Nine times does the Apostle speak of the gospel, but it is always the personal relation of the believer to it, not what the gospel is in itself. To come to Philippians to discover the gospel of the grace of God is to come to the wrong book. The intimate relation of service and suffering connected with the gospel will be seen at a glance by the following:--

The Gospel in Philippians.

A | i. 5. Fellowship from the first day.
B1 | i. 7. Defence. "Ye partakers." \
C | i. 12. Knowledge of Paul's unselfishness. } Defensive.
B2 | i. 17. Defence. "I am set." /
D | i. 27. Citizenship worthy of the gospel.
B2 | i. 27. Striving together. \
C | ii. 21. Knowledge of Timothy's unselfishness. } Offensive.
B1 | iv. 3. Striving together. /
A | iv. 15. Fellowship in the beginning of the gospel.

The whole atmosphere of this epistle is full of suffering for Christ's sake, engaging in a conflict, seeking to walk worthy of the calling, running a race with the prize in view, and stamped indelibly from first to last with unselfishness, the very opposite of the mind of the flesh, the true result of having the mind of Christ.

Philippians ii. 6-11 was not written to teach the doctrine of the Godhead, but to explain the meaning of the Apostle's words:--

> "Look not every man on his own things, but every man also on the things of others. let this mind be in you which was also in Christ Jesus."

The Apostle then proceeds to show how He did indeed "look not on His own things" in any selfish way. He was in the form of God; He willingly took the form of a servant. Not only so, He further humbled Himself, and became obedient unto death, the shameful and agonizing death of the cross. Here we find no word of explanation regarding what is meant by the "form of God"; our attention is riveted upon His condescension, He emptied Himself (made Himself of no reputation, A.V.). No doctrine is established by that death on the cross, but the apostle presses on:--

> "Wherefore God also hath highly exalted Him."

This is the line of teaching he seeks to impress. This he immediately impresses by saying, "Wherefore. . . . work out your own salvation." He does not question that that salvation is theirs; he does desire that they should "work it out." To that end he brings before them the example of Christ. The reference to obedience, both regarding Christ and the Philippians, we must keep in mind as it will figure prominently presently.

The meaning of the word "work out" are illuminated by noting other occurrences. In II Cor. iv. 8-12 we have a clear exhibition of one who bore about in his body the putting to death of the Lord Jesus. In verse 17, however, the Apostle calls this terrible suffering "light affliction, which is but for a moment," because he could see that it was "working out a far more exceeding and aionian weight of glory." Again, the word occurs in a context of conflict:--

> "Wherefore take unto y the whole armour of God, that ye may be able to withstand in the evil day, and having worked out all, to stand" (Eph. vi. 10-17).

The believer, clad in the armour of God, suffering, enduring, standing, is "working out his own salvation with fear and trembling."

There can be no greater contrast than that of Ephesians and Philippians in their point of view. Ephesians teaches "boldness with confidence," because there the question is entirely to do with being accepted in the Beloved.

Philippians speaks of "fear and trembling," because it has reference to the service, the running, and the contest of the believer subsequent to his perfect acceptance in Christ. The teaching of both Ephesians and Philippians is summarized in the second Epistle to Timothy. Chapter ii. speaks of service and conflict, for the figures used are a soldier, an athlete, and a husbandman. If anyone contend in the games, he is not crowned unless he contend lawfully (i.e., keeps the rules, to which Paul alludes in I Cor. ix. when he speaks of being "disqualified," or as the A.V. has it, "castaway"). A crown is in view, and a contest is to be won, rules have to be kept. Here is no free grace gift, like salvation, here is a prize that needs the winning. II Tim. ii. 11-13 gives the two sides of the question. "If we died with Him, we shall also live with Him." Ephesians established this blessed fact and nothing can overshadow the "boldness and confidence" that this truth gives. It is a position so entirely given by grace that it is indefectible. Verse 12, taking this as its basis, goes further, and introduces the prize, and the crown. "If we endure, we shall also reign with Him: if we deny Him, He also will deny us."

Our living with Him is one thing, our reigning with Him is another. This is related to our enduring now, and to draw back from this involves loss. Philippians iii. is full of this thought, and to that chapter we must address ourselves in the next article.

"The Crown of Righteousness."
pp. 57-63

The example of humility, suffering, and of consequent exaltation given in Phil. ii., is echoed in the case of the Apostle Paul in chapter iii. The many things that were a gain to the Apostle are counted loss for Christ. For the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus his Lord he had suffered the loss of all things, and had counted those highly prized possessions as so much offal. Why? That, as he says, "I may win Christ." The word translated "win" is kerdainõ, and means "to gain" (Matt. xvi. 26). Kerdos, "gain," occurs twice in Philippians (i. 21, and iii. 7). "For me to live is Christ, to die gain." "What things were gain to me." The reference in chapter iii. 7 undoubtedly refers to those things which were accounted by the Apostle once as actual gains; he now sought to "gain" Christ. The strangeness of the expression prepares us for the reference that follows regarding the prize, the uncertainty, and the eager pursuit. In iii. 9 words occur that must not be lightly passed over. "Not having mine own righteousness which is of the law, but that which is through the faith of Christ, the righteousness of God upon faith." This passage does not say that the Apostle was seeking justification by faith in Christ (for that he had possessed years previously), he speaks of "the righteousness which is through the faith OF Christ." Faith in Christ is one thing, and is attended by great blessings, but the faith of Christ is another, and is connected with a different aspect of truth. The faith of Christ is His own personal faith, exercised by Him when as a man He lived in utter dependence upon His Father. By faith, and not by the manifestation of innate Deity, He overcame the tempter. The "prayers and supplications with strong crying and tears" were real, and it is written, "He learned obedience by the things which He suffered."

The meeting place between the sinner and the Saviour is at the cross, and the empty tomb. Afterwards, as a saint who seeks to "walk even as He walked," he may go back into that life of faith and seek to know Him and the fellowship of His sufferings. Shall we be misunderstood if we speak of "two justifications"? Or perhaps better, "a twofold justification"? The bearing of this truth upon the subject of "The Prize" of Phil. iii. will be more fully appreciated when the whole case has been placed before the reader, but one passage will perhaps suffice to warrant the patient investigation, and that is II Tim. iv. 6-8.

In Philippians, the Apostle had expressed his desire "to depart" (i. 23), and his willingness to be offered (ii. 17). When writing II Timothy the time for his departure was at hand, and the willingness to be offered was soon to be realized. "I am now ready to be offered, and the time of my departure is at hand." In Phil. iii. he expressed his uncertainty regarding the obtaining of the prize; in II Tim. iv. he can speak with confidence.

> "I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith. Henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord the righteous judge shall give me at that day."

The crown Paul will receive is a crown of RIGHTEOUSNESS, and it will be given to him by the Lord the RIGHTEOUS JUDGE. The attaining of the prize of Phil. iii. seems to be very parallel with the receiving of the crown of righteousness of II Tim. iv. Scripture provides us with a complete illustration of the doctrine of the two justifications of which we speak, in the history of Abraham. In Gen. xv. the Lord brought Abram forth and said:--

> "Look now toward heaven, and tell the stars, if thou art able to number them: and He said unto him, So shall thy seed be. And he believed in the Lord; and He counted it to him for righteousness."

This passage forms the basis of the grand argument of Rom. iv. This argument concerns justification by faith as over against justification by works.

> "For if Abraham were justified by works, he hath whereof to boast; but not before God. For what saith the Scripture? Abraham believed God, and it was counted unto him for righteousness. Now to him the worketh is the reward not reckoned of grace, but of debt, but to him that worketh not, but believeth on Him that justifieth the ungodly, his faith is counted for righteousness (verses 1-5).

The reference to Gen. xv. is resumed in verses 17-22, the emphasis being upon the fact that Abraham's faith rested in "God Who quickeneth the dead." It was an easier thing for Abraham to believe that in some centuries' time God would raise His own Son from the dead, than to believe that with his own body "as good as dead" and the "deadness" of Sarah, that God should fulfil His promise and give them a son. Abraham, however, was not weak in faith. He staggered not through unbelief, therefore it was imputed to him for righteousness. Now it was not written for his sake alone, but for us also if we believe on Him that raised up Jesus our Lord from the dead.

In Gen. xvii., "when Abram was ninety years old and nine, the Lord appeared to Abram and said unto him. I am the Almighty God (El Shaddai); walk before me and be thou perfect" (cf. Gen. vi. 9, Job i. 1). A change is suggested by the fact that Abram is called Abraham in this chapter, yet more important is it to observe that it is here, and not before, that circumcision is introduced. Indeed, Rom. iv. 9-12 makes a point of Abram's *un*circumcision in connection with the teaching of justification by faith without works. Now, however, is given to Abraham a covenant "which ye shall keep" (Gen. xvii. 10). Bearing upon this new phase is the reference of Paul in Phil. iii., "We are the circumcision," and his own once highly prized relation to the circumcision as pertaining to the flesh. True circumcision is related to the theme of Phil. iii. and Col. ii. 11, 18, where "being perfect," "the prize," and "the reward" echo the conditions of Gen. xvii. Abraham's attempt to walk before God and be perfect was not one long triumphant course. He often failed, as all who seek to "walk worthy of the vocation wherewith they are called," will often fail. His failures however were allowed for his "perfecting."

His first failure is related to Ishmael—a severe lesson regarding the flesh—repeated over and over again in the experiences of God's children. If any one had talked with Abraham then, he would have said with Paul, "not as though I had already attained, either were already perfected"; he would still be found "working out" with "fear and trembling." Abraham failed again in Gerar when he equivocated respecting Sarah. Now it is important to note that both these failures have reference to Sarah and the birth of Isaac. Abraham believed the stupendous promise of God, yet the trying of his faith found him at times wavering. At length Sarah does receive the promise and Isaac is born (xxi.); and the incident concerning Ishmael and Hagar is used as an allegory by the Apostle in Galatians to indicate the free sons connected with Jerusalem that is above, and the children of bondage connected with Jerusalem that is below, a distinction to be kept in mind when we consider the teaching of the Epistle to the Hebrews.

Gen. xxii. brings us to the supreme moment in Abraham's life and walk of faith. "God did tempt Abraham." The only son whom he loved, the child of promise is demanded of him. Possibly without saying a word to Sarah, Abraham rose up early and went through the fiery trial. Every detail given indicates the depth of his experiences.

He saddled the ass, he clave the wood, he went to the place of which God had told him. Oh, precious trial of faith, much more precious than gold that perisheth. Yet further details are given. The wood is laid upon the shoulders of the beloved son, the fire is in his hand, yea it is scorching his very heart, the knife he carries is cutting him deeper and deeper at every step. The final thrust must have come when Isaac turned his questioning eyes and said, "My Father." The faith of Abraham wavered no longer. Abraham had received Isaac as from the dead, and his faith accounted that God was able to raise him up even from the dead (Heb. xi. 19). The altar was built, the son was bound, the knife was raised, and then came the voice of the Lord Himself out of heaven saying, "Abraham, Abraham"! With what delight must the God of Abraham have uttered the words, "Now I know that thou fearest God." The Lord had more to say to Abraham, and the second time the angel of the Lord calls to Abraham and tells him that the Lord had said, "By Myself have I sworn, for because thou hast done this thing, and hast not withheld thy son, thine only one, that in blessing I will bless thee," &c. Let it be observed with attention that here are circumstances that differ from the record of Abraham's faith as given in Gen. xv. There it was a righteousness imputed to him that worketh not but believed, here in Gen. xxii., it is a blessing of the highest type given, "for because thou hast done this thing," and it cannot be said that works are not in view. Abraham at length has walked before God and has been "perfected."

In Heb. v. 11-14 two classes of believers are brought before us. The one class "dull of hearing" who had remained "babes," and were "unskillful in the word of righteousness." The word "unskillful" is most important. It is literally untempted. The others were "of full age"—literally perfect, and not only had senses (as a babe has them), but had "senses exercised." Heb. vi. leads on from this. After urging the believer to go on unto perfection, the Apostle refers again to those who were "dull of hearing," for the word "slothful" in Heb. vi. 12 is the same translated "dull" in Heb. v. This dullness or sloth has reference to "work and labour of love," "diligence to the full assurance of hope unto the end," "followers of them who through faith and patience INHERIT PROMISES" (verses 10-12), then comes the reference to Gen. xxii. with its great example of a tempted and perfected saint. Verse 15 concludes, "And so, after he had patiently endured, he obtained the promise."

Heb. xi. is full of those who were "perfected" in the same way. Abraham's great trial comes again to view (verses 17-19), and the list closes with those who through faith. . . . worked righteousness, obtained promises." Rom. iv. 4, 5, dealing with Abraham's faith as set forth in Gen. xv., denies works a place, but the same word is used in Heb. xi. 33 when dealing with the righteousness that is the fruit, the finished thing, the result of having been "perfected." James in his epistle deals with the same aspect of truth. He opens with the exhortation to "count it all joy when ye fall into divers temptations," and his reason is the same as that of "Hebrews"—it has a "perfecting" work. He, moreover, says, "Blessed is the man that endureth temptation; for when he is tried he shall receive the crown of life." Chapter ii. 17-26 deals with the question of "faith without works." It may be set out as follows:--

A1 | 17. Faith without works is dead.
  B1 | 18, 19. Faith and works. Example, Demons.
A2 | 20. Faith without works is barren (R.V.).
  B2 | 21-25. Faith and works. Example, Abraham and Rahab.
A3 | 26. Faith without works is dead.

The Apostle says that there is as much profit in faith without works, as there is in saying to a hungry man, "Be ye filled." Demons believe there is one God, nevertheless they tremble; there is no evidence of salvation in such faith. Abraham, however, who in Gen. xv. was "justified by faith without works," was "justified by works when he had offered Isaac his son upon the altar." The Apostle asks us, "Seest thou how faith worked with his works, and by works was faith made perfect?" The act of Gen. xxii. "fulfilled" the faith of Gen. xv. "Ye see then how that by works a man is justified, and not by faith only."

Many other passages of Scripture could be brought forward, but enough has been said for the purpose. Paul's "crown of righteousness" had reference to that righteousness which he had as a result of fellowship with Christ. Justified by faith, he had entered into the blessing of life and peace. An added revelation had shown him the new teaching concerning the One Body. This he had believed and preached. This new revelation did not stay at the manifestation of grace as set forth in Eph. i.-iii., but led on to even fuller fellowship with Christ, and revealed a "prize" in connection with the "high calling." That prize is referred to under various titles. It appears to be the "crown of righteousness," "the out-resurrection from among the dead," "the reward of the inheritance" (Col. iii. 24), the "working out" of the salvation given, "the obtaining of the salvation which is in Christ Jesus with eonian glory" (II Tim. ii. 10), "the reigning with Him" as a reward for enduring (II Tim. ii. 12), the "crowning" as a result of "striving lawfully," or "keeping the rules of the game" (II Tim. ii. 5). The fulness of Christ is the pivot of the teaching of Ephesians, that fulness which is His now at the right hand of God. The emptying of Christ is equally the glory of Philippians, the voluntary self-abnegation of the lowly life on earth. With this, the Apostle desires to have "fellowship"; those "sufferings" have a relation to "perfecting" (Heb. v. 8), and future glory. We hope to see this more clearly when we have considered a little more of Phil. iii. in our next article.

The apostle in verse 8 had spoken of the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus his Lord, and, in order to show that excellency, he leaves the main theme for a moment to tell us how his most treasured possessions were reckoned by him as worthless, so that he might gain Christ and be found in Him, having the righteousness which is through the faith of Christ. Having thus proved this point, the apostle returns to his interrupted theme, namely, the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus his Lord, and, resuming, tells of his desire > "Of the knowing of Him, and the power of His resurrection, and the fellowship of His sufferings, being conformed to His death."

It will be noticed that in both cases mention of the knowledge of Christ is followed by (1) suffering, and (2) gaining or attaining.

A | 8-. The knowledge of Christ.
B | -8-. Loss of all things (consequence).
C | -8, 9. So that I may gain Christ (goal).
A | 10-. The knowing of Him.
B | 10. Suffering and death (consequence).
C | 11. If by any means I may attain resurrection (goal).

In chapter i. is recorded the apostle's prayer for the Philippians:--

> "And this I pray that your love may abound in knowledge and in all discernment, so that ye may test the things that differ, and that ye may be sincere and without offence unto the day of Christ" (9, 10).

It will be seen that the apostle does not pray that the Philippians may know Him, and the hope of His calling; he does not pray that they may be taught their glorious position as members of the one body; he goes further, he prays that their knowledge may be accompanied by discernment, for things lie ahead that demand distinguishing. The prayer of Philippians is in harmony with the theme of the epistle, which is not the setting out of the grace of God as exhibited in Ephesians, but the call to those who have been thus blessed to "work out their own salvation with fear and trembling." This prayer has in view their sincerity and inoffensive character "in view of the day of Christ." The exhortation to "work out" their own salvation in chapter ii. is followed by the words, "that ye may be blameless and harmless, children of God without reproach." The apostle raises no query regarding their "sonship" (indeed the words "son" [huios] and "adoption" [huiothesia] do not occur in the epistle), but his concern is, that being children of God, they should be such "without reproach." In other words, the whole epistle revolves around the idea of "walking worthy of the calling," of "working out" the salvation, or as it is expressed in Phil. i. 29:--

> "Because to you it hath been given as a privilege on the behalf of Christ, not only to believe on Him, but also to suffer on His behalf."

This is something beyond the state of believing unto salvation, this is the stepping-out of faith in union with the Lord in a world that knows Him not, "a crooked and perverse generation." When the apostle says, therefore, in chapter iii. 10, "that I may know Him," we must remember how far and how deeply he had already progressed in the knowledge of his Lord. Evidently there was more before the apostle to know, and what that involved is immediately indicated by the words that follow, "and the power of His resurrection." Paul does not require knowledge as to the FACT of the resurrection of Christ, neither does he need an explanation as to HOW it was accomplished, his great concern is to know the POWER of it.

This cannot mean that he desire to penetrate into the mysteries of the unseen, and to know either the measure or the manner of the power that was needed to raise Christ from the dead, as a speculative knowledge; he desired it as something intensely practical. In Eph. i. 19, 20 the apostle prays that the saints may know the power exerted in the raising of Christ, but not as an isolated event, for his words are:--

> "And what the surpassing greatness of His power UNTO US WHO BELIEVE, according to the energy of the strength of His might, which He energised in Christ, when He raised Him from the dead and seated Him at His own right hand in the super-heavenlies."

Here are things that differ. The surpassing greatness of this power is unto us, its measure is according to the strength of the might which was put forth in the resurrection of Christ. This then is still the object of the apostle's desire in Phil. iii., "that I may know Him, and the power of His resurrection." Eph. vi. 10 brings these words together again in their practical application to the believer as viewed on active service:--

> "Finally, empower yourselves in the Lord, and in the strength of His might."

Eph. i. tells us of principalities and powers placed beneath the feet of Christ, Eph. vi. tells us that we too are called upon to overcome even as He overcame, and use the "power of His resurrection" to stand in the conflict with "principalities and powers."

There is one more item in Eph. vi. which, when seen, links this passage to the theme of Philippians the more, and that is the word translated in verse 13 "having done all"; it is the same word that is translated "work out" in Phil. ii. The word occurs but once more, and that in a similar context, in II Cor. iv. 17, where we read:--

> "For our light affliction, which is but for a moment, worketh out for us a far more exceeding aionian weight of glory."

This passage not only very fully demonstrates the fact that "working out" links suffering with glory, but is found in immediate and logical connection with a most lucid exposition of what the apostle means by the "power of His resurrection."

Chapters iii. and iv. contrast the ministry of the old covenant with that of the new, and after having shown the excellent glory of the new the apostle says:--

> "But we have this treasure in earthen vessels, in order that the excellency of the power may be of God and not of us."

The earthen vessel was the frail body of the apostle, and he continues by shewing, on the one hand, the almost unbearable afflictions that he passed through, and on the other, the marvellous power that sustained him.

"In everything

being afflicted,	but not distressed;
being perplexed,	but not in despair;
being persecuted,	but not forsaken;
being cast down,	but not destroyed."

Here is a series of afflictions, perplexities, persecutions, and casting down that would have shivered the earthen vessel if left to its own "power"; but in spite of all, we find the apostle not distressed, not in despair, not forsaken and not destroyed. What is the secret of his preservation? First, the afflictions he endured were of a special character. "Always bearing about the putting to death of Jesus in the body." The deliverance was special too, "in order that the life of Jesus also may be made manifest in our mortal flesh." No change therefore had come upon the physical nature of the apostle, he still speaks of his own body as "mortal flesh." He further says that he is sustained by the knowledge that though the outward man is perishing, the inward man is renewed day by day, "for our light affliction", etc.

One more link with Philippian teaching must be noted while we have the passage open before us. Verse 18 says, "while we look not at the things which are seen." The word "look" here gives us the word "mark" in Phil. iii. 14 and 17. II Cor. i. 8, 9 sums up the matter, proving that we have in this epistle the exhibition of "the power of His resurrection."

> "For we would not, brethren, have you ignorant of our trouble which came to us in Asia, that we were pressed out of measure (same word 'excellency' in iv. 7), above power (same word iv. 7), so that we despaired (same word iv. 8) even of life: but we had the sentence of death in ourselves, but in God Who raiseth the dead."

Paul's own testimony is given with great clearness in Gal. ii. 20:--

> "I have been crucified together with Christ, nevertheless I live; yet not I, but Christ liveth in me; and the life I now live in the flesh I live by the faith of the Son of God, Who loved me and gave Himself for me."

In an article in another series we show that "crucifixion" is something beyond being reckoned to have died with Christ; we cannot attempt to prove this here other than by calling attention to the usage of the doctrine in Gal. v. 24, where the "affections and desires" of the flesh are prominent, and in Gal. vi. 14, where in contrast to circumcision, which made a "fair show in the flesh," is set the cross of Christ.

That this has a special connection with Phil. iii. will be seen by noting that at the beginning the apostle says of those likeminded with himself, "we are the circumcision," and at the end of the chapter he contrasts himself with those who were enemies of the cross of Christ. Circumcision was a voluntary and a conditional covenant. Taking up one's cross is also voluntary and conditional act. The apostle in Phil. iii. breathes the prayer of his desire, "the fellowship of His sufferings." There is no voluntary act in the salvation that reaches down to those who were dead in sins—it is of grace apart from works; the believer, however, lives, and he may "go on to perfection", or he may shrink back and cast away his opportunities of winning the prize. He may have salvation, but he may fail to "work it out." True it is that the outworking will be as "God works in," but it is service that is being considered, and rewards, for which endurance is necessary.

If we marvel at the grace that saves us, what shall we say of the grace that promises to recognize the slightest act of service in His name, and accomplished by His power? To attain the prize of Phil. iii. it is necessary to have fellowship with his sufferings, this, however, does not come first; first of all is shown us the power that is ours for the conflict and the race—"the power of His resurrection."

We commend these and parallel scriptures to all our readers, praying that in the matter of salvation and service they may "try the things that differ," in view of the day of Christ.

"The Fellowship of His Sufferings." (Phil. iii. 10). pp. 109-112

In our previous article we considered the desire of the apostle to know "the power of His resurrection," and found that it had reference to the present time and to suffering in view of glory. We feel it to be necessary to emphasize these introductory passages, lest we fail to appreciate the strength of the words of verse 11, "if by any means I might attain unto the resurrection of the dead." The last clause of verse 11 requires so much alteration that we quote the A.V. until we have considered the wording in these articles. In the structure of verses 8-11 given on page 85, Paul's loss of all things corresponds with the fellowship of suffering and death of verse 10, while the result, "so that I may gain Christ," is exactly answered by the words of verse 11, "If by any means I may attain"; it is evident that the apostle has something before him that can only be attained as a result of endurance, loss, and suffering. It is foolish for us to turn away from this fact. True, we are under the dispensation of the grace of God, and that salvation is of grace, not works; is it less grace, or other than grace, if, after we have been saved with such a salvation, blessed with such blessings, comforted with such a hope, and honoured with such a citizenship, is it, we repeat, not more grace to promise to reward the feeble endurance in suffering which such saved ones may pass through in their endeavour to "walk worthy of the calling" in a world that hates their Lord? Surely, if from the moment of our conversion to the moment of our death our whole lives were to be one unremitting self-service, and martyrdom, it would be but our reasonable service, and could by no means be said to earn a reward; the reward, then, if given, must be another act of overflowing grace. Suffering with Christ is not to be viewed as something irksome, something to be endured with scant grace; Paul declares it to be an act of grace on the part of God to allow any of His believing people to enter into such a sacred fellowship, "For unto you it was graciously given in the behalf of Christ. . . . to suffer for His sake." It is important to remember that this same word comes in Heb. ii. 9, "Wherefore God. . . . hath graciously given Him the name which is above every name." The same verb expresses the act of God in granting to us the high privilege of suffering for Christ's sake and of granting to Christ the exalted name as a result of His deep humiliation and death. To share the blessedness and the glory of Christ is ours for ever, to share His reproach is ours now OR NEVER. When this brief pilgrimage has ceased, never more shall we be able to have such wondrous fellowship as "the fellowship of His sufferings." Among the sufferings that the Saviour endured, and in which Paul sought fellowship, was that of temptation and trial. "For in that He Himself hath suffered being tempted, He is able to succour them that are tempted." To be tempted, according to the teaching of Hebrews, and to endure, is a mark of full age or perfection. "For every one that useth milk is unskillful" (apeiros, from peirazo, to tempt or to try) (v. 13, 14). "Abraham, when he was tried (same word as 'tempted'), offered up Isaac" (xi. 17). "Others were stoned. . . . were tempted" (xi. 37). Thus it is that Christ is set forth in Hebrews as one to whom those suffering or tempted ones could go for help:--

> "For we have not an high priest which cannot be touched with (sumpatheõ, our word 'sympathy', literally 'to suffer together with') the feeling of our infirmities, but was in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin."

The words, "like as we are", are a free rendering of kathhomoioteta ("according to a likeness"). Heb. ii. 17 tells us that it was necessary for Him to be made like unto (homoiothenia) His brethren; while Phil. ii. 7 puts the being made in the likeness of men (homoiomati) as a part of the great humiliation that preceded His exaltation. The suffering of Christ also was that of the world's repudiation:--

> "Jesus. . . . suffered without the gate; let us go forth therefore unto Him without the camp, bearing His reproach, for here we have no continuing city but we seek one to come" (Heb. xiii. 12-14).

Here is fellowship with His sufferings, and one directly linked with the attitude of faithful Abraham, who

> "By faith sojourned in a strange land dwelling in tents. . . . for he looked for a city which hath the foundations whose builder and maker is God. . . . God hath prepared for them a city" (Heb. xi. 9-16).

Moses is given as an illustration of bearing reproach for Christ and suffering together with Him; he refused such a high dignity seems to involve the fact of having had the offer presented. Moses "chose rather" to suffer evil together with the people of God, than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season, esteeming the reproach of, and for, Christ greater riches than the treasures in Egypt: for he had respect unto the recompense of the reward (Heb. xi. 24-26). Egypt is a type of the world, and the believer who seeks the prize of Phil. iii. must make up his mind regarding the world, or he will fail. Within the circumference of the "world" some things are better than others, just as the flesh can produce many things that are lovely and beautiful, yet are they flesh still. The believer does not say that one kind of government may not be better than another, or one nation better than another, what he does learn from Scripture is that the world with its good and its bad is the world still. It is the world that hated and still hates Christ, and still hates all those who bear witness that its virtues as well as its vices have no acceptance with God. It is the world, the fashion of which passeth away, and which is not of the Father. We may look upon the marvellous mechanism of an engine of destruction, we may readily acknowledge the beauty of its design, the exhibition of patience and skill in its construction, but that does not prevent an argument that when that marvellous machine invades our land, leaving in its train suffering and death, it should not be destroyed. So with the world, admit all you may regarding the good things of civilization, they are all within the world's circumference and stand or fall together. Fellowship with His sufferings will involve reproach from the world.

> "Behold what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us, that we should be called the sons of God; therefore the world knoweth us not, because it knew Him not. . . . marvel not my brethren if the world hate you" (I John iii. 1, 13).
> "Love not the world neither the things that are in the world" (ii. 15).

Just as Moses suffered the loss of all things, and counted them as refuse for the excellency of Christ, so did Paul, and so must all who lay claim to the prize of the high calling. We cannot conduct a search into all the many phases of suffering with Christ, each one will pursue his appointed track, but we do believe that if any are to attain the likeness to the "body of His glory", they must in some measure have known something of the meaning of the body of humiliation. We take it that Paul's desire, as expressed in chapter i. 23, the "out resurrection" of chapter iii. 11, the "prize of the high calling" of chapter iii. 14, and the being fashioned like unto His body of glory of iii. 21, all refer to the same thing. The standing of the believer as a member of the one body is indefectible. To such and to such only is there presented the possibility of winning a prize and of attaining unto the "out resurrection". The indefectible standing is connected with the work of Christ for us, the attaining of the prize is connected with the outworking of His grace in us.

May we discern the things that differ, and lay aside every weight, run the race set before us, looking away unto the Lord, Who for the joy set before Him, endured a cross, despising the shame, and is set down at the right hand of the throne of God.

"He humbled Himself. . . . wherefore God hath highly exalted Him."

"Conformity unto His death" (Phil. iii. 10). pp. 121-125

Conformity to the death of Christ is the final term that the apostle uses in his statement of the steps that lead to attaining the resurrection of verse 11.

In chapter i. 21 he says, "For me to live is Christ, and to die gain". In chapter iii. he tells us that he counted all things as loss and refuse, that he might "gain" Christ. The climax of such abandonment is death. Of Christ it is said, in this context, that the lowest depth of His humiliation is marked by death, even the death of the cross. "The death of the cross" therefore is that which Paul has in mind when he says in Phil. iii. 10, "being made conformable unto His death". Even in that death the repudiation of the world is marked. No honours attend the burial, no monument marks the spot, it is the death of the cross. Paul does not pray for martyrdom, he does not ask that he might die as Christ died, he does pray that he might be made "conformable unto His death". The word used here is summorphoumenos. In verse 21, a verse which we believe answers very pointedly to verses 10 and 11, the word translated, "may be fashioned like", is summorphos, the one conformity is related to the other. If there be no conformity unto His death of shame, how can we claim verse 21 with its conformity to His body of glory?

"To conform" means literally "to make of the same form", and then, "to be in entire harmony with the object indicated"; the conformity which the apostle desired was not, as so many teach and desire, a conformity with His life on earth, but with His death. "What would Jesus do?" is misleading; the earthly life of the Lord Jesus is of the utmost importance to us both in its teaching and its help in understanding the nature and purpose of God: we must not confuse that with the teaching before us; to obtain the prize, conformity to His death is necessary. Paul has already spoken in this strain before; he says:--

> "Always bearing about in the body the dying ('deadness', see Rom. iv. 19) of Jesus, that the life of Jesus may also be manifested in our body" (II Cor. iv. 10).

The death of Christ is a wide term. From one aspect it stands alone, none can enter into fellowship with Him. In the capacity of the bearer of sin that sacrificial death would lose its saving power were it possible for even one to aspire to fellowship in it. But the death of Christ has other aspects; such a passage as I John iii. 16 will illustrate this:--

> "Hereby perceive we the love of God, because He laid down His life for us; and we ought to lay our lives for the brethren."

In this aspect the believer is called upon to be "conformed". Again, Eph. v. 2 presents another aspect of that death with which we may have fellowship:--

> "Walk in love, as Christ also hath loved us, and hath given Himself for us an offering and a sacrifice to God, for a sweet smelling savour."

Phil. iv. 18 uses the same words in reference to the kindly acts of the Philippians in ministering to the apostle's needs:--

> "But I have all and abound, I am full, having received of Epaphroditus the things which were sent from you, an odour of a sweet smell, a sacrifice well pleasing to God."

The words of I Pet. iv. 1-4 and 12-14, while referring indeed to the sufferings of Christ, give the same line of argument. Returning to the epistle to the Philippians, the great emphasis is placed upon the fact that the death of Christ was the death of the cross (Phil. ii. 8). This passage, as indeed the whole epistle, was not written to teach doctrine, but to enjoin practice. Philippians contains no reference to the doctrine of, or even the words, "Redemption through His blood, the forgiveness of sins". Sin and redemption are not under consideration, it is supposed that the reader has already believed the basic teaching of Ephesians, and desires to "walk worthy". That profound revelation, both of the person and work of Christ given in Phil. ii. 6-11, was written to give point to the exhortation, "Let this mind be in you, which was also in Christ Jesus", the lowest depth of His humiliation is sounded when we read the words, "and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross". It is to this aspect of His death that the apostle looks in iii. 10, and to this he looks when uttering his warning with weeping in verse 18, when he speaks of those whose walk showed them to be enemies of the cross of Christ.

In an article under the heading Things that differ, we show that fellowship with this aspect of Christ's death is voluntary. The cross had a meaning before Christ Himself was crucified, as may be seen by reading the closing verses of Matt. xvi. To take up one's cross was to deny one's self. We do not repeat ourselves here, but pass to yet another aspect; it is hinted in Phil. iii., but set out in Col. ii. In Phil. iii., before the apostle recounts his loss and his gain, or tells of his desire for the prize, he says:--

> "For we are the Circumcision, who are serving God in spirit, and boasting in Christ Jesus, and have no confidence in flesh" (3).

There is indirect allusion, by way of severe contrast, to this in verses 18, 19. In Col. ii. 11 we read how this circumcision was accomplished.

> "In whom ye were circumcised with a circumcision made without hands, in the putting off of the body of the flesh (no reference to sin, the A.V. reading is not supported by best texts) by the circumcision of Christ."

We said above that the taking up of our cross was a voluntary act, so also in some respects was the performance of the rite of circumcision. True, little children of eight days old could have no volition in the matter, but its institution and occasional examples help to show that it was something over and above a type of redemption. When and under what terms was circumcision instituted? In Gen. xv. we read that Abram believed in the Lord, and He counted it to him for righteousness. Paul, when quoting this in Romans iv., insists on the fact that Abram was uncircumcised. Some time elapses, and events transpire that show that Abram still had confidence in the flesh; true, Abram believed that which God had told him—so indeed did Sarai—but Hagar an Egyptian is brought in to help to accomplish the unconditional covenant of God! "and Abram was fourscore and six years old when Hagar bare Ishmael to Abram" (xvi. 16). Thirteen years pass by without record, and when Abram was ninety years old and nine, the Lord appeared to him and said, "I am the Almighty God (El Shaddai, 'the God Who is enough'), walk before Me, and be thou perfect" (xvii. 1). After speaking in unconditional terms during which Abram's name is changed, the Lord speaks of a covenant which Abraham was to keep (10):--

> "This is my covenant, which ye shall keep, between Me and you and thy seed after thee; every man-child among you shall be circumcised."

This is additional to the covenant already made with Abraham, and follows the covenant to walk before the Lord and be perfect. Circumcision may be expressed doctrinally as the repudiation of the flesh; to put away the flesh is not an easy thing, indeed it is painful in the extreme; to endeavour to consistently live as becometh this high standard will call one into fellowship with the suffering, the reproach, the hatred, the shame that made up the dreadful cup of Gethsemane and Calvary: this is conformity to His death. Crucifixion is the word used by inspiration to define the dread ordeal, "they that are Christ's crucified the flesh with the affections and desires" (Gal. v. 24). Paul's attitude to those who desired a fair show in the flesh was:--

> "God forbid that I should boast, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, whereby the world is crucified unto me, and I unto the world" (Gal. vi. 14).

Can we, with the things of this world clinging about us within and without, can we dare to say that crucifixion is not too strong a term? If we cannot, if the flesh in its many guises is still pampered, if the world, the highest and the best of the world, is not discerned as it is truly in the light of God, we must say, "not as though I had already attained, either were already perfected". To grasp the import of this conformity to the death of Christ is to have obtained the solution of the problem of what is, and what is not acceptable in the sight of God. The believer's duty in home, business, or State is not to be settled by expediency or custom, but by this touchstone—the death of the cross. It is a high standard, yet we dare not lower it, even though we condemn ourselves in the penning of these lines. Too lightly has the prize of the high calling been spoken of, as though it were within the grasp of all who have believed. Not merely the doctrinal reckoning to have died with Christ is here, but a desire that the present life should be conformable to that death.

We have been considering the inspired statement of the apostle's desires; he has expressed his ardent longing to know Him, to know the power of His resurrection, to know the fellowship of His sufferings, being made conformable to His death. With what object? Let the apostle answer, "If be any means I might attain unto the resurrection of the dead". It is evident by these words that the fellowship of His sufferings and conformity to His death are to be looked upon in some way as conditions. The previous statement of the apostle, where he said that his most treasured possessions he counted as dung, is directly connected with the desire, "that I may have Christ for my gain". Of a truth, as Paul himself could say, when a man can say, "for me to live is Christ", then he can also add, "and to die will be gain".

We cannot help but feel that these passages of chapter i. are closely related to the theme before us. To sum up one's life in the one name—Christ, is equivalent to having counted all things loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ, and includes the fourfold statement of iii. 10. So also, if to die is gain for the apostle, then he can truthfully say that he desired to depart and be with Christ which was far better. The theme is still more opened up in the passage before us.

First let us notice that the apostle expresses uncertainty of attainment. "If by any means" (eipõs). In Rom. i. 10 he says, "making request, if by any means now at length I might have a prosperous journey", and in xi. 14, "if by any means I may provoke to emulation them which are my flesh". In Acts xxvii. 12, 13 the sailors, by reason of the south wind blowing which made them suppose that they would obtain their purpose, departed from the Fair Havens, "if by any means they might attain to Phenice"; here we have a plain record of history, the facts of the case show that instead of reaching Phenice, the ship was caught in a tempest and made a total wreck. The words used by the Spirit of God in Acts xxviii. 12 are similar to those used by Paul. The shipmaster desired to attain to Phenice, Paul desired to attain to the special resurrection indicated in the verse before us; in both cases (indeed in all cases where eipõs is used), there is of necessity the introduction of uncertainty.

Before we go further we must make it clear that we are not dealing with the hope of our calling, but the prize of our calling. We mention this because some have apparently failed to distinguish between the blessed hope which is unconditional and certain, and the prize which none can say they have secured until they have finished their course.

The apostle continues in verses 12 and 13 to emphasize the uncertainty which he was in, "not as though I had already obtained (the prize), either were already perfect. Brethren, I count not myself to have laid hold"; every word is suggestive of the eager runner nearing the goal, but not having reached it, and therefore not yet certain of the prize. The same element of uncertainty arising from the same conditions is found in connection with another phase of this wide subject of reward.

> "Know ye not that those running in a race, all indeed run, but one obtains (same word as 'attain' in Phil. iii. 12) the prize (same word as in Phil. iii. 14). So run, that you may lay hold (same word as 'apprehend' in Phil. iii. 12); now every one that contends (for a prize) is temperate in all things, they indeed to obtain a perishable crown, but we an imperishable. I therefore so run as not uncertainly, so I combat as not beating the air; but I buffet ('weary', Luke xviii. 5) my body and lead it captive, lest after preaching to others, I myself should become disapproved" (I Cor. ix. 24-27).

No explanation is needed, for the passage speaks plainly for itself. Paul, saved by grace and absolutely certain of his position in Christ, when speaking of running for the prize, or wrestling for the crown (II Tim. ii.), not only refrains from saying he is certain of attaining, but goes so far as to admit of the possibility of becoming disqualified.

It is to our loss just here that the chapter division occurs. The questions that arise in the mind upon closing I Cor. ix. are anticipated and answered in chapter x. The word "moreover" in x. 1 is misleading, it is apt to make the reader think that a new subject is to be opened; the word is gar, and should be rendered "for", thereby linking chapter x. with ix., "for I wish you not to be ignorant brethren". Of what is the apostle speaking? Of a case illustrating the very point at issue. The lesson hinges upon the words "all" and "many"; five things are said of all Israel that passed out of Egypt under the protection of the sprinkled blood, viz.:--

(1). They were ALL under the cloud.
(2). They ALL passed through the sea.
(3). They were ALL baptized unto Moses.
(4). They did ALL eat the same spiritual meat.
(5). They did ALL drink the same spiritual drink.

But they did not ALL reach, "attain" the promised land, for the passage continues, "but with MANY of them God was not well pleased: for they were overthrown in the wilderness". If any one had said to Paul, But surely, you, with all that you have endured, with all your gifts and evident grace, surely you are certain of the prize?, Paul would have only to ask, Did Moses enter the promised land, or did he, after having preached to others, become disapproved? The passage continues with reference to the wilderness experience of Israel, concluding with the pertinent words, "Wherefore, let him that thinketh he standeth, take heed lest he fall". Then for their encouragement the apostle adds the gracious words:--

> "There hath no temptation taken you but such as is common to man; and God is faithful, Who will not suffer you to be tempted beyond what you are able; but with temptation, will make the issue ('end', Heb. xiii. 7) that you may be able to bear it."

The reader should now ponder the parallel teaching of Heb. iii. and iv. In conjunction with this section of I Cor. We do not think it likely that any reader of The Berean Expositor will be found boasting, where Paul himself spoke with humble uncertainty.

It is important that every word in this passage (Phil. iii.) should be given due consideration, we will therefore not conclude this article before noticing the word "attain". It is not the same as is used in the original of verse 12, and we must give each separate word its right place and meaning. The word "attain" in Phil. iii. 11 is katantaõ, to come, arrive, "then came he to Derbe", "he came to Ephesus", etc., etc., using the word in its primary significance, namely, that of arriving at the end of a journey. It is used in Acts xxvi. 7 in reference to the hope of arriving at the promise made to the fathers, and in Eph. iv. 13 of coming unto the unity of the faith. We must keep these few words of explanation in mind as we proceed.

Some reader may be anxiously waiting to interpose, But do you mean to say that Paul entertained any doubts as to arriving at the resurrection of the dead? So much depends upon the true understanding of the words, "The resurrection of the dead", that we refrain from saying more until the passage can be considered in our next article.

We saw sufficient in our previous article to realize that the words, "if by any means", and "not as though I had already attained", left room for uncertainty of attainment. What was it that the apostle was not certain that he would attain? The A.V. says, "the resurrection of the dead". This is so utterly opposed to the whole teaching of Scripture that every reader will agree that something more than appears upon the surface must be the meaning of this deep and difficult passage. In order to arrive at the meaning of the apostle, we must consider carefully and at some length the various expressions that are used concerning the resurrection, considering in every case the exact wording of the original. Commencing at the simplest expression of all, we note the words anastasis nekrõn. In Acts xxiii. 6 Paul says:--

> "Brethren, I am a Pharisee, the son of a Pharisee; of the hope and resurrection of the dead I am called in question".

We can safely say, from the earlier verses of Phil. iii., that Paul was not anxiously striving to attain to that which was his hope when an unconverted Pharisee. Mark ix. 9, 10 depends for its true understanding upon the recognition of a small word ek, meaning "out of". We urge upon the reader to notice what a difference to the meaning of the passage the true appreciation of this little preposition has.

> "And as they came down from the mountain, He charged them that they should tell no man what things they had seen, till the Son of man were risen from the dead; and they kept that saying within themselves, questioning one another what the rising from the dead should mean".

It appears from this passage that either:--

> (1). The apostles Peter, James, and John did not even believe that which was an article of faith among the Pharisees, or > (2). That the Lord had said something that introduced a new factor into the teaching of the resurrection.

Something evidently puzzled them, for they did not question the fact of resurrection, but "what the rising from the dead should mean". Their perplexity finally framed itself in the question, "Why say the Scribes that Elias must first come?" The Lord had not used the ordinary expression, anastasis nekrõn, but had added the word ek, saying, literally, "till the Son of man were risen out from the dead", and they questioned what the meaning of the rising "out from the dead" should be. It is evident that they perceived that the presence of the preposition ek indicated a resurrection prior to that of "the last day" (John xi. 24), yet seeing that the Scribes taught that Elias must first come, how could that be possible? We are not immediately concerned with the explanation that follows, our only object being to establish the scripture fact that the Lord here introduces as something new a resurrection that takes place earlier than was originally expected, and that the only word that indicates this tremendous change is the little word ek. This new expression, if recognized, gives point to the reply of Abraham to the rich man:--

> "If they hear not Moses and the Prophets, neither will they be persuaded though one rose out from the dead" (Luke xvi. 31; see verses 27-30).

It is this new expression that Paul uses in Rom. i. 4 when he says concerning Christ, that He was "declared to be the Son of God with power, according to the spirit of holiness, by the resurrection out from the dead". Luke xx. 35 introduces us to a passage somewhat parallel, though not quite, with Phil. ii. 11:--

> "But they which shall be accounted worthy to attain the age, and the resurrection the one out from the dead, neither marry nor are given in marriage".

Here, the presence of the word "the" is important. It is the resurrection, that special one that is out from among the dead, which they that are worthy obtain. There is yet another form of expression, and this occurs in Acts xxvi. 23:--

> "That Christ should suffer, and that He should be the first that should rise from the dead".

Here, the word ek instead of coming before dead comes before the word resurrection, and so we read is ex anastasis nekrõn, "an out resurrection of dead ones". The special emphasis given here seems to be that Christ was the FIRST to so rise.

We now come to the fullest expression of all, not merely a resurrection of dead ones, not merely a resurrection out from dead ones, not even an out resurrection of dead ones, but the OUT resurrection that which is OUT from dead ones, ten exanastasin ten ek nekrõn (Phil. iii. 11; see next of Lachman, Tischendorf and Tragelles).

It will be seen that the apostle was not thinking of the resurrection in its wide aspect. Seeing that he belonged to Christ, by his own teaching he was sure of participating in the resurrection of those who were Christ's at His coming. The only alternative before us is that he was seeking something different, something possibly better, and something in the way of a prize. Hebrews xi. 35 acquaints us with a resurrection that was to be "obtained", and which was called, "a better resurrection". The verse speaks of two resurrections, (1) a resurrection which was in the nature of a deliverance, and (2) while others (not accepting deliverance by that means) suffered to the full in order that they might obtain a better resurrection. Hebrews xii. is devoted to the subject of "Sons" and "Firstborn". All sons are not necessarily "firstborn". The position of the firstborn is one of special privilege in the Scriptures. These Hebrews, while being "holy brethren and partakers of the heavenly calling", were warned of the dangers of "letting slip" (ii. 1), of seeming to "come short" (iv. 1), of being "slothful" (vi. 12), of "drawing back" (x. 38), and of "casting away their confidence with its great recompense of reward" (x. 35). Were they going to fail? Were they, though delivered from Egypt, to fall in the wilderness? Were they going to "sell their birthright" for a little ease in this life? If so, the "better resurrection" of Heb. xi. 35 could not be theirs, for that was only attainable by those who had been "perfected" (xi. 40, and the whole teaching of the epistle, which see later under the title "perfected"). The second half of Heb. xii. deals with the firstborn and their inheritance.

Hebrews xii. 15-24.

A | 15-17. The forfeited birthright (prõtotokia).
B | 18-21. Mount Sinai.
B | 22-. Mount Sion.
A | -22-24. The attained birthright (prõtotokos).

Esau is brought forward as an example of how these Hebrew believers might forfeit their birthright and special position as the firstborn. Mount Sion is the goal of the "heavenly calling", the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem, and an innumerable company of angels, a full festival, and the church of the firstborn having been enrolled in heaven, and to God the Judge of all, and the spirits of perfected righteous ones. We call special attention to the fact that it is not the perfecting of the spirits that is here intended, but that here are the spirits of "perfected righteous ones". This is in many points parallel with the teaching of Phil. iii., the city on the one hand is the heavenly Jerusalem, the citizenship on the other is "in heaven"; the "perfected" ones are the ones who find their place alongside of the innumerable company of angels; the "perfected" ones alone could attain to the "out resurrection" of Phil. iii.

These passages refer to different spheres, but are found running in parallel lines, and throw light upon our subject. Angels are "spirits" (i. 7 and 14), and angels are spoken of together with these "spirits" of perfected righteous ones. We have already referred to the passage which says that those who are accounted to attain that age are "like unto the angels". Creed speak of the resurrection of the "body", the Word speaks of the resurrection of the "dead". Some will have one kind of body, some another, God giveth a body as it hat pleased Him, and to every seed his own body; there are "heavenly bodies" (I Cor. xv. 40) to fit a "heavenly calling", as there will be "earthly bodies" to fit the earthly calling. "There is a natural (soul) body, there is also a spiritual body". The spiritual is found alone in the sphere of resurrection. Some will say, How are the dead raised up, and with what body do they come? We can only quote the apostle's reply, "thou sowest not that body that shall be, but bare (literally 'naked', as every child of Adam) grain". Paul had no desire to be "found naked", but rather "clothed upon" with the house which was awaiting him in the heavens (II Cor. v. 1-10). This, however, must not be taken as having reference to the resurrection pure and simple, but must be viewed in its context. Suffering was "working out" glory (iv. 17), and this was in view of the judgment seat of Christ (v. 10, 11). In other words, II Cor. v. 1-10 is a prize rather than a hope. What therefore was before the apostle when he eagerly sought to attain the "out resurrection out from dead ones"? It was that he might "depart and be with Christ", and not fall asleep and wait until the day of resurrection for the church as a whole. This was the "prize", prefigured in the case of Enoch who "pleased" God and was taken by God. In Enoch's case he did not see death; in Paul's he knew that he would see death, but he knew there was a possibility of departing and being with Christ, and could therefore say that he was "willing to be absent from the body, and to be present with the Lord".

The scriptural doctrine of the state of the dead is in no-wise altered. This "out resurrection" is an exceptional case, to be entertained only with "fear and trembling" by those who "work out their own salvation", who suffer with Christ, who have been conformed unto His death, if by any means they may attain unto this added bliss. Many passages will be calling for consideration as a result of this statement we know, and we hope to be able to deal with them all. We must not, however, stay longer upon this one feature, as there are some weighty words to be considered in Phil. iii. before we have obtained an all-round understanding of the character of those who may have some assurance that such a "prize" is within the possibility of their achievement.

Things that Differ.

The Blood of Christ. Its Scriptural Limitations. pp. 53-57

There are two references to the blood of Christ in the Epistle to the Romans, both of which add to our understanding of the doctrine attached to it.

> "Whom God hath set forth to be a propitiation through faith in His blood, to declare His righteousness for the remission of sins that are past, through the forbearance of God" (iii. 25).
> "Much more then, being now justified by His blood, ye shall be saved from wrath through Him" (v. 9).

In the first passage Christ is spoken of as "set forth to be a propitiation". "Set forth" (proetheto) is the middle voice, and means, "set before oneself", i.e., God set the propitiation before Himself as the basis of His attitude to man, and the justification of His passing by the sins that had taken place before the coming of Christ. The same word is translated in the two other occurrences "purposed" (Rom. i. 13 and Eph. i. 9). God purposed that Christ should be a "propitiation" hilasterion). This word occurs only once more, in Heb. ix. 5, where it refers to the "mercy seat" that was placed in the Tabernacle. Upon this mercy seat the blood was sprinkled on the great day of atonement (Lev. xvi. 14, 15). Sins were "covered" for a year, typically atoned for, the real atonement being only possible by the blood of Christ. Instead of saying that atonement is an Old Testament doctrine, and not to be used of the offering of Christ, we ought to say, rather, that the "atonements" of the Old Testament were only typically so, in reality they were merely "coverings", Christ alone put away sin, and made an atonement.

The point, however, in the verse for our special notice is, that whatever meaning may attach to the word rendered "propitiation", it does not apply universally, as does the death of Christ. It is limited in its application by the words that follow, "through faith in His blood". Note also the context,

> "The righteousness of God which is THROUGH FAITH of Jesus Christ unto all them that BELIEVE. . . . that He might be just, and the justifier of him who is of the FAITH of Jesus. . . . the law of FAITH. . . . we reckon that a man is justified by FAITH. . . . one God who shall justify the circumcision out of FAITH, and the uncircumcision through the FAITH. . . . His FAITH is counted for righteousness" (iii. 22 - iv. 5).

Nothing can be clearer than that without faith in the blood of Christ there can be no propitiatory, no mercy seat. The faith, too, is said to be "in His blood". No other conception will do. It is not a question of believing that there is one God, for we know that demons believe that, yet tremble. It is not a question of believing the good news of the kingdom; that brings no justification with it. Justification is "by His blood", and Christ is a mercy seat only to those who "have faith in His blood". The two references in Rom. v. 1-9 link the same thought together. "Being justified by faith. . . . being now justified by His blood". While the Epistle to the Romans links justification with the blood of Christ, Hebrews connects cleansing and sanctification with it.

> "For if the blood of bulls and goats, and the ashes of an heifer, sprinkling the unclean, cleanseth to the purification of the flesh; how much more shall the blood of Christ, Who, through the eonian Spirit, offered Himself without spot to God, purify your conscience from dead works unto serving the living God" (Heb. ix. 13, 14).
> "Wherefore Jesus also, that He might sanctify the people with His own blood, suffered without the gate" (Heb. xiii. 12).

Entry into the holiest is by the blood of Christ, as set forth in type in the offerings of the law (Heb. ix. 7, 12; x. 19). It is spoken of as "the blood of the eonian covenant" (Heb. xiii. 20), and "the blood of the covenant" (Heb. x. 29).

The first Epistle to the Corinthians refers to the blood of Christ three times, and in one connection only. "The communion of the blood of Christ" (x. 16), "the new covenant in My blood" (xi. 25), "guilty of the body and blood of Christ" (xi. 27). Each reference has to do with the Lord's Supper. There is no reference to the blood of Christ in Galatians, neither is there in II Corinthians, Philippians, Thessalonians, Timothy or Titus. Ephesians speaks of the blood of Christ in two connections, "redemption", and being "made nigh" (i. 7; ii. 13). Col. i. 14 is to be omitted according to best Greek texts. Col. i. 20 refers to the blood of Christ in "making peace" in connection with reconciliation. I Pet. i. 2 speaks, as the Epistle to the Hebrews does, of the blood of "sprinkling". This "sprinkling" is used entirely in connection with Israel, for it occurs nowhere else in the New Testament, but in Hebrews and I Peter.

What is the meaning of the "blood of sprinkling"? The Greek word rhantizõ stands for two Hebrews words translated "sprinkle" in the O.T., and therefore a detailed examination of the words is not necessary in this article. We are more concerned about the teaching of the act of sprinkling. The books of Leviticus and Numbers contain the clearest indications of its meaning.

Blood, oil, and the water of separation are said to be sprinkled in these two books. The Epistle to the Hebrews connects sprinkling with purifying (ix. 13, 14), the dedication of the old covenant (ix. 18-20), and the tabernacle and vessels (ix. 21). That "cleansing" is a prominent idea in the sprinkling is evident from verse 22, "And almost all things by the law are purged (cleansed) with blood". Heb. xii. 24 links the Mediator of the new covenant with the blood of sprinkling which speaketh better than Abel. Some by Cain that cried from the ground. The fact that the "better" things of Hebrews are all to do with the new covenant as compared with the old, and that Abel and his offering heads the list in Heb. xi., whereby he received testimony that he was righteous, and, still more to the point, that by it, though Abel be now dead, he yet speaks, shows that the offering of Abel is intended. This links xi. 4 with xii. 24. The incident of Gen. iv. revolves around the forfeiture of birthright, just as the case of Esau (Heb. xii. 16), the position of blessing indicated by the same word in xii. 23. The spirits of righteous men perfected, and the fact that nearly every reference to Abel in the New Testament declares him to be righteous, and shows how he was perfected through suffering, are added witnesses (Matt. xxiii. 35; Luke xi. 51; Heb. xi. 4; I John iii. 12). Although the twelfth of Hebrews is not our exposition just now, it is well to note that it is not the spirits of just men that are said to be perfected, it is rather the spirits of perfected righteous ones (see James ii. 22), but of this we hope to speak when considering The Hope and the Prize.

Coming back to the 1st Epistle of Peter, and remembering the teaching of Hebrews, we understand the meaning of the passage, "unto obedience and sprinkling of the blood of Jesus Christ", so far as the reference to sprinkling is concerned. The real teaching of I Peter seems to have been much confused, particularly the special aspect, "the end of your faith, even the salvation of your souls", but of this we shall be able to speak more clearly when considering The Hope and the Prize as referred to above. The redemption, likewise, by the precious blood of Christ, spoken of in I Pet. i. 18, 19, is nearly always quoted with reference to sin and sinners in general which, while being a truth, is not the teaching of I Pet. i. 18, 19; there the redemption is "from your vain conversation (foolish manner of life), received by tradition from your fathers". This redemption is a deliverance from Judaism and tradition. The theme is developed in the second chapter, where the Apostle, speaking of the remnant of Israel who believed and who were called to be a chosen generation, a kingly priesthood, says, "unto you therefore which believe is the preciousness", the preciousness of the blood (ii. 7), and of the rejected foundation stone (ii. 4).

John in his first epistle refers to the blood of Christ. First as that which cleanseth from all sin while walking in the light of God's presence. What the sprinkling of the blood before the vail, upon the altar, and upon the vestments and vessels meant in type, the blood of Christ means in reality (I John i. 7). The reference in I John v. 6 is personal to Christ Himself. It is a context where the great theme is "the witness of God concerning His Son" (v. 9). The Apostle has before him the Gnostic heresy, the spirit of Antichrist which denied the Father and the Son. Against the teaching that upon a man, Jesus, descended the Christ at baptism, but which left him before crucifixion, the Apostle John writes in I John v. 6-8:--

> "This is He who came through water and blood, Jesus Christ, not by the water only, but by the water and by the blood. . . . there are three that bear witness, the Spirit and the water and the blood, and these three are unto the unity."

Not merely the unity of their agreement, but the very case in point, the unity of the Person of Christ. He was Jesus the Christ before baptism, and after the crucifixion—the threefold witness is unto the unity. There remains only four references in the book of Revelation. Chapters i. 5, v. 9 and vii. 14 speak of being "loosed from sins", "redeemed" and "made white" by the blood of Christ. xii. 11 speaks of overcoming by the blood of the Lamb.

It will be seen that no passage speaks of the blood of Christ in the universal terms of I Cor. xv. 22. Within the grand circumference of the death of Christ as seen over against the death brought in by Adam there are circles, higher in blessing, though narrower in scope. The forgiveness, peace, justification by faith, access as true worshippers, cleansing, the dedication of a new covenant, the deliverance from the vain traditions of Judaism, the power to overcome even in the time of greatest persecution, these are the themes connected with the blood of Christ. While we rejoice to know that the Lord Jesus offered one sacrifice unto perpetuity, never to be repeated, yet we are equally taught that that one offering has more than one aspect, and more than one effect. This will be still further seen when we consider the references to the Cross, and to the Sufferings, both a part of the one offering, yet capable of being viewed as distinct in their respective applications.

The Cross of Christ in relation to Suffering and Glory. pp. 89-93

We have seen that the Scriptures, while viewing the offering of the Lord Jesus Christ as one, connect different results with the different phases of that one offering. The death of Christ, we found, covered all who died in Adam, whereas the blood of Christ was shed in a covenant capacity, or is essentially related to faith. We have already alluded to the analogy of the various Levitical offerings. All our readers would agree, we trust, that the sin-offering, the peace-offering, and the whole burnt-offering are directly typical of the one sacrifice offered by Christ, yet we believe that they would equally assert that the doctrine that pertains to the sin offering differs very essentially from that of the whole burnt offering. As it is in the type, so it is in the Antitype, we must be prepared, in this, to try the things that differ.

We now consider the teaching of the Scriptures concerning the cross of Christ. There must have been some real reason in the divine plan that made so shameful a death a necessity. Had death simply been necessary, there were various ways in which such death could have been endured, without the suffering and the shame of the cross. The death could have taken place without the necessity of the shedding of blood, hence, these various aspects of the one great offering are to be distinguished, and their various effects kept apart. To confound things that differ here at the very centre of things must of necessity lead to grievous errors. If the truth that Christ died for all is taken as tantamount to teaching that He shed His blood for all, that He endured the cross for all, that He suffered for all, then all without exception must receive the results. But if the death for all is wider in its scope than the shedding of the blood of the covenant, then to teach universal salvation from I Cor. xv. 22 may prove to be as illogical as it appears to be unscriptural.

It is a fact that calls careful attention that the first references to a cross in the N.T. are made by the Lord to His disciples, before He told them that He Himself was to be put to death by crucifixion. This indicates that the cross had some definite association, and it will be well for us to allow the Lord's own lesson to take its place before we attempt to discover the deeper meaning of the cross of Christ.

Matt. x. 38; xvi. 24; Mark viii. 34; x. 21; Luke ix. 23; and xiv. 27 are the reference to those passages which we quote in order that their combined testimony may be unmistaken.

> "He that loveth father or mother more than Me, is not worthy of Me; and he that loveth son or daughter more than Me is not worthy of Me. And he that taketh not his cross, and followeth after Me is not worthy of Me. He that findeth his soul (psuche) shall lose it, but he that loses his soul on My account shall find it."
> "Then said Jesus unto His disciples, If any one wishes to come after Me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross and follow Me. For whosoever may wish to save his soul shall lose it; and whosoever loses his soul on My account shall find it. For what is a man profited, if he should gain the whole world and suffer loss of his soul; or what shall a man give as a ransom for his soul? For the Son of man shall come in the glory of His Father with His mighty angels, and then shall He reward every man according to his works."

Mark viii. 34-38 is similar to Matt. xvi. 24-27, therefore we refrain from quoting it here. Mark x. 21 must be read in its context. Someone came and asked the Lord what he should do that he might inherit aionian life. The Lord referred him to the commandments. All these he had kept from his youth.

> "Then Jesus beholding him loved him, and said unto him, One thing thou lackest: go thy way, sell whatever thou hast, and give to the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven, and come, take up the cross and follow Me."

Luke ix. 23-26 is very similar to Matt. xvi. 24-27 and Mark viii. 34-38. Luke xiv. 27 is set in a context similar to that of Matt. x. 38 quoted above. The words of Matt., "to love more than", are exchanged here for a strong figure, "to hate". The passage is immediately followed by two parables, where the great point is "counting the cost", and concludes:--

> "So likewise, whosoever he be of you that forsaketh not all that he hath, he cannot be My disciple."

Every passage is insistent upon one aspect of truth. The denial of self and all thins that pertain to this life, even extending to the dearest of earthly kinships. There is also in each case a reference to future recompense. The cross is associated with the crown, the suffering with the glory, the loss with the gain. It would be too great a digression to deal with the use of the word "soul" in these passages. Suffice it to say that these and similar passages have no connection with salvation in its evangelical sense. This study we can reserve (together with any other side issues), for the close of this series. We feel that unless we are fully aware of the context of the Lord's references to the cross as a mark of self-denying discipleship, we shall possibly miss the true significance of the cross of Christ itself, and be liable to import lessons and doctrines foreign to it.

The cross of Christ is not referred to in the epistle to the Romans. That such a basic epistle, dealing with such fundamentals as justification by faith, should be under no necessity to refer directly to the cross of Christ, is a fact that needs to be kept in mind. In I Cor. i. 17, 18 the apostle refers to it:--

> "For Christ sent me not to baptize, but to preach the gospel; not with wisdom of words, lest the cross of Christ be made of none effect. For the preaching of the cross is to them that perish foolishness; but unto us that are saved it is the power of God."

So in verse 21 we read of "the foolishness of the proclamation", and in verse 23 of a "stumbling block" and "foolishness", "that no flesh should boast in His presence. . . .

He that boasts, let him boast in the Lord". Chapter ii. continues in the same strain. Instead of "wisdom of words" the apostle, with a determination that cost him great trial, preached the cross of Christ, repudiating the so-called wisdom of men.

As we shall devote a special study to the references to the word "crucify", we pass on to Galatians where the cross is again referred to.

> "And I, brethren, if I yet preach circumcision, why do I yet suffer persecution? then is the offence of the cross ceased" (Gal. v. 11).
> "As many as desire to make a fair show in the flesh, they constrain you to be circumcised; only lest they should suffer persecution for the cross of Christ. . . . that they may boast in your flesh, but it is not becoming to me to boast, save in the cross of the Lord Jesus Christ, whereby the world is crucified unto me, and I unto the world" (Gal. vi. 12-14).

I Corinthians opposes the cross of Christ to the wisdom of men and the boasting in the flesh. Galatians opposes the cross of Christ to the attempt to avoid persecution, to avoid the offence of the cross, to make a fair show in the flesh, and to boast in the flesh. Ephesians, Philippians, and Colossians are epistles of the dispensation of the mystery, so we will examine the one other reference first, namely, that of Hebrews xii. 2. It is striking to observe that in no epistles, except those of St. Paul, do we find the words "the cross", and "crucify", neither Peter, James, John nor Jude uses either word. Heb. xii. 2 brings the references in the Gospels and Epistles to a completion. This reference, however, is so vitally linked with the theme of the epistle, that we cannot appreciate its teaching, position, or bearing upon the passages quoted above without considering the epistle as a whole. To do this we must devote the space of one article. It will be well worth the time and space, and therefore we defer any further remarks upon this subject until we are able to do so in the added light of the teaching of the epistle to the Hebrews.

The Cross of Christ.
Its relation to the Crown and the Prize.
pp. 117-121

In our last article we considered the teaching of the early references to the cross, and in this we are to consider the last reference, which will, we believe, give a clear understanding of the scriptural position that the cross has in the great plan of redemption. Let us remember that the cross had a definite meaning before the Lord Jesus Christ ever made it clear that He Himself was to be crucified. The close link which He has made between the disciple and his Lord compels us to believe that when the Lord of glory stooped to the death of the cross, He did not introduce thereby some entirely new conception, but fulfilled, as none other could fulfil, the meaning He Himself had in mind when He called upon His disciples to deny themselves, take up their cross, and follow Him. Heb. xii. 2 is the reference which will occupy our attention for a while.

> "Looking off unto Jesus, the captain (archegos) and perfecter (teleiõtes) of faith Who for the joy set before Him, endured a cross, despising the shame, and hath sat down at the right hand of the throne of God."

The most casual reader of Heb. xii. will not fail to be impressed with the fact that this verse is the grand conclusion towards which the apostle has been leading. We look back to the first verse; this in turn directs us to the eleventh chapter, which grows out of chapter x., until, such is the organic living unity of the Word, to really understand one verse necessitates understanding the general theme of the whole epistle. In such a series as this a detailed examination of such an epistle is out of the question. There is, we believe, scarcely a more misunderstood epistle, and as soon as space is available we hope to deal with it in these pages.

The great key word of the epistle is the word "Perfect", and its derivatives, which occur fourteen times. The idea expressed in the words, "let us go on unto perfection", is the idea of the book. The word which the A.V. translates "author" in xii. 2 is translated "captain" in xii. 10, and there, as in xii. 2, He is "perfected through suffering", and "for the suffering of death crowned with glory and honour", although at present "we see not yet all things put under Him". In leading many sons to glory He Himself passed through the discipline of suffering. For Him as for them the crown was the outcome of the cross.

When the apostle borrows from the typical history of Israel to enforce the lesson of the epistle, to what section does he turn? Does he speak of the typical teaching of the Passover? No, for redemption is not his theme; the epistle to the Hebrews is not addressed to unsaved ones, but to "holy brethren, partakers of the heavenly calling". Does the apostle draw from the typical kingdom of David and Solomon? No, for the kingdom of peace and glory had not yet come. He takes us to the period of the wilderness, after the redemption from Egypt, and before the entry into the land of promise.

> "With whom was He grieved forty years? Was it not with them that had sinned, whose carcasses fell in the wilderness? And to whom sware He that they should not enter into His rest, but to them that believed not?" (Heb. iii. 17, 18).

What is the conclusion of and the reason for this reference?

> "Let us therefore fear, lest a promise being left us of entering into His rest, any of you should seem to come short of it. . . . let us labour therefore to enter into that rest, lest any man fall after the same example of unbelief" (Heb. iv. 1, 11).

This unbelief is not the unbelief of the unbeliever, but of the brethren (see iii. 12). Typically, at least, every Israelite who left Egypt was redeemed, yet many fell in the wilderness. This did not undo their redemption, but they forfeited the land of promise. Even Moses lost this, and none of us would say that Moses was himself lost, though he might have been a loser. Changing the example somewhat, the apostle in chapter v. 7, 8 adverts to the "perfecting" of Christ:--

> "Though He was a Son ('was' is correct, 'were' is hypothetical. 'He was a Son, yet –') yet learned He OBEDIENCE by the things which He suffered, and having been perfected He became the author of aionian salvation unto all them that OBEY Him."

Notice again, it is not the faith of the sinner believing unto salvation, but the obedience of sons which by its perfecting fits for the aionian salvation, which was typified not by the deliverance from Egypt (which all Israel had), but by the entry into the promised land (which only some of Israel obtained). A word of rebuke is then given to those who were "dull of hearing", who failed to get beyond babyhood, and who could not go on unto perfection. The problem of vi. 4-6 is solved in the light of the wilderness experiences of Israel. Coming to his point, the apostle says that he does not want them to be "slothful, but followers of them who, through faith and patience, INHERIT THE PROMISES" (12). Then follows the great example of Abraham, and his patient endurance which "obtained the promise", and the fact that the Lord Jesus in the capacity of that High Priest who met the victorious Abraham has "run before" the race, and received the crown.

Chapters vii. - x. must be passed over in this survey until we reach verse 32. The Hebrew believers are reminded of the days when they did endure, when they did take joyfully the spoiling of their goods, and they were urged not to cast away their confidence, "which hath great recompense of reward." "For ye have need of patience", continued the apostle, "that after ye have done the will of God, ye might receive the promise". The link with chapter vi. is very evident. It is still more so in the verses that follow. Such is the reference to "drawing back", as contrasted with those that "believe unto the purchasing (or acquiring) of the soul". This strange rendering sends the mind back at once to the references in Matthew which speak of losing the soul in order to find it. "The saving of the soul" is usually interpreted to mean nothing more than the salvation of the sinner. This we believe to be quite a mistake. The question of losing, gaining, and saving the soul has reference to "things that accompany salvation". This will be easy of proof when we deal with the epistle.

Following immediately upon this sharp contrast between those who live by faith and those who draw back, is the inspired definition of xi. 1, a much mis-applied verse. To teach as a scriptural truth that the faith of the sinner believing unto salvation is the substance of things hoped for, and the evidence of things not seen, is a misuse of the verse. The apostle is emphasizing living by faith, of going on unto perfection and of not missing the promise by drawing back. By this faith the elders were attested. Every example given in Heb. xi. is the faith of the believer who seeks to walk worthy of his calling. How much untruth has been written in connection with Abel's offering! How few seem to see that the great point the apostle makes is not that he was justified by faith, but that "he obtained witness that he was righteous". (So also in I John iii. 12, "works were righteous", and Matt. xxiii. 35, "righteous Abel"). Heb. xi. has no concern as to how Abel was justified; it is written to show that being justified Abel acted in harmony with such a calling. So with all the examples that follow. They all suffered, they gave up place, position, wealth, they became tent dwellers and wanderers, they looked for a city which had foundations—a heavenly one. These were the early members of the heavenly calling, they "worked righteousness, obtained promises". Yet—

> "these all, having been attested through faith, received not the promise, God having provided some better thing for us*, that they without us* should not be perfected" (xi. 39-40).

Then follow the words of xii. 1-4:--

> "Wherefore seeing we also are compassed about with so great a cloud of witnesses (i.e., those already mentioned in Heb. xi., not the modern meaning of 'spectators'), let us lay aside every weight (a swelling or a tumour, excess of flesh, which regarded physically, or spiritually, would hinder running), and the closely surrounding sin (the apostle alludes to the hampering effect of flowing robes—meaning that the runner must 'gird up the loins' and free his limbs), and let us run with patience the race lying before us, looking off unto Jesus, the captain and perfecter of faith, Who for the joy lying before Him, patiently endured a cross, despising the shame, and hath sat down at the right hand of the throne of God. For consider Him Who patiently endured such a contradiction of sinners against Himself, lest ye be wearied and faint in your souls. Ye have not yet resisted unto blood, striving against sin."

The full bearing of this passage is more easily seen when the structure is discovered. We give it therefore, as follows:--

Heb. xii. 1-4.

A | Lay aside entangling sin.
B | a | The agony (agõni, contest, struggle) set before us (prokeima).
b | c | Looking off unto Jesus.
d | Captain and perfecter of faith.
B | a | The joy set before Him (prokeimai).
b | d | Cross, shame, right hand.
c | Consider Him Who endured.
A | Striving against sin.

The race set before us is echoed by the joy set before Him. Those who are "good and faithful servants" enter into the "joy" of their Lord. The "race" and "the joy" set before the believer and the Lord has been already referred to in a similar context of overcoming and "patiently enduring", namely, Heb. vi. 18, "the hope set before us". Heb. vi. 1 says, "Let us go on unto perfection". Heb. xiii. 13, 14 says, "Let us go forth therefore unto Him without the camp, bearing His reproach. For here we have no continuing city, but we seek one to come". The reference to the reproach and the city will establish the link with Heb. xi. The whole epistle is taken up with the pursuit of this theme. The perfecting of the believer, and the example of the perfecting of the Lord Jesus Christ (Heb. ii. 10; v. 8, 9; vii. 28, margin), the captain and perfecter of faith. The culminating suffering and reproach in which "He learned obedience and was perfected" was the death of the cross. Evangelical preaching has always maintained a foremost place in its message for the cross of Christ. Readers must weigh the Scriptures over, and of course come to their own conclusions. So far as we see the teaching of the Word, the message of the cross, with the related doctrine of "crucifixion", is a message more for the saint than for the sinner. In our next two articles we hope to deal with the references to the cross in the Prison Epistles, and the doctrine of the crucifixion as it relates to the believer.

[* - "us" to be understood of those who are in the same dispensational place as the "Hebrews".]

The Cross of Christ.
Its relation to the Dispensation of the Mystery.
pp. 148-152

We have reviewed the references to the cross of Christ in the Scriptures with the exception of Paul's prison epistles. We have found that the leading thought in connection with it is that of shame, self-denial, deepest humiliation and subsequent glory. We call to mind the words of one of our readers with reference to Heb. xii. 2, which we give before passing on to the prison epistles. "The word 'for' in the expression 'for the joy set before Him', is in the Greek anti. This means, when governing the genitive, 'in return for', 'for the sake of', the word in all its usages involving the idea of correspondency to, or answering to something." In Heb. xii. 16 we find it; Esau for (anti) one morsel of meat sold his birthright. The suggestion is that there is a distinct correspondence between the joy and the shame, and that this glory is something different from the glory which Christ had with the Father "before the world was", it is the added glory of the overcomer.

Turning now to the prison epistles we find that there are five occurrences of the word. The following structure of the occurrences is repeated with some modifications from Volume IV. & V. page 91:--

The Cross in the Prison Epistles.

A | Eph. ii. 16, 17. Reconciliation by the cross. Enmity slain.
B | Phil. ii. 8. The death of the cross. The humiliation.
C | Phil. iii. 18. Enemies of the cross. "Earthly things."
A | Col. i. 20. Peace by the cross. Enemies reconciled.
B | Col. ii. 14. Freedom by the cross. The triumph.

Members A , A deal with the reconciliation, which we have dealt with at some length in Volumes V. and VI. We refer our readers to those articles as it will not be possible to summarize the subject sufficiently to keep within the limits of this article. We would draw attention to the dispensational character of this reconciliation as between (1) Jew and Gentile in the one body, and (2) between the one body and the heavenly powers. The wider reconciliation of the earlier epistles (Romans and II Corinthians) rests upon "the death" of Christ. The narrower, elective and fuller reconciliation of the epistles of the mystery is by virtue of the cross of Christ, and the blood of the cross. The remaining passages, Phil. ii. 8, iii. 18, and Col. ii. 14 must be considered more is detail. The structure of the passage where the first occurrence comes in Philippians is eloquent, and to see it will obviate the necessity of writing much explanation.

Phil. ii. 1-21.

A | 1.3. sumpsuchos. One accord (A.V.).
B | 4. Look not on own things.
C | 5-11. Example of Christ. the great self-emptying.
D | 12-16. Work out your own salvation.
C | 17, 18. Example of Paul. The drink offering.
A | 19, 20. Isopsuchos. Like minded (A.V.).
B | 21. All seek their own things.

It will be readily seen that we are not listening to the gospel in its initial sense in these verses. The whole is addressed to those who are capable of following, at least in some measure, the great example of Christ. Members C , C deal with the great examples of self-denying and suffering, and we give the structure here of the first and greatest.

The Example of Christ (Phil. ii. 5-11).
The great kenosis (self-emptying).

A | 5, 6. Equality. Originally (huparchon).
B | 7, 8. The Humiliation (seven-fold).
a | He emptied Himself.
b | A bond-servant.
c | Likeness of men.
d | Fashioned as a man.
a | He humbled Himself.
b | Obedient unto death.
c | The death of a cross.
A | 9-. Wherefore highly exalted. As inherited (Heb. i. 4).
B | -9-11. The Glory (seven-fold).
a | The name given.
b | Every knee to bow.
c | In heaven; on earth; under earth.
b | Every tongue to confess.
a | Jesus Christ is Lord.

It is not possible in this series to attempt an exposition of such a passage as this, we can but point out one or two items that bear most closely upon our immediate subject, remembering, however, that the whole passage in all its details really deals with the doctrine of the cross, as to its significance, its reward, and its bearing upon the present and future of the believer. The climax of the great renunciation (the word rendered “no reputation” is derived from that which means to empty) is found in the death of the cross. It was the last manifestation of “the mind that was in Christ Jesus”, and is the final word to the believer. The more we study the subject, the more we are convinced that the cross of Christ is not to be the first presentation of the gospel. The death of Christ, as we have seen, is the broad basis and reason. The cross is connected with deeper lessons that only believers can learn. The utter worthlessness of the flesh, the necessity for self-denial, the perfecting work of suffering with its future glory, the folly and weakness of the wisdom and power of man, these are some of the lessons learned at the cross of Christ. Further, the cross is something that may be experimentally entered into, but only as a disciple following his Lord. Immediately "the death, even the death of a cross" is reached, then come the words, "Wherefore God also hath highly exalted Him", and He Who stooped to the bond-servant's place, walked and lived and died as a man, Who suffered the most awful and shameful of deaths, He is to receive universal homage and adoration. The sequel, rather, the very reason for the introduction of this marvellous theme at all, follows in verse 12, "So that, my beloved. . . . work out your own salvation". The salvation is already certain. The "working out" of it is the question that is now before them.

In chapter iii., where the next reference is found, Paul shows how he in some degree follow in the steps of Christ. He enumerates his gains and losses, and tells us that he reached out for a prize. He calls upon the Philippians to consider his example and his walk:--

> "For many walk, of whom I have told you often, and now tell you even weeping, they are enemies of the cross of Christ, whose end destruction, whose god the belly, whose glory in their shame, who mind earthly things."

These are terrible words, spoken apparently of some who at least had made some profession of faith. The apostle would have no need to draw attention to his walk as contrasted with the world, or the unbeliever. The close relation between the words of the original for "destruction" and "loss" suggests the teaching that these believers, whose affection for earthly things made them enemies of the cross, would "suffer loss", which would be in exact contrast tot he apostle who, having fellowship with the sufferings and shame of his Lord, was running for the prize. Close parallels to this are found in I Cor. iii. and Heb. x., xi., where "perdition" (Heb. x. 39) is used in connection with those who "draw back", and where a similar line of teaching is intended. The severe words, "whose end destruction", should be considered with other warnings uttered to believers, e.g., "He that soweth with a view to his flesh, shall of the flesh reap corruption" (Gal. vi. 8); see contextual reference to the cross (vi. 12-14) and "crucify" (v. 24), all in connection with the believer's relation to the flesh. Phil. iii. indeed leads us to see that what the circumcision meant in type, the cross means in reality.

> "We are the circumcision, which worship God in spirit, and boast in Christ Jesus, and have no confidence in the flesh" (Phil. iii. 3).

This could not be said of those referred to in verse 19. When it is remembered that circumcision was introduced after the great unconditional covenant was made with Abraham, that it was essential for every one coming up out of the wilderness to be circumcised before entering the land of promise, its typical teaching is still further perceived. That the spiritual circumcision of the believer is connected with the cross of Christ Col. ii. will show.

> "In whom also ye are circumcised with a circumcision made without hands, in putting off the body of the flesh, in the circumcision of Christ. . . . the uncircumcision of your flesh. . . . blotting out the handwriting of ordinances that was against us, which was contrary to us, and took it out of the way, nailing it to His cross, having put off the principalities and the powers, He made a public exhibition of them, triumphing over them in it."

Nailed to the cross, in the person of the Lord Jesus Christ, were the handwritten ordinances that were against us. Ordinances have reference to the flesh—the flesh has been shewn to be hopeless by the crucifixion. "Why as though living in the world", then, asks the apostle, "are ye subject to ordinances, which are to be subject to corruption in the using". "Set your mind on things above, not on things on the earth". Here we have the contrast to those who "mind earthly things", whose "god was their belly". In Col. ii. the other extreme is mentioned, "the neglecting of the body", but it ends in the same way. The wondrous doctrine of Philippians centres around the stupendous fact that Christ "emptied Himself"; the glory of Colossians is that He, in Whom all the fulness was pleased to dwell, has been raised from death and ignominy, and once again in Him dwells all the fulness of the Godhead bodily. In each epistle His headship over principality and power is included as a part of the great reward given to Him Who for the joy set before Him, endured a cross and despised the shame. Though we do not yet see Him sitting upon His universal throne crowned with many crowns (a blessed bay to look forward to!), we do see, by the eye of faith, Jesus, for the suffering of death crowned with glory and honour.

We have now passed under review every reference in the epistles to the cross of Christ. Before we attempt to draw a conclusion it will be of service if we devote one article to the consideration of the doctrine that is connected with "crucifixion". We shall then be in a position to state with scriptural certainty the position which the cross of Christ hold in the economy of redemption.

The Crucifixion.
Its place in the economy of redemption.
pp. 180-185

The results of our review of the occurrences of the Cross from the opening verses has had one trend and one theme—suffering as a prelude to glory, shame as a forerunner of joy. We feel, however, that it would be wise to hold back our conclusions until the related references to crucifixion have been examined.

The first occurrence of the word is found in Matt. xx. 19, where the Lord, speaking of His approaching death, says that He would be delivered to the Gentiles, "to mock, and to scourge, and crucify". There are about thirty references altogether in the four Gospels that testify to this awful death that was endured by the Son of God. Acts contains two references, both having a somewhat similar context. In ii. 36 Peter places in vivid contrast the fulfillment of Ps. cx., "Sit Thou at My right hand until I make Thy foes Thy footstool", to the humiliation that Christ suffered, "Therefore let all the house of Israel know assuredly, that God hath made that same Jesus, whom ye have crucified, both Lord and Christ". In chapter iv. the power of the risen Christ to heal the lame man, and the antitype—Israel itself, is again emphasized by the reference to the crucifixion, "Whom ye crucified, Whom God raised from the dead". The reference in Acts ii. 23-33 is the rendering of another Greek word, nevertheless the atmosphere is the same, "Ye have taken, and by wicked hands have crucified and slain", is immediately followed by, "Whom God hath raised up. . . . He would raise up Christ to sit on his throne". Passing to the Epistles and Apocalypse we find the references divide themselves into two sets. Those which speak of the crucifixion of Christ, and those which speak of the crucifixion (in the spiritual and doctrinal sense) of the believer.

The words that we shall consider are the renderings of stauroõ, to crucify; anastauroõ, to crucify afresh; and sustauroõ, to crucify together. In I Cor. i. 23 the apostle says, "But we preach Christ crucified". The "But" compels us to look back. Verse 18 speaks of the "preaching of the cross"; there such preaching is esteemed by them that perish, foolishness. In verse 23 the preaching of Christ crucified was a stumblingblock to the Jew and foolishness to the Greek. I Cor. ii. 2 places the preaching of "Jesus Christ, and Him crucified" in a context that repudiates "excellency of speech or enticing words of man's wisdom," but which does speak of true wisdom to such as are "perfect" (the latter word brings this passage into line with the Epistle to the Hebrews). In verse 8 the apostle tells us that had the princes of this age known the hidden mystery previously marked out before the ages unto our glory—for, apparently, that crucifixion was the straight and narrow path which led to the crown. II Cor. xiii. 4 is the only reference in that epistle, and it is in a context which emphasizes the shame, the weakness, the humiliation of the death of the cross. "For though He was crucified through weakness, yet He liveth through the power of God".

Turning to the Epistle to the Galatians we find the word used more pointedly than in any other epistle. In Gal. iii. 1, when the apostle would show the folly of being "made perfect" (mark the word) by the flesh (verse 3), he uses the strong expression, "Before whose eyes Jesus Christ hath been set forth, crucified among you". His argument is that to have seen Him thus, and then to consider that there was any possibility for good in the flesh, could only be answered by concluding that they had been bewitched. In v. 24 the subject is still more decidedly referred to:--

> "They that are Christ's have crucified the flesh with the affections and desires. If we live spiritually, spiritually let us walk".

In vi. 14, in contrast to "boasting in the flesh", the apostle says:--

> "Let it not be that I should boast, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, whereby the world is crucified unto me, and I unto the world".

What words are these! The flesh so denied, so repudiated, so utterly contemned and loathed, that it is not merely neglected and kept under, but crucified. This is the only thing to do with it, yet how many of us can claim to have reached this position? Or again, the mutual crucifixion of the world and the believer to one another. The world with its pleasures and its sins, its denial of the Lord and its religious pretensions, its ambitions and its sorrows, the world and the believer too, are crucified in the crucifixion of Christ. Yet how strong the so-called innocent and legitimate claims of the world! and how utterly futile are half measures. Crucifixion is after all the only remedy, yet here again arises a self-searching question. When the apostle Paul confronted the apostle

Peter and rebuked him for not walking in line with the gospel, he crowned his argument against the flesh and its works by his own personal testimony:--

> "I have been crucified with Christ: nevertheless I live; yet not I, but Christ liveth in me; and the life I now live in the flesh I live by the faith of the Son of God. Who loved me and gave Himself for me" (Gal. ii. 20).

If verse 19 be noted, the following will become apparent:--

(a) To the law Paul had died, that he might live unto God.
(b) With Christ He had been crucified, that the life he lived in the flesh, Christ living in him, was lived by the faith of the Son of God.

The crucifixion bears particularly upon the "life in the flesh", the death to the law bears more particularly upon the question of justification. Paul could not have more completely repudiated the flesh, and have set forth his utter dependence on the risen Christ, than he did when he said, "I have been crucified with Christ".

In Rom. vi. 6 we meet the expression again. Note particularly that it is not met with in Rom. i. - v. There, where the question of justification by faith is the great theme, the death of Christ, faith in His blood and faith in Him Who raised Him from the dead, are prominent. Rom. vi. turns, however, to the question of "continuing in sin". The apostle meets the insinuation by using such strong terms as, "we that are dead to sin"; "baptized into His death"; "buried with Him"; "knowing that our old man is crucified with Him, that the body of sin might be destroyed, that henceforth we should not serve sin". In Col. ii. 11 we have already noted, "the putting off of the body of flesh", and now in Col. iii. 9 we may read, "that ye have put off the old man with his deeds". There is a marked consistency of teaching here. The old man crucified, the body of sin destroyed, the body of the flesh put off, the old man with his deeds put off, speak of a power, a nature that would dominate us if it could, that would attempt to compel us to "serve sin". In this sphere of truth there is such a thing as "yielding your members servants to righteousness unto holiness", which the apostle amplifies in Rom. xii. 1, 2, and declares to be our "reasonable service". The book of the Revelation makes one reference to the crucifixion (Rev. xi. 8):--

> "And their dead bodies shall lie in the street of the great city which spiritually is called Sodom and Egypt, where also our Lord was crucified".

It is a case of witness against the world, the flesh, and the devil. For their witness' sake these two were eventually killed. The city wherein this shall take place is not only named Sodom and Egypt (fit symbols of the flesh and the world), but is stated to be where also our Lord was crucified. It was the flesh, as represented by the religious leaders of Israel, and the world, as represented by the religious leaders of Israel, and the world, as represented by the policy of Pilate, that took up and obeyed the cry, "Away with Him, crucify Him". That cry was the verdict of the flesh and the world upon the Faithful Witness, the Son of God. Rev. xi. 8 links the suffering of the two witnesses with the crucifixion of Christ, thereby showing us the meaning that is attached to crucifixion in the Word.

Heb. vi. 6 is the remaining passage. The whole of chapter v. and vi. 1-6 should be read. It is a question of going on unto perfection. Those who are addressed were once enlightened, they had tasted the good word of God, and the powers of the coming age; these were not unbelievers, they had gone on, they had attained to some acquaintance with the good things to come. Now if such fall away, draw back to perdition, there can be no renewing such to repentance. The type of Israel in the wilderness has already prepared for this. When the spies had brought their report, when the people had evidence of the fruit before their eyes, when they then failed through unbelief, they were turned back to wander and die in the wilderness. When they would have afterwards entered the land they found it to be impossible.

In Heb. xii. is another figure equally decisive. Esau despised his birthright. Afterwards he sought a blessing, and when he would have inherited the blessing he was rejected, for he found no place for repentance though he sought it carefully with tears. So in Heb. vi. To turn back was fatal. The death of Christ, and the shedding of His blood, had redeemed them; like Israel they had come out of Egyptian bondage, and crossed the Red Sea, they had passed from death unto life, yet they were in danger of failing, of coming short, of turning back. "Thou turnest man to destruction", wrote Moses of the wilderness wandering. So in Heb. vi. It is impossible to renew again to repentance those who against light and teaching turn back. Such, continues Heb. vi., "Crucify to themselves the Son of God afresh and put Him to an open shame". Such practically side with the flesh and the world in their mind. Possibly they would deny the charge with vehemence. But, if the fresh is allowed to lead them back from the land of promise, and if the world allures them by its seductions, if they lust after the fleshpots of Egypt, the onions and the garlic, if their soul loathes the bread from heaven, then, although they may be redeemed by the death and the blood of God's Passover, and stand upon the other side of the Red Sea, yet the cross and its blessings is not for them. "Saved, yet so as by fire" will be the verdict.

Thus we conclude our review of the doctrine of the cross and we believe that the passages cited demonstrate that the cross of Christ is something more advanced than the wider references to His death and atoning blood. The death may be as universal as Adamic death. The blood is not quite so wide in its application, being either associated with a covenant, or with faith. The cross is narrower still. It is connected with suffering, self-denying discipleship, and the crown of glory that follows.

So far as the type used in Hebrews is concerned, the effect of the cross is experienced by the few; of all the thousands who left Egypt two adults only entered "the rest that remained". (?)

We trust that these very weighty considerations may be used of God to open our eyes to see the things that differ, that we may be unashamed in that day, through being made willing to share His shame in this. REMEMBER LOT'S WIFE.

DEAR FELLOW-MEMBERS,

The conclusion of another year's testimony, and of the great world conflict, cannot be contemplated without feelings of genuine thankfulness and a deep recognition of all-sufficient grace.

While it may not be necessary that our readers should be acquainted with the details of management, we feel sure that they will join with us in most hearty thanks for the Lord's continued mercies, as evidenced by the completion, in such trying times, of another volume.

May we be permitted to repeat with all meekness and forbearance, yet with all earnestness, that The Berean Expositor, is the organ of NO SOCIETY, the property of NO SECT, the exponent of NO CREED.

Yours in the expectation of "that blessed hope",

Palestine for the Jews.
Government's decision.
pp. 11-13

"Foreign Office, Nov. 2, 1917.

"Dear Lord Rothschild.—I have much pleasure in conveying to you on behalf of His Majesty's Government the following declaration of sympathy with Jewish Zionists aspirations, which has been submitted to and approved by the Cabinet:--

'His Majesty's Government view with favour the establishment in Palestine of a national home for the Jewish people, and will use their best endeavours to facilitate the achievement of this object, it being clearly understood that nothing shall be done which may prejudice the civil and religious rights of existing non-Jewish communities in Palestine or the rights and political status enjoyed by Jews in any other country.'

I should be grateful if you would bring this declaration to the knowledge of the Zionist Federation.

Yours sincerely,
(Signed) Arthur James Balfour."

To the majority of our readers it will be recognized that the "Government's Decision" quoted above has all along been the Lord's own decision. It is safe to say that not one of the nations now at war consciously included in their original aim and object the restoration of Israel to the land of promise, yet it seems to us quite feasible that such will prove to be the result which the overruling power of God will bring out of the terrible confusion, enmity and failure, which now surround us.

Since the call of Abraham the pivot of the purpose of God, so far as this earth is concerned, has always been the people of Israel, and together as inalienable accessories, the City of Jerusalem, and the land of Promise. The great nations of antiquity that are mentioned in the Bible are those that played some part in the history of Israel—Egypt, Assyria, Babylon, Persia. While many able and accredited students of prophecy make the possession of BABYLON a crucial test with regard to world supremacy and position (in the great vision of Nebuchadnezzar as recorded in Dan. ii.), we ourselves feel that JERUSALEM is the key. That power which holds sway over Jerusalem is the successor in the line of Gentile supremacy, "Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles, until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled" (Luke xxi. 24). A reference to Dan. i. 1, 2 will show that a mighty change had then taken place:--

"THE LORD GAVE Jehoiakim, king of Judah, into his hand, with part of the vessels of the house of God, which he carried into the land of Shinar to the house of his god".

No longer, as in the case of Dagon, does the idol fall prostrate before the holy symbols—the people have become "Lo-ammi", and the crown and throne have been taken from them for a time, and a Gentile, with a succession of Gentiles, is to sit upon the throne.

The question of the inclusion or exclusion of Rome from the prophetic vision of Dan. ii., if tested by its possession of Babylon, may leave the matter in doubt, but there is no doubt in any mind that Rome was the power that held beneath its control the City of Jerusalem, that included the inhabitants of Palestine in the decree that "all the world" should be taxed, and that finally crucified the Messiah and destroyed both the City and the Temple. To quote these facts, too well known to necessitate chapter and verse, seems to indicate something adrift in the principles of interpretation that would leave out Rome altogether. The present power that holds Jerusalem under its control seems on the verge of collapse; the powers are gathering for the final development, and one of the signs of the times is the growing prominence of the right of Israel to the land of Palestine.

While Israel has been a wanderer among the nations, the land too has steadily declined, until it, the "land flowing with milk and honey", has in its turn become an astonishment and a proverb. God has, however, recently been preparing the land to receive His people. The Gentile nations, for the purposes of their own, have been making roads and building railways. Natural elements also have been employed by Him to the same end. Until "the former rains" have softened the ground, ploughing and sowing is impossible in Palestine. "The latter rains" in March also are essential to the ripening of the grain. God promised to restore the latter rain (Joel ii. 21-23), and meteorological reports provide data to show that the long withheld latter rain is being restored (see, Jerusalem the Holy City, by Consul Wallace).

Without falling into what appears to us to be an error, in attempting to compute "times and seasons", it must be evident to the thoughtful student of prophecy that the times of the Gentiles are fast running out, and although "that blessed hope" which is before us is in no sense connected with Nebuchadnezzar's dreams or Daniel's visions, yet seeing these things are so, "what manner of persons ought we to be?"

Since writing the above, Jerusalem has fallen to the Allies, and is no longer under Turkish control. It is still, however, under Gentile dominion, and must continue so until "the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled". Believing as we do that power over Jerusalem places the nation or nations exercising it in the line of succession from Nebuchadnezzar (the head of gold), we cannot help looking with great interest towards the future turn of affairs regarding that city. This taking of Jerusalem brings the number of its sieges, that sacred and profane history record, up to twenty-eight. We know not how many more may have to be endured before the day of its final emancipation shall come, but Zech. xiv. records that the Lord will gather all nations against Jerusalem to battle, and that this siege will be raised by the coming of Christ to the Mount of Olives. The Lord declares that He will yet rejoice in Jerusalem, and joy in His people (Isa. lxv. 19); that Jerusalem shall yet be holy (Joel iii. 17); yea, every pot in Jerusalem and in Judah shall be holiness unto the Lord of hosts, and in that day there shall be no more the Canaanite in the house of the Lord of hosts (Zech. xiv. 21). The name of the city from that day shall be Jehovah Shammah, the Lord is there (Ezek. xlviii. 35). Truly "glorious things are spoken of thee, O city of God", and it is written, "Pray for the peace of Jerusalem; they shall prosper that love Thee".

Paul, the Apostle.

"I am not ashamed, for I know Whom I have believed."
pp. 14-16

It would not be entirely in harmony with the Word to leave the consideration of the apostle's trials, and the pursuit of his life's purpose, without a reference, not only to the sources of opposition, but the source of his strength and encouragement. The second epistle to the Corinthians contains not only the deepest exhibition of the apostle's sufferings, but also most clearly reveals the secret of his endurance. The opening words of the epistle deal with comfort in tribulation. The title of God is, "the Father of mercies and the God of all comfort"; the extent of the apostle's sufferings are said to be, "out of measure, above strength, insomuch that we despaired of life itself". This extreme brings the great sustaining power of God into prominence:--

> "But we had the sentence of death in ourselves, that we should not trust in ourselves, but in God WHICH RAISETH THE DEAD".

This same power is seen in chapter iv.; there we not only read of his trials, but of his deliverance. The treasure is designedly in an earthen vessel that the excellency of the power may be of God and not of themselves. Is the apostle troubled on every side? Yet he is not "straitened". Is he perplexed? Yet he is not entirely without means. Is he persecuted? Yet there is One who never leaves him. Is he cast down? Yet is he not destroyed. He indeed bears in his body the putting to death of the Lord Jesus, but only that there may be abundantly manifested in him the risen life of Christ.

This "power of God" the apostle refers to again in chapter xiii. 4 in a way that shows clearly that he served in the power of the risen Christ. The apostle's desire to know "the power of His resurrection" is coupled with a knowledge of the Lord, "that I may know Him"; this is seen to be a source of strength to him by considering his words in II Timothy. After calling upon Timothy not to be ashamed of the testimony of our Lord, nor of Paul, His prisoner, he tells us that in the midst of all his sufferings he also is not ashamed, "FOR I KNOW WHOM I HAVE BELIEVED". He did not look to man for praise or for blame, he sought wholeheartedly to "serve the Lord Christ"; this singleness of eye led him into close fellowship with his Lord, and the knowledge of His glorious and gracious Person was a panoply in the fiercest trial. "All in Asia" were turned away from the apostle, and at his first defence no man stood with him, but all forsook him, notwithstanding the Lord stood with him and strengthened him, and he knew that he would be delivered from every evil work, and be preserved unto His heavenly kingdom.

Not only the power of the risen Christ, and the knowledge of Him, but the deep conviction of his stewardship must be included in the sources of his strength. This is apparent in both passages we have referred to in II Timothy. First in chapter i. 12 he says, in addition to the statement that he "knew" Whom he had believed, "and I am persuaded that He is able to guard my deposit (R.V. margin, 'that which He hath committed unto me') against that day". The rendering suggested by the R.V. margin seems to be the true one, particularly when we read the next two verses:--

> "Hold fast the form of sound words, which thou hast heard of me, in faith and love which is in Christ Jesus; guard, by the Holy Spirit which dwells in us, that good deposit entrusted" (see also I Tim. vi. 20).

The apostle never shows the slightest hesitancy regarding his mission and ministry. "I am appointed a preacher, and an apostle, and a teacher of the Gentiles", he affirms in his final message to Timothy (II Tim. i. 11). The second passage (II Tim. iv. 17, 18) likewise emphasizes the apostle's firm conviction of his special appointment; he gives, as the reason why the Lord stood by him and strengthened him, "that by me the preaching might be fully known, and that all the Gentiles might hear". In I Cor. ix. 16, 17 he says, "For though I preach the gospel, I have nothing to glory of, for necessity is laid upon me. . . . a dispensation is committed unto me". "Let a man so account of us", he says in I Cor. iv. 1, "as of the ministers of Christ, and stewards of the mysteries of God". He tells us that he had been approved of God to be entrusted with the gospel (I Thess. ii. 4; I Tim. i. 11).

There were doubtless other contributing causes of the apostle's continuous perseverance, but the three we have enumerated, (1) The power of Christ's resurrection, (2) the knowledge of his Lord, and (3) the unwavering conviction of his calling and ministry, these proved a threefold power that enabled him against all odds, in honour and dishonour, to fight a good fight, to finish his course, and to keep the faith.

The day in which we live calls loudly for witnesses thus empowered, and thus resolved. May we be enabled to see our path, and then to tread it with singleness of purpose.

"The Pillar and Ground of Truth" (I Tim. iii. 15).
Is it the Church or the Mystery of Godliness?
pp. 28, 29

With the A.V. and the R.V. as our guide we should have no hesitation in saying that the church was the pillar and ground of truth. It is not within the limits of The Berean Expositor to turn aside to note how, from the great apostate church to the most scriptural of assemblies, this conception has exercised a great influence over the conduct and attitude of thousands of believers. The church in I Tim. iii. 15 is not looked upon under its title, "the church which is His body", but as "the house of God". As a "house of God" it needed servants, and the chapter has been dealing with bishops and deacons. The bishop must rule his own "house" well, otherwise he will not be able to take care of the "church of God" (verses 4, 5); the deacons also were to rule their own houses well. It is evident that the church in I Tim. iii. is a church in its corporate capacity.

Now it requires no long argument to prove that if the church is the pillar and ground of truth, the fall and failure of the church must also mean the fall and failure of the stay and support of truth also. It is sadly true that both the corporate church, and the truth itself have suffered at the hands of friend and foe alike, but we raise the question in this short paper regarding the accuracy of the translation of the passage which teaches that the church is the pillar and ground of truth. We set before the reader the following translation as giving the true meaning of the passage.

> "These things I write to thee, hoping to come to thee very soon but, if I should delay (I write) so that thou mayest know to conduct thyself in (the) house of God, which is (the) church of the living God."

Here the apostle reaches the conclusion of the subject commenced in the first verse of chapter iii. He now turns from the question of right behaviour in the church, to the deep subject of "mystery of godliness". This subject opens with verse 16 in the following words:--

> "A pillar and ground of the truth, and confessedly great is the mystery of godliness."

This rendering makes the mystery of godliness, and not the church corporate, the pillar and ground of the truth.

We commend this rendering to the prayerful consideration of all our readers.

The End. (Telos and Sunteleia).

pp. 127, 128

The attention of many is directed at this time to the study of prophecy, and we have found, when speaking with brethren here and there, that the distinction made in the inspired Word between the two words translated "end" is not clearly perceived. The following illustration, though somewhat crude, has enabled some to appreciate the distinction, and we venture to use it here, trusting that it may be of similar service.

Telos may be represented by the terminus of a railway, while sunteleia may be represented by the junction just before the terminus is reached.

Quoting from The Companion Bible Note on Matt. xxiv. 3 we read, "Sunteleia = meeting together of all that makes the consummation of the age; not telos = the actual end". It will be remembered that the disciples asked, "What shall be the sign of Thy coming, and of the end of the age?". This is the word sunteleia, the "junction", the point where the separate lines of purpose touching the Jew, Gentile, and Church meet together.

In Matt. xxiv. 6 we have the "terminus" mentioned, "And ye shall hear of wars and rumours of wars; see that ye be not troubled; for all these things must come to pass, but the end (telos) is not yet". The true "end" lies beyond this point. Verses 13 and 14 speak of this end.

If the reader does not already know, let him say which of these two words he would expect the Lord to have used in Matt. xiii. 39, 40, "The harvest is the end of the world". The majority have reckoned that the harvest would be the telos, the terminus. It is not so, however; it is the sunteleia, the junction. It will be readily seen that a clear conception of these terms will be an advantage to all who seek rightly to divide the Word of truth, and these words have been penned with the desire that some may be helped in this direction.

The complete list of occurrences of sunteleia is as follows:--Matt. xiii. 39, 40, 49; xxiv. 3; xxviii. 20; Heb. ix. 26. It would be a helpful exercise to tabulate the differences that are observable in the events and statements under the two headings, telos and sunteleia.

"(1). Is it correct that the Hebrew ha-qatan, which is translated (the) 'younger' in Gen. ix. 24, should be rendered 'the youngest'? I am informed that, according to Fuerst, the Hebrew Lexicographer, it is so, and that every occurrence of ha-qatan in the O.T. means 'the young*est*'.

(2). According to a pamphlet entitled Coming Events, by Pastor Joseph Smale. The Pastor writes, 'That there is no tarrying in the air is clear from the usage of the word meet' (page 9 note). If this is so, then the rapture of I Thess. iv. will take place at the end of the great Tribulation and not before it. But does not this contradict the teaching of I Thess. v. 1-11 and I Thess. i. 10, 'even Jesus, which delivered us from the wrath to come'? I presume that the us refers to the members that will form the bride."

In answer to (1), the word ha-qatan, primarily means anything small, then, young. You may test the value of the assertion that "every occurrence of ha-qatan in the O.T. means 'the youngest'" by referring to its use in Genesis itself. For example, "Jacob her younger son" (xxvii. 15, 42), "the name of the younger was Rachel". "Seven years for Rachel thy younger daughter" (xxix. 16, 18). The word youngest in these three cases would be untrue, for Jacob had but one brother, and Rachel but one sister. Ha-qatan is translated youngest in Gen. xlii. 13; the change of vowel from qatan to qaton has no inspired authority, for the original Hebrew had no vowel points. Time is too valuable to tabulate the 47 occurrences of qatan, and the 50 or more occurrences of qaton, for the words are used for either the younger or the youngest, the lesser or the least as the case may be (see Gen. i. 16, "lesser").

In answer to (2), when you say, "Does not this contradict the teaching of I Thess. v. 1-11?" you do not say enough, for you mean some interpretation of the passage that makes it appear that those who meet the Lord in the air will of necessity escape the great tribulation. Looking at the passage we note that it says, "But of the times and seasons, brethren, ye have no need that I write unto you". Here comes a pause in some interpretations, and the question is asked, Why had he no need to write concerning times and seasons? the answer being, Because times and seasons had nothing to do with them, as they would caught up before the day of the Lord comes. What is the answer of the Word to the self-same question? The answer is that they knew perfectly! It is as though I wrote saying, There is no need for me to send you a time-table, for you know perfectly the time the trains start. Would it be a fair inference to say, As I have no need for a time-table, that proves I am not going by a train at all? The Thessalonian saints had no need for the apostle to write to them concerning "brotherly love" (iv. 9), not because brotherly love had no connection with them, but for the good reason that they themselves were taught of God to love one another. The Thessalonian saints knew the thief-like character of the day of the Lord. The outside world ("they") would be saying "peace and safety", but the saints ("ye") would not be overtaken as by a thief, not because they would not be there, but because they would be fully aware of the character of the days in which they were living. They were not appointed to wrath (v. 9 and i. 10), but tribulation has always been associated with the endeavour to live godly, and according to II Thess. i. 5-7 will continue to be the lot of the Lord's people until He comes and metes out judgment to the oppressor.

You say, "I presume that the us refers to the members who will form the Bride". Again it is not clear from your letter, although of course you may be quite clear in your own mind just what you believe the Bride to be. Let us state that we do not believe the Church of the One Body as revealed in Ephesians is the Bride. That Church is one new man. The Bride we believe to be a company of overcomers, and not the Church universal, and to be distinguished in turn from the position of Israel as the restored Wife. Should there arise further questions in your mind as a result of what we have written, please write again, and let us seek to help you. We must, however, ask you, together with all readers to bear with us, as the trying circumstances under which we now labour quite prevent any attempt to reply to questions by post, and make even the ordinary demands of correspondence nearly impossible.

No. 23.—T.S.D., U.S.A.

"We were wondering if it would be too much to ask you if you had any light from the Word concerning the soul having a separate existence apart from the spirit and the body."

To answer your question it becomes necessary briefly to summarize the teaching of Scripture as to what is meant by the soul. The Hebrew word usually translated "soul" is nephesh, the Greek word psuche.

Nephesh is used both of man and the lower animals; we find it in Gen. i. 20 and 30 translated "life". "The moving creature that hath life"; "Beast. . . fowl. . . creeping thing wherein there is life".

In Gen. i. 21, 24, "Every living creature that moveth, which the waters brought forth"; "The living creature after his kind, cattle and creeping thing".

The above references, occurring as they do in the inspired record of creation, and therefore conveying a primitive meaning, will be sufficient to show that the soul is not confined to man.

The first usage of the word in connection with man is in Gen. ii. 7, and again the passage, as it deals with creation, will be using the word in a primary sense, "man became a living soul".

We note that the passage does not say that man received a soul, it says that man became a living soul. Before the breath of lives entered his nostrils man was a lifeless shape, formed of the dust of the earth. While man lives he is a living soul, and when he dies Scripture says that he is a dead soul (Numb. ix. 6, 7, 10, rendered "dead body").

From this primitive meaning there are of course various derivations. The word soul means an individual, a person (Exod. i. 5; Gen. xiv. 21).

While man himself, at his creation, is spoken of as becoming a living soul, Scripture uses the expressions, "my soul", "thy soul", etc. This must not be taken to indicate some separate entity, as would be understood if one said "my book", but is a figurative usage of the word to convey the meaning "myself", "thyself".

Samson said, "Let me (Hebrew nephesh, my soul) die with the Philistines". He did not use the word soul in a theological sense, he simply meant himself. Psalm cv. 18, speaking of Joseph, says, "he (nephesh, his soul) was laid in iron". Job says in xxxvi. 14, "they (their soul) die in youth". Isa. v. 14 says, "Hell hath enlarged herself (her soul)". The soul is associated with all the appetites, desires and functions of this present life; with the feelings, affections, passions and mind. (See a good Concordance for this, also Appendix 13 of Companion Bible, sections v. and vi.).

The soul is connected with the blood, "for the life (soul) of the flesh is in the blood" (Lev. xvii. 11).

The N.T. usage of the equivalent word for soul is very much the same as that of the O.T. Psuche is twice used of the lower creation, "The third part of the creatures which were in the sea, and had life (soul) died" (Rev. viii. 9); "and every living soul died in the sea" (xvi. 3). The word is used of the creation of Adam, and being an inspired comment upon Gen. ii. 7 demands most careful attention.

> "There is a natural body (soma psuchikon, a soul-ical body), there is also a spiritual body, and so it hath been written, the first man Adam became a living soul, the last Adam a life-giving spirit. . . . the first man was out of the earth earthy; the second man, out of heaven" (I Cor. xv. 44-47).

Here it will be seen that the record of Gen. ii. 7 teaches not the spirituality of the "soul", but rather the reverse.

> "The natural (soul-ical) man receives not the things of the spirit of God" (I Cor. ii. 14).

Again, the word psuche stands for the natural life.

> "Take no thought of your life (soul) what ye shall eat or what ye shall drink, nor yet for your body, what ye shall put on" (Matt. vi. 25).

Here, eating and drinking are as closely related to the soul as clothing is to the body. It is spoken of as being laid down, both by the Lord and by His people (Matt. xx. 28; John x. 11; xiii. 37; I John iii. 16). It is used also of the individual himself as distinct from the body:--

> "Fear not them which kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul but rather fear Him which is able to destroy both body and soul in Gehenna."

Death, whether by natural decay or by violence, does not involve the individuality, for there is to be a resurrection. Gehenna, however, can accomplish what man cannot, for in Gehenna God can destroy (not merely kill), soul as well as body. The soul sums up moreover all that this present life can hold of pleasure, honour, enjoyment. As such it must be "lost" if the believer would follow the Lord through suffering to glory. Note the prominence given to the word in Luke ix. 24:--

> "For whosoever will save his life (soul) shall lose it, but whosoever will lose his life (soul) for My sake, the same shall save it."

and also in the parable of the rich man who said to his soul:--

> "Soul, thou hast much goods laid up for many years. . . . thou fool, this night thy soul shall be required of thee" (Luke xvii. 13, 20).

The soul is neither spirit nor spiritual. Heb. iv. 12 speaks of the "dividing asunder of soul and spirit", and the orthodox theological concept is entirely foreign to Scripture. A living believer can be spoken of as "spirit, soul and body", meaning the living entire person, living, I say, at the time of the Lord's coming, and not dead, and thereby necessitating the re-union of spirit and body.

We have not reviewed every occurrence of this word in Scripture, for it is used so often, but from our study of the subject we understand the soul to be the natural man in all his outgoings. We do not find the idea in Scripture that the soul is a separate entity, independent of the natural life of man. Living, he is a living soul; dead, he is a dead soul, and what may be predicated of the dead, may be predicated of the dead soul.

We come now to your question "concerning the soul having a separate existence apart from the body".

The passage quoted above (Gen. ii. 7) seems to find its parallel in the world of physics. By the chemical combination of Oxygen and Hydrogen in correct proportions I obtain water. By the electrolysis of water, I obtain Oxygen and Hydrogen, but I cannot have the water as something distinct and separate from the two gases. The moment I have Oxygen and Hydrogen in a free state, the water ceases to exist. The water is not a third thing, distinct from the other two; rather it is the resultant of their combination. So with the soul, the dust of the earth moulded into shape and organism, separated from the breath of life, is a dead soul. When the breath animates the lifeless form the resultant is a living soul, but, as in the illustration, we cannot have the soul as something separate, it only exists as a result of the combination of spirit and body. We therefore can find no warrant for speaking of the soul as a separate entity. We do not say it sleeps, or dies, it simply ceases to be the moment the breath ceases to animate the body.

There is much left unsaid, and although we have not referred in this answer to many passages, we have not ignored them in coming to this conclusion.

"I should be greatly obliged if you would kindly give me the gist of your remarks concerning two subjects we were speaking about.
(1). 'Without sin.' (2). Apostate Israel as the Scarlet Woman."

(1). "Without Sin".—The gist of our remarks was to the effect that the words, "without sin", in Heb. iv. 15 and ix. 28, were important key words bearing directly upon the theme of the epistle.

The usual interpretation of Heb. iv. 15 is that the Lord Jesus was tempted in all points as we are, yet never yielded to the temptation. When the matter is pressed, and general statements become particular, when one asks how the Holy One of God could be tempted by the crimes and passions of our fallen nature, the answer usually is, the temptation is no sin, but yielding to it constitutes the offence. This superficially satisfies. To us the question does not present itself. We believe the very Scripture itself tells us that the Lord Jesus Christ WAS NEVER TEMPTED BY SIN. He is "touched with the feeling of our infirmities", and was "tempted in all points like as we are, APART FROM SIN". The temptations of the believer who is passing through the experiences of "Hebrews", are the temptations of the wilderness journey. The imagery of Hebrews iii. and iv. is borrowed from the wilderness journey of the children of Israel. Their temptations were of God.

> "The Lord thy God led thee forty years in the wilderness to humble thee and to prove thee, to know what was in thine heart, whether thou wouldest keep His commandments, or no. And He humbled thee, and suffered thee to hunger, and fed thee with manna, which thou knewest not, neither did thy fathers know; that He might make thee know that man doth not live by bread only, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of the Lord doth man live. . . . as a man chasteneth his son, so the Lord thy God chasteneth thee" (Deut. viii. 2-5).

James says that the man who endures temptation is blessed, but declares that God cannot be tempted with evil, neither tempteth He any man with it. To be tempted by sin is to drawn away of our own lust, a statement we can never make of the Son of God in any shape or form. The temptations of "Hebrews" are "apart from sin". So also is the salvation. To them that look for Him, He shall appear the second time unto salvation "apart from sin". This salvation is for "them that look for Him". They are already "saved" so far as sin is concerned. The "so great salvation" involves more than that. Salvation is not only a past fact but a future hope. "Of which salvation the prophets have inquired. . . . the sufferings FOR CHRIST and the glories that should follow (see I Pet. i. 11, R.V.).

(2). Apostate Israel as the Scarlet Woman. In our limited space we do not want to spoil the teaching of so important a subject, so we ask you to be content with a few suggestions.

Two women are contrasted in the Revelation. One a Bride, the other a Harlot. The figure of an unfaithful wife is constantly used in the O.T. to describe Israel in apostacy.

Two cities are contrasted. Jerusalem and Babylon. Zech. v. speaks of a vision wherein wickedness, in the form of a woman, is seen being taken "to build it an house in the land of Shinar".

We believe that one of the results of the taking of Jerusalem from the Turk, will be a great return of the Jews to Palestine. Being still unregenerate, many will be attracted by the revived Babylon, and this city will pass largely into the hands of the great Jewish financiers. They will bear rule over the earth. With these apostates the Man of Sin will make his covenant. The intolerable burden of debt will eventually cause the beast which supports the woman finally to turn and rend her. The name of her forehead, "Babylon the Great", means something more than the words at first sight teach. There is a "mystery" here, and we believe apostate Israel supplies the solution.

DEVOTIONAL ARTICLES.

"But He knoweth the way that I take; when He hath tried me, I shall come forth as gold."
Job xxiii. 10

pp. 29 – 31

What "comfort of the Scriptures" many of us have found in pondering the words of Job quoted above. There must be few, very few, readers of The Berean Expositor who are not passing through periods of trial at this time, and some may feel that such words of trust and confidence are not for them. It is for our joy that the Scriptures give such faithful records as they do, and it will be found that the context of this statement shows Job to be after all a man "of like infirmity as ourselves". This discovery will not make his trust and confidence the less—it will make the link with ourselves the stronger. Job is found uttering words in the verses that come before verse 10 that do not savour so strongly of calm and restful trust, his complaint is bitter, his stroke heavier than his groaning (verse 2). God seemed to be hidden from His servant, and Job say, "Oh that I might know where I might find Him" (verse 3). His reason for desiring to find God is that he felt that he could lay such a good case before the Lord as to establish his righteousness and obtain relief (verses 4-7). But such was not his experience. "Behold" he says:--

> "I go forward, but He is not there; and backward, but I cannot perceive Him; on the left hand, where He doth work but I cannot behold Him; He hideth on the right hand, that I cannot see Him."

Here we see Job baffled at every turn, forward, backward, right hand, or left hand, Job could not perceive, behold or see, all was darkness and perplexity. Job's own feelings caused him to utter words that he afterwards confessed were wrong (xlii. 1-6).

Then come the words of faith. Although I cannot see Him, He knoweth the way that I take. The infirmity of the flesh causes the believer many sorrows, and causes him to give utterance to words that do not really express his real and deep convictions. David, anointed by God, believing fully that the Lord would surely fulfil His pleasure, yet under the pressure of circumstances cried out in his infirmity, "I shall one day perish at the hand of Saul". If one had approached David and had said, Do you really think that God will fail you? Do you think that Saul would ever be allowed to thwart the purpose of the Almighty?, he would immediately have said, No, what I said was in my haste, and out of the bitterness of my spirit—I do trust Him, and I know He will not fail. So with Job, although he gave expression to his feelings, and seemed to charge the Lord with injustice; although he confessed that on every hand was perplexity and a hiding of the Lord's hand, yet faith rises and overcomes, and out of the depths of his sorrow he cries, "But He knoweth the way that I take".

In that confidence he could rest. A very close and interesting parallel is found in Rom. viii., "We know not what we should pray for. . . . we know that all things work together for good". Job did not know many things; he did know, however, that the Lord was over all; that although he could not discern the Lord's hand, yet the Lord knew the way that he took, and in that confidence he found rest. So may we too, when before, behind, and on each hand there is nothing but darkness and perplexity.

Job not only was confident that the Lord knew the way he took, but also that a purpose was in it, "When He hath tried me". The trial that Job speaks of is likened to the refining of precious metals, for he continues, "I shall come forth as gold". In Psalm lxvi. we read of this kind of testing, "For Thou O God hast proved us: Thou hast tried us, as silver is tried" (verse 10). Verses 11 and 12 detail the ways in which the Lord had refined and tried them.

> "Thou broughtest us into a NET.
> Thou hast laid AFFLICTION on our loins.
> Thou hast caused men to RIDE OVER OUR HEADS.
> We went through FIRE and WATER."

The tangle and baffling nature of circumstances, likened to a net, the heavy affliction, the tyranny of fellow-men, the variety of trials that were like fire and water, these were the elements of testing. One blessed fact appears which is encouraging, and that is, the Psalmist can say, "Thou broughtest", "Thou hast laid", "Thou hast caused". This is parallel to Job's utterance, "He knoweth the way that I take", and like Job's conclusion, "I shall come forth as gold", the Psalmist says, "but Thou broughtest us out into a wealthy place".

Mal. iii. 3 says of the Lord, "And He shall sit as a refiner and purifier of silver". The context speaks of the coming of the Lord, and its bearing upon Israel and the priesthood. The words are true, however, in a wider sense; He sits as a refiner with regard to all His own. The trial of faith still proceeds, and sometimes it is a fiery trial, yet if it be found unto praise and glory and honour in the Lord's presence, the fiery tests will have been justified.

One very precious thought is suggested by viewing the eastern refiner at work. He sits, skimming the surface of the molten metal, removing the dross that rises under the effect of the fire, UNTIL HE CAN SEE THE REFLECTION OF HIS FACE! There is no need to explain the bearing of this upon our subject, it is so evident. May every trial through which we may be called upon to pass be borne in the strength and the joy supplied by the thought that He will refine and purify until He too shall see His own image reflected in us, and then shall we say like Job, "I shall come forth as gold".

We often hear fellow-believers either in prayer, in praise, or in conversation over the trying times in which we live, ask for, offer praise for, or refer to "an Elim in this wilderness". When the heart is downcast by distress and sorrow, the Lord often gives a period of relief and cheer, and we would not be unmindful of this mercy, or underrate the goodness that remembers that we are dust. Our object, however, is to draw the reader's attention to another aspect of truth. Israel had tested the bitterness of Marah, and then "they came to Elim, where there were TWELVE WELLS of water, and three score and ten palm tress". Here was a place exactly suited to their needs. Twelve wells, one for each tribe, and the shelter of the seventy palm trees! How runs the record, however? Did they stay and enjoy this resting place for long? Did they apportion off the wells one to a tribe? Did they settle here, or stake out a claim? The very next verse says, "And they took their journey from Elim, and all the congregation of the children of Israel came unto the wilderness of Sin".

They left the wells of water for the wilderness again, and they did so under the direct guidance of the Lord, for the pillar of cloud or of fire led them day and night. As a result of removal into the wilderness again, the children of Israel murmured. We do the same to-day if we place the Lord's blessings above Himself. What would Elim be to the spiritual minded when the pillar of cloud had left it for the wilderness? As we learn from I Cor. vii. 31, we hold all things that pertain to this life with a light hand.

"Ill, if Thou bless, is only good,
And unblessed good is ill."

We are all too prone either to mistake Elim for the land of promise, or to be willing to accept is as a substitute.

Blessed as these Elims are, they are only the blessings of a pilgrimage. Immediately they cause our hearts to cling to earth and ease, rather than resume the wilderness journey, they become a snare. Elim, though blessed, is not perfect. The place is named six times in the Scriptures, and is the sixth place mentioned by Moses in his summary of the journeyings of Israel (Num. xxxiii. 9). It is not the perfect rest. Let us therefore be grateful for the Elims of our journey. Let us, however, never allow these pleasant oases to become more to us than a halt by the way. Like the apostle, we "pursue", and face the trials of the wilderness in full consciousness of the blessing that must accrue to those who follow the leading of the Lord.

We may discover evidences to satisfy the flesh if we so desire. Moses could, most likely, have discoursed very convincingly upon the twelve wells, and the seventy palms, but all his arguments would have been shattered by the first movement of the pillar of cloud. Philippians and Hebrews, both epistles of the prize and crown (though on different planes and in different spheres), warn against "murmuring". May the Lord give us grace to unmurmuringly follow His guidance, accepting either Elim or wilderness with equal gratitude, being confident that it is “that good, and acceptable, and perfect will of God”.

“I have chosen the way of truth;
Thy judgments have I laid before me.
I have stuck unto Thy testimonies;
O Lord, put me not to shame.”

Psalm cxix. 30, 31.

pp. 63, 64

Every believer has made the first decisive choice. For them there is but one way, the way of truth. The word of truth, the gospel of their salvation, set their feet on this new road, and, by grace, this way is now their choice.

Truth to the believer is no speculation; it has been given by inspiration of God. Perilous times are imminent. A false liberalism is eating out the vitals of the Word; the leaven is working its corrupting way. One of the greatest perils for the believer now, and in the future, is that of faltering with regard to the Word of truth.

There is something sterling about the blunt Anglo-Saxon of verse 31, “I have stuck unto Thy testimonies”. It seems to look at apostasy in the face, and defy its seductions, even as the Lord did the temptations of the Devil by the word, “It is written.”

It is blessed to have made the choice of the way of truth; how much more blessed at the finish of one’s course to be able to say, “I have stuck to it”. Of all the perils which beset the believer in these closing days of darkness, none seems more singled out for scriptural notice than the tendency to give up, to turn back, to fail to stick to the truth.

In the advancing apostasy may we all be enabled to say with the Psalmist, “I have stuck unto Thy testimonies”, and with the apostle, “I have kept the faith”, and then with both we may look forward to that day without fear of shame.

"Say ye not, A Confederacy, to all them to whom this people shall say, A Confederacy; neither fear ye their fear, nor be afraid."
Isaiah viii. 12.

pp. 78 - 80

The prophecy of Isaiah contains two sections that are the recorded history of his own day. The first, chapters vii. and viii., concerns the Assyrian invasion and King Ahaz; the second, chapters xxxvi. - xxxix., concerns the Assyrian invasion and King Hezekiah. Much may be learned that would otherwise escape notice by comparing these two sections together. It may be asked, Why does this history intrude itself so pointedly into a book so undoubtedly prophetic of the future? The reason, or one reason at least, is this. These historic happenings were prophetic foreshadowings. If we see how God overturned all Sennacherib's vaunted strength, and saved the holy city without the intervention of the arm of flesh, we may well believe that He will do so again in the case of the Assyrian's antitype, the final oppressor, the beast of Rev. xiii.

We may learn a needed lesson by considering for a while the teaching of chapter viii. Verses 5-8 describe in strong figurative language the Assyrian invasion and its cause. We must go back to chapter vii. to understand the import of this inroad. Rezin, King of Syria, and Pekah, the son of Remaliah, King of Israel, went up toward Jerusalem to war against it, but could not prevail. It was told the house of David that Syria was confederate with Ephraim; their evil counsel was "to set a King in the midst, even the Son of Tabeal", i.e. Rezin, King of Syria. This then was not merely a war as of one nation against another, it was a war against the purpose of God, for He had covenanted with David concerning the throne and city of Jerusalem. Concerning this project therefore the Lord declared, "It shall not stand, neither shall it come to pass", for within the space of sixty-five years Ephraim should be carried away captive by Shalmaneser, "that it be not a people". Ahaz is told to ask a sign of the Lord, but refuses, for he had evidently made up his mind to seek to the arm of the flesh, instead of resting, like Hezekiah did, on the faithfulness of the Lord. The Lord Himself then gives a sign, "Behold, the virgin shall conceive, and bear a son, and shall call his name Immanuel". While this sign had a fulfillment in the days of Ahaz, it is pre-eminently Messianic, and is God's own renewal of the primal promise of Eden, through David's line, as may be seen in the accounts of the birth of Christ in the Gospels. The plot of Ephraim and Syria could not "stand". As a punishment the King of Assyria was to be brought against Israel, and great desolation would result.

Returning to chapter viii. 5-8 we shall appreciate the position better. "This people" had refused the waters of Shiloah that go softly. The pool of Siloam is mentioned in the Gospel by John, and the meaning of the name is given, viz., "which is by interpretation, Sent" (this is a symbol here of Christ, the sent One). Just as in the days of Ahaz the Jews refused the waters of Shiloah, and preferred the false King, Rezin of Syria, so in the future, having refused Him who came in His Father's name, they receive the one who comes in his own name.

The waters of Shiloah were the secret supply of Jerusalem, "the river that makes glad the city of our God", Psa. xlvi. 4 referring to this rock-hewn tunnel which gave access from within the city to the spring. The thought of quiet confidence suggested by the hidden supply of water is prominent in Psa. xlvi.:--

> "God is our refuge and strength, a very present help in trouble; therefore will not we fear, though the earth be removed, and though the mountains be carried into the midst of the sea. . . . the heathen raged, the kingdom were moved; He uttered His voice, the earth melted. The Lord of hosts is WITH US."

Here we find the same words that go to form the sign-name of the Messiah given to Ahaz, "Immanuel, God WITH US". So in Isa. viii. 10, the word Immanuel is translated by the words, "God with us". Speaking to the nations the prophet declares that all their associations and counsels shall come to naught, for "God is with us". This was the prophet's confidence; it was not alas shared by King and people. By a strong hand the Lord instructed the prophet saying:--

> "Say ye not, A confederacy, whensoever this people shall say, A confederacy; neither fear ye their fear, nor be afraid. Sanctify the Lord of hosts Himself, and let Him be your fear, and let Him be your dread."

The people, devoid of faith, were running panic-stricken to the arm of the flesh for succour; on every lip was the cry, "A confederacy". The separate calling of this people was flung aside, the faithfulness of their God was discredited, His covenant set aside; instead of "Sanctifying the Lord of Hosts" by quiet confidence in Himself, they "rejoiced in Rezin and in Remaliah's son". Are we not in need of this word? Is there not a tendency in all to forget our separate calling, to fail to sanctify the Lord, to lean on the arm of flesh, to underestimate the "waters of Shiloah that go softly"?

To those who are strangers to grace, who have no hope in God, to those whose sphere is the flesh, the use of all the ways and means of the flesh might be reckoned consistent, but what shall we say when the church of God, purchased by the blood of Christ, made alive together with Him, yea, raised and seated with Him far above all principality and power, what shall we say to that people if they take up the popular cry, if they desert their rock and refuge? Grave spiritual dangers are ahead of us, pressure such as is foreign to us now may be brought to bear; the temptation to yield, to give up the struggle, to go just a little way with the tide will be great. Take, among other passages, these words of Isaiah in the day of apostasy, Say ye not a confederacy. . . . Sanctify the Lord. . . . let Him be your fear.

"Use this world as not abusing it."
I Cor. vii. 31.

pp. 89 - 91

The words of our title come in an answer to some questions which the Corinthians had asked the apostle relative to marriage.

Dispensationally, the coming of the Lord was an event that bounded the horizon of the then living generation. The crisis of Acts xxviii. was yet future and unknown. The answer of the apostle concerning the question of marriage was given "because of the present distress". When a new phase of God's dealings was made known, the apostle commanded even young widows to re-marry and Eph. v. gives its benediction to the married state. While, therefore, those who are not under the dispensation which obtained when I Corinthians was written have no need to bind themselves by the apostle's advice to the Corinthians, the spirit of the message is as true as ever, and may prove a word in season to many.

Three arguments are put forward by the apostle to show the reasonablesness of his statement.

(1). It was a time of distress.
(2). The time was short.
(3). The fashion of this world was passing away.

The time of distress will come again with intensified violence as the coming of the Lord draws near (Luke xxi. 23-26). Already signs are multiplying about us, and foreshadowings warn us. The time too is shortening, the season of grace draws near to its close, and the day of vengeance approaches. Students of prophecy realize that the time for the resumption of prophetic times draws on apace. The world has not improved since the days of the apostle, the transitory nature of all its ways and wealth are still patent to the eye of faith. What is our attitude?

> "But this I say, brethren, the season having been shortened, henceforth both they that have wives, be as though they had none; and they that weep, as though they wept not; and they that rejoice, as though they rejoiced not; and they that buy, as though they possessed not; and they that use this world, as not using it to the full; for the fashion of this world passeth away."

Those who were married were not to renounce their obligations. Those who wept or rejoiced felt some pain or pleasure; those who bought obtained possession as a matter of course. The point is, all was to be held loosely, nothing was considered an end in itself. Sorrows need not unduly depress, joys will not unduly exalt, all will be tinged with the presence of sin and so be spoiled, and all may be lustred by the presence of the Lord and so be blessed. We use the world (by our creaturehood we must), it is even of necessity that we have dealings with the ungodly, for as the apostle wrote:--

> "I enjoined you in the letter not to mix with fornicators; not that you should utterly forego all intercourse with the fornicators of this world, or lascivious, or extortioners, or idolators, since you would need to go out of the world entirely" (I Cor. v. 9, 10).

Although, therefore, we must come into touch with the world, we seek not to be "of it" while compelled to be "in it"; we have to use the world, but we seek not all its privileges, we desire not its friendship, we shall gain or lose with very little difference of feeling so long as we know that He remaineth. We use the world, but not to the full.

Rotherham renders the word translated "abuse", by "using to the full". J. N. Darby renders it, "as not disposing of it as their own", and refers to ix. 18, 19 where he renders the verses:--

> "What is the reward then that I have? That in announcing the glad tidings, I make the glad tidings costless [to others], SO AS NOT TO HAVE MADE USE, AS BELONGING TO ME, of my right in [announcing] the glad tidings; for from being free from all, I have made myself bondman to all, that I might gain the most [possible]."

The world and all it possesses does not belong to us, our "rights" are heavenly, our blessings "spiritual", and we pass through the wilderness, and need journeying mercies; having "food and raiment" we are exhorted to be content; our true possessions are where our risen Lord is "in the heavenlies".

Content.

"For I have learned in whatsoever state I am to be content."
Phil. iv. 11.

pp. 109 - 112

So wrote the apostle to the church that he honoured by recognizing them to be spiritual enough to contribute to his needs, without receiving spiritual harm by the concession.

He rejoiced in the Lord very much that their care for him had revived, but he hastened to assure them that he did not speak as to want, for he had learned in whatsoever state he was to be content.

The apostle said, "I have learned." Where did he receive this learning? It was not as he sat at the feet of Gamaliel, excellent teacher as he may have been; it was as he sat at the feet of Christ.

The first occurrences of the word show that this "learning" is no mere book knowledge, but something deeper:--

> "But go ye and learn what that meaneth, I will have mercy and not sacrifice" (Matt. ix. 13).
> "Take My yoke upon you and learn of Me, for I am meek and lowly in heart: and ye shall find rest upon your souls" (Matt. xi. 29).

"Take My yoke", not merely hear My words. Enter practically into fellowship, not merely assent with mind and reason. In this manner had the apostle "learned" his lesson.

The word "therewith" which the A.V. gives in italic type is not necessary, and scarcely true. The apostle does not say that he is content with his state; rather he is content independently of it. The word rendered "content" is autarkes, and means, "sufficient in one's self, self-adequate, needing no aid, hence contented" (Dr. Bullinger's Lexicon). It might almost be rendered "independent". The idea is that the "state" in which Paul found himself had no effect upon the source of his contentment, it was quite "independent" of circumstances. When the Lord Jesus told His disciples to learn of Him, He referred to the circumstances that had just occurred. Chorazin, Bethsaida and Capernaum had not repented even though the works done in them were mighty enough to have brought about the repentance of such notorious cities as Tyre, Sidon, and Sodom. Outwardly the Lord's ministry looked like failure.

> "AT THAT TIME Jesus answered and said, I thank Thee, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth, because Thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent and hast revealed them unto babes. EVEN SO FATHER: for it seemed good in Thy sight" (Matt. xi. 20-27).

It was this spirit that the apostles had to learn, that they might find rest, true rest. Not to be glad because their ministry prospered (see Luke x. 17-20), not to be sad because their ministry was rejected, but just holily independent of either condition, finding all their joy in the will of the Lord.

The apostle had received his learning in the school of experience.

> "I know both to be humbled, and I know to abound. In everything and in all things I have been initiated both to be full and to be hungry, both to abound and to suffer privation."

Not only could he say "I have learned", and "I know", but "I have been initiated". This blessed independence of all externals is indeed a sacred mystery, and known experimentally only to initiates. Those initiated into the mysteries were "the perfect", and this passage glances at the third chapter with its fellowship in suffering and glory.

Another connection, and one of the greatest importance, is near to hand. Paul had written in a verse previous to his mention of being content,

> "Those things which ye have both learned and received and heard, and seen in me, do; and the God of Peace shall be with you."

Does not this seem to show that the apostle's contentment was but another word for a conscious enjoyment of the presence of the God of Peace? Yet again, he counseled the Philippians to be "anxious for nothing" and "praiseful and prayerful for everything", the result being "the peace of God which passes all understanding shall garrison your hearts and minds in Christ Jesus".

How was this lack of anxiety obtained? Again the answer is the conscious presence of the Lord. "Let your yieldingness be known to all men. The Lord is near". When we read on, after the apostle's statement concerning his contentment, we find his confession once again of the Living Christ, "I have strength for all things in Him that empowereth me".

As we look at this servant of God we can well understand that he needed to have no anxiety, no doubts, no trust or foreboding in circumstances. The Lord was near him; the peace of God garrisoning the citadel of heart and mind; the God of peace with him; and strength given for all things. Hunger and thirst, fullness and plenty had alike contributed to his initiation. We are sometimes apt to limit discipline to the hunger and privation side of things. Paul speaks not only of being humbled, but of abounding, not only of suffering need, but of being full. He had learned the wilderness lesson of the manna, "He that gathered much had nothing over, and he that gathered little had no lack". "In everything and in all things", he had been initiated. Contentment was only to be found in God, even though he had abounding wealth; contentment was only possible in God, when all things had gone. Paul and Asaph could both say, "Whom have I in heaven but Thee? And there is none upon earth that I desire beside Thee", and Paul and Asaph learned their lesson in the same place, "the sanctuary of God."

May we ask and receive this holy independence, holding on our way "in honour and dishonour, in evil report and good report", being rendered perfectly regardless of the opinions of others, of the character of circumstances, finding all our satisfaction in the God of peace, and learning the secret of true contentment in His presence.

Content.

pp. 122 - 125

As a supplement to Phil. iv. 11, we might look at one or two other passages. In I Tim. vi. 6, the apostle writes, "godliness with contentment is great gain"; this is in contrast with the wranglings and questions of men of corrupt minds who supposed that "godliness was a means of gain". From a worldly standpoint, godliness is more likely to lead to loss than gain. It is the exception and not the rule in the New Testament Scriptures to find increase of wealth accompanying increase of godliness. Yet after all these men of corrupt minds uttered truth, even though they meant very differently from the apostle; godliness is indeed a great gain. The apostle, however, qualifies his words; godliness with contentment. We have already learned his meaning of contentment by studying Phil. iv. 11; it indicates a complete independence of circumstances both favourable and adverse. We brought nothing into the world, and we can take nothing out, "But having food and raiment let us therewith be content", here is true gain, true riches.

The apostle turns again to the question of riches. "Those who will to be rich". What a temptation and a snare, what a source of discontent, as a perusal of Ecclesiastes will show; the love of money is a root of all evil, and pierces through with many sorrows those who through longing have wandered away from the faith. The apostle charges those who are rich in this age not to trust in their uncertain riches, but in God Who gives to us all things richly for enjoyment. There is a future treasure to be thought of, and a life that is life indeed, that is associated with the contentment of those who know the Lord. would it not do all of us good to ask ourselves the plain question: "Are we content with food and raiment?" These two items summarize the necessities of our creaturehood, all else must be considered as additional. We are bidden to take no anxious thought concerning what we shall eat, or what we shall drink, or wherewith we shall be clothed. Our Father knoweth we need these things, and all our need He will supply. The spirit that is not unceasingly stretching out after the comforts, the advantages, the privileges, and the good things of this world, but rests in the all-sufficiency of the grace of God, the fulness of Christ, and the blessedness of hope, is near the ideal. Food and raiment are pilgrim necessities, and are sure. Israel in the wilderness ate "angel's food", they were fed with bread from heaven, their raiment too was miraculously preserved during all the wilderness journey:--

> "I have led you forty years in the wilderness; your clothes are not waxen old upon you, and thy shoe is not waxen old upon thy foot, ye have not eaten bread, neither have ye drunk wine or strong drink, that ye might know that I am the Lord your God" (Deut. xxix. 5, 6).

Turning to the epistle to the Hebrews we find another exhortation to contentment:-- > "Let your conversation be without love of money; and be content with present things, for He hath said, I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee" (Heb. xiii. 5).

Love of money enters into the subject again, for the word "covetousness" here is the same as the "love of money" of I Tim. vi. "Conversation" here is the rendering of a word meaning "turn", and indicates the turn or bent of the mind, the attitude, the tendency even before it results in the act itself; let love of money have no influence upon you, let not your mind run along the channels of pounds, shillings and pence; if you have a business to attend, do your business heartily as unto the Lord; if your normal expenses are so much, seek to provide things honest in the sight of all men, but at the same time beware the love of it, for love is connected with the heart, and out of the heart are the issues of life. Satan knew the weak point in Judas—he knows ours too. The A.V. continues, "be content with such things as ye have", literally, "the things being present"; the Hebrews were enjoined to be content independently of their "having" anything. "The things present" may have been grievous to the flesh, as the only other occurrence of the word in Hebrews teaches. "Now no chastening for the present seemeth joyous". The child of God looks at present things with an eye that is really focussed on things to come; he sees them as it were without seeing, he knows the vanity of this world, he understands the hopelessness of all the attempts to put a Christless world right, and while he pities the blind leaders of the blind, and preaches "the Word" in season and out of season, he does not fret or worry, but sharing neither in the world's dreams of wealth, or schemes of happiness, its despair and its failure, he just finds his rest in the Lord he loves.

There is One Who remains ever true and faithful and He hath said, "No, I will not leave thee, no, neither will I in no wise forsake thee". Inelegant as this rendering may appear, we leave it as an attempt to show the English reader the fivefold negative. It is more than the exigency of rhythm that gives the five negatives in the hymn, "I'll never, no never, no never forsake", it is sober glorious truth. In the context of Phil. iv. 11 we found the words, "the Lord is NEAR". The reason for contentment in Heb. xiii. is the same.

Here is the secret of contentment, the enjoyment of the presence of the Lord, the knowledge that He will never forsake us, that come what may, He will be near. This will prevent the things present from chafing and irritating. Murmuring cannot live in His presence, money has no attractive glitter in the light of His countenance, but we are thankful for whatever His mercy sends us, and quietly wait for Him.

May we all numbered among the Lord's contented ones—miracles indeed of grace in a world of sordid self-seeking, shining as lights in a dark place, till satisfied we awake in His likeness.

God's Hidden Ones.

pp. 125, 126

Many and blessed are the titles which are used of the children of God in the Scriptures. Each one has a preciousness all its own, some titles are repeated over and over again, some are of a rarer nature; the title we have under notice occurs but once, and that occurrence is Psa. lxxxiii. 3, "Thy hidden Ones".

The day of manifestation and recognition is coming, prominence or exalted position is not characteristic of the children of God now. Like most, if not all the titles of the saints, this title necessitates Christ to make it valid; if they be God's hidden ones, Christ is their hiding place, "a man shall be as an hiding place from the wind" (Isa. xxxii. 2). Troubles and trials may be as a biting wind, or likened to the floods of great waters, yet of the Lord we may still say, "thou art my hiding place; Thou shalt preserve me from trouble; Thou shalt compass me about with songs of deliverance" (Psa. xxxii. 7). The Word of God, likewise, is a hiding place for the distressed and troubled spirit, "Thou art my hiding place and my shield: I hope in Thy Word" (Psa. cxix. 114); and precious is the marginal reading of Psa. cxliii. 9, "Deliver me, O Lord from mine enemies: I hide me with Thee". Not hidden and forgotten, but hidden and consoled, me with Thee.

This hiding place of the hidden ones is their refuge in time of trouble, "For in the time of trouble He shall hide me in His pavilion: IN THE SECRET of His tabernacle shall He hide me" (Psa. xxvii. 5).

Do you know the secret of His tabernacle? Do you know "where Christ sitteth on the right hand of God"? Does your hope "enter into THAT within the veil"? What an unspeakable privilege is here revealed; "Thou shalt hide them in the SECRET OF THY PRESENCE from the pride of man; Thou shalt keep them secretly in a pavilion from the strife of tongues" (Psa. xxxi. 20).

How bitter, how cruel may be the pride of man! How distracting and distressing the strife of tongues! How blessed to find such a hiding place, and to rest at peace in the secret of His presence!

Take as an illustration of this the attitude of the Lord Jesus when His testimony was rejected, when He had come to His own, and His own had not received Him:--

> "Even so, Father: for it seemed good in Thy sight. . . . Come unto Me all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest, take My yoke upon you and learn of Me; for I am meek and lowly in heart, and ye shall find rest to your souls" (Matt. xi. 26-29).

Only as we have something of this "spirit of Christ" that rests in the Father's will, only as we "take His yoke upon us and learn of Him", only as we have a meek and lowly heart can we find this true rest. Here is no self assertion, no aggressive championship, no defence, but rather the quiet withdrawing into God's hiding place.

> "He that dwelleth in the secret place of the Most High shall abide under the shadow of the Almighty. . . . He shall cover thee with His feathers, and under His wings shall thou trust" (Psa. xci. 1, 4).

As days grow darker, and apostasy deepens, this hiding place will become increasingly precious, and this title become one of the many "comforts of the Scriptures". Let us be grateful for the title and its message, and be content during man's day to remain God's hidden ones.

"The Just shall live by his Faith."
pp. 155 - 158

The words of our title occur in the writing of the prophet Habakkuk, chapter ii. 4, but the three quotations made by the apostle Paul in Rom. i. 17, Gal. iii. 11, and Heb. x. 38 are more generally known than is the original passage. On the three occasions in which the apostle quotes from Habakkuk, he places the emphasis upon a different section of the verse. Rom. i. 17 introduces the quotation in relation to the fact that the power of the gospel was found in its revelation of a righteousness of God; the apostle's first point is connected with the Just. Gal. iii. 11, the second quotation, emphasizes Faith, as opposed to law and the works of the law. Heb. x. 38, the third quotation, emphasizes the "living by faith", and chapter xi. is devoted to a series of Scripture biographies, the point in each case being the practical exhibition of the faith professed. At some future time we may profitably consider these passages in the epistles. Our intention at the moment, however, is to consider the bearing of the original passage upon the theme of the prophecy. Shall we therefore turn to the prophecy of Habakkuk?

The opening verses of chapter i. will give us the setting and the occasion of the words under consideration. The setting is a period of distress, and as we read, many will doubtless find an echo in their own experiences.

"O LORD, HOW LONG SHALL I CRY, AND THOU WILT NOT HEAR!
EVEN CRY OUT UNTO THEE OF VIOLENCE, AND THOU WILT NOT SAVE."

"How long?" How much agony of mind is summarized in these small words? This was Isaiah's only answer when sent upon his awful commission (Isa. vi. 11).

We shall find, when considering the Lord's answer in chapter ii., that this question is dealt with. The prophet had cried, and there was no evidence that the Lord had heard; he had cried out unto the Lord, making particular reference to "violence", and yet the Lord had not saved. Job passed this way, for he said:--

"Behold, I cry out of wrong (see margin, 'violence')
But I am not heard:
I cry aloud,
But there is no judgment" (Job xix. 7).

and we shall find that Job's remedy was Habakkuk's too. He next tells us that the distressing condition of the times he lived in were brought prominently before his eyes by the Lord Himself. "Why dost Thou show me iniquity, and cause me to behold oppression, for spoiling and violence are before me: and there are that raise up strife and contention". Chapter ii. gives the Lord's answer to the prophet's cries. Habakkuk had prayed, but to watch and pray; this Habakkuk did. "I will stand upon my watch, and set me upon my tower, and will watch to see what He will say unto me, and what I shall answer when I am reproved" (Hab. ii. 1). "And the Lord answered me" (Hab. ii. 2). The Lord then had heard, though no sign had been given; the prophet had said "How long?" The Lord's answer is, "The vision is for an appointed time, but at the end it shall speak and not lie: though it tarry, wait for it, because it will surely come, it will not tarry".

Unbelief questions God's wisdom, or His faithfulness, or His love, or His power, when placed in a position similar to Habakkuk, Faith waits. Faith is instructed to know:--

1. There is "a time to every purpose under heaven."
2. There will be no tarrying on the part of God when His appointed time comes, at the end of that limitation the silence shall be broken by the God of truth, "It shall speak."
3. The tarrying is only apparently so from our limited standpoint, "It will not tarry" must ever be faith's watchword.
4. Faith's attitude under the trial of unanswered cries and unchecked violence is that of waiting, "Wait for it."

All this the Lord puts into one sentence, "Behold his soul which is lifted up is not upright in him:

BUT THE JUST SHALL LIVE BY HIS FAITH."

This word comes as a message to ourselves. If by the grace of God we are numbered among "the just", if we have been justified "by faith", then during the days of this world's sunshine or tempest, peace or violence, we are called upon "to live by faith". To us the vision has been made plain; we grasp the precious fact that He is working out His purpose, however silent the heavens may be. We learn that prayer is not to be looked upon as a power for making God alter His set time to suit our convenience. Prayer is not only "crying", but prayer is "waiting" (the marginal reading of Psa. xxxvii. 7 is very beautiful, "Be silent to the Lord, and wait patiently for Him"). The just one who lives by his faith while grieved by violence and oppression, waits patiently, and is silent to his God. Unbelief calls upon God to vindicate His character, faith knows that "at the end it will speak and not lie"; unbelief says to its idols, "awake", but faith knows that the Lord is in His holy temple, and says, "Let all the earth keep silence before Him" (Hab. ii. 20).

Did Habakkuk learn the lesson? Chapter iii. is largely taken up with his Psalm, and the concluding portion (verses 17-19), will abundantly answer our question. Listen to the words of implicit trust even though all things around are failing and perishing. Chapter i. emphasizes "the things seen", chapter iii. closes with a faith that looks beyond to "things not seen".

"Although the fig-tree shall not blossom,
Neither shall fruit be in the vines;
The labour of the olive shall fail,
And the fields shall yield no meat:
The flock shall be cut off from the fold,
And there shall be no herd in the stalls;
YET I WILL REJOICE IN THE LORD
I WILL JOY IN THE GOD OF MY SALVATION."

Here is the righteous "living by his faith". The lesson has been learned, and God alone is the object of his trust; instead of despairing at such a terrible blight and visitation, faith knows that the Lord is in His holy temple. Circumstances may change, but we trust in the One who is above circumstances, He changes not. "The Lord God is my strength", and while He abideth faithful we may well be "content".

Such is the context of the oft-quoted words, "the just shall live by faith"; we pray that "like precious faith" may be the increasing portion of all who seek to "adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour in all things".

"What sayest thou of thyself?"
pp. 158 - 160

What a temptation to flesh and blood such a question can become! The words are taken from John i. 22, and they come in a section of that chapter headed, "and this is the witness of John" (i. 19). The occasion of the witness was the mission of the priests and Levites from Jerusalem to ask him, "Who art thou"? Such a deputation would have turned the heart and head of many a man. John had attracted the attention of the great ones at the metropolis, they had considered him important enough to send a deputation of priests and Levites to ask him who he was. Before this is recorded, the Scripture has already prepared us for the answer that he would give to their question; he was a man sent from God; he came for a witness of the Light; he was not that Light (i. 6-8). It is evident from these opening words that Christ was not eclipsed by the eloquence or the prominence of His forerunner; John was simply sent to bear witness of that Light. "John bare witness of Him and cried saying, This was He of whom I spake, He that cometh after me is preferred before me, for He was before me" (i. 15). Again the record of the forerunner is interrupted by a reference to the glory of his Lord; then after three more verses the witness of John is resumed. When the priests and Levites asked John, "Who art thou?", we are told "he confessed and denied not, but confessed, I am not the Messiah". The confession and the denial is without equivocation; most emphatically, positively, and negatively John bore witness to His Lord and Master. His questioners then ask, "What then? art thou Elias?".

In answer to the disciples' question, "Why then say the scribes that Elias must first come?" the Lord replied, "Elias truly shall come and restore all things; but I say unto you that Elias has come already, and they knew him not, but have done unto him whatsoever they listed. . . . then the disciples understood that He spake unto them of John the Baptist (Matt. xvii. 10-13). Or again in Matt. xi. 14, "If ye will receive it (i.e., the King and the Kingdom), this is Elias (i.e., John the Baptist), which was for to come". Before his birth the angel had told his father that he (his son John), should be great in the sight of the Lord, that he should be filled with the Holy Ghost before birth, and that he should go before the Lord in the spirit and power of Elias (Luke i. 14-17). Few of the Lord's servants had greater reason to make at least some claim to the title and office of Elias. John might have explained to his questioners the angel's words, or have anticipated the Lord's own statements; what, however, is his reply? Briefer than before he replies, "I am not". Again they ask him, "Art thou that prophet?" They may have referred to the words of Moses which were prophetic of Christ, or some other idea may have been in their minds; at any rate, John answers more briefly still, "No". Each answer becomes briefer; this was rather annoying; these men had to take back some answer, so again they put their original question, adding the words, "What sayest thou of thyself?" What will John say of himself? Listen, "I am A VOICE", not the voice, but a voice, simply a voice. This chapter reveals Christ as THE WORD, and John as A VOICE. Blessed relationship! Christ is the Light also, and of John Christ said, "He was a burning and a shining lamp" (luchnos). If Christ be a King, John is His forerunner; if Christ be the Word, John will be a voice; if Christ be the true light, John will be a lamp; if Christ be the bridegroom, John will be the friend of the bridegroom. Upon the testimony of Christ, John was more than a prophet, and the greatest of men; in his own eyes he was not worthy to stoop down and loose the latchet of his Saviour's shoe; his "text" might have been his own words recorded in John iii. 30, "He must increase, but I must decrease". John speaks of Christ as having come from heaven, and of himself as being of the earth, yet the Lord's question of the chief priests and elders, "The baptism of John, was it from heaven, or of men?", shows that John could have found reasons for placing himself a grade above the "earth" with regard to his ministry.

What true greatness is here! Christ and His glory filling the heart and the vision. To be greater than John the Baptist means to be lower and more humble, to be more completely devoid of self and self-seeking; to be more proof against the temptations of the flesh. Humility of mind too should characterize every member of the One Body; this can only be attained, as John's example teaches, as Christ is central and Christ is all.

Beloved reader, how would you answer if a learned and important body waited upon you and asked the question, "What sayest thou of thyself?"

"Christ is all."

pp. 171 - 174

The apostle Paul, speaking of one phase of his own experience in Rom. vii. said, "When the commandment came". He, as a Hebrew and a Pharisee, knew the law, and many many times he had read and recited the commandment, "thou shalt not covet". One day, however, it came, and the effect of the coming was immediately manifest. The words of our title have been read many times. We knew those words were in the epistle to the Colossians, we could have quoted the verse and its context from memory. One day, however, the words came, and despondency gave place to joy, weariness to renewed vigour, and murmuring to peace. "CHRIST IS ALL."

Starting from the innermost circle of the Church of the One Body, the doctrine of Scripture expands in ever-widening circles, but all concentrate in Christ. It will be helpful if we refresh our memory of this blessed fact, and notice a few passages of Scripture which point in this direction. First let us notice the verse itself wherein out text occurs. "Ye have put on the new man. . . . where there is neither Greek nor Jew, circumcision nor uncircumcision, Barbarian, Scythian, bond nor free, but Christ is all, and in all" (Col. iii. 9-11). In keeping with this is the statement of chapter i. 26, 27:--

> "The mystery which hath been hid from ages and generations, but now is made manifest to His saints: To whom God would make known what is the riches of the glory of this mystery among the Gentiles; which is Christ among you, the hope of the glory."

Or again in chapter ii. 2 (following the best texts):--

> "That their hearts might be comforted, being knit together in love, and unto all riches of the full assurance of understanding, to the acknowledgment of the mystery of God—CHRIST—in whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge."

Yet one more quotation from Colossians as bearing upon this one point:--

> "Let no man therefore judge you in meat or in drink or in respect to an holy day, or of the new moon, or of sabbath days: which are a shadow of things to come; but the body is of Christ" (ii. 16, 17).

If we turn our attention to the teaching of the Word regarding doctrine and practice, prophecy and ministry, church truth and age-time truth, search where we will, we shall find that the centre of each is Christ.

CHRIST IS ALL IN THE SCRIUPTURES.—To attempt to compare the Scriptures with any other book is indeed absurd. Like God Himself it sends out the challenge, "To whom then will ye liken Me?" The incomparable theme of this incomparable book is the Person and Work of Christ. What was the subject that caused the two disciples' hearts to burn within them on that day of resurrection? Let them tell us:--

> "Did not our hearts burn within us, while He talked with us by the way, and while He opened to us the Scriptures"

If we make further inquiry as to the subject of this memorable discourse we read:--

> "And beginning at Moses and all the prophets, He expounded unto them in all the scriptures the things concerning Himself."

Again, in this same chapter (Luke xxiv.) we have the same theme:--

> "These are the words which I spake unto you, while I was yet with you, that all things must be fulfilled, which were written in the Law of Moses, and in the Prophets, and in the Psalms, concerning Me."

It is a fact known to most of our readers, that these three words, "the Law, the Prophets and the Psalms" are the recognized title of the complete Hebrew Scriptures. In both quotations the Lord makes it clear that in all the Scriptures are to be found things concerning Himself. The words of the Lord, as recorded in John v. 39, 40, convey a vital lesson in this connection:--

> "Ye search the scriptures: for in them ye think ye have eternal life: and they are they which TESTIFY OF ME. And ye will not come to Me, that ye might have life."

The failure both of the Jews and of the disciples was due to their failure to see Christ in all the scriptures, and to realize in each case that "Christ is all." When Philip sought to persuade Nathaniel concerning Christ, his appeal is made to the Scriptures:--

> "We have found Him of Whom Moses in the Law and the Prophets did write, Jesus of Nazareth" (John i. 45).

Look at the way in which the Lord's whole life and ministry were continually referred to the Scriptures by the occurrence of the formula, "that the scripture might be fulfilled". The choice of Judas, the betrayer, and his doom, the very words and acts of the Roman soldiers regarding the Lord's coat, and, marvellous thought, the final concern of the crucified Christ Himself (John xiii. 18; xvii. 12; xix. 24, 28, 36, 37) are "that the scriptures might be fulfilled". So vividly does Psalm xxii. portray the crucifixion of the Saviour, that it is considered by many that this Psalm was quoted in full by the dying Christ. We know the opening words were uttered by Him, "My God, My God, why hast Thou forsaken Me?" We know that He was "despised of the people." We know they did "laugh Him to scorn", and say in effect, "He trusted on the Lord that He would deliver Him: let Him deliver Him, seeing He delighteth in Him". How vividly the awful condition of crucifixion is brought before us in the words:--

> "I am poured out like water, and all My bones are out of joint. . . . My tongue cleaveth to My jaws. . . . they pierced My hands and My feet. I may tell all My bones, they look and stare upon Me."

And then, at the very end of the Psalm, the words, "He hath done", are equivalent to those blessed words, "It is finished". Whatever these Psalms may have meant to those who first penned them, and whatever they may mean to us who read them still, one thing is clear, their first and grandest testimony is to Christ.

The exact place of His birth is given in Scripture, for Micah v. 2 says:--

> "But thou, Bethlehem Ephratah, though thou be little among the thousands of Judah, yet out of thee shall He come forth unto Me that is to be ruler in Israel, whose goings forth have been from of old, from everlasting" (Hebrew, Olam).

The very words the Son of God uttered as He left the glory to take upon Himself flesh and blood, are recorded in Scripture:--

> "Wherefore when He cometh into the world He saith, Sacrifice and offering Thou wouldest not, but a body hast Thou prepared for Me; in burnt offerings and sacrifices for sin Thou hast had no pleasure. Then said I, Lo, I come (in the volume of the book it is written of Me), to do Thy will, O God" (Heb. x. 5-7).

Thus we find that not only in life and in death is the Lord Himself in all the Scriptures, but before His birth at Bethlehem, and after His resurrection, He gave His testimony to the fulness and the truth of the Word of God. Let the reader take a concordance and trace the recurring words, "that it might be fulfilled", and he will but add to the evidence that Christ is in all the Scriptures.

The Spirit's record of the preaching of Philip in Acts viii. shows that Christ was the All in that man's evangel.

> "Then Philip went down and preached CHRIST unto them" (verse 5).

This is the burden of his message to the Samaritans. He next speaks to a man of Ethiopia who is reading the 53rd chapter of Isaiah:--

> "Then Philip opened his mouth, and began at the same Scripture, and preached unto him JESUS" (verse 35).

May we who read these words gratefully realize that the power and the glory of the Word of God lie largely in the fact that there Christ is all and in all.

The Name (Psa. xx.).
pp. 187 - 189

The most important feature of this Psalm is the recurrence of "The Name".

> "The Lord hear thee in the day of trouble
> The NAME of the God of Jacob defend thee" (verse 2).
> "We will rejoice in Thy salvation
> And in the NAME of our God we will set up our banners" (verse 5).
> "Some trust in chariots and some in horses;
> But we will remember the NAME of the Lord our God" (verse 7).

Before endeavouring to draw out some of the comfort of these verses, it will be helpful if we remember the custom of Bible lands to which allusion is made. In his book, Pictured Palestine, the Rev. James Neil, quoting from an article in the Quarterly Statement of the Palestine Exploration Fund, January, 1879, says:--

> "A fourth and most remarkable mode of taking sanctuary is evidently ancient. A man when pursued and overtaken by the avenger of blood may yet in most cases save himself by crying, 'I am the Daheel (that is 'one who has entered the abode of') such an one', mentioning the name of some person of power or rank. According to their custom, the protection of the person invoked is gained by thus merely calling upon his name. It is held to be as though the fugitive had succeeded in entering the tent of the dwelling of the person he mentions. In such a case, if 'the avengers of blood' refuse to listen to the appeal and take the manslayer's life, the person on whose name he has called is bound, by their code of honour, to take swift and summary vengeance. . . . he marches to the place where his Daheel was slain and has a right to take vengeance upon all who were concerned in killing him during three and one-third days. . . . when the three and one-third days are over, a white flag is hoisted on a pole by the relatives of the Daheel who was put to death, in honour of his protector."

At first sight we may be tempted to call such an illustration but cold comfort, for although the name was invoked, and vengeance was executed, the fact still remained, the one who sought protection was dead. This, however, we feel, is just the very point of the passage before us. First notice that the Psalm is a prayer for the Messiah, who figures prominently in the series of Psalms commencing with Psa. xvi. Notice Psa. xxi. is all about the King, crowned and in resurrection. Psa. xx. 4 says, "Grant thee according to thine own heart". Psa. xxi. 2 says, "Thou hast given him his heart's desire". What was this desire? "He asked life of thee, and thou gavest it him, even length of days for ever and ever". The "crown of pure gold", the "glory and honour", the gladness with the Lord's countenance, speak of the glory of the Lord in resurrection (cf. Heb. ii. 10-18; v. 7). Psalms xxii., xxiii., and xxiv. follow, and the references therein to the Messiah's death and resurrection need no expansion in these pages.

Coming back then to Psa. xx. we read again the prayer for the Messiah, "The Lord hear thee in the day of trouble". With this compare Psa. xxii. 11, "Be not far from me, for trouble is near". Then it is that the prayer goes up, "The name of the God of Jacob defend thee". This "name" the risen Lord declares unto his brethren (Psa. xxii. 22). The name that defends is "the God of Jacob", and the "seed of Jacob" is called upon to glorify the Lord in xxii. 23. The word "defend", means literally, "to set on high", and is so rendered in Psa. lxix. 29; xci. 14; and cvii. 41. It is something more than defence, it is triumphant deliverance.

The setting up of the banner in the name of the Lord when viewed in the light of the Palestine custom speaks plainly of resurrection. This banner was set up after the THIRD DAY! When the Lord Jesus died and was buried, it seemed to His sorrowing disciples that indeed God had forsaken Him. It was not so, however. During these three days of darkness, the prince of this world was judged, and on that resurrection morning the banner was set up in the name of our God, indicating his triumph over the powers of darkness. How full of meaning is that cry on the cross, "My God, My God, why hast Thou forsaken Me?" When He cried, "Deliver My soul from the sword, My darling from the power of the dog" (Psa. xxii. 20), He was calling on the NAME, and He could at length say, "When He cried unto Him, He heard" (verse 24).

The third reference to "the name" in Psa. xx. seems to be the result of the great saving strength put forth in the behalf of the Messiah, and its effect upon believers.

> "Now I know that the Lord saveth His anointed. . . . Some trust in chariots, and some in horses; but we will make mention of the name of the Lord our God. They are brought down and fallen; but we are risen and stand upright."

As we realize that faith goes out to God who quickeneth the dead, so we realize that all earthly and carnal strength is vain. "We will make mention of the name of our God". He who on that resurrection morning vindicated the trust reposed in Him by His well-beloved Son, is worthy of our fullest confidence.

"THE NAME OF THE LORD IS A STRONG TOWER, THE RIGHTEOUS RUNNETH INTO IT, AND IS SAFE."

Eternal Life.

The Acts of the Apostles.
pp. 26-28

There are but two references in the Acts to eternal life, and they both occur in the words of Paul spoken in the synagogue at Antioch, viz., Acts xiii. 46, 48.

Paul had spoken in the synagogue, and had given the Jews the solemn warning of verse 41. When the next Sabbath arrived such great numbers crowded into the synagogue that the Scripture says, "almost the whole city came together to hear the word of God". Instead of the Jews rejoicing that at last their Gentile neighbours were paying tribute to the oracles of God, envy possessed their hearts, and they spoke against the things spoken by Paul and Barnabas, contradicting and blaspheming.

> "Then Paul and Barnabas waxed bold, and said, It was necessary that the word of God should first have been spoken to you, but since ye put it from you, AND JUDGE YOURSELVES UNWORTHY OF aionian LIFE, lo, we turn to the Gentiles."

Rom. ii. 1-11 seems to throw a light upon this passage. There, in verse 7, we find the aionian life is bestowed upon those who by patient continuance in well doing seek for glory and honour and immortality, but unto them that are contentious and do not obey the truth, but obey unrighteousness, indignation and wrath, tribulation and anguish. How did these Jews "judge themselves" as unworthy of aionian life? The probability is that every one of them would have sure of aionian life; how did they therefore "judge themselves"? Rom. ii. supplies the answer:--

> "Therefore thou art inexcusable, O man, whosoever thou art that judgest: for wherein thou judgest another, thou condemnest thyself; for thou that judgest doest the same things."

Paul's great concluding words at Antioch had been:--

(1). A statement regarding justification by faith as something beyond the sphere of the law of Moses, followed immediately by
(2). A warning concerning despising (Acts xiii. 39-42; cf. Rom. ii., "or despisest thou", etc.).

The next two chapters that follow Rom. ii. deal almost exclusively with justification by faith without the deeds of the law. This was a great stumblingblock to Israel; in their self-righteousness they judged others and thereby judged themselves. The Gentiles at Antioch, on the other hand, did not despise the word of God's grace, they were glad when they heard the quotation of the prophet that spoke of themselves; instead of "putting the word of God from them", we read that they "glorified the word of the Lord", and AS MANY AS WERE ORDAINED TO aionian LIFE BELIEVED.

The same word is used in Rom. xiii. 1 as is used here, "the powers that be are ORDAINED of God". In Rom. xi., instead of recording the self-judgment of the Jew, and the ordaining by God of the Gentile, the apostle uses the symbol of the Olive Tree. Some of the branches were broken off; this is parallel with the attitude of the Jews at Antioch. The Wild Olive is grafted in; this is parallel with the ordaining of the Gentiles. There is no need to commence a discussion regarding free-will and electing grace, such doctrines do not come within the scope of this paper. God ordained that the aionian life forfeited by the Jews should be received by the Gentiles, and as many therefore as were ordained unto aionian life believed.

Further light upon this complex subject will be received from the passages where the words aionian life occur in the Epistles, which we must reserve for another occasion. The chief point of importance that should not be missed regarding this particular section is the connection that is observable between the occurrences of aionian life in the Acts, and Rom. ii., for there are few students of the Epistles who will not value the smallest help in arriving at the true meaning of that confessedly difficult passage.

Romans and Galatians.
pp. 73-77

The apostle Paul in his epistles uses the words aionian life ten times, and of this number four occur in the epistle to the Romans. It may be remembered that we found that the passage in the Acts (xiii. 46), where aionian life occurs, threw a little light upon that difficult chapter Rom. ii. In the Acts the Jews judged themselves unworthy of aionian life, and we observed by way of illustration the words of the apostle to the Jews in Rom. ii.

The context of the first occurrence (Rom. ii. 7) is most difficult of interpretation, and not until we have seen the true place that this passage has in the apostle's argument can we hope correctly to interpret its details. We might notice, however, that the apostle speaks in verse 6 of judgment according to works:--

> "Who will render to every man according to his works: to those who indeed by patient continuance of good works, are seeking glory and honour and incorruptibility, aionian life."

Here it will be seen that this aionian life, as it were, a summary of glory and honour and incorruptibility, and is awarded to those who patiently continue good work. The question here does not appear to be whether righteousness is attainable by good works, but rather that of impartial judgment as opposed to privilege, which idea of privilege was so ensnaring to the Jew. Whatever we may have to leave uninterpreted in this second chapter, we cannot avoid noting the fact that aionian life as it first occurs in this epistle is set before us in the light of a reward for good works rather than as an unmerited gift in grace to the undeserving.

If the context of the first occurrence of the words is one that is difficult of interpretation, that of the second cannot be said to be simple. It is not a question in this passage of award according to works, but of the goal of the Saviour's great sacrifice and redeeming love. The two parties in view in chapter ii. were the contentious Jew and the well-doing Gentiles; the alternative to aionian life in that passage was "indignation and wrath, tribulation and anguish". In Rom. v. 12-21 (the context of the second occurrence) the alternative to aionian life is death. In Rom. ii. the individual deeds of each person are the subject of scrutiny; in Rom. v. one man's disobedience constitutes all his seed sinners. The two parties chiefly concerned in Rom. v. are Adam and Christ. If these observations do nothing more than point out the fact that aionian life is not treated as a simple subject in the Word, we shall have accomplished a great deal. In the minds of most of us there has been but one idea regarding aionian life, and that, the concept of John's Gospel. We find, however, upon impartial study of the subject, that it is associated with widely differing aspects of truth; in one case it is associated with works, as for example the references in Matthew, in another with faith, as in John's Gospel: in Romans it is connected in the first instance with "good work", and in the second with the triumph of redeeming grace. Individual works, and even individual faith, are not mentioned in the context of the second reference. Adam brings in death by sin; Christ brings in life by righteousness. "Death reigned", says verse 14, "from Adam to Moses, even over them that had not sinned after the similitude of Adam's transgression", and "sin is not imputed where there is no law" (verse 13). Here we have the monarchy of death claiming all by virtue of one man's sin; verse 21 reveals another awful occupant of the throne, "sin reigned unto death". Death's dominion was due to sin, and to remove the sin would be to deprive death of his crown. And so the mighty simile is written, "that as sin hath reigned unto death, even so might grace reign through righteousness unto aionian life by Jesus Christ our Lord". In place of Adam, we have Christ, in place of sin and death, righteousness, grace and aionian life. The glory, honour and immortality lost by Adam is echoed by the aionian life brought in by Christ; as the one was lost through sin, the other, by grace, is brought in by righteousness.

Chapter vi. follows this passage with searching arguments concerning the walk of the believer after having passed from death unto life. The reign of sin, terminated by the work of Christ, must be terminated in the believer's experience also, "Let not sin therefore reign in your mortal body, that ye should obey it in the lusts thereof" (vi. 12). Sin cannot exercise dominion in the immortal body, for that will be beyond its sway. Chapter vi., however, has to do with the present life and the mortal body. Verse 13 speaks of "yielding" ourselves and our members unto God, a theme which is resumed in chapter xii.

Looking back to the time past of their lives, the apostle says:--

> "What fruit had ye then in those things whereof ye are now ashamed? For the end of those things is death; but now, being made free from sin, and become servants to God, ye have your fruit unto holiness, and the end aionian life" (vi. 21, 22).

The complete change in every particular that is indicated in these verses may be more clearly seen if set out as follows:--

A | a | Servants of sin.
b | Free from righteousness.
B | c | Fruit of shame.
d | End - death.
A | b | Free from sin.
a | Servants to God.
B | c | Fruit unto holiness.
d | End - aionian life.

Here again we find aionian life related to service and fruit, a very distinct conception, and not to be summarily swept aside by a generalizing of the subject in favour of the one aspect presented by John's Gospel. It must not be forgotten that the oft-quoted verse (Rom. vi. 23), commences with "for", and is a direct conclusion of the argument that has occupied the better part of the chapter.

The apostle speaks of our state by nature as being a condition of service; he speaks of the past time of our lives in the words, "ye were the servants of sin", and contrasts that service with the present, "being then made free from sin, ye became the servants of righteousness". The service of sin is "unto death" (16), "the end of those things is death" (21); so in verse 23, the figure of the servant and his wages is used, "for the wages of sin is death, but the grace gift of God is aionian life through Jesus Christ our Lord". The argument that is often developed from this verse (by taking it out of its context), while indeed truth, is not the truth that the apostle is here teach. The verse is often used in gospel preaching, the first statement being used as the basis of the teaching concerning the condition of the unsaved, the second as the setting forth of the grace of God in the gospel. This, however, is rather outside the scope of Romans vi. The doctrine of justification by faith and the question of salvation has been dealt with in the first five chapters of the epistle; Rom. vi. passes on to consider the question of the new life, and the new service (vi. 4; vii. 6), and here the apostle presents the believer with the alternative services, sin or righteousness. "Know ye not", says the apostle to these believers, "that to whom ye yield yourselves servants to obey, his servants ye are to whom ye obey, whether of sin unto death, or of obedience unto righteousness"? It is a question of "yielding"; "neither yield your members as instruments of unrighteousness unto sin, but yield yourselves unto God". The "end" of one service was death, or, as verse 23 puts it, "wages"; the "end" of the other is life, or as the same verse puts it, "the grace gift". No service that a believer renders earns anything. Rom. xii. 1 speaks of the yielding of our bodies a living sacrifice as but our reasonable service. Each one of us must realize, as we contemplate our utmost effort, that after all we are "unprofitable servants", and if the Lord has been pleased to promise a recognition of such service it must be taken as an act of grace. Rom. viii. 13 speaks very solemnly to the believer in relation to this question of life and death, which is somewhat parallel to the reference in Gal. vi. 8.

This passage in Galatians is the next in order of occurrence, and the context will be found to speak of service and work:--

> "Let every man prove his own work, and then shall he have rejoicing in himself alone, and not in another, for every man shall bear his own burden."

Then after telling those who receive spiritual help to remember to communicate in all good things, he adds the solemn words:--

> "Be not deceived, God is not mocked: for whatsoever a man soweth, THAT shall he also reap; for he that soweth to his flesh shall of the flesh reap corruption, but he that soweth to the spirit, shall of the spirit reap life aionian."

These words are addressed to saved persons, the unsaved man has no option. The believer therefore may sow to the flesh, and reap corruption. Just as he (the believer) is warned that the wages of sin is death, he may on the other hand sow to the spirit and reap life aionian. It is again a question of service or sowing, not, as in John's Gospel, believing.

There are a few more passages to consider before we summarize our findings, but such will have to be dealt with in another paper.

The First Epistle to Timothy.
pp. 94-96

The last reference which we considered was in the epistle to the Galatians. The canonical order of the epistles places Ephesians next, but we search that epistle of the Mystery in vain for any reference to aionian life; we go on to Philippians and to Colossians with similar results; there remains but one more "prison" epistle, namely II Timothy, and again our search is fruitless; fruitless is hardly the word, however, for the omissions of Scripture are inspired. Believing as we do, and as we believe we can demonstrate, that these four epistles are peculiarly sacred to the revelation and doctrine of the dispensation of the Mystery, and the church of the One Body, we cannot but recognize the fact that the apostle in enunciating and teaching this wondrous revelation of God's grace to the Gentiles has no occasion and no place for aionian life. By what warrant do we introduce it therefore? The apostle most plainly commanded Timothy, and us through him, to have a form (hypotuposis—a rough draft, or sketch plan) of sound words, which, said he, "thou hast heard of me". To those who do not recognize the peculiar and exclusive character of the prison epistles and the dispensation of the mystery, the fact that aionian life is never once mentioned in those four prison epistles may not mean much; to those to whom those epistles form the standard and touch-stone of their attitude toward the remaining portion of inspired truth, such omission speaks with authority. In the first epistle to Timothy and the epistle to Titus aionian life is found.

Paul tells us that he received mercy, though the chief or "first" of sinners, that the Lord might exhibit in him all long-suffering as a pattern (same as in II Tim. i. 13) of those about to believe on Him unto aionian life (I Tim. i. 16). Much depends upon the due appreciation of the meaning of the word mellõ ("about to", or "should hereafter") as to whether we grasp the import of the passage. Note the context and its arrangement.

I Tim. i. 12-17.

A | 12. Thanks to Christ Jesus our Lord.
B | 13. a | Paul "before" (proteros) a blasphemer.
b | "I received mercy".
c | "Because. . . . unbelief".
C | 14. Superabounding grace.
C | 15-. Saving sinners.
B | -15, 16. a | Paul "chief" and "first" (prõtos).
b | "I received mercy".
c | "That", example of those about to believe.
A | 17. Honour and glory to the King of ages.

The value of discovering the literary structure is that it enables one to see more readily with which particular section of the context any one part is connected. The verse that contains the reference to aionian life corresponds with verse 13, and the items introduced there are taken up and expanded in the later verse. Paul's former condition as a blasphemer, a persecutor, and an outrageous person would seem to have placed him beyond hope, "but I received mercy", he added. This mercy, verse 16 explains, must be considered as an exhibition of all longsuffering, having as its object, a type or pattern of those who are on the point of believing unto aionian life.

Mellõ ("should hereafter"), is variously rendered in the A.V., e.g.:--

"To be about" to do something (Acts iii. 3; xviii. 14; xx. 3).
"To be almost" (Acts xxi. 27).
"To be at the point of death" (John iv. 47).
"To be ready to do something" (Luke vii. 2; Acts xx. 7; Rev. iii. 2).
"To tarry" (Acts xxii. 16).

Many times it is rendered "shall" and "should".

The underlying idea in every passage seems to be that which is felt in the rendering, "at the point of"; it is as though we had almost reached the end, but we pause, we hesitate before taking the final step. For the encouragement of all, whatever their degree of sinnership who possibly were holding back, the apostle details his own condition; he emphasizes the mercy that was granted to him, and commends the true and faithful saying, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save SINNERS. He then stands forward as the "chief", the "first", the "pattern", and declares that the sins he committed he did it "ignorantly in unbelief". All, therefore, who finds themselves similarly placed and similarly constituted are encouraged to believe and receive aionian life. There is a solemn thought here that cannot be denied. Had Paul committed the same sins other than "ignorantly and in unbelief", his case would have been different; willful sin after a knowledge of the truth does not seem to be included in the character before us in the case of Paul. Such a statement will be an impossible idea to those only who hold that aionian life is synonymous with salvation.

The other reference is found in the sixth chapter, "Lay hold on aionian life" (I Tim. vi. 12). These words are a part of the charge addressed to Timothy. A saved man with years of faithful service behind him, called in the very context a "man of God", he it is who is exhorted to lay hold on aionian life. This is not in line with the usual evangelical conception of eternal life—but we are not careful for that. The context, moreover, is entirely contrary to that which the evangelical presentation of the theme demands; conflict, a good confession, keeping the commandment blameless, are the setting. Timothy's constancy in confession is stimulated by the remembrance of Christ who before Pontius Pilate witnessed a good confession. When Paul said of himself, "I have fought a good fight", he links it with the crown of righteousness which shall be awarded him at the manifestation of Christ (II Tim. iv. 7, 8). Instead of the crown, Paul exhorts Timothy in connection with the same "good fight", to lay hold on aionian life. This brings the passage into line with the many we have found in previous studies, and presses upon us the need for a better understanding of its aspects and conditions. In verse 19 the A.V. again reads "lay hold on eternal life", but the R.V., following the better readings, has, "lay hold on the life which is life indeed". The parallel, however, is striking, and the altered word is a commentary upon the subject. Aionian life, that is life indeed; this present life is hardly comparable. Those who are rich in this world's goods are exhorted to view their riches from the standpoint of the life that is life indeed, and to "lay up in store for themselves a good foundation against the time to come, that they may lay hold on the life which is life indeed". This laying hold is associated with "good works", which are most rigorously excluded from the gospel of the grace of God as a means of obtaining life. Those who were "dead in sins hath God quickened. . . . saved by grace. . . . not of works" (Eph. ii. 1-10).

So far as salvation is concerned the only foundation that can be laid is Christ, yet here is the scriptural exhortation to "treasure up a good foundation for the time to come with the object that they may lay hold on life".

The Epistle to Titus.

pp. 107-109

The two references to aionian life found in Titus are both connected with hope (i. 2 and iii. 7). The first passage links it with a promise made before aionian times, the second with the fulfillment of the promise by becoming "heirs according to the hope of aionian life". The Apostle is most emphatic when speaking of salvation to say, "NOT by works of righteousness which we have done, but according to His mercy He saved us", yet the subject of "good works" is a prominent feature of the epistle as will be seen by the brief structure here given:--

A1 | i. 1-4. "The hope of aionian life".
B1 | 5-16. "Every good work reprobate".
A2 | ii. 1. "Speak. . . . sound doctrine".
B2 | ii. 2-8. "a pattern of good works".
A3 | ii. 9-13. "Obey", "blessed hope".
B3 | ii. 14. "Zealous of good works".
A4 | ii. 15 - iii. 1-. "Speak", "obey".
B4 | iii. –1, 2. "Ready to every good work".
A5 | iii. 3-7. "The hope of aionian life".
B5 | iii. 8-15. "Maintain good works".

As a structure of the whole epistle considerable alteration and elaboration of all the members marked A would be necessary; the above presentation emphasizes the fact that every section of the epistle is alternated by a reference to "good works". The first and last pair are the ones that contain the occurrences of aionian life; the first is contrasted with those who though they profess they know God, in works deny Him, being abominable, and disobedient, and to every good work reprobate. The second is connected with the double exhortation to maintain good works. We found when looking at the overcomers in I Timothy that "good works", the "good fight", a "good confession" and a "good foundation" were all closely connected with laying hold on aionian life.

The first reference in Titus is connected with "the knowledge of the truth which is according to godliness". Both passages, we observe, are associated with hope; let us see the list of blessings with which hope is associated. The tried saint rejoices "in hope of the glory of God" (Rom. v. 2); the justified believer waits for "the hope of righteousness" (Gal. v. 5); the member of the One Body seeks to know "what is the hope of His calling", and himself is "called in one hope of. . . . calling" (Eph. i. 18; iv. 4). The fact that Christ was preached among the Gentiles, even after Israel was set aside, was to them "the hope of glory" (Col. i. 27). The Thessalonian believers were to wear as an helmet "the hope of salvation". The opening words of the first epistle to Timothy reveal Christ Himself as "our hope". The hope of aionian life is connected with the promise made by the God who "cannot lie". In Heb. vi. 17, 18 the God who cannot lie is connected with the "heirs of the promise" and the "hope lying before them". Titus iii. 7 makes inheritance according to the hope of aionian life.

Viewed from all points, "eternal life" as spoken of in the epistle to Titus is not quite so simple a subject as we have been led to believe; we are not pretending that we have solved the problems that arise as a result of this re-adjustment, we are simply stating the facts as clearly as we see them, believing that the entrance of His Word giveth light.

In the first epistle of John the point of view is somewhat different to that of Paul, even as we found the aspect of this truth was different in the Gospel of John as compared with that of Matthew; we therefore hope to deal with the first epistle of John in a separate paper.

The Epistles of I John and Jude.
pp. 139-144

We now approach the last of the references to aionian life contained in Scripture. Six are found in I John and one in Jude.

It will be remembered that the apostle John tells us the object with which he wrote the Gospel that bears his name, and it may help us to compare the author's own explanation of his object before we proceed further:--

> "These things are written, that ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God; and that believing ye might have life through His name" (John xx. 31).
> "These things have I written unto you; that ye may know that ye have aionian life, even unto you that believe on the name of the Son of God" (I John v. 13, R.V.).

The epistle differs from the Gospel in this, that while the Gospel was written in order to bring about faith in Christ and aionian life as a result of believing, the epistle addresses those who are believers, bringing before them scriptural evidences that they may know that they have this life. Notice how this different viewpoint is evident at the beginning. The Gospel opens with the words, "In the beginning was the Word", and takes us back "before the foundation of the world". The epistle, however, commences with the manifestation of the Word as man, "That which was from the beginning" (see ii. 7, 24).

Something evidential is in mind all the way through these introductory sentences, something "heard", and "seen", and "contemplated", and "handled". In other words, as verse 2 continues, "the life was MANIFESTED". The epistle proceeds to "shew unto" us "that aionian life which was with the Father, and was manifested unto us". The declaration of that which John had "seen and heard" was with a view, among other things, to fellowship, fellowship among one another, and fellowship with the Father, and with His Son Jesus Christ. The message so impressively given, attended by such witnesses, made manifest in such a Person, is this, "GOD IS LIGHT". Before it was written, GOD IS LOVE, stand the words, God is light; this should correct the departure from revelation towards philosophy which is manifested in the words of those who say that whatever God may or may not do in the punishment of the wicked, all must be in accord with this one fact, GOD IS LOVE. This we believe to be a grave error; it would be nearer the truth to say that all God's dealings with all His creatures must accord with these two facts that God is light and God is love. What place is there for love in the Judge who without respect of persons is to pronounce guilty or not guilty? Light is the focussing expression of all the attributes of the divine Judge.

> "Every one that doeth evil hateth the light, lest his deeds should be reproved, but he that doeth truth cometh to the light, that his deeds may be made manifest, that they are wrought in God" (John iii. 20, 21).

The aionian life which is given by God upon faith in His Son was fully manifested in the faith, the life, and the walk of the Lord Jesus Christ. No one can have this life who abides not in Christ.

> "Let that therefore abide in you which ye have heard from the beginning; if that which ye have heard from the beginning abide in you, ye also shall abide in the Son and in the Father. And this is the promise that He hath promised us, even aionian life. . . . the anointing. . . . abideth in you. . . . ye shall abide in Him. . . . abide in Him" (I John ii. 24-28).

Now what of the one who profess aionian life, one who, in other words, professes to be abiding in Him? "He that saith he abideth in Him ought himself also so to walk, even as He walked" (I John ii. 6). Saying is forcefully contrasted throughout this epistle with doing; "He that saith he is in light and hateth his brother, is in darkness even until now, he that loveth his brother abideth in the light" (I John ii. 9, 10).

The next occurrence of aionian life continues this thought, "We know that we have passed from death unto life because we love the brethren", we know this fact upon the bare statement of God's Word, but we have evidence in our attitude to our brethren. "Whosoever hateth his brother is a murderer, and ye know that no murderer hath aionian life abiding in him" (I John iii. 15). Do not let us seek to turn the edge of this Scripture. It is not a question of whether a criminal can be saved, but whether a believer who hates his brother has aionian life abiding in him. If aionian life is synonymous with salvation, then, either a believer never has, and never can hate his brother, or some believers who have hated their brethren will be lost. We do not believe aionian life is synonymous with salvation, but that Scripture most definitely declares that a believer who hates his brother HAS NOT aionian life abiding in him, but we do not thereby believe such an one is "lost"—he will be a "loser" rather. In I John v. 4, 5 we read:--

> "Whatsoever is born of God overcometh the world: and this is the victory that overcometh the world, even our faith; who is he that overcometh the world, but he that believeth that Jesus is the Son of God."

It may be objected that there are some who believe that Jesus is the Son of God, who do not appear to possess the faith of the overcomer. That is true, and unless we have due regard to the atmosphere of the epistle, we may be importing into one dispensation that which is true in a full sense only of another. I John iv. in its opening verses makes it clear that the believers to whom John wrote were constantly confronted with "spirits" and "false prophets", "that spirit of Antichrist". This spirit of Antichrist confessed not that Jesus Christ has come in the flesh, but, said the apostle, "ye are of God, little children, and have overcome them". Again in ii. 22 the apostle says, "Who is the liar but he that denieth that Jesus is the Christ? He is Antichrist, that denieth the Father and the Son". Of these believers it is said:--

> "But ye have an unction from the Holy One, and know all things. . . . but the anointing which ye have received of Him abideth in you, and ye need not that any man teach you; but as the same anointing teacheth you of all things, and is truth, and is no lie, and even as it hath taught you, ye shall abide in Him" (I John ii. 20, 27).

These things are not the normal atmosphere of the Church of the One Body: the denying spirits, Antichrist, and the anointing with its supernatural power of instruction belong to other times; "Little children, it is the last hour" (I John ii. 18). All these things speak of that dreadful period when Antichrist and evil spirits will make a belief in Jesus as the Son of God a very real, personal, hated testimony.

Too readily have many taken to themselves the words of assurance in I John v. 11-13, "And this is the record, that God hath given to us aionian life. . . . that ye may know that ye have aionian life". Shorn of its context, it is easy to "prove" that a believer HATH everlasting life, and that he is not justified in questioning his possession of it, for is not the Word written, "that ye may know?" Reading the passage in its context we ask, What things were written that we may know?, and among them we must include the statement of iii. 15. A believer, therefore, who hated his brother would "know" that aionian life did NOT abide in him by "these things that were written". The epistle does not propose to prove that every one who believes has aionian life, but does set before us the walk and character of those who truly "abide in Him". Such and such only may take the assurance of v. 11. All the confusion comes about through the use made of one or two verses in John's Gospel by evangelists, whereby an unscriptural conception has been entertained as God's truth. Many fight for the retention of aionian life to every believer under the mistaken assumption that such life is equivalent to justification and salvation.

We have pointed out that aionian life has no place in the four prison epistles, the epistles of the Mystery. The parallel to aionian life in these epistles is to be found in Phil. iii. where the apostle desires to "know Him and the power of His resurrection". During the dispensation of miracle, the powers of the coming age, believers received the age-life. Let not the members of the One Body imagine that because they have not this life that they are losers thereby. The One Body has no place in the Millennial kingdom, it is not the loser thereby: so with regard to this question. Of the members of the One Body it is written, "Your life is hid with Christ in God". "Hid", not yet manifested; we walk by faith now, the hidden risen life at the right hand of God is our only hope and support. No powers of the coming age are ours, no anointing that endows us with supernatural powers of discernment, yet would we exchange? No member of that One Body who has realized his calling contemplate the thought.

Coming to the last reference in the epistle to aionian life, we must make another comparison with the apostle's words in the Gospel:--

> "I have overcome the world. These words spake Jesus and lifted up His eyes to heaven, and said, Father, the hour is come; glorify Thy Son, in order that Thy Son also may glorify Thee; as Thou didst give Him authority over all flesh, that He should give aionian life to as many as Thou hast given Him, and this is aionian life, in order that they might know Thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom Thou hast sent" (John xvi. 33 - xvii. 3).
> "We know that the Son of God is come, and hath given us discernment, in order that we might know Him that is true, and we are in Him that is true, even in His Son Jesus Christ. This is the true God and aionian life" (I John v. 20).

The Gospel teaches that aionian life is given in order to a knowledge of the only true God, and the One He has sent. The epistle re-affirms this, declaring that they know the Son of God has come, and has taught them concerning the true One; in this One those who have aionian life abide, and by the discernment given them they are kept from the lie, the Antichristian denial, and are exhorted to keep themselves from idols.

The last reference of all, Jude 21, will be found to have a context similar to the epistle of John. Denial of the Lord (verse 4) caused the apostle to write in haste (verse 3), and he immediately draws upon the portion of O.T. history that is the basis of the epistle to the Hebrews.

> "I will therefore put you in remembrance, though ye once knew this, how that the Lord, having SAVED the people out of the land of Egypt, afterwards DESTROYED them that believed not" (verse 5).

John had said, "It is the last hour". Jude reminds his readers that "there should be mockers in the last time", and in vivid contrast places the saints of God, building up themselves on their most holy faith, and praying in the Holy Spirit. To these he says, "Keep yourselves in the love of God, looking for the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ unto aionian life".

These words constitute the last occurrence of aionian life. We most earnestly ask our readers to weigh over all the passages, and to take notice of all the conditions attaching to the subject. The object of the papers will be attained if the reader is stirred up to try the things that differ, and to give an unbiased consideration to all the phases of the subject. Many be led on in their studies to see that they have been calling the highest glories of the One Body by a term that has confused them. May we all rejoice in "Christ Who is our life", and look forward to that day of manifestation "in glory".

Faction, Fellowship, Faithfulness.
pp. 91 – 94

It is written that, "he that soweth discord among brethren is an abomination unto the Lord", and we may well shrink back from any participation in that which is so grievous. To the Corinthians, the apostle speaks with equal intensity when he would show them the fleshy character of a party spirit. "Is Christ divided? Was Paul crucified for you? or were ye baptized in the name of Paul?

We must not think of unity as though it were a synonym for uniformity. The spirit that prompts the language, "Master, we saw one casting out demons in Thy Name, and he followeth not us; and we forbade him, because he followeth not us", must be repudiated, for it savours not of Christ, but of the flesh. Among those who seek the truth of the Word, there is not one that can lay claim to all the truth, and while the diligence and usefulness of others should provoke us to emulation, we must encourage continually the spirit that can say, "Enviest thou for my sake? Would God that all the Lord's people were prophets, and that the Lord would put His spirit upon them".

While we must ever watch our hearts and words lest Faction should be encouraged, we must equally weigh over the teaching of the Word as to Fellowship. Many who have sought to avoid the evil of a party spirit, have however overstepped the scriptural bounds of Fellowship. We are urged to "put up no bar", and not to sit in judgment upon fellow-believers. Much as we appreciate the spirit that often prompts those who thus speak, and while we have endeavoured to allow in others the liberty we ourselves enjoy, we see too plainly the teaching of the Word to allow ourselves to become entangled in a fellowship that is contrary to the Word, merely for sentimental or other feelings. While we are enjoined to "receive him that is weak in the faith", and not to despise the one whose weakness causes him to act very differently to ourselves, there are occasions when continued fellowship becomes a betrayal of our trust.

> "Whoso leadeth forward (proagõn, L., T., Tr.) and abideth not in the doctrine of Christ hath not God. . . . If there come any unto you, and bring not this doctrine, receive him not into your house, and greet him not; for he who greets him HAS FELLWOSHIP (koinoõ) with his evil deeds" (II John 9-11).

Here is scriptural ground for a cleavage. No plea of fellowship, or love, or our own liability to err, or the sadness our attitude may cause, or the fact that most probably our motives will be misunderstood, or that we shall lose the support of many a dear child of God, or that ties of sweetest friendship may be severed, none of these things can alter the plain teaching of the Word. The forerunners of the apostacy are everywhere busy. Earnest students of the Word are sowing seeds the harvest of which would horrify them could they but foresee it.

The Person of Christ, His nature and offices, are prominent in the list of doctrines marked down for attack. Sin, too, by the fact that its absolute origin is not a subject of revelation, affords scope for much teaching that either reduces sin from a crime to a blessing in disguise, or compromises the fair name of God and declares His policy to be let us do evil that good may come. We must not allow the words of those who misrepresent our motives, calling us partizans and what not, to prevent us from faithfulness.

The spirit in which the separation is made must certainly be one of love, even as the apostle enjoined the Thessalonians:

> "If any man obey not our word by this epistle, note that man, and have no company with him that he may be ashamed. Yet count him not as an enemy, but admonish him as a brother."

"It is required in stewards that a man be found faithful". Stewards dare not betray their trust by encouraging on the one hand faction and the drawing away of disciples after them, or by a false interpretation of fellowship on the other.

It is sometimes forgotten that a narrower margin is allowed a leader or teacher than is allowed the simple believer. I may have fellowship with a believer without compromise which in a teacher would be impossible. II John 9-11 has the leaders and teachers of doctrine in view.

This line of teaching is manifest in I Tim. iii. A bishop must be blameless, the husband of one wife, etc. In the early church (as in foreign missions to-day), where converts were made from paganism there were many who would have more than one wife. This was no barrier to fellowship, the responsibility could not be lightly repudiated. As a believer he would have to walk softly. While the fullest fellowship would be his as a believer, such could not be the case as a teacher. Such a man could not take oversight. His many wives would not commend the truth, hence he must be blameless, the husband of one wife. The home life of a believer is no qualification for fellowship as a believer, but if a believer cannot rule his own house well he cannot be allowed to attempt to rule the church of God. We are not discussing whether the office of bishop still obtains, we are considering this principle concerning the higher qualification of teachers. Faithfulness may compel me to repudiate fellowship with some as teachers lest I be implicated in their deeds, and faithfulness must be the touchstone increasingly as apostacy draws near.

Our hearts are heavy sometimes as we learn the emptiness and the error of the churches. We cannot, however, join in with their errors to endeavour to stem the tide. Faithful, separated Abraham could have done more for Sodom, had it been possible, than Lot who sat in the gate. Events are moving rapidly, and believers will continually be confronted with the choice of faction, fellowship and faithfulness. While we most earnestly pray that faction may be forever avoided, and true fellowship most eagerly pursued, we do, at the same time, pray that, "by honour and dishonour, by evil report and good report: as deceivers and yet true", that come what come may, even though faithfulness should foreshadow the forsaken and solitary parallel of II Tim. i. 15, "This thou knowest that all they which are in Asia be turned away from me", it may be held unashamed, knowing Whom we have believed, and find its other and blesses parallel in II Tim iv. 7, “I have kept the faith”.

Fundamentals of Dispensational Truth.

Cain and Abel.—The two Seeds.
pp. 3-9

The names given by Eve to the two sons whose birth is recorded in the opening of Gen. iv. provide a fair insight into the frame of mind, and the modifications wrought by experience, of the first man and woman.

They had been expelled from the garden planted by God; the ground upon which they stood, and from which they wrung a living by the sweat of the face, spoke to them continually of the curse which had settled upon it. The sorrows of their new experiences, however, were lustred by hope. Had not God said that the woman's seed should bruise the serpent's head? Did He not set before them the wonderful symbol of a restored and redeemed creation when He caused the cherubim to tabernacle at the east of the garden? In view of this we can understand in measure the fulness of hope and desire that possessed the breast of those first parents, and the reason why they named their infant son Cain. Cain in the Hebrew language means "acquisition", the verbal form occurs in Gen. xxv. 10 and Exod. xv. 16 as "purchase"; in Gen. xxxiii. 19, xxxix. 1 as "buy"; in Neh. v. 8 it is "redeem", in Isa. xi. 11 it is "recover", and in Gen. iv. 1 and Prov. iv. 5 it is "get". It will be seen that the word, while indicating acquisition, does not convey any idea as to how the acquisition is made; it may be as a gift, or as a purchase, it may be by power or by redemption. Cain was looked upon by his parents as an acquisition; the A.V. reads, "I have gotten a man from the Lord", the Hebrew 'ish 'eth Jehovah, is literally, "a man, even Jehovah". This rendering suggests the reason why the name Cain was given. Adam and Eve felt sure that this man-child born to them was none other than the "seed of the woman" promised in the earlier chapter; how mistaken they were events were to prove. Scripture indeed tells us that instead of being the promised seed of the woman, Cain "was of that wicked one", in other words, he was rather "the seed of the serpent". It is important to notice that the good, or the types of good, do not come first. Cain comes before Abel, Ishmael before Isaac, Esau before Jacob, Reuben and the others before Joseph, "that was not first which is spiritual, but that which is natural, and afterwards that which is spiritual". Cain is one of the great foreshadowings in this book of beginnings. Jude, writing of the last days, says, "Woe unto them! for they have gone in the way of Cain". John in his first epistle likens Cain to the world, "we should love one another, not as Cain, who was of that wicked one, and slew his brother. . . . marvel not, my brethren if the world hate you". Not only so, a strong division is made between the two seeds, Cain was "of that wicked one", "he that committeth sin is of the devil", "in this are the children of God manifest, and the children of the devil". In our Lord's day there were those who were "the offspring of vipers", and all down the age, from Cain onwards, the two seeds have run their course together. Satan, as the god of this age, and the prince of this world, by those who are his children, persecutes and seeks to destroy those who are God's children. The Lord Himself has ordained the "enmity" (Gen. iii. 15), therefore whosoever is a friend of the world constitutes himself an enemy of God. The presence and purpose of Cain is repeated in parable form by the Lord in the parable of the Tares, "the good seed are the children of the kingdom; but the tares are the children of the wicked one".

We cannot help feeling that a due recognition of those scriptures which speak of one section of the human race as "children of the wicked one", "children of the devil", (I John iii. 8; Acts xiii. 10; John viii. 44), a "generation of vipers", and of THE man of sin as the "son of perdition", etc., is necessary to arriving at a true understanding of the scope and results of redemption. When the Lord asked the question, "Ye serpents, ye brood of vipers, how can ye escape the judgment of Gehenna?" He gave expression to a query that runs through the whole Bible. As a "fundamental of dispensational truth" the recognition of the two seeds and their destinies is all-important.

The high hopes that burned in the heart of our first parents were doomed to disappointment, Cain was not the promised deliverer. By the time Abel was born experience had taught the lesson of the age, at least in its elements, that the creature had been made subject to vanity. "Vanity of vanities, all is vanity", was the summing up of the wisest man that lived, and we venture to say that no more important portion of Scripture from the dispensational point of view can be found than that of Ecclesiastes. Abel was so named because Abel means vanity. Cain is referred to in the N.T. three times, viz., Heb. xi. 4, "Abel offered a more excellent sacrifice than Cain"; I John iii. 12, "Not as Cain who slew his brother"; Jude 11, "They have gone in the way of Cain". Abel is mentioned four times in the N.T., viz., Matt. xxiii. 35, "From the blood of righteous Abel"; Luke xi. 51, "From the blood of Abel"; Heb. xi. 4, "By faith Abel offered unto God a more excellent sacrifice than Cain, by which he obtained witness that he was righteous"; Heb. xii. 24, "The blood of sprinkling which speaks something better than Abel."

The first thing we learn is that Abel was RIGHTEOUS, and that Cain was "of that wicked one". There is no question of salvation in the case of Cain and Abel, but rather of righteousness and unrighteousness. Abel was evidently a prophet (Matt. xxiii. 34), and when Cain shed his brother's blood, he shed "righteous blood" (Matt. xxiii. 35). The two offerings that figure in Gen. iv. were not offerings for sin, but for worship, the word minchah is that rendered meat offering, an offering that is in the nature of a gift, not an expiation (see Gen. xxxii. 13-21, "gift"). Abel's offering is given in Gen. iv. as, "the firstlings of his flock and the fat thereof". Cain's as "the fruit of the ground". Heb. xi. gives no such details, but says instead that Abel "offered unto God a more excellent sacrifice than Cain". The testimony that God bore to Abel was, "that he was righteous".

To introduce the future into the past or present is to fail in interpretation; to introduce into Gen. iv. the question of justification by faith is to teach a truth that does not find a place therein. Gen. iv. does not raise the question as to how righteousness was obtained, but whether it existed, the purely elementary fact that is taught by Gen. iv. in the light of Heb. xi. and Matt. xxiii. is that Abel was righteous. We might, in the light of subsequent revelation, be led to suppose that because Abel's offering was that of an animal, and involved the shedding of blood, that this constituted the great difference. It must be remembered that when God Himself gave the law of the minchah, the offering of

Gen. iv., He says nothing about the slaying of an animal, or the shedding of blood. Leviticus ii. gives the specification, and it will be seen that Cain's offering of the fruit of the ground is nearer to the bloodless minchah than was Abel's. The excellency of Abel's offering therefore seems to arise from another origin. The cause of the acceptance of Abel's offering and the rejection of Cain's is found in the character of the offerers rather than their offering. Abel's gift was accepted because he was "righteous"; Cain's was rejected because he was wicked. The same principle is found in the words of the Lord in Matt. v. 23, 24:--

> "If therefore thou bring thy gift to the altar, and there rememberest that the brother hath ought against thee, leave there thy gift before the altar, and go thy way, first reconciled to thy brother, and then come and offer thy gift."

Here is the case of Cain and Abel, Cain's offering was rejected because God could not bear witness that the offerer was righteous.

Let us look at the reference to Cain and Abel in I John iii. What is the theme of this chapter? The structure makes it very clear that John is urging a practical manifestation of righteousness and love upon those who have believed.

I John iii. 1-18.

A | 1, 2. The Father's love to us.
B | 3-9. Distinguishing mark between God's children and the devil's.--Righteousness.
B | 10-17. Distinguishing mark between God's children and the wicked one's.--Love.
A | 18. Our love to brethren.

The member B is the one that contains the reference to Cain, and we will give that in detail.

I John iii. 10-17.

B | e | 10, 11. "In this" are manifested the children of God and of the devil.
f | 12. Cain slew his brother.
g | 13. The world's hate.
h | 14, 15. No murderer has eternal life abiding in him.
e | 16-. "In this" we perceive the love of God.
f | -16. Lay down lives for brethren.
g | 17-. The world's good.
h | -17. No compassion. How abideth the love of God in him?

The two seeds are characterized by their deeds; the emphasis is not put upon the righteousness which is upon faith without works, but the righteousness which is "done" and manifested. The apostle says:--

> "Little children, let no man deceive you, the one who does righteousness is righteous, the one who does sin is of the devil; no one not doing righteousness is of God, and no one who loves not his brother."

Then follows the example of Cain who manifested that he was "of the devil", and was not righteous, by his hatred of his brother. "And wherefore slew he him? Because his works were wicked and his brother's righteous". Cain's works were poneros (wicked), because he was of the poneros (the wicked one). We do not understand the mystery of the divine begetting, we know it to be a reality, and we see its manifestation. We do not understand the mystery of satanic begetting, but Scripture emphasizes the "sonship" of the devil's children as clearly and in the same terms as it does those of God, and we see their manifestation. Cain slays his brother, children of God lay down their lives for their brethren.

We must not attempt to pursue this theme further, for the whole epistle is an exposition of this manifestation (see i. 6-10; ii. 4-6, 29; iii. 3, 7, etc.). Gen. iv. 7 places emphasis upon "doing well", and by so doing Cain would have been accepted. If he did not well "a sin offering was lying at the entrance (of the garden of Eden, where the Presence of the Lord tabernacled between the cherubim). Cain repudiated the word of God, he would not go the way of true acceptance, and instead of slaying the sacrifice, he slew his brother. Cain's punishment was:--

> "Now thou art cursed more than the ground. . . . a fugitive and a vagabond shalt thou be in the earth."

Cain realized that the greatness of his punishment consisted more in the being driven out from God's presence than from the extra curse upon the ground. In answer to his fear that he would be slain, the Lord set a sign or token for Cain, and protected him (O! wondrous mercy) by a threat of sevenfold vengeance. The vagabond takes his name with him, for the land he traveled to is named Nod (wandering or vagabond); it does not say "and he took unto himself a wife" in the land of Nod, as so many misquote.

Cain was the first one that Scripture says built a city, the second recorded builder was Nimrod. The Israelites were compelled to build cities for Pharaoh, but the only building that is recorded of God's children in the first two books of the Bible is that of altars. The rebels in the land of Shinar said, "Go to, let us build us a city". Lot, not Abraham, was attracted by "the cities of the plain", and when Sodom was about to be destroyed Lot pleaded that he might be allowed to go to another city, Zoar. Abraham, on the other hand, built no city, for he looked for a city that had foundations, whose Maker and builder is God. Cities are symbols of civilization, the arts and crafts and music were all introduced by the descendants of Cain. The "world" with all its attractiveness is of Cain, who was of that wicked one, and the true child of God is found outside with Abel, with Enoch, with Noah, with Abraham, and with Christ.

We must not go further, much more should have been considered, but space is limited. May the practical lessons not be lost upon us, and may we grasp this great fundamental of dispensational truth – the two seeds.

Seth (Gen. iv. 25).
The Principle of Substitution.
pp. 35-38

We have learned from the record of Cain and Abel of the presence of two seeds upon the earth.

The enmity which exists between these two seeds is irreconcilable. It is a fundamental of dispensational truth to recognize the presence and the utter contrast of the principles for which Cain and Abel stand.

The name "acquisition" is affixed to that which is evil, the name "vanity" to that which is good, for another fundamental of dispensational truth is that the present life is comparable to a wilderness journey, and that the believer's hope lies beyond it. We now turn to the consideration of what the Scriptures teach about Seth, the son of Adam.

At the birth of this son we read that his mother "called his name Seth, for God, said she, hath appointed me another seed instead of Abel, whom Cain slew" (Gen. iv. 25). The word "appointed" and the name "Seth", are alike in the original. There is an important difference between the record of Cain and Abel, and that of "Seth"; in the former case we have a record of deeds, we are told the daily occupation of the two seeds, we are told of the acts of worship also, we are told of the sin of Cain and of his punishment: this is in contrast with the record of Seth. Of Seth's actions we know nothing. He had a son whom he called Enos, meaning "frail" or "incurable", he had other sons and daughters unnamed, and died at the age of 912 years. The man's individual actions therefore do not constitute the special lesson for us, it is his position in the line of purpose that does. A similar observation may be passed upon the life of Isaac. Of the three "fathers" of Israel, Isaac's life is the most passive and quiet' as the type of the promised Seed, his birth, and his offering on the mount are of more importance than his subsequent manner of life, and from another standpoint Isaac, like Seth, speaks of substitution, for Isaac (and in Isaac, all Israel) lived because of a ram that was offered "instead".

The words of Gen. iv. 25 indicate that Abel was, humanly speaking, the chosen vessel through whom the deliverer should come, for Eve tells us that Seth was appointed as "another seed instead of Abel". It is beyond the limits of Scripture, and therefore beyond the bounds of our investigation or speculation, to fathom the mystery that lies beyond these simple words. On the surface it appears that Cain spoiled the purpose of the Lord, and that He was compelled to appoint another to take Abel's destined place. Appearances however are deceptive. We believe the fact of Scripture that the Lord will accomplish all His pleasure, and leave the demonstration of this truth to the Lord Himself in His own good time. For us, the more important truth is that God definitely accepts and adopts the principal of substitution in the accomplishing of His purpose.

Adam himself was dealt with not merely as a private individual, but as head and representative of unborn millions who had no voluntary association with his deeds (e.g., Rom. v. 14-21); the penalty threatened in the garden of Eden was suspended and endured by Christ instead. This substitution was typified to Adam and Eve in the provision of the "coats of skin" (Gen. iii. 21). By reason of death provision is made in the law for "that son that is priest in his stead" (Exod. xxix. 30).

The principle of substitution is seen in the choice of Levites, "all the firstborn are mine", said the Lord, "for on the day that I smote all the firstborn in the land of Egypt, I hallowed unto Me all the firstborn in Israel, both man and beast: mine shall they be" (Numb. iii. 13). Although such was the case, yet the Lord immediately before had introduced the principle of substitution, saying, "And I, behold, I have taken the Levites from among the children of Israel instead of all the firstborn" (verse 12). The firstborn of animals also were the Lord's, yet provision is made in Exod. xiii. 13 that "every firstling of an ass thou shalt redeem with a lamb". The reader will call to mind the many passages in the New Testament where the Lord Jesus is said to suffer or die for us, and we would commend to the earnest student a thorough examination of this wondrous theme. We must turn back for a moment to Gen. v. to make one other observation concerning Seth. Gen. v. commences the book of the generations of Adam; there, Cain and Abel are not mentioned. After the statement of the creation of Adam in verse 2, the book of the generations of Adam goes straight on to the birth of Seth, and he it is who heads the list. The substitute is here seen in an undisputed position, Cain and Abel are never again mentioned in the O.T.

In the genealogy given in I Chronicles i. 1, the order of Gen. v. is retained, viz., "Adam, Seth, Enosh". In the genealogy of the Saviour by Luke the same is true (Luke iii. 38). Now just as Cain and Abel never come into the book of the generations of Adam, but that honour is unreservedly given to Seth, the substitute, so in the Person of Christ, the last Adam, the second man, the whole creation will recognize in Him, and not in Adam, the One to whom dominion belongs, the glorious head of a new creation, the "former things", like Cain and Abel, having passed away.

Enoch, the seventh from Adam.
His threefold Witness.
pp. 68-70

In the book of the generations of Adam are two significant entries. The first is that of Gen. v. 5:--

> "And all the days that Adam lived were nine hundred and thirty five years, AND HE DIED".

The second is that of verses 23, 24:--

> "And all the days of Enoch were three hundred and sixty five years, and Enoch walked with God: AND HE WAS NOT, FOR GOD TOOK HIM."

The entry of death, first made against the name of Adam, is repeated with constant succession throughout this book of the generations of Adam, with the one exception of Enoch. That Enoch did not die Heb. xi. 5 affirms:--

> "By faith Enoch was translated that he should not see death; and was not found, because God had translated him: for before his translation he had this testimony, that he pleased God".

The words of the sub-title, Enoch, the seventh from Adam, are supplied by the Epistle of Jude, from which we may gather the corrupting ungodliness of the days of Enoch, and learn that just as the "last days" shall be "as it was in the days of Noah", so also shall they be as the days of Enoch. The seventh from Adam is not allowed to see death. Here we may observe a prophetic foreshadowing of the end. Just as the seventh day of Gen. ii. foreshadows "the rest that remaineth to the people of God", so the seventh from Adam foreshadows the triumph over the death of those who shall not sleep, but be changed at the last trump; this last trump appears to be the sounding of the seventh trumpet of the book of the Revelation.

In a world of ungodliness, fifty-seven years after the death of Adam, Enoch was translated. The name Enoch means "teaching" or "initiation", and Enoch's two prophecies show that he had an inner knowledge that guided him in the world of wickedness in which he was placed.

His first prophecy is the naming of his son. When Enoch was sixty and five years old a son was born, and he named him Methuselah, which by interpretation is, "At his death it shall be". Of what does Enoch speak? He speaks of coming wrath, he warned of the flood that was to destroy all flesh. See how exact is his prophecy; Noah was 600 years old when the flood came (Gen. vii. 6). Lamech his father was 182 years old when Noah was born, and Methuselah was 187 years old when Lamech was born. What is the total number of years then from the birth of Methuselah to the flood:--

187	Age of Methuselah at birth of Lamech.
182	Age of Lamech at birth of Noah.
600	Age of Noah at time of the flood.

Gen. v. 27 tells us that "all the days of Methuselah were 969 years, and he died". At his death it shall be, prophesied Enoch, and at his death, to the exact year, the awful deluge came, so faithful is the word of God. Yet note, and note well, the age of Methuselah is proverbial, even among unbelievers; yet how few recognize in this a glorious exhibition of longsuffering; the man whose death was to be the signal for judgment lived longer than any man before or since, it was as though God waited until

He could wait no longer. How strange a work is judgment, how the Lord delights in mercy.

Enoch's second prophesy is recorded in Jude:--

> "Behold the Lord cometh with His holy myriads, to execute judgment against all, and to convict all that are ungodly among them of all their ungodly deeds which they have ungodly committed, and concerning all the hard things that ungodly sinners spoke against Him" (verses 14, 15).

Enoch's twofold prophecy resolves itself into type and antitype. The flood, a real and dreadful judgment, was itself a type of a future day of wrath. The ungodliness of the days of Noah which brought down the floods of wrath was in turn typical of the character of the time of the end. "The coming of the Lord" therefore is no new doctrine, it is as old as Adam, for Enoch lived together with Adam for the last 308 years of Adam's life; Adam must therefore have understood the significance of Methuselah's name, and must have heard Enoch's prophecy of the Lord's coming.

"And God took him". In the days which are drawing nearer it will again be true that "one shall be taken, and the other left". Enoch was taken in blessing, and did not see death (type of those who "are alive and remain at the coming of the Lord"). Enoch's twofold prophecy is confirmed by his consistent walk with God, and thus together sets forth a threefold witness that cannot be gainsaid. Let us believe the literal accuracy of His Word, the graciousness of His purposes, the certainty of His judgments, and the blessed assurances of one day being with the Lord.

Lamech: the Curse and the Comfort.
pp. 101-103

The person who before the flood stands out more prominently than any other descendant of Adam, is Noah. Enoch's twofold prophecy, considered in previous series, pointed to the flood, and to that of which the flood was a type, the coming of the Lord in judgment.

Enoch could not have avoided explaining to Methuselah the prophetic import of his name, and this would doubtless have been the topic of many an earnest conversation both between them, and with Lamech, Enoch's grandson. Lamech was sufficiently well instructed to know that he was not the one who should survive the coming judgment, and is divinely guided in the naming of his firstborn son.

Before we pass on to consider the Scriptures that deal with Noah and the flood, it will be to our profit to pause awhile and learn what we can from his less prominent yet none the less godly parent. From what the Scriptures say concerning the "days of Noah", we may picture to ourselves the environment of the days of Lamech; he lived to within five years of the flood, and, further, in his grandfather Enoch's days ungodliness marked the generation (Jude 15), which evidently grew worse as the days drew on. Lamech was 182 years of age when Noah was born. Sufficient time had passed for him to arrive at the conclusion that has been discovered by others since, viz., that "vanity of vanities all is vanity."

In naming his son Noah, Lamech emphasized his felt need of rest. Noah is derived from nuach which means "to be at rest", and occurs in Gen. viii. 4, "and the ark rested in the seventh moth". Again in Exod. xx. 11, "for in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, the sea, and all that is in them, and rested the seventh day". When we read in Gen. viii. 9, "the dove found no rest", the word is manoach, or in viii. 21, "the Lord smelled a sweet savour", the word "sweet" is nichoach, and literally the passage reads, "a savour of rest". Thus it will be seen that for God as well as man there is a place of rest, and that rest is Christ, of whom Noah and the ark are prophetic.

Lamech in naming his son said, "this same shall comfort us (nacham, or give us rest) concerning our work and toil of our hands, because of the ground which the Lord hath cursed". The word rendered "toil" is twice rendered "sorrow" in Gen. iii. where the curse is first pronounced, "I will greatly multiply thy sorrow", and "in sorrow shalt thou eat of it all the days of thy life" (verses 16, 17). The words "work and toil" may be a figure, meaning very grievous work; the work and the toil are clearly specified as being the work and toil of the hands, and in connection with the ground, that under the curse yielded but thorns and thistles of itself, and bread only by sweat of face. We read that Cain experienced a special pronouncement of this curse (Gen. iv. 12), and he is the first builder of a City that is named in Scripture.

We cannot help noticing the similarity of names that occur in the two lines of Adam's descendants. If there is an Enoch who walked with God, there is an Enoch born to Cain in the land of banishment. If there is a Jared in the line of Seth, there is an Ired in the line of Cain, which differs only in one letter. Methuselah has a son named Lamech in the line of Seth, so Methusael had a son of the same name in the line of Cain. Both Lamechs have seven, and seventy and seven written of them. If these things were not recorded in Scripture we might dismiss them as fanciful, but they are written for our learning. Do they not speak to us of the beginning of that parody of truth which Satan has so skillfully established and maintained by taking advantage of similar sounding names, and of the confusion of tongues which we associate with Babylon and Babylonianism? (See The Two Babylons, by Hislop).

Lamech, "the seventh from Adam, in the line of Cain, has three sons, one (Jabal) kept cattle, and so continued in the work of the ground, but Jubal was the father of all such as handle the harp and organ, and Tubal-cain an instructor of every artificer in brass and iron. It would appear that the veneer which has spread over the curse, and which is variously named culture, civilization, etc., to-day, was originated by the sons of Lamech in Cain's line; the Lamech who begat Noah, however, is in direct contrast, he does not appear to have attempted to evade the weary toil that must be experienced by those who, by sweat of face, eat the bread that is produced by the ground that is cursed. Lamech longed for rest, but he did not accept the vain travesties of Cain's descendants. There are many to-day who, surrounded by the comforts and inventions of man could scarcely believe that there is truth in the record of the curse on the ground. The products of the earth and sea are brought to their door, no thought passes through their mind as to the sorrow and the toil that someone, somewhere, must endure to provide them with the necessities of life. Lamech knew no such deadening influence; the toil of his hands was hard and wearying because of the ground that the Lord had cursed. A friend writing recently gave an unconscious echo of Lamech's words, saying, "When one, from the back of the land, sees the toil of man and beast, there come to the lips no more fitting words than, 'Even so, Come, Lord Jesus'. "

Harps and organs, however, melodious and charming, brass and iron, modeled and designed into the most wonderful of machines and inventions, though they may "prove" to the natural man the upward development of man's attainments, afford no rest for those in whose hearts the truth of God abides. Rest for them is found in the true Noah, whose witness and whose experiences testify of the resurrection, and a new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness.

The Nephilim (Gen. vi. 1-7). pp. 133-137

Our last paper led on to the days of Noah by way of the line of promise and blessing, namely, through Seth. Where details of any of these sons of Adam are given, they are seen to be men of God; Enoch walks with God, Lamech looks for comfort, not from the civilization spread by the sons of Cain, but from the type of Christ, Noah. The last verse of chapter v. gives the names of the three sons of Noah, but the generations of Noah and the building of the ark do not commence with the opening verses of chapter vi. The first eight verses are a continuance of the book of the generations of Adam, and takes us back to the period indicated in v. 4, "and the days of Adam after he had begotten Seth were eight hundred years; and he begat sons and daughters". Chapter vi. differs from chapter v. in one or two important respects. Chapter v. tells us of Adam "in the day that God created man. . . . and blessed them". Chapter vi. 1-8 does not speak of the line of blessing – it tells of the curse.

It is necessary to point out that the word "men" in vi. 1, 2 is in the singular, carrying the article, and indicates, not men, but the man Adam. We must be on our guard, however, of hurriedly forming a hasty conclusion from the presence or absence of the article; there is no article in v. 1 before the word Adam, yet inasmuch as this is the first of a series of ten generations of individuals, it must mean the man Adam; the same is true of the opening of verse of I Chronicles i. It is the individual man Adam that is meant in v. 3, for he alone could be the father of Seth, so also verses 4, 5; thus it will be seen that while the presence of the article would generally indicate the man Adam, the absence of it does not necessarily refer to mankind in general. Just as in these verses Adam without the article can mean none other than the first man Adam himself, so in vi. 3, "My spirit shall not always remain in Adam, for that he also is flesh", simply tells us that the man

Adam would die, for that he also is flesh, like the others; then the length of Adam's days is given as 120 years.

One other reference to this question of the article must be given. In verses 7, 8 the Lord said:--

> "I will destroy (wipe off or blot out) man whom I have created from the face of the earth; both man and beast and creeping thing, and the fowls of the air; for it repenteth Me that I have made them. But Noah found grace in the eyes of the Lord".

The Lord did not "destroy" Adam. Chapter v. 5 records his death in exactly the same terms as it does that of Seth. God did destroy man and beast with the flood, and these were "made" by Him, which is parallel to the word "create". The statement also is definitely contrasted with the case of Noah, and it must be remembered that Adam had been dead over 120 years before Noah was born, or over 720 years before the flood came. Again, in viii. 21 "man" in both cases is "Ha-Adam"—yet, though the article is there, this cannot mean Adam himself. We can now come back to the opening verses of chapter vi. and render it as follows:--

> "And it came to pass, when Adam began to multiply on the face of the ground, and daughters were born unto them, that the sons of God saw the daughters of Adam, that they were fair: and they took them wives of all which they chose. And the Lord said, My spirit shall not always remain in Adam (the article is not used here, even as it is omitted in the words 'in the earth' in verse 4) for that he also is flesh: yet his days shall be an hundred and twenty years".

Who are the sons of God? Adam himself is so called in Luke iii. 38, but none of his descendants as such are afterwards so called. "The sons of God" are in exact contrast with "the daughters of Adam". Adam here is literal, it carries with "the daughters", and the words "of God" are in contrast with "of Adam". If the sons of God were men, they were sons of Adam, and to contrast the sons of Adam with the daughters of Adam by calling them sons of God must lead to error. Scripture does not mislead.

Job i. 6; ii. 1; xxxviii. 7 speak of the sons of God, and in these passages whatever else the "sons of God" may mean, certainly they do not mean any of the sons of Adam. In Psa. xxix. 1 and lxxxix. 6 reference is made to the sons of the mighty, the changed word being Elim instead of Elohim; the second reference places these sons "in heaven". another legitimate parallel is that of Dan. iii. 25. As the language of Dan. iii. is Syriac and not Hebrew, we have the word bar instead of ben for "son", but the meaning is the same. Nebuchadnezzar's words recorded in Dan. iii. were not inspired, nevertheless, seeing that he explains what he meant when he used the expression, "son of God", his explanation must carry more weight than that of those who live in the present time. In verse 28 Nebuchadnezzar explains his meaning of a son of God by saying that God had sent "His angel".

We know that angels fell, for Jude 6 speaks of the angels which kept not their first estate, but left their own habitation. The word for habitation is oiketerion and occurs nowhere else except in II Cor. v. 2. Their sin is likened to that of Sodom and Gomorrah in its essential feature, viz., "going after strange (heteros) flesh". The time of their fall is not given in Jude, but Peter links the "angels that sinned" with the time of Noah (II Pet. ii. 4, 5), and refers to the spirits in prison, which were disobedient during the time that the ark was preparing.

When we remember that angels are always spoken of as men, and indeed were entertained as such for some hours by Abraham, the difficulty which we may have in connection with this subject may not appear so great. It may seem strange at first that verse 3 should come in between the two statements concerning the sons of God, but we are sure that it is there with a definite object. Of Adam the Lord said, "My spirit shall not always remain in Adam, for that he also is flesh". The spirit remaining in man keeps him alive; when that spirit is withdrawn man dies, he is but flesh. Adam differed nothing in this respect from his children, his days were numbered, and it is revealed to us that from this point "his days" were to be "an hundred and twenty years". "There were giants in the earth IN THOSE DAYS", so continues verse 4, and the only days that can be meant are those which refer to the last 120 years of Adam's life. Not only were they in the earth then, but "after that", after Adam had died, and after the flood had destroyed the giants that were in the earth during Adam's closing years. The word "giants" comes form the Greek gigantes, which did not originally mean only greatness of size, but is derived for gegenes, "earth born". The Hebrew word is Nephilim, or "the fallen ones"; these were the Gibbor, the "mighty", for so it is translated 139 times out of 159 occurrences. Nimrod was "a mighty one in the earth", and "the beginning of his kingdom was Babel". These mighty ones are also called "men of renown", or literally, "men of name"; this again is a prominent feature in the rebellion that originated Babel, for the builders said, "Let us make us a name".

That the Nephilim numbered among them literal giants, the Scriptures clearly testify. The spies sent by Moses into the land of promise spoke of the "men of great stature" that they saw, saying, "and there we saw the giants (Nephilim) the sons of Anak which come of the giants". All however were not of necessity gigantic in size, although they seem to have left that impression upon the mind of man: their unnatural origin, their superhuman prowess supplied the basis for the "heroes" of Greek legend, and the "giants" of most folk tales; the giant cities of Bashan still bear testimony to the existence of a race of literal giants, the iron bedstead of Og, king of Bashan (over 15 feet long) bears its witness also; hence although the A.V. gives "giants" as a translation of Nephilim, and is therefore open to the charge of giving a private interpretation rather than a translation, let us not hastily come to the conclusion that these Nephilim were not, nevertheless, literal giants, for Scripture most definitely tells us that many of them were. The intermarrying of one section of Adam's children with another does not supply a reasonable argument for "giants" as a result. If the sons of God were fallen angels, the abnormal consequences are what may be expected, and such a drastic and universal destruction as the flood becomes a necessity. Amid the awful corruption of the flesh on every hand Noah stand uncontaminated. "Noah was a just man and perfect (without blemish) in his generations (his contemporaries)"; through him only could the line of promise run. Satan had tried to prevent the coming of the Seed of the woman, but had again failed; he tried at the birth of Cain, for Cain "was of that wicked one". Finding that Seth was given in place of Abel, he corrupted the stream of life while Adam still lived by the irruption of the angels that fell. Again his attempt failed, and the purpose of God held steadily on its way. Satan himself in the form of a serpent sought by the temptation in the garden to thwart the Most High. Satan by his angels again attempted by most diabolical means to render the purpose impossible of attainment, but he failed.

So has it always been, and so must it be till the end, for concerning His purpose it is written, “As I have purposed, so shall it stand”.

The Flood and the Renewed Earth (Gen. vi. 9 - ix. 29). pp. 165-169

We must keep before us the main line of purpose that runs through Scripture, and not lose the conception of the whole in the consideration of the incidents.

The temptation and fall of man must be view as part of a plan, and the words of Christ in the parable of the tares explain much that occurs in Scripture history, an enemy hath done this. Sin opened the door for death, and death reigned from Adam. God, however, is not thwarted either by sin or by death. For the complete emancipation from their dual authority, and for the crushing of the serpent’s head, He promises the “seed of the woman”. From Gen. iii. onwards we are reading chapters in the conflict between the Seed and the serpent, and their respective “seeds”; hence the sad history of Cain and Abel—hence, too, the awful corruption that necessitated the flood. The purpose of God has sometimes hung upon a slender thread, and in the well-nigh universal corruption one man is sustained by grace to keep the Messianic channel pure. “Noah was a just man, and perfect in his generations”. Noah is called in II Pet. ii. 5, “the eighth”, and it is a point that is noted in I Pet. iii. 20 that “eight souls” were saved in the Ark. Enoch we have already seen was “the seventh from Adam”, and although Methuselah and Lamech were born before Noah, yet Noah is marked as the “eighth” by reason of the significance of the number; the eighth or octave is a new beginning, the first day of the week also an eighth day, resurrection and regeneration are thereby symbolized. The very names of Noah and his sons have a numerical value, which connects them with this number.

Shem	=	340
Ham	=	48
Japheth	=	490
		936	=	8 * 117.

Ham comes under his father’s curse, and becomes the father of Canaan; removing his name from the list, the total is 888. The witness of numbers is not, however, exhausted by this. Chapter vii. 6 tells us that “Noah was 600 years old when the flood of water was upon the earth". Six is the number of man. Six days complete the week of work and lead to the Sabbath. Noah enters the Ark in his 600th year and thereby signified that the end of flesh had come. When were the waters dried up from the earth? "In the 601st year, in the 1st month, the 1st day of the month" (viii. 13), this is the beginning of the seventh hundred, the Sabbath rest of which Noah himself and his experiences were prophetic.

By the symbolism of the first seven days we are led to expect that the ages will lead on to a Sabbath; we do know that the millennial kingdom will be for a thousand years, and if we look upon the thousand years as being represented by a day, the six days of earth's toil and man's sin will cover a period of six thousand years. The re-entry of Noah into the world after the flood in the very dawn of the seventh century suggests the same line of thought. The millennial kingdom is also called, "the Regeneration" (Matt. xix. 28), and of this the flood and the renewed earth are a type. The days of Noah were also prophetic of the coming of the Son of man (Matt. xxiv. 37). Everything points to the flood as an epoch, and a type of the day of the Lord. Let us therefore, as we look at a few of the details of this momentous judgment, continually look away from the type to the great reality that is surely coming upon the world, plunged in darkness, heading for perdition, yet deluded by the fallacy of "peace and safety".

We noticed in our last paper that although the corruption began in the days of Adam, yet the height of iniquity was not reached until the days of Noah. After giving the names of Noah's three sons, the record continues, "The earth also was corrupt before God, and the earth was filled with violence". "The end of all flesh had come". Like Ezekiel's reiterated "end" (Ezek. vii. 2, 3, 6) there was no more remedy, and no further extension. For the preservation of Noah and his family (also of bird and beast) the building of the Ark was commanded; an act of faith that must have drawn down ridicule and scoffing upon the patriarch's head. There are suggestive parallels between this first structure here commanded, and the tabernacle and temples of Solomon and Ezekiel that may be worth the while of some of our readers to carefully work out. In the Ark, actual men, animals and birds were preserved; in the Tabernacle and Temple, the cherubim shadowed forth the same hope.

The destruction by the flood was utter and complete, the high hills "under the whole heaven" were covered (vii. 19), "the mountains were covered" (20).

> "and all flesh died that moved upon the earth, both of fowl, and of cattle, and of beast, and of every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth, and every man. . . . and every living substance. . . . and Noah alone remained alive, and they that were with him IN THE ARK" (21-23).

The first act of Noah upon leaving the ark was to build an altar and offer unto the Lord burnt offerings, "and the Lord smelled a savour of rest". Noah the man of rest, in his sabbath century, with death and judgment passed away, looks out again upon the earth. "I will not again curse the ground any more for man's sake". Why? Because Noah and his family were now sinless? No,

> "Although the imagination of man's heart is evil from his youth; neither will I again smite any more every living thing, as I have done; while the earth remaineth, seed time > and harvest, and cold and heat, and summer and winter, and day and night shall not cease" (viii. 21, 22).

With Noah, "the eighth person", God makes a covenant, and his covenant is referred to eight times afterwards (ix. 9, 11, 12, 13, 15, 16, 17). This covenant, said God, is "between Me and you and every living soul of all flesh"; it was for "perpetual generations (generations of the Olam or age; and so was called an everlasting covenant, or, a covenant for the Olam or age). This age lasts as long as the earth remaineth, and under the terms of this primitive covenant mankind as a whole still receives the providential mercies of God, and is under the assurance that no more will He bring a flood of waters to destroy the earth. God blessed Noah and his sons, and said unto them, "Be fruitful and multiply, and replenish the earth"; this places Noah in the position of Adam, for at Adam's creation the self-same words were uttered. In Gen. i. 28 it is recorded that God said to Adam:--

> "Be fruitful and multiply, and replenish the earth and subdue it: and have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over every living thing that moveth upon the earth."

This is parallel with the words of ix. 2:--

> "And the fear of you and the dread of you shall be upon every beast of the earth, and upon every fowl of the air, and upon all that moveth upon the earth, and upon all the fishes of the sea, into your hand are they delivered."

Following the blessing upon Adam comes the provision of his food:--

> "Behold I have given you every herb bearing seed, which is upon the face of all the earth, and every tree in the which is the fruit of a tree yielding seed; to you it shall be for meat" (Gen. i. 29).

In the same way similar words follow the blessing upon Noah:--

> "Every moving thing that liveth shall be meat for you; even as the green herb have I given you all things" (Gen. ix. 3).

Here we observe a most important change, for the first time in Scripture do we read of flesh being given as a part of man's dietary. To those who have any knowledge of the ways and means of spiritism, the change will be most suggestive, for anyone to attain to a high position in spiritism vegetarian diet is essential, as also is abstinence from marriage. To preserve the race from the universal effects of another irruption of spirit beings this change is made; here there is a further foreshadowing of the end:--

> "Now the spirit speaketh expressly, that in the latter times some shall apostatize from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits and doctrines of demons. . . . forbidding to marry, and commanding to abstain from meats" (I Tim. iv. 1-3).

Again, as in Gen. i., reference is made to the fact that man was created in the image of God, and upon this fact is based the law of capital punishment (Gen. ix. 6).

These parallels with Adam's original blessing and position indicate that Noah was in type a second Adam, and foreshadowed the Lord Himself. The bow in the cloud, given as the token of the covenant made between God and all flesh, is seen together with the Cherubim in Ezek. i. 28, and in Rev. iv. 3, and it shines around the head of the mighty angel who sware by Him that liveth for ever and ever, who created heaven and the things that therein are, and the earth and the things that therein are, and the sea and the things which are therein, that there should be a time no longer, but that the mystery of God should be finished (Rev. x. 1-7).

There are mysteries deep and wide that surround the record of the flood and the Ark; into these we cannot here attempt to penetrate; we rejoice, however, to trace the rainbow of God's covenant through to the day when the mystery of God shall be finished, and a real renewed earth shall be placed under the righteous way of a greater than Adam, and a greater than Noah.

The Epistle to the Hebrews.

#1. The Theme of the Epistle.

pp. 84 – 87

What is the theme of the epistle to the Hebrews? A full answer would of course be difficult to express in a sentence, but if we put our question as follows, the answer is simpler: Does the epistle to the Hebrews deal with the salvation of the sinner, or with the perfecting of the saint? From the careful study of the epistle we have for a long time reached the conclusion that the salvation of the sinner is nowhere in view, but that the apostle addresses "holy brethren, partakers of the heavenly calling", and is concerned throughout with the "perfecting" of the believer. Some may interpose with a reference to Heb. ii. 3, the "so great salvation". This has not been forgotten, for we hope to prove later that it was addressed to believers and not to unbelievers.

The great typical example whereby the apostle enforces his argument is borrowed not from the history of Israel's redemption from Egypt, but Israel's failure to reach the land of promise (iii., iv.). So it is with the references to Abraham: we are not referred to Gen. xv. (the passage which supplies the epistle to the Romans with its argument for justification by faith without works), but we are referred to Gen. xxii. (Heb. vi.) where, as James teaches, Abraham who was already justified by faith without works was "justified by works", and "by works was faith perfected". So in Heb. xi. we read of Abraham dwelling in tents, a sojourner, a pilgrim, and a stranger, looking for a city which hath foundations.

We do not lose sight of the fact that the epistle is addressed to Hebrews, and that the peculiar teaching of the Mystery and the One Body does not form part of its doctrine. We do not wish any reader to imagine that we teach that this epistle in its primary interpretation belongs to the church of the dispensation of the Mystery, but we do want to impress the great value of this epistle as an exposition of the principle that underlies the passage in Phil. iii. which we have been, and are still, considering under the heading, The Hope and the Prize. Because there is a unity of principle in these things, the apostle makes no lengthy digression in Phil. iii. to explain what is involved in being "not already perfected", and having "not already obtained", for the subject has been exhaustively dealt with in the epistle to the Hebrews.

Certain books of the Bible seem to have been written to be the great expositions and authority on certain doctrines. The epistle to the Romans will always be the classic on the foundation doctrine of Justification by Faith, and we believe it will be seen that the epistle to the Hebrews is the great classic on the question of "those things which accompany salvation", "the better things", "the perfecting of the faith".

In The Christian for 27th April and 4th May, 1916, there appeared two articles by J. W. Thirtle, LL.D., wherein the writer sought to show that the epistle to the Hebrews "in very early times followed that to the Galatians". Quoting from this interesting article:--

> "What, in reality, do we find? Just this—two epistles or writings, in close succession, in a professedly Pauline section of the New Testament, are merely separated or divided off, the one from the other, by the words pros Hebraious—'to Hebrews'."

The writer proceeds to give evidence to prove that the epistle to the Galatians is the "covering letter", and the epistle to the Hebrews is an "enclosure" written especially for the Hebrews in the churches of Galatia. The reader is referred to these articles for the details and evidence brought forward. Parallels between the two epistles are suggested; the quotation of Hab. ii. 4 in Gal. iii. 11, and Heb. x. 38; the covenant teaching of Gal. iii. 15-17, iv. 24; Heb. viii. 6-11, ix. 15-20, x. 16. Both epistles deal with mediatorship (Gal. iii. 19, 20; Heb. viii. 6, ix. 15, xii. 24). Galatians iv. 26 speaks of the Jerusalem that is above, Heb. xii. 22 of the heavenly Jerusalem.

Leaving much that is of interest and help unquoted, we ask the reader's attention to another parallel which immediately comes to our mind. In Gal. iii. 3 the apostle asks:--

> "Are ye so foolish? Having begun in the spirit, are ye now PERFECTED in the flesh? Have ye suffered so many things in vain? If it be indeed in vain."

This is practically the question dealt with in Hebrews. The Galatians were in danger of being led back into bondage; to avoid persecution the Judaisers constrained them to be circumcised, and to such the apostle's words are very severe; however, there were some whose attitude toward the flesh enabled them to be designated as the "Israel of God", the name given to Jacob when the hollow of his thigh was withered, and who after that mighty change limped, in evidence that his spiritual gain meant "no confidence in the flesh".

The great theme of the epistle is summarized in one passage:--

> "Therefore, leaving the word of the beginning of Christ, let us go on unto PERFECTION" (Heb. vi. 1).

With this passage may be considered the apostle's words in Phil. iii. 13, 14:--

> "Forgetting those things which are behind, and reaching forth unto those things which are before, I press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus."

While it will be of great value to study the epistle to the Hebrews for its own sake, we very much desire the interested reader to keep in mind the fact that Phil. iii. will be the richer and the fuller to him if in this study he will remember that Hebrews deals fully and in detail with that principle which is unexplained in Phil. iii., and to which allusion is somewhat brief. There are many who stumble in their endeavours to interpret the book of the Revelation partly because they have not grasped the teaching of such books as Daniel, Zechariah, Isaiah and Jeremiah. So with Phil. iii., we shall understand it the better when we read it in the light of the Scripture Commentary of the epistle to the Hebrews.

#2. A Key to the Epistle. "Perfection."
pp. 120 - 122

Before dealing with the epistle to the Hebrews in the order of its writing, we draw attention to a key word, Perfection.

1. THE LAW MADE NOTHING PERFECT (vii. 19). With the law is contrasted "a better hope". This did make perfect. The law includes the Levitical priesthood, and vii. 11 says:--

> "If therefore perfection were by the Levitical priesthood (for under it the people received the law), what further need was there that another priest should rise after the order of Melchisedec?"

If neither the law itself nor the priests ordained under it could bring perfection, it is not surprising to read in connection with the tabernacle, that it "could not make him that did the service perfect as pertaining to the conscience" (ix. 9). In the tabernacle "were offered both gifts and sacrifices", and chapter ix. 1 says:--

> "For the law, having a shadow of good things to come, and not the very image of the things, can never with those sacrifices which they offered year by year, make the comers thereunto perfect for ever."

2. UNDER THE NEW COVENANT PERFECTION IS POSSIBLE. While it is demonstrably impossible to be "perfected" under the law, the apostle shows that the New Covenant includes provision for this wonderful blessing, and it is so established on a better sacrifice and has in view such a better hope, that under it the believer may be urged to "go on unto perfection". One of the characteristics of the "perfect" is given in v. 14:--

> "Strong meat belongeth to them that are of full age (margin, perfect) even those who by reason of use have their senses exercised to discern both good and evil."

The strong meat is contrasted with milk, which are figures, the one for the advanced teaching connected with the aionian salvation of v. 9 (called the word of righteousness), the other for the elements or "the beginning of the oracles (logion) of God" (v. 12). It is to this distinction that the apostle refers when he says, "Therefore leaving the word (logos) of the beginning of Christ, let us go on unto perfection" (vi. 1).

There is one passage which will demand very serious attention when we reach so far, and that is chapter xii. 23, the particular clause being, "and to spirits of perfected righteous ones". We give it its place here in order that the various phases of the theme may be represented, but must defer any explanation until the context is under review. One other passage which demands more attention than we can give in this article is xi. 40, "God having foreseen concerning us a better thing, in order that not apart from us they might be perfected". The link between this "better thing", the "spirits of perfected righteous ones", and Paul's "far better", and "not as though I were already perfected" is possibly already visible to some of our readers.

3. THE PERFECTER.—Christ, as the great High Priest, has entered into the true tabernacle, heaven itself, not with the blood of others, but with His own blood; this sacrifice, the "very image" of which the Levitical sacrifices were but shadows, does bring perfection to those who are sanctified. "For by one offering He hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified" (x. 14). It will be remembered that James speaks of faith being perfected. Hebrews speaks of it too. In chapter xii. 1, 2 we read:--

> "Wherefore, seeing we also are compassed about with so great a cloud of witnesses, let us lay aside every weight and the sin which doth so easily beset us, and let us run with patience the race set before us, looking unto Jesus, the author and perfecter of faith; Who for the joy that was set before Him endured a cross, despising the shame, and is set down at the right hand of the throne of God."

4. THE PERFECTING OF CHRIST.—Under this heading we approach the profoundest aspect of this subject. To dare to contemplate perfection as possible for such as we are by nature would be presumption indeed were it not for the Word of God that directs us to that one offering as its basis. But this seems less difficult to comprehend than the words of our heading, "the perfecting of Christ". Was He not the perfect One from Bethlehem's manger to Calvary's cross? Can we speak of the possibility of His perfecting without casting some doubt upon His original holiness? Our apprehensions, though they be the outcome of loyalty to His name, are unfounded, because the perfecting of Christ is Scriptural teaching. Possibly the meaning we attach to the idea of perfecting may need some re-adjustment in the light of Scripture.

The first passage that speaks of the perfecting of Christ is ii. 10. There we read, "It became Him. . . . to make the Captain of their salvation perfect through sufferings", the portion of the verse omitted is necessary to the interpretation of the passage, as also is the meaning and associations of the word rendered Captain; these will be considered in their place in the exposition, at present we are but noticing the fact of the doctrine. An even more impressive and forceful statement occurs in v. 8, 9:--

> "Thought being a Son, He learned by the things He suffered, obedience; and having been perfected, He became, to all them that obey Him, author of a salvation aionian."

This statement is immediately followed by reference to the Lord's Melchisedec priesthood. In vii. 28 this priesthood is again linked with the Lord as the perfect One:--

> "For the law appoints men high-priests which have infirmity; but the word of the oath, which was since the law, appoints the Son Who unto the age hath been perfected."

This subject is the theme of the epistle, and we have brought the several references together in this paper in order that its important bearing may be realized. The exposition of each passage, however, must be deferred until we are able to consider the contexts.

#3. The Better Things.
pp. 151 - 155

Before proceeding to the detailed study of the epistle to the Hebrews, there is one other word which will repay our careful attention; it is closely allied to the key word perfect which we studied together in our last paper.

The first reference (i. 4) has to do with Christ Himself. After having spoken of the glorious titles which make verse 3 so full, verse 4 continues, "having become by so much better than angels, inasmuch as He hath inherited a more excellent name than they". Concerning angels He says:--

> "Who maketh His angels spirits and His ministers a flame of fire; but as to the Son, Thy throne, O God, is for the age of the age, a sceptre of righteousness is the sceptre of Thy kingdom; Thou hast loved righteousness and hast hated lawlessness, therefore God, Thy God, hath anointed Thee with the oil of gladness above Thy fellows."

The being better than the angels is connected with inheriting a more excellent name; the anointing above His fellows is because of His love for righteousness and hatred of lawlessness. Whatever His glory may have been with the Father before the foundation of the world, this "better" thing appear to be related to His life of overcoming righteousness during the days of His flesh. For a little He was made lower than the angels, but He ascended "far above" them all.

The next reference (vi. 9) speaks not of the Lord, but of His people, "but beloved, we are persuaded the better things of you, even things that accompany (literally 'that have') salvation, though we thus speak". The apostle had evidently been speaking of things that were not "the better things", and if we notice what they are, the contrast will serve to illuminate the meaning of the better things which he was persuaded they had. He had spoken of the case of those who were once enlightened, who had tasted of the heavenly gift, who were made partakers of the Holy Ghost, who had tasted the good word of God, and the powers of the age to come, that if such should fall away, it was impossible to renew again unto repentance. Unless some previously formed conception demanded it, these words would be taken to represent the privileges of the saved; we have read some interpretations that favoured the meaning, for instance, of the word enlightened, as representing merely an external illumination which did not indicate life. A reference to the parallel argument of x. 32 disposes of such an idea. We hope to deal with this clause later, and so proceed. The apostle passes to a figure:--

> "The earth which drinketh in the rain, and bringeth forth herbs meet for them by whom it is dressed, receiveth the blessing of God, but that which beareth thorns and briars is disapproved, and nigh unto a curse, the end of which is for burning"

Notice that the earth that brings forth the thorns is not cursed, but near to it; it is rejected, disapproved, "castaway", as Paul says of himself in view of the crown (I Cor. ix. 24-27). The better things are not salvation, but those things which accompany (have or hold) salvation, and are further explained in verses 10-12.

The next few references occur in the section wherein the apostle seeks to wean the Hebrews from the law and all pertaining to it, in order that they may press on to that perfection concerning which the law knows nothing, and the flesh can do nothing. They are the superiority of Melchisedec over Abraham, and in him Levi, and the terrestrial priesthood. "And without all contradiction the less is blessed of the better" (verse 7). Verse 19 contrasts the law, which made nothing perfect, with the better hope, which is connected with the better priesthood of the order of Melchisedec, and the better covenant (22).

In the summing up that comes in chapter viii. Christ is seen as the high priest who is set on the right hand of the throne of the majesty in the heavens. He ministers in the true tabernacle, and > "Now He hath obtained a more excellent ministry, even by so much as He is the mediator of a better Covenant which hath been legally instituted upon better promises" (6).

This heavenly priesthood must have a sacrifice equal to its high station, and therefore ix. 23 says:--

> "It was therefore necessary that the patterns of things in the heavens should be purified with these (sacrifices of the law); but the heavenly things themselves with better sacrifices than these."

This section which deals with priesthood, covenant, and offering, finishes in chapter x., after which the apostle returns to the theme of chapter vi., and says:--

> "Call to remembrance the former days, in which, after ye were illuminated, ye endured a great fight of afflictions; and partly, whilst ye became companions of them that were so used, for ye had compassion of me in my bonds, and took joyfully the spoiling of your goods, knowing that ye have in heaven a better and an enduring substance" (x. 32-34).

The parallels with chapter vi. will be noted more fully when we are giving the exposition of the passage, but sufficient has been seen to indicate that the same line of thought is linked with the "better things" of this chapter.

Chapter xi. introduces us to a series of examples of O.T. worthies who did go on to perfection, who. After they were illuminated, did suffer reproaches, did take joyfully the spoiling of their goods, and did not "fall away", "draw back", or become "disapproved and nigh unto a curse". These also as a matter of course had "the better things" in view. Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob are instanced as examples of such. Of Abraham it is said:--

> "He looked for a city which hath foundations, whose maker and builder is God. . . . they confessed that they were strangers and pilgrims on the earth. . . . they desire a better country, that is a heavenly. . . . He hath prepared for them a city" (xi. 8-16).

The tent endured now for the city hereafter, the better thing desired at the cost of all the earth might offer, such is their testimony. In verse 35 is recorded a different case, and one that brings these passages into close parallel, at least in spirit, with Phil. iii.:--

> "Women received their dead raised to life again: and others were tortured, not accepting deliverance; that they might obtain a better resurrection."

This better resurrection echoes the two expressions of Paul's desire in Philippians, where in chapter i. he says that "to depart and be with Christ" is better than living or dying, and in chapter iii. he speaks of such departure as "the out-resurrection out from among the dead", which was the prize of the perfected. With this thought chapter xi. of Hebrews closes:--

> "These all having obtained a good report through faith, received not the promise: God having provided a better thing for us, that they without us might not be perfected" (39, 40).

There is but one more reference, and that is in chapter xii. It occurs in the section of the epistle which deals with the first-born and the birthright. Esau is mentioned as a type of those already spoken of in chapter vi. and x., and the apostle tells them that they have not come to Mount Sinai (the law and its imperfect priesthood and offerings), but to Mount Zion, to the city that Abraham looked for, the better country, inhabited by the Church of the firs-born, which are written in heaven; to God the judge of all, and to the spirits of perfected righteous ones (again note Phil. iii. where Paul, although standing in the righteousness of God by faith, could also say, "not as though I am already perfected"; here in Heb. xii. we have both together, the spirits of perfected righteous ones); and to Jesus the mediator of the new covenant, which has already been pronounced a better covenant, resting upon better sacrifices, and to the blood of sprinkling, that speaketh better things than Abel's.

The following grouping of the thirteen occurrences of the word "better" may be of service.

Better.

A | 1. 4. Christ at the right hand (verse 3).
Better than angels; more excellent name.
B | vi. 9. The things that accompany salvation.
C | vii. 7, 19, 22. The better priesthood, hope and covenant.
A | viii. 6. Christ at the right hand (verse 1).
Better covenant; better promises; more excellent ministry.
C | ix. 23. The better sacrifice for heavenly things.
B | x. 34; xi. 16, 35, 40. Things that accompany salvation.
C | xii. 24. The blood of sprinkling speaking better things than Abel's.

There are many questions that awaits an answer, many of which we hope to deal with in this series. Meanwhile, whereunto we have already attained, let us walk by the same rule, and press on.

#4. The Son (Heb. i. 1, 2).
pp. 183 - 187

The theme of the opening section of Hebrews lies upon the surface; we do not pause long over the wondrous fact that God has indeed spoken to men, neither are we given a lengthy disquisition upon the sundry times and the divers manners in which He spake in times past unto the fathers by the prophets; the fact of importance, around which the epistle is written, is that God hath in these last days spoken unto us by His SON. This is seen to be the case by the way in which the inspired apostle elaborated this theme; the remaining verses of the first chapter are devoted to describing the excellent glory of this Son, in whom God spake.

Chapter ii. resumes the original theme, contrasting, this time, the word spoken by angels with the word spoken by the Lord. This will be made quite clear by throwing the two chapters into structural form.

Hebrews i., ii.

A | i. 1, 2. God once spoke by prophets. Now by His Son.
B | i. 2-14. The Son. His glories. God and Lord, better than angels.
A | ii. 1-4. God once spoke by angels. Now by the Lord.
B | ii. 5-18. The Son. His sufferings. Man and Abraham's seed, lower than angels.

Before proceeding to open up the teaching of the passage with regard to the infinite superiority of the Son, and the contrast drawn between Him and prophets and angels, the reader may desire an explanation regarding the opening words of the chapter. We therefore give a few notes on these before passing to the theme of the passage.

Polumerõs, "In many parts".—The opening word of the epistle refutes the long standing obstinate refusal of the gospel by the Jew on the grounds of the unchanging character of the law of Moses. The apostle is about to sweep aside the covenant of Sinai and speak of is as faulty (viii. 7), a better covenant being instituted in its place; the law, so prized by the Hebrews, he shows made nothing perfect (vii. 19), the sacred ordination of Israel's priests is after all "the law of a carnal commandment" (vii. 1), the tabernacle was but a "figure", and the sacrifices but "shadows", the true holiest of all was not contained in it, neither did the blood of bulls and goats take away sin (ix., x.). God had made known His mind and will, and had revealed His purposes in Christ in a series of "parts", no one prophet had received all the truth, little by little the prophets unfolded the great revelation, until the day came for the final and complete revelation to be made by the Son.

Polutropõs, "In many ways".—Not only did God speak in many parts, but His method of revelation was equally varied. Prophets received the word by vision, or by dream, by angel, by voice, by inspiration; truth was revealed also in variety of ways, types, ceremonies, prophecies, laws, commandments, parables; all contributed their share, and all formed part of the "many ways". However varied these "parts" and "ways" may have been God throughout was the speaker.

Palai, "In time past".—This is contrasted with the last days of verse 2, which indicated the conclusion of the process of revelation. It will be noticed that these words begin with "P". The word for father is pater, for prophet, prophetes; the alliteration in this verse seems intentional, and can be appreciated by the English reader if the words are rendered, parts, process, past, patriarchs and prophets. To the father, by the prophets, the Word of God came; what greater thing has occurred since? "The last days" have come, days wherein Messianic prophecy must be fulfilled. The R.V. reads, "at the end of these days" and this reading seems well supported; whichever reading we adopt, the important truth of the closing of the law and prophets and the opening of the day of the gospel is very evident.

In contrast with the "fathers" the apostle places "us", and in contrast with the "prophets" he puts "the Son". The superiority of the Son is so evident in this chapter, and the added responsibility resting upon those who heard Him is so clearly set forth in the opening words of the next, that one is a little surprised to find in the phrase, "by His Son", that the article is not used. This is all the more noticeable by reason of the fact that the corresponding phrase, "by the prophets", contain the article, "In or by THE PROPHETS" is answered by "in or by Son"; to translate "in a Son" seems out of harmony with the remainder of the verse, where the excelling glory of the Son is set forth, and yet to ignore the omission and to say that the presence or absence of the article is a matter of indifference is to deny verbal inspiration. Had the words, "in the prophets", been balanced by the words, "in the Son", nothing extraordinary would have been felt, and the mind would have received no impression of the essential difference that Scripture makes between that One who IS the Word, and those to whom the Word came. Readers may be acquainted with the argument derived from the omitted article in John i. 1 and 14, "the Word was God". Some have been tempted to translate this, "the Word was a God", but verse 14 exposes the foolishness of such an idea while it supplies the reason for the omission, "the Word was made flesh". No one would render this, "the Word was made a flesh", for the absurdity would be apparent, so in Heb. i. 2, God did not merely speak through the Son as He spoke through the prophets, God became man, the Son declared the Father, the Spirit was not given in measure unto Him, in Him dwelt all the fulness of the Godhead bodily. He that had seen the Son had seen the Father. The prophets, of whom Moses was the recognized leader, were servants, but Christ was a Son (Heb. iii. 5, 6).

God is invisible, Christ is the image of the invisible God, no one hath seen God at any time; in O.T. days the Word revealed Him to man, and in the last of the days, the Word—made-flesh revealed Him. Theology often mystifies, and by such unscriptural expressions as, "the eternal generation of the Son", has made the Word of God of none effect. We sometimes read or hear, "The O.T. reveals the Father, the Gospels the Son, and the Epistles the Spirit"; this is untrue. Shut up to the Old Testament what should we know of God as Father? The allusions to God as a Father may be counted upon the fingers; this is true also of the Son. Sonship and Fatherhood commence together; a man is not a father until his child is born. This in no-wise touches either the Deity or the pre-existence of Christ, for as The Word He was in the beginning, and was God. When the Word became flesh, then His glory, as the only begotten of the Father, could be seen. Christ was not man when "in the form of God", but when He took upon Him "the form of a servant" He was "made in the likeness of men" (Phil. ii. 6, 7). There is need for more care than has been used among us with regard to the titles of God; how many have used the argument to belittle Christ that the Father is greater than the Son; this has power only upon the mind if the word Father and God are considered synonymous. What we need to realize more is that the invisible God has manifested Himself to us in the Person of the Father as well as in the Person of the Son, and that while, for the purposes of His grace, one manifestation may be spoken of as greater than another, this in no-wise touches the question of essential Deity. When Scripture itself urges us to consider the fact that the Word when made flesh came down, laid aside His glory, humbled Himself, was made subject even to earthly parents, we are led to expect that the Father would be greater than He. The Son continually speaks of Himself as "the sent One" (see John's Gospel), and that the words He spake, the works He wrought, and the doctrine He taught were not His but the Fathers' who had sent Him: this, and so much more, is brought to notice by the omission of the article in Heb. i. 2. If we could but appreciate the un-English expression, "God spake in flesh", or "was manifest in flesh", or "in English" or "in Greek". The Hebrew beth, translated mostly "in", must be studied before the full meaning of "in Son" can be realized. Take for example Exod. vi. 3, "I appeared unto Abraham, unto Isaac, and unto Jacob B'EL SHADDAI", literally "in God Almighty"; again, in Exod. xviii. 4, the words, "the God of my father was mine help", are literally, "was in my help". Psa. xxxix. 6 gives an example where the translators have sought to retain the "in" by changing the words that follow, "in a vain shew", is literally, "in image". Another confessed instance of this beth essential is found in A.V. of Prov. iii. 26, "for the Lord shall be thy confidence", literally, "in thy confidence".

In the Person of the Son God has not merely added another name to the long list of prophets, He has provided a Theophany, He has spoken "in Son", and "in flesh".

When we consider the glorious titles that are given the Son in the very next verses we shall have the Scripture's own comment upon the meaning of the passage before us.

May the grace of God herein manifested to us be thankfully acknowledged, and may the fact that He has sent His Son be to us the "greatest thing in the world".

Lesson for Little Ones.

#1. An attempt to meet a growing need.
pp. 174 – 176

The days in which we live are dark. Scripture leads us to see that so far as spiritual things are concerned the darkness will deepen. The leaven is working its way with deadly effect, and soon the meetings and meeting-places where once we may have gathered around the Word may be closed to us. The Scriptures which lead us out will at that time lead us unto Him whose place is always "without the camp". In our isolation we shall glory in the Lord Himself, knowing that HE is our meeting-place with the Father, and that fellowship with HIM must ever be the very soul and centre of all meetings. We have His Word, and as He grants us the spirit of wisdom and revelation in the knowledge of Him, our needs in these things will still be met, though alone and at times opposed.

To not a few, however, comes a distressing though: "What of our children?" If the Sunday school no longer teaches truth, and if the Sunday school be a nursery for a yet more unscriptural church, we cannot allow our children to grow amid such teaching and surroundings. Many a dear child of God prays for his children that they may not only be saved, but that they may love and believe the truth, yet feels quite incapable of teaching them properly.

The Berean Expositor is too limited in size, and has too definite a ministry to attempt to take the parents' place, but from the letters of our readers we know that the smallest help would be greatly appreciated. We have thought it well, therefore, to make public that which at first was intended solely as a guide in the home training of the writer's own little one. The notes will not be developed into lessons, but left as they were drafted, and therefore the parents will have to exercise prayerful thought in the unfolding of the Word to their children. Some will have to go very slowly, some will find that the suggestions are not full enough, but we trust that the initial problem (which though in the first place is a spiritual one, is also psychological and a question of methods in teaching), will be at least partly solved, and that these notes may prove to many a parent a word in season, and that many a child may be made wise unto salvation through faith that is in Christ Jesus.

In our attempt to teach the truth to our little ones, due regard must be paid to the limitations of their knowledge, and care must be exercised to see that false notions are not allowed to remain. Everything must be brought to the touchstone of the Word. We may open our bibles and take as our first lesson the truth that the Scriptures are the Word of God. But Who, or what is God to your child? The little one has, we trust, a knowledge that that unseen One to Whom you pray, to Whom you give thanks, is God, but its ideas are very vague, and it needs careful and sympathetic handling, lest it be given faulty foundations.

The first of all lessons must be the forming of a scriptural conception of God. As we are led to the discovery of this initial need, the sublimity and fulness of the Scriptures press themselves upon us. The first verse of the Bible comes down to the need and to the understanding of the child mind, "In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth". That this subject is the right one to commence with is further confirmed by Heb. xi. 6, "for he that cometh to God must believe that He IS".

Scripture does not burden the mind with any references to before the beginning, and the child will not question the existence of God from any philosophical difficulties. The evidences of creation are convincing. God created. Rom. i. 19, 20 shows that "the invisible things" of God are clearly shown by the works of creation. He who made all things is God. The heavens declare His glory, the firmament sheweth His handiwork (Psa. xix.). By following the line of teaching suggested by this Psalm it will be seen that the "works" of God are spoken of before His "words".

In our next issue we hope to set out the barest outline, intended to give but a start, which will need modification, amplification, simplification, grace, and sympathetic understanding to be of much service.

#1. An attempt to meet a growing need. (Conclusions)
qq. 189, 190

So far as our own child is concerned, we shall direct her to notice the heavens and the earth, the grass of the field, the birds and beast of the field, always avoiding calling them "works of nature", or speaking of the "laws of nature", and continually acknowledging them to be works of God.

God made All things.--Exod. xx. 11.

Portion for reading together, and for detailed questioning:--Gen. i. 1 - ii. 3. Let the creation of each of the six days be the subject of question and answer. If the child can appreciate, let the parent read to it Job xxxvii. - xli. in sections. If possible, use not only the A.V., but the beautiful metrical version given in The Companion Bible. Psa. xix. is the passage to be memorized.

Many precious little lessons will present themselves as the study progresses, like the example given--Matt. vi. 26-30. Let the child realize that the teacher depends upon God for teaching, and let each lesson be prayed over together.

Studies in the Epistles of the Mystery.

We have passed under review two of the three petitions of this prayer, and we now are to consider the third, that which concerns power. Creation testifies to the power of God. Jer. x. 12 says, "He hath made the earth by His power", and Rom. i. 20 tells us that the creation teaches "that which may be known of God, ... even His eternal power and Godhead". Redemption also speaks of His power (Exod. xxxii. 11; Deut. iv. 37; ix. 29; I Cor. i. 24). Power enters largely into the ascriptions of praise in the Revelations (iv. 11; v. 12; vii. 12; xix. 1). Ephesians, however, brings before us a power which is "exceeding great". We are not only to learn of its greatness, but of its exceeding greatness. The word "exceeding" always indicates something well-nigh beyond our understanding. The "exceeding" glory of the new covenant was so great that the glory of the old was nullified by comparison (II Cor. iii. 10). Eph. iii. 19 speaks of the knowledge-exceeding love of Christ. The power contemplated in Eph. i. 19, 20 is that of resurrection. "The strength of death" is for the time held by the devil (Heb. ii. 14), but a stronger than he has triumphed: the gates of Hades did not prevail against Him.

The special point of the petition, however, is that we may know "the exceeding greatness of His power towards us". Not only have we the hope of His calling to encourage us, and the riches of the glory of His inheritance to ravish our hearts, but we also have the exceeding greatness of His power as our ever constant possession, it is "to usward who believe", and it is "according to the energy of the strength of His might which He energized in Christ in raising Him out from the dead ones, and having seated Him at His own right hand in the super-heavenlies". The practical section of Ephesians shows the use of this power, this strength, this might, for speaking of the believer's spiritual conflict chapter vi. says, "Finally, be empowering yourselves in the Lord, and in the strength of His might". The apostle who wrote these words knew from personal experience the reality of this resurrection power that was "to us-ward who believe"; his own weak body he likens to an earthen vessel, that the excellency of the power may be manifestly of God (II Cor. iv. 7). The power wielded by the apostle in the discharge of his onerous duties was this same mighty power. Christ was crucified in weakness, yet He lives by the power of God, and Paul says, "We indeed are weak in Him, but we shall live with Him by God's power" (II Cor. xiii. 4). When the apostle knew this weakness (the weakness of Christ crucified), then he knew also the power of Christ risen. It is in this connection that he could say, "When I am weak, then am I strong", and knew that "power is perfect in weakness", and desired even at the cost of weakness that "the power of Christ might tabernacle upon him" (II Cor. xii. 9). He could even say that he had been crucified with Christ, and the life that he lived in the flesh he lived by faith of the Son of God (Gal. ii. 20). For members of the body of the risen Christ, resurrection power alone was possible and needful, for those who were blessed with all spiritual blessings in the super-heavenlies in Christ, the exceeding greatness of resurrection power was essential. With this and by this their life had begun, for were they not DEAD in trespasses and in sins? And had they not been RAISED and SEATED together with Him in the heavenlies? The same mighty power that raised up Christ their Head, and placed Him far above all, had called them into life and had raised them together with Him.

We have purposely omitted one term from our reference to Eph. ii. 5, 6 in order the better to give it prominence. We have so often heard the citation of the blessed facts that we who were dead, have been raised and seated, with the equally important fact that we have been QUICKENED omitted, that we cannot but feel that the truth that believers have been "made alive together with Christ" is not grasped with the fulness of conviction and faith that it should be. True, our life is hid with Christ in God, nevertheless we have been made alive; to such, and to such only, can resurrection power be of service. Before the dead are raised, they must be quickened. For those who had been made alive the apostle prayed; he desired that they might know the exceeding greatness of the power that was toward them. That selfsame mighty power that was wrought in Christ, when He was raised from the dead, is the power for the believer's whole course of life and witness. The scope of that power is seen in its extremes, it descends into death, it ascends into the highest heavens "far above all". Can we who have believed the word of truth, the gospel of our salvation, can we say that this mighty power is our constant experience? Do we, like the apostle, "seek to know Him and the power of His resurrection"? It is a knowledge that cannot be attained upon any other ground than that which speaks of death to the flesh. If the cross of Christ has not been brought to bear upon our energies, our life, our hopes, our desires, then this mighty power must remain to a large extent unknown. To those who know the "weakness" of II Cor. xii. 9, the knowledge of this mighty "power" is given; the believer in Christ has "no confidence in the flesh"; he has no patron, power, provision or privilege in the world; death has settled down upon it all, and he has but one source of strength, one arm of power, one provision for all his needs, and that is found at the right hand of God. The apostle enlarges the view of the "exceeding greatness" of this power by giving a detailed statement of the height to which the Lord, by it, was raised; this is necessary to complete our conception of its magnitude, and we hope to deal with this aspect in our next article.

pp. 49-52

To duly appreciate the "exceeding greatness of His power to usward who believe", we must realize in some measure the height to which the Lord was raised. The same Lord, raised by the same power, is set before the reader of the Word—in different positions according as the writer's is ministering the gospel of the kingdom, the gospel of God for faith—obedience to all nations, or the gospel of the mystery. Acts ii. 30 speaks of the resurrection of Christ with the purpose in view of sitting on David's throne, which is vastly different to being raised to sit at the right hand of God in the super-heavenlies far above all. Acts v. 30, 31 says:--

> "The God of our father raised up Jesus, whom ye slew and hanged on a tree. Him hath God exalted with His right hand to be a Prince and a Saviour, for to give repentance to ISRAEL and forgiveness of sins."

The resurrection of Christ, Paul declared in his sermon at Antioch, fulfilled the promise made unto the fathers, fulfilled the prophecy of kingship on Mount Zion of the second Psalm, and also fulfilled the "sure mercies of David". By Him, the risen One, justification was alone possible (Acts xiii. 32-39).

As the revelation of God's purpose in grace was given, ever-increasing fulness was found in the resurrection of the Lord. Romans iv. 24 makes it vital to the foundation truth of justification by faith, as x. 9 does regarding salvation; the quickening power for those who "walk not after the flesh but after the spirit", even though they have "mortal bodies", is found only in the risen Christ (Rom. viii. 11). To the Corinthians Paul declared that if Christ be not raised from the dead, his preaching, and their faith was vain, that they were yet in their sins, those who had fallen asleep in Christ had perished, and the believer was of all men the most miserable (I Cor. xv.).

It is a great step from Acts ii. to Eph. i. To know that Christ was raised to sit upon the throne of David to be a Prince and a Saviour for Israel was blessed knowledge; to realize the vital power of the gospel—Christ risen—was to pass from death unto life. What must it be then to go still further and to know that when He was raised from the dead, not only David's throne should have an undying occupant, but that the throne of universal dominion was shared by the risen Son of God. No writer of either Old or New Testament tells of Christ in such exaltation; the apostle can most certainly claim that he had a knowledge of the mystery of Christ which in other ages was not made known (Eph. iii. 4, 5). Once, and once only, does the word "sit" occur in the prison epistles, as though the inspired writer would direct our attention to this singular revelation. Other parts of Scripture testify to the fact that the Lord is at the right hand of God, but none reveal with such fulness the glorious extent of His exaltation.

(2). Far above all principality. . . . and name.
(3). In this age.
(4). In the coming one.
(5). All things are put in subjection beneath His feet.
(6). He has been given as Head over all things to the church.
(7). Which church is His body and His fulness.

The nearest approach to point No. 1 is found in Heb. vii. 26, where Christ is said to be "made higher than the heavens", and in iv. 14, where we are told He "passed through the heavens".

Inasmuch as Paul had the revelation of "the mystery" made to him, which included the glorious fact that the blessings of the one body are "in the super-heavenlies", so it was fitting that he should be the one to reveal the fact of the mystery of Christ that He the Head of that body had been raised to that exalted position.

Other writers approach this revelation with regard to the position of Christ, but who beside Paul holds out the prospect of the believer sharing that exalted position? We would suggest that the reader tabulates all that is said concerning the believer "going to heaven" in the epistles outside those of Paul; the result may make him realize how little is said of such a position apart from the revelation of the mystery.

The super-heavenlies are not only the place of the throne of God, but the abode of principalities and powers, both good and bad. Some principalities and powers in the super-heavenlies are learning through the Church the manifold wisdom of God (Eph. iii. 10); other principalities and powers in the super-heavenlies (A.V. "high places") antagonize the believer; but above all principality and power the Lord has been raised. Other ranks of spiritual beings are enumerated, e.g., "might and dominion". Some are beyond enumeration, yet every name that is named, it matters not how high, none can ever be higher than the glorified Christ of God; He has been raised far above all.

The references to principalities and powers in the prison epistles are suggestive. Where Christ is named the Head, where there is a reference to His fulness, where the Church is called the "body", where the "mystery" is referred to, and where "reconciliation" occurs, there we read of principalities and powers. The grouping is somewhat similar in the two epistles where they come, for neither Philippians nor II Timothy speak of any of these things, Ephesians and Colossians containing all the passages.

Principalities and Power in Ephesians and Colossians.

A | Eph. i. 21. Principalities, Power, Might, Dominion.—Christ over all.
B | Eph. iii. 10. Principalities, Powers.
C | Eph. vi. 12. Principalities, Powers, Rulers, Wickedness.—The Contest.
A | Col. i. 16. Thrones, Dominions, Principalities, Powers.—Christ created all.
B | Col. ii. 10. Principalities, Powers.
C | Col. ii. 15. Principalities, Powers.—The Triumph.

By comparing the first occurrences in Ephesians with those of Colossians we see that Christ's ascension to the exalted position far above all is but His original right and due. As the first-born of all creation He is seen as the Creator of all things visible and invisible; as the first-born from the dead, therefore, He cannot be given a lower place than that He so gloriously occupied before His humiliation. As the new Head of a new creation it becomes necessary that even unfallen principalities in the heavens should be brought into the new sphere. The church of the one body being blessed "in the super-heavenlies", it becomes necessary, in the epistles which deal with that phase of truth, to record the inclusion of the invisible spiritual world in the sphere of the reconciliation. The relation of this glorious exaltation of the Lord with the church which is His body, and the remaining details of that exaltation, we must leave for the next article.

Not only does Scripture record the exaltation of the Lord as being far above all principality, power, might, and dominion, but it goes on to say, "and every name that is named". Heb. i. 4, speaking of the glory and dignity of the Son, says of Him, "having become by so much greater than the angels, as He has inherited a more excellent NAME than they". Here it is evident that the name inherited by the Lord indicates the honour and glory that is His at the right hand of the Majesty on high, a name that is "far above. . . . every name that is named". Phil. ii. 9 says, "Wherefore God also hath highly exalted Him, and given Him THAT NAME which is above every name". So great is His exaltation that when the passage continues, "that in the name of Jesus every knee should bow", it can speak of beings in the heavens as well as on the earth.

The completeness of the exaltation is not only emphasized by the inclusion of the heavenlies, but Eph. i. 21 tells us that His superiority over every name is not only in this, but also in the coming age. From that time henceforth, in all spheres and in all ages, He alone must be pre-eminent. To day is the day of His rejection; not yet do we see all bowing in His name, yet the words of Eph. i. 21 speak of the present as well as the future; the argument assumes that the Lord has the pre-eminent name now, "not only in this, but also in the coming age". Eph. i. 22 goes on to speak of all things being put under His feet. The Epistle to the Hebrews, whilst agreeing with Ephesians regarding the more excellent name (Heb. i. 4), has something different to say regarding the subjection of all things under His feet, for Heb. ii. 8 says, "But now we see not yet all things put under Him". Ephesians seems to say that NOW all things are subjected, while Hebrews says we see not yet all things subjected. First we must notice it is a question of seeing that makes the difference. Hebrews does not say that all things are not yet subjected, but that now "we see not" yet all things put under Him. In the second place we must observe that Ephesians speaks of "principality, power, might, and dominion", whereas Hebrews speaks only of angels. The more excellent name is in relation to angels; angels worship Him, He was made a little lower than the angels, and He laid not hold upon angels. Angels form part of the great fellowship of the first-born ones (Heb. xii. 22), and have been entertained unawares; angels are linked with Israel and the Kingdom. Angels have practically nothing to do with the Church of the One Body; when Peter speaks of the Lord's exaltation, he places angels first, "angels and authorities and powers being made subject unto Him". Thirdly, while Ephesians speaks of "the coming age", Hebrews speaks of "the coming habitable world" (Heb. ii. 5). These points of difference only emphasize the fact that Ephesians speaks of something that differs from the testimony of Hebrews or Peter. Ephesians is "super-heavenly", Hebrews "heavenly", and in association with the earth; the believer who is united to the Lord as a member of His body passes with his Head into the highest heavens; there perfect reconciliation has been brought about, and the pre-eminence of the Lord is gladly acknowledged by all (Col. i. 15-20).

This close association of the Church with these principalities is more completely demonstrated in Col. ii. Chapter i. 18 says, "and He is the Head of the body, the Church"; chapter ii. 10 says that He is the "Head of all principality and power"; this two-fold headship implies reconciliation, and is the sphere of the One Body, namely, the super-heavenlies; all is finished. From the standpoint of Hebrews, however, all is not finished, the habitable earth has not yet acknowledged Him, and so from that standpoint it is written, "we see not yet all things put under Him". Let the reader open a Concordance and look at the usage of the word angel. The Gospels and the Acts contain over seventy references, Hebrew to Revelation, over ninety, while Paul uses the word only fourteen times, and of these one reference only is found in the prison epistles, namely, Col. ii. 18, which sets them aside. Angels have much to do with Israel; at the birth of Christ they act as heralds, after His death they roll away the stone from the tomb and announce the resurrection. At His second coming angels will accompany Him, and will be sent as reapers of the harvest at the end of the age; angels ministered to Peter and Paul during the "Acts", and the apostle in I Cor. declares that he was made a spectacle to angels; they were associated with Abraham and Jacob, with Moses, and throughout the whole period of Israel's history; angelic activity is most prominent again in Revelation.

The way in which the references to principalities and powers are arranged in Ephesians and Colossians is instructive.

Eph. i. 21.	Eph. iii. 10.	Eph. vi. 12.
Principality.	Principalities.	Principalities.
Power.	Powers.	Powers.
Might.		Rulers.
Dominion.		Spiritual Wickedness.
Col. i. 16.	Col. ii. 10.	Col. ii. 15.
Thrones.
Dominions.
Principalities.	Principality.	Principalities.
Powers.	Power.	Powers.

Connected with these heavenly powers are the great themes of these epistles; the reader can test the statement for himself, and he will find how closely connected with the Church's present and future position these principalities and powers are.

We may not feel able to venture far into the difference that seems to exist between the principalities and powers, and the angels who seem to be the messengers of heaven, but this we can see, and in this we can rejoice, that He who stooped "for a little lower than the angels" (heaven's messengers) is not only exalted above them, but far above the highest dignities in the super-heavenlies. The church of the one body is, with Him, raised far above all such too, and the mediation and ministry of angels gives place to the immediate communion and succour of our glorified Head.

"Head over all things to the Church" (Eph. i. 22). pp. 113-115

The Lord Who was raised "far above all", to Whom was given the name which is above every name, occupies that position of exceeding greatness now, for it is written, "not only in this age, but also in the coming one". Indeed, this quotation takes it for granted that now the Lord is the exalted One, and goes on to state that this will be His position in the future as well; verse 22 continues with the words, "and hath put all things under His feet". When we turn to the epistle to the Hebrews we find these words in an entirely different setting; while it is in the purview of the epistle of the Mystery to see "all things under His feet" as a present fact, this is denied to those whose dispensational position is according to the teaching of the epistle to the Hebrews. The testimony is very distinct. In the one case the believer sees now, in this age, as well as in the coming one, "all things put under His feet", whereas in the other the believer has to confess, "But now we see NOT ALL THINGS in subjection under His feet". True, they see Jesus crowned with glory and honour as a direct result of "the suffering of death", but it is emphatically declared that NOW WE SEE NOT all things beneath His feet. Heb. ii. and Eph. i. therefore must have very different points of view if such opposite statements be true.

There is a progression also to be observed in the extent and character of the "all things" that are placed beneath the feet of the Lord. Heb. ii. quotes from Psalm viii. where the "all things" are given as "dominion over the works of Thy hands. . . . all sheep and oxen, yea, and the beast of the field; the fowl of the air, and the fish of the sea, and whatsoever passeth through the paths of the sea". Such is the dominion contemplated in the Psalm. The line of teaching of the epistle to the Hebrews leads to something above this. In Heb. ii. it is the "habitable world" which is in view.

The first epistle to the Corinthians likewise quotes from this eighth Psalm. The teaching of chapter xv. where the quotation occurs has the resurrection of Christ Himself, of His people, and of all Adam's seed in view; it carries the reader on to the "end" when the last enemy is to be destroyed, and definitely teaches that "when all things shall be subdued unto Him, then shall the Son also Himself be subject unto Him, that God may be all in all" (I Cor. xv. 22-28); all enemies, rule, authority and power (same words as Eph. i. 21, principality, power, might) are now included, which is an advance upon the "habitable world" of Hebrews ii.

The future subjection of the principalities and powers revealed in I Cor. xv. is brought into the present by Peter in his first epistle, "Who is gone into heaven, and is on the right hand of God; angels and authorities and powers being made subject unto Him" (iii. 22).

It is left to the epistles of the Mystery, however, to reveal that the present headship of Christ unites an elect company called "the Church which is His Body" with the principalities and powers that yield ready subjection to the ascended Lord. This revelation is definitely the theme of the Mystery, and cannot be found outside of it. This is the "mystery of His will" made known in Eph. i. 9, 10. It is no mystery that God purposed that Christ should be the Head over all things in the coming age. The mystery here revealed is twofold: first as to the time, and secondly as to the subjects. As to the period of the headship here made known, it is "a dispensation of the fulness of the seasons", another name, we take it, for the dispensation of the mystery (iii. 9, R.V.), and refers to the present, not to the future age. We cannot see the fitness of the word "dispensation" to the future period referred to in Psalm. viii. and I Cor. xv. Dispensations, or God's different ways of dealing with men, sub-divide this present age. As to the subjects, the passage reveals the wondrous truth that in that dispensation of the fulness of the seasons God will gather together under one Head (anakephalaiomai) things in the heavens, and things in the earth.

The passage Eph. i. 17-23 is alike a subject of "revelation", and is indeed equally a mystery. the full explanation if the difference between the statement of Eph. i. 22 and Heb. ii. 8 is found in the latter half of Eph. i. 22, where it goes on to say, "and gave Him to be Head over all things TO THE CHURCH, which is His Body". The words we have emphasized are the key to the problem. While the rejected Lord is NOT YET Head over all things as one blessed day (how soon we may not know!) He will be, He has been given to be Head over all things TO THE CHURCH. What heights and depths are there to be found in meditating upon this glorious revelation! The works of His hands, kings, nations, the men of this world, may not yet be manifestly beneath His feet. Enmity and hatred, sin and sorrow are on every hand. The former things have not yet passed away. A new heaven and a new earth have not yet been made, but, nevertheless, He is Head over all things TO THE CHURCH.

The companion epistle, Colossians, reveals the fact that Christ is the Head of all principality and power (ii.10), and brings the two companies (the church and the principalities) together in the great reconciliation of chapter i. 16-18.

Let us rejoice together in this blessed truth. We who by His grace are called into the fellowship of the church of the One Body look beyond the lawless state of our time to the right hand of God in the super-heavenlies, for there we have One Who to us is Head over all things now, and destined to be Head over all in the future.

May our faith and our hope be stedfast in this truth, and may our love abound more and more.

"The Church, which is His Body" (Eph. i. 22, 23).
pp. 145-148

In our last paper we were considering the evident difference that there is between the viewpoint of the epistle to the Hebrews, and that to the Ephesians. In Hebrews "we see not yet", while in Ephesians we see that now, as well as in the age to come, the Lord has all things under His feet, and is Head. This headship, however, we further observed was peculiar to the dispensation of the Mystery. From every other point of view except that of the Mystery we have to say, "we see not yet all things put under Him". The qualifying clause that explains the apparent contradiction is that which concludes Eph. i. 22. Christ has been given head over all things to the Church, even while it is still true that with that one exceptional qualification He is the rejected One, awaiting the day of His glory.

It is now necessary to call attention to the fact that although the verse ends with the words, "to the Church", the scriptural argument does not end there. The sub-division of chapters into verses, at times, misleads; the Church to which Christ has been given head over all things is the Church which is His body. It is necessary to keep this definitely before us; more "Churches" than one find their place in Scripture, and it is the initial step towards confusion to ignore the things that differ. A parallel to this verse division is found in iii. 6, 7; we must not stop short at the words, "partakers of His promise in Christ by the gospel", for the scripture is careful to define which gospel the apostle intends us to have in mind; verse 7 continues with a qualifying statement, and confines the gospel under view to that whereof Paul was made a minister. The Church which is His body forms a very precious for meditation. Chapter v. 23 argues that Christ being head of the Church, He is also saviour of the body; the nearness that the figure of the body conveys, and the love with which it is regarded by the Lord is given in v. 28-30:--

> "So ought men to love their own wives, as their own bodies, he that loveth his wife, loveth himself, for no man ever yet hated his own flesh, but nourisheth and cherisheth it, even as the Lord the church, for we are members of His body."

The references in Ephesians to the Body, the Church, are seven in number. This number is not accidental, and stamps the subject of God's own hall-mark of perfection; the line of teaching connected with the Body is clearly indicated by a comparison of these seven references.

A | i. 23. The Body. Christ the Head.
  B | iv. 4. The Unity. Christ the One Lord.
    C | iv. 12. Gifts for the building.
      D | iv. 16. Unity. "Fitly joined together."
    C | iv. 16. Each member for the increase.
A | v. 23. The Body. Christ the Head and Saviour.
  B | v. 30. The Unity. The Church the members.

First, comes the headship of Christ, as set forth by i. 23, and v. 23. Then comes the subject of unity; first, the sevenfold unity of the Spirit (iv. 4), secondly, the perfect relation of each member to the other expressed in the word, "fitly joined together", and finally the illustration of this wonderful unity in the words, "we are members of His Body". These three passages referring to unity all occur in the practical section of the epistle.

Members C , C (iv. 12 and 16), are placed over against each other to show the method used by the Lord, first in the building of the Church, and then in its increase. When dispensation of the mystery was first made known, and the exalted position of the rejected Lord was for the first time revealed, the Mystery of Christ, the message of grace that is manifested in the words, "gave Him to be Head over all things to the Church which is His Body", was entrusted to special men, "gifts" of the ascended Lord. Some were apostles, some prophets, some evangelists, some pastors and some teachers. These gifts, however, were temporary, they did not constitute an essential part of the One Body. Eph. ii. 20 tells us that this Church is built upon the foundation of the Apostles and Prophets. When once the new message had been received, and the transition had been effected, the members themselves, by direct communion with their living Head, made for the increase of the body, building itself in love.

As a testimony to the glory of our rejected Lord, the close connection between the members of the Body and the Head is most essential. This the evil one seeks to destroy, and Col. ii. shows his threefold weapon, a vain deceitful philosophy, the traditions of men, and the rudiments of the world (verses 8-19).

As members of this Body, let us "hold the Head", allowing nothing to come in between ourselves, and the risen glorified Son of God.

The sevenfold unity of the Spirit, with which we have been entrusted in the bond of peace, commences with the words, "One Body". There can be no progress in the understanding of the blessed teaching that is related to the remaining members if the true position of the One Body is missed. Many there are who closely question us with reference to the one hope, not realizing that it is one hope of our calling. These have not yet clearly grasped the distinct, elective, heavenly, and mystery character of the Church to which they belong. Let us remember also that while one reference is all that suffices in the doctrinal part of the epistle, six are found in the practical section. We are exhorted to walk worthy of the vocation wherewith we are called; lowliness, meekness, longsuffering, forbearance and love must surely characterize the members of HIS BODY! Hence it is that the apostle soon introduces the reference (Eph. iv. 1-4).

In our ministry one to the other, "the whole body" and "every part" are both under view (16), the whole body receives its power, its direction, its strength, its every supply from the Head "which is Christ"; the perfect unity of this Church is indicated by the words, "fitly joined together", while every member is looked upon as a "joint of supply"; the effectual working in the measure of "every part" indicates that each member is essential, and each member contributes towards the making "increase of the body unto the building up of itself in love".

Having spoken so much about the Body (4-16), the apostle returns with all the added force in his argument to the question of the believer's walk. Let us, while rejoicing in the wondrous truth revealed in Eph. i. 23, ever remember the practical issues that are found in chapters iv. and v.

"The Church. . . . the Fulness" (Eph. i. 23). pp. 177-179

The Church of this parenthetical dispensation of the Mystery, called out not only from the world, but from among those who do already believe, is not only "the Church which is His Body", but also, wondrous title, "the fulness of Him that filleth all in all".

First let us consider who it is that "fills all in all". In chapter iv. 10 we read:--

> "He that descended is the same also that ascended up far above all the heavens, in order that He might fill all things."

The parallel with chapter i. 20, 21, where the risen Christ is seated in the super-heavenlies "far above all principality", etc., is clear; the ascension beyond all heavens, even as the exaltation above all powers, was necessary in order that the Lord might manifestly "fill all things". John, when writing his Gospels, speaks of grace that outshone all that had previously been revealed; he tells us that > "The Word was made flesh, and tabernacled among us, and we beheld His glory as of the only begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth. . . . and of His fulness have all we received" (i. 14-16).

Those who received "of His fulness" were the ones who "beheld the peculiar glory" of Christ as "the Word made flesh", "the only begotten of the Father". The emphasis upon the "flesh" and "the only begotten" are essential; none can receive blessing apart from the one Mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus; of this we shall see more presently. Let us notice that rich as the blessing revealed by John undoubtedly is, those who are blessed therein are not said to be His fulness; they receive of it. The Church of the One Body not only receives of His fulness but is the fulness of Him who filleth all in all. These two aspects are brought together in Col. ii. 9, 10:--

> "For in Him dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily and ye are filled to the full of Him, which is the Head of all principality and power."

First we have the statement that in Christ dwells all the fulness of the Godhead; the words are simple, the meaning clear, but the tremendous conception of them surpasses human thought. One word more must however be added, and this seems to make the majesty and mystery of the revelation all the greater. How does all the fulness dwell in Christ? The answer is that it dwells in Him bodily; just as John tells us "the Word was made flesh", and the glory was that of "the only begotten", so on resurrection ground the fulness dwells in Him bodily, and He is twice spoken of in Col. i. as the first-born, firstborn of every living creature, and firstborn from the dead; it was well pleasing that in Him should all the fulness dwell (Col. i. 15-19).

Had we continued our quotation of John's Gospel to the eighteenth verse, we should have read, "No man hath seen God at any time; the only begotten Son, which is in the bosom of the Father, He hath declared Him"; this finds its complement in Col. i. 15 where Christ is spoken of as "the image of the invisible God". The body, whether of flesh and blood as it was during the life of Christ on earth, or manifestation of God to man. The passage from Col. ii. cited above links the believer with this glorious fulness; we are said to be "complete", or "filled full" in Him, and He who fills us is head of all principality and power. Both titles therefore lift the Church into the highest glory; as the Church appears quickened, raised and seated together with Christ at the right hand of God, filled to the full in Him, of all the assemblies purchased by precious blood and saved by sovereign grace, this Church alone is honoured by being called in its turn, "the fulness of Him that filleth all in all". He fills "all things" as Eph. iv. has already declared; in Him dwells all the fulness of the Godhead bodily; the invisible God finds in Him the express image of all His marvellous being, ways, and purposes. The church which in its turn is "His body", that Church is the "fulness" of the unseen Christ; even principalities and powers in the super-heavenlies look at this to be a member of His Body is glorious, what shall we say to the revelation that that Church is His fulness? Called during a dispensation of the Mystery in connection with the mystery of His will, it finds its place in a dispensation of the FULNESS of the seasons (i. 10). The goal before it is twice connected with the fulness; first, in Eph. iii. 19, it goes on in the comprehension of the love of Christ, in order that it may be filled unto all the fulness of God, and secondly, in iv. 13, the goal of the initial and foundation ministry of the "gifts" of the risen Christ, given in the capacity of the One that filleth "all things", is given as "the unity of the faith, and the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ". The Church which is His Body is the perfect man, for He created it in Himself "one new man" (ii. 15), and its measure is "the measure of the full age or maturity of the fulness of Christ". Christ as the One in whom all the fulness of the Godhead dwells, is the only manifestation of the invisible God, and the only declaration of the Father; the Church which is His Body is the present (and may we dare hope) the future manifestation of the glory of Christ, its unseen Head.

The hope that the special privilege of the One Body may go on into the future ages seems confirmed by the words of Eph. iii. 21, where, after reference to being filled unto all the fulness of God, the apostle concludes, "Unto Him be glory in the church by Christ Jesus, to all the generations of the ages, Amen". May it be so, now and ever, must surely be the desire of every member of His Body.

"The Name of the Lord, the Everlasting God."
"I AM THAT I AM. . . . . this is My Name for ever. And this is My Memorial unto all generations."
Gen. xxi. 33, and Exod. iii. 14, 15.
pp. 40 – 44

There is something profound and awe-inspiring in the contemplation of, or shall we say the attempt to contemplate, the idea conveyed in the words "everlasting", and "for ever".

Perhaps we feel it would have been more comfortable for our orthodoxy if the concordance did not put the possession of the land of Canaan, the covenant of circumcision, and the everlasting hills all together under the one heading. The same applies to the words "for ever" in Exodus. The feast of the passover, the service of the willing Hebrew servant, the sign of the sabbath between the Lord and Israel are all spoken of as "for ever".

To many of the readers of The Berean Expositor the suggestion that the passages in our title should not contain the words "everlasting" and "for ever" will not be new, and we believe that by a close following of the meaning of the original, a fuller conception of the Lord and His purposes will be discovered than is possible from the words as they stand in the A.V.

We have in previous articles discussed the meaning of the Hebrew word olam, translated "everlasting"; the conclusion of our study was that the word must always be given the meaning "age", and by that we understand a period of time of undefined or hidden duration, having both a beginning and an end, but that this end is hidden from the view of man. Some may say that we are tampering with the nature of God by substituting "age" for "everlasting". We seek to understand the message of these titles, feeling sure that to do so will be far more to the glory of God than any undue stress upon His eternal Being, concerning which finite minds cannot expect to contain very clear or adequate conceptions. Turning to the passages of our title, let us consider the context, then seek a literal translation. The word that stands out prominently is Beer-Sheba, the well of the oath; covenants, too, are the feature of the passage. Abraham is a sojourner (xx. 1; xxi. 34), Isaac, the child of promise, is born, the bondwoman and her son are cast out, and God was with Abraham in all that he did. As a result of the oath between Abimelech and Abraham, the name of the place was called Beer-Sheba, the well of the oath. Abraham was nearing his perfecting; the next recorded incident is that of his great trial, his endurance, and his obtaining of the promise. The covenant between Abraham and Abimelech brought to mind the great covenant God of Abraham, and Beer-Sheba assumed a grander meaning. Abraham called there on the name of JEHOVAH EL OLAM (the God of the age). Already we have read in connection with Abraham El Shaddai, the Almighty God. This occurs at the commencement of Abraham's walk and perfection, and introduces circumcision, and the change of name for Abraham and Sarah. In the words of The Companion Bible:--

> "EL is the God who knows all (first occ. Gen. xiv. 18-22), and sees all (Gen. xvi. 13) and that performeth all things for His people" (Psa. lvii. 2).

Jehovah is the name of God in covenant relation with His people. As Jehovah, He spans the ages and accomplishes His purpose. Newberry sets out the Hebrew title as follows:--

> "First, Yehi, 'He will be', long tense. Second, Hove, 'being', participle. Third, Hehyah, 'He was', short tense used in the past. Taking the first three letters of Yehi, Yeh, the middle two letters of Hove, ov, and the last two letters of hahyah, ah, we have Yehovah, or Jehovah, in full."

Rev. i. 4 gives an interpretation of the name, "From Him which is (ho on), and which was (hõ en), and which is to come (hõ erchomenos)".

Dr. Bullinger, in The Apocalypse or Day of the Lord says:--

> "Three times we have this periphrasis of Jehovah, and yet it is varied according to the emphasis we are to place upon it; in i. 4 and 8 it is 'is, and was, and is to come'; in iv. 8 it is 'was, and is, and is to come', in xi. 17 it is, "art and wast' (the third or future verb being omitted according to the critical Greek Texts, L.T., Tr., W.H., A.V., and R.V.)"

It will be observed that in the last occurrence of the title the name dealing with the future is omitted. Quoting again, as above, we learn the reason:--

> "It clearly is out of place here, because the twenty-four elders say, 'We give Thee thanks, O Lord God Almighty, which art and wast, because Thou hast taken to Thee Thy great power, and reignest' (not hast reigned)".

The coming had already taken place in Rev. xi. 17, and therefore the title of "the coming One" is omitted.

This being so, the suggestion that "Jehovah signifies—He that always was, that always is, and that ever is to come", falls to the ground. What do we understand by the words (Newberry's and others), "ever is to come"? Does it lend dignity and greatness to our God to use such mysterious titles? Will He never fulfil His promise and come? Yes, says the Scripture, and when He does come, and fulfils the meaning of that part of His title, that name passes. It is to the glory of God that we learn that the name Jehovah is not eternal. If it were, it would be a standing memorial of failure to accomplish His purpose.

The God of heaven and earth took the name of Jehovah in connection with His covenants, and when those covenants are fulfilled that name, like many other age-time titles and functions, will be given up "that GOD may be all in all".

Abraham looked to God to fulfil all His word, he therefore called on Jehovah, the God of the age. The moment this title of God is seen, the Satanic opposition to His purposes is emphasized, for Satan is "the god of this age" (II Cor. iv. 4), opposing at all points the development of the purpose of Jehovah, the God of the age. When the ages shall have run their appointed course, and the purpose of God as Jehovah shall be finished, that name, assumed only for the age, will be among the "former things" that shall be laid aside.

The omission of the title, "the Coming One", from Rev. xi. 17 towards the close of the age, is echoed in Exod. iii. 14, 15 near its beginning. There, the great emphasis is upon the present I AM, and the other phases of the title, the One who was, and the coming One, are omitted. I AM, as the covenant God of the fathers, is His name "to the age", and this is His memorial "to generations and generations". The parallelism between age and generation is fitting and unstrained, but the parallel between for ever and unto all generations is not so clear. The close connection between the 'age" (translated "everlasting" and "for ever") and "generations", is worthy of notice, and we give a few more references:--

> "And I will establish My covenant between Me and thee, and thy seed after thee in their generations for an age abiding covenant" (Gen. xvii. 7).
> "Ye shall keep it a feast to the Lord throughout your generations; ye shall keep it a feast by an ordinance to the age" (Exod. xii. 14. See also Exod. xxvii. 21; Lev. vi. 18; xxiii. 14; Num. x. 8).

Deut. vii. 9 seems to have the same view-point:--

> "Know therefore, that the Lord thy God, thy Elohim, He is God, the faithful God (El), which keepeth covenant and mercy with them that love Him and keep His commandments to a thousand generations."

A strong evidence that the word olam does not mean eternity is found in Deut. xxxii. 7.

> "Remember the days of old (olam). Consider the years of generation and generation."

The book that records the beginning of God's great purpose is pre-eminently the book of generations. The literary structure of Genesis is completely punctuated by the generations of the heaven and the earth, of Adam, etc. The same spirit that translated age-time titles by eternal names and attributes is evident in such a passage as Eph. iii. 21, where the A.V. reads, "unto Him be glory in the church by Christ Jesus throughout all ages, world without end. Amen."

The true rendering is found in the R.V. margin, "all the generations of the age of the ages", which carries us forward, as Deut. xxxii. 7 carried us backward, and leads to the grand consummation of the ages.

All this, and all that arises from it, we must forfeit if we retain the idea of the title of Jehovah being eternal in its essence. The very glory of the title is seen in its age-time character; the fact that it is temporary is revealed in Rev. xi. 17, and its greater glory is that He who is to come, will come, and not as some have said, "He that ever is to come". This great covenant name Jehovah is the memorial before God of His age purpose, and when that purpose is achieved, the God of the age will reveal Himself in other and fuller ways.

Let us be jealous for the truth of the Word and not for some laudable but misguided zeal for defending the eternity of the invisible God.

Studies in the Book of the Revelation.

The One Who sitteth on the Throne (Chapter iv.). pp. 1-3

The eyes of John were first of all directed to see "a throne", but a throne, to indicate authority and power, must be occupied, consequently the writer adds, "and One sat on the throne". The appearance of this One is described, and the special accompaniment of the rainbow is given. Then John saw not only one throne, but surrounding that throne twenty four thrones; he notes their occupants and accompaniments, this time thunder and lightning instead of a rainbow. Again he returns to the throne, and in the midst and round about he sees four living ones. This threefold description is clearly seen in the structure given, viz., iv. 2-8, the throne, elders, and living ones:--

A1 | 2. On the throne. One sitting.
B1 | 3. Appearance. Like jasper and sardine stone.
C1 | 3, 4. Accompaniment. Rainbow and twenty-four thrones.
A2 | 4. On the thrones. Twenty-four elders sitting.
B2 | 4. Appearance. Clothed in white, with gold crowns.
C2 | 5, 6. Accompaniments. Lightning, thunderings, voices, seven lamps, sea of glass.
A3 | 6. In midst of throne. Four living ones.
B3 | 7. Appearance. Like lion, calf, man, and flying eagle.
C3 | 8. Accompaniments. Threefold ascription of holiness.

The words, "He that sat upon the throne", must not be passed over without consideration. So often do they occur, and in such a manner, that the words indicate a definite title, and give a special character to the Revelation. The solemnity of the words and acts recorded in this book, and their judicial character, are emphasized by the continual reference to Him that sat upon the throne. In strong contrast will be seen the one who "sits upon many waters", "upon a scarlet coloured beast", "upon seven mountains", and who said "I sit a queen" (xvii. 1, 3, 9, 15; xviii. 7).

The first reference to sitting on a throne is in chapter iii. 21, where the Lord speaks of His sitting with His Father in His throne. The reader should carefully note the following passages, observing the various things that are related to the One Who occupies this glorious throne (v. 1, 7, 13; vi. 16; vii. 10, 15; xix. 4; and xx. 11). It will be specially profitable to compare and ponder the opening reference (iv. 2), with the closing reference (xx. 11); in both there is importance attached to books being opened.

The appearance of the One that sat upon the throne is said to have been like "a jasper and a sardine stone". Jasper is the first foundation stone of the New Jerusalem, and the sardius the sixth; jasper was the last stone in the High Priest's breastplate. Exod. xxiv. 10 says:--

> "And they saw the God of Israel: and there was under His feet as it were a paved work of a sapphire stone, and as it were the body of heaven in his clearness."

Ezekiel i. 22 seems to refer to this (see verse 26), and speaks of it as "the trouble crystal". (Ezek. xviii. 13), describing the "anointed cherub", speaks of his covering being composed of nine precious stones together with gold. The reference to precious stones, and the statement that the One Who sat upon the throne was like them, indicates that like all else in this creation they have their place as types of unseen spiritual realities.

Encircling the throne, and possibly partially veiling the glory of the One that sat upon it, was a rainbow, "in sight like unto an emerald". The green of the rainbow may well stand for mercy. This throne of righteousness, from which will go forth the commands of judgment, has also a sign of mercy; it is the fulfillment of Habakkuk's plea, "in wrath remember mercy". For the encouragement of the faithful few, the rainbow encircles the throne. The day foreshadowed by the days of Noah are imminent, a deluge of wrath is about to fall, but the Lord remembers His covenant, and the rainbow is seen. The day of grace has come to its end when this throne is seen, the day of the Lord with its judgments and its terrors is about to begin; yet it is well to remember that all judgments and plagues proceed from the throne, all is ordered by heaven's Ruler, nothing is by chance or hap. It is certainly a fact for rejoicing in such an hour to know that when the Apocalypse with its most awful scenes becomes history, there, in unsullied light and unruffled calm reigns the One "Who sitteth on the throne."

Further description of the Throne and its accompaniments (Chapter iv.) pp. 33-35

In our last article we were considering something of the majesty of Him who sat upon the throne. We now observe that around the throne are ranged twenty-four other thrones. The twelve apostles will sit upon twelve thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel (Matt. xix. 28). Thrones are a part of creation, both those in heaven, and those of earth (Col. i. 16). Satan has a throne (Rev. ii. 13; xiii. 2), so also has the Beast (xvi. 10), although the A.V. renders the word "seat". The thrones that are spoken of as those of the twelve apostles have direct reference to "judging" the twelve tribes; "judging" of course does not necessarily mean "condemning", for a judge acquits as well as pronounces sentence. The twenty-four thrones therefore seem to have some such purpose. This is further suggested by noticing who they are that sit upon the thrones, "I saw four and twenty elders". The word translated "elder" is presbuteros, and both among Gentiles and Jews the word conveys the idea of dignity, rule, and wisdom. It will be remembered that Moses chose seventy men who bore "with him the burden of the people". There were elders in the early church, and these held positions of responsibility (Titus i. 5). The number twenty-four takes us back to the days of David and the temple. I Chron. xxiv. 3-18 gives the twenty-four courses of the priests; there were also the same number of prophets appointed (xxv. 1-31); there were also twenty-four porters appointed from the Levites (I Chron. xxvi. 17-19). Twenty-four, therefore, seems to be closely associated with the administration of the temple in the days of the kingdom. As Moses made the tabernacle after the heavenly pattern shown to him, so David also was divinely instructed regarding the details of the temple and its appointments. "All this (including the courses of the priests, verse 13), said David, the Lord made me to understand in writing by His hand upon me" (I Chron. xxviii. 19). David addressing Solomon said, "Behold, the courses of the priests and the Levites, even they shall be with thee for all the service of the house of God" (verse 21).

In Revelation i. we have seen the risen Lord in His High-priestly robes; here, in chapter iv., we see the heavenly elders who take part in the administration of heavenly worship. These heavenly elders are seen clothed in white raiment, which raiment indicates righteousness. There are considerably more references to "white" in the Revelation than in the rest of the New Testament; the white robes, the white throne speak of a day of righteousness. The elders moreover are crowned with crowns of gold; this indicates that they not merely sit upon thrones, but are recognized rulers having dominion. To add to the majesty and solemnity of the scene, and also to indicate that here is not a throne of grace, the apostle says, "And out of the throne proceed lightnings and thunderings and voices"; the throne is set in the accompaniment of judgment and wrath, it recalls Mount Sinai at the giving of the Law.

> "And it came to pass on the third day in the morning, that there were thunders and lightnings, and a thick cloud upon the mount, and the voice of the trumpet exceeding loud, so that all the people that was in the camp trembled." (Exod. xix. 16).

In the Revelation itself the mention of thunder, lightning and voice is associated with judgment (viii. 5; xi. 19; xvi. 18). Before the throne seven lamps were seen burning, which are the seven spirits of God; these seven spirits have already been mentioned before in the Revelation; they are seen in the hand of Christ (iii. 1), and are there associated with the seven stars, and the seven angels of chapters ii. and iii. The seven spirits before the throne are linked with God, and the Lord Jesus Christ in i. 4, 5. Heb. i. 7 says, "He maketh His angels spirits, and His ministers a flame of fire". In Rev. v. 6 the seven spirits are sent forth into all the earth, and are there likened to "seven eyes". Here then is the throne set for judgment, with all in perfect readiness. One other item is mentioned, "and before the throne, like a glassy sea, like crystal"; this is very similar to the description given by Ezekiel in i. 22, "And the likeness of the firmament upon the heads of the living creature, was as the colour of the terrible crystal"; or in Exodus xxiv. 10, "And there was under His feet as it were a paved work of a sapphire stone, and as it were the body of heaven in his clearness".

There is something encouraging to us in this description; in spite of all the turmoil, blasphemy, plagues and sin, an unruffled sea like crystal stretches out before the throne, all is clam THERE. If this can be so in the day of judgment, much more so may it be in this day of grace. May we ever remember that our peace and safety are to be found there, at the right hand of God, not here, where sin and death still carry on their dreadful rule.

The Ascription of Praise (Chapter iv. 8-11).
pp. 65-68

In the structure of this first vision (see Volume VII. page 161) the Throne alternates with the saying or the song of those around and before it. Verses 8-11 of chapter iv. record first the "saying" of the living ones, and the response of the four and twenty elders.

Let us approach this subject with some degree at least of appreciation that we stand upon holy ground. "The four living ones had each of them six wings about him". In no description of the cherubim in the O.T. do we find any reference to their having six wings, neither do they speak, as do the living ones in this chapter. In Isaiah vi. we read of the seraphim; these are connected with the throne.

> "Each one had six wings, with twain he covered his face, and with twain he covered his feet, and with twain he did fly; and one cried to another and said, Holy, holy, holy, is the Lord of hosts, the whole earth is full of His glory".

The seraphim are associated with mercy:--

> "Then flew one of the seraphim unto me, having a live coal in his hand which he had taken with the tongs from off the altar; and he laid it upon my mouth, and said, Lo, this hath touched thy lips; and thine iniquity is taken away, and thy sin purged".

In contrast with this we read in Ezekiel x. of the cherubim being associated with the scattering of coals of fire in judgment. The departing and returning glory in Ezekiel, together with the placing of the cherubim at the garden of Eden, link them with righteousness as well as mercy. It has been suggested that the apparent merging of the characteristics of both cherubim and seraphim in the Revelation, is an indication that "righteousness and peace have kissed each other". These living ones we read, "rest not day and night, saying, Holy, holy, holy, Lord God Almighty, Who was, and Who is, and Who is coming". This is the first of a series of utterances that punctuate the book, and therefore it is of importance to notice what the theme of this first utterance is. It is an ascription of holiness to the Lord. Foremost of all the attributes of Him who occupies that awful throne in the day of the Lord is holiness. Holiness is akin to righteousness, but whereas righteousness may seem cold, holiness burns with white heat. The self-righteous man may be found who will speak of his own uprightness and integrity, his honesty and his truthfulness, but few will be found to speak of their own holiness. This is the sacred and peculiar attribute of God, and of this the living ones unceasingly tell.

In verse 9 we read, "and when these living ones give glory and honour and thanks to Him that sat on the throne". How are we to understand this? Verse 8 has already told us that they "rest not day and night, saying Holy, holy, holy". It would therefore seem to imply that this threefold ascription of holiness was also the threefold glory, honour and thanks which they give to Him. To speak unceasingly of the holiness of Him who sits on that throne is to "give glory". To tell of His holiness is to honour Him, and ascribe holiness to Him is to offer thanksgiving. Nothing can be to His glory that forgets or omits the recognition of His holiness. We cannot honour Him if we do not with reverence and regard remember that we stand on holy ground.

The effect of these words of the living ones upon the four and twenty elders is to cause them to fall down and worship, casting their browns before the throne saying:--

> "Worthy art Thou, O Lord, and our God, to receive glory and honour and power; because Thou didst create all things, and on account of Thy will, they were, and are created".

Creation and its purpose form the basis of the elders' utterance. The living ones spoke of what the Lord is - holy, the elders of what He has done – creation.

We have in a previous article called attention to the logical connection established in the book of Job between God's creative power and righteousness. Here, the living ones and elders link holiness, glory, honour and power with creation. Creation as it is, as well as what it will be; creation that groans and that has been subjected to vanity; creation in its present bondage as well as its future liberty is a manifestation of His holiness, and is for His will. Puny man, with defective logic and a specious humanitarianism, would draw conclusions from his conception of the love of God that would not allow the Scriptural logic of Job or Revelation a place. "The things that are made" are divinely intended to teach "that which may be known of God, even His eternal power and Deity" (Rom. i. 19, 20). "The heavens declare the glory of God", and we are not allowed by the Scriptures to brush aside the many strange and apparently opposite elements in creation to conjure up some Utopia of our own, whose God would have to repudiate the works of His hands, or change the meaning of His attributes. The present creation is the work of a holy and a righteous God; it is a necessary link in the chain of His purpose, and supplements and illustrates the teaching of the Word. The A.V. reads, "for Thy pleasure they are and were created". The word rendered "pleasure" is almost always rendered "will". This is a striking introduction. Creation will seem to have become in the day of the Lord almost universally given over to evil. The words before the Throne give us the aspect of those who see that which at present only eyes of faith can discern. They see creation still beneath His control. Creation was for His will; it shall accomplish His will, His holy will, in spite of all appearances and opposition. As to how it will do so may await further light and higher knowledge, but that it will do so is comfort to your hearts in the days of stress and evil.

Let us test every theory regarding creation and its purpose by the utterances of those nearest the Throne, first, ever remember that He who created all things, all, whatever their kind or function, is essentially holy, and secondly, let us remember that all was created "for His will". Creation is a part of the great purpose of the Lord God Almighty, and must be so viewed.

With this preparation we are introduced to a scene that takes us one step nearer to the great theme of the Revelation. "Thou are worthy" (cried the elders in reference to creation), "to receive glory and honour and power". We shall hear that cry again when in chapter v. the theme shall change from creation to redemption. Such an ascription we render unto Him now, during the time of His rejection.

The Sealed Book (Rev. v.). pp. 97-100

Having described the throne, the living ones, and the elders, and having recorded the utterances of these heavenly beings, the apostle recalls our attention to the throne, and what is taking place there.

The right hand of the glorious occupant of the throne held a scroll that had been written inside, and on the back, and which had been sealed with seven seals. What is the meaning of this sealed book? The answer is found by observing what happens when the seals are broken and the scroll unrolled. Chapter vi. describes the opening of six of the seals, and it will be seen that the sixth seal takes us to the day of judgment (vi. 12-17), "the great day of His wrath is come".

The opening of the seventh seal introduces the seven trumpets, and at the beginning of the seventh trumpet "the mystery of God shall be finished" (x. 7). When the seventh angel sounds his trumpet, the following words are heard, "the kingdoms of this world are become the kingdom of our Lord and of His Christ, and He shall reign unto the ages of the ages" (xi. 15). This is linked with the theme of the seventh seal by the words of verse 18, "Thy wrath is come". It is also the time for the judgment of the dead, the apportioning of rewards, and the destruction of those who destroy the earth. This is none other than "the REVELATION of Jesus Christ", for the wrath is the wrath of the Lamb, the King who reigns is Christ, and all judgment is committed into the hands of the Son.

Let us turn to the book of Daniel. We have already referred to Dan. x. when comparing the vision and its effects on Daniel as recorded in that chapter with the description of the Lord and the effects upon John in Revelation i.

> "In the third year of Cyrus, king of Persia, a thing was revealed unto Daniel whose name was Belteshazzar: and the thing was true, but the time appointed was long, and he understood the thing and had understanding of the vision" (x. 1).

Then follow three weeks' mourning and fasting. Evidently "the thing" and "the vision" were something to cause sadness. The vision of a man clothed in linen next appeared to Daniel, and after reviving the trembling saint he tells him that he has come "to make him understand what shall befall thy people in the latter days: for yet the vision is for many days". The whole of chapter xi., therefore, must refer primarily to the "latter days", and must be concerning a period that was "many days" from the days of Daniel.

To us, this settles the vexed question as to where in chapter xi. the yet future begins and past history ceases. Chapter xii. tells us that:--

> "At that time shall Michael stand up, the great prince which standeth for the children of thy people: and there shall be a time of trouble such as never was since there was a nation even to that same time: and at that time thy people shall be delivered, every one that shall be found written in the book. And many that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, these to aionian life, and these to shame and aionian contempt."

The note of time places the fulfillment of this prophecy in the yet future and links it with Rev. xii. (Michael), vii. (the great tribulation), xiii. (the book and deliverance), and xx. (the resurrection). Daniel is then told "to shut up the words, and seal the book unto the time of the end"; so also in verse 9. We are definitely told that the "thing", which together with the "vision" occupies chapter xi., was revealed to Daniel, and that he understood both the thing and the vision. Moreover, we read that to make Daniel understand was the object of the words of the man clothed in linen: this being so, we have no choice but to believe that Daniel did understand. The shutting up of the "words" and the sealing of the "book" therefore can have no reference to the question of his understanding.

Daniel has been spoken of as the book sealed, and the Revelation as the book opened. This, while being true, is misleading when used to teach that what is baffling, mysterious, and difficult in Daniel is clear and plain in the Revelation. The Apocalypse is not generally reckoned to be so clear and plain, and those who have studied both books would be the ones to confess that the Revelation is the more difficult to understand of the two. The sealing is "to the time of the end". This "time of the end" did present a problem to Daniel, a problem that was not solved, and for which the Revelation does supply the solution.

When we consider Revelation v. and note the call for one who should be worthy enough to open the seven seals, we shall there find that the idea of interpreting Daniel's prophecies can hardly fit the occasion. Angels were worthy enough to give the prophecies and to interpret them before; something more than interpretation is involved in the scene before us.

Let us get one more preparation before we consider Rev. v. in detail. This time we turn to Luke iv. The Lord had been tempted, among other things, with the immediate possession of "the Kingdoms of the habitable world", but had refused the offer. Then we read that:--

> "Coming to Nazareth He entered the Synagogue, and stood up for to read, and there was given to Him the scroll of the Prophet Isaiah, and when He had unrolled the scroll, He found the place where it is written,
>
> > The Spirit of the Lord God is upon Me, because He hath anointed Me to preach the gospel to the poor; He hath sent Me to heal the broken hearted, to preach deliverance to the captives, and recovering of sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that are bruised, to preach the acceptable year of the Lord.
> AND HE CLOSED THE BOOK. . . . and He began to say unto them, This day is this Scripture fulfilled in your ears."

What is there remarkable here? If we turn to the prophecy in Isaiah lxi., we shall find that the Lord "closed the book" before He had finished the passage; Isaiah's words are:

> "the acceptable year of the Lord, and the day of vengeance of our God; to comfort all that mourn; to appoint unto them that mourn in Zion, to give unto them beauty for ashes, the oil of joy for mourning, the garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness."

In Nazareth, the place that symbolized His utter rejection He closed the book without speaking of the day of vengeance. The day of vengeance is not for the lowly man of sorrows; that is reserved for the Lion of the tribe of Judah. When the prophet sees that day, the imagery is of greatness and power:--

> "Glorious in His apparel, travelling in the greatness of His strength. . . . mighty to save. . . . the day of vengeance is in My heart, and the year of My redeemed is come."

Both chapters lxi. and lxiii., link the day of vengeance with the blessing of Israel. The Lord is here set before us as the goel, the kinsman-redeemer, and the revenger of blood. It is important to remember that the word goel is not only translated redeemer, but also avenger (see Number xxxv. 19). We may read in the book of Ruth concerning the kinsman-redeemer, and the custom and law relating to the goel should be studied carefully in order fully to appreciate the fulfillment in Christ.

The opening of the seals does not interpret any veiled statements of Dan. xi. and xii. so much, as to put into operation the awful judgments that fall (Rev. vi.) before the Lord takes the kingdom and delivers His people. No one but Christ Himself in heaven or earth or under the earth could assume such an awful responsibility as the letting loose upon this earth the long pent up wrath of God. John wept much when no one was found worthy, not that he was disappointed that the judgments would not fall, but because he knew that these days of vengeance meant redemption for his people.

This twofold theme is developed throughout the remainder of the book, and the right division of the word of Truth, as indicated by the Lord in the synagogue of Nazareth, tells us that when the Revelation is in process of fulfillment, the "acceptable year" will have passed, and the "day of vengeance" will have come. The Church occupies a day of grace, and to bring the Church into this setting of judgment is to confuse things that differ.

The Lion and the Lamb (Rev. v. 1-7). pp. 129-132

Three times in the Revelation we read of a "strong angel". In x. 1, "another angel, a strong one" is seen coming down from heaven; he had in his hand a little scroll opened and sware that "time" should be no longer. Then follows immediately the reference to the seventh angel and the finishing of the mystery of God. In xviii. 21, "a strong angel" takes up a great millstone, and casts it into the sea, symbolizing thereby the sudden destruction of Babylon. In the chapter before us "a strong angel" proclaims with a loud voice, “Who is worthy to open the book and to loose the seals thereof?” No one was found in the whole universe “in heaven, in earth, or under the earth” who was worthy. The apostle must have realized the great importance of the scroll which was held in the hand of Him who sat on the throne, for one of the elders said to him, “Weep not! Behold, the Lion of the tribe of Judah, the root of David, prevailed to open the book, and shall loose the seven seals of it”. When John looked to the throne once again, in order to see the prevailing Lion, he beheld, “and lo, in the midst of the throne, and of the four living ones, and in the midst of the elders, stood a Lamb as it had been slain”. The elder says the LION, but John see a LAMB.

When Jacob gathered his sons together to tell them what should befall them in the last days, those sons concerning whom most is said, and who include in their forecast references to either Christ or Antichrist, are Judah, Dan and Joseph; this will be most readily seen if we just present the outline of Jacob’s prophecy as follows:--

Gen. xlix. 3-27.

A1	3-7.	a		Reuben. Water.
		b		Simeon. Scattered.
		c		Levi. Divided.
	B1	8-12.	d	Judah. The LION.
			e	THE SCEPTRE. SHILOH.
A2	13-15.	a		Zebulun. Ships.
		b		Isaachar. Rest.
	B2	16-18.	d	Dan. the Serpent and Adder.
			e	SALVATION.
A3	19-21.	a		Gad. Troop.
		b		Asher. Bread.
		c		Napthali. Hind.
	B3	22-26.	d	Joseph. Fruitful bough.
			e	THE SHEPHERD. THE STONE.
A4	27			Benjamin. Wolf.

Judah is the tribe whose latter day prophecy links it with the prevailing Lion, and with the sceptre, lawgiver and Shiloh. The One who had prevailed to open the scroll was moreover, “The root of David”. This title, taken together with that of Revelation xxii. 16, “I am the root and the offspring of David”, is often explained by saying that Christ was not only the son of David (the offspring), but also as the root whence David sprang. We rejoice to know that He who was David’s son was also David’s Lord, but in what special way David sprang from Christ we fail to see in Scripture; neither is there any need for such an idea. The “root” of David seems to be an allusion, if not a direct reference back, to Isaiah xi. 1, “And there shall come forth a rod out of the stem of Jesse, and a branch shall grow out of his roots”; the stem really means the stump of a tree after it has been cut down, and the figure exactly fits the apparent destruction of the royal line of David in our Lord’s day. Christ is the branch that grows out of his roots, for, in verse 10, the prophet continues, “And in that day there shall be a root of Jesse. . . . to it shall the Gentiles seek”. If the title, “the root of David”, denotes the source from whence David sprang, and not the same as the offspring of David, then “the root of Jesse” indicates the same.

All are agreed, however, that "the root of Jesse" is but another way of speaking of Him who should "grow out of his roots". Mal. iv. 1 shows that "root" as well as "branch" is used to indicate posterity. The prophecy of the Apocalypse is far more concerned to show the fulfillment of the promise concerning the Seed of David, than it is to prove the deity of Christ.

The Lord is seen as the great King, prevailing as the Lion of Judah, concerning whom alone a sceptre is mentioned, and as the root of David who, being raised from the dead, sits on David's throne.

One further and all-important truth is revealed in the vision concerning this kingly overcomer. The Lion of Judah and the root of David, is the Lamb of God. When He first came amongst men as the sent One of God, He came not as a Lion, but was pointed out as the "Lamb of God who taketh away the sin of the world". When John beholds Him in His risen glory, he still sees Him not as a Lion, but as the Lamb; when the day of His wrath comes, and strikes terror in the breast of all, we read of the wrath of the Lamb, not the Lion; when the marriage of heaven's King is announced, it is the marriage of the Lamb, not the Lion. More pointedly, perhaps, is vi. 1, where it is the Lamb who opens the seals, although the elder said it was the Lion. We are not to understand that He who once was the Lamb has now become the Lion. No, the Lamb it is that is seen right through the prophecy, the Lion never. Christ as the Lamb fulfils all the prophecies that speak of Him as Lion and King. The Lamb bears the marks of sacrifice, "standing as having been slain". Without the redemption concerning which the slain Lamb speaks, the throne of David would remain vacant, and the Lion of Judah would never be known. Heaven is about to burst forth in a new song, and it is to the Lamb they sing, and of His redemption, not to the Lion and of his strength.

Throughout the Scriptures there runs teaching that is summed up in this vision of the enthroned Lamb. Man by nature would give the battle to the strong. God has throughout glorified humility and meekness, everything in fact that goes with a lamb-like character. Those who suffer, overcome, while those who appear before their fellows as the greatest conquerors have suffered the greatest of defeats.

"Through weakness and defeat,
He won the mead and crown,
Trod all His foes beneath His feet
By being trodden down."

The Lamb, however, is living when John looks toward the throne. Blessed be God, He was dead, but behold He is alive for evermore. Without the resurrection the Lamb had died in vain. Resurrection is as vital to the fulfillment of the promises made to David concerning his earthly throne and city as it is to the Church of the One Body. Peter, in Acts ii., speaking of David says:--

> "Therefore being a prophet, and knowing that God had sworn with an oath to him. . . . that He would raise Christ to SIT ON HIS THRONE; seeing this before spake of the RESURRECTION of Christ" (Acts ii. 30, 31. See also Acts xiii. 34).

Christ as the Lamb in resurrection is seen possessed of "all power in heaven and earth", for John saw the Lamb "having seven horns and seven eyes". Omnipotence and omniscience are here symbolized, and a reference back to Zech. iii. 9 and iv. 10 will show that Israel's restoration and forgiveness is near. The seven eyes are further described as the seven spirits of God, and these have already been spoken of in Rev. i. 4 and iv. 5, and linked (see iii. 1) with the seven angels of the seven churches. John saw this One take the scroll out of the right hand of Him who sitteth on the throne. This One, alone in all the wide universe, was worthy to do so.

A close parallel in many ways is found in Dan. vii. 9-14. There is seen the throne, and the glory of Him who sat thereon. There books were opened, and > "One like the Son of man came with the clouds of heaven and came to the Ancient of days, and they brought Him near before Him. And there was given unto Him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all people, nations, and languages should serve Him".

"Every tribe, and tongue, and people and nation" figure in the new song that follows in Rev. v., which must, however, form the subject of another paper.

The New Song (Rev. v. 9, 10).
pp. 161-164

Before we can proceed with our studies, it will be necessary to give a rendering that shall contain the essential and important alterations to the A.V. in accordance with the readings of the critical Greek Texts.

> "And they sing a new song, saying, Worthy art Thou to take the book, and to open the seals thereof, because Thou wast slain, and didst purchase for God, by Thy blood, out of every tribe and tongue and people and nation and didst make them to our God a kingdom and priests, and they reign over the earth".

A new song! What song is it that Scripture calls new? Psa. xcvi. commences with the words, "O sing unto the Lord a new song, sing unto the Lord all the earth", and concludes with, "for He cometh, for He cometh to judge the earth". The next Psalm opens with the words, "the Lord reigneth", while Psa. xcviii. commences with the words, "O sing unto the Lord a new song". The next Psalm also commences with "The Lord reigneth".

The Companion Bible places these four Psalms together, making Psalms xcvii. and xcix. the new song, which the preceding Psalms had summoned the people to sing. We give it for the benefit of those who do not possess a copy.

F | xcvi. A summons to sing the "new song". "For He cometh" (Judgment).
G | xcvii. The new song. "Jehovah reigneth".
F | xcviii. A summons to sing the "new song". "For He cometh" (Judgment).
G | xcix. The new song. "Jehovah reigneth".

A new song is called for in the fourth Hallelujah Psalm (cxlix.); this speaks of "the King" (verse 2), and also speaks of Israel, and His saints who have the honour to execute "the judgment written", thereby linking the redeemed nation with the Lord who cometh to judge the earth. In Isaiah xlii. 19 we again meet with a new song, this time closely connected with the "new things" predicted in verse 9. These "new things" begin to be unfolded in the next chapter; in xliii. 19 the Lord says, "Behold, I will do a new thing", and the rest of the chapter, together with that following, emphasizes the future deliverance of Israel:--

> "Sing, O ye heavens; for the Lord hath done it; shout, ye lower parts of the earth; break forth into singing, ye mountains, O forest and every tree therein: for the Lord hath redeemed Jacob, and glorified Himself in Israel" (Isa. xliv. 23).

We read later of "a new name" (lxii. 2), and "a new heavens and a new earth" (lxv. 17). The new songs of Psalms and Isaiah are prophetic, they have never yet been sung. The new song of Rev. v. seems to link all these prophetic songs together. The fact that the Lamb had prevailed and was worthy to open the seals was a proof that the long promised kingdom was about to be set up; this necessarily included the redemption of Israel, and the rule of the saints over the earth according to the promise given in Rev. ii. 26, 27, and leads on to the new Jerusalem, the new heaven and the new earth.

"They sing a new Song". This is the first song recorded in the New Testament! Eph. v. 19 and Col. iii. 16 being exhortations, not records. This new song opens with the words, "Thou art worthy". It seems as though song had ceased on earth and in heaven whilst the Lord of glory stooped to die, and not until the moment comes for the rejected One to take unto Himself His great power, does the songless silence break, and heaven once more ring with harmony. Seven times does this word worthy (axios) occur in the Revelation, and in the following order:--

A | iii. 4. They shall walk in white, for they are worthy.
B | iv. 11. Thou art worthy to receive glory.
C | v. 2. Who is worthy to open the book?
D | v. 4. No man was found worthy.
C | v. 9. Thou art worthy to take the book.
B | v. 12. Worthy is the Lamb to receive power.
A | xvi. 6. Given them blood to drink, for they are worthy.

The worthiness of the Lamb is ascribed to His work of redemption, "Because Thou wast slain and didst purchase for God, by Thy blood, out of every tribe and tongue and people and nation". The A.V. reads, "and hast redeemed us", but the word "us" must be omitted. In verse 10 the A.V. reads, "and hast made us" and "we shall reign"; the critical Greek text and the R.V. read "them" and "they", for "us" and "we". The redemption spoken of, therefore, is not the redemption of the singers; they sing of the redemption of others. Who are the others that are redeemed? Are they the saved ones of all nations of the earth? No, this cannot be, for these redeemed ones are made "a kingdom and priests", a destiny reserved for one nation only, namely, Israel. If this be so, the redemption spoken of is that of the dispersed Israel scattered among the nations.

The first Lamb slain for Israel redeemed them from the power of one nation and the oppressor – Pharaoh; this redemption was accompanied by miracles and wonders, many of them taking the form of plagues. The title, "the Root of David", is suggestive of Isa. xi. 10, "the Root of Jesse", which is closely connected with Israel's second redemption, and here we find close parallel with "every tribe and tongue, and people and nation", for

> "It shall come to pass in that day that the Lord shall set His hand again the SECOND TIME to recover the remnant of His people which shall be left, from Cush and from Elam, and from Shinar, and from Hamath, and from the islands of the sea; and He shall set up an ensign for the nations, and shall assemble the outcasts of Israel, and gather together the dispersed of Judah from the four corners of the earth" (Isa. xi. 11, 12).

This second redemption is going to have much that will echo the first redemption from Egypt (Isa. xi. 16). The song of Moses followed the first, the new song celebrates the second.

In Exodus xxxiv. 10 we have a covenant given by the Lord, that before all the people of Israel He would do marvels, and marvels of such a character that it could be said they were such as had not been done in all the earth, nor in any nation. The word translated "marvels" is used by the Lord with reference to the plagues wherewith He smote Egypt, "I will. . . . smite Egypt with all my wonders", and also with the plagues threatened to Israel, "the Lord will make the plagues wonderful" (Deut. xxviii. 59). The covenant of marvels finds its fulfillment in the Apocalypse; there Pharaoh finds his antitype in the Beast, and Egypt in the wide world; the first covenant written upon tables of stone finds its echo in the new covenant written upon the fleshy tables of the heart, and the passover lamb finds its very image in the Lamb as it had been slain. The result of the purchase price paid by the Lamb is given in the new song, "and didst make them to our God a kingdom and priests, and they reign over the earth".

The subject of the "kingdom of priests" was dealt with in Volume VI. pp. 65-69 under Rev. i. 6. There we saw that this priestly kingdom looked forward to the Millennium of Rev. xx. 6, (Isa. lxi. 6), and backward to the Exodus (Ex. xix. 4-6). The scattered of Israel were addressed by Peter (I Pet. i. 1, 2), and to them at the REVELATION (I Pet. i. 3-13) the "royal priesthood" is promised. These priestly kings "reign over the earth". The glorious privilege of reigning with Christ, whether over the earth, or in the super-heavenlies far above all principalities and powers, is for the overcomers, but sufficient has already been said upon this theme in The Hope and the Prize. Such are promised that they shall sit with the Lord in His throne, they are to rule the nations with a rod of iron, and share the thousand years reign (see Rev. ii. 26, 27; iii. 21; xx. 4, 6).

The earth, subject to vanity since the days of Adam, and given over to Satan since the days of Nebuchadnezzar, is to be ruled in righteousness and finally delivered from the bondage of corruption; the initial act in this grand deliverance is the opening of the sealed book; this therefore calls forth the new song, and well may we hear its echo even now, realizing now "the future on the instant".

Sidelights on the Scriptures.

The Egyptian Gallery. Israel in Egypt. pp. 9, 10

The expulsion of the Hyksos conquerors of Egypt, the shepherd kings, introduces us to the kings of the XVIIIth dynasty, of which Thothmes III is a king of great importance: he is called by some historians, "the Alexander the Great of Egyptian history". Thothmes engaged in many wars, and carried his arms to the extremes of the then known world. An inscription reads:--

> "These are the unknown peoples of the furthest end of Asia whom His Holiness carried away as living prisoners (unknown was their land): it had never been trodden by the other kings of Egypt with the exception of His Holiness."

Cleopatra's Needle, so-called, which to-day stands upon the Thames Embankment, was erected by Thothmes III, and in every probability, was seen many times by Moses and Israel while in Egypt.

Standing in the centre of the North Gallery (No. 360) is a red granite head from a colossal statue of Thothmes III. He wears the double crown of the South and the North, the left arm and leg are in Bay 5; the total height of the head is 9 feet 5 inches, and its weight 4 tons 1 cwt. On the walls of the Temple of Karnak at Thebes, Thothmes III gives a list of 119 names of places in Palestine that were tributary. Among the list are such names as Gibeah, Migdol, Ophrah, Chinneroth, Joppa, Megiddo, Hamath and Damascus: the two names, however, that are most suggestive are those which occur in the 102nd and 78th positions in the list, they are JACOB-EL and JOSEPH-EL.

The coalition of the Canaanite tribes against Thothmes III, which included the tribes of Jacobel and Josephel, may illustrate the reason of the suspicion that the Israelites in Goshen would prove to be a menace if allowed to increase, although the oppression does not appear to have been instituted under this king.

The last king of the XVIIIth dynasty was named Amenophis IV. The mother of this king was a princess of Mesopotamia, and this may account for the fact that Amenophis IV (Amenhotep IV as sometimes written) discarded all titles that connected him with the ancient Egyptian Ra, and assumed another title, Khuenaten, meaning, "The splendour of the Solar Disc". He thereupon renounced all the polytheism of Egypt, with its animal worship, and became a worshipper of the Sun. A rebellion of the Egyptian priesthood against this Semitic faith followed, which ended in the overthrow of the dynasty. A seated statute of the fire-goddess Sekhet (Bay 6, No. 410) gives an idea of the Egyptian gods; this one is dedicated to the goddess in her awful character of "crusher of hearts!"

We now commence the examination of the history of a completely new line of kings, whose whole being was entirely opposed to the foreign element that had crept into the dynasty and the faith; they were "pan-Egyptian" in politics and religion, and their accession to the throne meant hard times for the foreign settlers in their midst. The data to hand are not sufficient to enable us to identify the pharaoh who was the "new king", or the Pharaoh who was overthrown in the Red Sea; some think that Ahmes, the founder of the XVIIIth dynasty, was the "new king", others say that Seti I, the founder of the XIXth dynasty, was the one. All that we can hope to do in these papers is to show something of the times during which these great events occurred, awaiting, if the Lord will, further evidences from the excavator and decypherer.

We must reserve any remarks regarding the XIXth dynasty, however, for another paper.

The Egyptian Gallery. "The New King." pp. 38-40

Scripture indicates that the Pharaoh who began the oppression of Israel was one of a line quite distinct from the Pharaoh under whose kindly patronage they had increased and multiplied. The word "arose" in Exod. i. 8 is in Hebrew kum, and means "stood up", denoting the standing up in the place of another who has been removed (see Dan. ii. 31, 39, 44; iii. 24, and Companion Bible). The words of Stephen in Acts vii. 18 point in the same way, "there stood up another king", the word "another" being heteros, meaning "another of another kind".

Exodus i. also very pointedly says, "and he said unto his people", indicating his own special followers as distinct from the friendly Egyptians who had grown up together with the Israelites. Whether it was Ahmes, or Seti, or Rameses, who was the oppressor of Israel, we do not know, but the character of the times and the revolutions that contributed to the enslaving of Israel are well depicted in the history of the XIXth dynasty. Rameses I and his son Seti I reigned together as the first kings of the new dynasty, and it was not long before that Seti succeeded to the sole kingship, then there began the new regime in earnest. The first three kings vainly endeavoured to expel the Hittite invader, and although Rameses II compelled the Canaanitish cities to acknowledge the suzerainty of Egypt, he was glad, twenty years after, to conclude a treaty of peace on equal terms with "the great king of the Hittites". These enemies on the frontier made the Israelites in Goshen a source of possible danger to the Egyptians. In the Central Saloon is a wooden statue of Seti I (No. 854), and Nos. 855, 884, and Bay 18, No. 1375, and Bay 13, No. 1189, contain portions of monuments erected by this king.

One inscription tells us that "a moment of the struggle of men is dearer to him than a day of pleasure; he slays them with one stroke, and spares none among them". Josephus tells that it was foretold to Seti I that a child would be born to the Israelites, who, if he were reared, would bring the Egyptian dominion low. If there is truth in this story, we can understand the reason perhaps which prompted the order for the massacre of the Hebrew boys. Seti, in accordance with the custom of the time, married a granddaughter of Khuenaten, which linked him with the old dynasty, and gave his eldest Son, Rameses II, greater chances of being respected and honoured than he himself could expect to be. This marriage also, in the person of Rameses II, succeeded in uniting the claims of the two great rival houses. Rameses was only ten or twelve years of age when he joined his father on the throne, and the sculpture and inscriptions constantly represent him as sharing the administration of the affairs of state. The great historical monument at Abydos records the induction of the young prince; "I was solemnly inducted as the eldest son unto the dignity of heir to the throne on the chair of the earth god Set".

Rameses II was the father of 3 sons and 51 daughters, he married many wives, some of them being near relatives. Rameses II is famous as a great builder, and the demand that his buildings made for labour, together with the need for constructing defensive works, caused great pressure to be put upon captives and aliens who laboured in the making of brick, and the building of cities. When we understand the details of Egyptian architecture, the great demand for bricks becomes understandable. Had the buildings and cities been built upon the ground, the next overflow of the Nile would have destroyed them; the yearly inundation made it necessary that the buildings should be erected upon raised foundations of brickwork. The bricks were of two sorts; those made of alluvial mud of the Nile, and those of the firmer clay. The Israelites labouring in Goshen were limited to the Nile mud, and "straw" was absolutely essential to make this into bricks.

Several monuments of Rameses the Great may be seen in this gallery, the gigantic proportions of them indicating a very high pitch of engineering skill on the part of those who conceived, executed, and erected them.

Israel's exodus from Egypt makes Egyptian archaeology from that point less interesting, but before we consider the memorials of the Assyrians, we must give one more monument our careful attention.

The Egyptian Gallery. The Rosetta Stone. pp. 70-73

A key is not to be valued by the amount of metal that enters into its composition, but rather by the access that it gives to the possessor of it.

The Rosetta Stone contains an inscription concerning the birthday celebrations of Ptolemy, and of itself possesses an interest that is neither startling nor of immeasurable value, but when we realize that this stone provided the key to unlock the Egyptian hieroglyphic inscriptions, and makes them speak again after millenniums of silence, then its value will become apparent.

The Rosetta Stone is an irregularly shaped slab of black basalt. Some of the lines of the inscription are lost. The inscription is in two languages, Egyptian and Greek: the writing of the Egyptian, however, is in two different sets of characters; the first is in the hieroglyphic character, the old picture writing which was used in state and ceremonial documents and inscriptions; the second is in the abbreviated and modified form that was in use in the time of the Ptolemies. The inscription is therefore threefold so far as its characters are concerned. The Greek was translated soon after gratitude of some priests of Alexandria, or the neighbourhood, towards Ptolemy Ephiphanes. While it was comparatively easy to translate the Greek inscription, the Egyptian remained a mystery for some years. We cannot attempt to give a history of the labours that resulted in a decipherment of the Egyptian, but will content ourselves with summarizing.

In the illustration given on page 72 it will be seen that a series of characters are enclosed within a long oval form called a cartouche, it was suspected that the signs thus enclosed were the Royal names. The Royal name in the Greek inscription of the Rosetta Stone is Ptolemaios. Another monument had been discovered at Philœ which was written in Egyptian and Greek; in this, two Royal names occur, Ptolemy and Kleopatra. This gave an opportunity of testing the question of the cartouche, and it was found that the characters were almost identical in both Stones. The next step was to compare the cartouches of both names, testing for similar characters.

LION in Coptic - LABO - L
EAGLE - - - AHOM - A HAND - - - T O T - T

Coptic Fem: art: distinguished by T

In the above illustration the reader can follow every letter in the Egyptian by the aid of the figures; thus in Kleopatra, K is a right-angle triangle, figured No. 1 in each case, L is represented by a lion, figured No. 2, and so on.

Let us now compare the two. In both cartouches there appears a square, No. 5 in Kleopatra and No. 1 in Ptolemy, in both Greek names this is the letter P, so one sign in Egyptian has now been verified; No. 2 in Kleopatra should therefore stand for L. what is the sign for L in Ptolemy? No. 4 is its position, and again, the sign is verified—a lion representing L in both cartouches. We will not attempt to trace the whole series, the reader who attempts a complete comparison will find that some signs do not agree; as in English, so it was discovered in Egyptian that one sound could be represented by more than one sign, but be careful collation and comparison the sound value of every sign was established.

The question which arose in the mind of those who attempted the decipherment of these Egyptian characters was, Are they letters of an alphabet, or do they represent ideas? Champollion, a Frenchman, was convinced that that Coptic language would throw a light upon the ancient Egyptian. It is common knowledge that the Hebrew alphabet is connected with some kind of pictorial representation, thus the equivalent to A, B, G, D are Aleph, Beth, Gimel, Daleth. Now while the English names A, B, G, D have no meaning other than the names of these letters, the Hebrew names have a meaning apart from the letters, Aleph meaning an ox, Beth a house, Gimel a camel, and Daleth a door; the pictorial representation of the ox or the house was used to indicate the opening sound of the word. Champollion's practically inspired idea of the relation between Coptic and ancient Egyptian led the way through this difficult subject to the elaboration of both alphabet and grammar. The Coptic name for lion is labo, and the value if the sign of a lion is found to be that of its first letter L (see No. 2 in Kleopatra, and No. 4 in Ptolemaios). The Coptic word for eagle was Ahom, and in the Hieroglyphics an eagle stand for A, which is No. 9 in the cartouche of Kleopatra. Hand is Tot and stand for T in Kleopatra; the letter T in Ptolemy is, however, another shape—that of a semi-circle. This sign will be found in the cartouche of Kleopatra (No. 10), and it was finally discovered that there were two signs for the sound T, and that the semicircle which came at the end of the titles of queens, princesses, and goddesses was the feminine article.

We cannot go further in this interesting subject without embarking on a more detailed explanation of the Egyptian language and characters. Sufficient, however, has been shown we believe to justify the value that is set upon the Rosetta Stone, and to call forth the thanksgiving of believers for the Providence that is thereby manifested by its preservation and discovery.

pp. 103-106

Following the plan which was given in the series "Introductory" (Volume IV. & V., pages 16-18), we pass from the antiquities of the Egyptians to those of a no less interesting and important people, the Assyrians, and enter the Assyrian Transept. The Assyrians were a Semitic people, speaking a language closely allied to Hebrew. Maspero says of them:--

> "The Assyrians were without contradiction one of the most highly endowed races of further Asia. They had less originality than the Chaldeans, their masters in civilization, but they had more tenacity and energy. They possessed in the highest degree the military qualities of physical strength, activity, decision, coolness and bravery that could not be > shaken. . . . Great vices veiled these virtues. They were a bloody people, full of violence and of falsehoods, sensual, haughty to excess, crafty and perfidious through contempt of their foes. Few nations have abused more insolently the rights of the strongest. . . . In spite of the éclat, and the refinement of their external civilization, they always remained barbarians."

As to the religion of the Assyrians, it was borrowed from that of Babylonia. While the Babylonian supreme god, Bel Merodach, is "the merciful one", and is accompanied by Beltis, "the lady", the Assyrian supreme god, Assur, is "a man of war". Assur was the state deified. It was the war-like state epitomized and worshipped. The Babylonians were a nation of agriculturists, scribes, and merchants. The Assyrians were a military power. In each case their gods reflected their inmost selves. Professor Sayce, speaking of the temple at Balawât, near Nineveh, says:--

> "The mercy-seat had the form of a coffer, or ark, in which two written tables of stone were placed. In front of it stood the altar approached by steps. In the court was a 'sea', or large basin of water, which like that of Solomon was, in one case at all events, supported on bulls of bronze."

Here we can clearly see the Semitic influence that came in and to a large extent overlaid the older Sumerian religion. The Assyrians had daily sacrifices, provided partly by voluntary gifts (called karbanni, the Hebrew korban), and partly by "tithes".

As well as the numerous festivals of the gods there was a sabathe, or "sabbath". On these days various kinds of work were forbidden, food was not cooked, and medicine was not to be taken. It was called "A day of rest for the heart". As we proceed with our examination of the Assyrian antiquities we shall find numerous Sidelights on the Scriptures that will, we believe, be both profitable and interesting.

On the eastern side of this transept are monuments from the palace of Sargon, the founder of the last dynasty, B.C. 722-705. In Isaiah xx. 1 we read of Sargon the King of Assyria, but no other record of the name of Sargon had been discovered up to a few years ago. Not only unfriendly critics, but earnest Biblical expositors have been found using all manner of subterfuges to find a place and a period for this Sargon. Even the Jews themselves had overlaid the fact of history with their fancies, and all that Jerome could learn from them was that Sargon had seven names, and that he was one of the Assyrian monarchs mentioned elsewhere in the Scriptures.

For over twenty centuries the only known reference to Sargon was found in the prophecy of Isaiah. Had a hostile critic chosen to affirm that the name of Sargon was entirely imaginary, it would until recently have been difficult to refute him. We may now look upon the portrait of this king and recognize, as we do so, the supreme accuracy of the Word of God towering above the assaults of its enemies and the weakness of its friends. Sargon conferring with his officials is seen on the slabs numbered 824 and 825. The monuments which, however, dominate this section of the museum are the colossal human headed bulls, placed as they originally stood at the entrance of a chamber. These figures were discovered at Khorsabad.

> "I have finished the gateways with genii, with stone colossi, which, like the beings they represent, overwhelms (with fear) the heart of the wicked."

Not only were these bulls called genii, but also they were given the name kirubi, this name is identical with the Hebrew word for cherub. There is, further, a connection between these Assyrian and Hebrew words and the Greek word for griffin, the body of which was that of a lion, while the head and wings were those of an eagle. On the western side of the transept will be seen a pair of colossal human-headed winged lions; here we have therefore in the Assyrian kirubi the man, the lion, and the ox with the wings, while the Greek gryphus supplies the head of the eagle. Can anyone think that the cherubim that played so important a part at the east of Eden have not lived in the memory of Adam's sons, still retaining something of their form and import though partially buried beneath a deal of incantations and superstitions. We have already drawn attention to the Egyptian preservation of the memory of the cherubim when dealing with the Canopic Jars on page 93, Volume VII. The human-headed lions were taken from the palace of Ashur-nasir-pal, King of Assyria B.C. 885-860.

On the Eastern side is another inscription which contains a name too important to miss, but whose monuments will be considered more fully later on in our series, that name is Sennacherib. There are slabs from similar colossal bulls which contain the accounts of Sennacherib's campaign against Judea; these are numbered 817, 819, 821, and 823. They were obtained from Nineveh.

On the western side (No. 865), among other monuments, is a slab with sculptured representation of an eagle-headed winged figure performing the ceremony of fertilizing the date palm. There is little doubt in the minds of those who have studied the subject but that this ceremony perpetuates something more than merely fertilizing of date-palms. The way in which the trees are conventionally shown suggests a grove of trees, and these "groves" (literally, "the Asherah") were the occasion of Israel's defection, idolatry and banishment. Appendix 42 of The Companion Bible explains the Asherah, giving all the references in the Scriptures, and showing how the human mind "given up" (Rom. i.) sank to the most abject slavery to the flesh. Originally a memorial of "the tree of life", and thereby connected with the kirubi, it became perverted into an instrument for binding and binding the sons of men with the most awful practices sanctioned by "religion". The book of Revelation warns of the re-appearance of something similar in the last days.

The Nimroud Central Saloon.—The Black Obelisk.
pp. 137-139

The next section of the Museum that is upon our programme is named The Nimroud Gallery, and contains slabs depicting hunting, battle scenes, and mythological subjects, together with the figure of the Assyrian King Ashur-nasir-pal, and table cases of domestic, agricultural and military articles. While much of interest may cause the visitor to linger, there is not much of peculiar Biblical interest to record.

Passing into the Nimroud Central Saloon we notice a black basalt seated figure of Shalmaneser II, found on the site of the City of Ashur, the most ancient capital of Assyria. The annals of this king become of great interest by reason of the introduction in his inscriptions of the names of Bible kings.

A black alabaster monolith stands near the center of the Saloon, and is commonly known as the Black Obelisk. It is four-sided, and each side is divided into four sections, which represent the offerings of tribute that were brought to him by his vanquished enemies. The inscription that runs round the second series of figures reads:--

> "The tribute of JEHU, THE SON OF OMRI, silver, gold, a golden cup, golden vases, golden buckets, lead, a stuff for the hand of the king, and sceptres, I received."

In the text that runs round the four sides of the obelisk, mention is made of another king. In the eighteehth year of the reign of Shalmaneser II he tells us that he captured 1121 chariots and 470 battle horses and the whole camp of "Hazzel, King of Damascus". The Scriptures bring together as contemporary monarchs Hazael of Damascus and Jehu of Israel, and Elijah was instructed to anoint both these kings.

Now, on this obelisk, in the fourteenth year of Shalmaneser, Benhadad is spoken of as reigning at Damascus. In Shalmaneser's eighteenth year, we find Hazael has succeeded him, and in this same year Jehu is mentioned for the first time. It may be asked, Why did Jehu give tribute to the Assyrian King? No record is made of the Assyrian invading Jehu's territory, and therefore we seek an explanation elsewhere. In II Kings x. 31, 32 we read:--

> "But Jehu took no heed to walk in the law of the Lord God of Israel with all his heart: for he departed not from the sins of Jeroboam, which made Israel to sin. In those days the Lord began to cut Israel short: and Hazael smote them in all the coasts of Israel."

Jehu evidently saw an opportunity of obtaining relief from this enemy, he offered tribute to the Assyrian king, trusting in the power of his gold and the chariots of the Assyrian rather than in the God of Israel.

There is also in this saloon a stele of Shalmaneser II which records that in his sixth year the Assyrian king attacked the King of Hamath, together with his allies; among these allies is found "Ahab of the land of Israel".

There are also a small group of wall sculptures (Nos. 64-67). One of them speaks of MENAHEM, King of Israel, as paying tribute to Tiglath-Pileser III. This Tiglath-Pileser is the "Pul" of II Kings xv. 19. In I Chron. v. 26 both names occur; the word "and" which joins the two names should be rendered "even". Before the monumental evidence was so complete as it is to-day the two names of this king caused a great deal of controversy; the facts that have now been ascertained show that originally this king was Pul of Babylon, who afterwards became Tiglath-Pileser III, King of Assyria. Once again the highest scholarship and most painstaking research but present the Bible reader with that which he already learned without effort from the pages of Scripture.

Nos. 69 and 70 are two statues of the god Nebo, mention of which is found in the Scriptures dealing with the period.

The Assyrian Saloon.—Sennacherib and Shalmaneser. pp. 169-171

The most important sculpture in this Saloon from the biblical standpoint is that numbered 28, which bears this inscription:--

> "Senncherib, King of hosts, King of Assyria, sat upon his throne of state, and the spoil of the city of Lachish passed before him."

Hezekiah, King of Judah, "rebelled against the King of Assyria and served him not" (II Kings xviii. 7). Upon the approach of the Assyrian, Hezekiah, hearing of the awful devastation that Sennacherib left behind him to mark his victorious career, sent to the King while he was yet at Lachish, saying, "I have offended: return from me: that which thou puttest on me I will bear" (II Kings xviii. 14). The demands of Sennacherib were heavy and necessitated even the stripping of the Temple of its gold and silver to make up the indemnity.

Sennacherib in his annals says:--

> "As for Hazagian (Hezekiah), fear of my lordship struck him, and the Urbu and his chosen soldiers which he had brought in for the defence of Ursalimme (Jerusalem), the city of his Kingdom, and had as guards (?), with thirty talents of gold, 800 talents of silver, precious (stones), guhli, dag-gassi, great carbuncles (?), couches of ivory, elephant skin, elephant-tooth, ebony (?), urkavimm wood, all sorts of things, and his daughters, the women of his palace, male singers, (and) female singers, he (or I) cause to be brought after me to the midst of Ninna (Nineveh), the city of my dominions, and he sent his messenger to present the gift and pay homage" (Dr. Pinches' The Old Testament pp. 373-376).

Naturally nothing is recorded by Sennacherib of the destruction of his host by the angel of the Lord, but it is significant to find that although he recounts with horrible details the taking of other cities, we find him receiving the tribute from Hezekiah not at Jerusalem but at Lachish, and it is evident that he covers his severe defeat by skilfully avoiding the usual details.

There are one or two items of interest on the slab (No. 28) that we would point out (the elevated throne of the King, with its carving and embroidery, and its footstool) as worthy of notice. Before Sennacherib are brought the captives, who kneel humbly before him. What they may expect is only too graphically presented, for two men are being put to death before the very eyes of the King, a mother is seen kissing a baby as she drives in a cart; does this mean "good-bye"? The way in which the history of Sennacherib comes into the prophecy of Isaiah shows that Sennacherib is a foreshadowing of the yet future and final enemy of the Jews—Antichrist; who, however, like his cruel type, will be "broken without hand".

We now pass round the gallery. The bulk of the sculptures consists of a long series of slabs representing the Lion hunts, and the hunting of other animals by Ashur-bani-pal, King of Assyria.

Descending the stairway into the basement, we find another series of sculptural slabs where the various methods employed in the warfare of the period are depicted. In a case at the end of the room are bronze bands of the gates of the temple built at Tell-Balawat, and record the conquest of Shalmaneser II. Carchemish, Ararat, Tyre and Sidon are mentioned, and Shalmaneser depicts his penetration to the source of the Tigris and the ceremonies that were performed there. The records pictured upon these gates supplement those of the "Black Obelisk" which we have already considered. Dr. Pinches, when reading a paper before the Biblical Archaeological Society, said that each bronze band measuring eight feet in length contained at least half as many representations as are found in the whole Nimroud Gallery of the British Museum. There is a great deal of detail in the representations, and by carefully observing all that is depicted a most accurate description is obtained of the methods adopted in besieging a city, the engines, battering rams and weapons used, the camp, the commissariat, the pontoons that cross the rivers are all clearly shown. There is, as usual, no compunction in leaving a lasting record of the great cruelty with which their unhappy captives were treated. In order that he may have the name of a "great conqueror" Shalmaneser boasts that he burned one hundred towns in one expedition. Among the titles assumed by this King is "the hope of the world"!

How blessed to turn away from such exhibitions of human enmity to Him who is indeed and in the fullest sense THE HOPE of the world, and the Prince of the kings of the earth.

The Hope and the Prize.

"Not already perfected" (Phil. iii. 12). pp. 23-26

To attain unto the out-resurrection, that which is out from among the dead, was the apostle's earnest desire; that he had not, at the time of writing Phil. iii., reached the position that would mean he was certain of attaining to it is clearly indicated by the words already considered, "if by any means I might attain", of verse 11, and the added statement of verses 12 and 13 now to be considered.

The fact that the apostle reiterates his uncertainty of attainment, and that he elsewhere is so positive with regard to the believer's hope, makes it clear that the out-resurrection is a prize to be won, and not simply a matter of free and sovereign grace.

> "If by any means I might attain unto the out-resurrection that which is out from among the dead. Not that I have already obtained (i.e. obtained the prize. Compare I Cor. ix. 24, 'receiveth'), or already been perfected; but I pursue if indeed I may lay hold on that for which also I was laid hold of by Christ. Brethren, I count not myself to have laid hold of (it); but one thing – forgetting the things behind and stretching forth to the things before, according to a mark I pursue towards the prize of the high vocation of God in Christ Jesus" (Phil. iii. 11-14).

The apostle seems to desire to make it plain that the race was still in progress, the prize still unwon, and so he says, "not that I have already obtained, or already have been perfected". It would seem that to have been perfected, would have placed the apostle in a position to have obtained, but seeing that he had not been perfected, he still had to run the race with patience. The out-resurrection and the prize of the high vocation were not to be attained or obtained without labour.

The believer, like his Lord, is perfected through sufferings. Christ Himself is the great example, He is the author and PERFECTER of faith, and in that capacity is represented as enduring the cross and despising the shame, for the joy set before Him. Though a Son, yet He learned obedience by the things which He suffered, and was thereby perfected. The apostle desired this perfecting; hence, in the verse preceding his reference to the out-resurrection, he gives as qualifications for attaining unto it, fellowship in Christ's sufferings and conformity to His death*. The perfecting work of "temptation" is shown by James, for in i. 2-4 he writes:--

> "My brethren, count it all joy when ye fall into divers temptations; knowing this, that the trying of your faith worketh patience, but let patience have its perfect work, that ye may be perfect and entire, wanting nothing."

The same writer goes on to show the perfecting of faith in the case of Abraham when he was tried (ii. 22).

The Thessalonians gave such evidence of "the work of faith" (i. 3), that the apostle Paul, who would not be easily satisfied in such matters, said that he had "no need to speak anything", yet in chapter iii., even after he had received good tidings of their faith, and had been comforted by their faith, he still desired to see them that he might perfect that which was lacking in their faith. There seems on every hand this aspect of truth, and it is this special phase that permeates the teaching of the Epistle to the Philippians. We have before pointed out that fundamental doctrine is not the feature of that epistle; the apostle is dealing with the things that accompany salvation; he reminds them that it had been graciously given them not only to believe, but to suffer. The offering of Christ is not set forth as the great redemption, but as the great example, sin and the forgiveness of sin are not doctrines that the theme of Philippians demands; the subject of sin and redemption must be settled before the teaching of Philippians can be appreciated. In every dispensation there seem to have been those who "have gone on unto perfection", but they have been a minority. Joshua and Caleb are examples; these two men were the only adults who crossed both the Red Sea and the Jordan, the others, including Moses and Aaron, though redeemed, never entered the land of promise. The Sermon on the mount has this special teaching in view, for after introducing a series of beatitudes that call for a high order of faith (Matt. v. 1-12), and a character that can be likened to salt and light (13-16), the Lord, by a six-fold emphasis, "Ye have heard", "but I, I say unto you", teaches a deeper spirituality than was possible under the law, summing up the whole by the words, "Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect". These words are not "the laws of the kingdom", although they anticipate its spirit.

In the kingdom that is coming there will be no room for such words as, "Blessed are ye when men shall revile you and persecute you", or "Whosoever shall smite thee on the right cheek, turn to him the other also". These counsels are very pertinent, however, to the time when the wilderness has still to be traveled and the promised land is still unentered. Rightly understood, the Sermon on the Mount is to the believers of the kingdom dispensation what Philippians is to the dispensation of the mystery. Suffering, meekness, yieldingness ("moderation", Phil. iv. 5), the mind of Christ, conformity to His death, these the elements that go towards "perfecting". To the "babes", to those who "walked as men", to those who at Corinth were "as carnal" and not "as spiritual" the apostle could not speak of deep and advanced truth; among them that were perfect, however, he did speak of "the wisdom of God in a mystery, which God had ordained before the ages unto their glory".

That the teaching should find opponents among those who should be its exponents is no proof that it is not scriptural. Those who may feel the call of the Word to venture on this pathway do so, indeed, with fear and trembling, they least of all say anything concerning their own attainments, and however much those who miss their meaning may seek to destroy their witness or misrepresent their teaching, they must persevere in their, oft-times, lonely path. One thing is certain, and that is, that those who take their place with the lowly apostle will never be found saying other than "not as though I were already perfected". When we have in deed as well as in word "counted all things loss", when it is true of us that "Christ shall be magnified in our bodies whether by life or by death", then, though we shall still have to say, "Not as though I had already attained, neither were already perfected", we may add, BUT I PURSUE.

"But I Pursue" (Phil. iii. 12).
pp. 57-59

The word "perfect" is a cognate of telos, which means the "end". The perfect one has reached the goal. Therefore, the apostle, when he said that he was not already perfect, indicated that his course had not yet been finished. To the runner there are two lines of action, either to lay aside everything that would hinder and run for the prize, or to allow other things to take a share of his energies and thoughts, and so hinder his progress.

There are many things that a believer may "feel free" to do. It is not our intention to give a list of the many indulgences that we all make, alas, to our fleshly natures, but to earnestly point out that they spoil our prospect for the prize. Shall we each one take that provision for the flesh that we make week by week, and place such conduct over against Paul's buffeting of his body, his desire for conformity to the Lord's death, his crucifixion to the world and the flesh. Such comparisons will humble us, and make us feel that indeed we are far, very far from perfection. What shall be our attitude? Shall we, like Lot's wife, "look back"? Shall we, like Israel, "turn back to Egypt"? or shall we, like the apostle, "pursue"? To say that we will follow the apostle's example will be undertaking a difficult task, he ploughed a lone furrow, he indeed "laid aside every weight", his most treasured possessions and privileges he estimated as refuse, to him the world and its ways had passed away; the things that were behind he had forgotten; he voluntary took up a cross and denied himself; he sought the mind that was in Christ, Who gave up all.

There are some who appear to shield themselves behind the fact that we are "free", that we are not "under law", that "all is of grace", such are likely soon to drop out from the running, and there is a solemn word that faithfulness will not allow us to pass over, and that is, that however longsuffering the Lord may be to the sinner in his sin, He does not allow the believer continually to fall out and restart with regard to the prize. We shall have to consider the teaching of other Scriptures to see this important and solemn lesson. Take the case of Israel on the verge of the land of promise. The faithful witnesses, Caleb and Joshua, were threatened by the Israelites with stoning, and the Lord said, "I will smite them with the pestilence, and disinherit them". Moses prayed for them, "and the Lord said, I have pardoned according to thy word". Yet the Lord said of them, "surely they shall not see the land which I sware unto their fathers". Let it be noticed that the pardoning of their sin did not give Israel another opportunity so far as the land was concerned. On the morrow Israel rose up early and said:--

> "Lo, we be here, and will go up unto the place which the Lord hath promised; for we have sinned. . . . they presumed to go up. . . . then the Amalekites came down. . . . and smote them" (Numb. xiv.).

Take now the case of Moses himself, because he spoke unadvisedly with his lips and sanctified not the Lord in connection with the giving of water, even Moses was prevented from entering the land. Listen how he pleads:--

> "I pray Thee, let me go over, and see the good land that is beyond Jordan, that goodly mountain, and Lebanon. But the Lord was wroth with me for your sakes, and would not hear me, and the Lord said unto me, let it suffice thee, SPEAK NO MORE UNTO ME OF THIS MATTER" (Deut. iii. 25, 26).

Esau is put before us in the epistle to the Hebrews as a typical example, having despised his birthright and having sold it for a mess of pottage, he had no opportunity of undoing his wrong or of regaining his lost birthright. His case is used as a warning to the Hebrews, as is the case of Israel's failure, to show them that they who "draw back", must suffer loss, and that there is, as in the cases of both Moses and Esau, no further opportunity. When once we grasp this solemn lesson we shall perceive the true import of that much abused passage, Heb. vi. So long as we believe the epistle to be dealing with redemption from sin, and the salvation of the sinner, so long shall we stumble over the words of Hebrews vi. In the light of the examples already considered Heb. vi. is clear and plain; the goal in mind is exhibited in the first verse, "let us go on unto perfection". This implies and indeed necessitates that those to whom the apostle spoke were saved ones; their fault was that they had become "dull of hearing". Like the apostle in Phil. iii. who forgot the things behind, these believers were urged to leave the word of the beginning of Christ, and to go on unto perfection. He then utters the solemn words that have caused so much anxious thought:--

> "For it is impossible for those ONCE having been enlightened, and having tested of the heavenly gift, and having become partakers of the Holy Spirit, and having tested of the good word of God and the powers of the coming age, and having fallen away, to renew AGAIN unto repentance".

The two words once and again take us back to the sad experiences of the three examples already quoted. The apostle in Heb. vi. applies the teaching and show us of what he speaks when, at verse 9, he turns to the believers, and tells them that he is looking for "the better things, even those connected with salvation" (not salvation itself). He then speaks of their service, and says that God will not forget it; he earnestly desires them to endure to the end. Why?

> "In order that you may not become dull (same word v. 11, "Gk. nothros"), but imitators (Phil. iii. 17) of these who through faith and long endurance are inheriting the promises."

The example of Abraham follows (but not the example of the one who believed God and it was counted to him for righteousness without works), but the example of him who having been told by the Lord to walk before Him and "be perfect", did eventually arrive at the point where, willing to offer up even Isaac his beloved son, he fulfilled (as James tells us) the early scripture of Gen. xv., and "obtained the promise".

These things must be duly weighed and considered when contemplating the apostle's statement and attitude expressed in the words, "But I pursue". Twice in verses 12 and 14 Paul says he "pursues"; what he pursued and what it involved we must consider in a separate paper.

"One Thing" (Phil. iii. 12, 13). pp. 87-89

In our last article we were considering the apostle's words, "but I pursue", and if we take note of the passage and context where he again uses these words, we shall obtain light upon the section we have to study together in this article. The words occur again in verse 14, rendered in the A.V. and R.V., "I press". In verse 14 the prize is that which is in mind, in verse 12 it is to lay hold upon that for which he was laid hold upon by Christ Jesus to which he presses.

By viewing these two statements together we shall be led to conclude, seeing that but one thing is said to be pursued, that the object for which the apostle had been laid hold upon by Christ Jesus was the prize of the high calling.

We must notice at the outset that the passage under consideration is possible of a rather different meaning. While the A.V. has no marginal note, the R.V. margin gives as an alternative, "apprehend, seeing that I also was apprehended". Rotherham renders the passage, "if you may even lay hold of that for which I have also been laid hold of by Christ Jesus", and gives as a footnote "lay hold inasmuch as". The words that cause the uncertainty occur in Rom. v. 12 (A.V. margin) "in whom", while the R.V. gives "for that" with no marginal alternative. They are in Greek eph hõ.

The meaning of the apostle therefore is either that he desired to lay hold of something FOR WHICH Christ had laid hold upon him, or he desired to lay hold on something, SEEING THAT Christ had laid hold on him. In the first case he desired to attain to the full, the standard and the blessing for which Christ had chosen him; in the second, he desired to attain to the highest because Christ had so graciously and so wonderfully laid hold upon him.

After all, the practical results of either interpretation would be the same. If the Lord has chosen and saved me, set my feet in the way, and bidden me run for the prize that He has chosen me to obtain, or if out of gratitude and a desire to magnify His grace I do my utmost to attain to the prize, seeing that He has so graciously, in the first place, laid hold upon me, I shall use all diligence so to run that I may obtain.

In the next verse the apostle continues, "Brethren, I myself do not reckon yet to have laid hold". The fact that Christ had laid hold upon him for this prize, or that he desired to go on because Christ had laid hold upon him, did not cause Paul to slacken or to assume an unspiritual certainty. "One thing" summarized the apostle's attitude and aim:--

> "The things that are behind forgetting, on the one hand, and on the other hand stretching out the things that are before, according to a mark I pursue for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus."

We have referred the reader many times to the epistle to the Hebrews as illustrating the principle, though not dealing with the same prize that obtains in Phil. iii., and once again we draw attention to that epistle in order that we may see a parallel and an illustration.

In Heb. v. 8-12, and vi. 1 the apostle writes:--

> "Though He was a Son, yet learned He obedience by the things which He suffered; and having perfected, He became unto all that obey Him the author of aionian salvation; named of God a high priest after the order of Melchisedec, of whom we have many things to say and hard of interpretation, seeing ye are becomes dull of hearing; for when by reason of the time ye ought to be teachers, ye have need again that some one teach you what are the elements of the beginning of the oracles of God. . . . Wherefore leaving the word of the beginning of Christ, let us go on unto perfection."

There we have a parallel with the "forgetting" and the "stretching out to" of Phil. iii.

The historical illustration supplied by Hebrews is found in chapters iii. and iv. The failure of Israel in the wilderness is largely connected with their fickleness of memory. While it could have been written of them after the mighty redemption from Egypt, "they soon forgat His works", we find that they "remembered the fish which they did eat in Egypt freely; the cucumbers, and the melons, and the leeks, and the onions, and the garlic" (Num. xi. 5), and accordingly after the spies had made their report, and after they had seen the bunch of grapes from Eschol (note the contrast to fruits of Egypt) "they said one to another, Let us make a Captain, and let us return into Egypt". It is significant that the word "Captain" in the LXX is the same as that name of Christ in Hebrews, and the contrast is vitally connected with the two attitudes of mind expressed in "leaving" and "going on unto", "forgetting" and "stretching out to". The Israelites' failure to "leave" and "go on" was used by the apostle to impress his teaching in the epistle to the Hebrews, and it will have the same effect in the epistle to the Philippians.

In Luke ix. 61, 62 we read:--

> "And another also said, I will follow Thee Lord, but first suffer me to bid farewell to them that are at my house, but Jesus said unto him, No man, having put his hand to the plough, and looking back, is well disposed for the kingdom of God."

The case of Lot's wife, saved indeed from the destruction that came upon Sodom, yet turned into a pillar of salt outside simply for looking back is also another solemn illustration.

We shall all, doubtless, have to supply in particular what constitute "the things behind", and what would be to one a hindering "weight" may have no power on another. The parable of the Sower, in that section which speaks of the thorny ground, seems to give an indication of some of the "things that are behind" that hinder "perfection".

> "And that which fell among the thorns, these are they that have heard, and as they go on their way they are choked with the cares and riches and pleasures of this life, and bring no fruit to perfection" (Luke viii. 14).

It therefore appears that without singleness of purpose failure is practically certain. It demands a high spiritual standard to be able to say the "one thing" of this chapter, yet without it all else seems of little worth.

"The Mark" (Phil. iii. 14). pp. 116-119

Taking the A.V. rendering as it stands, verse 14 makes the apostle state that he pressed "toward the mark". A reference to the original, however, will show that this rendering is not a clear statement of the apostle's intention. He does not say, "I press toward the mark"; what he does say is, "according to a mark, I press toward the prize". It is the prize toward which he presses, and it is the mark according to which he runs. The mark therefore is not the goal, it is not the object in view, but rather it is the rule and the guide. While the prize is the important thing to keep in view, it is very evident that inattention to the rules of the contest will jeopardize the claim. We will not therefore consider the question of the mark too small for a little careful study.

Skopos, mark, is something at which one looks. The word occurs nowhere else in the N.T., but in its verbal form it occurs six times. In Luke xi. 35 it is, "take heed"; in Rom. xvi. 17, it is, "mark them which cause divisions. . . . and avoid them". In II Cor. iv. 18 it is, "while we look not at the things which are seen", and in Gal. vi. 1 it is, "considering thyself, lest thou also be tempted". In Phil. ii. 4 we find it in the exhortation, "Look not every man on his own things", and in iii. 17, "Brethren, be followers together of me, and mark them which walk so as ye have us for as ensample".

While the references outside the epistle to the Philippians are of service in showing the word is to be understood, the two references from the epistle itself are all we need to explain to us the "mark" according to which the apostle presses on to the prize.

These two references supply us with the positive and the negative meanings of the word, and we shall be equipped for the race only when these two passages are understood and incorporated into our daily life.

Let us consider first The Positive (ii. 4). Immediately the apostle tells the Philippians to "Look not every man on his own things, but every man also on the things of others", he follows with the wondrous example of Christ Himself, "Let this mind be in you which was also in Christ Jesus". In chapter iii. 15 the apostle follows his references to the mark with the words, "Let us therefore, as many as be perfect, be thus minded", and gives a solemn warning concerning those who "mind earthly things". To understand the mark therefore we must understand the teaching which is intended for us in the passages where the mind is mentioned. Phroneõ, to mind, comprehends the operation of the understanding, the will, and the affections. The way the apostle beseeches Eurodias and Syntyche to be of the "same mind" shows that something more than a mental process is intended. Dr. Macknight renders ii. 2, 5 by, "that ye be alike disposed" and "wherefore let this disposition be in you". J. N. D. in his translation suggests, "Let this mind be found amongst you", while Rotherham puts it, "The same thing esteem in yourselves, which also in Christ Jesus (ye esteem)". Perhaps these varied renderings, together with the usages of the word throughout the epistle (which we give), may be sufficient to guide the reader in his approach to this important theme.

Phroneo (to mind) in Philippians.

A	i. 7. Think. (Huper).
B	ii. 2. Joy, same love, one mind.
C	ii. 5. Thus mind. (Touto).	\	The mark to follow.
	iii. 15. Thus minded. (Touto)	/
C	iii. 15. Otherwise minded.	\	The mark to avoid.
	iii. 19. Mind earthly things.	/
B	iv. 1, 2. Joy, same mind.
A	iv. 10. Your "care". Ye were "careful". (Huper).

It will be seen that the central members are directly concerned with the mark. The mind or disposition which the apostle enjoined was to be in line with the disposition of Christ, who, though He was the image of the invisible God, though He was in the form of God, "emptied Himself". Let us not lose the preciousness of this word "emptied Himself" (made Himself of no reputation), for a glory attaches to it paralleled only by that which is connected with His "fulness". While Ephesians and Colossians speak of the glory of "His fulness", Philippians, with the prize in view, dwells upon His voluntary "emptying". As a result of "this mind. . . . that was in Christ Jesus", God hath highly exalted Him. "Wherefore", continues the argument, "work out your own salvation with fear and trembling".

That salvation which is "not of works lest any man should boast" is nevertheless a salvation that may be "worked out", but not worked for. What this working out may mean, II Cor. iv. 17, 18 will explain:--

> "For our light affliction which is but for moment WORKETH OUT for us a far more exceeding aionian weight of glory, while we look (or mark) not the things which we see."

Eph. vi. 13, supplies an atmosphere of conflict:--

> "Wherefore take unto you the whole armour of God, that ye may be able to withstand in the evil day, and having WORKED OUT all, to stand."

The mark according to which the apostle pursued toward the prize, was "the mind that was in Christ Jesus", given in chapter ii. in all the wonder of that humiliation and exaltation, and in chapter iii. in the apostle's endeavour to follow His Lord. He, too, in his degree had emptied himself, all that once he held as gain he counted loss for Christ, and forgetting the things that were behind, he presses, according to a mark, for the prize. "This mind" is very beautifully exhibited in chapter i. 12-15, and is brought into direct contextual relation to the passage which parallels the "out-resurrection", namely, his desire to depart and be with Christ, which is far better.

Let us now consider The Negative (iii. 17-21). "Brethren, become joint imitators of me, and mark those thus walking, according as ye have us for an example. . . . for our citizenship is in heaven".

The negative section is a parenthesis, and occupies verses 18, 19. The apostle is still speaking of the walk. It is not a question of warning against imitating the unsaved; no believer who had attained the degree of sanctity indicated in Phil. iii. would need a warning not to imitate the unsaved. No, these enemies of the Cross of Christ are such by their walk; instead of gaining the prize, their end is loss; instead of suffering loss in this life, their belly is their God, and their mind instead of being like that which was in Christ Jesus is set on earthly things; these are not the true circumcision, they, though saved, have not yet learned to suffer; though redeemed by the precious blood of Christ, they have not yet learned the meaning of the cross*; for such the prize is out of the question; they shall be saved "so as by fire", their works being burned up, and their building destroyed; they fail to "work out" their own salvation.

The meaning we are to attach to the "fear and trembling" with which the salvation is worked out is very apparent from this third chapter. When writing to Timothy in his second epistle the apostle says, "If any one contend in the games, he is not crowned unless he contend lawfully"; the mere eagerness to win the prize is not sufficient, rules must be kept, otherwise the crown will be forfeited. Phil. iii. indicates the flesh and earthly things, all that is opposed to the Cross of Christ, as being disqualifying elements. II Tim. ii. speaks of not being entangled with the affairs of this life if one would be a good soldier of Jesus Christ, while I Cor. ix. 24-27 shows us the apostle buffeting his body, lest after having preached to others, he himself should be disqualified" (a castaway, A.V.).

While the most spiritual believer will confess with "fear and trembling" that he has not "already attained" or that he is not yet "perfected", those who cannot say with the apostle that they count all things loss, that they buffet their bodies, that they do not entangle themselves in the affairs of this life, such can well say that they have not yet started upon this wondrous race at all. Oh that we may seek the mind that was in Christ Jesus, becoming a joint imitator of the apostle, being occupied with one thing, and counting the fellowship of His sufferings and conformity to His death not too high a price to be paid for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus. May we ever keep in view "the mark".

"The Prize of the High Calling" (Phil. iii. 14).
pp. 148-151

We have seen the mark according to which the apostle pursued; we now consider the prize itself that he had in view.

First of all it may help us to remind ourselves of the fact that the doctrine of reward is not confined to one section of the Scriptures, but is as constant and inter-dispensational as is sin and salvation. For example, in Matt. v. 12 the Lord says, "Great is your reward in heaven", to those who were persecuted for His sake. In x. 41, 42 He clearly indicates the reward that shall correspond with the act:--

> "He that receiveth a prophet in the name of a prophet shall receive a prophet's reward: and he that receiveth a righteous man in the name of a righteous man shall receive a righteous man's reward, and whosoever shall give to drink unto one of these little ones a cup of cold water only in the name of a disciple, verily I say unto you, he shall in no wise lose his reward."

Turning to the epistles we read in I Cor. iii. 8, "Now he that planteth and he that watereth are one: and every man shall receive his own reward according to his own labour"; and again in verse 14, "If any man's work abide which he hath built thereupon, he shall receive a reward". The next chapter has this in view, where the apostle says in verse 5, ". . . . then shall every man have praise of God". In II Cor. v. 10 we read, "We must all be manifested before the judgment seat (the bema or tribunal) of Christ, that each may receive the things done in the body, whether good or evil". The epistle to the Hebrews urges its readers to endure to the end, saying, "Cast not away therefore your confidence which hath great recompense of reward" (x. 35), and draws attention to Moses who chose "to suffer affliction with the people of God, rather than enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season, esteeming the reproach of Christ greater riches than the treasures of Egypt: for he had respect unto the recompense of the reward" (xi. 25, 26). Some may say, While it is true that there is a reward held out to believers in the Gospels and early Epistles, yet we do not associate rewards with the freeness of the grace of the Epistles of the Mystery.

The epistle to the Colossians in its practical word to those who were members of the One Body addresses among others those who were slaves. To them it is written:-- > "Whatsoever ye do, do it heartily, as to the Lord and not unto men, knowing that of the Lord ye shall receive the reward of the inheritance: for ye serve the Lord Christ" (iii. 23, 24).

Here therefore in the Epistles of the Mystery we have undoubted reference to the fact of a future reward. The second epistle to Timothy, the last epistle written by the apostle Paul, and the companion epistle to Philippians, speaks clearly of the possibility of missing a "crown", and of not only living, but also of "reigning" with Christ; the crown is only won by striving, the reigning by enduring (II Tim. ii. 3-5, 12; iv. 6-8). Here, then, we have "reward" and "crown". Phil. iii. supplies the third, which is the "prize"; this, too, as we have seen, is not attained without giving up much, or without suffering and endurance.

The word rendered prize in Phil. iii. 14 is brabeion, and is derived from brabeus, the judge who presided over the Grecian games and assigned the prizes. From this word is also derived brabeuõ, which means, to preside, rule or act as umpire, and occurs in Col. iii. 15, "Let the peace of God act as umpire (preside) in your hearts". In Col. ii. 18 we read, "Let no man beguile you of your reward"; the word being katabrabeuõ, to defraud or deprive of the prize by so arranging affairs that judgment shall be pronounced against one by the umpire. How this may be accomplished the context of Col. ii. 18 only too plainly shows, but that, for the time, is another question. So far we have just considered the fact of the prize or reward, let us now consider the nature of it.

The apostle tells us that he presses toward the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus. We have already given our reasons in Volume VII pages 9, 10 for retaining the A.V. rendering, "the high calling". This prize is connected with the high calling which, as members of the One Body, we have received of the Lord. Both our hope and prize are related to the calling (see Eph. i. 18; iv. 4; Phil. iii. 14). As we realize our calling we define our hope, and as we practically enter into the fact that the calling is "high" (anõ), and set our minds n things "above" (anõ), not minding things "on the earth", indeed, "mortifying our members which are on the earth", we shall be prepared to run the race for the prize that God has linked with the high calling He has given us in Christ Jesus.

As we have shown in the article dealing with the "out-resurrection", we believe this prize to be an extraordinary privilege. We believe this to be the desire of the apostle when he expressed his choice in the words, "to depart and be with Christ which is far better", far better than living on here, or of falling asleep in Christ as all who believe must do unless living when He comes again. The apostle reached out to the "gain", the "prize" of departing and "being with Christ". There are many true doctrines that are misapplied, and so have been put aside as untrue. This subject is a case in point; tradition in its writings, its hymns, and its preaching has taken the peculiar privilege of the very few, and handed it over to the Church as a whole. Those who studied the Word realized that to teach that all believers who died went straight to glory, was error. The Scripture fact that the dead are really dead, that they have fallen asleep, that they are unconscious until resurrection, is untouched by the subsequent revelation of Philippians; in fact, Philippians confirms the general truth by putting forward the exceptional case of departing and being with Christ as a prize to be won, and in no wise to be considered as the universal hope of the Church. The high calling is the high calling of God, just as the hope of His calling in Eph. i. 18 is the hope of God's calling, for the same One is He who raised Christ from the dead. What an incentive it is to think that we have the possibility of thus adorning the doctrine of God our Saviour. It should help us in our endeavours by His grace to "walk worthy of the calling wherewith we have been called", and without this worthy walk all talk about the prize is empty and valueless.

How the readers of The Berean Expositor view this matter we do not know, but in face of the awful uncircumcision of the flesh, and the poverty of our practical manifestation of His grace, the writer, while penning these articles and expressing in them what he sees to be the truth, feels how very far from the mark his walk must be, and how slender the prospects of ever attaining to such a height as is this prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus.

The apostle has been speaking in Phil. iii. 4-14 in the first person. I, me, mine, are the recurring pronouns, "that I may know Him", "if by any means I might attain", "I press according to a mark toward the prize". Shall we conclude therefore that this peculiar prize so fervently desired by the apostle, and beset with so many difficulties, was for him alone, and that we, the ordinary members of the One Body, are not called upon to run this race? This question we feel is answered in the verses that follow.

The apostle now turns to his readers, and would join them with himself in this great contest, "Let us therefore, as many as be perfect, be thus minded". Dr. Macknight renders this passage as follows, "as many therefore as wish to be perfect, let us think this"; in either case the verb has to be supplied, and "wish to be" has as much right to be inserted as "be". He calls attention to the way in which the Hebrew active verbs express intention even though the thing attempted did not take place. Exod. viii. 18, "and the magician did so (i.e. attempted to do so) with their enchantments, but they could not", Deut. xxviii. 68, "ye shall be sold (i.e. set to sale), and no man shall buy you".

The apostle we believe intends us to understand that he speaks to those who would be perfect, who would together with himself go on unto perfection, and we adopt as the true reading, "as many therefore as would be perfect". What has the apostle to say to such? He says, "let us mind this", he brings us back at once to "the mark", which we saw had connection with "the mind that was in Christ Jesus", and was in direct contrast to those who "mind earthly things", "and if ye are any otherwise minded, even this God will reveal to you". It will be noticed that both the hope and the prize are subjects of revelation, not merely because they are contained in the Scriptures, but that they are taught of God Himself through the Scriptures in a very special manner.

In Eph. i. 17, 18 the apostle prayed that God "may give unto you the spirit of wisdom and REVELATION. . . . that ye may know what is the hope of His calling". The God who gives the calling makes it known; so with the prize. The mind and the mark that are essential for the contest are revealed by God Himself; this does not mean of course that any fresh "revelation" will be given, but it does indicate that each individual is thrown in a special manner upon the teaching of the Lord Himself.

By way of illustrating what we feel this reference to revelation means we draw attention to the case of Abraham as given in Heb. xi. In verse 8 there is a summary of Gen. xii., but in verse 10 there is given something which does not find a place in Genesis, "for he looked for a city which hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God". This city is further spoken of in verse 16, and the fact that it is linked with a heavenly country shows that the New Jerusalem is intended. There is no hint of this in all the passages that speak of Abraham in the O.T. Such doctrines as are to do with sin and salvation, and such prophecies as are of a fundamental character, these are written so plainly that the simplest may understand. There are other lines of truth that are not found upon the surface, and are not discovered by lexicons and concordances; God Himself must reveal them, not that He will give a revelation outside of His written Word, but that the Word itself contains teaching, like the Hope (Eph. i. 18) and the Prize (Phil. iii. 15) that are perceived by those who are initiated into the mysteries of the Word.

The apostle, however, does not leave the subject here, for to many, if not to all of us, such teaching unconnected by other and more practical things might lead us into many harmful vagaries, he therefore brings us back to the practical walk by using the little word plen, rendered "nevertheless". This word is often used when the writer would somewhat abruptly terminate one line of thought, and bring us back to the main issue; for instance, in Phil. i. 18 he comes to the point by saying, "What then, notwithstanding (plen) every way. . . . Christ is preached", and in iv. 14, after having spoken of his independence of all human aid, he immediately adds, "notwithstanding ye have well done, that ye had fellowship with me in my afflictions". So after having spoken of the revelation which God alone could give, the apostle immediately continues, "nevertheless, whereto we have already attained, to the same let us walk" (the rest of the verse is omitted from the best Greek MSS.).

The sense of this passage will be more clear when we have realized the meaning of the word rendered "attained". It is the word translated "prevent" in I Thess. iv. 15, and it means "to come, or do, before another, to be beforehand with, to overtake, outstrip, to come first" (Dr. Bullinger). Construed with epi (Matt. xii. 28; Luke xi. 20) the passage is rendered by Erasmus Schmidt, "the kingdom of God is come to you sooner than you expected". The apostle's argument seems to be something like this, "The line of teaching I have been giving you is indeed high and wonderful; you will have to depend more and more upon the direct revelation of God Himself teaching you through His Word as to the mind, the mark and the prize. Nevertheless, do not be misled into the error of thinking that such independence means carelessness as to your daily walk, the fact is, your walk must be more carefully watched than ever. By entering your name as one who is going to run for this prize, you have professed before your fellow-believers to have indeed advanced beyond the many in your understanding, see to it, I beseech you, that your walk keeps pace with your attainments. Remember, the further you have advanced, the more you have outstripped your brother, the nearer your walk should approach to the perfect example of Christ as given in chapter ii., and to the pattern set by such of His followers as Timothy (ii. 19-22), Epaphroditus (ii. 25-30), or Paul (iii. 4-14): the more you claim to have outstripped others, the more must you manifest that mind of Christ who, though He was rich, yet for our sakes became poor: the more must you imitate Timothy's lack of selfishness; the more must you be willing, like Epaphroditus, to spend and be spent; the more, like Paul, must you count all things loss, that you may have Christ for your gain."

We shall see, in the next paper, one way whereby we may learn how to walk worthy of our calling and run for the prize.

Things that Differ.

The Sufferings of Christ.
pp. 20-23

We have considered together the broad basis of the death of Christ, as broad as the death brought in by Adam; we have seen the narrower scope of the blood of Christ, which is connected with the new covenant and with faith; we have, moreover, seen that the cross of Christ has much to do with the flesh and the world as they pertain to the believer, and to the glory and the crown that awaits the faithful follower. We now consider the references and the message of the sufferings of Christ.

The first reference comes at a most important division in the Gospel of Matthew:--

> "From that time forth began Jesus to shew unto His disciples how that He must go unto Jerusalem and suffer many things of the elders, and chief priests, and scribes, and be killed, and be raised again the third day" (Matt. xvi. 21).

This verse and statement opens the second section of the Gospel of Matthew. In chapter iv. 17 we read, "From that time Jesus began to preach, and to say, Repent: for the kingdom of heaven is at hand". That presentation of the King, and the kingdom had been rejected, and the glory could only be reached through a path of suffering.

It will be seen that the suffering is said to be at the hands of the elders, chief priests, and scribes, and is distinguished from the death in which those sufferings culminated. Both in chapters iv. and xvi. there are references to the temptation by Satan, in each case seeking to turn the Lord aside from His appointed path. In Matt. xvii. 12, the Lord, referring to the treatment that John the Baptist had received at the hand of the scribes said, "Likewise shall also the Son of man suffer of them". In Mark viii. 31 there is an illuminating addition to the words of Matt. xvi. 21, "The Son of man must suffer many things, and be REJECTED of the elders, and of the chief priests, and scribes"; the suffering at the hand of these leaders was to include among other things rejection, and in that lay much of the bitterness.

The same addition is found in Mark ix. 12, "The Son of man must suffer many things, and be SET AT NAUGHT". Luke xvii. 25 also includes a rejection wider than that of the religious leaders, for the Lord there says that "first must He suffer many things, and be rejected of THIS GENERATION". Luke xxii. 15 speaks of the Lord's desire to eat the Passover before He suffered, and immediately looks forward to its fulfillment in the kingdom of God. In Luke xxiv. 25 suffering is linked with glory, and verse 46 speaks of it as necessary to the fulfilling of Scripture. These passages complete the references to the sufferings of Christ as recorded in the Gospels.

The Acts contains two references to the sufferings of the Lord, the one by Peter at the gate of the Temple, the other by Paul at Thessalonica; both go to prove that the suffering of the Lord was prophesied in the O.T., and, taken together with the witness of Matt. xvi.

and Luke xxiv., it would appear that the idea of a suffering Messiah was repudiated and resisted by the people of Israel. Acts iii. 18 contains Peter's words, "But those things, which God before shewed by the mouth of all His prophets, that Christ should suffer, He hath so fulfilled". In the immediately preceding verses Peter enumerates some of "those things", saying:--

> "The God. . . . of our fathers hath glorified His Son Jesus Whom > (1). Ye delivered, and
> (2). denied Him in the presence of Pilate, when > (3). he was determined to let Him go, But > (4). ye denied the Holy one and the just, and > (5). desired a murderer to be granted unto you, and > (6). killed the Prince of Life."

The words of Acts xvii. 2, 3 indicate strong opposition to the idea of a suffering Messiah:--

> "And Paul, as his manner was, went in unto them, and three sabbath days reasoned with them out of the Scriptures, opening and alleging, that Christ must needs have suffered, and risen again from the dead, and that this Jesus whom, said he, I preach unto you, is the Messiah."

The Epistle to the Hebrews contains several references to the sufferings of Christ.

> "The One who was made for a little while lower than the angels we behold, Jesus, because of the suffering of death, crowned with glory and honour" (ii. 9).
> "For it was fitting for Him, for whom are all things, and through whom are all things, in leading many sons to glory, to perfect the Captain of their salvation through sufferings" (ii. 10).
>
> "For that He Himself hath suffered being tempted, He is able to succour them that are tempted" (ii. 18).
>
> "Though being a Son, yet learned He obedience by the things which He suffered; and having been perfected, He became the cause of aionian salvation to all them that obey Him" (v. 8, 9).
>
> "Nor yet that He should offer Himself often. . . . for then must He often have suffered since the overthrow of the world" (ix. 25, 26).
> "Wherefore Jesus also, that He might sanctify the people with His own blood, suffered without the gate" (xiii. 12).

Only one of these occurrences in Hebrews has direct reference to the great offering on Calvary without having an immediate or contextual reference to its connection with glory to follow; that reference being ix. 25, 26, where the "suffering" is answerable to the word "to offer Himself" (verse 25), and "sacrifice of Himself" (verse 26). The other references do not present the great sacrifice for sin so much as they speak of suffering in relation to glory and perfecting. The first reference tells us that while we see not yet the Universal Throne occupied by the Son of God, we see Jesus crowned with glory and honour on account of, or because of, the suffering of death. The next reference (ii. 10), speaks of leading "many sons to glory", not merely leading them (to use the type of iii., iv.) out of Egypt, but into Canaan. Here is the true Joshua (iv. 8 margin).

The experiences of Israel's wilderness journey may be largely summed up in the word "tempted". It is the lot of all who, having been saved, are passing on unto perfection. So Christ Himself passed through the testing fires of temptation, and can succour those who seek to follow Him. In chapter v. 8 we are told the wonderful fact that He "learned obedience" by His sufferings, and as in ii. 10 these sufferings "perfected" Him, constituting Him the "cause" of not merely salvation from sin and death, but that salvation which, participating in the glories of the coming kingdom, is spoken of as "aionian salvation". Again, this is not a salvation granted to faith, but to "all them that obey Him", and by the parallel from verse 8 their obedience was at the price of suffering, and eventuated in their perfecting. The last reference links His sufferings with His reproach, and on to the future day of His glory; outside the city now, but inside the city in that day! These passages will (D.V.) receive fuller exposition in our proposed series on Hebrews, but sufficient is on the surface to show the line of teaching that is associated most with the sufferings of Christ.

There remains for consideration the first epistle of Peter to complete our investigations. Peter's epistle is so interwoven with the theme of suffering, that we must give it an article by itself. We will therefore reserve any further comment upon the general line of teaching on this subject until the first epistle of Peter has been examined.

The Sufferings of Christ (I Peter). pp. 52-56

In our last paper we reviewed the N.T. references to the sufferings of Christ with the exception of those passages which occur in the first epistle of Peter. So intimately connected with the theme of that epistle is the subject of suffering, that to understand the import of the several passages containing the word, necessitates a review of the whole epistle; and vice versa, a careful study of the contexts of each reference to suffering will throw a deal of light upon the book as a whole.

We must first of all consider the literary structure of the epistle as a whole, which we set out as follows:--

The Structure of I Peter as a whole.

A | i. 1, 2. Introduction. The elect dispersion at Pontus, etc.
B | 1. 3-13-. Glory after suffering for a season (oligon).
C | D | i. -13 - ii. 10. The End. Grace at the revelation of Jesus Christ.
E | ii. 11 - iv. 6. Sufferings followed by glory.
C | D | iv. 7-19. The End. Joy at the revelation of Jesus Christ.
E | v. 1-9. Sufferings followed by glory.
B | v. 10, 11. Glory after suffering awhile (oligon).
A | v. 12-14. Conclusion. The elect at Babylon.

The first reference to be considered is I Pet. i. 11, which according to the A.V. reads, "the sufferings of Christ, and the glory that should follow". The R.V. calls attention in the margin to the fact that the word rendered "of" is in the Greek "unto". J. N. Darby translates the passage, “the sufferings which [belonged] to Christ”, and Rotherham renders it, “the sufferings for Christ”. The same Greek word eis is used by Peter in i. 4, “reserved in heaven for you”, and in ii. 14 “sent for punishment”. We can therefore truthfully render the passage with Rotherham, “the sufferings for Christ”. Let us now look at the context. “If need be”, those who had been begotten unto a living hope were in heaviness for a season through manifold temptations, they were passing through the fiery trial of faith, looking forward to the day of Christ’s revelation when they would be found unto praise, honour and glory, this being “the end of their faith”, viz., “the salvation of their souls”.

This salvation must not be confused with salvation from sin. The believer whose salvation in that respect is secure may lose or may save his soul according as he suffers for Christ, or makes friends with the world. Of this particular aspect of salvation the prophets who prophesied have inquired and searched diligently; of what did they prophesy? They prophesied of the sufferings of Christ certainly, but in this instance Peter has another phase of truth in hand, and so he says that they prophesied of the grace that should come unto you. Now this grace might be the sufferings of Christ on our behalf, but the apostle continuing says:--

> “Searching unto what, or what manner of season, the Spirit of Christ which was in them pointed out, testifying before the sufferings FOR Christ and the glories after these; to whom it was revealed that not unto themselves, but unto us they did minister those things, which have now been announced to you by those who have preached the gospel unto you with holy spirit sent down from heaven, which things angels desire to look into. Wherefore having girded up the loins of your mind, being sober, do you hope perfectly for the grace to be brought to you at the revelation of Jesus Christ.”

This unity of theme is clearly seen in the structure of the passage which we set out as follows:--

I Peter i. 3-13.
Glory after suffering for a season.

B	a	3, 4.	The Living hope. Inheritance reserved in heaven for you.
	b	5.	Kept through faith unto salvation in the last time.
	c	6, 7-.	Trial of faith followed by glory.
	d	-7.	At the revelation of Jesus Christ.
	b	8, 9.	Obtaining the end of faith – salvation of souls.
	c	10-12.	Sufferings for Christ followed by glory.
	a	13-.	The perfect hope. Grace brought to you.
	d	-13.	At the revelation of Jesus Christ.

We trust the earnest student will compare each section of this structure and observe how the one theme, the believer’s suffering and corresponding glory, is developed, and founded upon the revelation of Jesus Christ.

The next reference to suffering is found in ii. 19, where the apostle speaks of suffering unjustly for conscience sake towards God. To enforce the needed lesson in patience he reminds his readers of the sufferings of Christ:--

> "If when ye do well, and suffer for it, ye take it patiently, this is acceptable with God; for even hereunto were ye called: because Christ also suffered for us, leaving us an example that ye should follow His steps; Who did no sin, neither was guile found in His mouth: Who when He was reviled, reviled not again; when He suffered, He threatened not, but committed Himself to Him that judgeth righteously."

Again it will be noticed that the "sufferings of Christ" Himself are set before the "sufferer for Christ" as an example to be imitated. None called to follow the example of Christ in His capacity as Sin-bearer, and this reference to suffering must be included among those passages which have in view suffering followed by glory.

In chapter iii. we have a most difficult context to the next references to suffering. In verse 14 the apostle is still found speaking of "suffering for righteousness' sake", and in verse 17, 18 he declares that it is better, if the will of God be so, to suffer for well doing, than for evil doing. Again, as in ii. 21, the apostle refers to the suffering of Christ. This time he speaks of Christ suffering "concerning sins".

It is not possible (neither is it necessary) in this series to turn aside to consider the problem of "the spirits in prison" which verse 19 introduces; sufficient at the moment let it be for us to see the suffering Christ ascend into heaven to the right hand of God, "angels and authorities and powers being made subject unto Him"; this is the point of the apostle's message. Suffering was followed by glory in Christ's case. "Forasmuch then", he continues in chapter iv. 1, "as Christ hath suffered for us in the flesh, arm yourselves likewise with the same mind: for he that hath suffered in the flesh hath done with sins". Note the reading "sins" instead of "sin", which reading is approved by the Numeric New Testament. The question of "sin" was dealt with alone by Christ; "sins", however, have to do with the life we live; and the apostle has this in view, as verses 2 and 3 indicate, and he shows that those who have "armed themselves" with the mind of Christ must expect suffering as a result. The unbelievers think it "strange" that the believer should have done with sins, but the believer is told not to think the fiery trial "strange", but rather to rejoice "inasmuch as ye are partakers of Christ's sufferings (concerning sins); that, when His glory shall be revealed, ye may be glad also with exceeding joy".

Peter speaks of himself as "a witness of the sufferings of Christ, and also a partaker of the glory that shall be revealed", and concludes his epistle by the comforting words of verse 10, "After ye have suffered awhile, make you perfect, stablish, strengthen, settle you".

We have in this review included the passages that speak of the believer's sufferings with those that speak of Christ's sufferings because they are so interwoven. The relation between present suffering and future glory is so plain as to require no argument. If we keep in mind the passages from the rest of the N.T. already considered, the primary teaching of the sufferings of Christ will be established. His death cancelled the death passes through to all the race of Adam. His blood was shed for the redemption, justification and salvation of all who believe in Him. His cross exposed the utter depravity and ruin of the creature and also indicated to the faithful follower the attitude he must take up respecting the flesh and the world. His sufferings, while forming part of His great redemption, also constitute the great example to those who are to be reckoned joint-heirs with Christ by having suffered with Him. His death is the pledge of life, His blood the pledge of salvation, His cross the pledge of triumph, and His sufferings the pledge of glory. This present period is the season of the dark and sad series. Soon (how soon we may not know) the bright glad issues will be realized.

(1). Life to a dead world.
(2). Salvation to those who believe.
(3). Triumph for those who have known the ignominy of the cross, and (4). Glory for those who have suffered for His sake.

We have attempted in these articles to call attention to some of the Things that Differ in this mighty theme. We trust that though this series may not be continued, or amplified, that each reader will now feel constrained to most carefully and thoroughly search out this most important subject, for if we compare the different phases of the work of Christ we shall be compelled to renounce many things that are not scriptural.

We most earnestly ask the reader to weigh over the suggestion given in an earlier article as to the essential difference that is observed in Scripture between all being made alive by virtue of Christ's DEATH, and BELIEVERS being saved by faith in His BLOOD. May we not only rightly divide the Word of truth as to dispensational teaching, but try the things that differ as to doctrine.

DEAR FELLOW-BELIEVERS,

First of all we take this opportunity of thanking God our Father for all the mercies that have contributed to the production of another year's testimony.

Secondly, we want all our readers to understand our position in connection with the state of the times. On every hand, man is uniting. There is a tremendous activity everywhere to bring about a unity of the flesh. The scriptural position seems to us to be, more than ever, independent testimony. We feel that no good purpose is served in becoming involved, either directly or indirectly, in controversy we do not propose to combat teaching which may run counter to that of this witness, neither do we propose to continue Reviews under Books for Bereans, as apart from the fact that the space at our disposal is much too limited, we feel constrained, for several reason, to confine ourselves to positive testimony in consonance with our title. This decision will explain why no references has been made to the several publications sent to us during the past few months.

To all who believe in the Scriptures of truth rightly divided, we commend this little witness, but above all we look up to Him Who alone has provided for and guided us through the years now past.

With every good wish in grace, through Christ,

Yours in that blessed hope,

CHARLES H. WELCH

DEVOTIONAL ARTICLES.

The Knowledge of God.
Col. i. 10. p. 13 – 15

When the Lord in His great intercession of John xvii. spoke of aionian life, He also spoke of its object:--

> "And this is the aionian life, that they might know Thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom Thou hast sent" (verse 3).

The word rendered that in this verse is in the original hinã, "in order that", "with the object that"; and therefore allowing this meaning its force and significance, we discover that aionian life is the glorious opportunity provided by the God of all grace to get to know Himself and the One He sent – Jesus Christ our Lord.

This passage is not alone in the suggestion that during the present life we do not know GOD. In the prayers of the apostle, as recorded in the three epistles of the mystery, Ephesians, Philippians and Colossians, there is progress observable in this knowledge. First in Eph. i. 17 the goal is stated:-- > "That the God of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of glory, may give unto you a spirit of wisdom and revelation in the full knowledge of Him."

Then the steps to that end begin to be enumerated, viz., (1) That you may know what is the hope of His calling. (2) That you may know what is the riches of the glory of His inheritance in the saints. (3) That you may know what is the exceeding greatness of His power to usward who believe.

Until we know these three manifestations or objects of God, the knowledge of God Himself cannot be ours. But these three items of knowledge, gloriously full as they are, are not sufficient qualifications to pass us into the higher school where we may learn to know GOD. Chapter iii. places all its emphasis upon knowing the love of Christ, "to know the love of Christ which passeth knowledge"; this special aspect of knowledge has its own peculiar goal, "in order that you may be filled unto (R.V. – not with) all the fulness of God". The fulness of God is the goal unto which the apostle's prayers are directed; he does not pray that the believer may be filled with all the fulness of God; such is reserved for One and One only – the Lord Himself, for in Him dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily, and we are filled to the full in Him. The prayer of Phil. i. deals with another phase of spiritual growth, another factor in the progress of the saint to the desired goal:--

> "And this I pray, that your love may abound yet more and more in knowledge and all discernment, that ye may try the things that differ (and so approve the things that are excellent), in order that ye may be sincere and without offence till the day of Christ: being filled with the fruits of righteousness, which are by Jesus Christ, unto the praise and glory of God" (verses 9-11).

Col. i. 9, 10 gathers up these factors into one prayer, and leads on to the goal expressed in the opening words of Eph. i. 17. "For this cause we also, since the day we heard (heard what? Their faith, their love, their hope, their fruit—all that had been prayed for in Eph. i.; iii.; and Phil. i.), do not cease to pray for you" (What! is there something more? Had they not yet reached the goal? No!), "that ye may be filled with the full knowledge of His will, with all wisdom and spiritual understanding to walk worthy of the Lord unto all pleasing; in every work bringing forth good fruit, and increasing (or growing up) to the knowledge of God". Some texts read, "increasing unto the knowledge of God", and it is difficult to decide the question, but in either case the truth remains, that all the knowledge of His will to which we attain in this life, all the increasing worthiness of our walk, all the fruitfulness of all our good works is after all a growth, an increase, a preparation to the one great and glorious goal, THE KNOWLEDGE OF GOD. We know God now, mediately, but then face to face. Our highest good during this life is fund in the recognition of this fact: during the pilgrimage, the discipline, and the probation of this life we make it our chief concern to know Christ. "That I may know Him" should be the desire of our hearts. To know the knowledge-surpassing love of Christ, to know the power of His resurrection, to know the Son of God, this is the knowledge for the time now present. This mediatorial knowledge leads on to the next and fullest, to know God. One has only to read the creeds of Christendom to see to what absurdities truly godly men may descend in their endeavour to explain the invisible God. For the present, Christ is All and in all; in the future, God will be All and in all. If ever the reader has thought about the occupation of the redeemed in glory, here is an answer that reaches out to boundless infinity—they will then begin to know God.

Let us accept the teaching of the Word instead of wasting precious time and opportunity on that which is beyond our scope; let us learn the appointed lessons now that we may the better learn the lesson then.

With what zest and earnestness shall we seek the knowledge of Christ and His love, the knowledge of the hope of His calling, and the glory of His inheritance if we realize the object with which those lessons have been set, viz., with a view to a future knowledge of GOD.

The knowledge of the Son of God leads on to the condition of perfection, and then, and not till then will the strong meat be allowed us.

To go beyond the appointed lesson of life is to be swayed by an unspiritual curiosity. True yearning to know God will bow before His appointments, and will realize that as in redemption and salvation, so with the knowledge of God, the Saviour can say, "No man cometh unto the Father, but by Me".

Freedom.

"For he that is called in the Lord, being a slave, is the LORD'S FREEMAN: likewise also he that is called, being free, is CHRIST'S SLAVE."
I Cor. vii. 22. pp. 29 - 32

If ever we are to appreciate what freedom means in the full sense of the scriptural meaning of the term, we must learn the truth of the seeming paradox of I Cor. vii. 22.

One of the first lessons we have to learn, not only in relation to freedom, but in relation to practically all the doctrines of redemption, is that no blessing or gift is of value for its own sake. To seek liberty because to our natural temperament bondage is galling, is to seek, under the cloke of the term liberty, the satisfaction of the flesh. To fail to "use liberty rather" if the opportunity is given because it brings with it irksome or hazardous responsibilities, is likewise pandering to the flesh. By nature we judge by outward appearances. It is God who looketh upon the heart.

The very slave, if a believer, may rejoice in the fact that in spite of all the shackles made by man, he is free—the Lord's freedman. In the same way the man who is master of his own time, who owes no man anything, if he is the Lord's, should remember that he is the very slave of Christ. The heartburnings, the envyings, the frettings that seem so synonymous with bondage to the mind of the flesh; the boasting, the patronizing, the ease that so often accompany the conception of freedom to the man of the world, vanish when viewed "in Christ".

This same spirit is observed in other connections. For example, "For in Christ Jesus neither circumcision availeth anything, nor uncircumcision; but faith through love working" (Gal. v. 6).

From our position we can readily appreciate the teaching that circumcision avails not anything, but we have not truly grasped the teaching of that statement if we do not as truly and as enthusiastically endorse the other phase, namely, that uncircumcision is equally of no avail. That this thought is very closely related to the spirit of I Cor. vii. 22 will be readily seen by reading back a little in I Cor. vii. to verses 18 and 19. The same argument that is used concerning the slave and the free, is used of the circumcision and the uncircumcision. The same neutralizing of disabilities and advantages which only obtain in the flesh and in the world are found again here.

"Circumcision is nothing, and uncircumcision is nothing; but keeping the commandments of God". If we read this verse with Gal. v. 6 we shall know how to interpret the words, "but keeping the commandments of God". Had we read on in Gal. v. to verse 13, we should have seen another close parallel. "For brethren, ye have been called unto liberty; only use not liberty for an occasion to the flesh, but by love serve (as a slave) one another".

This thought is echoed in I Pet. i. 16, "As free, and not using your liberty for a cloke of maliciousness, but as the slaves of God". In both passages, liberty is but an opportunity for bondage—but the bondage of love. No finite creature can ever be allowed to exercise without restraint his own will. The liberty which the gospel brings is a change of masters.

The sixth chapter of Romans speaks of bondage and freedom.

> "Our old man is crucified with Him, that the body of sin might be destroyed that we may no longer serve sin (as slaves). . . . Let not sin therefore reign in your mortal body, that ye should obey it in the lusts thereof. . . . Sin shall not have dominion over you. . . . Ye were the slaves of sin. . . . being freed from sin ye became enslaved to righteousness. . . . enslaved to God" (verses 6, 12, 14, 17, 18, 22).

Here the character of our liberty is clearly set forth. We were slaves. We have been set free in order that we may enter a new slavery. We have changed masters. Instead of sin and death, we have righteousness and God. The same thought is carried over into chapter vii. The wife is free upon the death of her husband, but the thought of being married to another is prominent. Rom. viii. 2 brings all the teaching to a focus. In Christ Jesus we are free, FREE, yet, notice well, we were set free by LAW. We are no longer under the law, but under grace (Rom. vi. 14). Nevertheless, being delivered from the law does not mean licence; we are still "under Christ's law" (I Cor. ix. 21). This apostle of grace who said of himself, "not being myself under law" (verse 20), nevertheless, in the exercise of his liberty, said "I buffet my body, and bring it into bondage". This holy paradox is vital to true service and to a true understanding of our position in the Lord. At one breath we say that we have been made free by Christ, and that we are bondslaves of the Lord.

Paul was a prisoner of the Roman power; he was a prisoner because of Jewish enmity, but his own description was, "a prisoner of the Lord", and "a prisoner for you Gentiles". He was Christ's free-man when manacled to his Roman guard, he was Christ's bond-slave when travelling into regions beyond. Are we not slaves if it is true of us:--

> "Ye are not your own, ye are bought with a price"?
> "Ye are bought with a price, therefore glorify God in your body"
> "Ye are bought with a price, become not the slaves of men"
> (I Cor. vi. 19, 20; vii. 23).

We cannot serve God and Mammon; we cannot serve two masters; we cannot glorify the God who has bought us, and be the bond slaves of any other.

At the close of that epistle of liberty (Galatians), the apostle says, "Finally, let no one trouble me; for I bear in my body the brand marks of the Lord Jesus". The "marks" are the stigmata, the brands whereby slaves and soldiers were marked to show to whom they belonged. He who gave place by subjection "no, not for an hour" when he defended the cause of our liberty in Christ (Gal. ii. 4, 5); he who drew such a decided line between the bondage of the child and the freedom of the son (iv. 1-11); he who used the allegory of the free woman (Sarah) and the bond woman (Agar), (iv. 22-31); he who raised that rallying battle-cry, “Stand fast to the liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free” (v. 1); this one was the branded slave of Christ.

There is a quietening influence in the contemplation of this relationship to the Lord. If we are His, if the freedom He has given us is ours to lay at His feet in loving service, if we no longer seek our own but His, if we cease from picking and choosing what “service” we shall render, if all service public or private, is rendered unto Him, we shall understand the sanctifying paradox of the new life. His service is perfect freedom, and truest liberty is expressed in the most devoted bond-service. The more free we are from the old bondage of sin, world and flesh, the more completely can we become the Lord’s bondmen.

Would we know the brand-marks of Paul the bondslave of the Lord? Did they consist only of the scars of the lictors’ rods, or the Jewish stripes? No. They are indicated for us the threefold crucifixion of Gal. ii. 20; v. 24; and vi. 14. Crucifixion to sin and to law; crucifixion to the flesh with its affections and desires; crucifixion to the world; these are the brand-marks of the slave of Christ. The liberty which knows not these marks is a delusion.

> “For while speaking high-flown words of vanity, they allure with the lusts of the flesh by dissoluteness those who have just fled, those who walk in error, promising them liberty, while they themselves are slaves of corruption: for by whom a man is subdued, by him is he also brought into slavery” (II Pet. ii. 18, 19).

Christ is All.
#2. The Gospel.
pp. 42 – 45

We pass from the wider testimony of Scripture to the consideration of the gospel, and in doing so we shall find it to be gloriously true that there, CHRIST IS ALL. Writing to the Corinthians the apostle explains or makes known (gnorizo) the gospel which he preached to them. That gospel was “glad tidings”, and centred in Christ: it presented Christ under three aspects of His work, followed by a sixfold witness to His resurrection:--

A | Christ died for our sins, according to the Scriptures;
B | He was buried;
A | He was raised again the third day, according to the Scriptures.

The sixfold witness.

a | Seen of Cephas.
b | Then of the twelve.
c | Of more than 500 brethren at once.
a | Seen of James.
b | Then of all the Apostles.
c | By Paul as of one born out of due time.

It will be observed that in explaining the gospel the apostle appears to consider the establishing of the facts concerning Christ as of fundamental importance. He does not refer to "us" except in the opening statement, whereas many of our attempts at defining the gospel revolve around the thought that it is God's goodness concerning our salvation, our peace, our glory; far from this being so, we shall find our next reference that the gospel is God's good news concerning Christ. In the opening verses of Romans the apostle give a clear definition of what he so often calls, "my gospel"; "Paul, a bond servant of Jesus Christ, a called apostle, separated unto the gospel of God. . . . concerning His Son Jesus Christ our Lord". By omitting for the moment the parenthesis of verse 2, we see clearly that the gospel of God is CONCERNING HIS SON. Christ as the Son around whose Person the gospel revolves, is set forth under two aspects, according to the flesh, and according to the spirit.

1. Who was born of the seed of David according to the flesh.
2. Who was marked off Son of God in power according to the spirit of holiness, by a resurrection out from the dead.

There is only one Christ, and He the Messiah of Israel. As subsequent revelations of the purpose of grace, were unfolded, new honours and titles were given to Christ, to mark new relationships. It is necessary to make this obvious remark because some, in their endeavour to discredit the teaching of the Mystery, discover a proof that the Church and the Kingdom are not to be distinguished, by the apostle's reference to David in II Tim. ii. 8. What does the apostle really say, "Remember Jesus Christ, risen from the dead, of the seed of David, according to my gospel" (R.V.). This version follows the order of the original which places resurrection first. The purport may be gathered better if graphically set out as follows:--

A | Jesus Christ.—The Person.
B | Risen from the dead.—Special fact.
A | Of the seed of David.—The Pedigree.
B | According to my gospel.—Special aspect.

Paul is telling Timothy to "remember" something. He may have referred back to his oft-repeated message spoken in Timothy's hearing; in any case, the record of his teaching is found in the opening verses of Romans.

A comparison of the preaching of Paul and Peter in their opening addresses as recorded in Acts ii. and xiii. will further illustrate and enforce the apostle's meaning. Peter and Paul quote the Psalms as foretelling the resurrection of Christ, and both speak of David by name. Peter declares that David, being a prophet, knew that God had sworn with an oath to him that of the fruit of his loins, according to the flesh, He would raise up Christ to SIT ON HIS THRONE (Acts ii. 30). Peter's testimony speaks of Christ, raised in relation to David's throne, and is "according to the flesh"; Paul's quotations from the Psalms, and his remarks concerning David, are very similar to those of Peter (Acts xiii. 36), but where Peter goes on to speak of David's throne, Paul goes straight on to preach forgiveness and justification, a doctrine entirely absent from Peter's messages. Thus, when in Rom. i. Paul would speak of his apostleship and gospel, he uses a strong, and an unusual expression concerning himself. He says, "separated unto the gospel of God"; this is the word used in the parable of the net where it speaks of "severing" the wicked from the righteous (Matt. xiii. 49), and in Matt. xxv. 32, the "separating" as between sheep and goats. The same word is used in Acts xiii. 2 when the Holy Ghost said, "Separate me Barnabas and Saul". There is a distinct contrast also intended, not only as between the ministry of the uncircumcision - Paul, and that of the circumcision – Peter (Gal. ii. 7), but between the condition of Saul the Pharisee, and Paul the Apostle; this is not evident to the English reader without a little help.

The word "separated" is from the verb aphorizõ, and this is similar in meaning and in sound to the word Pharisee, which also meant a separated one. The one-time Pharisee is now, may we say, "phariseed" unto the gospel; this has reference to Paul himself. When speaking of the distinct presentation of the gospel which was his special ministry, he uses a cognate word. In speaking of Christ according to the flesh (which was Peter's presentation in Acts ii. 30), Christ was of the seed of David, but was "marked off" Son of God in power, according to the spirit of holiness, by resurrection out from the dead (Rom. i. 3, 4); the word we have translated "marked off" is horizõ, which is merely aphorizõ without the prefix apo. A sharp line of demarcation is drawn between Christ "according to the flesh", and Christ "according to the spirit". There came a time early in the ministry of Paul when he could say, "Yea, though we have known Christ after the flesh, yet now henceforth know we Him no more".

Whether it be the gospel preached before unto Abraham, whether it be the gospel of the kingdom, or whether it be the gospel of the glory of the blessed God, Christ is its theme, its foundation, its dynamic, its goal, and its glory. He is the promised "seed" of Abraham's faith, He, the long looked-for Son of David, He, the glorious Head of the Church of the One Body. Christ is the gospel, and without Christ preaching is vain, and the good news a mockery to dying men.

Such, to come back to our primary thought, is the emphatic place accorded to Christ in the gospel. We may well pray that our every presentation of God's good news may be as full of the risen Christ as was the testimony of Paul, his separated servant.

Christ is All.
#3. The Prophesy.

When the Lord Jesus opened the Scriptures to His disciples on that memorable walk to Emmaus, He said:--

> "O fools, and slow of heart to believe all that the prophets have spoken: Ought not Christ to have suffered these things, and to have entered into His glory? And beginning at Moses and all the prophets, He expounded unto them in all the Scriptures the things concerning Himself" (Luke xxiv. 25-27).

Prophecy is spoken of as a light that shineth in a dark place, but it is a light that has gone out when Christ is not the centre, for it is true not only in the limited sense of the quotation, but in the widest sense, "the testimony of Jesus is the spirit of prophecy". See how decidedly Philip takes this view as recorded in Acts viii. 35. To the Eunuch, reading Isa. liii., "Philip opened his mouth, and began at the same scripture, and preached unto him Jesus". This chapter in Isaiah is a good illustration of the subject. The last three verses of Isa. liii. must be included in the theme of chapter liii. The exalted servant is Christ, for the words, "for that which had not been told them shall they see", are quoted in Rom. xv. 21 as of the gospel of Christ. That Christ is the "arm of the Lord" of liii. 1 is proved by John xii. 38, for the apostle says:--

> "But though He had done so many miracles before them, yet they believed not on Him: that the saying of Isaiah the prophet might be fulfilled, which he spake, Lord, who hath believed our report? and to whom hath the Arm of the Lord been revealed?"

The next section which opens with the words, "Surely He hath borne our griefs, and carried our sorrows", is quoted as of Christ in relation to His miracles of healing, "that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by Isaiah the prophet, saying, Himself took our infirmities and bare our sicknesses" (Matt. viii. 17). Peter, speaking of Christ's sufferings, quotes the words of Isa. liii. 5 and 6, in I Pet. ii. 24, 25, "By whose stripes ye were healed. For ye were as sheep going astray; but are now returned unto the Shepherd and Bishop of your souls". In verse 22 of the same chapter Peter refers to the words, "He hath done no violence, neither was any deceit in His mouth". The last reference is in verse 12, "He was numbered with the transgressors", which Mark xv. 28, says was fulfilled when the Lord was crucified amidst the thieves.

On that walk to Emmaus, however, Christ did not apparently direct the disciples' attention to a few outstanding prophecies, but began at Moses. It may be well for us to refresh our memories of these things, and while we cannot hope to touch "all the scriptures" which speak concerning Him, we may be able to trace the thread of prophecy, and confirm to our hearts the blessed truth that in prophecy as in all else Christ is all.

THE SEED OF THE WOMAN (Gen. iii. 15).—The very heart and soul of redemption is revealed in this primal prophecy. The history of redemption begins and ends with the history of the serpent. The serpent's seed betrayed its innate enmity at the very gates of paradise, for "Cain was of that wicked one and slew his brother". What is the title of the One who should overcome and destroy this awful power of evil? He is not named here the Son of God, or even the Son of man. He is not hailed as King of kings and Lord of lords. His name, "The Mighty God", is not uttered. Out of weakness itself is to be born the victor over the serpent. "The Seed of the woman" shall bruise the serpent's head. Within the compass of these few words is found human corruption and guilt are passed down the male line. Here also lies enfolded the glorious teaching of I Cor. 45-47, the second man, the Lord from heaven, is here in view—He is the Seed of the woman. The prophecy of the virgin birth, Isa. vii. 14 and Matt. i. 23 is hereby necessitated.

THE SEED OF ABRAHAM.—"He saith not, And to seeds, as of many; but as of one, And to thy Seed, which is Christ" (Gal. iii. 16). Here is another embracive title. All that Isaac was as the well-beloved and only son, offered willingly upon the altar, is included in this prophetic name. In this Seed all families of Jew and Gentile alike were to be blessed. The great principle of faith is implied in the title, and much of the apostle's teaching in Romans and Galatians is alone possible by reason for the fact that Christ fills both prophecies concerning the woman's seed and the seed of Abraham.

THE SEED OF DAVID (Rom. i. 3).—This title covers all the promises of God which relate peculiarly to Israel and the kingdom. It is related to a set of prophecies that deal with Israel "according to the flesh". Here is the king after God's own heart. Here is the Prince of Peace. The rule and reign of David's greater Son exhausts his kingly prayer, and in contemplation of His benign reign the prayers of David the son of Jesse are ended, accomplished, consummated (Psa. lxxii. 20). Every sacrifice and offering ordained by the law or the Word of God was a prophecy of Christ.

Did Israel find protection under the shed blood of the passover? "Christ our passover hath been sacrificed for us" (I Cor. v. 7). Did God ordain various offerings for the various phases of ceremonial access, worship, and expiation, these were but prophecies of Christ. "Sacrifice and offering Thou wouldest not, but a BODY hast Thou prepared Me. . . . Lo, I come" (Heb. x. 5-9). The time when the Messiah should come is given in various ways by various prophets (Gen. xlix. 10; Dan. ix. 24-27; Haggai ii. 6-9). The place of His birth is indicated by Micah v. 2. The nature and purpose of His death is foretold with marvellous precision in Psa. xxii. and Isa. liii. His glorious resurrection is foretold by David in Psa. xvi., His investiture with universal sovereignty is foretold by Daniel in vii. 13, 14, and by John in Rev. xi. 15. His second coming in its many phases constitutes the brightest star of both Old and New Testament eschatology.

We have done nothing more than pick out a few of the many themes that this subject holds out to us; Christ is ALL in prophecy. He is its beginning and its end. With His person and work Genesis records the first prophetic word, and His personal coming is the promise of the closing verses of inspiration, "Surely I come quickly".

May every reader be able, by grace, to reply, "Even so, Come, Lord Jesus".

Christ is All.

#4. Redemption.
pp. 142 - 144

"Christ our passover hath been sacrificed for us" (I Cor. v. 7).
"Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world" (John i. 29).

The first promise which God made to Abraham is contained in the words, "Get thee out of thy country, and from thy kindred, and from thy father's house, unto a land that I will show thee: And I will make of thee a great nation" (Gen. xii. 1, 2). It was not, however, until the seed of Abraham had spent many grievous days of toil in Egypt, that God appeared on their behalf, and fulfilled His promise. The first national act was the sacrifice of the passover, every member of the chosen race being redeemed by blood.

A vital change is indicated in Exod. xii. 2, "This month shall be unto you the beginning of months: it shall be the first month of the year TO YOU". Up till this point the first month of the year had been Tisri, which corresponds with our October, but a complete change was introduced, and the month Abib became the first month of the new year to Israel, "This day came ye out in the month Abib" (Exod. xiii. 4).

The children of Israel were commanded to take a lamb for an house. There is something suggestive in the way the word lamb is used. First it is A lamb (xii. 3), then THE lamb (verse 4), then YOUR lamb (verse 5). It is good to recognize Christ as A Saviour, it is better and more blessed to see in Him THE Saviour, best of all to realize once for all that He is YOUR Saviour. The record of Exod. xii., spoken as it was for the instruction of Israel on that memorable night, nevertheless seems to pass from the type to the Antitype in verse 6, "And the whole congregation of the children of Israel shall kill IT in the evening". For every house of Israel a lamb had been taken; many lambs therefore that awful evening would have been slain by as many fathers—yet the Word reads, "the whole congregation. . . . shall kill IT". "Christ our passover hath been sacrificed for us".

It has been pointed out by others before us, that while the blood of the passover was sprinkled above the upper door post, and on either side the two side posts, no blood was sprinkled upon the threshold; God saw to it that not even in type should any of the children of Israel "trample under foot" the blood that spoke of the sacrifice of His Son. To the children of Israel that sprinkled blood was a token, and the Lord said, "when I see the blood, I will pass over you, and the plague shall not be upon you to destroy you, when I smite the land of Egypt".

"When I see the blood". Not when I see your genealogy as a true son of Abraham, not when I see your character, but when I see the blood. No dispensation, however diverse in character, calling, and destiny, alters one word of this basic truth. Redemption by blood lies at the bottom of Israel's deliverance and nationality, redemption by blood is one of the "spiritual blessings" of the dispensation of the mystery (Eph. i. 7). Every presentation of the gospel whether from pulpit, platform, or village green must pass this scrutiny. The blood is the token, and the Lord still looks for the blood in order that "He may be just and the justifier of him that believeth in Jesus".

To many, possibly, the yearly sacrifice of the passover said little; to one, however, we do know that it spoke of Christ. That one was David. Ps. li. is the prayer of a truly penitent man. He prays that his transgressions may be blotted out, and he himself thoroughly washed from his sin. "Purge me with hyssop", he cries, "and I shall be clean; wash me and I shall be whiter than snow". Why did David ask to be purged with hyssop? Hyssop is a small bushy plant; in what way could it be used to purge and cleanse? The answer is found in the passover. "Ye shall take a bunch of hyssop, and dip it in the blood that is in the bason, and strike the lintel and the two sideposts with the blood" (Exod. xii. 22). Here is David's meaning; he cried for the protection and cleansing of the blood.

David follows the reference to the hyssop by another strange remark, "Make me to hear joy and gladness, that the bones which Thou hast broken may rejoice". Of the passover lamb it was written, "neither shall ye break a bone thereof", and John xix. 33-36, speaking of the Roman custom and the soldiers' attitude says, "These things were done that the scripture might be fulfilled, A bone of him shall not be broken."

In verse 14 of Psalm li. David utters the dreadful character of his sin, "Deliver me from blood guiltiness, O God, thou God of my salvation, and my tongue shall sing aloud of Thy righteousness". If it was impossible for the blood of bulls and goats to take away sin or to touch the conscience, how could David expect deliverance, and how could he couple it with God's righteousness? He might have said that his tongue would sing aloud of God's mercy, or love, or pity, but no, he says righteousness. David saw beyond the passover lamb to the Lamb of God, Whom God was to set forth to be a propitiation through faith in His blood, to declare His righteousness for the remission (margin, passing over) of the sins that are past, through the forbearance of God (Rom. iii. 25).

The lessons of the passover are many and full. This paper touches a few, but however many more may be seen and realized, still must it ever be true that in the sacrifice of the passover, as in all the scheme of redemption, CHRIST IS ALL.

Christ is All.
#5. For the Pilgrim.

Not only does Christ fill the gospel with His glory and sufficiency, and fill the purpose of the ages with His power and wisdom, not only is He found filling the Psalm of the cross (xxii.) with His passion, and the Psalm of the crown (xxiv.) with His glory, but He also fills the Psalm of the crook (xxiii.) with His shepherding care.

When Israel came out of Egypt under the sprinkled blood of the passover lamb, they came out by virtue of Christ. They did not leave Christ behind them, however, when they commenced the journey through the wilderness. We are not left to the process of inference in this matter. Scripture in more than one case declares that Christ is to be seen in the wilderness journey. In I Cor. x. 1-4 we read:--

> "Our fathers did all drink the same spiritual drink: for they drank of that spiritual Rock that followed them: AND THAT ROCK WAS CHRIST."

The Israelites not only had spiritual drink, but they ate manna (angels' food) which was sent from heaven. Again, we are not called upon to reason, infer, or spiritualize; we have but to read the Word:--

> "Our fathers did eat manna in the desert: as it is written, He gave them bread from heaven to eat. Then Jesus said unto them, Verily, Verily, I say unto you, Moses gave you not that bread from heaven; but My Father giveth you the true bread from heaven. . . . I AM THAT BREAD OF LIFE" (John vi. 31-51).

In the approach to God in worship during the days of pilgrimage, the Israelite had a constant reminder of Christ in the tabernacle that God commanded to be made. The inner shrine, the holiest of all, contained the ark and the mercy-seat, the meeting-place appointed by God between Himself and Moses, and, through Moses, the people. That mercy-seat was be-sprinkled with blood, and that mercy-seat spoke of Christ, "Whom God hath set forth to be a propitiation (a mercy-seat), through faith in His blood". Another accompaniment of the wilderness journey was the gracious presence. "My presence shall go with thee, and I will give thee rest" (Exod. xxxiii. 14). The Lord Jesus is to the pilgrim the presence of God. In His face shines the light of the glory of God. He it is who goes before us, our pillar of cloud and our pillar of fire. By day and by night His words remain true, "I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee". The very way the pilgrim treads may be looked upon as Christ Himself. Who but He is "the Way, the Truth and the Life"? How blessed the lesson of the wilderness! Its privations, and its provisions all to lead us to fuller trust in the Lord Himself.

If the redemption that lies behind us is all of Christ, and if the glory that awaits us be filled with His presence, shall not the brief interval of pilgrimage here be made blessed and holy by reason of the same precious truth. Oh may every sojourner through life's wilderness learn the blessed secret that in all our needs, our ways, our joys, Christ is all.

Pruning.
pp. 46 - 48

These thought were written in October, after having spent a little time pruning fruit trees. A garden teaches many lessons, and the pruning of fruit trees is by no means the least helpful.

First of all, why do we prune? While to one unaccustomed to fruit culture the principles upon which the pruner works may not be at once clear, it would be obvious that every cut of the knife was not wanton waste, but purposeful and good. Translating our thoughts into the sphere of spiritual things, we also are persuaded that every branch or shoot that the heavenly husbandman removes, is taken away for our good and for His glory. As we stood for a moment considering whether such and such branches should come off or stay on, the blessed comfort came to us to think how much more may we not believe that every cut we receive from the pruning of the Lord is the result of wisest choice and tenderest concern.

Why then do we prune? First, to produce the maximum amount of fruit-bearing wood; secondly, to give such fruit-bearing wood as much light and air as possible, and thirdly, that the resulting fruit shall be so placed as to be most easily gathered; these three reasons for pruning need no alteration of wording to speak to the believer of his own life and experience. We are expected to produce fruit, and just as the pruner's knife cuts away much that may look pleasant to the eyes, so the Lord has to remove much that to the eye of the flesh seems attractive and necessary: the pruner knows, however, that unwise pruning instead of producing fruit-bearing wood, produces year by year branches of twiggy growth that rob the tree, and deprive it of air and sunshine. God looks at us, as we look at our trees. He sees that branch of mental activity, that development of worldly or social affairs, is a branch that will be unfruitful and will also spoil the remaining fruit, and so He prunes. The reader should think kindly of this when suffering the cutting off of some fancied good, some hoped-for success—the Lord is pruning, He desires fruit. Air and sunlight are necessary not only for ripening the fruit when it has developed, but for ripening the wood upon which the fruit shall form. Remember, fellow-believer, fruit forms on ripened wood.

There are other minor considerations which are true in both the natural and spiritual spheres.

1. All trees are not alike.—While with some varieties fruit sets all along the branches, in others, fruit is borne at the tips of the branches and is found practically all on the outside of the tree; to prune merely by rule of thumb would spell ruin. How thankful we should be if, hesitating and half afraid at times through inexperience, we remember in the spiritual sphere that the Lord has said, "My Father is the husbandman." This physical fact (viz., the differing fruit-bearing habits) should also deter us from hasty comparisons. We are apt to think that the experiences of one child of God should be modeled upon our own; and if they are not we are apt to pass uncharitable judgment. Let us leave one another in the hands of the heavenly husbandman, and let us not "judge one another any more".

Pruning. (Conclusions)
pp. 63, 64

2. Heal the wounds.—When a fairly thick branch is to be taken out of a tree, the saw must be used. Living wood resents the saw, and if the stump be left unattended there is every possibility that the deadly canker may find an entrance. When the saw cut is made it must be smoothed over with a knife, and the edge bevelled to induce the formation of a cicatrix; how comforting is the thought that comes to one while thus carefully tending the wounded branch—He who wounds is He who heals.

3. Seasons.—Some trees will stand the pruner's knife at any period of the year - others, particularly plums, must not be pruned until the quiet season, otherwise there is a danger of bleeding the tree, perhaps to death. Grateful indeed are we that the pruning of God's trees is in His hands. There are too many of the mind of Peter who say, "And what shall this man do?", to whom the Lord must still answer, "What is that to thee? Follow thou Me".

And so lessons could be multiplied. When we cease from the language of ungodly science and speak of "Nature" as the "Works of God", we shall find continual parallels and correspondencies between His Word and His Works; the Scriptural teaching concerning fruitfulness unto God is a very blessed, albeit solemn one. Many other factors must come into the practice of fruit culture other than pruning, but pruning there must be if good fruit is to be produced.

The reader may be interested to note that the golden "snuffers" used in the temple (I Kings vii. 50) are "pruners", being a similar word to that translated "pruning hooks".

p. 111

In John's Gospel there are two closely related passages wherein the Lord Jesus Christ used the word "Always".

"Father, I thank Thee that Thou hast heard Me, and I knew that Thou hearest Me always" (John xi. 41, 42). The Lord was face to face with the utter hopelessness, yea corruption, of human nature. He stood at a tomb. Human love had done its all, but human love could not endure the thought of facing corruption. "Lord, by this time he stinketh, for he hath been dead four days". Yet, standing before that symbol and servitor of death, the Lord Jesus was perfectly confident that those who stood with Him should there see the glory of God. He knew that the Father heard Him always.

There is another passage, a passage which precedes this one both in time of utterance, and in order of experience. "I do always those things that please Him" (John viii. 29). Here is revealed the reason of unanswered prayer; here also shines out the character of the perfect Saviour.

Let us keep before our hearts these two verses. Always heard, because always pleasing; and further, that we can be heard at any time, but for His sake.

Three Phases of Peace.

pp. 127, 128

Peace is an effect, and it must ever held in mind that "the work of righteousness shall be peace" (Isa. xxxii. 17). Consequently "There is no peace, saith my God, to the wicked" (Isa. lvii. 21). Rom. iii., which declares "There is none righteous, no not one", also declares "the way of peace have they not known".

PEACE WITH GOD.—A sick-visitor once asked a man whether he had made his peace with God. No, replied the man, "No, thank God, it was made for me." Peace with God can only be possible as a result of righteousness. Man by nature cannot produce this righteousness, and therefore cannot make his peace with God. Rom. v. 1 gives the true position. "Therefore being justified by faith we have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ." Note the "being" before the "having".

PEACE OF GOD.—All who have peace with God, who are fully acquitted before God, are not always enjoying the peace of God. This is more in line with the second half of Isa. xxxii. 17, "The effect of righteousness quietness and assurance for ever". Phil. iv. 5-7 shows us the path to this peace. Moderation or "yieldingness" to all; anxiety for nothing, for everything prayer and thanks, "and the peace of God which passeth all understanding shall GARRISON your hearts and minds through Christ Jesus".

Col. iii. 15 says, “Let the peace of God RULE AS UMPIRE in your hearts”. Here we have a blessed guard and guide.

THE GOD OF PEACE.—One might think that to reach the standard of Phil. iv. 5-7 was high enough. Verse 9, however, pointing us to the example of that faithful follower of the Lord, says, “Those things, which ye have both learned, and received, and hear, and seen in me, do: and the God of Peace shall be with you”. If the Giver is greater than His gifts, this is favour indeed.

#19. The Basis of the New Order. (Gen. viii. 21 - ix. 17).

(see The Fifteen Dispensations, Volume VI, page 136).

There are many of the Lord's gifts to us as His creatures that we accept as a matter of course, yet without which life would be impossible. Nothing is so free as air and sunlight, yet nothing so vital. The regular sequence of day and night, the recurrence of seed-time and harvest, the continued rotation of summer and winter we think of as though no interference with their regularity and order could be possible. The flood, which we were considering in our last paper, was the most violent interference with "nature" that had occurred since the fall of man, and it was after the waters of the flood had dried up, and Noah had offered his burnt offerings, that we read:--

> "The Lord said in his heart, I will not again curse the ground any more for man's sake; for the imagination of man's heart is evil from his youth, neither will I again smite any more every living thing, as I have done" (Gen. viii. 21).

There is a parallel with this in ix. 8-17 where God establishes His covenant with Noah and his seed and with every living creature that there should never be sent a flood again to destroy all flesh.

Gen. viii. 21. And the Lord smelled a sweet savour; and the Lord said in his heart, I will not again curse the ground any more for man's sake; for the imagination of man's heart is evil from his youth; neither will I again smite any more every thing living, as I have done.
22. While the earth remaineth, seedtime and harvest, and cold and heat, and summer and winter, and day and night shall not cease.
ix. 1. And God blessed Noah and his sons, and said unto them, Be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth.
2. And the fear of you and the dread of you shall be upon every beast of the earth, and upon every fowl of the air, upon all that moveth upon the earth, and upon all the fishes of the sea; into your hand are they delivered.
3. Every moving thing that liveth shall be meat for you; even as the green herb have I given you all things.
4. But flesh with the life thereof, which is the blood thereof, shall ye not eat.
5. And surely your blood of your lives will I require; at the hand of every beast will I require it, and at the hand of man; at the hand of every man's brother will I require the life of man.
6. Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed: for in the image of God made he man.
7. And you, be ye fruitful, and multiply; bring forth abundantly in the earth, and multiply therein.
8. And God spake unto Noah, and to his sons with him, saying,
9. And I, behold, I establish my covenant with you, and with your seed after you;
10. And with every living creature that is with you, of the fowl, of the cattle, and of every beast of the earth with you; from all that go out of the ark, to every beast of the earth.
11. And I will establish my covenant with you, neither shall all flesh be cut off any more by the waters of a flood; neither shall there any more be a flood to destroy the earth.
12. And God said, This is the token of the covenant which I make between me and you and every living creature that is with you, for perpetual generations:
13. I do set my bow in the cloud, and it shall be for a token of a covenant between me and the earth.
14. And it shall come to pass, when I bring a cloud over the earth, that the bow shall be seen in the cloud:
15. And I will remember my covenant, which is between me and you and every living creature of all flesh; and the waters shall no more become a flood to destroy all flesh.
16. And the bow shall be in the cloud; and I will look upon it, that I may remember the everlasting covenant between God and every living creature of all flesh that is upon the earth.
17. And God said unto Noah, This is the token of the covenant, which I have established between me and all flesh that is upon the earth.

Although we often speak of Jehovah as God in covenant with His people, and God as Creator, we observe that while JEHOVAH said in His heart that He would not smite any more as He had done, it is GOD who makes the covenant to that effect. For the dispensational meaning of Jehovah the reader is referred to the article on pp. 40-44 of Volume VIII.

Jehovah being the God of the age, His covenant is called the age covenant (A.V. everlasting covenant, ix. 16):--

> "While the earth remaineth (or while all the days of the earth [continue]), seed-time and harvest, and cold and heat, and summer and winter, and day and night, shall not cease."

Day after day since this promise was made the Lord has looked down upon man whose heart is deceitful above all things and desperately wicked, and has never again interfered with the universal ordinances here specified. Famine and other judgments there may have been in places, but never universally, like the flood. The Lord while on earth drew attention to the fact that the Father "maketh His sun to rise on the evil and the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust". The apostle Paul declared that God, while suffering all nations in time past to walk in their own ways, yet "left not Himself without witness, doing good, and gave us rain from heaven, and fruitful seasons, filling our hearts with food and gladness" (Acts xiv. 15-17).

The Lord appeals to the unchanging continuance of the ordinance of day and night to indicate the like character of His covenant with Israel:--

> "Thus saith the Lord which giveth the sun for a light by day, and the ordinance of the moon and of the stars for a light by night. . . . If those ordinances depart from before Me. . . . then the seed of Israel also shall cease from being a nation before Me all the days" (Jer. xxxi. 35, 36).

The A.V. and the R.V. by using here the words, "for ever", instead of "all the days", commit the Lord to perpetuate Israel as a nation throughout eternity, and also the ordinances of the sun and moon. Neither of these propositions can be established by Scripture, and there are some passages which speak of the cessation of the ordinances of the sun, moon and stars, therefore the earnest student will be careful not to go beyond what is written. The apostle, as we have seen (Acts xiv. 15-17), speaks of these things as "a witness". Rom. i. 19, 20 teaches us that the Gentiles by the "things that are made" might have known the "eternal power and deity of God", and thereby have been deterred from idolatry. In the same manner these covenanted ordinances are God's witnesses. The recurring seed-time and harvest are a standing warning to the whole race, apart from the written revelation. How often the present life with its opportunities is likened to a seed time, and how many are the warnings and the encouragements in view of the harvest at the end of the age! The day, too, when man may work, the night that cometh when man's work is done; the daily miracle of sleeping and awaking is a foreshadowing of that sleep of death and that morning of resurrection which is so prominent in the N.T. Scriptures. All these themes the reader can pursue with profit; we can but draw attention to the great age-time covenant, that throughout all dispensations has continued in unaltered order.

The first great dispensational fact that is made known in the new world that opened out to Noah and his descendants was that judgment is deferred. God will not again visit in the same way the sins of man as He did at the flood; the wicked now may prosper as a green bay tree, the righteous now may be plagued all the day long, "the end", as seen in "the sanctuary of God", reveals the fact of a future day of individual judgment. So it is that even though man continues in his sin, seed time and harvest, and day and night, do not cease.

In the next chapter (ix.) the Lord lays the foundation of human government. We must go back further into history than the days of Nebuchadnezzar for the divine institution of "the powers that be". "Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed, for in the image of God made He man" (Gen. ix. 6). When Cain shed his brother's blood God made a special protection for him against the hand of his fellow-man. Here, however, man is appointed judge and executioner. A change also in the food of man is made. To Adam God gave every herb bearing seed, and every tree in the which is the fruit of a tree yielding seed; now, "every moving thing that liveth shall be meat for you, even as the green herb have I given you every thing". To this divine change in human diet the apostle Paul alludes in I Tim. iv. 4, 5, "For every creature of God is good and nothing to be refused, being received with thanksgiving, for it is sanctified by the Word of God and prayer". The false teaching of the apostacy, the doctrines of demons, included the forbidding of marriage, and the abstinence from foods which God created to be received with thanksgiving of them which believe and know the truth.

To progress in what is called Spiritism, abstinence from flesh foods and from marriage is essential; the seducing spirits with their doctrines of demons seem to be characteristic of the "latter times". The days of Noah are to be repeated, and the spirit activities that brought about the corruption of the earth that ended in the flood are to be expected again. If the abstinence from flesh food and from marriage makes intercourse with the spirit world easier, we can perceive the wise provision in the change of human food as given to Noah, and the reason why such an institution should be discontinued as a prelude to demon activities in the latter times.

After blessing Noah, and saying, "Be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth", God speaks of man's new relationship to the animal world; this is exactly in the same order in Gen. i. 28. There are one or two modifications, however, that indicate a change from Gen. i. 28; man is told not only to replenish the earth, but to subdue it, a type of Him who will yet subdue all things beneath His feet; further, he was to "have dominion", another type of the Lord from heaven. This appears to be directly connected with the fact that man was created in the image of God. That the image remained after the fall and after the flood is abundantly testified by Gen. ix. 6, and James iii. 9. Instead of the word "dominion", we have in the re-institutions of Noah, "the fear of you and the dread of you" shall be upon every beast, fowl and fish. This is something lower than dominion, and harmonizes with the general character of the age.

When Nebuchadnezzar was made "the head of gold", he became more than king of Babylonian Empire, or the first of a new dynasty, a dispensational change took place, almost as great as is indicated in Gen. ix. When Daniel interpreted to Nebuchadnezzar the meaning of the great image he said:--

> "Thou, O king, art a king of kings: for the God of heaven hath given thee a kingdom, power, and strength, and glory, and wheresoever the children of MEN dwell, the BEASTS of the field and the FOWLS of the heaven hath He given into thine hand, and hath made thee ruler over them all" (Dan. ii. 37, 38).

The words, "hath He given into thine hand", are an echo of the words of Gen. ix. 2, "into your hand are they delivered"; there is also more than a coincidence in the fact that in Gen. i., ix., and Dan. ii. these things are associated with an image, in the one case "the image of God", in the other a "great image whose brightness was excellent, and its form terrible" (Dan. ii. 31). One other consideration and we must close.

The question as to the extent of the flood is perennial, and we just briefly deal with it here. First of all, the extent of the flood must be considered not from a geographical point of view, but from the standpoint of its purpose. Gen. vi. 17 declares that the flood was intended to destroy all flesh, and that everything in the earth should die. This is again stated in Gen. vii. 4, "every living substance that I have made will I destroy from off the face of the earth" [adamah, ground]. This is recorded as an accomplished fact in vii. 21-23:--

> "All flesh died. . . . and every man, all in whose nostrils was the breath of life, and all that was in the dry land died, and every living substance was destroyed which was upon the face of the ground. . . . they were destroyed from the earth, Noah only remained, and they that were with him in the ark."

These statements are sufficient proof that the flood was universal in extent so far as life was concerned, and we might waive the question of its geographical extent did not the Scripture (Gen. vii. 19) use such an expression as

> "ALL the high hills, that were under the WHOLE heaven were covered."

Had the passage read, All the high hills that were on the earth or the ground, there may have been room for an argument as to the meaning of these terms, but surely no such limitation can be set to the whole heavens!

Dr. Kitto points out another witness:--

> "If the deluge were local, what was the need of taking birds into the ark, and among them birds so widely diffused as the raven and the dove? A deluge which could overspread the region which these birds inhabit could hardly have been less than universal. . . . if the waters of the deluge rose fifteen cubits above all the mountains of the countries which the raven and the dove inhabit, the level must have been enough to give universality to the flood."

We believe that the human race began anew in Noah and his sons, and with them commenced the order of things that was at the base of the national life, soon to be instituted; the beginning of the nations and their place in the divine economy we must consider in our next paper.

Space will not permit a lengthy examination of all the varying features of the new dispensation which commenced with Noah and his saved family and the lower animals. We feel that the evident relation between the dispensations connected with Adam, and that connected with Noah is important enough to receive the following tabulated list of parallels and contrasts, and we trust the interested reader will pursue the theme more fully than we are able to do in these pages; we write always for BEREANS:--

List of parallels and contrasts between the dispensations headed by:

ADAM.	NOAH.
A judgment in the background which left the earth without form and void (Gen. i. 2; Isa. xlv 18).	A flood in the background that left the earth a ruin (Gen. vii. 17-24).
(The parallel between these two passages is so close that commentators are divided as to which of them II Pet. iii. 5, 6 refers).
The dry land appears on the third day, grass and trees grow (Gen. i. 9-13).	The dry land appears in Noah's 601st year, and the plucked olive leaf indicated to Noah that this was so (Gen. viii. 11-13).
Living creatures are "brought forth" from the water and from the earth, and God blessed them saying, "Be fruitful and multiply, and fill the waters in the seas, and let fowl multiply in the earth" (Gen. i. 20-25).	Living creatures are "brought forth" with Noah out of the ark that they may breed abundantly in the earth, and be fruitful, and multiply in the earth" (Gen. viii. 15-19).
Man made in the image of God to have "dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over the cattle, and over all the earth, and over every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth. . . . and God blessed them, and God said unto them, Be fruitful and multiply and replenish the earth, and subdue it" (Gen. i. 26-28).	"And God blessed Noah and his sons, and said unto them, Be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth, and the fear of you and the dread of you shall be upon every beast of the earth, and upon every fowl of the air, upon all that moveth upon the earth, and upon all the fishes of the sea, into your hand are they delivered." "In the image of God made He man" (Gen. ix. 1, 2, 6).
Food.—"Every herb bearing seed, which is upon the face of all the earth, and every tree, in the which is the fruit of a tree yielding seed, to you it shall be for meat" (Gen. i. 29).	Food.—"Every moving thing that liveth shall be meat for you; even as the green herb have I given you all things", but not blood (Gen. ix. 3, 4).
The seventh day rest (Gen. ii. 1-3).	Every flood date (except Gen. viii. 5) is a sabbath. (Companion Bible note) the ark rested in the seventh month, on the seventeenth day of the month which was a Sabbath (Gen. viii. 4).
Adam has three sons, Cain, Abel and Seth (Gen. iv. 1, 2, 25).	Noah has three sons, Shem, Ham and Japeth (Gen. v. 32).
One son, Cain, is cursed more than the earth, and becomes a fugitive and a vagabond (Gen. iv. 12).	One son, Ham, the father of Canaan, is cursed, even though God had promised not to curse the ground any more, and Canaan becomes a servant of servants (Gen. ix. 25; viii. 21).
God curses Cain for shedding his brother's blood, but does not sanction vengeance by human hands (Gen. iv. 10-15).	God will require the life blood from every beast and man, but now delegates the execution of judgment to man himself. "Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed" (Gen. ix. 5, 6).

The Lord sets a "mark" (oth) to protect Cain (Gen. iv. 15).	The Lord sets a bow in the cloud for a "token" (oth) to ensure all flesh (Gen. ix. 13).
God planted a garden.	Noah planted a vineyard.
Nakedness and shame are linked together in connection with Adam.	Nakedness and shame are linked together in connection with Noah.
The fruit of the tree, and the fig. (Gen. ii. 8; iii. 6, 7, 10).	The wine of the vineyard (Gen. ix. 20-23).
The redemption of both man and his lost dominion is symbolized by the Cherubim (Gen. iii. 24).	The redemption of both man and his lost dominion is symbolized by the animals preserved alive in the ark (Gen. vii. 13-16; viii. 1, 17-19).
The serpent beguiled the woman and brought about the curse (Gen. iii. 1-24; II Cor. xi. 3).	The sons of God by their actions towards the daughters of men bring about the flood (Gen. vi. 1-4).
All the days of Adam were 930 years (Gen. v. 5).	All the days of Noah were 950 years (Gen. ix. 29).

Many other details could doubtless be collected, and many instructive lessons be learned from the changes introduced into the new dispensation. We trust that sufficient has been given above to stimulate the reader to individual effort.

#20. The Purpose of God (Gen. i. - ix.).
pp. 37 - 42

Our studies together of these early chapters of Genesis have led us up to the point when in the new world nations are to make their first appearance, and a new development is about to take place in the purpose of the ages. We write these pages for those who desire help in understanding the fundamentals of Dispensational Truth, and therefore propose to pause at this juncture to consider what light these early chapters throw upon the purpose of God.

There is need here for the utmost care, lest by confusing things that differ we are found saying things about the Lord that shall be to our shame.

First there is the purpose of God according to election. This purpose is illustrated for us in the ninth chapter of Romans; the apostle had expressed his sorrow for his kinsmen according to the flesh, but corrects any idea that there had been any miscarriage of the purpose of God by saying:--

> "Not as though the word of God hath taken none effect, for they are not all Israel, neither, because they are the seed of Abraham are they all children: but, In Isaac shall thy seed be called. . . . the children of the promise are counted for the seed."

The Scripture passes from the promise concerning Isaac to that concerning Jacob, saying:--

> "For the children being not yet born, neither having done any good or evil, that the purpose of God according to election might stand, not of works, but of Him that calleth, it was said unto her, The elder shall serve the younger."

It is evident that this is "election" pure and simple; it was planned before the children were born, and took no account of their works, either good or evil. In the operation of this purpose the Lord shows mercy or hardness entirely irrespective of the individual. Pharaoh, and the hardening of his heart, is instanced as a further illustration, and the figure of the potter and the clay makes the meaning of the apostle clear. References to a similar purpose are to be found in Eph. i. 1-14, where the election is said to have been made in Christ before the overthrow of the world, and the sonship and the inheritance are spoken of as being according to predestination, which predestination is in harmony with the purpose of Him who is energizing all things according to the counsel of His own will. Parallel with this is the reference in II Tim. i. 9:--

> "Who saved us and called us with an holy calling, not according to our works, but according to His own purpose and grace which was given us in Christ Jesus before aionian times."

This purpose and promise, related to that period spoken of as before aionian times, is, like the purpose which is related to the period before the overthrow of the world, connected with election, for Titus i. 1, 2 links the faith of God's elect with the promise that was made before aionian times. Now, here comes the danger of a false comparison of things that differ. If we transfer the terms of this pre-aionian purpose to the purpose of the ages, or to the purpose of God in general, we shall be found teaching that which if taught wittingly would be quite erroneous.

Let us see what happens if we take the absolute principles of the purpose of election, and teach that such is the character of God in the widest application. If this be true then there is no such thing as sin, or human guilt; God is openly and unblushingly made responsible for sin, and sin is robbed of its ugliness and criminal character, and becomes but the handmaid of God. Satan is not really an enemy or an adversary, he is but one of the many strange tools that God is employing under this purpose. It is idle to speak of responsibility, of obedience or disobedience, of punishment and repentance; as well punish a stone, because left unsupported it falls to the ground, as punish a man for sinning. If God has willed and decreed from first to last the whole course of the ages with all that ever will be done therein, He has of necessity made a machine, the wheels and cogs of which move by mechanical power and not by moral forces. If any fault is to be found it must be found in the Maker, for He willed all that has been and shall be down to the last detail.

Possibly the reader will interpose with one of the many passages of Scripture where man is addressed as a moral agent, urged to obey, believe, love, etc., threatened with punishment or encouraged by reward. Deut. xxviii., e.g., is so much mockery in the ears of those whose every deed is fixed by predestination or electing purpose. It will be sufficient for our purpose to consider the following passages in the nine chapters of Genesis which we have now passed under review.

(1). Gen. i.1, 2.	Creation and Chaos.
(2). Gen. ii. 17.	Prohibition and Penalty.
(3). Gen. iv. 25.	Seth and Substitution.
(4). Gen. vi. 5-7.	The repentance of God.

(1). GEN. i. 1, 2.—We noticed, when dealing with this passage in Volume VI, page 169-173, that the condition of chaos and darkness there indicated was not the condition of creation "in the beginning"; it became so. The passage we referred to (Isa. xlv. 18), not only discloses that the earth was not created tohu (without form), but that "He formed it to be inhabited". Here, therefore, at the threshold of our enquiry we have words that indicate that the purpose of the creation of Gen. i. 1 received a check; something had for the time being entered and spoiled the fair work of God. This passage, taken by itself, does not settle the question we are considering; we must wait until we have collected further evidence. We may remark here, however, that the "purpose of the ages" (Eph. iii. 11) occupies the whole period of this present time, the creation of the six days being the platform upon which the great drama of good and evil is enacted, the consummation being the restoration of the alienated creation back to God. When this takes place the present heaven and earth pass away, and a new heaven and a new earth appear. It seems that we must choose the view that either the purpose of God is of such a character as to roll on its way utterly unaltered by any action of any of His creatures, or we must believe that something did enter into His creation which temporarily turned that purpose aside, and that the conflict of the ages is no piece of theatricals, but a desperate battle, that sin is an ugly and awful things, and no creature of God, that the coming of the Son of God was a necessity, that His agony suffering, and death were real, that the triumph and victory was not the conquest of a make-believe enemy, and that the infinite power and wisdom of God are fully able to deal with all opposition, and to accomplish the fulfillment of all His purposes. The one who sees the very "weakness" of God as being stronger than man, and the "foolishness" of God as wiser than man, needs no inflexible mechanical purpose to necessitate certainty. We watch a game of chess, and after a while the certainty comes to us that one player is already beaten, and the other the victor, although each are bound by laws, and neither can predestinate the others movements, and the wisdom and the skill of the victor is enhanced as we realize the high qualities of his opponent. Sin, Satan, and death are real enemies; they are included in the things that offend, and are to be finally banished from the kingdom of God. True, He makes the wrath of man to praise Him, and restrains the rest (Psa. lxxvi. 10), true, He overrules sin, and takes the wise in their own craftiness. To accomplish His purposes of grace He spared not His own Son, and working by law and by faith, by conscience, and by revelation, by grace, by love, by warning, and by beseeching, with infinite variety and in manifold wisdom He deals with the ever varying moral agents that comprise the fabric of His purpose.

(2). GEN. ii. 17.—Coming to Adam, his temptation and fall, Scripture definitely declares, "This only have I found, that God hath made man upright; but they have sought out many inventions:" (Eccles. vii. 29). When God said to Adam concerning the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, "Thou shalt not eat of it", He meant it, as the "God of truth and without iniquity". He could not have meant, "Thou shalt not eat of it—but my purpose is that you shall, that your seeming responsibility and choice is only superficial and not real". The penalty attached to the disobedience is only moral if Adam had free action in the matter; if we grant this, then it at once becomes evident that the purpose of God cannot be of the mechanical unaccommodating character that some would have us believe. An illustration of what we mean by accommodation is found in the birth of Seth.

(3). GEN. iv. 25.—Seth was so called, because "God hath appointed me", said Eve, "another seed instead of Abel, whom Cain slew". Cain was "of that wicked one", and if the unalterable and inflexible purpose of God was that Seth should be the seed through whom the line of promise should run, then Cain had obeyed the will of God in thus murdering his brother, but if God met the attack of "the wicked one" by appointing "another seed instead of Abel", His purpose would still go on, and the enemy's attack fail. Besides, that view makes the whole transaction real, the other makes it an awful fiction.

(4). GEN. vi. 5-7.—Come again to another scene, the flood. If the deluge was a predestined part of the unalterable, inflexible purpose of God, so must have been the wickedness that necessitated it, and God, looking down upon the increasing violence, must have rejoiced to see how well His purpose was developing; but what saith the Holy Word?

> "And God saw that the wickedness of man was great in the earth, and that every imagination of the thoughts of his heart was only evil continually, and it REPENTED THE LORD that He had made man on the earth, and it GRIEVED HIM AT HIS HEART, and the Lord said, I will destroy man whom I have created from the face of the earth; both man and beast, and creeping thing, and the fowls of the air; for it REPENTETH ME THAT I HAVE MADE THEM" (Gen. iv. 5-7).

Here is solid, sober Scripture, call it by what name in the range of figurative language that you will, when all is said and done, stand once again and behold this record of Divine grief over the apostacy of His creatures, and the resolution to blot them out that followed. We need no greater proof than this, that the responsibility for human guilt rests upon man, and that he was under no necessity by reason of an iron purpose to do so wickedly. Noah himself, as we sought to show in the last two papers, is a kind of second Adam with whom a new start is made. We will not pursue this subject further, being content to have seen that there is a vast difference between that electing purpose that was made in Christ before sin entered, and that purpose and plan which spans the ages and ends in the defeat of the adversary, the destruction of the last enemy, and the homage of heaven and earth and underworld in the name of Jesus. We cannot quote a more apt passage in conclusion than that of Rom. iii. 5-8:--

> "But if our unrighteousness commend the righteousness of God, what shall we say? Is God unrighteous who taketh vengeance? (I speak as a man), God forbid; for then how shall God judge the world?
> For if the truth of God hath more abounded through my lie unto His glory; why yet am I also judged as a sinner, and not rather (as we be slanderously reported, and as some affirm that we say), LET US DO EVIL, THAT GOOD MAY COME? WHOSE DAMNATION IS JUST."

#21. The Birthright of the Nations. (Gen. x.).

pp. 69 – 75

It is evident from the many parallels exhibited between the period immediately following the flood and the period of the creation of Adam, that a new dispensation commenced with Noah and his saved family. If we believe the teaching of Scripture (Gen. x.) we can have no alternative but to believe that all mankind is descended from Noah, through his three sons, Shem, Ham and Japheth:--

> "These are the sons of Noah: and of them was the whole earth overspread" (Gen. ix. 19).

The apostle Paul, speaking to the Athenians said:--

> "God. . . . hath made of one every nation of men to dwell on the whole face of the earth" (Acts xvii. 26).

These words of Paul are either Scripture truth and therefore final, or private opinion and therefore fallible. Speaking as an apostle (ex cathedra, as it were) Paul was inspired and infallible, and the testimony given here on Mar's Hill was a public witness of a duly accredited ambassador of Christ. He spoke truth, and his word here is but an echo of the statement of Gen. x.

The Athenians applied the term of autochthones to other peoples, believing that other peoples had sprung as a separate creation from the soil, as they believed they had. One can feel the point of the apostle's words to these very Athenians, knowing the belief they entertained. The testimony to the unity of the human race seems to be the exclusive witness of the Scriptures, and what science is reluctantly but nevertheless definitely approaching, the humblest believer in the Word has known all along. As far back as 1655 La Peyrére published his theory of pre-adamite races, and at intervals since then there have been various suggestions put forward regarding the different origins of existing nations.

Voltaire said that no one who was not blind could doubt > "that the Whites, the Negroes, the Albinos, the Hottentots, the Chinese, and the Americans belong to entirely different races."

One philosopher maintained that there were eleven different species of mankind, while another went so far as to say there could be no less than fifteen.

Let us look at some of the most striking differences exhibited by the various nations. Among them we might mention colour. Quatrefages, in his book, "the Human Species", says:--

> "The difference in colouring is easily explained. We now know beyond a doubt that the skin of the Negro is exactly the same in composition as that of the White. . . . the mucous layer. . . . is the seat of the colour. . . . External influences have, moreover, > an influence on the organ, and modify the colour secretion. Simon has shown that freckles are nothing more than spots upon the skin of the White, presenting the characteristics of the skin of Negro. He also says that even the attempt to divide the races of mankind along the line of colour is founded upon entirely erroneous ideas. Among the 'Whites' there are entire populations whose skin is as black as that of the darkest of Negro."

> "There are Arab and Jewish families of ancient settlement in Northern Africa, who have become as black as the other inhabitants" (The Vestiges of Creation).

Another insecure test is that of the hair. All Negroes have not the proverbial wool. Every possible gradation from crisp curly woolly hair to flowing hair is found among them.

Difference in height is sometimes taken as an argument. The Patagonian of 6ft.3.75in. is in great contrast with the Esquimaux of 3ft.3.37in., yet the links that bind these extremes are of such gentle gradation that it is impossible to draw the line and say, Here one race begins and another ends. It has been ascertained that the French have decreased in height in the islands of Mexico, whilst the British have increased in height in Kentucky.

The brain capacity was once thought to be a criterion, but even Haeckel, the evolutionist, and no friend of the Bible, says:--

> "Within the limits of a single race, for example, among the peoples on the Mediterranean, the shape of the cranium can vary even to the most extreme forms."

The writer of The Vestiges of Creation quoted above says:--

> "About 200 years ago, a number of people were driven by a barbarous policy from the counties of Antrim and Down in Ireland towards the sea-coast, where they have ever since been settled, but in unusually miserable circumstances even for Ireland; and the consequences is, that they exhibit peculiar features of the most repulsive kind, projecting jaws with large open mouths, depressed noses, high cheek bones, and bow legs, together with extremely diminutive stature."

We could multiply quotations (we are indebted to the writings of Rev. John Urquhart for those cited), but we refrain. Scripture simply and unreservedly states as a fact of inspired truth that all the nations of the earth sprang from "one". Moreover, it does not make the mistake of judging by outward appearance, but divides the whole of mankind into three families, declaring that this division is the result of the families originating from Noah's three sons. The study of language has led men to divide the human race into three, called the Aryan (which corresponds with the Japhethic), the Semitic, and the Turanian (which answers to the Hamitic). The Aryan family stretches from India to England, and includes such a variety of languages as Sanscrit, Persian, Celtic, Greek, Latin, Italian, Russian, Danish, German, English, etc. Colonel Vans Kennedy shows a list of 900 words common to the Sanscrit and other languages of the same family. In the Sanscrit and Persian we find such words as pader, mader, sunn, dokhter, brader, deuta, eyeumen, nasa, none of which need translation for the English reader.

The Semitic family includes Hebrew, Assyrio-Babylonian, Arabic, Syriac, and Ethiopian. The third, the Turanian, or Hamitic group, comprises all the languages of Asia and Europe not included in the Aryan or Semitic groups. In the Proceedings of the Society of Biblical Archæology, 1889 and 1890, is shown the close connection between the Accadian, an undoubted Hamitic tongue, the most ancient language of Babylonia, and the Chinese, which Mr. J. C. Ball calls "the new Accadian".

The science of philology has led to the conclusion that there is a threefold division of the human race corresponding with the threefold division of Gen. x.

One more testimony from archæology and we pass to other things. Gen. x. places the new beginning of the race in Western Asia. Is there any evidence that these three families have left their mark here? Professor Rawlinson says:--

> "In Western Asia the several ethnic branches of the human family were more closely intermingled, and more evenly balanced than in any other portion of the ancient world. Semitic, Indo-European, and Tartar or Turanian races, not only divided among them this portion of the earth's surface, but lay confused and interspersed upon it in a most remarkable entanglement. It is symptomatic of this curious inter-mixture, that the Persian monarchs, when they wished to publish a communication to their Asiatic subjects in such a way that it should be generally intelligible, had to put it out not only in three different languages, but in three languages belonging to the three principal divisions of human speech.
> The region retains the same peculiarity to the present day. It is still inhabited by representatives of the three great divisions of the human race, and when the Government publishes its edicts, it has still to employ Indo-European (Persian), Semitic (Arabic), and Turanian (Turkish) speech."

We must now leave this testimony to the truth of the Scriptures to consider in brief "the generations of the sons of Noah". Shem is named first because of the fact that he was the father of the line of promise, although Japheth was the first-born (I Chron. i. 5).

THE SONS OF JAPHETH.—The name of Japheth means "enlargement", and the fulfillment of the promise, "God shall enlarge Japheth" is seen to this day in the fact that the "white man" is still the colonizer and pioneer. The sons of Japheth are seven in number, who have seven sons, and "by these were the coast-lands of the Gentiles divided in their lands; every one after his tongue, after their families, in their nations". Brief notes are all that can be given upon these sons and their descendants.

GOMER.--Ezek. xxxviii. 6 places Gomer in "the north quarter". In the Assyrian inscriptions Gomer is called Gimirra, and by the Greek writers Kimmerii. The name is preserved in the word "Crimea". By the Romans Gomer was called Cimbri. This in turn is the name Cymry, the name of the Welsh or the Celtic race. They have left traces of their journey across Europe from the Crimea to Cumberland.

MAGOG.--Ezek. xxxviii. 2-6 associates Gomer with Magog, and nothing very definite can be said of this man's descendants.

MADAI.—The title of the multifarious tribes to the east of Kurdistan; the Medes.

JAVAN.—Both Sargon (the father of Sennacherib) and Darius use this name for Ionia and Greece.

TUBAL spread over the south-eastern portion of Cappadocia.

MESHECH, Muski, Muska and Moschaius of the Assyrian tablets were known to be in the eastern part of the Asia Minor. An opinion, not yet confirmed, is that Meshech is the ancestor of the Muscovites.

TIRAS.—The Companion Bible gives this man as the ancestor of the Thracians.

Of the sons of Gomer and Javan little can be said.

Prof. Sayce sees in Ashkenaz, the Assyrian Asguza, a district which lay between the kingdom of Ekbatana and the Minni. The Jews, however, have always applied the name to Germany.

Max Muller says:--

> "There was a time when the ancestors of the Celts, the Germans, the Slavs, the Greeks, the Italians, the Persians and the Hindoos were living together beneath the same roof, and separate from the Semitic and Turanian races."

The philologist of the 20th century but repeats the witness of Gen. x.

THE SONS OF HAM are four in number.

CUSH.—The Cushites first lived in South Mesopotamia, and afterwards in Africa; the Ethiopians. Bunsen once wrote, "An Asiatic Cushite exists only in the imagination of interpreters, and is the child of their despair". Strabo, the ancient Greek geographer, describes the Ethiopians as "a two-fold people, lying extended in a long tract from the rising to the setting sun". Herodotus speaks of "Oriental Ethiopians". The Egyptian Monuments, "From the time of the twelfth dynasty onwards, a new race makes its appearance on the Egyptian horizon, viz., the Kashi in Nubia" (see also Jer. xlvi. 9, A. V. margin).

MIZRAIM.—The Egyptians. Isa. xxxvii. 25 records Sennacherib's boast that he had, "dried up all the rivers of Matsor", that is, the mouths of the Nile. Again, in Isa. xix. 6, the "brooks of defence" should read, "The Nile-arms of Matsor". While Matsor was the name of lower Egypt, upper Egypt was called, Pathros (see Isa. xi. 11), the Egyptian Peto-res or "southern land". A son of Mizraim is Pathrusim (Gen. x. 14).

PHUT.—Probably Somali-land, the Punt or Put of the Egyptian Monuments.

CANAAN.—The Tel-el-Amarna tablets show that the land of promise was known by the name of Canaan in the time of Moses. The Hittites were descended from Canaan

(Gen. x. 15, "Heth"), their language, as yet undeciphered, shows now affinity to the Semitic or the Aryan, and has been adjudged as Turanian or Hamitic. The Philistines were descended from Casluhim, while the Phœnicians were called Kept by the Egyptians, and the part of Egypt in which they lived was called Kept-ur (see Caphtorim, Gen. x. 14). Amos ix. 7 presents a problem as compared with Gen. x. 14 which we are unable to solve. There are thirty-one names given in the line of Ham.

THE SONS OF SHEM.—Shem is called the father of "all the children of Eber", for Peleg's descendants, who carry us down to Abraham, are not named in this chapter, but are reserved until the special section which gives the generations of Shem (Gen. xi. 10).

ELAM.—Josephus thought Elamites were Persians, but the Assyrian inscriptions identify the Elam with Susiana, the ancient inhabitants of which were Semites.

ASSHUR.—The Assyrians, whose language is closer to Hebrew than French or Italian is to Latin.

ARPHAXAD.—Prof. Sayce concludes that this refers to Chaldæa, as the word may be pronounced Arpa-Chesed, or "border of Chaldæa".

ARAM.—Mesopotamia and Syria. The language of this people, called Aramaic, was the language of Dan. ii. 4-7, the language of the common people of Palestine in the time of Christ. Mark v. 41 is an example. Very little is known of the other names figuring in this list.

Uz was the name of the country of the Sabeans and Chaldeans (Job i. 15, 17).

EBER.—The word indicates "one who passed over" (see Joshua xxiv. 2, 3, 14, 15), and from this word we get the name Hebrew. Eber has two sons, Peleg and Joktan. Attention is drawn to the fact that in Peleg's days the earth was divided, but nothing more is said of him until chapter xi., where he is seen in the direct line from Shem to Abraham.

Joktan is considered to be the father of the Saracens. He was the 13th from Shem, the numerics of his name being 13*13, and he had 13 sons.

> "These are the families of the sons of Noah, after their generations, in their nations: and by these were the nations divided in the earth after the flood."

These nations, seventy in all, were divided by God into the various parts of the earth. He set the bounds of their habitation (Acts xvii. 26), and divided the earth and its peoples, and separated the sons of Adam, "according to the number of the children of Israel (Deut. xxxii. 8). So the great purpose of the Bible is steadily pursued, the list of Noah's descendants being as vital to the theme as is the genealogy of Matt. i.

None of these nations is "lost". They may be untraceable to man, but God knows where they are, and what they are now called. Their names recur in the prophecies that refer to the future day of the Lord, and when the Lord deals both in judgment and in blessing with the nations of the earth, these seventy nations we believe will be found to encompass them all.

#22. Babel (Gen. x. 8-12, xi. 1-9).
pp. 101 - 108

In the midst of the list of names given in Gen. x. we are arrested by one or two digressions. One son of Cush became so great that his name and prowess became a proverb, "Wherefore it is said, Even as Nimrod the mighty hunter before the Lord". The other digressions in this chapter are the references to the Canaanites (18, 19); the statement that Shem was the father of all the children of Eber (21); the division of the earth in the days of Peleg (25); and the dwelling of the sons of Joktan (29, 30). We propose to consider the place that Nimrod occupies in the outworking of the purpose of God.

The name Nimrod is from the Hebrew marad, to rebel. The Merodach of the Bible (Jer. l. 2) is the name Nimrod. The Accadian Merodach was called Amaruduk or Amarudu, and became in Assyrion-Babylonian, Marduk. The suffix uk is dropped in the Hebrew, and the prefix ni, assimilating the name "to a certain extent to the initial forms of the Hebrew verbs", was added giving us the Hebrew name Ni-marad or Nimrod. We would not say that all error is counterfeit truth, simply because our limited knowledge would not justify the assertion, but we do say that much error, much vital error, is counterfeit truth, this is seen in the lies of Satan spoken in Eden and incarnate in Nimrod.

Merodach (i.e. Nimrod deified) is creator and saviour in the whole unholy parody. He it is who undertakes to do battle with Tiamat, and to him it was spoken, "Fear not, and make merry, for thou shalt bruise the head of Tiamat". Here is one of the primal declarations concerning the Seed diverted from its true object. Merodach, as a result of his decision to become the avenger and the redeemer, is exalted above all gods. "Among the high gods thou art highest; thy command is the command of Anu, O Merodach, our avenger, we give thee sovereignty over the entire universe. Thy weapon will ever be irresistible". "May Merodach, the mighty overseer of the heavenly spirits, exalt thy head".

What is true concerning the usurpation of the glory and offices of Christ in this satanic scheme, is true also of all that is associated with His gospel. A complete religion dealing with life, death, and judgment, salvation by works, penances and rites, a Christless creed, and the very mystery of iniquity. With Nimrod, Babylon and all that Babylon stands for are associated together. "Babylon is taken: Bel is confounded: Merodach is broken in pieces" (Jer. l. 2).

Nimrod, the rebel, is the first one that Scripture records as founding a kingdom. "The beginning of his kingdom was Babel". Up to this time an earthly king was unknown; how suggestive if the character and purpose of human kingdoms it is, that the first king was a rebel and the first kingdom began at Babylon! The line of Divine purpose was to flow and develop through Shem, that is evident by a comparison of the generations given in Gen. x. and xi. Nimrod was therefore the next great satanic attack upon that purpose, and from its first mention in Genesis until its final mention in Revelation Babel or Babylon has been the seat of all the rebellion and opposition to the Divine purpose.

Before we proceed to the more detailed account of the origin of the name Babel, as given in chapter xi., we will endeavour to show how the great rebel has been foisted upon mankind in the endeavour of Satan to usurp the glory and the kingdom of the Son of God. Bunsen states that the religious system of Egypt was derived from "the primitive empire of Babel". Birch, dealing with the Babylonian cylinders, is quoted by Layard as saying, "The zodiacal signs. . . . show unequivocally that the Greeks derived their notions and arrangements of the zodiac (and consequently their mythology, that was intertwined with it), from the Chaldees". Ouvaroff in his work on the Eleusinian mysteries states that these mysteries were transplanted from Egypt, which in turn received them from the East, "the centre of science and civilization". Not only did Egypt and Greece derive their religion from Babylon, but so also did the Phœnicians, so Macrobius says in his Saturnalia; and wherever man is found and religion is professed, beneath the superficial differences of names and ritual lies the one great primitive lie originated at Babylon and linked with Nimrod.

Egypt, under the titles Isis and Osiris; India under the titles Isi and Iswara; Asia as Cybele and Deoius; Pagan Rome as Fortuna and Jupiter-puer (the boy Jupiter); Greece as Ceres, the great Mother with the babe at her beast; China as Shing Moo with her child in her arms; and Papal Rome as the Madonna and child, all these and many more are the result of the original idolatry set up at Babylon to turn the minds of men away from the first promise of the true Seed of the woman to Satan's counterfeit. The Babylonians worshipped Semiramis under the name of the great Goddess Mother, and it was from her son that she derived all the glory and claim to deity. By a strange process the husband of Semiramis came to be worshipped as the seed (her son), and that son and husband was NIMROD himself. Babylon, both in Old and New Testaments, stands forward as the great symbol of Anti-God, even as Nimrod usurps all the titles and prerogatives of Christ. (For fuller details as to these titles, the reader is referred to that master-work, The Two Babylons by Hislop).

Let us now trace the story of Babylon, to see its place in the order of things. Babylon does not come into the page of Scripture (after the two references of Gen. x. and xi.) until the time of Israel's deposition draws near. God's king, David, and God's city, Jerusalem, had been chosen, but until David's greater Son should reign the purpose of God must flow in other channels. Universal sovereignty goes back by Divine appointment to Babylon, to be retained in Gentile succession until Babylon and Babylonianism should be destroyed. Read Daniel for this. Isa. xiii. contains "the burden of Babylon", "And Babylon, the glory of kingdoms, the beauty of the Chaldees' excellency, shall be as when God overthrew Sodom and Gomorrah". In chapter xiv. 4, the king of Babylon is addressed, and what is said is prophetic of the future antichrist who said, “I will be like the Most High”. Again, in “the burden of the desert of the sea”, come the words, “Babylon is fallen, is fallen” (xxi. 9). In Isa. xlvii. 1-15 we have another prophecy of Babylon’s doom. Babylon is addressed as a woman that had been called, “the lady of kingdoms”, and which had usurped the Divine prerogative of saying, “I AM, and none else beside Me”.

Jeremiah speaks the word of the Lord against Babylon, and occupies chapters l. and li. with threatenings of wrath to come. The vengeance that falls upon Babylon is “the vengeance of His temple”. “Babylon hath been a golden cup in the Lord’s hand that made all the earth drunken: the nations have drunk her wine; therefore the nations are mad”. Babylon is addressed as a “destroying mountain” in li. 25, and is threatened with judgment. “I will make thee a burnt mountain”. “As Babylon hath caused the slain of Israel to fall, so also at Babylon shall fall the slain of all the earth”. Many similar passages of great importance come in these two chapters of Jeremiah which we cannot stay to quote. Jeremiah concludes with a solemn charge to Seraiah, who was going to Babylon to take the book wherein all these judgments were written, to read them there, to bind a stone to it, and to cast it into the Euphrates, and say, “Thus shall Babylon sink, and shall not rise from the evil that I will bring upon her: and they shall be weary”.

Just as in Isaiah we have history intertwined with prophecy, a literal Sennacherib foreshadowing the future Antichrist in his blasphemy and his doom, so Jeremiah’s prophecy concerning Babylon had reference partly to the overthrow of Babylon of the Medes (Jer. li. 11), and partly to the future overthrow of the Babylon yet to be revived again in these last days. The book of the Revelation devotes considerable space to the fall of Babylon. Six times Babylon is mentioned, and five times out of the six she is spoken of as being “great”. Let us notice what is said in this last prophecy of the Word. “And there followed another angel saying, Babylon is fallen, is fallen, that great city, because she made all nations drunk with the wine of her fornication” (Rev. xiv. 8). This utterance has on the one side the aionian gospel, with its call to “worship Him that made heaven and earth, and the sea, and the fountains of waters”. On the other there is the threat of awful judgment upon any one who worships the beast and his image, and who receives his mark in his forehead, or in his hand.

The next reference is in chapter xvi. 19, “And great Babylon came in remembrance before God, to give unto her the cup of the wine of the fierceness of His wrath”. A most mighty earthquakes shakes the earth at the pouring out of the seventh vial, the great city is divided into three parts, the cities of the nations fall, every island flees away, and mountains are not found. The judgment of Babylon is in a setting of world-wide judgment. Then follows in chapter xvii. a description of this great city, and its judgment. It is likened to a woman sitting upon a scarlet coloured beast having seven heads and full of the names of blasphemy. The woman was arrayed in purple and scarlet colour, and decked with gold, precious stones and pearls, having a golden cup in her hand full of abominations and filthiness of her fornication: and upon her forehead was a name written, “Mystery, Babylon the great, the mother of harlots and abominations of the earth”. The woman was drunken with the blood of the saints, and with the blood of the martyrs of Jesus. Her destruction is brought about by the ten horns which the beast carried, who are ten kings who reign for the brief hour of the Beast's dominion.

Chapter xviii. follows with a further description of the character and fall of Babylon. again an angel cries, "Babylon the great is fallen, and is become the habitation of demons, and the hold of every foul spirit, and a cage of every hateful and unclean bird". As chapter xvii. tells of the kings of the earth, so xviii. links all nations and kings in the participation in Babylon's impure vintage. Jeremiah's command to Seraiah is taken up and amplified:--

> "A mighty angel took up a stone like a great millstone and cast it into the sea saying, Thus with violence shall the great city Babylon be thrown down, and shall be found no more at all. And the voice of harpers and musicians, and of pipers and trumpeters shall be heard no more at all in thee, and no craftsman of whatever craft he be shall be found any more in thee; and the sound of a millstone shall be heard no more at all in thee; and the light of a candle shall shine no more at all in thee; and the voice of the bridegroom and of the bride shall be heard no more at all in thee; for thy merchants were the great men of the earth; for by thy sorceries were all nations deceived. And in her was found the blood of prophets, and of saints, and of all that were slain upon the earth."

Let us note these closing words; they may be a figure of speech, they may, however, be very awfully true. All the blood! not only of prophets, saints and martyrs, but every murder and every execution, every war and every assassination, all traceable back to the system of iniquity and the father of lies, who, to thwart the purpose of the Most High, made his seat at Babylon. Not only is the influence and the judgment of Babylon world-wide in its effect (the very heavens resound with Hallelujahs at her downfall), heaven itself can hold the glorious Son of God no longer. He rides forth to conquer and to rule, and the reign of peace and righteousness follows swiftly on the destruction of that city which symbolized the dread authority of the prince of darkness.

We must now return to the book of Genesis, to learn somewhat more of the beginnings of Babel. Although the division of the earth among the sons of Noah comes before the record of the building of the tower of Babel, the scattering that took place at the confusion of tongues was the cause of the division recorded in chapter x. There in chapter x. 5, 20 and 31, the descendants of Japheth, Ham, and Shem are divided according to their tongues. This therefore must have come after the record of chapter xi., for there we read, "The whole earth was of one language and one speech" ("one lip, and one in words"). The idea that the tower of Babel was built "to reach unto heaven" is not scriptural. The words are more correctly rendered, "Whose top with the heavens", and far more likely denote a tower like the ancient temples of Denderah and Esneh which have the signs of the zodiac represented on them. What possible object there could have been to build such a tower with the Zodiac thereon we must reserve for the series entitles, Sidelights on the Scriptures, as the subject is too vast altogether for this article. Suffice it to say that it meditated a direct attack upon the primeval witness given by God to man, and pictured for his memory in the heavens. The builders also desired to make a name. This too was an intrusion into the purpose of God. That which could not be obtained by such means was promised by God to Abraham, "I will make of thee a great nation, and make thy name great". Seeing that the imagination of man's heart is evil, the greater the number, and the easier the means of communication, the greater the possibilities of evil. The Lord does not destroy these men; no judgments fall. He simply confounds their language. They were scattered abroad from thence upon the face of all the earth: and they left off to build the city. Nimrod did not build Babel (the beginning of his kingdom was Babel), he went back it would appear to that deserted city, finished it, and sought to overthrow the purpose of God by becoming the first earthly king. From this, apparently, small beginning has spread all the harlot abominations of the earth, and as we saw by reading the Revelation, no millennium is possible until that city and its system is judged before heaven and earth. Babylon is Satan's metropolis, even as Jerusalem is God's. Babylon and Shinar are about to revive before our very eyes.

As we see these things, we know the hour of our glory and hope is near. Readers, lift up your heads.

#23. The Generations of Shem and Terah. (Gen. xi. 10-32).
pp. 134 - 136

The generations of Shem lead us on to another phase in the unfolding of the Divine plan. The way in which this new section is placed in juxtaposition with man's attempt at Babylon is suggestive. In the order of occurrence Gen. x. follows Gen. xi. 1-9. This is easily seen when we note that in the period covered by Gen. xi. 1-9, "The whole earth was of one lip and one in words", whereas in Gen. x. 5, 20, and 31 the division of the earth among the sons of Japheth, Ham, and Shem is among other classifications, "after their tongues". We are not told when the tower of Babel was built, but we do know that it was immediately after its erection that "the Lord scattered the builders abroad upon the face of the whole earth". In Gen. x. 25 a statement is made that in the days of Peleg "the earth was divided". This word "divided" is not the same as that used in Gen. x. 25 and 32, but it is nevertheless used with the same meaning. The Hebrew word is palag, which comes in such passages as II Chron. xxxv. 5, "the division of the families of the Levites"; Ezra vi. 18, "they set the priests in their divisions"; Dan. ii. 41, "the kingdom shall be divided". We may take it that in the days this great division took place, and he was so named in relation to the event. In Deut. xxxii. 8 there appears another reference, as it seems, to this time:--

> "When the Most High divided to the nations their inheritance, when He separated the sons of Adam, He set the bounds of the peoples according to the number of the children of Israel."

Here the word "divided" is nahal, and directs attention more to the "inheritance" than to the manner of its division. Peleg's generation is not given in Gen. x., while that of Joktan his brother is set out fully; the reason is clear. Joktan is numbered among the nations, Peleg comes in the line of promise which involves the calling of the one nation out of which was to come the Messiah. Peleg was born, according to the genealogy of

Gen. xi., 101 years after the flood, and 121 years after Peleg, was born Terah the father of Abraham.

Terah's generation comes central in the book of Genesis. On the one side we have the generations of the heavens and earth, Adam, Noah, the sons of Noah, and Shem. On the other side we have the generations of Ishmael, Isaac, Esau, the sons of Esau, and Jacob. Terah is the link between the "nations" and the "nation". Strangely, Abram has no separate generation, but has his line traced under the generations of Terah. While the genealogy from Terah to Abram is exceedingly brief, the section covered by these generations is very full, extending to Gen. xxv. 11. Terah has three sons, Abram, Nahor, and Haran. Abram marries his half sister Sarai; Nahor marries his niece Milcah, the daughter of his brother Haran, and becomes the grandfather of Rebekah. Lot was brother to Milcah.

Gen. xi. 28 tells us that Ur of the Chaldees was the land of Haran's nativity, while verse 31 shows that Abram dwelt there also. The Hebrew name of this city is Ur-Kasdim. Hommel has shown that the name, like many others, has changed with time. From the 9th century onwards Kasdim was Kaldu, which gives the Greek word Chaldaioi, Chaldeans, before that, as early as the second millennium B.C., in fact to the very time of Abraham, and the dynasty of Khammurabi. This city, Ur of the Chaldees, was at the time of Abraham a centre of learning, science, art, and wealth, even to the point of luxury. All this has been discovered from the monuments and remains of the great city.

It is of great importance that we remember that it was not Abram's ordinary mode of life to dwell in a tent. He was not by upbringing and choice a nomad; he was a citizen of no mean city. The fact therefore that Abram chose to leave this city behind, and become a stranger and a pilgrim, is an evidence of faith, and becomes an example of enduring hardships for Christ's sake. With all the light and learning of Ur of the Chaldees there was darkness and ignorance of the true God.

> "Your fathers dwelt on the other side of the flood in old time, even Terah, the father of Abraham, and the father of Nachor; and they served other gods" (Josh. xxiv. 2).

So again when Laban and Jacob made their covenant, Laban sware by > "the God of Abraham, and the god of Nahor, the god of their fathers. And Jacob sware by the fear of his father Isaac" (Gen. xxxi. 53).

Idolatry had reached a high pitch by the time Abram was born. An elaborate ritual and priesthood, with altar, sacrifice, and temple. With gods many and lords many, with awful magical rites and powers, and a definite league with evil spirits had enveloped the earth a with a pall. Into this mire and corruption descended the God of grace, and led Abram forth to make of him the father of the faithful and the friend of God. Abram therefore stand out in the page of history as a kind of firstfruits, a pledge of the blessing yet to be realized.

The nations of the earth had been given up by God as a retribution for turning away from Himself, and for instituting idolatry. He might have left them to perish with their own devices. That He did not, but called out Abram to walk with Himself, and become the father of a great and privileged nation, is an eloquent testimony to the great purpose of love that shines out with ever increasing splendour as the Scripture story develops. Let the reader remember as he finishes the eleventh chapter of Genesis, that so far as the periods covered are concerned, he is half way through the O.T. It is an illuminating fact which shows how truly the Bible is the record not merely of human history, but of Divine purpose.

#24. The Foundation Covenant (Gen. xii. 1-4).

pp. 166 - 171

TERAH is the watershed of the Old Testament, even as his generation is the central one of the eleven in Genesis. His most famous son, Abraham, not only left his city and his home, but we nowhere read, "these are the generations of Abraham", the whole of his wonderful life being ranged under the "generations of Terah". Abraham beyond all things else sets forth the principle of faith. He is the first one of whom the Old Testament records that he believed in the Lord. The twelfth chapter of Genesis opens with the words:--

> "Now the Lord had said unto Abram, Get thee out of thy country, and from thy kindred, and from thy father's house, unto a land that I will show thee."

Stephen in his speech before the Council said:--

> "The God of glory appeared unto our father Abraham, when he was yet in Mesopotamia, before he dwelt in Haran, and said unto him, Get thee out of thy country" (Acts vii. 2, 3).

The Lord not only called Abraham out from Ur of the Chaldees, but from his kindred, yet the first movement after the word were spoken to Abraham is that of Terah.

> "And Terah took Abram his son, and Lot the son of Haran his son's son, and Sarai his daughter-in-law, his son Abram's wife; and they went forth with them from Ur of the Chaldees, to go into the land of Canaan; and they came unto Haran, and dwelt there. . . . and Terah died in Haran" (Gen. xi. 31, 32).

The call of God to Abraham involved separation of a very drastic character, and we shall see that the Lord did not lay upon him the whole burden at once; he was to leave country and kindred, but not at first his father's house; he obeyed the call so far as leaving his country was concerned, and Heb. xi. records the step of faith with divine approval. Scripture does not say, "and Abraham took Terah"; it is put the other way, "and Terah took Abram his son". Terah's name means a "traveler", or a "wanderer", and as a type he may well represent that class who "go out", not by faith, but by reason of temperament; the call that quickened Abram with a living faith acted upon the fleshly mind of Terah, and he too felt attracted by the journey.

A glance at the map shows that Terah and his family journeyed about 600 miles with Abram to get to Haran, but the map also reveals another thing, the route never took them across the river Euphrates. Even though 600 miles separated them from Ur of the Chaldees they were not separated from all that Chaldea meant to God. Haran was famous not only as a frontier town of the Babylonian Empire, but for the worship of the self-same god that made Ur of the Chaldess famous too. Terah was not a Hebrew, he never passed over. It will be remembered that Pharaoh was willing to let Israel go and worship the Lord "in the land", but neither Terah nor Pharaoh had the "Hebrew" spirit. Before the record is given of Abram's departure from Haran, there is recorded the great promise made by the God of glory, introducing into the page of Scripture the purpose of election, so far as nations are concerned. The Scripture are very exact, and we are never likely to believe them too implicitly; if we compare Gen. xii. 1 with Acts vii. 2-4, we shall find that Stephen makes an omission of one term. He tells us that the God of glory called Abraham from his country and kindred, but he does not say, "and from thy father's house". Abraham's action, therefore, in allowing his father and relatives to accompany him as far as Haran was quite within the command he had received. Upon the death of his father the added words, "and from thy father's house", make up the full statement, and "so Abram departed, AS the Lord had spoken unto him". Nature's ties were no longer to hold him, a second separation must now be made. How kindly the Lord leads on! Still further and deeper trials of faith await Abram, but he is not tried above that which he is able.

The Lord in Gen. xii. 1-3 makes the first of a series of eight covenants with Abraham. In this first covenant we have a promise, every item of it, as we shall see, being personal to Abraham.

> "Get thee out of thy country, and from thy kindred, and from thy father's house, unto a land that I will shew thee.
>
> And I will make of thee a great nation,
> And I will bless thee,
> And make thy name great,
> And thou shalt be a blessing,
> And I will bless them that bless thee,
> And curse him that curseth thee,
> And in thee shall all the nations of the earth be blessed."

This great covenant is divided into related groups of promise, as follows:--

A | Get thee OUT, the Lord had said.
  B | Country, KINDRED, and HOUSE. A land shown to Abraham.
    C | a | The promise of the GREAT nation.
      b | The promise to BLESS Abraham.
      a | The promise of the GREAT name.
        b | The promise that Abraham shall be a BLESSING.
          (Conditional clause added).
  B | All FAMILIES of the earth blessed in Abraham.
A | So Abram DEPARTED, as the Lord had spoken.

Here we have the germ of the whole of God's covenants with Abraham, viz., Israel and the Nations. Like Nebuchadnezzar's dream, which stands on the threshold of the times of the Gentiles, this covenant spans and embraces the whole period and scope of the Abrahamic covenant, all other covenants and promises, including even Paul's witness to justification by faith in Romans and Galatians, being but expansions and details of this one grand covenant. It behoves us therefore to give careful attention to this marvellous record; it is bounded on either side (members A A) by command and obedience, "Get thee out", "So Abram departed". Obedience to the word of God, "the Lord had said", "as the Lord had spoken". Heb. xi. 8 links Abraham's obedience with faith, "By FAITH Abraham, when he was called to go out unto a place which he should after receive for an inheritance, OBEYED"; this supplies the scriptural interpretation to the words of Paul in Romans, "By whom we have received grace and apostleship, for obedience of faith among all nations" (i. 5), ". . . . made known to all nations for obedience of faith" (xvi. 26). To this the apostle refers in xv. 18, "for the obedience of the nations". Acts vi. 7 shows that those of Israel who believed were "obedient to the faith". (We shall have to consider the relation of faith with Abraham and his covenants when we read Gen. xv.).

We pass on to notice members B B. Abraham's obedience meant loss, yet Abraham's obedience made him the father of many nations, and all families in the earth were to be blessed in him. How can we speak of losing when we have such a God! We lose trifles, bubbles, we gain realities for ever. The land promised to Abram was not to be a portion of earth cut off from all else, for though sacred and called by preeminence, The Holy Land, it was chosen, and the people and events that fill out its history have as their designed end the blessing of the nations, "all families of the earth". So in Gal. iii. 13, 14, "Christ hath redeemed us (Israel, verse 10) from the curse of the Law, ... that the blessing of Abraham might come on the Gentiles".

The central member C is taken up with the links that were designed to bring about this desired end, first, the formation of a great nation. A question that is of importance here is that which touches the greatness of this elect nation, viz., Wherein was their greatness? In several places the greatness of this nation is mentioned:--

> "Seeing that Abraham shall surely become a great and mighty nation" (Gen. xviii. 18). "I am the God, the God of thy father; fear not to go down into Egypt, for I will there make of thee a great nation" (Gen. xlvi. 3). "A Syrian ready to perish was my father, and he went down into Egypt and sojourned there with a few, and became there a nation, great, mighty and prosperous" (Deut. xxvi. 5).

The inhabitants of Canaan, however, are said to be great, "for the Lord hath driven out from before you great nations and strong" (Josh. xxiii. 9). Seven nations are enumerated in Deut. vii. 1 that were cast out of the land, "greater and mightier" than Israel. The question of Israel's greatness therefore does not consist of mere numerical greatness, indeed the same passage continues, "the Lord did not set His love upon you, nor choose you, because ye were more in number than any people; for ye were the fewest of all people" (verse 7). Israel's greatness as a nation consisted in the unique position which they occupied as an instrument of blessing in the hand of the Lord:--

> "For what nation is there so great, who hath God so nigh unto them, as the Lord our God is in all things that we call upon Him for; and what nation is there so great that hath statutes and judgments so righteous as all this law, which I set before you this day" (Deut. iv. 7, 8).

Israel's greatness is here shewn to be the nearness of the Lord, and gift of His revealed will in the law. To be entrusted with the oracles of God was the chief of their claims to pre-eminence (Rom. iii. 1, 2). Not only was Abraham to be the father of a great nation, but he himself receives the promise, "I will make thy name great". The greatness of the "name" is connected with the greatness of "inheritance" as Heb. i. 4, 5 shows. Abraham became "heir of the world", father of the great nation and of many nations; Abraham was called "the friend of God". The record of Gen. xii. seems to have been purposely placed in contrast with Gen. xi. There we have the whole earth of one speech, and inhabited by one family, they dwelt in the plain of Shinar or Mesopotamia; Abraham is called to leave that very land, and to separate himself from home and kindred. "Let us make a name", said the builders of the tower of Babel; "I will make thy name great", said God to Abraham. Judgment falls upon the people in Gen. xi., and they are scattered abroad to form "the families of the earth" who are to be blessed in Abraham, God, while leaving the nations to walk in their own ways, had not forgotten them or given them up for ever. His concentration upon Israel was for the Gentiles ultimate blessing.

No promise in this wonderful covenant is conditional to Abraham. Israel must be a great nation, Abraham must be a blessing, all the families of the earth must be blessed in him. God has said so, the only conditional element in the whole passage is that of verse 3:--

> "I will bless them that bless thee, and curse him that maketh light of thee."

They that pray for the peace of Jerusalem shall prosper. National histories bear record to the truth of these words.

Where is Babylon? where is Assyria? gone, yet Persia that helped Israel in the rebuilding of the temple remains to this day. It may be that the national prosperity of Britain is related to its attitude toward the people of Israel. The Jew, outcast and despised as he is, is a sacred object by reason of the covenant with the fathers:--

> "As concerning the gospel, they are enemies for your sakes: but as touching the election, they are beloved for the father's sakes, for the gifts and calling of God are without repentance. . . . for God hath concluded them all in unbelief, that He might have mercy upon all" (Rom. xi. 28-32).

These opening verses in Gen. xii. are of prime importance, for they are the foundation of the gospel of the apostle Paul, the teaching of such epistles as Romans and Galatians, and the ministry of the reconciliation.

The Epistle to the Hebrews.

#5. Heir of all things. The Ages.
pp. 24 – 29

The apostle no sooner speaks of the Son, than the original theme (the importance of His message) is for the time being held over, while the transcendent glories of His Person are brought before the mind.

The holding over of the theme, however, is in order to consider the Son as the highest example of those who are here to go on unto perfection, and to enter into the inheritance. Had we no knowledge of the theme of the epistle it is highly improbable that we should have correctly foreseen what the first title of the Son would be.

HEIR OF ALL THINGS.—Three times we read in Hebrews the word heir. (1) Christ, heir of all things (i. 2); (2) the overcoming Hebrews who were going on unto perfection, who like Abraham endured temptation and perfected the faith (vi. 17); and (3) Noah, who exhibited that faith which is the substance of things hoped for, having been warned of things not seen, endured to the end and became "heir of the righteousness according to faith" (xi. 7). For the exposition of this expression and its bearing upon the theme of the epistle we must wait until the verses are under review, but sufficient is on the surface for us to see the oneness of the theme covered by these three references. The same may be said of the one occurrence of the word "co-heirs", or as the A.V. puts it, "heirs together", in xi. 9. The pilgrim character is prominent, pilgrims because strangers, looking forward to their home and rest in the City whose builder and maker is God.

Passing from the heirs to the inheritance, we find it called an aionian inheritance (ix. 15), and in xi. 8 it is the land promised to Abraham that is spoken of. The verb, "to inherit", is found written concerning the Son in i. 4, where we read, "having become by so much better than the angels, as He hath inherited a more excellent name than they". The superiority of this inheritance above the angels is sustained in the next occurrence (i. 14), where, speaking of the angels, Scripture says, "Are they not all ministering spirits sent out for service on account of those who are about to inherit salvation". We shall find that this salvation which is to be inherited is something very different from the salvation from sin and death which is the theme of the gospel; we can only touch the subject here in passing. The verb occurs again in vi. 11, 12, where the believers are urged to show the same diligence in the full assurance of the hope to the end, in order that they become not slothful, but followers of those who through faith and patience are inheriting the promises. The last reference is in xii. 17, where Esau is spoken of as a type of those who mind earthly things, who lose both inheritance and birthright through failure to estimate the true value of spiritual things, and who sell their birthright for a mess of pottage.

We have read of the land, the heavenly city, and the promises as being inherited; the "so great salvation" also and the "righteousness of faith" are equally related to an inheritance: all, however, are within the one great allotment of the Son—for He has been appointed heir of ALL THINGS.

The epistle tells us that to this glorious inheritance the Son was appointed. As "God over all blessed for ever" He cannot be appointed to an inheritance, for all things are His. As Most High God He is the "Possessor of heaven and earth", but in the person of the Son He, by redemption and endurance, redeemed the alienated creation and is appointed heir. This very chapter speaks of the Son as God (8), and tells us that the earth's foundation was laid by Him, and that the heavens are the work of His hands (10), yet it seeks to prove that He has inherited a more excellent name than they. God must necessarily be above all His works, but here, as the Son, we see the Lord in the flesh enduring suffering, obeying, serving, and finally dying that He might overcome. As "God over all" He could not be "appointed", but when He became flesh and blood (ii. 14), such appointment was possible, and becomes the crowning attestation to the full accomplishment of His purpose of love. The second chapter of Philippians has a parallel with this line of teaching which it will be worthwhile to notice:--

Heb. i.	Christ addressed as "God", and creation ascribed to Him.
Phil. ii.	Christ "originally in the form of God", thought it not a thing to be seized upon "to be equal with God."
Heb. ii.	Christ made for a little "lower than the angels" and "partaker of flesh and blood."
Phil. ii.	Christ took the "form of a servant" and was "made in the likeness of men."
Heb. i., ii.	This descent was for the purpose of "purging" sin, and by death to destroy him that had the power of death; as a result, He has been appointed "heir of all things", has inherited "a more excellent name", and receives the "worship of angels" and a "throne."
Phil. ii.	This making Himself of no reputation, ending in the death of the cross, has resulted in His being "highly exalted", receiving "the Name which is above every name", and the homage of every knee, in heaven, earth or underground.
Heb. iii., iv.	"Wherefore, holy brethren, partakers of the heavenly calling, consider the Apostle and High Priest of our profession, Christ Jesus, who was faithful. . . . for we are made partakers of Christ if we hold the beginning of our confidence stedfast to the end. . . . let us therefore fear, lest a promise being left us of entering into His rest, any of you should seem to come short of it."
Phil. ii.	"Wherefore my beloved. . . . work out your own salvation with fear and trembling; for it is God which worketh in you both to will and to do of His good pleasure. Do all things without murmurings."

The earnest student is exhorted to read these parallels again and again, adding to their detail from the Word as far as possible, that he may see in their light the first great title of the Son, the "HEIR OF ALL THINGS."

The appointment of the Son to be "heir of all things" has not been fully realized as yet; from the standpoint of this epistle "we see not yet all things put under Him", a kingdom awaits His sceptre, and He is yet to be brought into the habitable world and acclaimed as the Son of God and the heir of all.

However complicated to our view the course of the ages may be, one thing comes prominently forward here—the ages are of His appointment, and must work out His purpose, "By whom also He made the Ages".

There are some versions which read, "on account of whom", or "for whom", "instead of", "by whom". In chapter ii. 10 the two Greek expressions, "for whom" and "by whom" occur together, di' on ta panta, for whom are all things, and, di' ou ta panta, by whom are all things. The word spoken "by" angels (ii. 2), those who came out of Egypt "by" Moses (iii. 16), the better hope "by" which we draw near (vii. 19) are all examples of the same expression. The preposition dia followed by the genitive case denotes a cause; it may be the efficient ministerial or instrumental cause, but not the final cause. Heb. i. 2 teaches that the Son, the heir of all things, was the One by whom God made the ages; here again we must pause to allow the Scripture to be our teacher. A superficial acquaintance with Hebrews would most likely have considered the High Priesthood as the title to have been given first, but it is not so—it is the fact that the Son has been appointed heir of all things. Of all the things that He has done we feel sure that the making of the ages would be among the last, and not the first, to be thought of, and yet so it stands. First, His Person—the Son, secondly, His dignity—the heir, thirdly, His work—the ages. In these two verses we have as the one great cause, GOD. God spake by the prophets, God spake by His Son, God appointed Him heir of all things. God made the ages by Him. Two instruments are mentioned, the one, "the prophets", the other, "the Son"; these instruments are contrasted both here and later. Prophets and angels are created beings, and their use produces no difficulty. The agency of the Son is not so simple a matter to grasp. Angels worship Him, creation is unreservedly ascribed to Him (10), immutability in contrast with created things is His. The omission of the article before the word "Son" prepared us for something different from a mere matter of degree. When Christ spoke it was not merely that a greater prophet than all before Him was speaking; God in a sense hitherto impossible was speaking. God, who is invisible, whose being must be beyond the powers of human thought or language to express, has made Himself known as Jehovah, as the Almighty God, as He now makes Himself known as the Son. The Son was not merely God's mouthpiece, He was God manifest in the flesh; by Him, Scripture reveals, the ages were made.

THE AGES.—The Hebrew and Greek words that are variously rendered age, world, ever, have been considered at length in earlier issues of The Berean Expositor (see Volume I, page 89, and Volume IV & V, page 113). In Volume VIII, pages 40-44, we sought to show that Jehovah is the God of the Ages. We do not feel that the English word "world" is a good translation, and it is likely to turn the mind to the creation of the "world", thereby meaning the heavens and the earth and all therein. That is not the purpose or the teaching of the verse before us. The making of the ages is very different from the creation of the world, and involves a very different line of teaching; it is the very first article of that faith which is the theme of Heb. xi. 1. That faith, which is the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen, understands that the ages were fitted together by the word of God (xi. 3). Thus the fact that the ages were made and were adjusted, is truth related to the special teaching of the epistle to the Hebrews.

Scripture speaks of "age-times" (II Tim. i. 9; Titus i. 2; Rom. xvi. 25), and of what was done "before" and "since" those times began; we also read of what God ordained "before the ages" (I Cor. ii. 7). The ages have their characteristics, their beginning, and their consummation; they pass one by one before the eye of faith as revealed in the Word with their burden of sin and death, and their burden of grace and glory.

Three distinct creations of "heaven and earth" (II Pet. iii. 5, 7, 13) carry us from before the ages on to the time when the ages cease, spanning, with the creation of six days, the present evil age; these provide, as it were, the platform for the working out of the purpose of redemption. The ages develop the unveiling of that purpose and witness the growing accomplishment of all its parts. Christ is the centre of the purpose, and by Him God made the ages; within the compass of the ages sin is dealt with and passes away, rebellion and conflict give place to harmony and love. Christ as king reigns supreme, heaven and earth, reconciled and united in Him, the heir of all things, brings the glorious consummation of the ages to pass.

May we rejoice in that marvellous wisdom which has placed the whole conduct of the ages and their purpose in the hands of Him who for our sakes died and rose again.

#6. The Brightness of the Glory (Heb. i. 3).

pp. 57 - 63

There is in these opening verses a simple alternation in the theme that divides the subject into two portions, (1) What God is, (2) What God does. Some may be disposed to object and say, No, it is rather (1) What Christ is, and (2) What Christ does, for the subject, as suggested in the sub-title of this very article is not the glories of God, but the glories of the Son. We attempted to point out that the Scripture makes a decided difference between the idea of God speaking in or by the prophets, using them as instruments merely, and the idea of God speaking to men in Son. The Son, however glorious, must not be looked upon merely as an instrument in the hand of God, but as God Himself, setting aside all the previous instrumentality of prophets and angels, coming among men as man, and that the Son is as much a title of the Most High God as is Jehovah, El-Shaddai, and other names; therefore we repeat, the subject is (1) What God is, and (2) What God does.

A | The new revelation.—The Son.
  B | His glories.—Heir of all things. Maker of the ages.
A | The brightness of His glory, express image of His substance.
  B | His glories.—Upholding all things. Purging sins. Sat down.
A | More excellent name.—Thou art My Son.

This is not to be taken as a literary structure, it is only intended to show the relation which our present study has to the context. What Scripture intends us to understand in the statement that God now speaks "in Son", or as it may be expressed "as a Son", is more fully opened up in the words of verse 3. The verse starts with His being, "Who being", not with His doing; we are to read what the Son is, and then what He does.

We first of all quote from the A.V., "Who being the brightness of His glory, and the express image of His person"; the R.V. gives it as, "Who being the effulgence of His glory, and the very image of His substance". Rotherham's version reads, "Who being an eradiated brightness of His glory, and an exact representation of His very being". J. N. Darby rendered it, "Who being [the] effulgence of His glory, and [the] expression of His substance." The A.V. alone of the versions quoted above uses the word person. The revelation contained in these few words is so vast, so deep, so high, so full, that the whole of the Scripture must be placed under review to present the subject accurately, and nothing but the spirit of revelation would be sufficient to fully interpret those Scriptures that speak of Him. All that we can hope to accomplish is to point the way, leaving the reader with the Word and with God to make the vision plain.

Let us first attend to the words of inspiration, "Who being (hos õn). Were the very words of Scripture not dealt out with marvellous exactness and perfect fitness, we might feel that such words as "who being" could well be passed over. A comparison with other Scriptures will, however, lead to an important aspect of truth, and well repay the time spent. In Phil. ii. 6 we read, "Who being in the form of God", and without instruction to the contrary the reader would not realize that there was any difference between the two passages. The words used in Phil. ii. 6, however, are not hos õn, but hos huparchõn; this word is made up of hupõ, "under", and archõ, "to begin"; "to begin under" does not convey much to English ears, but if expressed as "subsist" the difference between that and the ordinary "to be" can be felt. It is not easy, and perhaps not necessary, to find some one expression that will fully fit each of the occurrences of huparchõ, but a few examples of its varied meanings may, however, help us in the forming of a judgment.

Luke xi. 13.-	"Being evil." (That is by very nature, something at the base of things).
Acts iii. 2.-	Translated in A.V. "lame", was not accident, being the original condition of the man from birth.
Gal. ii. 14.-	"If thou being originally and at base a Jew."
Acts iii. 6.-	"Silver and gold are not things usually connected with me."

The derivations of this word are translated "goods" and "possessions". The Lord originally, and as His rightful position, was in the form of God. This is His position and sphere as the image of the invisible God, the firstborn of every creature, the Word who was in the beginning. The Son, however, in His position in time, when He who originally was in the form of God took upon Him the form of a servant, is different. It is of the Son that Heb. i. is speaking, the Word made flesh, and it is of Him as the Son that these glories are spoken, and not of Him as the Word, or any pre-natal manifestation.

Apaugasma.—Here we have a word found nowhere else in the N.T., a word reserved with jealous exclusiveness for the Son of God. The word is a compound, derived from apo, away from, and augazõ, to shine. The same exclusiveness is observed in the use of augazõ, to shine, for that word occurs nowhere else but II Cor. iv. 4, "By whom the god of this age hath blinded the minds of them that believe not, lest the light of the gospel of the glory of God should shine (or dawn) upon them". This light and glory is further spoken of in verse 6, “the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ”. There is a designed contrast here with the “face of Moses” and its “fading glory”, a contrast which also places the new covenant over against the old. The connection between II Cor. iii. 14 and the theme of Hebrews is clear; Moses, the servant, is eclipsed by Christ, the Son, which it is a part of the apostle’s intention to prove (see Heb. iii.). We must not fall into the error of thinking that the apostle indulges here in the metaphysics of the “fathers”, and commence an investigation along these lines; we shall surely fail if we attempt to explain spiritual things with anything else than spiritual words, and the unhappy conclusion of writers of all times who have argued concerning the sun and its beams, the light and its manifestation, etc., are sufficient warning to us to keep to Scripture typology. The apostle was writing to Hebrews who knew the Holy Scriptures, who had received types and shadows of this glorious One long before He came; the typology of the tabernacle is referred to somewhat fully in Heb. ix. and there we read of the ark of the covenant, the mercy-seat, and the overshadowing cherubim of glory. The ark was the divinely-appointed symbol of the presence of God with His people, and was itself called, “the glory”. The wife of Phinehas, with her dying breath named her son Ichabod, saying, “the glory is departed from Israel, because the ark of God was taken” (I Sam. iv. 21, 22). That this is an inspired title and not the idea merely of the wife of Phinehas may be seen by the Psalmist’s comment upon the same incident:--

> “He delivered His strength into captivity, and His glory into the enemy’s hand” (Psalm lxxviii. 61).

The ark of God, upon which stood the propitiatory and the cherubim, was the divinely-appointed meeting-place between God and man, “There will I meet with thee, and I will commune with thee from above the mercy-seat, from between the two cherubims” (Ex. xxv. 22). Many times God is addressed in the O.T. as, “He that dwelleth between the cherubims”; this is referred to in the chapter which calls the ark the “glory” (I Sam. iv. 4). Again in II Sam. vi. 2, David goes to bring back the ark of God, “whose name is called by the name of the Lord of hosts that dwelleth between the cherubims”. That the title did not by any means indicate a “localizing” of God may be clearly seen in the prayer of Hezekiah, who said:--

> “O Lord God of Israel, which dwellest between the cherubims, Thou art the God, even Thou alone, of all the kingdoms of the earth; Thou hast made heaven and earth” (II Kings xix. 15).

The glory of the Lord is said to be “above the heavens” (Psa. viii. 1), and yet Hezekiah’s prayer teaches us that that infinite and incomprehensible glory could also be spoken of as being manifested above the mercy-seat between the cherubims. At the giving of the Law the glory of the Lord abode upon mount Sinai, and was like a devouring fire (Ex. xxiv. 16, 17); that was one aspect of the glory. Moses later said to the Lord, “Show me Thy glory”, and the Lord said, “I will make all My goodness pass before thee. . . . while My glory passeth by I will put thee in a cleft in the rock”; the face of the Lord could not be seen by mortal man in the face of Jesus Christ. When the tabernacle was completed, “then a cloud covered the tent of the congregation, and the glory of the Lord filled the tabernacle”. When Solomon finished building the temple, and brought the ark into it, the priests could not stand to minister “for the glory of the Lord had filled the house of the Lord". When Isaiah saw the Lord high and lifted up in the temple, he heard the seraphims cry, The fulness of the whole earth is His glory (Isa. vi. 3, R.V. margin); the apostle John tells us that Isaiah in the vision saw the glory of the Son, and spoke of Him (John xii. 37-41). Ezekiel, describing the wonderful vision of the glory of the Lord, says, "And upon the likeness of the throne was the likeness as the appearance of a man upon it. . . . this was the appearance of the likeness of the glory of the Lord" (Ezek. i. 26-28). The reader can add to this brief selection many other passages which show the majesty and the glory of the presence of the Lord. What we desire, however, to emphasize here is, that when we have read and learned all that there is to be known concerning the glory, we still have to remember that it is written of the Son that He was the brightness of that glory; thus it is that "the light of the knowledge of the glory of God" is found only in the face of Jesus Christ.

As we meditate upon this wondrous theme, what light breaks forth from such a passage as Eph. i. 17, "The God of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of the glory", where glory answers to the Lord Jesus Christ, as surely as Father answers to God.

Dr. Owen calls attention to the Targum, which renders Psa. xliv. 24, "Wherefore hidest thou Thy face?", by, "Why takest Thou away the majesty (shekinah) of Thy glory". Rashi's comment upon the vision of Isa. vi. 1, is that it was the shekinah: the word shekinah comes from shaken, meaning to dwell, particularly as in a tabernacle, "Let them make Me a sanctuary that I may dwell among them" (Exod. xxv. 8). The connection between the Hebrew shaken, and the Greek skenoõ is visible to the English reader, especially when the vowels are eliminated, leaving n each case s...k...n. It is the word used in John i. 14, "the Word was made flesh, and tabernacled among us"; the apostle continues, "and we beheld His glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth".

The Companion Bible (Appendix 179) suggests that the birth of Christ took place on September 29th, which was the first day of the Feast of Tabernacles. Thus we come back and read the words again, "Who being the brightness of His glory", realizing perhaps with more reality than words can express the marvellous manifestation of grace and love given us in the person of the only begotten Son, the true shekinah glory, the very dwelling-place of glory in the midst of His people.

It is important to remember the lesson we learned earlier concerning the fact that these glories peculiarly concern the Son, and are not to be confused with the glory which He had before the world was. None but the Son, the Word made flesh, could be the great antitype of the ancient glory of Israel's ark and mercy-seat. "Wherefore, when He cometh into the world, He saith, Sacrifice and offering thou wouldest not, but a BODY hast Thou prepared Me". It is to the Son, as such, that pertains the throne and the sceptre (Heb. i. 8); it was as the Son "in the days of His flesh" that the Lord learned obedience by the things which He suffered (Heb. v. 7, 8); it was the Son of God who was crucified afresh (Heb. vi. 6), and whose blood was trodden under foot. The coming of the Son of God, and His partaking of flesh and blood, is a deep lesson not to be lightly displaced by the equal truth that the Lord existed in other glorious forms before His birth at Bethlehem.

#7. The Son, the express Image of His Substance. (Heb. i. 3).
pp. 85 - 91

We have already drawn attention to the peculiar importance of noting the words of verse 2, "spoken to us in Son". Not as through a new instrumentality as of a new prophet, but as of a new theophany God spoke "in Son". As the Son, God was manifest in the flesh. "The brightness of His glory" shows Him as the great antitype of the presence, the shekinah of the holiest of all. We now approach the consideration of a related title, but one that is confessedly more difficult of interpretation.

THE EXPRESS IMAGE OF HIS SUBSTANCE.—The A.V. reads "person", but we adopt the R.V. for reasons to be submitted presently. Our first consideration must be the words used in the original.

Express Image.—This in the original is the word charakter which all will recognize in the Anglicized "character". It is derived from charatto, "to engrave". The word occurs but once in the Scriptures, but in secular writings we find it used to mean letters, or as we call them still, "characters" engraved or impressed upon waxen tablets; and stamping or coining money, literally putting the impress upon it. A word closely allied to this, viz., charagma, is used several times in the Scriptures. We find it in Acts xvii. 29, "We ought not to suppose a gold or a silver or a stone sculpture of man's art and device, to be like the Deity." Here we translate the word "sculpture"; the remaining occurrences of the same word are found in the Revelation, where it is used of the "mark" of the beast.

Let us look again at Acts xvii. The spirit of Paul had been stirred while waiting at Athens when he saw that the city was full of "idols". The idols he refers to as sculptures were intended to represent the Deity. We might well ask how it could be that nations so advanced in culture and learning as the Egyptians and the Greeks, should be found upon the same level as the ignorant savage; and while we could argue from this universal craving for images in heathen worship the universal evidence of man's fall (Rom. i. 21-23), we should be no nearer the reason why a corrupt nature should of necessity express itself in image worship. The real reason is that it is by no means error to approach God by means of an image but profound truth, the error being that the idols of the heathen usurped the prerogative of the Son, for HE IS THE IMAGE OF GOD. God is invisible, He is One whom no man hath seen or can see, and Christ as the Firstborn of all creation is the image of the invisible God.

Another title used in another aspect of this great subject is that of Phil. ii. 6. There, as regards equality with God, He is spoken of as originally being "in the form of God", which glorious "form" expressing equality, was exchanged for "the form of a servant", when "equality" changed to "obedience". Heb. i. 3 therefore is but one further facet of this glorious jewel, there He is "the express image of His substance".

God as conceived of as "invisible" needs Christ as His "Image" both in creation and grace (Col. i. 14-16). God, as expressed by Christ as His "equal", necessitated "the form of God". God, as regards His "substance", required the "express image" of the Son. Each phase has its own manifestation and context. Christ is also spoken of as the "image" in II Cor. iv. 4-6, and in this passage the reference is not to the essence, being, or person of God like it is in Col. i. 15, but the revelation of His gospel, "the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ". We find, further, in Heb. x. 1 that the law had a "shadow" of good things to come, but not the "very image". A reading of the chapter will demonstrate clearly that the blood of bulls and goats, and the sacrifices and offerings of the law, are the "shadows", while Christ, the body prepared for Him, the once-offered sacrifice, and the remission of sins that touched the conscience, constitute "the very image".

It will be seen therefore that Christ is the "image" not only of God Himself, but also of God's intentions and purposes of grace, faintly set forth in the law until the fulness of time should come. We therefore take the word charakter to set forth a relationship to the "substance" parallel to that which the image holds to the unsearchable and hidden purposes of God.

We must now turn our attention to the second word, Substance.—This in the original is the word hupostasis. The English word is an exact equivalent of the Greek, but is derived from the Latin. Hupo and sub both mean under; histanai and stare have similar meanings, both being capable of the meaning "to stand". The first meaning of the English word "substance" is not something physically solid as, for example, a brick, and the statement that faith is anything but a "substance" is only true if this lower meaning of the word is intended. A dictionary gives the undermentioned meanings to the word substance in the following order:--

> "Being; something that exists, something real, not imaginary; something solid, not empty; that which underlies all outward manifestation; substratum; that which constitutes anything what it is; nature; real or existing essence; the most important element in any existence; the characteristics of anything; anything that has a material form; body; matter; estate; property. We call a noun a substantive because it designates something that exists, or some object of thought, either material or immaterial.

We have gone to this length of definition because if we merely say that hypostasis means substance, we use a word of varied meanings. What we mean by substance in this article is "that which underlies all outward manifestation". The hidden unknown characteristics of God are the hypostasis of which the Son, God manifest in the flesh, is the express image.

It is well to remember that the Greek of the N.T. is a language used by men who thought Hebrew, or at least had been trained in the Jewish school. The LXX therefore becomes of great service to us, showing us the Hebrew equivalent for these Greek words. In Psa. cxxxix. 15 (A.V. numbers) we read:--

> "My substance was not hid from Thee, when I was made in secret, and curiously wrought in the lower parts of the earth."

Verse 13 speaks of the period of birth, but this verse speaks of something far more mysterious. This secret thing wrought in the lower parts of the earth the LXX calls "my hypostasis", and this hypostasis is to birth (13) what the substance of Heb. i. 3 is to express image.

While the verse which follows does not contain the same word in the LXX, it is nevertheless an expansion of the meaning of hypostasis.

> "Thine eyes did see my substance, yet being imperfect, and in Thy book all my members were written, which in continuance were fashioned, when as yet there was none of them" (compare Heb. x., 'In the volume of the book', etc.).

In the earlier verses of the Psalm there is found this same thought of something hidden and unseen except by God, see verses 2 and 4. Another passage where the word occurs in the LXX is Psa. xxxix. 5, "Behold thou hast made my days as an handbreath, and mine age (hypostasis) as nothing". Here the word "age" is in Hebrew cheled, something that creeps imperceptibly, and so not manifest. "Time slips our notice and unheeded flies". The Syriac version used cheled to translate, "to creep in", in II Tim. iii. 6.

Psa. lxix. 2 gives an example of the simpler concept of "standing". Our own word "understanding" is a faculty of the mind, a meaning we can very well imagine a would-be expositor ridiculing who simply used the dissecting knife and limited himself to the etymology "stand", "under".

In the N.T. we find hypostasis used in the sense of "confidence", a most natural development of the idea of underlying reality, II Cor. ix. 4, xi. 17, Heb. iii. 14. Heb. xi. 1 reads, "now faith is the substance of things hoped for", something real, though not seen. The unseen faith of the worthies that occupy Heb. xi. was manifested in their lives. Their hypostasis had its express image in their lives and conduct. One thing was common to them all. They lived, suffered, and died for something "unseen", or "seen afar off"; they endured as seeing Him Who is invisible.

If faith is the substance of things hoped for, we can use either term with good sense. Instead of the words, "By faith Abel, ... Noah, ... Abraham", we can say, "By the substance (the deep hidden reality) of things hoped for, Abel, Noah, Abraham did this or that.

Christ is the charakter of God's hypostasis. No law or set of laws, no fasts, feast, or sacrifices, no series of typical man could ever be the express image; Christ alone is that. It is this thought that permeates the epistle to the Hebrews. It is because of this that the title occurs here. It is essential to its true understanding that we remember that it would not have been employed if the theme of the epistle had not demanded it. Because Christ and Christ alone is the express image, He is above angels (Heb. i.), above Moses and Joshua (iii., iv.), above the high priesthood of the order of Aaaron (v.-viii.), above all typical sacrifices and offerings (ix., x.), and above all examples and patterns (xii. 1, 2). None but Christ in every phase of His charakter can express the glorious hypostasis of the invisible God.

A passage somewhat parallel to Heb. i. is found in John's Gospel chapter i. The title there is, "The Word" (logos). It is the function of the word to express the hidden thought, and creation is associated with this title (1-3). In verse 14 the subject changes to redemptive purposes, and the Word becomes flesh. He then has another glory, "the glory of the only begotten of the Father". His title, "The Word", is used no longer, and in verse 18 the parallel with verse 1 is found, "No man hath seen God at any time, the only begotten Son, Who is in the bosom of the Father, He hath given Him an exegesis". The parallels may be seen the better if set out thus:--

Title.	The Word.	The only begotten Son.
Position.	With God.	In the bosom of the Father.
Purpose.	Implied in title.	He hath declared Him.

Of the only-begotten Son the Scripture says that He was "full of grace and truth. . . . For the law was given through Moses, grace and truth came into being through Jesus Christ". Moses did not originate the law, it was given through him. Christ, however, is not a servant, but a Son (Heb. iii. 1-6), and the very same word that declares the creation of all things to be through Him is used to teach us that in the new creation, as in the old, He is the Creator.

> Panta di' autou egeneto—"All things through Him became."
> He charis kai he aletheia dia Iseou Christou egeneto—"The grace and the truth through Jesus Christ became."

"Grace and truth" indicates, "True, real antitypical grace", something better and fuller than the veiled symbols of the law. He who brings in real grace is the One who declares the unseen God. The parallel with Heb. i. is worthy of careful study. What the Word is to God in creation, the Son is to God in grace, and the exegesis given by the Son as unfolded in John's Gospel (see for example John xiv. 7-11) is a part of the deeper doctrine contained in the words of Heb. i. 3, "The charakter of His hypostasis". Just as John i. speaks of Christ both as the Son and as God, so does Heb. i. Similarly, as John i. speaks of all things, and true grace coming into being through the Son, so Heb. i. tells us that the ages were made through Him, and that the heavens are the works of His hands. One great difference is to be observed if we would appreciate to the full the teaching of Heb. i. 3. Christ in John i. is the Word made flesh, and as such is the only begotten Son. In Heb. i., however, it is Christ in resurrection that is spoken of in the words, "Thou art My Son, this day have I begotten Thee". This is the One who fills with His glory the message of this epistle. As we ponder the fulness of the title, we may perhaps appreciate the better the reason why the article is omitted before the word "Son" in verse 2. God spoke through the prophets as His instruments; in these last days He has spoken "in Son", His fullest and greatest theophany.

NOTE.—As an appendix we draw attention to a word which differs from hypostasis, by the insertion of kata. It is the name of a figure of speech, Hypocarastasis, or implication. It is made up of the words hupo, under, kata, down, stasis, a stationing, hence means, a putting down underneath. (See Figures of Speech, Dr. E. W. Bullinger). "Beware of the leaven of the Pharisees" is such a figure. It is not stated that the doctrine of the Pharisees was like leaven, it is implied. The figure suggests something hidden, something under the surface, and is very parallel in meaning to the word hypostasis. This note may not mean much to some readers, but those who have a knowledge of figures of speech may find the thought suggestive.

#8. The Word of His Power (Heb. i. 3).
pp. 123 - 127

God has spoken to us "in Son". We reiterate this unique expression that the marvellous truth contained therein may enable us to realize the glory of the One we call Savoiur and Lord. He is the appointed heir of all things, by Him the ages were made, He is the effulgence of the glory of God; He, the express image of His substance.

The glories of the Son are not yet exhausted, for the passage proceeds, "and upholding all things by the word of His power". While the Greek word phero occurs some sixty times in the N.T., it is only translated "uphold" once. It is rendered "bring" over thirty times, but the primary meaning of the word ("to bear") seems to be the one intended in the passage before us. Outside the epistle to the Hebrews the word occurs but twice in Paul's epistles:-- > "Endured with much longsuffering" (Rom. ix. 22).

> "Bring the cloak which I left at Troas" (II Tim. iv. 13).

The word is used five times in Hebrews:-- > "Upholding all things" (i. 3).

> "Let us go on unto perfection" (vi. 1).
> "There must. . . . be (brought in, margin) the death of the testator" (ix. 16).
> "They could not endure that which was commanded" (xii. 20).
> "Bearing His reproach" (xiii. 13).

It will be seen that the word is one which has many usages. The primary idea of bearing as a burden, supporting and sustaining, seems to be the meaning in Heb. i. Moses, when speaking of the responsibility he felt, in Num. xi. 11, 12 says, "Thou layest the burden of all this people upon me", and that God had said, "carry them in thy bosom". In Hebrews we see "all things" (not merely the burden of one people) upheld by the word of Christ.

When considering the words, "the express image of His substance", we note a parallel in Col. i. 15. We must turn to that passage again.

> "Who is the image of the invisible God, the firstborn of every creature, for by Him were all things created, that are in heaven, and are in earth, visible and invisible, whether they be thrones, or dominions, or principalities, or powers, all things were created by Him, and for Him: and He is before all things, and by Him all things consist."

We note that there are several parallels here with Heb. i. The image of the invisible God, and the express image of His substance; the creation of all things, and the making of the ages; the statement that by Him all things consist, and that by His word all things are upheld; in both passages He is spoken of as the prototokos, the firstborn. In Colossians the titles are introductory to revealing Christ as the Head of the boy, the church, and the firstborn from the dead. In Hebrews the titles are introductory to His office as Mediator of the new covenant, and the firstborn in the habitable world whereof the apostle speaks in this epistle. The creation in its universal sense is intended in Col. i., the ages and their burden occupy the thought in Heb. i. The former is held together by the hand that created them, the latter is upheld and carried by the word of His power. Something must be accomplished during the course of the ages, and the word of His power is pledged to bring it to pass. Concerning the Son it is written in Hebrews that He is the upholder of all things, appointed heir of all things, that all things are to placed in subjection under His feet. It is a comforting as well as a majestic thought to realize that the burden of "all things" pertaining to the purpose of God is resting upon the Son of God. With matchless wisdom, with infinite grace, with mighty power, and with Divine foreknowledge, the whole of God's marvellous plan is brought to its goal by that One who died and rose again.

What is the means whereby the Son beareth or upholdeth all things? His hands made the heavens, His feet shall have all things placed beneath them, His body bore our sins, His Word, however, it is that upholds all things.

Rhema (the word)) differs from logos in that it indicates a spoken word or command, e.g., "by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God". We find rhema in Hebrews as follows:--

> "The word of His power" (i. 3).
> "Tasted the good word of God" (vi. 5).
> "The ages were formed by the word of God" (xi. 3).
> "The voice of words" (xii. 19).

The word that framed the ages is the word that upholds all things, the word that called them into being will surely prevail over all opposition and bring all to perfection. It is "the word of His power". He was crucified in weakness, but He liveth by the power of God (II Cor. xiii. 4). He was marked off the Son of God with power, by the resurrection (Rom. i. 4). As the risen One He said, "all power is given unto Me in heaven and in earth" (Matt xxviii. 18). This word "power" is rendered by "miracle" in Heb. ii. 4, and is linked with rhema in vi. 5, "the powers of the coming age". The high-priesthood of Christ differs from that of Aaron in that it is "according to the power of an endless life" (vii. 16); and in xi. 11, 34 it is again occurs. It is the power of the risen Christ that makes His word effective, He will destroy him that has the power of death, that is the devil. As the risen One He holds the keys of hades and death. He is the Son of God with power.

Let us turn for a moment to the records of His life on earth, for there we shall find, even in His humiliation, that His word was with power. When He said to two fishers, "Follow Me", there was no hesitation, "they straightway left their nets and followed Him" (Matt. iv. 19, 20); when the Lord had finished the "Sermon on the Mount" we are told, "the people were astonished at His doctrine, for He taught as one having authority, and not as the Scribes" (vii. 28, 29). A leper came and worshipped Him, saying, "Lord, if Thou wilt, Thou canst make me clean, and Jesus put forth His hand and touched him, saying, I will, be thou clean, and immediately his leprosy was cleansed" (vii. 1-3). This miracle is followed by one that even more clearly testifies to the power of His spoken word. A centurion who sought the Lord on behalf of his sick servant said, "Speak a word only, and my servant shall be healed. . . . and his servant was healed in the self-same hour" (viii 5-13). Shortly after this the Lord and His disciples are found in a ship, and upon a great tempest arising the disciples call upon the Lord to save them; He rebuked the waves and a great calm follows, "but the men marveled, saying, What manner of man is this, that even the winds and the sea obey Him?" (viii. 24-27). The miracle of the healing of the man sick of the palsy is a definite demonstration of the power of the Lord's word. He had said, "Son, be of good cheer, thy sins be forgiven thee". The Lord, answering the thought of those who heard these words, said, "for whether is easier, to say, "Thy sins be forgiven thee; or to say, Arise and walk? But that ye may know that the Son of man hath authority on earth to forgive sins (He saith to the sick of the palsy), Arise, take up thy bed, and go unto thine house" (ix. 1-8). So the record continues, His word was then with power.

If this is the character of His word while in the form of the servant, what shall be the character of His word as the risen Son of God with power? So Heb. xii. 25, 26 admonishes:--

> "See that ye refuse not Him that speaketh, for if they escaped not who refused Him that spake on earth, much more shall not we escape, if we turn away from Him that speaketh from heaven: whose voice then shook the earth: but now He hath promised, saying, yet once more I shake not the earth only, but also heaven."

The O.T. furnished illustration of the Lord's Word of power, "And God said, Light be, and light was" (Gen. i. 3); "By the Word of the Lord were the heavens made; and all the host of them by the breath of His mouth"; "For He spake and it was done, He commandeth and it stood fast" (Psa. xxxiii. 6, 9). Shall we not say that Psa. xxix., the Psalm of the "Voice", looks forward to that happy day when the Son of God shall have brought or carried all things on to the reign of peace?

> "Give unto the Lord, O ye mighty,
> Give unto the Lord glory and strength.
> Give unto the Lord the glory due unto His name;
> Worship the Lord in the beauty of holiness.
> The voice of the Lord is upon the waters;
> The God of glory thundereth:
> The Lord is upon many waters.

The voice of the Lord is powerful;
The voice of the Lord is full of majesty.
The voice of the Lord breaketh the cedars:
Yea the Lord breaketh the cedars of Lebanon.
He maketh them also to skip like a calf:
Lebanon and Sirion like a young unicorn;
The voice of the Lord divideth the flames of fire;
The voice of the Lord shaketh the wilderness:
The Lord shaketh the wilderness of Kadesh;
The voice of the Lord maketh the hinds to calve;
And discovereth the forests;
And in His temple doth every one speak of His glory;
The Lord sitteth upon the flood;
Yea, the Lord sitteth King for ever.
The Lord will give strength unto His people;
The Lord will bless His people with peace."

#9. "The Purifying of Sins" (Heb. i. 3).
pp. 150 - 154

Since the mention of the Son we have been taken you with the glories of His person and the wonders of His office. We now come prepared with this revelation of His majesty to the record of His work. His wondrous attributes are many and varied, but the word to which all are focused is one—the purification of sins.

The A.V. would lead the reader to emphasize the words, by Himself, but the R.V. and all the best texts omit them, together with the word "our", and we accept the reading, "when He had made a purification for sins". The word katharizõ is used for the cleansing of a leper (Matt. viii. 3), and the ceremonial cleansing of the outside of the cup (Matt. xxiii.). It is used in the epistle to the Hebrews, as indeed are the other forms of the word, and it will enlighten us as to the meaning if we consider all the references in that epistle:--

> "How much more shall the blood of Christ, Who through the aionian spirit offered Himself without spot to God, purge (katharizõ) your conscience from dead works to serve the living God" (ix. 14).
> "And almost all things are by the law purged (katharizõ) with blood" (ix. 22).
>
> "It was therefore necessary that the patterns of things in the heavens should be purified (katharizõ) with these" (ix. 23).
>
> "Our bodies washed with pure (katharos) water" (x. 22).
> "For if the blood of bulls and of goats, and the ashes of an heifer sprinkling the unclean, sanctifieth to the purifying (katharotés) of the flesh" (ix. 13).

As we examine these passages we shall observe that they do not speak primarily of the forgiveness of sins, or the justification of the sinner; they do not speak of redemption, but of one only of its effect, viz., purification. The type which will indicate fairly clearly the object of the work of Christ in Heb. i. 3 is that of the "ashes of the heifer". The nineteenth chapter of Numbers gives a detailed statement of this institution. Let us briefly analyze the record:--

1. The red heifer had to be without spot or blemish, and one upon which had never come a yoke.
2. It was slain "without the camp" (see Heb. xiii. 12).
3. The whole heifer, together with cedar wood, hyssop, and scarlet, was burned to ashes; these ashes were used for the purpose of purification.
4. Uncleanness was contracted by touching a dead body, or by being in a tent wherein a man died, or by touching a bone, or a grave.
5. Purification was effected by mixing the ashes with living water and by sprinkling with a bunch of hyssop on the third and seventh days.
6. An unclean person that refused to be purified was cut off from the congregation; he had defiled the sanctuary.

It will be noticed that the whole question is one of defilement and its resulting exclusion from the service of the Lord. Some of the causes of uncleanness were quite outside the volition of the person involved, the touching of one slain in the field, or the death occurring in one's own home were shadows of the defiling contact of the world. Had the water of purifying not been at hand, many would perforce have been absent from the Lord's house. The great antitype of the ashes of the heifer is "the blood of Christ"; this "purges the conscience from DEAD works". The reference to the defilement of Numb. xix. is obvious, the dead man, the bone, and the grave are here exchanged for "dead works"; the privilege of access to the tabernacle being exchanged for "service to the living God". The running water was a type of the "aionian Spirit".

The next passage refers to the fact that almost all things by the law are purified with blood, and that the tabernacle, the book, and the people were thus purified.

> "For when Moses had spoken every precept to all the people according to the law, he took the blood of calves and goats, with water, and scarlet wool, and hyssop, and sprinkled both the book, and all the people, saying, This is the blood of the testament which God hath enjoined unto you. Moreover he sprinkled with blood both the tabernacle and all the vessels of the sanctuary, and almost all things are by the law purged with blood. . . ." (Heb. ix. 19-22).

Here we have the other type of purifying, not the ashes of an heifer this time, but the blood of calves and goats. The effect, however, is the same, the result is purifying, and also a solemn dedication, the covenant, the tabernacle, and all the vessels of the ministry all had to be CLEAN. The parallelism of Heb. x. 22 will perhaps now be more obvious, as also the way in which the type merges into the antitype, "hearts sprinkled from an evil conscience" is the new covenant equivalent of "bodies washed with pure water" of Numb. xix.; as also the words, "let us draw near", which is impossible without purifying. It will be evident that we must include "the blood of sprinkling" (Heb. xii. 24), and indeed all the references to blood in Hebrews.

Speaking without the book, and from a superficial acquaintance with its theme, one would feel certain that in the epistle to the Hebrews a full statement concerning redemption by the blood of Christ would be found. Redemption is not conspicuous in the first reference (Heb. i. 3) to the work of Christ, the whole imagery and teaching has to do with a people already saved, who have access to God, who are pressing on to Canaan, and who need the continual ministrations of the priest and offerings for their sanctification. But let us see for ourselves; here are the references to blood:--

> "The children are partakers of flesh and blood" (ii. 14).
> "Into the second went the high priest alone once in every year, not without blood, which he offered for himself and for the errors of the people" (ix. 7).
> "Neither by the blood of goats and calves, but by His own blood He entered in once into the holy place, having obtained aionian redemption" (ix. 12).
>
> "For if the blood of bulls and of goats, and the ashes of an heifer sprinkling the unclean, sanctifieth to the purifying of the flesh" (ix. 13).
>
> "How much more shall the blood of Christ, who through the aionian Spirit offered Himself without spot to God, purge your conscience from dead works to serve the living God" (ix. 14).
>
> "Wherefore neither the first testament was dedicated without blood" (ix. 18).
>
> "He took the blood. . . . and sprinkled both the book, and all the people" (ix. 19).
>
> "Saying, This is the blood of the testament which God hath enjoined unto you" (ix. 20).
>
> "Moreover he sprinkled with blood both the tabernacle, and all the vessels of the ministry" (ix. 21).
>
> "And almost all things are by the law purged with blood" (ix. 22).
>
> "And without shedding of blood is no remission" (ix. 22).
>
> "Nor yet that He should offer Himself often as the high priest entereth into the holy place with the blood of others" (ix. 25).
>
> "For it is not possible that the blood of bulls and of goats should take away sins" (x. 4).
>
> "Having therefore, brethren, boldness to enter into the holiest by the blood of Jesus" (x. 19).
>
> "Of how much sorer punishment, suppose ye shall he be counted worthy, who hath trodden under foot the Son of God, and hath counted the blood of the covenant wherewith he was sanctified an unholy thing" (x. 29).
>
> "Through faith he kept the passover, and the sprinkling of blood, lest He that destroyed the firstborn should touch them" (xi. 28).
>
> "Ye have not resisted unto blood" (xii. 4).
>
> "To Jesus the Mediator of the new covenant and of the blood of sprinkling, that speaketh better things than Abel" (xii. 24).
> "The bodies of those beasts whose blood is brought into the sanctuary by the high priest, are burned without the camp" (xiii. 11).
>
> "Wherefore Jesus also, that He might sanctify the people with His own blood, suffered without the gate" (xiii. 12).
> "Now the God of peace, that brought again from the dead our Lord Jesus, that great Shepherd of the sheep, through the blood of the aionian covenant, make you perfect in every good work to do His will" (xiii. 20, 21).

Those that refer to redemption are ix. 12, 22, x. 4, and xi. 28; of these ix. 12 speaks of redemption as having been obtained already, and is not the result of the offering there, as verses 13, 14 prove; ix. 22, speaking of remission, may at first seem to be direct statement, yet it is in the midst of a context dealing with the covenant and tabernacle, and rather indicates that the remission which is a part of the new covenant (Heb. x. 16-18) cannot be enjoyed without this blood of sprinkling that links the people and the book together; xi. 28 refers to the passover, the true type of redemption, which offering is outside the scope of the epistle, for Hebrews has no place for redemption from Egypt, its setting being the wilderness and its centre the tabernacle. Salvation in the evangelical and gospel sense is not the theme of Hebrews; it deals with a saved people, and their sanctification.

The teaching of the epistle as to sanctification is directly bearing on the "purifying of sins", which Heb. i. 3 brings so prominently forward. It figures again in ii. 11 and x. 10, 14, "we are sanctified through the offering of the body of Jesus Christ once for all. . . . for by one offering He hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified". The context speaks of the new covenant, of access into the holiest, and of despising the blood of the covenant whereunto one is sanctified: it is not the salvation of the sinner, but the perfecting of those who are sanctified that is here; so we come back to Heb. i. 3. Of all the phases of the sacrificial work of Christ this one is selected, selected by reason of the fact that it is vitally connected with the purpose of the epistle. The greatness of the One who thus provided the purifying, the Son of God, makes wilful defilement a terrible thing, it does despite to the spirit of grace.

Heb. x. 12 tells us that after the Lord had offered one sacrifice for sins for ever, He sat down; this is the testimony also of Heb. i. 3, "When He had made a purifying of sins, sat down on the right hand of the Majesty on high". This has reference to His high priesthood, "we have such an high priest, who is set on the right hand of the throne of the Majesty in the heavens" (viii. 1), and to Himself as the pattern, "looking unto Jesus, the author and perfecter of faith, who for the joy that was set before Him, endured the cross, despising the shame, and is set down on the right hand of the throne of God" (xii. 2). Both the high priest and the pattern are for believers, so also this one phase of the work of Calvary, "the purifying of sins".

#10. The inherited Name, better than angels (Heb. i. 4).
pp. 181 - 186

The first "better" thing of the epistle is the exaltation of Christ ("having become by so much better than angels, by how much having inherited a more excellent name than they"). This is a sentence of un-English sound, and yet it brings out the comparison that is intended. The becoming better than the angels is not by virtue of the Lord's deity. Looked at from the divine standpoint, He Who is addressed as God (verse 8) must of necessity be better than angels; looked at from the human standpoint, He was made for a little while lower than the angels, and in that capacity as Son He has been highly exalted. The measure of His excellence above angels is His inherited name: by how much He has inherited, by so much He is greater.

The question then has to do with the inherited name. But first, we might pause to ask: Why should such an argument be necessary, and in what way does it contribute to the theme of the epistle?

Writing as he was to Hebrews, the apostle had in mind their veneration of angels. Stephen alludes to the place that angels hold in Israel, in Acts vii. 53: "Who have received the law by the disposition of angels, and have not kept it". The epistle to the Galatians says of the law, "it was ordained by angels in the hand of a mediator" (Gal. iii. 19). Some of the Jews went so far as to contend that Malachi, the last of the prophets, was an angel, his name meaning "My messenger", or "My angel". It is part of the purpose of this epistle to place the Lord Jesus Christ, as the Son, far above every other name and dignity. To have commenced with Moses as the law-giver would not have gone back far enough; Moses the mediator received the law by the disposition of angels. It must therefore be shown that Christ is much better than they, to establish His complete superiority. The exaltation of the Lord to the right hand of the Majesty on high marks the time when the Son was given the name that is above every name. It was at the resurrection that He was declared "son of God with power"; it was as the risen One that He claimed "all power" in heaven and in earth; the superiority of the Son above angels is one of degree, "by so much", and is to be understood in the light of His inherited name. The Lord Jesus by His birth at Bethlehem became "the Son of God", for said the angel to Mary, "the Holy Ghost shall come upon thee, and the power of the highest shall overshadow thee: therefore also that holy thing that shall be born of thee shall be called the Son of God" (Luke i. 35). When the Word became flesh, then was seen the glory of the only begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth. All through the spotless years of His life up to that dread crisis of the cross, the Father's testimony remained true and unchanged, "This is My beloved Son". He vindicated His claim to the name He bore, and the name becomes His by inheritance.

On page 183 of Volume VIII the structure of Heb. i. and ii. is given, and one member covering i. 2-14, "The Son, His glories, God and Lord, better than angels", must now be extended.

B | i. 2-14.

B | a | 2-4. The Son, Heir, made ages, upholds all things.
b | 5, 6. To which of the angels. . . . Thou art My Son?
c | 7. The Angels, Spirits, Ministers.
a | 8-12. The Son, O God, Throne, Lord, Creation.
b | 13. To which of the angels. . . . Sit on My right hand?
c | 14. The Angels, Ministering Spirits.

The argument that occupies the remainder of the chapter is an establishment of the glorious doctrine of the supremacy of the Son. The method which the apostle adopts to prove his point is to bring forward a series of quotations from the Hebrew Scriptures, all of them being taken from the Psalms. Seven Psalms are quoted, and the references give evidence of a design in the order of their quotation.

The Seven Psalms.

A | ii. 7. The King on Zion. The decree.
B | lxxxix. 26, 27, and II Sam. vii. 14. The King.
C | xcvii. 7. Worship Him all ye gods.
D | civ. 4. His angels spirits, His ministers a flaming fire.
C | xlv. 6, 7. Thy throne, O God is for ever and ever.
B | cii. 25. The Creator.
A | cx. 1. Priest on Zion. The oath.

Let us consider the passages which the apostle brings forward. The apostle's quotation and the manner of its introduction, "unto which of the angels did He at any time say?" show that the title, "the Son", is unique.

As it was in the days of the Lord on earth, so evidently it was at the time of writing this epistle the Scriptures were accepted as inspired truth, and however much their testimony may have been avoided or contravened, no voice seems to have been raised to throw doubt upon the infallible authority of the Word. There is also implied by the nature of the argument the completeness of the testimony of Scripture. It is sufficient to say that Scripture nowhere uses the expression, "Thou art My Son, this day have I begotten Thee", to prove, by the omission, that such words could never be said of angels at all. That Psalm ii. is prophetic of Christ, and of Christ in resurrection, we do not feel it to be necessary to prove; the testimony of men speaking under the inspiration of the Holy Ghost, and specially set apart to the authoritative position of apostles, is so great that no other evidence is becoming; such testimony is that of Acts xiii. 33.

The Psalm looks forward to the day when Christ as King shall be established on Zion, and shall rule to the uttermost part of the earth. The day of His begetting unto this glorious position was the day when, after He had suffered for sin, had died, and been buried, God raised Him from the dead, the firstfruits of coming glory. This double begetting finds an echo in Col. i. 15-18, where Christ is seen in the first place as the firstborn from the dead, the parallel with Heb. i. being very marked by the words that follow, "that in all things He might have the pre-eminence". The apostle brings another Scripture to bear upon this theme, and this time quotes from the words by Nathan to David, and which are referred to in Psalm lxxxix. Solomon here, as in Psalm lxxii., is a type of Christ. It is worthy of notice that in both cases Christ the Son is viewed as God's anointed King. While this fact is not brought into prominence by the apostle here, it is important, inasmuch as Christ, being King, could not be a priest after the order of Aaron; hence the Melchisedec priesthood is emphasized in this epistle. It may be objected, that both angels and men are called "sons of God". This is true, and the apostle in no wise denies it, but no angel has ever had a personal address made to him in this way, and no angel ever inherited the name. Angels are sons of God by creation, men become sons of God through faith; Christ, in resurrection, was declared Son of God by inheritance.

The third quotation is sometimes taken a little differently from the A.V. rendering; some would read it, "and when He again bringeth", in the sense of a second time. This we do not feel is necessary. The thought that the apostle insists upon is the superiority of Christ above angels, and the question whether this verse refers to His birth or His second coming does not materially alter the sense.

Passing from this threefold testimony, the apostle proceeds to a definite statement concerning the angels themselves. The Targum rendering of the verse quoted here, Psa. civ. 4, is:--

> "Who maketh His messengers, or angels, swift as spirits, and His ministers strong, or powerful, as a flaming fire."

The point that it is necessary to notice here is, not so much the nature of angels, but their capacity. They are messengers and servants; this is the distinction that is sharply drawn between them and the Son; "but unto the Son He saith, Thy throne, O God, is unto the age of the age". The strange phrase, "the age of the age", will be given closer attention when we are considering the definite teaching of the ages as taught in this epistle; at present we are considering the one great fact, that the Son is superior to the angels; they are ministers; He is addressed as God, and is seated upon a throne; His anointing above His fellows is an added testimony to His superior position. Without any effort to explain the strange wording of the quotation, the apostle leaves it to speak of itself. God addresses the Son as God, and it is in this light that the epistle introduces Him in verse 2. Not only does the Son sit as King and bear the name of God, but He is also addressed as Lord, and creation is ascribed to Him. Creation "in the beginning" is the work of His hands"; there are some who treat the passages of Scripture that speak of the Creatorship of Christ as though they meant nothing more than that Creation was made with a view to Him, or for Him, but the words are very plain here. In the beginning He laid the foundation of the earth, and the heavens are the works of His hands. "The works of Thy hands" can have only one meaning, that the Son is the actual Creator. The quotation does not finish here; the heavens and the earth "shall perish", but, in glorious contrast, we read of the Son, "but Thou remainest". When the appointed work is accomplished for which the heavens and the earth were called into being, they will be laid aside as a vesture, but of Christ it is written, "but Thou art the same, and Thy years shall not fail". Here we strike a note which shall find its echo when the wondrous teaching of the epistle shall have been given. In the last chapters in structural correspondence come the words, "Jesus Christ, the same, yesterday, to-day, and unto the ages". We now arrive at the concluding quotation:--

> "But to which of the angels said He at any time, Sit upon My right hand, until I make Thy enemies Thy footstool."

To ask the question is to answer it. To no angel however mighty did God ever address such an invitation. To One only has such a place been given, to that One Who is the brightness of His glory, to that One Who made a cleansing for sins, and Who was as a consequence raised to the right hand of the majesty on high. Familiarity with the scriptural fact of the place of Christ at the right hand of God has possibly dulled our appreciation of its greatness. The same Psalm that is quoted here is referred to again in chapter x. 12, 13, and again, in viii. 1, the apostle summarizes his teaching concerning the Melchisedec priesthood by saying, "We have such an high priest, who is set on the right hand of the Majesty in the heavens". The final reference to this high glory brings into prominence the original thought of Heb. i.

He has attained to this pre-eminence by way of inheritance:--

> "Who for the joy set before Him, endured a cross, despising the shame, and is set down on the right hand of the throne of God" (xii. 2).

Peter's testimony is much the same:--

> "Jesus Christ, Who is gone into heaven, and is on the right hand of God, angels and authorities and powers being made subject unto Him" (I Pet. iii. 22).

Space will not allow of further references, but we trust the reader will be sufficiently interested in this unique honour ascribed to his Lord to make a list of references where such a position is claimed by, or ascribed to, the Lord of glory. We defer consideration of Heb. i. 14 in order to give one expression in the verse the attention that it needs. We have not felt that it was necessary to enter into a careful examination of the Psalms themselves, as the evident purpose of the apostle in quoting them is the initial theme that Christ, as the Son, is by inheritance lifted far above angels. Incidentally, the unique title, "the only begotten Son", is set forth, as also the deity, "O God", the kingship, "thy throne", the creatorship, and the priesthood, but none of these things are a real part of the argument here, and we therefore wait until in the course of inspired argument these weighty themes are developed.

May we who are blessed under the terms of a dispensation differing from that of "Hebrews" keep prominently before us the blessed truth, and "set our affections on things above, where Christ sitteth on the right hand of God".

Lessons for Little Ones.

#2. The Creation of Man.
pp. 45, 46

Our first set of lessons were concerning God as the Creator, and creation itself was reviewed so that by seeing His works we may learn "what may be known of God" (Rom. i. 19, 20).

The child should now be taught its place and relation both regarding the creation and the Creator, and so we take the subject of man.

First.—Read Genesis i. 24-31.—On the sixth day were made (1) animals, (2) man. Man is linked with the lower animals, yet the pause, the consultation, and the making of man in the image of God set him apart from all creation as one having special dealings with God.

Question the child, point by point, to discern the differences in these two great sections of the sixth day:--

"Let the earth bring forth" – animals.
"Let us make man" – man.

The image and likeness (see ix. 6; I Cor. xi. 7; James iii. 9).

Title of Christ (Col. i. 15; II Cor. iv. 4; Heb. i. 3).

Parallel in the new creation (Eph. iv. 24; Col. iii. 10), the new man; note the renewal is in knowledge. Do not limit the image to the physical. The dominion given is a part of it, so also the mind which differs from all else in creation. Compare i. 27 with v. 1, 2; this proves that the creation of Gen. i. is the same as that of ii. 7-25.

Secondly.—Read Gen. ii. 7.—Man formed of the dust, the soil.

The word "man" here is adam=the ground. He became a living soul by breathing into his nostrils. Note the use of the word translated soul "creature" (Gen. i. 21, 24; ii. 19; ix. 10, 12). "Remember" (Eccles. xii. 1). The sin of idolatry and its senselessness (Rom. i. 25).

Learn Psalm viii.

Read to the child such passages as Isa. xl.; Psa. xc. Do not hurry with these lessons; be careful of details. See that false notions are not strengthened or implanted. Search the Scriptures, and compare passage with passage. Your child will value the Bible just so much as it sees that you do. Teach as much as possible by questioning.

Let us give an example. After having read Gen. i. 24-31 say, Can you tell me what were made on the sixth day?

Did God say the same words when He made animals and man?

What connection is there between man and God by his creation? (Image).

What connection and contrasts between man and animals? (1. The same order of creation, yet has, 2. Dominion, 3. Different food).

#3. Man.—His Fall.
pp. 95, 96

We have looked into the Scriptures and learned something about God, the Creator, and man, the greatest of His creatures, and have read just two chapters in the first book of the Bible. When we read the third chapter we come to a sad story, for there we read that man sinned and fell.

One word summarizes the sin of Adam, disobedience. Gen. ii. 17 gives the command, Gen. iii. 1-5 the temptation, and Gen. iii. 6 the disobedience. Notice, disobedience is connected with "hearkening" to a voice other than that of God (iii. 17, also 1-5). It may be that of our dearest friend (Eve), or our deadliest foe (serpent), it is all the same if it opposes the Word of God. Abraham was "blessed" because he obeyed God's voice (Gen. xxii. 18), but Jacob suffered severely because he obeyed his mother's voice to do wrong (xxvii. 8). Blessing is promised to obedience in Deut. xi. 27, but a curse to disobedience in xi. 28. See what Samuel told Saul (I Sam. xv. 22, and notice whose voice Saul obeyed [verse 24]). Adam's disobedience "made many sinners" (Rom. v. 19); it opened the door for sin to enter the world, "and death by sin". Gen. ii. 17 clearly tells us that "the wages of sin is death". The statement of Gen. iii. 19 shows us that "death entered by sin", and Rom. v. 14 tells us "death reigned from Adam to Moses", "that through the offence of one many have died" (verse 15). "The sting of death is sin" (I Cor. xv. 56).

Not only have all the children of Adam inherited a fallen nature and passes under condemnation, but every one of them has sinned (Rom. iii. 23). "All have gone astray" (Isa. liii. 6), "their own way" being the way of sin just as "hearkening" to any other voice leads to disobedience.

Rom. iii. 10-12 speaks of "none" and "all"; notice what is said. Verses 13-18 speak of the throat, the tongue, the lips, the mouth, the feet, the ways, the eyes. The words in verse 18 seem to be the cause of all the rest. The heart of man is the fountain of evil (Matt. xv. 19), it is deceitful above all things and desperately wicked (Jer. xvii. 9), and its imaginations are only evil continually (Gen. vi. 5).

Do not hurry to present the plan of salvation. Let the Scripture witness of the utter failure and sinfulness of man be really seen. A passage to memorize might be Psalm xiv. Gen. iii. should be carefully read, and such incidents as Saul's disobedience (I Sam. xv.) read and explained. Also, by way of illustration of the universality of sin, notice that even Abraham, Moses, David, Solomon, Hezekiah, Isaiah, Job, Peter, Paul, all have recorded against them sins of one sort or another. These will provide concrete examples of that which might otherwise be difficult doctrine.

Some may feel that such a subject is hardly suitable for "little ones". We have found that children understand and follow the teaching of Scripture on these subjects far more readily than many may believe, and we earnestly ask all who have the responsibility of teaching children to try by careful questioning and instruction to lay a good foundation for the days to come.

#4. What is Sin?
pp. 140, 141

We have learned that God is the great Creator, that man is His creature, that man has fallen. We have therefore brought our little charges face to face with the dreadful fact of sin.

What is Sin?.—Turn to I John v. 17, "All unrighteousness is SIN". Help the little mind to understand the word "unrighteousness". By illustrating by several words like un-known, un-clean, un-tidy, the little one will supply the meaning "not". Righteousness can be simplified by emphasizing the first syllable "right". We have now a scriptural definition in language that is within the child's grasp. "Everything that is NOT RIGHT is sin".

When addressing the adult believer in Ephesians, the apostle beseeches, but when enjoining obedience upon the child, he does not say, "because of the grace of God", but simply, "because it is right". Even in this epistle of grace the law is quoted when the child is instructed, even though it be "the first commandment with promise" (Eph. vi. 1, 2).

Turn again to I John iii. 4, "SIN is the transgression of the law". By wisely applied quotations where the words "transgression" and "law" occur, their meanings will be elicited. Never tell the child the meaning of a word where you can lead it to discover it for itself. Your child should realize from its earliest days that God's Word was written in another tongue. If this is the case you will be able to tell it that the word that God Himself used for “transgression of the law” is “lawlessness”. Sin therefore is going our own way instead of God’s way.

Turn yet again to Rom. xiv. 23, “Whatsoever is not of faith is SIN”. Faith therefore is very parallel to law in this respect. Faith cannot be “lawless”, faith is always “right”. In this passage it stand for the conscience enlightened by the truth and gospel. What the law was to the O.T. believer, faith is to the N.T. believer.

Psalm li. could be memorized, and such a passage as Rom. iii. read over together several times. If the child is able, a useful lesson (which should not be attempted at one sitting) would be the construction of a concordance of the word sin from one of the epistles. This should not be suggested to a child that has not had some year or two of ordinary schooling.

SIN IS	{	Lawlessness.
	\	Not of faith.

#5. Salvation.—The First, and the Last Adam.
pp. 175, 176

Salvation is many sided, and we must not unduly hurry in our endeavour to bring this wonderful testimony of God before our little charges. We observed, when dealing with the fall of man, that one word, disobedience, summed up the sin that brought in the curse. We shall find that obedience has brought in the blessing.

A clear statement as to this is found in Rom. v. 19, “For as by one man’s disobedience many were made sinners, so by the obedience of One shall many be made righteous”.

There are some who exclaim, “What, take little children to Rom. v.?” We say, Yes, and ask anyone who has the opportunity to test the clearness of the scripture upon the mind unclouded by “theology” and its problems. The parables, so often assumed to be the proper lesson material for the child, are far more difficult to comprehension than the doctrine of Rom. v. Let us notice what Rom. v. 12-21 teaches. We shall find that two persons are brought together, Adam and Christ. Adam is “the figure of Him that was to come”. Every evil effect of Adam’s action is answered by a corresponding effect of Christ’s action.

We can set out parallel columns and by dint of careful questioning and reading discover something like the following:--

ADAM.	CHRIST.
Through the offence of one, many are dead.	The grace of God, and the gift of grace hath abounded to many.
The judgment was by one to condemnation.	The free gift is of many offences unto justification.
By the offence of one death reigned by one.	They that receive abundance of grace and of the gift of righteousness shall reign in life by One.
By one offence judgment came upon all men unto condemnation.	By one righteousness the free gift came upon all men unto justification of life.
For as by one man's disobedience many were made sinners.	So by the obedience of One shall many be made righteous.
Where sin abounded.	Grace did much more abound.
That as sin hath reigned unto death.	Even so might grace reign through righteousness unto eternal life by Jesus Christ our Lord.

Some of the long words may need explanation, but the logic of the passage is not beyond the child mind.

Moreover, even if it should be difficult to teach, here we are at the fountain-head of sin and salvation. Read the two columns down separately, and see the legacy of sin, condemnation, and death for all in Adam, and then the gift in grace, the over-abounding grace that is stored for those in Christ.

These parallels will emphasize the urgent necessity of rebirth. The child will realize that salvation is more than an opinion; it is vital. To be saved, the sinner must pass from the line of Adam to the line of Christ. "For as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive". Death is Adam's legacy, life is Christ's. Fix it in the child's mind if you will, by some such scheme as

A s in Adam all
D ie, even so in Christ shall
A ll be
M ade alive.

Show from I Cor. xv. 45 Christ as the last "Adam".

Studies in the Epistles of the Mystery.

#30. "The Church. . . . the Fulness" (Eph. i. 23).

(*Further thoughts upon a wondrous theme).

pp. 17 – 20

At the creation of man, the purpose of his being seems to be foreshadowed in the words, "Let us make man in Our image, after Our likeness"; his domain was, for the time, the earth and its lower orders of life. The invisible God was imaged in this creation by Adam, the lower orders saw no higher manifestation of God on earth than man, made in the image of God. In a sense and degree infinitely beyond man's attainments the image of the invisible God is Christ, as Col. i. 15 records, "Who is the image of the invisible God, the firstborn of every creature". Another passage in Colossians reveals to us yet another of the glories of the Lord, "for in Him dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily" (Col. ii. 9).

The word "bodily" is somatikõs in the original, and explains how the Godhead dwelt in Christ; the same word in another form occurs in Luke iii. 22, "and the Holy Ghost descended in a bodily shape". It would appear that the body of the Lord was necessary to the full manifestation of the fulness of the Godhead to the members of His church and to the heavenly powers. This fulness resident bodily in Him is echoed back to God in His Church, for Col. ii. 10 continuing says, "and ye are complete in Him". Now the word "fulness" is plerõma, and "ye are complete" is peplerõmenoi, which might be rendered "filled full". J. N. Darby's note here is:--

> "The fulness or completeness of the Godhead is in Christ, as towards us; and we as towards God, are complete in Him."

In a previous paper on Ephesians we dwelt a little on the blessed fact that the Church is called "His body"; the verse, however, does not finish with this title, but adds one even more glorious, "the Church which is His body, the fulness of Him that filleth all in all". By comparing the teaching of Col. ii. 9 with Eph. i. 23 it seems that just as Christ is the fulness of God, and that in relation to the body, so the Church is the fulness of Christ, and that by reason of the special dispensational character indicated by the words, "the Church which is His body". Of this body Christ is the Head, and the relation between the head and the body in this connection is brought forward in such passages as > "I would have you know that the head if every man is Christ, and the head of the woman is the man; and the head of Christ is God. . . . Man. . . . is the image and glory of God, but the woman is the glory of the man" (I Cor. xi. 3 and 7).

Here we have a regular sequence, what God is to Christ, Christ is to man, and man is to woman: in each case the lesser is the glory of the greater, the woman is the glory of the man, the man is the glory of God: this is the order of things by virtue of creation:--

> "For the man is not of the woman; but the woman of the man, neither was the man created for the woman: but the woman for the man" (I Cor. xi. 8, 9).

The argument is transferred from the old creation to the new, and there the Church which is His body is renewed in knowledge

> "after the image of Him that created him, where there is neither Greek nor Jew, circumcision nor uncircumcision, Barbarian, Scythian, bond, nor free, but Christ is ALL and IN ALL" (Col. iii. 10, 11).

It would seem that the unity that is shadowed forth in the body is an essential feature of the Church. In that Church where there is neither Greek nor Jew, Christ can be ALL and IN ALL, and that Church which is His body, which "He created of the both", i.e., Gentile and Jew (Eph. ii. 15), that Church is the fulness of Him that filleth ALL in ALL. When the glorious consummation of God's purpose is reached and the words of I Cor. xv. 28 are fulfilled, then "God will be ALL IN ALL"; till that moment comes that wondrous fulness is vested in Christ. He is the One now who fills all in all. That these words are limited to the believer, and must not be interpreted universally, Col. iii. 11 would seem to indicate; perfect unity is necessary to manifest the fulness of Him that filleth all in all.

A church which is His bride, or His kingdom, or His people, cannot so fully reflect this glory as the church which is His body, and thus it is that the most glorious calling is reserved for the church of the dispensation of the mystery.

The word plerõma occurs four times in Ephesians, and each occurrence if studied will help us in our understanding of the subject.

First, the special dispensation which is connected with the Church of the One Body is spoken of as, "the dispensation of the fulness of the seasons" (i. 10), the characteristics of that dispensation are the headship of Christ, and the uniting together under that headship of things in heaven and earth; this is found to be equally the case in Eph. i. 23. Instead of speaking of the fulness of the seasons, the context speaks of "this age and the age to come"; instead of speaking of things in heaven and earth, the heavenly things are named – principalities and powers, etc., and the earthly is represented by the Church which is His body. Colossians, in its first reference to the fulness, takes us back first of all to the creation of things visible and invisible in heaven and earth, and links the pre-eminence of Christ as Creator with His headship as Saviour, which in turn leads on to the words, "for it was well pleasing that in Him should all fulness dwell" (Col. i. 16-19).

The third reference in Ephesians is found in chapter iii., where, as a conclusion to the prayer commenced in verse 14 the apostle says, "that ye might be filled unto all the fulness of God"; this is intimately related to the words, "that Christ may dwell in your hearts by faith". All the fulness dwells in Him, and can only be approximated by us as He, by faith, dwells in our hearts. The A.V. reads, "filled with all the fulness of God". One, and One only, is mighty enough to be filled with all the fulness; members of His body may be filled unto all the fulness of God, the utmost limit of their capacity is the measure of their comprehension of Christ Himself. As in other phases of divine manifestation it is written, "NO man hath seen God at any time, the only begotten Son, who is in the bosom of the Father, He hath declared Him", so with regard to the filling and the fulness. The words of Eph. iv. 13 speaks of the progress of faith toward the high goal:--

> "Till we all come unto the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of the Christ."

The Church which is His body is to be perfect man, even as it has already been created "one new man", its measure is a lofty one, it cannot aspire of itself to the fulness of God, it must needs have a Mediator; Christ is its measure, and His image its goal and glory. This glorious position of the Church in Christ would be like unto Lucifer's daring blasphemy were it conceived out of Christ.

Whether the Church will be His body in the future life we do not know. We incline to the thought that the body aspect is now, in time, while as a future glory is reserved for the Church the "fulness". In Eph. i. 23 the fulness is not spoken of as the fulness of God, but the fulness of Him that filleth all in all. Chapter iv. 9, 10 speaks of the Lord's descent into the lower parts of the earth, and His ascent far above all heavens, that He might fill all things; this the Church at present cannot reflect, except by faith. When, however, it is actually raised and seated far above all principality in the super-heavenlies, then will be seen, in a degree now impossible of comprehension, the high glory and wondrous grace that constituted the outcasts of the Gentiles the very fulness of Him that filleth all in all.

As a practical outcome, those who realize and appropriate this truth will surely above all others find Christ their all in all now, His grace will be their sufficiency, His strength their stay, His glory their goal. May it increasingly be so.

A state of grace, not of nature (Eph. ii. 1).

The structure of the epistle as a whole places chapter ii. in correspondence with iv. 7 - vi. 9. This may be seen in Volume II & III, page 93. Chapter ii. gives us the doctrine of which iv. 7 - vi. 9 specify the outworkings; let us note the theme of the chapter.

Builded together. /

In the first section (1-10) we have such words as “dead”, “trespasses”, “sins”, “disobedience”, “wrath”, “quickened”, “by grace saved”, “faith”, “walk” according to this age, and “walk” according to a new creation, all of which have to do with salvation from sin. In the second section (11-22) we have such words as “uncircumcision”, “aliens”, “far off”, “middle wall broken down”, “ordinances”, “one new man”, “fellow citizen”, and “holy temple”, and here the words “sin” and “death” do not occur. Instead of trespasses we have dispensational distance, instead of the flesh with its lusts and its wills, we have the flesh in its circumcision, its uncircumcision, and its enmity; in the one we have a creation in Christ Jesus unto good works; in the other a creation of the “twain” into one new man; in the one the quickened believer is raised to sit together with Christ in the heavenlies; in the other he is builded together as an habitation of God. We will not multiply these differences further, but will now turn our attention to the opening of the chapter which comes under the heading “once”.

A | a | “Once” walked.
b | The pattern.—The age of this world.
The power.—the energizing spirit.
c | Sons of disobedience.
A | a | “Once” conversation.
b | The motive.—Lusts of flesh.
The performance.—Wills of flesh.
c | Children of wrath.

The previous section which closed chapter i. had dealt with the glorious position of the risen Christ, His headship and His church. That church had been spoken of as His body. The apostle now proceeds to show that the same glorious power that quickened, raised, and seated the Saviour in the heavenlies, is that which has been exercised towards all that believe. The first item wherein Christ the head and the church His members agree, is that both were once dead. In the case of Christ Himself, we know that though He had no sin, and did no sin, yet He died for sins and died to sin. The A.V. would lead us to make a contrast here, and to understand that whereas Christ the sinless One died for the sins of others, we ourselves were already dead in sins of our own committing, and thus were set in the greatest contrast. We, however, ask the reader’s most careful attention while we seek to show what we believe is the real teaching of this passage.

First of all let us notice that although the deepest doctrine has been sounded in chapter i., but one reference has been made to sins in the whole of that passage. In chapter i. 7 we read, “In whom we have redemption through His blood, the forgiveness of sins”. The word “sins” is paraptõma, and is rightly translated “trespasses” in ii. 1. Chapter ii. 1 and 5 contain the only other occurrences in Ephesians of either the word paraptõma (trespasses), or hamartia (sins). When we realize that “trespass” or “offence” occurs some 9 times, and “sin” and “sins” over 40 times, in Romans, it will be evident that there is a considerable difference in the theme of these two epistles. Now, according to the A.V., Eph. ii. 1 is written to tell us that we were dead in trespasses and sins. This interpretation we very seriously call in question, and submit our reasons for believing that and the literal rendering is, "and you being dead (ones) to the trespasses and to the sins". It will be noticed that there is no word "in" in either the Greek or the literal rendering, this being a rendering of the dative case, in which the words "trespasses and sins" are written. Let us refer to other passages which are somewhat parallel.

Eph. ii. 1 speaks of our state in grace, and not our state by nature; the actual wording of the verse is as follows:--

Kai humas ontas nekrons tois paraptõmasi kai tais hamartiais,

Rom. vi. 2.	"We that are dead to sin" (te hamartia)*
Rom. vi. 10.	"He died unto sin" (te hamarita)*
Rom. vi. 11.	"Dead indeed unto sin" (te hamartia)*
Rom. vii. 4.	"Dead to the law" (tõ nomõ)*
Gal. ii. 19.	"Dead to law" (tö nomõ)*
I Pet. ii. 24.	"Dead to sins" (tais hamartiais)

[* - Dative singular.  - Dative plural.]

The last passage, I Pet. ii. 24, is identical with one part of Eph. ii. 1. Now the question that demands an immediate answer is, Can we substitute the words, "in sins", or "in law", where the above-quoted passage reads, "to sins", or "to law"? Let us try. "How shall we, that are dead in sin, live any longer therein"? If this be the correct translation the answer must be, Those who are dead in sin can do nothing else. We dare not pen the words in the place of the rendering of Rom. vi. 10, for the thought is blasphemous that Christ should ever have died in sin. And shall we say that believers are to reckon themselves dead in sin, but alive unto God? The very utterance refutes itself. There is no need for us to go further, the true rendering of Eph. ii. 1 must be, "And you being dead ones to trespasses and to sins", indicating the same blessed state of union with Christ as is indicated in connection with sin (not sin as here) in Rom. vi., and in connection with sins, in I Pet. ii. There is one passage which we have not yet referred to which is very parallel with Eph. ii. 1, viz., Col. ii. 13, "And you being dead in your sins and the uncircumcision of your flesh" (the word "in" is omitted by the best texts, and by the Numeric New Testament). To make verse 13 refer to our state by nature, breaks the inspired line of teaching; in verse 11 the statement is made, "ye are circumcised", which is interpreted as the "putting off of the body of the flesh by the circumcision of Christ", so that we can say, Here is union with Christ as to circumcision. Verse 12 continues by saying that we were "buried with Him in the baptism", and are "risen with Him through the faith of the inworking of that God who raised Him from the dead". Here again is union, this time in burial and resurrection; note also the close parallel of one passage with Eph. i. 19, 20, "His power to usward who believe according to the inworking of His mighty power which He wrought in Christ when He raised Him from the dead".

Keeping to our new translation, Col. ii. 13 makes no sudden digression, but continues the line of teaching, "and you being dead ones to trespasses, and the uncircumcision of your flesh, He made alive together with Him". We must not leave Eph. ii. 5 unconsidered, lest some should think it taught something contrary to our suggested translation. Ta kai ontas hemas nekrous tois paraptomasi, "and we being dead ones to trespasses". To be made alive together with Christ follows being dead to trespasses and sins here and in Col. ii. 13. This is precisely the same order that is found in Rom. vi., vii., and Gal. ii. Rom. vi., like Col. ii., speaks of our burial, baptism, and resurrection. It tells us that we who died to sin, now live to God; so Gal. ii. 19, "for I through law am dead to law, that I might live unto God". Thus it appears that Eph. ii. 1 is not teaching us that we were all "dead in trespasses and sins", but that through the mercy of God we are dead ones to trespasses and sins.

One further item before we close this paper. It will be noticed that in verse 1 we read "you", while in verse 5 we read "we". The apostle is linking Jewish and Gentile believers together here, just as he does in the next section by the words, "the both", and "twain". You died to sins; we also died to sins, and by grace He has made us alive together with Christ.

Let us not give away blessed truth; what though evangelical doctrine be deprived of the testimony of these verses to the depravity and corruption of sinners, it will be far better than missing the mind of the Spirit in such an important passage.

#32. Dead Ones to Sins (Eph. ii. 1).
pp. 81 - 85

In the preceding paper of this series we sought to show that Eph. ii. 1 did not teach the doctrine of human depravity, but the believer's relation to trespasses and sins, "And you being dead ones to trespasses and to sins". Let us now consider the relation of this passage with that of Rom. vi., and then with its context.

Rom. vi. while somewhat parallel deals with the root – sin; Eph. ii. deals with the fruit – sins. Rom. vi. opens with the question, "What shall we say then? Shall we continue in sin, that grace may abound?" There is no parleying, debating, or moralizing in the apostle's answer. To him it is a matter of life and death. "Let it not be. How shall we, who died to sin, live any longer in it?" The apostle calls the mind of his readers to their baptism wherein union with Christ involved also union with His death, "baptized into Jesus Christ, baptized into His death".

Baptism buried the believer also with the Lord into that death, that "like as Christ was raised out of dead ones by the glory of the Father, even so, we also should walk in newness of life". Not merely a new life, but a new kind of life, in fact, resurrection life. The old man was crucified with Christ so that the body of sin might be rendered inoperative. This body of sin is a most awful thing, for by it we are enslaved to sin. So it is written that the old man was crucified, and the body of sin rendered powerless THAT WE MAY NO LONGER BE ENSLAVED TO SIN. It is sin's dominion and sin's service that are here in view. The reign of sin and death ends when the reign of grace begins, "For sin shall not have dominion over you, for ye are not under the law but under grace" (verse 14).

It is this present deliverance from sin's dominion that is in view all the time. "Let not sin therefore reign in your mortal body". This must necessarily be limited to the present life. When this mortality puts on immortality, such an injunction, praise God, will be unnecessary. It is equally so with regard to verse 8, "Now if we died with Christ, we believe that we shall also live with Him". This is often read as though it referred to the future resurrection life of the believer. It does, but only because the future resurrection is involved in the present anticipation. Notice how the argument proceeds:--

> "Knowing that Christ being raised out of dead ones dieth no more, death hath no more dominion over Him. For in that He died, He died unto sin once; but in that He liveth, He liveth unto God."

Here the resurrection of the Lord is plainly taught. Now how will the apostle continue? Will he say, you also who have believed in Him shall in that day be raised, too, to likewise live unto God? No, he does not. What he does say involves the believer's present life in this mortal body, "Likewise reckon ye also yourselves to be dead indeed unto sin, but alive unto God through Jesus Christ our Lord". This is the "living with Him" of verse 8, blessed anticipation of living with Him in the glad day that is coming. The whole of the chapter deals with the great deliverance of the believer from the dominion and thraldom of sin. The chapter proceeds to contrast the service of sin with the service of God, and chapter vii. shows in what awful bondage sin and law holds a man until delivered by the Lord. Nothing but "the law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus" can make us "free from the law of sin and death".

To such a blessed state of liberty the Ephesian saints had arrived. They knew that in the death of Christ they had died to sin, and it was because they were already believers that the apostle prayed for them, that among other things they might know what was the exceeding greatness of His power to usward who believe, according to the inworking of His mighty power which He wrought in Christ when He raised Him from dead ones. Note, the prayer is not that we should know the power or process of the resurrection of Christ personal, it is that we may know what is the exceeding greatness of His power to USWARD, and that that power is according to, or in harmony with, the power put forth to raise Christ from the dead and exalt Him to the right hand of God in the heavenlies far above all. That such is the case Eph. ii. abundantly proves. If i. 20 tells us that Christ was raised from the dead, ii. 6 teaches us that we were "raised together"; so also, if Christ was made to sit at the right hand of God in the heavenlies, the believers have been made to "sit together in the heavenlies in Christ Jesus".

Not only had these believers died to sin, they were dead ones to sins. Not only did they realize that the truth in Jesus taught that they had put off the old man, but that they had put off the old man with his deeds, and that they had put off concerning the former conversation the old man, and were renewed in the spirit of their minds. Not only were they dead to sin, but to sins; not only the old man put off, but all bitterness, and wrath, and anger, and clamour, and evil speaking, together with all malice. Nothing but the exceeding greatness of His power to usward could accomplish such a wonderful change.

Peter in his first epistle speaks of "being dead to sins" and the context illuminates the expression. He tells us that Christ's sufferings leave us a "copy" (hupogrammos, the copy set for a pupil, the lines traced out for workmen to work by) with the object that we may > "follow His steps, who did no sin, neither was guile found in His mouth (works and words, compare Eph. iv. 28, 29, 'hands', 'mouth'); who being reviled, reviled not again: suffering, He threatened not, but committed Himself to Him that judgeth righteously; who His own self bare our sins in His own body on the tree, that we being dead to sins, should live to righteousness; by whose stripes ye were healed" (I Pet. ii. 21-24).

Christ's sufferings as a "copy", following "His steps", meekly submitting instead of giving place to the "old man and his deeds", these are to do with having died to sins.

Let us not hold back from the doctrine of this important verse (Eph. ii. 1). We know and rejoice, as the context teaches, that it is all of grace, that it is not of works, yet, we do not misunderstand grace and teach licence for liberty, and with the context would emphasize that while our salvation is not out of works, it is unto good works. Let not a spurious "holiness" deprive us of the true. All our holiness is found "in Christ", and we cannot walk worthy of our calling if we do not realize that we who died to sin should also be dead ones to sins. Let us again emphasize that the "truth" is not that we have put off the old man, but that we have put off the old man with his practices (Col. iii. 9). The "truth" is not that the old man is crucified, and that is sufficient; no, the old man is crucified, and the body of sin powerless, that we may be no longer enslaved to sin. "Know ye not", said the apostle of grace to those justified by faith, "that to whom ye yield yourselves servants to obey, his servants ye are to whom ye obey: whether of sin unto death, or of obedience unto righteousness?" (Rom. vi. 16). If such words do not harmonize with our doctrine, let us give up that doctrine, but let us hold fast the faithful Word. We feel constrained to emphasize that those believers to whom the marvels of grace and glory were revealed (as in Eph. i.), those spiritual blessings, those heavenly places, that predestination, that these believers were not led to believe that free grace meant irresponsibility, but rather that free grace gave them for the first time freedom to serve and obey from the heart the mind and will of God which had been hitherto impossible. The apostle says they were dead to trespasses and to sins. Let us consider these two words.

TRESPASSES (paraptõma).—The original word is from parapiptö, to fall off or away (e.g., Heb. vi. 6), and means a fall, an offence. Dr. Bullinger in his lexicon explains it as:-- > "A falling when one should have stood upright, a misfall, mishap; hence a falling from right, or duty, the particular and special act of sin from ignorance, inadvertence, or negligence; sin rashly committed by one unwilling to do an injury."

Gal. vi. 1 gives this element of surprise or of being caught unawares, "Brethren, if a man be overtaken in a fault, ye which are spiritual restore such an one in the spirit of meekness; watching thyself, lest thou also be tempted". It is the word which is used in

Rom. v. 15, 16, 18, and 20 of Adam's act of disobedience, which opened the door for the entrance of sin and death.

SINS (hamartia).—The original word is from hamartanõ, "To miss" as a mark, or as a way, a deviation, a failure. The tragedy of sin lies not only in its corruption and its criminality, but in the fact that it writes "failure" across the life of man. The bow has been drawn, the arrow has been shot, the mark has been missed; all have sinned and come short. Both to sins of rashness, ignorance, and temptation, as well as to sins of failure and deviation, the believer has died.

Do we intend by this that there are no longer two natures in the child of God? By no means. Do we intend by this that we have no sin, and that we shall not sin? By no means; but, knowing the blessed fact that Christ died to sin and for sins, we "reckon ourselves dead indeed to sin" and also to "trespasses and sins", and set our minds on things above, seeking the grace that He alone can give to enable us to begin to walk worthy of the vocation wherewith we are called.

#33. "The Age of this World" (Eph. ii. 2, 3).
pp. 113 - 118

The believer in Christ has died to trespasses and sins. This supposes that once the believer lived in them, which the apostle proceeds to teach, showing in so doing the character of those sins to which the believer is now dead. First let us notice to whom the apostle addresses himself. You in verses 1 and 2, we and us in verses 3 and 7. It is noticed by all readers that the words of verse 1 are repeated in verse 5, where the subject is resumed, but it may be necessary to point out the change of pronoun whereby both Gentiles and Jews, one in sinfulness, may realize their oneness in grace. "And you being dead ones to trespasses and to sins", "we also being dead ones to trespasses". This linking together is observable in the verses now before us, "in which YOU once walked. . . . among whom also WE all once had our conversation. . . .", the sinful life is called a walk, and this chapter places before us two walks and two only, the one "according to the age of this world", the other, the good works of the new creation (verse 10). Death and resurrection stand between these two, and to walk according to the age of this world is to walk contrary to our calling which has to do with the age to come.

It will be of service to us if we give a little time to the study of this word "walk". Starting with Romans, we have first of all the new life presented as a walk:--

> "Therefore we were buried with Him by baptism into death, that like as Christ was raised up from the dead by the glory of the Father, even so we also should walk in newness of life" (Rom. vi. 4).

Here is not reformation, but newness, the newness of life from the dead. Three other references follow in Romans in which the negative appears, and by what they deny, the reader may see the character of the walk of the flesh.

> Rom. viii. 4, "That the righteous requirements of the law might be fulfilled in us, who walk not after the flesh but after the spirit."

Here we have another division, "flesh" and "spirit".

> Rom. xiii. 13, 14, "As in (the) day, we should walk becomingly, not in riotings and drinkings; not in chambering and wantonness, not in strife and envying; but put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ, and make no provision for the lusts of the flesh."

Again the division is sharp and clear; on the one hand Christ, on the other the six-fold lusts of the flesh, and the exhortation to walk becomingly.

> Rom. xiv. 15, "But if thy brother be grieved with thy meat, no longer according to love thou walkest."

Here are three practical outworkings of the newness of life set forth in chapter vi.; they all need a separate study, but cannot receive more than a passing glance in this review. I Cor. iii. 3, "Are ye not carnal, and walk according to man?"; this must be read together with the reference to man's day of chapter iv. 3 (margin). II Cor. v. 7, "We walk by means of faith and not by means of sight". Col. ii. 6, "As ye have therefore received Christ Jesus the Lord, walk ye in Him". Col. iii. 7, "In which ye also once walked, when ye lived in them". Oh what a depth of doctrine and practice these two verses contain; see how the reception of Christ, and the character in which we receive Him, must influence our walk; see also the way in which the walk is linked with the life, Ye walked. . . . when ye lived is true both in the sphere of the flesh and of the spirit, so also runs the argument of Gal. v. 25, "If we live in the spirit, let us also walk in the spirit"; the word "walk" occurs seven times in the epistle to the Ephesians, we give the references: ii. 2, 10; iv. 1, 17; v. 2, 8, 13.

Let us come closer to the passage under review, and learn from the parallels in Ephesians and Colossians.

> "Wherein once ye walked according to the age of this world, according to the prince of the authority of the air, of that spirit now energising in the sons of disobedience" (Eph. ii. 2).
> "This I say therefore, and testify in the Lord, that ye no longer walk as the Gentiles also walk, in the vanity of their mind, having the understanding darkened, being alienated from the life of God through the ignorance that is in them, because of the blindness of their heart; who being past feeling have given themselves over unto lasciviousness, to work all uncleanness with greediness" (Eph. iv. 17-19).
> "Mortify therefore your members which are upon the earth; fornication, inordinate affection, evil concupiscence, and covetousness which is idolatry; for which things' sake the wrath of God cometh" (Col. iii. 5, 6).

Such is the natural condition of those who were by grace blessed with all spiritual blessings in the heavenlies in Christ. The sinful walk of Eph. ii. 2 is said to be according to (1) the age of this world, and (2) the prince of the authority of the air.

THE AGE OF THIS WORLD.—The way in which aiõn is used in this verse prevents us from translating aiõnian, "age-abiding", or "age-lasting", because something more than a time idea is intended here. Character also must be understood; while "age" therefore includes the idea of time, it also includes the characteristics of that time; the expression, "age of this world", looks at the age dominated by "the world". The A.V. suggests character by the translation "course". What is the world? Kosmos.—In secular writings this word always denotes order, regularity, ornament. In I Pet. iii. 3 it is translated "adorning". Wahl translates James iii. 6 "ornament (i.e., the glosser over) of iniquity". In its primary usage it indicates the created heaven and earth, and all therein. The Lord Jesus said, "My kingdom is not of this world" (John xviii. 36), although His kingdom will one day include the earth and the land of Israel. "This world" denotes the order obtaining now, and this world is stained with sin, and at enmity against God. This world has a prince, "the prince of this world cometh and hath nothing in Me", "Now shall the prince of this world be cast out", "the prince of this world is judged". It is evident from these passages that the world as at present constituted is anti Christ, and therefore to walk according to it is a mark of the unbeliever.

A | Ye are from beneath;
B | I am from above;
A | Ye are of this world;
B | I am not of this world (John viii. 23).

The seventeenth chapter of John has much to say concerning the world; the Lord declared both of His disciples and Himself that they were "not of this world". God has made "foolish the wisdom of this world", and "the spirit of the world" is placed in opposition to "the spirit which is of God". "The fashion of this world passeth away" (I Cor. i. 20; iii. 19; ii. 12; vii. 31).

The epistle to the Galatians has two very strong references to the world; the first (iv. 3) speaks of it as a sphere of bondage, "even so we, when we were children, were in bondage under the elements of the world", which elements are again referred to in verse 9 as "weak and beggarly". Gal. vi. 14 says, "but let it not be that I should boast, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, through which the world has been crucified to me, and I unto the world". No words could more clearly declare the utter antipathy that exists between the gospel of grace (as preached and practised by the apostle) and the world, than these two references. The elements of the world, together with the traditions of men, are "a vain deceitful philosophy", and "not according to Christ". To these elements the believer has died, for the apostle says, "Wherefore, if ye died with Christ from the elements of the world, why as though living in the world are ye subject to ordinances" (Col. ii. 8, 20). It will be seen from this earth passage that it is still possible to be living in this world; the entangling web of the world alas holds us all, we are often unaware of it until some revealing ray of light shines from the Word of truth. True religion includes the keeping of oneself "unspotted from the world" (James i. 27), which clearly indicates its moral character and defiled state before God. Further, James asks, "Know ye not that the friendship of the world is enmity with God? Whosoever therefore will be a friend of the world is the enemy of God". It is in this epistle that Abraham, the man of faith, the man who left the world, is called the friend of God (ii. 23). Peter speaks both of the "corruptions" and "pollutions" of the world, the last word being the "miasma" plague spreading filth, showing the awful condition of the world before God (II Pet. i. 4; ii. 20).

The first epistles of John uses the word twenty-four times in its five chapters, while the prison epistles use it only seven times in all. We cannot stay to consider all these references but just mention one or two. I John ii. 15 commands us to "love not the world", declaring that "if any one love the world, the love of the Father is not in him", moreover verse 16 supplies us with an insight into the "things that are in the world"—the desire of the flesh, the desire of the eyes, and the pride of life. Verse 17 echoes I Cor. vii. 31, the world knows neither the believer, nor his Lord (iii. 1). It hates him, even as Cain hated Abel (iii. 12, 13). The words of iii. 17 should be read with ii. 16, for the words translated "life" and "goods" are the same. Every one who has been begotten of God, and who believes that Jesus is the Son of God, overcomes the world. The last reference is in v. 19, "the whole world lieth in wickedness"; this may possibly mean "in the wicked one". Such is the Scriptural statement. What fellowship hath light with darkness, death with life, Christ with Belial? The great complexity—the world, stands on one side, Christ stand on the other. God loved the world and sent His Son into it to save sinners from their sins, but He came not to repair or renovate the world that must pass away. It has been weighed in the balances and found wanting; its politics are fore-doomed, its culture is unsanctified and Christless; its civilization goes in the way of Cain.

Just Lot, vexing his righteous soul, is a picture of the believer who has not learned the Scriptural character of the world, Abraham, outside the city, the picture of the man of God. Once the believer formed a part of that great system, the world; nothing but death and burial with Christ can make it possible for such to become "dead to the world"; the believer severed from the world, its advantages and its snares, finds his all in Christ. To some this may sound a hard saying, but the Scripture teaching seems clear. To walk "according to the age of this world" is the exact opposite to having died to sin. To walk according to man is the denial of spirituality, so self-evident is this that the apostle asks those who died with Christ from the elements of the world, "why, AS THOUGH LIVING in the world, are ye subject to ordinances?" This also is his thought in Eph. ii. There, the believer is viewed as dead to sin, quickened, risen, and seated with Christ, the other side of that grave lies the "times past", and with it the walk according to the "age of this world".

#34. "The World, the Flesh, and the Devil" (Eph. ii. 2, 3).
pp. 145 - 150

The Scripture not only teaches us that our life before salvation may be described as a walk "according to the age of this world", it also shows the power that is at work in the sons of disobedience; the world is looked upon as a kingdom, over which there rules a prince, his title as given in this passage is, "the prince of the authority of the air". The word translated "prince" is archõn, and indicates one who is first in authority, and so a prince. It is used of the rulers of the synagogue (Luke viii. 41), and of the rulers of the Jews (Luke xxiv. 20; John iii. 1). The title is used by Stephen with reference to Moses (Acts vii. 27, the A.V. of Exod. ii. 14 reading, "a prince and a judge"). Satan is spoken of as the prince of the demons (Matt. ix. 34; xii. 24, see verses 26-27), whilst verse 28 places the Spirit of God against the prince of the demons. Three times do we read in John's Gospel of "the prince of this world", viz., "Now is the judgment of this world: now shall the prince of this world be cast out"; "the prince of this world cometh and hath nothing in Me"; "the prince of this world is judged" (John xii. 31; xiv. 30; xvi. 11). The last reference where this word occurs is suggestive and cheering, "Jesus Christ. . . . the prince of the kings of the earth".

A cognate of archõn comes in Eph. i. 21 where it is rendered "principality", while the word "power" of the same verse is the word authority, rendered "power" in A.V. of Eph. ii. 2. The prince here spoken of is "the prince of the authority of the air". This is a strange title, and it seems to show that Satan, at present, has his seat of government in the air, and because of this the air does not escape the final judgments and raptured saints are to "meet the Lord in the air". To us, who are still flesh and blood, the air seems to be unsuited as a permanent abode, yet when we remember that we are dealing with spirit powers, we remember also that our objections are no longer valid. The conflict of the believer is described in Eph. vi.; it is not directed against "flesh and blood", but "principalities, authorities, world-holders of this darkness, spiritual wickedness in the heavenlies", shows that rule and dominion over this world and its darkness is exercised by those who are not flesh and blood, but who are mighty powers in the heavenlies; the prince of these powers is also the prince of this world, and the god of this age.

Eph. ii. is not alone in speaking of the state of unconversion as that of the dominion of Satan. The apostle, receiving an epitome of his ministry, in Acts xxvi. 18 speaks of the turning "from the authority of Satan unto God". Again in Col. i. 13 the apostle speaks of being delivered "from the authority of darkness", and in ii. 15 he speaks of Christ having "spoiled principalities and authorities" by the cross. Something of the meaning of the title, "prince of the authority of the air", may be gathered from Rev. xi. 6, where the witnesses are said to have authority to shut heaven, and to turn the waters to blood; or again in Rev. xiii. 2, where it is written that the dragon gave to the beast "his power, and his throne, and his great authority". Whatever the dread authority be that is spoken of in Eph. ii. 2, it is wielded by a spirit, who is a mighty energizing power in the sons of disobedience.

Two spirits powers are brought into strong contrast in this contest, the one, the spirit of the evil power that energizes the unsaved in their disobedience to God, the other, the Spirit of Him Who raised up Jesus from the dead. In Eph. i. 19, 20 we read of:--

> "the exceeding greatness of His power to us-ward who believe according to the enregizing of His mighty power which He wrought in Christ when He raised Him from the dead."

While Scripture does not minimize the greatness of the energizing power of Satan, it does draw attention to the "exceeding greatness" of the energizing power of God. This evil energy is spoken of in II Thess. ii. 7, 9, "the mystery of iniquity already energizeth", and "whose coming is according to an energizing of Satan"; this dreadful working is met by God in verse 11, "and for this cause God shall send them an energizing of deceit". Whether we can fathom this awful depth or not, we can realize the reality of Satan's power, and understand in some measure the unseen worldwide influence that is manifesting itself on every hand in the case of nations, and of the world, in fact in all the things of man. "The son of disobedience" are put in direct contrast with those who are "children of light", showing thereby that disobedience is connected with darkness.

Apeitheia is rendered "unbelief" in Rom. xi. 30, 32, and Heb. iv. 6, 11. Peithõ is often rendered "persuade", and the sons of disobedience are chargeable with an unwillingness to be persuaded as to the truth. While the world is divided into two main divisions, saved and unsaved, both of these divisions are sub-divided; not only are the saved blessed under various dispensations, but they are also made up of ready and unready ones. The unsaved are all unbelievers, but some have never wilfully rejected the word, having never heard the gospel (Rom. x. 14, 15), while others are said to have pleasure in them that commit the awful works of darkness (Rom. i. 32). There are those who are said to be "ever learning, and never able to come to a knowledge of the truth", the reason being that they "resist the truth", and are men of corrupt minds, "reprobate concerning the faith" (II Tim. iii. 7, 8). The "strong delusion that they should believe a lie", is sent to those who "received not the love of the truth" (II Thess. ii. 10, 11). The miracles of the false prophet deceived them that had received the mark of the beast" (Rev. xix. 20). It is a part of the work of Satan to turn men away from the truth, for "the god of this age hath blinded the minds of the unbelieving, lest the light of the gospel of the glory of Christ, Who is the image of God, should shine unto them" (II Cor. iv. 4); such were the Gentiles, walking in the vanity of their minds, having the understanding darkened.

If the Ephesians to whom the apostle wrote (addressing them as "ye" in ii. 2), were by nature "sons of disobedience", the Jews from whom the apostle had been taken (spoken of as "we" in verse 3), were as truly "children of wrath even as others", "among whom we all had our conversation in time past". It is not strictly necessary that the we of verse 3 should be limited to the Jews, for the apostle may have intended an all-embracive term, "we all", Jews and Gentiles, but seeing that the distinction is observed in verses 11 and 12, it may be intended here also. It is a levelling statement; outwardly Israel was not numbered among the nations; they were the circumcision, others had no hope, no Messiah, no God, yet were they (the favoured people) children of wrath even as the others, they too, in spite of electing grace, and wonderful laws, were in heart so like the heathen that the apostle sees no distinction and says, "among whom", not separated and distinct, but "among whom we all had our manner of life". Of the Gentiles dispensationally it was written that they were "Gentiles in the flesh" and "without God in the world" (11 and 12), yet of all, whatever their dispensational privilege or disadvantage, it can be said that they all lived "in the desires of the flesh".

Gal. v. 16, "Walk in the spirit, and ye shall not fulfil the desire of the flesh", will make clear that to be so characterized is an evidence that the spirit which thus leads and energizes is not of God. The desire of the flesh is the easiest of all entries for the spirit that energized the sons of disobedience. Look back over history, where will you stop? Must we not go back to the dawn of creation, and there in Eden's garden see the tempter making our first parents sons of disobedience by the "desire of the flesh" (Gen. iii. 6). These desires are "deceitful"; the truth in Jesus teaches "that ye have put off concerning the former conversation the old man, which is corrupt according to the deceitful desires" (Eph. iv. 22). Peter warns believers (calling them by the name of "strangers and pilgrims" to "abstain from fleshly desires which war against the soul" (I Pet. ii. 11), and again in iv. 2 he says, "that he no longer should live the rest of his time in the flesh to the desires of men, but to the will of God". Again, in II Pet. i. 4 he speaks of having "escaped the corruption that is in the world through lust" (or desire), and says of certain evil-doers that they "walk after the flesh in polluting desires" (ii. 10). The "scoffers" who say, "Where is the promise of His coming?", have this characteristic that "they walk after their own desires". The epistle to the Romans reveals the reason why the desire of the flesh is so faithful an ally of Satan. Sin reigns in the mortal body of the unbeliever, "let no sin, therefore, reign in your mortal body, that ye should obey it in the lust (or desires) thereof" (Rom. vi. 12). "Put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ, and make no provision for the lusts (or desires) of the flesh" (Rom. xiii. 14). "They that are Christ's have crucified the flesh with the passions and desires" (Gal. v. 24). We have used the word "desires" rather than "lusts", because in present day usage, "lust" has become lowered in meaning, and is usually associated with immoral and base passions; it is misleading to think that such is the scriptural limitation. The desires of the flesh may be above all suspicion of vice or immorality, they may include many of the legitimate things of life, they may include high ambitions and great schemes, the point is they are the desires of the FLESH, and the mind of the flesh is enmity against God. The great moving power of all men is desire. The man without desire or ambition accomplishes little; the desires of the flesh, however, soon lead to "doing the will of the flesh and of the mind". This is in exact contrast with the statement concerning the servants of Christ "doing the will of God from the heart" (Eph. vi. 6).

The whole difference between saved and unsaved may be expressed in this difference between their relation to the will of God: in the one case the dominant power is the "will of the flesh", while in the other it is "that good and perfect and acceptable will of God". Just as there is a filthiness of spirit as well as of flesh (II Cor. vii. 1), so there is the will of the mind, just as evil as that of the flesh; the mind (dianoia) of the unsaved is darkened (Eph. iv. 18), and enmity and alienation by wicked works is associated with it in Col. i. 21. Speaking of other phases of God's purpose, the new covenant deals with this alienation of mind, for it includes the promise, "I will put My laws into their mind" (Heb. viii. 10). When we realize the compelling force of desire and will, and then further have revealed that behind all the activities of this world there is the spirit that energizeth the sons of disobedience, we may well exclaim, "By grace are ye saved"! Nothing but the power that raises the dead could suffice to deliver us from this authority of darkness. That authority still constitutes our enemy, but thanks be to God we are more than conquerors in Him who is raised far above all.

#35. Rich Mercy and Riches of Grace (Eph. ii. 4-7).

Our study of verses 2 and 3 left us with a sense of the utter impossibility for the flesh, energized as it is by a wicked spirit, and environed in a world that is the enemy of God, of doing anything to bring about its own deliverance. The first words of verse 4 are the only words under circumstances that could be uttered, if the whole race were not to perish. "But God": great as the opposition may be, impossible as the task may appear, God is always the One and true turning point, with God all things are possible; Abraham and Sarah, as good as dead, shall have a seed as multitudinous as the stars of heaven and the sand on the sea shore, for He is the God of resurrection: did He stop short of that, all the promises and threatenings of law, all the rigours of Egypt or the blessings of a land flowing with milk and honey, would still leave the human heart untouched and unrepentant.

Rom. v. 8 is another instance of the introduction of the words, "but God"; so also are I Cor. i.27, ii. 10, iii. 6, where in each case the inability and failure of the flesh are exchanged for power and wisdom by the God of resurrection. Before the passage in Eph. ii. proceeds to tell us the wondrous works of God, it stays for a moment to tell us what He is—"but God, who is rich in mercy, for His great love wherewith He loved us". He is rich in mercy. Dr. Bullinger in his Greek Concordance and Lexicon explains eleos to mean, "a feeling of sympathy with misery, active compassion, the desire of relieving the miserable". Mercy differs from grace, in that it considers misery with pity, whereas grace considers the guilt and unworthiness of the object of its care. This is noticeable in the epistle to the Romans; the great word of Rom. i.-viii. is grace, and mercy does not occur until the dispensational and practical sections are reached in chapters ix.-xvi.

God is rich in this blessed quality. The riches of His goodness, the riches of His glory, the riches both of His wisdom and knowledge, the riches, yea the exceeding riches of His grace (Rom. i.4; ix. 23; xi. 3; Eph. i. 7, 18; ii. 7; iii. 16; Phil. iv. 19) are all lavished upon the undeserving children of wrath, accomplishing every step of their way from the initial repentance, brought about by the inheritance of the saints, and all summed up in the unsearchable riches of Christ (Eph. iii. 8).

One may have riches, and yet not use them, or use them only upon self. What is the motive cause that places the riches of God at the disposal of mercy? "Because of His great love wherewith He loved us". The word "great" here draws attention to the abundance of the love rather than the quality of greatness; it was because God so loved that He saved us sinners of the Gentiles. This is what He is, rich in mercy as the God of love. What will such a God do? Verse 5 takes up the theme of verse 1, "Ye being dead to trespasses and sins. . . . we also being dead to trespasses, He made us alive together with Christ". The apostle has more to say than this, but before he goes further he is constrained to ejaculate, "by grace are ye saved".

It is well to pause at this N.T. Selah. Over and over again we have heard brethren speak of these blessings, death with Him has been remembered, being raised and seated with Him has been gratefully acknowledged, but being made alive together with Him has often been forgotten. It may be true that to be raised necessitates life, nevertheless God, who is rich in mercy, calls our attention to the blessed fact of life in Christ. The apostle who was dead to the law, and crucified with Christ, knew this life: "the life I NOW live in the flesh, I live by faith of the Son of God", "Christ liveth in me", "I live, yet not I, but Christ", "always bearing about in the body the dying of the Lord Jesus, that the life also of Jesus might be manifest in our body, for we which live are always delivered unto death for Jesus' sake, that the life of Jesus might be made manifest in our mortal flesh". The life now lived in the mortal flesh does not refer to that blessed time of resurrection glory. Once we were under the dominion of death by reason of indwelling sin; now we have passes from death unto life by reason of the indwelling Spirit (Rom. vii. 20, viii. 11, "He that raised up Christ from the dead shall also make alive your mortal bodies because of His Spirit that dwelleth in you"). To this same truth Eph. i. 19, 20 refers, when it speaks of the mighty power which was wrought in Christ when He was raised from the dead as being directed "to usward who believe".

We have not died with Christ and been buried with Him merely to await in sleep for resurrection, we have been "made alive", we have been raised to walk in newness of life. The spirit that once energized us as sons of disobedience has left us, but we have not been left lifeless, for the body without the spirit is dead, the Spirit of Him who raised up Christ now energizes us to live, to will, and to do; "the living, the living, shall praise Thee"; and unless we realize that life is ours even now, in Christ, how can we "live unto God"? Before therefore the consummation is reached, the apostle exclaims, "by grace are ye saved". Let us not forget the grace that enables us now to live unto God. In the contemplation of the future glory in the ages to come, life now is a pledge of life then ("and raised us up together, and seated us together in the heavenlies, in Christ Jesus").

The mystery of Christ is indeed the basis of the mystery of the church. He was raised and seated in the heavenlies, so are the members of His body. Before a word of exhortation is given, before even a reference to walking worthy is mentioned, the believer is spoken as being "seated". He starts from a finished work. The nature of his new walk and conflict cannot alter this fact, the highest place in glory is his by grace, the question of prize and crown does not enter the subject here. Quickened, raised, seated, "in order that in the ages to come His might show the exceeding riches of His grace in kindness towards us in Christ Jesus". What does this verse teach? Does it mean that in those future ages the church of the one body will be recognized as an exhibition of the exceeding grace of God, by reason of His great mercy that quickened, raised and seated us in the heavenlies? Or can it be possible that these blessings are after all only preliminaries? If the words, "rich in mercy", are sufficient to speak of the blessings that lead to the seat in the heavenlies, what subsequent blessings are they that shall call forth the words, "exceeding riches of grace"? The wording of Eph. ii. 7 seems to show that the blessing that culminates in the seat in the heavenlies is but a beginning, not an end. In the coming ages the exceeding riches of His grace will be exhibited in kindness toward us. It seems too good to be true, and that very fact may be a good reason why it should be true, for we are now in the atmosphere of mercy, love, grace and kindness. If rich mercy places us at the right hand of God, what may not the exceeding riches of His grace accomplish? Do not these thoughts throw us back once more to chapter i. 18, where we are exhorted to pray that we may know what is the hope of His calling, and what the riches of the glory of His inheritance in the saints? If the ages to come hold out such blessed prospects, we also remember that it is written concerning our exalted Head, that He has been raised far above every name that is named, not only in this age, but also in that which is to come. No added blessing but what will enthrone Christ; no added kindness but what will be ministered to us "in Christ Jesus."

Passages from Proverbs.

#1. The Threefold Preface (Prov. i. 2-7).

pp. 155 - 158

While the fountain doctrine of justification by faith, and the all-sufficiency of the sacrifice of Christ for redemption and sanctification are prominent in the mind and message of those who believe the truth, there appears to be a failure many times to remember that for the walk that shall be "unto all pleasing", "wisdom and understanding" are necessary (Col. i. 9). Christ has not only been made unto us "righteousness, sanctification, and redemption", but also "wisdom". When the apostle James spoke of the divers temptations which should come to those who endured in the course for the crown of life, he speaks of the need of wisdom:--

> "Let patience have her perfect work, that ye may be perfect and entire, lacking nothing. If any of you lack wisdom, let him ask of God" (James i. 4, 5).

One might have thought that strength to endure, fortitude, stedfastness, or some kindred virtue would have been uppermost, but no, it is wisdom that is felt to be the great need for the tried believer. It is one of the spheres of the believer's walk, e.g., "Walk in wisdom" (Col. iv. 5). Without wisdom practical righteousness is impossible, for even though we err unwittingly, that error cannot be right and hence cannot be righteous.

The book of Proverbs contains inspired rules for the conduct of life; our English title suggests the terse, compact form of speech, proverbium, indicating for, or instead of, much verbiage; the Hebrew word mishlai is probably derived from mashal, "to rule", though some think it is from a word meaning "to resemble". In the first case we look to the proverb for guidance, in the second we are taught in parable form. Regarding the book of Proverbs as a whole, and particularly in connection with the suggestion that some of the proverbs were written FOR Solomon, and some BY him, we commend The Companion Bible to the reader. While it is necessary to arrive at some conclusion concerning this suggestion, this series does not necessitate a laboured discussion of the subject. We commend the whole book to our readers, but we do not intend to give an exposition of the whole, but just take a verse or two here and there, hence our title, Passages from Proverbs.

It has been observed that the opening verses of the book seem to be most ragged; in the words of the Rev. John Miller:--

> "We find in these opening verses where we might expect the diction to be most poised and perfect, a rather mixed collection of prefaces and preliminary purposes. This introductory incoherency reaches to the seventh verse inclusive, and if anyone doubts what we aver, let him try to read that collection of texts, and give the syntax, and the logic, and the motive for such a loose-jointed catalogue; the meaning comes when we take the infinitives of the second, fourth, and sixth verses, and see how they answered, by the assertions of the third, fifth and seventh; there are three assertions or proverbs therefore."

The obscurity it is here stated is in the translation, and not in the inspired original. The first proverb occupies verses 2 and 3, the infinitives being translated "to know", "to perceive", and "to receive"; the complete proverb therefore is obtained by just adding the little word is to verse three, thus:--

> "To know wisdom, and instruction;
> To perceive the words of understanding;
> To receive the instruction of wisdom,
> IS justice and judgment and equity."

We will return to a closer consideration later. The second proverb is contained in verses 4 and 5:--

> "To give subtilty to the simple;
> To the young man knowledge and discretion;
> A wise man will hear, and will increase learning;
> And a man of understanding shall attain unto wise counsels."

The third proverb occupies verses 6 and 7:--

> "To understand a proverb and the interpretation;
> The works of the wise, and their dark sayings;
> The fear of the Lord is the beginning of knowledge;
> But fools despise wisdom and instruction."

Let us now consider the first proverb, "To know wisdom and discipline". The word rendered "instruction" is translated elsewhere "chastening" (Prov. iii. 11; xiii. 24; Job v. 17), "chastisement" (Isa. liii. 5), "correction" (Prov. vii. 22; xxiii. 13), "discipline" (Job xxxvi. 10).

Here we have wisdom and its practical application toward us in discipline; next comes the perception of wisdom. The word "to perceive" and the word "understanding" are cognate. Literally the words read, "to make discern speeches of discernment", and by thus contemplating the actual wording we find on the threshold of the book a parallel to Phil. i. 10, and II Tim. ii. 15, the idea of discerning the point of a speech that possesses discrimination being prominent. "To receive the instruction of wisdom"; instruction we have translated "discipline" in verse 2. Wisdom here is not the same as in verse 2, it is rather something clear or prudent; thus we have four steps toward the goal of this proverb:--

1. To KNOW wisdom, to recognize it when we see it.
2. To KNOW it when it touches us as discipline.
3. To DISCERN things that differ in the speeches of the wise.
4. To RECEIVE the discipline that prudence demands.

All this is righteousness, and judgment, and equity. The whole good path (ii. 9) demands something even more than is laid down in the four steps detailed above. The recognition of the fact first, however, then the understanding of it is the right order. Ponder well this opening proverb. We who are justified freely by grace, who desire to walk in harmony with our calling, we shall value these words of guidance; we cannot be practically righteous if unwise, undisciplined and undiscerning.

The second proverb contemplates growth, advancement, and ability to help others. The "simple" are literally the "open ones", and are frequently mentioned in the book: they are classed with sinners and fools (i. 22); their turning away from the call of wisdom is fatal to themselves (i. 32); the simple believe everything, they pass on and are punished (xiv. 15; xxii. 3); all these passages if considered in their contexts reveal the fact that these simple ones are perishing for lack of instruction. "Discretion" preserves, it is life to the soul, it guards the life (ii. 11; iii. 21; v. 2). Verse 4 having spoken of those who need instruction, verse 5 proceeds to tell who is fitted to give it, "A wise man will hear, and increase learning". The word "learning" means "to take", and indicates that the wise man continues to take instruction; the best teachers are ever learning, ever increasing their capacity to receive, "and a man of understanding", one who has become "discerning", "shall attain unto wise counsels". The word rendered "wise counsels" is derived from a word meaning "a cord", "a rope", or a "tackling". The "Shipmaster" in Jonah i. 6 is literally "the chief of the rope". Wise counsels, therefore, indicate guidance and leading in the sense of navigating a vessel at sea; here then is the qualification for the teacher.

We now consider the third proverb, which deals with the grand secret of understanding the deep things of God. The A.V. by rendering, "to understand a proverb and the interpretation", does not take us very far, for how else can a proverb be understood than by its interpretation? The Companion Bible renders "interpretation" by "satire, or the point of what is said". Hab. ii. 6 translates it "taunting". The meaning of "a proverb and its point" seems to be given in the next phrase, "the words of the wise (the proverb), and their dark sayings" (the point). What is the "beginning", the sine qua non, for such knowledge? THE FEAR OF THE LORD. Not so much the brain, as the heart is here put first, this "fear of the Lord" is the "wisdom and discipline" that "fools despise".

The three proverbs open this book of wise sayings that are full and deep; their arrangement is simple, being an alternation:--

A | To know, to perceive, to receive for one's self.
B | Is righteousness, etc.
A | To give to others, as does a teacher.
B | Necessitates hearing, discerning, and capacity to guide.
A | To understand a proverb and its point.
B | The fear of the Lord is the beginning of knowledge.

We commend these opening words of Proverbs to all our readers, and hope that the need for wisdom in these perilous times may be realized, and that we may be guided along our pilgrim journey by these inspired "words of the wise".

#2. The Fear of the Lord.
pp. 186 - 191

In our first paper we considered the important conclusion of the preface, which was, "the fear of the Lord" was the "beginning of knowledge". So important is the lesson that finds its centre in the "fear of the Lord", that the phrase occurs fourteen times in the book. As may be expected, a progressive line of teaching is found connected with these occurrences, and we propose giving that teaching a consideration in this article. First, let us note the fourteen references and their arrangement.

The fear of the Lord.

A1 | i. 7. The beginning of knowledge.
| i. 29. Knowledge hated.
| ii. 5. Knowledge found.
B1 | viii. 13. Hate evil.
A1 | ix. 10. The beginning of wisdom.
| x. 27. Great days.
| xiv. 26. Strong confidence.
A2 | xiv. 27. A fountain of life.
| xv. 16. Contentment with little.
| xv. 33. Discipline of wisdom.
B2 | xvi. 6. Depart from evil.
A2 | xix. 23. Tendeth to life.
| xxii. 4. Riches, honour and life
| xxiii. 17. All the day long.

These proverbs are spiritual, and are to be understood by those who fear the Lord. The very beginning of knowledge is given as the fear of the Lord; a wisdom and a discipline that fools despise; this elementary truth is enlarged upon in verse 29, and in ii. 5, before the next great item of teaching is given (see structure). Wisdom has cried, warning of the awful effects of loving simplicity and hating knowledge (i. 20-28), then comes the conclusion:--

> "Forasmuch as they hated knowledge, and did not choose the fear of the Lord; they would none of my counsel; they despised all my reproof, therefore shall they eat the fruit of their own way, and be filled with their own desires, for the turning away of the simple shall slay them, and the prosperity of fools shall destroy them."

"They did not choose". What issues hang upon a right choice! The Psalmist said, "I have chosen the way of truth" (Psa. cxix. 30); may this choice be ours. Those who turn away from wisdom are slain by their own choice, "they lay wait for their own blood, they lurk privily for their own lives" (i. 18).

Chapter ii. opens with a sharp contrast: here, the fear of the Lord is not merely given as the beginning of knowledge, but the one who has this is instructed how he may "discern" the fear of the Lord, and "find" the knowledge of God. Look how specific the instructions are, seek it like men seek for wealth, and you must find it—find, simply receive—here we commence where the first proverb left off. Secondly, hide the commandments. The word indicates that one has discovered a treasure and "lays it up". Thirdly, incline the ear: the word means "to prick up the ear" as does an animal; it is rendered "attend" (Prov. iv. 1, 20; v. 1; vii. 24), "hearken" (I Sam. xv. 22), "mark" (Jer. xxiii. 18). Fourthly, then shalt thou bend thy heart toward discernment. Here we reach the end of the first stage, receive, hide, hearken, and the heart bends toward discernment. The A.V. commences verse 3, "yea, if"; the Hebrew ki-im is better rendered "for if", or "but if", and marks a new departure.

First, cry after discernment and understanding; the heart now begins to pray; this word is used for prayer over and over again. Secondly, seek it as money, and search for it as for hid treasure; here earnestness is evident, the bending of the heart has led on to a definite desire. Thirdly, then shalt thou discern the fear of the Lord, and find the knowledge of God. Where, it may be asked, shall we search, or where shall we dig? Verse 6 supplies the answer: His inspired Word is His treasury. All that we have seen is comprehended in "the beginning of knowledge", which is necessary to understand the point of these Proverbs and the words of the wise.

We now come to a practical issue: "the fear of the Lord is to hate evil" (viii. 13). No lesser word is compatible with the truth. Evil cannot be considered neutral, much less friendly, by those who fear the Lord. Fools hate knowledge (i. 29), and instruction (v. 12). The wise hate evil.

By noticing the structure of references above, it will be seen that the member B1 | viii. 13, "Hate evil", is balanced by the member B2 | xvi. 6, "Depart from evil". This has already been written in Prov. iii. 1, and xiii. 19 declares that it is an "abomination" to fools to depart from evil. ("A wise man feareth, and departeth from evil: but the fool rageth, and is confident", xiv. 16). The departing from evil is the very highway along which the upright walk (xvi. 17). Hate is as active as love: if love impels, hate repels. The order of this instruction is noteworthy. Departure does not come first; hatred first; the heart and the motive, then departure, the feet and the motion. It is an elementary law, as much a law as anything so named by science, that they who fear the Lord will hate evil and depart from it. No sophistry can alter this, and the wise will keep it before them as their infallible guide. Some may say, "Let us do evil that good may come". Of such the apostle says their "damnation is just". They eat the fruit of their own ways. This makes us suspicious of any line of teaching that looks upon evil with any other eye than that of hatred. God may use evil, even as the very chapter under notice (xvi.) declares, but we are not God, and our attitude is not to be regulated by our ideas, but His commands.

We now proceed, and discover that not only is the fear of the Lord the beginning of knowledge, but that it is also the beginning of wisdom (ix. 10). It is useless to reprove a scorner (8), for he lacks the essential to wisdom. A wise man being reproved will love (8), he will increase in wisdom (9), the reason being that he has been initiated, he fears the Lord; the next verse says, "for by me thy days shall be multiplied, and the years of thy life shall be increased" (11). This is the next item in the list of references, for x. 27 says, “the fear of the Lord prolongeth days: but the years of the wicked shall be shortened”. There is deeper truth here, and in ix. 10, than merely the prolonging of life, which, however, is attached to the observing of the commandment. Chapter ix. 10 may be translated, “for by me thy days shall become great, and they shall make thee greater through years of life”; and x. 17, “the fear of the Lord makes greater days, but the years of the wicked shall be made little”. This too is the testimony of Prov. iii. 1:--

> “My son, forget not my law; but let thine heart keep my commandments; for length of days, and years of life, and peace, SHALL MAKE THEE GREATER.”

Again in iv. 10 the A.V. says, “Hear, O my son, and receive my sayings, and the years of thy life shall be many”; the true rendering which takes account of the gender of the verb is, “Hear, O my son, and receive my sayings, AND THEY SHALL GROW GREATER TO THEE through years of life”. This is an aspect of truth that it is a blessing to realize.

The other passage that supplements ix. 10 is xiv. 26: “in the fear of the Lord is strong confidence: and His children shall have a place of refuge”. The heart, not the intellect, is ever in view. They who “fear” the Lord need fear none else, in Him they have both confidence and refuge.

The Proverbs now leave the subject of knowledge and wisdom to treat of life. “The fear of the Lord is a fountain of life, to depart from the snares of death”. We can understand the first statement of this verse, but how can a fountain be of use in departing, and in departing from a snare? The word rendered “fountain” is derived from a verb, to dig, and, compounded with M, means literally “a dug out place”. This became almost exclusively used for a fountain, but we are not bound to adopt this secondary meaning. The primary meaning seems demanded by the idea of departing from the snares of death. The snares of death are varied, and one that entraps many is concern for the good things of this life. The fear of the Lord enables us to depart from this, for “better is a little with the fear of the Lord, than great treasure and trouble therewith” (xiv. 16). This is a discipline, as the apostle says in Phil. iv., “I have learned”, “I am instructed”, yet it is the “discipline of wisdom”, and is in line with other Scriptures which teach that suffering precedes glory, and “before honour is humility” (Prov. xv. 3). This brings us to the passage already considered, “the fear of the Lord is to depart from evil”. In the section that deals with knowledge and wisdom hatred of evil is spoken of; in the section that deals with life, departing from it is the teaching. Out of the heart are the issues of life.

We now consider xix. 23, “the fear of the Lord tendeth to life”. The plural “lives” may have future life in view, and this seems to receive confirmation from the next line, “and he that hath it shall abide satisfied”. Contentment here below with a “little” and “satisfied” in the life to come are connected with the fear of the Lord, as fruit is with root, for the next reference may be translated, “the end of humiliation, the fear of the Lord, is riches and honour, and life” (xxii. 4). It is therefore for our highest good that we hold to the fear of the Lord. They who fear not the Lord may prosper in this life, but we understand, like Asaph, “the end”.

The last reference most aptly leaves us with the thought,

> "Let not thine heart envy sinners: but be thou in the fear of the Lord all the day long, for surely there is a hereafter, and thine expectation shall not be cut off" (xxiii. 17, 18).

The fear of the Lord covers the whole journey, from the "beginning" of knowledge unto the "hereafter" that shall be enjoyed in His Presence.

May we learn these lessons for our present and future welfare.

Studies in the Book of the Revelation.

#25. The Universal Praise of the Lamb (Rev. v. 11-14).

pp. 1 – 4

When the four living ones and the four and twenty elders had sung their new song, representing the innermost circle around the throne of heaven, its theme is taken up by the next order of created beings, the angels; here the number is so vast as to pass beyond definite enumeration, "their number was ten thousand of ten thousands, and thousands of thousands". These "holy myriads" seem to be referred to in Jude 14, and Matt. xxvi. 53. Dan. vii. 10, to which we have referred before, speaks of those who surrounded the heavenly throne in similar language. "Thousand thousands ministered to Him, and ten thousand times ten thousand stood before Him." These angels are spoken of as being ministering spirits, and in connection with Israel they had many opportunities of realizing the problem of redemption. From the tremendous host of angels sound forth the words, "Worthy is the Lamb that was slain, to receive

Power, and Riches, and Wisdom, and Strength, and Honour, and Glory, and Blessing."

Here is a seven-fold ascription, detailing in heavenly joy the perfections of the Lamb that was slain. The first is POWER.—He is worthy to receive power. The question is raised, Does this mean that He is worthy of having all these virtues and gifts bestowed upon Him? or is it that He is worthy of being praised as possessing them? That the Lord did possess power before His birth in Bethlehem we know, for Heb. i. 3 speaks of Him as "upholding all things by the word of His power". The Lord Himself, when He died on Calvary's cross, "was crucified through weakness, yet He liveth by the power of God" (II Cor. xiii. 4). That risen life marked Him off as "the Son of God with power" (Rom. i. 4), and His resurrection was the source from which His believing children draw their power (Phil. iii. 10).

In the three gospels of Matthew, Mark and Luke, the words of the Lord are recorded concerning His coming in the clouds with power and great glory. His High Priesthood is in the power of an endless life (Heb. vii. 16). The host of heaven say that the Lamb is worthy to receive power. We take this here in a literal sense. The Lord had been exalted to the highest place of glory, graced with the name that is above every name, that at that name every knee should bow; here in Rev. v. the myriads of adoring ministering spirits acclaim His worthiness to receive this seven-fold blessing. Power had been given to others, but how unworthy had they proved themselves to be of the trust. We read of the powers of the heavens which are to be shaken, the power of the enemy which was used for the hurt of human kind. There shall yet be manifested "power and signs and lying wonders" in the earth, when the dragon gives to the beast "his power, and his throne, and his great authority" (II Thess. ii. 9; Rev. xiii. 2). This last reference supplies the parallel with our subject; just as God will give to the Lamb "power", and He is acclaimed as worthy to receive it, so the dragon at the last feels that in the beast he has one who is worthy to receives this power is "as it had been slain", so of the beast it is written in Rev. xiii. 3, 4:--

> "And I saw one of his heads as it were wounded (same word 'slain') unto death, and his deadly wound was healed: and all the world wondered after the beast, and they worshipped the dragon which gave power unto the beast: and they worshipped the beast, saying, who is like unto the beast? who is able to make war with him?"

The parallel between these two passages is very marked and needs further comment. The power given to the Lamb has special reference to His kingdom, and in xi. 17 we catch an echo of the new song, when the Lord God almighty took to Himself His great power and reigned.

The same age-time lesson which we learn from seeing a Lamb, as it had been slain, in the place where we might have expected a Lion, is here. In all heaven and earth none is so worthy to receive power as the Lamb, and that Lamb the One who was dumb before His accusers and was crucified through weakness.

RICHES.—What we have said of power may also be said of riches; the Lord was rich, yet for our sakes became poor; He is worthy therefore to receive riches. When we try to think of the "riches in glory", or the unsearchable riches of Christ", we cannot find words to express even our puny conceptions, but we glory in the fact that He who sits upon heaven's throne and rules this poor cursed earth in righteousness and peace, is worthy to receive the coveted power and riches which no one yet has possessed without failing somewhere in his stewardship. The gold that the Lord counseled Laodicea to buy, was "gold tried in the fire, that thou mayest be rich"; such is the character of all the riches that He will receive.

So we may consider all the rest. The wisdom that is first pure, then peaceable, is His; the strength that is His will never be used but in the cause of righteousness. Honour and glory constituted His crown "for the suffering of death" (Heb. ii. 9), and His priesthood's consecration on the mount of transfiguration (II Pet. i. 17). Glory and honour also pertained to Him as the Son of man beneath whose feet shall be subjected all things.

Finally comes BLESSING.—As we listen to this acclamation, our minds are impelled backward into the history of the past. We think of those who have received from God glory and honour, riches and wisdom, power and blessing. Among those that stand out in this connection are Adam, Noah, Abraham, Solomon, Nebuchadnezzar—yet, wide as the difference between these individuals may be, and worthy as some are of our imitation, all were creatures, and all were fallen, none were "worthy to receive" the blessings that had been bestowed. How different it is with the Lamb of God! God blessed Adam, but how soon Adam involved himself and his seed in the curse! He was not worthy. God blessed Noah and his sons, but how soon the father's curse falls! God gave wisdom to Solomon, yet consider his end! All, all are unworthy, heaven's song is true, "Worthy is the Lamb".

This song begun in heaven is taken up by all creation. From the heavenly side, power comes first, leading on to blessing; from the standpoint of universal creation, blessing comes first and might last. This fourfold ascription taken up by the wider circle of all created things in the four divisions of the universe (heaven, earth, under the earth, and sea), is addressed to "Him that sitteth upon the throne", as well as "unto the Lamb".

The universal praise that ascend to the throne, commencing with the four living ones, and the twenty-four elders, extending to the myriads of heaven's angels, then taken up in turn by every creature in every sphere of creation, is gathered up again from whence it came by the solemn Amen of the four living ones, and the worship of the four and twenty elders.

All is now ready, the Lamb has been acclaimed, He alone was worthy to open the book, and to lose the seals, the solemn hour has struck, and with the noise of thunder the Lamb opened one of the seals, and the "day of vengeance" began.

Before passing on to the scenes of judgment, let us pause awhile to catch the joy and delight that seem to echo through the words of praise, "for He is worthy, Amen and amen".

#26. The Beginning of Sorrows (Rev. vi.).
pp. 33 - 36

The Lamb has taken the seven-sealed book from the hand of Him who sits upon the throne, ten thousand times ten thousand have acclaimed His worthiness and ascribed to Him power, and riches, and wisdom, and strength, and honour, and glory, and blessing. The apostle now watches the opening of the seals, and describes what he sees as a result. It will be seen that the first six seals are opened consecutively and without pause, but a whole chapter intervenes between the opening of the sixth and seventh seals; we shall therefore give our attention to the six seals as contained in chapter vi.

It is at once evident upon reading this chapter through, that these six seals are divided between (1) judgments, and (2) martyrdom:--

A | vi. 1-8. The four horses.—Judgments under false Christ.
B | 9-11. Martyrs.—Cry for vengeance.
A | 12-17. Signs in heaven.—Wrath of Lamb.

What are we to understand by these symbols? What volumes have been written in the attempt to interpret them! We do not intend wasting out limited space in refuting the interpretations of the "historic school" (the various writers do that so completely themselves), but we would most humbly and sincerely seek to follow the inspired rule, and "explain spiritual things by spiritual words". Keeping within the covers of the book for all the material necessary for the interpretation. What help can we get regarding these four horses? Every one acquainted with the Minor Prophets (and such only can hope to begin to understand the imagery of the Apocalypse) will immediately turn to the prophecy of Zechariah. In chapter i. of his prophecy Zechariah says:--

> "I saw by night, and behold a man riding upon a red horse, and he stood among the myrtle trees that were in the bottom; and behind him were there red horses, speckled and white. Then said I, O my lord, what are these? . . . . These are they whom the Lord hath sent to walk to and fro through the earth, and they answered the angel of the Lord that stood among the myrtle trees, and said, We have walked to and fro through the earth, and behold, all the earth sitteth still, and is at rest" (verses 8-11).

Before reading on further, we will turn to the corresponding vision described in chapter vi.:--

> "And I turned and lifted up mine eyes, and looked, and behold there came four chariots out from between two mountains; and the mountains were mountains of brass. In the first chariot were red horses; and in the second chariot black horses; and in the third chariot white horses; and in the fourth chariot grisled and bay horses; then I answered and said unto the angel that talked with me, What are these, my Lord? And the angel answered and said unto me, These are the four spirits of the heavens, which go forth from standing before the Lord of all the earth" (verses 1-5).

Coming back to chapter i. we find that the narrative continues with a prayer for mercy upon Jerusalem, and the cities of Judah upon which the Lord had indignation for threescore and ten years: the Lord answered, using good and comfortable words. God reveals His jealousy for Zion, and His sore displeasure with the nations who had gone beyond the little displeasure of the Lord, and had "helped forward the affliction"; the vision finishes with the promise that the Lord shall yet comfort Zion and shall yet choose Jerusalem. The vision of chapter vi. is preceded by the prophecy concerning the building of a house for the ephah in the land of Shinar (Babylon), and is followed by the prophecy concerning Christ who shall build the temple of the Lord.

We can now return to Rev. vi. and understand that the four horses and their riders are also "the four spirits of the heavens". By comparing chapter vi. and vii. and onwards we find the following:--

A | vi. 1-8. Four horses; commissioned to let loose God's four sore judgments on the earth.
  B | vi. 9-11. The martyrs; the cry for vengeance; their fellow-servants to be killed; white robes to be given them.
    C | vi. 12-17. Signs in heaven; the great day of wrath.
A | vii. 1-3. Four angels; commissioned to hurt the earth, the sea, and the trees.
  B | vii. 4-17. The 144,000 sealed; the great multitude out of the great tribulation;
    white robes.
    C | viii. - xix. The seven trumpets and vials; the wrath of Almighty God.

It appears from this survey that the judgments represented by the four horsemen will really be the ministry of angels, and that the fellow-servants of the martyrs are the 144,000 sealed ones and the great multitude.

The wrath of the Lamb, the great day of wrath, the wonderful signs in the heavens, and the effect upon the kings, captains, and mighty men, epitomized under the sixth seal, are given at greater length and fuller detail in the chapters that follow, concluding with the personal coming of Christ, the wrath of Almighty God, and the kings, captains, and mighty men who suffer under this judgment, as shown in chapter xix.

We will now once more leave the book of the Revelation to obtain further light from the prophecy of Christ Himself recorded in Matt. xxiv. There is an indirect link with Zechariah's prophecy in the prophecy of Olivet, by the reference to the house being left desolate, and its stones being overthrown. The disciples asked the Lord saying, "Tell us, when shall these things be, and what shall be the sign of Thy coming (parousia) and of the end (sunteleia) of the age?" This threefold question receives a threefold answer, but the answers do not follow the order of the questions, but the reverse; the first answer deals with the end (sunteleia) of the age (verses 4-22); the second answer deals with the sign of the coming (parousia) (verses 23-31); the third answer is the parable of the Fig Tree, which, by saying, "When ye shall see all these things, know that it is near, even at the doors", answers the first question, "When shall these things be?" (verses 32, 33).

Let us now take note of the Lord's answers in fuller detail. There shall be false Christs (5). Ye shall hear of wars and rumours of wars. . . . the end (telos) not yet (6). Nation shall rise against nation, and kingdom against kingdom, and there shall be famines, and pestilences, and earthquakes, in divers places (7). All these are the beginning of sorrows (8).

The disciples had asked as to what should be the sign of the sunteleia, consummation, gathering point of the age? Here is the answer; the end (telos) is preceded by the sunteleia, which is described as the "beginning of sorrows", and the characteristics of that period are given. Following this period comes martyrdom and tribulation:--

> "Immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven, and the powers of the heavens shall be shaken: and then shall appear the sign of the Son of man in heaven" (29, 30).

We turned, it will be remembered, to this prophecy for further light upon Rev. vi. By placing the records in parallel columns we shall easily see that Matt. xxiv. and Rev. vi. cover the same ground:--

Matt. xxiv.	Prophecies and Seals.	Rev. vi.
Verses 4, 5.	False Christs.	Verses 1, 2.
6, 7.	Wars.	3, 4.
7.	Famines.	5, 6.
7.	Pestilences.	7, 8.
"All these are the beginning of sorrows".
9-28.	Martyrs.	9-11.
29, 30.	Signs in heaven. The Lord's coming.	12-17.

We have now cleared the way for investigating the meaning of these signs; we have both the testimony of Matt. xxiv. and of Zechariah to prevent us from giving a second thought to the multitude of "fulfillments" that have been culled from the history of Rome onwards, and find in the reference to Dan. ix. in Matt. xxiv. a point of time around which these events are grouped. We must take up the more detailed exposition of this important chapter in our next article.

As members of the One Body we have a hope entirely unconnected with "signs", yet the argument is irresistible, that if the signs of the consummation of the age are appearing upon the horizon (be they as yet no larger than a man's hand), then our hope is so much nearer it realization. May we all live. . . . looking for that blessed hope.

#27. The Four Horsemen. (Rev. vi. 1-8).
pp. 65 - 68

Following the latest Greek texts, the first verse reads:--

> "And I saw when the Lamb opened one of the seven seals, and I heard one of the four living ones saying, as with a voice of thunder, Go!"

The words "and see" are omitted and the verb erchomai being translatable by either "come" or "go" the context alone can decide. If the living ones said "Come", the response would be, "he came forth"; as it is, the wording is "he went forth", showing that the verb in this case is the command "Go!".

In our last article we considered the teaching of the Old Testament prophecies, particularly Zechariah, in connection with these horsemen; we will now deal with the actual visions themselves.

In Matt. xxiv. we read not of one false Christ, but many, not one war or one famine or one pestilence, but many. We shall, therefore, have to be careful when viewing these seals that we do not read anything of our own into them. There will be one false Christ, and one false prophet when the end is in sight, but the "beginning" of sorrows is ushered in by the many false Christs—which are here symbolized under the figure of the white horse.

"A White Horse."—Here is the parody of Rev. xix. 11-16. There we read:--

> "And I saw heaven opened, and behold a white horse: and he that sat upon him was called Faithful and True, and in righteousness he doth judge and make war. . . . and the armies which were in heaven followed him upon white horses, clothed in fine linen, white and clean."

The rider in Rev. vi. has a bow, and is thereby linked with another vision of the revelation of Christ, viz., Psa. xlv. 4, 5. "In Thy majesty ride prosperously. . . . Thine arrows are sharp in the hearts of the King's enemies." While the bow is of frequent mention in the O.T. it is only mentioned once in the N.T. A passage from Hosea seems to point the meaning of the symbol:--

> "I will have mercy on the house of Judah and will save them by the Lord their God, and I will not save them by bow, nor by the sword, nor by battle, by horses, nor by horsemen" (Hos. i. 7).

This statement rules out the four horsemen of Rev. vi. These are not the divine instruments of Israel's restoration. What was true of the first inheritance will be true of the last.

> "They got not the land in possession by their own sword, neither did their own arm save them: but Thy right hand and Thine arm and the light of Thy countenance, because thou hadst a favour unto them. . . . I will not trust in my bow, neither shall my sword save me" (Psalm xliv. 3-6).

The false Messiahs will be no saviours, they will go forth conquering in order that he might conquer. The object is here stated, "in order that" (hina) he might conquer. Like the beast of Rev. xiii. and like all his pre-shadowings down the age; these grasp at world dominion, and seek it by right of conquest. The crown that is given to the rider is a triumphal crown (stephanos), indicating victory or conquest.

The next horseman that rides forth is seated upon a red horse. The red horse symbolizes war. To the rider are given two things, the one a symbol of the other. It was given to him to take peace from the earth in order that they should kill each other; and there was given to him a great sword. The sword is the first of God's great sore judgments.

> "The sword, and the famine, and the noisome beast, and the pestilence, to cut off from it man and beast" (Ezek. xiv. 21).

When the true Christ was born the angels said, "on earth peace" (Luke ii. 14), but the world despised Him, hated Him and crucified Him. The false Christ ushers in war, and takes peace away from the earth. No war ever fought will "end war"; that is one of the awful mockeries of the times we live in. Nothing but the coming of the Prince of Peace will be sufficient guarantee that the nations shall "learn war" no more. The peace is taken from the earth with a purpose, "in order that they should kill each other". Nation rises against nation, kingdom against kingdom, and wear themselves down in their blind hatred and impotence. All these things, as current events demonstrate, make the universal kingdom of the Beast a necessity, and a welcome proposition to the war-worn nations, for their cry will be, "Who is able to make war with him?" One of the features of the Antichrist is a false peace; the many false christs that precede him are accompanied with wars and rumours of wars.

Following in natural sequence we have the black horse. Desire for conquest, then war, then famine; how true this order has always been. The rider of this horse holds neither a bow nor a great sword, he holds a balance in his hand. Black denotes famine in scripture symbolism.

> "Their visage is blacker than coal. . . . they that be slain by the sword are better than they that be slain with hunger; for these pine away, stricken through for want of the fruits of the field."
> "We get our bread with the peril of our lives, because of the sword of the wilderness. Our skins were black like an oven because of the terrible famine" (Lam. iv. 8, 9; v. 9, 10).

The balance indicates the need of scrupulous care because of famine. When Ezekiel foreshadowed the siege of Jerusalem he had to eat his meat "by weight", and his water he had to drink "by measure" (Ezek. iv. 9-11; see also verse 16 and xii. 16-19). This is an expression in direct contrast with "eat and be full" of Deut. vi. 11, etc. The extent and nature of the famine is indicated by the words, "one chœnix of wheat for a denarius, and three chœnixes of barley for a denarius." A denarius was a day's wage (Matt. xx. 2, 9), and a chœnix was nearly a quart. Numerous citations from Greek writers show that this measure was the daily ration of a slave. An attic medimnus of grain cost five or six denari. A chœnix was the 48th part of a medimnus and cost one-eighth of a denarius. Here therefore is a statement of famine prices. The daily food advanced to 800 percent. The command also to injure not the oil and the wine indicates that extreme care must be taken with these by reason of the great shortage of the staff of life.

The fourth horse is described as pale. The word chlõros means a colour like that of a young shoot of vegetation, i.e., a palish green; evidently a hue inclining to the cadaverous is here meant (Moses Stuart, in loco.). The name of the rider is given, ho thanatos, "death", and in immediate association comes hades. Christ by virtue of His redemption claims the keys of death and hades. When the dead are raised to stand before the great white throne, we read, "death and hades gave up the dead which were in them", and finally, "death and hades were cast into the lake of fire" (xx. 13, 14). Both death and hades are spoken of as having a dominion. These forces and authorities of darkness are given a dreadful liberty of action in the closing days of the age.

> "And there was given to him authority over the fourth part of the earth, to kill with the sword, and with famine, and with death, and by the wild beasts of the earth."

To kill by "death" is a figure, a figure indicating pestilence and plague, death in its most awful form. The Septuagint renders the Hebrew word for pestilence by thanatos ("death") more than 30 times and so enables us to see the meaning of the word here.

We have in these four horsemen and their followers a series of symbols, setting forth the sign of the sunteleia of the age, the "beginning of sorrows". War, famine, pestilence, wild beasts, with death and hades exercising their dread authority. What a blessing to know Him who has the keys of death and hades, and to look across this darkening nightfall of a ruined world to the day when death and hades shall be cast into the great destructor together with all things that offend. These are the beginning of sorrows, but they do not last for ever. Greater judgments have yet to follow them, nevertheless we, according to His promise, look for a new heaven and a new earth wherein dwelleth righteousness.

#28. The Cry for Vengeance (Rev. vi. 9-11).
pp. 97 - 101

The first four seals are connected together by the reference to the four living creatures. The fifth seal is not connected with them, and must be considered as a separate subject. While viewing this seal as something separate, we must remember that the words of verse 11 link this with the awful times of the first four seals.

> "And when he opened the fifth seal, I saw under the altar the souls of those who had been killed because of the Word of God, and because of the testimony which they held."

An altar is literally "a place of sacrifice". It occurs in viii. 3 and 5; ix. 1; xi. 18; and xvi. 7. The first and last occurrences have much in common. We read that the third angel poured out his vial, and the angel of the waters said:--

> "Thou art righteous, O Lord, which art and wast, because thou hast judged thus. For they have shed the blood of saints and prophets, and thou hast given them blood to drink; for they are worthy. And I heard another out of the altar say, Even so, Lord God Almighty, true and righteous are Thy judgments."

While this last reference is parallel with the first, the idea of judgment is connected with several of the remaining passages. The dispensation of grace, with its spirit of longsuffering and meekness, has led the enemies of truth to a fatal misinterpretation. The God who said, "Avenge not yourselves", said also, "vengeance in Mine, I will repay". To the wicked God said, "These things hast thou done, and I kept silence; thou thoughtest that I was altogether such an one as thyself. . . . now consider. . . . lest I tear you in pieces" (Psa. l. 21, 22). The long deferred "day of vengeance" (see Luke iv. 19, 20) is linked with the comforting of Zion (Isa. lxi. 2, 3). So also in Isa. lxiii. 4, "For the day of vengeance is in My heart, and the year of My redeemed is come". "The day of the Lord's vengeance" is linked with "the year of recompenses for the controversy of Zion" (Isa. xxxiv. 8).

The opening of the fifth seal is marked with a cry for vengeance. The apostle says that he saw under the altar the souls of those who had been slain. It is surely a sign of weakness when such a passage is used to support the traditional teaching concerning the soul, and we do not remember ever reading that anyone who has used this passage to support the teaching of the soul's conscious existence after death has ever brought together the seven occurrences of the word "soul" in the Revelation. We do not believe that in such a book as the Revelation we shall find teaching concerning the nature of the soul, and as Moses Stuart remarks, "It would be as apposite to undertake a demonstration that the trees and brambles can talk, from the fable of Jotham, as it would to undertake the proof of the material nature of the soul from the representation before us". The seven occurrences of psuche are

> "The souls of those who had been slain" (vi. 9).
> "The creatures, which were in the sea, and had life died" (viii. 9).
> "And they loved not their lives unto the death" (xii. 11).
> "And every living soul died in the sea" (xvi. 3).
> "And bodies and souls of men" (xviii. 13).
> "The fruits that thy soul lusted after" (xviii. 14).
> "The souls of them that were beheaded for the witness of Jesus" (xx. 4).

The way in which the word is brought in vi. 9 and xx. 4, together with xii. 11, should cause us to hesitate to generalize the passages, and in effect to render the word unnecessary. We believe a richer lesson lies awaiting us than can be discovered by considering this word merely as a figure of speech. There is a most definite doctrine of Scripture concerning the soul that has not received sufficient notice. We do not refer to the teaching of the Word as to the nature of the soul, but the teaching concerning the losing and saving of the soul:--

> "If any man will come after Me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross and follow Me. For, whosoever shall save his soul shall lose it, and whosoever shall lose his soul for My sake shall find it" (Matt. xvi. 24-26).

In Heb. x. 39 we read, "But we are not of those shrinking back unto destruction; but of faith unto obtaining (as to a purchased possession, Eph i. 14) of soul". This is directly connected with, "taking joyfully the spoiling of your good, knowing in yourselves that ye have in heaven a better and an enduring substance", and is illustrated by the examples of Heb. xi. (see 8, 9, 10, 24-26), and in Heb. xii. 2 by the greatest example of all. The giving up in this life is rewarded by the joy in the next life. The losing of the soul here ensures the finding of it there. I Pet. i. 9 links the salvation of the soul with the theme of suffering followed by glory, "of which salvation", "the sufferings for Christ and the glories that should follow", and "the grace that is to be brought at the revelation of Jesus Christ".

It is because the apostle had to teach this truth, that he tells us that he saw not the dead bodies, but the souls of the martyrs under the altar. Here, these suffering saints "lost their souls" for Christ's sake. In xx. 4 John again saw "the souls" of these martyrs glorified—they had "found them", as the Lord had promised. This is a lesson worth the learning, and lies very near the heart of the Apocalypse, tracing as the book does the "overcomer" through suffering to glory. These martyrs were slain on account of the Word of God, and on account of the testimony which they held. Four times do we find the "testimony" and the "Word" together in the Revelation, viz.:--

John's testimony to the Word of God, and the testimony of Jesus Christ (i. 2).
John in tribulation and patience for the kingdom of Jesus, in the isle of Patmos for the Word of God, and the testimony of Jesus (i. 9).
John sees the soul under the altar of those slain for the Word of God, and for the testimony which they held (vi. 9).
John sees on thrones those who were beheaded for the testimony of Jesus, and for the Word of God (xx. 4).

It will be seen that to hold this testimony in the days of the Revelation will mean suffering and death. This is further emphasized in xii. 17, "And the dragon was wroth with the woman, and went to make war with the remnant of her seed, which keep the commandments of God, and have the testimony of Jesus", and here the dragon himself is seen to be the great persecutor. God views the death of these witnesses as sacrifices—their souls are seen under the altar, they have "loved not their lives unto the death". Their cry ascends to God, "How long, O Lord, holy and true, dost Thou not judge and take vengeance for our blood from them that dwell upon the earth". The church of God cannot cry to God for vengeance, such is not in harmony with its calling. When the day of grace closes, and the day of vengeance sets in, then the cry will be right and proper, and the "Imprecatory Psalms" and the many prophecies of vengeance will be fulfilled. Those upon whom vengeance is called are "them that dwell on the earth". Reference is made to these earth dwellers in very awful and solemn settings. We give the passages in order that this special title may receive the attention that seems its due.

The earth dwellers.

iii. 10.	Speaks of the hour of temptation about to come on such.
vi. 10.	Vengeance for blood shed is called down on them.
viii. 13.	An angel flies in mid-heaven saying Woe, woe, woe to them.
xi. 10.	They rejoice over the death of the two witnesses.
xi. 10.	Who had tormented them.
xiii. 8.	They shall worship the beast. Their names not written in the lamb's book of life.
xiii. 12.	They are made to worship the beast by the false prophet.
xiii. 14.	They are deceived by his numerous signs.
xiii. 14.	They are told to make an image to the beast.
xiv. 6.	An angel flies in mid-heaven with the aionian gospel to them.
xvii. 2.	They were made drunk with the woman's wine, which is likened to the blood of the martyrs (verse 6).
xvii. 8.	They shall wonder at the beast. Their names not written in the book of life.

The only gleam in the gloomy list is xiv. 6, and then we have no warrant for believing that the "earth dwellers" obey this primeval gospel, although we believe many of those who are differentiated from them (see xiv. 6, "and unto every nation, and tribe, and tongue, and people") will fear God in the hour of His judgment.

In answer to the cry of the martyred witnesses we read:--

> "And there was given to each one a white robe, and it was said to them that they should rest yet for a time until both their fellow-servants and their brethren that were about to be killed as they also had been, should fill up the appointed number."

The following passages will make clear the reason why these martyred saints were given white robes:--

> "Nevertheless, thou hast a few names in Sardis which defiled not their garments, and they shall walk with Me in white, for they are worthy. He that overcometh shall thus be arrayed in white garments" (iii. 4, 5).
>
> "A great multitude. . . . arrayed with white robes, and palm branches in their hands" (vii. 9).
> "These are they who come out of the Great Tribulation, and they washed their robes, and made them white through the blood of the Lamb" (vii. 14).

To each of the unavenged martyrs is given a symbol of the overcomer. "They are worthy", "They overcame because of the blood of the Lamb" (xii. 11). They are bidden to rest yet for a time. Their fellow-sufferers who were to be killed as they had been were also said to "rest from their labours, for their works follow with them" (xiv. 13). God, who allows His witnesses to be put to death for their testimony, knows them each one. Knows the number that must suffer, looks upon their faithfulness as an acceptable sacrifice. The guilty world little dreams that the blood they shed cries for vengeance. It does, and when iniquity reaches its height again in a rebuilt Babylon, judgment falls. Blessed are they who in that day hold the testimony of the Lord, blessed are they who are kept out of that hour, blessed are they whose hope shall anticipate the fall of vengeance, blessed are they who in every dispensation "hold fast the faithful word."

#29. The Sixth Seal (Rev. vi. 12-17).
pp. 129 - 133

> "And I saw when He opened the sixth seal, and there was a great shaking, and the sun became black as sackcloth of hair, and the whole moon became as blood; and the stars of heaven fell unto the earth, as the fig tree casteth her untimely figs when shaken by a mighty wind, and the heaven was separated (from its place) as a scroll rolling itself up; and every island and mountain were moved out of their places. And the kings of the earth, and the great men, and the chief captains, and the rich men, and the mighty men, and every bondman and free man, hid themselves into the caves and into the mountains. And they say to the mountains and to the rocks, Fall on us, and hide us from the face of Him that sitteth on the throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb. Because the great day of His wrath is come, and who is able to stand" (vi. 12-17).

THE GREAT SHAKING.—Although the word seismos may be render "earthquake" with truth in many passages, the primitive idea ("a shaking") will fit the context better in this case. Seven times do we find the earthquake or seismos mentioned in the Revelation itself, and as we desire to provide every facility for arriving at a true conclusion, we will set them out first.

> The "shaking" upon the opening of the sixth seal (vi. 12).
> The result of the angel's scattering of fire on the earth, before the seven trumpets were sounded (viii. 5).

The reviving of the two witnesses is followed by an earthquake, when the tenth of the city fell, and in the earthquake were slain 7000 men (xi. 13).
The result of the temple being opened in heaven (xi. 19).
The result of the pouring out of the seventh bowl. This earthquake is the greatest ever known (xvi. 18).

It will be seen that this "shaking" is connected with the presence of the Lord either on the throne, in the temple, or manifesting Himself in the raising up of the two witnesses, and in every case judgment is imminent. There is evident allusion in Rev. vi. 12, 13 to the times spoken of by Joel ii. 10, 11:--

> "The earth shall quake before them, the heavens shall tremble: the sun and moon shall be dark, and the stars shall withdraw their shining. . . . for the day of the Lord is great and very terrible, and who can abide it?"

A further reference to similar phenomena is found in Joel ii. 30, 31, which Peter quoted on the day of Pentecost, and declared that the outpouring of the spirit which had then taken place was the fulfilling of Joel ii. 28, 29. The complete prophecy of Joel has not yet been fulfilled, but a seven-fold beginning was made, leaving the wonders in heaven and earth to take place in the day of the Lord.

It will be remembered that the mighty earthquake that ushers in great Babylon's judgment in Rev. xvi. is preceded by the gathering of the whole world to the battle of that great day of God Almighty. The armies are gathered into the place called Har-mageddon. In Joel iii. 9-16 there is a proclamation of "Holy War" (see margin verse 9), and the Gentiles are gathered for judgment. There again we read:--

> "The sun and the moon shall be darkened, and the stars shall withdraw their shining. The Lord also shall roar out of Zion, and utter His voice from Jerusalem; and the heavens and the earth shall shake."

In the thirteenth chapter of Isaiah we have The burden of Babylon. The reader should read from the commencement of the chapter, noting parallels with Joel iii. In verses 9-11, and 19 we read:--

> "Behold the day of the Lord cometh, cruel both with wrath and fierce anger. . . . for the stars of heaven and the constellations thereof shall not give their light; the sun shall be darkened in his going forth, and the moon shall not cause her light to shine. And I will punish the world for their evil. . . . therefore will I shake the heavens, and the earth shall remove out of her place, in the wrath of the Lord of Hosts, and in the day of His fierce anger. . . . and Babylon, the glory of kingdoms, the beauty of the Chaldees' excellency, shall be as when God overthrew Sodom and Gomorrah."

When considering the cry for vengeance under the fifth seal, we quoted Isa. xxxiv. 8, which links the day of the Lord's vengeance with the year of the recompense for the controversy of Zion. That same chapter is an O.T. prophecy of the effect of the opening of the sixth seal.

> "The indignation of the Lord is upon all nations, and His fury upon all their armies. . . . all the host of heaven shall be dissolved, and the heavens shall be rolled together as a scroll: and all their host shall fall down as the leaf falleth off from the vine, > and as a falling fig from the fig tree. . . . for it is the day of the Lord's vengeance. . . . Behold, your God will come with vengeance, even God with a recompense; He will come and save you" (Isa. xxxiv. 1-8; xxxv. 4).

A terrible shaking awaits the nations of the earth. Even in the present day, as we see thrones and crowns on the brink of collapse, what word so expresses the state of the nations and kingdoms as the words of Haggai, "I will shake all nations"?

> "For thus saith the Lord of Hosts: Yet first, it is a little while, and I will shake the heavens and the earth, and the sea, and the dry land. And I will shake all nations, and the desire of all nations shall come, and I will fill this house with glory, saith the Lord of Hosts" (Hag. ii. 6, 7).

Here is the blessing of Israel. The closely-related "vengeance" on the nations is found in Hag. ii. 21, 22, "I will shake the heavens and the earth: And I will overthrow the throne of kingdoms, and I will destroy the strength of the kingdoms of the nations". In the epistle to the Hebrews we see that the shaking of the earth looks back to Sinai, while the shaking of the heavens "once for all" looks forward to a far more violent and far-reaching visitation the inspired comment being, "Yet once for all denotes the removal of the things that may be shaken, as of things that have been made, so that the things which cannot be shaken may remain" (Heb. xii. 25-29).

Coming now, with all these prophecies, to Matt. xxiv. the key prophecy, we shall be able to locate the sixth seal in the Divine plan.

> "Immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven, and the powers of the heavens shall be shaken: And then shall appear the sign of the Son of man in heaven" (Matt. xxiv. 29, 30).

No mention is made in this passage of the shaking of the nations, but this is supplied by Luke.

> "And when ye shall see Jerusalem compassed with armies, then know that the desolation thereof is nigh. . . . for these be the days of vengeance, that all things which are written may be fulfilled. . . . until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled. And there shall be signs in the sun, and in the moon, and in the stars; and upon the earth distress of nations, with perplexity; the sea and the waves roaring; men's hearts failing them for fear, and for looking after those things which are coming on the earth: for the powers of heaven shall be shaken; and then shall they see the Son of man coming in a cloud with power and great glory" (Luke xxi. 20-27).

It will be observed that in Matt. xxiv. 29 we have a distinct point of time indicated. The tribulation is immediately following the shaking and the signs in heaven. Therefore we can with certainty say that the great tribulation takes place either at the breaking of the fifth seal, or before the opening of the sixth. If this be so, then, still following the order of Matt. xxiv. 15, the Abomination of desolation must find its place somewhere between the fourth and the sixth seals, and consequently Rev. xiii. must be assigned a place here. It appears, therefore, that although there are seven seals upon the scroll, six of them exhaust the period of its prophecy. The sixth seal takes us to a period of time when kings, great men, and bond and free shall flee to hide from the wrath of the Lamb. The period which is reached by the sixth seal is called "The great day of His wrath". We are led on by a different series of events to the same end when the seventh angel sounds his trumpet, for again the period is given, "Thy wrath is come, and the time of the dead, that they should be judged" (xi. 18).

The record of the seven angels who have the seven vials gives us fuller details of this period of "wrath" (vi. 17; xi. 18), for they have the seven golden vials full of the wrath of God. At the opening of the seventh seal upon the sounding of the seventh trumpet, and upon the pouring out of the seventh vial, we have voices, thunderings, lightnings, and an earthquake or shaking (viii. 5; xi. 19; xvi. 18). These three series of seals, trumpets, and vials are each connected with the temple (viii. 3-5; xi. 19; xvi. 1, 17).

We have devoted time to this particular section because of the need there is to seek an answer to the question, "Do the seven trumpets, and the remaining prophecies of the Revelation, take place after the sixth seal in order of time, or do they go back and give fuller details of the period covered by the six seals?" The fact that the abomination of desolation and the great tribulation come before the opening of the sixth seal, necessarily brings some of the later chapters into the period covered by chapter vi., and considering also the manner in which each series of seals, trumpets, and vials ends, we cannot help but feel that the teaching is the true one which sees in the six seals the large outline of events, and in the subsequent trumpets and vials the fuller details of the same period.

Just by way of suggestion we pass on the following items, trusting the reader may be stirred up to make his own list and comparisons.

In the rendering of Rev. vi. 12-17, with which this article opens, it will observed that there comes the expression, "the whole moon became as blood". If we consider this as meaning what is known as the full moon, we shall miss the important connexion with the events of the fourth trumpet. When the fourth angel sounded, the third part of the sun was smitten and the third part of the moon. Just as God in His dealings with Pharaoh held back the threatened judgment upon the firstborn until the very last, so here we can see that the sounding of the fourth trumpet, though mentioned after the opening of the sixth seal, is really before it in point of time.

Again, at the conclusion of this fourth trumpet an eagle flies through mid heaven with cries of Woe. Under the fourth seal men repent not, neither give God glory. This seems connected with the record of xiv. 6, which speaks of an angel flying through mid heaven with the aionian gospel, calling upon the earth dwellers to give glory to God.

But we must conclude. May the revelation of these realities stir us up to diligent prayerful service, and stedfast faith during the days in which we are called upon to witness.

#30. The Sealing of the 144,000 (Rev. vii. 1-8).
pp. 161 – 166

Before the inspired record deals with the opening of the seventh seal, two episodes are introduced, one, the sealing of the 144,000, the other, the great multitude before the throne.

There is nothing in the wording of the passage to tell us definitely just where to place these visions in relation to the seals. The words with which chapter vii. commences are (according to the best texts and R.V.) after this, not "after these things"; there is therefore no necessity to take the sealing as occurring after the sixth seal in point of time. In verses 1 and 2 references is made to four angels who had received commandment to injure the earth, the sea, and the trees by the instrumentality of the four winds of the earth:--

> "And I saw another angel ascending from the sunrising, having the seal of the living God: and he cried with a loud voice to the four angels, to whom it was given to hurt the earth and the sea: saying, Hurt not the earth, neither the sea, nor the trees, till we have sealed the servants of God in their foreheads."

We do not read anything that exactly answers to this hurting of the earth, sea and trees in any of the happenings following upon the opening the six seals. In the sixth seal there is a most awful convulsion or shaking, but this seems to be the result of something other than the wind. In chapter ix. the fifth angel sounds and locusts come out upon the earth:--

> "And it was commanded them that they should not hurt the grass of the earth, neither any green thing, neither any tree; but only those men which have not the seal of God in their foreheads" (ix. 4).

Here, by implication, we see the 144, 000, for they are contrasted with the unsealed ones.

Rev. vii. 1-8.

1. And after these things I saw four angels standing on the four corners of the earth, holding the four winds of the earth, that the wind should not blow on the earth, nor on the sea, nor on any tree.
2. And I saw another angel ascending from the east, having the seal of the living God: and he cried with a loud voice to the four angels, to whom it was given to hurt the earth and the sea,
3. Saying, Hurt not the earth, neither the sea, nor the trees, till we have sealed the servants of our God in their foreheads.
4. And I heard the number of them which were sealed: and there were sealed an hundred and forty and four thousand of all the tribes of the children of Israel.
5. Of the tribe of Juda were sealed twelve thousand. Of the tribe of Reuben were sealed twelve thousand. Of the tribe of Gad were sealed twelve thousand.
6. Of the tribe of Aser were sealed twelve thousand. Of the tribe of Nepthalim were sealed twelve thousand. Of the tribe of Manasses were sealed twelve thousand.
7. Of the tribe of Simeon were sealed twelve thousand. Of the tribe of Levi were sealed twelve thousand. Of the tribe of Issachar were sealed twelve thousand.
8. Of the tribe of Zabulon were sealed twelve thousand. Of the tribe of Joseph were sealed twelve thousand. Of the tribe of Benjamin were sealed twelve thousand.

Let us now turn to the prophet Ezekiel to see whether we can obtain any light from his prophecy. The first twelve chapters of Ezekiel are taken up with the desolateness of Jerusalem and Israel, even as the concluding thirteen are taken up with the restoration. Chapter i. is full of teaching concerning four living creatures (the very same name as the four beasts, or living ones, of Revelation). Ezekiel receives his commission to go to the rebellious house of Israel, and in chapter iv. he prophesies, by means of a symbol, the siege of Jerusalem; there we find a parallel with the third seal:--

> "I will break the staff of bread in Jerusalem: and they shall eat bread by weight and with care, and they shall drink water by measure and with astonishment" (Ezek. iv. 16).

In chapter v. Ezekiel is bidden to take a sharp sword, "as a barber's razor shalt thou take it", and with it used in this fashion he is told to cut off some of his hair and beard. The hair was divided into three parts, one third to be burned in the city, one third to be smitten with the sword, and the remaining third scattered to the wind, and the Lord said, "I will draw out a sword after them". A few in number were to be taken and bound in the prophet's skirts. These signs are interpreted in verse 12:--

> "A third part of thee shall die with pestilence, and with famine shall they be consumed in the midst of thee (see the first four seals of Rev. vi.), and a third part shall fall by the sword round about thee; and I will scatter a third part into all the winds, and I will draw out a sword after them" (this emphasis upon the third part is also found in Rev. viii.).

No mention is made in this passage of those typified by the small portion of hair bound in the prophet's skirt; in chapters vi. and vii., however, a hint is given by the reference to a "remnant" that "escape" (vi. 8, vii. 16). Chapters viii. - xi. are taken up with the sins of Israel with reference to the temple, and a series of "abominations" are shown to the prophet. In chapter ix. 4-6 the Lord commanded:--

> "Go through the midst of Jerusalem, and set a mark upon the foreheads of the men that sigh and cry for all the abominations that be done in the midst thereof, and to the others He said in mine hearing, Go ye after him through the city, and smite; let not your eye spare, neither have pity: slay utterly old and young, both maids and little children, and women; but come not near any man upon whom is the mark: and begin at My Sanctuary."

Without pursuing this section further, it will be seen that we have a close parallel to the sealing of the 144,000 in the book of Revelation. We cannot but feel that they too will be marked off as ones that sigh and that cry because of THE abomination that maketh desolate. The sealing of these saints of God is in direct contrast with the branding of the beast (xiii. 16-18, xiv. 9-11, xvi. 2, xix. 20). God's own are "sealed", the devil's own are "marked" or "branded". John tells us that he "heard the number of the sealed", and the 144,000 (12,000 for each tribe) must be taken literally. Again in ix. 16 a far more "figurative" sounding number is given, viz., "two hundred thousand thousand"! yet the apostle solemnly declares, "I heard the number of them". When the number is beyond computation the apostle has said so, e.g., "whose number is AS the sand of the sea" (xx. 8), or even more to the point, in the very next vision to the 144,000 he sees a multitude "that no man could number". Moses Stuart says, "That the number in this case is symbolical, and not to be literally taken, seems scarcely necessary to remark"; the same writer, however, when speaking of the order of the names of the twelve tribes, makes the observation, “There are no two cases in the whole Bible where the order and number are the same”. The following table may be useful as a guide to the underlying reasons for this variation of what at first would seem to be a fixed subject:-- (see next page)

We have not attempted to set out all the lists that occur in the Scriptures as the above (next page) will be sufficient for our purpose. The first, the order of birth, needs no comment. Where the order differs from this one, however, an explanation seems necessary. The omission of Levi from four of the lists (Nos. 4-7) is explained in Josh. xviii. 7, “The Levites have no part among you, for the priesthood of the Lord is their inheritance”. These four lists deal with the earthly inheritance. Levi finds a place in No. 8 which deals with the heavenly inheritance. Ephraim is omitted in No. 8, but Joseph is named, while in Nos. 4-7 Joseph is omitted, Numb. xiii. 11 explaining the omission of Joseph’s names, “Of the tribe Joseph, namely, of the tribe of Manasseh”. This also would stand good in an opposite sense in No. 8, and Joseph would there stand for Ephraim, Manasseh being mentioned by name, the omission of Simeon from the blessing of Moses is unexplained in the narrative, and so far as we know is unexplained by any interpretation of Scripture.

Why is Dan omitted from No. 8? The sealing was that all the tribes of the children of Israel (Rev. vii. 4). Dan is by no means excluded from blessing, as may be seen in No. 7, for the very first to be assigned its portion is this tribe. Dan was the first tribe to set up idolatry after the entry into the land, but it must not be forgotten that before Dan’s image was made Aaron and all the tribes had been involved in the matter of the golden calf. Again, while Dan may have been the first to lapse into idolatry, what tribe is there that is clear from that sin?

The promises of the Revelation are addressed to persons, and are related to personal actions; they take no account of either the good or the bad record of the person’s ancestry. It is essentially “to HIM that overcometh”. It may seem strange that not one individual of the tribe of Dan should have been found worthy to receive the seal of the living God, but it is possible that in the light of the fulfilment of this passage abundant reason will be found. If, as some believe, Antichrist is to be of the tribe of Dan, that would possibly have some influence on the tribe as a whole, but this has to be proved, and we prefer to wait. We do not expect to see the fulfilment of this passage, believing that the blessed hope of the calling wherewith we have been called will have been realized before the day of the Lord sets in: the church of the one body has no promise that any of its members will be sealed in their foreheads, but the same principle obtains in this dispensation as in that of the Revelation, as the teaching of Phil. iii. bears witness.

#23. The Nineveh Gallery.--Sennacherib.
pp. 5, 6

> "The Bas-reliefs which line the walls of this room were excavated by Sir Henry Layard from the mound of Kouyonjik, Nineveh, between the years 1845-1854; a large number of them were fractured by the action of fire when Nineveh was destroyed by the allied forces of the Babylonians and Medes about B.C. 609. As far as possible the fragments have been laid in their proper places; no attempt at restoration has been made" (British Museum Guide).

We draw attention to the following:--

No. 2, ASSYRIAN GALLERY.—This is considered to be a Phœnician ship; note the ram, the double bank of rowers, and the shield fastened to the upper deck to protect the soldiers and crew. Several fish are depicted, also a crab. The detail that is introduced into these carvings is not merely ornamental. We quote from Canon Rawlinson's The First Great Monarchies:--

> "It was under Sennacherib that the practice obtained of completing each scene by a background, such as actually existed. . . . the species of trees' is distinguished in Sennacherib's bas-reliefs; gardens, fields, forests, seeds, are carefully represented. Wild animals are introduced, as stags, boars and antelopes; birds fly from tree to tree, or stand over their nests feeding the young who stretch up to them; fish disport themselves in the waters."

Nos. 4-8.—A battle in a marsh, and the registration of prisoners and spoil.

Nos. 20-26.—This is part of a series, representing the assault of the city of. . . . Alammu (? Jerusalem).

Nos. 41-42.—These slabs depict the various attendants bringing in food for the banquet; one figure is of particular interest as it shows a man carrying in each hand a rod upon which locusts are fixed, like beads on a thread; these are the locusts that formed the fare of John the Baptist while in the wilderness. Many think of the locust bean when they read about John, but it was the insect that was eaten.

Nos. 51-56.—These illustrate some of the architectural activities of Sennacherib. In No. 52 the king is shown standing in a chariot on the top of a mound, superintending the work. A colossal bull, such as we have seen in the Assyrian transept, is being dragged up the slope by force of gangs of men, each man has a small rope over his shoulder which is attached to the large one; other gangs of captives toil up the sloe with earth and stone. In No. 55 the artist has placed among the reeds a sow with nine little pigs; men are shown carrying picks, saw, spades, etc., and a drag carts laden with ropes and beams.

We quote Canon Rawlinson again:--

> "In the construction of these great works he made use chiefly of forced labour with which his triumphant expeditions into foreign countries had so abundantly supplied him, Chaldeans, Aramæans Cilicians, and probably also Egyptians, Ethiopians, Elamites and Jews were employed by thousands. . . . they wrought in gangs, each gang having a costume peculiar to it, which probably marked its nation. . . . the forced labourers often worked in fetters, which were sometimes supported by a bar fastened to the wrist, while sometimes they consisted merely of shackles round the ankles."

There is much in common between the Pharaohs of Egypt and the Kings of Assyria. Their cruelty, their culture, their art, architecture, learning and literature, their religion and their pride, are symbols of the ever present character of the flesh and the world.

There are other interests in this Gallery which require too careful a study for us to take them up now, but we hope to do so in our next paper.

#24. The Nineveh Gallery.--The Creation Tablets.
pp. 76 - 80

Along the middle of this gallery are nine table cases containing some most valuable tablets from the Royal Library at Nineveh. The library though existing in the days of Sargon (B.C. 722-705) reached its highest glory under Ashur-bani-pal (B.C. 668-626). These tablets, of which there are many thousands, are copies of older works deposited in the library in the temple of Nebo, the god of learning.

THE CREATION TABLETS.—In table case A will be found a series of tablets which give the Assyrian account of the Creation and the Flood. Nos. 1-19 form parts of the series known as the Creation Tablets. There were seven tablets, even as there were seven days occupied in the creation. The tablets are classified both by number, and also by the first words of the first tablet of the series. The first words of the first tablet are e – nu – ma e – lish, "When in the height", and so the fourth tablet is inscribed, "Tablet IV. e – nu – ma e – lish". This system is quite in agreement with the Hebrew method. The book of Genesis being called Beroshith, "In the beginning."

Tablet I.—The pre-creative state and the first day (Gen. i. 1-5).

TABLETS II., III., IV.—The creation of light and the war between light and darkness. The victory of the former and the separation of heaven and earth, the banishment of the dragon of chaos to the depths of the under world. The earth planted. This group corresponds in general to the work of the second and third days (Gen. i. 6-13).

TABLET V.—Creation and ordering of the heavenly bodies. Corresponds nearest of all to the fourth day (Gen. i. 14-19).

TABLET VI.—Lost.

TABLET VII.—Creation of cattle and creeping things, and probably man also. Corresponds to the sixth day (Gen. i. 24-31).

We now give a translation of the opening lines of the first tablet:-- > "At that time the heavens above named,

> Nor did the earth below record one:
> Yea, the deep was their first creator,
> The chaos of the sea was the mother of them all.
> Their waters were embosomed in one place, and
> The flowering reed was ungathered, the marsh-plant was ungrown."

The reference to the chaotic deep as the mother of them all seems a mutilated story of the time recorded in Gen. i. 2. These tablets do not go back to the primal creation of Gen. i. 1. Confusion and conflict is the beginning of their story. There is more than superficial resemblance, for the cuneiform word Tiamat corresponds with the Hebrew Tehom, "the deep" (Gen. i. 2).

We will not weary the reader with the rest of the translation; this teaches that the chaos and emptiness was broken by the creation of "gods". The last legible lines of the tablet however are suggestive, "Far extended were the days, until the host of heaven and earth were made". Some translations read, "Far extended were the days until the gods ansar and Ki-sar were made". An-sar means, "heaven host", and Kis-sar, "earth host" with which should be read Gen. ii. 1, "Thus the heavens and the earth were finished, and all the host of them".

Tablets II., III., and IV. are taken up with the doings of Marduk (Merodach), who eventually slays Tiamat (The Deep):--

> "He split her like a flat fish into two halves, He took one half of her and made it the covering of the sky; He stretched out the skin, and caused a watch to be kept, enjoining that her waters should not issue forth."

Beneath the strangeness of these words one can hear the remains of a great truth. The present heaven was a special creation, as Gen. i. 6-8 teaches. The keeping back of the waters of the great deep is an echo of the words of Job xxxviii. 4-11.

The third tablet contains a passage which speaks of sin being found among the "gods". As we believe that the fall of Satan and his angels has much to do with the condition indicated in Gen. i. 2, the following lines are suggestive:--

> "The great gods, all of them determiners of fate,
> They entered, and deathlike the God Sar filled (?)
> In sin one with the other the compact joins.

The command was established in the garden of God
The Asman (fruit) they ate, they broke in two,
Its stalk the (?) destroyed.
The sweet juice which injures the body.
Great is their sin. Themselves they exalted.
To Merodach their Redeemer He appointed their fate."

The "garden of God" is spoken of in Ezekiel xxviii. where the prophet speaks of one "full of wisdom and perfect in beauty. Thou hast been in Eden the garden of God. . . . thine heart was lifted up. . . .".

The fifth tablet presents several striking agreements with the Scripture record of creation:--

"He made pleasant the positions of the great gods
The constellations He arranged them, the double stars he fixed
He ordained the year, he appointed the Zodiac signs over it.
The twelve months of constellations by threes he fixed
From the day when the year commenced to its close.
He established the position of the crossing stars and for the seasons their bounds.
Not to make fault or error of any kind

* * * * * * *

The Illuminator he caused to shine to rule the night,
He appointed him to establish the night until the coming forth of the day (Saying) Each month without fail by thy disk keep watch.
At the beginning of the month or the rising of the night
Horns shine forth to announce the night.
On the seventh day to a disk it fills up.
Open thou and cause the rays of thy face to shine
At that time the Sun on the horizon of heaven at thy coming."

* * * * * * *

In this account the stars come first, which accords with the scriptural description of the people, "Astrologers", etc. The sun, moon and stars were created "for signs and for seasons, and for days and years", and this is evidently believed in this tablet. The path of the sun through the heavens was carefully mapped out. There were twelve stations, subdivided into four groups, divided from each other by fixed points. The words "crossing stars" in the tablet are the rendering of the cuneiform Nibiri. Nibiru really means a "ferry boat", and Merodach is called Ilu Nibiru, "the god of the ferryboat". The Nibiri means the constellations which mark the points where the sun passes from one division of the year to the other. The "Zodiac signs" of the third line are in the cuneiform Mizrata umazzir. With this compare Job xxxviii. 32, "Canst thou bring forth Mazzaroth in his seasons?" (margin, "the twelve signs"). "The rising of the night" is in cuneiform Lillate, in Hebrew Lillith, "the twilight".

The sixth tablet is very much mutilated, but sufficient is decipherable to show that it refers to the work of the sixth day (Gen. i. 24, 25):--

"When the gods in their assembly had created (great beasts)
They made perfect the mighty monsters,
They caused the living creatures to come forth;
The cattle of the field, the wild beast of the field, and the creeping things of the field.
. . . . . for the living creatures."

The god Ea, is mentioned in the mutilated lines that follow, and as this god is usually the one to whom the creation of man is assigned, it seems very probable that the Babylonian account of the creation of man was written on this same tablet. A fragment of a hymn has the following:--

> "Mayest thou be great, for a noble companion art thou. Let thy manhood be increased. With the dominion of all the gods I have caused thy hand to be filled."

These words seem an echo of Gen. i. 26. An ancient magical text of Accadian origin (a people from whom the Babylonians learned much) has a line, Assat ina udli nis uttam, "the woman from the flank of man was called", which is parallel with Gen. ii. 21, 22.

It is probable that the last tablet made reference to the Sabbath. The Sabbath was called Udu Khulgul, an "unlawful day", and Salum, "rest or completion". A gloss in a lexicographical tablet explains the word Sabbattum by Yum nukh libbi, "The day of rest for the heart". Those who are acquainted with the Hebrew language will see how closely related the Assyrian and the Hebrew are. In another list Sabattu is explained as a synonym of gamaru, "to complete, to finish". So in Gen. ii. 1-3 we read, "Thus the heavens and the earth were finished. . . . on the seventh day God ended (same word finished). . . . and He rested on the seventh day. . . .".

We have not quoted or even indicated the grotesque and "turbid mass of idolatrous fancies" which occupies the bulk of these tablets, neither do we suggest that a comparison with the inspired record is possible. Referring to the truth revealed in Rom. i. 18-24, we quote the words of the Rev. John Urquhart:--

> "The Chaldean Genesis is itself a testimony that revelation is a fact. The story is built upon outlines which perfect knowledge of creation's mysteries could alone have furnished. And the Genesis of the Bible is also itself the proof that He Who gave the first revelation gave us the second revelation, that men may know Him Who is behind all things and in all things--the living God, our Maker, and our Father."

This we shall have illustrated again when we consider the tablets dealing with the Flood.

pp. 137 - 140

TABLE CASE A (Nos. 24-64).—Here are fragments of twelve tablets which give the wanderings and adventures of a mythical hero Gilgamesh. He is called "A mighty one on earth", and has the title among others of "The warrior perfect in strength". Archæologists see in Gilgamesh, Nimrod, "the mighty rebel". His many titles are all applied to the sun god, and the twelve tablets of the exploits of Gilgamesh are arranged upon an astronomical principle, each book corresponding with one of the signs of the zodiac. The eleventh tablet corresponds to the sign Aquarius, and to "the month of the curse of rain", and here we find the story of the Deluge.

Gilgamesh sets out to find Tsit-napishtim, in order to learn from him the secret of immortality. Tsit-napishtim relates to Gilgamesh "the story of his preservation", and 173 lines are occupied with the account of the Deluge and the preservation of Tsit-napishtim. We will not quote the whole of the poem, but will give sufficient extracts to show how closely the Chaldean epic follows the Scripture narrative.

"To make a deluge the great gods brought their hearts.
Destroy the house and build a ship.
For I will destroy the seed and the life.
Cause them to go up into the ship all seed that hath life.
The ship which thou shalt make. . . . cubits its length in measure.
. . . . . cubits the contents of its breadth and height.
The building of the ship which thou commandest.
If it be made by me,
Then will laugh at me the children of the people, and the old men.
Ea opened his mouth and spake to me, his servant.
If they laugh at thee, thou shalt say unto them,
Every one who has turned from me
Shall be punished, for the protection of the gods is over me.
I will judge my judgment upon all above and below.
Close not the ship
Until the season, when I shall send the word (saying),
Enter the ship and close the door.
In the interior of it thy grain, thy furniture, thy goods,
Thy wealth, thy man servants and maid servants, and thy young men.
The cattle of the field and the animals of the field as many as I would preserve.
I will send thee, (then) make firm thy door.
The reverent and holy one opened his mouth and spoke to Ea, his Lord.
No one has made such a ship
. . . . on the ground. . . .
(The form of) the ship let me see.
On the fifth day two sides were raised,
In its enclosure (hull) fourteen ribs,
Also fourteen they numbered above.
I placed its roof and enclosed it.
Sixthly I made it firm, seventhly I divided its passages.
Eighthly its interior I examined.
Openings to the waters I stopped.

I searched for cracks, and the wanting parts I fixed.
Three sari of bitumen I poured over the outside.
Three sari of bitumen I poured over the interior.

* * * * * * *

The season the sun god had fixed and (of which) he spake saying:
I will cause it to rain from heaven heavily.
Enter into the midst of the ship and close thy door.
Of that day when I reached the twilight,
The day which I had watched for with fear.
Then rose the water of dawn at daylight
Like a black cloud on the horizon of heaven.
The thunder god in the midst of it thundered.
Nebo and the wind god march in front.
The throne bearers (storm clouds) go o'er the mountains and plains.
The pestilence god brings with him affliction.
The war god goes in front and casts down,
The angels of earth carry destruction.
In their glory they swept through the land.
The deluge of the rain god reaches to heaven.
The darkened earth to waste is turned.
To battle against men they brought the deluge.
Brother saw not brother, men knew not one another.

* * * * * * *

And though I the mother have begotten my people,
Yet like the spawn of fishes they fill the sea.

* * * * * * *

Six days and nights.
The wind, the deluge, and the storm go on sweeping away
The seventh day when it approached the rain subsided,
And the great deluge,
Which had assailed like a host,
Was appeased.
The sea began to dry, and the wind and flood ended.
I watched the sea making a tossing,
And the whole of mankind had turned to clay.
Like reeds the corpses floated.
I opened the window, and the light struck on my face.
I was sad at heart, I sat down, I wept.
To the country of Nizir floated the ship.
The mountain of Nizir stopped the ship, and to pass over it was not able.
On the seventh day in the course of it
I sent forth the dove; it left. The dove went and returned;
A resting place it saw not, it returned back.
I sent forth a swallow, it left and turned, and
A resting place it could not see, and it returned back.
I sent forth a raven, and it left.
The raven went and the corpses which were on the water it saw.
It did eat – it floated and was carried away – it returned not.
I sent the animals forth to the four winds (of heaven).
I sacrificed a sacrifice.

I built the altar on the peak of the mountain.
Adgur (libation) jars by sevens I placed.
Below them I spread reeds, pine wood, and spices.
The gods smelt the savour. The gods smelled the sweet savour.
The gods like flies over the master of the sacrifice gathered.
The great goddess lifted up the mighty bow which Anu had created as his glory.

* * * * * * *

Let the doer of sin bear his sin, and let the transgressor bear his transgression.
Instead of making a deluge, may lions increase, and men be decreased (also jackals, famine, pestilence).

* * * * * * *

He turned himself to us, and established himself to us in a covenant."

A few notes may be of service. The words Zir napisti bulaah, "preserve the seed of life", remind us of the words of Gen. vii. 3, "to keep seed alive". The reference to substituting the depredation of the lion, jackal, famine, and pestilence for the flood is a faint echo of the promise of Gen. viii. 21, 22. Further, the lion and jackal were emblems of the god of death, and the sword, famine, and pestilence are brought together in several parts of Scripture (see Jer. xiv. 12; xxvii. 13; II Sam. xxiv. 15; Rev. vi.). Some of the figures used to describe the deluge in this tablet remind one of the majestic Psalm of Habakkuk. See, for example, Hab. iii. 5, "Before Him went the pestilence, and burning coals went forth at His feet". The darkness that is spoken of in the line, "the darkened earth to waste is turned", is a word which suggests the "darkness that might be felt" of the Egyptian plague, while the combination of waste and darkness reminds one of Gen. i. 2.

The Scriptures tell us that the ark rested "upon the mountains of Ararat", not as often quoted, "upon Mount Ararat". The Chaldean tablet speaks of the ship resting upon "the mountain of Nizir". Ararat is written Uradhu in the inscriptions, and there denotes Armenia, and more particularly the district about Lake Van. An inscription of Assur-nazzir-pal places Nizir in the tableland of Pamir, a little south of Rowandiz. The word "Armenia" of Isa. xxxvii. 38 is in the Hebrew Ararat. The introduction of the rainbow into the account is noteworthy. There is also a hymn wherein occur the words, kistu abubi, "the bow of the deluge", Hebrew, kesheth, which differs only in pronunciation from the Assyrian. As in the article dealing with the creation, so here, we quote the words of Rev. John Urquhart:-- > "Notwithstanding these numerous and striking agreements, the Babylonian legend is neither progenitor nor rival of the Scripture. It is defile and defaced; and it contains distortions of the truth grave enough to make us sensible of how much we owe to this despised Genesis. . . . The truth was there; but it was inextricably mingled with error which spread darkness not only over the earth's past, but also over heaven. . . . For the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth to have been declared by Moses, he had to pass the Egyptian priests and the Chaldean documents, and to speak with God."

#26. The Nineveh Gallery.
Grammatical Tables and Syllabaries, etc.
pp. 171 - 175

It must be remembered that the Assyrians were not the original inhabitants of the country, and that the warlike Assyrians were indebted to the vanquished Accadians for the basis of their written language. The Accadian or Sumerian used a picture writing, which became conventionalized and simplified in course of time. The Assyrians took the signs from the Sumerians, disregarded their original meaning, and retained only their sound value. In the ancient Sumerian language the sign that represented "heaven" was pronounced an. This sign and sound was taken over by the Assyrians without its meaning. The sign simply stood for the sound an in whatever Assyrian word such syllable might come.

In Table Case B are portions of various Syllabaries, Nos. 9-11 being of the first class, viz., those which give (1) the Sumerian value, (2) the sign, and (3) its Assyrian name. Nos. 12-15 are of the second class, viz., those which give (1) the Sumerian value, (2) the sign, and (3) its Assyrian meaning. Nos. 16 and 17 are of third class, viz., those which give (1) the Sumerian value, (2) the sign, and (3) its Assyrian name, and (4) its Assyrian meaning. Nos. 22 and 23 give a list of Assyrian words of synonymous meanings. Nos. 24-26 give Assyrian words and phrases used in legal documents. Nos. 27 gives grammatical examples in Sumerian, with Assyrian translations, the phrases being those found in incantations. There are forty-one lists in this case dealing with a great variety of philological subjects. In Table Case C we have a collection of explanatory lists of words, names of gods, of utensils, of stars, rivers, countries, cities, temples, birds, animals, etc. As one begins to realize all that these grammatical tables and syllabaries mean, one can appreciate the following comment of Prof. Sayce:--

> "The Assyrian Scribes themselves have provided us with the most abundant materials for interpreting the inscriptions."
> "Every great Babylonian city had at least one library, scribes were kept constantly at work there copying and re-editing old tests, and sometimes writing new ones."

Table Case D contains a number of tablets dealing with Chronology, rich in material for Assyriologists, but not of a nature of interest the ordinary reader. One of the lists tells us that in the month Sivan an eclipse of the sun took place, and recent astronomical calculations prove that an eclipse of the sun, visible at Nineveh, took place on 15th June, 763, B.C. This gives a fixed point for assigning correct dates over a long period. No. 41 is an inscription of Tiglath-Pileser III, mentioning "Ahaz, king of Judah" as among tributary kings.

Table Case E contains a large number of Assyrian letters relating to public and private affairs, selections of astronomical reports, contract tablets, and commercial documents.

In Nos. 108 and 109, we see not only the clay tablet, but the clay envelope which was formed round it, making it impossible to open without destroying a part of the envelope. In Table Case F are exhibited tablets with incantations and directions for the performance of religious and magical rites and ceremonies. In Table Case G are prayers, hymns, litanies and incantations. No. 5 is an alliterative hymn in Assyrian in the form of an Acrostic. The initial and final syllables of the lines read downwards from the same sentence.

Exhibited in Table Case H is a series of Omen tablets. Omens derived from water, the flight of a bird, the births of deformed children, the weather, dreams, dogs, etc. The present day superstition concerning mirrors, salt, tea-leaves, crossed knives, ladders, etc., are somewhat parallel and less excusable.

Table Case I contains tablets inscribed with mythological legends, texts having magical powers, catalogues, and labels. No. 53 is a contract tablet written 694 B.C.; the nail marks of the witnesses here take the place of seal impressions. The present day fingerprint system of identification is a parallel. No. 66 shows the effect of the intense heat to which it was subjected at the burning of Ashur-bani-pal's Library at Nineveh.

A few words on the subject covered by these tablets may be of service. For the following we are indebted to the writings of Prof. Sayce:--

SACRED BOOKS and RITUAL.—Along with the growth of the official religion went the growth and completion of the Chaldean Bible and Prayer-book. The festivals of the gods were numerous; the ceremonies to be performed by the priests were more numerous still. The ceremonies were usually accompanied by the recitation of one or more hymns; these hymns were written in Sumerian, which had now become the sacred language of Chaldœa just as Latin is the sacred language of the Roman Church. An error in pronunciation was supposed to invalidate the ceremony.

THE PRIESTS.—The High-priest was often the monarch. Subordinate to him were other high priests and under them again the priests of Ishtar, and the "elders". By the side of them stood the "prophets" under a chief.

THE TEMPLES.—The temples were provided with towers which served for the observation of the stars. In the shrine was a "mercy-seat" whereon the god "seated himself" on certain occasions. At Balairât near Nineveh the mercy-seat had the form of a coffer or ark in which two written tablets of stone were placed.

ASTRO-THEOLOGY.—The stars were worshipped; Ishtar herself was originally the evening star, and most of the deities were identified with the planets and chief fixed stars.

SACRIFICES and OFFERINGS.—Sacrifices were offered to the stars, as to the other divinities. Besides the sacrifice, offerings were also made of meal, dates, oil, and wine. The sacrifices and offerings were provided partly by endowments, partly by voluntary gifts (sometimes called Kurbanni, the Hebrew Korban), partly by obligatory contributions, the most important being “tithes”.

LITERATURE.—Astronomy.—The great work on astronomy and astrology in seventy-two chapters or books was originally compiled for the library of Sargon of Accad. It contained chapters on the eclipses or conjunction of the sun and moon, of the planets, the fixed stars and the comets and the path of the sun through the signs of the zodiac.

Mathematics.—Treatises giving tables of cube and square roots give an example of the extent of the knowledge of the subject. The notation of the Assyrians was sexagesimal, and 6 still figures in such as the divisions of time, 60 seconds, 60 minutes, 24 hours. 360 degrees to the circle, etc.

Medicine, Law and History also held a considerable place in the literature of Assyria.

CONTRACT TABLETS.—From these contract tablets we may gather mush as to the social life of the people.

Marriage.—We find polygamy was very rare and the wife enjoyed a considerable amount of independence, being able to trade with her own money and conduct law suits in her own name. Wives, however, could be purchased.

Slavery.—This was ancient institution, but the slave was protected by law. The Sumerian law ordered a son who denied his father to be shorn and sold as a slave.

Taxes.—Nineveh paid into the Treasury in the time of Sennacherib 30 talents a year, Carchemish was assessed at 100 talents. There was an octroi duty upon goods entering a town.

The Bureaucracy.—The library of Nineveh gives long lists of Assyrian officials. Among them the Rab-shakeh, “chief of the princes” or Vizier (see Isa. xxxvii. 8), the Rab-saris, “chief of the nobles”, and the Rab-mag, “chief physician”.

In one important respect, the basis upon which society rested in Babylonia and in Assyria was different. The Government of Babylonia was theocratic, that of Assyria was military. While Assyria with its bureaucratic centralization was an anticipation of imperial Rome, Babylonia with its theocratic constitution was an anticipation of papal Rome. The king was the adopted son of Bel, and his right to rule was based on the fact that Bel, the true lord and master of the state, had delegated to him his power.

The Hope and the Prize.

#18. Joint Imitators (Phil. iii. 17).

pp. 21 - 24

The apostle had spoken of the truth pertaining to the prize, and of the instruction of those who desired to be perfect, as being revealed to such by God. He links with this high and holy revelation the responsibility of each one to walk in line with his attainments. He now proceeds to call their attention to the pattern that had been given them, saying, "Brethren, become joint imitators of me". In the opening up of the secret which was made known to Paul, we find the Gentiles made joint heirs, a joint body, and joint partakers of the promise (Eph. iii. 6). This joint participation in inheritance, body and promise was not of their own choosing or volition, it was entirely of grace. Those who were thus blessed were blessed without regard to their own personal characters or desires; the joint imitators of the apostle were such by virtue of that grace-given desire to press toward the prize.

On several occasions the apostle speaks of himself as a pattern for us to follow, and unless we appreciate the condescension of our God in this matter, we shall miss much blessing.

When we are exhorted to follow the example of Christ, we may feel tempted by reason of our own conscious corruption and failure to feel that the attempt must ever prove fruitless, because He, the Son of God, was so peerless and so perfect. God has met our need in this matter; He has taken a man who so hated the name of the Lord that he went the length of threatening and slaughter, and so dealt with him that he became God's own interpretation of what He means when He tells us to follow or imitate Christ. He says, in effect, here is no peerless and perfect Saviour, but a saved sinner, a man of like infirmity with yourselves; look at the way he followed his Lord, and take his example as my illustration of what I mean when I call upon you to walk in the steps of the Lord Jesus Christ.

Before passing on to consider the passage which will enable us to appreciate the apostle as the pattern for the Church, we would draw attention to the fact that here in Philippians we find the word "joint imitators", and not simply "imitators" as in all the other passages; this is peculiarly characteristic of the epistles of the mystery. This prize is to be won by members of one body, and however individual the progress and responsibility may be, there was to be a unity pervading the endeavour. This can be gathered by noticing the repeated emphasis on "minding the same thing", being of "one mind", being of "equal soul" that is found in the epistle. The "joint imitators" are called upon in i. 27 to be "joint strivers" for the faith of the gospel; the contexts of these two words have some things in common. Both are closely connected with the teaching concerning "citizenship", translated in each case by the word "conversation", both have to do with something that goes beyond salvation and speaks of suffering for Christ. The joint imitator is, moreover, very closely related to two other expressions in the third chapter. In verse 10 the apostle concludes the desires that constituted the qualifications for attaining the prize by using the words, “conformable to His death”, which word is prefixed with the same particle that we have rendered by the word “joint”. In verse 21 the glorious answer to the conformity to death of verse 10 is given in the words, “fashioned like unto the body of His glory”, the words being the verbal and substantive forms of the same word.

The “joint imitators” of verse 17, doctrinally, as well as literally, link these two references. Paul’s own individual conformity to the death of Christ, which led on to his conformity to the glory of Christ, becomes the example for our imitation, that we being already fellow heirs, fellow members, and fellow partakers, may by becoming fellow imitators share with him the added glory of attaining unto the prize of the high calling. If we have entertained hopes and fears regarding our place in the contest, the matter may become simplified by a prayerful examination of the pattern we have to follow.

The first epistle given by inspiration that Paul wrote contains in the sixth verse the reference to imitation, “and you became imitators of us”. Such statement requires a high standard of spiritual attainment for any teacher to make without qualification, yet the apostle's statement is even fuller than this, for he adds, “and of the Lord”, linking, by the authority of God, his own example with that of his peerless Lord.

The imitation here noted is explained as their having “received the word in much affliction with joy of the holy Spirit”, so that they in turn became “types to all believers in Macedonia and Achaia”. In I Cor. iv. 16 the apostle concludes a passage (which uses such loathsome similes as “the filth of the world”, and “the offscouring of all things”, and tabulates such privations as hunger and thirst, nakedness and homelessness), with the words, “Wherefore, I beseech you, become ye imitators of me”! Here again the imitation of the apostle led to suffering and rejection. In I Cor. xi. 1 he concludes another line of argument, this time not laying the emphasis upon suffering, but upon the placing of the well being of others ever before our own considerations:--

> “Give none offence, neither to the Jews, nor to the Gentiles, nor to the Church of God: even as I please all men in all things, not seeking mine own profit, but the profit of many, that they may be saved; become imitators of me, even as I am of Christ.”

How much the apostle realized that his life was to be an example for the saints to imitate is seen in such a passage as II Thess. iii. 7-9:--

> “For ye yourselves know how it behoves you to imitate us: for we were not disorderly among you; neither did we eat any man’s bread for naught, but wrought with labour and travail night and day, that we might not be chargeable to any of you; not because we have not authority, but in order that we might give ourselves a type for you to imitate us.”

This type which the Lord exhorts us to imitate sets before the believer suffering, hardship, self denial, care for others, toil and labour; the power of the example is found in the words, “even as I also am of Christ”. He so followed his Lord that his example becomes a type or pattern for us to imitate. From another standpoint, that of distinct doctrine, we might consider other passages where Paul and his life and teaching are spoken of as types, but such passages are not strictly connected with the thought of Phil. iii. We have not yet, however, considered the particular phase of the apostle's example that he gives in Phil. iii.; that particular phase is given in verse 20, but is preceded by a warning concerning those whose walk is quite contrary; these two types, the one to follow and the other to avoid, together with their ends, we must leave for another paper.

#19. The enemies of the cross (Phil. iii. 18, 19).
pp. 53 - 57

Before passing on to the grand conclusion of the chapter, which gives a glimpse of what the "out resurrection" will mean, the apostle pauses to give one final word of earnest warning. Early in the chapter he had sounded the same note, "Beware of dogs, beware of evil workers, beware of the concision, for we are the circumcision which worship God in the spirit, and rejoice in Christ Jesus, and have no confidence in the flesh"; these "dogs", "evil workers", and "concision" are in utter opposition to the true circumcision. Sadly enough, not only without but within the church were those who were not the true circumcision:--

> "For many walk, of whom I have told you often, and now tell you even weeping (parallel to the writing the same things which to the apostle was not grievous, as this was, but was safe), that they are the enemies of the cross of Christ: whose end is destruction, whose God is their belly, and whose glory is in their shame, who mind earthly things."

When the apostle speaks in the same breath of his own example, and that of those whose walk must not be imitated, it seems impossible to believe that he is speaking of the unsaved. Surely the example of the unsaved would be no snare to the Philippians in their running for the prize! No, these are believers, who though redeemed by the precious blood of Christ, and therefore saved and justified, had not gone on to realize the deeper teaching of His cross, who had not learned the circumcision of their flesh, whose God was, alas, their belly, whose mind was set on earthly things. Of such the apostle says, "their end is destruction". Concerning His sheep the Saviour had said, "they shall never perish", and this we believe is foundation truth also concerning every member of His church. The destruction here cannot refer to the believer himself, but is to be understood by its context, as being similar to the teaching if I Cor. iii. 15-17. "If any man's work shall be burned, he shall suffer loss, but he himself shall be saved, yet so as by fire. . . . if any may defile (margin and R.V. "destroy") the temple of God, him shall God destroy". The words, "he himself shall be saved", and "him shall God destroy", are so contradictory that the latter clause demands an explanation that shall bring it into line with what is clearly taught in verse 15. The word here rendered "destroy" signifies to spoil, mar, deprave, and this meaning agrees with the teaching as to suffering loss; further, there is something worth considering in the suggestion that the word rendered "him" should read "it", indicating thereby the building which, not being "God's building", is destroyed.

In the series of articles on "Things that differ" the special doctrine of the "Cross of Christ" (Volume VII, pp. 89, 117, 148, 180) was considered, and we learned that the cross had a bearing upon discipleship, denial of self, and crucifixion of the flesh; so that it becomes possible for a believer, by indulging the flesh, and by failing to walk spiritually, to constitute himself an enemy of the cross of Christ; the end of such must be loss. The epistle to the Hebrews speaks of the same thing; the failure of the redeemed Israelites, Moses included, to enter the promised land involved them in loss, and those who drew back, drew back to "destruction" or loss (same word as Phil. iii. 19), forfeiting as they did "the recompense of the reward". To those who look with longing eyes at the far off prize, such meanings will be of the utmost value, and the clearer the character of this walk is seen, the easier will it be to avoid the error.

After telling us what such are, viz., "enemies of the cross of Christ", and what their "end" must be, the apostle throws a threefold light upon the secret of their failure. Their God is their belly, their glory is in their shame, and the things on earth occupy their mind. Can a believer be said to have a "god"? At first thought we may answer, No, yet a moment's reflection may bring to your mind the warning against "covetousness which is idolatry". When in Rom. vi. 13 the apostle says, "neither yield your members. . . . unto sin; but yield yourselves unto God", it is not difficult to see that sin, being placed in opposition to God and claiming that service which is due to God, really becomes "a god" if yielded to by the believer. What is the god that claims the service of these enemies of the cross—"their belly". Scripture speaks plainly, and the issues are too solemn for us to gloss over these words of warning. Have we not at times been rebuked by some well-meaning but unenlightened believer, when such would dissuade from some step in the Lord's service by some such words as, "but you must live"! If faithfulness appears to jeopardize one's means of gaining a living, this is often reckoned as too foolish to be thought of, yet how many times do we not need to learn the ancient lesson, that "man does not live by bread alone"; anxious thought for "what we shall eat, or what we shall drink" is not the mark of the true disciple. The first temptation recorded in Scripture was founded upon something that looked "good for food", and the first recorded temptation of the Saviour in the wilderness was addressed to the claims of hunger, and in this temptation and triumph we may see the completest contrast with those whose example is the subject of the Apostle's warning. Israel's murmurings in the wilderness revolved round the question of food, and as we acquaint ourselves with the teaching of the Word, and note the tendencies in ourselves and others, it will be seen how easy a thing it is to lapse into this subtle form of idolatry. In Rom. xvi. 17, 18 the apostle calls upon the saints to "mark" (same word Phil. iii. 17) them which cause divisions, for such "serve not our Lord Christ, but their own belly". In I Cor. vi. 12, 13 the apostle, repudiating the idea covered by the saying, "all things are lawful unto me", says, "meats for the belly, and belly for meats: but God shall destroy both it and them", as much as to say, We take higher ground than this for the regulation of our conduct. Many times failure to rise to the high call of Scripture may be attributed to a "bread and butter reason"; many a believer has been betrayed into unfaithfulness because the contrary action involved what Scripture so searchingly calls, "the belly". What a degradation for one who has confessed the "one God and Father of all, who is over all, and through all, and in all"!

Those whose God is the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ find their glory in His presence, and in His smile, they look forward to the day when they, together with Christ their life, shall be manifested in glory; those whose God is their belly find their glory in their shame. Of the Lord it is written that He endured the cross, and despised the shame. The apostle in Phil. i. 20, speaking of his deliverance from prison, says:--

> "According to my earnest expectation and hope, that in nothing I shall be ashamed, but that with all boldness, as always, so now also, Christ shall be magnified in my body, whether it be by life or by death."

Paul's conception of shame seems to be a denial of Christ, the pleasing of self before the Lord; it is fairly certain that those whose God is their belly would not be likely to magnify God in their body. In what way such could find their glory in their shame may be difficult to detail, the fact is sufficient for the purpose of a warning. It is the special feature of the truth of the prison epistles that those who are blessed under the dispensation of the mystery are blessed "in the super-heavenlies", to such the apostle writes:--

> "If ye then were raised with Christ, seek those things which are above, where Christ sitteth on the right hand of God. Set your mind on things above, not on things on the earth" (Col. iii. 1, 2).

The concluding description of those whose example was to be avoided is that they "mind earthly things". The earthly things (epigeios) are contrasted with heavenly things in John iii. 12, and also in Phil. ii. 10. The same is also true of I Cor. xv. 40, where the heavenly body is contrasted with the earthly body; or of II Cor. v. 1, where the earthly house is contrasted with the house not made with hands, age-abiding in the heavens. The contrast is most severe in James iii. 15, where contrasted with the wisdom that descends from above is the wisdom that is "earthly, sensual (or natural, that which pertains to the soul, and so to the first man Adam, see I Cor. xv. 45), demoniacal". It is evident that one cannot have the mind that was in Christ Jesus, and mind earthly things at the same time. While the usage of the word "earthly" would seem to favour the thought that the evil things of earth are prominent, it is not exclusively so. What may be called legitimate earthly things may prove a snare should they absorb the mind of believers. It is right to be diligent in business, it is right to provide for one's own, it is right to labour with one's hands, yet business, family cares, and the necessities of daily life must not be allowed to take first place however great the pressure upon us may be. We all are more likely to become like Martha, cumbered with much serving, than Mary, choosing that good part of sitting at the Master's feet and learning of Him. If the Philippians with their light and advancement needed the words of warning that have occupied our attention, how much more do we need them? Let us keep before us the practical as well as the doctrinal truth, that there is, to us, one God, and that our glory and our minds are not connected with earthly things, but where Christ sitteth at the right hand of God.

> "I keep under my body, and bring it into subjection; lest that by any means, when I have preached to others, I myself should be disapproved" (I Cor. ix. 27).

#20. The Citizenship and the Transformation (Phil. iii. 20, 21). pp. 91 - 95

After the solemn warning that occupies verses 18 and 19, and which are parenthetical, it is a joy to resume the theme of the apostle commenced by him in verse 17. He had spoken of himself as a pattern for the believer to imitate, and verses 20, 21 may be read on from verse 17 without a break, ". . . . as ye have us for an example; for our conversation is in heaven, etc." The word rendered "conversation" is politeuma, and is better translated by the word "citizenship". We have the word polite, a citizen (Acts xxi. 39); politeia, citizenship, rendered "freedom" (Acts xxii. 28); politeuo, to live according to one's citizenship, rendered "lived" (Acts xxiii. 1); "conversation" (Phil. i. 27). The inhabitants of Philippi would be in a position readily to understand the apostle's meaning when he used this word "citizenship". Philippi, according to Acts xvi. 12, was "the chief city of that part of Macedonia, and a colony".

Philippi had been made a Roman colony with free municipal government by Augustus. Its citizens though living in Philippi were citizens of Rome. They were exempt from taxes that other less fortunate cities paid. How forcible therefore the meaning of the apostle would be. Just as they lived and acted as citizens of Rome though far away from that city, so too they were to act as citizens of heaven, though for the time on earth.

In Phil. i. 27 the exhortation is, "Only let your conversation (politeuo) be worthy of the gospel of Christ", where the idea of citizenship is latent in the word used. In Phil. iii. the connection is more evident, for the walk of the believer is directly linked with his heavenly citizenship. This citizenship, its freedom, its privileges, and its foundation, is explained in Eph. ii. 11-22.

> "No therefore you are no longer strangers and foreigners, but joint-citizens of the saints, and of the household of God" (verse 19).

It is because these believers were "joint-citizens" that the apostle exhorted them to become "joint-imitators" of his walk, for he ever remembered that his citizenship was in heaven. We must not pass over the little word "is" in the sentence, "our citizenship is in heaven", for it is not simply a part of the verb "to be", but the rendering of another verb altogether, namely, huparchõ. This word gives us huparxis, "substance" or "goods" (Acts ii. 45 and Heb. x. 34, and huparchonta, goods or possessions, Matt. xix. 22; xxiv. 47, etc.) and the primary idea is not expressed by the verb "to be" simply, but by the added thought "to possess". It is something that subsists, that really is, that demands this word in preference to eimi, "to be". The word occurs twice in Philippians. The first occurrence is in ii. 6, "Being in the form of God". The R.V. margin has, Gr. being originally; Rotherham and J. N. Darby render it "subsisting"; Weymouth puts it, "from the beginning He had".

The heavenly citizenship then of Phil. iii. is a blessed possession subsisting in fact and reality in heaven. Just as the Philippians were real citizens of Rome, though Rome was separated by many miles, so these Philippians were citizens of heaven. The contest for the prize might involve the loss of some if not all of their possessions (ta huparchonta), even as it had involved the "gains" of Paul, and the "goods" of the "Hebrews", yet the one great possession remained, their citizenship in heaven.

From this position and possession in the heavens "we are waiting with longing expectation a Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ". The word apekdechomai, "to wait, or expect", occurs seven times in the N.T., and all in the writings of Paul. "The earnest expectation of creation waiteth for the revelation of the Son of God"; "and not only they, but ourselves also, wait for the adoption, the redemption of our body"; "If we hope for that we see not, then do we with patience wait for it" (Rom. viii. 19-25). The Corinthians were "waiting for the revelation of our Lord Jesus Christ" (I Cor. i. 7); the Galatians, through the spirit, waited for the hope of righteousness by faith (Gal. v. 5), and the Hebrews were told that "unto them that look for Him, shall He (Christ) appear the second time apart from sin unto salvation" (Heb. ix. 28).

We have continually called attention to the parallel that exists between Hebrews and Philippians, and this passage is a case in point. The salvation waited for, like the redemption of Rom. viii., and the hope of Gal. v., is "apart from sin". The "so great salvation" of Hebrews was something that might be lost, and has reference to the promises that some were in danger of losing through drawing back. The Saviour that the Philippians looked for had already dealt with their sin, and so completely had that been settled that the word sin is absent from the epistle. The prize is now in view, and they were earnestly awaiting the Saviour to bestow it upon them. So, immediately the Saviour is mentioned, His sought-for work is described, "Who shall change (not forgive or justify), our vile body".

In this passage we have the words metaschematizõ, translated "change", and summorphos, translated "fashioned like". In Phil. ii. 6-8 we read that the Lord Jesus originally subsisted in the "form" (morphe) of God, but that He emptied Himself (R.V.), taking the form (morphe) of a servant, becoming in the likeness of men; and being found in "fashion" (schema) as a man, He "humbled" (tapeinoõ) Himself. This passage will throw light upon the meaning of the words "change", "fashioned like", and "vile" of Phil. iii. 21. The exchange of the "form" of God for the "form" of the servant was accomplished by a change of outward appearance; the Lord became in "fashion" as a man.

The believer whose conformity to the death of Christ has qualified him for the prize, must in order that appropriate expression be given to this conformity, and the prize be fittingly bestowed, be given an outward appearance that shall agree with this wondrous exaltation; and so he waits for a Saviour who shall "change", "transform", or "transfigure" the body of his humiliation (tapeiõnsis) that it may be conformed to the body of His glory. The rendering of the A.V. "vile body" is misleading. The word indicates "low estate" (Luke i. 48), "humiliation" (Acts viii. 33), "made low" (Jas. i. 10).

The antithesis to this word is “exalted” (see Luke i. 52; Isa. lii. 13; and James i. 9). The humbling of Christ, as set out in Phil. ii. will explain the humiliation of the believer in Phil. iii. Of the Lord it is written, “He humbled Himself, and became obedient unto death, EVEN THE DEATH OF THE CROSS”. The believer’s humiliation is conformity to His death, and that death the death of the cross. Those whose god is their belly know nothing of this body of humiliation. Instead of being conformed to the death of the cross, they are the enemies of the cross; instead of their minds being set upon the citizenship in heaven, their minds are fixed on earthly things. Instead of their humiliation being the passport to the likeness of the glory of the exalted Christ, they glory in that which is their shame.

The out-resurrection and the prize of the high-calling we saw were connected with the fellowship of His sufferings, and conformity to His death. The power that alone could enable one to run this race is called “the power of His resurrection”. The transformation of the body to the likeness of the body of His glory is connected with previous humiliation, and the power that accomplishes it is the energy whereby He is able even to subdue all things unto Himself.

We have on more than one occasion endeavoured to make it clear that there is no uncertainty attaching to our hope. Readers must distinguish between the “hope” and the “prize” and not dim the glory of the one, by their felt unfitness for the other. Sufficient we feel has now been brought forward in these articles to give all true Bereans enough to test for themselves, and we earnestly pray that walk and witness of all may be so worthy that at the end we may be able to say, “I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith. Henceforth there is laid up for me a crown”. Let us each remember the example of the apostle, let us lay aside every hindering weight, let us beware of the flesh, let us forget the things behind, let us remember the mark, let us “so run that we may obtain”. We hope to conclude this series with a few words dealing with one or two difficulties.

#21. A few difficulties and an encouragement.

pp. 118 - 122

The subject which we have considered in the previous twenty articles has not been without its difficulties; we have been encouraged from time to time to realize that readers were stirred to question the exposition of the subject, and in this concluding article we propose dealing with just a few outstanding difficulties. We shall not be able to answer each correspondent individually, but as many of the difficulties are of a similar nature, we believe that the following answers will embrace the majority.

Many have a difficulty regarding this subject by reason for failure to distinguish clearly Prize from the Hope. In an early article of this series we endeavoured to draw the distinction between “the Hope”, and “the Prize”, and said, “There can be no greater contrast than that of Ephesians and Philippians in their point of view. Ephesians teaches boldness with confidence, because there the question has entirely to do with being accepted in the Beloved; Philippians speaks of fear and trembling, because it has reference to the service, the running, and the contest of the believer subsequent to his perfect acceptance in Christ". The "Hope" does not figure in the epistle to the Philippians; the very word is used only by the apostle there with reference to himself. Phil. i. 20, his hope of deliverance and faithful testimony; ii. 19, 23, his hope of sending Timothy to the Philippians. To have misgivings therefore about the "hope", when reading Phil. iii. about the "Prize" is an evidence of failure to discern the things that differ. The hope of the believer is that of being with the Lord in glory and of sharing in the resurrection. This is a part of redemption; unto this every member of the One Body is sealed and pledged by the Holy Spirit "until the redemption of the purchased possession, unto the praise of His glory". No conditions are attached to the hope, no fears are expressed regarding its attainment, and no efforts are called for to qualify for it.

A passage from Colossians may help us to see that this is so. "Giving thanks unto the Father, which hath MADE US SUFFICIENT to be partakers of the inheritance of the saints in the light" (Col. i. 12). Here is not the "fear and trembling" attaching to the Philippian prize, but the "boldness and confidence" of the Ephesian hope. What must be the state and condition of those who are to be the partakers there "in the light", what holiness, what righteousness, what spotlessness, what worthiness? God alone knows the standard He has set, but "one thing I know", Christ is my sufficiency, in Him I am "sufficient" for the heavenly places "in the light". By no act or endeavour can we make ourselves sufficient, but the grace that "made us alive together with Christ" will "make us sit together in the heavenlies in Christ Jesus".

The prize forms no integral part of the unity of the Spirit, but the "one hope" does (Eph. iv. 4). A crown that may be won, may be lost, and the glory of reigning with Christ is directly connected with "enduring", whereas living with Him is simply the outcome of "having died with Him", a participation which is the joyous reckoning of every believer (II Tim. ii. 11-13). When the hope of the one body is spoken of in Col. iii. we do not read, "when Christ the righteous judge shall appear", but "when Christ who is our life shall appear, then shall we appear with Him in glory", and here is exactly the same argument that we found in II Tim. ii. 11, "ye died, and your life is hid with Christ in God". The apostle who wrote these inspired words, who so fully taught the perfect acceptance of the believer in the Lord, did not entertain any doubt regarding the hope when he penned the, "if by any means" of the prize. To be exercised in mind as to any question of worthiness regarding the Hope, and to assume certainty with regard to the Prize and the Crown, are alike to be shunned.

Another series of difficulties arises in connection with the question of the scriptural meaning of death. Many of our readers have come to the conclusion that the Scripture teaches that the dead are dead, and not alive in another world, that the scriptural figure of sleep disposes of the traditional idea of spirit activity after death, that the Scriptures' united witness is that the only hope before Jew, Gentile, or Church of God is by the one way--resurrection. Tradition uses the expression "sudden death—sudden glory", tradition speaks of the departed loved one as being now in the conscious enjoyment of the presence of the Lord. What tradition has done is this, it has denied the scriptural doctrine which teaches that the dead are dead, that the dead sleep until the resurrection, and it has taken that which is held out as a peculiar and extraordinary privilege, a prize in fact to be attained with great difficulty and self denial, as the common experience of every saved own who has fallen asleep in Christ. An axiom of the world says, "The exception proves the rule." The aspirations and the doubts of the apostle in Phil. i. and iii. bring before us an exception; there was a way whereby the resurrection may be brought nearer, the believer might attain unto the out-resurrection out from among the dead, he might "depart and be with Christ", which is far better than living or dying.

Another question that is asked in different ways is, "Who can hope to attain to this height?" And "Did Paul himself reach it?" Knowing something of the awful failure of the flesh, the entanglements of the world, the ease with which we may do wrong, the general uncircumcision of our natures, we do not wonder that many say, "All that I can hope for is that which comes by pure grace, anything that lies beyond that I cannot reach unto". The humility of mind that speaks thus is precious in the sight of God, and may be the first step towards the seemingly unattainable. Even Paul, the pattern, depreciated himself; he wrote, "not as though I had already attained, either were already perfected", and it might not do either for him or for us to know how far we were along the road, lest by thinking we stand we bring about a fall. One thing we may be certain about, if we know our shortcomings and besetting environment, the Lord does too. He has not told us that we have to reach the standard He has set for another. The outward conformity of one whose natural temperament never leads him into danger or difficulty may be far greater than another who has inherited some trying passion, yet in the eyes of the Lord, who looks upon the heart and tries the reins, who can tell which one is nearer the "conformity to His death" or which one is experiencing "the body of humiliation"?

A principle upon which the Lord works with regard to the awarding of reward seems to be contained in the following words, "and unto one He gave five talents, to another two, and to another one; to every man according to his several ability." The three servants varied in ability and responsibility; he who had five, gained five, and he who had two, gained two, and both stood exactly upon a level in the eyes of the Lord, for indeed one hundred per cent gain was true of both; identical words of approval and reward awaited them. Had the servant whose ability was represented by one talent gained but one talent, he would have stood as high as the one who gained five. In the days when "gifts" were common among the churches, the difference in the gift was made sovereignly by the Spirit, "dividing to every man severally as He will", and no one was responsible for the use of a gift with which he had not been entrusted, but all were exhorted that "having then gifts differing according to the grace that is given to us, whether prophecy, let us prophecy according to the proportion of faith." Paul must use Paul's gift up to his measure, or fail of his reward, but neither the writer nor the reader will be asked to reach Paul's standard; he may have been entrusted with the full five talents, Apostle, Prophet, Evangelist, Teacher, and Disciple; you may be but entrusted with one—the Disciple, "he that is faithful in that which is least is faithful in that which is much". As to conformity to the death of Christ, fellowship with His sufferings, the greatest conformity, the deepest fellowship must leave their depths unfathomed. Let us not err by measuring ourselves with ourselves, let us not grieve the Lord by desponding; an honest endeavour by His grace, though it fail, will be more pleasing to Him than to hide our one talent in a napkin; prove once again that grace is still sufficient.

Did Paul himself attain the out-resurrection? Scripture does not say. He desired "to depart and be with Christ", and in II Tim. iv. he says, "the time of my departure is at hand"; he does not say that his death is near, but retains the same word that he used in Philippians. In II Timothy there are none of the misgivings of Philippians, the apostle stands now on the verge of the grave, life and service are now behind, what is the God-given review? "I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith, henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness". Paul does not say that the prize of the high calling was his, he does not say that for him sudden death would mean sudden glory; we can only feel that the apostle who so ardently desired as to say that he had but "one thing" before him, would hardly say at the close, "I have finished my course", if he did not feel the Divine assurance that his desire was to be granted. We cannot but believe that the silence of the Scripture is salutary; we believe that the Lord would not lay before His children the impossible. We realize the difficulties a little, we need to be kept constantly humble all through our course, and may well leave the end to Him.

We trust that none will feel disposed to surrender because of the trials of the wilderness, but will rather, like Caleb and Joshua, seek to wholly follow the Lord.

DEAR FELLOW-MEMBERS,

"It is required in stewards that a man be found faithful". We neither judge ourselves, nor allow other to do so, leaving this as all else to the Lord. Nevertheless we remind all our readers that this high ideal is ours. That we fail we are only too conscious, but that we depart from this standard we most strenuously withstand.

It is because we consider ourselves "stewards", with the obligation to "faithfulness", that our magazine continues along the lines of exposition, and not of inference.

While recognising that "the body without the spirit is dead", we nevertheless know no other medium, and no other authority, than the inspired letter of the Word.

The day seems not far distant when "we shall know even as we are known". Till then we look for grace to be "found faithful".

Yours in that blessed hope,

UNITED, YET DIVIDED-- 5

"United, yet Divided.—A Key to Holy Scripture."

p. 111

You can appreciably assist by introducing this pamphlet to others. Have you ordered a few copies for judicious distribution? It is earnestly hoped that all our readers will assist us in this effort to interest others in a Word rightly divided. Sow the seed, and in due season ye shall reap.

The following is extracted from a letter recently received from the United States:--

> "I cannot help writing and telling you how I have been helped, and uplifted by 'UNITED YET DIVIDED'. I am over 60 years of age, and have been a Bible reader since girlhood; it is only in recent years, however, that I began to see the Dispensations. 'UNITED YET DIVIDED' epitomizes the wondrous plan so beautifully; it is so easily understood, so clear, that I value the copy I have more than gold. I lent it to another dear sister (a truth-seeker), who was so delighted with it, and who also profited by the reading."

The following review appeared in the February number of The Evangelical Christian of Toronto, Canada:--

> "This booklet deals with the important subject of Dispensational Teaching and shows the vital necessity and spiritual importance of 'rightly dividing the Word of truth'. This fundamental principle is clearly and convincingly set forth and deserves the thorough and constant attention of all Bible students. The author's application of the principle is that the dispensational boundary is not Pentecost but Acts 28:17-28. While he believes that 'a' Church began at Pentecost, 'the' Church which is Christ's body did not begin until the Jewish rejection of the Gospel recorded in Acts 28 took place. On this account that chapter is the boundary line. The author has a good deal to say for his position and while it may not be possible for all Bible students to accept it, the arguments by which it is supported are more weighty than many have been accustomed to think. Thus Mr. Welch calls special attention to the miraculous element promised in Mark 16:15,16, and pertinently asks whether these signs have followed our faith and, if they have not, whether some change of dispensation has not come in. Without necessarily accepting every position laid down the booklet is of real value and deserves the thorough consideration of all who love the Truth."

(These notes, contributed by a reader, should be read in connection with articles of "Fundamentals of Dispensational Truth".

Readers of THE BEREAN EXPOSITOR and lovers of the Word know the scriptural significance of numbers, but possibly some may not have noticed how the different Dispensations are in accord with the other occurrences in the Word.

The definitions given below are culled from Appendix 10 of that much valued Word, The Companion Bible:--

1. Adam unfallen.—One denotes unity and commencement. First day, Light.
2. Fall to Flood.—Two denotes difference; if two different persons agree in testimony it is conclusive, otherwise it implies enmity, opposition, division, as was the work of the second day.
3. Flood to Call of Abram.—Three denotes completeness. The number includes resurrection, for on the third day the earth rose up out of the deep.
4. Call of Abram to Exodus.—Four denotes creative works and always has reference to the earth and things under the sun.
5. Exodus to Destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar.—Five denotes Divine grace. It is God adding His blessing and gifts to the works of His hands, and it is the leading factor in the Tabernacle measurements.
6. Destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar to Ministry of our Lord.—Six is the human number. Six (and multiples thereof) is the hall-mark of all connected with man. The great men who have stood out in defiance of God (Goliath, Nebuchadnezzar, and Antichrist), are all emphatically marked by this number.
7. Our Lord's Ministry and that of those that heard him until Acts xxviii..—Seven denotes spiritual perfection. It is the number or hall-mark of the Holy Spirit's work. He is the Author of God's Word, and seven runs through it as the water-mark in paper.
8. The Mystery.—Eight denotes resurrection, regeneration, a new beginning. The eighth is a new first. It has to do with the Lord who rose on the eighth or new first day. Together with its multiples it is impressed on all that has to do with the Lord's names, people, and works.
9. The Day of the Lord to the Millenniums.—Nine denotes finality of judgment: it or its factors is seen in all cases where judgment is the subject.
10. The Millennium.—Ten denotes ordinal perfection.
11. The Final Rebellion.—Eleven denotes disorder, disorganization, being one short of the number twelve.
12. The New Heaven and New Earth.—Twelve denotes governmental perfection. It is the number or factor of all numbers connected with government, or things appertaining thereto in the heavens or on the earth.

The Purpose of the Ages. Course C. Paper #1.
pp. 27, 28

While every believer of the Bible is apt to have his favourite text, and to read some portions more frequently than others, yet, to understand the Scriptures, we must ever remember that God has a purpose, and that the Bible is the written revelation of that purpose. While we may get more spiritual help from reading the Psalms than a long list of names from Chronicles, yet no part can be spared or discounted the moment we begin to consider the purpose therein unfolded.

THE PURPOSE.—The fact of a purpose is evident from the number of passages which refer to it. The title of this paper comes from Eph. iii. 11, see R.V. margin, "The purpose of the ages".

THE FULFILMENT of God's purpose is entirely in His hands, and although He may use His creatures, the ultimate accomplishment does not rest in the creature, but in God Himself.

The FOCUS of God's purpose is His Son, the Lord Jesus Christ, whether in creation, kingdom, or church.

The AGENTS by whom this purpose is carried on are Israel, the Gentiles, and the Church. (See paper No. 7).

The GOAL of the purpose of the ages is found in a new heavens and a new earth wherein dwelleth righteousness, and where God shall be all in all.

Questions on Course C. Paper No. 1.

1. Collect the passages in the N.T. which show that God has a purpose. Give also a separate list of things which are said to be "according" to this purpose.
   Do you see anything striking, that demands a purpose for its explanation, by comparing the first and last chapters of Genesis?

2. Give references from both O.T. and N.T. to show that the fulfillment of God's purpose is sure. Make a list of expressions used in these passages, together with the words "purpose", and "counsel" that enforce this; e.g., Eph. i. 11 - the added words "Who worketh, etc."

3. The centre of God's purpose, it is said, is Christ. Give references to prove this. Consider these references, and show that Christ fills many spheres in different capacities in this great purpose.

4. It has been said the O.T. gives us preparation, the N.T. fulfillment. Each period in this preparation and fulfillment is marked by some transitional event, e.g., Gen. i. 2 - i. 31, The creative preparation for man.

Transitional event. The Sabbath rest.

Continue this endeavour to trace the unfolding of the purpose through both O.T. and N.T., noting particularly the events that link up each section.

5. Compare Genesis with Revelation. Set out parallels, e.g., Gen. iii. 17 with Rev. xxii. 3; show how this comparison helps us in understanding the purpose of God.

The Purpose of the Ages. Course C. Paper #2.
pp. 61 - 64

We have considered the fact that the Bible is the record of a purpose. We now consider the further fact that the purpose is being worked out through the ages. Here we are met by a powerful tradition that has been responsible for the veiling of much truth.

We read over and over again in the A.V. the words, "for ever", "everlasting", and "eternal', and we naturally believe that the subjects connected with these words have reference to eternity. This is not so; the Bible practically says nothing about eternity. Genesis commences with creation, Revelation ends with the new creation, the interval being spanned by the ages. To illustrate the inconsistency of the traditional rendering will also enable us to see the true meaning of the words translated "for ever", etc.

It is evident that the ages had a beginning (I Cor. ii. 7), for the word translated "world" here is aiõn, which in other places is translated "for ever". The ages also have an end (Matt. xxiv. 3). Some ages are past (Eph. iii. 9), some are to come (Luke i. 33; Eph. ii. 7). If aiõn means eternity, how can it also mean "world", and also what consistency is there in a rendering which uses the same word in such opposite senses as "the end of the world", and "world without end"? Further, if aiõn in the singular means eternity, what can aiõn in the plural mean? Can there be eternities?

The adjective aiõnios has likewise been subjected to similar treatment. In Titus i. 2 we read that ETERNAL life was promised before the WORLD began. Observe the words in capitals, they are as opposite as can be, yet they are both the same word aiõnios in the original. There is, further, no word "began" at all, the words are pro chronõn aiõniõn, "before times of ages".

Eph. iii. 11 (translated in A.V. "the eternal purpose") is rendered properly in the R.V. margin "Gk. Purpose of the ages." If the Greek says "ages", then "eternal" is merely man's idea given instead of God's truth.

Turning to the O.T. we find the same bias at work. The Hebrew word olam (translated "ever", "world", etc.), comes from a word meaning "secret" (see Psa. xc. 8, and Eccles. xii. 14). It usually implies a period of undefined limits. Man had a beginning, consequently olam, when referring to man's past, cannot be rendered "from eternity" (see Gen. vi. 4), yet when the same word speaks of man's future, it is rendered "for ever", etc. If it is heresy to say that man is always existed, and never had a beginning, why should it be heresy to say that he will not necessarily live for eternity, and never have an end (lest any should fear that the security of the believer is imperiled, we hasten to say that our hope is in no way connected with the words olam or aiõn).

Supposing the A.V. had rendered the passage, "The ungodly who prosper FOR EVER" (Psa. lxxiii. 12), the mis-translation would be apparent. Do we believe that the priesthood of Aaron and the service of the Tabernacle and its offerings are to continue "for ever"? Yet the A.V. says so (see Ex. xxix. 9, etc.).

Added to olam we often find the words va-ed, "and yet". This combination is rendered "for ever and ever". It should read, "unto the age and still further". Me-olam, often rendered "from everlasting", should be rendered "from, or since, the age". Some lines of teaching extend up to the limits of the secret, or undefined period—the olam, the aiõn. Some teaching goes beyond olam va-ed, "the age and beyond", the eons of the eons, and some teaching goes back before the ages, as Titus i. 2, "before times of ages".

We shall never understand the purpose of the AGES if we will persist in giving to a period of time the title of eternity. A concordance, showing Hebrew and Greek words, like Young's Analytical Concordance, is necessary for this paper.

Questions on Course C. Paper No. 2.

1. The word aiõn occurs seven times in Ephesians, translated in A.V. "world", "course", "ages", "eternal". Find these seven passages, write out each verse, using the word "age" or "ages" throughout.

What do you learn regarding the ages and the purpose from these passages?

2. The Hebrew words me-olam occur in the following passages: Psa. xxv. 6, Gen. vi. 4, Josh. Xxiv. 2, Psa. xli. 13, Psa. cxix. 52, Isa. lxiv. 4, lxiii. 16. Some passages speak of God, some of man.

Write out the verses, putting them in two columns (God and man), and say what you observe regarding the translation.

3. Compare Ex. xxi. 5, 6 with Lev. xxv. 40; I Sam. i. 22 with i. 11.

How does the comparison help to explain the words "for ever"?

Many other things are said to be "for ever" in the A.V. which have ceased, or will cease. They should have been said to be "unto the age". Collect these "for evers" of the O.T. and show the true meaning, e.g., Exod. xl. 15, etc., etc.

4. "For ever and ever".—Every passage in the O.T. (A.V.) except Isa. xxxiv. 10, so translated, is a combination of olam va-ed, "the age and beyond". Every passage in the N.T. (A.V.) rendered "for ever and ever" should read "unto the ages of the ages" with three exceptions, viz., Heb. i. 8, which is in the singular, "unto the age of the age"; Eph. iii. 21 is singular and plural, "unto the age of the ages"; and Rev. xiv. 11 which omits the article the, "unto ages of ages".

Collect the references. Arrange them to show with what they deal, e.g., Israel, God, torment, etc.

5. Discover all you can concerning "this age", "the age", and "the ages to come".

6. What are said to be aiõniõn ("eternal", "everlasting", A.V.)?
Make a list, e.g., Redemption (Heb. ix. 12).
How do you understand the words in Matt. xxv. 46?

7. Collect references to "eternal life". What is the difference in the way it is obtained in Matthew, John, Paul's epistles? Are all the same?

The Purpose of the Ages. Course C. Paper #3.
pp. 92 - 94

We have seen that God has a purpose, and that the purpose is begun and completed during the course of the ages, hence "the purpose of the ages".

We now pass under review some of the instruments or agents used.

CREATION is one of the parts of the great plan. With creation Scripture opens. The creation mentioned in Gen. i. 1 must not be confounded with the work of the six days. During the six days some things already created were made to fit the present period, others were created during that time. The present creation is not the goal; it is the platform upon which the great purpose of the ages is worked out. God has a new creation in view, which brings the purpose of the ages to completion.

Gen. i. 1 is severed from the rest of Genesis. How far that goes back none know. In verse 2 we read, "the earth was without form and void". The word "was" should be rendered became (see Gen. ii. 7, ix. 15, etc.). "Without form and void" is in Hebrew Tohu va Bohu. Isa. xlv. 18 declares that the earth was not created tohu; Gen. i. 2 tells us it became so. The six days' work and seventh day's rest have a foreshadowing of the great purpose begun then, and stretching out over the ages until "the rest that remaineth" is attained.

This creative work is sometimes referred to under the title, "THE HEAVENS AND THE EARTH". Gen. i. 1 tells us of the first, Gen. ii. 1 of the second, and II Pet. iii. 13 of the third, the new heavens and earth.

THE WORLD must be distinguished from heaven and earth. The Greek word kosmos meaning order, arrangement, and ornament.

TIMES AND SEASONS.—The whole purpose of God is ordered and sure, and the two indications of time teach this. Times convey the idea of the length of time, whereas seasons indicates the fitness of the time, as harvest-time means the season for harvesting, whereas the time that a thing takes to do indicates merely the amount of time without regard to any fitness or seasonableness. "Times" in N.T. Greek = chronos; "seasons" = kairos. They are not distinguished in the A.V.

Questions on Course C. Paper No. 3.

1. How many times does the word "created" occur in the record of the six days' work (Gen. i. 1 - ii. 3)? What does the number signify? What was created, and what was made?

What is the difference in the ending of the creation of verse 1, as compared with the ending of ii. 1-3?

2. Find the structure of the six days' work. This work of restoration seems to foreshadow the greater work during the ages. Trace any parallels. Note II Cor. iv. 6; also II Pet. iii. 8, and Rev. xx. 4.

3. Read Job xv. 15. Is there any warrant for this in Gen. i.? What other passages teach that the heavens come into the scheme of redemption?

4. "Without form and void." Find parallels. Darkness. What does it stand for? What must have happened between Gen. i. 1 and i. 2?

5. Discover all you can of the new heavens and new earth in the Scriptures. Discover as much as you can concerning the world.

6. How are "times" (chronos) mentioned in the Bible? Give details. How are "seasons" (kairos) mentioned? (Use Concordance for Greek).

7. Collect all you can concerning "The Lord's Day"—or the "Day of the Lord", and "The Day of God", "That Day". Analyze your findings from the standpoint of a student of the Purpose of the Ages.

The Purpose of the Ages. Course C. Paper #4.
pp. 127, 128

We have seen that God has a purpose, that the purpose is being worked out through the ages, that the six days' creation is its platform and foreshadowing, that the ages have various "times", and "seasons", and "days", that it includes the heavens as well as the earth, and that a new creation, new heavens and new earth complete the cycle of the ages.

DISPENSATIONS.—The ages are divided into a series of dispensations in which God's attitude and revealed will is made known in different ways, carrying with it different obligations and bringing into action different phases of His purpose. These should be carefully examined (a fuller examination of some of them will be given in subsequent papers); we first seek a bird's-eye view before attempting details.

The first dispensation is clearly that during which God treated with Adam unfallen.

The second commences with the fall of Adam and ends at the flood.

The third commences with the renewed world after the flood, and ends with the confusion at Babel.

The fourth reaches from the call of Abraham to the Exodus from Egypt.

The fifth (which should be sub-divided in order to see the dispensations fully) commences with deliverance from Egypt and ends with the birth of Christ.

The sixth commences with the birth, and ends with the death of Christ.

The seventh commences with the day of Pentecost (Acts ii.), and ends with Israel's rejection (Acts xxviii.).

The eighth is covered by the "Acts" ministry of the apostle Paul ending in Prison.

The ninth is encompassed by Paul's "prison" ministry—"The dispensation of the mystery".

The tenth commences with the recognition of Israel again, ends in apostacy, and is characterized by wrath.

The eleventh occupies 1000 years (the Millennial Kingdom) and ends in rebellion.

The twelvth completes the series, and commences with the new creation, and ends with "God, all in all".

The Purpose of the Ages. Course C. Paper #4.

(*Concluded) pp. 143

1. What is the difference between a "dispensation", and an "age"? Can two dispensation be in operation at the same time? May there be more than one dispensation in one age? Opinions are valueless; prove all by the Scriptures.

2. What were the outstanding characteristics of the first dispensation. Show Adam's relation to all men and to creation. Also how he typified Christ.

3. Collect references to Adam in the Scriptures. Did God plan redemption because Adam fell? Give the most prominent differences between the first dispensation and the others. What may we know since the fall that would not have been possible in the first dispensation?

4. Why was the flood necessary? Who were the "Sons of God"? What was there wrong at Babel? Of what is Babel typical? Why was Abraham called? What was the attitude of God to the nations after the call of Abraham? Why was it necessary for Israel to be in bondage in Egypt?

5. What are the great outstanding features and events of the fifth dispensation? What was the revealed object of the first coming of Christ? What was the burden of His message? Did He teach the same aspect of truth throughout His ministry?

6. What were the characteristic features of the seventh dispensation? What one book of Scripture covers the period?

Paul's ministry, during the Acts, differs in many ways from his ministry after Acts xxviii. Examine his two sets of Epistles (i.e. those not from prison, and those from prison, which are Ephesians, Philippians, Colossians, and II Timothy).

7. Give references from O.T. and N.T. to show that Israel will be gathered again. What one N.T. book deals with the 10^{th}, 11^{th}, and 12^{th} dispensations? What does Scripture teach concerning the 1,000 years' reign of Christ? What takes place after the Millennium?

The Dispensations.
pp. 143, 144

(These notes, contributed by a reader, should be read in connection with articles of "Fundamentals of Dispensational Truth".

Readers of THE BEREAN EXPOSITOR and lovers of the Word know the scriptural significance of numbers, but possibly some may not have noticed how the different Dispensations are in accord with the other occurrences in the Word.

The definitions given below are culled from Appendix 10 of that much valued Word, The Companion Bible:--

1. Adam unfallen.—One denotes unity and commencement. First day, Light.
2. Fall to Flood.—Two denotes difference; if two different persons agree in testimony it is conclusive, otherwise it implies enmity, opposition, division, as was the work of the second day.
3. Flood to Call of Abram.—Three denotes completeness. The number includes resurrection, for on the third day the earth rose up out of the deep.
4. Call of Abram to Exodus.—Four denotes creative works and always has reference to the earth and things under the sun.
5. Exodus to Destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar.—Five denotes Divine grace. It is God adding His blessing and gifts to the works of His hands, and it is the leading factor in the Tabernacle measurements.
6. Destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar to Ministry of our Lord.—Six is the human number. Six (and multiples thereof) is the hall-mark of all connected with man. The great men who have stood out in defiance of God (Goliath, Nebuchadnezzar, and Antichrist), are all emphatically marked by this number.
7. Our Lord's Ministry and that of those that heard him until Acts xxviii..—Seven denotes spiritual perfection. It is the number or hall-mark of the Holy Spirit's work. He is the Author of God's Word, and seven runs through it as the water-mark in paper.
8. The Mystery.—Eight denotes resurrection, regeneration, a new beginning. The eighth is a new first. It has to do with the Lord who rose on the eighth or new first day. Together with its multiples it is impressed on all that has to do with the Lord's names, people, and works.
9. The Day of the Lord to the Millenniums.—Nine denotes finality of judgment: it or its factors is seen in all cases where judgment is the subject.
10. The Millennium.—Ten denotes ordinal perfection.
11. The Final Rebellion.—Eleven denotes disorder, disorganization, being one short of the number twelve.
12. The New Heaven and New Earth.—Twelve denotes governmental perfection. It is the number or factor of all numbers connected with government, or things appertaining thereto in the heavens or on the earth.

DEVOTIONAL ARTICLES.

Do all to the glory of God. Give none offence. (I Cor. x. 31, 32).

pp. 14 - 16

If Christian doctrine and practice were simple issues, the problem of the believer's walk would not be a difficult one; as it is, the most bewildering complexity is the character of our pathway. We ourselves have, since we believed, dual natures; we possess the old man (crucified indeed), and the new man. We are continually being acted upon by the flesh and the spirit which are contrary the one to the other; added to this we have around us that marvellous and magnetic world, which in all its grades and varieties finds a ready response from the old nature. Nor is this all, the confused state of professing Christendom, its multiplied factions and sects, its snares and errors, but add to the problem of the believer whose desire is to live to the glory of God.

The passage of Scripture with which we have headed our article gives a command, which nothing less than the grace of God can enable us to obey. To some natures it is not difficult, when once the mind is made up, to pursue a given course regardless of difficulties, and equally regardless of the effect upon others. Such find in the words, "Do all to the glory for God", a scriptural reason for an unbending, uncompromising, clear-cut course. If weaker brethren are stumbled, it is their affair, the glory of God must come first and cannot be bartered for the feelings of others. There are others who are just the opposite, the idea of giving offence often dissuades them from persisting in a given line of conduct, and while they may often feel that there are many things that are unscriptural, a native timidity, or a desire to avoid unpleasantness, compromises their testimony; these would cling to the words, "give none offence". In both cases, there is room for the flesh to make some kind of fair show. The combined precept, however, which is the true pathway, is beyond the power of the flesh; bigotry and roughshod methods are not to the glory of God. Mr. Pliable, on the other hand, is not the pattern for our imitation.

The reader should ponder the example of the apostle as set forth in I Cor. ix. 19-23. He should observe the obedience to this two-fold precept in the apostle's attitude towards circumcision in Acts xv. and xvi. 3. A man of smaller spiritual power would have considered the idea of circumcising Timothy as pandering to human weakness; he would probably have thought of the charge of inconsistency. The apostle, however, pursues the higher law. There are some who have concluded that the unscriptural character of the churches of Christendom compels them to avoid any appearance of fellowship, while there are others whose disposition is to make no distinction, and who adopt the other extreme. The Scripture gives us a middle path; sometimes we give up our privileges and become as weak, as Jews even, or as those under law, or without law. Many doubtless condemned the apostle for being "made all things to all men". Sometimes we may appear to be sacrificing a real principle as superficial critics may have fancied Paul did in Acts xvi. 3. It will by no means prove an easy task to "Do all to the glory of God", and at the same time "Give none offence, neither to the Jews, nor to the Gentiles, nor to the Church of God".

The apostle gives a further statement in explanation in verse 33, and shows the secret of safety in an otherwise dangerous pathway, "even as I please all men in all things, not seeking mine own profit, but the profit of many, that they may be saved", this being followed by the remarkable words, "Be ye followers of me, even as I also am of Christ" (xi. 1). We give place to none in our insistence upon holding fast, and standing fast, yet feel the need of our text lest we be led in mistaken zeal to rob God of His glory by offending some by our manner or methods.

The Perils of Peace.
"Beware of False Prophets."
pp. 28 - 31

How we have longed for peace! How many things have been deferred "until peace comes"! The contrast is so great, the relief so deep, the thankfulness so full, that we shall not look with much favour upon anyone who lifts a warning voice. And yet peace has its perils no less than war. One thing remains unchanged though all things else have altered, and that is the heart of man. While most would admit that war is a product of the flesh, many may doubt either the wisdom or the truth of saying that peace too may be but another of its works. Let us remember that the present state of peace is only truly named as it is seen in contrast to the past state of war—it does not indicate, truthfully, the character of the age; whether the nations of the earth be at war or are at peace, the age is one, and the age is evil. In times of peace, as in times of war, the carnal mind is enmity against God; the proclamation of peace will not mean that this world has altered its attitude toward Christ or the Word. So it comes about that we seek to write a word of warning, lest the perils of the present time should overtake any of our readers and find them unprepared.

First among the "perils of peace" we place false prophets. We use the term in a lower sense than the scriptural one, and do not mean that miraculous powers will be manifested just yet. Newspaper articles, religious leaders, thinkers and speakers, press, pulpit, platform and pamphlet, have voiced a common theme, a growing ideal, an evolution of man upward toward some lofty goal. Scripture draws a decided line between the visionary and the true prophet:--

> "The prophet that hath a dream let him tell a dream: and he that hath My word let him speak My word faithfully, what is the chaff to the wheat? saith the Lord."
> "Behold I am against the prophets, saith the Lord, that steal My words every one from his neighbour. Behold I am against the prophets, saith the Lord that smooth their tongues, and say, He saith."

The Scriptures are indeed quoted on every hand, but in such a way as to really "steal" the word from us; "smooth things" are palatable, yet no smooth things can come from God to a world still answerable to Him for the death of His Son. So it was in the days of Ezekiel, the false prophets are likened to those who build a wall and who daub it with untempered mortar. These prophets had said, "Peace", when there was no peace, and had seduced the people. Their untempered daubing was doomed to fall:--

> "The wall is no more, neither they that daubed it; to wit, the prophets of Israel which prophecy concerning Jerusalem, and which see visions of peace for her, and there is no peace, saith the Lord God" (Ezek. xiii.).

The secret lies in the words, "there is no peace, saith my God, to the wicked". So long as this evil age endures, so long as natural man administers and rules, so long as Christ is absent from the throne, so long must true peace be known only to the few who believe in Him.

What are some of the characteristics of the false prophets' message, that imperils the times in which we live? The prophet Jeremiah in chapter xxiii. gives us a guiding word:--

> "Thus saith the Lord of Hosts, hearken not unto the words of the prophets that prophecy unto you: THEY MAKE YOU VAIN."

This is one of the characteristics of the false prophets of a Christless peace. Man is everywhere magnified, his need of a Saviour and Redeemer, or his own innate corruption and failure, is scouted. Jeremiah continues, giving another characteristic,

> "They speak a vision of THEIR OWN HEART and not of the mouth of the Lord."

Here is the fatal error of the message; the heart of man is desperately wicked, and out of the heart of the wisest and the best of unsaved men can come nothing but the wisdom of the world that comes to nought. A third characteristic is marked by Jeremiah:--

> "They say still unto them that despise Me, the Lord hath said, YE SHALL HAVE PEACE: and they say unto every one that walketh after the imagination of his own heart, NO EVIL SHALL COME UPON YOU."

This is marked as a characteristic of the last days by Zechariah in chapter v. What real peace can there be to those who despise the Lord? And is this not the attitude of all those who believe not on Christ? As regards the second clause, which promises no evil to those who walk after the imagination of their hearts, a consideration of Jeremiah's own words concerning this will show the utter falsity of these promises.

Jer. iii. 17 speaks of the time of Israel's real peace, and places it in utter contrast with the imagination of their hearts; vii. 24 speaks of the disobedience of Israel in the wilderness under this term, and says, "they went backward and not forward", their so-called progress was apostacy; ix. 14-16 threatens those who followed the imagination of their hearts with wormwood and gall, with scattering and sword, and yet the false prophets said, "no evil come upon you". In like manner xi. 8, xvi. 12, xviii. 12, and xiii. 9, 10 link the imagination with pride, and threaten that the pride shall be marred—yet they prophesied smooth things that could only deceive. In Jer. xxiii. 32 these false prophets are charged with causing the people to err by their lies and by their lightness or instability (see Gen. xlix. 4), lies because the words proceed from an evil heart, and contrary to the Word; and unstable, because double minded, endeavouring to serve two masters, not having the single eye.

There are many "perils of peace". The one we warn against here is the peril of the false prophet. Before we endorse the teaching of the times, let us test it by the sure word of prophecy. Does it point onward to Christ? Is HE magnified, alone exalted, or is man placing himself upon a yet higher pedestal? Is a millennium coming without Christ? Is it possible for man to "Ring out the thousand years of war, Ring in the thousand years of peace"?

Concerning all these dreams and prophecies of a Christless programme, politics or philosophy, may be quoted the language of Ezek. xxi. 27:--

> "I will overturn, overturn, overturn it, and it shall be no more, until HE COME whose right it is: and I will give it to Him."

Brethren, in time of peace as in time of war, "Beware of false prophets". "To the law and to the testimony: if they speak not according to this Word, it is because there is no light in them."

p. 31

What is Prayer?—A cry. "Hear my cry, O God." The unfeigned (Psa. xvii. 1) cry of distress (Psa. lxxxviii. 1).

Where may I pray?—"From the end of the earth will I cry." The Jew particularly connected the temple at Jerusalem with worship and prayer, yet even he could cry from the end of the earth. Isa. xlix. 6, and xlv. 22 is the all-sufficient reason.

When may I pray?—"When my heart is overwhelmed."
When heart and flesh fail (Psa. lxxiii. 26).
When the soul faints; when there is none to help;
When we draw near to the gates of death;
When we are at wit's end (Psa. cvii. 5, 12, 18, 27).
He is able to save to the uttermost.

What shall I pray for?--

"Lead me to the Rock that is higher than I."

/ For I am lost without Thee.
/ All else but Christ is quicksand.
{ I am a sinner; He did no sin.
\ I am a son of Adam; He is the Son of God.
\ I am mortal; He rose again.

What is my ground for prayer?—"Thou hast." God has been a shelter and a strong tower.

What will be the result?—I shall "abide". I will "make my refuge under the covert of His wings".

Let us pray.

Singleness.
pp. 109 - 111

The Scripture declares the "a double minded man is unstable in all his ways" (James i. 8). This is plainly true in the ordinary walks of life, and the Scriptures utter a warning that we do well to heed.

The "doublemindedness" of this verse is answered by the "wavering" of verse 6. "But let him ask in faith, nothing wavering, for he that wavereth is like a wave of the sea, driven with the wind and tossed"; and the "liberality" of verse 5, "God that giveth to all men liberally, and upbraideth not". The state of unstableness is easily recognized in the figure of the tossing sea, but the contrast of "liberally" with doublemindedness may not be so evident.

The word rendered liberally is haplõs, which means "simply, i.e., in simplicity with a readiness of heart, answering to the need without a second thought; simply, without a thought behind, freely" (Dr. Bullinger's Lexicon and Concordance). "He that giveth, let him do it with simplicity" (Rom. xii. 8). In both cases the idea conveyed is that there is no double motive, there is nothing behind the gift. It will be seen therefore that the doubleminded man is in contrast with the Lord.

In chapter iv. 8 James says, "Cleanse your hands ye sinners; and purify your hearts, ye doubleminded". From this it appears that not only is the double minded man unstable in all his ways, but also needs his heart to be purified, indicating thereby the seat of the trouble. Not once, nor twice, but constantly, we shall need to breathe the prayer, "O Lord, give me singleness of heart". How easily we confuse "soul and spirit" (Heb. iv. 12), how easily the old nature can be mistaken for the new, if our eye is not single.

Twice the apostle enjoins upon the believing slave the need for single hearted service:--

> "Slaves' be obedient to them that are your masters according to the flesh, with fear and trembling, in singleness of your hearts as unto Christ. Not with eye service, as men pleasers; but as servants of Christ, doing the will of God from the heart; With good will doing service, as to the Lord, and not to men; knowing that whatsoever good thing any man doeth, the same shall he receive of the Lord, whether he be bond or free" (Eph. vi. 5-8).
> "Slaves, obey in all things your masters according to the flesh, not with eye service, as men pleasers; but in singleness of heart, fearing God. And whatsoever ye do, do it heartily, as to the Lord, and not unto men; knowing that of the Lord ye shall receive the reward of the inheritance: for ye serve the Lord Christ" (Col. iii. 22-24).

Singleness of heart may be understood from the expressions that accompany it.

Not with eye service.—We have found this in ourselves and in others too much to make explanation necessary. Eye-service differs from heart service, as the "form" of godliness differs from the "power".

Not unto men.—We serve men. We have masters according to the flesh. We are enjoined to render them willing service. And yet our service is "not unto men". How so? The answer is given in the blessed words, "Ye serve the Lord Christ". Whatever our position may be, whatever our service may involve, we, as those who have been bought with a price, serve the Lord. What we do, we do "as to the Lord". If we belong to Him, if we with truth have said, "Lord, what wilt Thou have me to do?" cannot we trust Him to place us in that sphere where we can best serve Him? Why not serve Him where we are, instead of always thinking of how well we could serve Him somewhere else? Have we not often taken up our daily duties with heavy heart, begrudging the time that must be thus occupied? Yet, to slaves, to men and women whose condition was far removed from our own, the apostle could write, "Whatsoever ye do, do it heartily", "With good will doing service, as to the Lord, and not to men".

How can we reach this condition when service of this character can be rendered "heartily", when we can do our service "with good will"? It is all answered in the phrase, "with singleness of heart". When our motives are single, when our plans are not laid with one eye on the Lord's will, and another upon our own advancement, when our prayers are for His glory, and not for the satisfaction of the flesh (Jas. iv. 3), then we shall begin to enter into true service.

> "The light of the body is the eye: if therefore thine eye be single, thy whole body shall be full of light" (Matt. vi. 22).

Singleness of heart is accompanied by singleness of eye. This is further explained in the words:--

> "No man can serve two masters: for either he will hate the one and love the other; or else he will hold to the one, and despise the other. Ye cannot serve God and Mammon" (vi. 24).

The last words of this verse put the matter concisely. Self, the world, possessions, ambitions, anything other than the Lord Himself, make us doubleminded, unstable, impure, and darkened.

The days in which we live, the urgent call for faithful witness, have brought this thought of singleness prominently before us. Let us hold fast the faithful word. Let us, in all our service, and in all our ways acknowledge Him. May our eyes be single, and our motives pure.

Dispensational Difficulties.

A series of short articles designed to help to a clearer understanding of a rightly divided Word.

p. 94

As a result of coming into contact with some of the readers of The Berean Expositor, we begin to feel that it may be useful to go over some of the points of dispensational truth, the repetition of which we have hitherto felt to be unnecessary. Some do not appear to be quite clear, for example, as to:--

1. The Church which is the Bride and the Church which is the Body.
2. The use of the word "body" in I Cor. xii.
3. The dispensational position of I Thess. iv.
4. The hope of the Church of the Mystery.
5. The unique character of the dispensation of the Mystery.
6. The reason why Paul speaks of a new creation before Acts xxviii.
7. The dispensational place of the Gentiles during the Acts.
8. The place of Pentecost in the purpose.
9. Baptism and the Church of the One Body.
10. The "Gospel" for to-day.
11. The references to "gifts" in the Prison Epistles.

Those of our readers who do not find their particular difficulty dealt with, are invited to notify the Editor, but no reply by post can be promised. It is not intended in this series to deal with the subjects exhaustively, but to indicate their main bearings upon dispensational issues.

Studies in Ecclesiastes.

#1. The Question of Authorship. Who is "The Preacher"?

pp. 56 – 61

> "All Scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness, that the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works" (II Tim. iii. 16, 17).

Two important considerations arise out of the application of the above quotation of Scripture to the book of Ecclesiastes.

1. Seeing that Ecclesiastes was included in the Hebrew Scriptures long before the time of our Lord's earthly testimony, it received His approval when He referred in Luke xxiv. to the complete O.T. by using the accepted title, "The Law of Moses, the Prophets, and the Psalms". The book of Ecclesiastes therefore is canonical Scripture, and if "Scripture", it is inspired. 2. To omit this book from our study is to deprive ourselves of one aspect of truth which will prevent us from being "perfect" and "thoroughly furnished". This book, being inspired Scripture, will be "profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness".

The adverse critics of the book may be concluded under two headings, those whose theological opinions do not agree with some of its teaching, and those who on the grounds of "higher criticism" and literary examination pronounce the book either a pious forgery or something inconsistent with its place in the canon of inspired truth. The former can hardly have carefully pondered the nature of their criticism, for if books, or even verses, of Scripture may be rejected according as they agree or disagree with the individual's creed, there is hardly a book of either Old or New Testament that sooner or later will not fall outside the universally accepted Canon. The latter class of critics bring with them a variety of methods and motives. Those which are connected with the criticism of a literary and historical nature we may be able to consider, for the original language is open for all to search, and the careful comparison of scripture with scripture requires neither genius nor inspiration.

While the criticism of the former class says in effect, "Solomon's wisdom led him no higher than 'under the sun', poor soul; we however know better!" the criticism of the latter school usually commences with a most emphatic repudiation of the possibility that Solomon could be the author of the book. One great authority declares that if this book were written by Solomon, or in Solomon's time, then there is no such things as the history of the Hebrew language! The discoveries of man in any field of research are not final by any means, and even in the science of language it seems scarcely proper for such assumption of finality to be made. We propose therefore to ask the reader to consider the following collection of parallel passages (collected by other than ourselves), and then to answer the question, "Does the evidence of language lead us to accept or reject the Solomonic authorship of Ecclesiastes?"

In the first place we may be asked, "What does the book itself say with regard to authorship?" Solomon's name is nowhere mentioned, but the following statements are made, and these, we submit, apply to no other man than Solomon.

(a). He was the son of David, king in Jerusalem (i. 1). This is a title that is true of Solomon, but not exclusively so, for it is true of all the kings who reigned in Jerusalem up to the captivity.

(b). He was king over Israel in Jerusalem (i. 12). The only other king whose name is put forward as being the author Ecclesiastes is that of Hezekiah. Hezekiah, though a son of David and reigning in Jerusalem, is spoken of in Scripture as king of Judah. There are only two kings of whom it can be said that they were kings over ISRAEL in JERUSALEM, they are David and Solomon.

(c). The writer of Ecclesiastes was not only a king, but he claims to have gotten "more wisdom than all they that have been before me in Jerusalem". The wisdom of Solomon is proverbial. The Lord said:--

> "Lo, I have given thee a wise and understanding heart, so that there was none like thee before thee, neither after thee shall any arise like unto thee." "And God gave Solomon wisdom and understanding exceeding much, and largeness of heart…..Solomon's wisdom excelled the wisdom of all the children of the east country, and all the wisdom of Egypt. For he was wiser than all men" (I Kings iii. 5-12; iv. 29-34).

The writer of Ecclesiastes claims to have gotten more wisdom than ALL they that were before him in Jerusalem. There is no statement to the effect that the writer was wiser than any king before him—it is the simple statement, "all". Solomon was in Jerusalem, and inspired Scripture tells us that he stands alone regarding wisdom. Neither before nor since has anyone had such wisdom. We have therefore no need to pursue this section further.

> Solomon was the son of David.
> Solomon was king in Jerusalem.
> Solomon alone was, with the exception of David, king of Israel in Jerusalem.
> Solomon was wiser than any before him or after him in Jerusalem.
> The writer of Ecclesiastes was son of David, king in Jerusalem, king of Israel in Jerusalem, and wiser than all who were before him in Jerusalem.

We are therefore obliged to (1) accept the statement that Solomon was the author of Ecclesiastes, (2) reject either I Kings iii. 5-12, iv. 29-34, or (3) believe that some unnamed writer assumed the name of Solomon for his own purposes. To think of any other king as author necessitates two men, each wiser than the other, which is absurd. Those who tell us that the book must have been written much later than Solomon's day adopt 3. There is no alternative for the believer in inspired scripture with regard to 1 and 2.

Let us now look at the statements of the book a little further. Everywhere we have statements that read like autobiography, "I was king", "I gave", "I builded", "I found", etc. Those who deny the Solomonic authorship on literary grounds admit that Solomon is personated by the unknown author. Grotius bases his argument for the late date of Ecclesiastes on the appearance of (supposed) Aramaic words. These are "pot", sir (vii. 6), "interpretation", besher (viii. 1), "pit", gummats (x. 8), "desire", abiyonah (xii. 5).

Regarding the word sir, "pot", it was used by Moses even in Ex. xvi. 3, and is the very word used in I Kings vii. 45 for pots in the temple built by Solomon himself! Grotius therefore in this case is singularly unreliable.

Readers may remember that Daniel was "proved" to a be pious fraud because foreign names were given to musical instruments. The critics, however, were found untrustworthy, for the instruments, being imported, would naturally have native names, and the intercommunication of Daniel's day has been proved, and the critics routed. The wide dominion of Solomon, the coming to him of such as the Queen of Sheba, accounts for the introduction of stranger words than Aramaic.

Let us now notice some parallels that we find between Ecclesiastes and other of Solomon's writings:--

Ecclesiastes.	Proverbs.
"The fool foldeth his hands together, and eateth his own flesh" (iv. 5).	"A little folding of the hands to sleep: so shall thy poverty come," etc. (vi. 10).
"A good name is better than precious ointment" (vii. 1).	"A good name is rather to be chosen than great riches" (xxii. 1).
"I have seen servants upon horses, and princes walking as servants upon earth" (x. 7).	"…..for a servant to have rule over princes" (xix. 10).
"The lips of a fool will swallow up himself" (x. 12).	"A fool's mouth is his destruction, and his lips are the snare of his soul" (xviii. 7).

Compare also:
Eccles. viii. 5, ix. 10, x. 8, 10, 18 with Prov. xix. 16, iii. 27, xxiii. 32, xxvii. 17, xiv. 1.
Eccles. v. 1, 2 with I Kings viii. 27, 30, 43.
Eccles. viii. 15 with I Kings iv. 20.
Passages that are somewhat more lengthy are:
Eccles. vii. 26 with Prov. v. 3-14.
Eccles. ix. 7-9 with Prov. v. 15-19.

We now draw attention to some characteristic words and phrases:--

"STREET" (shug).—This word used in this way is peculiar to the books of Solomon, being found nowhere else than in Prov. vii. 8, Song of Sol. iii. 2, and Eccles. xii. 4, 5.

"DELIGHT" (taanug).—Translated "delight" in Prov. xix. 10, Song of Sol. vii. 6, and, Eccles. ii. 8. Elsewhere, twice in Micah.

"PRE-EMINENCE" (mothar), Eccles. iii. 19, "PROFIT", Prov. xiv. 23, "PLENTEOUSNESS", Prov. xxi. 5.

"FOOL" (cesil).—The Hebrew word occurs 70 times; 49 times in Proverbs, 28 times in Ecclesiastes, the remaining 3 passages being in the Psalms. Grotius would set aside Solomon with three Aramaic words—here, Solomon is established by a greater and more searching criticism.

There are several expressions concerning wisdom and wealth which are peculiar to the writings or time of Solomon, e.g.:--

"The giving of wisdom" (Prov. ii. 6; Eccles. ii. 26; I Kings v. 12).
"To know wisdom" (Prov. i. 2; Eccles. i. 17, vii. 25, viii. 16).
"To seek wisdom" (Prov. ii. 4, xiv. 6; Eccles. vii. 25).
"The heart of a wise man" (Prov. xvi. 23; Eccles. viii. 5; x. 2; cf. I Kings iii. 12).
"The words of the wise" (Prov. i. 6; Eccles. ix. 17, xii. 11).
"Wealth" (nekasin) (Eccles. v. 19, vi. 2; II Chron. i. 11, 12; Josh. xxii. 8).

The three Aramaic words look small against this list of words peculiar to Solomon.

Beside the above there is also the witness of style to be considered. Notice, for example, the way in which the word grace is used. The use of cheu absolutely, is a feature of Proverbs. See i. 9, iii. 22, 34, iv. 9, v. 19, xi. 16, xiii. 15, xvii. 8, xxii. 1, xxviii. 23. In Eccles. ix. 11, x. 12 it is used in the same way.

Love occurs 18 times in Prov., Song of Sol. and Eccles., and is used absolutely in every place, except Prov. v. 19; Eccles. ix. 6. These three books occupy 42 pages. The word occurs elsewhere 22 times in 568 pages, and is used absolutely at the most on three occasions. If there is any argument in style, this is unanswerable.

My son is always an appellative in Prov., and Eccles. "The heart of the sons of men" (Eccles. viii. 11, ix. 3; Prov. xv. 11; I Kings viii. 39; II Chron. vi. 30).

"The heart knoweth".—This expression is peculiar to Solomon (I Kings ii. 44; Prov. xiv. 10; Eccles. vii. 22, viii. 5).

"Assembler" (koheleth), which is the word translated "Preacher", is the language of David's time. David and Solomon were the only kings who assembled the congregation (I Kings viii. 1, 2). This signal honour is enshrined in the name adopted in Ecclesiastes. So with "nails" and "bowls": both have to do with the Temple.

"Peculiar treasure" is used of God six times. Twice only is it used of man (I Chron. xxix. 3; Eccles. ii. 8). The peculiarities of Ecclesiastes are all in favour of its Solomonic authorship.

The reader who is not yet satisfied with either the quantity of the quality of the evidence here brought together is recommended to consult "A Treatise on the Authorship of Ecclesiastes" by D. Johnston, the book which has supplied this article with most of the data assembled. We are convinced that Solomon is the author, and shall take up this position in the ensuing articles of the series. We also believe that Ecclesiastes is inspired Scripture and shall treat it accordingly. Who would think of treating the Psalms in the way that Ecclesiastes is treated even by the orthodox? and yet many, if not most, of the Psalms are in their primary setting the experiences and the findings of men who had not even the "wisdom of Solomon".

Asaph's experience recorded in Psalm lxxiii., so parallel in many ways with the outlook of Ecclesiastes, is accepted as inspired truth by the very ones who in their superiority speak of Ecclesiastes as "under the sun"! Surely Ecclesiastes has himself summed up the majority of adverse criticism in his inimitable words, "Vanity of vanities, all is vanity".

#2. Koheleth. Its occurrences and testimony.
pp. 89 - 92

The book of Ecclesiastes bears upon it the same marks that we find upon the other books of inspired Scripture, namely, the presence of a wonderfully designed structure. This structure extends to the position and occurrence of the principal words used, and we shall give out attention in this paper to the passages where the words THE PREACHER occur.

The title Ecclesiastes is nearer to the meaning of the Hebrew Koheleth than "The Preacher", for both words refer to an assembly. Koheleth might be rendered "The Convener". This appellative is used seven times in the book, as follows:--

Koheleth.

A | i. 1. The words of Koheleth.
B | a | i. 2. All is vanity.
b | i. 12, 13. King searching by wisdom.
C | vii. 27. What Koheleth found.
B | a | xii. 8. All is vanity.
b | xii. 9. Koheleth wise, taught the people.
A | xii. 10. The words of Koheleth, words of truth.

The structure of the occurrence of this word contains a challenge. It opens and closes with "the words" of Koheleth. What shall we say of these "words"? Are they the words of a jaded spirit, a satiated appetite? Are they to be deprecated in this age of Christian enlightenment? Are they given as a warning, to show us what is not truth? Let the final member of the series answer.

"Koheleth sought to find out acceptable words." Did he succeed? or was his search as vain as was also his estimate of this world? "And that which was written was upright, even WORDS OF TRUTH." Here are given three characteristics of the words that are written in this book.

First notice the careful distinction that is drawn between the endeavour to find suitable words and the result. Koheleth "sought to find out" acceptable words. His search was satisfactory, for that which was written was in words of truth. Now let us notice the three characteristics.

1. ACCEPTABLE.—This word has been used in Ecclesiastes before the last chapter, and in three of the passages it is rendered "purpose" (iii. 1, 17; viii. 6). The acceptable words of Koheleth were words that were exactly suited to express his meaning.

2. UPRIGHT.—This is the term used in vii. 29 to describe the state of man prior to his fall. Such is the character of the written words of Ecclesiastes.

3. TRUTH.—This is the word used to describe the law (Psa. cxix. 142) and commandments (151). We have such expressions as "words (sayings) of truth" (Prov. xxii. 21). "The Scripture of truth" (Dan. x. 21). "The law of truth" (Mal. ii. 6).

These three descriptions taken together should cause the believer to hesitate long before setting aside the "words" of Ecclesiastes as those of a worldly wise misanthrope.

Returning to our structure, we will next note the complete parallel that exists between the preface and the conclusion, i. 2 and xii. 8. Before we are given any of the processes whereby the conclusion is reached, the conclusion is stated, "Vanity of vanities, saith Koheleth, vanity of vanities; all is vanity".

It must not be imagined that Koheleth intimates that his mind was prejudiced before he commenced his research. The writer's preface, like that of most writers since, had to be written when the whole work was accomplished. He states at the beginning, as it were, his thesis, "All is superlatively vain", and then conducts the reader through the intricate mazes of investigation to the final statement of chapter xii. 8. "Vanity of vanities, saith the Koheleth, All is vanity". Whatever our private opinions of this book may be, we cannot charge the writer with either inconsistency or of wandering. His proposition and his proof are in sight throughout the book, as we shall see more clearly when we trace this special feature through. Another feature that is constant is that which is brought out in the structure, namely, the process of investigation. Chapter i. 12, 13 reads:--

> "I, Koheleth, was king over Israel in Jerusalem. And I gave my heart to seek and search out by wisdom concerning all things that are done under heaven."

So in the conclusion (xii. 9) we read:--

> "And moreover, because Koheleth was wise, he still taught the people knowledge; Yea, he gave good heed, and sought out and set in order many proverbs."

We have in the first paper of this series sought to show the connection both of theme and wording that exists between Ecclesiastes and Proverbs. Here, Koheleth tells us that many of his proverbs were sought out and set in order after the experience recorded in Ecclesiastes, and presumably connected with it. If Ecclesiastes is untrue, we should expect to find that "Proverbs" being inspired Scripture, the errors are there corrected. This is not the case however. Where Proverbs speaks of the same things as Ecclesiastes, it uses similar words and leads in the same direction. It will be observed that Koheleth refers in this chapter to "the words of the wise", saying that they are as "goads". "The words of the wise" come in the introduction of the book of Proverbs, and are immediately followed by that section of Proverbs that were written FOR Solomon. If we turn to The Companion Bible we shall find the structure of this section FOR Solomon set out on page 865, Part III. The section covers chapters i. - x. and there is a fivefold alternation of A | Wisdom's call, and B | The Foreign Woman.

This seems a strange theme, yet who knowing the sad end of Solomon's career can but see the reason for the repeated warning? What has this to do with Koheleth and his book? Look at the structure already given. What is the central member of the seven references (C | vii. 27)? "What Koheleth found." What did he find? He found by bitter experience what he might have known by simply believing the words of the wise inspired for his guidance:--

> "I find more bitter than death the woman, whose heart is snares and nets, and her hands as bands: whose pleaseth God shall escape from her; but the sinner shall be taken by her."

This is in entire harmony both with the introductory proverbs for Solomon's guidance, and also with the proverbs written by Solomon:--

> "Whoso findeth a wife findeth a good thing, and obtaineth favour of the Lord" (xviii. 22).
> "A prudent wife is from the Lord" (xix. 14).

With what theme does the book of Proverbs close? It closes with an acrostic in which for every letter of the Hebrew alphabet is written a verse in praise of the "virtuous woman" in whom the heart of her husband doth safely trust. Should this theme appear to be strange, let the reader turn to the other book of Solomon. The Song of Solomon shows us the faithful Shulamite and her shepherd lover in vivid contrast with Solomon and his threescore queens and fourscore concubines and virgins without number (Song of Sol. vi. 8). This number we find increased in I Kings xi. 3, "And he had seven hundred wives, princesses, and three hundred concubines", 1,000 in all. This gives added point to his words in Eccles. vii. 28, "One man among a thousand have I found; but a woman among all these have I not found".

The "conclusion of the whole matter" refers all happiness under the sun to fearing God and keeping His commandments. Solomon found written across his own life, and that of others, "vanity" by reason of failure in this particular. Lives differ, but experiences lead to the same conclusion. Whoever transgresses the commandment of God must of necessity wreck his career. In the case of Solomon the warning concerning "outlandish women" was ignored, and bitter was his experience. In another case warning concerning wealth, business, the world, etc. is ignored, and the same expression summarizes the result.

These things will be seen the better when we are definitely analyzing the subject matter of the book. The unity that is discovered by reading the seven occurrences of Koheleth together is of importance in directing us both to its consistency and theme.

#3. The Theme Traced.

Without resurrection, all is vanity.

pp. 122 - 127

What is the theme of the book of Ecclesiastes? Is it the quest for the summum bonum, "that good" (ii. 3)? Is it the quest for the origin and purpose of evil? We feel it best to defer any answer until we have set before the reader one or two of the most prominent features of the book. Then possibly the Scriptures will have provided their own explanation. We know what Koheleth's summary is, for it is written both in the preface and the conclusion:--

> "Vanity of vanities, All is vanity" (i.2, xii. 8).

The word "all" must be limited to its context as in other places, for of all the words that have made havoc of theology this seems one of the chief. "All means all" may be a most untruthful conclusion. All means as many as the context intends and no more. Whatever the writer has in view, his conclusion concerning it is, "All is vanity". Before reading on in Ecclesiastes, let us see what has been written elsewhere concerning vanity.

Psa. xxxix. 4-6.—This Psalm of David, we trust, is clear from any of the insults heaped upon the portion of Holy Scripture we are studying—this is not "under the sun" in the sense often intended:-- > "Lord , make me to know mine end, and the measure of my days, what it is; that I may know how short lived I am. Behold, Thou, Lord, hast made my days as an handbreadth and mine age is as nothing before thee. Verily every man at his best estate is altogether (or, only all) vanity. Surely every man walketh in a vain shew: Surely they are disquieted in vain: he heapeth up riches and knoweth not who shall gather them."

Here, it will be observed, the vanity of man is seen in the one great fact that stands at the end of his career—DEATH. Death writes vanity over the whole creation of man. His labours are spent in accumulating that which some unknown person shall use.

Psa. xlix. 6-20:--

> "They that trust in their wealth, and boast themselves in the multitude of their riches: None of them can by any means redeem his brother, nor give to God a ransom for him, that he should still live for ever and not see corruption. For he seeth that wise men die, likewise the fool and the brutish person perish, and leave their wealth to others…..like sheep they are laid in the grave."

The Psalmist gives as a parenthesis the inward thought of these people. "Their inward thought is that their houses shall continue for ever, and their dwelling places to all generations": To effect this they:--

> "call their lands after their names. Nevertheless, man being in honour abideth not, he is like the beast that perish. For when he dieth he shall carry nothing away: his glory shall not descend after him…..They shall never see light."

Here again the dread of death and of being forgotten urges men to do all kinds of things to perpetuate their memory. All the riches a man may accumulate, however, avail but for this transient life, "for when he dieth he shall carry nothing away". Surely this also is vanity?

Romans viii. 20, 21 says:--

> "The creature was made subject to vanity, not willingly, but by reason of him who hath subjected the same, in hope that the creature itself also shall be set free from the bondage of corruption into the liberty of the glory of the children of God."

Yet again we find vanity linked with the bondage of corruption with no release apart from resurrection.

Let us now turn to Ecclesiastes. What makes the writer there emphasize the vanity of all things? Precisely the same reason is found that we have read in Psalm and Epistle. Death writes Ichabod across the labours of man. The very first observation of the book is this, "One generation passeth away, and another generation cometh", and the section ends with the thought "There is no remembrance".

In chapter ii. 14-17 this observation is developed. He perfectly realized that wisdom excelled folly as light does darkness, yet he is faced with this calling fact. Death comes to the wise as well as the fool:--

> "One event happeneth to them all. As it happeneth to the fool, so happeneth it to me, even to me; and why was I then more wise? Then I said in my heart, that this also is vanity. For there is no remembrance (same word as 'memorial', i. 11) of the wise more than the fool for the age (olam); seeing that in the days to come all will have been already forgotten. And how dieth the wise man? AS THE FOOL! Therefore I hated life."

The writer not only hated life, but he hated all his labour by reason of the fact that death would deal with it.

> "Yea, I hated all my labour which I had taken under the sun; seeing that I must leave it to the man that shall be after me. And who knoweth whether he shall be a wise man or a fool. Yet shall he have rule over all my labour wherein I have laboured, and wherein I have shewed wisdom under the sun. This also is vanity."

The theme is not dropped, for within a few verses we read, "For there is a man whose labour is with wisdom, and with knowledge and with skillfulness". Yet he must leave it, perhaps to a fool! Surely life and its labours are vanity!

Chapter iii. develops a new phase of teaching. It is concerned with the set times and seasons for all the purposes under heaven. Although a new phase is commenced, the vanity of the creature by reason of mortality is not forgotten. What is the first couplet of the twenty-eight statements?

> "There is a time to be born, and a time to die."!

After pursuing the question of time, the writer comes back to the subject of death:--

> "I said in mine heart concerning the estate of the sons of men, that God might manifest them, and that they might see that they themselves are beasts. For that which befalleth the sons of men befalleth beasts; even ONE THING befalleth them; as one dieth, so dieth the other; yea, they all have ONE BREATH; so that a man hath no pre-eminence above a beast: for all is vanity. All go unto ONE PLACE; all are of the dust and all turn to dust again….." (iii. 18-20).

In iv. 8 there is still a reference to the same sad theme. He looks at one "alone" having neither child nor brother. Yet he does not say, "For whom do I labour"? The suggestion is, of course, that death will prevent him from enjoying the result of his labour himself. So whether a man has an heir (ii. 18), or whether he has not—"all is vanity, yea, a sore travail". Speaking further of the accumulation of riches Koheleth observes:--

> "As he came forth of his mother's womb, naked shall he return to go as he came, and shall take nothing of his labour, which he may carry away in his hand. And this also is a sore evil, that in all points as he came, so shall he go: and what profit hath he that laboured for the wind" (v. 15, 16).

"Do not all go to one place"? he asks (vi. 6), and speaks of this life as > "Vain life, which he spendeth as a shadow. For who can tell a man what shall be after him under the sun" (12)

> "It is better to go to the house of mourning, than go to the house of feasting: for that is the end of all men: and the living will lay it to his heart" (vii. 2).
> "The laughter of a fool is like the crackling of thorns under a pot" (vii. 6).

Nothing but senseless and unbridled licence can explain why those who are aware that "the end of those things is death" do not appear moved by the prospect and saddened at the outlook.

In chapter viii. 4 we read, "Where the word of a King is, there is power", but verse 8 reveals the need of a greater than Solomon. "There is no man that hath power over the spirit to retain the spirit; neither hath he power in the day of death: and there is no discharge in that war."

Not only does the sense of vanity come to the writer as he sees all men, fools and wise, subject to death. He contemplates the burial of the wicked and the fact that they are forgotten with an equal sense of vanity (viii. 10). Still the subject haunts Ecclesiastes.

> "All things come alike to all: there is ONE EVENT to the righteous, and to the wicked; to the good, and to the clean, and to the unclean; to him that sacrificeth, and to him that sacrificeth not: as to the good, so to the sinner: and he that sweareth, as he that > feareth an oath. This is an evil among all things that are done under the sun, that there is ONE EVENT unto all…..madness is in their heart while they live, and after that they go to the dead" (ix. 2, 3).

Surely had Ecclesiastes lived in this 20th century he would have heard the echo of his words in the colloquial, "What's the good of ANYTHING—nothing!". A Proverb is the wisdom of many in the wit of one, and—slang though it may be—it is the sub-conscious finding of man at large.

> "Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might, for there is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom, in the grave whither thou goest" (ix. 10, see also ix. 5).

Here the writer reveals the identity of the one place whither all go, Sheol, the Hebrew equivalent to Hades. The uncertain tenure of life also appeals to him:--

> "For man also knoweth not his time: as fishes that are taken in an evil net, and as birds that are caught in the snare: so are the sons of men ensnared in an evil time, when it falleth suddenly upon them" (ix. 12).

Whatever the condition in which a man may live, he is wise never to so live as though the rude intrusion were not bound to come.

> "Truly the light is sweet, and a pleasant thing it is for the eyes to behold the sun: But, if a man live many years, let him rejoice in them all, yet let him remember the days of darkness for they shall be many. ALL THAT COMETH IS VANITY" (xi. 7, 8).

The survey concludes with the exhortation to the youth to remember his Creator while the evil days come not. For:--

> "Then shall the dust return to the earth as it was; and the spirit shall return unto God Who gave it. Vanity of vanities, saith Koheleth, all is vanity" (xii. 1-8).

Thus ends the search and the survey. Dust returns to dust. Spirit returns to God the giver. What an end! What can we say after viewing the travail, the labour, the inequalities, the just suffering as the wicked, the wicked prospering as though just, the time and the chance, the one event to wise and to fools, but Vanity, all is vanity! Is this a sceptic's finding, or a believer's verdict? We dare to say that it is the finding of every Scripture-taught believer. One thing, and one thing only, can alter the verdict—RESURRECTION.

> "If Christ be not RISEN, then is our preaching vain, and your faith is also vain…..if Christ be not raised, your faith is vain; ye are yet in your sins…..if in this life only we have hope in Christ, we are of all men most miserable" (I Cor. xv.).

That the teaching of the apostle is similar to that of Ecclesiastes when resurrection is removed from the argument is manifested by the fact that he echoes Eccles. ii. 24, viii. 15, where Koheleth, looking at the just man who suffers like a wicked man, commends mirth saying:--

> "Eat, and drink, and be merry."

So the apostle says:--

> "If after the manner of men I have fought with beasts at Ephesus, what advantageth it me if the dead rise not? LET US EAT AND DRINK FOR TOMORROW WE DIE."

Few would be found who would pick out this verse from its context, and then try to show that the apostle was untrustworthy or that he was a cynic, or a sceptic, or any other of the names heaped upon Koheleth; yet what Ecclesiastes has spread over a book Paul has condensed into a verse. Koheleth wishes to impress the fact of vanity, Paul of triumph. Yet where they touch upon the same thing they speak with the same words.

All is vanity, even Paul teaches that, apart from the risen Christ. We shall find that Koheleth, too, teaches the same thing in his own way. Does this resurrection chapter continue the refrain, "What advantageth it me? What profit is there in labour?" No. Let us hear the last word on the matter:--

> "O death, where is thy sting? O grave (the sheol of Ecclesiastes), where is thy victory? …..thanks be to God, which giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ."
>
> Therefore my beloved brethren, be ye steadfast, unmoveable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, forasmuch as ye know that YOUR LABOUR IN NOT IN VAIN in the Lord" (I Cor. xv. 55-58).

#4. Koheleth's Key to the Riddle.—The LIFE TO COME. (Eccles. vii. 11).

pp. 165 - 168

In our last paper we sought to show that Koheleth was justified in his pessimism by the fact that ONE EVENT happens to all men, whether they be wise or foolish, good or bad, pious or profane, and that all go to ONE PLACE, in short, that death and the grave have the last word in the affairs of man "under the sun". Ecclesiastes is a black background solemnly true. Ecclesiastes' conclusion that all labour was vanity, is enforced by the converse statement that the believer's labour is not in vain "in the Lord".

If the one word death represents "the sore evil" with which the writer saw the whole of man's activities blasted, we should expect to find by the law of correspondence and the testimony of I Cor. xv. that life, that is resurrection life, would be "the good" which could alone solve the riddle and justify the experiences of this life.

After having entered the arena and made his challenge (i. 1-3), the writer conducts us along the line of his first investigation (i. 4 - ii. 17), and tells us that as a result he "hated life", and he "hated his labour" (ii. 18-26). His second method is to consider the bearing of time, season and the age upon the affairs of men (iii. 1-21). His conclusion is more sober than the former, as he perceives that there is nothing better than to enjoy the present, "for who shall bring him back to see what shall be after him?" (iii. 22).

In chapter iv. He considers all the oppressions, and concludes it better to be either already dead, or not yet born—anything but being ALIVE! He passes in review the envy and the vexation of life, the childless man labouring endlessly—for whom? Then after speaking about the fickle fate of kings, he enters the sanctuary of God. Asaph in Psa. lxxiii. passes along the same road as Koheleth. They record their findings in different terms, but their findings throughout are the same. In the house of God (v. 1-8) he learns to view "oppression" without such bitterness as he did in iv. 1. There he saw "no comforter": here he says:--

> "Marvel not at the matter: for He that is higher than the highest regardeth; and there be higher than they."

This is a definite acquisition. God knows, and regards, and is higher than the highest. He now returns to his theme, considering riches from a threefold standpoint (v. 9-17) and coming to a conclusion concerning that which is "good and comely"—because "God hath given him power to eat of his possessions". This is contrasted with an "evil" wherein "God giveth not power to eat thereof" (vi. 1, 2).

Life, viewed particularly in its utmost length, is considered and the conclusion is that a life of a thousand years twice told is in vain, where no good is seen. Then comes the contrasting reference to GOD, viz., MAN:--

> "That which hath been is named already, and it is known that it is man: neither may he contend with Him that is mightier than he."

This is in exact balance with the words, "He that is higher than the highest", and forms part of the structure, as we may see later. In the sanctuary of God Koheleth learned that God is higher than the highest. He also realized that it is vain for man to attempt to judge God; the word "contend" being the Hebrew "din". God is mightier than man. It is the same word used by Nebuchadnezzar when he too learned the same lesson that "the Most High ruleth in the kingdom of men", for he said "how mighty are His wonders" (Dan. iv. 3). Job's arguments were all stopped by the revelation of Him Who is mightier than man.

We leave this somewhat enigmatical verse (Eccles. vi. 11) for the time, and journey on. Verse 12 asks the question of the book, "Who knoweth WHAT IS GOOD for man in this life?" This life is then defined as "All the days of his vain life which he spendeth as a shadow". The reason why the quest is difficult is further explained, "for who can tell a man what shall be after him, under the sun?" In other words, "If a man die, shall he live again?" Let us notice the balance of thought here.

Question.	a	For who knoweth
	b	What is good
	c	For man in this life?

This life defined. Vain life, spent like a shadow.

Question. | a | For who can tell
b | What shall be after him
c | Under the sun?

"What is good" is echoed by "what shall be after him". Even though the writer had said, "there is nothing better than that a man should eat and drink, and that he should make his souls enjoy good in his labour" (ii. 24, iii. 13, v. 18), yet that does not represent "THAT GOOD' in its fullness, that Koheleth set out to find.

A certain definiteness meets us with the opening of the next chapter. The Companion Bible indicates a division in the book at vi. 10 denoting the section vi. 10 – xii. 12 as "The Chief Good, what it is". It will be observed that we put vi. 10-12 back into the section covered by the enquiry as to what is good and commence the section which gives the answer with chapter vii. This is a small detail, however. The chief good is approached by seven good things, and then Koheleth's question is answered.

1. A good name is better than ointment.
2. The day of death is better than the day of birth.
3. The housed of mourning is better than the house of feasting.
4. Sorrow is better than laughter.
5. The rebuke of the wise is better than the song of fools.
6. The end of a thing is better than the beginning.
7. The patient in spirit is better than the proud in spirit (vii. 1-8).

We will not stay over these now, they will come in the course of the general exposition. In verse 11 the revelation is made:--

"Wisdom is good with an inheritance."

Now this sounds rather like making the best of both worlds. By all means many would say, Let me have the wisdom with an inheritance. This however is not what Koheleth taught. The R.V. gives "Wisdom is as good as an inheritance", which, of course is quite another thing. The particle "with" is rendered in ii. 16 "as" and "more than". In Psa. lxxiii. 5, "like" other men. The translation we offer is strictly in line with the Hebrew and yields good sense:--

"Wisdom is good, like an inheritance, and profitable to them that see the sun. In the shadow of wisdom, in the shadow of silver, but the profit of knowledge (is) that wisdom giveth LIFE to them that have it."

A | Wisdom like an inheritance.
B | Profitable.
C | Wisdom likened to silver.
B | Profitable.
A | Wisdom gives life.

Koheleth has said some hard things about life. We remember his early conclusion, "therefore I hated life" (ii. 17). He calls it "vain life" and likens it to "a shadow" (vi. 12). Again he speaks of "the days of the life of thy vanity" (ix. 9).

He has given us his considered judgment even in this chapter, that the day of death is better than the day of birth, and approaches the depths of Job's sounding when he cursed the day when he was born! How comes it then that life being so, he finds the good that he is reaching for to be wisdom, and the reason, that wisdom gives LIFE! Common sense, apart from inspiration, demands that the writer must mean something different from the life he has considered so vain, otherwise the book may as well be closed for it is impossible to follow its arguments.

We saw in our previous article that the fact that death was at the end of man's career rendered all his labour profitless, and summed up all in vanity. Resurrection life is the only thing that can make the crooked straight. That is the life intended here. The Companion Bible in its note on Lev. xviii. 5 draws attention to the Chaldee paraphrase which reads, "shall live by them to life eternal" (Sol. Jarchi, "live in the world to come"). This being so, the problem of ii. 13-16 is solved. While he may still hate this life, Koheleth can now see that wisdom is not only excellent in itself, but excellent in its results—it leads to LIFE that is life indeed.

Here light breaks. Granted that there is a life beyond the grave, then though wickedness may sit in the place of judgment (iii. 16), and though many inequalities and perplexing mysteries of providence may still baffle us (vii. 15; viii. 14, 17), though the race is not to the swift, nor the battle to the strong, but all have to reckon with time and chance, yet the conclusion of the matter sets all right. It will be our wisdom to fear God and keep His commandments, for a day of judgment is coming, and if a day of judgment, then a day when the crooked shall be made straight, the inequalities made equal, a day of LIFE from the dead, where vanity and vexation of spirit shall never more intrude, for death and hades shall be destroyed in the second death, and God shall solve all life's mysteries in the LIFE TO COME.

#5. Is that life worth living, which is without Christ?
pp. 184 - 189

"Vanity of vanities, saith the preacher, Vanity of vanities; all is vanity."

The Hebrew superlative is expressed in the words "Holy of holies", "Servant of servants", etc., and this opening statement of the preacher indicates the most utter emptiness and vanity. Vanity is the word that meets us at every turn throughout this book, and we must at least give the passages a consideration before passing on, otherwise we shall miss much help in the subsequent interpretation.

First of all let us notice the repeated detailed confirmation of the opening utterance by observing in what connections the preacher remarks, "this also is vanity"; for these mark progressive examinations with their conclusions.

> "I said in mine heart, Go to now, I will prove thee with mirth, therefore enjoy pleasure" (ii. 1).

Prove.—This word in the same grammatical form is mostly rendered "tempt", and specially in the connection of tempting God. In slightly different forms it is rendered "prove" in such cases as Deut. viii. 2, 16. The underlying idea is that of trial by means of some ordeal.

Enjoy.—This word literally means "to see" and in this form occurs seven times in Ecclesiastes. "See, this is new" (i. 10). "Consider the work of God" (vii. 13). "Live joyfully" (vii. 14, 27, 29; ix. 9).

Pleasure.—This is translated in the third verse "good" and recurs constantly throughout the book. It is the word which comes in vii. 11, where the highest meaning must attach to it.

Instead therefore of accusing Koheleth of taking a mad plunge into pleasure, we must credit him with a sober and sane investigation of mirth in order to notice its effect upon himself, and particularly upon his heart. The good, of course, catches a reflection from the word "mirth", but the real thought seems to be that Koheleth in his search for what was "that good" tested himself with mirth, looking carefully concerning that good which is the reason for all these trials and experiments.

We translate "concerning good", and, we feel, rightly so. The Hebrew beth is usually rendered "in", sometimes "to", "against", "with", and sometimes, as Lev. vi. 2 illustrates, it bears the thought of "concerning". Here therefore was a properly planned, and carefully conducted test. What was the result? "This also is vanity."

> "I said of laughter, IT IS MAD, and of mirth, WHAT DOETH IT?"

This question "what doeth it?" is echoed in verse 3—"what they should do"—and shows that we have here a very real and careful investigation. Koheleth is after something. Shame on those misinterpreters who load their commentaries with their attempt to show superior knowledge. Even the A.V. is not clear over this, as witness their translation of ii. 1, which shows a bias against Koheleth.

He is still consistently pursuing his theme when he confesses that whatsoever God doeth it is for the olam (age) (iii. 14). So also when he pities the poor mortal, whose vain life he spends, or does as a shadow (vi. 12). The word appears again immediately in the next text. "I greatened my works" (lit.) (ii. 4), and all these "doings" are pronounced at the close "vanity" (ii. 11). We must not pursue this interesting theme now, it will form a separate study in this series.

The next case in which the writer pronounces the judgment "this also is vanity" is that of wisdom and folly:--

> "And I turned myself (same word 'looked' in verse 11) in order to look, to behold (not the usual word, it means 'consider') wisdom and madness and folly, for what can the man do that cometh after the king?" (This is to say, he had as many advantages, if not more than, as any successor was likely to have), "even that which hath been already done" (ii. 12).

This is a continual refrain:--

"Is there anything whereof it may be said, See, this is new? it hath been already of old time, which was before us. There is no remembrance" (i. 10, 11).

"For there is no remembrance of the wise than the fool for the age: seeing that which is already, in the days to come shall be forgotten" (ii. 16). So again iii. 15.

There is something baffling which Koheleth experiences, and which he clearly records, as we shall see. Here he refers to it. Concerning his consideration of wisdom and folly, he saw clearly that wisdom excelled folly as light darkness, yet at the end was that ONE EVENT which wrote its dread Ichabod. "Then said I in my heart, that this also is vanity." In verses 18 and 19 another phase of this same thought appears. Koheleth was to leave all his labours to another. But said he:--

"Who knows whether he will be a wise man or a fool? Yet shall he rule over all my labour wherein I have laboured, and where I have showed myself wise under the sun. This is also vanity."

The theme is restated in verse 21 with the more positive thought that the result of all his labours will go to one who has not given one moment's thought to its production. Yet once more:--

"What hath man of all his labour, and of the vexation of his heart…..all his days are sorrows, and his travail grief: Yea, his heart taketh not rest in the night. This also is vanity" (ii. 22, 23).

How completely in harmony is this with Psa. cxxvii., a song of degrees BY SOLOMON (see Companion Bible):-- "Except the Lord build the house, they labour in vain that build it: except the Lord keep the city, the watchman waketh but in vain.

It is vain for you to rise up early, and to sit up late, to eat the bread of sorrows: for so He giveth His beloved IN (their) SLEEP."

We must note verses 24-26 and remember that the word "than" is not in the original. The Vulgate and Luther make the sentence interrogative. In verse 25 the weight of MS evidence is in favour of reading "apart from Him" instead of "more than I". Hence the passage reads:--

"Is it not good for man that he should eat and drink, and that he should make his soul enjoy good in his labour? This also I saw, that it (i.e. enjoyment of good) was from the hand of God."

Man himself cannot accomplish it. "For who can eat, or who else can hasten hereunto apart from Him." Here Koheleth sees the truth of Rom. ii. 5-10:--

"For God giveth to a man that is good in his sight wisdom and knowledge and joy: but to the sinner he giveth travail, to gather in (as the fruits, Lev. xxiii. 32) and heap up (same word 'I gathered me also silver and gold', ii. 8), that he may give to him that is good before God."

How similar is Prov. xxviii. 8:--

"He that by usury and unjust gain increaseth his substance, he shall gather it for him that will pity the poor"!

"This also is vanity and vexation of spirit." Do not let us jump to the conclusion, as many do, that Koheleth is taking sides with the sinner. He is expressing a fact, that the fraudulent accumulation of riches is simply vanity and vexation of spirit for the sinner, for none can enjoy the results of his labours apart from God's permission.

In chapter iv. 4, 8 and 14 three further observations are recorded: first, the envy which even righteous work begets in one's neighbour; secondly, the vanity of increasing and unsatisfying labour on the part of one having neither kith nor kin; and thirdly, by the contemplation of the instability even of a despot's throne. This passage has been paraphrased by A. A. Morgan thus:--

"Better cried they, a youth the land should rule
Than one whom time and age hath made a fool.
The heir of poverty, of bondmen born
If wise, disarms hereditary scorn,
And claims a people's homage more than he,
Whose mind is wasted by infirmity."

While an old and foolish king can be no good to a people, and while we may argue with every appearance of right along such lines as "a man's a man, for a' that, and a' that", yet there is something very unscriptural in the democratic view of kingship. Prophecy illuminates the goal of democratic rule. The world will not be better for exchanging the head of gold for the feet of clay. God's ideal rule is by a king upon a throne, and nothing can finally be right that disregards that. Therefore Koheleth is right when he contemplates this up to date rebellion. "Surely this also is vanity and vexation of spirit." Five more observations will complete our survey.

"He that loveth silver shall not be satisfied with silver; nor he that loveth abundance (be satisfied) with increase" (v. 10).

This is exactly what Koheleth pronounced (i. 8). What is the eye for but for "seeing"? yet it is not satisfied thereby. If a man love silver will he not be satisfied with it? No. It is a weary business, this seeking satisfaction from a world marked with corruption. Ecclesiastes utters truth at every step. All his findings point in the same direction. Vanity is written over all by reason of death. THE good is the LIFE to come. Satisfaction cannot be found here. "I shall be satisfied when I awake with Thy likeness" is as much the burden of Koheleth as of the Psalmist. In chapter vi. 1, 2 the writer reverts to a phase of experience already touched upon in ii. 24-26.

"There is an evil I have seen under the sun, and it is common among men (or heavy upon men R.V.). A man to whom God hath given riches, wealth and honour, so that he > wanteth nothing for his soul of all that he desireth, yet God giveth him not power to eat thereof, but a stranger eateth it: this is vanity, and it is an evil disease."

How many failures may be attributed to the lack of recognition of this principle! The present economic situation is slowly revealing to the mass of men that money is a false standard of value, and when we remember such words as Hag. I. 6 we can see that to earn much and yet to put it into a bag with holes is indeed vanity. Yet such was the condition of those who in their selfish greed put their own house first and forgot the Lord's. We have still to do with the same Lord who fed the prophet and the widow during famine with the last handful of meal, and who could multiply five loaves and two fishes so that they would satisfy thousands. Chapter v. 19 tells us that this "power" is the gift of God, and a gift it is verily.

Verse 7-9 introduce another aspect of unsatisfied desires. "All the labour of man is for his mouth, and yet the soul is not filled." So Prov. xvi. 26, "He that laboureth, laboureth for himself: for his mouth craveth it for him". As we analyze the speeches of those who have pleaded for better conditions for labour, have they not insisted that the man who labours week in week out shall earn something over and above the mere satisfying of his mouth? Do not they speak of a higher standard of living within reach of some of the intellectual refinements of life? True it is there is nothing new under the sun. Koheleth strikes the same note here. There is no true satisfaction in merely satisfying the craving of the mouth.

Nevertheless Ecclesiastes is in advance of many of his self-appointed teachers. "Better is the sight of the eyes than the wandering of the soul"—for seek as he will and where he will man will never escape the curse of vanity except by Him Who is the true and living way. Both Ecclesiastes and Christ say "a living WAY". Man will believes in "a living WAGE!" "This also is vanity and vexation of spirit."

Chapter vii. 6 sums up the senseless laughter of fools as so much crackling of thorns under a pot—mere vanity. Koheleth's opinion of laughter and mirth, expressed in ii. 2, remains unchanged. He also reviews the burial of the wicked with all the pomp and splendour that may accompany it (see vi. 3). They had "come and gone". There is no "complex figure of Ellipsis" here. It is the observation of Ecclesiastes throughout the book. "One generation passeth away (same word gone) and another cometh (same word come)." "He cometh in vanity", and "goeth to his long home". "To come and go" is the summary of human activity. They had conducted their business in the very shadow of the holy place, yet "what shall it profit a man?" "This also is vanity."

Finally, the apparent lack of equity that goes to make up the lives of men, the prosperity of the wicked and the suffering of the righteous, this further emphasizes the unsatisfactory nature of things and cries aloud for the conclusion of the matter", viz., a definite hereafter for the rectification of all that now is crooked.

We have not exhausted the preacher's statement (we have limited ourselves to the one expression "this also is vanity") giving, as it does, a series of investigations or observations and results. Who is there, taught by the Scripture, that will say that Ecclesiastes is not soundly true? Members of the One Body, blessed with all spiritual blessings, will do well to meditate upon the teaching of this book, for what is the practical exhortation to us but the teaching of Ecclesiastes in the doctrine of Paul?

> "If ye then be risen with Christ, seek those things which are above, where Christ sitteth on the right hand of God. Set your mind on things above, not on things on the earth."

Fundamentals of Dispensational Truth.

#25. The Principle of Separation (Gen. xii.).
pp. 6 - 8

Abraham must ever stand out in the Scriptures as a giant of faith, and it behooves such pigmies as ourselves to be careful of our criticism, yet we realize that the faithful Word presents to us in Abraham a man of like infirmities with ourselves, and if we learn from the recorded failures of this man of faith, it need not minister to our pride, nor lessen the testimony of faith which Abraham gave:--

> "By faith Abraham, when he was called. . . . obeyed; and he went out, not knowing whither he went."
> "So Abraham departed, as the Lord had spoken unto him."

The question that is in our mind concerns Lot. The Lord had called Abram and he obeyed. He had told him to leave country, kindred, and father's house. Did Abram fully obey this part of the command? The verse in Gen. xii. says, "So Abram departed, as the Lord had spoken unto him, and Lot went with him". Lot was the son of Haran, therefore Abram's nephew (Gen. xi. 27, 31; xii. 5; xiv. 12), therefore he was Abram's kindred, and Abram had been commanded to get out from his kindred. Lot seems to be mentioned several times in a somewhat detached way, "and Lot with him" (xiii. 1). "And Lot also, which went with Abram" (xiii. 5). A relieved feeling seems to come when we read, "and the Lord said unto Abram, after that Lot was separated from him, Lift up now thine eyes". The ties of the flesh are strong. When Abram was first called out by God we read, "and Terah took Abram his son, and Lot the son of Haran, his son's son". Now this tie, first introduced by Terah, is again found to be strong, "and Lot went with him". Whether we are right in this, we cannot say, true it is that Lot's presence brought neither peace nor blessing to Abram, and his entry into the land of Canaan ultimately lost him his wife, his home, and finally his character. If we will but examine ourselves we shall find that most of our fullest acts of obedience, and sincerest endeavours to walk a separate path, have been somewhat spoiled by the Terahs and the Lots who will not leave us to wholly follow the Lord. The silence of Scripture as to this in the record of faith in Heb. xi. is a consolation; the Lord is not swift to mark iniquity, if He were, who should stand?

When Abram reached Sichem and the plain of Moreh, the Lord appeared unto him. Abram had crossed the Jordan, and penetrated nearly half way through the country known as Samaria; Gilgal, where the reproach of Israel was rolled away some years afterward, is near this place. It looks as though Abram had to venture upon the word of the Lord, walking by faith. Without further vision or revelation, surrounded by the Canaanites (ever the foes of faith), he was put to a severe test. The silence is at length broken by the promise, "unto thy seed will I give this land". Following this promise comes Abram's response, "and there builded he. . . ." What did he build? Surely, if the land was his freehold, and his seed's for ever, he will at once begin to build a nice comfortable house, he will be justified in adding all the latest improvements that the Canaanites may have invented, and so show that his faith was real and matter of fact, that he really believed that the land belonged to him. So reasons the flesh. Abram never built anything other than altars throughout his pilgrimage. Cain and Nimrod built cities, the whole family of mankind attempt to build a city and a tower, and make a great name; Noah and Abram built altars. There is in this a principle, true now as then, and expressed for all time in the words of Him Who spake with authority and not as the Scribes:--

> "Seek ye first the kingdom of God and His righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you."

The fitting accompaniment to the altar is the tent. Verse 8 tells us that Abram pitched his tent, having Bethel on the west, and Hai on the east, and there he builded an altar unto the Lord, and called upon the name of the Lord. Verse 9 says, "and Abram journeyed"; the word indicates the pulling up of tent pegs. There was a definite purpose and choice in all this:--

> "By faith he sojourned in the land of promise, as in a strange country, dwelling in tents with Isaac and Jacob, the heirs with him of the same promise" (Why?). "For he looked for a city which hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God."

The spiritual pilgrim in effect judges that no city of man's building has foundations. In spite of the testimony of our senses, faith knows that "that which is seen is temporal, but that which is not seen is eternal".

> "These all died in faith, not having received the promises, but having seen them afar off, and were persuaded of them, and embraced them, and confessed that they were strangers and pilgrims on the earth."

Do we "declare plainly" that such is our faith and hope? Our life and hope and inheritance are found at the right hand of God. Do we, by setting our mind on things above, and by exhibiting small concern for the fashion of this world that passeth away, do we "declare plainly" that here we have no continuing city? Our citizenship is in heaven, and as such we cannot but be strangers and pilgrims on the earth; the altar and the tent are the two great characteristics of the pilgrim walk. The altar recognizes the claims of a holy God, the tent the necessity of separation for a holy and pilgrim people.

Heb. xi. tells us that the fact that Abraham was willing to dwell in a tent in the land of promise, was due to the vision of faith.—"he looked for a city that had foundations." Abraham was not a nomad by temperament, he did not choose the tent out of preference, he longed for city life, he looked for a city. Like others, who found here no continuing city, he sought one to come. Abraham, however, realized that to have fellowship with God meant that he must share the rejection of the Lord. The altar and the city come together in Heb. xiii. 10-14, "We have an altar. . . . here we have no continuing city". That means practically for us, "the tent". In other words, like Abraham, we must "go forth unto Him without the camp, bearing His reproach".

It will come to the mind that no altar was raised to God in Egypt. Moses had to decide between the dignity and glory of being called "son of Pharaoh's daughter", and "the reproach of Christ". He exchanged, as a matter of choice and estimation, the palace for the shepherd's tent, the crown for the crook, the greatness of Egypt for the backside of the desert. Abraham was called "the friend of God", and Moses was never so great as when he renounced the treasures of Egypt. May the true spirit of altar and tent, of pilgrimage and strangership be more fully entered into by us all, that the name of the Lord may be magnified.

#26. Gaps in the Calendar of Faith (Gen. xii. 10-20).
pp. 38 - 42

We noticed in our last article the fundamental lesson of separation as it is exhibited in the case of Lot and Abram; we are now to see Abram in yet another light, and most heart-searching lesson awaits us.

> "And there was a famine in the land: and Abram went down to Egypt to sojourn there, for the famine was grievous in the land."

One of the lessons that we all have to learn is expressed in the words of Deut. viii.:--

> "Thou shalt remember all the way which the Lord thy God led thee these forty years in the wilderness, to humble thee, and to prove thee, to know what was in thine heart, whether thou wouldest keep His commandments or no, and He humbled thee, and suffered thee to hunger, and fed thee with manna, which thou knewest not, neither did thy fathers know, that He might make thee know that man doth not live by bread only, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of the Lord doth man live. Thy raiment waxed not old upon thee, neither did thy foot swell, these forty years; thou shalt also consider in thine heart, that, as a man chasteneth his son, so the Lord chasteneth thee."

Perhaps the strongest test of the faith indicated in these occurrences is the character of the manna, "which thou knewest not, neither did thy fathers know"; faith trusts apart from sight or knowledge, but sense yearns for something substantial, not realizing that "faith is the substance of things hoped for". We must not judge by some rule of thumb, for each case has its own peculiar position in the purpose of God. When on another occasion a famine swept over Canaan, and the sons of Jacob went down to Egypt, we can see that it was part of a Divine plan to bring about God's own purpose; and again, when Herod sought to kill the infant Christ, Joseph and Mary found refuge in Egypt at the command of an angel of God. Whether, therefore, Abram should have remained in Canaan in spite of the famine, or whether he was right to go to Egypt, it is not for us to say, one thing comes prominently out of the story, and that is the terrible effect upon the pilgrim of faith a close proximity to the world can have.

> "And it came to pass when he was come near to enter Egypt, that he said unto Sarai his wife, Behold now, I know that thou art a fair woman to look upon; therefore it shall come to pass, when the Egyptians shall see thee, that they shall say, This is his wife and they will kill me, but they will save thee alive. Say, I pray thee, thou art my sister; that it may be will with me for thy sake, and my soul shall live because of thee."

Bishop Hall's pithy comment is worth repeating:--

> "God hath said, I will make thee a great nation: Abram saith, the Egyptians will kill me. . . . he through inconsiderateness doubted twice of his life doubted not the life of his seed. . . . yet it was more difficult that his posterity should live in Sarah, than that Sarah's husband should live in Egypt."

When we analyze unbelief, it is of all things most unreasonable. Abram would doubtless have defended his attitude by saying that after all Sarai was his sister. The poet has it that the lie which is half the truth is ever the blackest of lies, and it is more abominable in Abram to make the semblance of truth his refuge, than for the wicked to lie outright. The world, the Pharaohs of this spiritual Egypt, they will even reprove the man of faith for his inconsistency. The famine in Canaan was a trial certainly, but all trials that come upon the child of God are intended to lead him more continually to Christ. If Abram had only thought what he was doing, as he drew near to Egypt, he would have realized that to take refuge in a lie was to depart from God. True, Abram exchanged Canaan's famine for plenty—"he had sheep, and oxen, and he asses, and menservants, and maidservants, and she asses, and camels"—but he had no fellowship with God. This we shall see in the sequel.

The plagues sent by the Lord because of Abram's wife are sent to unmask Abram's deceit. An unbeliever (or at least a type of this world), rebukes the man of God:--

> "And Pharaoh called Abram, and said, What is this that thou hast done unto me? Why didst thou not tell me that she was thy wife? Why saidst thou, she is my sister? So I might have taken her to me; now therefore, behold thy wife, take her and go thy way."

Let us notice how Abram's sin involved others. "What is this that thou hast done unto me?" The pilgrim cannot step aside from the path of faith without evil resulting to himself and others. How sad to think that he who had been specially called out to be a blessing to all nations, should by his first individual act involve (but for the mercy of God) a nation in sin!

Chapter xiii. sees Abram leaving Egypt rich in cattle, in silver, and in gold, yet poor as yet in the treasures of faith:--

> "And he went on his journey from the south, even to Bethel, unto the place where his tent had been at the beginning, between Bethel and Hai, unto the place of the altar which he had made there at the first, and there Abram called on the name of the Lord."

This is a picture of restoration, "He restoreth my soul, He leadeth me in the paths of righteousness for His name's sake". The time which Abram spent in Egypt was so much waste, so far as God was concerned; he had to retrace his steps to the starting point. Similarly, Jonah ran away from the Lord, and entered a ship bound for Tarshish, yet when the great fish vomited up Jonah, he was upon the coast of the country he had been told to visit:--

> "And the word of the Lord came unto Jonah the second time, saying, Arise, go to Nineveh, that great city, and preach unto it the preaching that I bid thee."

Not only is it true that these lapses in the path of faith are so much lost time to the individual believer, but it enters also into the great prophetical reckonings of God with

His people. We doubtless are aware that there are what are called lo-ammi periods in biblical chronology; lo-ammi being the Hebrew for, "not my people". According to I Kings vi. 1 the temple was commenced in the 480th year after the children of Israel had departed from Egypt, whereas according to Acts xiii. 17-22 the period is given as 573 years (this includes 3 years of Solomon's reign), a difference of 93 years. Abram's loss of communion, and the re-commencement with God from where he was at the beginning, is but a small example of the principle that solves this apparent riddle.

During the time of the Judges Israel were taken away captive 5 times, and if we note the duration of these captivities, we find they total exactly 93 years! In case some readers are acquainted with this fact, we give the references hereunder:--

Chusan-rishathaim.	Judges	iii. 8.	8 years.
Eglon		iii. 14.	18
Jabin		iv. 2.	20
Midian		vi. 1.	7
Philistines		xiii. 1 .	40

		Total	93 years.

The years of the Acts reckoning are Anno Mundi (in the year of the world), whereas the 480th year of I Kings is Anno Dei (in God's year), showing that no record is made of the years of captivity. What a short term of Christian service some of us really serve when we come to consider the many lapses, and the many fresh beginnings that we can remember. What a mercy that the Lord does restore us, yet should we remember His words, "Go, and sin no more". The reader who is interested in the prophetic times of Dan. ix. will find a further application of this principle in Volume VI The Berean Expositor (page 165).

We are sure that when Abram reached the place of tent and altar, and there called upon the name of the Lord, he realized that nothing Egypt could offer was so precious as these two accompaniments of his pilgrimage. The world throughout all dispensations has been an unqualified snare: the wise will profit by these scriptural examples, while the foolish will think that where Abram failed, they will succeed. Doubtless Lot thought he would overcome the evil of Sodom, but we know that he did not.

We cannot close without at least a remembrance of that One who though the Son of God (and who could, had He wished, have turned the stones of the wilderness into bread), nevertheless waited upon God, repelling the suggestion of dependence upon any arm save that of His Father. Abram will find his place in the list of those who lived by faith, but the One who eclipses the whole cloud of witnesses is that One who is the author and perfecter of faith.

> "Seek ye first the kingdom of God and His righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you."

#27. "Saved; yet so as by fire" (Gen. xiii. 5-18).
pp. 70 - 74

> "And the land was not able to bear them, that they might dwell together: for their substance was great, so that they could not dwell together. And there was strife. . . ."

The "substance", literally "that which is gathered together", was partly accumulated during the sojourn in Egypt and partly during the halt at Haran (Gen. xii. 5 and 16). The LXX translates the word by ta huparchonta, and a very apposite occurrence will be that of Heb x. 34, "Ye. . . . took joyfully the spoiling of your goods (ta huparchonta), knowing in yourselves that ye have in heaven a better and an enduring substance (huparxis)." "Goods" cling to Lot in this history. They originate the cleavage, and they are mentioned pointedly in chapter xiv.:--

> "And they took all the goods of Sodom. . . . And they took Lot, Abram's brother's son, who dwelt in Sodom, and his goods. . . . and he brought back all the goods. . . . his brother Lot, and his goods. . . and the king of Sodom said unto Abram, 'Give me the persons and take the goods to thyself'."

These goods, or this substance, seem to have no spiritual character or tendency.

Immediately following the record of strife are the words, "And the Canaanite and Perizzite dwelled in the land". Abram's conscience was still tender. The rebuke given him by the heathen king was yet vivid in his memory. And the strife between himself and Lot would be no good testimony to the Lord their God. He was beginning to desire to "adorn" the doctrine. Therefore it was that Abram, to whom the land had been given by God, stand aside and exhibits that meekness of spirit which should ever accompany the possession of the heavenly gift. To Lot Abram gives the right of choice. When all things are ours in God, we can well be generous with those of small faith.

Lot was not rebuked apparently by Abram's forebearance, or, if he was, the well-watered plains of Sodom proved too strong a temptation for him. It is a curiously mixed description that Scripture gives. It was well-watered everywhere, yet the words, "before the Lord destroyed Sodom and Gomorrah", are inserted between the beginning and the end of the description, "even as the garden of the Lord". Its Eden-like appearance was superficial, for the Lord never walked there in the cool of the day. It was furthermore "like to the land of Egypt as thou comest to Zoar". It was a reminder to Lot of that which Abram would fain forget. So it came about that the choice was made, the two separated. "Abram dwelled in the land of Canaan, and Lot dwelled in the cities of the plain (or among the cities of the plain) and pitched his tent toward Sodom." "Where your treasure is, there will your heart be also."

The Companion Bible draws attention to the six downward steps of Lot's course. 1. "Strife" (7), 2. "beheld" (10), 3. "chose" (11), 4. "pitched toward" (12), 5. "dwelt in" (xlv. 12), 6. "sat in its gate" (xix. 1).

Sodom is proverbial in Scripture for wickedness, yet Sodom did not repel Lot. The N.T. throws a light upon one side of Lot's action and attitude:--

> "And delivered righteous Lot, vexed with the filthy conversation of the wicked: (for that righteous man dwelling among them, in seeing and hearing, vexed his righteous soul from day to day with their unlawful deeds). The Lord knoweth how to deliver the godly out of temptation, and to reserve the unjust unto the day of judgment to be punished" (II Pet. ii. 7-9).

Lot was righteous; Lot vexed his righteous soul; Lot was delivered as the godly—all this is comforting. Lot's witness, however, was marred. His fellowship with the Lord was hindered, and he is an example of those who though saved are saved "so as by fire". Even in the parable of the Sower, the seed that was choked by the thorns is not to be taken altogether as of the unsaved, for Luke viii. 14 reads:--

> "And that which fell among thorns are they, which, when they have heard, go forth, and are choked with CARES and RICHES and PLEASURES of this life, and bring no fruit to perfection."

Lot had certainly "gone forth", but he did not "go on unto perfection". Rather did he come nigh unto cursing and being burned (Heb. vi. 8). He himself was righteous, but he did not bring forth the fruit of righteousness.

The two angels, who together with the Lord had been entertained by Abraham unawares, entered Sodom, but the Lord Himself Who had graced the hospitality of Abraham's tent would not enter the portals of Lot's city. Even the two angels were with difficulty persuaded to enter Lot's house.

Now as to the effect of Lot's choice upon his testimony. When the angels revealed to Lot the destruction of the city, he went and spoke to his sons-in-law, which had married his daughters, and said, "Up, get you out of this place: for the Lord will destroy this city". What was the effect of this righteous man's earnest warning? He seemed as one that MOCKED—or talked nonsense. Lot had chosen, dwelt in, and established family ties with Sodom. His actions were reasonable and intelligible; his words were those of a mocker, or as "one that played with them". Lot himself had to be hastened by the angels lest he should be consumed with the city. Even Lot "lingered", and had to be laid hold of, "the Lord being merciful", and set "without the city". While Abram's faith gives him "the land of Canaan" to dwell in (xiii. 12), such spaciousness was too overpowering for Lot. He pleads against the command, "neither stay thou in all plain",

> "Oh, not so, my Lord: Behold now, thy servant hath found grace in thy sight, and thou hast magnified thy mercy, which thou hast shewed unto me in saving my life; and I cannot escape to the mountain, lest some evil take me, and I die; Behold now, this city is near to flee unto, and it is a little one: Oh, let me escape thither (is it not a little one?) and my soul shall live" (xix. 19, 20).

Zoar, the city of his choice, did not long prove a refuge for Lot, "for he feared to dwell in Zoar". The last end of Lot is pitiable in the extreme. Finding a refuge for himself and his daughters in a cave, he who had chosen the well-watered plains and pitched his tent toward Sodom left as his legacy two nations whose history is that of shame and wickedness, Moab and Ammon. It is surely something more than coincidence that the final prophetic utterance concerning Moab and Ammon takes us back to the destruction of Sodom. "Surely Moab shall be as Sodom, and Ammon as Gomorrah" (Zeph. ii. 9). An Ammonite or a Moabite were not allowed to enter into the congregation of the Lord even to their tenth generation (Deut. xxiii. 3).

Lot's deliverance from Chedorlaomer was entirely the result of Abraham's activity, and Lot's deliverance from Sodom was for Abraham's sake. The Scripture does not say, "And God remembered Lot", but "God remembered Abraham, and sent Lot out of the midst of the overthrow". All the vexing of Lot's righteous soul did not avail to save one Sodomite. Abraham who never entered its gates prayed that even if only ten righteous persons were to be found in Sodom it might be spared. We do not know just the reason why Abraham stayed at "ten", some think he felt certain that Lot, his wife, his daughters and their husbands, together with their servants, would account for that number. It was not so however, Lot's only recorded attempt at preaching sounded as so much mockery—his practice was far too eloquent.

Sodom occurs 39 times in the O.T. (13*3), and 9 times in the N.T. Both numbers are indicative of rebellion and judgment. The references to Sodom in II Pet. ii. 6, 7 and Jude 7 show us the character of the last days fast approaching. In this light the connections between Sodom and Babylon are suggestive (Isa. xiii. 19; Jer. l. 40).

The attempt once again to intercept the purpose concerning the promised seed, and defile the Messianic stream, seems manifest. Sodom stand for all that is anti-Christian. The dead bodies of the two witnesses shall be in the streets of that great city, "which spiritually is called Sodom and Egypt, where also our Lord was crucified" (Rev. xi. 8). This world with its possessions, even though they may appear as attractive as the garden of the Lord, is on the verge of judgment. The lesson of Lot seems to be echoed in I John ii.:--

> "Love not the world, neither the things that are in the world. If any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him. For all that is in the world. . . is not out of the Father."

Whatever our interpretation of such a passage as, "All things are of God", certain it is that the Father repudiates the world and its ways as being of Him. Throughout the dispensations, different as they are in many particulars, there has always been the call of God on the one hand, and the attraction of the world on the other. Shall it be with us, "a tent in the land of promise as in a strange country", or shall it be the city with its plenty, its protection, its advantages—and its loss? The true Hebrew still says, "here have we no continuing city, but we seek one to come".

Christ is still "without the camp". Let us therefore go out unto HIM. The fundamental truth, true for all dispensations, which is brought forward prominently by a comparison of the O.T. and the N.T. story of Lot, is the distinction which must ever be drawn between salvation and service, between the One foundation and the building erected thereon, between the hope and the prize.

#28. Faith's Heritage and Repudiation (Gen. xiii. 14 - xv. 1).
pp. 101 - 105

Lot gives the picture of the failure of a believer's testimony; the utter lack of fruit; the barest minimum of faith.

We turn to the other picture of growing and increasing faith, and find it closely linked with a growing and increasing separation. There seems a clearing of the atmosphere when Lot is at last gone. Abram is now left alone. He had left his choice with the Lord. In the eyes of the world doubtless he would be pronounced a fool—but he was God's fool.

> "And the Lord said unto Abram, AFTER THAT LOT WAS SEPARATED from him, Lift up now thine eyes, and look from the place where thou art, northward, and southward, and eastward, and westward: for all the land which thou seest, to thee will I give it, and to thy seed for ever (olam, for the age of undefiled limits). And I will make thy seed as the dust of the earth: so that if a man can number the dust of the earth, then shall thy seed also be numbered. Arise, walk through the land in the length of it and the breadth of it: for I will give it unto thee" (Gen. xiii. 14-17).

Lot chose for himself and lost. Abram hears God's choice and obtained. Surely to each one of us the contrast is pointed enough to make us desire to emulate the one and shun the other. Leaving the well-watered plains of this world, let us stand alone in fellowship with the Lord and hear Him say, "Arise, walk through the land, in the length of it and the breadth of it". There are blessings which are ours in Christ, which we have never yet experienced. Let us present that "other-worldly" spirit in contrast with the Lots of our time and explore and appropriate the fulness of blessing that is ours already in Christ.

It is doctrinal verity, as much as a record of historical sequence, that Abram did not hear these words until separation was complete. Separation however must never be considered merely from one side. Abram was not simply separated from Lot, but separated to the Lord. This is indicated in his next movement:--

> "Then Abram removed his tent, and came and dwelt among the oaks belonging to Mamre (brother of Eschol and Aner, xiv. 13) which is in Hebron, and built there an altar unto the Lord."

It appears from Gen. xxiii. 2 that the name of this city was originally Kirjath-arba, the two names occurring together in the record of Sarah's death. Its first name means Strong-hold of Arba, being built by Anak and the sons of Arba (Josh. xiv. 15; xv. 13). It fell to Caleb, the type of the overcomer, where its second name again appears as Hebron. Hebron means "fellowship" or "confederacy", and was the name given to the rebuilt city of Kirjath-arba by the Kharibi or allies. The introduction of the name in the case of Abram emphasizes the typical meaning. Separation from worldliness meant fellowship, covenant fellowship with the Lord. David was King in Hebron before he was King over all Israel (II Sam. ii. 11). He also knew the blessing of fellowship even though not at the time recognized by all his people.

This twofold character of separation is found in many scriptures, e.g.:--

> "Wherefore come out from among them and be ye separate, saith the Lord, and touch not the unclean thing; and I WILL RECEIVE YOU" (II Cor. vi. 17).
> "Let us go forth therefore UNTO HIM without the camp, bearing His reproach, for here have we no continuing city, but we seek one to come" (Heb. xiii. 13, 14).

Not, let us go forth without the camp for temperament's sake, or for misanthropic reasons, but because He is there. "Unto Him" comes before "without the camp".

There is a great deal of archaeological interest in the chapter that follows this separation and fellowship of Abraham. We will not deal with it here, however, but go to the end of the chapter to see how Abram has progressed along the line of faith. After Abram had delivered Lot and all the people and goods of Sodom we read:--

> "And the King of Sodom went out to meet him after his return from the slaughter of Chedorlaomer, and the Kings that were with him, at the valley of Shareh, which is the King's dale; and the King of Sodom said unto Abram, Give me the persons, and take the goods to thyself.'

Now, viewed from the standpoint of the world, Abram would have been perfectly justified to have taken his reward. Will he do so? Does he walk according to the elements of the world, or does he now walk according to the unseen things of faith? Before we allow Scripture to answer, we must go back and insert the parenthesis which we have omitted.

Most abruptly and strangely the episode of the meeting of Abram and the King of Sodom is interrupted by the episode of the meeting of Abram and the King of Righteousness and Peace:--

> "And Melchisedec, King of Salem, brought forth bread and wine, and he was priest of the Most High God. And he blessed him and said, Blessed be Abram of the Most High God, possessor of heaven and earth: and blessed be the Most High God, which hath delivered thine enemies into thy hand. And he (Abram) gave him (Melchisedec) tithes of all."

Before Abram is tempted to sully the separate character of his walk with the goods of Sodom, he meets with him who was the type of Christ, the High Priest, specially mentioned in that epistle of perfection and overcoming—Hebrews. Abram's attitude in chapter xiii. led him on to victory and greater blessing. Did Lot have such a privilege in his "garden of the Lord"? Could he have repudiated the offer of Sodom's King?

There are times when the believer learns rapidly and accurately. Such was the condition of Abram. Melchisedec had ministered to Abram the symbols of covenant-keeping. Melchisedec had twice spoken of The Most High God, and further, that He was the possessor of heaven and earth. Melchisedec had blessed Abram in the name of this Most High God, taught Abram that the great deliverance that had been accomplished was entirely the work of this Mighty One, and Abram had recognized the truth and blessedness of all this by giving tithes of all the booty before ever he returned to Sodom. He was thus equipped to meet the offer of Sodom's King:--

> "And Abram said to the King of Sodom, I have lift up mine hand unto the Lord, the Most High God, the possessor of heaven and earth (oh, how small the goods of Sodom become by comparison! How small Lot's choice, with the northward, southward, eastward and westward of a separate blessing!) that I will not take from a thread even to a shoe-latchet, and that I will not take anything that is thine, lest thou shouldest say, I have Abram rich: Save only that which the young men have eaten, and the portion of the men which went with me, Aner, Eschol, and Mamre; let them take their portion."

Abram is jealous of the glory of God. How marked a contrast with the sad lapse before Pharaoh. Abram's attitude must have been wholly unintelligible to the King of Sodom, especially as one professing like faith had acted so differently. "The far more exceeding, age abiding, weight of glory" is in view "while we look not at the things which are seen". An eye on the well-watered plains or the goods of Sodom would soon lead to the reasoning that these things were Abram's possessions—for had not God Himself given them to him? But no, away with the thought—the blessing is vitally connected with righteousness and holiness, and to be a pilgrim in the midst of the earth is our only capacity "till He come". Greater riches than the treasures of Sodom are in store for Abram:--

> "After these things the word of the Lord came unto Abram in a great vision, saying, Fear not Abram, I am thy shield and thy exceeding great reward."

Great faith leads us face to face with great reactions. Abram had exposed himself and made possible enemies by his victory. He had further repudiated legitimate reward, and to confirm his faith and still his fears, the Lord reveals Himself in the twofold capacity of shield from enemies, and reward in the place of Sodom's repudiated gifts. As the man of faith goes on in the pilgrim pathway, he learns by blessed experience that his all is in God. Presently (chapter xvii.) God will reveal Himself in a yet fuller light as El-Shaddai, God all-sufficient; but for the time being Abram's faith can rest satisfied in God His shield and exceeding great reward.

There is no surer shield and reward for either the writer or the reader, than the same Most High God, made known to us by Him Who ever liveth at the right hand of the majesty on high. Oh that we all carried the name of the Lord so high and so clear that we could always repudiate the temptations of the world "lest it should say, I have made Abram rich"! None shall enrich the child of faith but God alone. The wilderness journey is designed to teach that man does not live by bread alone.

It is noticeable, that Abram had his faith "to himself alone". He did not impose it upon Lot who owed his life and liberty to his intervention, neither did he allow his own scruples to rule the attitude of Aner, Eschol and Mamre. The cause of truth is often hindered by zeal unaccompanied by knowledge. Think of the offence often caused by one believer telling another believer that he ought not to take the Lord's supper, for instance. In the first place the probability is that the said believer is blessed under the terms of the new covenant, and so would be wrong with his present light to forego the observance.

Then secondly, the only right that we have to use the word "ought" is with regard to ourselves. I can say, "I ought not to observe the ordinances of baptism and the Lord's supper" with clear conscience and scriptural reasons, but this must not be imposed upon any who do not take the same stand.

Lot, Aner, Eschol and Mamre were representative of a different class. Abram it was that met Melchisedec, and was blessed by him. Abram it was who lifted up his hand to heaven. The others were ruled by lower laws, that could not be imposed upon the man of faith, and conversely could not be displaced except by like precious faith. What Israel did by faith, the Egyptians 'assaying to do" were destroyed.

May we all learn increasingly the blessing of a closer walk with God our shield and exceeding great reward.

#29. Faith and the Flesh (Gen. xv. 1 - xvi. 16).
pp. 134 - 139

In the two chapters now before us we shall again be brought face to face with the conflict of spirit and flesh, of faith and works, of liberty and bondage, in short with the key words of the epistle to the Galatians, and the very allegory which the apostle uses in that epistle.

In response to the words which were given to Abram in the vision, "Fear not, Abram, I am thy shield, and thy exceeding great reward", Abram said:--

> "Lord God, what will Thou give me, seeing I go childless, and the steward of my house is this Eliezer of Damascus? And Abram said, Behold, to me Thou hast given no seed; and, lo, one born in my house is mine heir."

This must not be interpreted to mean that upon the mention of the word "reward" Abram evidenced a grasping spirit—rather the contrary is the true meaning. Here he was a stranger among strangers. His nearer relative had parted from him for the greater attraction of Sodom. He was getting well on in years and still childless. Hence he says, "What wilt Thou give me?"; as much as to say, Thou hast already loaded me with blessings, what can more of the same avail, seeing that in the ordinary course (and according to the law of the land at the time) it must all go to Eliezer my steward? (For the code of Khammurabi, to which Abram refers here, see Volume VI, page 104).

God had promised Abram a seed, and Abram began to think that the intention of the Lord was to run along the lines of human codes. In this he was mistaken:--

> "And behold the word of the Lord came unto him saying, This shall not be thine heir; but he that shall come forth out of thine own bowels shall be thine heir."

This definite statement removed Eliezer from the field conferred upon Abram in his old age the assured hope of literal parenthood.

Not yet did Abram's faith firmly grasp the fact that this promise encircled Sarah also; this is evident by the sequel, yet he believed the literal statement of the Lord and for the time that was all the Lord intended. When Abram stood alone, rid of the society of Lot, the Lord used the simile of the dust of the earth to indicate the number of his seed. Now Abram's eyes are directed heavenward:--

> "And He brought him forth abroad, and said, Look now toward heaven, and tell the stars, if thou be able to number them: and He said unto him, so shall thy seed be."

Abram stood before that heavenly host, a childless old man, yet the simple statement is made—grand in its simplicity—"And he believed in the Lord; and He counted it to him for righteousness". This sentence brings us to one of the most important utterances of Scripture. Upon the truth contained therein the apostle Paul founded his gospel. The epistles to the Romans and the Galatians are impossible apart from it: It will therefore warrant a pause and a prayerful consideration.

"He believed in the Lord."--Rom. iv. 3 says, "Abraham believed God." Had not Abraham believed in the Lord, or believed God when he obeyed the command to leave Ur of the Chaldees? He certainly did, for Heb. xi. definitely says that he acted "by faith". Was not the response recorded in Gen. xii. 7 the act of a worshipper who believed? Did not Abraham believe the Most High God when he preferred His blessing to Sodom's gifts? Surely he did. Then what is the reason for this statement here? We believe the whole secret is wrapped up in the fact that Abraham's belief in the Lord on this particular occasion embraced the idea of resurrection. This is elaborated in Rom. iv. in connection with the fuller statement concerning Abraham's seed given in Gen. xvii. That is the character of the faith which justifies.

The purpose of justification goes back as far as Gen. xii., for Gal. iii. 8 says:--

> "The Scripture, foreseeing that God would justify the Gentiles through faith, preached before the gospel unto Abraham, saying, In thee shall all nations be blessed."

Justification by faith was incipient in the covenant of Gen. xii., it arrives at full consciousness, so to speak, in Gen. xv. Take the words "counted for". If we turn to Rom. iv. 1-8, we find the expression "counted for", and also "reckoned" and "imputed", the same word being translated by these various terms. The important thing to notice is that faith is "counted FOR", whereas righteousness, sin and reward are "counted". The difference is this, righteousness, sin and reward are real value in themselves, whereas faith is only of value by virtue of the work of another and the ordinance of God.

A treasury note is worth £1, yet its intrinsic value is practically nil. Drop a treasury note in the fire and its value ceases. Drop a sovereign in the fire and its value remains the same. Faith is the treasury note. It is counted for, but it is not of itself counted as, righteousness. The moment we look on faith in itself as a meritorious cause of justification, that moment we make it a work which is excluded.

Abraham's faith, as exhibited in Gen. xv., confessed the utter inability of the flesh to accomplish anything for God. His faith said practically, "Unless God is the One who quickeneth the dead, I have no ground of hope".

Following upon this justifying faith comes the confirmatory covenant concerning the inheritance. "Whom He justified, them He also glorified"; that is the sequence expressed doctrinally. "Joint heirs with Christ, if so be we suffer with Him"; that is the reason for the affliction of Abraham's seed. "God works all things together for good to them that love God, to those who are called according to a purpose"; this expresses the superintending hand of God in all the strange pathways of His covenant people. Thus the history of Gen. xv. and the doctrine of Rom. viii., bear united testimony. Even though justification leads on to glory, it does not exempt from intermediate suffering, but rather supports the teaching that it must come.

The Lord said to Abram, "I am the Lord that brought thee out of Ur of the Chaldess, to give thee this land to inherit it". And he said, "Lord God, whereby shall I know that I shall inherit it?" There are two questions in this chapter, and there are two answers. Indeed the answers precede the questions:--

> "I AM THY SHIELD."—This was the pledge of Abraham's justification.
> "I AM THY EXCEEDING GREAT REWARD."—This was the pledge of Abraham's inheritance.
> "WHAT WILT THOU GIVE ME?"—External confirmation.—The stars.
> "WHEREBY SHALL I KNOW?"—External confirmation.—The smoking furnace and the burning lamp.

Space prevents us from quoting the verses of Gen. xv., the reader is expected to "search and see" with regard to all the articles of this magazine.

Offerings are arranged for the purpose of making a covenant, but Abram falls into a deep sleep that the covenant may be manifestly unconditional.

The question must arise, Why was it necessary for Israel to go down into Egypt, to be oppressed there, to be delivered out of it, and to be brought back to the same land wherein Abraham already was? Why should not Abraham's descendants just continue without a break in the land of their inheritance? This question expressed in different terms is asked all down the age regarding the strange providence of suffering. The answer is a revelation of God's character and purpose:--

> "But in the fourth generation they shall come hither again, FOR THE INIQUITY OF THE AMORITES IS NOT YET FULL."

The bondage in Egypt was not only for the discipline of Israel and the manifestation of redemption, it was because the longsuffering of God waits until the workers of iniquity have proved themselves incorrigible. That this is a Fundamental of Dispensational Truth we shall find by other scriptures:--

> "And in the latter time of their Kingdom, when the transgressors are come to the full, a King of fierce countenance. . . . shall stand up. . . . , but he shall be broken without hand" (Dan. viii. 23-25).

In Matt. xxiii. 32-36; I Thess. ii. 16 we find the words:--

> "Fill ye up then the measure of your fathers. . . . that upon you may come all the righteous blood shed upon the earth. . . . All these things shall come upon this generation." "Forbidding us to speak to the Gentiles that they may be saved, to fill up their sins always: for the wrath is come upon them to the uttermost."

"Filled up" sins are met with "filled up" wrath. John saw 'seven angels having the seven last plagues; for in them is filled up the wrath of God" (Rev. xv. 1).

There are spiritual and human workers of iniquity for whose fulness the inheritance waits. The book of the Revelation shows human and Satanic iniquity fully ripe. The bondage of the redeemed will then come to an end. Those that afflict them will be judged, and afterward the redeemed shall "come out with great substance".

Another covenant is made by God, which defined the geographical boundaries of the land of promise. This land has never yet been possessed by Israel. It is the "good land and large" that awaits them. When they enter it they will dispossess 10 nations, "the Kenites. . . . the Jebusites", which is typical of the overthrowing of the 10 antichristian kings at the time of the end. An episode follows this chapter of faith which again shows the failure of the flesh.

Abraham believed that the son and heir promised to him should be his own flesh and blood, but both Abraham and Sarah seemed to have concluded that Sarah was not to be the mother of the child. Indeed Sarah says that the Lord had restrained her, when He had done nothing of the kind. One of the hardest things for the believer to do is to WAIT. The promise seems to tarry, and the flesh counts the longsuffering of God "slackness". The flesh also seeks to help God to fulfil His own unconditional covenant, and the end is always disaster.

Ten years had passed, and the trial of faith proved too much. "Abram hearkened to the voice of Sarai", sad repetition of Gen. iii. 17. The transactions of this sixteenth chapter of Genesis seem strange to our ideas, but it was strictly in accord with the law of the land at the time. This is specially to be remembered when considering verses 3 and 6.

The result of the intrusion of the FLESH into the realm of FAITH was the birth of Ishmael. The epistle to the Galatians has much to say concerning the flesh and the spirit and the enmity between the son of the bondmaid and the son of the freewoman. The one indicates law which can only touch the flesh. The other indicates faith which can only apply to the spirit. The reader is referred to the whole epistle as an inspired comment upon these chapters. The individual working out of the comparisons and allusions will be a helpful study. We have the beginner in mind in this series, and nothing is worse than never to allow the beginner the opportunity of searching the scriptures and receiving the training which results from exercise.

Hagar had a wonderful experience. If Hagar was to wander later in the wilderness of Beer-sheba (the well of the oath) she is first of all to know Beer-lahai-roi (the well of living after seeing). Another interpretation of this name is The well of the living and the visible One, and when we remember the revelation of Christ to a fallen woman of Samaria (John iv.), the possibility of this equally wonderful revelation being made to the outcast Hagar is not to be dismissed.

When Ishmael was born Abram was eighty-six years old. Faith had yet to be strengthened by longer waiting, for chapter xvii. opens with a childless Sarai, when Abram had reached ninety and nine years of age.

We shall continually meet with these examples of failure because of not waiting. May the lesson be not wasted upon ourselves. "Wait, I say, on the Lord." "Which worketh for him that waiteth for Him" (Isa. lxiv. 4, R.V.).

#30. Circumcision and its relation to being "perfect" (Gen. xvii.).

pp. 161 - 165

Abram has had several trials of faith. We see his progress much like the climbing record on the meteorological chart. Not one straight undeviating line does Abram's record leave. He falls a few degrees, and advances a few more, but it is to be thankfully noted that he does advance. One, and One only, ever walked the straight path of perfect faith, and while Abraham may twice figure in the list of those who received a good report through faith, Christ Himself alone is the Author and Perfecter of faith (Heb. xi., xii.). Nevertheless, Abram is a follower of the Lord, and to him as to all believers comes the call to go on unto perfection:--

> "And when Abram was ninety years old and nine, the Lord appeared to Abram and said unto him. I am El Shaddai; walk before Me and be thou perfect.'

When He was revealed as Abram's shield and reward, Abram believed Him unto justification and inheritance. Something fuller and deeper lies before Abram now. Up to this point Abram is the father of all that believe. Every believing child of God is justified and will receive a share of His inheritance. Not all believers, however, "go on unto perfection". Even Paul, sure as he was of his justification and of his fitness for the inheritance in the light, yet says, "Not as though I were already perfect". When Abram is called upon to "be perfect", a fuller revelation of God is made to him. It will be helpful to observe the different titles of God that appear in the various phases of Abram's walk of faith.

Stephen tells us that "The God of glory" appeared to Abram and bade him leave Ur of the Chaldess for the land of promise. This title of the Lord is in vivid contrast to the idolatrous and passing world of Abram's nativity. As "The Most High God, possessor of heaven and earth", the Lord was revealed to Abram before he met the temptation of the king of Sodom. As Abram's shield and exceeding great reward the Lord is revealed Who was to justify him and pledge his inheritance through all the trials that awaited him and his seed.

His title, when He lets Abram know that his inheritance is sure, is "The Lord that brought thee out of Ur of the Chaldees"—implying the truth otherwise expressed "that He which hath begun a good work in you will perform it unto the day of Jesus Christ". This characterized Abram's faith (see Rom. iv. 21). As "The Almighty God", or El Shaddai, the Lord appeared to Abram when he would urge him on to perfection. If justification by faith supposes the deadness of nature and the resurrection power of the Lord, subsequent perfection will necessitate that God Himself shall be all in all. El Shaddai has been curiously rendered, "The enough God"; the idea is expressed by the apostle when he said, "Our sufficiency is of God".

Abram's name is here changed to Abraham, "The father of many nations", and this is spoken of at some length by the apostle in Rom. iv. 16-25. The land of Canaan is given here to Abraham and his seed for "an everlasting" possession, by an "everlasting" covenant, or a possession for the age of undefined limits. Thus Israel is called the ancient people, or the everlasting people, the people for the age (Isa. xliv. 7). The connection of this "everlasting" character of the blessing with "perfecting" will be more fully dealt with in the articles on The Epistle to the Hebrews.

The first occurrence in the New Testament of the title "Almighty" is II Cor. vi. 18 where it is preceded by separation, as in Abram's case, and followed by cleansing from the filthiness of flesh and spirit, "perfecting holiness in the fear of God". Seeing that the word "perfect" in Gen. xvii. is the word used of Noah in Gen. vi. 9, who "was uncontaminated in his pedigree", and considering the insistent attempts of Satan to corrupt the line of the promised Seed, as in the case of Pharaoh and Sodom already noticed, there may be an allusion here to the intrusion of the flesh resulting in the birth of Ishmael.

Three important aspects of truth are indicated in Gen. xvii.:--

1. The Lord reveals Himself.—"I AM" (1).
2. The Lord reveals His intention.—"I WILL" (seven times, 2-8).
3. The Lord reveals something for Abraham to do.—"Thou shalt keep" (9-14).

The Lord is Alpha (I am), and Omega (I will) before Abraham is called upon to do anything. The seventh "I will" pledges the fulness of El Shaddai in that day to Abraham's seed, "I will be their God". Further, Abram's name is changed to Abraham before a conditional covenant is made with him.

Abraham can be justified without circumcision, but not perfected. This is vividly brought out by the apostle in Phil. iii. where before speaking of the perfection to which he pressed, he spoke of those who were likeminded believers as "the circumcision who had no confidence in the flesh". That is the true significance of the rite. The flesh is repudiated. After having begun in the spirit, asked Paul of the Galatians, are you now made perfect by the flesh? To the Colossians the apostle expressed his earnest desire that he might present every man perfect in Christ Jesus. This statement follows the record of their perfect acceptance in Christ, and is followed by the reference to their circumcision in Christ.

1. "In the body of His flesh to present you holy and unblameable" (i. 22).
2. "That we may present every man perfect in Christ Jesus" (i. 28).
3. "In Whom ye are circumcised with the circumcision made without hands, in the putting off the body of the flesh by the circumcision of Christ" (ii. 11).

So it is that the changed name follows the command to be perfect, and is in turn followed by "My covenant which ye shall keep". This was to be the token of the "everlasting covenant" already mentioned.

Sarai's name is now changed to Sarah. The meaning of the two names does not differ much. Sarai means "princely" and Sarah "princess". The same letter "H" which was added to Abram's is added to Sarai's.

There are eight covenants that are made with Abraham, and each is suggestive when we observe its numerical order:--

1. The great nation. "Thee" (personal) seven times (Gen. xii. 1-3).
2. The Seed. Redemption. Altar (Gen. xii. 7).
3. The land. Only Abraham's in resurrection (Gen. xiii. 14-17).
4. Boundaries. 400 years. 4th generation (Gen. xv. 13-21).
5. Grace, the changed name. "H" = 5 in Hebrew. Circumcision and perfection. "Abraham laughed" (Gen. xvii. 1-22).
6. The flesh a failure. "Sarah laughed" (Gen. xviii. 9-15).
7. Isaac, not Ishmael. "Let him laugh" (Gen. xxi. 12).
   AFTER THE OFFERING OF ISAAC.
8. Blessing in resurrection. The oath (Gen. xxii. 15-18).

It may also have been remarked that in chapter xvii. we have a fuller statement of the sevenfold covenant of Gen. xii. This covenant has seven "I wills", but the promises are fuller. It commences the second set of four covenants. The first four are concerning the great nation, the promised seed, the promised land, and its geographical boundaries. These are covenants made with Abram. The second four are covenants made with Abraham. They include circumcision as the token, the promise concerning Sarah, the exclusion of Ishmael, and the "better promises" obtained by Abraham, revealed for the first time centuries after in the epistle to the Hebrews. The earthly inheritance is given in xv. 13-21, the heavenly is contained in xxii. 16-18.

Doctrinally we must repudiate the Ishmaels of our failures, but practically we may have to shoulder our burdens and responsibilities to them. Thus the apostle did not instruct a believing husband to put away his wife who may have still remained a pagan. This would have brought the name of the Lord into disgrace. Abraham remembers his responsibility regarding Ishmael. Rightly or wrongly, Abraham was his father, and he pleads for Ishmael before the Lord. The Lord replied:--

> "Sarah thy wife shall bear thee a son indeed; and thou shalt call his name Isaac: and I will establish My covenant with him for an everlasting covenant, and with his seed after him. And as for Ishmael, I have heard thee: Behold I have blessed him, and will make him fruitful, and will multiply him exceedingly; twelve princes shall he beget, and I will make him a great nation. But my covenant will I establish with Isaac, which Sarah shall bear unto thee at this set time in the next year. And He left off talking with him, and God went up from Abraham" (Gen. xvii. 19-22).

Ishmael should be blessed, but the covenant was in Isaac. Both Ishmael and Isaac were circumcised, yet one was of the flesh, while the other was of promise. Isaac was circumcised on the eighth day—the day of resurrection, whereas Ishmael was circumcised in his thirteenth year, the number of rebellion.

Thus Abraham was instructed, when he set out upon his walk before God, that to be perfect involved the putting off of the body of the flesh. Ishmael cannot inherit the promises of the covenant. All must be of God and not of the flesh. Thus did Abraham learn his first lesson when he was ninety years old and nine. Thus did he laugh the laugh of faith when he believed that a child should be born to one a hundred years old.

The scriptures in setting forth the truth of perfection allow no room in connection with it the flesh.

The Dispensations.
pp. 143, 144

(These notes, contributed by a reader, should be read in connection with articles of "Fundamentals of Dispensational Truth".

Readers of THE BEREAN EXPOSITOR and lovers of the Word know the scriptural significance of numbers, but possibly some may not have noticed how the different Dispensations are in accord with the other occurrences in the Word.

The definitions given below are culled from Appendix 10 of that much valued Word, The Companion Bible:--

1. Adam unfallen.—One denotes unity and commencement. First day, Light.
2. Fall to Flood.—Two denotes difference; if two different persons agree in testimony it is conclusive, otherwise it implies enmity, opposition, division, as was the work of the second day.
3. Flood to Call of Abram.—Three denotes completeness. The number includes resurrection, for on the third day the earth rose up out of the deep.
4. Call of Abram to Exodus.—Four denotes creative works and always has reference to the earth and things under the sun.
5. Exodus to Destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar.—Five denotes Divine grace. It is God adding His blessing and gifts to the works of His hands, and it is the leading factor in the Tabernacle measurements.
6. Destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar to Ministry of our Lord.—Six is the human number. Six (and multiples thereof) is the hall-mark of all connected with man. The great men who have stood out in defiance of God (Goliath, Nebuchadnezzar, and Antichrist), are all emphatically marked by this number.
7. Our Lord's Ministry and that of those that heard him until Acts xxviii..—Seven denotes spiritual perfection. It is the number or hall-mark of the Holy Spirit's work. He is the Author of God's Word, and seven runs through it as the water-mark in paper.
8. The Mystery.—Eight denotes resurrection, regeneration, a new beginning. The eighth is a new first. It has to do with the Lord who rose on the eighth or new first day. Together with its multiples it is impressed on all that has to do with the Lord's names, people, and works.
9. The Day of the Lord to the Millenniums.—Nine denotes finality of judgment: it or its factors is seen in all cases where judgment is the subject.
10. The Millennium.—Ten denotes ordinal perfection.
11. The Final Rebellion.—Eleven denotes disorder, disorganization, being one short of the number twelve.
12. The New Heaven and New Earth.—Twelve denotes governmental perfection. It is the number or factor of all numbers connected with government, or things appertaining thereto in the heavens or on the earth.

The Epistles to the Hebrews.

#11. The Inherited Salvation (Heb. i. 14).
pp. 20 – 23

Our last article was headed The Inherited Name, better than Angels. This one is entitled "The inherited Salvation", as it too is better than the inheritance of angels, for angels are ministering spirits to these heirs of salvation. Quoting from the previous article we remind ourselves that > "Angels are sons of God by creation, men become sons of God through faith in Christ. Christ in resurrection was declared Son of God by inheritance."

This argument is equally true in the present case. All who are saved receive salvation by faith, but some of the saved will, in addition, receive salvation by inheritance. Christ suffered and learned obedience by His sufferings, was perfected, and became the Author of aionian salvation to all them that obey Him. Christ is set before the Hebrews as the Author and Perfecter of faith, "Who for the joy set before Him endured a cross, despising the shame, and is set down at the right hand of God." Those who "inherit" salvation also suffer, endure, run the race set before them, and, like Moses and Abraham, have respect unto the recompence of the reward. To be an heir presupposes sonship: "If children, then heirs"; but before salvation no man is a child of God.

Does the word salvation in Hebrews point to something other than salvation from sin? Let us see. We shall not be at all surprised to find that such a word occurs seven times, viz.:--

Soteria (Salvation).

Inherited salvation (i. 14).
Neglecting so great salvation (ii. 3).
The Captain of salvation (ii. 10).
The Author of aionian salvation (v. 9).
Things that accompany salvation (vi. 9).
Without sin unto salvation (ix. 28).
Unto the salvation of his house (xi. 7).

Passing by for the moment the first reference, let us briefly notice the others.

Heb. ii. 3.—This salvation is called the "so great" salvation, which title indeed, we gladly agree, justly describes the redemption of the sinner. Those who were in danger of neglecting this so great salvation, however, are those who have had its testimony confirmed to them, which hardly applies to unbelievers. Much also depends upon the meaning of the word "neglect", which must be considered in its place. We hope to show that this salvation does not refer to salvation from sin.

Heb. ii. 10.—The underlying idea in this reference is contained in the words, "bringing many sons to glory". This is accomplished by One called "The Captain", who like Joshua leads on to the promised possession, but unlike Moses, who led out of the land of bondage.

Heb. v. 9.—This passage is almost parallel with ii. 10, but gives fuller detail. It is concerned with obedience, and the perfecting effect of suffering. We believe we shall be able to demonstrate that the aionian salvation of this passage, the so great salvation of ii. 3, the inherited salvation of i. 14, and the "glory" of ii. 10, all point to the one thing.

Heb. vi. 9.—"Things which accompany salvation" certainly link us with our first deliverance from sin; yet remembering the purifying and stimulating character of hope, we cannot exclude future salvation and inherited glory from this passage. One has only to read on in the near context to hear of showing "full assurance of hope unto the end", of "inheriting the promise", through "faith and patience", and of "the hope set before us". These all have a bearing upon the salvation of verse 9 and influence its interpretation.

Heb. ix. 28.—This passage not only puts salvation into the future and speaks of believers waiting for it, but it also definitely rules out the idea of salvation from sin, that having taken place once for all. This salvation is connected, not with the first but with the second appearing of Christ, and is expressly spoken of as "apart from sin" altogether.

Heb. xi. 7.—The salvation of Noah's house in the ark is the nearest approach to the salvation of the sinner that these seven references provide, yet the deliverance from the future day of wrath is clearly foreshadowed, Noah himself being already a saved and justified believer, and the record is part of a series illustrating faith as the substance of things hoped for, rather than faith that saves from sin, the "saving of the soul" of Heb. x. 39 notwithstanding.

Whatever the exact meaning of the word salvation may be, as used in this epistle, it is evident that no reference gives a clear evangelical statement of the way of salvation. On the other hand, the type of the wilderness journey, its tabernacle, its camp, and the rest that remaineth, its temptations and its perils, is so fully applied in this epistle, that we cannot dismiss them without losing light upon this subject.

The title "Saviour" never occurs in Hebrews. In Acts v. 31 Christ is called both a "Prince and a Saviour". In Hebrews the title of Prince is retained (ii. 10, xii. 2 Gk.), but the title Saviour is omitted. The contexts of both occurrences speak of suffering in view of glory, rather than suffering to expiate sin. Other epistles speak of Christ as Saviour, this one speaks of Him as Captain and Leader. Other epistles tell of salvation from sin, this one speaks of the salvation that is to be inherited at the second appearing of the Lord.

Coming back to Heb. i. 14 we notice that angels are called ministering spirits to these heirs of salvation. Ministering angels are seen from the days of Abraham onward. One is specially remembered by Jacob (Gen. xlviii. 16). An angel was sent before Israel to lead them on their wilderness journey (Exod. xiv. 19; xxiii. 20, 23). Angels interposed throughout the chequered history of the Judges. David has dealings with angels (I and II Kings and Psalms); Daniel and Zechariah are instructed by them, and the New Testament commences, continues, and concludes with angelic ministry—with one notable exception. Angels do not, so far as we can discover, minister to the members of the church of the one body, who are in immediate contact with their glorious Head. While the four gospels speak of angels some 50 times, the Acts some 20 times, and the Revelation some 70 times, or 140 times in all, Paul's epistles, omitting Hebrews, contain only 14 references between them. Of this number one only is found in the prison epistles, viz., Col. ii. 18, where the apostle warns against adopting the worship of angels in contrast with "holding the Head". Consequently it is true to say that the ministry of angels is never once referred to in the epistles of the mystery.

The epistle to the Hebrews is written to a different company of believers. They have a different calling than that of the one body, and in this epistle the apostle speaks of angel 13 times. Angels are the "servants" of the spirit world. The church of the one body have as their associates the nobility of heaven, principalities, authorities, thrones and dominions. Angels are the lowest order in that glorious world. They are God's messengers, not the princes of that sphere of bliss. These ministering spirits are "sent forth for service on account of those who are about to inherit salvation".

"About to."—This is an expression frequently used in Scripture. In the Hebrews we find it 10 times. It is often connected with the future kingdom, as may be seen in Heb. ii. 5, "The habitable (world) about to be." vi. 5, "The age about to be." ix. 11, x. 1, "The good things about to be." x. 27, "The judgment about to be.", and xiii. 14, "The city about to be."

The salvation in view in Heb. i. 14 is about to be inherited. It is something future and related to that world which shall be subjected to the Lord Jesus Christ, the age to come, and the city which hath foundations whose maker and builder is God.

#12. Confirmed Covenants and their responsibilities. (Heb. ii. 1-4).

pp. 52 - 56

The passage from the second half of verse 2 to verse 14 of chapter i. is a parenthesis, enlarging upon, and explaining by a series of O.T. references, the superiority of the inherited Name of the Son to that of the angels. Chapter ii. reads on from i. 2:--

"God…..hath in these last days spoken to US IN SON…..THEREFORE, we ought to give the more earnest heed….."

It may be of service to repeat the structure given in Volume VIII, page 183:--

Hebrews i., ii.

A | i. 1, 2. God once spoke by prophets. Now by His Son.
B | i. 2-14. The Son. His glories. God and Lord, better than angels.
A | ii. 1-4. God once spoke by angels. Now by the Lord.
B | ii. 5-18. The Son. His sufferings. Man and Abraham's seed, lower than angels.

The "therefore" of ii. 1 is dia touto, "on this account", or "for this reason". We must not look for the prime reason in the preceding verse, which speaks of the ministry of angels, but to the preceding clause which speaks of the superior testimony of the Son (i. 1, 2). "On this account it behoves us to give more earnest heed to the things which we have heard, lest at any time we should let slip". We differ from the A.V. in the rendering of this verse, agreeing more with the R.V. which reads, "drift away from them". Rotherham renders the word, "drift away"; J.N.Darby renders it, "we should slip away". A great deal of controversy has arisen over this word, one set of interpreters taking the passage to mean, "lest we should fall or stumble", the other taking it to mean, "lest we forget". The one makes the passage teach that we should give earnest heed lest WE slip away, the other that we should give earnest heed so that we do not let the WORDS slip away. Both sides refer to Prov. iii. 21 to prove their point. J.N.Darby says:--

> "Proverbs is a free translation, for the Hebrew is plural 'let them slip away from thine eyes', that is, what is spoken of in the end of the verse; but it shows the sense of the word."

Moses Stuart says:--

> "This is the very proverb to which Chrysostom and Theophylact appeal as an illustration of the word in question: but the true sense of this word in Prov. iii. 21 they do not seem to have apprehended. Pararrheõ here plainly does not mean to perish, to fall, but is the antithesis to tērēson, keep, attend to, practice, and consequently means, to pass by, to neglect, to transgress."

Dr. Bullinger in his Lexicon and Concordance says:--

> "Pararrheõ, to flow near, flow by, glide away; here the 2nd Aorist passive, carried away, beside, or with, referring, not like the active, to the act of floating away, but to being carried beside, or floating away past anything with the stream (the marginal reference is quite wrong and follows the Vulgate pereffluamus)."

The reader may wonder how it can be possible to arrive at a settled understanding where so many learned writers have so differently expressed themselves yet it is possible to perceive truth in both sets of interpretation. It is certain that if earnest heed be not given, we are apt to let the words slip, it is equally scripturally true that, if we do not give earnest heed, we ourselves shall slip. It appears therefore that the true meaning of the passage is a combination of both thoughts; we cannot let slip the words of truth without sliding away ourselves. An extension of the argument comes in chapters iii. and iv.:--

> "And to whom sware He that they should not enter into His rest, but to those who believed not; let us therefore fear, lest a promise being left us of entering into His rest, any of you should seem to come short of it."

The two sides of the question appear in chapters v., vi. In both the "dull" of hearing or the "slothful" are mentioned (same word in each case). Heb. v. 11,12: "Ye are dull of learning…..ye ought to be teachers, ye have need that one teach you again"; here is the parallel with the A.V. "let them slip". Heb. vi. 12-19: "That ye be not slothful, but followers of them who through faith and patience inherit the promises". These are "anchored", and this passage parallels the R.V. rendering, "drift away from them". On the whole the grammatical form and the general teaching of the epistle inclines to the second meaning—that the lack of diligence was fraught with the danger of slipping away.

The argument of the verses which follow is to the effect that, if Israel had to give earnest heed to the message sent by prophets or angels lest they should fail of entering into the rest that remained for them, those who have had the word spoken to them, not merely by prophets or even angels, but by the Son Himself, must even more diligently heed the words spoken, for it is impossible, we shall learn, to renew such unto repentance if they should "fall away"—or, in the words of the verse before us, "how shall we escape if we neglect so great salvation".

The apostle leads to this question by reverting to an argument parallel with that of the opening of the first chapter. God spoke in the past by many agencies, now He has spoken in the Son. Here the form of the argument is repeated, the details being altered:--

> "For if the word spoken by angels was stedfast, and every transgression and disobedience received a just recompense of reward, how shall we escape if we neglect so great salvation, which at the first began to be spoken by the Lord, and was confirmed unto us by them that heard Him?"

The apostle does not say "the law", but "the word", a term which is wider and embraces the whole of the old covenant. It will be found that the two covenants came with new laws. There can be no difficulty in connection with the law being given by the mediation of angels, even though the Scripture definitely declares that "God spake all these words". The problem would meet us in Heb. i. 1 where God speaks, yet uses the mouth of a prophet. Stephen, speaking to Israel, said, "ye received the law by the dispensation of angels" (Acts vii. 53). The apostle teaches that the law was "ordained by angels in the hand of a Mediator". The awful accompaniments of the giving of the law at Sinai are presently to be compared with the wonderful miracles that were wrought to confirm the testimony of the Lord and the apostles. The word spoken by angels was "stedfast" (bebaios). It is the word used for establishing a promise (Rom. iv. 16); for the hope of the believer which rests upon "an oath for confirmation" (Heb. vi. 16-19); for the establishing of a covenant over the dead body of the appointed victim (Heb. ix. 17); and for the confirmation of the prophetic promise (II Pet. i. 19).

In the verbal form bebaioõ the word occurs again in Heb. ii. 3, "was confirmed". This fact helps us to see the force of the word "stedfast" better. Both the old and new covenants have been miraculously confirmed, and that confirmation added to the degree of the guilt on the part of those who broke the terms. This is brought out in Heb. vi., and again from another standpoint in Heb. x. 28, 29. "Every transgression and disobedience"; the word are nearly synonymous, they indicate a transgression accompanied by stubbornness and rebellion. Let us remember the many examples of those under the old covenant who transgressed or rebelled against the terms of the covenant confirmed by God. Let Moses himself bear witness that his act of transgression caused him to forfeit that land of promise, let all Israel who wandered forty years in the wilderness enforce the same principle, and let Caleb and Joshua also declare that the "recompense of reward" took into account good as well as evil. It is the transgression, however, that is in view for the time being.

"The recompense of reward" (misthapodosia), and "the rewarder" (misthapodotes) are both peculiar to Hebrews. They indicate the idea of the epistle upon which we have again and again insisted, namely, that Hebrews is parallel with Philippians, which speaks of the prize, and of working out our own salvation. "The recompense of the reward" comes as follows, ii. 2, x. 35, xi. 26, where the two sides, the good and the evil, are illustrated. The parenthetical way in which verse 6 comes in chapter xi. indicates that all those witnesses whose overcoming faith is instanced in that remarkable chapter, believed that God was the rewarder of them that diligently seek Him.

Without suggesting that the following is verbally accurate, it will nevertheless set out the argument of the apostle sufficiently for the general reader:--

Hebrews ii. 1-4.

A | a | Warning, lest let slip.
b | Things spoken by angels.
c | Confirmed (bebaios).
B | No escape from just recompense.
B | How escape from similar recompense?
A | a | Warning, if neglect so great salvation.
b | Spoken by the Lord.
c | Confirmed (bebaioõ) in special manner by God.

The argument is resumed in Heb. xii. 25, 26, after a vast ground has been covered:--

> "See that ye refuse not Him that speaketh, for if they ESCAPED not who refused Him that spake on earth, much more shall we not escape, if we turn away from Him that speaketh from heaven, whose voice then shook the earth" (i.e. at Sinai, when the law was given by the disposition of angels).

That there was a tendency on the part of the Jews to think that they would escape is indicated by the question in Rom. ii. 3:--

> "And thinkest thou this, O man, that judgest them which do such things, and doest the same, that thou shalt escape the judgment of God?"

Covenant relationship and privilege notwithstanding, the Jew was in error. There are some believers to-day who so estimate free grace that it may do good to draw attention to these things.

#13. The so great Salvation (Heb. ii. 1-4).
pp. 85 - 89

"How shall we escape, if we neglect so GREAT SALVATION?" What is this salvation, which is so great? None would be found to demur at the designation if it thereby indicated the salvation of the sinner by the blood of Christ. How great that is, none can tell: salvation, as used in Hebrews, however, does not carry with it the evangelical meaning (see pages 20-23). Shall we allow the Hebrew usage to help us? Granting that the word often means individual salvation as in Rom. i. 16, there are other usages which show that the word has a wider meaning.

> Psalm xiv. 7. "Oh that the salvation of Israel were come out of Zion! when the Lord bringeth back the captivity of His people, Jacob shall rejoice and Israel shall be glad."

The national restoration of Israel is here called their salvation.

> Psalm xcviii. 2, 3. "The Lord hath made known His salvation: His righteousness hath He openly showed in the sight of the heathen."

What is this salvation which has been "made known"?

> "He hath remembered His mercy and His truth toward the house of Israel; all the ends of the earth have seen the salvation of God."
>
> Isaiah xi. 11, xii. 1-6. "And it shall come to pass in that day that the Lord shall set His right hand again the second time to recover the remnant of His people…..and in that day thou shalt say, O Lord, I will praise Thee: though Thou wast angry with me, Thine anger is turned away, and Thou comfortest me, behold God is my salvation."
>
> Isaiah lii. 9, 10. "The Lord hath comforted His people, He hath redeemed Jerusalem, the Lord hath made bare His holy arm in the eyes of all nations: and all the ends of the earth shall see the salvation of our God."

The close connection between "salvation" and the restoration of Israel makes comment unnecessary.

> Rev. xix. 1. "Hallelujah; Salvation and glory and honour and power unto the Lord our God: for true and righteous are His judgments."

Here the overthrow of Babylon ushers in the full redemption of Israel.

Just as we saw in The Hope and the Prize that there was something that was beyond the initial salvation from sin, so those who are under the new covenant have to learn that there is some aspect of salvation which is beyond the testimony of the Scriptures just quoted. The "so great salvation" is something that could be neglected, the salvation of the Psalms and Isaiah referred to above is unrelated to human faith or faithfulness.

Now we know that Abraham while dwelling in tents in the land of promise looked for the city which hath foundations, but we do not learn that from the O.T.. There is no hint there of anything of the kind. This special aspect of salvation had its commencement in being spoken by the Lord. Literally the passage reads, "which having received a commencement to be spoken by Lord". The idea is that the Lord Jesus was the first One to give shape and expression to this new aspect of salvation. It may be asked why. In the first case, He was born King and came preaching the Kingdom, and until it became manifest that He would be rejected by His people the "so great salvation" was not prominent. When, however, the signs began to multiply, showing that His ministry would end in rejection, then He spoke more openly of the added glory that should be shared by those who in His day of humiliation shared His rejection.

A hint is given in the distinction made between the treasure which having been found in the field was hidden again, and the one pearl (Matt. xiii.). When the Lord "began" to speak of His own death, He also began to speak of the qualifications of those who should attain the "so great salvation". He speaks of self-denial, of losing one's soul, and finding it when the Lord comes with His angels (Matt. xvi. 21-28). To the young man the Lord said:--

> "If thou wilt be perfect, go and sell that thou hast and give to the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven…..and come follow Me…..he went away sorrowing for he had great possessions…..Peter said unto Him, Behold, we have forsaken all, and followed thee, what shall we have THEREFORE? And Jesus said unto them, Verily I say unto you, that ye which have followed Me, in the regeneration when the Son of man shall sit on the throne of His glory, ye also shall sit upon twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel."

The parable which comes later in the Gospel, that of the Marriage of the King's Son, is a warning to those who "neglect so great salvation"—the very word translated "neglect" in Hebrews being here rendered "to make light of" the invitation. The unwise and unready virgins of Matt. xxv. speak again of the folly of neglect, they neglect the word spoken by the Lord, "Watch therefore", as the others we have seen despised His exhortation to give up now for His sake. The Hebrews on the contrary were commended in that they had taken joyfully the spoiling of their goods, and were urged not to cast away their confidence which had great recompense of reward. Parallel with the "so great salvation" of Hebrews is the "saving of the soul" of Peter. The link is found in Heb. x. 39, where the true rendering is, "believe unto the acquiring of the soul". Acquiring is the rendering of peripoiēsis which occurring but five times in the N.T. will not take long to consult:--

Eph. i. 14.	"Unto the redemption of the PURCHASED POSSESSION."
I Thess. v. 9.	"To OBTAIN salvation."
II Thess. ii. 14.	"To the OBTAINING of the glory."
Heb. x. 39.	"Unto the obtaining or the purchasing of the soul."
I Pet. ii. 9.	"A PURCHASED people" (margin).

The passage in Heb. x. is parallel with Matt. xvi. 24-27. Peter's expression, "the saving of the soul", contains a very different idea from that which is intended in present day gospel preaching. Paul never taught the saving of the soul when writing to the churches, he does when addressing the Hebrews. Peter does when writing to the dispersion. Those to whom Peter addresses his epistle were redeemed (I Pet. i. 18), yet the salvation of their souls was something they could receive as "the end of their faith".

This salvation is ready to be revealed in the last time. Concerning this salvation the prophets spoke and searched what the Spirit testified beforehand, "the sufferings FOR Christ (see R.V.) and the glories that should follow…..the grace to be brought at the revelation of Jesus Christ" (I Pet. i. 5-10). "Rejoice, inasmuch as ye are partakers of Christ's sufferings: that when His glory shall be revealed ye may be glad also with exceeding joy" (iv. 13). "The God of all grace, who hath called us unto His aionian glory by Christ Jesus, after ye have suffered awhile, make you perfect, stablish, strengthen, settle you" (v. 10).

This aionian glory, this share of the glory of the regeneration, this entry into the marriage feast, is all related to suffering, vigilance, not neglecting—or as it is in the Revelation, overcoming. The aionian glory is similar to the aionian salvation of Heb. v. 8, 9, which is closely connected with obedience and suffering. Those who attain this salvation are the church of the firstborn (Heb. xii. 23). To this salvation the apostle addresses himself here, he brings the wilderness wandering in to illustrate the failure to attain the promise, he exhorts to endurance, he gives a list of overcomers, and cites the Lord Jesus Himself in chapters v. and xii. as an example of the overcomer. It is in view of this and the miraculous testimony that was given that Heb. vi. is written, and the solemn conclusion of Heb. xii. is addressed.

The difficulty that many have regard to Heb. vi. will be solved as we realize the nature of the subject and the character of the confirmation. The miracles which were wrought by the apostles are called the "powers of the age to come", and to refuse their testimony was fraught with special danger. In this same context comes the nearest hint of the so great salvation in Abraham's history. Let it be observed what portion of Abraham's history is brought forward. Romans bases its teaching upon the testimony of Gen. xv. "Abram believed God and it was counted unto him for righteousness." The whole argument excludes works. James bases his argument upon the twofold testimony of Gen. xv. and xxii. Hebrews goes at once to Gen. xxii. The epistle to the Hebrews does not speak of imputing righteousness without works, its special theme demands such statement as "they wrought righteousness", and "the righteous shall LIVE by faith", "he obtained witness that he WAS righteous", "he became the heir of the righteousness which is by faith". The passage in Gen. xxii. referred to in Heb. vi. goes beyond justification by faith, as James ii. 22 declares, "thou seest how faith wrought with his works, and by works was faith perfected". After Abraham had passed the supreme trial of faith the words come:--

> "Surely blessing I will bless thee, and multiplying thee, and so after he had patiently endured he obtained the promise."

It was here when Abraham had reached this stage of "perfecting"—the master key of "Hebrews"—that it would seem God revealed to him the "so great salvation", the city which hath foundations.

#14. The Confirmatory Gifts (Heb. ii. 3, 4).
pp. 118 - 122

The great salvation which began to be spoken by the Lord, was as surely confirmed as was the first covenant. It will be remembered that the word "stedfast" in verse 2 is but another grammatical form of the word "confirm". The first covenant was confirmed in many ways, both Moses and those who followed after receiving abundant testimony from God that their ministry was from Him. The second confirmation spoken of is "unto us by them that heard Him". The nature of this confirmation must now be considered.

First we observe that in giving the special blessing to Abraham, as related in Heb. vi., God "interposed with an oath". This is spoken of as "an oath of confirmation" (bebaiõsis). The confirmation of the Lord's words by the apostles is further explained in ii. 4: "God also co-attesting both with signs and wonders and with divers miracles, and distributions of holy spirit, according to His will". "God hath spoken" (i. 1). Whoever the mouthpiece may have been, responsibility to hear follows. Yet an increased responsibility comes with the fact that God hath spoken unto us in the person of the Son. God's "co-attesting" must make each miracle something more than a mere "wonder". As a translation of sunepimartureõ, Dr. Bullinger's concordance gives; "to bear conjoint additional decided witness, to bear further or emphatic witness with".

It may be remembered how repeatedly the apostles are called "witnesses" during the Acts: "ye shall be witnesses unto Me" (Acts i. 8), but notice well what goes before, "but ye shall receive power, after that the Holy Spirit is come upon you: and ye shall be witnesses unto Me". "Ye shall receive" must come before "Ye shall be". Acts i. 22, ii. 32, iii. 15, v. 32, xiii. 31, and xxvi. 16 should be consulted. Notice v. 32, "and we are His witnesses of these things, and so is also the Holy Ghost, whom God hath given to them that obey Him". This is a scriptural exposition of the word "co-attesting". So also Acts xiv. 3: "Long time therefore abode they speaking boldly in the Lord, which gave testimony unto the word of His grace, and granted signs and wonders to be done by their hands". So again Acts xv. 8: "And God…..bare them witness, giving them the Holy Ghost".

Looking at the epistle to the Hebrews we see that God testified to Christ, (1) that He liveth, (2) that He is a Priest for the age after the order of Melchisedec (Heb. vii. 8, 17). The elders were attested, Abel obtained witness that he was righteous, God testifying over his gifts. Enoch received this testimony that he pleased God; and so it was with Noah, Abraham and the rest, "these all having been attested by means of faith" (Heb. xi. 2, 4, 5, 39). In a special manner God co-attested the word of the Lord through the apostles. The closing verses of Mark's Gospel seem to refer to Heb. ii. 3, 4:--

> "And these signs shall follow them that believe; in My name shall they cast out demons; they shall speak with new tongues; they shall take up serpents; and if they drink any deadly thing it shall not hurt them; they shall lay hands on the sick, and they shall recover. So then, after the Lord had spoken unto them, He was received up into heaven, > and sat on the right hand of God, and they went forth, and preached everywhere, the Lord working with them (co-operating), and CONFIRMING the word with SIGNS following."

The parallel with Heb. ii. is too obvious to justify any detailed comparison, but a word with regard to the character of these confirmatory miracles may be of service.

(1) They were "signs following", not mere prodigies, or marvels, but signs, mighty acts that SIGNified something.
(2) They were "the powers of the coming age" (Heb. vi.). Into this present evil age of demonic control comes the power of that age when such influences will be cast out. Into this veritable Babel comes the power of that age with its new tongues; in that age the serpent will no longer tempt and destroy; in that age deadly things shall do no hurt; in that age sickness shall flee away.

As an illustration of the miracles being a "sign", see the healing of the lame man by Peter, and his own application of it to the salvation of the nation (Acts iii., iv.). To the Corinthians, among whom miraculous gifts abounded, the apostle wrote:--

> "In everything ye are enriched by Him, in all utterance, and in all knowledge, even as the testimony (marturion) of Christ was confirmed (bebaioô) in you, so that ye come behind in no gift; waiting for the revelation of our Lord Jesus Christ, who shall confirm (bebaioô) you unto the end" (I Cor. i 5-8).

Here again Heb. ii. 3, 4 is seen, the testimony, the confirmation, the miraculous gifts, all coming together. In II Cor. i. 21 the apostle writes:--

> "Now He that confirms us with you with a view to Christ, and hath anointed us is God."

Here confirmation and anointing come together, the anointing referring to the baptism of the Holy Spirit. The three words, "signs, wonders and miracles" of Heb. ii. 4 are found written of the Lord's own personal work.

> "Jesus of Nazareth, a man approved (publicly attested) of God among you, by miracles, and wonders, and signs, which God did by Him in the midst of you" (Acts ii. 22).

It will be remembered that His ministry was a confirmatory one, "to confirm the promises made unto the fathers" (Rom. xv. 8). So the subsequent signs, wonders and miracles were confirmatory also. Many wonders and signs were done by the apostles (Acts ii. 43), "a notable sign" is what the rulers called the healing of the lame man (Acts iv. 16). This sign of the healing is the Scripture's own testimony (Acts iv. 22). Other passages are iv. 30, v. 12, vi. 8, viii. 6, 10, and xv. 12. It will be observed that "signs and wonders" usually go together. The "wonder" was indeed a "sign", not some prodigy to cause men open-mouthed astonishment. Even the terrible things which usher in the day of the Lord will be of similar character, "I will show WONDERS in heaven above, and SIGNS in the earth beneath" (ii. 19). The word rendered "miracle" in Heb. ii. is as often translated simply "power", e.g., "ye shall receive power" (Acts i. 8), "as though by our own power" (Acts iii. 12, iv. 7, 33, vi. 8, x. 38), the last reference ("how God anointed Jesus of Nazareth with Holy Ghost and with power: Who went about doing good and healing all that were oppressed of the devil, for God was with Him, and we are witnesses of these things") being a commentary upon the meaning of the anointing already noticed in II Cor., the enduement of the apostles in Acts i. 8, and the close connection between this "power" and the "miracle" which was its outflowing.

The scientific mind defines a miracle as the suspension of the laws of nature at the introduction of a higher law. The Scriptural definition seems rather to be that a miracle was the power of the age to come, brought forward as a pledge and a sign. What will be normal in that age of glory appears abnormal and supernatural in this. Added to the signs, wonders and miracles for this special confirmation are "the distributions of holy spirit". This is described as a taste of the good word of God and the powers of the age to come. Those who tasted are described as having become partakers of holy spirit (Heb. vi. 4, 5). Not until the Lord was about to leave His disciples did He say, "Receive ye holy spirit" (John xx. 22). With this read John vii. 39, "this He spake of the spirit, which they that believe on Him should receive: for holy spirit was not yet given, because that Jesus was not yet glorified". I Cor. xii. 8-11 gives a full comment upon the "distributions of holy spirit". These gifts, however diverse, are the working of that one and self same Spirit, dividing to every man severally as He will. These distributions of holy spirit covered the ministry of apostles, prophets, teachers, as well as miracles, gifts of healing, helps, governments, diversities of tongues (I Cor. xii. 28).

Let us notice the explanation of the Scripture as to how the gift of tongues was a sign. In the law it is written:--

> "With men of other tongues and other lips will I speak unto this people; and yet for all that they will not hear Me, saith the Lord, wherefore tongues are for a sign."

What the law prophesied is foreshowed in the possession and exercise of the distributions of holy spirit. When the people to whom the signs applied were removed from the scene, the signs went too. It is often stated, but with no Scriptural proof, that the miraculous gifts possessed by the early Church have been lost because of the worldliness and carnality of the Church. The most carnal Church in Scripture is indicated in I Cor. as the most richly endowed with supernatural gifts. I Cor. xiii. 9-12 indicates a dispensational change, associated with the passing of the gifts, and this is the testimony of the whole of the New Testament.

One word in closing seems necessary. The same words that are used of the mighty works of Christ and His apostles are used of the wicked one, "whose coming is after the working of Satan, with all power, and signs and lying wonders," the only added word being lying. This reveals the awful deception which will be thrust upon the earth in the last days. These miracles constitute the "strong delusion" which shall lead men to believe the lie. The fact that the false prophet will work actual miracles, and the three froglike spirits of demons seen in the Revelation will work miracles, should cause us most carefully to pause before we conclude that the possession of a supernatural power to-day is an evidence of divine approval.

#15. Crowned with Glory and Honour (Heb. ii. 5-9).
pp. 148 – 155

We now commence section B ii. 5-18. "The Son, Man, Seed of Abraham, Lower than angels." Here suffering and death are prominent, and the position of the Lord is "for a little lower than angels". The structure is so manifestly complete, that it will be as well to set it out before considering any further details.

B* | ii. 5-18.

A1 | 5-8-. Not angels.
| a | A little lower than angels.
b | Crowned with glory and honour.
B1 | -8. But now we see not yet.
B1 | 9-. But we see Jesus.
A1 | -9-. Jesus.
| a | A little lower than angels.
b | Crowned with glory and honour.
C | -9, 10. The archēgon (captain).
| c | It became Him.
d | Perfected through sufferings.
A2 | 11-13. All of one, the sanctified, brethren.
B2 | 14. Flesh and blood, took part, destroy death.
B2 | 15, 16. Seed of Abraham, took not angels, deliver fear of death.
A2 | 17-. Made like to brethren.
C | -17, 18. The arhiereus (high priest).
| c | It behoved Him.
d | Suffered being tempted.

"For unto the angels hath He not put in subjection the world to come, concerning which we speak". We have already drawn the reader's attention to the fact that the miracles of the early church were called "the powers of the coming age", and it will be seen that the statement quoted above, following immediately upon the reference to the signs and wonders, emphasizes this the more.

A more remote connection which it is important not to miss is that the "so great salvation" is in fact "the world to come", concerning which, said the apostle, he was speaking. "The world to come" is literally "the habitable (world) about to be". In the original the word "habitable world" is oikumenē. This word has occurred already in Hebrews, being used in i. 6. It is used of the Roman Empire (Luke ii. 1; Acts xxiv. 5). This is in line with secular usage, Polybius and Plutarch using it in this connection. The LXX in a similar manner uses the expression he oikumenē holē ("the whole inhabitable") for the Babylonian Empire (Isa. xiv. 17). Alexander's Empire is called he oikumenē (Ælitan, V.H. iii. 29). This combined testimony makes it appear very probable that the term must not be applied to the whole "world" as we know it, but to that portion which will become the final sphere of Nebuchadnezzar's sovereignty as pictured in the great image of Dan. ii. The word is still further limited in its usage in such a passage as Acts xi. 28, for Josephus speaks of a famine in Judea at that time, and not to one of world-wide extent. The "habitable world about to be" is set forth in Dan. ii. as a stone which struck the image on its feet, and ultimately fills the whole earth.

The word is used three times in the Revelation:--

> "I also will keep thee from the hour of temptation which is about to come on the whole habitable world, to try those who dwell on the earth" (iii. 10).
>
> "Satan, the one who is deceiving the whole habitable world" (xii. 9).
> "Which go forth to the kings of the whole habitable world, to gather them together unto the war of that great day of God Almighty" (xvi. 14).

These kings appear to be those which are connected with the Beast, and are kings of the "civilized" part of the earth. Now what do we learn by thus restricting the meaning of the word oikumenē? Surely this, that the great salvation, which is connected with overcoming and being made perfect, has to do with the initial phase of the future kingdom, when it will be necessary to rule the nations with a rod of iron (see Rev. ii. 26, 27). Parallel also is the blessing of Rev. xx. 4, "they lived and reigned with Christ a thousand years". The wonderful change indicated in Isa. xi. is at first limited to Israel's land:--

> "They shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain, for the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the seas."

Isa. lxv., which repeats part of Isa. xi., links the creation of the new heavens and the new earth with a newly-created Jerusalem. Isa. lx. makes a distinction too:--

> "Arise, shine, for thy light is come, and the glory of the Lord is risen upon thee, for behold, the darkness shall cover the earth, and gross darkness the people: but the Lord shall arise upon THEE, and His glory shall be seen upon THEE, and the Gentiles shall come to THY light, and Kings to the brightness of THY rising."

What redeemed Israel will be in relation to the other nations, those who partake of the "great salvation" will be to the remnant of Israel. Further teaching concerning this word oikunmenē will raise out of chapter iii.

There is, possibly, a glance backward in Heb. ii. 5. If we put a little stress on the "world to come" the question will at once arise whether angels ruled over the world in any period of the past? We believe that Satan is called in Scripture "the prince of this word", "the prince of the power of the air", and "the god of this age". There are others also who are called "the world rulers of this darkness" (Eph. vi. 12). Michael the archangel stands for Israel, and angels carry out Divine commissions right through the Scriptures except during the dispensation of the mystery. There is evidence of an inductive character which makes one feel that angels had much to do with this world before man and the creation associated with him. Be this as it may, angels are not the appointed rulers of the world to come:--

> "But one in a certain place hath testified, saying, What is man, that thou art mindful of him, or the son of man, that thou visitest him?"

There is a strangeness in the manner of the apostle's reference. Why did he not say, "DAVID, in the eighth Psalm", or "as it is written in the eighth Psalm", or "as it is written in the book of the Psalms", or even "as the Scripture testifieth"? If we turn back to chapter i. we shall find similar vagueness: verse 5 simply says, "for unto which of the angels", etc.; verse 6 and 7 simply have "He saith". Right through these verses, which are composed mainly of quotations, there is not a single reference to chapter, verse, or book. In chapter ii. 12 the only word used is "saying", in verse 13 "and again". At last in chapter iii. 7 we have a reference to Scripture, and the speaker is mentioned by name. Quoting from Psa. xcv. the writer says, "wherefore AS THE HOLY GHOST saith". When this same Psalm is quoted again (in iv. 7), then the apostle says, "saying by David". The reason is that by then his special object had been attained. "GOD hath spoken" (i. 1), "the LORD hath spoken" (ii. 3); all other names, such as David and Moses, or Psalms and Law, are but the "sundry times and divers manners". The important thing is that these quotations are from the Word of God.

In the second place, of course, the apostle was writing to those who were very familiar with the Scriptures, and who would not need continual reference to chapter and verse for their guidance. Had he been writing to Gentiles only recently brought to the knowledge of the Word, he would doubtless have followed the mode of reference found in Romans.

> "Thou madest Him a little lower than the angels: thou crownedst Him with glory and honour and didst set Him over the works of Thy hands, Thou hast put all things in subjection under His feet" (ii. 7, 8).

The apostle does not refer to every particular in his quotation, but centers his exposition upon three features. His first item is the subjection of all things under the feet of the Son of man.

(a) As to its universality.
(b) As to its fulfillment.

(a) Its universality:--

> "For in that He put all things in subjection under Him, He left nothing that is not put under Him" (ii. 8).

How similar this mode of reasoning is to that in I Cor. xv. 27!:--

> "But when He saith, all things are put under Him, it is manifest that He is excepted which did put all things under Him."

Its universality in the one case is proved by the word "all" which leaves "nothing" that is not put under Him; its universality in the other case is proved by one obvious exception—God Himself. All, whether principality, or power, heavenly, earthly or subterranean, all must be subjected unto Him.

In I Cor. xv. the "all" includes enemies, which are to be "destroyed". This fact will prevent us from reasoning that since all are to be subject beneath his feet, all must necessarily be saved. In I Cor. xv. death as the last enemy is to be destroyed; in Heb. ii. the devil, the holder of the power of death, is to be destroyed, so the parallel is completed. Before passing to the second feature of this Psalm the apostle makes another observation upon the subjection of all things:--

> "But now we see not yet all things put under Him."

This constituted a real difficulty. The Messiah had come, but the long promised kingdom had not yet been set up. Peter confesses that the subject was accompanied by difficulties, but he certainly did not endorse the words of the scoffers who said, "Where is the promise of His coming?" The Lord was not slack concerning His promise, but the writings of Paul, in which were things hard to be understood, contained the explanation of this apparent delay, while, so far as the dispensational position of the "Hebrews" is concerned, it was true, "but now we see not yet all things put under Him". The dispensational view-point of the Mystery put things in a different light. At the very same time that the apostle could say Heb. ii. 8, he could personally be rejoicing in Eph. i. 22, 23:--

> "And hath put all things under His feet, and gave Him to be the head over all things to the Church which is His Body."

Universal headship has not yet been taken by the Lord, but headship over all things to the Church is His position now. What He will be universally, He is now in mystery. What He will be in heaven and in earth is anticipated now in the super-heavenlies. We however are dealing with Hebrews, not Ephesians, and the point of view there is "we see not". Not until the seventh angel sounds shall the mystery of God be consummated in the universal sovereignty of the Lord Jesus Christ.

The second feature of Psalm viii. is the reference to man being made a little lower than the angels. Psa. viii. looks back to Adam and forward to Christ. Rom. v. 14 supplies the link:--

> "Adam…..who is the figure of Him that was to come."

and I Cor. xv. 45-47 supplements:--

> "The first man Adam was made a living soul, the last Adam a life-giving Spirit. The first man is of the earth earthy, the second man is the Lord from heaven."

Psa. viii. looks at the first and second man. Viewing Adam in his frailty and fall the Psalmist says, "What is man that Thou art mindful of him?" Viewing man in the person of the Lord from heaven he sees the crown of glory and honour placed upon One who will never fail or forfeit. The apostle's eye is not fixed upon frailty and forfeiture, but upon honour and glory—"but we see Jesus", "consider the apostle and High Priest of our profession" he writes; rather than Moses and Aaron (iii.), "look off unto Jesus"; rather than the cloud of witnesses enumerated in chapter xi., consider the end of the conversation of those who have spoken unto you the word of God—"Jesus Christ, the same yesterday, and to-day, and unto the age" (xiii.).

1. We see Jesus, who was made a little lower than the angels.
2. We see Jesus, crowned with glory and honour.

Both the A.V. and the R.V. read, "a little lower than the angels", and place in the margin, "a little while inferior to", "for a little while lower". The element of time does not enter into Heb. i. 4. There is shown the superior dignity of the Son in virtue of His inherited name. This influences the interpretation of Heb. ii. He who now is infinitely above angels achieved that glory by humbling Himself, suffering and dying. It is as important to the right understanding of the crown of glory and honour that we see the depth of the Lord's humiliation, as it is to the right understanding of His excellent glory that we realize His position at the right hand of God. In both cases angels are taken as the standard of comparison, for their position remains unchanged, whereas man fallen in Adam will be exalted in Christ, and so cannot be so easily compared.

The Psalmist does not glory in the exalted position of man. He does not bid us look at his excellency—only just a little lower than angels—he rather considers man's low estate, saying, as he looks abroad upon the creation, "What is man, that Thou art mindful of him?" The humiliation of the Lord was for a purpose:--

> "Forasmuch then as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, He also Himself likewise took part of the same that through death He might destroy him that hath the power of death, that is the devil…..for verily He took not upon Him the nature of angels" (ii. 14-16).

The argument is parallel, and is the apostle's own expansion. This we can readily follow by referring to the structure. In both cases it leads to Christ, either as the archēgon or the archiereus, and in both capacities He is set forth as One who has suffered. Phil. i. 6-13 is a passage to which all readers should prayerfully refer.

With what does the apostle link the words "for the suffering of death"? Does he intend us to understand that the Lord was made a little lower than the angels that He might suffer death? or does He intend us to understand that Christ was crowned with glory and honour because of the suffering of death? If we read it as meaning that Christ was crowned with glory as a result of His death, we shall have a difficulty in the conclusion of verse 9, "that by the grace of God He should taste death for every man"; He was not exalted to taste death, but was humbled. The grammar of the apostle's phrase seems to lead to the following as the meaning:--

> "But we see Jesus crowned with glory and honour, who was made a little lower than the angels for the suffering of death, that so He by the grace of God, might taste death for every man."

With this agrees Heb. x. 5:--

> "Wherefore when He cometh into the world He saith, Sacrifice and offering Thou wouldest not, but a body hast Thou prepared Me."

While this translation appears to conform to the requirement of grammar, we cannot help feeling how fully the alternative rendering fits the theme of the epistle.

Phil. ii. 8, 9 links the death of the cross with the glorious exaltation, and with the name above every name, which immediately attracts attention to Heb. i. 4. Heb. xii. 2 also links the suffering and cross very definitely with the exaltation at the right hand of the throne of God. The whole driving thought of the epistle is that endurance now is necessary to obtain that aionian glory and that so great salvation. By transposing the order of the words and placing the reference to the glory immediately after the reference to Jesus we may be more grammatical, but we have nevertheless taken a liberty with the way in which the apostle by Divine guidance arranged his sentence, and have robbed ourselves of the very ambiguity he intended. Why not leave the words as they are, and allow both the meanings their force?

The Lord did not take hold of angels, He took hold on the seed of Abraham. He was made flesh and received a body that thereby He might suffer the death of the cross. By that very act of humiliation, however, He intended a more excellent name than the angels, beneath whose dignity and nature He had voluntarily stooped, and therefore by reason of the suffering of death we see Jesus crowned with glory and honour.

The remainder of verse 9 we leave for another article.

#16. The Tasting of Death, and its relation to the theme of the Epistle (Heb. ii. 9).

pp. 180 - 184

Before we turn our attention to the last clause of verse 9 a further word seems necessary with regard to the glory and honour with which the Lord Jesus was crowned. Apropos of this we quote from a note sent to us from Rev. Geo. Parker, of Honan, China:--

> "You have not attempted sub-grouping of sevenfold ascription (Rev. v. 12), nor did Roe in 1834. I suggest:--
>
> Power.
> Riches. \ Solomon.—King.
> Wisdom. / > Strength.
> Honour. \
> Glory. / Aaron.—Priest.
> Blessing.
> The second pair, honour and glory, gives the clue."

When these kingly and priestly functions are united we have no longer Solomon and Aaron but the King-Priest of the Apocalypse, the Priest after the order of Melchisedec. The crowning with glory and honour (Heb. ii. 9) is the consecration of Christ as the Priest after the order of Melchisedec. "And no man taketh this HONOUR unto himself…..so also Christ GLORIFIED not Himself" (v. 4, 5). We shall find an allusion to this position in iii. 3: "for this man was counted worthy of more GLORY than Moses, inasmuch as He who hath builded the house hath more HONOUR than the house". Thus we find Christ superior in honour and glory to both Moses and Aaron, and when we see Him crowned with honour and glory we are indeed considering Him Who is the apostle (Moses) and high priest (Aaron) of our profession.

It will be remembered that immediately following the revelation of the Lord's approaching sufferings (Matt. xvi.) comes the transfiguration (Matt. xvii.). In order to have "an entrance ministered richly into the aionian kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ", the apostle Peter bids the believers of the dispersion remember the transfiguration:--

> "For we have not followed cunningly devised fables when we made known unto you the power and coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, but were eye-witnesses of His greatness, for He received from God the Father HONOUR and GLORY" (II Pet. i. 16, 17).

We pointed out in Article No. 13 that the "so great salvation" of which the Lord began to speak commences with His rejection, and is related more closely to the testimony of the second half of Matthew's gospel than to that of the first. Those disciples who saw the rejection of the King (Matt. xii., xiii.) could say after the transfiguration, "We see not yet all things put under Him, but we see Jesus…..crowned with glory and honour".

We now turn our attention to the close of verse 9, "that He by the grace of God should taste death for every man". How are we to understand the expression "taste death"? Is it merely a synonym for death itself? Some say so, but we are afraid of this interpretation of so many expressions as synonyms. We feel that there must be a clear reason why this word is used here, and therefore we turn to the Scriptures for light upon its meaning.

The word is translated in the A.V. "eat" three times, and "taste" twelve times. We shall never plumb the profoundest depths of the Scriptures "unto perfection", but we shall never find the Scriptures lapsing into the slightest approach to error or slovenly usage of language. That Homer may nod is proverbial, that the Scriptures are infallible is one of the first articles of faith. It is also the impression consistently gained by continued searching. We are not at all surprised therefore in the case of such divinely-arranged words to find that the first occurrence of the expression "taste of death" takes us back to the close of Matt. xvi., immediately before the record of the transfiguration (Matt. xvi. 28). Parallel with this are Mark ix. 1 and Luke ix. 27. There is one feature common to all these passages: immediately before the reference is the statement concerning losing the soul for Christ's sake, and immediately after it comes the transfiguration. Now Peter's epistles have as their theme present suffering followed by future glory: This is the lesson also of Matt. xvi., xvii.

To John viii. 52 we need not refer, for the Lord said "see death" (verse 51) and we are not certain enough of those children of the devil (verse 44) to follow them here. That to "taste" does not mean to "drink" Matt. xxviii. 34 shows and thus in the figurative sense also to taste of death need not necessarily mean to die. When the ruler of the feast "tasted" the water that was made wine, he certainly did not drink the whole six pots (John ii. 9)! and when the Lord said "none of those men which were bidden shall taste of my supper", it is equivalent to the more modern colloquial phrase, "they shall not have a bit of it". When Peter became hungry and would have "tasted" he wanted a very little, not a full meal (Acts x. 10). Again, the phrase in Acts xx. 11 does not indicate what we call a meal. The curse under which the enemies of Paul bound themselves was not that they would not eat, but that they would not even taste food, so great was their enmity. Those who during this present evil age experienced in any measure the powers of the age to come are said to have "tasted" of the heavenly gift, and to have "tasted" the good word of God (Heb. vi. 4, 5). They "sampled" these things, but it will be true of them, as of the Queen of Sheba, that "the half has not yet been told". I Pet. ii. 3, 4 is quite in line with the rest. The new born babes, though feeding on the milk of the word, have but "tasted" that the Lord is gracious. As they grow thereby and feed upon the stronger food, they will realize that blessed truth more. Every passage we have referred to leads us to draw distinctions between tasting and fully eating. Coming back to Matt. xvi. let us notice how this helps us:--

> "Verily I say unto you, there be some standing here who shall not taste of death till they see the Son of man coming in His Kingdom."

It is a difficulty with many that these men died before the Lord's return. Now apart from all other factors in the true explanation, this difficulty is a fallacy. The Lord did not say "shall not die", but shall not taste of death, and he refers to what He had just been teaching them:--

> "If any man will come after Me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross and follow Me, for whosoever will save his soul shall lose it, and whosoever shall lose his soul for my sake shall find it."

This is surely "tasting" death. To take up the cross and to lose one's soul—this, though not actual death, is tasting death. The disciples however were not permitted to suffer anything for their Lord until they had first of all seen the vision of His glory so closely connected with His decease which He was about to accomplish at Jerusalem (Luke ix. 31). This word "decease" impressed Peter, for he uses the very same word immediately before he speaks of the transfiguration in his second epistle. This time it was his own decease, but the link is there and visible. That bitter sorrow of soul "even unto death" experienced by the Lord in the garden of Gethsemane reveals the awful character of the taste of death to which Heb. ii. 9 refers, while the words "nevertheless, not as I will, but as Thou wilt" link it with Heb. v. 4-10. Who were they that were chosen to be near the Lord in this dread hour? The very three who witnessed the foreshadowing of His glory on the mount of transfiguration. When the Lord tasted that bitter cup, He prayed:--

> "O my Father, if this cup may not pass away from Me, except I drink it, Thy will be done" (Matt. xxvi. 42).

As we stand upon this holy ground and witness that agony and bloody sweat, we see the Lord Jesus tasting death. How pointed therefore the words are to those who are exhorted to follow Him in this path of suffering when they are told, "He Himself hath suffered being tempted, He is able to succour them that are tempted". Temptation hung over that garden of Gethsemane, as is seen by the Lord's words to His disciples. "Watch and pray that ye enter not into temptation." The garden of Gethsemane is no sentimental idea foisted upon Heb. ii. 9. This is seen by Heb. v. 7:--

> "Who in the days of His flesh, when He had offered up prayers and supplications with strong crying and tears unto Him who was able to save Him from death, and was heard in that He feared, though He was a Son, yet learned He obedience by the things which He suffered, and being made perfect, He became the author of aionian salvation unto all them that obey Him."

How fully this agrees with Heb. ii. 9, 10. We have only to read on to verse 10 to complete the parallel:--

> "For it became Him, for whom are all things and by whom are all things, in bringing many sons unto glory, to make the Captain of their salvation perfect through sufferings."

His sufferings therefore in this context are viewed as having an effect upon Himself, which is a thought distinct from that of Christ dying for the ungodly.

One more point we must notice: the words "for every man" are literally "on behalf of all". There are some who take the word "all" in a universal sense, but we must remember that the word is always limited by the context. Salvation from sin is not in view, suffering in view of glory is the theme, and the word "all" refers here to the "many sons" who are being led along the pathway of the fellowship of His sufferings to the glory that shall be revealed.

We trust that those who have read the articles on The Hope and the Prize will remember to notice the many parallels which Hebrews bears with Phil. ii. and iii. While we must not confuse the two sets of teaching, much light will be received if we remember that, although on differing planes, the ways of God with His people are actuated by similar principles, and all find their cause and goal in the same blessed Son of God.

Lessons for Little Ones.

#6. Redemption.
pp. 26, 27

We have seen from Rom. v. that to be in the line of Adam involves us in sin, condemnation and death, and that to be in the line of Christ brings us into righteousness and life.

REDEMPTION.—In Romans v. will be noticed the recurrence of the words, "free gift", "grace", righteousness". How are these blessings made ours? Are any righteous in themselves? (see Rom. iii. 10). Can any make himself righteous by his own efforts? (see iii. 20). How then can this righteousness be ours?

> "But now, the righteousness of God without the law is manifested…..even the righteousness of God which is by faith of Jesus Christ, unto all that believe: for there is no difference: for all have sinned and come short of the glory of God, being justified (accounted righteous) freely (as a gift) by His grace through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus" (iii. 21-24).

Here we see that without works (Rom. iv. 4) and so by grace, righteousness is made ours as a free gift THROUGH REDEMPTION. What that redemption is the next verse goes on to explain:--

> "Whom God hath set forth to be a propitiation (a mercy seat) through faith in His blood."

The Passover (Exod. xii.) will illustrate this: note verse 7, the blood sprinkled; the blood a token or sign; the blood saves (13). Lev. xvii. 11 shows that the "blood is the life", and so when the Lord Jesus shed His blood He gave His life to pay the price of redemption. Rom. v. 9 speaks of being justified by His blood, Eph. i. 7 says we "have redemption through His blood", Heb. ix. 14 shows that the blood of Christ cleanses the conscience, I Pet. i. 18, 19 tells us that we were not redeemed with corruptible things like silver and gold, "but with the precious blood of Christ, as a Lamb without blemish and without spot", I John i. 7 says, "the blood of Jesus Christ, His Son, cleanses us from all sin". Reading on in Rom. iii. 25, 26 we find that by reason of the redemption of the Lord Jesus God declares His righteousness, not merely kindness for the remission of the sins of the past and of the present. We may not therefore that

R	edemption brings emission of sins, and ighteousness.

How this becomes ours we shall see in our lesson. Read through together the story of the Passover, drawing out the gospel lesson in all its fullness; consider as many types of redemption by blood as the child can appreciate: the book of Leviticus will supply many; do not forget Isa. liii. Learn John x. 1-8.

#7. Faith.
pp. 47, 48

We found that the wonderful transfer from Adam to Christ, with the change of condemnation and death for righteousness and life, was "through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus" (Lessons Nos. 5 and 6). One thing more must be added to make the lesson complete. The gift of righteousness is said to be "unto all that BELIEVE". The offering of Christ becomes a mercy-seat "through FAITH in His blood"; and God is called "the Justifier of him that BELIEVETH in Jesus" (Rom. iii. 22-26). As a conclusion, the apostle again makes a clear division between works (or the idea of trying to earn salvation), and faith (or the idea of receiving a free gift in grace):--

> "Where is boasting then? It is excluded (locked out). By what law? Of works? Nay, but by the law of FAITH. Therefore we conclude that a man is justified by FAITH without the deeds of the law" (Rom. iii. 27, 28).

We said just now that "believing" was like "receiving a free gift in grace". This is the thought in John i. 12:--

> "As many as received Him, to them gave He power to become the sons of God, even to them that believe on His name."

All were by nature sons of Adam; faith gives the authority for this marvelous change. That well-known verse (John iii. 16), shows the exchange again very clearly:--

> "For God so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have everlasting life."

Believing makes the change from perishing to life. Perishing is Adam's legacy; life is the gift of God.

> "The wages of sin is death, but the gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord."

Again, the Lord Jesus said:--

> "Verily, verily, I say unto you, He that heareth My word, and believeth on Him that sent Me, hath everlasting life, and shall not come into condemnation but is PASSED FROM DEATH UNTO LIFE" (John v. 24).

Here again the transfer is connected with "believing", and this time also with "hearing" the Word. Verse 25 says, "they that hear shall live".

Go through the Gospel of John, and make a collection of the texts that speak of "believing". Then note the two ends again, viz., "perish", "everlasting life". Note also what is behind "His name", viz., "Him that sent Me", etc.

Learn John i. 1-13. Read together Rom. i. 1-18.

#8. Gospel.
pp. 78 - 80

We saw in our last lesson that faith receives the gift of God. This is good news to those who are sinners and under condemnation. They cannot work for their salvation; they are not asked so to do any more, for the law has given place to the gospel, which simply means "God's good news".

The same epistle which has told us so clearly about the blessings of the gospel, tells us about the gospel itself. "The gospel of God…..concerning His Son". The first part of the gospel, or God's good news, is about the Lord Jesus Christ Himself. He is the Saviour, and to hear of Him and His love and sacrifice is to hear "God's good news". The apostle especially points us to the Lord Jesus as the risen One, here "declared to be the Son of God with power…..by the resurrection" (Rom. i. 1-4). So full was this "good news" concerning the One who died and rose again, that Paul said that he was willing to preach it to all sorts and conditions of men. Some may have been better educated than others, some may have had more civilized conditions than others, but all were in the line of Adam, and so were "perishing", and had not "passed from death unto life", for they had not believed the gospel. This "good news" of God was powerful in its effect. It came with the power of God, and "they that hear shall live". "For I am not ashamed of the gospel of Christ; for it is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth".

The gospel is divided into two parts. The first half has to do with God, the second half with us. We have already looked at John iii. 16; let us look at it again so that this lesson may be impressed upon us.

Write down the capital letters G.O.S.P.E.L., but place them the one under the other as shewn below. We will call the first three God's half of the gospel, and the second three our half. Now we will start reading John iii. 16 and when we come to a word that begins with either of these six letters we will put it down so:--

	/	GOD so loved the world that He gave His
GOD	{	ONLY begotten
	\	SON, that whosoever believeth in Him should not
	/	PERISH, but have
US	{	EVERLASTING
	\	LIFE.

The first half of the gospel starts with God and tells of His great love to a world of sinners; a love so great that He gave His only begotten Son. The second half shows that by simply believing in the Son of God, the believer is taken out of the line of death, and put into line of life.

Learn Rom. i. 16-18. Read John iii. 14-21. Collect the various sets of "God's good news", e.g., "The gospel of the kingdom", "The gospel of the grace of God". Note any peculiarities.

Emphasize, as much as may be necessary, that the gospel begins with God as concerning His Son, and is preached as a completed message to us.

#9. The Glory of God.
pp. 95, 96

We have been looking at a few of the subjects connected with God's great purpose in man's salvation, and we shall find that the title of our lesson this month is very comprehensive: we shall limit our study at the first to the Epistle to the Romans.

MAN'S FAILURE.—"When they knew God, they glorified Him not as God, neither were thankful…..and changed the glory of the incorruptible God into an image made like to corruptible man" (i. 21-23). This section of Romans (i. 19 - ii. 1) is a black page of human history, it shows that although God, by means of the creation, on every hand manifested "that which may be known of God", man turned his back on the Creator and worshipped the creature (25); such was the state of the Gentile world when Paul wrote this epistle. In chapter ii. 17-29 the apostle turns to the Jew, and shows that even though the Jew had "the oracles of God" (iii. 2), which taught them so much more fully than the works of creation could, yet of them the apostle had to say, "the name of God is blasphemed among the Gentiles through you" (ii. 29). So then both Jew and Gentile have failed. This brings us to the apostle's summary given in Rom. iii. 23.

> JEW AND GENTILE.—"There is no difference, for all have sinned and come short of the glory of God."

This passage (iii. 21 – v. 11) sets aside the possibility of salvation for Gentile or for Jew by his own efforts under law, and reveals the way of salvation to be by faith in the finished work of the Lord Jesus Christ. Chapter v. opens with the conclusion to which this blessed truth leads, peace with God, access into grace, rejoicing in hope of the glory of God based upon the fact of being justified.

THE BELIEVER'S HOPE.—What fallen man, whether Jew or Gentile, failed to reach the believer may now look forward to. As an unsaved sinner he had "come short of the glory of God", but as a justified believer he may "rejoice in hope of the glory of God". If there is "no difference" with regard to their salvation ("for the same Lord over all is rich unto all that call upon Him, for whosoever shall call upon the name of the Lord shall be saved," x. 12, 13), this brings us to the next quotation, "wherefore receive ye one another, as Christ also received US to the glory of God" (xv. 7). This is connected with verse 6, "with one mind and one mouth glorify God".

Chapters xiv. - xvi. 7 are occupied with the practical application of "no difference". The chapter opens with the words, "him that is weak in the faith RECEIVE YE": even though some have scruples about certain ceremonial observances, receive them, for the strong and the weak differ nothing in this respect—that they were originally, whether Jew or Gentile, coming short of the glory of God. In chapter xv. 1-7 the apostle is seeking to prevent the Jewish believer and the Gentile believer from making a "difference" between each other. Christ had received them both, and had saved them both; let them now with one mind and one mouth glorify God.

The universality of sin, the free grace of salvation, and the lowly spirit of the redeemed, can be made clear from these passages. Rom. x. 1-13 may be learned, and other references to the "glory of God" in the Scriptures collected, and their contexts noted.

"Do all to the glory of God."

#10. New Life (John iii. 1-13).
pp. 159, 160

It will be necessary, as the little learner grows in grace and in years, to draw attention to the rightly-divided Word, and some of the items of John iii. will then be seen to apply primarily to others than the church of the one body. There are some doctrines that are true for all time, whether to Jew, Gentile, or church of God, and one of them is the supreme necessity of new life. If every Christian, of whatever denomination, really grasped the simple fact that the church is LIVING and the world is DEAD, the awful mixture and dangerous drift to-day could not be tolerated.

In John iii. 1-13 we read how a ruler of the Jews came to the Lord Jesus and began to speak concerning the Lord, viz., (1) being a teacher, (2) being sent from God, (3) being attested by miracles, and (4) being one of whom it could be said "God was with Him". Each one of these four statements is perfectly true, yet neither was the truth of Nicodemus at the time. The Lord's answer shows us that Nicodemus was without life. "Except a man be born again, he cannot see the Kingdom of God." The word "born" is better rendered "begotten", and "again" is better rendered "from above". In the spiritual sense Nicodemus was without life, sight or father; all three were his upon re-birth. We must remember that this re-birth does not mean starting all over again as a little baby and growing up all over again, this time avoiding the errors of the previous life. No, it is a new kind of life that is here given. This will be seen first by the Lord's own words to Nicodemus, where He corrects the idea of making a new start: "That which hath been born of the flesh is flesh". Notice the words "hath been", "is". There is never any possibility of change. That which hath been born of the flesh never changes into spirit, "that which hath been born of the spirit is spirit". We have a saying, "like father, like son". The flesh can never produce anything but that which is fleshly, and the mind of the flesh is enmity with God, "it is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be: so then they that are in the flesh cannot please God" (Rom. viii. 7, 8). This new life is connected with the Word (I Pet. i. 23).

It is spoken of as a new creature in II Cor. v. 17.
It is connected with the death of Christ in John iii. 14.
It is also connected with His resurrection in Rom. vi. 4.
It is life unto God (Rom. vi. 10).

How do we receive this blessing? There are two verses in John iii. which use the word "must", which will point the way: "ye must be born again", "as Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of Man be lifted up: that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have eternal life".

A passage to learn might be I John v. 1-13; such passages as II Cor. v. 14-21, Rom. vi., Ezek. xxxvii., might be read with the child.

Do all that you can to make it clear that, as in the case of Nicodemus, life must come before recognition of the Lord as a teacher sent from God, or as a pattern for us to follow.

#11. Three tests for the true gospel (Rom. i.).
pp. 189 - 191

The word gospel, as you probably know, is "a good message", or "good tidings". To believe the gospel means salvation, life and peace (find Scripture to substantiate this); to reject the gospel means death; it is important therefore that the "good tidings" we believe should be really "good", and really "true".

The apostle Paul speaks of the possibility that some would preach "another gospel", and even preach "another Jesus" (find passages—this is intended to teach in the use and appreciation of the Concordance). We believe the opening verses of the epistle to the Romans will provide us with three tests which the true gospel will stand, but which a false gospel will not endure.

1. THE TRUE GOSPEL IS "THE GOSPEL OF GOD" (Rom. i. 1).—God is the author, the One who planned it, the One who provided all things necessary for its success. The true gospel always places God first, the false gospel will place man, his works, his prayers, his desires in a prominent position. The true gospel tells us that GOD so loved the world, that this love is seen by the fact that GOD spared not His only Son. The righteousness revealed in the gospel (Rom. i. 17) is the righteousness of GOD, not of man, the power of the gospel is the power of GOD, not of meetings or promises or prayers: many other items of a similar character should be traced out under this heading.

2. THE TRUE GOSPEL IS IN HARMONY WITH GOD'S WORD.—"Which He had promised afore by His prophets in the HOLY SCRIPTURES" (Rom. i. 2). In Eph. i. the "gospel of salvation" is called the "word of truth"; in I Pet. i. 25 we read "the word of the Lord endureth for ever, and this is the word which by the GOSPEL is preached unto you"; from a child Timothy knew the "holy Scriptures, which are able to make wise unto salvation, through faith which is in Christ Jesus" (II Tim. iii. 15); "faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the word of God" (Rom. x. 17). Further testimony under this head should be collected.

While it is of the first importance to know that the gospel preached is the gospel of GOD, it is surely of the next moment to know that there is an infallible test for this—does it agree with GOD'S WORD? A book recently published by a D.D. says, speaking of natural man:--

> "Deep, hidden, silent, yet unceasing, that river of goodness flows on eternally in the heart of man."

Test this statement by reading Rom. iii. and let the child come to a conclusion as to whether this is a part of the gospel of God, or whether it is "another gospel".

3. THE GOSPEL OF GOD IS CONCERNING HIS SON (Rom. i. 3, 4).—"The spirit of prophecy is the testimony of Jesus" (Rev. xix. 10). As the body without the spirit is dead, so would be the Bible without Christ, and so must be the gospel. The true gospel preaches Christ. Philip in Acts (find the passage) is said in two brief narratives to have preached Christ, and from the prophet Isaiah to have preached Jesus. A closer examination of Rom. i. 3, 4 will show that the preaching of Christ, if it is to constitute a complete gospel, will be concerned with:--

(1) Christ as Son of man according to the flesh, and
(2) Christ as "Son of God with power" according to the spirit, and this in RESURRECTION.

To preach "Jesus of Nazareth, a man approved of God by mighty works" is only a partial gospel, and really no gospel at all. To preach that "Christ died for our sins according to the Scriptures" is but a portion, a foundation, but not a liberating, saving gospel. We must include Christ RISEN. This gives us a full gospel, this provides the power, the life, the hope.

Search these things out, remember the three tests:--GOD, HIS WORD, HIS SON. Learn Rom. i. 1-3. Read the sermons recorded in the Acts.

The Miracles.

#1. Introduction.
pp. 9 - 11

In earlier numbers of The Berean Expositor we had a series of articles dealing with THE PARABLES of Matthew, and while they touched upon Scriptures which were familiar to all readers, some aspects of their teaching, particularly their dispensational aspect, were set out and proved, we believe, of help to those who were just beginning to become acquainted with the right division of the Word.

The present series on THE MIRACLES is intended as a supplement to The Parables, for both parable and miracle formed a part of one definite witness. While these studies are intended to be somewhat elementary in character, we believe that the most advanced student will not fail to find that study profitable which has as its central figure the Lord of glory, acting as the sent One of God on earth.

It may be as well here if we notice the scriptural words and expressions used for miracles in the New Testament:-- DUNAMIS.—An act of power. The English dynamo, dynamite and dynamics have power as their dominant note.

SEMEION.—A sign. Used chiefly by John.
TERAS.—A wonder, a prodigy, something which strikes terror. John iv. 48 and Acts ii. 22 are the only references to Christ, the remaining fourteen occurrences are used of false christs, the Apostles, and Moses.
ERGON.—A work. The miracles are spoken of as the work of God, good works, and works which none other man did.
EUDOXIA.—Glorious things (Luke xiii. 17).
PARADOXIA.—Strange things (Luke v. 26).
THAUMASIA.—Wonderful things (Matt. xxi. 15).

Many of the miracles of Christ were miracles of healing. Never did He work a miracle of judgment upon a son of man. The withered fig-tree and the destruction of the herd of swine are the nearest approaches to miracles of judgment, but in neither case did they touch a human being. On the contrary, the blind receive their sight, the dumb speak, the deaf hear, lepers are cleansed, and infirmities are cured. Even the dead are brought back to life again, thousands are fed with a few loaves and fishes, and the marriage at Cana is graced by His miraculous provision. The winds and waves obey the voice of the Lord, the fish of the sea yield themselves to the net, or to pay the tribute at His command; demons and evil spirits are cast out, and the possessed set free. On two occasions the Lord passed through a crowd unseen.

The first record of miracles in the gospels is that of Matt. iv. 23, 24:--

> "And Jesus went about all Galilee, > TEACHING in their synagogues, and
> PREACHING the gospel of the kingdom, and > HEALING all manner of sickness, and all manner of disease among the people, and His fame went throughout Syria, and they brought unto Him all sick people that were taken with divers diseases and torments, and those which were possessed with demons, and those which were lunatick, and those that had the palsy;
> AND HE HEALED THEM."

The result of these mighty works was that:--

> "there followed Him great multitudes of people from Galilee, and from Decapolis, and from Jerusalem, and from Judea, and from beyond Jordan."

A glance at the map shows that thus early in the Lord's ministry His mighty works were known throughout the length and breadth of the land. It is important to observe the setting in which these miracles were wrought. The miracles were not mere exhibitions of power, neither were they performed to strike terror into the observers, for they were all of one character, viz., miracles of healing, and attracted followers from all parts of the country. The miracles formed a supplement to TEACHING and PREACHING. The last reference to miracles in the Gospel narratives says the same thing, "and they went forth and PREACHED everywhere, the Lord WORKING with them, and confirming the WORD with signs following" (Mark xvi. 20). Again, in Matt. x., we find the same connection, "As ye go, PREACH, saying, The kingdom of heaven is at hand, heal the sick, cleanse the lepers, raise the dead, cast out demons". Yet again the necessary association of preaching and miracles is implied in Matt. xi., "He departed thence to TEACH and to PREACH in their cities. Now when John had heard in prison the WORKS of Christ". The object (or at least a prominent object) with which the miracles were wrought is given in Matt. xi. 20, "then began He to upbraid the cities wherein most of His mighty works were done, because they repented not". The close connection between the miracles and the testimony is also indicated in Matt. xiii. 58, "He did not many mighty works there because of their unbelief". Matt. ix. 35 presents a practical repetition of Matt. iv. 23, as the reader can observe, and should be read in connection with the commission of Matt. x.

One of the characteristic accompaniments of the preaching of the gospel of the kingdom was the presence of miracles. One of the characteristic features of the preaching of the mystery is the absence of miracles. We might notice the extent of the miraculous healing given in Matt. iv. 23, 24, "healing all manner of sickness and all manner of disease"; "all sick people that were taken with divers diseases, and torments, and those which were possessed with demons, and those who were lunatick, and those who had the palsy, and He healed them ALL". The details are given more fully as the narrative advances, and when we see the complete list of the mighty works that are recorded in the Gospels we shall begin to realize what a confirmation is given to His ministry; and when we add to that the testimony of John xxi. 25, "there are also many other things which Jesus DID, the which, if they should be written every one, I suppose that even the world itself could not contain the books that should be written", the confirmation of His Messiahship must have been overwhelming. Yet they crucified Him! Yet they repented not! What a testimony then to the nature of the human heart.

#2. The Leper, the Centurion's Servant, and Peter's Wife's Mother (Matt. viii. 1 - 15).

pp. 42 - 46

After the record of Matt. iv. 23, 24, which we considered on page 9, the Lord ascended a mountain and taught. Teaching begins the chapter and teaching is the last thing spoken of in Matt. vii. 28, 29, viz., "sayings", "doctrine (or teaching)", and "taught as one having authority". Mighty words on the mountain are immediately followed by mighty works in the valley, "And when He was come down from the mountain, great multitudes followed Him, and behold there came a leper". The three miracles that are recorded in Matt. viii. 1-15 are suggestive of much teaching.

The Leper.	Israel.
The Lord touched him.
The Centurion's Servant.	The Gentile.
Healing at a distance.
His faith compared with that of Israel.
Peter's Wife's Mother.	A Woman.
The Lord touched her.

The Pharisee in his prayer thanked God that he was not born (1) a Gentile, (2) a slave, or (3) a woman, which position of "splendid isolation" is gloriously done away "in Christ" for Gal. iii. 28 shows that there is

(1). Neither Jew nor Greek.	The Gentile.
(2). Neither bond nor free.	The Slave.
(3). Neither male nor female.	The Woman.

Here in these three opening miracles the Lord breaks through many traditional barriers; He touched a leper! He healed a Gentile! He healed a woman! There is a dispensational lesson here which the reader should observe, as well as a moral one. Both the leper and the woman were healed by personal contact; the Gentile, however, was healed at a distance. This peculiarity comes out again in Matt. xv. 21-28; in both cases, too, reference is made to the great faith of the Gentile.

Going back again to the first of these miracles, let us see for what the leper prayed, "Lord, if thou wilt, thou canst make me CLEAN". The response equally insists upon the same thought, "immediately his leprosy was CLEANSED". The command that followed still keeps cleansing uppermost, "show thyself to the priest, and offer the gift that Moses commanded for a testimony unto them".

Lev. xiv. contains the intensely instructive "law of the leper in the day of his cleansing". Christ's dying and rising again is clearly set forth; the cleansed leper is atoned for by the blood, and re-consecrated by the oil. Here in the leper may be seen Israel's condition before God, "no soundness, but wounds, bruises and putrifying sores". The leper's condition cut him off from worship and service, rendering him quite unfit for any act of ministry in any shape or form; such was Israel—Israel that was destined to be a kingdom of Priests, Israel of whom the Gentile will yet say, "They are the ministers unto our God"; Israel - a leper.

The two questions that appear in this miracle are those concerning the Lord's power and will. Of the Lord's power the leper had no doubt, "If thou wilt, thou canst". The Lord alone could decide the question of willingness, and He did so, saying, "I will, be thou clean". Think for a moment of a mere man, confronted by the awful plague of leprosy (incurable still in this day of medical knowledge), daring to say, "I will". The One before whose will leprosy flees away at a word, who can say, "Be thou clean", is the same One who uttered the words recorded in Gen. i., "Let there be light, and there was light". The miracle is full of prophetic hope for the uncleansed nation. He who was and is their Messiah is both ABLE ("thou canst"), and WILLING ("I will"), and in God's good time the leper will be cleansed and receive the anointing oil of re-consecration. After Israel's cleansing will follow that of the Gentiles; this is the consistent theme of prophecy, type and doctrine, e.g., Gal. iii. 12-14:--

> "Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law. . . . that the blessing of Abraham might come on the Gentiles through Jesus Christ."
> Acts iii. 25, 26, '"Saying unto Abraham, And in thy seed shall all kindreds of the earth be blessed. Unto you first, God, having raised up His Son Jesus, sent Him to bless you, in turning away every one of you from his iniquities."

The cleansing of the leper by personal touch is followed by the healing of the centurion's servant by a word spoken at a distance. The Lord is no sooner acquainted with the servant's condition, than the gracious willingness is again made manifest. Before the request is actually made the Lord said, "I will come and heal him"; then follows an exhibition of faith so great that it is written of the Lord that He marveled. On only one other occasion is it recorded that the Lord "marveled", but then it was at the "unbelief" of those who were of His own country, and kin and house (Mark vi. 6).

The words of the centurion reveal how clearly he recognized the Lord as the SENT ONE. All who see Him thus will be brought to the same estimate of themselves, "I am not worthy that Thou shouldest come under my roof". Then come the words of faith that cause the Lord to marvel, "but speak the words only, and my servant shall be healed". What a contrast with another military Gentile—Naaman, who said, "behold, I thought he will surely come out to me, and stand, and call on the name of the Lord his God, and move his hand up and down over the place".

Great faith can dispense with all means and accessories, and can rely on "the word only". It was faith indeed on the leper's part to say to the Lord, "if thou wilt, thou canst", but it was greater faith for the centurion to dare to decline the personal visit of the Lord and rest confidently in His spoken word. We suggest that he recognized Christ as the Sent One, because of his added explanation. He said more than the A.V. records; not merely did he say, "for I am a man under authority", but he said, "for I ALSO am a man under authority". The fact that he was under authority gave authority to his words; he said to a soldier, "Go, and he goeth", and the authority under which he himself was placed gave, in its turn, all the weight to his commands. So with the Lord, He spoke not His own words, but the Father's; the works He did He declared were not His, but the Father's that sent Him. The whole of John's Gospel rings with the fact that Christ was the Sent One. The healing of the centurion's servant was John v. 24 in tableau,

> "He that heareth My word ('speak the word only'), and believeth on Him that sent Me ('for I also am a man under authority'), hath everlasting life."

The words of Christ that follow show that the miracle was connected, in some way at least, with teaching:--

> "I say unto you that many shall come from the east and west, and shall sit down with Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob in the kingdom of heaven, but the children of the kingdom shall be cast out into outer darkness, there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth."

The centurion's faith was real and strong, for the Lord said:--

> "Go thy way, and as thou hast believed, so be it done unto thee, and his servant was healed in the selfsame hour."

The parallel record in Luke vii. 1-10 should be read. The Companion Bible considers this a second miracle of healing, suggesting that the Lord had blessed the centurion before (Matt. viii. 12, 13), i.e., before the calling of the twelve in Matt. x. 1, etc. The second healing of the centurion's bondman took place after the calling of the twelve (vi. 13-16). It must be remembered that Matthew selects his items with a view to the object of his gospel, and nowhere claims that historical order is maintained. Luke, however, does claim that he writes "in order", and we take Luke's record of any incident to be the true historical order of its happening. Many have found a "discrepancy" in the fact that whereas Matt. v.-vii. was evidently spoken on a mountain, Luke vi. 17 says that a body of teaching of exactly the same character was spoken "in the plain". "There", says the critic, "the narrative is contradictory, one says a mountain, the other a plain". Others, to avoid the difficulty, say (and with truth), that the Lord could have repeated His teaching again elsewhere. The whole controversy is dispelled by looking at the original, and using simple common sense. First as to the mountain, Matt. v. 1 says:--

> "And seeing the multitude, He went up into a mountain, and when He was set, His disciples came unto Him."

Luke vi. 12 says:--

> "And it came to pass in those days, that He went out into a mountain to pray, and continued all night in prayer to God and when it was day He called unto Him His disciples, and of them He chose twelve, whom He also named apostles."

This passage supplements Matthew's record. Matthew evidently had no reason to say why the Lord went up the mountain, except that it was because of the multitude. The multitudes which followed Him were from Galilee, Decapolis, Jerusalem, Judea and beyond Jordan, according to Matthew; they were from all Judea, Jerusalem, the sea, and coast of Tyre and Sidon according to Luke. Both records are true, each gives his own account which does not contradict, but complements the other.

Now as to the plain. The actual words are este epi topou pedinou, which rendered literally are, "He on a level place". These words are only another way of saying, "and when He was set"; no one could address a company of people upon the oblique slopes of a mountain side, but coming down a little way until He reached "a level place" such as is often to be found at any height, He could then address them comfortably. The contradiction therefore vanishes, as does the need for two separate occasions when the actual facts are considered. Both Matthew and Luke record the entrance of the Lord, after this "Sermon on the Mount", into Capernaum. Matthew adds the miracle of the leper, and both record the miracle of the centurion's servant. What Matthew speaks of as being simply the words of the centurion without mediators, Luke explains in fuller detail. The reason why the centurion spoke of his unworthiness appears in Luke's account, because there it is recorded that the elders of the Jews had said that he was worthy for whom He should do this.

In verse 3 of Luke vii. the word "sent" is apostellö = sent away, the sender remaining behind. In verse 6 it is pempõ = to send with. The word "saying" (legon) indicates that the centurion is personally present and speaking to the Lord. It seems more reasonable that we should have the variations of one event, than that on two separate occasions the Lord utter a similar lengthy address, then enter Capernaum, then be asked to heal the centurion's servant, be answered in exactly the same way, and marvel for the second time at the great faith evidenced. Then as to the calling of the twelve, Luke vi. 13-16 positively states that after that night of prayer the Lord chose the twelve, whereas Matt. x. 1 says that He called unto Him the twelve disciples without stating when He had chosen them. The only reason why these two passages should have been confounded, is the fact that the names of the twelve are given at length.

The healing of Peter's wife's mother could easily be misunderstood in the same way. In reading Matthew's account we should naturally assume that the miracle took place after the healing of the centurion's servant, but both Mark and Luke place it considerably earlier (cf. Mark i. 29 and Luke iv. 38). The fact that Peter's house was in Capernaum (Luke iv. 31-38) links this miracle with the others that were associated with Capernaum, and Matthew, without pretending to keep the historical order, has grouped them together. The Lord again touched the object of His compassion, and this time the restored one arose and ministered unto Him.

So will Israel in the day of her healing, and so may we since He put forth His grace to us.

#3. The Twelve Miracles that precede Rejection (Matt. viii. - xii.).
pp. 74 - 78

Twelve separate miracles are recorded by Matthew. Eight separate signs are recorded by John. Evidently therefore the writers of these "gospels" made a choice of the event to suit the purpose of their respective narratives.

We know that twelve is associated with Israel, and with government. Let us look at these twelve miracles together, and notice anything that will help us to see what their special purpose may be.

viii. 2. The Leper cleansed.
viii. 5. Centurion's servant. Asks for another.
viii. 14. Peter's wife's mother.
viii. 16. Collective miracles and O.T. quotation, "that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by Isaiah the prophet saying, Himself took our infirmities and bare our sicknesses" (Isa. liii. 4).
viii. 24. The Storm.
viii. 28. The Demons.
ix. 2. Sins forgiven. Brought by others. O.T. quotation, "Go ye and learn what that meaneth, I will have mercy, and not sacrifice" (Hos. vi. 6).
ix. 18. Ruler's daughter.
ix. 22. Issue of blood.
ix. 27. Blind men.
ix. 32. Dumb demon. Brought by others.
ix. 35. Collective miracles and O.T. quotation, "As sheep having no shepherd" (Zech. x. 2).
xii. 13. Withered hand.
xii. 15. Collective miracles, and O.T. quotation, "That it might fulfilled which was spoken by Isaiah the prophet saying, Behold my servant, Whom I have chosen, My beloved in Whom my soul is well pleased: I will put my spirit upon Him and He shall shew judgment to the Gentiles. He shall not strive, nor cry; neither shall any man hear His voice in the street. A bruised reed shall He not break, and smoking flax shall He not quench, till He send for the judgment unto victory. And in His name shall the Gentiles trust" (Isa. xlii. 1).

xii. 22. Blind and dumb demon
The people's enquiry, "Is not this the SON OF DAVID?"
The Pharisees' objection, "He casts out demons by Beelzebub."

The first three miracles touch the orders of human society which would make a direct appeal to the Jew.

The leper, representing Israel, their uncleanness removed.
The centurion's servant, representing the Gentiles, healed at a distance.
Peter's wife's mother. A woman. Very little esteemed so far as spiritual things were concerned.

The Old Testament quotations that follows these three miracles shows that the healing of these diseases was part of the Lord's work as the suffering Messiah. He was "acquainted with grief", for He hath "carried our sorrows" as well as borne our sins.

As in the case of the woman who touched the Lord, virtue went out of Him when He thus bore the sickness of sin stricken Israel. This will sufficiently account for the Lord's sound sleep in the ship. Mark's account is very full here. The Lord after a strenuous period of service said to His disciples, "Let us pass over unto the other side. And when they (not He) had sent the multitude away, they took Him even as He was in the ship". Oh, wondrous weakness, oh, mighty condescension. "He saved others, Himself He could not save."

No miracle did the Lord work throughout His course to spare Himself. Thus it was that being wearied He was fast asleep on a pillow, while the storm began to swamp the ship. The result of the stilling of the storm upon the disciples was to make them exclaim, "What manner of man is this, that even the winds and the sea obey Him".

We do not feel that it would be profitable to enter into a detailed discussion concerning the question as to whether this miracle is different from that recorded in Mark iv. and Luke viii. The only gospel narrative that claims to have set out the events "in order" is that written by Luke. The other writers use what events serve their purpose without of necessity pledging that the sequence is always historical. Such a statement, however, as that this miracle of Matt. viii. was before the calling of the twelve: and that the other was after that event is misleading. By the calling of the twelve in Matthew we can only suppose Matt. x. to be meant. Now Matt. x. speaks of that time when the Lord called unto Him His twelve disciples to give them power over unclean spirits, and sent them forth to preach. This is exactly parallel with the record in Mark. vi. 7-13 and Luke ix. 1-6, and all three passages come after the miracle of the stilling of the tempest.

The references in Mark iii. 13-19 and Luke vi. 13-16 refer to a prior nomination, and this is moreover suggested in Matt. x. 2, "Now these are the names." Not that this passage (Matt. x.) is to be taken as the same as Mark iii. Matthew does not record the parallel for this earlier call. Then again the storm is followed in Matt. viii. by the healing of two possessed of demons. They cry, "What have we to do with Thee, Jesus, thou Son of God? Art Thou come hither to torment us before the time?" Then follows the remarkable request that they should be permitted to enter the herd of swine, which rush into the sea and perish. The result was that the people besought Him to depart from their coast. The same thing happens immediately after the miracle of the tempest in Mark iv. Matthew calls the place, "the country of the Gergesenes", Mark "the country of the Gadarenes", while Luke adds, "which was over against Galilee", but this is explanation not contradiction. It seems more difficult to believe that on two separate occasions, within a short while of each other, there arose two storms, that the disciples in both cases was asleep, that He rebuked their little faith, that on both occasions they express their astonishment, using similar words, and that the two separate miracles on the sea were each followed by the healing of the demon-possessed, the demons confessing Christ, and referring to their torment, and in each case asking to be permitted to enter a herd of swine, which were killed in the sea. If the slight differences in the narratives are to be taken as signs that a different event is being recorded, then we shall have to make three separate miracles, for the reader can easily find differences between the two narratives of Mark and Luke.

Let us not miss the point of these great powers and signs. The Lord was demonstrating His Messiahship. The world of the physical, the elemental, and the spirit were beneath His control. At a touch leprosy vanishes. At a word sickness departs. At a rebuke the storm subsides. At the word "go" the demons enter the herd of swine. A yet fuller and deeper power is exhibited in the next miracle which closes another series; His power over sin. What is it to us if He can heal the body and cannot heal the deadly wound of sin?

In Christ is no mere wonder-worker, but God's appointed Saviour, Whose redemption shall make universal what was the peculiar possession of the few. These miracles were "powers of the world to come". Christ shall reign not only in the world of sense, but also of spirit, all things in heaven and earth, yea and under the earth, shall own His sway. All this is set forth in these wondrous works. So it was that when they brought to the Lord the sick of the palsy He took the opportunity of declaring His greater power.

Mark places this miracle before the miracles of the storm and of the swine (Mark ii.), nevertheless it is one and the same event. Luke's order is equally very different from either Matthew or Mark; nevertheless one miracle is thereby intended.

The healing of the palsied man and the forgiving of his sins very much resemble the opening miracle of Peter's pentecostal ministry, and his application of it to the salvation of the nation (Acts iii., iv. 1-12). While the faith of the palsied man is presumed, this miracle is another instance of the efficacy of the faith of others on behalf of the sufferers. There is no indication that the centurion's servant exercised faith, neither is there that the Syro-phænician woman's daughter believed.

Knowing what we do of the Person and Work of Christ, the fact that He should say, "Son, Be of good cheer; thy sins be forgiven thee", does not strike us as it did those who heard the words actually uttered. The Scribes immediately said, "This man blasphemeth". Mark ii. 7 records that they said, "Why doth this man thus speak blasphemies? Who can forgive sins but God only?" Luke tells us that the Scribes and Pharisees were present and began to reason in their hearts. Thus the little differences need no solving, the miracle is one.

The Lord does not hesitate to call their thoughts "evil". This of itself testifies to the abundant proofs He had already given that He was the sent One of God. Nicodemus, Pharisee, member of the Sanhedrim, "the teacher" of Israel, bore witness that such was the case: "Rabbi we know that Thou art a teacher come from God: for no man can do these miracles that Thou doest except God be with him". For a man uncommissioned to stand up and say, "Thy sins be forgiven thee", would be indeed "blasphemy". The question does not touch the Person of Christ in His official capacity. As the sent One He had power on earth to forgive sins, and the signs and wonders were His credentials. He will however demonstrate His commission and authority yet once more. The reasoning of the Lord is invincible. It is certainly easier to SAY, "Thy sins be forgiven thee", than to SAY, "Arise and walk", for while none can test the fulfillment or otherwise of the first statement, all can witness the second. There are many to-day who pronounce the forgiveness of sins and wield a tremendous power over the ignorant and the superstitious, who could not abide this challenge. So the Lord of glory stooped again in long-suffering gentleness:--

> "But that ye may know that the Son of man hath authority on earth to forgive sins (then saith He to the sick of the palsy), 'Arise, take up thy bed, and go unto thine house.' And he arose, and departed to his house."

The result according to Matthew was, "When the multitude saw it they marveled, and glorified God, which had given such authority unto men". Mark says, "they were all amazed, and glorified God, saying, We never saw it on this fashion". Luke's record is, "They were all amazed and they glorified God, and were filled with fear, saying, We have seen strange things to-day".

Each Gospel records the calling of Matthew, immediately after this miracle. Each records that at the feast that followed the Lord said, "They that be whole need not a physician but they that are sick, for I am not come to call the righteous but sinners to repentance". Thus, as in the miracle, the physical shadows forth the spiritual.

#4. The Third Group.
The Culmination of Israel's Rejection (Matt. ix.).
pp. 105 - 109

This group contains four miracles. Two are wrought upon women and two upon men.

The domain of ceremonial LAW had been entered when the Saviour, in spite of the law of Moses, touched the leper. National exclusiveness had received a shock when the Gentile Centurion's prayer was heard, and his faith recognized as greater than any exhibited in Israel. The unnatural despising of woman in the estimation of the orthodox Jew received a rebuff when the Lord deigned unasked to cure Peter's wife's mother.

The domain of SIN was entered and spirit forces compelled to recognize their Master in the second set.

The third series brings the Lord face to face with DEATH. A ruler comes and worshipping Him says, "My daughter is even now dead, but come and lay Thy hand upon her, and she shall live". What a stupendous request! yet see how naturally the Lord receives it. "And Jesus arose and followed him, and so did His disciples." He even allows Himself to be intercepted on the way to heal another sufferer. The woman who had an issue of blood for twelve years (Israel's number coming out again), is another example of Israel's condition. Her complaint would render her unfit to attend the house of God. It was recognized by tradition as a sufficient ground for divorce, it placed her outside the pale of society generally. She was in effect in much the same position as the leper. Yet she dared to contemplate touching the fringe of the Saviour's garment! Something must have told her that no defilement could adhere to Him. Had He not touched lepers? Was He not even now going by request to touch the very dead? How closely He came to the suffering world! How wonderful beyond thought that He, the holy, harmless, undefiled and separate from sinners, could so mingle with them as to appear in the eyes of the unsanctified as a friend of publicans and sinners, in a sense lower than the scriptural one! There is often more of the unsympathetic Pharisee about our ideas and practice of "separation" than that of the Lord Jesus Christ, the true Holy One of God.

Faith appears in some miracles very prominently, in others it is not mentioned. The faith of the Centurion called forth the words of Christ, "Verily, I say unto you, I have not found so great faith, no, not in Israel". There does not appear any room for faith in the case of Peter's wife's mother. It was evidently possessed by the leper, for his "if" was merely a question of "will", not of "can".

The mention of "faith" in the storm is one of rebuke—"O ye of little faith". Faith does not figure in the miracle of the two demon-possessed. The faith which is expressly mentioned in the account of the healing and forgiving of the man sick of the palsy is the faith of those who brought him (ix. 2). To the woman whose issue of blood was healed the Lord said, "Thy faith hath made thee whole". No one can question the faith of the ruler, but the word does not appear. In the next miracle, that of the blind men, faith is prominent, and the cure was conditional upon it.

The references to faith in this Gospel are subject to a definite arrangement, and as some of the passages are directly concerned with the miracles, we will give the order for the sake of future study,

Faith.

A | viii. 10. Great faith; outside Israel. Man for servant.
B | ix. 2. Their faith. Led to forgiveness.
C | ix. 22. Thy faith. Exeranthe (dried up), Mark v. 29.
D | ix. 29. According to faith. Eyes of blind opened.
HERE COMES REJECTION (xii., xiii.).
A | xv. 28. Great faith; outside Israel. Woman for daughter.
B | xvii. 20. As mustard seed. Luke xvii. 6 links with forgiveness.
C | xxi. 21. Remove mountains. Exeranthe (withered), verse 20.
D | xxiii. 23, 24. Pharisees omit faith. Blind guides.

There is a lesson in all this. It is surely intentional that the two first occasions on which faith is mentioned concern Gentiles seeking the blessing for others, in one case so markedly as to cause the Lord to marvel, and in both cases to remark upon the greatness of the faith exhibited. Yet the Lord would not deny the faith that was as small even as a grain of mustard seed. His final charge against the blind guides of Israel, who were leading them quickly into the ditch of rejection and unrepentance, was that they omitted among other weighty matters "faith". The faith even of others was blessed by the Lord, how much more the faith of the individual! And so the last miracle that speaks of faith, before the crisis (Matt. xii.), makes healing conditional upon faith.

Two blind men address the Lord by His kingdom (the true dispensational) title, the title which Israel should have recognized and believed, "Thou Son of David, have mercy on us". Seven times in Matthew's Gospel is the Lord addressed as Son of David, this being the first occasion. Here at last comes the confession that in their midst stands Israel's long-promised King. Would the eyes of this nation be opened to see Him? or would He have to say that the words of the prophet were fulfilled, "their eyes they have closed". Therefore, not for the individual's sake, but because of the typical value of all the miracles, the Lord replies:--

> "Believe ye that I am able to do this? They said unto Him, Yea, Lord. Then touched He their eyes, saying, According to your faith be it unto you."

This is what might have happened nationally, but faith was absent. The persistent unbelief brought the evidences of the Messiah's presence to an end (Matt. xiii. 58). Therefore it was that the Lord straitly charged the two blind men, "See that no man know it".

The last miracle of the series makes the rulers of Israel speak out their antagonism. A demon-possessed man, rendered by this possession dumb, is cured, and the multitudes marvel saying, "It was never so seen in Israel". Then comes the Pharisees' blasphemy against the Holy Spirit. Look at chapter xii. 22-32. The healing of another demoniac caused the people to say, "Is not this the Son of David?" Again the Pharisees immediately counteract the impression by saying, "This fellow doth not cast out demons but by Beelzebub, the prince of the demons". The Lord in reply, after showing the folly of their argument says:--

> "But if I cast out by the Spirit of God, THEN, the Kingdom of God is come unto you . . . . Wherefore I say unto you . . . . the blasphemy against the Holy Spirit shall not be forgiven unto men, ... neither in this age of the one about to be."

Herein is the supreme responsibility of the rejection of God's evidences, a subject that comes again prominently forward in the Gospel of John.

We retrace our steps a little to observe the gathering opposition and the development of events, the healing of the man with the withered hand. The word here for "withered" is akin to that used of the fig-tree that withered. Christ stood ready to heal their barrenness and withered unfruitfulness, and they chose the dust-dry pettiness of Sabbath-day observances, even contemplating the murder of the very Lord of the Sabbath. In the previous cases, when others interpose, it has been for the purpose of obtaining blessing for the sufferer. Here, the man with the withered hand is brought forward, not for any love for him or sympathy with his affliction, but that he may prove a bait to catch the Lord of life and glory.

The Rabbis had taught that there was "no Sabbatism in the Temple". The Lord could have appealed to this, but He preferred to take a simpler and wider view, and asked, in fact, whether a man was not of more value than a sheep. That which God had given as a "delight", they in their withered barrenness made the symbol of all that was exclusive, narrow and formal. The way in which their leaders had fenced the observation of the Sabbath with the most minute and ridiculous restrictions blinded them to the spiritual significance of the day. We shall find that much of the opposition of the Pharisees was related to the Lord's attitude to their conception of the Sabbath. This we must deal with separately, as space will not suffice here and now.

The Pharisees now take counsel against the Lord as to how they might destroy Him. What perversity is this! His every act had left behind Him mercy, peace, health, thankfulness, life from the dead, sight for the blind, yea, the forgiveness of sins—yet they hated Him, these scrupulous Sabbath-keepers.

Then follows the quotation which at last speaks of the Gentiles. With this quotation, Isa. xlix. 3-7 should be read. There the close connection between Israel's rejection of the Lord, and the blessing of the Gentiles is seen. One of His titles there is, "Him whom the nation abhorreth"! We have already looked at the closing miracle. The last words indicate the possibility that Israel may receive the Lord as the Son of David. Here the Pharisees interpose their blasphemous statement, and Israel sinks into unrepentance and blindness.

The miracles keep pace with the theme. Each Gospel writer chooses or rejects in accordance with the special object of his narrative, and this is by far the most important aspect in which to view the miracles. They can be considered in a detached and undispensational manner safely afterwards, but that is not our present purpose.

#5. The Miracles of the Rejection (Matt. xiii. - xxi.).
pp. 139 - 142

We have traced the ever deepening character of the evidences given to the Messiah by the miracles which are recorded. Things physical and temporal, things spiritual and eternal, come within their scope. We notice the cumulative character of the effect produced:--

> "His fame went throughout All Syria. . . . and there followed Him great multitudes of people from Galilee, and from Decapolis, and from Jerusalem and from Judea, and from beyond Jordan" (Matt. iv. 24).

The emphasis here is mainly on the geographical extent of the evidence. It included practically all the land then occupied by the people of Israel.

The disciples themselves are the next to exhibit their impressions, marveling and saying, “What manner of man is this, that even the winds and the sea obey Him!” When the multitude witnessed the miracle of the healing of the sick of the palsy, “they marveled, and glorified God, which had given such power unto men”. As a result of His raising the ruler’s daughter from the dead, “the fame thereof went abroad unto all that land”. As a result of the disobedience of the blind men who were healed to the Lord’s injunction, the fame of the Lord was spread abroad in all that country. When the dumb man possessed with a demon was cured, the multitudes marveled, saying, “It was never so seen in Israel”.

Then follows the commission of the twelve (chapter x.) who received from the Lord power over unclean spirits, and to heal all manner of sickness and disease. Their power was very full: “Heal the sick, cleanse the lepers, raise the dead, cast out demons”. Their testimony was widespread. John in prison heard of the works of Christ and was confirmed in the belief that these were indeed His evidences (xi. 1-6).

After the healing of the blind and dumb demoniac, “the people were amazed, and said, Is not this the Son of David?” This in the eyes of the Pharisees was a perilous question, so that they reiterated their blasphemy that the Christ of God was in league with Satan.

We first of all find it touched upon in ix. 34, “The Pharisees said, He casteth out demons by the prince of demons”; and no comment is passed. In xii. 24 we discover it to have gathered strength, and then the Lord exposes their thoughts and brings to bear upon them the fact that the kingdom of God had come unto them. Will it be believed that after all the signs and wonders which the Lord had given, miracles for which He had become famous throughout the length and breadth of the land, these insolent rulers of this age have the temerity to say, “Master we would SEE A SIGN from thee” (xii. 38)? The Lord’s answer indicates that the time for shewing signs is passed. The next great sign shall be that of His resurrection.

We shall observe the same order in the Gospel of John. Seven out of the eight signs come in the first half of the Gospel. Then comes chapters xiii. - xvii., where the Lord is with His own, and the eighth and concluding sign is that which follows His resurrection.

The parables of the mysteries of the kingdom (Matt. xiii.) follow the Lord’s rejection, and the miracles that follow are a complete set by themselves. The first reference to miracles after the great rejection (chapters xii., xiii.) is of a negative character: “He did not many mighty works there because of their unbelief” (xiii. 58).

We will look at the whole series however before we consider any in detail:--

The Miracles after the rejection.

A1 | xiii. 58. Not many because of unbelief.
B1 | C | a | xiv. 14. Many healed.
| b | xiv. 15-21. 5,000 fed.
| D | xiv. 22, 23. The Sea.
| E | xiv. 36. Perfectly whole.
| D | xv. 21-28. The woman of Canaan.
| C | a | xv. 29, 30. Many healed.
| b | xv. 31-39. 4,000 fed.
A2 | xvi. 1-4. The demand for a sign refused.--
No sign but that of the prophet Jonah.
B2 | F | xvii. 14-21. Lunatic. Faith remove mountains.
| G | xvii. 27. Tribute. Kingdom not yet come.
| (xix. 2. Multitudes healed).
| H | xx. 30. Blind. Son of David.
| H | xxi. 1. Colt. Thy King cometh.
| G | xxi. 14. Blind and Lame. Son of David.
| F | xxi. 19. Fig tree withered. Faith to remove mountains.
A3 | xxvii. 42-44. Demand for evidential miracle refused.
B3 | xxvii. 52 - xxviii. 8. THE SIGN OF JONAH.

The first set of seven miracles does not partake so much of the character of signs as of miracles of compassion. He went about doing good. "And Jesus. . . . was moved with compassion" (xiv. 14). The feeding of the 5,000 resembles the feeding of the 4,000, and there again the Lord says, "I have compassion on the multitude".

The second series of seven begins to foreshadow the development of events. Immediately after the glory of the transfiguration the Lord deals with a difficult case of demon possession and makes reference to a faith capable of removing mountains. Then follows the miracle of the tribute money and its question:--

> "Of whom do the Kings of the earth take custom or tribute? of their own children, or strangers? Peter saith unto Him, Of strangers. Jesus saith unto him, Then are the children free. Notwithstanding, lest we should offend them, go thou to the sea, and cast an hook, and take up the fish that first cometh up; and when thou hast opened its mouth, thou shalt find a piece of money, that take and give unto them for Me and thee."

Has the reader observed one great difference between the miracles performed before the twelfth chapter and those after it? In the case of those that are detailed in the first half of Matthew Christ works them entirely alone. A change comes with this new series.

The disciples are the ones first addressed with regard to the feeding of the 5,000. "Jesus said unto them, They need not depart, give ye them to eat." While the disciples were utterly unable to comply with the task they have an ample share in its outworking. Peter evidently began to realize that the working of miracles in conjunction with the Lord was now expected, for he asks the Lord to bid him come to Him upon the water!

The repetition of the feeding of the 5,000 by the feeding of the 4,000 seemed intentional, but the disciples did not at the time appear to grasp the Lord's purpose. The Lord rebukes both lack of memory and lack of faith as to these two miracles (xvi. 5-12). He rebukes the lack of faith again when the disciples confessed their inability to cast out the demon (xvii.), and reminds them that prayer and fasting were essentials. Peter shares, however humbly, in the miracle of the tribute money; the disciples take a part in the miracle of the colt, and when the disciples marveled at the withering of the fig tree, they are again reminded of the faith which removes mountains. There is a reason for this, "Greater works than these shall ye do, because I go to My Father", said the Lord, and Mark xvi. closes with the words, "The Lord working with them, confirming the Word with signs following". These are therefore all indications of the coming dispensation of Pentecost. All was now awaiting that sign of all signs, the sign of the prophet Jonah.

The references to the coming of the King, and the hosannas to the Son of David, again indicate how near the common people were to accepting the Lord as their Messiah. What a shocking charge lies at the door of their spiritual rulers, who instructed them to choose Barabbas instead of Christ! How soon will this piece of history be repeated on a grander scale? The spiritist activity seems to indicate that the Lord is near.

There are two miracles which we reserve for more detailed consideration owing to their bearing upon the dispensational outlook, namely, that of the woman of Canaan, and that of the withered fig tree. These we hope to deal with in our next article.

#6. Two Miracles of Dispensational Importance (Matt. xv. 21 – 28, and xxi. 19).

The Syrophenician Woman (Matt. xv. 21 – 28). pp. 173 - 175

All the miracles, as do all the parables, have a definite dispensational character, but the two we select in this article have that character in a very prominent way. The first of the two take place near the close of the Lord's ministry as the Son of David, the second near the close of His ministry as the Son of Abraham. Soon after working the first miracle the Lord began to speak of His approaching death, while soon after the second He was led away to be crucified. A simple outline of the miracle of Matt. xv. 21-28 is as follows:--

A1 | Have mercy, O Lord, Thou Son of David.
B1 | But He answered; not a word.
A2 | Send her away for she crieth after us.
B2 | But He answered; not sent but to lost sheep of Israel.
A3 | Lord, help me.
B3 | But He answered; not take children's bread and cast to dogs.
A4 | True Lord, yet the dogs eat of the crumbs.
B4 | Then Jesus answered, O woman, great is thy faith.

The woman was a woman of Canaan, a Gentile, a Syrophenician by nature (Mark vii. 26), and she approached the Lord, calling Him by His title, "Son of David". Now as Son of David He came to be King, "King of the Jews" (Matt. ii. 2; xxvii. 37, 42). This sovereignty was primarily of an exclusive character. The promise to David regarding his throne will be fulfilled in Christ, and in its primary interpretation it has no place for any nation but Israel. When the kingdom is established and that King is reigning, then world-wide blessing will result. So it was that the Saviour, Who so often was moved with compassion as He contemplated fallen and suffering man, "answered her not a word".

His reply to the disciples' request reveals the reason of this strange silence, "I am not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel". These words, to weak faith, would have sounded as the death knell of hope. The woman however penetrated the reply and learned its lesson. As Son of David He could do nothing for her; she must therefore drop that title and approach Him simply as Lord; she had no right in Him as Son of David such as Israel had. "Then came she and worshipped Him, saying, Lord, help me." This request draws from the Lord a personal answer, but what will He say? Will He grant her request? "He answered and said, It is not meet to take the children's bread, and cast it to kunaria (little dogs)." At first sight this answer seems as forbidding as the former one. Israel were the lost SHEEP, what had He, their shepherd, to do with DOGS? Israel were the children of the house; surely it was not right to take the children's bread and cast it to dogs? The faith of this woman enabled her to believe that what He spoke to her was absolute truth, and she seized upon the word He had used for dogs. As the reader will know, the dog is a term of reproach throughout the east, and is a symbol of all that is depraved, forsaken and cast out, e.g., "without are dogs". The Lord in His reply said "little dogs", or, as we say, puppies. The rule regarding the dog has an exception in the case of the little puppy; children in the east, like children in the west, like to pet and fondle the little puppies and for a short time they are allowed inside the house. "Truth, Lord", replies the woman, "yet the puppies eat of the crumbs which fall from their master's table". She knew that the exclusiveness of the Lord's ministry to Israel was not for any mean or narrow reason; a saved Israel will be saved not for their own sake, but that all families of the earth may be blessed in them.

The twofold aspect of this phase of God's dealings is emphasized in Rom. xv. 8, 9, "Now I say that Jesus Christ was a minister of the circumcision for the truth of God to confirm the promises made unto the fathers"—this is an exclusive ministry to Israel with reference to promises made in the past—"and that the Gentiles might glorify God for His mercy"—this follows as the designed sequence. So it was that the woman sought the crumbs. She gave Israel their rightful place, they were the Masters (the very same word twice rendered "Lord"). She was but a little dog, they sat at the table, she could only expect the crumbs. As soon as this was recognized, blessing came. How vital to this woman's case a correct appreciation of dispensational truth! How many to-day are perplexed because the Lord answers not a word, simply because they are asking amiss! The miracle clearly shows us what was the relationship between Israel and the nations at the time of the Lord's earthly ministry. In Rom. xi. the figure changes to that of wild olive branches grafted into the true olive. In Eph. ii. it further changes to the creation of one new man. Which shall we believe, the Scriptures, or those who speak against "dispensational" truth?

The Barren Fig Tree (Matt. xxi. 19). pp. 175, 176

The second miracle has also a dispensational character. Here is a symbol of Israel as a nation, the fig tree. The fig, the vine and the olive represent Israel in various capacities:--

> "And when He saw one single fig tree by the way, He came to it, and found nothing thereon, but LEAVES ONLY, and said unto it, Let no fruit grow on thee henceforth for ever, and immediately the fig tree was withered."

In the prophecy of Luke the Lord separates the fig tree from all others—"Behold the fig tree, and all the trees," (Luke xxi. 29-31). The sign of the Lord's return is found in the budding of the nation and all the nations; a day is coming when "Israel shall blossom and bud and fill the earth with fruit" (Isa. xxvii. 6). At the time, however, when the miracle was performed, the Lord found "leaves only". The crowd had spread their garments in the road, had cut down branches from the trees and scattered them on the road, they had shouted saying, "Hosannah to the Son of David"; but it was "leaves only". The same crowd within a few days were prevailed upon to cry, "away with Him, crucify Him". The Lord had foretold this (Matt. xiii. 5, 6):--

> "Some fell upon stony places where they had not much earth, and forthwith they sprung up, because they had no deepness of earth: and when the sun was up they were scorched, and because they had no root, they withered away."

The Hosannahs were leaves only; the fruit depends upon root. The scorching sun indicates persecution:--

> "He that received the seed in stony places, the same is he that heareth the word, and anon with joy receiveth it, yet hath he not root in himself, but endureth for a while, for when tribulation or persecution ariseth because of the word, immediately he is offended" (Matt. xiii. 20, 21).

The fig tree and those hearers on stony ground withered. Such was the parable of Israel: they began to cumber the earth; soon the word would go forth, "cut it down". Israel will bring forth no fruit until the age (translated "for ever").

It is deeply suggestive to us all to note the fact that the only miracle of judgment which the Lord performed was upon a tree. Never did He work such upon a human being. The only other occasion where anything resembling a judgment might be found is the case of the swine which were choked. Yet here it was the swine, not the men, who were drowned.

Thus these two miracles taken together speak of the blessing going out to the Gentiles, and of the cutting off, for the time being, of an unfruitful people. In this case there are lessons for all to learn, lessons not rendered the less pointed by seeing them in their true dispensational perspective.

Studies in the Epistles of the Mystery.

#36. The Grace-by-Faith-Salvation (Eph. ii. 8, 9).
pp. 17 - 20

Having carried us on into the ages to come, and given us a glimpse of what the exceeding riches of grace will bring, the apostle returns to the present to speak of the salvation which is now in operation. Salvation is of grace, and as we begin to understand something of its fulness, we shall begin to realize the unspeakable glory that lies ahead, wherein exceeding riches of grace may be displayed.

While salvation from sin and death and wrath is most prominent in our eyes owing to their immediate presence, salvation to the glory yet to be is in fact the greater. The salvation from sin is indeed the foundation without which the glorious building could never be erected, and for the moment this will occupy our attention.

The first thing to notice is the emphasis upon grace, and the resulting exclusion of works—"for by grace are ye saved". Grace is all of God, it is utterly incompatible with meritorious works:--

> "And if by grace then it is no more of works: otherwise grace is no more grace, but if it be of works, then is it no more grace: otherwise work is no more work" (Rom. xi. 6).
>
> "For by grace are ye saved. . . . not of works" (Eph. ii. 8, 9).
>
> "Not by works of righteousness which we have done. . . . being justified by His grace" (Titus iii. 7).
>
> "Who hath saved us, ... not according to our works, but according to His own purpose and grace" (II Tim. i. 9).
>
> "By the deeds of the law shall no flesh be justified. . . . being justified freely by His grace" (Rom. iii. 20, 24).

Scripture presents us with two methods of salvation, salvation by our own works, and salvation by God's grace. It knows no other. The blending of works and grace as a means of salvation is an abomination, it is the "Linsey-wolsey garment" of one of Hart's quaint, yet forcible hymns. The robe of our own weaving must be either a white robe of righteousness, or filthy rags—there will be no patches seen in heaven.

Grace is linked to faith, just as law is linked to works. This salvation which is by grace is through faith. God who planned salvation by grace planned the gospel of grace. A gospel is good tidings, and tidings have to be heard and believed before anything further can be done. Faith is by no means a modified work, it is rather an acceptance of a work done. Let us not miss the emphasis upon faith because of our inability to define it satisfactorily: salvation by grace becomes our salvation, through faith; a man who is an unbeliever is at the same time unsaved.

Justification is free and by grace through the redemption which is in Christ Jesus, that redemption of Christ is spoken of as a propitiation—a propitiation through faith in His blood (Rom. iii. 24, 25). The redemption becomes mine through faith. The Scripture carefully distinguishes between work and faith in this same chapter—"where is boasting then? it is excluded, by what law? of works? Nay; but by the law of faith". This argument is very parallel with that of Eph. ii. 9, "not of works lest any man should boast". All ground of boasting is removed when we complete the sentence of Eph. ii. by the words: "it is the gift of God". If we should be tempted to look upon faith as in any sense a work of merit, these words will bring us sharply to order. Some are caused to stumble by these words, some make a kind of fatalism of them. Does this passage teach that faith is the gift of God, does it teach that no man can believe the word of truth, the gospel of our salvation, unless God in sovereign grace gives to that one faith? The word rendered "that" does not agree with the word faith. Rotherham gives, "and this [hath come to pass] not from you". If we consider the word, "salvation by grace through faith", as a whole, we shall then better realize the meaning, "for by grace are ye saved through faith, and this grace-by-faith-salvation is not of yourselves—it is the gift of God". God is the author and donor of this wondrous gift, it is the gift of God. He singles it out by the word He uses. Never in any epistle to the church or to its ministers does Paul use the word again. This salvation is THE GIFT of God; what do you think of it, beloved reader?

To understand the abyss of sin, the power of the dominion of sin and death, to realize the grasp of corruption, to ponder the vanity of life which ends in the grave, to know only too well the utter inability of the flesh to accomplish justification by works is to realize something of the sweetness, the blessedness of the word salvation. It is the exchange of the horrible pit and the miry clay for solid rock. This puts a song, a new song, into our mouths; not praises unto ourselves or our systems, but "to the praise of His glory". Had this salvation cost us our all, it would then be beyond all estimation; what shall we say when we consider that the salvation which rid us of our sins, struck off our fetters, robbed death of its sting and the grave of its victory, which lifted us verily from the dunghill and seated us with princes that this salvation is FREE, it is the gift of God? He has done all, we simply are the unworthy recipients. That is salvation by grace, that is salvation through faith, that is a salvation certainly not of ourselves, that is a gift worthy of the God of all grace. God will have no boasters before Him, except those who boast in Christ.

> "We are the circumcision, which worship God in the spirit, and boast in Christ Jesus, and have no confidence in the flesh" (Phil. iii. 3).

As in Eph. ii., it is Christ or self—one or the other. God has purposely arranged that the preaching of the gospel, which seems "foolish" to the flesh, shall rob the flesh of any ground of boasting, "that no flesh should boast in His presence". Salvation and all its outgoings are of Christ, and not of self; the presence of a little particle te in I Cor. i. 30 emphasizes this, and the verse may be truly rendered:--

> "But of Him are ye in Christ Jesus, who of God became to us wisdom, and righteousness as well as sanctification and redemption."

Not one part, but all parts, of the plan of redemption are in Christ Jesus, and this with an object, "in order that, according as it hath been written, he that boasteth, let him boast IN THE LORD". In contrast to those who wanted to make a "fair show in the flesh", and who desired to "boast in the flesh", comes the glorious renunciation of the apostle Paul:--

> "But it is not for me to boast, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, through which the world has been crucified to me, and I to the world" (Gal. vi. 12-14).

This grace-by-faith-salvation is the gift of God. What manner of persons ought we to be, who have been so saved and so blessed! To God be the glory through our Lord Jesus Christ.

#37. Not of Works. . . Unto Good Works (Eph. ii. 9, 10).
pp. 49 - 52

We saw in our last paper the clear distinction which the Scriptures draw between grace and works, and realized that there could be no possible amalgamation of the two where salvation is concerned. One would think, however, from the attitude of some who have grasped the teaching of the Word concerning grace, that the Lord Himself had a repugnance to good works, and that anyone daring to speak of good works was to be reckoned as unsound, if not unsaved. We have brought together in our heading that which God has joined together in His purpose of redemption. Salvation is indeed not out of works, but nevertheless it is unto good works. Let us allow the scriptural emphasis to have its way with us.

Take for a commencement the emphatic words of Titus iii. 5, "NOT by works of righteousness which we have done, but according to His mercy He saved us". Yet observe in the near context the equal emphasis placed upon works for those who are saved. "This is a faithful saying" (a phrase which is used in these pastoral epistles to mark out a passage of special importance), "and these things I will that thou affirm constantly (J.N.D. translates "insist strenuously"), that they which have believed in God might be careful to maintain GOOD WORKS" (Titus iii. 8). Here we have a close parallel to Eph. ii. 9, 10. While Titus iii. 5 rules out works as a means of procuring our salvation, there is no other epistle which gives "good works" a more prominent place. Look at i. 16, "They profess that they know God, but in works they deny Him, being abominable, and disobedient, and unto every good work reprobate." This verse shows the place of good works in any profession of the knowledge of God. Notice ii. 1, 7, 8:--

> "SPEAK thou the things which become doctrine. . . . in all things showing thyself a pattern of GOOD WORKS. . . . sound SPEECH that cannot be condemned."

See how the speech is closely related to the good works. Sound speech that cannot be condemned will never be separated from good works. The next passage is specially important:--

> "The grace of God that bringeth salvation, teaches us that. . . . we should live. . . . looking. . . . zealous of good works" (Titus ii. 11-14).

Here is another close parallel with Eph. ii. 9, 10, "by grace are ye saved"; yes, but grace does not stop there; the same grace that saves now teaches us to "live. . . . looking for that blessed hope". The Saviour for Whom we wait gave Himself for us, (1) that He might redeem us from all iniquity, and (2) purify unto Himself a peculiar people zealous of good works. There should be an enthusiasm for these good works, as it is such a joy to be able at last to accomplish anything worthy of the name. Redemption from the bondage of sin and death has placed us in a position where for the first time in our lives we can attempt with any hope of success "good works". Such are indeed a "peculiar people"; for how few there seem to be who are "zealous" for good works, and who realize that this indeed is one of the ends of that redemption which is not of works.

Titus iii. 14, speaking of good works, adds "that they be not UNFRUITFUL". The tree is supposed to be rooted; salvation has already taken place, and good works are as "natural" as grapes on a vine. Their absence should cause surprise and enquiry. The same teaching is found in II Tim.: there works are repudiated where salvation is concerned, and inculcated when saintship and service are concerned:--

> "Who hath saved us. . . . NOT according to our works, but according to His own purpose and grace, which was given us in Christ Jesus before the age times" (i. 9).

The exclusion of works is complete, for if our salvation was according to the grace that was given us so long ago, or, to take the parallel word of Ephesians, if we were chosen in Him before the foundation of the world, how can works possibly enter into the question? Yet, strong as this passage is, the same epistle, speaking to the same men, says:--

> "If a man shall purge HIMSELF from these, he shall be a vessel unto honour, sanctified, and meet for the master's use, and prepared unto every good word" (ii. 21).

The means to be used for this desired end are suggested in iii. 16, 17:--

> "All scripture. . . . that the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works."

Again, I Tim. ii. 10 links the profession of godliness with good works; the very desire to fulfil the office of a bishop is set down as desiring a "good work" (iii. 1). The widow who was to be taken into the number (presumably of those who were supported by the Church), was to be "well reported of for good works. . . . diligently following every good work" (v. 10), a qualification which must have been one of a high standard. Good works, while finding no place in our salvation, form a foundation against the time to come (vi. 19). Time would fail to tell of all those who "wrought righteousness, obtained promises", who chose to live as strangers and pilgrims, who chose affliction rather than the pleasures of sin for a season. Think of the Philippians, who although instructed by the example of the apostle to count all things loss, and to desire that righteousness which is not of the law, nevertheless were instructed by that same apostle to "work out" their own salvation with fear and trembling. Not "work for" salvation, be it noted; against that idea all Scripture is ranged, but upon possessing salvation, to work it out as one would a gold mine, to be fruitful, as does a branch that abides in the vine—this equally is a true and faithful sayings of Paul. "By grace are ye saved. . . . not of works" is the true and faithful saying which is worthy of all acceptation, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners. "Created in Christ Jesus unto good works" is the faithful saying which the apostle willed that Titus should constantly affirm, that they which had believed God should be careful to maintain good works. The fact that we are not under the law but under grace, instead of being an argument against good works, is an argument quite in their favour. For how could we, under the law, and under the dominion of sin, produce good works at all? This is the teaching of Rom. vi. 11-14, "Likewise reckon ye yourselves dead unto sin, but alive unto God through Jesus Christ".

What is to be the result of this? Shall such a mighty change have no effect and produce no results?

> "Let not sin therefore reign in your mortal body, that ye should obey it in the lust thereof, neither yield ye your members as instruments of unrighteousness unto sin: but yield yourselves unto God, as those that are alive from the dead, and your members as instruments of righteousness unto God, for sin shall not have dominion over you, for ye are not under law, but under grace."

Grace which excludes works includes them; it just depends upon where we attempt to introduce them. That makes the difference. Those who are "alive from the dead", and therefore "under grace", have the peculiar privilege of CHOOSING THEIR MASTER. They had no choice under the dominion of sin. His delivered ones can now yield their members to sin, or to God. Difficult and even "dangerous" as the outworking of this doctrine may be, truth it is, and it is needed to make our gospel complete. The righteousness of the law could not be fulfilled in those who walk after the flesh, but what the law could not do, in that it was weak through the flesh, God did by sending His Son, Who delivered us from sin, united us with Himself in His death and resurrection, with the object that now the righteousness of the law might be fulfilled in us, who walk not after the flesh, but after the spirit.

We have not finished with Eph. ii. 9, 10, and must return to the verses again; all that we have done in this paper is to press upon the reader's mind the scriptural doctrine contained in the words, "NOT OUT OF WORKS. . . . but UNTO GOOD WORKS". May the Lord be glorified by much fruit.

#38. "Before Ordained" (Eph. ii. 9, 10).
pp. 81 - 85

We have noticed the relation between works before salvation and works after salvation, but this theme of course does not exhaust the subject of these verses. We must return to them to consider their teaching from another standpoint. Verse 10 reads:--

> "For we are HIS workmanship, having been created in Christ Jesus for good works, for which God prepared beforehand in order that we should walk in them.'

There is a grammatical reason for printing HIS in capitals. There is a logical reason too. The order of the words in the sentence is, "Of Him are we for a work". "Him" comes first. If we read on from verse 9 the emphasis will be appreciated: "not of works lest any man should boast, for we are His workmanship". Instead of OUR works having a place, we are forcefully reminded that we are HIS work. Work and walk are related, the works of the flesh are in contrast to the fruit of the spirit and a spiritual walk (Gal. v. 19-25).

> "Walk as children of light: for the fruit of the light (R.V.). . . . have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness" (Eph. v. 8-11).

In the doctrinal section of Ephesians (i. - iii.) the whole outgoing and energy of man is summed up in the word "walk". God knows of two walks, and two only; all else are but sub-divisions. Eph. ii. speaks of them both: "wherein in time past ye walked according to the age of this world", verse 2, and the good works, pre-ordained, of verse 10. Between the "time past" and its walk and the present and its walk lies death, quickening, resurrection, ascension, and seating with Christ. There was no attempt made to alter the walk: God made a new creature. The walk of the unsaved is in the sphere of the dominion of sin and death. A mighty spirit energizes them. Deliverance from this fearful dominion is only found in the death and resurrection of Christ, and in union with Him. The life is not altered by the walk, the walk merely expresses the life:--

> "For which things' sake the wrath of God cometh upon the children of disobedience, in the which Ye also WALKED some time, when ye LIVED in them" (Col. iii. 6, 7).
>
> "As ye have therefore RECEIVED Christ Jesus the Lord, so WALK ye in Him" (Col. ii. 6).

The walk, like the good works, accompanies salvation. It does not bring it about, "for we are His making CREATED in Christ Jesus".

It will be noticed that we have the word "making" instead of "workmanship". The word is poiema, and comes from poieõ – "to make". Gen. ii. 3 brings the two words "make" and "create" together:--

> "And God blessed the seventh day and sanctified it because that in it He had rested from all His work which God created and made" (or "created to make"-margin).

If we look through the record of creation in Gen. i. we shall find some things are said to be made, like the firmament (verse 7), some things are said to be created, like the great "whales", and in some cases both words are used: "let us make man in our image. . . . so God created man in His own image". "In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth." After that He made the present heavens, the earth and some orders of life on it, introducing by creation fresh orders for the new purpose.

When we read of the generations of the heavens and the earth, we must remember that we are not dealing with their origin, but with their offspring. The generations of Adam, or of Noah, tell us of their respective descendants. The generations of the heavens and the earth then are what follow the creation of chapter i., and include the creation, temptation, and fall of man. We here make a suggestion regarding the interpretation of Gen. ii. 4. The generations set out are events that follow the creation of the heavens and the earth, and commence with the making of the present heavens and earth. Verse 4 therefore we would interpret as follows—these (events now to be chronicled) are the generations of the heavens and the earth when they were created (not showing how they were created, but speaking of those things which took place afterwards: "being already created" expresses the suggestion), in the day that the Lord God made the earth and the heavens, after the "overthrow" indicated in Gen. i. 2.

The same idea seems to underlie Eph. ii. 10, "we are His making, created". We too as individuals have had our "overthrow", darkness has covered us, and God Himself, Who commanded the light to shine out of the darkness of Gen. i. 2, shined into our hearts to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ.

The word rendered "workmanship" (poiema) occurs twice only in the N.T., once for the present creation, and once for the new creation. The two passages are Rom. i. 20, and Eph. ii. 10. When we deal with salvation by grace, we deal with a new creation. A new creation seems to indicate a greater change than does regeneration. The prophetic time referred to as "the regeneration" is this side of the great day when the earth and its works shall be burned up. It is not a new creation. The doctrine and ordinances of the Kingdom are largely related to the Regeneration, whereas the doctrine of the One Body is connected with a new creation. Kitzõ ("create") occurs four times in Ephesians, viz.:--

A | ii. 10. God. The Church His creation.
B | ii. 15. The New Man doctrinally considered.
A | iii. 9. God. "All things" His creation.
B | iv. 24. The New Man practically exhibited.

It will be noticed that three out of the four references speak exclusively of the new creation. One (iii. 9) may be regarded as doubtful, but personally we consider the reference there is to the new creation equally with the other passages.

It is a tremendous thought—creation. Scripture nowhere seems to define it, it is an act essentially Divine and beyond the scope of the human mind. Nevertheless it is a wondrous fact. If the heathen were without excuse by the evidence of Deity in the things that are made, what shall we say of ourselves? Is there not demonstrated even more forcibly, "His eternal power and Godhead" by the new creation? Littleness of faith stands condemned before this "manifold wisdom of God". The passage seems to take us to another genesis. No longer a creation of man out of the dust of the earth is described, but the creation of a new man in Christ Jesus. The thought of the image of God, borne even by unregenerate man, is exchanged for that of the renewed image in righteousness and true holiness.

Returning again to Eph. ii. 10 we notice the purpose of this new creation—"unto good works". The word usually translated "unto" is eis, but in this verse it is epi followed by the dative case. It indicates the purpose for which anything is done (Matt. xxvi. 50; Gal. v. 13). Good works were impossible under the old creation. God makes a new creation, and His purpose is that good works shall become possible. The remaining item to consider is somewhat difficult as it stand in the A.V.: "which God hath before ordained that we should walk in them". Is all our walk after salvation fixed by predestination? Does it mean that the new creation launches us out into irresponsibility? Is it an unnecessary thing to say to a believer, "walk worthy", "walk not as the gentiles"? If the walk of the believer is pre-ordained, what purpose does it serve to say:--

> "Walk in love. . . . let no man deceive you with vain words, for because of these things (the opposite walk) cometh the wrath of God upon the children of disobedience"?

Proetoimazõ is literally, "to prepare beforehand". "I go to prepare a place for you" (John xiv. 3); "the preparation of the gospel of peace" (Eph. vi. 15); "they that were ready went in" (Matt. xxv. 10); "the third time I am ready" (II Cor. xii. 14), are examples of etoimazõ, etoimos, and etoimõs, respectively. If the word "hina", which is rendered "that", be translated "in order that", the meaning of the passage will become clearer; "for good works, which God prepared beforehand, in order that we should walk in them". We might now notice two passages of Scripture:--

> "If a man therefore purge himself from these, he shall be a vessel unto honour, having been sanctified, and meet for the Master's use, and having been prepared unto every good work" (II Tim. ii. 21).

Here, it will be observed, the man purges himself, and the result is seen. The means used, or one of the means, is indicated in II Tim. iii. 16, 17, where the Scriptures make the man of God prepared unto every good work. Titus iii. 1 enjoins "to be ready to every good work". These passages speak of the believer being prepared, and not the good works being prepared. One translation of Eph. ii. 10 (the Emphatic Diaglot) reads, "good works, for which God before prepared us, that we might walk in them". This we believe is the meaning of the passage. This is parallel with the words of Eph. i. 4, "chosen in Him before the foundation of the world that we might be holy and without blemish".

Our materials need just a little sorting before we proceed. II Tim. ii. 21 speaks of the believer's own activity, Eph. ii. speaks of God's. The "before preparation" must necessarily precede the outworking. Rom. ix. 20 contains the only other occurrence of "being prepared". To walk in these good works, to seek to fulfil the object of our redemption, should be the great goal of our pilgrimage. All our queries, problems, hesitations, lapses, failures would be sanctified, minimized and eliminated did we ever seek these good paths.

When we come to the practical section we shall find the repeated exhortation is to walk. Only to walk worthy of our calling will fill out our whole life and witness. Summarizing we learn:--

That in this dispensation God has introduced a new creation, of which He is the Creator and Maker.

That the immediate goal of this new creation is good works.

That He has afore prepared each member of the one body to walk therein.

And so while works can find no place before our salvation, to us is addressed the words:--

> "Work out your own salvation with fear and trembling, for it is God Who worketh in you both to will and to work on account of His good pleasure."

#39. The Dispensational Disability of being a Gentile. (Eph. ii. 11, 12).

pp. 113 - 118

We now enter the second section of this chapter (for structure and relation of the two parts see Volume IX, page 49).

Verses 1-10 have dealt with what we might call, for the sake of a term, the doctrinal position. "Sin", "death", "life", "salvation", "grace", "faith", "walk", these are the key words. The words "with Christ" sum up the relation of the believer to the Lord. In the second section (verses 11-22) we have what we might call the dispensational position set forth. Here we do not read the words, "sin", "death", "raised", "seated", "life", "salvation", "grace", "faith", nor "walk". We read instead such words as "aliens", "strangers", "far off", "hope", "peace', "reconciled", "made nigh", "access". "Through Christ" and "in Christ", sum up the relation to the Lord.

What was the dispensational position of those who had been so wondrously saved by grace? They were told to remember that in time past they were:--

A | Gentiles in the flesh.
  B | Without Christ.
    C | Aliens from commonwealth of Israel.
    C | Strangers from covenants of promise.
  B | Having no hope.
A | Godless in the world.

This is the condition of those whose salvation and blessing this epistle chronicles. To the praise of His glory such are urged to remember what they once were, that their high privilege may be the better appreciated. Let us pass these items under review, so that we may indeed look to the pit from which we were digged.

GENTILES.—There is nothing personally immoral or wicked in being a Gentile as there is in being a sinner. While the Jew from his exclusiveness spoke of Gentiles, publicans and sinners as all one and the same, there could be no personal responsibility attaching to the question as to whether one was born a Roman, a Greek, a Scythian, or a Jew. Why therefore should this national distinction be the first to be brought forward as indicating the dispensational disability of these persons? When we stand upon Jewish ground, we realize the distance that the Gentiles were from God. While He revealed Himself to Israel, giving them holy and righteous laws, proverbs and prophecies, He spoke not to the nations:--

> "He sheweth His Word unto Jacob, His statutes and His judgments unto Israel, He hath not dealt so with any nation: and as for His judgments, they have not known them" (Deut. iv. 38; Psa. cxlvii. 19, 20; Amos iii. 2; Rom. iii. 2).

Over against this statement of Gentile dispensational disability, let us place the statement of Israel's dispensational privilege:--

A | According to the flesh.—Brethren.
B | Israelites.
C | Sonship.
D | Glory.
E | Covenants.
E | Law.
D | Service.
C | Promises.
B | Fathers.
A | According to the flesh.—The Messiah.

The one reminds us of our Gentile position, the other puts prominently forward the favoured nation—Israel. The one speaks of alienation and strangership, the other of sonship. In the one case neither covenants nor promises are attached; in the other they are mentioned particularly. The Gentiles were without a Messiah: of Israel it is said that Messiah came from them and that salvation is of the Jews. In both cases the paucity or privilege is introduced by a reference to the flesh. The Gentile disability was "in the flesh"; yet so also was the Jewish privilege. When the Jew and the Gentile stood together on resurrection ground, the flesh with its disabilities and with its privileges also vanished. "In Christ" is in the Spirit. Those who were far off and without hope in the flesh have access unto the Father "by one Spirit". This teaching commends that reading of Eph. iii. 5, 6 which makes the words "by" or "in the Spirit" to read with the peculiar privileges of the Gentiles recorded in verse 6. In the flesh the Gentiles could never be fellow-heirs, but in the Spirit they can. It is the flesh dispensationally considered that is dealt with and removed in this section. "The enmity in the flesh" Christ has abolished, it is the Spirit that is related to the new sphere; access is by the Spirit. The building as an habitation of God is by the Spirit, the unity is the unity of the Spirit.

Writers of Eugenics and Sociology have emphasized the tremendous influence that heredity and environment have upon the individual. Scripture draws attention also to these two principles. The Gentiles were "in the FLESH": that was the burden of heredity under which they suffered. They were "in the WORLD": that was the environment in which they sank hopeless, Godless, Christless. No wonder that within two or three verses the apostle twice says, "by grace are ye saved".

To be a Gentile was to be one of a vast number who had been "given up" by God (Rom. i. 24). If Eph. ii. sets forth Gentile distance, Eph. iv. shows us Gentile darkness:--

> "This I say therefore, and testify in the Lord, that ye henceforth walk, not as other Gentiles walk, in the vanity of their mind, having the understanding darkened, being alienated from the life of God through the ignorance that is in them, because of the blindness of their heart: who being past feeling have given themselves over unto lasciviousness, to work all uncleanness with greediness."

We cannot think that words could indicate a more hopeless and awful condition than the testimony of Eph. ii. 11, 12 and iv. 17-19. The reader is urged to read for himself the rest of the testimony concerning the state of the Gentiles, but we must pass on to notice some other items.

IN THE FLESH.—In this sphere are all men by nature, whether Jew or Gentile. It is written, "they that are in the flesh cannot please God" (Rom. viii. 8). The term is used in a special manner in the epistle, as will be seen by reading verses 9-18. Those who have believed on the Lord Jesus Christ, and have received of that spirit of sonship whereby they can cry "Abba Father", those who have received the spirit of Christ, the spirit of resurrection life (10, 11), are not in the flesh, but in the Spirit. The Gentile who believed the gospel of grace passed into a new life and a new environment; he became altogether "in the Spirit". The boasted distinction between Jew and Gentile could only remain true "in the flesh", all was radically changed by union with the risen Christ. The exposition of the Scripture teaching of the "flesh" is too vast for us to attempt it here. We can but suggest the position and pass on.

The apostle adds to the statement of the Gentile's evil condition, by a parenthesis concerning circumcision in the flesh, made by hands. Until there was a circumcised person on earth there could not be a company called the uncircumcision. Israel's superiority, like its sign, was artificial and temporary. Two qualifying statements used here are illuminating. Circumcision, which was such a ground of boasting for the Jew, was in the flesh; circumcision was "made by hand". The apostle supplies his own commentary in Col. ii. 11-13, iii. 10, 11:--

> "In whom also ye are circumcised with the circumcision made WITHOUT HANDS, in putting off the body of the FLESH by the circumcision of Christ, buried with Him in the baptism, wherein also ye are risen with Him through the faith of the operation of God, > who hath raised Him from the dead, and you, being dead to your sins and the uncircumcision of your flesh, hath He quickened together with Him. . . . and have put on the NEW MAN. . . . where there is neither Greek nor Jew, circumcision nor uncircumcision, Barbarian, Scythian, bond nor free, but Christ is all and in all."

AT THAT TIME YE WERE WITHOUT CHRIST.—We can realize that to be of the uncircumcision involved one in hopeless gloom and distance, but when we add the above words the gloom becomes Egyptian darkness. To Israel a Messiah had been promised, the hope of His appearing burned like a star in the firmament, even though the conception of what the Messiah should be and what He should do fell far below the scriptural description. Nevertheless, nationally, and in a higher sense individually, the Messiah was of Israel and for Israel, "of whom concerning the flesh Christ came" (Rom. ix. 5). Like circumcision, this blessing was related to the flesh.

The apostle, before the revelation of the mystery, stepped beyond this limitation:--

> "Though we have known Christ after the flesh, yet now henceforth know we Him no more, therefore if any man be in Christ, he is a new creature" (II Cor. v. 16, 17).

As in Eph. ii., so here, the new creation, as the new man, is lifted beyond the "flesh" and is entirely in the "Spirit.

ALIENS FROM THE COMMONWEALTH OF ISRAEL, AND STRANGERS FROM THE COVENANTS OF PROMISE.—Little comment is necessary. The Syrophœnician woman learned this dispensational fact (Matt. xv.). Whatever mercies fell to the Gentiles down the age were crumbs from the master's table. In the eyes of the circumcision Gentiles were "dogs".

The word "commonwealth" and the pride and privilege it conveyed is well expressed in its one other occurrence: "the chief captain answered, With a great sum obtained I this FREEDOM". Israel had such a freedom, they had citizen's rights, from all of which the Gentiles were "strangers". Israel could look back to the "fathers" to whom were made the "covenants of promise"; the Gentiles could look back to no "fathers" to whom God had made special and distinguishing covenants. While God was the Lord of Hosts, and the Most High God, the possessor of heaven and earth, He was in a special sense the God of Israel, and the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob. So the passage goes on to say that if the Gentiles were strangers from the covenant of promise, then they had.

NO HOPE AND WERE WITHOUT GOD.—This passage is speaking of dispensational disability, not moral depravity. The word atheoi, "without a God", was used by the pagans of Rome to describe the Christians. They did not charge the believers with "ungodliness" by using this term, but with having a faith and a worship which had no visible God, and which caused them to deny "the gods". With a Pantheon full of "gods" and altars dedicated to the unknown god; with Athens, to quote an ancient writer, "so full of idols that it was easier to find a god than a man", is it not a tragedy that these nations were nevertheless atheoi, "without God".

IN THE WORLD.—With these words the terrible catalogue closes, and all hope and all light are excluded. The world is an abandoned evil complexity, it is the enemy of God and of godliness, its prince is the devil; the whole world lieth in wickedness (or the wicked one), the things of the world are not of the Father (I John ii. 15, 16), the rudiments of the world are antagonistic to Christ (Col. ii. 8). The world is totally oblivious of the work and witness of the Spirit (I Cor. ii. 12), the elements of the world held the Gentiles in bondage (Gal. iv. 3). Believers are "not of the world" (John xv. 19), the world knows them not (I John iii. 1), they have, in Him, "died to the world" (Col. ii. 20), and by His cross the world is crucified unto them, and they unto it.

If such be a portion of the Scripture testimony concerning this abandoned, wicked, godless world, what utter bondage and hopelessness is written in the words "in the world"! According to the age of this world the Gentiles had walked, energized by a mighty spirit, the prince of the power of the air (Eph. ii. 2, 3). From this pit of corruption, and this godless, Christless, promiseless wilderness, God, in the riches of His grace, stooped to save those who are destined to sit with Christ at the right hand of God in the super-heavenlies, far above all principality and power. Such grace is unspeakable.

Let us bow our heads in silent adoring worship, and let us rise from our Father's footstool, finding in our hearts as no stranger expression the words—for me to live is Christ.

#40. "Made Nigh" (Eph. ii. 13).

pp. 145 - 148

"But now."—The reader has possibly not brought with him the sense of utter despair with which the scriptural explanation of Eph. ii. 11, 12 left us. We cannot appreciate fully the glorious change introduced by these little words, "but now", if we are unmindful of the apostle's exhortation, "wherefore remember". We will not repeat ourselves, but trust that the reader may feel it worth the while to re-read Eph. ii. 11, 12 before going further.

The Scriptures which were in the hands of the church at this time gave no clue to what God would do when the dispensation of the Acts period closed with the setting aside of an unrepentant Israel. All its prophecies bridged the present interval and spoke of the blessings attendant upon the second coming. The inspired apostles themselves could offer no explanation. Peter confesses that while he did not charge the Lord with slackness concerning His promise, there were certainly things that only the beloved brother Paul in his epistles could clear up (II Pet. iii.). Some one may interpose that the Gentiles were saved and delivered from the dominion of sin and death long before Eph. ii. was written. This perfectly true and only helps us to see that we are dealing with something other than salvation in this passage.

What does the verse say? "But now, in Christ Jesus, ye who sometime were sinners are now saved"? No, it says, "but now, in Christ Jesus, ye who sometime were FAR OFF are made nigh by the blood of Christ". The blood of Christ which effected our redemption has also cancelled the dispensational disability and made us nigh. If the reader will glance over the verse following this statement, he will see that the glorious change is indeed one of privilege and access, not of salvation and forgiveness. Cornelius was saved, as recorded in Acts x., but in comparison with the position of the saved Gentile in Ephesians he was "far off". This glorious "but now" deals with "peace", "the middle wall of partition", the abolition of the enmity and the fullest expression of the reconciliation. It gives those who were strangers and aliens a citizenship; it makes those who were denied access to the temple on earth the very temple of the Lord, a temple not made with hands but an habitation of God in spirit. It is clear that the whole section is dispensational in character. The section Eph. ii. 11-13 is divided into two parts, as follows:--

A | "Once."
B | In flesh, aliens, strangers, hopeless, godless, without citizenship.
A | "Now."
B | In Christ, nigh, reconciled, fellow-citizens, a holy temple.

Look at the suggestive parallel:--

"Gentiles in the flesh," &c.
"Far off made nigh in Christ Jesus."

To be a Gentile in the flesh was to be far off; to be in Christ Jesus was to be made nigh. Notice the "now" in connection with Paul's special ministry of the mystery and with the subjects related to it, Eph. iii. 5-10, Col. i. 21-26. The grand dispensational change introduced by these words "but now" constitutes a unique revelation. As we proceed we shall see that the present interval, the "now" of these passages, is the dispensation of the mystery, a dispensation where all distinctions of nationality cease, yet at the same time a dispensation where peculiar blessings are directed towards the Gentiles. None of these blessings can reach the Gentile while "in the flesh", they are all "spiritual". None of them can reach the Gentile while he is "in the world" in the sense of Eph. ii. 12; these blessings are all "in the heavenlies", and more than that, they are all "in Christ".

The expressions "in Christ" and in "Christ Jesus" are limited in Ephesians to the doctrinal portion (i. - iii.). It may be worth while to note them:--

i. 3. All spiritual blessings in the heavenlies, in Christ.
i. 10. The gathering together in one, all things, in Christ.
i. 12. Members of the One Body have a prior hope, in Christ.
iii. 6. The Gentiles are joint-partakers of His promise, in Christ Jesus.
ii. 6. They have been made to sit together in the heavenlies, in Christ Jesus.
ii. 10. They have been created, in Christ Jesus.
ii. 13. They have been made nigh, in Christ Jesus.
iii. 11. The purpose of the ages was made, in Christ Jesus.

This sectional use of the title is the more emphasized when we note that the solitary expression "in Jesus" occurs in the practical section, "as the truth is in Jesus" (iv. 21). Out of the flesh, and out of the world, out of the dominion of sin and death, delivered in fact out of the authority of darkness and translated into the kingdom of God's dear Son, such is the blessed state of those sinners of the Gentiles who have been made meet to be partakers of the inheritance of the saints in the light. The opening, therefore, of this blessed dispensation of grace must be "but now, in Christ Jesus". These Gentiles were once "far off". A review of verses 11 and 12 (see previous article) will be enough to reveal the deplorable distance at which they were placed. They are now "made nigh", and who shall say how nigh?

When the Psalmist wished to glorify God for the blessing of Israel, he said:--

> "He also exalteth the horn of His people, the praise of all the saints; even of the children of Israel, a people near unto Him. Praise ye the Lord" (Psa. cxlviii. 14).

Again, in Deut. iv. 7 Moses says:--

> "And what nation is there so great who hath God so nigh unto them?"

The nations are often referred to in prophecy as being "far off" (see Isa. viii. 9; Jer. v. 15; xxxi. 10). When Israel were deprived of their privileges, they were, among other punishments, dispersed into "far countries"; and when the time of their reinstating comes, they will be gathered "from afar" (Jer. li. 50, xlvi. 27). Yet, however nigh the children of Israel are, what can compare to the position of one who has been made a very member of the Body of Christ, for whom it is not only revealed that Christ died FOR him, but also that he is so identified with his Lord, that from a time as far back as before the foundation of the world until the time of being manifested in glory he may read his spiritual history as "in Christ" and "with Christ"?

This change of dispensation, this wonderful access to privilege, this light after darkness, this nearness after distance, though in Christ, is not ours if we stop at this point. Something more must be added before the blessings are secure, before the earnest can be given, before the seal is set. Is it the work of the Spirit that is needed to complete the work? No! it is the blood of Christ. It will be remembered that the first blessing recorded in Ephesians as flowing to us through the work of Christ is "redemption through His blood", and not till after that do we read of the seal and the earnest of the Spirit. So here, not till the blood of Christ has removed all barriers do we read of the work of the One Spirit. Eph. ii. 13 tells us we are made nigh by the blood of Christ; Col. i. 20 tells us He made peace through the blood of the cross. This, together with the statement concerning redemption in Eph. i. 7, completes the testimony to the blood of Christ in the prison epistles—redeemed, forgiven, made nigh, and in peace, through the precious blood.

From the point of view of redemption the blood indicates the price that was paid; from the point of view of dispensational nearness the blood speaks of barriers broken down and a new basis laid; and peace arising out of the reconciliation effected comes through the same blood of the cross. The blood of Christ is set in sharp contrast with all the many efforts of the flesh to accomplish redemption, access and peace. It tells us at once that we are not dealing with reformation, but with new creation. Bloodshed indicates life given. Any further movement therefore must be new life, resurrection life; and resurrection is the sphere and power of the spiritual blessings of the dispensation of the mystery. Let us withhold no praise, love and service, when we think of our distance, and try to realize our nearness, as we contemplate the altar of sacrifice, the blood of atonement, the price paid to set us free and bring us nigh to God.

#41. Peace and Enmity (Eph. ii. 14).
pp. 177 - 180

We have followed the workings of Divine grace reaching out into the Egyptian darkness of the Gentiles without hope, without God, and without Christ, and bringing those who were far off nigh unto God. When we examine the doctrine and practice of this dispensation, we shall find that Christ Himself in a marked manner fills up the measure of Divine love and human need.

It is so in the passage under consideration. When the Gentiles are made nigh, they are made so "in Christ" and "by His blood", and when they begin to enter into the fruit of this grace, instead of finding impersonal blessings, they find Christ. The passage before us does not say, "made nigh by His blood, therefore we have peace with God"; it says, "for HE IS OUR PEACE". There is something about the Person of Christ that is found in no one else. Not merely what He has done claims our homage or ministers to our need, but what He is.

Christ is our LIFE (Col. iii. 4).
Christ is our HOPE (I Tim. i. 1; Col. i. 27).
Christ is our PEACE (Eph. ii. 14).

The subject of Peace in Ephesians is beautifully complete and of a special character. Knowing the infallible accuracy of Scripture we are not surprised to find the word occurring eight times, eight being the number of resurrection:--

Peace.

Emphasizing its connection with the dispensational position of the One Body.

A | i. 2. Salutation.
B | Peace, and the unity of the Spirit.
a | ii. 14. The Lord Himself.—The Head.
b | ii. 15. The twain.—One new man.
c | ii. 17. Preached to those far off.
c | ii. 17. Preached to those nigh.
b | iv. 3. Bond of the unity.
a | vi. 15. The armour for the feet.
A | vi. 23. Benediction.

If we consider these references we shall find that peace, in the sense in which it is used in such a passage as Rom. v. 1, is absent. Peace as a result of forgiven sin and justification is presupposed, but peace as opposed to faction and division is prominent and emphasized. The central member "B", with its subdivisions must claim our attention. The six members flow out of the truth of ii. 14. In what way does it mean that He is our peace? The verse goes on to explain: "for He is our peace having made the both ONE". We cannot consider the peace apart from the unity. "The both": who are they? Are they God and the sinner? The fact that the subject returns on itself and comes back to its starting point in verse 15 ("in order that the two He might create in Himself into one new man, making peace") shows that they are not. Here all is explained. Whoever the two may be, they form part of one new man. This rules out the idea that in verse 14 "the both" can mean God and the sinner, for God has not been made part of the one new man. "The peace" of verse 14 is explained for us, it follows as a result of the two being made one, it is not the peace of forgiveness or justification, it is the peace of unity and reconciliation. The words "He is our peace" are explained also by this verse; for the creation of the one new man is in Himself, there is no unity contemplated here that is outside Christ. He Himself is the ground of meeting, the ground of unity, the hope of glory, the foundation and the chief corner stone. The unity of the Spirit is not a unity where the manifestations of the Spirit will be prominent, but where Christ will be all in all. The peace of Eph. iv. 3 is the peace of Eph. ii. 14, 15.

We are sent upon a search the moment we look at the inspired original, "endeavouring to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of THE PEACE". What peace is here intended? The answer is—the peace of Eph. ii. 14, 15. The unity of the Spirit stands in contrast to the divisions made by the flesh. These divisions being abolished in the new man, peace is attained, Christ Himself, being the peace of this unity, becomes in turn the bond that binds all together. It is the same aspect of peace that is intended in verse 17. He came to the far off Gentile and the dispensationally near Jew, and by the revelation of the one body preached peace. The members of that unity preach the same in their turn, their feet are shod with the preparation of the gospel of the peace. The vexatious differences between Jew and Gentile have given place to the peace of unity, Christ Himself the meeting place of "the both", Christ Himself the peace, Christ Himself the Head, and all the members equal. If ever the ideal expressed in the words "Liberty, Equality, Fraternity" is realized, it is realized here.

As a further elucidation of the nature of the peace that is meant in Eph. ii. 14 come the words, "and hath broken down the middle wall of partition, the enmity". Most readers know to what the reference is here. An inscription in Greek is to be seen in the British Museum, which translated reads:--

> "NO ONE BEING A FOREIGNER MAY ENTER INTO THE ENCLOSURE AROUND THE HOLY PLACE, WHOSOEVER IS APPREHENDED WILL HIMSELF BE TO BLAME FOR HIS DEATH WHICH WILL CERTAINLY FOLLOW."

This inscription was set up on the wall of the enclosure of the holy place in the temple at Jerusalem. Cornelius and Peter might both be saved, might both be baptized with the same spirit and in the same water; yet Peter could pass through the barrier and Cornelius must remain outside. It was the cause of much enmity. Paul's imprisonment was humanly speaking due to the fact that the Jews charged him with bringing into the holy place a Gentile—glorious prophecy, unconsciously made, of the result of his prison ministry. The reader will have noticed that we have included the word "enmity" in verse 14. The A.V. and the R.V., J.N.D. and Rotherham agree in keeping the word to verse 15. The Diaglott reads, "And having removed the enmity, the middle wall of partition". This places the word enmity first. Strictly the order of the original is:--

> "And the middle wall of the partition having broken up the enmity in the flesh of Himself the law of the commandment in ordinances having put out of working order."

The rendering we prefer makes the division of the sentence come after the word enmity. The A.V., R.V., and others put the stop before. He is our peace, for He destroyed the cause of enmity. That cause was the dispensational distinction between Jew and Gentile, the emblem of which was the middle wall in the temple. The Jews may make an uproar in the sacred building, they may exhibit all the enmity of their nature against the chosen vessel of the Lord, but in Him there is unity and there is peace.

Let us remember that we are exhorted to teach this unity. Let us remember also that enmity is a seed that grows only in the flesh—"the works of the flesh are. . . . enmities, quarrels, jealousies, resentment, altercations, factions, sects". The multifarious enmities of the flesh do not make for peace, and they certainly have not been made by the Lord. While owning the whole family of faith, let us cleave to the Lord, endeavouring to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of THE PEACE.

Passages from Proverbs.

#3. The Guarded Heart.

pp. 23 – 25

> "More than any guard-post, keep watch over thine heart, for out of it are the outgoings of life" (Prov. iv. 28, Miller's translation).

The marginal reading of Prov. iv. 23, "above all keeping", shows that the translators realized the intensity of the wording of the original here. There is a prefix M, which denotes "post" or "place" or "person". Adopting the suggestive translation quoted above, we render it "guard-post". The idea is this: if one or another out-post should be taken by a surprise attack, it may be won back again, but if the citadel, the central fort, be taken, all is lost. The out-posts begin to be enumerated in the verses which follow, "the mouth", "the lips" (24), "the eyes", "the eyelids" (25), "the path" (26), "the feet" (27).

That our attention may be drawn to these out-posts the scripture brings them before us in pairs: not only the mouth, but the lips; not only the eyes, but the eyelids; not only the path, but the feet. Important, however, as they are, we read, "above all keeping" keep the heart itself. Let us consider the teaching of the word with this thought in mind.

The importance of the hearts rests on the fact that out of it are the issues of life. It is so physically, and the physical world shadows forth eternal realities:--

> "A sound heart is the life of the flesh: but envy the rottenness of the bones" (Prov. xiv. 30).

Not only does soundness of heart mean life to the flesh, but the very countenance is an index of the heart within:--

> "A merry heart maketh a cheerful countenance, but by sorrow of the heart the spirit is broken" (xv. 13).

Joys that come from without are illusive, transient and often unreal, the peace and joy that arise within enable the believer to face the trials and vexations of this wilderness with smiling face:--

> "All the days of the afflicted are evil: but he that is of a merry heart hath a continual feast" (xv. 15).

The "afflicted" are those who among other things are "poor" (xiv. 21). The merry heart, however, spreads his table and turns the "evil" into " a continual feast". The word "evil", while often meaning moral evil or wickedness, many times means a "calamity". The law of correspondence settles the question for us here, placing "evil" in opposition to "a continual feast". This rule is to be observed in other passages, particularly in Isa. xlv. 7, where evil is contrasted, not with righteousness or good, but with peace. The merry heart is such because of the joy of trusting the Lord, and because the love of God has been shed abroad within it. The Proverbs therefore expand the thought given in xv. 15 by saying:--

> "Better is a little with the fear of the Lord than great treasure and trouble therewith. Better is a dinner of herbs where love is, than a stalled ox and hatred therewith" (16, 17).

As the Lord hath said, "a man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth". Not only is the heart the well-spring of life, not only does is show itself in the countenance and in the attitude of the afflicted; it is further written,

> "The heart of the wise teacheth his mouth, and added learning to his lips" (xvi. 23).

The mere "talk of the lips tendeth only to penury", but a wise and instructed heart teacheth the mouth the words that shall be "in season to him that is weary"; it will add the "grace" to the lips, so that all shall be, as it were, "seasoned with salt"; "for out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh".

Another reference to the "merry heart" is found in xvii. 22:--

> "A merry heart doeth good like a medicine: but a broken spirit drieth the bones."

There is healing in the joyful heart that spreads through all the outgoings of life. The converse is true; a caviling, murmuring spirit (for as the word "broken" may be understood) "drieth the bones".

> "Before destruction the heart of man is haughty, and before honour is humility" (xviii. 2).

Here again the vital relation between the heart and "the issues of life" is evident. The destruction that is sure to come may not yet have appeared on the horizon, but it is certainly indicated by the haughty heart. How forcibly, therefore, the words of the Proverb come! "More than any guard-post, keep watch over thine heart." The word "keep" gives us the words "watchmen" and "watchers" in II Kings xvii. 9, Jer. iv. 16, and indicates the keeping or the guarding of a besieged city. When we think of the seductions of the world, the many snares and pitfalls that beset our path, the lurking enemy that is still within our very citadel, the greatness of the enemy that is still without, we may well shrink from the task of attempting to keep the heart. Here the words of the apostle come to our relief –

> "Let your moderation be known unto all men, the Lord is at hand. Be careful for nothing; but in everything by prayer and supplication with thanksgiving let your requests be made known unto God, and the peace of God which passeth all understanding SHALL KEEP (as with a garrison) YOUR HEARTS AND MINDS through Christ Jesus" (Phil. iv. 5-7).

Studies in the Book of the Revelation.

#31. The Great Multitude (vii. 9-17).

pp. 1 - 5

There are some commentators of standing and repute who have, notwithstanding the definite statement of the early part of Rev. vii., interpreted the 144,000 of the tribes of the children of Israel* as of the church.

It will be remembered that we considered this passage in our last article, and gave evidence that the statements of the chapter were to be taken literally. We now approach the second part of the chapter, and the questions arise, "Is the great multitude the church? Are they Gentiles?" By far the great majority of writers take it for granted that this company is composed of saved Gentiles. This we question, and ask the reader to reserve his judgment until we have examined the Scripture together. It is no argument to produce Scripture to show that the Gentiles will be blessed through Israel—that is a blessed fact, but it does not prove anything here. The words of verse 9 are taken to indicate the Gentile character of the great multitude:--

> "After this, I beheld, and lo, a great multitude, which no man could number, of all nations, and kindreds, and people, and tongues.'

The reader will doubtless be aware that the passage should be rendered, "out of all nations". We have met with a similar expression in chapter v. 9, 10:--

> "Thou didst purchase for God, by Thy blood, out of every tribe, and tongue, and people, and nation, and didst make them to our God a kingdom and priests, and they reign over the earth."

In article #24 (Volume VIII, pp. 161-164) we considered the passage, and concluded that this was a redemption of scattered Israel, not out of one nation, nor as at the first from Egypt, but from many nations (Isa. xi. 11, 12); the fact that those redeemed were to be a kingdom and priests, pointed to Israel also. The great multitude likewise are Israelites gathered out of every nation, they too are invested with priestly dignity, "they serve Him day and night IN HIS TEMPLE". The great multitude were "clothed with white robes". The only other mention of robes outside this chapter is in chapter vi. 11. Under the fifth seal we heard the cry of the martyrs, to whom was given a white robe, with the injunction to await the vengeance for their blood until their brethren and fellow-servant who should be killed as they were, should be fulfilled. When we see the great white-robed multitude, we see the fulfillment of the promise of the fifth seal. The white-robed throng bear palm branches.

[* - A note regarding the Studies in the Book of the Revelation.]

> "D.T.S., Guernsey.—You remark in November Berean Expositor that 'The omission of Simeon from the blessing of Moses is unexplained in the narrative and so far as we know is unexplained by any interpretation of Scripture.' Have you noticed in The Companion Bible that the note on Deut. xxxiii. 7 runs thus, 'Judah includes Simeon by Fig. Synecdoche; for their inheritance and blessing were one.' This is certainly confirmed by the two passages cited, viz.:-- Joshus xix.1 and Judges i. 3. Doesn't this afford us some light, and it may be the only light that Scripture gives us."

Dr. Bullinger in his Apocalypse refers back to Lev. xxiii. 39-43. In that chapter we have the whole of Israel's history epitomized in the feasts. Commencing with the birth of the nation at the passover we follow its course through Pentecost, Harvest, Trumpets, Atonement, and lastly the feast of the Tabernacles. This is also connected with the ingathering of the fruit, and it is at this point that the palm branches are mentioned. Israel were to dwell in booths or tabernacles for the seven days of the feast. When the true feast of Tabernacles is celebrated it is written, "and He that sitteth on the throne shall TABERNACLE among them" (Rev. vii. 17). The reason for the feast of Tabernacles is given in Lev. xxiii. 43:--

> "That your generations may know that I made the children of Israel to dwell in booths, when I brought them OUT OF THE LAND OF EGYPT.'

The feast of Tabernacles is connected with the "year of release" (Deut. xv. 1; xxxi. 10). By comparing Rev. vii., xiv., and Lev. xxiii. together, we arrive at the following. The 144,000 sealed ones are the "FIRST FRUITS UNTO GOD". The great multitude constitute the HARVEST that follows. When we come to study xiv., we shall have further details given us as to the character of the 144,000, and why some tribes are omitted from the number. The church in Philadelphia had the promise, "Because thou didst keep the word of My patience, I also will keep thee out of the hour of temptation". The promise says nothing about keeping out of the "great tribulation".—it speaks of an hour of temptation, and a temptation which comes upon all the world to try those that dwell on the earth. This will include the worship of the image, the reception of his name or number, and will involve these earth-dwellers in unclean ceremonies. From all this the overcomers will be kept, and so we read their undefiled character in xiv. 4.

The first-fruit is followed by a glorious harvest. If the 144,000 are sustained during the temptation, the great multitude are enabled to endure the great tribulation. The great multitude come out of "the tribulation, the great one". This we learn from the question that is put by one of the elders, the answer being, "these are they which came out of great tribulation". This great tribulation is the subject of more than one prophecy. Matt. xxiv. 15-22 links it with Daniel's abomination of desolation which is distinctly connected with a fearful outbreak against Israel. Dan. xii. 1 says:--

> "And at that time shall Michael stand up, the great prince which standeth for the children of thy people; and there shall be a time of trouble, such as never was since there was a nation even unto that same time: and at that time thy people shall be delivered, every one that shall be found written in the book."

It will be remembered that only those whose names were "written in the book" withstood the pressure which was brought to bear upon them to make them worship the beast and receive his mark. Jer. xxx. 7 says:--

> "Alas! for the day is great, so that none is like it, it is even the time of Jacob's trouble, but he shall be saved out of it."

The white-robed multitude who stand before the throne have come out of the great tribulation, "such as never was", "so that none is like it", they come out of that tribulation which oppressed Daniel's "people"—Israel, which was called "Jacob's trouble".

Let us now seek to understand the meaning of the words, "they washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb". It is a misconception to speak of this passage as a "standing of works", in contrast with the "standing in grace" of the present dispensation. The dispensation is certainly different from the present one, but there is no question of a standing in works here. These are "overcomers", whose salvation has been settled for good by the once offered sacrifice of Christ. The epistle to the Hebrews makes this clear, and we cannot find any scriptural warrant to convince us that any one will be saved, under whatever dispensation he may come, by a mingling of works and faith: the blood of Christ is spoken of four times in the Revelation:--

> "Unto Him that loveth us, and loosed us from our sins by His Own blood, and made us a kingdom and priests to His God and Father." (i. 56).
> "Thou wast slain, and didst redeem back to God, by Thy blood, out of every tribe, tongue, people and nation, and Thou didst make them to our God a kingdom and priests, and they shall reign on the earth" (v. 9).
>
> "They washed their robes and made them white by the blood of the Lamb, because of this are they before the throne of God" (vii. 14).
> "And they overcame him because of the blood of the Lamb, and because of the word of their testimony, and they loved not their lives unto the death" (xii. 11).

Let us notice the facts here recorded, and the order of their development. First is the redemption of the priestly nation, stated without any details except the fact of the redemption and the goal towards which that redemption was directed:--

From sins. . . . By His blood. . . .A kingdom and priests.

Secondly, the added item is now given that this redemption was not only from sins, but from exile and banishment, "out of every tribe, tongue, people and nation"; further, the sphere of their priestly kingdom is indicated, "they shall reign on, or over, the earth". So far nothing has been said concerning the personal faithfulness of those redeemed, these two passages speak of all Israel. The book of the Revelation, however, from first to last is chiefly concerned with "him that overcometh":--

Out of all nations. . . . By His blood. . . . A kingdom and priests on earth.

The two remaining references do not speak of "all Israel", but of a faithful number of witnessing Israelites who overcome. In the third reference therefore the question of redemption from sin is not in view, it is now, "the things that accompany salvation" (Hebrews), or the "working out their own salvation with fear and trembling" (Philippians) that is intended:--

They washed their robes. . . . By the blood. . . . They are before the throne.

The fourth reference makes the positive statement:--

They overcame the devil. . . . Because of the blood.

Again redemption from sin is not in question. Now "the washing of the robes", a symbolical statement, is parallel with "overcoming", a literal statement. Daniel refers to the effect of this trying time in chapters x. and xi., "and some of them of understanding shall fall, to try them, and to purge, and to make them white, even to the time of the end" (xi. 35), "many shall be purified, and made white, and tried" (xii. 10). Zechariah is more specific. "I will bring the third part through the fire, and will refine them as silver is refined, and will try them as gold is tried" (xiii. 9). Malachi also refers to a similar effect of "that day", "He shall sit as a refiner and purifier of silver: and He shall purify the sons of Levi, and purge them as gold and silver, that they may offer unto the Lord an offering in righteousness" (iii. 3). Coming to the book of Revelation itself:--

> "Thou hast a few names even in Sardis which have not defiled their garments, and they shall walk with Me IN WHITE, for they are WORTHY; he that overcometh, the same be clothed in WHITE RAIMENT" (iii. 4, 5).

The great multitude therefore are "overcomers"

> "I saw the souls of them that were slain for the Word of God. . . . and WHITE ROBES were given unto every one of them (vi. 9-11).
> "The marriage of the Lamb is come, and His wife hath made herself ready, and to her was granted that she should be arrayed in fine linen, clean and bright, for the fine linen is the righteous (award) of saints" (xix. 7, 8).

Here are some who are pronounced "worthy", some who "make themselves ready". There is no mingling of grace and works, for it is purely a question of overcoming, not of salvation, that is in view all the time. Those who overcame, the preserved of the great tribulation, are said, in a figure, to have "washed their robes by the blood of the Lamb". It was because of His blood they overcame, and to them is given the victor's reward. God deals with the redeemed nation in companies. The great bulk are destined to rule on the earth, some by reason of faithfulness will be rewarded with a heavenly ministry, some will be numbered among a company called the Bride, which is chiefly connected with the New Jerusalem. What those had endured who had come out of the great tribulation is indicated in verses 15 and 17, hunger and thirst (for the Beast will control the supply of food); great heat through exposure and lack of home and covering; tears, for their sorrows were indeed great.

With these closing verses we break through the thick darkness of that day, and see the peace and rest of that which lies beyond for scattered Israel, and for blinded Gentiles; and nothing short of this can satisfy. Praise God! darkness may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning.

#32. The Seven Trumpets. Temple Judgments (viii.).
pp. 33 - 38

The sixth seal leads on to the day of the wrath of the Lamb, when the heavens shall depart as a scroll. This one statement is sufficient to prove that the sealing of the 144,000 does not follow the sixth seal in time. We are evidently taken back in the history covered by the six seals. The breaking of the seventh seal is therefore very markedly severed off from the breaking of the sixth. The seventh seal is the beginning of another series. A sevenfold judgment is revealed which culminates in the accession of Christ to the throne of universal dominion under the seventh trumpet.

The opening of the seventh seal is followed by silence, silence for about half an hour. While we can easily find "great voices" and "thunders" on other similar occasions which mark a contrast, the silence of this verse seems to indicate something deeper. Dr. Bullinger in The Apocalypse (pp. 294, 295) has brought together the following passages which we here quote:--

> "On earth, the cry of the saints has been incessant. They 'cry day and night'. In heaven the cry is now about to be answered, and there is a solemn pause—the silence of expectation."
>
> "The Heb. dumeyyah (silence) (fem. adj.) which occurs four times exactly expresses the position:--
>
> (1). 'O my God, I cry in the daytime, but Thou hearest not; And in the night season there is no silence to me' (Psa. xxii. 2, 3).
>
> (2). 'I was dumb with silence' (Psa. xxxix. 2).
>
> (3). 'Truly my soul is silence toward God:
> From Him cometh my salvation' (Psa. lxii. 1).
>
> (4). 'There shall be silence before Thee,
> And praise, O God, in Zion,
> O Thou that hearest prayer,
> Unto Thee shall all flesh come' (Psa. lxv. 1. R.V. margin).
> In all these four passages the word denotes a period of waiting between the offering of the prayer, and the giving of the answer which shall call forth praise. The adverb in Lam. iii. 26 exactly expresses it. 'It is good when one doth wait even in silence for the salvation of Jehovah'."

The words of Hab. ii. 20 seem applicable to this scene, "The Lord is in His holy temple, be silent all the earth before Him". So also Zech. ii. 13, "Be silent, O all flesh before the Lord: for He is raised up out of His holy habitation". Some action of intense moment seems imminent. All heaven awaits the moment when God shall speak.

The first movement that follows the silence is the giving of seven trumpets to the seven angels which stood before God.

The seven angels (Tous hepta angelous). Before the throne, we read in iv. 5, were the seven spirits. According to v. 6 the seven spirits of God were sent forth into all the earth. Seven angels preside over the seven churches of Asia. The apostle Paul when writing to Timothy said, "I charge thee before God and the Lord Jesus Christ, and the elect angels". This is comparable with Rev. i. 4, 5, "Grace be unto you and peace, from Him which is, and which was, and which is to come, and from the seven spirits which are before the throne, and from Jesus Christ". Here is heaven's supreme court. "The judgment shall sit", and it is because of the solemnity of that long-deferred judgment that heaven ceases as it were to breathe in dreadful sympathy and anticipation.

Before the seven angels sound their trumpets, another angel steps forward and by his action indicates the character of the impending judgments. They are TEMPLE judgments.

The sixth seal left us certainly at the throne, and the close of chapter vii. speaks of the throne, but that is not the case in chapter viii. Even the formula is altered. The seven angels are not said to stand before the throne, but simply before God. Further, it is not true exposition to draw a severe line between "throne" and "temple", for Rev. xvi. 17 reads, "And the seventh angel poured out his vial into the air; and there came a great voice out of the temple, from the throne". The Vatican Manuscript, Lt., and Tr. all agree to this reading, "out of the temple from the throne", which unites throne and temple together. The very passage before us does the same thing:--

> "And another angel came and stood at the altar, having a golden censer: and there was given him much incense, that he should offer it with the prayers of all saints upon the golden altar which was before the throne."

The throne is in the temple, and cannot be severed from it. Unlike all other kings the Lord unties priesthood and kingship together. The testimony of Zech. vi. 13 is fatal to the conception of a clear cut distinction between throne and temple in the Revelation:--

> "He shall sit and rule upon His throne; and He shall be a priest upon His throne."

Isaiah's vision, as recorded in chapter vi., links the throne with the temple:--

> "In the year that King Uzziah died I saw also the Lord sitting upon a throne, high and lifted up, and His train filled the temple. . . . mine eyes have seen the King. . . . a live coal from off the altar."

Here again the intentional linking of throne and temple, king and priest, will be recognized, especially when we remember Uzziah's act. He attempted to unite in himself kingship and priesthood, and for his temerity he was smitten with leprosy. In the year that the king died, Isaiah had a vision of the true and only Priest-King.

As the Priest-King, the Lord Jesus appears before us in the opening vision of Revelation, and as the Priest-King He will rule and reign. When we read of one who walks in the midst of the seven golden candlesticks, we see a priest. When we read of his golden girdle, and his clothing, we read of the symbol robes of a priest.

What is true of the opening of this seventh seal is also true of the sounding of the seventh trumpet. Rev. xi. 15-19 records the sounding of the seventh trumpet, and when that trumpet sounds:--

> "The TEMPLE of God was opened in heaven, and there was seen in His temple the ark of His covenant: and there were thunderings, and an earthquake, and great hail."

This temple scene is closely connected with the proclamation, "The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord and His Christ: and He shall reign for the ages of the ages."

We will now consider a little more closely the record of chapter viii. The prayers that ascend, with the incense offered by the angel, are answered by a symbolic action of judgment:--

> "And the angel took the censer, and filled it with fire of the altar, and cast it into the earth: and there were cries, and thunderings, and lightnings, and an earthquake."

This answer to the prayers which is here given, covers the period of the seven trumpets. The prayers of those under the altar who cry for vengeance are last to be heard. The "little season" (Rev. vi. 11) has passed, the seventh of these angels shall introduce the time when the dead should be judged, and rewards given to the Lord's servants and saints. The judgments do not fall in one stroke. Each trumpet sound introduces an added plague. This sevenfold judgment seems to be a fulfillment of Psa. lxxix. 12. "And render unto our neighbours sevenfold into their bosom." The whole psalm is prophetic of the period. The heathen have come into the Lord's inheritance. The holy temple is defiled, Jerusalem is in heaps. The dead bodies of servants and saints are devoured by the fowls of heaven and the beasts of the earth. Their blood has been shed round about Jerusalem like water. The heathen have taunted Israel with the silence of God. They pray:--

> "Let Him be known among the heathen in our sight by the revenging of the blood of Thy servants which is shed."

This prayer ascends unto the Lord. It is answered with fire from the altar. FIRE FROM THE ALTAR (viii. 5). Then these judgments are temple judgments. Let us look at the fire from the altar as it falls upon the earth at the sounding of these trumpets.

> "The first angels sounded and there followed hail and fire mingled with blood, and they were cast upon the earth, and third part of the earth was burned up, and the third of the trees was burned up, and all green grass was burned up."

Here is the effect of the fire from the altar. All human life is dependent upon the vegetable kingdom. It is not possible for man to assimilate for himself the elements which form his food. The lower orders of creation must lay hold of these for him. With an atmosphere around him four fifths of which is nitrogen, he would die of starvation. So with all the other necessary elements. What a stroke then it will be when a third part of the earth which stores the food, and the trees and grass which render that food available, are burned with fire.

Under the third seal famine is seen and here is a parallel affliction. The affliction of a third part is a feature of these early trumpet judgments. Let us, to save space, tabulate the references:--

1st trumpet.	Fire.	Third part of the earth and the trees.
2nd trumpet.	Fire.	Third part of the sea.
		Third part of the creatures in the sea.
		Third part of the ships destroyed.
3rd trumpet.	Burning Lamp.	Third part of rivers and fountains of waters.
		Third part of waters becomes wormwood.
4th trumpet.	. . .	Third part of sun, moon and stars darkened.
		Third part of the day and night affected.

There is mercy in this judgment, and it is more clearly seen when we turn to the seven vials. There mercy is withdrawn. The sea, not a third part, becomes as blood, and every living soul died in the sea. The rivers and fountains of waters become blood, not a third part. The close parallel between the trumpets and vials we shall see later.

Before we conclude we would draw attention to the equally close parallel between these judgments and the plagues sent through Moses upon Egypt.

> The first plague in Egypt turned the river into blood and the fish died.
> The second filled the land with frogs.
> The third afflicts man with lice.
> The fourth corrupted the land with swarms of flies.
> The fifth afflicted the cattle with a grievous murrain.
> The sixth afflicted the Egyptians with boils.
> The seventh kills the cattle with hail.
> The eighth, by means of locusts, devours every herb and fruit.
> The ninth plunged Egypt into awful darkness.
> The tenth smote every firstborn.

The trumpet and vial judgments of the Revelation are repetitions or parallels upon a vaster and grander scale, but they are as literal. We wish to hurt no one's feelings when we speak of the interpretation of these judgments set forth by such men as Elliot, Wordsworth, and others of the same school, but with Exodus before us we refuse to believe that the first trumpet means the wars of the Goths and the Vandals, or that "trees" mean princes, and "grass" their power and glory. God Himself has said that in the day of the Lord He will show wonders in the heavens, and signs on the earth, blood and fire and pillars of smoke. The sun shall be turned into darkness and the moon into blood. The literal plagues of Egypt prepare us for the literal judgments of the Revelation. We do not rest however upon analogy, we have definite Scripture for our belief. Israel's future is connected by a parallel with Exodus.

> "According to the days of thy coming out of the land of Egypt will I show unto him marvellous things" (Micah vii. 15; Isa. xi. 15, 16).

The redemption of Israel from Egypt will be repeated on a grand scale (Jer. xxiii. 7, 8). Indeed God makes a covenant that He will do marvels such as have not been done in all the earth, nor in any nation (Ex. xxxiv. 10). As every prophecy that has been fulfilled has been fulfilled literally, we prefer to take our stand with those who believe that the sea, the trees, the rivers, and the ships of these trumpet judgments are to be understood literally.

We have only to call to mind the menace to national existence that the submarine campaign instituted, to appreciate, somewhat, the dreadful calamity it will be when a third part of the shipping is destroyed.

Our desire is single—we wish to believe God, and to help His people to be free to do the same, and any allusions to the teachings of other servants of God are not made in a carping spirit, but in an earnest desire for truth free of tradition.

#33. The First Woe.--The opening of the Abyss (ix. 1-11).
pp. 65 - 70

To set out in diagram form that the seventh seal sub-divides into seven trumpets, and the seventh trumpet again sub-divides into seven vials, is attractive, and we have made several attempts to improve upon the efforts of those who had previously dealt with it. Being desirous of making our lay-out as scriptural as possible, we made careful examination of the Scriptures to obtain data upon which to work. The result is that no diagram has been prepared, for we have been obliged to confess that our notion on the subject was not supported sufficiently by the Scriptures.

We have seen that the six seals are complete in themselves. No event except solemn silence is chronicled upon the opening of the seventh seal. Instead of the seventh seal expanding to cover the events of the seven trumpets and seven vials, a new set of prophetic visions, ranging over parts of history already covered by the six seals, is introduced by the seven trumpets judgments. Just as the sixth seal completes the series, leaving the seventh detached and isolated, so the sixth trumpet appears to complete the series.

The narrative proceeds unbroken till the sixth trumpet is sounded (ix. 13-21). Chapter x. does not immediately follow with the sounding of the seventh trumpet. Another mighty angel comes down from heaven, holding in his hand a little book. Seven thunders utter their voices and their utterances are sealed. The mighty angel refers to the days of the sounding of the seventh trumpet as a period when the mystery of God shall be finished. John, however, is told that he must prophecy again before many peoples and nations and tongues and kings. The temple of God is measured, and the two witnesses prophecy for 1260 days. There is therefore a considerable interval indicated. These trumpets are, however, connected by the fact that they are called the three woes (viii. 13; ix. 12; xi. 14). Chapter xii. must go back again in history, for the seventh trumpet proclaims Christ as heaven's King, while in chapter xii. Satan is active and the Lord's people are persecuted. Chapter xiii. tells of the rise of the beast and the false prophet, and chapter xiv. speaks of the 144,000 on Mount Zion, and of the fall of Babylon. Then after this long interval the apostle speaks of the seven vials as the seven last plagues. It will be seen, however, that under the seventh vial great Babylon comes into remembrance (xvi. 19), whose judgment is given in detail in chapters xvii. and xviii. This shows that once again, under the vials, history is retraversed. Then follows the great Hallelujah of xix., the marriage supper of the Lamb, and the riding forth of Christ as King of kings.

It will be seen that a great interval separates the trumpets from the vials, and there is no possibility, so it appears to us, that the seventh trumpet which proclaims that the kingdoms of this world have become the kingdoms of the Lord and of His Christ, can develop into the seven vials which culminate in the judgment of Babylon. The order of these seals and trumpets may be perceived more clearly if set out thus:--

A | The Six Seals. A series of judgments ending in wrath of the Lamb.
Heaven departs as a scroll.
B | Episode separating the seventh seal from the rest.
The 144,000 and the great multitude.
C | The Seventh Seal. Silence in heaven.
A | The Six Trumpets. A series of judgments characterized by the affliction of "a third part".
B | Episodes separating the seventh trumpet from the rest.
The little book. The two witnesses.
C | The Seventh Trumpet. Christ proclaimed King.

So far there is a sequence of events which corresponds, but with chapter xii. we commence something quite different. There is, however, a very marked connection between the seven trumpets and the seven vials, which we must notice before we attempt to go further.

Trumpets. (Partial, not complete, mercy still holding back).	Vials. (The last plagues. In these the fury of God completed).
FIRST.	FIRST.
On the earth fire and blood. Third part trees and all grass burnt up.	On the earth grievous sore on worshippers of the beast.
SECOND.	SECOND.
On the sea. Third part became blood. Third part creatures died. Third part ships destroyed.	On the sea. It (the sea) became as blood of a dead man. Every living creature died.
THIRD.	THIRD.
On the rivers and fountains. Third part smitten. Third part wormwood.	On rivers and fountains. All smitten. They become blood.
FOURTH.	FOURTH.
On sun, moon and stars. Third part smitten. Third part of day and night.	On the sun. men scorched.
FIFTH.	FIFTH.
The Abyss opened. Darkness. Men tormented 5 months. King Appollyon.	The throne of the beast. Darkness. Men gnawed their tongues for pain.
SIXTH.	SIXTH.
The river Euphrates. The four angels loosed. Horsemen. Third part of men killed.	The river Euphrates dried up. Way for kings of East prepared. Three spirits like frogs. Armageddon.
SEVENTH.	SEVENTH.
Voices saying. Kingship of Christ.	Into the air. Voice says, "It is done."

By comparing the foregoing columns the reader will see that God in His longsuffering reserved the full outpouring of wrath till the end. A third part is smitten under the trumpets, yet men repented not, so the long-deferred stroke at last must fall. By reason of the terrible results that follow the sounding of the last three trumpets, they are called "three woes".

> "And I beheld and I heard one eagle flying in mid-heaven, saying with a loud voice, Woe, woe, woe, to those that dwell upon the earth by reason of the sounding of the trumpet of the three angels who are about to sound" (viii. 13).

The reading "eagle" (aetos) is supported by the best texts (see R.V.). Eagles are often used in Scripture in association with judgment, and this may be the reason for its use here. Our interest is therefore focussed upon these three trumpets, and we shall observe that they are described at greater length than the first four.

The first four trumpets are somewhat preparatory, warnings as it were to men concerning the nature of their guilt and the judgment impending. Up till this point the seals and the trumpets have shown wonders in earth, sea, air, heaven, and the greater and lesser luminaries.

The first woe opens the Abyss. What this fact means the mind cannot conceive. The Revelation contains several such crises. The casting of Satan out of heaven to the earth is another such close contact with hell. So also when the beast arises out of the Abyss. What an awful place the world will then become. The nature of the judgment is suggested by the likeness used—locusts. The host of destroyers is headed by Apollyon, the destroyer.

It would appear also from a close following of the original, that a fallen star, not one of the angels of God, is commissioned to let loose this scourge upon the earth. "And I saw a star, out of heaven having fallen". The idea is not so much that John saw the star fall, but that he saw a fallen star. To this fallen star is given the key of the pit of the abyss. The LXX uses this word abussos ("the deep") in Gen. i. 2. The waters which at that time covered the earth were pushed back at the emerging of the earth, again to break their bounds at the flood, when "the fountains of the great deep were broken up" (Gen. vii. 11).

The loosing of these locusts is a forerunner of a greater scourge, for out of the Abyss arises the beast (Rev. xi. 7; xvii. 8). It will be the prison of Satan during the thousand years. It is not to be confused with gehenna or the lake of fire, as it is differentiated in xvii. 8 from perdition. Satan likewise emerges from the Abyss after the thousand years and is cast into the lake of fire. The Abyss, being so closely connected with the supernatural evils of the closing days of Gentiles dominion, will not, we might well expect, liberate blessing to the earth, when the pit is opened by the fallen star. Smoke and intense darkness prepare the way for the scourge now let loose, which is described as that of locusts.

When the prophet Joel would speak of the terrors of the great and dreadful day of the Lord, he uses the figure of the locust. It is probable that Joel i. 4 refers to the locust under four stages of its development. The children's children were to tell the children of another generation of this destructive scourge. "Alas", says the prophet, "for the day! for the day of the Lord is at hand, and as a destruction from the Almighty shall it come" (Joel i. 15). The second chapter under the blowing of a trumpet speaks of this terrible visitation in language that applies to man. "A great people and a strong". Yet they are not ordinary men for, "there hath not been ever the like, neither shall there be any more after it, even to the years of many generations" (Joel ii. 2).

The Assyrian invasions were foreshadowings of the day of the Lord. That is why Isaiah, in the midst of his prophecy concerning the future, breaks off to tell of Sennacherib and his overthrow. In Prov. xxx. 27 we are told that "the locusts have no king". As the locusts of Rev. ix. have a king, it follows that these are a different kind from the natural order.

The description of these strange beings is fairly full, if at the same time strange:--

1. They are like horses prepared unto battle.
2. They wore as it were golden crowns.
3. Their faces were like the faces of men.
4. They had hair as the hair of women.
5. Their teeth were like the teeth of a lion.
6. They had breastplates of iron.
7. They made a sound like many chariots
8. They had tails like scorpions.
9. And they had a king named Apollyon.

There is a resemblance between the natural and the supernatural order of locusts in that five months is the space over which their ravages extend. The natural order appear usually in May and cease in September. Ordinary locusts destroy vegetation. These locusts are forbidden to hurt the grass, green herb or tree, but only the men who have not the seal of God upon their foreheads. When the trees are smitten, or when the waters become blood, the innocent suffer together with the guilty. This first woe discriminates, and does not punish man by destroying his food, but signally attacks those only who are devoted to the beast. The power of death was not given to them, but the power to torment men for five months. The limitation imposed upon Satan in connection with Job will come into mind. The torment is indeed terrible, for men will seek death and not find it. The reference to the hair on the locust, together with the general setting of the vision, makes one think of Jer. li. 27:--

> "Set ye up a standard in the land, blow the trumpet among the nations, prepare the nations against her, call together against her the kingdoms of Ararat, Minni and Ashchenaz; appoint a captain against her: cause the horses to come up as the rough caterpillars" (or locust bristling with hair).

In Rev. ix. 3 we read of the locusts that "authority was given to them as the scorpions of the earth have authority". There is nothing strange in reading that these locusts from the Abyss have an authority given them to hurt, and it might have been written that their hurt was like that of a scorpion. It does say this, but it says more. It reveals the fact that the scorpion of the earth can actually hurt a man now because authority is given it. The permission to hurt and destroy is not limited to scorpions, but over the face of the whole creation creatures seem authorized to spoil, destroy, infect and corrupt the fair things of earth. All this is because of sin and the lost dominion of man. It is intensified in the case before us, and will only cease when the dominion is again vested in the Son of man when it shall at last be true that > "the wolf shall dwell with the lamb, and the leopard shall lie down with the kid. . . . the weaned child shall put his hand in the adder's den. They shall not hurt nor destroy in all My holy mountain" (Isa. xi. 6-9).

Both the names of the king of these locusts of the Abyss mean destroyer, and Joel, who uses the locust to describe the terrible day of the Lord, speaks of it as, "a destruction from the Almighty". A day comes, however, when God will "destroy them that destroy the earth", when the last enemy shall be destroyed, when that abused term "reconstruction" shall be gloriously realized, because based upon the "reconciliation" accomplished by the Son of God.

#34. The Second Woe.-- The Four Angels of the Euphrates (ix. 12-21).

pp. 97 - 101

> "One woe is past; behold, there are coming yet two woes after these things."

In the first woe we see the Abyss opened and its immediate consequences. In this there is revealed the yet further relation between rivers and deeps with spirit powers. But first let us notice who it is that speaks and from whence the message comes:--

> "And the sixth angel sounded his trumpet, and I hear a voice from the four horns of the golden altar which is before God."

The golden altar stood, whether in tabernacle or temple, immediately before the veil. The command proceeds from the temple, and the judgment cannot therefore be called "political" in a sense which would sever it from connection with the temple. We ask our readers to be true Bereans over this point. The command is a singular one. "Loose the four angels which are bound at the river Euphrates".

The river Euphrates meets us in Gen. ii. in association with the creation of man. It formed the eastern boundary of the promised land (Deut. xi. 24). Babylon's doom was typified by the casting of a book bound to a stone into this river (Jer. li. 63). It is specially marked out for judgment under the sixth vial (Rev. xvi. 12). Babel and Babylon are linked with this river, and there at this eastern boundary of the land of promise four angels are bound:--

> "And the four angels were loosed, even those having been made ready for the hour and day and month and year, that they should kill the third part of men."

What stress this passage lays on the exact moment! In our puny computations of prophetic times we are full of suppositions. A published list of the dates and times suggested when certain prophecies are supposed to have been, or will be, fulfilled, would be its own confutation. There are no round figures with God. To us, as to Habakkuk, He speaks:--

> "The vision is yet for the appointed time, and panteth toward the end, and shall not lie: though it tarry, wait for it: because it will surely come, it will not delay."

Not only the year, but the month of that year is foreordained. Not only the month, but the day, yea, the very hour of that day is a matter of Divine provision. And what is all this careful provision for?—the killing of the third part of mankind! Upon the release of these four angels, there appears an army whose immense numbers, and whose monstrous character, while admittedly beyond our present comprehension, is not beyond our simple faith. The number is "two myriads of myriads", or 200,000,000, and such an army passes beyond human understanding. Yet the number must not be explained away, for the apostle adds, "I heard the number".

The description of these horses is unlike that of any creature known to man. Fire, smoke and brimstone come out of the horses' mouths and kill the third part of men. The tails also of these horses have heads like serpents. Like the locusts of the preceding trumpet they belong not to our creation—they are from beneath. The description of these creatures is indeed strange, yet we are not therefore to conclude that the passage is figurative. The apostle has described these beings in full detail because they are so strange. God had said:--

> "I will do marvels (pala, miracles, wondrous works, used of the plagues of Egypt, Psalm cvi. 22) which have not been done in all the earth nor in any nation" (Exod. xxxiv. 10).

What seems a greater marvel is revealed in the concluding verses of Rev. ix.:--

> "And the rest of the men who were not killed by these plagues, yet repented not of the works of their hands, that they should not worship demons and idols of gold and silver and brass and stone and of wood, which neither can see, nor hear, nor walk. Neither repented they of their murders nor of their sorceries, nor of their fornication, nor of their thefts."

To think that this great woe should visit mankind, leaving behind one third of the race dead, and not bring about repentance, seems almost impossible. "The heart of man is deceitful above all things and desperately wicked, who can know it?"

Some commentators find a difficulty in interpreting these words literally, believing it to be impossible that the enlightened world should ever fall into idolatry of such gross a type. If the reader will reflect, he will soon discover incipient idolatry with the actual, literal idols of gold, silver, brass, wood and stone about him. How many have their

"mascots" in one form or another? From time to time grotesque figures are put on the market in the form of desk companions, motor-car mascots, watch chain ornaments, etc., which are "lucky", or preserve from accident, or some other good that should be sought from the Lord only.

Then the passage specifies the worship of demons. As we write these words, two papers have come into the market. One is called PAN after the Greek god of that name. The other is called EVE which among other advertised attractions will be Pagan! One of these publications is for "Saints and Cynics"! Spiritism is demonism. The apostle Paul writing to Timothy says:--

> "Now the Spirit speaketh expressly that in the latter times, some shall depart from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits and doctrines of demons."

Witchcraft, necromancy, clairvoyance are all leading on to the same dreadful goal—a state of hardened unrepentance, deceiving and being deceived. Of those who are spoken of in Rev. ix. 2, II Thess. ii. seems to speak:--

> "Then shall that wicked one be revealed. . . . whose coming is after the working of Satan. . . . with all deceivableness of unrighteousness in them that perish, because they received not the love of the truth that they might be saved. And for this cause God shall send them strong delusion (a working of error, R.V.), that they should believe THE LIE."

Men will actually worship the dragon, the beast and his image (see xiii. 4, 15). Men will be saved in that depraved hour simply worship Him as Creator that made heaven, and earth, and the sea, and the fountains of waters (xiv. 7). Idolatry originated in the heart of man:--

> "When they knew God they glorified Him not as God. . . . they changed the glory of the incorruptible God into an image made like unto corruptible man. . . . they changed the truth of God into a LIE and worshipped and served the creature more than the Creator, Who is blessed forever."

Immorality is always the handmaid of idolatry. The spirits that prey upon mankind are often "Unclean spirits". If mankind sank so low when God "gave them up", to what depth will they descend when God send them the strong delusion? These sins are essentially "religious". This unprecedented judgment falls upon false worshippers. It is impossible to differentiate between the political and the religious, the throne judgment and the temple judgment, for the references to the temple and worship are not confined to any section. Social sins are spoken of as secondary in this awful list; and even of the four sins mentioned, sorcery and fornication have much to do with "religion" (ii. 20). The ready acceptance of the teaching of demons and the miracles that accompany their teaching are indicated in xvi. 13, 14.

The awful condition indicated in Rev. ix. 20, 21 is traceable to Babylon, and we need not go outside the Revelation to find that this is so. Babylon makes the inhabitants of the earth drunk with the wine of her fornication. Babylon is depicted as drunk with the blood of saints. Babylon deceived all the nations by her sorceries. Babylon becomes the habitation of demons. Since the days of Nimrod Babylon has been Anti-Christ.

Modernism, the super-man, civilization, are all so many phases of Babylonianism, and we do well to remember the horrible thing that surrounds us and entangles us, lest we forget our separate calling and bring that holy name into disrepute.

We shall miss the most powerful exposition of all if we do not realize that in Rev. ix. 20 we have a quotation from the Book of Daniel. It is common knowledge that Daniel's prophetic visions are preparatory to the vision of the Revelation, yet the quotation here is not from one of the visions of Daniel's book. It is taken from Daniel's solemn warning to Belshazzar, in the night in which he was slain.

> "And thou his son, O Belshazzar, hast not humbled thine heart, though thou knowest all this; but hast lifted up thyself against the Lord of heaven; and they have brought the vessels of His house before thee, and thou, and thy lords, thy wives, and thy concubines, have drunk wine in them; and thou hast praised the gods of silver, and gold, of brass, iron, wood and stone, which see not, nor hear, nor know; and the God in whose hand thy breath is, and Whose are all thy ways, hast thou not glorified: Then was the part of the hand sent from Him; and this writing was written. . . . God hath numbered thy Kingdom and finished it. . . . Thou art weighed in the balances, and found wanting" (Dan. v.).

Belshazzar lifted himself against the Lord of heaven in spite of the example of Nebuchadnezzar. He did not receive the love of the truth that he might be saved. So likewise, in spite of the most unprecedented judgment that had fallen upon mankind, it is written, the rest of the men. . . . repented not.

If Belshazzar sets forth the character and doom of the last phase of Babylonianism, Daniel and his companions set forth the faithful remnant, who pass through fire and who are cast to the lions, rather than bow down to the idol of the state. We may have sung with little thought, as children, "Dare to be a Daniel". May we pray with a deeper realization that both we and our dear ones may stand as stedfast as did that man of God.

So ends this phase of the sixth trumpet judgment, with a world mad upon its idols, and given up to evil. As it was with Belshazzar, so must it be again; the next act in this mighty drama will be the "taking of the Kingdom", not indeed by Darius the Mede (who will follow the folly of Belshazzar), but by Christ the Lord, the Prince of the kings of the earth.

#35. The Mystery of God finished (x.).
pp. 129 - 134

The result of the sounding of the with trumpet revealed mankind with a heart like that of Belshazzar. The quotation from Dan. v. makes one feel that judgment severe and without remedy is imminent. The kingdoms of this world are about to pass under the blessed sway of Christ the Lord. Before the seventh angel sounds and the proclamation of heaven's King is made, two most solemn episodes intervene. The first is recorded in Chapter x.

A mighty angel with insignia of covenant-keeping power descends from heaven. In chapter iv. a rainbow encircled the throne. Here the rainbow is seen on the head of the mighty angel. His face also was as the sun, and his feet as pillars of fire. There is a close parallel here with the description of the Lord as the King-Priest in Rev. i. This mighty angel comes, clothed with the authority of heaven, and comes to announce with mighty voice that the Lord at length will take unto Himself His great power and reign. "The nations tumultuously assemble, and the peoples imagine a vain thing. The kings of the earth set themselves, the rulers take counsel together (a league evidently in operation) against the Lord and against His Anointed." These words of Psa. ii. seem prophetic of this period. "Then shall He speak unto them in His wrath, and vex them in His sore displeasure." These words speak of the judgment of the Revelation. "Yet have I set My King upon My holy hill in Zion." This is the substance of the result of sounding the seventh trumpet. In spite of all, in spite of Satan, the beast, and all the infernal hosts, "The Lord God Omnipotent reigneth".

The power indicated in Psa. ii.—"Thou shalt break them with a rod of iron, thou shalt dash them in pieces like a potter's vessel"—is referred to in the Revelation more than once. The decree announced in this Psalm has reference to the Son as the King. In Psalm cx. we find the words, "The Lord said unto My Lord, 'Sit Thou at My right hand until I make thine enemies thy footstool'." This is what has been happening under the seals and the trumpets. At the sixth trumpet the enemies of the Lord are seen as His footstool. "The Lord shall send the rod of Thy strength out of Zion: rule Thou in the midst of Thine enemies." This is not the reign of peace, it is the rule of the great David, before the Solomonic reign can begin.

Instead of the decree we have here an oath, "The Lord hath sworn and will not repent, 'Thou art a priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec'." Heaven's King is also Priest. Throne and Temple are united in Him. His nearest subjects are a kingdom of priests, and these two functions cannot be divided in the Revelation.

> "The Lord at thy right hand shall strike through Kings in the day of His wrath. He shall judge among the nations. He shall fill the places with dead bodies. He shall strike through the heads over a great land."

These words vividly anticipate the remaining Chapters of the Revelation.

The mighty angel who descends from heaven in Rev. x. holds in His hand "A little scroll open". There are three contrasts here with the scene of chapter v. There, it is a scroll; here it is a little scroll. There none but the Lamb of God could be found worthy enough to take the scroll; here a mighty angel has it. There it was sealed with seven seals; here it is open. It seems evident that this mighty angel comes with full authority and with all the evidences to make formal claim for his Lord. When Christ, as the Son of man, was about to come in lowliness to Bethlehem, Nazareth, and Calvary, a man of the wilderness in camel's hair was His forerunner. Now that the same Son of man is about to take the kingdom and reign in glory, His forerunner is a mighty angel. John Baptist cried "Repent", but the sixth seal reveals the utter impenitence of man. The mighty angel makes no call to repentance.

Majesty accompanies this great forerunner's every act. "He set his right foot upon the sea, and his left foot upon the earth." This first act symbolizes possession. At His first coming though "the world was made by Him, the world knew Him not'. He was pointed out by His forerunner as the Lamb of God to take away the sin of the world. At His second coming the world made by Him will be claimed by Him. Creation will not be alienated for ever. His forerunner this time enters into possession. The inheritance is secured:--

> "Ask of Me, and I will give thee the heathen, thine inheritance, and the uttermost part of the earth, thy possession."

No longer as the Lamb of God to die for sin, but the Lion of the tribe of Judah He is coming in power and great glory. The cry of this mighty angel was as the roar of a lion, and seven thunders utter their voices at his cry, "the seven thunders" to be exact. We have the seven angels, the seven stars, the seven spirits, and here the seven thunders. What were these echoes awakened by the angel's voice? Were they the distant sounds of the seven vials? We do not know. For some wise purpose the apostle was commanded, "Seal up those things which the seven thunders uttered and write them not". Whatever they said, it was sealed. We believe that they are unsealed in the pouring out of the seven last plagues. The angel now:--

> "lifted up his hand to heaven, and swore by Him that liveth for ever and ever, who created heaven and the things that therein are, and the earth, and the things that therein are, and the sea, and the things which therein are, that there should be time no longer."

Before saying anything about this, we shall be wise to notice a parallel passage in Dan. xii. The prominent figure is Michael, the great prince which standeth for Israel. The setting is the time of great tribulation and resurrection. Daniel is instructed to shut up the words, and to seal the book, even to the time of the end. Then comes the parallel with Rev. x.:--

> "And I heard the man clothed in linen, which was upon the waters of the river, when he held up his right hand and his left unto heaven, and sware by Him that liveth for ever, that it shall be for a time, times and an half: and when he shall have accomplished to scatter the power of the holy people, all these things shall be finished."

In both cases, it will be observed, time is the subject. The term time, times and a half, is one way of referring to that period which figures so largely in Revelation, and is spoken of sometimes as 1,260 days, sometimes as forty-two months, being three years and a half. This we will consider in its proper place. In Rev. x., instead of saying that a certain amount of time shall run its course, the angel says, "time shall be no longer".

The word "time" here is chronos. This word is used four times in the Revelation, and its meaning will be ascertained by considering the four passages together:--

Chronos.

A | ii. 21. "Space to repent."—See sins detailed in verses 20 and 21, and the threat in 22 and 23.
B | vi. 11. "A little season."—Souls slain for Word of God and testimony; told to wait.
A | x. 6. "No longer time."—See statement concerning non-repentance at the end of chapter x., and the judgment that follows.
B | xx. 3. "A little season."—Souls of beheaded for testimony and Word; now reign.

It will be seen that the passage in x. 6 corresponds with ii. 21, and leads us to see that the angel declares that "space for repentance shall be no longer". Awful announcement! Yet who can say the Lord has not been longsuffering? The very complicated series of slowly increasing judgments are evidences that judgment is His strange act. Now however the wrath is come to the uttermost, and will be poured out without admixture. Coupled with this, we must read vi. 11. There delay is indicated until the martyr host is complete; here the delay is finished, heaven's King is at hand, and the martyred souls are soon to be liberated to share the reign of the thousand years. A sharp contrast therefore is made in the messages of the two forerunners.

We said above that the mighty angel makes no call to repentance, we can now see that he indicates that the time for repentance is over. This is indeed a "Woe". The angel's statement however has not been completely given yet. After this declaration that there should be time no longer he continues:--

> "But in the days of the voice of the seventh angel, when he shall begin to sound, the mystery of God should be finished also, as He hath announced the glad tidings to His servants the prophets."

The mystery of God announced as a gospel (evangelizõ) to His servants the prophets must not be confused with the mystery revealed only to the apostle Paul. It is the conclusion of the gospel of the kingdom, deferred owing to Israel's unrepentance, and here strangely enough ushered in upon the impenitence of the Gentiles. There may be a connection however here of these two hitherto separate lines of truth. The hope of the church of the mystery is given in Col. iii. 4:--

> "When Christ who is our life shall be made manifest, then shall ye also be made manifest with Him in glory."

Before the Lord takes to Himself His great power to reign He will be "made manifest" in glory. The church of the One Body will then be "made manifest" with Him. The time when this takes place we are not told. Here, as we see in Chapter x., the mystery of God is brought to a conclusion in the days when the seventh angel is about to sound. All the mysteries of the Word seem to focus here. What are the mysteries referred to in Matt. xiii.? Most interpreters of the parables would have us believe that the Christendom of the past 1,900 years is the fulfillment of those parables. We believe they point to the closing day of the Lord.

The mystery of Christ's rejection is solved by the sounding of the seventh trumpet. The mystery of Israel's blindness shall be finished when the trumpet sounds, for when "He shall send back Jesus", the times of restitution shall begin, and all Israel shall be saved. Israel's feast of trumpets in the seventh month, the trumpet of the jubilee with its liberty and re-entry into the forfeited inheritance, is consummated in the sounding of this seventh trumpet. The mystery of the sudden change from mortality to immortality without the necessity of death and resurrection will be solved when this trumpet sounds. This, together with the resurrection, takes place at the last trump. When this is brought to pass the prophecy of Isa. xxv. 8 is fulfilled, which in its turn will take place when the veil that is spread over all nations shall be taken away, the rebuke of God's people be taken away from off all the earth, and the Lord of hosts shall reign in Mount Zion and in Jerusalem, and before His ancients gloriously (Isa. xxv. 6-8; xxiv. 23).

The proclamation of Christ as King is the solution of every mystery, the reason for all the chequered history of the world, the goal of the purpose of the ages.

John is commanded to take the little scroll and eat it. The effect of doing so was that while it was to his mouth as sweet as honey, yet to his belly it was bitter. Ezek. ii. 9-iii. 3 is parallel. "How sweet are thy words to my taste, yea sweeter than honey to my mouth", said the psalmist, and this is echoed by the apostle. Yet the awful character of the judgments therein revealed could not be contemplated without emotion.

After having taken the little scroll and eaten it the apostle is told, "Thou must prophesy again concerning (or against, but not 'before', epi with dative) many peoples, and nations, and tongues and kings". The simplest interpretation seems to be that the remaining chapters of the Revelation, "the words of this prophecy", are here intended. Some who think that a future ministry is here indicated have wondered whether John was to be one of the two witnesses of Chapter xi., but this we do not believe is at all likely.

There is a sweetness and a bitterness at the consummation of God's mystery. It is the year of God's redeemed, but it is also the day of vengeance. This we shall see more fully when we read the actual passage in Chapter xi., which chronicles the sounding of the seventh trumpet. The book of the Revelation is essentially, "The revelation of Jesus Christ". The testimony of Jesus is the spirit of prophecy. "Lo, I come", and "Lo, He comes" fill the volume of the book and bring the mystery of God to an end.

May the seventh angel quickly sound! The bitterness attending that trumpet note will soon be passed, and then bliss, glory, joy and life immortal! Even so come Lord Jesus.

#36. The Two Witnesses (xi. 1-14).
pp. 169 - 173

The second woe finishes with the testimony of the two witnesses, who are introduced by the measuring of the temple, the altar and the worshippers. This section therefore, like that of the opening one of the second woe, has to do with worship, and is a temple section.

> "And there was given to me a reed, like a rod, and he said, Rise, and measure the temple of God, and the altar, and take account of those who worship therein. But the court that is without the temple cast without, and measure it not: because it is given up to the Gentiles: and the holy city shall they tread under foot forty and two months."

We are inclined to translate "a reed, like a sceptre". Moses Stuart and Dr. Bullinger show that the Hebrew equivalent is used for a measuring rod (Psa. lxxiv. 2; Jer. x. 16; li. 19). These references, however, are not very convincing. The word rhabdos is used in the N.T. with the meaning of:--

1. An ordinary staff (Matt. x. 10).
2. A rod for correction (I Cor. iv. 21).
3. A sceptre as of a King (Heb. i. 8).
4. A rod as of the High Priest (Heb. ix. 4).
5. The shepherd's club (Rev. ii. 27, rule = to shepherd. The word occurs four times in the Revelation: ii. 27; xi. 1; xii. 5; xix. 15).

It will be seen therefore that three references speak of shepherding the nations, and one is connected with measuring the temple.

Two passages of the O.T. may throw a light on the meaning intended here.

> "And concerning the tithe of the herd, or of the flock, even whatsoever passeth under the rod, the tenth shall be holy unto the Lord" (Lev. xxvii. 32).
> "I will cause you to pass under the rod, and I will bring you into the bond of the covenant" (Ezek. xx. 37).

In these passages the Lord is either claiming a portion as His special tithe, or referring to the gathering again of Israel. In both cases there is an emphasis upon peculiar possession, protection and reservation.

It will be remembered that before the seventh seal was opened 144,000 of the tribes of Israel were sealed. Here, before the seventh trumpet sounds, the temple and its worshippers are measured. Taking the suggestion of peculiar ownership from Lev. xxvii. and Ezek. xx., and that of sealing and preservation from Rev. vii., it appears that such is the meaning of the measuring of the temple. Another parallel is found in Zech. ii.

> "I lifted up mine eyes again, and looked, and behold a man with a measuring line in his hand. Then said I, Whither goest thou? And he said unto me, To measure Jerusalem, > to see what is the breadth thereof and what is the length thereof. . . . Jerusalem shall be inhabited as towns without walls for the multitude of men and cattle therein. For I, saith the Lord, will be unto her a wall of fire round about, and will be the glory in the midst of her" (Zech. ii. 1-5).

What is intended of the city here seems to be intended of the temple in Rev. xi. The passage in Revelation is concerned only with reserving the innermost part of the temple, the court is cast out and the city is trodden under foot. This emphasizes the fact that the temple and its worship is to be specially remembered in this section.

There are several passages of O.T. Scripture which refer to the time of trouble that will overtake the Lord's people, and indicate their place of refuge. Take for example the following:--

> "He that dwelleth in the secret place of the Most High shall abide under the shadow of the Almighty" (Psa. xci. 1).
>
> ". . . . to enquire in His temple. For in the time of trouble He shall hide me in His pavilion: in the secret of His tabernacle shall He hide me; He shall set me up upon a rock" (Psa. xxvii. 4, 5).
> "Thou shalt hide them in the secret of Thy presence from the pride of man: Thou shalt keep them secretly in a pavilion from the strife of tongues" (psa. xxxi. 20).

This secret place, the secret of His tabernacle and presence, seems intended in Rev. xi. The pride of man reaches its height in the blasphemy of the beast. This period is given as 42 months in xiii. 5, which is exactly the same period given for the treading down of the city in Rev. xi. 2. All except the inner shrine of the temple (naos) is given over to the Gentiles. But God has reserved His portion. There is a secret place. The sealed 144,000 will find a secure haven from the pride of men and the strife of tongues. The Lord (in Luke xxi. 24) says:--

> "Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles, until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled."

We will not go into the question as to when these times commenced; it will be sufficient for us here to state broadly that they commenced with Nebuchadnezzar as the King of Babylon. Rev. xi. does not speak of the whole Gentile times but only of the final period of 42 months when blasphemy will reach its height. During this period two specially equipped witnesses will prophesy:--

> "And I will endow My two witnesses, and they shall prophesy a thousand two hundred and sixty days, clothed in sackcloth."

This period, given in days, is the same as the 42 months already mentioned. While the final treading down of the city takes place, the two witnesses prophesy. As a result of Elijah's prayer the heaven was shut for the same period, three and a half years, so that there was no rain (Luke iv. 25; James v. 17). The history of that event and character of the King should be remembered as a type of the end. Many expositors believe that Elijah will be one of the two witnesses, and those who argue that as he did not die he must come back to do so usually take Enoch to be the other witness. Others, by reason of the transfiguration, prefer Moses and Elijah. The better plan is to abide by the statement of Scripture. "These are the two olive trees, and the two lampstands which stand before the Lord of the earth."

The title "Lord of the earth" is in line with the angel's claim in Chapter x. over the sea and the earth, upon which he placed his feet. The alternative to worshipping the beast is that of worshipping the Creator (xiv. 7) for the condition of things has become so bad that this most elementary feature constitutes the whole of the gospel then proclaimed. The Gentile times revert back to the character given in Rom. i. 18-32. The two witnesses are spoken of as the two olive trees and the two lampstands. This is a reference back to Zech. iv. When the angel asked Zechariah whether he knew the meaning of the two olive trees which emptied their oil into the lampstands, he replied, "No, my Lord". Then he answered Zechariah, saying:--

> "This is the word of the Lord unto Zerubbabel, saying, Not by might, nor by power, but by My Spirit, saith the Lord of Hosts. Who art thou, O great mountain? before Zerubbabel thou shalt become a plain: and he shall bring forth the headstone thereof with shoutings, saying, Grace, grace unto it."

The olive branches are differentiated from the lampstand, and are "the anointed ones that stand by the Lord of the whole earth" (14). In the Revelation the witnesses are called the two olive trees and the two lampstand. However, much is parallel. In both cases there is a return from captivity in progress. Great opposition is rising against the people, the city and the temple. Nevertheless, the seventh angel shall sound and the headstone shall be brought forth with acclamation. The great mountain foreshadows Babylon, and when Babylon falls, heaven rings with Hallelujahs and the Lord rides forth on the white horse as King of kings and Lord of lords.

The secret of power for the two witnesses is, "by My Spirit, saith the Lord of hosts". These witnesses have the power of devouring their enemies with fire and of shutting up the rain of heaven. They can turn water into blood, and smite the earth with every plague as often as they will. The plagues brought upon Pharaoh by Moses and the judgments brought about by Elijah were literal; so will these be, no power, not even that of Satan himself, can cut short a testimony given and sustained by God. For three years and a half Satan, the beast, and the false prophet with their host of followers, both demon and human, try in vain to stop this testimony. All the while that men are enrolling themselves on the side of the beast, God sustains a powerful miraculous testimony to Himself and His truth. The whole world have this testimony and become thereby involved in guilt.

It is important to observe the order of the words in Rev. xix. 20, "with which he deceived those that had received the mark of the beast". The *re*ceiving came before the *de*ceiving. They are without excuse. Heaven's witnesses have given unceasing warning, and at last repentance becomes impossible.

> "And when they shall have finished their testimony, the beast, which cometh up out of the abyss, shall make war upon them, and shall overcome them, and kill them. And their dead bodies shall lie on the street of the great city, which spiritually is called Sodom and Egypt, where our Lord also was crucified."

The two witnesses die at Jerusalem. Its character at the time is vividly presented under the two similes Sodom and Egypt, and by the connection of the martyrdom of the two witnesses with the crucifixion of their Lord. So far as God's purpose is concerned Jerusalem is "the holy city", but viewed in its apostacy it is not even named, being described instead by a threefold description which reveals its complicity with the dragon, the beast, and the false prophet.

By reading chapter xiii. it will be seen that while these two witnesses are working their miracles, the false prophet is working his. It is a repetition of the days of Moses and Aaron before Pharaoh. A short-lived rejoicing is followed by a great fear, for these servants of the Lord are raised from the dead and a loud voice from heaven says:--

> "Come up hither. And they ascended up to heaven in the cloud and their enemies beheld them. At the same hour there was a great earthquake, and a tenth part of the city fell, and there were killed in the earthquake seven thousand names of men."

The result of this judgment causes great fear to fall upon men, and they give glory to the God of heaven. No evidence is given that these men experience any change of nature, and the giving of the glory may be a passing admission that "this is the finger of God". On the other hand we do not limit God. The aionian gospel distinctly says, "Fear God and give glory to Him, because the hour of His judgment is come" (xiv. 7), and therefore we leave it without expressing an opinion. With this incident the second woe passes, and the third woe is spoken of as coming quickly.

God has never left Himself without witness. In the utter corruption and apostacy of the final three-and-a-half years of this world's Christless history two miraculously endowed, and miraculously sustained, witnesses bear their testimony. The longsuffering exhibited toward Pharaoh is repeated toward his antitype, and the miraculous ministry of Moses and Aaron is repeated in that of the two witnesses. But, alas, as it was with Pharaoh, so will it be again: the waters will cover the oppressor, and all his pomp will descend to perdition.

The next sound to break forth is that of the seventh trumpet. Surely in those days the urgent prayer will be, Even so, Come, Lord Jesus.

Sidelights on the Scriptures.

#27. Greek and Roman Antiquities.
pp. 11 - 14

THE ELGIN ROOM.—The object of this series of notes being expressed in the title, Sidelights on the Scriptures, reference to the many objects of interest and beauty that the visitor will have before his eyes is precluded.

Architects and artists know the high ideal that the Greek architects and sculptors had before them when they planted and wrought the buildings that crowned the Acropolis at Athens. The Temple known as the Parthenon reached perhaps the highest mark of aesthetic refinement that has ever been reached in architecture. The mouldings and ornaments of this period are repeated to this day, all innovations and changes proving somehow failures. Yet all is vanity. The apostle Paul, when he visited Athens, was not stirred at the exquisite statuary, or the dignity and excellence of the Temple—"his spirit was stirred in him, when he saw the city full of idols." His reference to the marvellous temples is recorded:--

> "God that made the world, and all things therein, seeing that He is Lord of Heaven and earth dwelleth not in temples made with hands."

His note concerning the Art for which the land and people were famous is :--

> "We ought not to think that the Godhead is like unto gold, or silver, or stone, graven by art and man's device."

There is no spirituality in being devoid of artistic appreciation, else were the Philistine a pattern; spirituality is evidenced when the highest refinements of art are still recognized as of the flesh, and are seen to be the product of the soul, and not of the spirit, a distinction made by the Word which is sharper than any two-edged sword.

In this room will be found an architectural model which presents the Acropolis much as it appeared in Paul's day, when on Mars Hill he preached the risen Christ, God's new attitude to men, and man's new responsibility to God (Acts xvii.).

THE MAUSOLEUM ROOM.—The tomb of Mausolos, one of the seven wonders of the world, has no direct bearing upon the Bible, but an alabaster jar, discovered upon the right of the Mausoleum, is of interest to all students of the ancient languages of the cuneiform inscriptions. The jar is inscribed with the words, "Xerxes, the great King", in the Persian, Median, Assyrian, and Egyptian languages. This repetition, though small, affords a good opportunity for testing the differences in the languages of the inscriptions.

THE EPHESUS ROOM.—Another of the seven wonders of the world was the temple of Diana of the Ephesians. On the left wall is a drawing, showing what the temple looked like when complete. So devoted were the Ephesians to the worship of Diana that the city is styled Neokoros, or "temple-keeper" (see Acts xix. 35, margin), as an official title of honour. The Ephesian Diana differed from the Roman and the Greek Artemis, bearing the attributes of the great mother goddess rather than the virgin.

One of the great capitals that reared its head high above the earth when Paul was the object of Ephesian rage now stand within a few feet of the ground in the Ephesus room, and students of geometrical drawing will be interested to notice, in the eye of the volute, the pin points still visible, whereby the mason swung the curves of the Ionic volute of the capital.

THE ROMAN GALLERY.—Here are portrait busts of Roman Emperors: Cæsar Augustus, in whose reign Christ was born; Tiberius Cæsar, whose "image and superscription" was probably upon the "penny" shown to the Lord, and of whom the Jews said, "We have no king but Cæsar"; Nero, under whom Paul was first a prisoner and finally a martyr for the faith and for Christ; Titus, who as the General of his father's army brought about the fall of Jerusalem.

THE ROOM OF GREEK AND LATIN INSCRIPTIONS.—There are two slabs here that we should notice. One, No. 171, a Greek inscription from Thessalonica, contains names of magistrates styled Politarchs, a local title quoted in Acts xvii. 6, 8. The fact of this being local and yet finding its place in the record of the Acts is one of those little touches which are worth volumes of argument with regard to the question of the inspiration and accuracy of the Scriptures. The other slab is a cast of an inscription which was set up over "the middle wall of partition", which divided the court of the Gentiles from the court of Israel in the Temple at Jerusalem. The following is a translation.

> NO ONE BEING A FOREIGNER MAY ENTER WITHIN THE ENCLOSURE AROUND THE HOLY PLACE. WHOEVER IS APPREHENDED, WILL HIMSELF BE TO BLAME FOR HIS DEATH WHICH WILL CERTAINLY FOLLOW.

Let the reader open his Bible as he faces this slab, and there read the glorious emancipation, access, and blessing that is recorded in Eph. ii.

Together, we have considered the antiquities of this Museum that have touched upon practically every phase of Bible History. It seems fitting that one of the greatest facts of the dispensation of the mystery should be so powerfully presented to our notice as we take our leave of this wonderful collection of Bible evidences. Before we leave the Museum, shall we not lift up our hearts in thanksgiving to God Who has caused so many incontrovertible proofs of the trustworthiness and accuracy of His Holy Word to be brought to light, just at the time when so-called Higher Criticism was apparently reducing the verities of our faith to figments and fables. Our faith needs no such evidences; like the blind man in John's Gospel, we know one thing, whatever else we may not know, once we were blind, but now we see; nevertheless, we do not undervalue the Providence of God Who has seen fit to demolish the blasphemous theories of the Higher Critics with the pick and the shovel of the Eastern excavator.

A brief SYNOPSIS of Study in The Epistle to the Philippians.
pp. 155 - 157

1. THE PRISON EPISTLES.

A | The dividing line of Dispensational Teaching – Paul's Roman imprisonment.
B | The relation of the four Prison Epistles.
a | Ephesians. | Fulness. Boldness.
Seated. Not of Works.
b | Philippians. | Emptying (kenosis, ii. 7).
Things that differ (i. 10).
The Prize (iii. 14).
Defence; striving; conflict (i. 7, 27).
Offer; depart (ii. 17, i. 23).
Suffer (i. 29).
a | Colossians. | Balances Ephesians.
b | II Timothy. | Forsaken (i. 15, iv. 10, 16).
Rightly divide (ii. 15).
The Crown (ii. 5, 12, iv. 8).
Defence; striving; fight (iv. 6, ii. 5).
Depart; offer (iv. 6).
Suffer (i. 12, &c.).

While Ephesians emphasizes certainty and boldness, Philippians speaks of "fear and trembling". Philippians deals with a prize to be won, not salvation already received.

Philippians and II Timothy are the Epistles of the Prize and the Crown, hence their emphasis on "endurance", &c.

2. EXAMPLES IN PHILIPPIANS (i. 27 – iv. 2).

A | i. 27-ii. 4. Stand fast, same love, same soul.
B | ii. 5. The MIND of Christ—Now.
C | ii. 6-11. The sevenfold humiliation and consequent exaltation of Christ given as an EXAMPLE.
D | ii. 12-30. The Philippians.—"Wherefore…..work out."
Paul.—"If I be offered…..I rejoice."
Timothy.—"He did not seek his own."
Epaphroditus.—"Nigh unto death in service."
C | iii. 1-14. The sevenfold loss and gain of the Paul.
Suffering in view of the Prize.
Paul bids us note his walk as an EXAMPLE.
B | iii. 21. The BODY of His glory.—Then.
A | iv. 1, 2. Stand fast, same mind.

The "mind" of Christ, exhibited pre-eminently in His wonderful kenosis ("He emptied Himself"), and partially seen in the lives of Timothy, Epaphroditus, and Paul, is essential to the attaining of the Prize, "The body of His glory".

3. PAUL'S DESIRE. (Phil. i. 21-26).

A | 21. To me (emoi) ; to live is Christ.
B | 22, 23. a. Live in flesh.--Fruit.
b. Paul's desire.--Not made known (I wot not).
c. Paul's desire.--To be with Christ.
B | 24, 25. a. Alive in the flesh.—Needful for you.
b. Paul's confidence.--I know.
c. Paul's continuance.--With you all.
A | 26. By me (emoi) ; my presence ; glorying in Christ.

"I wot not."—The word gnorizo occurs in N.T. 24 times. Paul uses it 18 times, and of these, 11 are found in the Prison Epistles (Phil. iv. 6, Eph. i. 9, iii. 3, 5, 10, vi. 19, 21, Col. i. 27, iv. 7, 9). One meaning only fits all cases, i.e., "to make known". This disposes of the idea that Paul did not know which to choose.

"In a strait." (sunecho).—Luke viii. 45, xii. 50, xix. 63; Acts vii. 57. Every passage demands the meaning "to hold fast", "to keep in", "to stop".

"betwixt two" (ek).—Sometimes means "with"—(Matt. xxvii. 7, Mark xii. 30, John xii. 30). Sometimes means "by"—(Matt. xii. 33, Titus iii. 5, Rev. ix. 18). Sometimes means "by reason of"—(Rev. viii. 13, ix. 2, xviii. 19).

"The two."—They are (1) The desire to depart and be with Christ.
(2) The necessity to remain in the flesh.

One would be the apostle's own gain; but the other would benefit the Philippians. He chose the latter, while desiring the former.

"to depart" (analuo).—Gives us 'to analyze' (Luke xii. 36). Rotherham translates, "break up at the marriage feast" (the schoolboy's "breaking up" for the holidays). Paul settles his own meaning by repeating himself in II Timothy:--

Phil. ii. 17.	Ready to be offered.	II Tim. iv. 6.	About to be offered.
i. 23.	Desiring to depart.	same.	Time of my departure has come.

4. THE PRIZE. (Phil. iii. 14).

1. The Crown of Righteousness, and two-fold justification.
2. Enduring and reigning. Scripture testimony generally.
3. The Circumcision, the Cross, and the Crown.

6. Marks of perfection.
7. Factors in Perfection.

6. THE OUT-RESURRECTION. (Phil. iii. 11).

This cannot be the general resurrection of all believers, for Paul says, "If by any means I might attain" unto it.

The words of the original are tēn exanastasin tēn ek tõn nekrõn, "the OUT resurrection, that which is OUT from the dead".

Let us analyze the teaching of Scripture as to resurrection:--

1. Anastasis nekrõn. The simplest expression of all. Believed by Pharisees (Acts xxiii. 6).

2. To ek nekrõn anastēnai, "The rising out from the dead". (Mark ix. 9, 10). This was something new to the disciples. This new expression gives us such passages as Rom. i. 4.

3. Tēs anastaseõs tes ek nekrõn, "The resurrection, that which is out from the dead". (Luke xx. 35). This is connected with being "worthy to attain", and approaches to Phil. iii. 11.

4. Tēn exanastasin tēn ek tõn nekrõn, "The out resurrection, that which is out from dead ones" (Phil. iii. 11).

Parallels are:--"The better resurrection" (Heb. xi. 35). "The spirits of perfected righteous ones" (Heb. xii. 23), and "Enoch, who was translated that he should not see death (Heb. xi. 5).

7. THE PURSUIT.

The essential condition.—"One thing I do" (iii. 13).
The essential feature. (iii. 8-10).
The essential rule. (iii. 14, 16, 17).

DEAR FELLOW-MEMBERS,

The completion of Volume XI of The Berean Expositor calls for deep and earnest gratitude to the Lord for all His enabling grace and providential care during another year's testimony.

The increasing darkness, both in the world and in the professing church, seems but to make the humble witness of our magazine the more necessary.

Our object remains unchanged. We seek to glorify the Lord, and to edify His people, by presenting in its varied aspects a Word of TRUTH RIGHTLY DIVIDED. The peculiar testimony of the Prison Epistles must be our chiefest burden, seeing that this is the message for the Dispensation of the Mystery. Neither space, nor the understanding of our calling, will allow us to cater for the needs of all believers.

To all those who appreciate the blessings of dispensational truth, we earnestly commend this little witness.

With an increasing desire to be "found faithful",

Yours in Christ our Hope,

CHARLES H. WELCH

THOUGHT IT NOT ROBBERY TO BE EQUAL WITH GOD 5

TIMOTHY, SECOND EPISTLE OF 8

Answers to Correspondents.

pp. 143, 144

No. 25.—Thought it not robbery to be equal with God (Phil. ii. 6). J.N.D. translates, "Did not esteem it an object of rapine to be on an equality with God", and adds the suggestive footnote, "I have no doubt all this is in contrast with the first Adam".

The R.V. reads, "counted it not a prize", and gives in the margin "a thing to be grasped".

Arpagmos, "the act or the object of plunder", comes from arpazõ which occurs 13 times in the N.T. and is translated "take by force", "catch away", "pluck", "pull". Arpagē occurs three times, and is rendered "spoiling", "extortion", "ravening".

Adam when tempted through Eve heard the words, "Ye shall be as God". It was a thing to be grasped at, and Adam was not equal with God, he was of the earth, earthy, mortal and but a living soul.

Is this the teaching of Phil. ii.? Does it teach that far from claiming equality with God, the Lord Jesus never "contemplated such an act of usurpation"?

Let us examine the context. In the first place, why is this profound subject introduced? Was the Deity of Christ in question? No, for the apostle had just said, "look not every man on his OWN things, but every man also on the things of others" (ii. 4). That this is the theme of the passage will be evident by reading on to verse 21 where the answering clause is found, "For all seek their OWN", unlike Timothy who cared for others. Yet further on the concern of Epaphroditus was not for himself, but because the Philippians had heard that he had been sick. Finally comes the parallel of Phil. iii. where the actual "gains" of the Apostle are not "held as a prey", but gladly relinquished for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ.

The whole context demands that equality with God was the actual possession of Christ before He became man. If this be not so, all point is gone from the words, "Let this mind be in you, which was also in Christ Jesus". If Christ be an example to these Philippians as was Timothy, Epaphroditus and Paul, particularly the latter, then Christ must have given up an actual possession. He Who in the beginning "was God" (John i. 1) had no necessity to grasp at that which was His own. All others of necessity must if they aspire to Divine honours. Satan, Lucifer, Adam, Herod, Antichrist, all grasp at something they desire but which they do not possess. Christ is entirely separated from these. We feel sure that no argument can overthrow the manifest intention of the Apostle as indicated by the theme of these two chapters.

A Doctrine of Demons.
God, the Author of Sin.
p. 173

A contemporary rightly says that the fact that any particular doctrine is taught by demons is of itself sufficient proof that it is untrue. We would therefore earnestly draw the attention of any of our readers who may have inclined to the teaching that God is the author of evil to the following extract from a Spiritualistic book entitled "Whatever Is, Is Right".*

> "Evil does not exist, evil is good. A lie is the truth intrinsically; it holds a lawful place in creation; it is a necessity. Vice . . . . . beautiful in the eyes of the soul. Virtue is good and sin is good. The woman who came to the well of Sychar was just as pure in spirit before she met Christ, even though she was a harlot, as she was afterwards when she went to live a different life. There's no difference between Herod the murderer of the babes in Bethlehem, and Christ the Saviour of men. Murder is good, and is perfectly natural act. There are no evil Spirits, no Devil, and no Christ. Christ and the Devil are both alike.
>
> For not a path on earth is trod
> That does not lead the soul to God.
> No matter how bad that path may be, whether it be the path of the liar or the murderer, it is the path of Divine Ordination and Divine Destiny."

The closing paragraph should be prayerfully weighed in the balances of the Sanctuary by those who in their zeal to emphasize the Sovereignty of God and the truth that He worked ALL THINGS after the council of His Own Will, have not seen in all its hideousness the logical outcome of this doctrine of demons.

The Ministry of Consolation.
The Patience and Comfort of the Scriptures.
p. 174

As one's experiences widen, the burden of sorrow as well as of sin becomes a reality, and the need for comfort as well as conciliation a needed ministry. Sickness, anxiety, and distress arising out of the state of the times call for a word in season. One after another, loved-one or fellow-worker is laid in the grave, and the battle becomes more lonely, and the day more drear. A doctrinal treatise is not necessarily "a word in season to him that is weary", but true lasting consolation can only come from that treasure-house of truth—the Scriptures:--

> "For whatsoever things were written aforetime, were written for our learning, that we through patience and comfort of the Scripture might have hope" (Rom. xv. 4).

The trial of Job will minister to the tried saint, and inspire patience and hope by seeing the end of the Lord. The trial of Abraham's faith and the glorious issue of his trust in the God that quickeneth the dead may be a special word for some in similar anxiety. Whatever the sorrow, patience to endure without murmuring, without rebellion, with undiminished faith will be a prime necessity, and comfort, sympathy and consolation will ever be the greatest need. These two are ministered most fully by the Word of God, "that we through PATIENCE and COMFORT of the Scriptures". These two mutually lead the sorrowing child of God to look beyond the cloud, beyond the grave, beyond earth's pilgrimage; they minister HOPE—"That we through patience and comfort of the Scriptures might have HOPE".

"We sorrow", and here we share the common lot of Adam's race. "We sorrow not as those who have no hope", and here we at once have ministered to our grief the oil of patience and the wine of comfort, "Wherefore comfort one another with these words". Behind the written Word is the Living God of that Word. His Word ministers patience, comfort and hope. He Himself is the "GOD OF PATIENCE AND CONSOLATION . . . . . THE GOD OF HOPE" (Rom. xv. 5-13). The Scriptures are the channel, God Himself the source. We seek to obey the exhortation, "Comfort one another with these words".

Berean Bible Studies.

The Purpose of the Ages. Course C. Paper #5.
pp. 30, 31

We have noted the various dispensations which have been or will yet be in operation; we now draw attention not so much to the surface distinctions (such as the presence or absence of miraculous gifts), but to those things which are at the very basis of all God's dealings. First we must notice that from dispensation 2 to dispensation 11 (see Volume X, page 127) we have the presence and effects of SIN. Coupled with sin we find DEATH. Both are said to REIGN.

In the fifth dispensation (commencing with the exodus), God introduced the principle of LAW, and from Moses to Christ law was in force. The law never saved a man, never justified, never freed, it only condemned, and showed what sin and the creature were. GRACE is the exact opposite to law. It is free unmerited favour bestowed upon the vilest. Grace is said to REIGN; where grace is in operation the reign of sin comes to an end, and law has no place.

There is, however, another principle which must be distinguished from grace, and that is MERCY. This does not hold such blessings as does grace; it operates in different ways, and has other ends in view. There is yet one further principle whereby God deals with sin, and that is JUDGMENT.

It will be found that grace absolutely, and mercy largely, have reference to the elect and the present. Judgment, however, covers all men and relates mostly to the future. By thinking of Judgment merely as the act of condemnation, we have completely missed its scriptural meaning, and failed to give it its place in the Purpose of the Ages.

After judgment nothing is left but the second death, beyond which Scripture gives no word to teach that there is anything.

Questions on Course C. Paper No. 5.

1. How, and by whom, did sin enter into the world? What do you understand by the word sin? Give the various names for sin as used in the Scriptures (e.g., trespass), and show their distinctive meanings. Collect the references to sin, and sins, also point out their differences.

2. Examine Rom. v. 12-21, show its structure, set out its teaching under two columns: (1) Adam, (2) Christ. Examine in the same way I Cor. xv. 21-28, 42-49, and Rom. viii. 19-21. How do these passages bear upon the purpose of the ages?

3. Go through Romans and Galatians and note every reference to "law". What do you learn regarding its place in the purpose? Go through Matthew and Acts for the same. Do you note any difference?

4. Can you find grace in operation before the coming the Christ? Go through Romans, Galatians and Ephesians, noting every reference to grace. Does grace extend to all men, or to the elect?

5. In what part, and in what connections, is mercy mentioned in Romans? Wherein do these passages differ from those in Romans which deal with grace?

6. Go through the book of Judges and note the work of the judge, e.g., ii. 16 "deliver" (same word as "save", vi. 14). Take the word "judgment", and write out the passages where it is linked with mercy, deliverance, instruction.

Consider carefully and state the design and effect of punishment in Lev. xxvi. 14-46; Isa. ix. 13; Ezek. xx. 26; Hag. ii. 17; II Cor. xiii. 10; I Tim. i. 20; Rev. ix. 20, 21, xvi. 9-11; Prov. xx. 30; Isa. xxvi. 9; Isa. iv. 4; Dan. iv. 25, 26; Hos. v. 15, vi. 4; Judges x. 15; II Chron. xxxiii. 9-13.

7. Does Rev. xx. teach that all those who stand before the Great White Throne are cast into the lake of fire? Collect parallels to the judgment according to works. Where do you place such a passage as Jer. xxxi. 20? Explain as fully as you can John v. 28, 29.

The Purpose of the Ages. Course C. Paper #6.
pp. 94, 95

The purpose of the ages may be divided into three spheres, (1) earthly, (2) heavenly, and (3) super-celestial, this last one being the dispensation of the mystery. For our present purpose, however, we can combine (2) and (3), waiting until our studies have advanced sufficiently for us to appreciate the distinction. We find TWO TIME PERIODS.—(1) From, or since the foundation of the world, and (2) Before the foundation of the world.

NOTE.—"Foundation" in these references is the Greek word katabole, which means "to cast down". The verb is so translated in II Cor. iv. 9 and Rev. xii. 10, and in the Septuagint (Greek version of O.T.) it occurs in II Sam. xx. 15; Hag. ii. 22. In all its occurrences "to throw down" is a good rendering. The time referred to may be Gen. i. 2, or at the flood—in either case it should be rendered before or since the "overthrow of the world".

TWO SPHERES OF OPERATION.—The earth, and the heavens. Both become involved in sin and uncleanness, and both have a future in the redemptive plan.

TWO MINISTRIES.—The first including within its scope a great variety, prophet, saviour, and apostle, in fact, all except the second, viz., the ministry of Paul as Apostle to the Gentiles, and as the prisoner of the Lord.

TWO AGENCIES.—The kingdom, centred in Israel, the church as ministered to by Paul.

TWO GOSPELS.—The gospel of the kingdom, and the gospel of the grace of God.

TWO HOPES.—(1). The parousia, the personal coming and presence of Christ on earth, and (2) The "being made manifest with Him in glory".

To distinguish between these things that differ is essential to a clear understanding of the teaching of the Word of truth.

Questions on Course C. Paper No. 6.

1. Collect all references to "From", and "Before, the foundation of the world". Note any peculiarities. Compare with refs. to "Before times eternal" (Before age-times).

2. Give references (and explain them) which show that (1) the earth, (2) the heavens, come within the sphere of redemption. Is it true that the Bible teaches throughout its pages that the believer will "go to heaven"? Prove your answer from the Word. Collect refs. to "inheriting the earth". Explain Abraham's connection with the heavenly city (Heb. xi.).

3. Heb. i., ii.; Rom xv.; Acts xx. 17-27, xxvi. 16-18, and Eph. iii. 1-10 speak of various ministries. Consider each passage, and show the respective ministries.

4. What is the scriptural meaning of "The kingdom of heaven". Does it differ from "The kingdom of God", "The kingdom of His dear Son", and "The church"? Does Scripture warrant the belief in a future literal earthly kingdom? Give references to prove your answer. What does "Church" mean in the Bible. Does it always apply to the same thing?

5. What is the meaning of the word "gospel"? How many different gospels are mentioned in the Word? Explain the passages referring to "gospel" in Galatians. State clearly what constitutes the gospel of the kingdom, and what were its accompaniments. Is the following statement true? "There can be no gospel without a crucified and risen Saviour." Give Scripture for your answer. Explain Mark xvi. 14-20. Note the "shalls".

6. Trace the word parousia (coming) in Matt. xxiv.; I Thess., and I Cor. xv. Note all its accompaniments. What is the hope set forth in Ephesians, Philippians, Colossians, and II Timothy? Who is the Archangel of I Thess. iv.? Who does he represent?

The Purpose of the Ages. Course C. Paper #7.
pp. 142, 143

In considering the Purpose of the Ages in its broad outlines we should observe how the carrying out of the purpose is connected with certain lines of development.

GOD.—So far as the purpose of the ages is concerned, apart from the dispensation of the mystery, three items stand out very prominently. (1) A people – Israel; (2) A city – Jerusalem; (3) A King – David typically, Christ essentially.

SATAN.—Satan has or will travest these. He has (1) A people – some of the Gentiles; (2) A city – Babylon; (3) A King – Saul typically, Antichrist essentially.

God's purpose are developed by at least three distinct agencies. (1) ISRAEL. (2) THE GENTILE. (3) THE CHURCH OF GOD. Two great outstanding events prophesied in connection with both Jew, Gentile and Church are the two comings of Christ. Thus the two activities are those of God and the opposing and counterfeiting activity of Satan, both of which have direct reference to Christ. The three agencies likewise are linked most closely where Christ appears.

Questions on Course C. Paper No. 7.

1. (a) Israel – the People. (b) Jerusalem – the City. (c) Christ – the King.
   Collect references which link these three with the purpose of the ages.

2. (a) The Gentiles. (b) Babylon. (c) Antichrist.
   Collect references which link these three with the purpose of the ages.

3. ISRAEL.—Israel's history may be divided as follows:--
   (a) Abraham to Moses.
   (b) Moses to David.
   (c) David to captivity under Nebuchadnezzar.
   (d) Captivity to Christ.
   (e) Christ to setting aside of Israel
   (f) Re-gathering of Israel.
   (g) Repentance and blessing.
   Give the books of the Bible that deal with each of these sections. Point out in each section the most outstanding features, keeping in mind the purpose of the ages.

4. GENTILE.—Where, and in what connection do we first read of Gentiles?
   Explain the relation of the Gentile world spiritually before the preaching of the gospel of God by reference to Rom. i. and Acts xvii. How does Rom. i. illuminate the case of the Syro-phenician woman (Matt. xv. 21-28), the command of Matt. x. 5, 6, and the necessity of the reconciliation, Rom. xi. 15 and II Cor. v. 18-20.

What is meant by the “times of the Gentiles”? When did they begin? When do they end? Explain Dan. ii.

5. CHURCH.—Explain the difference between Israel, Gentile and Church. What is a Church? Wherein does the “Church” of I Corinthians differ from that of the Epistle to the Ephesians?

What spheres of blessing, government, etc., will these several companies or churches occupy in the future administration of God’s purpose?

6. Collect and arrange in order the prophecies which followed the first coming of Christ, and which foretell the second coming.

How were the prophecies concerning the first coming fulfilled? Literally or figuratively? How does your answer affect belief in the teaching concerning the second coming.

7. What is the Millennium? What follows it? Does Christ reign at the end of the 1,000 years? When does it finish, if ever?

DEVOTIONAL ARTICLES.

A word fitly spoken.
pp. 15, 16

It is an axiom sanctioned alike by Scripture and popular proverb that Actions speak louder than words. Yet while we should ever remember that such is the case, we must not miss the scriptural importance of the spoken word. "Every idle word that men shall speak, they shall give account thereof in the day of judgment (Matt. xii. 36). The context shows the idle word to be unfruitful.

> "Out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh" (Matt. xii. 34).
> "If a man offend not in word, the same is a perfect man, and able also to bridle the whole body" (James iii. 2).

James continues with the figure of the small bit in the horse's mouth, and the small rudder of the great ship. It was sufficient for God to confound the words of men at Babel in order to stop their work. No work is accomplished without words spoken, written or described. The builder must have plans and specifications; the soldier must have orders; the merchant must give instructions and keep accounts. Let us therefore remember the power of a word.

In the physical world many are dumb simply because they are deaf (see Mark vii. 35). In the spiritual world also the same is true. Would we have the "tongue of the learner"? then Isa. l. 4 shews us that such is ours only as we have the "ear to hear as the learned".

> "Let the words of my mouth, and the meditation of my heart, be acceptable in Thy sight, O Lord, my strength and my redeemer" (Psa. xix. 14).

The Lord's Leading.
pp. 47, 48

While it is the constant exercise and prayer of the Child of God that he may be continually led of the Lord, this is often a very difficult and humbling experience, and many souls are baffled and perplexed by the strangeness of the way. A few thoughts on this important theme may not come amiss.

The Lord guides by the application of His own Word. One can be positive in saying that no one is ever "led" to disobey or contravene the teaching of Scripture. Instead of praying for guidance on many subjects, we should read the answer already given in the Word. For example, the Lord has linked together these two things:--

1. In all thy ways acknowledge Him.
2. And He shall direct thy paths.

Without any special prayer, or special guidance, this lamp unto our feet will settle the Lord's will for us. We stand at the cross-ways of life. Which is the path for us? This road seems attractive, but it leads in a direction where it will be difficult or impossible to acknowledge the Lord in all our ways. That is the Lord's guidance; that shuts the door for us. Scriptural examples, as well as individual experience, go to show that the Lord's answers are far more frequently in a negative than in a positive direction.

Take, as an illustration, the case of the apostle Paul and those with him as given in Acts xvi. 6-10. After they had preached the word in Phrygia and Galatia, we find that they were forbidden to preach the word in Asia. Here is a negative leading; they were not told where they were to preach, but were simply forbidden to preach in that one spot. They arrived on their journey at Mysia, and here it appears they wondered whether it was the Lord's will for them to evangelize Bithynia; "but the Spirit suffered them not." Here again was a negative answer, there was no other course open apparently than to go straight on, so > "passing by Mysia they came down to Troas, and a vision appeared unto Paul in the night…….immediately we endeavoured to go into Macedonia, assuredly gathering that the Lord had called us for to preach the gospel unto them."

Here was at last the positive. There is no mystery whatever about the preponderance of negatives in our experience. Just as there is one right way of doing a thing and a hundred wrong ways, so is it with the will of God. And just as there are 99 chances to 1 that we shall adopt the wrong way first, so it is highly probable that we shall attempt to preach in our Asia, or assay to go into our Bithynia instead of going straight from our Galatia to Troas and Macedonia.

The negative answers will grow less in proportion to the nearness of our walk to the Lord, and the knowledge of His will. As we grow in grace we shall sense as it were the right and the wrong, we shall ask less for those things that are not according to His will, we shall seek more to please Him than to please ourselves, and instead of experiencing a whole list of negatives, we shall approach the Divine plan for us more quickly and certainly. Our prayers are answered when the Spirit forbids or suffers us not, just as surely as when He gives the vision and the assurance of the call.

With what certainty we tread when the positive answer is given: "immediately we endeavoured", "assuredly gathering", "we came with a straight course", and we find the one "whose heart the Lord opened", (Acts xvi. 6-15). It is helpful in this connection to remember the LXX rendering of Prov. iii. 6:--

"In all thy ways acknowledge Him, and He shall RIGHTLY DIVIDE thy paths."

The Goal of a Ministry.

"That we may present every man perfect in Christ Jesus." (Col. i. 28).

pp. 63, 64

The apostle, writing about his earlier ministry, said, "I have planted, Apollos watered, but God gave the increase". And again, "As a wise master builder, I have laid the foundation, and another buildeth thereon". "Ye are God's husbandry, Ye are God's building" (I Cor. iii. 6, 10).

It is evident that beyond the responsibility of sowing true seed, and of laying the true foundation, the apostle looks to God to "give the increase"; and even the work actually performed by him was "according to the grace of God which is given" unto him. There is therefore from this standpoint a holy care-less-ness, a sense of irresponsibility that must ever accompany the labours of one who realizes that God alone gives life and growth and fruit.

That this does not by any means present a complete aspect of ministry the epistles to the Corinthians will abundantly show. How these epistles reveal the heart of this faithful apostle, yearning, fearful, anxious for his children in the faith! What an epistle that written to the Galatians is in this same particular! This other phase of ministry is brought before us in Col. i. 28:--

> "Whom we preach, warning every man and teaching every man in all wisdom: that we may present every man perfect in Christ Jesus."

For this the apostle "laboured", and "strove", and had a great "conflict". It must ever be the same, while truth and the world and the flesh remain unchanged.

One cannot but be anxious at the state of Christian testimony. The signs of the times, while not directly referring to the Church of the One Body, point clearly to the approaching end of the age. The coming of the Lord to the earth, the meeting of the Lord in the air must be anticipated, if by ever so small a space, by the realization of the "hope of glory";--

> "When Christ, Who is our life, shall be manifested, THEN you also shall be manifested with Him IN GLORY" (Col. iii. 4).

As professing Christianity more and more openly leaves the Lord and His truth, as leagues and combines encircle the earth in their deadly embrace, how can we stand by and watch dear children of God dallying with that which they themselves will finally repudiate as an unholy thing? The apostle not only desired that the Corinthians should build upon the One true foundation , but that also what they built would stand the test of the fire of that day.

It is not for us to set out a catalogue of the failures of others, but we would earnestly plead with all who have realized the sacredness of a rightly-divided word of Truth to realize also the sacredness of a rightly-divided Church. Failure to discriminate, in a child of God, is a serious error, doubly so if that child of God is a leader of others. No wonder James said:--

> "My brethren, be not many teachers,. Knowing that we shall receive the greater judgment" (James iii. 1).

Look at the prayer which the apostle prayed for that Church which he taught to press on for the prize:--

> "And this I pray, that your LOVE may abound more and more in knowledge and in all DISCERNMENT; that ye may try the things that differ; so that you may be sincere and without offence till the day of Christ" (Phil. i. 9, 10).

The scriptural conception of love here is no mere sentiment, it abounds not merely in affection and kindness and "bowels and mercies", but in "knowledge" and in all "discernment", it quickens the perceptions, it makes us more sensitive to that which is for and against Christ. The discernment vitally influences the future, it is the only safe path of sincerity and inoffensiveness in the day of Christ.

There is a distinct connection between a rightly-divided Word and a discrimination between the world and the Church, the flesh and the spirit. It would be better for some not to have learned of "heavenly places in Christ Jesus" if they are not going to "set their mind on things that are above", and have "no confidence in the flesh". The days into which we are entering are defined by the Spirit as "perilous times", and we must not hesitate to "warn" because some will consider that we are "troublers of Israel". May all unite together to make a clear uncompromising loving testimony to the truth given to us, before the days of our testimony be numbered.

"That He might be just." (Rom. iii. 26).

pp. 76 - 79

Unless we had previously given attention to the subject, we should probably follow the usual error of thinking of the gospel first of all in terms of blessing to ourselves. What is the gospel? God's good news concerning OUR forgiveness, OUR salvation, Christ's death for OUR redemption—something like this arises to the mind at once; yet though this attitude is natural, it is hardly scriptural. Look at Rom. i. 1-4; there the gospel of God is defined as "concerning His Son", and nothing beyond "His Son" is mentioned in verses 3 and 4. That is God's definition of the gospel, its saving power to those who believe is one of its applications—but it is not the first, or most important, feature.

Similarly with the use of "righteousness" and its cognates ("just", "justify"), whilst it is true that Romans clearly establishes the doctrine of justification by faith, it also as clearly emphasizes the Godward side. Not only does the Scripture reveal God as "the justifier of him that believeth in Jesus", but, more important still, the gospel is so designed that this blessing can be prefaced by the words, "that He might be just and the justifier of him that believeth in Jesus" (iii. 26). Particular care is taken that the righteousness of God should not be compromised in any way. Christ has been set forth as a propitiation, not first for the remission of sins, but first "to declare His righteousness for the remission of sins that are past, through the forbearance of God". "The passing by of the sins that had taken place before" was not without a righteous basis, and the apostle is careful to make it evident that by the proclamation of the gospel God is justified as well as man, as in the past, so in the present, "to declare at this time His righteousness".

Look again at the argument in Rom. iii. 1-8. Complicated as it may be, one fact stand out clearly, God is just in all His ways. "That Thou mightest be justified" is the aspect of truth we here seek to emphasize. Again note the reasoning:--

> "If our righteousness commend the righteousness of God, what shall we say? Is God unrighteous Who taketh vengeance? (I speak as a man). Let it not be so, for then how shall God judge the world?"

Any system of teaching which reflects upon the righteousness of God touches the very basis of all things. The two following verses expand the though as follows:--

> If the truth of God is really after all furthered by my lie, then I should not be judged as a sinner, for my sin has really contributed towards the fulfillment of God's purposes, and He is as much implicated in it as I am; why am I judged as a sinner? Why not rather (as some slanderously reported that the apostle taught) take this line, "let us do evil that good may come"?

By the teaching of Rom. iii. neither God nor man can "do evil that good may come" without being involved in unrighteousness. Of those who do such things the apostle said, "Their judgment is just", and he has already spoken of God Himself being "justified" and overcoming when He is "judged". A similar case is exhibited in Rom. vii.:--

> "What shall we say then? Is the law sin? Let it not be; nay, I had not known sin, but by the law…….wherefore the law is holy, and the commandment holy and just and good: was then that which is good made death unto me? Let it not be so, but sin, that it might appear sin, working out death in me by that which is good: that sin by the commandment might become exceeding sinful."

Another rendering of this verse may be helpful:--

> "That good thing, then, has become death to me? By no means, but sin has; that sin might be manifest, through that good thing producing death to me; so that sin through the commandment might become an exceeding great sinner" (verses 7-13).

"Sin is lawlessness"; "He that committeth sin is of the devil…….in this the children of God are manifest, and the children of the devil: whosoever doeth not righteousness is not of God, neither he that loveth not his brother" (I John iii. 4, 8, 10). The line of argument in Rom. iii. links the believer with God in His attitude towards evil. It was slander upon the apostles to report that they affirmed "let us do evil that good may come". It is also nothing more nor less than a slander upon the name of God to teach that He adopts the same method. God is not the author of evil. But some may interpose, "The Scripture in at least one place definitely ascribes the creation of evil to God". That passage is Isa. xlv. 7:--

> "I make peace, and create evil:
> I the Lord do all these things."

It is a matter of common knowledge that the Hebrew word ra, which is here translated "evil", may mean either moral evil, or evil in the sense of a judgment, or a calamity. That being the case, the context alone must decide. By observing the simple parallelism of the verse the meaning is clear:--

A | I form light,
B | And created darkness.
A | I make peace,
B | And create evil.

Just as darkness is the antithesis of light, so evil will be the antithesis of peace. If the intention had been to teach that God was the creator of moral evil, the antitheses would have been, "I make righteousness", or "I make good". The antithesis however is peace, which is the fruit of righteousness, and therefore evil here must be the inflicted punishment which is the wages or the fruit of sin.

The Lord claims to be the doer of all these things; there is nothing here that is not in line with the teaching of the Word as a whole, but to teach that God is the author or creator of moral evil we cannot help feeling is a "slander". If evil has been started on its course by God, if it is the work of His hands and according to His will, we might well exclaim with the apostle, "How then shall God judge the world?"

God is just, while the justifier of the believer, and God is just while the judge of the unbeliever. He has taken pains to draw our attention to the way both law and gospel "declare His righteousness"; may we eschew any vain and deceitful philosophy which either in actuality or in tendency leads us in any other direction.

> "He is the Rock, His work is perfect: for all His ways are judgment: a God of truth and without iniquity, just and right is He" (Deut. xxxii. 4).

Consecration.
pp. 95, 96

What does the word imply? How far is it Scriptural for a believer to speak of yielding himself, of seeking a second blessing, and of being filled with the Spirit? That it is the blessed privilege of the redeemed and justified to "yield" their members unto God, Rom. vi. declares, and in so far as Rom. vi. is obeyed, true consecration must result.

While not using the expression "a second blessing" exactly as it is intended by those who most frequently employ the term, nevertheless the grace of God that bringeth salvation, teaches us to live…….looking (Titus ii. 11). This again must result in consecration. To be "filled with the Spirit" often implies an undispensational position, but the true filling in harmony with Eph. v. 18 results in the practical submission to God's order as set forth in the rest of the chapter. This too is true consecration.

An old Testament word seems to point the way to a true understanding of the term; the word that is rendered "consecration" in Exod. xxix. 9, 29, 30 is literally "to fill the hand" (see verse 9 margin). With what must the hand be filled to satisfy the idea of consecration? Our hands may be filled with service, with gifts, with work, yet we may miss true consecration. Exod. xxix. not only gives us the word "fill the hand", but it also reveals what shall fill the hand. Aaron during the ceremony of his consecration not only had the blood of a ram applied to his ear, thumb and toe, but also had to do with "a ram of consecration". This together with a loaf of bread, a cake of oiled bread, and a wafer out of the basket of unleavened bread that is before the Lord, is put into his hands—"thou shall put ALL in the hands of Aaron…….for a wave offering". The connection here between the ram of consecration and the wave offering leads us on to Lev. xxiii. 10, 11, "Ye shall wave the sheaf before the Lord to be accepted for you, on the morrow after the Sabbath the priest shall wave it". The context shows that the morrow after the Sabbath is that which follows Passover, in other words, it typifies Christ risen from the dead.

Here therefore is the secret of true consecration, the hands filled with all that pertains to the risen Christ. This will solve all problems, and settle all difficulties. Consecration is not a matter of rule, but of newness of life. Let us seek grace to enable us to free our grasp of the things of this world, that in truest consecration we may "fill our hands" with the things of Christ risen, in other words, consecration is expressed for us in Col. iii.

"Set your mind on things above."

Herewith.
pp. 108 - 110

A curse is alternated with a blessing in Mal. iii. 9, 10:--

> "Return unto Me, and I will return unto you, saith the Lord of Hosts, But ye said, Wherein shall we return?" (verse 7).

The same cry is found in Zech. i. 3. The return of the Lord to His people in blessing hinges upon their return unto Him in repentance and obedience. The return enjoined is not the external return from the captivity of Babylon, but the return in heart to the forsaken covenant. Hence the words that preface the command to return are:--

> "Even from the days of your fathers ye are gone away from mine ordinances, and have not kept them."

Brazen and stiff-necked, the people reply, "Wherein shall we return?" This querulous spirit is symptomatic.

> "I have loved you, saith the Lord.
> Yet ye say, WHEREIN hast thou loved us?" (i. 2).
> "A son honoureth his father, and a servant his master: if then I be a father, where is mine honour? If I be a master, where is my fear? saith the Lord of Hosts unto you, O priests, that despise my name.
> And ye say, WHEREIN have we despised Thy Name?" (i. 6).
> "Ye offer polluted bread upon mine altar:
> And ye say, WHEREIN have we polluted Thee?" (i. 7).
> "Ye have wearied the Lord with your words.
> Yet ye say, WHEREIN have we wearied Him?" (ii. 17).
> "Return unto Me, and I will return unto you, saith the Lord of Hosts.
> But ye said, WHEREIN shall we return" (iii. 7).
> "Will a man rob God? Yet ye have robbed Me.
> But ye say, WHEREIN have we robbed Thee?" (iii. 8).
> "Your words have been stout against Me, saith the Lord.
> Yet ye say, WHAT have we spoken so much against Thee?" (iii. 13).

It would be well to consider the reply of the Lord to these questions, which the reader can do for himself. We come back to the passage with which we started.

The people's defection is gauged by their attitude toward God, they had robbed God by withholding the "tithes and offerings". The ninth verse reads in the A.V. "Ye are cursed with a curse". The Sopherim say that they altered the letter M into N (Hebrew), thus making it passive instead of active (see Companion Bible). The primitive text reads, "Ye have cursed Me with a curse"; the alteration was made to avoid a supposed irreverence. Disobedience and self-seeking rob God and, awful thought, curse Him! The alternative is comforting—How may we bless God? by obedience and loving service.

The word rendered Wherein is literally "in what". God's answer to all their questions seems contained in the word, "herewith", literally "in this".

> "Bring ye all the tithes into the storehouse and prove Me now HEREWITH, saith the Lord of Hosts, if I will not open you the windows of heaven, and pour you out a blessing, that there shall not be room enough to receive it" (iii. 10).

The mere tithe of that already given by the Lord, rendered back in grateful service, would open the flood gates of blessing, and the cup would run over. The locust had been ravaging the crops, the fruit of the vine had been prematurely cast, and the people may have said that to take a tenth even from the failing stocks was wrong, unwise and foolish. God challenges worldly wisdom and fleshly economies. Prove Me now HEREWITH. The devourer shall be rebuked for your sakes, the vine shall not cast her fruit before the time.

Haggai, another prophet of the restoration, has much to say upon these same lines. "Is it time for you, O ye, to dwell in your ceiled houses, and this house lie waste?" He calls upon them to consider their ways, to notice the results of their self-seeking policy.

> "Ye have sown much, and bring in little; ye eat, but ye have not enough; ye drink, but ye are not filled with drink; ye clothe you, but there is none warm; and he that earneth wages earneth wages to put it into a bag with holes" (Hag. i. 6).

The God of the widow's barrel and cruse is also the God of the leaky purse. Little is much with His blessing, but even blessings may become curses (Mal. ii. 2). The people looked for much, and it came to little. Why? "Because of Mine house that is waste, and ye run every man to his own house." This spirit shuts up heaven. "Therefore the heaven over you is stayed." Yet did this people but bring the tithes into the storehouse, and think of God's house instead of their own, the very windows of heaven would open. Not merely a falling dew, but a very flood of blessing. Cease to run to your own houses, run instead to Mine, cease to trust to the arm of flesh, and trust in Me, so seems to run the Divine argument. If Hag. i. contains a parallel with Mal. iii., so also does Hag. ii. Again the people are urged to Consider:-- > "And now, I pray you, consider from this day and upward, from before a stone was laid upon a stone in the temple of the Lord: Since those days were, when one came to a heap of twenty measures, and there were but ten: when one came to the pressfat for to draw out fifty vessels out of the press, there were but twenty. I smote you with blasting and with mildew and with hail in all the labours of your hands: yet ye turned not to Me, saith the Lord.

> Consider now from this day and upward, from the four and twentieth day of the ninth month, even from the day that the foundation of the Lord's temple was laid, consider it. Is the seed yet in the barn? yea, as yet the vine, and the fig tree and the pomegranate, and the olive tree, hath not brought forth: from this day will I bless you" (Hag. ii. 15-19).

God's HEREWITH in Haggai is the laying of the foundation stone of the temple; in Malachi it is the ordinances of His service, in both it is the spirit that puts God first, the Old Testament parallel with Phil. ii., "The mind of Christ".

Do not we lose by withholding from the Lord? Have we never experienced the purse with holes in it? Shall we not rather seek the spirit of the Lord's words, "Seek ye first the kingdom of God and His righteousness", knowing full well that our small loss will be made more than gain, "All these things shall be added unto you". Are you called to take up more time in the Lord's service? Prudence, your own plans and the advice of your friends will tell you that you cannot afford it. Remember the Lord's "Prove me now herewith". Is there some service opening before you that will take more of your money? Consider! Compare the blessed experience of the widow of Zarephath ("the place of refining") with that of the people addressed by Haggai and Malachi. Let us render to the Lord unstinted service, let us accept His blessed "Herewith".

"There shall not an hoof be left behind."
(Exod. x. 26).
"Your carcases shall fall in this wilderness."
(Numb. xiv. 29.)

pp. 110, 111

While the reading of these two passages together produces the feeling of a contradiction, that feeling is superficial, for it is an instance of the proverb "Circumstances alter cases".

The quotation from Exodus refers to Egypt, the quotation from Numbers refers to the wilderness. The first passage stands at the head of a long line of passages, all of which teach in type, prophecy and doctrine the blessed truth, that salvation being by grace through redemption, is thereby indefectible. Of all who are typified by Israel in Egypt under the shelter of the shed blood it is true, "They shall never perish". Were we concerned to develop the doctrine known as "the final perseverance of the saints", we could easily fill more space than is at our disposal with passages of scripture which would prove beyond question that those who have once passed from death unto life, can never pass back from life into that death again.

The second passage equally stands at the head of another long line of passages, all of which, in type, prophecy and doctrine, emphasize that over and beyond the blessed fact of an unconditional salvation, is placed a conditional prize or crown or recompence of reward. Again, the passages which speak of present endurance being linked with a future glory, present conflict with a future crown, present denial with the attainment of a future prize, are too numerous for such a short article as this must be.

Together with these passages come the converse, those which speak of the possibility of even Paul himself being disapproved ("castaway", A.V.), and of Moses, that man of God, forfeiting his right of entering the promised land. The believer who has been delivered from the bondage of sin and death cannot be left behind in Egypt—"not a hoof", but by reason of unfaithfulness, of murmuring, of the worship of self instead of the whole-hearted following of the Lord, many who were thus redeemed from Egypt fell in the wilderness.

That there is nothing new in this line of thought we are well aware. We are but repeating the message of The Hope and the Prize, and the articles on Hebrews, but we felt a simple word to stir up the mind by way of remembrance might not come amiss in a time when the snares and cares of this evil age are unremittingly pressed upon the believer as he seeks to follow the pilgrim path. "Let no man beguile you of your reward" (Col. ii. 18).

Dispensational Difficulties.

#1. Is the Church of the One Body also the Bride?

(With a Note on the statement that the Church is feminine).

pp. 9 - 11

There are some who are not quite clear as to the distinction which Scripture draws between the Church called before Acts xxviii., and that of the mystery called after Acts xxviii.

The epistle to the Ephesians gives the definition, "the Church which is His Body, the fullness of Him that filleth all in all". This Church is further spoken of in the second chapter as "one new MAN", and Scripture figures are inspired and consistent. A new man can never be a bride. During the Acts of the Apostles the Church was not the new man, and there the Apostle speaks of it as a betrothed virgin, "I betrothed you to one husband, a chaste virgin to present you to Christ" (II Cor. xi. 2). There is no simile here, it is not "as a chaste virgin", as the A.V. reads. The new man is consistently spoken of as the Church which is the Body. The chaste virgin is consistent with the Church which is the Bride; the Church which is the Bride is associated with the New Jerusalem (Rev. xix.)., whereas the Church of the One Body is connected with the super-heavenlies "far above all". Some have a difficulty when they come to Eph. v., for there the relationship of husband and wife is very prominent. Chapter v. is a section in the practical portion of the epistle, where the walk of the believer is considered. The section does not stop short at the relationship of husband and wife, but speaks of children and parents, servants and masters.

Believers who are members of the One Body have relationships one with another to observe, and the relationship of husband and wife comes first. Husbands are exhorted to love their wives, even as Christ loved the Church; wives are exhorted to be in subjection to their own husbands as the Church is to Christ; children are exhorted to be obedient; and fathers to tenderness; servants are reminded that in their service they may serve the Lord Christ, and masters are reminded that they have a master in heaven. None of these things, however, can rightly be made to teach or to prove the dispensational position of the Church. The practical exhortations would remain true if the church of Ephesians had been the kingdom of the heavens, or any other company.

Some have been perplexed because they have heard it said that where the A.V. reads "it" in Eph. v. 25, 26, the original reads "her", and have therefore concluded that the church being feminine must be the bride. This method of argument is fallacious. The word translated "Church" is feminine, and is therefore followed by a feminine pronoun, but to say that this proves the church to be a female is to betray ignorance of the facts of language. Turn for a moment to modern language. The French have feminine and masculine "words" which are of course accompanied by feminine and masculine articles and pronouns. La table is feminine: should we be truthful if we spoke of the table as a female, and referred to it by the pronouns "her" and "she"? Le livre is masculine: is a French book therefore a male, and must we speak of "him" and "his"? The truth is that the "word", and not the "thing" named, is feminine or masculine; so with the Greek. The same argument that would prove the Church to be feminine would prove the Spirit to be neuter.

Let us look at a few examples of feminine words, kephalē is feminine; this word is translated "head" in Eph. i. 22, but this does not in any sense imply that the head of the Church is a female, "and gave HIM (MASCULINE) to be HEAD (feminine) over all things to the CHURCH (feminine) which is His BODY (neuter)". In Eph. ii. 1 we have "trespasses and sins". "Sins" is feminine; does this imply that only women are guilty of "sins"? In Eph. ii. 3 we read of the "lusts of the flesh"; the word "flesh" is feminine, whether used of male or female. "Wrath" in the same verse is feminine also, so also is "love" in verse 4, and "grace" in verse 7. When Christ said, "I am the true VINE", the word used is feminine; when the Lord said, "I am the DOOR", the word again is feminine. The word graphē ("Scripture") is feminine, while the "law" (nomos) is masculine.

We will not multiply instances of that which is patent to those having the most casual acquaintance with language. We can only regret that such examples of "a little knowledge" should still be found, as that quoted above. The title of the Church as either the Bride, or the Body, has no connection with the etymological or grammatical requirements of the word ecclesia, but is a subject of revelation. The question of the use of the "body" in I Corinthians we will deal with in a separate paper.

#2. "The Body" in I Corinthians.

pp. 40 - 43

It is our belief that the Church of the One Body is peculiar to the revelation of the prison epistles (Ephesians, Philippians and Colossians), and that before the dispensation of the mystery the Church was not the "One Body". We certainly find references to the body in I Corinthians, and as some of our readers are not clear about the subject we propose to consider it here.

The passage to which reference is made is I Cor. xii. This chapter, together with xiii. and xiv., is "concerning spiritual gifts". First of all the apostle divides his subject into two distinct sections:--

1. The spiritual gifts emanating from evil sources (xii. 2, 3).
2. The spiritual gifts emanating from the Divine source (xii. 4-11).

Looking at the second part we observe that it is sub-divided into three groups:--

1. There are diversities of gifts, but the same SPIRIT.
2. There are differences of administrations, but the same LORD.
3. There are diversities of operations, but the same GOD (xii. 4-6).

Here we notice that while there are differences, there is also an all-pervading unity. In verses 7-11 the diversity of gifts (No. 1 above) is considered at length. First the manifestation of the Spirit is given to profit withal. Secondly, this manifestation is a "diversity in unity":--

"To one.	is given. . .	the word of wisdom. . . .	by the Spirit.
To another. . .	is given. . .	the word of knowledge. .	by the same Spirit.
To another. . .	is given. . .	faith. . .	by the same Spirit.
To another. . .	is given. . .	the gifts of healing. . .	by the one Spirit (Vaticanus).
To another. . .	is given. . .	the working of miracles.
To another. . .	is given. . .	prophecy.
To another. . .	is given. . .	the discerning of spirits.
To another. . .	is given. . .	divers kinds of tongues.
To another. . .	is given. . .	the interpretation of tongues,

But ALL these worketh that ONE and the SELF SAME SPIRIT, dividing to every man severally as He will" (xii. 8-11).

This expansion of the subject is followed by the reference to the body, being introduced by the words kathaper gar ("for just as"); the references to the body, therefore, are logically connected with the teaching of the chapter "concerning spiritual gifts". This is taught by the word "for". The references to the body are to be taken as an illustration of the diversity in unity of these spiritual gifts. This is taught by the words "just as". "For just as the body is ONE, and hath MANY members, yet all the members of that body, being many, are one body, so also is the Christ" (Ho Christos). This is the title of the Lord pre-eminently, yet not exclusively. Any who were anointed by God come under that title. The first epistle of John speaks of such:--

> "And you have an ANOINTING from the holy one, and ye all know it" (Vaticanus), "but the ANOINTING which ye have received of Him abideth in you and ye need not that any man teach you" (I John ii. 20, 27).

This anointing was evidently something supernatural in its character and effect. Who among us to-day could truthfully say, "we need not that any man teach us"? Those to whom John wrote could be called, like the Corinthians, "the Christ". In II Cor. i. 21, 22 we read:--

> "Now He confirming us with you in Christ, and having anointed us, is that God who also hath sealed us, and given the earnest of the spirit in our hearts."

This "confirmation" was by means of numerous gifts:--

> "Which was confirmed to us by those who heard, God also attesting by signs and wonders and with divers miracles and distributions of holy spirit, according to His will" (Heb. ii. 3, 4).

Here we have the "diversities" of I Cor. xii. The confirmation and the anointing by means of these supernatural gifts have been withdrawn, the seal and the earnest remain. Eph. i. 13, 14, I Cor. i. 5-7, and Mark xvi. 17-20 bear similar testimony to the presence of "gifts". "The Christ" therefore of I Cor. xii. is NOT THE CHURCH OF THE ONE BODY (which is characterized by the absence of all signs and evidential miracles), but that Church which was composed of supernaturally-gifted believers. The argument of the apostle is, therefore, that the gifts are to be looked upon as so many different members of one body, each gift is necessary to the perfect functioning of the whole, the more ostentatious gifts, such as speaking with tongues, being no more important than the less obtrusive ones. Whatever gift had been given to any individual was to be held and used for the edifying of the whole company.

This unity is the baptism of the one Spirit, Who baptized all these believers into one body (verse 13), and the remaining verses take up the thought of the diversity of gifts and the unity of their origin by a more detailed reference to a human body. Following on therefore from the teaching of verse 12 the apostle says:--

> "For by one Spirit are we all baptized in one body, whether we be Jews or Greeks, whether we be bond or free, and have been all made to drink into one Spirit, for the body is not one member, but many."

Many seize upon these words as though they were a revelation of the mystery of the One Body, which had been hidden since the ages. Such have only to read chapter x. 1-4 to see the reference back to Exodus:--

> "All our fathers were under the cloud, and all passed through the sea, and were all baptized unto Moses, in the cloud and in the sea, and did all eat the same spiritual meat, and did all drink the same spiritual drink."

Returning to I Cor. xii. let us notice the "one body" as the apostle details it. "If the foot shall say, Because I am not the hand, I am not of the body; is it therefore not of the body?" Here is clearly a resumption of the argument of verses 7-12, "if the ear shall say, Because I am not the eye, I am not of the body; is it not therefore of the body?" Here, members of the head are introduced, which cannot possibly be true of the Church of the One Body, for the Head of that Body is Christ Himself. The next verse is directed against the spiritual pride of those who possessed some more apparent gift than others, "If the whole body were an eye, where were the hearing?" "but now God hath set the members every one of them in the body as it hath pleased Him." With this verse read verses 27, 28:--

> "Now ye are a body of Christ, and members in part, and God hath set some in the Church, first apostles, secondarily prophets, thirdly teachers (these are the members like the eye or the ear), after that miracles, the gift of healings, helps, governments, diversity of tongues."

Coming back to verse 18 we observe the continuation of the argument, "and if they were all one member, where were the body? But now are they many members, yet one body". The argument is pursued even to speaking of "uncomely parts", which certainly can find no place in "the Church which is His Body, the fullness of Him that filleth all in all". Chapter xiii. is the more excellent way, and chapter xiv. resumes the theme of the gifts. Here the apostle dwells upon the useful gifts, and "edifying" is a key word, "forasmuch as ye are zealous of spiritual gifts, seek that ye may excel to the edifying of the Church" (verse 12).

The endeavour to read in I Cor. xii. that which is declared to be a mystery unrevealed until the imprisonment of Paul robs both sets of teaching of their point and purpose. In Corinthians the Church in connection with the supernatural gifts is likened to A body, the Church of the mystery is spoken of as being dispensationally THE body.

Let us try the things that differ.

#3. The Heavens and the Super-heavens.
pp. 75, 76

"In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth" (Gen. i. 1).

"And God said, Let there be a firmament in the midst of the waters, and let it divide the waters from the waters, and God made the firmament, and divided the waters which were under the firmament from the waters which were above the firmament: and it was so. And God called the firmament heaven."

"And God said, Let there be lights in the firmament of the heaven to divide the day from the night…….and let them be for lights in the firmament of the heaven……." (Gen. i. 6-17).

"The heaven, and the heaven of heavens, cannot contain Thee" (I Kings viii. 27).

"Behold, I create new heavens and a new earth" (Isa. lxv. 17).

"He…….ascended…….far above all heavens that He might fill all things" (Eph. iv. 10).

"A great high priest who has passed through the heavens" (Heb. iv. 14).

"A high priest made higher than the heavens" (Heb. vii. 26).

"The heavens and the earth which are now are reserved unto fire…….the heavens shall pass away with a great noise…….the heavens being on fire shall be dissolved…….nevertheless we, according to His promise, look for new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness" (II Pet. iii. 7-13).

"The heaven departed as a scroll when it is rolled together" (Rev. vi. 14).

"And I saw a great white throne, and Him that sat on it, from whose face the earth and the heaven fled away; and there was found no place for them…….and I saw a new heaven and a new earth: for the former heaven and the former earth were gone" (Rev. xx. 11, xxi. 1).

"Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings in the super-heavenlies in Christ…….far above all principality and power" (Eph. i. 3; 20, 21).

The above collection of references hold within them some wondrous teaching. Let us seek to separate the material into groups. Peter in his second epistle speaks of three worlds, as will be seen upon examination:--

1. "The world that then was" (II Pet. iii. 6).
2. "The heavens and the earth which are now" (iii. 7).
3. "New heavens and a new earth" (iii. 13).

This suggests to us that all our material belongs to one or other of these three groups.

1. THE WORLD THAT THEN WAS.—To this belongs Gen. i. 1. Note that it is not said that the earth and the heavens perished, but the "world". This is indicated in Gen. i. 2, "the earth became without form and void and darkness was on the face of the deep". References to "the heavens of heavens", "passing through the heavens", "higher than the heavens", take us beyond the present "heaven", to the "super-heavenlies" at the very right hand of God.

2. THE HEAVENS AND THE EARTH WHICH ARE NOW.—Vast as is the "expanse" (raqia, "thinness", sterēoma, "firmament" Heb. and Greek) containing the sun, moon and stars, it is temporary and destined to pass away. To this present circumscribed heaven belong most of the references in the Old and New Testaments. The kingdom of the heavens will be set up before the new heavens are created. To this heaven belong the heavenly calling of Hebrews, and Abraham's heavenly city.

Both Peter and John tell us that the present heaven is to pass away. The latter is most arresting in his description. He likens the passing away of the heaven to the sudden release of a stretched out roll of parchment. When the present temporary heaven rolls up and passes away, the real original heaven of Gen. i. 1 will once again come into its place.

3. THE NEW HEAVENS AND THE NEW EARTH.—To this period belong the blessings of the mystery. The only calling or revelation that has pierced the present temporary heaven and touched that which can be spoken of as eternal is that dispensation of the grace of God which has blessed us with all spiritual blessings in the super-heavenlies far above all. This shows the unique character of the church of the one body. It is connected both by time and place with that which begins before the present heavens were made and goes on when the present heavens shall be no more.

The church of the mystery is the only link during this age between the time before sin entered and the time when sin shall be no more. All other purposes are "under the heavens", this one alone places those who are blessed under its terms "above the heavens". If these things are so, it would be very surprising if the doctrine and practice of this peculiar people were not different from all others.

#4. The Hope of the Church of the Mystery.
pp. 125 - 128

If I Thess. iv. be not the hope of the one body, it is reasonable that the question should arise, What is the hope of the church of the mystery? A patient study of Scripture will provide a fairly detailed presentation of the hope of Israel, and also the hope of the calling of the church which was formed during the Acts period.

When we approach the question of the hope of the one body an equally full and detailed account of that hope is not given. That however does not indicate that our hope is not to be known or understood. Where the church of the mystery in either doctrine, practice or hope shares with the church of other dispensations, details will be rare. When we consider that four short epistles contain the special teaching of the dispensation of the mystery we shall not be surprised to find that practically nothing but essential and peculiar truth finds room therein. Take for example doctrinal truth. Sin is interdispensational; it is not the peculiarity of any company or calling, consequently definitions of sin are not included in the Prison Epistles. We have "All Scripture", and can learn from that all that is necessary.

Coming therefore to the question of the HOPE, we observe first of all that there are some features that are common to the hope of all periods. These will not need repetition in the small compass of the Prison Epistles. Let us notice three outstanding features common to all.

1. RESURRECTION.—There can be no need of detailed proof to show that the one grand all-inclusive circle of hope is resurrection. Israel are to be brought up "out of their graves" when the time comes for them to be made "one nation in the land", and the "tabernacle of God to be once more with them (Ezek. xxxvii.). This truth is attested by Paul (Acts xxiv. 21; xxvi. 6, 7; xxviii. 20). The church during the Acts as ministered to by Peter or Paul had their hope only in resurrection (I Pet. i. 3, 4; I Cor. xv.).

2. THE LORD'S PERSONAL PRESENCE.—No student of prophecy can avoid the emphasis placed upon the personal presence of the Lord as the center of the hope of nations or of churches. Peter intimates that until the Lord Jesus returns, there can come no season of refreshing (Acts iii. 19, 21). The Lord Himself in Matt. xxiv. links the end of the age, the conclusion of tribulation and the setting up of the kingdom, with His own parousia or personal presence (rendered "coming"). The Thessalonian saints "waited for God's Son from heaven" (I Thess. i. 10). The Corinthians waited for the "revelation of the Lord Jesus Christ" (I Cor. i. 7).

3. THE BEMA OR JUDGMENT SEAT OF CHRIST.—The Lord, when He sits upon the throne of His glory, shall divided the nations into sheep and goats (Matt. xxv.), and take account of His servants and their use of the talents committed to them. The Corinthian saints were taught that they "must all appear before the judgment seat of Christ: that every one may receive the things done in his body, according to that he hath done, whether it be good or bad".

We shall find that these three features are true of the hope of the one body. These, therefore, while receiving any necessary adjustment will remain in essence the same.

So far we have noticed things which are common. There are distinctions too that are indicated, quite apart from the peculiar hope of the one body. The believer, during the time when the kingdom was in view, hoped "to inherit the EARTH'. During the transitional period of the Acts, the believer hoped to meet the Lord in the AIR, the living to be changed in a moment in the twinkling of the eye. Some, the overcomers, looked for a CITY which hath foundations, the new Jerusalem. ALL, whether to inherit the earth or the heavenly city, must enter by the way of resurrection, and find the center of their hope in the glorified Christ, either as David's greater Son, or the Lamb in the midst of the throne.

When we turn to the epistles of the mystery, it is to find the few points of difference, all else remaining as taught throughout Scripture. Col. iii. 1-4 presupposes that our hope must be via resurrection, and be consummated when with Christ personally, the difference being in the sphere of its enjoyment and the mode of its attainment, "For ye died and your life is hid with Christ in God: When Christ Who is our life shall be made manifest, then shall ye also be made manifest with Him in glory". Here is (1) Resurrection, and (2) Personal presence, the difference being indicated by the words, "With Him in glory". This manifestation of the Lord takes place in heaven before He descends to the air of the earth, and the hope of the one body is that whenever the moment comes for the Lord to be made manifest "IN GLORY", then that church will be made manifest with Him.

This indicates that the church of the one body must be removed before the Lord's return to the earth, and before the hope of I Thess. iv. or I Cor. i. is realized. There is no indication given of any manifest ascent into heaven. Nothing that would be noticed by the outside world, as it must be when the saints are "caught up in clouds to meet the Lord in the air". The professing church is in ignorance that "the mystery" has been revealed, or that such a company as "the one body" exists, and when that company has ceased on earth they will not be missed. The church of the one body has never formed a separate sect or denomination. Its inception was a secret. Its annunciation was within the four walls of a Roman prison. Its course through the age has been purely elective in character and has never found a place in the general evangel. Its consummation will equally be unobserved.

What we do know is this, that just prior to the descent of the Lord to the air and to the earth, the complete church of the one body will be "manifested with Him in glory". Their blessed hope is "the manifestation of the glory of our great God and Saviour Jesus Christ", and for this they "live…….looking". The references in the prison epistles to prize, crown, inheritance, and reward must be studied in order that the earlier teaching concerning the bema or judgment seat may be re-adjusted to the altered dispensation.

There is more detail in the Prison Epistles however than we may at first credit. It is locked up in the words "One hope of your calling" and "the hope of His calling". As the special and peculiar features of our calling are realized so will the conception of our hope be increased. For example, our blessings are "in the superheavenlies" (Eph. i. 3). In spirit we are already seated with Christ there "far above all". What is this but a revelation also of our hope? If our hope be the hope of our calling, then when our hope is realized we shall in fact as well as by faith be found seated with Christ far above all. Each reader must pursue this for himself and as he does so he will be answering the question, what is the hope of the one body?

It is possible that the testimony to the mystery will end as it began. One by one the living members of the one body will fall asleep and the truth will be buried in the tomb of the last believer. How such will be raised and be made manifest in glory we are not told. We do not understand how Christ was raised, but we believe it and rejoice in it. This too must be true in connection with our hope. Just as our salvation is a phase of the one salvation, and the church a special company of all the redeemed, so our hope is a peculiar phase of one great event and centred in the heavenly glory of our great God and Saviour.

While proving the things that differ we must ever remember the things which underlie and remain unchanged. May we "Live…….looking……." (Titus ii. 12, 13).

#5. Baptized Believers.

pp. 158 - 160

We occasionally come into touch with companies of believers, who by the prominence which they give to baptism by water refer to themselves as "baptized believers". Moreover, it is very usual to find those who are members of the one body, and blessed with all spiritual blessings under the dispensation of the mystery, conceding this point, and allowing others to say of them, they do not believe in baptism.

Nothing could be further from the truth. Every member of the one body is a "baptized believer", and in no sense should we allow any to say of us that we do not believe in "baptism". See the strange argument which is used; while it is conceded by those who practice water baptism that it is a typical rite, nevertheless, we allow those who emphasize the shadow to monopolize the claim to baptism, while we who rejoice in the substance (the "one baptism") often appear to undervalue it. It must be one of the objects of our endeavour, for without it the unity of the Spirit is incomplete. "Divers baptisms" are classified as "carnal ordinances" in Heb. ix. 10, which together with the tabernacle and its offerings, was a representative figure (parabolé) for the season then present.

If we take the opening verses of Rom. vi. to teach the lesson conveyed by the immersion of the believer in water, we shall be the better able to understand the reality of the one baptism of Eph. iv.:--

> "Know ye not, that so many of us as were baptized into Christ, were baptized into His death? Therefore we were buried with Him by baptism into His death, that like as Christ was raised from the dead by the glory of the Father, so also we should walk in newness of life, for if we have been planted together in the likeness of His death, we shall be also in the likeness of His resurrection."

When we turn to the epistle to the Ephesians, we find that we have been:-- > "Made alive together with Christ, and raised together, and made to sit together in the heavenlies in Christ Jesus" (II. 5, 6).

By consulting Eph. iv. 5 we read that there is ONE baptism. It is nothing less than a piece of self-deception to make ONE read TWO, for if one baptism can mean two, then one body may well mean two, one spirit two, etc. We know well that when John the Baptist commenced his ministry there was ONE baptism—that of water, and he looked forward to another baptism—that of spirit. During the Acts of the Apostles, there were TWO baptisms, viz., water and spirit, the type and the reality. The reality has always been the baptism of the spirit, and when the type has no dispensational place the reality still remains untouched and unchanged.

True baptism united the believer with his Lord in His death and resurrection—a unity typically set forth in the ceremony of water baptism. What therefore can have possessed the mind of believers when we find them reasoning that while the reality is the baptism of the spirit, and the type that of water, the removal of the TYPE removes the REALITY! Is there not true tabernacle which the Lord pitched and not man, because the earthly type has crumbled to dust? Is there no one sufficient sacrifice because the typical offerings have ceased? What distorted logic is it that dares to say that those believers who, by the Divine sentence, are united by one Spirit to the death, burial, resurrection and present glory of the ascended Lord, are un-baptized? Col. ii. 11, 12 speaks emphatically on this point:--

> "In whom ye are circumcised with the circumcision made without hands, in the putting off the body of the flesh, by the circumcision of Christ, having been buried with Him by baptism, wherein also ye were raised with Him through the faith of the inworking of God who raised Him out from the dead."

Doubtless in the days of the apostles and after there were those who would strenuously deny that the Gentiles were "the circumcision" (Phil. iii. 3), simply because they had not submitted to an external rite; nevertheless the circumcision without hands was the real thing, while many who boasted of the carnal rite were foreigners to the reality. In the same way, that baptism which united the believer with his Lord is independent of the carnal ordinance. When the nature of the dispensation required typical ordinances, God commanded water baptism in association with the real invisible baptism. When the dispensation changed, and believers were "no longer children" and they "put away childish things", the external ceremony was no longer imposed upon them, but the reality remained. The one baptism of the one Spirit is the only baptism that figures in the unity of the Spirit.

If other believers are found biting and devouring one another over the shadow, let us see to it that we do not, for a little peace, yield the true place of the substance. Our stand must be that every member of the church of the one body is ipso facto a "baptized believer", and that no amount of emphasis on the type can lift it into the place of the reality.

"The things which are seen are temporal, the things that are not seen are age-abiding" (II Cor. iv. 18).

Studies in Ecclesiastes.

#6. Does your Business Pay? (i. 3).
pp. 17 - 20

We have scanned somewhat briefly this wonderful book, and have seen the conclusion of the matter, that apart from the blessed hope of resurrection both Paul and Solomon agree that we are of all men most miserable. We now return to the opening section of the book to look more closely at the method which is adopted, the materials that are used, and the result that is achieved.

The thesis with which Koheleth opens chapter i. 2 and closes chapter xii. 8 is that which he probes and proves throughout the twelve chapters. All is vanity, such is the statement. Now for the proof. The preacher puts forth a question:--

> "What profit hath a man of all his labour which he taketh under the sun?"

It is most important, in order to arrive at a true answer, that we should have a true understanding of the question, which is one concerning profit. The Hebrew word is yithrohn, and signifies literally "What is over and above", that is, the true commercial everyday idea of profit. Labour, which earns enough to supply to-morrow's strength to labour again, is but an endless circle to be described in the verses that follow, and is profitless however much it may seem to produce. The reader may prove this meaning by the usage of the cognate yother which occurs in Ecclesiastes seven times, viz.:--

ii. 15.	"Why was I then more wise."
vi. 8.	"What hath the wise more than the fool."
vi. 11.	"What is man the better."
vii. 11.	"By it there is profit to them."
vii. 16.	"Neither make thyself over wise."
xii. 9.	"And moreover."
xii. 12.	"And further."

The only positive statement is the central reference. In this book of superlative vanity something is profitable. What is it?

> "Wisdom is good, like an inheritance, and by it there is profit to them that see the sun…….the PROFIT (yithrohn) of knowledge is that wisdom giveth LIFE to them that have it" (vii. 11, 12).

Here we are plunged at once into the very heart of the matter. All labour is profitless which does not yield treasure in heaven. Merely to moil and toil for the meat that perisheth, for the clothes that wear out, for the gold that fades, for riches that take wings, is to live the life of a bankrupt though we die wealthier than a Crœsus. So to dispose of one's time, so to arrange one's labour that some of the seed sown shall be harvested "in that day", that some of the treasure shall be laid up as a good foundation for the life that is life indeed, even though some of our crops down here are sparse and our bank account low—such labour is not without its "moreover". From the verse which asks the question concerning the profitableness of labour (i. 3) until chapter ii. 26, the great subject of investigation is this one of works, sore travail and labour. After the enumeration of the time and seasons (iii. 1-8), which in effect summarizes the whole round of human activity, the question of i. 3 abruptly reappears: "What profit hath he that worketh in that wherein he laboureth?" The insane idolatry of mere accumulation is exposed in the next reference to "profit" (v. 9-12):--

> "Moreover, the profit of the earth is for all (or consists in the whole): the King himself is served by the field."

The verses which follow both speak of the failure of silver and of increase to satisfy. The occupant of the humble cottage, were he taught by this book, would never envy the owner of the mansion which overlooks his roof. Can that wealthy man eat more than one meal at a time? wear more than one suit at a time?

> "What advantage to the owners thereof saving the LOOKING AT THEM with their eyes?" (v. 11).

In contrast with all the vexations and taxations of the wealthy is the poor man:--

> "The sleep of the labouring man is sweet whether he eats little or much."

A plain and frugal supper satisfies his modest desires, and an extra good meal brings no nightmare to haunt his slumbers. Again the question is raised in v. 16, and labour for riches proves to be labour for the wind, and where is the profit? Did not the Lord Jesus Himself take up the teaching of Ecclesiastes when He said:--

> "For what is a man profited if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul?" (Matt. xvi. 26).

Here the truth is enforced by a figure that does not speak merely of accumulating silver or adding field to field, it contemplates the possession of the whole world—yet even then we ask where is the profit? there is none, for the reward which the Lord will give when He comes in the glory of His Father is forfeited. Is not the conclusion of Ecclesiastes' investigation expressed in the words:-- > "Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon earth…….but lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven"?

The apostle Paul knew full well that the balance-sheet is not to be made up annually—it is an affair of life:--

> "For me to live is Christ, and to die GAIN" (Phil. i. 21).
> "What things were gain to me, those I counted loss for Christ…….I count all things but loss…….that I may have Christ for my gain" (Phil. iii. 7, 8).
> "I have learned in whatsoever state I am to be content" (Phil. iv. 11).

We return to the opening chapter, and note the observations which follow immediately upon his question. He instances the generations of mankind, the sun, the wind, the rivers. One thing is common to them, a continuous never-ending circle. One generation passeth away and another generation cometh. The sun is no sooner risen than he seems to hasten along his pathway to complete his circuit. The winds whirl about continually, and return according to their circuit. The rivers run into the sea and return again to their source. "All things are full of weariness" (see xii. 12 for the same word). There is no satisfaction to be found in the things of this life of themselves. What is the eye for but to see? yet "the eye is not satisfied with seeing"! The idea of the endless circle comes out again in i. 9, 10:--

The final statement seems to reach the depths of vanity. "No remembrance" (i. 11). After all the toil, the heart ache, the sleepless nights, the weary struggle, the little petty triumph—oblivion, forgotten! Ichabod: where is the glory? One writer remarked that if he had to use two geometrical figures, the one to represent man the other God, he should use a circle for man and a straight horizontal line for God for He alone moves forward, man but treads a never ending mill.

This book has something more cheerful to say even about this life, when we are ready for the lesson (we intend to pause here so that we may all face this Scripture). Here we are in a world of strife, struggle, turmoil. Whether we are officially in a state of Peace or War makes very little difference. Men and women spend their lives in pursuing the unsatisfying round of eating and drinking, buying and selling, losing and gaining, in short, all the items enumerated in iii. 1-8, for what use or purpose? If it ends in the things of this life, it has been a mere circle. If that circle is so big that it embraces "the whole world", yet the Saviour says, "What shall it profit a man?"

My reader, ask yourself the question as before the Lord, DOES MY BUSINES PAY? Do not consult your pass book, nor speak of your turn-over, do not think of your increasing barns or added acres; where is the profit in the scriptural sense? Does each year find you with an increasing balance stored up "where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt and where thieves do not break through nor steal?' When you have computed your yield per acre, have you thought of that other harvest? "God is not mocked, for whatsoever a man soweth that shall he also reap." Some commodities are not very saleable. For example, how few Buy the truth and sell it not. How many of us are keen to Redeem the time because the days are evil? And when we labour with our hands do we have the apostle's injunction in mind, That we may have to give to him that needeth?

One word in conclusion. "We brought nothing into this world, and it is certain we can carry nothing out." With that "one event" vanishes all the "gains" of this life. Oh to realize the value of an everyday appreciation of resurrection ground!

"Your labour is NOT IN VAIN in the Lord."

#7. Sore travail and its exercise (i. 12-15).
pp. 53 - 56

After surveying the course of nature and seeing impressed upon the whole of creation the endless circle of objectless activity, Koheleth proceeds to a further detailed investigation. We observed that the opening of verse 3 gave the key to the direction of the search, What profit? We shall now observe that verses 12 and 13, which commence a sub-section, likewise provide the key to the matter of the search:--

> "I, Koheleth, was King over Israel in Jerusalem. And I gave my heart to seek and search out by wisdom concerning all things that are done under heaven: this sore travail hath God given to the sons of man to be exercised therewith" (Eccles. i. 12, 13).

The search was to be conducted "by wisdom" and it is essential to our appreciation both of the method and of the results of the enquiry, that Koheleth retained that God-given wisdom throughout the investigation. Wisdom is the emphatic word of this section, e.g.:--

> "To seek and search out by wisdom" (13).
> "I have gotten more wisdom…….my heart had great experience of wisdom and knowledge" (16).
> "I gave my heart to know wisdom" (17).
> "In much wisdom is much grief: and he that increaseth knowledge increaseth sorrow" (18).

In ii. 3, even in the apparent plunge, "giving myself unto wine", Koheleth still could say, "Yet acquainting my heart with wisdom". Further, in ii. 9, the writer asserts, "My wisdom remained with me". We travel as far as vii. 25 still to hear the words:--

> "I applied my heart to know and to search, and to seek out wisdom and the reason of things."

In the conclusion of the book, the wisdom of Koheleth is mentioned:--

> "Moreover because the preacher was wise, he still taught the people knowledge" (xii. 9).

Whatever we may think of the personal participation of the writer in the objects of his search, we must not ourselves forget the scriptural emphasis upon the searcher's wisdom. Moreover, he declares also for our benefit that at the time he pursued this enquiry, he was King. These investigations were not carried out by an inexperienced minor, but one who for the purposes of his kingly office had received a special grant of wisdom. Further, in a king of such wealth, magnificence and sway as that of Solomon, we see one who was able to the fullest extent to sound the depths and scale the heights in his research.

Returning to verse 13, we observe that Solomon gave his heart "to seek and search". The word "search" (tur) is the word used so frequently of the spies in Num. xiii., xiv. It indicates a thorough survey according to the charge given by Moses to the spies (Num. xiii. 18-20) both of the nature of the land itself, its crops and its inhabitants. So Solomon's search was thorough, it was "by wisdom" and it was the occupation of his "heart". The object of this thorough search was "concerning all things which are done under heaven", which in turn is further described as:--

> "This sore travail which God hath given to the sons of men to be exercised therewith."

The object is the things "done" under heaven. Verse 14 tells us that Koheleth had seen all the works that are done under the sun, and they were all vanity and vexation of spirit. It is the same sentiment and the same word, rendered "wrought", that we read in ii. 17. Among the things "done" we never include the "oppressions" that abound on every hand (iv. 1-3). But to limit our observations within handy compass we note the many things "done" in this practical experiment, as indicated in chapter ii. Each reference is to the same original word:--

> "Till I might see what was that good for the sons of men which they should do under heaven" (3).
> "I made me gardens and orchards" (5).
> "I made me pools of water" (6).
> "I gat me men singers and women singers, and the delights of the sons of men, as musical instruments, and that of all sorts" (8).
> "Then I looked on all the works that my hands had wrought and on the labour that I had laboured to do" (11).
> "What can the man do that cometh after the King? even that which had already been done" (12).
> "The work that is wrought under the sun is very grievous to me" (17).

Here is an array of doings, the result—"very grievous". In our "text" the things done are defined as "sore travail". This is an expression which we meet several times through the book. The question is asked, "What hath man of all his labour?" The answer is:--

> "All his days are sorrows, and his travail grief" (ii. 23).
> "He giveth (to the sinner) travail (namely) to gather and to heap up, that he may give to him that is good before God" (ii. 26).
> "I have seen the travail which God hath given to the sons of men to be exercised in it" (iii. 10).
> "There is one alone…….he hath neither child nor brother: yet there is no end of all his labour; …….this is also vanity yea, it is a sore travail" (iv. 8).
> "A dream cometh through the multitude of business (travail)" (v. 3).
> "Riches perish by an evil travail" (v. 14).
> "The business (travail) that is done upon the earth" (viii. 16).

These references show that the "things done" by the sons of men, those things which constitute "business", are a "sore travail". Sorrow and grief, heaping up for another, whether the good before God, or for someone else because one has neither child nor brother, disturbing one's very sleep so that the daily business demands the activity of the restless brain at night, the transient character of these hard-earned riches, and the baffling mystery of it all—these constitute one of the causes for vanity and vexation of spirit. There is, however, in all these intricacies the redeeming feature of a purpose. This sore travail is given to the sons of men "to be EXERCISED therewith". So fundamentally true is this, that the same Hebrew word that gives us "travail" gives us "exercise". This word comes in many passages Scripture, e.g.:--

"Before I was afflicted I went astray" (Psa. cxix. 67).
"To humble thee and to prove thee" (Deut. viii. 2).

This second reference well illustrates the teaching of Ecclesiastes:--

> "Thou shalt remember all the way which the Lord thy God led thee these forty years in the wilderness, to humble (exercise) thee and to prove thee, to know what was in thine heart, whether thou wouldest keep His commandments or no. And He humbled thee, and suffered thee to hunger and fed thee with manna, which thou knewest not, neither did thy fathers know: that He might make thee know that man doth not live by bread only, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God doth man live."

This is parallel with the teaching of I Cor. x. 13:--

> "God is faithful who will not suffer you to be tempted above that ye are able: but will with the temptation also make the issue, that ye may be able to bear up under it."

And again, in Heb. xii. 11:--

> "No chastening for the present seemeth to be joyous, but grievous, nevertheless AFTERWARDS it yieldeth the peaceable fruit of righteousness unto them which are exercised thereby."

Oh, the tragedy of unlearned lessons! The trial passed through without being exercised, the suffering endured without result, the heavy stroke without the blessed fruit. God has so ordered the affairs of men that this world shall not yield only joy and gladness; sorrow, vexation and worry at every turn beset the sons of men, not out of caprice or indifference, but that they may be exercised, humbled therewith. And the Christian too passes through sore trials, so that he may learn to lean harder and more completely upon his Lord.

Has the reader been "exercised" thereby? Have you gone on your knees with your trouble to ask that you may not miss its lesson? Have you realized that He who sends the trial makes the issue?

As a conclusion to the opening investigation Koheleth says:--

> "That which is crooked cannot be made straight: and that which is wanting cannot be numbered" (i. 15).

This conclusion, namely the utter inability of man to "reform" this age, is stated again in viii. 13:--

> "Consider the work of God, for who can make that straight which He hath made crooked."

Well may the gloomy Dane say:--

> "The world is out of joint. Oh, cursed spite > That ever I was set to put it right."

The sore travail of the age is clarion-tongued in its call for Christ. The whole creation groaneth and travaileth, waiting for the coming of the Prince of peace. "I will overturn, overturn, overturn, until He come whose right it is." It is for the believer to be spared the fruitless agony of the gospel of reform, and to fret not himself because of evil doers, because of him that bringeth wicked devices to pass, but to roll his burden upon the Lord, and wait patiently for Him.

#8. The search for "that good" (i. 16 - ii. 3).
pp. 81 - 83

In the opening verse (i. 13) the Preacher tells us he gave his "heart" to the search concerning the sore travail of men. In the verses that follow, we can see how his heart went out into all the avenues of human suffering, pleasure and experience in his endeavour to discover "what is that good?"

A1 | I communed with mine own heart.
  B1 | Greatness and wisdom.
A2 | My heart.
  B2 | Great experience of wisdom and knowledge.
A3 | I gave my heart.
  B3 | Wisdom, madness, folly, grief, sorrow.
A4 | I said in mine heart.
  B4 | Mirth, pleasure mad.
    C1 | What doeth it?
A5 | I sought in mine heart.
  B5 | Wine, folly.
    C2 | What was that good which they should do?

Koheleth had gotten wisdom more than all that had been before him in Jerusalem. His heart also had "great experience of wisdom and knowledge". He had not only possessed but he had used his gift. The word experience is given in the margin "seen much". It is variously translated in Ecclesiastes, viz., "to see", "enjoy", "perceive", "consider", "behold". Nevertheless Koheleth realized the unplumbed depths that surrounded him. So with all his wisdom and experience of it, he gave his heart "to know wisdom and to know madness and folly". In many points chapter vii. echoes these opening verses. There he shows that his experiences have taught a needful lesson:--

> "I said, I will be wise; but it was far from me. That which is far off and exceeding deep who can find it out? I applied mine heart to know and to search and to seek out wisdom, and the reason of things, and to know the wickedness of folly, even of foolishness and madness."

Here Koheleth indicates that by wisdom some things cannot be fathomed, and this is more positively taught in viii. 16, 17:--

> "When I applied mine heart to know wisdom and to see the travail that is done upon the earth, how that one doth not see sleep with his eyes by day or by night. Then I beheld all the work of God, that a man cannot find out the work that is done under the sun, because though a man labour to seek it out, yet he shall not find it; yea farther; though a wise man think to show it, yet shall he not be able to find it."

Again in iii. 10, 11 the sore travail and its legitimate exercise is contrasted with the "far off" and the "exceeding deep" things which wisdom cannot explore:--

> "He hath made everything beautiful in its season: also He hath set the age in their heart, so that no man can find out the work that God maketh from the beginning to the end."

Revelation alone can make us know the work that God maketh from the beginning to the end. What is revealed we know, what is unrevealed all our wisdom will never supply. We shall but make our folly manifest and ultimately be found wresting the scriptures to make them fit our theories. Again in another parallel with the opening section we read:--

> "Consider the work of God, for who can make that straight, which He hath made crooked (the vain attempt is seen in every department of life to-day, from theology downwards). In the day of prosperity be joyful, but in the day of adversity consider that God also hath set the one over against the other, to the end that man should find nothing after him…….neither make thyself over wise" (vii. 13-16).

Solomon, therefore, when he gave his heart to know wisdom and madness and folly, was simply asking to:-- > "perceive vexation of spirit. For in much wisdom is much grief (or mortification): and he that increaseth knowledge increaseth sorrow" (i. 17, 18).

This result he arrives at in ii. 21-23:--

> "The man whose labour is in wisdom, and in knowledge and in equity…….all his days are sorrows and his travail grief."

It is impossible to attain to a knowledge of the world and its ways without experiencing the utter failure of man to save himself or reform the crooked world. Wisdom also fails us to make plain the work that God doeth from the beginning to the end. Faith in His written Word is our only safety and rest. We have already indicated that the word experience is the word enjoy. "I said in mine heart, Go to now, I will prove thee with mirth, therefore look into pleasure." What was the result of the investigation? "This also is vanity" (ii. 1). His experiment with "mirth" was very thorough. It is set out in detail in the verses that follow. In verse 10 Koheleth says, "I withheld not my heart from any joy (mirth)".

"Therefore look into pleasure."—This word pleasure is rendered "good" twenty-four times in Ecclesiastes, besides "better" and "well". Koheleth did not "plunge into pleasure" here, but "investigated good", as he repeats in ii. 3. Here he examines mirth, there he interrogates folly with the same object in view. All that he could say of laughter was that it was mad. In chapter vii. 3, 4, we find (as we have found before) his sober judgment on the matter:--

> "Sorrow is better than laughter: for by the sadness of the countenance the heart is made better. The heart of the wise is in the house of mourning, but the heart of fools is in the house of mirth."

His question concerning mirth was, "What doeth it?" In what way does it help man upon the road to true peace and lasting joy. Surely the beginning of wisdom is to recognize that we are in an evil age, with corruption in our nature, and condemnation as our legal end. Laughter and mirth are out of place in the presence of such a state. It is like the crackling of thorns under a pot in its transience. Solomon went the whole gamut of experiences, and in verse 3, when he gave himself to wine, he exposed the subtle philosophy of the Ruba'iyát of 'Omar Khaiyam. Chapter vii. answers the "laying hold of folly" by replying "It is good that thou shouldest take hold of (same word) this", indicating the argument of verses 13-17 already quoted above. No conclusion is arrived at in ii. 3. All we know is that the writer tested these things in turn with one object:--

> "Till I might see what was that good for the sons of men, which they should do under heaven all the days of their life."

We must examine the process of investigation more thoroughly in another paper.

#9. Life's true Portion (ii. 4-11).
pp. 113 - 116

In this series we are seeking principles. The limitations of space and time prevent us from a closer consideration of connecting details other than a brief survey. Such a survey must be given now of the subject matter of chapter ii. 4-10. The pursuit of the enquiry as to what was "that good for the sons of men which they should do under the heaven all the days of their life" was not conducted as a theoretical speculation, but as a practical experiment. Koheleth's attention is first described as that which from the days of the flood till the present time has been a past summary of human activity: "I builded, I planted". Here we see the laying out and equipping of a great establishment. Matthew Henry in his commentary writes:--

> "Solomon here, in pursuit of the summum bonum, the felicity of man, adjourns out of his study, his library, his laboratory, his council chamber, where he had in vain sought for it, into the park and play house, his garden and his summer house, exchanging the company of philosophers and grave senators for that of the wits and gallants, and the beaux esprits of his court, to try if he could find true satisfaction and happiness among them. Here he takes a great step downward from the noble pleasures of intellect to the brutal ones of sense; yet, if he resolve to make a thorough trial, he must knock at this door because here a great part of mankind imagine they have found that which he was in quest for."

The turning from pure wisdom and abstractions to the concrete erection of buildings and planting of gardens here noticed is founded upon the two phases manifestly indicated in i. 16, ii. 3, and ii. 4-10. The books of Kings and Chronicles give some idea of Solomon's activities as a builder.

> "He built Tadmor in the wilderness, and all the store cities, which he built in Hamath. Also he built Beth-horon, the upper, and Beth-horon, the nether, fenced cities, with walls, gates and bars: and Baalath, and all the store cities that Solomon had, and all the chariot cities, and the cities of the horsemen, and all the desire of Solomon which he desired to build in Jerusalem, and in Lebanon, and throughout all the land of his dominion" (II Chron. viii. 4-6).

Koheleth not only built and planted, but he gathered a great retinue of servants and maidens. His possessions in cattle were greater than all that had been before him in Jerusalem. Silver and gold and the peculiar treasure of kings and of the provinces were gathered without stint. Singers, both male and female, and musical instruments of all sorts were not omitted. Here was one who had unlimited scope and unlimited power, > "And whatsoever mine eyes desired, I kept not from them, I withheld not my heart from any joy" (Eccles. ii. 10).

Here all men may see ambition and desire gratified and indulged to the utmost bound, and from the record may learn the vanity of their own puny graspings. Here is one who was not an envious spectator of a distant pleasure, nor who merely had a share with others of the good things of this life; here was one who was pivot and center of all the beauty, luxury, refinement and greatness of kingly estate and gratified ambition. While the scheme was in process, Solomon's whole heart had been engaged and satisfied.

> "For my heart rejoiced in all my labour, AND THIS WAS MY PORTION" (Eccles. ii. 10).

Here we leave details for principles again, and here we must stop to weigh and consider its meaning. This is the conclusion which Koheleth came to after he had traversed another field of enquiry.

> "Wherefore I perceive that there is nothing better, than that a man should rejoice in his own works; FOR THAT IS HIS PORTION" (Eccles. iii. 22).

What comes after that no one can say. "For who shall bring him to see what shall be after him?" (iii. 22). Yet again in chapter v. 18, 19:--

> "Behold that which I have seen; it is good and comely for one to eat and to drink, and to enjoy the good of all his labour that he taketh under the sun all the days of his life, which God giveth him: FOR IT IS HIS PORTION. Every man also to whom God hath given riches and wealth, and hath given him power to eat thereof, and to TAKE HIS PORTION, and to rejoice in his labour; this is the gift of God."

Finally in ix. 9, 10:--

> "Live joyfully with the wife whom thou lovest all the days of the life of thy vanity, which He hath given thee under the sun, all the days of thy vanity: for THAT IS THY PORTION in this life, and in thy labour which thou takest under the sun. Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might: for there is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom, in the grave, whither thou goest."

These passages come as a revelation from heaven upon the true nature of this present life. We are now here practicing our scales, the public performance is future. We are now perfecting our powers of drawing, the academy picture is future. We do not call our friends around us to hear our scales, neither do we hang in the public gallery our many attempts with chalk and crayon. So with this life. Solomon realized that his portion was in the doing, and not in the result.

> "If what shone afar so grand
> Turns to nothing in thine hand,
> On again: the virtue lies
> In the getting, not the prize."

This is perhaps pessimistic. Life's lessons need not "turn to nothing". The "exercise" may yield peaceable fruits of righteousness, the sorrows may accomplish our perfecting. A professor of economics once said to his students, "Live all the time". His meaning was—Do not set out in life with the idea that you will work hard till you are, say, 50 years of age, and then retire to some nice country house, with well-kept lawns, etc., etc., etc., and enjoy life, for you will do no such thing. "Live all the time." Think, that little one of yours, for whose "future" you anxiously and wearily toil, whose budding life you hardly know so much are you engrossed with the imaginary youth of the future. If you would learn the lesson of Ecclesiastes, you will put aside that opportunity of extra business, which would add so many more pounds to your reserve of your child's "future", and you will go and live with the little one for an hour or so; you will then enter into your portion, all the rest is simply vanity and vexation of spirit. Too late the parent wakes up to the fact that in thus slaving and saving he has really robbed his child and himself of their true inheritance. "Live all the time."

It is quite untrue to think that the conclusion of Ecclesiastes is wicked or sad. Having faced facts and realized what life is, we conjure up no illusions, and chase no mirages. "Live joyfully with the wife whom thou lovest" says Koheleth, not live morbidly, morosely, grudgingly. Entertain no false ideas of life, and then life can be a blessed thing. Life is a pilgrimage, a series of halts and moving on again. When we make up our minds to achieve anything for its own sake then we find that all is vanity and vexation of spirit. When we realize that nothing is a goal in itself, but merely a means to an end, we shall not call the time wasted that helped us on another stage of our pilgrimage, even though the moment we achieved some object, it ceases to attract or be of service. So immediately following upon the rejoicing with which Koheleth had engaged in the labours he had planned, we find dissatisfaction and vexation when viewed in themselves and for their own sakes.

> "Then I looked on all the works that my hands had wrought, and on the labour that I had laboured to do, and behold, all was vanity and vexation of spirit, and there was no profit under the sun" (Eccles. ii. 11).

The labour that ye may be "exercised" therewith is good. The resulting "work" which you produce may be very emptiness. If your heart is in the discipline, all is well, but if your heart is set on the result here in this life, then all is vanity. Even Alexander wept because there were no more worlds to conquer. Let us thank God for the portion He gives us, and remember that ever parallel Psalm lxxiii. Speaking of the seemingly prosperous wicked, Asaph says:--

> "I was envious at the foolish when I saw the prosperity of the wicked…….they have more than heart could wish…….they increase in riches."

Need Asaph have envied such? Ask him as he leaves the sanctuary of God:--

> "Surely Thou didst set their feet in slippery places…….Whom have I in heaven but Thee, and there is none upon earth I desire beside thee…….God is…….my PORTION for ever."

#10. A time for every purpose – both of God and man. (iii. 1-17).
pp. 152 - 155

The remaining verses of chapter ii. (12-26) are divided up into a series of quests and conclusions, arriving at length at the same result as we were outlining in our last paper when referring to ii. 10. While Koheleth quite appreciated the superiority of wisdom over folly, yet the maddening thing was that

> "One event happeneth to them all. And how dieth the wise man? as the fool. Therefore I hated life; because the work that is done under the sun is grievous unto me: for all is vanity and vexation of spirit" (ii. 14-17).

This must be the conclusion if we look for results in this life. Koheleth, however, has something better to tell us of wisdom later on; he says it is "good like an inheritance", and this does give true "profit". "Wisdom giveth life", that is, the life to come.

At the end of chapter iii. Koheleth again considers the "one event". Here, instead of looking at two classes of men, the wise and the fools, he sees all men comparable with beasts in respect to their end:--"One thing befalleth them: as the one dieth, so dieth the other…….all go unto one place……." (19, 20). He no longer hates life however, but perceives what is the true "portion", and is content (iii. 18-22). See also pages 113-116. Death, if viewed as the destroyer of all our works, must fill us with despair, and raise sceptic plaint as to the reason of things, but if death simply ends out term of schooling, then we may look forward to true accomplishment in the life to come and rejoice in the opportunities of this fleeting life while we may.

Another reason why Koheleth hated not only life but all his labour was that he would have to leave it to the man (who may prove the veriest fool) that should be after him. This made his heart despair. Here have I, he says in effect in ii. 21, laboured with wisdom, knowledge, and equity, yet now that my labour is accomplished I am faced with the spectre of human frailty. A few short years, and all my toil will pass to another—what then has been the good of all the planning, the labour, the care, the skill? Then he emerges into the sunlight of his previous conviction:--

> "There is nothing better for a man, than he should eat and drink, and that he should make his soul enjoy good in his labour. This also I saw, that it was from the hand of God. For who can eat, or who can enjoy, WITHOUT HIM?" (ii. 24, 25, Companion Bible).

Chapter iii. opens with the well-known list of times and seasons for every purpose under heaven. There is a real connection with the preceding argument, as the sequel indicates (see iii. 9-17).

> "To everything there is an appointed time (cf. Ezra x. 14; Neh. ii. 6; Dan. vi. 10) and a fitting time for every purpose under the heaven" (Eccles. iii. 1).

The word "purpose" here indicates something desired (see II Sam. xxiii. 5), or delighted in (Psa. i. 2), or pleasure (Eccles. v. 4; xii. 1). It is not the purpose of God that is under consideration, as we are still pursuing the great theme of the book. There is a time to be born, and a time to die, and between these two events the whole round of positive and negative purposes that constitute the daily round are filled in. Planting or plucking up, killing or healing, getting and losing, loving and hating. The twenty-eight items give the sum of human activity, and when it is all summed up, Koheleth says, "What profit?"

If the affairs of men, with their profitless labours, are nevertheless regulated by a fitting time, so also is the work of God; "He hath made everything beautiful in its own time" (iii. 11). What we must learn is that God's time is not man's time. Here is the time for man's purposes, but Koheleth says:--

> "I said in mine heart, God shall judge the righteous and the wicked; for there is a time THERE for every purpose and for every work" (iii. 17).

The olam, the inscrutable character and indefinite length of the age, is "set in the heart of man". The olam or age is the "time and season" for every purpose under heaven. God's purpose, however, goes back before the age, and runs on after it has ended. Man cannot "find out the work that God doeth from the beginning to the end" (iii. 11). "I know that whatsoever God doeth it shall be for the olam or age" (iii. 14). God's work goes on beyond the scope and sphere of man's work. "Nothing can be put to it nor anything taken from it" (iii. 14). How unlike man's work, which is spoiled by the "one event" that happeneth to all. Left to other hands and hearts to waste and spoil, soon to be cast into forgetfulness, its very memorial vanished, what a contrast with the work of God. Man slaves for the temporal, God works for the olam, the age. The word olam or age occurs seven times in Ecclesiastes, as follows:--

Olam.

A	|	i. 4. Generation pass, the earth abides.
B	|	i. 10. Nothing new under the sun.
C	|	ii. 16. No memorial.
D	|	iii. 11. Set in their heart of man, to prevent full understanding.
C	|	iii. 14, 15. The past foreshadows the future.
B	|	ix. 6. No portion under the sun.
A	|	xii. 5. The passing generation, the "long" home.

God works in the way He does "that men should fear before Him" (iii. 14). This is the conclusion of the whole matter:--

> "Fear God, and keep His commandments: for this is the whole duty of man. For God shall bring every work into judgment, with every secret thing, whether it be good or whether it be evil" (xii. 13, 14).

The complexities of this span of time, the inequalities, the time and chance which happen to all, the righteous suffering and the wicked prospering, all these and more make up the olam set in the heart of man. The relief that comes to the mind when one learns that a time is THERE when the crooked shall be made straight, when every work shall be brought into judgment, is beyond words. It enables one to obey the injunction, "Fret not thyself because of evildoers…….because of him that bringeth wicked devices to pass" (Psalm xxxvii.). God has a purpose and a work that transcends all our thought, "Wait patiently for Him". This wholesome scriptural fear is verily a safety-valve in the midst of the baffling problems of Providence, "He that feareth God shall come forth of them all" (vii. 18). "Though a sinner do evil an hundred times, and his days are prolonged" (so that Asaph-like we are tempted to say "I have cleansed my heart in vain: nevertheless what saith the scripture), "Yet surely I know that it shall be well with them that fear God" (viii. 12).

Let us return for a moment to chapter iii. Does it not seem strange at first sight for Koheleth to interpolate between his weighty references to the work of God with regard to the age such things as eating and drinking?

> "I know that there is no good in them, but for a man to rejoice, and to do good during his life. And also that every man should eat and drink, and enjoy the good of all his labour, it is the gift of God" (iii. 12, 13).

Verily it is the gift of God, this strange unearthly peace in the seething strife of this world. No longer like the caged eagle do we beat ourselves against the bars; we know, and in that knowledge of Him we realize that all is well. We can enjoy the "good" of our labour, and thank God for His gift. The endless circle of human experience, after all, is a faint echo of the mighty purpose of the ages.

> "That which hath been is now; and that which is to be hath already been: and God SEEKETH that which is past" (iii. 15).

How often is this glorious statement of the goal of the ages perverted into a sentence of threatening, "God requireth that which is past", meaning the sinner's past life.

> "That which IS TO BE, hath already been."

Revelation restores the lost paradise of Genesis. The new creation brings us back to the state of bliss which obtained before man or Satan fell. The whole work of redemption is to seek the lost and bring it back. "God SEEKETH the past." Israel's restoration is spoken of in the language of their past. "I will restore thy judges AS AT FIRST"

(Isa. i. 26). Before the age-times began God was all in all, when the ages shall have reached their consummation God will be all in all.

> "That which hath been is now."

Type and prophecy continually repeat the final truth. One antichrist there shall be, but there are also many antichrists. Even Scripture moves in the greatest of circles, and God Himself stretches out across the ages to bring a ruined world back to Himself. Such were the lessons which Koheleth learned as he contemplated the times and seasons of human activity. May we drink deeply into the spirit of this passage, and though exercised with the sore travail which God gives, be cheered with the joy of faith, which is also the gift of God.

#11. Adam; his relation to the theme (vi. 10).
pp. 179 - 184

The reader is expected to weigh and examine the many and varied investigations conducted by Koheleth. Just a passing note or so must suffice for the details of the next chapter or two.

Chapter iii. 18.—The marginal rendering of the A.V. and the text of the R.V., together with the suggested version of the Companion Bible, show that some difficulty has been experienced in arriving at the true meaning of this verse. The most difficult word to place is that translated "manifest". One of its most frequent meanings is "to purify". Parkhurst places this as the primary meaning.

> "The commandment of the Lord is pure" (Psa. xix. 8).
> "To cleanse as is wheat from chaff" (Jer. iv. 11, xxiii. 28).
> "To purify", as by suffering and trial (Dan. xii. 10).
> "Fuller's sope" (Mal. iii. 2).

Isa. i. 25 has been rendered, "I will melt down as with alkaline salt thy dross, and I will remove all thy base metal". We suggest that the meaning of Eccles. iii. 18 is somewhat as follows:--

> "I said in mine heart concerning the estate of the sons of men, that God might purify, winnow, cleanse as by trial them, and that they might see that, apart from resurrection, the one event levels all to that of the beasts that perish."

Koheleth evidently did not believe the philosophic conceit so universally believed to-day that man possesses an immortal soul; he left that for these more enlightened days. Though wisdom excel folly, the wise man dieth "AS THE FOOL". Though man bear the image of God, he dieth "AS THE BEAST'. Psa. xlix. bears unequivocal testimony to the truth of Eccles. iii. 18, 21. This is indeed the final thought expressed by Koheleth at the close of his investigations:--

"Then shall the dust return to the earth as it was, and the spirit shall return to God Who gave it. Vanity of vanities saith the preacher, all is vanity."

Death is the final expression of vanity, and that which is associated with it the aggravating factors.

Oppression (iv. 1), all travail and rightness of work (4), the heaping up of riches for whom? (8), pass under review, punctuated at every step by a reflection on that which is good, or that there is nothing better than to accept quietly the limitations of our present position, fret not ourselves because of evil doers, but wait patiently for Him. Chapter v. brings us to the sanctuary, and bids us keep our foot, be not rash with our mouth, "For God is in heaven, and thou upon earth; therefore let thy words be few". From this standpoint, as with Asaph (Psa. lxxiii.), the writer can view many distressing prospects with calmness and hope.

"If thou seest the oppression of the poor, and violent perverting of judgment and justice in a province"—play the man, act the citizen, champion the right, raise rebellion, overthrow the tyrant, assert the claims of humanity—so speaks the man of this world, and even the believer who imbibes its wisdom and traditions; such however is vain, the crooked cannot be put straight by such means, "Marvel not at the matter, for He that is higher than the highest regardeth". What we have to do is to regard our foot when we go to the house of God (v. 1), regard His commandments (xii. 13), and to remember that "He that regardeth Israel shall neither slumber nor sleep" (Psa. cxxi. 3, 4), "And there be higher than they", concludes Koheleth. This thought is carried over to vi. 10, where we appear to have reached the heart of the whole book.

Chapter vii., as we have previously pointed out, echoes most of the expressions of chapter ii., iii., and iv., and is in the second half of the book, when question begins to give place to answer. Right there, at the junction of the two parts of the book, is placed the solution of the enigma, viz.:--

> "What is he who hath been?
> Long ago his name was given
> And it is perceived what (that name indicates)
> It was ADAM; neither may he judge Him that is mightier than he."

The vanity of this life, all the strange and perplexing dealings of Providence are all traceable back to the nature and fall of man. The NATURE of man as much as the FALL of man.

> "The first man Adam was made a living soul; the last Adam a life-giving spirit. Howbeit that was not first which is spiritual, but that which is natural; and afterward that which is spiritual. The first man is of the earth, earthy: the second man is the Lord from heaven" (I Cor. xv. 45-47).

The answer to this set of difficulties is the answer to Ecclesiastes' problem, the resurrection of the dead. "It is sown in corruption, it is raised in incorruption." Sown, not as some think when a person is buried, but when he is born into the world. For no one sows dead seed. The contrast is between the two Adams.

> "As in Adam all die (wise as well as fools), so in Christ shall all be made alive (wise as well as fools)" (I Cor. xv. 22).

When once resurrection is believed and seen as the goal of God and the entrance into true life, then we reverse the statement of the vanity of all labour, "forasmuch as ye know that your labour is not in vain in the Lord".

> "For I reckon that the sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory which shall be revealed in us. For the earnest expectation of the creature waiteth for the manifestation of the sons of God. For the creature was made subject to vanity, not willingly, but by reason of Him who hath subjected the same; in hope, because the creature itself also shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God. For we know (as Ecclesiastes perceived) that the whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain together until now" (Rom. viii. 18-22).
> "By one man sin entered into the world and death by sin…….When I would do good evil is present with me. O wretched man that I am! Who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" (Rom. v., vi., vii.).

These and such like passages echo and illuminate the discovery of Eccles. vi. 10. The one great pitfall into which most of us fall is revealed in the last sentence of vi. 10. Man, whose name is red earth or mould, "the thing formed by the potter", let him beware of saying, "Why hast thou made me thus?" We must avoid "judging" the One that is mightier than we are. The book of Job reveals something of this:--

> "But how can mortal man be just with God?
> If man contend in argument with Him,
> Of thousand things he could not answer one
> However wise of heart and stout of limb

Who ever braved Him, and prospered?
* * * * * *
How then can I (address or) answer Him?
Or choose my words (for argument) with Him?
I could not be induced to make reply
Though just: but I would supplicate my Judge
* * * * * *
If I appeal to strength; Lo! He is strong,
And if to justice; who could summon Him?"
(Job ix. - Metrical Version of Companion Bible).

The paranomasia of the two words contend and content may help us to see the Divine lesson. To fight against the divinely appointed hiding of God's work "from the beginning unto the end" leads to contending or judging God. Judging need not mean condemning, it may mean justifying—God requires us to do neither. We are as wrong when we labour to justify His ways with man, as we are when we rebel against His appointments. Better, far better, to obey Him, walk humbly with Him, wait patiently for Him, and trust Him. Who are we to express our conviction that "If God were to do so and so then He would be…….!" Is this asked of us? Have we still failed to learn the humiliating estate of the sons of Adam? Not till resurrection dawns shall we begin "to know even as we are known".

Elihu speaks in harmony with this, when he said to Job:--

"But surely, thou hast spoken in mine ears,
And I have heard a voice of words like these:
'A man without transgression, pure am I:
Yea, I am clean, without iniquity.
He is against me, seeking grounds of strife,
That He may count me as His enemy,
My feet He setteth fast within the stocks,
And taketh observation of my ways.'
Behold, thou art not just: I answer thee:
HOW GREAT IS GOD COMPARED WITH MORTAL MAN?
Why then 'gainst Him didst thou dare make complaint,
That by no word of His He answ'reth thee?"
(Job xxxiii. 8-13. - Metrical Version of Companion Bible).

Job, afflicted by a discipline the causes of which were hidden from his eyes, contends with God, and when the Lord does speak to him, He says to Job:--

"Shall he that contendeth with the Almighty instruct Him? he that reproveth God, let him answer it" (Job xl. 2).

What a title for Job, "He that REPROVETH God"! His only answer is, "Behold I am vile".

"Then answered Job, and to Jehovah said:--
I know, I know, that Thou canst all things do [Thou askedst] (xxxviii. 3; xl. 2).
'Who is this that counsel hides,
And darkens all because of knowledge void'?
''tis I! I uttered things I could not know';

Things far too wonderful, beyond my ken.
    Hear now I pray thee: let me speak this once.
[Thou sadist (xl. 2)]:--
    ''tis I who ask thee: Answer me.'
I heard Thee with the hearing of the ear,
    But now mine eye hath seen Thee, I abhor [Myself]. In dust and ashes I repent."
        (Job xliii. 1-6. - Metrical Version of Companion Bible).

A modern example of this skeptical criticism, the product of failure to discern the plan of the ages, is that of T. Hardy:--

"I have finished another year" said God,
    "In grey, green, white and brown;
I have strewn the leaf upon the sod,
    Sealed up the work within the clod,
And let the last sun down."
    "AND WHAT'S THE GOOD OF IT?" I said.

While the age is set in the heart of man, and he is prevented from knowing what God doeth from the beginning unto the end, he only hears with the ear; he knows in part. To jump to conclusions, to construct theories, to attempt to pass the limits of revelation, is to be made ashamed of our words when we "see Him". Far better to heed the teaching of Koheleth, and fill our humble sphere with contentment. Does not the apostle, when writing to the Thessalonians, take the same line? They had been shaken in mind concerning the Day of the Lord. Paul instructs them concerning such deep things as the manifestation of the Man of Sin, but does not leave them until, like Koheleth, he comes down to everyday life, and says:--

"We command and exhort by our Lord Jesus Christ, that with QUIETNESS they WORK, and EAT their own bread" (II Thess. iii. 12).

What difference is there between these words and those of Ecclesiastes?

It is because of the conclusion arrived at in vi. 10, that Koheleth could view the crooked things, and the oppressions, without being "astonished at the purpose".

"Lord, my heart is not haughty, nor mine eyes lofty:
Neither do I exercise myself in great matters,
Or in things too high for me.
Surely I have behaved and silenced myself,
As a child that is weaned of his mother:
My soul is even as a weaned child.
Let Israel hope in the Lord,
From henceforth and for ever" (Psa. cxxxi.).

Fundamentals of Dispensational Truth.

#31. The Child of Promise.
pp. 5 - 9

As early as the time recorded in Gen. xv. Abraham learned that God would give him a son, and that his heir should not be "this Eliezer of Damascus". When the Lord bade him look toward heaven and consider the multitude of the stars, saying "so shall thy seed be", Abraham believed. Chapter xvi. however opens with the words:--

> "Now Sarai, Abram's wife, bare him no children; and she had a handmaid, an Egyptian, whose name was Hagar."

This maid was given to Abram by his wife in accordance with the law of the time (recorded in Code of Khammurabi), and the birth of Ishmael was the result. Abram was eighty-six years of age when Ishmael was born. Thirteen more years passed and then came the word, "I am the Almighty God, walk before Me, and be thou perfect". God then renews the covenant with Abram, "thou shalt be a father of many nations", and changes his name from Abram to Abraham, "father of a great multitude". Then comes circumcision, the sign and the seal of the righteousness of faith (Rom. iv.). God can now reveal the next step to Abraham:--

> "As for Sarai thy wife, thou shalt not call her name Sarai, but Sarah (Princess) shall her name be, and I will bless her, and give thee a son also of her: Yea, I will bless her, and she shall become nations; Kings of people shall be of her. Then Abraham fell upon his face and LAUGHED."

When Sarai overheard the words of the angel,

> "I will certainly return unto thee according to the time of life and lo, Sarah thy wife shall have a son" (xviii. 10).

we read, "therefore Sarah LAUGHED". Both Abraham and Sarah laughed—the one in the joy of faith, the other in the derision of unbelief. Responding to the laugh of faith, the Lord continued to Abraham,

> "Sarah thy wife shall bear thee a son indeed, and thou shalt call his name LAUGHTER (Isaac)."

In reply to the laugh of unbelief come the words:--

> "Is anything too hard for the Lord? At the appointed time I will return unto thee according to the time of life, and Sarah shall have a son."

Three important dispensational principles are disclosed to us by this passage:--

1. The nature of PROMISE.
2. The factor of TIME.
3. The fact of RESURRECTION.

The nature of Promise.

One of Abraham's titles is, "he that had the promises" (Heb. vii. 6, xi. 17). The land of Canaan in which Abraham sojourned is also called "the land of promise" (Heb. xi. 9). Isaac and Jacob who dwelt with him there are said to be "heirs with him of the same promise". Both the epistle to the Galatians and that to the Romans lay great emphasis upon the nature of God's promise. Let us notice what is attached to the promise:--

> "That we might receive the promise through…….FAITH" (Gal. iii. 14).
> "The covenant, that was confirmed before of God in Christ, the LAW, which was four hundred and thirty years after, cannot disannul, that it should make the promise of none effect, for if the inheritance be of the law, it is no more of promise" (Gal. iii. 17, 18).

Here the nature of the promise is shewn by its relation to law and faith. Turning to Rom. iv. we shall increase our understanding of the nature of the promise, and also learn more fully the strength of Abraham's faith. The first reference echoes Gal. iii.:--

> "For the promise, that he should be heir of the world, was not to Abraham, or to his seed, through the LAW, but through the righteousness of FAITH, for if they which are of the law be heirs, faith is made void, and the promise made of none effect…….therefore it is of FAITH that it might be by GRACE, to the end the promise might be SURE to all the seed" (Rom. iv. 13, 14).

Notice the teaching; it is by faith, by grace, that it might be SURE. Abraham and Sarah believed the promise (faith), but they endeavoured to help God (flesh), and the birth of Ishmael was the result. God will make the promise sure without the intrusion of the flesh, for the very intrusion of the flesh robs the word promise of its meaning.

The factor of Time.

Attached to every promise of God is an appointed time either stated or implied. Not only is this necessitated by the outworking of a plan, but it also is used to exercise and encourage simple faith. Ecclesiastes has noted, "There is a time to every purpose under heaven". The answer to the tried faith of Habakkuk was, "the vision is yet for an appointed time…….though it tarry, wait for it". So the promise to Abraham was timed. To the flesh the long years that passed after the normal age of parenthood had been reached were a hard trial of faith. It was not until Abraham was "about an hundred years old" that the promise was fulfilled; yet there was no tarrying on the part of God. "At the time of life", "at the set time", "at the time appointed", Isaac is born, and Ishmael is seen to be the symbol of law, bondage, and unbelief.

> "It is written that Abraham had two sons, the one by a bondmaid, the other by a free woman, but he that was born of the bondwoman was born after the flesh, but he of the freewoman was by promise" (Gal. iv. 22-31).
> "They are not all Israel, which are of Israel; neither because they are the seed of Abraham are they all children, but IN ISAAC shall thy seed be called, that is, They which are the children of the flesh, these are not the children of God, but the children of the promise are counted for the seed" (Rom. ix. 6-8).

In Gen. xxi. we read the simple yet sublime account of the fulfillment of God's promise:--

> "And the Lord visited Sarah as He had said, and the Lord did unto Sarah as He had spoken. For Sarah conceived and bare Abraham a son in his old age, at the set time of which God had spoken to him…….and Sarah said, God hath made me to laugh, so that all that hear will laugh with me."

Here Sarah's laugh is the laugh of faith. She is however forcibly reminded of her laugh of unbelief, for the context once more uses the word (this time translated "mock"), "and Sarah saw the son of Hagar the Egyptian, which she had borne unto Abraham, laughing (mocking)."

Not only is the promise of God entirely removed from the sphere of law and flesh, the accident of time and the impatience of unbelief, but its essential characteristic and crown is that it triumphs over DEATH.

The fact of Resurrection.

Rom. iv. displays the essential facts of resurrection both as regards Abraham's personal faith, the title of God, and the essential element in justifying faith. Abraham's personal faith. Which was easier to believe, that God in some far-off day would raise His own Son from the dead, or to believe that there and then, Abraham and Sarah "as good as dead" should be quickened into life? Abraham's faith is thus described:--

> "Who against hope (humanly speaking), in hope believed, that he might become the father of many nations, according to that which was spoken, so shall thy seed be, and without growing weak in faith, he considered his own body now dead, when he was about an hundred years old, and the deadness of Sarah's womb, he did not use doubtful disputation in unbelief (cf. Rom. xiv. 1) against the promise of God, but was strong in the faith, giving glory to God, and being fully persuaded that what He had promised, He was able also to perform, and therefore it was imputed for righteousness" (18-22).

This factor of resurrection re-appears in connection with Abraham's faith in Heb. xi. 17-19:--

> "By faith Abraham, when he was tried, offered up Isaac, and he that had received the promises offered up his only begotten son, of whom it was said, that in Isaac shall thy seed be called, accounting that God was able to raise him up even from the dead; from whence also he received him in a figure."

The one title of God that is given in this passage (Rom. iv.) is "God Who quickeneth the dead, and calleth those things which be not as though they were". Abraham's trust was not in a blind impersonal Providence, not in the Almighty whose name is uttered by the despairing, and forgotten when the storm is passed, but the God of resurrection. This title of God before all others is the one which all believers to-day must recognize. Only as such can He be our Father; only as such can He be the God of hope, of peace, of all comfort, of patience, of glory. None of the glorious promises enshrined in the Divine titles can ever be realized or enjoyed apart from the resurrection. The Old Testament saints were taught this; the land of promise was theirs in resurrection: "they all died in faith not having received the promise". The throne of David cannot be occupied apart from resurrection: "Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee" are the words of the decree (see Psa. ii.).

The Church has no status or blessing apart from resurrection; chapter and verse can hardly be given, as this thought underlies the whole of the apostle Paul's ministry, both before and after Acts xxviii.

The Essential Element in Justifying Faith.

> "Now it was not written for his sake alone that it was imputed to him: but for us also, to whom it shall be imputed, if we believe on Him that raised up Jesus our Lord from the dead; who was delivered for our offences, and was raised again because of our justification."
> "If thou shalt confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus, and shalt believe in thine heart that God hath raised Him from the dead, thou shalt be saved" (Rom. x. 9).

Let us learn this important teaching concerning the promises of God, for it underlies all His purposes of grace and glory. The close association between Isaac and Christ (Gal. iii. 16; Rom. ix. 7), the references to the offering of the only begotten Son (Heb. xi. 17; John iii. 16) reveal that in some mystical way God Himself moves along these lines as well as His people. He also awaits the hour appointed. He must eliminate all human merit. He too works only in the sphere of resurrection life.

> "For how many soever the promises of God, in Him is the yea; wherefore also through Him is the Amen to the glory of God through us" (II Cor. i. 20).

#32. The Perfecting of Faith (Gen. xxii.).
pp. 36 - 39

We now approach the supreme trial of Abraham' life. Laughter in the shape of Isaac had entered into his home and heart, and the promises were all centred in that little life now growing up. Abraham's old age had been illuminated by the gift of God. Then came the test and the triumph. "Walk before Me and be thou perfect", God had said some twenty-five years previously. The first act which followed that command was the rite of circumcision.

The act which we now contemplate is not the rite of circumcision, but the reality. Phil. iii. defines true circumcision. It is threefold:--

(1). Worship God in Spirit.
(2). Rejoice in Christ Jesus.
(3). Have no confidence in the flesh.

Surely if the flesh ever made an appeal it did in Gen. xxii. God said to Abraham:--

> "Take now thy son, thine only son Isaac, whom thou lovest, and get thee into the land of Moriah; and offer him there for a burnt offering upon one of the mountains that I will tell thee of."

There is much meaning in the response of Abraham:--

> "And Abraham arose up early in the morning, and saddled his ass, and took two of his young men with him, and Isaac his son, and clave the wood for the burnt offering, and rose up and went unto the place of which God had told him."

Here was no conference with flesh and blood. Had Abraham consulted Sarah surely she would have anticipated Zipporah's reproach, telling Abraham that he was a bloody husband, and have withstood his purpose, and probably have prevailed. Had Eliezer been consulted, he too might have urged such strong reasons against the deed, that Abraham would have compromised. There were times in Abraham's life when he stooped to lies and to the appeal of the flesh, but it was not so now. He had reached the end of his calling and his faith, and so can tell no one, ask no one, but just obey his God.

When God first appeared unto Abraham in Ur of the Chaldees, there was the element of uncertainty in regard to his destination, "he went out not knowing whither he went". This is repeated in Gen. xxii. Abraham did not know the exact place of the mighty transaction, but went out awaiting direction as the time arrived. This is always the character of faith, it is the opposite of sight. The simple words of Abraham to his young men, when read in the light of Heb. xi., reveal a triumphant faith:--

> "I and the lad will go yonder and worship, and WE WILL COME AGAIN to you."
> "By faith Abraham, when he was tried, offered up Isaac, and he that had received the promise offered up his only begotten son, of whom it was said, that in Isaac shall thy seed be called, accounting that God was able to raise him up, even from the dead, from whence also he received him in a figure" (Heb. xi. 17-19).

A most important lesson, perhaps we should say the most important lesson for us here, lies in the word "account". It occurs once in Hebrews, but eleven times in Rom. iv. In Rom. iv. Abraham believes the God of resurrection, and his faith is imputed, accounted for righteousness. The important thing to observe is that Abraham is passive as far as the imputing is concerned. Abraham believes, "is persuaded", "staggers not", "gives glory to God", but he imputes nothing. "Abraham believed God and it was counted unto him for righteousness": "his faith is counted for righteousness"; cf. "the man unto whom God imputeth righteousness without works". This is the way in which the word is continually used. At the beginning Abraham, as we said, imputed nothing, but when faith is perfected his passive attitude is replaced by activity. What God can do in view of the resurrection of Christ, Abraham can in his measure do. So it is that the father can contemplate the slaying of his beloved son, "accounting that God was able to raise him up". Rom. vi. is a step forward from Rom. iv., and there the active side is presented:--

> "For in that He died, He died unto sin once, but in that He liveth, he liveth unto God; likewise reckon (account) ye also yourselves to be dead indeed unto sin, but alive unto God through Jesus Christ our Lord" (Rom. vi. 10, 11).

We find the active again in Rom. viii. 18, "for I reckon", where resurrection glory is in view. We find the explanation of this advance in the epistle of James. He too speaks of the great trial of Abraham's faith, and, as in Hebrews, it is connected with the idea of "going on unto perfection". In this connection temptation is prominent:--

> "My brethren, count it all joy when ye fall into divers temptations, knowing this, that the trying of your faith worketh patience, but let patience have her perfect work, that ye may be perfect and entire, lacking nothing." "Blessed is the man that endureth temptation, for when he is tried he shall receive the crown of life" (James i. 2-4, 12).

In chapter ii. 14, 21 James asks a straight question:--

> "What doth it profit, my brethren, though a man say he hath faith, and have not works? Can that faith save him? Was not Abraham our father justified by works, when he had offered Isaac his son upon the altar?"

There is no confusion or contradiction of Rom. iv. Here, Abraham was justified by FAITH in Gen. xv. when he believed God's promise regarding the seed. Abraham was justified by WORKS in Gen. xxii. when, still believing God's promise, he offered Isaac, accounting that the God who gave him in figure from death ("one as good as dead"), could raise him again from the dead. It all resolves itself into a matter of personal, experimental, individual, faith. It was comparatively easy for Abraham to believe in the impersonal doctrine, the idea of resurrection. It was also comparatively simple to believe that God some thousand or so years hence would raise His own Son from the dead. It was quite another matter to build the altar, take the knife and prepare to slay his own flesh and blood, and believe that there and then (not some thousand years or so hence) God would raise his (Abraham's) son from the dead. This is where faith is perfect.

> "Seest thou how faith wrought with his works, and by works was faith made perfect? and the Scripture was FULFILLED, which saith, Abraham believed God, and it was imputed unto him for righteousness and he was called the Friend of God" (James ii. 22, 23).

This chapter (Gen. xxii.) is quoted in another context in Hebrews, to which we must turn:--

> "And we desire that every one of you do show the same diligence to the full assurance of hope to the end; that ye be not slothful, but followers of them who through faith and patience inherit the promises, for when God made promise to Abraham, because He could swear by no greater, He sware by Himself, saying, Surely blessing I will bless thee, and multiplying I will multiply thee, and so, after he had patiently endured, he obtained the promise" (Heb. vi. 11-15).

The chapter opens with the words, "Therefore…….let us go on unto perfection", and Abraham is cited as an example. Notice too this fact. James says that Gen. xv. was fulfilled in Gen. xxii. Heb. vi. says that the promise, made and believed earlier, was obtained in Gen. xxii. In Heb. xi. 33 we meet the expression again, "who through faith subdued kingdoms, wrought righteousness, obtained promises".

There are some who look upon this subject with suspicion, or at any rate treat it as something like a pet theme of the editor. We would ask such to consider our claim that this doctrine is a "Fundamental", in view of the words of James ii., "Faith without works is DEAD". While Gen. xv. reveals the justification of Abraham, Gen. xxii. shows its fulfillment. While Gen. xii.-xvii. contains the promises, in Gen. xxii. Abraham obtains them. We misunderstand the gift of life if we assume that because it is a gift, and a gift of grace and not of works, no activity on our part is called for. Scripture speaks otherwise, "Arise, shine; for thy light is come", "Awake thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead". We have been redeemed from all iniquity, "that we might be a peculiar people, zealous of GOOD WORKS". Let no creed, or remnant of a creed, cramp our minds and hearts. The teaching of Scripture is our creed, formulated or otherwise, for we all tend to turn the liquid metal into moulds of our own fashioning.

We have not dwelt in this article upon the wondrous theme of the great Sacrifice on Calvary, so vividly presented in this remarkable chapter. This is not because such has no place in our heart or teaching, but because that aspect is so evident to all, and so widely recognized. We would nevertheless not let the opportunity pass without using it, if only briefly.

Redemption by the blood of Christ, true atonement by His death, and full acceptance in His merits, are the first words of gospel preaching, and the first note of apocalyptic song. The religion of the age repudiates the necessity for the blood of Christ. Jude's picture of the closing days is of men "denying the Lord that bought them". We cannot read seven verses into the epistles of the Mystery without hearing that we are redeemed by the blood of Christ (Eph. i. 7). God has offered His only Son whom He loved, He spared not His only begotten Son. That Son of God loved me and gave Himself for me. Let us listen afresh to the word:--

> "Ye are not your own, ye are bought with a price, therefore glorify God in your body" (I Cor. vi. 19, 20).

#33. Jacob.—The Flesh and the Promise (Gen. xxv. - xxviii.).
pp. 67 - 71

We have seen Abraham's initial response to the call of God in his going out "not knowing whither he went", and we have seen his last trial of faith in his journeying to one of the mountains of which God would tell him. While there is much of interest and instruction in the closing days of this man of faith, we feel it time to pass on to another figure who plays a part in the development of the purpose of the ages.

The marriage of Isaac with Rebecca (xxiv.) kept the seed of promise within prescribed limits, also affording in the case of the eldest servant (who may have been Eliezer of Damascus) an example of faithful service and Divine leading, "I being in the way, the Lord led me". The words of xxv. 5 ("and Abraham gave all that he had unto Isaac") suggest as the heir of all things—Christ. Jacob the son of Isaac holds a place more prominent than his father in the typical outworking of the purpose, partly by reason of the intensely human side of his career. Jacob's history begins before his birth. The N.T. commentary upon Gen. xxv. 22-26 is found in Rom. ix. 10-13:--

> "When Rebecca also had conceived by one, even by our father Isaac; for the children being not yet born, neither having done any good or evil, that the purpose of God according to election might stand, not of works but of Him that calleth; it was said unto her, the elder shall serve the younger, as it is written, Jacob have I loved, but Esau have I hated."

The purpose according to election is a key to Israel's position and privilege. The purpose ensured a remnant in the days of deepest apostasy. When Elijah felt he alone was left, the answer of God to him was, "I have reserved unto myself seven thousand men, who have not bowed his knee to the image of Baal."; so verse 5 continues, "at the present time also there is a remnant according to the election of grace". Thus we have Israel blinded with the exception of a remnant.

Let not a cold Calvinism, however, intrude its rough-shod logic here. It is a simple thing to divided the world into two classes, the elect who are saved, and the reprobate who are as most certainly damned. The teaching of Scripture, however, is not so. Chapter xi. continues, and looking onward into the days to come speaks of a time of Israel's fullness, and of receiving them back again; of regrafting the broken branches in. The remnant according to an ELECTION OF GRACE far from excluding the rest pledges their restoration, for the figure used by the apostle in this connection is "the firstfruits" (verse 16). The firstfruit presupposes a harvest to come, and the election of grace presupposes the words of 26-29, "and so ALL Israel shall be saved…….for the gifts and calling of God are without repentance".

The opening words of chapter ix. balance the closing verse of chapter xi. In both sections come the words, "all Israel"; in chapter ix. we read:--

> "They are NOT ALL ISRAEL that are Israel, neither because they are the seed of Abraham are they all children, but in Isaac shall thy seed be called…….the children of the promise are counted for the seed."

Some who were the children of Abraham by physical descent were nevertheless children of the devil according to the Lord's own testimony (John viii. 33-44). The nation of Israel, as a nation, was so according to election. Whether that national election is co-extensive with the salvation of Rom. xi. 26 is a point which we are not called upon to settle.

In Gen. xxv. we have the election of the nation, "two nations are in thy womb", "the one people shall be stronger than the other people". When God made the promise of a seed to Abraham, the flesh spoilt the answer of faith by introducing Hagar, in a weak attempt to help God fulfil His word. When God so definitely said, "the elder SHALL serve the younger", it should have been sufficient. The firstborn according to election must stand. Yet what do we find? The flesh practicing deception upon Isaac in the matter of the blessing of the firstborn.

In connection with Jacob's birth is recorded the incident that gave him his name—"the heel-catcher" or "circumventor". This strange incident must have some meaning, for not only is it recorded in Gen. xxv., but it appears in the prophecy of Hosea in rather a strange manner (which receives consideration in another article). The incident which follows the record of their birth is evidently in continuation of this theme. Here we find Esau and Jacob as grown men. Esau is spoken of in Heb. xii. as "a profane person who sold his birthright", so we need waste no unspiritual sentiment upon one whose true character is revealed by that Word of God which discerns between soul and spirit. Neither can we commend Jacob's action. It was, to say the least, unbrotherly. Yet, if we look below the surface, we shall at least find this, that however wrong he may have been in method, he certainly did not despise the promise of God, but stooped to a mean level to endeavour to bring about its fulfillment.

An opportunity occasioned by his brother's extreme need presents itself, and Jacob seizes it—"Sell me this day thy birthright". The next step in this despicable attempt of the flesh to help God to fulfil His promise is recorded in Gen. xxvii. There, acting under the direction of his mother, Jacob disguises himself as Esau, and filches the blessing of Esau. Even Jacob finds his conscience too difficult to ignore when Isaac said, "how is it thou hast found it (the venison) so quickly my son?" for he replies, "Because the Lord THY God (not MY God) brought it to me". The blessing which Jacob lied and deceived to obtain, however, was not to be received by him in that manner. Even though Isaac does bless him with "dew of heaven and fatness of the earth, and plenty of corn and wine", that blessing can hardly be said to epitomize the life history of Jacob, even upon his own testimony (xlvii. 9). Isaac certainly said of Jacob, even after he realized the deceit which had been practiced upon him, "yea, and he shall be blessed"; but it does not follow that by some decree of fate God was at all bound to fulfil any such thing, otherwise there would be a premium on the methods of Jacob.

We will here pursue the story of Jacob, and return to that of Esau later. Rebecca's scheme for her favourite son now begins to bear fruit. She who stooped to deceive is now to be the one who of her own accord advises the departure of Jacob on that journey from which she would not live to welcome him back. Esau's vow of vengeance was known to her, so she planned to deliver Jacob for a time, and send him far off to her brother Laban. What must the feelings of this frail fleshly pair have been, when Isaac, unconstrained, freely, and "by faith" (Heb. xi. 24) gave Jacob the coveted blessing, viz.:--

> "And EL SHADDAI bless thee and make thee fruitful, and multiply thee, that thou mayest be a called-out assembly (Hebrew equivalent for ekklesia or church) of peoples: and gave THE BLESSING OF ABRAHAM to thee, and to thy seed with thee, that thou mayest inherit the land wherein thou art a stranger, which God gave to Abraham" (Gen. xxviii. 3, 4).

Here we do not read of corn and wine, but of that which Rebecca and Jacob had schemed and lied for in vain. The blessing of Abraham did not of necessity belong to the firstborn by nature, nor could it be attained by the sharp practice with which the birthright was secured, or the low deception which filched the blessing. The promise of God which runs along the line of an election of grace takes no notice of either good or evil. God's government however does, and though Jacob cannot but receive the blessing of Abraham, as the elect link in the chain of purpose, Jacob must nevertheless suffer the consequences of his deception, and the devoted mother must part from her son upon the morrow of his triumph. David experienced this same dual treatment too; the covenant remained unaltered, but war never left his house after his great sin. This is the first great crisis in Jacob's history. Here starts the long discipline which culminates in the change of his name.

We pause here to consider the folly of all, whoever they may be, who dare attempt by any means of the flesh even co-operation with the God of electing grace. Such attempt carries with it nothing but defeat and sorrow. Abraham never forfeited his place in the purpose of God, yet what a deed was that that gave him Ishmael for a son! Jacob never forfeited his elect position, yet his deceptions led him straight away to banishment, servitude, and to be deceived in his turn, first by Laban, Rebecca's brother, and then by his own sons, in the matter of Joseph.

Whatever our calling may be, and whatever the peculiarities of the dispensation under which we walk, God's attitude both to His gifts and callings, and also to truth and righteousness, remain the same. It is not written in Genesis alone, or even in Galatians with its "justified by faith without law", but throughout Scripture that "whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap".

#34. Jacob and the God of Bethel (Gen. xxviii. - xxxi.).
pp. 104 - 107

There is a statement, several times repeated, that Laban was "Rebekah's brother". If Rebekah can deceive for her son's gain, possibly her brother can deceive for his own, and such at any rate is the fact.

> "And Jacob went out from Beer-sheba (the well of the oath) and went toward Haran" (the frontier town of the Babylonian Empire) (Gen. xxviii. 10).

Somewhere between these two suggestive places Jacob is overtaken by the night. A stone formed his pillow and in that place Jacob met with God. There God speaks with him. No word of censure for his sins, no word of bitter disillusion, indicating that the blessing of Abraham could never be for such as he, but a blessed confirmation of the purpose according to election, which we learn from Romans is an election of GRACE. Above the ladder which Jacob saw, the top of which reached heaven (or as some read "beside him,") stood the Lord, who said:--

> "I am the Lord God of Abraham thy father, and the God of Isaac: the land whereon thou liest, to thee will I give it, and to thy seed. And thy seed shall be as the dust of the earth, and thou shalt spread abroad to the west, and to the east, and to the north, and to the south, and in thy seed shall all the families of the earth be blessed, and behold, I am with thee, and will keep thee in all places whither thou goest, and will bring thee again into this land: for I will not leave thee, until I have done that which I have spoken to thee of" (Gen. xxviii. 13-15).

When Jacob awoke, he said, "surely the Lord is in this place, and I knew it not", and he was afraid and said, "how dreadful is this place! this is none other but the house of God, and this is the gate of heaven". These words sound sincere; were they? Some commentators reckon that the bargaining cheating spirit of Jacob is manifest in the vow that follows; we however believe that here we have, in the opening chapter of this pilgrimage, the dawn of a new life, not by any means perfected, for he has much to learn of the weakness and failure of the flesh, before he shall halt upon his thigh, a cripple of grace. Some say, hark at his bargainings, with his ifs. "If God will be with me…….then shall the Lord be my God." In the first place a true translation transposes the "then" of verse 21, and the "and" of verse 22, making the verses read thus:--

> "If God will be with me, and will keep me in this way that I go, and will give me bread to eat, and raiment to put on, so that I come again to my father's home in peace, and the Lord be my God, THEN, this stone, which I have set up for a pillar, shall be God's house: and of all that Thou shalt give me I will surely give the tenth unto Thee."

Here is no bargaining spirit. Jacob, overwhelmed with grace, can only say, if this be so it demands of me nothing less than the devotion I now offer. The tenth or the tithe became a Divine institution, and appears to have been accepted of Jacob. The one whose stolen blessing included PLENTY of corn and wine is grateful to acknowledge "bread to eat". Here is Jacob's first meeting with God, and here is seen the effect of grace. Any one less than God would have felt it becoming and right, nay righteous, yea a moral necessity, to have prefaced the blessing with reminders, with censure, with warning, with upbraiding. Blessed be God! He knows best. Here, Jacob is more deeply moved by unsullied grace than ever he would have been by perfect law. Censure, rebuke, warning, would have called forth the depths of Jacob's duplicity; unmitigated grace finds its echo in unsophisticated gratitude. Surely a fundamental here, not only of dispensational truth, but of private conduct too, especially in the dispensation of the grace of God.

The first act of Jacob was symbolical of supplanting and gave him his name Jacob (Gen. xxv. 26). His next recorded act shows him cheating his brother of his birthright and blessing, then comes the crime and the commencement of his pilgrimage. Here, possibly for the first time, Jacob comes into personal touch with God, and that God of his father becomes his God. His next recorded act is not one of selfishness, but of chivalry:--

> "And it came to pass that when Jacob saw Rachel, the daughter of Laban, his mother's brother, and the sheep of Laban, his mother's brother, that Jacob went near and rolled the stone from the well's mouth, and watered the flock of Laban his mother's brother, and Jacob kissed Rachel, and lifted up his voice and wept" (Gen. xxix. 10, 11).

The repeated reference to his mother's brother seems to indicate Jacob's affection for his mother, and also carries an intimation that possibly Laban will have some of the cunning of his sister in his character, which forebodes trouble for Jacob. However, at the beginning Jacob is received with warm welcome, and with a kinsman's affection. The last sentence of verse 13 suggests much, "and he told Laban all these things". How much did Jacob tell his "mother's brother"? Whatever it was, Laban said to him, "surely thou art my bone and my flesh, and he abode with him the space of a month". At the end of this time Laban suggests that Jacob should be paid for his services, and asks Jacob to name his wage:--

> "And Jacob loved Rachel, and said, I will serve thee seven years for Rachel thy younger daughter" (Gen. xxix. 18).

Now commences the operation of that even-handed justice which commends the ingredients of our poisoned chalice to our own lips. Jacob of all men has to say to his uncle:--

> "What is this that thou done unto me? Did not I serve thee for Rachel? Wherefore then hast thou BEGUILED me?" (verse 25).

Laban realized that in Jacob he had too valuable a servant to lose, and possibly noting the rare love which Jacob had (verse 20) for Rachel acted accordingly. Another seven years unpaid service must Jacob give for the wife of his choice. Leah was hated (possibly "not loved so much", see verse 30), and the Lord gave Leah children, but withheld children from Rachel. Rachel may have been more beautiful and loved more ardently, yet there is manifested in Leah's attitude a loving patient trust in God, which is not so marked in Rachel. This comes out in the naming of her children. The first is called Reuben, "for she said, surely the Lord hath looked upon (raha) my affliction; now therefore my husband will love me". Her second son she called Simeon (shimeon, hearing), "because the Lord hath heard (shama) that I was hated". Again a son is born, and again her sorely tried faith revives, "now this time will my husband be joined unto me, because I have borne him three sons; therefore was his name called Levi" (joined). Her fourth son is called Judah, for his mother said, "let me praise the Lord". Man had failed, her husband still loved Rachel more than herself, and she turns to the God of all comfort, voicing no more her heart's burden, but saying in true resignation, "let me praise the Lord".

Leah's fruitfulness, if it failed to arouse her husband's love, moved Rachel's envy. Even Jacob's anger is kindled against Rachel by her importunity. Rachel then in agreement with the code of Khammurabi and the example of Sarah gives her handmaid Bilhah to Jacob. A son is born, and Rachel calls his name Dan, for said she, "God hath judged me". This child is not born into so kindly an atmosphere as the sons of Leah. The second one too, called Nephtali, was so called because Rachel said, "with great wrestlings have I wrestled with my sister, and I have prevailed". Leah is now stirred and presents Jacob with her maid Zilpah; another son is born, and in happy exuberance Leah cries, "a troop cometh", and calls his name Gad. Again another son, and he is called Asher, for said Leah, "happy am I, for the daughters will call me blessed", and so through the whole story. Isaachar means "hired", Zebulun, "endued with a dowry", Dinah the daughter is so named, but no reason is given. At last Rachel herself is remembered of God, and gives birth to a son whom she named Joseph, for she said, "the Lord shall add to me another son". Here we reach another turning point in Jacob's eventful career. Immediately the chosen wife of Jacob bears a son, Jacob thinks of home:--

> "And it came to pass, when Rachel had borne Joseph, that Jacob said unto Laban, Send me away that I may go unto mine own place, and to my country" (Gen. xxx. 25).

What follows to the end of the chapter appears at first to be an evident piece of Jacob's typical cunning. Laban agreed that Jacob's hire shall be the speckled and spotted cattle, and removed all such from the herd and set a three days' journey between them and the rest of the flock under Jacob's hand. The question arises once more, was the action of Jacob, detailed in verses 37-42, the ingenuity of the man Jacob, or was it of God? Our first thoughts condemn Jacob we do not shrink from exploiting his cunning—yet, as at Bethel we may find sufficient evidence to alter our verdict. Read on into chapter xxxi. The Lord said unto Jacob, "Return unto the land of your fathers, and to thy kindred, and I will be with thee". He reminds his wives that with all his power he had served their father, who had nevertheless deceived him and changed his wages ten times. Then he introduces the part that God took in this state of affairs. At the time covered by Gen. xxx. 37-42 Jacob had a dream, and the angel of the Lord showed him practically what he then put into operation, and declared Himself to be "the God of Bethel, where thou anointedst the pillar, and where thou vowedst a vow unto Me". Laban's cupidity had alienated his daughters from him; "he hath sold us", could both Leah and Rachel say with truth, "and hath quite devoured also our money". Thus Laban prepared his daughters to be willing to leave their home and journey back with Jacob to the land of his fathers.

Truly, whether the central figure be a placid Isaac, a scheming Rebekah, a deceitful Jacob, or a greedy Laban, all are in the hands of One Who worketh all things after the counsel of His own will. Bethel was the turning-point in Jacob's life. As the God of Bethel God appears unto Jacob in his exile, so at Bethel once again with changed name shall Jacob once more meet with God.

#35. Israel—Prince of God (Gen. xxxii.).

pp. 135 - 139

Jacob's first meeting with the God of his fathers at Bethel and the impress of grace he there received is to have yet more and abiding fruit. In a night vision some twenty years afterwards the Lord again speaks to him saying:--

> "I am the God of Bethel…….now arise, get thee out of this land and return unto the land of thy kindred" (Gen. xxxi. 13).

We have no means of determining whether Jacob's silent flight was dictated by natural cunning or by Divine instruction, nor are we called upon to pass judgment. The action itself could be right or wrong, according to the will of the Lord at the time. Laban however gives chase, but before he can come up with the fugitives God came to Laban the Syrian in a dream by night saying, "Take heed that thou speak not to Jacob either good or bad". Laban's search for his stolen gods proves fruitless, and Jacob, knowing nothing of Rachel's action, takes the opportunity of forcing upon the conscience of Laban his own dishonest dealings during the time when Jacob served him faithfully and well (xxxi. 37-42). Laban and Jacob build a "witness heap" and a "watch tower", for Laban said, "the Lord watch between me and thee when we are absent one from another".

At the close of the solemn covenanting Laban departed and "Jacob went on his way, and the angel of God met him". Upon hearing of the approach of Esau with a company of four hundred men Jacob does two things: he first disposed of his forces, with foresight and wisdom taking the "two bands" of angels as his guide, and secondly he prayed. Here is the first real prayer recorded in the Bible. Abraham's intercession for Sodom is more like an argument. Abraham's servant's words in Gen. xxiv are the expression of a desire for a sign. Here is a real prayer. It commences and ends with a reference to the covenant. Jacob's conception of his claim on God is not based upon his worthiness or his need, but upon the covenant made with his fathers. The reference to the covenant made unto the fathers is followed by a remembrance of a personal promise, which in its turn is echoed by a confessed fear and felt need; in the center comes the repudiation of all worthiness echoed by an acknowledgment of God's faithfulness:--

A | xxxii. 9-. The God of the covenant with Abraham and Isaac.
B | -9. Reminder of promise.
C | 10-. Confession of utter unworthiness.
C | -10. Acknowledgment of overflowing blessing.
B | 11-. Prayer for deliverance.
A | -11. Reference to covenant blessing.

Jacob after this prayer arranges a present to pass over the ford that Esau may be appeased and accept his returning brother in peace. His two wives and his two women servants together with his eleven sons pass over the ford, "and Jacob was left alone". If Jacob could say of Bethel "how dreadful is this place", what shall he say of this all-night wrestling with the angel of God? "And there wrestled a Man with him." This wrestler is called God in verse 30.

There is a division of opinion regarding the meaning of this midnight wrestling. Some see in it a picture of overcoming prayer—but it does not say Jacob wrestled, but the Man wrestled—Jacob's attitude was one of resistance. This passage, coupled with the strange supplanting act at his birth, is referred to in Hosea xii., and possibly the reference there will aid us in understanding the purport of Gen. xxxii. The passage in the A.V. reads as follows:--

> "He took his brother by the heel in the womb, and by strength he had power with God (margin 'was a prince, or behaved himself princely'), yea, he had power over the angel, and prevailed, he wept and made supplication unto him, he found him in Bethel, and there he spake with us, even the Lord God of hosts; the Lord is his memorial."

The Companion Bible differs from the majority of commentators, both in the passage in Gen. xxxii. and in Hosea xii. In Gen. xxxii. the changed name Israel is interpreted, "God commands, orders or rules", and the additional remark is made that "out of some forty Hebrew names compounded with El or Jah God is always the doer of what the verb means (cf. Dan-el, God judges). "The name" (continues the note) "is used here not to dignify but to reproach", and the references are given. The words "hast thou power with God and with men and hast prevailed" are explained to mean that Jacob had contended with Esau at birth, for the birthright, for the blessing, and with Laban. In contending with men he had succeeded, but now contending with God he fails, and receives the name Isra-el, (God commands) to teach him the greatly needed lesson of dependence upon God.

The notes of the Companion Bible to Hosea xii. 4, 5 are even more complicated. The words "by his strength" (in his manhood) referring to another occasion of strife; "had power with" (contended with), Heb. Sarah (hence his name Israel). The word "prevailed" is not to be referred to the result of Jacob's contending, but means that He (the angel) prevailed. "He found him in Bethel", i.e., God found Jacob. If Jacob's new name Israel indicates "God commands" it cannot at the same time have any connection with Jacob's own "contending"—see note above—it must be one or the other, yet the Companion Bible emphasizes both.

We cannot say that the note on Gen. xxxii. appeals to us as being the true meaning, and therefore we have no help for it but an independent search into what is confessedly a difficult passage. One interpretation makes Israel a Prince with God, because he had power with God and prevailed, the other makes the name Israel mean God commands, and supposes it used as a reproach not a dignity. Let us turn again to Gen. xxxii. 24, 25. "WRESTLED."—This word occurs nowhere else in the O.T. A substantive derived from this word is translated five times "dust" and twice "powder". This would show the idea to be more "pounding", "crushing", or "pulverizing" than "wrestling". It does not seem possible that an ordinary man could in his own strength "wrestle" with the Angel of God for hours, but from what we have gathered of Jacob's character we can understand that it was not a trifling thing to reduce his old nature to powder.

"PREVAIL."—This word suits well the idea of wrestling, but when connected with reducing anything to powder it is not so fitting; it is translated "could" in Gen. xiii. 6, xxxvi. 7, xxxvii. 4, xlv. 1, 3; "can" in Gen. xiii. 16, xix. 19, 22, xxiv. 50, xxix. 8, xxxi. 35, and as this is the usual rendering we are under no necessity to translate the passage other than "was not able", or "could not". One suggestive use of the word is found in II Sam. xvii. 20, "they be gone over the brook of water". In II Sam. xvii. 20 we have mee-chal, when joined with the word for water it means, "manageable water", "fordable water", "water that can be overcome". Jacob, by the ford Jabbok, was not so manageable. As the dawn of day approached it became imperative that the reduction of Jacob should be accomplished, and the angel touched the hollow of Jacob's thigh, and he limped the remainder of his pilgrimage. Jacob now clings tight to the angel and says, "I will not let thee go, except thou bless me".

Now, do the words that follow indicate a blessing for Jacob, or otherwise? First of all his name is changed, "Thy name shall be called no more Jacob but Israel". Now if Israel be a term of reproach, we are faced with a problem indeed; we are further told that Jacob had succeeded in his contending with men, but had failed with God. Neither statement is true, Jacob miserably failed in the scheme to get the blessing and Scripture settles the other statement by saying of Jacob, "as a prince hast thou power with GOD and with men, and hast prevailed".

We have other evidences of the purport of a change of name in Genesis, e.g., Abraham instead of Abram, Sarah instead of Sarai. In both cases the change is to a higher plane and the result of a blessing. The name Sarah means Princess and contains the word which gives us I-sra-el. SAR.—Sar is rendered "prince" 208 times, and "captain" 125 times, hence chief, ruler, governor, etc., and seen in connection with Sarah Jacob's new name seems to echo its meaning, she the Princess, he the Prince. One feature of great importance must now be noted which links together the changed names of Abraham, Sarah, and Israel, and also substantiates the meaning of Prince in the name Israel.

> "As for Sarai thy wife, thou shall not call her name Sarai, but Sarah shall be her name…….KINGS of people shall be of her" (Gen. xvii. 15, 16).
> "Thy name shall not be called any more Jacob, but Israel…….KINGS shall come out of thy loins" (Gen. xxxv. 10).

We must by this evidence retain the kingly thought in the word Israel. Here, in each instance, the change of name is associated with blessing, and a promise of a royal seed. Newburry interprets Isra-El by a prince of God, just as we translate Peni-El, face of God, or Beth-El, house of God. The change of name was given for a revealed reason, "FOR thou wast as a prince", saritha, "as a prince hast thou power", being but one word.

This word occurs nowhere else, but in Hosea x. 11. Bethel in the days of Hosea had become notorious for its idolatry. Israel is exhorted to consider the typical history of their father Israel, how from being a supplanter he was changed to a Prince of God, and how from being a keeper of sheep (xii. 12) he became a Prince of God, or, as the parallel is written turning from the type to the antitype, the captive bondman Israel in Egypt brought out of Egypt by a prophet (xii. 13) to become when at last they see God face to face "kings and priests unto God". Ephraim or Israel had become idolators, they had fallen by their iniquity, yet, saith the Lord, "I will heal their backsliding, I will love them freely". Jacob's experience at Jabbok is an Old Testament parallel to Paul's experience spoken of in II Cor. xii. 9, 10:--

> "And He said unto me, My grace is sufficient for thee: for My strength is made perfect in weakness. Most gladly therefore will I rather glory in my infirmity that the power of Christ may rest upon me…….for when I am weak, then am I strong."

Jacob's human frame ever afterwards showed evidence of his weakness and the need to distrust the flesh, but it would ever be associated with a gracious blessing, a princely name and a consciousness that henceforth his strength was to be found in God. Jacob's experience anticipates that day soon to dawn, when the night shall have passed away for ever, when his descendants shall look upon Him whom they pierced (Peniel) and shall say:--

> "Unto Him that loved us and loosed us from our sins by His own blood, and hath made us KINGS and priests unto God" (Rev. i. 5, 6).

Who is this One upon whom they look? "PRINCE of the KINGS of the earth." Sar of Sars, the true and antitypical Israel, Prince of God. Saviour and saved are both foreshadowed. He the great King-Priest after the Order of Melchisedek, they the kingdom of priests, a royal priesthood. Israel like Jacob could not attain this by creature strength, it was when the hollow of his thigh was touched that he asked a blessing and received his princely name.

#36. Esau, the Profane. Jacob, the Perfect. (Gen. xxv. - xxxv.). pp. 164 - 167

We have passed Jacob's history in review up to the moment when he "saw God face to face, and his life was preserved", and he was changed from supplanter to prince. Such is his transit, from catching his brother's heel in creature strength to losing the power of the flesh for spiritual force, from scheming, bartering, and lying to obtain the blessings that vanished into thin air to vowing with awe-struck heart, and praying with earnest self-abnegation to the God of Bethel, the God of all grace.

Jacob well set forth in type Israel's history. First the reliance upon self, then the exile, the servitude, the return and the new name—a Prince with God: and over all, from before birth and throughout that eventful pilgrimage, the God of Abraham and of Isaac, in very truth the God of Jacob. We now retrace our steps to the time of Jacob's birth to note what is said concerning Esau, for he too is typical.

The epistle to the Galatians uses the two sons of Abraham as a figure, Ishmael representing those in bondage, Isaac those who are free. Romans draws attention to Esau and Jacob, teaching that they are not all Israel that are of Israel, and that the true Israel is the child of promise. Not only did Abraham have two sons, the one a type of the flesh and the law, the other a type of promise and covenant mercy, but Isaac also had two sons, Esau and Jacob, who in their turn reflect in type the seed of truth and of evil.

Esau when he had grown is described as "a cunning hunter". The word for "hunter" occurs twelve times in Genesis and is used of two persons only, Nimrod the mighty hunter and Esau the cunning hunter. Esau is further described as "a man of the field". Jacob in the same verse is called "a plain man". Why this rendering should have been chosen we do not quite see. The very next occurrence of the adjective is found in Job i. 1, "this man was PERFECT and upright". In Song of Solomon v. 2 and vi. 9 it is rendered "undefiled". The substantive is rendered in Gen. xx. 5 "integrity" (margin, "simplicity", "sincerity"), and these three words together with uprightness are the words that are used to translate it throughout some twenty occurrences.

In the emphatic form tahmeem we find the word used of Noah, "Noah was a just man and perfect" (Gen. vi. 9). It is used of Abraham in the words, "Walk before me and be thou perfect" (Gen. xvii. 1). It is used of the Passover lamb, "your lamb shall be without blemish" (Exod. xii. 5). Every occurrence of the feminine form is translated "integrity". The last thing we should say of Jacob (as taught by our traditions) is that he was sincere, upright, simple or perfect. Who would think of Jacob and Job together? Nevertheless God who trieth the heart and knows what is in man definitely describes Jacob as a perfect or sincere man, whilst generous-hearted, easily-appeased, hale-fellow-well-met Esau is termed a profane person. God seeth not as man seeth, man looketh upon the outward appearance, but God looketh upon the heart.

The second description of Jacob is "dwelling in tents". This fact is referred to in Heb. xi. 8, and is there used as a sign of faithful patience in view of the promise:--

> "By faith he (Abraham) sojourned in the land of promise, as in a strange country, dwelling in tents with Isaac and Jacob, the heirs with him of the same promise."

The epistle to the Hebrews uses both the words which describe Jacob with special purpose, perfect and dwelling in tents. The same epistle describes Esau as a profane person who sold his birthright. Esau thus becomes the exact opposite of Jacob. Esau is held up as a warning to these Hebrews who were beginning to draw back, whose endurance was waning. Such could not be renewed again unto repentance, and are pointed to Esau:--

> "Who for one morsel of meat sold his birthright, for ye know how that afterwards, when he would have inherited the blessing, he was rejected; for he found no place of repentance, though he sought it carefully with tears" (xii. 16, 17).

The chapter goes on to speak of those who were the church of the firstborn ones, who are here warned against selling their birthright for a little respite.

Esau's second name (Edom) is taken from this selling of his birthright for a mess of pottage, "that red" as he called it. Esau' second name links him with his profanity, and Jacob's second name with his loss of self and his royalty, Esau is named after a mess of lentils, Jacob is named Prince of God. Esau comes in from the field saying, "I am faint…….I am at the point of death; and what profit shall this birthright do to me?" Jacob after an all-night wrestle with the angel, touched at the breaking of the day upon his thigh so that the sinew withered, still clings tight saying, "I will not let thee go except thou bless me". Esau after selling his birthright "did eat and drink and rose up and went his way; thus Esau despised his birthright". How many more have done the same! Jacob on the other hand, though he works with base tools and crooked means, pursues his end—THE blessing. We make no excuse for the method nor the means, but we do ask the reader, whether God Who judges the motive may not after all amid all that is false and fleshly see earnest desire, not for ease, comfort, or worldly greatness, but the heart's cry, "Oh that I may receive the blessing of Abraham, and take my place in the line of God's purpose". For this frail flesh will lie and deceive, for this suffer exile and the heat by day and the frost by night, but nevertheless Jacob the perfect man shall by one path or another come at last to see the face of God, repent, believe, and inherit the blessing.

Esau's next evidence of his nature is given by his choice of wives. Jacob had two wives—but not of choice, yet Jacob's wives were of his kindred, he allowed not his "generation" to be contaminated, being like Noah "perfect as to his pedigree", for the Abrahamic blessing involved a "seed". Abraham's care for Isaac's wife will here come to mind. When Esau was forty years old he married two Hittites! These were "a bitterness of spirit to Isaac and Rebecca". It is in keeping with Esau's typical character that his Hittite wife should bear a Hebrew name, "Judith", but her name alone was Hebrew. Esau, finding that Isaac straitly charge Jacob not to marry one of the daughters of Canaan and that his own Canaanitish wives were not pleasing to his parents, manifests the utter incapability of the flesh of doing a spiritual act by taking a wife this time of the line of ISHMAEL! Oh unhappy man! Judith, Hebrew in name, but not in heart: Ishmael, son of Abraham truly, but of bondage, not of promise. Esau has many followers in the religious world to-day, who vainly seek to copy the outward things of faith but manifest their profanity and their folly thereby. It is but the "form of godliness".

Jacob' words when he meets Esau after their long separation are repeatedly of grace. When Esau said, "Who are these with thee?" Jacob replied, "The children which God hath graciously given thy servant". When Esau asks the meaning of the droves he met, Jacob replies, "These are to find grace in the sight of my Lord". Esau magnanimously tells Jacob to keep what he has for himself: "I have enough my brother", but Jacob urges, "If I have found grace in thy sight that the present be received…….because God hath dealt graciously with me". His parting words with Esau are, "Let me find grace in the sight of my lord". After this Jacob erected an altar and called in El-eloe-Israel, God, the God of Israel. We must remember as we read this that Israel at that moment was the one individual—Jacob. It was Jacob's personal testimony to God Who had so wondrously kept his word.

The generations of Esau are given, and kings and dukes are in his line. Edom looms large in the day of judgment, the prophets speak much of its sin and its punishment. Isa. lxiii. gives a tragic figure of wrath, but the subject is too great to be dealt with here.

Jacob with his many failings finds many a parallel in the believer to-day. The very possession of "two natures" in the child of God will manifest itself in an erratic walk while the flesh is not reckoned dead, while the thigh bone is not out of joint. It is easy to be worldly-minded in the world, or heavenly-minded in heaven, but to be always heavenly-minded in the world needs great grace. May we who do not spare our censures on Jacob's meanness and cunning emulate his desire for the thing that matters most; and while we sound out the praise of noble generous Esau, take heed that we do not for a mess of this world's pottage sell our birthright.

The Epistle to the Hebrews.

#17. The Captain; Perfected.
pp. 28 - 30

> "For it became Him, for Whom are all things, and by Whom are all things, in leading many sons to glory, to perfect the captain of their salvation through sufferings" (Heb. ii. 10).

Instead of simply saying "God" or "The Father" the apostle uses the title "Him, for Whom are all things, and by Whom are all things". There is a reason for this which it is important to observe, and it comes out again in chapter xi. There the statement is simpler, and will enable us to perceive the underlying principle here in verse 10:--

> "For it is necessary for him who comes near to God (a special term) to believe that He is, and that He is a rewarder to those who diligently seek Him" (xi. 6).

Three statements are here, which placed beside ii. 10 will illuminate that passage:--

"It is necessary."	|	"It was becoming."
"He is."	|	"Him, for Whom and by Whom are all things."
"Rewarder."	|	"Perfecter."

The doctrine of reward is as primal and absolute as the very existence of God. "He is." "He is a rewarder." The words of chapter ii. 10 are an expansion of this. He who IS is the Creator whose creation has been arranged with a view to His own glory. He who is a rewarder of the diligent seeker plans also the pathway to glory—"Perfect through suffering". Instead of counting the idea of reward as strange and proudly saying, "Virtue is its own reward", "We ought to do right for right's sake", which is perfectly true, we should be more scriptural, and at bottom more true, if we saw in the framing and enforcing of all law whatever, that reward is essential, and that suffering is of purpose. So the words are introduced by eprepe, "It is becoming".

Prepõ is used again in vii. 26, when the essential suitability of Christ as High Priest is spoken of; also in Matt. iii. 15 where it was fitting and proper that the Son of God should fulfil all righteousness. It was therefore in the way of the nature of things that God who had made all things for Himself, in leading many sons to glory, should perfect their captain through sufferings. The idea of a suffering Messiah was repugnant to the Jew by reason of the traditions of the elders, but the apostle shows that the "taste of death for every son", was most fitting and proper. The path of suffering to glory must not be counted as though some strange thing had happened, it is according to plan.

The last words of verse 9 are sometimes quoted to prove that Christ died for every man and therefore is the Saviour of every man. The passage does not teach this. We saw in our previous article that the "tasting" of death did not mean death itself, but the sufferings which preceded it, and that this tasting of death did not have redemption in view, but glory. There is no word "man", and the word "all" has reference to the "many sons" who were being led on to glory through suffering.

Christ is their captain, and Joshua is the type. That this is so the words in iv. 8 will shew. "For if Jesus had given them rest", where the margin says, "i.e. Joshua". Hebrews is NOT dealing with Moses and the Passover redemption from the land of Egypt, but with Joshua and the survival through the rigours of the wilderness to the triumphal entry into the land of promise. The wilderness is the setting of the book. A saved people addressed and they are not urged to believe and be saved, but to go on unto perfection.

Christ is called the captain again in Heb. xii. 2, and that once more in connection with perfecting and suffering; the "author (captain) and perfecter of faith" (not of our faith). There He is seen leading the van of that great company who overcame through faith and obtained promises. The "so great salvation" is for those who have been perfected, just as the "Prize" is in Phil. iii. Of Christ it is again written:-- > "And having been perfected (by the things which He suffered, verse 8), He became the author of aionian salvation, unto all them that obey Him" (v. 9).

In connection with sufferings Christ as captain sets us an example, for He:-- > "Hath suffered for us, leaving us an example, that we should follow His steps" (I Pet. ii. 21).

> "For as much as Christ hath suffered for us in the flesh, arm yourselves therefore with the same mind" (I Pet. iv. 1).

It is well to consider Him lest we grow weary and faint in our minds. It is in this sense that we see Him as "the forerunner for us", Who has entered beyond the veil. The Hebrew believers had endured a great contest (athlēsis) of sufferings (Heb. x. 32, same word in ii. 10); which, said the apostle, had great recompense of reward.

The perfecting of faith (I Thess. iii. 10; Heb. xii. 2), the perfecting of love (I John ii. 5), and the perfecting of holiness (II Cor. vii. 1) cannot be accomplished apart from suffering. Faith will be tried (Gen. xxii.), love will be called upon to suffer long and endure all things (I Cor. xiii.), holiness will cause separation from much that is attractive to the flesh and spirit.

We are heirs of God, if sons; but we are joint-heirs with Christ if so be we suffer with Him (Rom. viii.). Present affliction is temporal in duration and light in comparison with the aionian weight of glory which it works out for those who are exercised by it and whose eyes see beyond the temporal and visible. "The fellowship of His sufferings" is a necessary prelude to the fellowship of His glory.

'Weeping may endure for a night,
But joy cometh in the morning.'

#18. A special aspect of Sanctification.
pp. 60 - 62

To catch the meaning of the concluding portion of Heb. ii. (11-18) we must first of all see it as a whole, apart from details and difficulties:--

"All of one."

A | 11. Oneness in sanctification.
B | 14. Oneness in nature. He partook.
C | 14-16. Oneness in death and deliverance.
B | 17. Oneness in nature. He was made like.
A | 18. Oneness in temptation.

This simple arrangement sweeps aside the idea entertained by some that "all of one" refers to Adam, or to God. Verse 10 speaks of two parties, "many sons" and the "captain". The perfecting of the captain can only bear upon the many sons, if they are united in some way. Verse 11 says they are, both sanctifier and sanctified being all of one. What therefore happens to the captain is communicated to the host. We must remember the limitations imposed upon the scope of "all" by the word "sanctified". "All of one" does not here speak of the human race although Luke traces the genealogy of Christ back to Adam, and Paul uses the same expression (ex henos) in Acts xvii. 26 when he speaks of "every nation of men". Neither does the passage speak of redemption from sin and its penalty. The exodus is already accomplished. The union here is with the things which accompany salvation. The Israelites were baptized into Moses in the cloud and in the sea after redemption. This oneness is limited to sanctification. We must therefore seek a true meaning for this term before we can appreciate the teaching of the passage.

Hagiazõ ("to sanctify") occurs seven times in Hebrews. It is therefore a key-word and carries an important message:--

Sanctify.

A | a | ii. 11. He that sanctifieth. The one perfected through suffering.
b | ii. 11. They that are sanctified.
B | ix. 12, 14. Blood of bulls . . . . . flesh.
Blood of Christ . . . . . conscience.
C | x. 9, 10. The will of God. The offering of the body. Once.
B | x. 14. Perfected for ever (cf. x. 1) by one offering.
A | b | x. 29. The blood wherewith He was sanctified.
a | xiii. 12. The people sanctified by His blood, without the gate.

The thought is uppermost in Heb. i. 3 where purification for sins, and not redemption, is the aspect of truth presented. This aspect is sustained in ix. 12-14 where the blood of goats and bulls is linked with the ashes of an heifer, which were not used as a ransom or an atonement, but for sprinkling the unclean, and results in a sanctification for the purifying of the flesh which had come into contact with some form of death. Christ's sanctification cleanses the conscience from dead works, the spiritual counterpart. Heb. x. 10 and 14 cannot be understood apart from the earlier verses. The word translated "continually" in x. 1 is the same as is rendered "for ever" in v. 14, and should in both cases be translated "unto perpetuity". Chapter x. 1 should be rendered:--

> "For the law having a shadow of good things to come, and not the very image of the things, can never with those sacrifices which they offered year by year make the comers thereunto PERFECT UNTO PERPETUITY. For then would they not have ceased to be offered? because the worshippers once having been cleansed should have had no more conscience of sins."

Verses 10 and 14 are the answer to this, just as verse 14 is the answer to verse 13 in chapter ix. Chapter x. 29 speaks of the awful possibility of counting the blood wherewith He was sanctified unholy, and of doing despite to the spirit of grace, which is opened up in an intensely practical way in the verses that follow, where the drawing back from suffering and trial is a parallel. The last reference shows the captain of our salvation suffering outside the gate. The oneness between sanctifier and sanctified is expressed in the words:--

> "Let us go forth therefore unto Him without the camp, bearing His reproach. For here we have no continuing city, but we seek one to come" (Heb. xiii. 13, 14).

These last words are full of light for us as to the underlying idea of this sanctification. The pilgrim character, the wilderness pathway, the whole theme of race and crown is involved in the word. Its association with "perfection" would teach students of Philippians that much. See also another link between sanctification and pilgrim character. Those who are sanctified suffer the spoiling of their goods knowing that in heaven they have a better and an enduring substance. They have here no continuing city, but seek one to come. Like Abraham:--

> "They desire a better country, that is an heavenly: wherefore God is not ashamed to be called their God: for He hath prepared for them a city" (xi. 16).
>
> "Both He that sanctifieth and they who are sanctified are all of one, for which cause He is not ashamed to call them brethren" (ii. 11).

Hagiotes and hagiasmos in Heb. xii. 10 and 14 speak of holiness as the outcome of the Father's discipline, without which no man shall see God.

Hagios, apart from its occurrences in the expression "the Holy Ghost", comes in iii. 1, "holy brethren", who are immediately named "partakers of the heavenly calling", a statement which illuminates the meaning of "holy brethren" somewhat. In vi. 10 and xiii. 24 it is used for "the saints" without qualification. In ix. 2 it is rendered "sanctuary".

Hagion in its nine occurrences is used to denote the sanctuary or the holiest of all, either in the tabernacle in the wilderness or the true tabernacle, "heaven itself". The sanctification of "Hebrews" is linked with the wilderness and the tabernacle, not the kingdom and the temple, and with the heavenly Jerusalem, not the earthly (see xii. 22). It is associated with purification from things of death, it leads outside the camp, it shares the reproach for Christ, and counts it greater riches than the treasures of Egypt.

Sanctification of the Spirit is never once mentioned in Hebrews. It is always connected with the sufferings of the captain of our salvation and His once offered sacrifice for the purification from sins and uncleanness. It is utterly valueless as an aid to exegesis simply to string together the occurrences of the word "sanctify" regardless of their origin or context. The word here, as we have seen, has a special shade of meaning which is closely related to the theme of the epistle to the Hebrews. It does not mean every saved one by virtue of salvation, as it probably does in Rom. i. 7. It is the title of the many sons who through suffering are going on to glory. It is closely associated with the captain and perfecter of faith, Who for the joy set before Him endured a cross, despising the shame, and is set down at the right hand of God. It is a necessity in view of the aionian salvation and inheritance.

The element of overcoming is often passed over in Heb. x., but it is there, and there with a purpose. It immediately precedes the reference to the perfecting of the sanctified, "from henceforth expecting till His enemies be made His footstool". Such sanctified ones the great captain is not ashamed to call His brethren. The three quotations that follow in Heb. ii. are designed to show the close association of Christ and His people. This is particularly so in the second one where Christ uses the words, "I will put my trust in Him". There we see Him trusting, in the days of His flesh, and it is there we find the oneness with Him in this sanctification by suffering.

#19. "Him who had the strength of death" (ii. 14, 15).
pp. 87 - 91

> "Forasmuch therefore as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, He also, in like manner, partook of the same; in order that by means of death he might render powerless him having the strength of death, that is the devil, and might set free those who by fear of death were through all their life held in bondage" (Heb. ii. 14, 15).

The words of v. 11, "all of one", here receive a fuller explanation. Those who were sanctified and called His brethren were partakers of flesh and blood, and were also held in bondage by the fear of death. The Lord too, their Redeemer, became partaker of the same nature, submitted Himself to death, and rendered the devil powerless. Had the passage meant merely to indicate the Lord's sympathy with our frailty, flesh alone would have been used. "Flesh and blood" stand for human nature without reference to its deeds. In other words, the Captain of our salvation became a real man "in like manner", "not in show, nor in appearance, but in truth" (Chrysostom).

"The children" are first described as to their natural state—"common sharers of flesh and blood"; then, as to their moral and dispensational condition, "held in bondage by fear of death". The Saviour is first described as to His natural state—"He partook of the same"; and then as to the moral effects—"He rendered powerless the devil" and delivered His brethren.

Three passages should be read in conjunction with these verses. Rom. viii. 3; Phil. ii. 7, 8; Heb. x. 5-7 and their contexts noted.

Rom. viii. 3. "God sending His Son in the likeness of sinful flesh."
Phil. ii. 7, 8. "Was made in the likeness of men, and being found in fashion as a man . . . . ."
Heb. x. 5-7. "When He cometh into the world, He saith, Sacrifice and offering Thou wouldest not, but a body hast Thou prepared me . . . . ."

The section of Romans which contains viii. 3 commences with Rom. v. 12, and reveals the entry of death. Here death is spoken of as exercising dominion, "Death reigned by one". The dominion of sin and death is the theme of Rom. vi. 9-14. The law of sin and death is uppermost in Rom. vii. 21-25. Rom. viii. 2 introduces the other law, which indicates deliverance, "For the law of spirit of LIFE in Christ Jesus hath made me free from the law of sin and death". This was accomplished by Christ assuming our nature, the result being "that the righteous requirement of the law might be fulfilled in us who walk not after the flesh but after the spirit". The context this side speaks of life (6, 10, 11, 12, 13), our deliverance from the bondage of corruption (15-23), a bondage which is ever related to "fear" (15).

The statement that Christ was made in the likeness of sinful flesh is here chiefly connected with the practical out-working of truth, of triumph over death, of "life because of righteousness", of "life and peace" as a result of being "spiritually minded". The passage speaks moreover not only of being heirs of God by virtue of being sons of God, but of being JOINT HEIRS WITH CHRIST by virtue of suffering together with Him (17, 18). Here the goal is that Christ should be "the first-born among many brethren" (29). Here we read of having "the spirit of Christ", of working out our own salvation with fear and trembling, of being finally fashioned like unto the body of His glory (iii. 21). Here we have also a close connection with Hebrews:--

"Who being in the FORM OF GOD" (Phil. ii. 6).

"Who being the brightness of His glory and the EXPRESS IMAGE of His person" (Heb. i. 3).

"He was made in the likeness of men" (Phil. ii. 7).

"Forasmuch then as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, He also Himself likewise took part of the same" (Heb. ii. 14).

"And being found in fashion as a man He humbled Himself, and became obedient unto death" (Phil. ii. 8).

"That through death He might destroy him who has the power of death, that is the devil" (Heb. ii. 14).

"Wherefore God hath highly exalted Him, and given Him the name which is above every name" (Phil. ii. 9).

"Who for the joy set before Him endured a cross, despising the shame, and is set down at the right hand of God" (Heb. xii. 2).

"Being made so much better than the angels, as He hath by inheritance obtained a more excellent name than they" (Heb. i. 4).

"Work out your own salvation with fear and trembling; For it is God which worketh in you both to will and to work on account of the good pleasure" (Phil. ii. 12, 13).

"Make you perfect in every good work, in order to do His will, doing in you that which is well pleasing in His sight" (Heb. xiii. 21).

The third reference (Heb. x. 5-7) we have already had occasion to examine when dealing with the word "sanctified". There we read of the moment when the Lord laid aside His glory, the moment of His kenosis (Phil. ii. 7); and just as He left the glory that was His before the world was to enter by human birth in the crib at Bethlehem that path of suffering, we hear Him say:--

"Sacrifice and offering Thou wouldest not, but a BODY HAST THOU PREPARED ME . . . . . Lo, I come to do Thy will, O God."

Here we are allowed by wondrous grace to hear the words with which the Lord of life and glory voluntarily partook of the same flesh and blood as the children of men, that in the body thus prepared for Him He might learn obedience by the things He should suffer, and, being made perfect through suffering, lead many sons to glory.

Before we attempt to explain our verse, we must examine another item. The Lord submitted to death, not only that all Adam's sons might live again (I Cor. xv. 22), but that "He might render ineffective the one having the strength of death, that is the Devil". What is this strength of death? Here we are not viewing atonement, for Christ offered Himself in all aspects of His sacrifice, "unto God". The Devil possessed this strength, and we must seek from the Word the meaning of the expression. Kratos is used in Eph. i. 19 of resurrection, "according to the energy of the strength of His might", and in vi. 10 of its practical application to the believer, "Finally be empowered in the Lord and in the strength of His might", this empowering being in view of the conflict with spiritual wickedness in heavenly places.

It will be remembered that (evidently) at the time when Moses was to appear with Elias on the mount of transfiguration, "Michael the archangel when contending with the Devil disputed about the body of Moses" (Jude 9). It will be remembered that the mount of transfiguration came into prominence in our investigation into the meaning of the expression "taste of death" of Heb. ii. 9, and Peter in his epistle of suffering in view of glory introduces it in the first chapter. It is the vision of the overcomer. Death is spoken of ten times in Hebrews. In v. 7 we are taken to the garden of Gethsemane and there the Lord:--

"in the days of His flesh, offered up both prayers and supplications with strong crying and tears to Him who was able to save Him out of death, and was heard for His piety."

This passage, the reference following the cluster in Heb. ii. (9, 14, 15), carries with it the same sense that is more dimly seen in Heb. ii., namely, death as viewed in connection with suffering and glory, obedience and perfection, aionian salvation, and the so great salvation. Here also, as in Heb. ii. 17, the High Priesthood of Christ is introduced (v. 6). The next reference to death (vii. 23) speaks of the priesthood of the sons of Aaron in contrast. The last reference seems of great importance in our endeavour to understand the peculiar meaning of death in Heb. ii. 14, 15. In Heb. xi. 5, the chapter of overcomers, sons led on to glory perfected through sufferings but not yet perfected in resurrection, we read of Enoch, who by faith "was translated that he might not see death". When we turn to chapter iii. 17, 18, we read of the tragedy of the wilderness:--

> "And with whom was He displeased forty years? Was it not with those who sinned, whose carcasses fell in the wilderness? And to whom sware He that they should not enter into His rest, but to them that believed not?"

Those in Heb. ii. were all their lifetime held by the "fear" of death. In chapter iv. 1 we read, immediately after hearing of those whose carcasses fell in the wilderness:--

> "Let us therefore FEAR, lest a promise being left us of entering into His rest, any one of you should seem to have come short of it."

In writing of the wilderness to the Corinthians, the apostle says:--

> "Neither murmur ye, as some of them also murmured, and were DESTROYED OF THE DESTROYER" (I Cor. x. 10).

When a believer was handed over to Satan by the apostle, it was for the destruction of the flesh that the spirit might be saved. Parallel with this is I Cor. iii. 15, "He shall suffer loss, but he himself shall be saved, yet so as by fire". This too is the one great theme of Hebrews.

> "But we are not of them who draw back unto destruction (the destruction of the flesh, the two words used come together in I Cor. x. 10), but of them who believe to the saving of the soul" (Heb. x. 39).

The death of Christ was effective in rendering ineffective him who had the strength of death. By His one offering the "sanctified" (Heb. ii. 11, x. 14) are "perfected" for ever.

The deliverance is like that from a legal opponent (Luke xii. 58), or from the grip of disease (Acts xix. 12). It is not the word that indicates deliverance from sins in the gospel sense of the word. It is from the power of someone into whose hands, or under whose authority, we have come. The connection between the believer's "perfecting", expressed in Colossians and Philippians as circumcision, and antagonistic principalities and powers is indicated in Col. ii. 10-15, and its connection with the "reward" is seen in v. 18. The death and the deliverance of Heb. ii. must be seen as related to the overcoming, the crown, the prize, and it is against this "strength of death" the believer is ranged as he presses along the path, and to which he is delivered should he so sadly fail as did those who tempted God in the wilderness.

The Captain of our salvation is the TRUE JOSHUA under whom we enter into the rest that remaineth.

#20. (An interpretation of Heb. ii. 16, submitted to the reader for prayerful consideration).
pp. 120 - 122

> "For verily He took not on Him the nature of angels, but He took on Him the seed of Abraham."
>
> A.V. margin Gr. Reads: "He taketh not hold of angels, but of the seed of Abraham he taketh hold." The R.V. follows the A.V. margin.

A great mass of conflicting opinions will be found in commentaries upon this verse, some seeking to prove that Christ did not assume angelic form, but human, some seeking to prove that the passage means that He did not succour or assist angels, but men. Parkhurst in his lexicon says:--

> "The text therefore means that Christ, when He came to redeem us, did not assume a glorious, awful and angelic appearance, but etc., etc."

This is promptly denied by his Editor who follows with a note:--

> "There appears little ground for assigning this sense to epilambanomai. Ernesti says that the ancient Greek church always interpreted the verb in this place to assist."

Moses Stuart disposes of the A.V. idea of the nature of angels by saying that both usus loquendi and context is against this meaning:--

> "For the apostle had just asserted above that Jesus took on Him a nature human, and it would be a mere repetition."

Moses Stuart thinks it means "to aid". Dr. Owen proceeds by lengthy argument and characteristic sub-division to prove the meaning to be "assumo, accipio, to take unto, or to take upon", and that:--

> "The apostle teacheth us by it, that the Lord Christ took to Him, and took on Him, our human nature of the seed of Abraham."

The idea of "relieving" or "helping" is fitly expressed by antilambanomai (Luke i. 54; Acts xx. 35; I Tim. vi. 2), but the writer of Hebrews passes by this word. The reader is probably no wiser by all this than before, and we have endeavoured to indicate the exceedingly ambiguous results of past scholarship in elucidating this passage. The A.V. margin and the R.V. indicate the first and last results of all this endeavour. We shall therefore be justified in saying, that as there is no agreement among the learned themselves, we must turn once more to the fountain head. One writer complains that the other usages of the word "to take hold" do not help him; the reason seems that they do not help his idea of what it means. Let us examine the word afresh, epilambanomai.

Matt. xiv. 31.	"Stretched out His hand and caught him."
Mark viii. 23.	"He took the blind man by the hand."
Luke ix. 47.	"And Jesus . . . . . took a child."
Luke xiv. 4.	"He took him, and healed him."

Luke xx. 20, 26.	"Take hold of His words."
Luke xxiii. 26.	"They laid hold upon one Simon."
Acts ix. 27.	"And Barnabas took him."
Acts xvi. 19.	"They caught Paul and Silas."
Acts xvii. 19.	"They took him."
Acts xviii. 17.	"The Greeks took Sosthenes."
Acts xxi. 30, 33.	"They took Paul."
Acts xxiii. 19.	"Took him by the hand."
I Tim. vi. 12, 19.	"Lay hold on eternal life."
Heb. ii. 16.	"The passage under consideration."
Heb. viii. 9.	"I took them by the hand."

An impartial examination shews that the word is colourless. There is no moral meaning inherent to it. The same word can be used when Christ takes a man by the hand to heal him, as when the Roman soldiers take hold on Simon to compel him to bear the cross. The same word can be used for Barnabas' kindly act in taking hold of Paul to bring him to the apostles, as for the mob who took Paul with the intent to kill him. This characteristic of the word precludes the idea of "assisting, helping, succouring". It also seems to preclude the idea of assuming, as in the rendering "assuming the nature of angels". It simply means to take hold upon, whether for good or evil motives and objects.

We have already observed that the A.V. italics make Heb. ii. 16 a somewhat needless repetition. May there not be some meaning which has been on the surface all the while? We believe there is. There is a footnote in the Emphatic Diaglott which reads, "For truly it", i.e., the fear of death, or death itself, "does not lay hold of, or seize on angels, but of the seed of Abraham it does lay hold" (Theolog Ref. and Kneeland). Those of our readers who are not conversant with the original must know that the "He" or the "it" is contained within the verb epilambanomai, and epilambanetai, means equally it, as well as He, takes hold. Let us look at the structure again, verses 14-16 are included together there under one member (wrongly shown on page 60 as verses 14, 15).

C | 14-16. Oneness in death and deliverance.

This member is made up of parts, and we can test the congruity of this new suggestion here.

C	14-16.	A1	The death of Christ.
			The destruction of the Devil who had the strength of death.
		A2	The deliverance of those subject to bondage of fear of death.
			The seed of Abraham laid hold of by fear of death.

With the exception of the fourth line, the emphatic word is death. If the A.V. reading be retained it introduces a discordant note. If the idea of "assisting" be adopted it harmonizes with "deliverance", but has no relation with the emphatic word "death". What has Scripture to say about angels and death? Luke xx. 35, 36 says:--

> "But they which are accounted worthy to obtain that age (the very pith and marrow of Hebrews) and the resurrection from the dead, neither marry nor are given in marriage NEITHER CAN THEY DIE ANY MORE, FOR THEY ARE EQUAL TO THE ANGELS."

If the seed of Abraham, and flesh and blood, were laid hold of by the fear of death and thereby brought into bondage, Christ's becoming flesh and delivering them from that bondage is a fitting sequel.

> "Wherefore in all things it behoved Him to be made like unto His brethren that He might be a merciful and faithful High Priest" (verse 17).

We have already seen that the Lord Jesus "tasted death" and in the garden of Gethsemane His soul was exceeding sorrowful even unto death. Three times He prayed with reference to that awful cup. Heb. v. 7 tells us that He was heard for His piety. There is a direct connection between Gethsemane and the Melchisedec priesthood of Christ in Heb. v. It is an expansion of Heb. ii. 16-18. Since Christ has come and died and risen again, such words as II Tim. i. 10 can be written:--

> "Our Saviour Jesus Christ, who hath on the one hand rendered death powerless (same word Heb. ii. 14) and on the other hand illuminated life and incorruptibility through the gospel."

Those who once were subject to bondage can now look death in the face and say, "O death, where is thy sting?" We submit this interpretation to the judgment of our readers and shall be glad to hear from any who may search out the matter more thoroughly.

#21. Propitiation and the Pilgrim (ii. 17, 18).
pp. 148 - 152

> "For which reason it behoved Him to be made like to His brethren n all things (kata panta), in order that He might be a merciful and faithful high priest in things pertaining to God, with a view to making a propitiation for the sins of the people. For in that He Himself has suffered being tempted, He is able to succour them that are tempted" (Heb. ii. 17, 18).

"All things" here is panta, a word liable to much abuse, for although it may seem a very forceful argument to emphatically say, "God say All things, and that does not admit of exception", we find that this very epistle interprets its own language for us, and definitely teaches that "all" does not necessarily mean "all" in our sense of the word.

Heb. iv. 15 returns to the theme of Heb. ii. 17, 18:--

> "For we have not an high priest which cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities, but one having been tempted in all points (kata panta) like (see ii. 17) as we are, SIN EXCEPTED."

This is important. The temptations referred to in the epistle to the Hebrews in which Christ so fully shared, like the temptations of Abraham (Gen. xxii.), and the children of Israel in the wilderness were trials of faith, not temptations to sin; thus the "all points" are by no means universal.

The word homoioõ, "to be made like", gives us homoiotes. This comes in the parallel verse (iv. 15), where we read that Christ as the high priest was "in all points tempted like as we are". The actual wording is pepeirasmenon de KATA panta KATH homoiotēta, "having been tempted according to all things according to a likeness". Heb. vii. 15 contains the only other occurrence of the word in the N.T. The fact that the Saviour stooped not only to our humanity, but to endure its trials and its sorrows, is emphasized as one of the chief of His high qualifications as the true, merciful and faithful high priest. His work here is twofold. In the things pertaining to God—expiation for sins of the people; in the things pertaining to His people—succour for those who are tempted. The hilaskomai ("reconciliation" in A.V.) gives us the hilasterion of Heb. ix. 5, "the mercy seat" of which Paul said he could not then speak particularly. If we remember that he makes a similar statement regarding the Melchisedec priesthood of Christ (v. 11), we shall perceive that the subject before us is fuller and deeper than we at first might suppose.

In the doctrine of Romans the mercy seat figures in iii. 25, "Whom God hath set forth to be a propitiation", but the subject is not exhausted by justification. The mercy seat bore the cherubim of GLORY, and was the very visible throne of God in the tabernacle. There, the Lord said, He would meet with Moses and commune with him. The epistle to the Romans, with its emphasis upon justification, sees the blood-sprinkled mercy seat resting upon the ark which contained the unbroken tables of the law. The epistle to the Hebrews sees the same blood-sprinkled mercy seat, but while it recognizes the teaching of the preservation of the tables of the law, it finds the necessity of "finding fault" with the old covenant in a way which is parallel, though different from the setting aside of the law in Romans. Moreover, Hebrews takes account of the other articles which were covered by that mercy seat and indeed speaks of them before mentioning the tables of the covenant, viz., "the golden pot that had the manna, and Aaron's rod that budded".

The manna speaks of wilderness provision. In Christ as high priest the believer finds all that the golden pot of manna means. The epistle to the Hebrews is essentially the book of the wilderness and the pilgrim, and in pressing on to perfection the wilderness experience is repeated. The believer learns that man does not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God. Faith, not sight, is his characteristic. The rod that budded speaks of a living priesthood. This too is emphasized in Hebrews:--

> "And they truly were many priests, because they were not suffered to continue by reason of DEATH; but this man, because He continueth ever, hath an intransmissable priesthood. Wherefore He is able also to save them to the uttermost that come unto God by Him, seeing He ever LIVETH to make intercession for them" (vii. 23-25).

Manna from heaven for all our needs, an ever-living high priest to save to the uttermost, this is vitally connected with the thought of the propitiatory and the propitiation of Heb. ii. 17. The LXX commonly rendered the Hebrew word kopher.

This word gives us "atonement" in the A.V. The great day of atonement is the type which is in view in Heb. ix.

It will be noticed that the idea of cleansing or purifying is prominent in that chapter. First we have the cleansing of the conscience by the blood of Christ as the antitype of the ashes of the heifer. Then we have the cleansing by the blood, the patterns of heavenly things and the heavenly things themselves being thus cleansed. The opening section of chapter ix. speaks of the high priest who went into the holiest alone once every year, not without blood. This is an evident reference to Lev. xvi. and the day of atonement. The closing section speaks of the Lord Jesus as the true high priest:--

> "For Christ is not entered into the holy places made with hands, which are the figures of the true, but into heaven itself, now to appear in the presence of God for us . . . . . Christ was once offered to bear the sins of many; and unto them that look for Him shall He appear a second time WITHOUT SIN unto salvation."

While the "second time" indicates the "second coming" of the Lord, the meaning which is to be attached to the expression here is the fulfillment of the type in Lev. xvi. Not until the high priest had gone in beyond the veil with the blood of atonement and had appeared the second time did the people, typically, enter into the "so great salvation" of Hebrews.

When we look at the context of Heb. ii. 17 we observe that it is covered by the thought of "sanctification" (ii. 11). The only aspect of Christ's sacrificial work which is given in that great summary of Heb. i. 3 is that of "purification" or "cleansing" (as in Heb. ix.). The sufferings of Heb. ii. are connected with perfecting and glory, delivering from the fear of death, and making propitiation for sins. Here, in Heb. ii. 11, we have the offering of Christ "sanctifying". In Heb. x. 14 we get to the farthest extreme, where we read that "by one offering He hath perfected for ever them that ARE SANCTIFIED".

This is what is intended in Heb. ii. 17, 18. First He sanctifies (ii. 11), then He perfects (ii. 17, 18). Here the perfecting work is seen beginning; we shall trace it through its various processes until we read the Hebrew's equivalent to the prize of Phil. iii., viz., "the spirits of perfected righteous ones" (Heb. xii. 23). This perfecting of the sanctified is the theme of the book, and merely to lift out a verse, as so many do x. 14, is practically to misquote it, for it is not usual for an evangelical or protestant speaker, when using Heb. x. 14, to teach the "perfecting" of those already sanctified, but to buttress up some anti-Romish doctrines, truth in its way, but not the truth of that verse.

It will be noticed that ii. 18 leaves us with the thought of "succour in temptation", and not "salvation from sin". Babes are "unskillful", i.e., "untested" or "untempted", but perfect ones have their senses "exercised". The pilgrim journey is one beset with temptations, but all for the good of the tempted. The Lord will never fail them; perfect sympathy exists between the great high priest and the tried saint. He Himself has suffered, being tempted; He can succour those who are tempted. Failure therefore is simply lack of faith, not lack of provision. This we shall see more clearly when we enter upon the examination of chapters iii. and iv.

To summarize. The four steps towards perfection are:

First.—Sanctification.
Second.—Realization of the oneness existing between the risen Lord and His people.
Third.—Consciousness that the one who had the strength of death can no longer hold us in bondage.
Fourth.—That complete provision, both for sins on the one hand (Lev. xvi. deals with the sins of a people already redeemed and separated), and for wilderness temptations on the other hand, has been made in Christ.

While some of the figures used may not fit the church of the One Body, the blessed realities are for all saints in all times.

> "If we walk in the light . . . . . the blood . . . . . cleanseth us from all sin . . . . . We have an advocate . . . . . He is the propitiation" (I John i., ii.).

#22. The Heavenly Calling and Profession (iii. 1).
pp. 187 - 190

The first word of Heb. iii. is hothen, which properly means "from whence". The idea intended by its use here may be expressed by saying, "Seeing that things are thus (as indicated in Heb. i., ii.) then I ask you to consider the One who is both apostle and High Priest of our profession." The title High Priest is one which most believers will associate with Christ, but how few realize His equal glory as THE Apostle!

One of the special aspects of the Gospel according to John is to set before us Christ as the Apostle and High Priest. John's Gospel is divided into two sections, the first being the outer and public ministry (i.-xii., Apostle), the second the inner or private ministry (xiii.-xxi., High Priest). Both sections begin with a reference to "His own". "He came to His own, and His own received Him not." "Having loved His own that were in the world, He loved them unto the end." Here in this thirteenth chapter we see the Apostle and High Priest.

> "Jesus knowing . . . . . that He was COME FROM GOD"—The Apostle.
> "And WENT TO GOD"—The High Priest.

This is repeated in the wonderful seventeenth chapter:--

> "Jesus Christ, whom Thou hast SENT"—The Apostle.
> "I am no more in the world . . . . . I COME TO Thee"—The High Priest.

The fact that Christ was the sent one is the burden of the Gospel. It is aionian life to recognize Him as the sent one (xvii. 3). The disciples are marked by the knowledge that Christ was the sent one (8). The oneness of the Father, the Son, and the saint, so marvelously indicated in verse 21, is with the object that the world might believe that the Father sent Christ. This is repeated with the added words, all reminding us of Heb. ii., "That they may be perfected into one, and that the world may know that Thou hast sent Me".

It was no new thought to the Hebrews that Messiah should be the Apostle, or the sent One. In Isa. xlviii. 16; and lxi. 1 the Hebrew equivalent is used. According to Isa. xix. 20 the exodus from Egypt is to be repeated: "He shall send them a saviour, and a great one, and He shall deliver them. And the Lord shall be known to Egypt". Moses was evidently a "sent one".

> "Come now therefore, and I will send thee unto Pharaoh."
> "This shall be a token unto thee, that I have sent thee."
> "I AM hath sent me unto you."
> "The Lord God of your fathers, the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob, hath sent me unto you" (Exod. iii. 10, 12, 14, 15).

It is possible that Moses had the promised Messiah in view when he said to the Lord, "Send now I pray Thee by the hand of him whom Thou wilt send" (Exod. iv. 13). The immediate result of this continued hesitancy on the part of Moses is the mention of Aaron, destined to be the High Priest. Moses apparently forfeited this office, and instead of his holding the office both of Apostle and High Priest this was now to be shared with his brother. Great as Moses was, and great as every Jew held him to be, all must confess that know the truth that He who combined the two offices in His one Person was greater. Thus it is that Moses is introduced in chapter iii. Christ has already been seen greater than angels. He is now seen greater than Moses: then greater than Joshua, greater than Aaron, and greater than all the offerings of the law.

Christ is here called the Apostle and High Priest of our "profession". What is the idea contained in the word "profession"? (homologia). Hebrews uses the word three times:--

> "The Apostle and High Priest of our profession" (iii. 1).
> "Let us hold fast our profession" (iv. 14).
> "Let us hold fast the profession of our faith" (x. 23).

Seeing that it is the profession of faith, the word indicates something which is subsequent to faith, parallel with "the things which accompany salvation". We view Christ here not as Redeemer, but as Apostle and High Priest of our profession. This profession is further illustrated by the use of the cognate homologeö.

> "These all died in faith, not having received the promises, but having seen them afar off, and were persuaded of them, and embraced them, and CONFESSED that they were strangers and pilgrims on the earth" (Heb. xi. 13).
> "Let us go forth therefore unto Him, without the camp, bearing His reproach. For here we have no continuing city, but we seek one to come. By Him therefore let us offer the sacrifice of praise to God continually, that is, the fruit of our lips CONFESSING to His Name" (Heb. xiii. 15).

Here the two references emphasize the stranger and pilgrim character of this profession of which Christ was Apostle and High Priest. For this other-worldly character see I Tim. vi. 12, 13:--

> "Fight the good fight of faith (fight = same word "race" in Heb. xii. 1) . . . . . and hast professed a good profession before many witnesses (witnesses=same word as Heb. xii. 1) . . . . . Christ Jesus, who testified before Pontius Pilate the good confession."

It is evident by the balance of the words that the "good fight" is parallel with the "good confession"; and seeing that the "fight" is the same as the "race" of Heb. xii., the titles "Apostle and High Priest of our profession", and "The Captain and Perfecter of faith", have much in common. As the Captain He was the Apostle, the Sent One. As the Perfecter, He was the High Priest, who went back to God. The "profession" being the profession of "faith" is another view of the particular aspect of faith exhibited in Heb. xi.; in other words the whole theme revolves around the idea of pilgrim walk and perfecting. The holy brethren are exhorted to "consider" Christ as the Apostle and High Priest of their profession. In close association with the final reference (x. 23) recurs the word "consider". This time however the exhortation is to "consider one another" in view of the approaching day. These holy brethren are addressed as "partakers of the heavenly calling".

A superficial exposition, which is ever ready to seize upon some verse to refute "Ultra-dispensationalism", whatever that may mean, says:--

> "Here is the same word that is used in Ephesians, therefore the Hebrews were members of the One Body, and the whole dispensational distinction is exploded."

Readers of The Berean Expositor know full well that the peculiar and exclusive character of the dispensation of the mystery rests upon positive Scripture (e.g., Eph. iii.) and not inference, and further that the words of Eph. i. 3, 20; ii. 6; iii. 10; and vi. 12, have a special feature to be found nowhere else—but this we leave.

It is essentially in harmony with the perfecting of the pilgrim character, that those addressed should be called "partakers of the heavenly calling", and that heavenly calling needs no further exposition than is given in Hebrews itself to make its scope and position clear to us.

"Heavenly."

A | Partakers.—Now.
  a | iii. 1. Partakers of heavenly calling. Christ not ashamed.
    b | vi. 4. Partakers of holy spirit.
  B | Place. The Tabernacle.
    c | viii. 5. The shadow of heavenly things.
      d | ix. 23. The heavenly things themselves.
A | Partakers.—Then.
  a | xi. 16. The better country--a heavenly, God not ashamed.
    b | xii. 22. The heavenly Jerusalem (Holy City).

If we trace the teaching associated with this word, we are led on through participation of the "gifts", which were anticipations of the world to come (vi.), and from the shadow to the real tabernacle "heaven itself", to the heavenly country, and heavenly Jerusalem. Heb. xii. 18-21 speaks of Moses, verses 22, 24 of "Jesus, the mediator of the new covenant". Connected with the latter is the perfecting of those who were sanctified. There we see them, "the church of the firstborn, which are written in heaven". These are associated with "the spirits of perfect righteous ones" and the "innumerable company of angels". How any can confuse such a description with the Right hand of God far above all principality and power is beyond our understanding. So far as we are concerned we see a decided difference and keep it so.

It was the consciousness of this "heavenly calling" that supported Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, enabling them to "confess that they were strangers and pilgrims on the earth". As we have pointed out before, there is a close parallel of principle between Hebrews and Philippians, and the consciousness of the "high calling" in Phil. iii. enables the believer there to count all things loss, and make the same confession of faith.

Let us remember what is connected with "confessing to His name" (Heb. xiii. 13-16) and the many passages which link suffering with future glory.

The Hope and the Prize.

(Second Series).

#1. A consideration of the circumstances of the times of "Philippians" with those of to-day. "The Handicap."

pp. 21 - 24

Many exercised believers have felt how exceedingly slender is their likelihood of attaining to the standard set before them in the epistle to the Philippians. This is well, for in direct connection with the theme of race and crown the apostle concludes: "Let him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall". There is, however, a great difference between a due recognition of our frailty and a spirit of despondency. God has also appended to the theme of the race and the crown a second conclusion:--

> "There hath no trial taken you except what is common to man, but God is faithful, who will not suffer you to be tempted above that which you are able, but will with the temptation also make the end, that you may be able to bear up under it" (I Cor. x. 13).

As we read the epistle to the Philippians, we become conscious that the atmosphere and the conditions under which the church at Philippi were exhorted to seek the prize differ in many essential features from those obtaining to-day. While the epistle is not addressed to the church as such but to the saints in Christ Jesus, we must not dismiss as of no account the remaining words of the address, "with the bishops and deacons".

The church of the One Body holds the Head and each single member of that body as a joint or band should minister the one to the other; there is no such thing within that body as the distinction between clergy and laity. Those who were bishops and deacons were men specially qualified to help the church, particularly in the matter of "teaching" and "taking care of" the church of God (I Tim. iii.). No church could be anything but better for having such men as described in that chapter, and the Philippians, being blessed with such, possessed great advantages over the individual believer of to-day.

There is also a strong emphasis upon the collective effort of the saints in the epistle to the Philippians. The apostle himself thanks God for their fellowship in the gospel, and tells them that in his bonds and in the defence and confirmation of the gospel they all were partakers of his grace (Phil. i. 6, 7). Even though the personal desire of the apostle was "to depart and be with Christ", yet he chose the alternative of remaining with the believers "for their furtherance and joy of faith". What this must have meant in the way of example and encouragement we can only dimly surmise. These Philippians were exhorted to "stand fast in one spirit, with one mind striving together for the faith of the gospel" (i. 27). They were exhorted to have the same love and to be of one accord (ii. 2, iv. 1, 2). Prisoner though the apostle was, and isolated as he always must have been, yet he can rejoice in Epaphroditus not only as a "brother". But also as a fellow-worker, and fellow-soldier.

Further, Epaphroditus was a link between the apostle and the Philippians, for he was also "your messenger". When the apostle urged the Philippians to follow his example he could use the word "become fellow-imitators of me" (iii. 17). The emphasis upon fellowship in this epistle is worth noticing:--

Sugkoinõnēsas.	"To have fellowship" (iv. 4).
Sugkoinõnõs.	"Fellow partakers" (i. 7).
Sugchairos.	"To rejoice together" (ii. 17, 18).
Sunzugos.	"Yoke fellow" (iv. 3).
Sullambano.	"Assist together" (iv. 3).
Summimētas.	"Fellow imitators" (iii. 17).
Summorphos.	"Conformity" (iii. 21).
Summorphizomai.	"To be conformed" (iii. 10).
Sumpsuchos.	"Equal soul" (i1. 2).
Sunstratiõtēs.	"Fellow soldier" (ii. 25).

Here is fellowship in suffering, in labour, in joy and in spirit, here the apostle and the Philippians together could press on the pathway of victory.

We now pause for a moment to remember that in the correspondence observable between the four prison epistles II Timothy echoed Philippians. Let us turn to that epistle to learn of any charge that may have come over the external circumstances of the subject of the Prize. Let us begin with a further tabulation of the words which introduce the idea of fellowship:--

Suzaõ.	"To live together" (II Tim. ii. 11).
Sunapothnēskõ.	"To die together" (II Tim. ii. 11).

Here we have two references only, which have nothing to do with the subject, as they refer to the position of the believer by grace, without reference to the question of the subsequent faithfulness, service or reward. It is evident that the atmosphere of II Timothy is essentially different from that of Philippians. Here isolation and a solitary fight is more the condition. Let us trace this as we did the fellowship in Philippians. First of all there are no bishops and deacons addressed. While rule characterizes the first epistle to Timothy, with its reference to behaviour in the church of God, bishops, deacons, the place of women in the assembly, widows, etc., ruin (as far as corporate testimony is concerned) is the characteristic of the second epistle:--

> "This thou knowest, that ALL they which are in ASIA be turned away from me" (i. 15).

The house of Onesiphorous stands out as a blessed exception (II Tim. i. 16-18). Timothy also must take this separate stand:--

> "If a man therefore purge himself from these (false teachers), he shall be a vessel unto honour, sanctified, and meet for the Master's use, and prepared unto every good work" (II Tim. ii. 21).

Timothy's fellowship is to be with "those that call on the Lord out of a pure heart". Serious opposition to the truth is predicted (ii. 25, 26), culminating in the "last days" with a "form of godliness"; "from such", continues the apostle, "turn away". The charge which he gives to Timothy in the fourth chapter points essentially to a lonely and isolated stand:--

> "Preach the Word, be instant in season, out of season…….for the time will come when they will not endure sound doctrine…….they shall turn away their ears from the truth, and shall be turned unto fables" (II Tim. iv. 2-4).

Still the loneliness continues:--

> "Do thy diligence to come shortly unto me, for Demas HATH FORSAKEN ME…….only Luke is with me…….bring the cloak and the books, especially the parchments…….at my first defence NO MAN stood with me, but all FORSOOK me" (II Tim. iv. 9-22).

The second epistle suits the period in which we live. Churches there are by the thousand, but, in spite of all that the votaries of each peculiar assembly may bring forward, the true church has disappeared from the face of the earth. All the existing assemblies from the great apostate church, down through every grade and variety of connection with, or separation from, this world's patronage, manifested in the presence of every variety of ministry or in its absence, in the claim to gifts or the denial of them, in a plethora of ceremonies and observances as well as in their entire absence, no collective company of saints now represents the church. At best these companies provide convenient opportunities for testimony and worship, and association with the purest may often prove a snare.

Whereas the pathway for attaining to the Prize in the days of Philippians was one of blessed fellowship, the pathway to-day is one of blessed loneliness. The essentials of the conflict remain the same, and He who shall sit upon the Umpire's throne (the bema, the seat of the umpire at the races and athletic sports) alone knows the just and equal terms in which the handicap can be fixed; before therefore we can fully understand the scriptural teaching of The Hope and the Prize, the altered conditions of II Timothy must be studied. We therefore hope to turn our attention to this epistle which deals with the last and perilous days, so that the reader may not be left in uncertainty either as to the nature of the conflict, or the terms of its triumphs.

#2. The Prize and the Crown.
pp. 56 - 59

We noticed in a general way in our opening article the change that had come over the character of the testimony between the days of "Philippians" and those of "II Timothy", and suggested that this change may possibly influence the conditions relating to the prize. We will, before proceeding further, show that II Timothy deals with a similar phase of teaching to that of the epistle to the Philippians, and then we shall be able the better to compare or contrast the two sets of teaching.

The central thought of Philippians is expressed in the word Prize. While this word does not occur in II Timothy a close parallel nevertheless exists, to which we now draw attention. Timothy, in the early part of chapter ii., is addressed under three figures:--

The Soldier. The Athlete. The Husbandman.

THE SOLDIER.—The good soldier has not only to fight, but to "endure hardness" (ii. 3). What this hardness may involve verse 9 indicates, where the same word is used, "Wherein I suffered trouble as an evil doer, even unto bonds". Once again in this short epistle the apostle speaks to Timothy as to enduring hardness, "But watch thou in all things, endure afflictions, do the work of an evangelist" (iv. 5). The good soldier merges with the preacher in the case both of Paul (ii. 9) and Timothy (iv. 5).

The word "good" in ii. 3 is not agathos, but kalos. Three connected things are spoken of as kalos in this epistle:--

1. The special revelation of God's purpose entrusted to Paul (i. 14).
2. The servant of the Lord under the likeness of a soldier (ii. 3).
3. The contest, or race (see Heb. xii. 1, 2), rendered "fight" (iv. 7).

The good deposit. The good soldier. The good fight.

Here we have another link between the soldier and the preacher. This time we learn that the preaching is of a special character, and this helps us to understand something of the nature of the "hardness" which those who preach or teach this aspect of truth will have to endure.

The next item to observe in connection with the good soldier is given in ii. 4, "No man that warreth entangleth himself". The word emplekõ, through the Latin, gives us the English "implicate". This entanglement has to do "with the affairs of this life". Roman soldiers were not allowed to engage in commerce, and the apostle alludes to this fact here. The word "life" here is not zõē, but bios. Bios sometimes has the force of "the means of supporting life", "the livelihood".

"Even all her bios, her means of supporting life" (Mark xii. 44).
"Had spent all her bios, living" (Luke viii. 43).
"He divided unto them his bios, living" (Luke xv. 12).
"Hath this world's bios, goods, means of living" (I John iii. 17).

While the believer must seek to provide things honest in the sight of all men, to provide for his own, to labour with his hands, etc., he must guard against any tendency to becoming "entangled". His wilderness experiences are to teach him that man doth NOT live by bread alone. The moment the means of livelihood entangle the believer he ceases to be a "good" soldier, and bids fair to lose in the "good" contest. A mistaken notion, largely spread by hymnology, is that every believer is of necessity a soldier of Christ. This is not the case. It is the last phase of ripe experience. It comes last in the epistle to the Ephesians (vi. 10-17).

THE ATHLETE.—The figure changes from a soldier to an athlete. "And if anyone contend in the games" (athleõ). This is a figure which the apostle has elaborated elsewhere:--

> "Know ye not that they which run in a race run all, but one receiveth the prize? So run that ye may obtain. And everyone that striveth for the mastery is temperate in all things…….lest…….I myself should become disapproved" (I Cor. ix. 24-27).

The closing word, wrongly translated "castaway", is echoed in II Tim. ii. 5. "He is not crowned, unless he contend lawfully." Any who have entered for a race, or engaged in sports, will know that no amount of prowess, skill or endurance can avail a competitor who does not "strive lawfully", or in modern terms, "breaks the rules".

THE HUSBANDMAN.—This third figure is introduced to emphasize the truth that the prize or the crown is the result of achievement. "The husbandman must first labour, before he can be a partaker of the fruits" (II Tim. ii. 6).

As to the comparison of the teaching of the two epistles, Philippians and II Timothy, we notice that whereas the word "soldier" does not occur in Philippians, FELLOW-soldier does (ii. 25). Athlete does not occur, but FELLOW-athletes does (i. 27; iv. 3). This word (sunathleõ) translated "striving together" and "laboured with" does not occur anywhere else. Here is an essential difference between the conditions under which the Prize and Crown might be obtained. Philippians abounds in fellowship, II Timothy is marked by loneliness. "Forsaken", "turned away from me", "no man stood by me"; these are the expressions we meet in II Timothy. Most believers who seek to hold the good deposit, the mystery, walk solitary paths. Since Philippians was written the contest has become one of solitary, individual, scattered combatants. "Striving together" does not represent the attitude now. It is for our encouragement and strengthening that we draw attention to this change. The Lord Who knows the case fully knows what is the handicap.

After having addressed Timothy, the apostle speaks next of himself. He suffers trouble, or endures hardness for the gospel. Not only so, he patiently endures all things "for the elects' sake", and that for a particular purpose, "that they may also obtain salvation, that which is in Christ Jesus, with aionian glory". What that special aspect of salvation may be, and what the accompany aionian glory means, is immediately explained:--

"It is a faithful saying; for if we died with Him, we shall also live with Him:
If we patiently endure, we shall ALSO REIGN with Him:
If we deny Him, He also will deny us:
If we believe not, yet He abideth faithful, He cannot deny Himself."

Here we have two subjects, allied, but distinct. The first is a question of dying and living. The second is a question of enduring and reigning. The one essential for LIFE is having died with Christ. Subsequent faithfulness cannot make that gift of grace more secure, and subsequent failure cannot remove us from the place that grace provides. The essential for REIGNING is patient endurance. Here, faithfulness and faithlessness count. Here, should we deny Him, He will deny us. The crown will be withheld, nevertheless, He abideth faithful, "saved so as by fire" will prove that to be true. For the sake of clearness we set out the theme as follows:--

II Tim. ii. 11-13.

A | Living with Christ.
B | Reigning with Christ.
B | "Reigning" may be denied. OUR faithfulness counts.
A | "Living" cannot be denied. HIS faithfulness alone counts.

External conditions change, but essential terms remain. We may not be able to draw up a sliding scale, nor would such a thing be tolerable, nevertheless it is a comfort to know that in these dark days, when the helpful guidance of true apostles, prophets, bishops and deacons is withdrawn, and the encouragement of standing shoulder to shoulder in the fight is no longer ours, that He who searches the reins and hearts can interpret the conditions with perfect accuracy. Paul calls Him "The Lord, the righteous Judge" in connexion with the "crown" to be bestowed "in that day".

#3. II Tim. ii. 15 a Separating Principle.
pp. 91 - 93

We noticed in our last article the distinction which is drawn between living, and reigning with Christ (II Tim. ii. 11, 12, 13). A few verses further on in the chapter the idea is repeated:--

"Nevertheless the foundation of God standeth sure, having this seal. The Lord knoweth them that are His. And let every one that nameth the name of Christ (some readings have "Lord") depart from iniquity" (19).

The good soldier must be clear from entanglement in the affairs of daily life, that he may please Him Who chose him to be a soldier. The athlete must observe the rules if he would gain the crown. The husbandman must labour before he can taste the fruits. The believer who would reign with Christ must patiently endure. So also on the foundation of God the seal is dual. Not only does it say, "The Lord knoweth them that are His", which is parallel with the words of verse 11, "If we died with Him, we shall also live with Him", but it further says, "Let every one that nameth the name of Christ depart from iniquity", which is parallel with the words of verse 12, "If we patiently endure, we shall also reign with Him". The words which are engraven upon this seal are found originally in a most solemn context.

There are three men whose sins are so characteristic of the last days that they are mentioned together by Jude, and separately in the first epistle of John and in the Revelation, viz., Cain, Balaam and Korah. Cain was of that wicked one and slew his brother, and is a type of the world, for the passage immediately adds, "marvel not if the world hate you" (I John iii. 12, 13). Balaam is linked with Jezebel and the profanities of the Apocalypse Beast. Jude connects three different items with these three men. "The WAY of Cain, the ERROR of Balaam, the GAINSAYING of Korah" (Jude 11). This element of opposition which attaches to the name of Korah is seen in II Tim. ii. 24, 25:--

> "The servant of the Lord must not strive, but be gentle unto all men, apt to teach, patiently bearing up under evil, in meekness instructing those that oppose themselves."

That is one kind of opposition. It is not hopeless for the verse concludes:--

> "If God peradventures will give them repentance to the acknowledging of the truth."

There is another more fatal kind of opposition indicated in the next chapter and associated with the perilous times of the last days. These are "ever learning and never able to come to a knowledge of the truth". These are likened to the Egyptian Magicians who withstood Moses. These resist the truth. These are connected with "a form of godliness", and there is nothing left for us to do but "from such turn away".

The reader may wonder what all this has to do with the seal set upon God's foundation. In Num. xvi. we have the record of Korah's rebellion. When Moses heard Korah's words he fell upon his face, and in his reply gives the first words of the seal:--

> "And he spake unto Korah, and unto all his company, saying, Even to-morrow the Lord will shew who are His" (5).

When the morrow came, and the dreadful decision was to be made, Moses gives the second part of the seal:--

> "Depart, I pray you, from the tents of these wicked men" (26).

This principle of departure not only applies to those like Korah, and those who have merely the form of godliness, it also applies in modified form to believers. This we find in the words that immediately follow in II Tim. ii. 20:--

> "But in a great house there are not only vessels of gold and of silver, but also of wood and of earthenware; and some on the one hand for honour, and some on the other hand for no honour."

First let us be clear on this point. All the vessels are in the one great house. They are all the property of the One Master. In doctrinal words they are all saved, and are found in verse 11. Some however are unto honour, while others are unto no honour. The word

"dishonour" is too strong. Simple lack of honour is the meaning. Some vessels will be specially delightful to the Master. These will be at His hand on the table. Others will never have the honour of His smile, they never leave the kitchen or the scullery. The Apostle now applies his figure—

> "If a man therefore will thoroughly purify himself from these things (of verses 16-18, 22, 23), he shall be a vessel unto honour, having been sanctified and meet for the Master's use, and prepared unto every good work" (21).

The "profane and vain babblings" (ii. 16), and the "foolish and unlearned questions" (ii. 23), must be "shunned", and avoided. Equally emphatic is the first epistle to Timothy. "Refuse profane and old wives' fables, and exercise thyself rather unto godliness" (I Tim. iv. 7). The reason for this care is revealed in the two remaining quotations:--

> "Neither give heed to fables and interminable genealogies, which minister questions, rather than a DISPENSATION OF GOD (see texts) that is by faith" (I Tim. i. 4).

This passage by giving the later reading shows the seriousness of the charge, the next particularizes what that dispensation of God is:--

> "O, Timothy, keep that which is committed to thy trust, avoiding profane and vain babblings, and oppositions of that falsely named gnõsis (knowledge)" (I Tim. vi. 20).

What that is that was committed to Timothy we must look into later. One more word is needed here. In II Tim. ii. 14 there is a reference to striving about words and subverting the hearers. In verse 16 there is the command to shun the profane and vain babblings. These, as we have seen, are a special snare set for the believer who seeks to maintain the truth of the mystery. Verses 14 and 16 speak of the danger to be avoided; what does verse 15 say? Here we read the positive and contrastive statement:--

> "Study to shew thyself approved unto God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth."

Not a FELLOW-workman, as in Phil. iv. 3, just as there is no fellow-soldier, or fellow-wrestler. All is individual. If we would be "approved" (the positive of the word used by Paul and translated "castaway" in I Cor. ix.), if we would be "unashamed", if we would be "unto honour", if we would "strive lawfully" and so be "crowned", then here is the great separating principle. Rightly to divide the word of truth. This will mean conflict. It will rouse opposition. It will call for patient endurance, but it leads to salvation WITH AIONIAN GLORY.

#4. The Arena (II Tim. iii. 1-13).
pp. 123 - 125

The Philippians contested for the Prize in the midst of "a crooked and perverse generation" (ii. 15), and had adversaries who would seek to terrify them, who would judge their very evidence of salvation as so many "tokens of perdition" (i. 28). The Hebrews, as they ran the race set before them, "endured a great fight of afflictions", and "took joyfully the spoiling of their goods" (Heb. x. 32-35).

Those whose conditions and circumstances fit the times for which II Timothy has been written have their unpeculiar trials which are given as special chapter to their unfolding (II Tim. iii.). The first item that contributes to the afflictions and hardness which must be endured arises out of the state of the "seasons" of these last days. The word translated "perilous" occurs in but one other place, viz., Matt. viii. 28, where it is rendered "fierce", and describes the state of men "possessed of DEMONS". The apostle, in I Tim. iv. 1, had already written:--

> "Now the Spirit speaketh expressly, that in latter seasons, some will apostatize from the faith, giving heed to deceiving spirits and DOCTRINES OF DEMONS."

Demon possession having come, its character begins to shew itself, "Fierce seasons will have set in". The remarkable growth of spiritism and the many doctrines preached and believed in the churches for which no basis exists in the Word of God indicate that these "fierce" times are upon us. The moral state produced by these doctrines is given, and for all who would seek to live godly in such a time nothing but persecution can be expected.

> "For men shall be philautoi (self lovers), philarguroi (money lovers)……. aphilagathoi (without love for good)…….philēdonoi (pleasure lovers) more than philotheoi (lovers of God)" (II Tim. iii. 2-4).

The list of characteristics begins and ends with a reference to love. It is punctuated by love of money, no love of good, and love of pleasures. If love be the fulfilling of the law (Rom. xiii. 8-10), yea, the first and great commandment of the law (Matt. xxii. 34, 40), then these words characterize lawless times. If in the blessed three, faith, hope, and love, love is the greatest, if love never faileth, then these loveless times have lost their very salt and are fit for nothing but trampling under feet.

Love is the supreme test. Instead of God comes self; instead of His glory comes money; instead of His service comes pleasure. All the other awful things mentioned, such as "boasters, proud, blasphemers", can all be resolved unto a lack of or misdirection of love. The whole position is summed up in verse 5:--

> "Having a FORM of godliness, but denying the power thereof."

If those who hold the mystery of the faith could do so with a compromising conscience, no doubt their path would be fairly easy; but obedience to the injunction which immediately follows, "from such TURN AWAY", brings down upon them the wrath of a condemned Christendom. Christendom has long since "turned away" from Paul and his divine commission (II Tim. i. 15) and is about to be turned away from the truth unto fables (II Tim. iv. 4). There can be no compromise with such—the "turning away" is mutual. We have to discriminate between two kinds of opposition:--

> "In meekness instructing those that oppose themselves; if God peradventure will give them repentance to the full knowledge, epignõsis, of the truth" (II Tim. ii. 25).

These are believers who from ignorance, prejudice or the bondage of tradition oppose themselves.

> "Ever learning and never able to come to a full knowledge, epignõsis, of the truth. Now as Jannes and Jambres withstood Moses, so do these also resist the truth; men of corrupt minds, disapproved concerning the faith" (II Tim. iii. 7, 8).

The magicians of Pharaoh were demon worshippers (I Cor. x. 20) and such demon-possessed resistance calls for a different attitude on the part of the soldier of Christ.

We are now ready to understand the teaching of Eph. vi. 10-19. The soldier there described wrestles with "spiritual wickedness" and the armour is to be particularly taken in view of "the evil day", which evil day II Tim. iii. declares to be upon us. Further, the Prize or the Crown is in view, for the word of verse 13 "having done all" is literally "having worked out all", the very words used in Phil. ii. 12 and II Cor. iv. 17. The apostle refers Timothy to that period of his ministry when he worked quite independently of the twelve.

> "Persecutions, afflictions, which came unto me at Antioch, at Iconium, at Lystra; what persecutions I endured; but out of them all the Lord delivered me" (II Tim. iii. 11).

He then adds the words which included Timothy and every succeeding generation of faithful ones, "Yea, and all who will to live godly in Christ Jesus shall suffer persecution" (verse 12).

> "Evil men and impostors (jugglers—a synonym for magicians and so balancing Jannes and Jambres) shall wax worse and worse" (II Tim. iii. 13).

To protest against the popular doctrine of demons that the world is getting better, that a millennium brought about by education, sanitation, and human evolution is coming, will be asking for reproach and scorn. Such false teachers will progress, deceiving and being deceived, until truth is entirely exchanged for the lie, fables will take the place of inspired Scripture, and the voice of faith will be like one crying in the wilderness. Such is the arena in which the contest is set for these last days. The whole world deceived and blinded by demons and their teaching; resisting the truth, and unable to grasp it; having but a form of godliness, a very Babylon out of which God calls His own, and then persecution, affliction, reproach, scorn, until the Lord comes and the conflict ceases in His Presence.

The "evil day" of Eph. vi. is upon us. Praise God for the "whole armour of God" wherein we may stand conscious that we are more than conquerors in Him Who loved us.

#5. The Weapon (II Tim. iii. 14-17).
pp. 156 - 158

"BUT CONTINUE."—With these words the apostle turns to Timothy as he warns of the evil days to come. The deceivers will "make progress" even as their "profane and vain babblings" will "make progress unto more ungodliness" (ii. 16). Now just as ii. 16 is in sharp contrast with the command rightly to divide the word of truth (ii. 15), so iii. 13 is in sharp contrast with the rightly divided word itself (iii. 14). Timothy is to:-- > "Continue in the things which he had learned and had been assured of, knowing FROM WHOM he had learned them, and that from a child he had known the Holy Scriptures" (iii. 14, 15).

The one weapon in the complete armour of God is "the sword of the Spirit, which is the Word of God" (Eph. vi. 17). "It is written" overthrew the tempter in the wilderness. The "word of their testimony" ranked next to the "blood of the Lamb" as the overcoming power of the conquerors in Rev. xii. While the world makes its so-called "progress", the believer stand fast to the Word. Such an attitude is unscientific, it is behind the times, it does not fit in with the ever-broadening tendency. As the "image" nears its final phase, "but continue" is our watchword. That in which the believer is to continue is twofold.

THE SCRIPTURESS.—The apostle links his own special teaching which Timothy had learned with the Scriptures. In chapter iv. Timothy is charged to preach the word. This word is in iii. 15, 16 called the holy scriptures. The word "scripture" in iii. 16 is graphē, meaning that which is written. The words "given by inspiration of God" represent the one word Theopneustos = "God-breathed". This is the temper of the steel of our one weapon; it is without alloy. Divine inspiration is predicated not of some scriptures, but of ALL. Moses was an historical person; Sinai was a fact; Adam and Eve dwelt in a literal garden eastward in Eden; Noah actually lived and built an ark on dry land; Abraham literally was the father of Israel. If the last piece of the Christian armoury be the sword of the Spirit, the first piece is the girdle of truth.

A further item of importance concerning Scripture is that there is no interval for human interference between the Divine utterance and the human record. "All (written) Scripture is God-breathed." It is not that Isaiah, after a vision, pondered its meaning, worked himself up to a pitch of excitement and translated the disorders of his time into a far-fetched dream of Messianic deliverance. The written record that "He was despised and rejected of men" is that which God said. Acts i. 16 is a valuable example of the truth of II Tim. iii. 16, "This Scripture…….which the Holy Ghost by the mouth of David spake". The mouth was David's, the words were God's. Then observe the range of these same Scriptures. They are able to make wise unto salvation. They are profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness. They are essential for the perfecting and outfitting of the man of God.

Notice the two extremes that meet together at the Word of God. The "child" (brephos, the newly-born babe), is made wise unto salvation; the "man of God" is thoroughly equipped for service—both by the self-same Word. The Scriptures are equally powerful as an instrument of salvation (iii. 15) as they are for the utmost demand of service (iii. 17), and fill all the interval of doctrine and correction that either and all may need. The apostle here links the special teaching which he gave to Timothy with the Divinely inspired Scriptures. "Let another praise thee" saith the Word. Now note what Peter declares. He says:--

> "No prophecy of the Scripture is of its own unfolding, for the prophecy came not in old time by the will of man; but holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost" (II Pet. i. 20, 21).

That is Peter's conception of "Scripture". Now hear his testimony to Paul:--

> "Even as our beloved brother Paul…….hath written unto you…….which they that are unlearned and unstable wrest, as they do also THE OTHER SCRIPTURE" (iii. 15, 16).

Paul's writings are ranked by Peter with the other Scriptures which were not produced by the will of man but by God. When Paul drew Timothy's attention to his own special set of Scriptures, he was but reiterating the message of II Tim. ii. 15. While all Scripture is inspired, it needs to be rightly divided to obtain the truth for the times. This takes us back to the earlier utterance in chapter i. 13, 14:--

> "Have a draft of sound words, which thou didst hear FROM ME…….The good deposit do thou guard."

So in chapter ii. 2, when speaking of apostolic succession [evangelist (iv. 5), teachers (ii. 2)], the apostle emphasizes his special teaching:--

> "The things which thou hast heard FROM ME by many witnesses, these things deposit (see i. 14 parathēkē and parathou) among faithful men, who shall be competent to teach others also."

If we would have a weapon that will never fail, it must come from the armoury of Scripture, and if we would fight the good fight, stem the tide, and be unashamed in that day, then we must firmly grasp the special revelation committed to the apostle Paul, taught by him to Timothy, and in turn passed on down the age to the feeble company who still perceive some of its glory and grace. If we would "strive lawfully", we shall "rightly divide the Word". The Word contains rules for more contests than those into which we are called, and to mis-apply these various conditions spells shame and failure.

If the times are perilous, or fierce, we have a sure word for our evangel and our hope. Let us hold fast the faithful word in this day of darkness, looking for that blessed hope.

#6. The Crown Won.
pp. 185 - 187

"The crown. . . . .for all that love His appearing" (II Tim. iv. 8).

These words epitomize the great condition in view of the crown. Taken alone, they may not appear to teach more than a belief in the second coming of Christ. Taken in connection with the teaching of the whole epistle they say much more.

We observed that a misplaced love marks the last days—love of self, love of money, love of pleasure. The love of His appearing is in entire contrast to this. A person may believe the doctrine of the "pre-millennial advent", and love self, or love money, or love pleasure; but if he receives "the LOVE of the truth", if he "loves", not a doctrine, but the Personal epiphany of Christ, he will ipso facto be placed outside the pale of modernism, and will be called upon to endure hardness. If the believer seeks in any small measure to stand hardness. If the believer seeks in any small measure to stand in the breach and preach the Word committed by Paul to Timothy, he will learn that one great part of his qualification will be the grace to "endure afflictions" (iv. 5).

In II Tim. iv. 6 the apostle uses the two peculiar words of Philippians. For the sake of clearness let us repeat them:--

Philippians.	II Timothy.
i. 23. "Having a desire to depart and be with Christ."	iv. 6. "The time for my departure has come."
ii. 17. "If I be offered upon the sacrifice and service of your faith."	iv. 6. "I am now ready to be offered."

What he was willing for in Philippians has arrived in II Tim. iv. He summarizes his course. In Philippians he had to say, "Not as though I had obtained". In II Tim. iv. he says:--

> "The good fight I have fought, the race I have finished, the faith I have guarded; it remains that there is laid up for me the crown of righteousness which the Lord the righteous Judge will give me in that day and not to me only, but also to all those who love His appearing."

The crown follows the finishing of the race. The race will be finished, the faith will be guarded, the contest will be carried through by all who love His appearing. Practical righteousness flowing out of imputed righteousness stands on the side of the risen yet rejected Lord. Practical righteousness will not go hand in hand with lawlessness, will not share the platform with "doctrines of demons" or "fables", but will lay aside every weight and run the race set before it. This "appearing" is more fully set forth in Titus ii. 11-15, and is the hope of the one body (Col. iii. 4). Phil. i. looks on to this same day, when it says, "That ye may approve the things that are excellent (parallel with II Tim. ii. 15), that ye may be sincere and without offence till the day of Christ" (i. 10).

While the prize of Phil. iii., "the out-resurrection out from the dead", is not mentioned by name in II Tim., the fact that Paul repeats the words of Phil. i. 23 and ii. 17, and summarizes with confidence his contest and race inclines one to feel that he stood in no doubt concerning that for which he forgot all that was behind, and counted all as loss, "if by any means" he might attain to it.

The prize and the crown are to be distinguished. The former is defined as "being with Christ" and attaining to a special resurrection from the dead. The latter is not awarded until "that day" which is still future. Nevertheless they are to be viewed together. Not all who will attain to the crown will necessarily have also reached the prize, but the one is a step to the other. The difference is rather one of degree than kind. We are not edified by an undue curiosity into these things which Scripture has not enlarged upon; we do well to observe the special conditions under which we labour, notice the weapon which is provided us, set our hearts upon that day of His appearing in glory, and leave both prize and crown with that One who is called "The Righteous Judge".

We do not pretend to have exhausted the theme. A few indications of the changed environment that now obtains from what existed when Philippians was written is all that we undertook to show. This was done with a desire to help those who may have felt that the increasing difficulties and the decreasing aids, the failure of corporate testimony, and the lonely battle, made the case hopeless. We direct such to II Timothy that they may see their position and take courage.

It is not possible for any one of us to decide either for ourselves or for others as to the possibility or the probability of having attained either prize or crown. The best thing is humility. To reckon that we are not yet perfected, and for the love of the truth press on.

> "Not for weight of glory, not for crown or palm > Enter we the army, raise the warrior's psalm.
> But for love that claimeth lives for whom He died."

The Eight Signs of John's Gospel.

#1. The Purpose of their Selection.

pp. 1 - 5

We have recently concluded a short series of articles on the Miracles of the Gospel of Matthew, and at this point it might be useful to examine the "signs" of John's Gospel before taking up a fresh theme.

John never employs the word dunamis = "mighty work", and only once uses the word Teras = "wonder" or "miracle" (John iv. 48), where it is linked with "signs". Semeion (sign) is the word which John uses in his Gospel, and which again in another form meets us in the opening words of the Apocalypse—"He sent and SIGNified it". We are not to look at the signs recorded by John as exhibitions of power, but rather to seek to discover what they signify. That there is a designed selection is evident, for the six of the eight are not recorded by Matthew, Mark or Luke. Further, while eight are recorded, John bears testimony that "many other signs truly did Jesus in the presence of His disciples, which are not written in this book" (xx. 30, xxi. 25). We are not left in doubt as to the inspired purpose for which these eight signs recorded, for John himself gives the fullest explanation:--

> "But these are written, that ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that believing ye might have life through His name" (xx. 31).

The eight signs recorded, therefore, are set before us with this twofold object, and not these signs only but practically every sentence in the narrative is written either to give some further detail concerning the person of Christ as the Son of God, or to show the nature of believing and receiving life or rejecting and passing into condemnation. The Companion Bible in Appendix 176 sets out in very full detail the correspondence which exists between these different signs. The reader is referred to that for details; a mere summary of the structure must suffice us here:--

The Eight Signs.

A | ii. 1-11. THE MARRIAGE IN CANA.—The third day. No wine. Glory manifested.
  B | iv. 46-50. THE RULER'S SON.—After two days. At the point of death.
    C | v. 1-47. THE IMPOTENT MAN.—Pool Bethesda. 38 years. Sabbath. Sin.
      D | vi. 1-14. THE FEEDING OF THE FIVE THOUSAND.—Many went back.
      D | vi. 15-21. THE WALKING ON THE SEA.—Many of the people believed.
    C | ix. 1-44. THE MAN BORN BLIND.—Pool Siloam. From birth. Sabbath. Sin.
  B | xi. 1.44. THE SISTERS' BROTHER.—Two days. Lazarus is dead.
A | xxi. 1-14. THE DRAUGHT OF FISHES.—The third time. No meat. Lord magnified.

It is important to remember that the Gospel of John is divided into two sections, each commencing with a reference to "His own":--

1. "He came to His own, and His own received Him not" (i. 11).
2. "Jesus having loved His own…..loved them unto the end" (xiii. 1).

The first twelve chapters are devoted to His public ministry, which ended in rejection. Then public ministry ceases, and the Lord spends the time instructing His own. The signs are restricted to the first twelve chapters, with the one exception which occurs after His resurrection. Besides this the occurrences of the word semeion are restricted also. Of the seventeen occurrences sixteen occur between chapters ii. and xii., the remaining occurrence being at xx. 30. The effect of the signs is traced through these twelve chapters, and the effect—reception or rejection—is repeatedly given:-- > "Many believed in His name, when they saw the signs which He did" (ii. 23).

>
> "Rabbi, we know that Thou art a teacher come from God: for no man can do these signs that Thou doest, except God be with Him" (iii. 2).
>
> "When they had seen the sign…..they said, This is of a truth that prophet that should come into the world" (vi. 14).
>
> "Many of the people believed on Him and said, When the Messiah cometh, will He do more signs than these which this Man hath done?"

The last three references before the end of the public witness are sad in their revelation of the open-eyed denials of the rulers of Israel:--

> "Then gathered the chief priests and the Pharisees a council, and said, What do we? For this man doeth many signs, if we let Him thus alone, all men will believe on Him…….then from that day forth they took counsel together for to put Him to death" (xi. 47-53).
>
> "For this cause the people also met Him, for that they heard that He had done this sign; the Pharisees therefore said among themselves, Perceive ye how ye prevail nothing? Behold the world is gone after Him" (xii. 18, 19).
>
> "But though He had done so many signs before them, YET THEY BELIEVED NOT ON HIM" (xii. 37).

Then follows the quotation from Isa. vi., parallel with the reciting of the quotation in Matt. xiii. and Acts xxviii., viz., rejection.

In accordance with the purpose for which they are recorded, these eight signs are linked up very intimately with the whole book, while the record is divided into compartments that emphasize the lessons for us in a graphic manner. Before the fist sign is recorded comes the wonderful introduction of chapter i. Its testimony that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, is as unique as it is emphatic. We believe the true reading of John i. 13 to be "Who was born", referring to Christ, not "which were born" referring to the believer (see The Companion Bible, in loco). Christ was the One Who was born not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God. Se verse 14 continues, "and the Word was made flesh and tabernacled among us, and we beheld His glory"—what kind of glory? Kingly? Priestly? No, "the glory AS OF THE ONLY BEGOTTEN from beside the Father, full of true grace". The witness of John the Baptist is given with great clearness:--

> "I knew Him not, but that He should be made manifest to Israel therefore am I come baptizing with water…….and I saw and bare record that THIS IS THE SON OF GOD" (29-34).

The testimony of Andrew is next given: "we have found THE MESSIAH" (41). Nathaniel concludes the witness of the chapter with the words, "Rabbi, Thou art the Son of God" (49). Then comes the first sign. Immediately before the second sign comes the meeting of the Lord with the woman of Samaria. What is her testimony?

> "I know that Messiah cometh…….Jesus saith unto her, I that speak unto thee, I AM HE…….The woman saith to the men, Come, see a man which told me all things that ever I did, IS NOT THIS THE CHRIST?…….Now we believe not because of thy saying, for we have heard Him ourselves, and know that this is indeed the Christ the Saviour of the world" (John iv. 25-42).

Then follow the second and third signs. The third sign is followed by bitter opposition. What was the chief feature of the opposition? Not only was it because the Lord had healed the man on the Sabbath day (v. 16), but "because He not only had broken the Sabbath, but said also that GOD WAS HIS FATHER, making Himself equal with God". In the verses that follow, the word "Son" with reference to Christ occurs no less than ten times, and the Father thirteen times. Between the central pair, the fourth and fifth signs, come the words, "This is of a truth that prophet that should come into the world" (vi. 14). At the conclusion of the controversy which follows the fifth sign stand Peter's memorable words:--

> "We believe and are sure that Thou art that Christ, the Son of the living God" (vi. 69).

The crowd voices the common feeling in chapter vii.:--

> "Do the rulers know indeed that this is the very Christ? Howbeit when Christ cometh, will He do more signs than these which this Man hath done?…….Of a truth this is the prophet; others said, This is the Christ…….there was a division among the people because of Him" (26, 31, 40, 41, 43).

Chapter viii. concludes with the stupendous claim of Christ, "before Abraham was I AM". Then comes the sixth sign. The gradual illumination of the blind man's heart and mind is beautifully set forth in the record. His first confession was, "He is a prophet" (ix. 17). As a result of his loyalty to the Lord who had blessed him "they cast him out". Jesus heard that they had cast him out, and when He had found him He said unto him, "Dost thou believe on the Son of God?" We might have expected anything but this, some word of sympathy, some word of cheer, but no, the Lord of life desires this soul to believe and live:--

> "He answered and said, Who is He, that I might believe on Him? And Jesus said unto him, Thou hast both seen Him and it is He that talketh with thee; and he said, Lord, I believe; and he worshipped Him."

The last sign before rejection now draws near, and the Jews come to the Lord and say, "If Thou be the Christ, tell us plainly"; as a result of His answer we read:--

> "Then the Jews took up stones again to stone him…….for blasphemy; and because that Thou, being a man, makest Thyself God…….because I said I am the Son of God" (x. 24-42).

The seventh sign contains Martha's confession:--

"I believe that Thou art the Christ, the Son of God, which should come into the world."

and ends with the plot against the Lord's life. With the next chapter the first part of John's gospel concludes, testifying to the blindness of Israel's heart and to the glorious person Who had been so fully set forth as the Son of God; for when Isaiah beheld the Lord sitting upon a throne, high and lifted up, before whom the Seraphim veiled their faces as they cried, "Holy, Holy, Holy, Jehovah of hosts", the Scripture declares that "These things, said Isaiah, when he saw His glory, and spake of Him" (xii. 41).

A long interval comes between the seventh and eighth signs. The great High-Priestly prayer of John xvii., where come the words, "glorify Thy Son", still sustains the theme. Even the choice of Barabbas emphasizes it, for the name means "son of a father". When Pilate declared that he found no fault in Christ, the Jews answered him:--

"We have a law, and by our law He ought to die, because He made Himself the Son of God."

Thomas's belated but full confession immediately precedes the final sign—"My Lord and my God".

Such is the setting of these signs. May every reader experience the joy of faith, as we behold this wondrous record of the Father, and increasingly seek to honour the Son as we honour the Father, for He is worthy.

#2. The Marriage in Cana (ii. 1-11).
pp. 33 - 35

We have seen that the signs selected by John have as their common object "that ye may believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that believing ye might have life through His Name". Our task is therefore simplified. Instead of seeking in each sign to find out its purport, we have only to seek the peculiar part it plays in the illumination of this double purpose. The first sign is recorded in chapter ii. 1-11, and took place at Cana of Galilee.

We have already observed that the eight signs are in the form of an introversion, the first corresponding with the eighth. The Companion Bible points out thirteen items of correspondence. There is in both a background. In the one Nathaniel's faith and his declaration, "Thou art the Son of God, Thou art the King of Israel". In the other Thomas's confession, "My Lord and my God". (Here The Companion Bible gives us Thomas's unbelief).

The place in both signs is Galilee. There is also a reference to the "third" day and the "third" time. Wine is provided in the one case, and food in the other. In the first sign we read, "They have no wine", in the last they had "caught nothing" and had "no meat".

In the first we have six water pots, in the eighth 153 fishes. In both there is a command, "Fill the water pots", "Cast the net", which is obeyed. The verb "to bring" or "to bear" (pherõ) occurs in both signs: "And they bear it", "Bring of the fish". The verb "to manifest" (phaneroõ) also occurs in both signs. In the first his glory is manifested, in the last Himself. The value of such details is that they emphasize for us the important part of the sign, and indicate what part of the incident constitutes the "sign" and what the accidental setting.

The title of Christ which immediately precedes the record of the first sign is "The Son of man". Nathaniel had confessed Him "The Son of God". The Lord Himself refers to Himself as the "Son of man". This title carries with it the idea of rule and dominion forfeited by the first man. The title occurs twelve times in the Gospel which is suggestive of its association with Israel.

If we read the narrative of this sign without reference to the preceding chapter we shall begin talking about the "third" day and its type, resurrection. If, however, we pause to ask what the primary meaning of the words of ii. 1 may be, light will be thrown upon its true typical character. The words, "And the third day", indicate a continuance of reckoning. In chapter i. we read of four successive days, which link up the waning ministry of John the Baptist with the opening ministry of the Lord.

"The day following" (i. 43); "The next day" (i. 35); "The next day" (i. 29). Now, as i. 29 says, "The next day", i. 19-28 must indicate the day previous. This gives us four days in all. The first day is the day of John's confession, when he took no honour to himself but ascribed greatness to the coming Messiah. The second day John sees Jesus and says, "Behold, the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world", and also contrasts his baptism with that of the Lord's. He concludes this second day's testimony with the words, "I saw and bare record that this is the Son of God". The third day John again says of Christ, "Behold the Lamb of God". This results in two of his disciples following the Lord. One of these proves to be Andrew, Simon Peter's brother, who first found his own brother Simon and said, "We have found the Messiah, that is, the Christ". The fourth day the Lord goes into Galilee and calls Philip: and Philip find Nathaniel, and Nathaniel confesses that Jesus is the Son of God and King of Israel.

The marriage in Cana was therefore the SEVENTH day of this record. This is typical. Here the opening scene is a Marriage just as Rev. xix introduces Rev. xx. With the "Marriage supper of the Lamb." As the Lamb of God he had already been heralded, though for the time His glory must be veiled. Some of the disciples of Christ who were invited with Him had been disciples of John the Baptist. It would be necessary to teach them that a dispensational change was indicated by the personal ministry of the Messiah. Weddings and wine are quite foreign to the witness of John the Baptist. They harmonize with the message of Christ. John is the Friend of the Bridegroom, but Christ is the Bridegroom Himself.

The instruments of the miracle were the six water pots "after the manner of the purifying of the Jews". Again the new dispensational note is struck. That which was O.T. ritual is changed into the pledge of millennial joy. He the Son of man and Son of God has come, in order that all types shall have their completion and all promises their fulfillment.

His first miracle "manifested forth His glory". It is not a miracle merely of compassion or mercy. It foreshadows coming glory. "His hour was not yet come" (ii. 4); and although that hour must come, wherein the Son of man must be lifted up, nevertheless glory must follow, for so it is written. The last miracle before His own death and resurrection was at the tomb of Bethany. Here, however, in this opening sign He manifests His glory at a marriage; His glory was manifested in that He supplied their lack. They had "no wine". We are not told what effect this sign had upon the guests or the bride and bridegroom. We are told, "His disciples believed on Him".

This sign has been recorded in order that we might believe:--

(1). The Jesus is the Christ.
(2). That He is the Son of God.
(3). That believing we might have life through His name.

The miracles which He did were the evidence of His Messiahship. This we have already seen in Matthew's Gospel. They are further given to reveal Him as the Son of God. This one in particular is a miracle of creation. What is ordinarily accomplished by the slow process of vegetable growth and development is here performed instantaneously at a word from Him. To believe Him is to receive life. Here life is indicated "more abundantly". Not water for purifying, but wine that maketh glad the heart of God and man. We are perfectly certain it was not the wine that is a mocker, that biteth like a serpent, respecting which Scripture itself testifies, "whosoever is deceived thereby is not wise".

#3. The Ruler's Son (iv. 46-50).
pp. 65 - 67

The first and last signs bring before us the nation's need. There is a failure of supply which can only be met by their Messiah. The second and seventh signs emphasize sickness and death, death being mentioned in these two alone.

The first sign was given on the seventh day of the record. In the second sign restoration takes place "at the seventh hour". Seven disciples figure in the last sign (xxi. 2). We shall find this element emphasized still more in the signs that follow. It is a genuine part of the symbolism. The nation's restoration to joy and the marriage feast will take place in the Sabbath that is coming, the seventh thousand years of this world's history. So likewise will their being received back as alive from the dead.

Possibly, if the words of verse 43 stood alone, no symbolic meaning would be attached to them, but they appear again in the corresponding seventh sign, and unitedly compel one to think of Hos. vi. 1-3, viz.:--

> "After two days He will revive us, in the third day He will raise us up, and we shall live in His sight."

The passages are:--

> "After two days He departed" (John iv. 43).
> "He abode two days…….after that saith He to the disciples, Let us go into Judea again" (xi. 6, 7).

This period prophetically covers the 2,000 years of Israel's death as a nation, and indicates the millennium as the day of Israel's revival and new life. To the same period refer the words of Hos. xiii. 14:--

> "I will ransom them from the power of the grave: I will redeem them from death. O death, I will be thy plagues: O grave, I will be thy destruction."

The apostle Paul, speaking of Israel's failure as a nation, says:--

> "If the casting away of them be the reconciling of the world, what shall the receiving of them be but LIFE FROM THE DEAD?" (Rom. xi. 15).

Twice does the nobleman use the words "come down" to the Lord. This may be simply common usage, it may be strictly topographical, it may nevertheless be a part of the sign itself. Over and over again in this Gospel the Lord refers to Himself as the bread which came down from heaven. Israel's great cry in the day of deliverance will be:--

> "Oh that Thou wouldest rend the heavens, that Thou wouldest come down" (Isa. lxiv. 1).

Israel at the point of death will have no hope of deliverance except from above.

We must however be careful to note the great difference between the second and seventh signs as well as the correspondence that exists between them. In the case of the nobleman's son healing is the word, whereas in the case of Lazarus resurrection is the one essential. In the second sign the child is "at the point of death", dying of a "fever".

The verb "to heal" occurs but three times in John's Gospel (iv. 47, v. 13, and xii. 40). The last reference is at a dispensational crisis, and is found in the quotation of Isa. vi. 9, 10, a passage fraught with solemn importance. Healing in John's Gospel means not only the physical cure, but the spiritual healing of the nation. Immediately before this quotation is made, the seventh sign has been given. "Lazarus is DEAD." No longer a nation "at the point of death" needing healing is set forth, but a nation dead and buried, needing nothing less than resurrection. In Acts iii. 11 the word "to heal" reappears, with the renewed preaching of repentance. Once more Isa. vi. 6, 10 are quoted in Acts xxviii. 27, this time finally. The time for healing is past, death has come, and Israel must await the hour when it shall hear the voice of the Son of God.

In five out of the eight signs the Lord speaks the word only, and does not touch the subject. There is an emphasis on the power of His word. In the first sign He simply says, "Fill the waterpots with water"; "Draw out now". In the second, "Go thy way, thy son liveth"; and the man believed the word that Jesus had spoken unto him. In the third, in contrast to the complaint of the impotent man that he had no one to put him into the pool, come the words, "Arise, take up thy bed and walk". This is followed by the wondrous words:--

> "For as the Father raiseth up the dead and quickeneth them, even so the Son quickeneth whom He will…….He that heareth My word…….hath everlasting life…….the hour is coming when all that are in their graves shall hear His voice, and shall come forth."

This truth is fully set forth in the raising of Lazarus. Here again we see a second setting forth of the Messiahship of Jesus, and perceive the power of life which abides in His name and which is received by faith.

Readers will sympathetically bear in mind that this series, together with Fundamental of Dispensational Truth, is written for those readers who have not as yet progressed far in the study of these things.

#4. The Impotent Man (v. 1-47).
pp. 97 - 100

We saw that death was confined to the second and seventh signs, and we shall now see that sin is spoken of only in the third and sixth. It will be observed, moreover, that the second pair of signs intensifies the subject.

In both the third and sixth signs we have a pool, a long standing case, and the Sabbath day. Further, the nature of the spiritual infirmity and blindness is suggested by the reference in each case to the words of Moses and the works of the Father. Both signs were given at Jerusalem. The pool in the third sign is called Bethesda. The pool in the sixth is called Siloam. In both cases a reference is made to either the language or the meaning of the name "which is called in the Hebrew tongue Bethesda", "Siloam, which is by interpretation, Sent". Bethesda means "the house of mercy" and here in this sign mercy is seen and heard. Whether the troubling of the water by an angel is to be taken as scriptural truth or whether we have here the record of a popular idea, makes no difference to the value of the story. Israel as a nation were guarded, redeemed, led, taught, and punished by the instrumentality of angels, but the world to come, of which the apostle speaks in Heb. ii., has not been subjected to angels.

Among the many impotent folk who anxiously awaited the troubling of the water was a man who had been in a state of helpless infirmity for thirty-eight years. If the reader consults The Companion Bible, Appendix 50, vii. 2, 3, he will see that this is the actual period of the wandering of Israel in the wilderness, which wandering was a punishment for their sin of unbelief. The impotent man is a type of Israel shut out from the promised land, cut off from aionian life. To this man comes the word of power:-- > "Arise, take up thy bed and walk, and immediately the man was made whole, and took up his bed and walked, and on the same day was the Sabbath" (John v. 8, 9).

The epistle to the Hebrews deals with the actual historic wandering in the wilderness, and speaks of the "rest" that remaineth, which rest is a sabbatismos (See Heb. iii., iv.). Here we have therefore at the pool of Bethesda the type of Israel's restoration. The man who was healed being cross-questioned by the Jews confessed that he did not know who his benefactor might be. This is paralleled in the sixth sign, where the neighbours and the Pharisees cross-questioned the man concerning his benefactor. Commencing with "a man that is called Jesus", he is led on at length to the confession that Jesus was the Son of God.

We shall see the prophetic significance of the sixth sign later, but it is already obvious to any student of the prophets that in both of these signs Israel's restoration is set forth. The bigotry and hatred manifested over the "desecration" of the Sabbath revealed the utter darkness of the minds of these leaders of the people.

Let us spend a moment to survey the Lord's doings on the Sabbath. In Matt. xii. 1-8, where the word first occur, the Lord shows how vastly different was his understanding of the Sabbath from the strait-laced formal conception of the Pharisees. Out of this controversy comes the first great truth, that we do well ever to keep in mind. "The Son of man is the Lord of the Sabbath day."

The next truth to emerge from the crafty questioning of the Pharisees is that it is lawful "to do good on the Sabbath". Mark in his Gospel adds one item that must not be omitted here:--

> "The Sabbath was made for man, and not man for the Sabbath; therefore the Son of man is Lord also of the Sabbath" (Mark ii. 27, 28).

If we glance back again to Matt. xii. we shall see that this latter sentence is there connected with "mercy and not sacrifice"; in other words, the Sabbath is the day of healing, of mercy, of the beneficial effect of the redemption made by Christ. It is fitting therefore that the impotent man should be healed at the "House of Mercy". We shall see also how fitting the pool of Siloam was when we come to the sixth sign. Luke while recording the incident of Matt. xii. gives a further illustration of the importance of the Sabbath.

A woman bound by Satan for eighteen years is loosed from her bond on the Sabbath day. The Lord gives special emphasis to the fact that the woman who was "made straight" was a "daughter of Abraham". The Millennium is the day in which the seed of Abraham shall be delivered from the long-standing bondage of Satan, when they shall be healed, when their blindness shall give place to sight, when they that are in their graves shall hear the voice that awoke Lazarus (the seventh sign), when the marriage feast shall be set, and the "new wine in the Father's Kingdom" shall be tasted with joy, when the 153 fishes shall all be gathered to the shore with net unbroken.

In John v. 17 the Lord refers to the Father's works, "My Father worketh hitherto and I work". The meaning of this statement is that up till the ministry of Christ the Father had wrought for Israel, "hitherto" meaning "until now". From the commencement of the ministry of the Son the Father wrought through Him. This truth comes out again in John ix. 4, "I must work the works of Him that sent Me, while it is day". The testimony of Moses is also referred to in both signs.

> "There is one that accuseth you, even Moses, in whom ye trust. For had ye believed Moses, ye would have believed Me, for he wrote of Me. But if ye believe not his writings, how shall ye believe My words?" (John v. 45-47).

The Pharisees confess in chapter ix. 29:--

> "We know that God spake unto Moses: as for this fellow, we know not from whence He is."

Had Israel really believed Moses, they would have known when Christ presented Himself "whence He is", and their thirty-eight years of wilderness wandering would have ended, and the Sabbath of blessing, the kingdom of heaven which "is at hand", would have dawned. As it was, blindness total and complete is found in the parallel sign. Thus all these signs testify. "No wine" is echoed by the absolute "nothing" (xxi.). "The point of death" is echoed by "dead and buried" (xi.). The thirty-eight years of infirmity are exchanged for blindness from birth (ix.).

A prophetic meaning attaches to the words of Christ when He found the man in the temple, "Behold thou art made whole: SIN NO MORE, lest a worse thing come unto thee". There will be some who will sin even during the Millennium, and a worse punishment than wandering and dying in the wilderness will befall them. The Millennium must not be confounded with the new Creation. The seventh day is the last day of the week, not the first. The new creation follows the age of the Kingdom, and in that new day sin and sorrow shall be found no more.

The first set of signs indicates what might have been had Israel repented. The second set indicates what did and will take place, for Israel has now entered into blindness and death, from which nothing can save them but the personal advent of their long-rejected Messiah.

#5. The Central Signs (vi.). Feeding of Five Thousand, and Jesus Walking on the Sea.

pp. 139 - 142

The signs already considered have been indicative of Israel's condition and prophetic of the nation's restoration. The fourth sign (Feeding of five thousand) reveals the way in which this restoration will be accomplished, and leads on to a crisis. It is the last of the series.

The feast of the Jews which is mentioned in the sign is suggestive ("The Passover a feast of the Jews was nigh"), for here we shall read of the blood of Christ, without which no man shall have life. Both of these central signs take place after the Lord had ascended into a mountain. Israel's restoration is connected with the Mount of Olives both in the prophets (Zech. xiv. 4), the Lord's own prophecy (Matt. xxiv. 3), and the angel's announcement (Acts i. 12).

The Lord to test Philip asked him, "Whence shall we buy bread that these may eat". He replies that "Two hundred pennyworth would not be sufficient to provide every one with a little". Andrew remarks, "There is a lad here, which hath five barley loaves and two small fishes", but adds, "what are they among so many?" Clearly "buying" or "sharing" will not go far, for there are over 5,000 hungry people to feed. The Lord now says, "Make the men sit down" and then begins, after giving thanks, to distribute the loaves to the disciples. When all had eaten "as much as they would" twelve baskets were filled with the fragments that remained "over and above." The apostles were thereby also provided with a full supply of food. The effect of this sign upon the multitude was to make them say, "this is of a truth that prophet that should come into the world," and they contemplated taking Christ by force and making Him King. "When Jesus therefore perceived that they would come and take Him by force, to make Him a King, He departed again into a mountain Himself alone."

Here we reach a point of great dispensational importance. Nothing is clearer than the testimony of Scripture that Christ came to be King of Israel, yet when the multitude contemplated making Him King, the Lord withdrew Himself. The reason is to be found in their motive which is exposed in the sequel. The fourth and fifth signs are so linked together that we cannot proceed to that sequel without dealing with the parallel sign. The night drew on and the disciples entered a boat and "went over the sea toward Capernaum. It was now dark and Jesus had not come to them." Presently the sea began to rise by reason of a great wind that blew. The other gospels testify to the dangerous character of these storms that sweep the inland seas. About half way across the lake they saw the Lord walking on the sea and drawing nigh unto the ship. This was the first time the Lord had used any miraculous power in His own case. Here we have an anticipation of the Lord as the risen One. In John xx. 19 after resurrection, closed doors were no barrier to the spiritual body of the risen Christ. Here as He walked upon the sea this power is foreshadowed.

The disciples were afraid, but the Lord reassures them by crying out, "It is I; be not afraid". The actual words of Christ were far more impressive than these. In John viii. 58 He said, "Before Abraham was, I AM". Here in John vi. 20 He uses identical language "I AM, be not afraid". Here is the true significance of the sign. He that must save Israel, Who alone can satisfy their need, is the "I AM" Who in the days of Egypt originated the first Passover, and is here about to fulfil that wondrous type. When Israel look upon Him whom they pierced and testify of the redeeming power of His blood, they will also say, "this is our GOD, we have waited for Him". The rising sea and the great wind will be found in Rev. xiii. and Dan. vii. The four winds of heaven when they strive upon the great sea will bring about the day of Jacob's trouble, yet as the prophet says, "He shall be saved out of it", saved, as signified here, by the personal coming in the midst of their danger of the Lord Jesus Christ, the I AM of the O.T.

The people who had been fed follow after the Lord, and are rebuked for merely seeking the "loaves and fishes". The Lord points them to the meat that endureth unto aionian life. Then follows the discourse on the Manna, and the blessed fact that Christ Himself is "that bread of life". He goes deeper: "the bread that I will give is My flesh which I will give for the life of the world". Yet further He adds, "Except ye…….drink His blood, ye have no life in you". Many of the disciples when they heard this said, "This is a hard saying, who can hear it?" When He followed this by emphasizing the elective character of God's purpose (verse 65) "many of His disciples went back and walked no more with Him". Then comes the climax. To the twelve the Lord says, "Will ye also go away?" and Simon Peter bears his abundant testimony that he at least has learned the lesson of the signs:--

> "Lord, to whom shall we go? Thou hast the words of aionian life. And we believe and are sure that Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God" (verses 68, 69).

Thus the central pair of signs turn from Israel's need to the person of the Messiah Himself, their only hope.

Each set of four signs is complete however in itself. This is quite compatible with the existing correspondence already pointed out on page 2 of this volume. Briefly they may be set out thus:--

Israel's	|	A	|	No wine.—Fully supplied.

#6. The Man Born Blind (ix.).
pp. 167 - 170

With this miracle we commence the corresponding signs of the second series. The healing of the man born blind echoes the healing of the impotent man who had been in that case for 38 years. In this sign however we are dealing with a type of Israel after the rejection of the Lord had taken place. We have already drawn attention to the intensifying of the conditions of the second set of signs. As this is important and may have been missed, we give again the following figure.

Before Rejection.	After Rejection.
No wine.	Nothing.
At the point of death.	Dead and buried.
Important for thirty-eight years.	Blind from birth.

While the Lord tells His disciples that the cause of the man's blindness was neither his own sin nor that of his parents, the dispensational application is found in the closing of the chapter:--

> "For judgment I am come into the world, that they which see not might see: and that they which see might become blind. And some of the Pharisees which were with Him heard these words and said unto Him, Are we blind also? Jesus said unto them, If ye were blind ye would have no sin: but now ye say, We see; therefore your sin remaineth."

We observed in our consideration of the corresponding sign that John is careful to tell us what the name of the pool (Bethesda) was in the Hebrew tongue. Something similar occurs again in this sign. "Go wash in the Pool of Siloam (which is by interpretation Sent). He went his way therefore, and washed and came seeing" (verse 7). The narrative of this remarkable cure is held up half way for the sake of the meaning of a name. That name therefore must have a bearing upon the meaning of the sign, otherwise the parenthesis is unwarranted.

SENT.—Is the reader aware that around this word the whole of the Gospel of John is written? that the sin of Israel was the rejection of the Sent One, just as their salvation will be found in His reception. As the two words rendered "sent" occur some sixty times we can only give an indication of their usage.

> "He whom God hath sent speaketh the words of God" (John iii. 34).
> "He that heareth My word and believeth on Him that sent Me" (John v. 24).
> "The works…….bear witness of Me that the Father hath sent Me" (John v. 36).
> "I came to do the will of Him that sent Me" (John vi. 38-40).
> "My doctrine is not mine, but His that sent Me"(John vii. 16).

In chapters viii. to xvii. the word recurs. In that impressive chapter xvii. the word comes seven times:--

> "And this is aionian life, that they might know Thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ, Whom Thou hast sent."

No one but the Sent One can give life to the dead or sight to the blind. We find in the next sign that the Lord, beside the tomb, audibly addressed the Father because of the people that stood by, saying "that they may believe that Thou hast sent Me" (xi. 42). There was much division among the people over this miracle. Willful rejection is now evident. "If any man did confess that He was the Christ, he should be put out of the synagogue" (ix. 22).

The questions which were put to the man born blind were used to lead him on in the truth. First he says, "The man that is called Jesus, etc." (verse 11). Then upon being more directly questioned he answered, "He is a prophet" (17). Upon the third interrogation the man waxes warm, "I have told you already and ye did not hear: wherefore would ye hear it again? Will ye also be his disciples?…….if this man were not of God, He could do nothing" (27-33). This could not be tolerated. "Thou wast altogether born in sins, and dost thou teach us? and they cast him out" (34). As in the parallel sign, the Lord finds the man a second time and the great revelation is made. "And when he had found him, he said unto him, Dost thou believe on the Son of God?…….Lord I believe. And he worshipped Him" (35-38). This is immediately followed by the reference to judgment, sin and blindness, already quoted.

There is significance in the fact that the blind man was cast out before he believed that Jesus was the Son of God. The nation as such denied this truth. Only a few and an outcast few saw this light of life. It is also highly suggestive that the same word is used for the action of the Pharisees and of the Lord. "They cast him out" (ix. 34). "When He putteth forth His own sheep" (x. 4). The Lord overrules the wrath of men. They may cast out, but the Good Shepherd will use their action as a putting forth of His own sheep.

Returning for a moment to the body of the narrative, we cannot but feel the sincerity of the testimony of verse 25. The Pharisees said, "We KNOW that this man is a sinner" (24). The blind man replied, "Whether he be a sinner or no I know not, ONE THING I KNOW, that whereas I was blind, now I see" (25). The man's theology was perhaps lamentably crude. Yet he knows "one thing". We in our turn may not be able to answer all the questions which tradition, hatred, or ignorance may put to us; but "one thing" we know too. Here is a fixed, subjective, personal commencement. This is not creed, but conviction, not theology, but truth, not so much light, as it is life. If there is an element of vagueness in the words "The man that is called Jesus" in verse 11, there is none in the concluding portion of the statement, "I went and washed and I received my sight". His knowledge of the Person of his Saviour grows constantly upwards from "The man that is called Jesus" to "a prophet", "a man of God" to the "Son of God" and "Lord". His sight was immediately and completely given. He did not as one on another occasion "see men as trees walking", he "came seeing".

If we collect the testimony of Scripture concerning the blindness of Israel and consider the testimony alongside of this sign, we shall see much that is parallel and prophetic. Let us praise God for the revelation given concerning the duration of this condition:--

> "Blindness in part is happened unto Israel until the fullness of the Gentiles be come in. and so all Israel shall be saved" (Rom. xi. 25, 26).

Lessons for Little Ones.

#12. pp. 31, 32

Four titles for sinners are given in Rom. v., viz.,:--

1. Without strength.	\	Negative.
2. Ungodly.	/
3. Sinners.	\	Positive.
4. Enemies.	/

The initial letters if taken in pairs spell WE and US. The first is not so bad as the last, yet if a child is too weak to save himself, he will be lost, just as much as if he were an active enemy. God has one remedy for the four classes:--

"Christ died for Us."
"Christ died for the ungodly."
"While We were yet sinners Christ died."
"While We were enemies We were reconciled to God by the death of His Son."

Notice the lesson of the little words in Rom. v.:--

YET (6, 8).—No waiting for us to try to "be good".
FOR (6, 8).—His death for us.
BY (9, 10).—His blood, His death, His life.
FROM (9).—Wrath.
TO (10).—God.

Shew how "God commendeth His love" (v. 8); trace on what Scripture says of sinners. This will shew the nature of the love of God.

#13. Counted, and counted for (Rom. iv. 3-8).
pp. 79, 80

In answer to the question, "What must I do to be saved?" the apostle says, "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ".

FAITH, OR BELIEVING.—Go through the Gospels and Epistles noting the many references which link salvation, eternal life, justification, etc., with faith or believing. Keep a note of all the passages. Now go through these references again, this time to see who or what is believed. Faith will be found to rest usually in God, His Word, the Person and redemptive work of the Lord Jesus Christ. Turn now to Rom. iv. 3-8, "Abraham believed God, and it was counted unto him for righteousness". Here the faith of Abraham was "counted for". Verse 5 uses the term again in connection with faith.

In verses 4, 6 and 8 the words "reckoned" (4), "imputed" (6), and "impute" (8), are all the same as "counted", but observe the essential difference—there is no word "for". Faith is "counted" FOR something else, but faith is not reckoned AS righteousness, for it is not. Reward (4), Righteousness (6), Sin (8), are not "counted FOR" something else, but are "counted" themselves, but faith is only of value when it rests in Christ.

To illustrate this important difference consider a £1 Treasury Note, a 20/- Postal Order, and a Sovereign. The Treasury Note, or the Postal Order, we say are worth £1. But are they worth £1 in the same way that a Sovereign is? Should the Treasury Note be put upon the fire it would ceases, but should a Sovereign be placed in the fire it would still present £1 worth of gold. The Sovereign, then, can be "counted" a pound, whereas the paper money can only be "counted for" a pound. While the Government pledges itself to honour the Note it is of value, but its value is not intrinsic, its value is relative.

Faith itself is of no more value than making vows, praying prayers, or attempting good works. Faith is only of value because it is connected with the finished work of Christ. That is the bullion in the Bank of God which alone makes faith what it is. Should God at any time link salvation with anything else, faith would contain no saving power of itself.

To carry out thoroughly the earlier suggestion of this paper it is necessary to use a Concordance, and the child should be made familiar with one as soon as it has the necessary ability to read and understand. Later on we hope to give some assistance to parents in guiding and encouraging the child to use and appreciate a concordance.

#14. From Darkness to Light, through Blood.
pp. 111, 112

I wonder whether you know the meaning of the Belgian Flag? Its colours are black, yellow and red, arranged in three vertical panels.

The Legend of the flag epitomizes

the history of the country and reads

From Darkness to Light, through Blood.

Here we have not only the Belgian Flag, but one which could have been carried by Israel as they left the bondage of Egypt, by the redemption of the Passover Lamb, FROM DARKNESS TO LIGHT, THROUGH BLOOD. That also is my flag, it is yours too if the Lord Jesus is your Saviour.

Study the Scriptures for the following subjects, viz., SIN is represented by darkness. SALVATION is represented by light. Such salvation is only accomplished through the blood of Christ.

Studies in the Epistles of the Mystery.

#42. "The law of commandments contained in ordinances" (Eph. ii. 15).

pp. 24 - 27

In verse 14 the Lord Himself is set forth as our peace in contrast to the condition of enmity which is brought before us in verse 15. The A.V. leads us to believe that the enmity was abolished in the flesh of Christ, which indeed in a broad sense is a scriptural doctrine as Col. i. 22 and ii. 14 indicate. A close adherence to the wording of Eph. ii. 15 however leads to another conclusion and to a slightly different truth. Rotherham observed the different teaching here, and renders the passage:--

> "He in fact is our peace . . . . . Who made both one, and the enclosing middle wall took down, the enmity, in His flesh . . . . . the law of commandments in decrees . . . . . bringing to nought, that the two," etc.

The two sentences are:--

1. The middle wall taken down, and
2. The enmity in His flesh abolished.

The middle wall and the enmity in His flesh are the same, both are obstacles to peace, and both were taken down or abolished. The explanation, "the law of commandments in decrees", is given to throw light upon the nature of the middle wall, and how that could be spoken of as the enmity in His flesh. How could enmity be connected with Him?

When the apostle wished to enumerate the covenant privileges of Israel, he included, as one of their exclusive dispensational possessions, Christ. But can Christ, the One who is the very Head of the One Body, really be included as a peculiar possession of Israel? Yes, within the limitations set in Rom. ix. 5, for there we read:--

> "Of whom, AS CONCERNING THE FLESH, Christ came, the One Who is (really) over all, God blessed for the ages."

According to the flesh Israel have the prior claim to the Messiah. This He recognized during His earthly ministry, for He said to the Gentile woman who came to ask a favour, "I am not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel". In the second epistle to the Corinthians the apostle makes a very sweeping statement:--

> "So that we, from now, know no one according to flesh (or fleshly distinctions, seeing that Christ died on behalf of all, verse 15), and even though we knew Christ according to the flesh, yet now we no longer know Him (thus), so that if any one be in Christ, he is a new creature; the old things have passed away, behold they have become new" (II Cor. v. 15-17. Vatican MSS).

What is the compelling context of this new vision of Christ? "Having judged this", namely, the death for all (not only for Israel), the new creation, and the reconciliation.

This is parallel with Eph. ii. Circumcision in the flesh made with hands erected a middle wall of partition; but Christ viewed as risen from death, as the One in whom the reconciliation found its fullest scope (ii. 16), where the new creation was expressed in the new man ("for to create in Himself"), is above and beyond all these "old things". In the dispensation of the Mystery they have "passed away", new things have come into being. Christ in the flesh was a minister of the circumcision; Christ in the spirit is Head over all things in the new creation.

So it will be observed that the enmity was in His flesh, and that so long as Christ according to the flesh was preached the enmity between Jew and Gentile remained. The Gentile believers had been "in the flesh", and in that sphere were aliens and strangers "without Christ". During the period covered by the Acts of the Apostles, we see the gradual opening of the door of faith to the Gentiles.

What were these "ordinances"? Looking at the modern use of the word some have interpreted this passage almost exclusively as of Baptism and the Lord's Supper. We cannot see anywhere in the Scriptures that either of these ordinances stood as the "middle wall of partition", for believers from either Jews or Gentiles were baptized and partook of the Lord's Supper. The fact that the word here translated ordinances is the same which is rendered decrees in Acts xvi. 4 does not by any mean prove that they are one and the same, for those decrees were delivered to the church by Paul, and the record continues, "and so were the churches established in the faith". The epistle to the Colossians uses very similar words to those in Ephesians, and there these ordinances are more particularly indicated:--

> "And ye are in Him filled full, who is the Head of all principality and authority, in whom ye have also been circumcised with a circumcision not made by hand, in the putting off of the body of flesh in the circumcision of Christ, having been buried together with Him in baptism, wherein also ye have been raised together, through the faith of the inworking of God, who raised Him from among the dead; and you, being dead to trespasses and to the uncircumcision of your flesh, He hath made alive together with Him, having freely forgiven us all trespasses, having blotted out that which was contrary to us, and removed it out from the midst, having nailed it to His cross; having put off the principalities and authorities, He made a public example of them, triumphing over them by it" (Col. ii. 10-15).

The decrees or ordinances of Eph. ii. constituted a middle wall and enmity. This wall was destroyed. The parallel reference in Col. ii. shows these decrees as being "against us" and "contrary to us"; they were "taken out of the midst" and "nailed to His cross"; there need be no mystery about the matter, for the passage goes on to define these ordinances for us:--

> "Let no man therefore judge you in meat, or in drink, or in respect to a feast, or new moon, or Sabbath, which are a SHADOW of things to come, but the BODY is of Christ" (Col. ii. 16, 17).

Heb. x. 1 tells us that the law had the shadow of good things to come, and here all the ordinances or decrees of the law, which so emphasized the difference between Jew and Gentile, are set aside, annulled and cancelled, the enmity gone, the middle wall broken down.

Perhaps nothing crystallized the difference between the Jew and Gentile so much as did the decree of circumcision. This is particularly dealt with both in Eph. ii. and Col. ii., and it is pointed out in Eph. ii. as being "made by hand", so linking it with Col. ii. by the contrast in the words "made without hands" of verse 11. So essentially does the member of the One Body find his all in Christ, that bondage of any kind except the holy bond of peace and love (Eph. iv., Col. iii.) must be intolerable. Therefore the apostle proceeds to speak of the decrees and ordinances of the "vain deceitful philosophy" which sought to hold them apart from Christ the Head (Col. ii. 18). He concludes by referring again to the decrees, this time not the decrees of the law of God which are binding until He repeals them, but the decrees of the world, such as:--

> "Touch not, taste not, handle not, all which things are consumed in the using; according to the commandments and doctrines of men" (Col. ii. 21, 22).

A decree of God is placed upon the same level as the decree of man, when once that decree is undispensational. This is plain not only from the chapter before us, but from Gal. iv. 8-11:--

> "Howbeit then, when ye knew not God, ye did service unto them which by nature are no gods, but now, after that ye have known God, or rather are known of God, how turn ye again to the weak and beggarly elements, whereunto ye desire again to be in bondage? Ye observe days, and months, and seasons, and years, I am afraid for you."

These Galatians, as heathen, never rendered obedience to the observance of Israel's days, months, seasons, and years, yet their turning back from the liberty of Christ to the bondage of law was all one and the same in essence, as turning back to the weak and beggarly elements of heathendom. The member of the One Body is free from ALL decrees, whether ordained by Moses, by Elders in Jerusalem, or by his fellow man; One is his Head, Christ, and for the glory of His name he submits to no other.

Those believers who seek to know Christ after the flesh, whose only title for Him is the too familiar "Jesus", may of necessity find themselves still involved in that enmity which is connected with the flesh. We know but ONE BAPTISM and ONE BODY, we are bound to observe no day in particular (this does not give licence to outrage other believers' feelings concerning Sunday), but gladly seek to walk worthy before the Lord and our fellows. The atmosphere of reconciliation and new creation is too pure, too heavenly, for anything pertaining to the flesh. Here grace reigns, enmity is abolished, and Christ Himself is our Peace.

#43. "The New Man and Peace" (Eph. ii. 15, 16).
pp. 49 - 52

The middle wall (mesotoichon) being abolished, the enmity being slain, the decrees removed from the midst (mesõs), handmade distinctions gone and the flesh as a factor eliminated, there can be only one conclusion at which we can arrive, This conclusion is arrived at in the words "dead to trespasses and sins", "buried with Him in the baptism", "putting off the body of the flesh", and "the creation of the one new man". With that creation peace dawned, "in order that the two ('the both', 14-16) He might create in Himself unto one new man, making peace". The creation here, like the reconciliation of verse 16, is limited to the one body, but it is a blessed foreshadowing of that new creation which in a fuller measure is yet to be.

"THE TWO."—Here are the elements out of which the new creation is fashioned. The context leaves us in no doubt as to who are intended, the Gentile in his darkness and distance, and the Jew in his pride and privilege. The uncircumcision and the circumcision, the sheep and the dogs. The flesh is so entirely removed from this sphere, that God's own institutions which were connected therewith are destroyed.

"CREATION."—Creation indicates something new. II Cor. v. and Rev. xxi. bear their testimony to the passing away of the old, and the making of all things new. It is utterly inconsistent with the meaning of the word "create" to bring over anything "old" unchanged. If anything is repeated it will be adjusted to its new setting (see Gen. i.). There are not a few who through failure to discern things that differ and things that excel desire a list of commands and prohibitions, as though they were still under law. Everything pertaining to the flesh must stay behind as we rise together with Christ into the new creation. This settles the question of baptism and the Lord's supper, the decrees of Acts xv., the order and gifts of I Corinthians, and the many other questions which half-grasped truth begets. The church of the one body is a new creation, and is "in Himself". He is our peace, and "in Him" are all our blessings.

"ONE NEW MAN."—The new man is created during this present dispensation, the chaste virgin was in process during the last (II Cor. xi. 2), and the bride appears in the next. How can there be any consistency in the language of Scripture if the one new man is the BRIDE? What one might call the balance of truth is becoming increasingly impressed upon us. The privilege of belonging to the church of the one body carries with it the responsibility to fellow-members and to the living Head; to belong to a new creation places one outside of much that pertains to this life. To be created a new man involves a corresponding repudiation of the old man. This we may see in chapter iv., where the balance of truth is emphasized by the balance of literary structure.

In Volume II & III, page 92, appears the structure of Ephesians as a whole and chapter ii. 1-18 is seen to be balanced by chapter iv. 17 - vi. 9. There in both sections we have the two walks contrasted, in both good works find their place, and in both we have the doctrine and practice, position and responsibility connected with the new man and the new creation. In chapter ii. the church as a whole is viewed as the creation of Christ, in chapter iv. the practical endorsement of that truth is taught:--

> "That ye put off concerning the former conversation the old man, which is corrupt according to the deceitful lusts, and be renewed in the spirit of your mind: and that ye put on the new man, which after God is created in righteousness and true holiness."

The link also with the doctrine of the one body is here too; this being the practical section, we read that it is commanded to the members:--

> "Wherefore putting away the lie, speak every man truth with his neighbour; for we are members one of another."

The same balance of truth is observed in the sequel. As a result of the creation of the new man we read, "so making peace". This new man has been created "of the twain one"; it is a unity. So in chapter iv. the unity of the Spirit is associated with the bond of peace.

Do we appreciate with any fullness the blessedness of the words, "so making peace", "the bond of peace"? On every hand there is faction and strife, the sects are divided by the things of the flesh, one great company distinguish themselves by a name associated with baptism, another, with endless schisms within itself, makes the Lord's table the rock upon which it splits. One great assembly styles itself Episcopalian, another Presbyterian (both referring in the N.T. to the same office!).

As we pass in review the well-nigh endless divisions of Christendom, ordinances and ministry ever come uppermost. What a blessing to be able with a good conscience to say "none of these things have any further place with me". Possibly Scripture is clear over the question concerning baptism, possibly they who contend for believers' immersion are right—but to the members of the one body, the question has ceased to be of vital interest. Possibly they who continue to use the unleavened loaf at the Lord's table are scriptural, but the church of the one body is not associated in any way with the memorial of the new covenant. Possibly any priestly pretensions on the part of any man are not only unscriptural but anti-scriptural, but such controversies cannot occur within the bond of peace, for there all are members one of another, and all hold the one Head, all build one another up in love. With the destruction of the cause of enmity (the flesh), peace is assured.

This peace is the direct outcome of the creation of the twain, one new man. The attitude of the one body towards all men is peace, "we wrestle not with flesh and blood"; though this seems to be outside the faith and practice of many. The feet shod with the preparation of the gospel of peace indicates that our warfare is not on earth; even in the days of the kingdom the Lord said, "My kingdom is not of this world, else would My servants fight", how much more is the church which is His body "called into peace"! Not only is there perfect unity existing between the erstwhile conflicting parties, more glorious still, the truth is unfolded, they, together, are reconciled to God. To say merely that they are reconciled to God, however, is stating but half of the truth, two actions, the one related to the other, are also described:--

1. That He might create the two in Himself, one new man, making peace.
2. That He might reconcile the both in one body to God, through the cross, having slain the enmity in it.

Reconciliation to God is of "both in one body". The teaching of Matt. v. 24, "first be reconciled to thy brother", is here observed. It is not the individual reconciliation of a sinner as a result of the forgiveness of his sins, but the reconciling of "the both in one body". They are reconciled the one to the other, the middle wall has been broken down, they, in that capacity, can now be reconciled to God.

We are inclined to read the words "by the cross" with the concluding sentence, "by the cross having slain the enmity in it", it referring to the body in its divided state of enmity. The parallel in Col. ii. 14, 18 seems to confirm this. Be this as it may, reconciliation with God, and peace between individual members is the blessed condition of the church which is His body. Not even the millennial reign of the Prince of peace foreshadows the goal of God like the mystery hidden during the ages. The Bible, taken as the record by a truncated pyramid.

GENESIS REVELATION

The church of the one body with its glorious Head is by itself a complete things, and can well be represented by a small pyramid:

This foreshadows the end, and when placed upon the line indicating the rupture of Acts xxviii. "fills up the word of God" (Col. i. 25), completes the design and shows that the future vast new creation is but an enlargement of this smaller and superheavenly one, which is now manifested in the church which is His body. Surely no words are more fitting a conclusion than those of Col. iii. 15:--

> "Let the peace of God rule (as an umpire) in your hearts, to the which also ye are called in one body, AND BE YE THANKFUL."

#44. Access to the Father (Eph. ii. 17, 18).
pp. 84 - 86

Not only has peace been made, but it had been made known. The Lord Who made the both one "came and preached peace to you which were far off and peace to them that were nigh". The two conflicting parties are variously named according to the aspect of truth which obtains at the time. So far as covenant relationship is concerned one is the circumcision, the other the uncircumcision. One is Israel, the other Gentile. Here the one is the far off, the other the nigh. Both the far off and the nigh needed the work and the proclamation of peace. The nigh were only such in the flesh. They had no access in the spirit. The "far off" is another title of the Gentiles in their dispensational disability.

In the days of His flesh the Lord categorically declared that He was not sent but to the lost sheep of the house of Israel. The apostle, in Rom. xv., declares that Christ was a minister of the circumcision, and that he, Paul, was a minister of Jesus Christ to the Gentiles. In II Tim. i. 8 he says, "Be not thou therefore ashamed of the testimony of our Lord, nor of me His prisoner.

The words "and came and preached" indicate that the ministry of the Mystery is as much the personal word and work of Christ, as the Sermon on the Mount or the Parables of the Mystery of the kingdom of heaven. It brands as unscriptural that sentiment which prefers the "words of Christ Himself" to those of Paul, for Paul links the testimony of his Lord with his own prison ministry. When Paul made known the blessings of the mystery, Christ Himself "came and preached". It is of the first importance that we realize that Christ has spoken since His ascension. Eph. iv. 8-13 says:--

> "When He ascended up on high He gave gifts unto men . . . . . some apostles . . . . . for the perfecting of the saints . . . . . till we all come in the unity of the faith . . . . ."

Peace constitutes the gospel of the Mystery, the word preach meaning to preach the gospel. "And having come, He announced as glad tidings, Peace." The order is suggestive. Whoever would have put the Gentiles first before this period? Here the "far off" are named before "the nigh".

This evangel made known the blessed fact of access. "For through Him, we, the both, have access in one spirit to the Father." When we examined chapter i. 1-14 we observed how the Father, the Son and the Spirit divide the passage into three sections of truth. We find the same apportioning in the verse before us.

Through Him . . . . . One Spirit . . . . . The Father.

The recipients of the blessing are named "We, the both", and the blessing itself is "access". It is the sequel of acceptance. Those who are accepted in the Beloved of necessity have access to the Father. Those who have been reconciled in one body experience the blessed fruit in one spirit. Experimental access to the Father cannot be enjoyed except in this one spirit. Unity there must be in the presence of the Lord. The sevenfold unity of the Spirit commences with one Body, and one Spirit, and concludes with one God and Father of all.

Access to the Father is the sum, the concrete expression of peace. This is seen in Rom. v. 1, 2, "We have peace . . . . . we have access". Sin means distance. The flesh means distance. Dispensational infancy means distance. The new man means access. This access is "through Him". He is our peace, He made the both one, He abolished the enmity, He created the new man, He reconciled the both in one body to God, He came and preached peace, He alone can give access to the Father. The truth of John xiv. is the truth of Eph. ii., "I am the true and living way, no man cometh unto the Father, BUT BY ME".

We noticed in our last paper that "the both in one body" were reconciled to God. Let us notice in this that it is "We, the both", who have access to the Father. The reconciliation is to God, the access is to the Father. The reconciliation is basic, the access experimental. We miss much by not recognizing our membership of the one body. Reconciliation is here for the body as a whole. Access is for the both. They who would comprehend what is the breadth and length and depth and height must do so "with all saints". Those who would wield the weapon of "all prayer" must watch with all perseverance and supplication for "all saints".

The one body is related to God as the Father, as the sevenfold unity indicates, "One body . . . . . one God and Father".

The unity of the faith comprehends the Son of God, the perfect man. The perfect man is a title of both the Son of God, and the church which is His body. It is for this reason, among others, that the Father is so closely related to the body.

We draw near the verge of a profound depth in these things. When the Word became flesh, John says, "We beheld His glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the Father". We do not read in John i. 1, "The Word was with the Father", but "the Word was with God". It is the Son who is in the bosom of the Father. The church of the one body as a whole is like the Son. The Father is the Father of His Son's body, both in the natural and the spiritual world. What a calling and what a position—"Having predestinated us unto the SONSHIP". Servants may not at all times have access. Young children also are not always free to enter, but full-grown sons, those whose measure is the perfect man, those who constitute the body of Christ, these have the access. May we believe this "gospel", may we preserve this spirit, may we know what it is to be made nigh, and to draw near.

With this blessed position the section opened, "But now, in Christ Jesus, ye who once were far off are made nigh by the blood of Christ" (13). With this gracious privilege the section closes, "For through Him, we the both have access by one Spirit, unto the Father" (18). It is a blood-bought privilege. The spirit follows, but never precedes the blood. As in sanctification, "The oil . . . . . upon the place of the blood" (Lev. xiv. 28), so here. When we do rise to the privilege of access, we find that it is after all but an experimental acquaintance with our position in Christ and with Christ when we were "made to sit together in heavenly places". The epistle to the Hebrews teaches the same thing:--

> "Having therefore, brethren, liberty to enter into the holiest by the blood of Jesus, by a new and living way which He hath consecrated for us through the veil, that is to say, His flesh . . . . . let us draw near" (x. 19-22).

It is echoed in I John i. 7:--

> "If we walk in the light as He is in the light, we have fellowship one with another, and the blood of Jesus Christ His Son cleanseth us from all sin."

"Let us draw near", for we have been "made nigh".

#45. "The Holy Temple" (Eph. ii. 19-22).
pp. 116 - 119

Access unto the Father concluded the section of Eph. ii. which dealt with the distance, the "far off" character of both Jew and Gentile in the flesh. The far off are made nigh; the both made one. Reconciliation, peace and access are now their privilege in place of distance, enmity and the middle wall of partition.

Without our attempting an elaborate literary structure the expansion of the theme will be observed if we notice the following:--

Eph. ii. 11-22.

A	Once.—Strangers and aliens	\
B	Now.—Made nigh.	\	Body
C	Unity.—The two made one.	/
D	Access.—In one spirit.	/
A	No longer.—Strangers and aliens	\
B	But.—Fellow citizens.	\	Temple.
C	Unity.—Fitly framed together.	/
D	Habitation.—Of God in spirit.	/

The value of this method of study is that it keeps prominently before us the main theme. We Gentiles once were aliens, but we are such no longer. This is the primary subject. The intermediate verses (13-18) explain how this can be. It is accomplished by the blood of Christ, the destruction of all enmity in the flesh, the creation of the new man, and leads up to access in one spirit to the Father. The second section (19-22) starting with the altered position of the Gentiles "no longer aliens", leads on, not this time to our access to God, but to His dwelling in us. This important order is observed in the two prayers of Ephesians. In Eph. i. 15-23 the believer is directed outside of himself to the right hand of God and sees what he is "in Christ". In Eph. iii. again as a sequel to access (see verse 12) and a united family (15), the believer's attention is directed within, and the inner man is prepared so that "Christ may dwell in the heart by faith".

The figure which is used of the company of believers thus made nigh is "The Body"; the figure used of the company of believers in whom God makes His dwelling place is "The Temple". This thought of the body and the temple is not new. Christ Himself "spake of the temple of His body" (John ii. 21). To the Corinthians the Apostle wrote as practical truth that which God was to put into operation as doctrine in Ephesians:--

> "Know ye not that your bodies are the members of Christ . . . . . he that is joined to an harlot is one body . . . . . but he that is joined unto the Lord is one spirit . . . . . Know ye not that your body is the temple of the Holy Spirit" (I Cor. vi. 15-20).

There are some who see nothing more in Eph. ii. 19 than that the Gentiles who once were aliens from the commonwealth of Israel are now given access to that position. Two great objections to this are found in the Epistle, viz., one is the unqualified emphasis upon the new dispensation which Paul ushered in upon the revelation of the mystery, and the other is the presence of the word "FELLOW" in verse 19. When the Apostle unfolded the mystery, as he does in chapter iii., he uses this word to express the great distinctive fact:-- > "That the Gentiles should be FELLOW heirs, FELLOW (members of the same) body, and FELLOW partakers of the promise" (verse 6).

So long as we are dealing with the commonwealth of Israel and the covenants of promise, so long must Israel's position be maintained, "The Jew first", the Gentiles being "wild olive branches grafted in". The dispensation has changed. Instead of the flesh we have the spirit; instead of nations and kingdoms we have the church which is His body. In this new sphere the Jew who believes, equally with the Gentile, loses all his national and covenanted distinctions. This blessed truth was preached by Christ through the prison ministry of Paul equally to those who were far off (Gentiles) and to those who were nigh (Jews), and while the distinctive character of this Church and dispensation is Gentile, those Jews who were made fellow-members at the beginning, were in no sense favoured above their Gentile brethren. The position of the Gentile in the one body is exceptional, and is designed to fill up the Word of God until the day comes for the breach to be healed and the threads resumed.

There is a great use made in these few verses of the word oikos, a house, and its cognates:--

FOREIGNER (ii. 19)	is paroikos (cf. Acts vii. 6, 29).
HOUSEHOLD (ii. 19)	is oikeioi (cf. Gal. vi. 10; I Tim. v. 8).
BUILT (ii. 20)	is epoikodomeõ (cf. I Cor. iii. 10).
BUILDING (ii. 21)	is oidodomē (cf. I Cor. iii. 9).
BUILT-TOGETHER (ii. 22)	is sunoikodomeomai (only occurrence).
HABITATION (ii. 22)	is katoikētērion (cf. Rev. xviii. 2).

It will be noticed that the word which is so suggestive of the peculiar blessing of this dispensation, viz., "builded together", occurs nowhere else in the New Testament. The same is true of the other equally suggestive word of this chapter, viz., "made to sit together". The "together" aspect with its thought of equality is one of the most important keys to the teaching.

The building, so variously expressed, rests on a foundation. For salvation Christ alone is the foundation (I Cor. iii. 11), but in the matter of the dispensational position of the one body the foundation is that of the apostles and prophets. What this means will be more clearly apprehended when we study Eph. iv. 11-16, but a reference to these verses will show that the foundation ministry was that of apostles and prophets, succeeded as II Tim. ii. 2 and iv. 5 indicate by that of evangelist and teacher. Apostles and prophets, however, do not form a substitute for Christ. He still the Chief corner stone. A further link with the body aspect is found in verse 21. There we read:--

> "In whom the whole building fitly framed together groweth unto an holy temple in the Lord."

In chapter iv. 16 the same word occurs, there translated differently:--

> "From whom the whole body (cf. the whole building) fitly joined together and compacted by means of every joint of the supply, according to the proportionate energy of each single part, maketh growth of the body (cf. groweth unto an holy temple) unto a building up of itself (the building of ii. 21) in love."

The temple is the dispensational figure (ii. 21), the body is its practical manifestation (iv. 16). Chapter ii. 21 says, "IN whom all the building fitly framed together groweth"; chapter iv. 16, "OUT of whom the whole body fitly joined together . . . . . groweth".

The temple aspect of these dispensational blessings is in Him, the body aspect is out of Him. The one is our position, the other our practice. The one grows without reference to any activity, the other grows as it builds itself up, as each of its members ministers to the increase. The one grows up from the foundation, the other grows up into Him in all things which is the Head, even Christ. The body is the present position of the church, the fullness of Him that filleth all in all is its future glory.

The Church of the One Body, since the days of Paul himself, has never been a popular assembly. An outside position has ever been its allotted portion, yet who will worry as to access to the meeting places of saints who has access in one spirit unto the Father? Who will repine at the closed doors of temples and tabernacles, when they themselves are a dwelling place, nay, the very innermost shrine for God Himself? If the Gentile could not pass the barrier of the middle wall, the ordinary Israelite equally could not pass the barrier of the second veil. True access is found here in Eph. ii. The shadows are past for us, "the body is of Christ".

Those who realize in any measure the unspeakable privilege, not merely of entering the true temple, but of being themselves the true temple, will not need much emphasis upon the exhortation to walk worthy. The world and the flesh (Eph. ii. 11, 12) are outside this holy place.

#46. "Paul, the Prisoner" (Eph. iii. 1).
pp. 145 - 148

The church of the One Body, reconciled, at peace, blessed far above all the strifes and distinctions of the flesh, built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Christ Jesus Himself being the chief corner stone, growing into an holy temple in the Lord and builded together for an habitation of God in spirit, now becomes a subject of the apostle's prayer. In order to catch the apostle's line of thought the whole parenthesis of iii. 2-13 must be passed over and the prayer of iii. 14-21 read as a direct outcome of the teaching of chapter ii. The church is an holy temple, a habitation of God in spirit. "For this cause I bow my knees unto the Father." Before, however, the apostle reveals the subject matter of this second great prayer, he is impelled to make a digression by way of explaining his own peculiar and special relationship with that church.

Here is no merely interested worker or fellow-member, here is one into whose hands the whole dispensation of the mystery has been placed. Apart from the revelation made known to Paul, none knew the mind of God for the present interval. Instead therefore of proceeding straight on with the prayer of his heart, he turns aside at his reference to being "the prisoner of Christ Jesus for you Gentiles" to explain and (if need be) defend his title. That there is something in this description of himself that rises to the level of an official character appears in this first reference. Paul, the prisoner of the Roman power, and a prisoner by reason of the hatred of his own kinsmen, nevertheless speaks of himself as the prisoner of Christ Jesus. Paul views his imprisonment much in the same light that Joseph viewed the treachery of his brethren:--

> "I am Joseph your brother, whom ye sold into Egypt. Now therefore be not grieved, nor angry with yourselves, that ye sold me hither: for God did send me before you to preserve life" (Gen. xlv. 4, 5).

Arising out of the temple character of the church are three themes. The first occupying, with the parenthesis, chapter iii., the prayer; the second occupying chapters iv. 1 – vi. 9, the walk; and the third occupying the rest of chapter vi., the conflict. Now, each of these three themes contains a reference to the apostle as a prisoner. (1) The PRAYER, with parenthesis concerning the dispensation, "The prisoner of Christ Jesus for you Gentiles" (iii. 1), (2) The WALK, "I therefore the prisoner in the Lord" (iv. 1), and (3) The CONFLICT and Mystery, "An ambassador in bonds" (iv. 20). The Epistle to the Philippians speaks of Paul's "bonds in Christ" (i. 13). The Epistle to the Colossians speaks of Paul as being in bonds for the mystery of Christ, and bids them in his parting salutation to remember his bonds (iv. 3, 18). The second epistle to Timothy links the testimony of our Lord with Paul His prisoner (i. 8).

Four epistles are marked off from the rest of Paul's writings (excluding the personal one to Philemon) by this reference to bonds, and by their distinct and exclusive doctrine. For convenience, we call them the Prison Epistles; they contain the truth concerning the One Body.

This prisoner of Christ Jesus had a very positive mission "on behalf of you Gentiles". In Acts xix. the apostle ended his synagogue witness (8 and 9). In Acts xx. he concluded his ministry which he had up till then pursued. As we listen to his words to the elders of Ephesus, observing how he reviews the manner and matter of his ministry (18-21, 26, 27, 32-35), listening to their grief, "sorrowing most that they should see his face no more" (25 and 38), hearing him foretell the advent of the grievous wolves after his departure, we are impressed with the imminence of a crisis. His ministry is summed up in the words, "Testifying both to the Jews and also to the Greeks repentance toward God, and faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ" (21), "Preaching the Kingdom of God" (25), and declaring "all the counsel of God" (27). We may legitimately supplement this summary by adding his further statement before Agrippa. Following upon the heavenly vision on the road to Damascus the apostle outlines the course and the character of his ministry by saying that he:--

> "shewed first unto them of Damascus, and at Jerusalem, and throughout all the coasts of Judæa, and then to the Gentiles, that they should repent and turn to God, and do works meet for repentance . . . . . saying none other things than those which the prophets and Moses did say should come; that Christ should suffer, and that He should be the first that should rise from the dead, and should shew light unto the people, and to the Gentiles" (Acts xxvi. 19-23).

It is evident, however, from both Acts xx. and Acts xxvi. that the apostle, while conscious of the conclusion of one ministry, was also equally certain that he was about to enter into another. The words "And now" of Acts xx. 22 indicate a change. Before ever he was bound by the chain of Rome Paul could say, "Behold I go bound in the spirit unto Jerusalem". He further went not knowing the things which should meet him there, except that the Holy Spirit witnesseth in every city saying that bonds and afflictions awaited him. "But", he concludes with humble confidence, "of no account make I life precious to myself, so that I may finish my course, even the ministry which I have received of the Lord Jesus, to testify the gospel of the grace of God" (xx. 22-25). That Paul had a two-fold ministry Acts xxvi. 16-18 bears abundant evidence, and it is obvious that the second commission dates from about this time, for so vividly does the apostle recall the Lord's second appearing to him that he does not say "unto whom He sent me", but ". . . . . the Gentiles, unto whom NOW I SEND THEE". Paul's appeal unto Caesar was a step in the fulfillment of the Divine commission.

Acts xxvi. 18 contains in every sentence a foreshadowing of the prison epistles.

"To open their eyes."	"The eyes of your heart having been enlightened" (Eph. i. 18).
"To turn them from darkness to light."	"Delivered us from the authority of darkness" (Col. i. 13).
"And from the authority of Satan unto God."	"The Prince of the authority of the air" (Eph. ii. 2). "The Rulers of the darkness of this world" (Eph. vi. 12).
"That they may receive forgiveness of sins."	"Redemption . . . . . the forgiveness of sins" (Eph. i. 7).
"Inheritance among those having been sanctified."	"His inheritance among the saints ('sanctified')" (Eph. i.18). "Meet to be partakers of the inheritance of the saints (sanctified) in the light" (Col. i. 12).

Reverting for a moment to Acts xx., another most important item of truth appears in the apostle's words recorded in verse 32:--

> "And now, brethren, I commend you to God, and to THAT WORD OF HIS GRACE, which is able to build you up (Eph. ii. 20), and to give you an inheritance among all those having been sanctified."

He is leaving these believers, never to see their faces again; he looks forward to his ministry of the gospel of the GRACE of God; he commends them to that word of His GRACE, and in Eph. iii. 2 follows his reference to being the prisoner of Christ Jesus for the Gentiles by saying, "If ye have heard of the dispensation of the GRACE of God which is given me to you-ward". It would seem that these Ephesian elders were prepared to anticipate in the unfolding of God's purpose some further revelation of His grace, and such indeed the epistle which bears the name "to the Ephesians" proved to be. Our suggestion is that the apostle does not refer the Ephesians to the Scriptures in general, but to that Word of grace shortly to be announced through this very apostle who was then on the eve of bonds and imprisonment.

In coming back to our original verse (Eph. iii. 1) we are better able to appreciate both the context which precedes and succeeds the statement that Paul was the prisoner of Christ Jesus for the Gentiles. Chapter ii. had made the profound revelation of the grace of God manifested to the far off Gentiles, so full, so rich, that such who were hopeless and Godless in the world become a holy temple in the Lord and the very body of Christ. Chapter iii. continues, as a direct outcome of the statement in verse 1, to speak of the new dispensation given to the apostle under which such blessings were alone possible, viz., "the dispensation of the grace of God", "the dispensation of the mystery".

#47. FOR YOU GENTILES (Eph. iii. 1).

pp. 177 - 179

We have noticed the meaning and purport of the title of the apostle when he called himself the prisoner of Christ Jesus. This however is not a complete statement, he does not simply say that he was the prisoner of Christ Jesus, but that he was such "For you Gentiles." This is equally true with regard to his next statement. In verse 2 he not only says, "since ye have heard of the dispensation of the grace of God", but qualifies that statement with the words, "which is given me to you ward". This was the apostle's one real mission, all else was subsidiary, preparatory and temporary.

In Acts ix. 15 Ananias is instructed concerning Paul, "He is a chosen vessel unto Me, to bear My name before the Gentiles". The first missionary journey of Paul, separated by the Holy Spirit for the work, was to the Gentiles—Galatians indeed of the southern portion of the province (Acts xiii., xiv.). His first miracle and his closing warning (xiii. 6-12, xiii. 45-48), emphasize the apostasy of Israel and the blessing of the Gentiles. After Acts xiv. until Acts xxi. the apostle works among the Gentiles, but in fellowship with Jerusalem. This ministry ceased with his apprehension in the temple. After two years' imprisonment at Caesarea (not the wonders of the coming dispensation) the apostle sailed for Rome, where he made known for the first time the mystery which had been hidden since the ages.

Five is the number of Grace, and five times we read the word Gentiles in Ephesians.

Gentiles.

A | ii. 11. What the Gentiles were by nature, aliens from commonwealth.
B | iii. 1. Paul's prison ministry to the Gentiles.
C | iii. 6. The threefold fellowship of the mystery.
B | iii. 8. Paul's special evangel of the unsearchable riches of Christ.
A | iv. 17. What the Gentiles were by practice, alienated from life of God.

Once only does the word occur in Colossians (i. 27), where in a context which emphasizes the church which is His body, the dispensation of God "given to me for you", "the mystery which hath been hid from ages and generations", Christ "the hope of glory". In I Tim. ii. 6, 7 the apostle speaks of Christ, "Who gave Himself a ransom for all to be testified in due time", and says of himself in connection with this truth, "whereunto I am ordained a preacher, and an apostle (here he feels the necessity of a strong statement), I speak the truth in Christ and lie not, a teacher of the Gentiles in faith and truth". The mystery of godliness includes in its rhythmic setting* the line "preached unto the Gentiles" (I Tim. iii. 16). In his final letter, written in view of martyrdom, the apostle reiterates his commission, ". . . . . the gospel, whereunto I am appointed a preacher and an apostle and a teacher of the Gentiles" (II Tim. i. 11); and the deliverance which followed upon his first defence is not considered for its own sake, but for the opportunity for accomplishing his ministry:--

> "At my first defence no man stood with me . . . . . notwithstanding the Lord stood with me, and strengthened me; that BY ME the preaching might be fully known, and that ALL THE GENTILE might hear; and I was delivered out of the mouth of the lion" (II Tim. iv. 16).

Thus he who standing at the threshold of the dispensation of the mystery counted not his life dear unto himself, but had just the one desire to finish his course, could say at the close, "I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith".

Although we have quoted just a few passages, the number of references which indicate the Gentile character of Paul's ministry are nearly fifty. Further, such expressions as, "which is come into all the world", "which was preached to every creature under heaven" (Col. i. 6, 23), "A ransom for all", "The Saviour of all men", "Who will have all men to be saved" (I Tim. ii. 4-6, iv. 10); and "the dispensation of the grace of God . . . . . TO YOUWARD", "my sufferings FOR YOU", "the dispensation of God which is given me FOR YOU" (Eph. iii. 2, Col. i. 24, 25) must not be omitted from the number of references.

[NOTE: * - Some authorities consider this a quotation from an early hymn.]

Seeing that this subject with its many and wondrous outworkings constitute the theme of these portions of Scripture, is it any marvel that some, having seen these things, at least in part, feel more and more the burden of making known, by pen and by voice, the claim which, under God, the apostle Paul has upon the ears and the hearts of those who by nature are Gentiles? Is there not, consciously or unconsciously, on the part of many preachers, who otherwise, praise God, still hold fast to the inspired Word, is there not an unexplainable silence, a reticence, with regard to the distinctive message of the apostle to the Gentiles? How many a sermon is preached from a text in Matthew, or the Psalms, or Isaiah, and how vain it seems to hope for one even from Romans, to say nothing of Ephesians!

The day is far spent, the signs of the times indicate to the believer of prophecy that soon the Lord will take up the case and cause of His rejected and downtrodden Israel. If this be so, the opportunities of witnessing to the peculiar grace of God under the terms of the mystery are fast running out. Oh may we, who consider these things, buy up the opportunity, redeem the time, set forth the wondrous message of all spiritual blessings in the superheavenlies, revealed in the gospel as the peculiar blessings of this dispensation of the grace of God TO YOU GENTILES.

Studies in the Book of the Revelation.

#37. The Third Woe and its consummation. (xi. 14-19).

pp. 11 - 15

The first woe was occasioned by the opening of the abyss (ix. 1-11); the second by the loosing of the four angels bound at the river Euphrates (ix. 12-21).

The first woe synchronizes with the fifth trumpet (ix. 1), the second with the sixth trumpet (ix. 13). We now approach the third woe and the seventh trumpet.

> "The second Woe is past; and behold, the third Woe cometh quickly, and the seventh angel sounded."

So far the parallelism is preserved, but when we read on we become conscious of a change in the order of narration. Instead of some more dreadful judgments falling, heaven rings with the joyful news that at long last:--

> "the kingdoms (or sovereignty) of this world are become the kingdom of our Lord, and of His Christ, and He shall reign for the ages of the ages."

Such blessed news cannot constitute the third woe; we must search for further information. It may be remembered that when we reached the sixth seal "the heavens departed as a scroll…….the great day of his wrath is come……." The opening of the seventh seal did not lead further into the future that lies beyond the day of wrath. After the solemn silence in heaven for about half an hour, the seven trumpet angels come forward, and again we follow the narrative step by step until the sixth trumpet and its second woe is past, and then again at the seventh the sequence is broken with the same purpose—the supplying of fuller detail concerning the end. Readers familiar with Daniel's visions will remember the same phenomenon there. The seventh trumpet is evidently pregnant with meaning, for in x. 7 we are told:--

> "But in the days of the voice of the seventh angel, when he shall begin to sound, the mystery of God shall be consummated."

We observe here "in the days", not merely the day, as though this seventh trumpet is protracted: and "when he shall begin, or be about to sound", again indicating a period of time covered by the sounding of the trumpet. The question arises, if this sounding of the seventh trumpet brings the mystery of God to a conclusion, and places Christ upon the throne of the world, what place in the Divine programme do chapters xii.-xx. occupy? The answer is supplied from several considerations:--

1. We must find a place in this seventh trumpet for unprecedented judgment, for with it is associated the third woe; this would therefore reach forward and include the seven vials of wrath of chapter xv. 7.

2. Verse 18 gives a summary (see below) of the events that fill out the sounding of the seventh trumpet, which upon examination will be found to be chapters xii.-xx. in brief.
    a. "The nations were angry, and thy wrath is come.
    b. The time of the dead, that they should be judge.
    c. And the rewarding of God's servants the prophets.
    d. And the saints, and them that fear Thy name, small and great.
    e. And the destruction of those which destroy the earth."

This summary is followed by the statement "that the temple of God was opened in heaven, and there was seen in His temple the Ark of His covenant". Then follow lightnings, and voices, and thunderings, earthquake, and great hail.

It will be evident that the time for judging the dead and giving rewards must reach over to chapter xx. The anger of the nations and the failing wrath, together with the destruction of those who destroy the earth, are also found in the chapters that follow. Some look upon chapter xv. 5 as the resumption of the subject, and place chapters xii.-xiv. as episodes, not strictly in chronological order, which lead up to the same point by other ways. We feel that this is unnecessary.

Upon the proclamation of heaven's King war would be made by Michael upon the Dragon. That this is no fancy is seen by reading xii. 9-12:--

> "And the great Dragon was cast out into the earth, and his angels were cast out with him, and I heard a loud voice saying in heaven, Now is come salvation, and strength, and the Kingdom of our Lord, and the power of His Christ: FOR the accuser of our brethren is cast down…….Woe to the earth…….for the devil is come down unto you having great wrath."

Our search has not been fruitless: here we discover the third woe. The third woe, the proclamation of heaven's King, and the casting out of Satan therefore synchronize. This settles the position of chapter xii. We must not look upon it as a parenthesis—it is an integral part of the subject. We are also able to say, with tolerable certainty, when the seventh angel sounds, and what time the "days" will cover. Upon the casting down of Satan the woman flees into the wilderness for the space of three years and a half. For exactly the same period the outcast Satan gives his authority and throne to the beast from the abyss (xiii. 5). The aionian gospel will be published at this time also, for one of its statements is "for the hour of His judgment is COME". Again, the fall of Babylon, which occupies chapters vii. and xviii. and leads right on to the Hallelujahs of xix., is linked with these chapters, for another angel follows the herald of the aionian gospel announcing that Babylon is fallen.

Chapter xv. introduces the seven angels having the seven last plagues, and these are not poured out until after the beast has arisen (chap. xiii.), for those who had gotten the victory over the beast, and over his image and over his mark and over the number of his name (all found in xiii.) stood upon the sea of glass having the harps of God. Immediately before chapter xii. we read, "and the temple of God was opened in heaven, and there was seen the Ark of His covenant". In chapter xv. the wording is a little different, “the temple of the tabernacle of the testimony in heaven was opened”. Under the “opening” of chapter xi., where the emphasis is upon the covenant, the Lord is seen succouring His own during the time of trouble through which they pass; under the “opening” of chapter xv., where the emphasis is upon the testimony, the Lord is seen visiting with unmitigated judgment the Beast and his followers.

Returning to chapter xi. we would draw attention to the R.V. which follows the best texts in verse 17, “We give Thee thanks, O Lord God Almighty, which art, and wast”. The A.V. wrongly adds “and art to come”. The Lord had come, and that portion of the ineffable name is fulfilled at the sounding of the seventh trumpet. For a fuller exposition of the theme the reader is referred to Volume VIII, pages 40-44.

The several statements, “the Lord, and His Christ”, “the nations were angry, and Thy wrath is come”, refer back to the prophecy of Psa. ii.:--

> “The kings of the earth set themselves, and the rulers take counsel together against the Lord and against His anointed.”
> “Then shall He speak to them in His wrath.”
> “Yet have I anointed my King upon My holy hill of Zion.”

The words of Dan. vii. 21, 22, and 26, 27, seem very fitting here:--

> “And I beheld, and the same horn made war against the saints and prevailed against them, until the Ancient of days came, and judgment was given to the saints of the Most High; and the time came that the saints possessed the kingdom…….but the judgment shall sit, and they shall take away his dominion, to consume and to destroy it unto the end, and the kingdom and dominion and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High, whose kingdom is an aionian kingdom, and all dominions shall serve and obey Him.”

The following simple diagram may help the reader to realize the chronology of the seventh trumpet:--

The Time of the Seventh Trumpet, 3½ years.

The woman fed for 1,260 days (xii. 6).
A time, times and a half a time (xii. 14).
The beast has power 42 months (xiii. 5).
The Seven Vials (xv., xvi.).
Babylon falls (xiv. 8).
The final 3½ years of Daniel’s to weeks (Dan. ix. 27).

If the above suggestion is true, then it would appear that the breaking of the covenant in the midst of the week (Dan. ix.) is answered by the opening of the temple containing God’s covenant. The giving over of the throne and great authority of Satan to the Beast is answered by the proclamation of Heaven’s King (xi. 15). It is the date also of the catching up of the man child to God and His throne (xii. 5). The Lord too may descend from heaven to the air immediately after the pouring out of the seventh vial—“and the seventh angel poured out his vial into the air”—and the hope of I Thess. iv. will be realized.

When Satan is cast out of heaven with his angels, the place will be occupied by the Church of the One Body, whose sphere of blessing and service is in the heavenly places, where at present wicked spirits are (Eph. vi. 12).

When Satan loses his authority of the air (Eph. ii. 2), the church of the Acts dispensation will occupy that region.

When Satan is taken and cast into the abyss, the kingdom under the whole heaven will be given to Israel.

Thus each section attains its hope upon the ejection of Satan from their destined sphere of glory.

The Mystery of God finishes with the seventh trumpet. That mystery may have several phases and different planes, but all focus in the exalted pre-eminence of Christ.

Thus far we have considered the preliminary statement of the third woe and its consummation. We can now give attention to the various steps which lead to that blessed end, which we hope to do in our next article.

#38. The Man-child caught up to God (xii.).
pp. 43 - 46

A great sign in heaven appears in chapter xii. This is the first time the word "sign" (sēmeion) occurs in the Apocalypse. The sign is that of a woman clothed with the sun, with the moon under her feet, and upon her head a crown of twelve stars. A contrast is evidently intended with the woman of chapter xvii.:--

> "And the woman was clothed (same word as in xii. 1) with purple and scarlet and adorned with gold and precious stones and pearls…….the woman whom thou sawest is that great city which reigneth over the Kings of the earth."

This city's name is Babylon, and in it is brought to its head the mystery of iniquity (xvii. 5). Chapter xii. also has the sign of a woman, which also represents a city (and the system for which the city stands). The one is the false, the other the true, the one is supported by the beast, the other is attacked by the dragon. In Gen. xxxvii. 9 the sun, moon and eleven stars represent Jacob, his wife, and his eleven sons. The woman is Jerusalem, the city of David and of Israel. She is represented as being on the eve of giving birth to a child.

Another sign is seen in heaven: a great fiery red dragon, having the insignia of the final phase of Gentile dominion, stood before the woman, ready to devour her child as soon as it should be born. The sun, moon and stars, the woman's emblems, seems to indicate a power from heaven. This is in direct contrast with the seven heads and ten horns and the seven diadems, which plainly indicate the powers of the beast that support the woman of Rev. xvii. (see verse 3).

The dragon in the sign is said to draw the third part of the stars from heaven and cast them to the earth. This is taken by some to refer to the fall of Satan away back in the beginning, but we cannot see how this fact can come into the story here. There is no necessity to leave the period under view, for the reference to the stars is interpreted in verse 9, "and his angels were cast out with him", viz., at the moment of the defeat by Michael. The chief interest of the passage however is the man-child that is born:--

> "And she brought forth a man-child, who was to rule all nations with a rod of iron; and her child was caught up unto God, and His throne" (xii. 5).

To whom does this refer? Undoubtedly the words in the first instance are prophetic of Christ Himself, as we find them in Psa. ii. In Rev. ii. 26, 27 these words are quoted of the overcomer:--

> "And he that overcometh, and keepeth My works unto the end, to him will I give power over the nations, and he shall rule them with a rod of iron; as the vessels of a potter shall they be broken to shivers: even as I received of My Father."

In Volume VII, pages 97-101, we pointed out the way in which the seven churches of chapters ii. and iii. were related to the rest of the book. The reader is referred to the article for the complete statement, argument, and illustration. We now merely extract the portion which bears upon our present study:--

> THE THYATIRA CHURCH (ii. 18-29).—The woman Jezebel; the morning star; the rod of iron; the depths of Satan; keep works; faith and patience; false prophetess; her children killed.
> THE THYATIRA PERIOD (xii. and xiii.).—The woman clothed with the sun; the twelve stars; the rod of iron; Satan; keep commandments; patience and faith; false prophet; God's children killed.

The close parallel between the "church" and the "period" in each case provides a valuable key to interpretation. There in the future day to which Revelation refers this man-child is born. This cannot refer to Christ personally, but it can indicate that company of faithful overcomers who share the millennial reign of Christ. The catching up of this man-child to God and His throne precedes the tribulation, it is a complete escape from that day of trouble. In Matt. xxiv. 4-8 we have the beginning of the birth-pains, which are the false Christs, wars, famines, pestilences and earthquakes. These have already been indicated in the opening of the seals. They lead the way for the tribulation under the Beast and false Prophet, and when they reach their meridian, the man-child is born.

After the man-child is caught up the woman flees into the wilderness. So in Matt. xxiv., after the period spoken of as the beginning of birth-pains, which synchronizes with Rev. xii. 2, we hear of affliction and hatred, of offence and betrayal, of false prophets who deceive. At the same time a gospel activity is indicated witnessing to all nations before the end come.

About this same time the abomination of desolation spoken of by Daniel the prophet will be set up in the holy place. This evidently refers to the image of the Beast, Daniel's prophecy indicates that the setting up of this abomination occurs in the midst of the final seven years there referred to. This would leave 3½ years for the tribulation to run until "the end". So, in perfect harmony, we read that the woman is fed 1,260 days (xii. 6), or (as in xii. 14), "a time, times and a half", in line with Daniel's cryptic utterance. Three years and a half therefore before the end, and before the revelation of the Lord, the man-child is caught up. This is the rapture of the overcomers. Some will be "accounted worthy to escape all these things that shall come to pass" (Luke xxi. 36). The man-child caught up and escaping the tribulation, the woman who flees into the wilderness, and the remnants of her seed which are attacked by the dragon, cannot possibly represent the same company of people. There are the overcomers who are destined to rule; there is the woman, shielded, fed and protected in the wilderness; there are the seed that are left, who are persecuted. It is evident that some believers are left to endure the fierce wrath of the last days. Our attention however must be kept for the present upon the man-child. Verse 11 adds a detail as to the character of these overcomers:--

> "And they overcame him because of the blood of the Lamb, and because of the word of their testimony, and they loved not their lives unto the death."

The sign is a child under the menace of Satanic destruction; the reality is the faithful testimony of those who loved not their lives unto the death. The dragon waiting to devour is interpreted in verse 10 as "accusing the brethren before God day and night". The moment of the rapture of these overcomers is at the sounding of the seventh trumpet:--

> "NOW is come salvation and strength, and the KINGDOM of our God, and the power of His Christ, for the accuser of our brethren is cast down" (xii. 10).

The words "our brethren" attract attention. Who is it that say these words? The speaker ("I heard a loud voice saying in heaven") is unnamed, but it is clear, from all other similar references, that it cannot be a man. In Rev. xxii. 9 an ANGEL says to John:--

> "I am a fellow servant with thee and with thy brethren, the prophets, and with them that keep the sayings of this book."

We adopt the translation given in the Diaglott. "I am a fellow servant of thee", sounds a contradiction in English. It means that the angel and John and the brethren are all upon one common level in this aspect. An ANGEL, therefore, appears to be the one who calls the overcomers "our brethren". These overcomers are to be identified with the Church of the first-born who are enrolled in heaven (Heb. xii. 22). These have come to Mount Zion (so had the hundred and forty-four thousand, Rev. xiv. 1); and unto the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem. This is also said of the overcomers (Rev. iii. 12). These had also come unto an innumerable company of angels, the general assembly. The casting out of the great dragon to the earth ushers in the third and last woe:--

> "Rejoice, ye heavens, and ye that dwell in them, woe to the inhabiters of the earth, and the sea! for the Devil is come down, having great wrath, because he knoweth he hath but a short time" (xii. 12).

The woman is carried away to a place prepared for her, and nourished in the wilderness for the rest of the period until the kingdom is set up on earth. To this period applies the LORD'S PRAYER. "Thy Kingdom come, Thy will be done on earth, as it is in heaven." These words will be the heartfelt utterance of this persecuted company, and while experiencing again the manna in the wilderness, they will pray with real understanding, and not with vain repetition, "Give us this day the bread that cometh down upon us". The word rendered "daily" in the prayer occurs nowhere else in Scripture, nor, as far as we know, in any writing in the Greek language. It is a word which can only be fulfilled by the repetition of the miracle of the manna, and this is what does take place.

The Scriptures speak of several companies of believers, some ready, some unready, some watchful, some asleep, some like wise virgins, some like unwise, one taken, the other left, one child of the woman caught up to God and His throne, other of her seed suffering the wrath of the dragon, some sheltered in heaven and the secret of His presence, others sheltered in the wilderness. The Church of the One Body, while not connected with these phases of the great plan, should give heed to these differences and seek to profit thereby.

#39. The Two Beasts (xiii.).

pp. 71 - 74

"The Devil is come down having great wrath", and the most appalling programme of evil immediately ensues. The R.V. places the opening of chapter xiii. at the close of chapter xii., and follows the critical Greek texts by reading "and he stood upon the sand of the sea", instead of the A.V. reading "I stood". Before attempting to analyze the intricate details of this chapter it will be necessary to look at it as a whole. It is divided into two parts closely related:--

1-10	speak of the beast that arises from the sea.
11-18	speak of the beast that arises from the earth.

These two parts run parallel to one another in detail:--

A | 1-. And I saw.
B | -1. A beast rise up out of the sea.
C | -1-2-. Like unto a leopard, etc.
D | -2. His authority. Satanic.
E | 3. The deadly wound healed.
F | 7. War with the saints.
G | 9, 10. a | "Let him hear."
b | "Here is patience."
A | 11-. And I saw.
B | -11-. Another beast arise up out of the earth.
C | -11. Like a lamp.
D | 12-. His authority. The first beast.
E | -12-15-. The deadly wound healed; the image worshipped.
F | -15-17. Death for those who worship not.
G | 18. b | "Here is wisdom."
a | "Let him count."

Those who have read Dr. Bullinger's Apocalypse will have no difficulty in tracing the origin of this structure. We have altered it in a few minor details only. It will help us to observe these several features more closely. The first beast rises out of the sea, called up by the devil who stood upon the sand of the sea. The sea out of which the beast ascends is evidently the same as seen by Daniel in the vision recorded in chapter vii. of his book:--

> "I saw in my vision by night, and, behold, the four winds strove upon the great sea; and four beasts came up from the sea, diverse one from the other."

In Rev. xii. one beast arises out from the sea. When the interpretation of this vision is given to Daniel we read:--

> "These great beasts, which are four, are four kings, which shall arise out of the EARTH."

The "great sea" of the vision can be interpreted of the "earth". This is strange if the literal Mediterranean is intended, but if peoples and nations are symbolized here as in other places, the difficulty vanishes. Daniel next describes these beasts: the first was like a lion and had eagle's wings; the second was like a bear; the third was like unto leopard with four wings and four heads; the fourth was indescribable, it was dreadful and terrible and strong exceedingly, it devoured and broke in pieces the other three beasts, it was diverse from the others and it had ten horns. John in Rev. xiii. sees only one beast, but immediately we begin to read its description we realize that he saw the nondescript beast which devoured the other three, and is here found with all their characteristics merged into one huge combination of Satanic power:--

> "And the beast which I saw was like unto a leopard (third beast) and his feet were as the feet of a bear (second beast) and his mouth as the mouth of a lion (first beast)."

Both are said to have ten horns. Attention is drawn to the leopard having four heads, while the nondescript beast of Rev. xiii. has seven. This difference is accounted for simply by seeing that the other two are added to his own and the leopard's four. These earlier beasts are kings, each having some special feature represented by the lion, bear, or leopard. The beast of Rev. xiii. will be a combination of all these and more.

There is to be observed here a similarity to the final phase of the same Gentile dominion as represented by the great image of Nebuchadnezzar's dream. While successive monarchies are positively intended by the various metals (for Daniel thus interprets the parts), nevertheless, when the stone which is Christ's kingdom strikes the feet of the image, the whole image (gold, silver, brass, iron and clay) is smashed at the same time, indicating that at the time of the end Gentile misrule will be concentrated in one awful monster energized by the devil, and Babylon will be its seat of government. As at the beginning, the power, the throne and the great authority of the beast will be those received from Satan. These are given to the beast in exchange for the greatest thing that Satan covets—WORLD WORSHIP. Think of the temptation of Christ in the wilderness. Satan there shows Christ all the kingdoms of the world and the glory of them, and says, "All these things will I give Thee, if Thou wilt fall down and worship me". What a tragedy! How art thou fallen, Lucifer, son of the morning!

One of the heads of the beast was wounded, or "slain to death", and the deadly wound was healed. This travesty of the resurrection of Christ causes all the world to wonder after the beast, and to worship the dragon. The inner thought of the people is expressed by the words, "Who is like unto the beast, who is able to make war with him?" We do not wish to be fanciful, yet we are confident that Scripture fully anticipates the end. Military experts, as well as the man in the street, know that the next war is to be a war in the air. Britain's boasted isolation and ocean bulwark have been breached, the invasion of these islands has been considered well-nigh impossible; now we know that the introduction of aerial warfare has broken down all such frontiers. That nation, large or small, which has dominion of the air, will conquer the world. Satan is called "the Prince of the authority of the air" (Eph. ii.). Satan gives his great authority to the beast, the result being that all the world at once recognize his position; "Who is able to make war with him?"

There are indications that the beast will be small and obscure in its origin, but this will matter nothing then. Daniel sees among the ten horns another little horn, which emulates the beast that carries it by plucking up three of the horns by the roots, as the beast had devoured the three beasts before it:--

> "The fourth beast shall be the fourth kingdom upon the earth…….and the ten horns out of this kingdom are ten kings that shall arise, and another shall arise after them; and he shall be diverse from the first, and he shall subdue three kings, and he shall speak great words against the Most High, and shall wear out the saints of the Most High, and think to change times and laws, and they shall be given into his hand until a time and times and the dividing of time" (Dan. vii. 23-25).

The parallel in Rev. xiii. is remarkable:--

> "And there was given unto him a mouth speaking great things, and blasphemies, and power was given unto him forty and two months…….to make war with the saints, and to overcome them."

In the light of Dan. vii. we realize that the interest passes from the beast as a whole to "the horn that shall arise". This is more fully dealt with in chap. xvii., the main outline being sufficient here. The second beast, who is called the false prophet (xix. 20), leads the world to worship the first beast whose deadly wound was healed. This beast has power to perform miracles, he makes fire come down from heaven, and deceives them that dwell on the earth by means of those miracles which he had power to do in the sight of the beast. An image to the beast is made, and life is given to it so that the image speaks, all who refuse to worship the beast are ordered to be killed. Who that reads these words does not think of the image in the plain of Dura, the dulcimers and the sackbut and all kinds of music, the command, "whoso falleth not down and worshippeth shall the same hour be cast into the midst of a burning fiery furnace". We remember the noble answer of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego:--

> "O Nebuchadnezzar, we are not careful to answer thee in this matter; if it be so, our God whom we serve is able to deliver us from the burning fiery furnace, and He will deliver us out of thine hand, O king: BUT IF NOT (what a marvelous lack of worldly wisdom! What a ruthless lack of compromise! but if not), be it known unto thee, O king, that we will not serve thy gods, nor worship the golden image thou hast set up" (Dan. iii. 16-18).

The glorious testimony of these three, together with the equally glorious witness presently of Daniel himself under a similar trial (vi. 1-28), while being historic fact concerned personally with the four men named, is placed in the prophecy, illustrating for us more plainly than any vision could portray the days of the beast and the false prophet, and the sterling testimony of those who:--

> "overcame because of the blood of the Lamb, and because of the word of their testimony, and they loved not their lives unto the death."

As Nebuchadnezzar testified that one like unto a son of God walked with the faithful three in the furnace, so angelic fellowship will be granted to those who are faithful even unto death.

The epistles of Paul speak of the end of this age in terms of apostasy and darkness. Let us not be merely moved as we read the splendid courage and faithful witness of these men of old, let us also in our day and generation hold fast the faithful word, even to the extent of saying the "But if not" of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego.

#40. The Patience and Faith of the Saints (xiii. 10).
pp. 100 - 103

We observed in our last paper that the personal incidents interwoven in Daniel's prophecy were in themselves prophetic. This is true of chapter iv. as well as of chapter iii. Nebuchadnezzar himself is smitten by the watchers, and during a period of seven times becomes to all intents and purposes a beast of the field. Had the event no prophetic meaning, the cryptic words "seven times" would not have been written; we should have read "seven years".

In the lycanthropy of the head of gold may be seen the nature of Gentile dominion in the sight of God. It is that of a beast, and as a monster it emerges at the close, including in its composite character all the cruelty, oppression, and power of the kingdoms that had passed away. We will not attempt a consideration of details in Rev. xiii. until we have seen one further connection, this time with II Thess. ii. We have seen that the whole chapter (Rev. xiii.) is devoted to the beast from the sea and the beast from the earth.

II Thess. ii. 1-12.

A | 1-3. The day of the Lord, not yet.
B | 3. The apostasy.
C | 3. The revelation of the man of sin.
D | 4. Showing himself that he is God (see Rev. xiii. 6-8).
A | 5, 6. He holdeth fast, his own season.
B | 7. The mystery of iniquity.
C | 8. The revelation of the wicked one.
D | 9. With all power, and signs, and lying wonders.

Again we acknowledge the help received from Dr. Bullinger's Apocalypse in making this comparison. Here we have one called "the man of sin, the son of perdition", and his recorded act is that he

> "opposeth and exalteth himself above all that is called God, or that is worshipped, so that he as God sitteth in the temple of God, shewing himself that he is God."

We believe this to be one individual, and not the whole beast of Rev. xiii. Antichrist is a person, the beast is a power. This surely is the abomination of desolation in the holy place, and is the signal for the believer to flee from Judea to the mountains. This is but the plain way of speaking about the woman carried on eagle wings and nourished in the wilderness.

The Thessalonians were informed that the day of the Lord could not have set in because several events had not taken place. The day could not come until the apostasy had set in. While "he holdeth fast" the final wickedness cannot be manifested, but as soon as Satan is cast out of heaven, comes down to the earth in great wrath and stand upon the sand of the sea, then is the moment for the final throw. God Himself is challenged and the world worships the Dragon; truly a burning fiery furnace for the faithful few in those days. No wonder each of the seven Churches have special promises given to the overcomer. In Rev. xix. 20 we read:--

> "And the beast was taken, and with him the false prophet that wrought miracles before him, with which he deceived them that had received the mark of the beast."

Note this order, "he deceived them that HAD RECEIVED", they received first, they were not deceived first. Now note II Thess. ii. 9-12:--

> "Whose presence (parousia) is after the working of Satan with all power and signs, and lying wonders, and with all deceivableness of unrighteousness in them that perish: BECAUSE THEY RECEIVED NOT the love of the truth, that they might be saved. And for this cause God shall send them strong delusion that they should believe the lie, that they all might be judged who believed not the truth, but had pleasure in unrighteousness."

Here the same order is followed, they are deceived, because they would not receive, they will not believe the truth, they do believe the lie; not merely a lie, but the lie. John viii. 44, speaking of the Devil says, "he is a liar, and the father of IT". Christ is the truth, the old man is the lie (Eph. iv. 21-25, "wherefore putting away the lie."). All Satan's works are "the lie". With a lie he deceived our first parents saying, "ye shall not surely die"; with some similar lie he sets God aside in favour of himself and his false Messiah at the end. If all this iniquity finds its home in Babylon, it has but returned to its original home. Speaking of the Babylonian apostasy, Rom. i. 18-32 uses terms similar to II Thess. ii.

> "They changed the truth of God into the lie, and worshipped and served the creature more than the Creator."
>
> "They changed the glory of the incorruptible God into an IMAGE made like to corruptible man."

The words of II Thess. ii. are further echoed in Rom. i. 32, where it speaks of those who "have pleasure in them that do them". The miracles wrought by the energy of Satan are called "powers and signs and wonders of falsehood". These three words are used in Heb. ii. 4 without the words "of falsehood" to describe the miracles of the Acts of the Apostles. This fact should be enough to teach us that the miracles performed by the false prophet will be real enough even as Jannes and Jambres were able in many instances to work miracles in opposition to the miracles of Moses. The peril with which many so-called Pentecostal movements are fraught becomes clear in the light of this fact. The work of Satan will be such a counterfeit of truth as to deceive if it were possible the very elect. "Here is the patience and faith of the saints." In the somewhat confused state of the Greek text of Rev. xiii. 10, the safe course to follow is to turn to the Hebrew original to which this passage alludes:--

> "And when he cometh, he shall smite the land of Egypt, and deliver such as are for death; and such as are for captivity to captivity; and such as are for the sword to the sword" (Jer. xliii. 11).

Rev. xiii. 10 therefore should be rendered:--

> "If any one is for captivity into captivity he goeth; if any one is to be killed with the sword he is killed; here is the patience and faith of the saints" (see also xiv. 12, 13 for similar thought).

For forty-two months it will be given to the beast to make war with the saints and to OVERCOME them. Many will have the patience and faith of Shadrach, Meshach and Abed-nego and say, "but if not…….we will not serve thy gods". To this period belong such Psalms as Psa. x.:--

> "Why standest Thou afar off, O Lord? Why hidest Thou Thyself in a time of trouble? The wicked in his pride doth persecute the poor…….the wicked boasteth of his heart's desires…….the wicked through pride of his countenance will not seek after God."

The Psalm closes with the coming of the Lord:--

> "To judge the fatherless and the oppressed, that THE MAN OF THE EARTH may no more oppress."

Again, Psalm xi. says:--

> "If the foundations be destroyed, what shall the righteous do?"

The answer is supplied in the next verse:--

> "The Lord is in His Holy temple, the Lord's throne is in heaven: His eyes behold, His eyelids try the children of men, the Lord TRIETH the righteous."

"Here is the patience and faith of the saints."

> "Upon the wicked He shall rain snares, fire and brimstone, and an horrible tempest, this shall be the portion of their cup."

Here we have in one verse the awful outpouring of wrath detailed in the Revelation. Psalm xii. again deals with the same period of trial:--

> "Help, Lord; for the godly man ceaseth; for the faithful fail from among the children of men…….the wicked walk on every side, when the vilest of the sons of men are exalted."

Psalm xiv. sums up the great man of Satan's right hand.

> "The FOOL hath said in his heart, let God not be."

Doubtless in that day of darkness the "fools" will be, apparently, those who trust in a God who saves them not, who cry to a God who is afar off. "Here is the patience and faith of the saints", "the just shall live by his faith", "yet a little while and He shall come, and will not tarry". Do we wonder that, patient as they were, John, who was their brother and companion in tribulation, and in the kingdom and patience of Jesus, records the cry:--

> "How long, O Lord, holy and true, dost Thou not judge and avenge our blood on them that dwell on the earth?"

John expresses the one great cry that will go up to the throne on high from that awful arena, “Even so, come, Lord Jesus”.

> “Oh that Thou wouldest rend the heavens and come down” (Isa. lxiv. 1).

#41. 666, the number of his name (xiii. 18).
pp. 129 - 135

The mark of the beast, what visions this calls up! The number of his name, on this theme what volumes have been written! Yet must we add our effort in the endeavour to understand what God has written for our learning.

Those who will not worship the beast will be put to death; the refusal of the mark, the name, or the number will be punished by hunger and ostracism, a living death. We must first bring together in some sort of order the references to this name, mark and number, and observe anything that will lead us on in the understanding of the problem.

Mark.

> “And he causeth all, even the small and the great, and the rich and the poor, and the free and the bond, to receive a mark on their right hands, or upon their foreheads, that no man should be able to buy or sell except he who had the mark.” (xiii. 16, 17).
>
> “If any one worshipped the beast and his image, and receiveth his mark on his forehead, or on his hand, even he shall drink of the wine of God’s fury” (xiv. 9).
>
> “And there broke out a noisome and grievous sore upon the men who had the mark of the beast” (xvi. 2).
>
> “The miracles…….with which he had deceived them that had received the mark of the beast” (xix. 20).
>
> “And whosoever did not worship the beast…….and did not receive the mark on their foreheads and on their hands, both lived and reigned with Christ a thousand years” (xx. 4).
>
> NOTE.—The words “and from his mark”, in xv. 2, are omitted by G.L.T.Tr.A., W.H. and R.V. This gives 6 occurrences of the word.

The Mark of his Name.

> “They have no rest day and night…….whosoever receiveth the mark of his name” (xiv. 11).

The Name.

> “That no one should be able to buy or sell except he who has the mark, or the name of the beast” (xiii. 17).

The Number of his Name.

> “That no one should be able to buy or sell except he who has…….the number of his name” (xiii. 17).
> “Those who had gotten the victory…….from the number of his name” (xv. 2).

It will be seen that while the mark and the name are spoken of separately, both the expression "the mark of his name" and "the number of his name" point to the fact that in both cases it is the NAME that signifies. Before going further into "the number of his name" we shall learn a little by contrast from the emphasis laid in this book upon the name of the Lord and the application of that name to the believers of the period:--

The Name (the Lord Himself).

"Hast not denied My name" (iii. 8).
"He had a name written that no man knew" (xix. 19).
"His name is called the Word of God" (xix. 13).
"On His thigh a name written, King of kings and Lord of lords" (xix. 16).

The second reference demands a moment's consideration before proceeding. The Vatican MS reads in xix. 12, "many diadems having names written, and a name written, which no one knows except Himself". The reading of the Vatican MS are of the highest importance and for the most part correct. This gives us our first contrast:--

The Beast.	Christ.
"Upon his horns ten diadems and upon his head names of blasphemy" (xiii. 1).	"Upon His head many diadems, having names written" (xix. 12).

Surely it is patent to all that the name written on the many diadems of Christ will be the exact contrast to those blasphemous names written on the heads of the beast. If "blasphemy" sums up the seven names of the beast, the words "holiness to the Lord" will sum up the names on the diadems of the King-Priest of God. Another name, written on the thigh of the coming Christ, is "King of kings, and Lord of lords". This name is in direct contrast to Gentile domination. Daniel uses the words in his interpretation to Nebuchadnezzar of the head of gold, "Thou, O King, art a KING OF KINGS…….ruler over all" (Dan. ii. 37, 38), and we meet it again in Rev. xvii. 18, "and the woman (supported by the beast)…….is that great city, which reigneth over the KINGS of the earth".

The Name (the believers).

"Him that overcometh will I make a pillar in the temple of my God…….and I will write on him THE NAME of My God…….and My new name" (iii. 12).
"An 144,000, having His name, and the name of His Father on their foreheads" (xiv. 1).
"And they shall see His face, and His name shall be on their foreheads" (xxii. 4).

Here is a most evident contrast with the devotees of the beast. The world at that time will be divided into two classes, the huge majority, those that receive the mark of the beast; the persecuted minority, those that deny not the name of the Lord, and who receive the name of the Lamb on their foreheads. Here we must examine a second contrast which is instructive.

The Beast.	Christ.
The name of the BEAST upon the foreheads of those that dwell on the earth.	The name of the LAMB upon the foreheads of 144,000.

Christ in His twofold character in this book is Lamb and Lion. The Beast in his composite character is a combination of Leopard, Bear, and Lion. The Lion in both represents kingship, and this is common to both (see quotation from Dan. ii. above). The Lamb is the Redeemer, the Leopard and the Bear the Destroyer. Some are marked with the name of the Redeemer, others are numbered among those that destroy the earth; the former in harmony with that name are "redeemed" from among men (xiv. 4), the latter in harmony with their mark are "destroyed" (xi. 18).

We now look at the "number of his name". As we have received help by placing Christ in contrast with the Beast, we will continue to do so as we examine this number. The reader is probably aware that both the Hebrew and the Greek alphabets serve for both letters and numbers. The name "Jesus" in Greek characters is written IESOUS. The numerical value of each letter in order is 10, 8, 200, 70, 400, 200, which added together give the great contrast to the number of the beast, 888. In the same way Lord (Kurios) = 800. We have already had occasion to refer to the typical character of Daniel and his three friends. It is highly significant that their Hebrew names give the very same number as the name Jesus!

DANIEL.	95	\
HANANIAH.	120	\	Total
MISAEL.	381	/	888
AZARIAH.	292	/

Without pursuing this feature further we feel that in this recognition of the lordship of "Jesus", and the absolute refusal to bow down and worship the image of the beast, the contrast with the number of the name of the beast is manifested, and by the contrast the character of the beast is brought to light.

Before proceeding further we pause to observe that Irenaeus tells us that some ancient copies of the Apocalypse in his day read 616 instead of 666. While there is no doubt that 666 is the true reading, the fact that such a number as 616 found advocates suggests that there was a reason for the alteration, and that it must not be attributed to carelessness on the part of the scribe. It will be remembered that when the Apostle wrote to the Thessalonians concerning the advent of the beast in II Thess. ii. he uses rather cryptic language, referring to something he had told them which he would not commit to writing. Again, when Jeremiah wished to refer to the King of Babylon he refers to him as Sheshach (Jer. xxv. 26). The Massõrah explains that this word stands for Babel. The system upon which this is worked is the reversal of the Alphabet; thus, since "b" is the second letter of the Hebrew Alphabet, and "sh", the second from the end, "sh" stands for "b"; so with the place of "l" and "ch", respectively. Jeremiah, Paul, and John use cryptic methods when speaking of the beast.

The suggestion that John in the Apocalypse refers to the Hebrew is not to be despised. In the Talmud and other Rabbinical writings the words Neron, Kesar (the Caesar Nero) often occur. The gematria of the Hebrew words are 666. If, however, this name be written in the Latin way, Nero Caesar, it amounts to 616, the alternative reading of Irenaeus' reference. Now, if Nero was intended by John and by Paul, we can understand how convenient at the time the method of Jer. xxv. 26 would be. Moreover, if some wrote the name after the Latin fashion they would be tempted to consider 616 to be correct and not 666.

The reader by this time may be asking, Does this writer of this article believe that Rome is the Beast of Rev. xiii.? We will answer that question by asking another. Was John the Baptist Elijah? John the Baptist, when asked the question said he was not (see John i.); Christ when asked the question said he was:--

> "I say unto you that Elias is come already…….then the disciples understood that He spake of John the Baptist" (Matt. xvii. 12, 13).
>
> "For all the prophets and the law prophesied until John, AND IF YE WILL RECEIVE IT, this is Elias, which was for to come" (Matt. xi. 14, 15).
> "He shall go before Him in the spirit and power of Elias" (Luke i. 17).

John was Elias, IF…….! Rome would have been the Beast of Rev. xiii., IF…….! the "if" here was the repentance of Israel. Israel however did not repent, and the nation was set aside, and Rome was not the beast. When the Lord Jesus commenced His ministry He could say "THE TIME is fulfilled, the kingdom of God is at hand, repent and believe the gospel" (Mark i. 15). Had Israel repented (we speak after the manner of men) there must have been at hand all material ready for the final sphere of Gentile dominion. Surely the times that could produce a Herod (Acts xii. note carefully) could produce the Antichrist! surely the age that could see the rise of such as Nero could produce the Beast!

One of the objections to Rome is that it never really held possession of Babylon. This is not by any means a difficulty, neither is it a valid objection. Jerusalem, not Babylon, is the Key. Babylon, Medo-Persia, Greece, Rome, each in turn held JERUSALEM, and that fact constituted it the successor in Gentile dominion. Rome it was that compelled the mother of Christ to travel to Bethlehem, Rome's penny it was that was shown to the Lord, Rome it was that crucified Christ, Rome's soldiers that guarded His tomb, Rome itself was the final place of appeal of the Apostle Paul. Upon the failure of Israel the prophetic Image of Daniel enters into mystery. The first three dynasties are named, Babylon, Persia, Greece, the rest remained unnamed. Rome succeeded to the domination of Jerusalem, and after Rome came the Turk. This lasted until the taking of Jerusalem by General Allenby. The Gentiles are nearing the end of the period foreshadowed by Nebuchadnezzar's image.

STONE, THE KINGDOM OF THE LORD, THE 7th TRUMPET, (Rev. x., xi.).

We are aware that the imagination has run riot with the gematria of names. Names as disconnected as those of Napoleon, Mahomet and Martin Luther! finding their places in the list. Rome however does not come in this fanciful category.

Apart from the computation of the number of the name we can learn something more concerning the character of this final phase by the occurrences of the number elsewhere and its significance. Take for example the revenue of Solomon in one year (I Kings x. 14)., viz., 666 talents of gold. Surely we can see something more than a hint in this that one of the gods of Gentiles dominion will be Mammon:--

> "The merchandise of gold, and silver, and precious stones, and of pearls, and fine linen, and purple, and silk, and scarlet and all thyine wood, &c." (Rev. xviii. 12, 13).

From the battle of Actium (B.C. 31) to the Saracen conquest (A.D. 636) the period of Rome's domination of Jerusalem is 666 years. Again, we still speak of 360 degrees of the circle, 60 minutes, 60 seconds. This is a survival of the Assyrian system of reckoning, which has 6 as its main factor. Strangely enough Rome's numerals, which we still use on our clock dials, inscriptions, etc., are six in number, i. v. x. l. C. D. (the M for thousand is a composite figure), and their numerical value is 666. Six is the number of man. Man was created on the sixth day; for six years Athaliah usurped the throne of David (II Kings xi.; II Chron. xxiii.), six words are used of Man in the Bible. Goliath, one of the many foreshadowings of the beast, was 6 cubits high, had 6 pieces of armour, his spear's head weighed 600 shekels. Nebuchadnezzar's image which he set up was 60 cubits high and 6 cubits broad, introduced by 6 instruments of music. Dr. Bullinger tells us that the gematria of the Hebrew words of Dan. iii. 1, which describe the setting up of the image, is 4,662, the facts of which are 7*666.

One further remark before closing. We do not use the word Antichrist when speaking of the beast of Rev. xiii. The word does not occur in the Revelation. The Antichrist is spoken of by John in his first epistle. The beast will be the great world power at the end, the Antichrist will be the great apostate false Messiah. The beast of Rev. xiii. is not a false Messiah, it is a political power, Nero well foreshadows the Beast, Herod the Antichrist. The Antichrist will sell the people of Israel and help on the time of trouble, he will be a renegade Jew; Judas the betrayer was called "the son of perdition". By confusing these two titles (Antichrist and Beast) we are apt to mystify ourselves and misunderstand the Scriptures. The number of man, the number of the name of the beast, apart from the cryptic reference to the individual himself, tell us that he will be the climax MAN, deified, worshipped—and destroyed with the brightness of the appearing of the Son of God. The League of Nations is preparatory to the development of the ten Kings, the ten toes of the image.

Praise God for the blessed hope that is even nearer than that awful time.

#42. The 144,000 and THE LIE (xiv. 1-8).
pp. 160 - 163

In immediate succession, and as we have seen in designed contrast, to the reference to the enforcing under penalty of death of the mark of the beast comes the vision of the 144,000, having the name of the Lamb and of His Father in their foreheads. In chapter vii. we have the sealing of the number; in chapter xiv. the relation between the two companies is shown. The 144,000 are "firstfruits unto God and to the Lamb"; the great multitude is the harvest that follows.

The elect company are seen standing upon mount Zion. Zion, or Sion, means a stronghold; upon Zion God will yet set His King (Psa. ii.); "out of Zion" shall come the Salvation of Israel (Psa. xiv. 7), strengthening (xx. 2), the shining of God (l. 2), the rod of Messiah's strength (cx. 2), blessing to, and from, the Lord (cxxviii. 5, cxxxv. 21), and the law (Isa. ii. 3). It is evidently central, a place of administration and of strength.

The epistle to the Hebrews in chapter xii. speaks of two companies which bear a relation to each other very parallel with that of the firstfruits and harvest here. The first part of Heb. xii. speaks of sons, the second of the first-born, introduced by the reference to Esau and his birthright. One of the statements made concerning their position is that they had "come unto Mount Sion". In both places mount Sion is connected with the overcomers, and their victory is the theme of the new song (which none could learn by rote, but only through experience) before the throne.

Singing is with understanding, and the nature of their victory is explained in Rev. xiv. 4, 5, "they are virgins". In our English language a virgin always means a female, but in the Greek it is not necessarily so. Here in Rev. xiv. 4 it cannot be so, for the passage reads, "these are they who were not defiled with women, for they are virgins". We do not wish to enlarge upon this, but feel we must warn our readers against spiritualizing the passage away. Rom. i. 18-32, the history of Israel from Balaam's stumbling-block to Solomon's shame, the prophetic utterances of Paul, Peter, and Jude concerning the character of the end, and the testimony of the Revelation itself, all go to show that moral uncleanness, Satanic religion, doctrines of demons, and idolatry go hand in hand.

The transition from the truth to the lie is strongly marked in Rom. i. 18-32, "the lie" being the one great covering title of the whole Satanic programme, which includes uncleanness and a reprobate mind. One need have but the slightest acquaintance with the undercurrent of life in great cities to know that should immorality ever receive the sanction of religion, devotees would flock in their millions to its shrine.

These 144,000 sealed ones have been preserved from the doctrines of Balaam or Jezebel; "they are virgins"; "in their mouth was not found (the) LIE, for they are blameless". All the best texts read lie instead of "guile", they are blameless with regard to the LIE. The lie is believed as a result of not receiving the love of the truth

(II Thess. ii.). The overcomers who repudiate the lie stand on mount Zion; those who cannot enter into the city, the holy Jerusalem, include everything common or that maketh an abomination and a LIE. Those written in the Lamb's book of life alone have access. Only those thus written are able to refuse the mark of the beast:--

> "And all that dwell upon the earth shall worship him, each one whose name hath not been written from the foundation of the world in the book of life of the Lamb slain" (Rev. xiii. 8).

While truth wears different aspects and presents itself under different forms according to the dispensation under which it appears, it is nevertheless one; the same is true of error. The truth had ever been the mark of God's children, and the lie the mark of the devil's; "the devil…….is a LIAR, and the father of IT" (John viii. 44); God is "a God of truth, and without iniquity" (Deut. xxxii. 4); He is a God that cannot lie (Titus i. 2). The apostasy of the Revelation is spoken of in Isa. xxviii. 15 as a covenant with death and an agreement with hell and a refuge of lies. The poor and needy of that day, the Lord's own flock, they find in the Lord "a refuge from the storm" (Isa. xxv. 4). "His truth shall be their shield and buckler" (Psa. xci. 4). The doctrine of the Antichrist is summed up by John in his first epistle as a lie, and those who teach it as liars:--

> "I have not written unto you because ye know not the truth, but because ye know it, and that NO LIE is of the truth: who is THE LIAR, but he that denieth that Jesus is the Christ? This is THE ANTICHRIST, that denieth the Father and the Son" (ii. 21, 22).

If we turn to the epistles of the Mystery the same teaching is present:--

> "But you have not thus learned Christ, if indeed you heard Him, and were taught by Him, as the TRUTH is in Jesus (namely) to have put away from you the former manner of life, the old man which is corrupt according to the deceitful lusts, and to be renewed in the spirit of your mind; and to have put on the new man which according to God has been created in holiness and righteousness of TRUTH; wherefore, having put off THE LIE, speak every man TRUTH with his neighbour" (Eph. iv. 21-25).

Here the lie is the old man and his deeds. This is fundamental. The blasphemy of the beast, the denial of the antichrist, the well-nigh universal apostasy of the end, are all so many manifestations of MAN as he is. The regeneration of Israel, the overcomers who enter the city, the membership of the One Body, these are various manifestations of the new man, the new creation. Rev. xiv., therefore, while speaking primarily of that future day of trial, speaks to us now. All that goes to make up the lie we must repudiate, all the truth we must embrace. Our armour will be useless if our loins are not first girded with truth, our gospel will be powerless if it is not "the word of truth, the gospel of our salvation". Righteousness and holiness will be fictitious if they be not of the truth. The worldliness of modern Christendom is the lie, and those who are of the truth have no place other than OUTSIDE. We are not to assume to ourselves the blessings and privileges of the 144,000, but we have our own victory and its blessed results in view. Where we are at one with all people of God through all dispensations is in our attitude towards the truth, the lie and the overcoming.

Sin.
Its Origin and Entry.
pp. 170 - 173

A question of the deepest gravity, and one that reaches up to the very throne of God Himself, is the question of the origin of sin and its entry into the creation of God.

Starting from a point that is not only revealed in the Scriptures, but is within the scope of our understanding, we learn that:--

> "By one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin" (Rom. v. 12).

That one man is ADAM (verse 14), and Adam is the one who by his disobedience introduced sin and death into the world over which he had been placed. While this clearly answers the question as to how sin entered the world, it still leaves unanswered the question why it should have been allowed, and who was its originator. The idea of incriminating God is repulsive to our spirit of sonship. Whatever we may have yet to learn, we have learned the fundamental fact that sin is hateful in the sight of God:--

> "He is the Rock, His work is perfect: for all His ways are judgment: a God of truth and without iniquity, just and right is He" (Deut. xxxii. 4).

God has a purpose, and that purpose will stand against all opposition: but we must not reduce the opposition to a fiction and unreality in our emphasis upon the supremacy of the power and will of God. One school of teaching presents to us a God whose wisdom and power is seriously called in question by the way in which it represents His relation to sin. Another school, to rescue the character of God from such charges, declares bluntly that sin was planned by Him, that He is the creator of moral evil, that in fact God is doing evil that good may come. To write such words is not pleasant, but hurtful, yet we do not believe we have misrepresented the case.

As in many cases, the truth lies midway between these extremes. Scripture tells of an enemy at work within the universe of God. When we ask the question as to the origin and the entry of sin, we may reply in the language of Christ, "An enemy hath done this". The lesser instance may help us to understand the greater. The Lord had come declaring that the kingdom had drawn nigh; He had presented Himself as the anointed King; suddenly after centuries of silence the heavens had opened and God had borne witness to His beloved Son; mighty miracles were wrought that would have brought Tyre and Sidon to repentance, but the people of Israel believed not. In the parables of Matt. xiii. the Lord explains some of the reasons why He had been rejected, and among the causes which He enumerates is the activity of AN ENEMY. That enemy is the devil.

If the sin of unbelief (John xvi. 9) was real, if God in Christ really meant what was preached, then, however much we magnify the fact that God knew that Israel would reject His Son, we must not do so in such a way as to represent their action as other than sinful. We have not given place enough for the activity of "the enemy", and though we rejoice to know that this foe is already judged and his execution is certain, yet we must not minimize his opposition, or call sin, his product, by any name that would lead the thought that Satan's work was God's. In the 1st epistle of John we read:--

> "Little children, let no man deceive you . . . . . he that committeth sins is of the devil; for the devil sinneth from the beginning, for this purpose the Son of God was manifested, that He might undo the works of the devil" (iii. 7, 8).

Here it is clearly taught that sin originates from the devil, and they who practice sin are said to be "of the devil". This is somewhat different from the idea that man falls as a result of his nature just a stone falls, for a falling stone is obedient to the law of gravitation, whereas "sin is lawlessness". Whoever would dream of punishing a stone for falling? And unless the wrath of God, His hatred of sin, His utter inability to countenance iniquity, be all taken as something other than mere theatricals, then something criminal is involved in the idea of sin. Scripture definitely declares sin to be of the devil, further, the devil sinneth from the beginning. Whenever this period may have been, we know that THERE lies the origin of sin, and Satan is the originator. The children of God and the children of the devil have the mark of their father upon them:--

> "Whosoever hath been begotten of God doth not commit sin, for His seed remaineth in him, and he is unable to sin because he hath been begotten of God; by this the children of God are manifest, and the children of the devil . . . . . Cain was of that wicked one and slew his brother" (I John iii. 9-12).

We are told that Christ was manifested, not to bring God's plan regarding sin to perfection, but to take away our sins, and UNDO the works of the devil. Instead of looking upon sin as a necessary part of God's purpose it is viewed as the work of an enemy, to undo which required the utmost strength of the Son of God, and to triumph over which the Father's exceedingly great power.

No writer of the Scripture appears to feel any need to defend God when speaking of this enemy and his works. Take for example the words of Gen. vi. 5-7:--

> "And God saw that the wickedness of man was great in the earth, and that every imagination of the thoughts of his heart was only evil continually, and it REPENTED the Lord that He had made man on the earth, and it GRIEVED Him at His heart; and the Lord said, I will destroy man whom I have created . . . . . for it repenteth Me that I have made them."

So far as language is concerned, we may admit that we are dealing here with the figure of speech called Anthropopatheia. In the words of "Figures of Speech" (Dr. E. W. Bullinger), figurative language "is never used except to add force to the truth conveyed, emphasis to the statement of it, and depth to the meaning of it". If sin was a part of God's purpose, if His mighty plan would have for ever lacked by its omission, how comes it that He has explained His thoughts and motives that brought about the flood (a dreadful reality, and no mere figure) in language that speaks of repentance and grief over the wickedness of His creatures? If sin is the work of His enemy all is clear, if sin is His handmaid all is confusion.

It appears therefore that a careful study both of the nature of sin itself and of Satan is necessary to the consideration of the origin and entry of evil into the universe of God. To this study therefore we must apply ourselves, and hope at some future date to present to the reader, as fully as circumstances will allow, the nature of sin, its origin, course, and end together with the history of Satan and the Satanic system as revealed in the Word of truth.

DEAR FELLOW-MEMBERS,

Every fresh volume of The Berean Expositor seems to be another "Ebenezer", for we can most truly say concerning its publication, "Hitherto hath the Lord helped us".

The limits of our witness are marked for us by a rightly-divided Word of truth, and the ministry of the apostle Paul to the Church of the Mystery is its stand-point and testimony. We do not expect such a course of teaching to be popular, but we do call upon all whose eyes God has enlightened as to the Mystery of His will, to join with us in upholding this testimony in the fast closing years of the dispensation of the grace of God.

Yours for the Truth, by grace,

The Fear of Forming a Sect.
pp. 45 - 47

Some of the Lord's people who feel the need of fellowship with other fellow-members have expressed hesitation to put their desires into operation, fearing that by so doing they would be forming "another sect". It is well to retain a tender conscience over all our actions, but at the same time we must not allow an unscriptural fancy to prevent us fulfilling what may be a scriptural desire.

WHAT IS A SECT? We read in Acts v. 17 of the sect of the Sadducees, and in xv. 5 of the sect of the Pharisees. In Acts xxiv. 5 we find the term the sect of the Nazarenes. Here we have the same word used of two sects who were manifestly not of God and also of the true Church of God. The Apostle takes up the word used by Tertullus in xxiv. 5, in his defence saying:--

> "But this I confess unto thee, that after the way they call heresy (same word as sect), so worship I the God of my fathers" (Acts xxiv. 14).

Hairesis = sect is derived from haireomai = to chose (Phil. i. 22; II Thess ii. 13; Heb. xi. 25). The scriptural idea of a sect is "self choice", and is a work of the flesh (Gal. v. 20; I Cor. xi. 19 heresies). A company of believers seeking to manifest their union with one another and with the risen Lord cannot be guilty of forming "another sect" by so doing. Should unscriptural practices, leaders, or ideas be allowed, these departures would merit the undesired title, and it is these "self choosings" we must shun.

One of the most important facts to remember in connection with any attempt to form a meeting to-day is the condition that corporate Christianity had reached in the days of the Apostle Paul. The second epistle to Timothy reveals a church in ruins, the foundation alone remaining and exposed to view. Consequently the discipline that was possible while the church was standing can no longer be put into operation. Instead of Timothy being instructed to exercise his disciplinary powers upon others, he is urged to exercise them upon himself. The foundation itself bears the seal:--

> "Let every one that nameth the name of Christ depart from iniquity" (ii. 19).

The personal note is sounded in such statements as:-- > "If a man therefore purge himself from these" (not purge others) (ii. 21).

> "From such turn away" (not turn others away) (iii. 5).

Timothy is told to "shun" profane and vain babblings, to "flee" youthful lusts, to "follow" righteousness, faith, love, peace with them that call on the Lord out of a pure heart. Foolish and unlearned questions he is to avoid, knowing that they but gender strifes (II Tim. ii.). These passages seem to indicate in a general way the mind of the Lord as to the meeting together of His people.

In the early days we read many times of "the church in the house" (Rom. xvi. 5; Col. iv. 15) of one or another. We believe that the apostasy which everywhere manifesting itself will compel the faithful once again to meet in this primitive way. When this does take place, the domestic qualifications of the bishop and deacon of I Tim. iii. will be better appreciated. It will be obviously impossible to meet in the house of a brother whose lack of control makes his children's behaviour a scandal. Neither could the meeting be held in a home where there was lack of unity between husband and wife. With regard to the question of teachers, we believe that when the Lord's people met together, it would not be long before one or two would manifest that they were "faithful men, able to teach others also", and would be recognized as such.

We are fellow members of the One Body, and our privilege it is by the working together of every part to make increase of the body unto the building up of itself in love. Let us avoid by all means a mere multiplication of "Meetings". Let us shun any approach to a "sect", but let us as fellow-members of one body seek by all the means sanctioned and sanctified by the Word, to build one another up in the faith.

> "Then they that feared the Lord spake often one to another, and the Lord hearkened, and heard, and a book of remembrance was written before Him for them that feared the Lord, and that thought upon His name" (Mal. iii. 16).

"No More Canaanite."
(Zech. xiv. 21).
pp. 172 - 174

The closing words of the Prophets are full of interest and instruction, bringing to a focus the goal and purpose of the age. The last verse of Zechariah is no exception. After describing the holiness of the people of Israel in the day of their restoration, the prophet adds:--

> "And in that day there shall no more be the Canaanite in the house of the Lord of Hosts" (Zech. xiv. 21).

In the Revelation the sin and sorrow of Gen. iii., and the overthrowing deluge of Gen. i. 2 are seen to pass away:--

> "I saw a new heaven and a new earth . . . . . and there was no more sea" (Rev. xxi. 1 -- Gen. i. 2).
> "There shall be no more death, sorrow, crying, pain." "There shall be no more curse" (xxi. 4; xxii. 3 -- Gen. iii.).

Zechariah however speaks of certain nations that shall "no more" be in the house of the Lord. Are we to look upon these Canaanites as being in the same category with the "deep" of Gen. i. 2, and the curse, sin, death and sorrow of Gen. iii.? The only way to obtain an answer to this question is to "search and see" what the Scriptures teach.

The Canaanites take their name from Canaan, the son of Ham. As a result of his father's action, Canaan is cursed by Noah. "Cursed be Canaan" (Gen. ix. 25). It is important to notice those who are cursed in Scripture, and their relation one to the other:--

> The Serpent.—"Thou are cursed above all cattle" (Gen. iii. 14).
> The Ground.—"Cursed is the ground for thy sake" (Gen. iii. 17).
> Cain.—"Thou art cursed from the earth" (Gen. iv. 11).
> Canaan.—"Cursed be Canaan" (Gen. ix. 25).

Contrary to common belief neither Adam nor Eve were cursed in Gen. iii. Sorrow and toil until death, with the hope of the promised seed and the pledge of the cherubim are the results of Adam's sin, but the curse falls upon the Serpent and upon the ground.

The first man to be cursed is Cain, and though the first son of Adam and Eve, was "of that wicked one" (I John iii. 12). The second man to be cursed is Canaan, and through him the Canaanites. And the Canaanites likewise appear to be closely connected with the wicked one. The land of Canaan was inhabited in earlier days by races of giants called Anakim, Avim, Emims, Horim, Rephaim, Suzim and Zamzammim, but these earlier races were supplanted by the Canaanites. The first mention of the land of Canaan is found in Gen. xi. 31:--

> "Terah took Abram . . . . . to go into the land of Canaan."

After Terah died, Abram entered the land of Canaan, but "The Canaanite was then in the land". It would appear that the elect nation Israel were destined to fill the place occupied by the Canaanites, which either in actuality or in type, the Canaanites had forfeited. The parallel is extended into the dispensation of the mystery. Some Principalities and Powers, with Satan at their head, have forfeited their place in the heavens, and an elect company called the Church which is His Body, at present pilgrims and strangers, and wrestlers with these heavenly powers, shall one day enter into their inheritance in the heavenly places.

Abraham, the first man to receive the promise of Canaan, was most particular that his son Isaac should not marry any woman of the Canaanites:--

> "I will make thee swear by the Lord, the God of heaven, and the God of the earth, that thou shalt not take a wife unto my son of the daughters of the Canaanites" (Gen. xxiv. 3).

When the spies entered the land of Canaan they were terrified by the children of Anak in whose sight the Israelites felt like grasshoppers (Numb. xiii. 33), and the Canaanite dwelt in both the valley (xiv. 25), and in the hill (xiv. 45). Upon entering the land of Canaan Israel was instructed to smite them, and utterly destroy them, to make no covenant with them, nor shew them mercy, neither allow their sons nor their daughters to make marriages with them, the great reason being that the Canaanites would turn the hearts of Israel away after idols, the other reason being that Israel was a holy people unto the Lord (Deut. vii. 1-6). A distinction in treatment is to be made between the cities of those who live far away from Israel's inheritance and the cities of the Canaanites. An element of mercy and discrimination is enjoined in the one case (Deut. xx. 10-15):--

> "But of the cities of these people, which the Lord Thy God doth give thee for an inheritance, thou shalt save nothing alive that breatheth" (Deut. xx. 16-18).

Both the books of Joshua and Judges reveal the fact that Israel did not fulfil the commands of the Lord respecting the Canaanites, and the subsequent history of Israel and their kings, ending as it did in the Babylonish captivity and the establishment of gentile dominion, is a black commentary upon their disobedience. The Canaanite stands for all that is unholy and unclean, and therefore when Zechariah looks forward to that day when even the bells on the horses and the utensils of the kitchen shall be "Holiness unto the Lord", then he cries as expressing a long-deferred factor in Israel's blessing:--

> "In that day there shall be no more the Canaanite in the house of the Lord of Hosts" (Zech. xiv. 21).

Further thoughts arising out of this must be deferred until another opportunity.

The Lord's Anointed.
pp. 175, 176

As one reads the concluding chapter of I Samuel, with the tragic story of Saul's death, and then continues on into II Samuel and reads David's lament, one is impressed with the great contrast that is found in these two references to the one subject.

The Amalekite apparently reckoned that his story of the death of Saul would give him favour in the eyes of his successor David, and reckoning according to the flesh he was doubtless justified. David, however, viewed the event and story in quite a different light. Instead of rewarding the messenger and exhibiting pleasure or satisfaction at the news he brought, David said unto him:--

> "Whence art thou? And he answered, I am the son of a stranger, an Amalekite. And David said unto him, How wast thou not afraid to stretch forth thy hand to destroy the Lord's anointed? And David called one of the young men, and said, Go near, and fall upon him. And he smote him that he died. And David said unto him, Thy blood be upon thy head; for thy mouth hath testified against thee, saying, I have slayed the Lord's Anointed" (II Sam. i. 13-16).

Then David lamented Saul in words that he afterward taught the children of Israel. He opens his lamentation with the words:--

> "Thy heart, Israel, is slain upon the high places; How are the mighty fallen!" (verse 19).

Further on he says:--

> "Saul and Jonathan were lovely and pleasant in their lives" (verse 23).

When one reviews the long persecution which David suffered at the hands of Saul, the words "lovely and pleasant" sound strangely in our ears. Both words ("love" and "pleasant') are used of Jonathan:--

> "I am distressed for thee, my brother Jonathan; very pleasant hast thou been unto me; thou love to me was wonderful, passing the love of women" (verse 26).

This we can understand, but how could David use them of Saul? The secret of David's regard for Saul lies in the words "The Lord's Anointed". In the days of his persecution, though tempted by his advisers and his extreme need, he refrained from killing Saul when he had the power so to do. On one occasion he cut off the skirt of Saul's robe, yet so tender a conscience did David keep, we read that:-- > "David's heart smote him, because he had cut off Saul's skirt. And he said unto his men, The Lord forbid that I should do this thing unto my master, the Lord's anointed, to stretch forth mine hand against him, seeing he is the anointed of the Lord" (I Sam. xxiv. 6).

Again, after Saul had basely broken his promise to David, and was once more in his power, David again refrained, saying:--

> "Who can stretch forth his hand against the Lord's anointed, and be guiltless?" (I Sam. xxvi. 9).

When David was king and he composed a Psalm of thanksgiving upon the occasion of the coming of the Ark of God, the Lord's anointed is once more mentioned. This time, however, it is not a king that is intended, but the children of Israel:--

> "When they were but few . . . . . He suffered no man to do them wrong: Yea, He reproved kings for their sakes, saying, Touch not Mine anointed, and do My prophets no harm" (Psalm cv. 12-15).

When Balaam looked upon Israel, the Lord's anointed, he said of God:--

> "He hath not beheld iniquity in Jacob, neither hath He seen perverseness in Israel" (Numb. xxiii. 21).

This is parallel with David's attitude. Saul had many things in his life that were neither "lovely" nor "pleasant", and died at length at the hand of the Lord for the sin of witchcraft. Yet for all this he was the Lord's anointed. Israel is continually spoken of as rebellious and stiffnecked, their works and thoughts are "iniquity", the conception of "perverseness" (mischief) being attributed to them (Isa. lix. 4-7), yet the words of Balaam are true.

Do we realize as we should the efficacy of the name of Christ, THE Anointed One? While we must never condone sin in the believer, and ever seek grace to walk worthy of our calling, let us in our estimate of other believers, and of ourselves, never under-estimate the fact that with all our confessed failings, we are IN Christ and blessed WITH Christ, accepted IN the Beloved.

No. 26.—R.J.C. writes. "I am seeking light on the question of the hope of the mystery Church. I see clearly the 'Thessalonian' hope was entirely contingent upon Israel's repentance. I would ask:--

1. Is this held in abeyance till Israel is taken up again in God's purpose, or has it completely passed. All the Thessalonian saints died and of course await resurrection. To what? The Air, the New Jerusalem or the super-heavenlies?
2. I am searching (but cannot find it revealed) for the meeting place of the Head and the Body, which I presume must take place somewhere before the manifestation of Christ and we with Him (Col. iii. 4).
3. The Apocalypse Scriptures I take it deal with the unveiling of Christ's glory, to us and others."

(1). Hope is the realization of one's calling. It is "the hope of your calling". Whatever therefore constitutes the calling of any believer now by faith, will be fulfilled to him when hope is realized. Consequently those Thessalonian saints who fell asleep believing the words and teaching of I Thess. iv., will be found among those who being "the dead in Christ shall rise first", and share with the living saints the joy of meeting the descending Lord in the air. This will not take place until Israel once more are taken up by God and the two epistles to the Thessalonians will be "dispensational truth" once more (see II Thess. ii. for its association with the Day of the Lord, Antichrist and the Book of the Revelation).

The mention of the New Jerusalem as an alternative shows that it is not realized that entry of that city is more of the nature of a "prize" than of hope (see Heb. xi. 16; xxii. 22, 23; Rev. xxii. 5, 14).

The "super-heavenlies" do not come within the hope revealed to the Thessalonians. They waited for God's Son FROM HEAVEN.

(2). This search is likely to be a long one, for so far as our knowledge of the epistles is concerned we do not remember any indication being made as to where the meeting place will be. Our attention is rather focused upon being manifested with Him in glory.

(3). By the "Apocalypse Scriptures" we suppose is meant those epistles and the Revelation itself which use the word "Apocalypse" of the Lord's second Coming? Seeing that this word is never used in connection with the hope of the One Body, it is wise for us to keep the two aspects of the Lord's Coming distinct. If "the unveiling of Jesus Christ" is set forth in Rev. xix. 11-21 then it is not to us, however much we may, in spirit, rejoice in the prospect. The key to understanding our hope is in Eph. i. 17, 18:--

> "That the God of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of glory, may give unto you the spirit of wisdom and revelation in the knowledge of Him (the eyes of your heart having been enlightened); that ye may know what is the hope of His calling."

As we get to know the present glory of Christ in His position "far above all", we add to our understanding of the hope that will place us there with Him. Further, seeing that this "one hope" of our "calling" is a part of the seven-fold unity of the Spirit, it would appear that as our practical appreciation of the truth becomes manifest, so our understanding of the One hope will develop.

May the Lord bless you in your labours for Him and His truth.

No. 27.—W.H.G.T. writes:--"I notice on page 58 of the Berean Expositor for April, 1917 (Volume VII), that you distinguish between faith in Christ, and the faith of Christ. I wish you would some time or other elaborate this and justify it from Scripture, because the matter is a very vital one. The word "faith" is followed several times by the genitive case, and in several passages I have hitherto found it impossible to take the words as meaning Christ's own faith. Thus, in Rom. iii. 22, I do not see how it is possible to render the words other than by "faith in Jesus Christ". There are other passages equally impressive, and one of them is, as you know, Mark xi. 22, where the context seems to demand the thought of "faith in God". I have sometimes felt tempted to render "faith" as "faithfulness" in these passages, because, as we know, the two renderings of the Greek word are possible, and when we look at the distinct references to faith in Rom. iii. 22 it certainly yields a vital truth to translate "the righteousness of God which is by the faithfulness of Jesus Christ unto all those who believe", but of course it seems impossible to render the same word in two different ways in one text . . . . ."

We are thankful for this reminder to "search and see", to "prove all things and to hold fast that which is good", and as we desire the truth and have no reputation at stake except that of those who seek the truth of God, we set out upon a further and fuller examination of the theme mentioned in out correspondent's letter.

We have continually found help and light upon vexed questions by following a simple self-made motto "When in doubt, consult the Septuagint". The usage of pistis in the N.T. is somewhat difficult to define. But seeing that the apostle Paul has practically founded the whole of his teaching concerning justification by faith (in its threefold aspect, Rom. i., Gal. iii. and Heb. x.) upon one verse in the prophet Hebakkuk, we feel compelled to cross the bridge provided by the LXX in order to discover the underlying meaning of "faith" in the Hebrew of the O.T.

Pistis.

This word occurs about thirty times in the LXX; let us look at its usage. We will not only give the English rendering, but the Hebrew word also, so that we may be more fully qualified to arrive at a Scriptural conception of the word.

"Children in whom is no faith" (Heb. *eh-moon) (Deut. xxxii. 20).
"The just shall live by his faith" (Heb. emoo-nah) (Hab. ii. 4).

These are the only places where the A.V. renders the word "faith". As one of the passages (Hab. ii. 4) is practically the one awaiting proof, we must search further before we can feel that we are on sure ground.

"His righteousness and his faithfulness" (Heb. emoo-nah) (I Sam. xxvi. 23).
"Did ordain in their set office" (margin trust, so in four other places (I Chron. ix. 22).
"The men did the work faithfully" (II Chron. xxxiv. 12).
"All His works (are done) in truth" (Psa. xxxiii. 4).
"He that speaketh truth . . . . ." (false witness, in antithesis) (Prov. xii. 17).
"They that deal truly" (Prov. xii. 22).
"Seeketh truth" (Sym reads alētheian) (Jer. v. 1).
"Great is Thy faithfulness" (Lam. iii. 23).
"Betroth thee unto Me, in faithfulness" (Hos. ii. 20).
"We make a sure covenant*" (Heb. amah-nah*) (Neh. ix. 38).
"They dealt faithfully" (Heb. emeth) (II Kings xii. 15).
"Let not mercy and truth forsake Thee" (Prov. iii. 3).
"As a liar, and as waters that fail" (margin "not sure") (Heb. ah-man) (Jer. xv. 18).
"The heart of the righteous studieth to answer" (Heb. gah-nah) (Prov. xv. 28).
[* - All transliterations given as in the Englishman's Heb. and Chal. Concordance.]

We have given above a sample of the usage of the word pistis, with all the Hebrew words which it translates in the LXX. The meaning of the Hebrew words, except gah-nah, is summed up in the words Truth, or Faithfulness. The Hebrew word here quoted give us the familiar Amen, which is translated in the Gospels "Verily". It will serve no useful purpose to set out the way in which pistis can translate gah-nah "to answer", as a proof demands a wider digression than space or time permit. We feel that sufficient has been cited to show the meaning of the word.

In the LXX of Hab. ii. 4, instead of reading "The just shall live by his faith", it reads ho de dikaios ek pisteōs mou zēsetai, "the just shall live by MY faith". This word "my" does not occur in all the MSS but its presence is suggestive. Those who thus translated the passage evidently understood it to mean God's faithfulness, not merely the prophet's faith in God. The three quotations of Hab. ii. 4 in the N.T. omit the words "his" of the Hebrew and "my" of the LXX, and so do not decide the reading either way. The Apostle uses the verse in two distinct ways, (1) Doctrinal, in Romans and Galatians where the righteousness spoken of is in contrast to law and doing, and (2) in Hebrews, where the same verse is brought forward to enforce the truth of "living" by faith after being justified. This broad use of the passage therefore still leaves the primary meaning and wording untouched.

Let us now turn to the N.T. Rom. iii. 22 is one of the verses under consideration, but before we turn to that verse, we shall find earlier in the chapter an undoubted use of pistis after the manner of the O.T.

> "For what if some did not believe? shall their unbelief make the FAITH OF GOD of none effect. Let is not be so; yea, let God be TRUE, but every man a liar . . . . . if the TRUTH OF GOD hath more abounded through my lie unto His glory . . . . ." (Rom. iii. 3-7).

Here we have the expression, tēn pistin thou Theou. This cannot mean our faith in God, it means here His faithfulness (the "truth" of verses 4 and 7). In Rom. iv. 16 we have another expression that may help us:-- > "To the end the promise might be sure to all the seed; not to that only which is of the law, but to that also which is of the faith of Abraham" (tō ek pisteōs Abram).

It is perfectly clear that this cannot mean our faith in Abraham, but refers to Abraham's own faith. This expression finds a parallel in Rom. iii. 26:--

> "The justifier of him which believeth in Jesus" (Ton ek pisteōs Iēsou).

When we compare this passage with the one cited above from iv. 16 we shall agree that something is wrong with the A.V. rendering. Gal. iii. 22 uses the expression in an exactly similar context to that of Rom. iv. 16:--

> "In order that the promise by faith of Jesus Christ (ek pisteōs Iēsou Christou) might be given them that believe."

If we translate this as meaning that the promise by faith in Jesus Christ is given to them that believe, we feel conscious that something is amiss, one word, either "faith" or "believe", is an unnecessary repetition. The promise is not ek nomou = out of law (21), but ek pisteōs Iēsou Christou = the faith of Jesus Christ. This parallelism indicates the two possible sources or origins of the inheritance. They arise either (1) out of the law, or (2) out of the promise made 430 years before the law to Abraham. The context decides that it is not out of law, but out of the promise made to Abraham (16-18). The promise to Abraham looked forward to one seed, Christ. Christ came in relation to that covenant previously made by God (17), and His faithfulness in every phase of His work and office is the great ground of justification. So in Rom. iii. 22 we have two great presentations to faith.

1. The Righteousness OF GOD.
2. Through the Faithfulness OF JESUS CHRIST, to all who believe.

There is no difficulty in translating pistis as "faithfulness", and pisteuō as "believe", for this is in line with the LXX and the Hebrew renderings of the two words. We quote here from Glynne, on Galatians, on this use of the genitive:--

> "When a writer would describe a person as the author or owner of a thing, the proper and obvious course is to write the name in the genitive case; if he desires to present him as the object of reference, a variety of forms suggest themselves (which are freely employed by New Testament writers, such as eis, epi pros, and sometimes en, with their respective cases), by which his purpose can be effected without exposing himself to the charge of ambiguity, or the risk of misapprehension. Should he, however, passing over all these forms, select the genitive which is the natural expression of source or proprietorship, it is to be presumed that it was his intentions so to do, and the genitive is to be understood subjectively."

Mark xi. 22 we believe can be best explained by the figure of speech known as Antimeria, a figure involving exchange, and in this phase called "the Sacred Superlative".

> "Great wrestlings" are literally "Wrestlings of God" (Gen. xxx. 8).
> "Cedars of God" (Psa. lxxx. 10).
> "A city great to God" (Jonah iii. 3).
> Moses was "fair to God" (Acts vii. 20).

Mark xi. 22, and the parallels in Matthew and Luke, demand the meaning "great faith", and this verse need not interfere with the usage of the other expressions which we have noted above.

Readers of The Berean Expositor may often find statements that are not matured and reasoned out, scattered through the articles. We make an observation of a fact; sometimes we are able to pursue it at once, sometimes it lies dormant, and sometimes it stimulates others. In the passage cited from Volume VII, page 58, we made a statement as to fact and desired that the peculiar expression "The faith of Jesus Christ" should be allowed to stand, even though we may not have been clear as to its full meaning. Since then others have corresponded and the results are given in this brief investigation. The subject is by no means exhausted. Some reader may be inclined to tabulate all the various ways in which faith is used, and so bring out fuller light upon a vital theme. To the correspondent (W.H.G.T.) we offer our thanks for suggesting the fuller investigation.

No. 28. E.B. writes:--"We have had what is called a Mission of Revival. One of the addresses to Christians was on the subject of being filled with the Holy Ghost. It was stated that all believers were not Spirit filled because they had not faith. Acts xiii. 9 and Eph. v. 18 were quoted among several other passages. Are the two things the same, "Being filled with the Holy Ghost" and "Being filled with the Spirit", and are they for this present time?"

We will pass without comment the question of Missions of Revival (every servant of the Lord is responsible to his Master) and will confine ourselves to the question concerning "being filled with the Spirit".

The words "Holy Ghost" and "Holy Spirit" are translations of the same Greek words and you can dismiss any idea of difference. We do not use the word "Ghost" to-day as it was used when the A.V. was translated, and every place where "Holy Ghost" occurs you may read "Holy Spirit". There is a difference, however, to be observed as between "The Holy Spirit", the Person, and "Holy Spirit", His gifts, which gifts may be further differentiated as either (1) supernatural gifts, or (2) the new nature, which is also "holy spirit". Dr. Bullinger's Work The Giver and His Gifts goes very thoroughly into the question, showing that in many passages where the Person is understood, the gifts are intended. The words pneuma hagion = holy spirit. This usage (without articles) occurs 52 times in the N.T. and is always wrongly rendered "The Holy Spirit" (with the definite article, and capital letters), consequently there is no stronger rendering available when there are two articles present in the Greek (to pneuma to hagion), which means, "The Spirit the Holy (Spirit)". In Acts ii. 4 we read:--

> "They were all filled with pneuma hagion, and began to speak with other tongues, as THE SPIRIT gave."

Here the Giver and His gifts are strictly distinguished. (Appendix 101 of The Companion Bible).

Pneuma hagion (the gifts) is an expression absent from Ephesians, Philippians and Colossians.

Another important feature is that the verb "to fill" is sometimes Active and sometimes Passive. In the Active followed by the Genitive case it indicates what the person is filled with, viz., with supernatural gifts, for example. In the Passive followed by the Dative case, the one who fills is indicated. Now in Acts xiii. 9 we have the Passive followed by the Genitive which indicates what the vessel was filled with. "Then Saul, being filled with pneumatos hagiou", the gifts of the Spirit.

In Eph. v. 18 we have the Passive followed by the Dative indicating who was the filler, not with what the vessel was filled, "Be filled by Spirit".

Under no circumstances omit a reference to Colossians when studying Ephesians. Observe how we add to our understanding by reading the parallel passages together.

Eph. v. 18, 19.	Col. iii. 16.
"Be filled by (the) Spirit, speaking to yourselves, in psalms and hymns and spiritual songs, singing and making melody in your heart to the Lord."	"Let the word of Christ dwell in you richly. In all wisdom teaching and admonishing one another, in psalms and hymns and spiritual songs, singing with grace in your hearts to the Lord."

Here we learn with what the Spirit now fills us—"The word of Christ". During the Acts the Spirit filled men with supernatural gifts, now He fills men with the word of Christ. This takes the place of the "gifts" and enables them to speak with wisdom and profit. The "gifts" of the Acts period were visible. They could be possessed in abundance by a carnal and divided Church, like that at Corinth. These gifts were for a sign while Israel as a people remained. They have no place in the Dispensation of the Mystery and the Church of the One Body.

A Criticism of Dispensational Truth Examined.

#1. The Critic and Inspiration.
pp. 1 - 4

"The servant of the Lord must not strive", yet upon occasion he must be prepared to withstand "Peter to the face". Such is our position at the moment. A servant of God whose earlier writings have contributed to our understanding of the Word of God has for some considerable time maintained an active and aggressive campaign against what we commonly understand as Dispensational Truth. He has not refrained from speaking of the teaching as unscriptural, inconsistent, absurd, erroneous, and as a mutilation of Scripture, and as several have raised questions concerning these particular articles and books, we feel constrained to examine them in these pages.

We wish it to be clearly understood that there is nothing of a personal character in these notes, and although for some reasons we might have preferred to have spoken openly of the writer, yet to avoid even the appearance of personalities we refrain. We shall therefore refer to the book under review by the letters "G.P.K."; those who know the book will recognize the title. When the necessity arises of referring to the author we shall use the letter "M." and trust that by so doing we shall direct the attention not to the man himself, towards whom we can entertain no feelings other than Christian, but to the doctrine, which we feel is contrary to truth.

The first item with which we shall deal is not the writer's views of Kingdom or Mystery, but the effect of those views upon his own appreciation of the inspiration of Scripture. In 1909 "M." wrote an excellent booklet and in the introduction said:--

> "It is manifestly of the very highest importance to insist unceasingly upon the sufficiency, finality and completeness of the revelation given by God in His Word" (Our italics).

By the "Word" the writer means the whole Bible as we possess it to-day, for he uses "The Word" and "The Bible" interchangeably. Our object in quoting this passage is to shew the change that has come over "M.'s" view of the completely and equally inspired Scripture, since he took in hand the task of proving that the Kingdom of the Heavens and the Church of the One Body are all one and the same.

In 1919 "M." wrote another book entitled "G.P.K.", and there express his more mature thoughts concerning "All Scripture" which is given by inspiration of God. In the following quotation, taken from pages 112, 113, we preserve unaltered the author's own italics, so that he himself shall place his own emphasis upon his own words.

> "We receive GOD'S communications through Paul and through other earthen vessels as being truly 'the commandments of the Lord', and to be reverenced and obeyed as such. Yet we must carefully note the difference which the Scripture makes between Divine communications given through the pens of fallible men, who received an occasional and strictly limited inspiration for that particular purpose—men who, but for the > comparatively brief moments when the HOLY SPIRIT controlled their tongues and pens, were just as liable to err as we are (see Gal. ii. 11 for example)—and those particular words which were actually formed by the lips and living breath of the LORD JESUS CHRIST Himself. For He ever and always spoke 'the words of God'. For God gave not the SPIRIT 'by measure' unto Him (John iii. 34). Whereas, to every servant of CHRIST, grace for ministry is given 'according to the measure of the gift of Christ' (Eph. iv. 7), 'the gift of CHRIST' being, of course, 'the gift of the HOLY SPIRIT'."

Now what does "M." intend his readers to understand by these words? He draws attention to the "difference" which he says that "Scripture makes" between the words of Christ and all other instruments of revelation. We shall see upon further examination that "M." does not teach that Paul's subject matter differed from Christ's personal ministry, for he strenuously endeavours to prove that John Baptist, Christ Himself, Peter and Paul all taught the same doctrine and preached the same gospel. He is however inconsistent because he immediately follows the quotation given above with a reference to Heb. ii. 1, where the question is not one of inspiration but subject matter, namely, "the so great salvation".

To return to the quotation. At the close "M." draws attention to the difference which Scripture makes as to the qualifications for ministry, which we readily admit. An apostle differed in his "measure" from a prophet or a teacher, and all were exceedingly different from Him they call Master and Lord. "M." cannot be referring to either differences of subject matter or of ministerial qualifications and there is only one conclusion left for us. He sees differences in INSPIRATION. Look at the words:--

> "Pens of FALLIBLE men."
> "Occasional and STRICTLY LIMITED inspiration for that particular purpose."
> "Those particular words which were actually formed by the lips and living breath of the Lord Jesus Christ Himself."

What is the intention behind these words? Is it not to leave in the mind of the reader the idea that the words of Paul or Peter as given in the Epistles are less inspired than those of Christ given in the Gospels?

It has been our constant witness that "ALL SCRIPTURE is God-breathed", and it matters not whether the instrument of inspiration be David the shepherd boy, Amos the gatherer of sycamore fruit, Peter the Galilean fisherman, or Paul the Pharisee. Let us leave the confusion which is evidently the mental condition of our would-be critic and hear what the Scriptures themselves say on this important matter. And first of all where shall we find the "particular words which were actually formed by the lips and living breath of the Lord Jesus Christ Himself"? They were spoken in the streets, synagogues and temple of Galilee, Samaria, Judea and Jerusalem. Like the spoken words of any ordinary man they have left no mark except in the minds and memories of those who heard them. All who heard those wondrous words are dead, and all that we possess of the ACTUAL words formed by the lips and living breath of Christ has come to us through the writings of a converted publican named Matthew, or such a one as Mark, Luke or John. As a matter of fact there are no words of Christ in existence save as recorded by "the pens of fallible men". Now we believe Paul was no more fallible than was Matthew, and if we once agree that in the matter of writing the Gospels or the Epistles the respective writers were INSPIRED, then "the differences" which "M." speaks of are the result of his own confusion, for all alike are equally and fully inspired.

In the business world there are shades and degrees of falsehood. We have heard of "white lies" and "business lies", but they are all "lies" nevertheless; and so with the Scriptures. The slightest departure from perfect and complete inspiration means that such departure or "measure", call it what you will, is fallible and liable to error, which idea we absolutely repudiate.

The emphasis placed by "M." and others like him on the words of Christ is misleading. Humanly speaking the first Gospel is in the words of Matthew and the first epistle in the words of Paul. But are they not all the words of Christ, O.T. Scriptures included? Did not "the Spirit of Christ" speak the words of inspired prophecy (I Pet. i. 11)? Was not Paul's prison ministry "the testimony of our Lord"? (II Tim. i. 8). If we admit any difference in inspiration (which we do not) we should say that the later revelation of Christ given to Paul from heaven was of greater weight than the earlier ministry of Christ on earth (Heb. xii. 25).

The charge often made against those who believe Dispensational Truth is that they rob God's children of most of their Bible. But we believe it is demonstrated that the case is the reverse of this. We rightly divide a Word of TRUTH, and make no invidious comparisons between the inspiration of Matthew or Paul. Those who share the opinions of our brother wrongly divide the Word and are obliged to speak of some parts as being more inspired than others. In essence "M." robs us of all infallible Scripture except the four Gospels.

Enough of this phase of the subject. "M." in seeking to save his readers from the imaginary ditch of a rightly divided word has landed himself and his readers in a very bog of confusion. We shall examine his criticism of our teaching further in subsequent papers. Meanwhile we believe we have demonstrated that his own views render him upon his own confession unfit to be a teacher of the Word.

#2. David's House and Kingdom.

pp. 17 - 20

In order to understand the purport of the Gospel according to Matthew one must understand the intention of the Holy Spirit when He names Christ in the opening verse "The Son of David".

We were under the impression that the genealogy given in Matthew (which differs from that given in Luke) was intentionally placed where it is, in order that the crown rights to the throne of David may be clearly set forth as belonging to the Lord Jesus: further, that the opening words of the wise men, "Where is He that is born KING OF

THE JEWS?" were intentionally recorded by Matthew as being entirely in line with his purpose in writing. The writer of G.P.K. however, while agreeing that the title Son of David in Matt. i. 1 is indicative of the theme of the Gospel, denies that Christ came as King or came to occupy an earthly throne. According to this writer David is not to be connected with the idea of a King and Kingdom, but with a house, which house is the Church of Matt. xvi. and of Eph. ii. 22. The promise made by God to David in I Chron. xvii. is, according to this writer, fulfilled in the "Church". The following quotation from G.P.K. is given with the author's own italics:--

> "And it shall come to pass, when thy days be expired that thou must go to be with thy fathers, that I will raise up thy seed after thee, which shall be of thy sons; and I will establish His kingdom. He shall build Me an house, and I will establish His throne forever. I will be HIS FATHER and He shall be MY SON—see the express application of these words to CHRIST in Heb. i. 5—and I will not take My mercy away from Him as I took it from him that was before thee. But I will settle Him in Mine house and in My Kingdom forever; and His throne shall be established for evermore."
>
> "These words settle in the clearest way (and other Scriptures furnish a great mass of concurring testimony) certain matters touching which various eminent expositors in our day have contrived to produce extraordinary uncertainty and confusion. Our immediate purpose has to do with the fact, first, that the principal thing foretold of David's SON was the building of the HOUSE OF GOD; second, that in the order of events as clearly predicted, the SON OF DAVID was first to build GOD an house, and then GOD was to establish His—the SON'S—throne."

"M." finds the Key to a right understanding of the character of Matthew's Gospel in the words which higher up the page he lifts out of their context and prints thus:--

> "He shall build Me an house, and I will establish His throne forever."

Nothing can be clearer if the reader will only allow "M." to guide his study of the Word. As he says, the order of the events is clearly predicted, and so that there shall be no doubt about it, he will number them for us, so saving us all trouble and responsibility. "M.'s" order is:--

1. The House.
2. The Throne.

and the idea developed from this order is the main feature of the book. We however prefer God's order unedited and find it as follows:--

1. I will establish HIS KINGDOM.
2. He shall build an HOUSE.
3. I will establish HIS THRONE.

In case any should refer to the closing words, "I will settle Him in Mine house and in My kingdom forever and His throne shall be established for evermore" as giving a different order, we must point out that the subject matter differs. In the first quotation the subject is the BUILDING of the house by the SON. In the second it is the SETTLING of the Son in the house by the FATHER, which of course must be subsequent to the building of the house. We cannot help feeling that "M." has been unfortunate in the selection of his first great proof, that Christ as Son of David came not to reign as King but first of all to found the Church.

After this "clear proof", on page 28 and 29 the writer pursues his theme until he reaches page 181, and then he exhibits one of the weirdest pieces of self-deception one can well imagine. The footnote of thanks, printed at the end of the chapter (page 182), makes one wonder whether this is the clutch of the drowning man at a straw. He says:--

> "For this valuable suggestion as to the significance of the omission from Matthew of part of Zechariah's prophecy I am indebted to a brother, a servant of the Lord, who once held the postponement theory, but was convinced of its unscripturalness by the writer's booklet on the Kingdom of Heaven."

Let us see what the "significance of the omission" is. "M." is still on the subject as to Christ coming as King. He contends that Christ came first as SAVIOUR, and will not come as KING until He comes the second time with power. Matthew therefore, we can imagine will omit any reference to kingship, but will insert any reference in Zechariah's prophecy to salvation. We will quote from G.P.K.:--

> "It is a noticeable and significant fact that but part of Zechariah's prophecy is quoted by the evangelists as having its fulfillment at the Lord's entry into Jerusalem immediately before His betrayal and crucifixion. The whole verse reads, 'Rejoice greatly, O daughter of Zion; shout, O daughter of Jerusalem; behold thy King cometh unto thee. He is just and having salvation, lowly and riding upon an ass, and upon a colt the foal of an ass'."

When we do turn to Matt. xxi. 5 this is what we read:--

> "Tell ye the daughter of Sion, BEHOLD THY KING COMETH unto thee, meek, and sitting upon an ass, and a colt the foal of an ass."

What is therefore the "noticeable and significant FACT"? It is that Christ presented Himself as KING at this entry into Jerusalem. Kingship is inserted and Salvation is omitted, yet the logic peculiar to "M." and the brother who was convinced by the writer's booklet leads them to deny that Christ had any thought of kingship during His earthly ministry, but was all the time and without break intent upon building the Church. We wonder what "M." would say should any one deduce from the "noticeable and significant fact" of the omission of "salvation", that Christ had no intention of becoming the Saviour at all?

There is no need to examine publicly all the details of the edifice when we see how unsound the foundations are. We can only deplore the mental state of those who may be so misled by such "significant facts" and alterations in God's own written "order".

We must take up the positive teaching of Scripture concerning the questions raised as to Matthew's Gospel, David's Throne, and the House, when we have considered the teaching of "M." on one or two other related themes.

#3. The Mystery.
pp. 33 - 36

"G.P.K." is a book of 240 pages, and out of this number the writer devotes one and a quarter pages to the wondrous teaching of Ephesians and Colossians on the subject of the mystery, which we here quote in full:--

"PAUL AND THE 'MYSTERY'.

> It is astonishing to find how prevalent has become the idea that the Church was a 'mystery' first revealed to the Apostle Paul, and of which the other Apostles were ignorant, until Paul made it known. We meet this idea again and again in current writings, and when we ask what basis there is for it, we are referred to Eph. iii. 1-13; and Col. i. 23-29. But we are unable to find a trace of that idea in those Scriptures.
>
> In the first place the 'mystery' (whatever it be) whereof Paul is there speaking, was one that, according to his own testimony, had been revealed not to him exclusively, nor to him primarily, nor to him in any special way. It was 'the mystery of CHRIST which in other ages was not made known unto the sons of men as it is now'—in this age—'revealed unto His holy Apostles and prophets by the Spirit.' Paul thus claimed no exclusiveness nor preeminence in the knowledge of this mystery. The SPIRIT OF GOD revealed it to GOD'S 'holy apostles and prophets', Paul being simply one of a number to whom the revelation had been given.
>
> The mystery itself was that Gentiles were to receive 'the unsearchable riches of CHRIST' on precisely the same terms as the Jews—the ancient 'middle wall of partition' that GOD had placed between Jews and Gentiles having been removed by the death of CHRIST (Eph. ii. 13-16). As stated in Eph. iii. 6, the mystery consists in this, 'that the Gentiles should be fellow-heirs, and of the same body and partakers (lit. joint partakers) of His (GOD'S) promise in CHRIST by the Gospel'.
>
> Peter had acted upon this 'mystery' in preaching CHRIST to the Gentiles at Cornelius' house before Paul began his ministry; which fact is enough in itself to dispose of the idea that Paul was the first to receive knowledge of it.
>
> The passage in Colossians is precisely to the same effect. 'The hope of the Gospel' was 'preached to every creature (or in all creation) under heaven', and not to Jews only. Of that Gospel Paul 'was made a minister'—simply one of many. He also had become 'a minister' of the Church; and this was, to quote his words, 'according to the dispensation of GOD which is given to me for you (Gentiles) to fulfil the word of GOD, even the mystery which hath been hid from ages and from generations, but now is made manifest to His saints, to whom GOD would make known what is the riches of the glory of this mystery among the Gentiles which is Christ among you (Gentiles) the hope of glory'.
>
> This, we think, requires no explanation, the meaning being quite evident to those who give proper attention to the language."

Let us examine "M.'s" statement as to the mystery.

Speaking of the prevalent belief that Paul had some exclusive revelation he says that upon examining Eph. iii. 1-13 and Col. i. 23-29, he is "unable to find a trace of that idea in those Scriptures". Not even a TRACE! We had better look at the passages again.

The first reason why "M." failed in his search is basic. He does not rightly divided the Word of truth. He does not clearly distinguish between the revelation of the mystery of Christ which was shared by other apostles and prophets, and that revelations which Paul declares was revealed to himself that he should enlighten all. He fails to rightly divide between the ministry of Paul and Peter, for he says:--

> "Peter had acted upon this 'mystery' in preaching Christ to the Gentiles at Cornelius' house before Paul began (our italics) his ministry, which FACT is enough of itself to dispose of the idea that Paul was the first to receive knowledge of it."

"M." is rather fond of FACTS. He continually refers to some statement of his own as "this fact", but we feel that most of these are open to doubt. The one before us is a case in point. The casual reader, who does not test what is written by the Word, would conceived that the idea of Paul's exclusive claim to the revelation of the "mystery" was exploded by "this fact" from Acts x. In Acts ix. we have the following FACTS recorded by inspiration:--

> "And straightway he preached Christ in the synagogues, that He is the Son of God" (verse 20).
> "He spake boldly in the name of the Lord Jesus, and disputed with the Grecians; but they went about to slay him" (verse 29).

Gal. i. 17 supplies the ellipsis of Acts ix. 22, stating that Paul went away into Arabia. The scriptural FACT is that Peter had not gone further in his testimony than to the Samaritans, and upon his own confession would not have done so had he not received the vision from heaven. This vision did not take place until AFTER Paul's conversion and commission. Another FACT is found in Acts xxvi. 16-18. There, Paul reveals for the first time what the Lord said unto him on the road to Damascus:--

> "I have appeared unto thee for this purpose . . . . . delivering thee from the people, and from the GENTILES, unto whom now I send thee, to open their eyes, and to turn them from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God, that they may receive forgiveness of sins, and inheritance among them which are sanctified by faith that is in Me."

"M.'s" facts are fictions, anything being a good enough weapon with which to beat the "postponement theory". But he can do nothing against the truth, and we cannot think many real students will be impressed with the facts about the "mystery (whatever it be)" that are of this character. We will accept his own explanation, and believe that he is indeed "UNABLE to find a trace", etc., and agree that the failure so to do is found in his own inability as a student and not in the inspired record.

The closing paragraph quoted on page 34 contains this wholesome suggestion:--

> "The meaning being quite evident to those who give proper attention to the language."

We do not know the extent of "M.'s" acquaintance with the original tongue of the N.T., but scattered through his books are references to the Greek and quotations from "Bagster's Interlinear."

If “M.” had been more concerned to find the truth than to beat his fellow servants and had paid that “proper attention to the language” which is its due, he would not have made such a public exhibition of his “inability to find a trace” of the unique character of Paul’s ministry.

“M.” quotes Eph. iii. 4, 5 in the second paragraph and Col. i. 26 in the last paragraph but one of the excerpt given beforehand:--

> “The mystery of Christ, which in other ages was not made known unto the sons of men as it is now—in this age—revealed unto His holy Apostles and prophets by the Spirit” (Eph. iii. 4, 5).
> “Even the mystery which hath been hid from ages and generations, but now is manifest to His saints” (Col. i. 26).

Now had “M.” followed his own advice, he would have seen in the original this FACT. The word translated “ages” in Eph. iii. 5 should be rendered “generations” and is exactly the same word as that which is so translated in Col. i. 26, where we read of both “ages” and “generations”. The “meaning” is now “quite evident”. Having given “proper attention to the language” we shall be able to find much more than a trace of the idea of Paul’s exclusive ministry. Eph. iii. 5 speaks of something which had been revealed “now” in a fuller measure than it had been in “other generations”, which brings to light one FACT that the “other generations” did have the subject “made known” to them in a degree. Col. i. 26 however adds another FACT, and that HIDDEN instead of being made known to the generations. Inasmuch as there can be no contradiction conceived in the statements of Eph. iii. 5 and Col. i. 26 they must of necessity be speaking of two distinct things, and the argument of “M.” is found worthless and without foundation. We feel sure that if he will only give the language of these wonderful passages proper attention he will have to revoke a good deal of his recent publications. The pity of it is, he will not be able to undo the harm that his methods of study and his untenable “Facts” have done.

We cannot do more than touch upon the positive side of the question in these papers; this we must reserve until later.

#4. Elijah.
pp. 49 - 52

"M." has a deal to say against the "postponement theory" which we will consider in its order. One of the obstacles lying in his path is the statement made in Scriptures concerning John the Baptist and Elijah. We quote from "G.P.K." page 51:--

> "We have now to inquire as to the time of the fulfillment of Malachi's prediction of the coming of Elijah the prophet. For it is held and taught by not a few prominent expositors that Elijah himself (meaning Elijah the Tishbite) will come during the great tribulation and will then fulfil Malachi's prophecy by turning many Israelites to the Lord. In fact this assumption is one of the main props of the post-Kingdom theory. Hence it challenges scrutiny. The idea that John did not fulfil the Elijah-ministry foretold by Malachi rests upon a very curious interpretation of Matt. xi. 14. We quote verses 12-15 inclusive:--
>
> > 'And from the days of John the Baptist until now the Kingdom of heaven suffereth violence, and the violent take it by force. For all the prophets and the law prophesied until John. And if ye will receive (it), this is Elias, which was for to come. He that hath ears to hear, let him hear'."

"M." adds:--

> "We believe that the real meaning is simple and obvious." "The name 'Elijah' was in our opinion used in this prophecy (of Malachi) in order that we might have a key to the unlocking of important truth." "The view we take is, we are confident, sustained fully, first by the results accomplished by John's ministry in making ready a people prepared for the Lord."

The connection of the writer is that there is nothing conditional in the Lord's words. He believes that John the Baptist was Elijah, and that no future Elijah is to be expected. Hence he speaks of the "Elijah-ministry" of Malachi's prophecy—which of course Malachi does not, for he says definitely "Elijah the prophet". We will take the writer's own canon as our guide.

First, the results accomplished.—The writer limits his statement to the preparation of a people for the Lord, but this will not do. On page 55 he again quotes Scripture, "And Jesus answered and said, Elias truly shall first come and restore all things". He follows the full quotation of Matt. xvii. 9-13 with the remark:--

> "These words are too plain to admit of any misunderstanding on the part of those whose minds are not occupied by preconceptions. The language is simple and unambiguous."

We ask "M." one simple and unambiguous question, Did John the Baptist RESTORE ALL THINGS? The answer is No, he did not. In Acts iii. 21 Peter uses the same word, when speaking of the second coming of Christ:--

> "Whom the heavens must receive until the times of the RESTITUTION of all things, which God hath spoken by the mouth of all His holy prophets since (the) age."

Elijah's ministry of restoration was future when John the Baptist was dead. "M." says:--

> "It is noticeable that the Lord connects John's ministry with the prophecy of Malachi."

The Scripture, speaking of that coming for which the 'messenger" prepared, says, "But who may abide the day of His coming, and who shall stand when He appeareth?" (Mal. iii. 2)—words that do not describe the Advent of Christ as unfolded in Matthew's Gospel, but which look onward to the second coming. Malachi continues:--

> "I will come near to you in judgment" (Mal. iii. 5).
> "Behold, I send unto you Elijah the prophet (which is John the Baptist, according to "M." unconditionally), BEFORE THE COMING OF THE GREAT AND DREADFUL DAY OF THE LORD" (Mal. iv. 5).

Joel says:--

> "The sun shall be turned into darkness and the moon into blood, BEFORE THE GREAT AND THE TERRIBLE DAY OF THE LORD COME" (Joel ii. 31).

This is the second test. "M." opens the chapter with an enquiry as to time. That terrible day is still future. John the Baptist's preparatory ministry is divided from the event by nearly 2,000 years. This can by no argument be made to fit with the meaning of the word translated "before". A similar objection is found in the reference to the sun and moon—these signs are still awaiting fulfillment. The so-called "postponement theory" instead of receiving a refutation is very much strengthened by these passages.

When the Lord said, "Elias is come already", the disciples "understood that He spake of John the Baptist" (Matt. xvii. 13); and seeing that He had previously prefaced His words concerning John with a condition—"If"—they were able to understand His meaning. When John was questioned, "Art thou Elias?" he answered, "I am not". Shall we quote our brother and say,

> "These words are too plain to admit of any misunderstanding on the part of those whose minds are not occupied by preconceptions. The language is simple and unambiguous"?

No, that will not do here, "M." is in possession of a secret that was hidden even from John the Baptist himself. John the Baptist did not know that he was Elijah which was for to come! We quote:--

> "In perfect keeping with this was it for him to take the question of the Jews as referring to Elijah the Tishbite, as doubtless it did in fact. Therefore John could consistently and truthfully answer 'No'."

We fear that our own understanding of the meaning of Yea, Yea and Nay, Nay will not allow us to follow the subtle reasoning here manifest. We do however most certainly believe that John the Baptist would have scorned such casuistry. As well say that when he said that he was Not the Christ he was mistaken.

Now for the anti-climax. After having denied the conditional nature of the Lord's statement, after having had recourse to such an idea as that Malachi, who said "Elijah THE Prophet", meant no such person: after having confused the time of fulfillment, and taken prophecies which deal with the great and dreadful day of the Lord as applying to the ministry of John Baptist: after having spoken of "this assumption" as being one of the main props of the "post-Kingdom" theory—"M." finishes his argument by saying:--

> "The view we have here presented does not, of course, exclude the possibility that there may be yet another 'Elijah' who will accomplish a further and final fulfillment of Malachi's prophecy. Hence any who wish to do so are free to look for such a further and final fulfillment. All we have to say about that is that we see nothing in Scripture to support such expectation."

Is this what the writer means by "simple and unambiguous" language? On page 63 of "G.P.K." the writer speaks once more of Elijah. He there quotes I Kings xviii. 36. In this Scripture Elijah is definitely called "Elijah the Prophet", identifying him with the Elijah of Malachi. He quotes Elijah's prayer:--

> "Hear me, O Lord, hear me, that this people may know that Thou art the Lord God, and that Thou hast turned their heart back again" (verse 37), and says:--

> "It was then a far off look to the time when the nation Israel shall gaze upon Him Whom they pierced, and shall turn indeed, never to apostatize again. But that day is drawing near."

If ever a man was compelled by the force of Scripture to acknowledge truth in spite of his own misunderstandings our brother is so compelled here. The ministry of John the Baptist, which is so linked with that of Elijah, had to do with the turning back to God the apostate NATION ISRAEL, and that day is drawing near! "M." believes the "postponement theory". He believes John Baptist's ministry was to the Nation Israel, and not to or concerning the Church, and that the long postponed completion of that germinant fulfillment, when John went before the Lord "in the spirit and power of Elias", is drawing nigh.

We rejoice in the confirmation of the truth to ourselves by those who set out thus to oppose it, and trust that its reconsideration may prove a blessing to our critic himself.

#5. The Postponement Theory.
pp. 65 - 68

The idea of a "dispensational change" or "dispensational break" is opposed very strongly by "M." Instead of a "break" he teaches that there has been no change whatever in the testimony from the time of John the Baptist to the writing of the Epistle to the Ephesians. The teaching of a dispensational change at Acts xxviii., or earlier, the writer calls for convenience the "postponement theory". Our brother then makes the following sweeping statement:--

> "This principle of interpreting a passage according to its plain and simple meaning is of the utmost importance in the inquiry we are now making, for the reason that the advocates of the postponement theory do not even pretend to offer proof from Scripture in support of it."

We do not even pretend! The author of G.P.K. will be grieved to discover when dealing with the testimony of others that his antipathy to their doctrines has led him to cross the border line of truth. The advocates of the postponement theory do not EVEN PRETEND to offer proof from Scripture. Yet within the space of two pages the same writer says:--

> "Finally, we have sought to examine patiently EVERY SCRIPTURE, and EVERY DEDUCTION from Scripture, that has been brought to our attention as tending in any way to support the postponement theory."

If those who advocate this theory do not even pretend to give Scripture proof, how can anyone examine patiently, that which no one even pretends to produce? Does "M." mean us to understand that he only pretended to seek to examine patiently these Scriptures with their deductions? If he does not, then upon his own confession, the advocates of the postponement theory have evidently a goodly array of Scripture and deductions from Scripture. This question of Scriptural proof we must take up seriously when we deal with these subjects positively. In this paper we are seeking to understand our critic. Of course there is an exception to every rule. The "PLAIN and SIMPLE meaning" has not been followed for instance in the case of Malachi's prophecy of Elijah, or of John Baptist's plain straightforward answer "I am not". In order to prove John Baptist to be Elijah, the words "Elijah the Tishbite" are introduced instead of Elijah the prophet. You must speak of an "Elijah ministry" instead of Elijah in person. "M." even teaches that either John did not know that he was Elijah, or that he could say "I am not" with a double meaning. Further, the postponement theory is novel, therefore untrue:

> "The results of his investigations fully confirm our statement as to the entire novelty of the postponement theory."

Some think the John-Baptist-Elijah-theory to be novel—yet once again this is the favoured exception. The doctrine of the Second Coming of Christ was considered novel when it was brought to light by the early Brethren. Justification by faith was novel to the majority in the days of Luther.

In attacking the "postponement theory" you may say that it does not pretend to claim the support of the Scriptures; then you can face about, and say that you have patiently examined every Scripture and deduction, and that "it has been a matter of surprise that such arguments as HAVE BEEN ADVANCED (forgetting the statement about 'pretending'), and have been repeated OVER and OVER (forgetting the other statement about no Scripture proofs) should ever have been put forth at all".

Another statement equally emphatic, but speedily revoked, is the following:--

> "From first to last there is no sign of any break in the purpose of God se clearly indicated in Matt. i. 1."

This is not sound argument. Matt. i. 1 simply says:--

> "The book of the generation of Jesus Christ, the Son of David, the Son of Abraham."

and others beside our brother may think that they can discern God's purpose therein, which differs very much from that of the author of G.P.K.

Following on from this statement, and within four pages of it, our attention is called to the "enlightening comments" in a letter written by one for whom the "postponement theory" has been shattered. The "enlightening comments" deal with the quotation of Zech. ix. 9 in Matt. xxi. 5, where the words concerning the King are given, but the words concerning salvation are omitted. These are the words:--

> "The Holy Spirit purposely leaves out these words from the record in Matt. xxi. 5; for Christ came the first time as the Meek One; and He is coming the second time as the Just One. Between the first and second comings of Christ there is the age of grace, 'the acceptable year of the Lord'."

This is "enlightening" and true. Surely here is a confession that Scripture teaches a "break", a "dispensational change", and that the novel "postponement theory" is proved by its opponent to be as old as Zechariah! Let us read on. "M." seems to lose some of his certainty as he proceeds:--

> "The opposition of the Kings of the earth and its rulers against Him is foretold in Psalm ii.; and this, according to Acts iv. 26, 27, WAS FULFILLED."

Adherence to the "no break" theory would necessitate that "M." stopped here, but cannot. In spite of all his strong words to the contrary, he is obliged to adopt the despised "postponement theory", for he says, "was fulfilled, partially at least". If it was only fulfilled "partially", the complete fulfillment is yet future, which is all the postponement theory demands. Even "M." cannot misinterpret Psa. ii. of the church, it is too evidently future and earthly. We shall see this more clearly still when we return to the subject.

One more reference, and we can leave the question. On page 48 the writer is dealing with the subject of Malachi's prophecy of Elijah. He says:--

> "The words 'before the day of the Lord' are not to be taken to mean 'immediately before' the coming of that day."

It will be observed that our brother does not even PRETEND to give Scriptural proof for this statement, and we therefore cannot seek to examine patiently his proofs, for there are none. What we will do however is to tell his readers that the very same Hebrew word is used by the same prophet in the words, "He shall prepare the way before Me", in Mal. iii. 1, and trust that they will judge for themselves as to the character of the criticism which complains of those who do not even pretend to bring forward Scripture in proof. Continuing our quotation:--

> "And furthermore it is in accordance with Old Testament prophecy to disregard the length of time of this dispensation, and to speak of events belonging to the second coming of Christ AS IF THEY FOLLOWED CLOSELY upon the events of His first coming."

Could a clearer demonstration be given of the Scriptural fact of the "gap", "break", or "postponement" theory? Is Scripture so elastic? The word "before" which literally means "in the face of" means according to our brother "a very long way off", and then after having stretched this word, he compresses the whole of the present dispensation within the compass of a comma. We urge out critic to study II Tim. ii. 15 in view of "that day". It seems manifest to us that "M." is beating the air. Those who have never grasped the truth of the Mystery or of a rightly divided Word, and whose time and capacity are too limited to enable them to do their own study of the Word, may be led away by "M.'s" arguments, but no true BEREAN can be satisfied by such methods, and so far from shaking their faith in the wondrous truth of the Mystery the very attacks only revealed its foundation principles to be impregnable.

#6. The "Offering" of the Kingdom.
pp. 84, 85

We do not feel our readers will disagree with us in thinking that no good purpose will be served by occupying much more space with this examination. We will just touch upon one or two further fallacies and conclude.

A proper man of straw which "M." erects and overthrows is the idea that Christ, or John the Baptist, offered the kingdom to Israel, and he states that if this had been his ministry instead of baptizing unto repentance, John should have opened up negotiations with the leaders of the nation. "To offer an earthly kingdom to the nation of Israel is a very different thing from turning 'many of the children of Israel to the Lord their God'," states "M.", and we agree. It is a very different thing indeed, and had Israel "repented", the times of restitution and restoration would have commenced, the king being present and the kingdom heralded as "at hand". Christ was the King, not the "leaders of the nation". They were offered nothing, but were bidden to repent in order that the Spiritual Kingdom of Prophecy might be set up. This fallacy of the "offer" is associated with another. "M." writes:--

> "The words we have quoted from I Chron. xvii. 11-14 sweep away completely the idea that the Son of God and Son of David came to announce an earthly kingdom, or to seek acceptance of Himself as Israel's King. No such UNWORTHY THOUGHT as that can be read out of any part of the Word of God . . . . . To dispel that UNWORTHY and UNWARRANTED idea is one of our objects in writing these pages."

Surely students of prophecy will not need details to convince them that "M.'s" conception of the earthly kingdom is as UNWORTHY as it is UNWARRANTED. "M." further writes:--

> "No trace, we repeat, not the slightest trace, of such an offer is found in any of the recorded utterances of the Apostles."

Let the reader compare Acts i. 6 with Acts iii. 19-21 in the original, and then say whether "M." is warranted in making such a statement. "M." makes much of the Sermon on the Mount. Does he fail to see that "theirs is the kingdom of heaven" must be read with "they shall inherit THE EARTH"? "M." further writes:--

> "Moreover, had the Lord stated to Nicodemus that he was offering or announcing the promised earthly kingdom to Israel, and that He would immediately establish it if acceptable to the people and their rulers, Nicodemus would have had no difficulty at all in understanding what was meant."

Nicodemus and our brother however are both in the same error. Both looked upon the earthly kingdom as being not spiritual, whereas when the kingdom does come, "all Israel shall be saved"; "ungodliness shall be turned away from Jacob"; the very pots in the houses of Israel in that day shall be "Holiness unto the Lord"; and a "nation shall be born in a day"; "they shall all be righteous". What as "unworthy and unwarranted" conception "M." has of that kingdom for which David so yearned in Psa. lxxii., and concerning which he could say, "The prayers of David the Son of Jesse are consummated!"

With regard to the question as to the relationship of the Kingdom of Heaven and the Kingdom of God "M." makes the following statements:--

> "The Kingdom of Heaven and the Kingdom of God which the Lord was announcing, and for which He was preparing His disciples, ARE ONE AND THE SAME" (page 136).

On page 149 is a most involved argument which when analyzed results in the following:--

1. "The children of the kingdom" (Mat.. viii. 12) does not refer to the kingdom of heaven.
2. That this same kingdom is intended by Peter when he spoke to unconverted Jews in Jerusalem (Acts iii. 24) and with this agrees the Lord's words to the Pharisees, when He said
3. "The Kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof" (Matt. xxi. 43).
4. "It is particularly to be noted in this connection that the Lord does not say in Matt. viii. 12 that the Israelites are the 'children of the kingdom of heaven'."

Page 136 gives among “facts” which “clearly appear”, that the kingdom of heaven and the kingdom of God are one and the same. Page 149 by reason of confusing the teaching of Eph. ii. with Matthew’s Gospel puts forward as a “fact” and “plain” that the kingdom of God and the kingdom of heaven are vitally different, the one including unconverted Jews and referring to a nation, the other, the kingdom which is the Church, and the Body, and the Mystery, and the fulfillment of the promise of Abraham.

We leave these evidences of confused thought, feeling that they are sufficiently self contradictory of themselves. The author of G.P.K. is a warning to us all, showing the confusion of mind and the misunderstanding of Scripture that arises out of failure to put into constant practice the command of II Tim. ii. 15, Rightly to divide the Word of truth.

Dispensational Difficulties.

#6. The New Creation.

An enquiry as to how the Apostle Paul could use the term both before and after Acts xxviii.

pp. 11 - 13

The Church of the One Body is a new man, created so. In II Cor. v. the apostle says, "If any man be in Christ, he is a new creature". The difficulty before the minds of some is somewhat as follows:--If the Church of the One Body be the subject of a mystery not made known until after Acts xxviii. how is it that the apostle speaks of a believer being a new creature in an epistle written before Acts xxviii., seeing that the new creation is a distinctive term of the Mystery?

Let us notice the references to a new creation in the prison epistles.

> "Created in Christ Jesus unto good works" (Eph. ii. 10).
> "To create of the two in Himself one new man" (Eph. ii. 15).
> "Put on the new man, which after God is created in righteousness and true holiness" (Eph. iv. 24).
> "And have put on the new man, which is renewed in knowledge after the image of Him that created him: where there is neither Greek nor Jew, circumcision nor uncircumcision, Barbarian, Scythian, bond nor free, but Christ is all, and in all" (Col. iii. 10, 11).

Next let us observe the references in the earlier epistles:--

> "Therefore if any man be in Christ, he is a new creature: old things are passed away, behold new things have come into being, and all things are of God who hath reconciled us to Himself" (II Cor. v. 17).
> "For in Christ Jesus neither circumcision availeth anything nor uncircumcision, but a new creature" (Gal. vi. 15).

The doctrine of the earlier epistles of Paul are the foundation upon which the Mystery is built. During the early ministry doctrine and dispensation differed considerably. The doctrinal position of Jew and Gentile as set forth in Romans is summed up in the words "no difference", whereas the dispensational position is "some difference", and, "the Jew first". The middle wall still stood.

The introduction of the ministry of the reconciliation, while it did not completely remove the dispensational distinctions, was plainly a step in that direction.

During the early epistles the dispensational position of the Gentiles was that of wild olive branches grafted into the true olive, whereas the dispensational position of the Gentiles in the prison epistles is that of fellow-members of the One Body. What is true only doctrinally in Paul's early ministry is true equally of doctrine and dispensation in Paul's prison ministry. Every saved and justified believer during Paul's early ministry was himself a new creature, but did not at that time come under a dispensation that eradicated all the distinctions between himself and Israel. In the dispensation of the Mystery dispensation echoes doctrine, the anomaly has vanished, the new creation has extended to "the both", and has united Jew and Gentile in one new man, so making peace.

The position may be set out thus:--

New Creation. Doctrine.	Jew first. Wild Olive. Dispensation.	New Creation. Dispensation.
II Cor. v. 17. Gal. vi. 15. Eph. ii. 10. Eph. iv. 24. Col. iii. 10, 11.	Rom. i. 16. Rom. iii. 1, 2. Rom. ix. 3-5. Rom. xi. 17-26.	Eph. ii. 15. Eph. iii. 6.

The step forward is indicated in Eph. ii. 15. There the new man that is created is not that which is connected with the salvation and justification of a sinner by grace. This new man is created in Christ "of the twain", that is of Jewish and Gentile believers. This brings dispensational position level with the doctrinal position; in both the flesh is eliminated, both are connected with reconciliation. In II Cor. v. the new creature is the doctrinal outcome of the first sphere of reconciliation. In Eph. ii. 15, 16 the new man created in Himself is the outcome of the further reconciliation there brought in.

The difference between the two periods may be seen if set out thus:--

Before Acts xxviii.

Doctrine.—"In Christ"; Dispensation.—"With faithful Abraham."

After Acts xxviii.

Doctrine.—"In Christ"; Dispensation.—"With Christ."

#7. The dispensational position of I Thess. iv. 13-18.
pp. 61 - 63

Each chapter in this epistle speaks of the Lord's coming. It is of such importance, that it is indicated as the one thing for which the redeemed wait while serving God; "they wait for His Son out of the heavens" (I Thess. i. 10). Chapters ii., iii., iv., and v. give this Coming one name—The Parousia. The word "coming" is not a good rendering, rather is it His arrival—His "Personal Presence"—that the word indicates.

The apostle tells the Thessalonians practically what he told the Corinthans:--

> "We shall not all sleep" (I Cor. xv. 51).
>
> "For this we say unto you in a word of the Lord, that we, the living who are left to the Coming of the Lord, will by no means precede those who fell asleep" (I Thess. iv. 15).

"In a word of the Lord" does not necessarily indicate the special revelation of a mystery or secret; Paul refers to such a statement as John xi. 25, 26:--

> "Jesus said unto her, I am the resurrection and the life, he that believeth in Me, though he were dead, yet shall he live: and whosoever liveth and believeth in Me shall never die."

There is a "mystery" revealed in I Cor. xv. concerning this same truth, but that does not refer to the fact of some being found alive on the earth at the Lord's Coming, but to their "change", even though not passing through death and resurrection.

> "For the Lord Himself will come down from heaven with a shout, with an archangel's voice, and with a trumpet of God, and the dead in Christ shall rise first" (I Thess. iv. 16).

The shout is the shout of soldiers rushing to the charge, the archangel being Michael. This resurrection is intimately connected with Daniel's people:--

> "And at that time Michael shall stand up, the great prince that standeth for the children of thy people: and there shall be a time of trouble, such as never was since there was a nation even to that same time: and at that time thy people shall be delivered, every one that shall be found written in the book. And MANY THAT SLEEP in the dust of the earth shall awake" (Dan. xii. 1, 2).

The voice of the archangel connects I Thess. iv. with the great tribulation of the Revelation. It connects it also with the hope of Israel. In Rev. xii. Michael stand up and engages in war with the dragon. In Rev. xiii. the beast and the false prophet arise.

The two epistles to the Thessalonians were written about the same time and to the same people. The second epistle in the second chapter deals with the same period as is dealt with in Rev. xiii. This is a further link with the Apocalypse. Again, this coming of the Lord is also "with a trumpet of God". In Rev. x. & xi. we have the sounding of the seventh trumpet which announces the taking of the sovereignty of this world by Christ. I Cor. xv. 52 says this resurrection and change shall be at the last trump, and the seventh trumpet of Rev. xi. is the last in Scripture.

The hope of I Thess. iv. 17 is to "meet the Lord in the air", which is not the same as "going to heaven". Those who met the Bridegroom turned and came with him (Matt. xxv.). Those who met Paul on the road to Rome turned and went back to Rome with him. Those who meet the Lord in the air will not alter the Lord's course. He will descend to the earth according to His promise.

Scripture is most consistent in the usage of words. The word Parousia is used by the Lord in Matt. xxiv., by Paul in I Cor. xv. 23 and I & II Thess., by James, by Peter and by John. It is NEVER USED OF THE LORD'S COMING in the Prison Epistles. It is consistent with the dispensation that covers Matthew's testimony, the Acts, and the ministry of Peter, James and John. It cannot be used of the blessed hope of the Church of the One Body. When I Thessalonians was written it was a Scriptural expectancy that within that generation the Lord would come. Paul could rightly join himself with the believers and say:--

> "We which are alive and are left to the coming of the Lord" (I Thess. iv. 15).
> "Your whole person, spirit, and soul and body be preserved blameless unto the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ" (I Thess. v. 23).

Of this coming Peter spoke in Acts iii. 19-21:--

> "Repent ye therefore, and be converted . . . . . When the times of refreshing shall come from the Presence of the Lord, and He shall send Jesus Christ . . . . . Whom the heavens must receive until the times of restitution of all things, which God hath spoken by the mouth of all His holy prophets since the age."

Right on till Acts xxviii. the hope is "the hope of Israel" (xxviii. 20). This therefore includes the hope of Galatians, I & II Thessalonians, I & II Corinthians and Romans. But Israel repented not. They were not "converted" (xxviii. 27). The times of refreshing did not come. The Lord did not return. The dispensation with its hopes and its doctrine, its church and its sphere, passed away, and its place has been taken by the dispensation of the mystery. Not until the Church of the One Body is complete can the hope of Israel be resumed. It shall come. He is faithful; but a better hope awaits the Church of the Mystery.

#8. The dispensational place of the Gentiles during the Acts.
pp. 71 - 73

Our only means of knowing the purpose of God is the teaching of the Word of God. We cannot argue the point as to whether there may have been some Gentiles gathered with the disciples on the day of Pentecost, all we know is that there are none in the Scripture record. None but Jews, or Israel, either believing or unbelieving, figure in Acts i., ii., iii., iv., v., vi. & vii. We earnestly invite our readers to write to us if they disagree on this, not to debate, but to supply us with chapter and verse. Chapter viii. records the widening of the witness:--

> "Then Philip went down to the city of Samaria, and preached Christ" (viii. 5).

Here the third sphere of testimony is reached, "Jerusalem and in all Judæa and in Samaria" (i. 8). Toward the close of the chapter an Ethiopian is introduced, to whom Philip preaches "Jesus" (viii. 35). Philip passes through Azotus (in Judæa) and preaches in all the cities until he comes to Cæsarea, some 30 miles north-west of Samaria. Chapter ix. finds the preaching of Christ extended as far as Damascus, some 140 miles north of Jerusalem. This section is concluded by the words of ix. 31:--

> "Then had the churches rest throughout Judæa and Galilee and Samaria."

The conversion of Cornelius is next recorded. Here Peter makes the statement that he is still "a man that is a JEW', and that he had been bound until that moment to observe the law which forbade such to keep company or come unto one of "another nation". Till then all Gentiles, even though they might be "devout", and even though they "feared God with all their house", "gave alms" and "prayed to God always" (x. 2), were reckoned as "common or unclean" (x. 28). It needed a thrice repeated vision to convince Peter otherwise, AND YET WE ARE TAUGHT that the church BEGAN AT PENTECOST! This attitude exhibited by Peter was not something personal to himself, it was shared by "the Apostles and brethren in Judæa" who contended with Peter for going in to men uncircumcised and for eating with them (xi. 2). How could a Gentile have "continued stedfastly in the Apostles' doctrine and fellowship, and in breaking of bread . . . . . and have all things common . . . . . and eat meat with gladness"? There would have been an uproar instead of fellowship had a Gentile been included.

After the rehearsal of the case of Cornelius by Peter, who concludes by saying "What was I, that I could withstand God?" we find:--

> "When they heard these things, they held their peace, and glorified God, saying, Then hath God also to the Gentiles granted repentance unto life" (xi. 18).

This admission is immediately followed by the statement that they which were scattered abroad upon the persecution that arose about Stephen traveled a far as Phenice, and Cyprus, and Antioch, preaching the Word TO NONE BUT JEWS ONLY.

Acts xiii. commences the second and larger half of the Acts. Barnabas and Saul are separated by the Holy Spirit unto a special service. This is somewhat parallel with the baptism of the Spirit on the day of Pentecost. As a result a Jew is blinded and Sergius Paulus, a Gentile, is saved. This foreshadows the new turn of events.

The Synagogue witness at Antioch shows the Gentileward trend by the concluding words (xiii. 40-48):--

> "Lo, we turn to the Gentiles . . . . . I have set thee to be a light to the Gentiles."

It is, we trust, abundantly evident that Paul was the Apostle to the Gentiles and it was his commission and ministry that gathered the Gentiles to Christ, and founded churches in the heathen cities of Corinth, Thessalonica, Philippi, Ephesus, etc. It will be from his epistles therefore that we shall learn the place of the Gentile during the Acts.

Galatians teaches that both Gentile as well as Jewish believers were "All the children of God by faith in Christ Jesus", they were "All one in Christ Jesus", and argues "If ye be Christ's, then are ye Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise" (Gal. iii. 36-29). They were by virtue of being "in Christ Jesus" a new creation (Gal. vi. 15).

The first epistle to the Thessalonians shews that the Gentiles converted from the heathendom were "waiting for His (God's) Son from heaven" (i. 10; iv. 14-18). They had been "called unto His Kingdom and glory" (ii. 12), they had not been appointed to wrath, "but to obtain salvation by our Lord Jesus Christ" (v. 9). The second epistle to the Thessalonians reveals that the Gentiles who believed during the Acts period formed part of a company that will be on earth during the last days, during the rise and dominion of the man of sin, and the time of tribulation (i. 5-12; ii. 1-12).

The first Epistle to the Corinthians shews us that the Gentile believer at that time came behind in no gift "waiting for the revelation (apocalypse) of our Lord Jesus Christ", which is parallel with I & II Thessalonians. These spiritual gifts, which so mark the times of the Acts, were for a purpose:--

> "In the law it is written, With men of other tongues and other lips will I speak unto this people: and yet for all that will they not hear Me, saith the Lord. Wherefore tongues are for a sign" (I Cor. xiv. 21, 22).

With this passage should be read Rom. x. 19, xi. 11-14, where the place of the Gentile and the object of his inclusion before the Millennium is explained:--

> "But I say, Did not Israel know? First Moses saith, I will PROVOKE you to jealousy by them that are no people, and by a foolish nation I will anger you."
> "Salvation is come unto the Gentiles, for to PROVOKE them to jealousy . . . . . If by any means I may PROVOKE to jealousy them which are my flesh, and might save some of them."

Here is light upon the inclusion of the Gentile. It had the provocation of blinded Israel in view. Like the Apostle to the Gentiles, they were "born out of due time".

The figure whereby the Apostle enforces and illustrates this position of the Gentile is next given. The Gentile is likened to a "wild olive" graft (contrary to nature) into the true olive tree. This is not a case of ordinary grafting, for it is usual to graft the choice variety on to the wild stock. At this present moment, and for the identical reason, slips of one variety of dessert pear are being grafted into another, not that the graft shall bear fruit, but that it may "provoke" the flagging tree into more fruitfulness. The Gentile was included during the Acts for Israel's sake to stir up, if it were possible, that people fast falling into a deadly slumber. It was of no avail. The day at length came when Israel were "dismissed" and the secret purpose of God for the Gentiles in the interim made known.

If we allow a place to the testimony of I Cor. xiv. and Rom. x., xi. in our views of Gentile blessing, we shall see how utterly impossible it is to try to make the teaching of Ephesians fit in with the earlier teaching of the pre-prison epistles.

#9. The Gospel for To-day.
pp. 103 - 105

Most believers who have been led to see the truth of the "Mystery" immediately feel that some different presentation of the gospel becomes necessary. The "Whosoever will" evangel does not seem to harmonize with the peculiar teaching of the prison epistles. The gospel of the Kingdom (as given in Matthew) or the fuller and future gospel of "Whosoever is willing", when the Spirit AND the Bride shall witness together after the Day of the Lord (Rev. xxii. 17), do not express the good news of God for the present time. Let us observe one or two outstanding features of the present dispensation.

1. GENTILE.—The secret purpose of God for the present interval could not be made known nor introduced until the people of Israel had been set aside. The present emphasis is not (a) Salvation is of the Jews, (b) The Jew first and also the Gentile, but (c) The Gentile WITHOUT the Jew at all. This statement by no means excludes the Jew as an individual from believing in Christ as Saviour and Lord now.

2. GRACE.—When the apostle was about to become a prisoner and looked forward to finishing his course and the ministry he had received, he speaks of it as being "the gospel of the grace of God" (Acts xx. 24). This exactly fits the present period, for it is called in Eph. iii. 2 "the dispensation of the grace of God".

Plainly, each dispensation must have its own gospel or set of good news. The gospel of the kingdom runs with the dispensation of the kingdom. The gospel of the grace of God goes with the dispensation of the grace of God. The great basis of the gospel to-day is found in Romans. The limitations of this present article forbid any attempt at opening up this marvelous epistle, but we call attention to the following. The epistle opens with the gospel of God which had been promised before by the prophets in the Holy Scriptures. It closes with a reference to a gospel which was intimately associated with the preaching of Jesus Christ according to the revelation of the mystery, which had been silenced in the age times, but was now made manifest through prophetic writings.

The gospel of God occupies Rom. i. 1 - v. 11. It deals with the Jew and the Gentile in their separate needs, shewing that whether under the law of conscience and creation, or under the superadded law of Sinai, all have sinned and come short of the glory of God. The gospel that is connected with the mystery which had been silenced is related to something deeper than anything revealed in Rom. i. 1 - v. 11. There the personal sins and doings are under review; here in Rom. v. 12-21 the failure and fall of the creature apart from his deeds is brought to light. The gospel of God goes back to ABRAHAM, the mystery of Rom. xvi. goes back to ADAM. In no other place except I Cor. xv. is it revealed that Adam's one act of disobedience is the great cause of sin, death and condemnation. This opens the way for the preaching of Jesus Christ according to this mystery, and shows that:--

> "As through the disobedience of the one the many were constituted sinners, so also through the obedience of One, the many shall be constituted righteous" (Rom. v. 19).

As we said above, an exposition here is impossible. It is essential to distinguish between the "many" and the "all", this we must reserve until later. Rom. vi., vii., & viii. follow and preach Christ in this connection in relation to the dominion of SIN, LAW and DEATH. It is this inner section of Rom. v. 12 - viii. 39 which is the basis of the gospel for to-day, and "Who is sufficient for these things?"

How many "Evangelists" would give a series of gospel addresses on these pages? The Prodigal Son, John iii. 16, and similar scriptures written for other times are deemed all-sufficient.

The world to-day is thinking in terms of "Humanity", but the gospel for to-day reveals the utter failure of all mankind, and the new Headship of Christ. This gospel is the gospel of the new creation. All men by nature are "in Adam"; Christ is revealed as the "last Adam" and the "second Man". The gospel reveals the way whereby man may be taken out of the natural sphere of sin and death into the sphere of life and righteousness. The "no condemnation" of Rom. viii. 1 looks back to v. 16-18.

There is one element which is very prominent in Romans and Galatians which does not need so prominent a place now, and that is the various things said regarding "the law". "For we know that what things soever the law saith, it saith to them who are UNDER THE LAW" (Rom. ii. 19). "The Gentiles have NOT the law" (Rom. ii. 14). Of course, where any may be found to have a tendency of legalism, then these passages will be needful.

When the gospel has been believed, and becomes "the word of truth, the gospel of their salvation" (Eph. i. 13), it is followed by the "mystery of the gospel" (Eph. vi. 19) which structurally balances the "mystery of Christ" (Eph. iii. 3), as also in the remoter context of Col. iv. 3. In the inner teaching of Romans (v. 12 - viii. 39) the believer is spoken of as dying with Christ, and being buried with Christ, and being raised again with Christ. This is the gospel which leads up to THE Mystery of Ephesians, for there the top stone is added, "seated together with Christ" (Eph. ii. 6). Further, the threefold equality of Eph. iii. 6, 7 is a part of the gospel, as also the peace which accompanies the "one new man" (ii. 14-17). The gospel for to-day is essentially a preparation for the mystery and its peace—"Your feet shod with the preparation of the gospel of peace" (vi. 15).

We believe that God blesses the faithful preaching of His Word whether it have as its goal Christ as King, Bridegroom, Last Adam, or Head, but those who rejoice in the "revelation of the mystery", who know the final revelation of the "mystery of Christ" and are members of "the Church which is His body", such will preach that gospel which, while it saves from sin and its consequences, leads to Christ as Head over all things to the Church, and to the heavenly places far above all.

(Concluded from page 105).

pp. 139, 140

W have recently read an article which seeks to prove that the gospel of the Kingdom as given in Matthew, and the gospel of the grace of God as revealed in Paul's epistles, are one and the same.

One argument put forward is so manifestly a piece of bad logic that we feel it has only to be stated to be disproved. The argument is this. The word gospel means God's good news; therefore, seeing that both the gospel of the Kingdom and the gospel of the grace of God are God's good news, they must be the same, and the difference in their titles must not be taken to indicate that they differ in reality.

For the sake of clearness let us use an illustration from the Vegetable Kingdom. The potato, the tomato, and the nightshade are all of the same genus Solanum. If the writer mentioned above should put his method of reasoning into practice, he would probably do so at the cost of his life. He would find that it is perilous logic to say that because a potato, tomato and nightshade are of the genus Solanum, they are all one and the same. The word gospel is the name of a genus. It is God's good news; but, just as in the example given, there are vital differences within that genus. The potato is a Solanum, and we eat the tuber that is formed in the earth. The tomato is a Solanum, but we eat the ripe fruit that grows in the sunlight. The nightshade is a Solanum, and unless its product be administered with care and knowledge, it is deadly poison.

The gospel of the Kingdom is like the gospel of the grace of God in this particular, that it is God's good news. It differs however from the latter, inasmuch as it announces a Kingdom, and that a Kingdom which shall be set up "under the whole heaven". They who enter or inherit that Kingdom shall at the same moment "inherit the earth". The gospel preached by Paul on the other hand had other phases of God's revealed purposes of grace as its theme. One presentation of it is entirely heavenly. Now while the earthly and the heavenly purposes may both be announced under the covering word "gospel", it is no more true that the gospel of the Kingdom is the gospel of the grace of God than that the tuber of the earth (the potato) is one and the same with the fruit of the air and sunshine (the tomato).

With regard to the strong statement made by Paul as to the preaching of "another" gospel in Gal. i. 9, we would remind those who use that passage as an argument against us, that they themselves must be careful to preach no other message than that preached by Paul himself if they would avoid the Apostle's anathema.

#10. The references to "gifts" in the Prison Epistles.
pp. 124 - 126

Speaking broadly "gifts" are prominent in the epistles of the Acts period, but practically absent from the prison epistles. While such gifts as "tongues", "miracles" and "healings" are never mentioned in the post-Acts epistles, some references are to be found to "gifts", and as these references cause some readers a difficulty from the dispensational point of view we propose a consideration of them here. Charisma, the word that is so characteristic of I Cor. xii., is used only of Timothy himself, and that upon two occasions. We shall consider these passages in their place. Charisma occurs nowhere else in Paul's epistles after Acts xxviii.

The first reference to "gifts" in the prison epistles is that of Eph. iv. 8:--

> "Having ascended, He has led captivity captive, and has given gifts to men."

Here, associated with the ascended Lord, are "gifts". What are these gifts? Are they the "signs" of I Cor. xiv. 22 in fulfillment of the passage in Isaiah? Are they the gifts as detailed in I Cor. xii. 28? Let us see.

The passage in Ephesians continues and speaks of the Lord in His relation to the Church of the One body as the One who "ascended far above all heavens, that He might fill all things". This is exactly parallel with Eph. i. 21, 23, "Far above all . . . . . who filleth all in all", where the Lord's relation to the Church as Head is prominent. The gifts which are given in this capacity and sphere are next detailed:--

> "And He has given some apostles, and some prophets, and some evangelists and some pastors and teachers, for the readjustment of the saints, with a view to (the) work of ministry, with a view to the building up of the body of Christ" (Eph. iv. 11,12).

These are the gifts and their purpose.

In I Cor. xii., where the gifts are set out in detail, there is an inspired order maintained; first, secondly, thirdly. This order must be so placed for a purpose. To discount it is to despise the inspired Word; to add to it is to take unwarranted liberty. Before Acts this is the God-given order:--

First,	Apostles.
Secondarily,	Prophets.
Thirdly,	Teachers.
After that,	Miracles.
Then,	Gifts of healings; Helps; Governments, Diversities of tongues (I Cor. xii. 28).

This order is repeated in the verse that follows. The order in Eph. iv. is:--

1. Apostles.
2. Prophets.
3. Evangelists.
4. Pastors and Teachers.

The third one here is the Evangelist whilst the Teacher is fourth. No other gifts follow, as they do in I Cor. xii. 28; we are evidently dealing with a different order, e.g.:-

"APOSTLES."—These were given after He had "ascended up on high". Which of the apostles were thus given? In Matt. x. 2-4 we read:--

> "Now the names of the twelve apostles are these. Peter, Andrew, James, John, Philip, Bartholomew, Thomas, Matthew, James, Lebbæus, Simon and Judas Iscariot."

Before the Lord ascended He was seen "of the twelve" (I Cor. xv. 5). This therefore includes Matthias, for Judas never saw the risen Lord, and Matthias was a "witness of His resurrection", and was "numbered with the eleven" (Acts i. 15-26).

The twelve Apostles are complete without Paul.

In I Thess. ii. 6 Paul associates with himself Timothy and Silas saying, "We might have been burdensome as the apostles of Christ". These men are also outside the list of Matt. x. Paul and the apostles of his Order were the gifts of the ascended Lord, the apostles of the Circumcision were appointed by Christ on earth.

"PROPHET" are referred to in Ephesians alone of the prison epistles, and always in the same relation as in iv. 11. First we read that the "One body" is built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets (ii. 20). Next that the revelation of the Mystery of Christ, now given to his holy apostles and prophets, is greater and fuller than that given in other generations (iii. 5), and lastly, that this order was a part of the gift of the ascended Lord to His Church (iv. 11).

"EVANGELIST."—This is the gift which is not found in I Cor. xii. Philip is called an evangelist in Acts xxi. 8, and when Paul was giving Timothy his parting charge, he says:--

> "Do the work of an evangelist, make full proof of your ministry, for I am already being poured out" (II Tim. iv. 5, 6).

The office was evidently very different from that which is so named to-day. The Evangelist was the successor to the Apostle. Timothy, who had the charge of the Church, the appointing of the elders and deacons and general administration, was called upon to make full proof of his ministry at the passing of the Apostle by doing the work of an Evangelist.

The foundation ministry was that of Apostle and Prophet. These, together with Evangelist, Pastor and Teacher bridged the gulf, re-adjusted the saints as to the new dispensation that had been introduced, and led on to the unity of the faith.

From our brief examination of this first passage we find that the "gifts" of Eph. iv. are totally different from those which were prominent during the Acts. We must continue our examination in another paper.

#10. The unique character of the Dispensation of the Mystery.

pp. 155 - 158

1. "Is the Mystery of Eph. iii. 3 something revealed for the first time through the Apostle Paul, after the setting aside of Israel, in Acts xxviii., or was it known before?"
2. "Is the Mystery of Eph. iii. 3 peculiar in its teaching, or is it merely a development of the Gospels and the Acts?"
3. "Is the Mystery of Eph. iii. 3 the logical outcome of the Gospel of Matthew, the Epistle to the Romans and the ministry of Peter and Paul as set forth in the Acts, or was it revealed for the first time when logic failed and a crisis had been reached?"

The word "mystery" is not confined to the prison epistles. The word occurs in the N.T. 27 times. Three of these occurrences are found in the Gospels, and four in the Revelation. The remaining 20 are exclusively used by Paul. Neither Peter, James, John nor Jude have anything to say about a mystery of any kind. Paul, and those with him, were "stewards of the mysteries of God". Ten of the references made by Paul to the mysteries occur in Ephesians and Colossians. The other ten are found in Romans, I Corinthians, II Thessalonians and I Timothy. Let us now seek a scriptural answer to the three questions given above:--

1. (a) Is the Mystery of Eph. iii. 3 something revealed for the first time, (b) through the Apostle Paul, (c) after the setting aside of Israel, in Acts xxviii., or (d) was it known before?

Opinions are valueless. All we desire is the pronouncement of the Word of God on the matter. Let us turn to Eph. iii. In verse 3 the apostle says:--

> "By revelation He made known unto me the mystery as I wrote before briefly."

The superior knowledge of the "mystery of Christ" which the apostle had received was his credentials for being believed in the more exclusive realm of the mystery itself. Our first question deals with the time of the revelation of the Mystery. Let the apostle himself tell us:--

> "Unto me . . . . . that I should preach among the Gentiles the unsearchable riches of Christ, and to enlighten all as to what is the dispensation (R.V.) of the Mystery, which hath been hidden since the ages by God" (Eph. iii. 8, 9).

The Lord once said, "If they hear not Moses and the prophets, neither will they be persuaded, though one rose from the dead", and we feel the same applies here. As we have dealt with this subject in the April number, we refer the reader to the article there for fuller detail.

We there showed that the Mystery was revealed for the first time to Paul alone in Ephesians, and therefore the rest of the question set out above requires no further answer. The distinction between "the Mystery" and "the mystery of Christ" was also discussed in that number.

2. "Is the Mystery of Eph. iii. 3 peculiar in its teaching, or is it merely a development of the Gospels and the Acts?"

Let us notice what is revealed in Ephesians regarding the characteristics of this mystery.

1. PLACE.—Heavenly places (i. 3), further defined as at the right hand of God and far above all principalities (i. 20, 21), and indicated as the glorious sphere of blessing for the church of the one body who are made to sit together in the heavenly places in Christ Jesus (ii. 6).

2. TIME.—Before the foundation of the world (i. 4).—Waiving the question of the interpretation of this passage, we note that no other company of believers are spoken of as connected with this period. The expression occurs elsewhere only of Christ Himself. All others are blessed in connection with a purpose dating "since the foundation of the world". Parallel with this unique expression are the words of II Tim. i. 9 and Titus i. 2, the literal rendering of which is "before age times". Other mysteries are dated "since the age times" (Rom. xvi. 25).

3. TITLE.—The company of believers who are thus blessed are called "The church which is His body, the fullness of Him that filleth all in all" (Eph. i. 22, 23).

4. UNITY.—All distinctions, privileges, and disabilities, which in here to either Jew or Gentile in the flesh, are destroyed, and in this new company we find not a reformation or a development, but a "new man" and a "new creation". The middle wall of partition being broken down, the only unity now recognized is the unity of the Spirit.

5. STATUS.—In this new sphere the Gentile is a fellow-heir, a fellow-member, a fellow-partaker, a fellow-citizen (ii. 19, iii. 6). Such a condition had not been hitherto experienced. In Romans, even, the Jew is first, the Gentile is but a wild olive, grafted into the Abrahamic stock. In Ephesians it is impossible to distinguish either the Jew or the Gentile. They are created one new man.

Question 3 (above) is practically answered already. If the mystery was never revealed until the people of Israel had been set aside, if no one except the apostle Paul originally received it, if its place of blessing, time of election, title, unity and status are all peculiar to itself, it is evident that it did not logically arise out of the teaching of the early ministry of Peter and Paul. It rather is given complete and entire by God, when all His hitherto revealed purposes had apparently ended in disaster.

The omission of Old Testament quotations, the absence of the names of Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Moses, the Fathers, Israel (in a positive sense, see refs.); the setting aside of ordinances, decrees, observances, feasts, fast, and days; the entire absence of supernatural gifts, the emphasis upon one baptism, the non-reference to the Lord's supper, these must all be weighed in the balances of the sanctuary.

Our space is limited, and a fuller discussion of the subject must be reserved for a series upon the Mysteries of Scripture. Meanwhile we feel that sufficient evidence of the unique character of the Dispensation of the Mystery has been here brought forward.

Studies in Ecclesiastes.

#12. The Seven Good Things.
1. The Good Name (vii. 1).
pp. 20 - 22

The reference to Adam in vi. 10 brings us to the structural centre of the book, and the doctrinal basis of its teaching. Chapter ii. opens with a series of answers to the question, "What is that good?" The question is stated in vi. 12 thus:--

> "For who knoweth WHAT IS GOOD for man in this life, all the days of his vain life which he spendeth as a shadow?"

The question is not simply, "What is good?" (that might be answered easily), it is what is good for a man "IN THIS LIFE?" and the problem is emphasized by the added words, "the numbered days of his vain life as to which he spendeth as a shadow". Over against vi. 11, 12 we may write:--

A | vi. 11, 12. The Question stated, What is good?
A | vii. 1-18. The Question answered,
1. Good name. \
2. Day of death. \
3. Mourning. \
4. Sorrow. } "Better."
5. Rebuke. /
6. End. /
7. Patience. /

Let us patiently and humbly seek to understand this sevenfold answer to the question, "Who knoweth what is good?"

A GOOD NAME IS BETTER THAN PRECIOUS OINTMENT (vii. 1).—Let us note the literary peculiarities of this opening verse. The Hebrew sentence commences and ends with the word tobh, "good", for the word "precious" is the same as the word "good". Another literary figure is employed called paronomasia, where words of like sound are used to call the reader's attention to their deeper similarity. The Hebrew word for "name" is shem; the Hebrew word for "ointment" is shemen. The complete sentence reads, Tobh shem mish-shemen tobh.

We must now have a clear image in our mind as to what the "precious ointment" signifies, otherwise we shall miss the point. With us ointment generally indicates some healing and mollifying substance. In the East it has a deeper and wider range of meaning. First let us notice the occurrences of the word in Ecclesiastes:--

vii. 1. "A good name is better than precious ointment."
ix. 8. "Let thy head lack no ointment."
x. 1. "Dead flies cause the ointment of the apothecary to send forth a stinking savour."

In the Song of Solomon we have a parallel usage to that of Eccles. vii. 1:--

> "Sweet is the odour of thy good ointments; thy name is as ointment poured forth" (i. 3).

Another reference to ointments occurs in Song of Solomon iv. 10:--

> "How fair is thy love, my sister, my spouse! how much better is thy love than wine! and the smell of thine ointments than all spices!"

The anointing oil which was used in the service of the tabernacle was composed of pure myrrh, sweet cinnamon, sweet calamus, cassia, and olive oil. The tabernacle and its vessels were anointed with it, as also was Aaron, the high priest. The kings later were inducted into their high office as "the Lord's anointed". Another who was anointed with this holy ointment was the leper in the day of his cleansing. Esther ii. 12 tells us that before the women entered into the royal presence they were purified, six months with oil of myrrh and six months with sweet odours.

The "precious" ointment seems to have specific reference to that which was exclusively sacred to the Lord. The expression occurs in II Kings xx. 13, repeated in Isa. xxxix. 2 and in Psa. cxxxiii. 2. In these instances it refers to the holy anointing oil which was forbidden to the people. To this, apparently, Eccles. vii. 1 refers. Better even than the holiest external symbol of acceptance of high priesthood, of kingship, or of cleansing—better than even this is a "good name"—a good shem than a good shemen.

The word "name" does not occur more than three times in Ecclesiastes, and it is very evident that vii. 1 is in direct contrast with vi. 10, "That which hath been the name thereof is called already, and it is known that it is Adam".

The very first "good thing" for any man in this vain life, whose days are numbered, whose character is a shadow, whose end is the "one event", the very first thing consists in a change of name. The mystery of the gospel as revealed in Rom. v. 12 onwards was not clearly seen by Koheleth, but the spirit who inspired the book not only knew that Adam was the concluding note of the downward progress of chapters i.-vi., but that the "good name" which would hereafter be placed over against Adam must be the very beginning of the quest for "that good thing".

Koheleth has guarded his conception of a good name. He cannot mean that which passes current among men, for he has deliberately set it in contrast with the holiest external symbol known in his day. Those who have been most entitled to the "good name" have often been covered with calumny and false charges. The apostle Paul, who most surely of all the followers of Christ had that "good name", could write of himself that he was made "the filth of the world and the off-scouring of all things". Not he that commends himself, or he that is commended by others, but whom the Lord commendeth, is the possessor of this good name.

Those who have this good name carry with them everywhere a sweet savour of Christ. Their daily work and conversation is an offering of a sweet smelling savour acceptable and well pleasing unto God (Phil. iv. 8). What though they never "make a name" in this Babel of a world! what though their names be cast out as evil, and blotted out of the world's conventions! nevertheless, they have started with the first great good thing in this world of shams and unrealities. Every virtue, every fruit of the spirit, every following after Christ is a contribution to this good name which is better than precious ointment.

May we take the consolation of the Scriptures fully to ourselves in these degenerate times, and rejoice in the blessed fact that we are named with the name of Christ.

#13. Death, Mourning and Sorrow, and their relation to what is good for man in this life (vii. 1-6).

pp. 52 - 55

The first "good thing" we have learned, is a good name. The name covers all its outgoings. By nature all have the name of Adam, and the very first "good thing" is to exchange that name for the better name of a child of God. Koheleth may not have personally understood the full evangelical meaning of his own statement, the statement being increasingly true as one ascends the scale of fuller knowledge and personal faith in Christ.

It is, however, necessary that we appreciate the radical change indicated by the possession of the "good name", otherwise the remaining "good things" will not be understood. The second good thing which Ecclesiastes records is apt to sound " a hard saying", and only those who have tasted the sweets of the new name can heartily endorse his testimony.

"The day of death (is better) than the day of one's birth."—To the unsaved reader these words will be sufficient to confirm their opinion that Koheleth was a pessimist. To the enlightened believer the same words will reveal him as a spirit-taught optimist. From the viewpoint of Ecclesiastes what is this present life? It is summed up in the words "Vanity and vexation of spirit" to all those who have not reached the "conclusion of the whole matter" (xii. 13, 14). This present life is expressed in the synonymous clause "all the days of his vain life which he spendeth as a shadow" (vi. 12). At the end of that life there is the "one event", and the "one place".

The flesh profiteth nothing. This life can only be blessed and purposeful when it is viewed as a place of discipline and training, fitting one for true service and life that is life indeed in resurrection. The day of our birth ushers us into a sphere dominated by the law of sin and death. We are at birth "sown in corruption", dishonour, weakness, merely a natural (soul-ical) body. Resurrection changes all this. We are raised in incorruption, glory, power and with a spiritual body. The first state is connected with Adam (I Cor. xv. 45, Eccles. vi. 10, Heb.), the second with Christ.

If these facts are appreciated in any degree, we shall also appreciate the words of Ecclesiastes "the day of one's death is better than the day of one's life". At death the pilgrimage ceases, the lessons are over, the discipline done. For the believer sin's punishment, power and presence will have for ever passed away. The death which has fallen upon him shall never fall again. The present life with all its blessings and pleasures and opportunities is a life spent in corruption, and in the sphere of a curse. Such a condition cannot be immortal. Flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God, neither can corruption inherit incorruption. This being so, even though the mind and heart shrink from the valley of the shadow of death, one can see that it is a necessity ("change" will be the equivalent for the living saints) if we would enter into the full blessedness of redemption.

Ecclesiastes is under no false idea that death is a "friend" or a "bright angel". That is left to the unbeliever in his endeavour to hide the terror of the last enemy. The believer taught by the Scripture is under no illusions as to death. Job could even dare to speak of "worms destroying his body" when he knew that his Redeemer lived. Paul can speak of death and the grave without softening either awful word, because resurrection robbed them of their sting and their victory. Ecclesiastes teaches that the only ones in this life who can "enjoy" any good in it, in the true sense, are those who have faced its transient character, realized the fact that this is not their rest but their school, and who, knowing that life in its fullness cannot be entered until we awake satisfied with Christ's likeness, set their mind on things above where Christ is. As a result of believing that the day of death is better than the day of birth, Koheleth continues:--

> "It is better to go to the house of mourning, than to go to the house of feasting: for that is the end of all men; and the living will lay it to heart" (vii. 2).

The man of the world argues in an exactly opposite direction. Seeing that death is the end of all men, he says, "Let us eat, drink and be merry, for to-morrow we die". Again it is the hope of resurrection that makes the difference. Both can say "to-morrow we die", but the one as a result says "feast", the other "fast". It is a natural thing to say, "If this brief life is to end in death, why not make the most of it? Why not get all the good one can out of it, in other words, put sadness and sorrow out of sight; eat, drink and be merry". That is natural. Taught by the Spirit of truth however, we reason that if this present life is to end in death and the full blessings of redemption cannot be entered by flesh and blood; moreover, if there are spheres of service to be entered in the life to come that shall bear some analogy to our faithfulness here, and if an eternal weight of glory lies over against a light affliction which is but for a moment, if moreover, love to our Redeemer compels us to stand on His side, go without the camp and suffer His reproach—then we cannot help becoming pilgrims and strangers, declaring by our very abstention that we seek a country that lies beyond the grave, that our pleasures are associated with our Saviour, and that while sin and death and the curse are everywhere apparent, we cannot find it in our heart to eat, drink and be merry, but rather find greater and deeper joy in those circumstances which superficially are the saddest and darkest hours of life.

"The living will lay it to heart" (vii. 2); further, "Sorrow is better than laughter" (vii. 3) for the same reason, "for by the sadness of the countenance (external) the heart (internal) is made better" (vii. 3). The world thinks only of the face, the believer thinks more of the heart. True wisdom recognizes the essential difference.

> "The heart of the wise is in the house of mourning (and will be thereby made 'better'); but the heart of fools is in the house of mirth" (vii. 4).

Association with mourners may not prove so enjoyable to the flesh as the hilarity of feasting and mirth, but > "It is better to hear the rebuke of the wise, than for a man to hear the song of fools. For as the crackling of thorns under a pot, so is the laughter of the fool. This also is vanity" (vii. 5, 6).

The choice of worldliness is fleeting. The brief hour of mirth is oft followed by days of bitterness. The poor untaught world sees nothing beyond this present age, and the majority of Christians seem to have conspired to perpetuate its blindness. Present Christendom with its worldliness, its pleasures, its fleshly inducements, its forsaking of the narrow path, its philosophy, its politics, all proclaim the negation of resurrection. The Church is fast approaching the form of godliness which involves the denial of the power of the resurrection, and with it in song and sermon sounds the hoary tradition that puts resurrection aside, bridges the gulf between the flesh and the spirit, and seeks to improve that which is corrupt, carnal and mortal. Eccles. vii. is sober truth.

Let us hear the rebuke of the wise, and seeing the end of all men let us lay it to heart.

#14. The maddening effect of "oppression" and "crookedness", but for the knowledge of God's purpose (vii. 7-13).

pp. 81 - 83

The result of entering into the spirit of Eccles. vii. 1-6 must be a chastened and humbled mind, and a frame and a temper not easily provoked. Instead of frantically seeking to bolster up the doomed fabric of Adam's world the believer realizes that God has reserved the honour of complete restoration to His Son. Instead of becoming a member of this Society and of that he realized that all improvements of the flesh are destined to end on this side of the grave. To this aspect the writer now turns.

> "Surely oppression maketh the wise man mad; and a gift destroyeth the heart . . . . . Be not hasty in thy spirit to be angry: for anger resteth in the bosom of fools" (vii. 7-9).

To those who do not possess the wisdom which comes from above the call of the oppressed sometimes becomes irresistible. Many times the tyranny of oppression, the selfish cruelty of those who have rule and authority, have stirred the old nature, and but for grace this would have manifested itself in association with fleshly and worldly methods, which in reality vainly seek to do that which Christ alone can do. The new man however looks beyond the present.

> "If thou seest the oppression of the poor, and violent perverting of judgment and justice in a province, marvel not at the matter (margin, will, or purpose): for He that is higher than the highest regardeth; and there be higher than they" (v. 8).

Let our indignation be modified by the fact that if we see, so also does He that is higher than the highest. Moreover the "matter" is of "purpose". It is not a question of indifference on the part of God; He knows, He regards, but the place of judgment is THERE, not here (xi. 9; xii. 14; see especially iii. 16, 17). Chapter v. introduces us to the sanctuary of God, and like Asaph we understand the end and cease to fret ourselves because of evil-doers and of those wicked who prosper.

In our quotation of Chapter vii., which appears above, we gave verses 7 & 9, omitting verse 8. There is a helpful alternation which should be observed here:--

A | 7. Oppression makes wise man mad.
B | 8. Pause.—Better the end than the beginning, and a patient spirit as a consequence.
A | 9. Be not hasty; anger belongs to fools.
B | 10. Pause.—Do not enquire petulantly concerning the former days.

The great corrective, when we view the inequalities of this life, is to remember that there is a purpose which runs through the ages, that this world is out of joint by reason of sin, and that to attempt to put crooked things straight apart from Redemption is the worst vexation of all. Pause and reflect; the end is the great thing; God is over-ruling oppressions and inequalities and all shall subserve His end. Be "patient in spirit"; do not be "hasty in spirit to be angry", for only fools are thus betrayed into impotent wrath. Moreover, do not be tempted to adopt the general idea embodied in the term "the good old days"; there have been no such good old days, for all days have been marked by the presence and power of sin and death with their accompanying miseries. The days past were no better than the present; all human nature runs in the same direction. The parent assures his erring child that he was "never so naughty when he was a little boy". Old people always deplore the awful sinfulness of the rising generation, but this is not wisdom, it is feebleness of mind (Eccles. vii. 10). All generations have been wicked and will be until the Lord comes and the new life begins.

Keep an even temper. Eccles. vii. 7-10 says in effect, "Let your moderation be known unto all men: the Lord is near" (Phil. iv. 5). "Wisdom is good like an inheritance . . . . . the excellency of knowledge is, that wisdom giveth life, to them that have it" (Eccles. vii. 11, 12, see Volume X, pages 167 & 168 for fuller exposition). Instead of allowing the limited horizon of this life to decide our actions, to arouse our anger, to lead us in the vain attempt to improve the old nature, we remember "the Higher than the highest", we reflect upon the purpose that is surely beneath all the happenings, we remember the "end" and the "life" to which true wisdom points. So concludes Koheleth:--

> "Consider the work of God: for who can make that straight, which He hath made crooked?" (vii. 13).

Contrasted with the works of God are the works of man.

> "I have seen all the works that are done under the sun; and behold, all is vanity and vexation of spirit. That which is crooked cannot be made straight" (i. 14, 15).

When the Apostles came first to Thessalonica they were styled "These that have turned the world upside down" (Acts xvii. 6). It is the world that is in reality upside down. The very word rendered "crooked" is so translated in Psa. cxlvi. 9, "The way of the wicked He turneth upside down". We do well therefore, before hastily espousing some cause of the world, to "consider the work of God". If the deranged affairs be a part of His doing, shall we lead men to fight against Him? Then consider again, Have all the revolutions that have arisen on earth ever made crooked things STRAIGHT? At best they have made the crookedness less apparent, or cause the pressure to be felt in another direction, but God and His people are concerned with utter rectification, not mere palliatives, and that awaits the day of the Lord. The word "straight" occurs again in Eccles. xii. 9, "set in order". In the Chaldee of Dan. iv. 36 (33), it is rendered "I was established", with reference to a kingdom.

Such straightening out of the crookedness of Adam's race can never be accomplished by man. We patiently await the day of Christ. We shall not sit inert, we shall not be idle, but rather shall be occupied with nobler and more fruitful service by a due recognition of the true dispensational character of many of the things around us.

#15. The practical problem of good and evil (vii. 14).
pp. 115 - 118

Four times in chapter vii. does the Preacher bid us "consider".

> "Consider the work of God: for who can make that straight, which He hath made crooked?" (13).
> "In the day of adversity consider . . . . ." (14).
> "Consider, this have I found . . . . ." (27).
> "Consider, this only have I found, that God hath made man upright; but they have sought out many inventions" (29).

Let us look at verse 14.

> "In the day of prosperity be joyful, but in the day of adversity consider: God also hath set the one over against the other, to the end that man should find nothing after him."

It is sometimes helpful to work back through a passage and it may help us here.

"After him."—The baffling nature of God's providential dealings is to prevent a man discovering that which comes after him. This is a theme many times repeated in this book. When Koheleth had expended his energies and wisdom on labours vast and wonderful he said:--

> "What can the man do that cometh after the King?" (ii. 12).

His further investigation was not encouraging:--

> "I hated all my labour which I had taken under the sun: because I should leave it to the man that shall come after me; and who knoweth whether he shall be a wise man or a fool?" (ii. 18, 19).

Having traversed the thoughts of chapters ii. & iii., Koheleth arrives at the conclusion:--

> "Wherefore I perceive that there is nothing better, than that a man should rejoice in his own works, for that is his portion: for who shall bring him to see what shall be after him?" (iii. 22).

The question forms the very closing words of the first half of Ecclesiastes, before he begins to enumerate the good things for this life:--

> "For who knoweth what is good for man in this life, all the days of his vain life which he spendeth as a shadow: for who can tell a man what shall be after him under the sun?" (vi. 12).

Following the verse under consideration (vii. 14) we pass on to:--

> "A fool also is full of words: a man cannot tell what shall be; and what shall be after him, who can tell?" (x. 14).

These six references focus the attention on the problem of what shall be "after?"

The reference in iii. 22 shews resignation and contentment, the enjoyment of one's rightful portion, and leaving the "after" with God. This is seen from another angle in vii. 14. The experiences of prosperity and adversity which come upon man are intended to prevent discovery of that which shall come after: "To the end that man should find nothing after him" (vii. 14). There is a close parallel here with iii. 11:--

> "He that made everything beautiful in His time; also He hath set the olam (the age) in their heart, so that no man can find out the work that God maketh from the beginning to the end."

So in vii. 23, 24:--

> "I said, I will be wise, but it was far from me. That which is far off, and exceeding deep, who can find it out?"

In vii. 26, 27, 28, 29 the word "find" comes again and again, leading to the discovery that man has departed from his original uprightness, and sought out many inventions.

The conclusion of this matter is reached in viii. 17, ix. 1:--

> "Then I beheld all the work of God, that a man cannot find out the work that is done under the sun: because though a man labour to seek it out, yet he shall not find it; yea, further; though a wise man think to know it, yet shall he not be able to find it. For all this I considered in my heart even to declare this, that the righteous, and the wise, and their works, ARE IN THE HAND OF GOD: no man knoweth either love or hatred, all lies before them (in the future)."

The baffling experiences which have this effect have been "set the one over against the other" by God.

The word "set" is usually rendered "made". It comes in iii. 11 and vii. 29:--

> "He hath made all things beautiful in His time . . . . . the work that God maketh . . . . ." (iii. 11).
> "God hath made man upright" (vii. 29).

The two experiences, prosperity and adversity, are made to balance one another, they do not always follow one another as cause and effect, but as xi. 11 says, "times and chance" enter in and prevent calculation. No one can foresee what shall be "after". God alone holds all things in His hands and works all things in line with His purposes.

We are to rejoice in the day of prosperity. Blessings of health and friends, of happy labour and happy homes come from the Lord:--

> "Every man also to whom God hath given riches and wealth, and hath given power to eat thereof, and to take his portion, and to rejoice in his labour, this is the gift of God. though He give not much (cf. verse 12) yet he remembereth the days of his life: because God causeth a response in the joy of his heart" (v. 19, 20).

Those who misunderstand Ecclesiastes think that its teaching makes for gloominess, brooding, austerity, cynicism. This is quite untrue. Only he who has faced the fact of death in the light of resurrection, only he who has ceased from vain speculation and has reached the haven of peace in the will of God, only he who has gratefully acknowledged the limitations set around this life and its possibilities can really enjoy the blessings as they come without being haunted by the shadow of the "one event", or being troubled by the oblivion of the "one place".

The word rendered "prosperity" is *tohv which is the word "good". We are not surprised therefore to find that the word "adversity" is ra(n)g = "evil". This knowledge of "good and evil", with its concomitant sorrow and death, commenced in the Garden of Eden and shall go on until that day when God Himself shall wipe away all tears from off all faces. The whole of the age is associated with the acquiring of this knowledge, and its application. When experiencing the "good", rejoice. When experiencing the "evil", consider. Let the visitation not pass without profit. Let the chastisement yield its fruit. Let the lesson be learned. Let patience have her perfect work. The day of prosperity is not the time when we consider the purpose of the ages with so much profit as in the day of adversity. Then, says Koheleth, consider the purposes of God and learn the humbling lesson. A word almost identical with "adversity" is "sadness" (vii. 3), and the lesson is the same. Chapter xi. 9, 10 bases its teaching upon the same truth as does vii. 14. Youth will, and should rejoice, but let rejoicing be of that sort that remembers the fact of judgment. Instead of the problem of "good and "evil" being something for the philosopher only, it enters into the warp and woof of life, and Ecclesiastes rightly followed will cast many a ray of light upon the ways of God with man, "all the days of his vain life which he spendeth as a shadow" (vi. 12).

[NOTE: * - For the sake of consistency we use throughout these articles the English, equivalent as given in Englishman's Hebrew and Chaldee Concordance.]

#16. The Policy of Laodicea (vii. 15-22).
pp. 147 - 149

> "All things have I seen in the days of my vanity. There is a just man that perisheth in his righteousness, and there is a wicked man that prolongeth his life in his wickedness" (vii. 15).

This is a recurring observation in this book (see ii. 14; viii. 14; ix. 1-4). Its effect upon the mind and heart has been faithfully chronicled in Psalm lxxii., where Asaph envied the wicked who prosper, and considered that he had cleansed his heart in vain. It would seem that in Eccles. vii. 16, 17 we have some such sentiments expressed as those of Asaph before he went into the Sanctuary of God. It seems repugnant to the general teaching of Scripture to understand that God would have us not to be righteous over much, or wise over much, or wicked over much. It is far more likely that Koheleth is expressing the general compromising policy of the world. The very words "over much" of vii. 16 are used of Solomon in I Kings iv. 29, 30, where we read:--

> "And God gave Solomon wisdom and understanding exceeding much . . . . . and Solomon's wisdom excelled the wisdom of all the children of the East."

Are we to understand that God gave Solomon much wisdom and then inspired him to discredit it? The word rendered "over wise" in verse 16 comes in Eccles. ii. 15, "Why was I then more wise", and in xii. 9 (margin), "Because the preacher was more wise".

It appears that when the just man perished in his righteousness the comment of worldly wisdom was, Keep the happy medium. Don't be over righteous or over wise. Why should you destroy yourself? Why not make the best of both worlds? Do not be too strait-laced. On the other hand don't be over wicked. This is not good policy either. Why should you die before the time? This we understand to be the wisdom of the world, but that it is not given for us to follow. On the contrary Koheleth appears to counteract this teaching in verse 18:--

> "It is good that thou should'st take hold of this, yea, also from this withdraw not thine hand: for he that feareth God shall come forth of them all."

Did Joseph in the house of Potiphar listen to the policy "Be not righteous over much"? or did he not rather in the prison and on the throne realize the truth of "He that feareth God shall come forth of them all"? Did Shadrach, Meshach and Abed-nego listen to this policy, "Be not righteous over much"? Did they not "come forth of them all"? This "coming forth" is used of birth (v. 15); of coming out of prison (iv. 14); of coming out of the ark (Gen. viii. 19). Let not the believer heed the temporizing policies of the day. He will only too soon meet the kindly-spirited brother who will advise compromise under the guise of long-suffering, gentleness, judging not, etc. Let him beware of such; long-suffering and gentleness let us have by all means, but let us abhor the wisdom of the age which urges us to be neither righteous over much nor wicked over much, but just nicely and comfortably Laodicean through and through. Koheleth says, "Much study is a weariness to the flesh" (xii. 12). True, but does he mean then that we should not study? Again, "In much wisdom is much grief; and he that increaseth knowledge increaseth sorrow" (i. 18). Shall we infer then that "Ignorance is bliss"? If sorrow be the price of true wisdom we must pay it. If weariness be the result of much study we must be prepared for it.

> "Wisdom strengtheneth the wise more than ten mighty men which are in the city" (vii. 19).

Verse 20 commences with "for" and is usually read as an explanation. It is difficult to see how the fact that "there is not a just man upon earth, that doeth good, and sinneth not" can be a reason why "wisdom strengtheneth the wise more than ten mighty men which are in the city". Verse 19 concludes the statement of verses 11-18, and verse 20 opens a new section. It may be objected that the verse commences with "for". The word can also be rendered "because" and thus read gives better sense:--

> "Because there is not a just man . . . . . Also take no heed unto all the words that are spoken, lest thou hear thy servant revile thee. For oftentimes also thine own heart knoweth that thou likewise hast reviled others" (vii. 20-22).

We shall be wise to take no heed to either the policy of worldly wisdom (16, 17), or to the censure and criticism of others, however just they may be. Our one aim and desire should be to fear God, and in the confidence that we shall come forth of them all, we are to hold on our way. "It is good that thou shouldst take hold of this" (vii. 18), said the Preacher. Let us hold fast the truth in the day when it is being deserted; the Lord is faithful, and one day, how soon we know not, they that be wise shall shine.

#17. The "reason" of evil discovered (vii. 24-29).
pp. 180 - 183

The concluding portion of Eccles. vii. contains an exceeding difficult statement. Believing it to be a part of that Scripture which is not only inspired but profitable we must seek its meaning, looking continually to the Author Himself to lead us into all truth.

A step toward truer understanding will be the recognition of the theme of the writer. "I applied my heart . . . . . to seek out . . . . . the reason" (vii. 25). Now this word "reason" occurs again in verse 27: "counting one by one to find out the account". We evidently have here the thread, and if we find this same word yet again at the conclusion we shall be justified in assuming that we have established one item. In verse 29 we have the feminine form of the word, "They have sought out many inventions". In the space of five verses we have "reason", "account", and "inventions". We must find some common idea that will enable us to understand Solomon's investigation more clearly. The feminine form of verse 29 occurs in II Chron. xxvi. 15, "He made in Jerusalem engines invented by cunning men". The word translated "cunning" is also from the same root; the French version reads "des machines de l'invention d'un ingenieur". Many times the root word is rendered "devise", "curious", and "cunning".

If we now come back to Eccles. vii.25 we may be able to perceive more clearly the object of Koheleth's search. We shall observe that the words "of things" are in italics and we can ignore them if need be.

> "I applied mine heart to know, and to search and to seek out wisdom and the cunning device, and to know the wickedness of folly even of foolishness and madness."

The Preacher was seeking the hidden spring of wickedness, seeking to know what was the ensnaring bait that led men on to sin and death. Out of the bitter experience of his heart Solomon now speaks. He confesses that he had not discovered "what his souls seeketh" (28), but the example which he gives, together with the conclusion at which he arrives in verse 29, will be sufficient for those who seek guidance in this world of darkness.

The better to appreciate Solomon's warning here, we must turn aside for a moment to the book of Proverbs. The reader is referred to the Companions Bible for a full account of the composition of the book of Proverbs. Suffice it for your purpose to say that some Proverbs were written BY Solomon, but some were written FOR Solomon. Those written FOR Solomon occupy i. 7 -ix. 18; xix. 20 -xxiv. 34; xxvii. 1 - xxix. 27 and xxx. 1 - xxxi. 31. These were compiled for the future guidance of David's son and successor. Among the items of solemn warning is the danger morally, religiously and dynastically of the "alien woman". In the Proverbs written BY Solomon this one feature is never mentioned. The Proverbs FOR Solomon conclude with a marvelous pen portrait of the wife he should seek. Here was evidently Solomon's weak point. Had he hearkened to the Word of God he would have saved his name from the ill savour that must ever attach to it.

In I Kings xi. 1-8 we read the dismal failure of Israel's wisest king:--

> "But King Solomon loved many strange women beside the daughter of Pharaoh, women of the Moabites, Ammonites, Edomites, Zidonians and Hittites; of the nations concerning which the Lord had said unto the children of Israel, Ye shall not go in to them, neither shall they come in unto you: for surely they will turn away your heart after their gods."

Nehemiah, when reproving the people for marrying wives of Ashdod, Ammon and Moab, could find no more tragic example than that of Solomon:--

> "Did not Solomon King of Israel sin by these things? Yet among many nations was there no King like him, who was beloved by his God, and God made him King over all Israel; nevertheless even him did outlandish women cause to sin" (Neh. xiii. 26).

It is evident, by both the account in I Kings xi. and Neh. xiii., that Solomon's sin was not so much that of immorality as of failure to keep intact the covenant separation of his race and throne. In other words to the believer of all ages it represents the temptation of the flesh to overstep the bounds of separation drawn by redemption. It is suggestive in view of Eccles. vii. 28 that I Kings xi. 3 tells us that Solomon had a harem of exactly 1,000:--

> "And he had seven hundred wives, princesses, and three hundred concubines: and his wives turned away his heart."

Ignoring the warnings of the Proverbs written for his guidance he added wife to wife in vain endeavour, but among the whole thousand found not one. The one depicted in Prov. xxxi. he had turned from, and the result was disaster. Just a little earlier in Eccles. vii. Solomon had said, "There is not a just man in all the earth, that doeth good, and sinneth not". His words therefore in verse 28 must not be interpreted as meaning that one man in a thousand was just and sinless. We meet the expression in Job ix. 3, "He cannot answer him, one of a thousand"; and in Job xxxiii. 23, "If there be a messenger with him, an interpreter, one among a thousand, to shew unto man his uprightness: Then he is gracious unto him". Here the one among a thousand is an "interpreter", one who seems somewhat like the "days-man" of Job ix. 33, who was "in God's stead", yet "formed out of the clay" (Job xxxiii. 6), and so could mediate between them. We seek to avoid spiritualizing, yet, if Koheleth makes a cryptic reference back to Adam in Eccles. vi. 10, it is not unreasonable to suppose that he makes here a cryptic reference onward to Christ. Whether he personally thus understood his own words we cannot say, the application of Solomon's failure and discovery is for ourselves.

One deeply important finding of the Preacher is written with no uncertainty, and this we would set forth with all possible emphasis:--

> "Lo, this only I have found, that GOD HATH MADE MAN UPRIGHT, but they have sought out many inventions" (vii. 29).

One thing emerged clearly before Solomon's mind. God was not chargeable with the fall of man. In his own case this was clear. God warned him again and again. His fall was entirely due to disobedience to the Will and Word of God. From his own personal case he views man as a whole. He weigh over "one by one to find out the cunning device" which has ensnared them. It is always the same:--

> "Let no man say when he is tempted, I am tempted of God; for God cannot be tempted with evil, neither tempteth He any man, but every man is tempted, when he is drawn away by his own lust, and enticed . . . . . do not err, my beloved brethren" (James i. 13-16).

Ecclesiastes is a book in which the problem of good and evil is investigated from many standpoints. It is a cause for thankfulness that this clear statement is found here. Man, when he left the hand of his Maker, was upright. The devices for his own undoing proceeded from himself. Mankind has sought out "many inventions". The apostle Paul has given a more doctrinal setting to the theme in Rom. vi. & vii., and speaks of the dominion of sin in the members of the body, which dominion can be traced back to Adam by consulting Rom. v. Paul, James and Koheleth are at one in this, that God is not the Author of sin or of moral evil. God made man upright. To each of us the experience of Solomon should be a warning. We may not all be vulnerable at the same point. Solomon seemed proof against the snare of riches and power. Many who may have been proof against the alien woman would have lost their heads with half his riches or power. The world is ever seeking access by means of our members and our carnal nature. We have the clear word of God as to the character of our calling and the dangers of fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness. While we may not fully solve Solomon's own peculiar enigma, let us see to it that we learn our own lesson, and profit by his example.

One concluding thought. It has been said that the writing of the book of Jonah argues for his (Jonah's) repentance. The writing of the fifty-first Psalm proves David's deep contrition. Shall we not also believe that Solomon's eyes were opened at the last, and that these few verses indicate his justification of God and of the simple truth of His Word?

Fundamentals of Dispensational Truth.

#37. Joseph—The Dominion Promised and Postponed.

pp. 5 - 7

Passing over the chapter that is devoted to the generations of Esau we open at Gen. xxxvii. and read:--

> "And Jacob dwelt in the land wherein his father was a stranger, in the land of Canaan. These are the generations of Jacob. Joseph . . . . ."

Jacob's generations are not written as from Padan-aram and the house of Laban, but from Canaan, the land of pilgrimage. Jacob uses this word "stranger" in xlvii. 9, when he speaks of the years of his "pilgrimage". The pilgrim character of the family of faith is a very "fundamental of dispensational truth". All the exhortations to leave the world and its ways, which so characterize the writings of the New Testament, emphasize this truth.

The second item of importance in this statement of the generations of Jacob is the fact that it is practically the life story of Joseph. We do not read, "These are the generations of Jacob. Reuben . . . . . ," but "Joseph". The other sons are referred to as "his brethren". Joseph is pre-eminently the great type of Christ in Genesis, and this again leads us to another great fundamental of all truth; whether doctrinal or dispensational Christ is all. The first great type of Christ in Genesis is Adam, "who was a figure of Him that was to come". The last is Joseph, equally a figure of the same blessed one. Adam's story is one of awful failure involving all his seed in ruin. Joseph's story is one of suffering as a path of glory with the object that he may "preserve life".

It may be interesting to note the complete little picture that Genesis presents in the seven great types of Christ that it contains:--

A | ADAM.—Sin forfeits life.
B | ABEL.—The accepted offering.
C | SETH.—Substitution.
D | NOAH.—Atonement ("pitch").
C | ISAAC.—Substitution.
B | JUDAH.—Suretyship.
A | JOSEPH.—Sufferings lead to preservation of life.

The record on Gen. xxxvii. does not say, "Now Jacob loved Joseph", but "Israel loved Joseph". Israel, the prince with God, loved Joseph more than all his children. Joseph's position in the family is indicated by the "coat of many colours", which his father made for him. The marginal alternative of the A.V., "pieces", is to be rejected. The same word is used in Judges v. 30 where it refers to "divers colours of needlework". The embroidered garments of Aaron—the blue, the purple and the scarlet, were symbols of the priestly office. Joseph was the heir and the priest of the family. When Rebekah prepared Jacob to deceive Isaac and to seek the birthright, she took "raiment of desires".

Throughout Scripture clothing has a symbolic value. The result of Joseph's pre-eminence is prophetic of Christ. "His brethren . . . . . hated him."

Joseph's career cannot be dissociated from dreams, and they run in pairs:--

1st pair.		Joseph's dreams of pre-eminence.
		Lead to prison and suffering.
2nd pair.		The prisoners' dreams being interpreted.
		Lead to deliverance from prison.
3rd pair.		Pharaoh's dreams being interpreted.
		Lead to glory and honour.

The words of his brethren at the recital of his first dream anticipate the words of the enemies of Christ:--

> "Shalt thou indeed reign over us? or shalt thou indeed have dominion over us? And they hated him yet the more for his dreams and for his words" (Gen. xxxvii. 8).

The statement made concerning Jacob—"his father observed the saying" (Gen. xxxvii. 11)—upon the narration of the second dream remind one of the words concerning Mary that she "kept all these things, and pondered them in her heart" (Luke ii. 19).

It is very strongly emphasized in the sequel that the envy and hatred that sought to prevent Joseph's dreams from becoming accomplished facts were over-ruled by God to bring about their fulfillment:--

> "So now it was not you that sent me hither, but God: and He hath made me a father to Pharaoh, and a lord of all his house, and a ruler throughout all the land of Egypt" (Gen. xlv. 8).

So Peter could say:--

> "Him, being delivered by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God, ye have taken and by wicked hands have crucified and slain" (Acts ii. 23).

Joseph's dreams spoke of rulership over his brethren. The rejection of Joseph by his brethren temporarily suspended this prophecy from fulfillment, and during the interval he became ruler and saviour among the Gentiles, reaching the destined rulership at a subsequent period. The "postponement theory" cannot be proved from a type, but the fitness is nevertheless confirmatory. Christ was heralded as a King. His rejection as such was foreknown; and when at length He is acknowledged King, it will be found that He is Saviour as well.

It is also surely not an accident that it is one named Judah (Judas in Greek) who suggested selling Joseph for twenty pieces of silver, while Judas sold Christ for thirty pieces of silver. It was the father who sent his beloved son Joseph to his brethren, the latter saying, "Come now, therefore, and let us slay him". It was the Father Who sent His well beloved Son to His brethren in the flesh: these received Him not, but rather said, "This is the heir; come, let us kill Him".

We learn from the last verse of Gen. xxxvii. that Joseph was sold to Potiphar; and then, before we are told anything further, a part of the life of Judah is interjected, the theme of Joseph at Potiphar's house being resumed in chapter xxxix. Judah falls into temptation, and the signet, bracelets and staff which he left behind are a witness against him. Joseph stands firm under a similar temptation; and the garment which he left behind, though used against him falsely, was a witness really of his integrity. Joseph stands where Judah falls: how this is repeated in the temptation of Christ is recorded in Matt. iv. Those three temptations in the wilderness have their parallels in the wilderness wandering of Israel, the three quotations used by Christ being from the book of Deuteronomy.

The pathway to glory for Joseph was via prison and shame. It was so with his blessed Antitype too, Who declared that He must needs have suffered these things and to have entered into His glory. When Joseph was in the house of Potiphar, we read, "The Lord was with Joseph" (Gen. xxxix. 2). This is repeated when Joseph was cast into prison (verse 21). This must have been the great sustaining fact upon which Joseph leaned during his severe trial. It was the consciousness, too, of the Father's nearness that was the great joy of Christ during His earthly ministry. We have reached the lowest depth of Joseph's trials. The rejection and the loss are to be followed by acclamation and honour. This we must leave until we can devote more space to it.

We conclude this section with the quaint rendering of an early English version:--

> "The Lord was with Joseph, and he was a luckie fellow" (Gen. xxxix. 2).

#38. Joseph—The Dominion Realized. (Gen. xl. - l.).
pp. 36 - 39

Joseph sets before us in his remarkable career a clear type of that feature which is so prophetic of Christ—"the sufferings and the glory that should follow".

We left Joseph in our last study together in the lowest depths; we shall not leave him in this paper until we see him seated at the right hand of Majesty. The dreams of Joseph led to his exile; the dreams of Pharaoh led to his exaltation.

> "And Pharaoh said unto Joseph, Forasmuch as God hath shewed thee all this, there is none so discreet and wise as thou art. Thou shalt be over my house, and according unto thy word shall all my people be ruled; only in the throne will I be greater than thou" (Gen. xli. 39, 40).

Pharaoh called Joseph's name Zaphnath-paaneah. The A.V. gives a possible meaning in the margin by considering it a Coptic word, but more recent discovery in Ancient Egyptian brings to light the true meaning of the name and its prophetic import. Zaph-en-to was a title of the last of the Shepherd Kings of Egypt and means "The nourisher of the world". Zap means "abundance".

> "Its well ascertained meaning is 'food', especially 'corn' or 'grain' in general" (Canon COOK).

Nt (nath) is the preposition "of", common on the early monuments. Pa is the definite article "the". Anch signifies "life". Thus one name of Memphis is ta-anch, the land of life, or, the land of the living. The name therefore means "Food of the life", and is a far-off echo of that wondrous claim which the Greater than Joseph was to make when He said "I am the Bread of Life".

Is there not also an echo of Pharaoh's words in the lips of Mary? Pharaoh said, when the people had no bread, "Go unto Joseph; what he saith to you, do" (Gen. xli. 55). Mary said to the servants, when they had no wine, "Whatsoever He saith unto you, do it" (John ii. 5).

Chapter xlii. resumes the broken thread of the story of Jacob and his sons. One event however has happened that it is important to remember. Joseph blesses the Gentiles during his rejection by his brethren. Joseph is united to a Gentile by marriage while exiled from his father's house. The names of his two children speak of forgetting his toil and his father's house, and of being fruitful in the land of his affliction. The famine at length appears and among those who are forced to sue at Joseph's feet are his ten brethren. The story is a long one and we will not spoil it by attempting to summarize, we know how it all ends. The outstanding typical features number among them the following:--

1. THE REPENTANCE OF ISRAEL.—When Joseph's brethren came before him and are charged with being spies, they aver that they are twelve brethren, the sons of one man in the land of Canaan; and behold say they:--

> "The youngest is this day with our father, and one is not" (Gen. xlii. 13).

The mention of the fate of Joseph and the harshness of their treatment at the hands of the ruler of Egypt causes their conscience to awaken and they said:--

> "We are verily guilty concerning our brother, in that we saw the anguish of his soul, when he besought us, and we would not hear; therefore is this distress come upon us" (Gen. xlii. 21).

Reuben uses even more forceful words: "Behold, also his blood is required" (Gen. xlii. 22). The type is clear. Israel must repent before they can be blessed.

2. THE REVELATION TO ISRAEL.—"Then Joseph could not refrain himself . . . . . I am Joseph" (Gen. xlv. 1-4). When Israel's blindness is removed and for the first time they recognize the Lord Jesus as their Messiah, "They shall look upon Me whom they have pierced, and shall mourn for Him" (Zech. xii. 10) is the word of prophecy.

First there is the revelation of the Person, "I am Joseph". Then follows the revelation of the Purpose, "God did send me before you to preserve life . . . . . to save your lives by a great deliverance" (Gen. xlv. 4-7).

3. THE RESTORATION OF ISRAEL.—Joseph could not be content until "all Israel" were safely beneath his care. Benjamin had been brought before him by the strategy of love, and now nothing must hinder the journey of his father Jacob.

One more feature of fundamental importance is marked for us in Heb. xi. If we were to select the one act in Joseph's life which should eclipse all others as an act of faith, we hardly feel that the one selected by the inspired writer of Heb. xi. would be our choice. There in Heb. xi. 22 we read:--

> "By faith Joseph, when he died, made mention of the departing of the children of Israel; and gave commandment concerning his bones."

"Concerning his bones!" What is there in these words to deserve such prominence? Joseph linked the deliverance of Israel with resurrection.

4. THE RESURRECTION OF ISRAEL.—Joseph stresses the fact that the land of promise was that which God sware to Abraham, to Isaac and to Jacob (Gen. l. 24), and Christ shows that the title "The God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob" proves the doctrine of Resurrection (Matt. xxii. 23-33). Ezek. xxxvii. connects resurrection with restoration.

We are conscious that much more precious truth lies near the surface of this remarkable history. We have indicated a few fundamentals of dispensational importance. One more feature must bring this paper to a close. The dreams of Joseph, though their realization was postponed, were eventually realized, but the postponement shut the door upon Israel for a time and opened it to the Gentiles. So the rejection of Christ by His brethren, their refusal to "have this man reign over them", deferred the time of their restoration. When Israel is at length restored the Gentiles will have been blessed for a period of two thousand years, or as the type has it, "For these TWO years hath the famine been in the land" (Gen. xlv. 6).

The Lord who was despised and rejected shall yet be honoured and exalted, and in this glorious fact is all our hope and desire.

#39. Final Notes on Genesis.
pp. 68 - 70

While the story of Joseph carries us through to the close of the book of Genesis, there are one or two items of dispensational importance that may be profitably gathered together before leaving this book of the beginning.

Judah, who made such a sorry figure in the parenthesis of chapter xxxviii., becomes a noble type of Israel's Redeemer in chapters xliii. and xliv. There the great feature is Suretyship:--

> "I will be surety for him; of my hand shalt thou require him: if I bring him not unto thee, and set him before thee, then let me bear the blame for ever" (xliii. 9).
> "Now therefore, I pray thee, let thy servant abide instead of the lad a bondman to my lord; and let the lad go up with his brethren. For how shall I go up to my father and the lad be not with me?" (xliv. 33, 34).

The language of these verses is so clear, so beautiful that any words of ours would seem to spoil their teaching. All that we will do will be to indicate the usage and meaning of the word translated Surety.

SURETY (Hebrew Arab).—The root idea of the word appears to be "To mix", as in Psa. cvi. 35, "mingle"; Prov. xiv. 10, "intermediate". In the Chaldee section of Daniel the equivalent occurs in Dan. ii. 41, "Iron mixed with miry clay".

In weaving, the ereb is the "woof", that which is woven into or mixed in the texture (Lev. xiii. 48). The word is translated many times "evening", the time when darkness begins to "mix" with the light. Now all this bears upon the truth of Surety-ship. The Surety so "mixes" with the one for whom he acts as to take his place and be treated in his stead. Judah clearly perceived this when he said:--

> "Let thy servant abide INSTEAD of the lad A BONDMAN, and let the lad GO UP with his brethren" (Gen. xliv. 33).

Benjamin was the one who really should have been bound and Judah the one who should have gone up to his father, but Judah as the Surety was so intermingled with the case of his brother that he could be treated "instead of" Benjamin with perfect justice.

The attitude of Reuben with regard to Joseph must not be passed over without a word. Reuben, being the first-born, might well have been jealous of Joseph but we find him doing his best to save Joseph from the hands of his brethren. It was during Reuben's absence that Joseph was sold, and his grief is expressed upon his return in the words:--

> "The child is not, and I, whither shall I go? (xxxvii. 30).

The student of the Scripture must have noticed the important place given to the firstborn. Christ Himself bears the title, and so do the elect. A careful weighing of the statements of Scripture would make one feel that believers to-day constitute a kind of firstborn, saved early and during this present time that they in their turn may deliver those who have not been so favoured, when the time comes for the knowledge of the Lord to cover the earth as the waters cover the seas.

Before Jacob died he gathered his sons together, to tell them what should befall them "in the last days" (xlix.). The prophecy, though it finds partial fulfillment in Israel's past, looks to the period of the second coming of the Lord and the time of Jacob's trouble and restoration. By far the largest space is devoted to the future of Judah and Joseph. In both come prophecies of Christ. Verse 10 speaks of "Shiloh" and the "Sceptre" in connection with the royal tribe of Judah, and in Joseph's line Christ again figures as the "Shepherd" and "Stone" of Israel of whom Joseph was such a type.

A brief outline may help to set out the chief points.

Reuben (Firstborn).	Not excel. Birthright forfeited (I Chron. v. 1).
Simeon and Levi.	Divide; Scatter. (Josh. xix. 1; Lev. xxv. 32-34; Exod. xxxii. 26; Deut. x. 8, 9).
JUDAH.	The Lion.
	The Sceptre.
	Shiloh (Christ).
Zebulun.	Haven of Ships.
Isaachar.	Strong Ass.
DAN.	Judge.
	The Serpent (Antichrist).
	The Salvation (Christ) awaited.
Gad.	Overcome.
Asher.	Bread.
Naphtali.	Let loose.
JOSEPH.	The Fruitful Bough.
	The Shepherd.
	The Stone (Christ).
Benjamin.	Wolf.

When Jacob had finished this prophecy, he spoke of his approaching death and commanded that he should be buried together with Abraham and Isaac. Joseph lived to nourish and care for his brethren, and when he was about to die, he too gave command that his bones be carried up to the land of promise, saying "God will surely visit you". The book, which commences with the creation of heaven and earth, concludes with the history of one obscure man and his twelve sons, and stresses the fulfillment of God's promise concerning the "land" and the close connection that resurrection would hold to that fulfillment. The Scriptures focus upon a small space and a limited number, not because the wider circle is forgotten, but because in the smaller sphere we may the better see the purpose of the ages which indeed transcends the promised land and embraces the heavens and the earth, and goes beyond the pale of the chosen people to embrace every nation, tongue, people and language, and behind the promises made to Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, to that promise made before the age times.

#40. Israel's Bondage and its Bearing upon Dispensational Truth (Exodus i.).

pp. 106 - 109

The Hebrew title for Genesis is B'reshith, "In (the) beginning". It speaks of Creation. The Hebrew title of Exodus is Ve alleh Shemoth, "Now these are the names". It speaks of Redemption. Genesis speaks of the Nations, Exodus of the Nation. The theme of Genesis is traced through Adam and the fall of Joseph and the restoration. Joseph's last words were that God would surely visit Israel and lead them back to their own land. That visitation is chronicled in the book of Exodus.

The book is divided into two sections by the giving of the law at Mount Sinai, and may be visualized thus:-- Exodus.

Bondage.	\	Passover.
Redemption.	/
The Giving of the Law.
Freedom.	\	Tabernacle.
Worship.	/

Worship can only be offered by a free people, yet let us note well a free people received the law! The apostle Paul who fought so for freedom in the epistle to the Galatians gladly commences Romans by calling himself the "bond slave" of Christ. The one great purpose of God is displayed under varying forms again and again:--

First we have a perfect creation (Gen. i. 1).	\
Then a fall, darkness and chaos (Gen. i. 2).	}	Cosmic.
Then a renewal (Gen. i., ii.).	/

If we leave the cosmic platform and limit ourselves to the human plane, the purpose is again displayed in Gen. iii.:--

First a perfect creation. Man.	\
Then a fall, death and expulsion.	}	Racial.
But a restoration promised and typified.	/

Leaving the wider circle of the human race we notice the story of the nations:--

First the nations divided by God (Gen. x.).	\
Then their rebellions (Gen. xi.).	}	National.
Then their only hope of restoration (Gen. xii.).	/

This is as far as Genesis takes us. exodus now expands the theme, but confines itself to the fortunes of the one nation Israel. The same order is observed.

First the fruitful and mighty people (Exod. i. 1-7).
Then the bondage.
Followed by the deliverance and exodus.

How did it come about that Israel became such abject slaves? There is a threefold answer to the question, viz., (1) The Purpose of God:--

> "Thy seed shall be a stranger in a land that is not theirs, and shall serve them: and they shall afflict them" (Gen. xv. 13).

(2) The Fulness of Iniquity. Their entrance into the land of Canaan was delayed in mercy to the wicked inhabitants:--

> "In the fourth generation they shall come hither again: for the iniquity of the Amorites is not yet full" (Gen. xv. 16).

and (3) The Punishment of Sin. The bondage of Israel was connected with their own failure. They became idolatrous and like the Egyptians themselves (Lev. xvii. 7; Josh. xxiv. 14; Ezek. xx. 5-9).

Possibly some readers will not be fully alive to the fact that God visited Israel with judgment in Egypt before He delivered them, and therefore we will quote the passage from Ezek. xx. referred to above:--

> "In the day that I lifted up Mine hand unto them, to bring them forth of the land of Egypt . . . . . Then said I unto them, Cast ye away every man the abominations of his eyes, and defile not yourselves with the idols of Egypt. I am the Lord your God. But they rebelled against Me . . . . . in the midst of the land of Egypt."

Israel sets forth in miniature the dealings of God with mankind. First there is the great purpose of the ages, that necessarily accounts for much that is mysterious and strange in God's providential dealings. It would have seemed more reasonable, seeing that Abraham, Isaac and Jacob were already settled in the land of promise, that the promises upon which their faith rested should be put into immediate operation. As it was, these men were pilgrims and strangers in the very land of promise, and the only portion that actually belonged to Abraham was a piece he paid for in which to bury Sarah.

Secondly, the relation which Scripture shows existed between the exile of Israel and the iniquity of the Amorites reveals another phase of God's dispensational dealings. The same truth is uttered in the epistle to the Romans:--

> "Blindness in part is happened to Israel, until the fullness of the Gentiles be come in, and so all Israel be saved . . . . ." (Rom. xi. 25, 26).

Adam's fall, Job's sufferings, the Church's period of suffering and persecution, all speak of the same long waiting for the heading up of Sin, as set forth finally at Babylon (Rev. xiii., xvii., xviii., etc.).

Thirdly, Israel became idolators in Egypt. Their bondage followed upon their departure from God. So with the larger issue. Man's present condition of bondage is a part of the Divine Plan. It must continue his condition until iniquity has filled its measure. It continues also because man is personally sinful and amenable to wrath. The heirs of promise therefore possessed no merit whereby they could lay claim to the land. The movement which ended in their deliverance was entirely the work of God:--

> "Speak not thou in thy heart . . . . . saying, For my righteousness the Lord hath brought me in to possess this land . . . . . Not for thy righteousness, or for the uprightness of thine heart dost thou go to possess their land . . . . . but that He may perform the Word which the Lord sware unto thy fathers, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob" (Deut. ix. 4-6).

There is yet one further reason for the long sojourn in Egypt before the occupation of the land, which bears upon the purpose of every individual life, and that is experience. They were destined to be a Kingdom. The law was to come forth from their holy city unto all the earth. They were to be the custodians of the written revelation of God, and the guardians of His holy Law. Moses himself was most thoroughly trained under Pharaoh for his future great work, being learned in all the arts of the Egyptians. Israel, too, during their stay would become possessed of a wide knowledge and ability, which, humanly speaking, could never have come to them had they remained in Canaan in the same station and manner of life as that of the twelve sons of Jacob.

Every child of God is gathering experience. He may never perform in the life to come the occupation wherewith he earns his bread in this life, but he that is faithful in that which is least is faithful in that which is much. A faithful and honest fulfillment of life's little duties here may be fitting one for higher service there. In Building there are the great fundamental principles of righteousness expressed in the line and the plummet, the square and the foundation. In Agriculture there is the ploughing and the sowing before the reaping. All spheres of life contribute their quota, and like Israel in Egypt we are being prepared for higher things.

The Author of the Natural History of Enthusiasm may be quoted here with advantage. After having spoken of the misconception of heaven as a place of inertness and quiescent bliss, he says:--

> "But if there be a real and necessary, not merely a shadowy, agency in heaven as well as on earth; and if human nature is destined to act its part in such an economy, then its constitution, and the severe training it undergoes, are at once explained; and then also the removal of individuals in the very prime of their fitness for useful labour ceases to be impenetrably mysterious. This excellent mechanism of matter and mind, which, beyond any other of His works, declares the wisdom of the Creator, and which under His guidance is now passing the season of its first preparation, shall stand up anew from the dust of dissolution, and then, with freshened powers, and with a store of hard-earned and practical wisdom for its guidance, shall essay new labours in the service of God, Who by such instruments chooses to accomplish His designs of beneficence. That so prodigious a waste of the highest qualities should take place, as is implied in the notions which many Christians entertain of the future state, is indeed hard to imagine. The mind of man, formed as it is to be more tenacious of its active habits than even of its moral dispositions, is, in the present state, trained, often at an immense cost of suffering, to the exercise of skill, of fore-thought, of courage, of patience; and ought it not to be inferred, unless positive evidence contradicts the supposition, that this system of education bears some relation of fitness to the state for which it is an initiation? Shall not the very same qualities which here are so sedulously fashioned and finished, be actually needed and used in that future world of perfection? Surely the idea is inadmissible, that an instrument wrought up at so much expense to a polished fitness for service, is destined to be suspended for ever on the palace-walls of heaven, as a glittering bauble, no more to make proof of its temper?" (Quoted by Fairbairn on Typology).

Let us not repine therefore at the trials of the way, but believe that when the harvest comes we shall reap in this connection, exactly as we have sown.

#41. Moses and Christ; rejected at first, but afterwards received (Exod. ii. - iv.).
pp. 132 - 135

We saw, in our last paper, the great dispensational fact that Israel's bondage was a necessary part of the Divine purpose, both with regard to themselves and with regard to the nations.

> "Man is born to trouble as the sparks fly upwards: YET affliction cometh not forth of the dust, NEITHER doth trouble spring out of the ground" (Job v. 6, 7).

Affliction and trouble are within the providence of God; they come from above. Egypt was no fit abiding-place for the chosen people; affliction and distress came upon them, to make them the more ready to respond to the command to leave the house of bondage and go forth to the land of promise.

> "Arise and depart hence, for this is not your rest, because it is polluted" (Micah ii. 10).

Before the cry of oppressed Israel ascended up to heaven, the deliverer was prepared who should be the manifest answer to their prayer. The seventh from Adam was Enoch (Jude 14). He walked with God, and he was not, for God took him. Scripture draws attention to the fact that Enoch was the seventh from Adam, and it is evident that we are to consider this as of typical importance. Moses was the seventh from Abraham. (1) Abraham, (2) Isaac, (3) Jacob, (4) Levi, (5) Kohath, (6) Amram, (7) Moses. This fact seems to indicate that Moses also will be an outstanding figure in the development of the purpose of God. The same numerical character may be seen in the case of Abraham. Abraham was the seventh from Eber, who gave his name to the Hebrews—"Abram the Hebrew" (Gen. xiv. 13).

The faith of the parents of Moses finds a place in the list of overcomers in Heb. xi. This led to the adoption of Moses by Pharaoh's daughter, and is a remarkable example of the marvellous way in which the Lord makes "the wrath of man to praise Him". "When Moses was grown" (Exod. ii. 11), or, as Acts vii. 23, 24 tells us:--

> "When he was full forty years old, it came into his heart to visit his brethren the children of Israel. And seeing one of them suffer wrong, he defended him, and avenged him that was oppressed, and smote the Egyptian."

Stephen, when he uttered these words, was "full of the Holy Ghost", and his face as it had been "the face of an angel". This must guide us when we read in Exod. ii. 12:--

> "And he looked this way and that way, and when he saw that there was no man, he slew the Egyptian and hid him in the sand."

Exodus gives us the outward appearance, Acts vii. looks upon the heart, and moreover reveals the dispensational teaching as we shall see. Instead of thinking that Moses cast furtive glances "this way and that way" before dealing a treacherous blow, we must see it in the light of Isa. lix. 16:--

> "And He saw that there was no man, and wondered that there was no intercessor: therefore His arm brought salvation . . . . ."

So also Isa. lxiii. 5. Stephen reveals the purpose that prompted Moses to take vengeance upon the oppressor:--

> "He supposed his brethren would have understood how that God by his hand would deliver them: but they understood not" (Acts vii. 25).

Vengeance as well as redemption belong to the Kinsman-Redeemer of Whom Moses was a conspicuous type.

These words prevent us from agreeing with the words of Dr. Fairbairn concerning this act of Moses when he says:--

> "It was the hasty and irregular impulse of the flesh, not the enlightened and heavenly guidance of the Spirit, which prompted him to take the course he did."

Upon interposing between two of his brethren who were striving together next day, he was rebuffed by their jealous words, "Who made thee a ruler and a judge over us?" This is typical of the rejection of Christ upon His first advent. It is not the failure of Moses, but that of his people, that we are to see here. His sojourn in the land of Midian and his marriage there must be viewed in the same light as Joseph's sojourn in Egypt and his marriage there, the outcome of both being the deliverance and blessing of his brethren who had hated and rejected him. That this is so we may earn from Acts vii. Joseph and Moses are brought together by Stephen to enforce this great lesson upon the leaders of Israel:--

> "And at THE SECOND TIME Joseph was made known unto his brethren" (13).
> "This Moses whom they refused, saying, Who made thee a ruler and a judge? THE SAME did God send to be a ruler and a deliverer by the hand of the angel which appeared to him in the bush" (35).

It is clear that we have here in Exodus a foreshadowing of Israel's great rejection. The Lord Jesus came, the time was fulfilled, but His people refused Him saying, "We will not have this man to reign over us".

During their rejection by their brethren both Moses and Joseph marry Gentile brides. This looks to the dispensation of the Acts during which the Church is spoken of as being prepared as a bride, and on to the period of the second coming as given in Rev. xix. The second time is the key thought. The reason why Israel failed to respond to Moses and to Christ is the same, “They understood not”. Their eyes were blinded, their ears were stopped, their hearts were hardened. At length however Israel cry unto the Lord, “and their cry came up unto God by reason of the bondage” (Exod. ii. 23). Their cry brings back the deliverer they refused. The Lord spake to Moses out of the burning bush and said:--

> “I have surely seen the affliction of My people . . . . . I will send thee unto Pharaoh” (Exod. iii. 7-10).

Moses was sent in the name of Him Who was the great I AM, and was assured of his success by the twofold sign of the serpent and leprosy. He Who came to be the Saviour must have power over Satan (the serpent) and over Sin (leprosy), so Matt. iv. records the temptation, and Matt. viii. the first defined miracle. It was Moses’ high destiny to have foreshadowed Christ in more ways than one. He was to have been both “Apostle and High-Priest”, but by reason of human infirmity this honour was shared with his brother Aaron.

A greater than Pharaoh is soon to mount the throne, and a greater tribulation than that of Israel in Egypt will follow. The apocalyptic judgments will be appalling greater than the plagues of Egypt. Men will once more harden their hearts instead of repenting. Israel will cry again to the Lord, and “the day of vengeance” will be in His heart. He Whom they rejected shall come back to them and “so all Israel shall be saved”. They shall look upon Me Whom they have pierced”, saith the Lord. And when Israel do at length see Who it is that is their deliverer they will say, as we can never so fully say:-- > “Surely He hath borne OUR griefs, and carried OUR sorrows, YET we did esteem Him stricken, smitten of God, and afflicted!” (Isa. liii. 4).

Moses was inspired to speak of his own typical character:--

> “A prophet shall the Lord your God raise up unto you of your brethren, like unto me; Him shall ye hear in all things whatsoever He shall say unto you . . . . .” (Acts iii. 19-26).

The truth of the postponement of the purpose of God relative to Israel is much more than a theory. Israel through all these centuries have experienced the terrible reality of its effect upon them. The hour of their deliverance draws near, “the second time”.

#42. "Let My people go" (Exod. v. 1). The Principle of Separation.

pp. 164 - 167

The demand that Moses made when he entered into the presence of Pharaoh, and Pharaoh's refusal and attempts at compromise, form a type of the age-abiding feud between the "Church and the World":--

> "Thus saith the Lord God of Israel, Let my people go, that they may hold a feast unto Me in the wilderness" (Exod. v. 1).

No feast to the Lord could be held in Egypt, the type of the world. The wilderness was the place chosen by the Lord for worship. Pilgrims and strangers may worship acceptably; slaves to the world and the flesh cannot worship in spirit. In Exod. v. 3 two terms are added that are typically suggestive. God is called "The God of the Hebrews", suggesting the separate character of His people. The journey that the Israelites must take in order to worship God was to be a "three days' journey". From the Creation week onwards the third day sets forth resurrection. True worship is not of the world (Egypt), it is offered by a free people (Let My people go), and a separate people (Hebrews), and is upon resurrection ground (three days). One sacrifice only was offered in Egypt, the Passover; all else was reserved for the Tabernacle in the wilderness.

Pharaoh's answers, "Who is the Lord?"; "I know not the Lord, neither will I let Israel go"; "Get you to your burdens", are, in their turn, typical of the world's attitude towards spiritual service. The "burdens of Egypt" are far more important than the service of the Lord, and even among the Lord's people Martha finds more imitators than Mary, so much of Egypt do we all carry with us.

The Judgments of God begin after Pharaoh's refusal, and in chapter viii. Pharaoh calls for Moses and Aaron and suggests the first compromise, "Go ye, sacrifice to your God IN THE LAND" (25). God had said "in the wilderness" and a "three days' journey". Pharaoh's says, in effect, "You can worship your God, I do not ask you to bow down to any of mine, you can offer your sacrifice, but there is no necessity for making yourselves so peculiar, sacrifice to your God in the land."

The first great snare set by the god of this age is that of mixing the world with the church. Moses repudiated the compromise, the first reason being that the very center and basis of their worship was an abomination to the Egyptians.

The world is quite willing to speak of "Jesus", and especially so if they can refer to him as the "Galilean" or the "Carpenter", but the center of the faith, the cross, "Christ crucified", is an "offence". The cross reveals the hopeless and helpless condition of the flesh, and this is an "abomination to the Egyptians".

The second reason for repudiating the suggestion is just as strong as the first, but one that we are apt to forget. The suggestion ran counter to God's express statement, and that is enough to condemn it. When He says "wilderness" and "three days' journey", to debate the question of "in the land" is sin. Upon this resolute stand being taken by Moses Pharaoh appears willing to lengthen the chain, but it is still a chain:--

> "I will let you go, that ye may sacrifice to the Lord your God in the wilderness" (Exod. viii. 28).

So far, that is good. Pharaoh, moreover, does not speak irreverently of God; he uses the full title of the Lord. The snare, however, is still set. "Only"—Ah yes! the world will give a good length of chain. "Only ye shall not go VERY FAR AWAY". The contested point is the clear-cut division between the Church and the World. While many would hesitate to offer the abomination of the Egyptians IN THE LAND, they are ensnared at the HALF-WAY HOUSE. Let the Church have its separate gatherings, its ecclesiastical laws, its ordained priests, its ritual, its "form of godliness", but let it deny "the power thereof" by leaving out the "three days' journey". Once more the demand is made, and once again the chain is lengthened:--

> "Go, serve the Lord your God: but who are they that shall go? And Moses said, We will go with our young and with our old, with our sons and with our daughters, with our flocks and with our herds; for we must hold a feast unto the Lord" (Exod. x. 8, 9).

True scriptural unity has ever been the target of Satan. If the attractions of the world from without do not avail, distractions from within may prove more effectual.

> "And he said unto them, Let the Lord be so with you, as I will let you go, AND YOUR LITTLE ONES: look to it; for evil is before you. Not so, go now YE THAT ARE MEN, and serve the Lord" (Exod. x. 10, 11).

The distraction of divided heart, the serving of two masters, the miserable failure of the attempt to make the best of both worlds, are suggested here. After further judgments, a yet further concession is made:--

> "Go ye, serve the Lord: only . . . . ." (Exod. x. 34).

The presence of that "only" is deadly. Shakespeare puts it—"but me no but's", and it were well that we met all attempts to evade the full truth as peremptorily.

> "Only let your flocks and herds be stayed, let your little ones go with you" (Exod. x. 34).

That is, bind the saint of God down to earth by the shackles of worldly possessions. The love of riches, the cares and riches of this age, the things that so easily entangle us. Moses replied:--

> "Thou must give us also sacrifices and burnt offerings that we may sacrifice unto the Lord our God, our cattle also shall go with us; there shall not an hoof be left behind; for thereof must we take to serve the Lord our God; and we know not with what we must serve the Lord, until we come thither" (Exod. x. 25, 26).

Demas was caught in this snare, so also were Ananias and Sapphira. The parable of the Sower speaks of the thorns as representing the cares, riches and pleasures of this life. The evil is two-fold. While our possessions remain in Egypt, our hearts are likely to turn back there too. On the other hand we must be prepared to offer whatever the Lord shall demand. We may be prepared to offer money, but hold back time. We may be pleased to pray, but not to labour. That is a spirited expression that it would do us good to repeat occasionally—not an hoof. Separateness must ever be offensive to the world, and will never be understood or tolerated.

Moses demanded that Israel should serve God:--

In the wilderness.
A three days' journey.
All should go.
Not an hoof left behind.

Pharaoh suggested that they could serve their God just as well and with far less inconvenience if they either remained:--

In the land.
Not very far off.
Only men went.
Flocks and herds left behind.

These four items teach us that true worship is connected with a pilgrim walk, is on resurrection ground, that it comprehends all saints, and embraces all we have and are. These four items fill out the word "Saint"; anything less "comes short of the glory of God".

The Epistle to the Hebrews.

#23. The Profession (iii. 1-6).
pp. 25 - 28

We have already seen that the master key of the Epistle is the theme of "perfection", that the great leader, perfecter and finisher is Christ, Who as Son is higher than angels; as Apostle is higher than Moses; as High Priest is greater than Aaron; and as Sacrifice better than all the offerings of the law.

The doctrine of perfection is set forth in type also, and in chapters iii. & iv. the type is the rest that was promised to Israel, the failure of most to attain to it, and the triumph of those who like Caleb and Joshua overcame by faith.

Ignoring other parts of the Structure of the Epistle, we find that chapters iii. & iv. are set in correspondence with v. & vi. and note their related themes:--

* * * * *
B | iii. 1. The Priesthood of Christ.
C | iii. 7 - iv. 13. Failure to enter into rest.
* * * * *
B | v.1 - x. 18(?). The Priesthood of Christ.
C | vi. Failure to go on unto perfection.

The atmosphere of the passage before us is that of temptation:--

> "For in that He Himself hath suffered, being tempted, He is able to succour them that are tempted."
> "When your fathers tempted Me."
> "In all points tempted like as we are."
> "For every one that uses milk is untempted ('unskilful' A.V.) in the word of righteousness: for he is a babe. But strong meat belongeth to them that are perfect."

The two-fold title, "The Apostle and High Priest", is clearly echoed in the twelfth chapter in the words, "The Author and Finisher (Perfecter)"; while the words "our profession" find illumination in the same way from the word "faith", of which Christ is both Author and Perfecter.

The "profession" occurs at the beginning and end of this section, as do also the references to the High Priest and to temptation. They are linked together. In xi. 23 it occurs again, closely associated with the expression of iv. 14 and x. 19, Echontes oun, "Having therefore", and with the High priesthood of Christ. "Let us hold fast the profession of our faith ('hope', literally) without wavering." Here again we catch the thought of chapters iii. & iv. "Without wavering" (aklinēs), "turned to flight" (klinōs) (Heb. xi. 34). This word comes in Psa. cxix. 51, "The proud have had me greatly in derision; yet have I not declined from Thy law", which expresses the possibilities that beset the Hebrews.

This "profession" is also the "confession" of Heb. xi. 13. They "confessed that they were strangers and pilgrims on the earth". This confession is veiled somewhat in the A.V. rendering of Heb. xiii. 15, where it is translated "giving thanks". The context, like that of Heb. x. and of iii., iv. speaks of a position of exposure, temptation and loss. Those who hold the confession "bear His reproach", and the fruit of their lips is "confessing to His name" (xiii. 15 margin). The whole section may be visualized as follows:--

A | ii. 17 - iii. 1. Jesus. High Priest. Tempted. Succour. The Profession.
B | a | iii. 2-6. Christ the Son. Moses the Servant.
Whose house are we
If ___ ___ ___
b | iii. 7-14. Forty years. Moses.
We are made partakers
If ___ ___ ___
c | iii. 15 – iv. 8. Forty years. Moses. David. Joshua.
Some never entered
If ___ ___ ___
A | iv. 12 - 16. Jesus. High Priest. Tempted. Grace to help. The Profession.

Two great leaders are instanced in these chapters—Moses and Joshua. The words of iv. 8 in the A.V. are misleading. They should read, "If Joshua had given them rest". The land of Canaan was the type, not the reality. It is also important to notice that in iii. 1 and in iv. 14 the simple name "Jesus" stands; not "Christ Jesus", as the A.V. reads.

The points of superiority that are brought together in iii. 2-6 are emphasized either by comparison or by contrast. Both Moses and Christ were "faithful". This has already been said in ii. 17. Faithfulness is especially associated with endurance ("Be thou faithful! unto death" Rev. ii. 10). Christ is spoken of as the "Faithful Witness" (Rev. i. 5); and identical language is rendered "faithful martyr" in Rev. ii. 13. Moses failed to reach the promised land, but unfaithfulness to his charge could not be laid against him. Christ is superior to Moses, however, in this; Moses was placed over the house of God, but Christ built the house Himself. Moses' faithfulness also was as a Servant, but Christ's faithfulness was as a Son over His own house.

It is important that we realize something of the great place which Moses held in the estimation of the Hebrews. In Numb. xii. 7 the Lord Himself differentiates between Moses and the prophets: "My servant Moses is not so, who is faithful in all mine house". No other prophet would arise like unto Moses until Christ came (Deut. xviii. 18). Moses' faithfulness was "for a testimony of those things which were to be spoken after". The slavish adherence to Moses when the Greater than Moses had come was in reality denying the very testimony of Moses' life and ministry.

It is clear from Heb. iii. 6 and 14 that membership of the house, and the partaking of Christ, are conditional. "Whose house are we IF we hold fast the confidence and rejoicing of the hope firm unto the end."

If we understand that the Epistle to the Hebrews speaks, not of salvation, but of the things which accompany salvation, we shall have no need to defend the truth known as the final perseverance of the saints. This Epistle addresses those who are already saved ones and holy brethren. These, and these only, are exhorted to continue stedfast.

Christ has a house made up of those who overcome. This company is known as "the church of the firstborn" (Heb. xii. 23). They do not merely hold fast the hope (that is common to all believers in some degree), they go further. They triumph over troubles. They rise above persecution. They take joyfully the spoiling of possessions. They hold fast the confidence and the boasting of the hope firm unto the end.

These words indicate the overcomer. They are entirely in line with the theme of "perfecting". This we shall see more clearly when we have passed the remainder of the section in review.

#24. "Whose House are we IF . . . . ." (iii. 2-6).
pp. 58 - 60

When the apostle wished to lead the Hebrew believers to appreciate the excellency of Christ, he first drew attention to the difference that must be realized between God speaking by the prophets and God speaking "in Son" (see for this expression Volume VIII, page 183). He then proceeds to speak of the excellent name of Christ as compared with angels, and again the emphasis is, "Thou art My Son". In chapter iii. the apostle approaches the tenderest spot in the Hebrew mind, the place and honour of Moses. In the Jewish hymns for the Sabbath come the words:--

> "Thou calledst him Thy faithful servant, and didst put a glorious crown on his head when he stood before Thee in Mount Sinai, etc."

The Scriptures themselves emphasize the isolated dignity of Moses:--

> "I will raise up a Prophet from among their brethren like unto thee, and will put My words in His mouth . . . . . whosoever will not hearken unto My words which He shall speak in My name, I will require it of him" (Deut. xviii. 18, 19).

Deut. xxxiv. 10 adds:--

> "There arose not a prophet since in Israel like unto Moses, whom the Lord knew face to face."

When the apostle spoke of the angels he did not hesitate to shew their inferiority to Christ, but when he speaks of Moses, he is careful to bring forward the highest commendation which Scripture affords. Christ was faithful, as also Moses was faithful in all his house. The reference is to Numb. xii. 6-8 where the Lord severely reproves the attitude of Aaron and Miriam, saying:--

> "If there be a prophet among you, I the Lord will make Myself known unto him in a vision, and will speak unto him is a dream. My servant Moses is not so, who is faithful in all Mine house. With him I will speak mouth to mouth, even apparently and not in dark speeches and the similitude of the Lord shall he behold."

There can be no question that in all the range of Old Testament history no name could mean so much to a Hebrew as that of Moses. The apostle had to shew them one who was greater than Moses, inasmuch as the New Covenant of spirit and life was greater than the Old Covenant with its ministration of death.

In the first case he would bid them consider the essential difference between Moses and Christ. Moses was a part of the house over which he ruled, but Christ was the actual builder of the house Himself. This of necessity spoke of the greater honour of Christ, but in verse 4 the apostle brings forward the argument which formed the climax of his testimony in Heb. i.:--

> "For every house is builded by some one; but He that built all things is God."

There can be no purpose served by this statement unless the apostle intends the Hebrews to understand that Christ was God. Verse 3 demands this meaning, and the fitness of verse 4 is only preserved if we believe it to refer to the Person of Christ. In Heb. i., after having spoken of the high dignity of the Son, he leads on to the same point:--

> "Unto the Son He saith, Thy throne, O GOD, is for ever and ever . . . . . Thou, Lord, in the beginning hast laid the foundation of the earth" (i. 8-10).

Whether the "all things" of iii. 4 be taken to refer to the Creation at large, or in a more restricted sense to all the dispensations, including the Mosaic and the Gospel, Christ is the Builder.

The apostle now proceeds to another feature. Moses was faithful as a SERVANT in all his house, but Christ as a SON over His own house. Not only is there the contrast between Servant and Son, but between Moses IN, and Christ OVER, the house. Further, the added words "Over His own house" confirm the interpretation of verse 4 of Christ.

The reason for this carefully debated point is revealed in verse 6. This house over which Christ as the Son presides, is infinitely more glory than did Moses in the house of which he formed a part, this house is a special people who are now to be named and described. "Whose house are WE", the "we" being the holy brethren, partakers of the heavenly calling of iii. 1, and the many sons who are being brought to glory (cf. ii. 10).

Their peculiar characteristic is now added, and enforced by historical example.

> "Whose house are we IF we hold fast the confidence and the rejoicing of the hope firm unto the end" (iii. 6).

This finds its echo in verse 14:--

> "For we are made partakers of Christ, IF we hold the beginning of our confidence steadfast unto the end."

These two passages are followed by almost identical words, which is a more forcible reason why we should compare them together. Following verse 6 we read:-- > "Wherefore, as the Holy Ghost saith, To-day, if ye will hear His voice, harden not your hearts, AS IN THE PROVOCATION . . . . . forty years . . . . . I was grieved . . . . . I sware . . . . They shall not enter into My rest. Take heed brethren, LEST . . . ." (iii. 7-12).

Following verse 14, we read,

> "While it is said, To-day if ye will hear His voice, harden not your hearts, AS IN THE PROVOCATION . . . . . with whom was He grieved forty years? . . . . . to whom sware He that they should not enter into His rest . . . . . Let us therefore fear, LEST . . . . ." (iii. 15, iv. 1).

The whole context of chapters iii. & iv. makes it impossible that the "house" of iii. 6 can mean the church. In the case of the church there can be no "if", and the figure of Israel falling in the wilderness can by no system of interpretation set forth that church whose standing is in pure grace. So also the parallel expression "partakers of Christ"; this too refers to something which is in addition to redemption. The word "partakers" is the same as that which is rendered "fellows" in Heb. i. 9. The idea in these passages is that of association with Christ in "the joy that was set before Him", the "oil of gladness" being that of exultation or extreme joy. Heb. iii. 1 places no "if" against the statement that those addressed were "associates of the heavenly calling", that being unconditional. The association with Christ, however, is different. Rom. viii. 17 contains a parallel with these two conceptions.

> "And if children, then heirs, heirs of God" (parallel with Heb. iii. 1).
> "And joint-heirs with Christ; if so be we suffer with Him, that we may be also glorified together" (parallel with Heb. iii. 14).

We shall find that all the teaching of this epistle focuses upon the few verses with which chapter xii. opens. The exhortation is "so run that ye may obtain".

#25. The Provocation (iii.)
pp. 88 - 91

Chapters iii. & iv. are bounded by the word "confession":--

> "Consider the Apostle and High Priest of our confession" (iii. 1 R.V.).
> "Let us hold fast our confession" (iv. 14 R.V.).

It is evident that the Hebrew believers were exhorted to consider Christ as an example in the matter of this "confession". A somewhat parallel double occurrence is I Tim. vi. 12-14 where Timothy's "good confession" is associated with that of Christ before Pontius Pilate. The word contains an element of danger and opposition, and the exhortation is to hold it unto the end. The one great feature which is singled out by the apostle in the case of Christ Himself is that He "was FAITHFUL" (Heb. ii. 17, iii. 2). Within the bounds set by iii. 1 and iv. 14 therefore will come some further teaching, example, exhortation, encouragement and warning, such as will, by the grace of God, help the tried believer to hold on his way.

The one feature of Christ which the Hebrew believers were called upon to consider was His faithfulness; the one great warning which follows is that against unbelief:--

> "Take heed, brethren, lest there be in any of you an evil heart of UNBELIEF, in departing from the living God" (iii. 12).
> "So we see that they could not enter in because of UNBELIEF" (iii. 19).
> "The word preached did not profit them, because they were not united by FAITH with them that heard."

The great example is "the provocation". This word comes from pikraino—"to be bitter", and illuminates Heb. xii. 15, 16, where another type for the believers' warning (Esau) is closely linked with a "root of bitterness". The great "text" of the apostle in these two chapters is taken from Psa. xcv., which he introduces with the solemn words, "As the Holy Ghost saith".

It is evident that we must know something of this "provocation" on the part of Israel if we would profit by the Scripture before us. In Num. xiv. we have the record. Caleb and Joshua had urged upon the people a confident faith in the Lord with respect to the entry into and possession of the land of promise.

> "But all the congregation bade stone them with stones . . . . . And the Lord said unto Moses, How long will this people PROVOKE Me?" (Num. xiv. 10, 11).

Their provoking was largely due to their unbelief, for the passage continues, "How long will it be ere they believe Me?" The Lord threatened to disinherit and smite the people, but upon the prayer of Moses He said, "I have pardoned according to thy word". The people therefore were a pardoned people. But does this mean that they did go up and possess the land? No, for after pronouncing the gracious pardon the Lord added:--

> "But as truly as I live . . . . . surely they shall not see the land . . . . . neither shall any of them that provoked Me see it" (Num. xiv. 21-23; see also Psa. xcix. 8, II Sam. xii. 10-12).

In Numb. xiv. 22 the Lord declares that already this people had tempted Him ten times. THE COMPANION BIBLE gives the "ten times" as follows:--

1. At Read Sea. (Exod. xiv. 11, 12).
2. At Marah. (Exod. xv. 23, 24).
3. Wilderness of Sin. (Exod. xvi. 2).
4, 5. Twice about Manna. (Exod. xvi. 20, 27).
6. At Rephidim. (Exod. xvii. 1-3).
7. At Horeb (golden calf). (Exod. xxxii.).
8. At Taberah. (Num. xi. 1).
9. At Kibroth Hataavah. (Num. xi. 4).
10. At Kadesh. (Num. xiv. 2).

Each occurrence should be carefully studied, as each brings to light some ground of provocation and forfeiture. One of the most frequent expressions in this series is that the children of Israel murmured. It will be remembered that in Philippians, the Epistle of the PRIZE, the exhortation is:--

> "Do all things without murmurings and disputings, that ye may be . . . . the sons of God, without rebuke" (ii. 14).

In I Cor. x. also, this feature is brought forward:--

> "Neither murmur ye, as some of them also murmured, and were destroyed of the destroyer" (verse 10).

Murmuring may seem a small thing, but it is the seed of unbelief that departs from the living God. On one of the occasions, that of Num. xi. 4, it was the mixed multitude that led Israel astray—the type of those "whose God is their belly, who glory in their shame, who mind earthly things" (Phil. iii. 19). Israel murmured at the heavenly provision of Manna, saying, "Our soul loatheth this light bread" (Num. xxi. 5). Psa. lxxviii. reveals that unbelief was at the bottom of this rejection of heavenly food—"Because they believed not in God"; "Their heart was not right with Him" (verses 17, 18, 22, 25, 37). In the dealings of God with His people after salvation, the principle remains true that "Whatsoever a man soweth that shall he also reap . . . . . flesh . . . . . spirit"; for in Num. xiv. 28, 29 we read:--

> "AS ye have spoken in Mine ears, SO will I do to you. Your carcasses shall fall in this wilderness . . . . . which have murmured against Me."

The very sending of the spies into the land of promise was an act of provocation to the Lord. "We will send men before us" (Deut. i. 22). He allowed them their own way in the matter, but the result was that "they brought up an evil report". Exek. xx. 6 definitely tells us that the Lord Himself had espied the land for them, but they believed not His report.

It is comforting to know that while "Some, when they had heard, did provoke; howbeit not all that came out of Egypt by Moses" (Heb. iii. 16), for Caleb and Joshua wholly followed the Lord and are blessed examples of those who by patience and continuance inherit the promises.

While the church of the One Body has a different calling from either the church in the wilderness or the church of God during the Acts period, the temptations and the snares are much the same, and we should give earnest heed to these things, so that we may in our turn "press according to a mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus".

#26. "The Rest that Remaineth" (iv. 9).
pp. 121 - 124

In chapters iii. & iv. the words katapausis and katapauö ("rest") occur eleven times, and the one reference in iv. 9 where the word sabbatismos is used, makes twelve in all. It is evident therefore that this "rest" is an essential subject. In the first case the entry into the land of promise was typical of the rest that remaineth to the people of God, for it is used directly in connection with Israel in the wilderness. That it was not the actual "rest", but a type only, may be seen from Heb. iv. 8:--

> "For if Joshua had given them rest, then would He not afterwards have spoken of another day", which the Lord did in David's time, as is seen in Psa. xcv. Not only is the rest here spoken of likened to the entry of the faithful overcomer into Canaan, it is also likened to the Sabbath day rest of the week of Creation:--

> "For He spake in a certain place of the seventh day on this wise, And God did rest the seventh day from all His works" (Heb. iv. 4).

The structure of Heb. iv. 1-13 will help us to see the chief features of the passage and guide us in our study.

Heb. iv. 1-13.

A | 1, 2. | a | Let us therefore fear, lest.
b | Any come short.
c | Not united by faith.
d | The Word of hearing.
B | 3, 4. Nature of this rest. After Works, e.g., Creation.
C | 5, 6. It remaineth (apoleipō)—a rest.
D | 7. David.
D | 8. Joshua.
C | 9. There remaineth (apoleipō)—a rest.
B | 10. Nature of this rest. After Works. e.g., Creation.
A | 11-13. | a | Let us therefore labour, lest.
b | Any fall.
c | Example of unbelief.
d | The Word of God.

The A.V. of iv. 2 reads "not being mixed by faith", and gives in the margin "because they were not united by faith to". The R.V. reads "But the word of hearing did not profit them, because they were not united by faith with them that heard". This reading turns our attention to the great division that came about after the return of the spies.

Israel did not join with Caleb and Joshua in their triumphant faith, but with the unbelievers and the complainers.

With regard to the nature of this rest both verses 3, 4 and 10 look back to Gen. i. & ii., where we are told that God rested upon the seventh day after the completion of the six days' creation. The believer is said to have rested "from his works as God did from His", when he enters into this "rest that remaineth". Verse 9 departs from the usual word for rest to give us its full and perfect meaning:--

> "There remaineth a Sabbatismos (a Sabbath rest) for the people of God."

There is one further feature that demands attention, and that is the statement made in iv. 3:--

> "Although the works were finished from the foundation of the world."

"The foundation (katabolē) of the world" is an expression that has been carefully examined in The Berean Expositor, and the interpretation "The overthrow of the world" has been adopted instead of that of the A.V.

This "overthrow" we find indicated in Gen. i. 2:--

> "And the earth became without form and void", the six days' work which followed being the preparation of the earth as a platform for the outworking of the plan of the ages. The question that comes to us as a result of this is:--

> "In what way does this reflect upon the believers to whom the Apostle addressed his words, for their rest is likened to the seventh day rest of God" (see Heb. iv. 3, 4, 10).

A little wider study, we think, will help us to appreciate the apostle's meaning. In iv. 1 he writes:--

> "Let us labour therefore to enter into that rest, lest any man fall after the same example of unbelief."

Now we are already acquainted with the fact that the grand exhortation of Hebrews is to "go on unto perfection", perfection being the doctrinal equivalent of the rest that remaineth. So therefore in Heb. vi. 1 we read:--

> "Therefore leaving the word of the beginning of Christ, let us go on unto perfection."

This "perfection" we see to be the parallel with the "rest" of chapter iv. by observing the second half of chapter vi.:--

"Things that accompany salvation" (9).
"The full assurance of hope unto the end" (11).
"Followers of those who through faith and patience inherit the promises" (12).
"And so after he had patiently endured, he obtained the promise" (15).

In iv. 3 we read of works that were done since the overthrow of the world, and in ix. 25, 26 we read that Christ did not offer himself often as the High Priest who entered the Most Holy Place yearly with the blood of another, for in that case He must have suffered since the overthrow of the world.

The work of the six days' creation is brought into line with the work of redemption, as indeed it was a part. The rest that remaineth unto the people of God is a rest which follows completed work. The epistle will go on to develop the twofold character of this rest. It will first of all shew it to be the result of the great finished work of Christ Whose one offering caused the oft-repeated sacrifice of the law to "rest" (pauō = cease) from being offered (Heb. x. 2). And secondly it will shew it to be the result by grace of that faith which obtained promises and was the substance of things hoped for. Sabbath succeeding work is not gospel, it is reward.

"Let us labour therefore", while we at the same time rest in the finished work of Christ.

#27. Sword and Sympathy (iv. 12-16).
pp. 152 - 155

It is tolerably certain that in the book of the Revelation the Lord Jesus Christ enters into His office as the great King-Priest, "after the order of Melchisedec" (see Psa. cx.). This brings the Apocalypse and the epistle to the Hebrews into line. The fact too that both books treat of the overcomer and the New Jerusalem will add to this sense of similarity. In our last paper we were considering the "rest that remaineth unto the people of God", and in Revelation that rest is materialized. There too we have the words:--

> "Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord from henceforth: Yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labours; and their works do follow them" (Rev. xiv. 13).

The concluding verses of Heb. iv. contain a two-fold presentation of Christ: (1) as He appears to the seven churches (Rev. ii., iii.); and (2) as the merciful High Priest, Who can sympathize with His people's weaknesses.

> "For the word of God is quick and powerful, sharper than any two-edged sword, piercing even to the dividing asunder of soul and spirit, and of the joints and marrow, and is a discerner of the thoughts and intents of the heart. Neither is there any creature that is not manifest in His sight: but all things are naked and opened unto the eyes of Him to Whom we might give an account" (Heb. iv. 12, 13).

In Rev. ii. 12-16 Christ says:--

> "These things saith He which hath the sharp sword with two edges . . . . . Repent; or else I will come unto thee quickly, and will fight against them with the sword of My mouth."

The words spoken to each of the seven churches are searching indeed. Their works are known, the One Who speaks is a Judge of the thoughts and intents of the heart. His purpose too is to lead them on to "perfection", or as the Revelation words it to "overcome". So in Heb. iv. the searching statements of verses 12 and 13 are addressed to those who are being urged to endure to the end.

Some commentators say that the reference in Heb. iv. 12 is exclusively to the written Word, while others maintain that it can only refer to the living Word. It is evident that somewhere before verse 12 the personal element is introduced. The simplest view seems to be that which is expressed in the figure of Rev. i. 16, "And out of His mouth went a sharp two-edged sword", and Rev. xix. 13, "His name is called The Word of God". The apostle, in Heb. iv. 12, 13, speaks of Christ together with the Word using it for His people's good. There is possibly a reference also to that specific passage of the Word which underlies the apostle's argument, viz., Psa. xcv., which he referred to as the words of the Holy Ghost. That Psalm is still "living and energetic". The Lord can still use it to reveal the vital difference between "soul and spirit". This is a distinction that is not kept clear in the minds of many of the Lord's people.

Much that enters into Church life, witness and worship, if viewed in the pure light of the Word, would prove to be of the soul rather than the spirit. While body, soul and spirit compose the complete man, the highest service and the only acceptable worship is that of the spirit. Philippians, the epistle of the Prize, shews that discernment is necessary:--

> "And this I pray that your love may abound yet more and more in knowledge and in all discernment; that ye may try the things that differ; that ye may be sincere and without offence till the day of Christ" (i. 9, 10).

II Timothy, the epistle of the Crown, also urges discernment:--

> "Study to show thyself approved unto God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the Word of truth" (ii. 15).

Hebrews, the epistle of the Perfecting, also reveals the need for discernment. Soul and spirit must be kept distinct.

The last words of verse 13 read in the A.V. "with Whom we have to do". In Heb. xiii. 17 the word rendered "do" (logos) in iv. 13 is translated "account", and this is its meaning in Heb. iv.: "To Whom we must give an account". The atmosphere is that of the Judgment Seat of Christ, and verses 12 & 13 leave the mind impressed with the "terror of the Lord". This is but one side of truth however. There is another, which equally impresses us with infinite sympathy, tender care, wondrous grace, and bids us to come "boldly". That other phase is expressed in Heb. iv. 14-16:--

> "Seeing then that we have a great high priest, Who has passed through the heavens, Jesus the Son of God, let us hold fast our profession."

Here is the first exhortation. With this chapter iii. opened:--

> "Wherefore, holy brethren, partakers of the heavenly calling, consider the Apostle and High Priest of our profession, Christ Jesus, Who was faithful."

We have turned aside to consider the unfaithful of Israel and their forfeiture, turn again and see in Him the great Captain and Perfecter of faith, Who, for the joy set before Him, endured the cross, despising the shame and is set down at the right hand of the throne of God. An added reason for continuance is given in iv. 15, 16:--

> "For we have not an high priest which cannot be touched (sympathize) with the feeling of our infirmities; but was in all points tempted like as we are, APART FROM SIN."

God never tempts a man to sin. Temptation is an essential feature in the record of the race and the crown, but that temptation which is of the nature of trials and tests. Temptation which springs from our own sinful selves is another matter. James clearly distinguishes between the two sorts of temptations in the first chapter of his epistle:--

> "Count it all joy, my brethren, when ye fall into divers temptations . . . . . blessed is the man that endureth temptation; for when he is tried he shall receive the crown of life" (verses 2 and 12).

That is the temptation of Hebrews and of Revelation. The other kind of temptation to which Heb. iv. takes exception is next reviewed by James:--

> "Let no man say when he is tempted, I am tempted of God: for God cannot be tempted with evil, neither tempteth He any man; but every man is tempted, when he is drawn away of his own lust and enticed" (i. 13, 14).

Just as iv. 14 looked back to iii. 1, 2, we find iv. 15 looking back to ii. 18:--

> "For in that He Himself hath suffered being tempted, He is able to succour them that are tempted."

An example of the temptation that is intended in ii.-iv. is found in Heb. xi. 17:--

> "By faith, Abraham, when he was tempted, offered up Isaac."

Whatever the temptation may be through which we may be called to pass, it is a comfort to know that He who sits at the right hand above was made partaker of flesh and blood, was tempted like as we are, apart from sin, and is "able to sympathize with our weaknesses".

> "Let us therefore come boldly unto the throne of grace, that we may obtain mercy, and find grace to help in time of need" (iv. 16).

#28. The High Priest of our Profession (v. 1-6).
pp. 187 - 189

The way in which the High Priesthood of Christ comes before and immediately after the great type of Israel in the wilderness indicates that it is vitally associated with the attaining to the perfectness which is the great theme of the epistle, and of which the entry into the land of Canaan was a type. The link is more closely revealed by the words of iii. 1 "The Apostle and High Priest of our PROFESSION", for we have seen that this "profession" or "confession" is also related to the great theme of Heb. iv. 14.

In chapter iii. 1 Christ is presented as (1) Apostle, (2) High Priest. The first title is compared and contrasted with Moses. In some points the comparison holds good, "He was faithful AS also Moses was". In other points Christ rises superior to Moses. Moses was a servant, Christ a son. The same method is adopted with respect to the second title. This is compared and contrasted with Aaron in chapter v. 1-5. Christ fulfilled the qualifications which were essentially vital to the priesthood as set forth in the call of Aaron. He was "taken from among men". Chapter ii. 14 has already emphasized this:--

> "Forasmuch then as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, He also Himself likewise took part of the same."

There are many solemn and weighty reasons why Christ should have been made flesh. This is one of them. He was "ordained for men", and could never have been High Priest on their behalf if He had not been made like unto His brethren. Every priest had to do with the offering of sacrifices, "that he may offer both gifts and sacrifices". In this, too, the Saviour was fully manifested as true High Priest:--

> "For every High Priest is ordained to offer gifts and sacrifices; wherefore it is necessary that this man have somewhat also to offer" (viii. 3).

and chapters ix. & x. go on to show how infinitely great was the offering He made. Another phase of the high priest's mission, and one which some views of the great atonement are apt to slight or set aside, is that he is one:-- > "Who is able to have compassion on the ignorant, and on them that are out of the way; for that he himself is compassed with infirmity, And by reason hereof he ought, as for the people, so also for himself, to offer for sins" (v. 2, 3).

In these words we have a comparison and a contrast. As in the case of Moses the type breaks down. Christ was "touched with the feeling of our infirmities", yet the words immediately added, because of the words to be written in v. 2, 3, SIN EXCEPTED. In vii. 26, 27 the contrast is maintained:--

> "For such an High Priest became us, who is holy, blameless, undefiled, separate from sinners, and made higher than the heavens: Who needeth not daily, as those High Priests, to offer up sacrifices, first for his own sins, and then for the people's: for this He did once, when He offered up Himself."

There are many contrasts brought out in this epistle between the priesthood of Aaron and that of Christ. This is the first and fundamental one. He was without sin. He was holy. He was without blemish.

Then further, there is no usurpation of office by Christ. Aaron was called of God, so also was Christ. Neither the "honour" nor the "glory" did He take to Himself. Chapter ii. 9 shows us Christ crowned with glory and honour, because of the suffering of death. Here the two words (v. 4, 5) are connected with priesthood. Peter uses them of the Transfiguration, (II Pet. i. 16-18), and Psa. viii. 5 uses them of Adam and Christ in dominion over all things. A similar connection is seen by the quotation from Psa. ii. 7, "Thou art My Son, this day have I begotten Thee". Heb. i. & ii. use the statement to show the Lord's superiority over angels, particularly in connection with a "throne" and the "world to come". Chapter v. uses it with reference to the priesthood, thereby fulfilling the prophetic utterance of Zech. vi. 13, "He shall be a priest upon His Throne". This introduces the peculiar character of Christ's dual office, a King-Priest. Of this Order Aaron was not the type, for kingship and priesthood were kept apart with the utmost severity, as Uzziah learned to his life-long regret. This is none other than a priesthood after the Order of Melchisedec.

The introduction of this name demands prayerful attention. It is closely related with the great theme of the epistle and its various aspects demand at least an article to itself. This we must attempt in our next paper.

The Eight Signs of John's Gospel.

#7. The Raising of Lazarus (xi.).
pp. 8 - 11

We reach, in this seventh sign, the lowest depths of Israel's night. In the parallel sign—the second (iv. 46-54)—the ruler's son was "at the point of death", and the cry was, "Come down ere my child die". In this sign death has come, "Lazarus is dead", and the cry is, "Lord, if Thou hadst been here, my brother had not died". While the second sign shows the national life almost flickering out, the seventh shows life extinct.

In the sign of the healing of the blind man the Lord said that the man was not born blind because of his own sin or that of his parents, but that the works of God should be made manifest in him. In the seventh sign a somewhat similar expression occurs:--

> "This sickness is not with a view to death merely (free rendering of pros), but for the glory of God, that the Son of God might be glorified thereby" (xi. 4).

In all the eight signs there is some element of test; something that necessitates faith apart from sight or evidences:--

1. THE MARRIAGE AT CANA.—Woman! what have I to do with thee? (ii. 4).
2. THE RULER'S SON.—Except ye see signs and wonders (iv. 48).
3. THE IMPOTENT MAN.—Wilt thou be made whole? (v. 6).
4. THE FEEDING OF THE 5,000.—Whence shall we buy bread? (vi. 5).
5. THE WALKING ON THE SEA.—Jesus had not yet come (vi. 17).
6. THE MAN BORN BLIND.—The works of God manifested (ix. 3).
7. THE RAISING OF LAZARUS.—Not death, but the glory of God (xi. 4).
8. THE DRAUGHT OF FISHES.—Have ye any meat? (xxi. 5).

It is not always possible to understand the reasons for the many dispensational dealings of God, but one thing we know, that whatever the outward appearance may seem He abides faithful; He is still the God of love.

This is prominently brought forward in this seventh sign. We know from other sources of the love that existed between the Lord and the family at Bethany. In this chapter before us we are told, "Now Jesus loved Martha, and her sister, and Lazarus"; but instead of continuing "Therefore as soon as He heard of Lazarus' sickness, He hastened to his bedside and healed him", we read the following strange sequence, "When He had heard therefore that he was sick, He abode two days still in the same place where He was". All through those days one prayer was uppermost in the sisters' mind and heart. "If only the Lord would come." Separately each sister utters her heart's burden when she did meet the Lord. "Lord, if Thou hadst been here, my brother had not died" (xi. 21, 32). Those "two days" may have a variety of individual interpretations, but most know something of their anxiety and despair. Dispensationally too Israel will say:--

> "After two days He will revive us, and the third day He will raise us up, and we shall live in His sight" (Hos. vi. 2).

There is an ever widening circle of influence exhibited in the development of the sign. Starting from the centre of all we have the glory of God, and the extreme circumference reaches to "the people that stand by". This may be better seen as follows:--

1. The glory of God (xi. 4).
2. The glorifying of the Son of God (xi. 4).
3. The faith of the disciples (xi. 5).
4. The faith of Martha (xi. 25-27, 40).
5. The people that stood by (xi. 42).
6. Many of the Jews (xi. 45).

When Martha met the Lord she said:--

> "Lord, if Thou hadst been here, my brother had not died, but I know that even now, whatsoever Thou wilt ask of God, God will give it Thee" (John xi. 21, 22).

Vaguely Martha seemed to feel that even now in some strange way she need not abandon hope. When the Lord put her unshaped thoughts before her in the simple words, "Thy brother shall rise again", Martha's faith recoiled, as it were, for she said, "I know that he shall rise again in the resurrection at the last day". This was not, however, the secret hope that had prompted her first words. The Lord recalls her mind from the "last day" to Himself and the present. Knowing something of the feeling of human helplessness in the presence of death, we can in some small degree appreciate the majesty and the triumph of the Lord's reply to Martha:--

> "I am the resurrection and the life: he that believeth in Me, though he were dead, yet shall he live: and whosoever is alive and believeth in Me shall never die. Believest thou this?" (John xi. 25, 26).

The Gospel of John contains a wondrous series of statements made by Christ characterized by the expression "I AM". In Himself the Lord Jesus is the great "I AM".

> "Before Abraham was , I am" (viii. 58).
> "I am; be not afraid" (vi. 20).
