We have already referred to the fact that a thorough furnishing of the man of God includes, not only the supply of all necessary material, but the intelligent use of that material. We shall therefore not be fully equipped if our "manner" spoils our "matter". A good housekeeper not only provides wholesome food, but sees to it that it is not spoiled in the cooking.

> "As his manner was, Paul went in unto them, and three sabbath days reasoned with them out of the Scriptures. Opening and alleging . . . . ." (Acts xxvii. 2, 3).

Dialegomai, "reasoning", indicates an argument in which two or more speakers take part, or in which one speaker argues out the "pros and cons" of his subject. A good example of this method is exhibited in Rom. vi. and vii. where (four times) the Apostle interposes a possible objection, and (four times) gives a reasonable refutation and positive reply. The word translated "opening" is dianoigo, and is used of opening the scriptures, opening the heart, and opening the understanding (Acts xvi. 14; Luke xxiv. 32 and 45). "Alleging" is paratithemi, "to place beside". Its first occurrence in the N.T. is associated with parables, where it is translated "to put forth" (Matt. xiii. 24), a mode of teaching in which one thing is placed beside (para) another, thus, "The field is the world" (Matt. xiii. 38). The Apostle's method therefore was twofold. First, he opened up the Scriptures. This would involve, not only quotation, but any needed explanation to make plain the inspired sense to the hearer. Then he compared scripture with scripture, and scripture with historic fact, or with feeling, and so produced a convincing argument. There was one further element that Paul added to his manner of preaching which vivified his reasoning and alleging: he "testified" or "bore witness" to the truth he expounded. With this word he summed up his early ministry, "testifying both to the Jews, and also to the Greeks, repentance toward God, and faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ" (Acts xx. 21). From this time he looked forward to entering upon his second great ministry, "to testify the gospel of the grace of God" (Acts xx. 24), and with this expounding and testifying he brought his ministry to Israel to a close (Acts xxviii. 23).

Paul's message was the testimony of a lover of the Scriptures, not the mere deliverance of a doctrinaire. The alphabet he used may have been learned at the feet of Gamaliel, but the gospel he preached he learned at the foot of the cross. His learning and logic was made a living thing by reason of his personal testimony. He was both preacher and teacher. He brought good tidings of great joy; he announced the message given him with no uncertain sound, and he taught, and "showed", as the word translated "doctrine" indicates, the unfolding of the mind and will of God. He knew by bitter experience the bondage of legalism; he knew what pride of race and religion could never give. He knew the conflict that the believer experiences, for he confessed that when he would do good evil was present with him; and so he emphasizes the need for sympathy with our hearers in all their pilgrim experiences.

Turning from the example of Paul to some who served with him in the gospel, we learn another important lesson in Christian equipment. In Acts xviii. 24-28 we read of a man named Apollos, who was both "mighty" in the scriptures and an "eloquent" man. We might be pardoned for believing that such a man was "throughly furnished". Yet Aquila and Priscilla evidently thought otherwise, for they took him home, and there "expounded to him the way of God more perfectly". These faithful servants of Christ enabled Apollos to sort out his already abundant material; to arrange, to classify, to differentiate, to complete (for he knew only "the baptism of John"). In other words, he was led to see the need for "rightly dividing the Word of truth", and as a consequence he "helped them much which had believed through grace", besides "mightily" convincing the Jews (Acts xviii. 27, 28).

In conclusion, it must not be forgotten that the thorough furnishing of the Christian worker will not be attained unless he adds to all that has been brought forward such qualities as "lowliness of mind". While at one time the Apostle would "magnify" his office, at another he would recognize that he was indeed "less than the least of all saints".

The Apostle was consistent. His preaching and his practicing went hand in hand. "Thou hast fully known my doctrine, manner of life". Thus he not only taught the church to support the weak, but he could say, “These hands have ministered . . . . . I have shewed you . . . . .” (Acts xx. 34, 35).

While the Apostle had no confidence in the flesh, he had great confidence in His Lord. He was not to be made ashamed or intimidated by persecution, opposition or desertion; he “knew” Whom he had believed.

The word exartizo which we have been considering is used for the “fitting out of a ship”. Now the world has a proverb which says, “There is no back door to a ship”, the obvious meaning being that the equipment of a ship for a voyage must be thorough, comprising within itself provision for all possible contingencies, and it is the glory of the Scriptures that are given by inspiration of God, that such an equipment for the man of God is their special province.

So far we have pondered the fact and the meaning of the equipment; in our next study we must examine this complete equipment in relation to its context.

Time and Place.

or
The Scriptural association of chronology and topography with doctrine and purpose.

#1. A definition and a vocabulary.
pp. 189, 190

No experience is so fundamental to the human consciousness as the necessary relation of time, space and event. The human mind is so constructed that "an event" that took place at no time and in no place is inconceivable. Philosophy may entertain the idea that Absolute Being is unrelated to time and space, and the Scriptural title I AM suggests an eternal present, but the pursuit of this theme is forbidden by Scripture, for we read:

> "He hath set the olam (age) in their heart, so that no man can find out the work that God maketh from the beginning to the end" (Eccles. iii. 11).

If this is man's limitation regarding the "work" of God, how much more must he be limited when the subject is the Person of God Himself.

The various attempts to define the fundamental conceptions of time and space have filled volumes. Time has been defined as "the measure of movement", and this is certainly true, if not the whole truth. We cannot speak of a speed of "20 miles"; we must say "20 miles per minute, per hour, per day, etc.". Time, therefore, in this definition, is indissolubly linked with space, which is implied by "movement", for one can only move from one place to another. However, while recognizing this aspect of our subject, we have no intention of pursuing it. Our theme is by no means a philosophical inquiry.

Time and place, being two of the fundamental conceptions of human thought, must necessarily find their place in a book that purports to speak to the understanding, and we are sure that an acquaintance with the time "when" and the place "where" its events took place, will be a contribution to our understanding of its glorious doctrines. We shall also be obliged to take cognizance of Scriptural chronology, for the O.T. is vitally associated with a chronology that links Adam with Christ. We shall seek to demonstrate the accuracy of that chronology, and deal with some of the problems it raises. We make no pretence, however, to any special qualifications in this science, and shall be content to use the studies of others in so far as they are in harmony with the Scriptures. Where authorities differ and Scriptural harmony is not attainable, we shall be content to leave the matter.

The place where any event took place is also constantly noted in the Scriptures, and this will involve a knowledge of Ancient and Modern Geography. Like chronology, this, too, is a subject for the specialist, and where authorities differ, we must be content to wait. We believe, for example, most surely that a garden was planted in Eden, even though we may be bewildered by the variety of suggestions made by scholars as to the exact place on the map that should be assigned to it.

Before we begin our study of time and place and their relation to doctrine, let us first acquaint ourselves with the different words used by the inspired writers in connection with time. We will take the Hebrew first.

Zeman . . . Translated in the A.V. "season", "time" and as a verb, "to prepare".
Zaman . . . Translated in the A.V. "time", "appointed time", "season"; and as a verb, "consider", "think", "purpose", "devise", "imagine", "plot".

It is evident that the underlying meaning of this word is "time, with special reference to its fitness"; hence an "appointed time" or "season".

Yom . . . Translated in the A.V. 116 times "day" and 65 times "time", together with a great variety of other words, ranging from "weather" to "yearly". "Day" may be accepted as the fundamental meaning of the word, with the understanding that it is not always limited to a period of twenty-four hours.

Moed . . . Translated in the A.V. "congregation" 149 times, and then "appointed time", "appointed season", "time", "feast", and allied ideas. This word is derived from yaad, "to appoint, as a place or time", and so "to meet with others at an appointed place".

Iddan . . . Translated in the A.V. "time" 13 times. The word is derived from adah, "to go or to pass". From this comes ad, variously translated "for ever", "perpetually", etc. Its basic meaning may be seen in the adverb ad, "till", "yet", etc. From adah is also derived:

Eth . . . Translated in the A.V. "time" 257 times, "season", etc.

Olam . . . Translated in the A.V. "ever" and many other words. The primary meaning of the word is "age", and carries with it the idea of something hidden, from alam, "secret"—the length of the age being something beyond human knowledge.

Rosh . . . Translated in the A.V. "head" 349 times, and when used of time, "beginning" and "first".

Dor . . . Translated in the A.V. mostly by "generation".

Teledoth . . . Translated in the A.V. "generation", "family", "origin", "family history".

These are the most important words used in the O.T. to denote the conception of "time". In the N.T. the most important corresponding Greek words are as follows:

Genea, "generation"; hemera, "day"; kairos, "season"; chronos, "time"; hora, "hour"; aion, "age"; and arche, "beginning".

With this introduction and list of words we must be satisfied for the present. In our next article we hope to take up the question of Time and Place in relation to Scriptural doctrine.

The SECOND EPISTLE to TIMOTHY.

#11. Crown and Prize (ii. 1 - 13).
pp. 14 - 17

The reader may remember that, appearing in the structure (Volume XXXI, page 130) as three corresponding pairs, there are three great topics that run through this epistle:

FORSAKEN.—i. 8-18 and iv. 9-18;
CROWN.—ii. 1-13 and iii. 10 - iv. 8;
APPROVED, or DISAPPROVED.—ii. 14-26 and iii. 1-9.

We have seen that, although forsaken by most of those who should have stood by him, the Apostle is nevertheless not ashamed, because the Lord was his Keeper. Moreover, we have seen that though the outlook was indeed black, there were mitigating elements, not the least being the "refreshing" ministry of Onesiphorus. On the whole, however, this great opening section is painted in somber colours. Timothy is told that, if he is to endure the pressure of those persecuting days he will need all the grace that is at his disposal. Consequently the second great section of the epistle, while using figures that emphasize labour, suffering and endurance, introduces the encouragement of reward and crown.

Most of our readers are acquainted with the relationship of the four basic prison epistles, but it may be useful to set out the relationship of Philippians with II Timothy, so that we may the better appreciate the place that Prize and Crown occupy in the doctrine of the mystery.

PHILIPPIANS.	|	Try the things that differ (i. 10 margin).
The Prize.	|	Strive (i. 27).
	|	Press toward mark (iii. 14).
	|	Not already perfect (teleioo) (iii. 12).
	|	Prize (iii. 14).
	|	Depart (i. 23).
	|	Offered (ii. 17).
II TIMOTHY.	|	Rightly divide the Word (ii. 15).
The Crown.	|	Strive (ii. 5).
	|	Course finished (iv. 7).
	|	Finished (teleo) (iv. 7).
	|	Crown (iv. 8).
	|	Depart (iv. 6).
	|	Offered (iv. 6).

There can be no reasonable doubt that these epistles form a pair, just as surely as do Ephesians and Colossians. Apart from other distinguishing features, the words "Depart" and "Offered" are enough evidence of the fact, for these words do not occur in any other of Paul's epistles.

The correspondence of the two epistles places together the two outstanding thoughts of the Prize and the Crown. There are some who see a difficulty here. They say that in Phil. iii. 14, the Apostle has a Prize in view, whereas in II Tim. iv. 8, it is a Crown, and that these different words must refer to different things. But is this so? We can deal with the objection in two ways, either of which will show that the conclusion drawn is false. Let us suppose that an athlete enters for a competition. It is announced that the winner of "The 500 yards" will receive a prize. He runs the race and comes in first, and on the appointed day goes forward to the dais, where a lady has honoured the Sports Club by consenting to give the Prizes. One after another of the successful competitors have gone forward, received their Prize, bowed and retired, amid the cheers of their fellows. Our "500 yards" winner now goes forward, and the lady, with a gracious smile, hands him a silver cup. To the amazement of all present he refuses the cup on the ground that he expected a "Prize". The thing is too ridiculous to continue—no one in his senses could ever entertain such an objection. If instead of a silver cup the lady had presented him with a purse of money, a live pig, a ticket for a cruise, it would still have constituted the Prize. Without being formal logicians each of us acts in such circumstances as though they had actually reasoned the matter out thus:-- just as is done in countless other cases, such as when we speak of a flower.

GENUS (Prize).

SPECIES.

Silver Cup. Live Pig. Purse of money. Ticket for cruise.

GENUS (A Flower).

SPECIES.

Rose. Lily. Buttercup. Orchid. Hawthorn.

There are some, however, who look with suspicion upon "Logic", forgetting that without reason and rule language itself would be but a collection of words.

We are, however, happy in being able to turn from any appearance of "reasoning" to the Scriptures themselves. We feel sure that, given his belief in the inspiration and authority of the Scriptures, the most strenuous opponent would agree with the following line of investigation and proof. Paul uses the words "Prize" and "Crown" in Phil. iii. and II Tim. iv., and uses them in contexts that both state and imply the figurative background of a race or athletic effort. If this same Paul, in a similar context, brings together Prize and Crown in such a manner as to leave no doubt that the Crown is the Prize in view, then we have settled beyond controversy two things, namely:

(1) In Paul's estimation, Prize and Crown are related as Genus and Species, and,
(2) A Prize, in Paul's usage, is something that may be won by effort or lost by negligence, and therefore must not be confused with a gift in grace, which is categorically declared to be "not of works".

The student of the Scriptures knows quite well that Paul has done all that we here claim. Here is the passage:--

"Know ye not that they which run in a race run all, but one receiveth the PRIZE? So run, that ye may obtain. And every man that striveth for the mastery is temperate in all things. Now they do it to obtain a corruptible CROWN: but we an incorruptible" (I Cor. ix. 24, 25).

Note the following features:

(1) The words "receiveth" in the clause "but one receiveth the prize", and "obtain", in the clause "to obtain a corruptible crown", are both translations of the one Greek word "lambano". They "receive" a prize; they "receive" a crown.

(2) The word "race' is the Greek word stadion, a word meaning originally "a furlong" but used in the Apostle's day, and even to the present day, for the place where athletic sports are held. Owing to the influence of the Latin the modern spelling of the word is stadium. It is utterly unscriptural, nay, it is anti-scriptural, to import into the epistles of Paul the conception that any believer "runs", as in a race, for either salvation, life, forgiveness, membership of the body, acceptance, or any of the wonderful blessings that constitute the high calling of the church of the mystery. If Paul uses "Prize" in Phil. iii. or "Crown" in II Tim. iv., and if he uses figures that are drawn from athletic sports, which he does, then in these epistles he is not dealing with the high calling itself, but with the prize, crown or reward that is associated with that high calling, and which is held out to encourage the believer to endure to the end.

(3) The word "run" is trecho. This is the word that is used in Heb. xii. 1, where the apostle exhorts the believer "to run with patience the race that is set before us".

(4) "To strive for mastery" is the translation of the Greek agonizomai. This is the word used by Paul in II Tim. iv. 7, when he says, "I have fought a good fight", where the crown is in view, and the word agon gives us the word "fight" in II Tim. iv. 7 and the word "race" in the passage already cited from Heb. xii. 1.

(5) One further link with II Timothy is found in I Cor. ix. The reader will have in mind that, following the section now before us (II Tim. ii. 1-13), we have the two central sections and that their key words are "Approved" or "Disapproved", Dokimos and Adokimos. This theme is also the sequence of I Cor. ix. 27. Our version translates the word "A castaway" and lends colour to the erroneous idea that a saved child of God can be lost. The word is "Disapproved", or, in its modern dress, "Disqualified" and has to do with the matter in hand, namely the running for the prize.

We have quoted from the epistle to the Hebrews, and the reader should remember that this epistle does not present the initial way of salvation, but addresses those who are already "holy brethren" and "partakers of the heavenly calling". It is they who are to consider the history of Israel in the wilderness so that they should not "seem to come short".

The reader who realizes the importance of thus rightly dividing the Word of truth, as it deals with gift and reward, should make himself familiar with the evidence that is available for the proof that Hebrews and Philippians are expositions of the same line of truth.

What Romans is to the dispensation obtaining during the Acts, Ephesians is to the dispensation of the mystery. Both are basic. What Hebrews is to Romans, namely, an exhortation to endure with a reward in view, Philippians is to Ephesians. The evidence for the parallel nature of Hebrews and Philippians will be found in our book "The Testimony of the Lord's Prisoner", page 194, and in the Volume XX, page 231.

As it is found in the epistle we are now considering, we have not attempted to give an exposition of the matter, but we believe we have demonstrated beyond the possibility of contradiction that when the Apostle speaks of Prize and Crown he has the same thing in mind, and that this Prize or Crown is in the nature of a reward and not to be confused with the gift of grace. Under the mistaken idea that reward cannot exist together with grace, there are some who would rule out from the dispensation of the mystery all thought of reward, but we have only to turn to the epistle to the Colossians to discover that there is no such antipathy.

Perhaps the full and unimpeachable acceptance of the believer in Christ, quite apart from the slightest merit on his side, is expressed in richest language in Col. i. Among these passages of full assurance we find the following:

> "Giving thanks unto the Father which hath MADE US MEET to be partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light" (Col. i. 12).

In the third chapter of this same epistle we read, in the exhortation of the Apostle to slaves:--

> "And whatsoever ye do, do it heartily, as to the Lord, and not unto men: knowing that of the Lord ye shall receive the REWARD of the inheritance: for ye serve the Lord Christ. But he that doeth wrong shall receive for the wrong which he hath done: and there is no respects of persons" (Col. iii. 23-25).

There can be no mistaking the fact that "service", not "salvation", is the background of this passage in Col. iii. The reward is given "for ye serve the Lord Christ". Not only so, but the fact is also revealed, that he that doeth wrong shall receive for the wrong that he hath done, and, lest we should raise the objection and say, "But Lord, this cannot be true of us; we are exceptions, being members of the one Body", the Lord adds the words, "and there is no respect of persons". Again, if the context of the other occurrences of this rebuke are considered, namely, Eph. vi. 9 and Rom. ii. 11, all idea of privilege in this connection will die.

The word "reward" in Col. iii. 24 is antapodosis and occurs in a slightly modified form (apodidomi) in II Tim. iv. 8, where the Apostle says:

> "Henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, shall give me (give me as a recompense) at that day."

To remove this element from the N.T. would be to mutilate practically every book and epistle. The opposition to the doctrine of rewards is but a species of Modernism, for Modernism rejects what it does not want to believe.

This article does not by any means exhaust the subject. There is much more than we have touched upon to the same effect in I Corinthians, Hebrews, Philippians and the Apocalypse. We have accomplished our object, however, if we have at least demonstrated that when the Apostle speaks in this second chapter of II Timothy of enduring, striving for mastery, reigning and receiving a crown, he means just exactly what the words ordinarily import.

#12. The enabling of Grace (ii. 1).
pp. 45 - 49

The Apostle began this epistle with personal references to himself and to Timothy. He drew attention to the fact that while he had been obliged to wrench himself away from his home and from his fathers, Timothy had enjoyed the blessings of a Christian home. These personal passages lead up to the impassioned statement and appeal:

> "God hath not given us the spirit of cowardice; but of power, and of love, and of a sound mind. Be not thou therefore ashamed . . . . ." (II Tim. i. 7, 8).

The Apostle does not hide from Timothy the fact that difficulties accompany the ministry of the truth, but he shows also the other side of the picture, the satisfying and all-sufficient presence of the Lord. All in Asia may forsake him, but the Lord never! After speaking of the refreshing ministry of Onesiphorus the somewhat strange words are added, "this thou knowest very well". The pronoun "thou" (the Greek su) is emphatic, for without the pronoun being used at all, it has to be expressed in English as e.g. in II Tim. i. 8. There is no su in this verse; it is enough to see the verb "Be ashamed". Wherever therefore we read the pronoun su, we know that urgency or emphasis is implied. Why then did the Apostle emphasize this fact of Timothy's knowledge here? As a help, let us first see exactly when and where he used this pronoun in the epistle as a whole.

The emphatic "Thou" (Su) in II Timothy.

A | i. 8. Su.—Thou knowest. Onesiphorus. The Lord give mercy.
B | c | ii. 1. Su.—Be strong. Things heard of (para) me.
d | ii. 3. Su.—Suffer evil (kakopatheo) as good soldier.
C | iii. 10. Su.—Fully followed my doctrine, manner of life.
B | c | iii. 14. Su.—Continue in things heard of (para) whom.
d | iv. 5. Su.—Watch, suffer evil (kakopatheo).
Do work of evangelist.
A | iv. 15. Su.—Beware. Alexander. The Lord reward.

Except it were demonstrated before one's eyes, one would scarcely credit that even the distribution of so small a word as su should so evidently be designed by the Spirit of truth. Yet, beyond cavil so it is. Obviously the opening and closing references are in correspondence and refer to others. The remainder associate Timothy with some phase of the Apostle's ministry. It may be necessary to explain that the word para, which occurs in ii. 1 and iii. 14, comes in the phrases “Heard of me” and “Of whom thou hast learned them”. In ii. 3 and iv. 5 the word kakopatheo, “suffer evil”, is used, while the central reference sums up the whole of the Apostle’s example. Those who use the R.V. will observe that the Revisers were a little uncertain as to whether they should read sugkakopathesan, “suffer hardship with me” and so lose the su, “thou”, but replacing it by sug, “with” or whether the Received Text should stand. But when once the perfect structure of these seven occurrences has been seen all doubt vanishes and the A.V. is seen to be correct.

In connection with these structures, perhaps it will be well if we remind the reader that we may claim to be discoverers, for we have not seen them in the writings of other commentators, but we are not inventors, for, whether we see them or not, the seven pronouns are there, with their contexts.

We understand therefore that the Apostle intentionally used the emphatic pronoun in i. 18 and in ii. 1 to compel Timothy to consider his own position in the light of the example of others. That this is so, the presence of the word “therefore” makes plain, just as we have opened this paragraph with the words “We understand therefore”, the reason being that we are concluding an argument based upon the material that has gone before. This particle oun, translated “therefore”, “then”, and similar connectives of argument, should never be passed over lightly.

We find the Apostle using this particle of argument several times in this letter to Timothy. Let us notice the occurrences.

A | i. 8. Be not thou therefore ashamed.—Appeal made to early upbringing and gift.
B | ii. 1. Be thou therefore strong.—Appeal made to be like Onesiphorus, but to avoid likeness to Phygellus and Hermogenes (i. 15).
C | ii. 3. Thou therefore endure.—Appeal to character of trust committed.
B | ii. 21. If a man therefore purge.—Appeal to be a golden vessel, and to avoid likeness to Hymenæus and Philetus (ii. 17).
A | iv. 1. I charge thee therefore.—Appeal to early training in Scripture and equipment.

Here are the five occasions upon which the Apostle used oun, and once again we cannot but marvel at the Divine superintendence of their order, even to the two pairs of names that come in the argument, Phygellus and Hermogenes, in the one case, and Hymenæus and Philetus in the other. The appeal, at the beginning and end, to Timothy’s home training in the Word would be very strong to one of his nature.

The third item in the Apostle’s appeal to Timothy is the use of the title “son”. “Thou therefore my son.” Three words are used in the N.T. to translate “son”. Huios, which carries with it some sense of the dignity of sonship, and teknon, which is more a term of endearment. The latter is derived from tikto, “to bear”, and is equivalent to the Scotch “bairn”. The third word, pais, also means a child, but does not so strongly convey the idea of endearment. It is sometimes translatable by the word “boy”, sometimes by the word “servant”, in much the same way as the word garcon is used in French.

The term employed by the Apostle when writing to Timothy is not the huios of dignified son-ship—Timothy was too shrinking, and the perils of the time were too great for that to be fitting—neither is it pais—for although Timothy was still a comparatively young man the Apostle wanted him to face the serious issues that would arise upon his own death—but teknon, "my dear child".

By taking together the two epistles written to Timothy, another important fact emerges. Let us see the way in which the word teknon is used in them.

A | I Tim. i. 2. Salutation.
B | I Tim. i. 18. Good warfare (Kalen strateian).
A | II Tim. i. 2. Salutation.
B | II Tim. ii. 1. Good soldier (Kalos stratiotes).

Once again, it is useless to debate the question of this distribution of terms, for we are faced with a fact, viz., that the Apostle uses this word teknon in these two epistles with one object, to encourage Timothy in the good fight of faith.

While it has taken us some time both to set out the features and to acquaint ourselves with the associated arguments, we must remember that, by Timothy, these things would at least be sensed on perusal, if not actually seen. He would recall that in the earlier epistle the endearing term "child" had preceded the exhortation to wage a good warfare and, surrounded by fears and conscious of the growing presence of the enemy, the repetition in II Tim. ii. 1 would strike him forcibly.

In the first epistle Timothy was encouraged by being reminded that the Lord had marked him out for service by "prophecies that went before", and there can surely be no encouragement to persevere like that which comes from the consciousness that one is definitely called to a work, for the Lord's commands are always His enablings.

In the second epistle the Apostle does not so much call upon Timothy to rest upon the fact of the Divine call, as to realize that, having received the call, and having been endowed with the gifts necessary for performance of the work involved, there was also an element of responsibility laid upon him; consequently in this epistle the Apostle calls upon Timothy to stir up the gift of God, which was in him by the laying on of the Apostle's hands. He reverts to this later in the chapter when he says, "That good thing which was committed unto thee keep by the holy ghost which dwelleth in us" (II Tim. i. 14). Here, once more, the special gift of "holy spirit" is intended, for the words are without the article. All this the Apostle gathers up in II Tim. ii. 1, when he says, "Thou, therefore, my son, be strong in the grace that is in Christ Jesus".

On many occasions the writers of Scripture not only positively state their line of doctrine, but condescend to give also the negative side. For example, Eph. iv. 1 opens with the positive "Walk worthy": the section closes with the negative "Walk not as the Gentiles" (Eph. iv. 17). So in Phil. iii. 17-20, the Apostle points to his own example, but also includes a warning concerning those whose bad example must be avoided.

When dealing with the question of "power" (for the words "be strong" are the translation of endunamoo, and dunamis means "power") many a teacher immediately goes back to Pentecost, to supernatural gifts, to the phenomena of the Acts, whereas, for the member of the body of Christ the one great source of all power is that which raised up Christ from the dead and seated Him far above all (Eph. i. 19-23). Inasmuch as Timothy had been called and commissioned during the Acts period, he had special gifts, as did Paul himself, but even so, there is only one reference in II Tim. to the "spirit" in connection with "power", namely, in the opening exhortation of II Tim. i. 6, 7. Neither the present writer nor the reader has received a gift by the laying on of an apostle's hands, and even Timothy, who had, was pointed away from such gifts to the power in "Christ Jesus". So also the Apostle himself testified and had experienced, as we shall see.

There are eight occurrences of endunamoo in the N.T., and it will be helpful to have them before us, so that we may see how the mighty power that the Apostle experienced is spoken of. An examination of the contexts of several of these references will prove that it is "the power of His resurrection" that is in view.

> "But Saul increased the more in strength" (Acts ix. 22).
> "But was strong in faith" (Rom. iv. 20).
> "Be strong in the Lord" (Eph. vi. 10).
> "Who hath enabled me" (I Tim. i. 12).
> "Thou therefore, my son, be strong in the grace . . . . . in Christ Jesus" (II Tim. ii. 1).
> "The Lord stood with me, and strengthened me" (II Tim. iv. 17).
> "Out of weakness were made strong" (Heb. xi. 34).

In the first epistle Paul had told Timothy that, in spite of the unlovely features of his past life, the Lord's call to the office of an apostle was accompanied by "enabling". Paul recounted how he had been a blasphemer, a persecutor, and injurious, yet, as Timothy well knew, the Lord enabled him. Again, in II Tim. iv., in another context of extreme difficulty, this time, not the Apostle's failure, but the failure and opposition of others, is fully met by this same enabling. Paul was now in prison, withstood by some, forsaken by others, yet, in spite of it all, the Lord strengthened him so that even there, and at that time, the preaching was fully known and all the Gentiles heard. How could Timothy resist the appeal set in these two extremes? "Thou, therefore, my son, be strong in the grace that is in Christ Jesus".

While the Apostle had to record that in his younger days he was a blasphemer, Timothy is reminded of the piety of his mother and grandmother, and his early training in Christian truth. Now, where Paul was already a doomed prisoner, Timothy was free. While Paul was now "aged" Timothy was comparatively young. If the Lord's enabling was sufficient for Paul, it would be also for Timothy.

Finally, let us see how the Apostle has used this word "grace", not only for the initial fact and plan of salvation, but for all after life and service. Not only does he affirm that "by the grace of God I am what I am", but he declares that the grace bestowed upon him enabled him to labour "more abundantly than they all", adding: "yet not I, but the grace of God which was with me" (I Cor. xv. 10).

He speaks in Rom. i. 5 of having received "grace and apostleship", or perhaps better, "apostolic grace", and the implication is that teachers will receive teaching grace, and evangelists, evangelistic grace; in fact "unto every one of us is given grace according to the measure of the gift of Christ" (Eph. iv. 7). Writing to Titus the Apostle said, "The grace of God that bringeth salvation . . . . . teaches us" (Titus ii. 11, 12). It is therefore a serious mistake to limit grace to initial salvation: grace operates throughout the whole Christian life; it is at the disposal of the believer at all times, and as the Apostle once so thankfully declared, it is "sufficient" (II Cor. iii. 5), for although the actual word "grace" may not appear in that verse, the sentiment is too similar to that of I Cor. xv. 10 to leave any doubt in the mind as to what the Apostle referred to.

This grace, that was so fully and freely at Timothy's disposal, is "in Christ Jesus". That necessarily sets the seal of God upon it, and pledges the whole of heaven's strength on behalf of the tried believer. His faith "in Christ Jesus" had proved sufficient to make him wise unto salvation (II Tim. iii. 15), and the promise of life "in Christ Jesus" held good whatever man might do or say (II Tim. i. 1). We have the comfort and assurance that our salvation is no afterthought, but that we are the subjects of a purpose and grace that was given us "in Christ Jesus" before age-times (II Tim. i. 9). The grace of the Lord is so exceedingly abundant, that even faith and love are included "in Christ Jesus" (I Tim. i. 14; II Tim. i. 13), and so the Apostle exhorts his son Timothy to be strong in the only strength—"strong in grace"—that can enable in such a conflict, and points away from human upbringing, lovely and precious as it may be; points away from weakness and fear, discouraging and paralyzing though they be; to the fount of all grace, the guarantee of "good success", the One in Whom the weakest may stand "more than conqueror" in Christ Jesus.

#13. The transmission of the Truth (ii. 2).
pp. 87 - 92

We have considered the exhortation of II Tim. ii. 1, where the Apostle calls upon his son Timothy to be strong in the grace that is in Christ Jesus. We now turn our attention to the purpose for which this strengthening grace was bestowed.

> "And the things that thou hast heard of me among many witnesses, the same commit thou to faithful men, who shall be able to teach others also" (II Tim. ii. 2).

While of necessity Timothy would be called upon sometimes to preach and sometimes to teach the Word, that is not the point of the Apostle's statement here. He focuses attention on one thing, "the same commit". To understand what he intends by "the same" we must, perforce, understand the first half of the verse, "the things which thou hast heard of me", and to understand the second half of the verse and consider the character of those who were to be thus entrusted.

One of the reasons why Timothy needed such God-given strength is found in the nature of the testimony he was called upon to give. Its chief exponent was a prisoner and one who would soon pay the price of faithfulness in his life's blood, consequently the Apostle prefaces the call to follow in his steps by a reference to "power":

> "For God hath not given us the spirit of fear; but of power (dunamis), and of love, and of a sound mind. Be not thou therefore ashamed of the testimony of our Lord, nor of me his prisoner: but be thou partaker of the afflictions of the gospel, according to the power (dunamis) of God" (II Tim. i. 7, 8).

Although disguised by the English "to be able", in his own personal testimony the Apostle introduces the thought of power:

> "For the which cause I also suffer these things; nevertheless I am not ashamed: for I know Whom I have believed, and am persuaded that He is able (dunatos) to keep that which has been committed, against that day" (II Tim. i. 12).

From the initial call of the Apostle on the road to Damascus, suffering for the truth and for the Name of the Lord went hand in hand with his ministry (Acts ix. 16). When brought together, the list of things that Paul endured is staggering, but if the contemplation of them makes the stoutest heart quail, surely the record of the grace that sustained him should embolden the weakest. So sure is the Apostle that the sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the future glory, that after he has given a most appalling list of sufferings, he suddenly calls upon his hearers to step out into these sufferings in joyous fellowship.

This matter is too vital, both to the understanding of II Timothy and to ourselves, to leave with only these casual comments. We need to see for ourselves what the Scriptures say. Take the dreadful list in I Cor. iv. 9-13. The Apostle likens himself and his fellow-workers to Roman criminals, in this respect, that they were "set forth last", as in the arena games, a culminating sight, to satisfy the blood lust of the populace, which was glutted by the sight of these criminals, forced to expiate their crimes by mutual slaughter. Added to this he says that he was a "fool", "weak", "despised"; suffering hunger and thirst, nakedness and buffeting, with no certain dwelling-place. Labouring and working, being resisted and persecuted, he says, "We are made as the filth of the world, and are the offscouring of all things, unto this day". Yet, though reckoned literally as "the scum of the earth", this glorious fool for Christ's sake has the blessed effrontery to conclude this list of horrors by saying to the Corinthians:

> "Wherefore I beseech you, be ye followers of me" (I Cor. iv. 16).

The same true, uncrushable, invincible trust is seen in II Cor. iv. There he contrasts the earthen vessel with the power of God, and after giving another series of sufferings that are summed up in the words, "We which live are always delivered unto the death for Jesus' sake", he once more concludes on the optimistic note:

> "For our light affliction, which is but for a moment, worketh for us a far more exceeding eternal weight of glory, while we look not at the things which are seen" (II Cor. iv. 17, 18).

All this and more Timothy knew, for in II Tim. iii. 10, 11 the Apostle says: "But thou hast fully known (or followed) my doctrine, manner of life . . . . . what persecutions I endured", but the Apostle did not stay there; he adds, "But out of them all the Lord delivered me". Following this we have the appeal:

> "But continue thou in the things which thou hast learned and hast been assured of, knowing of whom thou hast learned them" (II Tim. iii. 14).

which is closely parallel with the exhortation of II Tim. ii. 2, "The things that thou hast heard of me".

When dealing with the first chapter of this epistle, we paid attention to the "good deposit" entrusted to Paul and which was to constitute a "pattern" for Timothy. While the Apostle insists in II Timothy, Ephesians and Colossians that to himself, and to himself alone, had been entrusted this sacred deposit of truth, and that he had been given the wondrous privilege of enlightening all as to what is the dispensation of the mystery (Eph. iii. 7-9), yet on the other hand he was ever careful to emphasize that what he had to make known was given to him by revelation (Eph. iii. 2, 3). Consequently in II Tim. ii. 2 and iii. 14 he chooses to use the word para, "beside", where we have the preposition "of" in the phrases "heard of me", "knowing of whom thou hast learned them". While the doctrine came from Paul, inasmuch as he had been entrusted with its proclamation, it did not originate with him but came "from above".

In II Tim. i. 13 he uses the same preposition, para, "Hold fast the pattern of sound words, which thou hast heard of me". To avoid ambiguity it would be better to have translated para by the word "from", so that the idea of origin should not be read into it, thus, "Heard from me", "From whom thou hast learned".

It will be observed that the Apostle would safeguard the message that Timothy was to pass on to others, for he says: "the things that thou hast heard of me among many witnesses." When instructing Timothy in matters of church discipline, the Apostle applied the Mosaic law, "Against an elder receive not an accusation, but before two or three witnesses" (I Tim. v. 19). When expounding the great doctrine of justification by faith, he is careful to bring forward the law and the prophets as "witnesses" (Rom. iii. 21). So, too, Timothy's good profession was not something secret or private; it had been made "before many witnesses" (I Tim. vi. 12).

While Timothy was strictly enjoined to pass on the same truth that he had heard of Paul, it was not something that could not be verified, and the Apostle safeguarded any tendency to make this insistence appear too personal by bringing in the attestations of many witnesses. In the earlier epistles he challenges his hearers to bear witness that what he continued to preach was what they had heard from him at the beginning (I Cor. xv. 1, 2, 11; Gal. i. 8).

In Timothy's day there was, of course, no such thing as a New Testament; the epistles had been written and were beginning to be circulated, but the witnesses would have to be those churches among whom the Apostle had laboured and who had received the epistles of the mystery. To-day we have no need to appeal to any authority or witness beyond the complete canon of Scripture, and for the distinctive teaching of the mystery, the four great prison epistles are all-sufficient: they constitute the good deposit.

The Apostle enjoins that this sacred deposit of truth shall be committed to a definite class of believer.

> "The same commit thou to faithful men, who shall be able to teach others also" (II Tim. ii. 2).

Note the order of the qualifications of these teachers: (1) Faithful; (2) Able. No degree of ability can compensate for unfaithfulness, while, conversely, it is true that a teacher must not only be faithful, but must have the ability to teach. The extremely important office of the teacher is manifested by the derivatives of didasko, "to teach". It would take us too far afield to follow all the ramifications of this word, but we shall profit by observing those which are used in II Timothy. First of all, the verb itself, didasko, "to teach". The word is probably derived from an obsolete verb, deikoto, "show", "exhibit", and, through the Latin, the Saxon word taecan: hence the English word teach: "Able to teach (didasko) others also" (II Tim. ii. 2).

From didasko comes didaskalos, "the teacher": "Whereunto I am appointed a preacher, and an apostle, and a teacher of the Gentiles" (II Tim. i. 11).

Didaskalia is the teaching of the didaskalos, the teacher, and is often translated doctrine, even as didaskalo is translated at times doctor (Luke ii. 46).

> "My doctrine" (II Tim. iii. 10).
> "Profitable for doctrine" (II Tim. iii. 16).
> "The time will come when they will not endure sound doctrine" (II Tim. iv. 3).

Didache, doctrine, the art of teaching: "Exhort with all longsuffering and doctrine" (II Tim. iv. 2).

Didaktikos, "Apt to teach" (II Tim. ii. 24).

In II Tim. ii. 2 the Apostle insists upon two things: the subject-matter (the doctrine) and the instrument (the teacher). Regarding the subject-matter, he has made it clear that it must conform to that good deposit entrusted to him and which constitutes the pattern for all concerned to follow. Regarding the instrument, he says the teachers shall be "faithful men" and that they shall be "sufficient to teach others". "It is required in stewards, that a man be found faithful" (I Cor. iv. 2).

We are not at liberty here to pass by the fact that the Apostle said "faithful men". If a writer in Greek wished to make his statement open, so that either sex could be included, facilities lay to his hand. For example, in II Tim. ii. 5, the A.V. reads, "If a man also strive for masteries", but this is the rendering of tis, "someone". So also in II Tim. ii. 21.

In the first epistle and in the companion epistle to Titus, the Apostle had given instruction as to the nature and extent of women's ministry. In other epistles he had expressed deep gratitude for the help and assistance of many sisters in Christ, but he makes it clear that it was not the Lord's will that women should teach (I Tim. ii. 12), and both in I Tim. ii. and in I Cor. xi. he goes back to the early chapters of Genesis for his reasons. These are as fundamentals as the facts of creation and of the fall upon which they are based, and those who are "faithful stewards" will neither argue, rebel, nor explain away these items of sound teaching.

To repeat, these faithful men must however be "apt to teach", or as II Tim. ii. 2 has it, they must be "sufficient" to be able to teach others. The word which we have translated, "sufficient" is hikanos and is derived from hikanoo, "to reach or attain unto". The word is a figure, and the idea of attaining, or reaching, becomes that of competence, ability, or sufficiency.

We come across different forms of the word in Col. i. 12, "to make meet" and in II Cor. iii. 5, "sufficient". In I Cor. xv. 9 it is rendered "I am not meet". It is most evident that the Apostle, who had already said of himself:

> "Not that we are sufficient of ourselves, to think any thing as of ourselves; but our sufficiency is of God, Who also hath made us able (hikanoo, sufficient) ministers of the New Covenant" (II Cor. iii. 5, 6).

had no thought that those who were described as "sufficient to teach" found their sufficiency in themselves; rather, he indicated a most important item of practical truth. The man who is called by God to visit the sick will have a truly blessed "bed-side manner". The man who cannot make himself heard in a small hall, whose speech is imperfect, who is lost for words, who can never overcome what is called "stage-fright", who finds it almost impossible to explain or illustrate the truth so that the young and inexperienced may learn; that man may be an appointed teacher, for grace can work wonders, but if the wonders are never wrought, both he and his hearers would be justified in believing that he had mistaken his calling.

The principle as to gifts already declared in Rom. xii. 6-8 is capable of unlimited expansion. It was this passing on, this entrusting of the right message to the right men that was the deep concern of the Apostle as he stood at the end of his course. He had finished. The foundation had been laid, but others must follow and build.

Here is the only apostolic succession that these epistles know. The privilege of thus continuing, however feebly, the glorious work commenced by such an apostle is overwhelming, but the same grace that equipped a Paul or a Timothy is at the disposal of the lowliest and weakest of his servants to-day, and will be until sower and reaper, planter and waterer, stand together in the presence of the Faithful Witness (Rev. i. 5) Himself.

#14. The Good Soldier.
Together with the structure of II Tim. ii. 1-13.
pp. 121 - 126

We have already devoted two articles to this third section of the epistle, but, before going further, it is imperative that we discover the structure, otherwise we shall miss the Divine underscoring, emphasize parts that appeal to ourselves, and so fail in our quest.

It has already been made evident that the testimony of the Lord's prisoner was not only despised and rejected but opposed and hated. The preceding section, II Tim. i. 8-18, opens with a reference to afflictions, as though the testimony of the Lord's prisoner and enduring afflictions necessarily went together. Three times in this brief compass of eleven verses we meet the word "ashamed"; "be not ashamed", "I am not ashamed", "he was not ashamed", while in verse 12 Paul categorically states that he suffered because he was a preacher, an apostle and a teacher of the Gentiles.

The Lord's answer to this discouraging aspect of things is the encouragement given in the third section, where suffering is intimately associated with reigning, and enduring with a crown.

Shorn of detail, the structure is resolved into three parts, thus:

II Timothy ii. 1 - 13.

A | 1-7. The Crown.
B | 8-10. I suffer, I endure.
A | 11-13. The Reign.

the key note being Suffering and Reigning. But the following fuller analysis is necessary to our understanding of the epistle, before we can effectively proceed to its exposition.

II Timothy ii. 1 - 13. Suffering and Reigning.

C1 | 1-7. Suffer evil (kakopatheo). C R O W N. |
i1 | 1, 2. Things heard of me.
j1 | k1 | 3. The SOLDIER.
l1 | 4. No entanglement.
k2 | 5. The ATHLETE.
l2 | 5. Contend lawfully.
k3 | 6. The HUSBANDMAN.
l3 | 7. Labour; more fruit.
C2 | 8, 9. I suffer evil (kakopatheo). |
i2 | 8. My gospel.
j2 | 9. Suffering unto bonds.
C3 | 9, 10. I endure (hupomeno). |
i3 | 9. The Word of God.
j3 | 10. Endurance for elect.
C4 | 11-13. If we endure (hupomeno). R E I G N. |
i4 | 11. The faithful WORD.
j4 | 13. The faithful LORD.
k4 | 11. If we died . . . live.
l4 | 12. If we endure . . . reign.
l4 | 12. If we deny . . . deny us.
k4 | 13. If we faithless . . . He faithful.

It will be observed that the fourfold reference to suffering, or enduring, is related to a fourfold reference to the ministry of the Apostle:--

"Things heard of me" (II Tim. i. 2).
"My gospel" (ii. 8).
"The Word of God" (ii. 9).
"The faithful word" (ii. 11).

Suffering for its own sake is to be avoided: it may be merely an exhibition of morbid and debased feelings. Suffering that comes upon us because of our own folly and misdeeds must be borne patiently and with penitence, but suffering that comes upon us because of the truth we hold and teach, should be a matter of rejoicing, not only for the honour put upon us to be counted worthy to suffer shame for the Name of the Lord, but because there is associated with this present suffering the crown and the prize.

In introducing this aspect of his teaching to Timothy the Apostle uses three figures, (1) The Soldier, (2) The Athlete, (3) The Husbandman. These are, as it were, the premises of his argument, and if we have unscriptural views as to these, we shall also have them in our conclusions.

Take the first figure, the Soldier. What we immediately associate with the profession of the soldier is fighting, but we look in vain in II Tim. ii. 3, 4 for reference to fighting qualities or fighting prowess, the Apostle's use of the word being restricted to the qualities of endurance and non-entanglement with the things of this life. We must therefore call a halt in our advance through this third section to make sure that the figures intended by Paul are understood by ourselves.

"The good soldier."—The word "good" is the translation in the N.T. (A.V.) of several words.

Agathos.—"The evil and the good" (Matt. v. 45).
Bios.—"This world's good" (I John iii. 17).
Eu.—"Ye may do them good" (Mark xiv. 7).
Kalon.—"When I would do good" (Rom. vii. 21).
Kalos.—"Bringeth not forth good fruit" (Matt. iii. 10).
Kalòs.—"Do good to them that hate you" (Matt. v. 44).
Chrestos.—"Evil communications corrupt good manners" (I Cor. xv. 33).
Chrestotes.—"There is none that doeth good" (Rom. iii. 12).

There are other occurrences of the word where the words so translated are compounds, such as "Be of good cheer", etc. These we have not tabulated.

The word used by Paul in II Tim. ii. 3 for "good" soldier is kalos. Cremer says of the two words agathos and kalos, that: "kalos is related to its synonym, agathos, as the appearance to the essence." Confining our attention to the second epistle to Timothy, we find that the Apostle uses agathos twice, "good works" (II Tim. ii. 21; iii. 17), and kalos thrice, viz.:

"That good thing which was committed" (II Tim. i. 14).
"Endure . . . . . as a good soldier of Jesus Christ" (II Tim. ii. 3).
"I have fought a good fight" (II Tim. iv. 7).

Here are three "good" things that are stressed in this epistle. Anticipating a possible objection to what has been observed as to the soldier and "fighting", we remark that the word "fight" in II Tim. iv. 7 is agon, a word meaning an athletic contest or race (Heb. xii. 1), which we must consider more fully when we reach the fourth chapter. The word translated "soldier" is stratiotes, and a variant of it appears in our own language in the words "stratagem" and "strategy", both of which refer to "the device of a general of an army". The following occurrences should be compared so that some true idea of the word may be obtained.

Strateia.—"Warfare" (II Cor. x. 4; I Tim. i. 18).
Strateuma.—"Army" (Matt. xxii. 7, etc.).
Strateuo.—"To war" (I Cor. ix. 7, etc.).
Strategos.—"Captain" (Luke xxii. 4, etc.).
Stratia.—"Host" (Luke ii. 13; Acts vii. 42).
Stratiotes.—"Soldier" (Acts xxviii. 16, etc.).
Stratologeo.—"To enroll a soldier" (II Tim. ii. 4).
Stratopedarche.—"Captain of the guard" (Acts xxviii. 16).
Stratopedon.—"Army" or "Camp" (Luke xxi. 20).

The true basis of the Apostle's teaching lies in what he says of the "good soldier", and to this we now turn. The Apostle was at liberty to select any one or more of the characteristics of the soldier. As he has done elsewhere, he could speak of his arms and of his armour; he could speak of his bravery, his discipline, his prowess, his obedience, his chivalry or his cruelty. But none of these things were in the Apostle's mind in the writing of II Tim. ii. 3, 4. What he selects and brings forward are:

(1) The quality of endurance, which was so fully exhibited in the Roman Soldier.
(2) The complete freedom from all business entanglements and property which was demanded of the Roman soldier upon his enrolment.

"Enduring hardness" is a passive quality and one not immediately associated with soldiering. Yet who is there that passed through the horrors of the Great War, whether personally or in imagination, that does not know that the long drawn-out horror of mud, filth and suspense of the trenches, demanded more from the soldier than the short, sharp, decisive, conflict of arms? These words, "Endure hardness", translate the Greek kakopatheo, "To suffer evil". Kakos is just the opposite of kalos, the word translated "good" in the same verse.

Josephus uses this word in his "Wars of the Jews", saying:

> "Now here it was that, upon the many hardships which the Roman underwent, Pompey could not but admire . . . . . the Jews' fortitude" (Wars of the Jews, i. 7. 4).

Again, in the "Antiquities of the Jews", speaking of the father of Nebuchadnezzar, he writes:

> "When his father heard that the governor . . . . . had revolted, while he was not himself able any longer to undergo the hardships of war, he committed to his son Nebuchadnezzar . . . . . some part of his army" (Ant. of Jews, x. 11. 1).

It is highly significant to learn that kakos, evil, is derived from chazo, to recede, retire, retreat in battle (So Eustath, quoted by Leigh). Homer and other Greek writers frequently use kakos in this sense (see Xen. An. ii. 6, 17. Eur. Phoen. 1022; Hom. Od. G. 375), and so the word meant cowardly, dastardly, faint-hearted. If these unsoldierly qualities inhere in the word kakos, "evil", one can readily appreciate the Apostle's choice of the word kalos for the "good" soldier.

In Matt. xxi. 41 we have brought together kakòs and kakos, "He will miserably destroy those wicked men".

Coming to the word kakopatheo, "to suffer evil", we find it in two forms and in all five references. Let us see them together:

Kakopatheia, "A suffering of evil".

> "Take, my brethren, the prophets, who have spoken in the name of the Lord, for an example of suffering affliction, and patience" (James v. 10).

Kakopatheo, "To suffer evil".

> "Thou therefore endure hardness (kakos), as a good (kalos) soldier of Jesus Christ" (II Tim. ii. 3).
> "Wherein I suffer trouble (kakos), as an evil doer (kakos)" (II Tim. ii. 9).

"Endure affliction, do the work of an evangelist" (II Tim. iv. 5).
"Is any among you afflicted? Let him pray" (James v. 13)
Sugkakopatheo, "To suffer evil together".
"Be thou partaker of the afflictions of the gospel according to the power of God" (II Tim. i. 8).

The reader will have noticed that this word is confined to the epistles written to Timothy and to the epistle of James. From one point of view these epistles are poles asunder, yet, if we make due allowances for dispensational distinctions, we shall find that they are united by a common theme. Is II Timothy the epistle of the crown? So also is the epistle of James. Does Paul associate the crown of righteousness with suffering evil and patient endurance? James associates the same endurance with the crown of life, "Blessed is the man that endureth temptation: for when he is tried, he shall receive the crown of life" (James i. 12). Does the Apostle Paul associate the crown of righteousness with "loving His appearing?" (II Tim. iv. 8). James says that the crown of life is promised by the Lord "to them that love Him" (James i. 12). Does the Apostle Paul speak of "finishing" (teleo) his course? James speaks of "perfecting" of the faith (teleioo) and the "perfect" work of patience.

In addition to this willingness to suffer evil, the Apostle says of the good soldier: "No man that warreth entangleth himself with the affairs of this life" (II Tim. ii. 4). Conybeare and Howson translate the above passage:

"The soldier when on service", and draw attention to the force of strateuomenos.
The military law of Rome did not allow a soldier to engage in merchandise or mechanical employment; armis non privitas negotus occupari.

The word "entangle" is a translation of empleko and occurs only once more in the N.T., namely in II Pet. ii. 20. Emploke, a noun form, occurs in the reference to "plaiting the hair" (I Pet. iii. 3). Pleko, from which these words are formed, is found three times translated "To plait", as the crown of thorns (Matt. xxvii. 29; Mark xv. 17; John xix. 2). There is a reference to empleko in the LXX version of Prov. xxviii. 18 which reads in that version, "He that walks uprightly is assisted; but he that walks in crooked ways shall be entangled" (Prov. xxviii. 18). A similar idea, but expressed by a different word, is found in Heb. xii. 1 where the runner is enjoined to lay aside every weight and the "easily encompassing" sin.

That which the Apostle says will "entangle" the good soldier, if he yields, is called "the affairs of this life". "Affairs" translates pragmateia, and pragma is variously rendered "business", "work" "matter", "thing". Pragmateuomai is the word that gives us "occupy" in Luke xix. 13. From the verb prasso has come into our own tongue the words "practice", "practical", and the like.

The affairs, or business, which the soldier is to avoid, are "the affairs of this life". The word translated "life" here is not zoe but bios, and refers more to the "livelihood" than the life-principle itself. Here are some examples of its usage and meaning:--

"She did cast in all that she had, even all her living" (Mark xii. 44).

"A woman . . . . . spent all her living upon physicians" (Luke viii. 43).
"He divided unto them his living" (Luke xv. 12).

Biosis gives us "manner of life" (Acts xxvi. 4), and bioo "live", in the sense of manner of life (I Pet. iv. 2).

Very near to the meaning of the Apostle in II Tim. ii. 4 is the word biotikos:

"And take heed to yourselves, lest at any time your hearts be overcharged with surfeiting, and drunkenness, and cares of this life" (Luke xxi. 34).

We have not arrived at a stage in our studies where we can "point the moral". All our time and attention has been devoted to the acquisition of some Scriptural conception of the terms employed by the Apostle. But before we are ready to gather the lesson intended by the Apostle we shall need to examine the figures of the athlete and the husbandman. These we must consider in a subsequent article, and we trust that no reader will consider the time ill-spent that endeavours to ascertain the meaning of the words "which the Holy Ghost teacheth; comparing spiritual things with spiritual" (I Cor. ii. 13).

#15. The Athlete and the Husbandman (ii. 5, 6).
pp. 182 - 185

We have examined the words used in the first of the three figures employed by Paul in II Tim. ii. 1-13, namely "The good soldier". We now pass on to the remaining two, "The Athlete" and "The Husbandman".

To pass so easily from the figure of the soldier to that of the athlete is a transition quite in harmony with the Apostle's thought and teaching. The classic example of course is Eph. vi. 11, 12, where the Apostle sees no incongruity in speaking of one clad from head to foot in armour and equipped with sword and shield, as engaged in "wrestling".

"Strive for mastery" translates the Greek word athleo. This word covered all the public games, such as running, wrestling and boxing, in which competitors met and struggled for the victor's crown. In Heb. x. 32 we have the word athlesis, "a great fight", associated with endurance and suffering. The exhortation that follows this enumeration of sufferings refers to the "great recompense of reward" (Heb. x. 35) which awaited the sufferers. In Phil. i. 27 and iv. 3 we have the compound form, sunathleo, "To strive together", and the whole of the epistle to the Philippians is written in the atmosphere of conflict and race, with a prize in view.

When we come to the references made by the Apostle to this conflict and crown in II Tim. iv. 7, 8, we shall have to extend our studies. Meanwhile we pass on to observe what is particularly said of the athlete here. As with the figure of the soldier, so again here the Apostle might have chosen for notice many qualities. He could have referred to the endurance displayed by these athletes; he could have repeated what he says in I Cor. ix. concerning their self-discipline and temperance, but these he had already introduced in connection with the good soldier. Here, he passes on to make the most important observation that "If a man also strive for masteries, yet is he not crowned, except he strive lawfully" (II Tim. ii. 5). It is this point that the Apostle wishes to make and which is repeated in doctrinal terms in verse 12, "If we suffer, we shall reign with Him; if we deny Him, He will also deny us". Those who transgressed the laws governing the Greek games were fined. Pausanias tells us that at Olympia, there were six statues of Jupiter made from fines imposed upon those who had not "contended lawfully". Epictetus speaks of the severe discipline to which the contestants were subjected, using very similar terms to those which occur in I Cor. ix. He says,

> "You wish to conquer at the Olympic games? so also do I; for I it is honourable: but bethink yourself what this attempt implies, and then begin the undertaking. You must submit yourself to a determinate course; must submit to dietetic discipline; must pursue the established exercises at fixed hours, in heat and cold; must abstain from all delicacies in meat and drink; yield yourselves unreservedly to the control of the presiding physicians, and even endure flogging" (Epictetus, Enchiridion).

The rigorous examination to which the candidates had to submit before being permitted to enter the contest throws further light upon the meaning of this rule that contestants must "strive lawfully". They had to satisfy their examiners as to whether they were slaves or freemen, and whether they were true Greeks. This was amplified in the public stadium by the herald laying his hand upon the head of the candidate and asking, "Can any accuse this man of any crime? Is he a robber, or a slave? or wicked or depraved in his life?" Finally if the candidate satisfactorily passed this ordeal he was taken to the altar of Jupiter where he was required to swear that he had gone through the discipline enjoined, and that he would abstain from every breach of the laws governing the contest.

Paul makes direct allusion to this in I Cor. ix. 24-27, where the race, the prize, the crown, the discipline, are all emphasized. In the concluding sentence Paul refers to the office of the herald, and the possibility, that he, after heralding to others, should himself be "disapproved" and fail to pass the equivalent of the examination to which we have referred. When referring to his own expectations regarding the race, the crown and the prize his language is characterized by extreme humility. Here, in I Cor. ix., he expresses the thought that he may not even pass the entrance examination. In Phil. iii. he has got as far as to be in the running, but has neither "apprehended" nor reached his goal, and not until he pens the last of his epistles can he say, "I have finished my course . . . . . henceforth a crown" (II Tim. iv. 7, 8).

The time to deal more fully with this subject will be when we come to the central members of II Timothy where the key words are dokimos, ("approved") and adokimos ("disapproved").

Meantime we must still refrain from any attempt to apply the teaching of the passage to the believer, and must also make one more survey in order to embrace the threefold figure used by the Apostle in this passage.

The Husbandman.—The word so translated is georgos, the origin of our English name George, and which means "an earth worker", ge meaning "the earth" and ergo "to work". This work establishes another link between II Timothy and the epistle of James (see previous article), for the only other occurrence of georgos in the epistle is in James:

> "Behold the husbandman waiteth for the precious fruit of the earth, and hath long patience for it, until he receive the early and later rain" (James v. 7).

Here, as in II Tim. ii., patient waiting is associated with harvest. The English "husbandman" is derived from hus (Old English) a house, and bondi (old Norse) to dwell, and so does not originally mean a married man, but a peasant owning his own house and land; a freeholder, or yeoman.

Apart from the two references already given, the remaining seventeen occurrences of georgos in the N.T. are found in the Gospels, where the husbandman are usually associated with a vineyard. (Matt. xxi.; Mark xii; Luke xx. and John xv.). One occurrence of the verb georgeomai is found in Hebrews; and there the use of the word transfers the teaching of II Tim. ii. from the husbandman himself to the field that he cultivates.

> "For the earth which drinketh in the rain that cometh oft upon it, and bringeth forth herbs meet for them by whom it is dressed (georgeomai), receiveth blessing from God: but that which beareth thorns and briars is rejected (adokimos, 'castaway', I Cor. ix. 27, see note above) and is nigh unto cursing; whose end is to be burned" (Heb. vi. 7, 8).

The next verse shows that salvation is not in view here, but "things that accompany salvation". In like manner, the "reigning" or the "denying" of II Tim. ii. 12, 13 has not to do with salvation itself, but the added glory that may go with it. Yet once more, georgion, "husbandry", occurs in I Cor. iii., a passage dealing, not with salvation but service; not with foundation but superstructure; not with the possibility of "being lost" but with the possibility of "suffering loss", while at the same time "being saved so as through fire".

It is not the husbandman merely that is in view in II Tim. ii.: the original reads, Ton kepionta georgon, "The toiling husbandman". Kopias, it to "labour", "toil", even to weariness—from kopto, "to strike". There are 23 occurrences of this verb in the N.T. and of these 14 occur in Paul's epistles. It is usually translated by the word "labour", but there is one reference where the idea of fatigue is uppermost, "Being wearied with His journey" (John iv. 6).

Kopos, "labour", occurs 14 times in the N.T. and is once translated "weariness": "In weariness and painfulness" (II Cor. xi. 27). We have already referred to I Cor. iii. in connection with the word "husbandry", and we find that in that passage the Apostle speaks of one's "own reward according to his own labour" (I Cor. iii. 8). Toil, says the Apostle, must come before partaking of the fruits, even as endurance must come before the award of a crown.

There are some who would refer the word "first" in II Tim. ii. 6 to the verb "toiling" rather than to the verb "partaking". It is a truth, certainly, that the husbandman must toil first before he can partake of the fruits, but it seems fairly certain that the meaning of the Apostle here is that, having toiled, he ought to be "a first-partaker" of the fruits (See Companion Bible). Valpy is of the opposite opinion, which is however shared neither by the A.V. nor the R.V. Conybeare and Howson say: "The Authorized Version, not its margin, is here correct" and translate: "The husbandman who toils must share the fruits of the ground before the idler." This is the thought of the Apostle in all his references to the prize, the out-resurrection, the better resurrection, etc. Wordsworth's note is:

> "The Apostle here alludes to that system of husbandry, according to which the georgos, or tenant, who tilled the ground, was allowed to participate with the landlord in the fruits of the soil, such as wine, oil, corn—and paid a portion to the landlord as rent (Matt. xxi. 34) . . . . . according to his kopos (labour) so will his karpos (fruit) be."

We trust these notes will have brought before the reader with some clearness not only the three figures themselves, but a realization of the Apostle's intention in the choice of them.

Before concluding let us set out the threefold figure, together with the particular points that the Apostle desired to make.

The GOOD SOLDIER . . .	Endurance . . .	Non-entanglement.
The ATHLETE . . .	The Crown . . .	Keeping the rules.
The HUSBANDMAN . . .	Toil . . .	First partaker of fruits.

It will be seen that the three figures, having served their purpose, can be expunged, thus throwing into relief the three words which embody the teaching upon which the exhortations are based.

We must in our next article see how these figures with their associated qualities are connected with the remainder of the passage. Meanwhile it will be a healthy exercise for us all to search our own hearts and ways to see how far we conform, by abounding grace, to either or all of these examples. Unless there be a fairly close conformity, our attitude should be that of the Apostle who wondered whether, after all, he would be reckoned to be adokimos, and therefore not be allowed even to start the contest.

#16. Consideration and Understanding (ii. 3-7).
pp. 194 - 199

The last two articles have been largely devoted to material, any spiritual application of its teaching being deferred until it was in some measure appreciated at its Scriptural value.

It is evidently intentional that there should be three "good" (kalos) things mentioned in II Timothy, and that these should be associated:

(1) THE GOOD DEPOSIT (II Tim. i. 14).
(2) THE GOOD SOLDIER (II Tim. ii. 3).
(3) THE GOOD CONTEST (II Tim. iv. 7).

The first comes in an exhortation to Timothy himself, in which he is urged to "guard" that good deposit of sacred truth which had been entrusted to him. The second is an impersonal figure, setting before Timothy the qualities so necessary to be possessed if this sacred trust is to be maintained. The third is the clinching example of the Apostle himself—he had endured; the crown was won. In each case there is insistence upon the ministry of the Word, and the particular ministry associated with the apostle Paul.

In the context of the first we find the exhortation, "Be not thou therefore ashamed of the testimony of the Lord, nor of me His prisoner", coupled with joyful acceptance of "the afflictions of the gospel" (II Tim. i. 8). This is followed by a reference to the Apostle's suffering and ministry (II Tim. i. 11, 12), and then the exhortation to "hold fast the form of sound words" which Timothy had heard of Paul.

The passage however is not without its comfort and strength. If afflictions are to be expected, they can be endured "according to the power of God" (II Tim. i. 8). If Paul is forsaken and suffering, he knows Whom he has believed, and is persuaded that He can keep until that day (II Tim. i. 12). So also the enjoinment to guard the good deposit is not made without a reminder that it is to be accomplished "by the Holy Ghost which dwelleth in us" (II Tim. i. 14).

So, when we come to the context of the second "good" thing, the good soldier, we find emphasis laid upon the special ministry and message of the apostle Paul: "The things heard of me"; "according to my gospel" (II Tim. ii. 2, 8). There is the same emphasis upon endurance and suffering which we have considered in relation to the soldier, athlete and husbandman, and there is the same comforting assurance of mighty power, "Be strong in the grace that is in Christ Jesus" (II Tim. ii. 1).

In the passage dealing with the third "good" thing, the good contest, these features recur. There is an allusion to the unpopular nature of the message that Paul and Timothy had to give; there is the same "turning away"; there is the same insistence upon "enduring afflictions", and there is also the same strengthening by the Lord Himself (II Tim. iv. 1-17).

It is therefore obvious that we shall best learn the lesson of the good soldier by taking a wider view than that of the immediate context. We are not surprised to find that the word aresko, "to please" (II Tim. ii. 4), occurs 14 times in Paul's epistles, and if the significance of number goes for anything, it is even more interesting to note that 13 of the references occur in the early epistles, and one only in the later, viz., II Tim. ii. 4, which as it were "completes" the word of God (Col. i. 25).

This guiding principle, "that he may please Him", is echoed in II Tim. ii. 15, "Study to shoe thyself approved unto God". To forget or omit it is to fail, but to hold to it and emphasize it is halfway toward success, for it rids one of the fear of man that bringeth a snare.

The Apostle's own exhortation to Timothy as an immediate consequence of setting forth the three figures of the solder, the athlete and the husbandman is, "Consider" (II Tim. ii. 7); "Remember" (II Tim. ii. 8); and "Study" (II Tim. ii. 15). Of these three II Tim. ii. 15 belongs to the central section of the epistle, and its consideration must be deferred until that section has been analyzed. Let us note the two that belong to the section before us:

> "Consider what I say; for the Lord shall give thee understanding in all things" (II Tim. ii. 7).

We have followed the R.V. here because the best texts read dosei (future), "he shall give", instead of doe, as in the A.V. The word translated "consider" is noeo, which is generally translated "understand". Again we have to record that this word occurs 14 times in the N.T.

The reader should observe that Timothy was called upon to use his "mind", noeo, and told that the Lord would give him understanding, sunesis. There is an important lesson here. The "mind", or nous, is the organ of mental perception.

> "The nous takes cognizance of external objects, and denotes the reasoning faculty. Its chief material organ is the brain, but all the senses serve it actively and passively. Nous is the human side of God's spirit in man; as to its source, it is Spirit; as to its action in man for intellectual purposes it is mind, i.e. the product of the spirit" (Dr. E. W. Bullinger's Lexicon).

The nous in man has been impaired by the fall (Eph. iv. 17), but the believer in Christ has experienced a renewing of its spirit (Eph. iv. 23).

Let us not hurry over this, for it is of great importance. There are so many who decry "reason", as though "faith" could ever be irrational or believe anything that was not "right", but if God has renewed the spirit of the mind, it is in order that the believer should use it to His glory.

The following diagram would find little favour with a psychologist, and does not pretend to be an accurate presentation of the human mind; but at the same time it may enable the reader to appreciate the relationship that exists between things seen and unseen; between the perceptions of sensation and the concepts of the mind.

- - - I l l u s t r a t i o n - - -
(BE-XXXIII.197).

The nous, or thinking part of man, is placed midway between the body, with its great organ of "sensation", the brain, and the spirit of man that is in him, whereby man "knows".

The relationship between the senses is implied in such a passage as Isa. vi. 9, 10.

> "Hear ye indeed (i.e. with the outer ear), but understand not (i.e. with the inner man); and see ye indeed, but perceive not. Make the heart of this people fat . . . . . lest they understand with their heart, and convert, and be healed."

Here it is evident that, had the heart of the people been right, the outward hearing and outward seeing would have led to inward understanding and inward perceiving.

If we could imagine such a horrible things as a man who could neither see, hear, touch, taste nor smell, we can readily see that there would be no way of getting at his inner consciousness; no way of communication; he would be idea-less and, to all intents, dead. When however we become acquainted with the outer world through the medium of our senses, we provide material out of which the mind arrives, by the processes of intelligence and reason, at all the wonder of mental conception. Owing to the fall of man, human reason is an unsafe guide, but the redeemed undergo a "renewing of the spirit of that mind" and are enabled by the eye of faith to see things that are invisible.

The reader will have no need to turn to the passage indicated for the spiritual equivalents of sight, hearing, touch and taste: they come readily to mind, but an equivalent to the sense of smell in the spiritual sphere may at first seem improbable.

The following passage in Isaiah however provides an instance:

> "And He shall make Him of quick understanding in the fear of the Lord" (Isa. xi. 3).

the margin drawing attention to the Hebrew, which reads "scent or smell". The figure intended is that of an animal scenting the air, keen and apprehensive.

We remember however that this article is an exposition of II Tim. ii. and not a treatise on the human mind, much as we should all profit by a study of the Scriptures along that line.

Returning therefore to II Tim. ii. 7 we observe that the Apostle says: (1) Consider; (2) What I say; (3) The Lord will give thee understanding. These words have been distributed on the diagram under the realms of sensation, mind, or of spiritual understanding.

"What I say."—The Apostle was writing a letter to Timothy, and consequently could not send Timothy his "thoughts", for these are invisible and intangible. All he could do was to send a series of black marks made with pen and ink on paper. The organ of vision would record these marks, straight lines and curved, and, without conscious effort, Timothy's memory would on his part translate these into words, which, in their turn, would be associated with distinct meanings; he would "consider", noeo, "perceive, implying the perception of the mind consequent upon sight" (Dr. E. W. Bullinger's Lexicon).

The nous, or mind, forms the connecting link between the world of sense and the world of spirit, and so we reach the third statement, "The Lord will give thee understanding".

> "Sunesis, the collecting together of single features into a whole, to reflect morally, to lay to hear. Sunesis is used of reflective thought; sophia (wisdom) of productive thought" (Dr. E. W. Bullinger's Lexicon).

The Apostle prays for the Colossians that the Lord would give them "spiritual understanding" (Col. i. 9), and this is his desire for Timothy here.

That it is quite possible to "consider what the Apostle had said" and yet not to arrive at a spiritual understanding is patent to all. The Lord spoke in parables to Israel, so that they would indeed "hear" His actual words, but not "perceive" the true import of His illustrations. But the Apostle wanted Timothy to ponder before the Lord the three figures he had used, (the good soldier, the athlete and the husbandman), so that, through revealing grace, he might see the will of the Lord for himself.

While mere "reasoning" can never lead us to the truth, which can only be revealed by the Lord, and while "faith" must apprehend that which lies outside the scope of human investigation, to rule out the exercise of the highest faculties that God has given is spiritual suicide. The very construction of the sentences is in the province of reason. Nouns, verbs, prepositions are a part of the material of reason. Faith can make nothing even of an inspired sentence if it is written in a tongue unknown to the reader, e.g., it is an impossible question to ask, "Do you believe Beroshith bara elohim eth hashamayim ve eth ha erets?" (Gen. i. 1) unless the person addressed is acquainted with the Hebrew tongue, and the question reveals the fact that it is foolish to talk about "believing" what we do not "understand".

Of course those who desire to exercise lordship over the faith of the Lord's people will naturally keep back from them the means of arriving at a personal understanding of the matters of revelation, but it is of the essence of the true Berean spirit "to search and see".

Let us therefore ponder the message of the Apostle, knowing that if we on our part will but “consider” what he says, the Lord will surely give us understanding, so that, knowing His will, we may intelligently serve Him and walk worthy of the Lord unto all pleasing.

Tools for the Unashamed Workman.

#2. The Concordance: its use.
pp. 17 - 20

In our last paper we ran over the history of the Concordance to the Scriptures. In this we propose to give a word or two upon its use. If we looked into the kit of a mechanic we should find, for instance, that he possessed more hammers than one and saws of different sizes and shapes, and that he suited the tool to the job. In like manner we will examine some of the "tools" we have at our disposal for the work to which we have put our hand.

As it is the one in common use, and may be purchased for a few shillings, let us first take a look at Cruden's Concordance. While Cruden can take no account of the original words of Scripture and must list together all occurrences of the same English word, whatever original words it may translate, he does sub-divide his subject in a manner that is distinctly helpful. For example, take the word "Glory". Before giving a concordance to the word, Cruden commences with most helpful analyses of its usage, which run into over a thousand words. He then sub-divides his concordance as follows: (1) Glory. (2) Give glory. (3) Glory of God. (4) His Glory. (5) My Glory. (6) Glory of the Lord. (7) Thy Glory. (8) Glorious. (9) Gloriously. (10) Glory, the verb. (11) Gloriest. (12) Glorieth. (13) Glorying. (14) See Crown, Honour, Vain. No student, however erudite, could fail to be considerably helped by this sub-division of the subject, a work entailing more hours of labour than most of us realize. The word "Go" is found under 28 sub-divisions, and the word "God" under 23, beside which a careful explanatory column and side references (as "See Almighty", "See Lord God"), of which there are 53 in number, and so throughout the work. Modern editions contain a concordance to the proper names of the Old and New Testaments.

The next concordance, to which we must give more than a passing reference, is "Young's Analytical Concordance". As its title page tells us, this work is "on an entirely new plan, containing about 311,000 references, sub-divided under the Hebrew and Greek originals, with the literal meaning and pronunciation of each, designed for the simplest reader of the English Bible". The 7th edition contains a most valuable index-lexicon, which makes the whole work twice as valuable, and no student should purchase any earlier edition. Dr. Young in his preface says:--

> "Its great object, as Tyndale said of his New Testament, is to enable every 'plough-boy' to know more of the Scriptures than the 'ancients', by enabling him at a glance to find out THREE DISTINCT POINTS—First, What is the original Hebrew or Greek of any ordinary word in his English Bible; Second, What is the literal and primitive meaning of every such original word; and Third, What are thoroughly true and reliable parallel passages."

As an illustration of the use of "Young's Concordance" we open the book at random, and our eye falls upon the word "Abundance". This is what we find:

ABUNDANCE.

(1) Multitude, (The word in Hebrew characters) hamon.
I Kings 18:41. for (there is) a sound of abundance of rain (and two more refs.).

This is a typical example of the difference in plan between Young's and Cruden's Concordances.

In sub-division No.7 the reader will observe that the Hebrew word rabah is followed by the figure 5. Such figures indicate the number that has been allotted to the conjugation of the Hebrew verb. Thus Nos.1, 3, 5 are active, Nos.2, 4, 6 passive, and No.7 reflexive. So that Qatal, in the first conjugation, is "He killed", in the second, "He was killed", the third, "He killed violently", the fourth, "He was killed violently", the firth, “He caused to kill”, the sixth, “He was caused to kill” and in the seventh, “He killed himself”. While there are many exceptions, the general formula holds good. We now turn to the valuable indexes. On the sample page we have taken we notice that the first Hebrew word is Hamon. Accordingly we turn up the Hebrew Index, and find the following:

abundance 3.	noise 4.	store 2.
company 1.	riches 1.	tumult 4.
many 3.	rumbling 1.
multitude 62.	sounding 1.

The figures indicate the number of times the word is translated by each English word. We observe that the word most used in the A.V. to translate hamon is “multitude”, and accordingly gather that such is its primary meaning.

We may be interested enough to look back into the Concordance to see how and where the word hamon is used. Accordingly we look up “noise”, or any of the other translations, and, in nearly every case, find further avenues opening up before us. We look up the Greek word dunamis (i.e., No.14 in the Concordance) and find a long list of words into which it is translated. Of these the outstanding word is “power” which translates dunamis 77 times.

Not only is Young’s Concordance useful and valuable as an aid in distinguishing things that differ, but there is prefaced to the Concordance, 71 illustrations of Bible Idioms. The reader may here also become acquainted with a few figures of speech, and profit by the useful hints and helps to Bible interpretation so liberally given by the compiler. Then, at the end of the Concordance, beyond the two Index-Lexicons, is a useful treatise and concordance of Proper Names of the O.T. with their modern pronunciation and the exact form of the original Hebrew.

The Seventh Edition of Young’s Analytical Concordance has been revised throughout by Wm. B. Stevenson, B.D. (Edinburgh), and in the latest impression of this edition there is added a sketch of recent exploration in Bible lands, by Thomas Nicol, D.D., together with a series of plates depicting facsimiles of Samaritan, Hebrew, and Greek MSS, and a number of engravings showing many sites and cities mentioned in the Bible.

There is hope that a new edition containing all these features will be published as soon as circumstances permit, but students who seek second-hand copies should examine the title page before completing the purchase.

Where possible, we strongly advise the purchase of a leather bound copy. The Concordance is a heavy volume, it is bought once only in a lifetime, and will give better service if it has the protection and strength afforded by leather binding, at least for the back.

To facilitate reference, we have lettered, alphabetically, the edge of our own copy so that the book can be easily opened approximately at the required place.

#3. Lexicons.
pp. 50 - 53

While there are several Lexicons and Concordances in one Volume, it must be remembered that a Lexicon, like a Dictionary, is concerned with the meaning of words, whereas a Concordance is concerned with the occurrence of words. A Lexicon and Concordance combines the two functions. Most know Liddell and Scott's Greek and English Lexicon. While this work takes cognizance of all words used in the N.T., it also draws many of its illustrations and instances from the writings of Greek philosophers. The meanings assigned to Greek words must be checked by usage, and not accepted without reserve, as absolutely true of the N.T. Schrevelius' Lexicon is useful and has much the same character as Liddell and Scott's.

The name, however, that comes to mind in association with Lexicons that have a distinct bearing upon the Scriptures is that of Parkhurst. There are two from his pen; one for the Hebrew and one for the Greek. We quote the title page of the Hebrew Lexicon, which is fairly descriptive and gives a good idea of the nature and scope of both works:--

> "An Hebrew and English Lexicon, without points, in which the Hebrew and Chaldee words of the Old Testament are explained in their leading and derived senses, the derivative words are ranged under their respective primitives, and the meanings assigned to each authorized by references to passages of Scripture, and frequently illustrated and confirmed by citations from various Authors, ancient and modern."

To this work is prefixed an Hebrew and a Chaldee Grammar, without points. The 7th edition, corrected and improved, was published in 1813. Parkhurst stresses the importance of the Hebrew tri-literal root. Care is necessary in taking his English derivations from the Hebrew. It is easy to mistake similar sounds for evidences of similar pedigrees, but this error is not confined to Parkhurst. Dr. McCaul, Professor of Hebrew in King's College, London, wrote:--

> "With regard to the Hebrew roots assigned by Parkhurst, the student will observe that, in consequence of his rejection of the system of vowel points, they sometimes differ considerably from those given in modern Hebrew Lexicons. In such cases, the reader must be led by the weight of evidence and analogy, and receive or reject Parkhurst's conjectures accordingly. He will, however, often find them both sagacious and valuable anticipations of that system of comparative etymology which now obtains in the Indo-European languages, and which has of late been applied to the Hebrew and its sister dialects."

After an interval of seven years, Parkhurst published his companion Lexicon to the Greek of the N.T. Its title page reads as follows:--

> "A Greek and English Lexicon to the New Testament in which the words and phrases occurring in those sacred books are distinctly explained, and the meanings assigned to each authorized by references to passages of Scripture, and frequently illustrated and confirmed by citations from the Old Testament and from the Greek writers. To this work is prefixed a plain and easy Greek Grammar, adapted to the use of learners, and those who understand no other language than English."

Later editions contain additional information compiled by Hugh James Rose, B.D., and Dr. J. R. Major added points to the Hebrew words that are cited, and an Appendix of proper names. Each Lexicon runs into over 700 pages and, while they must be used with discrimination, they are a library in themselves. They can often be obtained, second-hand, at a low price, the two copies in our own possession costing but a few pence each!

Another name that stands high among Lexicographers is that of Gesenius. His work, however, is spoiled by rationalistic and neological comments. A very fine abridgement, that is freed from these disagreeable elements, is published by S. Bagster & Sons. An analytical index of different words is included, and the meanings adopted by Dr. Furst in his Hebrew Lexicon have been added, with, in some case, brackets indicating where the Editor differs in opinion from Gesenius. The work is from the English translation of Dr. Tragelles.

Another Lexicon published by S. Bagster & Sons is the Analytical Hebrew and Chaldee Lexicon by B. Davidson. As its name implies, this differs from those already mentioned in that every separate word of the Old Testament original, in every variety of conformation, is exhibited in its alphabetical place, accompanied by a full grammatical analysis of its composition, the indication of its root, and its English meaning after the best authorities. Although its primary design is to supply the learner with the utmost possible assistance, it is no less serviceable for permanent use by those who have attained a scholarly proficiency in the study of the Hebrew and Chaldee Scriptures. A grammar both of the Hebrew and Chaldee occupies nearly 90 of its pages, while the Lexicon itself occupies 784 pages.

As a companion volume, the same publishers issued the Analytical Greek Lexicon, consisting of an alphabetical arrangement of every occurring inflexion of every word contain in the Greek New Testament Scriptures, with a grammatical analysis of each word and a lexicographical illustration of meanings. A complete series of paradigms (examples) with grammatical remarks and explanations is also included. To enhance the critical value of the work, various readings of importance, with the authorities supporting them, are incorporated in their respective places. The Grammar occupies 42 pages, and the Lexicon 444.

We have already referred to Dr. Bullinger's Lexicon-Concordance, when speaking of Concordances, but we did not exhibit its important characteristic. This we will now seek to do:

> "The design of this work is to give every English word in alphabetical order, and under each the Greek word or words so translated, with a list of the passages in which the English word occurs, showing, by a reference figure, which is the Greek word used in each particular passage. Thus, at one view, the Greek word with its literal and derivative meanings may be found for every word in the English New Testament."

As an example let us look at the word "Allow".

Allow (Alloweth; Allowed).

(1) dokimazo, to prove, assay, as refiners do metals by fire, to try, examine, try the fitness or goodness of; hence, to have experience of by trial, to approve.
(2) ginosko, to perceive, to observe, to obtain a knowledge or insight into, to know, ginosko frequently denotes a personal relation between the person knowing and the object known; equivalent to, to be influenced by our knowledge of the object, and hence, to allow oneself to be determined by one's knowledge.
(3) prosdechomai, to accept, to receive, to expect, to wait for.
(4) suneudokeo, to think well together with, to consent to, approve of, be well pleased with, take complacency in.

4. Luke xi. 48. | 2. Rom. vii. 15 (margin know) | 1. I Thess. ii. 4.
3. Acts xxiv. 15. | 1. Rom. xiv. 22.

At page 921 there is an alphabetical Index of every Greek word used in the N.T., together with every English word used in the translation of them, the number of occurrences of each translation being indicated by a figure. We look up dokimazo, the first of the foregoing examples, and find the following:--

try 4.	try 2 (italic type indicates a marginal reading).
prove 10.	allow 2.
approve 3.

Following the Index are three Appendixes; the first of various readings of the Greek text, the second of grammatical features, and the third showing the variant readings of the Sinaitic MSS.

One other Lexicon must be noted, and that is the one familiarly known either as "Grimm's" or "Thayer's", its full title being "A Greek-English Lexicon of the New Testament, being Grimm's Wilke's Clavis Novi Testamenti, translated, revised and enlarged by Jospeh Henry Thayer, D.D. Corrected Edition, 1896". The editor gives some of the leading objects of the revision in a note to the Preface which will be sufficient commendation of this valuable work.

"To verify all references (biblical, classical, and—so far as practicable—modern); to note more generally the extra-biblical usage of words; to give the derivation of words in cases where it is agreed upon by the best etymologists and is of interest to the general student; to render complete the enumeration of (representative) verbal forms actually found in the New Testament (and exclude all others); to append to every verb a list of those of its compounds which occur in the Greek Testament; to note more fully the variations in the Greek text of current editions; to introduce brief discussions of New Testament synonyms; to give the more noteworthy renderings not only of the 'Authorized Version' but also the Revised New Testament; to multiply cross references;

> references to grammatical works, both sacred and classical; also to the best English and American commentaries, as well as to the latest exegetical works that have appeared on the Continent; and to the recent Bible Dictionaries and Cyclopædias, besides the various Lives of Christ and of the Apostle Paul."

The reader will, by this extract, have no doubt as to the extreme value of this Lexicon, and would find it of constant service in the study of the New Testament.

Lastly, we draw attention to the Biblico-Theological Lexicon of the New Testament Greek, by Herman Cremer, D.D., translated from the German by William Urwick, M.A., and published by T. F. Clark. In the preface of this work, Cremer says:

> "A Lexical handling of N.T. Greek must, if it is to be really a help to the understanding of the documents of revelation, be directed mainly to that department of the linguistic store which is necessarily affected by the influence we have described, i.e., to the expressions of spiritual life, moral and religious. For other portions of the linguistic treasury the Lexicons of classical Greek suffice."

We have had to abandon giving a sample of Cremer's treatment for lack of space, and because of the necessity of using various types to stand for Greek and Hebrew words. A short quotation would indicate little and be no true exhibition of this monumental work. Its 913 pages are followed by an alphabetical Index of Greek Words, an Index of Synonyms Compared, an Index of Texts in the N.T. specially referred to, an Index of Biblico-Theological Subjects, and lastly an Index of Hebrew Words referred to.

There are other Lexicons which the reader may consult with profit, but those now passed in review provide a selection that should suffice for any ordinary student of the Word. We have purposely refrained from referring to works inaccessible to the ordinary reader, or prohibitive in price. Every one reviewed in this article is on our own shelves, and has been bought at a fairly low price by patient search over a period of years in second-hand bookstalls, where theological literature is often a drug in the market.

TRUST.

#1. A Sevenfold Aspect.

Volume XXXII, pp. 221, 222

The body of truth that constitutes the ground of our calling is called "The Faith", and the one condition for the obtaining of salvation, justification or life is "faith", and in a world where all was perfect and ideal "faith" and "trust" would be but two sides of one state or attitude. In the everyday outworking of truth, however, honesty compels us to admit that a person may be a believer and be saved by grace, yet at the same time not always and completely trusting the Lord. As an illustration, Abraham "believed" in the Lord and his faith was counted for righteousness—yet in spite of this we find him in Gen. xx. 1-18 resorting to the same deceitful measures that he had previously employed regarding Sarah and the Egyptians (Gen. xii. 10-20). "Trust", therefore, is not always commensurate with "faith", although, as we have said, most certainly it should be.

In moments of great peril, or after long testing and trial, the believer sometimes echoes the words of David, "I shall now perish one day by the hand of Saul" (I Sam. xxviii. 1), yet both David and the believer today would, at the same time and with the same breath, maintain the inspiration of God's Word and His utter and eternal faithfulness. At the time of writing this series of short articles peril is on every hand, and it is with a view to strengthen faith, in its intimate and personal sense of committal or "trust", that these words are written.

In the absence of specific scriptural definition of "trust", there is no surer way of arriving at an understanding of the term than an examination of the different words translated by it and of the way in which these are used. There are seven words used in the O.T. Scriptures which have been translated "trust", and observance of their peculiar meanings will form the basis of this first article of the series.

The Seven Words translated "Trust" in the O.T.

We should hardly think of going to the record of Israel's unbelief and murmuring in Numb. xi. to discover the first meaning of "trust", but in it mention is made of the "melons" which they ate in Egypt, and in the original the name of this fruit is "The Clinger", by reason of its manner of growth, and it is this word that provides the most important of the seven that are translated "trust": "They that know Thy name will put their trust in (or cling to) Thee" (Psa. ix. 10). About ninety of the occurrences of the word in the O.T. are translations of this word.

The second word is more obvious; it is "shelter" or "refuge", as in the passage: "Thou hast been a shelter for me" (Psa. lxi. 3), or, "God is our refuge and strength" (Psa. xlvi. 1). This provides the word translated "trust" in over thirty occurrences, as, for example, "He is a buckler to all them that trust in Him" (II Sam. xxii. 31). "Trust" therefore may "cling", in conscious weakness, or "shelter", in time of stress.

Of the three examples that follow each occurs but once and is translated “trust”, but they supply important aspects of meaning that are necessary to the complete conception of “trust”.

The idea of “staying” oneself upon someone underlies the word used by Elihu, when he said to Job: “Judgment is before Him: therefore trust thou in Him” (Job xxxv. 14).

In that dread experience recorded in Psa. xxii., the Psalm of the Cross, the word translated “trust” means “To roll on”, and is used in Gen. xxix. 3, where it speaks of rolling a stone from the mouth of a well. This is the word chosen as a taunt by the wicked when they said, “He trusted on the Lord that He would deliver him” (Psa. xxii. 8).

The next example is taken from the Aramaic, or Chaldee, language, and is found in Nebuchadnezzar’s frank utterance after the deliverance of the three from the furnace. The word used by that great king primarily means “To rely on”, and is found in Dan. iii. 28, where he is recorded as saying of God, “Who hath sent his angel and delivered His servants that trusted in Him”.

Two more words remain to complete the set.

The word “Amen” is known to every believer, and is the Hebrew word for “truth” and “faithfulness”. It occurs five times in the form of “trust”, but refers always to a misplaced trust or a trust withheld: “Behold He put no trust in His servants” (Job iv. 18).

And, lastly, the seventh word occurs in that moving utterance of Job when he said, “Though He slay me, yet will I trust in Him”, and introduces into the idea of trusting the thought of “waiting” and “hoping”.

Here then is a sevenfold presentation of the idea embodied in the words “To trust”. It means To cling, To find shelter, To stay upon, To roll upon, To rely on, To put faith in, and To wait with hope.

Without further exposition, here, in this sevenfold concept of “Trust”, is a message for the tired and tested believer in these days. Here is a trust that has as many aspects as there are days of the week. Here is a trust for all times and all occasions, and we therefore commend to the reader’s prayerful meditation this initial study.

#2. Seven results of a trust that clings.
p. 13

Having seen something of the scriptural meaning of the seven O.T. words translated "trust", we now consider a few relative outstanding passages, and note the bearing of the context upon the varied ways in which trust may be exercised.

Confining ourselves first to the one conception of trust which we saw was illustrated by the clinging of the melon by its tendrils, we observe the following conditions which Scripture associates with it:

(1) BLESSING.—"Blessed is that man that maketh the Lord his trust" (Psa. xl. 4).
(2) HOPE.—"Thou art my hope, O Lord God; thou art my trust from my youth" (Psa. lxxi. 5).
(3) PRE-EMINENT PIETY.—"He trusted in the Lord God of Israel; so that after him was none like him among all the Kings of Judah, nor any before him" (II Kings xviii. 5).
(4) ANSWERED PRAYER.—"They cried to God in the battle, and He was intreated of them; because they put their trust in Him" (I Chron. v. 20).
(5) REMOVAL OF FEAR.—"What time I am afraid, I will trust in Thee" (Psa. lvi. 3, 4, 11).
(6) HEART FIXED.—"His heart is fixed, trusting in the Lord" (Psa. cxii. 7).
(7) RIGHTLY DIVIDED PATH.—"Trust in the Lord with all thine heart; and lean not unto thine own understanding. In all thy ways acknowledge Him, and He shall direct thy paths" (Prov. iii. 5, 6).

Here are seven selected passages revealing seven most important adjuncts, or associations, of this trust that "clings" to God and His Word.

In the same manner as the seven different conceptions of trust were placed before the reader in the opening article, so this list is placed before him in order that he may see the field of experience covered, perceive the all-round fitness to this reliance upon the Lord, and be moved to emulate those who, in other days, have tasted that the Lord is gracious. But before giving any further subdivisions of these seven all-covering words, we must devote at least one article to each of the seven passages selected in the present article.

We look forward to ministering to the reader's Blessing, strengthening his Hope, encouraging him in his growth in grace and Godliness, assuring him of Answered Prayer, establishing his Heart, and, in the matter of practical guidance, indicating the conditions that lead to a pathway Rightly Divided. While there are many other phases of spiritual experience embedded in the hundred or more passages which use "trust" in the sense of "clinging", we believe most will be covered by the seven selected above.

#3. The blessedness of this trust (Psa. xl. 4).
pp. 35, 36

In the O.T. there are seven different words translated "Trust". These we considered in the opening article of this series. We discovered that the first one of this set of seven has the significance of "clinging", as the Melon plant does by means of its tendrils. Out of the hundred or more occurrences of this word we selected seven, and set them out on page 13. The first of this set of seven was the "blessedness" that was pronounced upon the man that trusted in the Lord (Psa. xl. 4).

Upon examination we find that there are four occasions when this peculiar blessedness is pronounced. They are as follows:--

(1) "Blessed are all they that put their trust in Him" (Psa. ii. 12).
(2) "O taste and see that the Lord is good: blessed is the man that trusteth in Him" (Psa. xxiv. 8).
(3) "Blessed is that man that maketh the Lord his trust" (Psa. xl. 4).
(4) "O Lord of hosts, blessed is the man that trusteth in Thee" (Psa. lxxxiv. 12).

These four Psalms, with their blessing upon the man that trusts in the Lord, have four very different contexts.

(1) THE DAY OF THE LORD.—Psalm ii. is prophetic of the days immediately preceding the coming of the Lord. People and king alike agree in counsel against the Lord and His anointed. It will be a day when any who cling to the Messianic hope will be persecuted. As indicated in verse 12 of this Psalm, it is upon such that the Divine benediction rests. They believe the prophecies and the promises, they cling to the Lord and His faithful fulfillment of them, and receive the Divine approval, "Blessed are all they that put their trust in Him".

(2) THE DAY OF TROUBLE.—Psalm xxxiv. 8 deals largely with the deliverance of the righteous in all his troubles. We read his experiences; we are called upon "to taste and see". The Psalmist places on record,

> "I sought the Lord, and He heard me, and delivered me from all my fears . . . . . This poor man cried, and the Lord heard him, and saved him out of all his troubles. The angel of the Lord encampeth round about them that fear Him, and delivereth them out of all their troubles . . . . . Many are the afflictions of the righteous: but the Lord delivereth him out of them all" (Psa. xxxiv. 4, 6, 7, 17, 19).

(3) THE DAY OF CONFLICT.—In this fortieth Psalm the writer tells of his deliverance from a horrible pit and from miry clay. The marginal note to the words "horrible pit" reads, "a pit of noise", and if the reader will note that these words were penned in London towards the end of June 1944, he will probably realize why they struck a responsive chord. The Psalm indicates the exemplary effect of this deliverance, saying,

"Many shall see it, and fear, and shall trust in the Lord", and this statement is followed by the Divine benediction on all such (verse 4).

(4) THE DAY OF EXILE.—The eighty-fourth Psalm was written for the sons of Korah whose duties are defined in I Chron. ix. 19 as "Keepers of the gates", or thresholds and "Keepers of the entry". The Psalmist remembers, with poignant feeling, the tabernacle and courts of the Lord, for there he had found the presence of the living God. He says, in verse 4, "Blessed are they that dwell in thy house", and then, in the second part of the Psalm, although for the time being unable to join in worship in the house of the Lord, yet preferring a doorkeeper's post in the house of God to luxurious living in wickedness outside of it, he has found full compensation in that simple "clinging" to the Lord, recognizing that even though separated from the tabernacle of the Lord, He is nevertheless both Sun and Shield, and will give both grace and glory. He therefore readily concludes, "Blessed is the man that trusteth in Thee" (Psa. lxxxiv. 12).

#4. The association of trust and hope (Psa. lxxi. 5).
pp. 53, 54

We have before us at the moment certain blessings and experiences which are linked together in the Scriptures with that form of trust which can be represented by "clinging" to the Lord.

In the present article we consider the relation of "hope" with "trust" which is indicated in Psa. lxxi. 5.

> "For thou art my HOPE, O Lord God, Thou art my TRUST from my youth."

The word "youth" is used with some latitude: it can refer to a new-born child (Exod. ii. 6), or to one who has reached approximately the age of twenty, as in the case of Joseph in Gen. xli. 12. The form in which it occurs implies that the words "the day of" are to be supplied mentally (the evidence for this lies outside the scope of these articles).

Psalm lxxi. speaks of "hope" and "trust", and by the disposition of the subject-matter, "trust" appears to be associated with all the days of this life, from the earliest recollections of youth to the days of old age and infirmity. "Hope", on the other hand, appears to be used as though it were the logical outcome of this "trust", but whereas "trust" extends to the limits of present life—youth and old age—"hope" goes back to the unconscious moments of birth, and forward to the awakening and renewing of resurrection. This argument of faith is one that is worth pondering. When we view the whole stretch of time, and then attempt to visualize within it our own tiny span, so small and insignificant is it that, were it not for the trust that clings to the Lord in all our conscious weakness, we should be overwhelmed by the surrounding immensity. Ages preceded our birth, and ages will succeed our death, yet we cannot shut our eyes to the fact that a wise and merciful Providence was at work on our behalf before we have our being and birth, which supplies us with the argument that the same gracious Providence can and will provide for us during that second period of silence called death, and bring us to something even more wonderful than our birth into this world.

To show that these thoughts may be rightly adduced from the subject-matter of this Psalm we give the following features:

T r u s t.

(1) YOUTH.—"Thou are my trust from my youth" (5).
"O God, Thou hast taught me from my youth" (17).

(2) OLD AGE.—"Cast me not off in the time of old age; forsake me not when my strength faileth" (9).
"Now also when I am old and greyheaded, O God, forsake me not" (18).

H o p e.

(1) BIRTH.—"By thee have I been holden up from the womb: Thou art He that took me out of my mother's bowels" (6).

(2) RESURRECTION.—"Thou, which hast shewed me great and sore troubles, shalt quicken me again, and shalt bring me up again from the depths of the earth" (20).

This association of "trust" (operating during the days of our present life), with "hope" (which operates beyond our present experience even to the day of "quickening again", when death shall be swallowed up of victory), contains a word of comfort for the present day. So the believer, as he trusts in the Lord Who has watched over him from youth to old age, can sing,

"His love in times past,
Forbids me to think;
He'll leave me at last
In trouble to sink."

"Each fresh Ebenezer
He brings to review
Confirms His good pleasure
To help me right through."

#5. Hezekiah's pre-eminence (II Kings xviii. 5).
pp. 69, 70

It is interesting and sometimes corrective to observe exactly what feature is singled out by the Holy Spirit as of eminence in the lives of those who figure in the Scriptures.

For instance, were we to be called upon to do so, what one thing of eminence should we choose out of all the many incidents in the life of Joseph? It is morally certain we should not have lifted into isolated pre-eminence the fact that Joseph "gave commandment concerning his bones", yet this is the one fact brought forward in Heb. xi. 22. So in the case of Hezekiah who comes before us in this matter of trust in the Lord. He was eminent in many ways. His action in breaking down the images, cutting down the groves, and his possession of sufficient spiritual insight and courage to see the necessity of destroying the time-honoured brazen serpent made by Moses, calling it Nehushtan, "A piece of brass", would alone have lifted his name and memory above the commonplace (II Kings xviii. 1-4). But this might be a negative attitude, for one can be an iconoclast, or a Protestant, without being definitely for God or for the truth. This could never be said of Hezekiah for the parallel record in II Chron. xxix. makes no mention of his attack upon idolatry, but of his opening of the doors of the house of the Lord and the call of the Levites to a rededication. The feature that is stressed is Hezekiah's trust in the Lord:

> "He trusted in the Lord God of Israel; so that after him was none like him among all the kings of Judah, nor any that were before him" (II Kings xviii. 5).

As identical language is used of another king, namely Josiah, in II Kings xxiii. 25, we realize that Hezekiah's pre-eminence was in the one stated thing, his trust in the Lord, even as Josiah's pre-eminence was in the stated being, that "he turned to the Lord with all his heart, and with all his soul, and with all his might".

It is alas possible to discover in the recorded actions of Hezekiah some things for which praise and commendation cannot be given; in this common frailty we all have a share. The great moment comes when things look blackest, and Rabshakeh's taunts seem to have stiffened Hezekiah's backbone, for the more that evil emissary vilified Hezekiah's trust, the more that trust grew. There are nine occurrences of the word "Trust" in the second book of Kings. All of them are found in chapters xviii. and xix., and all have to do with Hezekiah and the invasion of Sennacherib. It will help us if we note them together.

Hezekiah.

> "He trusted in the Lord God of Israel" (II Kings xviii. 5).

Rabshakeh.

> "Thus saith the great king, the king of Assyria, What confidence is this wherein thou trustest?" (verse 19).
> "Now on whom dost thou trust, that thou rebellest against me?" (verse 20).

"Now, behold, thou trustest upon the staff of this bruised reed, even upon Egypt, on which if a man lean, it will go into his hand, and pierce it; so is Pharaoh King of Egypt unto all that trust in him" (verse 21).

"But if ye say unto me, We trust in the Lord our God: is not that he, whose high places and whose altars Hezekiah hath taken away, and hath said to Judah and Jerusalem, Ye shall worship before this altar at Jerusalem" (verse 22).

"How . . . . . put thy trust on Egypt for chariots and for horsemen?" (verse 24).

"Let not Hezekiah deceive you: for he shall not be able to deliver you out of his hand: neither let Hezekiah make you trust in the Lord, saying, The Lord will surely deliver us, and this city shall not be delivered into the hand of the king of Assyria" (verses 29, 30).

"Let not thy God in Whom thou trustest deceive thee . . . . . Have the gods of the nations delivered them which my fathers have destroyed?" (II Kings xix. 10-12).

Unwittingly, Rabshakeh may have been used to reveal to Hezekiah the way of true trust. He had questioned the ground of his trust, "Whom dost thou trust?" What answer could Hezekiah make but that he trusted in the living God, the God of Abraham, and covenant promises?

He had revealed the utter untrustworthiness of Pharaoh, and had confused the idolatry—which Hezekiah had sought to stamp out—with the worship of the true God. The more Rabshakeh taunted him regarding the foolishness of his trust, the more his trust in the living God grew—such at least ought to be one of the lessons from this ninefold emphasis on the word "trust" in this book of Kings.

It may not be for us to attain pre-eminence in the affairs of men or in the eyes of the world, but, Oh, for a trust that could receive such commendation as is given in II Kings xviii. 5!

#6. Prayer and Deliverance (I Chron. v. 20).
pp. 227, 228

Trust in the Lord is not confined to one aspect of experience, but, as the Scripture itself enjoins, should be exhibited "at all times" (Psa. lxii. 8), and not only at "what time I am afraid" (Psa. lvi. 3). As we have seen in the case of Hezekiah under the threats and taunts of Rabshakeh and Sennacherib, it is nevertheless true to experience that times of great peril or distress are often occasions when trust rises to its supreme place.

"They were helped . . . . . for they cried to God in the battle, and He was intreated of them; because they put their trust in Him" (I Chron. v. 20).

These words are written, not of those who were defenceless, aged, infirm, or otherwise bereft of all external help, but of men who could be described as "Valiant men, men able to bear buckler and sword, and to shoot with the bow, and skilful in war" (verse 18). The expression "Valiant men" is given in the margin as "Sons of valour", and the phrase "Mighty men of valour" is constantly used as a description of famous men of arms who figured in Israel's history. A man may be fearless yet hopelessly outclassed in the matter of skill or equipment, but it was not so with these men of valour; they were "able" to bear buckler and sword, they could "shoot" with the bow, and were "skilful in war", an expression that covers discipline, instruction and familiarity with the arts of war. Men so equipped and so trained might be excused if they felt that crying to the Lord in battle was a thing to be ashamed of, yet here, in the record of battle, it seems to have come as the crown and climax of their previous preparation. Recounting the peculiar experiences of the past, the Psalmist sings:

> "We have heard with our ears, O God, our fathers have told us, what work Thou didst in their days, in the times of old . . . . . they got not the land in possession by their own sword, neither did their own arm save them; but Thy right hand, and Thine arm, and the light of Thy countenance, because Thou hadst a favour unto them. Thou art my King, O God; command deliverances for Jacob. Through Thee will we push down our enemies, through Thy name will we tread them under that rise up against us. For I will not trust in my bow, neither shall my sword save me" (Psa. xliv. 1-6).

In all these things there is need to strike a balance. Trust in the Lord does not mean foolhardiness, exposure to unnecessary risks, bravado, or even the failure to take reasonable precautions, measures, or equipment that is to be avoided. Fear has been implanted as a danger signal, and need not necessarily be antagonistic to faith. For instance, we lost count of the number of times we have had to break off the writing of this series and take cover during the recent war. The case of Noah is a classic example of the combination of faith and fear, trust and reasonable care.

> "By faith Noah, being warned of God of things not seen as yet, moved with fear, prepared an ark to the saving of his house" (Heb. xi. 7).

So it is written of these sons of Reuben, "They were helped . . . . . for they cried . . . . . He was intreated . . . . . they put their trust in Him".

This however is not all. God is a God of truth, and is righteous and holy. However perfect the equipment, the discipline, the valour; however fervent the cry, and however deep the trust, one other thing is wanted to complete the case. "There fell down many slain, because the war was of God" (I Chron. v. 22).

Private quarrels, the invasion of the rights of others, the war prompted by greed or vainglory, cannot thus be entitled, nor come under this pledge of deliverance. For us, to-day, these terms, both of battle and equipment, need translating into their spiritual equivalents. We to-day wrestle, not with flesh and blood, but with foes who are spiritual; the weapons of our warfare are spiritual also, and in this battle prayer and trust are essential. The girdle is truth; the helmet, salvation; the breastplate, righteousness; the shield, faith; and the sword, the Word of God. We too must "put on" the Divine equipment; we, too, must be men of valour, and then, in the battle which we know to be "of God", our cry will be heard, help will be forthcoming, and He will be entreated of us, for we too shall be found trusting in Him.

Truth in the Balance.

#1. A Preliminary Study of the Figure of the Balances in Scripture.

pp. 81 - 84

Every reader of the Scriptures is familiar with that dramatic incident recorded by Daniel, where a finger writes upon the plaster of the wall of the King's palace the words of doom; Mene, Mene, Tekel, Upharsin, which, being interpreted, meant:--

> "MENE: God hath numbered thy kingdom, and finished it.
> TEKEL: Thou art weighed in the balances and art found wanting.
> PERES: Thy kingdom is divided, and given to the Medes and Persians" > (Dan. v. 26-28).

What, in a specific sense, was true of Belshazzar, is true of us all, for it is written, "There is none righteous, no, not one . . . . . all have sinned, and come short of the glory of God" (Rom. iii. 10, 23).

In this series we purpose taking the figure of the balances, and bringing before the reader several aspects of divine truth wherein an observation of balance is of the utmost importance. Before doing so, however, it will be well if we acquaint ourselves with the way in which this figure of the balances is used in Scripture. The earliest reference is in Gen. xxiii. 16, where "Abraham weighed to Ephron the silver, which he had named in the audience of the sons of Heth, four hundred shekels of silver, current money with the merchants".

Anyone at all acquainted with the religion of ancient Egypt will remember the prominent place the "weighing of the heart" occupies in the, so-called, Book of the Dead, and the constellation known as Libra, "The Scales", in the signs of the Zodiac, shows that from earliest antiquity scales and weighs were known to men. The Hebrew word Moznayim, which is found in the O.T., is the Hebrew name for this sign, Libra, and the brightest star of this constellation is named Zuben al Genubi, "The price which is deficient", and another bright star is named Zuben al Chemali, "The price which covers" (Dr. Bullinger's The Witness of the Stars).

The standard weight was fixed as far back as the time of Moses, for we read of "The shekel (or weight) of the sanctuary" (Exod. xxx. 13, 24; Lev. v. 15). Job also uses the figure of the balance, saying:

> "Oh that my grief were thoroughly weighed, and my calamity laid in the balances together! For now it would be heavier than the sand of the sea" (Job vi. 2, 3).
> "Let me be weighed in an even balance, that God may know mine integrity" (Job xxxi. 6).

The word translated "even" here is tsedeq, "right" or "just".

Job speaks also of "the weight" for the winds and of the waters (Job xxviii. 25), and "the balancings" of the clouds (Job xxxvii. 16), while Isaiah takes note of the "small dust of the balance" (Isa. xl. 15), an indication that the system of weights in Israel was far from being either crude or primitive. The word that is translated "weight" in the O.T. is the Hebrew word eben, "A stone", and there is much to be said for a weight being made of stone, as it is less likely than a metal one to gain or lose.

Throughout the Scriptures balances are used as a figure of righteousness, just as to-day they are used as a symbol of justice:

> "Ye shall do no unrighteousness in judgment, in meteyard, in weight, or in measure. Just balances, just weights, a just ephah, and a just hin, shall ye have" (Lev. xix. 35, 36).
> "Thou shalt not have in thy bag divers weights, a great and a small . . . . . But thou shalt have a perfect and just weight" (Deut. xxv. 13-15).
>
> "A false balance is abomination to the Lord, but a just weight is His delight" (Prov. xi. 1).
> "A just weight and balance are the Lord's: all the weights of the bag are His work" (Prov. xvi. 11).

These are references are to literal weights and balances, but, in turn, they typify the righteous judgment of the Lord. In the second verse of this same sixteenth chapter of Proverbs we are reminded that "the Lord weigheth the spirits", while in I Sam. ii. 3 we are told that by Him "actions are weighed". Hosea charged Ephraim with using "balances of deceit" (Hos. xii. 7). Amos makes similar charges against Israel, saying that they make the ephah "small" and the shekel "great" and that they "falsify the balances by deceit" (Amos viii. 5), while Micah asks concerning Judah, "Shall I count them pure with the wicked balances, and with the bag of deceitful weights?" (Micah vi. 11).

The A.V. translates several Hebrew words by the English "weigh", "weight", or "balance", the most important being the verb shaqal, which gives us the familiar "shekel". The word tekel used in the writing on the wall in Belshazzar's palace is a Chaldean equivalent of this word.

While we do not suggest that the Hebrew prophets anticipated Newton's discovery of the law of gravity, the fact that this self-same word, shaqal, gives us the word "plummet" (II Kings xxi. 13; Isa. xxviii. 17), shows that all who used these words would know that the force which enabled them to weigh their bread likewise enabled them to build to a perpendicular line. So to this day we speak of a "right" line and a "right" angle, using the word that gives us "righteousness". Another word translated "weigh" is the Hebrew word palas, which means "To make level, or even". As a noun it means "the beam of a balance" (Prov. xvi. 11; Isa. xl. 12). The verb is used generally for the mental process of "pondering" or "adjusting": "Ponder the path of thy feet" (Prov. iv. 26). The one other word translated "weigh" is takan. Its primary meaning can be seen in the fact that in the Niphal future it is always translated "equal", the essential element in weighing with a balance.

The word translated "balances" is moznayim, a dual word indicating "a pair". It is derived from the same root that gives us ozen, "the ear", as though the ear "weighed" or "balanced" the sounds that reached it. "The ear" often indicates the faculty of understanding, as in Job xii. 11, "Doth not the ear try words", not merely "hear" them.

In the N.T. the one occurrence of the word "balances" is in Rev. vi. 5, where the Greek word zugos, "yoke", or "crossbar" is used. But four occurrences of the word "weight" are found in the N.T., viz.:

> "The eternal weight (baros) of glory" (II Cor. iv. 17).
> "His letters . . . . . are weighty (barus)" (II Cor. x. 10).
> "The weightier (baruteros) matters of the law" (Matt. xxiii. 23).

Here the word baros and barus mean "pressure", a meaning with which we are familiar in the word "barometer".

The other, and fourth, word is that used in Heb. xii. 1, where we are enjoined to "lay aside every weight", and is the Greek word ogkos (pronounced ongkos). This word means a tumour or a swelling, then a mass, as of corpulence, and then a swelling with pride. These meanings we gather from its use in the classics: it occurs but one in the N.T. Such a twofold meaning however exactly fits the context, for if a runner were to enter a race encumbered with too much flesh he could not hope to complete successfully, even as, in the spiritual sense, pride or pandering to the flesh is fatal to the believer's hopes of finishing his course.

We trust that these opening remarks will be useful in themselves and will, moreover, stimulate our study of this principle of balance, as we seek to apply it to doctrine and practice. This we hope to do in subsequent studies.

#2. The Purpose of the Ages.
Peter's testimony of the three Creations (II Pet. iii. 1-13).
pp. 113 - 117

In our opening article we introduced the figure of the balances and examined the terms in which this figure is presented to us in the Hebrew and Greek Scriptures. It is our intention in this series to test the doctrine and practice of the Scriptures by this principle of balance, and endeavour to discover how far it underlies the ways and will of God.

Scripture opens with the creation of heaven and earth (Gen. i. 1); it closes with the creation of heaven and earth (Rev. xxi. 1), and, intervening between these two extremes, are "the heavens and the earth which are now" (II Pet. iii. 7).

We are indebted to the second epistle of Peter for a comprehensive statement concerning these three phases of creation, which are dealt with, not scientifically, but in so far as they bear upon the purpose of the ages, which is the background of all Scripture.

Before we can attempt to interpret II Pet. iii. it is essential that we view the whole epistle, so that we may neither misplace, nor over, nor under, emphasize any one feature. The Apostle has before him one theme, namely, the fact of the second coming of Christ, and one great thing to do, defend that hope against the attack of the scoffers of his own day. These scoffers, in their turn, were prophetic of the attitude of men generally against the doctrine of the second coming and the day of judgment, which will characterize the last days. Consequently in writing the epistle we find the Apostle adopting (consciously or unconsciously) the principle of the balance. Omitting for the present the exhortative introduction and conclusion (II Pet. i. 1-11, and iii. 14-18) we discover that the theme of the epistle is distributed thus:--

II Peter i. 12 - iii. 13.

A | i. 12-15. PETER. | Parousia truth.
Stir up . . . . . remembrance.
B | i. 16-21. APOSTLES and PROPHETS. |
Visions of second coming confirmed by Prophets.
C | ii. 1-22. FALSE PROPHETS. |
Judgment neither lingers nor slumbers.
Angels, the Flood, Sodom, are evidences that God does not intervene in judgment.
He knows how "to reserve" angels and man for the day of judgment.
Noah saved through the Flood.
A | iii. 1. PETER. | Second Epistle.
Stir up . . . . . remembrance.
B | iii. 2. PROPHETS and APOSTLES. |
Words of Prophets confirmed by Apostles.
C | iii. 3-13. SCOFFERS. |
God is not slack concerning His promise.
Creation itself bears evidence that He does intervene.
He has reserved unto fire the present system.
The godly will be preserved just as Noah was through the Flood.

The recognition of this "balance" is worth more than pages of comment. Peter has but one theme, and he presents it in this twofold manner so that we shall not miss the point he desires to make. The second coming of Christ, he said, was not a fable, but based solidly upon the testimony of prophecy, which came, not by human intelligence, but by inspiration of God. The scoffers said, "Where is the promise of His coming?" (II Pet. iii. 4). "Where is?" (Pou estin). This is the formula of incredulity, not a genuine enquiry. Another instance of its use is, "My tears have been my meat day and night, while they continually say unto me, Where is thy God?" (Ps. xlii. 3). The "promise" in II Pet. iii. 4 is put for "the fulfillment of that promise", which these scoffers denied, and indicates no desire on their part for instruction in the text of prophecy. Weymouth renders the passage, "What has become of His promised return?" The scoffers do not wait for an answer but themselves supply it: "For since the fathers fell asleep, all things continue as they were from the beginning of the creation" (II Pet. iii. 4).

The words supplied by the A.V. "as they were", houtos, "thus", would be better paraphrased "as they are" or "as we now see them".

> (1) The time from which waiting for the fulfillment of the promise dates is from the death of the fathers, to whom these promises were originally made, and
> (2) These promises imply a violent interference with the course of nature, which is unscientific, for since the beginning of the creation until this same time no such interference has been experienced.

Peter takes up this challenge and in the first place reveals that the real reason for the rejection of the promise of the second coming is the condition of heart; the wish to have it so. That is why he prefaced this section with a reference to the believers' "pure", or "honest", minds (II Pet. iii. 1), and why he said these scoffers were "walking after their own lusts (or desires)" (II Pet. iii. 3). They were not honest doubters who could not make prophecy square with science or philosophy.

> "For this they willingly are ignorant of" (II Pet. iii. 5, A.V.).
> "For this they willingly forget" (R.V.).
> "For this purposely escapes them" (Diaglott).
> "For they are willfully blind to the fact" (Weymouth).
> "They willfully ignore the fact" (Moffatt).
> "For this hidden from them through their own willfulness" (Darby).
> "For this they willfully forget" (Rotherham).

Here are seven different renderings, but each preserves the true meaning of the Apostle. Perhaps Alford's translation and notes are as near as the English idiom will permit.

> "For (i.e. they speak thus, because) this (viz., this fact which follows) escapes them (passes unnoticed by them) of their own will (i.e., they shut their eyes to the fact)."

As the wisdom of the world has put it, "There is none so blind as he that will not see". What these scoffers willfully ignored was the testimony of the Scriptures, the observation and findings of philosophy, and the traditions of their own faith.

In reading these few verses of II Pet. iii.—the references to the heavens of old; the complicated statement regarding "the earth standing out of the water and in the water"—many questions are started and many problems suggested, with the result that we may easily miss Peter's intention. Perhaps the following paraphrase will help.

> "Instead of it being true that 'since the beginning of the creation' things have continued without interruption and interference, such a statement is palpably false. The surface of the earth bears evidence of the disintegration that has gone on for ages, and amongst the most active agents has been water. Gen. i. 1, 2, the findings of the earliest philosophers (Thales for example), and the very tradition preserved among us of the prophetic utterance of Adam himself, should make men pause before uttering so obviously untenable a statement. Further, observe this. The world that has passed away > was destroyed by the very water, in which and out of which it consisted, the self-same Word of God, which had called it into being, had pronounced the words that had accomplished its end. The heavens and the earth which are now, we know, by the activity of volcanoes and the presence of hot springs, are stored with fire, 'by the same word', and this is purposely reserved against the day of judgment and the perdition of ungodly men."

Josephus, in his "Antiquities of the Jews", preserves a tradition which was common knowledge in the days of Peter. According to this, Adam predicted "that the world was to be destroyed at one time by the force of fire, and at another time by the violence and quantity of water" (Ant. I. ii. 3), and while there is nothing to warrant this in the book of Genesis, neither is there any statement in Genesis that would lead us to conclude that Enoch prophesied of the second coming of Christ, yet Jude, writing by inspiration, assures us that he did (Jude 14).

No, the scoffer must willfully forget, not only Gen. i. 2, and the record of the Flood, but he must deny the record of the destruction of Sodom, the plagues of Egypt, the deliverance of Israel, the giving of the law at Sinai, the crossing of the Jordan, the fall of Jericho—in fact the whole of O.T. testimony and the unwritten testimony of the earth's crust.

The following analysis may be of service to the earnest student. We cannot now pursue the detailed argument, but after giving the structure of the passages must examine more definitely the truth about the three phases of creation, which was our purpose in turning to II Pet. iii.

II Peter iii. 3-13.

A | 3-5-. Wilful ignorance. |
a | Knowing this first.
b | The last days.
c | The promise of His coming.
c | Since the fathers fell asleep.
b | The beginning of creation.
a | Wilful ignorance.
B | -5-8. Heavens and Earth. |
d | By the Word of God.
e | f | Heavens of old and earth.
g | Water.
d | By the same Word.
e | f | Heaven and earth which are now.
g | Fire.
A | 9-12. Be not ignorant. |
h1 | Day—like 1,000 years and vice versa.
i | j | Not slack.
k | Longsuffering. Come to repentance.
h2 | Day of the Lord.
l | In which, dissolution
i | k | What manner of persons?
j | Hastening unto.
h3 | Day of God.
l | By reason of which, dissolution
B | 13. Heavens and Earth. |
m | His promise (the Word as above).
n | New heavens and new earth.
o | Dwelleth righteousness (No more destruction).

The whole of the Word of God, from Genesis to Revelation, deals with these three phases of creation.

The heavens and the earth that were at the beginning (Gen. i. 1).
The world that then was perished by water (Gen. i. 2).
To this, the words "before the foundations (Gk. katabole, overthrow) of the world" refer (Eph. i. 4).
As also do the word "without form and void" (Hebrew, tohu va bohu) (Gen. i. 2).

The heavens and the earth which are now (Gen. i. 3 - ii. 3).
The heavens of this creation are limited (Gen. i. 6-8).
They are called "an expansion" (Hebrew, raqia) (Gen. i. 6).
They have been spread out as a curtain (Isa. xl. 22).
They are to roll up like a scroll (Isa. xxxiv. 4; Rev. vi. 14).
All the host of heaven shall be dissolved (Isa. xxxiv. 4).
And tohu and bohu again be their state (Isa. xxxiv. 11; Jer. iv. 23-27).

The heavens and the earth which are new (Rev. xxi. 1).
John notes the absence of the sea (Rev. xxi. 1; Gen. i. 2).
No more death, no more curse (Rev. xxi. 4; xxii. 3).
God all in all (I Cor. xv. 28).

We are only too conscious that in this outline there is more left unexplained than is clarified. This of course is due to the magnitude of the subject, and we cannot here offer proof of the many relative points, such as the true translation of katabole, or the bearing of tohu and bohu upon the theme, but the "Indices to the Berean Expositor, Volumes I-XX, 1909-1930" indicate, under the Greek words katabole and kataballo, explanatory articles in four different volumes and, under the Hebrew words tohu and bohu, references in another four volumes. The subject inseparable from dispensational truth and the interested reader will find under "The Subjects", "Scripture References", "Hebrew Words" and "Greek Words" Indexes at least enough evidence to render the enquiry one of serious import.

#3. The Purpose of the Ages.
The Underlying Correspondence of All Scripture.
pp. 164 - 168

In our preceding article, we saw that the whole purpose of the ages is set out in the Scriptures as related to a creation that has passed away, a creation that is present, and a creation which is yet to come. The past and the future are, as it were, pivoted upon the present, and it is the purpose of redemption, which covers the whole of the present creation, to rectify the chaos which sin introduced into it, and so bring all back to balance and equipoise.

While any human attempt to set out this great purpose must of necessity be exceedingly limited both in scope and vision, and marked with errors and serious omissions, yet, if ever he is going to comprehend in the barest outline the purpose of the ages, the mind of the believer must make some attempt at the task. In this, however, there is no room for license. What God doeth "from the beginning to the end" is wisely hid from man's eyes (Eccles. iii. 11); no one is permitted to "find out God unto perfection" (Job xi. 7). But it does not require great knowledge or profound scholarship to attempt a comparison of Genesis with Revelation, even though the surface of these great books be merely scratched, and their full hidden wealth remain unknown. The following parallel has been taken from Appendix 3 of the Companion Bible. Doubtless other lists can be, and have been, compiled, but this is sufficient for our present purpose.

The balance of the scriptural record of the outworking of the purpose of the ages is not only seen in the wonderful correspondence of Genesis and Revelation, but also in the equally wonderful balancing steps that intervene. Let us attempt to show something of the way in which this mighty subject is unfolded in the Word.

The opening words of Gen. i. strike a note that is never quite silenced throughout the ages, but awaits its full harmony at the end;

> "In the beginning God . . . . ." (Gen. i. 1).
> "Then cometh the end . . . . . that God might be all in all" (I Cor. xv. 24, 28).

From what we understand of the nature of God, He is entirely self-sufficient. He needs nothing that anything external to Himself could supply. But God is love, and love demands objects that will be both recipients of love and lovers in return. And so we realize the purpose of the ages, with its "valley of the shadow"; with its moral creatures that can say NO, when God is longing that they should say YES; with its bitter cross, triumphant resurrection, glorious coming, and blessed "end".

There are three great corresponding truths revealed at the beginning and at the end of this purpose. Christ is set forth as the Firstborn of all creation; Satan is seen as the Anointed Cherub, and this opening period of the purpose ends with the overthrow of the world. At the other end, in perfect balance, Christ is set forth as the Head of all things. Satan is destroyed, and the Church is found in heavenly places, whilst the reconciliation of all things round off the overthrow of the world.

Immediately following this three-fold beginning of the purpose of the ages is a section which we denominate: "THE AGES BEGIN: PARADISE LOST." This section is divided into four by the sub-headings: Earth; Man; Usurper; Hope. The Earth is made for man and blessed. Man is created in the image of God, and made, for a little, lower than the angels, with dominion over the work of God's hands. The Usurper (the Serpent), by a false hope of immortality, robs man of his life and peace, and the only Hope left is in the promised "Seed".

The corresponding section is denominated: "THE CONSUMMATION OF THE AGES: PARADISE RESTORED." This, too, has four sub-headings: Earth; Man; True Heir; Hope. Earth is restored and blessed (Hos. ii. 18-23). The curse removed (Isa. lv. 13). The man, Christ Jesus, the last Adam, the express Image of God, has dominion in heaven and earth (Matt. xxviii.). He is the Heir of all things, and the Hope of Creation itself; the Seed of the woman, of Abraham, and of David.

We retrace our steps to see the way this great purpose is unfolded, and must be satisfied with the exhibition of the succeeding pairs in the Structure which are ranged on either side of the central number, the "MYSTERY".

The days of Noah. The nations just before the call of Abraham
As it was in the days of Noah. The nations before Israel are saved.

Promises made to Abraham, Moses and David.
Promises fulfilled that were made to these Patriarchs.

Christ comes as King of the Jews. Rejected.
Christ comes the second time as King. In power and great glory.

The complete Structure of "The Purpose of the Ages" is set out in detail on pages 248 and 249 of Dispensational Truth, a Volume known and possessed by many of our readers, and is still obtainable. To appreciate this attempt to indicate the element of balance in the outworking of this purpose, the reader is urged to consult that Volume and go over the Structure line by line.

We believe such an examination will justify fully the claim that the Scriptures are an organic whole; that God has a sublime purpose; that each succeeding dispensation unfolds further and fuller details of that purpose; that the dispensation of the Mystery is the pivot on which this purpose revolves, and that at the close of this dispensation the inverse correspondence commences, placing in the second scale the fulfillment of what is predicated at the opening of the Word.

If the reader can look, not merely at this outline but investigate its details, comparing feature with feature as they are given in its corresponding members, he will be in possession of a view of the whole of the Word, which, if deficient in the matter of detail, will be sufficient to encourage the fullest search and study, and, taken together with Peter's analysis studied in the preceding paper, should prove to be no small equipment in true, scriptural service.

The reader who consults Dispensational Truth will perceive that, without Christ, this outline has no connecting ties, but that with Him, in His various offices, the purpose of the ages is carried forward from glory to glory.

The central figure, the Mystery, has been given the same denominating letter, A*, as the beginning and the end, in order that it may be as apparent to the eye as to the understanding; that the Mystery, purposed before the ages and concealed for so long, is the pivot upon which the balance of this purpose depends.

A friend and reader who had recently been attacked by reason of his faith in the inspiration of Scripture, secured a hearing, and extracted a reluctant acknowledgment from his opponents that he had grounds for his faith, by presenting them with another, but somewhat similar, outline to the one printed in Dispensational Truth.

Apart from divine inspiration, it is difficult to explain the presence of such a perfect plan in the long series of books, written by different men, over a period of more than a thousand years, some in Hebrew and some in Greek, which constitute the Bible, and it is difficult for the believer to appreciate any but the most superficial of its doctrines, except he be persuaded that such doctrines constitute part of a connected, intelligible, whole.

The lesson we learn from the balance of the teaching of the three Creations is expanded and supplemented by perceiving the equally important balance of subject-matter which forms the skeleton framework upon which the whole revelation is woven.

When we come to details and smaller features in subsequent studies, we hope to show that this same principle is involved, and, throughout the series, may we be continually impressed with the need for balance in our thinking, in our manner of life, in our witness, and in all our ways.

#4. The Balance of Doctrine and Practice.
pp. 204 - 207

In the last two papers we have been exercised with a subject so vast, that, while it may be granted to the earnest believer to obtain some glimpse of the perfection of the great purpose of the ages, in this life no one can ever hope to comprehend a tithe of what the Scriptures actually teach on the subject. Let us now leave this vast and overwhelming aspect of truth and turn to something that is within our grasp. Let us consider the necessary balance that the Scripture insist should be maintained between doctrine and practice.

The example of the apostle Paul and the character of his teaching will supply sufficient material to show how vital to all living faith this balance is. First, the Apostle's own example.

At the close of his life's work he thus wrote to Timothy:

> "Thou has fully known (didst follow up) my doctrine, manner of life . . . . ." (II Tim. iii. 10).

What consistency of walk is implied in such a challenging statement! Having joined the Apostle early in life, when Paul and Barnabas had but traveled half way round their first missionary journey (Acts xvi.), Timothy had thereafter remained in close contact with the Apostle. It is comparatively easy to maintain a "platform" or "pulpit" consistency, but it is another matter to challenge investigation into one's life, especially one spent in perilous journeyings, bitter feuds, periods of want, general misunderstanding, and unmitigated opposition from within and without. Yet the Apostle was able to do this. "I have showed you, and taught you" said he on another and earlier occasion (Acts xx. 20), and in the same passage he supplemented this statement by saying:

> "I have coveted no man's silver, or gold, or apparel. Yea, ye yourselves know, that these hands have ministered unto my necessities, and to them that were with me. I have shewed you all things, how that so labouring ye ought to support the weak, and to remember the words of the Lord Jesus, how He said, It is more blessed to give than to receive" (Acts xx. 33-35).

Hupodeiknumi, "shewed" (Acts xx. 35), gives us hupodeigma, "example" (John xiii. 15), and Paul, fulfilling his doctrine by his practice, is found following in the footsteps of His Lord. This is teaching indeed, compared with which mere exactness in the form of doctrine and accuracy of presentation appear cold and lifeless.

The Apostle exhorted the Philippians to stand fast, being in nothing terrified by their adversaries, adding, "For unto you it is given, in the behalf of Christ, not only to believe on Him, but also to suffer for His sake" (i. 28, 29), and then concluded on the personal note, "Having the same conflict which ye saw in me, and now hear to be in me" (i. 30).

How near his Lord the Apostle must have walked to have taken this thought further, as he did in the fourth chapter:

> "Those things which ye have both learned, and received, and heard, and seen in me, do: and the Lord of peace shall be with you" (Phil. iv. 9).

Let us take some of the doctrines that we have received through the Apostle's writings, and see how he urges us to balance them by practice.

Forgiveness.

> "Having forgiven you all trespasses" (Col. ii. 13).

That is the doctrine. What is the corresponding practice?

> "Forgiving one another, if any man have a quarrel against any; even as Christ forgave you, so also do ye" (Col. iii. 13).
> "Be ye kind one to another, tenderhearted, forgiving one another, even as God for Christ's sake hath forgiven you" (Eph. iv. 32).

Kindness.

In this second practical exhortation there is the word chrestos, "kind". This in its turn is the practical outcome of the doctrinal truth revealed in Eph. ii.:

> "That in the ages to come He might show the exceeding riches of His grace in His kindness (chrestotes) toward us through Christ Jesus" (Eph. ii. 7).

This same practical outworking is found in Col. iii.:

> "Put on therefore, as the elect of God, holy and beloved, bowels of mercies, kindness (chrestotes)" (Col. iii. 12).

Put on.

The exhortation, "put on", reminds us of the passage in Eph. iv., which in its turn is the practical answer to the doctrinal passage of Eph. ii.:

"For to create in Himself of twain one new man, so making peace" (Eph. ii. 15).
"Put on the new man, which after God is created in righteousness and true holiness" (Eph. iv. 24).

This passage makes us think of Col. iii. 10, where we read:

"And have put on the new man, which is renewed in knowledge after the image of Him that created him."

but this in its turn is the practical outworking of the doctrine contained in that wondrous passage concerning Christ:

"Who is the image of the invisible God, the firstborn of every creature" (Col. i. 15).

Again, several items of the Unity of the Spirit which, in Eph. iv., the believer is enjoined to keep, are found in the doctrine of Eph. i., ii., and iii.

Ephesians i. - iii.	Eph. iv. 3 – 6.
Reconcile . . . . . in One Body (ii. 16).	One Body.
Access by one Spirit (ii. 18).	One Spirit.
The Hope of His calling (i. 18).	One Hope of your calling.
Head over all things (i. 22).	One Lord.
Faith according to the Lord Jesus Christ (i. 17).	One Faith.
Fellowheirs, body, partakers (iii. 6).	One Baptism.
Blessed be the God and Father (i. 3).	One God and Father.
He is our Peace, Who hath made both one (ii. 14).	The Bond of Peace.

While the Apostle uses the word prosagoge, "access", in Eph. ii. 18, we have to turn to Peter's testimony to discover the actual doctrinal fact, of which this "access" is the practical balance:

"For Christ also hath once suffered for sins, the Just for the unjust, that He might bring us to God" (I Pet. iii. 18).

"That He might bring" is the verb prosago from which "access", prosagoge, is derived. In other words, we "draw nigh", personally, because we have been "made nigh" by the finished work of Christ.

As the concluding example of this balance between doctrine and practice, let us take the great fundamental of Paul's gospel, "righteousness", dikaiosune. Nothing is more incisive than the teaching of the Apostle concerning the way in which righteousness must be received under the gospel. It is "by faith" (Phil. iii. 9), it is "not by works" (Tit. iii. 5), it is not "by the law" (Rom. iii. 21), it is "reckoned", not as a wage, but as a gift (Rom. iv. 5). Christ is "made unto us righteousness" (I Cor. i. 30), and is "the end of the law unto righteousness to every one that believeth" (Rom. x. 4).

Here is the doctrinal basis; what of the practical correspondence? Those thus justified by faith are told that they have become "the servants of righteousness" (Rom. vi. 18), that their members should be yielded as "instruments of righteousness" (Rom. vi. 13); and that the armour in which they stand contains "the breastplate" of righteousness

(Eph. vi. 14), and is itself called “the armour of righteousness” (II Cor. vi. 7). Timothy is exhorted to “follow after righteousness” (I Tim. vi. 11; II Tim. ii. 22), and the Apostle looked forward to receiving “a crown of righteousness” (II Tim. iv. 8) from the hand of the Lord, as the recognition by Him that the Apostle had finished his course and kept the faith.

Those of us to whom the Lord has shown such “longsuffering” as He did to Paul, the pattern of those who should after him believe (I Tim. i. 16), should find it comparatively easy to walk “with all lowliness and meekness, with longsuffering, forbearing one another in love” (Eph. iv. 2), but, if we are to be guided by the evidence of our senses, it seems, alas, easier to leave the presence of the Lord, having been forgiven so great a debt, and to take one’s fellow-servant by the throat and say “pay me that thou owest”.

We shall never err by exercising too much longsuffering and forbearance, for we can never estimate in this life the debt that has been forgiven us by grace. Let us seek this wonderful balance, so that in our degree, low and little though it be, we shall be able, with all humility, to draw attention to both our “doctrine” and our “manner of life”.

> “Who is sufficient for these things? . . . . . My grace is sufficient for thee” (I Cor. ii. 16; xii. 9).

War in Heaven (An Analogy).

#7. Underlying Principles.
pp. 55, 56

It is impossible to read the Old Testament Scriptures without becoming acquainted with war from a great variety of angles. We read of the conquest of Canaan, of civil war, and of war inflicted as a Divine scourge. Under the old dispensation God does not stand aloof from war. Indeed Moses, in Exod. xv. 3, speaks of Him as "a man of war". We shall, therefore, expect to find that there will be some passages of Scripture, dealing with Israel, and with some particular conflict, that will nevertheless contain principles which can legitimately be applied by believers of all times and callings.

At the exodus from Egypt, Moses gave utterance to the first of these great principles:

> "Fear ye not. Stand still, and see the salvation of the Lord . . . . . the Lord shall fight for you, and ye shall hold your peace" (Exod. xiv. 13, 14).

Long afterwards in the days of Jehoshaphat, we hear some of these words again:

> "Be not afraid nor dismayed by reason of this great multitude; for the battle is not yours, but God's . . . . . Ye shall not need to fight in this battle: set yourselves, stand ye still, and see the salvation of the Lord with you, O Judah and Jerusalem: fear not, nor be dismayed: tomorrow go out against them: for the Lord will be with you" (II Chron. xx. 15-17).

Then again, in I Sam. xvii. 47, we have David's words: "The battle is the Lord's."

Before, however, we go further with our application of these principles we must examine the contexts of the passages concerned.

In the first passage from Exodus, it might appear that Israel were perfectly passive, but this is not quite true. Immediately following the words: "The Lord shall fight for you, and ye shall hold your peace" comes the command: "Wherefore criest thou unto Me? Speak unto the children of Israel, that they go forward. But lift thou up thy rod . . . . ." (Exod. xiv. 15, 16).

Similarly, the citation of II Chron. xx. 15-17, if it unduly stresses the words "stand still" or "not need to fight" to the exclusion of all else that is said, will not supply the true Scriptural principle. Those who would have "no need to fight" are nevertheless told to "set" themselves, and we must also remember that the words "with you" are included:

> "Stand ye still, and see the salvation of the Lord with you . . . . . for the Lord will be with you" (II Chron. xx. 17).

Again, in I Sam. xvii., the youthful David, who declared that "the battle is the Lord's", was actually preparing at that very moment to go out and meet the champion of the Philistines in single combat.

It is evident, therefore, that, while the battle is indeed the Lord's, and it is He alone Who gives victory and deliverance, it is equally true that He calls us into association with Himself. We must "go forward". The salvation of the Lord is "with", and not independent of, His believing people, and, as in David's case, while we acknowledge at all times our utter dependence upon the Lord, there is also need for unflinching courage.

Another similar association of "faith" and "works" is found in the record of the battle with Amalek, in Exod. xvii. Joshua was bidden to "fight with Amalek" and Moses undertook to "stand" on the top of the hill with the rod of God in his hand.

> "And it came to pass, when Moses held up his hand, that Israel prevailed: and when he let down his hand, Amalek prevailed" (Exod. xvii. 11).

While re recognize the supreme importance given here to the place filled by Moses—a type of the glorious intercession of Christ on high—we must not shut our eyes to the fact that it does not say that "Moses prevailed" or that "Moses fought". There is no suggestion that, had Joshua or Israel refused to fight, the extended rod of Moses would have prevailed by itself.

These examples will perhaps suffice to illustrate the nature of the principle that underlies the spiritual conflict—a conflict in which the redeemed of the Lord have a definite part to play, assigned to them by the Captain of their salvation.

#8. "There's a War On."
Its effect upon the liberty of the subject.
pp. 71, 72

Having reviewed the teaching of the Scriptures regarding the existence and character of the conflict of the ages, we now apply the lessons we may learn to the affairs of daily Christian life and experience.

A skeptical objection, which we occasionally met, to the belief that a wise and beneficent Deity still holds sway over this world, may be illustrated by the following conversation, which has been recorded elsewhere. The speakers were two seafaring men, the one a Commander in the Royal Navy and the other a Captain in the Merchant Service.

> Said the Commander, "If there be a God, what a mess He has made of His world. Look at my ship. Every plank is scrubbed white; every piece of brass shines; every man is at his post; I have made a far better job of my ship, than your God has made of His world".
> "Yes", replied the Captain, "but tell me, WHAT WILL YOUR SHIP LOOK LIKE WHEN THERE'S A WAR ON AND YOUR SHIP HAS BEEN IN ACTION?"

When we meet anyone who is inclined to grumble at the necessary restrictions imposed by the Government on individual freedom of action and speech, we silence his objection by the observation, "There's a War on". Traveling facilities are curtailed; certain discomforts are inevitable; passengers have to wait a little longer for their particular bus, or a convenient train service has been suspended. Certain areas that once were common property or open of access become restricted and prohibited. But it were folly to murmur and wise to recognize that these things must be, if "there is a War on".

One of the things that strike us as sad is to realize, that by reason of the fact that they were born after 4th September, 1939, there are children suffering the consequences of War who have never lived in any other atmosphere. For them, the air has never been without its menace: for them, there has never been unlimited supply of the fruits of the earth: for them, there has never been the ability or opportunity of abundant life. Thus, also, it is of the utmost importance that we should remember that since the creation of Adam, it can be as truly said of mankind as of the children born since 4th Sept., 1939, that it has never yet known what it is to live without the conditions of War. Before Adam was formed in the image of his Maker, the spiritual conflict had broken out. The Anointed Cherub had rebelled against his Lord; he had attempted the usurpation of Heaven's dominion, and at the reconstruction of this present world and the creation of man with dominion in it, he immediately recognized in this new being his incipient foe, and laid plans for his overthrow. Man has never yet known true liberty. The presence of spiritual foes; the threat of invasion of his territory; the destruction of his fair inheritance; the employment of every artifice of deceit; all these have rendered the odds against him very great. They have beset man before and behind with all the spiritual equivalents of War conditions, so that, even though by his very constitution as a moral agent, whose will can remain "will" only if it be "free", he finds himself so surrounded by the consequences of conflict as to realize that his "liberty" must, for the time being, be seriously curtailed, and can only be fully enjoyed when the present conditions of conflict shall cease.

We find this limitation of full liberty in the command to abstain from one tree in the garden of Eden. We find it in operation when, in order that weaker brethren might not be stumbled, the Apostle Paul gladly and willingly curtailed some of the very liberty he might as a Christian legitimately have enjoyed. Had anyone challenged the Apostle on this point, asserting that his actions denied the championship of liberty and freedom with which his epistles abound, he might pertinently have replied, "There's a War on". His advice to the Corinthians regarding buying and selling, marriage or abstinence, was governed by "the present necessity" (or "distress") (I Cor. vii. 26). He urged those who used this world, not to "use it to the full" ("abuse") (I Cor. vii. 31); and that while they knew that "The earth is the Lord's and the fullness thereof", they might recognize that it might, on occasion, nevertheless be incumbent on them to allow another man's conscience to limit their own individual freedom (I Cor. x. 28, 29).

For over a thousand years the peoples of these islands of Great Britain have slowly and patiently acquired a liberty that has become the envy of other lands. Yet, with less stir and fewer headlines in the daily press than would be given to the sinking of one battleship, this people, of their own free will, have yielded the blood-bought rights of a thousand years, handed over their most sacred liberties for the duration of the conflict, voluntarily placed themselves in a state of bondage and accepted the possibility of a curtailment of rights comparable with that obtaining in a slave state. For what reason? There is but one answer: "There's a War on."

With this national lesson before his eyes the believer would do well to ponder its application in the spiritual realm, and as he becomes conscious of many restraints, of irksome limitations of his present enjoyment of spiritual freedom, let him acknowledge that in their willing renunciation the children of this generation can teach a wonderful lesson to the children of light, for true liberty must wait the crown of true peace for its unrestricted enjoyment. "The liberty of the glory of the children of God" (Rom. viii. 21).

#9. "There's a War On."
The legitimate use of the Scriptures in a day of darkness and strife.
pp. 126, 127

Among the conditions of life imposed by the Great War was one which was called "The black-out". Like Israel, the believer can have "light" in his dwelling, but the outside world will be found covered with a darkness that may be felt. It is the characteristic of our spiritual foe to work in darkness; our enemies, said the Apostle, are "The rulers of the darkness of this world" (Eph. vi. 12).

For the safety of those who must walk abroad in the period of the "black-out" it was arranged that while, owing to the conditions of the conflict, they were not permitted the indiscriminate use of lamp or torch or to throw light upon any and every object, they could use a torch of sufficient power to show their immediate path, and thus avoid obstacles and find their required haven. When, therefore, we meet any who complain that the Bible does not illuminate the vast geological ages preceding the advent of man; when the Scriptures leave much unsaid regarding the nations outside Israel, and leave untouched numerous philosophical problems, there is but one covering answer: "There's a war on". The Scriptures have been given for the use of the wayfarer during the present spiritual "black-out" and, if rightly used, they will indeed prove to be what the Psalmist said God's Word was to him, "A lamp unto my feet, and a light unto my path" (Psalm cxix. 105).

To avoid accident during the darkness we were urged to look carefully before we stepped off the curb into the traffic, and the Apostle advises the believer in similar spiritual conditions, to "Walk circumspectly . . . . . because the days are evil" (Eph. v. 15, 16). While the word "circumspectly" well conveys the idea of "looking all round", the word akribos which it translates is one indicative of even more insistent care and accuracy. There were, moreover, special crossings which were safe for pedestrians who observed the rules, even as the believer who attends to the Scriptures will hear a voice saying "This is the way, walk ye in it" (Isa. xxx. 21).

Not only may we learn from the analogy of the "black-out" to appreciate the true purpose of wise limitations of the Scriptures, but also from the censorship of news which the presence of the enemy imposed. No man in this country was prevented from listening to the wireless news that came from the four quarters of the earth, but he did not expect his government, in the name of liberty, to proclaim for all the world to hear, the disposition of its troops, the position and strength of its navy, and the hundred and one items of news then forbidden which, in days of peace, would have been common knowledge.

Similarly, the Scriptures contain indications of the wise censorship of their Author. Did the Apostles enquire whether the kingdom would be restored again to Israel at the time of the Lord's last days upon earth? They were reminded, "It is not for you to know the times or the seasons, which the Father hath put in His own power" (Acts i. 7). Are we inclined to compute the date of the second coming of Christ? We are met by the censorship of the truth, "But of that day and hour knoweth no man, no, not the angels of heaven, but My Father only" (Matt. xxiv. 36).

Instead, therefore, of likening the inspired Scriptures to the sun in the noonday heavens, we shall be wise if we remember the figure of the lamp to our feet in the present dispensational night. Instead of maintaining that the Scriptures contain full light upon any and every conceivable theme, we draw attention to the fact that those selfsame Scriptures inform us that there are some features of importance which the Father has kept even from the angels of heaven: "For now we see through a glass darkly; but then face to face" (I Cor. xiii. 12).

This is the testimony of the Word itself. To-day, owing to the presence of spiritual foes, we must be blessedly content to leave many a problem unsolved, and wait patiently the full-orbed illumination of "that day". That the Scriptures have not been written to satisfy all our curiosity and to answer all our questions, is no implication of their imperfection. Most assuredly they are perfectly adapted to their special work of providing enough information for the guidance and direction of the believer during life's journey, without at the same time giving away information that would be of help to our spiritual foe. To know even as we are known, we must await the day of peace.

#10. The Censorship of Information.

The full inspiration of the Scriptures and the divinely appointed limits of the subject-matter revealed in them, as, for example, indicated in I Cor. xiii. 12, do not conflict with one another any more than the effectiveness of the electric torch as "a lamp unto our feet, and a light unto our path", is nullified because it does not equal the light of day. In this respect the Scriptures are as and what they are because "There's a war on".

Another indication of intentional limitation of information, parallel to the censorship of news in war-time, is the presence in the Scriptures of a series of "mysteries". This word, as used in Scripture, must not be limited to its modern usage, as, for instance, the "mysterious" nature of the spirit-world, but rather has the meaning of a "secret", purposely hid because of the presence of an enemy, and revealed only at the appointed time. This can be seen in passages where we first meet with the word. "The mysteries of the kingdom of heaven", which fill the thirteenth chapter of Matthew's Gospel, with their twofold teaching concerning the outer and inner courses of the purpose relating to the kingdom in the absence of the rejected King, reveal the presence and activity of an enemy. In the parable of the Tares, we read, "An enemy hath done this" (Matt. xiii. 28), and because the time was ripe, the disciples then hear and see truth that many prophets and righteous men had desired to see (Matt. xiii. 16, 17).

So, too, "The mystery" that fills the present dispensation with its distinctive glory was "hid in God", and "hidden since the ages and generations" and therefore not revealed until the people of Israel, together with their hope and calling, were temporarily set aside at Acts xxviii. Inasmuch as this mystery goes back to a period "before the overthrow (katabole) of the world", when the great enemy of all truth was cast out as profane, we can understand the wisdom that decreed that certain aspects of the purpose of the ages should be kept secret until the appropriate time. The phrase, "The mystery of His will", found in Eph. i. 9, is very similar to one found in classical use, where it refers to the "plan of campaign" made by a king but naturally kept secret because of the enemy.

A feature which has never been absent from warfare but which has come very much to the fore in the present conflict is the use of the "spy" and his confederates. So much is this the case that it has given rise to the new names of "Quisling" and "Fifth Columnist". The Churches of Galatia suffered from the activity of fifth columnists (Acts xv. 1, 5), and when the Apostle Paul went up to Jerusalem about this very matter he found that "false brethren" had been brought in "unawares", who had come in "privily" "to spy out our liberty which we have in Christ Jesus that they might bring us into bondage" (Gal. ii. 4).

These churches had a "troubler" (Gal. i. 7) in their midst, whose object was "to pervert the gospel of Christ". The truth and the church were being "leavened" (Gal. v. 9), the cross of Christ emptied of its sacred worth, and its message nullified.

Another part of this campaign of deceit is disclosed in the statement made by Paul in II Thess. ii. 1, 2, showing that false messages came by "spirit", by "word" and by "a letter, as from the Apostle", to counter which the Apostle in his epistles was led to use a distinctive phrase which he always wrote with his own hand (II Thess. iii. 17).

This campaign of deceit never ceases. So far as man is concerned it began in the Garden of Eden, and it is resumed even after the millennial reign, when the devil, being let loose, shall go out to deceive the nations which are in the four quarters of the earth (Rev. xx. 7, 8).

Deception is raised to a fine art in the dispensation of the mystery, as will be seen by the efforts of translators to do justice to the intensity of the words used in the passages that reveal it.

> "By the sleight of men, and cunning craftiness, whereby they lie in wait to deceive" (Eph. iv. 14).
> "By the sleight of men in craftiness, after the wiles of error" (R.V.).
> "In the sleight of men, in cunning, with a view to systematized error" (Darby).

Rotherham, Weymouth, Moffatt and others may also be consulted, for each adds his help in throwing light upon the dark theme.

We must ever be on our guard against rumour and false teaching and remember that our spiritual foe is a past-master at the dreadful work of deception. By analogy, we may learn from the children of this generation, in their attempts to counteract the campaign of lies that often prepares the way for attack and conquest, the need of constant watchfulness.

#11. Measures of Defence and of Offence.
pp. 186 - 188

Because there was a war on, the man of the world voluntarily relinquished many legitimate pleasures, forgoed even some necessities, endured a deal of discomfort, and in many ways put into practice, in the secular sphere, the tenets of Scripture laid down for the guidance of the believer in the days of spiritual conflict.

The subject is as endless as life's experiences, for, from the cradle to the grave, man lives his life in a world of war. We cannot make this series of articles as exhaustive as life itself, but we can point out a few of the more obvious features, leaving the rest to the spiritual understanding of each reader.

We will then look for a moment at defensive and offensive measures that find parallels in spiritual warfare. Among these every believer observed the parallel between the "Anderson Shelter" and that Refuge which has been provided by the God of our salvation. It may be fanciful, but it is at least suggestive, that the name John Anderson means The Gift of God, the Son of man. John, and Jonathan, are composed of Nathan, a gift, and the name Jah. Andrew, which is allied to Anderson, is the genitive form of the Greek aner, man. The reader will find the subject of Refuge elaborated in a series of articles in Volume XXX entitled "The Eternal God is thy Refuge" (also in pamphlet form) and from some of the Scripture references appearing therein we now quote.

> "God is our refuge and strength, a very present help in trouble" (Psa. xlvi. 1).
> "He that dwelleth in the secret place of the Most High shall abide under the shadow of the Almighty" (Psa. xci. 1).
> "Thou has been a shelter for me" (Psa. lxi. 3).

We may be surprised to find in Scripture such a modern term as a shelter from blast, or to read of effective protection against incendiaries, but they are there:

> "A Refuge from the storm . . . . . when the blast of the terrible ones is as a storm against the wall" (Isa. xxv. 4).
> "The shield of faith, wherewith ye shall be able to quench all the fiery darts of the wicked" (Eph. vi. 16).

Decontamination is provided by "the washing of water by the Word" (Eph. v. 26); and the complete armour of God is detailed in Eph. vi. 14-17. The one weapon of offence with which the believer is provided is "The sword of the Spirit, which is the Word of God" (Eph. vi. 17). He is exhorted to "stand" rather than enter into a campaign; he is so train and discipline himself that he may be able "to withstand in the evil day" (Eph. vi. 13). Just as the civil population and peaceful towns and villages became, at times, the front line, and just as the recent conflict was called "An all-in war", where the slogan "Business as usual" was both untrue and impossible, so is it with the conflict of truth and error. There can be no holding back: all the redeemed are intimately involved, and their time, talents, and possessions must be freely used in the service of their Captain.

Unless we are watchful our "communications" will be cut, and many a believer has become either a casualty or has given up the conflict, because his fellowship with God has become slack or discontinued. Moreover, the enemy knows that starvation will bring the proudest nation to its knees. To the believer, the Bread of Life is Christ as ministered by the Word of God, and prayer is his line of communication, but the Scriptures represent our food. If therefore either prayer or Bible study can be hindered, our spiritual foe will gain an advantage.

Internal dissension, seeds of jealousy and distrust are fruitful causes of failure, as is also distorted and partially-quoted truth. The leader of the opposing force is a "liar" and a "murderer" (John viii. 44), and is obsessed with the awful ambition to occupy the place that alone belongs to Deity (II Thess. ii. 4; Matt. iv. 9; Rev. xiii. 4).

Thus at every turn, the recent earthly conflict reflected the heavenly in unseen warfare.

Terms of victory and the true meaning of peace will be considered in a separate series of articles, which should be consulted. Perhaps enough has been said in the present series for our immediate purpose, and we trust that as a result of pondering the teaching of the Word, and observing the many parallels that exist between the earthly and heavenly warfare, every reader will become that most envied of servants: "A good soldier of Jesus Christ".

Worship.

#1. The meaning of the term.
pp. 93 - 95

The first occurrence of the word "worship" in the A.V. is in Gen. xxii. 5, the significance of which will be appreciated by all who realize how near to the heart of all doctrine is the great offering therein set forth in type. While the word "worship" does not appear earlier, the student of Scripture is very conscious as he reads Gen. iii. that the words of the Serpent, "Ye shall be as God", would have been no lure to our first parents had true worship and its central significance been understood by them. Moreover, had Cain entered into the meaning of worship, as did his brother Abel, he might have enjoyed like acceptance with Abel, and have avoided the murderer's curse.

Those who see in Ezek. xxviii. something more than a reference to an ordinary King of Tyre, may perceive that an attack upon true worship, a usurpation of Divine prerogative, lie behind the judgment that caused the chaos of Gen. i. 2.

Coming to the end of the sacred volume and viewing the crisis and conflict there depicted, it can be truthfully asserted that it is mainly a conflict between true and false worship. Worship lies in the forefront of the ten commandments and is found in every section of the inspired Scriptures. The heart of the redeemed responds to the call:

> "O come, let us worship and bow down; let us kneel before the Lord our Maker" (Psa. xcv. 6).

Redemption, the gospel, prophecy, dispensational truth, are the outer court of the temple of truth, but the inner shrine, the goal towards which the whole purpose of the ages leads, namely, "that God may be all in all", is the summing up in word and in fact of all that acceptable worship means. A theme that is so near the centre of all truth should, therefore, receive from all who love the Lord the most earnest and prayerful attention, for if we are right here, we have a corrective against all other evils, doctrinal, dispensational and practical. On the other hand, if we are wrong here, we are exposed to all the assaults of the wicked one.

In every argument or study it is a necessity that terms be defined. We must arrive at a clear, scriptural understanding of what the word "worship" means and all that the term connotes. The inspired Scriptures were not given in our mother tongue, but in Hebrew, Chaldee and Greek, yet, upon examination, the English word "worship" will yield its quota.

The meaning of the word "worship".—The reader will not need a long explanation concerning the qualifying suffix, "ship", which is used in such words as "fellow*ship*", "disciple*ship*", or in the less familiar form as in "land*scape*". The word worship comes from the Anglo-Saxon weordhscipe, "worth", or "worthy", with the added suffix, and primarily means acknowledgment of "worth", wherever found. Formerly the word "worship" was not so restricted as it is now, e.g., Wycliffe gives a startling rendering of John xii. 26, "If any man serve Me, My Father shall worship him"! a usage of the word that would now not be tolerated. In our A.V., however, we still read, "Thou shalt have worship in the presence of them that sit at meat with thee" (Luke xiv. 10). The Church of England marriage service contains the word, to be uttered by the husband, "With my body I thee worship", yet, not idolatry, but recognition of the high place of honour in which the husband holds the woman who has given herself so wholly into his keeping is intended. We still speak of a magistrate as "Your worship", and of certain Guilds, as a "worshipful" company, without transgressing either Bible teaching or good taste. In all these usages the primary meaning, "worthy-ship", is retained. In every act of worship there is either expressed or implied the sentiment, "Thou art worthy", and, commensurately with the advancing ranks in the scale of being and holiness of those to whom this recognition is addressed will the "worship" offered grow richer, fuller and more exclusive.

All this however but skims the surface of meaning. The only words that can unfold the mind of God in this, and all other matters of truth, are the inspired words of holy writ.

As we have commenced with the English, let us go back to the Hebrew by way of the Greek of the N.T.

(1) Proskuneo.—There is a superficial resemblance in this word to the Greek kuon, "a dog", and some have given the primary meaning of the word as "To crouch, crawl, or fawn, like a dog at his master's feet". But there is a sense of degradation about this figure, and it is entirely contrary to any scriptural conception of "worship" that the Father seeks those who will crouch, crawl, or fawn to Him like a dog. There is another word, unused in the Scriptures but used in classical Greek, namely kuneo, "to kiss", and it is from this root that Cremer, Thayer, H. J. Rose in his footnote in the later edition of Parkhurst, and other lexicographers derive this word for "worship". Proskuneo means properly, "to kiss the hand (towards) one, in token of reverence", "to make a salaam" (Thayer). Liddell and Scott give instances where kuneo, "to kiss", is used in the sense of proskuneo, "to worship". The root kus has come through into many languages beside the Greek. The Anglo-Saxon coss, the Danish kys, the German kuss and the English kiss, being instances that come readily to mind.

The scriptures moreover associate kissing with worship. "And Moses went out to meet his father-in-law, and did obeisance, and kissed him" (Exod. xviii. 7). The word translated "do obeisance" is translated "worship" ninety-nine times in the O.T. Again, there is no doubt about the close association of the kiss with worship in the following passages:

> "Yet I have left me seven thousand in Israel, all the knees which have not bowed unto Baal, and every mouth which hath not kissed him" (I Kings xix. 18).
> "Let the men that sacrifice kiss the calves" (Hosea xiii. 2).
> "If I beheld the sun . . . . . moon . . . . . and my heart hath been secretly enticed, or my mouth hath kissed my hand . . . . . I should have denied the God above" (Job xxxi. 26-28).

The marginal reading of Gen. xli. 40, too, is suggestive. The A.V. reads, "Thou shalt be over my house, and according unto thy word shall my people be ruled". The word translated "word" here is "mouth", the cause put for the effect, and "be ruled" the verb nashaq, "kiss", as in Gen. xlviii. 10.

Omitting therefore the sense of the fawning of a dog, we can adopt the remainder of the definition given in Dr. Bullinger's Lexicon:

> "To prostrate oneself after the eastern custom, to do reverence or homage to any one, by kneeling or prostrating oneself before him (LXX everywhere for shachah, to bow down, to prostrate oneself in reverence). Used there ore as the act of worship."

(2) Sebomai, sebazomai, eusebeo.—The word just examined is used of the act of worship, whereas, these three words are used rather for the feeling associated with it. The meaning of sebomai is "To stand in awe". It is never used in the epistles. Sebazomai occurs but once and that in connection with "the worship of the creature" (Rom. i. 25). In the Acts sebasma is used once, of the "devotions" of the Athenians, and once in "all that is called God or worshipped" (II Thess. ii. 4). While eusebeia, 'godliness", is used in the epistles, neither eusebeia is there translated "worship". Their bearing upon the question of present-day worship must be examined later.

(3) Latreuo, means "to serve for hire", and when related to God means "to worship". It is used by Paul in Phil. iii. 3.

(4) Therapeuo is generally associated with medical service, and is derived from therapeuein, "To wait on". It is from an old Sanskrit root meaning "to maintain or support". It occurs but once, namely, in Acts xvii. 25, "neither is worshipped with men's hands" which the R.V. translates "serve".

(5) Threskeia.—This word refers rather to ceremonial and ritual than the inner meaning of worship. It occurs in Col. ii. 18, where the word is used of "the worshipping of angels" and, in combination with thelo, it is found in Col. ii. 23, where it is translated "will-worship".

The O.T. uses three words, two of which need not detain us long. Segad is Chaldee, and is used in Dan. iii. where it means "to bow down, do obeisance", and abad, which is Hebrew, and found translated "worship" only in II Kings x., where it speaks of the worship of Baal. The third word, shachah, is the equivalent of proskuneo.

Just as tubes of oil-paint do not produce on the mind the same effect as a picture, so these words supply the material, but do not teach the meaning, of worship. It must be our delight as well as our duty to use these materials, and under the guidance of the Spirit, to learn something of what is meant by the worship of God.

#2. Worship: its relation to Leading, Gospel, Sacrifice and Revelation.

pp. 143 - 147

The implications of posture have occupied the attention both of Doctors of Divinity and of Medicine. A lazy posture is inimical both to serious study and reverence in worship. And as the close association of "bowing the head" with worship meets us very early in the Scriptures, let us commence our study with an examination of the passages in which this expression is found.

The word used, is the Hebrew qadad, and occurs fifteen times. Of this number of references, nine deal with the worship of God, and six with various acts of reverence or fear in the presence of man or angel. We shall be following the Divine method of instruction if we begin with the three passages that refer to man, for, after all, the bowing of the head in the act of worshipping One who is spirit, borrowed as it is from this evident token of human respect, can have no intrinsic meaning as related to God Himself, Who sees the thoughts and intents of the heart, whatever attitude or posture is adopted.

The first pair of references occurs in I Kings i.:

> "And Bath-sheba went in unto the king into the chamber; and the king was very old . . . . . and Bathsheba bowed, and did obeisance unto the king. And the king said, What wouldest thou?" (verse 15 and 16).
> "Then Bath-sheba bowed with her face to the earth, and did reverence" (verse 31).

Between the two verses lies the asking of a request and the granting of it. The subject of Bath-sheba's request was the fulfillment of David's oath that her son Solomon should succeed to the throne, but that need not take our attention here. It is sufficient to see that in making the request of the king and in her acknowledgment of the answer given, Bath-sheba "bowed and did obeisance" and "bowed and did reverence".

The reader will not be surprised to learn that both "obeisance" and "to do reverence", here, are translations of the Hebrew word shachah, "to worship". It is a simple matter to translate the attitude of Bath-sheba, when making her request and in thanksgiving before an earthly and aged king, into higher terms, and see their application to the worshipper who approaches the "King Immortal" with requests and thanksgiving.

The next two references need not long detain us. I Sam. xxiv. 8 tells us that, after he had spared the life of Saul, David cried out to the king and "stooped with his face to the earth, and bowed himself". We only stay to observe here that the word "stooped" is the word translated "bow" in the other fourteen occurrences, whereas the word "bow" in this passage, is the translation of shachah, "do obeisance", "do reverence", or "worship". The same words are found in I Sam. xxviii. 14, where Saul, who had restored to the witch of Endor, "perceived that it was Samuel" and "stooped with his face to the ground, and bowed himself". While the two passages refer to occasions of a very different nature, they are linked together in that, whether it be David bowing before the Lord's anointed, or Saul fancying he is in the presence of a miracle, the attitude is one of reverence, whether genuine or misguided.

The fifth reference is in Numb. xxii. 31, where the eyes of Balaam are opened to see the Angel of the Lord in the way. We read: "And he bowed his head, and fell flat on his face." Although the word here translated "to fall down flat" is still shachah, "to worship", it is the only occurrence of the word being followed by such an expression as "on his face", which lowers it from its true meaning of fear, to sheer fright, leaving therefore fourteen examples of the use of the word "to bow" associated with the higher meaning of obeisance or worship.

The only remaining reference in this series is Gen. xliii. 28, where the brethren of Joseph "bowed down their heads, and made obeisance", fulfilling the dream that had excited their early animosity and foreshadowing the day when Israel shall look upon Him Whom they have pierced and give Him the long-deferred honour that is due.

We now have left for our meditation the nine occurrences of qadad, "to bow", all of which are definitely associated with the worship of God.

As we pursue this study let it be kept in mind that we are seeking fuller light upon the essential nature of true worship. A satisfactory definition of worship is hard to find, and it is hoped that the present studies will be a useful contribution to the subject. The nine references are Gen. xxiv. 26 and 48; Exod. iv. 31, xii. 27, and xxxiv. 8; I Chron. xxix. 20; II Chron. xx. 18; xxix. 30 and Neh. viii. 6.

The first pair show us worship in the presence of most evident leading. Abraham had sent his servant to Mesopotamia to seek a wife of his own kindred for Isaac. Upon arrival, the servant made the camels kneel down by the well, and prayed:

> "O Lord God of my master Abraham, I pray thee, send me good speed this day, and show kindness unto my master Abraham. Behold, I stand here by the well of water; and the daughters of the men of the city come out to draw water: And let it come to pass, that the damsel to whom I shall say, Let down thy pitcher, I pray thee, that I may drink also, let the same be she that Thou hast appointed for Thy servant Isaac; and thereby shall I know that Thou has showed kindness unto my master" (Gen. xxiv. 12-14).

In this prayer there is a delightfully robust, yet simple, faith which the Lord was pleased to honour. Before the man had done speaking, Rebekah is seen approaching, carrying her pitcher, not on her head, but upon her shoulder, indicating, as some have said, her higher caste. Thompson, in "The Land and the Book", is worth quoting here:

> "She went down to the well; and nearly all wells in the East are in wadies and many of them have steps down to the water—fountains of course have. Eliezer asks water to drink; she hastens and lets down the pitcher in her hand. How often have I had this identical act performed for myself, when traveling in this thirsty land. Rebekah's address to the servant, 'Drink, my Lord'—Ishrub ya seedy—will be given to you in the exact idiom by the first gentle Rebekah you ask water from."

Reading these words the prayer of Eliezer at first seems to lose its point. If it was tolerably certain that any damsel in the East would thus respond, no great advance towards identification would seem to have been accomplished. However, Thompson's comment continues:

> "But I have never found any young lady so generous as this fair daughter of Bethuel. She drew for all his camels, and for nothing, while I have often found it difficult to get my horse watered even for money."

That there should be a voluntary undertaking to water such thirsty creatures as camels, was a testing stipulation, and would indicate an exceptionally generous nature in the person sought. We can therefore understand the man "wondering at her" and "holding his peace, to wit whether the Lord had made his journey prosperous or not". But when he discovered that the damsel was actually Rebekah, the daughter of Bethuel, the Son of Milcah, he "bowed down his head, and worshipped the Lord, and he said, Blessed be the Lord God of my master of His master Abraham, who hath not left destitute my master of His mercy and His truth; I being in the way, the Lord led me to the house of my master's brethren" (Gen. xxiv. 26, 27).

Here is food for thought and light upon the nature of worship. The ascription of "blessedness" to God, the reference to "mercy and truth", and the most evident leading of Eliezer, combine to provide a warm and living atmosphere for the first reference to "worship" in association with the key word we are at present using, qadad, "to bow".

The book of Redemption, Exodus, contains three occurrences of qadad. The first is Exod. iv. 31, after Moses and Aaron had demonstrated by word and sign that the Lord had visited the children of Israel and had looked upon their affliction. These afflicted people did two associated things, "They believed . . . . . they bowed their head and worshipped". Worship therefore here springs from believing the good news of salvation. It must be as spontaneous as breathing, and can only be offered by a believing people.

The second reference is found in Exod. xii., the chapter of the Passover. God had now redeemed His promise; He had visited His people and when Moses enjoined upon them annually to remember this great Passover deliverance and teach their children its significance, the people, realizing something of the solemn nature of this great salvation, "bowed the head and worshipped" (Exod. xii. 27). Be it noted also, that "worship", or "bowed head", is closely allied with obeisance, for the next verse says: "And the children of Israel went away, and did as the Lord had commanded Moses and Aaron, so did they."

The third reference is Exod. xxiv. 8. Moses had prayed of the Lord that he might be shown His glory. The Lord had replied, "I will make all My goodness pass before thee, and I will proclaim the name of the Lord before thee; and will be gracious to whom I will be gracious, and will show mercy on whom I will show mercy. And He said, Thou canst not see My face; for there shall no man see My face and live" (Exod. xxxiii. 19, 20). Moses is therefore put into a cleft of the rock and, while the glory of the Lord passed by, Moses was covered by the Lord's hand, only such a revelation being permitted as was within the spiritual ability of Moses to receive, the Lord taking away His hand after He had passed by so that His "back parts" only might be seen. Then follows the writing of the fresh set of tables of stone, the proclamation of the name of the Lord, His mercy and His justice, "And Moses made haste, and bowed his head toward the earth, and worshipped" (Exod. xxxiv. 8).

It is somewhat striking to observe that in the four outstanding passages we have as yet reviewed, the words "make haste" (Hebrew mahar) occur.

> "And she made haste, and let down her pitcher" (Gen. xxiv. 46).
> "And Joseph made haste; for his bowels did yearn upon his brother" (Gen. xliii. 30).
> "Send them out of the land in haste" (Exod. xii. 33).
> "And Moses made haste, and bowed . . . . . and worshipped" (Exod. xxxiv. 8).

To attempt an analysis of this expression and consider its bearing upon the subject before us would take us too far afield and prevent the inclusion of the remaining references, but some readers may be interested enough to pursue the matter further for themselves.

As a result of this revelation of divine goodness we read, "Behold, the skin of his face shone", although he wist it not.

The three passages from Exodus associate worship with the believing of the typical gospel, with the memorial of the typical passover, and with the proclamation of the name of the Lord, His goodness, His mercy, His justice, and with the transfiguring effect upon the face of Moses—a foreshadowing of that antitypical change, when "we all, with unveiled face, beholding as in a glass the glory of the Lord, are changed into the same image from glory to glory, even as by the spirit of the Lord" (II Cor. iii. 18).

Before we have traversed the references that employ the word qadad, "to bow", four more illuminating episodes await us, but these must be left for our next article. In this we have seen worship associated with leading, gospel, sacrifice and revelation, each of which has its fellow in the fuller teaching found in the N.T., and consequently demands fuller and higher worship than was possible in a dispensation of types and shadows.

#3. Further examples and illustrations of worship.
pp. 169 - 173

Continuing our examination of those texts of Scripture which contain references both to "worship" and "the bowing of the head", we pass from the days of Moses to the time of the Kings; to David, and the offering made by both king and people for the building of the temple (I Chron. xxix.).

In the preceding chapter (I Chron. xxviii.) we find that David assembled the princes and officers of Israel and revealed to them how he had had in his heart the desire to build a house of rest for the Ark of the Covenant, and had made ready for the building, but that the Lord had intervened, saying that, seeing he had been a man of war, he could not build His house, but that Solomon his son should do so after his succession to the throne. After publicly exhorting Solomon to faithfulness, David gave him the pattern of the house and its service that he had received from the Lord. Furthermore the last chapter of Chronicles recounts how, after the people had been told of his intensive preparation for the building of the house, David made an appeal to them saying, "And who then is willing to consecrate his service this day unto the Lord?" (verse 5). The response was magnificent. First the princes and then the people "offered themselves willingly" (verses 6 and 9). In the confession that followed, when David blessed the Lord before all the congregation, this willingness comes as a refrain (verse 14, 17). The subsequent exhortation, "Now bless the Lord your God", is followed by worship, "And all the congregation blessed the Lord God of their fathers, and bowed down their heads, and worshipped the Lord, and the king" (verse 20).

If we inquire what "blessing the Lord" implies and involves, we have an answer here in the language of David which suggests that it is the recognition of all His grace and glory:

> "Blessed be Thou, Lord God of Israel our Father, for ever and ever. Thine, O Lord, is the GREATNESS, and the POWER, and the GLORY, and the VICTORY, and the MAJESTY: for all that is in the heaven and in the earth is Thine; Thine is the KINGDOM, O Lord, and Thou art exalted as HEAD above all. Both RICHES and HONOUR come of Thee, and Thou REIGNEST over all; and in Thine hand is POWER and MIGHT; and in Thine hand it is to make GREAT, and to give STRENGTH unto all. Now therefore our God, we thank Thee, and praise Thy glorious name" (I Chron. xxix. 10-13).

Worship contains more, but never less, than this great ascription of praise. Greatness that is intrinsic and His own, and greatness that is solely at His disposal. A God Who is sovereign, and a God of sovereign grace.

Mingled with this glorious ascription is the recognition of human frailty: "Our days on the earth are as a shadow, and there is none abiding" and the fact that all the service we can ever render to the Lord is but using the gifts which He has originally bestowed on us:

> "O Lord our God, all this store that we have prepared to build Thee an house for Thine holy name cometh of Thine hand, and IS ALL THINE OWN . . . . . Of Thine own have we given Thee" (I Chron. xxix. 14-16).

These chapters contain abundant material out of which a very full conception could be reached of what true worship involves, and we therefore commend to our readers the desirability of a prayerful and careful re-reading of them.

From David we pass on to the story of another king, namely, Jehoshaphat, and the triumph of praise (II Chron. xx. 1-30). The record opens with the report of an invasion by Moab (verses 1, 2), and ends with "rest and quiet" (verse 30). Fear of Moab (verse 3) is exchanged for fear of God in all the invading kingdoms when they heard that the Lord fought against Israel's enemies (verse 29). The people gathered themselves together to ask help of the Lord (verse 4), and when the battle was over they assembled themselves to bless the Lord (verses 26-28).

The central section of this record is divided as follows:

A | 5-13. Prayer and Confession.
B | 14-17. Prophecy: Given.
A | 18, 19. Praise and Worship.
B | 20-25. Prophecy: Fulfilled.

In his prayer Jehoshaphat acknowledged that the Lord God was not only the God of his fathers, and therefore in covenant relationship, but also God in heaven, Who ruled over the heathen, and his prayer for deliverance from the ungrateful invasion of Ammon and Moab is based upon these two facts. The prayer ends with a confession that Israel had neither power nor wisdom in the matter:

> "O our God, wilt Thou not judge them? for we have no might against this great company that cometh against us; neither know we what to do: but our eyes are upon Thee. And all Judah stood before the Lord, with their little ones, their wives and their sons" (II Chron. xx. 12-13).

This prayer is answered by the prophecy of Jahaziel, whose name means, "God reveals", who said:

> "Be not afraid nor dismayed by reason of this great multitude; for the battle is not your's but God's . . . . . ye shall not need to fight in this battle: set yourselves, stand ye still, and see the salvation of the Lord with you" (verses 15-17).

Upon hearing these words "Jehoshaphat bowed his head with his face to the ground: and all Judah and the inhabitants of Jerusalem fell before the Lord, worshipping the Lord" (verse 18).

Once more Jehoshaphat speaks, this time to the people: "Believe in the Lord our God, so shall ye be established; believe His prophets, so shall ye prosper" (verse 20). Then he consulted with the people to ascertain their attitude, with the result that singers were appointed to “praise the beauty of holiness”, and the heartening sequel is described in the words:

> “And when they began to sing and to praise, the Lord set ambushments against the children of Ammon, Moab, and Mount Seir, which were come against Judah; and they were smitten . . . . . every one helped to destroy another” (II Chron. xx. 22, 23).

On the fourth day the people assembled in a valley, and there blessed the Lord, the place from that day being called the Valley of Berachah, or Blessing (verse 26).

Here therefore is another telling context associated with the meaning and adjuncts of worship. The worshippers confess that they have neither power nor wisdom, but they believe the Lord and His prophets; they set themselves in battle array, armed, not with weapons known to men, but with praise, emphasizing the beauty of holiness and ending with the blessing the Lord. The eye that has looked to Christ as the “power” and “wisdom” of God will see in this passage much to illuminate the great subject of “worship”.

Turning now to II Chron. xxix., we come to the reign of Hezekiah, and the restoration of worship carried out under his command. His first recorded act was to “open the doors of the house of the Lord” and repaired them. The priests and Levites were assembled, and sanctified themselves and cleansed the temple and the court, beginning on the first day of the first month. Suitable offerings were selected, and reconciliation made with their blood, “for the king commanded that the burnt offering and the sin offering should be made for all Israel” (verse 24).

> “And when they had made an end of offering, the king and all that were present with him bowed themselves and worshipped” (II Chron. xxix. 29).

Consecration and cleansing being accomplished, the congregation brought their thank offerings, “as many as were of a free heart”, but because the number was so great, and the number of the priests too few, the Levites “did help them, till the work was ended, and until the other priests had sanctified themselves: for the Levites were more upright in heart to sanctify themselves than the priests” (verse 34). At the end of the chapter we read, “And Hezekiah rejoiced, and all the people, that God had prepared the people: for the thing was done suddenly” (verse 36).

There is much to exercise our hearts in this record, especially the breadth of view that is manifested. The ten tribes, known as “Israel”, were separated from Judah, Hoshea being king of Israel, in the ninth year of whose reign (which year coincided with the first year of Hezekiah), Samaria was taken, and Israel carried away captive. Hezekiah did not exclude the captive Israelites from a place in this great service, but insisted (as previously mentioned) that the offerings should be made “for all Israel” (verse 24). This is comparable with the repeated use of the expression “all saints” found in the N.T., and reveals a further and fuller aspect of worship, irrespective of the presence or absence of many who should have made up the congregation.

The second important point is the employment of the Levites, who were "more upright in heart", to act for the priests, who were too few in number for the work. This too must be remembered in days like those in which we live. Even in the epistle to the Philippians we discover that there were "bishops and deacons", but we doubt if such exist in sufficient number or of sufficient sanctity to-day. Nevertheless the worship of God is acceptable.

A further illustration of this principle is found in II Chron. xxx. 15-19. Here, as provided by the law of Moses, the Passover was observed on the fourteenth of the second month (see Numb. ix. 6-13), the Levites killing the passover lamb of every one that was not clean.

> "Yet did they eat the passover otherwise than it was written. But Hezekiah prayed for them, saying, the good Lord pardon every one that prepareth his heart to seek God, the Lord God of his fathers, though he be not cleansed according to the purification of the sanctuary" (II Chron. xxx. 18, 19).

In the eyes of the Lord "preparation of heart" counted far more than ceremonial cleansing, a word of grace to many in these distracted days in which we now seek to worship Him.

We now come to the last of this series of references where "bowing the head" is associated with "worship", and to the days of Nehemiah and Ezra, when the Word of God was opened in the sight of all the people (Neh. viii. 1-8). Though neglected, Hezekiah's temple did still stand, but in the days of Nehemiah the temple and city of Jerusalem were in ruins. The rebuilding of the walls had commenced, and the foundation of the new temple had been laid, but just between the two great works comes the story of Neh. viii. Hezekiah "opened" the doors of the temple; Ezra "opened" the book. In the revival of Hezekiah's day the worshippers assembled in the courts of the temple. But in the revival of Neh. viii. they "gathered themselves together as one man in the street". Here was no altar, no singing, no music, but instead of the elaborate ceremonial enjoined by the law, we have the "book of the law" and a "pulpit of wood". The Levites were here, but not to flay the sacrifices or to offer Passover lambs, "the Levites caused the people to understand the law" (Neh. viii. 7). The great central feature in this moving story is "The pulpit of wood". Ezra the priest is not seen officiating at an altar, but standing upon a pulpit of wood where he "opened the book in the sight of all the people". When the book was opened, the people "stood up" in token of reverence:

> "And Ezra blessed the Lord, the great God. And all the people answered, Amen, Amen, with lifting up their hands: and they bowed their heads, and worshipped the Lord with their faces to the ground . . . . . So they read in the book in the law of God distinctly, and gave the sense, and caused them to understand the reading" (Neh. viii. 6-8).

The days of Nehemiah are in many respects like our own. Organized religion has failed. The externals of the faith have gone. Like a bulwark in a flood stands "a pulpit of wood, which had been made for this purpose", and gathered around the "opened book" stand the worshipping multitude. To-day our High Priest is in heaven. We have no altar on earth. The Sacrifice has been offered, never to be repeated; the central point of our gathering now is not an altar but a pulpit; the great ministry now is, not the shedding of the blood of bulls and of goats, but the preaching of the Word that point away from all type and symbol to the finished work of Christ, now seated at the right hand of God.

Prayerfully considered, there is much in this series of studies upon which the enlightened mind can meditate, and thus knowledge be gained on the subject of "worship in spirit and in truth".

We must now turn our attention to other aspects of this important theme, and trust that when our quest is finished we shall have a clearer understanding of what is involved when we speak of the worship of God.

#4. Worship and Liberty.
pp. 221 - 225

We have already learned something of the nature of worship by following the lead given by the use of the expression "bow down". There are, of course, other lines of thought that we may pursue, and one that comes readily to mind is the connection between the word "worship" and "serve".

The Hebrew words Ebed, "a servant", and Abad, "to serve", are familiar in such names as Obadiah ("Servant of Jah"), and Obed ("Serving"), the son of Ruth, and the father of Jesse. The prophet Isaiah, also, has much to say of Israel, the Servant of the Lord, and of the Coming One, Who is called "My Servant, Whom I uphold" (Isa. xlii. 1). Ebed is the Hebrew equivalent of the Greek doulos, a "bond-slave", as in Rom. i. 1.

The word shachah, "worship", occurs upwards of one hundred and ninety times in the O.T., while abad occurs upwards of two hundred and eighty times. With numbers of this magnitude, the amount of labour involved in determining the number of references in which "serve" and "worship" come together can only be appreciated by those who have actually carried out investigations of this kind. We will not, therefore, be dogmatic, but so far as we have investigated, it would seem that there is not a single passage in the O.T. where "serve" and "worship" come together when the context is concerned with the worship of God. On the other hand, there are nineteen references where the two words come together in connection with the worship of other gods. We will not quote these nineteen passages in full, but the reader may like to have the references:

> Commands in the Law concerning "serving and worshipping" other gods: Exod. xx. 5; xxiii. 24; Deut. iv. 19; v. 9; xi. 16; xvii. 3; xxix. 26; xxx. 17.
> References to "serving and worshipping" other gods in the Prophets: I Kings ix. 9; xvi. 31; xxii. 53; II King xxi. 3; II Chron. vii. 22; xxxiii. 3; Jer. xiii. 10; xxii. 9; xxv. 6.
> In one passage a discrimination is made between "worshippers" of Baal, and "servants" of the Lord (II Kings x. 23).

While these references were being considered, we had at the back of our mind the well known words, "Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and Him only shalt thou serve". And yet these words did not appear in any of the passages we had collected. The reader will hardly need to be reminded that the words concerned occur in Matt. iv. 10 in connection with the Lord's temptation in the wilderness, but although the Saviour used the words, "It is written", it must be admitted that no such text occurs in our O.T. Scriptures. When we turn to the Septuagint Version, however, we find that Deut. vi. 13 is quoted word for word from the version, except for the one word "worship". In Matt. iv. 10 the Greek word is proskuneo, but in the LXX of Deut. vi. 13 the Greek word is phobeo, "fear", a correct translation of the Hebrew yare. We have here a problem of the first magnitude, but it comes more appropriately under the heading of Quotations from the O.T. in the New rather than under the simpler heading of Worship. It will perhaps suffice for the moment if we quote the words with which Appendix 107 of The Companion Bible opens:

> "It is a fact that in quotations from the Old Testament the Greek text sometimes differs from the Hebrew.
> The difficulties found in connection with the subject arise from our thinking and speaking only of the human agent as the writer, instead of having regard to the fact that the Word of God is the record of the words which He Himself employed when He spoke 'at sundry times and in divers manners' . . . . . denying the Divine speaker and Author the right that is claimed by every human writer for himself."

Matt. iv. 10 is included in a list of twelve such passages where the words of the quotation are varied "by omission, addition, or transposition". In dealing with Satan, the Saviour adopted the LXX version with the substitution of proskuneo for phobeo, and the addition of the word "only" for His own wise purposes.

Coming back now to the general question, we must try to discover why the words "serve" and "worship" should be used together when idolatry is spoken of, but not so used when the object of the service or the worship is the true God. Can we truly "worship" God, if we do not "serve" Him? Can we hope that any "service" we render can be acceptable to Him if "worship" is absent? These are our problems, and we have found no solution to them in the writings of men. The answer, if it comes at all, must come from the same source that has provided the problem, the Word of God itself.

In Psalm cv. 42 Abraham is called a "servant" of the Lord, but Melchisedec, who was a priest, and so connected with worship, is not so described. Moses, too, is called a "servant" (Josh. i. 1, 2), but not Aaron the priest. Joshua, the Captain of the Lord's host, is referred to as the "servant" of the Lord (Josh. xxiv. 29); but not Eleazar the priest. David is given the title "servant" of the Lord, (Psa. xviii., title, and lxxxix. 3), but not Abiathar the priest. Eliakim, the master of Hezekiah's household, is called a "servant" (Isa. xxii. 20), also Isaiah the prophet (Isa. xx. 3); but not Hilkiah the priest. The people themselves, both as "Jacob" (Isa. xliv. 1) and "Israel" (Isa. xlix. 3) are called the "servant" of the Lord, but their priestly office is reserved for a future day (Isa. lxi. 6). And even in the case of Christ Himself, who is spoken of prophetically as "My Servant" (Isa. xlii. 1) and "My Servant the Branch" (Zech. iii. 8), we have the testimony of Scripture that "If He were on earth, He should not be a priest" (Heb. viii. 4). Why, then, is there this consistent exclusion of "service" from the realm of "worship"?

In spite, however, of this evident separation of the words "worship" and "service" when used of the Lord, it is clear that when the Lord promised Moses, "Ye shall serve God upon this mountain" (Exod. iii. 12), and when he commanded Pharaoh, "Let My son go, that he may serve Me" (Exod. iv. 23), the "service" concerned was largely an act of worship, for we read that Moses demanded of Pharaoh "sacrifices and burnt offerings, that we may sacrifice unto the Lord our God" (Exod. x. 25). Again, the memorial of the Passover is called a "service" (Exod. xii. 25, 25), and the feast of unleavened bread (Exod. xiii. 5), but these are also called "ordinances" (Exod. xii. 14, 17, 24, 43; xiii. 10). The care of all the instruments of the tabernacle (Numb. iii. 7, 8), and the ministry of Aaron and his sons were all "service" (Numb. xviii. 7), as were the individual elements of this ritual such as the "vessels" (Exod. xxvii. 19), the things of gold, silver, and brass, and the skins, linen, incense and oil (Exod. xxxv.).

We have therefore, to keep in mind two facts:

(1) "Worship" is not used with the word "service" when that worship is directed to God; it is only so allied when used of idolatry.
(2) On the other hand, the work of the Priests and Levites in connection with the sacrifices, prayers and other ceremonials relating to the tabernacle are freely called "service".

The prophets Isaiah and Jeremiah have some searching things to say in connection with the service of the temple. In Jer. vii. we read:

> "Trust ye not in lying words, saying, The temple of the Lord, The temple of the Lord, The Temple of the Lord, are these" (Jer. vii. 4).

And in the first chapter of Isaiah:

> "Bring no more vain oblations; incense is an abomination unto Me; the new moons and sabbaths, the calling of assemblies, I cannot away with; it is iniquity, even the solemn meeting. Your new moons and your appointed feasts My soul hateth: they are a trouble unto Me; I am weary to bear them" (Isa. i. 13, 14).

And yet every item mentioned—temple, oblation, offering and feast—was Divinely appointed. Why then this revulsion? The answer is found in the chapters referred to. Israel had departed from the truth, and so in the eyes of the Lord, their clinging to the externals of religion was but empty mummery. False gods did not demand purity and spirituality from their worshippers, and so their worship and their service could be named together; but with the true God, even a Divinely appointed ritual was all in vain apart from uprightness of heart.

Even when the Apostle acknowledges that to Israel pertained "the service of God", this is limited to things "according to the flesh" (Rom. ix. 3, 4), and the epistle to the Hebrews, when speaking of "ordinances of divine service" under the Old Covenant adds the words "and a worldly sanctuary" (Heb. ix. 1). These things signified that the way into the holiest of all was not yet made manifest. They were figures, shadows of good things to come:

> "That could not make him that did the service perfect, as pertaining to the conscience, which stood only in meats and drinks, and divers baptisms, and carnal ordinances, imposed on them until the time of reformation" (Heb. ix. 9, 10).

The mere observance of "days, months, weeks and years", even though offered to the true God, is not far removed from the "weak and beggarly elements" of pagan worship (Gal. iv. 8-10). And the epistle to the Colossians associates "the worshipping of angels" and "will-worship" with ordinances that were cancelled at the Cross, such as "meats, drink, holy days, new moons, and sabbath days".

Returning to Galatians, it is impossible to understand the Apostle's teaching in this mighty episode, without a realization of the fact that the believer now is free. Jerusalem on earth with its children is in bondage, but Jerusalem which is above is free.

Perhaps we are at last drawing near to the solution of our problem. The word "serve" (abad) gives us the word "bondage" (Exod. i. 14), "bondmen" (Gen. xliii. 18), "bondservice" (I Kings ix. 21), "servitude" (II Chron. x. 4), and "servile" (Lev. xxiii. 7). The reader will remember that in the observing of the feasts of the Lord, and the sabbaths, it is reiterated that "ye shall do no servile work therein" (Lev. xxiii. 7, 8, 21, 25, 35, 36). "Servility" and "worship" cannot be thought of together; servility is only fit service for the darkened heathen. So when the Lord demanded the release of His people that they might serve Him, He speaks of them as His "son". This service of a Son was hidden under a mass of observances, in connection with a covenant with which the Lord Himself "found fault"—a covenant which was "imposed" until the time of reformation, and destined then to pass away for ever. "Is Israel a servant? is he a homeborn slave?" asks Jeremiah (Jer. ii. 14). Alas, he was, and is, and will be, until the veil is taken away. Worship, therefore, as practiced by such a people cannot be the full thing.

The secret of true worship is revealed in the words of Christ. It will be neither in Samaria, with its mixed motives, nor in Jerusalem, with its Divinely appointed ritual. The true worshipper worships the FATHER. He worships "in spirit, and in truth", and the Father seeketh such to worship Him. It is entirely foreign to the thought of reverencing a Father that the sons should be cumbered with ceremonials and ordinances. Tabernacles, temples, sacrifices, priests, vestments, holy days, and the like all indicate that the worshippers are at a distance. Those that have access to the Father can need none of these things.

We are grateful to have seen at least this amount of light upon the nature of true worship, even though much may still be hidden from our eyes.

DEAR FELLOW-BELIEVERS,

By the grace of God and with loyal fellowship of our readers, we have been enabled to complete the present volume, and with it thirty-nine years of testimony to the truth of the mystery.

A glance at the Index will show that the claims of "right division" have been recognized, and that the right division of the Word of truth does not cramp or limit us, but enables us to believe and enjoy "All Scripture".

The signs of the times indicate that the time for this testimony is short. The last members of the one body are being gathered out, and it is our prayer that The Berean Expositor may still be blessed to the enlightenment of those who seek to know "What is the hope of His calling", while the day of grace continues.

Yours in "that blessed hope",

Similarities do not constitute Identity.
pp. 7, 8

(An important principle of interpretation considered and commended to all true "Bereans").

On pages 173 to 177 of Volume XXXIII, we attempted to answer an objection that had been made to our teaching, based upon the incidence in Hebrews of words or expressions similar to others found in Ephesians. This objection was expressed in a letter, from which we gave an unedited extract. If this extract does not accord with a booklet since published by the writer of the letter, it will be understood that such variation, while within his rights, cannot reflect upon our own integrity.

The reasoning that underlies this method of examination is fallacious in that it discovers similarities but interprets them as identicals. Whether they are concerned with the problem put forward in the article referred to or not, we believe it would be a "word in season" to all our readers if this fallacious argument was exposed, because principles of interpretation are fundamental to all understanding, and should occupy a prominent place in the Christian worker's equipment.

The principle stated: Similarities, however many, cannot constitute identity in the presence of one proved contrary. This may sound rather involved, but the following illustration may convince of its essential truth.

The principle illustrated: Here is a supposed description, circulated by the police, of a wanted man:

> "A man, past middle age, height 5'7½", dark hair, slightly grey at temples, eyes grey, complexion pale, aquiline features, tendency to stoop, interested in art and music, editor of a religious paper; last known place of residence, London, S.W."

The reader who is personally acquainted with the editor of The Berean Expositor, will recognize the foregoing as a fairly good description of him. Now, let us further suppose that the police, acting upon information, take the editor into custody. He is examined point by point, and found to tally with the description. Surely some would say, "This is the man!" If a list of similarities proves identity, then the prospects before the editor look rather bleak.

As we have seen, the believer may put into a parallel columns words found in Hebrews and Ephesians, and say, in effect, "These prove identity", "This is the same calling", but, happily, the police do not mistake similarities for identity. One clear statement of fact that introduces a contrary, sets aside columns of similarities in the matter of identity. The editor of The Berean Expositor would have had not the slightest qualm in going up for examination, for he was in possession of one essential fact which disproved his identity with the criminal concerned: the wanted man was born in New York, whereas the editor was born in London. We cannot conceive that any official would interpose and say, "We are not concerned with where this man was born, we are more concerned with the many items of similarity. He must be the man."

Alas, the children of this generation are often wiser than the children of light, and would at once admit that one established contrary destroys assumed identity based on many similarities. "Similar" is not the "same".

In Ephesians we discover a revelation never before made known; a choice from "before the foundation of the world"; a calling "far above all"; a unique position, "seated together in heavenly places". Any one of these is a "contrary" to the revelation, the choice, the calling, or the position revealed in Hebrews.

One item alone in Hebrews is enough to destroy any attempt to make the callings of the two epistles identical. Embedded in the heart of Hebrews is "The New Covenant", and this one fact is so foreign to the whole teaching of Ephesians as to cancel any number of similarities, if they are used with the object of establishing identity.

We will not occupy valuable space with further illustrations of this principle, for we believe it is obvious. The reader can work out other illustrations by, for example, noting that the "ransom" occurs in Matthew and in I Timothy, and disprove the conclusion that the callings of Matthew and I Timothy must therefore be identical. In this case the emphasis on the Gentile in the epistle, and the emphasis of Israel in the gospel provide the "contraries".

Parallel passages abound in Scripture, but, instead of impinging on the domain of other callings, they, like those of Euclidean geometry, never meet. Let us "try the things that differ"; let us "rightly divide the word of truth". We shall then approve the things that are more excellent, and be workmen who need not be ashamed.

"Soul Sleep."

pp. 61 - 65

If it is to be truly profitable, all true ministry must be " a word in season", and it is not possible nor expedient to attempt to teach all the truth, or witness to every doctrine, at any one time.

The fact that within a week we have received more than one enquiry concerning the teaching of Scripture regarding death as a sleep, leads us to see that it would be a word in season to devote some of our limited space to a consideration of this subject. In the first place let us turn to John xi. 14: "Jesus said unto them plainly, Lazarus is dead" (Lazaros apethane). The Greek verb here translated "is dead" is from apothnesko. As John xi. 21 and 41 will show, the word thnesko means "to die". "The addition of the prefix apo intensifies the conception representing the actions of the simple verb as consummated and finished, to die out, to expire, to become quite dead" (Dr. E. W. Bullinger's Lexicon). In John viii. 52 we read "Abraham is dead" (Abraham apethane). Here therefore is fact #1: Lazarus was as literally and completely dead as was Abraham.

In the second place let us turn to Luke viii. 52. There we read "She is not dead" (Greek ouk apethanen). Here we have the negative "not", which sets before us the exact opposite of the proposition made in John xi. Here therefore is fact #2: "She is not dead."

Now we find that many use the words of Luke viii. 52 to deny or belittle the language of John xi. 14, but by so doing they are making Christ contradict Christ, which is impossible. The third fact (#3) therefore which emerges, and which demands acceptance, is, that Lazarus was dead and the little maid was not; both statements must be accepted, and neither contradicts the other.

In the fourth place, we are reminded that in both passages the word "sleep" occurs, and this is brought forward as a proof that Lazarus was not really dead. But when we "open the book" and "search and see" we discover that this "proof" is based on the supposition that the Greek word for "sleep" in both passages is identical. This, however, is not the case:

> "Our friend Lazarus sleepeth", Greek koimaomai (John xi. 11).
> "She is not dead but sleepeth", Greek katheudo (Luke viii. 52).

These two words represent two distinct thoughts; they are used with purpose, and recorded by inspiration of God. Those who desire the truth will adhere to the words that the Lord chose; those who wish otherwise will probably pay little or no attention to the essential difference between them. The word in John xi. 11 is used in the passive and means “To fall asleep involuntarily”, consequently it is used of death. The word in Luke viii. 52 is active, and means “To compose oneself to sleep”. A good illustration of the essential difference between the two words occurs in the first epistle to the Thessalonians. In iv. 13-15 we read of them which “sleep”, and these believers are spoken of as “them which sleep in Jesus” (verse 14) and “the dead in Christ” (verse 16). Moreover these are contrasted with those who are “alive and remain”. In these passages the word consistently used is koimaomai, for this “sleep” means “death”.

In I Thess. v., however, katheudo is used, and not koimaomai:

> “Let us not sleep, as do others” (verse 6).
> “They that sleep, sleep in the night” (verse 7).
> “Whether we wake of sleep” (verse 10).

Were the word “sleep” here synonymous with death, we should be able to restate verse 6 as follows: “Therefore let us not die as do others”! but, alas, we have no such option. The word “sleep” finds its synonym, not in death, but in “drunkenness”, its contrast in being “sober”.

The reader of the A.V. should remember that the words “watch” in I Thess. v. 6 and “wake” in verse 10 are the same. The original word is gregoreo, and is translated “be vigilant” once, “wake” once, “watch” twenty times, and “watchful” once; consequently I Thess. v. 10 should read, “Who died for us, that, whether we be watchful or drowsy, we should live together with Him”, although, of course, other scriptures make it plain that the unwatchful believer may not be granted to “reign with Him”, a doctrine not in view in the chapter before us.

Here therefore is fact number four (#4); that two essentially different ideas are presented by the two different words translated “sleep” in Luke viii. and John xi., and must therefore not be confounded.

There is however one further statement in Luke’s Gospel that demands attention. It is, “And her spirit came again” (Luke viii. 55). It is to Mark’s account of the raising of Jairus’ daughter that we are indebted for the fact that on that occasion (Mark v. 41) the Saviour spoke Aramaic, not Greek, from which it is clear that her parents and those concerned were acquainted with the Hebrew scriptures, and familiar with its idiom. Having that in mind, let us refer to I Sam. xxx. 11, 12, where we read:

> “And they found an Egyptian in the field, and brought him to David, and gave him bread, and he did eat; and they made him drink water; and they gave him a piece of a cake of figs, and two clusters of raisins: and when he had eaten, HIS SPIRIT CAME AGAIN to him.”

This passage proves that the expression used in Luke viii. 55 does not necessitate death.

We learn therefore that Lazarus was actually dead, whereas, while the family and friends of the little maid thought she was dead, they were mistaken. The word used of Lazarus meant "to fall asleep involuntarily", whereas the word used of the little maid meant "to sleep", not as the dead, but as those who were in a coma or heavy sleep.

Untrammelled by these subsidiary considerations we can now face the scriptural fact that the dead are said to be asleep. Even the heathen poets, of necessity well acquainted with their mother tongue, realized that the figure of "sleep", as used of death, implied a subsequent awakening, and so we find them continually adding the epithets "perpetual", "eternal", "unawakened", "brazen", to the word "sleep", in order to exclude the idea of awakening natural to it. Estius says "sleeping is thus applied to men that are dead, and this because of the hope of resurrection; for we read no such thing of brutes". The early Christians rightly called their burying places koimeterion, "sleeping places", from which comes the English cemetery.

To the believer who is prepared to accept whatever may be the teaching of the inspired Word, these passages are of themselves sufficient proof that in the Scriptures death is likened to sleep, and because the Scriptures are true, and no figure employed by them can be misleading, the two words "sleep and awaken", used to indicate "death and resurrection", leave no room for a conscious interval, where, it is taught, the disembodied dead are more alive than they were in this life.

In order that no unexplained difficulty shall be permitted to becloud the issue, we can now return to John xi.

> "He whom Thou lovest is sick" (John xi. 3).
> "This sickness is not unto death, but for the glory of God, that the Son of God might be glorified" (John xi. 4).

We have already seen the Lazarus died, and the record of his burial follows. The words "not unto death" cannot therefore means that our Saviour was mistaken. We may learn the intent behind these words by comparing them with another comment found in John:

> "Master, who did sin, this man or his parents, that he was born blind? Jesus answered, Neither hath this man sinned, nor his parents: but that the works of God should be made manifest in him" (John ix. 2, 3).

In this passage the Lord is not teaching that the man or his parents were the exceptions to the universal rule, and were sinless. He was teaching that this special calamity of blindness was allowed, or even planned, in order that, by the miracle of his healing, the works of God, that set Him forth to be the Messiah, should be made manifest. So, also, the sickness of Lazarus, though it ended in actual death, had a greater purpose in it, namely the glorifying of God and of His Son. In verse 14 of John xi. we read, "Then said Jesus unto them plainly, Lazarus is dead".

"Plainly (parrhesia)."—Four times this word occurs in John's Gospel as the translation of the Greek parrhesia, and in each case it is used in the explanation of a parable or proverb.

"If Thou be the Christ, tell us plainly" (x. 24).

"Then said Jesus unto them plainly, Lazarus is dead" (xi. 14).

"These things have I spoken unto you in proverbs: but the time cometh, when I shall no more speak unto you in proverbs, but I shall show you plainly of the Father" (xvi. 25).

"His disciples said unto Him, Lo, now speakest Thou plainly, and speakest no proverb" (xvi. 29).

In John x. 6, in allusion to the previous verses regarding the fold, the shepherd and the robber, this word paroimia, "proverb", is translated "parable". This "proverb" is then "plainly" stated in John x. 7-18. When therefore the Lord said "plainly", "Lazarus is dead", He was but explaining the meaning of the figure "sleep".

The reader will probably be alive to the fact that death, conceived of as a sleep from which there is no awakening until the resurrection, is so contrary to the teaching of many who have embraced the unscriptural teaching known as "The immortality of the soul", and its consequent sequel "The intermediate state" (with, incidentally, all the encouragement that such false teaching gives to "Spiritism") that so-called orthodoxy is obliged to stoop to the use of questionable methods in order to prevent the seeker after truth from finding it. Here, for instance, is a review, published in 1946, of The Companion Bible:

"COMPANION BIBLE, bearing no author's name but well known to be the work of Dr. Bullinger, gives the A.V., very much that is helpful and of literary value. Had it contained only orthodox matter it would have been a valuable book of reference. We must add that only students or those grounded in the faith should handle, as references and notes abound with Dr. Bullinger's views of "Soul sleep", "Hell, the grave", "Prison Epistles" and other dangerous theories, especially in the appendices. Do not invest in this book" (the italics are the author's).

The reader will observe the term "Soul sleep". Dr. Bullinger repudiates the term, saying that he did not know what it meant. Anyone who knew the meaning of the word "soul", as taught by Scripture, would never use such an expression, but it is good enough to frighten the timid seeker.

The reader will moreover notice the appropriation of the title "orthodox" by those who thus criticize and condemn "The Companion Bible". If we set out to discover what this "orthodoxy" is, and where its seat of authority is to be found, we shall be driven to the Bible and the Bible only.

Shall we say that orthodoxy is found only in that Church "by law established"? If so, then those whose criticisms have just been quoted will be found very unorthodox. Are Wesleyans, Baptists, Congregationalists and Brethren orthodox? What would happen to such a company if one should follow the lead of Paul when he observed that one part of the Sanhedrin were Pharisees and one part Sadducees? What an exhibition of "orthodoxy" would follow a few questions direct to such an assembly! This appeal to so-called orthodoxy is a confession of weakness. Let all such come out plainly and appeal only and solely to the teaching of the Scriptures and the field will be cleared of cant.

We can well understand the fears of "orthodoxy" if an enquirer should turn to Appendix 13 of "The Companion Bible". There the 754 occurrences of the Hebrew word nephesh are tabulated and analysed. In an introduction of this list Dr. Bullinger says:

> "This Appendix will exhibit all the varieties of translation; and while it is not intended to teach either Theology or Psychology, it will give such information as will enable every Bible reader to form his own views and come to his own conclusions on an important subject, about which there is such great controversy."

It is such an exhibition of the facts that "orthodoxy" would smother with pious warnings.

Orthodoxy has put many a saint of God to death, and those whose opinions we have cited would necessarily be obliged to class Tyndale among the heretics, for he says:

> "I marvel that Paul did not comfort the Thessalonians with that doctrine if he had wist it, that the souls of their dead had been in joy; as he did with the resurrection that their dead should rise again. If the souls be in heaven in as great glory as the angels, show me what cause be of the resurrection" (Tyndale).

Inasmuch as both the A.V. and the R.V., together with all translations and versions since the days of Tyndale, bear the impress of that man of God, the "orthodox" would be well advised to warn any but those who are "grounded in the faith" against reading the Bible at all.

May the Lord ever keep us free from the blinding power of tradition, and ever lead us in our intentions to base all our doctrine squarely upon what is "written", leaving "orthodoxy" to its inglorious emulation of the Scribes and Pharisees who made void the Word of God that they might keep the traditions of the elders.

Signs of the Times.
p. 80

> "Yet the voices of the prophets which are read every sabbath day, they have fulfilled them in condemning Him" (Acts xiii. 27).

These tragic words come into mind when we read that Dr. E. W. Barnes, Bishop of Birmingham, writes in his recent book that the stories of the Virgin Birth have "a pagan background". Of the miracles he writes that man is naturally superstitious but science has proved that nothing can happen contrary to observed sequences of the laws of nature; and concerning the record of the crucifixion and of the resurrection he writes that myth and marvel steadily become more in evidence as the story moves to the burial and resurrection, and "we are in the domain of religious romance, not religious history".

Bishop Barnes, however, is unconsciously confirming the truth of Paul's epistle to Timothy, where he says:

> "The time will come when they will not endure sound doctrine . . . . . and they shall turn away their ears from the truth, and shall be turned unto myths" (II Tim. iv. 3, 4).

("The Rise of Christianity" by Dr. E. W. Barnes, published on 24/3/47 by Longmans as reviewed in the "News Chronicle" of that date.)

Some Titles of Scripture.

#11. The Word of God.

p. 120

Where this title occurs in the N.T. it is the translation of either logos or rhema:

> "Not as thought the word of God hath taken none effect" (Rom. ix. 6).
> (Here the word used in logos.)
> "Faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the word of God" (Rom. x. 17).
> (Here the word used in rhema.)

Logos always retains some element of its original meaning, that of a logical account. The word "reasonable" in Rom. xii. 1 is logikos, and a "reason" in I Pet. iii. 15, is logos, while "account" in Rom. xiv. 12 is also logos.

> "Rhema, like logos, always keeps in view the substance of what is said, but differs from logos in bringing into prominence the fact that something is uttered, and thus denotes the word as the expressed will, while logos denotes the expressed thought" (Cremer).

In Loving Memory

p. 141

It is with a profound sense of loss that we record the falling asleep in Christ, on 27th November, 1947, at his home in Amersham, Bucks., of our beloved brother

FREDERICK PETER BRININGER

The fellowship now broken by death, and which reached to within one month of forty years, was as unique as it was full. Without in any sense undervaluing the unstinted fellowship which has been extended to us during all these years of endurance for the faith, we believe we can say without reserve of our brother's loyal friendship:

"I have no man like-minded."

We who are left bow in the presence of infinite Wisdom, and know that we shall honour his memory best by a deeper consecration of ourselves to the furtherance of that truth for which the best years of Mr. Brininger's life were so unselfishly devoted.

It is with some sense of ultimate triumph, even in our present sense of loss and sorrow, that we use the language of the Apostle in our tribute to his memory:

"I have finished my course,
I have kept the faith."

EPHESIA.

#13. pp. 161, 162

"Faithful", pistos. This word is a "verbal adjective" derived from peithein, "to persuade". By an "adjective" grammarians mean, "A word with a noun to distinguish or describe the thing named or spoken of". The Latin word adjectivum means "added to". Adjectives derived from verbs are called "verbal adjectives", as is pistos.

Adjectives are divided into three classes:--

(1) Quality. The large house; The good man.
(2) Quantity. Much rain; Few saved.
(3) Demonstrative. The man; This house; A book.

Pistos may be used either actively or passively. Accordingly we find the word used actively in such passages as

"Be not faithless but believing" (John xx. 27).
"A Jewess, and believed" (Acts xvi. 1, lit. A believing Jewess).

There are, however, but few occurrences of this active usage in the N.T (John xx. 27; Acts xvi. 1; II Cor. vi. 15; I Tim. iv. 3, 10, 12; v. 16; vi. 2). In the majority of cases the word is used passively, "faithful", and pistos occurs only in the passive, and usually translates fifty-three times. In the Hebrew Emum (Amen). It is fairly obvious, that pistos could not be translated "believing" in such passages as:--

"But God is faithful" (I Cor. x. 13);
"But as God is true" (II Cor. i. 18);
"This is a faithful saying" (I Tim. i. 15);
"Faithful high Priest" (Heb. ii. 17).

The word occurs nine times in the Prison Epistles, as follows:--

"The faithful in Christ Jesus" (Eph. i. 1);
"Faithful minister" (Eph. vi. 21);
"The faithful brethren" (Col. i. 2);
"A faithful minister" (Col. i. 7, iv. 7);
"A faithful . . . . . brother" (Col. iv. 9);
"Faithful men", "Faithful saying". "He abideth faithful" (II Tim. 2, 11, 13).

"The Saints" therefore are "the faithful", and both are "in Christ Jesus". The double title suggests their twofold calling. As saints they have been redeemed, called, sanctified and assured of glory but this does not mean that because salvation is not of works it is not unto works. Those who are thus called and sanctified are expected to respond. They rise and walk in newness of life and this is largely expressed in "faithfulness", and related to service.

Foundation Day Meetings, May 29th.

p. 162

Among the signs of the times that have a close connection with the present dispensation are those which are foretold by Paul in the second epistle to Timothy.

In chapter iii. he enumerates among other perils that beset the truth in the last days, "Truce-breakers" and "Traitors", and in chapter iv. reveals the dread consequences of this betrayal of trust. We are living in the closing days of this dispensation, and betrayal of truth now takes the place of the betrayal of Christ by Judas.

The Berean Forward Movement is a sacred trust, and in order that the truth entrusted shall be preserved inviolate, we hold every year in the month of May "Foundation Day Meetings", where the four basic tenets of the trust are reaffirmed and made public.

We appeal to all of like precious faith to do their utmost to stand by us in this endeavour to "Guard the good deposit". The foundation day meetings will be held at 3.0 and 6.0 with an interval for light refreshments.

Those responsible for the provision of the refreshments would be greatly helped if those who hoped to partake would send a post card, as no extra food is allocated by the authorities.

"Guests" or "Strangers"?

What is the true translation of Eph. ii. 12?

pp. 179 - 182

If the reader consults the A.V. or the R.V. of Eph. ii. 12, he will read "strangers from the covenants of promise". The only alteration that J. N. D. makes in his translation is to read "strangers to the covenants of promise" instead of "strangers from". Rotherham reads exactly as the A.V. Weymouth translates the passage:--

> "With no share by birth in the covenants which are based on the Promises."

These five versions of the N.T. differ from one another in several particulars, but, apparently, none of the Editors seem to have felt it necessary to translate xenos by "guest", in Eph. ii. 12. The fact that there is this unanimity however, is not proof of accuracy, and the Berean Expositor would be the last to refuse an examination of any rendering put forward in good faith. The matter is important, for at least two reasons.

First. Quit apart from its possible bearings upon our own hope or calling, we should be zealous for the truth, and jealous of the truth, earnestly desiring as near as is humanly possible, a translation in our own tongue that shall express the meaning of the original.

Secondly. Coming as the word does in a context that deals with the status of the Gentile before the revelation of the mystery, the whole passage must be coloured by the translation adopted, and must influence our minds and our teaching concerning the constitution of the church of the One Body.

The first thing we must do is to note the occurrences of the word in the N.T. The Greek word under consideration is Xenos, and occurs fourteen times.

Matt. xxv. 35, 43.	"I was a stranger."
Matt. xxv. 38, 44.	"When saw we Thee a stranger?"
Matt. xxvii. 7.	"The potter's field, to bury strangers in."
Acts xvii. 18.	"A setter forth of strange gods."
Acts xvii. 21.	"All the Athenians and strangers which were there."
Rom. xvi. 23.	"Gaius mine host."
Eph. ii. 12.	The passage under consideration.
Eph. ii. 19.	This passage also goes with Eph. ii. 12.
Heb. xi. 13.	"Strangers and pilgrims."
Heb. xiii. 9.	"Divers and strange doctrines."
I Pet. iv. 12.	"As though some strange thing happened."
III John 5.	"To the brethren, and to strangers."

It is evident that the five references found in Matthew can have no other meaning than "stranger", a "stranger" can only become a "guest" if he is "taken in", such a meaning is not resident in the word itself. The "strange" gods of Acts xvii. 18, and the "strange thing" of I Pet. iv. 12, allow of no alteration. The believers mentioned in Heb. xi. 13, were most certainly "strangers" and not "guests". The "resident strangers" at Athens, are very like the "strangers of Rome" (Acts ii. 10) and cannot be translated "guests". In Rom. xvi. 23, we have the word xenos translated "host". This can only be justified if the word is used figuratively, for no one would suggest using the translation "host" in any of the thirteen references given above.

Eustathius says, concerning this usage of xenos,

> "Both he who entertained and he who was entertained were called xenos, in respect of each other."

Parkhurst says of this word:

> "Properly, a person who belonging to one country, dwells or sojourns in another, a stranger, foreigner." "In a more general sense, a stranger, a person of another nation of religion." "As an adjective, strange, foreign, wonderful."

The transition from the idea of "stranger" to "hospitality" is natural, and this has taken place, but because this is so, that does not justify the substitution of "guest" for the translation "stranger" unless the evidence of the context be overwhelmingly in its favour.

Cremer, in his Biblico-Theological Lexicon does not treat of xenos except to place it as a synonym with paroikos.

Paroikeo, in Biblical Greek means, according to Cremer,

> "Strangers who dwell anywhere, without citizen rights or home title."
> Paroikia only in Biblical and patristic Greek.
> (a) Dwelling as a sojourner in a foreign land without home or citizen rights;
> (b) A foreign country as the dwelling place of him who has no home rights there.

Paroikos expresses a conception capable of many applications. Guest of God (Lev. xxv. 35), earthly homelessness (Psa. cxix. 19), etc.

The LXX uses xenos to translate the following Hebrews words,

(1) Traveller, helek (II Sam. xii. 4). This word means primarily to go, or to walk, and so by an easy transition it becomes a tax, custom or duty, laid on ports or ways. Should the reading arach be preferred here, there is no essential difference, arach meaning "To go in a track" and as a noun, "a common road, highway; a traveler".

(2) Stranger Gur (Job xxxi. 32). To sojourn, to dwell anywhere for a time, to live as not at home. Translated "alien" in Exod. xviii. 3, associated with the name Gershom.

(3) Stranger, Nokri (Ruth ii. 10). A foreigner, outlandish. As a verb the word means "to alienate".

Nekar is used of "the stranger" and "the alien" as contrasted with Israel in Exod. xii. 43; Isa. lx. and lxi. In Lamentations the word is used in a sense very suggestive of Eph. ii. 12.

"Behold our reproach, our inheritance is turned to strangers our house to aliens" (Lam. v. 1, 2).

(4) Those Bidden Qara (I Sam. ix. 13).

This passage indicates that xenos is once used in the LXX in the sense of "guest".

The reader can see for himself that "stranger", "alien", "foreigner", is the primary significance of the word xenos and that "guest" and "host" is a derived or secondary meaning.

We now come to Eph. ii. 12 to see what the context demands. The scale is already dipped by the weight of Scripture usage in favour of the translation, "stranger", and there will have to be very strong reason to justify any alteration.

The phrase under consideration, is in correspondence with another of like import.

"Being aliens from the commonwealth of Israel" (Eph. ii. 12). This alienation finds its dreadful echo in the practical section of the same epistle where we read:--

> "That ye henceforth walk not as other Gentiles walk, in the vanity of their mind, having the understanding darkened, being alienated from the life of God" (Eph. iv. 17, 18).

The reader may have seen in his newspaper some sort of "Quiz" in which general knowledge and intelligence tests are a feature. One such test is that which is known as "Spot the intruder" or some such name, and is generally a collection of words containing one that is outside the category. For example, in such a list of names as Shakespeare, Tennyson, Shelley, Beethoven, Byron, and Browning, it is obvious that "Beethoven" is the intruder, a Musician among Poets. Eph. ii. 11-13 contains a list of words and it will be seen that "Guest" would be an intruder among such words as Gentiles, In the flesh, Uncircumcision, Made by Hands, Without Christ, Aliens, Guests, No hope, Without God, In the world and Far off.

Is it conceivable that one who was a "guest" of the covenants of promise could be at the same time Godless, Christless and Hopeless? The church that the apostle has in mind in Eph. ii. is a new thing, created so by God, for the passage in the fifteenth verse that reads "To make in Himself of the twain" should be translated "To create in Himself of the twain" as the R.V. indicates.

The Church of the mystery is no mere evolution, it is a new creation, and as with all other "New creations" of God, "Former things" pass away, and with that passing of "former things" the dispensational place of the Gentile, whatever it may have been, is swept aside, the new thing completely taking its place.

Some alterations in the order of certain articles necessitated by the continued season of austerity.

p. 182

During the period of the war, we comforted ourselves that with the advent of peace, we should soon be able to revert to a monthly issue of the Berean Expositor.

We had hoped that the Workers Training Classes would soon lead to the more definite approximation to a "College" even though we could never hope to fill out the true meaning of that word. While those who have attended these classes have found them a help and a blessing, we ask the prayerful fellowship of all like minded believers to make these classes more widely known and better attended.

The subject for the session May and June is important. It is

THE PRINCIPLES OF INTERPRETATION.

Changes too are necessary in the presentation of the truth (but not, thank God in the Truth itself), and with the new volume which commences with the January number of 1949 certain series with which the reader has grown familiar will have to be discontinued.

It will take another NINETEEN YEARS to print all the articles that we have on hand on John's Gospel! and it will take SEVEN YEARS to finish those on ISAIAH. As there is so much "present truth" that demands a hearing we have reluctantly decided to discontinue the series on John, and to omit all on Isaiah except those on chapter liii.

Those articles which are withdrawn, however, will be kept intact against the day when it might be possible to continue their publication as a series, or to gather them up and reproduce in book form.

We cannot hope to emulate such stewardship, but in our lesser degree it is a joy to realize that some approximation is open, both to ourselves as publishers and to the reader as having real fellowship in our ventures of faith. In earlier issues of this magazine we confided in our readers, and from them received overwhelming evidence that our desire to save many articles already published in the Berean Expositor from oblivion was shared by them. For nearly two years we have been trying to make a commencement with this new and important phase of our publishing, but have been hitherto hindered by reason of paper shortage. At length, as the reader is aware, we have been enabled to place "PARABLE, MIRACLE AND SIGN" and this volume will shortly be available to our readers.

It is with thanksgiving that we now announce that both the necessary funds and the necessary paper have become available, and that negotiations are already afoot for the production of the second volume of this series which will be entitled:

JUST AND THE JUSTIFIER
An exposition of the epistle to the Romans considered Doctrinally, Dispensationally, and Practically, together with complete structural analysis.

Among the last acts of service rendered so ungrudgingly to the cause of Truth by Mr. Brininger was the preparation of this series for publication in book form. We feel that it will make a fitting memorial to his memory, and his name will appear in the Preface with that intent.

When the reader receives his copy of "Parable" we believe he will find it to be value for money. He may not be so fully aware, however, that for every 8/6 expended in the purchase of this book a large proportion will be returned to the fund to be used again in the production of "Just and the Justifier". This we believe will commend itself to all who desire to make their money go as far as possible. No salary, no office expenses, no profits are deducted from this sum, and it will be used again and again until used up completely in this particular form of service.

The Apostle James reminded his readers that they "Know not what shall be on the morrow", and whatever our calling may be or whatever the dispensation under which we live, this limitation is true and the recognition of it is timely. With all our projects and purposes they must be prefaced with hearty approval the words "If the Lord will".

PENTECOST 1948. This is a date to be remembered, and present day believers may look back upon May 1948 as the most critical period through which they have passed, for it may well be that a line has been drawn across the "times of the Gentiles" where the legs of iron join the feet of clay (Dan. ii.). (Israel's independence?)

Prophecy hinges upon Israel, and Israel have two important phases. At present they are still what is called Lo-ammi "Not My people", but a door of hope is to be opened to this scattered and persecuted people, a door that will give them hope of a national standing once again. True it is that not until they look on Him Whom they pierced will the light dawn and the veil be removed, but that day nevertheless draws near. The vision of the valley of dry bones seen by Ezekiel (Ezek. xxxvii.) may well be receiving its fulfillment before our eyes. As one Jewish delegate said at the Scarborough Conference in May, using a figure of speech that we can all appreciate, "I have been waiting 2000 years" for this.

The Fig tree has began to put forth its leaves, and therefore we know that summer is nigh. Those of us who rejoice in the calling of the Mystery have no immediate relation to "times and seasons" or with the fulfillment of O.T. prophecy, yet it is evident that if the hope of Israel is near the hope for which we wait must be nearer still. Whether our hope is near or whether much time is yet to elapse before the day of glory dawns is not for us to know, we are assured however that to us, as to those of other callings, the word is "Occupy till I come".

THE BEREAN EXPOSITOR 1949. As indicated in the May number we have felt that stewardship suggested one or two changes in the type of article that the nature of the times demands. Among them we believe the series on the BOOK OF JOB which we hope will commence in January next will be found timely, and the new approach to that ancient book we trust will be stimulating and helpful. To all those who value light upon the problems and the purpose of the ages these studies we believe will prove invaluable.

Another series of an entirely different character entitled "LESS THAN THE LEAST or treasure in earthen vessels" tells the story of the inception and conflict associated with the Berean Expositor and where such detail is likely to be edifying some idea of the early life of the Editor accompanies the record. This series has long been asked for, but up till now private reasons have prevented us from making intimate matters such as these public. Again as space permits we hope to deal with some of the "Signs of the Times" that belong to the dispensation in which we live.

"PARABLE, MIRACLE, AND SIGN." After nearly two years of enquiry and frustration we have at last been able to place this first of the "Reprints" from early volumes of the Berean Expositor, and we hope that a book bearing this title will be ready in the Autumn. The reader will find with the September number an order form, and we sincerely hope that this effort will be encouraged by prompt and free ordering by our readers.

"JUST AND THE JUSTIFIER." As the back volumes of the Berean Expositor go out of print it is all the more needful to encourage this "Reprint" section of our publication department, otherwise teaching that would prove a blessing might be lost to the present generation. When we made a canvass some time ago, some readers expressed their wish that this or that series should be included in the books reprinted, but without exception everyone included the articles on Romans. These occupied a period of fourteen years and are fundamental to all our teaching. The book would be bulky, running into 500 pages, and at present rates would cost not less than 15/-. We desire very much to produce this work, but hesitate to spend so much of entrusted funds without some assurance that a book at such a price would be readily taken up by our readers.

It would help us considerably if interested friends would send a postcard to Mr. Canning saying that such a venture would receive their support. Much spade work had already been done on these articles by our dear brother Mr. Brininger, and it would be a splendid testimony to his love of the truth if this volume could see the light of day.

All my springs are in Thee.
(Psa. lxxxvii. 7).

#2. The confession of Asaph and of Peter.
pp. 41, 42

"Fountains", "wells" and "springs" are in constant reference in the Scriptures, where they are used as figures of life, fertility and blessing. This can well be understood when the geography of Palestine is considered. When the land of promise was described by Moses, it was not only called "a land flowing with milk and honey", but "a good land, a land of brooks of water, of fountains and depths that spring out of the valleys and hills" (Deut. viii. 7). The particular word which is translated "springs" in Psalm lxxxvii. is the Hebrew word mayan, a word derived from ayin, "the eye", from the supposed resemblance to the eye as "a fountain of tears", a figure that is found in the Greek language also. These "fountains" may be as vast as those that cause the Deluge, when "the fountains of the great deep were broken up", or as small as a fountain that waters a garden (Song of Sol. iv. 15), and Isaiah uses the word when he speaks of "the wells of salvation" (Isa. xii. 3). To any who lived in the East, therefore, the joyous exclamation at the close of Psalm lxxxvii. would need no explanation; it would come spontaneously to the mind.

The word mayan occurs but five times in the Psalms, and that with a certain evident connection of theme:

Mayan* in the Psalms.

A | lxxiv. 15. Reference to dividing the waters and cleaving the fountains (13-15).
B | lxxxiv. 6. Valley of Weeping turned to a well in blessing.
C | lxxxvii. 7. All my springs are in Thee.
A | civ. 10. Waters rebuked, they fled. Not another deluge. Springs sent (6-10).
B | cxiv. 8. The sea fled. Water from the rock in blessing.

The figurative use of a spring is common to most languages. In our own tongue it has a number of allied usages. A rising, as of a river; a source of anything; the beginning, as of the day or year; springtime. The act of springing or leaping, and so, the origin of movement, as by a steel "spring".

To the believer, the Lord Himself is the spring, source and never-failing supply of all his needs, whether temporal or spiritual, and it is to this aspect of the subject that we direct our attention.

To any acquainted with the Scriptures, examples of this blessed fact come readily to the mind. We think of Asaph (Psa. lxxiii.) who had been envious at the apparent prosperity of the wicked and whose faith had been sorely tried, so much so that he had said, "Verily I have cleansed my heart in vain, and washed my hands in innocency". The turning point in Asaph's spiritual experience was the vision he obtained in the sanctuary:

"Until I went into the sanctuary of God; then understood I their end." Asaph, now, could see how it was that he could say, "my feet were almost gone; my steps had well nigh slipped"—"almost", "well nigh", but not quite, for he now confesses, "Thou hast holden my by my right hand". The wicked still prospered, they still appeared to have "more than heart could wish", but Asaph's envy had given place to confident trust, "Whom have I in heaven but Thee? and there is none upon earth that I desire beside Thee. My flesh and my heart faileth, but God is the strength of my heart, and my portion for ever". Providential mercies were guaranteed—"Thou shalt guide me with Thy counsel"—and a blessed hope awaited fulfillment—"And afterward receive me to glory". Asaph could surely say, "All my springs are in Thee".

A New Testament example of this same recognition is provided by Peter. The Lord had revealed Himself as "the True Bread" which had been given by the Father, in contrast with the Manna, which, though given by God and eaten by the fathers in the wilderness, yet did not give those who partook of it everlasting life. Moses gave not that "True Bread", "for the Bread of God is He which cometh down from heaven, and giveth life unto the world". "Your fathers did eat manna in the wilderness, and are dead. This is the bread which cometh down from heaven, that a man may eat thereof, and not die."

The Lord emphasized that the "True Bread" was not to be considered apart from sacrifice. It involved His very flesh and blood, which, said He, "I will give for the life of the world". Many of those who heard the Lord on this occasion declared His message to be "a hard saying", and "many of His disciples went back, and walked no more with Him". It was at this point that the test was made; the Lord turned to the twelve and said to them, "Will ye also go away?" Then Peter, with the words of the Psalm, "All my springs are in Thee", in heart, if not in mind, made the great confession, "To whom shall we go? Thou hast the words of eternal life. And we believe and are sure that Thou are that Christ, the Son of the living God" (John vi. 68, 69).

"Whom have I in heaven BUT THEE?"
"TO WHOM shall we go?"
"All my springs are in THEE."

#3. "With Thee is the Fountain of Life" (Psa. xxvi. 9).
pp. 81 - 83

To the believer and the diligent student of Scripture, the statement that God Himself is and must be the Spring and Fountain of all blessing is so obvious a truth as to amount to a truism. This truth is taught by nature and by creation, but it awaits the revelation of Scripture to retranslate these facts into evangelical experiences, and to teach that even though the Ultimate Source of all being and blessing is God, these blessings are mediated to their unworthy recipients through the Person and Work of the Son of His love. Gospel grace does not come to man straight from God, as God; it comes to man as a sinner seeking salvation through God manifest in the flesh. As we read the words of John i. 16 we are reading a N.T. version of the acknowledgment, "All my springs are in Thee". The passage reads: "And of His fullness have all we received, and grace for grace."

To appreciate the rich grace here indicated we must go back to the opening of the chapter in which the words occur. Even there, "in the beginning", when the purpose of the ages was planned and when the redeeming Lamb was foreordained (I Pet. i. 19, 20) we are not taken into the presence of God in the absolute sense, but into the presence of the Mediator, "The Word", "The Image of the invisible God", "The express Image of His substance", of Whom it is written, in the contexts of these several statements:

>
> "By Him were all things created, that are in heaven, and that are in earth, visible and invisible" (Col. i. 16).
>
> "By Whom also He made the worlds (ages)" (Heb. i. 2).

The fabric of creation is the work of His hands, and the ages, during which the Divine purpose shall be attained, are all vested in Him.

Immediately following the statement of John i. that all things were made by Him, come the words of so great import to us, "In Him was life". Of no creature can it be said that such has "life in itself"; inherent life is the prerogative of Deity. John goes on to say that this life "was the light of men", revealing that in the beginning, even before man was created, it was Christ (in Whose "image" he was later formed), Who was the Fount and Source of Life, even as, in fullness of time, Christ was revealed to be the Spring of all the graces of redeeming love. But not until the Deity took another step in corresponding love could the Fountain flow in all its fullness to the sons of men; and so we read:

> "The Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us (and we beheld His glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the Father) full of grace and truth" (John i. 14).

Here is the "fullness" out of which we all have received; here is the "grace for grace" that describes its nature.

However, before we further pursue this aspect, let us fortify our understanding by reading what is written concerning this One Who became "flesh". Was such a descent accompanied by the loss of inherent life? Could it be said of Him Who was found in fashion as a man and Who had actually come to die for sin, that He still had "life in Himself"? Yes, blessed be God, it is so written; we are not left to inference, however sound may be our reasoning.

Because the Saviour had cured a man on the sabbath day, the Jews sought to slay Him, and, instead of placating, He added to their wrath by saying, "My Father worketh hitherto, and I work". "Therefore the Jews sought the more to kill Him, because He not only broken the sabbath, but said also that God was His Father, making Himself equal with God" (John v. 16-18).

Then follows a series of stupendous claims, any one of which is a wonder, and any one a proof of His Deity. He saw what the Father did, and did "likewise". He quickened the dead, even as the Father raised up the dead and quickened them. He was the appointed Judge of all men, the Father judging no man. All men were required to give equal honour to the Son as to the Father.

> "For, as the Father hath life in Himself; so hath He given to the Son to have life in Himself" (John v. 26).

When He made Himself of no reputation and became man, He necessarily laid aside the insignia and the associations of Deity and, unless it had been revealed, we might have felt that although as "The Word" it could be written "In Him was life", yet, when He became flesh, this mark of Deity would be absent. For our peace it is not so. As the "Son" and the "Word became flesh", He possesses "life in Himself" and so is the Author and Fountain of life to all who believe. When therefore we read: "Of His fullness have all we received", we know that once again we are at the Source of all life and blessing.

The confessed purpose of John in writing his Gospel is "life" (John xx. 31), and this last reference is the last link in a chain of thirty-six occurrences of zoe, "life", in his Gospel. If to these we add the thirteen occurrences of the word in the first epistle, we have a total of 49, or 7*7, for perfection is indeed found here.

As we trace the use of zoe throughout John's Gospel we find that the goal of the gospel there preached is everlasting life (iii. 15, 16), and that this life is ours only by virtue of the sacrifice of "His flesh, which" said He, "I will give for the life of the world" (John vi. 51). Further, this life is essentially "resurrection life". Those who receive it "pass from death unto life" (John v. 24), and hear the voice of Him Who said, "I am the resurrection and the life" (John xi. 25).

As we become conscious of our sin and consequent death, and as we perceive the fullness that dwells in Him, can we not, with a full heart, look up to Him Who is Himself "The Way, the Truth and the Life" and say, "All my springs are in Thee".

#4. "Broken cisterns" (Jer. ii. 13).
pp. 121, 122

"With Thee is the fountain of life", said the Psalmist, and this blessed confession formed the basis of our last meditation together. This, sadly, was not the universal attitude of Israel; had it been, they would never have departed so wickedly from their God, nor would they have crucified the Lord of glory.

> "My people have committed two evils; they have forsaken Me, the Fountain of living waters, and hewed them out cisterns, broken cisterns, that can hold no water" (Jer. ii. 13).

The chapter opens with a remembrance of "the love of thine espousals", when "Israel was holiness unto the Lord" (Jer. ii. 1-3). The chapter ends with Israel as a "gad about" (Jer. ii. 36), a maid that has "forgotten her ornaments", a "bride that has forgotten her attire", "trimming" her way to seek illicit love (Jer. ii. 32, 33). Israel's departure from the Lord is often likened to the sin of adultery and it is with such a figure that Jer. iii. opens.

> "What iniquity", said the Lord, "have your fathers found in Me, that they are gone far from Me, and have walked after vanity and become vain?" (Jer. ii. 5).

Here are the "two evils" of verse 13. Israel went away from the Lord, the Fountains of living waters, "they followed after vanity", likened to the hewing out for themselves cisterns; "they became vain", for these cisterns could hold no water. So the charge is made throughout the chapter. We will not load the page with verse enumeration—the reader can follow better without—but here are the charges: "They are gone far from Me." They did not say "Where is the Lord that brought us up out of Egypt?" "They walked after vanity", "they walked after things that do not profit", "Thou hast forsaken the Lord thy God when He led thee in the way". Israel had not only hewn cisterns, instead of turning to the Lord as the Fountain of living waters, but, to change the figure without changing the fact, they had gone down to Egypt "to drink the waters of Sihor". The Sihor, or Shihor, is a river of Egypt, probably on the southern boundary of Canaan, whose name means "turbid", or "slimy". It was to this that Israel turned rather than drink of the Fountain of life. Or, again, the prophet demands, "What hast thou to do in the way of Assyria, to drink the waters of the river?" Such is the sad context of this record to departure. Let us now come a little closer to the actual passage. Reduced to its barest simplicity the structure is:

A | ii. 1-3. Espousals.
B | ii. 4-37. Remonstrance and Pleading.
A | iii. 1-11. Adultery.

Lifting out verses 11-18 from a great mass of detail we observe that it falls into the following disposition of subject-matter:--

Jeremiah ii. 11 - 18.

A | 11. | a | Changed gods.
b | Yet no gods?
a | Changed glory.
b | For no profit?
B | 12. Be astonished; horribly afraid; very desolate.
C | 13. Two evils. | c | Forsaken Me, the Fountain.
d | Hewed cisterns, no water.
A | 14. | a | Is Israel a servant?
b | Is he a homeborn slave?
B | 15, 16. Roar, yell, waste.
C | 17, 18. Two evils. | c | The Lord. Forsaken.
d | Water of Egypt in Assyria.

Until we acquaint ourselves with the statement of scripture on the subject, the question of "profit" appears to be somewhat remote as a spiritual motive, yet we observe that it finds a place in the Divine argument. Israel are said to have walked after Baal and those things that "do not profit" (Jer. ii. 8), and, in verse 11, "My people have changed their glory for that which doth not profit". So in chapter vii. verse 8 we read, "Behold ye trust in lying words, that cannot profit" and, again, in xxiii. 32, lying prophets "shall not profit this people at all, saith the Lord". It is right to ask, "What is the profit?" It is wrong to spend our money for that which is not bread and our strength for nought. The Saviour enforces the same question of profit in Matt. xvi. 26 and again and again Ecclesiastes asks, "What profit" is there in all the labour that man does "under the sun"? It could certainly not be deemed a profitable undertaking that forsook the Fountain of living waters, only to find that the cisterns hewn with such vast labour were useless.

> "Hath a nation changed their gods, which are yet no gods? but My people have changed their glory for that which doth not profit" (Jer. ii. 11).

The reader is urged by the prophet to go over to the isles of Chittim, (probably Cyprus and the north coast line of the Mediterranean), or travel to Kedar, in Arabia: in other words, whether he goes West or East he will not discover such a senseless thing as Israel had done. Israel had followed in the way of the darkened heathen, "changed their glory", (see Rom. i. 23), and corrupted themselves. Apart from the great labour involved in hewing cisterns out of the rock, the profitlessness of such labour is exposed by the fact that, when hewn, they were found to be "broken" and could "hold no water". The spiritual teaching behind these figures may be seen when we find the same word, "to hold", translated "comprehend" in Isa. xl. 12, and "abide" in Joel ii. 11 and Mal. iii. 2. The power of the living God cannot be contained by any man-made medium. The ONE Mediator is Christ; He alone is the Channel through which infinite power and Divine life can pass to man, without harm or fear. In view of the two evils here brought to light let us the more take to ourselves the language of faith:

> "Lord, to Whom shall we go? Thou hast the words of eternal life, and we believe and are sure that Thou art that Christ, the Son of the living God."

#5. "In Christ Jesus."

"And a river went out of Eden to water the garden; and from thence it was parted, and became into four heads" (Gen. ii. 10).

pp. 183 - 185

The Fountain of all being and all blessing is God, but in such overwhelming power that nothing but destruction would be the result of immediate contact with Him. In the person of Christ, infinite Power and Wisdom are mediated, and, thus, are found to be full of blessing. No man can look upon the face of GOD and live, yet to see the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ is life. This therefore is our theme.

Over and over again in the epistles, we meet with such expressions as "in Christ", "in the Lord", "in Jesus Christ our Lord", "in Christ Jesus" and other variations of the same blessed truth. These are the "heads" into which the river of life is "parted" for our sakes. Taking the epistles in the canonical order in which they are found in the N.T., the first occurrence of the phrase "in Christ Jesus" is in Rom. iii. 24, where we read "Redemption that is in Christ Jesus". The phrase does not recur until we come to Rom. viii. There it occurs three times: "No condemnation in Christ Jesus", "The law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus" and the blessed fact that nothing can separate us "from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord" (Rom. viii. 1, 2 and 39).

The phrase "in Christ Jesus" is found in Ephesians (R.V.) seven times, and is associated with Paul's apostleship (Eph. i. 1), and "the faithful" (Eph. i. 1). The peculiar privilege, granted alone to the church of the mystery, of being "seated together in heavenly places" is also "in Christ Jesus" (Eph. ii. 6). In the ages to come this favour is to be intensified, for "exceeding riches of grace in His kindness" are to be shown toward us "in Christ Jesus" (Eph. ii. 7), while we are declared to be "His workmanship, created in Christ Jesus" in Eph. ii. 10. Those who were the recipients of such overwhelming grace however, were, by nature, "far off" sinners of the Gentiles, but are "made nigh" in Christ Jesus (Eph. ii. 13). The title "Christ Jesus" is limited to the doctrinal section of Ephesians, the last occurrence being Eph. iii. 21, where the prayer ends in the doxology, "Unto Him be the glory in the church and in Christ Jesus unto all generations of the age of the ages. Amen".

These aspects of truth "in Christ Jesus" lie at the root of the revelation of the mystery but no attempt can be made here to expand their teaching: at the moment all we insist upon is that they are ours only "in Christ Jesus". Passing over the remainder of Paul's epistles, we come to II Timothy, where the phrase "in Christ Jesus" occurs seven times. The teaching associated with these seven occurrences will be more appreciated if the passages are seen together. Accordingly we throw them into an alternate correspondence.

"In Christ Jesus" (II Timothy).

A | i. 1. The Promise of Life.
B | i. 9. Purpose and Grace. Holy calling, not of works.
C | i. 13. Form of sound words. Doctrine.
D | ii. Be strong in the grace that is in Christ Jesus.
A | ii. 10. Salvation WITH glory.
B | iii. 12. Persecution and godly living. Practice.
C | iii. 15. Holy Scriptures. Salvation.

Turning to the briefer phrase "in Christ" we find it used in contrast to being "in Adam" and in other doctrinal and practical associations. It occurs seven times in II Corinthians where the passages may be taken to indicate the character of blessing that was found "in Christ" by the apostle.

The first sounds a note of triumph.

> "Now thanks be unto God, which always leadeth us in triumph in Christ" (II Cor. ii. 14, R.V.).

The second avers faithfulness.

> "But as of sincerity, but as of God, in the sight of God speak we in Christ" (II Cor. ii. 17).

There follows the ministry of the new covenant and contrasts of liberty, life and glory, with the bondage, death and passing glory of the old covenant. Paul tells us that when Israel read the old covenant, a veil is upon their eyes and heart but that this veil "is done away in Christ" (II Cor. iii. 14). Pursuing the wondrous theme, he passes from the new covenant to the new creation, saying "Therefore if any man be in Christ he is a new creature" (II Cor. v. 17). From the new creation he proceeds to speak of the reconciliation, saying, "God was in Christ reconciling the world unto Himself" (II Cor. v. 19). To Paul, salvation was to be found "in Christ" and when referring to his conversion and commission, he says, "I knew a man in Christ above fourteen years ago" (II Cor. xii. 2). In his last use of this phrase in II Cor. xii. 19 he again refers to his ministry as "speaking before God in Christ". In conclusion let us turn to Eph. i. 1-14, and, instead of limiting ourselves to one title, as "Christ" or "Christ Jesus", let us observe how the word "in" is used.

The preposition en, "in", occurs nineteen times in Eph. i. 1-14 and is translated "at" (i. 1); "with" (i. 3); "where*in*" (i. 6); and sixteen times is rendered by the word "in". Let us set out these verses, omitting those references that use the word "in" before such terms as "heavenly places" and marking only those which speak of blessing "IN Him".

> "Paul, an apostle of Jesus Christ by the will of God, to the saints which are at Ephesus, and to the faithful in Christ Jesus:
>
> Grace [be] to you, and peace, from God our Father, and [from] the Lord Jesus Christ. Blessed [be] the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings in heavenly [places] in Christ:
> According as he hath chosen us in Him before the foundation of the world, that we should be holy and without blame before Him in love: having predestinated us unto the adoption of children by Jesus Christ to himself, according to the good pleasure of His will, to the praise of the glory of his grace, wherein he hath made us accepted in the Beloved. In Whom we have redemption through His blood, the forgiveness of sins, according to the riches of his grace . . . . . having made known unto us the mystery of His will, according to His good pleasure which He hath purposed in Himself: that in the dispensation of the fullness of times, He might gather together in one all things in Christ, both which are in heaven, and which are on earth; [even] in Him:

In Whom also we have obtained an inheritance . . . . . that we should be to the praise of his glory, who first trusted in Christ.

In Whom ye also [trusted], after that ye heard the word of truth, the gospel of your salvation:

In Whom also after that ye believed, ye were sealed with that holy Spirit of promise, which is the earnest of our inheritance until the redemption of the purchased possession, unto the praise of his glory."

Here we see that the faithful in Christ Jesus find in Him Blessing, Choice, Acceptance, Redemption, Inheritance, and Hope; while at the same time and in association with these blessings, we find this great Purpose is in Him, and that in Him shall be gather together in one all things in heaven and on earth.

As he contemplates such riches of grace and glory, verily, every believer in the truth of the mystery, can exclaim,

"All my springs are in Thee."

The Atonement.

#1. Wherein the choice of the word "Atonement" in the A.V. of Rom. v. 11 is examined, and fully justified.

pp. 108 - 111

The primary object of those responsible for The Berean Expositor is a testimony to "The dispensation of the Mystery" and the principle of "right division". This does not, however, imply any narrowness of outlook or any neglect of the teaching of all Scripture, and a glance through the "Contents" of Volumes I-XXXIII will reveal a lively interest in all the great fundamental doctrines of the faith. Among such doctrines, that must always occupy a prominent place, is the fundamental one of the Sacrifice of Sin. At recurring intervals, articles bearing upon this theme have appeared in these pages, and we sincerely hope that, until the day comes when we lay down our pen for the last time, this most moving and precious doctrine of the Scripture will find a prominent place in our ministry.

The present series of articles will not traverse the ground already covered, but is intended rather to focus attention upon one aspect only of the finished work of Christ. There have been quite a number of "theories of the atonement" put forward, many of them widely different from one another, yet all propounded by sincere believers, and all based upon some one or more aspects of the truth, or upon some one or more key-words of the Old or New Testaments.

> "The difficulties in the way of a solution in the case of the doctrine of the Atonement are at least threefold—exegetical, theological and spiritual: and due effect must be given to each of them" (Dr. J. Scott-Lidgett).

The exegetical difficulty lies in the problem of interpreting the terms used.

> "It was impossible for all these requirements to be met and their difficulties to be overcome when Hebrew teacher was interpreted by Greek philosopher or Latin schoolman, prophet and priest by jurist, ancient seer by modern theologian, with little or no historical and critical sense or apparatus. And many of the most erratic explanations of the Atonement are due primarily to the misunderstandings, incongruities, and faults of proportion of such unequipped and faulty exegesis" (Dr. J. Scott-Lidgett).

The theological difficulties in the way of a satisfactory theory of the Atonement have been equally serious. These concern the Person of Christ, His relation to God, the relation of God and Christ to man, and the nature and consequences of sin. And finally, we must not forget that a spiritual apprehension of the revelation of God in Christ is most necessary if we are to arrive at a correct exegesis or a satisfactory theology.

> "A comprehensive and painstaking intellect is insufficient. Mental defects are harmful, but still more faults of heart. Yet until the truth of Christ has by a living experience pervaded every faculty, and brought at last the intellect of man into full accord with itself, agreement in a complete doctrine of the Atonement is impossible" (Dr. J. Scott-Lidgett).

These are weighty words, and will, we believe, receive the assent of all our readers.

In this series we are not attempting the impossible; we have but one item of truth to examine, and this we must begin to consider in this opening article. The question, then, before us is: Should the word "atonement" be removed from Rom. v. 11? Is it not true that "atonement" means "covering", and that nowhere in the N.T. do we read that Christ made a "covering" for sin, but rather that He "took away", or "put away" sin, which it was impossible for the blood of bulls and goats to do? Should not the word "atonement", therefore, be reserved for the O.T. sacrifices, and not be used of the one offering of Christ?

The reader will perceive that much is involved in this question, not only the translation offered in the A.V. but the very use of the word "atonement" in connection with the sacrifice of Christ. It will also be observed that in all this there is a desire to honour the Lord, and acknowledge the completeness of His one offering. In fact, it is this that is partly responsible for the objection to the word "atonement" as being too limited. We shall discover eventually that the whole problem revolves around the intention of the Scriptural writers when they used the word kaphar, which primarily meant "to cover", whether we understand this "covering" to be a mere O.T. expedient or regard it as foreshadowed, though never provided, by the O.T. sacrifices, and eventually fully accomplished by Christ. In other words, Does kaphar mean "to cover up" or "to atone" and "propitiate"? And is the sacrifice of Christ greater than the O.T. types, or different from them? This most important question will be approached, in this series, in the following sequence:

(1) An examination of the translation "atonement" in the A.V. of Rom. v. 11
(2) An examination of the idea expressed by the "covering" of sin.
(3) An examination of the Septuagint translation of the Hebrews word kaphar.
(4) The bearing upon the subject of "type", "shadow", "figure" and "pattern".

Following this sequence, let us devote the space available in the present article to a consideration of Rom. v. 11: "By Whom we have now received the atonement." The marginal note indicates that the word could be rendered "reconciliation" and refers to verse 10. It is therefore evident that the A.V. translators were perfectly familiar with the word "reconciliation", and yet deliberately used the word "atonement". It would be easy to sweep this rendering aside, but such an attitude would hardly do justice to the fact that the A.V. is the crown of many earlier translations, nor would it exhibit that becoming modesty, that would attribute to these translators at least as much common sense and understanding as we ourselves possess. The fact is that the word "atonement" means "reconciliation", and was in common use at the time of the A.V. translation. It was selected with deliberate intent, and shows that these translators, rightly or wrongly, intended the reader to link this one great "reconciling" sacrifice of Rom. v. with the "atoning" sacrifices of the Levitical law. To the translators of the A.V. the word "atonement" meant no mere "covering", but "reconciliation"—a fact that even a superficial acquaintance with Elizabethan English makes clear. Surely then we must not set aside the considered testimony of these translators because they used the language of their own day, or blame them because that language has changed during the three hundred years since. Shall we not rather regret that we cannot to-day use so homely a word as "at one" (written aton) to represent concord, friendship, reconciliation, and harmony?

The verb "to atone", meaning "to reconcile" or "to make one", is used by Shakespeare as follows:

> "He desires to make atonement > Between the Duke of Gloster and your brothers" (Richard III. i. 3).
>
> "He and Aufidus can no more atone
> Than violentest contrariety" (Cor. iv. 6).
>
> "Since we cannot atone you, we shall see > Justice design the victor's chivalry" (Richard II. i. 1).
>
> "I was glad I did atone my countrymen and you" (Cym. i. 5).

And by Philpot: "What atonement is there between light and darkness?"

The word "onement" has now dropped out of use, but is found in Wyclif's writings, and was employed, according to the Oxford Dictionary, in the year 1598 for "atonement".

The A.V. translators were perfectly right to render the word katallage by the, at that time, common word "atonement", as they were also right to render the same word in Rom. xi. 15 "reconciling", and in II Cor. v. 18, 19 "reconciliation". In the same way we find Shakespeare using the word "reconcile" on occasion, whereas in other plays he uses the word "atone".

> "Let it be mine honour . . . . . that I have reconciled your friends and you."

The translators of the A.V. would have been perfectly within their rights and have been fully understood by their own generation if they had written:

> "For if the casting away of them be the atoning of the world" (Rom. xi. 15).
> "And all things are of God, Who hath atoned us to Himself . . . . . and hath given us the ministry of the atonement, to wit, that God was in Christ atoning the world to Himself" (II Cor. v. 18, 19).

Such a rendering only sounds stranger to our ears because we have lost the word that was in common use at that time, but if the A.V. translators had proceeded in this way, the apparent intrusion of the word in Rom. v. 11 would never have been questioned. It is we, and not the A.V. translators, who need to be adjusted and rectified.

When the Revisers in 1881 undertook to produce a new version, they substituted for the archaic one a modern word "in equally good use at the time the A.V. was made, and expressing all that the archaism was intended to convey, but more familiar to the modern reader". They therefore adopted "reconciliation" in Rom. v. 11, but left the sense unaltered. "Atonement" and "reconciliation" are synonymous, the only difference being that "atonement" is English in origin, and "reconcile" Latin.

As things stand, therefore, we incline to the belief that the word "atonement", so consistently employed in the A.V. to translated the Hebrew word kaphar, is used with intention, as meaning "to make one", "to reconcile", and that instead of condemning the A.V. translators for introducing the word into Rom. v. 11, we should rather be grateful for the link that they have established between the O.T. types and the N.T. reality.

In our next article we must consider the idea the kaphar may mean merely a "covering", and that the "covering" of sin is a conception far removed from N.T. reality.

#2. The "Blessedness" of "Covered Sin" (Psa. xxxii. 1). (With a note on the difference between the etymology and the usage of words).

pp. 150 - 153

We have examined Rom. v. 11 as translated by the A.V., we have weighed that translation in the balances of the sanctuary, and we have found it to be justified. Any needed adjustment or rectification must be regarded as necessitated by modern ignorance, the growth and change of language, and not to any failure or fault of those who, in their great work of translating the scriptures over three hundred years ago, used their mother tongue with understanding. We now come to the suggestions, that the word translated "To make atonement", the Hebrew word Kaphar, should always be translated "make a covering", that such an idea as the "covering" of sin must be kept exclusively to the O.T., that Christ did not "cover" sin, but, "put it away"; and that therefore it is wrong to use the word "atonement" of the one great offering of Christ; that He did something infinitely greater, and entirely different. Once again, the reader will be conscious that very vital issues are at stake. First, let us be factual. Putting aside all theories let us seek an answer to the question; is there a single example in the whole of the O.T. where Kaphar is translated "cover"? for it is maintained that g, yet, somehow, throughout the whole range of the O.T. scriptures, the idea of "covering" anything never occurs. Every reader will know that this hypothetical statement is entirely false. So varied is the idea of "covering" in the O.T. that in the A.V. no less than twenty-three different words, besides their variants and derivations, are translated "cover". It may nevertheless be objected, that the idea of covering dishes, or heads, or nakedness, or by outstretched wings, or by ashes, or by robes or with gold, etc., would not necessitate the use of kaphar; that only such an idea as "covering sin" would meet the case. This is untrue. The first occurrence of kaphar and kopher mean nothing else than coating planks of wood with pitch (Gen. vi. 14), and if the principle be true that this first occurrence in Genesis settles the sense in all other occurrences, we should naturally assume that the second and only other occurrence of kaphar in this same book of Genesis, (and consequently before the giving of the law), would be employed in strict accord with this initial meaning.

Let us consider what such a principle of interpretation would lead to. Could we translate Gen. xxxii. 20—the only other occurrence of kaphar in the book—by "I will cover his face", in the same sense in which it was used where covering with pitch was concerned? Surely it is patent to all that between the days of Noah, when kaphar was used in its primitive meaning, and the days of Jacob, the word had dropped its initial idea of a mere "covering" and taken upon itself the new meaning, "to appease", as with a gift. At any rate to this modified meaning the whole of the subsequent books of the O.T. canon conform. The slightest acquaintance with the behaviour of language and the changes that come in the course of time, should have prevented so crude an idea as that a word must always rigidly retain its primary meaning. Many instances of this change in language will occur to every reader. One that has come before our notice at the time of writing will illustrate our meaning. A Dutch correspondent referred to Paul as the one who gave us "the mere doctrine of the sacrifice of Christ". For the moment, this puzzled us, for it was evident from the context that our correspondent intended to convey the idea, that of all the writers in the Bible, Paul was the one who gave us the most complete statement of this doctrine. Yet, we use the word "mere" in a depreciatory sense, and say "a mere trifle" or a "mere covering". Yet the fact is that the Dutch correspondent was using the word in its Dictionary and Etymological sense, whereas, to-day that is obsolete, its meaning, by usage, being the very reverse. The Oxford Dictionary gives the meaning of "mere" as "pure, unmixed, undiluted", and "absolute, entire, sheer, perfect", and only in the last definition does it give "barely" or "only". Shakespeare uses the word in the primitive sense when he makes the herald announce that, upon the arrival of the tidings of "the mere perdition of the Turkish fleet", bonfires, sports and revels should mark the welcome news. To-day the news of "the mere" perdition of an enemy fleet would lead to no such confidence. Thus it will be seen that the attempt to compel the word kaphar never to grow as other words grow; to confine its meaning to its primitive, etymological root, instead of allowing it the expansion of its usage and fruit, is just as unscientific and bad as to compel every modern Englishman to use the word "mere" as did the Dutchman, whose acquaintance with the language was after all at second-hand. In the next place, we must be aware of the fact that there is no aversion in the O.T. or N.T. Scriptures to using, with good intent, the expression "to cover sin". The phrase does occur, and kaphar is avoided, an entirely different word, from an entirely different root, being used. In Lev. xvii. 11 the words "to make atonement" occur twice, and twice they are the rendering of the Hebrew kaphar. Now if "covering" be actually the meaning of this word, what an opportunity was missed in the thirteenth verse of the same chapter, to demonstrate the fact once and for ever.

> "He shall even pour out the blood, and COVER it with dust, for it is the life of all flesh" (Lev. xviii. 13, 14).

Moses could have so interlinked this "covering" with the "atonement" of verse 11, as to establish, beyond dispute, the idea that "atonement" means a mere covering—yet he did not do so. We have said "Moses" did not do this; we have said "What an opportunity was lost", but the reader will readily understand that we speak after the manner of men.

What we really affirm is, that the Holy Ghost, Who inspired Moses, avoided such a usage of set purpose. And so must we. If the very idea of "covering" sin is to be reckoned as an intrusion into Christian doctrine, how can we account for David's pronouncement of blessing on such a fact and its endorsement by Paul? In Psalm xxxii. David is not limiting his remarks to the sacrifices of the Levitical law; he looks forward, as the companion Psalm (Psa. li.) reveals, to a cleansing that washes "whiter than snow", yet he does not hesitate to speak of that greater Sacrifice as providing a covering for sin, and as there is no other sacrifice that is conceivably greater than the Levitical sacrifices, except the one offering of the Lord Himself, then David must be credited with ascribing to the Sacrifice of Christ this effect of covering sin.

> "Blessed is he whose transgression is forgiven
> Whose sin is covered.
> Blessed is the man unto whom the Lord imputeth not iniquity
> And in whose spirit there is no guile" (Psa. xxxii. 1, 2).

The genius of Hebrew poetry places "the forgiveness of transgressions" over against "the covering of sin", and pronounces a blessing on both. It has been maintained that the O.T. word "atonement" means "to cover", as over against the N.T. word "take away". Unfortunately for this theory, but blessedly for us all, the very word "forgiven" in Psalm xxxii. 1 is the Hebrew Nasa, which is translated "Take (away or up)" 116 times in the A.V. of the O.T. Here, therefore, in the estimate of David, "lifted up" or "taken away" transgression, was the same as "covered" sin, and this is what we maintain is the teaching of scripture. If we continue in Psalm xxxii. we shall discover that he who could rejoice in the blessedness of "covered" sin, nevertheless declared, "mine iniquity have I NOT HID" (Psa. xxxii. 5), although, before the Psalm is finished, he says of the Lord "Thou art my hiding place". This apparent contradiction is found in the Proverbs.

> "He that covereth transgression, seeketh love" (Prov. xvii. 9).
> "He that covereth his sins shall not prosper" (Prov. xxviii. 13).

The difference between Prov. xvii. 9 and xxviii. 13 is the difference between sins righteously dealt with by God, and the covering by the sinner of his own sins. So in Psalm xxxii. it was a blessed thing to have sins covered by God, but a wrong thing to attempt to hide them from God. All this, however, is still within the limits of the O.T. We must take the matter one stage further, and show that the Apostle Paul, knowingly and of purpose, introduced this passage into the N.T. Paul quotes Psalm xxxii. 1, 2 in Rom. iv. Now if Paul knew that the O.T. sacrifices simply atoned for and "covered" sin, in contrast with the offering of Christ, which "put away" sin, why did he introduce so disturbing a verse as Psalm xxxii. 1? Rom. iv. deals with the doctrine of imputation, and Paul could easily have passed over Psalm xxxii. 1 and quoted verse 2,

> "Blessed is the man unto whom the Lord imputeth not iniquity."

Yet it will soon be evident, that this verse, as it stands, would not have served Paul's purpose. He wrote:

> "But to him that worketh not, but believeth on Him that justifieth the ungodly, his faith is counted (imputed) for righteousness, EVEN AS David also describeth the > blessedness of the man, unto whom God imputeth righteousness without works, saying:" (Rom. iv. 5, 6).

To quote Psalm xxxii. 2, saying, "Blessed is the man unto whom the Lord IMPUTETH NOT iniquity", would not be sufficient proof of expiation. Paul therefore includes the reference to the "covering of sin" and in that "covering" he finds the equivalent of the positive imputation of righteousness.

From what we have seen, it is evident that except in Gen. vi. 14, kaphar, "to atone", is never used in its primitive sense. It is also evident that the idea of "covering" sin is abhorrent neither to the doctrine of the Old Testament nor the New. In our next article we must endeavour to show how kaphar is employed, and how the idea of a real, true covering, as distinct from a "mere covering", is imbedded in the instincts of man at the beginning, and endorsed by God Himself.

#3. Showing that, since the "confusion of tongues", Kaphar has no other meaning than "to propitiate".

pp. 215 - 218

We have seen that the word Atonement is a synonym for Reconciliation, and that the Hebrew word kaphar is never translated "cover" in any of its forms. We have however seen that, instead of rejecting the idea of "covering" sin, both the Old Testament and the New acknowledge the blessedness of the man whose transgressions are forgiven, or taken away, and whose sins are "covered".

"By one man sin entered into the world", and the record of that fall is found in Gen. iii. While the word kaphar is not used in that chapter, and while the word "cover" is not found in the English translation, the idea is there in a double sense. In the first, and wrong, sense Adam and his wife sought to "cover" their transgressions by the aprons which they made of leaves, and by hiding from the presence of the Lord. We have scripture for it that the idea of "covering" is intended, for Job said "if I have covered my transgression as Adam" (Job xxxi. 33). This was the covering condemned in Prov. xxviii. 13. That the word "cover", used by Job, aptly applies to the attempt made by Adam, the use of the word in Gen. ix. 23 will show, for there, as in Gen. iii., the thought is the covering of "nakedness". Just as in Proverbs the covering by the sinner of his own sin is condemned, while the covering of sin by God is praised, so in Genesis, for while action of Adam there is rebuked, the principle that sin must be covered is maintained.

> "And unto Adam also and to his wife did the Lord God make coats of skins, and clothed them" (Gen. iii. 21).

The sense of need expressed by the making of aprons was right, but the attempt to provide a covering of their own devising was wrong. Aprons made of leaves omitted the essential element of shed blood. Coats made of skins cannot be provided apart from the death of animals, and so in the Garden of Eden the question of the right and wrong covering of sin was worked out in symbol and type. There is an allusion to this use of the skin in the law of the burnt offering, for the offering must be "flayed" i.e. skinned (Lev. i. 6). The tabernacle, too, with its cherubim and furniture, was "covered" with skins (Exod. xxv. 5). When Isaiah uses the figure of "clothing", saying, "He hath clothed me with the garments of salvation, He hath covered me with the robe of righteousness", he was but amplifying the significance of the act of the Lord in the Garden of Eden.

We have already indicated, in the last article, that in the next outstanding type of Redemption, the two words kaphar and kopher occur together in connection with the ark (Gen. vi. 14); and that when we next meet with the Hebrew kaphar it has acquired the meaning that is consistently adopted throughout the remainder of the O.T. Now this is too important a fact to pass by without further attention and we shall therefore observe this critical passage more closely. Jacob said,

"I will appease him with the present" (Gen. xxxii. 20). Esau, had been wronged by his brother, and felt it so deeply, that he comforted himself, "purposing to kill" Jacob upon Isaac's death (Gen. xxvii. 41, 42). We must remember Esau's "great and exceeding bitter cry" when he learned that Jacob's subtilty had deprived him of his blessing (Gen. xxvii. 34).

Many years passed before Jacob again met his brother, and although, so far as we can gather, the early hatred had died down, Jacob may not have been aware of it, and, being apprehensive, arranged the circumstances of the reunion so that his brother's hatred might be turned away, and reconciliation effected. Let us note his procedure.

First he sent messengers before him and, through them, addressed his brother as "My lord Esau", calling himself "thy servant Jacob" (Gen. xxxii. 3). We learn next the purpose of this embassy: "I have sent to tell my lord, that I may find grace in thy sight" (Gen. xxxii. 5). Upon their return the messengers report that "he cometh to meet thee, and four hundred men with him" (Gen. xxxii. 6). "Greatly afraid and distressed", Jacob at once proceeded to make provision for the safety of his family and possessions, and, at the same time, if possible, to avert the threatened wrath of Esau. First he divided his people, his flocks and his herds into two bands, saying, "If Esau come to the one company, and smite it, then the other company which is left shall escape" (Gen. xxxii. 8). He then turned to God in prayer, confessing his unworthiness and praying for deliverance from the hand of his brother Esau. Following this he took from his flocks and herds, two hundred she goats, and twenty he goats, two hundred ewes and twenty rams, thirty milch camels with their colts, forty kine, and twenty bulls, twenty she asses, and ten foals. These he divided into separate droves, instructing each servant to say to Esau, "They be thy servant Jacob's; it is a present sent unto my lord Esau: and behold, also he is behind us" (Gen. xxxii. 20).

When at last Esau saw his brother Jacob, he "ran to meet him, and embraced him, and fell on his neck, and kissed him; and they wept", and Jacob said, "If now I have found grace in thy sight, then receive my present at my hand: for therefore I have seen thy face as though I had seen the face of God, and thou wast pleased with me" (Gen. xxxiii. 8-11).

Here is the scriptural basis for interpreting the meaning of kaphar in the Levitical law.

Would any reader tolerate the argument that, because in the days of King Alfred the Great a certain word had a certain meaning, that that meaning must adhere to the word to-day? Could we ignore the revolution in language caused by the Norman Conquest, to say nothing of the changes that must naturally come with the passage of time?

The use of the word kaphar in the record of the flood is separated from the record of Gen. xxxii. by an interval of seven hundred years. Besides this, we have a revolution in language that puts that of the Norman Conquest into the shade, > "Because the Lord did there confound the language of all the earth" (Gen. xi. 9).

The Semitic speaking people adopted the word kaphar, but evidently dropped its primitive meaning of "covering" as with pitch, for Moses was under no obligation to append a note of explanation to the record of the use of the word by Jacob, and his subsequent adherence to one meaning, and to this meaning only, throughout the whole of the books of the law, is sufficient proof of the established meaning of the word. Apart from the preservation of the book of the generations of Noah by Moses, no one either in Israel's day or in our own would ever have had the slightest reason to speak of Atonement as other than a Propitiation. It is strange that we should use Moses (Gen. vi.) to confound Moses (Gen. xxxii.).

In everyone of its occurrences the word kapporeth, a feminine word formed from kaphar, is translated "Mercy Seat". Seeing that kaphar originally meant "to cover" it has been assumed that the word "Mercy Seat" should be removed from our Bibles, and the more prosaic "cover", or even "lid", substituted. The Septuagint translate kapporeth by exilasmos, "a propitiatory", (I Chron. xxviii. 11); Thusiasterion, (in some versions) "An altar", "A place of Sacrifice", and hilasterion "A propitiatory".

In Exod. xxv. 17 epithema is added, a word which was in use amongst the Pagan Greeks to indicate the "lid" of a chest. It is no revelation to any reader acquainted with the story of the tabernacle to learn that, as to its material, the "Mercy-Seat" was made of gold, and as to its shape and purpose, a lid. But this fact has no reference to the word hilasterion, which in no possible circumstances can mean "a lid". It can only mean "a propitiatory", and this fact is recognized by the Septuagint translators by the adding of the word epithema, so that a true translation of that version would read, "a propitiatory lid", leaving the word hilasterion untouched.

For the sake of clearness, and because the subject is so important, let us approach it afresh.

The ark was a chest, made of wood and covered with gold. A golden lid was made of exactly the same measurements, and this lid is, in the Greek, called epithema. It was "placed above upon the ark", epitithemi . . . . . anothen. Now this tells us the material of which the article was made, "gold", the purpose it served, "a lid", and where it was placed, "above upon" the ark. So far so good. We now enquire, Did this article of furniture have any spiritual significance? The answer is "Yes, the golden lid is explained to be 'a propitiatory', a place where atonement or propitiation could be made". This "lid" is therefore explained in the Septuagint to be an "hilasterion". But how from this data anyone can say that the term "Mercy-seat" should be removed and the word "lid" substituted passes comprehension. Further, the N.T. sets its seal upon the essential purpose of the Mercy Seat, for in Heb. ix. we read concerning the furniture of the tabernacle, "And over it the cherubim of glory shadowing", not the epithema, the mere "lid", but the "mercy seat", hilasterion (Heb. ix. 5). The apostle could have selected from his Greek Bible the word epithema, enforcing upon us the fact that all we had here was a golden lid but he passes this word by, and enforces its symbolic purpose; it was a propitiatory. That he most certainly meant a propitiatory, or a propitiation, is proved by his one other use of hilasterion where he speaks of the sacrifice offered by Christ as "a propitiation through faith in His blood" (Rom. iii. 25).

Now it has been suggested that in Rom. iii. we could read, "set forth a mercy seat through faith in His blood", and this would do no violence to faith or sense, but the possibility of suggesting that we could substitute the word "lid" in Rom. iii. 25 is beyond consideration.

Having thus said, the fact remains that the word epithema, used by the Greek translators, is an addition to the Hebrew they were translating, no equivalent Hebrew word being used in the original. It is therefore without authority, and must not be used as a basis for doctrinal teaching.

We have considered two aspects of the subject before us:

(1) That the idea of "covering" for sin is scriptural; the only reservation being that God must provide the covering, and that by means of sacrifice.

(2) That, apart from the ancient use of kaphar, preserved for us in Gen. vi. 14, and used before the confusion of tongues, the established use of kaphar by Moses and the Prophets upon every occasion that it is employed is "propitiation". This also is the meaning of the word translated "mercy seat" and is entirely independent of whether it also be a "lid", or made of "gold", or whether it be of the same size as the ark, or not.

The Bearing of the Context on Well-Known Passages.

#2. "Light affliction" and the "Weight of glory".
p. 40

> "For our light affliction, which is but for a moment, worketh for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory" (II Cor. iv. 17).

A deal of harm may be done if we lift this passage out of its context and press its teaching upon souls unprepared by truth to receive it. It is not true that "affliction", considered in itself, is "light". Paul had confessed earlier in this same epistle that he had been "pressed out of measure, above strength" by the trouble that came upon him in Asia (II Cor. i. 8). He later gives also a list of sufferings that neither he nor any sane person could call "light afflictions" (II Cor. xi. 23-28).

When we quote II Cor. iv. 17, we must remember the context, especially the condition that is made in verse 18. If we would speak truth with our neighbour, the word "while" is the qualifying word that must be included whenever we quote this passage. "While" the sufferer looks not at things seen but at things "not seen", the affliction becomes, by comparison, "light", and "while" he thus reacts to affliction it will "work" for him a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory. But if the eye is on the visible, the self-same suffering will be by no means "light", and its effects will be the very reverse of the triumph suggested by the words "weight of glory".

The bearing of the context must never be forgotten, whether the subject be doctrine, practice, exhortation, consolation, or the whole range of dispensational truth.

#3. "We glory in tribulations" (Rom. v. 3).
pp. 119, 120

Inasmuch as there is no punctuation, or even division into sentences, or in the earliest Greek manuscripts of the New Testament, there is no mechanical safeguard against misquotation, the meaning, as demanded by the context, must always be considered.

For any healthy, happy and intelligent young man to say that "to die" was "gain", or that he "gloried in tribulations", would not sound like a genuine statement. Moreover, to take the opposite case, for anyone in unhappy circumstances to use the same words, would be indicative of despair, or at least of very morbid feelings. In Rom. v. 3 the Apostle does not simply say, "We glory in tribulations" as an isolated remark. He prefaces his statement by the phrase, "And not only so", which clearly indicates a qualifying context, and he follows it up with the words "also" and "but".

The Apostle's statement, seen in its context, is a note of triumph. It is healthy and sane, the very reverse of anything morbid:

> "And rejoice in the hope of the glory of God, and not only so, but we glory in tribulations also, knowing that tribulation worketh patience" (Rom. v. 3).

Let us always remember that a consideration of the context invariably adds to the fullness and truth of a passage, and is essential to a true interpretation.

#4. "Concerning zeal, persecuting the church" (Phil. iii. 6).
pp. 160, 161

When Paul wrote these words to the Philippians, it is just possible, taking the statement by itself, that he used the word translated "persecuting" in its primitive meaning of "pursuing". If we adopt this view, the passage would mean that he sought most earnestly to reach the coveted position of membership of the church. There are contextual reasons, however, that make this translation impossible. Considering first the remote context we read in I Cor. xv.:

> "I persecuted the church of God" (I Cor. xv. 9).

This is given as a reason why Paul considered himself "the least of the apostles" and "not meet to be called an apostle". This would not make sense if he intended us to understand that he was anxiously desiring to reach the spiritual position of the church of God.

In Galatians we read:

> "I persecuted the church of God AND WASTED IT" (Gal. i. 13).

The added words "and wasted it" settle the Apostle's meaning without any shadow of doubt. But this is not all. He gives this as an example of his zeal in the "Jew's religion" and makes the boast that he profited in that religion above many that were his equals (Gal. i. 14). It is in this epistle that the Apostle, the erstwhile zealot for Judaism, declares:

> "I Paul say unto you, that if ye be circumcised, Christ shall profit you nothing" (Gal. v. 2).

And again, in Chapter vi.:

> "For in Christ Jesus neither circumcision availeth anything, nor uncircumcision, but a new creature. And as many as walk by this rule, peace be on them" (Gal. vi. 15, 16).

Of these same Galatians Paul asks "Are ye so foolish? having begun in the spirit, are ye now made perfect by the flesh?" and of himself he says:

> "God forbid that I should glory (kauchomai) save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ" (Gal. vi. 14).

The student of Scripture will need no argument to prove that these references in Galatians can all be matched in Philippians, of which indeed they form the spiritual background. The true circumcision, says the Apostle are they which "worship God in the spirit, and rejoice in Christ Jesus (kauchomai), and have no confidence in the flesh" (Phil. iii. 3). Again Galatians and Philippians are the only epistles where the Apostle speaks of walking according to a "rule" (Kanon). So also the question of being made "perfect" raised in Galatians, recurs in Phil. iii. 15.

Coming to the near context and allowing the remote context to decide the Apostle's meaning, we can see that the words "Concerning zeal, persecuting the church" represent an example of his "profiting in the Jew's religion" just as much as it was in Gal. i. All this and more would have to be discredited or set aside before it would be possible to agree that in Phil. iii., Paul used the word dioko in a good sense.

No interpretation of Scripture can be accepted if it does not stand the test of being examined in the light of both the "near" and "remote" contexts.

Comparing spiritual things with spiritual.

(A series of comparisons between the epistles to the Hebrews and to the Ephesians in relation to their respective spheres and callings.)

#1. The presence and absence of the name "Paul" in the two epistles.

pp. 77 - 80

In the course of our witness, the two great epistles Ephesians and Hebrews have been given a fairly comprehensive exposition. Readers who desire positive teaching concerning them are therefore referred to "The Berean Expositor", Volume II/III - XIV for Ephesians and Volumes VIII - XX for Hebrews. Our object now, however, is not of the nature of what is positive but comparative. We desire to institute a comparison between the two epistles in order to demonstrate thereby the peculiar character of their separate callings, and so by this method allow them to speak for themselves. As the matter of authorship does not enter the present controversy, we could assume that Hebrews was written by the apostle Paul, but the very fact that such a matter is at all controversial causes us to halt, for here is a feature that, in itself, demands examination and challenges comparison. In the circumstances we shall make it a first point of investigation.

It is agreed by both sides in this controversy that Paul is the author of fourteen of the N.T. epistles, and in thirteen of them his name is found in the first verse of the first chapter. In nine the title "apostle" is found accompanying the name Paul, those which omit the title being Philippians, I and II Thessalonians and Philemon. The omission of the title from these four latter epistles is accounted for by the circumstance that they do not come from Paul alone, but bear the names of others with him, "Paul and Timotheus" (Phil. i. 1), "Paul, and Silvanus, and Timotheus" (I and II Thess. i. 1). Philemon is a private letter, consequently Paul omits his official title, calling himself "A prisoner of Jesus Christ" and "such an one as Paul the aged", for he is pleading for compassion rather than commanding obedience as an apostle. Nevertheless, despite the absence of the title, it would be easy to demonstrate from these four epistles that Paul was nevertheless an apostle.

When we turn to the epistle to the Hebrews, no reference to Paul, by name, is found either in the salutation or in the body of the epistle, but that the Hebrews to whom the epistle was written knew the identity of the writer is evident, for, toward the close of the epistle, he said: "Pray for us . . . . . that I may be restored to you the sooner" (Heb. xiii. 18, 19). "Timothy" is also closely associated with the writer (Heb. xiii. 23), and the epistle ends with the words "Grace be with you all. Amen.", a salutation which constituted the token of Paul's authorship in each of his epistles, as he states in II Thess. iii. 17, 18.

We can but conjecture the reasons that made Paul omit his name, but we have more positive ground to stand on when we consider the omission of the title "apostle".

(1) Paul was The Apostle of the Gentiles (Rom. xi. 13; Gal. ii. 8; I Tim. ii. 7; II Tim. i. 11).

(2) He was about to write to the Hebrews concerning their calling and confession, and to urge them to consider the Lord Jesus Christ as "The Apostle and High Priest" of this calling and confession (Heb. iii. 1).

While keeping within the bounds of his commission to the Gentiles, Paul spoke with the full authority that apostleship brings, but when he addressed Hebrews he asked them to "suffer the word of exhortation" (Heb. xiii. 22), and omitted both his name and the credentials of his authority.

Peter was the Apostle of the Circumcision, and includes the title in the salutation of his two epistles. Towards the close of the second epistle he alludes to something that Paul had written, which must refer either to some writings now lost, and never heard of throughout the history of the church, or to this epistle to the Hebrews. Peter had addressed his first epistle "to the strangers scattered throughout Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia and Bithynia" (I Pet. i. 1), and his second to the same scattered companies (II Pet. iii. 1). There are evidences that favour the idea that the epistle to the Galatians was a covering letter to the Hebrews, but this must await the completion of our studies in the comparison of Hebrews and Ephesians. For the present purpose attention must now be concentrated on the following facts:

(1) Paul's name, together with his apostolic office, appears in the salutation of Ephesians.

Paul's name and office are omitted from the opening of the epistle to the Hebrews.

(2) Paul's name is repeated, together with the new title, "The prisoner of Jesus Christ", in the body of the epistle to the Ephesians (Eph. iii. 1).

Paul's name does not occur once in the whole of the epistle to the Hebrews.

It is therefore evident that Paul's authority as an apostle did not cover this epistle to the Hebrews, and this evidence of the withholding of his authority goes to show that the calling and sphere of the Hebrews was outside of the dispensation entrusted to him.

(3) Paul uses the personal pronoun, ego, three times in Ephesians: "I Paul, the prisoner", "I therefore, the prisoner", "I speak concerning the church" (Eph. iii. 1; iv. 1; v. 32).

Paul never uses ego of himself in the epistle to the Hebrews.

Paul uses eme once in Eph. vi. 21, "My affairs" (lit. the things as to me).

Paul never uses eme in the epistle to the Hebrews.

Paul uses emoi once in Eph. iii. 8, "Unto me, less than the least", with special reference to his peculiar ministry.

Paul uses emoi once of himself in Hebrews, where he says "The Lord is my helper" (Heb. xiii. 6), which obviously has no special bearing upon the calling and sphere of the apostle.

Paul uses emou in Eph. vi. 19 where he asks prayer on his behalf in relation to his stewardship of the mystery.

Paul never uses emou of himself in the epistle to the Hebrews.

Paul uses me once in Ephesians, namely in vi. 20, where he says, "as I ought to speak".

Paul uses me once of himself in Hebrews, namely in xi. 32, where he says, "the time would fail me to tell, etc." which, once again, has no bearing upon the theme of the epistle.

Paul uses moi four times in Ephesians, each occasion having reference to the ministry of the mystery, which was his peculiar trust (Eph. iii. 2, 3, 7; vi. 19).

Paul uses moi of himself once in Hebrews, namely at xiii. 6, when he says that he would not fear "what man shall do unto me", which has no ground for comparison with Eph. iii. 2, 3, 7, or vi. 19.

In Ephesians Paul uses mou, "my prayers"; "my knowledge"; "my tribulations for you"; "me knees"; "my brethren"; "my mouth" (Eph. i. 16; iii. 4, 13, 14; vi. 10 & 19).

Paul never uses mou of himself in the epistle to the Hebrews.

Here is internal evidence that Paul was personally and intentionally identified with the calling which we associate with Ephesians, but that he was not an apostle or a minister of the calling of the Hebrew Christians, to whom the epistle to the Hebrews was written.

To make this clear, and to feel the force of its evidence, the reader should not be satisfied merely to peruse the analysis set out above, but should turn to every reference which it contains. If he does, the one fact will emerge that constitutes the first fact that we note in this series of comparative studies, namely, that the inclusion of the name "Paul" and the inclusion of the title "apostle", together with the claims asserted and confirmed by the use of the personal pronoun "I", "to me", etc., already listed, form an integral part of the testimony of the epistle to the Ephesians, proving beyond contradiction that Paul was the minister of the Church of the One Body, the prisoner of Jesus Christ for the Gentiles, and steward of the dispensation of the Mystery.

The intentional and inspired omission of both name and office from the epistle to the Hebrews, as surely indicates that Paul had no place in the calling covered by the epistle to the Hebrews, but that, by the grace of God, he had been permitted to write to his "kinsmen according to the flesh" (Rom. ix. 1-3) a word of exhortation, urging them to leave the elements of religion, and to go on unto perfection.

#2. The testimony of such words as "Gentile", "Fathers", "People" in the two epistles.
pp. 112 - 115

We have seen the evidence which the absence both of the name and office of the writer provides regarding the dispensational place of the epistle to the Hebrews. We now turn from the question, By whom were these epistles written? to the question, To whom were they written?

The two epistles are alike in that the titles "Ephesians" and "Hebrews" may possibly form no part of the inspired work. In some MSS the words "at Ephesus" appear in verse 1, and in some they are omitted, a space being left instead, indicating that in some cases at least the epistle was designed as a circular letter rather than an epistle addressed specifically to one assembly. The title "to the Hebrews" also forms no part of the inspired text, being added afterwards, yet very early, for it not only occurs in the Greek MSS in our possession, but in very early versions, like the Syriac. (No such question arises as to the epistles to the Romans, Corinthians, Galatians, Thessalonians, etc., as the place names are imbedded in the text.) It is therefore only by internal evidence that we can hope to ascertain to whom the two epistles we are comparing were originally addressed.

In our first comparison we found that it was by nothing the presence or absence of the name and office of Paul that something of the essential difference that exists between these two epistles could be discovered. This difference is emphasized by the choice made in the two epistles of ethnos, "Gentile", and laos, "people", to indicate the two companies addressed.

It takes no more than a cursory reading of the epistle to the Ephesians to see that it was addressed to Gentiles.

> "Wherefore, remember, that ye being in time past Gentiles in the flesh, who are called Uncircumcision by that which is called the Circumcision in the flesh made by hands" (Eph. ii. 11).

Here is most definite distinction is drawn, "Gentiles . . . . . Uncircumcision".

Ethnos, the word translated "Gentile", occurs five times in Ephesians, and each reference has a specific bearing upon the calling revealed in that epistle. Ethnos is never employed in writing of the Hebrews, no circumstance ever arising in which the Gentile has a place or share. This we must now set out before the reader as a second proof that Ephesians and Hebrews minister to two distinctly different callings.

Ethnos, "Gentile", in Ephesians.

(1) In Eph. ii. 11, those who are addressed are reminded that they were Gentiles in the flesh, called Uncircumcision, and that they were "without Christ, being aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, and strangers from the covenants of promise, having no hope, and without God in the world" (Eph. ii. 12).

The word "without" (Choris) occurs nowhere else in Ephesians, but is found thirteen times in the epistle to the Hebrews, and, while it deals with a variety of subjects, it is never once used to teach that the Hebrews were ever "without Christ". In fact, a reference to Rom. ix. 1-5 will show how both the reference to Christ Himself and to the covenants and promises, provides a final means of distinguishing the Hebrews from the Gentiles, for the blessings indicated in Rom. ix. 1-5 were specifically enjoyed by Israel "according to the flesh" whereas the blessings indicated in Ephesians are all "spiritual", the flesh having no place in them whatsoever.

A word that demands a study to itself is diatheke, "covenant", which is one of the key words of Hebrews, occurring in that epistle no less than seventeen times. In Ephesians the word occurs but once and then in a negative sense. To remove it from Hebrews would be to eviscerate the epistle, even as the insertion of it into the calling and dispensation of the mystery would be to empty that calling of its essential characteristics.

The Ephesians Gentiles were originally in a state that could be described as that of persons "having no hope and without God in the world", but the Hebrews, while they might lapse into that condition known as "lo-ammi", were never abandoned by God, for His gifts and callings are without change of mind, and the New Covenant, which is enlarged upon in the eighth chapter of Hebrews, stresses that when that covenant comes into force the promise will apply that says, "I will be to them a God, and they shall be to Me a people" (Heb. viii. 10).

(2) In Eph. iii. 1 the Apostle reveals that his very imprisonment was related to the distinctive ministry to which he had been called, declaring that it was "for you Gentiles". He does not say "for both of you, whether Jew or Gentile", as he could have done when speaking of the ministry he exercised during the period covered by the Acts of the Apostles up to his imprisonment in Rome. He insists upon the Gentileward direction of this new ministry, and associates it with "the dispensation of the grace of God given me to you-ward".

(3) Eph. iii. 6 indicates the constitution of the calling of this epistle. It is a threefold equality, and addressed to the Gentiles. It is a misinterpretation to make this passage teach that the Gentiles were now being introduced to an existing calling, from which they had been previously "aliens", or that the new calling envisaged two companies, the one Hebrew believers, the other Gentile believers, the two being jointly blessed as such. On the contrary, it is the threefold unity of the newly-created New Man.

(4) In Eph. iii. 8, 9 Paul makes the claim, that to himself—all unworthy though he be of the high privilege—it had been given that he should preach among the Gentiles the unsearchable riches of Christ, and enlighten all as to what is the dispensation of the mystery. This ordination, with its clearly stated object, is a definite revelation and binding upon all who profess to acknowledge the inspiration of the Scriptures. No such claims, or anything approaching it, is found in the epistle to the Hebrews where the only preaching of the gospel that is found takes us back to O.T. times, and is therefore at the extreme pole from that which is announced in Eph. iii. The reference to it is as follows:

> "For unto us was the gospel preached (euaggelizo) as well as unto them . . . . . they to whom it was first preached (euaggelizo) entered not in because of unbelief" (Heb. iv. 2-6).

This quotation exhausts the occurrences of euaggelizo in Hebrews, while the noun euaggelion, "The gospel", does not occur at all. No system of interpretation worthy the name could therefore possibly confuse the gospel of Eph. iii. 8, 9 with the gospel of Heb. iv. 2-6.

(5) In Eph. iv. 17 is found the last occurrences of ethnos in the epistle, where the Apostle exhorts believers to a walk that shall be the very reverse of that which once characterized them "by nature" (Eph. ii. 1-3), the word "alienated" being reintroduced in a new connection, and confirming the state already described in Eph. ii. 11, 12.

Such is the internal evidence from Ephesians. Now let us turn to the epistle to the Hebrews.

First, as we have already observed, the word "Gentile" does not occur in it. The opening of the epistle addresses those who were intimately connected with "The fathers". In Paul epistles, "The fathers" relates always and only to Israel.

> "Whose are the fathers" (Rom. ix. 5).
> "Beloved for the fathers' sakes" (Rom. xi. 28).
> "Promises made unto the fathers" (Rom. xv. 8).
> "All our fathers were under the cloud" (I Cor. x. 1).

In each case the context supplies the words "Israelites", "All Israel", "The circumcision" and "Moses", making it impossible, in any place, to include the Gentile, in any way.

> "Spake in time past unto the fathers" (Heb. i. 1).
> "Your fathers tempted Me" (Heb. iii. 9).
> "The covenant that I made with the fathers" (Heb. viii. 9).

Here, once again, the Gentile is excluded. To Israel alone were entrusted the oracles of God; Israel tempted God in the wilderness, and with the fathers of this same people, and with no other, the covenant at Sinai was made.

When Paul uses the pronoun "us" in Heb. x. 15, "Whereof the Holy Ghost also is a witness to us", the Gentile is ruled out by the context (see verses 16-18). And when he uses the pronoun "we" in Heb. x. 26 he speaks still of those addressed in Heb. vi. 1-6, where the conditions are entirely contrary to the grace revealed in the epistle to the Ephesians. The word that is set over against "Gentile" in Ephesians, in Hebrews is laos, "people".

Paul contrasts the people of Israel with the Gentiles in Rom. xv. 10, and this word laos (which occurs thirteen times in the epistle to the Hebrews) is used there of Israel, even as the word ethnos is used in Ephesians of the Gentiles.

We bring this second study to a conclusion. Let us see what we have found:

(1) That the absence of the name and office of Paul from the epistle to the Hebrews, is an indication that Paul is dealing with a calling that was outside his own distinctive ministry as an apostle, and that, consequently, this epistle must be kept distinct, so far as sphere and calling is concerned, from the epistle to the Ephesians.

(2) That in close conformity with this finding, is the use of the terms "Gentile" and "People", supplemented by the references to "the Fathers". The two comparisons already instituted between these two epistles lead us to the conclusion that two different callings and spheres are in view in them. This conclusion will be strengthened, weakened, or confuted by further studies in this series, to which we direct the prayerful attention of every true "Berean".

#3. Angels (Hebrews), Principalities (Ephesians), Differences in rank indicated.

pp. 154 - 156

The distinctive callings and spheres of the epistles to the Ephesians and to the Hebrews, have been indicated by the presence and absence of the authority of "Paul the apostle", and by the exclusive use of either "Gentile" or "People". We now continue our comparison by observing the difference between the exaltation indicated in Heb. i. 4 and that spoken of in Eph. i. 20-23. In both epistles Christ is spoken of as being "seated" at the right hand of God (Eph. i. 20; Heb. i. 3; viii. 1; x. 12; xii. 2), but in Hebrews His exaltation is emphasized by its superiority to that of angels, whereas in Ephesians it is said to be far above all principality and power. It may be that no difference is intended by those two sets of expressions, and as we know nothing about the heavenly host except what is revealed in Holy Scripture we must abide by what is there written. First of all, let us put the two sets of passages before the reader. We have already observed that the distinctive word laos, "people", is used in Hebrews thirteen times; we now find that aggelos, "angel", occurs thirteen times also.

The use of "angel" in Hebrews.

In chapter i. Christ in His exaltation to the right hand of the Majesty on high is said to be made "so much better than the angels" (Heb. i. 4).

"Unto which of the angels said He at any time, Thou art My Son? . . . . ." (i. 5).
"Let all the angels of God worship Him" (i. 6).
"He maketh His angels spirits" (i. 7).
"To which of the angels said He at any time, Sit on My right hand?" (i. 13).

In chapter ii. angels are associated with the giving of the law and we are told that the age to come has not been put in subjection to angels. By the testimony of the prophetic eighth Psalm Adam, and Christ, are seen "for a little" lower than the angels, and, at the incarnation, Christ "took not on Him the nature of angels" (ii. 2, 5, 7, 9, 16). In xii. 22 the heavenly Jerusalem is associated with "an innumerable company of angels" and in xiii. 2 the believer is reminded that, in O.T. times, the ministry of angels was no uncommon experience. When writing to the Romans, Paul mentioned angels, together with "principalities" (Rom. viii. 38) and asked the Corinthians, "Know ye not that we shall judge angels?" (I Cor. vi. 3), but neither angelic ministry among men, nor the presence of angels at the exaltation of Christ, is mentioned in Ephesians. There, we read that when Christ was raised from the dead He was set at the right hand of God "in the heavenly places far above all principality and power, and might and dominion, and every name that is named, not only in this world, but also in that which is to come" (Eph. i. 20, 21). These "principalities" are mentioned again in Eph. iii. 10 and vi. 12, each time in connection with "heavenly places", but the Epistle to the Hebrews knows nothing of them. In Scripture angels have special reference to the people of Israel, and they are not mentioned in the O.T. until after the call of Abraham and the birth of Ishmael (Gen. xvi. 7). Angelic ministry is associated with the destruction of Sodom, the deliverance of Lot, the birth of Isaac, the quest for a wife for Isaac, and the blessing of Jacob in the book of Genesis. In the book of Exodus the angel of the Lord is intimately associated with the deliverance of Israel from Egypt and with their guidance through the wilderness, and so, throughout the Law, the Prophets and the Psalms, the whole course of Israel's history is accompanied by angelic ministry. Nor does it cease with Malachi; it is prominent in the Gospels, being associated with the birth, the sufferings, the resurrection and the second coming of Christ. It is prominent in the Acts from Acts i. to xii., but, after the ministry of Paul, which commences with Acts xiii., there is but one reference in the Acts to angelic ministry, namely at Acts xxvii. 23. This must be considered in contrast with the seventeen references that fill Acts i.-xii. In the prison ministry of Paul, that is in the five "prison" epistles, angels are mentioned but to be set aside, i.e., "the worshipping of angels" (Col. ii. 18). In I Tim. iii. 16 angels are mentioned in connection with the mystery of godliness, namely "God manifest in the flesh", and also in the charge of I Tim. v. 21, where "elect angels" are mentioned.

We have already drawn attention to the fact that the word "angel" occurs thirteen times in the epistle to the Hebrews. It is of interest to note that, taking Paul's epistles together, (with the exception of Hebrews), the word "angel" occurs thirteen times, or, if we include the passage where it is translated "messenger", fourteen times. It will be seen that where the word "angel" is used at the rate of one reference to an epistle in Paul's epistles (other than Hebrews), in Hebrews it is used at the rate of one reference to a chapter. Then, if we include the number of times the word occurs in the epistle of Peter, Jude and the book of Revelation, we must add eighty-one more occurrences to the number, making in all, from Matthew to Acts xii. and Hebrews to the end of the N.T., 164 occurrences, as over against ten in Paul's pre-prison epistles, two in I Timothy and none in the "prison" epistles. While we readily admit that doctrine cannot be proved by the mere number of occurrences of any particular word, yet the presence and the absence of such related terms as "angels" and "principalities" cannot easily be accounted for apart from purpose and intention. "Angels" are ministering spirits, but, by the very nature of the word, "Principalities" hold precedence in rank, and if that difference be evident between these heavenly powers, it follows that there must be the same difference between the callings of the two epistles. The Hebrew believers are never said to be "far above" angels, but by virtue of the revelation of Eph. ii. 6, the Ephesian believer is seated potentially, "far above" even principalities.

We have now tested these two epistles and on three counts have shown that they differ in essential features.

(1) The epistle to the Hebrews lies outside the apostolic authority of Paul, whose name does not therefore appear in it.
(2) The authority of Paul was bounded by the word "Gentile"; a word that is employed with dispensational purpose in Ephesians and could not be spared from that epistle, but a word which is signally absent from Hebrews.
(3) The heavenly host appears to be divided into two great groups:
    a. Angels. These are the spiritual associates of the calling of the Hebrews, and of the heavenly city.
    b. Principalities. These are the spiritual associates of the calling of the Ephesian believers, consequently the more we compare these two epistles the more the evidence grows of the differences that exist between their spheres and callings.

#4. The use of O.T. Scripture and of Redemption.
pp. 200 - 205

The Scriptures come to us as a revelation from God, and dealing, as they do, with such mighty themes as the Purpose of the Ages, the Mysteries of Sin and Salvation, to say nothing of the deeper mysteries of the nature of the Godhead, it is to be expected there will be many things in them hard to be understood; yet, on the other hand, if the Scriptures be a "revelation" they are intended to "reveal" and therefore are intended to be understood.

The enquiry before us, while involving height and depth and a love that passeth knowledge, is, at basis, simple. We ask for evidence to prove that the callings of Ephesians and of Hebrews are either identical or different, and our consideration of the subject is from the following points of view: 1. Writer; 2. Reader; 3. Spiritual Associates. If the calling of Hebrews is a perfecting of the calling instituted under the Old Covenant, we shall expect to find a continuous appeal to O.T. Scriptures. If Ephesians is the revelation of a calling that is a "secret", something never made known to the believers of O.T. times, and entirely different from the calling made known in Hebrews, we shall expect to find scanty reference to the O.T., especially in the doctrinal section.

In Ephesians, direct citation of the O.T. is limited to one passage in the doctrinal section (Eph. i.-iii.) and three in the practical section (Eph. iv.-vi.), namely Eph. i. 22; iv. 8; v. 31 and vi. 2. In Hebrews O.T. quotation and reference meet us at every turn. Instead therefore of attempting an examination of these—a task quite outside the scope of the present enquiry—we propose to limit our examination to the way in which both epistles treat an identical O.T. passage.

Both Ephesians and Hebrews quote from Psalm viii., Ephesians merely citing, in passing, the words "And hath put all things under His feet", without in any way giving an indication that a quotation is being made, whereas Hebrews refers to "one who in a certain place testified saying" and follows with a fairly full quotation of the Psalm, and an exposition of some of its clauses. The writer of the Hebrews has told us why he introduced this Psalm, saying,

> "For unto the angels hath He not put in subjection the world to come whereof we speak" (Heb. ii. 5).

Peri hes laloumen, "whereof we speak" is explicit. Peri means "concerning": it suggests the circumference of a circle, and includes the Psalm that is immediately quoted. All therefore that is said, until the subject changes, is bounded by the word peri: the quotation of Psalm viii. is entirely limited to "the world to come whereof we speak". It is therefore important that we should know something about this "world to come". The Greek word for "world" here is somewhat rare, it is the word oikoumene. It was used by the Greeks to indicate that portion of the earth inhabited by Greeks, as distinct from Barbarians; much as we to-day might speak of "The civilized portion of the earth". It was used to designate the Roman Empire, as in Luke ii. 1, and it is the word employed by Luke when, in his description of the temptation in the wilderness, he says that the Devil showed the Saviour "all the kingdoms of the world" (Luke iv. 5). The word was well-known to the Hebrews as it is used in the LXX version of the O.T. and also in the Apocrypha. Something of the prophetic import of the word may be seen by referring to Psalm lxxii. 8 (Psalm lxxi. in the LXX).

> "And He shall have dominion from sea to sea, and from the river to the ends of the earth (oikoumene)."

In this passage the original Hebrew word translated "earth" is eretz which means either "earth" or "land". The first occurrence of oikoumene in the LXX is significant, it is found in Exod. xvi. 35, where it speaks of the land of Canaan as "inhabited", in contrast with the wilderness in which Israel had so long wandered, and so, the oikoumene of Heb. ii. 5, and the "rest" of chapter iv. 8-11 are placed on either side of the wilderness wandering of chapter iii. In this first occurrence the Greek word translates the Hebrews yashab, "to dwell". In Psalm xlix. 1 the word translated "world" is cheled, which refers to the transitory character of this life. With the exception of these passages, and of eight references in Isaiah which translate the Hebrew word eretz, "earth", the bulk of the occurrences of oikoumene in the LXX are translations of the Hebrew word tebel.

"The world to come" is, literally, "the inhabitable (world) about to be". This word has occurred already in Hebrews, being used in i. 6.

> "And again, when He bringeth in the first begotten into the world."

which the R.V. corrects by reading "When He again bringeth", consequently the oikoumene must be the sphere of the Lord's dominion at His second coming. "The whole inhabitable", he oikoumene, whole, of Isa. xiv. 7, 26 refers to the Babylonian Empire, even as the same word was employed to define the Empire of Alexander (Ælitan V. H. iii. 29), and indicates "the whole world" that forms the battlefield in the coming Day of the Lord (Rev. xvi. 14). This oikoumene, or "habitable world", that Heb. ii. speaks of, is said to be the world "to come", the Greek word being mello. A literal rendering of mello is, "about to be". Hebrews speaks of those who were "about to be heirs of salvation" of "the world that was about to be", "the powers of the age about to be" of Christ as "High Priest of good things about to be"; of the law as a "shadow of good things about to be" of a fire that is about to destroy the adversaries; of a land that Abraham was about to receive as an inheritance; of the blessing of Jacob and Esau concerning things about to be and of a city which the Hebrews were seeking which was about to be (Heb. i. 14; ii. 5; vi. 5; ix. 11; x. 1, 27; xi. 8, 20; xiii. 14).

We now observe that the epistle to the Ephesians employs this word mello once; the reference is Eph. i. 21. The context speaks of the exaltation of Christ "far above all principality, and power, and might, and dominion, and every name that is named, not only in this age (aion) but also in that which is about to be: and hath put all things under His feet". Here therefore it is evident that the apostle when writing Ephesians, and even when quoting Psalm viii., has an entirely different sphere and calling in view. What connection is there between the oikoumene, with its recognized limitation, whereof the writer of the Hebrews assures us that he "speaks", and the Church which is His body, over which Christ has been given to be Head over all things, and which is further defined as "The fullness of Him that filleth all in all"? (Eph. i. 22, 23). The habitable world to come was a subject of prophecy and of type, the church of the one Body is the subject of a mystery. In Hebrews we read that the words "He hath put all things under His feet" imply that He left nothing that is not put under Him. In Ephesians this universal subjection is enlarged and given in detail, but there is added a reference to that company which are not put under His feet, a company that occupy a position unshared even by "principalities and powers", and form the Body of which Christ is the Head, a company that are destined to be the fullness of Him, Who, in His glorious day, will be manifesting the One that fills all in all. If these things are all one and the same with the teaching of Heb. ii., of what use is inspiration, to say nothing of logic and common sense? We submit that a comparison of the way in which Psalm viii. is used in Hebrews and in Ephesians is a further demonstration of the essential difference that must be maintained by all who would rightly divide the Word of Truth.

REDEMPTION AND FORGIVENESS, IN HEBREWS AND EPHESIANS.

No reader of the Berean Expositor will need a lengthy citation of passages from the epistle to the Hebrews to show that the great sacrificial system of the law is there set forth as fulfilled by the offering of Christ. Taking this fact for granted, therefore, we turn to the epistle to the Ephesians to see how far the sacrifice of Christ is made an integral part of the teaching of that epistle.

> "In whom we have redemption, through His blood, the forgiveness of sins" (Eph. i. 7).

Apolutrosis, the word translated "redemption" is found in Heb. ix. 15. This redemption is by "blood" and vitally associated with forgiveness, the word translated "forgiveness" being aphesis. So in Heb. ix. 22 we have the words, "without shedding of blood is no remission (aphesis)", and in Heb. x. 18, "Where the remission (aphesis) of these is, no more offering for sin". Apolutrosis is used once again in Heb. xi. 35, where it is translated "deliverance" but this passage has no bearing upon the present investigation.

Returning to Ephesians, we note that "redemption" is spoken of in Eph. i. 14 and iv. 30 as of a future "day of redemption". In these references we have before us every occurrence of "redemption" (apolutrosis) and "forgiveness" (aphesis) in these two epistles.

Let us observe the context of the references in Hebrews a little more closely.

> "And for this cause He is the Mediator of the new testament, that by means of death, for the redemption of the transgressions that were under the first testament, they which are called might receive the promise of eternal inheritance . . . . . Whereupon neither the first testament was dedicated without blood . . . . . And almost all things are by the law purged with blood, and without shedding of blood is no remission" (Heb. ix. 15-22).
> "Wherefore the Holy Ghost also is a witness to us; for after that He had said before, This is the covenant that I will make with them after those days, saith the Lord, I will put My laws into their hearts, and in the minds will I write them; and their sins and iniquities will I remember no more. Now where remission of these is, there is no more offering for sin" (Heb. x. 15-18).

In these two citations from Hebrews we have every occurrence of apolutrosis and aphesis, "redemption" and "forgiveness", in that epistle. The association here established with the new covenant cannot be broken. The redemption is specifically for "the transgressions that were under the first covenant". The remission is for the sins associated with these two covenants, and redemption and remission are found in no other connection in Hebrews. What is there in Heb. ix. 15-22 and x. 15-18, which can be said to be in common with the passages which speak of redemption and forgiveness in Ephesians? The answer must be that there is "nothing at all", save that the Redeemer of both companies and callings is the same Blessed One, the Saviour of all men and of all callings, the Lord Jesus Christ.

In Hebrews the Redeemer is given a title, He is "The Mediator of the New Covenant" (or testament). This is a title foreign to, and entirely unnecessary to Ephesians. The Ephesian saints were never under the Old Covenant, the Hebrews were; the Ephesian saints received no blessings from the New Covenant, the Hebrews did. To remove the New Covenant from Hebrews is to remove the very heart of the epistle. To intrude the New Covenant into Ephesians would be fatal to its glorious teaching. Who is there that retains the faculty of clear thinking, of comparing spiritual things with spiritual, of trying the things that differ, of proving those things which are more excellent, that can hesitate in accepting, fully and without reserve, the fact revealed by the employment of these two words, that the callings and spheres of these two epistles are completely different? Let us leave redemption and forgiveness, and consider the closely allied subject of "access".

"Access" in Ephesians.

> "For through Him, we, the both, have access by one spirit unto the Father" (ii. 18).
> "In Whom we have boldness and access with confidence by the faith of Him" (iii. 12).

Entrance in Hebrews.

The word translated "access" in Ephesians is prosagoge. This Greek word does not occur in Hebrews, neither does the related word, prosago. In the place of "access" Hebrews reads:

> "Having therefore brethren boldness to enter into the holiest by the blood of Jesus, by a new and living way; which He hath consecrated for us, through the veil, that is to say His flesh; and having a high priest over the house of God, let us draw near with a true heart in full assurance of faith, having our hearts sprinkled from an evil conscience and our bodies washed with pure water. Let us hold fast the profession of our faith without wavering: for He is faithful that promised" (Heb. x. 19-23).

In both Ephesians and Hebrews the "access" and the "entering in" is said to be with boldness. In both Ephesians and Hebrews something in the form of a barrier is associated with "His flesh"; in Ephesians it is the enmity, even the law of commandments contained in ordinances, and likened to "the middle wall of partition", while in Hebrews it is likened to "the veil", the ordinances already being spoken of in Heb. ix. 10. So far, there is a parallel, but the moment we begin to compare details, connections and consequences, the distinction of the calling and sphere of either epistle once more becomes manifest.

The exhortation "to draw near", which is found in Heb. x., is bounded by the terms of the New Covenant. The word "therefore" of Heb. x. 19 indicates that the boldness to enter, there revealed, is a direct outcome of the work of Christ as Mediator of the New Covenant. What the reference to "bodies washed with pure water" may mean is a matter about which commentators are divided, some taking it to refer to the ordinance of baptism, others to the fulfillment of the prophecy of Ezek. xxxvi. 25, or the typical washing of the priests in the tabernacle service. For the moment the point is immaterial, no "sprinkling" of the conscience or "washing" of the body can have any place in Eph. ii., as we shall see upon examination. But we have not yet done with this passage for the writer continues:

> "For if we sin willfully after that we have received the knowledge of the truth, there remaineth no more sacrifice for sins, but a certain fearful looking for of judgment and fiery indignation, which shall devour the adversaries" (Heb. x. 26, 27).

and instead of being able to argue, that such threats belong only to the Old Covenant, the passage goes on to declare that the punishment meted out to those who thus sin under terms of the New Covenant will be "much sorer", and clinches the argument by quoting the law:

> "Vengeance belongeth to me, I will recompense" (Heb. x. 30).

These strange and terrifying words arise naturally out of the calling and sphere of blessing to which the epistle to the Hebrews ministers, but not even the most ardent advocate of the position we refute would want to read them into Eph. ii. Do those who claim "Hebrews" as their own, accept Heb. x. 26-30 as dispensationally true for the Church of the Mystery, including themselves?

A superficial acquaintance with Ephesians and Hebrews might prompt the remark that, in both, believers are said to be "made nigh". This, however, is not true for the word employed in Eph. ii. 13 and 17 is eggus, "nigh", which word is never used in Hebrews, whereas proserchomai, "come" or "draw near", is the word consistently used in Hebrews. In Eph. ii. the believer is not told "to draw near" but learns the blessed truth that he has been "made nigh" by the blood of Christ, an essential difference. In Hebrews, the "drawing near" is a direct result of the New Covenant; in Ephesians the "being made nigh" is the result of the creation of the New man, the Hebrews position being the subject of the Law and the Prophets, the Ephesian position being the subject of the Mystery which had been hid in God.

#5. In Hebrews Christ is set forth as "High Priest"; in Ephesians, as "Head".

pp. 219 - 221

In the calling and sphere of Hebrews, the outstanding office associated with Christ as He sits on the right hand of God, is that of High Priest. In the calling and sphere of Ephesians, His outstanding office as He sits on the right hand of God, is that of Head. Are these but two names for the same thing, or do they differ? No epistle, apart from Hebrews, uses the title "High Priest" or "Priest", yet without the doctrine that revolves around these words, how could the teaching of Hebrews proceed? It will be remembered that the exhortation "to draw near" that occupied our attention in the previous article was based upon the fact that those thus exhorted had "an high priest over the house of God" (Heb. x. 21).

References to the necessity of a sacrifice for sin are not limited to any one epistle. Paul's epistles, both before Acts xxviii. and after, contain many such precious references, yet, never, throughout the course of his ministry as God's appointed Preacher, Teacher and Apostle of the Gentiles, does he ever use the word "Priest" or "High Priest", either of the believer or of his Lord. And yet, when he came to write the epistle to the Hebrews, he breaks entirely new ground, using the word "Priest" thirteen times—a number that we have already noticed earlier in this series—"Great Priest", (megan), once (Heb. x. 21); and "High Priest" seventeen times, and so interwoven with the theme of Hebrews is this thought of "Priesthood" that the teaching of chapters v., vii., viii., ix. and x. demand continual reference to "priests", while chapters ii., iii., iv., v., vi., vii., viii., ix. and xiii. necessitate continual reference to the "High Priest".

Words are counters; they are index fingers; their inclusion or exclusion from any reasonable piece of writing indicates its general trend. Any treatise, letter or book dealing with such matters as War, Finance, Religion and Logic would of necessity include certain specific terms and exclude others, and if the treatise, letter or book were of the length of either Hebrews or Ephesians, the subject-matter of the title could be deduced from a collation of the distinctive words employed. If the theme of Hebrews necessitated the constant use of the words "Priest" and "High Priest", that fact would go a long way to indicate the character of its teaching. If to this it be added that Ephesians contains neither of these words, that additional fact would go a long way to indicate that the essential theme of Ephesians differed from Hebrews. Further, if it be observed that in the whole of Paul's writings (thirteen epistles) there is not one occurrence of the word "Priest" or "High Priest", the evidence for the difference between his apostolic ministry as covered by the thirteen epistles and this letter to the Hebrews is still further increased, and when we remember that the same writer, Paul, is responsible for the use, or non use, of these words, and that the use, or non use, is controlled not only by Paul's reasonableness, and Paul's faithfulness, but by inspiration of God (II Tim. iii. 16; II Pet. iii. 16), then the evidence for the difference in calling and sphere of Hebrews and Ephesians becomes overwhelming.

Before we can appreciate the use or non use of the word "Priest" in these epistles, it will be necessary to consider the testimony of Scripture concerning the office of the Priest and its relation to Israel and the nations. The epistle to the Hebrews itself provides evidence that, long before Israel's time, the idea of Priesthood was entertained by the nations, for Melchisedec was a "King-Priest" at the time of Abraham (Gen. xiv. 18-20). There is much to be said concerning the Melchisedec priesthood (Heb. v. 11), but the present is not the time of it. There were priests in Egypt in the days of Joseph (Gen. xlvi. 20) and in Midian in the days of Moses (Exod. ii. 16) yet, out of the 725 occurrences where the word kohen is translated "priest", at least 700 refer to the priesthood of Israel. If under the law of Moses the offering of sacrifice, and the building of an altar is the work of a priest, this was by no means the case before the introduction of the "law of commandments and carnal ordinances" introduced after the breaking of the stones of the covenant at Sinai.

Abel offered an acceptable sacrifice, yet he was no priest. Noah offered a burnt offering upon an altar, and distinguishes between clean and unclean animals (Gen. viii. 20). Job, too, as the head of his family "sent and sanctified his children" and "offered burnt offerings" on their behalf (Job i. 5). Upon his entry into the land of promise Abraham also "built an altar, and called upon the name of the Lord" (Gen. xii. 7, 8), and is seen arranging the sacrifices at the time of the great promise (Gen. xv. 9-21). Isaac built an altar (Gen. xxvi. 25), and Jacob built an altar at Shalem (Gen. xxxiii. 20), and another at Bethel, by the command of God (Gen. xxxv. 1-7), and, last, but by no means least, the great Sacrifice of the Passover was offered by the head of each family, no priest being mentioned or necessary. In the Scriptures Priesthood is not introduced by Divine command until the consecration of Aaron and his sons, recorded in Exod. xxix. Before that consecration, priests are mentioned in Exod. xix. 22 and 24, but these seem to have occupied the same sort of position that was given to David's sons as recorded in II Sam. viii. 18, where the words "chief rulers" is the Hebrew word kohen, or to Zabud in I Kings iv. 5, where the words "principal officer" is the Hebrew word kohen. This unusual use of the word kohen, ordinarily translated "priest", appears to hark back to the primitive idea contained in the root meaning of the word, which signifies either "to present oneself, or to present something or someone else" (J. M. A. in the Comp. Bib. Dict.). It is a matter of scriptural testimony and not of inference or deduction, that only priesthood recognized in Israel under the law of Moses was the Levitical priesthood, of which the High Priest's office was given to the family of Aaron, and the Priesthood to the tribe of Levi (Heb. v. 4; vii. 5, 14).

When we turn to the epistle to the Ephesians, however, those belonging to the sphere and calling there administered are seen to have been "redeemed" and to have been "made nigh" by blood (Eph. i. 7; ii. 13). They themselves constitute a "holy temple in the Lord" and a "habitation of God in spirit" (Eph. ii. 21, 22). This company are "called saints" (Eph. i. 1), and find their inheritance "in the saints" and "of the saints" (Eph. i. 18; ii. 19), yet without the intervention of a priest. This company has access, yea, boldness of access, with confidence, but no priest is found necessary to open the way. In the practical section, Christ is said to have "given Himself for us an offering and a sacrifice to God for a sweet-smelling savour" (Eph. v. 2), and in the same practical section He is said to have sanctified and cleansed the church, and will present it unto Himself . . . . . holy and without blemish (Eph. v. 26, 27). Yet in chapter i. Christ is set forth not as "High Priest" but as "Head" and the church is set forth as His "body". This two-fold title occurs again in chapter v., and the "one body" is prominent in chapter ii. The calling of the church of the mystery is not typified in the types and shadows of the law. The extraordinary insistence upon Priesthood found everywhere in the law of Moses finds its echo in but one epistle of Paul, namely in the epistle to the Hebrews. The earlier position, namely that of head of a family, set forth by Noah, Job, Abraham, Isaac and Jacob before the law, is more in line with the relationship that Christ holds to the church to-day. Instead of indicating an enrichment, the addition of the Levitical priesthood was a sure indication of failure. No perfection was possible or intended under the Levitical priesthood, which was made after the law of a carnal commandment (Heb. vii. 11, 16). In the case of Israel, Christ, by being a priest after the order of Melchisedec, fulfils the office foreshadowed with such frailty by Aaron's priesthood. No such order is needed by the Gentiles who come under the dispensation of the mystery; they find all, and more than Israel can find in the King-Priest, in their ascended Head.

As space is precious, we will leave recapitulation of the findings of the preceding articles until we reach the closing articles of the series, but the reader who is in any doubt is advised to re-read what has previously been advanced so that the cumulative force of the comparisons made may be felt.

Fundamentals of Christian Practice.
by Stuart Allen

#1. Prayer doctrinally and dispensationally considered.
pp. 171 - 177

We are deeply conscious that, to have a share in the ministry of the "Berean Expositor", is not only a great privilege, but at the same time a real responsibility. In the following series we intend to dwell upon practical truths which the Scripture indicates should be in the lives of all who love the Lord and the high calling He has so graciously given us. We have the young believer specially in mind, and while some aspects of the truth presented may be elementary to those who are more advanced along the Christian pathway, we ask such to bear with us so that those who are younger in the faith may grow in grace and that we may all not only be rooted in Him (Eph. iii. 17) but exhibit that fruit of the Spirit which is so well pleasing in His sight (Gal. v. 22).

To the believer who is going on to spiritual maturity, there can scarcely be a more important subject than that of prayer. Its importance can be gauged by considering the pattern given to us by the ascended Lord Jesus, viz. the great Apostle of the Gentiles and his ministry (I Tim. i. 16).

Even a casual reading of Paul's epistles cannot fail to disclose the large place that prayer occupied in his life and witness. It is no overstatement of truth to say that these were literally steeped in prayer. No less than six times in his letters does the Apostle declare that he prayed "without ceasing". On the surface this appears to be an exaggeration. How could a man write such a passage as II Cor. xi. 21-31 describing his sufferings for Christ, his tremendous responsibilities, his untiring work, that could have left little time for what we call leisure, yet declare that he never left off praying?

If we limit prayer to drawing aside in secret upon our knees, and pouring out our hearts to God, it is obvious that the Apostle could have had very little time so to do. But prayer, in its essence, is an attitude of the new nature and the renewed mind to God. It is one that is constantly in touch with Him in fellowship and communion and that, in spite of all external pressure of circumstances.

Paul could therefore declare in truth that his prayer life was continuous and uninterrupted, and those who follow him even as he followed Christ, will ever desire to know in daily experience, such a blessed spiritual condition.

In considering this vital subject, let us look at the words used by the Holy Spirit in the N.T. for prayer.

Deomai occurs 22 times and is rendered in the A.V. "pray" 12 times, "beseech" 9 times and "make request" once.

Its root meaning is to be in want or need and this expresses one of the basic conceptions of prayer, a consciousness, on the part of the believer, of his weakness and insufficiency, and a desire to come into living touch with the Almighty One Who declared, "All power is given unto Me in heaven and in earth" (Matt. xxviii. 18).

Euchomai, to wish strongly, occurs 8 times and is translated both "pray" and "wish". Its compound proseuchomai is of more frequent occurrence, 87 times to be exact, 83 of which are translated "pray". Here prayer is the expression of a strong desire to the Lord, either personal or in respect of others.

Erotao to interrogate, to ask. Out of 58 occurrences in the N.T., 14 times the word is rendered "pray".

> "It implies familiarity if not equality; hence never used of our prayers to God, while it is used of Christ's prayers to the Father" (John xiv. 16; xvi. 26; xvii. 9, 15, 20).
> (Critical Lexicon Concordance to N.T., Bullinger).

Hence it is the word that is consistently used in the Gospel of John which stresses the Lord's Deity.

Parakaleo, to call beside or near, in order that the person concerned may do something. The word is used 110 times in the N.T. Three times it is rendered "entreat", six times "pray" and 43 times "beseech". Here again the conception behind the word is one of need and the calling to our side of the Lord to help and strengthen. It comes over into our language as paraclete and is applied to the Holy Spirit (John xiv. 16 Comforter) and to the Lord Jesus Christ (I John ii. 1 Advocate).

To the foregoing words must be added the Greek word enteuxis = intercession. The word means a falling in with or coming together and then to intercede, specially with relation to the needs of others. This is perhaps the highest conception of prayer, where self is relegated to the background and the welfare of others is put first and foremost.

In I Tim. ii. 1 the Apostle says, "I exhort therefore, that, first of all, supplications (deesis from deomai) prayers (proseuche from proseuchomai) intercessions (enteuxis) and giving of thanks (eucharistia) be made for all men". This covers prayer in a wide sense and gives us an indication what our prayer life should be like.

At this juncture we may well pause to ask ourselves, What is the purpose behind prayer? Is it a means of extracting something from God that He would otherwise by unwilling to give? Or is it its effect upon us in some way?

As we survey the evangelical world, we find a multitude of conceptions existing among believers. Some talk of "prayer warfare". Are we justified in regarding prayer as an offensive weapon? The answer to these and all other spiritual problems is only found within the range of inspired Scripture. Ephesians chapter vi. is the passage generally alluded to in connection with this idea. Here we have a description of the "whole armour (panoply) of God" which is for the believer with a view to the "evil day" (Eph. vi. 13).

A careful reading will show that this armour is sixfold, five pieces being for the defensive, and only one offensive weapon and that is not prayer, but the Word of God, the Sword of the Spirit. Prayer does not occur at all in the symbolism of the armour, but follows on in verse 18.

We do not deny that the believer who has taken to himself the whole armour of God, will also use to the utmost the privilege of prayer, but this does not of necessity turn it into an offensive weapon. Rather is it more protective than offensive.

Let us consider what prayer does for the believer and we may then appreciate something more of its supreme importance in our daily lives. We may remind ourselves to begin with that there is no such thing as unanswered prayer. If we have waited upon the Lord for a certain thing, and in His wisdom it is not granted the answer is "No", and "No" is as much as answer from Him as "Yes". Paul himself learnt this lesson. Three times he earnestly prayed and asked the Lord to remove his "thorn in the flesh" (II Cor. xii. 8). The Divine answer was "No" but the glorious experience of the added grace and strength imparted to him more than compensated for the negative answer to his prayer. Wise are we if we can take the Lord's refusals without being offended, and have a complete trust in His matchless wisdom and love for each one of us, a love that will not allow Him to grant us things that would be to our harm.

1. True prayer gives access to the Father. To appreciate this properly, we should put ourselves back into Old Testament times. Do we realize that, prior to the all sufficient offering on Calvary, no believer ever enjoyed access to God? Jehovah surrounded Himself with barriers of sacrifice and priesthood to impress upon His people the fact that sin eternally separates Himself from fallen man and until the One offering for sin had been made and sin righteously put away, there could be no possibility of access to the Divine presence. Let us consider the following verses:

> "The Holy Ghost thus signifying that the way into the holiest of all was not yet made manifest, while as the first tabernacle was yet standing" (Heb. ix. 8). "Having therefore, brethren, boldness to enter into the holiest by the blood of Jesus" (Heb. x. 19).

We may point out, in passing, that the right to enter into the holiest of all did not confer upon believers of the Acts period the tremendous privilege of dwelling there for ever. To enter there by prayer is one thing, but to be seated there in Christ Jesus, is quite another (Eph. ii. 6). This is the exclusive privilege of the One Body and it is revealed in all its fullness in the second chapter of the epistle to the Ephesians.

Every time we pray, we are able to draw near to God in a sense that no Old Testament saint was able to do, and this fact alone, should remind us of the inestimable privilege that prayer confers upon us. It should prevent us from thoughtlessly rushing into the Lord's presence.

In praying we are coming into the audience chamber of the King of Kings, but lest this should daunt us, we remember that this glorious One is also our Saviour and our Head.

2. True prayer gives fellowship and communion with God.

When believers speak of fellowship, they usually mean spiritual intercourse with one another, and this is a beautiful feature of the Christian life. The Apostle John, however, reminds us of a far more important aspect of fellowship: "Truly our fellowship (koinonia) is with the Father, and with His Son Jesus Christ" (I John i. 3).

The Greek koinonia means something that is shared or one has in common with someone else, so leading to the thought of communion. Thus, in a wonderful way, prayer brings us into communion with our Heavenly Father and we have the joy of talking with Him at any and all times. God forbid that we should ever regard prayer as a Christian act to be engaged in only when we want something, but rather learn, in a practical way, what day be day fellowship with the Father means.

Just as breathing is the natural expression of physical life, so should prayer be the normal and continuous expression of our spiritual life.

3. True prayer puts God first, others second, and self last.

In the prayer which our Lord taught His disciples, which is a model prayer for the subjects of the earthly kingdom, the Lord commences with: "Our Father which are in heaven, hallowed be Thy name, Thy kingdom come, Thy will be done . . . . ." Thus we have four references to God before we reach "Give us this day our daily bread". Likewise the recorded prayers of the Apostle Paul abound with concern for others. Rom. i. 9-12; I Cor. i. 4-7; Eph. i. 16-23; Phil. i. 4-11; Col. i. 3-6; I Thess. i. 2-4. These references not only make this clear, but also contain the element of thanksgiving which is most important. As long as we are conscious of the Lord's abiding goodness to each one of us, we are not likely to stray from the path of His revealed will. It was when Israel of old ceased to be thankful that they forgot God's lovingkindness and wonder working on their behalf and their heart turned back to Egypt (a type of the world) and its allurements.

It is also true of the nations at Babel. They knew God yet glorified Him not as God, neither were they thankful (Rom. i. 21), and thus started the terrible declension that the remainder of this chapter reveals. A thankful heart is a great preservative against evil and we are not ever likely to weary the Lord by including it continually in our prayers in a heartfelt manner.

4. True prayer rests upon and claims God's promises.

It is a significant fact that all the outstanding characters in Scriptures have been men and women who knew how to pray and a careful study of their prayers will show that these are based upon the Word of God and the promises contained therein.

We may think of Elijah. James, in his epistle, brings forward Elijah as an example of effectual praying (v. 17). He prayed earnestly that it might not rain and it rained not on the earth by the space of three years and six months. He prayed again and the heaven gave rain, and the earth brought forth her fruit (verses 17, 18). Now this was remarkable indeed, and on the surface it looked as though the prophet had some extraordinary power to accomplish a miracle. But it should be remembered that this prayer was based upon the Word of God.

> "And it shall come to pass, if ye shall hearken diligently unto My commandments which I command you this day . . . . . that I will give you the rain of your land in his due season . . . . . Take heed to yourselves, that your heart be not deceived, and ye turn aside, and serve other gods and worship them; and then the Lord's wrath be kindled against you, and He shut up the heaven, that there be no rain and that the land yield not her fruit . . . . ." (Deut. xi. 13-17).

Elijah, in a time of Israel's apostasy, was simply asking the Lord to carry out His written threats as well as His promises, in order to bring back the sinful nation to repentance.

Or let us take the case of David. After thanking God for all His gracious revelation of His purposes concerning himself he says, "Therefore now, Lord, let the thing that Thou hast spoken concerning Thy servant and concerning his house be established for ever, and do as Thou hast said" (I Chron. xvii. 23). God loves to be reminded of His promises.

If our praying is to be effective, it must be likewise based upon the unchanging Word, but to this we must add the injunction of II Tim. ii. 15. If we base our prayers upon Scripture or promises relating to a calling other than to which we belong, can we expect God to hear and answer? Most assuredly not. Right division is eminently practical in this respect as in every way. We must get to know our Divine calling before we can begin to pray properly. Many children of God are asking Him for all kinds of things pertaining to Scriptures that do not apply to them or which belong to another time period, and they are disappointed and frustrated because they have a silent heaven. Let us search our prayer life and make sure we are not perpetuating the same error.

5. True prayer watches and waits for the Lord's answer.

The prophet Habakkuk not only prayed, but stood upon his watchtower to see what the Lord would say in reply (Hab. ii. 1). The Lord Jesus not only exhorted His disciples to pray, but to watch as well as pray (Luke xxi. 36; Mark xiii. 35-37).

In the last reference the word translated "watch" is gregoreo, which literally means to be sleepless or to keep wide awake. Can it be that we sometimes pray to the Lord and then, as it were, go to sleep and forget? Did not many of the Pentecostal Church do this very thing? They were concerned that Peter had been imprisoned by Herod.

"Peter was therefore kept in prison, but prayer was made without ceasing of the church unto God for him" (Acts xii. 5). God was graciously pleased to answer this prayer and release His servant, who thereupon came to the house of Mary the mother of John where "many were gathered together praying" (verse 12) and knocked at the door of the gate. When the damsel Rhoda, who recognized Peter's voice, ran to tell them, they said to her "thou art mad" (verse 15). "But Peter continued knocking: and when they had opened the door and saw him, they were astonished" (verse 16).

Now this was praying, but it was certainly not watching and praying, for when the answer came, they were unprepared for it. However, we have no stones to throw at these believers, for how many times in the experience of both the writer and reader has this not been repeated? May God keep us wide awake to recognize immediately His answers to our petitions.

"Continue in prayer, and watch in the same with thanksgiving" (Col. iv. 2).

6. True prayer has an intensity and earnestness behind it.

We know little of Epaphras and his ministry, but of two things we can be certain: his keenness and practical love for the saints at Colosse and Laodicea (Col. iv. 13) and his vital prayer life.

> "Epaphras, who is one of you, a servant of Christ, saluteth you, always labouring fervently for you in prayers, that ye may stand perfect and complete in all the will of God" (Col. iv. 12).

"Labouring fervently" is a translation of the Greek word agonizo. While it would be going too far to translate this word "agonize" as some have done, it has in its composition the word agon meaning a race or contest and it brings before our mind the fact that effective praying has behind it an intensity of effort compared to an athlete running a race. Does this characteristic truthfully describe our praying? An apathetic or spasmodic prayer life accomplished nothing and often we may be convinced of laxity in this respect.

7. True prayer is offered to God the Father in Christ's Name.

In the N.T. prayer is always directed to God the Father (Eph. iii. 14) and offered in the Name of the Lord Jesus (Eph. iii. 21) and interpreted by the Holy Spirit (Rom. viii. 26). How often have we heard in public, prayer finished with the phrase "for Christ's sake, Amen" and so rushed over as though it was of little importance and merely a formal or correct way of concluding. Do we realize that it is only because of the Lord Jesus Christ and His precious redemptive work that prayer is possible at all? If we do, then we shall be very conscious of this supreme fact as we pray and ask that all His fragrance should be cast over all our spiritual breathings to God.

8. True prayer is protective.

The Lord Jesus, looking ahead to Peter's denial of Himself, says to him: "Satan hath desired to have you, that he may sift you as wheat, but I have prayed for thee that thy faith fail not" (Luke xxii. 31, 32). Literally the words read, "I have prayed (peri) around thee". Peter was, as it were, surrounded with a wall of protective prayer by the Lord. No wonder he was so soon to be smitten with remorse and turn back to Him, from his grievous fall, with true repentance.

The Lord uses the same expression in John xvii. 9, 20, "I pray for (peri) them, I pray not for (peri) the world" (verse 9). "Neither pray I for (peri) these alone, but also for (peri) those who shall believe through their word" (verse 20).

Paul, in his concern for the Thessalonian and Colossian saints uses the same thought (II Thess. i. 11; Col. i. 3). Do we uphold in prayer those who are in special need in this way? It may be that distance separates such from us, but prayer can annihilate the greatest distance and protect them from harm and danger.

9. True prayer makes doctrine real and experimental.

In Eph. i. 3-14 the Apostle Paul covers a tremendous sweep of doctrine, revealing the magnitude of the Father's will, the Son's redemptive work, and the Holy Spirit's present witness.

However, this did not exhaust what he had to teach the Ephesian saints, but before he proceeds further, he begins to pray that the truth so far given may become real and experimental to each of his readers (verses 15-23). Every public Bible reading and every private reading of the Scriptures should send us to our knees and make us realize the increasing responsibility that every revelation of Truth brings and the need that we should not only receive it as Truth (Eph. i. 17) but practically acknowledge it in our walk and witness day by day.

Reading about our inheritance in Christ, is like viewing if afar off. Prayer brings it near and makes it our own possession.

10. True prayer will conform to the will of God.

> "And this is the confidence that we have in Him, that, if we ask anything according to His will, He heareth us" (I John v. 14).

On reaching this point, we have come to the centre of the purpose of all prayer, that is, to bring each one of us into conformity to the Lord's will, whatever that may involve. Alas so many of us journey such a long way along the road of Christian experience before we reach this point. When we can honestly and truthfully say we long for nothing so much as His will in our lives, whatever that may cost, and when our wills are completely submerged in His, we have progressed far towards the goal of spiritual maturity. We shall not reach this stage until we know something of the deception, frailty and sinfulness of our own hearts, and, at the same time, the boundless love and infinite concern for our eternal happiness that exists in the heart of our Heavenly Father towards each one of us. Then, and not till then, can we say as the Saviour did, "Thy will, not mine, be done" (Luke xxii. 42).

#2. Conditions that govern the answering of prayer.
pp. 207 - 212

At this point it may be good to realize afresh from God's Word what are the conditions for obtaining affirmative answers to our prayers.

1. There must be an abandonment of all known sin in our lives.

The O.T. saints had to learn this lesson.

> "If I regard iniquity in my heart, the Lord will not hear me" (Psa. lxvi. 18),
> "Behold, the Lord's hand is not shortened, that it cannot save: neither is His ear heavy, that it cannot hear, but your iniquities have separated between you and your God, and your sins have hid His face from you, that He will not hear" (Isa. lix. 1, 2).
> "Bring no more vain oblations: incense is an abomination to Me . . . . . your new moons and your appointed feasts My soul hateth . . . . . and when ye spread forth your hands I will hide mine eyes from you: yea, when ye make many prayers, I will not hear. Your hands are full of blood" (Isa. i. 13-15).

Both John and James, in their epistles, stress the same truth:

> "Whatsoever we ask, we receive of Him, because we keep His commandments, and do those things that are pleasing in His sight" (I John iii. 22).
> "The effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much" (James v. 16).

Members of the Body of Christ are warned against giving place to the Devil, thus grieving the Holy Spirit (Eph. iv. 27, 30), and causing prayer to be disregarded by God.

2. There must be a practical realization of the truth of Sanctification.

The root meaning of sanctification is separation, with its twofold aspect of being separated from the world and separated to the Lord, for the fulfillment of His will in daily service.

When the judgment upon the cities of the plain was impending, there were two believers who figure largely in the story. One was inside the city of Sodom, namely Lot, and one was outside the city, namely Abraham. Although Lot was vexed every day by the sin which surrounded him (II Pet. ii. 7) we have no record of any prayer on his part on behalf of Sodom and finally we know that God had to drag him out that he might not be involved in its doom. He is a type of the believer who is not only in the world, but of the world and knows little of sanctification in practice. It was left to Abraham, the separated one, to intercede for these wicked cities (Gen. xviii. 16-33).

It is impossible for a believer who has too close a contact with a world which is under the domination of Satan (Eph. ii. 2, 3) to pray effectively. We must, in practice, be outside the enemy's camp if we wish to accomplish anything for those who are still inside it.

3. There must be no self motive in prayer.

> "Ye ask, and receive not, because ye ask amiss, that ye may consume it upon your lusts" (James iv. 3).

The Greek word hedone translated lust is elsewhere rendered "pleasure" and is used in the parable of the Sower to describe those who fall among thorns and are choked with cares, and riches and pleasures of this life and bring no fruit to perfection (Luke viii. 14). Sometimes it is a good thing to take stock of ourselves, searching our hearts and asking whether the things we constantly ask of God are for His glory, the blessing of others, or are they for the gratification of our desires?

Is He and His service first and last and self excluded?

4. Undispensational praying.

We have before commented on this very prevalent source of denied petitions. If dispensational truth means anything at all it will have a practical bearing upon every phase of our life including our praying. We must learn to pray in harmony with our calling. It is not sufficient basis for the Lord to answer our requests. How many believers have claimed such promises as Matt. xxi. 20-22. "And all things whatsoever ye shall ask in prayer, believing, ye shall received", only to reap disappointment which has staggered them! It is easy to explain the failure by reading into the promise conditions which are not there. The answer to the problem is to be found, not in tampering with the Lord's words, but in rightly dividing the Word of Truth. Again, if instead of a slavish adherence to the "Lord's prayer", the magnificent prayers of Eph. i. and iii. were used by God's people more frequently, would there not be a greater growth in grace and a deeper appreciation of His will?

5. There must be perseverance with our praying.

The Apostle Paul exhorted the saints at Colosse to continue in prayer (iv. 2). The word here is proskartereo. It occurs in Mark iii. 9, "And He spake to His disciples that a small ship should wait on Him because of the multitudes lest they should throng Him". Just as the purpose of this little ship was to be put at the Lord's disposal and wait for Him to use as He willed, so the believer, when he reaches the point in his spiritual growth where he earnestly longs for God's will, will likewise wait upon Him by continued prayer and watch for every indication of His hand to this end.

However, we must utter a word of warning. Persevering prayer to know our heavenly Father's will is one thing, but persistent praying that is outside His will may bring an answer that is terrible in the extreme. We think back on Israel's experience when, not satisfied with the gracious provision of the manna—"angel's food" as Scripture terms it—they longed for flesh such as they had in Egypt. The whole of Numbers chapter xi.

should be studied in this connection. Did God answer their prayer? Yes, indeed He did, but with dreadful consequences as the context indicates.

The Psalmist's comment is:--

> "They lusted exceedingly in the wilderness and tempted God in the desert. And he gave them their request, but sent leanness into their soul" (Psa. cvi. 14, 15).

Here was a terrible answer, consequent upon their determination to get something that was outside the will of God. Let us ever remember that He is always more ready to answer than we are to pray, and that persevering prayer is necessary, not because He is aloof and unwilling, needing constant worrying that the answer may be wrung out of Him, but rather that the waiting time is for our spiritual growth, discipline and appreciation of His goodness. Let us not interpret beseeching as though it were besieging. Just as a wise and loving parent makes every provision for the needs of his child, yet he trains that child, to ask for these things and say "please" and "thank you" when they are granted. Likewise our Heavenly Father deals in His grace and lovingkindness with us and teaches the true reason for prayer, to realize our utter dependence upon Him for all things necessary to Christian life and service and a desire to be filled with a knowledge of His will in all wisdom and spiritual understanding (Col. i. 9).

This lesson is not peculiar to the dispensation of the Mystery. Through the prophet Ezekiel God had made known His will to Israel and showed what He was willing to do for them in restoration and blessing (Ezek. xxxvi. 24-36). But, although this was true, the earthly people had to learn the lesson of prayer:

> "I will yet for this be enquired of by the house of Israel to do it for them" (verse 27).

There are two opposing schools of thought among believers regarding prayer. One stresses the fact that God is sovereign and is working all things after the counsel of His own will (Eph. i. 11) and that nothing can hinder the fulfillment of His plans. To such, prayer cannot forward or retard His purposes. The other lays stress upon the responsibility of the believer and the fact that unbelief limits the Holy One of Israel (Matt. xiii. 58). Such will talk of God being unable to work because of prayerlessness and of true prayer "moving the Hand that moves the world". It is very much like the arguments for free will set up against election. The truth lies, as it so often does, midway between these two extremes. It is important to realize that God has a glorious plan for both the heavens and the earth, and that, finally, this plan cannot possibly miscarry. Not to realize this would cause utter despair and make mockery of all Christian effort.

At the same time, if redemption means anything at all, it signifies that the believer is not only alive spiritually, but free; free to choose the way of the flesh and self gratification as well as the will of the Lord. And it is here that the supreme importance of prayer becomes manifest. If God is working to a plan and chooses to use redeemed human lives to carry it out, then the question arises as to what part each one of us is going to play in its unfolding. The importance of this can hardly be over emphasized. Does it not mean that we must go to the Throne of Grace constantly and ask "Lord, what wilt Thou have me to do?" (Acts xi. 6). We are assured by the apostle Paul that it is according to the "effectual working in the measure of every part", that the Body grows (Eph. iv. 16) and this will only happen when every member of the Church is doing just the work intended by our Heavenly Father and none other. This can only be discovered by prayer and waiting upon God.

As there are no useless members in the physical body—so there should be none in the spiritual Body.

That prayer does make a difference, the following Scriptures make abundantly clear.

> "Finally, brethren, pray for us, that the word of the Lord may have free course and be glorified . . . . . and that we may be delivered from unreasonable and wicked men" (II Thess. iii. 1, 2).

Now it could be argued that it was obviously the Lord's will that His Word should run unhindered and be glorified. If so, then why the need of prayer? But the Apostle knew how easily the human factor could enter in and the flesh and the Devil intrude, and so hinder God's work.

> "Withal praying also for us, that God would open unto us a door of utterance to speak the mystery of Christ for which I am also in bonds" (Col. iv. 3).

The same thought occurs here, but this time Paul is thinking of himself and any possible failure on his part to make known the great secret.

> "For I know this shall turn to my salvation through your prayer, and the supply of the spirit of Jesus Christ" (Phil. i. 19).

Whether we take salvation to mean Paul's deliverance from prison or in a much deeper sense, his salvation with age abiding glory (II Tim. ii. 10) is not our concern at the moment. It is clear that the suffering he was undergoing in his Roman prison was for the Lord's gain and the furtherance of the truth, and the prayers of the Philippian saints contributed a vital part to this great end.

Whether this would have happened if the church at Philippi had not constantly remembered the Apostle in prayer, it is idle to speculate, but it is quite evident that Paul took them as a factor to be reckoned with in the outworking of the Lord's will for himself.

> "But withal prepare me also a lodging: for I trust that through your prayers I shall be given unto you" (Philemon 22).

There, quite obviously, the Apostle is contemplating the possibility of his being set free from prison and being able to visit Philemon; and this possibility is inextricably woven with Philemon's intercession for his release. If prayer makes no difference to the daily happenings in our lives, why should Paul say "I trust that through or on account of (dia) your prayers, I shall be given to you"?

> "Now I beseech you, brethren, for the Lord Jesus Christ's sake, and for the love of the Spirit, that ye strive together (sunagonizomai) with me in your prayers to God for me, and that I may be delivered from them that do not believe in Judaea and that my service, which I have for Jerusalem, may be accepted of the saints; that I may come unto you with joy by the will of God and may with you be refreshed" (Rom./ xv. 30-32).

Here Paul asks prayer for four important things concerning himself and mentions God's will regarding them. If the fulfillment of this will was automatic, there would be no need of prayer, but it is evident that the Apostle did not so regard it, but rather that the petitions of the Church at Rome could materially help forward the fulfillment of his desires.

We trust that careful consideration of these passages will impress upon the mind of both writer and reader how vastly important our daily prayer life is and how it can very practically affect not only our own Christian service but also the service of others.

From time to time we come across believers who are exercised about their sphere of service and witness for the Lord. They are rightly concerned about these things. It is not our province to direct the conscience of such, but this we can say that here is a supreme ministry we can all engage in, namely that of intercession. It will cost us something in time and perhaps in other ways and we shall get no human commendation for it as it is a thing only known to us and our Saviour.

Just as in our physical bodies there are organs like the heart and lungs doing vital work, yet are never seen like the external members as the hands and feet, so believers who engage in this vital activity behind the scenes may be doing as much in the Lord's sight as those whose service is in the open and manifest to all.

The reader will remember the wonderful type given in Exod. xvii. 8-13. Joshua and his men may fight strenuously with Amalek in the valley, but it was the man unseen at the hill top who controlled the battle, namely Moses.

> "When Moses held up his hand Israel prevailed and when he let down his hand Amalek prevailed. But Moses' hands were heavy; and they took a stone and put it under him and he sat thereon; and Aaron and Hur stayed up his hands, the one on the other side, and his hands were steady until the going down of the sun" (verses 11, 12).

Do we who value dispensational truth and the glories of the dispensation of the Mystery, uphold our leaders like this in prayer? Oh the need to-day for many like Aaron and Hur! As we look around us we see a growing apathy to spiritual things in general and to our calling in particular. Christian walk and witness is getting more difficult as the weeks and months pass. We may put this down to the increasing apostasy and declension which marks the end of the age and we may be right in so doing. But can it be that we have not yet fully realized the possibilities latent in a vital prayer life and that the lack of results which we deplore may be due to the fact that we have sown the seed of the written and spoken word and then forgotten to water it by the ministry of prayer? Only then can we expect the increase or growth that God alone can give (I Cor. iii. 6, 7).

When John in his Apocalyptic vision sees the twenty-four elders before the Throne, he tells us that each one had a golden vial "full of odours which are the prayers of the saints" (Rev. v. 8). So in symbol the prayers of God's people ascend to Him as something inexpressibly precious and fragrant. What encouragement we have then to come constantly to the Throne of grace and share in this wonderful ministry of intercession!

Persevering prayer along the lines of the will of God does make a difference and if our studies in this subject come as a challenge to each of us as we consider the poverty of our prayer life, may God give us grace to use, as we have never done before, this matchless privilege and so be blessed of Him increasingly in making known His transcendent riches of grace and glory in the saving, calling out, and upbuilding of those chosen in Christ before the overthrow of the world, to inherit the Heavenly holiest of all for all eternity.

"Continue in prayer, and watch in the same with thanksgiving" (Col. iv. 2).

ISAIAH.
#24. Isaiah xl. 12 - xlii. 17.
The theme of the two "Servants" introduced.
pp. 9 - 11

The reader will have observed that Isaiah introduces, in direct contrast with idolatry, the subject of "service".

> "But thou, Israel, art My servant" (Isa. xli. 8).
> "Behold My Servant" (Isa. xlii. 1).

The etymology of the Greek word idolatry (eidololatreia) is suggestive of its essential meaning. It is compounded of eidolon, "an image", from eidos, "a form" (which in its turn is from eido "to see"), and latreia, "service", from latreito, "to serve". Idolatry is "the service of that which is seen". Hence in the N.T. "covetousness" is called idolatry (Eph. v. 5)—a connection which, although not expressly stated in the O.T., is implied in the Law:

> First commandment.—"Thou shalt have no other gods."
> Tenth commandment.—"Thou shalt not covet."

The reader will doubtless call to mind many passages where idolatry and the worship of graven images is spoken of as "service":

> "Thou shalt not bow down . . . . . nor serve them" (Exod. xx. 5).
> "Driven to worship them, and serve them" (Deut. iv. 19).
> "Walk after other gods, and serve them" (Deut. viii. 19).
> "Following other gods to serve them" (Judges ii. 19).
> "Whom they have loved, and whom they have served" (Jer. viii. 2).

Such acts of veneration and esteem as "bowing down", "worshipping", "walking after", "following", and "loving", find their complement here in "serving". It is not therefore strange—it is indeed of the very essence of the subject—that the section before us places "Image worship" over against true "Service".

The first of the two servants referred to is named:

> "But thou, Israel, art my servant, Jacob whom I have chosen, the seed of Abraham, my friend. Thou whom I have taken from the ends of the earth, and called thee from the chief men thereof, and said unto thee, Thou art My servant: I have chosen thee, and not cast thee away" (Isa. xli. 8, 9).

The second is unnamed, but His character and mission are defined:

> "Behold My Servant, Whom I uphold; Mine elect, in whom My soul delighteth; I have put My spirit upon Him; He shall bring forth judgment to the Gentiles" (Isa. xlii. 1).

We must now acquaint ourselves with the teaching that underlies these references to the Lord's "Servant". We must first, however, have the structure of the section as a whole before us, so that, even though we do not attempt a detailed exposition of every section, the relation of each part to the whole may be observed, and the light thus received illuminate the passages chosen for expansion.

"Israel, My servant" (Isa. xli. 8, 9).—Three names occur in this section, which must be considered together: "Israel", "Jacob", and "Abraham". Israel is the "servant"; Jacob was "chosen"; but both names would have remained empty titles, did they not belong to "seed of Abraham", the friend of God. "Covenant" relationship is implied in Isa. xli. 8; and expressed in Isa. xlii. 6.

In the section that follows (Isa. xli. 10-20), Jacob is referred to as "a worm", Israel as "man" and the Lord as their "Redeemer".

In Isa. xliv. 1 we find once again the double title: "Jacob My servant, and Israel, whom I have chosen", which is modified in verse 2 to read: "Fear not, O Jacob, My servant; and Jesurun, whom I have chosen." In verse 21 of the same chapter both titles are used together: "Remember these, O Jacob and Israel; for thou art My servant", a proof, if it were needed, that both titles refer to the one chosen people.

"Jacob, the servant", and "Israel, the chosen" figure once more in Isa. xlv. 4, while in the last reference to "Israel" as the "servant", the title is assumed by Messiah in His work of restoring and preserving (Isa. xlix. 3). These different passages will come before us in their turn; we have merely mentioned the references here in passing.

God's purpose in the earth, so clearly indicated at the call of Abraham (Gen. xii.), is the reason for the "service" of Israel and the "choice" of Jacob. Its unconditional character is made evident by the references to Abraham, and the assurances that the Lord would not "cast away" nor "forsake" His people (Isa. xli. 9, 17). This purpose receives further confirmation in the promise that "they that strive against thee shall perish" (Isa. xli. 11, 12), and the positive declaration that Israel shall be a sharp threshing-instrument and a fan in the hand of the Lord.

Israel, however, cannot stand alone. As we have already seen from the last reference to Israel as the servant (Isa. xlix. 3), all finally depends upon Israel's Messiah. We pass, therefore, from chapter xli., with its references to Israel, the servant, to chapter xlii. with its glorious prophecy of Israel's Messiah, Redeemer and King.

The main purpose of this article has been "to prepare the way of the Lord". This we have done chiefly by placing before the reader the structure of the section as a whole, with some insistence on the corresponding passages that speak of the Lord's "Servant". In our next article we hope to take up the blessed prophecy concerning the Lord Jesus Christ that occupies the first eight verses of chapter xlii. Meanwhile, even though we to-day are neither Israel nor the seed of Abraham, we may nevertheless lay hold upon and rejoice in the precious promise of Isa. xli. 10 as being true for us also in Christ:

> "Fear thou not, for I am with thee; be not dismayed; for I am thy God; I will strengthen thee; yea, I will help thee; yea, I will uphold thee with the right hand of My righteousness" (Isa. xli. 10).

ISAIAH.

#25. Isaiah xl. 12 - xlii. 17.

"Judgment unto TRUTH"; "Judgment unto VICTORY" (xlii. 1-4).

pp. 42 - 46

Without risk of contradiction, it may be said that whatever office Israel are destined to fulfil, they will enter it only through the mediation of Christ, and that most, if not all, of the responsibilities attached to their calling have been, or will be, fulfilled by Christ.

As an instance of the first proposition, we cite the office that is peculiar to Israel, "A kingdom of priests". We meet with this description of the nation in Exod. xix. where the foot of Mount Sinai is reached and the First Covenant instituted. Israel utterly failed to observe the condition of this covenant, and will become a "kingdom of priests" only by virtue of the blood of the New Covenant; in other words, through the mediation of Christ (Rev. i. 6).

As an instance of the second proposition we may cite Isa. xliii. 10, "Ye are My witnesses", which refers to Israel, and Rev. i. 5 which speaks of Christ as "The faithful Witness". So it is with the subject immediately before us. We have seen that the section divides into two, the first part falling under "Israel, the Servant", and the second under "Messiah, the Servant".

If the reader will consult the structure on page 10, he will observe that Isa. xlii. 1-17, is divided into three parts.

(1) BEHOLD MY SERVANT. (Isa. xlii. 1-.).
(2) WHOM I UPHOLD. (Isa. xlii. -1-8-.).
(3) THE CONTRAST—IDOLS—"Ye are gods" (Isa. xlii. -8-17).

Our immediate concern is with the first two parts, and we will consider the briefer part 1 before going on to the expansion in part 2, which is very full.

"BEHOLD MY SERVANT" (Isa. xlii. 1).

In the opening words of "comfort", with which chapter xl. opens, the prophets had said: "Say unto the cities of Judah, Behold your God!" (Isa. xl. 9). Here, in Isa. xlii. 1, he writes, "Behold My Servant". Both passages refer to the same blessed Person, none other than:

> "Christ Jesus, Who being in the form of God . . . . . made Himself of no reputation, and took upon Him the form of a servant" (Phil. ii. 5-7).

Of this One, Isaiah had already spoken:

"Behold, a virgin shall conceive and bear a Son, and shall call His name Immanuel (God with us) . . . . . a Child is born . . . . . His name shall be . . . . . the Mighty God . . ." (Isa. vii. 14; ix. 6).

The word translated "servant" is the Hebrew ebed, and although it may not be capable of proof, the idea is at least suggestive that the Latin obedio and the English obedience are derived from the same root. Abad, the verb, means "to labour", and, in certain forms, "to till" (Gen. ii. 5); "to dress" (Gen. ii. 15). To be destined to become "A servant of servants" was to be placed under a curse (Gen. ix. 25).

Of this "Servant" the Lord said: "Whom I uphold; Mine elect, in Whom My soul delighteth: I have put My spirit upon Him" (Isa. xlii. 1). A reference to Matt. xii. 18-21 shows beyond a shadow of doubt that the "Servant" of Isa. xlii. is the Lord Jesus Christ, but upon reading Matthew's quotation of Isa. xlii. 1-4, certain changes are observable which demand attention before we can proceed.

To economize space we will not print the passage in full as it occurs in the A.V. of Isaiah, the Greek of the Septuagint and of Matthew, but bring out the divergences by the following analysis:

Isaiah xlii. 1-4. (Hebrew).	Isaiah xlii. 1-4. (Greek).	Matthew xii. 18-21. (Greek).
"Behold My servant, Whom I uphold; mine elect in Whom my soul delighteth."	"Jacob is My servant, I will help him; Israel is mine elect, my soul has accepted him."	"Behold My servant; Whom I have chosen; My beloved, in Whom my soul is well pleased."
"Smoking flax shall He not quench; He shall bring forth judgment unto truth."	"Smoking flax shall He not quench; but He shall bring forth judgment unto truth."	"Smoking flax shall He not quench, till He send forth judgment unto victory."
"The isles shall wait for His law."	"And in His name shall the Gentiles trust."	"And in His name shall the Gentiles trust."

The careful reader will discover a number of other, minor, differences in these three presentations, but in the present study those cited are all that need be considered.

Seeing that both names have already occurred in connection with the title "servant" in the preceding chapter, the introduction of the names "Jacob" and "Israel" into the Septuagint version of Isa. xlii. 1 was perhaps natural, but the testimony of Matthew and the general trend of the prophecy of Isaiah leave no room for doubt but that the Messiah alone is intended in the passage before us.

The second passage cited is of a different nature and not so easily disposed of. Isaiah says "He shall bring forth judgment unto TRUTH", a translation followed by the Septuagint. Matthew however departs from this and uses the word "victory" instead of "truth".

Jenour has a note saying, "All translators, misled by the Septuagint, render the passage something in the same manner as in our English Bibles", and he would render the disputed words as "to the people". After careful examination we find no grounds for the amended translation, and only mention it for the benefit of any reader who may think it has not been seen and weighed. Emeth is "truth" and am "people", but there the likeness ceases. Matthew is evidently inspired to give the word used by Isaiah its full meaning, and guided by the underlying principles that are observable in all the ways of God, we ultimately arrive at the same conclusion.

> The Devil's doctrine is that "MIGHT is RIGHT".
> The doctrine of the Lord is that "RIGHT ALONE IS MIGHT".

By the very nature of the case, however, this involves the possibility that "right" will suffer before the ultimate victory, whereas brute force can crash its way to immediate triumph. So it is that the gentleness of the mighty Victor is intimately associated with His triumph.

In all the annals of the nations is there on record one who attained victory by manifesting such consideration for weakness and lowliness as is indicated by the words: "A bruised reed shall He not break, and the smoking flax shall He not quench"?

The structure of the passage (Isa. xlii. 1-4) reveals that the subject is twofold:

(1) The work which Messiah came to accomplish, "JUDGMENT".
(2) The character of the Messiah in its accomplishment, "GENTLENESS".

This has been set out in the complete structure (page 10), but it will not be out of place to reproduce it here.

Isaiah xlii. 1-4.

B | d2 | Judgment to the Gentiles.
e2 | He shall not cry, bruise, quench.
d2 | Judgment unto Truth.
e2 | He shall not fail, nor be discouraged.
d3 | Judgment in the earth.

The theme here is "Judgment", and it is subdivided into three aspects. This "Judgment" is to the Gentiles, it is unto truth, it is in the earth.

It is imperative that we should not misunderstand the meaning of the word "Judgment". Most certainly it does not mean "condemnation" here. That is but one of its meanings and only so when put into exercise in the face of evil. Judgment may be a great blessing, a coveted boon. The Hebrew word mishpat is from shaphat, "To judge". This is the word used for those who "judged" Israel (Judges iii. 10; I Sam. vii. 6). This is the word so frequently used in the prophecies and prayers of the oppressed, who looked for deliverance.

> "To judge the fatherless" (Psa. x. 18).
> "Judge me, O Lord" (Psa. xxvi. 1).
> "Judge me, O God, and plead my cause" (Psa. xliii. 1).

David's prayer reached its consummation in Psalm lxxii. in which he says of his greater Son, "He shall judge the poor of the people" (Psa. lxxii. 4).

While Isaiah sometimes uses the word mishpat in its condemnatory meaning, the bulk of the occurrences are in line with the usage already indicated.

> "Learn to do well; seek judgment, relieve the oppressed, judge the fatherless, plead for the widow" (Isa. i. 17).

Here it is evident that reference to the exhortation to seek judgment involves "relieving the oppressed" and "pleading for the widow".

> "How is the faithful city become an harlot! it was full of judgment; righteousness lodged in it; but now murderers" (Isa. i. 21).

One has but to read on in verses 22 and 23, to see, by contrast, what is implied by "full of judgment".

The manner of the restoration of Israel when that day comes is thus described:

> "And I will restore thy judges as at the first, and thy counselors as at the beginning; afterward thou shalt be called, The city of righteousness, The faithful city. Zion shall be redeemed with judgment" (Isa. i. 26-27).

The opening chapter of Isaiah speaks primarily of Israel, but in the closing section the "Gentiles" are given a place.

> "It is a light thing that Thou shouldest be My Servant to raise up the tribes of Jacob, and to restore the preserved of Israel: I will also give Thee for a light to the Gentiles, that Thou mayest be My salvation unto the end of the earth" (xlix. 6).

But judgment is not only "to the Gentiles"; it is also "unto Truth". An investigation of the meaning of emeth, the Hebrew word translated "Truth", and which gives us our word "Amen", cannot be undertaken now, but it is not without interest to discover that the word is used by Isaiah exactly twelve times, six occurrences coming in i.-xxxix. and six in xl.-lxvi.

Victory by aggression may be swift, but it is short-lived. Truth will and must prevail, but it is slower in achievement, even as the characteristics of the Conqueror are essentially different from those of brute aggression.

> "The smoking flax shall He not quench; He shall bring forth judgment unto truth."

Finally, this judgment shall be set "in the earth". We remember the prophetic cry of the Seraphim: "The fullness of the whole earth is His glory" (Isa. vi. 3, Margin), and the assurance of the millennial hope: "The earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea" (Isa. xi. 9).

The references to the "earth" in Isaiah are far too many to consider here, even as a list, and the study of its meaning and prophetic import must be reserved for a future article. In the passage before us the reference to "judgment in the earth" is balanced by the words, "and the isles shall wait for His law" (Isa. xlii. 4).

The Hebrew "isle" is not necessarily "a piece of land entirely surrounded by water". Jeremiah speaks of "The isles which are beyond the sea", which the margin renders "region by the sea side". The word "isles" indicates the lands inhabited by the Gentiles, without limiting those lands to the physical character of an "island".

Here, with the promise that judgment in the earth shall at last be established, we must close our present study, reserving for our next article the second part of this prophecy which comes under the heading, "WHOM I UPHOLD".

ISAIAH.
#26. Isaiah xl. 12 - xlii. 17.
The Covenant for Israel. The Light for the Gentiles.
pp. 83 - 87

The section of Isa. xlii. which is embraced by the words "I uphold", falls into two parts:

(1) I UPHOLD. RESULT. JUDGMENT (Isa. xlii. 1-4).
(2) I UPHOLD. RESULT. COVENANT (Isa. xlii. 5-8).

We have considered some of the teaching of the first part; let us now give attention to the second.

In an earlier study we have set out the distribution of the word "Covenant" in Isaiah, and have observed that in the former part, chapters i.-xxxix., the breaking of the covenant is prominent, while in the latter part, chapters xl.-lxvi., the making and keeping of the covenant is prominent.

The first occurrence reads: "They have . . . . . broken the everlasting covenant" (Isa. xxiv. 5) and the consequent misery is described:

> "The curse devoured the earth."
> "They that dwell therein are desolate."
> "The inhabitants of the earth are burned."
> "Few men are left" (Isa. xxiv. 6).

The last occurrence reverses all this: "I will make an everlasting covenant with them" (Isa. lxi. 8), and the consequences are expressed in such terms as:

"Beauty for ashes."
"Oil of joy for mourning."
"A garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness."
"Former desolation raised up."
"Everlasting joy shall be upon them" (Isa. lxi. 3-8).

Between these two references we find the utter failure of Israel and the glorious triumph of Christ, and it is the first of these Messianic references to the covenant that must now occupy our attention.

The passage, Isa. xlii. 5-8, falls into two parts. The first part announces the glorious power of the One Who has appointed this covenant; "He that created the heavens" (Isa. xlii. 5). He it is Who upholds His Servant, giving Him for "a covenant of the people" and for "a light of the Gentiles" (Isa. xlii. 6). The second part describes the blessedness of this Servant's work: "To open the blind eyes, to bring out the prisoners from the prison, and them that sit in darkness out of the prison house" (Isa. xlii. 7).

The first and last references to the "covenant" in Isa. i.-xxxix. speak of it as having been broken:

"They have . . . . . broken the everlasting covenant" (Isa. xxiv. 5).
"He hath broken the covenant" (Isa. xxxiii. 8).

The first and last references to the "covenant" in Isa. xl.-lxvi., speak of its establishment:

"I the Lord . . . . . will give Thee for a covenant of the people" (Isa. xlii. 6).
"I will make an everlasting covenant with them" (Isa. lxi. 8).

Moreover, we discover that there is an intended correspondence between Isa. xlii. and lxi. Let us read again xlii. 7, quoted above, and then read Isa. lxi. 1.

"The Spirit of the Lord God is upon Me; because He hath anointed Me to preach good tidings unto the meek; He hath sent Me to bind up the brokenhearted, to proclaim liberty to the captives, and the opening of the prison to them that are bound."

If Matthew, by his quotation in the twelfth chapter, establishes beyond dispute that Isa. xlii. 1-4 is fulfilled in the Person and work of Christ, Luke, in his fourth chapter, also establishes the same of Isa. lxi. 1.

Behind the Gospel is the Law, and behind the Law is the sovereign Creator of heaven and earth, Who not only "spread forth the earth" but "that which cometh out of it". Not only does this almighty Creator supply all things necessary for the sustenance of His creatures, but He is the source of life itself, "He giveth breath unto the people upon it, and spirit to them that walk therein" (Isa. xlii. 5). It is this One, Whose might and Whose right are beyond question, Who called the Messiah and gave Him to the world in His twofold capacity as: "A covenant of the people" and "A light of the Gentiles".

The word translated "covenant" is the Hebrew berith. The origin of this word is obscure, although there are many (as Gesenius) who teach that it is derived from an obsolete root, meaning "to cut", since, in making solemn covenants, it was the custom to pass between the divided parts of the victim (see Gen. xv. 10, 17). Gesenius however contains the following note, in the edition edited by Tregelles:

> "But the idea suggested by Lee deserves attention, viz., that berith is strictly nothing more than eating together, from barah No.2, since among orientals, to eat together is almost the same as to make a covenant of friendship . . . . . in this way we obtain an explanation of the covenant (or eating?) of salt."

As a matter of dispensational truth, observe the distinction between the relationship of Messiah with Israel and with the Gentiles:

> "A covenant of the people,
> A light of the Gentiles" (Isa. xlii. 6).

Since the call of Abraham, there is no record in Scripture of any covenant ever being made by God with a Gentile nation, company or individual. Even the admission of the Gentile to New Covenant blessings during the early ministry of Paul, which at first may appear to be the very essence of the gospel to-day, is, upon examination, found to be hedged about with limitations. It was not so much because the time for Gentile blessing had fully come, but in order, if possible, "to provoke to jealousy" the failing people of Israel, to "provoke to emulation" the true beneficiaries of the New Covenant. Old Testament prophecy and promise never visualize the Gentile coming into full blessing independently of a restored Israel. Consequently, while in the dispensation of the mystery the most glorious figure of the Body, with its equality of members, is used to set forth the relationship of believing Jew and Gentile to one another and to the Lord, the Head, during the period covered by the Acts, the union of Jewish and Gentile believer is likened to the ingrafting of a wild olive into a true olive tree, with admonitions concerning possible consequential Gentile "conceit", and admonitory foreshadowings of the ultimate restoration of the "natural branches" to their place in their own olive tree.

Here, in Isa. xlii., it will be observed that God's intentional order is maintained:

> First, Christ is given for a covenant of the People.
> Secondly, Christ is given for a light of the Gentiles.

But by the time chapter xlix. is reached a change has come over the face of things. Soon will come that great prophetic utterance which declares that "He is despised and rejected of men" (Isa. liii. 3), and the rejection of the Messiah by Israel brought the Gentile into favour before their, originally, allotted time. This can be seen in Isa. xlix.:

> "And now, saith the Lord that formed Me from the womb to be His Servant, to bring Jacob again to Him: Though Israel be not gathered, yet shall I be glorious in the eyes of the Lord, and my God shall be my strength: And He said, It is a light thing that Thou shouldest be my Servant to raise up the tribes of Jacob, and to restore the preserved of Israel: I will also give Thee for a light to the Gentiles, that Thou mayest be My salvation unto the end of the earth" (Isa. xlix. 5, 6).

We may learn a very profitable lesson in "Dispensational Truth" and the value of "Right Division" if we will observe how three writers of the New Testament handle the passages referred to in Isa. xlii. and xlix.

(1) The quotation of Matt. xii.—Matt. xii. approaches the first great crisis of the New Testament, the rejection by Israel of their Messiah and King. In the immediately following chapter "mystery" occurs for the first time in the phrase, "The mysteries of the kingdom of heaven", where parable is employed to hide rather than reveal truth (Matt. xiii. 10-12), and where Israel's rejection, as foretold in Isa. vi. 9, 10, now begins to take place. It is in such a context that Matthew introduces the blessing of the Gentile into his gospel.

According to Matthew's account the Saviour was named "Jesus, for He shall save HIS PEOPLE from their sins" (Matt. i. 21). He was born, to "rule MY PEOPLE Israel" (Matt. ii. 6). It was eventually "This PEOPLE's heart" that waxed gross (Matt. xiii. 15). The Gentiles are not introduced by Matthew in a favourable sense until the citation from Isa. xlii. in Matt. xii. 18, 21. "Not in a favourable sense" is in fact understating the truth, for in Matt. x. there is a definite exclusion of the Gentile: "Go not into the way of the Gentiles" (Matt. x. 5). With Matthew's testimony before us we can therefore safely say that, not until the rejection of Christ by Israel became quite evident, did the Gentile have any part or lot assigned to him in the scheme of salvation.

(3) The quotation of Luke ii.—The designed intentions of two writers is nowhere more clearly evident to the enquirer than in the case of Matthew and Luke. Where Matthew says "kingdom" Luke says "forgiveness of sins" (Matt. iii. 2; Luke iii. 3); where Matthew says "King" Luke says "Saviour" (Matt. ii. 2; Luke ii. 11). Matthew makes no reference to the prophetic utterance of old Simeon. To do so would not further his intention of presenting Christ as "King of the Jews". But Luke inserts it because it does most definitely further his intention to present Christ as Saviour, not only of the people of Israel, but of the Gentiles.

> "A light to lighten the Gentiles, and the glory of Thy people Israel" (Luke ii. 32).

Here, it will be observed, Simeon, who was waiting for the consolation of Israel (Luke ii. 25), is inspired to place the Gentile before Israel. This would have outraged the feelings of the Jewish reader, as may be seen by consulting the effect of "this word", "Gentiles", in Acts xxii. 22; yet in the Gospel of Luke, the companion of Paul, the Apostle to the Gentiles, this order of blessing is in harmony with its message.

(3) The quotation of Acts xiii.—The two halves of the Acts of the Apostles, Acts i.-xii., Peter's ministry, and Acts xiii.-xxviii., Paul's twofold ministry, may be compared with the two presentations of truth by Matthew and Luke just noted.

Acts xiii. corresponds somewhat with Matt. xii., xiii., for there the Apostle says:

> "It was necessary that the word of God should first have been spoken to you: but seeing ye put it from you, and judge yourselves unworthy of everlasting life, lo, we turn to the Gentiles. For so hath the Lord commanded us, saying, I have set thee to be a light of the Gentiles, that thou shouldest be for salvation unto the ends of the earth" (46, 47).

The reader will need no more persuasive argument than that already provided by these three passages, to lead him to see that "dispensational" truth, that "rightly divided" truth, is really the only presentation of truth that is whole, complete, and that does not mislead by misapplication.

Returning to Isa. xlii., we observe that this "covenant" for the people, this "light" for the Gentiles, is expanded in the verse that follows:--

"To open the blind eyes, to bring out the prisoners from the prison, and them that sit in darkness out of the prison house" (Isa. xlii. 7).

This twofold figure of "the blind" and "the prisoner" is found in other parts of Isaiah, but for the time, its study must be postponed.

There awaits us one section which is indicated in the structure, C | xlii. 8-17. Ye are gods, which is an exposition of the words that link the two parts of the structure together, namely, those contained in verse 8:

"I am the Lord: that is My name: and My glory will I not give to another, neither My praise to graven images" (Isa. xlii. 8).

The prophet repeats and amplifies what he has already said concerning the futility of image worship, once more concluding on a note of wondrous grace:

"I will bring the blind by a way that they knew not; I will lead them in paths that they have not known: I will make darkness light before them, and crooked things straight. These things will I do unto them, and not forsake them" (Isa. xlii. 16).

We are now approaching the further unfolding of the Divine purpose contained in the chapters that still await us, and to the blessed task of studying and understanding this we must devote ourselves in the subsequent articles of this series.

ISAIAH.
#27. Isaiah xlii. 12 - xlv. 15.
Restoration Promised, Conditioned, Foreshadowed.
Restoration Promised (xlii. 18 - xliii. 9).
pp. 123 - 126

The preceding section of Isaiah, which we have just completed, dealt particularly with Israel and the Messiah under the common appellation of "My Servant". The section now before us considers Israel and their Messiah under the title of "My Witnesses". We found, as a severe and awful contrast, that the worship of graven images was placed over against true service, and, once again, we shall find that idolatry is the black background against which true witness is depicted. Moreover, in connection both with Witness and Idolatry, Isaiah reiterates the glorious fact that God is One, and that there is none else. This constitutes the positive witness of Israel, which is definitely assailed by the introduction of false gods.

If we left the matter there, however, it would both misrepresent Isaiah's prophecy and manifest an ignorance of his great purpose. While positive witness to the fact that there is one God is of itself an essential element in all worship and service, we are nevertheless reminded by James that demons believe the fact yet tremble (James ii. 19). In Isaiah's prophecy Israel's witness and the doctrine of the unique supremacy of the Deity, are a means to an end. The end before Isaiah and before the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob; the end to which Israel themselves are witnesses, is "Restoration", the key-note of which has already been sounded in our meditation upon the opening words of Isa. xl., and we shall find a three-fold recurrence of it in the section now before us, viz., Isa. xlii. 18 - xlv. 15, each division of which is introduced by the subject of Restoration.

First we have a lament, that although Israel have been robbed and spoiled, "none saith, Restore" but, where man fails, God, in His mercy, triumphs, as is shown by the immediately following sweeping promise of Isa. xliii. 5, 6. But whether He deals with Man (Adam), Men (the individual), Nations (generally spoken of as Gentiles) or the Nation, Israel, God deals with them as with responsible, moral agents. Israel are not to be taken by sheer force; dragged unwillingly from the East, the West, the North and the South, and dumped into the land of Palestine regardless of their sins or of their desires. They are called upon to "Return", and Israel have been "Redeemed", and it is upon the basis that Restoration proceeds (Isa. xliii. 9 - xliv. 27). The third section of the prophecy differs from the bulk of the book, and introduces an historic character, Cyrus, the king of Persia. He takes his place in the foreshadowing of Israel's final restoration under their true King and Shepherd, as Sennacherib's fate foreshadowed the ultimate overthrow of the last world conqueror, the Beast of the Apocalypse.

Isaiah xlii. 18 - xlv. 15.
RESTORATION: Promised, Conditioned and Foreshadowed.

A1 | xlii. 18 - xliii. 9. RESTORATION Promised. |
"This is a people robbed and spoiled . . . and none saith, Restore (xlii. 22).
"Fear not: for I am with thee: I will bring thy seed from the east, and gather thee from the west. I will say to the north, Give up; and to the south, Keep not back: bring my sons from far, and my daughters from the ends of the earth" (xliii. 5, 6).

A2 | xliii. 9 - xliv. 27. RESTORATION Conditioned. |
"Return unto Me; for I have redeemed thee" (xliv. 22).
"That saith to Jerusalem, Thou shalt be inhabited; and to the cities of Judah, Ye shall be built, and I will raise up the decayed places thereof" (xliv. 26).

A1 | xliv. 28 - xlv. 15. RESTORATION Foreshadowed. |
"That saith of Cyrus, He is my shepherd, and shall perform all my pleasure; even saying to Jerusalem, Thou shalt be built, and to the temple, Thy foundation shall be laid" (xliv. 28).
"He shall build my city, and he shall let go my captives" (xlv. 13).

We must devote the remainder of our limited space to the consideration of the first of these three sections, namely "Restoration promised", and it will be well if the structure of this section is before us from the start.

Isaiah xlii. 18 - xliii. 9.
RESTORATION Promised.

A | xlii. 18-20. | a | Call to deaf and blind.
b | Perfect.
B | xlii. 21-25. | c | A people robbed and spoiled.
d | The law magnified and disobeyed.
e | Set on fire . . . burned.
B | xliii. 1-7. | c | Israel, created for His glory.
d | Redeemed.
e | Not be burned . . . flame not kindle.
A | xliii. 8, 9. | a | Call to deaf and blind.
b | Justified.

The chief interest is found in the central members, where Israel under law is contrasted with Israel under grace. But before we reach this portion the peculiar difficulty of verses 18-20 must be faced. Who are the "deaf and the blind" in these verses? Do they refer alone to Israel, as some teach? Do they refer alone to the Messiah, as other teach? or do they refer to both Israel and their Messiah, as yet others teach? Upon first reading, it is perhaps excusable to think of Israel's Messiah, rather than of Israel the nation, as being implied in the words, "Who is blind as he that is perfect?" (Isa. xlii. 19). Yet, if Meshullam (Perfect) must of necessity refer only to the Messiah and not to Israel, the same argument would apply in the case of the title Jeshuran (the Darling Upright One) of Isa. xliv. 2. Nevertheless we have the warrant of the law of Moses that Jeshuran was a title of Israel, and that even Jeshuran "waxed fat and kicked". If the "Darling Upright One" of the Lord could thus respond there is no insuperable obstacle to believing that the same people under the title of Meshullam (Perfect) should fail to see or hear. The title "Perfect" is given to Israel much in the same way that it has been adopted by the follower of Mahomet, who is called a "Musselman" or "Moslem", that is, one who is "complete". It was Israel's boast that they were Meshullam, but it was Paul's accusation that, while he conceded the claim to superior understanding, it revealed the utter darkness of their hearts.

> "Behold, thou art called a Jew, and restest in the law, and makest thy boast in God, and knowest His will, and approvest the things that are more excellent, being instructed out of the law, and art confident that thou thyself art a guide to the blind, a light of them that are in darkness, an instructor of the foolish, a teacher of babes, which hast the form of knowledge and of the truth in the law" (Rom. ii. 17-20).

Here Paul recognizes the right that Israel has to the title "Meshullam" but he continues:--

> "Thou therefore which teachest another, teachest thou not thyself? . . . . . thou that makest thy boast of the law, through breaking the law dishonourest thou God? For the name of God is blasphemed among the Gentiles through you, as it is written" (Rom. ii. 21-24).

It is evident that though Israel is Meshullam, or Perfect, yet in deed and in attitude they were they very reverse, thus the paradox of Isa. xlii. 18-20 finds its solution in them. Israel dishonoured their God by their disobedience to the law,

> "The Lord is well pleased for His righteousness sake; He will magnify the law and make it honourable" (Isa. xlii. 21).

What Israel failed to accomplish, Christ has done. The blindness and deafness which is here charged against Israel is a frequently recurring indictment. As a result of their blindness and deafness Israel had become the prey and spoil of other nations, yet they do not seem to have "considered" this matter (Isa. i. 3).

> "Who gave Jacob for a spoil and Israel to the robbers? Did not the Lord, He against Whom we have sinned?" (Isa. xlii. 24).

So blind were they that "none saith, Restore" (Isa. xlii. 22). Consequently upon this people came the fury and anger of the Lord, manifested in "the strength of battle", but though the nation was "set on fire round about, yet he knew it not; and it burned him, yet he laid it not to heart" (Isa. xlii. 25). Under the law, Israel failed, and failed utterly. Restoration was impossible. Blind, dear, blunted, hardened, they laid not these things to heart. The structure of this dark section is as follows. Its central note is, "No restoration", which indeed is the doleful prospect of all under law.

Isaiah xlii. 21-25.

B	xlii. 21-25.	a	The Lord is well pleased.
		b	The law, magnified.
		c	A people robbed and spoiled.
		d	None saith RESTORE.
		c	Jacob a spoil. Israel robbed.
		b	The law, not obeyed.
		a	The fury of His anger.

"But now" (Isa. xliii. 1). Isaiah introduces the change from law to grace, as, years afterward, Paul did. Israel is now viewed from the Divine standpoint. The purpose of the ages must be considered quite as much as the exhibition of justice and retribution. Israel has been "created" and "formed" for a specific purpose, and if law-keeping and the flesh failed, God, out of the treasures of His grace, would provide redemption.

> "I have redeemed thee, I have called thee by name, thou art Mine."

The structure places the obdurate insensibility to "fire" and "burning" in Isa. xlii. 25, in correspondence with the blessed immunity to such devouring agencies under grace. The punishment permitted against Israel in the ordinary course of events, would have ended in the utter extinction of them as a people. But there were other factors at work. Side by side with retributive justice went restoring and redeeming love, and it is the triumph of redeeming love that Isaiah celebrates in his glorious prophecy. So it is that, to the same people that are addressed in Isa. xlii. 18-25, come the promises of Isa. xliii. 1-7. To save space we omit the structure of Isa. xliii. 1-7 here, but it will be found in "The Companion Bible". When we read the blessed words:--

> "Fear not for I have redeemed thee" (Isa. xliii. 1), or "I am the Lord thy God, the Holy one of Israel, thy Saviour" (Isa. xliii. 3);

it is very natural for us, in the light of the New Testament, to invest the words "redeemed" and "Saviour" with their full evangelical meaning. While, at that time, this could only be in purpose we have but to read on to the end of the third verse, to find the precious word "ransom" (Heb. kopher, "atonement") used in connection with Israel's deliverance from the Persian captivity.

> "I gave Egypt for thy ransom, Ethiopia and Seba for thee" (Isa. xliii. 3).

We have already learned, that in the eyes of the Lord

> "The nations are as a drop of a bucket, and are counted as the small dust of the balance" (Isa. xl. 15).

Egypt, Ethiopia and Seba were not too big a ransom to compensate for the deliverance of Israel, "since", as the Lord said to them,

> "Thou was precious in My sight, thou hast been honourable, and I have loved thee, therefore will I give men for thee, and people for thy life" (Isa. xliii. 4).

Though Israel are at present blind, they "have eyes". Though this favoured people are at present deaf, they "have ears", and they shall yet, by redeeming love, see and hear and fulfil their appointed role as the Lord's witness (Isa. xliii. 9, 10). We must conclude our present study at this point and look forward to pursuing the theme of Israel's restoration when we come to deal with Isa. xliii. 9 - xliv. 27.

ISAIAH.
#28. The Lamb of God (Isa. lii. 13 - lvi. 8).
The Material sorted and the Structure of Isa. lii. 13 - liii. 12 discovered.
pp. 185 - 188

Isa. xl. opens with the words "Comfort ye" and the section before us provides the only solid basis for true comfort. To Israel, and indeed to us all, are addressed the words and where shall the "afflicted" look for comfort, but away to Him Who was "afflicted" as their substitute? (Isa. liii. 7). This portion of Scripture includes Isa. liii., the "holy of holies" of all the prophets. Whenever we open the sacred page we are on holy ground; whenever we read the Law and the Prophets we read the scriptures that speak of Christ, but there are some passages that stand out prominently in this blessed particular, and the chapter before us was written in the foreknowledge of Calvary, of its suffering and of its triumph.

> "O thou afflicted, tossed with tempest, and not comforted . . . . ." (Isa. liv. 11);

The section we are to study is lii. 13 - lvi. 8 and it divides into four parts.

A | lii. 13 - liii. 12. He bare the sin of many. His soul an offering.
B | liv. Restoration. Seed inherit Gentiles. No weapon shall prosper.
A | lv. 1-7. He will abundantly pardon. Your soul—fatness.
B | lv. 8 - lvi. 8. Gathering "others" "all people". Word shall prosper.

Before studying any passage in detail we seek the literary structure, for by so doing we discover the scope and the argument of the passage, and without either structure, scope or argument, our comments must degenerate to a mere list of unconnected notes on individual words. The desire to present to the reader the structure of this great passage, and our ability to satisfy that desire are, however, two widely differing propositions. We do not propose asking the reader to share with us in this arduous task, neither can we expect any who have not pursued this path, to be able to enter into the joy of its discovery. We give a few indications as to how the structure grew, and leave it with the earnest reader to test, to use and to enjoy as grace may be given. In the first place, we noted the passage opens with the words, "Behold My Servant" (Isa. lii. 13) and we remembered that after the record is given of His substitutionary sufferings, this blessed Servant is again brought before us.

> "By His knowledge shall My righteous Servant justify many, for He shall bear their iniquities" (Isa. liii. 11).

A moment's meditation brought another feature to light. The Hebrew word translated "To bear" is Nasa and means primarily "To lift up". The word "extolled" is also a translation of Nasa. Concerning these and other Hebrew words we do not offer any explanation, we are but noting the beginnings of the structural arrangement of material, and record our first note.

> "My Servant." "Extolled." Nasa.
> "My Righteous Servant." "Bear." Nasa.

We now observe that nations and kings are referred to in lii. 15, and we read of them being astonished at something totally unexpected. We find something equally unexpected after the sorrow, the humiliation and the meekness in Isa. liii. 4-10 Division of the Spoil with the Great and the Strong, Isa. liii. 12. These features however we kept in reserve, while examining the remaining verses. We knew that the words "The Lord hath laid on Him the iniquity of us all" (liii. 6), and "He made intercession for the transgressors" (Isa. liii. 12) employed the same Hebrew word paga, and this is noted in the first volume of the Berean Expositor in an article entitled "Wondrous meeting places", where these passages are retranslated:

> "The Lord hath made to meet on Him the iniquity of us all" and
> "He bare the sin of many, and made a meeting place for transgressors."

We have now two focal pairs of correspondences.

A Servant—extolled Nasa.
B Meeting place—Paga.
A Servant—bear Nasa.
B Meeting place—Paga.

We observed that both the sinner and the Saviour are likened to "sheep" which, together with the most evident emphasis upon His sufferings for the people, filled the remainder of the space with the wonder of His "Substitutionary sufferings". Returning to lii. 14, 15 and liii. 1-3 we discovered that the word "Visage" and the word "Beauty" were translations of the same Hebrew word, as also are the two words "Heard" (lii. 15) and "Report" (liii. 1). We therefore set before the reader and commend to his prayerful study and service the following structure of this glorious passage.

Isaiah lii. 13 - liii. 12.

A | lii. 13 - liii. 11-. MY SERVANT. EXTOLLED (Nasa).

As may have been expected, a number of quotations are made in the New Testament from Isa. lii. & liii., and we will conclude this opening survey of the material before us by indicating the passages quoted.

Isa. lii. 15. "For that which had not been told them shall they see; and that which they had not heard shall they consider."

This verse is quoted in Rom. xv. 21, in connection with the desire of the apostle to "preach the gospel, not where Christ was named lest I should build upon another man's foundation" (Rom. xv. 20).

> Isa. liii. 1. "Who hath believed our report? and to whom is the arm of the Lord revealed?"

This passage is quoted by John, in his Gospel, xii. 38; and the first sentence is quoted by Paul in Rom. x. 16. John xii. is the chapter which closes the witness of Christ in the world as man, and reveals His rejection.

> Isa. liii. 4. "Surely He hath borne our griefs, and carried our sorrows."

This passage is quoted in Matt. viii. 17 where it reads:--

> "Himself took our infirmities, and bare our sicknesses."

> Isa. liii. 5. "And with His stripes we are healed?"

This is quoted in I Pet. ii. 24 "By Whose stripes ye were healed". It is useful to note that Peter, by reason of the fact that he was writing an epistle changes the "we" of Isa. liii. to "ye" in order to apply the passage to his immediate hearers.

Isa. liii. 7, 8. This rather lengthy passage is quoted in Acts viii. 32, 33. A number of most important questions are raised upon comparing the O.T. original with the N.T. quotations, which will be considered in their place. The one and most important contribution which we would emphasize here is in the sequel

> "Then Philip opened his mouth, and began at the same scripture, and PREACHED UNTO HIM JESUS" (Acts viii. 35).

> Isa. liii. 9. "Because He had done no violence, neither was any deceit in His mouth."

The Hebrew word translated "violence" is translated hamartian by the LXX, and this is adopted by Peter. He also adds the verb "was found" which makes no material difference.

> Isa. liii. 12. "And He was numbered with the transgressors."

This is quoted in Mark xv. 28 and Luke xxii. 37. These seven passages are quoted by different writers of the N.T. and reveal the importance that this chapter holds in their estimate, for although at first sight seven quotations do not seem many—yet no other chapter in Isaiah nor in the Old Testament is quoted so many times.

We are now ready to give this majestic chapter something of the attention that is its due. May we never forget that its greatest glory is to lead our hearts upward from the contemplation of the letter, to Him "The Word made flesh", "The Son of God Who loved me and gave Himself for me".

ISAIAH.

#29. "Wherefore God hath highly exalted Him" (lii. 13).

pp. 227 - 229

"Behold My Servant shall deal prudently, He shall be exalted and extolled and be very high."

With these words, the great sacrificial chapter of Isaiah opens. Not with sorrow or grief, not with humiliation, not with references to death and the grave, but with exaltation, with being extolled, and with being very high. In earlier chapters we have read of this Servant of the Lord (Isa. xlii. 1, 19; xlix. 3, 6), and the prophecies have gathered strength and clarity as this climax drew near. Our attention is drawn first to what this Servant of the Lord does, "He shall deal prudently", and then what shall be done to Him "He shall be exalted". The word translated "deal prudently" is given in the A.V. margin an alternative meaning "prosper". This, however, must not be understood in the same sense as the word "prosper" in Isa. liii. 10 where a different Hebrew word is employed. Sakal, is rendered in most of its occurrences by the words "wise" or "understanding" but in the Hiphel or causative, it is translated eight times "prosper". Jeremiah uses this word in a prophetic utterance that looks to the same glorious day of the Messiah as does Isa. lii. 13.

> "Behold the days come saith the Lord, that I will raise unto David a righteous Branch, and a King shall reign and prosper, and shall execute judgment and justice in the earth. In His days Judah shall be saved, and Israel shall dwell safely; and this is His name whereby He shall be called 'THE LORD OUR RIGHTEOUSNESS'." (Jer. xxiii. 5, 6).

It is moreover written of both Joshua and Hoshea (names that foreshadowed the "Saviour" "Jesus") that they "prospered" (Josh. i. 7; II Kings xviii. 7). He Who is the Wisdom of God is also the Power of God (I Cor. i. 24), His Wisdom is dynamic, it "prospers" and prevails.

So Isa. lii. 13 opens "My Servant shall prosper", and the seal was set upon His glorious "success" (as this word is translated in Josh. i. 8) by His resurrection and ascension.

> "He shall be exalted, and extolled and be very high."

The Prophet has no intention here of making three different phases in this exaltation, it is the overflowing joy of the prophetic vision, using a well known figure of speech Anabasis or "gradual ascent" whereby an increase of emphasis is made by a rising series of successive words, phrases and sentences. We must nevertheless acquaint ourselves with all three words, in order that the Divine intention in their use may be perceived.

"Exalted", Hebrew Rum. It will be remembered that Abraham before his name was changed (Gen. xvii. 5), was Abram made up of Ab "Father" and Rum or Ram "High" and "Exalted". So also the place names, Ramah and Ramoth "A lofty place" (I Sam. xix. 18; Deut. iv. 43). Some of its usages in Isaiah alone will indicate sufficiently its distinctive meaning. Exalted as a "highway" (Isa. xlix. 11); as one of the cedars of Lebanon (Isa. ii. 13); as the Lord sitting upon a throne "high" and lifted up (Isa. vi. 1), or as "The High" and lofty One that inhabiteth Eternity (Isa. lvii. 15). Something of what is involved in the exaltation of the term in the blasphemous words of Lucifer, Son of the Morning.

> "I will ascend into heaven, I will exalt my throne above the stars of God . . . . . I will ascend above the heights of the clouds: I will be like the Most High" (Isa. xiv. 12-14).

The LXX translates this by the Greek verb Hupsoo which is fourteen times rendered "exalted" and six times "lift up" in the N.T.

> "Being by the right hand of God exalted" (Acts ii. 33).
> "The God of our fathers raised up Jesus, Whom ye slew and hanged on a tree. Him hath God exalted with His right hand to be a Prince and a Saviour, for to give repentance to Israel, and forgiveness of sins" (Acts v. 30-31).

"Extolled", Hebrew Nasa. This is a most extensive root, signifying "To bear, take or lift up". It is found in Isaiah in combination with the previous word Rum, several times.

Cedars of Lebanon "High and lifted up" Rum and Nasa (Isa. ii. 13).

I saw also the Lord "High" and "lifted up" (Isa. vi. 1).

Thus saith the "High" and "lofty One" (Isa. lvii. 15).

Another suggestive passage in Isaiah is "every valley shall be exalted". These are passages in which the verb Nasa is used in its reflexive form. In the simple active form, this word is used in Isa. liii. 4 and 12 "He hath borne our griefs", "He bare the sin of many", where instead of Himself being lifted up or "extolled" He is seen "lifting up" the burden of our sins. The LXX here uses the word doxazo "to glorify". Those readers who are acquainted with the Gospel of John, and especially John xiii.-xvii. will realize how fully the Saviour entered into these prophetic utterances concerning Himself.

> "Now is the Son of Man glorified and God is glorified in Him" (John xiii. 31).
> "Glorify Thy Son, that Thy Son also may glorify Thee" (John xvii. 1).

It will be seen how fully also Peter entered into these prophetic words. In Acts ii. 33 and v. 31, he used, as we have seen the word "exalted", but in Acts iii. 13 in a similar context he uses this word "glorify":

> "The God of our fathers, hath glorified His Son Jesus, Whom ye delivered up and denied in the presence of Pilate, when he was determined to let Him go."

"And be very high." Here the words used in the original are the verb Gabah and the adverb Meod. Just as we found Lucifer using the word "exalted" so we find written of the Prince of Tyre

> "Thine hearts is lifted up . . . . . thou hast set thine heart as the heart of God" (Ezek. xxviii. 5, 6).

and further to reveal the parallel intended between the Usurper and the Rightful Lord, we find the word "astonied" or "astonished" used of each (Isa. lii. 14; Ezek. xxviii. 19). Gabah is used of the "heart" II Chron. xxvi. 16; "the heavens" (Isa. lv. 9); "the Lord of hosts" (Isa. v. 16), and of Saul who was higher than any of the people (I Sam. x. 23).

> "Behold, said the Lord, "Behold My Servant, He shall be exalted, and extolled and be very high."

The LXX recognizes that these are not to be considered as three separate statements, positions or degrees, but an intensive way of speaking of His exceeding exaltation, it reads "He shall be exalted and glorified exceedingly".

We must not look upon the exaltation of the Servant of the Lord here, as though it were the effect of the prospering of the first part of the verse. Rather is the second clause to be read as an expansion, a parallel, with the first. In this verse the suffering and humiliation are passed, the glory fills the vision. Here, in Isa. lii. 13 - liii. 12 we have Exaltation, followed by a review of past humiliation, succeeded once again by exaltation, this time manifested by dividing the spoil.

We turn to the N.T. and discover another passage which sets before us the blessed sequel to His condescension. It will enable us to appreciate the antichristian blasphemy of Lucifer or the Cherub that fell; it will enable us to understand that the words "The high and lofty One" Who inhabiteth Eternity, were perfectly fitting to Him Who was on earth known as the Man of Sorrows, for He was more than mere man, He was the God-Man. "Behold My Servant" said the Lord, not only in Isa. lii., but in Phil. ii.

> "Who being in the form of God, thought it not robbery to be equal with God, But made Himself of no reputation . . . . . the form of a servant . . . . . He humbled Himself (see Isa. liii. 8 LXX, 'In His humiliation His judgment was taken away') . . . . . unto death, even the death of the Cross. Wherefore God hath highly exalted Him (huperupsoo) and given Him the name which is above every name; that in the name of Jesus every knee should bow" (Phil. ii. 6-10).

Stress is laid in the N.T on the exceedingly exalted position now occupied by the Ascended Lord.

"He ascended up far above all heavens" (Eph. iv. 10) so far above that He might "fill all things". He has "passed through" (dierchomai) the heavens (Heb. iv. 14); He is "made higher than the heavens" hupsiloteros "more exalted" (Heb. vii. 26).

Thus does prophet and apostle delight to honour Him, Who for our sakes stooped so low. It is good that at the opening of this chapter of unprecedented suffering we should be taken as it were with Peter, James and John to the Mount of Transfiguration, and there with Moses and Elijah become "eye-witnesses" of His majesty, before we descend with Him into the vale of tears that led to Calvary's Cross.

The Gospel of JOHN.

#29. The link between the third and fourth sign (v. 16 - 47). The Sabbath and Sabbatarianism.

pp. 21 - 25

The conflict that arose over the healing of the impotent man arose, not in connection with the nature of the cure, but entirely in connection with the Pharisees' attitude to the Sabbath:

> "And therefore did the Jews persecute Jesus, and sought to slay Him, because He had done these things on the sabbath day" (John v. 16).

The Lord's defence is brief but full: "My Father worketh hitherto, and I work" (John v. 17). This outrages the Jews more than ever, and we read that:

> "Therefore the Jews sought the more to kill Him, because He not only had broken the sabbath, but said also the God was His Father, making Himself equal with God" (John v. 18).

This double charge is met by a longer explanatory defence given in verses 19-30, in which the equality of the Son is demonstrated and proved. This appeal to the evidence of His Own works and appointment is supplemented by an appeal to the witness of John the Baptist, the Father, the Scriptures generally, and the writings of Moses. The Lord also speaks of the blinding power of the Jews' self-seeking spirit, a spirit in marked contrast to His Own (John v. 19 and 30). An appeal to the evidence of the Scriptures brings the section to an end (John v. 31-47).

The subject-matter of this section lies very near the heart of all truth, and we must spare no pains in our endeavour to understand its teaching. Let us first seek, by grace, to discover the structure of this great controversy, for if we can once perceive the underlying structure, an examination of the details can then be pursued with less risk of confusion. Following our usual custom, a custom justified by results over many years, let us consider first the large outline, and then the subdivisions later:

John v. 16 - 47.

A | 16-30. W O R K S. |
Opposition arising out of the Lord's attitude to the sabbath day and His claim to equality with the Father, met by the evidence of His works.

A | 31-47. W O R D. |
This evidence of His works is supplemented by the witness of John the Baptist and the Scriptures with a comment on the reason for Jewish blindness.

Taking now each of these large sections separately, we find the progress of the argument marked by the following subdivisions:

A | 16. Jewish opposition.
The Sabbath.
B | 17. The defence. "My Father worketh hitherto, and I work."
A | 18. Jewish opposition intensified.
The Sabbath and the claim to equality with God.
B | 19-30. The defence. An expansion of the defence given in verse 17, with special reference to the question of equality with God.

In the second section we find the following subdivision of the subject:

A | 31. Witness concerning Myself. True.
A | 32-47. The witness of others. True.

The Witness of Others (John v. 32-47).

A1 | 33-36. The witness of John the Baptist "concerning Me" (ho marturon peri emou).
B1 | 36-38. The Sent One. "Ye believe not."
A2 | 39, 40. The witness of the Scriptures
"concerning Me" (hai marturousai peri emou).
B2 | 41-44. The one in his own name. "How can ye believe?"
A3 | 45-47. The witness of Moses
"concerning Me" (peri emou egrapsen).

Here we have a threefold witness "concerning Me", but the witness was not received. The witness of John the Baptist was only received "for a season". The witness of the Scriptures was nullified because even though the Scriptures were "searched", those who searched them never came to the Lord of Whom these Scriptures testified. And thirdly, the Jews were actually persecuting the Lord out of zeal for "Moses" in whom they trusted, and yet Moses was one of those who wrote of Him.

In the two sections marked B1 and B2 the Lord reveals the reason for Israel's blindness: (1) they had not the word of God abiding in them and (2) they received honour from man, and did not seek that honour which comes from God only—and this blinded their eyes to the value of the evidences before them.

The most important subdivision of this great section is the defence that occupies verses 19-30. This has a most wonderful structure which we will reserve until we have considered those passages that lead up to it. The detailed analysis of the second great division (31-47) must also await the time when we arrive at it in the course of our studies. Let us now turn our attention to the opposition indicated in verses 16 and 18, so that the way may be cleared for the consideration of the great defence found in verses 19-30.

The words sabbata, sabbaton and prosabbaton, translated "sabbath day", "sabbath" and "day before the sabbath", occur in the Gospels 49 times (7*7). Not only is there evidence of intention here in the multiple of seven, but we also find that the expression "the first day of the week", sabbata (the exact translation of the original we do not now question) occurs seven times in the N.T. John, also, uses the word sabbaton seven times in connection with the healing of the impotent man (John v. 9, 10, 16, 18; vii. 22, 23).

We shall never understand the bitter animosity created over the observance or non-observance of the Sabbath, if we do not know something of the teaching of the Rabbis, and the dominant place the Sabbath occupied in the life and heart of every orthodox Jew.

> "It had become the most distinctive and the most passionately reverenced of all ordinances which separated the Jew from the Gentile as a peculiar people. It was at once the sign of their exclusive privileges, and the centre of their barren formalism. Their traditions, their patriotism, even their obstinacy, were all enlisted in its scrupulous maintenance . . . . . Their devotion to it was only deepened by the universal ridicule, inconvenience and loss which it entailed upon them in the heathen world" (Farrar).

Turning now to the first reference to the Sabbath in the Gospels, we read, in Matt. xii.:

> "And at that time Jesus went on the sabbath day through the corn; and His disciples were an hungered, and began to pluck the ears of corn, and to eat. But when the Pharisees saw it, they said unto Him, Behold, Thy disciples do that which is not lawful to do upon the sabbath day" (Matt. xii. 1, 2).

The Rabbis by no means taught that on the Sabbath men should fast or practice self-denial over their food; on the contrary, they interpreted the words "Thou shalt call the sabbath a delight" to mean that extra food, and daintier food should be eaten:

> "He that feasts thrice on the sabbath, shall be delivered from the calamities of the Messiah, from the judgment of hell, and from the war of God and Magog" (Maimon).

The disciples were satisfying their hunger with a few ears of barley. The Pharisees could not object to the nature of their food, except that it was poor and coarse, and the fact that the disciples were hungry shows that they had observed the custom of abstaining from food on the Sabbath day until the morning prayers of the synagogue were over. Moreover, the Pharisees were not raising any legal objection to the disciples taking a few ears of corn, for that was a lawful act:

> "When thou comest into standing corn of thy neighbour, then thou mayest pluck the ears with thy hand; but thou shalt not move a sickle unto thy neighbour's standing corn" (Deut. xxiii. 25).

The whole question was the lawfulness or otherwise of plucking ears of corn on the Sabbath. The tradition reads:

> "He that reaps on the Sabbath, though never so little, is guilty" (Maimon).

It may well be objected that plucking a few ears of corn is not "reaping". But, in the Rabbinical tradition the two things were classed together:

> "And to pluck the ears of corn is a kind of reaping" (Maimon).

As the Saviour well knew, this simple act was punishable by death; hence His intervention on His disciples' behalf.

> "The works whereby a man is guilty of stoning and cutting off . . . . . are either primitive or derivative" (Maimon).

There were 39 "primitive" kinds of work, which if done presumptuously on the Sabbath rendered a man liable to death—including ploughing, sowing and reaping. The "derivative" works were, for example, "digging"—for that was a sort of ploughing, and "plucking" ears of corn—for that was a sort of reaping. Knowing that death by stoning was the punishment for this action, if done presumptuously, the Saviour interposes to show that they had been moved the necessity of hunger, and not by contempt for the Law or Jewish scruples. He then cites the example of David and the priests (Matt. xii. 3-5).

In verse 5 the Lord refers to the fact that "the priests in the temple profane the sabbath and are blameless". The traditional law concerning the working of the priests on the sabbath reads:

> "The servile work, which is done in the holy things, is not servile" (Hieros. Schab).
> "There is no sabbatism at all in the temple" (Maimon).

In verse 6-8 we have the Lord's first great claim recorded in Matthew:

> "But I say unto you, That in this place is One greater than the temple . . . . . For the son of man is Lord even of the sabbath day" (Matt. xii. 6-8).

And Mark, in his Gospel, adds the significant words: "The sabbath was made for man, and not man for the sabbath" (Mark ii. 27).

Here then were two related claims, stupendous in their sublimity, and far-reaching in their effect upon subsequent doctrine. The Son of man was Lord of the sabbath day, and the sabbath day was made for the sons of men. No wonder such words were offensive in the ears of those whose teaching bound heavy burdens upon men, and who made void the law by their traditions.

Immediately following this incident, and as though to confirm His claim, comes the record of the healing of the man with a withered hand. The Lord's attention is drawn to this man by the Pharisees themselves, "that they might accuse Him" (Matt. xii. 10). He replies to their question by referring to their own laws. A sheep, if fallen into a pit, could be released on the sabbath, and the Lord knew only too well the kind of subterfuge that enabled the Pharisees to evade even his own laws, e.g., "He that hath a sore throat, let him not gargle it with oil"—but he was permitted to "swallow down the oil", and so on, through a whole series of laws and their evasion. Rejecting their pettifogging scruples, the Lord continues:

> "How much then is a man better than a sheep? Wherefore it is lawful to do well on the sabbath days" (Matt. xii. 12).

And, suiting the action to the word, the Lord commands the man with the withered hand to stretch it forth.

In contrast with this beneficent act, the Pharisees hold a council "how they might destroy Him". And so the enmity that bore the bitter fruit of the cross was sown in the soil of a perverted sabbatarianism.

It is no accident that the man's hand was "withered". The word is used again in Matt. xiii. 6 and xxi. 19, 20. The Pharisees' whole conception of the law was dry and withered. They had never learned the "meaning" of the words: "I will have mercy, and not sacrifice" (Matt. xii. 7).

In view of the Jews' attitude towards the sabbath day, there may have been more in the Lord's question to the impotent man than at first appears. The words "Wilt thou be made whole?" may have implied the unspoken thought, Wilt thou be made whole on the sabbath, with all that it may bring with it? The command to the man to take up his bed and walk was a further example of the Lord's dominion over the sabbath, and His disregard for the scruples of the Pharisees. According to their traditions:

> "Whoever on the sabbath carries out anything either from a private place to a public, or from a public place to a private, he is bound to offer a sacrifice for his sin, but if presumptuously, he is punished by cutting off, and being stoned" (Schabb).

We must give fuller consideration to the corresponding sabbath day controversy in John ix. when we come to the sign of the healing of the man born blind. Sufficient, we trust, has been said to enable the reader to understand the great difference between the Divine intention of the sabbath as taught by the Lord in word and deed, and the barren, lifeless, merciless imposition of the tradition of the elders. This exclusive, withered, merciless sabbatarian spirit still lingers among some Christians even to-day. Such believers no doubt mean well, but they have never entered into the spirit of Him Who is Lord even of the sabbath.

Time will not permit us to deal here with Paul's attitude towards the observance of "days" and "sabbaths". We must be content with the suggestion that the reader should study for himself, as a supplement to the present article, the Apostle's words in Rom. xiv., Gal. iv., and Col. ii.

#30. The link between the third and fourth sign (v. 16 - 47). The relationship of the "Son" and what it entails. pp. 65 - 70

Instead of acknowledging that He had in any way transgressed the law by bidding the healed man carry his bed on the sabbath day, the Lord went further and associated Himself and His actions with God Himself.

"But Jesus answered them, My Father worketh hitherto, and I work" (John v. 17).

When dealing with Divine truth there is a great need to realize and distinguish the relative from the absolute. For example, holiness is expressed by the Hebrew word qodesh, which primarily means "separation". From the point of view of man, this idea of "separation" is most important, for he is surrounded by so much evil that one of the first elements in practical sanctification is separateness. We must however avoid the error of transferring this idea to the full conception of holiness when applied to God. Was God not holy before sin entered into the universe? Most surely. Were not the angels holy? They were. Would this primal holiness know anything of "separation"? Most certainly not. Would this primal holiness therefore be lower than the present manifestation? Surely no. So, from man's point of view, the great feature that marks off the sabbath day from the remaining six is that on that day man should do no work. This, however, is because man needs to recuperate; needs to have time to think on work and ways that are higher than those which occupy the greater part of his time. Can we conceive, however, that there is any essential moral or spiritual difference in the work that God does on Monday as compared with that done on Sunday or Saturday? To ask the question is to expose its folly.

The Pharisees had fastened upon the necessary observation of rest from toil that man's nature demanded, if the sabbath were to be enjoyed, and made it contradict the very purpose of its institution. If all were as holy, as good, as merciful as the Son of man, all could go on working without cessation from one week's end to another. A moment's thought would convince anyone open to argument, that were God to withdraw from His creation for a single moment, to say nothing of twenty-four hours, creation would cease to exist. Our breath is in His hand (Dan. v. 23), He upholds all things by the word of His power (Heb. i. 3), by Him all things consists (Col. i. 17). Do we not breathe on the sabbath day? Does not the sun shine on the sabbath day? Does the whole composite labour of creation, generation, growth, decomposition, life and death, stand still on the sabbath day?

"My Father worketh hitherto."

In the second miracle wrought on the sabbath day that John records, the Lord emphasized this great, but misunderstood truth: "I must work the works of Him that sent Me, while it is day" (John ix. 4). In Matthew, Mark and Luke there are but nine occurrences of ergon, "work", but in John there are no less than twenty-seven occurrences. The words of John iv. 34, "My meat is to do the will of Him that sent Me, and to finish His work", is the opening reference to the Lord's works, while the words of John xvii. 4, "I have finished the work which Thou gavest Me to do", closes the references.

Every intervening link between the eight signs, namely, John ii. 13 - iv. 42; iv. 53, 54; v. 16-47; vi. - viii.; x. 1-42 and xi. 47 - xx. 31 is marked by the inter-relation of ergon, "work", and pisteuo, "believe", except iv. 53, 54, where the Lord's statement, "except ye see signs and wonders" (verse 48) indicates what the reference to "works" is.

Instead of subduing the anger of the Jews the Lord's answer increased it.

> "Therefore the Jews sought the more to kill Him, because He not only had broken the sabbath, but said also that God was His Father, making Himself equal with God" (John v. 18).

No Jew could really object to another Jew calling God His Father, but the Saviour did not say, "Our Father" but "My Father". He never did say "Our Father", as we are taught to do. When He instructed His disciples to pray He taught them to say "Our Father", but when He prayed He never said "Our Father". On the resurrection morning this distinction is emphasized:

> "I ascend unto My Father, and your Father; and to My God, and your God" (John xx. 17).

The R.V. corrects the A.V. in John v. 18, by translating the word idios, "own", "but also called God His Own Father".

We do not go to the angry Jews to find a ground for the deity of Christ, and the words, "made himself equal with God", arise out of the claim that the Saviour made that God was His own Father. He did not claim to be the Father, but he did claim equality with the Father. Isos means "equal", and is quite distinct from "identity". There is here no confusion of the Persons of the Father and the Son. When the labourers who had worked all day complained, "Thou has made them equal unto us" (Matt. xx. 12), the equality was not of nature or person but of wages. When Peter said of the Gentiles that God had given them the "like" gift to that already bestowed upon the Jews at Pentecost, the equality was of gift, not nationality; Cornelius was not made a Jew. The truth concerning the relation of the Father and the Son is the great theme of the Lord's reply to these words. He does not deny the equality which the Jews accused Him of claiming, but demonstrates and enforces it. While He readily admitted that the Son could do nothing of Himself, yet He not only claimed to "see" what the Father did, but also that He, the Son, did "likewise". Is this not equality? He twice uses the familiar figure of simile—"For as . . . . . so"—and does not simile imply equality? This simile is used of two tremendous statements. The first, that as the Father raiseth up the dead and quickeneth them, "even so the Son quickeneth whom He will" (John v. 21); the second, that as the Father hath life in Himself "even so hath He given to the Son to have life in Himself" (John v. 26). We are not however left to our own failing powers of logic; the Lord definitely states the case,

Before we proceed, we must seek the structure of this passage, for this will set the course of our investigation and prevent us from mistaking an incidental remark for one of first magnitude. In other words, the structure provides the Lord's own emphasis, as though He had actually underlined the Bible for us. Here is the structure of this great defence.

John v. 19 - 30.
"My Father worketh hitherto, and I work" expanded from verse 17.

A | 19. Nothing of Self. "What He seeth." |
a1 | The Son can do nothing of Himself.
b1 | What He seeth the Father do.
b1 | Whatsoever He do.
a1 | These also doeth the Son likewise.
B | 20. Greater works, that ye may marvel.
C | 21-23. Equality of the Son. |
c | For as . . . so . . . raiseth and quickeneth.
d | Krino, krisis: Judgment.
e | The Son sent.
D | 24, 25. The hour and the voice.
No condemnation (krisis). |
f | Verily, verily.
g1 | Hear my Word.
h1 | Hath everlasting life.
i | The hour cometh and now is.
f | Verily, verily.
g2 | Hear the voice of the Son of God.
h2 | They that hear shall live.
C | 26, 27. Equality of the Son. |
c | For as . . . so life in Himself.
d | Krisis: Judgment.
e | The Son of man.
B | 28-. Marvel not at this, for something greater follows.
D | -28, 29. The hour and the voice.
Some come to condemnation (krisis). |
i | The hour cometh.
g3 | Hear His voice.
h3 | Resurrection of life or judgment.
A | 30. Nothing of Self. "As I hear." |
a2 | I can of Mine own self do nothing.
b2 | As I hear I judge.
b2 | My judgment is just.
a2 | Not My own will, but His.

This corresponding members of the structure must therefore be the object of our investigation. We shall devote what space we now have left to the members "A | v. 19" and "A | v. 30", "What he seeth" and "As I hear".

In John iii. 34 the testimony is given, "He whom God hath sent speaketh the words of God", and we shall have occasion to consider this statement more fully when we arrive at chapter vii. 16, where the Lord says, "My doctrine is not Mine, but His that sent Me". Here, in chapter v., it is not "words" or "doctrine" but "works" that are in view.

The Lord claimed that He both "saw" and "heard" the Father. In this He stands apart from all other men. In the prologue it is written, "No man hath seen God at any time" (John i. 18), and in the very passage where the Lord's great claim is asserted, He said "He have neither heard His voice at any time, nor seen His shape" (John v. 37). This unique claim is repeated in John vi., "Not that any man hath seen the Father, save He which is of God, He hath seen the Father" (John vi. 46). Yet again, in the chapter where He claims the title "I AM" (John viii. 58), this unique vision of the Father is repeated, "I speak that which I have seen with My Father" (John viii. 38).

On the other hand, Who so dependent as the Son of God?

> "The Son can do nothing of Himself" (John v. 19).
> "I can of Mine own self do nothing" (John v. 30).

Similarly, the Lord said later to His disciples concerning the other Comforter, even the Spirit of truth, "He shall not speak of Himself; but whatsoever He shall hear, that shall He speak" (John xvi. 13).

A superficial reading of these statements might lead to the conclusion that, of themselves, the Son and the Spirit were powerless, not even possessing the abilities common to man, yet we have but to consider the reasons put forward in this Gospel for this very limitation to see that they reveal not only the true relationship of the Son with the Father, but magnify the Son Himself.

Here then are the reasons given why the Son did nothing and said nothing "of" (apo, from) "Himself".

(1) The Son spoke not "from Himself" because one sent by another who so acted would evidently be seeking "His own glory: but He that seeketh His glory that sent Him, the same is true, and no unrighteousness is found in Him" (John vii. 18).

(2) The Son spoke not "from Himself", because, not only had He been "sent" and found His meat and drink in finishing the work He had been sent to do, but He had the further reason and further joy that, "My Father hath not left Me alone; for I do always those things that please Him" (John viii. 29).

(3) And He added (verse 42), "neither came I of Myself". The Son was not self-commissioned. It is the glory of the gospel that God so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son; consequently, as the Sent One, He spoke and wrought only those things that pertained to His blessed commission.

(4) Both His "words" and His "works" partook of this character, but another and deeper reason was given why He did not speak or act "from Himself"; it was, "I am in the Father, and the Father in Me" (John xiv. 10, 11).

It took a long time; it took the working of many signs; it took the patient teaching of well-nigh another three years, before the claim of John v. was recognized by His disciples, but, in chapter xvi., they made this confession,

> "Now we are sure that Thou knowest all things, and needest not that any man should ask Thee: by this we believe that Thou camest forth from God" (John xvi. 30).

We may learn what "speaking of Himself" means by turning to John xi. 51, "And this spake He not of Himself: but being high priest that year, he prophesied that Jesus should die for that nation". If a sinful man like Caiaphas could not say anything "of himself" when the glory and purpose of God so demanded, how much more may we not expect it of the Son of God when He was in the position of willingly and joyfully limiting Himself to the execution of that work for which He had been sent by the Father. Moreover, on another occasion, He said, "I and My Father are One" (John x. 30), so that the truth of His equality is not a matter of inference but of revelation.

It may be said that every child of God "sees" and "hears" something of the words and works of the Father, and this would be true. In the Lord's claim, however, there is a plenitude that does not belong to men: "For whatever He may do, these things also doeth the Son, in like manner" (John v. 19). In the same verse the Lord had taught that the Son cannot work of Himself, because He is the Son. Other creatures standing on a lower level may abuse their freedom and do things contrary, but this would empty the title of THE SON of its essential meaning, namely, that of perfect unity with the Father. The same argument is also put in another form, "For it is the very nature of the Son to do whatever the Father doeth". Moreover, His works are "in like manner" (homoios).

The question of the deity of Christ is not in view. It has already been taught that "The Word was God". We are now learning about "The Word Who became flesh", and His relationship not with "God", as such, but with God revealed as "The Father". These are important distinctions. Both the Father and the Son bear the same title, "God", and the question of equality there, can never arise. If the Word, Who was God, became flesh, and was seen as the only begotten of the Father, then the question does arise, Is He subordinate or is He equal with the Father? This chapter of John which we are considering opens the question and, step by step, the subject is developed until we reach the definite assertion, "I and My Father are One", and the ultimate confession of Thomas, "My Lord and My God".

As we follow the lead given by the structure, the succeeding signs, and their intermediate links, these further steps in the argument await us. We must therefore devote further articles to the examination of this most important teaching, for there is no question so crucial as that which He Himself asked, "What think ye of Christ?"

#31. The link between the third and fourth sign (v. 16 - 47). Equality of honour of the Father and the Son established. pp. 115 - 119

The charge laid against the Saviour in this chapter of John's Gospel is twofold. (1) That He had broken the Sabbath day, and (2) that He called God His Own Father, making Himself equal with God.

The opening and closing words of the Lord's great defence, have occupied our attention in the preceding article. There we found that He claimed several vital and exclusive things.

(1) He saw and He heard what the Father did.
(2) He did whatever He saw the Father do.

A possible objection is now met by the Lord's subsequent words. True, a Pharisee may interpose, you do those things which you "see" the Father do; but what you actually see may be but a remnant of His ways and deeds; therefore your answer does not justify your claiming equality with God. To this the Lord gives a conclusive reply, leaving no loophole for further objection on the score of the possible limitation of His Own vision: "For the Father loveth the Son, and showeth Him all things that Himself doeth" (John v. 20). Here are three most conclusive elements in the argument:

(1) The great actuating principle of love.
(2) Not only did Christ "see", but the Father "showed".
(3) Not only did the Father show, but He showed "all things".

This is not the first time that the love of the Father to the Son has been given as the great reason why "all things" were committed into His hands.

> "He that cometh from above is above all: He that is of the earth is earthly, and speaketh of the earth; He that cometh from heaven is above all. And what He hath seen and heard that He testifieth; and no man receiveth His testimony. He that hath received His testimony, hath set His seal to this that God is true. For He Whom God hath sent speaketh the words of God: for God giveth not the spirit by measure unto him. The Father loveth the Son, and hath given all things into His hand" (John iii. 31-35).

Here the Lord's ministry is compared and contrasted with that of John the Baptist. He came from above; He came from heaven; He both heard and saw. He was sent; the Spirit was given to Him without measure, and, being loved of the Father, all things were given into His hands.

"All things."—Let us acquaint ourselves with the way in which this expression is used of the Lord in John's Gospel:

(1) All things were made by Him (i. 3).
(2) All things were known by Him (ii. 24; iv. 25, 29, 39; xvi. 30; xviii. 4; xix. 28; xxi. 17).
(3) All things were committed to Him (iii. 35; v. 22, 28; xiii. 3; xvii. 2).
(4) All things that the Father had were His (xvi. 15; xvii. 10).

These four sets include the whole creation, all things whatever that the Father does or has, all flesh, all judgments, all that are in the graves. In the face of this testimony, the question as to the Son's equality with the Father dies before it can be uttered. If these things do not mean equality, then there is no possibility of demonstrating the meaning of the word. He, for our sakes, left the glory which He had before the world was (John xvii. 5); He left the riches that He had (II Cor. viii. 9); He divested Himself of the form of God, wherein His equality with God was evident (Phil. ii. 6, 7) and took upon Him the form of a servant, wherein that equality was veiled (Phil. ii. 7) and it is in the gradual unfolding of His glory as "the Son", with special reference to His words and works, that the revelation is made that this "Sent One", though, according to the flesh, of Israel and Man, is nevertheless "over all, God blessed for ever" (Rom. ix. 5).

The Father "showed" all things that He did to the Son.

This word deiknuo, shewed, occurs seven times in John's Gospel. It is used of a sign (John ii. 18); of good works (John x. 32); and of the Lord's pierced hands (John xx. 20). It presupposes vision in the beholder that corresponds with the vision granted. When the disciples said "Shew us the Father" (John xiv. 8), they were asking for something which could not be granted to them without mediation, but there is no suggestion that any mediation was necessary when the Father "shewed" the Son whatever He was doing, for the Son declared that He "saw" all things.

Man can see the things of man:

> "For what man knoweth the things of man, save the spirit of man which is in him? even so the things of God knoweth no man, but the Spirit of God" (I Cor. ii. 11).
> "No man hath seen God at any time" (John i. 18).

He therefore that could "see" all things, "know" all things, "possess" all things, "make" all things, must be God:

> "For every house is builded by some one; but He that hath built all things is God" (Heb. iii. 4 R.V.).

The works which had commenced with the miraculous signs wrought by Christ, were to go on with increasing greatness until the evidence was complete that "Jesus was the Christ, the Son of God".

> "Marvel not", said Christ to Nicodemus, "that I said unto thee, Ye must be born again" (John iii. 7).
> "And He will show Him greater works than these, that ye may marvel" (John v. 20).
> "Marvel not", said Christ, at the fact that "All judgment hath been given unto the Son" (John v. 22, 28 and 29).

"The Jews marveled" when they heard the words of Christ, saying, "How knoweth this man letters, having never learned?" (John vii. 15).

"Ye all marvel", said Christ, because "I have done one work" (John vii. 21).

Greater and more marvelous things were to be accomplished by the Son of God before His work was done, and among them the Saviour specifies:

(1) The resurrection and quickening of the dead.
(2) The judgment of all men.

And this with the avowed object, "That all men should honour the Son, even as they honour the Father" (John v. 21-23).

It is the abundant testimony of the Scriptures, that it is God that raiseth the dead, and that it was He Who raised Christ up from the dead.

"God Which raiseth the dead" (II Cor. i. 9).

"If we believe on Him that raised up Jesus our Lord from the dead" (Rom. iv. 24).

Yet we observe that in the verse where the word egeiro, "raise", first occurs in John's Gospel, the Lord says:

"In three days I will raise it up" (John ii. 19).

"I lay down My life, that I might take it again. No man taketh it from Me, but I lay it down of Myself. I have power to lay it down, and I have power to take it again. This commandment have I received of My Father" (John x. 17, 18).

The Lord's resurrection was, therefore, not accomplished without His Own co-operation. How this could be may be beyond the power of mortal mind to know, but that it is so is revealed, and revealed for the express purpose that all men should give honour to the Son equal to that which they give to the Father: "The Son quickeneth whom He will" (John v. 21). With this impressive claim, read the prayer: "Father, I will that they also, whom Thou hast given Me, be with Me where I am" (John xvii. 24). The holiest saint that ever breathed would be condemned the moment such a "prayer" escaped his lips. He Who can say, "I will", and the dead are quickened, and Who can say, "I will", in addressing the Father, is certainly an equal.

There is a transition in John v. 21 and 22 from resurrection to the sequel of resurrection, namely "judgment" (see verse 29).

"For the Father judgeth no man, but hath committed all judgment unto the Son."

The solemn passages which speak of God the Judge of all; the awful grandeur of the day of judgment; the tremendous responsibility that rests in the hands of that Judge Whose verdict is eternal; all speak of Christ, and Christ as the Son of man (John v. 27).

"He hath appointed a day, in the which He will judge the world in righteousness by that Man Whom He hath ordained; whereof He hath given assurance unto all men, in that He hath raised Him from the dead" (Acts xvii. 31).

We must not allow ourselves to lose the main line of argument because, in themselves, the side issues are so great. The matter before us, as it was before the Lord, His disciples and the Jews, was His claim to equality with God, a claim resident in His Sonship, and by the fact that He declared that the works which He did were the self-same that the Father did. We resist therefore the temptation to explore the doctrines of resurrection, of quickening, of judgment; each theme demanding a study to itself; and pass on, with the Lord, to His conclusion > "That all men should honour the Son, even as they honour the Father. He that honoureth not the Son, honoureth not the Father Which hath sent Him" (John v. 23).

How should men honour the Father? They must worship Him in spirit and in truth (John iv. 23).

"All men should honour the Son, even as they honour the Father."

> "The Father raiseth the dead, and quickeneth them" (John v. 21).
> "Jesus said, I am the resurrection, and the life" (John xi. 25).

"All men should honour the Son, even as they honour the Father."

> "Shew us the Father, and it sufficeth us" (John xiv. 8).
> "He that hath seen ME hath seen the FATHER . . . . . believest thou not that I am in the Father, and the Father in Me?" (John xiv. 9, 10).

"All men should honour the Son, even as they honour the Father."

> "Father, the hour is come; glorify Thy Son, that Thy Son also may glorify Thee" (John xvii. 1).
> "I have glorified Thee . . . . . glorify Thou Me with Thine Own self, with the glory which I had with Thee before the world was" (John xvii. 4, 5).

"All men should honour the Son, even as they honour the Father."

Let us not miss the second part of John v. 23. A man may say that he honours the Father, for He indeed is God, but that he cannot bring himself to honour the Son in the same way, because that appears to be honouring One Who was subordinate. Let not such think that it is possible thus to honour the Father. It is impossible. Any who withhold equal honour to the Son, render themselves unable to honour the Father at all.

> "I am the Way, the Truth and the Life, no man cometh unto the Father, but by Me" (John xiv. 6).

To think that the Person and Character of the Father is less understandable than the Person and Character of the Son, betrays a dangerous ignorance.

> "All things are delivered unto me of My Father, and no man knoweth the Son but the Father; neither knoweth any man the Father, save the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son will reveal Him" (Matt. xi. 27).

a statement parallel with those already considered in John's Gospel.

Let us note with worship and wonder, the claim here made by the Lord in the hour of His rejection. The Father is revealed by the Son, but no such revelation is given of the Son Himself. The Son knows the Father in the same measure of fullness that the Father knows the Son, and this alone would be sufficient proof that the Son was equal with the Father, and must receive equal honour. But, added to this is the fact that, whereas the Fatherhood of God is a matter of revelation through the Son, the Sonship of Christ is not so revealed. The latter is evidently a more complete mystery than the former, and should for ever close all argument that would reason from the relationship of Father and Son to the belittling of the Son. None of the admitted facts, namely that Christ was "sent" or that He said "My Father is greater than I", can possibly alter the explicit testimony of Matt. xi. 27 or John v. 23.

A glance at the structure given on page 68 shows that at verse 24, a new section opens, governed by the words, "The hour and the voice", and as this new section continues the argument, we will devote the next article to its examination. Meanwhile, let us not, in the eagerness of our study, forget that the subject-matter which occupies our attention, must, if it be rightly understood, lead to the full confession of Thomas when he said, "My Lord and My God".

#32. The link between the third and fourth sign (v. 16 - 47). The Quickening or the Raising of the dead.

pp. 156 - 160

The structure of verses 24 and 25 and of verses 28 and 29 have already been given, but to facilitate reference we reproduce it here.

D | 24, 25. The hour and the Voice.
No condemnation (krisis). |
f | Verily, verily.
g1 | Hear my Word.
h1 | Hath everlasting life.
i | The hour cometh and now is.
f | Verily, verily.
g2 | Hear the Voice.
h2 | They that hear . . . live.
D | -28, 29. The hour and the Voice.
Some come to condemnation, Krisis. |
i | The hour cometh.
g3 | Hear His Voice.
h3 | Resurrection of life and judgment.

The solemn "Verily, verily" ushers in the truth of verse 24, and again of verse 25 (For a complete list of the occurrences of this expression see Volume XXXI, pages 173, 174).

"He that heareth My word, and believeth on Him that sent Me, hath everlasting life, and shall not come into condemnation; but is passed from death unto life" (John v. 24).

Much is made of "hearing" in his gospel. The Samaritans said,

"Now we believe . . . . . for we have heard Him ourselves, and know that this is indeed the Christ, the Saviour of the world" (John iv. 42).

Hearing is a characteristic of His sheep:

"The sheep hear His voice." "The sheep did not hear them" (the thieves and robbers).
"Other sheep I have . . . . . they shall hear My voice."
"My sheep hear My voice" (John x. 3, 8, 16, 27).

Moreover, hearing is a characteristic of they that be "of God" (John viii. 47), and they that be "of the truth" (John xviii. 37).

Some, by their very nature, cannot, and will not, hear.

"Ye have neither heard His voice, nor seen His shape" (John v. 37).

Hearing is a test of discipleship.

"This is an hard saying, who can hear it?" (John vi. 60).
"From that time many of His disciples went back and walked no more with Him" (John vi. 66).

Inability to hear God's word is a mark of evil.

"Why do ye not understand My speech? even because ye cannot hear My word. Ye are of your father the devil . . . . . when he speaketh a lie he speaketh of his own . . . . . he that is of God heareth God's words: ye therefore hear them not, because ye are not of God" (John viii. 43-47).

In John v. 24, 25, "hearing" His "word", and "hearing" His "voice", are intentional parallels, and both are ways of speaking of him that "believe".

The "believing" here has a specific object:
"And believeth on Him that sent Me" (John v. 24).

It is the insistent testimony of this gospel that Christ is the Sent One, this is intertwined with all the truth that is revealed in it. There are twenty-eight occurrences of pempo and seventeen of apostello (forty-five in all) that speak of Christ being "Sent". Space is lacking here to list these and exhibit in any degree their message. We can only say that the faith that receives everlasting life, comprehends the Father in the capacity of the One Who sent the Son, a statement that is not only the legitimate inference of John v. 24, but the inspired declaration of I John iv. 14:

"The Father sent the Son to be the Saviour of the world."

We must now give attention to the special feature of this section, which is placed in correspondence with verses 28, 29 in the structure.

> "The hour is coming and now is" (John v. 25).
> "The hour is coming" (John v. 28).

The additional words "and now is", found in the first occurrence, are absent from the second. In the first passage, "the dead" are said to hear the voice of the Son of God, whereas in the second "all that are in the graves" hear His voice. In the first, they that hear "shall live", in the second, they that hear "shall come forth" (v. 29). In the earlier passage they that live are those that do not come into condemnation (John v. 24), whereas in the later passages they that hear are those who are raised from the dead.

> "They that have done good, unto the resurrection of life, and they that have done evil, unto the resurrection of damnation" (krisis).

It is evident that the former passage refers to those who are spiritually dead, but who, upon hearing the gospel, live; whereas, the later passage refers to the physically dead, all of whom must hear His voice; but all these are not necessarily saved, neither does the hearing of the voice imply any element of faith on their part for while some come forth to a resurrection of life the rest come forth to a resurrection of judgment. There is little or no satisfaction to be discovered in the commentaries as to the precise meaning of the added words "and now is". Let us conduct an investigation for ourselves and see whether we can learn enough from the Word itself to help us to appreciate what is intended. We remember, of course, that similar expressions are found in chapter iv.; and it is fatal to ignore these when examining chapter v. In chapter iv., the question is one of worship; in chapter v., one of life.

1. The hour was coming, (an hour future to the time when the Saviour sat and talked at the well), when men would neither at Jerusalem, nor at Samaria, worship the Father. This "hour" had not "come" when Peter and John went up to the temple at the hour of prayer (Acts iii. 1), and the type of worship that was offered and conducted at Jerusalem at the moment that Christ uttered the words in John iv. 21, continued until the destruction of Jerusalem in A.D.70.
2. "The hour cometh, and now is", looks to a day when the true worshipper should worship the Father in spirit and in truth. No time need elapse before that took place; even while the temple still stood at Jerusalem, "true" worshippers could and did "worship the Father in spirit and in truth".

There is, however, a possibility that John, writing his gospel long after A.D.70, brought the Lord's testimony to the Samaritan woman up to date, saying, the hour the Lord had said was coming, is now here, the words "and now is" referring to the dispensation that had been instituted upon the setting aside of Israel, which in this gospel John particularly ministered to "the world". Parallels for this practice can be found in the O.T. In Gen. vi. 4, the record reads:

to which Moses added the words that referred to his own times, "and after that". In a similar manner Moses brings up to date the narrative of several other passages, as in Gen. xxvi. 33; xxxv. 20; and xlvii. 26, where the name of Beer-sheba, the grave of Rachel, and the law made by Joseph, are related by Moses to his own day.

In our Lord's own day it was blessedly true that whoever believed Him received life, but the words "and now is" were specially true when John wrote the record, for the very purpose for which he selected his material had in view "life through His name". John v. 24, 25 is most emphatically true for the day in which we live. Quite independent of, and outside the dispensation of the mystery, "the hour now is" that whoever believes that Jesus is the Christ the Son of God, whoever hears His voice and believes in Him that sent Him, hath everlasting life. For instance, no opposition or objection can override the blessed fact that the words were used by God to bring the present writer out of nature's darkness and death into the light of life, subsequent realization of a place in the glorious calling of the mystery, in no sense mitigating, canceling or altering this simple issue. To-day John's ministry and Paul's ministry are both running together, John having "the world" for his parish, and "life" for his great object. Paul the prisoner, has the "Gentile", as distinct from the "Jew", as his charge, and the message of Paul pre-supposes the hearer to have "life" and leads him on to the heights of that calling which finds its sphere in the heavenlies, and its inception "before the overthrow of the world".*

In John v. 28, literal resurrection is in view, and "all", not "some", that are in the graves shall hear.

The reader of "The Berean Expositor" needs no lengthy argument to prove that Scripture teaches the resurrection of the dead and that each will then be clothed with a body suitable to the sphere of blessing he is to enter. There may be, however, a need to discover why the Lord divided, as He did, the two classes who shall be raised.

It is emphatic testimony of the Scriptures, that > "There is none righteous, no not one . . . . . there is none that doeth good, no not one" (Rom. iii. 10-12).

If this passage is all that has been revealed on the subject, then our Lord could not have spoken of any who could be called "They that have done good". There would simply be the resurrection of but one class, the condemned; they who had done evil. Paul, on one occasion, spoke in the following words of the resurrection, and divided those thus raised into two companies:

> "And have hope toward God . . . . . that there shall be a resurrection of the dead, both of the just and the unjust" (Acts xxiv. 15).

If one may object to John v. that there is none that doeth good, one may object to Acts xxiv. that there is none righteous, and that there can no more be a resurrection of the just, than there can be a resurrection of those that have done good. But such sweeping statements cannot be allowed. There is a scriptural meaning and justification for all that is stated in John v. and Acts xxiv. Does not the same epistle that teaches "there is none righteous no not one", say "The just by faith shall live"? It does, and so, though a man can never be accounted "just" through any merit of his own, he can still be called "the just" even though he be just "by faith". So, also, with regard to "doing good". Eph. ii. 8-10, not only says that salvation is "not of works"; it, as surely, says that it is "unto good works". The apostle has hardly written the words "Not by works" in Titus iii. 5, than he is writing, > "Constantly affirm, that they which have believed in God, might be careful to maintain good works" (Titus iii. 8).

Into John v. and Acts xxiv., the question as to how those in view become "good" or "just" does not enter; resurrection there is rather the time of harvest, when men shall be known by their fruits. If, throughout his life, a man has said that he has "believed", but throughout that life he has "practiced evil", that man's "faith" is an empty profession, and in the resurrection he will find himself raised to judgment. While it would not be true to say that the N.T. draws a distinct line between the usage of poieo, "to do", and prasso, "to practice", it is nevertheless true that poieo is used in John v. twelve times of the Father and the Son, and once of those that "have done good". Prasso is used in John but twice, both passages referring to "doing evil" (John iii. 20; v. 29), and prasso differs from poieo in that, whereas poieo means "to make", "to build", "to do", prasso is used only of actions, a line of conduct, a practice.

We must defer examination of the references to "judgment" and "damnation" as this great subject comes not only in verses 24 and 29, but in 22, 27 and 30, where all judgment is given into the hands of the Son of God as the Son of Man, this we hope to do in the next article.

#33. The link between the third and fourth sign (v. 16 - 47).
"Life in Himself." "All Judgment."
The Equality of the Son with the Father.
pp. 222 - 226

Having deferred examination of the different passages that spoke of "judgment", "condemnation" or "damnation", we now examine the remaining subdivisions of this section, John v. 26, 27 and John v. 30. The latter reference closes the section, and is in direct correspondence with the opening member verse 19.

A | 19. Nothing of Self. "What He seeth." |
a1 | The Son can do nothing of Himself.
b1 | What He seeth the Father do.
b1 | Whatsoever He do.
a1 | These also doeth the Son likewise.

* * * * * * *

A | 30. Nothing of Self. "As I hear." |
a2 | I can of Mine own self do nothing.
b2 | As I hear I judge.
b2 | My judgment is just.
a2 | Not My own will, but His.

John v. 26, 27 is in direct correspondence with John v. 21-23.

C | 21-23. Equality of the Son. |
c | For as . . . so . . . raise and quicken.
d | Krino . . . Krisis: Judgment.
e | The Son sent.

* * * * * * *

C | 26, 27. Equality of the Son. |
c | For as . . . so . . . life in Himself.
d | Krisis: Judgment.
e | The Son of Man.

Three important items claim our attention in these sections,

1. The double title "The Son of God" and "The Son of Man" (John v. 25, 27).
2. The claim that the Son had been given "life in Himself".
3. The emphasis that is placed upon "judgment".

Summing up the chief purpose which he had in view John says,

> "These are written, that ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God; and that believing ye might have life through His Name" (John xx. 31).

It is therefore of the very essence of the teaching of this gospel that we should grasp the implication of this title "Son of God". Firstly let us examine the way in which John speaks of Christ under the title "Son". The first reference is critical, in that it sets the limit to the title, and governs every other reference.

> "The only begotten Son" (John i. 18).

What is meant by "only begotten" is made clear in verse 14, for it is only when "the Word" became "flesh" and tabernacled among us that the peculiar glory which belonged to Him as the Only begotten of the Father could be seen. Monogenes is used of ordinary men and women in Luke vii. 12 "The only son"; viii. 42 "one only daughter" "mine only child" ix. 38. It is used of Isaac, Abraham's "only begotten son" (Heb. xi. 17). Thus while Luke and Paul use the word monogenes of natural sonship, John is the only writer who uses the word of Christ (John i. 14, 18; iii. 16, 18; I John iv. 9), and it is evident he did so, in order to enforce upon us the true meaning that is intended in John xx. 31.

The title "Son of God" occurs in John's gospel eleven times, but in one or two references, some addition is made, which we will note as we proceed.

> "I saw, and bare record that this is the Son of God" (John i. 34).
> "Thou art the Son of God" (John i. 49).
> "The name of the only begotten Son of God" (John iii. 18).

The last reference gives us the first occurrence with an addition, and the first occurrence of John's own testimony. It is the apostle's endeavour to make sure that we do not separate the title "Son of God" from "the only begotten". John the Baptist and Nathaniel have given theirs, and now John adds his. We shall observe the importance of this addition as we proceed.

> "The dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God" (John v. 25).
> "Thou art that Christ, the Son of the living God" (John vi. 69).

Here is the testimony of the disciples, and two additional titles are found. "That Christ", so the disciples recognize the Saviour as the Messiah, moreover they recognized Him as the Son of the "living" God, a statement that must await examination.

> "Dost thou believe on the Son of God?" (John ix. 35).
> "Because I said, I am the Son of God?" (John x. 36).
> "That the Son of God might be glorified" (John xi. 4).
> "Thou art the Christ, the Son of God" (John xi. 27).

This last is Martha's confession following the Lord's claim to the title "I am the Resurrection and the Life' (John xi. 25).

> "The Jews answered Him, we have a law, and by our law He ought to die, because He made Himself the Son of God" (John xix. 7).
> "That Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God" (John xx. 31).

The title "Son of Man" occurs in John's Gospel twelve times (i. 51; iii. 13, 14; v. 27; vi. 27, 53, 62; viii. 28; xii. 23, 24; xiii. 31).

The Lord's statement concerning angels ascending and descending on the Son of Man, evidently relates to the future Mediation of Christ, linking heaven and earth by His Own dual nature as the God Man. In an earlier article we discussed the statement made in John iii. 13 "the Son of Man which is in heaven"; its claim to Deity cannot be lightly set aside. As the Son of Man, He could be "lifted up", "judge all men", "give everlasting life", give His "flesh and blood", "ascend up where He was before" and "be glorified".

Two acts of very great disservice have been committed by some orthodox Christians, who, by putting out their hands to save the ark of God, have severed from its scriptural associations of "only begotten", "Word made flesh", the title "Son of God" and where the Scriptures use "The Word" or "The Image" made it read as if it were a title belonging to pre-incarnation times. This has produced the meaningless expression "The eternal generation of the Son" to which John xx. 31 gives no support. On the other hand the title "Son of Man" has been relegated to the realm of the flesh, despite the facts that it was an O.T. prophetic title, and that the Lord's claim to be the Son of Man in answer to the question "tell us whether Thou be the Christ the Son of God" instead of tempering the animosity of the Jews, raised it to the highest pitch.

> "He hath spoken blasphemy . . . . . He is guilty of death" (Matt. xxvi. 63-66).

The title Son of God, has much affinity with the Saviour's manhood and the title Son of Man, has much that emphasizes His Deity. Such would be an anomaly if the Lord were "such an one as ourselves". But confessedly great is the mystery of godliness, "God was manifest in the flesh", and if at the same time He be the Child born, the Son given, yet also the mighty God (Isa. ix. 6) the mystery is not too much for faith, however, much it transcends our ability to comprehend. Further more, this is not a matter of purposeful mystifying, or cloaking of ignorance by the use of high sounding words, but in complete agreement with and full recognition of the limitations imposed by Matt. xi. 27, a passage demanding the same implicit acceptance as any other part of Holy Writ. There remains the title without definition other than the article "The Son". This occurs in John's gospel eighteen times, (John iii. 17, 35, 36; v. 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 26; vi. 40; viii. 35, 36; xiv. 13; xvii. 1) and must be considered as all embracive. It refers to the Saviour viewed as "The Only begotten of the Father", "The Son of God" and "The Son of Man". This survey of the distinction of these filial titles reveals the intention of the writer of this gospel, but we must here note the way in which these titles are used. The references to "The Son" are bounded by verses 19 and 26. The first statement says:

> "The Son can do nothing of Himself, but what He seeth the Father do" (John v. 19).

The last says:

> "As the Father hath life in Himself; so hath He given to the Son to have life in Himself" (John v. 26).

"Of Himself"; "In Himself". There are depths here that lie beyond the reach of man. In the former, we have the most blessed self abnegation that forms the theme of Phil. ii.

> "He made Himself of no reputation (emptied Himself, R.V.) by taking the form of a servant" (Phil. ii. 7).

This corresponds with the statement that the Son can do nothing of Himself. The very fact that the Scripture says "He emptied" Himself reveals that He had somewhat which He voluntarily relinquished when He became "flesh" and was "found in fashion as a man". As the "Word" in the beginning, He had "life in Himself" (John i. 4) "In Him was life". When therefore we read that the Father had given the Son life in Himself, or that He had power to lay down His life, and power to take it up again, He was but receiving in His new sphere, that which was His own. In the beginning He had life in Himself. Before the world was He had shared the glory with the Father, and when He spoke of His ascension, it was but to go up "where He was before". It was "the living Father" that had sent Him (John vi. 57). He was the Son of the "living God" (John vi. 69). He came to dispense "living water" (John iv. 10); He Himself was "the living bread" (John vi. 51), and "life through His name" is the purpose of the gospel. Moreover, His glorious titles include this life in many ways. He is "the bread of life" (John vi. 35, 48), He is "the resurrection and the life" (John xi. 25); He is "the way, the truth and the life" (John xiv. 6); "I am come that they might have life" was the Lord's own summary of His commission (John x. 10). The life that is here offered is the fundamental need of all men, whether Jew, Gentile or Church of God, whether belonging to the earthly calling, the heavenly country, or the position of the One body "Far above all". "Life through His name" and that name "The Christ, the Son of God" belongs to all callings and dispensations. Any attempt to limit John's Gospel to "the Kingdom" is contrary to the express testimony of the book itself.

We now turn our attention to the references to "judgment" that are a feature of this section. The following is the disposition of krino and krisis in this section. In order that it may be easily followed, we retain the A.V. translation.

A | a | v. 22. The Father judgeth no man. Krino.
b | 22. All judgment committed unto the Son. Krisis.
B | c | 24. No condemnation for those who believe. Krisis.
d | 27. As Son of Man, execute judgment. Krisis.
c | 29. Resurrection of damnation. Krisis.
A | a | 30. As I hear I judge. Krino.
b | v. 30. Judgment, just. Not seek own will. Krisis.

Krisis means judgment, not necessarily a judgment that condemns, as can be proved from many a passage (Matt. xxiii. 23). But krisis can and does mean damnation too, as another passage in Matt. xxiii. makes clear "the damnation of hell" (Matt. xxiii. 33), not permitting any softening down; the believer is exempted from Krisis.

> "Shall not come into condemnation" (John v. 24).

And this is in correspondence with the fate of those who have "done evil", for they shall be raised to a "resurrection of condemnation" not merely a resurrection for the judgment of their service. It surely calls forth praise, to learn that all judgment is committed into the hands of Christ because He is the Son of Man! The judgment of the Invisible God, must and would be just; had the Father reserved all judgment to Himself, or had it been committed to the Holy Spirit who is he that dare protest? Yet the great God condescends to man and his estate. For the seeking sinner, there is the One Mediator, "The Man Christ Jesus"; for the praying believer, there sits at the right hand on high, One Who is not untouched with the feeling of our infirmities; for the very condemned, is provided a Judge Who has walked this vale of tears, Who knows what temptation means, who suffered at the hands of men, and whose judgment is just. How inadequate are our words to explain or even point the way of truth. We have sought to deal with the first half of this great section in this series, yet how much awaits the patient study of the believer? Though only too conscious of our limitations, we must press on. In our next series we hope to deal with the second part of this section, which brings to the fore the threefold evidence of the Lord's claims.

Mitsrach

"Toward the Sunrising."

(A motto for all Bereans, for the year 1947).

pp. 1 - 3

In the home of any orthodox Jew one will find, to this day, a strange device hanging upon the east wall of the house. It is called a Mitsrach. Often it takes the form of the ten commandments. Any who have access to Volume IV of The Berean Expositor will find on page 62 (or Volume IV/V, page 51) a description and illustration of articles used in the synagogue and Jewish home. The articles numbered 5 and 6, give some idea of what a Mitsrach looks like. This word means "From the rising", and is hung upon the east wall so that prayer can be directed toward Jerusalem. Now we have no intention of hanging a Mitsrach on any wall of our house, nor of advising any of our readers to adopt this Jewish custom, but we mention it here because of the lesson it may enforce.

The full expression is Mitsrach Shemesh. "From the rising of the sun", "Toward the sunrising" (Numb. xxi. 11). In Numb. xxi. we have the record of Israel's transgression, the lifting up of the brazen serpent and the healing of all who "looked". The concluding words are.

> "And the children of Israel set forward . . . . . toward the sunrising" (Numb. xxi. 10, 11).

We believe every redeemed child of God is expected to follow this course. First to "set forward". Redemption is a deliverance "out of", therefore Egypt must be left behind. It is however more than that; it has an inheritance in view, and this must be entered and possessed. Consequently we discover that from the moment the Passover had been offered Israel were on the move, and though they wandered forty years in the wilderness, the word translated "set forward" (Heb. nasa) is used of that period forty-two times in the record of the itinerary of Numb. xxxiii., where it is variously rendered "depart", "remove" or "journey".

Among the earliest commands given to the redeemed people under Moses is that found in Exod. xiv. 15, "Speak unto the children of Israel, that they go forward". If the typical teaching of Israel's deliverance be acknowledged, it appears that Christian witness also must be a "setting forward". There can be no turning back. There is however a great difference between setting forward along the Divinely appointed path, and merely blundering onward without guide or goal. Consequently we must add to our statement taken from Exod. xiv. further words of guidance from subsequent passages.

In Numb. x. 33, for example, we read, "And they departed from the mount of the Lord", and the word translated "departed" is nasa. But this statement is followed immediately by another, "and the ark of the covenant of the Lord went before them". Here once again the word "went" is a translation of nasa. Further, in Numb. x. 34, we read, "And the cloud of the Lord was upon them by day, when they went (nasa) out of the camp", and yet once more in verse 35 we read the words, "When the ark set forward", where the Hebrew nasa is used for the fourth time in this context. A redeemed people must "go forward", but they go forward at the command of the Lord and in close association with the symbols of His presence as set forth in the ark and the cloud. If we are a redeemed people we must "set forward", but we set forward with a guide.

Secondly, our goal is prefigured in the statement that "They pitched . . . . . toward the sunrising" (Numb. xxi. 11). Here we have two related references. The children of Israel were not expected to be on the move day and night; they "pitched" their camp regularly, and the word conveys the thought of unburdening, of relaxing; this is good to remember as we press onward. But on the other hand this did not imply settling down; consequently, when they did pitch their camp it was always "toward the sunrising", for they were pilgrims and strangers in the wilderness. The Christian hymn well expresses the sentiment in the refrain:

> "I nightly pitch my moving tent
> A day's march nearer home."

It is without significance that, after Jacob's all-night wrestle with the angel, his change of name, and his blessing, we read, "And as he passed over Penuel the sun rose upon him" (Gen. xxxii. 31). The climax of prophetic vision is expressed also in this glorious figure:

> "Arise, shine; for thy light is come, and the glory of the Lord IS RISEN upon thee . . . . . the Lord shall ARISE upon thee, and His glory shall be seen upon thee. And the Gentiles shall come to thy light, and kings to the brightness of thy RISING" (Isa. lx. 1-3).
> "But unto you that fear My name shall the Sun of righteousness ARISE with healing in His wings" (Mal. iv. 2).

Nearly forty years ago those responsible for the testimony of The Berean Expositor and for The Berean Forward Movement heard the command, "Go forward". They have faced their "Red seas", their "Marahs" and their "Amaleks", but they have found a way opened through seas of difficulty, have had bitter experiences rendered sweet, and enemies routed, without recourse to carnal weapons. The witness has been sustained through the fury of two world wars, and the nature of its testimony has compelled those who have the work at heart to suffer isolation and loneliness to a marked degree. Our consolation and strength has been the conviction that we were entrusted with precious truth, and had the assurance of the Lord's continual presence with us. After crying like a voice in the wilderness for the life-time of a generation, the precious truth of our high calling has at length found acceptance, and in every continent there are those who can say with meaning and discrimination:

> "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, Who hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings in heavenly places" (Eph. i. 3).

For this we thank God and take courage. We still "press toward the mark"; we still "set forward". Our faces are "toward the sunrising", for we are enjoined to "set our affection on things above where Christ sits at the right hand of God". We are under no illusions. Much as we hope and labour with the desire that many may be blessed by our testimony, we are warned by the infallible Word that, as the end of the age approaches, the times will be “perilous”; that they will be marked with a turning away from the truth, and a being turned to fables (II Tim. iii., iv.).

If this were all, we should become unnerved, and our efforts would die. But we look beyond earth’s long, dark, night and hail the coming day. Here, therefore, in the opening pages of yet another year’s witness, we “Set forward . . . . . toward the sunrising”.

#1. Foreword.
pp. 143 - 146

These notes and comments on Nehemiah were written at a time when the witness connected with the Berean Expositor was in a state of transition. Like Nehemiah, we, too, have had "open letters"; we, too, have experienced the wearisome effect of "much rubbish"; we, too, have received invitations to occupy a "broader" platform, to come down into the wide open "plain" and not cramp ourselves within the prescribed limits of a "prison ministry". We were particularly attracted to the thought that the goal of Nehemiah's efforts namely, "The Pulpit of the Opened Book" (Neh. viii. 4, 5), was similar to our own. Because of this, we expected to find much in the experiences of Nehemiah that would prove a word in season to ourselves. On many critical occasions, when the policy of the work hung in the balance, we have taken heed to the counsel of Nehemiah and have never yet been disappointed, and we shall have to return to this book again and again.

The chronology of Ezra-Nehemiah has been discussed in the closing chapters of the series entitled "Time and Place"* (* - A series which commenced in Volume XXXIII), and the reader is advised to acquaint himself with the arguments there put forward to establish the interrelationship of these two books. The books opens with a statement concerning the writer, "Nehemiah", a date, "the month Chisleu, in the twentieth year", a reference to the state of the "Jews", the "captivity" and "Jerusalem", which is followed by a prayer of some length and fullness, and concludes with the information that Nehemiah was "the King's cup-bearer". The subject of chapter ii. follows a similar pattern, the prayer this time, however, being the briefest on record. Before considering these passages in detail let us set out this arrangement.

Nehemiah i. 1 - ii. 4.

A | i. 1. Date. Month Chisleu.
B | i. 2-11-. Weeping, mourning, fasting, and prayer because of condition of Jerusalem.
C | i. -11. The King's cup-bearer. Office stated.
A | ii. 1-. Date. Month Nisan (four months later).
C | ii. -1. I took wine to the King. Office used.
B | ii. 2-4. Sadness, sorrow of heart, and prayer because of condition of Jerusalem.

We shall find that structurally the remainder of chapter ii. belongs to the next great division of the subject matter, and it will be considered in its place and relation to the theme.

"The words of Nehemiah the son of Hachaliah" (Neh. i. 1).

It is evident that the intention of this opening statement is to intimate that Nehemiah himself made this record, just as we understand that the expression "The words of Amos" (Amos i. 1), or "The words of Jeremiah" indicates that the prophet recorded the prophetic utterances attributed to him. The name Nehemiah is of prophetic import; it means "The Comforter (appointed by) the Lord", and contains the word translated "comfort" in Isa. xl. 1, which verse stands at the head of a prophecy that speaks of the restoration of Jerusalem in two aspects.

(1) The restoration carried out under the command of Cyrus (Isa. xlvi. 28; xlv. 1-5), and
(2) The complete restoration yet to take place under the benign sway of the Messiah.

To those who sighed concerning the desolations of Jerusalem, and hoped for its restoration, the very name of this man would give courage and cheer—"The Comforter (appointed by) Jehovah".

From Neh. x. 1, we gather that Nehemiah was one of the Princes of Israel, for chapter ix. 38 tells us that "princes" as well as Levites and priests sealed the covenant there made. Moreover, he is called "The Tirshatha", a title indicating "fear" or "reverence" (compare the Persian torsh, severe, austere). In Neh. xii. 26 he is called "the governor", where the word so translated is pechah, a foreign word common to the Arabians and Persians. The note in the Companion Bible, "Governor-Pasha", must not be taken to indicate that Pasha is derived from Pechah, as that would be false etymology. A further reason for the supposition that Nehemiah was probably a prince of Judah, is the fact that "the King's seed" and "princes" were taken prisoners to Babylon. The character of this man of God shows him to be of fearless integrity, a firm believer in the promises of his God, a fervent patriot, a man of prayer, and a splendid leader of the people, being especially proof against intimidation or corruption. The need to-day is much the same, and if the study of this book but manifests both the activities of the enemy and the way in which these activities are to be met and overcome, it will be a blessing indeed.

"And it came to pass in the month Chisleu" (Neh. i. 1).

Let us take this opportunity of recording the months of the Jewish year, commencing with Abib, as indicated in Exod. xii. 1.

i. Abib or Nisan (April). Abib means "The ear month" Exod. ix. 31; xiii. 4. (In the books of Nehemiah and Esther, the name Abib is exchanged for the Babylonian name of the god of "spring", Neh. ii. 1. Est. iii. 7).
ii. Zif (May). Chaldee. "Brightness".
iii. Sivan (June). Uncertain.
iv. Thammuz (July).
v. Ab (August). In later Jewish writings.
vi. Elul (September). "Gleaning".
vii. Tisri or Ethanim (October). Tisri is found in later writings. Ethanim means "perennial".
viii. Bul (November). "Rain".

ix. Chisleu (December). Orion.
x. Tebeth (January). "Winter".
xi. Shebat (February).
xii. Adar (March).

One or two points of interest are brought to light by an examination of this list of names. During the time of Moses, the first month of the year was called Abib; the name occurs in Exodus and Deuteronomy. In the days of, and after, the captivity, the old name of the month is dropped and Nisan, a Babylonian name, takes its place. The testimony of these two names is valuable evidence for the historicity of the books of the Bible. In the days of Solomon, the names of the month had to be explained thus:--

> "In the month Zif, which is the second month" (I Kings. vi. 1).

Later, after the captivity, the explanation takes the opposite form, the names being added to explain the number, thus "In the tenth month, which is the month Tebeth" (Esther ii. 16). These features, together with the appearance of Babylonian and foreign names, are evidences of the changes that were overtaking the people of Israel. Nehemiah tells us that his inquiry after the condition of his brethren and country was made "in the month Chisleu, in the twentieth year". By comparing this passage with the next date, given in Neh. ii. 1, we discover that this was the twentieth year of Artaxerxes. Strictly speaking Artaxerxes is not a private name, but an appellative title, like Pharaoh, and was common to a number of kings. It means "Great King" (Arta = great, Kshatza = king). From the record of the Behistun rock (see The Berean Expositor, Volume IV/V, pages 78, 79) we learn that he was the husband of Esther ("the queen also sitting by him" Neh. ii. 6), and the father of Cyrus, who gave the order to rebuild the temple (Ezra i. 1).

The date of this twentieth year of Artaxerxes is B.C.454, proof of which will be found in the series already referred to entitled "Time and Place". This is of extreme importance because of the relation of this date with the prophecy of Dan. ix. On this date, therefore, Nehemiah commences his record, and tells us that he was in "Shushan the palace". The city of Shushan has been excavated, and a palace, built on a mound 1,000 feet square, laid bare. The palace had several groups of columns enclosing a central hall 200 feet square, and outside, separated by a wall some eighteen feet thick, were three porticos 200 feet wide and supported by columns. It is highly probable that in one of these, protected by awnings, the great banquet, described in Esther i. took place. The river upon which it stands is referred to in Dan. viii. 2 by the name Ulai, which occurs in the writings of Pliny, who, in his Natural History, calls it Eulaeus. To Nehemiah, on this auspicious date, came Hanani, one of his brethren and certain men of Judah (Neh. i. 2).

The edict of Ezra i. 3 had not yet gone forth; the Jews were not yet "free", consequently Nehemiah enquires concerning those that had "escaped" which were left of the captivity. These that are said to have "escaped" may have slipped away from the lands of their captivity and made their way back to Jerusalem, but there is another word, malat, that carries that meaning. The word used here, peletah, occurs in Ezra ix. 8, 13, 14, 15, "escape" and "deliverance", where the idea is not so much slipping away from captivity as being delivered from, or spared, captivity. In Ezra ix 14 the word "escaped" is practically synonymous with a "remnant" and consequently Nehemiah may refer to those who by some means had avoided transportation and so remained in their desolated and ruined city. This meaning is confirmed by the reply of Hanani,

> "The remnant that are left of the captivity there in the Province are in great affliction and reproach: the wall of Jerusalem also is broken down, and the gates thereof burned with fire" (Neh. i. 3).

We read of this company in Jer. xl. There they are called "The people that were left in the land" (6); "The poor of the land, of them that were not carried away captive to Babylon" (7); "a remnant of Judah" left by the king of Babylon (11); and "The Jews which are gathered" (15). Judæa, the portion of the royal tribe of Judah, is now called "The Province", and is so referred to by the letter sent by Tatnai to Darius the king (Ezra v. 5). It was but one of the "hundred and twenty and seven provinces", referred to in Esther i. 1. Over the whole kingdom Darius had set a hundred and twenty princes, ruled over by three presidents "of whom Daniel was first" (Dan. vi. 1, 2). The difference between the hundred and twenty-seven provinces and the hundred and twenty princes is left unexplained, but this is an evidence of truth rather than of a discrepancy, for there might have been many reasons to account for it, well known to all at the time, whereas a forger would have seen to it that the number in both accounts was the same. This remnant left in Jerusalem were in "affliction and reproach", and, moreover, the wall and the gates of the city being destroyed, the private life of the people was invaded, and the observance of the law hindered, as may be seen from the command of Nehemiah in chapter xiii. 17-22. While the gates with their locks and bars remained unrepaired, it was not possible to enforce the keeping of the sabbath against the intrusion of those who sold wares. Upon hearing this grievous news, Nehemiah tells us that he sat down and wept and mourned certain days and fasted, and then addressed himself by prayer to "The God of heaven". This divine title is peculiar to the times of the Gentiles, it suggests that God had withdrawn Himself from among His people and ruled from afar, even as Nebuchadnezzar had been forced to acknowledge that "The heavens do rule" (Dan. iv. 26, 35). The title occurs in II Chron. xxxvi. 23, and Psalm cxxxvi. 26, where the deliverance of Israel from Pharaoh and other enemies is the theme. The bulk of the occurrences is found in Ezra (eight occurrences), Nehemiah (four occurrences) and Daniel (four occurrences).

#2. Prayer, Providence and Provision.
pp. 212 - 215

The prayer of Nehemiah, consequent upon the sad report he had received concerning his people and their city, occupies the remaining portion of the opening chapter of this book. It has interesting parallels with the prayer of Daniel, recorded in Dan. ix. Both prayers are concerned with the same subject, but whereas Nehemiah's prayer was focused upon his interview with the king—which interview was to produce the commandment to restore and to build Jerusalem (Neh. ii. 7, 8 and Dan. ix. 25), the commandment being given in the year B.C.454—Daniels' prayer led to the prophetic vision of the seventy weeks, the date line of which was this self-same year, B.C.454, "From the going forth of the commandment to restore and to build Jerusalem", and which looked, not to the immediate rebuilding of the street and the wall in troublous times, but to the final and blessed restoration of the city and people at the time of the end.

Both men were moved to tears, fasting and prayer, the one by the report of Hanani, the other by the prophecy of Jeremiah (Neh. i. 4, 5; Dan. ix. 1, 2). Both addressed God as "terrible" and "dreadful" (Neh. i. 5; Dan. ix. 4), using the same Hebrew word. Both speak of God keeping covenant and mercy, both call upon God either to let His ear be attentive or to incline His ear. Both unite their personal confession with the confession of their people, and both refer to Moses as the Lord's "Servant", attributing to him the law, commandments, covenants, curses and promises, exactly as is found written in the Pentateuch.

> "Prosper I pray Thee, Thy servant this day, and grant him mercy in the sight of this man. For I was the King's cup-bearer" (Neh. i. 1).

This prayer that he might "prosper" was no self-seeking on the part of Nehemiah. It was not the prosperity of ease and plenty; it was rather the carrying forward of the project he had in mind. The primary meaning of the Hebrew words, Tsaleach is "To go over, or through, a river" and then it came to mean the surmounting of obstacles and achieving success. The obstacle that was before Nehemiah's mind was the possible attitude of the king. How would he react to the request of a captive to be released and sent back to build the walls of a rebellious city? If with suspicion and disfavour, a man so intimately attached to the royal person of the king might easily pay forfeit for such temerity with his life. He was the King's cup-bearer, or "butler" as the Hebrew word is translated in Gen. xl., where it is made clear that such an official could offend his royal master and suffer imprisonment. In an Eastern court, where poison was often resorted to, Nehemiah's was a position of great trust, and the possible corruption of one so intimately connected with the royal table, was therefore a constant course of anxiety to him who wore the crown.

When Nehemiah addressed the king he used the conventional title of respect, "Let the king live for ever!" and sought favour in his sight (Neh. ii. 3, 5), but in his prayer to the God of heaven, he referred to the mighty king Artaxerxes as "this man", yet not with any disrespect for he used the noblest Hebrew word he could, namely Ish.

Four months intervened between the report of Hanani and the request before the king. Four months of waiting, of grieving, of praying. Whether Nehemiah had any plan which he was waiting to put into effect, we cannot know, but the king observed the sadness of the man, and knowing that he was not physically ill, his comment was, "This is nothing else but sorrow of heart". Instead of saying, "Now I knew that I should be pitied by my royal master", Nehemiah makes no secret of the fact that the king's command made him "sore afraid". He promptly, yet respectfully, unburdened his heart before the king, saying,

> "Let the king live for ever: why should not my countenance be sad, when the city, the place of my father's sepulchres, lieth waste, and the gates thereof are consumed with fire?" (Neh. ii. 3).

The Lord prospered the way of Nehemiah and the first obstacle was surmounted:

> "For what dost thou make request?" (Neh. ii. 4).

This word, "make request", is often used to indicate prayer, for example, "To seek" by prayer and supplication, as in Dan. ix. 3. Before Nehemiah prays the King's aid, he puts up another prayer to the God of heaven, but this time, no analysis of it nor comparison with Daniel's is possible for it was wordless and instantaneous.

> "So I prayed to the God of heaven, and I said unto the king" (Neh. ii. 4, 5).

Like Daniel, Nehemiah may have prayed regularly "three times a day" "toward Jerusalem" (Dan. vi. 10) "kneeling on his knees". But Nehemiah knew that prayer was something beyond and above all convention; without bodily movement or the upward glance of an eye, without perceptible pause, he cast his all on God and spoke to the king.

Now, preparation for this very epoch-making movement had been made by God Himself. Thirteen years previously, a Jewess, named Esther, had been taken by the King and made queen instead of the deposed Vashti (Esther ii. 17). When the people of Israel were threatened with extermination by the hatred of Haman, Mordecai, Esther's uncle, even then realized the Lord's hand in the elevation of his niece to the throne, saying, "Who knoweth whether thou art come to the kingdom for such a time as this?" (Esther iv. 14).

Nehemiah's request was put before the king:--

> "If it please the king, and if thy servant have found favour in thy sight, that thou wouldst send me unto Judah, unto the city of my fathers' sepulchers, that I may build it" (Neh. ii. 5).

Before the record of the king's reply comes the parenthetical clause ("the queen also sitting by him"). The more frequent word for "queen" is the Hebrew Malkah, but the word here is Shegal, which occurs only in Psalm xlv. 9; Dan. v. 2, 3, 23, and in the passage before us. It is not a Hebrew word but comes from the ancient Akkadian sha "bride" and gal, "great". It would exactly fit Esther's position as the foreign bride of the great king. God sometimes answers our prayers years before they are breathed, and the coming together of the two passages—"So I prayed to the God of heaven, and I said unto the king" and the parenthetical clause "the Queen also sitting by him"—throw light upon a neglected aspect of this vital subject.

The prayer of Nehemiah was granted. Leave of absence from the court, together with letters addressed to the governors "beyond the river" guaranteeing safe convoy, together with instructions to the keeper of the King's forest, or park, (pardes, a Persian word that gives us, through the Septuagint, the word "paradise") to provide the necessary timber for the work of restoration which he was about to undertake. A man of prayer need not be unpractical: the special providence that placed Esther on the throne, did not necessarily mean that beams for building would come "out of the blue". These necessary things, though provided by the king, were nevertheless the answer of God as Nehemiah recognized when he said,

> "And the king granted me according to the good hand of my God upon me" (Neh. ii. 8).

We shall learn by the record that follows, that answered prayer and providential interposition do not render us immune from attack. Like Paul at a later date, Nehemiah could have said regarding this work to which he had been led,

> "A great door and effectual is opened unto me, and there are many adversaries" (I Cor. xvi. 9).

The story we are about to follow is one largely made up of these two elements. They are features that are associated with all true service, our own included, and if we study this record of Nehemiah aright, there will be brought to light that which will encourage us to persevere, as well as reveal the perennial methods of spiritual opposition, and the spirit in which all such animosity must be met.

We commence this study with the words that immediately follow: "Then I came to the governors beyond the river" (Neh. ii. 9) with which our next article must open.

Pentecost and the Mystery.

pp. 163 - 170

In this pamphlet we shall endeavour to demonstrate the difference between the earlier Epistles of Paul, written before Acts xxviii., and the later Epistles written after the setting aside of Israel as recorded in Acts xxviii., and show the way in which various terms, ordinances, etc., are used, and note any omissions, additions or modifications which took place owing to the change of dispensation that followed the blindness of Israel.

In examining these subjects, we must ever bear in mind the fact that they must be viewed from two standpoints—the Divine and the Human. From the Godward side the dispensations are but the unfolding of the Will of God, arranged and ordered "before the world began". From the Human side, man's failure calls for the interposition of the sovereignty of the Lord, and ushers in dispensation after dispensation. Adam, in innocence, placed in the Garden of Eden, had no intimation of the provision of the Redeemer, yet God had provided a Ransom and arranged for man's Salvation before man fell. This by no means excused the sin of man, or helped it on. So with the Pentecostal dispensation. For the third time the Gospel of the Kingdom was proclaimed (1st by John the Baptist, 2nd by the Lord Himself, 3rd by Peter and the twelve), accompanied with signs and wonders attesting the fact of the Resurrection of Christ as the Son of David. Fully and unreservedly the Apostles preached, declaring, upon the authority of God and the whole of the Old Testament, that all that was needed to usher in the Kingdom was the Repentance of Israel. Nothing in the economy of the time could be found to give the slightest hint that God was preparing something, totally different, which was to be introduced upon the manifested failure of Israel. But this is in fact what the Lord was doing. With our fuller knowledge, gained by the subsequent revelation of the Mystery "hid in God", we may look upon this transitional period, and see that which none could know without the key supplied in the later Epistles.

We have abused this added knowledge by reading into the words of a dispensation that PRECEDED the revelation of the Great Secret, that which was unrevealed to man at the time. The pre-eminence of Israel in earthly blessing is the characteristic of the Millennial Kingdom, and this is emphasized by the Apostle Paul in the very last Epistle of the Pentecostal dispensation (Rom. xi. 17-21). Looking back now we can see, scattered through these earlier Epistles, some indications that another dispensation must come, but these are so veiled, or so arranged, as to harmonize with the anticipations of the Millennial Kingdom that characterize the early epistles.

First of all, we would direct our readers' attention to the following list of some of the words used in the earlier Epistles, but which occur rarely, if at all, in the later ones. The usefulness of this list would be increased if we included in our reckoning the "Acts", the "Gospels", and "Hebrews", and the number of examples would then be largely multiplied. We, however, leave this for our readers to work out for themselves.

In the Epistles to the Church, Christ is never called the "Shepherd" although He is so named both in Hebrews and I Peter. The members of the Church which is the Body of Christ, are never called "Sheep" although this title is found in those parts of the N.T. devoted to callings other than that of the mystery.

It would take us too far from our present theme to deal with "the other sheep" of John x. 16, we note it here in order that it may be evident that the passage has not been overlooked, but refer the reader to other issues of this series that deal with the wider ministry of the Gospel according to John.

In another pamphlet, we examine the subject of the "One Body", and find that in I Cor. xii., it was explained as being "Partial", in contrast with the "Fullness" of Eph. i. 23.

Let us examine this subject a little closer, and we shall see that many of the essential elements of the "One Body" are to be found scattered in these earlier Epistles.

It will be remembered that the Unity of the Spirit, which has to be kept "in love" is defined in Eph. iv. as consisting of One Body, One Spirit, One Hope of our calling, One Lord, One Faith, One Baptism, and One God and Father.

In this wonderful sevenfold unity the Three Persons in the Godhead have their place. In I Cor. xii. 4-6 in connection with the diversities, administrations and operations of the gifts, which formed the basis of the ecclesiastical "body" (I Cor. xii. 12-27), we read that it is the same SPIRIT, the same LORD, and the same GOD, Who worketh all in all.

In verse 13 we read, “For by ONE SPIRIT are we all BAPTIZED into ONE BODY”.

In I Cor. viii. 6 we read, “To us ONE GOD, THE FATHER . . . . . and ONE LORD JESUS CHRIST”. Again we read, “And now abideth FAITH, HOPE, and LOVE” (I Cor. xiii. 13). It will be seen that the seven wonderful components of the Unity of the Spirit are here, although not yet brought together in order, nor invested with their fuller and higher meaning. Had the nation of Israel repented, and the Kingdom come as a consequence, these passages would have exactly fitted the prophecy of Zech. xiv. 9, “And the LORD shall be king over all the earth; in that day shall there be ONE LORD and His Name ONE”.

As it is, the Kingdom is in abeyance; and instead of ONE LORD being King, He is exalted as HEAD of the Church, His Body; not “over all the earth”, but “in the Heavenlies”; for “earthly things” are connected with the Kingdom of Israel (John iii. 12).

The One Body of I Cor. xii. is connected with “Gifts”. “All these worketh that one and the selfsame Spirit, dividing to every man severally as He will, FOR AS the body is one and hath many members, and all the members of that one body, being many, are one body: so also the Christ. FOR by one Spirit are we all baptized into one body . . . . . and have been all made to drink into one spirit”. The fact that all had a gift is compared to the body having many and varied members, yet all composing one body. The words, “All made to drink into one Spirit”, refer to the promise of John vii. 37, 39. (Compare Mark xvi. 14-20; Acts ii. 33).

A question arising out of the foregoing subject is: “Does the term ‘The Baptism of the Spirit’, of the Pentecostal dispensation, mean the same thing as the Baptism of Eph. iv.?” We hope to demonstrate in another pamphlet that the “One Baptism” of Eph. iv. is the Baptism of the Spirit, to which the reader is referred. We sometimes meet a Christian who tells us that he has “received the Baptism of the Holy Ghost”, or that he is “Praying for the Second blessing”. “Second blessings” may be a legitimate subject for prayer, on the other hand, they may result from undispensational views. The believers’ charter COMMENCES (in Eph. i. 3) with the fact that God “HATH blessed us with ALL spiritual blessings”.

The book of the Acts gives us very clear data as to what the Baptism of the Spirit is. Acts i. 5 and ii. 14-16 make it quite clear as to what the term refers. Let us examine the passages carefully:

Acts ii. 1-4.	“And began to SPEAK with other tongues.”
Acts viii. 18.	“When Simon SAW . . . . . the Holy Spirit was given.”
Acts x. 44-46.	“They HEARD them speak with tongues.”
Acts xix. 6.	“They SPAKE with tongues and prophesied” and I Cor. xii. 1-27.

Almost without exception, miraculous gifts followed the Baptism of the Spirit—but such is nowhere hinted at in the Epistles written after Acts xxviii. Ministering the Spirit and working miracles is connected with justifying faith, in Gal. iii. 5, 6. Is it so now? The One Baptism of I Cor. xii. is essentially connected with Miracle and Supernatural Gifts. Is it so now? Do members of the One Body possess the power to prophesy, speak with tongues, take up serpents, and drink deadly things unhurt? Do they really believe the words to be true of themselves, "They shall LAY HANDS on the sick, and they SHALL recover"?

In a former day, Paul could raise the dead and heal the sick: but this was before Acts xxviii. After Acts xxviii. he instructs Timothy to use wine medicinally, and leaves a valued helper behind, sick! Faith to believe that the Lord can heal one, however, must not be confused with these miraculous gifts.

The Baptism of the Spirit in Pentecostal times was subsequent to salvation: often by the space of days, weeks, and months; whereas Eph. i. 13 says that "we are sealed 'upon believing' (pisteusantes) with the Holy Spirit of promise, Who is the Earnest of our inheritance".

Eph. ii. 15, 16, links the One Body with the Work of Calvary, "For to make in Himself of the twain ONE NEW MAN", "And that He might reconcile both unto God in ONE BODY by the cross". When the Holy Spirit quickens a dead sinner into life, He, at the same moment links him for ever WITH CHRIST; raising him up, together and seating him together with Christ in the heavenlies. This union with the Risen Saviour makes the believer a member of the ONE BODY, and neither the "laying on of hands" can confer, nor the "excommunication" of men take away, this blessed position of grace. The One Body of I Cor. xii. was evidenced by "signs" and "wonders". The Unity of the Spirit is without any such evidence; in fact, it is belied by many who profess to be upon the ground of the One Body, by their manifest divisions; it is belied by the ignorance of the vast number who seem hardly conscious of its existence on the page of Scripture. No visible signs attest its reality. It is among the things "not seen, yet eternal", which faith receives. A man may have evidences of salvation—but the truth of the One Body is totally independent of any and every appeal to sight, rite or ordinance.

Let the reader now turn to the Acts and note how vitally "Water Baptism" is connected with the Baptism of the Spirit. See, for example, Acts x. 44-48.

The subject of Water Baptism is a large one. The writer believes that its administration was by Immersion; and was only that of believers. But the question of "administration" is only of importance if Water Baptism is a "command" for us to-day, in this dispensation; the greater question being "Does Water Baptism belong to the present dispensation?"

No one can read the opening chapters of the Acts without at once seeing that the cry of John the Baptist "Repent ye, for the Kingdom of Heaven is at hand", and the baptism that accompanied that proclamation, are there taken up again. The baptism, truly, is no longer "John's baptism", but in many ways it is the same.

The Apostle Peter no sooner sees that conviction has pierced the heart of his hearers than he says, "Repent, AND BE BAPTIZED, every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ, for the remission of sins, and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost" (Acts ii. 38). "Then they that gladly received his word were baptized, and the same day there were added about three thousand souls" (verse 41).

At Samaria "When they believed . . . . . they were baptized" (Acts viii. 12). In Acts xvi. 14, 15, we read of Lydia, who was baptized, and her house. In xvi. 30-33, the apostle Paul speaks to the Jailer, "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved, and thy house . . . . . and was baptized, he and all his".

So with Crispus, in Acts xviii. 8 (with which read I Cor. i. 14), "many of the Corinthians, hearing, believed and were baptized". The Apostle in his defence (Acts xxii. 16) says of his conversion, "Arise, and be baptized, and wash away thy sins, calling on the name of the Lord". We do not believe that unbiased exegesis would attempt to divorce the "baptism" here from the "washing away of sins". It is only when we mix up dispensations that we are driven to wish that some Scriptures said other than they do. That baptism had a typical teaching as to cleansing can also be gathered by reference to Heb. ix. 19, "Meats and drinks and diverse WASHINGS and CARNAL ORDINANCES". The word translated "washings" is rendered "baptisms" in Heb. vi. 2.

Some of the passage quoted above, from the Acts, include the house of the believer as well as himself. Lydia, the Jailer, Crispus and Zaccheus, believed, "and their house". It is important to distinguish between "house" and "household", especially as the A.V. uses both terms interchangeably. The "house" refers to parents and children, the "household" includes the family, servants, visitors, etc., etc. The Apostle spoke of Salvation to the jailer for him and his house (oikos), he then spoke to all that were in his household (oikia). In I Cor. i. 16 the word household should be house. "To you, and to your children", the promise was given; and family conversion and blessing seems to have been the general thing during the period of the Acts. Is it so now?

The Apostle Paul refers to another wonderful symbolism in Rom. vi., where he speaks of being "buried with Christ". It must, however, be remembered that the primary teaching of Rom. vi. is not Water Baptism, but Death to Sin (verse 2). Those who had been united to Christ in His Resurrection Life were to remember that they had also been crucified with him and buried with Him. Burial with Christ is a solemn yet blessed truth for us to-day, but quite independent of Baptism or other rites.

We have, in passing, referred to I Cor. i.; let us turn to that passage again, as verse 14-17 are often used in this controversy.

It is both absurd and untrue to teach from these verses that the Apostle Paul did not baptize, or that he considered baptism in that period to be wrong. It is not that he thanked God that the Corinthian believers were not baptized, but that he was thankful that he, personally, had had so little to do with it, because the Corinthians had turned the Divine ordinance into a party cry, and had gathered around those who had baptized them, and made them into party leaders. This Paul abominated.

There is, however, in verse 17, a statement which demands most careful attention. We do not deny that the Apostle means, by the words "Christ sent me not to baptize but to preach the Gospel" that the Lord desires faith in Himself and not faction over ordinances; but we venture to say that, with even this thought in mind, not one of the Apostles who had received the commission to "Go preach . . . . . baptize" could ever have so definitely said "Christ SENT ME NOT to baptize BUT to preach the Gospel".

The Apostle Paul hereby makes another statement which helps us to see that he was not to be reckoned among the twelve Apostles. For, although he laboured in conjunction with them during the proclamation of the Kingdom (which was always accompanied by baptism) yet such was his commission that, when the Kingdom was no more, and baptism came naturally into disuse, his Apostleship only took upon itself its higher and greater meaning. It is abundantly clear that during the Pentecostal dispensation there were two baptisms.

Eph. iv. as definitely tells us that, in the Unity of the Spirit which we are called to "keep" there is "ONE BAPTISM". The one baptism whereby a believer of the present dispensation is made a member of the One Body is the work of the Holy Spirit, which not only united him on Resurrection ground to the Risen Saviour, but has buried his old nature together with Christ—the Baptism wherewith Christ was baptized in death, an aspect of baptism often ignored (Matt. xx. 22, 23).

The Epistles to Timothy and Titus contain explicit directions to the leaders in the churches "that they may know how they ought to behave in the House of God", but we look in vain for any direction as to baptism—not a word of instruction or caution as to administration, as to the fit candidates for it, as to any of the many things that it is continually necessary to be told and taught wherever baptism is practiced.

Linked with the subject of baptism is that of the Lord's Supper. In I Cor. xi. the Apostle declares how he received instructions from the Lord on this important subject, and in other parts of this Epistle he refers to the Lord's Supper. In I Cor. x. 17, he draws a lesson of Unity from the fact of there being one loaf, just as he does in I Cor. xii. by the fact that the diverse gifts were given by the one Spirit. Water Baptism, the Lord's Supper, and gifts, were all closely connected with the Kingdom, and when the Kingdom became in abeyance, these consistently became in abeyance too. Hence, we read through Ephesians, Philippians, Colossians, I and II Timothy and Titus in vain to find the SLIGHTEST reference to ordinances of any kind whatever. Timothy needed no instruction as to ordinances, neither do we; for we are in a dispensation where ordinances are not commanded. It is very remarkable, and worthy of notice, that those Christians who have brought to light most prominently during the past century the subject of the One Body are those who have caused more divisions than any others; and have stumbled more enquiring believers as to this very subject, by their tyrannical conception of the Lord's Supper.

Closely allied to the ordinances is the subject of Church Government. Here again a comparison of I Corinthians and Timothy and Titus will lead to the same conclusion as above, namely, that there is a TOTAL DIFFERENCE between the two periods.

I Cor. xii.	I Tim. iii. and Titus i.
7-11. "Every man" possessed a miraculous gift; "every one of you hath a psalm, hath a doctrine, hath a tongue, hath a revelation, hath an interpretation" (xiv. -26). "Let the prophets speak two or three" (xiv. -29).	"An overseer must be blameless the husband of one wife, vigilant, sober, of good behaviour, given to hospitality, apt to teach, etc., etc. Likewise the Deacons" (Read I Tim. iii. 1-13, Titus i. 5-14).

In the passages which have reference to the Pentecostal period, the instructions to the church deal with miraculous gifts at every point; while in the parallel passages in Timothy and Titus (dealing with the ministry in the church), there is not a single mention of gifts; the only qualifications specified being those of a moral and godly character. I Cor. xii. - xiv. is inspired Scripture, yet we believe we are right when we say that these chapters would have been utterly useless, so far as practical instruction was concerned, to the churches where Timothy and Titus had to work; simply because they deal with an element which is conspicuously absent from the church at the time of writing the later Epistles.

While we find some things omitted in the later Epistles, as ordinances and miraculous ministry, we find the subject of the ministry of women repeated. This is valuable for it shows us that, where anything which belonged to the Pentecostal dispensation was to be perpetuated in the New dispensation, the Apostle said so, and repeated his instructions.

I Cor. xiv. 34	I Tim. ii. 8-14.
"Let your women keep silence in the churches: for it is not permitted unto them to speak, but to be under obedience, as also saith the law" (i.e. Gen. iii. 16).	"I will therefore that men (males Gk) pray." "I suffer not a woman to teach nor to usurp authority over the man, but to be in silence. For Adam was first formed, Eve, and Adam was not deceived, but the woman, being deceived, was in the transgression."

A reference to I Cor. xi. will show that the question of being veiled, which was emphasized in the Pentecostal dispensation, is not repeated in I Timothy.

If it be not invidious to compare portions of Scripture together, we would ask—Are not Ordinances and Spiritual Gifts, as important that the Apostle was inspired to repeat the one, and inspired to omit the others? We believe that this silence of Scripture is eloquent to those who have ears to hear. There was no need for instruction as to the use, or the abuse of "Gifts", if no one possessed them. There was no need of regulations as to Baptism in Water, for the Apostle had previously instructed them as to the One baptism. There was no need for the solemn warning about the Lord's Supper; for that, being connected with the New Covenant, was, like the Kingdom and the Covenants, in abeyance, believers now having not even a type to remind them of their absent Lord, but simply faith, unaided by sight or feeling, just faith in the Word of God.

Summarizing, we have found by comparison that—

(1) There is a distinct difference between the Epistles written before and after Acts xxviii.
(2) That the difference is chiefly found in connection with the omission of Gifts and Ordinances, from the later Epistles.
(3) These belonging to the "Kingdom" help to show that the dispensation before Acts xxviii. was connected with "Kingdom" promises; whereas, now, there is a dispensation connected with a secret purpose revealed only after Israel had proved unfaithful.
(4) That the Baptism of the Spirit is not to be taken as identical in the two dispensations.

The Second Sphere of Blessing.
The New Jerusalem.

(Being the substance of an address given by the Principal at one of the Saturday Conferences at the Chapel of the Opened Book.)

#1. The subject introduced.
pp. 36 - 40

Self-government! Democracy! The voice of the people! What visions of peace, of liberty, of prosperity, these words conjure up in the mind of man! Ever since the absolute autocracy of Nebuchadnezzar Gentile rule has gravitated towards this goal. Each succeeding stage of development however has been a step downward. The limited monarchy of the Medo-Persian succession is likened, not to gold, but to silver, and, at the time of the end, Gentile rule will be an unholy mixture of "iron and clay". Babel early usurped dominion in the earth, and its dread power persists right through until the Day of the Lord. In the book of the Revelation, Babylon "reigns over the kings of the earth" and corrupts them. By a dread ordeal Nebuchadnezzar himself learned that "the heavens do rule", and the Saviour taught His disciples to pray, "Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done on earth, as it is in heaven".

For a period the earthly Jerusalem will be the Lord's centre of government on the earth, but the Satanic rebellion that arises at the end of the Millennium shows that the earthly Jerusalem had neither the wisdom nor the power to succeed. Hence, at the last, we see God's solution in the form of the New Jerusalem that descends from God out of heaven. Those who are the destined rulers and who occupy this city are the overcomers—those who have endured; those who have been "faithful over a few things". These and allied features will be presented in the course of the following study, and though our calling and sphere of blessing are far removed from this heavenly city that comes down to earth, we can rejoice at the prospect it holds out for "peace on earth" in the fullest and most enduring sense of the term.

That "God made the country, but man made the town" is one of those sayings that are only partly true. If we limit its application to the days of industrialism, its force can be felt, but if we project it into the prophetic future, it will be found to be false, for in each of the three spheres of blessing our attention is focused upon a city and citizenship. Of the earthly Jerusalem the sum of glory is expressed in the proud boast, "This man was born here" (Psa. lxxxvii. 6). Of the second sphere, all that is revealed of it is concerned with the "Heavenly City". That the third sphere of blessing—that pertaining to the mystery and the church of the One Body—is no exception is also clear, for members of the One Body are "fellow-citizens of the saints" (Eph. ii. 19), and Phil. iii. 20, using the word politeuma, translated in the A.V. "conversation", reveals that "our citizenship is in heaven".

Two cities represent, between them, the claim to rule the earth: they are Babylon, Satan's seat, and Jerusalem, the city of God. During the Millennium the earthly Jerusalem is to be the centre of authority in the earth, "for out of Zion shall go forth the law, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem" (Isa. ii. 3), but at the close of the thousand years, when Satan is let loose again, many of the nations will gather for battle, "and compass the camp of the saints about, and the beloved city" (Rev. xx. 9).

Following the great white throne judgment of Rev. xx. 11-15, comes the New Heaven, and New Earth, together with the New Jerusalem, which is seen descending from God out of heaven. Here at last the kingdom prayer will be answered. God's will shall then be done on earth, as it is in heaven. Here, at last, the lesson learned by Nebuchadnezzar, that "the heavens do rule", shall be universally acknowledged. Here, too, the title of this kingdom used by Matthew, "The Kingdom of Heaven", will be literally justified.

In the beginning there were but two spheres, "The heavens and the earth". During the ages, there have been three. In the city of the second sphere we are therefore prepared to find associations that are special and peculiar to its own distinctive purpose, and while the blessings of the church which is the Body of Christ are not to be enjoyed there, any light that can be thrown upon the distinctive place that the New Jerusalem occupies in the Divine scheme, will but make our own high and holy calling the more clearly seen and appreciated.

We therefore turn to the Scriptures and seek to discover all that is written and implied concerning this second and heavenly sphere.

Scriptural References.

Definite reference to the New Jerusalem is found only in three books of the Bible, namely Galatians, Hebrews and the Revelation.

The purpose with which the epistle to the Galatians was written does not necessitate an excursion into the question of spheres of blessing or reward for faithfulness, consequently the one reference to the New Jerusalem found there is in an allegory, where the Apostle likens "Jerusalem which now is, and is in bondage with her children" to Hagar and her son Ishmael, "the son of the bondwoman", but Jerusalem which is above, which is free, and the mother of them all, is likened to Sarah, Isaac being "the son of the freewoman" (Gal. iv. 21 - v. 1).

Paul has used the New Jerusalem to serve as an additional argument in his fight for freedom, but in this he had no intention of expanding the subject or of dealing with it dispensationally. The only note that arrests us in reading is that he contrasts Jerusalem "that now is" with Jerusalem which "is above", the contrast of "now" and "then" being implied but unsaid. The New Jerusalem will not only be "above", but belongs to the future day when the "former things are passed away".

The references in Hebrews to the New Jerusalem form an integral part of the teaching of that epistle, and are not brought in by the way or merely to enforce a point, as is the reference in Galatians. We cannot hope to appreciate the place of the New Jerusalem in the Divine scheme if we are ignorant of or hazy regarding the outline of Hebrews as a whole.

> Chapters i. and ii. ranged under the heading, "The word spoken", and > Chapters xiii. 25- and xiii. under the heading, "Him that speaketh".
> The remainder, that is the bulk of the epistle, is concerned with two alternatives, "On to Perfection" (iii. - vi.) and "Back to Perdition" (x. 19 - xii. 25-), with a great explanatory section which may be headed, "Perfection; where found".

Now the references to the New Jerusalem are found in Heb. xi. and xii., consequently a fuller analysis of this and the corresponding section, iii. - vi., is called for.

Hebrews iii. - vi.	ON TO PERFECTION. |
	Let us come boldly.
	Example of unbelief.
	Perfect v. babes.
	No renewal unto repentance.
	Senses exercised.
	Crucify afresh the Son of God.
Hebrews x. 19 - xii. 25.	BACK TO PERDITION. |
	Let us draw near.
	Example of faith.
	Sons v. firstborn.
	Found no place for repentance.
	Discipline exercised.
	Trod under foot the Son of God.

The example of unbelief in Heb. iii. and iv. is that of Israel in the wilderness who, though they were all redeemed from Egypt, yet did not all enter the land of promise, notable exceptions being Caleb and Joshua, types of the overcomer. The examples of faith given in Heb. xi. are drawn from many parts of the O.T., beginning with Abel, but, however varied the experience recorded, one thing is common to all, "These all died in faith, not having received the promises, but having seen them afar off, and were persuaded of them, and embraced them, and confessed that they were strangers and pilgrims on the earth" (Heb. xi. 13).

In this connection Abraham is cited as the great example. To him the land had been given, yet "he looked for a city which hath foundations". He and those of like faith with himself "declared plainly that they seek a country"; "they desire a better country, this is, an heavenly; wherefore God is not ashamed to be called their God; for He hath prepared for them a city" (Heb. xi. 14-16).

Here therefore is a calling that has the character of reward (Heb. xi. 26, 35): it is over and above the calling that is unconditional and received as a gift.

Turning to Heb. xii., we have a more specific statement concerning the heavenly Jerusalem, and the structure will be useful in showing the development of the theme.

Hebrews xii. 15 - 25-.

A | 15. | a | Looking diligently.
b | Lest any man fall back.
B | 16, 17. The birthright bartered (Prototokia).
C | 18-21. Ye are not come. Six "ands". SINAI.
C | 22, 23. But ye are come. Seven "ands". SION.
B | 23, 24. The birthright enjoyed (Prototokos).
A | 25-. | a | See.
b | Lest ye refuse.

Heb. xii. 5-25- is occupied with a twofold theme. Verses 5-14 deal with sons, but verses 15-24 deal particularly with the firstborn and the birthright. The section dealing with "sons" speaks of those things which all are partakers, whether sons or firstborn. The section dealing with the firstborn, however, deals with what the firstborn may attain unto, with warning that a birthright can be exchanged for a mess of pottage. When dealing with the New Jerusalem, we are not dealing with salvation, but with those things that accompany salvation, which are essential to the attaining to this added blessing of the second sphere. Just as Ephesians is concerned with the gift of grace, and Philippians with the added prize, so Romans is concerned with the gift of grace, and Hebrews with the added prize, the only difference being the dispensations in which they obtain, and the spheres in which they operate: they are parallel but not identical (see previous study on pages 7 and 8). While salvation is by grave and therefore "sure", the very nature of a race and of running for a crown introduces contingency; "So run, that ye mat obtain"; "Not as though I had already attained". So Heb. xii. 15-25- opens with the warning, "Looking diligently lest any man fail of the grace of God". It does not say "fall from the grace of God", but uses the word hustereo, "to come short", as found in Heb. iv. 1. Not sonship simply, but the birthright in particular; not deliverance from Egypt, but triumphant possession of Canaan is before us.

In contrast with Sinai Heb. xii. places Sion.

> "But ye are come unto Sion, and unto the city of the living God . . . . . and to the church of the firstborn . . . . . and to the spirits of righteous ones having been perfected" (Heb. xii. 22-24).

The structure of Heb. xii. 15-25-, already given, places in correspondence "The bartered birthright" and "The birthright enjoyed", for, as already noted, the two words "birthright" and "firstborn" are respectively prototokia and prototokos, the warning being to those who, for a brief period of ease in this world, forfeited the crown of faith in the next. Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, though heirs of the land of Canaan, "dwelt in tents"; though rightful possessors, were willing to be "pilgrims and strangers". Moses had in view the difference between the pleasures of sin for a season, and the recompence of the reward. The second sphere, the heavenly Jerusalem, therefore, is largely associated with that aspect of truth which speaks of Prize, Crown and Reigning, Hebrews being a parallel with Philippians, not with Ephesians.

We have the passages in the Revelation to examine, but before doing so, it may be useful to enumerate the characteristics of this Heavenly City. It is called "free", "holy" and "great"; the city that hath "foundations"; the city whose Builder and Maker is "God"; the city of the "living God". It is called the Jerusalem that is "above", the Jerusalem that is "heavenly" and the Jerusalem that is "new". In Hebrews the city is also referred to as a "heavenly country" and "a better, that is, an heavenly country"—heavenly because it is "better", presumably, than the earthly sphere and city.

Hitherto we have read no description of this city, nor found any definite link between it and Old Testament prophecy. These features however come prominently forward in the references found in the book of the Revelation and will occupy our attention in the succeeding article.

#2. The City Described.
pp. 70 - 73

The first reference in the book of Revelation to the New Jerusalem makes it clear that the same element of reward which we have observed attaching to it in the epistle to the Hebrews is to be remembered here:

> "Him that overcometh . . . . . the name of the city of my God, which is New Jerusalem, which cometh down out of heaven from my God" (Rev. iii. 12).

It will be observed that in describing this city John was obliged to include one feature out of many recorded in chapter xxi., namely, that it came down out of heaven from God. This fact is recorded twice in Rev. xxi. and is the first thing noted by John in verses 2 and 10.

For our salvation the Son of God "came down", or "descended"; in John's Gospel, particularly, as the Bread of Life which came down from heaven. In Ephesians, as the One Who afterward ascended far above all heavens that He might fill all things, we read that He "descended first", and at the second coming, as recorded in I Thess. iv., the Lord Himself shall "descend from heaven". The descent of the holy city from heaven to earth is for the purposes of grace and glory. It constitutes "the tabernacle of God" among men, with the consequent dwelling by God upon the earth among His people. The mind fails in the attempt to imagine the effect upon the world when at last it can be said, "The tabernacle of God is with men"! Some of the immediate effects are noted—Tears wiped away, and death, sorrow, crying and pain, gone for ever! The nations of the earth shall walk in the light of this city of God; Kings will bring their glory and honour unto it; the glory and honour of the nations shall be brought unto it, but nothing that defiles shall enter its gates!

With the coming of this city to the earth, Paradise will be restored, the tree of life made accessible, the healing of the nations provided for, and the curse removed! This city is the answer to the cry of the nations; here is the perfect administration; here is God's seat of government, "The throne of God and of the Lamb shall be in it" and two great facts are recorded of His servants; "The shall serve Him", "They shall reign for ever and ever".

The physical description of the city can but be read and pondered. Whether the words, "The length and the breadth and the height of it are equal" (Rev. xxi. 16) indicate a cube, or whether the great pyramidical towers of Babylon are to be taken as blasphemous anticipations, cannot be dogmatically asserted. We can however give the reasons we have culled from the Scripture which lead us to think that, not a cube, but a great pyramid, with terrace rising above terrace is, possibly, the plan of this city.

First, the New Jerusalem is most definitely placed in opposition to Babylon.

> BABYLON.—"And there came one of the seven angels which had the seven vials, and talk with me, saying unto me, Come hither; I will show unto thee the judgment of the great whore, that sitteth upon many waters" (Rev. xvii. 1).
>
> NEW JERUSALEM.—"And there came unto me one of the seven angels which had the seven vials full of the seven last plagues, and talked with me, saying, Come hither, I will show thee the bride, the Lamb's wife" (Rev. xxi. 9).

That a parallel is intended is obvious, and therefore needs no proof. Further examination confirms this and strengthens the conviction.

Babylon.	New Jerusalem
Carried away in spirit into the wilderness.	Carried away in spirit to a great and high mountain.
Seated upon a scarlet coloured beast. Blasphemy.	Descending out of heaven from God. Glory. Light. Most precious.
Precious stones, pearls and gold.	Precious stones, pearls and gold.
No more harper, candle or rejoicing.	No more death, sorrow or curse.
The habitation of demons.	Nothing that defileth.
Kings of the earth corrupted.	Kings of the earth bring glory.
Nations made drunk.	Nations walk in light.

So the list might be extended. The New Jerusalem is most evidently God's answer to Babylon's usurpation.

Near to the ruins of Babylon is a huge mound which is called Birs-Nimrod, or the tower of Nimrod: it covers a square surface of 49,000 feet, and is nearly 300 feet high. Herodotus saw it while it retained something of its ancient glories. He describes it as being constructed of a series of eight towers, with a way running spirally around them. Nebuchadnezzar restored this tower, using different coloured tiles for each stage of the building, some of which can be seen in the British Museum.

The twelve foundations of the New Jerusalem, the twelve apostles of the Lamb, the twelve gates of pearl, all associate this city with the people and kingdom of Israel. It is the realization of "The kingdom of heaven", "The days of heaven upon earth", that Moses speaks of (Deut. xi. 21), the rule of the heavens that Nebuchadnezzar himself perceived must come.

Israel as a nation, when restored to favour, is likened to the restoration of an unfaithful wife, who had been "put away". The "marriage" of the Lamb, which is associated so intimately with the New Jerusalem, and the fact that this city is likened to a "Bride", make it impossible to interpret this event simply of the restoration of back-sliding Israel. On the contrary, here is a new company; one that has been faithful in a world of apostacy. Like Abraham, who endured and waited, they are "overcomers" and they reign with Christ. It is this that constitutes them a separate "sphere", regardless of whether they are in heaven or on earth.

In the Millennium there will be a glorious temple, of which Ezekiel was inspired to speak specifically. In the New Jerusalem there will be no temple, "For the Lord God Almighty and the Lamb are the temple of it". In Rev. xxi. we learn that God and the Lamb are the "temple", and in Rev. xxii. that the "throne" of God and of the Lamb is in it, bringing together the offices of priest and king.

The Heavenly Jerusalem, with its rule by the great King-Priest, is God's answer to the cry of the oppressed and the vain dreams of the Dictator. The failure of all human rule lies in the fact that the heart of man is beyond the power of any government, either to cleanse or to deliver. Crime can be the legitimate subject of law, police and parliament, but sin lies outside their scope.

In the beginning, before sin entered into the universe, there were two spheres, "The heaven and the earth". During the ages, while the great redemptive purpose runs its course, "heaven itself" is at a distance, and a temporary "firmament" called for the time being "heaven" is brought into place. This firmament or heaven however is destined to pass away. The three spheres of blessing remain until the purpose of the ages is attained, but whether dispensational differences will continue or be modified when "God" shall be "all in all" is not a matter of revelation, and does not come into the present discussion.

While the purpose of the ages is unfolding there must persist "Three spheres of blessing", each in living contact with the others, but never invading or neutralizing their distinctiveness. The heavenly Jerusalem is the link between heaven and earth, but, while it is called "heavenly", it comes down from God out of heaven. It is the link with the earth, for it descends to its appointed site in Bible lands, yet while on the earth it is not of it, being distinctly a heavenly city, even though not in heaven itself.

Into these wider inferences and themes we cannot enter now. It is a joy to the believer to know, while living in a world that must be shaken to its collapse, that there is a "continuing city", a city which has "foundations", "whose Builder and Maker is God".

The Self-Drawn Portrait of the Apostle Paul.

#14. Separate Features: His Humanity.
pp. 25 - 27

> "Here we see . . . . . that tender friendship which watches over the health of Timothy, even with a mother's care, that intense sympathy in the joys and sorrows of his converts, which could say, even to the rebellious Corinthians, 'Ye are in our hearts to die and live with you'. That longing desire for the intercourse of affection, and that sense of loneliness when it was withheld, which perhaps is the most touching feature of all, because it approaches most nearly to a weakness" (Conybeare and Howson).

Timothy was given to the Apostle as a son. Over and over again this is the title that he uses, "My son Timothy". Like a parent, the Apostle knew the many fears and anxieties that love and affection induce, as is evinced by his very epistles to Timothy, which show a remarkable interchange of thought, human in the extreme.

Who but Paul, thinking of Timothy, would crowd together in four verses such themes as elect angels, partiality, laying on of hands, personal purity, water drinking, wine, digestion, and Timothy's "oft infirmities", sins, and judgment? (I Tim. v. 21-24). Yet the transition is easy, natural and intensely human. The Apostle is urging Timothy, though young, to exercise himself in the office to which he had been called. He had to deal with charges made against elders, and Paul directs his eyes, above and beyond all earthly tribunals, to the Lord Himself and the elect angels. In view of that judgment-seat, Timothy would be strengthened to administer justice impartially. On the other hand, in appointing men to office in the church, Paul did not inculcate impartiality at the expense of discrimination, nor must Timothy be so falsely charitable as to partake of other men's sins. So, with all this burden resting upon his son, Paul says, "Keep thyself pure", yet, as he writes the words, he remembers that, if anything, Timothy was inclined to be too reserved, to abstemious, and, fearing lest this emphasis upon purity might be misinterpreted, he adds:

> "Be no longer a water-drinker, but use a little wine for thy stomach's sake and thine oft infirmities" (I Tim. v. 23).

Perhaps the responsibility attaching to the appointment of bishops, who must not be "given to wine" (I Tim. iii. 3), or of deacons, who must not be "given to much wine" (I Tim. iii. 8), had led Timothy to feel that he too should abstain.

In all this we can see the tender care of the Apostle for his son.

This same interchange of theme is brought about in passages where the Apostle reveals how intense was his desire for human fellowship. When Paul left Berea for Athens, Timothy remained behind, but upon arriving at Athens he sent a command that Silas and Timothy should come to him with all speed. Yet, with blessed vacillation, when Timothy did arrive at Athens, the Apostle's deep concern for the faith of the Thessalonians made him, however reluctantly, send Timothy off again:

> "Wherefore when we could no longer forbear, we thought it good to be left at Athens alone; and sent Timothy our brother . . . . . For this cause, when I could no longer forbear, I sent to know your faith" (I Thess. iii. 1-5).

How perfectly free the Apostle was from airs, pretensions, affectations. In II Tim. iv. he is a self-acknowledged martyr; he knows that he has finished his course; he is assured of a crown. Does he pause, for one moment, to strike an attitude? Never! In the course of his statement concerning his triumph, he drops from the skies to the earth, and reveals his intensely human heart, saying,

> "Do thy diligence to come shortly unto me, for Demas hath forsaken me" (II Tim. iv. 9, 10).

Then, after other statements and instructions—in which he finds time to speak well of Mark, who once turned back (II Tim. iv. 11)—he says to Timothy:

> "The cloke that I left at Troas with Carpus, when thou comest, bring with thee, and the books, but especially the parchments" (verse 13).

In view of death, one might almost have forgotten parchments and books, but how lovely to see this utter lack of affectation in his request for the cloke left behind at Troas. So, on the Apostle goes, to the end of the epistle. Alexander the coppersmith is remembered, and the sad fact that at his first defence the Apostle was forsaken is immediately countered by that irrepressible catching up of a subject: "No man stood with me . . . . . Notwithstanding the Lord stood by me" (verses 16 and 17).

The same swift play with words is seen in II Tim. ii. 9: "I suffer trouble, even unto bonds", and then, quick as a flash, he adds: "But the word of God is not bound." Incidentally, it is seldom that we hear this passage read with any intelligent appreciation of the mind that prompted it.

So, to return to chapter iv. He immediately passes from the reference in verse 8 to the crown to be given at the appearing of the Lord, to the urging of Timothy to come quickly: he has no sooner speaks of the heavenly kingdom, than he salutes the saints and says to Timothy: "Do thy diligence to come before winter" (verse 21).

Such is a sketch, and but a sketch, of the earthen vessel. Less than the least of all saints, yet not one whit behind the chiefest of the Apostles. A man of many moods, and several evident infirmities, but so enraptured by the Christ of God, so enthralled with His great love, that, time and again, we forget the earthen vessel for the glory it contained. May we not believe that if sanity and sanctity are near one another in sound and meaning, that it would be well for us all to be able to manifest the same human traits as were seen in spirit where the Apostle shines so brightly in the reflected glory of the Lord he loved.

We do not pretend to have given a portrait of the Apostle but, as we have said, only a sketch, which may serve its turn until we and he, together, shall be transfigured into that glorious image of our Lord, which, being so far above all earthly attainments, will level us all, whether Paul, or Timothy, the reader or the writer, and enable us, with a true heart, to glory in the truth proclaimed by the Apostle that “Christ is all”. We value the Apostle, not merely for his own sake, but rather because of the Christ we have learned through him, and that not only because of the doctrine he was commissioned to proclaim, but through the manner of man that he was, by the grace of God.

Throughly Furnished (II Tim. iii. 17).

(Being introductory lectures given at the Christian Workers' Training Class).

#2. The Text and its Context.

pp. 31 - 35

We have seen that the words "thoroughly furnished" indicate complete equipment, both in matter and in method. We now examine the context in order that by its light we may the better see what this complete equipment involves and implies.

Just as it is true that no man liveth unto himself or dieth unto himself, so it is true that all words used in rational discourse take some colour and modification from the passage in which they are found. Thus the expression "A well-furnished house" conjures up an entirely different set of ideas from the expression "A well-furnished mind", yet the difference lies not in the words "well-furnished" but in their relationship either with a "house" or a "mind". We must therefore not rest satisfied with having examined the meaning and usage of exartizo, but go on to consider the bearing that the context has upon its meaning.

As we look at the context that precedes and follows this word, the first fact that registers itself upon the mind is that it is almost entirely related to the Holy Scriptures. These Scriptures are said to be profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction (II Tim. iii. 16), and the exhortation follows in the next chapter to "preach the Word . . . . . reprove, rebuke, exhort with all longsuffering and doctrine" (II Tim. iv. 2), which most evidently looks back to the characteristics of the Word, already examined in II Tim. iii. 16.

By scrutinizing the whole epistle we discover that II Tim. iii. 10 - iv. 8 constitutes a complete member, and this will set the bounds of the immediate context which we are seeking. Broadly, it may be set out thus:

II Timothy iii. 10 - iv. 8.

A | iii. 10-12. Paul's doctrine and ministry. The BEGINNING.
B | iii. 13-17. Scripture for doctrine.
C | iv. 1. The Judge and His appearing.
B | iv. 2. Preach the Word . . . . . with doctrine.
A | iv. 3-7. Paul's doctrine and ministry. The END.
C | iv. 8. The Judge and His appearing.

Omitting for the time being the references to the beginning and the ending of Paul's ministry, we have the closer context of chapter iii. 13 - iv. 2, which we must now examine more closely.

This passage opens with the deception that arises from the teaching of evil men, "deceiving, and being deceived", and looks down the age to the time that will come when men shall turn away their ears from the truth, and be turned unto fables. In contrast with such fatal error the Apostle places the "throughly furnished" man of God.

This man of God was once a child: this man, who is now seeking to serve his Lord, once needed to be shown the way of salvation. We are not only saved to serve, but no one can possibly serve who has not already been saved, "for all have sinned".

> "From a child thou hast known the holy scriptures, which are able to make thee wise unto salvation through faith which is in Christ Jesus. All scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness: that the man of God may be perfect, throughly furnished unto all good works" (II Tim. iii. 15-17).

This passage may be restated in analyzed form thus:

A | B | 15-. The CHILD.
C | -15-. The holy Scriptures Grammata.
D | -15. Wise unto SALVATION.
A | C | 16. All Scripture Graphe.
B | 17-. The MAN OF GOD.
D | -17. Furnished for SERVICE.

Here we see the range covered by the scriptures; the child must begin with them, and the man of God still needs them. They make wise unto salvation; they are profitable for doctrine; they provide a complete outfit.

Two words are employed here when speaking of the Scriptures, (1) Gramma, (2) Graphe. Both are derived from grapho, "to write", but, whereas the Holy Scriptures with which Timothy was acquainted as a child are called grammata, referring rather to the "letters", the "elements" of revelation, the Scripture spoken of in verse 16 is Graphe, meaning "The Writings", and by common consent The Writings par excellence, namely, the Scriptures as a whole. Moreover the phrase, "It is written" (gegraptai), literally, "It hath been written (and remains so)", is never used except to refer to the Scriptures as authoritative. The following passages are examples of this usage: Matt. iv. 4; Mark xiv. 27; Luke vii. 27; John xii. 14; Acts xv. 15; Rom. i. 17; and Gal. iii. 10.

The word used by Paul for "a child" shows that one can scarcely begin Christian training too early. Brephos (allied to "embryo", Luke i. 41), refers to a newborn babe, and Peter does not hesitate to say, "As newborn babes, desire the sincere milk of the word" (I Pet. ii. 2).

These Scriptures, learned by Timothy as a child at his mother's knee, were able "to make wise" unto salvation. Sophizo is used in the Greek version of Psalm xix.: "The testimony of the Lord is sure, making wise the simple" (Psa. xix. 7).

These Scriptures, said the Apostle, "are given by inspiration of God". The Revised Version has the following translation of the first clause of II Tim. iii. 16: "Every Scripture inspired by God is also profitable, etc." The question of inspiration is so fundamental that we must ask the reader's patient and careful attention to this translation, even though the nature of the enquiry necessitate references to dry grammar, and require hard thinking.

In order to make the grammatical problem as clear as possible to the reader not too familiar with Greek syntax, we give a few specimen passages of parallel construction, and then show the absurdities which result by translating them as the R.V. has translated II Tim. iii. 16.

Romans vii. 12.

He entole		hagia	kai	dikaia.
The Commandment	is	holy	and	just.

I Corinthians xi. 30.

Polloi		astheneis	kai	arrhostoi.
Many	are	weak	and	sickly.

II Timothy iii. 16.

Pasa graphe		Theopneustos	kai	ophelimos.
All Scripture	is	given by inspiration of God	and	is profitable.

Hebrews iv. 13.

Panta de		gumna	kai	tetrachelismena.
But all things	are	naked	and	opened.

To these could be added five other examples, namely, II Cor. x. 10; I Tim. i. 15; ii. 3; iv. 4; and iv. 9; but those set out will be sufficient. To help the reader, we draw attention to the fact that in the second column the verb "is" or "are" has to be supplied, it being absent in the original. Kai, the conjunction, is sometimes translated "also", as we have found in the R.V. of II Tim. iii. 16. If it be permissible to translate pasa graphe theopneustos kai ophelimos by "Every scripture inspired of God is also profitable", etc. the same rule should also apply to the four examples given above. But when we do so we get the following result!

> "The commandment (being) holy is also, just."
> "Many ones (being) weak are also sickly."
> "All things (being) naked are also opened."

Dean Burgon's words are to the point here.

> "At a period of prevailing unbelief in the INSPIRATION of Scripture, nothing but real necessity could warrant the meddling with such a testimony on the subject as is found in II Tim. iii. 16. We have hitherto been taught to believe that 'All scripture is given by inspiration of GOD, and is profitable', etc. The ancients* clearly so understood S. Paul's words: and so do the most learned and thoughtful of the moderns. Pasa graphe, even if it be interpreted 'every scripture', can only mean every portion of those hiera grammata of which the Apostle had been speaking in the previous verse; and therefore must needs signify the whole of scripture. So that the expression 'all scripture' expresses S. Paul's meaning exactly, and should not have been disturbed."

[* - The Dean cites Clemens, Tertullian, Origen, Gregory Nyss, Dial (ap. Orig. i. 808), Basil, Chrysostom, Cyril and Theodoret.]

Bishop Middleton says:

"I do not recollect any passage in the N.T. in which two adjectives, apparently connected by the copulative, were intended by the writer to be so unnaturally disjoined. He who can produce such an instance, will do much toward establishing the plausibility of a translation, which otherwise must appear, to say the least of it, to be forced and improbable . . . . . But in fact the proposed rendering is inadmissible, being without logical coherence and consistency. The utmost that could be pretended would be that S. Paul's assertion is that 'every portion of Scripture being inspired' (i.e. inasmuch as it is—because it is—inspired) 'is also profitable', etc. Else there could be no meaning in the kai. But, in the name of common sense, if this be so, why have the blessed words been meddled with?"

Dr. Henderson cites the following rule when dealing with the point:

"Such a mode of construction is at variance with a common rule of Greek syntax,—which requires that, when two adjectives are closely joined, as theopneustos and ophelimos ('given by inspiration of God' and 'profitable') here are, if there be an ellipsis (an omission) of the substantive verb esti (is), this verb must be supplied after the former of the two, and regarded as repeated after the latter."

This rule is observed in the translation of the A.V., but broken in the translation of the R.V.

Let us now turn to the actual wording of the passage. We have already spoken of the usage of graphe, which, though it could mean anything written by anybody, is strictly reserved in the N.T. to refer to the Holy Scripture, "THE" writings, par excellence. Graphe therefore must be considered as equivalent to a proper name, and be treated as an appellative. Pasa graphe therefore signifies tota Scriptura, "the whole Scripture", as pasa Ierosoluma, "all Jerusalem" (Matt. ii. 3) and pas oikos Israel, "all the house of Israel" (Acts ii. 36).

We find that Josephus, a contemporary of Paul, uses a similar expression to theopneustos, saying of the complete canon of O.T. Scriptures, that the prophets "wrote according to the pneustia that comes from God"; and Philo, another contemporary, calls the Scriptures "theochrest oracles", that is oracles given under the dictation of God.

Theopneustos is composed of Theos, "God", and a word derived from pneo, "to breathe". Let us acquaint ourselves a little more closely with this word pneo and its derivatives.

Pneo: "The winds blew" (Matt. vii. 25).

There are seven occurrences of pneo in the N.T., every one referring, in the English, to the "wind blowing", although we must remember that more than one word is translated "wind" in the A.V.

> Pnoe: "A rushing mighty wind" (Acts ii. 2).
> "He giveth to all life, and breath" (Acts xvii. 25).

These are the only occurrences of pnoe.

> Pneuma: "God hath not given us the spirit of fear" (II Tim. i. 7).

This word has at least fourteen distinguishable usages in the N.T., as, for example, "God is spirit", "The Holy Spirit", "The gifts". It is however outside our subject to pursue these subdivisions here.

> Pneumatikon: "Now concerning spiritual (gifts)" (I Cor. xii. 1).
> Pneumatikos: "Spiritually discerned" (I Cor. ii. 14).
> Ekpneo: "He gave up the ghost" (Luke xxiii. 46).
> Empneo: "Saul, yet breathing out threatenings" (Acts ix. 1).
> Kapnos: "Vapour of smoke" (Acts ii. 19).
> Hupopneo: "And when the south wind blew softly" (Acts xxvii. 13).

The word has entered into our language in such words as pneometer, pneumatic and pneumonia, in each case the primitive idea of "breathing" being retained. The words "inspiration" and "inspire" are used with this primitive idea of breathing, as well as in the doctrinal sense. "Inspire" is used as the opposite of "expire", and we speak of the "inspiratory" organs, which draw in air during respiration. The Apostle asserts that "The sacred letters", "All Scripture", are "breathed by God". In this passage it is not the writers that are in view. Holy men of God were indeed moved by the Spirit of God (II Pet. i. 21), but Paul, in II Tim. iii. 16, is speaking of "the writings" themselves. What has been written, pasa graphe, "All scripture", is nothing less nor more than what "God breathed". They are inspired words. It follows that such Scripture must be inerrant, infallible, authoritative, perfect.

Having learned this momentous fact, we defer consideration of its consequences until the next article.

#3. The Fourfold Equipment of the Man of God.
pp. 73 - 77

In the second article of this series most of our space was devoted to the important matter of the Inspiration of Scripture, for both the message and the subject matter, as well as the equipment and the subsequent manner, will gain or lose in power, according as the preacher's assurance or lack of assurance that the Book that constitutes his message and his equipment is "given by inspiration of God".

No preacher to-day has any warrant to preface his own message by the words "Thus saith the Lord", but the book that supplies him with his doctrine, and gives life to his delivery, everywhere claims to be the word of the living God.

We have already examined the last part of the fourfold equipment spoken of in the passage before us, namely, "throughly furnished", but before we can estimate the completeness of the equipment provided the others must be given earnest consideration. In order that we may perceive the relation of these four parts let us note the following arrangement:

II Timothy iii. 16.

All	|	/	Doctrine	\	|	The man of God
Scripture	| Therefore	/	Reproof	\ In	|	may be perfect,
Divinely	| profitable	\	Correction	/ order	|	throughly furnished
inspired	| for	\	Instruction	/ that	|	unto all good works.

Writing to the Hebrews, the Apostle said, "The word preached did not profit", and gives as the reason a "lack of faith" (Heb. iv. 2). This supplies an important corrective. The Scriptures, even though divinely inspired, are addressed to intelligent, moral creatures. They are certainly "profitable" if received by faith, acknowledged by obedience, and held in love; but there is no warrant for believing that they can be of profit to anyone who does not "mix with faith" the things he hears. Were it otherwise, the superstitious Jew, who wears his phylacteries, or fixes the Mezuzah to this doorpost, is an example to be followed. It is well to realize the mind of God in this matter.

Take another example. The epistle of James asks a pointed question, which only a shallow reading could cause to be misunderstood to mean that James is teaching something contrary to justification by faith:

> "What does it profit, though a man SAY he hath faith, and have not works? can THAT faith save him?" (James ii. 14).

Or let the Apostle speak to the Jew, trusting in the external rite of circumcision:

> "For circumcision verily profiteth if thou KEEP the law; but if thou be a BREAKER of the law, thy circumcision is made uncircumcision" (Rom. ii. 25).

Or, once more, let the Apostle show the hollowness even of martyrdom, where "charity" is lacking:

> "And though I bestow all my goods to feed the poor, and though I give my body to be burned, and have not charity, it profiteth me nothing" (I Cor. xiii. 3).

Inspired Scripture is most certainly profitable, but only if it be accepted in faith and acknowledged in life.

Ophelimos occurs four times in the N.T., always in the pastoral epistles.

Ophelimos ("Profitable").

> "For bodily exercise is profitable for a little; but godliness is profitable unto all things" (I Tim. iv. 8).
>
> "These things (i.e. that believers should maintain good works) are good and profitable unto men" (Titus iii. 8).
> "All Scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable" (II Tim. iii. 16).

The Apostle condemns the doctrine of the false teachers, not saying that their teaching is "uninspired", but that it is "unprofitable" (Titus iii. 9); "useful for nothing" (II Tim. ii. 14); "vain" (I Tim. vi. 20), in utter contrast with inspired scripture which is "sound" or "healthful" (I Tim. i. 10; II Tim. i. 13) and profitable indeed.

There is nothing vague about the "profitableness" of Scripture, and the Apostle proceeds at once to specify the four ways in which it is peculiarly profitable to "the man of God".

First and foremost he places "Doctrine". It is only necessary to read through the pastoral epistles to perceive how anxious the Apostle was that Timothy should know and hold fast the doctrine that he had received. He is warned against anything "contrary to sound doctrine" (I Tim. i. 10); is exhorted to give attention to "the reading . . . . . to doctrine" (I Tim.iv. 13); to keep a vigilant look out for "teaching that is otherwise", heterodidaskaleo, but to maintain "the doctrine that is according to godliness" (I Tim. vi. 3). So when he would call Timothy's attention to his past life, he opens with, "Thou hast fully followed my doctrine" (II Tim. iii. 10).

If here, in II Tim. iii. 16, we translate didaskalia, "teaching", we shall be quite true, providing that we realize that the meaning of the Apostle is the teaching of the person, and not the conferring upon him of a gift of teaching. As Alford, with a play upon words, puts it:

> "It is not Timothy's ability as a teacher, but his stability as a Christian which is here in question."

Doctrine is perhaps positive truth; the very stuff with which the teacher builds up the believer. It will be remembered, however, that, at times, the Apostle combined "warning" with his "teaching" (Col. i. 28). So the second item of profitableness given is "reproof".

Elenchos, the word translated "reproof", primarily means "the refutation of error", then, as a result, "conviction". The A.V. translates elenchos, "To tell one's fault" (Matt. xviii. 15); "To reprove" (Eph. v. 11); "convince" and "convict" (John viii. 9, 46); "rebuke" (Titus i. 13; ii. 15).

> "A Bishop must be blameless, as the steward of God . . . . . holding fast the faithful word as he hath been taught, that he may be able by sound doctrine both to exhort and to convince (elencho) the gainsayers . . . . . Wherefore rebuke (elencho) them sharply, that they may be sound in the faith" (Titus i. 7-13).

Reproof, therefore, has in view the blessing of the one reproved, consequently, the third item is "Correction", epanorthosis. In the classics this word means "to straighten what has become crooked" and is applied to manner of life. It contains the word orthosis, which is from orthoo, "to rectify", which comes in II Tim. ii. 15, for "rightly to divide" is orthotomeo. In Titus i. 5, where the Apostle says "set in order" the things that are wanting, the word is epidiorthoo.

These two, "reproof" and "correction", are included in the final item, "instruction", for paideia is derived from pais, "a child". The word occurs but six times in the N.T., and of these four are found in Heb. xii., where the A.V. translates the word "chastening" or "chastisement" (Heb. xii. 5, 7, 8, 11). The Apostle leaves "reproof" and "correction" undefined, but "correction" he defines as "instruction in righteousness". In Heb. v. 13, "a babe" is described as being unskillful in "the word of righteousness", which shows that there, too, a similar idea was in the Apostle's mind. We shall also see that the "crown" that he expected is the "crown of righteousness", and so Timothy, "the man of God", would have been disciplined by the Scriptures with this goal in view, "That the man of God may be perfect, throughly furnished unto all good works" (II Tim. iii. 17).

Timothy is the only N.T. character to whom the title "Man of God" is given. Peter refers to "men of God" (II Pet. i. 21), but this has reference to O.T. prophets. The title was first borne by Moses who is referred to by this name in six different places (Deut. xxxiii. 1; Josh. xiv. 6; I Chron. xxiii. 14; II Chron. xxx. 16; Ezra iii. 2; and Psalm xc. title). Others who bear the title are Elijah, Elisha, David, Shemaiah and Hanan. Added to this list must be the references to five unnamed witnesses, one of whom proved to be an angel (Judges xiii. 6, 8) (we hope to deal with this title more fully in the next article).

Timothy, who knew the holy scriptures, would not fail to realize the solemnity and importance of such a title. He was being called upon to take up a position, indicated by prophecy (I Tim. i. 18), and reinforced by gift (II Tim. i. 6), that placed him in a singular place of trust, and such opposition as was endured by Moses, David, Elijah and Elisha would probably be his, but, by grace, all the encouragement of the triumph of those men of God, was his also. At this time Timothy was still a young man; Paul could still say to him, "Flee youthful lusts", "Let no man despise thy youth", yet with all that, the Apostle also knew by actual, living experience, the altogether wonderful enabling of the grace of God. Yet, in spite of all this, it is surely for our encouragement that this gifted, prophetically appointed man, is at the last referred to the fourfold equipment of the inspired Scriptures, just as any ungifted person must be to-day. We are therefore not justified in sitting down with folded hands, simply because the day of "gift" and "prophecy" has passed. "We have a more sure Word."

The word here translated "perfect" and the word translated "throughly furnished" are both derived from the same root word, artuo, "to make ready", which is found in the N.T. with but one figurative meaning, "to season with salt" (Mark ix. 50; Luke xiv. 34; Col. iv. 6), but this word is at the basis of a series of compounds and derivations that speak of "making ready" and "equipping" for a particular purpose.

The word exertismenos, translated "throughly furnished", occurs, as we have already seen, in Josephus:

> "They were in a mighty disorder, and in want of all necessaries, and yet were to make war with men" (Tois pasi kalos exertismenous) "who were thoroughly well prepared for it" (Ant. iii. 2. 2).

Here the equipment is that of a soldier.

In chapter ii. the Apostle had used three figures in illustrating the special characteristics of one who would press toward the mark for the prize; the soldier, the athlete, and the husbandman. What inexhaustible supplies the Scriptures provide for the man of God in these three great typical characters! Is he a good soldier? then his girdle is the truth, his sword is the Word of God. Is he an athlete? then the histories of such overcomers as Caleb and Joshua and those who obtained a good report (Heb. xi.) are his example and inspiration. Is he a husbandman? the seed he sows is the Word of truth and the harvest sure. It must be remembered that the "Scriptures" referred to in II Tim. iii. 15, 16 are the O.T. books. The N.T. Scriptures were in process of completion, but, at the time of writing, would not be accessible to Timothy as a whole.

The following comment from Conybeare and Howson is a useful note on "Doctrine", "Correction" and "Instruction":

> "St. Paul frequently uses the Old Testament for teaching, i.e., to enforce or illustrate his doctrine, e.g., Rom. i. 17. The numerous quotations from the Old Testament, in Romans and Galatians, are worthy examples of its use for confutation. Epanorthosin means the setting right that which is wrong. The Old Testament is applied for this purpose by St. Paul in I Cor. xiv. 21; I Cor. x. 1-10, and generally, wherever he applies it to enforce morality.
> Paideian ten en dikaiosune.—The word paideia has the meaning of chastisement or discipline; compare Heb. xii. 7. It is here used as a severer kind of epanorthosis. Thus the Old Testament is applied in I Cor. v. 13." (Life and Epistles of St. Paul).

It is the Old Testament that Paul speaks of in II Tim. iii. 15 and 16 as "sacred" and "inspired of God". There is no problem about the N.T. It goes without saying that if the O.T. be inspired, the N.T. must be. But the converse is just as true: if the O.T. be not inspired, then the N.T. cannot be, for the O.T. histories, doctrines, types and prophecies are so inextricably interwoven into the Gospels, Epistles and the Apocalypse, that the inspiration of the N.T. is impossible if the inspiration of the O.T. be denied.

There can be no doubt in the mind of any who will prayerfully ponder the passage that is before us, but that one of the most important factors in the training of the Christian worker is the equipment provided by an intense belief in and love of the Holy Scriptures. This characterized our Lord Himself and every one of His faithful followers, and should now certainly be the outstanding characteristic of any teacher who professes to follow the example of the Saviour or the pattern left by Paul.

#4. "The Man of God." The implications of the title.
pp. 102 - 108

We have seen that the Holy Scriptures are able to make even a "child" wise unto salvation, and that they also are equally able to equip, most thoroughly, the "man" of God. Merely to contrast the "child" with the "man", however, is not enough, for the title "Man of God" in the O.T. had a definite meaning with which Timothy would be well acquainted. He would not fail to perceive the high honour, as well as the great responsibility, that the conferring of such a title upon him implied. The comment against the title of Psalm xc. in the Companion Bible is, "There are seven specially so called", and it is highly probable that these seven named men of God will provide a perfect picture of this high office.

We will not attempt to survey the whole of these occurrences, but rather give a representative selection, so that what is intended and covered by the office of "man of God" may be kept in mind as we consider its bearing upon the position of Timothy and of all who follow in his steps. So wonderful is the Scripture, so completely does the Lord know the end from the beginning, that it is not putting too great a strain upon our faith to anticipate that much that is said of the different "men of God" mentioned in the O.T. will be focused upon the one "man of God", Timothy. Let us search and see.

The first occurrence of the title is found in Deut. xxxiii. 1, "This is the blessing, wherewith Moses the man of God blessed the children of Israel before his death". The last is "A prayer of Moses the man of God" (Psalm xc.). The first and last references have this in common, that either Moses or Israel forfeited inheritance in the land. Moses' death, mentioned in Deut. xxxiii. 1, is explained in xxxii. 48-52. Moses was to see the land of Canaan from Mount Nebo, but he was to die before Israel entered:

> "Because ye trespassed against Me among the children of Israel at the waters of Meribah-Kadesh, in the wilderness of Zin; because ye sanctified Me not in the midst of the children of Israel."

Psalm xc. opens the fourth book of the Psalms (xc.-cvi.), which corresponds with the fourth book of the Law, the book of Numbers, and speaks of this experience of Moses as it was also shared by those whose carcasses fell in the wilderness. To this verses 9 and 10 refer, for every one that was twenty years of age and upward died during the forty years wandering. To this Psalm cvi., the closing Psalm of the book, refers:

> "They soon forgat His works . . . . . they envied Moses also in the camp . . . . . Yea, they despised the pleasant land . . . . . so that it went ill with Moses for their sakes . . . . . he spake unadvisedly with his lips" (Psa. cvi. 13-24).

They angered him at the waters of strife (Meribah—see Deut. xxxii. quote above).

The first "man of God" stands as a warning to all who follow, to remember the great responsibility that attaches to this office, and avoid "striving" (Meribah Numb. xxvii. 14). "The servant of the Lord must not strive" (II Tim. ii. 24). Secondly, the fact that even Moses forfeited the right to enter the promised land is a solemn warning to all who have responsible positions in ministry, for II Timothy speaks of suffering and reigning with Christ, or of denying Him and so being denied (II Tim. ii. 11, 13), which subject is closely related to this matter of "striving about words" (II Tim. ii. 14). In contrast with Moses who did not "finish his course" the Apostle put his own case, "I have finished my course . . . . . henceforth . . . . . a crown" (II Tim. iv. 7, 8).

With this encouragement we come back to note the other references to Moses as "the man of God", and see whether they, too, point to any other important principle contained in the second epistle to Timothy.

The second reference occurs in Josh xiv. 6, where Caleb comes to Joshua and speaks of these very same forty years of wilderness wandering, but, this time, instead of forfeiture because of failure, reward because of faithfulness is the keynote. "Thou knowest the thing that the Lord said unto Moses the man of God concerning me and thee at Kadesh-barnea". Caleb endured, and, at the end of the forty years' wandering, claimed his reward. The last but one reference to Moses, the "man of God", is found in Ezra iii. 2 where, once again, the name Joshua comes before us, this time the High Priest. "The Prophets" open with Joshua, "The Captain of our salvation", and end with Joshua, "the High Priest", and so take us to the epistle to the Hebrews, where Christ, the true Joshua (Heb. iv. 8 "Jesus" here is "Joshua") is represented as the "Captain", or "Author" (Heb. ii. 10, xii. 2 Archegos) and "Finisher", or "Perfecter" (Heb. xii. 2 Teleiotes) which again emphasizes the relation of service with suffering and with a crown, and so enforces the thought already brought forward in II Tim. ii. 11-13 and iv. 7, 8.

To complete the record, there remain but two further references to Moses as the "man of God". These are in I Chron. xxiii. 14 and II Chron. xxx. 16, and have, as their contexts, the services of the Law. In the first passage David brings one part of the service of the Levites to an end, "They shall no more carry the tabernacle", and these are "the last words of David" (I Chron. xxiii. 26, 27).

In the second reference, Hezekiah, after a period of ruin and desolation, attempted a revival, sending out a proclamation from Beersheba to Dan (thus including the, then, separated house of Israel), "to come and keep the Passover unto the Lord God of Israel at Jerusalem: for they had not done it of a long time in such sort as it was written" (II Chron. xxx. 5). Hezekiah's proclamation was mocked by some, "nevertheless divers of Asher and Manasseh and of Zebulun humbled themselves, the Passover was kept in the second month instead of in the first, as was provided for in the law (Numb. ix. 6-13). A multitude of the people failed to cleanse themselves, "yet did they eat the Passover otherwise than it was written" (verse 18), but, by his prayer, Hezekiah seems to realize that the preparing of the heart, even though in some points of ceremonial the people were at fault, was of chief importance. In this he was evidently right for we read: "The Lord hearkened to Hezekiah and healed the people" (verse 20).

So, too, by the time Paul wrote the second epistle Timothy "rule" had given place to "ruin". Corporate testimony had gone the way of all flesh, stress is laid upon the individual, "thyself", no reference is made to "bishops and deacons". In such circumstances much that is done in the way of worship and witness must fall very far short of the original constitution; must indeed by "otherwise than it was written". In such days of departure it is therefore a comfort to the man of God to remember that the Lord set His seal upon the "preparation of the heart", even though in many things the service that is now possible falls very short of that which would have been demanded of the apostolic assembly.

Here then is the first of seven "Men of God" whose lives and testimony illuminate the epistle addressed to the man of God in New Testament times.

Moses. The Man of God.

A | Deut. xxxiii. 1. BLESSING. Moses' failure to enter the land.
  B | Josh. xiv. 6. JOSHUA, the Captain.
    C | I Chron. xxiii. 14. DAVID. "No more carry the tabernacle."
    C | II Chron. xxx. 16. HEZEKIAH. "Otherwise than it was written."
  B | Ezra iii. 2. JOSHUA, the High Priest.
A | Psalm xc. PRAYER. Israel's failure to enter the land.

With this encouragement let us consider what further light may be forthcoming from the remaining references. The seven named "men of God" are: (1) Moses; (2) Samuel; (3) David; (4) Elijah; (5) Elisha; (6) Shemaiah; and (7) Igdaliah.

In the passage where Samuel is called "a man of God" (I Sam. ix. 6-10), Saul, the son of Kish, is introduced into the narrative, and the anointing of Saul to be king soon followed. This desire for a king was the result of Israel's other desire "to be like these nations". It was a step down from the high position they had occupied, with none but God Himself as their King. Samuel grieved at this departure and fall, and yet, without condoning their act, remained with the people, saying, "God forbid that I should sin against the Lord in ceasing to pray for you: but I will teach you the good and the right way" (I Sam. xii. 23).

Just as the emphasis here is on "teaching" so the word "doctrine", the command to "teach" and to appoint faithful men who shall be "apt to teach" are outstanding features of II Timothy. The church has failed to live at the spiritual height revealed in Ephesians, and its ministry no longer compares with the self-sacrificing service of the Philippians; nevertheless "the Lord will not forsake His people for His great name's sake" (I Sam. xii. 22), and so this "man of God" promises "to teach" the good and the right way. While the reader will need no further exposition of this subject he will find a reading of II Timothy helpful to his understanding thereof.

Following historic sequence, David is the next "man of God", and he is so named by Nehemiah at the dedication of the wall at Jerusalem:

> "And the chief of the Levites . . . . . to praise and to give thanks, according to the commandment of David the man of God, ward over against ward" (Neh. xii. 24).

There is a reference back, here, to a passage already considered, namely, I Chron. xxiii., for there David commanded the Levites "to stand every morning to thank and praise the Lord, and likewise at even" (verse 30). Much was done under the combined efforts of Nehemiah and of Ezra to bring the service and worship of God back to conformity with the law of both Moses and David, yet

> "Many of the priests and Levites and chief of the fathers, who were ancient men, that had seen the first house, when the foundation of this house was laid before their eyes, wept with a loud voice; and many shouted aloud for joy" (Ezra iii. 12).

To such, the prophet Haggai spoke, saying:

> "Who is left among you that saw this house in her first glory? and how do ye see it now? is it not in your eyes in comparison of it as nothing? . . . . . The desire of all nations will come: and I will fill this house with glory, saith the Lord of hosts" (Hag. ii. 3, 7).

As he compared the "church" over which he was about to take control, with the "church" as it was first formed when the revelation of the mystery called it into being, Timothy might well weep—nevertheless, weak though it was, a glory awaited it, for the glory of the church consists not in ordinances, ceremonies, or orders of ministry, but in the personal presence of the risen Lord. Timothy, and all like him, would be encouraged in the midst of much that was poor and frail and "otherwise than it was written", to stress the sanctifying presence of the Lord Himself.

Immediately following this reference to Haggai comes the reference to the law of uncleanness, a passage that makes one think of Paul's words to Timothy, "If a man therefore purge himself from these, he shall be a vessel unto honour, sanctified, and meet for the master's use, and prepared unto every good work" (II Tim. ii. 21).

Out of the abundance of material that is discovered when considering the teaching of Scripture concerning Elijah and Elisha as "men of God", two incidents are so evidently related that they stand out from the rest of the narrative, and to these we draw the reader's attention.

Elijah (I Kings xvii.).	Elisha (II Kings iv.).
THE WIDOW'S CRUSE OF OIL. "The barrel of meal shall not waste, neither shall the cruse of oil fail, until the day that the Lord sendeth rain upon the earth" (14).	THE WIDOW'S POT OF OIL. "Go borrow thee vessels . . . . . not a few . . . . . Go, sell the oil, and pay the debt, and live thou and thy children of the rest" (1-7).
THE DEAD CHILD. Elijah "stretched himself upon the child three times . . . Thy son liveth" (17-23).	THE DEAD CHILD. Elisha "stretched himself upon the child . . . Take up thy son" (8-36).

Throughout the O.T. oil is a type of the Holy Spirit, and in the earlier epistles of Paul the word pneuma occurs with considerable frequency. For example, there are 36 occurrences in Romans, and 15 in Ephesians, but three only in II Timothy:

> "God hath not given us the spirit of fear; but of power, and of love, and of a sound mind" (II Tim. i. 7).
>
> "That good thing which was committed unto thee keep by the Holy Ghost which dwelleth in us" (II Tim. i. 14).
> "The Lord Jesus Christ be with thy spirit. Grace be with you. Amen" (II Tim. iv. 22).

Here, therefore, is somewhat of a parallel with the widow's cruse of oil, or the widow's pot of oil. In comparison with earlier epistles, there was little indeed to boast of. Yet, just as, under the good hand of God, the small amount of oil was found to be ample, so the keeping power of the Holy Ghost, even though all the gifts of the spirit be now withdrawn, will prove all-sufficient. Timothy is no longer reminded of supernatural and spiritual gifts; no longer is he to expect miraculous healing, or the gift of prophecy. He is to see to it that in place of supernaturally endowed teachers he now appoints "faithful men" "able to teach" and, even though told to stir up the gift which he had already received, he is at the same time reminded that the spirit which he had received of God was a spirit of power, love and a sound mind, and these are the gifts of the spirit that are available to-day. Under grace, they are all-sufficient. The twofold miracle of the raising of a child to life but emphasizes the great doctrine of the resurrection, without which neither Timothy, nor his successors, could hope to prevail.

For the remainder, "Shemaiah, the man of God" commands Rehoboam that he must not fight against Israel (II Chron. xi. 2), even though it be with the laudable intention of bringing "the kingdom again to Rehoboam". It is not the will of God that we should engage in strife with those who have left the teaching of the Apostle. There will be no great revival or reunion of believers brought about by missions or other methods, but, there must be maintained a witness for the truth (whether men will hear or whether they will not), and a patient waiting for the day of the Lord's appearing (II Tim. iv. 1-4).

The last example, "Igdaliah, the man of God" (Jer. xxxv. 4) is associated with the test and triumph of the sons of Rechab, whose obedience to the command of their father was held up by the Lord as an example, to the shame of Israel. These Rechabites were not descended from Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, but from Hobab, the brother-in-law of Moses, and were known as Kenites (Numb. x. 29; Judges i. 16). Thus the last example of the "man of God" sets its seal upon the extreme importance of loyal obedience to the will of God in spite of all external pressure and inducement.

There is more, much more, in these passages, than we can hope to include in such an article as this, but let us summarize what we have seen.

MOSES, the first example of the "man of God", brings before us a warning concerning "striving" and the teaching of II Timothy concerning the difference between "living" and reigning".

SAMUEL as the "man of God" witnesses in a day when God is rejected and a human king occupies His place, Israel desiring to be "like the nations". The stress is placed upon "teaching".

DAVID is referred to by Nehemiah as the "man of God" in connection with the appointment of the Levites for praise and thanksgiving, these being acceptable and possible, even though there was much that led to weeping, when the temple built after the captivity was compared with that of Solomon's day. We live in a day of small things, but should serve to the fullest of our ability.

ELIJAH and ELISHA emphasize the wonderful way in which the dearth of spiritual power may be overcome by the God of resurrection. SHEMAIAH warns against any attempt to re-unite christendom, and IGDALIAH commends simple, whole-hearted, loyalty.

Let all who would be "men of God", "throughly furnished unto all good works", ponder these heart-searching lessons.

#5. The Furnishing, its completeness.

pp. 146 - 150

We have examined the word translated "throughly furnished", and considered some of the ways in which the Apostle himself exemplified, both in matter and in method, the completeness of the equipment provided. By comparing scripture with scripture, we now discover that the full preparation of the believer for Christian service falls under three heads, or in other words, it is a threefold preparation that is required.

i. The preparation provided by the Holy Scriptures, which "throughly furnish" unto "all good works" (II Tim. iii. 17).
ii. The preparation that involves separation, purging; "sanctified" and "prepared unto every good work" (II Tim. ii. 19-21).
iii. The preparation supplied by abounding grace, providing "sufficiency", so that the worker may "abound to every good work" (II Cor. ix. 8).

We have already noted the preparation provided by the Scriptures and now pass on to II Tim. ii. to discover the preparation indicated there. While the context is not devoid of reference to the Scriptures, they are not so specifically referred to as in II Tim. iii. 15-17. We read of the Word of Truth, but it is its "right division" that is stressed (II Tim. ii. 15): in verse 18 we read of "the truth" and of the resurrection, but it is in connection with a warning concerning error, not a positive declaration of doctrine. We certainly read that the foundation of God standeth sure and that the Lord knoweth them that are His but the point of the verse that contains this doctrine is the urging of all who name the name of Christ "to depart from iniquity". We read of a great house and its many vessels, some for honourable use, and the rendering of personal service to the Master, and of others that have no such honour, but, once again, the message speaks of "purging", "sanctifying", "being meet for the Master's use" and so "prepared unto every good work" (II Tim. ii. 19-21). In the next verse we have the whole teaching crystallized in two words, "flee", "follow". If we turn to the only other occasion on which Timothy was addressed as a "man of God" we shall find the same two words,

> "But thou, O man of God, flee these things, and follow after righteousness . . . . ."
> (I Tim. vi. 11).

Nothing is actually said in II Tim. ii. concerning "denominations", "sects", "christendom" and the like, but a guiding principle is there which makes one see very clearly that a servant of God who would preach and teach the mystery and be found "meet for the Master's use", must not only see the truth clearly for himself but stand clear of all compromising associations. In II Tim. iii. 15-17 the sequel is "saved", then "service", whereas in II Tim. ii. 19-21 the sequel is "sanctified", then "service". We have observed that where II Tim. iii. 17 uses the words "throughly furnished", II Tim. ii. 21 uses the word "prepared". This word etoimazo means "to prepare" as one prepares a road to facilitate progress (Matt. iii. 3); or as one prepares a "dinner" or "feast", like the passover; or a people for some specific duty. It is used of the Lord's gracious work of preparing for them that love Him; for Paul's request to Philemon to prepare him a lodging and for the adorning of a bride in readiness for her husband. The word implies watchfulness, "Be ye also ready"; "They that were ready went in". It also implies willingness, "Lord I am ready to go with Thee"; "ready always to give an answer". The use of the word in the O.T. is very similar to that of the N.T., only that, in the former, the word is occasionally used to translate a Hebrew word meaning "a base" or "foundation". This can be seen in Ezra ii. 68; iii. 3; and Zech. v. 11. The idea, too, of establishing or firmly settling is found in I Kings ii. 46. Consequently, some commentators view the "preparation of the gospel of peace" with which the believer is "shod" (Eph. vi. 15) as referring to the military hupodema (sandal) which enabled the Roman soldier "to stand" against the shock of an enemy. Each of the ways in which etoimazo is used, as cited above, can be applied to the preparation of the "man of God". His ministry is intimately associated with a "way" and a "meal"; with a "people" and a "home"; with readiness to speak, and with watchful care, even as it is expected that the true servant of the Lord will not only be "always abounding in the work of the Lord", but at the same time "stedfast" and "unmoveable" (I Cor. xv. 58).

Words, either spoken or written, constitute the material with which the servant of God must serve, and in the Pentecostal equipment, the twelve Apostles were miraculously enabled to speak in the language of those who were assembled at Jerusalem. Such supernatural equipment does not pertain to the present dispensation, but a recognition of the place that language must occupy is implied, even though such ability to speak be attained by slower and more painful processes. There is no doubt about the apostle's attitude to this great matter:

> "Except ye utter by the tongue words easy to be understood, how shall it be known what is spoken? for ye shall speak into the air" (I Cor. xiv. 9).

He proceeds to remark, that while there are a great variety of voices in the world, "none of them is without signification". If, therefore, said the Apostle, "I know not the meaning of the voice" the effort will be wasted. He stressed the need to "interpret" whenever the gifts of tongues was exercised; he affirmed that even though he prayed in an unknown tongue, his understanding would be "unfruitful" and concluded his remarks on this important element of service by saying:

> "I thank my God, I speak with tongues more than ye all. Yet in the church I had rather speak five words with my understanding, that by my voice I might teach others also, than ten thousand words in an unknown tongue" (I Cor. xiv. 18, 19).

The gift of language is a sacred trust and no man of God is "throughly furnished" who is not scrupulously careful in the use of this great implement. From I Cor. xiv. we can compile the following words, each of which has a distinct bearing upon the purpose of speech and therefore indicates what should form a part of the preacher's preparation:--

"Edification", "exhortation", "comfort", are set forth as objects at which to aim. "Revelation", "knowledge", "prophecy" or "doctrine" are indicated as the burden of the speaker's message. Distinction in sound, easy of being understood, words having signification and meaning, are alone profitable, and "to be understood" is the goal of all speech. The words "easy to be understood" in I Cor. xiv. 9, translate the Greek word eusemos, a word that is composed of eu, "good", and semos, "a sign". It indicates the avoidance of ambiguity, but inculcates the choice of words the significance of which cannot be missed. If our words are "good signs" we shall not select them merely for their "sound" but for their "meaning". In I Cor. xiv. 10 the word "without signification" is aphonon, or "dumb", as in xii. 2, a word the meaning of which is not clear, like the intelligible noises uttered by the dumb. In I Cor. xiv. 11 the word "meaning" is, in the original, dunamis. Where the meaning is not grasped a word loses its dynamic force, and accomplishes nothing; conversely, when the full meaning is understood, such a word will possess power approximating to a "miracle", as the same word is rendered in xii. 10 and 28. While therefore we must stress the spiritual preparation of the man of God—without which, necessarily, all will be dead and ineffective—the spiritual man will not despise the Dictionary, the Grammar, the Concordance, the Lexicon, and all aids that are at hand to enable him to "speak with understanding". Eternal issues hang upon the use of "right words". "How forcible" said Job "are right words!" (Job vi. 25). How needful to be able to speak a word "in season"! (Isa. l. 4). How precious are words "fitly spoken"! (Prov. xxv. 11). How important to follow the example of "the Preacher" who "sought to find out acceptable words . . . . . even words of truth"! (Eccles. xii. 10). The "thorough furnishing" of the man of God, even though it take cognizance of both "matter" (II Tim. iii. 16, 17) and "morals" (II Tim. ii. 19-21), would still be lacking if it did not also provide for the "manner" in which the message entrusted should be given.

Among the elements of "manner" that are found in Scriptural references to acceptable ministry, must be included "assurance".

> "The gospel came not unto you in word only but also in power, and in the Holy Ghost and in much assurance" (I Thess. i. 5).

"Continue thou in the things which thou hast learned and hast been assured of" (II Tim. iii. 14). The slightest doubt entertained in the heart and mind of the speaker, will make itself felt in the hearer, to the weakening of the testimony. While mere "self-assurance" must be avoided, it should be manifest that the speaker utters what he has to say with conviction, that he can at least say, "One thing I know"; "We speak that we do know and testify that we have seen". He must avoid the "uncertain sound" as he would the plague. In the eyes of the world he must exhibit a strange combination for he must be "gentle", yet he must be "bold". He must avoid "striving", yet he must "contend earnestly for the faith". He must be patient, apt to teach, and mingle "longsuffering" with "doctrine", and "endurance" with "evangelizing" (II Tim. ii. 24, 25; iv. 2, 5; Eph. vi. 19). In his attitude to those to whom he ministers, he must be made "all things to all men". He must be both "father" and "mother" to his hearers (I Thess. ii. 11; I Cor. iv. 15; Philemon 10), and have a ready and practical sympathy with them in all their joys and sorrows. He will feel for the prisoner, as "being bound with him" (Heb. xiii. 2). "Who is weak, and I am not weak" said Paul; "who is offended, and I burn not?" (II Cor. xi. 29). He will see in the weak brother one for whom Christ died, so that he will curtail or deny himself many a legitimate right, lest by offending the weaker brother he should sin against Christ" (I Cor. viii. 7-13). While it is true that we might obtain help in the study of the Scriptures or in the knowledge and use of language from our friends and brethren, where can such unselfish and truly spiritual characteristics be gained except in fellowship with the Lord Himself? Though we be not aware of it, others will "take knowledge of us" if we have been in His Presence. If we cry "Who is sufficient for these things?" the answer still stands, "My grace is sufficient for thee", "Not that we are sufficient of ourselves, to think anything as of ourselves, but our sufficiency is of God".

or
The Scriptural association of chronology and topography with doctrine and purpose.

#2. The purpose of the ages implied in Gen. i. 1.
pp. 11 - 13

The majestic opening words of Holy Scripture describe the first action of all time. "In the beginning" (B'reshith). The word reshith is the feminine form of rosh, "head", and while primarily rosh means "head", only incidentally "beginning", reshith on the other hand, primarily means "beginning", and incidentally "chief", but is never translated in the A.V. "head". The LXX translated it by the Greek arche, and so is parallel with John i. 1. That it is utterly futile to speculate upon what was "before" the beginning, our very language testifies, for, where time is not, "before" is meaningless.

An examination of the usage of reshith, "beginning", leaves the mind with the impression that something more than "time" is implied. First we observe that there is no article ("the"), so that the Hebrew reads "In beginning", and opens the door for the thought, "With what motive and with what ending?" There are two other occurrences of reshith in Genesis: the first is,

> "And the beginning of his kingdom was Babel . . . . . in the land of Shinar, and he (Nimrod) went forth out of that land into Assyria (Asshur), and builded Nineveh, etc." (Gen. x. 10, 11).

Here we have an illustration of the anticipatory character of reshith. Nimrod began with Babel, but he went on and added Erech, Accad and Calneh, in the land of Shinar, thereafter extending his conquest outside that land, including Nineveh and Calah.

The other reference to reshith is Gen. xlix. 3, 4:

> "Reuben, thou art my firstborn, and the beginning of my strength . . . . . unstable as water, thou shalt not excel."

Here again the "beginning of my strength" asks for its sequence, its correspondence, and the "end" is found to be failure and instability.

This word reshith is translated "firstfruits" eleven times (Lev. xxiii. 10, etc.), and it is the very essence of firstfruits that they anticipate a harvest to come. In Job viii. 7 and xlii. 12 the "beginning" is related to the "end"; as it is also in Isa. xlvi. 10.

By this time, most of our readers will have thought of the title given to Christ in the Revelation:

"I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the ending" (Rev. i. 8).

"These things saith the Amen, the faithful and true witness, the beginning of the creation of God" (Rev. iii. 14).

"It is done, I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the end" (Rev. xxi. 6).

"I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the end, the first and the last" (Rev. xxii. 13).

With these glorious truths must be included the testimony of the apostle Paul:

> "He is the head of the body, the church: Who is the beginning, the firstborn from the dead; that in all things He might have the preeminence" (Col. i. 18).

Let us examine these references more carefully. Rev. i. 8 associates the title, "the beginning", with the great age-abiding name Jehovah: "The Lord which IS, and which WAS, and which IS TO COME." Here, in this Name, all time is comprehended, past, present and future, and He is the "Almighty", so that what He "began" to do at the creation of heaven and earth, He will "finish" in the day of God. The "beginning" implies an end, or goal. In Rev. xxi. 6 the goal is reached: He that sat upon the throne said, "It is done." When we ponder Rev. iii. 14 with Gen. i. 1, to what other conclusion can we come than that Christ is there in Gen. i. 1, the "beginning of the creation of God", and in Him, the "first", creation will at length reach its goal, for He is also the "last", and He is the "Amen", the faithful witness to the onward movement of the ages.

In Col. i. 18 there is a limitation. He is there seen, not so much in His relationship to creation, as to the church. True, all creation is the work of His hands (Col. i. 16, 17), but it is there in the background, while the new creation, already seen in the church, which is the body, sets forth in miniature the creation to come. Christ is undoubtedly "The beginning" of that new creation, which has as its goal what is vividly expressed in Col. iii.

> "The image of Him that created him, where there is neither Greek nor Jew . . . . .; but Christ is all, and in all" (Col. iii. 10, 11).

This, in its turn, exhibits the goal that is implied by the opening words of Gen. i. 1:

> "In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth . . . . . Then cometh the end . . . . . that God may be all in all" (Gen. i. 1 with I Cor. xv. 24-28).

Christ is "all and in all" to the church of the mystery: God shall be "all in all" when the complete new creation is laid at His feet. So, the words "It is done" of Rev. xxi. 6 refer to the works of Rev. xxi. 5: "Behold, I make all things new." We observe also that in I Cor. xv. Christ is the "firstfruits", a word which we have seen is implicit in Gen. i. 1.

We return to Gen. i. 1, and with increasing wonder look at those opening words, "In beginning", could be expressed idiomatically, "As a beginning", demanding, some time and somewhere, a sequel, an end, a harvest. God created the heaven and the earth with an object, and His purpose may be expressed thus:

In beginning God was ALL. Heaven and earth sprang into being at His command. But God is not merely Almighty, He is essentially "Love". Creation therefore moved forward to the "Image", in Whose likeness Adam was created. Adam however did not obey mechanically, as do the sun, moon and stars, and so the long discipline of sorrow accompanies the advent of man, leading irrevocably down to the "unspeakable" Gift of Love, and, at long last, up to the willing submission of a new creation.

We therefore complete our exhibition of the implication of Gen. i. 1 as follows:

> In the beginning God was ALL, but when the end comes, God will be ALL IN ALL.

two vastly different things. He is indeed One that "declares the end from the beginning", and worketh all things according to the counsel of His Own will.

#3. Before the overthrow, and Since the ages times. Gen. i. 2.
pp. 46 - 49

Although there is no statement as to time in Gen. i. 2, upon examining other parts of Scripture we shall learn that a most important time period is associated with it:

> "And the earth was without form and void; and darkness was upon the face of the deep" (Gen. i. 2).

"And", the translation of the Hebrew vav, is also translated by the adversative "but" (Gen. ii. 6).

"Without form and void", cannot refer to the original state of creation, first of all because, elsewhere, God Himself says that He did not create the world in that condition and, secondly, because the word bara, "create", denotes "to cut" or "carve". This meaning is reflected in the Greek word kosmos, "world", which is once translated "adorning" (I Pet. iii. 3) and, with kosmeo, "adorn", "garnish" and "trim". The verb "was", in the phrase "The earth was without form and void", translates the preterite of hayah, "To be, exist, become, come to pass". The word is translated "became" in Gen. ii. 7, "and man became a living soul", and this translation is true, for it is self-evident that until he "breathed" man was not a living soul. Similarly we translated Gen. i. 2, "But the earth became without form and void". The words translated "without form and void" are the Hebrew words tohu and bohu. Tohu occurs twenty times in the O.T., and is translated "without form", "waste", "vain", "vanity", "nothing", "in a wilderness", "the empty place", "confusion" and "a thing of nought". Bohu occurs but three times, and is translated either "void" or "emptiness". While certain conclusions could be drawn from the words themselves and their roots, we have a safer and more convincing argument to hand in the usage of these words in the inspired Scriptures themselves. The only One Who can supply us with first-hand information about the process of creation is God Himself, therefore one word spoken by Him must outweigh all else that ever has been or can be said on the subject.

> "For thus saith the Lord that created the heavens; God Himself that formed the earth and made it; He hath established it, He created it NOT IN VAIN (tohu), He formed it to be inhabited" (Isa. xlv. 18).

The two words tohu and bohu come together in Isa. xxxiv. Let us acquaint ourselves with the context. In verse 2 we have the words, "Indignation", "fury", "destroyed", "slaughter", and verse 4 takes us to the day of which Peter speaks in his second epistle (II Pet. iii. 10, 12):

> "And all the host of heaven shall be dissolved, and the heavens shall be rolled together as a scroll: and all their host shall fall down, as the leaf falleth off from the vine, and as a falling fig from the fig tree. For My sword shall be bathed in heaven: behold, it shall come down upon Idumea, and upon the people of my curse, to judgment" (Isa. xxxiv. 4-6).

This is not creation but dissolution. This is the result of curse and judgment, "For it is the day of the Lord's vengeance" (verse 8). This land is to "lie waste" (Isa. xxxiv. 10) and be uninhabited or traversed by man until the age ends, and to describe this utter desolation the prophet has recourse to the words of Gen. i. 2, tohu and bohu:

> "He shall stretch out upon it the lines of confusion (tohu) and the stones of emptiness (bohu)" (Isa. xxxiv. 11).

We have confirmation of this meaning in the writings of the prophet Jeremiah:

> "I beheld the earth, and, lo, it was without form, and void; and the heavens, and they had no light" (just as darkness was on the face of the deep) . . . . . "there was no man . . . . . the fruitful place was a wilderness, and all the cities thereof were broken down at the presence of the Lord, and by His fierce anger" (Jer. iv. 23-26).

Here, once again, we have anger and its result. If Isa. xxxiv. said the land was to "lie waste" Jer. iv. says "The whole land shall be desolate" (Jer. iv. 27).

However interested he may have been in this study of tohu and bohu, the reader may be wondering where the "time" element comes in. To this we now address ourselves. In Eph. i. 4 we read: "According as He hath chosen us in Him before the foundation of the world." This word "foundation", katabole, must not be confused with the "foundation" of Eph. ii. 20 which is themelion. Kata means "down" and ballo means "to throw". "Katabolism" is used to this day in Biology to define the breaking up process of metabolism or the processes, in living beings, of assimilation and decomposition. The verb kataballo is used by Paul in a context that leaves no room for doubt: "Persecuted, but not forsaken; cast down, but not destroyed" (II Cor. iv. 9). This meaning is confirmed by John in the Revelation: "The accuser of our brethren is cast down"

(Rev. xii. 10). This verb kataballo occurs many times in the LXX version. We find it used of the siege of a city:

> "Joab battered the wall, to throw it down" (II Sam. xx. 15).

It is used of the overthrowing of Israel in the wilderness:

> "He lifted up His hand against them, to overthrow them in the wilderness; to overthrow their seed also among the nations, and to scatter them in the lands" (Psa. cvi. 26, 27).

Again it is written concerning the destruction of Tyre:

> "And they shall destroy the walls of Tyrus: and break down her towers" (Ezek. xxvi. 4).

A correspondent recently sent us a paper in which he agreed that the verb kataballo means "To overthrow", but by some process which he did not reveal nor support either by Scripture or the Lexicon, he maintained that the noun katabole meant "making a new start". It is foreign to the genius of language, whether ancient or modern, thus to separate noun and verb. If I sing (verb) that which I sing must be a song (noun). I cannot "sing" a "speech" or anything outside the category of "song". Similarly, if I overthrow (verb), that which is overthrown cannot be something freshly started or something constructed.

We therefore bring together the testimony of the Hebrew words tohu and bohu and the meaning and usage of kataballo and katabole, with the result that we are forced to translate Eph. i. 4, "before the overthrow of the world" and refer it to a period that comes between verses 1 and 2 of Gen. i. Further light upon this period is thrown by the time reference in II Tim. i., which deals with the same calling and company as those of Ephesians:

> "Who hath saved us, and called us with an holy calling, not according to our works, but according to His own purpose and grace, which was given us in Christ Jesus before the world began" (II Tim. i. 9).

The original reads pro chronon aionion, "before age-times".

We therefore now know two things of intense interest from the point of view of Biblical chronology.

(1) The church of the mystery was chosen in Christ before the overthrow of the world.
(2) And that with the reconstruction and making of the heavens and the earth in the six days, the age-times began.

Seeing that the dissolution of II Pet. iii. stands at the end of the present creation, just as the chaos of Gen. i. 2 stands at the beginning, it is a sound inference to draw that just as the "ages" commence with the present creation, they come to their end with the new heaven and the new earth. Looking at Gen. i. 1 and 2 together, in this matter of time and purpose we perceive that as a beginning, looking constantly at the end in view, God created the heaven and the earth. This end, however, was not to be attained mechanically or by arbitrary force; moral beings were created, whether Satan, spirits or man, and the possibility of fall and judgment was foreseen and provided for, so that the glorious end shall be attained in Christ, by grace, with due recognition of the values of righteousness, holiness and love.

#4. The Seven Days of Gen. i. 1, 2 - ii. 2.
pp. 87 - 89

It is impossible to speak of the present creation without referring to time. It is often spoken of as "The six days' creation" to distinguish it from the primal creation of Gen. i. 1 and the new creation of Rev. xxi.

In this connection of time we must first consider the word "day". It is conceded at the outset that yom, "day", may mean an indefinite period of time, and that it is so used in Gen. ii. 4, "In the day that the Lord God made the earth and the heavens", where "day" covers the whole of the six days' creation. Gen. i. 3 to ii. 3 however is a unit in which the "day" occurs fourteen times, and an examination of its usage will leave little room for doubt but that a literal day of twenty-four hours is intended.

At the creation of light the Lord divided the light from the darkness, calling the light "day" and the darkness "night". This division of time has remained ever since and, just as we find Noah receiving parallel commands to "replenish the earth" and with reference also to the subduing of the animal creation and the honouring of the image of God in man (Gen. ix. 1, 2, 6), so, as in Gen. i., this is preceded by a covenant which promised that "while the earth remaineth, seedtime and harvest, and cold and heat, and summer and winter, the day and night shall not cease" (viii. 22). Again, Gen. i. 5 adds, "And the evening and the morning were the first day".

If, as some have said, these are geological days, involving an "evening", that might have lasted millions of years, can anyone explain what kept alive the grass, the herb, and the fruit tree during its icy and inky darkness, or how the fowl of the air or creeping things managed to exist? for every day's work is summed up with the formula: "The evening and the morning were the . . . . . day." Yet if we interpret Gen. i. 1, 2 as the creation of the heaven and the earth which was created during the six days of the subsequent revelation, we shall be compelled to teach that these "days" are geological ages. The rocks evidence their age-long growth, the very fuel we burn witnesses that long ages must have passed in the process of turning forests into coal. But if we interpret i. 1, 2 as we have done, that is, seeing a primal creation in the beginning followed by an overthrow, we can place our geological ages in between verses 1 and 2 and look upon the present creation as occupying literally just six days, for it was largely a reconstruction, the word "create" only occurring in the record for two acts, (1) the creation of the inhabitants of the sea (verse 21), for in the primal creation, as in the new earth, there was, and there will, "no sea", and (2) the creation of man (verse 27).

The summary of the six days' work is given in Gen. ii. 3: "All His work which God created and made."

Because, to express the facts, we should have had to use a clumsy circumlocution, we have said in the earlier part of this article, "and the creation of light". But the word "create" is not used of light; the statement is "Light be, and light was." Similarly, "Let there be a firmament", "Let the waters be gathered", Let the dry land appear", "Let the earth bring forth", and so on.

The present creation was constructed to form a platform upon which the drama of the ages should be enacted, after which it is destined to pass away so that the goal of the ages might be enjoyed in a new heaven and earth, which are to be the glorious complement of the heaven and earth created as a "beginning".

A legitimate question to raise in connection with the six days' creation is, Why should the Lord have taken six days and not five or ten or any other number? Further, Why should the Lord have "rested" on the seventh? We are assured that "The Creator of the ends of the earth, fainteth not, neither is weary" (Isa. xl. 28). We are certain that the six days of creation and the seventh day rest are not mentioned without purpose and, seeing that the very "beginning" of Genesis anticipated its glorious "end", we return once more to the consideration of "time" in relation to the doctrine of Scripture, with the assurance that if we "seek" we shall "find".

> "Thus the heavens and the earth were finished, and all the host of them. And on the seventh day God ended His work which He had made; and He rested on the seventh day from all His work which He had made. And God blessed the seventh day, and sanctified it: because that in it He had rested from all His work which God had created and made" (Gen. ii. 1-3).

In other studies we have drawn attention to the way in which Noah stands as a sort of "second man and last Adam", and in connection with this use of the number seven, we find that shebu "seventh", occurs nowhere else in Genesis except in chapter viii. 4, where we read that "the ark rested in the seventh month". Not only Noah but his father Lamech emphasize this, for Lamech, the father of Noah, was 777 years old when he died.

In Gen. xxvi. 33 we read: "And he called it shebah (that is an oath)", and it is a feature not to be lightly passed over that the same Hebrew root that supplies us with the number seven gives us the word for "oath" and "to swear". The words shaba and shebuah, "to swear", occur in Genesis twenty-one times, or three times seven.

We have seen that the opening sentence of the Bible (Gen. i. 1) anticipates, as a kind of firstfruits, the end, and it may be well to remind the reader that the Hebrew of that verse contains 7 words, 14 syllables and 21 letters. We now see that in the choice of this number "seven" God has, in type, sworn that His purpose shall be accomplished. In the epistle to the Hebrews the Apostle quotes Gen. ii. 2, and from an examination of other scriptures, concludes that "There remaineth therefore a rest (sabbatismos) to the people of God" (Heb. iv. 9).

To keep this hope alive in the hearts of His people, the Lord placed the observance of the Sabbath day prominently in the tables of the covenant. To impress us still further with the extreme importance of this symbolic number, the Lord has multiplied these sabbatic observances. The word that is translated "rest" in Gen. ii. 2 and 3 is shabath. The law of Moses contains a series of feasts, or holy days, that carry on a progression of sevens. We have the seventh DAY (Lev. xxiii. 3); seven DAYS (Lev. xxiii. 6); seven WEEKS (Lev. xxiii. 15); the seventh MONTH (Lev. xxiii. 24); the seventh YEAR (Lev. xxv. 4); seven times seven YEARS (Lev. xxv. 8) and seventy times seven YEARS (Dan. ix. 24).

Here we have design and purpose. The glorious Jubilee, when every debt was cancelled, every man set free, every inheritance entered and enjoyed; the annual Feast of Tabernacles in the seventh month when every man sat, as it were, under his own vine and fig tree and none made him afraid; the prophetic period of Dan. ix. after which Israel's restoration should be complete, all speak of the same thing, and pledge the attainment of the same goal.

From our three studies in the time factor of Gen. i. 1 - ii. 3 it is abundantly evident that a knowledge of this feature is by no means of mere academic interest, but that it enters into the very fabric of revealed truth, and is no mean factor in its interpretation.

#5. The Site of the Garden of Eden. Gen. ii. 8-14.
pp. 127 - 130

Our attention having been wholly occupied with "time", we have hitherto found no opportunity to give heed to the testimony of the Scriptures concerning "place". We have the first topographical note in early Genesis:

> "And the Lord God planted a garden eastward in Eden" (Gen. ii. 8).

The name of this country, in which Paradise was planted, means "delight", and the word occurs in various forms six times, being translated "pleasure" and "pleasures", "to delight", "delights", and "delicates". Eden itself, the country, is named exactly 14 times in the O.T., where it is found in Genesis, Isaiah, Ezekiel and Joel. As we should expect, the name is found in other languages. In Arabic it signifies "delight", "tenderness" and "loveliness" (Firuzabadi Kamus). In the cuneiform texts it signifies the plains of Babylon, and in the Accado-Sumerian (inhabitants of Mesopotamia that preceded the Babylonians) it is Edin, "the fertile plain". The Greek word hedone, meaning "pleasure", is used in the LXX of Isa. xxxvii. 12; Ezek. xxvii. 23 and Amos i. 5, although these "Edens" have no reference to Gen. ii. 8. It was because of their beauty or pleasantness that the districts were called by this name. The Eden of Gen. ii. 8, is the most ancient name in all geography. The garden of Gen. ii. was planted "eastward" in Eden. In his translation of Rosenmuller's Biblical Geography of Central Asia the Rev. N. Morran has reduced the numerous theories as to the exact situation of Eden to nine, but none of them answer all the conditions of the problem. This brings us to an important question. For whose information were the geographical notes of Gen. ii. 8-14 written? Were they given by God to Adam? We can see no reason why the information should have been given to him. We know that it was given in writing by Moses, and, to illustrate and enforce the point we desire to make, we turn to another geographical note. In Gen. xxiii. we have the record of the death of Sarah, in which Moses wrote:

> "And Sarah died in Kirjath-arba, the same is Hebron in the land of Canaan" (Gen. xxiii. 2).

It is evident that when Moses took up his pen to write the book of Genesis, he had in his possession the several "books of the generation" of his fathers. In the family documents relating to Abraham and Sarah, the place where Sarah died is called by but one name, Kirjath-arba, but, later, for the benefit of Israel who were then about to enter the promised land under Joshua, Moses gives the more modern name of the ancient city, namely "Hebron", and, in Numb. xiii., adds a note,

> "Now Hebron was built seven years before Zoan in Egypt" (Numb. xiii. 22).

If, therefore, when he wrote Genesis, Moses found it expedient to bring its ancient geography up to date we must be prepared to find his explaining pen at work in Gen. ii. When we realize that the flood in the days of Noah, must have seriously altered the configuration of the land, diverted the course of rivers, buried some tracts of land beneath the sea, and brought up above sea-level, some part of the sea-bed, we can readily see that references to geographical boundaries, countries and rivers true in the days of Adam, may, in Moses' day, have proved valueless, except for archæological purposes. Moreover, one of the lands mentioned in Gen. ii. is Ethiopia. Now in the Hebrew this word is "Cush", and as Cush was not born until over two thousand years after Adam, to speak of Adam knowing the land by the name of one of his descendants who lived two thousand years after his time would be an anachronism.

Ethiopia, in Africa, is not the only land of Cush. Cush was the father of Seba, Havilah, and Sabtechah (Gen. x. 7, 8); Nimrod moved northward into Assyria, the others went South and settled in Arabia, consequently, there is no reason why we should introduce a region of Africa into Gen. ii. We must, however, return to the record of Gen. ii. Moses tells us that the river which watered the garden, parted, and was divided into four heads. The word "head" being rosh, we must understand this to refer to the sources of these rivers, not their mouths.

> "The name of the first is Pison: that is it which compasseth the whole land of Havilah, where there is gold; and the gold of the land is good; there is bdellium and the onyx stone."

Nothing further is said of this river in Scripture but the Companion Bible tells us that it flows West of the Euphrates, and that in the year of Nabonides, the last king of Babylonia, it was called Pullakat. Havilah is associated with "Shur, that is before Egypt as thou goest toward Assyria", (Gen. xxv. 18), and Ophir, famous for its gold (Job xxviii. 16), is associated with Havilah in Gen. x. 29; and again Moses gives the added note:--

> "And their dwelling was from Mesha, as thou goest unto Sephar a mount of the East" (Gen. x. 30).

If four great rivers took their rise from the river that watered Paradise, it is plain that Paradise itself must have been in an elevated tract of country. Lenormant says, "Eden, in the Accadian and Sumerian texts is used sometimes to designate a plain in opposition to a mountain. But this is never the bottom of the valley . . . . ." The Tigris (Hiddekel, Accadian for Tigris) and the Euphrates both rise in Armenia, thus, once again, we observe a connection between Adam and Noah, for the Ark rested on "one of the mountains of Ararat", which tradition places in Armenia. Two other rivers take their rise in this region, the Kur and the Araxes, which flow into the Caspian Sea. These rivers cannot be identified with the Pison or the Gihon, but such may be what remains of them since the disruption at the flood. As the Bible is the only book that declares that this district is the cradle of the human race, it has for thirty three centuries been ahead of the "science" of the day.

Quatrefages, the great French scientist and anthropologists, says, "that the study of the various populations, and of their languages, has led scientists of the greatest deliberation and authority to place the cradle of the human race in Asia, not far from the central mass of that continent, and in the neighbourhood of the region where all the principal rivers which plough their way to the north, to the south, and to the east, take their rise". It is in Central Asia alone that wheat is indigenous, and must have been carried thence by man as he spread abroad. In Gen. ii. 12 Moses speaks of the gold, the bdellium and the onyx stone as constituting an easy means of identifying this district. The word bdellium occurs but twice in Scripture, once in Gen. ii. 12, and once in Numb. xi. 7, where the manna is likened to it. This shows that Israel, for whom Moses wrote, were well acquainted with this substance, though today there may be uncertainty as to its identity. The LXX considered it to be a precious stone, and translate the word by anthrax and krystallos, while Aquila, Symmachus and Theodotion render it bdellium, a transparent aromatic gum which is formed by a tree that grows in Arabia. The Rabbis, however, translate the word by "Pearl".

In our earlier studies, we have found that the references to "time" in Gen. i., ii. 3 have a symbolic value far outweighing their primitive meaning. As we look at this first great reference to "place" are we not justified in expecting that its description answers some more important purpose than that of satisfying the Israelites as to the identity of the site of Paradise?

Three great streams of humanity have their origin in this district; the descendants of Shem, Ham and Japheth, and, mingled with the descendants of the true seed preserved alive in the ark, we learn of the Canaanite, and their frightful progeny.

> "In the following times of history, we have seen how the river of mankind from the mountains of Armenia poured itself into the plains of the Tigris and the Euphrates. The tribes of men went forth unto the regions of the stream of Paradise, acquired power and gathered riches. But of gold they made gods, decked them with jewels and brought incense to the things which have noses and smell not" (Dr. M. Baumgarten Theological Com. on O.T.).

Whether this be so or not may perhaps remain a moot point, but it seems reasonable to suppose that in a book which covers 2000 years of history in eleven chapters (Gen. i.-xi.) not one verse, certainly not seven (Gen. ii. 8-14), would be devoted to matter transient in its application, and the original meaning of which is now beyond the power of man to ascertain. The geography of the book that brings before us the glorious prophecy of Paradise restored, is centred around the same land that is brought before us in Gen. ii. The references to Asia Minor on the West (Rev. i.-iii.); beyond the Euphrates on the East (Rev. xvi. 12); with Jerusalem and Babylon as rival cities and systems, enable us to see that not only does Revelation corresponds with Genesis as to the entry and removal of the Serpent, sin, death and curse, but that the very geographical site of Eden, may yet form the earthly basis of the heavenly city when at last it descends from God out of heaven. Its gold will indeed be good, its stones most precious, and its gates pearls (see the earlier reference to the Rabbinical interpretation of bdellium).

#6. The land of Nod, the city of Enoch (Gen. iv. 16, 17). pp. 178, 179

The first geographical reference of Holy Scripture deals with the site of the garden planted by the Lord, "eastward in Eden". The second speaks of a city built by rebellious man, "on the east of Eden".

> "And Cain went out from the presence of the Lord, and dwelt in the land of Nod on the east of Eden. And Cain knew his wife; and she conceived and bare Enoch: and he builded a city, and called the name of the city after the name of his son Enoch" (Gen. iv. 16, 17).

The curse pronounced upon Cain included the words: "A fugitive and a vagabond shalt thou be in the earth." "Vagabond" is the translation of the Hebrew word Nod, which gives its name to the land whither Cain went. The same word that is translated "Nod" in Gen. iv. 16 is translated "wanderings" in Psalms lvi. 8, where David, though taken by the Philistines to Gath—a spiritual "land of Nod"—rejoices in the fact that "God is for me", a contrast indeed with the condition of Cain.

We have a similar instance of the meaning of a place from an experience of a visitor related in Gen. xxviii. 19.

> "And he called the name of that place Bethel: but the name of that city was called Luz at the first."

In this land of Nod the first city upon earth was built. The second city to be mentioned was built by the arch-rebel Nimrod, and its name was Nineveh, (Rehoboth may not be the name of a city, but the boulevard of the great city Nineveh: also "between Nineveh and Calah" may indicate one great city) (Gen. x. 10-12). The next city to be built was Babel (Gen. xi. 4, 5 and 8), and the fourth the wicked city named Sodom (Gen. xviii. 24).

This sinister history of city-building, recorded in the early pages of Genesis, finds its echo in the book of the Revelation, where Babylon is called "that great city which reigneth over the kings of the earth". Thus Enoch the city of Cain, the vagabond; Nineveh the city of Nimrod, the mighty rebel; Sodom, to which apostate Israel is likened (Isa. i. 10; Rev. xi. 8) and Babel, the city of final antichristian rebellion, are linked together.

Enoch comes from chanak, "to dedicate". The word is chiefly used to indicate the dedication of offerings, houses or persons, to the Lord, and this leads us to suspect that Cain dedicated his child and his city to the Serpent, the Wicked One, whose child he was (I John iii. 12). In Dan. iii. 2, 3, the word is used of the dedication of an image by Nebuchadnezzar for idolatrous purposes. Closely associated with Cain's city is the "civilization" introduced by his immediate descendants (Gen. iv. 20-22), an attempt to blunt the edge of the curse on the earth that Cain suffered. This is in severe contrast with the attitude of the great descendant of the other Enoch, "the seventh from Adam", who refused to mitigate the > "work and toil of our hands, because of the ground which the Lord hath cursed" (Gen. v. 29), and looked forward to the fulfillment of the type which his son Noah, and Noah's great work, foreshadowed.

Where Cain "builded a city", Noah "builded an altar", and both "buildings" are associated with the ground that was cursed (Gen. iv. 17; viii. 20, 21). So, later, we read that Nimrod, the rebel, builded Nineveh (Gen. x. 11) and the rebellious nations of the earth proposed to build a city and a tower (Gen. xi. 4); but Abraham, who obeyed, built an altar unto the Lord (Gen. xii. 7, 8).

Thus we have, in the first two geographical notices in Genesis, the site of the garden which the Lord planted, and the site of the city which Cain builded, which clearly symbolize the two antagonistic lines of doctrine that culminate in the destruction of Babylon and the restoration of Paradise foretold in the closing book of the New Testament.

#7. The First Registry of Births and Deaths (Gen. v. - vii. 6). pp. 189, 190

Once more, we leave the question of "place" and return to the element of "time".

"This is the book of the generations of Adam" (Gen. v. 1). A serious writer has recently put forward the idea that the fourteen generations of Genesis, refer not to what follows, but to what goes before. Thus, Gen. ii. 4 refers to the first chapter of Genesis, and speaks of the "origin" of heaven and earth, and so throughout the book.

While an appeal to Matt. i. 1 most certainly shows that, there not the "descendants", but the ancestry of Jesus Christ constitute His "generations", an examination of the usage of toledoth, "generations", in the O.T. makes the idea of ancestry impossible in every case. The only meaning that fits all cases is "family history", the context alone deciding whether the look is backward or forward.

"The generations of Pharez."

These are found in the book of Ruth, but one looks in vain for any of the ancestors of Pharez: what is given is a list of his descendants, from his son Hezron to David.

An example where "family history" better fits the case is found in I Chron. xxvi., in verse 31 of which chapter the expression "according to the generations of his fathers" obviously looks backward. Two "books of generation" are found in Scripture. The first relates to Adam, the second to Christ, and between the two is to be found the chronology of the Scriptures. After the birth of Christ, chronology ceases, and all attempts to construct a chronology of the N.T. fail because the necessary facts are wanting.

Anstey, in his work "The Romance of Bible Chronology", says:--

> "In a conversation with a friend, the present writer, in claiming authenticity for the chronological records of the early chapter of Genesis, was met by the objection 'At any rate there were no Registrars of Births and Deaths in those days', to which we replied, 'That is just exactly what the fifth chapter of Genesis is'. It might have been copied from the fly-leaf of an old patriarchal family Bible, or genealogical family chart. The family records that are preserved in these days are little else but records of births, marriages and deaths, but they go back farther than any other records in the family chart. Moses was the literary executor of Joseph, and the custodian of the heirlooms of antiquity preserved by the chosen race."

The chronology that extends from Adam to Noah is simplicity itself, but in later Scriptures we meet increasing complication. It may be good for us to construct our own chronology, collecting the material from the record of the Scriptures themselves. We shall soon find that we must not assume that the son named in the genealogy is always the firstborn, or that where the firstborn is included, he is always mentioned first. Seth was born after Cain and Abel, and, though mentioned first, Shem was not the eldest (Gen. x. 21). While there is a most careful catalogue of births and deaths in the line of Adam to Noah in Gen. v. no such genealogy is given of the line of Cain (Gen. iv.). Some have objected to the length of life attributed to Adam and the Patriarchs, but if we tamper with the 930 years of Adam's life, and reduce it to so many "months", what shall we do with the statement in the same book that Joseph was thirty years old when he stood before Pharaoh? After all, it is more reasonable to believe that, in the beginning, disease was less rampant than in later times, and the climate not so changeable as it became after the Flood.

It will be noticed that Moses does not give the "date" of the birth or death of each individual, neither day nor month being included, but reckons by complete years. This principle must be remembered when using the chronology.

> "Methuselah is said to have been 969 years at his death (Gen. v. 27), but actually it will be discovered that he was 968 years, 1 month and 17 days old, plus whatever fraction of the year of his birth was included in the 65th year of his father Enoch, when the flood began" (Anstey).
> "Since Ussher, no chronologer who has adopted the numbers given in the Hebrew text as the basis of his calculation, has ever failed to fix the flood in the year AN. HOM. 1656, and the death of Joseph in the year AN. HOM. 2369" (Anstey).

Here is the most venerable family document in the world, the family history of the ancestors of all mankind. To remove it from the book is to leave mankind without a record of its beginning, and more serious still, to snap the link that binds Adam, the first head of the race, to Christ, the true Head and Saviour of mankind.

#8. The chronology and typical dates of the Flood (Gen. vii., viii.).
pp. 230 - 232

The simple, straightforward register of births and deaths that provides the chronological link between Adam and the Flood, carries with it the conviction of truth.

We now come to the record of the flood itself and upon examination find in it a number of interrelated dates so connected with the narrative that they can be neither removed nor altered without dislocating the whole. Seen in their true place, as records of actual fact, they vivify the story and place the narrative upon the high ground of actual history.

Let us first of all assemble our data.

> "For yet seven days, and I will cause it to rain upon the earth forty days and forty nights" (Gen. vii. 4).
>
> "And Noah was six hundred years old when the flood of waters was upon the earth" (Gen. vii. 6).
>
> "And it came to pass after seven days, that the waters of the flood were upon the earth" (Gen. vii. 10).
>
> "In the six hundredth year of Noah's life, in the second month, the seventeenth day of the month, the same day were all the fountains of the great deep broken up, and the windows of heaven were opened, and the rain was upon the earth forty days and forty nights" (Gen. vii. 11, 12).
>
> "And the waters prevailed upon the earth an hundred and fifty days" (Gen. vii. 24).
>
> "And the waters returned from off the earth continually: and after the end of the hundred and fifty days the waters were abated" (Gen. viii. 3).
>
> "And the ark rested in the seventh month, on the seventeenth day of the month, upon the mountains of Ararat" (Gen. viii. 4).
>
> "And the waters decreased continually until the tenth month: in the tenth month, on the first day of the month were the tops of the mountains seen" (Gen. viii. 5).
>
> "And it came to pass at the end of the forty days, that Noah opened the window of the ark which he had made" (Gen. viii. 6).
>
> "He stayed yet another seven days: and again he sent forth the dove out of the ark" (Gen. viii. 10).

"And he stayed yet another seven days; and sent forth the dove; which returned not again unto him any more" (Gen. viii. 12).

"And it came to pass on the six hundredth and first year, in the first month, the first day of the month, the waters were dried up from off the earth" (Gen. viii. 13).

"And in the second month, on the seven and twentieth day of the month, was the earth dried" (Gen. viii. 14).

We cannot help but be struck with the opening and closing dates given here. In order that the evidence may be the better seen let us use figures, instead of spelling out the numbers.

Years when the flood came: 600th year of Noah.
Year when the waters were dried up: 601st year, 1st month, 1st day.

Six is the number of man, of labour, of failure, and of the measurement of time. Seven is associated with perfection, rest, and attainment. It is significant that Noah, whose name means "rest", and of whom the word "perfect" is first used (Gen. vi. 9), should at the close of his 600th year experience the flood and the deliverance of the ark, and that the drying up of the waters of judgment should coincide with the New Year's day of Noah's seventh century. The type is too clear to be missed, and, linked together with the witness of the first chapter of Genesis, makes us certain that all has been ordered according to a mighty plan.

If we were asked to say how many days there were in five months, we should have to ask for a clear statement as to the word "month". The first five months in our calendar have 31, 28, (29), 31, 30, 31 days, so that we should require to know what months were intended before a total could be reached. But the Hebrew month was a period of 30 days which gave 360 days for 12 months, leaving 5 days to be accounted for. Time was measured by the revolution of the sun, as it is to this day, and the year was one of 365 days. The feast, however, were regulated by the revolution of the moon.

"Blow up the trumpet in the new moon" (Psa. lxxxi. 3).

"Your new moons and your appointed feasts" (Isa. i. 14).

"Burnt offerings, and meat offerings, and drink offerings, in the feasts, and in the new moons, and in the sabbaths, in all the solemnities of the house of Israel" (Ezek. xlv. 17).

We must not make the mistake of imagining that the Hebrew names and number of months must necessarily have been used by Adam, Noah or Abraham: we can only be tolerably certain that no radical changes could have been made at Sinai, for day and night, summer and winter, remained unaltered, and the length of the solar year is independent of any dispensational change among the sons of men. As can be seen from the following data, the narrative of the flood contains positive proof of the average length of a month.

The flood commenced on the 17th day of the 2nd month and the ark rested on the 17th day of the 7th month. Thus we have an interval of exactly 5 months, which Gen. viii. 3, 4 declares to be 150 days. A month therefore must have averaged 30 days. We cannot, however, be dogmatic and say that a month must have been 30 days because the Hebrews reckoned 30 days to the month except when they saw the new moon on the 30th, which then became the 1st day of the new month.

Kennedy, a chronologer of the eighteenth century, makes the length of time during which Noah was in the ark exactly 365 days. He maintained that Moses measures time by solar years, and computes time by lunar years. His attitude to the Scriptures encourages one to give him a hearing, for he says:

> "The Hebrew text has never been corrupted in the article of Chronology by Jew or Pagan, by chance or design. It is not more certain that there is a sun and moon in the heavens than it is that not a single error of the press, or of Jewish transcriber, has crept into the present copies of the Hebrew Massoretic Text, to give the least interruption to its chronological years."

Returning to details, and, particularly, typical foreshadowings, let us look at Gen. viii. 4.

"The ark rested in the 7th month, on the 17th day of the month." What is there suggestive about these dates? At first, nothing, but when we remember that in the month Abib, the month of the Passover, Moses instructed the Israelites to reckon that month "the beginning of months, the first month of the year to you" (Exod. xii. 1, 2), we discover that the 17th day of the 7th month is a date to be noted. The 7th month became the 1st month. The Passover was observed on the 14th, and on the 17th the Lord was raised from the dead, consequently, the specific date of the resting of the ark on the mountains of Ararat becomes one of intensely typical importance.

The rain was upon the earth 40 days and 40 nights. This is the first occurrence of this critical number in the Scriptures. It is the number of trial. We immediately think of the 40 days occupied by the spies in spying out the Land, with the consequent 40 years wandering in the wilderness, (Numb. xiii. 26; xiv. 34); or of the 40 days of Jonah iii. 4; or of the 40 days preceding the temptation in the wilderness (Matt. iv. 2).

Again we see how complete, and how satisfactory is the account given of the flood, and its particular events. May these studies confirm our faith that these Scriptures are inspired, authoritative and trustworthy.

The SECOND EPISTLE to TIMOTHY.

#17. "According to my gospel" (ii. 8, 9).

pp. 13 - 17

In the preceding article of this series we have had brought before us the important association of "considering" and "understanding". We now pass on to another most wonderful faculty of mind, the exercise of memory:

> "Remember that Jesus Christ of the seed of David was raised from the dead according to my gospel" (II Tim. ii. 8).

Memory plays an important part both in Christian witness and Christian growth. Personality and memory are so interlinked that, where the memory becomes an utter blank, responsibility also ceases.

Both the faculty of memory and the failure of forgetfulness have played, and still play, an important part in the experience of the believer. Look at the fickle memory of Israel:

> "We remember the fish, which we did eat in Egypt freely; the cucumbers, and the melons, and the leeks, and the onions, and the garlick" (Numb. xi. 5).

Yet they forgot the bondage, the burdens, and the bitterness of Egypt. We find therefore in that great prophetic song of Jehovah's name* (* - see "Fundamentals of Dispensational Truth", Volume XXIV, page 81) the charge laid against Israel that:

> "Of the Rock that begat thee thou art unmindful, and has forgotten God that formed thee" (Deut. xxxii. 18).

So also in the Divine summary of Psalm cvi. we read,

> "Our fathers understood not Thy wonders in Egypt; they remembered not the multitude of Thy mercies; but they provoked Him at the sea, even at the Red sea . . . . . They soon forgat His works" (Psa. cvi. 7, 13).

On the one hand the Apostle urges us to "remember" our past alienation and hopeless condition as Gentiles in the flesh (Eph. ii. 11, 12), but, on the other, to "forget" the things that are behind, as we press toward the mark (Phil. iii. 13, 14), exhortations of which we all are in constant need.

Paul invokes the power of memory in the opening of this second epistle to Timothy, saying, "I have remembrance of thee" (II Tim. i. 3); "Being mindful of thy tears" (i. 4); "I call to remembrance the unfeigned faith that is in thee . . . . . Lois . . . . . Eunice" (i. 5); and "I put thee in remembrance that thou stir up the gift of God, which is in thee by the putting on of my hands" (i. 6).

In II Tim. ii. 8 the Apostle appeals to Timothy himself to remember certain facts concerning the great central theme of his message, and charges him to put his hearers in remembrance of the self-same teaching (ii. 14). Let us now consider more exactly what it was that Paul was so anxious for Timothy to remember:

> "Remember that Jesus Christ of the seed of David was raised from the dead according to my gospel" (II Tim. ii. 8).

While the A.V. reads, "Remember that Jesus Christ", thereby suggesting that Timothy was to remember some fact about the Lord rather than the Lord Himself, the R.V. omits the word "that", as does also the Companion Bible, in its margin. There is however good reason for its retention. When Luke wrote "Remember Lot's wife" (Luke xvii. 32), he put the words "Lot's wife" in the genitive. Here, however, in II Tim. ii. 8, the words "Jesus Christ" are put in the accusative. Timothy was called upon to remember, not so much his Lord, but one or two particular facts about his Lord that were vital to his ministry. In verse 18 of the same chapter the words that follow the verb "saying" are in the accusative, and so the translation given in both the A.V. and the R.V is, "saying that the resurrection is past already".

In the original text, these facts that Timothy was urged to remember, are in the following order:

(1) That He was raised from the dead.
(2) That He was of the seed of David.
(3) That these two facts must be kept together in their relation to that gospel which Paul calls "My gospel".

From earliest times the literal, physical resurrection of our Lord from the dead, and the reality of His human nature, were alike the subject of attack and denial. Docetism (from dokein, "to seem") taught that the body of Christ was not real or material, but only an appearance. But, intimately associated with the resurrection of Christ is the hope of His people; so much so that to deny either is to destroy both. It matters not which way the problem is stated, the result is the same.

> "If the dead rise not, then is not Christ raised: And if Christ be not raised, your faith is vain; ye are yet in your sins" (I Cor. xv. 16, 17).

That doubts concerning the literal fact of resurrection had already been entertained and expressed in the Church is seen by reading verses 17 and 18 of this second chapter of II Timothy.

> "And their word will eat as doth a canker; of whom is Hymenæus and Philetus; who concerning the truth have erred, saying that the resurrection is past already; and overthrow the faith of some" (II Tim. ii. 17, 18).

If he did not believe and maintain the glorious fact of the resurrection, it would have been impossible for Timothy to have succeeded Paul, either as an evangelist or as a minister of the Mystery. In II Tim. i. the Apostle speaks of that gospel of which he had been appointed preacher, apostle and teacher of the Gentiles, and for which he suffered, and the one outstanding fact that he brings forward there is that:

> "Our Saviour Jesus Christ, Who hath abolished death, and hath brought life and immortality to light through the gospel" (II Tim. i. 10).

The fact that Christ was of the seed of David can be looked at from more than one angle. In the first place, whoever believes that fact, must believe that Christ was really Man, that His body was really flesh and blood, and, from the standpoint of the kingdom and its hope, it was vital to the fulfillment of prophecy and covenant. So far as the dispensation of the mystery is concerned, the fact that Christ was of the seed of David, proves that God was manifested in the flesh, but from the standpoint of Peter and his ministry, the same fact not only demonstrated His manhood, but pointed to the realization of the hope of Israel:

> "David . . . . . being a prophet, and knowing that God had sworn with an oath to him, that of the fruit of his loins, according to the flesh, he would raise up Christ to sit on his throne; he seeing this before spake of the resurrection of Christ" (Acts ii. 29-31).

The basic epistle to the Romans makes it very clear that Christ was of the seed of David, according to the flesh:

> "The gospel of God . . . . . concerning His Son Jesus Christ our Lord, which was made of the seed of David according to the flesh; and declared to be the Son of God with power, according to the spirit of holiness, by the resurrection of the dead" (Rom. i. 1-4).

While Paul most surely believed that the Lord Jesus Christ was of the seed of David, according to the flesh, he tells us in connection with his ministry of reconciliation:

> "Wherefore henceforth know we no man after the flesh; yea, though we have known Christ after the flesh, yet now henceforth know we Him no more" (II Cor. v. 16).

If he would make full proof of his ministry, Timothy must therefore do the same. Others may preach the gospel of the kingdom; others may stress the reality of the throne of David. These ministers of the circumcision and the kingdom were right so to do. But Timothy had been chosen to maintain that good deposit of truth which is found only in the prison ministry of the apostle Paul. In the form of sound words which he had heard of Paul, the throne of David is overshadowed by a higher and greater throne. A higher throne, a vaster kingdom, a more spiritual realm, is associated with that seat "far above all", and to this the Apostle would have Timothy devote himself; this he would have him pass on to faithful men who should be able to teach others also; consequently, the Apostle follows the two items that deal with the incarnation and the resurrection of Christ with the qualifying words:

> "According to my gospel; wherein I suffer trouble, as an evil doer, even unto bonds" (II Tim. ii. 8, 9).

Here we have the prisoner of the Lord, "even unto bonds". Desmos, "bonds", and desmios, "prisoner", are poignant words in connection with the ministry of the mystery.

"And now, behold, I go bound (deo) in the spirit . . . . . bonds (desmos) and afflictions await me" (Acts xx. 22, 23).

Verse 24 shows him at the beginning of a "course"; II Tim. iv. 7 shows the course finished. At Acts xx. imprisonment lay before the Apostle, but it is clear that he also knew that, associated with prison, a ministry awaited him. It is in this searching letter to Timothy that his prison ministry (made available to us in the epistles to the Ephesians, Philippians and Colossians), is brought to its conclusion.

What a light is thrown upon the character of the Apostle by the concluding words of II Tim. ii. 9, "But the word of God is not bound". If we read this on one straight level with the rest of the verse we destroy its meaning. To realize the full import of the clause we must imagine a pause, followed by the lighting up of the Apostle's face as the contrast between the limitations of the servant in his bondage, and the Word in its freedom flashed upon his mind, and lighted up his devoted spirit. Earlier, he had said so pathetically at the close of the epistle to the Colossians, "Remember my bonds", but when he had requested prayer for an "open door" he had, with sublime indifference to his own state, simply asked for "a door of utterance" or "for the word", logos, as it is literally. So, here, a prisoner, awaiting his earthly doom, no longer in military custody with a degree of liberty, as was the case in Acts xxviii., but now, since the great fire of Rome and the subsequent persecution of Christians, imprisoned as an evil doer. In the circumstances of his case, the Apostle knew that from this charge there was no earthly release.* (* - See series entitled "The Powers that Be", Volume XXXI). Yet, from this dungeon, marked with death, sounds the triumphant, unselfish, note, "But the Word of God is not bound!"

Returning to the qualifying clause "according to my gospel", it is well to read this with Eph. iii. 6, 7.

"That the Gentiles should be fellow-heirs, and of the same body, and partakers of His promise in Christ by the gospel whereof I was made a minister."

To stop at the end of verse 6 is to omit an important truth. The mystery is not connected with the promises found in the gospel preached by Peter, "great and precious" though they were. Peter knows of a "royal priesthood and an holy nation", but this is entirely outside the scope of the mystery. The believer who rejoices in the truth of the mystery is continually assailed by suggestions from outside that tempt him to leave the high and holy ground of his calling to participate in the ministry of other callings and spheres. One will feel keenly the charge, unjustly leveled at him, that he has no "evangelistic" sympathy or ministry. Another will be baited with the false charge of Pharisaic exclusiveness, and be tempted to make a protest by stepping down from the exalted ground of his high calling. May one and all "remember" the insistence made in this short epistle upon the exclusive character of our witness.

"The testimony of our Lord and of me His prisoner."
"The pattern of sound words, heard of me."
"The things which thou hast heard of me . . . . . the same commit."
"My gospel."

"Knowing of whom thou hast learned them."
"By me the preaching might be fully known."

If unwarranted and uninspired this insistence on the personal pronoun would be disturbing, but the statements are as true as John iii. 16. When we realize how few there are who stand for the truth of the mystery, we should be all the more determined, by grace, to devote our every effort to its support and to its furtherance. If only all those who realize the blessedness of the calling could say "One thing I do", what a testimony would go out from this little, despised company! May every reader ponder II Tim. ii. 8, 9 as before the Lord, making it a very personal matter. We might do worse than breathe the earliest recorded prayer of Paul:

"Lord, what wilt THOU have ME to do" (Acts ix. 6).

#18. The Faithful Saying (ii. 10-13). The difference between living and reigning with Christ. pp. 49 - 54

In our last article we left Paul in bonds, suffering as an evildoer but exulting in the fact that "the word of God is not bound". The subject is in some measure continued to verse 13, the end of the present section.

"I endure", said the Apostle, and associated his endurance with the aionion glory of the believer. "If we endure", continued the Apostle, and associated that endurance of the believer himself with the added glory of "reigning" with Christ.

In the original, the words translated in the A.V. of II Tim. ii. 10 and 12 "I endure" and "If we suffer" are the verb hupomeno, from hupo, "under", and meno, "remain" or "abide". The noun form of this word is hupomone, and is translated "patience", and it would be wise if, in the verb, we brought the two words together and translated II Tim. ii. 10 and 12 "patiently endure", for there may be a grudging or murmuring endurance, which is far from the Apostle's meaning here.

Let us use this opportunity of becoming acquainted with the usage and derivations of this word meno, and for our present purpose let us confine ourselves to the epistles to Timothy.

Meno, "To remain or abide":

"If they continue in faith and charity and holiness with sobriety" (I Tim. ii. 15).
"If we believe not, He abideth faithful" (II Tim. ii. 13).
"But continue thou in the things which thou hast learned" (II Tim. iii. 14).
"Erastus abode at Corinth" (II Tim. iv. 20).

The simple and literal reference to "abiding" at Corinth helps us to understand what "continuing" in the faith implies. In an earlier epistle the Apostle has put "continuance" in the faith over against "being moved away" from the hope (Col. i. 23), which shows that he had in mind the primitive meaning.

Epimeno, "To remain on", and so "persist", and so "continue". It would be best if meno were allotted the translation "remain" and epimeno the translation "continue", so giving the prefix epi its value.

> "Take heed unto thyself, and unto the doctrine; continue in them" (I Tim. iv. 16).

There are, of course, many other occurrences of these words, and, moreover, many other combinations, such as prosmeno, diameno, katameno, etc., all of which must be consulted if the reader would be "throughly furnished". For our present purpose it is sufficient if we have established the relation that exists between the two words translated "endure" and "patience", and if both are seen in association with their basic idea of abiding or remaining. To endure is "to remain under", and patience is that grace of "remaining under", awaiting God's good time for deliverance. The man who could leap from the contemplation of his bonds to the exultant testimony that, nevertheless, the Word of God was not bound, was not a man to "remain under" as a result of either fear or despondency. His endurance was willing and an act of faith, and counted as such in the eyes of the Lord.

The Apostle knew that there was a purpose in his sufferings—"I endure all things for the elect's sakes"—and this very knowledge was sustaining. If we can say with Job, "He knoweth the way that I take", and if we are convinced that, at last, after we have been tried, we "shall come forth as gold", most of the sting will be removed from persecution, and joy will take its place. While it would be gratuitous to assume that none of Paul's sufferings fell upon him because of his own frailty and because he was a man of like passions with ourselves, we do know that from the moment of his commission until the end of his course the Lord associated with his ministry the suffering of great things for His name's sake (Acts ix. 16).

As a reference to II Cor. xi. and xii. will show, not only at the beginning of his ministry did he endure unparalleled sufferings, but when that period came to a close and he faced the prospect of the second ministry, visualized in Acts xx. 22-24, he spoke of a new set of sufferings intimately associated with his ministry of the mystery, saying:

> "Who now rejoice in my sufferings for you, and fill up that which is behind of the afflictions of Christ in my flesh for His body's sake, which is the church, whereof I am made a minister" (Col. i. 24, 25).

He told the Ephesians that his imprisonment was for them, and his tribulations were for their glory (Eph. iii. 1, 13), and in his last epistle, the one before us, we find the same claim.

The opening word of verse 10, "Therefore", is, in the original, dia touto, "because of this", and there are some who have felt that the Apostle was here referring back to the free and unbound character of the Word of God. Dia touto, however, followed by hina (in order that) is a phrase that the Apostle employs elsewhere, and by it refers to what follows. For example:

> "Therefore it is of faith, that it might be by grace" (Rom. iv. 16).
> "Therefore I write these things . . . . . lest . . . . . I should use sharpness" (II Cor. xiii. 10).
> "For this cause I obtained mercy, that in me first" (I Tim. i. 16).

Paul therefore endured affliction that the elect might benefit, though we know how resolutely he repudiated the remotest idea of associating himself with the atoning work of the Saviour, saying, "Was Paul crucified for you?" (I Cor. i. 13), "Who then is Paul, and who is Apollos, but ministers by whom ye believed" (I Cor. iii. 5).

Paul's sufferings on behalf of the church of the mystery laid no foundation for either the salvation of the members of that church nor its position in glory, but there is, as we have learned, an added glory, called in Phil. iii. "the prize", in Col. iii. "the reward", in II Tim. iv. "the crown", and in the very context of our verse, "reigning with the Lord". Now with regard to this added thing, we discover the Apostle does introduce his own example.

> "Brethren, be followers together of me, and mark them which walk so as ye have us for an example . . . . . for our conversation is in heaven; from whence also we look for the Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ, Who shall change the body of our humiliation, that it may be fashioned like unto the body of His glory" (Phil. iii. 17-21).

This body of humiliation must not be interpreted as referring to the body of every believer, for the Apostle has made his meaning plain in the Philippian epistle.

The word translated "vile" in the A.V., which we translate "humiliation", is tapeinosis. Just as we saw the word "endure" meant literally "to remain under", so we discover that this word primarily means a low-lying place or condition, hence "lowly" or "humble". Now in Phil. ii. 8 we read of Christ that "He humbled Himself" (tapeinoo), and in Phil. ii. 3 the believer is exhorted to follow the Saviour's example with "lowliness of mind" (tapeinophrosune). To this the Apostle refers when he says "I know how to be abased, and how to abound" (Phil. iv. 2). It is this voluntary humiliation that is in view in Phil. iii. 10.

> "That I may know Him, and the power of His resurrection, and the fellowship of His sufferings, being made conformable unto His death, if by any means I might attain unto the out-resurrection out from among the dead" (Phil. iii. 10, 11).

Just as this "conformity" (summorphomai) is no ordinary, average, experience, but something in advance of even the Apostle's experience ("Not as though I had already attained", Phil. iii. 12), so the parallel, "conformity" (summorphos) of verse 21 is not the blessed hope which belongs to every member of the one body, but that "out-resurrection" to which the Apostle aspired, and for which he voluntarily suffered. This is the background of the teaching of II Tim. ii. 10-13.

Coming a little closer to the actual wording of verse 10 we find that we must translated the passage:

> "Therefore I endure all things for the elect's sakes, that they may also obtain that salvation which is in Christ Jesus with age-abiding glory."

It is not "salvation" in its primary sense, but "salvation with age-abiding glory" that is in view. The whole testimony of Scripture makes it unnecessary to think that the elect will ever fail of salvation, but the elect may not all voluntarily share the humiliation of Christ; the elect may not all even desire to be conformed to His death. The elect are certainly on the one Foundation, Christ, yet for the building they erect subsequent to their salvation they may receive a reward or they may suffer loss. That this is the teaching of the Apostle the expansion of II Tim. ii. 11-13 is proof:

> "It is a faithful saying: For if we be dead with Him, we shall also live with Him; if we patiently endure, we shall also reign with Him; if we deny him, He also will deny us; If we believe not, yet He abideth faithful: He cannot deny Himself."

Here we have two very distinct phases of the work of grace.

(1) Free and full, unmerited, favour, that reckons the believer to have died together with Christ, and consequently pledges that he shall live together with Him, quite irrespective of his endurance or works, even if there should be a sad lack of faith subsequent to salvation (and Heb. iii. 12 is the classic example of the heart of unbelief in the believer, see Heb. iii., iv.). This lack of faith, which, while not depriving the redeemed of the title "believer", would prevent him from taking the title "faithful"; this smallness of faith would not touch the fact that he was saved, for "He abideth faithful, He cannot deny Himself".

(2) Faithfulness, however, is marked with Divine approval wherever it is found. Caleb and Joshua wholly followed the Lord, and they not only received, in type, "salvation", but "age-abiding glory", which many of their contemporaries lost. Consequently endurance under trial and a steadfast adherence to the Lord will be honoured, and the honour, in this passage, is "reigning with Him". In Rom. viii. 17, 18 we have the two classes of believers brought before us, "If children, then heirs; heirs of God". Nothing can alter this fact. It is all of grace, and is parallel with the opening clause of II Tim. ii. 11, "If we died with Him we shall also live with Him". But Rom. viii. 17 continues, "and joint-heirs with Christ; if so be that we suffer with Him, that we may also glorified together".

This is an advance upon the former position, which is parallel with the glorious testimony of Ephesians, "not of works". The latter is parallel with Philippians, "work out your own salvation". The former is the hope of the calling, whatever calling may be in view, the latter is the prize of that calling, whatever calling may be in view.

This "prize", this "reward", this "crown", this "reign" may be lost, and the one thing picked out by the Apostle when writing to Timothy was that of denying the Lord. With Nero on the throne and persecution raging, this denial of the Lord was an ever-present and dreadful possibility. The Apostle encouraged his son Timothy, and he encourages all of us who follow, however feebly, to endure, by speaking of the "age-abiding glory". Membership of the One Body is eternal, but the added glory (whether spoken of in Matthew, the Gospel of the Kingdom, or in Hebrews, the Epistle of the heavenly phase of the Kingdom, or in Romans, the Epistle of the grace of God to the Gentile as well as the Jew, or in Philippians and II Timothy), is age-abiding. We see the same principle at work in the book of the Revelation.

> "To him that overcometh will I grant to sit with Me in My throne, even as I also overcame, and am set down with My Father in His throne" (Rev. iii. 21).
> "And I saw thrones, and they sat upon them, and judgment was given unto them: and I saw the souls of them that were beheaded for the witness of Jesus, and for the word of God, and which had not worshipped the beast, neither his image, neither had received his mark upon their foreheads, or in their hands; and they lived and reigned with Christ a thousand years" (Rev. xx. 4).

Here we perceive that every one that attains to the age-abiding glory of the Revelation was not only saved, but endured. The throne and the glory are not the same as those of II Tim. ii., but the principle remains. We are not Apostles, but we all have a sphere of influence, and our example may help or hinder fellow-believers from reaching that age-abiding glory that was in the Apostle's mind, for which he endured, and concerning which he not only taught but "warned" (Phil. iii. 17-21; Col. i. 28). This last reference, namely Col. i. 28, is too good an illustration of the principle found in II Tim. ii. 11-13 to be passed over. In Col. i. we have two presentations, parallel with the two positions of II Tim. ii.

(1) The believer shall be presented holy, and unblameable and unreprovable, by reason of the death of Christ. This is parallel with the statement, "If we died with Him, we shall also live with Him".

(2) The believer may also be presented perfect, and this is connected with "warning and teaching". Col. ii. is the great warning, "Beware", "Let no man beguile you of your reward" (not your life, that is safe) (Col. iii. 3). This is parallel with the added glory of reigning with Christ if the believer endures.

Coming back to the passages under review, we learn that "This is a faithful saying". There are five such sayings in the pastoral epistles, and it is possible that they were well-known as part of the method of teaching adopted in the early church, or part of the service with which the believer would be familiar. They are,

(1) "This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptation, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners, of whom I am chief (or first)" (I Tim. i. 15).
(2) "This is a true saying, If a man desire the office of a bishop, he desireth a good work" (I Tim. iii. 1).
(3) "This is a faithful saying and worthy of all acceptation" (Namely the preceding teaching concerning godliness and bodily exercise) (I Tim. iv. 9).
(4) "It is a faithful saying: For if we died with Him, we shall also live with Him" (II Tim. ii. 11, 13).

(5) "This is a faithful saying, and these things I will that thou affirm constantly, that they which have believed in God might be careful to maintain good works" (Titus iii. 8).

The testimony concerning the prize and the crown is as much a faithful saying as the testimony that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners: may we believe all that God has spoken.

#19. (ii. 14-26). The Structure of the passage as a whole, The warning of verse 14 in particular.
pp. 89 - 93

We have now considered together the following sections of this second epistle to Timothy:

(1) THE SALUTATION AND REMEMBRANCE (i. 1-7).
(2) THE FORSAKEN MESSAGE (i. 8-18).
(3) THE GOOD SOLDIER (ii. 1-13).

These members find their correspondence in the third and fourth chapters of the epistle, leaving the two central members:

D | ii. 14-26. "Approved" (dokimos).
D | iii. 1-9. "Disapproved" (adokimos).

to complete the epistle and its corresponding members.

Throughout the epistle, so far, there has been an intermingling of sunshine and shadow, rejoicing and suffering. This is obvious to the most superficial reader. In the salutation we find not only encouraging words for Timothy's benefit, remembrances of his home life and Christian upbringing, reminders of the special gift that he had received by the laying on of the Apostle's hands, but we find also the exhortation to stir up this gift, and the very solemn reminder that God had not given to us a spirit of cowardice, but of power, and of love, and of a sound mind.

In the second section, we have the exhortation, "Be not ashamed", and the repeated reference to the fact that suffering is often the mead of faithfulness here, and we have also the triumphant testimony of the Apostle to the faithful keeping of the Lord. In the section now concluded, namely ii. 1-13, if there be the necessity to endure, to suffer evil, to strive and to wait, there is also the counterbalance of crown and reign. Timothy therefore would be led by these succeeding steps to the glorious conclusion that the only thing that really matters in this present sphere is that we shall be approved unto God (II Tim. ii. 15), with its dreadful counterpart in chapter iii., of those like Jannes and Jambres who are disapproved concerning the faith (iii. 8).

The section before us, II Tim. ii. 14-26, divides into three parts as follows:

A | 14, 15. The WORKMAN and the TRUTH. "The word of truth."
B | 16-23. ERROR and the TRUTH. "Concerning the truth."
A | 24-26. The SERVANT and the TRUTH. "Acknowledging the truth."

Everything revolves around "The truth". In the first case we have right division of the truth, which leads to unashamed work. Secondly we have wrong division of the truth ("past already"), which leads to the overthrowing of the faith, and, thirdly, we have the acknowledging of the truth, which liberates from the snare of the devil.

At the heart of this epistle we are at the heart of all service, all loyalty, all good success. Nothing is so important as our attitude to the truth. If we are wrong there we are wrong altogether. It may be that truth must be spoken in love (Eph. iv. 15); it may be that the Apostle combined faith with truth ("verity", I Tim. ii. 7); it may be that the whole armour of God is made up of something more than the girdle of truth (Eph. vi. 14); it may be that the fruit of the Spirit is goodness and righteousness as well as truth (Eph. v. 9); but, without truth, there would be no ministry of love, no apostolic record, no armour of God, no fruit of the Spirit.

While this threefold division of the section before us is important, it is not complete; we therefore set out in more detailed form the structure:

II Timothy ii. 14 - 26.
The approved concerning the truth.

THE WORKMAN AND THE TRUTH.
A | a | 14. Strive not about words.
b | 15-. Study to show thyself approved.
c | -15. That he may be unashamed.
ERROR AND TRUTH.
B | 16. Exhortation. Shun. Increase ungodliness.
C | d | 17, 18. Teachers and doctrine. A canker.
e | 19-. God's foundation. Sure.
e | -19. God's foundation. Seal.
d | 20, 21. Teachers and doctrine. Great house and vessels.
B | 22, 23. Exhortation. Flee. Avoid. Gender strifes.
THE SERVANT AND THE TRUTH.
A | a | 24. Servants of the Lord must not strive.
b | 25. Repentance.
c | 26. That he may be delivered.

Let us now see what lessons await us as we examine more carefully each of these three subdivisions:

> "Of these things put them in remembrance, charging them before the Lord that they strive not about words to no profit, but to the subverting of the hearers" (II Tim. ii. 14).

It is easy to go wrong at the outset of this new section. Just as the testimony of II Cor. iii. 6 can be distorted from the intended meaning of the Apostle—where the letter that kills stand for the law of Moses, and can be made to mean, what he most certainly never taught, that it did not so much matter whether we kept to the literal teaching of the Scriptures so long as we caught its "spirit", a fantasy that has opened the door for much false teaching and false freedom—so II Tim. ii. 14 may very easily be misunderstood. The Apostle has insisted in this very epistle upon the necessity of having "a pattern of sound words", and in contending earnestly for the faith, it often becomes an absolute necessity that we must "strive about words".

In this solemn charge the Apostle uses the expression logomacheo, which word occurs, in noun form, in the earlier epistle, and in a context that settles the meaning of the passage before us.

> "If any man teach otherwise, and consent not to wholesome words, even the words of our Lord Jesus Christ, and to the doctrine which is according to godliness, he is proud, knowing nothing, but doting about questions and strifes of words, whereof cometh envy, strife, railings, evil surmisings, perverse disputings of men of corrupt minds, and destitute of the truth" (I Tim. vi. 3-5).

There can be no possible comparison between such perverse disputings, and the patient and loving investigation of the believer into the very words of inspired truth, which he desires to hold fast in the face of all opponents.

The Apostle has made frequent reference to these false teachers, their doctrines, and their methods, and as, if we are to purge ourselves (II Tim. ii. 21), we must have some knowledge of this side of the matter, we will at once acquaint ourselves with the inspired words of warning.

> "Teach no other doctrine" (I Tim. i. 3).
>
> "Neither give heed to fables and endless genealogies, which minister questions" (I Tim. i. 4).
>
> "Some having swerved have turned aside unto vain jangling" (I Tim. i. 6).
>
> "Desiring to be teachers of the law; understanding neither what they say, nor whereof they affirm" (I Tim. i. 7).
>
> "There are many unruly and vain talkers and deceivers, specially they of the circumcision" (Titus i. 10).
>
> "Not giving heed to Jewish fables, and commandments of men, that turn from the truth" (Titus i. 14).
>
> "Avoid foolish questions, and genealogies, and contentions, and strivings about the law; for they are unprofitable and vain" (Titus iii. 9).
>
> "O Timothy, keep that which is committed to thy trust, avoiding profane and vain babblings, and oppositions of science falsely so called" (I Tim. vi. 20).

What are the "endless genealogies"? What are these "antitheses of knowledge, falsely so called"? What are these "strivings about the law"? We do not know with any certainty.

> "In the epistle to the Colossians St. Paul had dealt formally with the pretended philosophy and vaunted insight, the incipient dualism, the baseless angelology, and the > exaggerated asceticism of local heretics whose theosophic fancies were already prevalent. In these epistles (to Timothy and Titus) he merely touches on them, because in private letters to beloved fellow-workers there was no need to enter into direct controversy with their erroneous teachings" (Farrar, Life and Work of St. Paul).

Much has been written setting out the errors of Gnosticism and other heresies, but while it stands written, "avoid", "shun", "turn away", there is no call to the believer to cumber his mind with a load of error or to occupy his time in pursuing fantastic speculations. Sufficient for him is the positive teaching concerning the "ages", and that sacred secret which was hidden from the "generations". To Timothy, as to ourselves, the positive injunctions are sufficient:

> "Give heed . . . . . to a *dispensation of God" (I Tim. i. 4).
> "Consent to wholesome words, even the words of our Lord Jesus, and the doctrine which is according to godliness" (I Tim. vi. 3).
> "Keep that which is committed to thy trust" (I Tim. vi. 20).
> "Hold fast the pattern of sound words, which thou hast heard of me in faith and love which is in Christ Jesus" (II Tim. i. 13).
> [NOTE: * - The A.V. reads "godly edifying", the word which the translators had before them being oikodome, meaning "to build or edify". Whilst a few texts read oikonomia, authorities are unanimous that the true reading should be oikonomia, "dispensation". A somewhat similar scribal error is found in Eph. iii. 9, where the texts read oikonomia, "dispensation", instead koinomia, "fellowship".]

Here is the work that should claim all our time, energy and thought. We may know the errors we are to avoid by their fruits: They "minister questions", "vain jangling", "make shipwreck of faith", "suppose gain to be godliness", cause those who hold such teaching to "err concerning the faith", "overthrow the faith" and "lead captive" those who follow these pernicious doctrines and ways. Error and heresy are as old as man. So far as man is concerned, all error goes back for its origin to the garden of Eden. No error published to-day, with all the fervour of a new discovery, is really modern, it is but a new edition of an ancient lie.

We come back to II Tim. ii. 14 to re-read its exhortation in the fuller light we have received by this digression:

> "Of these things"—namely the teaching of verses 11-13, and, in particular, the emphasis upon the "good deposit"—"put them in remembrance, charging them before the Lord that they strive not about words to no profit, but to the subverting of the hearers".

Two words used by the Apostle in this exhortation call for a little expansion. The word "profit" (chresimon) actually means "use", and inasmuch as it is by our fruits that we are known, so all true doctrine will conform to the test of Matt. vii. 15-20. Chresimon, "profit" should be read with II Tim. ii. 21, "meet for the Master's use", the word translated "use" being euchreston. The profitless fables which the Apostle exposes in I Tim. i. 5 are put over against "the end of the commandment" which is "love out of a pure heart, and a good conscience, and faith unfeigned".

The second word calling for comment is the word "subverting". The Greek word so translated is katasthrope, which the reader will recognize as the prototype of the English "catastrophe", and Peter in II Pet. ii. 6 indicates the dire nature of this overthrowing of the faith, for he uses this same word to describe the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrha as is used by Paul to describe the overthrowing of the believer.

The Apostle has more to say about the particular evil that was threatening the faith, and deals with it in verses 16-18, but before going further with this negative side of witness, he states what is the glorious anchorage for faith and service, and the one great principle of right interpretation, which, if we give attention to it, will keep, and satisfy, better than a whole library of works on heresies old or new, or thousands of testimonials written by fallible men:

> "Study to shew thyself approved unto God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth" (II Tim. ii. 15).

#20. The approved of God (ii. 15). With special notes on Spoudazo (study) paristemi (shew) and dokimos (approved). pp. 130 - 133

The reader will remember that the central members of the structure of the epistle concentrate attention upon two related words, "Approved" (II Tim. ii. 15) and "Disapproved" (II Tim. iii. 8). Step by step, our studies have led us through glorious revelation and solemn warning, and at last we reach the verse that lies near to the heart of the apostle's word to Timothy and to ourselves. No one can read this epistle without sensing the apostle's anxiety for Timothy. The days were dark; opposition was growing; evil doctrines within the church menaced the faith; love was waxing cold. How could the apostle best help Timothy and all who tread the path in after years? He calls up memories of Timothy's home life; he reminds him of his gifts; he exhorts him to possess a pattern of sound words; he uses the figures of the soldier, athlete and husbandman; he refers to his own example; he encourages by linking together enduring and reigning; he warns concerning subverting heresies, and at last he gives his whole doctrine of perseverance in one verse, II Tim. ii. 15.

The verse divides naturally into three parts:--

(1) THE APPROVAL OF GOD.
(2) THE UNASHAMED WORKMAN.
(3) THE ESSENTIAL PRINCIPLE OF INTERPRETATION.

First of all, let us be clear as to the import of the command "Study". The idea in the word is not that the person addressed is to be "studious". It is certain that he must have some acquaintance with language, for his material is "the word of truth", but he is addressed rather as a "workman" than a scholar. The word translated "study" is the Greek word spoudazo. Speudo, from which spoudazo is derived, means "haste", (Luke ii. 16; xix. 5, 6; Acts xx. 16; xxii. 18; II Pet. iii. 12). Words have a tendency to degenerate, and, today, "haste" has lost its primary meaning and taken on another. "More haste, less speed" is a proverb of the world, but such "haste" is neither implied in the references given nor inculcated in the passage before us. In translating David's statement "The kings business required haste" (I Sam. xxi. 8) the LXX uses the word spoude. In the A.V. spoudazo, and its associate words spoudaios, spoudaioo and spoude, are translated more times by "diligence" and "diligently" than by any other. Let us note the passages, as they give a fair idea of the apostle's meaning in II Tim. ii. 15. The following occur in the pastoral epistles themselves.

> "He sought me out very diligently, and found me" (II Tim. i. 17).
> "Do thy diligence to come shortly unto me . . . . . do thy diligence to come before winter" (II Tim. iv. 9, 21).
> "Be diligent to come unto me to Nicopolis" (Titus iii. 12).
> "Bring Zenas . . . . . and Apollos on their journey diligently" (Titus iii. 13).

These five references have to do with travel, and, to this day, a special type of carriage is called a Diligence, especially in France. Both speed and care are associated with speudo and the words "assiduity", and "sedulous", very nearly approach the intention of the original. In Eph. iv. 3 the word is translated "endeavour". The exhortation to "study" also includes the idea of earnest and close application, implying some element of endurance and, as we have already seen, some driving necessity that demands haste in its primary meaning. Whatever it be that makes such demands upon the child of God must be of supreme importance. Let us see what it is.

> "Be diligent to shew thyself approved unto God."

In the original the word translated "to show" is paristemi, from para, "beside", and istemi, "to stand". The combinations of the root word "to stand" are numerous and of great variety. We will refer only to those that occur in II Timothy but commend to the "diligent" reader the examination of this word and its combinations in detail.

Istemi, "To stand". "Nevertheless the foundation of God standeth sure" (II Tim. ii. 19).
Anastasis, "To stand up". "Saying the resurrection is past already" (II Tim. ii. 18).
Anthistemi, "To stand against". "Withstood Moses." "Withstood our words" (II Tim. ii. 8; iv. 15).
Aphistemi, "To stand away". "Depart from iniquity" (II Tim. ii. 19).
Enistemi, "To stand in". "Perilous times shall come" (II Tim. iii. 1).
Paristemi, "To stand beside". "Study to shew thyself." "The Lord stood with me" (II Tim. ii. 15; iv. 17).
Peristemi, "To stand around". "But shun profane babblings" (II Tim. ii. 16).

It would be impossible for any acquainted with the Greek language to read this epistle without becoming aware of this interplay of words. See how many of them come within the context of II Tim. ii. 15. Because of the perilous times that are to "stand in" and because of those, like Jannes and Jambres, who will withstand the truth, we are encouraged to look forward to the glorious day of standing up from the dead, rejoicing that, in spite of all opposition, the foundation of God standeth. We should, consequently, be diligent to stand beside God, knowing that He will stand beside us, and should stand around, or aloof, from profane babblings, and stand away from iniquity. Even more than all this is crowded into the exhortation of II Tim. ii. 15. Timothy would know the exhortation of Eph. vi. to "stand", "stand against" and "withstand", and only those who have personally assimilated the many and wonderful occurrences of istemi and its combinations can hope to gather from II Tim. ii. 15 a tithe of its encouragement, warning and strength. This may sound like hard work. It is. A workman is being addressed and he has been exhorted to use diligence. While it is not practical to set out all these items, a little more attention must be given to the word translated "shew".

Paristemi, "shew", is translated "To present" in the following passages:--

> "That he might present it to Himself a glorious church" (Eph. v. 17).
> "In the body of His flesh through death, to present you holy and unblameable and unreprovable in His sight" (Col. i. 22).
> "Whom we preach, warning every man, and teaching every man in all wisdom that we may present every man perfect in Christ Jesus" (Col. i. 28).

The two latter references bring before us two aspects of truth. In the former of them presentation has no reference whatever to our works, our service, our growth, or anything we have done or can do: all is based upon the death of Christ. But in the latter the presentation has to do with service, with going on unto perfection, with growth and with reward (Col. ii. 18). This aspect is similar to that of II Tim. ii. 15, where Timothy is exhorted to "present himself", an exhortation completely foreign to the outlook of Col. i. 22. In thus exhorting Timothy Paul encourages him by recounting how the Lord had "stood with" him.

Again, service is in view, and in both chapter ii. and iv. we have the crown as a reward. Whether any member of the One Body will stand before the judgment seat of Christ or not, it is certain that the Colossian saints were assured that their service would be either rewarded, or otherwise (Col. iii. 24, 25), and Paul looked forward to the award of a righteous Judge (II Tim. iv. 8). Consequently when we realize that paristemi occurs in Rom. xv. 10, "We shall all stand before the judgment seat of Christ", it is evident, with Col. i. 28, iii. 24, 25 and II Tim. iv. 8 in mind, that something parallel is intended in Paul's exhortation to Timothy. We must now give attention to the one great thing that Timothy was to aim at: "Be diligent to present thyself approved unto God."

"APPROVED." The original word is dokimos, and, like istemi, the ramifications of the word and its combinations are too wonderful to be appreciated apart from personal acquaintance with them. We will, however, draw attention to a few obvious features. First of all, we note that the structure places dokimos, "approved", (II Tim. ii. 15) over against "adokimos", "disapproved", (II Tim. iii. 8). The root of the word is dokeo, and implies the passing of an opinion after weighing the evidence, hence it is sometimes translated "experience", and "proof". The form dokimos is found in the LXX in the sense of the refining and purifying of metals, and dokimion is used by Peter when comparing the "trial" of faith to the testing of gold (I Pet. i. 7). Already, in I Cor. iii., the apostle had written at length regarding the "sure foundation" and the approval or disapproval of the "work" and a comparison of this passage with II Tim. ii. will therefore be useful.

I Cor. iii. and xv.	II Tim. ii.
The foundation (iii. 10, 11).	The foundation (19).
Gold, silver, wood, etc. (iii. 12).	Gold, silver, wood, etc. (20).
The trial, dokimazo (iii. 13).	The approval, dokimos (15).
Reward, or suffer loss (iii. 14, 15).	Show (paristemi) the judgment seat (15).
Work abides (iii. 13, 14).	Workman that need not be ashamed (15, 21).
He himself shall be saved (iii. 15).	The Lord knoweth them that are His (19).
Resurrection doubted (xv. 12).	Resurrection misplaced (18).

Most evidently the apostle intended to bring all the encouragement that he could to bear upon Timothy to enable him to "stand" and for this purpose found nothing so powerful as that which had ever been before his own eyes:

> "I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith, henceforth . . . . . a crown" (II Tim. iv. 7, 8).

Let us not be wise above what is written for there is still evident need for this "warning and teaching", if servants of the Lord are to be "approved" in that day. We have seen already that the word dokimos, "approved", is associated with the fiery trial of both gold and faith, consequently all the allusions to suffering, persecution, affliction and endurance with which this epistle abounds are focused upon this verse, this workman and his work. We must reserve the consideration of the remainder of this verse for our next article.

#21. The Unashamed Workman, and Right Division (ii. 15).
pp. 191 - 194

As a redeemed and justified sinner, Timothy could look forward without a tremor to that future presentation which will result from the death of Christ, when he would be "holy, unblameable and unreprovable". In II Tim. ii. 15, however, he is seen not so much as a saved sinner, but as a responsible servant, and while nothing he did, or omitted to do, could make any difference regarding his blessed hope; the question of the prize or crown, of reigning or being denied, of being ashamed here or unashamed there, is raised with Timothy in his capacity of workman. Ergates, "workman", means primarily a labourer or artificer, the meaning being retained unchanged to-day. We find it in Acts xix. 25 in association with such words as "silversmith" and "craftsman" (24); "occupation" and "craft" (25); "made with hands" (26); and, if the Alexander of verse 33 be the coppersmith, (a matter that must await proof), his appearance in II Tim. iv. 14 is suggestive.

Both when exhorting others, and when speaking of himself, the apostle often speaks of "working with the hands" and although, so far as we can gather, he was under no necessity before conversion thus to earn his living, he was glad to find that his craft of tent-making was of service when the necessity arose (Acts xviii. 3). Service in the gospel or among believers is often denominated "work". Timothy is exhorted to do the "work" of an evangelist (II Tim. iv. 5) and the equipment, by the Word, of the man of God, is a thorough outfitting "unto all good works" (II Tim. iii. 17). So also, under the figure of a "vessel", the separated servant is meet for the master's use, and prepared "unto every good work" (II Tim. ii. 21). As an example of the difference between the approval of God and the approval of men, compare the joyous consciousness of the Lord's approval in II Tim. iv. 8, 9 with the estimate of man in II Tim. ii. 9, "I suffer as an evil worker, kakourgos", and, in contrast to the suggestion of denial and shame of II Tim. ii. 12 & 15, see the confidence of II Tim. iv. 18, "The Lord shall deliver me from every evil work". In this chapter the apostle has already brought before us three figures, and, together with those that follow, they all focus attention on this one element of being ashamed. We have seen how the word "ashamed" dominates the section i. 8-18. Timothy is exhorted not to be ashamed of the testimony of the Lord nor of Paul, His prisoner, but to suffer afflictions with the gospel (i. 8). Paul declares that, in spite of unprecedented sufferings, he is unashamed, and associates "that day", to which he looks forward, with the sacred trust "committed" to him (i. 12). Onesiphorus is commended for his "diligence" and because he was not ashamed of Paul's "chain" (i. 16, 17). With these examples on the one hand, and II Tim. ii. 15 on the other, we can easily see that the three figures introduced into II Tim. ii. 3-6 carry on the same message. The good soldier who endures hardness, will "please" his Lord, and will therefore be unashamed. The athlete who strives for masteries and who keeps the rules, wins a crown and so will be unashamed. The husbandman labours before partaking of the fruits, but the partaking is the very reverse of being ashamed.

To have to say of a servant that he is one who has drawn back under affliction and denied the Lord (II Tim. ii. 12) is but another way of saying that he is ashamed of the testimony of the Lord's prisoner. And those servants of the Lord who "shun", "avoid', "turn away", and "purge themselves" are "meet for the master's use", are "unto honour", and so unashamed. Timothy therefore was exhorted to consider these various figures and apply the principles involved to his own work. In chapter i. there is an anticipation of the great principle of right division, for the apostle emphasizes "The testimony of the Lord and of me His prisoner". He refers to that calling that goes back "before age times" but is manifest "now" that he is a prisoner. He draws attention to his own special ministry to the Gentiles and the "good deposit" entrusted to him and afterwards committed to Timothy, when he urged upon him the importance of having a pattern of sound words which he had heard of him, and in chapter ii. he exhorts Timothy to commit to faithful men "the things he had heard of him". What is all this but the application of right division? Here a distinction between the apostle's earlier ministry and his "prison ministry" is intimated. Here is a recognition of the distinctive calling of Eph. i.—"before the foundation of the world". Here is the claim that the apostle, preacher and teacher of the Gentiles, is Paul, and here the distinction is made between "that good deposit" and other parts of God's purposes. If Timothy is to be unashamed of his work he must know and appreciate these distinctions, otherwise (by occupying himself with service that belongs to other callings and dispensations, and so not being engaged in "God's building"), his work, being revealed by fire, will be found worthless. While Timothy might be expected to perceive the necessity of right division, Paul is anxious that he should not be left to his own inferences. How then shall the apostle best put the principle that is vaguely seen at work right through chapter i.? Shall he once more go back in mind to the child Timothy at his mother's knee? Shall he visualize the teaching of those holy Scriptures that had made Timothy wise unto salvation? Does he remember that a Jewish mother would most certainly teach her boy some of the Proverbs? and that Timothy's father, being a Greek, and living in Galatia, would most certainly have read the Greek version of the O.T., known as the Septuagint? We cannot tell, but this we do know, that Timothy needed no explanation of the term "right division". We can dismiss all attempts made by commentators to discredit this fact and feel perfectly safe in doing so, because we shall be "comparing spiritual things with spiritual". In the Bible used by Timothy occurs the following verse:--

> Pasais hodois sou gnorize auten, hina orthotome tas hodous sou (Paroimai iii. 6).
> "In all thy ways acquaint thyself with it (fem. ref. to sophia, wisdom, in verse 5) in order that it may rightly divide thy paths" (Prov. iii. 6).

We find the same word in Prov. xi. 5, where it is again used of a "way". These are the only occurrences in the LXX. We are not now concerned with the differences here observable between the A.V. and the LXX but are desirous that all shall see that the words used by Paul in II Tim. ii. 15 and known by Timothy are identical.

Orthotomeo, "To rightly divide".
Temno, "to cut", does not occur in the N.T but several combinations of the word are found.
"Sharper", Tomoteros. "Sharper than a two-edged sword" (Heb. iv. 12).
"Sharply", Apotomos. "Rebuke them sharply" (Titus i. 13).
Peritemno and peritome refer to circumcision, and there is no need to stress the literal meaning of either the Greek or the English.

The words finds its place in our own language, and in such surgical expressions as Anatomy, Tracheotomy, and Phlebotomy, the primary meaning of cutting is retained unaltered. With this evidence before him, the reader will need no refutation of the many suggestions put forward as translations, such as "handling aright the Word of Truth". Again, there is no possibility of mistaking what was to be rightly "divided". It was not the believer's conduct or service or anything to do with himself, but the "word of truth". Just as Timothy was subsequently exhorted to "preach the Word", so is he here commanded to divide that Word aright. What this principle involves when put into operation cannot be detailed here. Besides a number of volumes and smaller booklets, thirty-three volumes of this magazine have been published and they all have been subject to this one great principle. Right division distinguishes dispensations. It does not confound Kingdom with Church, Gentile with Jew, Mystery with Gospel, Earth with Heaven. It is beyond us, however, to attempt even a summary of its bearings, for there is no item of scriptural teaching to which the principle does not apply.

Moreover, let us repeat that what is here to be "rightly divided' is, and remains, the Word of Truth. No "higher critical" cutting up of the Scriptures is countenanced by this Word, and indeed we have only to read on to find in II Tim. iii. 16 one of the most emphatic statements concerning the inspiration of the Scriptures that the record contains. We can, however, easily rob the Word of its "truth" if we fail to "rightly divide" it. We can confound law and grace, to our undoing; we can preach Moses where we ought to preach Christ. We can be concerned with "earthly things", to our loss, if our calling is associated with "things above where Christ sitteth at the right hand of God". If we attempt to spiritualize the promises made to the fathers, we rob the word of promise of its truth. If we misinterpret Israel as of the Church; if we confound the Bride with the Body; if we preach the gospel of the circumcision to the Gentile to-day; if we do any of these things, we rob the Word of its truth.

One glorious result of "rightly dividing the word of truth" is that every statement of God may be taken without alteration. For instance, in the case of the promise, "The meek shall inherit the earth", a rightly divided word has no need to substitute "heaven" for "earth".

> Let us heed this word of exhortation. If we are not occupied with that part of God's purpose which has a present application, we shall most certainly be ashamed of our work. In other words, whether found in Genesis, Romans, Ephesians or the Revelation, "dispensational truth" is all the truth there is.

Happy is that workman who, though suffering under the disapproval of tradition, is approved unto God; that workman who will have no need to be ashamed of his work, because he has obeyed the great all-covering principle,

"Rightly dividing the Word of truth."

#22. The Unashamed Workman, and his attitude to Error and Evil (ii. 16).
pp. 232 - 235

The positive exhortation that had as its goal Divine approval and as its principle "right division" (II Tim. ii. 15) is followed by a strong negative exhortation, which is very characteristic of these pastoral epistles.

> "But shun profane and vain babblings: for they will increase unto more ungodliness" (II Tim. ii. 16).

This exhortation reverts back to verse 14 which speaks of striving about words to no profit but the subverting of the hearers. The word "profane" bebelos occurs five times in the epistles, and bebeloo the verb occurs twice, once in the Gospels and once in the Acts. Let us acquaint ourselves with the usage of this word.

"The priests in the temple profane the sabbath, and are blameless" (Matt. xii. 5).

"Who also hath gone about to profane the temple" (Acts xxiv. 6).

"The law is not made for a righteous man . . . . . for unholy and profane" (I Tim. i. 9).

"But refuse profane and old wives' fables, and exercise thyself rather unto godliness" (I Tim. iv. 7).

"O Timothy, keep that which is committed to thy trust, avoiding profane and vain babblings, and oppositions of science falsely so called" (I Tim. vi. 20).

"But shun profane and vain babblings: for they will increase unto more ungodliness" (II Tim. ii. 16).

"Lest there be any fornicator, or profane person, as Esau, who for one morsel of meat sold his birthright" (Heb. xii. 16).

The value of the two first references is that they show that the primitive conception of the word "profane" is associated with the sanctity of a temple, and while no temple is in view in the references in the epistles, the contrast that is instituted is parallel, for "righteousness", "godliness" and "a sacred trust" are the very stuff of spiritual worship and ministry. The words "vain babblings" are a translation of the Greek kenophonia, literally "empty sound". Again, this is the very antithesis of the Apostle's doctrine. In Col. ii. 8, 9 we have the contrast between the "vain or empty and deceitful philosophy" and the "fullness" and "completeness" that the believer finds in Christ. In Phil. ii., we have "vain glory" kenodoxia and the possibility of running or labouring "in vain", in contrast; this time, not with the fullness that is found in Christ, but with His most blessed kenosis.

"He made Himself of no reputation" (Phil. ii. 3, 7, 16).

It might be useful if at this point we acquainted ourselves a little more intimately with the various words used by the apostle in these pastoral epistles, to exhort us to avoid, shun or turn away from these doctrines and practices that are inimical to the faith. We will look at the verse under consideration first. "Shun" (II Tim. ii. 16) Periistemi. This word occurs in John xi. 42 "stand by"; Acts xxv. 7 "stand round about"; and Titus iii. 9 "avoid". It will be seen that in Acts xxv. 7 the people that "stood round about" were antagonistic, and in John xi. 42, at least unbelieving. Josephus uses the word to describe Adam's attitude after his transgression, saying

"He flies from and avoids God's company" (Ant. i. 1, 4).

We will reserve our examination of "what" must be avoided, shunned, turned from, until we have finished the present enquiry. "Strive not about words" logomacheo (II Tim. ii. 14). The substantive logomachia occurs in I Tim. vi. 4 "strifes of words". The occurrence of the word "strife" mache in II Tim. ii. 23 in close association with "foolish and unlearned questions" and in association with "foolish questions, genealogies, and strivings about the law" in Titus iii. 9, make the meaning of the apostle quite plain. Keen investigation into the meaning and use of inspired words is not in mind. "Depart from", aphistemi. The apostle uses this word twice in the first epistle to Timothy, where he says "some shall depart from the faith" (I Tim. iv. 1), and "from such withdraw thyself" (I Tim. vi. 5). "Purge" ekkathairo (II Tim. ii. 21), "Purge out the old leaven" (I Cor. v. 7). The word is used in some editions of the LXX, in Judges vii. 4 where the

A.V. reads "I will try them for thee there". In other editions of the LXX, dokimazo is used instead. This is illuminating, for dokimazo is the word translated "approved" in II Tim. ii. 15, and shows that like all truth, it has two sides, the positive and personal being expressed in the word "approved", while the negative is expressed in the word "purge from".

With this experimental use of the word ekkathairo we should associate the doctrinal and basic use of katharizo which is found in Titus ii. 14 "Purify unto Himself a peculiar people". Because He has already "purified" us by His blood, and because we are already a "peculiar" people for Himself, the reflex should be, as it is expressed in II Tim. ii. 21, that we should "purge ourselves" that we may be peculiarly "meet for the Master's use". "Flee" pheugo (II Tim. ii. 22). The apostle uses this word once again in the pastoral epistles, "O man of God, flee these things" (I Tim. vi. 11). "Turn away" apotrepomai (II Tim. iii. 5). This word does not occur anywhere else in either the N.T. or the LXX. It is, however, a word of common use in the Classics. The derivative apotreptos is used for the idea "abominable" which is suggestive. "Beware" phulasso. This word is found five times in the pastoral epistles as follows:--

> "Observe these things" (I Tim. v. 21).
> "O Timothy keep that which is committed to thy trust" (I Tim. vi. 20).
> "He is able to keep that which He hath committed" (II Tim. i. 12, R.V. Marg.).
> "That good thing which was committed unto thee keep by the Holy Ghost which dwelleth in us" (II Tim. i. 14).
> "Of whom be thou ware also; for he hath greatly withstood our words" (II Tim. iv. 15).

Here is a further illustration of the two sidedness of truth. We have been entrusted with a glorious doctrine, this we are enjoined to "keep". This not only includes our own personal loyalty, but a watchfulness upon the attitude of others. There are seven exhortations, to shun, strive not about words, depart from, purge, flee, turn away and beware. We have no option but to believe that they are written for our instruction, and to obey. It seems harsh and uncharitable in the eyes of some, to refuse to open the pages of the Berean Expositor to those who do not see eye to eye with those responsible for its witness. The standpoint of one recent correspondent was that we should have fellowship with any one who believed the inspiration of Scripture, even though they held such doctrines as that God was the Author of Sin, that Christ was God in a lesser of lower sense than Absolute Deity, and that Satan was created AS SUCH and serves the Lord equally with His beloved Son. Even this correspondent, however, had his limits. He draws the line at believing or not believing the inspiration of Scripture. This, however, gives the whole case away, for there are many who are most certainly "Christians" who entertain very opposite views on "inspiration". After all "inspiration" is a doctrinal belief, and even though he says no doctrinal belief is to bar fellowship, our correspondent has in effect accepted the principle that guides ourselves, but draws the line a little lower down. Another believer has just as much right to draw the line lower still and include any or all who believe "God". We have no option in these matters. Timothy was instructed to "withdraw" himself from any who taught "otherwise" than "the doctrine which is according to godliness" (I Tim. vi. 3-5), he was commanded to avoid complicity with teaching that antagonized the good deposit entrusted to him (I Tim. vi. 20;

II Tim. i. 14); he was to shun those who failed "rightly to divide the word of truth" saying "the resurrection is past already" (II Tim. ii. 16-18); he was "to purge himself" from those who held such things. We find it utterly impossible to construe such instruction, with having fellowship with all, whatever their doctrines, provided they subscribe to the basic doctrine of inspiration. It may be narrow, but so is the truth. We must now return to our theme, this time to take more particular note of what the believer is to shun and avoid.

We have already noted the word translated "vain babblings" used in II Tim. ii. 16, and so pass on to the next exhortation. The apostle tells Timothy that the great seal upon the one foundation includes the departing from "iniquity". This word adikia includes the unrighteousness of such abandoned men as those described in Rom. i. 29 to the "wrong" confessed by the apostle in II Cor. xii. 13. Its primitive meaning is anything that is "Not right"; and one of its usages is to indicate that "unrighteousness" which is associated with an anti-christian attitude to the truth (Rom. i. 18; II Thess. ii. 10, 12). It is the word used by John of the believer who, in order to be maintained in his fellowship with the Father, needs cleansing from all "unrighteousness" (I John i. 9). No believer needs to be told to withdraw from positive iniquity, but he needs continually to withdraw from everything that he sees to be "Not right", and this will exercise all the grace at his disposal, for the more he grows in grace and in knowledge, the more will he become sensitive to the "unrighteousness" of things around or within. He is to "purge himself from these", not merely "purge himself". "These" refer to the vessels of wood and earth, which in their turn indicate those who hold and teach doctrines contrary either to godliness or to the good deposit. He is to "flee" youthful lusts, and none who knows anything of the law of sin in his members will need a printed list here. Suffice it for the moment to realize that even a Man of God like Timothy was not strong enough to trifle or palter with youthful lusts, and neither are we, whatever our age may be; and finally, from a "form of godliness" that denies "the power thereof" Timothy was enjoined to "turn away". One word has recurred in this examination, which we have not noted, that word is "godliness". It is of such evident importance that we propose carrying over this study into our next article so that we may give all the attention and space possible to its investigation. Meanwhile let us remember that no solicitations to "keep the unity" can ever excuse us from full obedience to this sevenfold injunction to shun and avoid fellowship with either doctrine or practice that is contrary to the truth we have received through the ministry of the apostle Paul.

Tools for the Unashamed Workman.

#4. Translations.
pp. 239 - 242

While the student of the Scriptures must ever aim at first-hand understanding of the Word of God, he would indeed be unwise, as well as ungracious, to ignore the labours of men of all ranks and degrees of ability who have translated the Scriptures into our mother-tongue. Without attempting to place in any order of merit the translations to which we shall refer, we draw attention to their distinctive characteristics and to some of their limitations, trusting that those who may already possess copies will appreciate them the more and that those who do not as yet possess them will have their interest quickened, so that when they become available they will be appraised at their true worth and not passed by.

"Young's Literal." By this abbreviated title students generally refer to the work more fully described as:--

> "The Holy Bible, consisting of the Old and New Covenants translated according to the Letter and Idioms of the Original Languages, by Robert Young, LL.D."

Dr. Young profoundly venerated the Scriptures in their full and verbal inspiration and the following quotation from the preface to the Revised Edition will inform the reader of what to expect in his translation.

> "This inspiration extends only to the original text, as it came from the pens of the writers, not to any translations ever made by man, however aged, venerable or good; and only in so far as any of these adhere to the original—neither adding to nor omitting from it one particle—are they of any real value, for to the extent that they vary from the original, the doctrine of verbal inspiration is lost, so far as that version is concerned.
>
>
> For example, in Matt. ii. 4 Herod is presented as enquiring "Where Christ"* (* - This is corrected in the R.V.) should be born. But "Christ" is the surname of the man Jesus, who was quite unknown to Herod, who could not consequently ask for a person of whose existence he was ignorant. The true explanation is, that King James' Translators omitted the definite article which occurs in the original. The correct translation is where "the Christ" should be born. Herod knew of "the Christ" the Messiah, the long-promised Saviour and King of the Jews, and his enquiry was, where He was to be born, whose kingdom was to be over all. The simple article clears up the whole. There are about two thousand instances in the New Testament where these translators have thus omitted all notice of the definite article, not to say anything of the great number of passages where they have inserted it, though not in the original."

While Dr. Young's Literal Translation has many excellent features, we feel that where it fails it but manifests the practical impossibility of the most faithful to present to the English reader a strictly literal translation. For instance, after having read what Dr. Young has to say about inserting and omitting the article, or the changing of the English translation of similar words in the same context, the reader is likely, at the first, to believe that in this literal translation such defects will be conspicuous by their absence. It is not so however. Take for example John i.

Dr. Young's Literal read,

"In the beginning was the Word." Yet there is no article before the word "beginning".
"And the Word was with God." Yet there is the article before the word "God".
"And the Word was God." Yet the order of the words in the original is "And God was the Word".

Dr. Young therefore tacitly admits that with the best intentions a strictly literal translation becomes unreadable. In verse 3 he translates "All things through him did happen", where the verb is egeneto. In verse 17, however, where the same verb is used, he translates is "did come".

These remarks are not made in an unkind spirit, nor with a view to detract from the faithful labours of Dr. Young, but only to show how well-nigh impossible a task a strictly literal translation is.

There can perhaps be no greater contrast between Dr. Young's translation and that of James Moffatt, D.D., D.Lit., and we do not introduce Dr. Moffatt's translation to commend it to the general reader, but for the sake of comparing Dr. Young's Preface regarding a literal version, with Dr. Moffatt's Preface concerning the almost insuperable difficulties that make such a literal version impracticable.

Dr. Moffatt's Preface opens as follows:--

> "In his essay on Protestantism, de Quincey has a characteristic paragraph upon the popular delusion that every idea and word which exists, or has existed, for any nation, ancient or modern, must have a direct interchangeable equivalent in all languages. No one who attempts to translate any part of the New Testament is likely to remain very long under such a delusion . . . . . This raises one of the numerous points of difficulty that beset the translator. How far is he justified in modernizing an Oriental book? . . . . . I wish only to add this caution, that a translator appears to be more dogmatic than he really is. He must come down on one side of the fence or the other."

We do not expect any of our readers would readily accept Dr. Moffatt's rendering of Eph. i. 3:--

> "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ Who is Christ has blessed us with every spiritual blessing."

It will be observed that "in heavenly places" is entirely omitted, without even a footnote to explain why.

Passing to other translations, we draw attention to one simply entitled "A New Translation" but known to be the work of J. N. Darby. Every reader would benefit by carefully reading the Introductory Note and Revised Preface, especially the note on the problem of rendering the Greek Aorist into English. No one who reads that paragraph will underestimate the need for extreme caution in accepting "literal" renderings as being necessarily "true" translations. On the whole J. N. Darby is a wise and careful translator and the reader will often find great help in consulting him, giving especial heed to any footnote that may be added to elucidate the matter in hand.

Another Translation that must not be omitted is,

> "The New Testament in Modern Speech. An idiomatic translation into everyday English from the Text of the Resultant Greek Testament." By the late Richard Francies Weymouth, M.A., D.Litt.

In his preface, Dr. Weymouth says:--

> "The translation of the New Testament here offered English-speaking Christians is a bona fide translation made directly from the Greek and is in no sense a revision.
>
> The plan adopted has been the following:--
> 1. An earnest endeavour has been made (based upon more than sixty years' study of both the Greek and English languages, besides much further familiarity gained by continual teaching) to ascertain the exact meaning of every passage not only by the light that classical Greek throws on the language used, but also by that which the Septuagint and Hebrew Scriptures afford . . . . . But in the endeavour to find in Twentieth Century English a precise equivalent for a Greek word, phrase, or sentence there are two dangers to be guarded against. There are a Scylla and a Charybdis. One the one hand there is the English of Society, on the other hand that of the utterly uneducated, each of these patois having its own special, though expressive, borderland which we name "slang". It is plain that this attempt to bring out the sense of the Sacred Writings naturally as well as accurately in present-day English does not permit, except to a limited extent, the method of literal rendering—the verbo verbum reddere at which Horace shrugs his shoulders. Dr. Whelldon, recently Bishop of Calcutta, in the preface (p. vii.) to his masterly translation of the Nicomachean Ethics of Aristotle, writes: "I have deliberately rejected the principle of trying to translate the same Greek word by the same word in English, and where circumstances seemed to call for it I have sometimes used two English words to represent one Greek work";—and he is perfectly right. With a slavish literality delicate shades of meaning for the influence of interwoven thought . . . . . An utterly ignorant or utterly lazy man, if possessed of a little ingenuity, can with the help of a dictionary and grammar give a word-for-word rendering, whether intelligible or not, and print 'Translation' on his title page."

Dr. Weymouth refers to his pamphlet "On Rendering into English of the Greek Aorist and perfect", as a justification for the translation offered. As a sample of this translation, the following rendering of Rom. iii. 22-24 must suffice.

> "No distinction is made, for all alike have sinned, all consciously come short of the glory of God, gaining acquittal from guilt by His free unpurchased grace through the deliverance which is found in Christ Jesus."

Dr. Weymouth's translation was published in 1902. In 1901, another translation with which it is sometimes confused was published entitled "The Twentieth Century New Testament", a work "undertaken as a labour of love by a company of about twenty persons, members of various sections of the Christian Church; our work has extended over ten years". As an example of this version we give the passage already cited from Dr. Weymouth's translation.

> ". . . . . and is for all, without distinction, who believe in Him. For all have sinned, and all fall short of God's glorious ideal, but, in mercy, are being set right with Him through the deliverance which is in Christ Jesus."

As we do not wish a subject that has, perhaps, a somewhat limited appeal, to occupy undue space, we must continue this survey in our next article. In closing, we would, however, add a word lest the reader should misunderstand our attitude towards the Word of God, which is that of whole-hearted allegiance to the "words which the Holy Ghost teacheth".

The reader may ask, "Believing as you do the verbal inspiration of Scripture, using the Scriptures as you do, and finding arguments and doctrine in its every word, particle and inflection, how is it that you do not enthusiastically advocate a Literal Translation?" Our answer is, that there can be no such thing. Any one who has read a strictly literal translation of the Greek N.T. will know that, left to himself, the result will be quite unintelligible. If, unassisted, the reader can make sense out of a strictly literal word for word translation, that reader does not need it; he knows the Greek well enough to do without it. The assumption that the English language, or any language, can provide a medium for such a literal rendering is a fallacy—no such language exists. A translation being a necessity, we must perforce accept it with all its limitations, basing no doctrine upon any of its renderings, but basing all our teaching upon the original itself.

TRUST.

#7. The removal of Fear (Psalm lvi. 3).
pp. 19, 20

It is a far cry from the story of the men of valour of I Chron. v. 20, which formed the basis of the last article of this series, to the one we are now to consider, where the historic reference over Psalm lvi., "Michtam of David, when the Philistines took him in Gath", sends us back to I Sam. xxi. 13, to find David feigning madness, scrabbling on the doors of the gate, and letting his spittle fall down his beard.

David was "sore afraid of Achish, the king of Gath" (I Sam. xxi. 12), and Psalm lvi. gives something of the hidden history of that period of David's perilous life. The critics have not been backward in declaring that the title of the Psalm has nothing in it corresponding with history, but in this, as in many other judgments pronounced by them, their reading has been superficial.

De Wette alleges that in the record of I Samuel, it is not stated that the Philistines laid hold of David, but Hengstenberg draws attention to the words "in their hands" of I Sam. xxi. 13, and others have observed the "escape" of I Sam. xxii. 1. When we remember that David, in fleeing from Saul, had put himself into the hands of Goliath's people, we may well understand his sense of peril, even though the historic account of I Sam. xxi. makes little or nothing of it. It is the Psalm written of that period that draws the veil aside, and where the words "sore afraid" (I Sam. xxi. 12) find an exposition:

> "What time I am afraid, I will trust in Thee" (Psa. lvi. 3).

This trust in God is also a trust in His Word. God had made promises to David, and, although they were separated from fulfillment by years of wandering and persecution, David knew that God would honour His word. So, in verse 3, we read of David's trust in the Lord when he was afraid, but in verse 4, as he trusts in His word, his fear departs:

> "In God I will praise His word, in God I have put my trust; I will not fear what flesh can do unto me" (Psa. lvi. 4).

The structure of the Psalm shows how these items are repeated:

Prayer offered.

A1 | 1, 2. The antagonism of the enemy: "Swallowed me up."
B1 | 3, 4. Trust and praise: In God and His word.

Deliverance Expected.

A2 | 5, 6. The antagonism of the enemy: "My words", "my steps", "my soul".
B2 | 7-11. Trust and praise: In God and His word.

Prayer answered.

A3 | 12, 13. Deliverance from death and falling.
B3 | 13. Walk before God in the light of the living.

How different do the same things appear when viewed from the standpoints of man and of God. The attitude of the Philistines and other enemies of David was alarming. The figures used are those of the "thirst for blood"; the "snuffing" of animals close on their prey. Fighting was "daily"; his words were "wrested"; his steps "marked"; they waited for his "soul". Over and above these things David was an exile, "Thou tellest all my wanderings". These were in the menacing things that inspired fear in David. Then, as his trust in God and in His Word took hold upon his heart and mind, these ferocious enemies were seen to be but "flesh" and "man", and concerning both David said, "I will not fear", "I will not be afraid". As trust in God and in His faithfulness to His word increases, so fear of man and all that he can do decreases.

To us, as to David and the disciples of old, comes the cheering call:

> "Be of good cheer; it is I; be not afraid" (Matt. xiv. 27).

#8. The Fixed Heart (Psa. cxii. 7).
p. 100

Among the blessings consequent upon trust in the Lord is confidence or, in the language of the Psalmist, a "fixed heart" (Psa. cxii. 7). Of the wicked it is written, "The wicked flee when no man pursueth" (Prov. xxviii. 1). "There were they in great fear, where no fear was" (Psa. liii. 5).

The Psalm that supplies us with our text is Psalm cxii., which, by reason of its alphabetical structure, is bound together with Psalm cxi., with which it should be studied.

Psa. cxi.	1-8. Eight couplets, Aleph—Ayin.
	9, 10. Two triplets, Pe—Tau.
Psa. cxii.	1-8. Eight couplets, Aleph—Ayin.
	9, 10. Two triplets, Pe—Tau.

In both Psalms there are twenty-two lines, and the alphabet in both is complete. This artificial correspondence supports a correspondence of thought and idea.

> "In Psalm cxi. We have the mighty deeds, the glory, the righteousness of Jehovah, celebrated in the assembly of the upright; in Psalm cxii., the righteousness, the goodness, the blessedness of the upright, themselves, is described and enlarged upon. The one sets forth God, His work and His attributes; the other tells what are the work and character of those who fear and honour God. Thus in Psalm cxi. 3 it is said of Jehovah that 'His righteousness standeth fast for ever'; in Psalm cxii. 3 the same thing is affirmed of the man that feareth Jehovah. In cxi. 4 it is declared of Jehovah, that 'He is gracious and of tender compassion', in cxii. 4 the same character is given to the upright" (Perowne).

It is not therefore surprising to find that the words "Stand fast" of Psalm cxi. 8, "They stand fast for ever and ever", and "Established", of Psalm cxii. 8, "His heart is established, he shall not be afraid" are the same in the original. There is also a parallel between the word "Sure", in Psalm cxi. 7, and "Fixed", in Psalm cxii. 7.

This unmoved condition is thrice repeated in Psalm cxii.:

> "Surely he shall not be moved for ever" (verse 6).
> "His heart is fixed, trusting in the Lord" (verse 7).
> "His heart is established" (verse 8).

As we all know, evil tidings can be very unsettling, and it is in connection with such disquieting news that "Trust" gives confidence.

> "He shall not be afraid of evil tidings. His heart is fixed, trusting in the Lord. His heart is established, he shall not be afraid."

We discover, both from our own experience, and from Psalm lvii. 6 and 7 that it is possible for one to say "My soul is bowed down", while at the same time confessing, "My heart is fixed", for our fixedness of heart finds its roots and base, not in ourselves, but in the Lord, His omnipotence, His faithfulness, His care.

#9. The Directed Way (Prov. iii. 5, 6).
pp. 101, 102

We have considered together a series of experiences that the Scriptures associate with a trust that clings to the Lord, and it is fitting that the last of the series should relate to the leading of the Lord. This need of leading is recognized by all who seek to walk worthy in a world so far removed from the ways and will of God as it is to-day.

The passage that provides us with a message concerning the leading of the Lord and its relation to whole hearted trust is found in the book of Proverbs:

> "Trust in the Lord with all thine heart;
> And lean not unto thine own understanding.
> In all thy ways acknowledge Him,
> And He shall direct thy paths" (Prov. iii. 5, 6).

There is help for the reader in the correspondence of thought and idea that constitutes Hebrew poetry. "Trust" is amplified by the word "acknowledge" and "lean" is contrasted with His "direction".

The word translated "acknowledge" means to know in the sense of "recognizing" rather than acknowledging in the sense of "confessing". Trust clings to One that is known, One that is recognized, and the exhortation is to perceive and recognize, know and admit, the hand of the Lord in all our ways. Instead of following the inclination of our own hearts and leaning to our own understanding in order to discover for ourselves a plain path for our feet, those who trust in the Lord with all their heart find that the Lord Himself goes before them, leveling their path and marking it off from all that would side-track them.

Two aspects of this directing of our path are put before us, and both are profitable. First, the word translated "direct". In the original the word means "straight" and readers will remember "The book of Jasher" (Josh. x. 13) which uses the word Jasher, "Straight", or "Upright", as a proper noun. When the word is used of a "Way" it is referred to as a way in which the people "shall not stumble" (Jer. xxxi. 9), which suggests evenness and the absence of obstacles. So, in Isa. xl., the command, "Make straight in the desert a highway for our God", is followed by a description of the result of such a work in which it is stated that every valley is to be exalted, and every mountain and hill is to be made low; crooked places shall be made straight and rough places plain (Isa. xl. 3, 4). Again, speaking of Cyrus, Isa. xlv. 2 says, "I will go before thee, and make the crooked places straight", which is repeated in verse 13, in slightly different form, but, in the original, using the same word, "I will direct all his ways".

While the passage before us (Prov. iii. 5, 6) turns our thoughts away from self, and wholly to the Lord, it must not be supposed that the leading of the Lord is purely mechanical, and that there is no intelligent participation on our part. The same book of Proverbs tells us that "The integrity of the upright shall guide them" (Prov. xi. 3), that is, that the Lord who leads them does so in harmony with the believer's true desires after righteousness of those who are justified by faith, with the leading of the Lord. Yet further, while we are forbidden to lean to our own understanding, and encouraged to trust in the Lord with all our heart, that does not mean the blotting out of intelligent following, for Prov. xv. 19 and 21 says:

> "The way of the righteous is made plain" and
> "A man of understanding walketh uprightly", where the word translated "uprightly" is the same that is used in Prov. iii. 6, "He shall direct".

Secondly, the fact that the Septuagint translates the word yashar, "direct", by orthotomeo, "rightly divide", as in II Tim. ii. 15, suggests that where we most need guidance is at the fork in the road. Which way shall we turn? Shall we take the right hand, or shall we turn to the left? Here, if anywhere, Prov. iii. 5, 6 most fully applies. Sometimes we can answer our own prayer for guidance by asking ourselves, as we ponder the path of our feet, "Can I acknowledge the Lord if I take this particular turning on life's journey?" If there is any doubt in the matter, it is morally certain that however much we may "feel led" we shall not be justified in taking the step. "Straight" paths are paths that are under the direction of a "righteous" God, and are followed by "straight" people, who, though sinners by nature, and saved without works, recognize the fact that he who is righteous should do righteousness (I John ii. 29; iii. 7, 10), or, as the Shepherd Psalm puts it, “He leadeth me in the paths of righteousness for His name’s sake” (Psa. xxiii. 3).

Truth for the Times.

(Being the substance of the first of two addresses given by the Principal at a Scottish Conference held in Glasgow on 21st September, 1946).

#1. The Prison Epistles are and teach "The Truth".

pp. 3 - 7

The previous speaker made it clear to us that in the Acts of the Apostles the movement is from the Jew to the Gentile; from the kingdom to the church; from the fulfillment of O.T. prophecy to the revelation of a secret portion of the purpose of the ages, and that the Scriptures which reveal this secret or "mystery", as it is called, are the "prison" epistles of Paul; epistles that were written after Acts xxviii., when the Jew was set aside, and the salvation of God "sent", for the first time, to the Gentile, independently of Israel.

In the present address we are concerned with the question of "Truth". That being established, we hope in a second address to see how these "prison epistles" are indeed "Truth for the Times".

The epistles, written by Paul, that bear the mark of having been written in a Roman prison, are these: Ephesians, Philippians, Colossians, Philemon and II Timothy. In Philippians (Phil. i. 19, 24, 25) and in Philemon (verse 22) the Apostle is confident that he will be both spared and liberated for further service, but in II Timothy he knows that his end has come. These five epistles constitute the scriptural basis for the Church of the Mystery, and while Philemon is very precious evidence of the gracious spirit of the Apostle and the nature of the truth he taught, it does not contribute anything in the way of a revelation of truth, and for the present purpose can be omitted. We therefore usually speak of "The four prison epistles".

That this reference to "prison" is no mere accident is manifest, for in Eph. iii. Paul definitely associates his imprisonment with the dispensation of the grace of God to the Gentile, a claim which is supported and enforced in one way or another in each of these epistles.

Now our first object is to establish that these four epistles are "truth", and this we can do in exactly the same way as we establish any part of Scripture.

It would be out of place in a meeting of this character to spend precious time discussing the question of canonicity, therefore let it suffice to say that from the earliest times these epistles have been well-nigh universally accepted as part of the inspired Scriptures, and objections that could be brought against any one of them could be brought against any other book in the N.T., thus rendering all study fruitless. There are other and more fruitful ways of demonstrating the truth of any portion of the Scriptures: these we will endeavour to compress into as brief a compass as is consistent with clarity.

First.—Any one book of the Bible is a part of the whole, and by its own fitness as well as by its individual structure it claims that it does form an integral part of Holy Scripture. Now, every reader of the Acts of the Apostles is conscious that something is necessary to carry the revelation of truth on to its goal; something that will bridge the gap made by the non-repentance of Israel and their present "lo-ammi" condition. Previous to Israel's defection believing Gentiles were told that their dispensational position was as wild olives, graft, contrary to nature, into the olive tree of Israel, and that, humanly speaking, their inclusion at that time was for the purpose of provoking Israel to emulation. When however Israel failed, and their hope was temporarily suspended, the circumstances demanded either that nothing but confusion and darkness must be the portion of the believer during the ensuing two thousand years of Israel's blindness, or, that God in His wisdom and grace had provided against such a foreseen contingency, and, when the moment arrived, was ready to make known further phases of His great purpose that should deal particularly with the Gentile believer as separated from Israel.

This, we know, is what is claimed by the Apostle in Eph. iii. 1-13 & in Col. i. 23-27. In the latter passage Paul says that the mystery of which he was the minister "completes the word of God" (Col. i. 25). The same Greek word is used in Col. iv. 17 where "fulfil" once again means "complete", and is so translated in the phrase "complete in Him", which occurs in Col. ii. 10 and iv. 12.

Here then is one evidence that these prison epistles are "The Truth". They fit into their appointed place in all scripture, fully recognizing the dispensational change that the dismissal of the Jew must have made.

Secondly.—Not only is there a most evident fitness in this group of epistles in relation to the rest of Scripture—for they complete the record of that mighty purpose that embraces things in heaven and things on earth—but, when segregated and considered as a group by themselves, this same fitness and perfect correspondence is still observable. One of the characteristic features of any inspired book of the Bible is its literary structure. This has to be seen to be fully appreciated, but most readers of The Berean Expositor are acquainted with the phenomenon. It would therefore be a point against their inspiration were these four prison epistles not to exhibit this characteristic. That they do cannot be fully demonstrated now, but their detailed structures will be found set out in those of our writings that purport to give them an exposition; all that we can do now is to present the simplest analysis.

Ephesians.—This epistle is pivoted on the word "worthy" that comes in chapter iv. 1, and balances seven sections of doctrine with seven sections of practice: we indicate one such pair now:

> DOCTRINE.—The temple "fitly framed together" (Eph. ii. 21).
> PRACTICE.—The body "fitly joined together" (Eph. iv. 16).

What is true of these two corresponding sections is true of the whole seven.

Philippians.—

Fellowship in the gospel from the beginning (Phil. i. 3-26; iv. 11-20).
Conversation here, and there (Phil. i. 27 - ii. 5; iii. 20 - iv. 10).
Sevenfold humiliation of Christ, and loss of Paul (Phil. ii. 6-11; iii. 14-19).
Examples of Paul, Timothy and Epaphroditus (Phil. ii. 17-30).

Colossians.—This epistle is built round the central section which is headed with the word "Beware" (Col. ii. 4-23). We exhibit one pair of correspondencies only here.

G | i. 15, 16. Creator, Image.
H | i. 20. Heaven and earth.
I | i. 17, 18. Christ pre-eminent.
J | i. 20. Peace. Forgiveness.
K | i. 22. Holy, blameless.

G | iii. 10. Created, Image.
H | iii. 11. Jew and Greek.
I | iii. 11. Christ all and in all.
J | iii. 13, 15. Peace. Forgive.
K | iii. 9, 12. Put off, put on. Holy.

The disposition of the subject-matter would need to be slightly re-arranged if the literary form were our object: the above however is sufficient to demonstrate the balance of parts.

II Timothy.—Here we have three pairs of correspondencies:

(1) Paul and his message forsaken (II Tim. i. 8-18; iv. 9-18).
(2) The good Soldier. The good fight. The Crown (II Tim. ii. 1-13; iii. 10 - iv. 8).
(3) Approved (dokimos): Disapproved (adokimos) (II Tim. ii. 14-26; iii. 1-9).

This is not all. Not only has each epistle its own individual structure, but the four taken together make an indissoluble whole.

The Prison Epistles.

A	EPHESIANS. Seated together.	The dispensation (iii. 2 and 9 R.V.); Mystery (iii. 3). The Church which is His Body (i. 22, 23). The fullness (i. 23; iv. 10); Christ the Head (i. 22). Principalities and Powers (i. 21).
B	PHILIPPIANS. The Prize.	Try the things that differ (i. 21). Strive (i. 27); Press towards the mark (iii. 14). Prize (iii. 14); Depart (i. 23); Offered (ii. 17).
A	COLOSSIANS. Complete in Him.	Dispensation (i. 25); Mystery (i. 26). The Church which is His Body (i. 24). Fullness (i. 19); Christ the Head (ii. 19). Principalities and Power (i. 16; ii. 10).
B	II TIMOTHY. The Crown.	Rightly dividing the word of truth (ii. 15). Strive (ii. 5); Course finished (iv. 7). Crown (iv. 8); Depart (iv. 6); Offered (iv. 6).

Here it will be seen that these epistles deal with both sides of the Christian revelation. They reveal the doctrine and the standing of the church in grace, they also urge the believer to fruitful service. They speak of salvation by grace without works, but they also speak of a prize and a crown. They present, in themselves, a complete system of doctrine and practice, entirely and completely filling up the dispensation gap caused by the setting aside of Israel, and, with Israel, the suspension of the covenants and promises made unto the fathers.

Thirdly.—In the third place, we can allow these epistles to speak for themselves, and judge by what they say whether they are "the truth". They range themselves on the side of truth as opposed to the lie, and on the side of light as over against darkness. Moral living is inculcated, and responsibility goes hand in hand with grace (Eph. i. 3; iv. 21, 25; vi. 14; v. 4-8; Col. iii. 23-25). Everywhere Christ is honoured as Lord, and the great fundamental doctrines affirmed. Let us note a few references that will show the place that fundamental truth occupies in them.

(1) The inspiration of all Scripture.—This fundamental doctrine is affirmed in them in language that cannot surpassed in any other part of Scripture (II Tim. iii. 16).

(2) The Deity of Christ.—Such passages as Phil. ii. 6-11, and Col. i. 15-19 are sufficient evidence for their attitude to this most vital doctrine.

(3) Redemption by blood.—No part of Scripture reaches such spiritual heights as Ephesians and Colossians, yet it is in these epistles that redemption by the shedding of blood is emphasized (Eph. i. 7; Col. i. 14).

(4) Justification by faith without works.—The epistle to the Romans is confessedly the epistle to which we turn for this great doctrine of the gospel, but nowhere can there be found a more concise summary of its essential features than is compressed in the confession of Phil. iii. 7-9.

(5) Sanctification, both in its basic and progressive phases, is taught in them (Eph. i. 4; Col. i. 22; Eph. v. 25-27).

(6) Salvation by grace through faith (Eph. ii. 8-10).—Seeing that they are addressed to a company of saved people, and intended to lead them on the higher ground and into a new dispensation, it would not have been surprising if the gospel itself had not been mentioned. Yet in each of the four, the gospel finds a prominent place (Eph. i. 13; ii. 8-10; iii. 6; vi. 19; Phil. i. 5, 17, 27; Col. i. 5, 23; II Tim. i. 8, 10; ii. 8).

(7) The pre-eminence of Christ (Apart from His essential Deity).—This is perhaps the most marked of any peculiarity of these great epistles, namely, the glory, the pre-eminence, the position, "far above all", that is ascribed to the Saviour (Eph. i. 20-23; iv. 9, 10; Col. iii. 11).

By every test therefore we are safe in making the claim, that those who proclaim the message found in these four epistles will be proclaiming "The Truth". Our next proposition is that these epistles do not only contain "Truth", but that they are "The Truth for the times". This we will next consider.

#2. The Prison Epistles teach "Truth for the times".
pp. 27 - 31

In the first address we sought to establish the four great "prison" epistles as epistles of "truth", taking their place with all Scripture, and given by inspiration of God. We submitted these epistles to three forms of examination:

(1) Their relationship with the rest of Scripture.
(2) Their inter-relationship as exhibited by Structure.
(3) Their response to a seven-fold Doctrinal test.

We now pass to the second part of our proposition; that these epistles are not only epistles of inspired truth, but that they are "Truth for the times". Now, in such a claim there is a challenge. First, it supposes that there can be "truth" in God's word that is not "Truth for the times". Secondly, that such a discrimination is proper and scriptural, and thirdly, that these four epistles minister truth for the present dispensation, as no other part of Scripture can.

Let us take these three divisions of our subject and examine them separately in the light of all Scripture.

First. Can there be "truth" that is true at one time and not true at another? In one sense, any word that God has said is eternally, unalterably, true. The law given through Moses is as true as to-day as when it was first instituted. Yet, not one of those who read these words has ever kept those laws, which are true, nor has he any intention of doing so. The law of Moses contains commands that were not only enjoined upon the people, but accompanied by severe penalties for non-observance. There is a series of commands accompanied by the threat for disobedience; that "He shall be cut off from his people". Such are the rite of circumcision (Gen. xvii. 14); the eating of leaven during the days of unleavened bread (Exod. xii. 15); the keeping of the sabbath (Exod. xxxi. 14); the keeping of the day of atonement (Lev. xxiii. 29); the observance of the Passover (Numb. ix. 13); the purification upon touching a dead body (Numb. xix. 13, 20). Now either these passages are the truth of God, or they are not. We believe that they are truth, the words of Moses being endorsed by the Saviour Himself (Luke xxiv. 27; John v. 46, 47). Here therefore are words of truth, recognized as truth by believers, who nevertheless agree that they have not obeyed them, and do not intend to obey them, yet they have not suffered the penalties involved, nor do they expect to. Indeed, in the self-same Bible that enjoins, with such solemnity, circumcision or the keeping of the Sabbath day, we also read, "If ye be circumcised, Christ shall profit you nothing . . . . . ye are fallen from grace" (Gal. v. 2 and 4). "Let no man therefore judge you in meat, or in drink, or in respect of an holy day, or of the new moon, or of the sabbath days" (Col. ii. 16).

How are we to reconcile these, apparently, conflicting statements? You must be circumcised; you must not be circumcised. You must keep the Sabbath day; you should not keep the Sabbath day. You will be cut off if you fail to observe these commandments; you will fall from grace if you do. Unless the whole of the revelation of God is to be reduced to a mass of contradictions, surely there is a key provided that will give an honourable and satisfying solution of the difficulty. There is, and that key is implied in the term "Truth for the times". We therefore arrive at the next inquiry.

Secondly. Such a discrimination between one scripture and another is both proper and scriptural. When the Apostle enjoined Timothy "rightly to divide the word of truth", or when he urged the Philippians to "approve things that are excellent", or, as the margin indicates, to "try the things that differ", he had this principle of interpretation in view. When the Apostle distinguishes between Jew and Gentile; between kingdom and church; between earthly promises and heavenly places; between the Bride and the Body; between the citizenship of the New Jerusalem and the seating together of some "in heavenly places"; each portion of scripture is recognized as "truth", but not every portion referred to is "Truth for the times".

This principle of discrimination is called "dispensational truth", simply because all these differences are the result of changes in the developing purpose of God. The word "dispensation" is sometimes confused with the word "age", but, while a dispensation must occupy a period of time, it is of itself to be distinguished from a period of time, inasmuch as two or more dispensations can run together. Paul declares that for preaching the gospel a "dispensation" had been given to him (I Cor. ix. 17), but, by consulting Gal. ii. 7, we discover that the gospel of the uncircumcision had been committed to Paul as the gospel of the circumcision had been committed to Peter; consequently two dispensations, the one directed to the Gentile, the other to the Circumcision (Gal. ii. 8), were in operation at the same time, and recognized as such by the Apostles (Gal. ii. 9).

In the Greek the word "dispensation" is oikonomia, and is derived from oikonomos, "steward" (Luke xii. 42; xvi. 1, 3, 8; I Cor. iv. 1, 2; Titus i. 7; I Pet. iv. 10); "chamberlain" (Rom. xvi. 23); and "governor" (Gal. iv. 2). The word is composed of oikos "a house", and nemo "to deal out, distribute, dispense". The word has entered into English in the form "economy", and is used in such expressions as "political economy", "domestic economy", "economics", as well as in the more popular meaning of wise and thrifty spending of money.

After Israel had been set aside, as recorded in Acts xxviii., we find Paul still a prisoner at Rome, but free to receive all who would come to him, and in that condition he remained for two years. From that prison he wrote four epistles, each indelibly bearing the marks of his imprisonment in the body of the epistle. These four epistles are Ephesians, Philippians, Colossians, and Philemon. Subsequently, he wrote the second epistle to Timothy, in which he again refers to the fact and significance of his imprisonment.

> "I Paul, the prisoner of Jesus Christ for you Gentiles, if ye have heard of the dispensation of the grace of God which is given me to you-ward" (Eph. iii. 1, 2).
> "I am an ambassador in bonds" (Eph. vi. 20).

These words make it clear that Paul, as the prisoner, had a special stewardship regarding the Gentiles, and when we read further we find that this stewardship relates to "a mystery" revealed for the first time to men through Paul, and that it "completes" the Word of God (Eph. iii. 3-11; Col. i. 23-27). It is of the essence of a mystery that it should be "hid" until the time arrives for it to be revealed, and these scriptures, cited above, show that this mystery was "hid in God", "hid from ages and from generations" but has "now" been made manifest through the exclusive ministry of Paul, the prisoner of Jesus Christ.

While the fundamental doctrines of Scripture regarding sin and salvation remain unchanged, many features that are distinctive and peculiar to the dispensation demand attention. Let us acquaint ourselves with some of them.

(1) A distinctive and peculiar sphere of blessing.

> "In heavenly places" (Eph. i. 3).

While "heaven" and "heavenly" are terms found throughout the N.T., the expression en tois epouraniois, "in heavenly places", is peculiar to Ephesians. It occurs five times in that epistle, namely in chapters i. 3, 20, ii. 6, and vi. 12. These five occurrences provide us with all that we can know at present concerning this sphere of blessing. We can add Eph. iv. 10 which reveals that Christ ascended up "far above all heavens", and consequently we can perceive something of the high glory that pertains to the position of those who are said to be "seated together" there.

(2) A distinct period when chosen.

> "Chosen in Him before the foundation of the world" (Eph. i. 4).

In the Gospels, Epistles, and the Revelation, we find the expression "from" or "since" the foundation of the world (Matt. xiii. 35; Heb. iv. 3; Rev. xvii. 8), but never do we read the words "before the foundation of the world" in connection with the redeemed, except in this one place. Where we meet with this same phrase elsewhere, the reference is exclusively to Christ. In John xvii. 24, we learn that Christ was "loved" before the foundation of the world, and in I Pet. i. 20, that He was foreordained as the Lamb "without blemish and without spot" before the foundation of the world, and, wonder of wonders, these two things are said to be true of the believer also (Eph. i. 3-5): "in love"; "holy and without blame".

The word translated "foundation" in these passages is not themelion, the Greek word for the foundation of a building (Eph. ii. 20), but katabole, which, etymologically, means "A throwing down", even as the verb kataballo is translated "cast down" (II Cor. iv. 9;

Rev. xii. 10). This is the consistent meaning of the word as used in the LXX, of which II Sam. xx. 15 is an example. This period, "before the overthrow" of the world, takes us back to before Gen. i. 2, when the earth became without form and void.

Here therefore are two links with the past that are peculiar to this dispensation. (a) A sphere of blessing that is associated with the heavens, before the present "firmament" was arranged; (b) A time period that goes back before the overthrow of the world, which, we find by comparing with other scriptures, reveals a judgment upon a fall that took place long before man.

(3) A distinctive dispensation and steward.

Paul claims to be the one to whom the revelation of the mystery was made known, and that through him alone must all receive enlightenment as to it. This dispensation is peculiarly Gentile in its approach, and the fact is further emphasized by the absence of reference to the Jew, to Abraham, to "The Fathers" or to the New Covenant in any of the "prison" epistles. Unlike the early epistles of Paul, which abound in references to the O.T. scriptures, such references in these later epistles are few and far between, and have no reference to the special revelation of the mystery. Paul calls the truth there elaborated "The unsearchable riches of Christ". The absence of references to the O.T. Scriptures is not because Paul had ceased to believe them (for in II Tim. iii. 16 we have the fullest testimony to their inspiration that the Scriptures contain), but to the simple fact that he was dealing with a "mystery", something hitherto "hid", and something which he himself received by "revelation" (Eph. iii. 1-13).

(4) A distinctive calling. The Body, not the Bride.

The company of believers who are blessed under the terms of the dispensation of the mystery is called "The church which is His body, the fullness of Him, that filleth all in all" (Eph. i. 22, 23). This must not be confused with the references to the body in I Cor. xii., which is clearly stated to be concerned with "spiritual gifts", "miracles, healings, etc." Moreover, this church is spoken of as "the perfect man" (Eph. iv. 13), the word used for man being the Greek aner, which is translated in Eph. v. 22, 23, 24 and 25 by the word "husband". This fact alone makes it impossible that the church which is to become the perfect MAN, can at the same time be the "BRIDE, the Lamb's WIFE".

Of this company, the Body, Christ is the Head, and every member is on perfect equality with fellow-members (Eph. iii. 6). The church of the One Body, where "Christ is all and in all", foreshadows the new creation where, in the consummation of the ages, God will be all in all.

Associated with these four distinctive features—sphere, period, dispensation and calling—are many important subsidiary doctrines. There are things that are conspicuous by their absence, as, for example, miraculous gifts, covenants, and ordinances. All these and more, must be weighed in the balances of the sanctuary if an all-round comprehension of the glory of this high calling is to be acquired. This conference will, however, have attained its object if the interest of believers has been aroused and quickened, and, above all things, if the Berean spirit, that searches to see if these things are so, is emulated.

Truth in the Balance.

#5. Root and Fruit.
"The root of the righteous yieldeth fruit" (Prov. xii. 12).
pp. 17 - 19

"Doctrine and Practice", which we considered in the preceding study of this series, are related to one another as "root" is to "fruit". This is an analogy that all can appreciate, and one that is much used in Scripture. Both in the material and in the spiritual world, the relationship of root to fruit is that of balance and correspondence, and we must consider this in the series before us. The Book of Proverbs contains a passage which we might well choose as our text.

> "The root of the righteous yieldeth fruit" (Prov. xii. 12).

In the same chapter we have the assertion that "The root of the righteous shall not be moved" (Prov. xii. 3). This is equivalent to the doctrine of Prov. x. 30, "The righteous shall never be removed", and, as a result, "the root of the righteous yieldeth fruit". There is no actual word for "fruit" in this passage, but the Hebrew verb nathan, "to give", is often used in the sense of yielding fruit or increase, as for example:

> "When thou tillest the ground, it shall not henceforth yield unto thee her strength" (Gen. iv. 12).
> "The land shall yield her fruit" (Lev. xxv. 19).

In different connections, this principle is frequently enunciated: nor is it confined to any one part of the O.T., being used alike in Law, Prophets and Psalms. This is brought out in the following passage:

> "The remnant that is escaped of the house of Judah shall yet again take root downward, and bear fruit upward" (II Kings xix. 30).

Those of our readers who have had experience of fruit growing will know that, on occasion, it may be necessary to cut away the deep descending tap root in order to induce the tree to make less wood and more fruit. With this knowledge a superficial reading of II Kings xix. 30 might lead to the conclusion that one must not take these figures too literally. But for nearly forty years we have devoted ourselves to the patient investigation of the Scriptures, and it is our joyful testimony that never have we found it necessary to alter one word in order to bring it into line with truth. So here the word translated "downward" is the adverb mattah, which is rendered in the A.V., "beneath", "underneath", "very low", "under", "less", "down" and "downward". The verb from which this adverb is derived is natah, "To spread", or "To stretch forth", as a hand, as a tent. "He spread his tent" (Gen. xxxiii. 19). "Thou stretchest out thy right hand" (Exod. xv. 12). So we see that the tree contemplated in II Kings xix. 30 was to take root downward, but in the sense of spreading out underneath the soil, as all fruit bearing trees do.

The primary meaning of the word that gives us "upward" (le-malah) is "to ascend". Here there is definite and intentional correspondence between the firm, spreading, root underneath, and the blossom and fruit that appears above, and what is true in the realm of nature is true also in the realm of grace.

Further association of root and fruit is found in such a passages as,

> "Their root shall be as rottenness, and their blossom shall go up as dust" (Isa. v. 24).

The earlier verses of this chapter have likened Israel to a carefully tended vine:

> "For the vineyard of the Lord of hosts is the house of Israel, and the men of Judah His pleasant plant; and He looked for judgment, but behold oppression; for righteousness, but behold a cry" (Isa. v. 7).

Again, Hosea uses the figure,

> "Ephraim is smitten, their root is dried up, they shall bear no fruit" (Hosea ix. 16).

One of the complaints made against Israel by Hosea was, "Israel is an empty vine, he brought forth fruit unto himself" (Hosea x. 1).

To complete our survey we now turn to the N.T. Here is our Lord's own statement:

> "Beware of false prophets, which come to you in sheep's clothing, but inwardly they are ravening wolves. Ye shall know them by their fruits. Do men gather grapes of thorns, or figs of thistles? Even so every good tree bringeth forth good fruit; but a corrupt tree bringeth forth evil fruit. A good tree cannot bring forth evil fruit, neither can a corrupt tree bring forth good fruit. Every tree that bringeth not forth good fruit is hewn down, and cast into the fire. Wherefore by their fruits ye shall know them" (Matt. vii. 15-20).

This reiteration of the truth is emphasized by the Apostle in Romans, "If the root be holy, so are the branches" (Rom. xi. 16).

Both in the Epistles to the Ephesians and the Colossians, the Apostle speaks of the rooting of the believer:

> "Being rooted and grounded in love" (Eph. iii. 17).
> "Rooted and built up in Him" (Col. ii. 7).

and from this root, and this blessed soil, the "fruit" of the Spirit or (the Light) was expected to grow (Eph. v. 9), and the "fruits" of righteousness to form (Phil. i. 11), and be "brought forth (Col. i. 6). Paul sought fruit as a result of his sowing and planting (Rom. i. 13), and it was as such that he looked upon the offering made by the Gentile church to the poor saints at Jerusalem (Rom. xv. 28); it was also his prayer for the Colossians, who had been "rooted" in Christ, that they should be "fruitful in every good work" (Col. i. 10).

Here then is truth in the balance. If we have believed in Christ, and become partakers of His rich grace, what a root-hold we have, and hence, what corresponding fruit should we not bear! Alas, sometimes we bring forth fruit simply for ourselves, and so are really empty (Hosea x. 1), whereas we should "bring forth fruit unto God" (Rom. vii. 4). Patience is needed (Luke viii. 15), continued fellowship (John xv. 4), and pruning (John xv. 2). Not only did the Lord speak of "fruit", but also of "more fruit", "much fruit", and fruit that should "remain" (John xv. 2, 5, 16).

#6. The place of "works" before and after salvation.

pp. 54 - 57

At the close of the preceding article we quoted part of the prayer of Col. i. 10: "Being fruitful in every good work." Following up this thought of fruit, let us now consider, as a further example of truth in the balance, the way in which the Apostle deals with "works", setting them aside when considered as factors in our salvation, but praying for their manifestation after salvation, as "fruit" giving evidence of a healthy "root" beneath.

Here, then, are some of the statements that show how resolutely and unreservedly the Apostle sets works aside, before salvation.

The first is from Rom. iii., and represents the conclusion of the argument that fills the three opening chapters of Romans:

> "Where is boasting then? It is excluded. By what law? of works? Nay: but by the law of faith. Therefore we conclude that a man is justified by faith without the deeds of the law" (Rom. iii. 27, 28).

Again, in the following chapter, we read:

> "If Abraham were justified by works, he hath whereof to glory; but not before God. For what saith the scripture? Abraham believed God, and it was counted unto him for righteousness. Now to him that worketh is the reward not reckoned of grace, but of debt. But to him that worketh not, but believeth on Him that justifieth the ungodly, his faith is counted for righteousness" (Rom. iv. 2-7).

It is evident that Paul's conception of "grace" will not permit the slightest suggestion of "a reward that is a debt". This point is brought out very clearly in Rom. xi. Speaking of the remnant according to the election of grace, he says:

> "And if by grace, then is it no more of works; otherwise grace is no more grace. But if it be of works, then is it no more grace; otherwise work is no more work" (Rom. xi. 6).

The Apostle is equally emphatic on this aspect of truth in the smaller, but parallel epistle to the Galatians:

> "Knowing that a man is not justified by the works of the law, but by the faith of Jesus Christ, even we have believed in Jesus Christ, that we might be justified by the faith of Christ, and not by the works of the law; for by the works of the law shall no flesh be justified" (Gal. ii. 16).

What reiteration we have here. "Works of the law . . . . . works of the law . . . . . works of the law"—and these words are part of Paul's personal testimony to Peter and the assembly at Antioch (Gal. ii. 11-21).

When he learns that the Galatians had been persuaded to attempt to make their salvation secure by the practice of circumcision, and the observance of "weak and beggarly elements", the Apostle tells them that it looks as though someone must have "bewitched" them.

> "This only would I learn of you, Received ye the spirit by the works of the law, or by the hearing of faith? Are ye so foolish? having begun in the spirit, are ye now made perfect by the flesh?" (Gal. iii. 2, 3).

Notice that the Apostle places "works" and "flesh" together here, and "faith" and "spirit".

So comprehensive is the law, and so weak is the flesh, that the Apostle can say without need for proviso or exception: "For as many as are of the works of the law are under the curse" (Gal. iii. 10), and anyone who ponders the reason given in the remainder of the verse will be compelled to agree.

Turning to the epistles of the Mystery, the Apostle makes two clear statements that settle the matter once and for all:

> "For by grace are ye saved through faith; and that not of yourselves: it is the gift of God: not of works lest any man should boast" (Eph. ii. 8, 9).
>
> "Who hath saved us, and called us with an holy calling, not according to our works, but according to His own purpose and grace, which was given us in Christ Jesus before the world began" (II Tim. i. 9).

These two passages from the prison epistles are supplemented by one from Titus:

> "Not by works of righteousness which we have done, but according to His mercy He saved us" (Titus iii. 5).

Coming now to the other side of the question, are there any "works" that can be placed in the other scale? There are, and until we see both sides, our conception of the truth will be unbalanced and distorted. We need not go outside this same chapter of Titus for an example of balance. If in verse 5 the Apostle says "Not by works", he follows with this statement in verse 8:

> "This is a faithful saying, and these things I will that thou affirm constantly, that they which have believed in God might be careful to maintain good works" (Titus iii. 8).

In fact, the structure of the whole epistle is written round this theme of "good works". If no works are permitted by the Apostle before salvation, he insists upon their presence after.

> "They profess that they know God; but in works they deny Him, being abominable, and disobedient, and unto every good work reprobate" (Titus i. 16).

The moment one speaks of "profession", "good works" are to be expected. So, to Titus himself, the teacher of the Church, the Apostle writes:

> "In all things showing thyself a pattern of good works: in doctrine showing uncorruptness, gravity, sincerity, sound speech, which cannot be condemned" (Titus ii. 7, 8).

What the Apostle looked for in the teacher, the "pattern", he also looked for in those who had believed, and were taught.

Later on in the chapter he writes:

> "Looking for that blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ; Who gave Himself for us, that He might redeem us from all iniquity, and purify unto Himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works" (Titus ii. 13, 14).

Coming back to Eph. ii., the reader may remember that we only partly quoted from verses 8 to 10. After declaring that salvation is by grace and not of works, Paul immediately proceeds to add: "For we are His workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works" (Eph. ii. 10). The Apostle who so ruthlessly sets aside "works" as a means to salvation, insists upon good works as a manifestation that salvation is indeed a possession and not merely a profession.

We have another example of these two aspects of "works" in II Timothy. There, in the first chapter, "works" are repudiated as we have already seen (verse 9), but there are five passages further on where "works" are looked for as a normal result of salvation. We also read that Paul remembered with thanksgiving the "work of faith" of the Thessalonians (I Thess. i. 3), and prayed that they might be established in "every good word and work" (II Thess. ii. 17). So again we find that perfect balance that gives us the complete truth.

#7. The scriptural relationship of the epistles of Paul and the epistle of James considered in preparation for the study of James ii., and its bearing upon justification by faith.

pp. 93 - 97

When quoting the Apostle in the preceding article, there were almost as many occurrences of the words "justified" or "righteousness" as there were of the word we were examining, namely "works". Had we attempted any notice of this at the time, it would have confused the issues, but now we turn to the matter of justification, for that also is a Truth in the Balance.

It is well known that Paul, when he uses Abraham as an example of justification by faith, goes to Gen. xv., where Abraham is said to have believed God, and where his faith had been counted for righteousness. Paul rightly stresses the fact that, there, in Gen. xv., "works" were inadmissible. But there is another side to this truth, and one, alas, which some of the best have misinterpreted. This other side is found in the epistle of James. It is false to teach that James propounded one way of justification and Paul another. Unless we maintain that the fruit on a tree "contradicts" the root in the soil, we cannot contend that the teaching of James contradicts the teaching of Paul. James stress the "fruit" aspect, the "good works", whereas in Rom. i.-v. Paul emphasizes the "root" aspect and leaves the fruit for subsequent teaching.

The reader is probably aware that there are two very divergent points of view regarding the epistle of James. Luther's designation of it as "an epistle of straw" on account of its alleged contradiction of Paul's doctrine of justification by faith, is probably known to all readers, but few cite the famous dictum in its context, or remind the reader of the atmosphere of conflict in which the words were uttered. Here it is:

> "St. John's Gospel and first Epistle, the Epistles of St. Paul, especially those to the Romans, Galatians and Ephesians, these are the books which set Christ before you, and teach you every necessary thing for you to believe, though you never hear of any other book or doctrine. Therefore the Epistle of James is quite an epistle of straw by the side of these, for it has no true Evangelical character."

Seen in its context, this reference to James as an epistle of straw can be apprized at its true worth. The expression is not used positively, but in comparison with those books of the N.T. which are "Evangelical" in purpose and which "set Christ before" the reader. We must remember that when Luther uttered these words he was engaged in his fight for justification by faith without works, and knew that the epistle of James had been perverted from its original intention, and had become the main prop of those who combated Luther's distinctive doctrine. In such an atmosphere, the best of men are liable to exaggeration, if only to counterbalance the exaggeration of their opponents.

While we must remember that James write to the "twelve tribes scattered abroad", he wrote to them not as Jews, but as believers. He does not "emphasize his physical kinship with Christ" (as one writer—whose name we withhold—says) but, like Paul, calls himself, "A servant of God and of the Lord Jesus Christ" (James i. 1) and speaks of Christ as "Our Lord Jesus Christ, the Lord of glory" (James ii. 1). That James addressed Christian Jews is manifest, for they had been "begotten by the word of truth" (Jas. i. 18), and had been called by "that worthy name" (James ii. 7). The same writer who falsely accused James of "emphasizing his physical kinship with Christ" also says that James "drags the nation down into the sphere of the flesh, thus preparing the way for their repudiation by God". We wonder if there is extant a worse example of the effect of prejudice than this, written, not in ignorance, but as a preparatory note to an examination or translation of the epistle of James from the original. One would conclude that Paul had never written such words as: "Faith which worketh by love", or "the obedience of faith". James says that those who have "respect of persons", who are "partial in themselves", blaspheme the worthy name by which they are called. Is that a doctrine that "drags down into the sphere of the flesh"? Does not Paul urge obedience to a master that the name of God and His doctrine be not blasphemed? (I Tim. vi. 1). Does he not speak against "partiality"? Does he not speak scathingly of "respect of persons"?

James says:

> "If ye fulfil the royal law according to the scripture, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself, ye do well" (ii. 8).
> "So speak ye, and so do, as they that shall be judged by the law of liberty" (ii. 12).

Paul says:

> "Brethren, ye have been called unto liberty; only use not liberty for an occasion to the flesh, but by love serve one another. For all the law is fulfilled in one word, even in this, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself" (Gal. v. 13, 14).

Can anyone detect the slightest divergence here? Does one lead up and the other drag down?

James supports his argument by saying:

> "For whosoever shall keep the whole law, and yet offend in one point, he is guilty of all. For He that said, Do not commit adultery, said also, Do not kill. Now if thou commit no adultery, yet if thou kill, thou art become a transgressor of the law. So speak ye, and so do, as they that shall be judged by the law of liberty" (James ii. 10-13).

Paul adopts the same method:

> "Owe no man anything, but to love one another; for he that loveth another hath fulfilled the law. For this, Thou shalt not commit adultery, Thou shalt not kill, Thou shalt not steal, Thou shalt not bear false witness, Thou shalt not covet; and if there be any other commandment, it is briefly comprehended in this saying, namely, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself. Love worketh no ill to his neighbour: therefore love is the fulfilling of the law" (Rom. xiii. 8-10).

The argument that would deduce from James ii. 10-12 that James taught justification by the works of law, must deduce the same from Rom. xiii. 8-10 which, as Euclid says, "is absurd". Further, it has been repeatedly observed by students, that the teaching of the epistle of James is an application of the Sermon on the Mount. Shall we say that anyone, writing to the dispersion during the Pentecostal dispensation, was "thus preparing the way for their repudiation by God"? The question seems too fantastic for consideration, yet this is accepted by some as the last word on the subject!

The teaching of James.	The teaching of the Lord. (Matthew).
"My brethren, count it all joy when ye fall into divers temptations" (i. 2).	"Blessed are ye, when men shall revile you . . . . . Rejoice, and be exceeding glad: for great is your reward in heaven" (v. 11, 12).
"Let patience have her perfect work" (i. 4).	"Be ye therefore perfect" (v. 48).
"What doth it profit, my brethren, if a man say he hath faith, and have not works, can that faith save him?" (ii. 14, R.V.).	"Not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven" (vii. 21).
"Whosoever therefore will be a friend of the world is the enemy of God" (IV. 4).	"No man can serve two masters" (vi. 24).
"Your riches are corrupted, and your garments motheaten" (v. 2).	"Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon earth where moth and rust doth corrupt, and where thieves break through and steal" (vi. 19).
"But above all things, my brethren, swear not, neither by heaven, neither by the earth, neither by any other oath; but let your yea be yea; and your nay, nay; lest ye fall into condemnation" (v. 12).	"But I say unto you, Swear not at all; neither by heaven; for it is God's throne: Nor by earth; for it is His footstool . . . . . but let your communication be Yea, yea; Nay, nay: for whatsoever is more than these cometh of evil" (v. 34-37).

These parallels lie on the surface: doubtless, the earnest student could double their number.

Rightly understood, the Sermon on the Mount is, to believers of the Kingdom, what Philippians is to the dispensation of the Mystery, Hebrews, to the "holy brethren, partakers of the heavenly calling", and James, to the dispersion during the Pentecostal administration.

We have found that there is a correspondence between the Sermon on the Mount and James; let us once more put truth into the balance, and see the correspondence that exists between Philippians and the Sermon on the Mount.

Philippians.	Matthew v. - vii.
"Look not every man on his own things but every man also on the things of others" (ii. 4).	"Seek ye first the kingdom of God" (vi. 33).
"Some indeed preach Christ even of envy and strife . . . . . What then? . . . . . Christ is preached; and I therein do rejoice, yea, and will rejoice" (i. 15, 18).	"Blessed are ye when men shall revile you, and persecute you, and shall say all manner of evil against you falsely, for My name's sake. Rejoice and be exceeding glad" (v. 11, 12).
"Let us therefore, as many as would be perfect, be thus minded" (iii. 15).	"Be ye therefore perfect" (v. 48).

"That ye may be blameless and harmless, the sons of God, without rebuke" (ii. 15).	"Love your enemies . . . . . that ye may be the children of your Father which is in heaven" (v. 44, 45).
"Shine ye (A.V. margin) as lights in the world" (ii. 15).	"Let your light so shine before men" (v. 16).
"Let your moderation (yieldingness) be known unto all men" (iv. 5).	"Whosoever shall compel thee to go a mile, go with him twain" (v. 41).
"Be careful (merimnao) for nothing" (iv. 6).	"Take no thought (merimnao) for your life" (vi. 25).
"Many walk . . . . . whose end is destruction (apoleia)" (iii. 18, 19).	"Wide is the gate, and broad is the way, that leadeth to destruction (apoleia)" (vii. 13).
"If there be any virtue, if there be any praise, impute these things" (iv. 8).	"Why beholdest thou the mote that is in thy brother's eye?" (vii. 3).

The key that unlocks the Sermon on the Mount, the epistle to the Philippians, and the epistle of James, together with the epistle to the Hebrews, and the central teaching of the epistle to the Colossians, is the word "perfect". No one who has comprehended the distinctive teaching of this word could confuse James' teaching with Paul's basic teaching of justification by faith, and whoever approaches James not thus equipped, will fumble on the threshold and mislead all who follow.

Let us not mistake the issue. It is not that James and Paul do not minister to entirely different companies, under different dispensational terms. This is acknowledged as self-evident truth. James wrote to the dispersion, the twelve tribes scattered abroad, who still worshipped in the synagogue (James ii. 2).

James, whose attitude towards ritual was as far removed from that of Paul as the poles are asunder, nevertheless administers a rebuke worthy of him who spoke of those who had "the form of godliness, but denied the power thereof". The word translated "religion" in James i. 27, is threskeia and refers to external religions observances, or, as we call it, "ritual", but not in a corrupt sense. James, however, says that "pure and undefiled religious service" (or ritual) does not consist in external rites and ceremonies, the products of a dead faith, but that it will manifest the hidden grace of the renewed heart. This is parallel with Paul's repudiation of external circumcision, but retention and application of its inner meaning.

We commenced with the intention of putting Rom. iv. and James ii. into the balance of truth, but so many features and items had to be discussed in order to clear the mind of bias and provide a key, that our space is already exhausted. As a result, however, we shall be able to pick up the threads and pursue the theme the better in our next article.

#8. By works was faith perfected, and Gen. xv. "fulfilled" (James ii. 22, 23).

pp. 133 - 137

We have now seen enough to enable us to set aside the aspersions that have been cast on the teaching of the epistle of James, and can next consider what the epistle actually teaches.

As we have already seen, a comparative study of James, Philippians and the Sermon on the Mount brings the word "perfect" into prominence. The Greek word is teleios, cognate with telos, "the end", and expresses the idea of finishing one's course. We will begin, therefore, by considering the passages in James that contain the words teleios, teleioo, teleo, and telos. Let us first see them together:

Teleios.	"Let patience have here perfect work, that ye may be perfect and entire, wanting nothing" (James i. 4).
	"Every perfect gift is from above" (James i. 17).
	"But whoso looketh into the perfect law of liberty" (James i. 25).
	"The same is a perfect man" (James iii. 2).
Teleioo.	"By works was faith made perfect" (James ii. 22).
Teleo.	"If ye fulfil the royal law" (James ii. 8).
Telos.	"And have seen the end of the Lord" (James v. 11).

Let us now examine these references, and discover if possible the Scriptural meaning of the Greek words used and their bearing on the purpose of James' epistle in general, and James ii. 22 in particular. The root of all the words is tel, and however far the various derivations may depart from this root meaning, there will always be in the background the idea of an "end" or "finish". The words "finish" and "end", have a double meaning in English—signifying either the termination or end of space or time, or the goal, or completion or issue of anything. It is obvious, however, that when James speaks of the "end of the Lord" he can only mean the end or goal that the Lord has before Him. This reference comes in the last chapter of James, and is in structural correspondence with the first chapter:

A | i. 1-4. Patience, and its perfect work. Teleios.

* * * * *

A | v. 7-12. Patience, and the end of the Lord. Telos.

In the second of these sections we read:

> "Be patient therefore, brethren, unto the coming of the Lord. Behold the husbandman waiteth for the precious fruit of the earth, and hath long patience for it, until he receive the early and the latter rain. Be ye also patient, stablish your hearts: for the coming of the Lord draweth nigh . . . . . Behold we count them happy which endure. Ye have heard of the patience of Job, and have seen the end of the Lord; that the Lord is very pitiful, and of tender mercy" (James v. 7-11).

The reference to Job in connection with the "end of the Lord" is enlightening, for in the experiences of the patriarch we see worked out the blessedness of temptation when, through it, patience has its perfecting work. Turning now to chapter i., we see there the lesson summed up in verse 12:

> "Blessed is the man that endureth temptation: for when he is tried, he shall receive the crown of life, which the Lord hath promised to them that love Him" (James i. 12).

The teaching of this verse is comparable with that of II Tim. iv. 7 and 8, where the apostle speaks of a "crown of righteousness".

As a good example of the confusing of things that differ, we quote the following comment on James i. 12:

> "Life, in James, is the result of endurance to the consummation. Hence it is figured by the victor's wreath. We cannot boast of our life in Christ, but in the kingdom life comes to those that overcome."

If this comment be true, we might just as well say of II Tim. iv. 7, 8:

> "Righteousness, in Paul, is the result of endurance to the consummation. Hence it is figured by the victor's wreath."

Such a comment would be a monstrous perversion of the truth. Anyone who confuses "hope" with "prize", or "gift" with "reward" cannot help but lose his way and mislead his followers. James deals with "perfecting", as does Paul in some places, but Paul also gives basic teaching which James, in his one epistle, does not give.

Those to whom James wrote had been "begotten" (James i. 18) and to speak of their "life" as the "result of endurance" is unscriptural. "The crown of life" is the award granted to those who endure the test, and to those "who loved Him", just as in II Tim. iv. 8 "the crown of righteousness" is for those "that love His appearing". Life is a necessity before it is possible to exhibit love.

The law that James has in view is not "Mount Sinai which gendereth to bondage" but "the perfect law of liberty"—"the royal law" (James i. 25, ii. 8). "The perfect law of liberty" means "the perfect law which is (the law) of our (Christian) liberty". It is not the Gospel as contrasted with the Law, but the rule of life which obtains under the gospel dispensation, and which Paul and James declare to be the law of love (Gal. v. 13, 14; James ii. 8) or the state of being "under the law to Christ" (I Cor. ix. 21). If James actually teaches that those believers to whom he addressed his epistles were justified, while still sinners, by works, then we must believe that we have in view here a company that differs fundamentally from the rest of the redeemed, whether they be Jew or Gentile. Under Paul's ministry the Jew, equally with the Gentile, was justified by faith without works. Those to whom Peter ministered were not justified by works, for he speaks of Christ as having died "the just for the unjust" to bring them to God (I Pet. iii. 18); and certainly no one can think of intruding justification by works into the epistles of John.

Israel also, according to the prophecies of the O.T., are justified without works, for they will acknowledge that all their righteousness are as filthy rags, and that Jehovah Tsidkenu is their "righteousness". David, also, knew and taught the same blessed doctrine as Paul makes evident in Rom. iv. The believers addressed by James could no more attain to a righteousness by works than we can to-day. Both Paul and James appeal to the record of the justification of Abraham, and both appeal to the same verse. We are fully aware that in the process of his argument James goes to Gen. xxii. but this is not the basis; it is rather the "end" or "perfecting" of the faith already manifested without works. Referring to Gen. xv., Paul writes:

> "For what saith the Scripture? Abraham believed God, and it was counted unto him for righteousness" (Rom. iv. 2).

In connection with the same passage James writes:

> "And the Scripture was fulfilled which saith, Abraham believed God, and it was imputed unto him for righteousness" (James ii. 23).

Paul carries us forward in Rom. iv. to Abraham's further exercise of the faith he had already shown in believing God's promise of a son to a man and woman "as good as dead":

> "He staggered not at the promise of God through unbelief; but was strong in faith, giving glory to God: and being fully persuaded that what God had promised, He was able to perform. And therefore it was imputed to him for righteousness" (Rom. iv. 20-22).

Paul concentrates on the question of Isaac's birth, and makes it clear that he has in mind the kind of faith that includes resurrection, and believes in "God Who quickeneth the dead". James does not speak of the initial act of Abraham's faith but takes us rather to the "end", where we stand with the patriarch on Mount Moriah, and see him "tempted" and attaining "the crown". James exposes the hollow mockery of a "faith" that is in name only. The A.V. reads:

> "What doth it profit, my brethren, though a man say he hath faith, and have not works? Can faith save him?" (James ii. 14).

The R.V. is closer to the true meaning here, and reads:

> "Can that faith save him?"

The believers to whom James was writing, had been brought up as Jews to believe that the mere fact of being a child of Abraham was sufficient to guarantee their entrance into the kingdom—an evil doctrine that was rebuked both by John the Baptist and the Lord Himself, ("Think not to say within yourselves, We have Abraham to our father" Matt. iii. 9, John viii. 33-44). James saw that they were now slipping into the error of regarding "faith" in a similar way. "Though a man say he hath faith", says James, "Can that kind of faith save him?" The answer is that it cannot, and the answer is illustrated by the two examples that follow. Try saying to a naked and destitute brother, "Be ye warmed" and "be ye fed" without implementing these words with necessary materials, and ask the one who is sent empty away how much this "saying" has profited him (James ii. 15, 16). "Even so", comments James, "faith, if it hath not works, is dead in itself". He then goes on to the second illustration: "Thou believest that there is one God: and thou doest well."

The word hoti ("that") after pisteuo ("to believe") expresses the highest form of faith (John vi. 69; xvii. 8, etc.). Yet what follows? "The devil believe [and thus far are 'believers'] and shudder."

Now comes the appeal to Abraham:

> "Was not Abraham our father justified by works, when he had offered Isaac his son upon the altar? Seest thou how faith wrought with his works, and by works was faith made perfect? And the Scripture was fulfilled which saith, Abraham believed God and it was imputed unto him for righteousness, and he was called the Friend of God. Ye see then how that by works a man is justified, and not by faith only" (James ii. 21-24).

Note carefully what James actually says here. The supreme act of obedience on Mount Moriah "fulfilled" the Scripture which said that "Abraham believed God, and it was imputed unto him for righteousness", and showed to a demonstration that Abraham's faith was "living" and not "dead". Faith, says James, wrought with his works, and by these works faith was perfected—or brought to its goal or consummation. Wesley observes: "There is no contradiction between the apostle because: (1) They do not speak of the same faith; St. Paul speaking of a living faith, St. James here of a dead faith. (2) They do not speak of the same works; St. Paul speaking of works antecedent to faith, St. James of works subsequent to it." Abraham had "gone on unto perfection", he had reached his goal, he had finished his course, and attained to a crown, for he was called "the Friend of God". It is all a matter of "right division", for balanced truth is truth "rightly divided".

We trust that the application of this thought of "perfecting" will be made by the Spirit of Truth, as the reader ponders the doctrine of "perfecting" in Phil. iii., with its "prize" (Col. i. 28) and its "reward" (Col. ii. 18), together with Heb. xii. with its "race" and "joy", and James with its "crown of life". Any teacher who builds an argument upon a false comparison of James, with his "perfecting" and "crown", and Paul, with his justification of the ungodly, is building something which will not stand the test of "that day".

#9. The "presentation" and "inheritance" of Col. i. 22, 28 and Col. i. 12 & iii. 24 compared.

pp. 194 - 196

We have shown that to attempt to compare the teaching of James, concerning the "perfecting" of the believer, with Paul's concerning the justification of the ungodly, leads to confusion and false statements. The epistle to the Colossians provides an illustration of trying these "things that differ", for the false principles that we have seen would rob the reader of the truth of the epistle of James will, if applied here, rob him of the truth as taught by Paul in Colossians. We might take the word "present" that occurs twice in Col. i. One could take his stand upon verse 22 and repudiate the apostle's desire to present every man perfect that is found in verse 28. Another, coming upon verse 28 first, might conceivably criticize the doctrine of verse 22 as "dangerous", yet who can fail to see that both passages teach glorious truth, but two passages in the balance, in order that our faith may comprehend truth as a whole.

> "In the body of His flesh through death, to present you holy and unblameable and unreproveable in His sight" (Col. i. 22).
> "Warning every man, and teaching every man in all wisdom; that we may present every man perfect in Christ Jesus" (Col. i. 28).

Here are two separate statements. (1) Christ's presentation of the believer. (2) Paul's presentation of the believer. Christ's presentation is "in the body of His flesh through death", Paul's presentation is by "warning and teaching". Christ will present the believer "holy", Paul desires to present the same believer "perfect". These passages contain the only reference to peristemi in Colossians. Col. i. 22 is basic truth, and can give no place for "works", Col. i. 28, is subsequent truth, and contemplates the believer as amenable to "warning". Col. i. 22 is parallel with Paul's basic doctrine of justification by faith without works, and Col. i. 28 is comparable with James' teaching of the "perfecting" of faith by works, subsequent to salvation. In neither case is there contradiction, the subjects differ as do foundation from superstructure, or as root from fruit. Can "holiness" be perfected? The reader who is unacquainted with the epistles of Paul might conceivably answer this question with an emphatic negative. Yet he would be wrong, for Paul uses the very expression "perfecting holiness" (II Cor. vii. 1). If we turn aside for a moment to consider the context of this important expression, we shall better appreciate the intentions of the apostle in Col. i. 22-28.

II Cor. vi. 14 - vii. 1.

A1 | vi. 14, 16. No unequal yoke.
  B1 | vi. 16. Reason. Ye are Temple. I will dwell.
A2 | vi. 17. Separation.
  B2 | vi. 17, 18. Reason. I will receive, be a Father.
A3 | vii. 1. Perfecting holiness."

Throughout this passage Paul is dealing with believers, in contrast with unbelievers, urging them to act in harmony with their calling. They were "saints" (I Cor. i. 2), and this sanctification was theirs through Christ Who had been made unto them "sanctification" (I Cor. i. 30). It was complete and unalterable, and rested upon no merit, growth or godliness of the believer; all this is most evident in the epistle to the Corinthians, for these "saints" in themselves were guilty of most "unsaintly" conduct. The apostle did not and could not take away from these Corinthians, their sainthood, but he could and he did urge them to "perfect holiness", which in other words, was their own response to such a holy calling.

> "Let us cleanse ourselves from all filthiness of the flesh and spirit, perfecting holiness in the fear of God" (II Cor. vii. 1).

The position of the believer in Col. i. 22 is so gloriously complete, that the mind is overwhelmed at the very contemplation of that presentation which will place the erstwhile enemy and sinner "holy, unblameable and unreproveable" in the sight of God. The apostle, however, was not content that the believer should be thus sanctified by the death of Christ. He longed to see the "fruit of holiness", and so he warns them of the specious teaching, that is repudiated in Col. ii., which would beguile them of the reward which is associated with "perfecting" as in II Tim. iv., Phil. iii. and James. Supplementing the two "presentations" Col. i. 22 and 28, are the two "Inheritances" of Col. i. 12 and iii. 24. And again we have the same relationship and the same differences as we found in the two "presentations", and the two aspects of "justification", moreover we observe the same harmony when the principle of right division is applied.

> "Giving thanks unto the Father, which hath made us meet to be partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light" (Col. i. 12).
> "Knowing that of the Lord ye shall receive the reward of the inheritance: for ye serve the Lord Christ" (Col. iii. 24).

In the first instance, the work of grace is already accomplished. The Father "hath made us meet", He "hath delivered us", He "hath translated us". No works of ours can be admitted in any shape of form. In the second instance the atmosphere changes from acceptance through grace alone to that of the desirability of acceptable service. The words are addressed to "servants" who are exhorted to serve their earthly masters "as to the Lord", and that recognition of faithful service would be "the reward" of or pertaining to the inheritance.

In the presentation of Col. i. 22, it will be remembered, the reconciled sinner is to be presented, not only "holy", but "unblameable and unreproveable", but, the servant in Col. iii. is warned that > "He that doeth wrong shall receive for the wrong which he hath done: and there is no respect of persons" (Col. iii. 25).

Here "blame" and "reproof" come within the radius of the possible, just as surely as they are entirely outside the blessed scope of Col. i. 22. Both doctrines are compatible, both are truth, and the conjunction of the two, reasonable, salutary and right. Why cannot the same reasonableness be exercised when remoter comparisons are made, such as those between Romans and James, or between the doctrines of Hope and Prize?

#10. The Deity and Humanity of the Son of God.
pp. 236 - 238

If the doctrines of justification, sanctification and salvation can only be seen faithfully and accurately when placed in the balance of the sanctuary, even so does the doctrine of the Person of the Lord Jesus Christ, demand this even balance. Some of those who maintain the essential Deity of Christ, have gone beyond the words which the Holy Ghost teacheth, and intrude the "sonship" of Christ into that sphere and time, when He is denominated "The Word", "The Image" and "the Form" of God. Those who have emphasized His perfect Manhood have at times done so to the sacrifice of His essential Deity. Some, to maintain His Deity, have rendered His bodily presence unreal, others, in order that His humanity shall be fully perceived have sacrificed His sinlessness, and sought to make Him but another son of Adam. All these are aberrations from the truth, and the doctrine of the Lord's Person like all other doctrines of the Scriptures can only be perceived and understood when truth is seen in the balance. The subject, necessarily, is vast, and an adequate examination demands a study far transcending anything we can give, or the space we have available. This, however, must not deter us from pointing out some obvious passages, which show how balanced is this teaching of the Scriptures.

Let us open our study by a reference to the first chapter of the Gospel according to John. Suffice it for the moment to indicate the balance that is found in this one Gospel.

John's Gospel.
DEITY.	HUMANITY.
"The Word was God" (i. 1). "God . . ." "Before Abraham was, I am" (viii. 58). "My Lord and my God" (xx. 28).	"The Word became flesh" (i. 14). ". . . Only begotten" (i. 18, R.V. marg.). "Jesus therefore being wearied with His journey sat thus on the well" (iv. 6). "Behold My hands . . . My side" (xx. 27).

If John's Gospel only were before us, this list could be doubled and trebled. What has been given are examples of the mighty twofold truth. The Deity of the Lord is revealed without reserve or ambiguity. When John fell down at the foot of an angel in the attitude of worship, the angel said, yet the Saviour not only did not rebuke Thomas for ascribing full deity to Himself, He positively accepted it, granting a blessing upon all who "believe" though they may not have "seen". The Epistle to the Romans declares the same twofold truth.

> "See thou do it not . . . . . worship God" (Rev. xix. 10).

Romans.
DEITY.	HUMANITY.
"Who is over all, God blessed for ever" (ix. 5).	"The Seed of David according to the flesh" (i. 3). "Of Whom as concerning the flesh Christ came" (ix. 5).

Here again our present purpose prevents us from entering into a detailed examination of these passages. The reader will find Rom. ix. 5 discussed more fully in the series on the epistle to the Romans (Volume XXVII, pages 196-198). That Christ had a real humanity is proved by the two references given where the relationship of Christ is established between Israel, David and Himself "according to the flesh". The sinlessness of this humanity is safeguarded by the language used in Rom. viii. 3 where the apostle says that God sent "His Own Son in the likeness of sinful flesh". The epistle to the Hebrews, likewise balances this great doctrine.

Hebrews.
DEITY.	HUMANITY.
"Thy throne, O God" (i. 8).	"Therefore God, even Thy God, hath anointed Thee with the oil of gladness above Thy fellows" (i. 9). "Forasmuch then as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, He also Himself likewise took part of the same, that through death He might destroy him that had the power of death, that is, the devil" (ii. 14).

Here again, as in John i., He Who is "God" and the Maker of all things, was made "flesh" for our sakes and for our sins. The fact that Christ as "God manifest in the flesh" is the pivot upon which His Deity and His Humanity balance, is well illustrated by the structure of I Timothy.

B | i. 17. The King, incorruptible, invisible (i. 17).
E | iii. 15, 16. The MYSTERY of GODLINESS.
B | vi. 15, 16. King, immortal, unseen (vi. 15, 16).

I Timothy.
i. 17.	vi. 15, 16.
"The King . . . incorruptible, invisible, the only God."	"King of kings . . . Who only hath immortality . . . Whom no man hath seen, nor can see."
iii. 16.
"The mystery of godliness God was manifest in the flesh."

The reader will be aware that there is a great controversy as to the true reading of I Tim. iii. 16. This matter is discussed in a separate series of articles in the Berean Expositor, which should be consulted by the interested reader. For our present purpose it will be enough to see how the truth of chapters i. and vi. find their true resolution in the Person of Christ "God manifest in the flesh", for in both chapters i. and vi. He is declared to be "invisible". Paul therefore can teach that there is "One God" and "One Mediator", the "Man" Christ Jesus, when he writes to Timothy (I Tim. ii. 5), and nevertheless declare in the contemporary epistle to Titus, that the Lord Jesus Christ is "The Great God and our Saviour".

Titus.
GOD.	JESUS CHRIST.
"The commandment of God our Saviour" (i. 3). "The doctrine of God our Saviour" (ii. 10). "The love of God our Saviour" (iii. 4).	"The Lord Jesus Christ our Saviour" (i. 4). "Looking for the blessed hope, and appearing of the glory of our great God and Saviour Jesus Christ" (ii. 13, 14, R.V.). "Through Jesus Christ our Saviour" (iii. 6).

This essential Deity and perfect Humanity, in the Person of Jesus Christ, is implied in the title "The Son of God". So, John, who opens with the twofold revelation of the Word "Who was God", "Who became flesh" (John i. 1, 14), tells us that the purpose he had when writing his gospel was,

"That ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God" (John xx. 31).

Romans declares Him to be "The Son of God" (Rom. i. 4); Hebrews, which gives Him the title of "God" in chapter i., tells us that He partook of flesh and blood in chapter ii. and emphasizes the glory of His title "The Son" a title intended to combine both phases of truth (Heb. i. 2, 5, 8).

The very unity of the faith, is the acknowledgment or recognition of the Son of God (Eph. iv. 13)*. The Deity and the Humanity of Christ are pivoted upon His Sonship, which must not be considered independently of the Deity on the one hand, for that makes Him a mere man like ourselves, nor of the Humanity on the other hand, for that removes Him entirely from our sphere and we are left without a Redeemer or a Mediator. Truth in the balance is the only truth that honours the Scriptures and their revelation concerning the person of our glorious Lord.

[NOTE: * - For an examination of epignosis and Eph. iv. 13, the reader is directed to a series of studies entitled "Acknowledgment".]

To take the word "My Father is greater than I" as a "proof" that the speaker was not "our great God" as well as "our Saviour", is to take truth out of the balance, and to misapply the relationship of the "Son" with the "Father" in order to demonstrate an entirely different relation, namely that of both the Son and the Father to essential Deity. It is equally possible having commenced with a text which taught that Christ is God, to prove, though erroneously, that as there is "one God", the Father must be excluded. This terrible possibility is happily not attempted and the converse misunderstanding concerning "The Son" is illuminated by keeping this blessed "truth in the balance".

Worship.

#5. Worship due to God as "Our Maker" (Psa. xcv. 6).
pp. 57 - 60

We have seen something of the nature of the worship that was offered by Israel, and we have learned from the testimony of the New Testament to shun all "carnal ordinances" because of their inability to touch the conscience or to please the Lord. We have also seen that true worship can be offered only by the free. With this knowledge in head and heart, we can now turn to the Old Testament, and learn some of the essential features of true worship, for there were, even in O.T. times, men of God who saw beyond the shadows and perceived the more excellent way.

It cannot be accidental that the first reference to "worship" found in the Bible is far removed from ceremonial. If the place where this worship was offered be deemed a holy place, it is only so because of what transpired there, not because it was holy in itself. Here we have a sacrifice without a priest, and an altar without a temple. The offerer is a father, and the offering his beloved and only son. This first reference to worship is a record of perfected faith, offered to God in a place far from the haunts of men, far from the courts of a temple, and yet a worship as near to the true and the ideal as the Old Testament can shew.

"I and the lad will go yonder and worship" (Gen. xxii. 5).

A priest and a sacrificial victim are essential for Israel's worship, but here at the beginning the place of the priest is occupied by a "Father", and the place of the sacrifice by a beloved "Son".

For further light on the spiritual elements in Old Testament worship we turn to the Psalms, which record experiences too deep for ritual to reach, and too high for ceremonial to clog. In Psalm xcv. 6 we have the thought of worship rendered to God as our MAKER:

> "O come, let us worship and bow down: let us kneel before the Lord our Maker" (Psa. xcv. 6).

We sincerely hope that not a few of our readers will be critical enough to pause at this passage, and wonder why we did not include it in Articles 2 and 3 of this series in the list of references connecting "worship" with "bowing". The reason is this. Qadad means to "bow the head", but the word used in Psalm xcv. 6 is kara, meaning "to bow the knee". In its verbal form it is used in I Kings viii. 54 for the act of "kneeling", and in the plural form keraayim it is translated "legs" in Exod. xii. 9. The plural form also occurs in the curious definition in Lev. xi. 21—"which have legs above their feet, to leap withal upon the earth". Parkhurst renders the phrase: "Which have benders or crouching joints above their feet or lower part of their legs." The verse that follows in Lev. xi. speaks of such creatures as locusts and grasshoppers, the "knees" of which are very prominent. To "bow the knee" is an act of worship (I Kings xix. 18; II Chron vi. 13), and it is this act of adoration that shall one day be paid by all to the Lord (Isa. xlv. 23, Phil. ii. 10). The Apostle Paul, too, writes, "I bow my knees unto the Father" (Eph. iii. 14). We must not, however, allow ourselves to be diverted to the question of attitude in prayer; this we may perhaps consider later in these studies.

The call in Psalm xcv. is to worship and kneel before the Lord our Maker. This is worship in its most fundamental aspect. Because God is our Maker, man is a responsible being. Because man was made in the image of his Maker, worship becomes possible. To withhold worship at this initial step is to commence the downward path indicated in Rom. i. 19-23. Worship of the Creator constitutes the "everlasting gospel" that will be preached at the time of the end (Rev. xiv. 7).

Eliphaz the Temanite ascribes "purity" to his Maker (Job iv. 17), while Elihu, the son of Barachel confesses that, if he gave flattering titles to man, his Maker would soon take him away (Job xxxii. 22). The titles "Maker" and "Holy One of Israel" are linked by Isaiah and he declares that in the day that is coming "a man shall look to his Maker . . . . . and shall not look to the altars, the work of his hands" (Isa. xvii. 7, 8). Again, the Lord through Isaiah says:

> "I, even I, am He that comforteth you; who art thou, that thou shouldest be afraid of a man that shall die, and of the son of man which shall be made as grass; and forgettest the Lord thy Maker, that hath stretched forth the heavens, and laid the foundations of the earth . . . . .?" (Isa. li. 12, 13).

When at last Israel are restored, and shall not remember the reproach of their "widowhood" any more, the reason given is that > "thy Maker is thine husband; the Lord of hosts is His name; and thy Redeemer the Holy One of Israel; the God of the whole earth shall He be called" (Isa. liv. 4, 5).

Ecclesiastes exhorts the young man to remember his Creator in the days of his youth (Eccles. xii. 1), and Peter encourages the persecuted believer with the words: "Wherefore let them that suffer according to the will of God commit the keeping of their souls to Him in well doing, as unto a faithful Creator" (I Pet. iv. 19).

The recognition of these things constitutes the first step in a worship that advances in spirituality as the relationship to God grows closer, until it eventually becomes the worship of the Father by His emancipated children. This worship is not without its temple, its songs, and its celebrants. The floods "clap their hands", as do "all the trees" (Psa. xcviii. 8; Isa. lv. 12). The heavens are called upon to sing, and the earth to be joyful (Isa. xlix. 13). When David brings the Ark to "the city of David", he sings to the Lord a Psalm of praise, in which not only Israel are called upon to join, but the heavens also are said to be "glad", the earth and the fields to "rejoice", the sea to "roar", and the trees of the wood to "sing out" at the presence of the Lord (I Chron. xvi. 31-33). Psalm cxlviii. is a call to the heavens, the angels, sun, moon and stars, the earth, dragons and all deeps, fire and hail, snow and vapours, stormy wind fulfilling His word, mountains and all hills, fruitful trees and all cedars, beasts, cattle, creeping things and flying fowl, to swell the anthem of praise that ascends to God our Maker.

A sense of awe, and of personal insignificance is never far removed from the worship associated with the wonders of "Nature". This is very evident in the closing chapters of the book of Job.

> "Where wast thou when I laid the foundations of the earth? declare, if thou hast understanding" (Job xxxviii. 4).

With these words the Lord begins to answer Job, and for four lengthy chapters, Creation in its height and depth, its wonder and its variety, the stars that form the distant Pleiades, the crystals that form the tiny snowflake, the ordinances of day and night, the wonders of storm and rain, the animal creation with its marvelous instinct, all these are brought before Job by his Maker, and at the conclusion he has to say, "I have heard of Thee by the hearing of the ear; but now mine eye seeth Thee. Wherefore I abhor myself, and repent in dust and ashes" (Job xlii. 5, 6).

There are some who affect an indifference to the wonder and beauty of "Nature", feeling perhaps that they belong to a sphere that lies outside that of redeeming love. For a Christian to rise no higher than the wonders of "Nature" in his praise of the Lord is certainly to be deplored, but for a Christian not to be moved by the evidences of the hand of the Lord in creation means that God is deprived of some of the glory due to His name. Let the believer but begin to examine any part of the great creation around him, and he will soon be compelled to bow before the Lord his Maker. A busy hive of bees, the development of the chick in the egg, the wonders of crystallization, the marvels of chemical affinity, the use of light in vision, the phenomena of colour, of spectrum analysis, of therapy, of chemistry—all these things provide and endless cause for praise and worship.

> "The heavens declare the glory of God; and the firmament showeth His handiwork" (Psa. xix. 1).
> "The works of the Lord are great, sought out of all them that have pleasure therein . . . . . He hath made His wonderful works to be remembered . . . . . He sent redemption unto His people: He hath commanded His covenant for ever: holy and reverend is His name" (Psa. cxi. 2, 4, 9).

Here there is a most evident connection between Creation and Redemption: "He hath given meat unto them that fear Him; He will ever be mindful of His covenant" (Psa. cxi. 5). His covenant may include much more than the "meat that perisheth", but it includes no less, for without the basic things of life all other and higher things would be impossible. The twenty-four elders before the rainbow-circled throne may sing their new song of redemption, but this is followed by another song, of which part might well have been sung by the morning stars at Creation's dawn:

> "And every creature which is in heaven, and on the earth, and under the earth, and such as are in the sea, and all that are in them, heard I saying, Blessing, and honour, and glory, and power, be unto Him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb for ever and ever" (Rev. v. 9-14).

> "Thou art worthy, O Lord, to receive glory and honour and power: for Thou hast created all things, and for Thy pleasure they are and were created" (Rev. iv. 11).

Without a Creator in full control, the glorious consummation of the ages could not be reached. The Book of the Revelation, which reveals some of the steps towards this goal, speaks of a new heaven and a new earth (Rev. xxi. 1), which demand the great Creator as surely as they did "in the beginning". The same book also speaks of the "everlasting gospel" that will be preached at the time of the end:

> "The everlasting gospel . . . . . Fear God, and give glory to Him; for the hour of His judgment is come: and worship Him that made heaven, and earth, and the sea, and the fountains of waters" (Rev. xiv. 6, 7).

Returning to the Psalm which supplied our text (Psa. xcv.) we observe that it falls into two parts. The first part (verse 1-7) is a call to worship "our Maker"; the second part (verses 8-11) a reminder of Israel's failure in the wilderness—two aspects of truth that at first do not seem very closely related. The link is found in the words, "Your fathers . . . . . proved Me, and saw My work", for unless the Lord had been also the Creator, how could Israel have survived that forty years' ordeal? Who but God could have fed the multitude for such a time in the wilderness?

We will conclude this article with the full quotation of Psalm xcv. 1-7:

> "O come, let us sing unto the Lord: let us make a joyful noise to the rock of our salvation. Let us come before His presence with thanksgiving, and make a joyful noise unto Him with Psalms. For the Lord is a great God, and a great King above all gods. In His hand are the deep places of the earth: the strength of the hills is His also. The sea is His, and He made it: and His hands formed the dry land. O come, let us worship, and bow down: let us kneel before the Lord our Maker. For He is our God; and we are the people of His pasture, and the sheep of His hand."

#6. Worship in the beauty of holiness. Psa. xcvi.
pp. 97 - 99

Psalm xcv. opens with a call to "sing"; Psalm xcvi. begins with a call to "sing unto the Lord a new song". The call to worship in the second of these two Psalms is given in verse 9: "O worship the Lord in the beauty of holiness."

There is an intended contrast here with the "gods of the nations" in verse 5, and in verse 4 we read: "The Lord is great, and greatly to be praised: He is to be feared above all gods."

The expression "the beauty of holiness" is one of the gems of the A.V., and at first sight is so crystal-clear, that it almost seems sacrilege to examine it. The Margin gives as an alternative rendering, "In the glorious sanctuary", and the expression is found in Psalm xxix. 2, II Chron. xx. 21, I Chron. xvi. 29, and (in the plural: "The beauties of holiness") in Psalm cx. 3. How then are we to construe this phrase? Do the words pertain to God? Do they imply that when we worship Him, we must remember His essential holiness? It is certainly true that we must do this, but this may not be the meaning intended in this particular passage.

The Septuagint translators render the passage: Proskunesate to Kurio en aule hagia autou, "Worship the Lord in His holy court". A very similar version is given in I Chron. xvi. 29, but in Psalm cx. 3, where the word "beauty" is in the plural, their translation is En tais lamprotesi ton hagion sou, "In the splendour of Thy saints". In II Chron. xx. 21 the translation is different again: "And he took counsel with the people, and set appointed men to sing psalms and praises, to give thanks, and sing the holy songs of praise in going forth before the host". It is evident from this variety of renderings that the words of the original need careful attention.

The word translated "beauty" is the Hebrew hadarah, a feminine form of hadar, which meant primarily "to adorn, decorate or deck", as in Isa. lxiii. 1: "Glorious in His apparel." The idea of "clothing" comes again in Psalm civ. 1: "Thou art clothed with honour (beauty) and majesty", and also in Ezek. xvi., where the word is translated "comeliness" (verse 14). In this chapter of Ezekiel we have an extended use of the figure of clothing:

> "I clothed thee also with broidered work, and shod thee with badgers' skins, and I girded thee about with fine linen, and I covered thee with silk. I decked thee also with ornaments, and I put bracelets upon thy hands, and a chain on thy neck . . . . . and thy renown went forth among the heathen for thy beauty: for it was perfect through My comeliness (Hebrew hadar, 'beauty') which I had put upon thee, saith the Lord God" (Ezek. xvi. 10-14).

In Exod. xxviii. we read of the "holy garments for Aaron",—garments "for glory and for beauty"—comprising "a breastplate, and an ephod, and a robe, and a broidered coat, a mitre, and a girdle" for ministering in the priest's office (Exod. xxviii. 2-4). The word translated "beauty" here is different from the word used in Psalm cxvi., but the intention is much the same.

Throughout Scripture, clothing is symbolic. We read of "garments of salvation, and the robe of righteousness" (Isa. lxi. 10), while in Isa. lii. 1 restored Jerusalem is exhorted to "put on" her "beautiful garments". The bridegroom is expected to deck himself with ornaments, and the bride to adorn herself with jewels, and these are used as symbols of higher things. Job speaks of putting on righteousness—"and it clothed me" (Job xxix. 14), and the Lord Himself is said to "put on the garments of vengeance for clothing", and to be "clad with zeal as a cloke" (Isa. lix. 17).

When we come to the N.T., we find this figure in full use. Enduo, often translated "put on", is also translated "clothe with", "be clothed", and "be arrayed"; while enduma is translated "clothing", "garment" and "raiment". So, the believer is said to have "put on" Christ (Gal. iii. 27), and to have "put on" the new man (Eph. iv. 24). He is also exhorted to "put on" the armour of light (Rom. xiii. 12), to "put on" the Lord Jesus Christ (Rom. xiii. 14), and to "put on" the whole armour of God (Eph. vi. 11). These are the spiritual equivalents of the garments described in the O.T., and when the Psalmist speaks of worshiping "in the beauty of holiness", he approximates to the Lord's own words when He declares that the "true worshippers" must worship the Father "in spirit and in truth".

Acceptable worship can only be offered by those who are clothed with the righteousness of God which is by faith and, as Peter says, "clothed with humility" (I Pet. v. 5)—boasting in Christ, but finding no grounds of boasting in themselves.

The "beauty" in which the worshipper is clothed is "the beauty of holiness", for the God he worships "sitteth upon the throne of His holiness" (Psa. xlvii. 8), and has declared that "holiness becometh His house" (Psa. xciii. 5). Twice the Psalmist calls upon the worshipper to "give thanks at the remembrance of His holiness" (Psa. xxx. 4 and xcvii. 12).

Qodesh, the Hebrew word translated "holiness", is also rendered "consecrated", "dedicated", "hallowed", "saint" and "sanctuary". All true worship recognizes the significance of the opening sentence in "the Lord's prayer"—"Our Father, Which art in heaven, hallowed be Thy name". All acceptable worship must involve "dedication", even as in the type and shadow (I Chron. xxvi.20). All true worship must be offered in the Sanctuary; not in a sanctuary that could be called "worldly" (Heb. ix. 1), but in that sanctuary which is the "true tabernacle, which the Lord pitched, and not man" (Heb. viii. 2). All that Israel had in type and symbol, we have in its perfection in Christ. Our "place of worship" is where Christ sits at the right hand of God, our garments are of His blessed provision, and are all of grace. He Himself takes the place of altar, sacrifice, priest, incense, vestments: to introduce any of these shadows now in our worship would be to ruin its spirituality.

Psal xcv. calls upon us to worship the Lord our "Maker"; Psalm xcvi. calls upon us to worship Him in the "beauty of holiness". Between these two conceptions of worship lies the cross of Christ, His death, His burial, and His resurrection. We must be "new creatures" before we can have any place where holiness dwells, but, blessed be God, we know that Christ has been made unto us "wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption" (I Cor. i. 30).

#7. Worship and the exaltation of the Lord.
pp. 137 - 140

In Psalm xcix. 5 and 9, we read:

> "Exalt ye the Lord our God, and worship at His footstool; for He is holy."
> "Exalt ye the Lord our God, and worship at His holy hill; for the Lord our God is holy."

This Psalm is one of a series that speak of the coming King, and find their fulfillment in that day when "The kingdoms of this world become the kingdom of our Lord and of His Christ" (Rev. xi. 15). Psalms xciii., xcvii. and xcix., open with the announcement, "The Lord reigneth". Psalm xcv. says, "The Lord is a great God, and a great king above all gods" (verse 3). Psalm xcvi. would have the good news of the kingdom proclaimed among the nations: "Say among the heathen that the Lord reigneth" (verse 10). In Psalm xcviii. all the earth is called upon to make a joyful noise unto the Lord, "With trumpets and sound of cornet make a joyful noise before the Lord, the King".

There is an emphasis in Psalm xcix. on the awful holiness of God:

> "The Lord reigneth; let the people tremble. He sitteth between the cherubim, let the earth be moved" (Psa. xcix. 1).

He has a "terrible name" for "it is holy" (verse 3). Again at the end of verse 5 and verse 9 there is an insistence upon His holiness. His almighty power is allied to and always used with judgment. With God "right is might" and never "might is right". His mercy is great, for He is a God that forgives, yet at the same time He took vengeance upon the inventions that, at times, even the best of His servants superimposed upon the ordinances which they had received (verse 8). The correspondence of verses 5 and 9 indicates that "His holy hill" is His footstool. In I Chron. xxviii., "the ark of the covenant" is called the footstool of God, and in Psalm cxxxii. 7 "His footstool" is found "in His tabernacles", the plural form of majesty being used here, as in Heb. ix. 24, "the holy places". In Isa. lxvi. 1, the earth is said to be His footstool. These are not contradictions, but revelations. In connection with His manifest presence "between the cherubim" the ark would be His footstool, but when we learn that the Lord's throne is heaven, then the wide earth itself becomes His footstool: it is a matter of proportion in the particular sphere concerned.

In this Psalm the special feature in connection with worship is the twice-repeated call to "exalt" the Lord. In verse 2 the psalmist says "He is high above all people", where the words "high above" translate the same Hebrew word that is translated "exalt". This word is Rum, and enters into the name Abram, "high or exalted father". False worship ends in the exaltation of self, true worship in the exaltation of the Lord. This element of false worship can be seen in the import of such a passage as Isa. xiv.:

> "For thou hast said in thine heart, I will ascend into heaven, I will exalt my throne above the star of God . . . I will ascend . . . I will be like the Most High" (Isa. xiv. 13).

Even so is it written of the "man of sin", the "son of perdition":

> "who opposeth and exalteth himself above all that is called God or worshipped, so that he as God sitteth in the temple of God, showing himself that he is God" (II Thess. ii. 4).

We have a foreshadowing of this blasphemous worship in Dan. iii. 1, where we read of the image made by Nebuchadnezzar, whose height (rum) was three-score cubits. The same word is repeated in Dan. iv. where the figure changes to a green tree. Its "height" (rum) is spoken of in verses 10, 11 and 20, its "height reached unto the heaven". It is comforting to remember the sequel, however. Nebuchadnezzar was brought to recognize the truth, for he said after his restoration:

> "I, Nebuchadnezzar, praise and extol (rum) and honour the king of heaven" (Dan. iv. 37).

Belshazzar is reminded of this by Daniel:

> "When his heart was lifted up, and his mind hardened in pride, he was deposed from his kingly throne, and they took his glory from him . . . . . And thou his son, O Belshazzar, hast not humbled thine heart, though thou knewest all this; but hast lifted up (rum) thyself against the Lord of heaven" (Dan. v. 20, 23).

Worship, false or true, is never far from the record of Scripture, and, here, worship and "exaltation", both false and true, are what is stressed.

Leaving such extreme cases, let us look at one or two references in the Psalms that may help us to see the way in which the exalting of the Lord in His varied relationships with the redeemed is related to worship.

1. Worship and a sense of utter need.

> "Hear my cry, O God; attend unto my prayer. From the end of the earth will I cry unto Thee, when my heart is overwhelmed: lead me to the rock that is higher (rum) than I" (Psa. lxi. 1, 2).

Here all ground of boasting in self has disappeared. Prayer is a "cry"; the place of prayer is "the end of the earth"; the condition in which prayer is made is a heart "overwhelmed"; the one desire is to be led to the Rock that is higher than man. There follow words like "shelter", "strong tower", "abide" and "refuge" (margin) which show that the prayer has been answered. After the pause, "selah", comes worship. Instead of "Hear my cry", the Psalmist now says, "Thou hast heard my vow" and the Psalm finishes with the words, "So will I sing praise unto Thy name for ever; that I may daily perform my vows" (Psalm lxi. 5-8).

2. Worship and deliverance.

> "O magnify the Lord with me, and let us exalt His name together" (Psa. xxxiv. 3).

This exaltation of the name of the Lord is called for because of the deliverance experienced by the Psalmist.

> "I sought the Lord, and He heard me, and delivered me from all my fears . . . . . This poor man cried, and the Lord heard him, and saved him out of all his troubles. The angel of the Lord encampeth round about them that fear Him, and delivereth them . . . . . the righteous cry and the Lord heareth, and delivereth them out of all their troubles" (Psa. xxxiv. 4, 6, 7, 17).

3. Worship and lowliness of heart.

> "Though the Lord be high (rum) yet hath He respect unto the lowly; but the proud He knoweth afar off" (Psa. cxxxviii. 6).

Here the exaltation of the Lord, and the humility of the worshipper are brought together, and worship is the result.

> "I will praise Thee with my whole heart; before the gods will I sing praise unto Thee. I will worship toward Thy holy temple, and praise Thy name for Thy lovingkindness and for Thy truth" (verse 2).

This meeting of extremes in grace, is found in other places of Scripture. For example Isaiah says:

> "For thus saith the high (rum) and lofty One that inhabiteth eternity, whose name is Holy; I dwell in the high (marum) and holy place, with him also that is of a contrite and humble spirit" (Isa. lvii. 15).

4. Worship, goodness and the wonderful works of the Lord.

Psalm cvii. has a refrain that comes four times over:

> "Oh that men would praise the Lord for His goodness, and for His wonderful works to the children of men" (Psa. cvii. 8, 15, 21 and 31).

This fourfold call to praise, follows a fourfold description of human need and Divine deliverance. First we have "wanderers" seeking a city to dwell in, but, finding none, in their trouble they cried to the Lord and He delivered them out of all their distresses (verses 4-7). Next follows a reference to "rebels" so reduced that there is none to help, shut in by gates of brass, and bars of iron. These, too, cried to the Lord in their trouble, and they, too, were saved out of their distresses (verses 10-16). The third company are "fools", whose folly brings them near to the gates of death. These, too, are healed by His word and delivered. It is noteworthy that the word "distresses" is here exchanged for "destructions" (compare verses 6, 13, 28 with 20). Fourthly, "They that go down to the sea in ships", who "are at their wits' end".

Gathering up this fourfold call to praise, the Psalmist adds, "Let them exalt Him also in the congregation of the people".

5. Worship and the exalted Saviour.

> "In the year that king Uzziah died I saw also the Lord sitting upon a throne, high (rum) and lifted up, and His train filled the temple" (Isa. vi. 1).

Above this throne stood the seraphim, with veiled faces. The prophet heard the Trisagion, "Holy, Holy, Holy", and cried, "Woe is me". John, writing later, assures us that when Isaiah saw this vision he spoke of the Saviour:

> "These things saith Isaiah when he saw His glory, and spake of Him" (John xii. 41).

True worship must ever have, in perfect combination, this sense of utter unworthiness and inability on the part of the worshipper, and the exalted position and high glory of the Lord. The Saviour Who died for us, not only rose again from the dead, but has been "highly exalted" and it is the purpose of God that, one day, at that exalted name, "every knee shall bow and every tongue confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father" (Phil. ii. 10, 11). Let us anticipate that day by honouring Him, by exalting Him in our hearts, for He indeed is worthy, and worship, as we have seen, is the ascription of "worthy-ship" to the Lord as His due.

> "Thy mercy is great above the heavens . . . . . Be Thou exalted, (rum), O God, above the heavens: and Thy glory above all the earth" (Psa. cviii. 5).
>
> "Seek those things which are above, where Christ sitteth at the right hand of God" (Col. iii. 1).

#8. References to Worship in the Gospel.
pp. 196 - 199

While there are further lessons awaiting us in the O.T. settings of the word "worship", it is time we turned to the N.T., for while there are certain basic truths concerning worship that no dispensational changes can alter, the worship that is now acceptable differs in many ways from that enjoined by Moses, David and Solomon. There are several words translated "worship" in the N.T. but it is worth remembering that Proskuneo is never translated in any other way, and as this is the word we are considering, there will be no alternative renderings to keep in mind. Christ is the object of worship in the Gospels on eleven occasions, but this fact must not be misunderstood. While the same word is used each time, the intention of the worshipper varies considerably and it is both useful and necessary to our study for us to examine these references. One passage we can dismiss immediately, is Herod's request to the wise men concerning their quest for the infant Christ, "When ye have found him, bring me word again, that I may come and worship Him" (Matt. ii. 8). The only contribution this passage makes is that Herod realized that "worship" was not too high a word to use of this new-born King. Of the other acts of worship recorded in the Gospels, we have:

(1) The wise men from the East (Matt. ii.). Three references.
(2) The leper (Matt. viii.).
(3) The ruler (Matt. ix.).
(4) The disciples (Matt. xiv.).
(5) The woman of Canaan (Matt. xv.).
(6) The mother of Zebedee's children (Matt. xx.).
(7) The women (Matt. xxviii.).

(8) The disciples (Matt. xxviii.).
(9) The man born blind (John ix.).
(10) In the parable of the unforgiving servant, the Lord depicts the approach of that servant to the king in the words "the servant therefore, fell down and worshipped him" (Matt. xviii. 26).

In this last case, the word means that the servant "did homage" before the king, not that he offered idolatrous worship. The same thing may be said of some of the occasions when worship was offered to Christ. In the case of the cleansing of the leper, recorded in Matt. viii., the leper calls the Saviour "Lord" and "worships" Him. In the same chapter the centurion calls Him "Lord", but does not worship Him, though he exhibits a faith such as had not, till then, been seen in Israel. We have no warrant from Matt. viii. 2 for believing that the leper pierced the veil of His flesh and perceived the Saviour's deity. He merely offered the customary act of homage that a Jew would make but which a Roman soldier would probably withhold. The same must be said of the worship offered by the woman of Canaan. Again, when the mother of Zebedee's children came to make her request, she naturally did homage, but there is no reason to believe that her act of "worship" was of a deeper character.

There are, however, a few instances of worship offered to the Son of God, that go beyond this mere token of respect. These are the worship of the wise men, the worship of the disciples after the resurrection, and the worship of the man born blind. Let us examine these. The wise men who came from the East declared that they had come to seek Him Who had been born King of the Jews, for they had "seen His star in the East" and had come "to worship Him" (Matt. ii. 2). They stood by while their guidance by the star was confirmed by the quotation from the prophet Micah, and then, following the star, came to the house where they saw the young Child with Mary His mother. There they fell down and worshipped Him, and opening their treasures, presented Him with gifts, gold, and frankincense and myrrh (Matt. ii. 11). Being "warned of God in a dream" not to return to Herod they departed to their own country another way.

The translation "wise men" is insufficiently specific. The word thus translated is usually sophos, but here, in Matt. ii., Magos, a word of Hebrew origin, is employed. This name is used throughout the east, especially in Persia for a sect of philosophers who studied astronomy and natural philosophy; who abhorred the adoration of images and worshipped but one God. Their doctrines are said to have been derived from Abraham, and, also, from Daniel, who received the title "Master of the Magicians" (Dan. iv. 9). Historians indicate there was at the time a feeling of expectancy in the east of the near advent of an extraordinary personage. These magi declared that they had "seen His star in the east", but it is evident from the record in Matthew that they had temporarily lost sight of the star, hence their questions, and their outbreak of joy when the star once more become visible. Many different explanations have been offered to account for this heavenly phenomenon. Some make elaborate calculations and show that about this time significant conjunctions of the planet took place, but no conjunction of the planets can be made to harmonize with the words of verse 9, that the star "went before them, till it came and stood over where the young child was". Movement and rest are most definitely predicated of this star, which would therefore appear to have been a celestial luminary of a special order provided by God for the guidance of these men, hence its appearance in such a way as to confirm their expectations, and lead them to the feet of the Saviour. Although Mary was present on the arrival of the magi, their worship is offered to the Babe, and not the mother. The offering of gold, frankincense and myrrh anticipates Psalm lxxii. 10 and Isa. lx. 6. Men thus divinely led; who heard the confirmation of their quest from one of the prophets of old and who "fell down and worshipped" a babe—these men rendered no ordinary act of homage; their worship was deeper; they must have recognized in this Child of Bethlehem, not only a future King of the Jews, but heaven's King, yea, the King of kings, and by their act of worship anticipated the submission and offering of the Gentile world in "that day". While all this may be true, there is little guidance in the record as to what constitutes Christian worship to-day, so we pass on to other references.

The worship of the Magi was offered soon after the birth of Christ; the worship of the disciples recorded in Matt. xxviii. was offered after His resurrection.

> "And as they went to tell His disciples, behold, Jesus met them, saying, All hail. And they came and held Him by the feet and worshipped Him."
>
> "And when they saw Him, they worshipped Him: but some doubted" (Matt. xxviii. 9, 17).

Bengel's comment on verse 9 is:—"Before His passion, Jesus had been worshipped by strangers, rather than by His disciples". It is evident that this prostration at the feet of the risen Christ marks a new attitude on the part of the disciples, but there is no evidence from the context that His deity was then recognized and acknowledged. Thomas reached that stage of conviction when at length he exchanged his doubts for a full recognition of the Lord's deity, saying, "My Lord and my God" (John xx. 28) and we can but believe that, subsequently, those who "doubted" (Matt. xxviii. 17) were, also, likewise, convinced. Personal conviction is more evident in the case of the man born blind, as recorded in John ix. Under the stress both of the miracle which had been wrought, and the consequent opposition which it aroused in the hearts of the religious leaders, he advanced from the simple recognition that his Healer was "A man that is called Jesus" (John ix. 11) to a higher recognition. Upon being pressed, his faith grew, for his next answer to the question "What sayest thou of Him, that he hath opened thine eyes?" he said, "He is a prophet" (John ix. 17). Opposition now intensified, and the Pharisees charged the Saviour with being a sinner. This, with the growing conviction of faith, the man born blind rebuts, and reasons "If this man were not of God, he could do nothing" (John ix. 33). For so speaking, the man was cast out. The Lord then found him and put to him the question, "Dost thou believe on the Son of God?" It is a splendid tribute to this man's clear sightedness, that he did not immediately fall down at the feet of the Saviour, but, rather, desired fuller knowledge that his faith might be rational. The Lord recognized this and supplied the needed information, saying, "Thou hast both seen Him, and it is He that talketh with thee". This was plain testimony. He Who had opened the eyes of the man's physical nature, now illuminated the eyes of his understanding. The response was immediate and complete: "Lord, I believe. And he worshipped Him" (John ix. 35-38).

This incident brings us nearer to Christian worship than any passage we have hitherto considered. This act of worship was not the product of sudden fear or great joy in the presence of some awe-inspiring spectacle. It was slowly built up, steadily approached, and calmly acknowledged. The steps in it are indicated by the growing acknowledgment, "A man", "A prophet", "The Son of God". One more passage in John's Gospel speaks of worship, but we reserve consideration of John iv. for the next article.

#9. "Neither in this mountain, nor yet in Jerusalem" (John iv. 21).

pp. 242 - 246

It is extraordinary at first sight to think that the Saviour condescended to discuss the matter of "worship" with a poor sinful Samaritan woman, but said nothing about it to "the master of Israel", Nicodemus, who would have been so much better qualified to discuss the matter. When, however, we remember that the flesh profiteth nothing, that Nicodemus was no more able to appreciate the nature of true worship than the Samaritan woman we recognize the workings of grace and with bowed hearts prepare to read once more concerning true worship in a truer frame of mind.

The revelation of the Samaritan woman's private life, caused her to pause and to say "Sir I perceive that Thou art a prophet", but whether the sudden introduction of the highly controversial subject of worship was made by her in an attempt to prevent any further reference to her private life, or whether being convinced both of her own sinfulness and the fact that she stood in the presence of One Who could enlighten her on such a subject, we may never know; possibly the woman's motives, like so many of our own were mixed.

Whatever be the truth of the matter, the Saviour most graciously allowed the new subject full scope, and the subsequent record made by John has provided us with, perhaps, the most comprehensive statement as to the nature of true worship that the New Testament contains. The thought uppermost in this woman's mind was the correct "place" where worship should be offered.

> "Our fathers worshipped in this mountain; and ye say, that in Jerusalem is the place where men ought to worship" (John iv. 20).

As readers of the New Testament unconsciously adopt the attitude of the Jew when thinking of the Samaritans, it may be useful to record a few outstanding features concerning them, especially those bearing upon the matter of worship. The Samaritans have four basic tenets of belief.

I. That Jehovah alone is God. II. That Moses alone is the Law-giver. III. That the Torah (the five books of Moses) is the only divine book, and IV. Mount Gerizim is the only house of God.

The Samaritans observe the Sabbath and the rite of circumcision. They do not observe all the feasts of Israel, but do observe Passover; Unleavened Bread; Pentecost; The Rosh hashanah the commencement of the civil year (Lev. xxiii. 24); Yom Kippur, the Day of Atonement, and the Feast of Tabernacles. Mount Gerizim is the holy place in the estimation of the Samaritans, and it is spoken of with reverence, and always with some such title as "the house of God", "the house of Jehovah", "the mountain of the world", "God's mountain", "The Sanctuary", "The mountain of the Divine presence". We can perhaps the better understand the words of the woman of Samaria when she said "Our fathers worshipped in this mountain". She had already claimed Jacob as her "father" (John iv. 12), and knew the coming of the Messiah (John iv. 25).

Before discussing the relative merits of Samaria and Jerusalem as the "place" where worship should be offered, the Saviour set both aside by saying,

> "Woman, believe Me, the hour cometh, when ye shall neither in this mountain, nor yet at Jerusalem, worship the Father" (John iv. 21).

By so replying, the whole matter was raised to a higher plane. It would have been easy to have cited passages from the Old Testament to prove that Jerusalem had been chosen by the Lord, but the Samaritan woman would have refused to accept this authority—for her Bible consisted only of the five books of Moses. The Prophets and the Psalms were rejected by the Samaritans. Here, in the Lord's attitude we have a divinely given method when dealing with parallel problems. Think of the interminable debates that the introduction of "British Israel" brings! The erections built upon such crazy foundations as Berith-ish; of Isaac-son; of Union Jacks and Gates of enemies! Far simpler and more in line with the Saviour's attitude is to turn at once to Phil. iii. there to see that an undoubted Israelite, discarded undoubted blessings for the fullness to be found in Christ. This being so it is vain to tempt one who after all may not be an Israelite to set aside such superlative blessings for those discarded by Paul. The same principle is true in dealing with such subjects as the gift of tongues, the various modes of observing the Lord's supper, the controversies as to infant sprinkling v. adult believer's immersion; into these controversies we have no call to enter, they lie on the other side of Acts xxviii., have no place in the present dispensation, and are legitimate controversies only among those that practice them.

However, after having taken this high ground, the Saviour can now descend to details without adopting the attitude of a partisan.

> "Ye worship, ye know not what: we know what we worship: for salvation is of the Jews" (John iv. 22).

In this utterance the Lord brings to light two essential elements in all true worship. First "knowledge" which stands in severe contrast with blind tradition, superstition and unreasonable practices. Now knowledge in such matters as worship must come as a revelation, and while the Samaritans possessed the five books of Moses they were denied the light and leading of the rest of the Old Testament. Here therefore emerges another essential principle. True worship must be based upon revealed truth. This we can see is expressed negatively in Matt. xv., "In vain they do worship Me, teaching for doctrines the commandments of men" (Matt. xv. 9).

Secondly, the Lord associated together "worship" and "salvation" implying that worship could not be understood, and would not be acceptable apart from salvation. This salvation, said Christ, was "of the Jews", because to them had been committed the oracles of God, to them pertained the promises and the covenants and the service of God, and most important of all, from them must come, as regards the flesh, the long promised Saviour. True worship therefore is regulated according to divine revelation, is at the heart evangelical, and is intimately associated with the person and work of the Saviour. Judaism itself drew all its power from these sources. It was a divinely given religion of types and shadows, it was given only to one people Israel, it found its fulfillment in the person and work of the Saviour whose person and work alone made its rites, ceremonies, sacrifices and observances of any value.

> "But the hour cometh, and now is, when the true worshipper shall worship the Father in spirit and in truth: for the Father seeketh such to worship Him" (John iv. 23).

On two occasions the Gospel of John records the statement "The hour cometh and now is" (John iv. 23; v. 25), and once in a slightly different form "The hour cometh, yea is now come" (John xvi. 32). Weymouth rightly translates John xvi. 32, "The time is coming, nay has already come", for eleluthen is the perfect of erchomai. In John iv. 23 and v. 25, the original reads Kai nun estin which unfortunately, Weymouth translates exactly as he does the different words of John xvi. 32. Kai nun estin can only be translated correctly by the words "and now is". How are we to understand this expression, "and now is"? In John v. 25 it is seen to be the present spiritual equivalent of the future physical resurrection. In John iv., however, the temple at Jerusalem still stood, and the prophetic words "Your house is left unto you desolate" had not been pronounced. In chapter ii. the temple had been referred to as "My Father's house" and even in the period covered by the early part of the Acts of the Apostles, it was not inconsistent evidently, for Peter and John to go up to the temple at the hour of prayer.

It is therefore possible that what the Saviour said when he spoke to the woman of Samaria, was "The hour cometh when the true worshippers shall worship the Father in spirit and in truth", but when John came to write this gospel, he was able to interpolate for the benefit of the reader the information that this hour had now come. For us, to-day, the question of "place" so far as worship is concerned, has no meaning. Chapels and Churches are convenient meeting places where the saints can assemble, but if they know the truth, whatever the architecture, and whoever it may be who made the building "sacred" one of the hymns they will surely sing will be:--

> Saviour, where'er Thy people meet,
> There they behold Thy mercy seat;
> Where'er they seek Thee, Thou art found,
> And every place is hallowed ground.
>
> For Thou, within no walls confined,
> Inhabitest the humble mind;

Such ever bring Thee where they come,
And going, take Thee to their home.*

[* - This hymn is included in Hymns of Praise, compiled for the use of meetings where dispensational truth is discerned.]

What are we to understand by "true" worshippers? What are we to understand by worship that is "in spirit and in truth"?

Alethes is used when truth as opposed to falsehood is in view. Thus in John iv. 18 where it is translated "truly". Alethinos is truth when opposed not so much to a lie, but as substance is opposed to shadow. So we have such expressions as "the true tabernacle" (Heb. viii. 2); "the figure of the true" (Heb. ix. 24) obviously in contrast with the typical tabernacle and its furniture. So in John's gospel we read of "the true light", "the true bread" and "the true vine" as fulfillments and contrasts with their respective types. So "true" worshippers are not placed in contrast with idolators, worshippers of false gods, but they are constrasted with Old Covenant worshippers whose worship was typical and shadowy "which stood only in meats and drinks, and divers washings and carnal ordinances, imposed until the time of reformation" (Heb. ix. 10).

The expression "in spirit and in truth" without the preposition "in" repeated, should be taken as a figure of speech, known as hendiadys, where one thing is meant, but two statements are made—hence hen = one, dia = by means of, dys = two, the "One-by means of two" figure. "Truly i.e. antitypically in Spirit". Two reasons are given for thus worshipping the Father:

(1) He seeks such worship. This is a unique passage. No other passage of scripture uses the word "seek" in this way. It is a common thing for worshippers to be bidden "to seek" the Lord, but here, it is the Father that seeks! If He thus seeks, shall He not find? If He thus finds shall He not be pleased? If He thus finds, must not blessing be the result? Is not therefore true worship near the heart of all true acceptable and fruitful service? (2) The second reason resides in the very nature of the God we would worship.

"God is Spirit." Pneuma ho theos. It is no more necessary to insert the indefinite article here and read "God is a spirit" than it would be to translate the similarly constructed passage of John i. 1 and read "The Word was a God". To this Samaritan woman a statement concerning the essential Being of God is made that transcends every other revelation found in the Scriptures! All titles under which God is pleased to make Himself known in the O.T. scripture are really gracious accommodations to our finite capacity to understand. The God Who is spirit is beyond our powers of experience. We do not know the mode of being of One who is not conditioned by time and space, who is invisible, inaudible and intangible (John i. 18; v. 37). Now if our Saviour had intended to teach this woman the essential nature and being of God, our comments would constitute a criticism of His words, and we should stand condemned. He was teaching this woman, and all who will learn, not the nature of the absolute and unconditioned, but what the nature of that worship must be that is offered to, and is acceptable to, a being of such a nature. To obtain but a glimpse of the Divine nature, is to forego for ever all the trappings of ceremonial, all rites and all observances as being essential to true worship—a God who is “spirit” must be worshipped “in spirit and in truth”.

The pursuit of this theme has already led us to occupy more space than was originally allotted, so with one further observation we must close the present article.

In the O.T. worship is offered to “The Lord” who is referred to as “The Lord thy God”. In the N.T. (The Revelation), worship is offered to “God”, and to “Him that made heaven and earth”, but here in John iv. it is the “Father” that is worshipped, it is the “Father” that seeks worship—and surely none but “children” can worship the “Father”, none but children can offer to Him His due. And will “children” who seek thus to render homage to a “Father” feel under any necessity to pay such reverence in a temple? need such adopt priestly vestments? need such perform an elaborate ritual? No title of God is so intimate, so near to the heart, so far removed from ritual and ordinance as the title “Father” and worship that is offered to Him in that capacity must of necessity participate in the same essentials.

DEAR FELLOW-BELIEVERS,

We can truthfully say of the last two years, "Never before have we faced such intimidating costs in the printing and publishing of our testimony; yet never before within a like period have we been permitted to publish so great a number of separate volumes".

The God make known to the Corinthians seems to have been very manifest. In those epistles we read:

> "The weakness of God is stronger than men."
> "God hath chosen the weak things of the world to confound . . . . . the mighty."
> "Our sufficiency is of God."

Having said so much we must say more. These same epistles speak of those who were "labourers together with God", and, humanly speaking, only the protracted and constant fellowship of a faithful few, giving time, labour and money, "deep poverty" indeed abounding unto "riches of liberality", could have accomplished this happy result.

We earnestly pray that this testimony to the Truth "rightly divided" will be as abundantly blessed to the readers, as the publishing has been to the producers.

Yours by all sufficient grace,

CHARLES H. WELCH,
GEORGE T. FOSTER,
LEONARD A. CANNING.

At the Yorkshire Evangelical Conference, held in 1899 Canon Faussett, D.D., gave an address entitled "The Old Testament in the light of internal evidences" which was recorded in Things to Come, Vol. vi., pages 54 to 56. Some of the statements made by Canon Faussett seem worthy of preservation and expansion, for until the end of time the Scriptures will be attacked, and we need to be reminded that they contain abundant evidence of their integrity. Omitting many items that it was wise and necessary to include at the actual conference, we note:

"History fits geography."—To-day we usually speak of "Tyre and Sidon" as though they always existed together, but while Genesis knows the city of Zidon, Tyre is never mentioned (Gen. x. 19, xlix. 13). The greatness of Zidon is acknowledged by Joshua who calls it "Great Zidon" (Josh. xi. 8, xix. 28), but at that time Tyre was but a stronghold of Zidon, and not mentioned. In David's day however Tyre took the lead (II Sam. v. 11) and Zidon takes a lesser place. Had the book of Genesis been written in later times, Tyre and Sidon would most certainly have been coupled together, and thereby have betrayed the hand of the late writer.

"Language accords with the context."—The record is that Moses was brought up in Egypt, and Egyptian words should therefore make their appearance in the books of Genesis and Exodus. The Egyptian word tebah is actually used of Noah's ark, whereas the Hebrew aron is used of the ark in the tabernacle. Again, the early date of the Pentateuch can be discerned by the way in which the pronouns "he" and "she" are represented. In the five books of Moses "he" and "she" are not distinguished by gender, but in the later books "he" is written hu (masculine) and "she" is written hi (feminine). Hi is never used in the Pentateuch. No other writer than Moses uses the word naar "youth" in both genders. Again Moses uses the Egyptian achu translated "meadow" (Gen. xli. 2) but which should be rendered "reeds". Many other Egyptian words not listed by Canon Faussett, could be brought forward to supplement this testimony to the integrity of the books of Moses.

"Natural History accords with the wilderness sojourn."—There are eleven animals mentioned in Deuteronomy which are not recorded in Leviticus and Numbers, mainly antelopes, the ibex of Arabia, the coney or hyrax, the little pachyderm related to the hippopotamus. They are numerous in the Arabian desert, but are not found in Egypt or Palestine. This accords with the record that when Leviticus was written, Israel had only just come from Egypt and did not know yet the animals of the desert. Deuteronomy, written at the close of the forty years in the wilderness, and before entering Canaan, is familiar with the fauna and flora of the desert. This change of the lists of animal shows that Moses, and not a priest a thousand years later, was the writer.

"An unbroken chain."—Malachi, the last of the prophets pre-supposes the history of Elijah, the law of Moses and the history of Esau and Jacob. Zechariah pre-supposes the feast of tabernacles, the earthquake in the days of Uzziah, and the Babylonian captivity. Haggai pre-supposes Solomon's temple, the exodus from Egypt, and God's covenant with Israel by Moses. The prophets refer to the tabernacle in Shiloh, the creation, the flood, the destruction of Sodom, the Amorites, the Patriarchs and the deliverance from Egypt. The subsequent reigns look back to David as the founder of the dynasty. Samuel pre-supposes the Judges and Joshua, and Joshua pre-supposes the Pentateuch.

A golden thread runs through the many parts, uniting them into one organic whole, the promise of the seed of the woman. This promise becomes more definite in Noah's prophecy, for he focuses attention upon the line of Shem. At the call of Abraham, a descendant of Shem, the range is further narrowed to Isaac, Jacob and thence to Judah, finally fixing upon the family of David, and so to the birth of the Saviour at Bethlehem.

This article is necessarily brief, it is but to stimulate the mind, but if any reader is thereby encouraged to search and see whether these things are so, the conviction will grow as the evidence is accumulated that we can unreservedly confess "Thy Word is true from the beginning".

#1. The Place of Acknowledgment in Experimental Truth.
pp. 18 - 20

Salvation is a finished work. Nothing that man can do can make salvation more secure than it is, for it rests solely upon the once-offered sacrifice of Christ. It is a salvation that is by grace. Yet, it is equally the testimony of the Scriptures that salvation is also "by faith", and though it be a work already accomplished on behalf of sinful man, no man is "saved" apart from faith in the Son of God. Man is a moral being and in this lies his separateness from the rest of the visible world. No one has ever seen a stone "refuse" to fall to the ground when released, nor the sun hesitate on his course. Like man, sun and stones, stars and trees, are creatures but, unlike man, they are not moral. It is of the essence of the moral sphere that obedience be freely rendered. The very idea of an enforced holiness is intolerable either to reason or to revelation. The man who is "saved by grace" is a man who has also felt his need and has been "saved by faith".

Now a word that recurs in the spiritual history of man as recorded in the Word, and that forms the bridge over which man as a moral creature passes into salvation and its accompanying blessings, is the word "acknowledge". Let us turn to some passages of Scripture that reveal the important place "acknowledgment" has in the mind and will of God for His people.

"Only acknowledge thine iniquity" was the one proviso needful for restoration in the Lord's call to Israel by Jeremiah:

> "Go and proclaim these words toward the north, and say, Return, thou backsliding Israel, saith the Lord; and I will not cause Mine anger to fall upon you: for I am merciful, saith the Lord, and I will not keep anger for ever. Only acknowledge thine iniquity, that thou hast transgressed against the Lord thy God, and hast scattered thy ways to the strangers under every green tree, and ye have not obeyed My voice, saith the Lord. Turn, O backsliding children, saith the Lord; for I am married unto you" (Jer. iii. 12-14).

Acknowledgement is here seen as one phase of repentance. "Return", "acknowledge", "turn" and the like truth is also found in the New Testament. Much to the same effect is the testimony of Prov. xxviii. 13:

> "He that covereth his sins shall not prosper: but whoso confesseth and forsaketh them shall have mercy."

This passage makes us think of that great example of true acknowledgment, David, whose repentance has given us those two wonderful Psalms, xxxii. & li. Psalm xxxii. opens with the blessedness of the man whose transgression is forgiven, but before this blessedness could be experienced by David, he had to acknowledge his sin. While he kept silence his misery was great, and the hand of the Lord was heavy upon him.

> "I acknowledged my sin unto Thee, and mine iniquity have I not hid. I said, I will confess my transgressions unto the Lord; and Thou forgavest the iniquity of my sin" (Psa. xxxii. 5).

Parallel with this is the experience of Psalm li.:

> "Have mercy upon me, O God, according to Thy lovingkindness: according unto the multitude of Thy tender mercies blot out my transgressions. Wash me throughly from mine iniquity, and cleanse me from my sin. For I acknowledge my transgressions: and my sin is ever before me. Against Thee, Thee only, have I sinned, and done this evil in Thy sight" (Psa. li. 1-4).

When we turn to the epistles that speak of the grace of God to the church, we shall find that in some places where the Authorized Version reads "knowledge", the true meaning is "acknowledge". In the first epistles of John, where experimental truth, associated with walking in the light, is the theme, "confession" is used in much the same way as "acknowledgment" is used elsewhere.

> "If we confess our sins, He is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness" (I John i. 9).

Before the prodigal son "came to the father", he "came to himself" (Luke xv. 17, 20). Before he experienced reconciliation and wore the best robe, he had said:

> "Father, I have sinned against heaven, and before thee, and am no more worthy to be called thy son" (Luke xv. 18, 19).

The moment that salvation becomes our realized possession the Lord is pledged to lead us out and on. We have but to read the book of Exodus to see this plainly set forth. From the moment the blood of the Passover had been shed and the hour of deliverance had come, Israel never lacked a leader. Moses may go the way of all flesh, but Joshua is there to take his place, and over and above all human agency, we find the pillar of cloud and fire that never left the people throughout their pilgrimage. Let us therefore turn our attention to the experience of being led by the Lord.

> "Trust in the LORD with all thine heart; and lean not unto thine own understanding. In all thy ways acknowledge Him, and He shall direct thy paths" (Prov. iii. 5, 6).

From these words it is evident that the acknowledging of the Lord is fairly comprehensive. It is impossible to acknowledge the Lord unless our trust in Him is with "all our heart" and in "all our ways". Very often no other "leading" is necessary than to stand at the parting of the ways, look ahead, and see whether following the one or the other would involve some denial of the Lord. If this is seen to be so, the matter is settled, and prayer for guidance at such times may too much resemble the attitude of Balaam (Numb. xxii. 13, 19).

This acknowledgment of the Lord in all our ways is very finely brought out in the story of Abraham's servant, who said:

> "I, being in the way, the LORD led me" (Gen. xxiv. 27).

Returning to our text (Prov. iii. 5, 6) we further observe that there is a correspondence instituted between "trust" and "lean"; and between "with all thine heart" and "in all thy ways". The "heart" deals with the life and motive force within, the "ways" deal with the outgoings of this hidden power in active and practical service. It is important to keep the divine order. Mere outward conformity, "ways", without inward reality, "hearts", is a self-blinding form of hypocrisy.

#2. Epignosis and Epiginosko refer to acknowledgment rather than added knowledge.

pp. 35 - 37

When it is true that "all the heart" is engaged with the things of God the normal outward expression will be an acknowledgment of Him in "all our ways". This close association of "heart" and "way" is very clearly seen in Psalm cxix.:

> "The undefiled in the WAY . . . . . seek Him with the whole HEART" (1, 2).

The question:

> "Wherewithal shall a young man cleanse his WAY?"

is followed by the statement:

> "With my whole HEART have I sought Thee" (9, 10).

Again the Psalmist says:

> "I will run the WAY of Thy commandments, when Thou shalt enlarge my HEART" (32).

In the next stanza we read:

> "Teach me, O Lord, the WAY of Thy statutes."

and its echo:--

> "Give me understanding, and I shall keep Thy law; yea I shall observe it with my whole HEART" (33, 34).

And yet again:--

> "Incline my HEART unto Thy testimonies . . . . . quicken Thou me in Thy WAYS" (36, 37).

So in verse fifty-eight we have the "whole heart" followed in verse fifty-nine by "I thought on my ways".

Many other examples could be brought forward to emphasize the close connection between "heart" and "ways", but the foregoing will suffice.

To an English ear, the word "acknowledge" conveys the idea of "confession". Another rendering that would perhaps be truer to the original would be "recognize". It is a blessed thing to be sensitive to the presence and work of the Lord; to be able to "recognize" Him in the dark as well as in the light; in the difficult path as well as in the hour of triumph. When one is able thus to "recognize" Him the direction of our pathway will follow as a matter of course.

It is interesting to know that the LXX version uses the word orthotomeo "rightly divide", where the English version reads "direct". This is an important factor in the true interpretation of II Tim. ii. 15 for the word would be immediately recognized by Timothy as one with which his early training had made him familiar, and thus would understand the practical necessity to follow the Divinely appointed finger-posts regarding dispensational truth as the wayfarer and pilgrim would follow the directions placed for his guidance at the fork of the road.

If acknowledgment of our sin is a necessary prelude to the "joy" and "experimental knowledge" of sins forgiven, acknowledgment of the Lord in all our ways is assuredly as necessary, if we would be "directed" in all our paths.

In the New Testament epiginosko and epignosis are translated both by the words "knowledge" and "acknowledge". In early days the distinction between them was not so sharply drawn as now. For example, the majestic words:

> "We knowledge Thee to be the Father of an infinite Majesty," was the recognized form in the year 1535A.D. To-day "knowledge" stands, in the first instance, for the "stuff" of knowledge, the information gathered, or the intelligence possessed. This however is the secondary meaning of the word, and even to-day a first-class dictionary places the primary meaning of "knowledge" as: "Acknowledgment, confession; recognition of the position of claims of any one" (Oxford English Dictionary).

Epignosis is the combination of epi, "on", and gnosis, "knowledge", but it must not be assumed that the addition of epi indicates merely the piling up of knowledge upon knowledge: few, if any, occurrences of the word would justify this usage.

When Hosea says:

> "The Lord hath a controversy with the inhabitants of the land, because there is no truth, nor mercy, nor knowledge of God in the land" (Hosea iv. 1), mere formal knowledge, historical knowledge, grammatical knowledge, is not intended. There is implicit in the word the idea of acknowledgment or recognition. If we could divest the word "recognition" of its secondary meaning (that of "recognizing" a person by feature or manner), and retain only the primary meaning, that of recognizing or acknowledging a liability or an obligation, the word would suit admirably.

This matter is something more than a mere technicality; it lies near the very heart of all true teaching, and we therefore "recognize" the claims which the word has upon us to make its meaning clearly understood. Epiginosko occurs forty-two times in the New Testament and epignosis occurs twenty times. While space will permit of the setting out of only a selection from all these references, we trust that all who teach others, and those who desire the fullest proof of all that is here set forth as truth, will personally acquaint themselves with the usage of these words in the whole of the sixty-two occurrences:

> "Ye shall know them by their fruits" (Matt. vii. 16).
> "Elias is come already, and they knew him not" (Matt. xvii. 12).
> "When Jesus perceived in His spirit" (Mark ii. 8).
> "The people saw them . . . . . and many knew Him" (Mark vi. 33).
> "Their eyes were holden that they should not know Him" (Luke xxiv. 16).

In these few references taken from the Gospels, "recognize" could, with advantage, be substituted for "know". We do not "know" a fig-tree by the mere fact of looking at its fruit, for a "knowledge" of the fig-tree involves acquaintance with several sciences, and then is but partial. Yet the most untutored and illiterate observer would "recognize" a fig-tree by its fruit.

It is a most natural transition for the word "recognize" to take on a moral colouring, so that while the recognition of a fig-tree by its fruit may not involve self-denial or expose to persecution, it becomes another matter to "recognize" the rejected Christ or the doctrine which is after godliness.

In the passage we are about to consider let us therefore, with this explanation in mind, consistently use the word "recognize" or "acknowledge" in place of "knowledge". Limitations of space compel us to confine ourselves to one passage only, but that a representative one.

> "Paul, a servant of God, and an apostle of Jesus Christ, according to the faith of God's elect, and the acknowledging of the truth which is after godliness" (Titus i. 1).

Here the Apostle associates his ministry with two phases of Christian experience (1) According to the faith of God's elect, this is basic; (2) According to a recognition of the Truth, this is experimental. This second phase is expanded thus: "According to a recognition of the truth, which (in its turn) is according to godliness."

The Apostle is inspired to hold an even balance. He stresses neither the sovereignty of God nor the responsibility of man, but gives each its place. The faith of God's elect comes first, and this is according to truth. We love Him because He first loved us. There could be no recognition of truth on our part, had it not been preceded by grace. It is however entirely untrue to represent the Apostle's doctrine as the faith of God's elect, and that only. That is but one side of it. It has another:

> "The Lord knoweth them that are His."

That is the elective side, the side that lies beyond our control, responsibility or power. The other is:

> "Let every one that nameth the name of Christ depart from iniquity" (II Tim. ii. 19).

This is the experimental side, the side that lies within the ambit of our control, responsibility and power, as those who have received mercy to be faithful.

The possession of the "knowledge" of the truth which is according to godliness is no guarantee that a "life" of godliness will ensue. But the "acknowledgment" or "recognition" of such truth does carry with it the idea of taking one's stand, and abiding by any consequences that may follow.

> "Be not . . . . . ashamed of the testimony of our Lord, nor of me His prisoner" (II Tim. i. 8).

was a call to Timothy, who "knew" the truth, to "acknowledge" it, or, in the sense adopted in this series, to "recognize" its claims. The call comes with equal force to us to-day, when "knowledge" has increased, but when "the godly man ceaseth", and acknowledgment of the truth, at times, costs dear.

#3. "Face to face", or future "recognition" of the truths that lie behind the imagery of human speech.
pp. 58 - 60

The earliest use of epiginosko by Paul, is that found in I Cor. xiii. 12:

> "For now we see through a glass, darkly; but then face to face: now I know in part; but then shall I know even as also I am known."

In this passage the first "know" is ginosko, the second and third in italics, are epiginosko. The apostle has been speaking of the transitory character of the gifts enjoyed by the church, and contrasts the partial knowledge which then obtained, with a future day, when, in exchange for seeing "through a glass darkly", the believer would see "face to face": when, instead of the partial knowledge which our very nature imposes, we shall "recognize" even as we are "recognized". This day of full recognition does not refer to the present dispensation of the mystery, for, however transcendent the blessings and superior the calling and sphere of the church of the Body of Christ, no member of that body sees "face to face", or "recognizes" even as he himself is "recognized" by the Lord and the higher intelligences of the spiritual world. That day is future, not only for the Corinthians, but also for us.

Before we can appreciate the Apostle's teaching in I Cor. xiii. 12 it will be necessary to attain some element of certainty as to the figure he uses when he speaks of seeing through a glass darkly. There is a division of opinion among commentators as to whether the world "glass" refers to a mirror "by" which objects are seen, or to a semi-transparent window, "through" which objects are seen. Bloomfield understand esoptron, "glass", to refer to the lapis specularis of the ancients, thin plates of some semi-transparent substance with which windows were glazed. But as he admits that there is no other example of the use of this word esoptron for dioptron his case is very weak. Alford's comment on this usage is:

> The idea of the lapis specularis, placed in windows, being meant, adopted by Schöttgen from Rabbinical usage . . . . . is inconsistent with the usage of esoptron, which (Meyer) is always a MIRROR . . . . . the window of lapis specularis being dioptra" (Strabo xii. 2, p.540).

If we keep to the known examples of the use of esoptron, we must reject the idea of the specular, the semi-transparent window, and retain the figure of a mirror. The only other occurrence of the word in the New Testament is James i. 23, where the fact that a man is said to behold his natural face "in a mirror", makes it impossible to translate esoptron by the word "window". Two occurrences in the Apocrypha are helpful.

> "The unspotted mirror of the power of God, and the image of His goodness" (Wisdom 7:26).
>
> "Never trust thine enemy: for like as iron rusteth, so is his wickedness. Though he humble himself, and go crouching, yet take good heed and beware of him, and thou shalt be unto him, as if thou hadst wiped a mirror and thou shalt know that his rust hath not been altogether wiped away" (Ecclus. 12:11).

From these references we may learn two items of interest:

(1) That it was no uncommon thing for a mirror to be spotted.
(2) That the reference to "iron rust" indicates that such mirrors were made of metal, not of glass.

That the mirrors which the women of Israel brought out of Egypt were made of "brass" and not of "glass", we know, for out of them were made:

> "the laver of brass, and the foot of it" (Exod. xxxviii. 8).

Job compares the firmament to "a molten mirror" (Job xxxii. 8); and Nahum speaks of the nation of Israel becoming a "gazing stock", or perhaps better, a "mirror", so that the nations might see in Israel's punishment an example for themselves. The LXX departs from the literal here, and translates the Hebrew by paradeigma, "an example" (Nah. Iii. 6). Shakespeare's conception of drama runs parallel with this Biblical usage:

> "Whose end, both at the first, and now, was, and is, to hold, as 'twere the mirror up to nature; to show virtue her own feature, scorn here own image, and the very age and body of the time, his form and pressure" (Hamlet iii. ii. 23).

The writer of the article on "glass" in "Kitto's Encyclopaedia" thinks that a mirror cannot be intended in I Cor. xiii., for "face to face" he contends, presents an improper contrast, for in a mirror, "face answers to face" (Prov. xxvii. 19). This objection however is not valid: there is no word to correspond with "answer" in the original. A more literal translation yields a different meaning and message:

> "As water, face to face;
> So heart, man to man."
>
> "If I bring rock together, it abuts, but there is no mixture. If I pour sand together, it meets, but I may trace the parcels if they differ; but 'water' is a fine picture of 'heart' . . . . . two sparkling drops, as they touch, instantly are blended" (Miller).

There seems no room for doubt but that the apostle speaks of a "mirror" here. No one having any acquaintance with language will be stumbled by the use of dia, "through". We see "through" a mirror in the sense of "by means of" the mirror and dia with the genitive is translated "by" or "through" in the sense in I Cor. i. 1, 9, 10, 21; ii. 10; iii. 5, 15, to give no more instances.

What does the apostle mean when he says "in a glass darkly"? The word translated "darkly" is ainigma, our English "enigma". There is an allusion here to Numb. xii. 8.

> "Mouth to mouth, even apparently, and not in dark speeches" (ainigmaton).

Ainisso, the verb from which ainigma, "enigma", is derived, means to hint, intimate with obscurity, insinuate, teach by figurative language.

We have discussed the necessary limitations of human knowledge and of Divine revelation to human hearers in the series entitled "Fruits of "Fundamental Studies" (Volume XXIX, p.161), and to this limitation the apostle refers when he says that "Now we see by means of a mirror enigmatically".

Are there no images, figures, or symbols in the epistles of the mystery? Is not the very title "Christ" a condescension to our limitations? It means "Anointed" and we can appreciate the symbols involved, but when we see "face to face" will not the title "Christ" be, for the first time in our experience, "recognized" even as we are "recognized"? Do not the facts that lie behind the figures "head", "body", "members", "temple", "citizens" await fuller recognition? If we now "know" even as we are known, what is the meaning of the words:

> "The Love of Christ which passeth knowledge"
> or
> "The peace of God which passeth all understanding"?

There are a few, who, by reason of temperament and circumstances, torment themselves with problems concerning the future glory. One such problem that we have had put to us is "Will the saints recognize their loved ones in glory?" For our own part, we have no problem. Recognition is incipient in individuality, and individuality is vitally bound up with memory, and I cannot remember things pertaining to myself without remembering things pertaining to others. Peter, even in this life, apparently had no difficulty in recognizing Moses and Elijah on the mount of transfiguration, even though he had met neither of them in the flesh. Should any reader of these lines still be worried by this question of future recognition, perhaps the amended translation of I Cor. xiii. 12 will come as a relief:

> "Then shall we recognize even as we are recognized."

#4. Acknowledgment, the spirit of wisdom and revelation (Eph. i. 17, 18).
pp. 79, 80

The first fourteen verses of the epistle to the Ephesians contain a revelation of the distinctive truth of the Mystery, as entrusted to the Apostle Paul in his capacity of the prisoner of Jesus Christ for us Gentiles. In this opening revelation the Apostle makes known some unique features of this dispensation. Its blessings are "spiritual"; its sphere "heavenly places"; its association with the age-purpose, "before the overthrow of the world"; its pre-eminence in this exalted sphere indicated by the word elsewhere translated "adoption", and its hope is said to be "prior". At verse fifteen, the Apostle ceases to add further teaching, and turns to prayer. If epignosis meant simply piling knowledge upon knowledge, the Apostle could have gone on, regardless of the moral and spiritual response or lack of response of these Ephesian saints, but at verse seventeen he prays:

> "That the God of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of glory, may give unto you the spirit of wisdom and revelation in the knowledge of Him . . . . . that ye may know what is the hope of His calling . . . . ." (Eph. i. 17, 18).

The margin of the A.V. reads for the acknowledgment in place of in the knowledge. The preposition en occurs more than one hundred and twenty times in Ephesians and is translated "in", "by", "with", "through" and "at"; it is only translated "for" in iv. 32, where it is translated "for Christ's sake", an exceedingly free rendering and which the R.V. renders "in Christ".

Accepting, as we have in this series, the translation of epignosis as "acknowledgment" or "recognition", we still have to ponder the Spirit's meaning. Does the apostle mean that the gift of a spirit of wisdom and revelation leads to and enables "acknowledgment". That is, shall we accept the A.V. marginal reading "for the acknowledgment"? or, while returning the new rendering of the word epignosis, shall we leave unaltered the preposition en and read "in the acknowledgment"? Should anyone ask what difference such a rendering would indicate, we reply that in the first translation the spirit of wisdom and revelation leads to acknowledgment, whereas in the second the spirit of wisdom and revelation is found in the acknowledgment, and will not be granted, where acknowledgment is withheld. This is a serious difference, and we believe that the second translation expresses the truth. How is it that we have to say of one and another believer: "He did run well, he appeared to be quite convinced, both of the general application of the principle of right division, and of the particular application to the present dispensation of the mystery—yet, somehow, he seems to have drawn back, his testimony is silenced. If he preaches or speaks in public, it is painfully evident to those who know the truth that he is not emulating the apostle, who, by manifestation of the truth, commended himself to every man's conscience in the sight of God."

If we have personal acquaintance with any of these brethren we soon become convinced that it is not lack of "knowledge" that hinders. They may have ability to read the Word in the original tongue, they may be level-headed and able to follow an intelligent proposition. In fact, we feel that some have seen all too clearly the logical conclusions of standing by such unpopular teaching as that which is associated with the testimony of the Lord's prisoner. In such circumstances growth ceases.

If, after we have received a knowledge of the truth; if, after the eyes of our hearts have been enlightened; if, after that, we would receive "a spirit of wisdom and revelation" so that we may "see" (eideo) what is the hope of His calling, that spirit must be received "in the acknowledgment of Him". The eyes of our heart may be enlightened, but we may not "see" for all that. Prejudice, fear of man, a too careful pondering of consequences, all these may have a blinding effect, or if not blinding, a dimming and distorting influence. We may still "see", but see "men as trees walking".

When we hear and read some of the things that are advanced under the aegis of Paul the prisoner, we cannot help but feel that such must be the explanation. Let us take this message to heart. Let us "acknowledge" the truth that we have seen. Let us not hide it out of fear, or dissimulate because of advantage. The clear perception as to what is the hope of our calling is largely associated with this acknowledgment, and where there is no acknowledgment a blessed foretaste of the glory of our inheritance must be forfeited. A realization of the source of all power to usward who believe will never be obtained where there is not frank and full acknowledgment.

If in the fulfillment of our stewardship, The Berean Expositor had made no statement about the Lord's Supper; if it had not made a clean cut at Acts xxviii.; if it had included the hope of I Thess. iv. in the doctrine of the mystery; if it could have retained the ecclesiastical position of the first epistle to the Corinthians, while holding to the teaching of Ephesians; if it could blend the New Covenant with the Mystery, it might have "prospered" as the world or Christendom counts prosperity. Its readers might have been multiplied, our spiritual pride fed, our creature comforts increased, but how poor in all essentials we should have been! If this witness is comparatively "unknown" yet the Lord acknowledges it. If we are comparatively "poor" we have proof that we have "made many rich", and if in the eyes of the world we "have nothing", yet, with the eyes of our heart enlightened, we are conscious that we "possess all things".

May every reader, together with the writer and his colleagues, be numbered among that blessed company who thus "acknowledge Him".

#5. A Coveted Acknowledgment ignored (by man), yet recognized (by the Lord) (II Cor. vi. 9).
pp. 99, 100

In that day we shall all recognize even as we are all recognized now (I Cor. xiii. 12). Such was the promise that held our attention in the previous article. We now turn to a passage in the second epistle to these same Corinthians, that deals with the present, viz.,:

> "As unknown, and yet well known" (II Cor. vi. 9).

The margin of our old Bible, which is too worn to be used elsewhere than on the desk, reads, "As ignored yet recognized". Dr. Bullinger in his "Figures of speech used in the Bible", places II Cor. vi. 8-10 under the figure Antithesis or Contrast, and these verses contain the last of a series of statements distributed under four heads, as follows:

(1) A seven-fold passive experience (II Cor. vi. 4, 5).
(2) A seven-fold self-denial (II Cor. vi. 5, 6).
(3) A seven-fold means to endure (II Cor. vi. 6-8).
(4) A seven-fold result (antithesis) (II Cor. vi. 8-10).

This last group is composed of a series of antitheses, which include the passage we are considering.

> "Deceivers, and yet true;
> Unknown, yet well known;
> Dying, yet living;
> Chastened, yet not killed;
> Sorrowful, yet always rejoicing;
> Poor, yet enriching others;
> Having nothing, yet possessing all things."

This long list of personal experiences is introduced by the words, "in all things approving ourselves as the ministers of God" (II Cor. vi. 4). The word "approving" translating the same word that is rendered "commending" in iii. 1 and v. 12.

> "Do we begin again to commend ourselves?"
> "For we commend not ourselves again unto you."

Meyer draws attention to the position of heautous in these passages as compared with II Cor. vi. 4. Where the commending of ourselves is used in a bad sense, heautous precedes the verb; but in II Cor. iv. 2 and vi. 4 heautous follows the verb. Alford remarks:

> "This is only one of continually occurring instances of the importance of the collocation of words with regard to emphasis."

It would have improved the rendering, and removed the ambiguity of the Authorized Version had it rendered the fourth verse, "In all things, as the ministers of God, approving ourselves", that is, "as it is meet that ministers of God should do".

Referring to this list of afflictions in conjunction with those presented in II Cor. xi. 21-28, Canon Tate says:

> "Forming conjointly a splendid enumeration of particulars, which—unparalleled, as, from their nature they ever must be—may be ranked among the very highest examples of the sublime and the pathetic."

II Cor. vi. 8-10 shows the real, as compared with the reputed situation in which the Apostle laboured. It is here, the second in the list, that we meet with our text, "as unknown, and yet well known", or, as we have suggested, "as ignored, yet recognized".

This seven-fold antithesis may be set out thus:

In the eyes of man.	In the eyes of God.
Deceivers.	True;
Ignored.	Recognized.
Dying.	Living.
Chastened.	Not killed.
Sorrowful.	Always rejoicing.
Poor.	Enriching others.
Having nothing.	Possessing all.

The word "deceiver" planos, is used of Christ (Matt. xxvii. 63), Antichrist (II John 7), Paul (II Cor. vi. 8) and the seducing spirits of the closing days of this dispensation (I Tim. iv. 1). How closely the apostle followed in the footsteps of his Lord. The Lord Himself is classed with His very opposite, even as Paul was classed with the very demons who will attempt to undo his life's work. Who are we, therefore, to murmur or complain if, occasionally, we too find ourselves in this same exalted company? In such circumstances the words of Kipling, written on a lower plane, often come to mind:

> "If you can bear to hear the truth you've spoken, > Twisted by knaves to make a trap for fools."

And one wishes that some Christian poet might take "If" as his model, and give us a companion poem relating to true Christian experience. (Since writing this series it has been our joy to read a poem by Reginald Wallis which fulfils this wish.)

#6. The "Recognition" that leads to "Full Adulthood". "The knowledge of the Son of God" (Eph. iv. 13).

pp. 117 - 120

Epignosis, the word under consideration, occurs but twice in Ephesians, and epiginosko not at all. This of itself should make us hesitate to subscribe to the suggestion that epignosis means the "full knowledge" of the mystery as distinct from the more elementary knowledge of the Pentecostal dispensation. We have looked at Eph. i. 17, where is the first occurrence of epignosis in that Epistle. We must now look at Eph. iv. 13, the only other reference.

We are all doubtless familiar with the fact that the epistle to the Ephesians is divided into two main parts, chapters i.-iii. containing doctrine, and chapters iv.-vi. containing corresponding practice. We observe, therefore, that the word we have translated "acknowledgment" occurs once in the doctrinal and once in the practical section of this epistle.

> "Till we all come in the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ; that we henceforth be no more children, tossed to and fro" (Eph. iv. 13, 14).

This passage must not be visualized as one long chain of equal links, but rather as a succession of expansions, each containing a development of the doctrine enunciated. The goal is "the unity of the faith". This goal is further expanded and explained as "the acknowledgment, or recognition, of the Son of God". To follow the subdivisions clearly, it is necessary to correct the Authorized Version in the matter of the translation of the preposition eis which occurs in verses 12 to 16 seven times, as follows:

> "For the work of the ministry, for the edifying . . . . . in the unity of the faith . . . . . unto a perfect man, unto the measure . . . . . may grow up into Him . . . . . unto the edifying of itself in love."

While it is impossible and undesirable to reduce the translation of the Greek original to a lifeless and mechanical uniformity, it is wise, when examining a passage, to realize that where prepositions are repeated, it will seriously influence our understanding if such repetition is hidden by a variety of renderings, however charming they may sound.

Eis answers the question Whither? The idea of a goal or an end in view is always present. Consequently, where the goal is material or physical, "to", "into" or "unto" is the usual rendering. Where the goal is intangible, "for" sometimes better expresses the idea of moving on to its attainment. Thus we have eis translated in Rom. xiv. 9, "to this end". While "into" may sometimes be a legitimate translation, it can sometimes be an overstatement. In John xi. 38, "cometh to the grave" is true, "cometh unto the grave" would be true, but "cometh into the grave" would be false (cf. 41). The Lord came unto, but not into, Sychar (John iv. 5, 8, 28). Mary came unto, but not into, the sepulcher (John xx. 1, 11).

For the purposes of study and analysis, "unto" is the safe translation, and the occurrence of eis in Eph. iv. 13 subdivides the goal into three parts.

Till we all come

UNTO	(eis)	The unity of the faith.
		The knowledge of the Son of God.
UNTO	(eis)	A perfect man.
UNTO	(eis)	The measure of
		The stature of
		The fullness of THE CHRIST.

The goal of the ministry given by the ascended Lord, when He gave some apostles, some prophets, some evangelists and some pastors and teachers, was "the unity of the faith". This unity of the faith embraces, and is partly explained by, "the knowledge of the Son of God" which, in its turn, is revealed under the figure of the "perfect man", and this perfect man is none other than Christ in all His fullness of stature—truly an amazing Goal.

In the epistles of Paul to the Romans, Galatians, Hebrews, both epistles to the Corinthians and the first to the Thessalonians, reference is made to Christ as the Son twenty-seven times, but in the epistles of the Mystery there are but two such references, the one already quoted from Eph. iv. and one in Col. i. 13, "The kingdom of His dear Son".

The doctrine of the sonship of Christ had been made known before the opening of the dispensation of the Mystery. The sonship of Christ, even as to its human side, forms a definite part of the witness for the present dispensation. This is implied in the exhortation given to Timothy:

> "Remember that Jesus Christ of the seed of David was raised from the dead according to my gospel" (II Tim. ii. 8).

However great the difference between the position of the risen Christ as Head of the Church, and the position of the risen Christ as David's heir, the Person remains unchanged, and consequently the doctrine of the sonship of Christ, so clearly taught in Romans and Hebrews, remains a fundamental of the faith of all times.

We have already observed that the one reference to "the Son of God" occurs not in the doctrinal but in the practical section of Ephesians. In the fourth chapter we are not taught the doctrine of the Divine sonship, but we are told that we shall never attain to full growth and maturity apart from "the recognition of the Son of God". What this recognition involves is discovered in the expansion of the theme that follows. Christ is "recognized" as "the perfect Man", and the measure of our growth is "the measure of the stature (or age) of the fullness of the Christ". Just as in Paul's early epistles the sonship of Christ is stressed, so also in the same epistles the sonship of the believer is stressed; and just as there are only two references to the sonship of Christ in the epistles of the Mystery, so there is no reference to the sonship of the believer in the prison epistles, except the one passage which speaks of his "adoption", huiothesia, "to place as a son" (Eph. i. 5).

In the epistles of the Mystery the single reference to Christ as the Son of God is used to encourage growth, and the single reference to the adoption of the believer points not merely to sonship, but to the dignity of the firstborn son, the distinctive title of Christ in Col. i., "Firstborn of every creature" and "Firstborn from the dead" (Col. i. 15, 18), being the counterpart. In Eph. iv. the believer is referred to a "measure". For the exercise of grace in ministry the believer's attention is directed to "the measure of the gift of Christ" (Eph. iv. 7-12). For growth and attainment, he is directed to "the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ" (Eph. iv. 13, 14). For his individual share in the growth of the body, each member is reminded of the "measure of every part", if the body is to increase and edify itself in love (Eph. iv. 15, 16). The "perfect" man is in direct contrast with the "children" who are tossed to and fro (Eph. iv. 13). The word "perfect", teleios, is often placed in contrast with "babes" (Heb. v. 14, with Heb. v. 13; and I Cor. ii. 6 with iii. 1 & xiii. 11).

> "Be not children in understanding . . . . . in understanding be men" (I Cor. xiv. 20).

Here the word translated "men" is teleios, "perfect" or, as it should be rendered in this passage, "of full age". The word translated "stature" includes both height and age, the two evidences of adulthood that are immediate to the eye.

> "Add one cubit to his stature" (Matt. vi. 27).
> "He was little of stature" (Luke xix. 3).

are proofs that the word helikia refers to height.

> "He is of age" (John ix. 21).
> "When she was past age" (Heb. xi. 11).

are proofs that the word helikia refers to age. Like teleios, the word indicates adulthood, and it is this that the apostle has in mind in Eph. iv. 12. It is the "recognition" of the Son of God by the adult believer which is placed in contrast with the "wind of doctrine" that tossed to and fro the "babe", and which shows that practical issues are before us.

The secret of spiritual maturity, is NOT introspection, for the holiest saint will be horrified at the evidences of corruption which he will find within. The secret of spiritual maturity is the "recognition" of what Christ means to the believer as the Son of God, the perfect Man, and true growth is "up into Him in all things which is the Head". Finally, it is "the fullness" which is the goal here, "the measure of the stature of the fullness of the Christ".

To appreciate in any adequate degree what is intended by this word "fullness" would demand a life's study of the Scriptures, and to enter really into its meaning demands resurrection glory as its atmosphere.

Attested Truth.
pp. 93 - 99

(Being the substance of an address given by the Principal, on Foundation Day, May 28th, 1949, at the Chapel of the Opened Book).

To the believer, brought up in orthodoxy, accustomed to the phrase "the Church began at Pentecost", taking to himself as a matter of course the words "we are the people of His pasture, and the sheep of His hand" (Psa. xcv. 7), the results of the application of "right division" and the somewhat startling claims of "dispensational truth", may seem after all to rest upon the somewhat uncertain basis of human deduction and inference. It may be that if we can discover that dispensational changes that subdivide the purpose of the ages, have always been announced, and that spiritual deduction only finds its place after, and not before, the announcement has been made public, the recognition of the differences that claim attention and which are vital to the full acknowledgment of our calling may be simplified.

First, in order to be sure that the term "dispensational truth" shall be understood, let us consider its place in the revelation and interpretation of the Word.

THE THREEFOLD DIVISION OF ALL TRUTH.

The revelation given in the Scriptures comes to us in three forms (1) Doctrinal Truth; (2) Dispensational Truth; (3) Practical Truth.

What do we mean by Doctrinal Truth?—Doctrinal truth embraces all that has been revealed concerning the Being and Attributes of God, and all that God has done, commanded, promised or foretold in Creation, Law and Grace. "All have sinned" is true under whatever dispensation we may be called. "God is Just" is as true under grace as it was under law. "To the Jew first" was true during the period covered by the Acts, but cannot be put into practice since the dismissal of the Jew in Acts xxviii. This latter statement therefore comes rather under the next heading.

What do we mean by Dispensational Truth?—Dispensational truth takes note of the purpose of the ages, the changes that have been introduced since Creation, such as may be denominated the dispensations of Innocence, Law, Kingdom, Grace, Church, Mystery, &c., and the office of dispensational truth is to decide whether any particular doctrine—be it command, promise, calling or prophecy—does or does not pertain to any particular individual. Dispensational truth would lead the believer to distinguish between the blessing which says, "the meek shall inherit the earth", and those blessings which are described as "all spiritual" and to be enjoyed in "heavenly places".

What do we mean by Practical Truth?—Not until doctrine has passed the mesh of dispensational truth, can practical truth put in its claim. It is obvious that the people of Israel, called to be a royal priesthood and a holy nation, with its sphere of influence in the earth, could not be called upon to put into practice the injunctions of Eph. iv.-vi. In like manner, the Church of the One Body has no guarantee that obedience to the special truth attaching to that calling will result in blessing in "basket and in store". Those who are under the law must have a very different form of practice from those who are under grace.

Only by loyally preaching and teaching the truth of God as related to these three aspects can we hope to become workmen who need not to be ashamed, for only by so doing shall we "rightly divide" the Word of truth. We believe this threefold division will command the assent of all who honour the Scriptures as the revelation of the mind and will of God.

In the endeavour to discern the changing dispensations, we may collect together "things that differ", we may observe that one calling is associated with the period "before the foundation of the world", and another with a period "from (or since) the foundation of the world". We may observe that in one calling Christ is "King"; in another He is represented as "Priest after the order of Melchisedec", in another He is denominated "Head over all things to the church which is His body". We observe that some are "to inherit the earth", but that others find their place in the "New Jerusalem", and yet others are blessed with all spiritual blessings "in heavenly places"; and that this sphere of blessing is "where Christ sits at the right hand of God". We might moreover bring forward the prevalence of miraculous gifts and the persistence of the hope of Israel, right through the Acts of the Apostles to the last chapter, and compare and contrast this state of affairs with the teaching of the "Prison Epistles". These, and many other studies are a legitimate approach to the Scriptures, and fulfil the injunction "comparing spiritual things with spiritual". In this present study the key word is the word "Witness", and our contention is that every dispensational change is accompanied by an accredited witness. We are not left to our own searchings or deductions, we find witnesses at intervals along the way, who declare in the name of Him that sent them that this or that change has taken place. If this be so, then we should spare no pains to become acquainted with so important a feature in the unfolding of the divine purpose. We have called this address "Attested Truth", for dispensational truth is inseparable from "witnesses" specially raised up at the crises of spiritual history.

The word "witness" (Anglo-Saxon) and the words "testimony" "testify" (Latin) together with "record" and "report" (Latin) and the English word "martyr" which is from the Greek, are employed in the New Testament to translate the various verbal forms of the word martus, and together present a fairly comprehensive idea of the meaning of the original.

Testimony or witness is that which is affirmed as something seen, heard or experienced, or that has been made known by divine revelation, and for which the testifier would be prepared, if need be, to confirm by a martyr's death. The words, ho martus ho pistos are translated "faithful witness" in Rev. i. 5, and "faithful martyr" in Rev. ii. 13.

The words that will be employed, or have a bearing on the subject, are:

Martureo "to bear witness, to testify". Marturia/on "That which is testified."
Promarturomai "To bear witness beforehand."
Epimartureo "To bear witness, to make a deposition."
Diamarturomai "To affirm with solemn protestation."
Sunepimartureo "To bear witness together, to concur in testimony."

The first thing that we must do is to discover who, and what are called "witnesses" in the New Testament and, in order to avoid cumbering ourselves with unwanted material, we shall ignore references to "false witnesses" or those witnesses referred to who have no bearing upon the subject in hand.

(1) JOHN THE BAPTIST. "The same came for a witness" (John i. 7).
(2) THE LORD JESUS CHRIST. "I am one that bear witness of Myself" (John viii. 18).
  (a) The Father bears witness of Christ.
    "The Father that sent Me beareth witness" (John viii. 18).
  (b) The Holy Spirit's witness of Christ.
    "He shall testify of Me" (John xv. 26).
  (c) The Scriptures bear witness of Christ.
    "They are they which testify of Me" (John v. 39).
(3) SUPERNATURAL GIFTS AND SIGNS.
  (a) To Christ.
    "The works that I do, bear witness of Me" (John v. 36).
  (b) To apostles.
    "God also bearing them witness . . . . . with signs" (Heb. ii. 4)
(4) PETER and THE TWELVE. "Ye shall be witnesses unto Me" (Acts i. 8)
(5) THE APOSTLE PAUL,
  (a) Paul, before Acts xxviii. "His witness unto all men of what thou hast seen and heard' (Acts xxii. 15).
  (b) Paul both before and after Acts xxviii. "A witness both of these things which thou hast seen and of those things in the which I will appear" (Acts xxvi. 16).
  (c) Paul after Acts xxviii. "The testimony of our Lord nor of me His prisoner" (II Tim. i. 8).

It is written of John the Baptist "John did no miracle" (John x. 41), and there is neither sign, wonder nor miracle recorded of the apostle Paul after the change of dispensation which took place at Acts xxviii. We therefore distribute the witnesses in the New Testament as follows:

A | John the Baptist. No miracle.
  B | Christ, and His apostles until Acts xxviii.
    Sign, wonder and miracle.
A | Paul the Prisoner. No miracle.

It should be noticed with heart searching seriousness, that each one of the "witnesses" enumerated in the list above, were actually "martyrs". John the Baptist was beheaded, The Lord Jesus Christ was crucified, Peter was forewarned by the Lord as to the death he should die and spoke of the near approach of his "decease" in his second epistle, and Paul wrote his second epistle to Timothy in view of his approaching death which tradition says, as well as the evidence of the epistle, was by execution. They were witnesses in the double sense of the word. It cannot be too strongly emphasized therefore that only in a secondary sense can any one of us to-day be called "witnesses".

A "witness" must have had first hand evidence. He must be able to say "I was there", "I saw with my own eyes", "I heard with my own ears", and we only spoil the incisive character of New Testament testimony by appropriating so intensely personal a term to ourselves. Let us put this to the test.

JOHN THE BAPTIST.—"How far was he an eye-witness"?

> "The next day John seeth Jesus coming unto Him, and saith, Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world. THIS IS HE OF WHOM I SAID . . . . . and John bare record (martureo same word 'bear witness' John i. 7), saying I SAW the spirit descending from heaven like a dove, and it abode upon Him. And I knew Him not; but He that sent me to baptize with water, the same said unto me, Upon Whom thou shalt SEE the spirit descending and remaining on Him, the same is He which baptizeth with the Holy Ghost" (John i. 29-33).

THE TWELVE.—How far were these "eye-witnesses"?

> "Wherefore of these men which had COMPANIED with us ALL the time that the Lord Jesus went in and out among us, BEGINNING at the baptism of John, UNTO that same day when He was taken up from us, MUST one be ordained to be a WITNESS of His resurrection" (Acts i. 21, 22).

PETER.—"He was seen of Cephas" (I Cor. xv. 5).

PAUL.—"Chosen . . . . . see that Just One and . . . . . hear His voice' (Acts xxii. 14).

As we trace the unfolding purpose in the New Testament we observe that at each central epoch, a witness is raised up. This witness will either have extraordinary confirmation of his calling by the "signs and wonders" and the "divers miracles and gifts of the Holy Ghost" (Heb. ii. 4) or if he be like John the Baptist who did no miracle, the prophecies that went before and at his birth (Luke i. 5-20, 57-80), were a sufficient attestation. With most of these assertions we shall find general agreement among believers, and as our chief interest is related to the special witness of Paul, and as it is in connection with this witness that the greatest difference of opinion is found, we will devote the remainder of our time to his particular ministry.

Witnesses for Pentecost and its message are abundant in the early Acts. Even the number "twelve" had to be made up—for had not the Lord spoken of "twelve thrones" that must be occupied by the "twelve apostles"?

With the call and commission of Paul, however, a new witness appears and his advent indicates another dispensational change. He is given a number of titles, "A chosen vessel" being the earliest recorded. Paul was to bear the name of the Lord before the Gentiles, and Kings and the children of Israel. "Gentiles" occupying the first place even as they do in the prophetic utterance of old Simeon (Luke ii. 32). The emphasis upon the Gentiles in these passages, cannot be disassociated from the withdrawal of favour from Israel.

> "It was necessary that the word of God should first have been spoken to you; but seeing ye put it from you, and judge yourselves unworthy of everlasting life, lo, we turn to the Gentiles" (Acts xiii. 46).

From Acts xxii. 6-15 we learn more fully the commission given to Paul following his conversion on the road to Damascus:

> "For thou shalt be His witness unto all men of what thou hast seen and heard" (15).

and referring to this first ministry which ends with the shadow of prison in Acts xx., he summed it up as "testifying (or witnessing) both to the Jews, and also to the Greeks, repentance towards God, and faith towards our Lord Jesus Christ" (21).

In his defence, the Apostle more than once linked the two sections of his ministry by the word that is translated either "witness" or "testify".

> "As thou hast testified of Me in Jerusalem, so must thou bear witness also at Rome" (Acts xxiii. 11).

In like manner, Paul's prison ministry, the ministry that unfolded the new dispensation of the mystery, the ministry that finds its exposition in the "Prison Epistles", Ephesians, Philippians, Colossians, Philemon and II Timothy, this too is a "witness" or a "testimony". The first ministry comes to an end in Acts xx., and the new ministry is envisaged. Referring to the prophecies that spoke of "bonds and afflictions" Paul said:

> "But none of these things move me, neither count I my life dear unto myself, so that I might finish my course with joy, and the ministry which I have received of the Lord Jesus, TO TESTIFY the gospel of the grace of God" (Acts xx. 24).

This implies something more than preaching the gospel as an "Evangelist", it includes this, but it gives meaning to the emphasis which is laid on "the grace of God", for in the Prison Epistles we read that "the dispensation" which had been given to the apostle as "the Prisoner of Christ Jesus for you Gentiles" was "the dispensation of the grace of God" (Eph. iii. 1, 2).

Again, in his defence before Agrippa the apostle spoke of his twofold ministry, again using the word translated either "witness" or "testimony".

> "I have appeared unto thee for this purpose, to make thee a minister and a WITNESS both of these things which thou hast seen, and of those things in the which I will appear unto thee, delivering thee from the people, and from the Gentiles, unto whom now I send thee" (Acts xxvi. 16, 17).

Some of these words were uttered by the Lord on the Damascus Road, but in Acts ix. Paul was not delivered from "the people", neither was he "sent unto the Gentiles" at that time. "Now I send thee", with these words the apostle intimates that the second appearing to him of the Lord had taken place, according to the promise originally made, and "NOW", that is at the time of his defence, he was being "sent unto the Gentiles", the Roman powers undertaking his transport as a prisoner.

The apostle's prison ministry is called "the testimony (or witness) of our Lord" and of Paul "His prisoner" (II Tim. i. 8). The special teaching which Timothy was enjoined to commit to faithful men, was a teaching which he had heard of Paul "among many WITNESSES" (II Tim. ii. 2). So, in his first epistle to Timothy, Paul speaks of the great message concerning "One God and one Mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus, Who gave Himself a ransom for all", he adds (our translation):

> "THE TESTIMONY IN ITS OWN PECULIAR SEASONS" (I Tim. ii. 5, 6).

Then immediately following this most discriminating claim, he adds:

> "Whereunto I am ordained a preacher and an apostle (I speak the truth in Christ, and lie not), a teacher of the Gentiles in faith and verity" (I Tim. ii. 7).

The words translated "in due time" in I Tim. ii. 6, which we have rendered "in its own peculiar seasons", are the Greek words idios and kairos in the plural dative. Idios means something peculiarly one's "own", and is so translated in I Tim. iii. 4, 5, 12. A similar phrase, similarly translated in the Authorized Version is found in Titus i. 2, 3:

> "In hope of eternal life, which God, that cannot lie, promised before age-times (pro chronon aionion); but hath in due times (kairois idiois) manifested His word through preaching, which is committed unto me according to the commandment of God our Saviour."

Here we find it is a "God that cannot lie" which strikes the same note as the interjected words of I Tim. ii. 7 "I speak the truth in Christ I lie not", and suggests that this peculiar dispensational claim here "attested" would be strongly "contested", a fact that most of those associated with The Berean Expositor will endorse. Here also we have a message "committed" to Paul in harmony with a "commandment of God", which is but another way of saying "whereunto I am ordained" (I Tim. ii. 7).

The revelation of the mystery and the dispensation of the grace of God, especially committed to Paul the Prisoner with its accompanying Gospel of the grace of God (?), and its teaching concerning the one Mediator Who gave Himself a ransom for all, as distinct from the more limited reference in Matt. xx. 28, which was "for many", this new ministry was a testimony or a witness that had its own peculiar season for its manifestation and announcement. Therefore every fresh unfolding of the dispensations has been accompanied at its inception, with a specially equipped and commissioned witness. Dispensational truth, like all other aspects of truth, can be supported, illustrated and enforced, by comparison, by study and by every other legitimate means, but it is an occasion for thanksgiving to have seen, that its discovery does not depend upon the WIT of man, but stands solidly and unassailably upon the WITNESS of God. From the days of John the Baptist until the end of time, each and every dispensational change could be heralded with the words employed by Paul "A testimony in its own peculiar season".

Dispensational Truth is "Attested Truth".

EPHESIANS.

"To make all men see what is the dispensation of the mystery"
(Eph. iii. 9, R.V.)

#7. The Muniment Room (i. 3 - 14).
The Threefold Charter of the Church of the one body.
pp. 1 - 4

EVERY BLESSING THAT IS SPIRITUAL.

We have seen that the opening section of Ephesians is threefold, and deals with:--

The WILL of the Father	(i. 3-6).
The WORK of the Son	(i. 7-12).
The WITNESS of the Spirit	(i. 13, 14).

Each department in this great passage is devoted to one phase of the truth and together make up the Charter of the Church. We go back in time to "before the foundation of the world" (i. 4) and on to the future day of redemption (i. 14 with iv. 30). This redemption comes under the heading "The Work of the Son" for He alone is the Mediator, He alone the Redeemer, for He alone offered Himself without spot an offering and a sacrifice for sin. The Spirit's seal and earnest follows and does not precede this great redemptive work, the Witness of the Spirit combines the "Promise" given before age times (II Tim. i. 8-10 and Eph. i. 14) with the "Redemption" accomplished by Christ.

In Eph. i. 3-6 we have "The Will of the Father". We ask a series of questions concerning this will and submit the answers:

WHAT does the believer inherit? "All spiritual blessings."
WHERE will this inheritance be enjoyed? "In heavenly places."
WHEN was this will made? "Before the foundation of the world."
WHO will inherit? Those who received "The adoption".
WHY did the Father thus choose? "The good pleasure of His will."

While these five subdivisions of this mighty subject do not actually state all that is written, it will be found that they will help us as we endeavour to grasp something of the stupendous revelation which is here made to use.

"ALL SPIRITUAL BLESSINGS."

> "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, Who hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings in heavenly places" (i. 3).

Our blessings are not so much in mind in this opening passage as an overwhelming sense of grace. "Blessed be God." No petition rises to the Father, no confession, no vows of reform, no statement of failure, but thanksgiving and worship, full and free, ascends unto the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ. No blessing is sought or desired, "all blessings" are acknowledged.

The opening words of this glorious revelation are NOT "may I be blessed" but "may He be blessed". This note struck so early, should never be forgotten by the reader as he follows his guide through chamber after chamber of unspeakable glory. "He hath blessed us". The word eulogia "blessings" is derived from the verb eulogeo "to bless", which is a compound of eu "well" and lego "to speak". The reader will recognize that this word is the origin of the English "eulogy", a word meaning a high form of praise. The word translated "blessings" in Eph. i. 3 is actually once translated "fair speeches", namely in Rom. xvi. 18 which reveals the primary meaning of the word. Eu is an adverb and is found in Eph. vi. 3, "that it may be well with thee". It is of frequent use as a particle in combination with other words and is most familiar to the reader in the word evangel or "gospel" where the letter "u" is pronounced "v" in English.

Writing to the believer before the great dispensational landmark of Acts xxviii., Paul speaks of "the blessing of Abraham" coming on the Gentiles, but Abraham is never mentioned in the "Prison Epistles", and no blessing of Abraham is associated either with "heavenly places" or "before the foundation of the world". There are some terms used in the Scriptures, which by their very nature and the place they occupy in the scheme of salvation, come over and over again in the writings of the apostle. Such terms as "faith", "redemption", "justification" will come to the mind immediately, and are found in many of the epistles whether written before or after Acts xxviii. No one moreover could deny the use of the word "blessing" when speaking of these great doctrines of salvation, yet the fact remains that Rom. xv. 29 "the fullness of the blessing of the gospel of Christ", I Cor. x. 16 "the cup of blessing which we bless" and Gal. iii. 14 "the blessing of Abraham", are the only other occurrences of the word in Paul's epistles. So far as the Prison Epistles are concerned Eph. i. 3 stands alone of the new revelation and never again employed in any capacity by the apostle. Terms such as "seated together" and "blessing" receive emphasis by their glorious solitariness. They stand alone and are beyond compare.

These blessings of Eph. i. 3 are moreover peculiar in this, that they are "all spiritual". As the record stands in the Authorized Version "all spiritual blessings" must be considered as plural. The fact is, however, that in the original the word is singular, and a literal rendering is "in (or with) every blessing (that is) spiritual". Where the Greek word pas "all" is used of one it means "the whole", "entire" or "all the . . . . .", but if it be used to cover several items, it means "every".

Green, in his handbook says that where the adjective pas "all" in the singular number is written without the article "the", it signifies "every", but with the article it means "the whole of" the object which it qualifies. Thus pasa polis means "every city"; pasa he polis, or he pasa polis "the whole city" and he polis pasa would have a slightly different meaning—either "the city, all of it" or "the city in every part".

The church of the one body is blessed "with every blessing that is spiritual". This is even wider in its scope than to say "all spiritual blessings", for if the number of the blessings were but few—say four, they could be defined as "all spiritual", whereas the mind reels as it endeavours to grasp the fact that there is no blessing that comes under the category of "spiritual" that is omitted. It is highly improbable that while we are in this life we shall be able to appreciate a tithe of what is here so freely bestowed.

We turn our attention from this vision of unspeakable glory to consider the nature of the blessings thus bestowed. They are "spiritual", Greek pneumatikos. Pneuma "spirit" is derived from the idea of "breath" and goes back to the equivalent terms that are found in the Hebrew. It would be a mistake however just here and now to attempt a dissertation on the origin and usage of pneuma, for that would take us so far afield that we should be in danger of forgetting our immediate quest. First of all, we discover that pneumatikos occurs three times in Ephesians:

> "All spiritual blessings" (i. 3).
> "Hymns and spiritual songs" (v. 19).
> "Spiritual wickedness" (vi. 12).

Without comparison or consideration we might have been tempted to think that "spiritual" blessing must mean any blessing that comes from "God, that they must be good, that they must refer to redemption and so on. But Eph. vi. 12 gives us pause, for there we read of "spiritual WICKEDNESS". It is manifestly absurd to speak of "good" "holy" or "Divine" wickedness, and therefore we realize that the word spiritual has other and different connotations if it can be used in the same epistle of both "blessing" and "wickedness". In Eph. vi. 12 "spiritual" wickedness is set over against "flesh and blood". It is evident that the word "spiritual" is the opposite of the word "corporeal", and this is what we find elsewhere. Paul, writing in the epistle to the Romans places the idea of "spiritual" over against the "carnal", "for we know that the law is spiritual (pneumatikos); but I am carnal (sarkikos)" (Rom. vii. 14). "For if the Gentiles have been made partakers of their spiritual things, their duty is also to minister unto them in carnal things" (Rom. xv. 27). In first Corinthians he not only contrasts spiritual with carnal, but also with "natural".

> "The natural man (psuchikos) . . . . . but he that is spiritual . . . . ." (I Cor. ii. 14, 15).
> "It is sown a natural body, it is raised a spiritual body. There is a natural body, and there is a spiritual body" (I Cor. xv. 44).

The "carnal" things of Rom. xv. 27 were good. We can learn from other passages that the apostle was very earnest in his endeavour to fulfil the injunction received at Jerusalem, that in the exercise of his ministry among the Gentiles he should remember the poor saints at Jerusalem, and quite a large portion of the epistles to the Corinthians is occupied with the "collection". These "carnal" things would include food, drink, clothing and other necessities of life. The "natural" is placed over against the spiritual, for the spiritual is supernatural and is enjoyed on resurrection ground.

In complete contrast with the spiritual blessings of the mystery, are the "carnal" or "natural" blessings of the law.

> "Blessed shalt thou be in the city, and blessed shalt thou be in the field . . . . . blessed shall be thy basket and thy store . . . . . the Lord shall command the blessing upon thee in thy storehouses . . . . . the Lord shall make thee plenteous in goods . . . . ." (Deut. xxviii. 1-13).
>
> "Blessed is every one that feareth the Lord; that walketh in His ways. For thou shalt eat the labour of thine hands: happy shalt thou be, and it shall be well with thee. Thy wife shall be as a fruitful vine by the sides of thine house, thy children shall be like olive trees round about thy table" (Psa. cxxviii. 1-3).

How completely opposite all this is from the experience of the believer under the dispensation of grace. Like Paul, he may know what it is to suffer need, to be in want, to know what it is to be continually in trouble. He will have no guarantee of a settled dwelling place, he has no promise of special protection during periods of danger, his "basket and store" may show impoverishment, while the ungodly may appear to prosper. It would be foolish to assess a man's spiritual worth to-day by the size of his bank balance, or the weight of his watch chain. Eph. i. 3 does not speak of daily bread, of dwelling place, of home comforts or of business success, it visualizes a new plane, the spiritual, which is on resurrection ground. The earnest of our inheritance is not a bunch of grapes as it was when the spies returned with the grapes of Eschol, neither are our enemies men of flesh and blood, but spiritual foes.

The individual believer, like the rest of mankind must needs find the means of living and provide things honest in the sight of all men, but these come to him as the blessings of the wilderness. They are no more "spiritual blessings" than the "manna" of the wilderness was the fruit of the land of promise. A member of the one body may be rich or poor, sick or well, troubled or tranquil, but such conditions have no reference to "every blessing that is spiritual" for two reasons, i.e., their nature and their sphere.

This second reason refers of course to the words "in heavenly places" but this subject must occupy our attention when next we meet.

#8. The Muniment Room (i. 3 - 14).
"In heavenly places", "where Christ sitteth".
pp. 21 - 24

The believer in the dispensation of the mystery is blessed with every blessing that is spiritual. No limits are set to the extent of these blessings, only to their character. We now leave one subject of wonder, but to exchange it for another of equal marvel. These spiritual blessings are linked with a sphere "in heavenly places".

IN HEAVENLY PLACES En tois epouraniois.

We have said elsewhere that this phrase is unique, that it occurs in the epistle to the Ephesians and nowhere else. The unwary can easily be moved when they read that, in spite of what we have said, epouranios occurs in fifteen other places outside of Ephesians, as widely distributed as Matthew, John, I Corinthians, Philippians, II Timothy and Hebrews. We have been accused of misleading God's people and of misquoting scripture, and yet, in spite of all that has or can be said we repeat that the phrase "in heavenly places" en tois epouraniois is unique, occurring nowhere else than in the epistle to the Ephesians. The word "heavenly" epouranios most certainly occurs elsewhere, this we have never denied, we read in Matt. xviii. 35 of "My heavenly Father" and in John iii. 12 of "heavenly things", in I Cor. xv. 40 of "celestial bodies" and in Hebrews of those who "tasted of the heavenly gift". No one, so far as our knowledge permits us to say, has ever maintained that those Hebrews who had tasted of the heavenly gift, had actually ascended up to heaven itself in order to taste it! Many things may be heavenly in origin and in character that are not enjoyed "in heaven", and this is the point, it is this feature that is unique.

First let us consider the implications of this term "in heavenly places". What justification is there for the added word "places". The reader will agree that the word "places" answers the question "where?" and our first consideration must be to examine the scriptures to see whether "this is so".

Hou is an adverb of place, and is used elliptically instead of the full expression eph hou topou "in what place". We read in Col. iii. 1 "seek those things which are above WHERE Christ sitteth at the right hand of God". Presently we shall see that "heavenly places" is synonymous with "where Christ sitteth at the right hand of God", and that it is moreover allied with the word ano "above", which also is directly connected with these heavenly places.

This one passage, Col. iii. 1, establishes that Christ is represented as being someWHERE, and if He is said to be seated at the right hand of God in heavenly places in Ephesians, no more need be said on that score. That such a statement is true every reader is aware, for Eph. i. 20, 22 directs our wondering attention to the exalted position of Christ, Who being raised from the dead was set "at His own right hand in the heavenly places". This sphere of exalted glory is further defined, it is said to be "far above all principality and power" (Eph. i. 21). Now the simple connective ano is sufficient to take us to "where" Christ sitteth at the right hand of God (Col. iii. 1), consequently the intensive huperano employed by the Apostle, and translated "far above" in Eph. i. 21, cannot certainly mean less, it must mean more than the simple ano. If we allow the Apostle to speak for himself we shall be left in no doubt as to the nature of this exaltation. In the fourth of Ephesians we read:

> "He that descended is the same also that ascended up far above all heavens, that He might fill all things" (Eph. iv. 10).

Let us notice one or two important features in this passage "He ascended up" anabaino literally means "to go up" as one would a mountain (Matt. v. 1); or as the false shepherds who "climb up" some other way (John x. 1). The ascension is put in contrast with His "descent" katabaino. This also primarily means "to go down" as rain descends (Matt. vii. 25), or when one descends a mountain (Matt. xvii. 9). Eph. iv tells us that His descent was to "the lower parts" kaloteros and that His ascent was "far above all heavens", and lest we should be tempted for any reason to set a limit to this ascent, we are further informed that this descent and this ascent was in order that He may "fill all things". Consequently, the Saviour ascended to the highest conceivable position in glory. Now this position described as huperano "far above all heavens" is found in Eph. i. 21, "far above all principality and power". They are co-extensive in scope and meaning. In other parts of the New Testament we read of this ascension and one or two passages give further meaning and point to the phrase we are examining. When the apostle speaks of the ascension when writing to the Hebrews, he says of Christ that He "is passed into the heavens", which the Revised Version corrects to read "passed through the heavens". The word here is dierchomai "passed through" as Israel passed through the Red Sea (I Cor. x. 1) or as the proverbial camel is spoken of as going through the eye of a needle (Matt. xix. 24). Again, in Heb. vii. 26 Christ is said to have been made "higher than the heavens". We can therefore understand that the epi in the compound epouranios does really indicate position and place—every reference so far considered points to that one fact, this is "where" Christ sits, this is "where" all spiritual blessings will be enjoyed.

However, we have not yet concluded our examination. Christ is said to be in "heaven" (Heb. ix. 24) in the self same epistle that says He "passed through the heavens". How can this be? The Hebrew reader acquainted with the first chapter of Genesis would need no explanation. The heaven, which is "at the right hand of God" is the heaven of Gen. i. 1. The heavens through which Christ "passed" and above which He ascended is called the "firmament" or "expansion" in Gen. i. 6. This "heaven" spread out during the ages "as a curtain" and "as a tent to dwell in" is to pass away. The Lord is far above this limited "heaven" and so is the sphere of blessing allotted to the church of this dispensation.

While there are references in the Old Testament scriptures as well as in the New which show that saints of old knew that there were "heavens" beyond the limited firmament of Gen. i. 6, no believer ever entertained a hope that the sphere of his blessing was THERE where the exalted Christ now sits "far above all heavens", yet this is what we are now to learn.

The expression en tois epuraniois occurs five times in Ephesians as follows:

A	i. 3. "In heavenly places."	Dispensation of fullness of times. Mystery of His will. The purpose in Himself.
B	i. 20. "In heavenly places."	Principality and power. Power, strength, might. Power inwrought.
C	ii. 6. "In heavenly places."	Quickened \ Raised } together. Seated /
B	iii. 10. "In heavenly places."	Dispensation of the grace of God. The Mystery. The purpose of the ages.
A	vi. 12. "In high places" (A.V.). "heavenly places" (R.V.).	Principality and power. Strong, power, might. Power worked out.

We will not attempt to examine these references here, but each one will come before us in its turn, and will be given the attention that such a revelation of grace demands. We have been concerned in this study to establish two related things:

(1) That "in heavenly places" refers to a sphere, a place, a condition that answers the question WHERE?
(2) That "in heavenly places" is unique, and is found only in the Epistle to the Ephesians.

The mystery, concerning which Ephesians was written, is the only calling of believers that goes BACK so far, even to "before the foundation of the world" (an expression that awaits examination), it is the only calling of believers that goes UP to where Christ ascended when He passed through the heavens, when He ascended up "far above all heavens". If these two features alone do not make the calling of the Church of the One Body UNIQUE, language is emptied of its meaning, and all our attempts to let the scriptures speak for themselves is so much waste of time. If "unique" means, "having no like or equal; unmatched, unparalleled, unequalled; alone in its kind in excellence", these references to the phrase en tois epouraniois do most certainly indicate a sphere of blessing "unparalleled, unmatched, unequalled" in all the annals of grace or glory.

The reader may wonder why all this "proof" is necessary for a matter so obvious. If so he has probably been spared the pain of reading the futile efforts of some of God's own children, who, to substantiate their own ideas based largely upon a misunderstanding of the epistle to the Hebrews, would drag the church down from its destined place, and more terrible to relate, in doing so drag down the exalted Lord at the same time. The Church of the One Body, and Christ the Head are raised and seated together. Whom God hath joined together let no man put asunder.

The relation of election with foreknowledge.
pp. 41 - 45

It may be felt that nothing so exclusive, so unique, can be said of any company of believers as that which we have already considered. The unique character of their blessings "every blessing that is spiritual" is so wonderful, that however many times it be repeated, yet, like the love of Christ, it still "passeth knowledge". Added to this we have learned that this company of believers are the only ones who can entertain a hope whose sphere of realization is beyond the present limited "firmament", is indeed "where Christ sits at the right hand of God, far above all". There is however more to be said before our examination of these treasures of grace and glory is in any sense complete. Let us repeat some of the questions that arise as we read Eph. i. 3, 4.

(1) What are these blessings? "Every blessing that is spiritual."
(2) Where enjoyed? "In heavenly places, far above all."
(3) At what period was the inception of this purpose?

It is to answer this third question that we now seek all sufficient grace. Before, however, we attempt this we desire to assure every reader that we have by no means "forgotten" the most important item of all—that is, that these spiritual blessings in heavenly places are ours, and ours only IN CHRIST, but this truth is stated so many times and in so many connections, that we believe it will be more useful to concentrate upon the unique character of the calling of Ephesians, before we consider that every blessing of every calling in any and every sphere, must and only can be "in Christ".

"According as He hath chosen us in Him before the foundation of the world" (Eph. i. 4).

It will be observed that "in Him" carries the thought "in Christ" on to this new theme. These unique blessings, this unique sphere are "according" to something done in a unique period.

Kathos occurs in the New Testament one hundred and eighty-one times and is translated "as" and "even as" one hundred and seventy-one times, which is evidence enough of its primary meaning.

"According as" is found four times, namely in Rom. xi. 8 and I Cor. i. 31 where we read "according as it is written", in II Cor. ix. 7 where it reads "according as he purposeth" and in Eph. i. 4 "according as He hath chosen us". Seeing that kathos is a compound of kata "according to" (Eph. i. 5) and os "as" (Eph. vi. 20), the rendering of kathos by "according as" will be seen to be as near to the primary meaning of the two words as our language will permit. It is evident that the unique blessings and the unique sphere of these blessings already indicated are in accord with, or, in harmony with, an elective purpose.

"According as He hath chosen us." Eklego "to choose" is akin to eklektos "elect" and ekloge "election". Later in this first chapter of Ephesians we read "being predestinated according to the purpose" (Eph. i. 11), which but puts the theme of election before us in other terms. By their very nature "election" and "predestination" are words of high import. They belong to the realm of Divine sovereignty and purpose and cannot be denied or fail. Speculation concerning the subject has led to much strife, and has had in some cases a deadening effect upon life and service, for an element of "fate" has been imported that has stultified effort and paralyzed the exercise of freedom of choice.

While it is beyond the requirements of exposition to turn aside and consider these questions in all their bearings, one feature seems called for to adjust the balance. We are compelled to conclude from the way in which "choose", "elect" and "election" appear in the scriptures, that this choice or election proceeds from God and cannot be altered by man.

"Ye have not chosen Me, but I have chosen you" is the statement of the Saviour concerning the choice of the "Twelve"; and the believers are often entitled "The Elect". Associated with "election" is a "purpose" that must "stand" (Rom. ix. 11), and it is called by its very nature "an election of grace" (Rom. xi. 5). The reader may at some time have come into touch with the Calvinistic doctrine of "decrees", and faced the dreadful consequences of this belief, which by the very relentlessness of its logic, as surely predetermines who are to be irretrievably lost, as it predetermines the number who must be saved. He may on the other hand have been spared this conflict, but to every mind there must come at times concern over this great problem. If man is a moral agent, held responsible for his actions, so that should he transgress he is held worthy of punishment, then by all the laws of right and wrong, that man must have some measure of choice. If he be held in bonds so tight that his very evil acts are the results of an unalterable decree, conscience is seared and every stand of equity destroyed and both "sin" and "salvation" become but hollow mockeries. Man would be the sport of a power indeed greater than himself but a power who could command neither respect nor devotion. Some have faced the facts that there appear to be two lines of teaching in the scriptures, that run side by side but which never appear to meet, and are content to fall back upon the words of Abraham "Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?" One writer says:

> "Rather than give a positive answer to the question, therefore, I should desire, like Burnet, to state the arguments on both sides, and leave the conclusion to others; with Watts, to pronounce, that since we are assured, by reason and scripture, both of human free will and Divine foreknowledge, we may justly believe them both; and to say, with Simeon, that Calvinists would wish scripture to contain fewer Arminian likelihoods and Arminians fewer Calvinistic ones. There is a way of dwelling on the prescience of God which obscures His moral attributes" (Grant).

Having said so much it becomes necessary to say a little more. The problem we are facing can be at least presented with some measure of clearness if we set out the two views represented by the two schools of thought denominated Calvinism and Arminianism.

CALVINISM	ARMINIANISM
Absolute and unconditional predestination with predetermined preterition of the reprobate. (Preterition, first means a state of being past, then the act by a testator of passing over one of the heirs. In theology, "the passing over of the non-elect".)	Predestination upon foreknowledge of the party's acceptance of the Gospel-covenant, and an assertion that nothing is said in Scripture concerning predestination to death. Again, all the passages respecting election, are written to, or concerning, communities.

There are other features in which the Calvinistic doctrine appears truer to the teaching of the scriptures than does that of Arminianism, but these are outside the present argument.

A long list of passages can be quoted from both the Old and the New Testaments which will "prove" that God is sovereign, that whatever He wills must come to pass, that He chose, He predestinated, He willed, that certain men should be saved, become members of an elect nation, or members of an elect church. An equally long list of passages can be quoted from both the Old and the New Testaments which will "prove" that man has freedom of choice, that salvation is to be preached without reservations, that God loved "the world" and not only "the elect", that the word "whosoever" must not be shorn of its meaning to suit a narrow decretive doctrine, and so on and on.

The key to the resolution of the two divine doctrines, namely, predestination and freedom of choice seems to be the word "foreknowledge". Predestination, according to Rom. viii. 29 flows from foreknowledge: "For whom He did foreknow, He also did predestinate." Election, according to I Pet. i. 2 flows from foreknowledge: "Elect according to the foreknowledge of God."

Foreknowledge, when used of man, simply means "to know beforehand", but of necessity, not to predetermine anything.

> "My manner of life from my youth, which was at the first among mine own nation at Jerusalem, know all the Jews, which knew (proginosko "foreknew") from the beginning, if they would testify, that after the stratiest sect of our religion I lived a Pharisee" (Acts xxvi. 4, 5).

The same Paul who had already written Rom. viii. 29 speaks here. Does anyone in his senses contend that Paul put the blame and responsibility for his Pharisaism upon the shoulders of his contemporaries, simply because they "knew-beforehand"? The very thought is absurd.

> "Him being delivered by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God, ye have taken, and by wicked hands have crucified and slain" (Acts ii. 23).

The same Peter who was yet to write I Pet. i. 2 uses the word "foreknowledge" here.

It was the determinate counsel of God that in the fullness of time He would send His Son, Who should willingly offer Himself an all-sufficient sacrifice for sin. When the same Son stood among men, He said:

> "Therefore doth My Father love Me, because I lay down My life that I might take it again. No man taketh it from Me, but I lay down of Myself. I have power to lay it down, and I have power to take it again. This commandment have I received of My Father" (John x. 17, 18).

Here in other language is expressed "the determinate counsel of God". There was however, as we all know, another side to this great question. "Wicked hands" took Him and crucified Him. This was "foreknown" by God for "known unto God are all His works from the beginning of the world" (Acts xv. 18), and as all His works are related down the stream of time with the countless million works of man, it follows that God's foreknowledge must comprehend what free agents uncompelled by any necessity shall at any time do.

The presence of the word "by wicked hands" makes it impossible for "foreknowledge" to be the same as the "predetermined counsel", for then God would have "willed" "wickedness", and as wickedness is essentially that which is contrary to His will, the whole becomes an involved absurdity. Contingent actions foreknown, do not always, of necessity, take place. An example is found in I Sam. xxiii. 10-13. David asked the Lord whether Saul would come down to Keilah, and the answer was "He will come down". David consequently enquired whether the men of Keilah would deliver him up to Saul, and again the Lord answered "They will deliver thee up", as a result of this "foreknowledge of God" David withdrew, and neither did Saul come down nor did the men of Keilah deliver him up. Here then is an example of foreknowledge which most certainly was not "predetermination", for nothing happened. Whenever and wherever we have a world of contingency, a world in which has been introduced the word "if", so that even God Himself says "if you do this or that, then I will do so and so".

Jonah preached to Nineveh "Yet forty days and Nineveh shall be overthrown" but Nineveh repented, and Nineveh was not overthrown. We shall be wise therefore, to leave the word foreknowledge to mean just what it says and no more. The infinite knowledge of God makes it impossible that He shall not know who will preach and who will teach; where they will go, and when they will go; who shall hear, who reject, who accept, and who be left without a word of the gospel. The one great demand upon all who hear the gospel is that they believe the testimony of God concerning His Son. Whoever so believes passes into all the blessings purchased by the blood of Christ. Whoever does not believe makes God a liar (I John v. 10). If there were any idea of preordination in this, refusal to believe would be as much a part of God's predeterminate decree as is election to glory, and it would not be possible to make God a liar by so refusing His testimony. Further, in the passage before us foreknowledge is differentiated from predestination, for we read: "Whom He did foreknow, He also did predestinate." If we alter the word "foreknow" to any word bearing the sense of predetermining or predestinating, the sentence ceases to have meaning, as, for example, if we read: "Whom He did foreordain He also did predestinate."

We therefore understand the passage before us to declare that God, Who is not under the limitations of time and space as we are, knows all things, past, present and future, knows them perfectly and completely, and can, therefore, act with complete certainty where, to us, all would appear in a contingent light.

The whole testimony of the Scriptures is to the effect that God has a purpose before Him, according to which He works and, in accord with that purpose of peopling heaven and earth with the redeemed, He foreknew everyone who would respond to the call of grace, and accordingly marked them off beforehand for the various spheres of glory that His purpose demanded.

If we believe that God fixed unchangeably, from all eternity, whosoever should, in time, believe, then however much we may hedge and cover the fact, there is but one logical conclusion, a conclusion that, in days gone by, has driven many to the edge of despair. That conclusion is, that He Who absolutely and unalterably fixed the number who should believe, as surely fixed unalterably the number of those who should not believe, a conclusion so monstrous that it has only to be expressed to be rejected.

> "How then shall they call on Him Whom they have not believed? And how shall they believe in Him of Whom they have not heard?" (Rom. x. 14).

Perhaps a simple illustration may help us in appreciating the relation of God's foreknowledge with the purposes of election. One of the world's master chess players, the type that can take on several opponents at once and beat them all, if he stood for a moment and glanced at the chess board of two very average players could say "in two moves you will be checkmated", and he would in all probability be right. His foreknowledge however would in no wise compel these chess players to make any particular move. This master chess player had such a thorough knowledge of all the possible moves that he could foreknow, as we have suggested. God knows all possible combinations of heredity, of environment, of temperament, of time, place and circumstance, "all things are naked and open" in His eyes. The illustration may be crude, and bristles with weak points, but it may point the distinction that must be made between foreknowing a thing, and predestinating a thing, and also may suggest how it can be that God can infallibly know what a free agent will choose to do without in any sense influencing the act.

This has been a big digression. We come back to Eph. i. 4 "according as He hath chosen us in Him before the foundation of the world" with a solemn sense of the grace thus made known, and bow in worship and in wonder at the love that could so plan and so give for the salvation of those who by this very Divine foreknowledge were foreseen to be utterly unworthy.

#10. The Muniment Room (i. 3 - 14).
The Threefold Charter of the Church.

"Before the foundation of the world."
Part I. In which the word "katabole" is examined and the testimony of the LXX exhibited.
pp. 61 - 65

The unique blessings of the Church of the One Body are "according" to an elective purpose. Now, it is by no means true to say that "election" or "predestination" is a peculiarity of the dispensation of the mystery, the very distribution of these terms sufficiently disproves such a statement, and no one has ever put such a proposition forward. Yet there is something unique in Eph. i. 4 that, when once perceived, makes the calling of the Church of the One Body completely separate from that of any other company spoken of in the Scriptures. The peculiarity of this calling does not rest in the word "foundation" whatever the word shall ultimately prove to be, it rests on the word "before", this is the unique feature. All other callings are related to a choice and a purpose that is dated "from" or "since" the foundation of the world; this calling of Ephesians alone is related to a choice and a purpose that goes back "before" that era. As a certain amount of doctrine must be built upon these two prepositions "before" and "from", some acquaintance with them seems called for.

Pro "before" is a preposition that indicates place, time and preference.

(1) Before in respect of place:
"The Judge standeth before the door" (James v. 9).
(2) Before in respect of time:
"Judge nothing before the time" (I Cor. iv. 5).
(3) Before in respect of preference:
"He is before all things" (Col. i. 17).

Apo "from" is a preposition that indicates separation or origin. The primary use of apo is with reference to place, but by a recognized transition, it can be employed of the distance of time, of the temporal terminus "from which".

"From that time Jesus began to preach" (Matt. iv. 17).
"From two years old or under" (Matt. ii. 16).
"From the beginning of the world" (Eph. iii. 9).

The two expressions "from the foundation of the world" and "before the foundation of the world" occur as follows:

FROM THE FOUNDATION.

(1) With reference to the use of parables, in speaking of the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven.

"That it might be fulfilled which was spoken of by the prophet, saying, I will open my mouth in parables; I will write things which have been kept secret from the foundation of the world" (Matt. xiii. 35).

(2) With reference to the separation of the nations at the second coming of Christ.
"Then shall the king say unto them on His right hand, Come, ye blessed of My Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world" (Matt. xxv. 34).

(3) With reference to the character of those who killed the prophets sent to them:
"That the blood of all the prophets, which was shed from the foundation of the world, may be required of this generation" (Luke xi. 50).

(4) With reference to the typical character of the Sabbath:
"As I have sworn in My wrath, if they shall enter into My rest: although the works were finished from the foundation of the world" (Heb. iv. 3)

(5) With reference to the character of the offering of Christ:
"Nor yet that He should offer Himself often . . . . . for then must He often have suffered since the foundation of the world" (Heb. ix. 25, 26).

(6) With reference to names written in the book of life:
"Everyone whose name hath not been written from the foundation of the world, in the book of life of the Lamb that hath been slain" (Rev. xiii. 8 R.V. margin).
"They whose name hath not been written in the book of life from the foundation of the world" (Rev. xvii. 8 R.V.).

BEFORE THE FOUNDATION.

(1) With reference to Christ alone:
(a) "Thou lovedst Me, before the foundation of the world" (John xvii. 24).
(b) "As of a lamb without blemish and without spot; who verily was foreordained before the foundation of the world" (I Pet. i. 19, 20).

(2) With reference to the Redeemed:
"Chosen in Him before the foundation of the world" (Eph. i. 4).

Comment upon the most obvious difference between these two sets of passages is unnecessary. Let us, however, not miss one precious item of doctrine that is revealed by comparing the three references to "before the foundation" together.

In John xvii. 24 Christ was "loved" agapao; in I Pet. i. 19, 20 He was "without blemish and without spot" amomos. In Eph. i. 4 the believer is said to have been chosen before the foundation of the world "in love" agape, to be "blameless" amomos.

Here, those who were chosen in Christ, were looked upon as being so closely identified with Him, that the same terms are used. No wonder that as we proceed we read of further identification with the Beloved, that not only speaks of being "crucified together with Christ" but "raised together", "seated together" and ultimately to be "manifested together with Him in glory".

These two sets of terms "before" and "since" indicate two distinct time periods. Further studies will show that "before" or "since" the age times is a somewhat similar set of terms, but before these can be allied we must arrive at some understanding of the meaning of the word "foundation".

Our thoughts naturally turn to such passages as Job xxxviii. 4 and Isa. xlviii. 13 where the Lord speaks of "laying the foundation of the earth". Now, happily, we have a New Testament quotation in Heb. i. 10, where the word "foundation" is expressed by the word themelion, but when we turn to any of the passages where the words "before" or "from" the foundation of the world occur, themelion is not found, but instead the word katabole is employed.

Now it is impossible to argue that Paul, for some peculiar reason, would not and did not employ the word themelion, for it occurs as the translation of the foundation of a temple in Eph. ii. 20, "the foundation of the apostles and prophets", and again in I Cor. iii. 10 and II Tim. ii. 19. Therefore, there must be some good reason for choosing so different a word as katabole. This word has entered into our own language as a biological term, metabolism, being the name given to the process in an organism or a living cell, by which nutritive material is built up into living matter and this process is divided into (1) constructive metabolism which is called anabolism, by which protoplasm is broken down into simpler substances to perform special functions; and (2) destructive metabolism, which is called katabolism.

In its biological use, katabole indicates "destruction". It is strange, that a word which means "to place upon a foundation", should have been adopted by scientists to indicate the very opposite, namely disruption. Very clear evidence of the essential meaning of katabole can be gathered from the usage of the verbal form kataballo. This verb kataballo is used three times in the New Testament:

> "Cast down, but not destroyed" (II Cor. iv. 9).
> "The accuser of our brethren is cast down" (Rev. xii. 10).

indicate very clearly the meaning of the word.

In Heb. vi. 1 the word is used with themelion, the true word for a foundation, and there it appears to have its primitive meaning "cast down", but whether in the sense of overthrowing, or of laying a foundation, only a most exhaustive study of the context can decide. Job xii. 14, quoted below, has a bearing.

Kataballo occurs twenty-nine times in the Septuagint version of the Old Testament Scriptures. It will strengthen the faith of many, and deepen the conviction of most, if these references which contain the word kataballo are quoted, but to avoid occupying a disproportionate amount of space, verses will not be given in full. We will also quote from the A.V. instead of giving a translation of the LXX version, except in those cases where the LXX uses an entirely different text. Those who have access to the LXX will not be hindered by this course and those who cannot refer to it will be helped.

> "Joab battered the wall, to throw it down" (II Sam. xx. 15; LXX II Kings).
> "Ye (they) shall fell (felled) every good tree" (II Kings iii. 19, 25; LXX IV Kings).
> "As one was felling a beam" (II Kings vi. 5; LXX IV Kings).
> "I will cause him to fall by the sword" (II Kings xix. 7; LXX IV Kings).
> "They slew him with a sword" (II Chron. xxxii. 21).
> "Behold He breaketh down, and it cannot be built again" (Job xii. 14).

"He teareth me in His wrath" (Job xvi. 9).

"Thy remnant shall fall by the sword" (Ezek. xxiii. 25).
"They shall destroy the walls of Tyrus, and break down her towers" (Ezek. xxvi. 4).
"He shall cast down with his swords" (LXX translation, Ezek. xxvi. 9).
"He shall cast down thy walls" (LXX translation, Ezek. xxvi. 12).
"I will leave thee thrown into the wilderness" (Ezek. xxix. 5).
"I will cause the sword to fall out of his hand" (Ezek. xxx. 22).
"Have him cast down upon the mountains" (LXX translation, Ezek. xxxi. 12).
"Will I cause thy multitude to fall" (Ezek. xxxii. 12).
"Thou shalt fall upon the mountain of Israel" (Ezek. xxxix. 4).
"He shall cast down many ten thousands" (Dan. xi. 12).

This is rather a formidable list, and the verification of each reference is no light task, as in one or two passages there is no obvious Hebrew equivalent, yet we believe it is impossible for any reader not to be impressed with the solidarity of its witness. Every single reference is for the translation "overthrow", not one is for the translation found in the A.V. of Eph. i. 4.

This however is not all. If each reference be read in its context, the references will be found to be those of battle, of siege, of destruction, of judgment, which tilt the beam of the balances still further. If in addition we discover what Hebrew words have been translated by kataballo in the LXX our evidence will be complete. These we will supply, for the benefit of any who may not have the facilities to discover them.

Naphal.	"To cast down, to fall" (LXX, II Sam. xx. 15 and sixteen other references).
Charas.	"To crush" (LXX Job xii. 14; Ezek. xxvi. 4, 12).
Shachath.	"To mar, corrupt or destroy" (LXX Ezek. xxvi. 5).
Natash.	"To leave, spread out" (LXX Ezek. xxix. 5; xxxi. 12).
Nathats.	"To break down" (LXX Ezek. xxvi. 9).
Parats.	"To break forth" (LXX Job xvi. 14; Psa. xxv. 29).
Taraph.	"To tear" (LXX Job xvi. 9).
Satam.	"To hate" (LXX Job xvi. 9).

Not a solitary Hebrew word that means to build, to lay a foundation, to erect, is here but a variety of words everyone meaning destruction, is spoiling, or causing to fall. This is "proof positive", no reasoning is necessary except the most elementary recognition of fact when it is presented. From every point of view, the word katabole in Eph. i. 4 should be translated "overthrow".

The Church of the One Body consequently is blessed with peculiar blessings, these blessings are to be enjoyed in a peculiar sphere, and now we learn, they are according to a purpose made at a peculiar period.

#11. The Muniment Room (i. 3 - 14). The Threefold Charter of the Church.

"Before the foundation of the world."

Part II. In which the Hebrew word "tohu va bohu" are associated with the Greek "katabole", to which is appended the opinion of several geologists.

pp. 81 - 85

We have provided evidence in the preceding article to justify fully the translation "the overthrow of the world" in place of "the foundation of the world" in Eph. i. 4. This however is but the first step in our enquiry. Important as the correct translation of katabole may be, it loses its value if we are unable to place it in its true position in the outworking of the purpose of the ages. Our quest is a dual one. We ask "when" this overthrow took place and "why" it took place, and if true answers can be given to these questions, we shall then be able to appreciate the unique calling and character of the present dispensation, which alone of all callings is associated with this period "before the overthrow of the world".

In the list of occurrences of the phrase "from the foundation of the world" will be found one quoted from Luke xi. 50 (see last issue, p.62). This speaks of the blood of the prophets that has been shed "from the foundation of the world", and does not leave us in doubt as to the name of the first on this list of martyrs, for it immediately adds "from the blood of Abel". Only one person is so named in the Scriptures, and although he is mentioned by name but four times in the New Testament on three occasions there is reference to his blood that was shed. This reference alone is sufficient to discredit one attempt that has been put forward to refer "the foundation of the world" to the yet future kingdom of the Lord.

We go back therefore to the early chapter of Genesis, to a period before "Abel", to discover this "overthrow". There are a number of references in II Peter that focus our attention upon the flood in the days of Noah, and this too could well be described as an "overthrow of the world", but the reference to Abel providentially prevents us from drawing a line at Gen. vi. We must go back to an earlier period. The opening verse of the book of Genesis stands alone. It is the record of the primal creation before the advent of iniquity and judgment. This unique verse is expressed in the Hebrew language by seven words, fourteen syllables and twenty-eight letters, a feature with which the student of scripture will be familiar. The second verse in the Authorized Version reads:

"And the earth was without form and void; and darkness was upon the face of the deep."

The Revised Version reads:

> "And the earth was waste and void; and darkness was upon the face of the deep."

Rotherham renders the passage:

> "Now the earth had become waste and wild, and darkness was on the face of the roaring deep."

The first item which calls for attention is the true rendering of the verb "was". The Authorized Version, it will be noticed, uses "was", but in the same verse where "was" is repeated this is found to be in italics. If we glance down the chapter we shall see this italic was in verse four, or the plural were in verse seven. In the phrase "it was so" (Gen. i. 7) the word "was" is in ordinary type. In the phrase "and God said that it was good" (Gen. i. 10) the word "was" is in italics.

What is the reason for the interchange of type? "Was" and "is" are parts of the verb "to be", and this has no equivalent in the Hebrew. Where the word is printed "was", it is a rendering of the verb "to become" and not "to be" so Gen. i. 3 could read:

> "And God said let light come into being, and light came into being."

That the word so translated does not mean that Gen. i. 2 represents the way in which creation came into existence, but rather, that it subsequently "became" as it is there described, other examples will illustrate.

> "And the LORD God formed man of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, and man BECAME a living soul" (Gen. ii. 7).
>
> "I shall be a fugitive and a vagabond in the earth, and it SHALL COME TO PASS, that every one that findeth me shall slay me" (Gen. iv. 14).
>
> "I will remember . . . . . and the waters shall no more BECOME a flood to destroy all flesh" (Gen. ix. 15).
>
> "But his wife looked back from behind him, and she BECAME a pillar of salt" (Gen. xix. 26).

The pages of Scripture are filled with examples of the use of these two words "was" and "is" printed in italics, which represent the verb "to be", and the words "was", "is" and "become" printed in ordinary type, which indicated a subsequent event.

Man was not a living soul until he breathed, then he BECAME one. Cain was not looking back but forward to the possibility of the future, and Lot most surely did not marry a pillar of salt, his wife of many years "became" one. We must therefore revise Gen. i. 2 and read:

> "And the earth BECAME without form and void."

Some scholars moreover translate the word "and" at the beginning of this sentence by the adversative "but" as introducing an opposite state of affairs to that found in the primal creation of Gen. i. 1. In this the LXX concurs, using de "but" instead of kai "and", which shows that those early translators looked upon Gen. i. 2 as something distinct from initial creation.

What the earth "became" is revealed by the two Hebrew words that are translated "without form" and "void". They are tohu and bohu.

Tohu. Gesenius says that this word is derived from an unused Chaldee verb meaning "to be waste, desert" which gives us the word that appears twenty times in the Hebrew Old Testament. It is variously translated "without form", "waste", "vain", "vanity", "nothing", "wilderness", "empty place", "confusion" and "things of naught". It never refers to anything constructive, but always something wasted and spoiled. Moses, the writer of Gen. i. 2 uses the word to describe "the waste howling wilderness" of Israel's wanderings (Deut. xxxii. 10) and we can believe that he did not employ the word tohu in Deuteronomy in a meaning entirely opposite to that of Gen. i. 2. The fact that so many times tohu is translated "vain" again indicates the conditions obtaining in Gen. i. 2.

Bohu also comes from an unusual root which means to be "empty", as a house that is unoccupied. This word occurs but three times in the Scriptures, and on each occasion it is paired with tohu. In Isa. xlv. 18 we read:

> "For thus said the LORD that created the heavens; God Himself that formed the earth and made it; He hath established it, He created it NOT IN VAIN, He formed it to be inhabited."

Here we learn from God Himself the Creator, that He did not create the earth tohu; if He did not create it so it must have become so as a subsequent event. Moreover, we can learn from the parallelism of the verse, that tohu indicates an uninhabited condition "a waste, empty confusion".

In Isa. xxiv., the prophet speaks of "the city of confusion" tohu (verse 10), and this in a context that speaks of the earth being made "empty", "waste", "turned upside down", "utterly spoiled", "utterly broken down", and "clean dissolved" (Isa. xxiv. 1, 3, 10, 19). It will also be observed that the prophet extends the meaning of tohu until it resembles the companion word bohu by adding "every house is shut up" (verse 10).

Now this state of desolation is definitely said to be a "punishment". "The earth shall reel to and fro like a drunkard . . . . . the LORD shall punish the host of HIGH ONES THAT ARE ON HIGH, and the Kings of the earth upon the earth" (Isa. xxiv. 20, 21).

Here, this state of confusion is seen to be a judgment that falls upon the earth, not only for the evils wrought by kings on earth, but by "high ones on high". This word "high" is used not only of high places on the earth, but as here in contrast with the earth, with heavenly heights even the dwelling place of the Lord Himself (Isa. lvii. 15).

Already we have read enough to warrant the thought that:

(1) Gen. i. 2 indicates a state entirely different from God's creative purpose. "He created it not tohu."
(2) Gen. i. 2 can be likened to a waste howling wilderness, something empty and uninhabitable, a confusion very different from creation which was intended to be "inhabited".
(3) Gen. i. 2 is seen to be a "punishment" that descended upon "high ones that are on high" for this judgment took place long before Adam was created.
(4) The words of Heb. ii. 5 imply that a past world had been subjected to Angels, and that before Adam.

When we examine the two occasions where tohu and bohu occur together other than in Gen. i. 2, punishment is most evident.

Isa. xxxiv., where these words are found together, is set in a scene of judgment. Here is a collection of terms taken from this chapter: indignation, fury, utterly destroy, slaughter, all the host of heaven shall be dissolved, and the heavens be rolled together as a scroll, a sword bathed in heaven, curse, judgment, for it is the day of the Lord's vengeance and the year of recompence for the controversy of Zion, the streams turned to pitch, the dust to brimstone, burning pitch, it shall not be quenched night nor day, it shall lie waste. These words are all found within the compass of the first ten verses of this chapter! With such a vocabulary nothing but judgment can possibly be the theme.

In the eleventh verse, we meet with the words tohu and bohu "without form and void":

> "And He shall stretch out upon it the line of confusion (tohu) and the stones of emptiness (bohu);"

and this judgment is followed by thorns, nettles and brambles, and the place becomes an habitation of dragons, and a court for owls, together with wild beasts, satyrs, screech owls, vultures and other unclean creatures. It is beyond the ability of a truthful witness to deny that these words tohu and bohu are set in a context of dire judgment. The other reference is Jer. iv. and here the words are translated as in Gen. i. 2. Jeremiah sees an evil that threatens Zion from the North, likens it to a lion, and calls it "the destroyer of the Gentiles" who brings desolation in his train, laying cities waste, without inhabitant (Jer. iv. 6, 7).

The prophet continues:

> "I BEHELD the earth, and lo it was without form and void and the heavens, and they had no light.
> I BEHELD the mountains and lo they trembled and all the hills moved lightly.
> I BEHELD, and lo, there was no man and all the birds of the heaven were fled.
> I BEHELD, and lo, the fruitful place was as a wilderness and all the cities thereof were broken down, at the presence of the Lord, and by His fierce anger" (Jer. iv. 23-26).

Here again the testimony of Scripture is clear. "Without form and void" are indubitably terms, NOT of Creation, but of Judgment, Gen. i. 2 therefore must refer to an "overthrow", and the word katabole in Eph. i. 4 must be so translated.

While we do not attempt to make Scripture bend and bow to the findings of "Science", for these are continually changing, yet as the interpretation of Gen. i. does invade the territory of geological science, the reader may find the following testimony of a Scientist of interest. Lt.-Col. L. M. Davies, M.A., F.G.S., F.R.S.E., F.R.A.I., writes:

> "I mistrust all attempts to treat the six days of Gen. i. as geological epochs instead of literal days. All such attempts arise from, and aim at supporting the idea that the fossiliferous rocks were laid down during six days, and I find fatal objections to the idea in the fact that these rocks are packed with evidences of disease, fear, pain, abortions and internecine strife . . . . . How could God have called such things 'very good' during creation days if He regards them as abominable now?"
>
> "The third chapter of Genesis introduced the curse and all those aborted and offensive structures, typified by serpents in the animal world, and thorns and thistles in the vegetable world, which characterize the internecine strife of nature today."
>
> "As a geologist and as a Christian I see only one way of reconciling scripture with the testimony of the rocks, and that is by taking the six days of Genesis as literal days, days when a previously ruined world was restored and provided with an (unfortunately only temporarily) ideal population" (Trans. Vic. Inst. LXX 79-83).

Mr. Thomas Fitzgerald, meeting the accusation that the interpretation of Gen. i. 2 was only put forward to save the face the Scripture in view of geological findings said: "Not when geology was a young science, but centuries before geology or biology were thought of, learned men translated Gen. i. 2 as the English words 'and the earth became without form and void'."

Dr. Paley, Regius Professor of Hebrew, Oxford, says: "The belief that creation, at least, dated backward for countless ages, was current in the church some 1400 years before geology" (Trans. Vic. Inst. LXX 85).

The names of several scholars of high repute can be cited in support of this translation:

John Harris, D.D., "The Pre-Adamite Earth", and "Man Primeval";
The Rev. David King, LL.D., "The Principles of Geology" (2nd Edit.);
The Rev. T. R. Birks, M.A., "The Bible and Modern Thought";
The Rev. Charles Herbert, M.A., "Neology not New" (2nd Edit.);
The Rev. E. B. Pusey, D.D., "Daniel the Prophet".

We believe that the translation of the word katabole by "overthrow" is fully justified and completely in harmony with the testimony of the Septuagint version of the Old Testament and refers to Gen. i. 2, which itself has been shown to be, not the state of the world as it came from the hands of the Creator, but the state of the world after judgment had fallen upon it.

The question that still awaits consideration is, seeing that Adam was at that time uncreated, who or what, caused the "overthrow of the world". This we must consider in our next article.

#12. The Muniment Room (i. 3 - 14).
The Threefold Charter of the Church.

"Before the foundation of the world."
Part III. In which the agents that brought about the state described in Gen. i. 2 are shown to be angelic.
pp. 101 - 104

We have given considerable space to the examination of Eph. i. 4 and have proved that the Church was chosen "before the overthrow of the world" which is recorded in Gen. i. 2. The fact that the Church is associated with the "heavens" of Gen. i., and that it is associated with "principality and power" in those heavenly places "far above all", makes the mind meditate the possibility that angelic and satanic rebellion was the agent of the overthrow, especially when we remember the "high ones on high" of Isa. xxiv. 21.

Moreover the "Serpent" of Gen. iii., and the cherubim of that same chapter seem related, while the words:

> "For unto the angels hath He not put in subjection the world to come whereof we speak" (Heb. ii. 5).
> "Thou madest him for a little while inferior to the angels" (Heb. ii. 7, margin).

seem to indicate that a past world had been subjected to angels and that Adam at his creation was most definitely appointed in their room and stead. Because things may "seem" to be, however, does not justify the building of a doctrine. We must have a much more definite basis as a foundation for so important a teaching and consequently we must turn to the Scriptures to discover what they teach on the subject.

It is clearly established Scripture that there was a fall among the angels. Let us make this matter sure before proceeding.

Angels sinned.	"If God spared not the angels that sinned" (II Pet. ii. 4).
Angels revolted.	"The angels that kept not their first estate" (Jude 6).
Angels at war.	"There was war in heaven, Michael and his angels, fought against the dragon; and the dragon fought and his angels" (Rev. xii. 7).
The Dragon.	"That old serpent, called the Devil and Satan" (Rev. xii. 9).
Principalities.	"Angels, authorities (principalities) and powers" (I Pet. iii. 22).
	Some Principalities are foes. "Neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities" (Rom. viii. 38).
	"Having spoiled principalities and powers" (Col. ii. 15).
	"We wrestle . . . . . against principalities and powers" (Eph. vi. 12).
	"Fire, prepared for the devil and his angels" (Matt. xxv. 41).
Pride.	"Lest being lifted up with pride, he fall into the condemnation of the devil . . . . . lest he fall into reproach and the snare of the devil" (I Tim. iii. 6, 7).

The epistle to the Hebrews looks back to a world which had been under the rule of angels, and in keeping with the limitations of that epistle this would include the ministry of the law of Sinai, for we read more than once that the law "was ordained by angels" (Gal. iii. 19; Acts vii. 53; Heb. ii. 2). The epistles of Peter and of Jude take us back to the days of Noah, but Ephesians goes back before the overthrow of the world, and while there are indications of a fall among the angels, just before the flood, and which indeed brought about that dreadful catastrophe, there are indications that something similar, and perhaps on a vaster scale, took place before the overthrow of Gen. i. 2, and was the reason for that great catastrophe.

We must admit that explicit teaching on the subject is not to be found in the Scriptures, and that anyone whose faith refuses the witness of type and analogy, is at liberty to refuse such teaching. We however are convinced that all Scripture is profitable, and has been written with a purpose, and that if we evade or omit these difficult portions of Scripture, our faith will necessarily suffer. The great amount of Old Testament scripture that deals with events long past, indicates that much of it is recorded because it sets forth in type or by analogy other and vaster issues.

In the opening verses of Genesis we are told nothing of the nature of the original creation, but are taken in one stride across the darkness of the great deep, to the six days work of restoration and preparation for the man, Adam, who, as we know, was made for a little while inferior to the angels. Into this creation which had been pronounced "very good" comes unheralded and unexplained "the serpent" and at the close of the third chapter, in perfect structural balance, we have "the cherubim". It is this strange symbolic creature that leads us to a passage in Ezekiel that sheds light upon the relation of Satan to the earth prior to the overthrow. There is no doubt as to the identity of this serpent. Rev. xii. 9 speaks of the dragon as "that old (or ancient) serpent, called the Devil (Greek) and Satan (Hebrew)".

The bait of the temptation in the Garden of Eden is found in the words "ye shall be as gods" (Gen. iii. 4, 5). The word "gods" can be accepted as an ordinary plural referring to the "gods", a word sometimes translated "angels" by the LXX, or it may be taken to refer to the Supreme, Elohim, God Himself.

Satan is spoken of in the Scriptures as the god of this age, and the prince of the power of the air, and he moves in spheres and exercises powers that are beyond the range of human experience or understanding. It is therefore necessary to use type and symbol in the endeavour to bring his person and activities within our present comprehension. We are acquainted with many of these symbols, "the roaring lion", "the angel of light", "the false accuser", "the serpent" come readily to mind. There are others that are imbedded in Old Testament history and prophecy that are not so well known. To one such analogy we now direct the reader's attention.

In the prophecy of Ezekiel we have a series of historic references that exhibit certain traits that lead up to the great revelation of Ezek. xxviii. Ammon (Exek. xxv. 1-7), Moab and Seir (8-11), Edom (12-14) and the Philistines (15-17) are all judged and denounced, and then follows in fuller detail the charge and the doom of Tyre. The judgment on Tyre includes a repetition in miniature of Gen. i. 2.

> "When I shall bring up the deep (Heb. Tehom, same word Gen. i. 2) upon thee, and the great waters shall cover thee" (Ezek. xxvi. 19).
> "I will make thee a terror, and thou shalt be no more" (Ezek. xxvi. 21).

The doom pronounced in verse twenty-one is repeated in chapters xxvii. and xxviii. The denunciation of Tyre continues throughout chapter xxvii., where we meet the boastful saying "I am of perfect beauty" (3), and after a long series of descriptive reference to the merchandise of Tyre we return to the doom already pronounced:

> "Thou shalt be a terror, and never shalt thou be any more" (Ezek. xxvii. 36).

Yet, Tyre continues to occupy the attention of the Prophet, for Ezek. xxviii. opens with an address to "the prince of Tyre". This chapter is divided into three parts, from verse twenty to the end Zidon comes into view, but for the moment can be left out of our reckoning. Verses 1-19 is a complete section and is divided into two portions, verses 1-10 speaking of the Prince of Tyre, who for all his boasting is after all "a man and no god" and shall die the death of the uncircumcised by the hand of strangers (9, 10); and verses 11-19 which speak of the King of Tyre, whose end is described in the words "Thou shalt be a terror, and never shalt thou be any more" (19). But this time the doom is accompanied by statements that lift this character out of the ordinary. Instead of being a "man" and dying the death of the uncircumcised at the hand of strangers we have this strange statement:

> "I will bring forth fire from the midst of thee, it shall devour thee, and I will bring thee to ashes upon the earth in the sight of all them that behold thee" (18).

When Ezekiel described the appearance of the One who occupied the throne supported by the Cherubim, he said:

> "From the appearance of His loins even upward, and from the appearance of His loins even downward, I saw as it were the appearance of fire" (Ezek. i. 27).

and if we look at Ezek. xxviii. 14, 16 we shall read:

> "Thou art the anointed cherub that covereth . . . . . I will destroy thee O covering cherub, from the midst of the stones of fire."

Such appearances, titles and experiences are superhuman, words like these apply strictly to an order that is above the human, the angelic.

The Prince of Tyre seems to be a type, a reflection, a shadow of the King of Tyre, the former being human, the latter superhuman. The Prince of Tyre lifted up his heart in blasphemous boasting, and in so doing revealed the nature of the greater supernatural blasphemer. He had said "I am God" (2) and had a conceited estimate both of his wisdom and beauty (3, 7). The opening description of this mighty being is truly wonderful:

"Thou sealest up the sum, full of wisdom, and perfect in beauty" (xxviii. 12).

The "Companion Bible" renders this "Thou art the finished pattern", and the Hebrew word for sum means a "measure" or a "standard". In Ezek. xliii. 10 the word is translated "pattern".

"Thou hast been in Eden the garden of God" (Ezek. xxviii. 13).

When speaking of the fall of another boaster, namely Pharaoh, Ezekiel reverts to this same "Eden" saying:

"All the trees of Eden, that were in the garden of God envied him" (xxxi. 9).

Then, because of his pride, he is thus addressed:

"To whom art thou thus like in glory and in greatness among the trees of Eden? Yet shalt thou be brought down with the trees of Eden unto the nether parts of the earth" (18).

The Garden of Eden of Gen. ii. and iii. belongs to this present creation, and into this garden the "Serpent" entered. It may be that before the world was overthrown there was in that earlier creation a garden of God in Eden, for the somewhat strange passage quoted from Ezek. xxxi. suggests that it was the scene of a rebellion and judgment anterior to the sin of Adam.

Spurrell translates xxviii. 13, "Thy covering veil was adorned with every precious stone", and the list of precious stones there given call to mind the breastplate of Aaron, the foundations of the New Jerusalem, and of the vision already described in Ezek. i. 26-28, and that seen by John in Rev. iv. 3-6. This "covering" or "veil" is the Hebrew mesukah. The masculine form masak is used in twenty-two out of twenty-five occurrences of the "hanging", "covering", or "curtain" of the tabernacle (Exod. xxvi. 36; xxxv. 12; Numb. iii. 26).

All the hangings of the tabernacle were associated with approach. This "anointed cherub" appears to have held a holy office, and we read that he was upon the holy mountain of God, yet by reason of iniquity, his heart being lifted up because of his beauty, he was cast out as profane, and finally will be brought to ashes and never be any more. A fuller exposition with much more attention to detail in found in The Berean Expositor, Volume XV, pp. 113-128, 130-133, which should be consulted if available. We feel sufficient has been brought forward to justify the teaching that:

Satan, now fallen, and yet to be destroyed, once held a high position before the overthrow of Gen. i. 2.

He aspired to be like God, and was cast out as profane.

He was the anointed "cherub", and so the connection between the serpent of Gen. iii. and the "cherubim" of the same chapter is intentional.

The fall took place before the present "firmament" existed, and hence, the sphere from which he fell, namely "Heaven" as distinct from "the firmament", must be referred to as "far above all heavens" or the "heavenly places" of Eph. i. 3.

The Mystery was never a subject of Old Testament teaching, neither was it revealed until Israel were dismissed in Acts xxviii. It links the original heavens with the future when God will be all in all, and the Church of the One Body is seen to be the only company of the redeemed whose sphere of blessing is directly connected with the heavens of Gen. i. 1 which never pass away. For similar reasons "principality and power" rather than "angels" are named in association with this church.

#13. The Muniment Room (i. 3 - 14). The Threefold Charter of the Church.

"Before the foundation of the world." Part IV. In which the objection that "the world" cannot refer to Gen. i. 2 is refuted, and the opposite demonstrated and proved. pp. 121 - 125

In the tenth article of this series evidence was given of the unanimous testimony of the Septuagint version to the fact that kataballo ALWAYS means throw down, NEVER lay or build or found in any sense whatsoever. We were at some pains to make the evidence complete, omitting no reference and adding a list of the Hebrew words thus translated, because we had in mind an attack which had been made upon the translation "overthrow" in Eph. i. 4 by a writer whose name we will not divulge, but refer to him as "X". He is quite sure of himself, for he writes:

> "The 'Disruption' theory, so far as related to the New Testament, is another optical illusion, a mirage which disappears the closer we look at it. Yet the theory has been greedily ingurgitated by many ignorant souls who have been unable to refute the specious arguments put forward. Every one of the passages wherein the word katabole occurs deserts this clumsy yet alluring theory, and upon close examination reveals it as a fiction and a mirage."

We await this writer's reaction to the publication of the testimony of the Septuagint, particularly as he was at pains to quote Plutarch, Herodotus and other Pagan writers to support his interpretation but made no attempt to enlighten "many ignorant souls" who could not make the search, that the LXX was solidly against his views. The reference made by "X" to an "optical illusion" arose out of his own experiences. Going home one night he "suddenly encountered a real live ghost" he says, his "hair stood on end" when suddenly "a large cow with a white head" made him realize that "the whole adventure was due to an optical illusion". Well, we hope "X" will again be undeceived. At the moment Plutarch and Herodotus have dazzled his mental eyes, but it is possible that after pondering the twenty-nine witnesses provided by the LXX, his "illusion" will resolve itself once again into a homely cow "with a white head bobbing up and down". The unfortunate thing is, however, "many ignorant souls" will still believe in the "real live ghost". While "X" was under this illusion he naturally had a distorted vision, and so he set about proving that the "world" in the New Testament cannot refer to anything outside human society, and that it never signifies a planet or a star. He writes:

> "Our next step must be, in case someone should enquire, 'Is the word kosmos never used of an orb, a starry world, a planet?' to find out just how the term is used in the New Testament. Kosmos occurs in the N.T. nearly 190 times. There is thus very ample scope to fix its true meaning and characteristics. In the LXX it is found about two dozen times."

In this last sentence "X" makes it clear that he knew what the LXX teaches as to the meaning of kosmos, but here he practices what he has elsewhere called "elliptic reasoning", which quietly ignores evidence that is awkward or antagonistic to his views. He occupies another eight pages of print in which he can find space to quote from six Pagan Greek writers, but if he had quoted ONE reference, namely, the first occurrence of kosmos in the LXX his attack would have been exposed for the worthless thing it is.

Before quoting the LXX, let us examine the Dictionary, for we suppose "X" is not so great an authority that he can set aside the accepted usage of the word cosmos in English speech. The following is taken from "Lloyd's Encyclopædic Dictionary":

> "COSMOS. Greek—(1) order, (2) ornament, (3) ruler, (4) the world or universe from its perfect order and arrangement as opposed to chaos."

It will be seen that the Editors of this Dictionary would have had no hesitation in using cosmos of Gen. i. 2, in fact their reference to "chaos" almost supposes that it had been in mind. To proceed with the quotation:

> "Ancient Philosophy. The Term kosmos in the fourth sense appears first in the philosophy of Pythagoras. His followers Philolaos, Callicratides, and others adopted the word, as did the philosophic poets Xenophanes, Parmenides and Empedocles. From them it passed to the natural philosophers, with whom it became a current word. The stoics used it for the anima mundi or the soul of the world. With regard to extent it had several senses: (1) the earth, (2) the firmament, (3) the region in which the stars are fixed or apparently move; in the Alexandrian Greek, the known world."

As Pythagoras was born about B.C.580, it is evident that the word kosmos had an established meaning before the LXX incorporated it into that version. If the word thus established by usage is given a new meaning, evidence will be necessary and forthcoming.

Let us repeat "X" question after the reading the history and usage of the word kosmos. "Is the word kosmos never used of an orb, a starry world, a planet?" asks the imaginary "ignorant soul" that "X" envisages, and the remainder of his article is intended to prove that the answer is "NO". He attempts to cover himself by limiting his enquiry to the usage of kosmos in the New Testament. But that will not do—unless Eph. i. 4 and other references to "the foundation of the world" are to be considered as outside the New Testament. We are not concerned with the limited fallen disrupted "world" that lies about us, and of which we form part, we are concerned with the meaning of that "world" so intimately associated with the period of our election to glory, and "X" is out to show that kosmos can have no reference to "an orb, a starry world, or a planet".

Let us now bring forward our first witness. The first occurrence of kosmos is in that venerable version, the Septuagint. Grinfield in his "Apology for the Septuagint", says:

> "This version of the Hebrew Scriptures was made between two and three centuries before the Christian era, and was universally received by the Hellenists or Jews of the Dispersion as authoritative and canonical, being publicly used in their synagogues both before and after the Christian era. Christ and the apostles, in their reference to the Old Testament, make their principal citations in the words of the LXX, and occasionally, where it differs from the Hebrew text. The bulk of the citations in the New Testament, are equal in extent to Mark's Gospel. The most remarkable and important feature of this version consists in its regular selection of the same doctrinal words and expressions, as those which were subsequently adopted by the Evangelists and Apostles. The terms Repentance, Faith, Righteousness, Justification, Redemption, Sanctification, &c.,: together with the titles of the Lord, Christ, Saviour, Holy Spirit, &c., are the very same in the Alexandrian version as in the New Testament, and they are precisely in the same meaning" (Author's own italics).

Such is the character of the witness we are about to hear. The first occurrence of kosmos in the LXX is Gen. ii. 1:

> "Thus the heavens and the earth were finished, and ALL THE HOST (kosmos) of them."

The Hebrew word translated "host" or "kosmos" is tsaba, the essence of which is "order'. It is used of the assembly in orderly troops of soldiers and of the starry host of heaven, God calling Himself "The Lord of Hosts". Gen. ii. 1 certainly includes Adam, (which is not the point at issue), it also includes "heaven and earth" "all the host of them" which "X" denies. There are one or two other places in that "two dozen" references so cavalierly dismissed, that are written long after man's world had become the thing it is, yet including the heavenly bodies and heavenly rulers—all of which the uncritical reader loses if "X" is blindly followed.

> "And lest thou lift up thine eyes unto heaven, and when thou seest the SUN, and the MOON, and the STARS, even all the host (kosmos) of heaven" (Deut. iv. 19).

Is Moses to be reckoned as among those who mislead "ignorant souls"? If so we are glad to be numbered with him. Here right in the midst of man's world, Moses declares that the kosmos includes the whole starry universe. Shall we repeat the oratorical question (i.e. a question that is put, but which does not seek an answer), "Is the word kosmos never used of . . . . . a starry world . . . . .?" Deut. xvii. 3 repeats the truth already expressed in iv. 19. The prophet Isaiah takes us further. He includes in the kosmos beings who are evidently spiritual powers, for they are used as a parallel with kings on the earth.

> "The Lord shall punish the host (kosmos) of the high ones that are on high, and the kings of the earth upon the earth" (Isa. xxiv. 21).

Here kosmos embraces the higher ranks of heavenly beings, and this one passage is enough to justify our contention that the "world" that was overthrown at the bringing in of chaos at Gen. i. 2, includes "principalities and powers" as in Eph. vi. 12. These "high ones" (marom, Heb.) would be included in that great ascension spoken of in Psalm lxviii. and Eph. iv.:

> "Thou hast ascended on high (marom); thou hast led captivity captive."

We have already referred to Isa. xxvi. 5 by reason of its use of kataballo "The lofty city, He layeth it low; He layeth it low even to the ground". We now refer to the same verse for a reference to "them that dwell on high (marom)". "Kosmos" therefore includes the living "hosts" of heaven as well as the "starry host". Shall we forfeit all this revealed truth just because most of the New Testament references to the word are concerned with man's limited sphere? Again, in Isa. xl. 26 we are exhorted to lift up our eyes "on high" and behold Who hath created these things, that bringeth out their host (kosmos) by number. Here the kosmos includes "created" things that are above the earth. Our mentor "X" says "In the Greek Old Testament, we admit freely, kosmos signifies ornament or adornment", but a witness even in a human court is expected to speak "the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth", why therefore this admission concerning "ornament" and the omission of the passages now brought forward that he contradicts?

We now append the references found in the LXX where the idea "ornament" or "delight" is intended. Prov. xxix. 17. Here the word kosmos translates a Hebrew word, whose root gives us the name "Eden", where the Garden of Gen. iii. was planted. Eden is used as a type of restoration in Isa. li. 3. Exod. xxxiii. 4, 5, 6; II Sam. i. 24; Isa. xlix. 18; lxi. 10; Jer. ii. 32; iv. 30; Ezek. vii. 20; xvi. 11; xxiii. 40 are passages which speak of "ornament", and Prov. xx. 29; Isa. iii. 18; xiii. 10 and Ezek xvi. 13 speak of delight, glory or constellations, but all have the basic meaning of orderly arrangement that is a character of ornament and adornment. The Hebrew word which is translated "create" in Gen. i. 1 is bara, which primarily means "to cut, carve, form by cutting, pare down, to plane, to polish". In Josh. xvii. 15 this "creating" is done with an "axe". The world is an ornament, a jewel, fashioned by the loving wisdom and power of the Creator, and when the restoration or the new creation is in sight, the scripture reverts to this conception of a jewel fashioned and polished with care. Speaking of the new Jerusalem in Isa. liv. 11, 12; lxv. 18, the prophet says:

> "I will lay thy stones with fair colours, and lay thy foundations with sapphires. And I will make thy windows of agates, and thy gates of carbuncles, and all thy borders of pleasant stones."

The reader will not need a quotation from Revelation to show that the same lavish adornment characterizes also the heavenly city.

All this may at first seem far removed from Eph. i. 4 but we could not stand by and allow those less fortunate than ourselves to be so misled and so defrauded of fact without incurring a great responsibility. We have now had sufficient evidence to justify the translation of Eph. i. 4 "before the overthrow of the world" and its reference back to Gen. i. 2 and that kosmos is not only the created universe, but includes spiritual beings also.

We must now pick up the thread of our exposition and resume our normal positive method of teaching, but there may be other occasions when it will again become necessary “to contend earnestly for the faith” and when they do present themselves we pray that we may not be found wanting.

Part V. Showing that the kosmos “the host” of Gen. ii. 1 refers to the conflict of the ages and cannot be disassociated from the idea of “war”. pp. 141 - 144

We have demonstrated from the Septuagint that the translation “overthrow” for foundation in i. 4 is fully justified, and that the word “world” kosmos embraces not only the limited dominion and age of man, but includes the heavens, the earth and the starry host. If we leave the matter there, however, we shall but play into the hands of the great enemy of truth, who must already be rejoicing that some of the saints of God are using their powers to blind the eyes of the believer to the judgment that fell on him in Gen. i. 2. The matter however involves our loyalty to Him Who is not only our Saviour, not only our Head, but One Who has called us to be good soldiers, for remote as it may seem at first sight, the introduction of the word kosmos (Gen. ii. 1) involves a reference to the battle array of the Lord of Hosts. First let us turn to Ephesians, and consider the occurrences of the word kosmos. In three references the word is simple, but in one, the word is composite.

Kosmos in Ephesians.

A | i. 4. Chosen . . . before the overthrow of the world.
B | ii. 2. The Prince of the power of the air . . . according to age (aion) of this world.
A | ii. 12. Gentiles (who had been chosen as in A) were without Christ, without hope, without God, in the world.
B | vi. 12. Principalities and powers, the world rulers of the darkness of this age (aion) in heavenly places (cf. “the air”).

It is evident that here we have a record that vitally influences our calling and walk. Those Gentile believers whose election “in Christ” dates from before the overthrow, found themselves “in the flesh” in an abandoned condition in the present world. The prince (archon) of the authority (exousia) of the air, is balanced by the principalities (arche) and authorities (exousia), while “the age of this world” is exactly answered by the “world rulers of the darkness of this age”. This also is “the authority of darkness” from which we have been delivered, according to Col. i. 13.

Kosmos is employed by the Septuagint in Gen. ii. 1 where we read “all the host of them”. The word translated kosmos in the Greek and “host” in the English is the Hebrew tsaba. Lloyd in his analysis says of this verse and word: "The allusion is to the marshal array of an army. All the parts of the visible creation, like a disciplined army, had their proper place."

The only objection to this comment is that it does not go far enough. The kosmos was not "like" a disciplined army, IT WAS AN ARMY and there was at the time of the six days' creation a state of war in the universe, the chosen battlefield being the earth with its immediate heavens. It is not enough to merely make such a statement. Readers of The Berean Expositor expect demonstration and proof.

Tsaba the Hebrew word translated "host" and kosmos occurs in two forms, the verb thirteen times, the noun 486 times. The verb is translated "fight", "war", "muster", "assemble", "wait upon" and "perform". Even where it is employed in describing the service of the tabernacle, the margin (Numb. iv. 23 and viii. 24, 25) tells us that the service equally with that of the soldier in the field was "to war the warfare". Two references to "assemble" are used only of women, and could be unrelated to the conception of war, but even then we do not really know why these women "assembled in troops" at the tabernacle. The noun is translated mostly by the word "host", of itself a military term, and then "war", "warfare", "army", "battle" and "soldier" leaving only thirteen references out of the 486 to be translated "appointed time", "company", "waiting upon" and "service", and even among these the margin in the Revised Version has rendered some by the word "warfare". Moses uses the word tsaba seventy-nine times, of which seventy-seven speak of war, battle, army and host, and two of the host of heaven. In Dan. x. 1 where we read "the time appointed" the Revised Version reads "warfare". The occurrences of tsaba in Daniel apart from this reference are viii. 10, 11, 12, 13, where the antichristian king of the latter days wages war against the host of heaven, ultimately to be broken without hand (viii. 25).

"The Lord is a Man of War" says Moses at the overthrow of Pharaoh at the Red Sea. The Hebrew word haras which is translated kataballo in some other places, is used here in Exod. xv. 7; the "depths" that closed over Pharaoh and his host (Exod. xv. 5) is the Hebrew tehom identically the same that is used in Gen. i. 2. The same word that is used of "the Spirit" that moved on the face of the waters for the reconstruction of the world is translated "blast" in Exod. xv. 8. Like the flood in the days of Noah, as the epistles of Peter testify, the overthrow at the Red Sea is a smaller version of that primal catastrophe, and enables us to see that these were all acts of "war". Another lesser picture of the same conflict is that of the destruction of a Canaanitish king Sisera at the hand of a woman. Deborah the prophetess when commemorating the victory says:

> "The kings came and fought, then fought the kings of Canaan in Taanach by the waters of Megiddo . . . . . they fought from heaven; the stars in their courses fought against Sisera" (Judges v. 19, 20).

Here the heavenly host, spoken of as "stars", engage in conflict, and Megiddo but looks forward to Armageddon, the mountain of Megiddo, where will be fought the "battle of the great day of God" (Rev. xvi. 16) with all its demonic accompaniments. Revelation plainly tells us that there will be "war in heaven" and the fallen followers, "the army" of Satan are likened to "the stars of heaven" (Rev. xii. 4, 7, 9). Here, Satan is said to be "cast out", the Greek word being kataballo, the long deferred "overthrow" first introduced in Gen. i. 2. The critic ("X") referred to in the preceding article, does not seem to know how to avoid the evidence of this verse, all he can offer his reader is the comment: "The word used is the passive of ballo, at Rev. xii. 10 and it is erroneous to render this as 'the accuser of our brethren was cast down'. This has been changed in the latest C.V. to cast (out)." But the "ignorant" reader is left still asking what really does happen to Satan according to chapter twelve of Revelation. It is one comfort to notice that even "X" the critic has not the temerity to suggest that Michael and his angels were endeavouring to put Satan upon a more solid foundation. If Satan is not said to be "cast down", John needs to be corrected in his further testimony for he says "the devil IS COME DOWN" and that he was "cast UNTO the earth" (Rev. xii. 12, 13). If he does come down, then to all intents and purposes kataballo is correctly translated in the Authorized Version. If "X" desires to leave Satan "suspended", Michael and his angels will act otherwise. Thank God, the accuser of the brethren will be cast down. Cunnington, whose accuracy is often acknowledged by "X" translates Rev. xii. 9 "he was cast down unto the earth", and verse ten "was cast down". In the former passage the simple verb ballo is used, in the later the intensive form kataballo. If ballo can be translated "cast out" or "cast down" kataballo when referring to the same event can mean nothing else than "cast down". No wonder "X" treats chapter twelve "elliptically".

Just before the overthrow of Jericho under his leadership, Joshua is reminded of the heavenly army that was led by "The Captain of the Lord's host". One so holy, that Joshua was told to take off his shoes (Josh. v. 15). All that Israel did was to compass the city, led by the priests, an invisible host destroyed the defences of the city. The emphasis upon the seven times seven, the blowing of the Jubilee "trumpet" and the "shout", help us to see that here once again is a type of the overthrow of the Satanic system at the time of the end. If Michael was this Captain, or Prince (see margin Dan. x. 13, 20, 21), then at the second coming of Christ, we have the fulfillment of this type, the last trumpet, the shout, and the voice of the Archangel (I Cor. xv. 52; I Thess. iv. 16).

When Adam was placed in the garden he was told not only to "dress" it, but to "keep" it, and what this "keeping" involved can be gathered from the next occurrence of the word, "Cherubims, and a flaming sword which turned every way TO KEEP the way of the tree of life" (Gen. iii. 24). Adam failed as a good soldier, he let down his guard, he was deceived by the enemy, and the war took another serious turn. This feature of course has been repeated again and again, and is a matter of present history. The employment of the "fifth column" is as old as Eden. Elisha the prophet, knowing of this heavenly host or army, reassured his fearful servant saying:

> "Fear not: for they that be with us are more than they that be with them . . . . . and he saw, and behold, the mountain was full of horses and chariots of fire round about Elisha" (II Kings vi. 17).

All this and more is implied in the first use of kosmos by the Septuagint translators. This earth is the battle ground upon which the conflict of the ages is being fought. The collapse of Adam gave Satan a grip upon the world and mankind, and he became "the god of this age", "the prince of this world" and "the prince of the authority of the air". The nation of Israel were used by God against the Canaanites, but there is also a heavenly phase of this warfare, and with this the church of the mystery is involved:

> "For we wrestle not against flesh and blood but against principalities, against powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world, against spiritual wickedness in high places" (Eph. vi. 12).

"World rulers" of darkness is the Greek kosmokrator, kratos meaning power. Rabbinical writers actually adopted this Greek word and turned it into Hebrew, using it sometimes of Satan, sometimes of the angel of death, and sometimes of earthly kings. Wetstein says that the title was used of Sisanchosis, king of Egypt as "emperor of the word", and the interrelation of earthly monarchies with heavenly though fallen princes is indicated in Dan. x. It is therefore of the utmost importance that we do not allow the references to the present "world" which is to pass away, and which at the present time is largely under the power of Satan, to blind our eyes to that greater kosmos, that "host" of which the Lord is leader, which will ultimately triumph over evil and establish righteousness and peace. Every redeemed child of God is called to be a good soldier in this glorious army. He is provided with complete armour, and a trusty weapon. May every reader realize the gravity of our calling and the utmost call there is for single-eyed loyalty. These articles have been somewhat of a digression, but the contention for the faith needs no apology, and none is offered.

"Quit you like men, be strong."
"Endure hardness as a good soldier of Jesus Christ."
"God Himself is with us for our Captain."

#15. The Muniment Room (i. 3 - 14). The Threefold Charter of the Church.

"Holy and without blame" seen against the background of Ezek. xxviii.

pp. 161 - 165

We have spent considerable time in the endeavour to present something of the importance that the phrase "before the foundation of the world" holds in the dispensation of the mystery, and have seen that there are three unique features revealed in Eph. i. 3, 4 that for ever set the mystery apart as a revelation and a calling.

The blessings are "all spiritual" or "every blessing that is spiritual".
They are "in heavenly places" en tois epouraniois. In the super-heavens.
They were planned "before the overthrow of the world", i.e. before Gen. i. 2.

We now move to a contemplation of the purpose with which these unique things are associated. They are:

That we should be holy and without blame before Him in love.
Having predestinated us unto the adoption of children.
Having made us accepted in the Beloved.

"That we should be holy." How easy to write, how easy to read, but what worlds of thought these few words contain. The very conception of holiness is of a thing apart. We meet men in the ordinary walk of life who would not hesitate to claim that they are as "good" as the next man. The very Apostle who wrote Ephesians could write concerning himself "touching the righteousness which is in the law, blameless", but the claim to "holiness" is never heard in the ordinary walks of life. Every day in the conduct of daily business, the word "just", "good", "true" will be used by thousands in the course of business correspondence, but one could search the files of a year's mail, and be fairly sure that the word "holy" would never be found therein.

> "Thou sealest up the sum, full of wisdom, and perfect in beauty."
> "Every precious stone was thy covering."
> "Thou art the anointed cherub that covereth."
> "Thou wast upon the holy mountain of God."
> "Thou hast walked up and down in the midst of the stones of fire."
> "Thou wast perfect in thy ways."

In contrast with this list of excellencies let us tabulate his defection.

> "By multitude of thy merchandise, they have filled the midst of thee with violence, and thou hast sinned; therefore I will cast thee as profane out of the mountain of God."
> "Thou hast corrupted thy wisdom by reason of thy brightness."
> "Thou hast defiled thy sanctuaries . . . . . by the iniquity of thy traffic."

However far from ordinary experience the above account may be, it is very clear that this King of Tyre had to do with holy things. The anointing, the covering, the holy mountain, the stones of fire, the sanctuary all alike speak of holy things.

So also the fall. The "merchandise" was not the ordinary trading of an ordinary merchant, this "traffic" "defiled" sanctuaries.

We have seen that Ezek. xxviii. speaks of the fall of a being, in terms not suitable if that "anointed cherub" was but a descendant of fallen Adam. We have seen sufficient to believe that there is contained in this symbolism a reference back to "before the overthrow of the world" and to "the heavenly places" which were the realm of this great one, set forth as the King of Tyre.

If the church of the mystery was chosen to occupy the place and position forfeited by Satan and the principalities and powers that fell with him, then, we shall find by examination a further link between Ezek. xxviii. and Eph. i. 4 and its insistence upon "holiness".

If we remember the word “holy” is allied with the word “whole” in its derivation, the words “Thou sealest up the sum, full of wisdom and perfect in beauty” (Ezek. xxviii. 12) take on a fresh significance. That the mighty being spoken of by Ezekiel had an office intimately connected with holy things, is evident.

He was cast out as “profane”, he was charged with “defiling” his “sanctuaries”, He was “the anointed cherub that covereth” and had been on “the holy mountain of God”.

While the word translated “traffic” and “merchandise” retains its usual significance in Ezek. xxviii. 5; when it is used of this anointed cherub (who can scarcely be conceived of as a “merchant” in the ordinary sense of the word), when it is used of such a being, and speaks of “traffic” in holy things, the word takes on a sinister meaning. Even among men “traffic” in holy things is looked upon with horror and loathing. This feeling is supported by the fact the Hebrew word rekullah is derived from the word ragal “to go about”, which word is translated “backbite” (Psa. xv. 3), “spy” (Gen. xlii. 9) and to “slander” (II Sam. xix. 27).

The LXX renders the words “he hath slandered” by methodeusen “to deal deceitfully”, a word which will call to mind in many readers the language of Eph. vi. 11 “the wiles (methodias) of the devil (deabolou)”, and this diabolos is rendered “slanderer” (I Tim. iii. 11). This reference in I Tim. iii. is but an extension of verses 6 and 7 which warn against the snare of the devil, in connection with the care of the Church of God.

To one entirely unacquainted with the original languages in which the scriptures are written, such a long drawn out attempt to relate the Anointed Cherub, with traffic, which in its turn lends itself to the names of Satan and Devil, and through the LXX, to the “wiles” of the devil, and so back again to the emphasis upon “profane”, “defile”, “sanctuary” and the like, may seem a trifle far-fetched, but were we all as acquainted with the primary and derived meanings of words in the original language as we are, without conscious effort with similar phenomena in our mother tongue, these lengthy explanations would be unnecessary. This association of the word “to go about” with Satanic characteristics, is repeated in the use of another word found in Job, where Satan replied to the Lord’s enquiry, that he had come “from going to and fro in the earth” (Job i. 7). It should be remembered that this same word is used of the Lord when we read:

> “The eyes of the Lord run to and fro throughout the earth” (II Chron. xvi. 9).
> “They are the eyes of the Lord, which run to and fro through the whole earth” (Zech. iv. 10).

These same eyes are mentioned immediately after the scene which is introduced with “Satan standing at His right hand to resist” (Zech. iii. 1).

Again, as it is impossible to imagine the “Anointed Cherub” of Ezek. xxviii., running a business and being a “merchant” in the ordinary sense of the term, so we suspect that when Zechariah, speaking of the day of Israel’s restoration, says “there shall be no more the Canaanite in the house of the Lord of hosts” (Zech xiv. 21), he is but allying himself with those other writers who speak of "no more" death, curse or pain. If the word Canaanite had been translated "trafficker" as it is in Isa. xxiii. 8, or "merchant" as it is in Hosea xii. 7, or in Job xli. 6, the link with Ezek. xxviii. and the "traffic in holy things" would have been apparent. These prophetic associations, moreover, give point to the Saviour's reprimand "make not My Father's house an house of merchandise" (John ii. 16). The declared purpose behind the choice of the church "before the overthrow of the world" is that it should be "holy", and the contrast which appears to be intended here, between the church and that company which with Satan fell, through "trafficking in holy things", enables us to see with clear cut precision what one characteristic at least, should dominate all others in the estimate of the believer to-day. We have received a "holy" as well as a "high calling", and the first detailed description of the walk that should correspond, is given in Eph. iv., where it is the "keeping" as a sacred trust, the unity of the Spirit, keeping unsullied from the bribery or corruption of compromise. When we come to Eph. i. 18, and enquire as to the meaning of the phrase "in the saints", we hope to make it plain that this directs our attention to "the holiest of all", but until we can prove this we must not include it in our present exposition.

The two words "holy" and "blameless" (or "without blame") are repeated in Eph. v. 27 and Col. i. 22.

One passage in Ephesians disposes of any idea that the believer can accomplish the Father's object, and that is v. 27. There the blessed and comforting truth is declared, that the Father's object expressed (Eph. i. 4) is accomplished by the sacrifice of His Son:

> "Husbands, love your wives as Christ loved the Church, and gave Himself for it, in order that He might sanctify (hagiazo, "holy" is hagios) and cleanse it with the washing of water by the word, in order that He might present it to Himself a glorious church, not having spot or wrinkle or any such thing, but in order that it should be holy and without blemish" (Eph. v. 25-27).

The words are exactly the same as those rendered "holy and without blame" in Eph. i. 4. What fullness! what assurance! The Father's object accomplished by His Son, our Lord. Oh that the Lord's people could rest here, cease their vain strivings, and rest in the words of blessing—"it is finished".

Col. i. 12-22 brings before us this same blessed truth. There again we find the Father and the Son in perfect accord:

> "Giving thanks unto the Father, who hath made us meet (sufficient) unto the portion of the inheritance of the saints (or holy place, hagion) in the light, Who hath delivered us from the authority of darkness, and hath translated us into the kingdom of His beloved Son . . . . . You that were sometimes alienated, and enemies in your mind by wicked works, yet now hath He reconciled in the body of His flesh through death, to present you holy and unblameable (the same word as used in Eph. i. 4 and v. 27) and unreproveable in His sight."

Meetness for the inheritance, the Father's object (Eph. i. 4; Col. i. 12), is the result of the offering of His Son, our Lord (Eph. v. 25-27; Col. i. 22). Positively holy, negatively without blame or blemish, made meet by the Father, presented perfect by the Son, surely none can refrain from the words of praise, "Blessed be God Who hath blessed us".

The condition of "blamelessness" and "spotlessness" (Eph. i. and v.) is that which pertained to the Lord Jesus in the capacity of the great sacrifice for sin.

> "The precious blood of Christ as of a lamb without blemish (cf. Eph. i. 4), and without spot (Eph. v. 27), who verily was foreordained before the overthrow of the world" (I Pet. i. 19, 20).

In this passage we learn that not only is the believer's state of blemishlessness exactly the same as that of the Lord Jesus, but that the same mark of time (before the overthrow) is spoken of them as it is of the Lord as the fore-ordained Lamb.

Every additional verse we have read in this connection has strengthened and deepened our knowledge and faith in the completeness and perfectness of our standing "in Him". Eph. i. 4 adds one more clause which is too important to miss. All this perfectness and holiness is "before Him". The expression "before Him" is no vague term, but is the rendering of a very intense and searching word, katenopion. In II Cor. ii. 17 the Apostle uses this strong word (according to the received text) when seeking to show that he was not a corrupter or trafficker of the word, but "as of sincerity (tested by sunlight), as of God, speak we in Christ" (cf. II Cor. xii. 19; Jude 24).

Eph. i. 4 renders katenopion autou "before Him", Col. i. 22 "in His sight". The less emphatic word enopion occurs several times (see Rom. xii. 17, Rev. iv. 5, &c.). The qualification is stated positively, holy; negatively, without blame; and positionally, before Him. If the holiness provided by the Saviour can endure the light of God's presence we have that which is perfect and complete. To attempt to improve it or make it more secure is to miserably fail. This perfect standing before God, this completeness in Christ, is the basis of the words:

> "Let no man, though he wishes it, defraud you of your prize, persuading you to self humiliation and the worship of angels" (Col. ii. 18).

The Seraphim veil their faces in the divine presence, "but we all with UNVEILED FACE, as in a mirror, behold the glory of the Lord". We have "boldness of access with confidence by the faith of Him". We do not glorify this wondrous grace by depreciating the perfectness of the holiness which is ours in Christ. In ourselves we are nothing but He is all. Of ourselves we are darkness, but we may walk in the light as He is in the light, for the precious blood of Christ cleanseth from all sin.

This then is the object of the Father's choice. What a calling is ours! Those who are thus holy in Christ are called saints. These demand our love (Eph. i. 15), our prayers (vi. 18), and only as we, in spirit, embrace all saints shall we begin to understand the fullness of the love of Christ (iii. 18). We cannot make ourselves holy, we cannot keep ourselves holy, but the Lord asks us to "walk worthy of the calling" (Eph. iv.), for He has "saved us and called us with an holy calling" (II Tim. i. 9).

The Father's Motive. In Love. pp. 181 - 183

Some believers, who hold the Calvinistic doctrine of the decrees, are so antagonistic to the suggestion which we have earlier put forward, namely that the Divine foreknowledge which could see beforehand whether a free moral agent would or would not believe the gospel, that one of them, after reading the article in Volume XXVII, page 33, stooped to attack us by means of "an open letter", but if we will but read to the conclusion of Eph. i. 4 we shall discover that the initial cause of our election and salvation, is neither the Sovereign decree of the Most High, nor the foreseen faith of the poor human recipient, but simply and solely the promptings of Divine Lord, which is the root and cause of the whole purpose of redeeming grace.

"IN LOVE."—This we shall find is true of other callings than that of Ephesians.

> "Thou art an holy people unto the Lord thy God; the Lord thy God hath chosen thee to be a special people unto Himself, above all people that are upon the face of the earth. The Lord did not set His love upon you, nor choose you because ye were . . . . . but because the Lord loved you" (Deut. vii. 6-8).

Blessed "arguing in a circle"! The Lord loved you . . . . . because He loved you.

Here we meet with "choice" a "special people", "above all" in connection with this earthly calling, which reflects the high glories of the super-heavenly calling. Yet, however diverse these callings may be, whatever dispensational differences are apparent, however great the contrast between law and gospel, one thing remains constant, the primes cause of all causes, is Love.

This phrase ("In love") occurs six times in the epistle, namely in i. 4; iii. 17; iv. 2, 15, 16 and v. 2. The first occurrence deals with pure doctrine, speaking of the choice of the Father before the foundation of the world; the second occurrence reveals this love to be the root and the ground from which all Christian graces spring; the remaining occurrences have to do with Christian walk and practice, "forbearing in love", "speaking the truth in love", "edifying in love" and "walking in love".

Those who have had the responsibility of translating the Scriptures into the tongue of a people who have hitherto entertained very depraved conceptions of God, or of moral virtue, will appreciate the problem that was before the writers of the New Testament when the time came for the Gospel of God's love to be written. Paul was about to declare of that trinity "faith, hope and love", that the greatest of these is "love". John was to write that golden verse "John iii. 16", and in his epistle was to reveal that "God is Love". While the Greek language contained three words all translatable by the one word "love', two of them, by reason of human frailty could not justly bear the new burden imposed by the true conception of the love of God manifested in the gift of His Only Begotten Son.

The three Greek words which are translated by the word "love" are agapao, phileo, and erao. Of these, erao, and its derivatives eros and erastes were rendered impossible by reason of the sensual associations which clung to the word. A statue to Eros the God of Love may be a thing of beauty as viewed from the standpoint of art, but when translated into terms of the moral and spiritual, anything tainted by eroticism must for ever be forbidden.

Phileo, and its derivatives, while free from the corrupting taint that spoiled the first word, was unsuitable owing to its confessed limitations. Phileo is used of affection generally, and when joined with the words to stomati, meant "to kiss", even as philema means "a kiss". So in the New Testament philanthropia which is once translated as "love of God towards man" (Titus iii. 4) is rather benevolence, and "philanthropy" has become a fully accepted English word. Philos occurs twenty-nine times and each occurrence is translated "friend". There remained therefore agapao and its derivatives. Agape which is the word selected by the inspired writers, is unknown in classic Greek literature. The conception of "love" that the highest human culture had reached before Christ was exhausted in the terms erao and phileo. It must surely be an evidence of Divine Inspiration, that without the possibility of consultation and collaboration, every writer in the New Testament was constrained (1) to avoid altogether the word erao; (2) to use phileo in its broad human sense of benevolence and friendship, and (3) to seize upon the obscure and practically unknown agape, to bear the new image and superscription of the God of love.

The following is the way in which the occurrences of the phrase "in love" group themselves:

A | i. 4. The Father's motive.
  B | iii. 17. Rooted and grounded (figures of growth and building).
    C | iv. 2. Forbearing one another in love.
    C | iv. 15. Being true in love.
  B | iv. 16. Increase and edification (figures of growth and building).
A | v. 2. The children's walk ["Be ye imitators of God" (v. 1)].

The Father's motive must be the children's example. How can we ever hope to attain such selfless love in this life. Even with the aid of the Spirit and all abounding grace, such love seems beyond us. But the very recognition of this will but separate and exalt the great primary cause of all causes, the Father's love.

Chapter v. 1 makes it clear that the Father's love, which was before all time and the love of Christ which manifested itself in its fullness when He gave Himself for us are associated together as purpose and means are associated. Again, when once the Apostle was assured of the love of the saints one to another, he could pray for their further enlightening. The benediction with which the epistle closes, is "love with faith", the rich mercy of God towards us flows from His great love (Eph. ii. 4), and the climax prayer (Eph. iii. 14-21) reaches out to "the love of Christ which passeth knowledge".

One of the most precious titles of the Saviour in the epistles is "The Beloved" (i. 6), in Whom we are accepted. The only other occurrences of agapao in Ephesians are found in v. 25-33.

Whatever our business and whatever the circumstance, let us remember "His great love", reminding ourselves that we can only love Him, because He first loved us. Our acceptance even as our calling originates in love, and a loveless walk can only belie our calling. The Father's all comprehensive motive shall in measure be the motive of His children, it shall be IN LOVE.

Adoption.
pp. 201 - 207

"Having predestined us unto the adoption of children" (Eph. i. 5). Predestination.—It is impossible for the mind to dwell upon this term without it being influenced by the word "destiny". Destiny calls up the idea of fate, inexorable and unalterable, and so we have the expression of this in the Westminster Confession which reads:

> "That the number of those predestinated to life, and of those foreordained to death, is so certain and definite, that it cannot be either increased or diminished."

It is difficult to see how any one holding such a doctrine, could ever preach the Gospel of salvation, could ever contemplate the "plucking" of even "one brand from the burning" or why anyone should bother to preach at all. The overshadowing of the word "destiny" is plainly marked, and many of the advocates of Calvinism are Necessitarians. In a letter to Archbishop Crammer, the reformer, Melancthon complained:

> "At the commencement of our Reformation, the STOICAL disputations among our people concerning FATE were too horrible."

We have in our library a treatise on "Necessity" by Toplady, the writer of the hymn "Rock of Ages", who does not hesitate to quote ancient Pagan Philosophies to support his high-Calvinism.

The word "destination" may convey in some contexts, the most fixed and unalterable of fates, while in another it may be just the attaining of a journey's end. To meet one's "Waterloo" may mean meeting one's fate, to be met at "Waterloo", or "Waterloo Station was his destination", can have no such element of "destiny" about it. We must therefore avoid importing any ideas into the doctrine of predestination that derives from the composition of the English word.

The Greek word translated "predestinate" is a compound of pro "before" and horizo "to set bounds". In the New Testament horizo is translated "determinate", "ordain", "limit", "declare". This word gives the English "horizon" which has no element of fate in its meaning, but means simply the "boundary" where sea and sky appear to meet. Predestination occurs twice in Ephesians, one it is "unto adoption" and once to an "inheritance" (Eph. i. 5, 11). This second occurrence falls into line with the usage of the LXX.

Horizo in the LXX is found in the proximity of the words kleros and kleronomia, words that mean "the obtaining of inheritance by lot":

> "This shall be your west border" (horion, Numb. xxxiv. 6).
> "Jordan shall be their boundary (horion) on the east: this is the inheritance (kleronomia) of Benjamin" (Josh. xviii. 20).
> "See, that I have given to you (lit. 'cast upon you') these nations that are left to you by lots (klerois) to your tribes . . . . . and the boundaries (or he shall be bound horizo) shall be at the great sea westward" (Josh. xxiii. 4).

In the context of most of the references to horizo will be found words that mean an inheritance obtained by lot.

Seeing the Apostle has linked "predestination" prohorizo with "obtaining an inheritance" (kleroo), this Old Testament usage must be recognized.

Predestination, or "marking off beforehand" is what every one does when he makes a will. Here, in the Will of the Father, we are permitted to see, that "adoption" or "inheritance" are secured. That a human "will" is a permissible analogy, Gal. iii. 15 and iv. 1, 2 will make clear, and no legatee under a human will has ever been heard to raise an objection on the lines of "fatalism".

Those who were chosen in Christ before the overthrow of Gen. i. 2 were also "marked off beforehand" and, as the Revised Version reads, were "foreordained" unto adoption. The Authorized Version reads "the adoption of CHILDREN", the Revised Version reads "adoption AS SONS".

This word "adoption" is the translation of the Greek huiothesia, a word composed of huios "a son" and thesis "to place or constitute". The word is used only by Paul in the New Testament and occurs five times as follows:

> "Ye have received the spirit of adoption" (Rom. viii. 15).
> "Waiting for the adoption" (23).
> "To whom pertaineth the adoption" (ix. 4).
> "That we might receive the adoption of sons" (Gal. iv. 5).
> "Unto the adoption of children" (Eph. i. 5).

To appreciate the full significance of the Apostle's figures in Gal. iii. and iv. they must be viewed in the light of the law of adoption—and more particularly, the Greek law of adoption. At the same time it must be remembered that Paul also uses the term in Romans, so that we must also bear in mind the Roman law on the subject.

> "The adopted son became a member of the family, just as if he had been born of the blood of the adopter; and he was invested with all the privileges of a filius familias. As a matter of fact it was by this means that the succession amongst the Caesars was continued. It never descended from father to son. What with poison, divorce, luxury and profligacy, the surviving members of a family were few, the descent suffered constant interruption, and whole families disappeared . . . . . In no case amongst the Caesars did the throne pass from father to son . . . . . Augustus was the great nephew of Julius Caesar, and was adopted from the Octavian into the Julian gens. Tiberius was no relation at all to his predecessor: he was merely the son of Augustus' wife, Lavia, by Tiberius Claudius Nero. Here we have the introduction of another family—the Claudii . . . . . Nero was the great nephew of his predecessor Claudius, who had adopted him in the year 50A.D." (Septimus Buss).

Adoption was of two kinds: adoption proper, and adrogation.

Adoption proper.—It must be remembered that the father in Roman law had absolute control over his family, possessing the same rights over his children as over his slaves. By this patria potestas the son was deprived of the right to own property, and the father could inflict any punishment he thought fit, even to the extent of the death penalty. He could also sell his son into bondage. According to the law of the XII Tables, however, a father forfeited his potestas if he sold his son three times. For this reason, in the case of adoption, a legal ceremony took place in which the father went through the process of selling his son three times, and the son passed over completely to the potestas of the adopter. In later times the cumbersome ceremony was substituted by a simple declaration before the Praetor or Governor.

Adrogation.—When the person to be adopted was his own master, he was adopted by the form called adrogation (from the word for "ask", since in this case the adopter, the adopted, and the people were "asked" rogatur). The law demanded that the adopter should be at least eighteen years older than the adopted, for, says Justinian:

> "Adoption imitates nature, and it seems unnatural that a son should be older than his father" (Justinian).
>
> "Adoption was called in law a capitas diminutio, which so far annihilated the pre-existing personality who underwent it, that during many centuries it operated as an extinction of debts" (W. E. Ball).

(1) A CHANGE OF FAMILY.—The adopted person was transferred from one gens to another.

(2) A CHANGE OF NAME.—The adopted person acquired a new name: for he assumed the name of his adopter, and modified his own by the termination ianus. Thus, when Caius Octavius of the Octavian gens was adopted by Julius Caesar, he became Caius Julius Caesar Octavianus.

(3) A CHANGEOF HOME, and (4) NEW RESPONSIBILITES AND PRIVILEGES.—While the adopted person suffered many "losses", these were more than counterbalanced by his "gains", for he received a new capacity to inherit. In the case of the adopter dying intestate, the adopted son acquired the right of succession.

Paul alludes to the patria potestas, the absolute power of the father in the family, in Gal. iv., where he speaks of "the child differing nothing from a slave" and goes on to say "Thou art no longer a slave, but a son" (Gal. iv. 7). Paul also alludes to tutelage in iii. 23 and iv. 3, where we have such phrases as "kept in ward", "tutor to bring us to Christ", "under guardians and stewards", and "children held in bondage".

So far as the ceremony was concerned, the difference between the transferring of a son into slavery, and his becoming a member of the family was very slight. In the one case the adopter said "I claim this man as my slave"; in the other, "I claim this man as my son". The form was almost the same; it was the spirit that differed.

If the adopter died and the adopted son claimed the inheritance, the latter had to testify to the fact that he was the adopted heir. Furthermore:

> "the law requires corroborative evidence. One of the seven witnesses is called. 'I was present', he says, 'at the ceremony. It was I who held the scales and struck them with the ingot of brass. It was an adoption. I heard the words of the vindication, and I say this person was claimed by the deceased, not as a slave, but as a son'." (W. E. Ball).

Bearing all these facts in mind, can we not feel something of the thrill with which the Roman Christian would read the words of Rom. viii.?

> "Ye have not received the spirit of bondage again to fear; but ye have received the spirit of adoption, whereby we cry, Abba, Father. The Spirit Itself beareth witness with our spirit, that we are the children of God, and if children, then heirs" (viii. 15-17).

It is not so much the Holy Spirit addressing Himself here to the human spirit in confirmation, but rather the joint witness of the Holy Spirit and the spirit of the believer to the same blessed fact.

Closely associated with the law of adoption was that of the Roman will. The Praetorian will was put into writing, and fastened with the seals of seven witnesses (cf. Rev. v. and vi.). There is probably a reference to this type of will in Ephesians.

> "In Whom also after that ye believed, ye were sealed with that Holy Spirit of promise, which is the earnest of our inheritance, until the redemption of the purchased possession, unto the praise of His glory" (i. 13, 14).

W. E. Ball translates the latter part of the passage, "Until the ransoming accomplished by the act of taking possession (of the inheritance)":

> "When a slave was appointed heir, although expressly emancipated by the will which gave him the inheritance, his freedom commenced not upon the making of the will, nor even immediately upon the death of the testator, but from the moment when he took certain legal steps, which were described as 'entering upon the inheritance'. This is 'the ransoming accomplished by act of taking possession'. In the last words of the passage, 'to the praise of His glory', there is an allusion to a well-known Roman custom. The emancipated slaves who attended the funeral of their emancipator were the praise of his glory. Testamentary emancipation was so fashionable a form of posthumous ostentation, the desire to be followed to the grave by a crowd of freedmen wearing the 'cap of liberty' was so strong, that very shortly before the time when St. Paul wrote, the legislature had expressly limited the number of slaves that an owner might manumit by will" (W. E. Ball).

In all these things there is necessarily more than one aspect to be remembered. The bearing of the Old Testament teaching of the Kinsman-Redeemer and of the Hebrew law must never be forgotten, but for the moment we are limiting ourselves to the laws in force during the period covered by the Acts. Many passages like Rom. viii. and Gal. iii. & iv. are given a much fuller meaning when we are able to understand the allusions to customs and procedure that were everywhere in vogue at the time they were written.

No modern writer has greater first-hand knowledge of this term than Sir William Ramsay, and in order to acquaint ourselves with its usage in Galatia, we will first of all quote from Sir William's "A Historical Commentary on St. Paul's Epistle to the Galatians":--

"The idea that they who follow the principle of faith are sons of Abraham, whatever family they belong to by nature, would certainly be understood by the Galatians as referring to the legal process called adoption, huiothesia."

"Adoption was a kind of embryo will; the adopted son became the owner of the property, and the property could pass to a person that was naturally outside the family only through his being adopted. The adoption was a sort of Will-making; and this ancient form of Will was irrevocable and public. The terms 'Son' and 'Heir' are interchangeable."

"An illustration from the ordinary fact of society, as it existed in the Galatian cities, is here stated: 'I speak after the manner of men'. The Will (diatheke) of a human being is irrevocable when once duly executed. But if Paul is speaking about a Will, how can he say, after it is once made, it is irrevocable?"

"Such irrevocability was a characteristic feature of Greek law, according to which an heir outside the family must be adopted into the family; and the adoption was the Will-making. The testator, after adopting his heir, could not subsequently take away from him his share of the inheritance or impose new conditions on his succession. The Roman-Syrian Law Book will illustrate this passage of the Epistle. It actually lays down the principle that a man can never put away an adopted son, and that he cannot put away a real son without good ground. It is remarkable that the adopted son should have a stronger position than the son by birth; yet it is so. The expression in Gal. iii. verse 15, 'When it hath been confirmed', must also be observed. Every Will had to be passed through the Record Office of the city. It was not regarded in the Greek law as a purely private document. It must be deposited in the Record Office."

Here it will be seen that one may be "adopted", or made the heir, without being at the same time a true child, but in the case of the Scriptural usage of adoption there is no idea that the believer is only an "adopted" child, for the testimony of the Word is explicit on the point, making it clear that adoption is something added:

"The Spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit, that we are the children of God" (Rom. viii. 16).

The argument of Gal. iv. 1-7 proceeds upon the supposition that there is a difference between a "child" (1, 2), and one who has received the "adoption" (5). "If a son, then an heir of God through Christ" (7). That "adoption" is related to "inheritance" we can see by examining Eph. i. There we find the word "predestinate" used twice, once in verse 5, where it is "unto adoption", and again in verse 11, where it refers to "inheritance".

Let us now observe the way in which this important word is used in connection with three different companies of the redeemed.

In the ninth chapter of Romans the Apostle enumerates the distinctive and exclusive privilege of Israel "according to the flesh", who are Israelites; to whom pertaineth the adoption" (4). The structure of the passage relates "adoption" with "promises" and the whole is important enough to claim our attention before passing on. Accordingly we set out the structure.

A | According to the flesh.—Brethren.
B | Who are Israelites.
C | To whom pertaineth the ADOPTION.
D | And the glory.
E | And the covenants.
E | And the giving of the law.
D | And the service of God.
C | And the PROMISES.
B | Whose are the fathers.
A | As concerning the flesh, Christ came.

No one who has any understanding at all can interpret "Israel" "according to the flesh" as of the Church, or of that company where there is "neither Jew nor Greek" (Gal. iii. 28).

When Israel were about to be brought out of Egypt, God called the nation His "firstborn" saying, "Israel is My son, even My firstborn" (Exod. iv. 22). Attached to this position is a citizenship, the city being Jerusalem which is destined to be the centre of the earth when the Kingdom is set up. This we already know and we need now do no more than quote the references (Isa. ii. 3; Zech. xiv. 16, 17). One item, however, must now be given due prominence. It is obvious that if one nation is to be granted pre-eminence, the others must be subservient, and one of the accompaniments of the privilege of adoption, which we find true of each sphere, is the grant of pre-eminence over other companies in the same sphere.

> "The nation and the kingdom that will not serve thee shall perish; yea, those nations shall be utterly wasted" (Isa. lx. 12).
>
> "Strangers shall stand and feed your flocks and the sons of the alien shall be your plowmen and your vinedressers; but ye shall be named the Priests of the Lord: men shall call you the Ministers of our God" (Isa. lxi. 5, 6).

We shall find that the following features are inseparable from adoption as used in the Scriptures:

(1) The appointing of the heir.
(2) The dignity of the first-born.
(3) The close association of a citizenship.
(4) Some special pre-eminence over other companies in the same sphere.

In marked contrast with Rom. ix., where "the adoption" is the exclusive prerogative of "Israel according to the flesh", we have "the adoption" of Gal. iv. which pertains to the seed of Abraham who are not considered "after the flesh" (23), who are associated with "Jerusalem which is above" (26), and which is composed of both Jew and Greek made one in Christ, and consequently heirs according to the promise. Yet, further, those to whom the adoption pertains according to the teaching of Ephesians, have no relationship with Israel at all, they have no connection with the promises made unto the fathers, they were aliens and strangers, without hope, and without God. These were chosen before the foundation of the world, and in Christ are raised and seated far above all principality and power. Consequently the logical result of admitting the contextual teaching of Paul's epistles regarding "adoption" is to admit three distinct spheres of blessing.

A man can only have three first-born sons, if he has had three families. This application of the teaching concerning adoption will be found to be an irrefutable proof of the existence of "three spheres of blessing". There have been many adverse criticisms of our contention that there are "three spheres of blessing", and this criticism has been based on a number of Scripture passages, but no one has ever dealt with the "proof" that there are "three spheres" based upon the fact of a threefold adoption, and until they do, they are but wasting words.

#18. The Muniment Room (i. 3 - 14). The Threefold Charter of the Church.

"Highly Favoured." pp. 221 - 224

The section before us, Eph. i. 3-6, we have called "The Will of the Father", for it is occupied with choosing, predestinating, placing and with sphere and purpose.

The emphasis upon "will", especially the will of God, associated as it is with such a term as "predestination" can easily conjure up in the mind some of the awful and cramping paralysis that the Calvinistic doctrine of the "Decrees" has many times induced in the mind of the believers.

One reader, years ago, under the pseudonym Bereana, wrote a booklet entitled "Under Calvin's Yoke", in which he says:

> "There are, we know, numbers of the Lord's people who are burdened by the harsh Calvinistic creed . . . . . they believe or imagine themselves to believe—that God by His irresistible decree, determines, before they are born, that by far the greater number of His creatures shall be effectually damned in the World to Come, Disguise it, and gloss it over, as so many try to do, that is their real teaching."

The writer acknowledges in this booklet that some of the writings of the present author were blessed to his liberation, saying:

> "Now as to Dr. John Owen's second question 'Did Christ die for all the sins of some men', we answer, Yes, the election hath obtained it (Rom. xi. 7). For it is indeed the faith of God's elect. For if ever there was a dispensation of absolute election, it is now. But as Mr. Charles H. Welch, in his Dispensational Expositions ( - a series which appeared in Things to Come 1909-1913), has said 'We must be very careful, however, with regard to these things, that we do not limit the Holy One of Israel. His purpose of grace to Us, and the redemptive work of Christ for Us, may not necessarily be the same as His purposes regarding other ages and dispensations. Particular redemption, with the utmost emphasis of hyper-Calvinism, may be the correct aspect of the work of Christ regarding the Church (the elect body of Christ). It may or may not be so regarding mankind under other dispensations."

The choice, before the overthrow of the world, is revealed to have been "in love". Or, if, with some commentators, we refer this to the next clause, then "in love" He hath predestinated us, sounds the same note. This reference to predestination is followed by the words "according to the good pleasure of His will" (Eph. i. 5), or as it is extended in verse 9 to "His good pleasure which He hath purposed in Himself".

The words "good pleasure" are a translation of the Greek eudokia. This word occurs nine times in the New Testament. How are we to understand this term "good pleasure"? It will be seen that everything depends upon the character of the one whose good pleasure is in view. If it be an autocrat, like Nebuchadnezzar, of whom it is written "whom he would he slew, and whom he would he kept alive", then the exercise of such good pleasure will always have a sinister effect. If however we are contemplating the "good pleasure" of "the God and the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ", the One Who so loved the world that He gave, and spared not His only son, then the fact that His choice and His predestination is revealed to be according to His good pleasure, will but encourage us to rest in His choice and to realize that His good pleasure is but another way of saying, with verse four, that He chose us "in love".

Eudokia is composed of the adverb eu "well" and dokeo "to think". The basic idea of dokeo is "to seem", so the good pleasure of the Lord is that which "seems good" in his sight. The reader will remember its use in Matt. xi. 26 when in the time of His rejection the Saviour looked up to the Father and said:

> "Even so Father for so it SEEMED GOOD in Thy sight."

The herald angels used the word eudokia when they spoke of "good will" toward men (Luke ii. 14). That the word does not necessarily imply any element of arbitrariness or tyrannical power, let the Apostle testify, for in a context in which he shows himself willing to make the greatest self sacrifice known to man, he says:

> "Brethren, my heart's desire for Israel is that they might be saved" (Rom. x. 1, see Rom. ix. 1-3).

The same word is used of those who were prompted to serve the Lord out of “good will” as opposed to those whose motive was out of “contention” (Phil. i. 15), and the Apostle could pray nothing better for the Thessalonians, than that God should “fulfil all the good pleasure of His goodness” in them (II Thess. i. 11).

Thelema, the Greek word “will” occurs seven times in Ephesians.

A1 | i. 1. Apostleship.
A2 | i. 5, 9, 11. Doctrine.
A3 | ii. 3; v. 17; vi. 6. Practice.

The three references to doctrine in the first chapter are:.

Doctrinal.

A2 | a | i. 5. Good pleasure of His will.--Predestination to sonship.
b | i. 9. Mystery of His will.--Fullness of seasons.
a | i. 11. Counsel of His will.--Predestination to inheritance.

The three references to practice that follow seem to be a response to this manifestation of grace.

Practical.

A3 | c | ii. 3. Doing the will of the flesh.--"Once."
d | v. 17. Understanding the will of the Lord.--Present rule.
c | vi. 6. Doing the will of God.--"Now."

The final statement of this great section of the Father’s will leads us to “The Beloved”. We have already observed the sphere of our blessings “in the heavenlies”, but we have not paused to consider the most fundamental of all spheres, without which all promises must for ever remain unfulfilled, we refer to the recurring words “in Christ”, “in Him”, “in Whom”, that meet us at every turn. The spiritual blessings in heavenly places are “in Christ” (Eph. i. 3); those thus blessed were chosen “in Him” before the overthrow of the world (Eph. i. 4); they are “accepted in the beloved” (Eph. i. 6). While the theme changes at verse seven to Redemption and “the Work of the Son”, the passage opens with the words “In Whom”, and the goal of the ages, together with its inheritance, is still found to be “in Christ” (Eph. i. 7-11).

An adequate exposition of all that is involved in the terms “in Christ”, “with Christ” and “by Christ” would exceed the limits of these articles, but no presentation of either doctrine, dispensation or practice is of any value that does not place these terms in the very forefront of its exposition. We may be able to devote a series of studies to this aspect of truth, and may then hope to give it the attention that is its due. Meanwhile, we proceed to the most blessed title “The Beloved” in Whom this passage of Ephesians tells us we are “accepted”.

The three occasions in Matthew upon which the Lord is spoken of as the "Beloved" are connected with the word eudokeo which gives us the word "good pleasure" which we have just been studying. The passages are iii. 17, xii. 18 & xvii. 5, and in each we read the added words "well pleased".

In Colossians, which in many ways is seen to be a parallel epistle with Ephesians, Christ is not called "The Beloved" but, literally, "The Son of His love" (i. 13). In this Beloved One, the believer is "accepted". It will be observed that the word "in" occurs twice in Eph. i. 6:

> "WhereIN (literally "in which") He hath made us accepted IN the Beloved."

This word "which" is in the feminine gender and agrees with charis, the word translated "grace" which immediately precedes it. We now note that the words "He hath made us accepted" echaritosen is also a word derived from charis "grace". Charitoo occurs in but one other passage in the New Testament, namely, Luke i. 28, where we read the salutation of Mary by the angel "Hail (thou that art) highly favoured among women". The particular form of the word is unknown in Classical Greek, and occurs only in one passage in the Greek translation of the Old Testament by Symmachus.

The two occasions upon which it is pronounced in the New Testament mark it off as unique. No woman, before or since, has or could be so uniquely set apart and highly favoured as the woman who became the mother of the Saviour, the woman through whom was fulfilled the prophecy of Gen. iii. 15 and Isa. vii. 14 & ix. 6, and the glorious revelation of I Tim. iii. 16. No company of believers apart from the Church of the One Body have "heavenly places" as the sphere of their blessings; no church but this one of Ephesians, was chosen in Christ before the overthrow of the world, and no other calling, church or company from either Israel or the nations, is ever said to be so "HIGHLY FAVOURED" in the Beloved, as this church of the dispensation of the mystery. Elsewhere we may read of the "riches" of the Lord's grace but it is reserved for the epistle to the Ephesians to unfold the exceeding (hyperbole) riches of His grace (ii. 7) and the unsearchable riches of Christ (iii. 8).

Fundamentals of Dispensational Truth. (Second Series).

#36. An approach to the Four Gospels.
pp. 70 - 74

Four inspired accounts of the earthly ministry of the Son of God have been given to the people of God and it is the Divine intention that these four accounts should be understood as providing four distinct aspects of the truth represented by the earthly life and ministry of Christ. Four texts of Old Testament scripture can be used to set out these four distinctive aspects of truth, namely:

MATTHEW	"Behold thy KING"	(Zech. ix. 9).
MARK	"Behold My SERVANT"	(Isa. xlii. 1).
LUKE	"Behold the MAN"	(Zech. vi. 12).
JOHN	"Behold your GOD"	(Isa. xl. 9).

These four references can be supplemented by observing the use in the O.T. of one peculiar title of the Messiah, namely "The Branch". The figurative use of a great tree to set forth in symbol a great man, leads to the use of a "branch" to indicate some notable offspring or descendant both in the Hebrew of the O.T. and in modern usage.

> "And there shall come forth a rod out of the stem of Jesse, and a branch shall grow out of his roots: And the spirit of the Lord shall rest upon Him" (Isa. xi. 1, 2).

Here we have the figurative use of rod and stem; branch and root, disposed in alternating pairs. This title is endorsed and expanded in Rev. xxii. 16:

> "I am the root and offspring of David."

In the prophet Jeremiah we have the promise:

> "Behold the days come, saith the Lord, that I will raise unto David a righteous Branch, and a KING shall reign and prosper" (Jer. xxiii. 5).

The gospel according to Matthew sets forth the Lord as KING, and traces His genealogy back through David.

The prophet Zechariah addresses Joshua the high Priest saying:

> "Behold, I will bring forth My Servant, the Branch" (Zech. iii. 8).

It is in this capacity and office of a SERVANT, that Mark presents the Saviour; hence there is no genealogy in the opening chapter, but immediate service, and this feature persists even unto the resurrection, the Gospel closing with the words "The Lord working with them, and confirming the Word with signs following" (Mark xvi. 20). Luke sets forth the Lord as the MAN and traces His genealogy back to Adam, it is of Him Zechariah speaks when he says "Behold, the MAN Whose name is the Branch" (Zech. vi. 12). Some two centuries earlier Isaiah, looking forward to the day of restoration, says, "In that day shall the Branch of the LORD be beautiful and glorious" (Isa. iv. 2), and so provides the text which is appropriate to the Gospel according to John.

- - - I l l u s t r a t i o n - - -
(BE-XXXVI.71).

The four gospels point to the Lord Jesus Christ as the One in Whom all these promises were or shall be fulfilled. These four phases of prophecy however are all closely connected with Israel; there is another fourfold promise that goes back to the days of Adam that must also be fulfilled in Christ as set forth in the four gospels. From the earliest times, the Cherubim have been associated with the four gospels and it will be remembered that these living ones are described as having four faces:

> "The face of a man, and the face of a lion, on the right side . . . . . the face of an ox on the left side . . . . . also the face of an eagle" (Ezek. i. 10).

That these cherubim are not of passing interest, but seem to be woven as it were into the very text of Scripture, a moment's consideration will prove. There are six different periods marked out in the Scriptures, where the cherub or cherubim (im Heb. plural) accompany the unfolding of the Divine purpose:

Ezekiel xxviii.	A supernatural being, who held the title "the anointed cherub that covereth". He was cast out as profane. The word "anointed" is used of "The Messiah" or "The Christ" when applied to the Lord Jesus.
Genesis iii.	At the fall of Adam and at the expulsion from Eden, the cherubim are seen associated with the flaming sword that kept the way of the tree of life. "Paradise lost."
Exodus xxv.	The cherubim now appear in the holiest of all and form a part of the mercy seat at the meeting place of the priest and God. They are intimately connected with the plan and purpose of redeeming love as set forth in the typical teaching of the tabernacle.
I Kings vi.	The cherubim are a feature in the temple built and dedicated by Solomon, whose reign of peace and abundant prosperity sets forth in type the glory that is yet to be.
Ezekiel.	In the opening and closing sections of Ezekiel we see the glory of the Lord leaving and returning to Israel accompanied by the cherubim.
Revelation iv.	Under the term "the four beasts" (Lit. "living creatures" as in Ezek. i.), the cherubim are associated with the great prophecy of restoration that leads up to "Paradise restored" in the last chapter.

If we attempt to set out these references to the cherubim in structure form, we become conscious of a gap, or something missing, but if we include the four gospels as indicating that the cherubim find their fulfillment in Christ, Who is set over against the fall and failure of the anointed cherub of Ezek. xxviii., the pattern is complete.

A | Ezek. xxviii. The Anointed. His pride and fall.
B | Gen. iii. Paradise lost. Pledge of restoration.
C | Exod. xxv. Tabernacle and Wilderness.
I Kings vi. Temple and Land.
Ezekiel. Glory and Temple.
A | Four Gospels. The Anointed. His humility and triumph.
B | Rev. iv. Paradise restored.

We therefore believe that it was a sound sense of fitness that led the early Christians to identify the four gospels with the cherubim.

Matthew	The LION	The King.
Mark	The OX	The Servant.
Luke	The MAN	Back to Adam.
John	The EAGLE	My Lord and my God.

Christ is set forth in Matthew in the highest earthly position, that of King, and in Mark as the lowest, that of a Servant. Luke presents Him as the second Man the last Adam, and John as "The Word made flesh", "The Son of God".

It has been said concerning the fact that we have four gospels "The marvel is that we have not had more". Luke tells us that many had "taken in hand to set forth in order a declaration of things which are most surely believed among us" (Luke i. 1). Some find difficulty in believing the doctrine of Inspiration when faced with these four separate accounts. Yet a consideration of the duplication of another important event might enable the reader to see that purpose, influencing choice of material under Divine superintendence, may fully answer the case.

Paul's conversion is recorded in Acts ix., again in Acts xxii. and yet again in Acts xxvi. To which must be added his own references in the epistles. The first record made by Luke places the conversion and commission of Paul in its historic setting, the accounts given by Paul himself follow this primary record, but with that freedom which must ever mark the retailing of first hand knowledge. Moreover, there is one item of information which neither Acts ix. nor Acts xxii. record, namely, the words actually spoken from heaven to Paul himself. These are found for the first time in Acts xxvi. 16-18 and their absence from the earlier accounts can be satisfactorily explained for dispensational reasons. In like manner we shall discover that there is a definite and sufficient reason for the fourfold presentation of the Gospels—each has a purpose to fulfil and each has been written with a specific object. The critics' view is that because there are similar passages in each of the four gospels, that there must, therefore, have been an earlier common original which is now, apparently, "lost". The critics however cannot agree among themselves as to which Gospel denotes this supposed original. Urquhart has given a table showing six different theories, in which Matthew, Mark and Luke have respectively been "proved" to be the original, and he comments:

> "In other words, criticism tells us (1) that each of the three was the original Gospel; (2) that each of the three was derived from another; and (3) that each of the three was derived from the two others!"

There has probably occurred to the reader, as it has to the writer, that a trite comment of Euclid namely, "which is absurd", could be quoted very fittingly here.

Dr. E. A. Abbott wrote:

> "It is well known that in many parts of the four gospels the same words and phrases are curiously interlaced, in such a way as to suggest that the writers have borrowed either from each other or from some common source."

This conclusion has stultified research and led its followers into the blind alley of self contradiction.

John Urquhart replies:

> "But why? Is the explanation not at least equally good that they have come from ONE MIND, by which the similarity was preserved when no variation was called for?"

This is illuminating, it involves us in no contradictions, it accepts both the differences and the agreements as coming from ONE AUTHOR, God the Holy Spirit, Who caused the four-fold Gospel to be written in harmony with that Divine purpose which it was the blessed object of the Son of His love to bring to glorious fruition.

The accompanying diagram may help the reader to visualize this fourfold gospel.

#37. The Structural outline of Matthew, exhibiting key words and correspondences.
pp. 86 - 89

Having seen that the four Gospels form a unity, though each of them has its own individuality and its subject matter so chosen that it will develop and illustrate the peculiar purpose set before the writer of each; we shall now endeavour to set out some of the essential differences and so arrive at a just appreciation of the individual purpose of each.

First of all we must seek the underlying structure, then the disposition of its subject matter, and learn by the inclusion or exclusion of certain facts and features what the distinctive message of each record may be. Here however the reader is caused to halt by reason of the many outlines and structures that men of God have offered. Bengel in his "Gnomon of the New Testament" published in 1742A.D. has set the course for one type of analysis which has influenced many subsequent writers. It occupies six pages of print, and cannot be reproduced here. Its main divisions are:

(1) The nativity, and the matters immediately following (i. 1 - ii. 23).
(2) Our Lord's entrance on His ministry (iii. 1 - iv. 11).
(3) The deeds and words by which Jesus proved Himself to be Christ (iv. 12 - xvi. 12).
(4) Our Lord's prediction of His passion and resurrection (xvi. 13 - xx. 28).
(5) The events at Jerusalem immediately before the passion (xxi. 1 - xxv. 46).
(6) The passion and resurrection (xxvi. 1 - xxviii. 20).

In recent times, the outlines prepared by Dr. Campbell Morgan are suggestive, and even if the reader is conscious that the alliteration may sometimes have run away with the theme, these outlines are nevertheless worthy of attention and respect. Dr. Campbell Morgan's outline of Matthew is in the main threefold, with many subdivisions which we cannot here reproduce.

Matthew i. - iv. 16. The Person.
- (1) Relation to earth i. - iii. 12.
- (2) Relation to heaven iii. 13-17.
- (3) Relation to hell iv. 1-11.

Matthew iv. 17 - xvi. 20. Propaganda.
- (1) Enunciation of law iv. 17 - vii.
- (2) Exhibition of benefits viii. - ix. 34.
- (3) Enforcements of claims ix. 35 - xvi. 20.

Matthew xvi. 21 - xxviii. The Passion.
- (1) His Cross and His subjects xvi. 21 - xx.
- (2) Rejection of Hebrew nation xxi. - xxiii.
- (3) Prediction xxiv., xxv.
- (4) Passion xxvi. - xxviii.

The "Companion Bible" gives the structure in the form of an alternation, and as most of our readers have access to (if not possession of) this valuable work we will not occupy space by reprinting it here.

While recognizing all the labour that has been expended by other believers in the past, let us once more turn to the gospel of Matthew itself and see what fresh light the Lord may be pleased to give. We observe in the opening verse that Jesus Christ is set before us as the Son of David and the Son of Abraham, and that the genealogy itself is artificially subdivided as follows:

> "So all the generations from Abraham to David are fourteen generations, and from David until the carrying away into Babylon are fourteen generations; and from the carrying away into Babylon unto Christ are fourteen generations" (Matt. i. 17).

Here we have two patriarchs with whom covenants were made and promises given that find their fulfillment only in Christ. The failure of Israel led to their rejection and to the rise of Nebuchadnezzar, with whom commenced the "Times of the Gentiles", and it is suggestive that we meet the word musterion "mystery" for the first time in the book of Daniel.

This great prophetic event throws light upon the turn taken in the Gospel at chapter xiii., where we meet, for the first time, the expression "The mysteries of the Kingdom of Heaven". We cannot prove from Matt. i. 1, but we receive a suggestion from that verse, that Matthew may have subdivided his theme so that his gospel shall set before us first, Christ as Son of David, and secondly, Christ as the Son of Abraham, the former title stressing kingship, the second title referring to the antitypical death and resurrection of the true "Isaac" offered on one of the mountains of Moriah at a place called Calvary. We discover by reading through* the gospel, that there are two great time periods which cannot be ignored, and these therefore we present as our first pair of items in the discovery of the structure of Matthew.

> [NOTE: * - The reader must remember that there are no short cuts to truth. What occupies a few inches of space, and takes a minute or two to read, may have cost many hours of patient research and prayerful acknowledgment of human inability.]

> "From that time Jesus began to preach, and to say, Repent: for the kingdom of heaven is at hand" (Matt. iv. 17).
>
> "From that time forth began Jesus to show unto His disciples, how that He must go unto Jerusalem, and suffer many things of the elders and chief priests and scribes, and be killed, and be raised again the third day" (Matt. xvi. 21).

Here most evidently we have two distinct departures, two ministries, two themes. The first stresses the kingdom, the second the cross. The former ranges under the name "David" the second under the name "Abraham". One finds its type in Solomon the Son of David, the other in Isaac the son of Abraham.

The next repeated feature which our reading brings to light, is found in the records of the baptism at Jordan and the transfiguration on the Mount.

"And lo a voice from heaven, saying, 'This is My beloved Son, in Whom I am well pleased" (Matt. iii. 17).

"And behold a voice out of the cloud, which said, 'This is My beloved Son, in Whom I am well pleased; hear ye Him" (Matt. xvii. 5).

We now have two pairs of corresponding terms,

A | The voice from heaven.
B | From that time . . . . . began.
B | From that time . . . . . began.
A | The Voice from heaven.

We observe moreover that in chapter sixteen, just before the new revelation is made concerning the Lord's sufferings, that Peter makes his great confession.

"He saith unto them, But Whom say ye that I am? And Simon Peter answered and said, Thou art the Christ, the son of the living God" (Matt. xvi. 15, 16).

With this we must place the confession made by Christ Himself when adjured by the High Priest:

"I adjure Thee by the living God, that thou tell us whether thou be the Christ, the Son of God. Jesus saith unto him, Thou hast said" (Matt. xxvi. 63, 64).

The words "Thou hast said" are in the original su eipas and in the early Greek manuscripts (where there were many contractions employed to economize space and where no space was allowed between one word and another) we find that where, in Matt. xvi. 18 we now read su ei Petros "thou art Peter", the earlier contraction was sueips, which would naturally be expanded to su eipas "thou hast said", had Peter not been in the immediate context. This matter needs much more examination and proof than these few notes can supply, but we are convinced that in both cases the words stand for one and the same thing—an emphatic affirmation, and that Peter's name does not come into Matt. xvi. 18 at all. We now have sufficient data to build the complete structure of the Gospel according to Matthew, not by alliteration however useful such a method may be, but by recording the actual facts as found in the scriptures.

Matthew.

A | i. 1-iii. 16. From Birth to Baptism.
The ministry of John the Baptist.
"Born King of the Jews."

B | iii. 17 - xvi. 18. SON of DAVID the King.

a | iii. 17. The Voice from Heaven.

b | iv. 1-16. The Threefold temptation of the King.

c | iv. 17. Time. "From that time . . . began."

d | xvi. 16-18. Confession "The Christ" su eipas "Thou hast said".

In this section comes the Sermon on the Mount, giving rules for guidance during the rejection of the King. In this section also come the Parables of Matt. xiii. showing the character of the kingdom, its mystery phase, during rejection.

B | xvi. 21 - xxvi. 64. SON of ABRAHAM the Priest.

c | xvi. 21. Time. "From that time . . . began."

a | xvii. 5. The Voice from heaven.

b | xxvi. 36-44. The Threefold agony of the King-Priest.

d | xxvi. 63, 64. Confession "The Christ" su eipas "Thou hast said".

In this section the parables are largely connected with service during the absence of the Lord. The Sermon on the Mount changes to Prophecy on the Mount and speaks of the end of the "mystery" phase of the kingdom, by which personal presence of the King in glory.

A | xxvii., xxviii. From Baptism of suffering to birth in Resurrection.
Ministry of those who are to baptize all nations.
"This is Jesus the King of the Jews."

This structural outline put forward, not as in any sense exhaustive, but suggestive. To produce a complete structural outline of a book containing twenty-eight closely packed chapters as those of the Gospel according to Matthew, is beyond our range in these articles. Such however could be built up by the student working methodically within the bounds now presented.

The two time periods, chapters iv. 17 and xvi. 21, are decisive factors in the division of the Gospel. The two "voices" and "confessions" supplement, and the threefold temptation of chapter four finds its complement in the threefold agony of chapter twenty-six, and in both the tempted Saviour emerges triumphant. When we come to compare the Gospels, we shall then be able to throw into relief those distinctive teachings that will demonstrate without peradventure the key note of each Gospel, although as the reader will remember we have tentatively put forward the well-known headings—Matthew, the King; Mark, the Servant; Luke, the Man; John, God.

#38. The distinctive character of both "Mark" and "Luke". pp. 105 - 109

After detailing a series of differences observable between the Gospel of Mark with that of Matthew and Luke, A. W. F. Blunt, B.D., in the "Clarendon Bible", says of Mark's gospel:

> "Thus the Marcan Jesus is neither, as in Matthew, the giver of a new law, nor as in Luke, the preacher of a catholic paternity . . . . . His portrait is drawn with the utmost economy of line and colour. Practically all is subordinated to the emphasizing of His Messianic intention. First He announces the Messianic kingdom, then He admits His Messianic position, then He publicly assesses the Messianic role, goes up to Jerusalem to die, and dies for His Messianic claim."

We appreciate the note in the "Companion Bible", p.1381, which reads:

> "The Four Gospels are treated in the 'Companion Bible' not as four culprits brought up on a charge of fraud, but as four witnesses whose testimony is to be believed."

The difference between these four witnesses however must wait until, as in the foregoing articles on Matthew, we have attained some idea of the structural outline of the gospel itself. Blackwall in his Sacred Classics wrote of Mark's Gospel:

> "Simplicity and conciseness are its characteristics; for the majesty of the subject, the variety of the actions recorded, and the surprising circumstances attending them together with the important doctrines and precepts laid down, this is the shortest, the clearest, the most marvelous, and at the same time the most satisfactory history in the world."

Written across the Gospel according to Mark are the words recorded in x. 45, thus:

> "The Son of Man came (i. 1-13)
> To minister (i. 14 - viii. 30),
> And to give His life a ransom for many (viii. 31 - xvi.)",

Which three sub-divisions are summed up by Campbell Morgan as:

Sanctification, . . . Service, . . . Sacrifice.

Like Matthew, who was also called Levi, Mark is referred to as "John whose surname is Mark" (Acts xii. 12, 25), and the Latin surname suggests some association with a Roman family. Mark has a fair sprinkling of Latin words; he translates the meaning of the Aramaic expressions introduced and explains Jewish customs. The fact that Mark wrote for the Romans would explain the omission of the genealogy and the general absence of quotation from the Old Testament Scriptures. The passage quoted at the beginning of the Gospel is the only exception, for the quotation given in xv. 28 is omitted in the R.V. Writing for Romans—who were men of action and whose ideals differed materially from both those of the Greeks and the Hebrews—Mark emphasizes the acts rather than the discourses of the Saviour, a feature which his frequent use of the words "immediately" and "straightway", intensifies. Mark differs from Matthew not only in the omission of the genealogy and quotations from the Old Testament, but in his treatment of a common theme and his selection of material. For example, where Matthew records fourteen parables Mark records but four; where Matthew occupies a whole chapter of forty-two verses (x.) to record the call and commission of the twelve apostles, Mark compresses this subject into seven verses (vi. 7-13); where Matthew's purpose demanded thirty-nine verses (xxiii.) in setting forth the denunciation of the Scribes and Pharisees, Mark's purpose is served by the use of but three (xii. 38-40); where Matthew's records in detail the temptation in the wilderness, Mark simply records the fact that the Lord was there in the wilderness forty days, tempted of the devil. Perhaps, with his Roman readers in mind Mark makes one addition to the record, namely, that the Lord was "with the wild beasts" (i. 12, 13). Mark does not record the "Lord's Prayer", a strong echo in chapter xi. 24-26 satisfying the requirements of his gospel. In the face of the second coming found in Mark xiii., shows the extreme importance that must be attached to this epoch-making event for Israel and the nations of the earth.

While these articles were in preparation, a very precious letter was received from a valued fellow-worker, which so beautifully brings to light what we were feeling after, that we can do no more than quote it here, trusting that the reader will be as helped by its reprint as we were at its first reading.

> "I think there are four portions of Scripture which refer to the Lord as 'Servant', namely Isaiah, Zechariah, Mark and Philippians, with perhaps the addition of such passages as Luke xxii. 27 and John xiii. 16.
>
> It is correct to say that in His 'servantship' lies the redemption that is in Christ Jesus (the stripping of Himself John xiii, Phil. ii.) the Servant being the sufferer, and is the servantship a priestly one? If it is, a completed work, as in Hebrews, seems indicated in Mark xvi. 19, 'Sat down at the right hand of God'. This seems to have been the line taken by Campbell Morgan, but he links Mark with the Pentateuch—'the answer to the unfulfilled aspiration and sigh of humanity for a priest.*
>
> [* - This aspiration is fulfilled for Gentile believers, by Christ as the one Mediator and Head, Paul never refers to Christ as a Priest outside of the epistle to the Hebrews.]
>
> Amongst the omissions (no miraculous birth; no reference to childhood at Nazareth; no claim to authority, e.g., in the parable of the tares where the command to the reapers is omitted; no woes upon the Pharisees; no reference in Gethsemane, to the legions of angels; no statements as to His having all power in heaven and in earth)—amongst such is the omission of nomos 'law' which occurs in Matthew eight times, in Luke nine times, in John fifteen times. Service SUCH AS HIS was the free offering of His heart of love and knew no urge save that of His own nature or that He came to do the will of His Father.
>
> There is something that is very comforting in the thought that of all of whom God might have used to write along the lines of this gospel for our learning, it is the failing servant, who draws back from the path of service he had entered, but who later, through grace, was made 'serviceable' to whom it is given to set before us, so graphically and so entrancingly, the unfailing, the perfect Servant, Christ Jesus our Lord.

The narrative in Mark seems to have behind it the training of the twelve; in the book from which the prophecy of Mark is quoted, namely Isaiah, the disciples would have read of a ministry to be exercised by the Servant of God—now they SEE IT LIVED OUT under their very eyes; there they would have read the passages containing, I suppose, the fullest setting forth of Messiah in the Old Testament, now they are in daily contact with One Whose very living amongst them draws from them (one being spokesman for the rest) 'THOU art the Messiah' and immediately (viii. 29, 31) He began to teach them concerning His suffering, as if He would lead them on from Isa. xl.-xlii. to lii. 13-53 (compare Isa. liii. 1 and Mark viii. 27), while the whole gospel ends with His quietly dismissing them FOR SERVICE, but going forth 'working with (them)'.

> "That they should be WITH Him and that He might send them forth to preach" (meta Mark iii. 14).
>
> "They went forth and preached . . . . . the Lord working WITH (them)" (sun Mark xvi. 20).

How dependent we are on Him both for equipment and then for performance. There seem to be two avenues to the knowledge of the Lord Jesus—through the Book and by companionship with Him. It is possible to know more of the Book than of Him—oh for commensurate knowledge—'That I may know HIM'. Living, walking, with Him, they learnt Him to be what the Book says He is and was. Blessed fruitful knowledge. May it be ours."

A word must be given on the last twelve verses of Mark xvi. The R.V. margin reads "The two oldest Greek manuscripts and some other authorities omit from verse nine to the end".

Scrivener, one of the foremost authorities in textual criticism wrote:

> "The twelve concluding verses of his gospel are still found in every Greek Manuscript except the two oldest. Cod.B however, betrays consciousness on the scribe's part that something is left out, inasmuch as after ephobounto gar v. 8, a whole column is left perfectly blank (the only blank one in the whole volume), as well as the rest of the column containing verse 8, which is usual at the end of every book of Scripture."

In the "Companion Bible" Appendix 168, the reader will find a summary of the controversy, and will observe that Dean Burgon's work is indicated as the basis of the argument presented.

It lies quite outside the scope of our pages to attempt textual criticism, for if it is not dealt with exhaustively it is valueless. Those of our readers who are interested can find all the material necessary for arriving at a sound judgment in the various volumes written on the question of Textual Criticism, and of Mark xvi., in particular those of Scrivener, Dean Burgon, Hammond and Gaussen may be cited as authors to be consulted early in the enquiry. For our own part we are satisfied with the evidence at hand (whether these last twelve verses be the work of Mark himself, or added by another) that they form a part of those canonical Scriptures given by inspiration of God which we ignore at our peril.

LUKE'S GOSPEL SETS FORTH CHRIST AS "THE MAN".

According to Eusebius and Jerome, Luke was born at Antioch, in Syria. He is reckoned among the uncircumcision by Paul (Col. iv.), and was by profession a "physician" (Col. iv. 14). Tradition also has it that Luke was a painter of no mean skill. A fellow-labourer of Paul, he joined the apostle at Troas and accompanied him to Macedonia as far as Philippi, where he apparently left him for a time. Van Doren says of Luke's gospel "we are plainly not listening to the Galilean fishermen, but to the educated citizen of Antioch, well versed in the literary language of empire".

> "Origen, Eusebius and Jerome understand the expression 'my gospel' is used in Rom. ii. 16 of the Gospel of Luke. But the language of Luke's preface forbids the notion of any exclusive influence of Paul" (Van Doren).

The truth concerning this expression lies midway, though Paul did not come into contact with Christ during His earthly ministry, the peculiar Gentile trend of Luke's Gospel would provide a complete background for the gospel preached by the apostle of the Gentiles.

The outline suggested by Dr. Campbell Morgan for Luke's Gospel is an adaption of the words found in Luke xiii. 32. Omitting lesser subdivisions, here it is in substance.

Luke's Gospel. The Man.

A	i. - iii.	PERFECT	i.1-4. Prologue. (1) i. 5 - ii. 39. Being and Birth. (2) ii. 40-52. Childhood and Confirmation. (3) iii. Development and Anointing.
B	iv. - ix.36.	PERFECTED	(1) iv. 1-14. Temptation. (2) iv. 15 - ix. 27. Teaching. (3) ix. 28-36. Transfiguration.
C	ix. 37 - xxiv.	PERFECTING	ix. 37-50. Prelude. (1) ix. 51 - xviii. 30. Purpose and Preparation. (2) xviii. 31 - xxiv. 12. Approach and Accomplishment. (3) xxiv. 13-53. Administration.

Of the four Gospels Luke's is the one that is associated with the gospel as preached by Paul, not merely because Luke was a fellow-worker with the apostle, but because he so evidently wrote with the Gentile convert in mind.

Sadler has devoted a considerable portion of his introduction to Luke's Gospel to the links that are observable between the Epistles of Paul and the Gospel of Luke. For the benefit of the reader, we will epitomize these observations, but their full force can only be felt when the parallel passages are actually read together, unfortunately limitations of space make it impossible to set out these parallels here.

Paul's Gospel had an historic basis (I Cor. xv. 1-10). It had moreover a definite doctrine of the Person of Christ (Rom. i. 1-4), the birth, death and resurrection of the Son of God being basic.

In I Cor. xv. Paul says of the risen Christ "He was seen of Cephas, then of the twelve". Luke alone mentions the appearance of Cephas (Luke xxiv. 34).

Luke lays great stress upon the fact that the ceremonial law was observed at the birth of Christ (Luke ii. 21), which provides a background to the words of Gal. iv. 4 and Col. ii. 11.

Paul's description of a "widow indeed" (I Tim. v. 5) is foreshadowed by Anna (Luke ii. 37).

The acceptable year of the Lord (Luke iv. 19 and II Cor. vi. 2); the title "steward" (Luke xii. 42 and I Cor. iv. 1); the condition of alienation as one of death (Luke xv. 24, 32 and Eph. iv. 18); the use of the word "revealed" in connection with the second coming (Luke xvii. 30 and I Cor. i. 7); the comment "for all live unto Him" (Luke xx. 38 with Rom. xiv. 7; II Cor. v. 14); the reference to the "times of the Gentiles" (Luke xxi. 24 with Rom. xi. 25) and the close association of the ascension with the resurrection observable in the gospel and the epistles.

Luke's record of the institution of the Lord's supper (Luke xxii. 19, 20) is followed very closely by the record of I Cor. xi. 23-26, and it must be remembered that in both this institution, and the summary of the gospel given in I Cor. xv., Paul declares "I have received of the Lord" and "that which I also received".

Verbal coincidences as the use of katecheo "catechize" (Luke i. 4; Gal. vi. 6); "children of light" (Luke xvi. 8; I Thess. v. 4); the possible reference in I Tim. ii. 15 "the childbearing" to the account given of the birth of the Saviour in Luke's Gospel and the use of the word ophthe in Luke xxii. 43 and I Tim. iii. 16 "seen of angels".

If the exhortation "Let the word of Christ dwell in you richly" (Col. iii. 16) refers to a scriptural record, a record moreover that contains the only Christian hymns recorded in the New Testament then Luke's gospel may be intended by the apostle under the heading "the Word of Christ". Again when the apostle beseeches the Corinthian Christians "by the meekness and gentleness of Christ" (II Cor. x. 1) some such record as that of Luke seems intended.

Other links with Paul's Gospel will be brought to light when we institute a comparison between the Gospel of Matthew and that of Luke.

#39. The Distinctive Purposes of the Gospels according to Matthew and Luke demonstrated.

pp. 125 - 129

The words used by Luke and Paul have been tabulated, and it has been found that "every second word in the Gospel of Luke is also used by Paul" and so close is the language of the Acts of the apostles to the diction of Paul's epistles, that there is actually a volume of considerable interest published, entitled "Paul, the author of the Acts" (H. Heber Evans). Moreover, among those who deny that Paul was or could be the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews, are those who maintain that its author was Luke. This we do not believe, and have every confidence that Hebrews is one of Paul's fourteen epistles—yet the closeness of language between Paul and Luke is emphasized by this suggestion.

The message which was given to the apostle Paul for the Gentiles, and the ministry of the reconciliation committed to him, arose out of the failure of Israel (speaking after the manner of men) to repent and believe the good news of the kingdom. The great teaching of the apostle, which included the Gentile within the sphere of the promise of Abraham (Romans and Galatians), is scarcely suggested by Matthew's Gospel. We have already seen that Matthew's Gospel is divided into two parts, each part is connected with the relationship and covenants indicated in Matt. i. 1. The first part, covering Matt. iv. 17 - xvi. 20, is associated with the kingly title "Son of David"; the second portion, commencing with the announcement of suffering, death and resurrection (xvi. 21), is the fulfilling of the title "Son of Abraham". The second phase of the Lord's ministry could not be made a matter of public proclamation until the great transaction of Calvary had removed the curse, and made it possible for the blessing of Abraham to flow out to the Gentiles (Gal. iii. 13, 14). The Acts opens with a renewed witness concerning the kingdom of Israel and David's throne, but also links with it the wider covenant made with Abraham. Luke, who wrote the "Acts", had already written a "former treatise of all that Jesus began to do and teach" and in that treatise he laid a foundation for Paul's Gospel of the reconciliation. He does not stay at Abraham when he gives the genealogy of the Lord, but goes back to Adam.

The unfolding of the divine purpose is closely connected with the revelation of Christ Himself. It will be found that the circle of truth widens and deepens as the time arrives for some richer title of Christ to come forth. The inner circle, latest in time of revelation, and first to be fulfilled and exhausted is associated with David. To this the first portion of Matthew is devoted (i.-xvi.). The next circle, which goes back in history, and looks forward beyond the confines of the rule of David, is connected with Abraham. The second portion of Matthew (xvii.-xxviii.) and the Acts belong to this section of the purpose. Luke's gospel goes back beyond both Abraham and David, and traces the genealogy of the Saviour back to Adam. This forms the basis for Paul's message to the Gentiles; and indeed it is Paul alone of all the New Testament writers who makes known the wondrous and far-reaching connection that is established in the purpose of God between Adam, mankind (including Jew and Gentile) and Christ.

Let us now examine one or two passages that are found in both Matthew and Luke, and see what divergence there is, if any, and what significance may be attached thereto.

(1) THE FORERUNNER.

(a) The Time and Period.

Matt. iii. 1, "In those days."

Luke iii. 1, 2, "Now in the fifteenth year of the reign of Tiberius Caesar, Pontius Pilate being governor of Judaea, and Herod being tetrarch of Galilee, and his brother Philip tetrarch of Ituræa and of the region of Trachonitis, and Lysanias the tetrarch of Abilene, Annas and Caiaphas being the high priests."

Matthew, the Hebrew writer for the Hebrews, is unconcerned about the bearing of Gentile rulers upon the date of John's commission, whereas Luke, the writer for the Gentiles, gives the utmost attention to the Gentile powers that be.

(b) The Preaching of John.

Matt. iii. 1, 2, "Came John the Baptist preaching in the wilderness of Judæa, and saying Repent ye: for the kingdom of heaven is at hand."

Luke ii. 3, "The word of God came unto John the son of Zacharias in the wilderness, and he came into all the country about Jordan, preaching the baptism of repentance for the remission of sins."

Here once more the divergence is according to plan. Matthew, the writer of the gospel of the King, for the Hebrew Christian, stresses "repentance in view of the kingdom of heaven"; Luke, companion of Paul, and writing for the Gentile convert stresses "the remission of sins".

(c) The Quotation from Isaiah.

Matt. iii. 3, "For this is he that was spoken of by the prophet Esaias saying, The voice of one crying in the wilderness, Prepare ye the way of the Lord, make His paths straight."

Luke iii. 4-6, "As it is written in the book of the words of Esaias the prophet, saying, The voice of one crying in the wilderness, Prepare ye the way of the Lord, make His paths straight. Every valley shall be filled, and every mountain and hill shall be brought low: and the crooked shall be made straight, and the rough ways shall be made smooth; and all flesh shall see the salvation of God."

It will be seen at once, that Luke could not be satisfied with the brief quotation made by Matthew. He must go on until "the salvation of God" seen by "all flesh" is reached, for such a theme coincides with the purpose of his gospel.

(2) THE BIRTH OF CHRIST.

(a) The Time and Period.

Matt. ii. 1, "Now when Jesus was born in Bethlehem of Judæa in the days of Herod the king."

Luke ii. 1, 2, "And it came to pass in those days, that there went out a decree from Cæsar Augustus, that all the world should be taxed (and this taxing was first made when Cyrenius was governor of Syria)."

Matthew's circumference is "Judæa" and its centre Herod; Luke's circumference is "all the world" and its centre Cæasar Augustus.

(b) The Worshippers.

Matt. ii. 1, "There came wise men from the east to Jerusalem."

Luke ii. 8, 15, "There were in the same country shepherds . . . . . Let us go now even unto Bethlehem, and see this thing which is come to pass, which the Lord hath made known unto us."

Matthew makes no reference to the shepherds; Luke makes no reference to the wise men. Each is divinely guided in his selection as the sequel will show.

(c) The Purpose of the Nativity.

Matt. ii. 2, 5, 6, "Where is He that is born king of the Jews . . . . . they said . . . . . In Bethlehem of Judæa."

Luke ii. 11, "For unto you is born this day in the city of David a Saviour which is Christ the Lord."

Here the contrast is most marked—Matthew says in Bethlehem is born the King; Luke says in Bethlehem is born a Saviour, each evangelist keeping strictly to his aim and purpose.

Luke supplements his account of the shepherds' and of the Angels' testimony by the added doxology "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will toward men", whereas Matthew quotes the prophet Micah saying "that shall rule My people Israel". In addition, old Simeon is brought before us, an Israelite looking for the consolation of Israel, but when he saw the infant Christ, and took Him in his arms, Israel is not mentioned first, but strange as it may seem, he said, "A light to lighten the Gentiles, and the glory of Thy people Israel" (Luke ii. 32).

(3) THE LORD'S OPENING MINISTRY.

(a) The Context.

Matt. iv. 1, "Then was Jesus led up of the Spirit into the wilderness to be tempted of the devil."

Luke iv. 1, "And Jesus being full of the Holy Ghost returned from Jordan and was led by the Spirit into the wilderness."

No comment is here necessary, the only reason these passages are quoted is to show that the next statements are rightly compared together.

(b) The Subject of the Ministry.

Matt. iv. 17, "From that time Jesus began to preach and to say, Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand."

Luke iv. 18, 19, "The Spirit of the Lord is upon Me, because He hath anointed Me to preach the gospel to the poor: He hath sent Me to heal the broken-hearted, to preach deliverance to the captives, and recovering of sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that are bruised, to preach the acceptable year of the Lord."

Here once again each evangelist is true to the purpose of his gospel, Matthew consistently speaks of the kingdom, Luke of the Gospel. The Lord continued His discourse and drew attention to the fact that in the days of Elias there were many widows in Israel during the great famine, but unto none of them was Elias sent, save unto Sarepta, a city of Sidon, unto a woman that was a widow. And many lepers were in Israel in the time of Eliseus the prophet, and none of them was cleansed, saving Naaman the Syrian. Just as with the supplement in the second chapter, so here, the Gentile, not the Jew, is pre-eminent—both the widow of Sarepta and Naaman being Gentiles. One further illustration will suffice.

(4) THE SECOND COMING.

(a) The Context.

Matt. xxiv. 19, "And woe unto them that are with child, and to them that gave suck in those days!"

Luke xxi. 23, "But woe unto them that are with child, and to them that give suck in those days."

As above, these two passages are quoted to establish the fact that both passages record the same prophecy.

(b) The Prophecy.

Matt. xxiv. 21, "For then shall be great tribulation, such as was not since the beginning of the world to this time, no, nor ever shall be."

Luke xxi. 23, 24, "For there shall be great distress in the land and wrath upon this people. And they shall fall by the edge of the sword, and shall be led away captive into all nations: and Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles, until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled."

Here therefore is a demonstration of the distinctive point of view of each gospel. Matthew traces the Saviour's descent back through David and Abraham and stays there, Luke however pursues it back to Adam. Matthew speaks of the quest of the wise men, and their question concerning the King of the Jews, Luke tells of the angels and the shepherds, and that child born in the city of David is a Saviour. Old Simeon supplements by putting the Gentile first. The opening ministry of Christ as recorded by Matthew speaks of the kingdom as does that of John the Baptist, whereas in Luke the opening ministry of our Lord stresses the gospel of mercy and deliverance, while instead of announcing the kingdom John preaches remission of sins.

We all know what a prominent position is given by Matthew to the parables of the mysteries of the kingdom, in no lesser prominence the distinctive parables of Luke set forth his peculiar teaching. Who but Luke could record the parable of the Good Samaritan? How fitting is the parable of the Prodigal Son! The parable of the Unjust Steward with its use of oikonomia illustrates Paul's usage of the word when translated "dispensation". The parable of the Pharisee and the Publican is the doctrine of Romans in picture form, and contains the only evangelical use of "justification" found in the four gospels. The parable of the "ten pounds" is similar, but not the same as the parable of the "ten talents" recorded by Matthew. The special point of Luke's parable is the statement that it was uttered to correct the impression "that the kingdom of God should immediately appear". Consequently this nobleman "went into a far country to receive for Himself a kingdom, and to return".

The reader will find upon careful comparison, that in the smallest details, Matthew and Luke can be discovered consistently heading for their distinctive goals, and while such an examination cannot be conducted in these pages, the reader who has never attempted it, has a joy awaiting him that no second hand acquaintance with Holy Writ can provide.

#40. The Dispensational Place of John's Gospel.
pp. 145 - 148

For the full exposition of the Gospel of John the reader will be able to consult our new book Life Through His Name, to be published shortly, but in order to make this series as complete as possible yet without undue repetition, we will discuss the dispensational place which this Gospel occupies.

In the first place let us get well into mind the fact that the primitive church had three gospels, and three only. So far as we have any knowledge neither Matthew, Mark, Luke, Peter nor Paul saw or knew of the Gospel according to John. Polycrates, Bishop of Ephesus, at the end of the second century, and Irenaeus, the scholar of Polycarp, who was himself a disciple of John, record the fact that John remained in Ephesus till the times of the Emperor Trajan, and that he died there in extreme old age, as is testified by Eusebius also. The mistake concerning John that is exposed in John xxi. 23, may have obtained some credit by the fact that John outlived all the other apostles. It is evident that the gospels of Matthew, Mark and Luke contained all the teaching that was essential during the period governed by the Hope of Israel and that the statements concerning the "world", "whosoever" and the "other sheep" found in John's Gospel would have been premature or "undispensational" at the time. The relative place of the different sections of the New Testament, with particular reference to John's Gospel might be set out thus:

(1) Gospels.—New Covenant in operation.
Matthew, Mark, Luke.
King and Kingdom rejected.
(2) Acts.—New Covenant in operation.
King and Kingdom re-offered.
Israel rejected. Hope suspended.
(3) The Mystery.—New Covenant NOT in operation.
Paul's prison Epistles.
(4) John's Gospel.—New Covenant NOT in operation.
The world. The other sheep.
The gospel of eternal life.
(5) The Revelation.—Resumption of the New Covenant.
The Day of the Lord.

In Matthew's gospel is recorded the parable of the marriage of the King's Son, which is divided into three distinct phases, corresponding with the periods covered by the three Gospels, the Acts and the gospel according to John.

First Invitation (Matt. xxii. 3), "They would not come", the three gospels.
Second Invitation (Matt. xxii. 4, 5), "They made light of it", the Acts period; the servants were entreated spitefully and slain by the remnant, who in turn were destroyed and their city burned by the King in his wrath.
Third Invitation (Matt. xxii. 9, 10), "Gathered all . . . . . both bad and good", John's gospels.

The punishment of those who did not accept the second invitation took place between Acts xxviii. and 70A.D. during which period the dispensation of the mystery was revealed, believed and then largely forsaken. After Paul's death John wrote his gospel, giving a message and a calling to the "world" and revealing that the Lord had "other sheep" who were not of Israel's fold, which must be gathered, so that at last there may be "one flock and one shepherd".

At the present time there is an inner circle, embracing that small company of believers that are members of the Body of Christ and blessed under the terms of the Mystery, with Paul the prisoner as the appointed channel of teaching and truth, and a large outer circle embracing a vast number of believers, who while they have life, have no clear idea as to what is the hope of their calling. These find their gospel, comfort and teaching in John's Gospel.

Let us consider the character of the times in which John's Gospel operates, as compared with the character of the times covered by the three synoptic Gospels and the Acts. During the earthly ministry of Christ, He pointedly limited His ministry to the lost sheep of the house of Israel and forbade His disciples to go into the way of the Gentiles. This limitation is most definitely set aside by John's Gospel. There, the most prominent word indicative of sphere and scope is "the world", where it occurs about seventy-nine times, as against fifteen occurrences in the three synoptics. The bulk of the scriptures, whether Old or New Testaments, was written for Israel, about Israel, or written for the guidance of believing Gentiles who were "blessed with faithful Abraham". To-day Israel has long been in the condition known as Lo-ammi "not My People" (Hosea i. 9), and if the Gospel of John belongs to the period when Israel is not a living active factor, then, it should contain evidence that it was written for non-Jewish readers. We turn to the Gospel, and are not only struck with the title Logos "the Word", which is more intimately associated with Greek Philosophy than it is with the Law and the Prophets, but we discover that John goes out of his way to interpret terms which every Jew would know from childhood. Consider the following passages in the light of the argument that John wrote for non-Jewish readers, as over against the idea that John, like the writers of the three gospels, addresses the same people on the same theme.

> "They said unto Him, Rabbi (which is to say being interpreted, Master) where dwellest Thou?" (i. 38).
>
> "We have found the Messias, which is, being interpreted, the Christ" (i. 41).
>
> "And there were set there six waterpots of stone, after the manner of the purifying of the Jews" (ii. 6).
>
> "The Jews' Passover was at hand"; "The Passover, a feast of the Jews, was nigh"; "The Jews' Passover was nigh at hand" (ii. 13, vi. 4, xi. 55).
>
> "The Jews' feast of Tabernacles" (vii. 2).
>
> "It was at Jerusalem the feast of the dedication and it was winter" (x. 22).
>
> "The Jews have no dealings with the Samaritans" (iv. 9).
>
> "Go wash in the pool Siloam, which is by interpretation, Sent" (ix. 7).
>
> "Thou shalt be called Cephas, which is by interpretation, A stone" (i. 42).

It is evident that no Jew needed to be told the meaning of Rabbi, Messiah, or Cephas, neither did he need to be instructed that the Passover or Tabernacles were feasts of the Jews. Let us take the reference in x. 22 as a proof text. Some time ago a book came into our hands, and as we read we were at first somewhat mystified. Birds were described as flying North, in order to get to a warmer clime! Christmas Day was described in terms of the warmest summer, and where one would naturally look for typical Christmas fare and indoor conditions, picnics and open air enjoyment of the summer were its accompaniments. It began to dawn upon us that this book belonged to another part of the earth than England, and the mystery was solved by turning to the title page, where we discovered that it had been written and published in New Zealand. A book originating in London and addressed to European readers, would never use such an expression as "it was Christmas Day, and it was winter", or "it was August Bank holiday, and it was summer", and the fact that John felt called upon to add the words "and it was winter" to his reference to the feast of dedication is a proof that non-Jewish readers were in mind. Upon opening either of the three synoptic Gospels, we discover Christ presented to the people as the long promised King and Saviour, not until we are some distance through the narrative does it appear that Israel will reject their king. With John's Gospel, rejection is imprinted on the opening chapter.

> "He came unto His own and His own received Him not" (i. 11).

Here the rejection of Matt. xii. & xiii. and Acts xxviii. is assumed as it also is in the words of John ix. 39 "for judgment I am come into this world, that they which see not might see, and that they which see might be made blind", where an allusion to Isa. vi. 10 (quoted in both Matt. xiii. and Acts xxviii.) is apparent. The synoptic Gospels operate under the terms of the New Covenant and consequently the New Covenant memorial feast, known also as the Lord's Supper, is given a prominent place in them all. It is somewhat surprising, if one does not possess the dispensational key, to discover that John makes no mention of the institution of the Lord's supper in his gospel! If, however, the point of view advocated here be correct, then, seeing that before John's Gospel was written the people of the New Covenant had passed off the scene, it is but right and proper that John should leave the New Covenant feast unrecorded.

The revelation of the Mystery through the prison epistles of Paul had been made known some years before John's Gospel saw the light of day, consequently although John did not teach the truth of the Mystery, he need not have been ignorant of it, and a comparison with the doctrine of Christ, as made by John with the earlier revelation found in Colossians will show how this twofold ministry could run together, John ministering to the world, Paul ministering, through his prison epistles, mainly to the Gentiles believer.

John i.	Colossians i.
The Word (No man hath seen God).	The Image of the Invisible God).
The Only Begotten.	The Firstborn.
All things made by Him.	All things created.
His fullness.	All fullness.
The Word made flesh.	The body of His flesh.
Preferred before me.	He is before all things.
He was before me	He has pre-eminence.

In the record of our Saviour's conversation with the woman of Samaria, John slips in a note of time in order to indicate that what the Saviour had then said to the woman, had at the time of writing been fulfilled. At the time that Christ spoke to this woman it was still true that salvation was of the Jews and that Jerusalem was the place divinely appointed for worship. He, however, revealed to this woman that a day was coming when this would be changed, saying:

> "Woman, believe me, the hour cometh, when ye shall neither in this mountain, nor yet at Jerusalem, worship the Father."
>
> "The hour cometh (and now is, adds John), when the true worshipers shall worship the Father in spirit and in truth" (iv. 21, 23).

John's gospel covers the period indicated by the words "and now is", a phrase repeated in v. 25-28 and referring to the gift of life which is the central message of his gospel.

The complete structure of John's gospel, both as a whole and in its separate parts will be found in our new book which is now well in hand. It is hoped that this book entitled "Life Through His Name", being an exposition of John's Gospel in its entirety, will be ready and on sale by the end of this year. The present article is but an attempt to indicate this teaching and dispensational place, in order that the series now in hand should be in some measure complete.

#41. The Acts of the Apostles.
pp. 165 - 168

When it is the glad acknowledgment that the Scriptures are "true from the beginning" and that "all Scripture is given by inspiration of God and profitable", it is impossible to pit one section against another and say "this" is more important than "that". Yet the reader who most cordially endorses the doctrine of the inspiration of all Scripture would not hesitate to choose, say, between the prophet Jeremiah and the epistle to the Ephesians, and if we seek the reason why such a choice is inevitable the answer surely is that each dispensation has its own peculiar Scriptures, and whereas the believing Israelite would choose Jeremiah, because it so accurately suited his case and need as an Israelite who realized his need of a "New Covenant", the Gentile believer to-day who has realized his need of a calling that fits the period when Israel are reckoned "lo-ammi" and the New Covenant suspended, would find his case more than met by the glorious revelation of the epistle to the Ephesians. In this light we can therefore say, that no book of the New Testament is so important from a dispensational standpoint, as the Acts of the Apostles. If the believer entertains false views of the day of Pentecost he will find such views will tinge the whole of his outlook. If he entertains clear and scriptural views both of Pentecost and the crisis of Acts xxviii., it then becomes difficult not to see with clearness the dispensational place of both sets of Paul's epistles, and the relationship existing between them.

An exposition of the Acts of the Apostles was commenced in The Berean Expositor for 1934, and at the time of writing (1944) that study draws to a conclusion. It is now being prepared in book form and will D.V. be published later. To attempt a summary of this ten years' study in a few pages would not be profitable, we can only trust that the earnest student will readily avail himself of the existing volumes and be possessed of all the structures and explanations that have been offered.

In the series we draw attention to key passages and points of dispensational interest, so that we may be free to pass on to those remaining books of the New Testament whose exposition is needed to make this series "Fundamentals of Dispensational Truth" complete. In the first place, the reader should observe the overlap that is evident in Acts i. 1-14. Luke refers to "the former treatise" and Acts i. 1-14 is largely a resumé of Luke xxiv. The "Acts" proper begins with Acts i. 15.

A | i. 1-14. The former treatise.
All that Jesus began to do and to teach.
A | i. 15 - xxviii. 31. The present treatise.
All that Jesus continued to do and teach, through the ministries of Peter and Paul.

Apart from minor references to other servants, the Acts of the Apostles is the record of the Acts of Peter and Paul, Peter's ministry commencing with Pentecost and ending with his imprisonment (i. 15 - xii. 23); Paul's ministry commencing with the Spirit's call at Antioch (Acts xiii.) and ending with the imprisonment of Acts xxviii. The Acts of the Apostles opens and closes on a similar note.

> "Wilt thou at this time restore again the kingdom to Israel?" (i. 6).
> "For the hope of Israel I am bound with this chain" (xxviii. 20).

Whereas, however, in the former passage the Lord does not state explicitly that Israel's restoration will be deferred, simply saying "It is not for you to know the times or the seasons, which the Father hath put in His own power" (i. 7), Paul is inspired to declare in Acts xxviii., that blindness has descended upon Israel, and that the salvation of God is sent to the Gentiles (xxviii. 28). Should the reader wish for a fuller exposition of the question raised in the sixth verse of the first chapter, he is referred to the volume "The Apostle of the Reconciliation" (pp. 33-48), where the subject is considered at some length under the following subdivisions:

> The Lord's own teaching concerning the restoration of the kingdom to Israel.
> The Old Testament teaching concerning the restoration of the kingdom to Israel.
> The meaning and dispensational place of Pentecost.

It will be patent to the intelligent reader that if the hope of Israel runs throughout the activities covered by the Acts, it necessarily follows that the epistles of Paul, addressed to the churches founded by the ministry recorded in the Acts, will find their hope vitally associated with the current hope of Israel. The geographical movement of the Acts, the people who are particularly addressed and the key words that indicate the dispensational teaching of the period, move together, and are as follows:

GEOGRAPHICAL MOVEMENT. PEOPLE ADDRESSED:
Jerusalem.	Antioch.	Rome.
"Israel" (i. 6). "Jews only" (xi. 19). "A man that is a Jew" (x. 28). "Unto you first . . . God sent" (iii. 26).	"Children of the stock of Abraham, and whosoever among you feareth God, TO YOU is the word of this salvation sent . . . the Gentiles besought that these words might be preached unto them." "It was necessary that the Word of God should first have been spoken unto you . . . lo, we turn to the Gentiles" (xiii. 26-46)	"The Chief of the Jews . . . they departed . . . Be it known therefore unto you, that the salvation of God is sent UNTO THE GENTILES, and that they will hear it" (xxviii. 28).
KEY WORDS.
Restoration.	Reconciliation.	Rejection.
Restore (i. 6) Refreshing (iii. 19). Restitution (iii. 21). "This is that" (Joel).	The ministry of Paul (Rom. xi. 15; II Cor. v. 17-21; Acts xiii.-xix.). "A light of the Gentiles" (Isa. xlix. 6).	Acts xxviii. 17-27. "Go and tell this people" (Isa. vi. 9, 10).

Two miracles, having dispensational teaching, are found in the Acts; one, the healing of the lame man by Peter (Acts iii. and iv.), the other the blinding of a Jew followed by the conversion of a Gentile (Acts xiii.). Peter follows the miracle of healing with two prophetic applications, one in iii. 17-24, the other in iii. 25 - iv. 12. In the third chapter, the times of refreshing and the times of restitution are named, while in the fourth chapter, the healing of the lame man is further expanded in the words "neither is there salvation (literally 'the healing') in any other" (iv. 12). This miracle sets forth in symbol the intent and purpose of Peter's ministry.

In Acts xiii. Paul also performs a miracle, but this is one of judgment and foreshadows his ministry. A Jew, who withstood the preaching of the gospel to the Gentiles, is smitten with blindness, while a Gentile bearing the same name as "Paul" is saved, a typical foreshadowing of what actually took place as recorded in Acts xxviii. 17-31. In Acts xiii. 38 Paul warns the Jew of the danger that threatened, introducing the warning with the words "Be it known unto you therefore", he uses the same words in Acts xxviii. 28, when that judgment had fallen, "be it known unto you therefore". Turning to the ministry of Paul himself which occupies chapters xiii.-xxviii., we discover that it falls into two parts. At Acts xx., in Paul's speech to the elders of Ephesus (verses 20-21, 25-27) we are conscious that a change is coming, and in verses 22-24, Paul makes it clear that a new sphere of ministry, associated with bonds and afflictions is awaiting him. As we read on, we discover in the next chapter, that owing to a riot in Jerusalem, Paul is taken into custody by the Roman soldiers, and in Acts xxiii. 11, in the night following his trial before the council, Paul is encouraged by a vision in which he is assured he must testify of the Lord in Rome.

In Acts xxvi. 16 Paul makes it clear that he had received of the Lord a twofold ministry.

> This is indicated by the word "both".
> This is indicated by the subdivision of his ministry into "those things which thou hast seen" and "those things in which I will appear unto thee".
> The transition is further indicated by the words "unto whom NOW I send thee", and it is to this point of time that the apostle refers when he uses the past tense of the verb in Acts xviii. 28 "was sent".

After the dismissal of Israel in the last chapter (xxviii.) and the suspension of their hope, we find the apostle occupying two whole years in his own hired house at Rome, and there, as "the prisoner of Jesus Christ for you Gentiles" (Eph. iii. 1), he declares he received the "dispensation of the mystery" which forms the basic theme of the epistles written by Paul the prisoner, namely Ephesians, Philippians, Colossians and II Timothy.

This outline of the book of Acts would be totally inadequate did it stand alone, but as a full exposition of the book has been given in these pages over the last ten years, and as both space and time are too precious to spend in unnecessary repetition, we submit this summary trusting that where it should be necessary to supplement the hints given here, the reader will find a satisfactory explanation in the series referred to. Our way is now clear to approach the epistles of Paul, and this we hope to do in our next article.

#42. Evidences for the Pauline authorship of Hebrews.
pp. 188 - 191

Having considered the historic portions of the New Testament, namely the four Gospels and the Acts of the Apostles, the next subject, if we continue in the canonical order of the books is the epistle to the Romans. This epistle, as our readers know, is a mighty system of theology in itself, but, even so, it belongs to a distinct group of writings and can only be fully appreciated after its relation to the whole has been perceived. That whole is the fourteen epistles written by Paul.

Eusebius, an ecclesiastical historian born 270A.D., confirms this for he wrote "fourteen epistles are clearly and certainly Paul's". The one epistle concerning which there has been difficulty in accepting Paul as the author is the epistle to the Hebrews. For purposes that will be evident when the epistle is studied, neither the name of Paul nor his apostolic office is mentioned, and this has opened the door for doubts and speculations. Origen, born 185A.D., is often quoted as saying of the authorship of the epistle to the Hebrews "what is the very truth of the matter, God only knows", but a fuller quotation shows that he was not referring to authorship or substance:

> "If I were to give my opinion, I should say, the phraseology and the texture belong to some one relating the apostle's sentiments, and, as it were commenting on the words of his master. If any church therefore hold this to be an epistle of Paul, let it receive commendation on account of this; for it is not without reason that the ancients have handed it down as being of Paul. Who wrote the epistle (graphes, penned it, or committed it to writing) God (only) knows with certainty; but the report which has reached us is, that some affirm it to be written by Clement, bishop of Rome; and some, by Luke, who wrote the Gospel and the Acts."

Other writings of Origen can be quoted to show that he was not in a doubtful state of mind regarding this epistle, he says, quoting Heb. v. 12 "according to this, the apostle says", and again "in the epistle to the Hebrews, the same Paul says", and in a homily preserved in a Latin translation, he says "Paul himself, the greatest of the apostles, writing to the Hebrews, says" and then quotes Heb. xii. 18, 23. Origen refers to the opinion held "in ancient times". Who can these of "ancient time" be? He himself being born in 185A.D. was only a little over a hundred years removed from apostolic times, consequently as Hallet remarks:

> "It is very certain, then, that the churches and writers who were ancient with respect to Origen, had one common tradition, that St. Paul was the author of the epistle to the Hebrews. And their testimony to this matter of fact cannot but be of great weight, since those Christians who were ancients with respect to Origen, must have conversed with the apostles, and at least with their immediate successors."

Turning from external evidence, let us examine the epistle itself and see what light and information it gives of its author. From Heb. xiii. 18, 19, 23, 24 and x. 34, we gather that the author was well known to these Hebrews, and he calls Timothy "our brother" even as he does in Col. i. 1, I Thess. iii. 2 and Philemon 1. The word translated "set at liberty" apoluo means "released, dismissed or sent away on some special mission". The request "pray for us" and the suggestion that he may be restored to the Hebrews is characteristic of Paul, as may be seen by comparing Heb. xiii. 18, 19 with Phil. i. 25, ii. 24, & Philemon 22 and Heb. xiii. 23 with Phil. ii. 23. Heb. x. 34 cannot be pressed, as the critical Greek text reads "prisoners" instead of "my bonds". "They of Italy salute you" (Heb. xiii. 24) must mean that the apostle was writing from Italy if not from Rome, the Greek hoi apo tes Italias cannot mean "natives of Italy now resident elsewhere", this is against the *usus loquendi of the Greek language. A similar use of apo is found in Acts xvii. 13. A writer is known, not so much by outstanding features, but in small unobtrusive, least suspected items. In Heb. x. 30 for instance, the author quotes Deut. xxxii. 35, but upon examination it is found that this differs both from the Hebrews and the Septuagint. Paul quotes Deut. xxxii. 35 in Rom. xii. 19, and the words used are identical with those used in Heb. x. Does not this clearly indicate common authorship? Small particles and connections are employed by Paul in such a manner as to demand that he is the author of Hebrews. Not only do the following particles occur ONLY in Paul's epistles and in Hebrews, but they occur NOWHERE else in the whole range of Scripture.

> [* - "Usage in speaking." The student would be well advised to compile his own dictionary of terms, so that the fullest value may be obtained from the books he consults.]

"Even as", "as well as" kathaper (Heb. iv. 2, v. 4; Rom. iv. 6).
"Not yet", "never" medepote, medepo, mepo (Heb. xi. 7; II Tim. iii. 7; Heb. ix. 8 and Rom. ix. 11).
"Therefore", "wherefore" toligaroun (Heb. xii. 1; I Thess. iv. 8).
"Far above", "over" huperano (Heb. ix. 5; Eph. i. 21, iv. 10).

Again one set of ideas that would come naturally to one writer, would be foreign to the upbringing or thought processes of another. Paul, brought up in Tarsus, would not have the antipathy to Greek sports that would be felt by a Palestinian Jew, and his peculiar use of terms borrowed from Greek games is a most decisive indication of his authorship of Hebrews. The word agon is found neither in the Septuagint nor in any other part of the New Testament, than in Paul's epistles and Hebrews. It is translated "conflict", "contention", "fight" and "race", and occurs in Phil. i. 30, Col. ii. 1, I Thess. ii. 2, I Tim. vi. 12, II Tim. iv. 7 and Heb. xii. 1. This however is not all, there are scores of connections discoverable between Paul's epistles and Hebrews by observing the context of the several occurrences of agon. We give the following:

Echontes "having" (Heb. xii. 1 and Phil. i. 30).
Tes pisteos "of faith" (Heb. xii. 1, 2 and I Tim. vi. 12).
Perikeimenon "compassed about" and apokeitai "laid up" (Heb. xii. 1; II Tim. iv. 8).
Stauron "cross" (Heb. xii. 2 and Phil. ii. 8).
Teleioten "finisher" (Heb. xii. 2) and teteleka "I have finished" (II Tim. iv. 7).

Athlesis "fight" (Heb. x. 32) and athleo "strive" (II Tim. ii. 5) are ample illustrations of the underlying links that bind Hebrews into the same bundle with the undisputed epistles of Paul.

Apekdechomai "waiting with expectancy", douleia "bondage", endunamoo "to be strengthened", entungchano "to make intercession", euarestos "acceptable", these are but a few specimens of the peculiar use of words that characterize Paul's epistles and the epistles to the Hebrews. The reader will see that the words chosen are in alphabetical order, and will find many others by patient search.

To this testimony of the exclusive use of certain words, must be added the personal way in which certain words are used by Paul. This can be well illustrated by the word katargeo which occurs in Paul's epistles and Hebrews twenty-six times. The word is found but four times in the Septuagint, namely in Ezra iv. 21, 23; v. 5; and vi. 8, where the word is used with its primitive significance of "stopping work". Paul however uses the word katargeo in a sense peculiar to himself, "to make without effect" as of faith, "to make void" as of law, "to destroy" as of the body of sin &c., &c. On two occasions Paul uses katargeo in connection with death.

"The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death" (I Cor. xv. 26).
"Who hath abolished death" (II Tim. i. 10).

This last usage is found in Heb. ii. 14:

"That through death he might destroy him that had the power of death, that is the devil."

While the presence of katargeo in such a context as the above is a testimony by itself, a comparison of the context of I Cor. xv. 26 is overwhelming.

I Corinthians xv. 26-28.	Hebrews ii. 5, 8, 14.
"The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death. For He hath put all things under His feet. But when He saith all things are put under Him, it is manifest that He is excepted, which did put all things under Him. And when all things shall be subdued unto Him, then shall the Son also Himself be subject unto Him that put all things under Him, that God may be all in all."	For unto the angels hath He not put in subjection the world to come, whereof we speak . . . Thou hast put all things in subjection under His feet. For in that He put all in subjection under Him, He left nothing that is not put under Him, but now we see not yet all things put under Him . . . that through death He might destroy him that had the power of death that is the devil."

Not only is there the special use of "destroy" as applied to death, there is in both "the world to come", the specially peculiar argument derived from the passage "Thou didst put all things under His feet" and the reference to Adam, (1) by name in I Cor. xv. and (2) by implication in Heb. ii. 6. The fact that angels mediated at the giving of the law at Sinai is stated in Gal. iii. 19 and implied in Heb. ii. 2. The apostolic confirmation by "signs and wonders and diverse miracles" are brought forward in II Cor. xii. 12 and Rom. xv. 19, and they are alluded to in Heb. ii. 4. Sinai and Sion are used allegorically of the two covenants in Gal. iv., and the two mountains are placed in similar juxtaposition in Heb. xii. While Heb. ii. is before us, we observe in verse 4 the reference to the confirming "of them that heard Him" and find parallels in II Cor. xii. 12 and Rom. xv. 19 as though the writer of Hebrews was making a covert allusion to the "signs and wonders, and diverse miracles" which were "the signs of an apostle". The hand and mind of Paul are not only revealed in all these and many other close parallels, but in such features as a tendency to use paronomasia or a "play on words" and not only so, but to use the same play on words in Hebrews as is found in his other epistles. For example in Rom. i. 20 he speaks of the "invisible" things of God being clearly "seen" and uses aoratos, a rare word for "invisible". The same peculiar figure being found again "as seeing Him Who is invisible" (Heb. xi. 27). Here once more aoratos is employed, and is found nowhere else in the New Testament outside Paul's epistles.

Again, to give another illustration, from Philippians and Hebrews there is a paronomasia on the word meno "to abide".

> "I know that I shall abide (meno), and continue (suparameno), with you all" (Phil. i. 25).
> "Not suffered to continue (paramenein) by reason of death, but this man because He continueth (menein)" (Heb. vii. 23, 24).
> "The same play, on the same words, is to be found in no third instance throughout the Bible" (Forster).

We cannot multiply evidences further. For those who desire an exhaustive treatment of the subject, we recommend a reading of the argument in the Commentary on Hebrews by the Rev. Moses Stuart, M.A., and the exhaustive treatise by the Rev. Charles Forster, B.D. We must conclude our examination of the evidences for the Pauline authorship of Hebrews, by referring to one that Paul himself assures us will always be found. If we can show this, then the matter can be considered settled.

Early in Paul's ministry he was compelled to protect the churches against fraud. Writing to the Thessalonians he bids them not to be shaken in mind as though they had received a letter from himself (II Thess. ii. 1, 2), for there had been reserved for his own peculiar use one expression, which he would always write with "his own hand" and which would be "the token in every epistle". That "token" was the use of the words "grave be with you" (II Thess. iii. 17, 18). This benediction in one form or another is found at the close of every one of Paul's epistles, including Hebrews, but is absent from the epistles of Peter, James, John and Jude. Here then is "proof", proof made doubly sure by the comparisons suggested already in this article. We therefore conclude that Paul wrote the epistle to the Hebrews, and shall deal with it as such in all our studies without further question or remark.

#43. The Place of Galatians in the early group of Paul's Epistles.
pp. 207 - 211

In our last article we were occupied with the proofs that may be brought forward for the Pauline authorship of the epistle to the Hebrews. We are satisfied that there is abundant proof and that Paul is the author of fourteen epistles in the New Testament. We have, in other epistles of other series, as in the article in the series dealing with the Acts of the Apostles, made it clear that Paul exercised a twofold ministry, and that his epistles keep pace with either the itinerant preaching of Acts xiii.-xix., of with the prison testimony indicated in the closing verses of Acts xxviii. The epistles therefore divide into two groups: those which were written while Paul was free to travel are Romans, Galatians, I and II Thessalonians, I and II Corinthians, Hebrews, and those written after the setting aside of Israel, and either during or after the imprisonment therein recorded. For the moment we are concentrating our attention on the earlier ministry and the seven epistles of that period. It is evident that the pairs of epistles—I & II Thess., and I & II Cor. must be kept together for the purposes of study, whether one of the other epistles were written between the writing of the first and second epistles or not. We could also consider the three single epistles in their canonical order, namely Romans, Galatians, and Hebrews, but wherever we may feel Galatians fits in the chronological order, we know that Romans was the last of the series.

As we found it necessary, and we trust profitable to discern the authorship of Hebrews, we shall find it equally important and helpful to have some certain convictions regarding the geographical and chronological place of Galatians. The following note from Lewin's "Life and Epistles of Paul" bears witness:

> "It is a great disappointment that neither in the Acts nor even in the Epistles can we trace any details of Paul's ministry in Galatia, and we must therefore content ourselves with reasonable probabilities."

We are now in the happy position of reading in the Acts itself the fullest account of this Galatian visit, and are free from the necessity of "reasonable probabilities" of any kind. Let us examine the problem.

- - - I l l u s t r a t i o n - - -
(BE-XXXVI.208a).

First, if Galatia be conceived of as the kingdom of that name which occupied the Northern part of Asia Minor, it is obvious that the epistle could not have been written until after Acts xviii. 23, for Gal. iv. 13 indicated a second visit. The reader may wonder how it is possible to use such an argument as "if Galatia be conceived" for a country either is or is not a definite geographical site and beyond argument. That of course would be conclusive if man did not alter frontiers by conquest or agreement, and if the ancient boundaries of any particular country were always identical with modern geography. The map above illustrates the position of Galatia as a kingdom, and the extent of geographical and historical information possessed by Bible Students up to the days of Dr. Kitto's Cyclopaedia 1847, or T. R. Birks, editor of Paley, 1849.

- - - I l l u s t r a t i o n - - -
(BE-XXXVI.208b).

By the year 1875 knowledge had so far increased that Lewin could publish in his "Life and Epistles of Paul" two maps, one showing the national boundaries of Galatia, the other the political boundaries, and it will be observed, that while the national boundaries coincide with Kitto's map, the political map reveals many changes. We find that a part of Phrygia had been incorporated in the enlarged Province of Galatia. The second map is based upon the discoveries of Sir William Ramsay, and reveals that the Roman Province extended so far south as to include as Galatian cities, Antioch, Lystra, Derbe and Iconium. By the time we come to the New Edition of "Youngs Analytical Concordance" only one map of Galatia is provided and that the largest Province including Antioch and the other cities enumerated above.

Now Paul was a Roman citizen and knew the high value placed by all in the Empire on that status, whatever their nationality might be. He could not, without offence, have addressed one of the Churches of Galatia as "Phrygians", and it is practically impossible that he would ever have thought of so doing. To him, Antioch, and the cities visited in Acts xiii. and xiv. were in Galatia.

Now it is remarkable that recent archaeological discoveries in Asia Minor have confirmed this point so that it has ceased to be a conjecture.

(1) In 401A.D., Asterius, Bishop of Amaseia lived in Pontus, consequently he knew at first hand the geography of his neighbourhood. Now by 401A.D. there had taken place many changes, and Lycaonia did not at that date belong to Galatia. The Bishop and all his readers knew this, yet in dealing with Acts xviii. 23, in direct contradiction to the facts of his own day, he included Lycaonia in Galatia.

"No conceivable interpretation could get Lycaonia out of Galatiken Choran except deliberate adhesion to the South Galatian view."

(2) Ptolemy wrote concerning this part of the Roman world and arranged his chapters according to the Roman Pro-consular divisions: The Pontus and Bithynian Thesis, The Asian Thesis, The Lykian Thesis, The Galatian Thesis.

We learn from Ptolemy that Galatia is bounded on the South by Pamphylia, and on the North by the Euxine Sea. The Southern portion included Pisidia. Further he actually enumerates Antioch, Iconium and Lystra as cities of Galatia.

(3) Hadrian conferred the rank of Colonia upon the city of Iconium and in Paul's day Iconian citizens called their country Galatike eparcheia "Province of Galatia".

(4) In a Greek dedicatory inscription of the year 56A.D. (and so of the very period under discussion) the writer describes his patris, Apollonia, as being the land of the Galatians. A glance at a map will show Apollonia to be over 40 miles west of Antioch and Pisidia.

When therefore Paul addressed converts at Iconium as Galatae, he gave them their due as Roman citizens. Had he called them by their national and not by the political name, that is Lycaonians, he would have insulted them, giving them the name reserved only for slaves. To be a "Phrygian" was to be rude, ignorant, slavish. To be addressed as "Men of the Province of Galatia" was honourable. Paul could no more have hoped to gain a hearing in Antioch by persisting in the use of "Phrygians" than a candidate for Parliament could hope to secure the votes of a constituency in Scotland by persistently using the name "English" instead of "British".

If therefore the cities evangelized in Acts xiii. and xiv. were cities of Galatia the argument for a later place in chronology that is based upon Gal. iv. 13, ceases to be sound. The fact that the Galatians knew Barnabas (Gal. ii.) is another strong proof that the epistle was written early. Paul had to explain who Titus was, but Barnabas needed no introduction. Now Barnabas played an important part in Acts xiii. and xiv., but he served his association with Paul at the end of Acts xv. and there is no record that he ever again visited these Galatians cities. If we adhere to the North Galatian view, then Paul did not visit Galatia until after Barnabas had left him.

We can now consider the chronological place of the epistle. In the fight for the truth seen in the epistle to the Galatians, no mention is made of "the decrees" of Acts xv., and Peter's defection of Gal. ii. is much more difficult to understand if it be held that it took place after Acts xv. We believe that the private conference of Gal. ii. took place upon the second visit of the apostle to Jerusalem (Acts xi. 30), and the reference to the "poor" coincides with the errand of mercy there indicated in that same verse. While Paul abode at Antioch for "a long time" the emissaries from Jerusalem went to Galatia and troubled the church (Gal. i. 6). The apostle's immediate reaction was the writing of the epistle to the Galatians. The self same contention that necessitated the conference of Acts xv. necessitated the epistle. If Paul had already received the decrees formulated by the Council at Jerusalem, he would have been in duty bound to have said so in his epistles, and moreover they would have provided him with his strongest weapon with which to overthrow the Judaisers who were spoiling his great work, yet he never refers to these decrees when writing to the Galatians.

Summarizing we put the position as follows:

(1) By this view no visit of Paul to Jerusalem is suppressed.
(2) The most forceful arguments that could be used at the time are used.
(3) No inconsistency is intruded into the Acts.
(4) Every phrase which bears upon the date is simply and naturally explained.
(5) The authority of the Council at Jerusalem and the decree made, remain unimpaired.
(6) The epistle was written from Antioch in Syria, or the neighbourhood.
(7) The Churches of Galatia were those of Pisidia, Antioch, Iconium, Lystra and Derbe.
(8) The epistle to the Galatians is probably the earliest book in the New Testament.

The seven epistles of the early ministry therefore appear to be arranged as follows:

Galatians.
I and II Thessalonians.
Hebrews.
I and II Corinthians.
Romans.

Our next study must seek to discover the key doctrines that bind this series of epistles together as one whole, but nothing further can be added at the moment, without encroaching too far into our limited space.

#44. The seven early epistles as a whole.
pp. 224 - 227

Two rather controversial subjects have occupied our attention in the last two articles, namely the authorship of the epistle to the Hebrews, and the identification of the Galatian churches, together with the probable chronological position of the epistle addressed to them.

We must now submit these seven epistles to an examination in order that the distinctive teaching that they give may be made evident; but before we endeavour to open up the epistle to the Galatians itself we must see the seven epistles as one whole, and the relationship of each epistle to that whole. In order to do this some acquaintance with the teaching of each of these epistles is necessary.

We therefore approach the epistle to the Galatians with the object of discovering some basic theme which will relate its content with the rest of the group. The moment we commence to read this epistle we are conscious of conflict, something vital is at stake, something that must be met, single-handed if need be, something that may necessitate withstanding Peter to the face and yielding “not for an hour” to those who “seemed to be pillars” at Jerusalem. The “truth of the gospel” was in jeopardy (Gal. ii. 14), the liberty of the believer was in danger (Gal. iv.) and the labours of the apostle rendered valueless.

We remember that in the thirteenth of Acts there has been recorded an outline of the address that Paul gave at Antioch, and how that Gospel was summed up in the wondrous words:

> "Through this Man is preached unto you the forgiveness of sins; and by Him all that believe are justified from all things, from which ye could not be justified by the law of Moses" (Acts xiii. 38, 39)

The heart and soul of Paul's Gospel is here revealed, it is the blessed and liberating doctrine of "Justification by Faith". The moment we reach this truth, we are conscious that we have reached the basic doctrine of the epistle to the Galatians, and turn to the third chapter to find its key text:

> "The just shall live by faith" (Gal. iii. 11).

When we turn to the epistle to the Romans, the atmosphere of conflict, of eager zealous championship gives place to one of quieter and calmer reasoning and demonstration, yet we have but to read the first half of the first chapter to realize that "the gospel" is once more the theme (Rom. i. 1, 9, 16) and that the heart of this gospel is still found in the words quoted once more in Rom. i. 17, "The just shall live by faith". Justification underlies the whole doctrinal fabric of Romans, dikaios "just", occurs seven times; dikaiosune "righteousness", 36 times; dikaioo "justify", 15 times and dikaioma "righteousness", 5 times, or 63 occurrences in the one epistle of these various aspects of righteousness.

Already while we have been recording these facts, the epistle to the Hebrews have been passing before the mind. This epistle is so different from either Galatians or Romans, that at first sight it does not seem very likely that any real connection will be discovered, until we remember that in Heb. x. we meet for the third and last time the text "The just shall live by faith" (verse 38).

This quotation from the prophet Habakkuk is found nowhere else in the New Testament and therefore its presence in these three great epistles cannot be lightly set aside. Having seen that these three epistles are therefore linked together by this common text we must endeavour to discover how it is that three epistles with so much individual and distinctive teaching come to have this common basis.

We return to the chapter in Galatians where the text is found, and learn from its context that the apostle used the text from Habakkuk to insist upon "faith" as distinct from "works of law".

> "But that no man is justified by the law in the sight of God, it is evident; for, The just shall live by faith. And the law is not of faith: but, The man that doeth them shall live in them" (iii. 11, 12).

"The hearing of faith" over against the "works of the law" (iii. 2, 5), Abraham's "belief" and "faith" being the characteristics of his children (iii. 6, 7, 9) and the justification of the heathen by faith (iii. 8), have led up to the introduction of this key text. We can write Paul's text as found in Galatians thus:

> "The just shall live by FAITH."

The moment we do this, our thoughts go back to Romans with its insistence upon "Righteousness". While it is still as true as when the apostle penned Galatians, that "faith" not "works of the law" constitutes the gospel plan for justification, there is, in Romans, a strong emphasis upon the word "just". Paul explains that the secret of the power resident in the gospel is because:

> "Therein is the righteousness of God revealed from faith to faith; as it is written, The just shall live by faith" (Rom. i. 17).

Here, it is "the righteousness of God" that drew out the text from Habakkuk, and we may write Paul's text as found in Romans thus:

> "The JUST shall live by faith."

Returning now to Hebrews, we are already aware that the evangelical doctrine of justification by faith is not the uppermost theme of that epistle. These Hebrews are rather exhorted to leave the types and shadows of their faith and to "go on unto perfection" (Heb. vi. 1). If it was blessedly possible for them to "go on", it was sadly possible for them to fail so to do, and consequently we find in structural correspondence the two passages thus:

> "Let us go on unto PERFECTION" (vi. 1).
> "We are not of them who draw back unto PERDITION" (x. 39).

Now it is just here, at this second alternative that the apostle brings forward the text from Habakkuk.

> "For yet a little while, and He that shall come will come, and will not tarry. Now the just shall live by faith: but if any man draw back, my soul shall have no pleasure in him" (Heb. x. 37, 38).

It is evident that the apostle is now speaking of practical faith, a faith that "endures" (x. 32), a faith that holds in it great recompence of reward (x. 35). He exhorts his readers to exercise patience during the waiting period, and enforces it by the quotation, "Now the just shall live by faith". It is evident that he is not speaking of the plan of gospel salvation, he is rather dealing with the life of faith that should accompany salvation, consequently we can once more set out the apostle's text as follows:

> "The just SHALL LIVE by faith."

Having seen the connecting link between the three single epistles of this series we turn our attention to the two pairs of epistles, those to the Thessalonians, and those to the Corinthians.

Again we are conscious of a very different atmosphere in the Thessalonian epistles from those to the Corinthians, yet as we ponder their message there emerges from the first epistle to the Thessalonians the trinity of graces, "faith, hope and love".

> "Remembering without ceasing your work of faith, and labour of love, and patience of hope in our Lord Jesus Christ" (I Thess. i. 3).

After some very pointed personal statements in chapter two, the apostle reverts to "these three" and in the third chapter deals first of all with "faith". Timothy is sent to comfort them concerning their "faith" lest they should have been tempted and when Timothy brought good tidings of that faith and charity the apostle was comforted, and expressed the most ardent desire to see them once more that he might "perfect that which is lacking" in their faith (I Thess. iii. 2, 5, 6, 7, 10).

From faith, the apostle passes to "love" (iii. 12; iv. 9), and from love to "hope" (iv. 13-18). In the last chapter of the epistle, the apostle not only repeats "faith, love and hope", but also repeats "labour", "work" and "patience" (v. 8, 12, 13, 14), consequently it is clear that we can write as the key words of this epistle "faith, love and hope". Having seen this, our task in I Corinthians is simplified. We know that after all the correction had been given and the instruction which the apostle deemed necessary, he concludes with that wonderful summary:

> "And now abideth faith, hope, love, these three; but the greatest of these is love" (I Cor. xiii. 13).

We have therefore key passages for five out of seven epistles. There remains to be adjusted the second epistle to the Thessalonians and the second epistle to the Corinthians. One feature that is true of both these epistles lies on the surface, they were both written to correct erroneous conclusions that had been drawn from the first epistles. Another and deeper parallel is that in both of these epistles there is a strong warning concerning the devices of the evil one:

> "Let no man deceive you by any means . . . . . whose coming is after the working of Satan with all power and signs and lying wonders, and with all deceivableness of unrighteousness in them that perish; because they received not the love of the truth, that they might be saved. And for this cause God shall send them strong delusion, that they should believe a lie" (II Thess. ii. 3-11).
>
> "I fear, lest by any means, as the serpent beguiled Eve through his subtlety, so your minds should be corrupted from the simplicity that is in Christ . . . . . For Satan himself is transformed into an angel of light. Therefore it is no great thing if his ministers also be transformed as ministers of righteousness" (II Cor. xi. 3, 14, 15).

With the data now collected we are able to present these seven epistles as a whole, revealing their concern for doctrine, practice and dispensational truth.

Galatians. The just shall live by FAITH.
I Thessalonians. Faith, love, hope.
II Thessalonians. Satanic deception.
Hebrews. The just shall LIVE by faith.
I Corinthians. Faith, hope, love.
II Corinthians. Satanic deception.
Romans. The JUST shall live by faith.

We now ready to give the epistle to the Galatians the attention it demands. This we will do in future articles.

The Gift of God.

A note on the meaning of "Doron" in Eph. ii. 8.

pp. 38, 39

At the time of writing (November 1950), the preparation of the series on Ephesians has reached article No.44, and a very simple computation will show that at the present rate of publication, article No.44 will not see the light of day for another six years. We therefore feel that one item could be extracted from that article with profit and presented here, owing to the problem that it deals with and the wondrous grace that it reveals.

By some, Eph. ii. 8 has been taken to teach that faith is the gift of God. This leads at last to the hyper-Calvinistic position that none but the elect can believe, and to the awful conception of Divine Justice that a man will be held responsible for not believing, although unable to believe unless God grant the ability! This extreme doctrine arises out of two misconceptions, one of grammar, the other of meaning. The word "that" in the expression "And that not of yourselves it is the gift of God", is the Greek touto and is neuter. It cannot therefore refer to faith, which in the Greek is tes pisteos, and is feminine. "That" must therefore refer to something other than faith, and the continuation of the argument in verse nine shows that the "Grace-by-faith-salvation" considered as a whole is in view.

The word "gift" is the Greek doron, one of many variants of the root do (cf. donation, &c.) meaning a gift. This particular word is used in Matt. ii. 11; v. 23, 24 and elsewhere as of gifts and offerings brought by men to God. In Mark vii. 11 it is "corban", and the LXX employs doron thirty-seven times in the one book Leviticus to translate the Hebrew qarab (corban), as for example in Lev. i. 2, 3, 10, 14, 15. Eph. ii. 8 provides the most astounding evidence of the character of this dispensation of grace, for it presents the unique conception of God bringing an oblation, an offering to man, a situation without parallel! Let us bow in adoration at such a "gift". It would be impossible to teach that "faith" is the oblation or sacrificial offering brought by God—such an idea defies explanation, it is gloriously true to teach that this "Grace-by-faith-salvation" cannot possibly originate from ourselves, for it is the love gift of God.

We believe that some of our readers who have expressed concern about the translation of Eph. ii. 8 will appreciate the following extract:

> "In the opening paragraph we spoke of the future of these studies and as another two months have passed and further work has been done we bring our report up to date. Feeling that it would be well-pleasing to the Lord and in entire harmony with the stewardship entrusted, we have, during the last year, put aside all work that could reasonably wait, and have pressed on with these articles on Ephesians, and have the joy of knowing that the whole of the doctrinal section has now been reviewed, and with the sixty-eighth article we have reached the close of the great central prayer in Eph. iii. 14-21. We shall have to leave the exposition of the practical section to our successor, but we feel that whenever the great revelation of grace and glory that is found in the opening chapters of this epistle is understood and appreciated, the practical outworking can be safely left to work itself out without human assistance.

Others avenues of exposition lie before us, and we hope to explore these together with our readers, but no one that understands the peculiar nature of the testimony of The Berean Expositor will need to be told that whether we are engaged in the study of Genesis or Revelation or of any intermediate book, whether we seek a structure or endeavour to untie a grammatical knot, from first to last and all the time "STANDARD TRUTH" to us must be that revelation of superlative grace which is enshrined in the epistle to the Ephesians."

Studies in the Book of JOB.

#13. "The patience of hope." (Key to the enigma of the ages. No.3).

pp. 8 - 12

"Ye have heard of the patience of Job, and have seen the end of the Lord", said James in his epistle (James v. 11) and this twofold reference to the book we are studying must be included in our survey. This verse forms part of a section that occupies chap. v. 7-11, and this in its turn is in structural correspondence with chap. 1. 2-4.

> "My brethren count it all joy when ye fall into divers temptations; knowing this, that the trying of your faith worketh patience. But let patience have her perfect work, that ye may be perfect and entire, wanting nothing" (James i. 2-4).

The stress upon "patience" in its relation to "perfecting" cannot be avoided. It is evidently an integral part of the epistle and the reference to Job must not be looked upon as incidental. The reader of the book of Job, would probably think that James might have said "Ye have heard of the impatience of Job", for Job, while enduring unprecedented affliction did nevertheless exhibit great impatience. Yet we are sure that James is right and that our reading of Job must be wrong.

The first thing we must do is to become acquainted, as fully as possible, with the meaning of the keywords of this passage. The word "patience" in the English language answers to more than one conception as expressed by the Greek. There is that form of patience, which "suffers long" makrothumia, which is found in James v. 10, where "the prophets" are given as an example of those who, suffering affliction did so with "patience". There is that form of patience, which James speaks of in Chapter iii. 17 where epiekes is translated "gentle", and there is that form of patience which patiently bears up under evil, which should mark the teacher (II Tim. ii. 24), but these words are not used of Job, either in the LXX or in the N.T. The word that James uses of Job is the Greek word hupomone, which literally means "to remain under". The verb is hupomeno and the noun and verb together are used in the epistle of James five times.

> "Blessed is the man that endureth temptation" (i. 12).
> "We count them happy which endure" (v. 11).
> "The trying of your faith worketh patience" (i. 3).
> "But let patience have her perfect work" (i. 4).
> "Ye have heard of the patience of Job" (v. 11).

The reference to Job coming last in the list of occurrences suggests that in Job, James sums up what he has said previously upon this subject of patience. It will be seen that in James' epistle patience is connected with temptation and the trying of faith and that it has a perfect work to accomplish. Other renderings of hupomeno that give further light are those that speak of "enduring" to the end (Matt. x. 22; xxiv. 13), "suffering" in view of reigning (II Tim. ii. 12); and the four references in Hebrews, which speak of enduring "afflictions", "the cross", "contradiction" and "chastening" (Heb. x. 32; xii. 2, 3, 7). Patience "waits" (Rom. viii. 25) and patience is closely allied with "hope". The apostle speaks of "the patience of hope" in the same way that he speaks of "the work of faith" (I Thess. i. 3), and if James is right when he declares that "faith" without its consequent "works" is dead, it follows that "hope" cannot be severed from "patience".

It will be observed that we have moved somewhat from the idea of patience being quiet, uncomplaining submission, to a submission (quiet or complaining as the case may be) that has hope in view and accordingly waits in expectation. When we turn to the book of Job we find that the A.V. does not use the word "patience" or "patient", neither is there any Hebrew word that must necessarily be so translated. When we read in Psalm. xl. 1, "I waited patiently" the margin instructs us that the original reads "in waiting I waited", and the only other occurrence of the word "patient" in the O.T. is in Eccles. vii. 8, where the word means "slow", as in "slow to anger" or "to prolong" as one's days. While there is no actual word that can be translated "patient" in the book of Job, there are a number of occurrences in the LXX version which must not be neglected, and if we give these our consideration we may perceive a little more clearly "the patience of Job" as James intended. Upon examination we find that the LXX uses the word hupomeno thirteen times and hupomone once, making fourteen in all. These thirteen occurrences of the verb translate eight different Hebrew words and the one occurrence of the noun, of course, translates one Hebrew word. These Hebrew words have a wide variety of significance and we shall understand the meaning of "patience" as applied to Job if we exercise a little of that quality while we examine these different references and note their bearing upon the matter before us. Let us take them in the order of occurrences.

Job iii. 9. "Let it look for light but have none" (A.V.).
"Let it remain dark, and not come into light" (LXX).

Here the Hebrew word translated "remain" is qavah, which is translated "wait" in Job xvii. 13 or "look" in Job xxx. 26. To wait with expectation, is the meaning of this Hebrew word.

Job vi. 11. "What is my strength, that I should hope?" (A.V.).
"What is my strength, that I continue" (LXX).

The Hebrew word yachal combines the two thoughts "to wait with hope". It is used of Noah when he "stayed" for seven days, awaiting deliverance from the deluge, and it is found eight times in Job, where it is translated "wait", "hope" and "trust". Job xiv. 14 which is one of these occurrences, and which is also rendered in the LXX by hupomeno, is so to the point of our enquiry that we give it separate mention "all the days of my appointed time, will I wait, till my change come" (A.V.). "I will wait until I exist, or am made, again" (LXX).

Job vii. 3. "So am I made to possess months of vanity" (A.V.).
"So have I also endured months of vanity" (LXX).

The Hebrew word here translated by the LXX hupomeno is nachal "to inherit, or possess".

Job ix. 4. "Who hath hardened himself against Him, and prospered?" (A.V.).
"Who has hardened himself against Him and endured?" (LXX).

Here, hupomeno is the translation of the Hebrew word shalam, the word which gives us the word shalom "peace", the root idea of which is completeness. In Job ix. 4 the idea seems to be "who that hath hardened himself against the Lord, ever lasted out to finish?" an intensive form of the thought "endure". With this example, Job xxii. 21 "be at peace" and Job xli. 11 "repay" should be read.

Job xv. 31. "Let not him that is deceived trust in vanity" (A.V.).
"Let not him think that he shall endure, for his end shall be vanity" (LXX).

Here the Hebrew word taah "to deceive" is translated by the LXX hupomeno but it is beyond present day knowledge to explain how the Septuagint translators could use the word "patiently endure" to translate "deceived" or "be led astray". We can but record the fact, and pass on.

Job xx. 26. "All darkness shall be his in his secret places" (A.V.).
"Let all darkness wait for him" (LXX).

Here the Hebrew word taman, followed by "secret places" is rendered hupomeno, and there is some affinity between the idea of being hid in secret and "remaining under", which is the literal meaning of the word translated "patience".

Job xxxii. 4. "Now Elihu had waited till Job had spoken" (margin "Expected Job in words") (A.V.).
"But Elihu had forborne to give an answer to Job" (LXX).

Here the Hebrew word is chakah "to wait earnestly", and is used by Job in iii. 21, when he speaks of those who "long for" death, and by Habakkuk in ii. 3, in the injunction "though it tarry wait for it".

Job xxxiii. 5. "If thou canst answer me, set thy words in order before me, stand up" (A.V.).
"If thou canst: give an answer: wait therefore, stand against me and I will stand against thee" (LXX).

The LXX evidently felt a need to interpose the idea of waiting with patience here, because the Hebrew word arak "to order" or "to set in order" implies the absence of all heat in argument (see Job xiii. 18, xxiii. 4, xxxii. 14). This exhausts the references to hupomeno in the Septuagint translation of the book of Job, and requires but the record and examination of the one occurrence of hupomone to complete the analysis.

Job xiv. 19. "Thou destroyest the hope of man" (A.V.).
"Thou destroyest the hope of man" (margin, patience or endurance) (LXX).

This Hebrew word is tiqvah, and one that has a most interesting and suggestive connection with redemption.

The examination of the references, while it may have tested our "patience" has shown that the governing idea is "patient and expectant waiting for the fulfillment and completion of something hoped for". In Job, as in the New Testament it is "the patience of hope". Now, it is true, that however exasperated Job may have been by the counsels of his three friends, or however bitterly he may have complained against the apparently insensate afflictions that fell upon him, he held on with blessed determination to the hope of resurrection. This we have seen in earlier studies, and the truth is patent to all. Instead therefore of going over the ground already covered, we draw attention to the first occurrence of tiqvah in the Scriptures, a word that is translated "hope" eleven times in the book of Job.

> "Thou shalt bind this line of scarlet thread in the window" (Josh. ii. 18).

The word translated "line" is tiqvah, and is an instance of the figure Metonymy of the adjunct. In this figure "the cord" mentioned in Josh. ii. 15 became a symbol of hope, hope of deliverance based upon a promise that was honoured and fulfilled. It is evident that Job held on to a "scarlet thread" which constituted both his "hope" and the ground of his patience. He knew that his Redeemer lived, and because of the strength of the hope that this knowledge inspired, James could speak of "the patience of Job". For, as we have seen, it was the "patience of hope" that is implied and not an unruffled temper. We have however to consider the second feature of James v. 11, namely "the end of the Lord", which must form the theme of our next article.

#14. "The End of the Lord."
(Key to the enigma of the ages. No.4).
pp. 28 - 31

We have seen that James speaks not only of the patience of Job but also of "the end of the Lord". This allied subject now demands our closest attention.

"The end of the Lord." What does this mean? In what way is it seen in the book of job? In the English language a certain amount of ambiguity attaches to the word end. It can mean the end of a thing as contrasted with its beginning. "Better is the end of a thing than the beginning" (Eccles. vii. 8), or it may mean the intention, the purpose, the object of anything, "to the end that man should find nothing after him" (Eccles vii. 14), or it may mean cessation, as in death, "for that is the end of all men" (Eccles. vii. 2). We can say "that would be the end of all civil government" and mean anarchy, or we could say "this is the end of civil government" and mean peace and security. The word used by James is telos, which means "the end in view", "the goal", "the end at which a thing ceases to be" and "an end of duration or of time", but not an end in space which is expressed by the word peras.

In his "Greek Lexicon and Concordance" Dr. Bullinger says: "Telos, the fulfillment or completion of anything (Lat. effectus), that is, its end and issue (not its cessation). It denotes strictly not the ending of a departed state, but the arrival of a complete or perfect one."

Words that have as their stem the letters tel form a very interesting group in the New Testament. Here are five examples out of twelve.

Telos.	"The end" in the sense of accomplishment or goal" (Phil. iii. 19).
Teleo.	"To finish", "perform", "accomplish" (Matt. xxvi. 1; Luke ii. 39; xii. 50).
Teleios.	"Perfect", "full age" in contrast with the immature (Eph. iv. 13; Heb. v. 14; I Cor. xiv. 20).
Teleiotes.	"Perfection" (Col. iii. 14; Heb. vi. 1).
Teleioo.	"Fulfil", "finish" (Luke ii. 43; John iv. 34).

We must now come nearer to our subject and review every occurrence of every variation of this word in the epistle of James.

Telos occurs but once and as this is in the passage we are examining we proceed to other variants of the same root to learn all that they reveal. "Let patience have her perfect work, that ye may be perfect and entire wanting nothing" (James i. 4). This passage might almost be taken as a comment upon the book of Job, so closely does it fit the theme of the book. James expands the meaning of the word teleios by the word "entire" and "wanting nothing". The word "entire" is holokleros, and is composed of holos "whole" and kleros "a lot" or "an inheritance". The completeness that is everywhere implicit in the word "perfect" is here expressed. The meaning can be gathered from two examples. "Perfect soundness" holokleria, as of the man healed at the gate of the temple (Acts iii. 16), and so a reflection upon the condition of Job and his complete restoration, and "whole" as in I Thess. v. 23, when speaking of the believer in resurrection. "Your whole spirit, and soul and body be preserved blameless unto the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ". "Wanting nothing." The same word is found in James i. 5 "lack", and in ii. 15, "destitute".

It will be seen that the New Testament meaning of the word "perfect" includes the idea of "wholeness" that we found was implied by the Old Testament usage. We read in James i. 4 that patience has a "perfect work". Patience is a factor in the perfecting of the believer. "Patience" is most surely linked with "the end of the Lord" even as it is surely associated with hope. James has much to say about "work", indeed he uses the word ergon fourteen times. He associates faith with works, even as he does patience, and teaches not only that patience has a perfecting work to accomplish, but concerning Abraham says "seest thou how faith wrought with his works, and by works was faith made perfect?" (James ii. 22).

Teleios occurs again in James i. 17 where we read:

> "Every good and every perfect gift is from above, and cometh down from the Father of lights, with Whom is no variableness, neither shadow of turning."

In his next usage of anothen "from above" James speaks of "wisdom" (James iii. 15, 17); contrasting the wisdom that is from beneath with that which is from above. Now Job is most certainly one of the "wisdom" books of the Bible, and without the Divine comment found in Job xlii. 7 who of us would feel capable of pronouncing judgment upon the logic and philosophy of Eliphaz and his friends? The word teleios is used twice more "the perfect law of liberty" (James i. 25); and of the man who offends not in word and consequently is able also to bridle the whole body (James iii. 2). While there is no evident reference in this passage to the work of Job, it is interesting to see that "unbridled disrespect" was a figure well-known to Job by painful experience (Job xxx. 11).

Teleioo "to perfect", occurs but once in James in the passage already quoted: "seest thou how faith wrought with his works, and by works was faith made perfect?" (James ii. 22). James is not traversing the doctrines of Romans or Galatians, which insist upon the doctrine of justification by faith only, but speaks of the "perfecting" of that faith by works that follow.

Teleo occurs but once in James, "if ye fulfil the royal law", where the word means as elsewhere to "finish" as a course, as well as to fulfil, as a law.

In these eight references we can see that James means by "the end" of the Lord, the end the Lord had in view when He permitted Job to be subjected to such severe discipline. Job knew what it was to be visited "every morning" and tried "every moment" (Job vii. 18). He could also say "when He hath tried me, I shall come forth as gold" (Job xxiii. 10), then "patience" had its perfecting work and the end of the Lord was achieved.

The problem of pain and of apparent unequal distribution of suffering; the total disregard, in natural events, of relating the life and character of the sufferer with the heaviness of the stroke endured, these and similar subjects have tormented the minds of sensitive men and women since the dawn of time; yet here, at the threshold of Revelation, is a book that epitomizes the problem of the ages and deals with this very thing. In the opening chapters of Job is made known that which was hidden from Job and his friends—the enmity that must exist between the two seeds and which underlies the problem of the ages. The overruling grace of God, bending all these things to the accomplishing of His "end", shines as a light in a dark place. Argument can never resolve the problem of evil. Philosophic research is vain. Tradition can offer no solution, and religion no solace; all that Job could do, and all that we can do, is to "trust", to lean hard upon the fact that God is both righteous and good; both wise and kind; and at last He will be justified in all His ways, and the sufferer "come forth as gold".

Job uses the word massah "temptation" in chapter ix. 23 where he faces the problems of the apparent inequality in the distribution of affliction; of man's inability to justify himself; and here we find him feeling out for the only key to the enigma, "The Daysman", the One Mediator the Man Christ Jesus. In the margin of his own translation of Job the running comment of Carey is suggestive, and we hope every reader will "open the book" and read the following with the test beside him. Commencing at Job viii. 20, therefore, let us read Carey's paraphrase:

> "Let Job then observe, for his own satisfaction (if the case can apply), that God will not cast away, but will bless the upright; and, so far from helping, will destroy the ungodly. Then Job answered and said Bildad has said nothing new, and has shown how any man can dare insist with God upon his own righteousness—(with God!)—God is that all-wise and Almighty Being Who in His answer dislodges mountains, and continents, obscures the sun and stars, lowers the heavens, governs the sea, causes the constellations to appear, and does what is beyond all search and computation, a Being invisible and incomprehensible, Sovereign in His will, and irresistible and implacable till proud man submits. How then could he (Job), even if he were righteous, venture to justify himself with such a Being, or suppose that God would condescend to argue with him; and the more so, as God was treating him with great severity. Whether he had recourse to force or to law would be equally vain; for however guiltless, he would only condemn himself if he set up a plea of innocence, and which in point of fact, he could not do: and in any case (innocent or guilty) instances showed that the position is not tenable, that the good always escape trouble; man may be innocent, but injustice often reigns, and the innocent suffer. In his own case, his days had sped rapidly, without realizing true happiness; if he determined upon banishing his anxieties, then, the conviction that God would hold him guilty overwhelmed him with fear, and made him feel the folly of an attempt at self-justification with God, Who could, if He pleased, soon prove him, however generally innocent, to be guilty: indeed, God's divine nature rendered a controversy between Him and man ill-matched, and he (Job) regrets that there is no arbitrator to act between them, as in that case he would be able to speak without fear".
>
> - The comment of Cartaret Priaul Carey, M.A., > written to accompany his translation of Job viii. 20-ix. 35).

We observe that in spite of his further relapses and abortive attempts at self vindication as the book proceeds, Job recognizes, as here in chapter ix., that no man can claim complete exemption from trial and affliction, nor to be so innocent as to be free from the sorrows and afflictions of this mortal life. He sees, moreover, that affliction and trial do not necessarily follow wickedness, but that the wicked may actually prosper sometimes while the godly suffer.

At the close of this chapter we see Job groping for the one great solution, the Daysman, the One Whom all who believe God to-day acclaim as "the Power of God, and the Wisdom of God", the One Who in His own good time will make all crooked places straight and rough places plain, wipe away all tears, give a complete and harmonious explanation of the wilderness journey of every one of His redeemed children; the Son of God, the One Mediator between God and men the Man Christ Jesus.

#15. The Goal of the Ages foreshadowed.
pp. 46 - 48

The book of Job contains in dramatized form the problem of the ages, and in the opening and closing chapters, the key to the enigma is supplied. We who read the complete book, have the advantage of Job and of his friends, for we see that Job's trouble arose, not so much from his own doings or circumstances, but from the enmity that is inherent between the two seeds. Satan is seen attacking Job, whose name actually means "The Attacked". God's permission of the evil endured by Job was, as we learn, limited. His life could not be touched. We have also seen that there are two essential features in this great outworking of the Divine purpose. Patience, "Ye have heard of the patience of Job" and End, "and have seen the end of the Lord". The fact that Job received "double" for all his sufferings and loss is stressed at the close of the book. In the first chapter he is said to have had "seven sons and three daughters", he also possessed 7,000 sheep, 3,000 camels, 500 yoke of oxen and 500 she asses. In chapter xlii. we learn that the Lord turned the captivity of Job, and gave him twice as much as he had before. The Lord blessed the latter end of Job more than his beginning, and he had 14,000 sheep, 6,000 camels, 1,000 yoke of oxen, and 1,000 she asses (10, 12). The number of his children was not doubled, but he was given seven sons and three daughters as at the beginning. The names given to the three daughters suggest that Job had been entirely delivered from the loathsome disease that had been inflicted upon him for Jemima probably means "as the day" betokening Job's emergence from the shadow of death. Kezia means "cassia" (Psa. xlv. 8) and Keren-happuch "horn for paint" indicating rare beauty. The comment is added:

> And in all the land were no women found so fair as the daughters of Job" (Job xlii. 15).

The name of Job's third daughter is prophetic, for the Hebrew word puk meaning "paint" is found in Isa. liv. 11, where we read "I will lay thy stones with fair colours". The same word is used in I Chron. xxix. 2, for the "glistering" stones there described, anticipating as it does the splendour of the New Jerusalem, even as the "painted" face of Jezebel anticipates the evil system described in Rev. xvii. 1-6.

Moreover Job is said to have lived "after this" another hundred and forty years. If his age was doubled, as the number of his cattle had been, then Job's total age would have been 280 years. If on the other hand, his age was repeated as the number of his children had been, then he would have been 70 at the time of his affliction and 70 + 140, namely 210 at the time of his death.

At the time of Job's experiences, Israel had not come into being, but the God of Job was also the God of Israel and of the ages. It is therefore entirely in harmony with the teaching of Scripture that the experiences of Job should be echoed by those of Israel. Thus we notice in the first chapter of Isaiah that Israel, like Job, is seen covered with incurable sores, and that in Isa. lxi. in the acceptable year of the Lord, we find this promise:

"For your shame ye shall have double"
"In their land they shall possess the double" (Isa. lxi. 17).

In Job xlii. we read the words "the Lord turned the captivity of Job" and the reader will recognize in this phrase, a recurring promise made to Israel through Moses and the later prophets. Over and over again we read the words "bring again captivity", "turn again, turn away or turn back captivity", all of which go back to Job's experience as their original. If it is true, that Moses is the one into whose hands the story of Job came, it is impossible to believe that he could write of Israel's future "The Lord thy God will turn thy captivity" (Deut. xxx. 3) without associating Israel's age-time experiences with those of Job. This "turning again of the captivity" of Israel is the burden of the Psalmist (Psa. xiv. 7; liii. 6; lxxxv. 1 and cxxvi. 4). "Oh that the salvation of Israel were come out of Zion. When the Lord bringeth back the captivity of His people, Jacob shall rejoice and Israel shall be glad." Jeremiah uses the phrase twelve times over, a number suggestive of Israel. Hosea vi. 11, Joel iii. 1 and Zeph. iii. 20 also should be read. In the strictly literal sense of the term Job was never in "captivity", and in the prophetic references to the captivity of Israel, much more than physical bondage or exile is intended.

Did Balaam know the story of Job? We cannot tell, but he could easily have been acquainted with the life of this great man of the East, and might even have had him in mind when he said "Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his" (Numb. xxiii. 10), for it is the same word that is translated "latter end" in Job xlii. 12. Prophecy concerning Israel has much to say concerning "the last days", "the latter days" and "the latter end". Deut. viii. opens with a reference to trials and chastenings, but it has in view "good at the latter end" (Deut. viii. 16). "There is hope in thine end", said Jeremiah to the captivity (Jer. xxxi. 17). In every way the book of Job is seen to take its rightful place in the forefront of revealed truth.

By the time that Moses had been raised up to be the deliverer and law-giver of the chosen people, the testimony of tradition had become distorted and valueless as may be seen in the vain endeavour of Job's three friends to solve his problem by appeals to that source. The testimony associated with the stars had become corrupted, the day was drawing near when a great prophet should be raised up to give to Israel, and through them, to the world, a written revelation of Truth. Moses opens the book of Genesis with the sublime words "In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth". If his own mind and that of others in Israel to whom he had shown the book of Job upon his return from the land of Midian had been prepared by the lengthy appeal to the wonders of creation that occupy the closing chapters of the book of Job, the epitome of Gen. i. 1 would come with even greater force. To us, who read the book of Genesis and have not the knowledge supplied by the book of Job the entry of the serpent into Gen. iii. is an enigma. Moses and those who had read the book of Job would have been prepared for such initial intrusion and would have seen the attack upon Adam and Eve in the light of the subsequent attack upon one of the woman's seed.

The lesson for us who are teachers or students, seems to be that wherever possible, students and teachers should make themselves acquainted with the book of Job as a necessary preparation for the greater study of all scripture. Let us rejoice that we not only hear of the patience of Job, but also that we have "seen the end of the Lord" wherein we find the solution not only of Job's problems, but also the age-long problem concerning all who pass through the wilderness of this world, and the way which leads to the goal of the ages, when all tears shall be wiped away, Satan and his seed destroyed, and God All in all.

#13. The Witness for the Mystery in Holland.
pp. 5 - 8

In the last article of this series, the brother who had suffered so for the truth in South Africa referred to Mr. Van Mierlo. This reference introduces another overseas link that is very precious to us.

Two brethren G. T. Pauptit and S. Van Mierlo, one living in Holland and the other in Antwerp began to correspond in connection with the teaching of the Mystery. First we give a few extracts from letters of Mr. G. T. Pauptit, written between 1919 and 1924.

"Sir, a friend of mine called my attention to The Berean Expositor. I began to read it and thought your explanation very beautiful. I was eager to read all the volumes, but Volumes II, III, IV were out of print. By Mr. Brininger's brotherly kindness however we (my friend and I) have read his volumes and so we were able to follow all your expositions. Especially those on the One Body I think striking. I also read your book 'Dispensational Truth'. (It is a pity that is out of print). It has delivered me from all orthodoxism, thank God! I wrote you this to show you, that your work is not in vain, but that even in foreign countries it is blessed. Though I differ in some respects with you on account of the One Body I agree in all with you. You see the truth in this so sharp as I never saw developed in any writing or heard from one theologist. Happily God gives willingly of the spirit. He may enable you to open many eyes.

I have read The Berean Expositor as far as Volume X and now I have also ordered the other volumes. I have in following your papers, now better understood the relation of Philippians to Ephesians, and seen that the latter shows the believer's position (standing) in Christ, the former his walk.

God has given you much light in His Scriptures. In a wonderful way He led me to The Berean Expositor. I hope He may strengthen you further to accomplish your task that it be to honour and glory of our Father in the heavenlies and His Son the Beloved.

The truth on the One Body is gradually spread in the Netherlands. Mr. Van Mierlo of Anvers (Antwerp) well known to you, has written the book (The purpose of the ages and the church of the mystery). It is sold rather well and opens the insight in the 'new doctrine'. We hope truth will proceed on. As for myself—I have some works ready for the press.

We (Mr. Van Mierlo and I) now intend to edit a magazine, beginning 1920 to expose regularly the truth on the One Body, &c. It asks much preparation but it seems as if God leads the way in this direction.

As for your work, we see that at several places in England there are meetings where you speak. So truth seems to keep its course. How much tradition has spoiled. On every side lies. Lie that Israel has no future, lie that there is one church, lie—that man has an immortal soul, lie that we are living in the 1000 years, &c. What patience has God also in this respect."

The next letter, of which extracts are given, was received from Mr. S. Van Mierlo, then residing in Antwerp, and written in 1926,

"I have received 'Dispensational Truth' and the first volume of the Berean with much profit. Some things I had already learned to some degree, but much has appeared in a better light and I found also many things which I had not yet noticed. A careful study makes the Word always more valuable to the student. On the other hand one is sometimes afraid to open his mouth or to write a line because this pure truth is so easily distorted. No human being can touch it without defiling it to some degree. But it also appears necessary to correct so much obviously false teaching distributed since 2000 years. I appreciate very much your continuous effort, made in God's strength, to come nearer and nearer the truth and to break through tradition and human theories. I join my prayer to that of Paul: 'That the God of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of glory, may give unto you the spirit of wisdom and revelation in the knowledge of Him.'

I will send you back to-morrow your copy of 'Dispensational Truth' and thank you very much for your kindness. I noticed a printer's fault p.120 (11:6 instead of 12:6).

When you find a moment could you give me the address of the Dutch reader you mentioned during my visit? I could correspond with him and see what can be done to print something about the Church in Dutch.

The booklet I had prepared is not yet printed, the publisher did not find it of commercial interest (of course!). May be that I will have it printed in Antwerp and take care myself of the distribution. If the number of readers is sufficient we could then try to issue a small monthly paper and make use of your articles in the Berean."

The two brethren whose letters have been quoted, commenced in 1920 a magazine devoted to the exposition of Scripture with particular reference to the Dispensation of the Mystery and allied subjects. It was entitled "Uit de Schriften" meaning "Out of the Scriptures", and it has been revived after a period of interruption caused by the war, and is now in its twenty-second volume. Readers who are conversant with the Dutch language and who would like to get into touch can do so by writing to the Administrator, Schipbeckstraat 17², Amsterdam, Z.

In 1930 the Editor paid a visit to Antwerp and Holland and we believe the following extracts from the report of that visit, will be of interest.

"THE EDITOR'S WIDER MINISTRY.

We feel sure that our readers will be glad to have a few particulars of the Lord's work in Holland, and we trust that prayer and praise will follow the perusal of the following note. Some twenty years ago Dr. Bullinger visited Germany and Holland, and found a handful of believers who were rejoicing with him in the unfolding of the Mystery. The Berean Expositor found a few readers also at that time among them being Heer O. a de Grube, whose fellowship we have enjoyed at last, after all these years. The work however was small and years went by without much growth. Then some few years ago letters began to come from Belgium and Holland. We learned that our book 'Dispensational Truth' had been translated into Dutch and awaits the necessary funds for publication* (* - We are sorry to say that funds for this work were not forthcoming.). We rejoiced to find that our smaller pamphlets were in circulation. The next step was the personal visit of our brother Mr. S. Van Mierlo, of Antwerp, who, together with brother S. J. Pauptit of Scheveningen, Holland, have decided as before the Lord to publish the blessed truth of the Mystery and accompanying doctrines, so that many more in Holland may have the privilege of the witness. Carte blanche has been given to these brethren to use any articles found in The Berean Expositor and thus share in any good thing given by the Lord. We all felt the time had come for a personal visit, so on Wednesday, July 24th we visited brother S. Van Mierlo in Antwerp, where quite a range of points and problems were discussed. We found our brother confined to his bedroom through illness, but we rejoice with him in the realization that the Lord's will cannot be frustrated. On July 26th we reached the Hague, and the whole time, until we left Rotterdam on Monday evening of the 29th, was filled with conversation, small Bible studies, or conferences around the Word. On Sunday 28th two conferences were held in The Hague, and as we look at the faces of these brothers and sisters and heard their words of appreciation of the witness of The Berean Expositor, we entered into the meaning of Paul's parenthesis 'Unto me, less than the least of all saints is this grace given'.

Some of our readers have seen the chart prepared to illustrate Ephesians, in the shape of a pair of balances. This we were enabled to turn into Dutch, and both morning and afternoon sessions were occupied in the survey of this great epistle. Three brethren undertook the work of interpreting, and we were glad to discover that English is taught in the Dutch schools much as French is taught here.

The conference occupied the hours of 10.0-12.0 and 2.0-5.0. We had the pleasure at the end of the same day of attending a Bible Study conducted by Mr. Pauptit and of rejoicing to behold the keenness of both teacher and student. It gave us intense pleasure also to meet several Jewish brethren who, like Paul in the third of Philippians had counted all things loss, for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus the Lord.

The witness in Holland is but the beginning. There are beloved fellow members in adjacent countries on the Continent that we long to meet that our mutual faith may be strengthened. The Lord is able. We rejoice to think that the witness of The Berean Expositor is not cumbered with unscriptural organizations, and that our friends in Holland have no intention of forming any society or sect, but of just patiently endeavouring 'to keep', not to invent or to make, 'the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace'.

At the conferences, we were charge to convey to all in England and overseas who are of like precious faith, the love and heartfelt greetings of these brethren and sisters in Holland, and we are sure that in the name of all our readers this love is most heartily reciprocated.

‘Hem nu die magtig is meer dan overvloedig te doen boven alwat wij bidden of denken, naar de kracht die in ons werkt, hem zeg ik zij de heerlijkheid in de gemeente door Christus Jesus, in alle geslachen, tot alle eeuwigheid. Amen’ (Efez. 3:20, 21).

‘Now unto Him that is able to do exceeding abundantly above all that we ask or think, according to the power that worketh in us, unto Him be glory in the church by Christ Jesus unto all the generations of the age of the ages. Amen’ (Eph. 3:20, 21).”

Both Mr. Pauptit and Mr. Van Mierlo have published books in Dutch dealing with various aspects of “Dispensational Truth”. In our next article we shall be speaking of the witness to the Truth that was associated with The Berean Expositor in French, and it will then be seen that our brother Van Mierlo is at home in more languages than one. We rejoice in these evidences that show that the long years of isolation that followed our stand in 1909 have not been without some fruit and confirmation, not only at home but abroad.

#14. The Testimony in French and Spanish. With a further note concerning the Dispensational place of The Lord’s Supper.

pp. 24 - 28

Before me as I write are two leaflets, both bearing upon the front page a coloured diagram. The one is entitled “Drie Sferen van Zegening”, the other “Trois Spheres de Benediction”, the one being the Dutch and the other the French translation of a pamphlet by our brother J. Eustace Mills, entitled “Three Spheres of Blessing”. This introduces us to the witness for Dispensational Truth in France.

In the year 1932—through the kind collaboration of a believer in the south of France, who prefers to remain anonymous—a twelve paged periodical was produced entitled:

GRACE ET GLOIRE

Organe francais du “Berean Expositor” Journal consacre à la proclamation de la doctrine de la dispensation du Mystère (Eph. 3:3) et de la division de la Parole de la Verite (II Tim. 2:15).

This periodical contained dispensational articles, and articles on Sanctification and the Sacrificial work of Christ, that are to be found in the early volumes of The Berean Expositor.

At the same time several small leaflets were published such as "Il n'y a pas de difference" (There is no difference), "Les Cles de Pierre et les Portes de Paul" (The keys of Peter and the doors of Paul).

In 1934 it was felt that a fuller presentation of the question of Dispensational Truth, so far as it had a bearing upon the Church of the One Body, was called for and a booklet of twenty-three pages was issued entitled "La Voie par Excellence, Une Etude biblique concernant la distinction entre Israel et l'Eglise" (The more excellent way. A Bible Study concerning the distinction between Israel and the Church).

In spite of great difficulty and much opposition and disappointment the witness thus started has been continued by this believer in the South of France, although the publication of "Grace et Gloire" was discontinued after a period. However, there are evidences that the truth has been received by believers in France and during the last few years a very fine witness to the claims of Dispensational Truth has been given by a Professor in Paris, whose lectures on the Scriptures have been well attended.

Mr. S. Van Mierlo in 1934 produced his first volume in French entitled "Le Plan Divin et sa realization". This is a book of 135 pages, which was followed by others, and was written in Versailles. Other volumes were entitled "Les Messages de l'Apôtre Paul" and "La Voie du Salut". In the introduction mention is made of The Berean Expositor, also the writings of Dr. Bullinger, "The Companion Bible", and the works of Sir Robert Anderson. The above is a very poor presentation of the labours of these good friends but it may be sufficient to show that small and despised as The Berean Expositor may have been, the Lord was pleased to use it to the illumination or encouragement of men and women also in Holland, Belgium and France. On one or two occasions it was a joy and privilege to speak to gatherings of believers and enquirers both in Paris, Lyons and in Neuchatel as an outcome of this pioneer work of the printed page.

The influence of The Berean Expositor was not confined to European countries, but readers began to multiply in the United States, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, China and India. For the moment we keep to languages other than English, and so in addition to the Dutch and French testimony already indicated, we can thankfully add the language of Spain. The actual number of readers in Spain itself is very small and no translations have been made for that country, but the great Spanish speaking world of Central and South America has had a witness, which we must now record. The earliest contact was with a Missionary in Costa Rica in 1915, who had prepared a correspondence course of studies on the dispensational teaching of the Acts. A few extracts from letters will enable the reader to realize something of the influence that the teaching of The Berean Expositor must have had in the mission field served by this writer from Costa Rica.

"Santosa Costa Rica.
Sept. 2m 1915.

Brethren of The Berean Expositor—By some unaccountable way the July 1915 issue never reached me, and I am particularly interested in the study of the word 'Reconciliation', began in the June number. I have that and the August number. I would appreciate very much if I were made the recipient of a duplicate of the July issue. May I impose on your kindness to ask the reading of the difficulty which confronts me in ref. this word Reconciliation—Broadly speaking, it appears to me it is the attitude of our God towards the whole race produced by the value in His eyes of the Death of our Lord Christ. But its doors of grace were not thrown open until the limitations placed thereon by reason of the favoritism to Israel secured in the Covenants was suspended in Acts xxviii.

When I had thought this out as being the force of the word reconciliation, I was stopped by reason of the fact that the great statement re reconciliation is found in the Book of II Cor. 5:19 written before Acts xxviii. occurred.

Therefore I am confused, and dependent for light, probably in your July article. Anticipating your kindness in sending me this number again.

I subscribe myself,

Yours in Christ,

F. W. B."

This letter will reveal that the writer was no slavish follower of another man's writings but exercised the true Berean Spirit, as well as reading The Berean Expositor. The following extracts of a letter written two years later showed not only progress but a joy in the liberty that the truth brings with it.

"How much I am indebted to your writings words cannot reveal . . . . . This early hour that I am writing has been made luminous with the 20th re-reading of your 'Dispensational Place of the Lord's Supper' and exegesis of Col. 2:8-23. 'All hail. O man of God. All hail.' I pray for power to pass such richness to those who sit in the shackles of ordinances here in dark Costa Rica. God bless thee.

Yours in the Hope,

F. W. B."

Another witness to Spanish speaking America was produced later when Pastor F. G. Cave then of Rancagua, Chile, translated the booklet "United yet Divided" into Spanish, under the title "La Correcta Division".

Pastor Cave has recently returned to Chile, but has done so without the backing of the Society that originally sent him out there, and while it is not within our power to undertake the responsibility of his support, we have a missionary fund to which all who are concerned with the spread of the truth "in regions beyond" are invited to contribute as the Lord shall lead and enable. Recently, an enquiry for all our printed works has come from a reader in Buenos Aires, another indication of the spread of the truth and the breaking down of tradition which we value. One rather strange request was made, to which we most readily acceded. It was this. Would we permit the Chile Pentecostal, the official organ of the Inglesia Metodista Pentecostal de Chile, to reprint in the form of a serial in their paper, the booklet "La Correcta Division". We most readily granted permission, and numbers of Pentecostalists were thereby introduced to a line of teaching which if followed would lead them on from Pentecost to the heavenly places in Christ Jesus.

Here then are a few evidences that the magazine which you have valued and helped these years, has in its turn been blessed to the illumination and emancipation of many whose language and manner of life differ so considerably from our own.

It will be noticed that "The Dispensational Place of the Lord's Supper" was referred to with evident approval by the Missionary in Costa Rica. Strangely enough, when I was in Amsterdam and met a few believers there, I asked how they first came to consider the claims of Dispensational Truth. To my surprise I learned that one of them had brought back with him from England a copy of the booklet on the Lord's Supper, and that above all things had opened their eyes to the whole truth. Usually this subject is so controversial that it is not brought forward until the question arises, as it must, eventually. We will therefore include in this series, extracts from a reply made by us that was circulated in New Zealand to a criticism of our pamphlet.

> "The Dispensational Place of the Lord's Supper", by Charles H. Welch having been reviewed in a pamphlet entitled "Should Christians observe the Lord's Supper?" by Hubert Taylor of Dannevirke, New Zealand, and published by James G. Harney, 114, Main Street, Palmerston North, the following leaflet has been prepared so that the reader shall have the essential features of the question placed before him.
>
> "As the dispensational place of Pentecost and of Acts xxviii. form an important part of the argument, and as these features are given but scant consideration in the review under notice, the reader may value the opinion of the late Dr. W. H. Griffith Thomas which has been printed upon the last page."

The pamphlet published in New Zealand was headed:

"SHOULD CHRISTIANS OBSERVE THE LORD'S SUPPER?"

The reader will probably observe that there is a great difference between the two titles quoted above, and our first remark must be that Mr. Taylor's title is misleading. We sought to discover the dispensational place of the Lord's Supper, and in the Preface to the Third Edition, we said: "The question of the observance or non-observance of the Lord's Supper is a part only of a wider subject. This being so, it is utterly beyond our powers to say to anyone, You ought not to observe this ordinance. Each believer must see clearly whether his hope is connected with the new covenant or not, and must act accordingly."

After the briefest possible introduction to the subject we took up in pages 2-4 this vital question of the new covenant. It lies at the opening of our enquiry, all else being subsidiary. How does Mr. Taylor review this vital feature? By printing a pamphlet of fifteen pages which never once mentions the new covenant!

Miraculous gifts.

What scriptural answer has Mr. Taylor for the failure of the Church to produce the "signs" that the Lord said should "follow them that believe"? (Mark xvi. 17-20). Paul had them even at the end of Acts (xxviii. 1-9), and the epistle that speaks of the Lord's Supper, I Corinthians, is most emphatic regarding miraculous gifts. Those who "rightly divide" the Word have a complete and scriptural answer.

It is not our intention to give an explanation of the whole case: this we have attempted during the last twenty years in a number of books and pamphlets. The present paper is written simply to draw attention to facts that are vital, but which get no hearing in Mr. Taylor's review.

We have omitted the bulk of this reply, but as the reader already knows, we rest the whole issue upon the question of the New Covenant, the entire omission of this subject from the criticism reveals more eloquently than words, the utter bankruptcy of the reviewer's position. He did not meet the argument because he could not.

#15. "Come over and help us." The Visit to Canada. pp. 48 - 53

Very little has been said (in this survey) of our world circumstances, struggles and disappointments on the one hand, and the most wonderful sustaining grace of the Lord and the fellowship of a few of His people on the other.

Owing to a threatened physical collapse, it became necessary to move into the country in order that an open air life might lead to some measure of recovery. Among the means adopted to this end was the construction and working of a range of greenhouses, the capacity of which may be gauged when it is learned that the first crop was four and half tons of tomatoes. Health certainly improved, but the fact that after twelve to fourteen hours physical toil (in which Mrs. Welch took part) the work of The Berean Expositor had still to be done, made life very hard going. On top of that, I often had to sacrifice a crop in order to fulfil speaking engagements, so that at length in 1926 after much prayer, it was decided that the time had come to devote what measure of strength, health and life were left to me entirely to the ministry of the Word. The house and nursery were scarcely disposed of when an invitation came from readers in Canada, to conduct a series of Bible Expositions in Toronto. The coming of this invitation was so timed that I could not but see in it the confirmation by the Lord upon the decision already arrived at; so in May 1927 I sailed in the Empress of Scotland for Quebec. Except for a visit occupying Monday, July 18th to Friday, July 22nd at Creemore, the meetings were all conducted in Toronto. The letters sent home by Mr. George H. Farnworth and Mr. Joseph Caldwell, must now be allowed to speak for themselves. Extracts are only possible, but we believe sufficient has been quoted to provide a fair and comprehensive story of this missionary effort. My memories of happy fellowship around the Word are as vivid to-day as though the visit to Canada had but just concluded.

"Dear Brother Brininger.—My heart rejoices as I pen these few lines—may yours also on reading them—for much has happened to bless the name of our God and Father and our Glorious Head, the exalted Lord Jesus Christ. Already three meetings of humbling, restoring, raising, edification, grounding and reconciliation. First things first and an attempt to record chronologically events in an endeavour to give you a picture. I immediately wrote our Bro. Welch, care of the Pilot, to the Empress of Scotland, and to make sure sent him a marconigram on Friday the 20th. These he received O.K. On Saturday noon, Mr. Caldwell and myself finished work and set out at 2.10p.m. to drive to Montreal. Two schoolboys never scanned their favourite book as we did the hotel register, and what a disappointment—no sign or name of Mr. Welch. The boat had not even docked at Quebec. It was held up for two days outside of port owing to fog and rain . . . . . ."

Monday noon, and then a telegram 'arriving on a special midnight, etc.' 11.30p.m., raining, when Mr. Caldwell and I drove down to the Union Station; at 12.30 the train rolled in. Mr. Caldwell stayed in the car; I was pacing the platform. Saw him? Did I? First look on the run; peering through the window was our beloved brother; one frantic wave of the hand, and then the meeting. You'll have the same experience when he (D.V.) arrives safely home again to his beloved and his lambs.

He rested up a couple of days and on Friday we had our first taste of the goodness and grace of God as ministered by His servant, our Bro. Welch. The reading began at 8.15p.m. 9.15 came, then 10.15. Those eyes lighted; that face shone; and most rejoiced in the Unity of the Spirit. There were Mr. And Mrs. Fenton, Miss Fenton, Mr. Caldwell, Mrs. Farnworth, Mr. A. V. White, Mr. And Mrs. Mabie, Mrs. Pogue, Mrs. Fenton's sister, Mrs. Brandon and myself; last but not least, Mr. Welch. His message was true to the Word and faithfully delivered in the fear of his Lord and without regard of favour to man: showing our relative and true position to the God Who raises the dead.

On Sunday morning, we went over early to the hall and fixed the seats, arranged the literature (not for sale; for inspection after the meeting) and with anxious but happy hearts awaited the gathering of saints, friends and others. His subject was 'Let us go on'. We had learned to love our brother through his written ministry, and more so now he is with us. The evidence of his message of the morning was noticeably apparent in the evening. Many of the saints kept their telephone red hot, and though many failed to come who promised, we practically doubled in the evening. 'Rightly Dividing the Word' was the message at 7.0p.m. We forgot ourselves as we gave ready ear to the written Word expounded by the Spirit of God through an earthen vessel, a vessel whom we honour as chosen of God to testify of the riches of the Glory of His Grace. Three brethren who were stumbled at and stumbling each other, were reconciled, and rejoiced with each other over the blessed portion we had received from the Lord.

Each meeting was opened by singing one hymn and being taken before the throne of Grace by one short prayer and then our brother giving the Lord's message and himself closing the meeting. May I express the tone of the meeting thus: 'Unity of the Spirit in the Bond of Peace'. Could you have but seen the faces and heard the buzz of conversation, your heart would have leaped with joy in Snell's Hall that morning and evening. The love of Christ was manifested and made known through our brother, and we caught glimpses of that paternal love of his for wife, bairns and home that he had left to minister to us, as he remembered them by illustration and in prayer. May we all, through you, send Mrs. Welch and children words of cheer and comfort and an acknowledgment of their contribution and sacrifice they are making in this great work in the Lord's service. May God in His Grace and Mercy enlighten our eyes, illuminate our minds and enrich our souls, giving us understanding to give heed and apprehend the calling wherewith He hath called us, in this blessed ministry of His, through His servant and our beloved brother."

"8.30a.m. June 5, 1927.

At the Tuesday night (May 31st) reading, Mr. Welch gave us an outline of the dispensation, spoke particularly on Gen. 1:1, 2, and thoroughly explained the meaning of Scripture with reference to the words dispensation and stewardship. At the Thursday (June 2nd) meeting there were mostly new faces and somewhat strangers. And what a message we had given us! Galatians, Chapter one, was opened up as few of us have ever seen or heard. Mr. Welch himself was a study as he forgot himself and centred his heart and knowledge on the Risen Lord, His chosen apostle and we Gentiles by nature. The eyes of those old in the knowledge of God shone, which evidenced the communion and fellowship as the wonder of the Word gripped them, and Col. 3:16 was manifested. A number of young people from St. John's Presbyterian Church were among the company, and our brother had hardly got into the stride of the message when note books were pulled out and pencils flashed. As one not only hungry for the Truth, but with a heart interest in each meeting, it seemed to me as I looked, that not opposition but blessing had come our way. Every meeting has been characterized by a quiet patient listening, no marring of the tenor by innuendo or direct rebuttal, while the one or two who are more or less instructed in these things, have restrained themselves and willingly become weak to those who are weak in the knowledge of the mystery and of the Word in general. Not only has our brother been used of God to instruct us but he has warmed and cheered our hearts concerning those in England and elsewhere, for we have heard of the love and faith and the work of patience of Mr. Petty, Mr. Whittaker, Mr. Mills and son, Mr. Gallimore, Mr. Hannam, Mr. Fisher, Mr. Livingstone, Dr. Moss, friends at Huddersfield, Salisbury and others, and rejoice in their part and work in this ministry to a 'Canadian' Macedonia.

Last night by the Grace and Power of God another meeting was held and the Truth of the Gospel as entrusted, held and delivered by the Apostle Paul was faithfully and vividly brought before our hearts and minds. Scripture study to us has taken on new meanings. Our brother showed us the balance of Truth with respect to doctrine and walk as exemplified by the Apostle Paul. Gal. 2:1-16 was structurally outlined for us. More than ever have we been brought to realize and recognize the Grace of God Who chose such a vessel as the Apostle Paul and fitted him to bear such a witness for us Gentiles. The Epistle to the Galatians seems to grip our Bro. Welch in a peculiar way, and as he speaks his whole being and energy seem to be concentrated on endeavouring to so present the Truth as to not only realize our liberty in Christ, but to so walk: compromising 'no, not for an hour'.

The way of the cross leads home, and what a home, it was for such as we who were chosen in Him from before the foundation of the world, that was brought before us, in the lecture on Eph. 1:1-14 on Sunday evening the 19th June. Facile as may seem my pen, I have to confess to you, my dear brother, that the communion of my soul with the Father and Son is impossible for me to translate into words and terms. At the majesty and fullness of those words of the inspired Apostle 'Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ Who hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings in heavenly places in Christ', the hall faded, I saw not the speaker, as I was taken before the very Throne of Grace. Whatever our Brother Welch's thoughts were as indicated by his face could not be guessed by me, his voice, 'The Word', its theme 'The Father'—'Christ'—and I was as one under an anaesthetic as regards immediate surroundings. I was far above all in the third sphere. After the meeting closed I knew I was not the only one, at least two shining faces bore testimony as well as with voice, as we clasped hands in farewell.

Thursday evening to Sunday evening—'from the Cross to the uppermost'—literally I saw the facts as concerning myself—'from the guttermost to the uttermost'. What a paean of praise ascended as we sang No.38 'Sing of the wonderful story, sing of the Word of His grace . . . . .' I cannot say more of this meeting, save only one thing—never a thing gave me more pleasure, than to give out to all present the coloured leaflet of Mr. Mills, 'Three spheres of blessing', which was sent and arrived at an opportune moment. Truly we had fellowship with the saints in the old land as well as with those in this far off place, as many an outstretched hand eagerly grasped the literature.

Dear Mr. Brininger—I shall have to work hard to condense the account of nine meetings into one short epistle, nevertheless I will do my best to acquaint you with the outstanding facts and features. On Tuesday evening the 21st of June at 8.0p.m. a company gathered themselves together for the reading, the subject of which was 'The Two Seeds'. Heb. 11 and Gen. 4 were paralleled, and the two offerings of Cain and Abel, the meaning of the word 'sin offering' in scripture was dealt with. The parting of the ways is clearly seen with reference to the two seeds or lines in connection with the sacrifices offered by Cain and Abel. We stepped through Gen. 6 and 9 and looked closely at Mal. 2 and saw the evil of divorce and its relation to 'The Seed of God'.

Thursday, June the 23rd Mr. Welch dealt with Gal. 2:15 to 4:12. After giving an outline of the whole section, concentration was on the passage 'The Just shall live by faith'.

Sunday a.m. the 26th June many learned for the first time, and many were more thoroughly instructed, in the patent fact (after you had been shown by sheer comparison of the Word) that there were eight parables in Matt. 13 and not seven as commonly apprehended and taught. It was surely 'search and see' and what we saw was plenty. How that mystery followed after failure, as in Daniel and Acts 28 and this was the heart and crux of the lecture on Matt. 13 in which is shown the rejection of Christ as prophet—priest—and king.

The subject for the evening meeting same day, was 'Before the foundation of the world'. If ever your remark, made some time back in one of your letters, that Mr. Welch was a patient consistent student of the original was justified, it was surely confirmed at this meeting, the potentialities involved in that one word 'overthrow' is nothing short of marvelous, passage after passage had light shed upon it, and more than ever our minds were illuminated.

Dear Brininger—I cannot help boasting how clear the word of God is and what an utter fool at least I am in expressing my little comprehension of it. Sometimes I feel like kicking myself for being so dumb, at others I am overwhelmed by the very clarity and simplicity of a portion of the Word brought before me. At the Tuesday meeting, June 28th most of us fondly hugged to ourselves the thought, if there is one subject we are well instructed in, and thoroughly versed, it is the 'Second Coming, premillennial and imminent'. We looked, we listened, and we gaped, as the Epistle of Jude with special reference to Enoch the seventh from Adam, was unfolded before our eyes, literally and spiritually. We learned more about angels and satan from that portion of the Word, supported by other portions than we little recked of. Mr. Welch is laying more than foundations, he is being used of the Lord whereby the saints are being fed strong meat, and digestive organs being worked as never before.

The Evening Meeting had a most fitting subject to close the first half of the Sunday messages, Eph. 1:17. 'Redemption—The Kinsman-Redeemer and the nature of forgiveness.' The person and work of Christ was wonderfully exhibited from the scriptures. The Deity of Christ needs not to be questioned or taken up from any other angle if this marvelous kinship is seen, as the Scriptures state it.

As several had requested a lecture on some of the more common figures of speech used in the scriptures, Mr. Welch took the opportunity to do so on Tuesday the 12th. He very lucidly explained to us about ten of these figures.

Mr. Totton in closing said:

Mr. Welch, it has been to me a continual feast of fat things. For now about four months we have been having this feast, and it is possible and even probable that some of us now looking at our brother in the flesh may not meet again, and Mr. Welch, it has been one of the treats of my life, and I can assure you I am saying this not only for myself but for all present.

We not only appreciate your willingness to come this distance to minister the Word, but also would express our appreciation of the part that Mrs. Welch has taken in this severing of domestic relations for such a length of time in order that you might come to minister to us, and we express to her and the children our feeling of indebtedness for her share in this ministry.

God bless you, and remember please, that:

'There is a place where spirits blend,
And friend holds fellowship with friend;
Though sundered far by faith we meet
Around one common mercy seat.'

Mr. Fenton concluded the meeting by saying: 'I just want to say a very brief word. I have immensely enjoyed all the meetings we have had. To-night we have had a sample of what we have had practically all through.

For a man who treats the scriptures as wonderful and believes every word of it, and who is tolerant with those who may not agree with him on some things, and who is apt to teach, believing in it all, I have never met Mr. Welch's equal. There are those that are just as fundamental and just as true to the Word so far as they see it, but Mr. Welch has opened up the book to me, and to all of us who have attended the meetings, in a way that has given us a broader and deeper insight into its teaching, so that we cannot dispense with any verse or any word.'

#16. "All the ends of the earth have seen the salvation of God." pp. 65 - 70

We can all sympathize with the apostle's reticence to speak of himself or of the hardships he endured, yet what a wealth of practical teaching we should have missed had he not for Christ's sake "become a fool" in his boasting. The priceless chapters four and eleven in his second epistle to the Corinthians supply the necessary background against which the frailty of the earthen vessel and the sovereignty of the Divine Power that sustained him could be fittingly exhibited. In this same spirit we apologize, if an apology should be needed, for any element of "foolish boasting" that may have appeared in this series, but we are sure that the little that has been told, but emphasizes both the emptiness of the earthen vessel and the fullness of Divine grace that alone made the witness of The Berean Expositor possible.

Correspondence over the forty years of our testimony must necessarily be great and varied. Much is precious but too personal for reproduction, yet a few further extracts from fellow believers at home and abroad will, I think, bring this part of our testimony to a fitting conclusion. Here is part of a letter received from a reader in Newburyport, Mass., U.S.A., during the early days: "Words fail to express my heartfelt thanks for the light that under God you have let into my life through your articles in Things to Come. January number was almost a blank without you—I never heard of you until you appeared in Things to Come. Have you no book or tracts of your own? If so please send me them with your last book as noticed in T. to C. I have had T. to C. from its first number. I like Dr. Bullinger, he seems to be so sincere and learned in Scripture—he must continue with you, and you with him."

> A student at Wheaton College, Ill., U.S.A. wrote in 1932: "I have started on the course (a correspondence course) but before I went very far I noticed the lack of mastery of my Bible. I did not know the facts of the Bible, to say nothing of the interpretation . . . . . I am enjoying the monthly visit of The Berean Expositor. I especially get much help from the expositions of different epistles (Colossians and Romans, e.g.) and the Fundamentals of Dispensational Truth . . . . . My heart yearns to go and teach the rightly divided word but it seems for the present for me to remain in College and learn something of the worldly knowledge . . . . . May the Lord richly bless you and Mr. Brininger and those called to the ministry of the rightly divided Word."

> Another reader of Philadelphia, Pa., U.S.A. wrote: "Dear Mr. Brininger—I just want to say how I thank God through our Lord Jesus Christ for The Berean Expositor and for all those who made it possible for such a magazine to be published and sent out as it is to many parts of the world. Though our number is very small yet we go on endeavouring to be true Bereans, searching the Scriptures daily to see if these things are so. Personally there have been things I could not see and in some cases hard to understand, but in every case after time taken to 'search and see' they were proven to be right according to scripture."

We pause here not only to note the working of the true Berean spirit, but to recognize the fellowship indicated by the reference "All those who make it possible for such a magazine to be published and sent out, as it is, to many parts of the world". In the very early days, the MSS was re-written in a bold round hand by a lady who was eighty years of age! After she fell asleep friends living in Scotland prepared the MSS in a similar way. For many years a sister in Christ living on the South Coast has put every line of my handwriting (which alas does not improve with the passing of time) into typescript. This, however, is but the second step towards publication. At the very beginning Mr. H. C. Bowker—whose name is associated with Things to Come and "The Companion Bible", and revered for his stand for Conditional Immortality and Life only in Christ—reviewed the MSS in order that its English may be void of offence. This task has been undertaken by different brethren since then up to the present time, and their attention to punctuation, spelling and easy and intelligent reading has contributed much to the high standard of The Berean Expositor. Mr. Brininger used to gather the corrected MSS and make up the copy for the printer. The number of lines had to be counted, and any excess adjusted, paragraphing, Scripture References and Quotations, Structures, Greek and Hebrew words all verified. Subsequently proofs were marked by several brethren, and Mr. & Mrs. Brininger patiently "read back" the proof from the MSS. A good deal of this work is now being shared by friends of the Truth in Worcester.

Every month for all these years, hundreds of envelopes have been addressed by loving hands, and finally, friends have met together at an agreed time and passed the month's issue through the post. Correspondence, keeping of the accounts, filing names and addresses incidental to publishing, all take a toll of time and labour lovingly and loyally given. This is but a hasty survey of the monthly or bi-monthly routine, to say nothing of the work on other publications, the preparing of minutes and all the many background duties that are so often not mentioned. I am glad to take this opportunity of making this acknowledgment, even though it is not possible for several reasons, to mention many of these willing helpers by name.

> Another reader from Philadelphia wrote: "I have been preaching for the past twenty years and not until the message of the grace of God was preached apart from any works, did I meet with such opposition as is now manifested among the Lord's people. Yours to make all see . . . . ."

> Many readers of The Berean Expositor will need no signature in order to identify the writer of the following extract received from Ill., U.S.A. in 1935: "I have had some correspondence with your fellow labourer, Mr. Brininger, but desire to write to you personally and express my thanks for your kind tribute to my booklet on 'The Glory of the One Baptism'. Your graciousness and kindness in this matter to me, a stranger, shows that you not only teach the Pauline truth but follow the Pauline example and admonition of doing 'good unto all, especially unto them who are of the household of faith'."

To us who live in these Northern Latitudes, Australia and New Zealand seem to be verily "the ends of the earth", but we rejoice to know that there in the Antipodes the glorious truth of the Mystery is believed and loved. It is common knowledge that Mr. William Barron was the prime mover in getting Dr. Bullinger to undertake "The Companion Bible", and his interest in The Berean Expositor was both practical and lasting; his enthusiasm for the Rightly Divided word and his singleness of purpose were an inspiration to us in the struggles of the early days. I remember the thrill I felt when, having become involved in a liability that to me, at that time, was formidable, to discover that in the same week and without any information on the subject William Barron had felt moved to send the first of many contributions to meet our needs.

"Gisborne, New Zealand,.
10th June, 1912.

Dear Brother in the Lord—For some time back I have been intending writing to you as your articles in Things to Come have been a very great help in placing the Mystery on its true foundation, the Prison Epistles. Lately I received 'Dispensational Truth' through Dr. Bullinger, and after quietly looking over it, I find much to edify and enlighten . . . . . The structure of the Purpose of the ages (page 291) is no doubt the most complete and far reaching of anything that has been issued and will be a great help to Dr. Bullinger in 'The Companion Bible' . . . . . Through 'Figures of Speech' (by Dr. Bullinger) I learned that water baptism belonged to the kingdom and had no place in the present dispensation. Through you I have learned that the Lord's supper belongs to the kingdom and has no place in the present dispensation. The rightly dividing of Paul's former and later epistles has been the most difficult to learn, and although thirty-three years saved, I can say that I am learning little by little. For a good many years I have known that only those who are in Christ shall put on immortality. I was not aware till I saw your list on page 238 on eternal judgment that man had so much to do in setting and settling theology. Having Rotherham's New Testament I understood that the word ever should be age, but until now I did not understand how our translators had handled the word.

I see that you heartily commend 'The Companion Bible' and use some of its structures, &c. I also see that you and Dr. Bullinger are giving addresses together at Nottingham (May T. to C.).

Five years ago I went home to see my Mother and relations and also Dr. Bullinger with whom I had been corresponding for six or eight years. This proved to be the beginning of 'The Companion Bible'. For three years previous to this I had been writing and trying to show forth the need of such a work, in which he could bring forth all that the Lord had been pleased to give him.

Until we met we could not understand how this could be done apart from a new translation (which no doubt would have been excellent) but which never could have taken the place of the A.V. amongst the Common people. 'The Companion Bible' will be the gathering together of all his great labours, and the crowning part of all his works while it will bring much glory to God even our Father and much help to his dear ignorant and misguided people. Should you find time to write a few lines it will indeed give me pleasure to hear from you. Your affectionate brother in Christ Jesus our Lord

(Signed) William Barron."

Another link with the Antipodes is supplied by the following extract from Freemantle, Australia, dated February, 1933. "Dear Brother Welch—I make no apology for addressing you thus—for although I have not seen your face in the flesh nevertheless I know you intimately in the spirit through your writings and particularly through The Berean Expositor. I have also the joy of knowing a dear brother in the Lord who also is your friend and fellow labourer in the ministry concerning the Mystery of Christ. I refer to Brother William Barron of Gisborne, New Zealand.

I have a long while desired to write you, but procrastination has been my enemy within to hinder me and only an overpowering sense of ingratitude to God our Saviour and to you, awakened in me, has urged me to write as I now do.

God has used you in a wonderful way to unfold the wonders of His grace. In the words of the preface to your Volume XXI, B.E., your publications are a definite witness raised up and sustained by the Lord. There must be many like myself who thank God for such a witness. Your Berean Expositor as far as I know is unique, almost every step in exposition is hedged about by scripture reference, and although I know nothing about the Hebrew and Greek languages, the etymological equivalents in the English which are given therein and which are determined according as they are consistent with the usage throughout all the scriptures, these translations make a tremendous appeal to the spiritual sense of the student in his effort to know the mind and will of God.

It is certainly most satisfying to me, and at the moment I have in mind the series of articles on Redemption which appeared in the B.E. some little time ago. It is most enlightening to comprehend the divine meaning of redemption and what constitutes a Redeemer. Man invariably has preconceived ideas of things, and sticks to them in spite of what God says—"My thoughts are not your thoughts, neither my ways your ways", saith the Lord. Your reference to the book of Ruth as giving God's definition of a Redeemer and the attributes of a Redeemer is a real eye opener. Again, I am thankful for the spirit of love that is so evident in your writings even when you have to stand firm for the Truth against those that assail it, and who despitefully use you. It is the right Christian attitude 'Do all things without murmurings and disputings: that we may be blameless and harmless, the sons of God, without rebuke, in the midst of a crooked and perverse nation, among whom ye shine as lights in the world; Holding forth the Word of Life', &c. (Phil. 2:14-16).

May God our Father use you more and more in the ministry of the Body of Christ, edifying the members as to their glorious inheritance in the light, and I pray that you may have the joy of knowing that your labours have not been in vain, for I am sure there are very many who are thankful to God for raising up such an one as yourself and your fellow labourer Bro. Brininger to discover for us the riches of the glory of this Mystery, and all this that Christ our Head may be magnified to the honour and glory of the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ. I trust you and your family are well. I am, Yours in Christ."

Again, these extracts from loyal and loving fellow members in New Zealand and Australia could be multiplied, but to do more would overburden the reader and accomplish no good purpose. Sufficient has been quoted to indicate to the reader something of the nature of the Good Deposit entrusted to Mr. Brininger and myself, and lovingly shared by Mr. Dive, Mr. Foster, Mr. Canning, Mr. & Mrs. Farmer, Mr. & Mrs. W. Hannam and other loyal helpers, something of the adverse conditions in which the testimony to this truth was put into effect, something of the marvelous grace of God that enabled in spite of almost insurmountable difficulties, both social, physical and financial, and something of the extent of the witness and its influence on others who have subsequently received the call to hold forth the same precious Word of Truth.

It would have been our joy to have mentioned by name each of those loyal and faithful friends, who have stuck "closer than a brother". Among this number, I greatly prize the friendship and support of two who, though they must remain anonymous, may recognize their own "handwriting" in the following brief extracts.

"Cheshire 1916.—I have been a reader of your contributions in Things to Come for some years. I also subscribe to The Berean Expositor . . . . . I owe more than I can tell to Dr. Bullinger and yourself. I feel thankful to God that he has raised you up to carry on the witness of His departed Servant." The fellowship started by the receipt of this letter has persisted to this day, and is numbered among the most precious of the Lord's gifts in grace.

The other extract is also inserted as a tribute to loyalty that can be matched by few: 1924.—"I count it a great privilege to be allowed to enjoy such a close friendship with one I regard as a chosen vessel of the Lord. I would rather help him to fulfil his ministry for one hour than spend a life time in so called Christian work."

#17. A Document in the case.
pp. 110 - 113

The letter which is printed below is of interest to all who are concerned with the Editor's fight for the truth "rightly divided". It is an unfinished rough draft of a letter sent to the leader of the movement in which I served as Secretary for several years. There are evidences of confused ideas that need considerable clarification, but speaking generally, it will be seen that as early as 1908, the general lines of Dispensational Truth were perceived, and which were seen more clearly when complete freedom was attained. We have purposely omitted names and places as no good would be done by their publication, and some would be unnecessarily hurt. This letter was written when I was not quite 28. I am now over 70 and there is little I would alter, apart from phrase and style.

"London, 1908.

Dear . . .—I have been waiting for some weeks before writing to you, for I feel that this letter will contain that which will cause a greater separation between us or (which I cannot believe) will revolutionize the work at . . . It is not pleasant to the flesh to know that one is courting the censure of those whose regard in spiritual things has been valued. Nevertheless I trust I have learned in heart as well as in head that knowledge brings with it a painful yet blessed responsibility. After prayer and I must confess much hesitation I look for grace to write you, and realize that if you do not believe the content of this letter to be true, that you will have no alternative but to class me with those who go contrary to the Word of God*.

[* - This is in fact what happened and was quoted against me as aptly fitting my case.]

In the first instance I must confess that I never felt easy over your attitude towards the teaching of the Scriptures concerning 'The Body', and now looking back I can see that the publication of your conclusions on this subject marked a turning point for me, for which you are partly responsible.

According to your view of the Word, Satan's great attack was against the manifestation of the One Body, in other words, the assembly position as recorded in the Acts and I Corinthians. You have had the church on earth so much in your mind that the heavenly reality has become dim (pardon any appearance of rudeness I seek grace to exercise true meekness*) and you would in other points condemn the method of interpretation you have adopted in this.

[* - The reader will perhaps sense that the stand taken as indicated by the tone of this letter cost the writer great exercise of heart at the time.]

Paul's conflict was related to the heavenlies, which cannot be interpreted of the assembly on earth. Satanic power was leveled against the saints who like Paul were constrained to leave Judaizing Christians, even though they were Apostles, and who boldly proclaimed the truth of the One Body and the heavenly calling. Here the article referred to assumes in my estimation its significant and awful position. Satan saw that we were beginning to appreciate these blessed truths. Ephesians was being studied and he must seek at all costs to prevent that long buried truth, the teaching that is summed up in the words 'In the heavenlies in Christ' from being proclaimed—and so you suddenly framed the proposition 'A Body is something visible', logic then compelled you to continue 'No visible Body is on earth now, therefore the Body does not exist'. You faced the problem, came to the conclusion, brought the study of Ephesians to a close, and since then your teaching and exhortation has been based upon Acts 2, &c., the typical character of the books of Ezra and Nehemiah as applied to church conditions, and the special teaching for the present period has been allowed to fall into the background, the Apostle's great argument 'See what you are in Christ, and walk accordingly' has given place to precepts and commandments, a tendency to look within, and so Satan's object was attained. You have of late insisted upon Matt. 5-7; bear with me when I draw your attention to the fact that whereas Matt. 6 says 'forgive us, as we forgive' Ephesians says 'forgive because you are forgiven'. My own dear father has voiced something of this same feeling. Walking to the meeting he said to me: 'I sometimes feel in the week with its worry and distress, that I yearn to hear something of what the Lord has done for me. I hear much of what I ought to do, but how empty it all seems!' II Cor. 3 says: 'Beholding the glory of the Lord we are transfigured' the Lord's people being in Christ, there is a new creature. Seeing things through other men's spectacles I have in time past used the epithets 'Jewish' or 'Ultra-dispensational' when speaking of the work of others. Upon more careful study I feel that we can see Satan at work again. In the movement of 1840, the blessed truth of the standing and calling of the Church was re-discovered, and for a time J.N.D. and those with him saw the distinction and emphasized it, but made some unwise and far-fetched statements. B.W.N. saw the tendency and went to the other extreme and practically denied the peculiar element that characterizes the epistle of Paul*. What do we really find. Malachi is not the end of inspired Jewish history, neither is Matthew. Inspired Jewish history reaches to the last chapter of the Acts, there the nation of Israel is recognized as such, blessing is promised to them upon repentance, and Gentiles blessed through them. Rom. 15 opened my eyes to this, and if we perceive the truth of Rom. 15:8, why should we use the epithet 'ultra' of those who apply this teaching to the gospel that contains it? That gospel teaches that Christ came as the Messiah. His opening proclamation is concerning the kingdom. He gave its laws, and He was, as king, rejected. After His ascension the final testimony was given to Israel accompanied by signs and wonders. Every accompaniment of Pentecost was Millennial, the preaching was purposely addressed to Israel, and the promise was made of the return of the Lord upon their repentance. It seemed to me an ominous evidence of the power of one's own opinion which led you to give public utterance to the idea that Peter made a mistake in Acts 1 and 3. In Acts 3 Peter was but following out the principle expressed in the parable of the Nobleman who had gone into a far country to receive a kingdom and return. The final rejection of Israel and the use of Isa. 6 in Acts 28 is crucial. Before this Paul had written Corinthians, Galatians and Romans. Already he had suffered at the hands of those who, though believing that Christ was the Messiah, were still zealous of the law (Gal. 2) and although you quote this chapter I fear you approximate to Peter and James rather than to Paul. Nevertheless, these leaders were compelled to allow Paul to preach his glorious teaching of 'in Christ' even though some said his teaching led to licence, yet he still emphasized their freedom in Christ. If you will compare the epistle to the Ephesians with the epistles written before Acts 28 you will see a noteworthy difference. For example the Jew is personally addressed in Romans and occupies a considerable space in that epistle (chapters 2, 3, 4, 9, 10, 11). In chapter 11 it is definitely taught that Gentile blessings is through the Jew, and the associations with the hope as set out in Rom. 15 are Millennial. So in I Corinthians, the gifts were a witness to Israel, they are called in Hebrews the powers of the age to come. Paul could only speak to spiritual ones at Corinth concerning the mystery (cf. milk and meat). Paul's 'sin' (as taught) is overruled to take him to Rome and there Ephesians, Colossians and Philippians were written, each epistle refers to the fact that he was a prisoner—why? to show that Jerusalem was rejected as the centre ('beginning at Jerusalem'), and that Rome, the city of the Gentiles, with Paul the prisoner, taking its place. He now can declare that which it would not have been expedient to utter while Israel (humanly speaking) had the opportunity to repent. The dividing line which affects us is Acts 28. You will remember that we saw, very blessedly, that we were in a dispensation of foreshadowing 'the earnest', but we have not seen this in true perspective. From Acts 2 to 28, gifts, assemblies and the position of Israel—all were prophetic of, and foreshadowing, the Millennium. After Acts 28 it is the New Creation that is foreshadowed.

[* - These remarks refer to long discussions arising out of the teaching and divisions among the early brethren, and would have then been understood far more than it is possible for any one now reading them to enter into.

 - Acts 28 as the dispensational boundary is here evidently seen.

 - This was immature teaching given at the time concerning Paul and his journey up to Jerusalem, and is rectified later.]

This new creation does not come in the epistle to the Hebrews, the object of Hebrews being very different. Hosea 3 declared that Israel shall abide many days without a King, Priest or Sacrifice, and Hebrews point to the only One who sums up these offices in Himself. In Heb. 6 is Paul's final appeal to his brethren still entangled in Judaism. To me, your exposition of Heb. 6 places you on the wrong side of Acts 28, and is consequently undispensational. Paul exhorted the believer to 'leave' these things. You would make them fundamental . . . . ."

Here the rough draft of the letter ends. How it was concluded cannot now be remembered, but there is sufficient evidence here to enable the reader to understand the cause of the separation indicated, and the place that Acts 28 had assumed in the writer's estimate before The Berean Expositor saw the light.

Life and Its Outgoings.

#6. The Finishing of the Course (Acts xx. 24).
pp. 159, 160

One of the differences between "mice" and "men" is indicated by Burns when he said to the "Wee, sleekit, cow'rin, tim'rous beastie" whose nest had been wrecked by the plough:

> "Still thou art blest, compar'd wi' me!
> The present only toucheth thee;
> But Och'! I backward cast my e'e on prospects drear!
> An' forward, tho' I canna see, I guess an' fear!"

Man looks backward and forward. He cannot help it, it is a part of his constitution. A good bulk of philosophic speculation has been expended on the questions "whence?" and "whither?" and will be until the day of revelation. The apostle looked forward, but he did not "guess and fear". He knew Whom he had believed and was persuaded regarding "that day". His great desire was to "finish his course". The Authorized Version adds the words "with joy", the Revised Version omits them, and there is apparently slender MSS authority for their inclusion. We can well believe that Paul would desire to finish his course, with or without joy, being assured that the "well done" at the end would more than compensate him for "the light affliction which is but for a moment". In this desire of the apostle to finish his course, he was but following in the steps of the Lord Himself, Who had declared early in His ministry "My meat is to do the will of Him that sent Me, and to finish His work" (John iv. 34).

At the close of the Saviour's earthly life it is written "that the scripture might be fulfilled (He) saith, I thirst . . . . . When Jesus therefore had received the vinegar, He said, it is finished: and He bowed His head, and gave up the ghost" (John xix. 28-30). The word that the Saviour used in John iv. 34 is the same that Paul used in Acts xx. 24. The word that the Saviour used in John xix. 30 is the same that Paul used in II Tim. iv. 7 when he said "I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith: henceforth . . . . . a crown". The word "course" which the apostle here uses as having finished was a racecourse, which is the primary meaning of the word dromos and enters into the word "hippodrome", a racecourse for horses. In I Cor. ix. 24, they "which run in a race run all . . . . . so run that ye may obtain", where the Greek word stadion is used, a word meaning one-eighth of a Roman mile, and then used of a racecourse. In Heb. xii. 1, "let us run with patience the race that is set before us", is the word agona.

The word "finish" is the Greek word teleioo, one of a number of derivatives from the word telos which means "the end". This word translated "finish" is also translated "perfect", and because of the doctrinal importance of this term we will give a few specimen passages both of teleioo and other similarly derived words.

Telos "The end." "Whose end is destruction" (Phil. iii. 19). To the Greek reader this passage would be suggestive, as the word "destruction" is the same as "perdition" in Heb. x. 39 which in its turn is the dread alternative of "perfection" in Heb. vi. 1 "Let us go on unto perfection . . . . . not draw back unto perdition".

Teleioo "To finish." "The third day I shall be perfected" (Luke xiii. 32). "Make the Captain of our salvation perfect through sufferings" (Heb. ii. 10).

Teleios "Perfect." "We speak wisdom among them that are perfect" (I Cor. ii. 6).

Teleiotes "Perfection." "Let us go on unto perfection" (Heb. vi. 1).

Teleiôtes "Perfecter." "Looking unto Jesus the author and finisher of our faith" (Heb. xii. 2). Heb. xii. 2 speaks of running a race, with joy set before the runner, and the word translated "Author" is the same as that translated "Captain" in Heb. ii. 10.

"Perfection" in these passages does not mean "improvement" but the reaching of a goal. The stem of the Greek words tele quoted above is in common use in English, still with the idea of distance uppermost, here are a few examples:

TELEphone.	To speak or make a sound at a distance.
TELEgram.	To write a word at a distance.
TELEscope.	To see at a distance.

There are others that will occur to the reader. The teaching of the Scriptures concerning the Prize and the Crown is closely related with this word that means the reaching of a goal, an "out-going" of life indeed.

Life in the apostle's estimate was of value because of its possibilities, and for him, the redeemed and sanctified child of grace, life was not held dear except as a means to an end, to finish the ministry which he had received of the Lord Jesus.

"My Cup Runneth Over"

No.1 The Superlatives of Grace.

p. 220

We are allowing ourselves a certain amount of liberty in the application of the wording of Scripture in this series of articles, our primary object being to minister some word of comfort and strength rather than give a straight exposition of any particular passage.

The Psalmist's words, "My cup runneth over", make us think of some of the superlatives that are associated with grace in the New Testament, and to the passages which thus speak we would turn the reader's attention, as a kind of triumphant contrast to the valley of the shadow. A "cup" in the Scriptures is used not only in its primary sense, as in Gen. xl. 2 "Pharaoh's cup", but in a number of passages it is used in a figurative sense. We read of "the cup of salvation", "the cup of consolation", "the cup of trembling", "the cup of astonishment" and "the cup of fury". We remember, too, the dreadful significance of the "cup" which the Saviour was willing to drink for us men and our salvation.

In Psalm xvi. the Psalmist associates the cup with his "portion", "inheritance", "lot" and "lines" (5, 6).

The idea that underlies the word "runneth over" is "abundance".

> "We went through fire and water: but Thou broughtest us out into a wealthy place" (Psa. lxvi. 12).

Here the same word is used that is translated "runneth over" in Psalm xxiii. The Lord has filled the cup of our salvation with a lavish hand, and in the New Testament there are a series of superlative passages which are to the Church what the overflowing cup was to the Psalmist.

Here are some of the "superlatives" of grace, that we hope to consider together:

LOVE that passeth knowledge;
JOY that is unspeakable;
PEACE that passeth understanding;
GRACE that is abounding;
POWER that is exceeding great;
SALVATION that is to the uttermost;

and others which will be brought to light as we proceed.

No.2 Grace that Superabounds.
p. 240

At first thought one might say when dealing with such solemn truth as that which pertains to sin and salvation, no flights of fancy can be tolerated, nothing but the plainest of statements can be permissible. Yet experience will prove otherwise.

The very immensity of the subject, either of human guilt or of Divine grace, makes such demands upon the resources and powers of language that one has to adopt the words of Scripture and confess:

> "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man," and the only recourse is to figurative language, and figurative language in its very essence is an exaggeration allowed and acknowledged owing to the paucity of every day speech to express adequately all that the hearts feels.

This series aims primarily at ministering comfort to the believer in these troublous times. That presupposes that he is redeemed and that he knows it. It will, however, be wise if we look "to the hole of the pit whence we are digged" and open this series with a meditation upon

SUPERABOUDING REDEEMING GRACE.

There are two passages to which we must turn for light upon this blessed theme, Rom. v. and Eph. i. Grace is revealed in the opening section of Romans (i. - v. 11) as the only "cause":

> "Being justified freely (without a cause) by (because of) His grace through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus" (iii. 24).

The plan of salvation was thus ordained: "Therefore it is of faith that it might be by grace" (iv. 16) and into this grace we have both access and standing (v. 2).

The argument of the apostle up to this point has revolved around human responsibility, he has been concerned with "sins" rather than "sin". He has had Moses in view rather than Adam, individual and personal transgressions rather than the ruin of the creature as such, what a man has DONE rather than what he IS.

With the twelfth verse of Rom. v. however a change appears. Moses recedes, Adam comes forward, "sins" give place to "sin" and here we meet with "superabounding grace". Judgment came upon all men by reason of one act of sin, but the free gift of salvation takes into account not only that one federal act of our racial head, but of the "many offences" that have sprung from it ever since (v. 16).

> "Where sin abounded, grace did much more abound" (v. 20).

The Prophetic Earth.

No.1 The meaning and bearing of the word "oikoumene".

pp. 178 - 180

World events, coupled with the recent acknowledgment of Israel as a nation, have turned the thoughts of many believers to Prophecy, the Second Coming and the many strange and startling statements of Holy Writ concerning "the end".

In other issues we have given expositions of the books of Daniel, Isaiah and the Revelation, in this series we are limiting our enquiry to the question "what is the extent of the Prophetic earth?" When we read of men's hearts failing them for fear in looking after those things which are coming on the earth (Luke xxi. 26) are we to understand the trouble in the Far East, China and other distant lands, or is this passage concerned with a much more limited area? When we read of wars and rumours of wars, when nation shall rise against nation and kingdom against kingdom (Matt. xxiv. 7) are we to look at the threat of "world", or as the word is "global" war, or are we to remember that the quotation from Isa. xix. 2 rather focuses our attention upon Egypt? Does the king of the North spoken of in Daniel refer to Russia? If so does this mean that the Soviet Union will be dissolved and Russia once again be ruled by a "king"? This seems well nigh impossible. Shall we therefore set aside the term "king" as negligible? and if we do what value can we place on any term used by the prophets? Is there any warrant for associating the name Meshech with Moscow? Does Rosh mean Russia? Is Tubal, Tobolsk (Ezek. xxxvii. 2)? Scripture speaks of ten kings that are to rule under the antichristian beast at the time of the end. Will these kings sit on thrones as far removed as China and Brazil? Or will their dominion be limited to the lands ruled over by the Gentile powers envisaged in the image of Dan. ii.? This however, in itself, raises another question or series of questions. Does Rome come in the image at all? If it does, will the Roman Empire be renewed? If it will not be renewed, is it not reasonable to expect that where the prophecy was broken off, there it will be resumed? Can the final phase, the feet and the toes of the image, cover a greater area in rule and dominion, than that governed by the Gold, Silver, and Copper phases of the great image in Dan. ii., at the time of the rejection of Christ? It will be agreed, we trust, by all who value the light of prophecy, that our enquiry is a serious one, the answers to which must materially influence our interpretation of prophecy in general. We must neither seek an answer, nor expect one, from the opinions of men, of whatever rank and qualification they may be—our only answer can come from the Scriptures themselves. Let us make a test of the passage already quoted from Luke xxi. 26:

> "Men's hearts failing them for fear, and for looking after those things which are coming on the earth."

What is the word used in the original here for the "earth"? The contextual reference to sun, moon and stars, would suggest nothing less than the whole world is in view. Yet, when we examine the passage we discover that the word translated "earth" here is the Greek word oikoumene. This word is properly the passive present participle of the verb oikeo "to inhabit" and means "the habitable", generally with the ellipsis of the word "world" or "earth"—the habitable earth. This word can and has been taken to indicate the whole area of the earth's surface which is inhabitable by man, and so would include vast tracks of land unknown to the writers of Scripture. On the other hand the word has a much more restricted meaning both in the scriptures and in the writings of the Greek historians, and we must therefore reserve our conclusions until we have acquainted ourselves with this usage, for usage is a supreme factor in establishing the meaning of any term.

Plutarch, who died 120A.D. speaks of "many countries of the Roman world" Romaion oikoumenes, and Polybius, a celebrated Greek historian (born B.C.203) wrote "The Romans in a short time subdued the whole inhabited world" ten oikoumenen. Josephus has the following expression "And let no one wonder that there was so much wealth in our temple, since all the Jews throughout the habitable earth, and those that worshipped God, nay even those of Asia and Europe, sent their contributions to it" (Ant. xiv. 7,2), and speaking of the days of Elijah, he wrote "the famine has seized upon the whole country" (Ant. viii. 13,4). Here it will be observed, the term is limited to the land of Palestine. Again, where Acts xi. 28 says that in the days of Claudius Cæsar there should be a great dearth "throughout all the world" (oikoumene), Josephus says in the same period "a great famine happened in Judea" yet although it was said to be "throughout all the world", Josephus adds "in which Queen Helena bought corn in Egypt' (Ant. xx. 5,2). In Luke ii. 1 where we read "There went out a decree from Cæsar Augustus that all the world should be taxed", it is evident that such a decree could not extend beyond the limits of the Roman Empire. And, even though we allow a great margin for the fanatical worshippers of Diana, their words "whom all Asia and the world worshippeth", can hardly mean "the world" we now know, and it would be ludicrous to put Asia Minor and "the world" together as Luke has done. If the Ephesians meant the habitable world of their day, namely the Roman Empire all is plain. Isaiah uses the words "the world" of the Babylonian Empire which in the LXX reads he oikoumene hole (Isa. xiii. 11, xiv. 17). With these passages before us taken from Scripture, and from writings during Bible times, other places where oikoumene is used, begin to assume a somewhat different appearance, and must refer to a much more restricted area than is often imagined. If the gospel of the kingdom is to be preached "in all the world" for a witness unto all nations, before "the end" comes, then centuries must roll their weary way before that blessed consummation is reached. But Matt. xxiv. 14 limits this preaching to all the nations that make up the oikoumene the area ruled over by Rome and Babylon and no problem arises. So when Christ was shown "all the kingdoms of the world" (Luke iv. 5) it is reasonable to interpret the second occurrence of oikoumene in the light of the most evident meaning of the first occurrence in Luke (ii. 1), Christ was shown the "world" that was ruled over by the successors in the image of Dan. ii.

In order that every reader shall have full opportunity of testing this matter, we provide a concordance to oikoumene in the New Testament:

Matt. xxix. 14. shall be preached in all the world.

Luke ii. 1.	that all the world should be taxed.
iv. 5.	all the kingdoms of the world.
xxi. 26.	which are coming on the earth.
Acts xi. 28.	dearth throughout all the world.
xvii. 6.	turned the world upside down.
xvii. 31.	in the which He will judge the world.
xix. 27.	all Asia and the world worshippeth.
xxiv. 5.	among all the Jews throughout the world.
Rom. x. 18.	their words unto the ends of the world.
Heb. i. 6.	the first begotten into the world
ii. 5.	not put in subjection the world to come.
Rev. iii. 10.	which shall come upon all the world.
xii. 9.	which deceiveth the whole world.
xvi. 14.	kings of the earth and of the whole world.

"The world to come" (Heb. ii. 5) is the oikoumene, and there are indications in this chapter of Hebrews that the sphere of this dominion is purposely limited. For example, this world to come is contrasted with some earlier rule exercised by "angels" (Heb. ii. 5), and Adam is spoken of as being made a little lower than the angels (Heb. ii. 7), and when the Apostle returns to the comparison in verse 16, he does not say, as we might have expected, "for verily He took not on Him the nature of angels, but He took on Him the (nature of) the seed of ADAM", it says "the seed of ABRAHAM", thereby suggesting a less extensive dominion "under His feet" (Heb. ii. 8) than is revealed in Eph. i. 21, 22 where the word oikoumene could not have been used.

Before we shall be in a position to come to a Scriptural conclusion, we shall have to consider the teaching of the Old Testament, and the connecting link will be the use of oikoumene in the Greek O.T., the Septuagint version, and the Hebrew words that are so translated. At the moment everything w have seen points to the conclusion that the Prophetic Earth is limited to the lands ruled over by Nebuchadnezar and his successors until the rupture which occurred at the rejection of Christ and the subsequent rejection of Israel.

No.2 The occurrences of oikoumene in the Septuagint.
pp. 198 - 200

We have considered the use of the word oikoumene in the New Testament, but before we can arrive at a conclusion, an examination of its Hebrew equivalent is called for. The following words are translated oikoumene in the LXX.

(1) Erets "earth". This word has a wide significance. It is used of the earth in its fullest meaning, as in Gen. i. 1, to the more restricted meaning "the dry land" as in Gen. i. 10, to a particular "land" (Gen. ii. 13), to the different lands apportioned to the Gentiles (Gen. x. 5), to a piece of ground that could be bought for a burial ground (Gen. xxiii. 15), or to the ground upon which one stands (Gen. xliv. 11). None of these references are translated oikoumene, they are given here, in the first place, to indicate the nature of the Hebrew word that is later on so translated. But, inasmuch as oikoumene does translate the Hebrew word erets in some places it will be realized that it is possible that any use of these meanings may be intended. This of course must be settled by the context.

(2) Baal "be married".

(3) Cheled. This word is derived from a root which means "to move quickly" and gives its name to the weasel.

(4) Yashab "inhabited", from the primitive meaning "to dwell" Exod. xvi. 35 "until they came to a land inhabited", so we see that the oikoumene here refers to Canaan, as contrasted with the wilderness.

(5) Tebel. This word is important, and we will postpone an examination of its bearing upon our subject until we have given the usage of erets as it is translated by oikoumene , a fuller examination.

Erets "earth" is translated in the LXX oikoumene nine times, one occurrence being in the Psalms, the rest in Isaiah. The passage in the Psalms comes in the great Psalm of David "for Solomon", type of the greater Son of David "The King's Son". We must remember, that however much the dominion of Christ may exceed that of Solomon, that initially the terms used in this Psalm must have been true in Solomon's day.

> "He shall have dominion also from sea to sea, and from the river unto the ends of the earth" (Psa. lxxii. 8).

The extent of Solomon's kingdom is given:

> "And Solomon reigned over all kingdoms from the river unto the land of the Philistines, and unto the border of Egypt: they brought presents, and served Solomon all the days of his life . . . . . he had dominion over all the region on this side the river, from Tiphsah even to Azzah, over all the kings on this side of the river" (I Kings iv. 21, 24).

"The river" is the Euphrates. Tiphsah means "a ford", and was on the west bank of the Euphrates, some 300 miles above Damascus. Azzah or Gaza is on the coast where the land of Palestine begins to turn west towards the delta of the Nile. The two seas mentioned would be the Mediterranean and the Red Sea. One can sense something of the different outlook of the ancient world from that of modern times, in the expression "The Seven Seas". The Talmudists speak of the land of Israel being compassed by seven seas, these include the Mediterranean, the sea of Tiberius and the sea of Sodom, and the Midras Tillim says: "I have created seven seas, saith the Lord, but out of them all I have chosen none but the sea of Gennesaret." The Atlantic and the Pacific might well have never existed so far as these writers were concerned. When David spoke of the dominion of his son reaching "from sea to sea" therefore, we must beware of the temptation to interpret the words with a modern breadth, and read into them a meaning that would have been quite foreign to the reader of the day. Further, the dominion which was to extend from "sea to sea" is given another dimension, it was "from the river unto the end of the earth". After Israel's contact with Egypt is recorded, the Hebrew word yeor is employed when the Nile is intended, but when the Euphrates is meant the Hebrew word nahar is used (Gen. xli. 1 and xv. 18). It will be observed that when the extent of the promised land was given to Abraham in Gen. xv., its boundaries were given as from the river of Egypt, unto the great river, the river Euphrates, and in Gen. xiii. 14, Abraham was told to look "from the place where thou art northward, and southward, and eastward, and westward". From the river Euphrates, this dominion spoken of in Psalm lxxii. extended "unto the end of the earth". If the extreme interpretation of these words is adopted, it will appear somewhat strange to attempt to measure the whole earth from such a datum line, and an examination of the term is therefore called for. The word translated "end" is the Hebrew ephes, primarily means "to cease" and so comes to mean "an extremity".

In Psalm lxxii. 8 the LXX translates the Hebrew word erets "earth" by the limited Greek word oikoumene. Apart from this one passage in the Psalms, the remaining references where erets is rendered oikoumene are all found in Isaiah. These references are: "In the midst of all the land" (x. 23); "the whole land" (xiii. 5); "to lay the land desolate" (xiii. 9); "the whole earth" (xiv. 26); "upon the face of the earth" (xxiii. 17); "the Lord maketh the earth empty" (xxiv. 1); "all the kingdoms of the earth" (xxxvii. 16); "the Assyrians have laid waste all the nations", margin "lands" (xxxvii. 18).

If these passages be considered with their contexts, it will be seen that where a modern reader is likely to invest these predictions and threats with a word wide significance, the Septuagint translators limited them to the narrow sphere of the oikoumene. In like manner, the command of the Lord, recorded in Acts i. 8 has been looked upon as being of world wide scope, whereas it is most probable that it should read Jerusalem, Judæa, and in Samaria, and unto the uttermost parts of the land. The Hebrew word tebel is translated oikoumene in the LXX more times than any other, it occurs twenty-six times or more than twice the number of all the other Hebrew words so translated put together.

Gesenius derives the word tebel from the verb yabal "to bring forth", and so it indicates the fertile or habitable earth. We are distinctly told that the Lord formed the earth to be inhabited (Isa. xlv. 18), and the book of Proverbs takes us back to the day of creation where we read of One, spoken of as the personification of Wisdom, saying that He was "rejoicing in the habitable part of His earth" (Prov. viii. 31), where the words tebel or oikoumene are translated "habitable part". Bildad the Shuhite has a strange expression, he speaks of the wicked being driven from light to darkness, and chased out of the world" (Job xviii. 18).

If tebel refers to the habitable part of the earth, and particularly that which was promised to Abraham or ruled over by Nebuchadnezzar later, then we can understand the expression, but if we interpret the word "world" in its widest sense, how can one be chased "out of it"? The parallel which is instituted between "darkness" and "out of the world" calls to mind and illuminates the words "outer darkness" (Matt. viii. 12; xxii. 13; xxv. 30), and probably also such expressions as "the four corners of the earth". These terms must be interpreted with the land of promise as the centre. In Psalm lxxxix. 11 tebel, "the world" is differentiated from both "the heavens" and "the earth". Again in Psalm xc. 2 "the earth and the world" are spoken of as distinct, "or ever Thou hast formed the earth and the world" (see also Psalm xciii. 1; xcvi. 10, 13; xcviii. 7). The Hebrew word tebel occurs in places where the LXX translates it other than oikoumene, some of these passages are somewhat vaguely rendered, but here are a few. We have given one quotation from Job, but two others must be added:

> "Who hath given him a charge over the earth? or who hath disposed the whole world?" (xxxiv. 13).
>
> "The face of the world in the earth" (xxxvii. 12).

Job xviii. 18 already quoted is parallel with the punishment of Cain, who became a fugitive or a vagabond "driven from the face of the earth" (Gen. iv. 14). The LXX translates the Hebrew word tebel in Job xxxiv. 13 by the Greek tenhup' ouranon, "that which is under heaven".

From what we have gathered there appears a strong presumption in favour of interpreting the references to the Prophetic Earth so that they fall within the borders of the Babylonian Empire in the East, to the extremes of the Roman Empire in the West. If, as we believe, the prophetic image of Dan. ii. is about to be resumed after its veiled history during Israel's blindness, it will be misleading to read into the Prophets or the Apocalypse references to the nations of the wide earth, where a far more limited sphere is intended. We must examine these references afresh and seek the light that comes from Truth alone.

No.3 From Spain to the Indus.
pp. 236 - 239

Before we can go further in this investigation, and reach some conclusion as to the area covered by the Prophetic Earth, certain debateable matter pertaining to the prophecy of Daniel must be considered. The question of the composition of the Gentile dynasty as symbolized in the image of Dan. ii. There are many expositors who see four, and no more than four successive kingdoms in this symbol, namely Babylon, Persia, Greece, and Rome. These look for a revival of the Roman Empire at the time of the end. Some derive support for this number "four" from the subsequent vision of Dan. vii. Let us consider the second chapter.

The Gentile character of this vision is indicated by the change of language that occurs at verse 4: "Then spake the Chaldeans to the king in Syriac." The words "in Syriac" mark the place where Daniel ceases to write in Hebrew, and thenceforth to the end of chapter seven employs the Syriac or Aramaic language.

- - - I l l u s t r a t i o n - - -
(BE-XXXVI.237).

Before going into detail it may be well to consider two of many interpretations that have been put forward, so that the way may be cleared and our study pursued unhindered.

(1) Four kingdoms. One school of interpretation speaks of the image as representing four kingdoms only—Babylon, Medo-Persia, Greece and Rome, the legs representing the two divisions of the Roman Empire, the eastern and western, and the ten toes, the kingdom into which it will finally be divided, thus making Rome's dominion either in its full power or in its divided form cover the whole period from before Christ to the present time, and necessitating a revival of ancient Rome at the time of the end. Some who endorse this view believe Rome to be the Babylon of the Apocalypse, whilst other believe that literal Babylon will be rebuilt.

(2) The fourth kingdom regarded as Satanic.—Another view of the purport of the vision does not include Rome at all. The view is that Babylon, Medo-Persia and Greece followed one another, but that by the time the Lord was here upon earth, the devil could claim that the kingdoms of the world had been delivered unto him (Luke iv. 6).

Let us now search and see. The succeeding kingdoms symbolized in the great image of Dan. ii. show a marked depreciation. Gold gives place to silver, silver to brass (or copper), brass to iron, iron to clay. Because we are far more likely to have handled a solid piece of lead than a bar of gold, many would place lead as the heaviest of metals.

This, however, would be inaccurate, the specific gravity of lead being 11·4 (11.4), whereas that of gold is as high as 19·3 (19.3). Gold is the heaviest metal mentioned in Dan. ii. and it is of that metal that the head is constructed, so that the image of Gentile dominion is top-heavy from the commencement. This can be seen by observing the relative specific gravity of each material:

Gold	19.3
Silver	10.51
Brass	8.5	(Copper 8.78)
Iron	7.6
Clay	1.9

The arrangement of these metals in the structure of the image indicates depreciation not only in weight, but also in the characteristics of the kingdom. The kingdom of which Nebuchadnezzar was the head of gold was an absolute monarchy. Of him it could be said: "whom he would he slew, and whom he would he kept alive." The Medo-Persian kingdom, represented by silver, was not absolute, as was Nebuchadnezzar's. Darius was limited by the presidents and princes, and by his own laws "that could not be broken". The Grecian kingdom of brass was a military kingdom, and consequently lower still in the scale. We will not here speak of Rome, as we have not yet dealt with the question of the fourth kingdom. We see enough, however, to realize that this prophetic image prevents us from ever believing that the kingdom of heaven will come upon earth as a result of Gentile rule; rather are we clearly told that Gentile rule must be ground to powder before the kingdom of the Lord can be set up.

The times of the Gentiles are insolubly linked with one item of prophetic import, "the treading down of Jerusalem" (Luke xxi. 24), a feature that continues into the book of the Revelation (Rev. xi. 2) and to the middle of the final seven years of Daniel's great period (Dan. ix.). Those who would rule Rome out of the image of Dan. ii., must of necessity deny or ignore this great identifying characteristic. There is far more evidence in the Scripture that Rome dominated Jerusalem, than did Persia or Greece. Rome it was that compelled the mother of the Saviour to travel to Bethlehem. It was Rome's penny, and Cæsar's image and superscription that was shown to the Lord. It was a Roman Governor who handed Christ over to be crucified, and he was reminded by the Saviour that the power he had exercised had been given him from above. It was Rome's soldiers that guarded the tomb. It was Roman soldiers who safeguarded Paul, and it was to the Roman Cæsar the Apostle made his appeal. Finally it was a Roman General who sacked Jerusalem and destroyed its temple. To deny all or any of these items betokens something more deadly than prejudice. Jerusalem is the key to the problem. Whatever Gentile power dominates Jerusalem, that power is in the succession symbolized by Daniel's image. A two-edged argument has been employed by some in the attempt to rule Rome out from this succession. It is that Rome never ruled over the lands governed by Babylon. But this cuts both ways, Babylon never ruled over the lands dominated by Rome, and consequently the argument proves itself to be invalid. Indeed, if the argument be taken to its legitimate ends, Babylon itself would be suspect, for Nebuchadnezzar most certainly never ruled over the territory that had been given him, namely "wheresoever the children of men dwell", to say nothing of the beast of the field and the fowl of heaven. God could hand over nothing less, for all dominion on earth is traceable back to Adam, but no man has yet or ever will fulfil this requirement. The Babylonian and Persian empires extended from Asia Minor on the West to the Indus on the East, and it was left to Greece and Rome to complete the oikoumene of the prophetic earth. At the death of Alexander, his kingdom was divided among his four generals as is indicated in Dan. viii. 22, Ptolemy taking Egypt, Palestine and some parts of Asia Minor; Cassander taking Macedonia and Greece; Seleucus taking Syria, Armenia, territory east of the Euphrates; and Lysemachus taking Bithynia, Thrace and Mysia. Rome took all this territory except that which lay east of Syria, but added to it a great portion of Europe and the countries on the southern edge of the Mediterranean. The prophetic earth therefore, if it be limited to the territory governed by these four successive kingdoms, extends from Spain on the west, to the Indus on the east. To supplement this investigation we reproduce the chart drawn for us by our brother W. G. Whitaker, first used in the reprint of "This Prophecy" in 1951.

Resurrection and The Purpose of the Age.

by Stuart Allen

No.1. pp. 133 - 136

In Eph. iii. 8-11 the Apostle Paul refers to the unfolding of the dispensation of the Mystery (secret) "according to the eternal purpose which He (God) purposed in Jesus Christ our Lord". Sometimes it is necessary to sacrifice the magnificent prose of the Authorized Version in order to get nearer to the meaning of the original Hebrew and Greek. A more literal rendering of verse eleven would be "according to the purpose of the ages which He made in Christ Jesus our Lord". The ages are the great platform of time on which God is working out a mighty plan embracing heaven and earth, centred in the Lord Jesus Christ, and the Bible is God's record of this plan, revealed step by step according to His matchless wisdom. A careful study of the New Testament shows that this mighty purpose is said to be by, through, in or with Christ and we do well to realize that there is no phase of it that is not essentially connected with Him and His atoning death and resurrection. In fact we can say that the truth of resurrection connected with the Lord and His redeemed people is the basis which holds this great plan together. What a pity then that this doctrine has been practically jettisoned by modern Christendom or mere lip service paid to it! How many Christian preachers and expositors give it a place in their ministry apart from Easter Sunday? Yet the apostle Paul did not hesitate to write to the church at Corinth: "If Christ be not raised, your faith is VAIN; ye are yet in your sins." Such was and still is the hopeless position of living believers apart from the resurrection of the Lord. And what of God's children who have died? "Then they also which are fallen asleep in Christ are PERISHED." This is strong language, but the Apostle was dealing with truth so fundamental that it was warranted. Let us notice the various ways in which the great truth of resurrection impinges upon the purpose of the ages.

(1) The Lord Himself.—It is hardly possible to read the eleventh and twelfth chapters of Matthew's Gospel without realizing that events recorded there were working to a climax. The Lord had come to His earthly people Israel and presented His credentials as Messiah by working daily in their midst the very miracles that the Old Testament had predicted He would accomplish at His advent. He was indeed a man "approved of God among you by miracles and wonders and signs" as Peter expressed it (Acts ii. 22). But in spite of all this, unbelief was doing its deadly work in the hearts of the people of Israel. "Then began He to upbraid the cities wherein most of His mighty works were done, because they repented not" (Matt. xi. 20). "And He did not many mighty works there because of their unbelief" (Matt. xiii. 58). This unbelief was such as to cause the Lord to marvel (Mark vi. 6). He had presented Himself in His threefold capacity as Prophet (Matt. xii. 41), Priest (verse 6) and King (verse 42) and yet they had the impertinence to ask for a sign:

> "But He answered and said unto them, An evil and adulterous generation seeketh after a sign; and there shall no sign be given to it, but the sign of the prophet Jonas; for as > Jonas was three days and three nights in the whale's belly; so shall the Son of Man be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth" (xii. 39, 40).

Later on, the Lord referred again to Jonah as being the only sign that would be given to that unbelieving generation (xvi. 4). Apart from the fact that the Saviour set His seal upon the truth of Jonah being swallowed by the great fish, it is evident that there was more in this incident than appears on the surface. Too often it is understood to mean that Jonah was miraculously preserved alive inside the fish and afterwards vomited upon the dry land. In which case one might well ask how the prophet could be a true picture of the death of the Lord Jesus and His entombment for three days and three nights? Jonah does not hesitate to describe the belly of the sea monster as "sheol" the grave (ii. 2 translated "hell" cp. Psa. xvi. 10) and "shachath" corruption (ii. 6). This word is rendered the "grave" in Job xxxiii. 22. The belly of the fish was the grave to Jonah. Moreover the "as" and the "so" of Matt. xii. 40 would lead one to believe that Jonah, after uttering the prayer recorded in chapter two of the prophecy, actually died and was brought to life again when given up by the great fish, so becoming a perfect type of the Lord's death and *resurrection. This occasion in the Lord's ministry was not the only time that He stressed His resurrection as a sign to those who would not believe.

> [* - We are aware that some Christian expositors would not go as far as this, but ask the reader to test what is written in the true Berean spirit.]

> "Destroy this temple and in three days I will raise it up . . . . . but He spake of the temple of His body" (John ii. 19-21).

Not only was the truth of His death and resurrection a stone of stumbling to His enemies, but His own disciples failed to grasp the significance of these great truths.

> "And as they came down from the mountain, he charged them that they should tell no man what things they had seen, till the Son of Man were risen from the dead. And they kept that saying with themselves, questioning one with another what the rising from the dead should mean" (Mark ix. 9, 10).

But the most majestic reference to the truth of His resurrection during His earthly life was given by the Lord Jesus to a sorrowing woman, distraught with grief at the loss of a loved one. "Thy brother shall rise again" (John xi. 23) was the greatest comfort that He could give to Martha on the death of her brother Lazarus. Then followed: "I am the Resurrection and the Life; he that believeth in Me, though he were dead, yet shall he live" (25). To the believer who is instructed in the Word, this has always been the only ground of his hope for time and for eternity. "Because I live, ye shall live also" (John xiv. 19). After the glorious statement of John xi. 25 which proclaims Him to be the I AM—Jehovah of the Old Testament—Who has the keys of death and the grave we come to the opposite extreme in verse thirty-five which is the shortest verse in the Bible. "Jesus wept." Here we have the sublime mystery of godliness—God manifest in the flesh. He Who was truly God was also truly human and only as such could He be the Redeemer of sinners.

(2) Resurrection and the Gospel.—In the fifteenth chapter of first Corinthians Paul gives the basis of the gospel that he preached "how that Christ died for our sins according to the Scriptures; and that He was buried, and that He rose again the third day according to the Scriptures" (3, 4) and in Rom. iv. 24, 25 he declares that the righteousness of God is "for us also, to whom it shall be imputed, if we believe on Him that raised up Jesus our Lord from the dead; Who was delivered for our offences and raised again for our justification". It is evident that the resurrection of Christ held a vital place in the gospel that the Apostle ministered. While it is important to stress the death of Christ as the one offering for sin—for "the wages of sin is death" (Rom. vi. 23)—yet this is only half the truth, for of what use would a dead Christ be as a Saviour? The pouring out of His precious blood on Calvary's Cross would be valueless apart from His present resurrection life.

> "I am He that liveth and was dead and behold I am alive for evermore" (Rev. i. 18).
> "Wherefore He is able also to save them to the uttermost (literally to all perfection or maturity) that come unto God by Him, seeing He ever liveth to make intercession for them" (Heb. vii. 25).

He has entered into heaven itself "now to appear in the presence of God for us" (Heb. ix. 24).

Many a gospel message has been spoiled and robbed of its power by omitting the great truth of resurrection. To multitudes of unbelieving people Jesus Christ is merely an historical figure Who walked this earth some 2000 years ago and is now dead, buried and finished. In testifying to the gospel of His grace we must present Him as a living Saviour, One Who is vitally interested in each person and One to Whom all shall one day give account (Rom. xiv. 10-12). In Rom. x. 9 the Apostle states "If thou shalt confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus and shalt believe in thine heart that God hath raised Him from the dead, thou shalt be saved". While we have no mention of Calvary here, it must be included, inasmuch as the lesser is included in the greater. It is possible to present the work on the cross without resurrection, but it is not possible to set forth the resurrection of Christ without implying all that was accomplished on the cross for sinners.

When we come to the types of atonement and cleansing in the Old Testament it is manifestly impossible for an animal to represent at one and the same time both the death and the resurrection of the Lord. Consequently we have two types in Lev. xiv. and xvi. to set forth this double truth. In the case of the cleansing of the leper two birds alive and clean were to be brought to the priest. One was to be killed and then we read:

> "As for the living bird, he shall take it, and the cedar word, and the scarlet, and the hyssop, and shall dip them and the living bird in the blood of the bird that was killed over the running water . . . . . and shall let the living bird loose into the open field" (Lev. xiv. 6, 7).

The living bird was identified with the slain one by being dipped in its blood, showing that it was two aspects of the same work, and then released alive, a picture of death and resurrection. The same truth is set forth in the sixteenth chapter of Leviticus describing the day of atonement. Aaron was commanded to take two goats, one of which was offered as a sin offering (9) and the other was let go alive into the wilderness.

The New Testament commentary on this chapter is found in Hebrews:

> "But Christ being come an high priest of good things to come . . . . . neither by the blood of goats and calves, but by His own blood He entered in once into the holy place, having obtained eternal redemption for us" (ix. 11, 12).

The fullness of His antitypical work is then summarized under three appearings:

He hath appeared to put away sin by the sacrifice of Himself (His atoning death) (Heb. ix. 26).
He now appears in the presence of God for us (His resurrection and ascension) (ix. 24).
He will appear the second time without sin unto salvation (His second advent and the hope of the believer) (ix. 28).

In our presentation of the redeeming work of Christ let us make sure that we present the full gospel of His grace and rejoice not only in His death as our substitute, but in the glorious fact of resurrection in that He ever lives to makes intercession for us.

(3) Resurrection and Promise.—We who are believers in the Lord Jesus Christ rejoice in the precious promises of God which are yea and amen in Him—but do we realize how much they owe to the truth of resurrection? It would be difficult to find a promise in the New Testament that has not this fundamental truth either directly associated with it or in the background. It is noteworthy that the first occurrence of the word promise occurs after the resurrection. "Behold, I send the promise of My Father upon you" (Luke xxiv. 49).

We see the outworking of Divine promises backed by resurrection power clearly exemplified in the life of Abraham. In Gen. xii. 1-3 and xv. 1-6, God made a promise to Abraham that through his seed He intended to bless the whole world. Now although the promises of God are sure, they are not necessarily put into operation straight away and this is where faith is exercised and the believer is disciplined in order that he may grow in grace and in the knowledge of the ways of the Lord. Abraham and Sarah had to wait until, humanly speaking, the fulfillment of the promise seemed impossible. During this time they had to learn that they were dealing with God "Who quickened the dead" (Rom. iv. 16, 17) and that resurrection power infinitely transcends all the limitations and the inability of the flesh.

> "And being not weak in faith, he considered not his own body now dead, when he was about an hundred years old, neither yet the deadness of Sarah's womb; he staggered not at the promise of God through unbelief; but was strong in faith, giving glory to God; and being fully persuaded that, what He had promised, He was able also to perform" (Rom. iv. 19-21).

Isaac, the child of promise, was a literal example of resurrection power in operation. Nor was this the last time in Abraham's life that he was to learn the exceeding greatness of this power. The climax of this man's experience came when at length he was asked by God to give back the son he had waited for so long, the one who had become so precious to him. The Epistle to the Hebrews makes it clear how the patriarch's faith was able to stand so severe a test:

> "By faith Abraham, when he was tried, offered up Isaac: and he that had received the promises offered up his only begotten son . . . . . accounting that God was able to raise him up, even from the dead; from whence also he received him in a figure" (xi. 17-19).

Abraham knew that the power that had conquered the deadness of his own body could bring his own son back to life and his implicit trust in resurrection power is seen in the narrative in Gen. xxii. 4, 5:

> "And Abraham said to his young men, Abide ye here with the ass; and I and the lad will go yonder and worship and come again to you."

and this in spite of the fact that he was intending to sacrifice his son. Now these things are written for our learning and encouragement. The power that conquers death and that wrought so wondrously for Abraham has not changed. It is indeed "to usward" who believe (Eph. i. 19, 20). As this age draws nearer to its end and the times grow darker with increasing difficulties and problems, the need for a practical experience of the inworking of this supreme power grows greater and greater. There is scarcely a child of God to-day who is not being tested in one direction or another and the only way that we can say with Paul that "in all these things (not exempt from them) we are more than conquerors" (Rom. viii. 37), is by drawing on the power of His resurrection (Phil. iii. 10) resident in our ascended Saviour and Head, by simple childlike faith. Then and only then, shall we be able to rise above the difficulties with which we are beset and live to glorify Him in our daily life and witness.

(4) Resurrection and Prophecy.—The promises made to Abraham in Gen. xii. & xv. are revelations of the Divine plan as regards the earth. This man's descendants were to be God's agents for worldwide blessing, with the consequences that the Old Testament from this point onwards is really a record of God's preparation of this people for the role they were to perform in His purpose and their reaction to His leading and guidance. The record is largely a sad one, for God's revelation is one thing, and human response often quite another. Israel's failure under the Judges and the Kings is black indeed, ending with seventy years' judgment in Babylon under Nebuchadnezzar. The restoration under Ezra and Nehemiah was only a partial recovery spiritually and when in the fullness of time their King came to them in the flesh, it was only a little flock who were ready to receive Him. The official verdict of the nation was "we will not have this man to reign over us" (Luke xix. 14) and they crucified their Saviour and their King. Such was the greatness of the Lord's mercy that, in spite of the enormity of their crime, He was ready to pardon their sin, and during the period covered by the Acts of the Apostles, His longsuffering again waited for their response to the Divine offer of restoration through Peter's lips in Acts iii. 19-26. The Lord's longsuffering waited in vain and His verdict on Israel at this particular time is found in Rom. x. 21, "all day long I have stretched forth My hands unto a disobedient and gainsaying people". Acts xxviii. sees the terrible warning of Isa. vi. 9, 10 at last fulfilled with its consequent blinded eyes, deaf ears and a non-understanding heart, a condition which has characterized the Jewish race all through this present dispensation. But is this the end of the story for Israel? There are some who would not hesitate to say that it is. Such would assert that the promises to Israel are fulfilled in a spiritual way through the Church. But do these people realize the consequences of what they teach? If this is so, then the "I wills" of Gen. xii. and xv. have been broken and this cuts at the very foundation of our own faith, for it means that God has broken His word and if this is true, what security have we as members of His Body, relying by faith on the same word? We would rather believe God than man, however eminent he may be. The Scriptures declare that the gifts and calling of God are without repentance (i.e. change of mind on His part, Rom. xi. 29). God has never varied His plan for world blessing through the Jew and not a single Scripture, taken in its context can be brought forward to substantiate the idea that the Church has taken over this prerogative of Israel. Moreover such teaching nullifies the truth of the Ministry of the New Covenant which Jer. xxxi. emphatically asserts belongs to Israel the nation, when at last they shall be given an understanding heart and shall be My people again (verses 32-36). Rom. xi. 27 alludes to this time and it is linked with the return of the Lord Jesus Who shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob (26). But before this can happen, we find that a representative number of the earthly people must return to their land, rebuild their temple and restore their sacrifices even though still in unbelief. As the dispensation of the Mystery closes, this movement amongst the Jews begins and Ezek. xxxvii. foretells this period. The people of Israel are likened to dry bones—withered and lifeless—and as Ezekiel prophesies, sinews and flesh come upon them and finally "breath came into them and they lived and stood upon their feet, an exceeding great army" (Ezek. xxxvii. 9, 10). It is the spirit of resurrection that animates them, for we read in verses 12-14:

> "Therefore prophesy and say unto them. Thus saith the Lord God; Behold, O my people, I will open your graves . . . . . and bring you into the land of Israel. And ye shall know that I am the Lord, when I have opened your graves, O My people and brought you up out of your graves, and shall put My spirit in you and ye shall live, and I shall place you in your own land: then shall ye know that I the Lord have spoken and performed it, saith the Lord."

The quickening of Israel is by resurrection power and whether we deal with individuals or with the chosen nation, we cannot get away from this fundamental fact.

The days that we live in are solemn indeed, but to the humble student of prophecy they are thrilling as well—for we can see the beginnings of Ezek. xxxvii. taking place under our own eyes. Something has happened to the Jew which has not been since the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus, namely they have acquired national status again in their land. The importance of this from a scriptural standpoint should be evident. There are stirrings amongst the dry bones now and while as yet they have no spiritual life, the time cannot be very far distant when the power of resurrection will begin to operate in them and they shall live.

Since Calvary there has been a converse action going on with regard to Jew and Gentile. During the Acts, as the chosen people sink deeper into unbelief and darkness, the Gentile comes more and more to the fore, till at last in this present dispensation, the Gentile is right in the forefront the Jew far off in unrepentance and hardness of heart. As the dispensation of the Mystery closes, the reverse takes place, the Jew comes back to the light and finally takes the place that God intended that he should, namely to be first amongst the nations. And here we get resurrection power operating again for Rom. xi. 15 declares "If the casting away of them be the reconciling of the world, what shall the receiving of them be, but life from the dead?" First of all Israel themselves experience the working of resurrection and then, in their turn, they become the means of resurrection life to a world sunk in sin, death and darkness.

Let us take heart as we see these things happening which not only confirm the truth of the Word of God, but assure us that the day cannot be far distant when our own hope shall be realized and the church of the One Body joined to its Head in glory and manifested there (Col. iii. 1-4).

No.3. pp. 194 - 197

(5) Resurrection and Hope.—When we consider the scriptural basis for life after death, or the hope of the believer, we reach a point where resurrection comes right to the forefront. With whatever company of the redeemed we are dealing, hope is clearly the realization of some promise of God or the fulfillment of a calling. The apostle Paul links the two together:

> "And now I stand and am judged for the hope of the promise of God unto our fathers" (Acts xxvi. 6).

To Israel after the flesh, the promises pertained in a special way (Rom. ix. 4). As we have stressed in previous articles, God has planned that Israel as a nation shall be a means of blessing to the whole world, and as such they shall be the premier nation.

> "The Lord shall make thee the head and not the tail; and thou shalt be above only and thou shalt not be beneath" (Deut. xxviii. 13).

While Israel forfeited any claim to such an exalted position by their sin and disobedience, yet under the new covenant of grace they will realize the fullness of God's purpose. At that time Isa. lxi. 5-9 shall be true of them:

> "And strangers shall stand and feed your flocks, and the sons of the alien shall be your plowmen and your vine dressers. But ye shall be called the Priests of the Lord; men > shall call you the ministers of our God, ye shall eat the riches of the Gentiles and in their glory shall ye boast yourselves . . . . . their seed shall be known among the Gentiles and their offspring among people: all that see them shall acknowledge them that they are the seed which the Lord hath blessed."

When all this has been accomplished for the earthly seed of Abraham and the Divine promise put into effect and become literally true, Israel will have realized their hope.

Coming to the Church of the One Body we find no future blessing in an earthly sphere, but a revelation of a mighty purpose to bless all such in the heavenlies far above all where the ascended Lord Jesus is now seated (Eph. ii. 4, 5). This favoured company has been "made meet to be partakers of the inheritance of the holiest of all in light" (Col. i. 12). Now we walk by faith, but when this has become literally true and we enter into our heavenly inheritance, our hope will have been realized. But we may ask, how will this hope and the hope of other callings be fulfilled? The scriptural answer is that there are only two ways: (1) for the living saints it will be the Lord's coming or the manifestation of His glory; (2) for those of the redeemed who have died, it will be resurrection. The Word of Truth knows no other way to glory, and hope that is based on anything else, however ancient, learned or sincere it may appear, will surely lead to deception and delusion. To substitute any other conception for the great truth of resurrection as the hope for children of God who have died, is to miss the way and to build on a foundation of sand.

Let us come to the ministry of the Lord Himself. We have seen that the Lord's greatest comfort to a sorrowing woman was to remind her that her brother would rise again (John xi. 23). What an opportunity the Saviour had for telling Martha that Lazarus was consciously in glory, if this had been the truth! And if that was so, was it an act of love that brought him back from the unutterable bliss of heaven to a world of sin, death and darkness? But we go further. In the sixth chapter of John's Gospel we have a record of the Lord's discourse to the multitudes who followed Him. He gave them precious truth and revealed Himself as the Bread of Life (35) and promised the believer that he should never hunger or thirst (35) and then added the following:

> "And this is the Father's will . . . . . that I should lose nothing but should raise it up again at the last day" (39).

Nor is this all, for verse forty continues:

> "And this is the will of Him that sent Me, that everyone which seeth the Son and believeth on Him, may have everlasting life, and I will raise him up at the last day."

And further on:

> "No man can come to Me except the Father which hath sent Me draw him: and I will raise him up at the last day" (44).
>
> "Whoso eateth My flesh and drinketh My blood, hath eternal life and I will raise him up at the last day" (54).

So we find that the Lord four times over emphasizes resurrection as the hope of the believer. To those who are pleased to remind us that we should return to the "teaching of Jesus" we are glad to say that we stand foursquare on this precious hope that He has given. But do they? To all such we would say—do you really believe what the Lord Jesus Christ taught here or have you substituted something other than the truth of resurrection for your hope? If so it is a vain one. But this is not all. We have been dealing with the hope for believers who have died. Does the Lord deal with hope from the standpoint of His children who are alive when He returns again? The answer is yes, He does. In John xiv. 3 we find the following:

> "And if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again and receive you unto myself, that where I am there ye may be also."

It is the believer's greatest joy to look forward by faith to the time when he will be with his Lord. How is that going to be accomplished? By death say multitudes of Christians; by My coming again, says the Lord Jesus. Which are we going to believe? When we come to the epistles we find the same truth. It is well to remember that I Thess. iv. was not written to give a dissertation on the doctrine of the Second Advent, but to comfort those whose loved ones had fallen asleep, that they should sorrow not as others who had no hope. The Lord would surely return "Then we which are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air: and so shall we ever be with the Lord (17). The word so is houtos meaning thus—or in this way. In this way (i.e. by the Lord's coming) shall believers be with the Lord and we have no right to substitute any other way. The Thessalonians were exhorted to comfort one another with these words and we look in vain for death or any other conception to be presented as a hope by the Apostle. Rather is he promulgating exactly the same truth as we have seen that the Lord Jesus proclaimed, namely that resurrection and His coming again was not only the true hope of the living Christian, but also the hope for those who had died. But, it will be objected, what about II Cor. v. 6 and Phil. i. 23? To begin with, we would emphasize that both these verses have contexts and if these are carefully considered, they only confirm what we have already stressed. II Cor. v. commences with the word 'For', reminding us that there should be no chapter break, but that the apostle is continuing the argument developed in chapter 4. Verse 14 reads 'Knowing that He which raised up the Lord Jesus shall raise up us also by Jesus, and shall present us with you'. So the presentation of the believer to the Lord is vitally linked with resurrection. Paul now refers to the earthly body as our 'earthly house' (1) and contrasts it with the resurrection body as 'our house which is from heaven' (2). But what about the time in between when this earthly house shall be dissolved (i.e. death) and we are clothed upon with our heavenly house? (i.e. resurrection). This can only refer to the death state and it is figuratively described as being 'naked' or 'unclothed' (3 and 4). Now the apostle definitely asserts that he did not desire to be unclothed (4) but He did desire to be clothed with the heavenly house (resurrection) and so avoid being 'naked'. In plain words—he did not look forward to the death state as a hope, but rather wished to avoid it. The eye of faith looked on to the glorious time of resurrection when mortality would be swallowed up of life (4) and this statement takes us to I Cor. xv. 54 'Death is swallowed up in victory', and when is that? 'When this corruptible shall have put on incorruption, and this mortal shall have put on immortality' (54) at the change in the 'twinkling of an eye' (52) and when the dead shall be 'raised in incorruption' (42). Again we are forced back to the great basis of resurrection for the dead and change for the living as being the true hope of the believer.

Coming to the crucial verses of II Cor. v., namely verses 6-8, we are now in a position to understand the apostle's meaning. "Therefore we are always confident, knowing that, whilst we are at home in the body, (i.e. our earthly house) we are absent from the Lord . . . . . we are confident, I say, and willing rather to be absent from the body (i.e. our earthly house) and to be present with the Lord (i.e. with our heavenly house of resurrection for as we have seen, Paul above all wished to avoid being naked—the unclothed state of death)." To misquote verse eight as 'absent from the body is to be present with the Lord' apart from resurrection is to reverse the apostle's meaning and comes perilously near to handling the Word of God deceitfully. It is nothing more than a flagrant (fragrant) example of making the Word of God fit the creed, instead of making the creed fit the Word.

[ERRATUM: for "fragrant" read "flagrant". - see p.220]

The great truth of resurrection has been the hope of believers from the earliest times. If we go back to the oldest book in the Bible we find Job stating that his hope was in a living Redeemer and 'though after my skin worms destroy this body, yet in my flesh shall I see God' (Job xix. 26). And so it always has been for the believer who fastens his faith to the Word of God rather than to the opinions of man.

No.4. pp. 214 - 217

(6) Resurrection and Prize.—We must now give a consideration to Phil. i. 21-23. Article XX of the Church of England states 'it is not lawful for the Church to ordain anything that is contrary to God's Word written, neither may it so expound one place of Scripture, that it be repugnant to another'. While we do not bind ourselves to the 39 articles, we do believe that the above quotation is according to the mind and will of God as it applies to the passages already referred to in the epistle to the Philippians. We have seen that the witness given by the Lord Jesus and the apostles constantly directs the mind to resurrection and the Second Advent as being the only hope for the redeemed. This being so, it would be strange, to say the least, if the apostle Paul in Philippians contradicted all that had been written before by himself and others and proceeded to teach that death was the hope of the believer, which immediately ushered him into the presence of the Lord. Yet this is the 'orthodox' view, and it does not seem to matter to those who hold it that they are interpreting Scripture as being repugnant to other passages. These must be swept aside, and the orthodox view kept at all costs. It is so 'comforting' we are told. However, we do not write for such, but for those who above all want Truth, whether this contradicts preconceived notions or not. All who follow this way will avoid wishful thinking and be content to base their views on the Word of God and not isolated passages torn from their contexts. It is well for us to remember that Phil. ii. 4 is one of the key thoughts of the epistle:

> "Look not every man on his own things, but every man also on the things of others."

In other words, unselfishness is the fruit of the Spirit which is stressed here. And in order to exemplify it, concrete examples are brought forward by the apostle. First of all that of the Lord Jesus Who thought not of Himself, but for our sakes left the glory that was His by right and stooped so low as to die the death of a criminal, that all who trust in Him should not die eternally. Next Timothy is cited, of whom Paul writes: "I have no man likeminded, who will naturally care for your state" (ii. 20). Then Epaphroditus: 'For the work of Christ he was nigh unto death, not regarding his life, to supply your lack of service towards me' (ii. 30). In chapter one the same spirit is manifest. The apostle, instead of bemoaning his lot in his Roman prison, declares that even this has turned out to the furtherance of the gospel (i. 12). And even if some were preaching Christ of envy and strife, the fact remained that the person of the Lord was coming to the forefront: 'What then? notwithstanding, every way, whether in pretence, or in truth, Christ is preached; and I therein do rejoice' (i. 18) and then follows verse 20 in which Paul declares 'so now also Christ shall be magnified in my body, whether it be by life, or by death'. All thought of self and self advancement has been laid aside by this great servant of the Lord. His one ambition was to put the Lord Jesus Christ first and to glorify Him. Even when Paul talks of departing and being with Christ or remaining in the flesh, he still unselfishly says that he knows he would continue with them for their furtherance and their joy of faith, not his own (verse 25).

What does he mean by departing and being with Christ? In spite of having taught that resurrection and the Lord's coming would unite the believer with his Lord—so (in this way) would he ever be with the Lord (I Thess. iv. 17), it would appear on the surface that here, the apostle of the Gentiles was contradicting this definite teaching, by asserting that death, without resurrection, was his hope. However this is not true if the whole epistle be studied and the remoter context be taken into consideration. In chapter 3 verse 10 we read:

> "That I may know Him, and the power of His resurrection, and the fellowship of His sufferings, being made conformable unto His death; if by any means I might attain unto the resurrection of the dead. Not as though I had already attained . . . . ."

On the surface this passage presents an insuperable difficulty. It would appear that Paul, although a saved man, was not sure of being raised from the dead if he should die, but he longed to attain to resurrection. If this is true then it strikes at the very root of all Christian hope, for if such a saint as the apostle was in doubt of resurrection, we may be sure that the average Christian of to-day stands very little chance of experiencing it. But this is impossible. Resurrection was part of orthodox Judaism. "I know that he shall rise again in the resurrection at the last day", said Martha, referring to her dead brother (John xi. 24). It was the Sadducees, the rationalists of that time who rejected this truth; 'the Sadducees which say that there is no resurrection' (Matt. xxii. 23).

The difficulty of Phil. iii. 11 lies in the English translation and not in the original Greek which reads 'that I might attain unto the out resurrection, that one which is out from dead ones'. The double emphasis on the preposition out (ek) makes this phrase unique in the New Testament.

We leave the human creeds to talk of one general resurrection. The Word of God teaches no such thing. 'As in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive: But every man in his own order (or rank)' (I Cor. xv. 22). There is a resurrection of believers which is their hope, for the gift of eternal life necessitates life from the dead. There is another resurrection which is out from the dead, leaving others behind, which is connected with personal worthiness and faithfulness in service. To this aspect of truth the Lord Jesus was referring when He said in Luke xx. 35:

> "But they which shall be accounted worthy to obtain that age and that resurrection which is out from dead ones (literally) neither marry nor are given in marriage."

This is a selective raising from the dead and must not be confused with the one that the Lord referred to in John vi. 40. The context there will show that personal worthiness does not enter in. Resurrection in this passage is the logical end to all who simply 'believe on Him' and receive eternal life.

We are now in a position to understand the apostle's desire in Phil. i. 23. He had a deep longing to be with the Lord in His exaltation in the heavenly places far above all (Eph. i. 20-23; ii. 5,6). The same deep longing is expressed in Phil. iii. 11 by the phrase 'if by any means I might attain'. He greatly desired to participate 'by any means' in this special 'out-resurrection' for he knew that only in this way could he be with Christ which is far better. Nothing that Paul writes in this epistle could contradict the definite teaching he had given in previous letters on this subject. It is merely wishful thinking that lifts Phil. i. 23 out of its context and the theme of the epistle in order to find some ground for its beliefs. What these people do not realize is that they glamorize death which is represented in Scripture as an enemy to the last, and they open the door to the Devil's deception in all its various manifestations such as Spiritism, Mariolatry, Reincarnation, Purgatory, all of which are variations of the old lie in Eden: 'thou shalt not surely die' (Gen. iii. 4).

Let us learn to distinguish between the resurrection which is connected with the hope of the believer apart from works, and the special out-resurrection which is linked with growth in grace, faithful service and if need be suffering in view of the 'prize of the high calling' (Phil. iii. 14). While the epistle to the Hebrews does not minister to the same calling as Philippians, yet it is evidently running along parallel lines. The writer urges his readers who were saved and 'partakers of the heavenly calling' (Heb. iii. 1) to go on to full growth (perfection, vi. 1). They were not to lay again foundation truths such as 'the doctrines of baptisms, and of laying on of hands, and of resurrection of the dead, and eternal judgment' (vi. 2). In chapter xi. we have examples of those who did this and learned not only what is meant to be saved by faith, but to live by faith (x. 38) and to suffer for Christ's sake. Like Moses, they had respect unto the recompense of reward (xi. 26). They even accepted torture—that they might obtain a better resurrection (xi. 35).

If God's Word assures us that one resurrection can be better than another, it surely behooves us all to search our own hearts whether we are qualifying for the inestimable privilege of attaining to the out-resurrection, out from among the dead (Phil. iii. 11). But whether it is as an introduction to our hope or our prize, resurrection is our Scriptural key that unlocks life after death. To miss this is to throw away or lose God's key, and there is nothing that can be a substitute for it. We can definitely state as a Scriptural axiom that there is no way out of the grave for a believer or unbeliever except by resurrection. We challenge anyone to find one Scripture that, when taken in its context, proves otherwise. Let us hold fast to the truth and have a hope that is based on the revelation of the Word of God, not on human opinion or tradition, lest we deceive ourselves and be ashamed before Him in that day when we shall see Him face to face.

(7) Resurrection and Service.—In considering the way in which the basic truth of resurrection enters into the plan and purpose of God, we should fail if we omitted to consider how it is woven into the present walk and witness of the believer. 'Saved to serve' is a good motto and one that expresses truth. The Church of this present dispensation is designated the Body of Christ and, just as in the human body there are no useless members, each one playing its necessary part in the health and activity of the body, so it should be in that redeemed company of which the Lord Jesus is the Head. The apostle Paul in Col. i. 9 prays that all such should be 'filled with a knowledge of His will in all wisdom and spiritual understanding'. This means that there is a practical outworking of Truth in divinely appointed service for every member of the Body. Merely to accumulate Scriptural knowledge is dangerous and unprofitable if it does not eventuate in a daily life and Christian witness in harmony with our high calling. We should never forget that the reception of light and truth brings a corresponding responsibility in the sight of the Lord to pass on to others what we have learned. This is the way the Body is going to grow and exhibit that wonderful unity that Eph. iv. 15,16 describes:

> "But speaking the truth in love, may grow up into Him in all things, which is the Head, even Christ, from Whom the whole body fitly joined together and compacted by that which every joint supplieth (or literally every joint of the supply) maketh increase of the body . . . . ."

The joints themselves, the individual members, supply nothing. That supply comes from the Head alone and the joints are merely channels to convey something of His fullness and truth to other members. Every time we receive light on the word, the sense of responsibility should never be absent, but should drive us to our knees to seek the Lord's guidance into practical avenues of 'working out' what He has graciously 'worked in'. At the very outset of his Christian life Paul realized this, for among his first recorded words after his conversion was the famous question, 'Lord, what wilt Thou have me to do?' (Acts ix. 6). With some, however, it is not so much that they do not know the Lord's will in service, but they shrink from what it will cost them or feel their inability to carry it out. We should face this issue squarely, and realize that creature strength is useless here. And yet how often have we all attempted the Lord's work in the power of the flesh and failed! Even the great Apostle was on the same level as the humblest believer when it came to power for service. Listen to his words in II Cor. iii. 5, 'Not that we are sufficient of ourselves to think anything as of ourselves; but our sufficiency is of God'.

We are inclined to invest Paul with superhuman qualities, so it is good to realize that he was a person of like limitations as ourselves. When he wrote to the Galatian believers he made a tremendous declaration in the twentieth verse of the second chapter, 'I have been crucified with Christ, nevertheless I live'.

How was this seeming paradox explained? If he was a crucified man he was dead, and yet he declares 'I am alive'. This being so, the resurrection power of the risen Christ must have been operating in his experience, so that he could say 'Christ liveth in me'. When later on he was writing his second letter to the Church at Corinth, he speaks of his experiences in Asia and declares he was 'pressed out of measure, above strength, insomuch that we despaired even of life: But we had the sentence of death in ourselves, that we should not trust in ourselves, but in God Which raiseth the dead, Who delivered us . . . . .' (II Cor. i. 8-10).

It was glorious resurrection power which overcame all the Apostle's limitations and enabled him to triumph in the midst of superhuman difficulties. In the eleventh chapter he is compelled to write of things about which he would rather have kept silent. His apostleship had been challenged and he had been compared unfavourably with the Twelve. He was forced to boast 'foolishly' in his sufferings and labours for the Lord Jesus Christ. And as we read verses 22-28, do we not feel a sense of shame and realize afresh how very little our Christian profession has cost us? Humanly speaking the long list of terrible experiences he endured for Christ's sake was beyond the strength of the human body to withstand. Yet he triumphed through them all to the glory of God. He knew in his experience the truth of the promise of Rom. viii. 11, 'He that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies by His spirit that dwelleth in you'. Again we see resurrection power in operation overcoming the failures and weaknesses of the human body, so that the believer is able to accomplish the Lord's will. This wondrous theme is further elaborated in the epistle to the Philippians. In chapter 4, verse 11, Paul states 'I have learned, in whatsoever state I am, therewith to be content'. Our English version is not strictly accurate. The Apostle did not say that he was content with every experience he passed through. The Greek word autarkes means independent and whatever extremes of circumstance that came his way, whether being abased or abounding, whether being full or hungry, whether having everything necessary or suffering need, he was independent of them all. How could this be? The next verse (12) shows the way. He tells us that he had been 'instructed'. Here the word is mueomai which is linked with musterion, giving the word mystery or secret. It has the thought behind it of being initiated into a secret. We are dealing now not with the secret concerning the church, but the secret of being able to triumph over all circumstances, trials, difficulties, and come through to the glory of God. This secret is fully made known in verse 13, 'I can do all things through Christ Who strengtheneth me'.

Note not some things, not just the things that we think we are capable of, but all things that the Lord in His wisdom and love may ask us to do for His sake. Have we not sometimes shrunk back from some aspect of service, because we felt utterly unable to accomplish it, or perhaps through some fear of the consequences such a work would bring? Here is the glorious answer. The ascended Lord Jesus is waiting and ready to strengthen us with resurrection might so that we can carry out all things to His glory. No wonder that in the first prayer of Ephesians recorded in chapter one we have the following:

> "That ye may know what is the exceeding greatness of His power to usward who believe, according to the working of His mighty power, which He wrought in Christ, when He raised Him from the dead, and seated Him at His own right hand in the heavenly places, far above all . . . . ." (19-21).

We live in an age of power. Man is wresting secrets from nature and getting to know more and more of the huge reserves of power inherent in matter and this to his own undoing. But however great atomic energy may be, there is one thing it cannot do, it cannot give life to a corpse or conquer death. Nothing less than resurrection power is sufficient for this tremendous task and we may be sure that the power that conquers the last enemy, death, is more than a match for any difficulties, dangers or tests that we may undergo in this life. Why then do we fail so often? The Apostle stresses that it is to 'usward who believe'. Is it not lack of trust, absence of appropriating faith in this almighty storehouse of energy, that is at the bottom of all our troubles? It is only when we rely moment by moment with childlike faith on resurrection power that we can say 'I can do all things'. We can understand now why Paul wrote in Phil. iii. 10 'that I may know Him, and the power of His resurrection'. This should be our aim too if our service is going to count at all in the practical working out of the truth of the Mystery.

As we look back on our findings in previous articles, we trust the reader has realized how the great and fundamental truth of resurrection enters into the warp and woof of the purpose of the ages. That which orthodoxy to all intents and purposes casts aside becomes the very basis of God's almighty plan to bring all things to perfection. Summing up we have found that:

(1) Resurrection is the basis of the gospel of God's grace.
"If thou shalt believe in thine heart that God hath raised Him from the dead, thou shalt be saved" (Rom. x. 6-9; I Cor. xv. 2-4, 14).

(2) Resurrection is behind the promises of God.
"Abraham . . . . . a father of many nations, before Him Whom he believed, even God, Who quickeneth the dead" (Rom. iv. 16-21; Heb. xi. 18, 19).

(3) Resurrection will accomplish the restoration of Israel and world blessing.
"O My people, I will open your graves, and cause you to come up out of your graves, and bring you into the land of Israel" (Ezek. xxxvii. 12-14).

"What shall the receiving of them (Israel) be, but life from the dead" (Rom. xi. 15).

(4) Resurrection, connected with the Lord's return, is the hope of the believer.

"Every one that seeth the Son, and believeth on Him, may have everlasting life: and I will raise him up at the last day" (John vi. 39, 40, 44, 54; xiv. 3; I Thess. iv. 13-18).

"Though after my skin worms destroy this body, yet in my flesh shall I see God" (Job xix. 25, 26).

(5) An out resurrection is revealed as the gate-way to the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus for the believer.

"If by any means I might attain unto the resurrection of the dead (literally, attain unto the out-resurrection out from among the dead" (Phil. iii. 11).

"Others were tortured, ... that they might obtain a better resurrection" (Heb. xi. 35).

(6) Resurrection power enables the believer to triumph over all circumstances and render acceptable service to the Lord.

"The exceeding greatness of His power to us-ward who believe, ... which He wrought in Christ when He raised Him from the dead" (Eph. i. 19-23).

"That I may know Him, and the power of His resurrection" (Phil. iii. 10).

What more can we say then? Here is the means by which we may each one become more than conquerors in our daily experience until that time when, with the Psalmist, we can say:

"I shall be satisfied, when I awake, with Thy likeness" (Psa. xvii. 15).

To the reader therefore we repeat, hold fast to the fundamental truth of resurrection. Let not tradition rob you of it, for in losing this you lose your all.

"If the dead rise not, then is not Christ raised . . . . . then they also which are fallen asleep in Christ ARE PERISHED" (I Cor. xv. 16-18).

These words, so full of suggestion and meaning for the believer, we hope to show belong to the eighth Psalm, and associate the Mystery of Christ (Eph. iii. 4) with Adam, the figure of Him that was to come (Rom. v. 14). Our enquiry relates particularly to the words that, in the A.V., stand at the head of Psalm ix. and read "Upon Muth-labben", words which have received a variety of interpretations. We will subdivide our material under a series of sub-headings, thus:

(1) The place that the words Muth-labben occupy.

The ordinary reader may express some surprise at this heading, for his Bible, whether he read the A.V. or the R.V. places it at the head of Psalm ix. We believe, however, that many of our readers (who evidently are not "ordinary readers"!) are already in possession of the findings of Dr. J. W. Thirtle, of which the following is a summary: He observed that in the third chapter of Habakkuk and Isa. xxxviii. 9-20, we have two complete Psalms. The Psalm falls under three heads: (1) The Superscription; (2) The Psalm itself; (3) The subscription thus:

> A Prayer of Habakkuk the prophet upon Shigionoth (iii. 1).
> The Psalm proper (iii. 2-19).
> To the chief singer on my stringed instrument (Neginoth) (iii. 19).

Applying this principle to the book of Psalms, we find that Psalm iii. has a superscription, but that the words of Hab. iii. 19, instead of being used as a subscription to the Psalm are transferred as a title of Psalm iv. These titles and subtitles are all restored to their true place in the "Companion Bible", Psalm viii, reading:

> A Psalm of David.
> The Psalm itself (verses 1-9).
> To the Chief Musician upon Muth-labben.

The words Upon Muth-labben being the subscription of Psalm viii., not superscription of Psalm ix.

(2) The meaning of the words of the subscription Upon Muth-labben.

The reader may not be conscious as he reads the words "upon Muth-labben" that it is already assumed without proof that the word "upon" is of necessity a true translation of the Hebrew word employed. Al standing alone is often translated "upon", but until we are sure that these two letters do stand alone, we are prejudicing the reader from the start. It seems that the Septuagint translators knew that AlMuth-labben came at the end of Psalm viii., for the word eis to telos "unto the end" are inserted. If the reader consults Young's "Analytical Concordance", he will find that the words Muth-labben are not translated “death of the champion” but “death of Ben, or of the Son”. Again, if he looks for the word labben in the Englishman’s Hebrew and Chaldee Lexicon, he will not find it, but he will find the term under the heading Ben “Son”. We cannot therefore endorse the statement that there is nothing about a “son” in either Psalm viii. or ix., for most readers will know that the word Ben “son” occurs in Psalm viii. Neither is it true that all are agreed that muth can only mean “death” for the LXX does not so translate the word, and these translators were nearer to the times of David than we are by over two thousand years. What the LXX saw in the words AlMuth-labben is made evident by their rendering huper ton kruphion ton huion “concerning the secrets of the Son”. There is another Psalm where the LXX uses these words huper ton kruphion “concerning the secrets” and that is at the foot of Psalm xlv., where the A.V. reads “Upon Alamoth”. Do these words strike any chord in the reader’s mind? Remembering that originally there was no division made between words, as now, let us put in English letters, the two subscriptions to these two Psalms.

The subscription to Psalm viii. reads AlMuth-labben.
The subscription to Psalm xlv. reads Alalamoth.

In both the Septuagint sees the word “secret”. How is this? Alalamoth is considered to mean “relating to the maidens”, the word almah being the Hebrew for a maiden.

At the close of Psalm xlviii., we have the words “unto death” which in the Hebrew reads Almuth, but which this translation divides into two, al “unto” muth “death”. The LXX however considered it to be one word almuth, eis ton aionas “for ever”, or “unto the ages”. The structure of Psalm xlviii., (see “Companion Bible”) places this passage in correspondence with verse 8. Here is another instance where the word almuth “secrets” has been wrongly divided to read al muth, “unto death”.

How does it comes about that the word almuth can mean either “maiden” or “secret” or “for ever”? The Hebrew root Alm means to hide or conceal, and gives us “secret” (Psa. xc. 8), “hide” (Psa. x. 1) and in the East in old time, a virgin (maiden, damsel or youth) was called almah because of the concealed or retired state of the unmarried of both sexes. “The virgins shut up in chambers” is an expression found in the Apocrypha. From this same root comes the word translated “age” and “ever”, being a period of time, whose end or duration is hidden from view. It will be seen therefore that the rendering “concerning the secrets of the Son” given by the LXX two centuries before Christ, has much in its favour.

(3) The internal evidence of Psalms viii. and xlv.

At first there does not appear to be any distinctive feature common to both Psalms, until we realize the way in which they are quoted in the epistle to the Hebrews.

Hebrews i. & ii.

A | i. 1, 2. God spoke once by the prophets. Now by His Son.
B | i. 2-14. The Son. His glories. Better than angels.

Quotation from Psalm xlv.

"Thy throne, O God, is for ever and ever."

A | ii. 1-4. God spoke once by angels. Now by the Lord.
B | ii. 5-18. The Son. His sufferings. Lower than angels.

Quotation from Psalm viii.

"What is man . . . . . or the Son of Man?"

With these evidences before us, we feel that the translations given "death to the champion" and "concerning maidens" must give place to the ancient interpretation "the secrets of the Son" and "concerning secrets", and we can read with richer and fuller understanding both the Psalms themselves and the quotations from them in Heb. i. and ii.

This subject is discussed at greater length in a series entitled "In Adam", but as this cannot be printed for several years, it was felt that the reader would value this rather condensed presentation of the subject, owing to its extreme importance in the matter of dispensational truth.

#8. "Not in any honour (save) to the satisfying of the flesh" (Col. ii. 23).

pp. 12 - 16

We have seen that the doctrine of demons, is in reality a doctrine of a mediation other than the Mediation of Christ, and that it is in complete harmony with the purpose of the apostle that in I Tim. ii. he should stress the fact that "there is one God, and one Mediator between God and men, the Man Christ Jesus", because in Chapter four, under the heading "The doctrine of demons", he was going to warn against the many "gods" and the many "mediators" who were "spirits" and not "men", whose evil teachings were to percolate into the doctrine of the church and so start the movement which was to end with the advent of the Man of Sin.

Just as the conflict of the Bible is a conflict between the Truth and the Lie, between Light and Darkness, between the Seed of the Woman and the Seed of the Serpent, so the conflict is headed up in two Mysteries, the Mystery of Godliness, where Christ is all and in all, and the Mystery of Iniquity, where Satan ascends the throne and the Son of Perdition sits in the place that none but Christ should occupy. The awful climax however is not reached by one great step, nor is it reached by immediate blasphemy or evident iniquity. Indeed it is all the other way. Those who give heed to the opening words of these seducing spirits will for the time appear to live upon a higher plane than their more grossly minded fellows. They will not marry, they will abstain from meats, no one can accuse such of self indulgence.

These prohibitions, like those of the second chapter of Colossians lead to a mere negative sanctity "touch not, taste not, handle not". Such self imposed self denial while having the appearance of extreme humility, can be the product of unholy conceit, a false modesty that conceals an overwhelming pride. It may not immediately appear how celibacy or a restricted diet can possibly lend themselves to an apostasy from the truth, but should such practices minister to a false superiority, there we shall have a fruitful seed-plot for the sowing of heresy. A comparison of the warning of Col. ii. with those of I Tim. iv., will illuminate the danger. Let us ponder these things with the aid of Scripture lest hearing the Serpent say "Ye shall be as gods knowing good and evil", we too should fall and fail of our high calling.

"Forbidding to marry." The three Synoptic Gospels record the saying of the Lord that in the resurrection there is neither marrying nor giving in marriage, a condition which makes them "like unto the angels", Luke adding the observation that it is the children of this world that marry and are given in marriage. Marriage therefore is a relationship that pertains to this world, and which is foreign both to the resurrection life and to those spirits called angels. It would be an easy step therefore in the conduct of an argument to show that the believer in Christ who is reckoned to have died and risen again in Him, and whose position in glory is even above that of angels and principalities, to conclude that a walk that is worthy of such a calling would lead to avoidance of so carnal a bond.

By the time John came to write his gospel, however, incipient Gnosticism had made its voice heard, and John omits the references to marrying already referred to, and instead emphasizes the fact that the Lord's opening miracle was at "a marriage" at Cana of Galilee. If Christ could thus grace with His presence the nuptials of two villagers, it becomes evident that to "forbid" to marry contains the seeds of anti-christian teaching. In intentional contrast with the demonic doctrine of celibacy the apostle enjoins even a second marriage upon young widows, associating the abstinence from such marrying with waxing wanton against Christ, having damnation, and having cast off their first faith (I Tim. v. 11, 12), this "first faith" being placed in intentional opposition to the tenets of I Tim. iv. 1-3. Moreover, in the third chapter of this same epistle and associated with the Mystery of Godliness, the apostle speaks of the offices of both bishops and deacons and stresses that both should be married and have children, not even permitting marriage and the avoidance of children, and associating these homely and familiar conditions with "holding the mystery of the faith in a pure conscience", with evident anticipation of the reference to the forbidding of marriage and the seared consciences of first Timothy, chapter four. It evidently became necessary for the apostle to write to the Hebrews that "marriage is honorable in all, and the bed undefiled" (Heb. xiii. 4). Marriage, like meats, is a part of the conditions of life while in this "body of our humiliation" and the intricate ceremonial of the Levitical laws of uncleanness that are associated with child birth and its necessary concomitants, could be used by these seducing spirits to create an aversion and cause a rebound to a false sanctity. While the seducing spirits lead their dupes on their vain quest for a superior sanctity that finds its roots only in the flesh, I Tim. iv. tells us the only real sanctity that avails before God is that which "is sanctified by the Word of God, and prayer".

Here we have the sanction of scripture intelligently and thankfully endorsed by the prayer and thanksgiving of the believer. He who has reached this blessed position is indeed proof against the enticement of a specious holiness, but those who do not see that sanctification, like justification, is in the first instance a gift in grace and can have no room for the flesh in any of its ways, are the ones most likely to be used as instruments in the hands of the father of lies.

It is a mistake to look upon the words "meats" in I Tim. iv. as being a reference to "flesh" and as distinct from a "non-flesh" diet. This has turned the eyes of many to Roman Catholic and Ritualistic practices and so prevented them from beholding the possibility of a beam being in their own eye. The word broma means in the first place any solid food as distinct from drink.

> "I have fed you with 'milk', and not with 'meat'." (I Cor. iii. 2).

The "meat" offering of the second of Leviticus is entirely devoid of "flesh", and the expression "Grace before meat" means the giving of thanks before partaking of any meal. The terms "sweetmeats" "greenmeat", &c., further indicate the range of the word. While therefore a super sanctity would naturally abstain from flesh as an article of diet, that is not the exclusive teaching of these seducing spirits. The hidden danger in the command to abstain at all contradicts the purpose of God, for these "meats" God hath created to be received with thanksgiving of them which believe and know the truth . . . . . it is sanctified by the Word of God and prayer. "It is sanctified." Here is true sanctity as contrasted with the false sanctity of abstention. In the Word of God we learn that at the first, the food of mankind was "every herb bearing seed . . . . . and every tree, in the which is the fruit of a tree yielding seed, to you it shall be for meat" (Gen. i. 29). As these words apply to the Garden planted by God before the curse came down on earth, there was no need to provide against poisonous and noxious plants, they did not exist. At the expulsion of man, he was under a necessity to eat bread in the sweat of his face. The earth would no longer yield "of itself" but required the labours of husbandry, and "bread" made from wheat, barley or rye became practically "the staff of life". After the flood, for reasons not state, but which are implied, flesh meat was added to human diet by Divine command,

> "even as the green herb have I given you all things" (Gen. ix. 3).

To abstain from flesh meat for humanitarian reasons, or for any feeling of superior sanctity is therefore to take a step in the direction of apostasy. Later, the apostle said:

> "All things are lawful for me, but all things are not expedient . . . . . Let no man seek his own, but every man another's wealth. Whatsoever is sold in the shambles, that eat, asking no question for conscience sake . . . . . whatsoever is set before you eat" (I Cor. x. 23-27).

The only abstinence commended is that which stoops to yield to the qualms of another's man's conscience (I Cor. x. 29). There may be genuine reasons why an individual should abstain from one form of food or another, because of weakness, sickness or other infirmity, but even this, justifiable as it may be, can easily become a "cult" and should be followed with care. How many books and tracts have unwittingly emphasized the abstinence inculcated in the fourth chapter of first Timothy in an endeavour to deepen the spiritual life! How few have emphasized the liberality and largeness of I Tim. vi. 17, "Trust . . . . . in the living God, Who giveth US RICHLY all things to ENJOY". It is a false sanctity that would rid the believer's vocabulary of these words and but feeds the vanity of self imposed humility.

Feeding of all kinds, like marriage, is an indication that we are still in the body of this humiliation. There is no warrant for believing that the spiritual body which will fit the believer for "heavenly place" in resurrection will be sustained in life by any sort of digestive process at all, but even so, though it be a reminder of our present humiliation, we must resist the temptation to a specious refinement that while apparently neglecting the body, yet ministers to the satisfying of the flesh, for this is a covert attack upon our completeness and our acceptance in Christ, even as the doctrines of demons was an attack upon His sole Mediation between God and men.

It must not be forgotten moreover that the word "hypocrite" meant "one who plays a part on a stage, a player, an actor". So hupekrithesan tragodoi means "tragedies were performed". Of course, in time the idea of playing a part, feigning, dissembling took on a sinister meaning, and the word hypocrite emerged. It should further be remembered that in the Greek plays the actor spoke through a mask, impersonating the character he was supposed to represent. It must further be understood, that in course of time, "good men" who died were promoted to the rank of demons or mediators, and "demons and heroes differed but in more or less antiquity; the more ancient heroes being called demons, and the younger demons, heroes" (Mede).

The prevalence of "saint-worship" in the Romish Church is one of the more modern ways in which demon mediation has usurped the place of Christ; but Spiritism is another, for the words "speaking lies in hypocrisy" could mean "speaking lies in a mask, as an impersonator or play actor".

The enlightened believer is neither likely to be deceived by the claims of some that dead "saints" act as mediators, nor to be ensnared by the Spiritists at their seances; but the Devil can pose as an angel of light and his ministers as ministers of righteousness. He can lead on to a false humility by giving undue prominence to an honoured minister of the Word, to a Church position, to anything and everything good in itself, so long as it comes between the believer and his Lord. In each and every case the remedy is "to hold the Head", to remember in the calling we have received that "Christ is all, and in all". We must not dwell unduly upon this opening phase of the apostasy that is to come, for the words "latter times" can well refer to those times that followed close upon the end of the apostolic age. The seeds were then sown that will bear their evil fruit in the perilous times with which the present dispensation ends and in the Mystery of Iniquity which will be manifested after the hope of the Church of the One Body has been realized.

There are warnings that belong to the close of the present dispensation that are found in the second epistle to Timothy. These have a bearing upon the time now present, and to these we must give heed.

#9. The Character of the "last days".

pp. 32 - 34

The apostasy of I Tim. iv. started early in the history of christendom, but the prophetic warning of II Tim. iii. refers to "the last days", the extreme verge, the days immediately before the end of the present dispensation and possibly to the days in which we live, or which are imminent. The one characteristic of these days here revealed, is that they are "perilous", a word we have examined in the fourth article of this series and one which is used of men possessed of "devils" or demons, and who were in consequence "exceeding fierce". The "last days" therefore will be "perilous" indeed. In the preparatory and incipient stages of this great and terrible apostasy, the bait was cleverly hidden beneath seductions to abstinence and self-denial; now, as the end approaches, this disguise is thrown away and the hideous character of the hidden plague is made manifest. Now "self" is prominent, and instead of a false humility, we have such words as

"boasters, proud . . . . . heady, highminded". Where first Timothy tells us that the doctrine of demons leads to "forbidding to marry", the present passage reveals that men will be "incontinent" and "without natural affection". Where the early departure was marked by a specious sanctity, in the last days no such pretence will be made, they will be "unholy".

The most marked characteristic of this departure however, is its relation to "love". The word philos (love) appears at the beginning and the close of this long and terrible list.

Men shall be Philautos (lovers of their own selves);
Philarguria (lovers of money);
Philedonos (lovers of pleasures); rather than Philotheos (lovers of God).

The warning against "the love of money" as a root of all evil, is sounded in I Tim. vi. 10 which, by coveting, some "have erred from the faith". In the parallel passage in Colossians, the apostle warns against "a vain deceitful philosophy" (Col. ii. 8), which introduces many features that are similar to those given in I Tim. iii. The epistles to Timothy and Titus are not without the corrective to this false and selfish love, as the following series of seven references will show. We have no knowledge of the exact chronological relationship of these two epistles but we place all the references in Titus first because of the greater number.

A | Titus i. 8. Lover of hospitality, philoxenos.
B | Titus i. 8. Lover of the good, philagathos.
C | Titus ii. 4. Lover of husband, philandros.
D | Titus ii. 4. Lover of children, philoteknos.
C | Titus iii. 4. Lover of mankind, philanthropia.
B | Titus iii. 15. Lover of those in the faith, phileo . . . en pistei.
A | I Tim. iii. 2. Lover of hospitality, philoxenos.

Is it accidental that the apostasy of I Tim. iv. is associated with forbidding marriage, and commanding to abstain from meats, and the antidote to the false love of the last days, should stress hospitality, husband and child, and link such homely love with the love that embraces "the good" and "the faith", and which reaches up to the majestic philanthropy of God Himself? The root of true doctrine thrives in the home life of the believer, and where the home is a place of light and love, the church will thrive, but when ever church going, church meetings, or that which can be comprised under the term "churchianity", takes the place of home there the rot sets in, and the root withers. Such will have exchanged "the mystery of godliness" (I Tim. iii. 16) for "the form of godliness" (II Tim. iii. 5). But the fact that a form is retained is an indication that professing believers are still before us.

In the first epistle to Timothy, the safeguard on either side of the mystery of godliness is expressed thus:

"If I tarry long" . . . . . Behave thyself in the house of God (I Tim. iii. 15).
The mystery of godliness (I Tim. iii. 16).
The apostasy (I Tim. iv. 1).
"Till I come" . . . . . Give attendance to reading (I Tim. iv. 13).

In II Timothy the corrective is the Inspired Word and its preaching. While Timothy is warned that "evil men and seducers shall wax worse and worse, deceiving, and being deceived", his own safeguard was to "continue" in the things he had learned and had been assured of, knowing of whom he had learned them remembering that all scripture was given by the inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, reproof, correction and instruction, and that he could only hope to stand against the swelling tide of apostasy by preaching "The Word".

"The time will come" (II Tim. iv. 3). Here is a resumption of the apostle's revelation concerning the last days. Men will not endure sound doctrine. The word translated "endure" anechomai, is a compound of the verb echo "to have", and the meaning of the apostle is well expressed in the colloquial expression in use to-day: they will have "have" it. The word means "to suffer" anything, or "to bear with" anything, and so indicates an intolerance of the truth. There are several compounds of echo "to have" in these three Pastoral epistles which should be considered together as they all have a bearing upon the attitude which different men will adopt at the time of the end. We have already learned that the initial departure from the truth started with "giving heed" (I Tim. iv. 1) and this word is prosecho. Over against this the apostle says "give attendance" to the reading of the Word, and uses prosecho again.

The Apostle had already warned Timothy against "giving heed" to fables, which were antagonistic to the dispensation which he had received from God (I Tim. i. 4) where once again prosecho is employed. A similar passage is that of Titus i. 14. These fables, added the Apostle, but "minister" or "occasion" questionings, and here the word used is parecho. The word "to abstain" in I Tim. iv. 3 is apecho. Over against this we have the "holding fast" the faithful Word (Titus i. 9) antechomai; and the advice to Timothy "take heed unto thyself and unto the doctrine" (I Tim. iv. 16) where epecho is found. The complete safeguarding of the truth and the only true means of stemming the apostasy and preserving the trust and truth of the mystery, is summed up in a passage where the apostle uses the simplest form of the word echo, "hold fast the form of sound words, which thou hast heard of me" (II Tim. i. 13). Here we have seven words, echo "to have or to hold" and six combinations of that word with prepositional affixes. The collection of this series must not be considered as an interesting trifle, it is supplying the English reader with something of the emphasis that the reader of the original gathered as he pondered the warning concerning "giving heed" with which the apostasy starts, and the "intolerance" with which it ends.

The passage "They heap to themselves teachers, having itching ears", could mean, to the English reader, that the teachers were the ones that had the itching ear, and this ambiguity is rectified in the R.V. Moffatt gives a vigorous and suggestive rendering of the passage:

> "Keep at it in season and out of season, refuting, checking and exhorting men; never lose patience with them, and never give up your teaching, for the time will come when people will decline to be taught sound doctrine and will accumulate teachers to suit themselves and tickle their own fancies; they will give up listening to the Truth and turn to myths" (II Tim. iv. 2-4).

The figure of the itching ears was known to Timothy, as it is found in Greek writers before the days of the apostle. It denotes among other things a desire for something pleasant at all costs, a shirking of responsibility and a shelving of troublesome truth. There well be no dearth apparently of teachers in the last days, who will satisfy this craving, and the main basis will be the opposite of the musterion (mystery), it will be the muthos (the myth or fable).

Modern civilization has made it necessary that all along the roads both in town and country there should be erected signs, warning and directing the traveler. Some of these signs are long distance warnings, e.g. telling a lorry driver that some miles ahead is a bridge only fifteen feet high, others are immediate and are at our very door? These warnings and signs may be used as symbols of the Signs of the Times. Long distance signs are those of Matt. xxiv., the movements now taking place in Palestine and among the Nations. The more immediate signs include the notice "Beware" found in Col. ii., and the warning concerning apostasy in I and II Timothy which we have had before our notice in these articles.

The testimony of The Berean Expositor is such that it cannot afford either the space or the time to elaborate those long distance signs that belong to the dispensation that will immediately follow the close of that of the mystery, but it does fall within our responsibility to draw the reader's most serious attention to the warnings that are found in Paul's later epistles, for such belong to our calling, to our peace and to our hope of reward.

Time and Place.

or

The scriptural association of chronology and topography with doctrine and purpose.

#11. The Genealogy from Shem to Abraham (Gen. xi.).

pp. 16 - 18

The computation of the chronology of the period from the creation of Adam to the birth of Noah is simple and straightforward; to arrive at a correct answer to the problem, nothing more than ability to add up a column of figures is necessary. But in Gen. xi. 10 we have the "generations of Shem", and there we read:

> "Shem was an hundred years old and begat Arphaxad two years after the flood."

With this statement begins one of a series of chronological problems that increase in difficulty as they succeed each other. These will be stated and met as we reach them, but the immediate problem is, how are we to fill the gap that we discover in the chronology from the birth of Noah to the birth of Arphaxad? We shall find that the answer is useful not only for its own sake but also because it shows us that all the material we need is to be found within the sacred record, if only we seek it.

This problem is a simple one: "What was the age of Noah at the birth of Shem?" This is a necessary piece of information because, without it, we have a link missing from the chronological chain that connects Adam with Christ. In Gen. v. 32 we read:

> And Noah was 500 years old: and Noah begat Shem, Ham and Japheth."

We must not assume that Shem is the firstborn because he is the first named, for Japheth is distinctly called his elder in Gen. x. 21. Likewise when we read:

> "And Terah lived seventy years, and begat Abram, Nahor and Haran" (Gen. xi. 26).

We shall discover that, though placed first, Abram was not the eldest. So also Isaac is put before Ishmael in I Chron. i. 28, which gives the Divine point of view, although, as a matter of historic fact, Ishmael was the elder of the two. The Scriptures are a record of redemption and purpose, and the redemptive purpose was vitally associated with the promise of the Messiah, it is men like Shem, Abram, Isaac, Jacob and David that are given prominence, while the firstborn according to the flesh are ignored or given second place.

The material in Genesis which gives us Noah's age at the birth of Shem is found in the compass of a few chapters. From Gen. vii. 6 we learn that Noah was 600 years old at the time of the flood and in Gen. xi. 10 we find that two years after the flood, Shem was 100 years old. We know therefore that Shem was 98 years old when the flood came, and when Noah was 600. That being so, we subtract 98 from 600 and arrive at the age of Noah when Shem was born, which was 502. We now have the missing link and can proceed with our chronology. It may help the reader if we set out this simple sum in plain figures.

In article No.6 (Volume XXXIV, p.189) of this series we showed that Noah was born in the year 1056. Let us continue from that point.

The Computation of the link between Noah and Arphaxad.

1056	Birth of Noah.
502	Age of Noah at the birth of Shem.
1558	Birth of Shem.
100	Age of Shem at the birth of Arphaxad (xi. 10).
1658	Birth of Arphaxad.

We have already demonstrated that Noah was in the ark for one whole year. We must not fall into error of adding the "two years after the flood", to the end of the flood, but reckon from its commencement, which we have seen was in 1656; to this we add the two years of Gen. xi. 10 and get the date 1658 as above. The way is now clear to proceed with Gen. xi. and establish the chronology from Shem to Terah.

The Chronology of the Postdiluvian Patriarchs.

1656	The Flood.
2	Add the two years of Gen. xi. 10.
1658	Arphaxad born.
35	Add age of Arphaxad at birth of Salah (xi. 12).
1693	Salah born.
30	Add age of Salah at birth of Eber (xi. 14).
1723	Eber born.
34	Add age of Eber at birth of Peleg (xi. 16).
1757	Peleg born.
30	Add age of Peleg at birth of Reu (xi. 18).
1787	Reu born.
32	Add age of Reu at birth of Serug (xi. 20).
1819	Serug born.
30	Add age of Serug at birth of Nahor (xi. 22).
1849	Nahor born.
29	Add age of Nahor at birth of Terah (xi. 24).
1878	Terah born.

Before completing the chronology to Abram we must examine the record. That Abram was not the eldest son of Terah is discoverable, with other relevant details, as follows: From Gen. xi. 32 we learn that Terah was 205 years old when he died. This would be the year 2083. By including the word "had" the rendering of the Authorized Version of Gen. xii. 1 is misleading. From Acts vii. 4 we learn that Abram left Haran at the death of his father, and from Gen. xii. 4 we find that Abram was 75 years of age. If Abram was 75 when his father died, and if his father was 205 at this death, if follows that Terah was 130 years old when Abram was born. We can therefore complete the chronology given above:

1878	Terah born.
130	Add age of Terah at birth of Abram (xi. 26-32, xii. 4).
2008	Abram born.

If the reader will glance at the list given previously it will be observed that the age of the Patriarchs at the birth of their firstborn sons is about 30 years but in the case of Terah we learn that he was 70 years old at the birth of his firstborn (Gen. xi. 26), and 130 years old at the birth of Abram. This accounts for the curious fact that Abram was only 10 years older than his half-niece Sarah, for Sarah married her father Haran's younger brother. Terah was probably married twice, for Abram told Abimelech,

> "She is the daughter (granddaughter) of my father, but not the daughter of my mother" (xx. 12).

Simple as this computation of the chronology of Terah to Abram may seem to us, now that it is set out, it was not clearly seen until published by Archbishop Ussher. This brings our chronology down to the great watershed of the Old Testament, for there are approximately 2,000 years from the creation to Abraham, and there are approximately 2,000 years from Abraham to Christ. This being the case we cannot but realize that it is with the experiences of the twelve tribes of Israel that the bulk of the Old Testament is concerned, commencing at Exodus.

The fact that the first 2,000 years of history is contained within the compass of eleven short chapters renders the enquiry as to who was Cain's wife, and similar questions, both foolish and unprofitable.

#12. Sichem, Moreh, Bethel and Hai (Gen. xii. 6-8).
pp. 136 - 138

In the first half of Genesis (i.-xi.) "time" takes precedence of "place", but with the opening of the story of Abraham, geography comes into its own, and makes as much demand upon time and thought as does the ever growing chain of time that binds Adam, Abraham and Christ together.

Gen. xii. not only speaks of the land of Canaan in general but speaks of places in particular, and the study of these places must be our concern. We read:

> "And Abram passed through the land into the place of Sichem, unto the plain of Moreh" (Gen. xii. 6).
>
> "And he removed from thence unto a mountain on the east of Bethel, and pitched his tent, having Bethel on the west, and Hai on the east" (Gen. xii. 8).

Sichem is the alternative spelling of Shechem a city which, at the distribution of the land to the twelve tribes, was allotted to Levi and became one of the six cities of refuge (Josh. xx. 7). Situated in the valley that lies between Mount Ebal and Mount Gerizim (Judges ix. 7) it fell within the territory of Ephraim (I Kings xii. 25). Shechem is thirty-four miles north of Jerusalem, and seven miles south of Samaria.

In the time of the Judges, Abimelech the usurper and type of Antichrist, made Shechem his capital (Judges ix. 6). In later times it became associated with the ten tribes, and it was here that Jeroboam conceived the idea of making the golden calves which he set up at Dan and Bethel which became "a sin". Its modern name Nablus is a corruption of Neapolis "New City", so named by the Romans. The New Testament name Sychar (John iv. 5) has been variously explained. It may be but the change that time works in the speech of men, but there is a possibility that it is a sort of nickname or by-word invented by the Jews, playing upon the Hebrew words sheker "falsehood", spoken of idols (Hab. ii. 18), and shikkor "drunkard' (Isa. xxviii. 1, 3), and the enmity between the Jews and the Samaritans would fully account for such imposition of an evil name. It is noteworthy that Stephen uses the ancient name (Acts vii. 16). Here Abraham first halted in the land of promise, and here subsequently Abimelech and Jeroboam set up their kingdom; Christ revealed Himself to the woman at the well as the long promised Messiah (John iv.).

It has been supposed that the statement of Gen. xii. 6, that Abram came unto the "place" of Sichem, that the town was not actually built at the time. Smith's Dictionary of the Bible gives passages which use the word "place" as equivalent to a city. Dr. W. Max Muller found the name Shechem in the "Travels of Mohar", where it reads "The mount of Sa-ka-ma" (Asien v. Europa, 394).

At the foot of Gerizim is a place called El'Amud (the column) and the Rev. George Williams has with much probability identified it with "the pillar of Shechem" where Abimelech was made king.

It is interesting to read that when Mahomet, on one of his journeys out of Arabia, was taken to look upon Damascus, he gazed, but turned away; "Man", said he, "can have but one Paradise, and mine is above". Abraham, we read in Heb. xi., though given the land of Canaan looked for a heavenly country. We can see how Lot was attracted by the plains of Sodom, and must not judge ancient Palestine by its barren crudity when "forsaken" for Israel's sin.

Before passing on to our next geographical term, we suggest that every reader take a map of Palestine and actually identify the "place of Sichem", observing the distance and probable route traveled by Abraham from Haran. Abraham came not only "unto the place of Sichem", but "unto the plain of Moreh" (Gen. xii. 6).

Elon "plain", however, means "oak" as well, and although we do not believe that we may to-day actually look upon the tree under which Abraham sat nearly 4,000 years ago, yet the presence still of ancient and giant oaks in this same spot, enables us to picture the patriarchal scene.

> "And the Lord appeared unto Abraham" (Gen. xii. 7).

Apart from the record of Gen. iii. 8 this is the first theophany, or manifestation of God, in scripture. It is associated with the promise of the "seed" and the "land" and the building of an "altar" (Gen. xii. 7), all of which pointed down the ages to the birth and death of Him Who should be named Immanuel, "God with us".

> "And he removed from thence unto a mountain on the east of Beth-el—and pitched his tent, having Beth-el on the west, and Hai on the east: and there he builded an altar unto the Lord, and called upon the name of the Lord" (Gen. xii. 8).

When Jacob left home for Padam-Aram and when he returned again he halted at Beth-el, following, not only the footsteps of Abraham, but also using a well-known route for travelers in his time. Like Sichem, Beth-el became identified with idolatry, and as it was with Shechem, there was a play upon the name, and it was called Beth-aven, the house of idols or vanity, instead of Beth-el, the house of God (Hosea iv. 15). The spelling Hai, for the city Ai, is because translators have incorporated the "H", which is the Hebrew article. Hai means "the heap" and its modern name Et Tell perpetuates the meaning.

We observe that Abraham did not enter either Beth-el or Hai, but occupied a mountain having Beth-el on one side and Hai on the other. When he returned to this same spot (xiii. 3, 4) after his sad lapse in Egypt and after his noble act of faith which resulted in his separation from Lot, it was from this mountain that Abraham saw, northward, southward, eastward and westward, the land promised him. Dean Stanley tells us there is at this spot, a conspicuous hill:

> "To the east there rises in the foreground the jagged range of the hills above Jericho; in the distance the dark wall of Moab; between them lies the wide valley of the Jordan, its course marked by the tract of forest in which its rushing stream is enveloped . . . . . To the south and the west the view commanded the bleak hills of Judaea . . . . . and in the far distance the southern range on whose slope is Hebron . . . . . Northward are the hills which divide Judaea from the rich plains of Samaria."

The reader is again urged to refer to a map and mark the places that Abraham surveyed, when first he looked upon the "land of promise".

After pitching his tent between Beth-el and Hai, Abraham moved South and entered Egypt. This, however, involves so much of interest that we must devote a separate article to this note of "place" that is associated with the father of the faithful.

#13. The Egypt of Abraham's Day (Gen. xii. 9-20).
pp. 153 - 155

> "And Abram journeyed, going on still toward the south. And there was a famine in the land: And Abram went down into Egypt to sojourn there; for the famine was grievous in the land" (9, 10).

"The South" (Heb. Negeb or Negev, see extract from Midnight Cry, Nov. 1951, at close of this article) towards which Abraham journeyed as he went on from Bethel presents no difficulty, for South any one must go who would leave Bethel for Egypt. When Abraham left Egypt however, on his return journey (xiii. 1-4), he must have traveled north, yet the scripture tells us that: "Abram went up out of Egypt . . . . . into the south . . . . . from the south even to Bethel."

It is really an ascent to leave Egypt for Palestine, and "went up" is literally correct. Seti I has left a record that he made "the ascent" to the country of the Amorites. The word "south" is Negeb, and while meaning in ordinary contexts just the south, was also the name of that portion of land that lies between the base of Palestine and the Dead Sea. In this same district later, Isaac dwelt (xxiv. 62). Here were the wells of Lahai-roi and Beersheba. More is being learnt of this district and we now pass on to the more important consideration of the earliest reference to the land of Egypt in the Bible. Egypt has left a fairly complete account of itself, and it will be of peculiar interest for us to note how far the narrative of the twelfth of Genesis accords with the record that Egypt has left.

> "Let it be remembered that Moses never saw that Egypt. It was separated from the time in which he wrote by more than four centuries. We are now in the year 1900 of the Christian era. A like interval would therefore, take us back, to say, 1470, when the Moors were still in Spain, and Louis XI filled the throne of France, when Edward IV reigned in England, and James the Third in Scotland. Most of us know something of our country's history, but how many of us could sit down and write the story of some > German or French pilgrim of that time, and give an accurate reflection of the period?" (Urquhart).

It is implied in the narrative of Gen. xii., that Egypt was open to strangers. Abraham has no apprehension about his acceptance, his only fears are related to himself as Sarah's husband. In later years the hatred of foreigners by the Egyptian, became proverbial, and Strabo and Diodorus Siculus tell us that Egypt shut itself off from strangers until over a thousand years after Abraham's day. When Abraham and his retinue presented themselves at the frontier of Egypt, their names, and number would be carefully recorded. In Papyrus Anastasi VI, we still possess the actual certificate of a similar company that entered Egypt during the reign of Meneptah, thought by some to be the Pharaoh of the Exodus. Speaking of the title of the king of Egypt, Pharaoh, which occurs for the first time in Gen. xii. 15, it would be perhaps a pardonable mistake for the average reader to make, that this title was universally acknowledged, and that the Scriptures merely record what all knew. This however is by no means the truth of the matter. The word Pharaoh means nothing in Hebrew, it is simply an Egyptian word put into Hebrew letters. No classical writer of antiquity uses the title, and not until M. de Rouge discovered the true pronunciation of the hieroglyph which occurred as a regular title of the Egyptian kings did the ancient "Pharaoh" come to light. Perao, or Pherao signifies "The Great House" and is parallel with the titles "The Sublime Porte" and Pontifex Maximus "The Great Bridge". Sargon, the King of Assyria B.C.718-715 (Isa. xx. 1) speaks of Pir'u sar mati Musri "Pharaoh, King of the land of Egypt", and Mr. Pinches reckoned that the Assyrian would pronounce Pir'u as Phero, which brings the word very close to the Hebrew form.

We return to our inquiry as to the accessibility of Egypt to strangers, and particularly to Semitic strangers, and we find a confirmation beyond our dreams. At Beni-hassan there is depicted a procession of a Semitic people, and archaeologists at first identified the picture with the sons of Jacob. The Lord of the tomb is Khnum-hotep, he stands staff in hand, and two scribes barefooted, approach, one bearing a tablet upon which is inscribed: "Sixth year of the reign of King Osortasa II; report of the Amu brought by the son of prince Khunm-hotep, bringing stibium from the barbarian Petti-shu; their number is thirty-seven." The second scribe has his name and office written: "The inspector of these, Khiti by name."

Here is a concise official document. Date, number and nationality of the visitors, their most important article of commerce, its origin, and the name of the inspector. It does not need much imagination to reconstruct the official report of the advent of Abraham and his family. We now come to the concern exhibited by Abraham about his wife.

> "It shall come to pass, when the Egyptians shall see thee, that they shall say, This is his wife; and they will kill me, but they will save thee alive" (Gen. xii. 12).

What Abraham feared, turned out only too true:

> "The princes also of Pharaoh saw her, and commended her before Pharaoh, and the woman was taken into Pharaoh's house" (Gen. xii. 15).

In the painting of the procession of the Amu in Beni-hassan, there are four women, and they all unveiled, the veil was not introduced into Egypt until later than Abraham's time.

The British Museum contains, perhaps, the oldest piece of fiction in existence, it is a papyrus and is called "The story of the two brothers". In it we read: "The Pharaoh of the time, acting on the advice of his counselors, sends two armies to fetch a beautiful woman by force, and then to murder her husband." In all this there is not the slightest hint that anyone considered the act of Pharaoh to be wrong. Indeed, as Erman says:

> "What can we say when an ancient sacred book, describing the life of the deceased Pharaoh's in bliss, assures him, with the addition of some words which we cannot understand, that in heaven he will at his pleasure take the wives away from their husbands?"

We say nothing here as to the sad backsliding of Abraham and his refuge of lies, but we do see that his fears were well grounded in fact. The British Museum contains another papyrus of the eleventh dynasty, Abraham's time being the twelfth, where the Pharaoh seizes a foreigner's wife and children, but orders so much bread and beer to be given daily to the husband. This has its parallel in the gifts made by Pharaoh to Abraham (xii. 16). Egypt plays an important part in the history of Israel and in the working out of the Divine programme. It will come before us again in the story of Joseph and in the book of Exodus. We shall then have opportunity of becoming more fully acquainted with the government of the land, and its religion.

The narrative of Abraham's first visit to Egypt has demonstrated the trustworthiness of the scriptures, and with this we must be content to leave the subject for the time being.

ISRAEL NEWS IN BRIEF.

Preparation has now been started by the Minister of Agriculture for ploughing the second half-million dunams (1250,000 acres) in the Southern Negev.

In a festive mood and impressive celebration, the people of the Negev marked the official opening of the central water pumping station for the Northern Negev. The station, located north-west of Beersheba, was built in eight months by recent immigrants from Yemen, under the direction of Swiss engineers and Israel water experts. The electrically-run pumps are Swiss-made. It is the first of four stations planned by the government at a cost of 2,000,000 Israel pounds, which will provide water to the whole of Northern Negev and irrigate about 100,000 dunams.—The American Zionist.

#14. The Chronology of the Hebrew Patriarchs Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Joseph (Gen. xii. - l.).

pp. 174 - 177

We have followed the chronology of the book of Genesis from Adam to Abraham, and have found it complete and consistent. We now take up the chronology of the second half of Genesis or the chronology of the Hebrew Patriarchs, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob and Joseph.

Picking up the thread from article No.11, we start with the date of Abram's birth 2008. It must be remembered that these dates are reckoned from Adam and not B.C.

2008	Abram born.
75	Add age of Abram at call of Gen. xii. 1.
2083	Call of Abram at death of Terah.

We now read on through chapters xii.-xv. before we meet a fresh chronological statement.

> "And Sarai Abram's wife, took Hagar her maid the Egyptian, after Abram had dwelt ten years in the land of Canaan" (xvi. 3).

This means that Abram was 85 years old when he married Hagar. One year after his marriage, Ishmael was born.

> "And Abram was fourscore and six years old when Hagar bare Ishmael to Abram" (xvi. 16).

Again we read chapters xvii.-xx. before we reach the next chronological item, the birth of Isaac.

> "And Abraham was an hundred when his son Isaac was born" (xxi. 5).

By subtracting Abraham's age 86 at the birth of Ishmael, from his age when Isaac was born we get 14 years. We can add a few links to the chain from these items.

2083	Call of Abram and death of Terah.
10	Add 10 years for Abram's marriage with Hagar.
2093	Abram, 85 years of age.
1	Add 1 year to birth of Ishmael (xvi. 16).
2094	Ishmael born.
14	Add 14 years to the birth of Isaac (xxi. 5).
2108	Isaac born.

The next link in the chain is only discovered by pondering a series of statement made elsewhere. First of all we must go back to the fifteenth chapter, where we read:

> "Know of a surety that thy seed shall be a stranger in a land that is not theirs, and shall serve them: and they shall afflict them four hundred years" (xv. 13).

The 430 years.

We learn from Exod. xii., and from Gal. iii.:

> "Now the sojourning of the children of Israel (who dwelt in Egypt) was 430 years" (Exod. xii. 40).
>
> "The covenant that was confirmed before of God in Christ, the law which was 430 years after, could not disannul" (Gal. iii. 17).

The 400 years.

We learn from Gen. xv., and from Acts vii.:

> "Thy seed shall be a stranger in a land that is not theirs (and shall serve them; and they shall afflict them) 400 years" (Gen. xv. 13).
>
> "His seed should sojourn in a strange land (and they should bring them into bondage and entreat them evil) 400 years" (Acts vii. 6).

Abraham is included with "the children of Israel" by a figure of speech, for he was a stranger and a sojourner also.

From Gal. iv. 30 we learn that Isaac became the "heir" at the weaning feast, when Ishmael mocked. If the Exodus was 430 years after the call (Gen. xii. 1) when he was 75 years old (verse 4), then the date of the Exodus, minus 400, which brings us to the age of Isaac when he was weaned. We can proceed.

2108	Isaac born. Abraham's 100 years old
5	Add 5 years at Isaac's weaning.
2113	Isaac weaned. Ishmael cast out.

We must now pause for another computation. Sarah was 90 years when Isaac was born (xvii. 17), and she died at the age of 127, (xxiii. 1). Therefore Isaac was 127 – 90 = 37 years of age at the death of Sarah. We can now continue:

2113	Isaac weaned. Ishmael cast out.
32	Add 32 to the 5 years at Isaac's weaning.
2145	Sarah died at the age of 127 years.
3	Add 3 years to the 37, as Isaac was 40 years.
2148	Isaac at his marriage with Rebekah.
20	Add 20 years to the birth of Esau and Jacob.
2168	Esau and Jacob born. Isaac 60.

Abraham's death is the next note, and Gen. xxv. 7 tells us that Abraham's age was 175 years, and xxvi. 34 gives Esau's age as 40 years at his marriage with Judith and Bashemath.

2168	Esau and Jacob born.
15	Add 15 years to death of Abraham.

2183	Abraham died at age of 175 years.
25	Add 25 years to the marriage of Esau.

2208	at the age of 40 (Esau).

The next computation demands a series of comparisons, and we must go to the record of Joseph for a while. When Joseph stood before Pharaoh he was 30 years old (xli. 46). He was therefore 37 at the end of the seven years plenty, and 39 at the end of two years of famine, when Jacob came down to Egypt (xlv. 6) we learn that Jacob himself was 130 years of age (xlvii. 9). If therefore Jacob was 130 when Joseph was 39, Jacob must have been 91 when Joseph was born. Then we learn that Jacob had served Laban 14 years when Joseph was born (xxx. 25). If we subtract from 91, the age of Jacob at the birth of Joseph, this 14 years, we reach the number 77 for the age of Jacob when he left home. We can now continue our genealogy.

2208	Esau married at the age of 40.
37	Add 37 years to the 40 to bring up the age of Jacob to 77.

2245	Jacob left home at age 77.
7	Add 7 years to the date of Jacob's marriage.

2252	Jacob aged 84 when he married.
7	Add 7 years to the birth of Joseph (xxx. 25, 26).

2259	Joseph born. Jacob 91 (verse 25).
6	Add 6 years, Jacob's return (xxxi. 41).

2265	He had been 20 years 7+7+6 from 2245.
24	Add to the 6 years, Joseph being 30 (xli. 46).

2289	Beginning of 7 years of plenty (verse 46).
7	The 7 years of plenty (47).

2296	Joseph aged 37 at the end of the 7 years.
2	Add 2 years of famine (xlv. 6).

2298	Joseph aged 39 (xlv. 6, xlvii. 9).
17	Add 17 years to the death of Jacob.

2315	Jacob was 147 when he died.
54	Add 54 years to the death of Joseph.

2369	Joseph was 110 years old at death (l. 26).

The Rev. Martin Anstey, B.D., M.A., to whom we are obviously indebted for the setting out of this chronology, remarks:

> "Each step in the progress of the chronology is clearly explained in the above table, and the 'proof' is given in the 'testimony' of the Scripture cited. These proof texts are the historical data with which the science of chronology is built up. The result arrived at is characterized by the accuracy and certainty of an exact science. It cannot be one year more. It cannot be one year less."

From the same monumental work we give the following diagram and argument for the details of the two periods of 400 and 430 years.

Periods.	The* 400 yrs.	The 430 *yrs.
From call, promise and covenant of Abraham to the marriage of Hagar.		10
From marriage of Hagar to birth of Ishmael.		1
From birth of Ishmael to birth of Isaac.		14
From birth of Isaac to his being weaned and becoming the seed at the casting out of Ishmael.		5
From the weaning of Isaac, to the going down into Egypt.	185	185
		215
From the going down into Egypt to the Exodus, to make up the 400 years of Gen. xv. 13 and the 430 years of Exod. xii. 40, 41.	215	215
	400	430

> "The method of fixing the date of the weaning of Isaac is strictly logical and mathematically exact. We begin with the call, promise, covenant or sojourning of Abraham, which took place immediately after the death of Terah, An.Hom.2083. There is the direct and positive testimony of the Hebrew Text for the fact that the period from that point to the Exodus was a period of 430 years; therefore the date of the Exodus must be 2083 + 430, An.Hom.2513. We have again the direct and positive testimony of the Hebrew Text for the fact that the SEED of Abraham should be strangers and sojourners for the period of 400 years. That period ended with the Exodus, An.Hom.2513. Therefore it began 2513 – 400 = 2113, and since Isaac was born An.Hom.2108, he was then 5 years old. But Isaac became the sole HEIR (with whom we may connect the word SEED) of Abraham on the day that he was weaned. On that day Abraham made him a great feast to celebrate the event. Ishmael was Abraham's heir no longer. Isaac had taken his place. He mocked, and was cast out."

#15. The Kings of Gen. xiv.
pp. 192 - 194

Although Sodom is the next geographical item that meets us in our reading of Genesis (xiii. 10), we will defer our examination of the geography of these cities of the plain until we reach the record of their destruction given in the nineteenth chapter. After the separation of Lot and Abraham, Lot pitched his tent towards Sodom, and Abraham removed his tent, and dwelt in "the plain" or among the "oaks" of Mamre, which in the days of Moses was known as Hebron. Fuller particulars are given of Hebron later on in the narrative, and so we pass of for our present study to the intensely interesting story of Gen. xiv. 1-4.

> "And it came to pass in the days of Amraphel King of Shinar, Arioch king of Ellasar, Chedorlaomer king of Elam, and Tidal king of nations; that these made war with Bera king of Sodom, and with Birsha king of Gomorrah, Shinab king of Admah, and Shemeber king of Zeboiim, and the king of Bela, which is Zoar.
>
> All these were joined together in the vale of Siddim, which is the salt sea. Twelve years they served Chedorlaomer, and in the thirteenth year they rebelled."

Here is a most explicit account, committing the Scriptures to a series of historical assertions, introducing names of kings and geographical terms, and, above all, taking for granted that Elam at the time of Abraham exercised dominion as far as Palestine.

Let us remember that Moses wrote the account of this battle some four hundred years after the event, yet the language is precise and the description that follows (verses 5-24) reads almost like the language of an eye-witness.

The Rationalistic critics made merry over this chapter of Genesis. It was rejected as being utterly unhistorical, because forsooth, there was no record outside of the Bible that Elam ever ruled as far as the land of Palestine. Grotefend, to whom Assyriology owes a debt because of his pioneer work in the decipherment of the cuneiform inscriptions, went to the extreme of explaining the four kings from the east as being the four seasons, and the five kings of the plain as the extra days which the Babylonians added to their twelve months to complete the year!

We turn from these sad "oppositions of science falsely so-called" to the simple evidence of the excavator and the archaeologist. The cuneiform inscriptions have brought to light facts that have completely stopped the mouth of adverse critics, and fully vindicated the integrity of the fourteenth chapter of Genesis.

Theophilus Pinches, in his article entitled "Babylonia and Elam Four Thousand Years Ago" says:

> "One of the important facts of the early history of Babylonia and Elam is that related by king Assur-bani-apli of Assyria, who tells us that 1532 or 1632 years before his time, Kudurnan Khundi, king of Elam, invaded Akkad or Babylonia, and carried off from Erech the image of the goddess Nana."

While the above testimony proves that Elam dominated Babylonia, we have yet to discover proof that Elam conquered Canaan. This too has been proved.

George smith found an inscription on a brick from Ur of the Chaldees, and this simple piece of hardened clay, says Urquhart, has stopped the mouths of the critics. It speaks of a king called Kudur-Mabug, and he is entitled the Father of the land of the Amorites or Palestine. He is also called Lord of Syria and of Elam. Yet the critics had boastfully said that Gen. xiv. had "not so much as one traditional event as its foundation"!

Now Kudur means "servant" in Elamitic and is reproduced in Chedor-laomer. A tablet has been discovered which speaks of Kudur-Lakhgumal, king of Ela(m). This name approaches very closely to the Hebrew of Chedorlaomer, and this Elamite king's name would mean "Servant of Lagamer", an Elamite god.

The next discovery was of supreme importance. Theophilus Pinches found a very mutilated tablet and was attracted by one name that stood out, which read "Tudkhula, son of Gazz". This would be Assyrian spelling of Tidal, the king mentioned in Gen. xiv. 1. Continuing his investigation he was delighted to find on this same tablet the names Eri-(E)aku which is equivalent to Arioch, and Kudur-lakmal, which looked like a variant of Chedorlaomer.

From other sources we learn that Eri-aku was associated with his father, and he received as his capital the city of Larsa, which has been identified with the Ellasar of Gen. xiv. 1. The "El" in the Hebrew name may be the Accadian al meaning city (Sayce). Amraphel, has been identified with Khammurabi, whose code of law stands in the British Museum, together with the copper head of his royal sceptre. Amraphel or Khammurabi stands for Ammirrabi-ilu "Khammurabi the god" (Dr. Lindl).

With regard to variants of spelling, Urquhart says:

> "It is as if it were contended that a piece of an old newspaper mentioning Wellington or Wellingtone, Bluchere and Napon, Emperor of the French did not refer to Wellington, Blucher and Napoleon I, at all."

Shinar (Gen. xiv. 1) has been identified with Sumer of the cuneiform inscriptions.

Dr. Scheil discovered in the Museum at Constantinople, letters written by Khammurabi (Amraphel) to his vassal of Larsa. In these letters mention is made of Kudur-Laghghamar the king of Elam.

Professor Sayce found the name of the Canaanite king "Shinab, king of Admah" on a cuneiform inscription.

Tiglath Pileser III speaks of Sanibu king of Ammon, and this is the same word in Assyrian, as Shinab is in Hebrew, and the name was thus perpetuated on the eastern side of Jordan. Light also has been shed on the title "King of nations". One of the tablets deciphered by Pinches state that Chedorlaomer "assembled the Umman-Manda" or nomad hordes, and the Hebrew goyyim or "nations" is the equivalent of the Babylon Umman-Manda; Tidal therefore being king of the nomad hordes which adjoined Elam on the north. We read that war was joined between these kings "in the vale of Siddim, which is the salt sea" (xiv. 3).

Its name has been an enigma to commentators, and numerous suggestions have been put forward. Tomlinson says that the word without the Hebrew vowel points reads Shedim, the gods of the Canaanite. This however is conjecture and we must leave the matter there. We shall have occasion to return to verse three when dealing with the fate of Sodom and the cities of the plain. In Gen. xiv. 5 there is a reference to the early inhabitants of Canaan, the Rephaim, Zuzim and Emim. These nations will be considered together when we come to the list given in xv. 19-21.

Let us see what we have learned regarding the trustworthiness of chapter fourteen as a true record of historic facts.

It would have been something to cause wonder and thanksgiving if one name only of these conflicting kings had been preserved in the inscriptions, but when we find no less than three on badly mutilated tablet, our consciousness of Divine providence is intensified. The critics made rare sport of the idea that Elam had ever extended its conquests to the borders of the land of Canaan, but once again the statement has been corroborated by the title "the Father of the land of the Amorites" given to Kudur-Mabug another King of Elam. "Not so much as one traditional event as a foundation" said the critic. The lie direct has been given by these "stones crying out". May we be grateful for the long array of witnesses that the overruling providence of God has stored in the earth against this day of departure from the Word.

#16. Sodom and Gomorrah (Gen. xix.).
pp. 217 - 219

It has been supposed that the consistent testimony of tradition for centuries testifies that the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah lie under the waters which form the Dead Sea. It is not wise to thrust aside ancient tradition simply because it is either "ancient" or "tradition", neither is it proper to accept any teaching however plausible, unless it harmonizes with the inspired Word of God.

"The Companion Bible" apprizes its reader of the falsity of this tradition, saying at Gen. xix. 25:

> "These cities are not in the Dead Sea, but their ruins have been discovered by M. de Saulcy (called to-day Kharbet-Goumran), about 4 miles square ("Journey round the Dead Sea", Vol. 2, pp. 42-46)."

The narrative of the Scripture shows Lot and his daughters dwelling in Zoar, which would have been impossible had the cities of the plain been engulfed, and moreover, archaeological research and Scriptural reference are at one as to the fate of these evil cities. Let us acquaint ourselves with the testimony of research both of that which is conducted within the sacred page, and that which is conducted in the land itself.

Here is a comment taken from Kitto's Encyclopaedia, which perpetuates an error concerning the site of these cities.

> "In the first place, we learn that the vale of Siddim, in which Sodom lay, was very fertile . . . . . next it appears that the vale was full of 'slime-pits'."

The error in this description is in the clause "in which Sodom lay". What Gen. xiv. 3 says is:

> "All those were joined together in the vale of Siddim, which is the Salt Sea."

This plainly reveals that the battlefield was subsequently submerged, but the battlefield is not the site of the cites, but was chosen to prevent Chedorlaoma's attack reaching those cities. We find upon examining the testimony of antiquity that there is no basis for the tradition that has been largely accepted regarding the submergence of the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah beneath the waters of the Dead Sea.

Here is the testimony of Strabo, a geographer, who visited the East, about a quarter of a century before Christ.

> "It is said that this country is burnt up by fire; evidences of this fire are traceable in certain baked and calcined mountains, in the direction of Masada; in deep rents and cliffs; in a soil like ashes; in rocks distilling pitch, and in rivers of boiling water, emitting from afar off a loathsome odour. Here and there, places formerly inhabited by man, are now confused masses of ruins. It is thus easy to put faith in the tradition universally believed throughout the country, that thirteen cities formerly existed there. We are even told that ruins still exist of the metropolis, Sodom, the circumference of which extends to about sixty stadia. Earthquakes, eruptions of subterraneous fires, warm, bituminous, and sulphurous waters are said to have caused this lake to overflow its original borders; rocks have been set on fire; and at the same time these cities were either swallowed up or deserted by as many of the inhabitants as were able to escape."

This testimony is confirmed by Tacitus, a Roman historian, and by Josephus, the Jewish historian who was a contemporary with the apostle Paul. Josephus says:

> "I think if the Romans had delayed punishing this wicked people, the town would have been either swallowed up in the abyss, or overwhelmed under the waters, or else that it would have been destroyed by the fire of heaven like the land of Sodom" (Wars of the Jews").

Here Josephus . . . . . "either . . . . . or . . . . . else" shows clearly that in his view Sodom was not "overwhelmed under the waters" The language of Deut. xxix. 21-23 also supposes that the blasted cities of the plain were open to Israel's inspection, even as Isaiah's statement:

> "As when the Lord overthrew Sodom and Gomorrah. It shall never be inhabited, neither shall it be dwelt in from generation to generation; neither shall the Arabian pitch tent there; neither shall the shepherds make their fold there" (Isa. xiii. 19-22).

Jeremiah also makes a similar comparison when referring to Edom (Jer. xlix. 17, 18).

M. de Saulcy has brought to light the truth of the Scripture record, and has discovered the ruins of these cities of the plain. De Saulcy describes the ruins which he investigated, and which the Arabs call Kharbet-Goumran, which he identified with the ruins of the Scriptural Gomorrah.

> "If this point be disputed—a controversy for which I am fully prepared—I beg my gainsayers will be so obliging as to tell me what city, unless it be one contemporaneous with Gomorrah, if not Gomorrah itself, can have existed on the shores of the Dead Sea at a more recent period."

These ruins have been visited by the eminent archaeologist, Clermont Ganneau, who undertook excavations there, and De Saulcy re-visited the ruins and wrote:

> "North of the Lake there is a mount, called by the Arabs, Gebel Sedoum 'Mount of Sodom', and below the mount, ruins called Kharbet Sedoum 'Ruins of Sodom'. The Arabic exactly represents the Hebrew name."

The Commander of the American Expedition to this locality made a thorough exploration of the stretch of water known as the Dead Sea, and said:

> "The bottom of this sea consists of two submerged plains, an elevated, and a depressed one; the former averaging thirteen, the latter about thirteen hundred feet below the surface."

This shallow southern portion "is a flat plain with the greater part of its area nearly level, a very few feet only below the surface" (Ant. The Salt Sea).

This is the submerged battlefield of Gen. xiv.

The valley of Siddim, we are told, was full of "slime pits" (Gen. xiv. 10). This same word chemar is used in Gen. xi. 3, "slime had they for mortar", and means "bitumen".

> "Chemar (masc.) bitumen or asphaltus, a glutinous matter issuing from the earth, which springs in a turbid effervescence near Babylon, also near the Dead Sea and at its bottom" (Davidson, Lexicon).

The ancient name of the Dead Sea was Lacus Asphaltites. The Arabs called it Birkit-Lut, or "The Lake of Lot". Its waters contain 25% of salts, of which 7% is common salt. On the west side of this Sea is a hill of rock salt named by the Arabs Hajar Usdam, or "The Stone of Sodom".

The presence of so much salt in the vicinity of Sodom, when taken together with the tremendous upheaval that took place at its destruction, reveals that the fate of Lot's wife "turned into a pillar of salt", to be no mere figure of speech.

The Hebrew word netsib, translated “pillar”, does not in any sense refer to a statue or image in human likeness. It is derived from natsab, which means “to be set, placed or appointed”, and the peculiar form netsib, occurs twelve times, and is rendered in the Authorized Version “pillar” once, “officer” twice and “garrison” nine times. The idea conveyed by the expression “a pillar of salt” is rather that of a mound, something fixed and standing sentinel. The fatal hesitation of Lot’s wife led her to be caught and overwhelmed by a mass of salt much as the inhabitants of Pompeii were overwhelmed and fixed by the overflowing lava and ashes of Mount Vesuvius. The Saviour has endorsed the record of Gen. xix. 26, by the pregnant words recorded by Luke, “Remember Lot’s wife” (xvii. 32).

The SECOND EPISTLE to TIMOTHY.

#25. "Vessels unto honour, or dishonour."

The will of the Lord exhibited with regard to the voluntary fellowship of His servant with those who hold evil doctrine (II Tim. ii. 20, 21).

pp. 74 - 78

After having spoken of a specious line of teaching, that was calculated to "overthrow the faith of some", the apostle turns to that which can never be overthrown, "the foundation of God". The translation found in the A.V. is not grammatically correct. It reads:

> "Nevertheless the foundation of God standeth sure" (II Tim. ii. 19).

The R.V. here reads correctly:

> "Howbeit the firm foundation of God standeth."

What is this "firm foundation?" In a previous article (No.20 of this series) we suggested there was a parallel between the teaching of II Tim. ii. 19-21 and I Cor. iii. 10-15. The space occupied by this comparison is small, but its value as a means of understanding the apostle's intention here, is great, therefore we have no hesitation in setting it out again.

I Cor. iii. and xv.	II Tim. ii.
The foundation (iii. 10, 11).	The foundation (19).
Gold, silver, wood, etc. (iii. 12).	Gold, silver, wood, etc. (20).
The trial, dokimazo (iii. 13).	The approval, dokimos (15).
Reward, or suffer loss (iii. 14, 15).	Show (paristemi) the judgment seat (15).
Work abides (iii. 13, 14).	Workman that need not be ashamed (15, 21).
He himself shall be saved (iii. 15).	The Lord knoweth them that are His (19).
Resurrection doubted (xv. 12).	Resurrection misplaced (18).

We are left in no doubt, in I Cor. iii., as to the foundation intended there, it is Christ, "for other foundation can no man lay". Neither should we have doubt when we read II Tim. ii. 19. Yet many wise and good men have entertained many varied ideas on this point. Perhaps the most insidious is that which confuses the foundation with the superstructure and, relying upon the A.V. of I Tim. iii. 15, speaks of the foundation as though it could be the Church. If we rest satisfied with the A.V. rendering of I Tim. iii. 15 we may be found among those who maintain that "the church is the pillar and ground of truth" but if we go beneath the surface we shall find sufficient evidence to revise such an idea. First of all, this Church of I Tim. iii. 15 is not conceived of as the spiritual, universal church, but is called "the house of God", concerning which Timothy was exhorted and instructed as to how he should behave himself when present in it, and this fifteenth verse is at the conclusion of a section entirely devoted to a local church, probably held in the house of a bishop (I Tim. iii. 1-5). Now it is unbelievable that such an assembly should ever be indicated as "the pillar and ground of truth". Nowhere in the whole range of N.T. teaching is such an idea to be found. If we ignore the punctuation of the English versions, recognize the fact that a change of theme is indicated in iii. 16, omit the article that has been added by the A.V., we shall arrive at the following:

> ". . . . . how thou oughtest to behave thyself in the house of God which is the church of the living God. A pillar and ground of the truth and confessedly great is the mystery of godliness" (I Tim. iii. 15, 16).

It is Christ Himself Who is the pillar and ground of the truth, even as He is the foundation of I Cor. iii. 10, 11 and of II Tim. ii. 19. This foundation is "firm" and "sure". There is no possibility of it ever failing. The only room for doubt is connected with the building erected by the believer, which building is likened to erections made of gold, silver, precious stones, wood, hay and stubble in I Corinthians; and by a change in the figure, the likeness is to that of gold, silver, wood and earthen vessels in II Tim. ii. Consequently our attention is directed in II Tim. ii. 19 not to the foundation, about which no doubt is entertained, but to the seal that is found upon it. There is an interesting note in Calmet's Dictionary which we transcribe:

> "Among the representations of seals collected by Mr. Taylor, is one from Tavernier, being that of the first minister of state of some oriental prince. The seal, in the original, is set on the back of the patent, no man daring to affix his seal on the same side as the King; and this Mr. Taylor thinks may give the true bearing of the apostle's expression (II Tim. ii. 19), The foundation of God standeth sure having this motto around the seal—this inscription 'The Lord knoweth them who are His'. And this inscription is on the enclosed, the folded, side of the patent, not visible to us: whereas, on the open side, the exposed part of the patent, is the counter-inscription 'Let all who name the name of Christ depart from iniquity'."

Here we have in the two inscriptions of this seal, the two great doctrines of Divine Sovereignty and human responsibility. We are encouraged as we realize that we are known to the Lord, but this fundamental truth is stated but not elaborated. In this passage the apostle is enforcing the necessity for those who know they were chosen before the overthrow of the world (Eph. i. 4), and whose calling goes back before the age times (II Tim. i. 9) to act accordingly and to realize that such a calling and such a choice necessitates there shall be no conscious compromise with iniquity, even though it mean the "shunning" and "avoiding" of believers by reason of their evil doctrine. The reader will find suggestion for much thought by observing that both sides of this seal of II Tim. ii. 19 are found in Numb. xvi.

> "The Lord will show who are His" (xvi. 5).
> "Depart I pray you, from the tents of these wicked men" (xvi. 26).

We may ask, In what way does II Tim. ii. resemble Numb. xvi.? We should remember that Korah objected to the possibility that some of Israel may have been called to higher glory and closer relationship to the Lord in their service, than others and we may perceive the trend of the apostle's thought if we read II Tim. ii. 20 as follows:

> "But in a great house (parallel with the whole congregation Numb. xvi. 3) there are not only vessels of gold and of silver (like the office of Moses and Aaron, and the Levites), but also of wood and of earth; and some to honour, and some to no honour."

There are those who object to the teaching which we discover in the Scriptures as to the high glory of the Church of the Mystery, and falsely ascribe pride to those who have meekly accepted overwhelming grace. There are those who, while they see the high and distinctive glory of the mystery, are moved to anger at the suggestion that there is such a thing as a "prize" to be won, but this is just what II Timothy so clearly teaches in the very passage which is before us.

> "But in a great house there are not only vessels of gold and of silver, but also of wood and of earth; and some to honour, and some to dishonour. If a man therefore purge himself from these, he shall be a vessel unto honour, sanctified, and meet for the Master's use, and prepared unto every good work."

"Every good work" is the goal. We are therefore dealing with service, not salvation. "Meet for the Master's use", suggests something personal, which thought is expressed in the words "a vessel unto honour". This vessel unto honour may be the subject of eternal decrees, but the apostle's immediate concern is with the personal and private reaction of the individual servant of the Lord to the evils that surround him in his attempt to serve acceptably. "If a man therefore purge himself from these, he shall be a vessel unto honour." We therefore discover there are two classes of vessels, "some to honour and some to dishonour", and these are differentiated as "vessels of gold and silver", and "vessels of wood and of earth". We must therefore not load the passage with doctrine that may be in itself true, but which forms no part of the apostle's teaching here. Paul is primarily concerned for his son Timothy and his loyalty to the Lord Whom he served, and just as the apostle himself had finished his course, kept the faith, and was assured that he had proved himself to be a vessel unto honour, so he earnestly desired this for Timothy, and for all who should in after days believe and minister the same precious truth. The play upon Timothy's name would have been irresistible with a man like Paul. Many times during their earlier converse Paul must have reminded Timothy that his name meant, either "one who honours God" or "one who is honoured by God". Which double meaning implies no contradiction, for the Lord had said "Them that honour Me, I will honour". While the word atimia "dishonour" can mean most positive disgrace such as "vile" affections (Rom. i. 26) there is no reason to believe that the apostle, in II Tim. ii. 20, intended vessels for vile purposes, but alluded to the fact, true of any "great house", that there would be found therein "vessels of gold and of silver", vessels that were precious and personal to the Master of the house, and "vessels of wood and of earth", the pots and the pans of the kitchen and scullery, that, though they had their work to perform, were not personal or precious to the Master, and in most cases practically unknown to him.

In all our service we should aspire to this "honour" of being "meet for the Master's use". Now this dignity is not reserved for the clever or the gifted, but for those who out of a love for truth and out of loyalty to the Lord "shun" and "avoid" those doctrines that are not according to godliness, and who "turn away" from those who like Hymenæus, Philetus, Jannes and Jambres, err concerning the truth and overthrow the faith of some. It is not possible to make distinction between the evil doctrine taught and the teacher, we cannot repudiate the doctrine and retain fellowship with the teacher, and so the apostle says:

> "If a man therefore purge himself from these."

The "purging" is personal and thorough. It is personal, the apostle does not say that we have to attempt to purge another, we have to purge ourselves. The word occurs in only one other place, namely in I Cor. v. 7:

> "Purge out therefore the old leaven."

and Timothy having been brought up with a Jewish mother and grandmother, would remember very vividly the scrupulous care with which every crumb of leaven and bread was sought and put out at the Passover season, and the change of figure here would not prevent him from sensing the same application. He would also remember the exhortation of the prophet:

> "Depart ye, depart ye, go ye out from thence, touch no unclean thing; go ye out of the midst of her; be ye clean, that bear the vessels of the Lord" (Isa. lii. 11).

and would find no difficulty in transferring the thought of cleanliness from those that bore the vessels, to the vessels themselves. This attitude towards iniquity and evil doctrine, the apostle sums up in the one word "sanctified". This word can mean that state of holiness which is the glorious destiny of the redeemed (Eph. v. 26); or it may mean some special "setting apart" as "the blood of the covenant wherewith He was sanctified" (Heb. x. 29), for Christ Who was "holy" was not made "holy" by the shedding of His Own blood. This wider meaning is seen in I Tim. iv. 5, where, speaking of the question of food, the apostle says:

> "It is sanctified by the word of God and prayer."

So in II Tim. ii. 21 the sanctification there uppermost is the idea of separation or setting apart for any particular purpose; in this instance, set apart particularly for the Master's use. We must not ignore, however, that hegiasmenon and hetoimasmenon are perfect participles, and should be rendered "having been sanctified" and "having been prepared". This would lead us to see that, the "purging of self", the "shunning" and the "avoiding" that was enjoined upon Timothy, was but the "perfecting of holiness", the carrying of one's sanctification to its logical conclusion. This one can see most clearly set out in II Cor. vi. 14 and vii. 1, where the separation of the believer there enjoined is said to be but the taking of holiness to its logical conclusion ("perfecting" does not mean "improving" but "finishing" or taking anything to its "goal").

These believers had been prepared unto every good work, as we can see in Eph. ii. 10, where the words "before ordained" are the translation of proetoimasen, this is the one side of the seal, "The Lord knoweth them that are His". They are exhorted to act according to this high calling, and the response that is expected in II Tim. ii. 20, 21 is in harmony with the other side of the seal "Let every one that nameth the name of Christ depart from iniquity". While we must not limit the title believer, brother, Christian or fellow member, to those whose doctrine commends itself to our judgment, we must limit our fellowship, as servants of the Lord in active fellowship with other servants of the Lord, to those whose doctrine is according to the pattern given by the apostle Paul. We have been obliged to refuse space in our pages to those whose Christianity we do not doubt, but who by reason of some doctrine which they advocate, make it a matter of faithfulness on our part to avoid them in their capacity as servants. This attitude is always liable to misunderstanding, and those whose fellowship is refused are always likely to resent the "Pharisaic" attitude adopted. This is part of the price we must pay. "Purging ourselves" will not be a pleasant process but if it pleases the only One Who has the right to be called "Master", if we ever and only seek to show ourselves "approved unto God" we shall not only be "prepared unto every good work" but shall not be ashamed of our work in that day, for not only shall we have "rightly divided the Word of truth" but we shall have also "rightly divided" in connection with our service, and be not only "unashamed" but "honoured" with the only honour that is worthy of the name.

#26. Characteristics of the Lord's servant, especially in association with opposition (ii. 22 - 26).
pp. 89 - 92

Separation from doctrinal error is most important, but separation because of doctrine without a corresponding separation in heart and life, even though the doctrinal separation be true, must in itself be false and breed a Pharisaic spirit. The Apostle who knew this fact only too well, follows his exhortation to Timothy to separate himself from those vessels which were not unto honour, by adding immediately:

> "Flee also youthful lusts" (II Tim. ii. 22).

The word "lust" when used by itself generally denotes sensuality and if there were no context to the exhortation addressed to Timothy, we should be obliged, however reluctantly, to reckon that Timothy, being a man of like passions as ourselves and a young man in a prominent position often having to deal very intimately with members of the other sex, the Apostle felt it incumbent upon him to utter this warning. Before attempting a conclusion, however, we should acquaint ourselves with two essential facts: the way in which epithumia (lust) is translated in other passages, and the general bearing of the immediate context. While epithumia is usually translated "lust" there is a secondary and milder meaning, as may be seen in the following list.

> "The lusts of other things" (Mark. iv. 19).
> "With desire have I desired to eat this passover" (Luke xxii. 15).
> "Having a desire to depart" (Phil. i. 23).
> "After their own lusts shall they heap unto themselves teachers" (II Tim. iv. 3).

We can understand that "intense desire" can well be the meaning of the Saviour's desire in Luke xxii. 15 and that of His apostle in Phil. i. 23; and a moment's thought will convince us that the "lust" of those who heap up "teachers", has no reference to impurity of life. This therefore brings us back to II Tim. ii. 22, prepared to interpret the apostle's meaning not so much with reference to the possibilities of a lapse from personal purity, but in connection with "those vehement, impetuous and headstrong passions" that so often mar earnest contention for the faith; passions that are by no means absent from those of mature years, but very closely associated with youth in a position of trust. The context also influences the shade of meaning which we must attach to epithumia. The verb epithumeo moreover is used in a good sense in the statement that if a man seeks the office of a bishop "he desireth a good work". This shows that the "lust" against which Timothy was warned, could easily comprehend "desiring" office, which in itself be good. When we look at the alternatives that follow in II Tim. ii. 22-25 we fail to discover the alternatives to sensual impurity, but instead we find the characteristics of the true leader and teacher.

> "But follow righteousness, faith, charity, peace with them that call on the name of the Lord out of a pure heart."

The word translated "follow" is a word very much like the one translated "lust", in that it can have both a bad and a good meaning. Dioko occurs in I Tim. vi. 11 in a good sense, and in II Tim. iii. 12 in a bad sense.

> ". . . . . But thou O man of God flee these things (the love of money, &c.); and follow after righteousness, godliness, faith, love patience, meekness. Fight the good fight of faith" (I Tim. vi. 11, 12).

Here the word is used in a good sense and the context also throws light upon the parallel passage in II Tim. ii. 22, 25. An example of the bad sense of the word dioko is found in II Tim. iii.:

> "Yea, and all that will live godly in Christ Jesus shall suffer persecution" (II Tim. iii. 12).

Here the word is translated "shall suffer persecution". The context of this reference has to do with purity of doctrine also, and not with purity of mind and body. We should be sorry to be misunderstood however in this endeavour to see just exactly what the Apostle meant by his reference to "youthful lusts". Even though it be established that the Apostle referred to passions that operated within the circle of service and public office, he himself insisted throughout his teaching that purity of mind and body were the necessary accompaniments of soundness in doctrine.

Continuing our examination of the context, we read on:

> "But foolish and unlearned questions avoid, knowing that they do gender strifes" (II Tim. ii. 23).

Here, once more, we have an atmosphere of debate and strife associated with doctrine and its interpretation. The word apaideutos, translated "unlearned", does not suggests that only "learned" folk were permitted to raise a question, but rather does it refer to "undisciplined" questions flung out at random that were far more likely to gender strife than to edify.

> "And the servant of the Lord must not strive" (II Tim. ii. 24).

It would be easy to point to passages which appear to contradict this prohibition. In this same chapter we read:

> "If a man also strive for the masteries, yet is he not crowned, except he strive lawfully" (II Tim. ii. 5).

We could refer to Phil. i. 27, Col. i. 29 or to Heb. xii. 4 for further sanctions—but, of course, we already suspect that the Apostle uses two or more very distinct words. The striving that is forbidden is machomai which means to fight in war or in battle, and is cognate with machaira a sword, and is found in combination with logos in II Tim. ii. 14, where it is translated "strive about words". The striving that is commended is either agonizomai "to compete in a contest" as in II Tim. iv. 7 and Col. i. 29, or athleo "to contend in public games as an athlete" as in II Tim. ii. 5. The word translated "must" is dei, an impersonal verb that means "it needs be, it is necessary", very much like the French il faut. It is translated "was meet" in Rom. i. 27, and, with the negative, can be translated in II Timothy ii. 24: "It is not meet that the servant of the Lord should strive."

The contrast with this "striving" is set out in the remainder of the verse and in the first half of the verse that follows.

> "But be gentle unto all men, apt to teach, patient, in meekness instructing those that oppose themselves" (II Tim. ii. 24, 25).

Here are some of the characteristics of the true teacher:

"Gentle" epion, occurs nowhere else in the New Testament except in I Thess. ii. 7 where its association with a "nursing mother nursing her own children" illustrates the inner meaning of this wonderful word. The learned lexicographer Damn derives it from epo "to follow", as denoting one who readily follows the desire or will of another. It is blessedly possible to be gentle and inflexible at the same time, but it needs abundant grace.

"Apt to teach" didaktikos. This word occurs in I Tim. iii. 2 where the qualifications of a bishop are stated. In II Tim. ii. 2 where the Authorized Version gives the same rendering, the original is in the nature of an expansion of didaktikos, being hikanoi esontai kai heterous didaxi "who shall be sufficient to teach others also". This word hikanos gives us such passages as "not that we are sufficient of ourselves . . . . . but our sufficiency is of God, Who also hath made us able ministers" (II Cor. iii. 5, 6).

"Patient" anexikakos. This is not the word usually translated patient and patience. It is a compound of two words, one from anechomai "to bear" and kakos "evil".

"In meekness instructing those that oppose themselves." "Meekness" praotes is one of the fruits of the Spirit (Gal. v. 23) and should characterize all who deal with those who have been overtaken in a fault, considering themselves, lest they also be tempted (Gal. vi. 1). It is enjoined in each of the pastoral epistles, I Tim. vi. 11, II Tim. ii. 25 and Titus iii. 2. It was the blessed characteristic of Christ Who invited His disciples "to learn" of Him. It is the common mistake of the man of the world that "meekness" and "weakness" are one and the same, it is our responsibility to disillusion such when occasion offers. The word "instructing" is used with a negative in the reference to "unlearned" questions in II Tim. ii. 23.

"Those that oppose themselves" antidiatithemenos. There seems to be an intended distinction between these opposers, and those of II Tim. iii. 8, who "resist" the truth, where the Greek word is anthistemi, for in the former case, Timothy is to endeavour to lead them to an acknowledgment of the truth (II Tim. ii. 25), whereas those of II Tim. iii. 8, though ever learning, will never be able to come to an acknowledgment of the truth. Only grace, and close fellowship with the Lord can enable any servant of the Lord to discern between these two classes of opposition. When the servant of the Lord is faced by opposition; when his whole being rebels against gross misrepresentation; when he is tempted to "strive"; when he finds it difficult to bear up under evil; there is great encouragement in looking to the goal that is in view. These opposers are in the devil's snare (II Tim. ii. 26), and that snare is only possible while error is entertained instead of truth. It is true for all time "Ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free". These opposers may be "kings" and men in "authority", and even such may "come to the knowledge of the truth" (I Tim. ii. 2, 4).

Repentance, which occupies so large a place in the gospel of the kingdom, is never used by Paul in the presentation of the gospel. Metanoia and metanoeo mean "a change of mind", and this change of mind towards the truth of God means deliverance. This snare of the devil is referred to in I Tim. iii. 7, where the context speaks of the pitfalls awaiting the "novice" who being lifted up with pride "falls into the snare (pagida) of the devil". In I Tim. vi. 9 we read of one of the baits that the devil uses for this snare,

> "They that will to be rich fall into temptation and a snare."

It would appear, therefore, that this snare of the devil is threefold. It is especially laid up for the novice in his pride; it is baited with discontent and love of money; and there can be no deliverance apart from repentance and the acknowledging of the truth. This brings us to the close of another great section of this epistle, and marks the central item of the structure.

#27. Love and the Lapse of the Last Days (iii. 1 - 4).
pp. 113 - 117

The reader of the Scriptures would do well to remember that in many instances the subdivision of chapter and verse does not always follow the true structural division of the passage. In II Timothy, with its four chapters, there is not so much room to go wrong; and with the end of chapter ii., we reach the close of the first half of the epistle. We have approached the centre of the epistle by a series of four steps: (1) Salutation, (2) Forsaken, (3) the Crown, (4) Approved. From this point these four phases of the truth are expounded and expanded in reverse order, (4) Disapproved, (3) the Crown, (2) Forsaken, and (1) Salutation. This has already been shown in the opening articles of the series where the structure of the epistle as a whole is set out. The opening words of this new section are prophetic in tone and deal particularly with the characteristics of the last days. This feature is very prominent in chapter iv. and it is this light upon the last days of the dispensation of the mystery that makes Paul's final word so important to us. Let us first of all acquaint ourselves with the structure of this section.

II Timothy iii. 1 - 9.
Disapproved concerning the faith.

A | 1, 2. MEN (anthropoi) of the last days.
B | Characteristics of last days—misplaced love. |
a | 2. Love of self (philautoi).
Love of money (philarguroi).
b | 3. Haters of good (aphilagathoi).
a | 4. Love of pleasure (philedonoi), more than Love of God (philotheoi).
C | 5-. Form without power.
D | -5. From these turn away.
A | 6.. WOMEN (gunaikaria) of the last days.
B | Characteristics of last days—inordinate desires. |
a | 6. Led captive.
b | 6. Laden with sins.
a | 6. Led away by lusts.
C | 7. Ever learning. Disapproved.
D | 9. They shall proceed no further.

Just as the key note of the balancing member II Tim. ii. 14-26, is the word "approved" dokimos (II Tim. ii. 15) so the key note of the present section is "disapproved" or "reprobate" adokimos (II Tim. iii. 8). The apostle opens this section with a forecast of the character of the last days. We must exercise care when meeting this expression lest we confuse things that differ. Peter quoting from Joel refers to the "last days", but a reading of the context shows that these days immediately precede "the great and dreadful day of the Lord" and are associated with Israel's restoration. The Lord speaks of "the last day" six times in the Gospel according to John, and the day HE refers to is the day of resurrection and judgment. From the standpoint of the epistle to the Hebrews, "these last days" refer to the days of Christ's first advent (Heb. i. 2), even as John in his first epistle said: "it is the last time" (ii. 18). It is manifest that each writer views the subject from his own point of view, Peter's "last days" would be the last days of the dispensation associated with the Kingdom and Israel, whereas Paul's "last days" would be the closing days of the dispensation of the mystery. We are concerned when we read in II Pet. iii. 3, that in the last days shall come scoffers who shall walk after their own lusts and deny the second coming of the Lord; but we should be still more concerned to learn that the closing days of this most favoured dispensation will end in apostasy parallel to the conditions of ancient paganism (for proof of this statement see later exposition), and characterized by the same dreadful motive "after their own lusts" (II Tim. iv. 3). With such passages of scripture written for our learning, and with the consciousness that the end of the present dispensation cannot be far off, the reader will not be easily moved to believe that a great spiritual revival is on its way, even though such should be "a consummation devoutly to be wished".

In the first epistle to Timothy the apostle had been led to speak of the outstanding character of the "latter times" husterois kairois "latter seasons". Not only is there the change of word "days" in II Tim. iii. and "seasons" in I Tim. iv., but also the second epistle speaks of the "last" eschatos "the extreme end", whereas I Timothy speaks of the period that is "left over" husteros of the season. Consequently, the state of affairs described in the first epistle must be understood as leading up to the crisis of the second epistle. The apostasy starts in I Tim. iv., for the word "depart" is the Greek word aphistemi from which our word apostasy is derived, it marks the beginning of the movement that ends with the awful reprobation of II Tim. iii. This departure from the faith is the outcome of "giving heed to seducing spirits and doctrines of demons" which, while including antagonism against the essentials of the Gospel, points markedly to "spiritism", a cult that is developing with alarming rapidity and captivating millions. While "seducing spirits" are not named in II Tim. iii., their fell work is to be seen in the word translated "perilous" times or seasons. This word "perilous" is the Greek word chalepos, the word employed in Matt. viii. 28 to describe two demon possessed men who lived among tombs exceeding "fierce".

Such is the prophetic picture of the last days of this dispensation. The truth forsaken, those who hold it despised or persecuted, the whole dominated by the doctrines of demons; no wonder the apostle spoke of a day that should come when men would turn away their ears from the truth and be turned unto fables. We said earlier that the characteristics of these last days of II Tim. iii., were like those of the early days of paganism. We gather this from a comparison of II Tim. iii. 1-4, with Rom. i. 28-32.

Romans i. 28 - 32.	II Tim. iii. 1 - 4.
"Boasters" alazon (30).	"Boasters" alazon (2).
"Proud" huperephanos (30).	"Proud" huperephanos (2).
"Disobedient to parents" goneusin apeitheis (30).	"Disobedient to parents" goneusin apeitheis (2).
"Without natural affection" astorgos (31).	"Without natural affection" astorgos (3).
"Implacable" aspondos (31).	"Truce breakers" aspondos (3).
"Reprobate" adokimos (28).	"Reprobate" adokimos (8).

In addition to these six words that are repeated from Rom. i., we read: "Lovers of their own selves, lovers of money (covetous), blasphemers, unthankful (which finds an echo in Rom. i. 21 neither were thankful), unholy, false accusers, incontinent, fierce, despisers of those that are good, traitors, heady, highminded, lovers of pleasure more than lovers of God." Standing out prominently in this dreadful list is one word "love". We have indicated it in the structure, but must draw attention to it again:

"Lovers of their own selves" (philautoi).
"Lovers of silver, or money (covetous)" (philarguroi).
"Not loving those that are good" (aphilagathoi).
"Lovers of pleasure" (philedonoi).
"Lovers of God" (philotheoi).

We have seen there had been erring from the "truth" (II Tim. ii. 18) and resisting the "truth" (II Tim. iii. 8) and turning away from the "truth" (II Tim. iv. 4); there were also some who had made shipwreck concerning "faith" (I Tim. i. 19); there was to be a departure from the "faith" (I Tim. iv. 1); some had erred from the "faith" (I Tim. vi. 10, 21); others were reprobate concerning the "faith" (II Tim. iii. 8). When, however, the apostle comes to the outstanding characteristics of "the last days", he does not speak of faith or truth, but goes deeper, and speaks of love. It was his constant practice to associate faith with love. To the Galatians he spoke of "faith which worked by love" (Gal. v. 6). To the Colossians he wrote, linking their "faith in the Lord Jesus" with their "love unto all the saints" (Col. i. 4). Did he speak to the Thessalonians of that "work of faith"? then he coupled it immediately with their "labour of love" (I Thess. i. 3). The good tidings that rejoiced his heart were concerning their "faith and love" (I Thess. iii. 6), and the very breastplate was dual, it was a "breastplate of faith and love" (I Thess. v. 8). So also when writing to Timothy the apostle spoke of his commission as being "with faith and love which is in Christ Jesus" (I Tim. i. 14), and when he would exhort Timothy, he links "faith and love" together (I Tim. vi. 11) and points to his own life as an example "faith, long-suffering, love" (II Tim. iii. 10).

If James could say: "faith without works is dead being alone", Paul most surely taught that a faith that did not work by love would simply lead to shipwreck. To say to-day "love is all that matters" may not be wise, and may not be true, because "love" first of all needs definition and some of us have already learned that the love of Christ passeth knowledge. To-day, owing to our limitations, we need to have love defined and divided for us in order to perceive that love includes all righteousness and holiness, as well as grace and mercy. So with the nature of God. To teach to-day "God is love and nothing else" (a notice we have actually seen outside a meeting place) is either the most supreme revelation uttered before its due season, or a misleading statement, calculated to blunt the edge of wrath, judgment and sin, and to make atonement superfluous and envelop all in a sickly sentimentality far removed from the faith of God's elect. Nevertheless, where love is missing the finest creed will fail us, where love works not, the workman will be ashamed in that day. When the apostle reached the close of Rom. viii., it is not righteousness or faith that is emphasized but love. "Who shall separate us from the love of Christ?" (verse 35) is his all embracing question. After he has stressed the utter failure of the law as a means of attaining righteousness and life, he asks us which of the commandments will he break who walks in love? "for love is the fulfilling of the law" (xiii. 10). Though a man speak with the tongue of angels, possess a faith that would remove mountains and be such a zealot for the faith as to give his body to be burned, what is he without love? (I Cor. xiii. 1-3).

While the apostle would have the saints "established in the faith" (Col. ii. 7), he would also have them "rooted and grounded in love" (Eph. iii. 17). The believer is to forbear "in love", speak the truth "in love", edify himself "in love" and walk "in love" in his endeavour to walk worthy of the calling (Eph. iv. 2, 15, 16; v. 2). Among the gifts with which the believer has been endowed are "power . . . . . love and a sound mind" (II Tim. i. 7). When Paul urged Timothy to hold fast the form of sound words which he had heard of him, he did not conclude without adding, "in faith and love which is in Christ Jesus" (i. 13). He would not quarrel with any who saw in these words, that not only did Paul himself receive the truth accompanied by "faith and love" (I Tim. i. 14)—and so present a direct contrast to the zeal and bigotry that made him a blasphemer, and a persecutor and injurious, acting ignorantly in unbelief (I Tim. i. 13)—but Timothy also must "hold fast" this same precious doctrine, not with bigotry, not with a persecuting zeal, not ignorantly, but "in faith and love which is in Christ Jesus".

It may be that some reader has expected a fuller analysis of the dreadful times that are ahead of us, and is disappointed because we have not pursued the blasphemy, incontinence and treachery of the last days with all their harrowing effects upon heart and mind. We believe, however, that the judicious will realize that the time and space occupied by the preceding exposition of the fundamental character of love is more than justified, for it is just there that we are most vulnerable and where the best of us breakdown. It is comparatively easy for some temperaments "to do all to the glory of God". It is, alas, a loophole for the lax, to quote "give none offence" but it takes grace, and grace abundant, to obey the scripture which makes the exhortation twofold: "Do all to the glory of God, give none offence" (I Cor. x. 31, 32). Perhaps the secret lies in the closing words of this chapter, "not seeking mine own profit", for "love seeketh not her own" (xiii. 5).

Returning to II Timothy we observe that this supremacy of love comes forward in chapter four. The crown which the apostle had won because he had "kept the faith" was also open to all who "love" the appearing of the Lord (II Tim. iv. 8). Not only so, but the apostle continued: "Demas hath forsaken me, HAVING LOVED this present world" (iv. 10).

"Let us, therefore, suffer this exhortation, let us pray, let us serve, let us walk, let us live, with love as our atmosphere, our attitude and our environment. This will not be possible to the flesh, even the religious flesh of a genuine believer, it is the fruit of the spirit, it grows in the soil of grace, and God alone gives the increase.

"Keep yourselves in the love of God" (Jude 21).
"Knit together in love" (Col. ii. 2).
"The Lord direct your hearts into the love of God" (II Thess. iii. 5).

#28. The form of godliness, and the believer's attitude (iii. 5).
pp. 129 - 132

If the long and awful list of the evil characteristics of the last days, were extracted from the epistle, and presented to any one unacquainted with the teaching of the Scriptures, and he were asked, whether men exhibiting such an array of blasphemous, unholy and wicked traits could be "religious" or manifest any interest whatever in "religion", we should expect the answer to be an emphatic "No!" Yet the apostle follows this dreadful catalogue of wickedness with the words "having a form of godliness" (II Tim. iii. 5), and later that they were "ever learning" although never coming to a knowledge of the truth (II Tim. iii. 7).

Reverting to Pagan times, as revealed in the first chapter of Romans, we learn that the heart of the apostasy that took place in heathendom was that they:-- > "Changed the truth of God into a lie, and worshipped and served the creature more than the Creator, Who is blessed for ever. Amen" (i. 25).

Men did not become atheists, they became idolators, they did not renounce "worship", they worshipped the creature rather than the Creator. They did not declare themselves independent, they changed the truth for a lie and "served" other gods. This has been the outstanding character of Satanic opposition since time began, it reaches it climax in the day of the Lord, when the Dragon at length receives world-wide worship (Rev. xiii. 4). We are apt to limit idolatry to the worship of idols made of wood, stone or metal, but Paul tells us in the epistle to the Galatians that "idolatry" is one of the works of the flesh, while Col. iii. 5 says that "covetousness is idolatry", and Eph. v. 5, that a covetous man is an idolator. The apostle John even, did not believe it to be unseemly to conclude his wonderful epistle with the exhortation "little children keep yourselves from idols" (I John v. 21), consequently, though faith be denied and truth resisted, though the good is despised and pleasure enthroned, a "form of godliness" will be retained. Satan travesties truth. Truth is exchanged for the lie, "substitution" in this evil sense is fundamental to apostasy, therefore as we find in the first chapter the apostle urging Timothy to "hold fast the form of sound words", so in the third chapter we learn that even in the last days a form of godliness will be retained. There are, however, essential differences. The "form" of II Tim. i. 13 is hupotuposis "a pattern"., whereas the form of II Tim. iii. 5 is morphosis "form without substance", and is used in Rom. ii. 20 in the charge laid against the Jew, who though he had "a form of knowledge" yet failed to obey its precepts himself.

With the "form" of sound words which Paul advocated, were the saving accompaniments of "faith and love", but it is written concerning those who have a "form" of godliness in the last days, that they "deny" the power thereof. The word "thereof" refers to godliness. These denied the power of godliness while retaining its form; form indeed without substance.

We have seen in an earlier article that "godliness" is one of the key words of these pastoral epistles, and we are not surprised to find that Satan maintains his reputation, and promptly brings forward a substitute. The apostates of the last days are said to "deny" the power of godliness. What does this mean? Will they actually declare by word of mouth the emptiness of their "form"? That cannot be, for it would be the first step in repentance thus to acknowledge the bankruptcy of their creed. The apostle has used the word arneomai, seven times, and we shall learn from some of these references, how men in the last days can "deny" the power of godliness, without uttering a single word.

Arneomai "TO DENY".

"If any provide not for his own, and specially for those of his own house, he hath denied the faith, and is worse than an infidel" (I Tim. v. 8).

"If we deny Him, He also will deny us" (II Tim. ii. 12).

"He cannot deny Himself" (II Tim. ii. 13).

"A form of godliness, but denying the power thereof" (II Tim. iii. 5).

"They profess that they know God, but in works they deny Him, being abominable and disobedient, and unto every good work reprobate" (Titus i. 16).

"Teaching us that denying ungodliness and worldly lusts we should live soberly" (Titus ii. 12).

"Moses . . . . . refused to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter" (Heb. xi. 24).

Men in the last days will deny by their works the "power" of godliness. What is this "power"? The apostle had reminded Timothy that:

"God hath not given us the spirit of fear, but of power, and of love and of a sound mind" (II Tim. i. 7).

and had followed this statement with an exhortation to use this power, saying:

"Be not thou therefore ashamed of the testimony of our Lord, nor of me His prisoner; but be thou partaker of the afflictions of the gospel according to the power of God" (II Tim. i. 8).

It would appear from these two passages that Timothy knew whence this power came and what it was, but we shall have to go back into the apostle's ministry, and discover for ourselves the essential nature of this power, denied by the men of the last days. Godliness, we have already discovered, is:

"The religious character of moral reverence . . . . . God-fearing, to be God-fearing as to doing something . . . . ."

"The energy of piety in the life, both internal and external, not the religion that leads to piety, but the religious life that manifests religion" (Article No. 23, Vol. xxxv, p. 50).

Everything, therefore, that leads up to this "manifest religion" would constitute some part of the "power" of godliness. It would include "the gospel of Christ" for that is the power of God unto salvation (Rom. i. 16). It would include the cross and the preaching of the cross, for that, too, is the power of God (I Cor. i. 18). This power of God is placed in contrast with the wisdom of men (I Cor. ii. 5). This power is manifested in the fact that earthen vessels were used to contain the treasure of truth (II Cor. iv. 7). We can readily perceive that the "form of godliness" that will be held by the apostates of the last days, will have no room for the gospel of Christ, nor for the preaching of Jesus Christ and Him crucified. It will magnify the wisdom of men, and ignore the earthiness of the vessels that God has deigned to use. When we open the epistle to the Ephesians we meet this mighty power, so essential to godliness, in all its wondrous fullness. From Eph. i. 19-21 we learn that the power to usward who believe is nothing less than the mighty power which was wrought in Christ when He was raised from the dead, and which placed Him at the right hand of God far above all principality and power. We discover that this same power enabled Paul in the execution of his ministry, prepares the heart of the believer to receive the Lord by faith, and that it operates in answer to prayer (Eph. iii. 7, 16, 20). It is named in Phil. iii. 10 "the power of His resurrection". It comes therefore to this, the "religion" of the last days will have no room for "Jesus Christ, crucified, risen and ascended" and will be powerless either for salvation or sanctification. The great characteristic of the doctrine of the mystery is that it is the "faith" of God's elect, and the "truth" which is according to godliness (Titus i. 1).

Having been warned of God by the prophetic statement of II Tim. iii., we must be on our guard against every plausible presentation of truth which, while using the phrases of the dispensation of the mystery, leads to a denial of its most practical outworking. We are not however to run a campaign against the formalists, we have to remember that "obedience" is better than sacrifice, and is essential to godliness itself, and our instructions are definite "from such turn away" (II Tim. iii. 5). We meet the verb "turn away" three times in this second epistle to Timothy:

> "All in Asia be turned away from me" (i. 15).
> "From such turn away' (iii. 5).
> "They shall turn away their ears from the truth" (iv. 4).

Two Greek words are translated in these three references, apostrepho (II Tim. i. 15, iv. 4), and apotrepomai (iii. 5), and the surprising thing is that the word used of the turning away of those in Asia, and of those whose ears are turned away from the truth, is a less forceful word than that which is used of the believers turning away from those who merely hold a form of godliness. Yet so it is, apostrepho means "to turn away", but apotrepomai means "to turn right away", so completely that one's face is turned in the very opposite direction. Consequently, the impelling force behind the movement of the believer, is not merely aversion but reversion, a turning towards the truth quite as much, if not more, than a turning away from error. If we refer back to I Tim. iv., where the apostle speaks of the apostasy of latter times, we shall find this attitude towards error is emphasized there:

> "But refuse profane and old wives fables, and exercise thyself rather unto godliness" (iv. 7).

Here is the idea expressed in the words "turn away" of II Tim. iii. 5, expanded and divided "refuse" "exercise rather unto". May we know something of this aversion to error, but may we also know the blessed counter-attraction of the truth.

#29. Disapproved (Adokimos) (iii. 6-9).
Showing the dupes and devices of evil, and its final self-evident folly.
pp. 148 - 152

When we completed the list that describes the awful character of the last days, the revealed fact that all it comprises will have a form of godliness, came rather as a surprise, but showed how strong is the "religious" impulse even in the most abandoned. We are now to learn that these blasphemers, and unholy men, are not content with a mere form of godliness, they seek to make adherents, and while actually resisting the truth, make great efforts, apparently to come to a knowledge of the truth.

> "For of this sort are they which creep into houses and lead captive silly women laden with sins, led away with divers lusts" (iii. 6).

They "creep" into houses. Enduno, the Greek word translated "creep" occurs nowhere else in the New Testament. It is however a variant of enduo which means "to put on clothing", and the English use of the word "insinuate" approaches very near to the sense of the original. Most normal people have an instinctive horror of things that "creep" and this is right, for creation is filled with types of good and evil, and the creeping thing, though innocent in itself, is a type of evil. This is no direct attack, it is back door tactics, horrible, loathsome, reminiscent of the first intrusion into man's peace in Eden. They creep into "houses". In the first epistle we read:

> "But the younger widows refuse: for when they have begun to wax wanton against Christ, they will marry; having damnation, because they have cast off their first faith. And withal they learn to be idle, wandering about from house to house: and not only idle, but tattlers also and busybodies, speaking things which they ought not" (I Tim. v. 11-13).

Here we read of some who "wandered about from house to house". Into such houses, these evil men will "creep", and alas, they will find an easy prey. We must not misunderstand the apostle, he speaks of some "houses" that would be easy of access to these advocates of error, he does not condemn all, for he knew some "houses" that proved a veritable Bethany to him. It is suggestive that the word used by the apostle for "house" is oikia, a house as distinct from the inmates, whereas oikos which he uses with approval, means not merely the house but the household or the inmates that turn a "house" into a "home". It is equally suggestive to observe that the next occurrence of oikia is II Tim. iii. 6; the last in the New Testament is that of II John 10:

> "If there come any unto you, and bring not this doctrine, receive him not into your house, neither bid him God-speed."

The child of God is exhorted to be given to hospitality, and many a home has been the means both of leading seeking sinners to Christ, or of refreshing the weary saint, simply by practicing this christian principle. This ready welcome however has its limits, and to entertain wittingly a purveyor of error is to come short of the Divine standard. These evil workers who creep into houses select their prey, "and lead captive silly women laden with sins" (iii. 6).

"Lead captive" aichmaloteuo, is derived from aichme a spear, allied with akme (English "acme") a sharp point. This same word aichmaloteuo occurs in Eph. iv. 8 and cannot refer to the deliverance of the sleeping saints, for at the ascension of the Lord He surely did not lead His redeemed people to glory at the point of a spear! It rather refers to those principalities and powers which were put off at the cross, made a show of openly, and triumphed over by the victorious Christ. There is an evident connection here with the close of chapter ii., for there also we read of some who had been "taken captive" by the Devil. The word used in ii. 26, is zogreo, and means literally "to take alive", some commentators have the idea that the meaning of verse 26 is that the person spoken of had been "caught alive by the Lord's servant", and so delivered. This translation, though attempting to ease the problem occasioned by autou and ekeinou being used of the same person, introduces greater confusion, for it ignores the "snare" actually mentioned and introduces another (an evangelical one). Zogreo is used in Luke v. 10 "henceforth thou shalt catch men", undoubtedly in a good sense. While we may not endorse the idea that zogreo can mean deliverance (26), yet the fact that within the compass of a few verses two distinct words are used for the one idea, should cause us, reverently, to inquire the meaning. Those who were ensnared in ii. 26, had hope of deliverance; upon repentance they would "recover", or, as the original reads, ananepho "to awake out of a drunken sleep" and so be restored. In the second instance, those "led captive" are led captive at the spear's point, not "taken alive", they do not "wake up", they do not arrive at the knowledge of the truth which "waking up" signifies in the twenty-sixth verse and so never recover themselves from their bondage. Those who are thus "led captive" (iii. 6), are called "silly women", gunaikaria. This passage seemed to us to read a little uncharitably towards women in general and we half-hoped that it would permit the rendering "effeminate persons" and so include men as well as women, but there is a word already in use with that meaning, and there is no avoiding the fact that the apostle had one class of women in view. It is good to remember what tributes the apostle has paid to some women of his time. There is "the woman Lydia" (Acts xvi. 14); the "wife" or "woman Priscilla" (xviii. 2); there are "those women" so commended by the apostle (Phil. iv. 1-3) and Phebe (Rom. xvi. 1, 2), also the mother and the grandmother of Timothy (II Tim. i. 5). While all mankind have sinned, men differ from women in many ways, and Satan is not ignorant of these things, neither does he hesitate to prey upon any human weakness. Just as in II Tim. iii. 1-9 we have "men" and "women" specially referred to, so in I Tim. ii. we have the same marked division.

> "I will therefore that men (aner) pray . . . . . lifting up holy hands . . . . . in like manner also women (pray) adoring themselves in modest apparel . . . . . Adam was not deceived but the woman . . . . . was" (8-14).

It was to the woman that the serpent directed his tempting arguments at the beginning, and he has been unscrupulous in his exploitations of the sex ever since. These "silly women" moreover were "laden with sins". It was this burdened conscience that made these poor women so vulnerable. Soreuo "lade", "heap up", a sepulchral mound and suggests that the class of women here referred to were buried beneath a weight of sin. Their burdened conscience made them only too ready to grasp at any offer of easement. We have already referred to the word "lust" when dealing with II Tim. ii. 22 and iv. 3. In the phrase "led away with diverse lusts" with which II Tim. iii. 6 ends, we need not think that further and fuller participation in sensuality was the attraction that induced these silly women to become such slaves, it may mean by epithumiais poikilais, that these poor creatures would clutch at any straw that might ease their burden, but alas they found no ease for they were blind and deaf to the appeal of the gospel.

> "Evershifting passion for change in doctrine, running after fashionable men and fashionable tenets, which draw them (agousi) in flocks in the most opposite and inconsistent directions, evermore learning, always with some new point absorbing them, which seems to them the most important, to the depreciation of what they held or seemed to know before" (Alford in loco).

Doubtless we all have met persons who manifest some of these traits. If we meet them this week, their enthusiasm for some new doctrine knows no bounds, if, however, accident postponed our meeting of them for a week we should have found them advocating with the same hysterical enthusiasm some other equally futile innovation. It is comforting with these things in mind to note that the apostle says at the end of this passage "they shall proceed no further".

We saw, earlier, that the language of the apostle in II Tim. iii. 1-4 linked the apostasy of the last days with the paganism of ancient Rome. He now established another link with the past by introducing the magicians who withstood Moses:

> "Now as Jannes and Jambres withstood Moses, so do these also resist the truth" (8).

Apart from any other source of information, the fact that the apostle gives the names of Jannes and Jambres to these two men of ancient times, would be sufficient for us. It is however interesting to know that Jonathan, who wrote a paraphrase of the law, (the Targum) says that these men were two sons of Balaam. They have various names in different translations, which is not surprising. Hilary speaks of a book "Jannes and Mambres", and the Talmud speaks of "Juhanni and Mamre, chief of Pharaoh's physicians". Numenius, cited by Aristobolus, says "Jannes and Jambres were sacred rabbis of the Egyptians"; Pliny speaks of a sect of magicians, of whom he says "Moses, Jannes and Jocabel at Jotapa were heads". While therefore we do not take our doctrine from tradition, we must not allow ourselves to become unreasonable and reject every traditional statement simply because it is traditional. It may also be the truth as well, and sometimes an ancient tradition will help to confirm or illuminate an otherwise obscure item of inspired truth. These magicians Jannes and Jambres were no ordinary men, they were inspired by Satan and worked actual miracles, even as the false prophets will at the time of the end (II Thess. ii.). This fact makes Paul's introduction of them all the more pointed, for we have seen from I Tim. iv. and II Tim. iii. 1 that demonic influence will be at work in the last days. We shall not only be resisted by ordinary sinful and darkened men, we must expect to be opposed by those who consciously or unconsciously are the instruments of the Devil. Our warfare is spiritual, and our foes are "spiritual wickednesses". Eph. vi. 13 speaks of the "evil day" that was to come, and II Tim. iii., reveals that day and its character more fully. These men "resist" the truth and the same word anthistemi is used by the apostle in Eph. vi. 13 where he says "that ye may be able to withstand in the evil day". The same word is found in II Tim. iv. 15 where Alexander is said to have "greatly withstood" the apostle's words, and both James (iv. 7), and Peter (I Pet. v. 9) use the word in their exhortations to "resist" the Devil.

We now reach the antithesis of the unashamed workman. His great desire was to show himself "approved" (dokimos) unto God. These evil teachers and opponents prove themselves to be just the reverse "reprobate', adokimos. This term is peculiar to the writings of the apostle Paul, seven occurrences being found in his church epistles, and one in the epistle to the Hebrews. The fact that the "reprobate" mind of Rom. i. 28, occurs in such a parallel context as that of II Tim. iii. 9 reveals the terrible nature of this reprobation. Nevertheless there is no decree of reprobation at work. The nations gave up God, before God "also" gave them up (Rom. i. 19-25). As they did not "like" (edokimasan) to retain God in their knowledge, God gave them over to a reprobate (adokimos) mind (Rom. i. 28). So also in the days that will immediately succeed the close of the present dispensation, men will be condemned who believe not the truth, not because of some irresistible decree of Divine Sovereignty, but because "they received not the love of the truth, that they might be saved", and moreover, who "had pleasure in unrighteousness" (II Thess. ii. 10-12). There are however limits set to evil, and we are glad to read "they shall proceed no further" (II Tim. iii. 9). At first sight this seems to contradict what is written in ii. 16, "they will increase unto more ungodliness". The meaning however is clear. Left unchecked, evil grows and spreads, but God has His limits beyond which no foot can pass. In the last days this limit will have been reached and they shall proceed no further. How will this check be administered? Will an angel from heaven convince these men of their soul destroying error? Will God Himself break silence and speak with a voice of thunder? No, the check is brought about in a less spectacular, but a more convincing way.

"For their folly shall be manifest unto all men, as theirs also was" (II Tim. iii. 9).

There were miracles wrought by Moses, that were duplicated by Jannes and Jambres, there were other occasions, however, when they realized their utter failure and had to confess "this is the finger of God" (Exod. viii. 19, ix. 11). Truth is its own justification, and error given time enough, manifests its own inconsistency. To perceive this will enable the tried servant of God to wait with patience; failure to do so will tempt him to yield to bitterness, strife, and to borrow weapons from the armoury of darkness.

We have had brought before us a dark picture, but we do not conclude the survey without learning that the darkest night ends with break of day, and we, being children of light, await with patience yet with intense desire that day when the truth shall be enthroned and the lie for ever discredited.

#30. Paul's doctrine, manner of life and purpose (iii. 10), with the structure of II Tim. iii. 10 - iv. 8.

pp. 168 - 174

Having now considered the two central members of the epistle ii. 14-26, Approved, and iii. 1-9, Disapproved, the subject matter, follows the ordinary disposition of regular introversion, and the member now before us (iii. 10 - iv. 8) "The Crown" is in structural correspondence with ii. 1-13, "The Crown". We discover that both passages have to do with Paul's ministry and the suffering it entailed, together with the glorious recognition by the Lord "in that day". This member opens with the first great missionary ministry of the apostle (iii. 10-12) and closes with the words concerning his prison ministry "I have finished" (iv. 3-8). Between these two extremes, the apostle places in contrast, the apostasy of the last days with its refusal of the Word, the inspiration of all Scripture, and its profitableness both for salvation and subsequent service. The skeleton outline is:

A | iii. 10-12. Paul's doctrine and ministry. The BEGINNING.
B | iii. 13-17. Scripture for doctrine.
C | iv. 1. The Judge and His appearing.
B | iv. 2, 3-. Preach the Word . . . with doctrine.
A | iv. -3-7. Paul's doctrine and ministry. The END.
C | iv. 8. The Judge and His appearing.

Ministry, especially that of Paul's, is a ministry of the Word, and none can hope to follow in the footsteps of the Apostle to the Gentiles, who sets aside, belittles, or underestimates the value of inspired Scripture. We must now complete the structure, and then begin an examination of its vital contents.

II Timothy iii. 10 - iv. 8. Suffering and Reigning.

A | iii. 10-12. Paul's doctrine and ministry.—The BEGINNING (Acts xiii. and xiv.).
a | 10. My doctrine, etc.
b | 11, 12. Paul's first ministry and suffering.
B | iii. 13-17. Scripture for doctrine. For child and Man of God.
For Salvation and Service.
c | 13. Deceiving and being deceived.
d | 14, 15-. The CHILD.
e | -15-. Holy Scriptures.
f | -15. Wise unto salvation.
e | 16. Inspired Scriptures.
f | 16. Profitable for doctrine.
d | 17-. The MAN.
c | -17. Furnished to all good works.
C | iv. 1. The Judgment of Quick and Dead at Appearing.
g | 1. The Judge.
h | 1. His Appearing.
B | iv. 2, 3-. Preach the Word . . . . . with doctrine. In view of apostasy.
j | 2. In and out of season (enkairos, akairos).
k | 2. Preach the Word.
k | 2. Longsuffering and doctrine..
j | 3-. The coming season (kairos).
A | iv. -3-7. Paul's doctrine and ministry. The END. "I have finished."
a | 3-5. Sound doctrine not endured.
b | 6, 7. Paul's last ministry and suffering.
C | iv. 8. The Judge of Paul and others at Appearing.
g | 8. The righteous Judge.
h | 8. His appearing.

> "But thou hast fully known my doctrine, manner of life, purpose, faith, longsuffering, charity, patience, persecutions, afflictions, which came unto me at Antioch, at Iconium, at Lystra; what persecutions I endured; but out of them all the Lord delivered me" (II Tim. iii. 10, 11).

Let us not forget, that intense as our own personal interest must be in this epistle, that the apostle primarily penned it to encourage his young son in the faith, Timothy, who was about to step into the breach made by the apostle's death. Every exhortation, every warning, every encouragement, every personal appeal, was first of all addressed to one man, and the more we keep this great fact in mind, the better shall we appreciate the epistle as a whole. "But thou", three times in this section does the apostle use this phrase, Su de, "Thou" Su with the adversative* "but" de.

> [* - For the sake of clearness, and for any whose grammar has become a little "rusty", an adversative, like the word "adverse" or "adversary" indicates opposition or contrast.]

> "In contrast with the apostasy of the last days, thou, Timothy, hast fully known my doctrine" (iii. 10).

"In contrast with the evil men who deceive and are themselves deceived, do thou Timothy, continue in the things which thou hast learned, &c." (14).

"In contrast with those who turn away their ears from the truth, and who are turned unto fables, do thou, Timothy, watch in all things, &c." (II Tim. iv. 5).

Timothy must be an outstanding witness in a day of departure, and all who would carry on the great and gracious ministry entrusted to faithful men down the age, must give continual heed to the apostle's "but thou", "but thou", "but thou".

The word translated "fully known" is parakoloutheo, a compound, made up of para meaning "beside" and akoloutheo "to follow". The word without the preposition para means to follow as a disciple (Matt. iv. 20), and with the preposition kata it means to "follow after" (Luke xxiii. 55, Acts xvi. 17), but with para the word used by the apostle when addressing Timothy, there is a reminder of companionship. The word parakoloutheo occurs but four times in the New Testament and we shall understand the apostle better if we are possess of the knowledge of the usage of this word in its other occurrences. "These signs shall follow them that believe" (Mark xvi. 17). Not "may" follow, and not "shall follow" a long time afterward, but in close association with believing faith, these miraculous gifts were experienced during Pentecostal days.

"Having had perfect understanding of all things" (Luke i. 3).

Bloomfield says:

"Perhaps with allusion to the top-springs or source of a river. In this very sense the word is used by Demosthenes."

"Nourished up in the words of faith and of good doctrine, whereunto thou hast attained" (I Tim. iv. 6).

Alford here translates and comments:

"The course of which thou hast followed (I have thus endeavoured to give parakolouthekas:—'hast followed along, by tracing its course and accompany it')."

The purpose which the apostle had, when he called the attention of Timothy to the very beginnings of his ministry, seem to be made clear as we perceive the meaning of the words translated "fully known". Timothy had followed the course of this great ministry from its source, he had accompanied the apostle in person, he knew as few could ever know the full meaning of the apostle's claim to be "the preacher, the apostle, and the teacher of the Gentiles", "the Lord's prisoner". While this lesson in the first place was Timothy's contact with the apostle and his ministry, the lesson is nevertheless as personal and as pointed as ever, while the age lasts, to any of us, who receives the sacred trust of making known "what is the dispensation of the mystery". We may not have had physical contact with Paul, nor have we actually walked the streets of Antioch, nevertheless, we have what Timothy did not have, namely, the inspired narrative of the Acts of the Apostles, and having this we are spared many an irrelevant incident, and we have also the complete set of Paul's epistles, and in this again may have some advantage over Timothy. What Timothy lacked in the matter of inspired Scripture, was made up to him in the matter of "gift" (II Tim. i. 6) which he had received through the laying on of Paul's hands. Those marvelous epistles signed with Paul's "own hand" are more than a compensation to us for the absence of any such gift, and consequently, we may stand on a common level of responsibility and blessed equipment with Timothy and every succeeding "faithful man able to teach others also", to whom the sacred trust has been committed down the age until the last messenger has been equipped and the last member enlightened.

Should any demur at this leveling statement, we point to II Tim. iii. 17, where Timothy, with all his gifts, is nevertheless informed that the Holy Scriptures, possessed by us as surely as by himself, "thoroughly furnish" the man of God. Before leaving this word "follow" we must consider the fact that the revised text uses a different tense of the verb. The Authorized Version uses the perfect tense, which ends with thekas, whereas the revised text uses the aorist tense, which ends with thesas, substituting "s" for "k". The translation of the perfect is simple. "Thou hast fully followed", with the unexpressed idea "and are still following". This meaning can be sensed by those whose grip on grammar may not be strong. "What I have written I have written", conveys the idea that such is going to remain written. "That which hath been born of the flesh is flesh" teaches the same lesson. If however the apostle used the aorist, he must have had a different intention. We can no longer use the words "have followed", and if we use the timeless "thou fully followest", it looks so much like the present tense, that we must follow such a rendering with an explanation. The Revised Version translates "but thou didst follow", and Alford writes:

> "The aorist is both less obvious and more appropriate than the perfect: this was the example set before him, and the reminiscence, joined to the exhortation of verse 14, bears something of reproach with it, which is quite in accordance with what we have reason to infer from the general tone of the epistle. Whereas the perfect would imply that the example has been really ever before him, and followed up at the present moment; and so would weaken the necessity of the exhortation."

Before the apostle names Antioch, Iconium and Lystra he draws the attention to Timothy, and of ourselves, to those characteristics of his own ministry, which he so earnestly desired Timothy to follow, "my doctrine, manner of life, purpose" (II Tim. iii. 10). Let us pause here. First of all, let us notice that Paul, with all the knowledge that he possessed of his own frailty and liability, to err as man, could unhesitatingly draw the attention of one who had been an intimate companion for years, to the close relation which "his doctrine" bore to "his manner of life". Few could stand such scrutiny, few would encourage the investigation and comparison, but whoever can thus boldly link together doctrine and manner of life, will also know something of the true success that crowned the apostle's ministry.

One of the most noticeable characteristics of the apostle Paul's life is that he most certainly "practiced" what he "preached", and to this day, we are prepared to listen to the man who brings such credentials.

"Doctrine", Didaskalia means teaching, especially the substance of the teaching, and differs from didache, which refers rather to the process, or the act of teaching. The two words can be seen together in II Tim. iv. 2, 3.

> "Exhort with all longsuffering and doctrine (didache, the act of teaching) . For the time will come when they will not endure sound doctrine (didaskalia, the substance of the teaching) but . . . . . will heap unto themselves teachers (didaskalos)."

To the ordinary reader there does not seem to be any obvious connection between the two words "doctrine" and "teaching". "Doctrine" comes from the Latin docere "to teach", even as doctor, document, docile, (i.e. teachable), and disciple (i.e. a learner from Latin discere "to learn" which is allied to docere "to teach"). It would not be right to-day for any "teacher" to assume the title "doctor", but that is simply because the two words have parted company and have received distinctive characters which we must observe. The apostle has more to say about this "doctrine" in these Pastoral epistles, than elsewhere. In his other epistles he actually gave the "substance", but in epistles to his fellow-servants Timothy and Titus, he reminds them of its value and character. There are fourteen references in these three epistles to the apostle's doctrine, and one of the contrary doctrine of perilous times that are to come. Seven of these occur in I Timothy and three in II Timothy. The three in II Timothy are iii. 10, 16 and iv. 3. It will not be a waste of time if we gather the seven references to "doctrine" made in the first epistle.

A | a | i. 10. Contrary to sound doctrine. Unholy and profane.
b | iv. 6, 7. Good doctrine . . . fables . . . unto godliness.
B | iv. 13. The reading, exhortation, doctrine.
C | iv. 16. Thyself and Thy doctrine.
B | v. 17. Labour in the word and doctrine.
A | a | vi. 1. Name of God and His doctrine, not blasphemed.
b | vi. 3, 4. Doctrine according to godliness, questions.

It would take us too far afield to examine these references separately, but we must draw attention to the central one "thyself and thy doctrine", which is just the same line of thought as that of II Tim. iii. 10.

"Manner of life" agoge. This word does not occur again in the New Testament. It comes twice in Esther and three times in the second book of the Maccabees.

"Like as when she was brought up with him" (Esther ii. 20) is expressed in the LXX, "As when she was with him: and Esther changed not her manner of life". In Esther x. 3 where the Hebrew reads, as in the Authorized Version, "speaking peace" the LXX translates the passage: "And passed his life beloved of all his nation."

While the Apocrypha was never looked upon as inspired and canonical, its influence upon phraseology was great, just as the words of Shakespeare, Bunyan, Milton or Tennyson are quoted to-day by many who do not realize that such expressions are quotations at all. As a proof of this, can the reader say, without reference, to which English writer we owe such household words, as "The cricket on the hearth", "As children gathering pebbles on the shore" and "The light fantastic toe"?*

[* - The writer is Milton.]

So in II Maccabees 4:16, 6:8 and 11:24, agoge is used of following the "customs" of the Grecians, of observing the same "fashions", conforming themselves to the manner of the Gentiles, or of keeping their own "manner of life". Agoge is derived from ago "to lead, bring or carry". The use of the verb "to go" or "to carry" is a common mode of referring to manner of life even to-day. "Comment vous portez-vous?" in French and "Wie geht's?" in German, will occur to most as specimens of modern usage. The fact that this word occurs nowhere else in the New Testament however makes one feel that Paul had some special reason for its choice. In the next chapter (II Tim. iv. 7) he uses another derivative of ago, namely agon, which is translated "fight". The word actually refers, not to a military combat but to the Greek games. It is translated "race" in Heb. xii. 1, and Epictetus uses the word when he says:

> "Remember that now is the time of contest, now the Olympics are come" (Enchirid 75).

In effect the apostle would sum up his "manner of life" as one long contest, with all its need for self discipline, and with the encouragement of the knowledge that to the victor, there was a crown and a prize, not corruptible, like that of the Greek sports, but incorruptible, a crown of righteousness which the Lord would give in "that day".

"Purpose" prothesis, something set or placed before one. Before the apostle was a goal. This goal or purpose coloured all his doctrine and influenced all his life. "One thing I do" was not the cry of a narrow-minded bigot but the heart utterance of one who had seen the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ. In II Tim. i. 9, Paul had referred to God's own purpose, in iii. 10 he speaks of his own. God's purpose so far as it came within Paul's capacity and calling was Paul's purpose. God's doctrine or teaching was Paul's teaching. This he desired beyond life itself for his son and successor Timothy. Tradition has left no word as to the life of Timothy beyond this point. We hope and believe that he was enabled by grace to stand fast and to hold fast, to fulfil the prayers of his father in the faith. We too, near the close of a long line of men who have received this sacred trust (ii. 2) can ask for nothing nobler, higher or more pleasing to the Lord, than that our "doctrine, manner of life and purpose" shall approximate to the "pattern" given us in the ministry and example of Paul, the prisoner of the Lord (I Tim. i. 16 and II Tim. i. 13). And for this we indeed need grace.

#31. Paul's early independent ministry (iii. 10, 11). His faith, longsuffering, charity and patience.
pp. 183 - 187

The doctrine, manner of life and purpose that occupied our attention in our last study, might be called the major factors in Paul's witness. These are followed by lesser virtues which the apostle desired Timothy to emulate, lesser only in the sense that they form part of the threefold whole already expressed. If preferred, we might speak of general and special terms. "Faith, longsuffering, charity, patience" (II Tim. iii. 10). These four, when taken together with his doctrine, life and purpose reveal a sevenfold subdivision, a glorious rainbow of faith. The persecutions and afflictions that are mentioned in verse eleven were what the apostle endured at the hand of others, and must be kept for the time being distinct. "Faith" pistis a conviction based upon trust. In his Lexicon Dr. Bullinger says of pisteuo the verb "to believe":

> "The N.T. conception of faith in (i) a fully convinced acknowledgment, (ii) a self surrendered fellowship, (iii) a fully assured and unswerving confidence."

Pistis is derived from pepeistai, the perfect passive of peitho "to be persuaded". When we hear the apostle's triumphant confidence in II Tim. ii. 12, "Nevertheless I am not ashamed: for I know whom I have believed (pisteuo), and am persuaded (peitho)", we may appreciate that the apostle referred to something deeper than a mere belief when he spoke of his "faith". Without this "strong conviction" his work as an apostle would have been impossible.

> "He counted me faithful (pistos) putting me into the ministry; who was before a blasphemer . . . . . I did it ignorantly in unbelief (apistia) and the grace of our Lord was exceeding abundant with faith (pistis) and love which is in Christ Jesus. This is a faithful (pistos) saying" (I Tim. i. 12-15).

Faith and faithfulness were the very stuff of Paul's life and ministry. Elsewhere the apostle has placed "love" above even faith and hope (I Cor. xiii. 13), why did he alter the order of the words here? When we "know even as we are known" we shall learn that love comprises every grace. During this present life such a truth if misunderstood or misapplied, might be dangerous. We have, in No.27 of this series, spoken of a notice outside a meeting place which read "God is Love, and Nothing Else". Now either the folk responsible were an age ahead of all others, and expressed the full orbed truth that most of us must wait until resurrection to appreciate or, as we sadly fear, they expressed a dangerous perversion of truth. To-day, such a statement might cover the denial for the necessity of the Atonement, or for the possibility of judgment on sin. To one of Timothy's nature, so far as we can gather from these epistles, to have put love first may have been unwise. Strong conviction, unwavering faith, full assurance, utter faithfulness, these were his urgent need; and not Timothy alone, but we to-day are in the same age with the same opposition, and the same snares. We need to have before us at all times the faith and the faithfulness of Paul the pattern given by God. When therefore, we arrive at the apostle's own summing up, we read:

> "I have fought a good fight.
> I have finished my course.
> I HAVE KEPT THE FAITH" (II Tim. iv. 7).

Love is there, for the crown which the Lord will award the apostle who "kept the faith" is for all them also the LOVE His appearing (8). "Longsuffering" makrothumia; from makros "far" as in (Luke xv. 13, xix. 12), or "long" as in (Luke xx. 47); and thumos, wrath (Gal. v. 20), indignation (Rom. ii. 8). Thumos is from thuo to rush impetuously, and then in the New Testament times, to slay either as a sacrifice (Mark xiv. 12), or for food (Acts x. 13). Makrothumia is another word that occurs fourteen times in the New Testament. That it was an integral part of the apostle's character we may learn from II Cor. vi.:

> "Approving ourselves as the ministers of God, in much patience . . . . . by longsuffering . . . . . by love unfeigned" (4-6).

This longsuffering had been made manifest in his own case (I Tim. i. 16) and is enjoined upon Timothy and all who follow after.

> "Preach the word . . . . . with all longsuffering and doctrine" (II Tim. iv. 2).

In Hebrews, where the word is translated "patience", we have a parallel with II Timothy, for both epistles have a reward in view.

> "That ye be not slothful, but followers of them who through faith and longsuffering inherit the promises" (Heb. vi. 12).

"Longsuffering" is an integral part of the walk that is worthy of our calling (Eph. iv. 2), and is essential to the walk that is worthy of the Lord (Col. i. 11). It becomes the elect of God (iii. 12) and is evidently a reflection of that image after which the new man has been created (i. 11). If any of our readers can read these words without the humbling sense of failure in the past to reach this high standard, then they are already much nearer to perfection than the writer of these lines, or they are blind to their own shortcomings. Why did the apostle associate "faith" with "longsuffering"? Possibly for the same reason that he joined together the two exhortations "Do all to the glory of God" and "Give none offence". In urging Timothy to maintain the faith, he did not want him to become a bigot, consequently, he added to faith, longsuffering, that the balance might be maintained.

"Charity" agape. There is a world of theology packed into the choice and the history of this word. The word "charity" has lost its primitive meaning to-day, its stages being indicated by the passing of time, and suggested in the following:

(1) "The charity of God, that is in Jesus Christ our Lord" (Rom. viii. 39).
(2) "Charity begins at home."
(3) "As cold as charity."

This word came into our language from the Latin caritas. To-day we must translate agape consistently and always by the word "love".

The Greek language has three words for love, philein, eran, agapan. Eran denotes the love of passion, of vehement, sensual desire; but so unsuitable was this word, by usage so saturated with lustful ideas, to express the moral and holy character of that love with which scripture in particular has to do, that it does not occur in a good sense even in the Old Testament save in Prov. iv. 6; Wisdom 8:2, and, as already remarked, not at all in the New Testament.

However often agapan and philein are used in the same combinations and relations, it must not be overlooked that in all cases wherein the simple designation of kindred, a friendly or in any way intimate relation between friends &c., was required, the words philos, philein were naturally used.

"We shall not go wrong if we define the distinction thus: philein denotes the love of natural inclination, affection—love, so to say, originally spontaneous, involuntary (amare); agapan on the other hand, love as a direction of the will (diligere)." Agape "love" is not found in the profane writers, it is unknown either in Philo or Josephus, and was coined apparently by the LXX.

> "It denotes the love which chooses its object with decision of will, so that it becomes self-denying or compassionate devotion to and for the same, love in its fullest conceivable form; love as it is the distinguishing mark, not of humanity, but, in the strictest sense, of Divinity" (Cremer).

What teaching, and what example, is found in the apostle's epistles regarding this great quality. We must read Rom. xiv. and I Cor. xiii. to see something of its spirit at work. We must read the whole of II Corinthians to realize its presence in the apostle's ministry. The expression "in love" occurs six times in Ephesians and once in Colossians, making seven in these basic epistles of the mystery. Coming to the epistles to Timothy and Titus, we find agape occurring ten times. We find it joined with "faith" in I Tim. i. 14; ii. 15; vi. 11; II Tim. i. 13; ii. 22; iii. 10; Titus ii. 2. "Love", said the apostle, "suffers long and is kind" (I Cor. xiii. 4), and the need of this longsuffering may be seen in the words of II Cor. xii. 15, "The more abundantly I love you, the less I be loved".

"Patience" hupomone, from hupomeno to remain under, so endure, sustain. This is the word which meets us in II Tim. ii. 10, 12.

> "Therefore I endure all things for the elect's sakes."
> "If we suffer we shall also reign with Him."

This grace of patience has much to do with the race and the crown.

> "Let us run with patience the race that is set before us. Looking unto Jesus the author and finisher of faith, Who for the joy that was set before Him endured the cross" (Heb. xii. 1, 2).

Paul had "finished" his course, and he shows Timothy very clearly that without "patience" this can never be done. So James speaks of patience having its perfect work, and endurance leading to the crown (James i. 3, 4, 12). In the long list of evidences that Paul puts into II Cor. vi. patience comes first, "In much patience, in afflictions, in necessities, in distresses" (4).

How much Christian service has been spoiled by lack of longsuffering, or lack of patience, only "that day" will reveal. Indeed, without these four "cardinal virtues", namely, faith, longsuffering, love and patience, the persecutions and afflictions which came upon the apostle would have been emptied of value.

> "Persecutions, afflictions, which came unto me at Antioch, at Iconium, at Lystra; what persecutions I endured; but out of them all the Lord delivered me" (II Tim. iii. 11).

Here the apostle travels back over the years to the first great missionary journey he had undertaken. One of the reasons why he sent Timothy's mind back to those days was that the mission was conducted in entire independence of Jerusalem. The Holy Ghost had separated Barnabas and Saul for the work which they undertook.

> "And thence sailed to Antioch, from whence they had been recommended to the grace of God for the work which they fulfilled" (Acts xiv. 26).

Remember, said Paul, in effect, that his ministry was entirely independent of man or men.

> "Paul an apostle (not of men, neither by man, but by Jesus Christ, and God the Father, Who raised Him from the dead)" (Gal. i. 1).

These challenging words written to the Galatians (which covered Antioch, Lystra, Derbe*) must be remembered by Timothy and by ourselves, and the independence of man which the opening challenge conveys, is still to be understood in the twice repeated assertion:

[* - For proof see "The Apostle of the Reconciliation", p.75.]

> "I am ordained a preacher, and an apostle (I speak the truth in Christ and lie not); a teacher of the Gentiles in faith and verity" (I Tim. ii. 7).
> "I am appointed a preacher, and an apostle, and a teacher of the Gentiles" (II Tim. i. 11).

While Paul is "but a minister by whom ye believed", that ministry was of God, and it is a vital element in our stand for the truth to-day. The reference back to Antioch moreover, would remind Timothy of the fact that here, for the first time, the great doctrine of justification by faith was enunciated.

> "Be it known unto you therefore, men and brethren, that through this man is preached unto you the forgiveness of sins: and by Him all that believe are justified from all things from which ye could not be justified by the law of Moses" (Acts xiii. 38, 39).

Again, at Antioch, the first great foreshadowing of the crisis of Acts xxviii. was given:

> "Beware therefore, lest that come upon you, which was spoken of in the prophets . . . . . lo, we turn to the Gentiles" (Acts xiii. 40-46).

Acts xxviii. is the dispensational boundary, and at the setting aside of Israel, the mystery was made manifest; Timothy is urged to keep this well in mind. Not only is the doctrine of Paul's early ministry thus brought to mind, but also the persecutions and the sufferings that he had been called upon to endure. Paul does not hide from Timothy that the ministry to which he was called involved suffering.

> "Be not thou therefore ashamed of the testimony of our Lord, nor of me His prisoner; but be thou partaker of the AFFLICTIONS of the gospel" (II Tim. i. 8).

On either side of this exhortation is the Divine enstrengthening:

> "For God hath not given us the spirit of fear but of POWER . . . . . according to the POWER of God" (II Tim. i. 7, 8).

In the last chapter of this epistle, the apostle refers to his own distresses:

> "At my first answer no man stood with me" (II Tim. iv. 16).

This however, is immediately followed by the triumphant:

> "Notwithstanding the Lord stood with me, and strengthened me; that by me the preaching might be fully known, and that all the Gentiles might hear: and I was delivered out of the mouth of the lion. And the Lord shall deliver me from every evil work, and will preserve me unto His heavenly kingdom, to Whom be glory for ever and ever. Amen" (II Tim. iv. 17, 18).

So, although Timothy would remember the tumult at Antioch (Acts xiii. 45-50), the assault at Iconium (Acts xiv. 1-5) and the stoning at Lystra (19), he is exhorted by the apostle to remember also the fact that:

> "Out of them all the Lord delivered me" (II Tim. iii. 11).

Here, we must stay, although the complete statement has not been surveyed. Let us ponder these words of the apostle as written to ourselves. Let us not minimize the persecuting spirit of the enemy of truth, let us not think that we shall be exempt, but nevertheless let us enter into the spirit of this unashamed apostle and be able to say with him:

> "He hath said, I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee. So that we may boldly say, The Lord is my helper, and I will not fear what man shall do unto me" (Heb. xiii. 5, 6).

#32. The abiding, and the assurance of the true successor to Paul (iii. 12 - 14).
pp. 211 - 214

Paul had reminded Timothy of his own experiences at Antioch, Iconium and at Lystra, and had added the comforting comment that "out of them all the Lord delivered me". Before he proceeds to the next great theme of this section, he adds a word for us all.

> "Yea, and all that will live godly in Christ Jesus shall suffer persecution" (II Tim. iii. 12).

"Will" and "shall" are often the indications of the future tense in an English sentence, and the casual reader may see no more in the "will" and the "shall" of verse eleven than this. Upon examination however, we find that "will live godly" employs the verb thelo "to will", and Weymouth goes so far as to translate the passage, "Every one who is determined to lead a godly life". Conybeare and Howson give a similar rendering, "Yea, and all who determine to live a godly life". Alford renders the passage, "All who are minded to live piously", and comments:

> "Hardly so strong as determine (Conyb.). Nor can it be said that thelontes is emphatic as Huth. It requires its meaning of purpose to be clearly expressed not slurred over; but that meaning is not especially prominent."

Thelema, the noun, is found in two passages of II Timothy:

> "Paul, an apostle of Jesus Christ by the Will of God" (i. 1).
> "Taken captive by him at his will" (ii. 26).

The verb occurs in I Timothy three times, and in the first occurrence it is translated "desire", "Desiring to be teachers of the law" (i. 7). The apostle's meaning in II Tim. iii. 12 seems to be expressed in the rather wide interpretation suggested by Alford "All who are minded", so long as we remember the original and do not build false arguments from the word "mind". Why does the apostle open his next sentence with "but"?

> "But evil men and seducers shall wax worse and worse, deceiving and being deceived"?

There does not seem to be much sense in reading:

> "But on the other hand evil men and seducers shall wax worse and worse," for there is no real contrast. May it not be that the real contrast is found in the word translated "wax" in contrast by anticipation with the word "continue" of verse 14? For the word translated "wax" is prokopto, and has already been used by the apostle in the epistle.

> "For they will increase unto more ungodliness" (ii. 16).
> "But they shall proceed no further" (iii. 9).
> "Evil men . . . . . shall wax worse and worse" (iii. 13).

Prokopto means, to drive forwards as if with repeated strokes (Dr. Bullinger's Lexicon).

"To continue" (iii. 14), on the other hand, is the translation of meno "to abide", as in ii. 13 and iv. 20, and is a strong contrast with the "driving forward" of these men who are called "evil" and "seducers".

"Evil" poneros is the character of this age "this evil age" (Gal. i. 4) and of the "wicked" one (Matt. xiii. 19). The apostle uses the word but once more in II Timothy, namely when he says:

> "And the Lord shall preserve me from every evil work" (iv. 18).

"Seducer" goes from goao "to moan", and referring to the "wizards that peep and mutter" (Isa. viii. 19). Secular writers join goes with magos "magician" and Josephus uses the word to describe an imposter during the government of Felix (Jos. Ant. xx. vii). The reader will need no reminder of Jannes and Jambres who withstood Moses and whom the apostle brought forward to exemplify the kind of opposition which the truth will meet in the last days (iii. 1-8). Neither will he need reminding of the teachers who will turn away the ears of the people from the truth and turn them unto fables or myths (iv. 4). There is an apparent contradiction between II Tim. ii. 16, iii. 9 and iii. 13, for one passage says "they will increase", another passage using the same word says "they shall proceed no further", and yet another using the same word says "they shall wax worse and worse". The discrepancy however is only superficial. Timothy is warned in ii. 16 to shun profane and vain babblings, for such will increase, yea eat as a canker. He is comforted in iii. 9 by the fact that all evil has a limit, and just as Jannes and Jambres were compelled to admit that their enchantments failed in the presence of the mighty power of God, so shall be made manifest the folly of the opponents of the truth "as theirs also was". Until that day comes, however, Timothy and ourselves must expect evil men and seducers to wax worse and worse, and consequently persecution for the truth's sake will never be far away. "Deceiving and being deceived." Can anyone be a deceiver of others without being eventually deceived himself? It would appear not, for the very untruth that one teaches wittingly or unwittingly, takes the place of the truth that alone makes free. Planao, translated "to deceive", primarily means "to wander", which meaning is still preserved in our word "planet", translated in Jude 13 "wandering stars" and in the references to "wandering" or "straying" sheep (Matt. xviii. 12; I Pet. ii. 25). When at last God shall send "a strong delusion (plane) that they shall believe the lie" (II Thess. ii. 11) it is but a judicial reflex for such "received not the love of the truth, that they might be saved"; "who believed not the truth but had pleasure in unrighteousness" (II Thess. ii. 10-12).

In intense and purposeful contrast with this expansion of error, the apostle places Timothy's "continuance". It is not easy to divorce some element of movement from the English word "continue" but the Greek meno, meaning to abide or to remain, has no such idea at all. Other translations of meno in the Authorized Version are "be present", "abide", "dwell", "tarry", "remain". The idea is well expressed in I Cor. xiii. In contrast with those things which are to "vanish away" or "be done away" or "be put away" (8-11) there "abide" or "remain" these three, "faith, hope and love" (13). Timothy's safety and usefulness were essentially connected with his abiding or remaining unmoved respecting the things which he had heard. Two added considerations are urged by the apostle, namely Timothy's "assurance" and the source of his knowledge "knowing of whom thou hast learned them". If we follow the received text and read tinos singular, "of whom" will be an exclusive reference to Paul, and this reference will fall into line with all those other references where Paul claims to be the appointed channel through whom the distinctive teaching of the mystery was made known. If we follow the revised text and read tinon plural, "of whom" would include those like Timothy's mother and grandmother (i. 5) whose influence would still be strong upon his heart and mind.

It is impossible with the material we have to hand to be dogmatic, but the scales seem to dip if anything towards the received text, and to be in favour of the singular, and so to Paul himself. The word chosen by Paul to indicate Timothy's association with himself or with others, as his teacher or teachers is suggestive. Timothy did not learn the truth "of" Paul (ek) for Paul was not its "source" he was but an earthen vessel filled by grace. He did not even use the preposition dia "through" as he could have done, and as he has done elsewhere, as in II Tim. iv. 17 "that through me the preaching might be fully known". Paul uses the word para, a word found in a similar context in i. 13 and ii. 2 "which thou hast heard of me". Timothy would feel that he was being addressed as an equal. He had stood "beside" the apostle and learned the truth, not by giving an unintelligent or unwilling assent to the words of a despot, nor by being carried away by the dreams and self-originated visions of a dreamer. In II Tim. ii. 2 Paul goes so far as to include the testimony of "many witnesses", and in the immediate context (iii. 15) the apostle is found bringing his doctrine and teaching to the touchstone of inspired Scripture.

The question of the inspiration of scripture is a great one, it underlies every phase of teaching and preaching. It has been the object of the most persistent attacks, and this attack is a characteristic of the time of the end (iv. 2-4). While we have not felt called upon to devote our time and space to the defence of the Scriptures, being more concerned with making known what the Scriptures teach, the fact that the apostle spoke so strongly upon this subject when writing this last epistle to his son in the faith, shows how important the matter is. We cannot do justice to such a subject at the close of an article and therefore will devote all the space available in our next study to this fundamental of all fundamentals, the inspiration of all Scripture.

#33. The Divine Inspiration of all Scripture (iii. 15 - 17).
pp. 227 - 232

This last of Paul's epistles which we are studying together, contains two great fundamentals.

(1) The fundamental doctrine concerning the inspiration of all Scripture.
(2) The fundamental principle of its "right division".

The former great doctrine has been systematically denied and to-day is considered a relic of the days of unscientific thinking and of superstition, the latter has been ignored. Consequently there is no authoritative voice, and we are getting, doctrinally, to the condition of the days of the Judges, when:

> "There was no king in Israel, and every man did that which was right in his own eyes" (Judges xxi. 25).

or, those for whom such a state of utter independence is intolerable, turn to Rome where the Church has taken the place of Scripture, and constituted itself as the supreme authority. Where there has been some recognition of the truth of the Word, the edge of its teaching has been blunted by failure to decide its message aright, and therefore this second epistle to Timothy is of supreme value to every true Berean who holds to the infallibility of the Scriptures and to the necessity for its right division.

Let us restate the analysis of the section now before us:

S A L V A T I O N.

B | 15-. The CHILD.
C | -15-. The Holy Scriptures, grammata.
D | -15. Wise unto SALVATION.

S E R V I C E.

C | 16. All Scripture, graphe.
D | 16. Profitable for DOCTRINE.
B | 17. The MAN.

We observe at once the comprehensive scope of the Scriptures. They are for "the child", but they are also needed by "the man of God". They make wise unto salvation, but they are profitable for doctrine, they lead to faith in Christ Jesus, they also fully equip the man of God unto all good works. It was the consciousness of this wonderful comprehensiveness of the Scriptures as well as the fact that the wide marginal notes were a companion to the text, that led Dr. Bullinger to call his last great work "The Companion Bible", and to print upon the title page the words:

> "When thou goest, it shall lead thee; When thou sleepest, it shall keep thee; And when thou awakest, it shall talk with thee" (Prov. vi. 22).

It will be noticed that two related words are chosen by the apostle to refer to the "Scriptures", gramma and graphe. Both are derived from grapho "to write", but usage has given to each word a distinctive meaning. There are fifty-one occurrences of graphe in the New Testament and, without exception, every reference is translated "scripture" or "scriptures". The distribution of graphe "scripture" and "scriptures" is as follows: Matthew, 4 occurrences; Mark, 4; Luke, 4; John, 12; Acts, 7; Romans, 7; Rest of Paul's epistles, 7; James, 3; Peter, 3.

The phrase "it is written" gegraphai, literally "it hath been written (and remains so)", refers to the Scriptures as an authority. Such examples as Matt. iv. 4; Mark xiv. 27; Luke vii. 27; John xii. 14; Acts xv. 15; Rom. i. 17; I Cor. i. 19; II Cor. ix. 9; Gal. iii. 10; Heb. x. 7; I Pet. i. 16, will show that Gospels, Acts and Epistles use this expression with this special significance. "The Writings" became the exclusive name of the sacred books of the people of Israel. A canvass of the expression, will show that it is applied equally to the Law, the Prophets or the Psalms.

Gramma is also used to indicate "the scriptures", but generally it is found with the addition of ta hiera "the sacred writings". While graphe denotes "that which is written" with reference to the Scriptures as a whole or in parts, gramma refers to the "letters" rather as an object of study and learning. So, in John vii. 15 we read: "How knoweth this man letters, having never learned."

The figure is familiar to us, we speak of a "man of letters", either intending a scholar, or more usually, a literary man or author. From gramma came grammateus "the scribe", the man who studied the Scriptures and, by so doing, possessed some authority in Israel. It is therefore a happy distribution of the two words that we find in II Tim. iii. 15, 16. Where he speaks of the child, Paul uses grammata, "the alphabet", but where he speaks of the man of God, he uses graphe the authoritative scriptures. These "letters" are called "holy". The word so translated is hieros, a word familiar to us in the Egyptian hieroglyphics "sacred engravings", but not so familiar to us is the Biblical hierogrammata. Hierus is translated "priest" in the New Testament, and hieron "temple". The apostle selected the word hierourgeo "to minister as a priest" when he spoke of his own particular relationship to the offering up of the Gentiles (Rom. xv. 16). In order to distinguish hieros from hagios it is wise to use the word "sacred" for hieros, reserving "holy" for hagios. Paul refers to the Scriptures which Timothy learned as a child as "the sacred letters", partly because the other "sacred" things, such as priesthood, sacrifice and temple, were passing away.

Brephos "from a child". The New Testament uses seven different words which are translated "child".

Teknon, from tikto to bear, like Scottish "bairn".

Huios, a son, especially emphasizing relationship with the father.

Pais. In relation to descent, a child; in relation to age, a boy or a girl; in relation to condition, a slave (as French use garcon, and we use "post-boy").

Paidon, a diminutive of pais, an infant.

Paidarion, another diminutive of pais, a little boy or girl.
Brephos, allied with "embryo" (see Luke i. 41), the new born babe.

The apostle goes right back to the time of birth in the word he chose, and while we are not to understand literally that upon the very first day that Timothy was born, he was taught the sacred letters, we must understand that his mother lost no time, but at the earliest moment sought to lead her little son in the way of the truth. Peter uses this word when he says:

> "As newborn babes desire the sincere milk of the word" (I Pet. ii. 2).

We have no exact knowledge as to the age of Timothy, but if we reckon that he was twenty-one years of age when he joined Paul, as recorded in Acts xvi. 1, then, when his mother began the instruction of her infant son, the Lord Jesus had only just commenced His public ministry. We read that his mother was "a Jewess and believed" (Acts xvi. 1), and that his grandmother also was a believer (II Tim. i. 5). Here we have a splendid example of what the apostle himself was endeavouring to impress upon Timothy. The mind stored and instructed by the teaching of the Scriptures (in the case of Timothy and his mother, the O.T. Scriptures), was being made "wise unto salvation through faith that is in Christ Jesus". When we were considering the special word orthotomeo "rightly divide" (II Tim. ii. 15), we said that Timothy would have no difficulty in understanding its meaning, even though the word does not occur anywhere else in the New Testament, for he would have been familiar with it in Prov. iii. 6, "He shall direct (rightly divide) thy paths".

So, when he read sophizo "to make wise", even though he may have known Peter's use of the word in the expression "cunningly devised fables" (II Pet. i. 16), he would remember another passage of Scripture which he had learned at his mother's knee, namely Psalm xix. 7:

> "The law of the Lord is perfect, converting the soul: the testimony of the Lord is sure making wise the simple."

He may also have taken a little courage, as he thought of his youthfulness and the great work he was called to do, by remembering another passage, learnt in his early days:

> "Thou through Thy commandments has made me wiser than mine enemies; for they are ever with me" (Psa. cxix. 98).

We now come to the great text concerning the inspiration of Scripture:

> "All Scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness; that the man of God may be perfect thoroughly furnished unto all good works" (II Tim. iii. 16, 17).

The Revised Version gives the following translation of this verse: "Every Scripture inspired by God is also profitable", and as the question is so fundamental we must ask the reader's patient and careful attention, even though the nature of the enquiry necessitate references to dry grammar and requires some hard thinking. In order to make the grammatical problem as clear as possible to the reader not too familiar with Greek syntax, we give a few specimens of parallel construction and then show the absurdities which result by translating them, as the Revised Version has translated II Tim. iii. 16.

Romans vii. 12.

He entole		hagia	kai	dikaia.
The Commandment	is	holy	and	just.

I Corinthians xi. 30.

Polloi		astheneis	kai	arrhostoi.
Many	are	weak	and	sickly.

II Timothy iii. 16.

Pasa graphe		Theopneustos	kai	ophelimos.
All Scripture	is	given by inspiration of God	and	is profitable.

Hebrews iv. 13.

Panta de		gumna	kai	tetrachelismena.
But all things	are	naked	and	opened.

To these could be added five other examples, namely, II Cor. x. 10; I Tim. i. 15; ii. 3; iv. 4 and iv. 9, but the above are sufficient. To help the reader, we draw attention to the fact that in the second column, the verb "is" or "are" being absent from the original has to be supplied. Kai the conjunction, is sometimes translated "also", as we have found in the Revised Version of II Tim. iii. 16. If it be permissible to translate pasa graphe theopneustos kai ophilimos, "Every scripture inspired of God is also profitable", to apply the same rule to the four examples given above would make them read: "the commandment (being) holy is also just", "many (being) weak are also sickly", "all things (being) naked are also opened". But who does not know that things which are naked must be also opened to the all-seeing eye of the Lord? Such misapplication of learning produces error.

Dean Burgon's words are to the point here.

> "At a period of prevailing unbelief in the INSPIRATION of Scripture, nothing but real necessity could warrant the meddling with such a testimony on the subject as is found in II Tim. iii. 16. We have hitherto been taught to believe that 'All Scripture is given by inspiration of GOD, and is profitable' etc. The ancients* clearly so understood S. Paul's words: and so do the most learned and thoughtful of the moderns. Pasa graphe, even if it be grammata of which the Apostle had been speaking in the previous verse; and therefore must needs signify the whole of Scripture. So that the expression 'all Scripture' expresses S. Paul's meaning exactly, and should not have been disturbed."
>
> [* - The Dean cites Clemens, Tertullian, Origen, Gregory Nyss, Dial (ap. Orig. 1808), Basil, Chrysostom, Cyril and Theodoret.]

Bishop Middleton says;

> "I do not recollect any passage in the N.T. in which two adjectives, apparently connected by the copulative, were intended by the writer to be so unnaturally disjoined. He who can produce such an instance, will do much towards establishing the plausibility of a translation, which otherwise must appear, to say the least of it, to be forced and improbable . . . . . But in fact the proposed rendering is inadmissible, being without logical coherence and consistency. The utmost that could be pretended would be that S. Paul's assertion is that 'every portion of Scripture being inspired (i.e. inasmuch as it is—because it is—inspired) is also profitable', etc., else there could be no meaning in the kai. But, in the name of common sense, if this be so, why have the blessed words been meddled with?"

Dr. Henderson cites the following rule, when dealing with the rendering of II Tim. iii. 16 adopted by the R.V.:

> "Such a mode of construction is at variance with a common rule of Greek syntax—which requires that, when two adjectives are closely joined, as theopneustos and ophelimos ('given by inspiration of God' and 'profitable') here are, if there be an ellipsis (an omission) of the substantive verb esti (is), this verb must be supplied after the former of the two, and regarded as repeated after the latter."

This rule is observed in the translation of the A.V. but is broken by the translation given in the R.V. Let us now turn to the actual wording of this passage. We have already spoken of the usage of graphe, which though it could mean, anything written by anybody, is strictly reserved in the New Testament to refer to the Holy Scriptures, "THE" writings par excellence. Graphe therefore must be considered as equivalent to a proper name, and be treated as an appellative. Pasa graphe therefore signifies tota Scriptura "the whole Scripture", as pasa Ierosoluma "all Jerusalem" (Matt. ii. 3) and pas oikos Israel "all the house of Israel" (Acts ii. 36). We find that Josephus, a contemporary of Paul, uses a similar expression to theopheustos, saying of the complete canon of Old Testament Scriptures, that the prophets "Wrote according to pneustia that comes from God", and Philo, another contemporary, in his account of an embassy to the emperor Gaius, calls the Scriptures "theochrest oracles", that is oracles given under the dictation of God. Theopneustos is composed of Theos "God" and a word derived from pneo "to breathe". Let us acquaint ourselves a little more closely with this word pneo and its derivatives.

Pneo. "The winds blew" (Matt. vii. 25). There are seven occurrences of pneo in the New Testament and every reference in the English refers to the "wind" blowing, although we must remember that more than one word is translated "wind" in the A.V.

Pnoe. "A rushing mighty wind" (Acts ii. 2); "He giveth to all life, and breath" (Acts xvii. 25). These are the only occurrences of pnoe.

Pneuma. "God hath not given us the spirit of fear" (II Tim. i. 7). This word has at least fourteen distinguishable usages in the New Testament, as for example "God is spirit", "the Holy Spirit", "the gifts". It is however outside our subject to pursue these subdivisions here.

Pneumatikon. "Now concerning spiritual (gifts)" (I Cor. xii. 1).

Pneumatikos. "Spiritually discerned" (I Cor. ii. 14).
Ekpneo. "He gave up the ghost" (Luke xxiii. 46).
Empneo. "Saul, yet breathing out threatenings" (Acts ix. 1).
Kapnos. "Vapour of smoke" (Acts ii. 19).
Hupopneo. "And when the south wind blew softly" (Acts xxvii. 13).

The word has entered into our language, and we have such words as pneometer, pneumatic and pneumonia in each case retaining the primitive idea of "breathing". The words "inspiration" and "inspire" are used in the English language with this primitive idea of breathing, as well as in the doctrinal sense. It is used as the opposite of expire, and we speak of the inspiratory organs, which draw in the air during respiration. The apostle Paul asserts that "the sacred letters" or "all scripture" is "breathed by God". In this passage it is not the writers that are in view. Holy men of God indeed were moved by the Spirit of God (II Pet. i. 21), but Paul, in II Tim. iii. 16, is speaking of "the writings" themselves. What has been written in pasa graphe "all scripture" is nothing less nor more than what "God breathed". They are inspired words. It follows that such Scriptures must be inerrant, infallible, authoritative, perfect.

Truth in the Balance.

#11. An examination of several books of the New Testament in which "balance" is an integral factor in true interpretation.

pp. 56 - 58

We have put a number of the doctrines of Scripture into the scales, and found that truth is whole when truth is balanced, but when truth is not put into the scales it can easily be perverted. The reader of The Berean Expositor cannot read many of its pages without realizing that this element of balance plays an important part in our arrival at the truth of an epistle, a book, a passage or the whole purpose of the ages. From the vast outline of the age purpose commencing with Gen. i. 1 and ending with I Cor. xv. 28 (which we have considered in Nos.2 and 3 of this series), to the "one word" quoted by Paul from Isa. vi. (Acts xviii. 25-27) this balance and correspondence is discoverable, and a judicious use of it is an all important factor in interpretation. Let us take a few examples, most of them known to the reader, but which if brought together in one article may prove a demonstration that cannot be denied.

Let us apply this principle of balance to the Gospel according the Matthew, the Acts of the Apostles, the epistles to the Ephesians and to the Hebrews, and while avoiding anything like fullness of detail let us note the outstanding features which most clearly testify to the value of this method of study.

MATTHEW. ITS TWOFOLD TIME NOTE.
1st half of the Gospel.	2nd half of the Gospel.
"From that time Jesus began to preach and to say, Repent; for the kingdom of heaven is at hand" (iv. 17).	"From that time began Jesus Christ to show unto His disciples, how that He must suffer many things of the elders and chief priests . . . . . and be killed—and the third day be raised up" (xvi. 21 R.V. margin).
"And lo, a voice from heaven, saying, 'This is My beloved Son, in Whom I am well pleased" (iii. 17).	"And behold a voice out of the cloud, which said, 'This is My beloved Son, in Whom I am well pleased; hear ye Him" (xvii. 5).

Without the addition of any further material, it is evident that the references given, clearly indicate that the Gospel according to Matthew falls into two distinct portions, and when this is recognized, no scheme of interpretation will be acceptable that does not give full place to this inspired subdivision.

We turn next to that most important book, the Acts of the Apostles, and once again, by observing the balance of its parts, we are compelled to recognize that the book is practically an account of and a comparison of two ministries, those of Peter and Paul.

THE ACTS. THE TWO MINISTRIES, PETER and PAUL.
Peter.	Paul.
Jerusalem. Holy Spirit (i. 15 - ii. 13). Israel in the land (ii. 14 - viii. 1). Cornelius, the Gentile (viii. 1 - xi. 30). Prison and close of ministry (xii. 1-19).	Antioch. Holy Spirit (xii. 24 - xiii. 3). Dispersed outside the land (xiii. 4 - xiv. 28). Epistles to Gentiles (xv. 1 - xix. 20). Prison, close of one ministry (xix. 21) and commencement of another (xxviii. 31).

The reader is asked to remember, that in the effort to reduce the four subdivisions of Acts, into four lines of print, the unavoidable exclusion of detail may give a false impression. If however, each section is taken and examined, the balance of parts will become so evident that the purpose of Luke, in vindicating Paul from the charges laid against him by the Jews, will be clear. In the series of articles on the Acts, which commenced in Volume XXIV, this analysis is taken to a considerable length and the interested reader may acquaint himself with what has there been presented.

The first epistle of the Mystery is the Epistle to the Ephesians, and whether our exposition has been of Genesis on the one hand or of the Apocalypse on the other, every article in The Berean Expositor has been written with Ephesians as the basic epistle of our calling constantly in mind. We have set out the structure of this Epistle in its literary form, in Volume XXXV, p.123, and in XVIII, p.167; as a chart in the form of a tree in Volume XXIV, p.4, and as a pair balances in Number 10 of the Berean Messages.

The last example of this particular aspect of the subject "Truth in the balance" is the presentation of the epistle to the Hebrews.

HEBREWS.
On to Perfection	Back to Perdition
The Word Spoken \ Thou art the same } i. and ii. How escape if neglect /	Him that speaketh \ Jesus Christ the same } xii. 25 - xiii. No escape if refuse /
Let us come boldly \ Examples of unbelief \ Perfect v. Babes } iii. to vi. No renewal unto repentance / Senses exercised. /	Let us draw near \ Examples of faith \ x. 19 Sons v. Firstborn } to. No place for repentance / xii. 25 Discipline exercised. /
Perfection. Where? But this Man. vii. 24. No perfection in priesthood. No perfection in law. No perfection in ordinances. No perfection in sacrifices. But this man. x. 12

Hebrews is addressed to believers, "Holy brethren, partakers of the heavenly calling". The exhortation is "let us go unto perfection", the warning is the alternative of "drawing back unto perdition". Examples of unbelief are taken from Israel in the wilderness who did not mingle faith with the things they heard, while examples of belief are taken from the Old Testament characters who from Abel to Moses manifested the truth that “faith is the substance of things hoped for”.

Truth in the balance is the sacred imprint on all Scripture.

DEAR FELLOW-BELIEVERS,

During the past two years, we rejoice to record that criticism and exclusion of our witness, has given place, in some cases to acknowledgment that the publications associated with The Berean Expositor, honour the Scriptures as the Word of God, are expository in the richest and fullest sense of the Word, and that our insistence on the supreme importance of viewing all Scripture dispensationally, is slowly, if reluctantly being admitted. For even the smallest indication that our many years of "Crying in the wilderness" may at last be heard and heeded we unitedly give God thanks.

The present volume contains an innovation. We refer to the issues of May 1953 and 1954, where the ordinary articles were suspended and the whole issue devoted to the claims of dispensational truth. These issues were republished as booklets and made available for wide distribution. Their titles are:

THE DISPENSATIONAL FRONTIERS. Acts xxviii. 23-31.

WHO THEN IS PAUL?

We hope to continue this mode of presenting the truth and earnestly ask every reader to co-operate with us in this missionary effort.

Both the General Secretary and the Secretary for the Publications join me in expressing our sincere thanks for all the encouragement we have received over these two years, with the hope that it may be increased as we realize that the end of the present dispensation of grace draws near.

Yours in the grace of Christ,

CHARLES H. WELCH,
GEORGE T. FOSTER,
LEONARD A. CANNING.

On The Threshold

p. 120

Under this heading as opportunity occurs, we are printing a series of short meditations, originally designed to accompany a daily reading. We have, as a matter of interest, retained the original date heading, and the reader will understand why we have entitled this series "On the Threshold", for in 1909, we commenced the series entitled "Dispensational Expositions" in Thing to Come and at the same time No.1, Volume I of The Berean Expositor was published. There is nothing very striking about this simple little series, it sought then to minister to the heart's need and that need is as great to-day if not greater.

JANUARY 1st, 1908

"Take my yoke upon you, and learn of Me; for I am meek and lowly in heart" (Matt. xi. 29).

As one looks toward the opening of another year, with the consciousness of much failure, the text above seems to give a wondrous message. As heavy laden ones by grace we have come to Him, and He has given us rest (28), shall we not as saved ones, still come to Him? We can either frame our code of regulations for another year, and miserably break them, or, as this verse teaches we may be linked to the Blessed Person of our Saviour Himself, to walk as He walked; not to learn something about Him, but to learn of Him. There can be no learning without the yoke. Fellowship with the Lord is far more important than scholarship, and moreover, we have a responsibility—we are to take the yoke. This word "take" is the same as that in Matt. xvi. 24 where it refers to taking up the cross, for even Christ learned obedience by the things He suffered (Heb. v. 8). The original word is also translated "to bear", as in John i. 29 and I Pet. ii. 24. Thanks be to God it is His yoke we are called upon to bear, and it is light, let us remember, He bare our sins, surely gratitude should link us to Him! The character of Christ is here wonderfully revealed, "meek and lowly in heart", and thus should every teacher be, see II Tim. ii. 24, 25. This is the great lesson we have to learn, and we can only hope to succeed as we are joined to Him. May it be our blessed experience for by so doing we shall find rest unto our souls.

(At the end of this year 1908, we had an interview with Dr. Bullinger which brought us into association with "The Companion Bible" and Things to Come, and led to the witness now known as The Berean Forward Movement. We trust, however far we have traveled since January 1908, we have traveled "with Him").

Emmanuel, God with us.

No.1. (Being a continuation of the series entitled "In Adam").

pp. 148 - 152

Angels appear to be separate creations, there being no marriage or giving in marriage in the spirit world, and angels fell from their high and holy position, and there is no guarantee that they will not fall again in ages to come. To make this dread occurrence impossible appears to have been solved as He alone could solve it. The heirs of glory destined to occupy a place even higher than that of angels, were not created as separate entities. They came into existence through "one man" Adam. Every child born into this world has one common father, the race is organically one for good or evil. Into this race, in the fullness of time God became incarnate, the Word was made flesh, a body was prepared for Him, and at His birth He was announced to be Emmanuel "God with us".

To those who have taken the apostle Paul as the Divinely ordained apostle, teacher and pattern for believers of the present dispensation, it is natural and right that they should place such a text as that of I Cor. xv. 3 near the forefront of their testimony concerning the work of Christ in the great matter of salvation:

> "For I delivered unto you first of all that which I also received, how that Christ died for our sins according to the Scriptures" (I Cor. xv. 3).

We meet with this same basic doctrine in Romans where we read:

> "But God commendeth His love toward us, in that, while we were yet sinners Christ died for us" (Rom. v. 8).

The phrases "first of all" and "while we were yet sinners" fully justify the primary importance with which this aspect of the work of Christ is regarded. That which is first in the experimental order, however, is not necessarily the first in the historical order, and a moment's reflection will reveal that, however fundamental and primary the doctrine that "Christ died for our sins" may be, much had to be done before that death on the cross could be accomplished.

These thoughts arise as a result of pondering the opening of Matthew's Gospel, for there, at the close of the genealogy, the Saviour is given a twofold name: "Thou shalt call His name Jesus; for He shall save His people from their sins", and, "Behold a virgin shall be with child, and shall bring forth a son, and they shall call His name Emmanuel, which being interpreted is, God with us" (Matt. i. 21-23). It is the fact that this child, born at Bethlehem, was "Emmanuel", "God with us", that made the glorious doctrine that Christ died for our sins a blessed possibility.

The moment we give expression to these thoughts, passages crowd in upon us from the epistles of Paul which show that this doctrine is by no means absent from their teaching. Before we reach Rom. v. we shall have read the first chapter, where "the Gospel of God", to which Paul had been separated, is distinctly declared to be "concerning His Son", who is presented to us in His twofold nature; "according to the flesh" of the seed of David, and "according to the spirit of holiness", the Son of God with power (Rom. i. 1-4). If the doctrine of Rom. v. 8 is primarily our experimental approach to the gospel, the doctrine of Emmanuel, "God with us", is fundamental and initial. If in our experimental approach, the position of I Cor. xv. 3 be primary to the gospel, yet the close of the chapter is not reached without bringing into prominence the doctrine of Emmanuel, "God with us", for that is incipient in the references to Christ as "the second Man", Who is nevertheless "the Lord from heaven" (I Cor. xv. 47).

The epistle to the Galatians places great stress on the fact that "Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us" (Gal. iii. 13), but it also stresses the Emmanuel aspect by saying that "when the fullness of time was come, God sent forth His Son, made of a woman, made under the law, to redeem them that were under the law" (Gal. iv. 4, 5). In like manner the epistle to the Hebrews sums up its doctrinal teaching in the words, "But this man after He had offered one sacrifice for sins for ever sat down on the right hand of God" (Heb. x. 12), yet the same chapter stresses the Emmanuel aspect of the truth by the words:

> "Wherefore when He cometh into the world, He saith, Sacrifice and offering Thou wouldest not, but a body hath Thou prepared Me" (Heb. x. 5).

Earlier in this epistle we read, "Forasmuch as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, He also Himself likewise took part of the same; that through death He might destroy him that had the power of death, that is, the devil" (Heb. ii. 14). Again, Matthew is not the only one to introduce the great doctrine contained in the name Emmanuel, "God with us", in the opening page of his record, for Hebrews also opens with an emphasis upon "The Son", "The first begotten", Who nevertheless is "the express image of His Person" and Who, not only "made the ages" and "upholds all things by the word of His power" (Heb. i. 2, 3, 5, 6), but is addressed as "God" (i. 8), is to be worshiped by all the angels of God (i. 6) and Who as "Lord" in the beginning laid the foundation of the earth (i. 10). Here then, in Heb. i., ii. and x., we have most gloriously set before us Emmanuel, "God with us".

When we think of the gospel of eternal life, we immediately call to mind John iii. 16, but we also remember that the "giving" of the only begotten Son is not as in that passage, limited by John to the death of the cross, for in the first chapter he writes:

> "And the Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us" (i. 14).

Christ is most surely set forth as Emmanuel, "God with us", in the opening chapter of John's Gospel, for "the Word" Who was made flesh, was, "in the beginning, God" (i. 1). If we leave the doctrine of redemption and the gospel of grace, and turn to other phases of the Divine purpose, we shall see that this Emmanuel doctrine is ever present. Take for example the dispensational portion of Romans, chapters ix., x. and xi. There, in the forefront of chapter ix., we read Israel's privileges, which reach their culmination and crown in the coming of Emmanuel, "God with us",

> "Of whom as concerning the flesh Christ came, Who is over all, God blessed for ever, Amen."

We return to the opening chapter of Matthew's Gospel and observe the place in the unfolding purpose that this Emmanuel doctrine there holds. The chapter falls into two sections:

The Book of the generation of Jesus Christ. A genealogy commencing with Abraham and ending with Joseph, a descendant of David, the husband of Mary (1-17).
The birth of the Saviour and the prophetic fulfillment of Isaiah's prophecy, that His name should be Emmanuel, God with us (18-25).

There is a reason why the N.T. opens as it does, but an acquaintance with the order of the books of the O.T. is necessary to appreciate the way in which the twofold theme of Matt. i. 1-25 corresponds both with the genealogy and with the utter need expressed in the closing book of the Hebrew canon.

The reader is aware that, while the English Version of the O.T. contains exactly the same number of books as the Hebrew canon, the grouping in each case, is not the same. In both, the five books of the law are found occupying the opening section of the Scriptures, but with the commencement of the next section, "The Prophets", a change takes place. While the books of Samuel and of Kings find their place among "The Prophets", the books of Chronicles are placed at the extreme end of the third section, which is headed by the Psalms. Thus, where the A.V. of the O.T. concludes with the twelve minor prophets, Hosea to Malachi, the Hebrew canon concludes with the two books of The Chronicles. Thus, upon the last page of his Scriptures, the Hebrew reader sees the dreadful words, "No remedy" (II Chron. xxxvi. 16). But the reader of the N.T. is blessedly aware that the very next page contains the record of the coming into this world of God's one great remedy, the gift of His Son to be our Saviour. Let us see how the record of the first chapter of Matthew follows on from the closing books of the Old Testament.

Without the preparation of mind afforded by the above introductory notes, most readers, if asked where they would turn in the O.T. for the complete genealogy of Adam onward, would naturally refer to the book of Genesis. This of course is right, but no complete, unbroken, genealogy, commencing from Adam and ending with the days of Saul king of Israel, is to be found except in the opening chapters of the book of Chronicles. Thus in the opening verse we read "Adam, Sheth, Enosh", and in I Chron. ix. 1 is found the summary:

> "So all Israel were reckoned by genealogies, and behold they were written in the book of the kings of Israel and Judah, who were carried away to Babylon for their transgression."

It was because of these transgressions that the words "no remedy" were written in the closing chapter:

> "And the Lord God of their fathers sent to them by His messengers, rising up betimes and sending; because He had compassion on His people, and on His dwelling place. But they mocked the messengers of God, and despised His words, and misused the prophets, until the wrath of the Lord arose against His people, till there was no remedy" (II Chron. xxxvi. 15, 16).

The word translated "remedy" is the Hebrew marpe, which is derived from the verb rapha, "to heal". It forms one of the Jehovah titles, namely "Jehovah-Ropheka", "The Lord hath healeth thee" (Exod. xv. 26). Healing is a figure used in the Scriptures to set forth salvation from sin, and the many miracles of healing found in the Gospels and the Acts have a threefold purpose. First, the immediate healing of the body; secondly, the setting forth in type of the greater, spiritual healing of salvation; thirdly, the exhibition of signs and wonders constituting evidence that the Son of God had come. Thus the cleansing of the leper, the restoration of hearing and of speech, the giving of sight to the blind, the feeding of the hungry, and the raising of the dead, all set forth in type the great salvation that the Lord had come to give.

Upon turning the page and opening the N.T. at the first chapter, we again meet with a genealogy. For the immediate purpose of his gospel, Matthew had no need to trace the Saviour's earthly line back as far as Adam; it was sufficient that he demonstrated that this Child, whose birth at Bethlehem meant so much to His people and to the world, was in direct descent from David and from Abraham.

It is to the companion gospel of Luke that we turn for the Saviour's unbroken line of descent through David and Abraham to Adam. An examination of these two genealogies cannot be made here: it falls better under the series now running through The Berean Expositor entitled "Time and Place".

The essential contrast between the closing book of the Old and the opening book of the New Testament may be demonstrated thus:

Old Testament failure—

Genealogy. Adam, Abraham, David to Zedekiah.
"No remedy."
The restoration proclaimed under Cyrus King of Persia.
Yet Israel was about to become lo ammi, "not My people".

New Testament Victory—

Genealogy. Adam, Abraham, David to Christ.
"Save His people from their sins."
Restoration in the Gospel proclamation, "God with us".

It is very evident therefore that both in the Gospels and in the Epistles the incarnation, the coming into flesh of Him Who is over all, God blessed for ever, is shown to be at the very foundation of all our hopes.

We must therefore pursue this theme in further studies together, in which we shall discover that in Practical Truth as well as in Gospel, Doctrine and Dispensation, the glory of Him Who alone could bear the name Emmanuel, irradiates all with its glorious influence.

No.2. Emmanuel, and the Virgin Birth.
pp. 193 - 196

We have seen the fundamental importance of the doctrine contained in the name of Christ "Emmanuel", and must, before proceeding to consider its bearing upon Gospel, doctrine and practice in the N.T., give some attention to the O.T. prophecy which was fulfilled in the birth of Christ.

The section of Isaiah, which gives us the prophetic name Emmanuel, covers chapters vii. to ix. 7, and in these chapters the teaching of the prophet is made to revolve around children who are given as "signs".

SHEAR-JASHUB "The remnant shall return" (vii. 3). This child accompanied Isaiah when he sought to encourage Ahaz to "Take heed and be quiet", in face of the evil counsel of Syria, Ephraim and the son of Remaliah (vii. 4-9).

Isaiah appears to have entertained extreme doubt as to Ahaz and expressed his doubt in the words "If ye will not believe, surely ye shall not be established" (vii. 9).

To encourage Ahaz yet further in resisting the enmity of these confederate kings, he is called upon to ask a sign of the Lord, whether in the depth, or in the height above. He appears, however to have made up his mind, "he had a policy of his own and was determined to pursue it. He insisted on appealing to Assyria" (G. A. Smith).

> "So Ahaz sent messengers to Tiglath-pileser, King of Assyria, saying, I am thy servant and thy son; come up and save me" (II Kings xvi. 7).

Upon the King's refusal to ask a sign, the prophet replies with the second great sign of the section, the sign of the Virgin's Son.

IMMANUEL "God with us" (vii. 14). We must give this sign closer attention, but will continue and record the third of these signs together with Isaiah's own comment and prophecy.

MAHER-SHALAL-HASH-BAZ "Haste, spoil, speed, prey" (viii. 1-4) which speaks of the coming of the King of Assyria and the spoiling of Damascus and Samaria.

> "Behold, I and the children whom the Lord hath given me are for signs and for wonders in Israel from the Lord of Hosts which dwelleth in mount Zion" (viii. 18).

Finally, in chapter nine, we have the glorious prophecy of Emmanuel more fully stated:

> "For unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given; and the government shall be upon His shoulder; and His name shall be called Wonderful, Counselor, the Mighty God, the Everlasting Father, the Prince of Peace" (ix. 6).

Returning to the Emmanuel sign we observe that like many another Messianic prophecy it had an immediate fulfillment in the life of the hearers, and a fuller and future fulfillment in the Person of Christ. The immediate fulfillment is clearly indicated by the words:

> "Before the child shall know to refuse the evil, and choose the good, the land that thou abhorrest shall be forsaken of both her kings" (vii. 16).

This prophecy was fulfilled within two years of its utterance, as II Kings xv. 30 and xvi. 9 will show.

The reader may feel that his faith is subjected to a strain as he reads Isa. vii., "Behold, a virgin". Are we to believe that on two occasions God miraculously brought about a virgin birth? And if we do so believe, does not this lower the uniqueness of the birth and person of the Redeemer? The answer to this problem is found by examining the actual words employed in the Hebrew O.T. and the Greek of the N.T.

The word translated "virgin" in Isa. vii. 14 is the Hebrew word almah, the word translated "virgin" in Matt. i. 23 is the Greek word parthenos.

Almah occurs in the Hebrew O.T. seven times: namely in Gen. xxiv. 43; Exod. ii. 8; Psa. lxviii. 25; Prov. xxx. 19; Song of Sol. i. 3; vi. 8; and Isa. vii. 14. This word, while it may refer to a virgin in the strictest sense of the word, only means a young woman, a maiden, a damsel. There is, however, another word which does indicate a virgin in the strictest sense of the word, and that is bethulah. This word occurs also in Gen. xxiv. 16, where Rebekah is said to be a "damsel, very fair to look upon, a virgin". Isaiah knew the word, and uses it five times in his prophecy. The Hebrew bethulim is translated "virginity". "The Companion Bible" therefore, rightly comments "While every bethulah is indeed an almah, yet not every almah is a bethulah".

The word "Virgin" in the strictest sense is reserved for the great fulfillment of this prophecy at the birth of Christ, there the N.T. reads parthenos (Matt. i. 23). "The word may, I think, be best derived from paratheinai, to lay up, set apart, and so allude to the retired life of virgins in the eastern countries, and among the Greeks" (Parkhurst).

This word is narrower than the Hebrew almah used in the seventh chapter of Isaiah and sets the seal of truth upon the miracle of the Virgin birth. This fundamental doctrine of Redemption is not taught by a matter of fact statement, but is forced upon the mind of the reader of the N.T. by a number of converging features.

First, there is the decisive word parthenos, a word that was not confined to one sex, but could be used of men as well as of women, the essential point in either case being chastity, virginity. Then, there are a number of passages that reveal the presence of a miracle, although in themselves and taken separately they may not be considered of sufficient weight to prove the point. Let us note them.

(1) The Genealogy of Matt. i., and its one departure from the normal.—In this genealogy the word gennao "begat" "was born" occurs some forty times, and follows the course of nature as in any other genealogy—"Abraham begat Isaac" right on through the succeeding generations until the birth of Joseph, "Jacob begat Joseph". At this point however a noteworthy departure is made from the ordinary method of notification, because a noteworthy departure from the normal had now to be recorded. Had the Lord Jesus Christ come into this world as every other child has come into this world, the genealogy would have continued "Jacob begat Joseph, and Joseph begat Jesus, Who is called Christ", and the Christ of God would have been a man, a holy man, a blessed man, a glorious man, but a man and no more. His name would still have been "Jesus", but His name could not also have been Emmanuel, "God with us".

The last line of this genealogy makes a definite break in the natural sequence, "Jacob begat Joseph the husband of Mary, of whom (feminine) was born (gennao) Jesus, Who is called Christ".

The "begetting" ends with the birth of Joseph. Man then stands aside, and for the first time the Mother stands associated with gennao alone and independent of the man. Earlier in this genealogy the names of several mothers are recorded, but they never stand alone, the word gennao always being attached to the father who is named, as for example "Booz begat Obed of Ruth" (Matt. i. 5). Here therefore is evidence that the birth of Christ was miraculous.

(2) The natural perturbation of Joseph (Matt. i. 18, 19).—Although Mary was espoused to Joseph, they had not actually come together as man and wife, consequently when it was discovered that she was with child, Joseph as a righteous man under the law, had no option but to divorce his wife—although being a kindly man he intended to do it privately. All this is perfectly natural, and were it on record that Joseph re-acted differently our suspicions would be justified.

As the words stand in the A.V. of Matt. i. 18, however, they do not make sense. If Joseph had discovered that Mary "was with child of the Holy Ghost" his questionings would have been answered before they arose. The note in "The Companion Bible" is worth recording*.

> [* - "Now; or, But, in contrast with those mentioned in verses 2-16. Render: 'The begetting, then, of Jesus Christ was on this wise (for after His mother was espoused to Joseph, she was found with child) of pneuma hagion.' . . . . . birth = begetting. Gr, gennesis. Occ. Only here and Luke i. 14, used of the Father."]

(3) The natural perturbation of Mary (Luke i. 27-37).—In this record Mary is not only called a virgin, but acts as one. She was "troubled" at the salutation of the angel, and expostulated with the angel in reply to the announcement that she should have a son. "How shall this be, seeing I know not a man?"

In both passages, Joseph and Mary are assures that the conception of this child upon which such mighty issues would hang was of the Holy Ghost, and that the "Holy thing Which shall born of thee shall be called the Son of God" (Luke i. 35).

The parties most concerned in this great matter, were perfectly convinced and assured. Their characters, as given in the Scriptures show that they were honest, godly folk, and we are therefore confronted with two alternatives. Either we accept the testimony of the Scriptures, and believe unreservedly in the miracle of the virgin birth, and all the consequent doctrines and blessings that flow from it, or we reject the statements of Scripture, are left with a Saviour, Who being of the fallen line of Adam, must need a Saviour Himself, before He could undertake the Salvation of the world. With the rejection of the testimony of the first chapter of Matthew all the subsequent teaching comes to nothing. We are left with ashes and dead sea fruit, the name Emmanuel is a mockery, and we are of all men most miserable.

This "sign" of Isa. vii. 14, was indeed "in the depth" as "in the height", as verse eleven puts it, for what could be deeper than the Saviour's condescension when He laid aside His glory to take upon Himself the form and fashion of a man, and become the Virgin's Son?

We therefore rejoice that in the Person of Christ, the Virgin's Son, we have the fullest realization of the prophetic Name "God with us".

No.3. "With us" in our experiences in this world.
pp. 218 - 221

There is a world of comfort in the word "with". Many a time when we have prayed for friends and loved ones in distress and trouble, and not knowing how to frame our petition, we have fallen back on the simple request to the Lord, "be with them", knowing that this blessing of personal fellowship with the God of all grace, would sanctify the deepest distress and give grace to overcome in every difficulty.

We turn the page of our Bible, and from contemplating the chapter that tells us that "The begetting of Jesus Christ was on this wise" we look at the succeeding chapter that tells us of the actual birth at Bethlehem and the things that happened to the infant even in such tender years, that this child was living up to the great title "Emmanuel" or must we wait until He comes to the cross and becomes the bearer of our sin? We remember that the name Emmanuel is associated with the fulfillment of prophecy, and our eye is caught in Matt. ii. with the recurring phrase, "and it was fulfilled", as it is associated with the birth at Bethlehem, the departure to Egypt, the massacre of the innocents, and the character and condition of Nazareth (Matt. ii. 5, 6, 15, 17, 18, 23).

Bethlehem is the "city of David" and it was meet that David's greater Son should be born there, but we observe that lowliness, not greatness is attached to the place of Emmanuel's birth. In Luke's record, we find that the infant Christ is laid in a manger, because there was no room in the inn (ii. 7), and in Matthew's account note is taken of the fact that Bethlehem is "least among the princes of Judah". The reader may object at this point and point out that Matt. ii. 6 does not say that Bethlehem "was least", but "art not the least". If we consult the original passage in Micah v. 2 we shall read:

> "But Thou, Beth-lehem Ephratah, though thou be little among the thousands of Judah, yet out of thee shall He come forth unto Me, that is to be ruler in Israel," and will find that the passage quoted in Matt. ii. 6, does not agree verbally with either the Hebrew original or the LXX translation of Micah v. 2. What we must remember here is that Matt. ii. 6 records the immediate response of the chief priests and scribes to the question put by Herod. It is apparently a quotation made off hand and from memory, which true in general, must not be used to set off the original which they failed accurately to quote. "Ephratah" is paraphrased by "in the land of Judah" and this is true. There was another Bethlehem in Zebulun (Josh. xix. 15). In all probability Herod had never heard the ancient name Ephratah, and the Scribes were justified in translating the intention of the prophet into terms understandable by the king. The alteration also of the word "thousands" to "princes" is to be explained in the same way. The word translated "thousand" also meant a family, as the LXX renders Judges vi. 15, where Gideon says "my family (lit. thousand) is poor"; or again in I Sam. x. 19 where Samuel calls upon the people to present themselves "by your thousands", i.e. families. The scribes therefore were translating again freely for Herod's benefit.

However, it is in the next quotation from the prophets that the blessed fullness of the idea "God with us" begins to be made manifest. Joseph is warned in a dream that Herod would seek the young child's life and is instructed to flee to Egypt, where the King's writ did not run, "And was there until the death of Herod: that it might be fulfilled which was spoken of the Lord by the prophet, saying, out of Egypt have I called My Son" (Matt. ii. 15). This passage is quoted from Hosea xi. 1:

> "When Israel was a child, then I loved him, and called my son out of Egypt."

Unlike the quotation of the Scribes of the prophet Micah, this is a true translation of the words of Hosea xi. 1. The problem attaching to this quotation does not reside in the citation, but in the interpretation or application of the prophet's words to Christ. As the words stand in Hosea they are not a prophecy of the future but a statement of historical fact. Israel were in Egypt suffering under the bondage imposed by Pharaoh. The Lord looked with love upon this infant nation which He had chosen and called out of Egypt, giving them the title "Son", saying:

> "Israel is My son, even My firstborn, and I say unto thee, Let My son go" (Exod. iv. 22, 23).

It is evident both in the reference before us, and in the other allusions to Egypt made by Hosea, that Egypt is referred to as a type (Hosea ii. 15; vii. 11,16; viii. 13; ix. 3, 6; xi. 1, 5, 11; xii. 1, 9, 13; xiii. 4).

"As in the day when she came up out of the land of Egypt" (Hos. ii. 15) links Israel's first deliverance with his future restoration.

Egypt in Scripture stands for the world in its apparent independence of God. Unlike other lands that depend upon the rain of heaven, Egypt has no rain, but is dependent upon the river Nile (Zech. xiv. 18). The Nile like every other river is fed by the rain of heaven, but it is not manifestly so in the case of Egypt and so becomes a type. Egypt, at the time of the oppression was ruled by "another king who knew not Joseph", and who made Israel's lives bitter with hard bondage, and eight times in Egypt called in the law "the house of bondage". Not only was Egypt a type of the world in its oppressing and persecuting attitude, but it is also set forth as a type of false security that it offers to the vacillating faith of tried believers. Abraham, the father of the faithful felt its attraction (Gen. xii. 10), and Isaiah reprimands the tendency of Israel "to trust in the shadow of Egypt" (Isa. xxx. 3; xxxvi. 9), calling Pharaoh in whom they trusted "a broken reed". John in the apocalypse calls the city in which the dead bodies of the two witnesses lie "The great city which spiritually is called Sodom and Egypt where our Lord was crucified" (Rev. xi. 8).

Returning to the second chapter of Matthew we observe that the passage from Hosea is not quoted when Joseph responded to the call "Arise and take the young child and his mother, and go into the land of Israel" (Matt. ii. 21), the prophet's words are recorded upon the leaving of the land of Israel and the entry into Egypt. Why is this?

This sojourning of Israel in the land of bondage was prophesied before Israel as a nation existed. It is implied in the terms of the promise made by God to Abraham as recorded in Gen. xv.:

> "And He said unto Abram, Know of a surety that thy seed shall be a stranger in a land that is not theirs, and shall serve them; and they shall afflict them four hundred years; and also that nation, whom they serve, will I judge: and afterward shall they come out with great substance . . . . . in the fourth generation they shall come hither again: FOR THE INIQUITY OF THE AMORITES IS NOT YET FULL" (13-16).

Israel's sojourn in the land of bondage was not simply for their own sakes, or for their own deeds, it was because a period had been set for the filling up of Canaanite iniquity, who in their turn shadow forth the fallen principalities and powers, satanic usurpers, who have yet to be cast out and dispossessed under the true Joshua, the great Captain of the Lord's Host.

Every "son" finds himself in "Egypt" and his full redemption cannot be entered until the iniquity of the great spiritual Amorite is fulfilled. Into the sorrows and the straitness that such an age purpose must entail, the "Son of God" entered, so that He may be "with" every son that He came to redeem and share with every trial of life's waiting season.

Another answer is given to the problem set by this quotation from Hosea, by the use of the Greek word hina, "in order that it might be fulfilled" (Matt. ii. 15). The infant Christ went down into Egypt "in order that" He might be called out of it! Badly stated thus, the reason seems inadequate and none too serious, but stated with understanding it yields precious truth.

Why was it necessary that Christ should go down into Egypt? Why necessary that He should be called out of Egypt? The answer is in the name Emmanuel "God with us". He came in the likeness of sinful flesh into this world of sin and shame, and in the course of His sinless pilgrimage from cradle to cross, He traversed all the roads that the weary feet of His people have walked. Tempted as we are tempted, hated, despised, misunderstood, forsaken, He knows by living sympathy and experience every step of the pathway.

When we read Matt. ii. 15 with anointed eyes, it is seen to be one facet of the glorious jewel exhibited in Heb. iv. 15, "we have not an high priest which cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities; but was *in all points tempted as we are, yet without sin".

[* - See series of articles "Tempted in all points" in The Berean Expositor, Volume XXXIII.]

No.4. "With us" in temptations.
pp. 231 - 233

A series of articles will be found in Volume XXXIII of The Berean Expositor devoted to the exposition of the words of Heb. iv. 15, "Tempted in all points like as we are". The whole series can be considered as a discussion of one aspect of the glorious purpose enshrined in the title Emmanuel, God with us. It is not our intention to repeat what we have already published, but to draw the attention of the reader to the aspect of the lesson which comes before us in the fourth chapter of Matthew. Christ in sympathy with His people was "called out of Egypt", Christ in fellowship with His people is tempted in the wilderness.

> "Then was Jesus led up of the Spirit into the wilderness to be tempted of the Devil. And when He had fasted forty days and forty nights, He was afterward an hungered."

There is a closer relationship in the typical teaching of the wilderness as set over against Egypt than at first seems apparent. He Who called His Son out of Egypt, called him into the wilderness.

> "The Lord God of the Hebrews hath met with us; and now let us go, we beseech thee, three days journey into the wilderness, that we may sacrifice to the Lord our God" (Exod. iii. 18).

Many who read the word "wilderness" in the Scriptures conjure up a sandy waterless desert, but this is not the chief meaning of the word wilderness, although of course some wilderness or parts of them, may be sandy waterless wastes.

While Israel were miraculously fed by the manna during their forty years wandering in the wilderness, we read of no such miraculous provision for the flocks and herds that accompanied them, yet they lived and thrived throughout that trying period. Some wilderness were "great and terrible", some were described as "waste howling" wilderness but the basic meaning of the word wilderness is not that of scorched arid desert, neither is the typical and spiritual meaning to be found in such a condition. The main word translated "wilderness" in the O.T. is midbar, which is derived from dabar "to lead or to drive" as cattle. Gesenius defines the word as "an uninhabitable plain country, fit for feeding flocks, not desert, a pasture".

So we read in Joel ii. 22 "the pastures of the wilderness do spring", as in Psa. lxv. 12 we read "Thou crownest the year with Thy goodness; and Thy paths drop fatness. They drop upon the pastures of the wilderness", and in Isa. xlii. 11 "let the wilderness and the cities thereof lift up their voice".

The English word retains something of the primitive idea as may be seen by examining its composition and origin. It is composed of the word "wilder", a shortened form of "wild deer", and our forefathers when laying out a garden often set aside one portion called a wilderness, so that it may grow in unchecked luxuriance—never that it may become a desert.

The Greek word translated "wilderness" is eremos which is derived from eremoo "to make desolate". The word however sometimes denotes no more than uncultivated ground used as a common or pasture in distinction from arable and enclosed land ("Shaw's Travels", and Doddridge on Luke xv. 4).

"The wilderness of Judaea" (Matt. iii. 1) does not mean a country absolutely desert and uninhabited, but only little cultivated and thinly inhabited, as in Josh. xv. 61, 62.

We come now to the passages that provoked this inquiry. The Lord demanded of Pharaoh through Moses saying:

> "The Lord God of the Hebrews hath met with us; and now let us go, we beseech thee, three days journey into the wilderness, that we may sacrifice to the Lord our God" (Exod. iii. 18).

The essence of this demand is discovered in the contrast that is intended between the sophistication of Egypt and the primitive uncivilized nature of the wilderness; Egypt famed for its "wisdom" (Acts vii. 22) which Moses had to unlearn in the "desert" or "wilderness" (Exod. iii. 1); Egypt noted for its temples, its pyramids, its sphinx, its gods; Egypt in which even the Israelites trusted sometimes rather than in the Lord, so much so that Isaiah had to say "now the Egyptians are men, and not God" (Isa. xxxi. 3); Egypt the type of the world in its apparent independence of rain from heaven (Zech. xiv. 18, 19). In contrast with Egypt, Scripture places the wilderness, a place unspoiled by the hand of man, a place where one could meet with God undisturbed by the deadening distractions of so called civilization.

It may or may not be waste and howling, it may be a place where sheep could be pastured, the essence of the type lies in the extreme contrast that exists between "the wild" and "the cultivated", the unspoiled and natural, as over against the sophisticated and the artificial. In the wilderness man soon learns that he does not live by bread alone, but city life spreads a veneer over the curse, blunts its edge, so that man feels less dependent upon God and more likely to trust in civilization.

If we can carry with us the essential meaning of the WILDerness and keep it in contrast with the high civilization of Egypt and all that Egypt typifies we shall arrive at a truer conception of the typical meaning of Israel's wilderness experiences, than if we allow our minds to be dominated by the idea of a desert in the generally accepted sense of the word.

It was into this experience that is the portion of every redeemed child of God, that He Who was Emmanuel, entered at the beginning of His public ministry.

It is well known to every student of the Word that the order of the temptations as found in Matt. iv., differs from the order as found in Luke iv., and moreover, that there are other differences, for example, where Luke speaks of a stone and bread in the singular, Matthew uses both words in the plural.

There are three ways in which this variation in the order of the temptations may be explained:

(1) That one or the other, and possibly both records are untrustworthy. This is the attitude of the Sceptic, and is only stated here, to be resolutely set aside.
(2) That both records are true, and that on two occasions during the forty days trial the Devil tempted the Lord with these three temptations, adopting slightly different language and approaching Him in a different order. This is the conclusion of "The Companion Bible" and is fully worked out in Appendix 116.
(3) There is another point of view however. Any comparison of any two Gospels will bring to light the fact that what we think of as the historical order of events was not so considered by ancient writers, but that the logical order and spiritual significance was of far great importance.

To take an extreme and entirely unconnected example. It is evident by comparing Gen. x. and xi. that the dispersal at Babel must have come before the occupations of the various lands "after his tongue", for Gen. xi. assures us that "the whole earth was of one language, and of one speech".

Luke is the only writer who has assured us that he undertook to "set forth in order" the happenings he records, consequently we can easily believe that what we read in Luke's account is the actual historical sequence of events, but that Matthew, because of the kingdom aspect of his account, places the temptation concerning "the kingdoms of the world" as a climax. While, in the circumstances, it is impossible for any one to dogmatize in such matters, no essential truth is touch whether we believe the interpretation suggested under (2) or (3).

The essential feature that emerges for us, in our consideration of the bearing of the name Emmanuel, God with us, is that though the Saviour, in the right of His Godhead could have withered Satan at a glance, or blasted him with a word, He used no other weapon in this conflict than the humblest of His followers can use at any time. Three times He is tempted, and three times He met the temptation by the words "It is written". He was indeed "with us" in this unequal strife, and revealed not His own intrinsic omnipotence but the omnipotence of the Word of God.

Adam the first man was similarly tempted, but tempted in a garden of plenty, and miserably failed. Christ Emmanuel the seed of the woman, gloriously triumphed in a wilderness.

Israel were sorely tempted in a wilderness for a period of forty years, but had an unbroken supply of manna throughout their wanderings; Christ had nothing during the forty days yet triumphed. He is "with us" in our Egyptian bondage, He is "with us" in our wilderness temptations. Blessed be God for His unspeakable gift, Emmanuel, God with us.

The Work of the Son (i. 7 - 11).
Redemption.
pp. 1 - 5

It is the delightful paradox of the gospel of grace, that "Redemption is so costly, that it must be free!" The freeness of our salvation must ever be uppermost in our preaching to the unsaved, and in our thanksgiving for our own gratuitous acceptance. The words "not of works", "without money and without price", come spontaneously to mind. The Psalmist said concerning those who trusted in their riches:

> "None of them can by any means redeem his brother, nor give to God a ransom for him . . . . . that he should still live for ever and not see corruption" (Psa. xlix. 7, 9).

Verse eight reads "for the redemption of their soul is precious, and it ceaseth for ever". Dr. W. Kay renders this latter clause "and for ever unachievable", lit. "it ceaseth for ever" or "one must cease (from that attempt) for ever" (LXX kai ekopiasen). The Prayer Book version reads "he must let that alone for ever". The fact that redemption is free, without money and without price, must not blind our eyes to the equally important fact, that the Lord Jesus Christ is God's "unspeakable gift". To every believer comes the challenging question:

> "What? know ye not . . . . . that ye are not your own? For ye are bought with a price" (I Cor. vi. 19, 20).

To every redeemed sinner comes, with the full assurance of perfect acceptance, the consciousness of the price that was paid:

> "Ye were not redeemed with corruptible things, as silver and gold . . . . . but with the precious blood of Christ" (I Pet. i. 18, 19).

Redemption is the work of "The Son", for a principle is involved that necessitates the incarnation as a prerequisite to redemption. This principle is not categorically stated in Scripture but is implicit in several passages, among which are the following:

> "It is not possible that the blood of bulls and of goats should take away sins" (Heb. x. 4).

"This" as Dr. Owen says "is the last determinate resolution of the Apostle concerning the insufficiency of the law and its sacrifices for the expiation of sin". These sacrifices had a value in that they set forth in type the one great and all sufficient sacrifice that Christ would offer in the fullness of time. "It is possible that things may usefully represent, what it is impossible that in and by themselves they should effect" (Dr. Owen). Following on the statement that it is not possible that the blood of bulls and of goats should take away sin, we have the Saviour's own intervention:

> "A body hast Thou prepared Me . . . . . we are sanctified through the offering of the body of Jesus Christ once for all" (Heb. x. 5, 10).

This testimony is not limited to the early ministry of Paul, it is given a prominent place in that epistle of the Mystery, Colossians:

> "In the body of His flesh, through death to present you" (Col. i. 22).

The impossibility that is announced in Heb. x. 4 is made understandable by a reference to resurrection, which most surely includes redemption:

> "For since by man came death, by man came also the resurrection of the dead" (I Cor. xv. 21).

And so, it was necessary that the Saviour be man, and have a body of flesh and blood, nothing less would avail. "Nothing less", of a truth, but how much more than a mere man was demanded by the nature of things. Redemption is set forth in the typical teaching of the Old Testament and foremost among these types, and one that is evidently in view in Eph. i. 7, as we shall see presently, is that of "The Lamb". The blood of lambs however come under the same restriction as that of bulls and goats, consequently, another and fuller type of the Redeemer is set forth in the Old Testament as "The Kinsman Redeemer". This aspect of redemption will fall better into place when we arrive at the fourteenth verse, and so with the recognition that whatever type we may employ, redemption can only be the work of "The Son", let us turn our grateful and worshiping attention to the passage before us. In the preceding article we have set out the alternation of the theme of Eph. i. 7-9 and have suggested that while redeeming grace "abounds toward us", the reference to "prudence" belongs not to redemption but to the subsequent making known of the mystery of His will.

"In Whom." Some commentators render these words "by Whom" and apart from the bearing and demands of the context, either translation may be the true one. But translators cannot ignore the context without loss and damage. "In Whom" must of necessity refer back to "in the Beloved" (6), and is but another link in a chain made up of the Greek preposition en that binds this section of Ephesians together. Let us note the recurrence of this preposition and for the sake of clearness, let us translate every reference by the one word "in", whether that translation makes good English or not. The saints which are IN Ephesus . . . . . IN Christ Jesus . . . . . blessed IN all spiritual blessings IN heavenly places IN Christ, according as He hath chosen us IN Him, that we should be without blame before Him IN love, IN which He hath made us accepted IN the Beloved IN Whom we have redemption. One of the outstanding testimonies of Paul are those doctrines and blessings which come to the believer "in Christ".

To the Gentile, “in Christ” is set over against “in Adam”, to the Jew, in addition to being like the rest of mankind in Adam, he had been baptized into Moses and the term “in Christ” had to do double duty for the Jewish believer. To canvass the New Testament and to collect and arrange the many references to “in Christ”, while being a profitable study, seem too vast an undertaking for so limited a space, that we give as a specimen “in Christ” as it is found in the epistle to the Ephesians. Even with this limitation to our field of search, we shall be surprised doubtless with both the number of passages quoted and the riches which they reveal. For the present, we will not discriminate between the various titles of the Lord, but include them all under one head, although, in Christ differs a little from in Christ Jesus, even as both differ from in the Lord, or in Jesus. Here then is the list of occurrences. The faithful in Christ Jesus. All spiritual blessings in heavenly places are in Christ. We are made accepted in the Beloved, in Whom we have redemption. All things in heaven and on earth are to be headed up in Christ, in Whom we have obtained an inheritance. Trust is in Christ, in Whom we are sealed. Faith is in the Lord Jesus, and the spirit of wisdom and revelation is granted in the acknowledgment of Him. Resurrection power associated with believing was wrought in Christ. Not only so but the believer is made to sit together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus, and in the ages to come God will show His kindness toward us in Christ Jesus. Works are excluded as a basis of salvation, we are rather His workmanship, created in Christ Jesus. The Gentiles who once were hopeless, in the flesh and in the world, are now in Christ Jesus made nigh. He abolished in His flesh the enmity, to create in Himself of the twain one new man. In Whom the building grows unto an holy temple in the Lord, in Whom we too are builded together. All this is in harmony with the promise and the purpose of God in Christ Jesus, in Whom we have boldness and access, all of which leads to glory in the church in Christ Jesus, and so to the conclusion of the doctrinal portion of this epistle. Practice is not to be thought of however in any other sphere than in Christ and Paul speaks of himself as the prisoner in the Lord, he testifies in the Lord, and reminds the reader that he had been taught as the truth is in Jesus. Even the words of forgiving grace “for Christ’s sake” can be rendered “be generous to each other as God has been generous to you in Christ”. These believers were now light in the Lord, worship is in the name of the Lord Jesus and obedience rendered to parents was rendered to such in the Lord. The warrior for Christ was made strong in the Lord and the commendation of Tychicus as a faithful minister in the Lord, rounds off these wondrous references to a wondrous sphere. It will be observed that the first reference is to those who were “faithful” in the Lord. There does not seem to be any point in giving the long string of chapter and verse, any reader of the epistle will find these passages without difficulty. Twenty-six references to this blessed sphere are recorded in the doctrinal portion, and nine in the practical, making thirty-five in all. Quite apart from the effect on the mind that the rich variety of grace that is brought to light in these references produces, such a number of passages must impress us by their very quantity.

Redemption is in Him, in Whom every promise finds its fulfillment, every blessing its enjoyment, every aspiration its realization. In Him as the one Mediator God and man meet, and in Him the conflicting parties of the Acts period find their peace.

"In Whom we have redemption." In strong contrast with the alien position of the Gentile by nature who was in a state described as "having no hope", these believers "have" redemption, even as they "have" access and "have" boldness. The extremely useful office which the verb "to have" fulfils as an auxiliary may obscure a little its primitive force which is that of possessing and holding. We can say "I have lost a penny" without any sense of contradiction, the auxiliary here, having lost its prime meaning, but where it is used in its original intention, to have is to hold and to possess. As John has declared when speaking of eternal life "He that HATH the Son HATH life" (I John v. 12), and it would be quite as true to say "He that hath the Son", hath peace, or redemption or any other of the blessings that flow to us in grace as a consequence of His finished work. When this great fact becomes a reality to the believer, he will see that redemption cannot be looked upon merely as a price paid on our behalf by someone else, but that it involves either by reckoning or by some other process yet to be discovered and revealed, that there is an intimate relationship indicated by this work of redemption, it is not only "in Him" that we have it, but severed from Him it can never be enjoyed. This feature will come out more clearly presently when we are examining the references which associate the redeemed sinner "with" Christ in His death and resurrection, an aspect of redeeming love which carries us a stage further than this initial aspect set forth here in Eph. i. 7.

"Redemption." Redemption in the Authorized Version is the translation of the Hebrew words geullah a redemption by a kinsman, who is the gaal or kinsman redeemer, or of peduth and pidyom, a word that means primarily to make a division or a difference. In the New Testament redemption is the translation of either lutrosis or apolutrosis, both of which are compounds of luo "to loose". In addition the verb "to redeem" translates the Hebrew padah "to free", paraq "to break off" and qanah "to acquire", while in the New Testament we have in addition to lutroo and lutrosis, words of special import implying the paying of the price necessary to set a slave free, namely agorazo and exagorazo. The very recording of these precious terms illuminates the essential characteristics of scriptural redemption, but we are sure that no reader would be satisfied if we left the matter here. There is enough matter of solid worth in the examination of this one great term, upon which all our salvation and subsequent hopes are built, to justify the devotion of a complete article to its exposition. Rejoicing therefore in our present knowledge namely that in Him we have redemption, we must now address ourselves to a fuller understanding of that which is not only ours in Him, but ours by precious blood, and not only ours through precious blood, but ours in such a way that it leads to the inestimable benefit of the forgiveness of sins through matchless grace.

Redemption.

pp. 21 - 24

In our last article we enumerated the basic Hebrew words used in the Old Testament and the Greek words used in the New Testament for redemption, but reserved their examination for the present study.

Taking the Old Testament first, we have the Hebrew gaal and its derivatives geullah, peduth and its derivatives pidyom and padah, and finally paraq and qanah; the Greek lutroo, and its derivatives, and agorazo and its compound exagorazo. Let us give our close attention to these terms for they speak of things which, like the love that prompted them, passeth knowledge.

Gaal. The earliest reference to a goel or a "kinsman-redeemer" (see the spelling suggested in "The Companion Bible") is that of Job xix. 25 "I know that my Redeemer liveth" and under the operation of the law given by Moses, the necessity of such a redeemer was intensified. The land of Canaan differed from all other lands in this, that it was in a peculiar sense "The Lord's", and certain laws such as the observance of the Sabbatic year, in which no sowing or cultivating were permitted, would of necessity call for some "release" in connexion with debts, and although the land was given to Israel as an everlasting inheritance, the human incidence of death, childless marriage, forfeiture and the pledge of bond service, all called for the interposition of the goel, the kinsman-redeemer, the one that had right to redeem, he who, as "the husband's brother" could marry his brother's childless widow and so raise up his name from the dead, that his name be not blotted out in Israel. Added to this was the office of Avenger of Blood. We have not given chapter and verse for all these details, but the reader will readily discover the proofs of these assertions for himself. We will however give a few specimen quotations to show the usage of the word gaal. The book of Ruth is particularly rich in its use of this Hebrew word, where it is translated "next kinsman", "near kinsman", "one who has the right to redeem" and "redeem" (Ruth ii. 20; iii. 9, 12, 13; iv. 4). The Jubile laws given in Lev. xxv. use this Hebrew word for the "purchase" or the "redeeming" of a house or person. The office of the Avenger of Blood is described fairly fully in Numb. xxxv. and it is this self same word that is used of the Lord Himself in every reference to the "Redeemer" in the Authorized Version of the Old Testament. This fact of itself demands a miracle, the miracle of the incarnation. For if the scriptural Redeemer be God (Isa. xliii. 14; xliv. 6; liv. 5) and at the same time a next of kin to man, then nothing less than "God manifest in the flesh" can satisfy all that is demanded. If the Lord Jesus Christ be the Redeemer, He must be both God and Man or the Scriptures will be broken and we left without a Saviour.

Geullah occurs eight times in Lev. xxv. translated "redemption" and "redeem", twice in Ruth, namely in iv. 6 "my right" and iv. 7 "redeeming", twice in Jeremiah, namely in xxxii. 7, 8 and once in Ezekiel, namely in xi. 15 where it is translated "kindred".

The words peduth, pidyom and padah which are translated "redeem" have as their root meaning, separation or division. We remember the name of the land Padan-Aram, which in the LXX becomes Mesopotamia and in both languages indicates the land severed off by the two rivers, the Euphrates and the Tigris. So where the Hebrew of Isa. xxix. 22 reads padah "redeem" the LXX reads aphorizo "to separate". It is this word which is used by the Psalmist when he said:

> "None of these can by any means redeem his brother" (Psa. xlix. 7).

and in Job when we read:

> "Deliver him from going down to the pit" (Job xxxiii. 24).

It is the "redemption" money of Numb iii. 49 and the "ransom" of Exod. xxi. 30. The word is used with special regard to its double significance in Exod. viii. 23:

> "I will put a division between My people and thy people."

Added therefore to the rich teaching already imbedded in the doctrine of the Kinsman Redeemer is this thought of the complete distinctiveness or separation that redemption implies, together with a sense of cost.

Paraq means primarily "to break" and passing by the ideas of kinship and separation emphasizes the mighty power that was put forth to deliver the Lord's people from the hand of the enemy (Psa. cxxxvi. 24).

Qanah is only translated "redeem" once, namely in Neh. v. 8, it is rendered many times "buy" and "purchase" in connexion with the exercise of the right of redemption as in Ruth iv. 4, 5, 8 and we are reminded in the New Testament that the redeemed have been "bought with a price".

Coming now to the New Testament we have two words to consider. Lutroo and its derivatives, and agorazo and its derivative.

Agorazo speaks of the market place, where buying and selling proceeded and it is used of buying fields, victuals and other every day commodities, then of that great transaction whereby we are "bought with a price" (I Cor. vi. 20) and so of those who were "redeemed" (Rev. v. 9; xiv. 3, 4). Agorazo is used for the purchase of slaves in the will of Attalus iii., B.C.133, and the words "bought . . . . . with a price" are written on the polygonal wall of Delphi in an inscription setting forth the freeing of a slave between the years B.C.200-199 Exagorazo "to buy out of the market place" is found in Gal. iii. 13; iv. 5; Eph. v. 16 and Col. iv. 5. In Galatians the allusion is to the freeing of a slave upon the payment of a price, in Ephesians and Colossians, in the phrase "redeeming the time", the references is still to the market place, but in the sense of "forestalling", being as keen for the Lord as those who queue up at the bargain counter.

This leaves the word lutroo and its derivatives. Let us trace the usage of this word from its primitive source, luo. This word means to loose as opposed to deo to bind, and is used of the loosing of a colt, of the string of the tongue, then by an easy transition, for the loosing of souls from the bondage of sin, for the "breaking" of a commandment, for the "breaking down" of the middle wall of partition, and for the "melting" and "dissolving" of elements with fervent heat.

Lutron. We now come to the means of loosing, and here the reference is entirely to the sacrificial loosing from sin, it is translated "ransom" in Matt. xx. 28 and Mark x. 45 where it is followed by the preposition anti, the preposition of equivalence. In I Tim. ii. 6, the preposition is incorporated with the word lutron, and followed by huper "on behalf on". Lutron always means "the price paid for the liberation of those in bondage", and is employed by the LXX as a translation of the Hebrew gaal in Lev. xxv. 51 and elsewhere. Matt. xx. 28 carries the typical teaching of Num. xxxv. 31 over into Christian reality. Lutroo literally means "to bring forward a ransom" the active being used not of him who gives, but of him who receives it, hence "to release on receipt of a ransom". In the middle voice it means "to release by payment of a ransom, to redeem", and in the passive "to be redeemed, ransomed" (Cremer). There are three occurrences in the N.T.:

> "He which should have redeemed Israel" (Luke xxiv. 21).
> "That He might redeem us from all iniquity" (Titus ii. 14).
> "Ye were not redeemed with corruptible things" (I Pet. i. 18).

Lutrosis is the consequent redemption, the act of freeing or releasing by a ransom (Luke i. 68; ii. 38; Heb. ix. 12). Lutrotes is of necessity the redeemer and liberator, and is referred to Moses in Acts vii. 35.

Apolutrosis or "releasing by ransom" (Exod. xxi. 8). It is used in Luke xxi. 28 for the national redemption already referred to in Luke i. 68; ii. 38 and in xxiv. 21, and in Heb. xi. 35 of release from suffering and persecution, the remaining eight references having a direct bearing upon redemption by sacrifice. We give the eight references here:

> "The redemption that is in Christ Jesus" (Rom. iii. 24).
> "The redemption of our body" (Rom. viii. 23).
> "Who of God is made unto us . . . . . redemption" (I Cor. i. 30).
> "In Whom we have redemption" (Eph. i. 7).
> "The redemption of the purchased possession" (Eph. i. 14).
> "Sealed unto the day of redemption" (Eph. iv. 30).
> "In Whom we have redemption" (Col. i. 14).
> "For the redemption of the transgressions" (Heb. ix. 15).

Here, it will be seen that redemption in all its aspects is presented. Redemption from sin and from death, and the future redemption of the purchased possession. The two references in Eph. i. 7, 14 stand related together as the Passover in the book of Exodus, is to Kinsman Redeemer in the book of Ruth. Eph. i. 7 being the initial redemption by blood, bringing with it forgiveness, Eph. i. 14 being the concluding redemption bringing with its entry into our inheritance in resurrection. When therefore the Apostle penned the words "in Whom we have redemption" all that we have seen and more is to be found in these most wonderful types which are intended by him in the adoption and perpetuation of this sacrificial term. This Redeemer was indeed a Kinsman-Redeemer, a ransom had been paid and a release effected. There are some who while going as far with us in this matter, hesitate to endorse in its fullness the Old Testament sacrificial system, and would indeed suggest that here, in this most spiritual of all Paul's epistles, the grosser and lower aspects of the Old Testament ritual, right and proper though they may have been in the age when they were instituted, must be left behind as we contemplate all spiritual blessings as our lot and portion. This however is shattered by the fact that Paul unhesitatingly and of purpose adds the words "through His blood", before he proceeds to the forgiveness of sins, and not only so, he repeats himself in Col. i. 14, as though he would say as he did another context "as we said before, so say I now again". A reading of these two epistles of the Mystery, Ephesians and Colossians, will reveal that even though our blessings are "all spiritual", even though our sphere is in "heavenly places", even though we were chosen before the foundation of the world that we should be "holy", our access to these blessings, our meetness for such a sphere, is provided for us, as it must be provided for any believing sinner of whatever calling or sphere, by the sacrificial offering of the Saviour. It is true not only for the Hebrews, but for the Gentiles, that "without the shedding of blood is no remission".

There are four references to the blood of Christ in the epistles of the mystery, which we should keep before us.

A | Eph. i. 7. Redemption through His blood—forgiveness.
B | Eph. ii. 13. Far off ones made nigh . . . so making peace.
A | Col. i. 14. Redemption through His blood—forgiveness.
B | Col. i. 20. Peace made, all things reconciled.

It will be seen from these references that even though the number is small, that they cover the two great categories, namely Redemption that is FROM (Eph. i. 7; Col. i. 14), the deliverance aspect, and the Reconciliation which is TO, the subsequent access and acceptance. It is important that we do not stress the one to the exclusion or minimizing of the other. God did not lead Israel out of Egypt only to abandon them on the shores of the Red Sea, and again, God did not speak of tabernacle, priest and access, until the initial redemption from Egypt had been accomplished. It requires both the redemption out of and reconciliation unto to embrace the blessings that flow to the believer "through His blood". The specific blessing "the forgiveness of sins" is too precious and too important to be dispatched in a few lines—let us approach this most vital and gracious provision with expectant hearts and consider it in our next article.

Forgiveness.
pp. 61 - 64

We remind our readers that Eph. i. 3-14 is the charter of the church and provides the documents that relate to our high calling, inheritance, release, adoption, seal and earnest. In our last article we were occupied with the fact that Redemption is necessary and has been provided in order that all the gracious provisions of our Father's will may be enjoyed. The first result of this Redemption is given both in Ephesians and Colossians as "the forgiveness of sins", and to this most gracious theme we now address ourselves. Again, in order to realize something of the teaching of Eph. i. 7, we must include in our survey the Hebrew words that are employed in the Old Testament, the meaning of which is carried over into the Greek of the New.

Forgiveness. This word translates the Hebrew selichah (Psa. cxxx. 4) which means "a sending away", and is derived from salach in Psalm ciii. 3. Other words used are kaphar "to cover", the word which gives us the Old Testament term "atonement", nasa "to lift up", "to bear", "to carry". The New Testament words are apoluo "to loose away" (Luke vi. 37), charizomai "to be gracious to" (Eph. iv. 32), aphesis and aphiemi "to send or to let off or away". The word used in Eph. i. 7 is aphesis, "a discharge", "a setting free as of a prisoner", "the putting away as of a wife" (Exod. xviii. 2) or "the remission of a debt" (Deut. xv. 3). In the New Testament aphesis speaks of (1) the remission or forgiveness of sins (Matt. xxvi. 28; Heb. ix. 22; Acts xxvi. 18, &c.), and (2) deliverance, or setting at liberty of captives (Luke iv. 18). Aphiemi from which aphesis is derived, has a greater variety of renderings and usages. Perhaps the most primitive of these usages is where it is translated "cry" (Mark xv. 37) and "yield up" (Matt. xxvii. 50), the idea of sending forth being uppermost. "Put away, lay aside, leave, let go, send away" are other ways in which the word is rendered, the one great covering word being "release". Aphesis occurs many times in the LXX, and its usage in the twenty-fifth chapter of Leviticus gives the scriptural colouring to every one of its occurrences. The great theme of this chapter is "the Jubile". "And ye shall hallow the fiftieth year, and proclaim liberty throughout all the land unto all the inhabitants thereof: it shall be a jubile (LXX a year of release) unto you: and ye shall return every man unto his possession, and ye shall return every man unto his family" (xxv. 10). Aphesis occurs fourteen times in this chapter, where it is usually equivalent to the word Jubile in the Authorized Version. Land might be sold as a temporary measure against need, but at the Jubile, if not redeemed before, it reverted to its original owner. An Israelite who became an hired servant might serve until the year of Jubile, but no longer, and at the year of release he returned to his family and his possessions. A Hebrew sold to a foreign resident could be redeemed at any time, but at the Jubile, under all circumstances, he had to be set free. Josephus states in his Antiquities, that "debtors are freed from their debts", which the reader will readily associate with the clause concerning forgiveness in the "Lord's Prayer". The better to appreciate what this "forgiveness" of Eph. i. 7 embraces, we must acquaint ourselves with some features of the manumission of slaves that were customary during the period prior to and during Apostolic times. Manumission obviously means, literally "to send from the hand", where the "hand" indicates the master, just as "the soul" and "the body" often indicate the slave. North, in his Plutarch speaks of the act of Valerius, who desiring to recompense the bondman Vindicius for his services "caused him not only to be manumissed by the whole grant of the people, but made him a free man of the city besides". The force of many passages in the New Testament is blunted because the word doulos is mostly translated "servant", whereas it means "a bond servant" or "slave". The principal means of enlightening us to-day as to the nature and ritual of manumission, comes from the inscriptions at Delphi, but records are found of the Jewish practice, one dated 81A.D.:

> "Among the various ways in which the manumission of a slave could take place by ancient law, we find the solemn rite and fictitious purchase of the slave by some divinity. The owner comes with the slave to the temple, sells him there to the god, and receives the purchase money from the temple treasury, the slave having previously paid it in there out of his savings. The slave is now the property of the god; not, however, a slave of the temple, but a protégé of the god. Against all the world, especially his former master, he is a completely free man; at the utmost a few pious obligations to his old master are imposed upon him."

The form in which this manumission was recorded followed a traditional pattern of which the following is a fair sample:

> "Date. Apollo the Pythian bought from Sosibus . . . . . for freedom a female slave, whose name is Nicæa . . . . . with a price . . . . . the price he hath received. The purchase, however, Nicæa hath committed unto Apollo, for freedom" (Deissmann).

The reader will recognize the phrases "bought with a price" and "for freedom" which underlie some of the Apostle's own teaching. When therefore we read "in Whom we have redemption through His blood, the forgiveness of sins" in Eph. i. 7, the uppermost thought is the "release" from bondage that this redemption has accomplished. Two words are employed by the Apostle in Ephesians and Colossians, which are translated "forgive" namely aphesis, the word found in Eph. i. 7 and charizomai, the word found in Eph. iv. 32, Col. ii. 13 and iii. 13. "And be ye kind one to another, tenderhearted, forgiving one another, even as God for Christ's sake hath forgiven you" (Eph. iv. 32). Charizomai is obviously derived from charis "grace", and only in the New Testament does it denote that particular exhibition of grace that issues in the forgiveness of sins; in classical Greek it went no further than expressing a favour, being agreeable and pleasing, but when charis was endowed by the New Testament usage with the higher and richer qualities of Gospel "grace", charizomai took upon it the Christian grace of forgiveness. In some passages it still retains its simple meaning of "giving" as in Luke vii. 21 and Gal. iii. 18, but the requirement of the context at times, compelled the translators to say "freely give" as in Rom. viii. 32, but in the majority of cases, the word is rendered "forgive". It will be observed that whereas aphesis "forgive' in Eph. i. 7 is never used of the forgiveness extended by man to man, that charizomai is used of both God and man. In this dispensation of grace God alone can "set free" from sin and its consequences, whereas, both God and the believer can and do extend grace to those who have offended. There will be a need to qualify this observation when we come to the consideration of the difference that we should make in the employment of the two words "forgiveness and pardon". Originally both words were synonymous, for they differ only in the fact that forgiveness is derived from the Anglo Saxon forgifan, and pardon from the Latin per "for" dono "give", but in usage they have become slightly separated, so that in some cases "pardon" could be used where "forgiveness" would be inaccurate. Pardon is an official warrant remitting a crime, and in law it is the prerogative of the king, this pardon being absolute or conditional as the Sovereign shall please. Crabb says "forgive is the familiar term, pardon is adapted to the serious style. Individuals forgive each other personal offences; they pardon offences against law and morals". These differences are by no means academic, they belong to the essential difference between the Gospel of the Kingdom, as seen at work in Matthew, and the Gospel of the grace of God, as seen in the ministry of Paul. Take for example the parable of the unforgiving servant. He was frankly forgiven a great debt which he owed to the king, but upon the report being made of his uncharitable conduct to a fellow servant, he was called back into the royal presence, the forgiveness was rescinded, he was cast into the prison there to remain until he should pay all that was owing. The Saviour leaves us in no doubt as to the "moral" of this parable:

> "So LIKWISE shall My heavenly Father do also unto you, if ye from your hearts forgive not every one his brother their trespasses" (Matt. xviii. 35).

It is this feature that makes the prayer of Matt. vi. 9-13 impossible for the dispensation of grace.

> "And forgive us our debts AS WE forgive our debtors" (Matt. vi. 12).

and lest we should soften down this comparison, the Lord picked out from this prayer, this one clause which He expands along the lines of the parable of the eighteenth chapter:

> "For if ye forgive men their trespasses, your heavenly Father will also forgive you: But if ye forgive not men their trespasses, neither will your Father forgive your trespasses" (Matt. vi. 14, 15).

This is explicit, uncompromising and final. If this kingdom principle be carried over into the dispensation of grace it will work havoc.

On one occasion, it was our privilege to hear Archibald Brown preach on the Parable of the Unforgiving Servant. Or perhaps we ought to say, he thought he was preaching on that subject. His theology and his conception of grace however prevented him, and we had the joy of seeing this fine preacher continually referring to Matt. xviii., but preaching from his own heart acquaintance with Romans and Ephesians. In Matthew we have the Royal Pardon, the pardon of a king, and in many cases, if not in all, it is conditional. In the present dispensation of grace we have Divine forgiveness, which is unconditional, can never be rescinded, and while it should lead all who are so freely forgiven, to extend a similar forgiveness to their fellows, this extension is by no means a condition as it was in Matt. vi. and xviii.

> "God in Christ" (ho Theos en Christo not as in the A.V. "for Christ's sake") "forgave you" (echarisato humin not as the A.V. "hath forgiven you") (Eph. iv. 32).

"It is the historical fact of Christ once for all putting away sin by the sacrifice of Himself, which is alluded to, so that we are not to attempt to change the meaning into a future" ("even as Thou, Lord, for Christ's sake, hath promised to forgive us." "Family prayers by the Bishop of London", p.43), Alford. In Colossians the case is stated with similar precision:

> "And you hath He quickened together with Him having forgiven you all trespasses" (Col. ii. 13).

Here again the aorist participle looks back to an act of God wrought once and for all in Christ. The atmosphere of the Gospel according to Matthew is that associated with a royal throne and with clemency extended by royal prerogative, whereas, in the great epistle to the Romans, upon which the present dispensation is erected, the atmosphere is that of a Court of Law, the one forgiven is not simply discharged as an act of clemency, he goes out ACQUITTED, he is JUSTIFIED, he has a STANDING before God in Christ, and these are priceless, fundamental and radical differences which no amount of pleading can alter, or zeal exonerate.

We remind our readers that we are in the Muniment Room of this great house, and that Paul, the Janitor is exhibiting to our wonderful eyes, the documents that pertain to our calling. We have seen the "Will of the Father", we have now seen the "Manumission" of those of us who by nature were sold under sin, but are here released, acquitted, forgiven and free. Let us never underestimate the fact that we have been "bought with a price".

Redemption and Forgiveness. We do most gladly acknowledge that these are "according to the riches of His grace" (Eph. i. 7), but verse 8, as it stands in the Authorized Version, seems to contain a contradiction:

> "Wherein He hath ABOUNDED towards us in all wisdom and PRUDENCE."

The concepts "abounding" and "prudence" do not seem to belong to the same category. The Greek word translated "abounding" is perisseuo, a word which by its derivation and its usage suggests prodigality, whereas the Greek word translated "prudence" phronesis indicates, as does the English "prudence" that which comprehends, "that discreet, apt suiting and disposing as well of actions as words in their due place, time and manner" (Peacham), and in the expenditure of money, being frugal, economical and provident. The contradiction however exists only in the English version, where the translators have joined together into one verse, what should have been kept separate. The reader should remember that punctuation and verse formation are modern and not found in the original. When we examine the verses before us and inquire concerning their theme, we observe, that it is twofold.

(1) Redemption. This is made to abound with prodigal richness.
(2) Instruction. This is given little by little as we are able to bear it.

We can retain the Authorized Version just as it stands, if we will but put a full stop in the middle of verse 8, thus:

> "In Whom we have redemption through His blood, the forgiveness of sins, according to the riches of His grace wherein He hath abounded toward us. In all wisdom and prudence having made known unto us the mystery of His will, according to His good pleasure, which He hath purposed in Himself."

We can now return to the term "abounding" and examine it a little closer. Perisseuo means "to be over and abound, to be more than enough, to exceed". Perissos "exceeding abundantly" (Eph. iii. 30), "superfluous" (II Cor. ix. 1), "beyond measure" (Mark vi. 51). The word used in Eph. i. 8 occurs several times in Philippians, where it is consistently translated "abound" (Phil. i. 9, 26; iv. 12, 18). There can be no doubt therefore of the lavish overflowing grace that is manifested in the forgiveness of sins. We now come to the new yet related subject, that of making known to these emancipated ones "the mystery of His will". Here we must pause, for the word mystery itself needs explanation and the mystery of His will must not be confused with other mysteries that are found in the same epistle.

"Wisdom" is linked with the making known of the mystery and its associations in each of its occurrences in Ephesians.

> "In all wisdom and prudence, having made known unto us the mystery of His will" (Eph. i. 8, 9).
>
> "That . . . . . may give unto you a spirit of wisdom and revelation in the acknowledgment of Him" (Eph. i. 17).
>
> "To make all men see what is the dispensation of the mystery . . . . . might be known by the church, the manifold wisdom of God" (Eph. iii. 9, 10).

Philippians which deals with an entirely different aspect of truth, contains no reference either to wisdom or mystery, but Colossians which corresponds with Ephesians contain them both:

> "To whom God would make known what is the riches of the glory of this mystery among the Gentiles . . . . . in all wisdom" (Col. i. 27, 28).
>
> "To the acknowledgment of the mystery . . . . . Christ, in Whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge" (Col. ii. 2, 3).

The word mystery is practically a transliteration of the Greek musterion, a word derived from mustes one initiated into the mysteries, which in its turn comes from muo to close the mouth or the eyes and so initiate. Rotherham translates musterion "sacred secret". This rendering removes from the mind anything "mysterious", occult or mystical about the subject, but unfortunately while rendering one service, robs us of the history of the word and the evident reference that Paul makes to the Pagan mysteries which abounded in his day. It is an unsafe analogy to argue from the use of the word "mystery" as employed in the articles of indenture, and referring to the mysteries of a trade, for this word should really be spelled "mistery" coming as it does from the French mestier or métier, which in its turn is derived from the Latin ministerium. It will not do therefore to teach that there is no more "mystery" about the mysteries of the Bible than there is about trade secrets, for this approach to the subject omits the presence and influence of the Pagan mysteries, that will eventually come to a head in "the mystery of iniquity", even as the mysteries of the Scripture come to a head in "the mystery of godliness". Is there any one who knows all that there is to know concerning either the mystery of iniquity or the mystery of godliness? Are there not "depths of satan" and "the deep things of God"? Are there not "unspeakable words which it is not lawful for a man to utter" (II Cor. xii. 4)? And is there not in the same epistle the offering of thanks to God for His "unspeakable gift" (II Cor. ix. 15). From very early times there were in the Pagan world vast and widespread institutions known as Mysteries, celebrated for their profound secrecy, admission to which was only by initiation. The Greek, Egyptian and Persian mysteries can be traced back to a common source, namely Chaldea, and constitute one of the travesties of truth that is so characteristic of Babylonianism. Babylon is represented as bearing a golden cup, and to drink of mysterious beverages says Salverte, was indispensable on the part of all who sought initiation in these mysteries.

> "To musterion. This is not the only term borrowed from the ancient mysteries, which St. Paul employs to describe the teaching of the Gospel. The word teleion (Col. i. 28 'perfect') seems to be an extension of the same metaphor. In Phil. iv. 12 again we have > the verb memuemai (I am instructed—literally I am 'initiated'); and in Eph. i. 13 sphragizesthai ('sealed') is perhaps an image derived from the same source. So too the Ephesians are addressed as Paulou summustai 'fellow initiates of Paul' in Ignatius' Epistle, and the Christian teacher is thus regarded as a hierophantes who initiates his disciples into the rites" (Bp. Lightfoot).

It becomes very clear that no knowledge of the mysteries was obtainable apart from initiation, and this fact must be borne in mind when we approach the mysteries of Scripture. No mere instruction, or quoting of verses of scripture, nor even the most lucid presentation of Dispensational Truth will ever "convince" any one apart from the gracious enlightening that God alone can give.

> "It is given unto you to know the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven, but to them it is not given . . . . . many prophets and righteous men have desired to see those things which ye see, and have not seen them; and to hear those things which ye hear, and have not heard them" (Matt. xiii. 11, 17).
>
> "Who hath ears to hear, let him hear" (Matt. xiii. 9).

The recognition of this great fact of initiation would save the believer many hours of fruitless anxiety on the part of others. The truth of the mystery is not to be made known by the organizing of campaigns, it will never be a subject of popular appeal, our attitude must be a readiness at all times to help and guide wherever we see a desire to know and follow on, being assured that none will come to see the mystery apart from the Lord's own illuminating, we ourselves can at best be but the earthen vessels that He stoops to use in this most wondrous work. Out of the twenty-seven occurrences of the word "mystery", the Apostle Paul uses twenty, the remaining seven being divided between the first three Gospels and the Revelation. The word mystery is found in Ephesians as follows:

Mystery in Ephesians.

A | i. 9. The Mystery of His Will—which he purposed.
B | iii. 3. THE MYSTERY—pre-eminently so.
C | iii. 4. The Mystery of Christ—not made known as now.
A | iii. 9. The Dispensation of the Mystery (R.V.)—which He purposed.
B | v. 32. THE GREAT MYSTERY.
C | vi. 19. The Mystery of the Gospel—made known.

The Mystery of His Will, the passage immediately before us, is "unto" or as its goal (eis) a dispensation of the fullness of the seasons wherein Christ shall head up (anakephalomai) all things, this is in correspondence with the dispensation of the mystery which deals with the Church, the Body, and Christ the Head, concerning which the word "fullness" is used of both (Eph. i. 23; Col. ii. 9). This first occurrence of the term mystery focuses our attention, not so much on consequences and calling, but on "The Will" that is thereby being carried into effect, and so much has been built upon the conception of the "Will" of God that is harmful because erroneous that we believe every reader will approve of the departure we are making to enable them to benefit by the writings of another student of the word on this momentous question.

Under the title "Does God Will Everything", Alexander Thomson, writing in The Differentiator of March—April 1950 has put the matter so succinctly and completely that we have asked permission to quote liberally from his article. The Greek word under review is thelo translated "will" in Rev. xxii. 17 "whosoever will", and the noun form thelema Eph. i. 1 usually translated "will" and in the epistles mostly referring to the will of God. In Acts x. 10 Peter is revealed to us as being very hungry, and "would have eaten", where the word thelo is employed.

"How shall we describe his natural reactions? We might do so in different ways:

Peter desired to taste food.
Peter wished to taste food.
Peter willed (that is, determined) to taste food.
Peter was willing (that is, agreeable) to taste food.
Peter wanted to taste food.

Peter did not need to 'make up his mind' regarding his needs. There was more than mere desire present with him. He was more than willing to eat. It was more than a wish that he experienced. Peter wanted to taste food. There can be no doubt that is the best translation. Any child in the same situation would cry, 'I want something to eat', and would not use the other terms. The English word WANT expresses well the need and the desire.

Let us, then, examine the Greek word thelo, which occurs over 200 times in the New Testament, and its noun thelema, which is found about 60 times. In the Authorized Version (King James) the verb is rendered 98 times by will, 70 times by would, 12 times by desire, 10 times by will, have or would have, and three times by list. The noun is rendered 62 times by will, once by desire and once by pleasure. Other versions render the verb occasionally by wish, desire, choose, and even determine. In the Concordant Version (C.V.), the noun is always rendered by will, but, strange to say, the verb is in no fewer than 120 cases rendered by want, and only in 96 cases by will or would. The definition given is, 'form a decision, choice or purpose'. While the standard is WILL, the 'idiomatic' rendering is want. Now that the idiomatic meaning is want is very evident. I should say it is the best English equivalent. But the definition can hardly be correct. That of Webster, in his 'Syntax and Synonyms of the Greek Testament', seems superior. 'Thelo' denotes a natural impulse or desire, the ground of which is generally obvious, or for which it is unnecessary to assign a reason. Dr. Bullinger is substantially similar.

It will be seen at once that the whole question of what is God's 'will' requires reconsideration when it is seen that the real idiomatic meaning of the verb is 'want'. It is both misleading and inconsistent to render John vii. 17 by 'If anyone should be wanting (thele) to be doing His will (thelema)'. The sense must either be, if anyone may WILL to be doing His WILL, or if anyone may WANT to do what He WANTS. Unfortunately, idiom forbids us to say, if anyone may want to be doing His want (or wants).

Here I shall ask you some very pointed questions. Can you, as a disciple of the Lord, WILL, or purpose, or determine, to be doing His will? Does your freewill extend so far? Can you WILL to follow behind the Lord? (Matt. xvi. 24). Can you WILL to save your soul? (Matt. xvi. 25). Can you WILL to enter into the life? (Matt. xix. 17). Can you WILL to be perfect? (Matt. xix. 21). Did the Canaanitish woman of Matt. xv. 28 obtain her extraordinary bold request through WILLING or WILL power? 'O woman, great of-such-as-you the faith. Let it be done to you as you are wanting'.

* * * * * * *

I shall cite another case which shews how we might be misled. 'How many times do I want (ethelesa) to assemble your children . . . . . and you will not (ethelesate).' At first sight we should certainly reckon that Jerusalem determined deliberately not to be gathered as described. Yet in each case the meaning is nothing more than 'want'. Did the Lord, many a time, merely express a wish to gather Jerusalem's children, while the inhabitants deliberately WILLED not? Or suppose that we read it thus, 'How many times do I WILL to assemble your children . . . . .' (Matt. xxiii. 37). If the Lord did so WILL, did He fail? Was He frustrated?

But how could the Lord have willed to gather together these children at that time, in view of the facts He made known just about that time contained in ch.21 of Luke? In that chapter He details certain events which even now are still in the future (verses 10 & 11). Then, from verse 12 to verse 24 are many events which were to come 'before all these' things stated in verses 10 and 11. We might say, Yes, 1900 years before them at least. All the events from verse 12 to the middle of verse 24 pertain to the first century, and have been fulfilled. Then in verse 24 (middle) we have the period between the destruction of the city and the present. 'And Jerusalem will be (a City) trodden by (hupo, UNDER-by) Gentiles until what time may be fulfilled seasons of Gentiles'. This cuts out any hope of a Hebrew Kingdom in the first century. We cannot place the events of verses 12 to 24 anywhere but in the first century, and these events were impending, inevitably, over the Nation during the whole period of the Acts of the Apostles. Therefore the Lord never willed to gather Israel at that time. But the time is coming when He shall will to accomplish what He has always wanted to do. And Israel shall then both will and want to be His true children, for they shall enter upon the life of the ages.

Could we say that the Scribes and Pharisees willed to see a sign, or merely wanted to see one? (Matt. xii. 38). Mark helps us by telling us that they were seeking a sign (Mark viii. 11).

When the disciples were being tortured by a hurricane, while trying to row across the lake (John vi. 21), Jesus approached them, and according to the A.V. 'they willingly received Him into the ship'. The R.V. says 'they were willing therefore to receive Him into the boat'. These statements, however, might almost imply that the disciples were conceding something, or obliging the Lord. There was more than mere willingness. The C.V. shews the proper sense. 'They wanted, then, to take Him into the ship'. Perhaps they felt that with a Man on board who could walk on the lake during such a storm, they would be safe.

Both the A.V. and C.V. say that Pilate was willing to release Jesus (Luke xxiii. 20). The R.V. says he was desiring to do so. But the proper sense is that Pilate was wanting to release Him. Pilate, however, was overruled by the mob.

The wind bloweth where it listeth (John iii. 8), but did you ever know that the wind had a will of its own? And a will that is very erratic and fickle? But why not render literally, 'The Spirit—just where He is wanting (thelei) is blowing (for spiriting), and His voice thou art hearing'. It would be very strange if the wind had almost unlimited free-will, while human beings had next to none. Was there not a time when God's spirit blew strangely upon us, for the first time, and we heard His voice? And does He not still blow upon us daily and stir us?

We now approach the noun form (thelema, will), so often used of God, occurring over 60 times in the N.T. Strange to say, just as the Hebrew word olam, when used of God, was always rendered by a word expressive of eternity, but when used of human beings, was translated by a term expressing very limited duration, so this noun is almost invariably rendered by 'will'. No one hitherto, it would appear, has had the temerity to suggest that the real meaning is merely what God wants. We have been trained to regard God's will as a fiat, fixed and firm and final; something inevitable and inflexible, ineludible and ineluctable.

And there are some who would tell us that everything which happens is God's will, even things which God does not want.

Let us, then, test this doctrine, as the matter is of vast importance.

If there is but one thing in the world that is not of God, then it does not require much proof that all things are not of God.

If but one thing is not God's will, then there may be other things which are likewise.

Matthew tells us (xviii. 14), in very simple language, that 'it is not a will (e.g. something willed or wanted) in front of your Father—Him in heavens, that there may be lost one of these little ones'. Can we aver, however, that no children are ever lost? God declares that He does not want this to happen. Or has He willed or purposed that this shall never happen?

So far in this discussion the pregnant and profound facts set forth in most categorical language by James in ch. 1:12-15 do not appear to have been honestly face. The pernicious doctrine that everything comes out from God blasts itself against this solid rock. Because this brief passage has been more or less ignored, Scripture has been set against Scripture, with very baneful results. Passages have been made to state far more than they mean, while these verses in James have been shunned.

* * * * * * *

Here is a question I would like to ask you. If everything is according to God's will, why should it be necessary for us to test what that will is? Paul tells us in Rom. 12:2 not to con-figure to this eon, but to transform by the renewing of the mind, so that we may test (dokimazein) what is the will of God—that which is good, and well-able-to-please (euareston) and mature. The obvious implication is that there are some things which are not God's will, some things which He does not want. Why does not Paul state here that God wants or wills also that which is evil and displeasing and immature? Here the R.V. margin reads, 'the will of God, even the thing which is good and acceptable and perfect'. Young's rendering is, 'what is the will of God—the good, and acceptable and perfect'. The following versions read similarly, Weymouth, 20th Century, Dewes, Moffatt, Goodspeed, Alford, Bloomfield, Cunnington, Challis, Godwin and Lutterworth.

* * * * * * *

Various friends of mine have sought to pass judgment upon me for not believing those verses which appear to state that 'all things are out of God'. I have been told that 'God's word says so'. As though this was final. Some have echoed the charge that not to accept these statements as they wish them understood, is apostasy."

Note the words already quoted in this extract:

"No one hitherto, it would appear, has had the temerity to suggest that the real meaning is merely what God wants. We have been trained to regard God's will as a fiat, fixed and firm and final; something inevitable and inflexible, ineludible and ineluctable."

It is this attitude of mind that we seek to avoid. Let no one think that by thus surrendering the Calvinistic interpretation of the will of God, that he lets chaos loose in God's universe. Let us remember that just as Paul can say:

"The FOOLISHNESS of God is wiser than men; and the WEAKNESS of God is stronger than men" (I Cor. i. 25).

so we continue "the mere WISH of God is stronger than men", and His great redeeming purpose will be carried to its glorious goal, without introducing such a conception of the will of God as to make Him, of necessity the author of sin, as such a conception must lead to if carried to its logical conclusion. On the other hand the fact that we have such words as "purpose", "predestination" and "election" will effectively safeguard us from swinging over to extremes in the matter of what the will of God really is. The word thelema occurs seven times in Ephesians, in six references, where God is the One Who is in view, the word is translated "will", but in Eph. ii. 3 the same word is translate "desire", when used of the flesh. Eph. i. 9 is not discussing the mysterious nature of the will of God, but that His will contains some items that were kept secret, not revealed until the appropriate time. It was the revealed will of God that Israel should accept their Messiah and, under the New Covenant which He would ratify, become a kingdom of Priests, and the channel of blessing to the Gentile world. Nothing can be discovered in the scriptures, outside of Paul's epistles or the closing chapters of the Acts, to tell us what God would do if Israel, the chosen channel, should fail, or whether He had any plans made to cope with such an emergency. Satan, the arch enemy of truth must have felt that having prevented the repentance of Israel, he had effectively thwarted the Divine purpose. This is where the wisdom of God becomes so evident. He had purposely kept as a secret hidden in Himself, what He had planned, and what He would do, if Israel failed. Of course seeing that He knows the end from the beginning, we are but speaking in the manner of men, when we use these terms of conjecture or surprise. Before the overthrow of the world He had chosen from among the outcast Gentiles, those who should be called into high favour during such a period of rejection, but for His own wise purposes God had refrained from making such a fact known to Prophet or Apostle, until Paul became the Prisoner of Christ Jesus for us Gentiles. This "mystery of His will" includes all the mysteries that form a part of the revelation made known through Paul the prisoner, but the expansion of this must of necessity await the time when the other references to mystery are before us.

No.23 The Muniment Room (i. 3 - 14).
The Threefold Charter of the Church.

The Work of the Son (i. 7 - 11).
Fullness of Times.
pp. 101 - 105

We devoted a good deal of our available space in the last article to the consideration of the import of the word usually translated "will". Before going on to the next theme that awaits us, namely "The Fullness of Times", we must note that the Mystery of His will is said to be "according to His good pleasure, which He hath purposed in Himself" (Eph. i. 9), and as these words are an extension of the conception of "His will" and the mystery that belongs to it. We must give them some attention. The preposition kata "according to" occurs twenty-four times in Ephesians and is found in every chapter, being distributed as follows: in the doctrinal portion (Eph. i. - iii. 13) it is found thirteen times, in the practical portion (Eph. iv.-vi.) it is found nine times, and in the great central prayer (Eph. iii. 14-21) it is found twice. The very presence of this word emphasizes the harmonious outworking of God's purpose, it can be translated many times "in harmony with". So, the choice before the foundation of the world, and the predestination to sonship, is "in harmony" with the good pleasure of His will (Eph. i. 4, 5). If, as the Westminster Confession of faith declares:

> "God from all eternity did, by the most wise and holy council of His own will, freely and unchangeably ordain whatsoever comes to pass," it is an evidence of uncertainty to say immediately "Yet so, as neither is God the author of sin . . . . . nor is the liberty and contingency of second causes taken away", for that robs the words "freely and unchangeably ordain WHATSOEVER comes to pass" of their meaning. Instead, therefore of reading into the word "will" a fixed, unalterable decree, we must see in it, His "desire" (Eph. ii. 3 thelo), and that this desire is in harmony with His good pleasure and His purpose, and if God's desire is implemented by infinite wisdom, power and love, who can think of failure or frustration? Why stretch out our hand to stay the ark of God and speak of His "decrees", absolute, unconditional and fixed as fate? This desire of God is in harmony with His good pleasure eudokia. This word is translated "good will" (Luke ii. 14), "desire" (Rom. x. 1), while eudokeo the verb, is the verb "to please". The word translated "purpose" is prothesis, "something placed before" the mind or, as in Matt. xii. 4, Mark ii. 26, Luke vi. 4 and Heb. ix. 2, it is the bread that was placed before Him, called the shew bread. In Gal. iv. 2 prothesmia is the time "appointed" by a father in his will for his son, and it should be remembered that where Paul does introduce a human illustration to illuminate the character of God's "will" he speaks after the manner of men to the Galatians concerning their own customs (iii. 15-18). So in Ephesians, we are dealing with no fatalistic decrees but the will of a Father, with the inheritance and blessing of His children in view. This mystery, will, good pleasure and purpose had a special dispensation in view.

> "That in the dispensation of the fullness of times He might gather together in one, all things in Christ, both which are in heaven, and which are on earth, even in Him" (Eph. i. 10).

The Revised Version reads "unto a dispensation" which recognizes the presence of the preposition eis, which indicates a goal. "With a view to", while rather a free translation, is a good indication of the meaning of eis here. The word "dispensation" comes into our language from the Latin, where it was used to translate the Greek oikonomia, which is the word found here in Eph. i. 10. It means the ordering, management, especially the ordering of events by divine providence. In theology a religious order or system conceived of as a stage in a progressive revelation, expressly adapted to a particular nation or age, as the Patriarchal, Mosaic, Christian dispensation. It also came to mean "the age" in writing of the period 1643A.D. Dickens speaks of the mysterious dispensations of Providence ("Oxford English Dictionary"). As Paul not only speaks of a dispensation of the fullness of times, but of a dispensation that had been given to him for the Gentiles (Eph. iii. 2) we cannot limit the word to a period of time, or even to the disposing of God independently and without the work of a steward, and this leads us to the kindred word oikonomos. In Luke xvi. will be found three occurrences of oikonomos rendered "steward", three occurrences of oikonomia rendered "stewardship" and one occurrence of oikonomeo "be steward". The apostle Paul also uses the word oikonomos in the same way "stewards of the mysteries of God", "it is required in stewards that a man be found faithful", "blameless, as the steward of God", beside "chamberlain of the city" and "governors" (I Cor. iv. 1, 2; Titus i. 7; Rom. xvi. 23 and Gal. iv. 2). When we examine the composition of the Greek word oikonomia, or oikonomos, we find that it is made up of oikos a house, and nomos from nemo "to administer". The reader will recognize in the word "economy" the Greek word in English dress. There is therefore in view in Eph. i. 10 a stewardship which is there defined as "the fullness of times". If we accept the Revised text we shall read at Eph. iii. 9 oikonomia dispensation instead of koinomia "fellowship", and this reading has all the best texts in its favour.

Accordingly, Ephesians speaks of a dispensation three times:

A dispensation or stewardship of the fullness of times (i. 10).
The dispensation or stewardship of the grace of God (iii. 2).
The dispensation or stewardship of the mystery (iii. 9).

In addition to this we must include the one reference in Colossians, where Paul says:

> "Whereof I was made a minister according to the dispensation of God which is given to me for you" (Col. i. 25).

It is a well-known fact that Colossians supplements Ephesians, and these four passages can be taken together.

A | A dispensation of the fullness of times, according to His good pleasure, which He hath purposed in Himself.
B | The dispensation of the grace of God which is given to me to you-ward.
A | The dispensation of the mystery . . .
according to the eternal purpose which He purposed in Christ Jesus our Lord.
B | The dispensation of God which is given to me for you.

If these four passages belong to the same subject, then we cannot use the term "the fullness of times" as though it looked down the ages to the day when God should be all in all, but that rather it refers to the dispensation of the mystery now obtaining. Let us examine this expression. The word translated "fullness" is the Greek word pleroma, the word "times" is the Greek word kairos. Pleroma, is a word of such significance that it demands a treatise to itself, and a series of studies under the heading The Pleroma has been prepared for The Berean Expositor. In Gal. iv. 4 we read of "the fullness of time" when God sent forth His Son, but here the word "time" is chronos. Kairos means "season" rather than "time", and in Eph. ii. 12 the beggary and degradation of the Gentile "at that time" (kairos season) are placed in contrast with the fullness of blessing that is theirs in this present season of grace. This word can be used of the "time" of harvest (Matt. xiii. 30) which cannot refer to the time of the clock but to the season. It is used of the "time" of figs for the same reason. It is not without significance that where Luke speaks of the "times" kairos of the Gentiles (Luke xxi. 24), Paul speaks of the "fullness" of the Gentiles (Rom. xi. 25). The great characteristic of this dispensation of the fullness of the seasons is that then shall be gathered together in one all things in Christ. In the many passages where we read "gather together" in the New Testament the Greek word is ither episunago, sunago, sullego, or sunathroizo. Eph. i. 10 uses a word that occurs nowhere else in the New Testament except in Rom. xiii. 9 where it is translated "is briefly comprehended". Anakephalaioomai is composed of ana "up" and the verbal form of kephale "head" and so does not mean "together" but "to head up". The Revised Version has rendered the phrase "to sum up all things in Christ". While this is nearer to the meaning, as seen in the "briefly comprehended" of Rom. xiii. 9, it has the disadvantages of failing to reveal the connexion of this passage with Eph. i. 22, 23 where "head" and "fullness" re-appear in connexion with the present dispensation and the church of the one body. It is evident therefore that "the dispensation of the fullness of the seasons" when God will "head up all things in Christ" must refer to the dispensation of which Paul was the minister, and which obtains now. "All things" here is not the universal panta, but the limited ta panta "the all things", some entity that is under immediate review, namely the redeemed and the heavenly beings with whom their lot is cast. Only those "in Christ" are thus "headed up" but these are not limited to things on earth, things in heaven are included and this fact must be considered. We cannot stay to give an extended examination of these two terms, but one example may indicate the Scriptural intention in the use or absence of the article "the". We know that ALL THINGS (panta, good and gad, all things without restriction or limitation) work together for good (no one needs an inspired revelation to inform that "good things" work together for good). Here the absence of the article is understandable (Rom. viii. 28).

> "He that spared not His own Son, but delivered Him up for us all, how shall He not with him also freely give us ALL THINGS." (Here the original reads ta panta, some specific "all things" that can be freely given us with Christ as Redeemer) (viii. 32).

The sphere of the church of the mystery is in those heavenly places, where Christ sits at the right hand of God, than which, no place of honour can be higher. This company are potentially "seated together" there now, in anticipation of the day when they shall be manifested with Him in Glory (Col. iii. 1-4; Eph. ii. 6). Christ is not only revealed to be the Head of this church (Eph. i. 22, 23), but at the same time and during the same dispensation, He is revealed to be equally the Head of all principality and power (Col. ii. 10), and whether we adopt the translation of Eph. iii. 15 given by the A.V. "of Whom the whole family in heaven and earth is named", or whether we believe we should read with the R.V. "every family", this "heading up" of things in heaven and earth in Christ is an actual blessed present fact, an anticipation of the day that is coming, when all things in whatever sphere they be shall be ranged under Christ in blessed unity. The anticipatory character of the present dispensation is seen in the words of Col. iii. 11 "Christ is all and in all"—a present glory foreshadowing the greater glory when the end is attained and "God" shall be all in all (I Cor. xv. 28). Both Eph. i. 22, 23 and I Cor. xv. 27, 28 flow out of the special interpretation of Psalm viii. which is peculiar to Paul's epistles (see also Heb. ii. 8 as an evidential proof that Paul wrote that epistle).

All that we have seen in this study of Eph. i. 10 is a preparation for the concluding clauses of this section, "The Work of the Son", which speaks of an inheritance. We have not only been saved "from" we have been saved "to", and among those things that are the goal and consequence of our redemption is an inheritance. This association of bondage, redemption and inheritance moreover, is not peculiar to the dispensation of the mystery.

Other callings follow the same pattern, as indeed does the purpose of the ages. For example, the book of Job falls into three parts:

(1) Job, perfect but untried.
(2) Job, tried and not perfect in the experimental sense.
(3) Job, restored, tried and perfected.

Again, the promise made to Abraham in Gen. xv. falls into the same pattern:

(1) Unconditional covenant. Deep sleep (12).
(2) Interval of bondage. They shall serve them (13).
(3) Covenant fulfilled. They shall come hither again (16).

So, Eph. i. 3-14 exhibits a similar movement:

(1) Unconditional will. Chosen, predestinated (4, 5).
(2) Interval of bondage. Redemption, release (7).
(3) Will accomplished. Inheritance sealed (11-14).

In our next article we must consider the inheritance of the eleventh verse.

The Authorized Version renders Eph. i. 11 "In Whom also we have obtained an inheritance", where the Revised Version reads: "In Whom also we were made an inheritance." There is a considerable difference, between the idea of "obtaining" an inheritance, and of "being made" an inheritance. In the one the inheritance becomes ours, in the other we ourselves become an inheritance. Cunnington translated the verse "in Whom also we were made God's portion". Rotherham reads "we were taken as an inheritance" and Moffatt "we have had our inheritance allotted to us". The Authorized Version and Moffatt point in one direction, the others point in the opposite direction, and in such changes as inheritance to portion, and to something allotted.

The word inheritance, kleronomia, is composed of kleros, a lot, and nemo, to administer. Kleros is derived from klao to break (Matt. xxvi. 26) and so came to mean a small stone, piece of wood, or earth, that was thrown into a vessel, or which was shaken out of the vessel in the casting of lots.

The casting of lots during the O.T. times and at the beginning of the New was the Divinely appointed means of discovering the Lord's will. Two Hebrew words are employed in the Old Testament, namely goral, which occurs seventy-seven times and always translated "lot", and chebel, which occurs sixty times, and is translated "lot" thrice, a figurative use of the word which primarily meant "a cord, a line, a rope", and then a coast, a country, a portion or a region so measured off. In the New Testament we have kleros occurring thirteen times, being translated "lots" or "lot" eight times, "inheritance" and "heritage" once each, and "part" twice". Here again, the pebble, by a figure of speech becomes the portion which the falling of the pebble indicated. Langchano occurs four times, twice it is translated "obtain", once "be one's lot", and once "cast lots". From Esther iii. 7 and ix. 24 we learn that the Persians also used the lot which they called "pur", and apparently continued casting the lot from day to day until they discovered the day propitious to their desire, which turned out to be the 13th of the 12th month, Adar.

The first use of the lot according to the Scriptures, was for ascertaining which of the two goats on the day of atonement, was for the Lord, and which for the scapegoat (Lev. xvi. 8, 9, 10). The seven occurrences in Numbers and the twenty-six in Joshua relate to the apportionment of the land of Canaan among the twelve tribes. We find the lot used in apportioning special service in Neh. x. 34 and xi. 1, and after that, the casting of lots is used in the Psalms, Proverbs and the Prophets in secondary and figurative senses. One passage from the Psalms calls for attention:

> "The Lord is the portion of mine inheritance and of my cup: Thou (emphatic) maintainest my lot. The lines are fallen unto me in pleasant places; Yea, I have a goodly heritage" (Psa. xvi. 5, 6).

The subject matter is distributed thus:

A | Inheritance.
B | Lot.
B | Line.
A | Heritage.

A similar combination of lot and line is found in Isa. xxxiv. 17:

> "And He hath cast the lot for them, and His hand hath divided it unto them by line."

And yet another in verse eleven where we read of "the line of confusion, and the stones of emptiness", an inheritance of wrath, not of blessing. A passage in Micah that bears upon the quotation of Psalm xvi., given above, reads:

> "He hath changed the portion of my people: how hath He removed it from me: turning away He hath divided our fields. Therefore thou shalt have none that shalt cast a cord by lot in the congregation of the Lord" (Micah ii. 4, 5).

To understand the Psalmist's reference to the lot and the line, we must go back to his times, to a village where the inhabitants are gathered in a house for a most important decision. Surrounding the village was a tract of land which belonged to the village and not to any individual owner. Now, as the parable of the Sower indicates, some of this land may be good, some bad and some indifferent, and instead of this land, good, bad and indifferent being the possession of some person for all time, it was divided, once a year, by lot to whom each portion of this communal land should fall. Very often a little child, too young to be influenced by bias, would be selected and he would put his hand into the vase or receptacle and draw out the different lots. Whether the translators of the Authorized Version consciously chose the word "maintain" because it is derived from main "a hand" and teneo "to hold", we do not know, but the Hebrew word so translated means to uphold as with the hand (Isa. xli. 10) or to stay up the hand (Exod. xvii. 12). We believe the following extract from the book "Pictured Palestine", by the Rev. James Neil, M.A., will be of service here.

> "The tenure by which these open fields are held is exceedingly interesting and evidently ancient. The land is not, as with us, in individual holding. The village house, the enclosed garden, vineyard, orchard, olive or fig yard, and even fruit trees, such as the olive growing on unenclosed land, may be held, as with us, individually, or, as lawyers say, in severalty. But broad acres are crown-lands, ard amiriyeh, and the whole village as occupiers have only the muzara'a, or right of cultivation, held by them all in common (musha'a). But they possess this right in perpetuity, and are virtually joint free-holders in common of all the land belonging to their village community. The cultivation each year begins with ploughing, about the middle of November, as soon as the first heavy winter rain, the Hebrew geshem, has come to saturate and soften the soil. Before this, all the men of the village who possess oxen meet in a general assembly in the saha, or 'guest-house', which answers to our public hall; for all of these, one as much as another, except slaves, have the joint right of tillage and pasturage over all the lands of the community, in proportion to the number of their cattle.
>
> The course of procedure is then as follows: the Khateeb, or Mohammedan religious teacher, who is also the scribe, recorder, and accountant of the place, presides at this gathering. He first writes down the names of all who desire to plough, and against each man's name enters the number of ploughs that he intends to work. The farmers now form themselves into several equal groups, generally making up ten ploughs in a group, each of which chooses one of their number to represent them. If there are forty men who desire to farm, making up amongst them sixty ploughs, they will divide themselves into six parties of ten ploughs each, represented by six chiefs. The whole of the land is then parceled out into six equal parts, one for each group of farmers, by the six elected chiefs. The land being in most instances of various qualities, some very good, some much poorer, and some comparatively bad, has to be chosen from different and often distant parts to form each of the six several parcels. Although there are no hedges, ditches, or walls, the tillage is all divided into portions somewhat answering to our fields, marked off from one another by rough natural boundaries, each bearing a name, such as 'the field of the partridge', 'the field of the mother of mice', &c. It would seem to have been the same in ancient times for we read of 'the fuller's field' and 'the potter's field', the latter called afterwards, on account of its purchase with the thirty pieces of silver given to Judas as the price of Messiah's betrayal, by the tragic name of 'the bloody field', Aceldama (Acts i. 19).
>
> The six representatives, having parceled out the land, now cast lots for its distribution. Each of them give some object to the presiding Khateeb, such as a stone or a piece of wood, and he puts them into a bag. The Khateeb then asks to whom one of the six parcels of ground which he names is to belong, and a little boy, chosen to draw out the > objects from the bag, puts in his hand, and the ground in question is adjudged to the party represented by the chief who gave the stone or other object which the child brings out. A very young child is generally chosen for this purpose, in order that there may be no collusion. When the six divisions are thus allotted, they are again subdivided, in the case of each party, amongst the ten ploughs in a similar way. For this purpose each field of each parcel is divided into ten equal strips, which are now generally, on the mountains, measured out roughly with an ox-goad, about eight feet long. On the plains they use for this purpose a rope about twice the length of the ox-goad, made of goat's hair, about half an inch thick, called hhabaleh, evidently the Hebrew hhevel, 'rope', or 'measuring line'. Each of these strips is called a mares, from Arabic meeras, 'inheritance' or 'allotted portion' (or, as some say, from maras, 'cable', a collective plural from marasah, 'rope'). The fields are taken separately, and the ten mawaress, or strips, are apportioned amongst the ten ploughs by lot. The owner of two ploughs, for instance, would get one-fifth of each field in his sixth division of the land, and the owner of one plough one-tenth. A man with two weak oxen who can only plough half a day is set down at half a plough, and gets one-twentieth of each field; and another who can only plough for a quarter of a day received one-fortieth. Each farmer then pays the proportion of the land-tax due on the strips of land allotted to him."

Instead, therefore of questioning the use of the word "lot" to indicate our inheritance, it would be difficult with such a background to avoid it.

So far we have considered our attention on the word kleronomia, we must now consider the evidence that is forthcoming to justify one or other of the divergent translations namely, the inheritance which we have obtained or have had allotted us in Him, or, as the Revised Version, Cunnington and Rotherham would have it "we were made God's portion". When we turn to the original of Eph. i. 11, we find no word exactly equivalent to "obtain" and observe that we meet here, for the first and only occasion, the word kleroomai, which is explained in Dr. Bullinger's Lexicon as being in the middle voice, and meaning "to acquire by lot, to obtain, to possess", but leaves the question still unsolved, as to who it is that obtains. We have on other occasions expressed our conviction, that many a doubtful passage in the New Testament can be rendered with certainty by referring to a parallel use in the LXX. One such passage is I Sam. xiv. 41, where in answer to the casting of lots between Saul and Jonathan, "Jonathan was taken". The Greek kleroomai here is the translation of the Hebrew lakad "to take" in what is called the niphal or passive voice, "be taken", not actively "to take". There are six occasions apart from I Sam. xiv. 41 and 42 where this word is used for being taken by lot.

> "The tribe of Judah was taken . . . . . and Zabdi was taken . . . . . and Achan . . . . . was taken" (Josh. vii. 16, 17, 18).
>
> "The tribe of Benjamin was taken . . . . . the family of Matri was taken, and Saul the son of Kish was taken" (I Sam. x. 20, 21).

It seems impossible to resist this evidence. Eph. i. 11 teaches us NOT that we have obtained an inheritance, but that we have been taken by God for HIS inheritance! Of this rendering Alford says: "This seems to me the only rendering by which philology and the context are alike satisfied."

We have already gained information by referring to the history of Israel, let us turn again and this time see what that typical people tell us concerning the conception now set forth namely, that instead of reading in Eph. i. 11 that we have obtained an inheritance, we learn with amazement that we have been taken for an inheritance, by the Lord Himself.

> "And the Lord spake unto Aaron, Thou shalt have NO INHERITANCE in their land, neither shalt thou have ANY PART among them: I am thy part and thine inheritance among the children of Israel" (Numb. xviii. 20).

This is blessing contrary to nature indeed. The man that God would honour the most, is to have, apparently, the least, but only apparently. The tribes of Israel may possess a portion of the land, but Aaron finds his part and his inheritance in the Lord Himself. This is not on all fours with Eph. i. 11 but it is an approach.

(1) All Israel have a portion of the land for their inheritance.
(2) Aaron finds his portion and his inheritance in the Lord.
(3) The Ephesian believer is taken one stage further, the Lord finds His portion in the members of the Church of the One Body.

This, too, finds its counterpart in Israel:

> "The Lord's portion is His people: Jacob is the lot of His inheritance" (Deut. xxxii. 9).

We must not, however, make the mistake of insisting so much upon this aspect as to deny that Israel did have an inheritance, truth out of proportion oft becomes a lie. In Deut. iv. 20 Moses reminds Israel that they were taken to be unto the Lord, a people of inheritance, but in verse twenty-one he refers to the good land which the Lord had given them for an inheritance. Both statements are necessary for the presentation of "Truth". Both Israel and the Church are reminded by these passages that unless they are the Lord's portion, all other portions will be a mockery. That unless they find their inheritance in the Lord, mere possessions will become vanity.

> "All things are yours", said the Apostle, "whether Paul or Apollos, or Cephas, or the world, or life or death, or things present, or things to come, all are yours: and ye are Christ's and Christ's is God's" (I Cor. iii. 22, 23).

"The Prior-hope" (i. 12).

pp. 141 - 143

The inheritance, which formed the theme of our last study, is linked with the blessing pronounced in verse five by the repetition of the word "predestinated".

A | Predestinated to the adoption of sons, i.e. constituting such "heirs".
B | According to His good pleasure.
A | Predestinated to the inheritance described in verse 11.
B | According to the purpose of Him Who worketh all things after the counsel of His own will.

This brings us to the end of the second great section of Eph. i. 3-14, namely that which deals with the Work of the Son, and calls forth the refrain that we met in verse seven and will meet again in verse fourteen "to the praise of His glory". We now enter the third section of this great charter of the Church which we have called "The witness of the Spirit".

In the first section, "The Will of the Father", we have Choice.
In the second section, "The Work of the Son", we have Deliverance.
In the third section, "The Witness of the Spirit", we have Sealing.

Each section is ultimately concerned with inheritance. The Will of the Father settles who are to be His heirs, this is implied in the word adoption. The Work of the Son sets those thus chosen free from the bondage of sin and death and fits them for their inheritance. The Witness of the Spirit operates during the period that elapses from the first act of faith unto the redemption of the purchased possession, and seals them for this inheritance.

The word "trust" to-day stands for reliance, confidence, credit, and only in a very secondary sense is it used for "hope". This can be realized if we were to interpose the word "hope" into a "trust deed" or the office of a "trustee". Trust is connected with the old word trow, to hold true. The word trust is used in the Authorized Version, to translate two Greek words, peitho "to persuade" and elpizo "to hope". In Rom. xv. 12 and 13 we have verb and noun of the latter coming together, where we read "In Him shall the Gentiles trust, now the God of hope". While the verb elpizo is translated more times by "to trust" than "to hope", the noun elpis is translated fifty-three times "hope" and once "faith". This exception is Heb. x. 23, "the profession of our faith", which the Revised Version renders "the confession of our hope". While we cannot entirely dispense with "trust" as a translation of elpizo by reason of the fact that the believer has every ground for confidence that God will perform His promises, it does seem that where noun and verb come together, or where the blessed hope of our calling is in view, the word "trust" should be exchanged for the less ambiguous word "hope". The word that is used in Eph. i. 12 is a compound, proelpizo, the pro being translated in the Authorized Version "first", but although pro occurs forty-eight times in the New Testament it is never so translated in the Authorized Version elsewhere. "The Companion Bible" sums up the meanings of pro, in Appendix 104/xiv. thus:

> "Pro governs only one case (the Genitive) and denote the position as being in sight, or before one, in place (e.g. Luke vii. 27; ix. 52; James v. 9), time (e.g. Matt. v. 12; John xvii. 24; Acts xxi. 38), or superiority (e.g. James v. 12; I Pet. iv. 8).

Just as the preposition pro indicates of place, time and dignity so is it when used in combination with other words. When used as a prefix to the Greek verbs ago "to lead", erchomai "to come", and poreuomai "to go", it is translated "to go before". When prefixed to lego "to speak", grapho "to write", or epangellomai "to promise", it is rendered "in time past", "aforetime" and "afore". These refer either to priority of place or of time. The third usage is that of priority in position, dignity or advantage. Proerchomai "better" (Rom. iii. 9), Proegeomai and prokrima "prefer" in two senses (Rom. xii. 10; I Tim. v. 21); prokopto, prokope "profit" and "wax" (Gal. i. 14; I Tim. iv. 15; II Tim. iii. 13).

We cannot quite eliminate the third sense, of dignity, from such passages as John i. 15, 27 and 30, which say "He was before me", for each passage use the word "preferred", and in one, John the Baptist expands this meaning by saying "Whose shoe's latchet I am not worthy to unloose", which has nothing to do with time. The same may be said of Col. i. 17, 18 for the words "before all things", "beginning" and "firstborn", refer not only to time, but especially to dignity "that in all things He might have the pre-eminence". To tell the members of the One Body, believers during the dispensation of the mystery, the period when Israel's hope is deferred, that "we hoped-before" and mean by that, the hope of the believer during the Acts, is manifestly without point. Right up to the dispensational boundary of Acts xxviii., the "hope of Israel" was uppermost (Acts xxviii. 20), so to tell the Ephesians that the Apostle or his fellow believers, hoped before the Ephesians did, is to tell them nothing relevant to the object with which Ephesians was written. If we believe that the "we" of Eph. i. 13 refers to one company, namely the Jewish believer, and the "ye" refers to the Gentiles, are we going to take the argument to its logical conclusion, and say that the words "Blessed US", "Chosen US", "WE have redemption" , "WE have obtained" in the preceding verses are also exclusive to the Jewish believer? We believe that the meaning of the Apostle can only be discerned if we perceive that the word pro is used to indicate priority of position or dignity.

The word "predestinate" is used twice in this great charter of the church, and enables us to see that the wondrous acceptance in the Beloved, is echoed by this condition of being in a state of "prior" hope, thus:

Ephesians i. 5, 6 and 11, 12

5, 6. | A | Predestinated to adoption.
B | According to the good pleasure of His will.
C | To praise of the glory of His grace.
D | Highly favoured in the Beloved.
11, 12. | A | Predestinated to inheritance.
B | According to purpose . . . will.
C | To the praise of His glory.
D | Who fore-hoped in Christ.

We believe that the Apostle uses this word proelipzo to speak of the exceeding high calling of this church of the mystery. The word "also", too, needs care in interpretation. Some read Eph. i. 13 as though it means "We (i.e. the Jews) first trusted, and now ye (i.e. the Gentiles) also". We believe that the word "also" belongs to the fact of "sealing" and that there is a parenthesis in the middle of verse thirteen. "In Whom also you (. . . . .) were sealed." The Apostle often slips an explanatory clause into an argument as though he would say "I take it for granted that . . . . ." An illustration that lies to hand is in verse eighteen. He was not praying that the eyes of their understanding MAY BE enlightened, he says in effect, "taking it for granted that the eyes of your understanding have been enlightened".

These highly favoured believers were "also sealed". We must therefore devote the next article to the meaning of the "seal" and the related terms "earnest" and "Holy Spirit of promise".

The Ephesian believers were "sealed". What does this mean? The Word translated "to be sealed" or "to set a seal" is the Greek word sphragizo, and a seal is sphragis, which words represent the Hebrew chotham. Seals were employed to safeguard letters or treasures, to guarantee legal evidences, deeds, &c., to give authority to shut and seal the doors of a prison.

"So she wrote letters in Ahab's name, and sealed them with this seal" (I Kings xxi. 8).
"I subscribed the evidence, and sealed it" (Jer. xxxii. 10).
"The King sealed it (the den) with his own signet" (Dan. vi. 17).

are samples of its use. The word sphragis "seal" comes sixteen times in the New Testament and sphragizo twenty-five times.

We will not attempt to examine every reference, but we are particularly concerned with the subject of Eph. i. 13 which is connected with the witness of the Spirit. There is a passage written before Acts xxviii., which by its very additions is illuminating, we refer to II Cor. i. 22:

> "Who hath sealed us, and given the earnest of the Spirit in our hearts."

At first, unless like true Bereans we consider the context, we may assume that inasmuch as both II Cor. i. 22 and Eph. i. 13 speak of both seal and earnest, that it is all one and the same whether the epistle thus quoted is on one side of Acts xxviii. or the other. A closer examination, however, will reveal an essential dispensational difference.

> "Now He which stablisheth us with you in Christ, and hath anointed us, is God, Who hath also sealed us, and given us the earnest of the spirit in our hearts" (II Cor. i. 21, 22).

The word "stablish" is the Greek bebaioo which is used in I Cor. i. and Heb. ii. with particular reference to the confirming nature of miraculous gifts.

> "Which at first began to be spoken by the Lord, and was confirmed unto us by them that heard Him; God also bearing them witness, both with signs and wonders, and divers miracles, and gifts of the holy spirit, according to His own will" (Heb. ii. 3, 4).
>
> "That in everything ye are enriched by Him, in all utterance, and in all knowledge; even as the testimony of Christ was confirmed in you; So that ye come behind in no gift; waiting for the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ" (I Cor. i. 5-7).

Paul practically said, therefore, in II Cor. i. 21 "Now He which confirmeth us (by the endowment of miraculous gifts) with you . . . . . is God". Associated with this confirmation is "anointing". Chrio "to anoint" gives the title "Christ", The Anointed. This anointing, says John in his first epistle, made it unnecessary that any man should teach those who received it, for "the same anointing teacheth you of all things" (I John ii. 27). No member of the One Body has such an anointing, but where there were miraculous gifts, there would also be found this anointing. In I Cor. xii., which deals with supernatural gifts in the church, the Apostle uses the somewhat strange expression "so also is Christ" (xii. 12). Now a reading of the context will make it impossible to read this of our Lord. Valpy says of the word "Christ" here:

> "The word Christos is frequently used by Paul as a trope, denoting sometimes the Christian spirit and temper, as when he says until Christ be formed in you (Gal. iv. 19); sometimes the Christian doctrine as, But ye have not so learned Christ (Eph. iv. 20), and in this place the Christian church."

All that we need add to Valpy in this place is, "that church as endued with supernatural gifts". The "stablishing" and the "anointing" belong to the calling that lies on the side of Acts xxviii. that commences with Pentecost, Ephesians has the seal and the earnest just the same, but the supernatural gifts are conspicuous by their absence. The seal is "with that holy spirit of promise". The construction of this phrase in the original is somewhat peculiar. It is:

To	pneumati	tes	epagglias	to hagio.
With the	spirit	of the	promise	with the holy.

While there are many instances in the N.T. where the presence of the article "the" with the words translated Holy Spirit, indicates the Person, the Giver, and the absence of the article with "Holy Spirit" indicates His gift; there is no mechanical rule possible, for the article can be added or omitted for a number of reasons. This passage is a case in point. Most readers know the valuable contribution to the subject of Dr. Bullinger in his book "S or s, Spirit of spirit", and in Appendix 101 of "The Companion Bible" the findings of this work are summarized. Pneuma hagion without the article is never used of The Holy Spirit, the Giver, but only and always of His gift. It is not so universally true however to say, that where the article "the" is added to Holy Spirit, or two articles are employed as "The" Spirit, "the" holy, that the reference is only and always of the Giver, Eph. i. 13 being a case in point. The note in "The Companion Bible" reading:

> "Although both articles occur (see App. 101 ii.14) yet it is clear from the 'earnest' (verse 14) it is the gift, and not the Giver."

The bulk of commentators read this verse as though it spoke of the Holy Spirit Himself which had been promised, and refer back to Luke xxiv. 49, Acts i. 4 and ii. 33. The Holy Spirit promised by the Father, and fulfilled at Pentecost is not in view in Eph. i. 13. Here is not the Spirit that was promised, but the spirit that confirmed something that had been promised. The Apostle himself suggests the true meaning of the phrase here, by going on to speak of this "spirit" with which we are sealed as the "earnest". There is waiting for us, in our own tongue a term that well expresses the intention of the Apostle. It is the "promissory note". This is a written promise to pay a given sum of money to a certain person on a specified date. The stamp duty is ad valorum, that is according to the value of the subject matter. This use of the word "spirit" as a pledge or earnest does not occur here for the first time. We meet it in Rom. viii. and there are accompanying features in that chapter that illuminate Eph. i. 13 while not speaking of it. In Rom. viii. 15 and 16 we read of "the spirit of adoption", and that this spirit bears witness with our spirit. The structure of Rom. viii. 15-17 is as follows:

Rom. viii. 15 - 17.

A	SONS.	a	Ye have received.
		b	The sonship spirit.
		a	We cry.
		b	Abba, Father.
B	SPIRIT ITSELF bears witness with our spirit.
A	HEIRS.	a	We are the children of God.
		b	And if children.
		b	Then heirs.
		a	Heirs of God.

This section denominated "the spirit of adoption" is balanced in the structure of the chapter by verses 22-28 "Waiting for the Adoption". Rom. viii. 15 speaks of the spirit of adoption, enjoyed now in this life, Rom. viii. 23 speaks of the literal, future adoption "the redemption of the body" for which the believer waits and which cannot be enjoyed apart from resurrection. What is called "the spirit of adoption" in verse 15, is called "the firstfruits" of the spirit in verse 23. Now the firstfruits was a pledge of the yet future harvest, so Paul, who wrote Rom. viii., could link the spirit of the promise the Holy One, with the earnest of a future inheritance. Not only is there in both passages the "adoption", there is "predestination" and "hope".

Let us turn then to the earnest and see what we can learn. The word so translated is arrhabon, a word exactly the same as the Hebrew of Gen. xxxviii. 17 except, of course the characters used are Hebrew instead of Greek. This word seems to have passed from the Phoenicians in their trading, to the Greeks, and thence to the Romans, (Latin arrha, arrhabo). Our English "earnest" is a descendant of this Hebrew word. The terminal "t" is an addition, and like many other additions it may have grown out of the idea that the word meant that one was in earnest when promising, and this form of speculation is a cause of many etymological pitfalls. In Middle English, the word was spelt ernes, and sometimes earles, whence comes the early English equivalent "earlespenny", a term not unknown in some parts of Scotland to-day. The English word was derived from the Old French arrhes.

Blackstone in his commentary says of the earnest:

> "If any part of the price is paid down, if it be but a penny, or any portion of the goods delivered by way of earnest, the property of the goods is absolutely bound by it . . . . ."

Erabon, the Hebrew word which appears in Greek form in Eph. i. 14 occurs three times in Gen. xxxviii. and is translated "pledge". The simpler word Arab occurs twenty-two times, and is translated "surety", "pledge", "mortgage", "engage", "undertake", "mingle", "meddle" and "sweet". Note although for certain reasons one word begins in English with E, and the other with A, both represent the one Hebrew letter Ayin. It may not be at first obvious how this word can have such a variety of meanings. The root meaning of the word is "to mix, or mingle" as in Ezra ix. 2, and in Lev. xiii. in nine verses, it is translated "the woof", a word meaning the threads that cross "the warp", the threads running the long way of the fabric. In all its varied renderings, the one idea of "intermingling" is present. Take the word "surety". Judah realized the serious implications of suretyship saying:

> "For thy servant became surety for the lad unto my father, saying, If I bring him not unto thee, then I shall bear the blame to my father for ever. Now therefore, I pray thee, let thy servant abide INSTEAD OF the lad" (Gen. xliv. 32, 33).

The surety is so intermingled with the one for whom he becomes pledge as to be practically inseparable. All these features enter into the thought of the "earnest" in Eph. i. 14. Whether the pledge be a penny or a pound it is equally binding. Whether the earnest include the confirmation of supernatural gifts, including even the raising of the dead, or whether it be but the possession of that faith which is the substance of things hoped for, whether it be the "manifestation of the spirit" or whether the witness of the spirit be so simple, so quiet, so unobtrusive as to exclude all apparent "evidence", one thing abides the earnest has been given, and those who have been thus sealed have received the pledge of the God of truth, Whose promises in every dispensation find their Yea and their Amen in Christ.

The remainder of the record of Eph. i. 14 "the redemption of the purchased possession" demands a separate study.

The seal and earnest are related to hope, promise and inheritance in Eph. i. 12-14 or as it is summed up at the close "until the redemption of the purchased possession". The preposition eis is only translated "until" once and "till" once, and although these are noted in Young's Analytical Concordance under till, neither until nor till are included in the Index at the back. While it is necessarily true that the earnest is "until" the day of redemption, the idea in Eph. i. 12-14 is that it is given "with a view to" or "unto" that day. However we translated eis, the idea of a goal must never be absent. Predestination is said to be "unto the adoption", in the same way the earnest is unto the redemption of the inheritance. What is meant by the expression "the redemption of the purchased possession"? Redemption in its initial stage is blessedly past, "In Whom we have redemption through His blood" (i. 7). This initial redemption is set forth in the type of the Passover Lamb. Here deliverance FROM bondage is the uppermost thought. Redemption however is also UNTO something, He Who led Israel out of Egypt, led them ultimately into the land of Promise. The figure that stands out prominently in the O.T. as the great type of this second aspect of Redemption is "The Kinsman-Redeemer" and the book that sets this great type forth most blessedly is the book of Ruth. Before therefore we deal with the actual term "the redemption of the purchased possession" let us become acquainted with the general teaching of the book of Ruth. The Book of Ruth fulfils several purposes.

(1) It reveals that even during the dark days of the Judges, there were some who lived their simple lives in the fear of the Lord.
(2) The example of utter faithfulness presented by the story of Ruth the Moabitess, stands out in bold relief against the dark background of the times, and gives encouragement to us in our own day of darkness and apostasy.
(3) The book supplies an important link in the genealogy of Christ as the Son of David.

(4) The introduction into that genealogy of a Moabitess illuminates the character of the God of all grace, prefiguring the acceptance of the Gentile, and indicating something of the gracious work of the Saviour.
(5) But perhaps more important than all is the light this book throws upon that most important typical figure, the Kinsman-Redeemer.

If we turn to the first chapter of Ephesians, we find there a twofold presentation of redemption:

(1) REDEMPTION FROM BONDAGE.—"In Whom we have redemption through His blood, the forgiveness of sins, according to the riches of His grace" (i. 7).
(2) REDEMPTION OF A POSSESSION.—"Which is the earnest of our inheritance, until the redemption of the purchased possession" (i. 14).

In the first passage the word aphesis ("forgiveness") is used, meaning "setting free from bondage" (see Luke iv. 18). In the second passage, sin and bondage are not in view. The figure is an "earnest" now, in view of a "possession" then; and as the possession had been forfeited, redemption is essential. It is this second aspect of redemption that finds so beautiful an illustration in the Book of Ruth, and makes its study so profitable.

The central and longest portions of the book revolve round the figure of Boaz as the Kinsman-Redeemer (gaal). The word gaal and its derivatives, which are variously translated "redeem", "right", "right to redeem" and "kinsman", occur no less that twenty times in these central chapters.

The simplest analysis of the book seems to be as follows. The first chapter puts us in possession of the circumstances that involved the forfeiture of the inheritance, while the closing verses of the fourth chapter reveal its redemption.

A | i. 1-22. Sons dead.
No more sons possible.
Inheritance suspended.
B | ii. 1-23. Kindness to living and dead. \ Kinsman-
B | iii. 1 - iv. 13. Name of dead not cut off. / Redeemer.
A | iv. 14-22. Better than seven sons.
Genealogy to David.
Inheritance redeemed.

After the death of Elimelech, the two sons married two women of Moab, and lived together for ten years. In both cases the marriages were childless, and at the death of the two sons, three widows were faced with a serious problem. Elimelech's inheritance which passed on to Mahlon and Chilion was temporarily suspended owing to the fact that no child had been born to either of them. This gives point to the otherwise rather strange reference that Naomi makes to the idea of the two widows waiting until she, Naomi, might re-marry and have further sons—a far-fetched argument to our ears, but not so when read in the light of the law of Moses, to which we must make reference later. We do not give here the full outline of this first chapter, but give the outline of i. 8-18.

Ruth i. 8 - 18.

A | i. 8-18. |
- d1 | Ye dealt kindly with me.
  - e1 | "Rest" in house of husband.
  - e1 | "Tarry" for husband.
- d1 | The Lord against me.
  - f | Orpah. Kissed.
    - Ruth. Clave.
- d2 | She has gone back.
  - e2 | Her people. Her gods.
- d2 | Intreat me not to leave.
  - e2 | Thy people. Thy God.

In those days the lot of an unmarried woman was such that marriage with almost anyone, however irksome, was preferable. Naomi speaks of Orpah and Ruth "finding rest" (menuchah) in the house of a husband. The same word is repeated in Ruth iii. 1, "Shall I not seek rest for thee?" This figure, too, is prophetic; for in Isaiah we find marriage terms employed to describe the glory of that future day when Israel shall be restored. In Isa. lxii. we read that Israel shall be called Hephzi-bah, "My delight is in her", and the land Beulah, "Married" (4). Again, in Isa. xxxii.:

> "And My people shall dwell in a peaceable habitation, and in sure dwellings, and in quiet resting places (menuchah)" (18).

The contrast between Orpah and Ruth is most marked. Orpah "kissed" her mother-in-law; but Ruth "clave" to her. Orpah went back to "her people" and to "her gods", but Ruth chooses Naomi's "people" and Naomi's "God". The beauty of the words of Ruth as recorded in verses 16 and 17 will move the heart so long as the world endures. They are comparable with the lowly act of love which the Saviour said should be remembered wheresoever the gospel was preached (Matt. xxvi. 13).

> "Intreat me not to leave thee, or to return from following after thee: for whither thou goest, I will go, and where thou lodgest, I will lodge: thy people shall be my people, and thy God my God. Where thou diest, will I die, and there will I be buried: the Lord do so to me and more also, if ought but death part thee and me" (Ruth i. 16, 17).

And so these two took the long road back to Bethlehem, and arrived there at the beginning of the barley harvest. There are no accidents in God's providence. His hand guided; His heart planned; Boaz, all unwittingly, was awaiting his appointed time and work.

We are now ready to take up the great story of the Kinsman-Redeemer as it is unfolded in the central section of this beautiful little book. May the faithfulness of Ruth be an inspiration to each of us in these days when so many seem to do "that which is right in the sight of their own eyes".

The central sections of the Book of Ruth are mainly concerned with the Kinsman-Redeemer. It is evident, therefore, that before we can rightly appreciate the narrative of Ruth ii.-iv., we must be well acquainted with the teaching concerning this important office.

Chapter two opens with the statement: "And Naomi had a kinsman of her husband", and this note is repeated with variations throughout the section. In verse 3 we read that Ruth's "hap was to light on a part of the field belonging unto Boaz, who was of the kindred of Elimelech".

In verse 20, when Ruth returns to her mother-in-law with her gleanings, we find that Naomi links up the thought of kindness to the dead, with that of nearness of kin:

> "Blessed be he of the Lord, Who hath not left off His kindness to the living and to the dead. And Naomi said unto her, The man is near of kin unto us, one of our next kinsmen" (Ruth ii. 20).

There are four words used in connexion with Boaz and his kinship with Naomi, which may be set out as follows:

(1) He was a "kinsman" of Elimelech (Ruth ii. 1). Here the word translated "kinsman" is moda, derived from yada, "to know". The word implies very intimate knowledge, as the usage of Gen. iv. 1 indicates, and is used in Isa. liii.: "By His knowledge shall My righteous servant justify many" (11). When we realize the relationship between this word and the "Kinsman" and "Kinsman-Redeemer" we begin to see a fuller reason for its use in Isa. liii., and a deeper meaning in many of the N.T. references to "knowledge".

(2) We also read that Boaz was of the "kindred" of Elimelech (Ruth ii. 3). Here the word translated "kindred" is mishpachah, from the root shapach, "to join" or "associate". Mishpachah is translated "after their kinds" (Gen. viii. 19), "after their families" (Gen. x. 5), and is the word "family" in Ruth ii. 1. Ruth uses the word twice in ii. 13 in reference to herself as a "handmaid". Once again profound doctrine is resident in these facts. To be redeemed one must be of the same "family" or "kind" as the redeemer. It was a necessity, therefore, that the Lord from heaven should become man and that the Word should be made flesh.

(3) In Ruth ii. 20 Naomi says of Boaz: "The man is near of kin to us." Here the word translated "near of kin" is qarob. Readers who depend upon Young's Analytical Concordance should note that this reference is omitted both under "near" and "near of kin". The verb qarab, "to come near", is used in the same intimate sense as the verb "to know" (see Gen. xx. 4) and once again the instructed reader will appreciate the fuller meaning behind the N.T. references to drawing near, both on the part of the Saviour Himself, and of those whom He had redeemed.

(4) This is perhaps the most important reference and is found in Ruth ii. 20 ". . . . . one of our next kinsmen". Here the margin informs us that the passage may be translated: "One that hath right to redeem." The word here is *Goel, or "Kinsman-Redeemer".

[* - In the Concordance, Goel will be found under Gaal, "to redeem".]

The "Kinsman-Redeemer" played an important part in the Hebrew economy and is referred to in Lev. xxv., where we find the first statement of the law concerning the redemption of land. Under the law of Moses it was not possible for a man to sell the land that formed part of his true possession "in perpetuity". In every transaction with regard to the sale of land, it was compulsory to "grant a redemption" (Lev. xxv. 23, 24). If a man had "sold away" any part of his possession, on account of poverty, his "next of kin" had the right to redeem it. A special provision was made for the safeguarding of the inheritance to the rightful family, which is set out at length in Deut. xxv. 5-10:

> "If brethren dwell together, and one of them die, and have no child, the wife of the dead shall not marry without unto a stranger: her husband's brother shall take her to him to wife, and perform the duty of an husband's brother unto her. And it shall be, that the firstborn which she beareth shall succeed in the name of his brother which is dead, that his name be not put out of Israel. And if the man like not to take his brother's wife, then let his brother's wife go up to the gate unto the elders, and say, My husband's brother refuseth to raise up unto his brother a name in Israel; he will not perform the duty of my husband's brother. Then the elders of his city shall call him, and speak unto him: and if he stand it, and say, I like not to take her: then shall his brother's wife come unto him in the presence of the elders, and loose his shoe from his foot, and spit in his face, and shall answer and say, So shall it be done unto that man that will not build up his brother's house. And his name shall be called in Israel, The house of him that hath his shoe loosed."

This law was certainly in the minds of Naomi, Ruth and Boaz, and its recognition makes the reading of Ruth ii.-iv. vivid and plain. Before turning to Ruth, however, we must mention the other aspect of the Kinsman-Redeemer's work—that of the "avenger of blood". The word Goel or Gaal is translated "avenger" or "revenger" in thirteen passages, and we are told in Numb. xxxv. that cities of refuge were provided so that a man could get a hearing and a trial in the event of having slain another without premeditation. This aspect of the Kinsman's duty does not, however, come into the story of Ruth.

With the information we have gathered, both as to the various words used for kinship and the law concerning the kinsman and his brother's widow, let us return now to Ruth and read the story again in the light of these facts. First of all let us see the structure of the passage.

Ruth iii. 1 - iv. 13.

A | iii. 1-9. | a | c | Shall I not find rest for thee?
d | Is not Boaz of our kindred?
b | e | When Boaz finishes eating and drinking.
f | Mark the place where he shall lie.
g | Uncover his feet.
h | Lay thee down.
i | He will tell thee what to do.
i | All that thou sayest I will do.
e | When Boaz had eaten and drunk.
f | He went to lie down.
g | Uncovered his feet.
h | Laid down.
a | c | Who art thou?
b | j | I am Ruth, thine handmaid.
k | Spread thy skirt over.
j | Thou art a near kinsman.
B | iii. 10-13. Boaz explains about the nearer kinsman. Promises to redeem.
C | iii. 14-18. Ruth assured.
B | iv. 1-6. Boaz advertises the other kinsman. Fulfil his promise to redeem.
A | iv. 7-13. The inheritance secured. Ruth becomes wife to Boaz.

We have not felt justified in setting out the whole of the passage in detail. We have given the sections, and set out the first one as an example, so that the reader should find little difficulty in completing the structure if it deemed necessary.

Naomi's words in chapter iii. find a parallel in Ruth i. 9:

> "The Lord grant you that ye may find rest, each of you in the house of her husband" (Ruth i. 9).
> "My daughter, shall I not seek rest for thee, that it may be well with thee?" (Ruth iii. 1).

No longer has Naomi to speak of a possible husband and future sons (Ruth i. 12, 13) for now she can say: "Is not Boaz of our kindred?" (Ruth iii. 2).

It was the custom at threshing time for the owner to remain all night on the threshing-floor, until the harvest was safely garnered. Naomi knew this and instructed Ruth how to act. Judged by modern standards of morality Ruth would probably be condemned, but Boaz bears testimony that "all the city of my people dost know that thou art a virtuous woman" (Ruth iii. 11).

When Ruth said: "Spread thy skirt over thine handmaid for thou art a near kinsman" (or, one who has the right to redeem) (Ruth iii. 9), Boaz knew that she was asking him not only to redeem the land that had been lost, but also to marry her and save the name of the dead husband from being blotted out. Boaz is touched by the fact that Ruth had not followed after young men, but had let her choice fall upon one who was apparently many years her senior.

Boaz was not Ruth's brother-in-law and was, therefore, under no compulsion in the matter, for the law of Deut. xxv. is concerned with the "husband's brother" and the case of "brethren dwelling together" (5, 6). By removing to Moab Elimelech had made impossible the second of these conditions, and Boaz, though of the kindred of Elimelech, was not the deceased husband's brother.

We find this practice of marrying the brother's widow in operation before the giving of the law (see Gen. xxxviii. 8), and we have records of its existence in Athens, in Persia, in Tartary and Circassia, and among the Druses. Niebuhr writes:

> "It does indeed happen among the Mahometans that a man marries his brother's widow, but she has no right to compel him so to do."

Boaz was obliged, in fairness, to defer complying with Ruth's request, for, said he: "It is true that I am thy near kinsman, howbeit there is a kinsman nearer than I" (Ruth iii. 12). However, Boaz probably guessed that the marrying of the Moabitess would be a stumbling-block in the other kinsman's way, and promises to perform the office of the kinsman himself, should the nearer kinsman fail.

It is interesting to note that, while Ruth's virtue could not apparently be called in question, and neither she nor Boaz had any cause for shame, they did not in any way flaunt their innocence, but sought rather to preserve their good name from the smallest suspicion of evil:

> "Let it not be known that a woman came into the floor" (Ruth iii. 14).

Naomi's immediate question: "Who art thou, my daughter?" (Ruth iii. 16) does not mean that she was unable to distinguish Ruth owing to the early hour of the day, but rather expresses her intense desire to know what had transpired (compare Judges xviii. 8). In Ruth ii. 19 Naomi had inquired where Ruth had gleaned, and when she was shown the ephah of barley she immediately perceived that the Lord's hand was in it. So here, when she sees the six measures of barley, she expresses her confidence that Boaz will not rest until the matter is settled.

In Ruth iii. 15 the A.V. reads: "And she went unto the city." This, however, is incorrect, the true rendering being: "And he went into the city." Boaz meant to lose no time in bringing the matter to a head. Sitting down in the gate, where all public transactions were carried out, he hails the other kinsman and, in the presence of the ten men that had been secured to make the transaction legal, he says to him:

> "Naomi, that is come again out of the country of Moab, selleth a parcel of land, which was our brother Elimelech's. And I thought to advertise thee, saying, Buy it before the inhabitants, and before the elders of my people. If thou wilt redeem it, redeem it: but if thou wilt not redeem it, then tell me, that I may know: for there is none to redeem it beside thee: and I am after thee. And he said, I will redeem it. Then said Boaz, What day thou buyest the field of the hand of Naomi, thou must buy it also of Ruth the Moabitess, the wife of the dead, to raise up the name of the dead upon his inheritance."

While the nearer kinsman was quite willing to redeem the parcel of land, he was not willing to marry the Moabitess and he therefore relinquishes his right. Boaz and the other kinsman then follow a custom that was even then ancient in Israel, whenever redeeming and changing were to be confirmed:

> "A man plucked off his shoe and gave it to his neighbour: and this was a testimony in Israel" (Ruth iv. 7).

To place one's shoe upon anything was a symbol of possession. To take off one's shoe and pass it to another was a symbol of transference. The spreading of the skirt already alluded to was another symbol of transferred authority. Even to this day, it is the custom to associate old boots with weddings, and although this is now simply a piece of harmless fun, the custom has its origin in these distant times.

It would seem that the nearer kinsman who failed probably sets forth the failure of man to redeem either himself or his brother, and that the transference to Boaz is an indication that Christ alone is strong enough to undertake the task.

We next read that Boaz calls upon the elders and the people to witness that he has bought all that was Elimelech's, Chilion's and Mahlon's, of the hand of Naomi, and further, that he has purchased Ruth the Moabitess, the wife of Mahlon, to be his wife, and that he intends to play the Kinsman-Redeemer's part and to "raise up the name of the dead upon his inheritance, that the name of the dead be not cut off". In reply, the people not only declare themselves witnesses, but also express their pleasure by adding words of blessing. There is pointed meaning in the reference they make to "Pharez whom Tamar bare unto Judah", for in Gen. xxxviii. we have the story of one who, by refusing to do the kinsman's part, not only involved himself in death, but his brother's widow in immorality. Boaz, it is implied, represents the reverse of all this.

We now reach the conclusion of the book:

B	iv. 14-17.
		a	The women.
		b	Blessed be the Lord . . . . . a kinsman to thee.
		c	Name famous in Israel.
		d	Nourisher.
		d	Nurse.
		a	The women.
		b	A son born to Naomi.
		c	Name Obed (Jesse, David).
A	iv. 18-22.	e	The generations of Pharez. Pharez begat . . . . . David.

Not only is Ruth, the Moabitess, graciously brought under the wing of the God of Israel, and her temporal needs satisfied by the love and wealth of Boaz the Strong, but a link is also made in the chain that binds Adam to Christ, and Ruth finds an honourable place not, only in the line of David, but in the genealogy of David's greater Son (Matt. i. 5).

When we remember that the Scriptural Redeemer must be a kinsman and an Israelite, and also that the Redeemer of Israel is set forth as Israel's Lord and God (cf. Isa. xli. 14; xliii. 14; xliv. 6, 24, &c.) we are confronted with a problem which can only be solved in the light of the person of Christ as "God manifest in the flesh".

We must defer examination of Eph. i. 14 to the next article, but we believe the extreme importance of the subject more than justifies this long digression.

With the background provided by the Old Testament type of the Kinsman Redeemer, we can approach the exposition of the words "the redemption of the purchased possession" with a fuller sense of its importance, and with a better sense of equipment for the task. We must not forget, however, that the Ephesians would, like the Galatians, be more familiar with the Greek and Roman law and custom regarding the adoption, the selection and legal installment of the heir, and the actual moment of taking possession. This too, if known to the reader, will intensify the meaning of Eph. i. 14 and so we give a brief review of the custom—not of adoption in its initial stages, but in its final phases.

So far as the ceremony of adoption was concerned, the difference between the transferring of a son into slavery, and his becoming a member of the family was very slight. In the one case the adopter said: "I claim this man as my slave"; in the other, "I claim this man as my son". The form was almost the same; it was the spirit that differed.

If the adopter died and the adopted son claimed the inheritance, the latter had to testify to the fact that he was the adopted heir. Furthermore:

> "The law required corroborative evidence. One of the seven witnesses is called. 'I was present', he says at the ceremony. 'It was I who held the scales and struck them with the ingot of brass. It was an adoption. I heard the words of the vindication, and I say this person was claimed by the deceased, not as a slave but as a son'." (W. E. Ball).

Bearing all these facts in mind, can we not feel something of the thrill with which the Roman Christian would read the words:

> "Ye have not received the spirit of bondage again to fear; but ye have received the spirit of adoption, whereby we cry, Abba, Father. The Spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit, that we are the children of God, and if children, then heirs" (Rom. viii. 15-17).

It is not so much the Holy Spirit addressing Himself here to the human spirit in confirmation, but rather the joint witness of the Holy Spirit and the spirit of the believer to the same blessed fact.

Closely associated with the law of adoption was that of the Roman will. The Prætorian will was put into writing, and fastened with the seals of seven witnesses (cf. Rev. v. and vi.). There is probably a reference to this type of will in Eph. i. 13, 14:

> "In Whom also after that ye believed, ye were sealed with that Holy Spirit of promise, which is the earnest of our inheritance, until the redemption of the purchased possession, unto the praise of His glory."

W. E. Ball translates the latter part of the passage: "Until the ransoming accomplished by the act of taking possession (of the inheritance)."

> "When a slave was appointed heir, although expressly emancipated by the will which gave him the inheritance, his freedom commenced not upon the making of the will, nor even immediately upon the death of the testator, but from the moment when he took certain legal steps, which were described as 'entering upon the inheritance'. This is 'the ransoming accomplished by the act of taking possession'. In the last words of the passage 'to the praise of His glory' there is an allusion to a well-known Roman custom. The emancipated slaves who attended the funeral of their emancipator were the praise of his glory. Testamentary emancipation was so fashionable a form of posthumous ostentation, the desire to be followed to the grave by a crowd of freedmen wearing the 'cap of liberty' was so strong, that very shortly before the time when St. Paul wrote, the legislature had expressly limited the number of slaves that an owner might manumit by will" (W. E. Ball).

This Roman custom helps us to see the link that there is between Rom. viii. and Eph. i. 13, 14, as well as with the book of Ruth.

"The purchased possession." Had the Apostle simply intended that the seal and the earnest guaranteed the entry into the promised inheritance at last, it would have been easy to have said so, this somewhat strange expression challenges us, and demands fuller inquiry.

Peripoiesis, the word translated "purchased possession" in the A.V., and "God's own possession" in the R.V., occurs five times, thus:

> The redemption of the purchased possession (Eph. i. 14).
> To obtain salvation (I Thess. v. 9).
> To the obtaining of the glory (II Thess. ii. 14).
> To the saving of the soul (Heb. x. 39).
> A peculiar people (I Pet. ii. 9).

to which we should add the two occurrences of the verb (Acts xx. 28; I Tim. iii. 13), both of which are translated "purchase". We have already found that light was to be obtained by studying the teaching of the O.T. concerning the Kinsman-Redeemer. Let us consider those passages where the LXX employs this word, peripoiesis.

Peripoiesis the noun occurs in II Chron. xiv. 13; Hag. ii. 9 and Mal. iii. 17 and translates two Hebrew words. Peripoieo the verb occurs over twenty-five times, and translates eleven Hebrew words, and in addition the word peripoieo is found in the Apocrypha three times.

Let us first consider the three references to peripoiesis. II Chron. xiv. 13 tells us of the Ethiopians who were "overthrown, that they could not recover themselves"; the Hebrew word so translated here being michyah a reviving, quickening or preserving of life. Hag. ii. 9, "In this house will I give peace of soul for a possession", for which there does not appear to be any Hebrew equivalent. The translators appear to have felt that the word "peace" needed to be extended and cover the period that ensued.

Mal. iii. 17 "When I make up My jewels". Here the Hebrew word is segullah a word of rich content and application. Segullah is the word used by the Lord in Exod. xix. 5 where He says of Israel, "Ye shall be a peculiar treasure unto Me". So in Deut. vii. 6; xiv. 2 and xxvi. 18, where it is rendered "special" and "peculiar". In these four occurrences the LXX use periousios, which is employed by Paul in Titus ii. 14 "a peculiar people", both Greek words, periousios "beyond the ordinary", and peripoiesis "an acquisition", being used in the LXX to translates the word segullah. In I Chron. xxix. 3 David refers to his "own proper good" where segullah is translated by peripoieo. Psalm cxxxv. 4 uses segullah, "Israel for His peculiar treasure" and Eccles. ii. 8 uses it for "the peculiar treasures of kings". In no one instance is Israel promised that they shall inherit a peculiar treasure, they are told that they will be taken by the Lord for His peculiar treasure, a special people unto HIMSELF. This brings us back to the meaning we discovered in Eph. i. 11 where, instead of "obtaining" an inheritance, the glory of this calling is that this people are "taken" for an inheritance by the Lord. A peculiar treasure indeed! While these references to Israel illustrate, they do not exhaust the meaning of the Apostle here. The Emphatic Diaglott translation gets very near to the heart of the matter by reading: "a redemption of the purchase" which, strange though it may sound, brings up into the mind the idea that a pledge, an earnest, a deposit has been paid, and in God's good time, the complete amount will be put down. The first aspect of redemption was paid in blood and offered in weakness, the second will be with power. One phase of this second aspect of redemption is set forth in Rev. v. and vi., where the Lion of the tribe of Judah opens the seven sealed book. The redemption of the purchase, so far as the Mystery is concerned is not described, the only added word that is written elsewhere is in Ephesians:

> "Grieve not the Holy Spirit of God, whereby ye are sealed unto the day of redemption" (iv. 30).

the day of redemption being comparable to Rom. viii. 23 "the adoption, to wit the redemption of the body". It does not seem reasonable to speak of "grieving" a miraculous gift, or a spiritual endowment, one can only grieve a person. The two passages must be read together. The Holy Spirit, Who can be grieved, seals the believer with “holy spirit of promise” the pledge or earnest of the glorious reality. Once more the section ends with a note of praise.

The Apostle has now given us some idea of the priceless treasures that are contained in this “Muniment Room”. Here to our wonderful gaze he showed us “the will” of our Father, revealing His most sacred secret, a will and a choice made and purposed “before the overthrow of the world”. Here we learn that the blessings allotted to us are “every blessing that is spiritual”, and to be enjoyed in the super-heavens en tois epouraniois, where Christ sits at the right hand of God. Here we see the documents that appoint us heirs and firstborns, we are, as verse six has declared, “highly favoured in the Beloved”. If this gracious will of the Father calls forth our praise, what shall we say when we review afresh the documents that set forth the grounds of our enfranchisement. We were bondslaves, but we have been redeemed, released and forgiven with a grace that overflows. In this revelation of favour, there is made known “the secret of His will” which shows that this church thus chosen and redeemed is a foreshadowing of the day when in the fullest sense, the Saviour shall head up all things in Himself, in Whom we find our blessed part, being honoured as was Aaron, not so much in being allocated an inheritance but of being taken to be the Lord’s portion, His “peculiar possession”, unto which the Holy Spirit has sealed us, and given us an earnest, in full assurance that the redemption of the purchase shall be effectually completed. The phrase “in Whom” links these three sections of our charter together, carrying each stage on as an outcome of the other.

IN WHOM we have redemption, i.e. in the Beloved of the Father’s will.
IN WHOM we also were taken to be an inheritance,
i.e. in Him Who is our Redeemer, and Head.
IN WHOM ye also were sealed with the holy spirit of promise, i.e. in Him, the Redeemer and the Beloved.

“In Whom” each time refers to Christ. The Father’s will and the Spirit’s witness focuses our adoring gaze on the Sacrifice for sin so freely offered that we may be set free to enjoy “all spiritual blessings in heavenly places”, we who by nature were so far off as to be hopeless, Christless and Godless.

Can we wonder that we pass from the Muniment Room under the guidance of the Apostle, into the Chapel of Acknowledgment, which section, Eph. i. 15-20 now awaits our worshipping attention.

No.45. GALATIANS.
The Scope and Structure of the Epistle.
pp. 5 - 8

For the prime purpose of these studies, it does not really matter very much what particular tribe of human race were the ancestors of those known as the Galatians, for all nations of the earth are of one blood, all have sinned, and all alike need salvation, and that by grace; but the British reader may be interested in the conclusion found in Lightfoot's discursus on the subject:

> "There is every reason then for believing that the Galatian settlers were genuine Celts, and of the two main subdivisions into which philologers have divided the Celtic race, they seem rather to have belonged to the Cymric, of which the Welsh are the living representatives. Thus in the age when St. Paul preached, a native of Galatia spoke a language essentially the same with that which was current in the southern part of Britain."

For those who desire fuller information, dealing with notes on language, historical references and other arguments, Lightfoot, Alford and particularly Ramsey should be consulted.

Whether the Galatians were Celts or not does not matter so much to us at the distance, what is more important is that they being sinners saved by grace were evidently influenced by Judaistic teachers and were in danger of bartering their liberty for a dismal bondage, and to save them from this living death, and to ensure that "the truth of the gospel" should "continue right through" (diameno Gal. ii. 5), this epistle to the Galatians was written.

In the Volume "The Apostle of the Reconciliation" (page 111), a tentative structure was offered, showing the main divisions. For the purpose of that volume this structure was sufficient. We are now about to make a more thorough examination of the epistle and a structure that conforms more fully with the correspondences of the theme is demanded. We set out such a structure below, but it must be remembered that no attempt has been made in this initial presentation to show in strictly-structural form the sub-divisions of A or B sections. These will be exhibited later, as the subject matter under consideration may then demand.

GRACE and SPIRIT. Bondage and signature (see II Thess. iii. 17).

Before commencing the exposition of the epistle let us acquaint ourselves with the lines of teaching summarized under the captions printed in capitals here given. We do not set out every reference, but give a fair sample of the way these subjects are treated.

FAITH v. WORKS. "Knowing that a man is not justified by the works of the law, but by the faith of Jesus Christ, even we have believed in Jesus Christ, that we might be justified by the faith of Jesus Christ, and not by the works of the law; for by the works of the law shall no flesh be justified" (ii. 16).

"This only would I learn of you, Received ye the Spirit by the works of the law, or by the hearing of faith?" (iii. 2).

"He therefore that ministereth to you the Spirit, and worketh miracles among you, doeth he it by the works of the law, or by the hearing of faith?" (iii. 5).

SPIRIT v. FLESH. "Having begun in the Spirit, are ye now made perfect by the flesh?" (iii. 3).

"He that was born after the flesh persecuted him that was born after the Spirit" (iv. 29).

"Walk in the Spirit, and ye shall not fulfil the lust of the flesh" (v. 16).

"The flesh lusteth against the Spirit, and the Spirit against the flesh" (v. 17).

CROSS v. LAW AND WORLD. "For I through the law am dead to the law, that I might live unto God. I am crucified with Christ" (ii. 19, 20).

"But God forbid that I should glory, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, by Whom the world is crucified unto me, and I unto the world" (vi. 14).

"Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us; for it is written, Cursed is every one that hangeth on a tree" (iii. 13).

When we compare the epistle to the Galatians with the second epistle to the Corinthians, we discover that much of the conflict that had been fought in Galatia was repeated in slightly modified form in Corinth. For example, the strange reference to the apostles at Jerusalem "these who seemed to be somewhat" of Gal. ii. 6, finds an echo in the reference to "the extra-super apostles" of II Cor. xi. 5. The preaching of "another gospel" in Galatia (Gal. i. 6-9); has its counterpart in the preaching of "another Jesus", "another spirit" and "another gospel" of II Cor. xi. 4. In both epistles reference is made to "false brethren" (Gal. ii. 4 and II Cor. xi. 26); and the comparison of Gal. ii. 8, "He Who wrought effectually in Peter . . . . . the same was mighty in me", is repeated in another form in the words of II Cor. xi. 5, "for I suppose I was not a whit behind the very chiefest apostles". If to the Galatians Paul spoke of "the marks of the Lord Jesus" which he bore in his body (vi. 17), to the Corinthians these "marks" are given in fuller detail. Five times was he given the "forty stripes save one" of the synagogue scourging, thrice was he "beaten with rods", once he was "stoned", thrice "shipwrecked" (II Cor. xi. 24, 25). He repeats the figure of "devouring" one another (Gal. v. 15; II Cor. xi. 20), as also the argument of Gal. iii. 3 "having begun in the Spirit, are ye now made perfect by the flesh", "That as He had begun, so He would also perfect in you the same grace" (II Cor. viii. 6) and finally, in both epistles there is the triumphant reference to the "new creature" (Gal. vi. 15; II Cor. v. 17). Parallels can be found between other of the early epistles and that of the Galatians, but these will fall into their place better when those other epistles are before us.

When we read in the Acts of Peter's hesitancy to go to the Gentile Cornelius, and of the opposition manifested by the church when they heard that "the Gentiles had also received the word of God", and when we read that the circumcision party did not hesitate to contend with Peter saying "Thou wentest in to men uncircumcised, and didst eat with them" (Acts xi. 3) then we are somewhat prepared for the challenge that Paul's apostleship and gospel received, and for the elements of strife that permeate these early epistles. Jealousy for the law of Moses, for the rite and privileges of circumcision, marched side by side with a belief in the gospel, but in many cases, alas, the pure grace of the gospel was so adulterated with legal and ceremonial additions, that the apostle had to speak of it as "another gospel" or the preaching as the preaching of "another Jesus".

The presence of these features makes the epistle to the Galatians of great importance to all who love the truth and who would be made both wise as to the nature of the opposition and equipped to meet it adequately and spiritually. Here in this epistle we have laid bare the devices of the opposition and the example of this foremost champion of the faith in meeting them. The foe is still the same, the truth is still the same, the call is still the same. May these and future studies be used by the God of all grace to enlighten the eyes and equip the minds of all who in this our day and generation have been chosen to be "good soldiers of Jesus Christ".

No.46. GALATIANS.
The Threefold argument of Gal. i. 1 - 24 with a special examination of the term "apostle".
pp. 25 - 28

We have considered the epistles of Paul as a whole, and have seen that there are fourteen epistles that are from this apostle's pen. We have seen that they form two groups of seven epistles each, ranged on either side of Acts xxviii. 28. We have examined the evidences for the Pauline authorship of the epistle to the Hebrews, and found it to be abundant and satisfying. We have considered the latest archaeological findings and their bearing upon the date of the epistle to the Galatians and have found that there is now no valid reason for refusing this epistle prior place in the chronological order of the epistles of Paul, and we now address ourselves to the happy though arduous task of following the mind of the Spirit, through the words of Paul as they were written in his burning zeal to preserve "the truth of the gospel" for all time, and save those whose steadfastness in the faith was his own joy and crown.

As we commence this epistle and read on through chapters one and two we cannot help but be struck with the insistence with which the apostle emphasizes his own apostolic authority and message, and when we remember that this epistle was his effort, under God to stop the rot that had set in and which threatened the very life of the church and the saving power of the gospel, then it becomes evident that a recognition of Paul's authorship and independent ministry lies very near the heart of truth, and cannot be dismissed as being of secondary importance. "The LORD's message" IS associated very intimately with "the LORD's messenger" (Hag. i. 13). If Paul was in deed and in truth God's messenger to the Gentiles, then the enemy of truth would most surely endeavour to undermine his authority, and if he had been entrusted with a special message of grace to the Gentiles, then we might expect that one of the enemy's attacks would be made upon the gospel either by denial, by misrepresentation or by substitution. Tools for this sad work would never be lacking while a sectarian spirit was far more natural than an humble recognition of the basic unity of the redeemed, and the power of tradition would prevent many of those who were really saved from breaking clean away from the "weak and beggarly elements" that had but led them deeper into bondage.

The challenge therefore having sounded, the apostle as the chosen vessel to bear the name of the Lord before the Gentiles, takes up the gage, and enters the arena. His opening words are a threefold response to this challenge of his enemies, and all his blessed teaching stands for naught if this threefold response cannot be maintained and justified. What are his three points therefore?

(1) He asserts his absolute apostleship, in entire independence of man or men.
(2) He testifies to the unique character of his gospel, which was not taught by man, but which he received by revelation.

(3) In proof of his claim to such independence both of apostleship and gospel, he appeals to fourteen years of glorious ministry in which the commendation of "the twelve" was neither sought nor received.

We must now turn to the first chapter of this epistle to see whether these things are so, and discover how the apostle introduces this threefold theme and with what language and argument he enforces his conclusions.

Paul's Apostleship, Gospel and Authority (Gal. i. 1 - 24).
(Key-words "Not"; "Neither"; "But").

A1 | 1-5. Paul's APOSTLESHIP. | Not from men.
Neither through man.
But through Jesus Christ.
B1 | 6-10. No change in gospel—"Ye received".
A2 | 11, 12. Paul's GOSPEL. | Not according to man.
Neither from man, nor by teaching.
But by revelation of Jesus Christ.
B2 | 13, 14. His past attitude—"Ye heard".
A3 | 15-17. Paul's AUTHORITY. | Not flesh and blood.
Neither apostles.
But into Arabia.
B3 | 18-24. His present attitude—"They had heard".

> "It was the fashion of the false teachers in the Galatian church . . . . . with a view to undermine his authority, and to disparage the doctrine which he taught, to originate reports prejudicial to the character of St. Paul. He had never seen the Lord Jesus Christ; had not received his commissions as the rest of the apostles did, at His hands; if he had any position in the church, it was delegated to him from others; whatever knowledge of the gospel he possessed had been derived from the instruction of men, and consequently his testimony, should any difference of opinion arise, should be accounted of no value, if found in opposition to them. To meet this and every kindred species of defamation, the apostle felt called upon in limine to establish the divine origin of his mission, which he does, negatively and affirmatively, in the passage before us" (Gwynne).

The title "apostle" is familiar to all Christians and its general import is understood. It plays such an important part however in the argument of this epistle, and its meaning is so intimately attached to the whole range of ministry fulfilled by Paul, that we will not consider the time ill spent that makes the meaning and bearing of this title known, before we proceed with the teaching of the epistle.

Apostolos occurs 81 times in the New Testament and is translated 78 times "apostle", once "he that is sent", and twice "messenger". The word is distributed as follows, nine occurrences in the four gospels, of which Luke contains six, and the other three references are found in Matt. x. 2; Mark vi. 30 and in John xiii. 16. This last reference however should be kept apart, as it does not speak of "the apostles" but can be applied to all believers, "neither is he that is sent greater than He that sent him". The Acts of the Apostles itself contain 30 references, the Epistles of Paul use the word 35 times, of which two are translated “messenger”, the remaining six references are found in the epistles of Peter, Jude and the Book of the Revelation.

Mclean in His “Apostolic Commission” has given a very clear delineation of the Apostolic Office, which we summarize here:

(1) (a) They must have been eye and ear witnesses (John xv. 27).
(b) This is laid down as essential in the case of the successor of Judas (Acts i. 21, 22).
(c) Paul is no exception (I Cor. xv. 8; ix. 1; Acts xxii. 14, 15).

(2) (a) They must have been immediately called and chosen by Christ Himself.
(b) This was true of the twelve (Luke vi. 13; Gal. i. 1), Matthias himself not excepted.

(3) (a) Infallible inspiration was essential to the office (John xvi. 13; I Cor. ii. 10; Gal. i. 11, 12).

(4) (a) The power to work miracles was associated with the apostolic commission (Acts ii. 43; I Cor. xii. 8-11). “Truly”, says Paul, “the signs of an apostle were wrought among you in all patience, in signs and wonders, and mighty deeds” (II Cor. xii. 12). “God bare them witness” (Heb. ii. 4).

(5) (a) Their commission was not local, it was not confined to any particular visible church, like that of ordinary pastors, but like Paul himself “they had the care of all the churches”.
(b) They had power to settle the faith and order of the church, to determine all controversies (Acts xvi. 4), and to exercise the rod of discipline upon all offenders, whether pastors or flock (I Cor. v. 3-6; II Cor. x. 8; xiii. 10).

To such high office the apostle Paul lays claim in the opening words of the Galatian epistle, and his added statement “not of men, neither by man” seems to refer to the fact that among the Jews it was a custom “to call those who carry circular letters from their rulers by the name apostles” (CEcumenius).

Paul asserts that his apostleship was unlike that which was known among the Jews, who derived their authority from the Chief Priests and from the Sanhedrin. Who, Paul seems to ask, can give to me “letters of commendation”? (II Cor. iii. 1), the only “letters of commendation” possible in his case were those who believed, “Ye are our epistle written in our hearts, known and read of all men” (II Cor. iii. 2).

In this opening chapter of Galatians the apostle refers to his previous zeal as a persecutor of the faith, and it is not improbable that when he said “Paul an apostle, not of men, neither of man” he not only repudiated all human mediation in connection with his great office in the church, but he may also have glanced back to that other apostleship (using the word as the Jews employed it) indicated in the Acts.

> “(Saul) desired letters to Damascus to the synagogues, that if he found any of this way, whether they were men or women, he might bring them bound unto Jerusalem” (Acts ix. 2).

What the apostle thought about the office can be gathered from his epistles. He styles himself "a called apostle, separated unto the gospel of God" (Rom. i. 1), and his apostleship was to "obedience to the faith among all nations" (Rom. i. 5). While he was called and commissioned during the period when the Jew was still "first" he realized his apostleship was distinctly toward the Gentile (Rom. xi. 13) and on two occasions he makes a very solemn declaration concerning this apostleship.

> "I am ordained a preacher, and an apostle (I speak the truth in Christ, and lie not); a teacher of the Gentiles in faith and verity" (I Tim. ii. 7).
>
> "Whereunto I am appointed a preacher, and an apostle, and a teacher of the Gentiles" (II Tim. i. 11).

In the estimate of Paul, the office of an apostle took first rank.

> "First apostles, secondarily prophets, thirdly teachers" (I Cor. xii. 28).

and in connection with his own commission, as distinct from the call of the "twelve" his apostleship was directly given by the "Ascended" Christ (Eph. iv. 8-11). Such was the man, and such his office, and such "his gage of battle to the incompetence of traditional authority—his trumpet note of defiance to all Pharisees of Christianity" (Farrar).

We must return to the opening sentence of this epistle in our next article, but we can now do so with at least a more accurate conception of what the claim to be an apostle, embraced.

No.47. GALATIANS.
"The Lord's Messenger" and "The Lord's Message" (Hag. i. 13).
pp. 65 - 68

Having seen the scope of chapter one, and the meaning and importance of the word "apostle", we can now turn our attention to the way in which the apostle opens his epistle.

Sir William Ramsay in his "Historical Commentary of the Epistle to the Galatians" says:

> "In any judicious system of interpretation, great stress must be laid on the introductory address of this epistle. It should be compared with the address prefixed to the Epistle to the Romans, a letter which presents marked analogies in sentiment and topics. In each case Paul puts in his introduction the marrow of the whole letter. He says at first in a few words what he is going to say at length in the body of the letter, to repeat over and over, to emphasize from various points of view, and to drive home into the minds of his correspondents."

Lightfoot commences his commentary with the words:

> "1-5. The two threads which run though this epistle—the defence of the apostle's own authority, and the maintenance of the doctrine of grace—are knotted together in the opening salutation. By expanding his official title into a statement of his direct > commission from God (verse 1), St. Paul meets the personal attack of his opponents; by dwelling on the work of redemption in connexion with the name of Christ (verse 4), he protests against their doctrinal errors."

We have seen that the key words of the structure are the threefold repetition of the expressions "not, neither, but" as applied to the three great aspects of Paul's commission, and his independence in each department. (1) Independent Apostleship; (2) Independent Revelation of the Gospel; (3) Independence of all human authority. "Not of men, neither by man" ouk ap' anthropon oude di' anthropon.

> "There are indeed few points more characteristic of the apostle's style than his varied but accurate use of prepositions, especially of two or more in the same or in immediately contiguous clauses (e.g. eis . . . . . epi, Rom. iii. 22; ex . . . . . dia . . . . . eis, xi. 36) for the purpose of more precise definition or limitation" (Ellicott).

No two prepositions are synonymous, although at times the difference intended by their use may be difficult to express. Perhaps an illustration of the apostle's usage will be the best means of showing the shade of meaning attaching to interchanged prepositions. "God is one Who will justify the circumcision BY faith, and the uncircumcision BY MEANS OF (the same) faith" (Rom. iii. 30). Here ek is used in the first reference to faith, and dia in the second. The former indicates the source of justification and the latter its means. So in Gal. i. 1 Paul was neither originally commissioned apo from men, nor was he commissioned dia through the intervention of any man. In the first clause Paul distinguishes his calling from that of "false apostles" who certainly did not receive their commission from God the fountain head; in the second he shows that his apostleship is on a level with the twelve.

Not only does the apostle vary the prepositions, apo . . . . . dia, he speaks of "men" and "man", he maintained that his apostleship was not a commission from "man in the concrete" nor from "man in the abstract" i.e. flesh and blood including a self appointment arising from his inclinations. Later in this chapter he uses "flesh and blood" and those which were "apostles" before him in much the same alternative senses, as "men" and "man" here. Truth however cannot rest upon negatives. It may be necessary for us to know that Paul's apostleship did not arise out of any commission given him by the Sanhedrin, or that it did not originate in his own heart and upbringing, but we must pass to the positive and discover from what source this great commission sprang. This is what the apostle does:

> "Paul an apostle NOT from men, NEITHER BY (the instrumentality of) man, BUT BY Jesus Christ, and God our Father, Who raised Him from the dead."

It will be observed that whereas we have "men" and "man" put as alternatives, with their respective prepositions "of" and "by", no such discrimination is made between "Jesus Christ and God the Father" which are both governed by the one preposition dia. Whether it be the doctrine which He taught, the miracles which He wrought or the appointments which He made, whatever the Lord Jesus Christ taught or did was regarded not as the expression or doing of His own will, but the will of Him that sent Him. If Paul was appointed an apostle of Jesus Christ, then he must also be one by the appointment of the Father, beyond which there can be no other or higher authority.

This appointment took place on the road to Damascus (Acts ix. 3) and the personal appearing of the Saviour to him enabled Paul to claim fullest apostolic recognition, saying "Have not I seen Jesus Christ our Lord?" (I Cor. ix. 1).

Nor is this all, he must convince the Galatians beyond the possibility of doubt, that he was not one whit behind the chiefest of the apostles, and so he not only refers his apostleship to "Jesus Christ and God the Father", but adds "Who raised Him from the dead". This added clause, largely explains the omission of the preposition before "God the Father", as Gwynne remarks, this is "no ordinary adjunct, nor casually introduced, but a participial clause artistically arranged, to reflect light upon the antecedent context", namely the joint names of Jesus Christ and God the Father, the introduction of the resurrection "being virtually the investiture of Him with supreme dignity and unlimited authority".

Thus it was that Paul entered the arena, and took up the challenge. His primary object was to save the church from the Judaisers, and to do this he had to make very clear the radical difference between an attempt to justify self by the works of the law, and the justification which was by grace through faith; but this gospel was so closely related to Paul's commission, that it became incumbent upon him to vindicate his apostleship to the utmost, setting aside the twelve, setting aside his own selfish desires, setting aside all association with men and man, and linking his calling and commission not only by the Lord Jesus, as the Twelve could, but to the Risen Christ, as the twelve could not (for the twelve were appointed during the earthly life of Christ [see Matt. x.]), but Paul was the first of the apostles to be appointed by the Ascended Christ (see Eph. iv.).

One of the characteristics of Paul's writing is the backward and forward sway of thought and feeling. Zealous, keen beyond the average, he makes a bold unmitigated claim—then conscious that a misinterpretation may wound a believer, he swings back and humbles himself to the dust.

Does he tell the Philippians how glad he is that their care of him has flourished again after a break, he immediately adds "but ye lacked opportunity". Fearing lest his reference to their former fellowship should lend itself to misconstruction he adds "Not that I speak in respect of want" and asserts the most uncompromising independence. This however might appear ungrateful, and lest he should appear to undervalue the Philippian fellowship, he swings back again with the words "Notwithstanding ye have well done, that ye did communicate with my affliction" (Phil. iv. 10-14).

So here in Galatians. Nothing could be more uncompromising, more independent, more entirely severed from human intervention or approbation than the opening challenge of the first verse of Galatians and nothing could be so characteristically Pauline than the swing back to human co-operation with which he opens verse two.

> "And all the brethren which are with me."

Just as he brings forward “five hundred brethren” as additional witnesses to the Resurrection of the Lord in I Cor. xv. 6, so these brethren are associated with him in this great stand for the truth, and the vindication of his claims.

Macknight brings this passage forward as one of the evidences that Paul wrote the epistle from Antioch.

> “From as the only view with which any of the brethren could join the apostle in writing to the Galatians, was to attest the facts which he advanced in the first and second chapters for proving his apostleship, the brethren who joined him in writing it must have been such as knew the truth of these facts.”

Brethren of Corinth, or Ephesus, or Rome would only be able to attest what the apostle himself had told them, but the brethren at Antioch would have had opportunity of obtaining first hand evidence of these things. In chapter two Paul refers to an incident which took place at Antioch, an incident that put Peter in a very bad light, and it was necessary that some such confirmation should have accompanied this stirring letter, lest the edge be taken off the arguments by doubts as to their truth and reality.

If Paul’s word is to be accredited at all, and if the confirmation of “all the brethren” that associated themselves with his attitude and witness, is not to be set aside, then in the clearest possible light we must set the apostle of the Gentiles, accepting his unique and distinctive office as a gift of the ascended Christ, and realizing as we do so, that an apostle implies a message, and an apostle so represents the Lord Who sent him, that the words reveal how exceedingly serious the attitude of those must be who look upon the glorious revelation of Divine Truth found in Paul’s epistles, as but Paul’s “opinion”.

> “Verily, verily , I say unto you, He that receiveth whomsoever I send (exapostello) receiveth Me; and he that receiveth Me receiveth Him that sent (exapostello) Me” (John xiii. 20).

No.48. GALATIANS.
With a special note on the testimony of the papyri.
pp. 92 - 94

This epistle is address "unto the churches of Galatia" (Gal. i. 2) and its study will throw light upon the constitution and calling of the church, and indicate the essential difference that exists between the church as it existed before Acts xxviii., and the church as it came into being after that dispensational boundary is crossed.

Not only is it not the observed custom of the apostle thus to address an epistle, the omission of any commendation is most marked. This however cannot be felt unless the introductions to the epistles are actually before us. It would occupy much precious space to quote each introduction in full, we must content ourselves with the barest summary.

> "Unto the church of the Thessalonians which is in God the Father and in the Lord Jesus Christ . . . . . we give thanks . . . . . for you all" (I Thess. i. 1, 2; II Thess. i. 1-3).
>
> "Unto the church of God which is at Corinth, to them that are sanctified in Christ Jesus, called to be saints, with all that in every place call upon the name of Jesus Christ our Lord, both theirs and ours . . . I thank my God always on your behalf" (I Cor. i. 1-4).
>
> "Unto the church of God which is at Corinth, with all the saints which are in all Achaia . . . . . blessed be God . . . . . Who comforteth us" (II Cor. i. 1-4).
>
> "To all that be at Rome, beloved of God, called to be saints . . . . . first, I thank my God . . . . . that your faith is spoken of throughout the whole world" (Rom. i. 7, 8).
>
> "To the saints which are at Ephesus, and to the faithful in Christ Jesus" (Eph. i. 1).
>
> "To all the saints in Christ Jesus which are at Philippi, with the bishops and deacons" (Phil. i. 1).
>
> "To the saints and faithful brethren in Christ Jesus which are at Colosse . . . . . we give thanks" (Col. i. 2, 3).

It will be observed that there is a transition from "churches" in a locality to "the church of God", from "the church of the Thessalonians which is in God the Father", to "all at Rome, beloved of God, called to be saints". The epistle of the Mystery do not use the word "church" in the opening address, reserving that word for higher meaning that it assumes in the present dispensation. For this transition no individual believer or separate ekklesia could be held responsible, it but marked the onward movement of the Truth, but the most marked omission in Galatians of any word of commendation or thanks on their behalf calls for explanation, and that explanation must be either that Paul failed in his customary courtesy, or that the Galatian church was in such grave doctrinal and practical danger, that no such commendation could be given, but instead the most drastic measures must be taken, involving rigorous action, respecting no man's person, whether that of the pillars at Jerusalem or the false teachers in Galatia. A burning zeal sweeps aside all convention, and the churches of Galatia were given a most salutary shock as the apostle plunged unceremoniously into his fight of faith.

While the apostle found no grounds for thanksgiving as he view the wrecking of his labour and the assault upon the truth of the gospel that brought forth this epistle, he did not, and could not, withhold the most earnest desires for their well being, consequently, whereas the customary commendation is absent, the benediction is present in all its fullness, unreserved and free as the gospel he preached, and for which he suffered.

> "Grace be to you and peace from God the Father, and from our Lord Jesus Christ" (Gal. i. 3).

It is the habit of many commentators to go into the meaning and doctrinal significance of the words "grace" and "peace" used in the salutation, but while we are sure that these words are never used by the apostle lightly or without intention, they constitute not so much a piece of doctrine to be studied, as an heartfelt wish to be immediately appropriated. They give atmosphere to the remainder of the epistle, and to loiter on the threshold of the epistle itself, to examine this introductory blessing word for word is to misunderstand its place and intention. Therefore, instead of dealing with the wording of this salutation, let us use it as an introduction to the larger question that has received so much light in modern times from the papyri discovered in the sands of Egypt. In view of the discovery of this papyrus, Lightfoot's words have become classical, he wrote:

> "If we could only recover letters that ordinary people wrote to each other without any thought of being literary, we should have the greatest possible help for the understanding of the language of the N.T. generally."

That help we now possess, as Professor Milligan has said:

> "An Egyptian papyrus letter and a N.T. epistle may be widely separated alike by nationality and habitat of their writers and by their own inherent characteristics and aims, but both are written in substantially the same Greek."

To this may be added that the form in which the epistles are written, their opening salutation, their thanksgiving and commendation, their conclusion and benediction, are seen to be in accordance with the accepted model of the times. Individual expressions moreover, found in Paul's epistles, find their echo in the papyrus letters. For example:

> "Comfort, therefore one another" (2nd cent.).
> "Henceforth" used as an introduction to concluding injunctions (2nd cent.).
> "Serapion, with all at his house, salutes you" (1st cent.).
> "Parousia" for personal presence (Phil. 2:12 and 3rd cent.).
> "To be refreshed" as in 2Tim. 1:16 (3rd cent.).

> "A casual review of the private correspondence in the papyri reveals the fact that the letters of the period followed a regular and established order and were shaped in a well-defined way . . . . . as a rule, the customary epistolary formulae turn on the following: (a) thanksgiving for good news and expressions of good wishes; (b) prayers for welfare of body and soul and also for worldly prosperity."
>
> "The generous proportion of personal greetings in a private letter is quite in keeping with its essential character as a fresh and intimate communication between absent friends."
>
> "A list of personal greetings closing the communication is a markedly common feature in papyri private correspondence" (Meecham, "Light from Ancient Letters").

The postscript is by no means a modern invention, and examples are found in the papyri of a postscript added by another hand after the signature has been appended. The brief note by Tertius in Rom. xvi. 22 and the postscript coming after the signature in I Cor. xvi. 21 and Col. iv. 18 are good examples.

It may come as a surprise to some readers to learn that it was a common practice in the days of Paul, for writers to dictate their letters and literary efforts to amanuenses who would take it down in shorthand. Here are the terms of apprenticeship dated 155A.D.

> "Panechotes . . . . . to Apollonius, writer of shorthand, greeting. I have placed with you my slave Chærammon to be taught the signs which your son Dionysius knows, for a period of two years . . . . . at the salary agreed upon between us, 120 silver drachmæ . . . . . of which sum you have received the first installment amounting to forty drachmæ, and you will receive the second installment when the boy has learned the whole system, and the third you will receive at the end of the period when the boy writes fluently in every respect and reads faultlessly."

Many of our readers who have experience of shorthand writers will appreciate the last phrase "and reads faultlessly".

There is every reason to believe that Tertius wrote the epistle to the Romans in shorthand at the dictation of Paul.

The epistle to the Galatians provides an example of where the author, to impress one special point upon his readers, takes the pen out of the hand of the trained scribe, and with more cumbrous letters writes the final sentence (Gal. vi. 11-18).

One of the most pathetic of these ancient papyrus letters is the following:

> "Irene to Tacunophria and Philo, good cheer! I was much grieved and wept over the beloved one, as I wept for Didymus, and everything that was fitting I did, and all who were with me. But truly there is nothing any one can do in the face of such things. Do you therefore comfort one another. Good-bye."

Poor Irene. She grieved and wept. She did what was fitting—but what a blank she faces! "But truly there is nothing any one can do." How different is the language of Paul in I Thess. iv. 14-18, he could write "Wherefore, comfort one another with these words", for he spoke of the Risen Saviour.

The epistles of Paul are neither valued by us because of the form in which they are cast, nor for any novelty of style or approach. They are of perennial blessedness because of their Divine authority, and by reason of the sacred character of their subject matter.

It is a salutary lesson for all, that these holy letters were written with the same instruments and in the same way as were those that were secular and transient, and we are sure that had Paul lived in our time, he would have used to the full the advantages that accrue from the modern printing press and postal service. Let us not close without a moment's grateful remembrances of those faithful helpers, like Tertius whose names though unknown to us to-day are in the book of life and known to the Lord we both serve.

No.49. GALATIANS.
The unique character of the introduction to this epistle.
pp. 105 - 108

The salutation of verse three, leads on to the augmenting reference to the sacrifice of Christ, with which the introduction to the epistle closes:

> "Who gave Himself for our sins, that He might deliver us from this present evil world, according to the will of God and our Father: To Whom be glory for ever and ever. Amen" (Gal. i. 4, 5).

If the salutation, wishing "grace" and "peace" be something which the other epistles of Paul would lead us to expect in this place, the words that follow, and which are quoted above, are so unusual that their addition must have some most intimate bearing upon the purpose of the epistle. If the reader will consult the opening words of the epistles of Paul, it will be discovered that the salutation concludes with the wish for "grace" and "peace" and that epistle proper immediately follows. We are therefore obliged to ask why the apostle adopted such a different approach here? The answer that satisfies the question as to the strangeness of the challenging word of the first verse satisfies this question also. The Galatians were being carried away from the basic facts of salvation by grace to a system of legal works and ceremonial religion. This is diametrically opposed to the great central fact of the Gospel that "Christ died for our sins according to the Scriptures". To this sacrificial death the apostle returns again and again in the course of his argument. See how it forms the climax to his personal testimony of the second chapter, "I am crucified with Christ" (ii. 20) shatters the whole fabric of legalism that the Judaistic party had been erecting. "O foolish Galatians" the apostle cries—Why? because "placarded" before their eyes (as the word "evidently" literally means) "Jesus Christ hath been evidently set forth crucified" among them (iii. 1). How then could they think of being made perfect by the flesh?

Do they lean toward the possibility of accomplishing a righteousness in their own works of the law, it is met, exposed and rendered impossible by the fact that "Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law" by hanging on a tree (iii. 13). So on to the personal appeal with which the epistle ends, "God forbid that I should glory, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus" (vi. 14). The same impassioned love for truth which made Paul use such language of the apostles as is recorded in Gal. ii. 6, which made it necessary to speak of Peter's defection and Barnabas' fall; which justified the use of the epithet "foolish" and the charge of being "bewitched" (iii. 1); which classed the withdrawal from free grace to legal observances as all one and the same with Paganism (iv. 8-11); and that could contemplate anathematizing an angel (i. 8), or "the cutting off" of those that trouble the church (v. 12); and which moved him to make the lengthy and personal appeal with his "own hand" at the close of the epistle, this same impassioned love for the truth would not hesitate to sweep aside convention and to introduce in the very salutation of the epistle a reference to that Sacrifice for sin, which was being empted of meaning by the false teaching combated by this epistle.

The apostle stresses the fact that the Saviour "gave" Himself tou dontos heauton, and this participial clause "serves at the very outset to specify the active principle of the error of the Galatians" (Ellicott). This use of didomi places in strong contrast the negative of iii. 21, "If there had been a law given which could have given life, verily righteousness should have been by the law", and the intense personal note of ii. 20, 21 is incipient in these words of i. 4:

> "I am crucified with Christ; nevertheless I live; yet not I, but Christ liveth in me: and the life which I now live in the flesh I live by the faith of the Son of God, Who loved me, and gave Himself for me . . . . . If righteousness come by the law, then Christ is dead in vain" (ii. 20, 21).

Christ gave Himself "for our sins". The Received Text reads huper, but the balance of authority is in favour of peri as the true reading here. While it cannot be said that huper and peri are never interchangeable by the writers of the New Testament generally speaking, peri will be found used with "things", as for instance sins, while huper will be used of persons. The two prepositions are found in I Pet. iii. 18 Christ suffered "for sins" peri the Just "for the unjust" huper, and illustrate this distinction. Peri means "around" and so "concerning". It encircles the object in view.

The dignity of the Person and the unique character of His work forbid the idea that Christ could die for our sins, and yet, weak and beggarly elements, rites and observances, all of them the works of the flesh, could have part or lot in this gracious work of redemption. The apostle had made it very clear when he opened his ministry in Galatia that "Through this man is preached unto you the forgiveness of sins; and by Him all that believe are justified from all things, from which ye could not be justified by the law of Moses" (Acts xiii. 38, 39).

The apostle however, does not stay at the statement that Christ "gave Himself for our sins" he proceeds to show its application in a special particular:

> "That He might deliver us from this present evil world, according to the will of God and our Father" (Gal. i. 4).

Just as we discover that there is an intimate connexion between the reference to the Sacrifice for sins in this salutation and the purpose of the epistle, so most surely must there be an adequate reason for this extension. No difficulty exists in the insistence on "deliverance" for emancipation is the key thought of the epistle's doctrine, but the question persists, "Why go on to speak about this present evil age? How does that bear upon the theme and motive of Galatians?" Ordinarily "the present evil age" would mean much the same as "this present world", literally "the age of this world" (Eph. ii. 2) and simply "this world" (Rom. xii. 2), and placed in opposition to "that world" (Luke xx. 35) and "the world to come" (Heb. vi. 5). But there is no evident or sufficient justification for obtruding this teaching in the salutation of an epistle; there must be something in the words used that would strike with intended force, those who were in the position that these Galatian Christians found themselves. In his commentary upon this passage Locke says:

> "Christ's taking them out of the present world may, without any violence to the words, be understood to signify his setting them free from the Mosaical constitution."

Poneros "evil" sometimes means defective or imperfect as for example "If thine eye be evil" (Matt. vi. 23). So the law was described as "weak through the flesh" (Rom. viii. 3), as making nothing "perfect" (Heb. vii. 19) and as a system that could be "blamed" (Heb. viii. 7). In the epistle to the Galatians itself it is likened to weak and beggarly elements (iv. 9), and was "added because of transgressions till the Seed should come" (iii. 19). In this light we must read the strange words of Ezek. xx. 25 "I gave them statutes which were not good". To the Jewish believer in Galatia the apostle's words would be vivid and incontrovertible. There is the fact to be faced that this epistle is addressed not to converted Jews only, but to converted Gentiles, and however much it may be conceded, that the Jew reading these words, would have sensed their application and import, it still remains to be shown how a Gentile could thus be conceived of understanding them. When, however, we realize that Paul has not hesitated to bracket together as it were legalism and ceremonial rites whether Mosaic or Pagan in origin, when they stand opposed to the free grace of the Gospel the difficulty is partly removed.

Later in his argument the apostle refers to the condition under which his hearers had lived "in bondage under the elements of the world" (Gal. iv. 3), and in his concluding testimony he does not speak so much as dying to the law or to sin, but being "crucified unto the world" (vi. 14). It will be seen by comparing ii. 19, 20 with vi. 14, that in the one place Paul claims to have been "crucified with Christ" and so become "dead to the law" and in the other place, to have been crucified with Christ and so become crucified to the world. In both instances there is a new life as a sequel "the life I now live in the flesh I live by the faith of the Son of God" and "for in Christ Jesus neither circumcision availeth anything, nor uncircumcision, but a new creature".

Lightfoot says "Aion 'age' in the Scripture, very ordinarily is 'the Jewish age'. In which sense, circumcision, the Passover, and other Mosaic rites are said to be eis aiona 'for an age'."

We may sum up this argument concerning the present evil age with a quotation from Sadler's commentary:

> "The evil world of St. Paul is twofold. It was the Jewish evil world, with its self-righteousness, its legalism, its utterly Godless and immoral traditions, forming a character of intense worldliness and deep seated alienation from God, and the Gentile evil world with its lasciviousness, lusts, and abominable idolatries."

Christ has come to deliver from both systems, and for a Gentile who had professed to believe in Christ, to come out of the evil world of Gentile Paganism and to turn to the equally evil world of Judaistic formalism was such a lapse that the apostle could only say of such "ye are fallen from grace", "Christ is become of no effect".

The apostle, after this most unique addition to the salutation of an epistle, declares this deliverance to be "according to the will of God and our Father, to Whom be glory for ever and ever, Amen". There is, in these concluding words, yet one more item that is unique. The "will of God" is mentioned many times as the originating cause of mercy and grace but this is the only occasion when the words "and our Father" are added. Does not the apostle intentionally stress the Fatherhood of God because of the emphasis he is to place upon "the time appointed by the Father" "the adoption of sons" and the right to say "Abba, Father" in Ga. iv.?

If the exordium of this epistle contain such evidence of intense feeling and concern, we shall not be surprised to discover that the epistle itself is full of this burning zeal and evangelical fervour, and it should be our prayer, that not only may we hold fast to the Gospel therein displayed, and to the freedom therein so bravely championed, but that we too may catch something of the spirit of this man of God, and in our day and generation be prepared not only to "stand" but to "withstand" so that the "truth of the gospel may continued right through (diameno)".

No.50. GALATIANS.
No "Other" Gospel (i. 6 - 10).
pp. 126 - 129

The introduction of this epistle, with its strange challenge, is followed immediately and abruptly with the equally strange and challenging words "I marvel". No intervening words of praise or commendation soften the plunge, the apostle by his very manner revealing the intensity of his feelings in this great matter. The truth of the Gospel was at stake (Gal. ii. 5, 14), and the whole of chapter one pivots on the gospel and its preaching. In the short section before us (Gal. i. 6-10) the word translated "gospel" and its derivatives, occur six times: "another gospel" euangelion (6); "the gospel of Christ" euangelion (7); "preach any other gospel" euangelizo (8 twice and 9); and "an angel from heaven" angelos (8).

> "I marvel that ye are so soon removed from Him that called you into the grace of Christ unto another gospel" (6).

We may marvel when we see some exhibition of great faith, as did the Saviour (Matt. viii. 10), or as did the disciples when they saw the Lord's command of the elements (27). The word is used to express wonder and astonishment at anything extraordinary, whether at a miracle (Matt. ix. 8, 33), a profound speech (xxii. 22) or at an unprecedented occurrence (Mark v. 20).

This act of marveling may be the accompaniment or outcome of unbelief (Mark vi. 6); fear (Luke viii. 25); or joy (Luke xxiv. 41). Paul was not, evidently, given to "marveling", for out of forty-six occurrences of the word in the New Testament, Paul is responsible for three only, and of these three, once only is the word used of Paul himself, and that in the passage before us.

At Antioch in Galatia he had used the word of the unbelieving Jews—"Behold ye despisers, and wonder, and perish" (Acts xiii. 41), and now, to his astonishment he sees the believing company at the same place, following rapidly the same disastrous course.

The apostle's astonishment was not only that the Galatians had been "removed", but that the removal had been so rapid. The translation of tacheos by "so soon" or "quickly" seems to demand some datum line from which to reckon it. Some commentators say "so soon after conversion", others "so soon after the apostle's visit", yet others, "so soon after the advent of the false teachers". Bloomfield's translation is probably nearer to the apostle's intention, for he, together with a few ancient and modern commentators, understand the word to mean "hastily", "precipitately", "inconsiderately", and Paul is seen marveling, as it were, at a spiritual landslide.

The main structure of this section is simple:

A | 6. The defection "moved away" (metatithemi).
B | 6. The grace of Christ.
C | 6, 7. The "other" gospel (heteros).
A | 7. The perversion "turned away" (metastrepho).
B | 7. The gospel of Christ.
C | 8-10. The "different" gospel (par ho).

The members C and C allow of an expansion, thus:

C | 6, 7. The "other" gospel (heteros).
a | Not another (allos).
b | Some that trouble you.

* * * * * * *

C | 8-10. The "different" gospel (par ho).
a | We, or an angel.
b | Preached (past).
c | We preached (we).
d | Let him be anathema.
a | If anyone.
b | Preachers (present).
c | Ye received (Ye).
d | Let him be anathema.
a | Do I obey God?
b | Do I seek to please men?
b | If I yet pleased men.
a | I should not be servant of Christ.

The word translated “removed” in verse 6, is metatithemi. It has the force of “transference”, “translation”, or “to carry over” (Acts vii. 16; Heb. xi. 5). It was this sudden transfer of allegiance, without defence, without an appeal to the apostle for help; this sudden capitulation that caused the apostle’s astonishment, and called forth this burning epistle.

The words “Him that called you” are almost universally ascribed to God the Father, but there are indications in this epistle that in this case the apostle refers to himself as the minister by whom they had believed. He charges them with “changing over from him that called them”, not so much with apostasy from God Himself, but from the pure gospel as preached by himself , to the garbled mixture as preached by the Judaizers. He speaks of such as “troublers”, refers plainly to them in Gal. iv. 12-17 and in Gal. v. 8, and the fact that he devotes practically two whole chapters to defend his apostleship and ministry lends weight to the suggestion.

Whether Jerome’s thought that in metatithemi “removed” there is a mental pun on Galatæ, the Hebrew galal meaning “to roll” or “be removed”, is perhaps beyond our present knowledge to judge.

The seriousness of this “removal” or transfer, was not merely that it was a piece of personal disloyalty, it was the removal from the true gospel to that which was a gospel but in name.

> “Unto another gospel which is not another” (Gal. i. 6, 7).

This phrase calls for examination, and we might as well couple with it the words “any other gospel” of verses 8 and 9, words which we have rendered in the structure by the phrase “different gospel”.

In verses 6 and 7 two different words are rendered “another”; heteros, “another of another sort or kind”, and allos, “another of the same or similar kind”.

This passage has given considerable trouble to commentators, and the reader may profit by considering some of the most noteworthy suggestions that have been put forward.

Alford adopts the note of Meyer:

> “The preaching eis heteron euangelion was paradoxical expression, there being in reality, but one gospel. Paul appeared by it to admit the existence of many gospels, and he therefore now explains himself more accurately, how he wishes to be understood.”

Lightfoot comments:

> “Only in this sense is it another gospel, in that it is an attempt to pervert the one true gospel.”

Ellicott sees the connexion with "troublers", saying:

> "which is not another (a second) gospel, except (only in this sense, that) there are some that trouble you, i.e. the Judaists bring you another gospel, but it is really no GOSPEL at all."

Wordsworth uses this connexion too and would have it read:

> "Which is not a second Gospel, unless, forsooth, those persons who are troubling you, and whose will it is to prevent the Gospel of Christ are somebody", a thought brought over from Galatians 2 where the apostle speaks of those who seem "to be somewhat" (Gal. 2:6).

Conybeare and Howson approach nearer to the intention of the apostle (as we understand him), "for a new glad tidings which is nothing else but the device of certain men who are troubling you".

If we take as the antecedent of the pronoun "which" the whole of verse 6, we may render the passage as follows:

> "which thing (viz. that ye are so quickly changing from him that called you, &c., &c.) is nothing else, save that there are some who trouble you."

This gives the words ei me their proper signification, and throws the blame not so much on those who had been duped, as upon those who had duped them (see Gal. iii. 1; v. 8-10, 12; vi. 12, 13).

The fact that Paul calls these false preachers "troublers" is an interesting link with Acts xv., even as we found the word "marvel" a definite link with Acts xiii.

> "Forasmuch as we have heard, that certain which went out from us have troubled you with words, subverting your souls, saying, Ye must be circumcised, and keep the law; to whom we gave no such commandment" (Acts xv. 24).

Just as the Council at Jerusalem said these "troublers" subverted the souls of the believers, so Paul said that these "troublers" perverted the gospel.

Metastrepho primarily means to "turn", "alter", "change", and the perversion of the gospel arises out of the awful nature of its contents. It is so unique, so divine, that to tamper with it must be fatal. In order to compel the Galatians to perceive the serious nature of this preaching of a "different" gospel Paul uses a figure of speech known as hyperbolical hypothesis, a figure whose name implies both exaggeration and moral impossibility and only permissible when an extreme example is called for.

Here the "different" gospel is expressed by the words par ho "beside which". The gospel of God can brook neither rival or equal.

To Gentiles brought up as we have been with no spiritual history, the pronouncing of a possible anathema upon an angel from heaven may sound surprising but not blasphemous, but for one who was a Hebrew of the Hebrews, and who had been an exceeding zealot for Israelite tradition, the veneration of angels would be deeply ingrained thereby making this extreme case the more incisive. Nothing could be more certain than Paul's clear conception of the Gospel he preached, and nothing could move him to abate one iota of its blessed provision. The apostle's adversaries had not hesitated to dub him both a time server and a man pleaser (I Cor. ix. 10-23; x. 24); he had proscribed circumcision, yet had practiced it (Acts xvi. 3).

"Now then", the apostle seems to say, "does this language startle you? Is this the language of a time server? Will you persist in defaming me by saying I simply seek to conciliate men? If that had been my desire I should not be suffering for faithful adherence to the gospel of Christ".

The word "yet" eti verse 10 should be read in the light of Gal. vi. 17, where Paul closes his epistle on the same note with which he began. "Henceforth let no man question my authority." "Persuade" peitho usually suggests subordination, and is sometimes translated "obey". In chapter two we see the apostle yielding subjection "not for an hour". He disposes of the idea that he sought to please men.

Having triumphantly disposed of the first charge, that he most certainly was not attempting to ingratiate himself with men who were his superiors in the apostolic office, or to please those who were his hearers, he turns to the next great subject of dispute, namely, the Gospel itself which he preached, and the authority he had received. These two related subjects follow in due order, and must occupy our attention in succeeding articles. Let us not lightly put aside this record of a valiant single-handed fight in which immortal odds were at stake, and the whole subject of salvation by grace through faith in the very melting pot, without putting up a twofold prayer, first a word of thanksgiving for the man of God who "fought a good fight and kept the faith" and, secondly, a prayer for ourselves that we too in our day and generation may quit ourselves like men and be strong in the faith.

No.51. GALATIANS.
The Gospel received (i. 11 - 14).
pp. 143 - 147

Having taken up the challenge regarding his apostleship, it of necessity involved the gospel he preached, for an apostle without a message would remain a mere cypher and would not be worthy of debate. Again, he uses the negations "not . . . neither . . . but" declaring that the gospel which he preached was not "according to man" kata anthropon (see Gal. iii. 15), neither was it received from man, nor taught by man, but received by revelation of Jesus Christ. The apostle having made this new and sweeping claim to independence, proceeded at once to justify it. But here he was met with a difficulty. How can anyone prove to anyone else that which is exclusively personal? Paul might claim with all the earnestness and solemnity of his being that the gospel he preached, was revealed to him by Christ, but it must for ever remain a purely personal, unsupported assertion. The only thing he can do is to appeal to circumstances that are knowable, show the moral impossibility of things being otherwise, and demonstrate that the whole manner of his life and upbringing was completely opposed to the thought that he, Saul the Pharisee, should have evolved from his own heart and mind the gospel of free grace to the Gentiles.

The structure of this short passage is as follows:

A | 13. | a | My conversation,
b | In time past,
c | The Jews' religion.
B | 13. | d | Beyond measure.
e | Persecution of Church of God.
A | 14. | c | The Jews' religion.
a | My equals,
b | In my nation.
B | 14. | d | More exceedingly.
e | Zealot for traditions of fathers.

Two items are thrown into relief by this correspondence. "The Jews' religion" and the excessiveness of Paul's zeal expressed negatively in persecuting the church and positively in maintaining the traditions of his fathers. Let us consider the bearing of this argument upon the question of Paul's independence of human intervention in respect to the gospel which he preached.

"Conversation." The Latin origin of this word means "to live with" or "keep company with" others, and only in a secondary sense did it bear the meaning of "talking together". The Greek word is a compound of strepho "to turn", which has already met us in Gal. i. 7 in the word metastrepho "to pervert". Diastrepho is translated "perverse" and "pervert" , and the English reader will not fail to perceive in each rendering of these words the stem ver is retained in English. So in the word anastrophe the translation retains the same stem "conVERsation" a "turn". Anastrepho, the verb, is translated literally "overthrow" as in John ii. 15 or "return" as in Acts v. 22; and also in its secondary sense "to abide", "to behave", "to live" and to "have one's conversation" (Matt. xvii. 22; I Tim. iii. 15; Heb. xiii. 18 and Eph. ii. 3). When therefore Paul spoke of his "conversation in time past in the Jew's religion" he meant his whole course and manner of life, and he was but adopting a form of argument which is repeated several times in the New Testament record. Let us acquaint ourselves with this mode of reasoning so characteristic of the apostle.

(1) In his defence before the multitude.

> "I am verily a man which am a Jew, born in Tarsus, a city of Cilicia, yet brought up in this city (Jerusalem) at the feet of Gamaliel, and taught according to the perfect manner of the law of the fathers, and was zealous toward God, as ye all are this day. And I persecuted this way unto the death, binding and delivering into prisons both men and women. As also the high priest doth bear me witness, and all the estate of the elders" (Acts xxii. 3-7).

(2) In his defence before Agrippa.

> "My manner of life from my youth, which was at the first among mine own nation at Jerusalem, know all the Jews; which knew me from the beginning, if they would testify, that after the most straitest sect of our religion I lived a Pharisee . . . . . I verily thought with myself, that I ought to do many things contrary to the name of Jesus of Nazareth, which thing I also did in Jerusalem . . . . . I punished them oft in every synagogue, and compelled them to blaspheme; and being exceedingly mad against them, I persecuted them even unto strange cities" (Acts xxvi. 4-11).

(3) In his confession when writing to Timothy.

> "I thank Christ Jesus our Lord, Who hath enabled me, for that He counted me faithful putting me into the Ministry; who was before a blasphemer, and a persecutor, and injurious; but I obtained mercy, because I did it ignorantly in unbelief" (I Tim. i. 12).

Is this the sort of man that one would expect to evolve from his own heart and mind a gospel of grace to the Gentile sinner? A man who was a Pharisee, a Jew, a Zealot, a traditionalist, a blasphemer, and a persecutor? If so, then all argument is at an end. There is no room for cause and effect in the estimate of human action, all psychology is emptied of meaning, all the influence of environment and birth set at nought. One has only to become acquainted with Judaistic teaching and upbringing to know that nothing short of a miracle can account for the conversion of this Pharisaic persecutor into the lowly apostle of abounding grace, and nothing short of a miracle is recorded in Acts nine.

One especially Pauline characteristic finds its place in this passage of first Galatians, the twofold superlative "beyond measure", "more exceedingly". It will be observed in the "most straitest sect" of Act xxvi. 5 and in the "less than the least" of Eph. iii. 8. Among other consequences of his superlative zeal, Paul says that he "persecuted the Church of God and wasted it" (Gal. i. 13). There can be no two thoughts about the meaning of the added words "and wasted it". Portheo occurs three times in the New Testament and in each case refers to the action of Paul.

"Is not this he that destroyed them which called on this name in Jerusalem?" (Acts ix. 21).

"I persecuted the church of God, and wasted it" (Gal. i. 13).

"They had heard only, that he which persecuted us in times past now preacheth the faith which once he destroyed" (Gal. i. 23).

The reason we have examined this word first, and not the word persecute will become evident as we proceed.

The word translated "persecute" is dioko, a word in common use both in the apostle's day and at the time of the translation of the Greek O.T. Like all words that are in constant use, it takes upon itself secondary meanings, but a consultation of the LXX of the Pentateuch leaves us in no doubt as to its primary significance.

"He pursued after him seven days" (Gen. xxxi. 23).

"The enemy said, I will pursue, I will overtake" (Exod. xv. 9).

"Ye shall chase your enemies . . . . . chase an hundred . . . . . put ten thousand to flight" (Lev. xxvi. 7, 8).

"Ye shall flee when none pursueth you" (Lev. xxvi. 17).

"The sound of a shaken leaf shall chase them . . . . . they shall fall when none pursueth" (Lev. xxvi. 36).

"That which is altogether just shalt thou follow" (Deut. xvi. 20).

"Lest the avenger of the blood pursue the slayer" (Deut. xix. 6).

"Them that hate thee, which persecuted thee" (Deut. xxx. 7).

"How should one chase a thousand" (Deut. xxxii. 30).

The only occurrence in the Pentateuch of the use of this word in a secondary sense is that of Deut. xvi. 20, but this cannot be pressed as the Alexandrian version reads phulasso "to keep". There can be no doubt that the mistaken idea of "pursuing" as one would "a calling" or with good intention is foreign to the usage of the word. The meaning read into the words of Judges viii. 4 "faint yet pursuing", and kept alive by a popular hymn is altogether false.

Coming to the New Testament the six occurrences of dioko in Matthew are all translated "persecute" and can mean nothing else. Of the two references in Luke, one, Luke xvii. 23 is employed in a secondary sense. In John, the three references are translated "persecute" and can mean nothing else. Nine times does the word dioko occur in the Acts, and in each case the only translation is "persecute". In the Epistles, the word is more often used in its secondary sense as in Romans, where it is translated three times "follow", once "given to" and once "persecute". In I Corinthians it is twice rendered "persecute" and once "follow after". In II Corinthians it occurs but once, and in this reference it is translated "persecute". In the epistle to the Galatians there are five occurrences of dioko all of which are translated "persecute". In Philippians it occurs three times, once translated "persecute", once "followed after" and once "press toward". In I Thess. v. 15; I Tim. vi. 11; II Tim. ii. 22; Heb. xii. 14; and I Pet. iii. 11 it is used in the secondary sense, and in II Tim. iii. 12 and Rev. xii. 13 it is again "persecute". There are therefore thirty-one passages where the word is translated either "persecute" or "suffer persecution", and thirteen where the translation is "follow" or a similar word.

The reference to Paul's persecution of the church are as follows:

> "Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou Me?" (Acts ix. 4; xxii. 7; xxvi. 14).
> "I am Jesus, Whom thou persecutest" (Acts ix. 5; xxii. 8; xxvi. 15).
> "I persecuted this way unto the death" (Acts xxii. 4).
> "I persecuted them even unto strange cities" (Acts xxvi. 11).
> "I persecuted the church of God" (I Cor. xv. 9).
> "Beyond measure I persecuted the church of God, and wasted it" (Gal. i. 13).
> "Concerning zeal, persecuting the church" (Phil. iii. 6).

Here is a consistent use of this word, and unless one had some private reasons, it would never occur to the mind that in Phil. iii. 6 the apostle, without warning, without conforming to the obligation laid upon all writers to notify his reader should he suddenly depart from accepted usage, that Paul here intends us to understand that he was "following after" the church, with the intention if possible to being accepted as a member! We almost feel obliged to apologize to our readers for what must appear slight recognition of their intelligence, but as this interpretation has been put upon the passage, and has been circulated among those who love and honour the Scriptures, we have felt it incumbent upon us to call attention to it. There would be just as much truth in a contention that as the word "conversation" can sometimes mean nothing more than "speech with another" that all Paul meant in Gal. i. 13 was his manner of "speech"—a proposition that could not be maintained in the light of the passages cited from Acts xxii. and xxvi.

In Philippians the apostle prefaced the persecution of the church with a list of his Judaistic credentials, even as he does in Gal. i. 11-14, and apparently for the same reason. He says in the one passage "concerning zeal, persecuting the church". If we ask "concerning zeal for what?" we are not left without guidance. The answer is "zeal for the traditions of the fathers", and such a zeal though it may and has led to persecution, could never lead to an ardent following of a position entirely opposed to these traditions and with a view to acceptance. The whole of the passage quoted in Phil. iii. 4-6 is descriptive of Saul of Tarsus, before his conversion on the road to Damascus. It was "touching the law" that he was a Pharisee. It was "touching the righteousness which is in the law", that he was blameless, a statement diametrically opposed to his apostolic doctrine, and belonging only to his unconverted Pharisaic condition.

The word diogmos is translated in each of its ten occurrences by the one word "persecution" and dioktes is the word Paul uses of himself when he styled himself "a blasphemer, and a persecutor, and injurious" (I Tim. i. 13).

In the two passages in Galatians one where the Authorized Version reads "the Jews' religion" the word is Ioudaismos "Judaism", and includes the whole Jewish manner of life. "I forged ahead" he says (prokopto "profit") above many mine equals. To be entrusted, though a young man, by the Sanhedrin as he had been, was a signal honour, and the more these things are appreciated, the more abundantly it becomes manifest that the gospel which Paul preached was not after man, it was not received from man, it was not taught him by man, but it was given to him by revelation.

We shall have opportunity to consider this claim to revelation when dealing with Gal. i. 16. Meanwhile let us rejoice that we are counted worthy to inherit so glorious a message, and pray that we may be in our small degree as faithful to the trust as was Paul the apostle of Jesus Christ.

No.52. GALATIANS.
Paul's Independent Authority (i. 15 - 24).
pp. 189 - 193

Paul has now asserted in unmistakable terms his independent Apostleship and Gospel, and his assertions have been supported by very strong proof derived from the manner of his upbringing and the moral impossibility that from such soil there should grow, without Divine intervention, such a plant as the Gospel of the Grace of God proved to be. The apostle might have left the matter there, and proceeded forthwith to the great theme of his epistle, but he knew the kind of antagonists these Judaizing preachers were, and how any unexplained association that he may have had with the apostles at Jerusalem could easily be distorted into a tacit acknowledgment of his indebtedness to that body. He therefore uses the words "not . . . neither . . . but" once more, and shows his complete independence of all human authority especially the authority vested in the apostles at Jerusalem.

We shall find him therefore meticulously going over the ground he traversed after his conversion on the road to Damascus, how he resolved "immediately" that this was a case for a clean cut with "flesh and blood", how he avoided both "Jerusalem" and those who were "apostles" before him, but that on the contrary he went away from all human contacts into "Arabia", and returned to Damascus.

Three years elapsed before he paid a friendly visit to Jerusalem "to see Peter", but even on that occasion he declared on oath that he saw no other apostle save James the Lord's brother. After that visit he traversed the regions of Syria and Cilicia, but was personally unknown to the churches of Judæa. All they knew of him and his activities were to the effect that the Persecutor had now turned Preacher, and they had glorified God in Him and on this account.

Galatians i. 15 - 24.

A | a | 15, 16. "In me." His Son revealed. En emoi.
b | 16. "Preach Him." Euangelizomai.
c | 16. "I conferred not with flesh and blood."
B | d | 17. "Neither went . . . but I went" apelthon.
e | 17. "Returned again unto Damascus."
d | 18-20. "I went up . . . I lie not" anelthon.
e | 21. "Afterwards I came into . . . Syria, Cilicia."
A | c | 22. "Unknown by face."
b | 23. "Preacheth the faith . . . he destroyed." Euangelizetai.
a | 24. "In me." God glorified. En emoi.

The structure of the section is simple, and throws into correspondence these items, approaching the central theme by three steps, and completing the argument by another three steps, leaving the "neither . . . but" and the geographical items to form the centre of the argument.

> "But when it pleased God, Who separated me from my mother's womb, and called me by His grace, to reveal His Son in me."

The simple sentence deals with the good pleasure of the Lord to reveal his Son in Paul, but so overwhelming was the consciousness of the Divine hand in all his affairs, even when he knew not the Lord, that the apostle has to put in a parenthetical note. Let us look at the parenthesis first.

"Separated." Apart from three references in the Gospels, the use of aphorizo "to separate" is confined to the Acts or Epistles of Paul. This word is composed of apo "away from" and horizo "to define or set bounds". The English reader will recognize the origin of the word "horizon". We cannot here go into the many subdivisions of this word, sufficient for the moment is it to say that another word of great moment in Paul's ministry is closely related to aphorizo, and that is the word translated "predestinate" proorizo "to mark off beforehand". Just as in Romans, the term "calling" follows "predestination", so here "calling" to service, follows "separation". God may not have been known to us during the early years of our unregenerate days. We may have done many things the very reverse of His will and contrary to His Word, yet who among us but cannot look back to those early days and be conscious that there was a hedging, a guiding, a leading which we unconsciously obeyed or which we followed sometimes against our own inclinations. In spite of prevalent evil and in full recognition of human free choice, God has not and never will abdicate His throne.

As a "Hebrew of the Hebrews" Paul would have imbibed from infancy the doctrine of separation as it pertained to Israel and the Priesthood, for no Israelite could forget the peculiar calling of the nation to which he belonged. He would moreover, as a Preacher, remember—even when overwhelmed with his own unworthiness—the language of Jer. i. 5-10 and its close parallel with his own calling as an apostle to the nations, and still further, as a "Pharisee of the Pharisees", he could not miss the *paronomasia of the words aphorizo and Pharisee, for both words have the common meaning "separated" though derived from entirely different roots.

> [* - A figure of speech where words of similar sound are brought together, a figure found several times in Paul's epistles.]

This national separation, this separation in pride and contempt, however, was included in those things which Paul had counted as dung, as he now rejoices in a higher and holier separation.

(1) He had been "separated" by the Will of God before time began "chosen in Him before the foundation of the world . . . . . predestinated" proorizo.

(2) He had been "separated" from his birth by God Who knows the end from the beginning, and had decided both his parentage and birthplace which included not only the privileges of the Hebrew race, but that of the city of Tarsus and of Roman citizenship.
(3) He had been "separated" on the road to Damascus, when the Lord revealed to Ananias that Paul was a "chosen vessel".
(4) He was "separated" unto the Gospel of God, as he declared in Rom. i. 1.
(5) He had been "separated" by the Holy Ghost as recorded in Acts xiii.

When these facts are superadded to the items already brought forward, the apostle's claim to entire independence of man or men is distinctly furthered, and amounts to a moral necessity.

Paul not only draws attention to his "separation", he follows it immediately with the assertion, that the gospel which he preached was his "by revelation", "to reveal His Son in me" (Gal. i. 16). He has already put this "revelation" over against all possible modes of instruction, declaring that he had received the gospel "by revelation" (Gal. i. 12). There it was "the revelation of Jesus Christ", which by the antithesis of the former clause, means "a revelation from Jesus Christ" as the One Who occupied the place of a teacher. In this second reference, the Revealer is God, and the subject matter is "His Son". To Paul the gospel of God unto which he had been separated, was "concerning His Son" (Rom. i. 1-4). When Paul preached the Gospel he preached Christ. In Romans the gospel is referred to as "The Gospel of God" because God is its author (i. 1). It is the Gospel of His Son (i. 9), because, as the Son of God, Christ was declared to be such with power (i. 4), and it is called the Gospel of Christ, because it is the power of God unto salvation (i. 16). This gospel revealed in such a manner and entrusted with such grace, the apostle claimed as his own, calling it "my gospel" (xvi. 25).

One of the reasons that helped Paul to the decision that he would not confer with the apostles at Jerusalem, seems to be found in the words of Gal. i. 16: "That I might preach Him among the heathen, or Gentiles." The peculiar nature of this ministry was so new and unprecedented that Peter even, was called upon to give an account of himself after preaching once to the Gentiles (Acts xi. 1-4), making it clear to Paul that he could expect little or no help from Jerusalem and the twelve. The other reason was that he had come through a crisis, lifelong convictions had been shattered, pride had been humbled.

> "He was a stricken deer, and was impelled as by a strong instinct to leave the herd. In solitude a man may trace to their hidden source the fatal errors of the past; he may pray for light from heaven—he may want the healing of his deep wounds by the same tender hand that in mercy had inflicted them" (Farrar, "Life and Work of St. Paul").

Like Moses, and even like the Lord Himself, retirement into the wilderness was a necessity.

Lightfoot says: "A veil of thick darkness hangs over St. Paul's visit to Arabia . . . . . It is a mysterious pause, a moment of suspense in the apostle's history, a breathless calm which ushers in the tumultuous storm of his active missionary life."

Justin Martyr, argues, "that Damascus belongs and did belong to Arabia, though now it has been assigned to Syrophoenicia", and so it is just possible that Paul retired to some spot in the immediate neighbourhood of Damascus. Yet, seeing that "Arabia" is mentioned in the allegory of Gal. iv.:

> "For this Agar is Mount Sinai in Arabia, and answereth to Jerusalem which now is, and is in bondage with her children" (25), it seems almost a necessity that the Arabia to which Paul withdrew should be the Arabia of Sinai and bondage too.

Elijah, as Paul would well know, had been forced to withdraw into the region of Horeb the Mount of God, there to learn a needful lesson, and when the lesson was learned, to receive the command:

> "Go, return on thy way to the wilderness of Damascus" (I Kings xix. 15), even as of Paul it is written "I went into Arabia, and returned gain unto Damascus" (Gal. i. 17).

There at the seat of the old covenant which gendered to bondage, Paul learned the wonder of the gospel of liberty which had been entrusted to him, and like Elijah, he listened to the "still small voice" and returned equipped for the fight of faith which occupied the remainder of his pilgrim days. Three years were allowed to elapse between this experience in Arabia, and his acquaintance with Peter.

> "Then after three years I went up to Jerusalem to see Peter, and abode with him fifteen days" (Gal. i. 18).

Historeo means "to see or visit a person in order to make his acquaintance" (Dr. E. W. Bullinger, "Critical Lexicon"). From this Greek word our own word "history" is derived. While Paul owed his Gospel and Commission to no man, it was the most natural thing in the world that he should desire to make the acquaintance of one who not only was a prominent fellow apostle, but one whose rich experiences and personal associations with the Lord would make such an acquaintance valuable beyond estimation. We are sure that Paul would follow with a full heart, the earthly footsteps of the Son of God as conducted over the ground by such a fellow disciple as Peter. Yet this could not and did not add one iota either to his gospel or his authority.

So near to the heart of things was this independence of the apostle that more than once we find him approaching the solemnity of an oath as he asserts it:

> "Now the things which I write unto you, behold, before God, I lie not" (Gal. i. 20).
> "I am ordained a preacher, and an apostle (I speak the truth in Christ, and lie not); a teacher of the Gentiles in faith and verity" (I Tim. ii. 7).

The persecutor had become the preacher, but no human instrumentality had been permitted, lest the opposition to such a ministry as had been entrusted to him should have found a handle wherewith to rob him of his commission and us of the gospel of free grace, and so the chapter ends with the simple yet full words:

> "And they glorified God in me."

No.53. GALATIANS.
"Not for an hour." Paul in the Arena (ii. 1 - 14).
pp. 213 - 218

After the very thorough defence which the apostle has put up in the first chapter, one might have reasonably expected that he would have proceeded forthwith to the exposition of the great doctrine which was at stake, namely "Justification by Faith". This, however, does not come into prominence until we reach Gal. ii. 15, and a further series of historic happenings that have the independence of Paul and his gospel as their central theme are brought before us. From other epistles we know how foreign it was to Paul's spiritual nature to appear to boast, and how reluctant he was to say anything derogatory to the character of another servant of the Lord. Yet in the section now before us, he shows quite plainly that the church to-day owes, humanly speaking, the full gospel of grace to his lone stand against the prevailing views of many in authority, and not only so, but he shows as in marked contrast with his own loyal stand, the defection of Peter and Barnabas and a company of Jewish believers who were associated with Peter. If we seek a word to justify such an exposure and such a record, we shall find it in the one word "gospel". If it had been a matter of defending his own personal honour, Paul would have suffered in silence; but silent he could not be when the very "truth of the gospel" was at stake.

The structure of Gal. ii. 1-14 is so lucid, so transparent and so clearly puts the apostle's argument before the eye, that we shall be doing a disservice to the truth by holding it back from the reader another moment.

It was the fatal shadow of "another gospel" (Gal. i. 6) that stirred Paul to the depths and demanded his utmost in countering its dreadful blight. It was the perversion "of the Gospel of Christ" (i. 7), not merely the ingratitude of the Galatians, that set his heart aflame. It was the "truth" of the gospel not some marginal or debateable borderland of doctrine or practice that called him into the arena, as the champion of Christian liberty.

Gal. ii. opens with the visit to Jerusalem and with a date attached, "fourteen years after". Already, in chapter one, a series of time notes have been given. The starting point is Gal. i. 15 "when", and the occasion is the apostle's conversion. This is the great outstanding period of his life, over and over again, both in the Acts and in his epistles, the apostle shows how vividly that momentous occurrence on the road to Damascus was impressed on heart and memory.

We start our reckoning therefore with his conversion. In verse 16 we have the next note of time, "immediately", which refers to the retirement into Arabia and in verse 17 "again", which records the return to Damascus. "Three years after" we have the first visit of the apostle to Jerusalem, and the "fifteen-day" visit to Peter (i. 18-19) "afterwards" the work and abiding in Syria and Cilicia (i. 21-24), and so to Gal. ii. 1 "fourteen years after".

> "Here the numbers derive their effect on the reader's mind from their greatness; and if he had been able to use the number 17 (i.e. by adding together the "three" years of Gal.1:18, and the "fourteen" years of Gal.2:1), he would inevitably (according to my conception of his nature) have taken the expression which enabled him to use the larger number" (Prof. Ramsay).

The fourteen years dates from the apostle's conversion and if we can translate, as has been suggested, II Cor. xii. 2 "a man who had been fourteen years in Christ" (cf. Rom. xvi. 7), then Paul had received the "revelations" spoken of in II Cor. xii. at the same time that he had gone up to Jerusalem "by revelation" as recorded in Gal. ii. 1. Indeed there is a marked parallel between the two epistles that should be noted, each stressing his apostleship, gospel and authority.

"He Who wrought effectually in Peter . . . the same was mighty in me" (ii. 8).	"For I suppose I was not a whit behind the very chiefest apostles" (xi. 5).
"I am afraid of you, lest I have bestowed upon you labour in vain . . . I desire to be present with you now, and to change my voice; for I stand in doubt of you" (iv. 11-20).	"For I fear, lest, when I come I shall not find you such as I would" (xii. 20).

"I have confidence in you through the Lord that ye will be none otherwise minded" (v. 10).	"I rejoice therefore that I have confidence in you in all things" (vii. 16)
"From henceforth let no man trouble me, for I bear in my body the marks of the Lord Jesus" (vi. 17).	"Forty stripes save one, five times: thrice beaten with rods: once stoned: thrice shipwrecked . . ." (xi. 24, 25).
"Behold, before God I lie not" (i. 20).	"The God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, which is blessed for evermore, knoweth that I lie not" (xi. 31).
"If ye bite and devour one another, take heed that ye be not consumed one of another" (v. 15).	"If a man devour you"; "Backbitings, whisperings, swellings, tumults" (xi. 20; xii. 20).
"As we said before, so say I now again, if any man preach . . ." (i. 9).	"I told you before, and foretell you, as if I were present the second time" (xiii. 2).
"Having begun in the Spirit, are ye now made perfect by the flesh" (iii. 3).	"That as he had begun, so he would also perfect in you the same grace also" (viii. 6).
"For in Christ Jesus, neither circumcision availeth anything, nor uncircumcision, but a new creature" (vi. 15).	"Therefore if any man be in Christ, he is a new creature" (v. 17).

The words "with Barnabas" of Gal. ii. 1 have a bearing upon the date of this visit to Jerusalem. It was evidently necessary for the apostle to explain Titus "a Greek", and to explain Peter, James and John as "pillars" but Barnabas needs no explanation. Barnabas had been "separated" together with Paul to preach the gospel to the Galatians (Acts xiii., xiv.) and is evidently included in the plural pronoun "we", when referring to the preaching of the gospel (Gal. i. 8). At the close of Acts xv. Barnabas parts company with Paul and we have no record that he ever accompanied Paul on a missionary journey again. It seems certain therefore that the conference at Jerusalem described in Acts xv. could not be the one referred to in Gal. ii., but rather the contention that led up to the conference, and to the writing of the epistle. The "decrees" formulated at the Council are never mentioned in the epistle. This omission is important. He would have been obliged in all honesty to have referred to them had they already been written (see Acts xv. 25, 26; xvi. 4, 5), and to have quoted them would have silenced the Judaizers in Galatia and made the epistle to the Galatians as we now have it, unnecessary. We can have no doubt but that the apostle used the strongest arguments that were at the time available. Altogether there are five recorded visits of the apostle to Jerusalem, the one before us in Gal. ii. 1 being the second. The visits are as follows:

PAUL'S VISITS TO JERUSALEM.

FIRST VISIT (3 years)	Acts ix. 26-30 Gal. i. 17-21	Compare "Cæsarea and "Tarsus" with "Syria and Cilicia".
SECOND VISIT (14 years)	Acts xi. 29, 30 (see also xii. 25), Gal. ii. 1	Before the first missionary journey to Galatia.
THIRD VISIT	Acts xv. 2-4	After the first missionary journey to Galatia.
FOURTH VISIT	Acts xviii. 21, 22	To keep the Feast.
FIFTH VISIT	Acts xxi. 15 - xxiii. 30	Taken prisoner.

"And took Titus with me also" (Gal. ii. 1). The parallel wording that we find in the Acts, concerning the call of Timothy, and this record of Gal. ii., to the taking of Titus, is suggestive of close proximity of date.

GALATIANS ii.	ACTS xvi.
With me.	With him.
Greek.	Greek (mother a Jewess).
Not circumcised.	Circumcised.
Because of false brethren (dia).	Because of the Jews (dia).
Nothing added at Jerusalem.	Decrees from Jerusalem.
Ministry to Gentiles.	Ministry to Gentiles.

The taking of Titus was something of a test. The Judaizers had intimidated the Galatian converts, quoting chapter and verse, as many of their successors do to-day—but failing rightly to divide the scriptures quoted. They urged the necessity for circumcision to make salvation secure, and had such a view been entertained by the leaders at Jerusalem, Titus, a Greek, would not have been accepted as he was. Yet said Paul:

> "But neither Titus, who was with me, being a Greek, was compelled to be circumcised" (Gal. ii. 3).

The use of this word "compel" which the structure throws into prominence show how sadly Peter failed at this point. "Why compellest thou the Gentiles to Judaize?" said Paul (Gal. ii. 14). Peter's action was not only contrary to the gospel Paul had preached, but to his own interpretation of its liberties (ii. 12) and the attitude adopted finally at Jerusalem (Acts xv. 24).

Upon what a knife edge, sometimes mighty issues are balanced.

> "To whom we gave place by subjection, NO, NOT FOR AN HOUR; that the truth of the gospel might continue (right through dia meno) with you" (Gal. ii. 5).

The possibilities are too horrible to contemplate—but what might not have happened had Paul yielded that vital "hour"? We rejoice to know that God is over all, and works His will both in heaven and earth—yet we also do well to remind ourselves that there is such a thing as responsibility, that one lone man with God did count, that truth has been rescued from oblivion by men and women of as little account as he that writes or they who read these present words of exposition. The result of this interview at Jerusalem settled for all time the rightful place of Paul and his gospel. Those who "seemed to be somewhat" could not intimidate one of such singleness of eye as Paul, they saw and admitted even to the giving of the right hand of fellowship, that there was as full and complete authority for Paul's gospel and apostleship to the Gentile, as there was for Peter's apostleship and gospel to the circumcision.

> "In conference they added nothing to me . . . . . only that we should remember the poor" (Gal. ii. 6-10).

I will admit, says the apostle in effect, that I did not come away from the visit to Jerusalem quite as I went, something was laid upon me by the apostles there—it was not a confirmation of my apostleship—for that they were compelled to recognize (that I) stood on parallel grounds with that of Peter, it was not that they attempted the slightest modification of the gospel I preached, Titus being a living witness, they did place upon me one obligation which I was only too ready to shoulder, they said—listen carefully now for the mighty edict, they said, "Remember the poor!" If, said Paul, you can make anything out of that to militate against my independence you are welcome to it.

When men criticize our message to-day we have in Gal. i. and ii. an impregnable position. They say of us sometimes that we are wrong to differentiate between the gospel of the kingdom and the gospel of Peter and James, and the gospel of the grace of God entrusted to Paul.

We need waste no time in arguing, we have a faultless and unassailable argument in these two chapters. Whether the gospel of the kingdom, is or is not the same as that preached by Paul, whether the gospel as preached by Peter, James and John is or is not the same as the gospel of the grace of God, let others attempt to decide—for us it is settled. Though an angel from heaven, let alone a preacher of the kingdom, should preach any other gospel than that which was preached by Paul, and found in his epistles "let him be anathema". If men to-day would impose upon us the message delivered by Peter, let them read for themselves that Peter endorsed the distinctive gospel of the uncircumcision entrusted to Paul. In this matter we can safely and happily echo the apostle's closing words:

> "From henceforth let no man trouble me" (Gal. vi. 17), not because we can exhibit the scars of conflict as that man of God could, but because the matter is settled and closed for every believer in these two opening chapters of Paul's epistles.

No.54. GALATIANS.
The Cross v. Law (ii. 15 - iv. 12) The Structure.
pp. 229, 230

We have now considered the double affirmation of the apostle, as found in Gal. i. - ii. 14. The first affirmation being the threefold use of "not . . . neither . . . but" in Gal. i., whereby the apostle set forth his independent apostleship, gospel and commission. The second affirmation is set out in Gal. ii. 1-14, where the apostle proves by reference to Peter, James and John that this threefold independence was acknowledged by the apostles at Jerusalem. The remainder of Gal. ii. 15-21 is a record of Paul's personal affirmation regarding the truth of the Gospel.

On page six will be found the structure of the epistle as a whole, and Gal. ii. 15-iv. 12 is set out under the title "CROSS v. LAW", which finds a corresponding member in Gal. vi. 11-16 "CROSS v. WORLD".

The section, Gal. ii. 15 - iv. 12 is a lengthy one, and its teaching is condensed yet full. To attempt a meticulous display of the structure would defeat our object both by its length and its prolixity, for we have learned that a structure that exceeds one page of print is too unwieldy for general use.

We have therefore indicated the great steps that the argument takes, and in one instance, to avoid much sub-division, we have allowed a telescoping of parts in chapter iii. 15-21, which however can be rectified when these parts are set out in fuller detail later. The structure opens and closes with a threefold argument, using the words "by nature" first of the Jews, and then of the so-called heathen gods. Peter's defection, "building again the things which he destroyed", is seen to be the same in spirit as the "turning back again to the weak and beggarly element" by the Galatians. The problematical exhortation of Gal. iv. 12, "Be as I am; for I am as ye are", becomes luminous in the light of the corresponding member "I am dead to the law". For the rest of the structure the words put into prominence, indicate the trend of the argument. Atheteo comes twice "I do not frustrate the grace of God" (Gal. ii. 21); and "no man disannulleth" (Gal. iii. 15). In two passages the Scriptures are personified.

"The scripture, foreseeing . . . . . preached before" (iii. 8) and "The scripture hath concluded all under sin" (iii. 22). Twice the apostle uses the word exagorazo "to redeem", once for the redemption from under the curse of the law, that the blessing of Abraham may be received, and the second time redemption from the servile position of being "under" the law, "under" tutors and governors, "under" the elements of the world, in order that the blessing of adoption might be realized (iii. 13, 14; iv. 1-5).

The reader is asked to give something more than a cursory glance to this structure; it is an attempt to exhibit the hidden handiwork of God, and its presence in such a personal epistle, is surely evidence of the inspiration of God that turns Paul's personal witness into Holy Scripture.

The opening member of this section (ii. 15-20), is the account of Paul's personal testimony which he made when withstanding Peter, a testimony which he made "before them all" (Gal. ii. 14). In it he challenges all who had made a profession of faith, and entered into the free grace of the gospel. In it he defines his terms, and is so careful that justification by faith should be understood as "not by works of law" but by "faith of Jesus Christ", that verse sixteen upon its first reading seems to contain a great deal of repetition. He condemns both Peter's defection and withdrawal at Antioch and denies by implication that during his gospel witness he himself had ever "built again the things which he destroyed". Then with characteristic directness he leaves all lesser argument, and meets all objectors with the one glorious fact, that Salvation is not merely a change of opinion, it is a matter of death and newness of life. So far as Paul was concerned the law was dead to him, and he to the law. The crucifixion of Christ, explained later in iii. 13, to have accomplished redemption from the curse of the law, was his one all-sufficient answer "I have been crucified with Christ". What place can legal works, ceremonial rites, holy days and other observances of the flesh have with one so cut off, so completely buried, so gloriously translated? We feel it will be unwise to add to this article a further structure, and so, commending this analysis to all readers, we prepare to take up the apostle's defence (ii. 15-20) in our next article.

In Adam.

No.1. The Problem Stated.
pp. 14 - 17

In a series of articles entitled “The Seed” we have attempted to show that from the beginning, and against all the opposition of the enemy, God has pursued His great purpose, a purpose which, while it comprehends more, must comprehend at least the election, preservation and ultimate glory of a chosen “seed”. While the demonstration of this aspect of the mighty purpose of the ages clarifies some erstwhile difficult passages, it reveals further and deeper problems, and while it will never be given to anyone on this side of glory “to know even as he is known” we do nevertheless believe that Scripture has been given to reveal the mind of God, even though the nature of the subject revealed, and the limitations of those addressed, render many a passage difficult of apprehension, as though seen “in a glass darkly”.

We now approach this purpose from another, yet related, angle and throw the subject before us in the form of a question. “Why was the church, which was chosen IN CHRIST before the foundation of the world not created spiritual and placed immediately into its heavenly inheritance? Why was it necessary for every member to enter into life IN ADAM?

The problem can be visualized thus:

THE PURPOSE

A | In Christ.
B | Spiritual blessings.
C | Heavenly places.
D | Far above all principality.

THE PROCESS

A | In Adam.
B | Not spiritual but natural.
C | Of the Earth, earthy.
D | Lower than the angels.

We have purposely limited our enquiry to a select company, the Church of the One Body. If we extend our enquiry to comprehend the number that do not appear to have been the subjects of Divine grace at all, the problem becomes so vast and the issues so great, that there is every likelihood that we should fail to accomplish anything satisfactory. While readily admitting this vast outer ring, it will simplify the present quest, if we concentrate on the known few, rather than the unknown many. The company we have before us therefore is the Church of the Mystery. They are a unique company both in regard to the parenthetical nature of the dispensation under which they have been called, and the sphere and character of their blessings. These are particularly related to one feature, with which we are concerned at the moment, the period of their election by God.

"According as He hath chosen us in Him before the foundation of the world" (Eph. i. 4).

The word "according" links the distinctive sphere of blessing "in heavenly places" with the distinctive period "before the foundation of the world". For our present purpose we assume that the reader already accepts the translation "before the overthrow of the world"—those to whom such a rendering is either new or objectionable are referred to article No.10 of the series on Ephesians, in The Berean Expositor Volume XXXVI, p.61.

At the moment we assume that no reader has any difficulty in believing that heavenly places is the destined sphere of blessing for this company, and that they were chosen before Gen. i. 2. The difficulty arises out of the fact that even though this company were thus chosen in Christ they come into conscious existence in Adam, and it is with the hope that the reason for this will be evinced that the present series is undertaken.

The chronology of the Bible commences, not with "the beginning" but with the creation of Adam. Yet Adam appeared on the earth less than six thousand years ago (see series entitled "Time and Place"). The period that intervened between the choice of the church and the creation of Adam cannot be computed. We cannot speak of the enormous length of time that intervenes in thousands or even millions of years, we must speak of geological ages. One has but to consider the formation of the coal seams, the building up of a chalk cliff, the evidence of igneous and sedimentary rocks, the provision of oil, and the record of fossils, to realize that the period is so immense as to pass beyond the bounds of human comprehension. If God chose the members of the church and destined them for a super-heavenly inheritance IN CHRIST, why did he wait all these ages and bring them into existence IN ADAM? (who was not "spiritual"—I Cor. xv. 46-50). Why did He not create the church at the time of its election, or place these elect members straight away in possession of their inheritance? There must be a reason, what is it? Before we can proceed, we must divest the subject of one feature that if unremoved will clog the issue. The words "in Adam" are so related to sin and death, that we may forget that these are added complications that have come in after the creation of man, and that the words "in Adam" primarily refer to man as the head of the race, and as he left the hand of his Maker. This we must establish before we can go further.

Man was made in the image and in the likeness of God. This does not mean that the physical appearance of Adam had any relation to the appearance of God, for God is spirit, and is invisible. The "image' seen by Nebuchadnezzar in a dream symbolized the whole course of Gentile dominion, but neither Nebuchadnezzar, Daniel nor the reader believes the Gentile dominion is "like" an image in appearance. Adam set forth as a "shadow" (Hebrew tselem) the glory of his Creator. Adam was "a figure of Him that was to come" (Rom. v. 14). Man was "made upright" (Eccles. vii. 29), he subsequently "sought out many inventions" but these we leave for the moment. Man was made at the beginning

"a living soul", was "of the earth, earthy", was "not spiritual", and possessing a nature of "flesh and blood" could not, even when unfallen, "inherit the kingdom of God" (I Cor. xv.). Moreover, Adam unfallen was but a type. The true Adam was Christ.

> "The first man Adam was made a living soul; the last Adam was made a quickening spirit. Howbeit that was not first which is spiritual, but that which is natural: and afterwards that which is spiritual. The first man is of the earth earthy: the second man is the Lord from heaven . . . . . now this I say brethren, that flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God" (I Cor. xv. 45-50).

We purposely refrain therefore from including in the present exhibition of our problem the added conditions of sin and death that are also involved. These will come later. We have big enough problem before us without added complications.

Before man was created there was an order of spirit beings, of varied ranks, Angels, Principalities and Powers, some of whom, when the foundations of the earth were laid "sang together" and "shouted for joy" (Job xxxviii. 7). It was therefore not outside the realm of possibility for God to have created another company of spiritual beings, and placed them directly and without further ado "in heavenly places". Should it be objected that God did not choose angels for this high honour, we reply, that is true, and we do not suggest that the church could be or should be but another order of angels. What we do ask is why, seeing that they were chosen to "spiritual" blessings in "heavenly" places, were they nevertheless brought into being as "natural" and "earthy" creatures? What purposes did the long wait and the entry of Adam serve? For the answer to this and the statement of further allied problems, we must await the unfolding of the Scriptures in the succeeding articles of this series.

No.2. "Strangers in a land not theirs."
pp. 28 - 31

We have expressed in a few words a part of the problem that the words "in Adam" introduce, and we now look to the Scriptures to provide an answer, if the provision of an answer should be in conformity with the will of God. If, on the other hand, the reason why the church having been chosen in Christ before the overthrow of the world must come into conscious existence in Adam, only to be "changed" or "translated" later should be a secret which God does not intend to explain, then we shall abide by this decision, resting satisfied in the adequacy of Divine wisdom and the sovereignty of the Divine will.

In this article we are leaving the question of Adam and the church, for the smaller yet concentric question of Abraham and Israel. In many things, the story of Israel portrays the wider story of man; and where we may not be able to grasp unaided the great sweep of the purpose of the ages, we may be able to learn by type and symbol, what the record of Israel sets forth in the Scriptures. We come therefore to Abraham, and the promise to him of a seed and a land, and we shall discover that here, as with the church, the line taken is not a straight one, not the shortest way, in fact the Lord says that even though the way which He led Israel was "a right way" (Psa. cvii. 7) it was nevertheless "roundabout" (Exod. xiii. 18). We can be sure before we examine the matter further, that however "roundabout" the pathway of the Divine purpose, we know that it will be "right". Just as the church was unconditionally chosen in Christ, so Israel were unconditionally chosen in Abraham. One has but to read Rom. ix.-xi. to realize that the purpose of election deals with those "not yet born, neither having done any good or evil", so that the two callings stand parallel at the beginning. Gen. xii. contains the unconditional promise of a land and a seed:

> "Unto thy seed will I give this land" (Gen. xii. 7).

Let us pause for a moment to get this question of seed and land associated. The "seed" at the time of promise was future, the land was already in existence and already inhabited.

> "And Abram passed through the land unto the place of Sichem, unto the plain of Moreh. And the Canaanite was then in the land" (Gen. xii. 6).

It is following this statement that we read of the promise of seed and land to Abraham. When the promise of a seed and land was more specifically promised, Abraham asked of the Lord:

> "Whereby shall I know that I shall inherit it?" (Gen. xv. 8).

The answer given is so full of light upon the problem before us, that we must spare no pains to understand it. Coming straight to the heart of the matter, before examining the accompanying details, the great problem before us, finds an echo. Abraham asks for some assurance concerning the seed and the land. The answer is "Thy seed shall be a STRANGER in a land NOT THIERS" (Gen. xv. 13). Strange assurance! strange answer! Abraham enquires about a land promised to him and his seed, and God speaks of this seed being strangers in a land not theirs. Further, the chosen seed are to be in servitude, and the people of the land "not theirs" shall afflict them, the whole length of the period dating from the vision granted to Abraham in Gen. xii. was to be four hundred years. Then, when that term was reached, this same chosen seed should "come hither again" (Gen. xv. 16). Here then is a parallel with the church chosen in Christ yet found in Adam. Instead of God saying to Abraham "I have given you this land, stake out your claim, build up a family, and as the chosen seed come into life, they too can settle straight away in this land of promise, never to suffer, never to know alienation or distress", the chosen seed, for no sin or misdeeds of their own, are born IN EGYPT and then after a sojourn characterized by "bitterness" and "burdens" are brought back to the self same land in which Abraham received the promise! A ray of light, however, is found in Gen. xv., even though its very illumination reveals further and deeper problems. There was a reason for the long delay, there was a sin that awaited a reckoning, even though that sin was another's and not the sin of Israel.

> "But in the fourth generation they shall come hither again: for the iniquity of the Amorites is not yet full" (Gen. xv. 16).

The emphasis on the number four is evidently intentional. "Four hundred years", "Fourth generation", and both were literally fulfilled. In Exod. xii. 40, 41 at the coming out of Egypt, we read:

> "Now the sojourning of the children of Israel, who dwelt in Egypt was four hundred and thirty years. And it came to pass at the end of the four hundred and thirty years, even the self same day it came to pass, that all the hosts of the Lord went out from the land of Egypt."

The reader, who is conscious of the apparent discrepancy between the "four hundred years" of Gen. xv. and the "four hundred and thirty years" of the present passage, will also be aware that the record appears to be a fulfillment, by reason of the words "the self same day". The LXX version and the Samaritan version insert the words "and in the land of Canaan", reading:

> "The sojourn of the children of Israel who sojourned in Egypt and in the land of Canaan was 430 years," which interpretation was accepted by Stephen (Acts vii. 6) and by the apostle Paul (Gal. iii. 17). Thus we get 30 years to the weaning of Isaac, when he became "heir" and Ishmael was cast out. Then 185 years unto the going down of Jacob to Egypt, followed by the 215 years affliction, deliverance and the giving of the law, making 430 years all told. This question is incidental to our main enquiry, a fuller examination will be found in the series entitled "Time and Place". This still leaves the insistence on the number "four" untouched.

The iniquity that was the cause of this interval of four hundred years was the iniquity of the Amorite. The Amorite was a tribe descendant from Canaan, the fourth son of Ham, and they, together with other Canaanitish peoples, were in possession of the promised land. Both Sihon and Og were kings of the Amorites, which link the Amorites with the giants whose stature so terrified the children of Israel. Jacob appears to have anticipated the ultimate triumph of his seed, for he bequeathed to Joseph one portion above his brethren, which he had taken out of the hand of the Amorite with the sword and bow (Gen. xlviii. 22). The word "portion" is the Hebrew shechem translated in the LXX Sychar, and referred to in John iv. 5:

> "Then cometh He to a city of Samaria which is called Sychar, near to the parcel of ground that Jacob gave his son Joseph."

This was a pledge or earnest of the ultimate possession of the whole land, parallel to the earnest and pledge given the church until the redemption of the purchased possession (Eph. i. 13, 14). Whether this parcel of land is the same that Abraham and Jacob had bought in Shechem (Gen. xxiii. 17, 18; xxxiii. 18, 19) we cannot now be sure. The type remains however, and for our present enquiry it is enough. The chief feature of interest to us is that it was "taken out of the hand of the Amorite", a token and forecast of the day when there shall be no more Canaanite in the land. For us, this passage has deep significance by reason of the fact that the Canaanite is an O.T. type of those spiritual wickednesses that antagonize the Church of the Mystery, and apparently dispute their right to access to “heavenly places” even as Og king of Bashan and Sihon the Amorite disputed the right of Israel.

Summary judgment is not the character of God’s dealings until the time of the end. He waits. The expression “not yet full” suggests that there is a line beyond which iniquity, be it that of angel, devil or man cannot pass, and moreover, that until a certain bound is reached, God will wait and His people may have to wait too. The light we receive from this passage in Gen. xv. illuminates the wider problem of the ages, and for the sake of the truth, we will attempt to summarize it as follows:

Abraham in this connexion stands in relation to Israel, as Christ stands to His Church. To both Abraham and Christ as heads of these two companies, a promise is made which is unconditional and for the fulfillment of which God Himself stands pledged. The call of Abraham cannot be disassociated from the presence of the Canaanite and the land of promise, even as the choice of the church in Christ cannot be disassociated from the fact that the heavenly places in which their lot is cast, were at the time of God’s choice, either still occupied, or only just evacuated by the spiritual “Amorite”, the principalities and powers who fell and who are under the headship of the prince of the power of the air. The descent of Israel into Egypt only to be delivered and to return to the same place in which the promise was confirmed to Abraham, is parallel with the descent of the chosen members of the church in Adam, who must eventually be delivered and translated before they can inherit the promise made before the overthrow of the world. Just as Israel were debarred from their inheritance for four hundred years, because the iniquity of the Amorite was not yet full, so the church has been debarred its inheritance for a much longer period because the iniquity of the spiritual Amorite is not yet full.

We have yet to discover whether there may be other and richer reasons for this position “in Adam” before the day of glory, and in addition we must take into account the added complication brought about by the fact that Adam was not only by nature “natural” and “earthy” but in addition involved his seed in both sin and death. These features however we reserve for another article.

No.3. A re-translation of the words "Upon Muth-labben", as a preface to the study of Psa. viii. and Heb. ii.
pp. 68 - 71

The present article will be found in The Berean Expositor for May, 1951 (under the title "The Secrets of the Son") (be-xxxvi Secrets of the Son), as at that time there seemed little hope that the present series could be published for several years to come. The subject is of great importance, and its inclusion as an integral part of this series seems necessary both for the completion of these studies and that new readers may have the benefit of the translation there given. We are sure that our readers will not look upon this as a piece of "vain repetition".

We have seen that the purpose of the ages as it pertains both to the church of the mystery, and to the people of Israel, follows a similar pattern. Both make a strange descent from which both must be delivered and transferred before the goal can be reached. While such a correspondence encourages us in our search, it does not answer the question "why?" Why should it have been necessary for those destined to inherit heavenly places, to come into life through him who is described as "earthy"? Why should it have been necessary, for those destined to enjoy all spiritual blessings, to come into life through him who was "natural" and not "spiritual"? If "flesh and blood" CANNOT inherit the kingdom of God, why were the heirs of glory ever "flesh and blood"? If all our hopes are centred in the second Man the Lord from heaven, why make us a part of the first man, who was but a shadow of Him that was to come? For the moment we take notice of that which presses itself upon us at every turn, namely the fact that the heirs of glory not only are associated with Adam and his creature frailty, but that Adam by his sin and disobedience has involved them all in death. This added disability demands added deliverance and will be considered in its place. For the moment we are considering the Divine programme, apart from the fall of man. We cannot read far on in this matter before coming either to the eighth Psalm itself, or to references and comments on it in the New Testament. As we shall be obliged to refer to its teaching as we proceed, let us give Psalm viii. and its N.T. quotations a study now.

First, let us acquaint ourselves with the Psalm as we find it in the Old Testament. Those readers who use "The Companion Bible" know that the Psalms are distributed into five books, each book ending with a benediction and a double Amen, e.g. xli., lxxii., lxxxix., cvi. and cl. These five books corresponds to the five books of the law, thus:

Genesis, Ps. i.-xli. This book concerns Man and Promised Deliverer.
Exodus, Ps. xlii.-lxii. This book concerns Israel and redemption and kingdom.
Leviticus, Ps. lxxiii.-lxxxix. This book concerns the sanctuary.
Numbers, Ps. xc.-cvi. This book concerns the Wilderness and the Overcomer.
Deuteronomy, Ps. cvii.-cl. This book is the book of the "Second Time" in which "He sent His word and healed them".

It is beyond our present purpose to attempt an analysis of the Psalms, we are at the moment concerned with one Psalm, namely the eighth. Readers of The Berean Expositor who have read the series "Less than the least", will know the high place both of esteem and affection that Dr. Bullinger must ever occupy in the mind of the present writer. He was partly responsible for some of the items that appear in "The Companion Bible", and any criticism of that colossal work is only expressed in the interest of the Truth, for which Dr. Bullinger himself lived and died. We have elsewhere said, that where we may differ at any time from the conclusion of this beloved teacher, we are at that very moment most in agreement with the spirit of his work. He was a true Berean and never wished any reader to be a "follower", but a "fellow" searcher of the Word.

The point at issue is the true place and true meaning of the words that appear in the title of Psalm ix., namely, "To the chief Musician upon Muth-labben". It was the considered opinion of Dr. Bullinger that the words Muth-labben should be translated "Death of the champion", and refer to Goliath. The reasons for this are set out both in the notes beside the title in the Psalm, and also in Appendix 65. As our research has led us to a different conclusion we will ask the readers' patience while we present the materials out of which this new rendering has grown. We will subdivide our material under a series of sub-headings in order to avoid confusion.

(1) The place that the words upon Muth-labben occupy.

The ordinary reader may express some surprise at this heading, for his Bible, whether he read the A.V. or the R.V. places it at the head of Psalm ix. We believe, however, that many of our readers (who evidently are not "ordinary readers"!) are already in possession of the findings of Dr. J. W. Thirtle, of which the following is a summary: He observed that in the third chapter of Habakkuk and Isa. xxxviii. 9-20, we have two complete Psalms. The Psalm falls under three heads: (1) The Superscription; (2) The Psalm itself; (3) The Subscription thus:

> A Prayer of Habakkuk the prophet upon Shigionoth (Hab. iii. 1).
> The Psalm proper (iii. 2-19).
> To the chief singer on my stringed instrument (Neginoth) (iii. 19).

Applying this principle to the book of Psalms, we find that Psalm iii. has a superscription, but that the words of Hab. iii. 19, instead of being used as a subscription to the Psalm, is transferred as a title of Psalm iv. These titles and subtitles are all restored to their true place in the "Companion Bible", Psalm viii, reading:

> A Psalm of David.
> The Psalm itself (verses 1-9).
> To the Chief Musician upon Muth-labben.

The words Upon Muth-labben being the subscription of Psalm viii., not superscription of Psalm ix.

(2) The meaning of the words of the subscription upon Muth-labben.

The reader may not be conscious as he reads the words "upon Muth-labben" that it is already assumed without proof that the word "upon" is of necessity a true translation of the Hebrew word employed. Al standing alone is often translated "upon", but until we are sure that these two letters do stand alone, we are prejudicing the reader from the start. It seems that the Septuagint translators knew that AlMuth-labben came at the end of Psalm viii., for the word eis to telos "unto the end" are inserted. If the reader consults Young's "Analytical Concordance", he will find that the words Muth-labben are not translated "death of the champion" but "death of Ben, or of the Son". Again, if he looks for the word labben in the "Englishman's Hebrew and Chaldee Lexicon", he will not find it, but he will find the term under the heading ben "Son". We cannot therefore endorse the statement that there is nothing about a "son" in either Psalm viii. or ix., for most readers will know that the word ben "son" occurs in Psalm viii. Neither is it true that all are agreed that muth can only mean "death" for the LXX does not so translate the word, and these translators were nearer to the times of David than we are by over two thousand years. What the LXX saw in the words AlMuth-Labben is made evident by their rendering huper ton kruphion ton huion "concerning the secrets of the Son". There is another Psalm where the LXX uses these words huper ton kruphion "concerning the secrets" and that is at the foot of Psalm xlv., where the A.V. reads "Upon Alamoth". Do these words strike any chord in the reader's mind? Remembering that originally there was no division made between words, as now, so let us put in English letters, the two subscriptions to these two Psalms.

The Subscription to Psalm viii. reads ALMUTHLBN.
The Subscription to Psalm xlv. reads ALALMUTH.

And in both the Septuagint sees the word "secret". How is this? Al Alamoth is considered to mean "relating to the maidens", the word almah being the Hebrew for a maiden.

At the close of Psalm xlviii., we have the words "unto death" which in the Hebrew reads ALMUTH, but which this translation divides into two, al "unto" muth "death". The LXX however considered it to be one word almuth, translating it eis ton aionas "for ever", or "unto the ages". The structure of Psalm xlviii., (see "Companion Bible") places this passage in correspondence with verse 8. Here is another instance where the word almuth "secrets" has been wrongly divided to read Al muth, "unto death". How does it comes about that the word almuth can mean either "maiden" or "secret" or "for ever"? The Hebrew root ALM means to hide or conceal, and gives us "secret" (Psa. xc. 8), "hide" (Psa. x. 1) and in the East in old time, a maiden, damsel or virgin, or youth, was called almah because of the concealed and retired state of the unmarried of both sexes. "The virgins shut up in chambers" is an expression found in the Apocrypha. From this same root comes the word translated "age" and "ever", being a period of time, whose end or duration is hidden from view. It will be seen therefore that the rendering "concerning the secrets of the Son" given by the LXX two centuries before Christ, has much in its favour.

(3) The internal evidence of Psalms viii. and xlv.

At first there does not appear to be any distinctive feature common to both Psalms, until we realize the way in which they are quoted in the epistle to the Hebrews.

Hebrews i. & ii.

A | i. 1, 2. God spoke once by the prophets. Now by His Son.
B | i. 2-14. The Son. His glories. Better than angels.

Quotation from Psalm xlv.
"Thy throne, O God, is for ever and ever."

A | ii. 1-4. God spoke once by angels. Now by the Lord.
B | ii. 5-18. The Son. His sufferings. Lower than angels.

Quotation from Psalm viii.
"What is man . . . . . or the Son of Man?"

With these evidences before us, we feel that the translations given "Death to the Champion" and "Concerning maidens" must give place to the ancient interpretation "The secrets of the Son" and "Concerning Secrets", and we can read with richer and fuller understanding both the Psalms themselves and the quotations from them in Heb. i. and ii., and realize better than ever the truth of the Apostle's claim to a fuller knowledge of the "Mystery of Christ" than had been granted to those who were before him.

No.4. Type and Antitype in Psa. viii.
pp. 87 - 91

In the preceding article (p.68) we discussed the subscription of Psa. viii. "Upon Muth-labben" and came to the conclusion that the LXX translation "The secrets of the Son" is correct. With this as our guide we now turn to Psa. viii. and seek, by prayerful analysis to discover, if the Lord will, some of the secrets that await the Berean searcher after truth. Whether we shall be successful time will show. Our desires are known and our prayers ascend to the God of Daniel, the Revealer of secrets. The eighth Psalm is quoted in Matt. xxi. 16, in Heb. ii. 6-8, in I Cor. xv. 27 and in Eph. i. It therefore appears to have something in common with the gospel of the kingdom, with the teaching of both Hebrews and I Corinthians as the nature and office of Christ as the last Adam, and with the high exaltation spoken of in the Epistle to the Ephesians. While these different portions of Scripture belong to different dispensations, they are united in their need of and glory in the Saviour of all men, whatever their calling may be. One quotation calls for consideration before we turn to the Psalm as a whole:

"Out of the mouths of babes and sucklings has Thou ordained strength."

The quotation given in Matt. xxi. 16 reads "Thou hast perfected praise". One way of dealing with this difference is to consider the words "ordained strength" to include a figure of speech known as metonymy, where "strength" is put for the praise due to it. A parallel to this is found in Psa. xxix. 1 "Give unto the Lord glory and strength". We can praise Him for these, we can ascribe them to Him, but we cannot "give" them. The words found in Matt. xxi., are taken from the LXX which reads katertiso aiono, which give sanction to the rendering of this ancient version. There is no difficulty in accepting katartizo "to perfect" as a translation of the Hebrew yasad, the difficulty is in reconciling the translation of the Hebrew oz "strength" with the Greek ainos "praise". Any attempt at reconstructing the possible Hebrew original is fraught with danger, first because of human frailty, and secondly because it opens a door for all sorts of excess. Bloomfield's comment seems sane and sufficient. In sentiment there is no discrepancy; the idea being, "Thou hast accomplished a grand effect by altogether puny means".

Before we attempt a view of the Psalm as a whole, one or two items of translation call for attention. The A.V. reads "Who hast set Thy glory above the heavens" whereas the R.V. reads "upon the heavens" with "above" in the margin. Al the preposition, has a wide extent of meaning, answering to the Greek epi "upon", ana "above" and huper, Latin super "over". In some instance al has the significance of surpassing or going beyond. The root from which this preposition derives is alah "to go up" as in Psa. xcvii. 9 "exalted far above all gods". The LXX reads huperano ton ouranon, which only differs from the terms used in Eph. iv. 10 in that the Apostle adds the word panton "all". Huperano is used in Eph. i. 21 "far above all". There is therefore every reason to retain the A.V. "above the heavens". It is the first of the "secrets of the Son" (almuth labben) that His glory should be associated with the sphere which is "far above all heavens". The glory of the Lord is said to be "set" above the heavens. Now while the Hebrew word Nathan is translated "set" a number of times, Psa. viii. 1 is the only occasion where this translation is found in the Psalms. Nathan means to give, but when it is followed by al and the like, it means to put, place, set or appoint. For example:

> "And God set them in the firmament" (Gen. i. 17).
> "I do set My bow in the cloud" (Gen. ix. 13).

While we cannot import into this passage of Psa. viii., the word "give" we must allow the idea to pervade, and remember that in direct association with the huperano "far above all" position of Eph. i. 21 Christ is said to have been "given" as Head of the Church which is His body. Psa. viii. 1 therefore looks beyond the firmament to the heaven of heavens (Psa. cxlviii. 4). This therefore is one of "the secrets of the Son". Three other Psalms seem to rank with Psa. viii. as emphasizing the same truth, namely Psalms lvii., cviii. and cxiii. Psa. lvii. belongs to the second book of the Psalms and speaks of Redemption. Psalms cviii. and cxiii. to the book of final deliverance.

> "Be thou exalted, O God, above the heavens; > Let Thy glory be above all the earth" (Psa. lvii. 5, 11; cviii. 5).
> "The Lord is high above all nations,
> And His glory above the heavens" (Psa. cxiii. 4).

The secrets of the Son, include His condescension, His stooping down to the level of man. "What is man that Thou art mindful of him?" Something of this same truth is found in Psa. cxiii., where, after contemplating the high glory of the Lord, the Psalmist speaks in adoration of the condescension of this same highly exalted One, saying:

> "The Lord is above all nations, and His glory above the heavens. Who is like unto the Lord our God, Who dwelleth on high, Who humbleth Himself to behold the things that are in heaven and in the earth: He raiseth up the poor out of the dust, and lifteth the needy out of the dunghill. That He may set him with princes" (Psa. cxiii. 4-8).
>
> "He humbled Himself" (Phil. ii. 8), "He hath raised us up together, and made us sit together in heavenly places" (Eph. ii. 6).

Returning to Psa. viii., we observe that the condescension of the Lord is manifest in the choice of "babes and suckling" in perfecting His praise, and that for an explicit reason:

> "That Thou mightest still the enemy and the avenger."

Who is this enemy and avenger? This enemy and avenger is mentioned again in Psalm xliv. 16, and if we turn to I Cor. xv., where Psa. viii. is quoted by the Apostle, we shall read:

> "For He must reign till He hath put all enemies under His feet, The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death" (I Cor. xv. 25, 26).

Or, again, if we turn to Heb. ii. where the Apostle quotes Psa. viii., we read:

> "Forasmuch as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, He also Himself likewise took part of the same: that through death He might destroy him that had the power of death, that is the devil; and deliver them who through fear of death were all their lifetime subject to bondage" (Heb. ii. 14, 15).

The enemy and avenger, moreover is not far to seek in Eph. i. and ii. Psa. viii. is once again quoted (Eph. i. 22) and he is called "the prince of the power of the air" in Eph. ii. 2. Further light is found by realizing that the word "still" in the phrase "still the enemy and the avenger" is the Hebrew shabath "to cause to keep sabbath". The word is found in the first place in Gen. ii. 2, 3. It is used in the sense of causing something to cease in such passages as:

> "I will cause the arrogancy of the proud to cease" (Isa. xiii. 11).
> "How hath the oppressor ceased?" (Isa. xiv. 4).
> "He maketh wars to cease" (Psa. xlvi. 9).

The epistle to the Hebrews declares:

> "There remaineth therefore a rest (sabbatismos a keeping of sabbath) to the people of God" (Heb. iv. 9).

When the Psalmist contemplated the heavens, he exclaimed:

> "What is man that Thou art mindful of him? or the son of man that Thou visitest him?" (Psa. viii. 4).

The man of science to-day, after contemplating the heavens, and computing the distance of the stars in the light years, answers the question "what is man?" by referring to the earth as a whirling speck of dust in the immensity of the universe.

> "The tendency of verses 3 and 4, as commonly quoted, is to crush man; to make him feel his nothingness in the presence of the numberless orbs revealed by astronomy" (W. Kay, D.D.).

The reverse is the teaching of Psa. viii. The word "mindful" is the Hebrew zakar "to remember" and it is used many times in connection with covenant relationships:

> "And God remembered Noah—Abraham—His covenant" (Gen. viii. 1; xix. 29; Exod. ii. 24).

Or as in Psa. ciii. 14 "He remembereth that we are dust". In like manner "visit" is often employed. The Hebrew word is paqad. "The Lord visited Sarah"; "I have surely visited you"; "God will surely visit you". Once it is translated "avenge" "I will avenge the blood of Jezreel" (Hos. i. 4) and so this remembering and visiting has to do not only with the performance of covenant promises but with stilling the enemy and avenger. As Heb. ii. 14, 15 indicates, Christ is both Destroyer and Deliverer.

Continuing the reply to the question "What is man?" the Psalmist said:

> "For Thou hast made him a little lower than the angels, and hast crowned him with glory and honour" (Psa. viii. 5).

The word translated "angels" is elohim. Had we only the O.T. before us, we might feel that it was necessary to translate Psa. viii. 5 "Thou hast made him a little lower than God (or gods)" but the N.T. has endorsed the LXX rendering "angels" and that is, to us, final. "To make lower" is literally "to make to lack". Chaser, the Hebrew word here translated "to make lower" occurs twenty-one times, and is only translated "lower" once. It is rendered "lack"; "have lack"; "be abated"; "decrease"; "fail" and "want". The corresponding Greek word elattoo, means "to decrease", as in John iii. 30 "He must increase, but I must decrease". Elattoneo is translated "to have lack" (II Cor. viii. 15), and elasson is translated "less", "under", "younger" and "that which is worse" (Heb. vii. 7; Rom. ix. 12). The relationship of man to angels indicated by this term is illustrated by the attitude of John the Baptist to the Saviour. Immediately following the words "I must decrease" we read, as an expansion of the idea: "He that cometh from above is above all; he that is of the earth is earthly, and speaking of the earth: He that cometh from above is above all" (John iii. 31). While the words used are not the same, we are forcibly reminded of I Cor. xv. again, where we read:

> "The first man is of the earth, earthy, the second Man is the Lord from heaven."

The comparison here is not between Adam and angel, as in Psa. viii., but between Adam and the Lord. Although man was created a little lower than the angels, he is signally honoured in that he was made in the image of God, a statement never used of angels. He was also "crowned", Hebrew atar, used of the crown of a king (II Sam. xii. 30). The idea however is extended beyond that of an actual king, we read of crowning of the year with goodness and crowning with lovingkindness. Adam was crowned with "glory and honour". The word translated "honour" is the Hebrew hadar, which in the feminine form is rendered "beauty" in the phrase "the beauty of holiness" (Psa. xxix. 2; xcvi. 9). The clothing of Aaron the High Priest was "for glory and beauty" (Exod. xxviii. 2), and while a different word is here translated "beauty" this also is associated with the sanctuary (II Chron. iii. 6; Psa. xcvi. 6, see verse 9 quoted above). When the Saviour was transfigured, Peter tells us He received from the Father "honour and glory", the LXX of Psa. viii. 5 using the Greek words doxe kai time, the passage in II Pet. i. 17 using the Greek words timen kai doxan. This, said the Apostle, made the prophetic word more sure. It appears therefore that Adam at his creation was in the capacity of a king-priest, an office held by Melchisedec but finally and only to be held by Christ, the Son of God. Here is yet another of the "secrets of the Son" to which the subscription Almuthlabben directs our attention. At this point in Psa. viii., the type Adam is separated from the antitype Christ. Adam had "all things put under his feet" but the "all things" are limited to sheep, oxen, beast of the field, fowl of the air, fish of the sea, and whatsoever passeth through the paths of the sea—a dominion as universal as the living creatures that share the earth with man.

The "forces of nature" were not entrusted to Adam. He was tempted to extend his dominion beyond its legitimate sphere, and before the time appointed—but this is another story and must be treated separately. The quotation in Heb. ii., I Cor. xv. and Eph. i. repeat the fact that "all things were put under His feet", but instead of "sheep and oxen" we there read of principality and power, throne and dominion, indeed a universal subjection, with one extraordinary exception—namely the Father Himself!

We commend therefore to every student capable of conducting the investigation the Septuagint translation of al muth labben "THE SECRETS OF THE SON" for the Mystery of Christ, is a necessary prelude to the dispensation of the mystery itself as Eph. iii. 1 will make clear.

No.5. Adam, and the Mystery of Christ.
pp. 109, 110

We have seen in our previous study, that the eighth Psalm is concerned with "The secrets of the Son", and we therefore compare its teaching with the exposition and development of "the Mystery of Christ" as set forth in the epistles of Paul, THE steward of the mysteries or secrets of the New Testament.

(1) "O LORD our Lord." Here two Divine titles are used, namely "Jehovah" and "Adonai". These are employed in Psa. cx. 1 "The LORD said unto my Lord" which fact the Saviour Himself referred to, to substantiate His claim to deity as we see in Matt. xxii. 41-46. Further, just as we have seen Psalms viii. and xlv. are quoted in Heb. i. and ii., so we read in Psa. cx. "The LORD said unto my Lord, Sit Thou at My right hand, until I make Thine enemies Thy footstool", a passage also quoted in Heb. i. concerning "The Son"; and incidentally providing another means of identifying "The enemy and the avenger" of Psa. viii. It is manifest that Psa. viii., not only looks back to the first Adam but forward to the second man, the last Adam, and so provides a basis for the mystery of godliness, namely that God was manifest in the flesh (I Tim. iii. 16), another aspect of "The secret of the Son".

(2) Another facet of this great mystery is the twofold excellency of His name and glory "in all the earth", "above the heavens". This, too, we shall find is enlarged upon by Paul in Eph. iv.

(3) The reference to "babes and sucklings" suggests that we are in the presence of one of the mysteries of the Scriptures, for this passage is quoted in Matt. xxi. 16, the babes and sucklings recognizing the Son of David, the leaders of the people being blind. There is also a particular reference in Matt. xi. 25, where in the consciousness of His rejection by Israel, the Son of God said "I thank Thee, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth, because Thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent, and hast revealed them unto babes". In more than one epistle the Apostle has echoed this truth in reference to the mysteries and secrets of the Scripture.

(4) "What is man that Thou art mindful of him? and the son of man, that Thou visitest him?" Here the stoop from heaven's highest glory to man's lowly estate is indicated—a blessed aspect of "The Secrets of the Son".

(5) The twofold relationship of the Saviour with the Angels, "a little lower" in Heb. ii., "above" in Heb. i., is suggested here in Psa. viii.

(6) "Thou hast put all things under His feet." This, as we have observed is interpreted by the Apostle in I Cor. xv., Heb. ii. and Eph. i., of the universal sovereignty of the ascended Christ.

As a proof that he had received by revelation THE MYSTERY, the apostle Paul drew attention to his knowledge in the associated "Mystery of Christ" (Eph. iii. 4). This mystery had been the theme of many an O.T passage, but reached its zenith in the revelation made to and through Paul. The double exaltation "in the earth" and "above the heavens" is expounded by Paul in Eph. iv. 9, 10 "Now that He ascended, what is it but that He also descended first into the lower parts of the earth. He that descended is the same also that ascended up far above all heavens, that He might fill all things".

We have long seen and taught that the mystery of Rom. xvi. 25-27 looks to the inner teaching of Romans, namely v. 12 - viii. 39 where Adam is introduced, and with Psa. viii. before us we begin to see that the whole mystery of Christ looks back to Adam also. Here are some of the outstanding foreshadowings.

(a) The first man Adam, who was of the earth earthy, set forth in mystery or in type the second man, the last Adam Who was from heaven. Adam was "natural" or "soul-ish", Christ was a life giving spirit. The name Adam is reflected in the word likeness, which is the Hebrew demuth, the letters DM being common to both words, a feature not so obvious in English as it is in Hebrew. Christ is the image of the invisible God, and Adam was created in that image. In these features, the mystery of Christ most evidently looks back to Adam.

(b) The whole argument of Rom. v. 12-21 revolves around the fact that both Adam and Christ are Representative Heads of a seed. "The offence of ONE" and "ONE man's disobedience" is a foreshadowing of "the righteousness of ONE" and "the obedience of ONE", a truth which finds expression also in I Cor. xv., where we read "For since by man came death, by man came also the resurrection of the dead, for as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive", the image of the earthy being exchanged for the image of the heavenly.

(c) The promised seed of the woman finds its fulfillment in Christ and His seed, "The God of peace shall bruise Satan under your feet shortly" (Rom. xvi. 20).

The more therefore we can learn of the true position and purpose of Adam's creation, the more shall we enter into the "secrets of the Son" and "the mystery of Christ", and the more we appreciate the mystery of Christ, the better shall we be prepared to understand the mystery of the present dispensation. The fact that Adam sinned and involved all his seed in death, adds to the problem, but redemption, justification and forgiveness, blessed as they are, do not remove the initial disability of "flesh and blood" unfallen though it was at the beginning. Adam by creation, and apart from sin altogether could not inherit the kingdom of God (I Cor. xv. 50), and so the problem still remains—Why were the elect brought into existence "in Adam" even in unfallen Adam? That there must be an all sufficient reason the fact that God is "the only wise God" makes clear, but we must exercise further patience as we search the Scriptures and look to the Divine Author for fuller light.

No.6. The Primal Promise and the Incarnation.
pp. 130 - 133

Flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God. Yet God purposely placed every elect soul "in Adam", who was flesh and blood, a process that demanded that the elect should be ultimately transferred to Christ. Gen. xv. points to the same process, and the "pattern" of the ages, can be set out in the form of a letter V, a descent before the ascent and the goal.

The elect members of the Church of the One Body, are destined to enjoy "spiritual blessings in heavenly places" and to this, flesh and blood even when unfallen is by its very nature alien.

What do we know of spiritual beings? Very little. Angels and other ranks of the spiritual world break into the record of the Scriptures, they exhibit extraordinary powers, are apparently above the influence and reach of many of the "laws of nature", but very little positive teaching is discoverable in the Divine record. The earliest institution, appointed by the Divine will is that of marriage, and this is one thing that is foreign to the experience of angels.

> "This children of this world marry, and are given in marriage: but they which shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world . . . . . neither marry nor are given in marriage, neither can they die any more: for they are equal to the angels" (Luke xx. 34-36).

At the resurrection, the believer will receive a "spiritual body" (I Cor. xv. 44) and in this too he will be equal to the angels. Here then is an outstanding divergence. Man from the beginning was created with marriage as a normal experience. Angels as created are excluded from such an experience only by "keeping not their first estate" and by leaving "their own habitation" could any semblance of marriage be attained. The union of man and wife makes them "one flesh", and their children are called their "seed".

If it be true that marriage is unknown among spiritual beings, it follows that angels and principalities are all separately created beings. No angel is either the descendant of or parent of any other spiritual being. There can be no such unity among angels as is found among mankind. Home, family, parent, child, members of one body, all of one blood, these features which are essential characteristics of the human race, are all absent from the spirit world. We can and do use the word "race" of humanity, for it means "A class of individuals sprung from a common stock; the descendants collectively of a common ancestor". We cannot legitimately use the word "race" of angels, it has no meaning or place in the spirit world. It seems, therefore, to be an inevitable conclusion, that in the wisdom of God, it was imperative that those who were elected to be blessed with all spiritual blessings, should commence their term of conscious being "in Adam", even though they had been chosen "in Christ", and would have to be translated.

Before we proceed further, there is a question that demands an answer, "Is the title 'Christ' restricted to the Saviour to the period that follows His incarnation? can the title be used of Him, in His pre-incarnated glory, the glory that He had before the world was?" There are a number of expositors who unhesitatingly affirm, that the title "Christ" belongs only to the Saviour as the Man, Jesus, the Christ. It is well known that the word "Christ", the Greek Christos is the translation of the Hebrew Mashach, which is transliterated into English as the Messiah and means the anointed. This "anointing" was done with oil (Psa. lxxxix. 20) and it is this fact that gives the word Mashach its significance. There is another word that is translated anointed and that is the Hebrew suk, which in every one of its nine occurrences is rendered "anoint" in the A.V. A word derived from the same root is nasak, which occurs in Psa. ii. 6, "Yet have I set My King", where the margin reads Heb. "anointed". While this reveals the necessity to include nasak and mashach, it does not answer our question. There is, however, a passage which does:

> "The Lord possessed me in the beginning of His way; before His works of old. I was set up from everlasting, from the beginning, or ever the earth was . . . . . when He prepared the heavens I was there . . . . . then I was with Him, as One brought up with Him . . . . . rejoicing in the habitable part of His earth, and My delights were with the sons of men" (Prov. viii. 22-31).

Young's literal translation reads "From the age I was anointed". Here we are taken back "before the foundation of the world", and there we find One Who is called the "Anointed". When the church was chosen in Christ before the foundation of the world, "Christ" was there, "I was there" (Prov. viii. 27). This rids the mind of the necessity to await the incarnation of the Saviour for He Who was acclaimed "The Christ" here on earth, was "The Anointed" from the beginning. Yet, even though this illuminates one aspect of the mighty truth we are considering, it only makes the problem deeper. Why, seeing that Christ was "there" did the Lord wait geological ages for the advent of Adam? and why, seeing Christ was already "there" must He too in the fullness of time "come in the flesh"? We might at first be inclined to think that He only came in the flesh because man had sinned—but we have already seen that unfallen Adam was the figure of Him that was to come, and that the fact of sin and the need of redemption but adds to the problem without solving it. In Phil. ii. there is observable a twofold descent: the one reaching its goal when Christ became man, the other when He still further descended to "the death of the cross".

> "Who being in the form of God, thought it not robbery to be equal with God: but made Himself of no reputation, and took upon Him the form of a servant, and was made in the likeness of men."

This is the first stage.

> "And being found in fashion as a man, He humbled Himself, and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross" (Phil. ii. 6-8).

This is the second stage.

Christ in the first stage came to reveal the Father, in the second stage He came to redeem the church. But more, the goal before God is a Unity, expressed with such overwhelming fullness in the language of John xvii. 23.

On one occasion Paul wrote: "Now concerning virgins I have no commandment of the Lord: yet I give my judgment, as one that hath obtained mercy of the Lord to be faithful", and when the Apostle's judgment was given he concluded by saying:

> "She is happier if she so abide after my judgment: and I think also I have the spirit of God" (I Cor. vii. 25-40).

We have no Apostolic gift, but we too have obtained mercy to be faithful, and venture to express the opinion that follows, fully recognizing that for this we have no "commandment". With this understanding the reader is invited to ponder what is "my judgment" of a most wonderful subject, reserving the right to reject it or to modify it as light is given. Let us turn to the opening chapters of Genesis. The last verse of Gen. ii. says of Adam and his wife, that they were both naked but "not ashamed". No one so created by God and innocent of sin would have any sense of shame, this could only come as an accompaniment of guilt, and is written to prepare us for what follows in Gen. iii. The word "naked" is the translation of the Hebrew word arom, and the word "subtil" which immediately follows in Gen. iii. 1 is the Hebrew arum. The first meaning that Gesenius gives to arum is "to be naked", the second meaning "to be crafty". The reader should know that the only way of distinguishing the vowel "o" from the vowel "u" in the Hebrew is the position of a dot like a full-stop. If it be half-way up the sign for vav, the vowel is pronounced "u", if it stands at the top of the vav it is pronounced "o". Mark, it is a matter of pronunciation, not meaning that is here intended. Shorn of the vowel points, that were added later, the words "naked" of Gen. ii. 25 and "subtil" of iii. 1 are identical. It is not possible to know this, or to read the original Hebrew without immediately making a mental connexion between the two verses. Now whatever the actual transgression of Adam and his wife may have been, and however we interpret the "tree of knowledge of good and evil", one thing stands out prominent in the record, the immediate consequence was a sense of shame, not so much a sense of guilt, but a sense of shame connected with their nakedness.

> "And the eyes of them both were opened, and they knew that they were naked: and they sewed fig leaves together, and made themselves aprons."

When challenged by the Lord, Adam's immediate reply was: "I was afraid, because I was naked; and I hid myself" (Gen. iii. 7 and 10). When the doom was pronounced upon the man and his wife, a most unexpected turn is taken. Instead of receiving the death sentence, as Gen. ii. 17 would lead us to expect, child birth is referred to. First in the form of a prophetic promise:

> "I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed: it shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise his heel."

Secondly, in the form of a chastisement and continual reminder:

> "Unto the woman he said, I will greatly multiply thy sorrow and thy conception; in sorrow thou shalt bring forth children; and thy desire shall be to thy husband, and he shall rule over thee."

The sexes were never "equal" even at creation, as I Cor. xi. 3-9 and I Tim. ii. 13 will make clear. Now since the advent of sin and death, a further subordination of woman is instituted, echoed by the sweat and the toil that Adam now faced, as compared with the labour of love which occupied his unfallen energies in the Garden. The words: "Thy desire shall be to thy husband, and he shall rule over thee" (Gen. iii. 16) are repeated, with the necessary alterations of gender, in Gen. iv. 7:

> "If thou doest well, shalt thou not be accepted (margin have the excellency) and if not sin (or the sin offering) lieth at the door. And unto thee (margin subject unto thee iii. 16) shall be his desire, and thou shalt rule over him."

Cain, as the firstborn, had pre-eminence (see Col. i. 18), a position which he forfeited by sin. When Cain was born, Eve in naming him gives utterance to a strange expression:

"I have gotten a man from the Lord" (Gen. iv. 1).

"Gotten" is the translation of the Hebrew qanah, from which root the name "Cain" is derived. Some, with Luther, render this passage: "I have gotten a man, the Jehovah", referring to the promised seed of the woman. Subsequent events show that Eve was mistaken. Cain was not the promised seed, he was, rather "of that wicked one" the false seed (I John iii. 12). Nevertheless, Eve must have had good grounds for such an expectancy, even though the advent of the promised Seed did not take place until nearly 4000 years had passed.

With these facts before us, we suggest (speaking always after the manner of men, for God knew what He would do from the beginning) that the primal purpose was that the Incarnation should take place by virgin birth in the Garden of Eden itself, that Christ should be "made flesh" and tabernacle among men from the beginning. The intrusion of the Serpent, the temptation and fall of the first pair, opened a door for sowing of the false seed (Cain) and the murder of Abel foretold the agonizing conflict that ensure culminating in the shedding of the blood of Him, Whose blood speaketh better things than that of Abel. The virgin birth of the Son of God was postponed until nearly four thousand years had passed, but in the fullness of time, He was born of a woman, entering not into the full glory of the Incarnate Son, because the added complication of sin and death, necessitated a sacrifice and an offering to deliver the heirs of promise from their bondage. That being graciously accomplished, resurrection and change, provide the appointed way in which both the innate frailty of sinless "flesh and blood" and the inherited corruption consequent upon the fall, should be exchanged for immortality, incorruption, and likeness to His body of glory.

This is "my judgment" and I believe I can in good conscience say: "I think I also I have the mind of the Lord", even if I cannot say with Paul: "I think also that I have the spirit of God."

"My Cup Runneth Over"

No.3. Love that exceeds Knowledge.
pp. 39, 40

Before turning to Eph. iii., where we read of the Love of Christ that "passeth knowledge", a word or two may be necessary to show the link that exists between this love, and the great act of Redemption which this love exhibits. In previous articles we were pondering the abounding grace manifested in Redemption "Wherein He hath abounded toward us" (Eph. i. 8), and the grace that "superabounds" (Rom. v. 20).

The particle that indicates the superlative quality of this grace is found in the following passages, and the translation given by the Authorized Version will be quite sufficient to justify the translation of Rom. v. 20 by "superabound".

"Exalted above measure" (II Cor. xii. 7).
"Groweth exceedingly" (II Thess. i. 3).
"Go beyond" (I Thess. iv. 6).
"The glory that excelleth" (II Cor. iii. 10).
"A more excellent way" (I Cor. xii. 31).
"Running over" (Luke vi. 38).

We can therefore use the language of Psa. xxiii. and say "my cup runneth over" when we speak of redeeming grace.

In the first of Ephesians the object of the apostle is not so much to magnify redemption, which he has already done in Romans, but to lead on the mystery, which is the distinctive theme of Ephesians. Readers of both the Authorized and the Revised Versions may miss the apostle's argument unless they realize that the punctuation of Eph. i. 7-9 is of human origin and allow the sense of the passage full scope, the passage as it stands in the A.V. reads:

"Wherein He hath abounded toward us in all wisdom and prudence" (i. 8).

The word "abounded" suggests the prodigality of an over-running cup, "wisdom and prudence" suggest the care of stewardship for a priceless trust. If we will but ignore the verses and the punctuation of the versions, we shall get the apostle's meaning and be able to rejoice in the lavish outpouring of redeeming grace, together with the wise and prudent unfolding of the mystery as we are able to bear it.

Redemption. "In Whom we have redemption through His blood, the forgiveness of sins according to the riches of His grace, wherein He hath abounded toward us" (i. 7, 8).

Mystery. "In all wisdom and prudence having made known unto us the mystery of His will according to His good pleasure, which He hath purposed in Himself" (i. 8-9).

Here the subject is complete and one feature is intentionally compared with the other. This evident correspondence may be set out thus:

A | Redemption. | a The forgiveness of sins.
b According to riches of grace.
B | He abounded.
C | Us.
B | Wisdom and prudence.
A | Mystery. | a The mystery of His will.
b According to His good pleasure.
C | Himself.

Teaching may necessitate "here a little and there a little, line upon line and precept upon precept", but redeeming grace overflows and knows no reservation; "My cup runneth over".

No.4. Love that exceeds Knowledge.
pp. 79, 80

We pass from "grace abounding" the beginning of our salvation, to meditate upon another superlative that is associated with its goal and end.

For this we turn to Eph. iii. where the apostle balances the great chapters of doctrine (i.-iii.) with the corresponding chapters of practice (iv.-vi.), and bridges the interval by a prayer, a prayer which leads on and up until the believer reaches the very goal of the ages.

> "That ye might be filled with ("up to" in the sense of measure or capacity) all the fullness of God" (iii. 19).

To be able to follow intelligently, or in faith, the apostle in this prayer of Eph. iii. 14-21 demands at the very least a fairly comprehensive understanding of the revelation contained in the first three chapters, a revelation that can never be appreciated apart from what is known as "Dispensational Truth". The mystery in its uniqueness must be perceived, the entirely new ministry of Paul as the prisoner of Christ Jesus for us Gentiles must be accepted, and the new and high calling that seats the believer at the very right hand of God where Christ sitteth, must be believed and entered, before this great climax prayer can be endorsed or uttered. The reader to whom such things are strange, or but dimly seen, may feel tempted to turn away from such apparent spiritual pride, such high sounding claims, such Pharisaic separation; but there awaits us in this prayer a rebuke to any such overbearing presumption, for the very foundation upon which all our hopes ultimately rest is declared to be beyond our knowledge.

> "That ye being rooted and grounded in love, may be able to comprehend with all saints what is the breadth, and length, and depth and height, and to know the love of Christ which passeth knowledge" (iii. 18, 19).

We have "the root of the matter", we have been rooted and grounded in love, but the basis of it all, "the love of Christ" may for ever be beyond our full comprehension. Indeed, the intervening clause "comprehend with all saints" suggests that only as a company, a body, a complete fellowship, will any such "comprehension" be possible. We are seeking to know something, which we are already warned "passeth knowledge". This however, is an incentive not a deterrent. In human affairs, as we draw near to the close of an investigation, as our knowledge attains a measure of completeness, the early zest and eagerness of pursuit is likely to give place to slackness. The poet had seen this when he said:

> "If what stone afar so grand,
> Turn to nothing in thine hand.
> On again, the virtue lies,
> In the struggle, not the prize."

Our quotation is from memory and is possibly faulty, but it will suffice. We are however confident that the quest before the believer will never cloy, there will never be "satiation" although there will always be blessed "satisfaction".

"THE LOVE OF CHRIST WHICH PASSETH KNOWLEDGE."

It is this word "passeth" that leads us to include this subject among the superlatives of grace. In the original the word translated "passeth" is hyperballo. To speak in "hyperbolic" language is to use exaggerated terms. If these terms are justified, we have a strong and useful figure of speech, but if they are not, we are conscious of a careless untruthful exaggeration. A polite way of calling a man a liar is to say he is using hyperbolical language.

There is however in this third chapter nothing but sober truth. Those who know the love of Christ most are those who are the most ready to subscribe to the statement, "it exceeds knowledge". For this reason, it may be that I Cor. xiii. says:

> "Then shall we know, even as we are known . . . . . the greatest of these is love."

We are, however, concerned at the moment, not so much with the occupation or capacity of the saints IN GLORY, but with their encouragement to endure IN TROUBLE, and the consciousness that grace superabounds and that love exceeds all human knowledge will surely minister to those who have tasted that the Lord is gracious, and sustain them in their hour of trial.

"My cup runneth over."

No.5. Peace that passeth all understanding.
pp. 118, 119

We have seen the beginning (grace) and the end (glory) and have learned that the beginnings of our calling spring from superabounding grace, while glory is associated with love that exceeds knowledge. During the interval, we might perhaps assume, that superlatives would be conspicuous by their absence, that if we have but the assurance of "bread and water" we should be thankful. The children of Israel however, while in the wilderness did experience some of the superlatives of the Lord, even though the great miracle of the Red Sea was past and the equally great miracle of the River Jordan was yet to come. So, too, the believer to-day will discover that the waiting period is not wholly devoid of superabundance, he will be able to say, not once nor twice as he passes along life's journey "my cup runneth over".

The very fact that we need redemption implies the presence of sin and bondage. In the background of all the Lord's dealings, in grace, we shall discover an enemy at work, and enmity in action. Yet such is the grace that calls, and saves us, that even here in this life we may know Superlative Peace.

> "Let your moderation be known unto all men. The Lord is at hand. Be careful for nothing; but in everything by prayer and supplication with thanksgiving let your requests be made known unto God. And the peace of God which passeth all understanding shall keep your hearts and minds through Christ Jesus" (Phil. iv. 5-7).

Dr. Weymouth's translation is suggestive and is as follows:

> "Let your forbearing spirit be known to every one—the Lord is near. Do not be over-anxious about anything, but by prayer and earnest pleading, together with thanksgiving, let your requests be unreservedly made known in the presence of God and the peace of God which transcends all our powers of thought, will be a garrison to guard your hearts and minds in union with Christ Jesus."

The world we live in is ruled by cause and effect. For everything there is a reason. Where, to us there may seem the operation of blind chance, a greater knowledge would perceive the remoter causes. A peace that transcends all our powers of thought is a boon to be devoutly sought—but there is no quick cut to this happy state, it is at the end of a sequence of causes and effects, for grace while superabounding and supernatural is not irrational. We must in the first instance distinguish between that peace which is ours by reason of redemption and justification "We have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ" (Rom. v. 1), and the peace of God which acts as a garrison in a world of anxiety and strife. Such a peace is far more experimental than that which arises from the sinners' acquittal at the bar of God. It is the blessed crown upon a series of spiritual qualities, and will never be experienced where these intervening steps are omitted.

Dr. Weymouth, at the word "forbearing" in his translation puts a footnote, which reads:

Forbearing spirit. "Not only passively, non-contentious, but actively considerate, waiving even just legal redress" (Ellicott).

A contentious person will never experience this superlative peace with God, for he carries the seeds of enmity within him, and sows them at every turn; and as Ellicott observes, the positive active meaning must be understood before the first condition is complied with, there must be active consideration for others, there must be that waiving of rights, which the Apostle himself has so fully exemplified, when he said "All things are lawful, but all things are not expedient". This "moderation" or "yieldingness" is a first step towards surpassing peace, but there is another. Not only must there be great consideration for others, there must not be too great consideration for ourselves. Many a believer's testimony has been ruined by a fussy, selfish spirit. Households have been unduly disturbed, servants caused to murmur and rebel, and bitterness manifest where fellowship was ardently expected, simply because of this fault of "over anxiety". Anxiety about our affairs, would naturally lead us, if believers, to make our requests to God, but the omission that would prove fatal to the enjoyment of peace that passeth understanding, would be to omit the mingling of thanksgiving with our asking. We have but to cast our minds back over the days that are past, to see much cause for thanksgiving. We have but to compare our lot with that of others, to see many reasons for grateful praise.

When there is this unselfish moderation, this lack of selfish anxiety, this mingling of thanksgiving for past blessings with requests for present needs, then the "Peace of God, which transcends all our powers of thought" will be ours.

In what way this peace will be experienced is expressed in the words that follow:

"The peace of God . . . . . shall keep your hearts and minds through Christ Jesus."

The word "keep" which Paul uses here, has a specific sense, and its first occurrence in the N.T. makes that sense clear:

"In Damascus the governor under Aretas the king kept the city of the Damascenes with a garrison, desirous to apprehend me" (II Cor. xi. 32).

Here the word is translated "kept with a garrison".

In the world of strife and enmity, with many causes for natural anxiety, the believer who is obedient to the heavenly wisdom of this passage in Phil. iv., will be garrisoned by a power beyond his comprehension, and be kept in a peace that surpasses his understanding. He will find his table spread in the presence of his enemies. His head will be anointed with oil, he will be enabled to say:

"My cup runneth over."

No.6. "God's unspeakable gift" (II Cor. ix. 15).
pp. 139, 140

When Carlyle spoke of "the unspeakable Turk" he used the word in the extremely opposite sense from that of Paul when he thanked God for "His unspeakable gift", or when Peter spoke of "joy unspeakable". Tyndale speaks of "God's ineffable gift" (II Cor. ix. 15), and it is in this sense that both apostles have used the word.

There is, however, a slight difference in the intention of Paul when he spoke of God's "unspeakable" gift, and of Peter when he spoke of joy that is "unspeakable".

Paul uses the Greek word anekdiegetos, whereas Peter uses aneklaletos. The "a" in each case is the negative, and the peculiar meaning of the two words may be discovered by their usage. There are but two occurrences of ekdiegeomai in the N.T. and in both passages the A.V. renders it "declare":

> "A work which ye shall in no wise believe, though a man declare it unto you" (Acts xiii. 41).
>
> "They passed through Phenice and Samaria, declaring the conversion of the Gentiles" (Acts xv. 3).

Paul may have been enabled to "declare" with a great amount of completeness and comprehension, the message of the prophet, and Peter may have given a very circumstantial account of the conversion of Cornelius, but to contemplate Christ, the Son of God, the Saviour, the Lord, in all the plenitude of His Majesty and Humility, His Grace and His Power, was confessedly beyond the power even of an inspired apostle. It is good for us to recognize that not only the Invisible God is past finding out, but that the Saviour, even in His condescension as "the gift of God" is "unspeakable". Truly, said the Prophet as he spoke of the "child" yet to be born, and of the "son" yet to be given, His name is "Wonderful".

The words of the apostle that are engaging our thoughts come at the close of the two chapters in II Corinthians, in which Paul had urged upon the church with many an entreaty and argument the realization of his desire to take to Jerusalem a tangible expression of fellowship from the Gentile churches.

Early in his appeal, he had introduced the example of Christ, saying:

> "Ye know the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, that though He was rich, yet for our sakes He became poor, that ye through His poverty might be rich" (II Cor. viii. 9).

Whether Paul had entertained the idea of appealing to other phases of the Saviour's life and work to encourage the Corinthians, we do not know. He spoke of the necessity of a willing mind (II Cor. viii. 12) and quoted scripture to encourage liberality (viii. 15). He appealed to their honour (ix. 2, 3); added a proverb of his own (ix. 6); and supplemented the early remark concerning a "willing mind" with the words "God loveth a cheerful giver" (ix. 7). This moreover he confirms by another quotation "As it is written" (ix. 9); but nowhere throughout the exhortation, does the apostle refer any more to the example of Christ. Not until his entreaty is finished does the apostle refer again to Christ Himself, and when he does, it is to express with overflowing fullness something of his own appreciation of the incalculable debt we owe. Surely, the apostle, as he contemplated Christ as the gift of God, would have agreed with the Psalmist, and out of a full heart would have said "My cup runneth over".

"Thanks be unto God for His ineffable gift" (ix. 15).

No.7. "Joy unspeakable" (I Pet. i. 8).
p. 234

There are two "unspeakable" blessings which help to fill the believer's cup to overflowing. We have very lightly touched upon one, "The unspeakable gift", let us consider the other, "Joy unspeakable". It has been well observed, that "happiness" differs very essentially from "joy". Happiness depends largely upon "what happens" and consequently is of necessity superficial. Joy on the other hand is independent of external happenings. It is one of the graces that constitute "the fruit of the Spirit", and comes second only to "love" (Gal. v. 22).

When the Lord would bring before the believer the reward which was in reserve for faithful service, He spoke of it in two ways.

(1) "I will make thee ruler over many things";
(2) "Enter thou into the joy of thy Lord" (Matt. xxv. 21).

This aspect of the subject does not appear to have been given sufficient prominence in our thoughts. Let us pursue it further.

In the epistle to the Hebrews, chara "joy" is used four times and in each case it appears to be associated with suffering and reward. The four occasions are as follows:

(1) Ye . . . . . took joyfully the spoiling of your goods . . . . . great recompense of reward (Heb. x. 34).
(2) Who for the joy that was set before Him endured the cross, despising the shame, and is set down at the right hand of the throne of God (Heb. xii. 2).
(3) No chastening for the present seemeth to be joyous, but grievous: nevertheless afterward . . . . . (Heb. xii. 11).
(4) They watch for your souls, as they that must give account, that they may do it with joy (Heb. xiii. 17).

Both the epistle to the Hebrews, and the epistle to Peter have in common the theme, "Present suffering and future reward". "Suffering" and "rejoicing" are close companions in the epistle of Peter.

> "Wherein ye greatly rejoice, though now for a season, if need be, ye are in heaviness through manifold temptations; that the trial of your faith being much more precious than of gold that perisheth though it be tried with fire, might be found unto praise and honour and glory at the appearing of Jesus Christ: Whom having not seen ye love; in Whom, though now ye see Him not, yet believing, ye rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory" (I Pet. i. 6-8).

Peter, therefore, and those of like precious faith, could most certainly say, in view of this unspeakable joy:

"My cup runneth over."

The Prophetic Earth.

No.4. The "earth" as defined by the Prophets.
pp. 17 - 20

From the combined evidence of the words oikoumene and tebel, together with the testimony of Scripture concerning the extent of the dominion of the successive kings of the Gentile dynasty, we appear to be well within the truth, if we affirm that the prophetic earth extends from Spain in the west, the furthermost point of the Roman Empire, to the Indus in the East, the furthermost point of the Persian Empire, which necessarily includes all that was ruled over by Nebuchadnezzar. It seems a sound argument to affirm that by reason of Israel's lo-ammi condition at Acts xxviii., the time element in the history of the successive rulers from Nebuchadnezzar should cease to have a place, and it seems reasonable to believe that when the prophetic clock again begins to tick, the parenthesis will be closed and the powers indicated by the two feet and the ten toes (which toes are symbols of the ten kings yet to reign with the Beast at the time of the end) will reign, in the first place, over the same territory as was governed by their predecessors. Some commentators look for the revival of the Roman Empire, and would place the ten kings in Europe, but at the time of the end, the last power will apparently combine in itself all the powers of each successive ruler (Dan. ii. 45; vii. 4-7; with Rev. xiii. 1, 2), and Rev. xvii. and xviii., together with Jer. li. makes it clear that Babylon also is to be revived. These features convince us that we have attained with a fair approximation of truth to the extent of the prophetic earth. The prophets contain a number of geographical references, and it is our present intention to consider them with a view to discovering how far they do or do not conform to the limits we feel bound, at the moment, to set to the extent of the prophetic earth.

Commencing our reading with Isaiah, we find that every geographical reference in the first twelve chapters falls well within the limits suggested, unless we take exception to "the islands of the sea" and "the four corners of the earth" (Isa. xi. 11, 12). These are undefined and for the moment must be left out of the account. With chapter thirteen, a series of prophetic "burdens" commences, and each burden is connected with a special land or nation. Thus Babylon, Moab, Damascus, Egypt, Tyre and such less defined places as "the land shadowing with wings, which is beyond the rivers of Ethiopia", "the desert of the sea" and "the valley of vision" (Isa. xiii.-xxiii.). If we continue and read on to the last chapter, we shall discover that the prophecy has Jerusalem for its centre, and in the bulk of references the lands mentioned are in the immediate vicinity of the holy land. In chapter sixty-six, we read of Tarshish, Pul and Lud, Tubal and Javan. Taken by itself Tarshish could indicate a Phoenician port in Spain, but it is associated in Ezekiel with Persia (Ezek. xxvii. 10 and 12) and is linked with Pul and Lud, it appears therefore that the Tarshish of I Kings x. 22 and Jer. x. 9 is intended, and that this would be somewhere in the vicinity of the Red Sea. Pul is connected with Assyria (II Kings xv. 19) and Lud is associated with Persia in Ezek. xxvii. 10. So also, in the same chapter of Ezekiel, is found Javan and Tubal, these are Japhetic peoples, Javan being looked upon as the representative of the Greek race, Alexander the Great being called “The King of Javan” in Dan. viii. 21, in the A.V. Grecia. Tubal is reckoned to be in the southern range of the Caucasus, on the east of the Black Sea. It is evident that Isaiah never visualized the wide earth in his prophetic vision, but limited his range to a circle of the earth’s surface bounded by Greece on the West and Persia on the East.

Jeremiah also contains a number of geographical references, but his range is even more limited than that of Isaiah. Ezekiel too is just as circumscribed, but the names Gog, Magog, Rosh and Meshech found in chapter xxxviii. and xxxix. call for a fuller comment. Gog of the land of Magog, was the chief prince of Meshech and Tubal (Ezek. xxviii. 2; xxxix. 1). The people of Magog are described by Jerome as “Scythian nations, fierce and innumerable who live beyond the Caucasus and the lake Mætois, and near the Caspian Sea, and spread out even outward to India”. Meshech is rendered in the LXX Mesoch which in the opinion of many stands for the Moschi, a tribe that inhabited the Caucasus, and this tribe gave their name to the Muscovites with whom the modern Russian is allied, and from whom the ancient capital Moscow was named. Whether this brings Russia itself into the realm of the prophetic earth however is another question. Where the A.V. reads “chief prince” the R.V. reads “the prince of Rosh” the Hebrew word for prince being Rosh. This however is too slender a basis to build any prophetic reference to Russia. Gomer, mentioned in Ezek. xxxviii. 6 is generally regarded as the ancestor of the Celts or Cimmeri (the Cymri-Welsh) who settled to the north of the Black Sea and gave their name to the Crimea. The same argument that would conclude that Russia is intended because the word Meshech may indicate a Muscovy tribe, would prove that Wales is intended because they are the descendants of Gomer! The great powers outside the limits of the prophetic earth naturally play their part and exert a great influence, but just as the reference to the new heavens and new earth in Isaiah is localized, and our attention is focused upon “Jerusalem” (Isa. lxv. 17-18), or millennial blessings are peculiarly associated in the first place as with “all My holy mountain”, before the earth is full of the knowledge of the Lord (Isa. xi. 9), so the doings of the nations in the limited zone of the prophetic earth preceded and anticipate the wider activities and judgments that follow.

Leaving these great prophecies, we turn to the great prophecy of the day of the Lord, namely the book of the Revelation. The scene opens in Patmos, an island in the Mediterranean, and the book is sent to seven churches on the mainland of Asia Minor. Satan’s throne is said to be in Pergamos, a city of Mysia about fifty miles south of Troy. The great battle which follows the pouring out of the sixth vial takes place at Armageddon, literally the Mountain of Megiddo. This is situated in the plain of Esdraelon, and destined to be the greatest battlefield of time. The kings that are gathered to this battle by the supernatural agency of demons, are said to be “the kings of the earth and of the whole world”. The word here for “world” is oikoumene the prophetic earth, and does not include the vast continents of America, Asia or India. Again, the reference to the kings of the East (Rev. xvi. 12) does not refer to the Far East as we speak of it to-day. The Greek word anatole is used of the home country of the wise men (Matt. ii. 1). The corresponding terms in the Hebrew are mizrach which means “from the rising (of the sun)” (Josh. iv. 19) or qedem, a land, comprehending Arabia Deserta, Ammon, Armenia, Assyria and Mesopotamia. This is the anatole of the Hebrews. To this region belong the kings of the East, for the Hebrew words melchi qedem are found in Isa. xix. 11 and are there translated "ancient kings", but Pharaoh may be boasting here that he is descended from the kings of the East. Jer. xxv. 19-26 may give a fair survey of their dominion. The way of the kings of the East of Rev. xvi. 12 therefore cannot be construed to indicate an invasion of Mogul, Mongolian, Chinese or other rulers of the Far East. At the end of the Millennium, when Satan is loosed out of his prison he goes out to deceive the nations which are in the four quarters of the earth, these nations are called Gog and Magog (Rev. xx. 8). The English word "corner" is used in the Scriptures to translate a wing, a shoulder, a side or quarters, a turning, a tread, a rib, an extremity in the O.T. and a beginning and an angle in the N.T. In Rev. xx. 8 the Greek word is gonia an angle, recognizable in the English "diagonal". In the Revelation gonia is translated once corner, and once quarter. In the LXX this word is used of the four corners of the altar (Exod. xxvii. 2) &c., and it would appear that the four corners of the earth refer to the parts most distant from the sphere of blessing which has Jerusalem as the centre. To these regions the "outer darkness" may refer, and in these regions Gog and Magog, the great enemies of Israel in the past had settled during the thousand years reign.

It appears therefore from what we have seen, that the prophetic earth is exceedingly limited in extent, its utmost borders being from Spain to the Indus, but in the majority of cases the regions referred to lie within a circle whose centre is Jerusalem, and whose circumference is at the end of a radius of a thousand miles in length. This limited region being the microcosm, wherein would be enacted in miniature, the vaster movements that would embrace the whole earth.

Before us, as we write, a map lies opened, in which the Roman Empire is indicated, and the different countries so coloured as to divide it up into ten kingdoms. This map devised by Benjamin Wills Newton is intended to suggest the territorial arrangements which will be found in the Roman Empire when finally divided into TEN federal kingdoms. In this map Germany and Scandinavia are shown as outside the territorial bounds, as also is the whole of Ireland and Scotland north of the Firth of Forth. Italy is divided into two, the North including Rome, the South being called Magna Græca, which together with Sicily, Tunis and Tripoli comprise one of the ten kingdoms. If, however, the dominion exercised by the Gentile successor is indicated by the two feet of the image, it seems more likely that there will be five quisling kings appointed in the West and five in the East, but how the land will be distributed or divided is a matter that can only be conjectured.

The idea of a European Federal State has been in the mind of man for many years, such a scheme was noted in Things to Come in Vol. xxi., p.35, published in 1915. Earlier than this, the "Daily Mail Year Book" (1908) commenting on the Hague Conference said "Here we have the rudiments of the international legislature of the world-state slowly and gradually precipitating itself on the consciousness of mankind". Earlier still Dr. Timothy Richard, a prominent missionary in China said "My suggestions were that ten leading nations should federate and appoint a supreme court to decide all needful questions . . . . . In this way . . . . . all the world would enjoy peace. Instead of having ten mighty nations with their millions of soldiers, unite all these into one to enforce the decision of the supreme court of mankind" (The Christian Commonwealth, March 23, 1905).

We have traveled far since 1905, and the United States of Europe is being formed before our very eyes. Two items of peculiar interest are OIL and THE SUEZ CANAL, the oil fields of Iran and Iraq (Persia and Mesopotamia, so including Babylon) and the canal which passes through Egypt. It may well be that a "corner" in oil and a command of the Suez will make the rest of the world say of the last dictator "Who is able to make war with him?"

No.17. Beersheba and Moriah.

pp. 12 - 14

After the destruction of Sodom, which occupied our attention in the preceding article, we find Abraham journeying to the South country and dwelling between Kadesh and Shur, sojourning in Gerar (Gen. xx. 1).

There is a fairly insistent tradition preserved by Josephus, Eusebius and Jerome, that Kadesh was either identical or closely connected with Petra.

> "The mountain which overhangs the valleys of Petra has been known as far back as the knowledge of travelers extends, as the 'Mountain of Aaron'. The basin of Petra is known to the Arabs by no other name than 'the valley of Moses'."
>
> "The day after leaving Petra was occupied in the passage of the mountain into the 'Arabah; the next in crossing 'Arabah; on the other side we came to 'Ain el-Weibeh—three springs with palms under the low limestone cliffs which form the boundary to the mass of the mountains of Tih. This spot Dr. Robinson supposes to be Kadesh" (Stanley).
>
> "Shur, is the name of a desert that reaches from the E. Border of Egypt as far as the habitations of Amalek and Ishmael" (Young).

Shur means "a wall", and this well describes the tableland that forms the northern centre of the desert, which stops abruptly, like a wall, forming the eastern bank of the Red Sea.

> "Its unvarying wall-like front, here the most conspicuous object in the landscape, might well have given the name 'wilderness of Shur' (wall) to the desert region in which it is situated" (Ordnance Survey, Palmer).

Somewhere South of Gaza must be indicated the city of Gerar where Abraham sojourned. In this same district was Beersheba (Gen. xxi. 33), "beer" being the Hebrew for a "well", and "sheba" for an "oath". Beersheba was at the extreme South of Canaan, and the expression "from Dan to Beersheba" (Judges xx. 1) was similar to our saying "from Land's End to John O'Groats".

> "Its present Arabic name, Bir-es-Seba, means 'well of the seven', which some take to be the signification also of Beersheba, in allusion to the seven ewe-lambs which Abraham gave to Abimelech, in token of the oath between them" (Kitto).

It was while Abraham sojourned here, that God called him to go through his greatest trial.

> "Take now thy son, thine only son, Isaac, whom thou lovest, and get thee into the land of Moriah: and offer him there for a burnt offering upon one of the mountains which I will tell thee off" (Gen. xxii. 2).

There are two references to Moriah in Scripture, this passage in Genesis and a passage in II Chronicles.

> "Then Solomon began to build the house of the Lord at Jerusalem in Mount Moriah where the Lord appeared unto David his father, in the place that David had prepared in the threshing floor of Ornan the Jebusite" (II Chron. iii. 1).

The name given to the mountain by Abraham was "Jehovah-Jireh" meaning "The Lord will provide", or "In the mount of the Lord it shall be seen" (Gen. xxii. 14). The marginal reading of II Chron. iii. 1 is very suggestive in view of this name given by Abraham, for it reads "which was seen of David his father", for "where the Lord appeared unto David his father".

Attempts have been made to destroy this connexion between the place of Isaac's offering, the temple of Zion and the hill called Calvary, by citing the Samaritan tradition, "Isaac was offered on Ar-Gerizim".

It has been proved by travelers of repute, that it would have been physically impossible for Abraham to have reached Gerizim in three days. Robinson shows that it occupies thirty-five hours continuous traveling by camels to cover the distance, whereas Abraham and his followers were on foot with an ass to bear the load.

> "Now traveling at the ordinary rate of the country, Jerusalem would just be reached on third day from Beersheba—to reach Nablous in the same time is impossible at a pace of fellahin with their asses" (Canon Tristram).

It has been objected that there is no place on the route Abraham traveled where Jerusalem can be seen "afar off", but the words are not an exact measure of distance, neither do the words "he lifted up his eyes" indicate the contemplation of a height, for the same expression is found in Gen. xviii. 1, 2, where Abraham "sat in the tent door".

Dr. Cunningham Geikie has made it very plain, that at the Monastery of Mar Saba, some three or four miles South of Jerusalem, one can indeed lift up one's eyes and see Mount Zion.

> "This spot, from which the traveler coming from the south first sees Mount Moriah, the site of the Jewish Temple, wakes the tenderest recollection in every heart that reverences the Father of the Faithful. Here Abraham, on his sad journey from Beersheba, at God's command that he should offer his only and well-beloved son Isaac on Moriah, first came in sight of the hill" (Geikie).

The word Moriah means "Jehovah will be seen". It must not be forgotten that "provide" and "provision" are simply pro- vision "to see beforehand". Abraham uses the word that forms part of the name Moriah, when he said:

> "My son, God will provide Himself (or see for Himself) a lamb for a burnt offering" (Gen. xxii. 8).

So, Abraham, became a prophet and named that mountain Jehovah-Jireh, "In the mount of the Lord it shall be seen" (Gen. xxii. 14). The Septuagint renders Jehovah-Jireh by Kurios eiden, "The Lord hath seen". The Saviour said:

> "Abraham rejoiced to see my day: and he saw it and was glad" (John viii. 56).

David saw something of what was coming when he bought the site of the temple.

The Lord saw down the ages, that one offering, that should fulfil and complete the type and shadow of the offering of Isaac, and of the offerings of the temple, He saw that hill called Calvary, also one of the mountains of Moriah. We do not venerate holy places, but we are glad to see this connection between type and anti-type that is found by considering the "place where" Abraham was found willing to offer his "beloved son".

No.18. The Cave of Machpelah (Gen. xxiii.).
pp. 37 - 39

> "Next to the wells of Syria, the most authentic memorials of past times are the Sepulchres . . . . . The tombs of ancient Greece and Rome lined the public roads with funeral pillars or towers . . . . . But the sepulchers of Palestine were, like the inhabitants of its earliest inhabitants, hewn out of the living limestone rock, and therefore as indestructible as the rock itself" (Dean Stanley).

After the death of Terah in Haran, no record of death occurs in the narrative of Genesis until the death of Sarah at the age of a hundred and twenty seven years.

> "And Sarah died in Kirjath-arba: the same is Hebron in the lad of Canaan" (Gen. xxiii. 2).

It seems fairly evident that Moses had before him as he wrote, the authentic document, recording the actual name of the place, "Kirjath-arba", but as he wrote for the people of Israel many years after the event, he added the name Hebron, by which the ancient city was then known. Kirjath is a Hebrew word meaning a "city" as in Isa. xxiv. 10 and derived from karah "to meet" from the "concourse" of people that make up a city.

Arba is the name of the father of Anak, who was of the giants.

> "Now therefore give me this mountain whereof the Lord spake in that day; for thou heardest in that day how the Anakims were there, and that the cities were great and > fenced; if so be the Lord will be with me, then I shall be able to drive them out, as the Lord said" (Josh. xiv. 12).

This city, given to Caleb as a reward for his faithfulness, became one of the cities of refuge (Josh. xxi. 11). When the time came for David to reign as King over Judah it was this city of Hebron that he chose to be his capital, and it was here that he was anointed King over all Israel (II Sam. ii. 1-4, 11).

It was to this spot that Abraham was directed when he sought a burying-place, "for a possession" (Gen. xxiii. 9, 20).

The Hebrew word for "possession" is achuzzah and it is rather remarkable, yet nevertheless consistent with the truth, that this word occurs in but three passages, as follows:

(1) The Possession by Promise.

> "I will give unto thee, and to thy seed after thee, the land wherein thou art a stranger, all the land of Canaan, for an everlasting possession: and I will be their God" (Gen. xvii. 8).

(2) The Possession by Hope.

> "For as much money as it is worth he shall give it me for a possession of a burying place amongst you" (Gen. xiii. 9, 10).

These are the two occasions where achuzzah is used of Abraham and his possessions, the one other occurrence is found in the twenty-second chapter where Isaac, the heir, was spared, because of the ram which was offered up for a burnt offering "in the stead of his son".

(3) The Possession by Atonement.

> "And Abraham lifted up his eyes, and looked, and behold behind him a ram 'caught' (achaz) in a thicket by his horns" (Gen. xxii. 13).

In case any reader should notice the word "possession" in Gen. xxiii. 18 and think that it had escaped our notice, we just remark, that it represents a different Hebrew word, miqnah, which means "something bought with money".

The very full account of the buying of the cave and the field which we find in Gen. xxiii., must be considered in the light of a legal document.

We observe that Abraham recognizes his true position when he said:

> "I am a stranger and a sojourner with you: give me a possession of a burying place with you."

The children of Heth replied:

> "Hear us my Lord: thou art a mighty prince among us."

Abraham was not lacking in Eastern courtesy, so it is recorded:

> "And Abraham stood up, and bowed himself."

He then asked the children of Heth to intreat for him with Ephron the son of Zohar, that he may give to Abraham the cave of Machpelah,

> "For as much money as it is worth, he shall give it me for a possession of a burying place amongst you."

With true Eastern exaggeration, but not misunderstood by Abraham, Ephron replied:

> "Nay, my Lord, hear me: the field give I thee, and the cave that is therein, I give it thee; in the presence of the sons of my people give I it thee: bury thy dead."

Again, Abraham bowed himself, and reiterated his offer to pay the price, this time mentioning the field, which Ephron had included in his offer. Again Ephron replied:

> "My Lord hearken unto me: the land is worth four hundred shekels of silver: what is that betwixt me and thee? bury therefore thy dead."

The Western mind perhaps would have hesitated at this point, but Abraham knew the custom of his day. He "hearkened" unto Ephron, and weighed out the silver "which he had named" in the audience of the sons of Heth:

> "Four hundred shekels of silver, current money with the merchant."

Abraham, apparently, was forced to buy the "field" as well as the "cave". Possibly Ephron realized that the field would be of small value if Abraham secured the cave for a sepulcher. The transaction being concluded, verses 17-20, must be read as the title deeds to the property. Notice the precise description of the situation of the property:

> "The field of Ephron, which was in Machpelah, which was before Mamre."

Then note the way in which the property is described in detail:

> "The field, and the cave which was therein, and all the trees that were in the field, that were in all the borders round about."

Then follows the witnesses of the transaction, the possession was "made sure".

When the time came for Jacob to die, he gave his sons their blessing, and then gave specific instructions concerning his burial:

> "And he charged them and said unto them, I am to be gathered unto my people: bury me with my father in the cave that is in the field of Ephron the Hittite, in the cave that is in the field of Machpelah, which is before Mamre, in the land of Canaan, which Abraham bought with the field of Ephron the Hittite for a possession of a burying place" (Gen. xlix. 29, 30).

In this cave had already been buried the patriarchs with their wives.

> "There they buried Abraham and Sarah his wife; there they buried Isaac and Rebekah his wife; and there I buried Leah."

Is it nothing more than a coincidence to find that these names, Isaac, Sarah, Rebekah, Abraham, Leah, by an acrostic spell out the name Israel? Whether this be of Divine ordering or whether it just "happens", one thing is most sure, the burial place of these patriarchs, Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, with their wives, is the great pledge that in resurrection, they shall possess that land through which, in the days of their flesh, they walked as pilgrims and strangers. In another sepulcher, were buried the twelve sons of Jacob (Gen. l. 25; Josh. xxiv. 32; Acts vii. 16).

The prophet Ezekiel contains a vision of a valley full of bones, and the interpretation of the vision is as follows:

> "O my people, I will open your graves and cause you to come up out of your graves, and bring you unto the land of Israel" (Ezek. xxxvii. 12).

When the blessed day dawns, the three patriarchs with the twelve founders of Israel will rise in resurrection glory, to still for ever the rival claims to the land of Canaan that is at this moment raging over their very dust.

No.19. Mesopotamia and Padan-Aram (Gen. xxiv. and xxxi.).
pp. 77 - 79

After the burial of Sarah, Abraham's thoughts turn to the question of Isaac, his marriage and his successors. He therefore makes his trusted servant swear that he will not take a wife for Isaac from the daughters of the Canaanites.

> "But thou shalt go unto my country, and to my kindred, and take a wife unto my son Isaac" (xxiv. 4).

The country to which the servant traveled is called in verse ten "Mesopotamia, unto the city of Nahor". The name "Mesopotamia" is given to-day, to a greater stretch of country than was intended by the Scriptures. Mesopotamia is a Greek translation of the Hebrew words, Aram Naharaim. The Greek title means "between the rivers", the Hebrew title is more specific and means "Syria of the two rivers". The Hebrew name occurs in the A.V. in the heading of Psalm sixty but elsewhere the word is translated as in Gen. xxiv. by Mesopotamia. Without this knowledge, the reader might think that Abraham's servant went right back to Ur of the Chaldees, which to-day is included in Mesopotamia, but in Bible times was not. We know that "the city of Nahor" was Haran, for to this city Jacob fled to Rebekah's brother, Laban (Gen. xxvii. 43). The two rivers from which this land gets its names, are, the Tigris and the Euphrates. One section of Mesopotamia is called Padan-Aram (Gen. xxviii. 2) meaning "the plains of Aram", and this too is the site of Nahor's city.

> "And Isaac was forty years old when he took Rebekah to wife, the daughter of Bethuel the Syrian of Padan-aram, sister to Laban the Syrian" (Gen. xxv. 20).

If the reader will consult a map, he will see that immediately North of Palestine is Syria, this is the Aram of Scripture. To the East is the River Euphrates, and between the Euphrates and the Tigris is Aram-Naharaim, "Syria of the two rivers" or Mesopotamia. South of this, and still between the two rivers is Babylonia, the Shinar of the O.T., and lower still, near the Persian Gulf is Chaldea, from which Abraham commenced his great journey at the call of God.

When Joshua spoke of the period when Israel's fathers

> "dwelt on the other side of the flood in old time, even Terah, the father of Abraham, and the father of Nahor";

and when he further said in the name of the Lord:

> "I took your father Abraham from the other side of the flood" (Josh. xxiv. 2, 3, see also 14, 15), the English reader may be confused. The word flood in the original is Nahar, and occurs nowhere else in Joshua but in the first chapter where we read:

> "From the wilderness and this Lebanon even unto the great river the river Euphrates" (i. 4).

Urquhart, quoting Dr. Harper, Sayce and Ainsworth, tells us that:

> "There is a well in the neighbourhood (of Haran) which is called by the natives 'the well of Rebekah'. There is nothing to distinguish it from the other wells of the district except the limestone slabs, the accumulation of which shows that the well must have been in use from remote times. It may have been that Laban's homestead was placed close by, and that at this very spot Eliezer lifted up his heart in silent prayer to God, and bowed in fervent thanksgiving when the sign he had asked was given."

The statement that Abraham's kindred were idolators when on the "other side of the river", is borne out by the testimony of the Monuments:

> "Its temple was dedicated to the Babylonian moon-god like the temple of Ur. Between Ur and Haran there was thus a natural connexion, and a native of Ur would have found himself more at home in Haran than in any other city of the world" (Sayce, "The Higher Criticism on the Verdict of the Monuments").

Sin, the moon-god, is called in an inscription of B.C.800, "the Lord of Haran".

Urquhart draws our attention to another evidence that the Ancestors of Israel dwelt in Haran.

In Gen. xxx. 20, Leah calls her sixth son Zebulun:

> "And Leah said: God hath endowed me with a good dowry; now will my husband dwell with me, because I have borne him six sons: and she called his name Zebulun."

The word translated "dwell" is Zabal, and it stands alone in the Hebrew Scriptures. "The Companion Bible" says in a note that the word is Assyrian "to honour" brought out of Ur. To those whose acquaintance with the Hebrew tongue is not very deep, the fact that Lexicons and Concordances bring together Zabal and Zebul as meaning "to dwell" and a "dwelling" would be sufficient proof. But we are assured that Hebrew scholars have been puzzled by this word used of Leah. Dr. Payne Smith's note is emphatic, he says: "Leah is more than usually obscure in the reasons she gives for this name", says "there is no trace" of the word zabal, and says that the meaning "dwelling" given to Zebulun in the margin finds no support.

The language of Assyria and Babylon which has since been recovered, removes the difficulty. Zabal is an Assyrian word which means "to honour", "to be high" in one's esteem. Leah's statement would therefore read "Now will my husband honour me". If Leah actually spoke the language of Assyria, it would but confirm the record of Abraham's trek from Ur of the Chaldees to Haran. The Hebrew word for "dwelling" was evidently known, for a play upon the double meaning of the words, derived from the two languages, seems evident. Jacob, also, when he blessed Zebulun seems to glance at this double meaning:

> "Zebulun shall dwell at the haven of the sea" (Gen. xlix. 13), but the word here translated "dwell" is shaken not Zebul as we might have expected, and shaken means to dwell as in a tent, and supplies the word translated "tabernacle".

We find a generation or more later, that Chaldee was the natural tongue of the descendants of Nahor, for Laban, Rebekah's brother, called the heap of stones "Jegar-sahadutha", which Jacob called "Galeed", and these names mean "a heap of witness" in Chaldee and Hebrew respectively.

To the English reader there does not seem to be the slightest resemblance between Jegar-sahadutha, and Galeed, but the Hebrew reader would perceive that while two very different words are used for "heap", namely jegar and gal, the words for "witness" are similar, being adutha in Chaldee, and eduth edah and ed in Hebrew. So these similarities yet differences in the language of Jacob and Laban, like that of Leah is an indication that we are dealing with historic truths when we read the narrative of Genesis concerning Haran, Mesopotamia and Padan-aram.

No.20. Bethel, Jabbok, Peniel and Shechem.
pp. 99, 100

We touched upon Padan-Aram when speaking of Abraham's desire to obtain a wife for Isaac from among his own people, and consequently included some references to the life of Jacob.

There are one or two other references which we must include in our survey of the relation of place and purpose before we leave Jacob and pass on into Egypt with Joseph.

First comes Bethel, (Gen. xxviii. 19). Bethel is not mentioned in the N.T. but it still existed, for Josephus records that it was taken by Vespasian. The last mention of it that has come down to us, is in the writings of Jerome. In recent times Bethel has been identified with Beitin, a heap of ruins. Among the ruins were the remains of a large reservoir, 314 feet in length and 217 in breadth. We learn from Gen. xxviii. 19 that Jacob gave the name "Bethel" (the house of God) to the place where he had the dream, but that it was originally called Luz. The fact that in the earlier record of Abraham's journeyings the place is called Bethel, shows that Moses was using the familiar name, although in the record before him, there would naturally have appeared the ancient name Luz. We have found a number of instances of this work of Moses in bringing the history of the patriarchs up to date for the people.

Jacob returned to Bethel to fulfil his vow (Gen. xxxv. 1, 11-15). But a little way from Bethel, Rachel died in giving birth to Benjamin, and at "Ephrath which is Bethlehem" Jacob set up another pillar, and, comments Moses:

> "That is the pillar of Rachel's grave unto this day" (Gen. xxxv. 16-20).

It is possible that the ark stayed for a time at Bethel (Judges xx. 26-27; I Sam. x. 3), and if so, this would have lent an element of sanctity to the site. Jeroboam chose Bethel as the chief seat of idolatrous worship, and the orthodox Jews gave it the name Beth-aven "House of idols" as an expression of their contempt (Hosea iv. 15; x. 5). Thus fell the city which Jacob named "The House of God".

About thirty miles south of the sea of Galilee, a stream enters the River Jordan. This is the Jabbok, whose name was changed by Jacob to Peniel "For", said he, "I have seen God face to face, and my life is preserved" (Gen. xxxii. 30). The word Jabbok means "emptying", as the word baqaq is translated in Nahum ii. 2, "The emptiers have emptied them out", or, as in Hosea x. 1, "Israel is an empty vine". The name exactly fitted the experience of Jacob, he found himself in the presence of God, and it proved the emptying of self, manifested in two ways; he halted upon his thigh ever afterward to show the failure of the flesh, but he received a new name Israel to show the triumph of grace.

We have already spoken of Machpelah, the burying place bought by Abraham. In Gen. xxxiii. 18-20, we read that Jacob bought a parcel of ground, "where he had spread
