The Lord did not die to save us from dying, He died to save us from death. There is much teaching connected with this fact that must occupy our attention, but which lies outside the immediate scope of our enquiry. The great work of the kinsman Redeemer is expressed in I Cor. xv. 22, "For as in Adam all die, even so in Christ, shall all be made alive". The "all in Adam" are those for whom the great "division" and "stepping over" (padah and pesach) by the kinsman (gaal) has been made. It is impossible to predicate both universality and division of redemption, one or the other must be false. The doctrine of the two seeds, whether seen in Cain and Abel, or in Israel and the Egyptians, fits the whole case and cannot be ignored. Reconciliation and atonement cannot be deduced from redemption; they belong to an entirely different sphere. As related themes, we must deal with the teaching of the various sacrifices offered under the law, but such a study demands a section to itself.

A word may be necessary in conclusion on the occurrence of the word "redemption" in Heb. ix. 12, 15, because at first sight it would appear that the setting of these words contradicts our findings. The redemption of Heb. ix. 12 is an "aionian redemption", and is connected with "the blood of the aionian covenant" (xiii. 20). Now this covenant is vitally connected with an "aionian inheritance" (ix. 15). An inheritance that was forfeited could only be regained by redemption, and inasmuch as transgressing the terms of the covenant was the occasion of the forfeiture, we have the strange expression, "the redemption of the transgressions that were under the first covenant" (ix. 15), and in the circumstances the apparent exceptional use of the word redemption is justified. This is seen the more clearly when we remember:--

1. Redemption deals with Adam, his sin, his forfeiture, his death, all of which pass through to his seed.
2. Israel in type set forth this in their failure to keep the terms of the old covenant. Consequently their recovery to favour, to inheritance, and to the blessings of the new covenant are also due to a redemption, but this time, for distinction, the inheritance is called aionian, the covenant aionian, and the redemption aionian.

A similar difficulty may arise over the occurrence of redemption in Rom. iii. 24. The previous verse says, "For all sinned, and are coming short of the glory of God". The two tenses "all sinned" and "are coming short" take the mind back to Adam's "sin", and then to individual "sins". Sin needs redemption: sins need propitiation; hence in verse 24 we have redemption followed by the "mercy seat" in verse 25. This observes the same order that we have pointed out already. The "mercy seat" is for none but a redeemed people.

It is only natural that the presentation of a new aspect of truth should be beset by difficulties. These arise both from lack of clarity on the part of the writer, and from the pressure of accepted teaching on the part of the reader. A pioneer will often make mistakes, but small retractions do not prove that the whole course is wrong. Our readers are not "babes" but Bereans, and we desire to be free to share our discoveries in divine truth while their freshness is unsullied by too much handling and paring. "We have redemption through His blood"—let us glorify Him by seeking a true understanding of this purchased of His cross.

#10. The way out and the way in.
pp. 89 - 91

We have on different occasions found that a truth has been expressed in The Berean Expositor, but that owing to a somewhat compressed style of writing, which our limited space necessitates, such teaching has passed unheeded largely because we have not stayed long enough to give it prominence and expansion. In our last paper we sought to draw the distinction which is observable in Scripture between redemption and atonement, but feeling that the second aspect may not have been expressed fully enough, we give it space here.

The exodus.

Proof was given that redemption is the great exodus of the Lord's people. It leads them out, out of bondage, out of death, out of darkness, out of spiritual Egypt. We saw that redemption in its primary character is unconnected with altar, priest or tabernacle. Now if redemption is expressed by the Greek word exodos, the atonement may be expressed by the Greek word eisodos. This latter word occurs in Heb. x. 19-22:--

"Having therefore, brethren, boldness respecting the eisodos, the entrance into, the holiest by the blood of Jesus . . . . . let us draw near."

The same order may be observed in the epistle to the Ephesians, chapter i., exodos; chapter ii., eisodos.

REDEMPTION.—"In Whom we have redemption through His blood, the forgiveness of sins" (i. 7).

The word "forgiveness" (aphesis) is translated in Luke iv. 18 "deliverance" and "to set at liberty". There is another word which should be reserved for the idea of "forgiveness", which is used in Eph. iv. 32. Redemption leads out, it sets at liberty, it delivers.

ATONEMENT.—"Ye who sometime were far off are made nigh by the blood of Christ" (ii. 13).

Here we have the complement to redemption. That leads us out, this leads us in.

Following redemption the Spirit seals with a view to the purchased inheritance. Following atonement the Spirit gives access and builds us up into a holy temple. It is not only helpful in a general sense, but it is also a scriptural principle, that in the mouth of two or three witnesses every word shall be established. We will therefore give the testimony of Peter as well as of Paul.

REDEMPTION.—Ye were not redeemed with corruptible things, as silver and gold, from (ek) your vain conversation . . . . . but with the precious blood of Christ, as of a lamb without blemish and without spot" (I Pet. i. 18, 19).

ATONEMENT.—"Christ also hath once suffered for sins, the just for the unjust, that He might bring us (pros) to God" (I Pet. iii. 18).

Here we have once again redemption from and atonement to. The word "to bring" in I Pet. iii. 18 (prosagoge) is translated "access" in Eph. ii. 18. The same order and effect is observed in Titus ii. 14:--

"Who gave Himself for us, that He might redeem us FROM (apo) all iniquity, and purify unto Himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works."

John's Gospel opens with the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world, and his Epistle opens with the cleansing power of the blood for all who have fellowship and the propitiation for their sins. The Gospel is in order that sinners may believe. The Epistle is in order that saints may know: redemption and atonement once again. Reconciliation does not arise out of redemption, but out of atonement. Moreover (in spite of the usual indiscriminate use of the term) atonement is not for unsaved sinners. None but the redeemed could have an interest in the atonement. Israel had first to be delivered from the thraldom of Egypt before they could learn of the way into the holiest.

The one offering of Christ, the once shed blood is both our redemption and our atonement, both our way out and our way in, but that does not mean that we are to be careless in the use of these solemn terms, or to allow false argument to be built up from their confusion. Gen. iii. and iv. present a similar sequence, Gen. iii. indicating redemption, and Gen. iv. atonement.

We do not intend making this a lengthy article, nor dealing with any other feature. We shall have to give attention to the teaching of both Old and New Testaments respecting the atonement, and the related offerings, but that we must do in another paper. Let us remember with gratitude the exodos and the eisodos, the leading out and the leading in, that are ours through the blood of Christ. We trust that the reader will, moreover, realize that we are here using the word "atonement" in a very general way, as a convenient term to set over against "redemption".

#11. Atonement: a covering by cancellation.
pp. 118 - 124

The essential difference between redemption and atonement has been discussed in preceding articles. It will, however, be convenient to include the study of the doctrine of atonement as a branch of the wider theme of redemption. This we now propose to do. A glance at the concordance reveals a long column of references under the word "atonement" for the O.T., but one reference only for the N.T., and if our concordance notifies us of the changes made in the R.V., we shall find that even that one N.T. reference disappears.

Atonement: is it a N.T. doctrine?

The alteration of the word "atonement" in the A.V. of Rom. v. 11 is justified on the ground of correct interpretation and the avoidance of false connections. The ordinary reader would naturally assume that Rom. v. 11 referred back to the O.T. equivalents. The Greek word translated atonement here is katallage, but whilst the LXX version uses more than twenty Greek words to translate the Hebrew word "atonement", it never uses katallage. Apart from this possibility of making a false connection, atonement is quite as good a rendering as reconciliation, for the English word at the time of and preceding the A.V. bore the meaning at-one-ment, a meaning abundantly proved by more than one passage in Shakespeare. What does seem to be a pity is that the word was employed in the O.T. It is too deeply imbedded to think of removing or altering it, so we must rid our minds of anything that pertains merely to the English word, and seek the meaning warranted by studying the original. Before we do so, however, we must answer the question that arises, Is atonement a N.T. doctrine?

Now we can easily trip here. It does not follow that those who say that the atonement is not a N.T. doctrine deny the sacrificial work of Christ. What they mean is something like this: "The conception of the O.T. atonement is not full enough to set forth the actual work of Christ. That merely covered sin, He puts it away." If the Hebrew conception does really mean a mere covering up, then we are sure that Christ's work was something infinitely more blessed and perfect. We do not, however, believe this is a true presentation of the O.T. doctrine, and therefore reject it. On the other hand it does not follow that because the one word "atonement" is expunged by the R.V. that the doctrine itself is not found in the N.T. This we would prove in two ways. (1) by the presence of the actual word, and (2) by the presence of the results that alone follow it. By the presence of the actual word we mean of course the Greek equivalent, and not the English.

We must anticipate our O.T. investigation so far as to say that "mercy-seat" is from the Hebrew kapporeth, from kaphar, which is rendered "atonement" 72 times. Now the Greek translation of kapporeth is hilasterion, which is found in Heb. ix. 5. We read in Rom. iii. 25 that "God has set forth (Christ) as a propitiation through faith in His blood", and the word propitiation is hilasterion ("mercy-seat"). Moreover, hilaskomai and hilasmos are Septuagint renderings also of kaphar, and these occur in I John ii. 2 and iv. 10 where the epistle is not speaking of redemption, but cleansing by blood; of those who walk in the light, and who have an Advocate with the Father. Hence the word "propitiation" in these two passages speaks of atonement and atoning blood. So hilaskomai is used in Heb. ii. 17, where the R.V. alters the A.V. rendering to "propitiation". Here we have a series of definite references to the O.T. doctrine of atonement. But more than that, when the Lord used the word "ransom" in Matt. xx. 28, He used a word which is used several times to translate kopher, viz., lutron. So also the words katharizo and katharismos have undoubted reference to the atoning work of Christ, being used by the LXX to translate kaphar, and are used in such passages as the following:--

> "When He had by Himself purged our sins, sat down" (Heb. i. 3).
> "How much more shall the blood of Christ . . . . . purged your conscience" (Heb. ix. 14).
> "If we walk in the light . . . . . we have fellowship . . . . . and the blood cleanseth" (I John i. 7).

In each of the above passages one would be justified, with the O.T. rendering in view, to put the words "make atonement" where "purge" and "cleanse" occur. Moreover, hagiazo is used to translate kaphar, and brings in the many passages which speak of sanctification in connection with the blood Christ. To these examples must be added the effects of atonement such as "access", "fellowship", "acceptance", "made nigh", etc., which run through the teaching of the N.T. Surely we need go no further to find our answer to the question, Is atonement a N.T. doctrine, and does it describe adequately one phase of the work of Christ? If Christ be a propitiation, if He gave His life a ransom, if His blood cleanses and sanctifies the redeemed, then undoubtedly the O.T. doctrine of atonement as surely as the O.T. doctrine of redemption finds its fulfillment in the sacrifice and priestly ministry of Christ.

What does the O.T. word "atonement" mean?

There is hardly a student of Scripture worthy of the name who does not know that the Hebrew word translated atonement means "to cover". It may therefore be deemed a waste of time to ask the question again. Yet when we say "to cover", are we sure that we all mean the same thing? "To cover" may mean "to hide", or "to conceal"; it also may mean "to shelter or protect". It further means "to be sufficient for", "to comprehend" and "to include", "to compensate for damage done". Which of these meanings do we intend when we say that atonement means "to cover"? That question can only be answered by an examination of the original words and their varied usage.

The words translated "atonement".

Every occurrence of the word atonement in the O.T. is a translation of kaphar, or one of its derivatives. Both the noun and the verb occur together for the first time in Gen. vi. 14, where the words are used in a non-doctrinal sense, and are therefore all the more valuable.

> "Make thee an ark of gopher wood . . . . . thou shall pitch (kaphar) it within and without with pitch (kaphar)."

The LXX renders the words in question: "asphaltoseis auten te asphalto", which words are easily recognized as our English asphalt or bitumen. We need be no students of divinity to understand why Noah was instructed to use "pitch"; it was simply to keep the water out. Another non-doctrinal use of the word is found in I Sam. vi. 18, where it is translated "village", and answers to the Arabic khephre, which is observable in Caper-naum, and Chephar-haammonai in Josh. xviii. 24. Yet another use of the word is found in Song of Sol. i. 14, and iv. 13, where kopher is translated "camphire". This is an odoriferous shrub named henna in almost universal use in Egypt and many parts of the East for "staining" the skin and the nails. We have therefore the idea of protecting from a deluge, as in the pitch used on the ark, a shelter or home as in the village, and a stain as in the henna plant.

We now come nearer to the doctrinal meaning of the word by noticing the way in which kopher is used in connection with the law. We have "a sum of money" laid upon a man for the ransom of his life (Exod. xxi. 30); a "ransom" described as "atonement money" (Exod. xxx. 12, 16); a "satisfaction" for a life forfeited (Numb. xxxv. 31, 32); a "bribe" (I Sam. xii. 3 and Amos v. 12). In none of these passages is there the idea of "covering" in the sense of concealing, but "covering" in the sense of compensating for damage done, and in the sense of a "bribe" covering the eyes of the judge as Deut. xvi. 19 declares: "for the gift doth blind the eyes." The plural form kippurim is translated atonement or atonements in all passages, and for the sake of exactness, users of Young's Analytical Concordance should note that the second entry in some editions (Exod. xxx. 10) is inserted in error; there are only eight references. To complete the score of translations we must add:--

HOAR FROST which covers the ground (Exod. xvi. 14).
BASONS, that probably had lids (I Chron. xxviii. 17), and LION from its habit of lurking in dens or coverts (Jer. xxv. 38).

The feminine form kaphoreth is translated "mercy seat" in each of its 27 occurrences. So far we have considered the usage of the noun. The verb kaphar is translated in the A.V. as follows: To appease, pacify, put off, cleanse, disannul, pitch with their various verbal modifications, such as "make reconciliation", which we have not chronicled. These translations account for 29 occurrences. The remaining 72 are translated by the word "atonement". The only passage, apart from Gen. vi. 14, that uses kaphar before the law given in Exodus is Gen. xxxii. 20, "I will appease him with the present". We are all, alas, too truly human to pretend that we do not understand Jacob's action and motive. He had prayed for deliverance from the hand of Esau, for he knew he had wronged him in days gone by. So he took for his brother Esau a present of goats, sheep, camels, cows, and asses. When Esau asked Jacob, "What meanest thou by all these droves that I met?" Jacob replied, "These are to find grace in the sight of my lord" (Gen. xxxiii.8). When Esau would have refused the gift, Jacob urges him saying:--

> "If I have FOUND GRACE in thy sight, then receive my present at my hand, for therefore have I seen thy face, as though I had seen the face of God, and thou wast pleased with me" (verse 10).

Here is Jacob's own interpretation of what he meant when he said, "I will appease him with the present". Any attempt to use the idea of "covering" (except perhaps as Rotherham renders the passage, "I will cover his face with the present", and so shelter myself from his anger) yields no congruous meaning. The at-one-ment or reconciliation was the result; the present the basis or cause. This is an example of the idea of a covering being applied to the person. We have atonement applied to sin as well as to the sinner: "Deliver us, and purge away our sins" (Psa. lxxix. 9). Surely the Psalmist did not merely mean "cover up our sins"? Rather, has he not expressed his meaning in verse 8: "O Remember not against us former iniquities"? In some cases the idea of "covering by a full and equivalent compensation", in short "an eye for an eye", is to be found, as in Numb. xxxv. 31-33:--

> "Ye shall take no satisfaction for the life of a murderer . . . . . the land cannot be cleansed of the blood that is shed therein, but by the blood of him who shed it."

What sense is there in saying: "The land cannot be covered of the blood" unless we intend covering by compensation, and so canceling? This comes out prominently in another case. Suppose a man is found in the country, slain. No one knows who the murderer is. Yet blood has been shed. The elders of the city that is nearest to the spot are obliged to offer an heifer, and to wash their hands over its dead body, affirming their innocence, and praying that innocent blood be not laid to their charge. The passage concludes: "And the blood shall be forgiven them" (Deut. xxi. 1-9). The word in verse 8, "be merciful" is kaphar, and in verse 9 we read as an explanation: "so shalt thou put away the guilt of innocent blood." Therefore "covered" sin is sin "put away", for God says so. That this "putting away" was no mere "covering up" the false prophet knew when he was put to death (Deut. xiii. 5), and the idolators knew when they were stoned (Deut. xvii. 6, 7). To put away the evil is interpreted in Deut. xix. 21 as "life shall go for life, eye for eye, tooth for tooth, hand for hand, foot for foot". Is this "covering up" sin? Is it not "covering" in the sense of canceling by an equivalent? This is the way in which the word is used in Isa. xxviii. 18: "Your covenant with death shall be disannulled." Does this mean "covered up" or does it not mean "cancelled"?

Amplifications of atonement.

Did not the Psalmist have the meaning of the atonement in mind when he said:--

> "Blessed is he whose transgression is forgiven, whose sin is covered. Blessed is the man unto whom the Lord imputeth not iniquity" (Psa. xxxii. 1, 2)?

Sin covered is sin forgiven and not imputed. Then again, is not atonement in view in the passages which speak of "blotting out" sin? Upon the occasion of the golden calf Moses said: "Peradventure I shall make an atonement for your sin . . . . . if not, blot me, I pray Thee, out of Thy book . . . . ." (Exod. xxxii. 30-32). Again, when David prayed: "Blot out my transgressions", and "Hide Thy face from my sins, and blot out mine iniquities" (Psa. li. 1, 9), there is a twofold reference to the "covering" by atonement, viz., "blot out" as to sins, and "hide" as to God's face.

Moreover verse 14 shows that David had traveled beyond the type, and was looking forward to Christ, for the law provided no atonement for the murderer. In Isa. xliii. 25 "blotting out" is explained by "not remembering". In Isa. xliv. 22 a little revision is necessary:--

> "I have dissipated thy transgressions like a cloud, and thine iniquities like a vapour" (Spurrell's Trans.).

So complete is this "blotting out" that it is used of the utter destruction caused by the flood (Gen. vii. 4). Another parallel is found in Isa. xxxviii. 17: "Thou hast cast all my sins behind Thy back." If the eyes of the Lord are in every place, beholding the evil and the good, where can "behind His back" be but annihilation? No mere "covering up" can hide from His presence. Micah vii. 19 says: "Thou wilt cast all their sins into the depths of the sea." Now no sea is so deep that He cannot see its bottom. The context speaks of "pardoning iniquity", and "passing by transgressions" as synonymous expressions. One more example will suffice:--

> "As far as the east is from the west, so far hath He removed our transgressions from us" (Psa. ciii. 12).

Sin therefore if atoned for is said to be covered, not imputed, forgiven, blotted out, cast behind God's back, and removed as far as east is from west. These passages do not occur in the N.T., but in the O.T. They were uttered by men who knew the true meaning of atonement, and from them we learn and not from modern speculators. The subject is too sacred, too profound, too vital for anything trifling or speculative. We desire the rock of truth beneath our feet, and thank God we have found it.

The atonement, with the meaning that emerges from the great number of examples we have surveyed, is affirmed of the burnt offering, guilt offering, sin offering, the blood itself, the ram for the installation of the priest, the meal and peace offering, the half shekel, the appointment of the Levites, the incense, the punishment of a sinner, the offering of the spoils of war, and the blood of a murderer. Are we acquainted with all these urges, their contexts, their self-explanations? Until we are, what is the worth of our opinion? These and other features we hope to deal with in subsequent papers. Let us rejoice in that precious blood which not only redeemed us (Eph. i. 7), but made us nigh (Eph. ii. 13), and praise and adore Him who so loved us as to shed that blood as a propitiation for our sins.

#12. The five offerings of Leviticus.

pp. 150 - 152

We have seen in previous articles the necessity for keeping the conception of redemption distinct from that of atonement, although in reality both the redemption and the atonement of Christ were wrought by one and the selfsame offering. Drawing nearer to the question of atonement itself, we shall find that it has a five-fold significance, and that this five-fold aspect is set forth with great care and elaboration in the opening chapter of the book of Leviticus.

It is possible that some of our readers will be aware of the fact that atonement is not predicated of the meat offering, nor of the peace offering in Lev. ii. and iii. We find, however, that it is connected with the meat and peace offerings in conjunction with the burnt offering in Ezek. xlv. 15-17.

The five offerings as a group.

Each offering has its own peculiar mission, and sets forth some one distinctive aspect of the work of Christ, but we shall appreciate the distinctions when we see how they all blend into one harmonious whole.

A | The burnt offering. All claims of God and man perfectly met.
B | The meat offering. Inherent holiness. All frankincense.
C | The peace offering. Communion. God and man partake.
B | The sin offering. Inherent sinfulness. Ashes.
A | The trespass offering. The claims of God and man. The double tithe.

To establish the inter-relation suggested in this arrangement will necessitate a patient study of the separate offerings, but a brief anticipation of our findings may not be out of place. The burnt offering is entirely devoted to God. All except the skin (which typifies righteousness) is consumed upon the altar. This symbolizes the perfect accordance with the will of God that was ever manifested in the Lord Jesus Christ, and how throughout His life on earth he met every claim of God and neighbour.

The meat offering is often associated with the burnt offering (see Numb. xxix. 6, 13 and 14). There is no blood shed in this case. Fine flour, oil and frankincense speak of inherent sinlessness, the addition of salt and the exclusion of both honey and leaven emphasizing its spiritual character. Before the question of sin is dealt with we have these positive relations set forth. On the other hand we have man's need and its remedy.

The trespass offering is the burnt offering plus sin. In both cases that which is due to God and man is met. But in the trespass offering there is the addition of the "fifth part", a making of amends. So with the sin offering. This deals with inherent sin, What I am rather than what I do; it is the meat offering plus sin. When both aspects of the divine demands have been met, common ground is found in the central offering, "The peace offering", where all parties concerned (God, the sinner, and the priest) find ground for peace and communion.

The spiritual reader will be awakened to the possibilities of real light and teaching from a contemplation of these most important offerings a careful consideration, and to devote a separate article to each one. There is, however, a necessary preliminary study that can be done here, which is to investigate wherein these five offerings differ the one from the other.

Things that differ.

THE BURNT OFFERING.—This like the meat offering and the peace offering is a sweet savour. In this it differs from both the sin offering and the trespass offering. It is offered "for acceptance". This is one of its peculiar distinctions. It was the offering of life-blood. In this it differed from the meat offering. It was wholly burnt; no part was eaten by either offerer of priest. The skin alone was reserved. It made "an atonement for him", whereas in the sin offering it makes "an atonement for him as concerning his sin", and issues in "forgiveness".

THE MEAT OFFERING.—This also was a sweet savour offering, and so contrasted with both sin and trespass offerings. It differs from all the others in the nature of the offerings themselves. Flour, oil, frankincense and salt. No blood was shed, no life given. It was not wholly burnt. Some part was reserved for Aaron and his sons.

THE PEACE OFFERING.—It was a sweet savour offering, and so grouped with the two former, but its chief feature is found in the emphasis upon communion. God, the offerer, and the priest all find common food together.

THE SIN OFFERING.—This is not a sweet savour offering. It was not burnt upon the altar, but in the place of ashes outside the camp. It was specially for sin as distinct from trespass. (The reference in Lev. iv. 31 will be dealt with in the article dealing with the sin offering).

THE TRESPASS OFFERING.—The chief distinction is in the element of restitution, the making amends by the payment of the principal, and the addition of a fifth part.

We learn from these points of difference something of the fulness of the sacrifice of Christ for us. Both our sin and our trespass have been dealt with before God, and the full acceptance that inheres in a complete whole-hearted obedience to the claims of God and our neighbour is ours by virtue of the same offering. In Christ both sinful man and a Holy God find common ground, "He is our peace". Seeing that these typical sacrifices promise so much light upon the foundation of our salvation, we trust that none will think the time ill-spent that patiently and prayerfully weighs over these weighty words of God in the balances of the sanctuary.

#13. The whole burnt offerings.

Having looked at the five offerings of Leviticus as a whole, we must now consider each separately. The scriptural title for this offering is olah, or the "ascending" offering, referring apparently to the fact that this offering is wholly consumed upon the altar, and that its fragrance ascends in the smoke. While each offering has some peculiar feature that marks it off from the rest, there is one feature common to them all, and that is expressed by the word "satisfaction". This, however, is true if we have a broad view of the word satisfaction, for in the case of the burnt offering and the meat offering sin is not in view.

It is natural but not scriptural to limit the satisfaction rendered by the Lord Jesus to the Father as related to human guilt, but was there no satisfaction in His spotless purity, His humble and wholehearted submission? When the closed heavens at length opened, and there was heard the voice of God saying, "This is My beloved Son, in Whom I am well pleased", it was uttered at the close of His private life, and the opening of His public ministry, long before He died the just for the unjust that He might bring us to God. The burnt offering and the meat offering speak only of satisfaction intrinsically. The sin offering and the trespass offering of satisfaction for sin. The peace offering of satisfaction that is mutual. The first occurrence of the burnt offering is found in Gen. viii. 20, 21:--

> "And Noah builded an altar unto the Lord; and took of every clean beast, and of every clean fowl, and offered burnt offerings on the altar. And the Lord smelled a SAVOUR OF REST."

Noah's offering was one of thanksgiving and dedication, and not an offering for sin. The same may be said of the offering of Isaac, where the burnt offering is mentioned six times. Its inner meaning is expressed in the words:--

> "Now I know that thou fearest God, seeing that thou hast not withheld thy son, thine only son from Me" (Gen. xxii. 12).

It is this aspect of sacrifice that comes first from God's point of view. Man, quite apart from sin, should render to God all that the burnt offering implies, although such an offering on his part is now absolutely impossible. Man must begin at the other end; trespass and sin must first of all be dealt with. Christ is presented in Lev. i. under three figures. He is the offerer, the offering, and the priest. The whole of His work was vicarious and "for us". While in the O.T. sinful man brings the offering himself, in the N.T. fulfillment it is God Who provides the Lamb, and it is Christ Who offers Himself.

Acceptance.

In verse 2 we read: "Ye shall bring your offering of the cattle," etc. Now the Hebrew word "bring" is qarab, which means "to draw near", and the Hebrew word "offering" is qorban, which means "what is brought near". Both words have the same triliteral root orb. So in the A.V. we find the verb sometimes translated "bring", and sometimes "offer" as it is in Lev. i. 2, 3, 10. An essential element in all the offerings is this one of drawing near, and of giving access. Not only access, but acceptance is involved. In verse 3 the A.V. reads: "He shall offer it of his own voluntary will."

The Hebrew word ratson is sometimes rendered "self will" and "our will". But just as the noun and verb qorban and qarab were seen to be allied, so in verse 4 the verb ratsah (translated "it shall be accepted") reflects upon the noun in the preceding verse. Verse 3 should be rendered: "He shall offer it for its acceptance." So then this wondrous offering may be said to be both for access and acceptance. Those who have, by grace, access, and who are accepted in the Beloved, make it their aim that they may be acceptable in their service. This is provided for in the burnt offering, for it was offered at the consecration of priests, levites, and kings, for the purification of Nazarites, and before battle. The three items that specially mark the burnt offerings are:--

1. It was a sacrifice of sweet savour.
2. It was offered for acceptance.
3. It was wholly burnt upon the altar, except the skin.

These offerings are called "The food of God" [see Lev. xxi. 17 (margin) and 21], and in the structure given on page 150 we sought to express the value of this offering by saying:--

> "A | The burnt offering. All claims of God and man perfectly met."

This is expressed very clearly in Eph. v. 2 where we read:--

> "Walk in love, as Christ also hath loved us, and hath given Himself for us an offering and a sacrifice to God for a sweet smelling savour."

and that such a high ideal of practical love is attainable Phil. iv. 8 testifies:--

> "I have all things and abound: I am full, having received of Epaphroditus the things which were sent from you, an odour of a sweet smell, a sacrifice acceptable, well pleasing to God."

Three degrees.

In the law of the burnt offering provision is made for the differing degrees of wealth among the various offerers. The burnt offering could be either a bullock, a lamb, or fowls. Bullock and bull are used interchangeably in the A.V., but it is well to remember that the true concept is a bull, for the term "bullock" to-day often means an animal that is not complete, and which is simply retained for fattening purposes. The three animals used in the burnt offering represent varying degrees of appreciation on the part of the believer, for while there is a great difference between the conception of the work of Christ as set forth by the bull and that set forth by the sheep, or that set forth by the doves and pigeons, the result Godward never changes. This is most blessed fact. While the appreciation of Paul may be represented by the bull, and the appreciation of the weakest child of God be set forth by the dove, yet in Christ and before God Paul is not one whit more accepted or safe than the weakest and the lowest. This can be seen if we set out the law of the offering in Lev. i.:--

A1 | Lev. i. 3-9-. THE BULLOCK. Put his hand on.
Accepted for him.
Animal flayed.
Parts exposed and detailed.
B1 | -9. THE RESULT. A burnt sacrifice, an offering made by fire, of a sweet savour unto the Lord.
A2 | 10-13-. THE SHEEP. No hand laid on.
No mention of acceptance.
No flaying of the animal.
No detailed parts.
B2 | -13. THE RESULT. A burnt sacrifice, an offering made by fire, of a sweet savour unto the Lord.
A3 | 14-17-. THE DOVES. No hand laid on.
No mention of acceptance.
Not all on the altar; some part cast beside the altar.
Not divided into parts at all.
B3 | -17. THE RESULT. A burnt sacrifice, an offering made by fire, of a sweet savour unto the Lord.

The Epistle to the Romans
No.5.
The just by faith shall live (Rom. i. 17).

Three items of great importance remain to be considered before we can leave Rom. i.17.They are:

1. The facts involved in the word" revealed."
2. The meaning of "faith."
3. The quotation from Hab. ii. 4

The Revelation of Righteousness and Wrath

The gospel of God was promised by the prophets of the Old Testament Scriptures. With this fact Romans opens (i. I, 2). Not only so, but upon the declaration of the gospel, the law and the prophets come forward as witnesses (Rom. iii. 21). Both Abraham and David are cited in Rom. iv. as bearing witness to the initial fact of this gospel, namely, the imputation of righteousness apart from works and only by faith. The inner teaching, the mystery of it as associated with Adam and Christ, is opened up for the first time in Rom. v. 12-21, nevertheless Gen. iii. remains as originally written, and but confirms the revelation given through Paul.

In Rom. x. 6-10 a witness is found to the righteousness which is of faith in the somewhat strange words of Moses recorded in Deut. xxx. 12,13. The gospel, however, is the chosen instrument for the REVELATION of the righteousness of God by faith, which constitutes the power of the gospel, "But now the righteousness of God without the law is manifested, being witnessed by the law and the prophets" (Rom. iii. 21). Isa. Ivi. I says, " My salvation is near to come, and My righteousness to be revealed." Isaiah said" near" ; Paul said" now."

Until the Lord had made the one great offering for sin, the full revelation could not be given, the types and shadows could not be fully interpreted. Paul could preach Jesus Christ according to the revelation of the mystery which was kept secret in times aionion, but was then made manifest and by the Scriptures of the prophets confirmed, as we have already seen, and made known among all nations for faith obedience (Rom. xvi. 25-27).

We must not omit from our reckoning the statement of Rom. i. 18-20. Here had been another" revelation," other facts of God had been" made known," if not since the age times, yet" since" the creation of the world. This revelation made known the" power" of God, and left the disobedient without excuse, but it was not the power of God unto salvation; it revealed the "wrath of God," but not the "righteousness of God by faith." Conscience and creation declare the glory of God, and set forth His eternal power and Godhead, but the gospel reveals that which alone can save poor sinful men, viz., "a righteousness of God by faith."

The meaning of faith.

Perhaps no simpler illustration of the essence of faith is found in Scripture than is contained in the words of Paul, "I believe God, that it shall be even as it was told me" (Acts xxvii. 25). The circumstances in which this statement was made were those of human extremity. The ship on which Paul was being taken a prisoner to Rome had been caught in a violent tempest. In the graphic language of Luke, an eyewitness, we learn that when the ship could not bear up into the wind, " we let her drive." The strain on the great central mast caused the timbers of the ship to spring, which necessitated what is called" undergirding." The sailors then strake sail," or "lowered the gear," so that the great sail should just steady the ship, "and so were driven." The danger increased and the ship was further lightened, neither sun nor stars appearing for many days, and" all hope that we should be saved was taken away." It was then that faith arose victorious. It was not just a passing mood, nor the hysteria of a religious mind, it rested upon the spoken word and promise of God :

"For there stood by me this night the angel of am, and Whom I serve, saying, Fear not Paul; brought before Caesar; and 10, God hath given thee sail with thee" (Acts xxvii. 23, 24).

Thus it was that Paul could say, "I believe God, that it shall be even as it was told me." He could exhort these hopeless seamen to be of good cheer, for God had said, "Fear not." The implicit faith of Paul in the promise of God, "even as it was told me," is seen in his attitude when later some of the sailors were about to let down a boat and leave the ship. He said to the centurion, " Except these abide in the ship, ye cannot be saved" (Acts xxvii. 31). Paul believed the angel of God when he said, "God hath given thee all them that sail with thee." Paul it was (the landsman, the prisoner) who cheered and advised the mariners and the soldiers, for faith operates where reason and skill and circumstance fail. Paul's faith made him reasonable. He exported the panic-stricken crew to take food, "For there shall not a hair fall from the head of any of you" (Acts xxvii. 34). Paul's faith led to works, confession, and confirmation :

“And when he had thus spoken, he took bread, and gave thanks to God in the presence of them all: and when he had broken it, he began to eat. Then were they all of good cheer and they also took some meat” (Acts xxvii. 35, 36).

At length, in spite of the soldiers' murderous counsel, "It carne to pass, that they all escaped safe to land" (Acts xxvii. 44).

The OT. equivalent emunah, from which we obtain the word Amen, is a derivation of the word aman, which primarily means to be steady, constant, established. "His hands were steadied" (Exod. xvii. 12). Pillars or props of a building (2 Kings xviii. 16). The constant care of a nurse is expressed also by this word in Esther ii. 7. Among the varied translations we find such expressive words as "faithfulness" (Psa. cxix. 75); "truth" (Deut. xxxii. 4); "set office" (margin "trust," 1 Chron. ix. 22); "stability" (Isa. xxxiii. 6); "faith" (Heb. ii. 4).

Faith in the N.T. sense may be described as a threefold cord, (I) A conviction, (2) A cleaving, (3) A confidence.

The conviction.-This rests upon the acknowledged faithfulness of God (I Pet. i. 21; iii. 15; 2 Thess. ii. II, 12). The cleaving.--This is the outcome, and a necessary outcome, for hope and love are only separated from faith in idea, not in experience. The confidence.- This controls the walk and manner of life. Paul's attitude on the ship just cited was one of assured confidence. To the O.T. believer, constancy under suffering necessarily implied faith in God. To" endure, as seeing Him Who is invisible," is said of one who lived by faith (Heb. xi. 27).

The quotation from Hab. ii. 4.

The subject of N.T. quotation from the O.T. is one of far reaching importance, and cannot be entered into here. Material is slowly being gathered to show the relation of the N.T. to the Hebrew and the LXX., but this must be reserved for a separate study. The quotation of Paul from Hab. ii. 4 differs from the Hebrew considerably, and from the LXX. in one particular. For the sake of comparison with the quotation in the N.T. we give the translations from the Hebrew and the LXX.:

" Behold, his soul which is lifted up is not upright in him, but the just shall live by His faith" (Hebrew).

"If any man draw back, My soul hath no pleasure in him; but the just shall live by My faith" (LXX.).

"As it is written, The just by faith shall live " (Rom. i. 17).

"For, The just by faith shall live " (Gal. Hi. 11).

"Now the just by faith shall live : but if any man draw back, My soul shall have no pleasure in him" (Heb. x. 38).

It will be seen that the LXX. differs very materially from the Hebrew, but that the full quotation of the passage in Heb. x. 38 is in entire agreement with the LXX., except in the omission of the word" My." The Hebrew says" His faith." The LXX. says" My faith." The apostle simply says " faith."

As we have said, the pros and cons of the question of N.T. quotation involve too much investigation into the vicissitudes of the MSS., and patient searching for guiding principles for any attempt to be made here. The interested reader may look for a series when time and opportunity allow the necessary work, which is rather heavy and tedious. For the present purpose it is enough to see the use which the apostle makes of the O.T. at every turn, either to teach, illustrate, or confirm the truth he is unfolding. Habakkuk's faith rested upon the faithfulness of God, even though outward circumstances prompted the jibe of the scoffer, "Where is the promise? " During the time of trial, while the vision waited God's appointed time, Habakkuk learned, and manifested practically that" The just by faith shall live." This is the order of the words both in the Hebrew, the LXX., and in the three quotations of Paul. The very ambiguity is seized by the apostle, in one place, to emphasize the truth, "The just by faith. . . . shall live," and at another, "The just. . . . by faith shall live."

By keeping the passage of Habakkuk in mind we shall be saved from that rash system of interpretation that either makes faith into a work or into a fetish, that makes faith into a dead legal form instead of a warm, breathing, living organic part of the new birth. Just as man, the living soul, may be spoken of as " body, soul, and spirit," yet essentially one, so the new life is manifested by " faith, hope and love"; neither may these be separated, except mentally, without the spiritual dissolution of the new man. As we proceed through this wonderful epistle Hab. ii. 4 will unfold its three-fold fulless. We shall learn more fully the meaning of :

"The just" (ho dikaios).
" By faith" (ek pisteos).
"Shall live" (gesetai).

He who comprehends Paul's teaching concerning righteousness, faith and life, with its alternative sin, disobedience and death, will understand the basis of Paul's gospel, and can go forth to all the world with a gospel of which he need never be ashamed.

The Epistle to the Romans.

The suppression of the truth (Rom. i. 18).

The discovery of the meaning of the term" the righteousness of God" is of the first importance, but as the apostle was as sensible of this as any of his subsequent readers of expositors, we feel that it will be better to defer an extended examination of this term until we are considering the apostle's own inspired explanations that occupy Rom. iii. and iv.

Following therefore the line of the apostle's teaching, we find that after the great thesis of the epistle has been stated in Rom. i. 17, he turns aside to establish the utter need of both Gentile (Rom. i. 18-32), and Jew (Rom. ii. 1-29), and then "the whole world" (Rom. iii. 19), and that a righteousness provided by grace has taken the place of a righteousness attained by works of law.

Rom. i. 18 to iii. 20 is one large section of this epistle devoted mainly to the establishment of the utter need of all men for the provision of grace in the gospel. It opens with the testimony of creation, and the things that may be known of God; it closes with the testimony of the law, and the knowledge of sin. Man needs something more than knowledge, he needs power to perform, and this he does not possess. Confining ourselves for the time to the revelation given of the darkness of the Gentile world, let us turn our attention to Rom. i. I8-.ii. I. The statement of verse I8 is the conclusion of the argument introduced at verse 16:

"FOR I am not ashamed of the gospe1."
"FOR it is the power of God unto salvation."
"FOR .herein is revealed a righteousness of God."
"FOR the wrath of God is revealed from heaven."

The necessity for righteousness is stressed by the fact of the revelation of wrath against all unrighteousness.

Wrath.

The word orge (translated" wrath") occurs twelve times in Romans, and of these occurrences seven are found in the first great doctrinal division (Rom. i. I-v. I I). It is an important word, and seeing that" it is placed in distinct relation to righteousness in Rom. i. 17, I8, it demands a prayerful study. We observe in the first place that" wrath" is used in the outer portion of Romans only. The word is not used in Rom. v. I2-viii. 39. The word" wrath" is not used of either Adam or of man seen in Adam. Judgment, condemnation and death there are, but unaccompanied by wrath. There is no wrath either in connection with the lake of fire, or the great white throne in Rev. xx. All is calm, books are opened, everyone is dealt with in pure justice. Wrath, anger, indignation, fury, these words are of a different category.

Many times do we read that the wrath or the anger of the Lord was" kindled," as in Exod. iv. 14, or of wrath" waxing hot," as in Exod. xxii. 24, or of His anger" smoking" (Psa. Ixxiv. I), and of it being poured out in "fury" (Isa. xlii. 25). The nature of the wrath of Rom. i. I8, and of the day of wrath with which it is connected (Rom. ii. 5). is discovered in the book of the Revelation. Those upon whom this wrath is poured are the" nations," and the time is the time of the dead that they should be judged and rewarded (Rev. xi. I8; xix. 15). This wrath falls particularly upon Babylon (Rev. xvi.19), and in direct connection with its idolatry and uncleanness (Rev. xiv. 8-10). Babylon is in view in Rom. i. I8-32. There we see that Satanic system in all its naked horror, there we see the domination of darkness and the lie. In this section we read of those who by their deeds are" worthy of death," and who" have pleasure" in deeds of evil (Rom. i. 32). This section therefore is connected with wrath.

In the inner section, which is connected not with Babylon but with Adam, it is death and not darkness and uncleanness that comes through to the race, and in some cases it is distinctly implied that some who thus die in Adam are not held to be personally" worthy of death," for it speaks of some who did not sin" after the similitude of Adam's transgression" (Rom. v. I4), and in this connection we find one who instead of "having pleasure" in the practice of evil, says that he hates the deeds he finds himself practising, while inwardly delighting in the law of God. Such is the very different point of view of these two sections.

Wrath in Romans i. -.v.

A - i. 18. Wrath revealed against unrighteousness.
B - ii. 5. Treasuring up wrath. "Works" (verse 6).
C - ii. 5. The day of wrath and righteous judgment.
D - ii. 8, 9. Wrath rendered to Jew and Gentile alike.
C - iii. 5. Is God unrighteous Who visits with wrath?
B - iv. 15. The law worketh wrath. "Faith" (verses 14 and 16)
A - v. 9. Saved from wrath, because made righteous.

This revelation of wrath against those who, while being ungodly and unrighteous themselves, hold down the truth in unrighteousness, is further connected with willful despising of that goodness which should lead to repentance. In two places the righteousness of this wrath is emphasized (ii. 5 and iii. 5). There is much to be learned by comparing I and 2 Thessalonians with this passage in Romans.

"Wrath revealed from heaven" (Rom. i. 18).
"The Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven" (2 Thess. i. 7).
"When they knew God, they glorified Him not as God. . . .
"They did not like to retain God in their knowledge" (Rom. i. 21, 28).
" In flaming fire taking vengeance on them that know not God" (2 Thess. 1. 8).
"They have pleasure in them that do them" (Rom. i. 32).
"They had pleasure in unrighteousness" (2 Thess. ii. 12).
"They changed the truth of God into the lie" (Rom. 1. 25).
"They received not. . . the truth. . . . they believe the lie" (2 Thess. ii. 10, 11).
"They changed the glary of God into an image made like to man" (Rom. i. 23).
"The man of sin. . . . showing himself that he is God" (2 Thess. ii. 3, 4).
"Wrath revealed. . . . idolatry" (Rom. 1. 18-25).
"Ye turned to God from idols. . . . saved from the wrath to come" (1 Thess. i. 9, 10).
"God also gave them up to uncleanness" (Rom. i. 24).
" Not in the lust of concupiscence, even as the Gentiles which know not God" (1 Thess. iv. 5).

If we also bring together the parallels that we find in the book of the Revelation, we shall have a full reference to that satanic system of iniquity commenced at Babel, dominating the nations of the earth from that time onward until judged at the coming of the Lord in the day of wrath.

The wrath of God in Rom. i. 18 is revealed against specific sin, viz., " Upon all ungodliness and unrighteousness of those men who hold down the truth in unrighteousness." The ungodliness and unrighteousness that kindles the fierce anger of God is that which actually suppresses the truth. It is not the ungodliness of the ignorant, nor the unrighteousness of the wayward, but the conscious opposition of ungodliness to revealed truth. The mystery of iniquity has ever opposed the mystery of godliness.

Worship.

Man is disposed to place common honesty between man and his neighbour as of more importance than" worship." Many a moral person would think nothing of the charge that he was not pious, yet the deeper our insight into the basis of all things, the nearer it brings us to the footstool of God. Is there not enough in Scripture to indicate 'that the first sin of all had direct relation to the worship of God? (Ezek. xxviii.). Did not the tempter bait his hook with the words, "Ye shall be as God"? Did not Israel break the ten commandments when they broke the first in the worship of the golden calf? Is not the first example of living by faith that of Abel the worshipper, and was not Cain's primal sin the suppression or withholding of the demands of God's holiness? Babylonianism, author as it is of vice and cruelty, is primarily and essentially a system of false worship.

The words" hold the truth" are really" hold down" or " suppress" the truth. This word (katecho) occurs in the epistle we have already referred to, namely, 2 Thess. ii. 6, 7, where it is rendered in the A.V. by "withholdeth" and "letteth." A careful comparison of Rom. i. and 2 Thess. ii. will help us to realize the restraining power of Babel, this suppressing of the truth, this exchanging of the truth for the lie, this rendering of the worship due to the Creator to the creature.

Knowledge.

That this restraining of the truth is willful, and not out of pitiable ignorance (cf. I Tim. i. 13), is seen in the immediate context. The next verse commences with the word ., because," and goes on to show that there has been on the part of God a revelation of Himself of sufficient clearness to make idolatry a definite perversion. With this rejection of what might be known of God came the awful descent into the slough of uncleanness that is so vividly portrayed by the apostle, and by the writers of his own day. What was true of the Gentiles was only too true, alas, of Israel also. This we shall see more clearly as we proceed. Enough for the moment if we begin to realize the utter and abject need that the world had of that provision of righteousness which is the glory of the gospel and which, as the apostle said, was the power of God unto salvation.

What the Lord revealed to the nations, how He revealed it, and their subsequent attitude we must consider in our next paper. Let us meanwhile be grateful that though children of wrath, even as the rest, grace has saved us, and instead of being dominated by the lie, we have learned the truth as it is in Jesus.

The Epistle to the Romans
Inexcusable (Rom. i. 19, 20)

We sought to draw attention in our last article to the distribution of the word" wrath" in Romans, and to the related teaching that wrath is directed against culpable wickedness and apostasy, particularly that Babylonian phase called" the lie," and which finds expression in false worship. There is no fury, wrath, or anger to be discovered in Gen. iii., where the atmosphere is calm though sad, neither is wrath found in Rom. v. 12-viii. 39. We now turn our attention to the teaching of Rom. i. 19-32 in order to learn the history of Gentile failure and Babylonian triumph. Verses 19 and 21 both begin with dioti = "because." Both verses follow on from the statement in verse 18 that those spoken of "suppressed the truth." Their culpability in the matter is made evident by the fact that "they knew God." How they knew, what they knew, the limitations of this knowledge, the responsibilities of this knowledge, and the departure from it, with all that it implies, must now be the subject of our enquiry.

The knowledge of God.

In an age of intellectualism, the child of faith is liable to underrate true knowledge. Yet a moment's reflection will summon from the Scriptures abundant proof that the knowledge of God is the goal of redemption, and the strength of the pilgrim. Prophecy looks forward to no higher manifestation of glory than that the knowledge of the Lord shall one day cover the earth. It would occupy too much space in this article to deal with this aspect of the Word, but the reader is directed to the series entitled" Studies in the Prophets" appearing in these pages for its development. Coming therefore to the revelation of God to mankind at the beginning we find:

" That which may be known of God is manifest in them." Liddon makes the observation on the phrase to gnoston tou Theou, that" according to the invariable New Testament and LXX. use, this phrase means that which is known, not that which may be known about God (cf. Luke ii. 44; John xviii. 15 ;Acts i. 19, xv. 18, xxviii. 22)." "And Paul is speaking of an objective body of knowledge which becomes subjective in the phanerosis" (Winer, Gr. N.T. p. 295). This knowledge becomes manifested in their consciousness; en autois does not mean" among them" since nooumena kathoratai point to internal manifestation. If by "natural religion" we mean that which the unaided understanding of man can formulate from the visible creation, then we have no right to use the term here, for this knowledge was as much a revelation from God as is the written Word.

" For God hath made it manifest to them."-" That which is known of God": truly the written revelation makes God known in a way that can never be accomplished by the works of His hands, nevertheless the knowledge of God here indicated was very comprehensive. It was so far a revelation as to deal with" His invisible things," these things being further defined as " His eternal power and deity." The word translated" eternal" here is not the familiar aionios which means" age long," but aidios. Some there are who consider this word as coming from the same word as Hades, and render it " unseen," so making it amplify" invisible" of the same verse, but this is mistaking the paranomasia for the real meaning. Aidios is derived from aei = "always," and so means perpetual or eternal.

There is a distinction to be observed between the words Theiotes (divinity), and Theotes (the Being, God, Col. ii. 9). Under Theiotes all God's attributes (wisdom, goodness, etc.) are included. These truths about God are seen through being mentally perceived; the nous (mind), as distinct from the senses of man, must see God in nature. This ever existing power and deity of the Lord has been made manifest by His works since the creation. Apoktiseos means here, as it does in 2 Peter iii. 4, "since the creation of the world."

God made known by His works.

One has but to turn to the book of Job to learn something of what" nature" can say to him that hath the hearing ear. There, in Job xxxvi.-xli., we have heaven and earth called upon to bear their testimony to the" eternal power and deity" of Jehovah. "Behold, God is great," said Elihu, and then come the marshaled host of witnesses. Small drops of water, the spreading of the clouds, thunder and lightning, snow and hail. Then the Almighty Himself speaks to Job. He speaks of the foundation of the earth, the bounds set for the sea, the mysteries of light, the signs of heaven, the marvels of animal life and sustenance, all this and more lead Job to confess the eternal power of God: "I know that Thou canst do every thing, and that no thought of Thine can be hindered" (Job xlii. 2).

Can we forget Isaiah xliv. 9-24, which exposes the folly of idolatry, saying :

" He planteth an ash, and the rain doth nourish it . . . . he burneth part thereof in the fire; with part thereof he eateth flesh; he roasteth roast. . . . and the residue thereof he maketh a god!" (Isa. xliv. 14-17).

What a contrast with the true God:-

"Thus saith the Lord, thy redeemer, and He that formed thee from the womb. I am the Lord that maketh all things: that stretcheth forth the heavens above; that spreadeth abroad the earth by Myself" (Isa. xliv. 24)

So in the days when Babylon and its system shall be revived and in full power, the so called" everlasting gospel" will be preached, which gospel is nothing more nor less than a proclamation of the Lord as Creator:

Fear God, and give glory to Him; for the hour of His judgment is come: and worship Him that made heaven, and earth, and the sea, and the fountains of waters. And there followed another angel, saying, Babylon is fallen, is fallen" (Rev. xiv. 7, 8).

With this note the heavenly phase of Revelation opens. In chapter iv., the rainbow throne, the living creatures, and the twenty-four elders testify not to redemption, not to kingdom, not to church, but to creation:

"Thou art worthy, 0 Lord, to receive glory and honour and power; for Thou hast created all things, and for Thy pleasure they are and were created" (Rev. iv. 11).

Not till that is confessed do we read, " Thou art worthy. . . . . for Thou wast slain, and hast redeemed" (Rev. v. 9).

Science in its modern acceptation has rid the universe of its Creator. An impersonal force occupies the throne of deity. It is becoming well-nigh impossible for anyone to be a science teacher to-day who does not subscribe to the theory of evolution in some form. Finally Rev. xiv. 7 suggests that to dare to believe the scriptural doctrine of creation, as opposed to what a godless science will by theory advance, will be to believe the very gospel, and to constitute oneself a martyr for the truth. We use the word science in its modern acceptation. True science we must ever welcome, for it can never contradict the Word of God. Take for example one feature as an illustration. What room is there in modern science for the teaching of Gen. i. 7? Should anyone dare to affirm their belief that there was sea water above the firmament he would be classed as a fool, yet a modern scientist has recently said, in connection with the transmission of " wireless" waves, that there must be somewhere above the atmosphere a kind of sounding board or reflection whose density is equal to sea water! We all know Psalm xix. and its twofold division, also Psalm viii.:

"The heavens declare the glory of God" (xix. 1) . . . . . CREATION.
"The law of the Lord is perfect" (xix. 7) . . . . . SCRIPTURE.

" When I consider Thy heavens, the work of Thy fingers, the moon and the stars, which Thou hast ordained" (viii. 3).

Since the creation of the world therefore the eternal power and deity of God have been abundantly manifested by the works of His hands. So freely, so clearly has God "shown it unto them" as to leave all "inexcusable." When we hear and see the revolting idolatry carried on even to-day in such places as India or Africa, our hearts go out in pity to these demon ridden people, yet on every hand they have these evidences. God has never left Himself without witness:

"In that He did good, and gave us rain from heaven, and fruitful seasons, filling our hearts with food and | gladness" (Acts xiv. 16, 17).

It will be observed that the apostle prefaced this statement by speaking of God as:

"The living God. which made heaven, and earth, and the sea, and all things therein" (Acts xiv. 15).

Or again on Mar's hill, he said to the men of Athens :

" God that made the world and all things therein, seeing that He is Lord of heaven and earth, dwelleth not in temples made with hands" (Acts xvii. 24-31), and went on to demonstrate the utter folly of idol worship.

Inexcusable.

The nations of the earth were not so favoured as Israel, for to that nation were given" the oracles of God" (Rom. iii. 2). None of the nations received the law of Sinai, and therefore were not held accountable to it (Rom. iii. 19; iv. 15), but to all the world the witness of creation was given, and made manifest" in them" :

“There is no speech, and there are no words,
Unheard is their voice,
Yet through all the earth has gone their voice,
And to the end of the world their sayings " (Psa. xix. 3, 4).

God was the teacher, " for God hath shown it unto them." Presently we shall hear the charge reiterated when the apostle turns to the Jew (Rom. ii. I), but for the time our attention must be fixed upon the condition of the Gentile world. Mankind had a knowledge of God, and this knowledge was (I) attested as true by conscience, "in them," and was (2) derived from the witness of God's works. This knowledge was very marvelous, for it embraced" the unseen things of God," even His eternal power and divinity, and was perceived by the mind from the works of His hands ever since the creation of the world, and hence from Adam onwards. This witness is found scattered throughout heathendom, and leaves all the nations of the earth" inexcusable." Just what it was that came in and prevented this primitive knowledge must be the subject of our next paper. What a fall is here!

The Epistle to the Romans
No. 8
Glory and thankfulness to God for His Goodness (Rom. i. 21)

The inexcusability of mankind for their departure from God is twofold :

(1). God revealed His eternal power and deity in them by the witness of His works.
(2). When they knew God, they wickedly perverted this know ledge.

We have given some consideration to the truth of (I), so we now turn our attention to the teaching under the heading of (2).

"Because that, when they knew God, they glorified Him not as God, neither were thankful; but became vain in their imaginations, and their foolish heart was darkened."

" They knew God."- Is there any evidence extant of this primitive knowledge?

The testimony of antiquity.

Wilkinson, in his Ancient Egyptians, says, "The existence of a sole and omnipotent deity, Who created all things, seems to have been the universal belief." Moor, in his Pantheon, speaking of Brahm, the supreme God of the Hindoo, says, "Of Him whose glory is so great, there is no image" (Veda). He" illumines all, delights all, whence all proceeded; that by which they live when born, and that to which all must return" (Veda). Monier Williams, in his Hidden Wisdom, quotes some lines from a Vedic Hymn:-

"In the beginning there was neither nought or ought.
Then there was neither sky nor atmosphere above.
* * * *
Then there was neither death nor immortality.
There was neither day, nor night, nor light, nor darkness,
Only the Existent One breathed calmly, self contained.
Nought else than Him there was nought else above, beyond."

Col. Vans Kennedy, in his Hindoo Mythology, quotes from the Institutes of Menu:

"He Whom the mind alone can perceive; Whose essence excludes the external organs, Who has no visible parts, Who exists from eternity . . . . . Whom no being can comprehend. "

How can we account for the revolting idolatry of Hindooism to-day, with its millions of gods of inconceivable ugliness and sensuality, in the face of this testimony from their own religious literature? Rom. i. 19-32 provides the one and only answer. Among the Babylonians there was the tradition of "the only God," and a correct. rendering of Isaiah lxvi. 17 gives it prominence. Spurrell's translation reads :

" They who sanctify themselves, and purify themselves, after the ordinances of Achad in the midst of the gardens, Who eat swine's flesh, and the reptile, and the mouse."

Achad means" The Only One," and is used in Deut. vi. 4, as here, without the article, of the" Only Jehovah." The Babylonians, when they intended to assert the unity of the Godhead in the strongest possible manner, used the word " Adad" (see Macrobii Saturnalia). Mallet's Northern Antiquities reveals much the same testimony in Icelandic Mythology. God is there called:

" The Author of everything that existeth, the eternal, the living, and awful Being: the searcher into concealed things, the Being that never changeth," attributing to this deity" an infinite power, a countless knowledge, and incorruptible justice."

What blight was it that settled upon mankind, turning this primitive knowledge into myths, distorting and twisting primal truth until it became servant and witness to the lie? Rom. i. 21-28 supplies the answer. This answer is manifold, but it begins with this simple statement, "They glorified Him not as God." .

The glory of God.

The glory of God underlies both creation and redemption. It is the great factor in the nature of sin and of hope. The glory of God is a topic of great importance in the epistle to the Romans. First let us notice the testimony of the verb doxaso (" to glorify"). Rom. viii. 30 uses it of the redeemed, and xi. 13 uses it where Paul" magnifies" or literally" glorifies" his office. This leaves us with three references, viz., i. 21, xv. 6 and 9. These references are full of teaching when seen together. Rom. i. 21 reveals the Gentile failure; Rom. xv. 6 and 9 reveal the Gentile's blessed reconciliation. What they failed to do by nature, they will do by grace. Let us put the passages together :

" They glorified Him not as God" (i. 21).
"That ye may with one mind and one mouth glorify God" (xv. 6).
"That the Gentiles might glorify God for His mercy" (xv. 9).

Thus by this very first item, and its use in Romans, the glorious theme of the epistle is set forth. In Rom. i. we are to read of the setting aside of the nations, but in Rom. xv. we read of their blessed and happy restoration. Turning to the word doxa (glory) we learn from Rom. iii. 23 that it is essentially connected with sin. "For all sinned, and are coming short of the glory of God." Faith that emphasizes the fact of resurrection" gives glory to God," as may be seen in the case of Abraham (Rom. iv. 20), and of all of like precious faith, who can now" rejoice in hope of the glory of God" (Rom. v. 2).

The word" glory" runs through this epistle, and forms an integral part of its theme. The reader should examine all the passages (we give them here to facilitate the study: Rom. i. 23; ii. 7, I0; iii. 7, 23; iv. 20; v. 2; vi. 4; viii. 18,21; ix. 4, 23; xi. 36; xv. 7; xvi. 27). If such is the importance of this initial factor, it behooves us all to acquaint ourselves with just what is involved in "glorifying God," lest we in our measure come short, even though saved. Something of what is intended by " glorifying God" may be gathered from such passages as I Chron. xvi. 23-36):

> "Declare His glory among the heathen: His marvelous works among all nations."

Here it will be seen that" His glory" is, by the parallelism of Hebrew poetry, expressed by " His marvelous works." This is one item in glorifying God that the Gentiles omitted. Following this comes a statement concerning His eternal power and deity:

> " For great is the Lord, and greatly to be praised: He also i. to be feared above all gods. For all the gods of the people are idols: But the Lord made the heavens. . . . . Give unto tbe Lord the glory due unto His name. . . . . And let men say among the nation., The Lord reigneth."

Glorifying God declares His marvelous works, acknowledges that He is above all gods, confesses that He is Creator, and that He reigneth. When we remember the testimony of Psa. xix., we remember that there we have a similar connection.

> "The heavens declare the glory of God;
> And the firmament showetb His handywork."

The parallelism here is complete:-

The heavens	----	The firmament
Declare	----	Showeth
The glory of God	----	His Handywork

It is very evident that this confession of God as Creator is directly connected with glorifying God. Into the higher and deeper connection of this glorifying of God as, for example, is indicated in the language of Christ in John xvii., we do not enter, as this is beyond the scope of the passage in Romans i. Here is the first step in Gentile departure. They did not glorify God as God. The second step was that of ingratitude, "neither were thankful."

Thanksgiving,

The testimony of creation might have been awe-inspiring, the thunder bolt, the avalanche, the hurricane might have overwhelmed man's spirit with their testimony to tremendous power, might have extracted his tardy glorifying. But God's glory cannot be separated from His goodness. As Moses learned in Exod. xxxiii. 18, 19, "Shew me Thy glory. . . . I will make all My goodness pass before thee." So when Paul sought to prevent' the' men of Lystra from worshipping himself and Barnabas as gods, he not only drew their attention to that which demanded glory, namely, that God "made heaven, and earth, and the sea, and all things that are therein," but that which as surely demanded thanksgiving: "In that He did good, and gave us rain from heaven, and fruitful seasons, filling our hearts with food and gladness" (Acts xiv. 8-18). Sunshine and shower, the kindly fruits of the earth, the gift of sleep, the reward of labour, the blessings of home, of parent and child, all these were from the good hand of God, yet" they glorified Him not as God, neither were thankful."

In the ascription of praise that is recorded in Rev. iv. 9 "thanks" is included, as also in Rev. vii. 12. Again in Rev. xi. 17 we read:-

> "We give thanks, 0 Lord God Almighty, which art, and wast, because Thou hast taken to Thee Thy great power, and hast reigned."

Four times does the Psalmist say, "Give thanks unto the Lord, for He is good." His Godhead demands glory, and His goodness thanks. There is more than a mere phonetic connection between God and good, Some consider that the word" Deva," the generic name for" God" in India, comes from the Chaldee thav (" good "), with which is allied the Hebrew tob. Donaldson, in his New Cratylus, shows that Th is frequently pronounced Dh. From the Sanscrit Deva, without the digamma Deo, comes the Latin Deus, and the Greek Theos. "There is none good but One, that is God" (Matt. xix. 17). He is good, and He does good. When He manifests His glory He shows His goodness and declares His name.

As we meditate upon these things, the early apostasy of the Gentile world takes upon it a more serious character. It is not so much that they were ignorant, but ingrate. God did not look for learning, but He did look for thanksgiving. Science, as taught, is cold, mechanical, thankless. When the botanist Linneus saw a field of English gorse for the first time, he burst into tears. Herschel, Faraday, and others are, alas, magnificent exceptions. Let us not slip into a Godless nomenclature, and speak of " the laws of nature," but let us boldly, and yet humbly, glorify God as God, and be thankful to the great Giver for His gifts, by speaking rather of "the laws of God." If we would be true Protestants to-day, "God" will be in the language of everyday life, and not banished to the realm of hymns, prayers, and religious exercises. The reader who knows" The Biglow Papers" by James Russell Lowell; may remember that in his vernacular poems the name of God is mentioned rather freely. In his justification for the use he says :

> "The charge is of profanity (against himself) brought in by persons who proclaimed African slavery of divine institution. . . . . I scorn any such line of defence, and will confess at once that one of the things I am proud of in my countrymen is, that they do not put their Maker away far from them, or interpret the fear of God into being afraid of Him.
> The Talmudists had conceived a deep truth when they said that 'all things were in the power of God, save the fear of God,' and when people stand in great dread of an invisible power, I suspect they mistake quite another personage for the Deity."

By this reference we do not intend to take Lowell's characterizations as our standard, but suggest that his point, so skillfully introduced at the time of the slavery question, should help us to pierce that smug and false piety that divorces the glory of God from His goodness and our thanksgiving, and mistranslates ritual as worship. Here again we must pause, reserving for another paper this record of the quick following of the mind into the follies of human imagination, when the fool had found it in his heart to say, "There is no God."

The Epistle to the Romans.

NO. 9.

Given up (Rom. i. 21-32).

In our last paper we found that the first step that led to the giving up of the Gentiles was a failure to glorify God as such, and to give Him thanks for the evident good gifts that He bestowed. In considering the next step in this downward course, we must remember that it follows the first as does effect the cause. Man being what he is, it does not seem possible for the throne of the universe to remain empty. If God be not honoured as the great Creator and Benefactor, then man will soon listen to the serpent's voice repeating the subtle temptation of Eden, "Y e shall be as God." As it was at the beginning, so was it at Babel, and ever since. The temptation as presented led apparently to the wisdom of God, " a tree to be desired to make one wise."

With the infallible sequence of cause and effect comes conscious distance: "I hid myself"; and loss of innocence: "I was naked." Gen. Hi. is echoed by Rom. i. The first sin is repeated in all sin and in all men. There in Rom. i. we have the other side of temptation, " as God," and the worship of an image made like to man, with the dominion placed beneath his feet. "To make one wise" is repeated in the words" professing themselves to be wise, they became fools." The hiding of the guilty pair and the sense of distance that came in is repeated in the" giving up" of Rom. i. 24, 26 and 28, while the loss of innocence in their conscious nakedness is but the tiny seed that produces the crop of uncleanness that makes Rom. i. 24-31 hard reading. Let us give our attention to the record of Gentile failure. Starting from the withholding of that due to God both in glorifying Him as God, and in expressing thankfulness for His bounty, we read the next stage in Rom. i. 21-23 :

> "But became vain in their imaginations, and 'heir foolish heart was darkened. Professing themselves to be wise, they became fools, and changed 'the glory of 'he incorruptible God into an image made like to corruptible man, and to birds, and fourfooted beasts, and creeping things"

As we read these words, Psa. viii. comes before the mind: "0 Lord our Lord, how excellent is Thy name in all the earth, Who hast set Thy glory above the heavens" (verse I). Here the Lord, the Creator, is glorified" as God. "For out of the mouth of babes and sucklings hast Thou ordained strength" (verse 2). This is the true sequence. The recognition of God "as God" leads to humility. What a difference between" babes and sucklings" and "professing themselves to be wise!" The contemplation of "the things that are made," which was neglected and rejected in Rom. i., led the Psalmist to say :

> "When I consider Thy heavens, the work of Thy fingers, the moon and the stars, which Thou hast ordained; WHAT IS MAN, that Thou art mindful of him? and the son of man, that Thou visitest him?" (Psa. viii. 3, 4).

Here is no empty pride or vain profession, but true humility. This however does not lead to a grovelling state of mind, nor an unholy denial of the dignity of that creation which alone bears the impress of the image of God: "For Thou hast made him a little lower than the angels, and hast crowned him with glory and honour" (verse 5). In Rom. i. man sank lower than the beasts in his empty wisdom. When he robbed God of the honour and glory due to His name, he at the same time robbed himself. Instead of standing in the consciousness of the glory and honour set upon him by God, we read in Rom. i. of dishonour, degradation and shame.

> "Thou madest him to have dominion Over the work. of Thy hand. ; Thou hast put all things under his feet. All .sheep and oxen, yea, and the beasts of the field: the fowl of the air, and the fish of the sea, and whatsoever passeth through the paths of the seas" (Psa. viii. 6-8).

Here is man's true dominion. O what a falling off is there in Rom. i.! Placed over the work of God's hand we find man so utterly darkened and besotted that he worships the very creation that had been placed beneath his feet. This idolatry, and all that it implies, degraded both God and man. The truth, and all it implies, honours both God and man.

Vanity.

At the fall of man in Eden, vanity entered and ruled. "For the creation was made subject to vanity" (Rom. viii. 20). Ecclesiastes found everything connected with Adam and separated from the risen Christ to be "vanity and vexation of spirit" (For justification of such a statement see the articles on Ecclesiastes in Vols. X.-XIII.). Vanity not only ruled without, but it reigned within. "They became vain in their imagination" (Rom. i. 21). There are two words that are translated" vain," kenos and mataios. The former refers to contents, the latter to results. It is the latter word that is used here. The word "imagination" is dialogismos, which is translated in Rom. xiv. i. "disputations." The fact is, these reasonings were futile, resultless, empty. They led nowhere except to complete alienation from God. "The Gentiles walk in the 'Vanity of their mind. . . . . being alienated from the life of God through the ignorance that is in them" (Eph. iv. 17, 18). The apostles at Lystra, as we have already seen, refer to the idols of the Gentiles as "vanities." Jer. ii. 5 reveals the reason for Gentile blindness: .. They are gone far from Me, and have walked after vanity, and are become "vain" (see also 2 Kings xvii. 15).

There are two important lessons to be learned here. First, the more obvious one, that man cannot by mere reasoning or philosophy discover God: "the world through its wisdom knew not God." It is a primary necessity that" He who cometh to God must believe that He is, and that He is a rewarder of them that diligently seek Him"; in other words, approach to God necessitates the recognition of the glory due to Him as God (Rom. i. 21)- "He is" (Heb. xi. 6), and thankfulness (Rom. i. 21), for He is the" rewarder" (Heb. xi. 6). The moment the fool says in his heart, There is no God, it can be written, "Corrupt they are, they have done abominable works, there is none that doeth good" (Psa. xvi. I). This Psalm is quoted at some length in Rom. iii., but its presence can be felt already in Rom. i.

The second lesson that we may learn is to avoid a tendency to extremes, and to the condemning of "reasoning" as such. High in the list of those enduements that lift man above the level of the brute is the possession of reason, and it is false to assert that faith is contrary to reason, or that it is unreasonable; that is to degrade faith to credulity, and revealed truth to the level of superstition. Where faith is in the ascendant, the mind is clarified, false grounds of argument are detected, and reason and faith walk hand in hand. "The entrance of Thy words giveth light; it giveth understanding to the simple" (Psa. cxix. 130). The necessary outcome of these baseless and empty speculations was the darkening of this very faculty of reason. "Their foolish heart was darkened" (Rom. i. 21). "Foolish" is translated undiscerning by Rotherham, and is translated in verse 31 (A.V.) by "without understanding." The darkness that settled down upon the world shut out the only light in which man may walk and please God; his reason and his mind ceased to function correctly, even as the eye loses its power and its discernment if deprived of light. It is" in Thy light we shall see light" (Psa. xxxvi. 9). This assumption of wisdom was in reality sheer imbecility. Rom. i. 22 led the Gentile world by rapid stages into a morass of the most degraded form of idolatry and immorality :

"They changed the glory of the incorruptible God into an image made like to corruptible man, and to birds, and fourfooted beasts, and creeping things" (Rom. i. 23).

Not only is there an exact parallel in the Gentile failure with the primal sin of Eden, but there is also an absolute parallel in the downward movement of the Gentiles as recorded in Rom. i. with the downward movement of Israel as given in Psa. cvi.

Gentile (Rom. i.)	Israel (Psa. cvi.)
"They changed the glory of the corruptible God into an image….man…birds, beasts…. creeping things" (23).	"They made a calf in Horeb, and Worshipped the molten image. Thus they changed their glory into the similitude of an ox that eateth grass" (19, 20)
"They did not like to retain God in in their knowledge" (28).	"The forgat God their Saviour" (21)
"Wherefore God also gave them up" (24).	"Therefore He said that he would destroy them" (23).
"Uncleanness…vile affections" (24-27).	"The joined themselves also unto Baal-peor, and ate the sacrifices of the dead" (28).
"Inventors of evil things" (30)	"They provoked Him to anger with their inventions" (29).

As we contemplate the twofold departure from the revealed truth of God, the one, the revelation of His Godhead in nature, the other, of Himself and His will in Scripture, our hopes for man in himself must surely die, and all our hope must rest in God.

The Gentiles given Up.

We now approach the solemn fact towards which all which has been written since verse 18 has been leading, viz., the giving-up of the Gentile nations by God; "Wherefore God also gave them up" (verse 24). The word paradidomai (" to give up") occurs in verses 24, 26 and 28. At this point it seems advisable to take notice of the structure of the passage that we may see the setting of this threefold giving-up.

Rom. i. 19-ii. 1.

A (i. 19-22) a. Known of God.
b. Inexcusable.
B. (23-31) c_1. Changed the glory.
d_1. Given up to uncleanness.
c_2. Changed the truth.
d_2. Given up to infamous passions.
c_3. Changed natural use.
d_3. Given up to reprobate mind.
A (32-ii.1) a. Knowing the judgment of God.
b. Inexcusable.

This threefold giving up indicates the dispensational position of the Gentiles from the dispersion at Babel, and the call of Abraham, until the ministry of the reconciliation committed to Paul, when Israel began to pass off the scene. The Gentiles were aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, and strangers from the covenants of promise throughout the dispensation of the law under Moses, throughout the kingdom under David, throughout the proclamation of the gospel of the kingdom during the earthly ministry of the Lord Jesus, and throughout a part of the period covered by the Acts of the Apostles. To this period Paul referred when he said to the Athenians; "At the time of this ignorance God winked," but indicated that a change had come by adding, "but now commandeth all men everywhere to repent" (Acts xvii. 30). That the reconciliation of the world was closely associated with the setting aside of Israel may be seen by reading Rom. xi. 15. Referring to the structure we observe that not only is there a threefold giving up, but also that this giving-up is preceded by a threefold change ;

1. They changed the glory of the incorruptible God, for the likeness of corruptible man, &c.
2. They exchanged the truth of God for the lie.
3. They exchanged the natural use for that which was against nature.

There is a slight alteration in the words translated "change" in these verses in the A.V. We have attempted to indicate the difference by using" change" and" exchange." First they changed the glory of God without actually giving up God altogether, but this soon led to the next step, for they exchanged the truth of God for the lie, and then worshipped and served the creature rather than the Creator. It is not possible for God to take second place. Ye cannot serve God and mammon. Into the third item we cannot go. The defiling character of idolatry may be gathered from its annals, and we do not feel that any good purpose would be served by elaborating this revolting subject here. At the same time we know only too well that human nature is not a whit better to-day than when it openly practised the sins condemned in Rom. i. We need to faithfully warn the rising generation, speaking very tenderly and lovingly, yet nevertheless plainly, for Babylonianism in all its forms is rising like a flood, and the book of the Revelation reveals Rom. i. in a superlative degree. We need not go so far into the future as the book of the Revelation, however, for 2 Timothy iii. 1-8 uses many of the words of Rom. i. to describe the perilous times at the close of this present dispensation. The sequence of the apostasy and its relation to the development of the mystery of iniquity, otherwise called" the lie," and the mystery of godliness, otherwise called " the truth," can be traced through Paul's epistles.

Taking the statements of Rom. i. we find them worked out in the other epistles :

1. “As God.” The creature more than the Creator.”	“The man of sin….as God” (2 Thess. ii 3, 4)
2. “The lie.” “The truth.”	“The received not the love of the truth...they believe the lie” (2Thess.ii.10, 11)
3. “Given up to an undiscerning mind”	“God shall send them strong delusion” (2 Thess. ii. 11).
4. “Pleasure in them that do them.”	“Had pleasure in unrighteousness” (2 Thess. ii. 12)

A comparison of the list of sins in Rom. i. with that of 2 Tim. iii. 1-7 will show how completely the para recorded. The reader must supply further parallels by studying the intervening epistles.

The lie.

We must draw attention before closing to the fact that the A.V. is not strong enough in its translation of Rom. i.25. It is "the lie." Of this lie Satan is the father (John viii. 44), and the Babylonian delusion at the time of the man of sin is the climax (2 Thess. ii. 10, II; Rev. xiv. 5 (*cp. Companion Bible)*xxi. 27, xxii. 15). This lie could not dominate the mind of man without something having entered into that mind at the same time. We have seen that as man robbed God of His glory, he robbed himself of his highest and best. As he degraded God to the level of a creature, so he degraded himself. The explanation is given in verse 28. In this verse there is a play upon the words dikimazo (" to try or prove"), and adokimos (" disapproved ") :

> "And as they did not approve to be holding God in acknowledgment, God gave them up unto a disapproved mind, to do that which is not becoming."

Vaughan, with a certain amount of liberty with the English, expresses it thus: "As they refused. . . . God gave them to a refuse mind." The glory of God is the last item of importance in the ethics and culture of material philosophy. It is the sheet anchor of all the teaching of Scripture. God knows why He placed the ten commandments in the order in which we have them in the Word. They are in the true sequence. Idolatry is "the lie" in essence, murder and adultery are but" the lie" in practice. The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom. "There is no fear of God before their eyes" (Psa. xxxvi. I) is the climax of the dreadful list of Rom. iii. 10-18.

Thus far we have traced the failure of the Gentiles. The apostle's object is to demonstrate the universal need of the righteousness revealed in the gospel. Consequently he has to show the parallel condition of Israel with the Gentiles before he can proceed with the opening up of the truth. This we must study together in another paper. Meanwhile, it would be good for us all to heed Eph. ii. II-13.

The Epistle to the Romans.

An important parenthesis and its point (Rom. i. 18-iii.20).

When we reach Rom. i. 16, 17 we cannot avoid the conviction that we are at the heart-of the gospel as preached by Paul. At verse 18 we seem to take a turn, and any further explanation of faith, righteousness, or justification seems to be suspended. From Rom. i. 18-32 we have a fearful picture of the utter failure of the Gentile world even though they had received the revelation of creation, and the monitorship of conscience. When we get into Rom. ii. the teaching becomes more involved; we seem further than ever from the theme of the epistle, and indeed the conclusions we may have reached at the end of Rom. i. seem rudely challenged by the time we reach the end of Rom. ii. Nevertheless we approach God's word not with a wonder as to whether it is perfect in every part, but with a conviction that it is, and just as it is said of the lover of the works of God: "The works of the Lord are great, sought out of all them that have pleasure therein" (Psa. cxi. 2), so to the earnest seeker after truth light will surely be given.

A reading of Rom. ii. leaves one with the feeling that the whole passage is an aside, a great parenthesis, and the opening verses of Romans iii. are but a continuation of the same theme. At Rom. iii. 9 light dawns, for the apostle himself definitely tells us what he has been endeavoring to set forth since Rom. i. 17. To follow the direction given by his own analysis gives certainty in place of conjecture. The object with which Paul wrote Rom. i. 18-iii. 9 is given in the following words: "We have before proved both Jews and Gentiles, that they are all under sin" (Rom. iii.9). (" Proved" is better translated" accused," as may be seen by other parts of the same word in Matt. xxvii. 37, &c.).

It is evident that the charge against the Gentile is opened in Rom. i. 18--32, and that the two-fold accusation against Jew and Gentile occupies Rom. ii. I---iii. 8, and the concluding evidence against the Jew-" those who are under the law" (iii. 19)--occupies verses 10-18, bringing us to the great conclusion: "all the world guilty before God." As soon as we pass this point, the thread laid down in Rom. i. 17 is seen to be resumed, and we immediately have before us one of the most illuminating passages of Paul's epistles so far as justification by faith is concerned: "even a righteousness which is by faith of Jesus Christ" (Rom.iii. 22). Although we have not as yet seen more than the drift of Rom. ii., we have at least set the bounds of our inquiry.

A - Rom. i. 17. Justification by faith.
B - Rom. i. 18--32. The accusation against the Gentile. -List of offences.
C - Rom. ii. I-iii. 9-. Circumcision and uncircumcision.
B - Rom. iii.-9-19. The accusation against the Jew. -List of offences.
A - Rom. iii. 20, &c. Justification by faith.

The members denominated" A" are merely to set bounds; we do not attempt anything further here. The passage that we have before us as the subject for study is "C"-Rom. ii. l-iii. 9--. Now for the trial of faith. The writings of our fellow-labourers in this epistle yield nothing as to structure or outline. The Companion Bible says nothing. Our own attempted sub-divisions were unsatisfactory. Accordingly we took a clean sheet, confessed to the Lord our ignorance, but at the same time the conviction that no one part of this epistle would be found unruly or out of order, and the light came. The fullest section, and that which sets forth the perfectness of the argument, is that under notice, and this will be the better appreciated when its place and purpose is understood. This understanding will be furthered by devoting our attention to the introductory and concluding members :

A – ii. 1. – a. – Krino. – Inexcusable, whoever judges.
b. – Krino. – Judging another condemns self.
c. – Krino. – The one judging practices same things.
B – ii. 2. Krima. – Judgment of God according to truth.
C – ii. 3-25 (Details omitted until next paper).
C – ii.25- iii. 1 (Details omitted until next paper).
A – iii. 4-7 a. – Krino. – God will overcome when judged.
b. – Krino. – God is not unrighteous when judging the world.
c. – Krino – God judges sin, though He overrules it for good.
B – iii. 8, 9 – Krima – Judgment of God is just.

The summary of this outline is as follows:

A – When man judges he sets a standard whereby he himself shall be judged.
B – God's judgment is according to truth, and not appearance or privilege.
C – No respect of persons with God. Jew and Gentile.
C – No advantage or disadvantage. Circumcision or uncircumcision.
A – When God judges He is found to be above all suspicion.
B – God's judgment is just.

We are told that the visitor to the labyrinths of the catacombs retained hold of a silken thread by which he could retrace his steps without fear of becoming lost. In the chapter before us there are almost endless opportunities for getting" lost." The apostle touches upon a sphere that is removed from our responsibility, and while certain passages will prevent us from coming to an adverse conclusion concerning the heathen world which has never known either the law of Moses or the gospel of Christ, the silken thread attached to Rom. iii. 9 and 19 will keep us to the reason for the teaching of Rom. ii. so far as this epistle is concerned, and prevent us from overturning the definite teaching of Rom. iii. 20 for the less definite suggestions of Rom. ii. 12-16. It is evident from Rom. i. 18-32 that nothing more was necessary to bring in the Gentile guilty before God. The apostle's problem, however, was to bring about the same conviction in the breast of the Jew. We are not left to our own conjectures to discover Israel's great impediment, for the apostle has spoken most clearly on the subject.

" I bear them record that they have a zeal of God, but not according to knowledge. For they being ignorant of God's righteousness, and going about to establish their own righteousness, have not submitted themselves unto the righteousness of God. For Christ is the end of the law for righteousness to everyone that believeth" (Rom. x. 1-4).

Israel's boast in Rom. ii. is that they" knew His will"; that they" approved the things that were more excellent."

They esteemed themselves as' guides to the blind, and lights to them which are in darkness." They had a "form of knowledge and of the truth in the law," but they were in fatal ignorance! When we see this, what is there to choose between the Gentiles who " Became vain in their imaginations and their foolish heart was darkened, who, professing themselves to be WISE, became FOOLS. . . . . and did not like to retain God in their KNOWLEDGE" (Rom. i. 21-28), and the Jews whose vain-glorious boasting ended equally in death? The deadly enemy of Paul's message before Acts xxviii. was Judaism, or the false claims of the law. After Acts xxviii. Judaism passes, and a "vain deceitful philosophy" challenged the high glories of the prison epistles. In both cases the apostle shows its utter vanity, and sets Christ crucified, risen, and ascended over against it as "the end" and" the fullness."

It will be seen by the words quoted from Rom. ii. 17-20, that the Jew not only made great claims for himself, but spoke with emphatic judgment against the Gentile. This, which the Jew thought his strong point, proved his overthrow, for the apostle brings to light a solemnizing truth, namely, that the clearer our judgment is against the shortcomings of others, the higher, necessarily, the standard must be by which we ourselves shall be judged. This, moreover, is aggravated by the fact that the Jew, while condemning the Gentile for breaches of the law, himself was responsible for similar breaches, and, like David before Nathan, uttered his own doom. The apostle here is stripping the false covering of privilege, both by his argument in Rom. ii. 1-3, and by the definite statement which is axiomatic the world over: "there is no respect of person with God" (Rom ii. II).

At the beginning and ending of this section we have a three-fold reference to judging (the verb krino), followed by a statement concerning the judgment (krima) of God: "Whoever judges another is inexcusable." The apostle had been " an Israelite," and having been brought up at the feet of Gamaliel he was swift to anticipate the cavils of his Jewish antagonist, which might be presented somewhat as follows:

You say Paul, that whosoever judges another is inexcusable and condemns himself. You stress the whosoever to the breaking down of distinction and privilege, but do you not see that by so doing you must therefore include God Himself? He too must stand before the bar and be judged.

Instead of meeting this specious argument with a swift and passionate denial, the apostle quietly assents to the main contention. In Rom. iii. he says, in effect:

Within certain limits I agree that your words contain a deeper truth than you are aware. God Almighty could withhold any account of any of His matters. In some things He does, but not in the matter of judgment. David acknowledged that God would ever become victorious when His judgments were questioned. Not because of His MIGHT, but because His judgments are RIGHT.

So concerned is God that no suspicion should lurk anywhere concerning His righteousness, that He is at pains to justify Himself in connection with passing over the sins of the past. He will not have His forbearance misinterpreted (Rom. iii. 25). The God of Israel challenges them, saying: " Are not My ways equal?" (Ezek. xviii. 29). The point of the case is that although God's judgments will be subjected to the most patient scrutiny, yet will He always triumph, and Israel will immediately collapse, " For thou that judgest doest the same things" (Rom. ii. I). In God's case He is not unrighteous Who taketh vengeance, for how then could He judge the world?

In case any reader should object to this rather free use of the Name and Person of God in this argument, we would direct his attention to the end of Rom. iii. 5 (" I speak as a man ").

" The judgment of God is according to TRUTH" (Rom. Ii. 2).

This stands in contrast with prosopolepsian of verse II, the respect of persons which is denied. God has further manifested the utter impartiality of His judgment in the fact that "He hath appointed a day, in which He will judge the world in righteousness by that man whom He hath ordained, whereof He hath given assurance (margin, offered faith, i.e., good faith) to all, raising Him from among the dead" (Acts xvii. 31).

"The judgment of God is RIGHT" (Rom. iii. 8).

The A.V. reads, "whose damnation is just." It is an entire repudiation of the casuistry of the Jew contained in the false charge: "Let us do evil that good may come" (Rom. iii.

8). If it was a slander to say that Christ's apostle taught such a doctrine, the fact that the context is occupied with the vindication of God's judgment from the least suspicion of advantage, or of the engineering of human faithlessness, should cause us equally to abominate the mere approach to such a thing. That God does overrule evil is abundantly testified throughout Scripture and experience, but that is an entirely different matter. Before we conclude this examination it is necessary to become acquainted with the central section (Rom. ii. 3-iii. I). This we must take up in our next article.

What a solid basis for our redemption! True it flows from the love of God; true it is all of grace and not of merit, yet marvelous to remember He has so wrought that" He might be just, and the justifier of him which believeth in Jesus" (Rom. iii. 26). Then what of that spirit of judgment? that keenness to see error? that" nose for heresy?" What kind of standard are we setting for ourselves? Should any interpose with a plea of privilege, parallel to that of the Jew, we would remind such that in addition to Rom. ii., Col. iii. 25 tells us that: "There is no respect of persons," and that" He that doeth wrong shall receive for the wrong which he hath done."

Read in the light of Isa. viii. 19, 20, and I Tim. iv. 1-3, we can see that forerunners of Rev. xvi. 14 are preparing the way. Therefore "lift up your heads" (Luke xxi. 28).

SIR A. CONAN DOYLE'S CHALLENGE.

3,000 of Albert Hall Audience Who Have 'Been in Touch with Dead'.

'I ask all those who are sure that they have been in touch with their dead to rise and to testify.'

This challenge by Sir Arthur Conan Doyle to spiritualists assembled yesterday morning at the Service of Remembrance in the Albert Hall was responded to by about 3,000 people, men and women of all types.

'I thank God there are so many', said Arthur. 'I will make a prophecy that within five years' time, to such an appeal made from this platform, there will not be one man or woman in the hall who will not rise.'

For the first time the Albert Hall had been engaged by the spiritualists for their annual Armistice service, and about 8,000 were present."

Christian people who have entertained the unscriptural hope of peace on earth apart from the personal presence of the Prince of Peace, would do well to heed the uncompromising testimony, not of a popular preacher, but of a soldier, quoted below from the article on War, by Sir Ian Hamilton, in the New Encyclopedia Brittanica:--

"Is War Inevitable?"

"Because good Europeans hate war in 1926 it does not follow that they hated war in 1914 or that they will hate it in 1964. Because Sir Bedivere has flung Excalibur far out into the mere let no one imagine that the glamour of the sword is for ever quenched. Against that spiritual symbol the shield of Locarno, welded by the spectre of the falling franc, will form a poor protection. To-day pacifists speak to the converted, but their young sons have been born with the old instincts.

Those who have seen with their own eyes and suffered in their own bodies know the ugly truths of war, but they cannot convey their knowledge to the young generation.

Nothing will stop war save the Second Advent of Christ."

The following extract from a report published in The Daily Chronicle, of the sixth Hailey Stewart Lecture, 1926, indicates the necessity for the believer to stand fast to the teaching of Scripture concerning the keystone doctrine of the resurrection:--

Sir O. Lodge's confession.

Never visits his son's grave in France.

"I have never been to see my boy Raymond's grave in France. He has asked me not to. He says, 'I take no interest in that grave. I never was in a grave in my life'."

Sir Oliver Lodge, the famous scientist, made the above dramatic statement delivering the sixth Hailey Stewart lecture at the Memorial Hall, London, last night, his subject being "Death and the Hereafter".

"Think about the grave as little as possible", proceeded Sir Oliver.

"If people would get over that trouble about interment, and about lying there for centuries waiting for a general resurrection—all that kind of medieval superstition—they could begin to regard death as more like what it is, an adventure, an episode that is bound to be welcome when it comes, and as something not to be afraid of."

Say ye not a confederacy" (Isa. viii. 12).
"Keep the Unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace" (Eph. iv. 3).

Words in Season.

#9. Onions and garlick, or this manna! (Num. xi. 5, 6).
pp. 92 - 94

There is a word that by its use conveys a most important lesson for all who would go on to the full goal of our redemption, and stand "perfect and complete in all the will of God". That word is variously translated "desire", "covet", and "lust". While it is true that in some aspects that which is sensual and unclean is intended, the believer is apt to miss much vital teaching by avoiding the word altogether as having no immediate application to himself. A few examples will help us in this matter, and so before proceeding further we will notice them:--

> "The flesh lusteth against the spirit, and the spirit against the flesh, and these are contrary the one to the other" (Gal. v. 17).

It is very evident here that the word "lust" does not imply anything sensual or unclean, but simply "desire", for it is used of both the flesh and the spirit:--

> "The lusts of other things entering in, choke the word" (Mark iv. 19).

Here again "lust" means desire or coveting:--

> "We should not lust after evil things, as they also lusted" (I Cor. x. 6).

The passage refers to the wilderness journey of Israel, and their desire for the things left behind in Egypt.

These examples will suffice to show that in avoiding this word "lust", we are closing our ear to very salutary warnings from the Word of truth. We cannot do better for the moment than look more closely at these three passages, and seek to discover their meaning. Take Mark iv. 19 first. It occurs in the parable of the Sower, and therefore has a primary interpretation respecting the mysteries of the kingdom. As this parable occurs in three of the Gospels, it will help us further to note any variation in the wording:--

> "The care of this age, and the deceitfulness of riches, choke the word, and he becometh unfruitful" (Matt. xiii. 22).
> "The cares of the age, and the deceitfulness of riches, and the lusts concerning things that are left, entering in, choke the word, and it becomes unfruitful" (Mark iv. 19).
> "And are choked with the cares and riches and pleasures of life, and bring no fruit to perfection" (Luke viii. 14).

It will be observed that while cares and riches are mentioned in all three passages, there are several variations that are illuminating. For example, the cares of the age of Matthew and Mark become the cares of life, and as the word is bios, the cares also of livelihood. Luke adds the word "pleasures", and Mark adds the word "desires" or "lusts". Now Mark's full expression is very suggestive: "desires concerning things that are left."

A somewhat parallel passage is Luke xii. 26, "If ye then be not able to do that thing which is least, why are you careful (anxious) concerning the things that are left?" Eph. ii. 3 makes a distinction between the saved and "the rest", as does also I Thess. iv. 13. the desires and cares for the things that are "left" choke the word, and prevent fruit to perfection. Paul says in Phil. iii. and iv.:--

> "Forgetting those things which are behind, and reaching forth unto those things which are before I press . . . . . Mark them which walk . . . . . who mind earthly things . . . . . Be careful for nothing."

This feature leads us on to the quotation from I Cor. x. 6, where Israel lusted after evil things. We find the record in Numb. xi. 4, 5:--

> "The mixt multitude fell a lusting . . . . . We remember the fish, which we did eat in Egypt freely; the cucumbers, and the melons, and the leeks, and the onions, and the garlick."

They remembered! Paul sought to forget. They, in type, minded "earthly things", the tasty produce of Egypt, the things that are left "entered in", and brought ruin with them. Their very remembrance spoilt their taste for the bread of heaven:--

> "There is nothing at all beside THIS MANNA!" (Numb. xi. 6).

The Psalmist gives one tragic comment upon this "lusting" or "desiring":--

> "They lusted exceedingly in the wilderness . . . . . And He gave them their request, but sent leanness into their soul" (Psa. cvi. 14, 15).

The fullest light is let in when we turn to the third reference cited above, viz., Gal. v. 16, 17:--

> "Now I say, walk in spirit, and ye shall not fulfil the desire of the flesh. For the flesh desires the contrary of the spirit, and the spirit the contrary of the flesh, for these are opposed to each other."

Here then are two sets and two sources of "lust" or "desire", flesh and spirit. They are contrary the one to the other. The spirit desires the things of God; therefore to "desire the things that are left", the things of the flesh, the things that were left behind beyond the Red Sea in Egypt, is to fail both in fruitfulness and in perfection.

We must return to this subject again, meanwhile may we receive with meekness the Word of God that reveals the hidden spring of so many perplexing things in this life, viz., desire.

Specially for Young People.

#1. Talks on the way.
pp. 113 - 117

At the London meetings conducted by the Editor, six meetings in the year are devoted to the instruction and help of the Young People who attend. These are held on the second Sunday of the months of January, March, May, July, September, and November, in which, of course, all ages are welcome. It has been felt that a wider circle of Young People, or those who have such under their care, would appreciate notes of these meetings. We accordingly commend them to the earnest prayerful use of all readers.

The way that seemeth right

Life is a journey. The Scriptures are full of references to this journey. Figures of the pathway, the guide, the provision, the dangers meet one everywhere. Psalm xxiii. has much to say about the way, so has Moses in the Pentateuch, the Lord in the Gospels, and Paul in the Epistles. Let us learn something for our help and blessing concerning "the way".

The way.

The whole scheme of Christian doctrine and practice is called "the way", especially in the Acts of the Apostles.

> "If he found any of THE WAY (see margin) . . . . . bring them bound unto Jerusalem" (Acts ix. 2).
> "Divers were hardened, and believed not, but spake evil of THE WAY before the multitude" (Acts xix. 9).
>
> "At the same time there arose no small stir about THE WAY" (Acts xix. 23).
>
> "I persecuted THIS WAY unto the death" (Acts xxii. 4).
>
> "After THE WAY which they call heresy, so worship I the God of my father" (Acts xxix. 14).
> "Felix . . . . . having more perfect knowledge of THE WAY, deferred" (Acts xxiv. 22).

Added to the simple expression "the way" we find in the Acts several explanatory terms, such as:--

> "The right ways of the Lord" (xiii. 10).
> "The way of salvation" (xvi. 17).
> "The way of the Lord" (xviii. 25).
> "The way of God" (xviii. 26).

These titles are expanded and expounded in the epistles, but before we turn to their teaching we must realize the character and end of "man's way" so that we may the better appreciate "the right ways of the Lord".

Man's way.

The book of Proverbs provides a comprehensive commentary upon the way of man. Conceit is taken from man by the impossibility he finds even of understanding his own way, to say nothing of clear sighted analysis or unbiased judgment.

> "Man's goings are of the Lord: how can a man then understand his own way?" (Prov. xx. 24).

The sense of this passage is obscured by the failure of the translation to differentiate between the two words used for "man". The LXX more truly gives the extremes—"a full-grown man" and a "mortal". The sense is better expressed thus:--

> "The steps of a powerful man are from the Lord;
> Then a common man, how shall he discern his way?" (John Miller's Translation).

That man is unable correctly to discern his way, Proverbs teaches most clearly:--

> "There is a way that seemeth right unto a man; but the end thereof are the ways of death" (xiv. 12 and xvi. 25).

This proverb is repeated and therefore its truth is doubly impressed. The word "seemeth right" is literally, is right to his face or before him. This is in direct contrast with the "end" which is literally "its after part". To be taken up with "things seen" blinds the mind to that "afterward" that is the inevitable wage of sin. Prov. xvi. 26 which follows (according to the A.V) speaks of man labouring for himself, the following translation being terribly suggestive:--

> "The labouring soul labours for it" (i.e. death). (John Miller's Translation).

It is a solemn thought that the whole way of man and all his labour is for nothing else than death. Nevertheless this is most certainly true. There are but two ways. Call then the way of man, and the way of God, the way of lying, and the way of truth, the way of death, and the way of life. Prov. xv. 19 has one of these contrasting pairs:--

> "The way of a slothful man is as an hedge of thorns; but the way of the righteous is raised up as a causey" (see margin).

There are fourteen references to the "slothful" or the "sluggard" in Proverbs, and the child of God could spend the time taken in their consideration on many other things with less profit. Faith, though it be not "works" is not slothful. For a connection between sloth and thorns as applied to the believer see Heb. vi. 7-12. Those who think their own ways to be right, Proverbs says are "fools":--

> "The way of a fool is right in his own eyes" (xii. 15).

Study the context of such passages that speak of being "wise", or "right, or "clean", or "pure", in our "own eyes", as Prov. iii. 7; xvi. 2; and xxx. 12. While the fool thinks his own way right, Scripture says:--

> "The foolishness of man perverteth his way: and his heart fretteth against the Lord" (Prov. xix. 3).

This perversion may be seen in Prov. xxi. 8:--

> "The way of a man is forward and strange: but as for the pure, his walk is right."
> "The man who has been twisting about as to his way, has also been getting further off: but the pure man is straightforward in his work." (John Miller's Translation).

Here is wandering that ends in utter loss, a twisting that never proves to be "a short cut". The way of truth is a "right" way, it leads to life; all others whatever their outward seeming end in death. Not only does man pervert his own way, and sow his path with thorns, but > "The way of the wicked seduceth them" (Prov. xii. 26).

There is a fascination about evil; a will-o'-the-wisp lures men on to ruin, and nothing but grace can enlighten the eyes to see it in its true colours, or to confess it. This word "seduce" in the preterite is used in Isa. liii. 6:--

> "All we like sheep have gone astray; we have turned every one to his own way."

Here is a complete endorsement of Prov. xii. 26. Their "own way" was parallel to "going astray", and in the blessed sequel we find it is expressed as "iniquity", which the Lord Jesus bore as the great sacrifice for sin. This "straying", this seduction of self by the way of wickedness, though apparently right, ends in death:--

> "The man that wandereth (same word as 'seduce') out of the way of understanding shall remain in the congregation of the dead" (Prov. xxi. 16).

Contrast this with the words of Prov. xv. 24:--

> "The way of life is above to the wise, that he may depart from hell (sheol) beneath."

It is ever the same. God's way is a way of light and life; and man's a way of darkness and death. We have not yet seen the verse that tells of darkness. Here it is:-- > "The way of the wicked is as darkness: they know not at what they stumble" (Prov. iv. 19).

This passage must be read with verse 18, which says:--

> "The path of the just is as dawning light, advancing and brightening toward perfect day." (John Miller's Translation).

What we have learned.

From these passages of heavenly wisdom we learned at least the following facts about the way of man:--

1. Man's own powers of observation and reasoning, and even conscience unguided by inspired truth, are not sufficient to convince him that his own way is utterly wrong.
2. Man's own way, though self-approved, is nevertheless a way of self-deception, a way of darkness, and a way of death.
3. Man really has become through sin an utter fool; he sows his own path with thorns, and renders upward progress impossible.

The apostle, in Rom. iii., puts the same truth in the following words:--

> "There is none righteous, no, not one . . . . . they are all gone out of the WAY . . . . . destruction and misery are in their WAYS, and the WAY of peace have they not know."

This is the testimony of all Scripture. It is found as early as Gen. vi. There in verse 12 we read:--

> "And God looked upon the earth, and, behold, it was corrupt; for all flesh had corrupted his WAY upon the earth."

This corruption of the way proceeded from within:--

> "And God saw that the wickedness of man was great in the earth, and that every imagination of the thought of his heart was only evil continually" (Gen. vi. 5).

A consideration of the way of man leads us to the inevitable conclusion that man of himself is hopeless and undone. Walking in darkness, going down, down to death, yet under the false conceit that his ways are right. It is bad enough to be on a wrong road and to know it, but man is on a wrong road and is deceived into thinking it is right!

> "This their way is their folly: yet their posterity approve their sayings"! (Psa. xlix. 13).

Yet if you read on in the Psalm it will be found that such folly is fatal, for "death shall feed on them". Shall we not, in view of this solemn testimony, put up the prayer of the Psalmist?

> "Remove from me the WAY of lying: and grant me Thy law graciously. I have chosen the WAY of truth . . . . . O Lord, put me not to shame" (Psa. cxix. 29-31).

Over and over again we read concerning Israel that they had "turned out of the way". This was their initial national sin after the great covenant of Sinai.

> "Thy people which Thou hast brought forth out of Egypt have corrupted themselves: they are quickly turned aside out of the WAY which I commanded them" (Deut. ix. 12).

So in Deut. xi. 27, 28. A "blessing" if they obey, a "curse" if they do not obey, but "turn aside out of the way". As we have seen when looking at the initial meaning of sin, sin is a negation: "all UNrighteousness is sin", "Whatsoever is NOT of faith is sin." So the false way, the way of death is really the negation of the way of truth, and the way of life. Man's way is the negation of God's way.

> "Forty years long was I grieved with this generation, and said, It is a people that do err in their heart, and HAVE NOT KNOWN MY WAYS" (Psa. xcv. 10).

Here for the moment we conclude. Our next subject must be blessed contrast, the way of God. May the awful revelation of the path that man is treading, until grace translates him, be used of God to the eternal blessing of many who are out of the way.

#2. Christ the way.
pp. 154 - 156

In the former talk we found that in Scripture the gospel is called the way, and that man's way and God's way are totally different in their character and goal. We now consider particularly Christ as the Way, and for this we turn at once to John xiv. 5, 6:--

> "Thomas saith unto Him, Lord, we know not whither Thou goest; and how can we know the way? Jesus saith unto him, I am the way, the truth, and the life: no man cometh unto the Father, but by Me."

We have already learned that man is out of the way, has gone astray, and Thomas but expresses the plaint of us all, "How can we know the way?" The answer is Christ: He is the way. There is an exclusiveness about this way that we do well to recognize: "No man . . . . . but by Me" shuts us up to one way only. This feature is by no means confined to the passage under notice:--

> "Verily, verily, I say unto you, I am the door of the sheep. All that ever came before Me are thieves and robbers . . . . . I am the door; BY ME if any man enter in, he shall be saved" (John x. 7-9).

Christ is the only door. Again, in John vi. we read that Christ is the true bread of life: "Your fathers did eat manna in the wilderness, and are dead . . . . . I am the living bread" (John vi. 49-51). Peter likewise declares, "There is none other name under heaven given among men, whereby we must be saved" (Acts iv. 12).

An important point.

The expression, "The way, the truth, and the life" needs a little attention if we would not miss its fulness. As it stands we have three separate facts, each and all true. Christ is the way; Christ is the truth; Christ is the life; and chapter and verse can easily be found in proof. At the same time, the passage contains something more. This may be a good opportunity for introducing to young people that important auxiliary, a knowledge of Figures of Speech. There is a figure which is called Hendiadys—a cumbersome name until understood. Hen is Greek for "one"; dia is Greek for "through"; dys is from duo ("two"), and so it is "The one-by-means-of-two" figure, two words being used, while one thing is intended. The familiar expression "bread and butter" in everyday English is an example of this figure. We do not mean a separate piece of butter in the same way that we do when we say "bread and cheese"; what we really mean is "buttered bread", with an emphasis upon the "butter". This adjective therefore is put forward and made into a noun. John xiv. 6 is an example of Hendiatris, or "one-by-means-of-three", and means, "I am the way, yes, the true and living way".

We must find space later on to give a few words of explanation concerning the most important Figures of Speech, but will not digress here. The figure emphasizes the two important facts that Christ, the way, is both true and living.

True.

The ordinary English usage of the word true limits it to that which is the opposite of "false", and this of course is a frequent meaning in the N.T. There is, however, another very important usage arising out of the fact that in the Old Testament there are so many types and shadows. When we read in Heb. viii. 2 of "the true tabernacle, which the Lord pitched, and not man", the passage does not imply that the tabernacle pitched by Moses was false, but that it was but a type of shadow. This is actually said to be the case in Heb. ix. 24: "For Christ is not entered into the holy places made with hands, which are the figures of the true, but into heaven itself." So, when we read in John that Christ is the "true light" (i. 9), the "true bread" (vi. 32), the "true vine" (xv. 1) and the "true way" (xiv. 6), they are viewed as the real in contrast with the type and shadow.

Living.

Not only is Christ the true or the antitypical way, He is also the "living way". The question of the angel at the sepulchre: "Why seek ye the living among the dead?" is applicable here. This way is "living" because it has essentially to do with resurrection, "Thou wilt show me the path of life" (Psa. xvi. 11). John not only speaks of Christ as the living way, but tells of "living water" (iv. 10); "living bread" (vi. 51); and the Son of the "living God" (vi. 69). A dead way or a merely typical way can never lead us back to the "living God".

A new and living way.

In Hebrews the "living God" is mentioned four times, and we read in x. 19, 20 of "A new and living way, which He hath consecrated for us". The utter failure of the typical way is the theme of Hebrews:--

> "The way into the holiest of all was not yet made manifest while as the first tabernacle was yet standing: which was a FIGURE for the time then present" (Heb. ix. 8, 9).

> "For the law made nothing perfect, but the bringing in of a better hope did; by the which we draw nigh unto God" (Heb. vii. 19).
> "For it is not possible that the blood of bulls and of goats should take away sins . . . . . every priest standeth ministering and offering oftentimes the same sacrifices, which can never take away sins: but this man, after He had offered one sacrifice for sins for ever, sat down on the right hand of God" (Heb. x. 4, 11, 12).

The once offered sacrifice and the ever living High Priest is the one true, new, and living way whereby we may draw near unto God. All other ways are either false or shadows. All other ways must fail, for they are not "living"; Christ alone is the One who can say, "I am He that liveth and was dead".

DEAR FELLOW-MEMBERS,

When we contemplate the tremendous nature of Paul's prison ministry, the well-nigh overwhelming odds against its testimony, and the feebleness of the witness associated with The Berean Expositor, nothing but the fact that we are in the hands of the God of all-sufficient grace gives the needed assurance to go forward. This we do despite the fact that as an organization we are negligible, our circulation not large, and our position outside the camp.

We rejoice however to record that at last, certain periodicals once fast closed against this truth have opened their pages, some for positive testimony and others for tentative correspondence. Whilst not having taken any part in the correspondence, we are encouraged by the fact that the Word is going forth and that in this country, in U.S.A. and on the Continent the seed so long sown in loneliness is at length bearing fruit.

With thankfulness for the practical fellowship of saints, and a desire that every issue shall increasingly magnify the Lord Jesus Christ,

We remain, by grace,

Yours for the truth,

All spiritual blessings.

#1. A criticism of the term "super-heavenly".

pp. 29 - 31

The reason for which The Berean Expositor exists is to make known the special revelation of God's grace to the Gentiles during this dispensation of the mystery, and, in harmony with this intention, is the fact that, during a period of fourteen years, the epistles to the Ephesians has been given a systematic study. Its words have been examined, its structure discovered, and some of its heights and depths acknowledged, though they remain unscaled and unfathomed. The fact that we have brought this serial exposition to a close does not mean that henceforth the epistle to the Ephesians is a shelved book, but rather that now the analytical study has been concluded the more spiritual study may begin. There are many wondrous and mighty themes that have been dealt with verbally that need a closer consideration now that the spade work has been done. The house is built, the furniture is in place, and we must now move in and take possession.

A question that lies at the very threshold, and one that seriously colours the whole of our present life here on earth, is, In what way are "all spiritual blessings" a present possession? Is Satan, together with Principalities and Powers, at this moment, actually and merely potentially, beneath the feet of the believer? Are we now, at this moment, actually "seated together in the heavenly places"? Is the new creation already our present, personal enjoyment? Can we, by virtue of union with Christ, Who is at the right hand of God, and by the operation of the law of the spirit of life, can we command the withdrawal from our sphere of disease, the curse, and the limitations associated with the presence here of sin and death? Is our attitude to be one of "reigning"? Should we speak of our position as "on the throne"? These, and such like questions, are not inventions of the writer; they are actually propounded by many earnest believers, and in many cases the answer has been, that all these things are ours here and now.

It has been the aim and the prayer of those responsible for this magazine to stand for all the truth of God for His saints, and therefore these questions challenge the very object for which we exist. It is our intention, by the grace of God, to consider these and similar points in this series to which we have given the title, "All spiritual blessings".

Closely allied with "all spiritual blessings" is its sphere, "heavenly places". This sphere we have considered in its place, and have seen that there is a threefold sphere of blessing in the purpose of God: (1) the earth, (2) the heavens, and (3) the heavenly places, far above all. For this third sphere we have used the term "super-heavenlies" in recognition of certain scriptural facts connected with it. While we believe most readers appreciate the fitness of this expression as embracing in itself the scripturally-revealed features belonging to it, some have nevertheless challenged its appropriateness. We therefore feel that in this introductory article the true meaning of "in heavenly places" and the suitableness of the term "super-heavenlies" should be considered.

This term seems to one to be a straining of words to the subverting of those who hear. This is a sufficiently serious charge to require refutation and brings us into line with the apostle who although he took with becoming meekness the criticism of his "contemptible speech" and his "mean appearance", yet when his apostleship or his doctrine was attacked threw himself into the breach and yielded subjection "no not for an hour" that the truth of the gospel might continue right through to ourselves. The criticism in question begins by stating the following fact, and this fact is the basis of our teaching on the subject.

> "En tois epouraniois. This expression is peculiar in its form to the Ephesian epistle, where it occurs five times; i. 3 and 20; ii. 6; iii. 10; vi. 12."

After having made this statement the critic opens up his view on the subject by a quotation from John iii. 12, and says, following the quotation, "(lit., heavenlies, as in Ephesians)".

Now there is something amiss here. If "in heavenly places" is peculiar in this form to Ephesians, it cannot also occur in John iii. 12. The word "heavenly" is used all over the N.T., a fact that it would be foolish to deny, and which has no bearing on the subject. Our contention has been that this peculiar form, "in heavenly places", has been used by God in Ephesians alone, because Ephesians reveals the mystery which, alone in all departments in the purpose of the ages, makes it known that a company of the redeemed shall one day enter into their inheritance "in the heavenly places far above all principalities and powers".

That the significance of the peculiar form found only in Ephesians is seriously questioned by our critic is revealed by the second item of criticism. Speaking of the term "super-heavenly" it is stated that:-- > "There is no such word in the New Testament as huper-ouranios, that is 'above or beyond the heavens'."

To this the obvious answer is that in Eph. iv. 10 we have the words, huper ano panton ton ouranon, "far above all heavens". This shows that while the actual term "super-heavenlies" may not be found, "super-heavens" is in the very heart of the self-same epistle associated with the self-same ascension, "far above all", with which the church of the one body is inseparably connected.

Can the logic of these two passages be denied?

> "The Lord Jesus ascended to the heavenly places" (Eph. i. 19-21).
> "The Lord Jesus at the same time ascended far above all heavens" (Eph. iv. 10).

The word used in Eph. iv. 10 is huper-ouranon; therefore "heavenly places" are "super-heavenly".

We really feel grateful for this criticism, for its investigation has proved, up to the hilt, the reality of the peculiarity of the position in Ephesians.

The problem that is connected with the fact that the throne of God, Principalities and Powers, even wicked ones, are alike spoken of as "in heavenly places" has been dealt with in Volume II & III, new edition, page 105 (Volume III original edition, page 56), and a difficulty connected with the usage of ouranos in Col. i. 5 is dealt with in Volume XVI, page 126.

We rejoice that God in His grace has not given us a place in the "heavenly city" that comes down from God out of heaven, but that, with fullness of thanksgiving, we can say:--

> "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, Who hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings in heavenly places in Christ" (Eph. i. 3).

#2. "Spiritual blessings in heavenly places."
pp. 72 - 75

The expression "heavenly places" occupied our attention in the first paper of this series; in this we turn to the equally important item, "All spiritual blessings". These blessings are "in heavenly places"—a definite locality "far above all"; but while we are there, in spirit, we are nevertheless still waiting for the redemption of the purchased possession, so that the enquiry as to whether these spiritual blessings can be enjoyed, in their full meaning, until the whole church enters into its glorious inheritance is a very real one.

If these blessings are enjoyed now by members of the One Body, and if these blessings are their everyday experience, it would be reasonable to expect that throughout the epistles of Paul written for this company, there would be references to them. The fact is that whatever the reason, the words "to bless" and "blessing" (eulogeo and eulogia) occur nowhere else in the prison epistles other than in Eph. i. 3.

The section in which they occur has to do with the plan and purpose of the Father made before the overthrow of the world. There is no mention of sin and death, redemption or forgiveness, and the "acceptance" which is ours in the Beloved is, strictly speaking, "high favour". Here in fact is the Father's will. Until we reach the time appointed by the Father, we must not presume that we are of age or have entered into our title. This is the lesson of Gal. iv. 1-10, which has a bearing on the point as we shall see by the reference to the "adoption". Those blessings that are ours by purpose (Eph. i. 3-6) become ours by purchase (Eph. i. 7 and 14). Until we reach the day of redemption, the "seal" and the "earnest" must be our blessed portion.

Spiritual.

Have we been led astray by the present-day use of the word "spiritual"? If this means a state of mind that combines the qualities of piety, unworldliness, and Christ-likeness, a mind and walk that is in harmony with Scripture and pleasing unto the Lord, how comes it that the whole of the O.T. could be written, such characters as Enoch, Noah, Abraham, Moses, Joseph and Daniel described, and the word "spiritual" never be necessary? Only once do we find the word in the O.T. Hosea says, "The prophet is a fool, the spiritual man is mad" (Hos. ix. 7). The correspondence here between "the prophet" and "spiritual" shows that Hosea refers to those who, under the influence of the Spirit, spoke to the people. This means that the word "spiritual" is virtually absent from the O.T.

It is never wise to omit a reference to the LXX version when dealing with the O.T. Accordingly we look to see whether pneumatikos (spiritual) is used, and, if so, how. There is no need for search; the word never occurs. Instead of translating Hos. ix. 7 by this word, another is used, which in Zeph. iii.4 stands for "light and treacherous persons". It is clear therefore that "spiritual" blessings and "spiritual" persons mean something very different from that usually intended by those who use the word to-day. Such expressions as "the deepening of the spiritual life" and "spirituality" are not in accord with the scriptural meaning of the word.

The epistle to the Ephesians uses the word of "blessings", but also of "wickedness" (i. 3 and vi. 12). These expressions moreover coincide with the first and the last occurrences of the phrase "in the heavenlies" that are to be found in Scripture. It is therefore folly to omit their comparison. If the believer has blessings in heavenly places, which are described by the same word as that which describes "wickedness", it is evident that the word does not mean piety, godliness, unworldliness, or Christ-likeness, but has reference to nature or condition. These beings are "spiritual" though "wicked".

The meaning of the word is made clearer when we discover its opposite or alternative. Take for example the "light" in II Cor. iv. In verse 6 its opposite is "darkness", but in verse 17 its opposite is "weight", which settles any ambiguity that might have existed. In Eph. vi. 12 the opposite to "spiritual" is "flesh and blood". Our foes are not human, but belong to a higher order, which for the moment we might call "angelic". All spiritual blessings therefore must be interpreted in the light of the usage of that term and not "spiritualized" away. The use of the word in Rev. xi. 8: "spiritually called Sodom and Egypt", shows that it can have no reference to "spirituality", for these cities were notoriously wicked, but indicates to us that "spiritual" blessings are "real", whereas present pilgrim blessings—like the manna in the wilderness—are but "figures of the true", but "earnests" and foretastes of the glory that awaits us at the right hand of God.

In Rom. xv. 27 the word "spiritual" is used in opposition to the necessities of life. "If the Gentiles have been made partakers of their spiritual things, their duty is also to minister unto them in carnal things" (Rom. xv. 27; see also I Cor. ix. 11). In I Cor. ii. 13-15 and xv. 44-46, spiritual things are placed over against natural things. These natural things have to do with the "soul", and Adam as he was created. It is the risen Christ, as the last Adam, Who as the "life-giving spirit" introduces "spirituality".

It is opposed to a "fleshly" condition in Rom. vii. 14, and used of "gifts" in Rom. i. 11; I Cor. xii. 1; xiv. 1; the wilderness provision in I Cor. x. 3, 4; "songs" and "understanding" in Eph. v. 19; Col. iii. 10, and i. 9; and of "persons" in Gal. vi. 1; and I Cor. xiv. 37.

The Corinthians were carnal, divided, and to them the apostle said: "And I, brethren, could not speak unto you as unto spiritual, but as unto carnal, even as unto babes in Christ" (I Cor. iii. 1). Here "spiritual" is opposed not only to "carnal", but to the condition of being "babes". By comparing Heb. v. 8 - vi. 1 with I Cor. ii. and iii. we find "spiritual" used as a parallel with "perfect" and opposed to "babes". A babe in Christ may be very godly, very Christ-like, but, according to this usage, would not be "spiritual". One more comparison with Heb. v., vi. and I Cor. ii., iii. makes us see that when the Church does reach the "perfect man" with its measure of the "full age of the fullness of Christ", it will be then, and then only, able to enjoy "spiritual" blessings.

Spiritual and heavenly.

There is one other passage that throws light upon Eph. i. 3. I Cor. xv., a chapter that is devoted to the theme of resurrection, we read: "There are heavenly bodies (epourania), and earthly bodies (epigeia) . . . . . there is a natural body (psuchikon), there is also a spiritual body (pneumatikon) (I Cor. xv. 40-44). Here we learn that a "spiritual body" and a "heavenly body" are parallel terms, which leads to the conclusion that "spiritual" blessings in "heavenly" places can only be enjoyed when we possess a "spiritual" and a "heavenly" body. This appears upon the surface of Eph. i., as we believe we shall be able to show when considering the references to the words "adoption", and "earnest".

Our conclusion is that the spiritual blessings that are ours according to the Will of the Father, and ours by reason of the redemption of Christ, and ours by reason of the earnest and the seal of the Spirit, will be ours in actual personal possession in that day when we shall attain unto the "purchased possession, unto the praise of His glory" (Eph. i. 14).

In another paper we must give attention to the other side of the question, namely, What are our possessions while here on earth?

#3. A guiding principle discovered by the analogy of Scripture.
pp. 186 - 191

In our former papers we sought to show that "super-heavenly" was warranted as a translation of epouraniois in Eph. i. 3, in the light of i. 20, 21 and iv. 10. We suggested that while all spiritual blessings were most truly ours "in Christ", they were not yet ours "in heavenly places", for the good reason that we were not actually there; but that what we did possess here, while we walked by faith yet still held by mortality, was the earnest of our inheritance, "until the redemption of the purchased possession", "unto the day of redemption".

In this connection a passage in Rom. viii. is sometimes quoted: "For the earnest expectation of the creature waiteth for the manifestation of the sons of God" (Rom. viii. 19). This must not read as though the sons of God were manifested now, for verse 23 shows that not only does the creature wait, but "ourselves also, who have the firstfruits of the Spirit, even we ourselves groan within ourselves, waiting for the adoption, the redemption of our body". The sons of God will be manifested, as such, at the resurrection, but till then they, too, must "groan" and "wait".

Ephesians tells us that we have "the earnest", not the full inheritance at present; Rom. viii. 23 repeats the thought by describing us as having "the firstfruits of the Spirit". Now the firstfruits were by no means the harvest, but a small pledge or earnest of the harvest yet to be. Christ Himself is the "Firstfruits of them that slept" (I Cor. xv. 20). Their resurrection is assured, and they may, even now, rise and walk in newness of life, but they dare not teach that "the resurrection is past already", for such would be serious untruth (II Tim. ii. 17, 18). The word "manifestation" in Rom. viii. 19 is apokalupsis, and it can easily be seen that just as the Lord Jesus is not yet "revealed", but is "expecting" (Heb. x. 13), so also must we, though sons of God, wait with earnest "expectation" for that day of revelation (Rom. viii. 23). Not only so, but Rom. viii. 24, 25 proceeds to remove any idea that the "revelation of the sons of God", or "the redemption of the body" obtains now, by saying:--

> "For we are saved by hope, but hope that is seen is not hope; for what a man seeth, why doth he yet hope for? But if we hope for that we see not, then do we with patience WAIT FOR (expect) it."

An O.T. illustration.

It may throw light upon the subject if we refer to a notable illustration of the principle underlying the scriptural answer to the question before us. It is provided by Abraham. Heb. xi. 8 tells us that when Abraham was called to leave Ur of the Chaldees, he knew that the place to which his steps were directed was to be his inheritance, yet he was an old man and his wife an old woman by the time they received the promise of a seed. Rom. iv. and Heb. xi. 12 tells us that so far as parenthood was concerned Abraham and Sarah were "as good as dead", and Abraham's faith is most definitely declared to be faith in God that "quickeneth the dead". Abraham knew most intimately the meaning of the words of Rom. viii. 11, in the quickening of the mortal body even before the actual and literal resurrection.

Quickened, but not raised and ruling.

But though Abraham got thus far, farther even than most of us can truthfully claim to have reached, yet observe the remarkable sequel. He had actually entered into the land of his inheritance, he had walked through the length and breadth of it, he had lifted up his eyes northward, southward, eastward, and westward (Gen. xiii. 14-17), and, as a direct sequel to this anticipatory possession, had refused "from a thread even to a shoelatchet" from the hand of the king of Sodom who was under heavy obligations to him (Gen. xiv. 21-23). He had met another king, even Melchisedec, and the truth associated with that typical king-priest, as taught in the epistle to the Hebrews, prevented Abraham from accepting "dominion" over the Canaanite or the king of Sodom. It rather led him to refuse all such anticipation, in the light of a deeper revelation made known to him.

The faith that awaits God's time.

Stephen draws attention to the deeply significant fact that although Abraham entered the land of promise in faith, nevertheless God "gave him none inheritance, no, not so much as to set his foot on, yet He promised that He would give it to him for a possession" (Acts vii. 5). The only piece of land that Abraham actually possessed was the field of Ephron and the cave of Macphelah, which he bought and paid for with 400 shekels of silver as a burial place for his wife (Gen. xxiii. 3-20). His own description of himself in that transaction was: "I am a stranger and a sojourner with you" (Gen. xxiii. 4). The reply of the Canaanite was: "Thou art a prince of God among us . . . . . none of us shall withhold from thee his sepulchre" (Gen. xxiii. 6). Who spoke the truth for the dispensation then obtaining? Abraham or Heth?

Some of our friends would have taken Abraham very seriously to task for his attitude. They would have demanded the operation of the law of the spirit of life over against the law of sin and death, and claimed the field of Ephron as a rightful possession. They would have considered the payment of the 400 shekels of silver as much a betrayal as the receiving of the shekels later by Judas himself. Yet Abraham was right. Hear the inspired comment:--

> "By faith he sojourned in the land of promise, as in a strange country, dwelling in tabernacles with Isaac and Jacob, the heirs with him of the same possession . . . . . These all died in faith, NOT HAVING RECEIVED the promises, but having seen them afar off, and were persuaded of them, and embraced them, and confessed that they were strangers and pilgrims in the land" (Heb. xi. 9 and 13).

Two reasons for waiting.

Two reasons are given for this renunciation; one in Heb. xi. and the other in Gen. xv. The first is that the Lord revealed to Abraham the glory of the heavenly city: "For he looked for a city . . . . . they desire a better country, that is an heavenly . . . . . He hath prepared for them a city" (Heb. xi. 10-16). This was something more than the inheritance originally promised. It became, to Abraham, what the prize of the out-resurrection becomes to the members of the One Body, which is also vitally associated with a heavenly citizenship (Phil. iii. 14-20). Abraham was well content to wait, to let his moderation be known to all men, to live as a pilgrim and a stranger in the land of his inheritance that he might reach out unto the prize made known to him.

Would it not be a steadying thought if members of the One Body realized that this present life is a blessed opportunity of suffering and enduring with and for Christ, "if by any means" a larger share in the glorious ministry soon to be set up may be entered upon? When you are tempted to ask, "What is the purpose for which I am here?" do not omit the possibility of qualifying for the highest of all service, that which is associated with the prize of our high calling. Those who see in Phil. iii. nothing more than a spiritual attainment in this life, differ essentially from our interpretation; the prize will never be attained apart from real conformity to the death of Christ; to such the literal and special resurrection will come as a very blessed event.

The second reason why Abraham was not, in his own lifetime, to inherit the land of promise was revealed to him as recorded in Gen. xv. 16: "The iniquity of the Amorites is not yet full." Abraham knew that he would die (though the Lord blessedly adds, "in peace"), and be buried in a good old age. He knew that his seed would go into bondage, and that they could not enter their inheritance for at least another 400 years. By consulting Deut. ii. 12-37 we see the beginning of the movement that ended in the possession of part, at least, of the land of promise. For us, the Amorite living in Canaan is but a type of the principalities and powers, the spiritual wickednesses that are in heavenly places, that still retain a hold upon their forfeited place. The iniquity of these spiritual Amorites is not yet full, and so we too must patiently await the day of redemption, which shall deliver us from a bondage worse than that of Egypt (Rom. viii. 19-25).

Had Abraham walked seven times round the walls of Jericho, the walls would not have fallen down flat; he would simply have exposed himself to ridicule, and the name of God to blasphemy. In Gen. xiv. 13 we find Abraham at peace with the Amorite, and his only battle for the rescue of his nephew Lot. When Joshua entered the land, however, nothing less than the utter destruction of the Amorite was required. Abraham was blessed by Melchisedec, king of Salem, when he returned from the slaughter of the four kings that had attacked Sodom. Joshua numbered among his enemies Adonizedec, king of Jerusalem, who, joined by four other kings, was put to death. No miracle is recorded when Abraham rescued Lot, but a stupendous miracle, a veritable "sign in heaven" is recorded in Josh. x. 1-14. It was enough that Abraham delivered Lot from the hand of the enemy; but Joshua bade the captains of Israel come and put their feet upon the necks of the captive Canaanite kings.

The conquest of the land under Joshua has a place in the typical teaching of Scripture for the believer now, and in so far as he enters by faith into his position with Christ, so will his realization of victory be more complete. But to act and to pray as though the day of redemption had come, and the redemption of the body were an accomplished fact, is to be under the spell of a falsehood, and must lead to disaster. "We are more than conquerors through Him that loved us" (Rom. viii. 37) is an incomplete quotation, and is often made to mean the very opposite of the truth. The full quotation is as follows:--

> "For Thy sake we are killed all the day long; we are accounted as sheep for the slaughter. Nay, IN ALL THESE THINGS we are more than conquerors, through Him that loved us."

The burden of the passage is that none shall separate us from the love of Christ, neither "tribulation, distress, persecution, famine, nakedness, peril, or sword", "neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord" (Rom. viii. 35-39). It is in this sense that we are more than conquerors, not in the sense of making a conquest over our enemies, Some take the stand, that seeing they are in Christ, and a part of a new creation, members of His body, and "far above all" it would be a sign of lack of faith ever to feel the stress of persecution, the shame of nakedness or the peril of the sword. Not so the apostle. It was the carnal Corinthians that made the boast that they "reigned as kings". The apostle said: "I would to God ye did reign, that we also might reign with you" (I Cor. iv. 8). Then follows that unparalleled list of suffering for Christ:--

> "God, I think, displayed us last as condemned criminals, a theatrical spectacle to the world, both to angels and men. We are fools for Christ's sake, but ye are wise in Christ; we are weak, but ye strong; ye glorious, but we dishonoured. Up to this very hour we both hunger and thirst, and are ill-clad, and are buffeted, and are hustled from place to place, and toil, working with our own hands; being abused, we bless; being persecuted, we endure; being reviled, we entreat; as refuse of all things are we become the offscouring of all things till now" (I Cor. iv. 9-13).

The true dominion is seen here. Not in boastful and carnal "reigning", as the Corinthians, but as the apostle in meek enduring. Paul reveals the spirit of the conqueror, the true king, the real dominion. When being reviled, he can intreat, when abused, he can bless. "In all these things" he is "more than conquerors" through Christ. During this present life dominion of the character of reigning on a throne is not experienced. Rather are we left as pilgrims and strangers, though joint-heirs with Christ. The position is that of those graciously allowed (Phil. i. 29, Gk.) to share the sufferings of Christ, while confidently looking forward to the glory. When we triumphantly exclaim (I Cor. xv. 55-57), "O grave, where is thy victory? . . . . . thanks be to God, which giveth us the victory, through our Lord Jesus Christ", we do not delude ourselves with the idea that we are no longer mortal, neither do we act as though death is for ever removed from us. It would help us if we remembered that Christ did not die to save us from dying, but to save us from death, and to apply this fact to the two phases of experimental redemption, the present, with its limitations, and the future, with its "liberty and glory".

Let us ponder the two reasons given in Heb. xi. and Gen. xv. as to why Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and the seed of promise could all die in faith NOT HAVING RECEIVED.

The Coming of the Lord.

#1. The O.T. foundation.
The prophecy of Enoch.
pp. 33 - 40

The reader may remember that in a previous number we touched upon the reason why the testimony of the second coming of the Lord does not figure in our pages so prominently as some may have been led to expect. We trust that what we then said will have allayed any suspicion of unfaithfulness. We do not wish, however, to let such a subject remain in a negative position, but would rather take our stand upon positive truth; therefore we ask the reader to come with us to the Word to search and see what has been written for our learning upon this important subject.

The O.T. basis.

To commence our study with the testimony of the Gospel according to Matthew is to attempt to build without a foundation. The teaching of Matthew and the bulk of the New Testament rests upon the teaching of the Old Testament, not only for the fulfillment of prophecy in the coming of the Lord as redeemer, but also for His coming again as the hope of His people.

It would not be difficult to prove that the very terms of Adam's creation look forward to the second coming of the Lord. For example, the reference to the dominion given to man, in Psa. viii., Psa. lxxii., Dan. ii. & vii., and Heb. ii., &c., seems to look forward to the coming reign of Christ. The description of the garden of Eden looks forward to Rev. xxii., and the promise that the Seed of the woman should bruise the serpent's head awaits the second coming of the Lord for its fulfillment.

These passages, however, are too indirect for our present purpose, so the first point to which we call attention is

The prophecy of Enoch.

The words that constitute Enoch's prophecy are not recorded in Gen. v., but it matters not who it is that has preserved his utterance so long as it is found within the pages of Scripture. We are indebted to Jude for the record. He writes:--

> "And Enoch also, the seventh from Adam, prophesied of these, saying, Behold, the Lord cometh with ten thousands of His saints, to execute judgment upon all, and to convince all that are ungodly among them of all their ungodly deeds which they have ungodly committed, and of all their hard speeches which ungodly sinners have spoken against Him" (Jude 14, 15).

Before we can understand the import of this prophecy, we must observe the general trend of the epistle in order to see the appositeness of Enoch's witness. If we glance at the earlier verses of Jude we shall see not only a reference to human sin of a deep dye in the mention of Sodom and Gomorrah, but a reference also to angels who kept not their first estate, and are therefore reserved for judgment.

Looking to the end of the epistle, such outstanding apostates as Cain, Balaam and Korah are brought forward as examples of the mockers who shall come in the last times. It is time, therefore, that we consider the structure of the epistle to see just where Enoch's prophecy comes.

It will be seen that Jude's testimony is directed to one point, viz., the judgment of the Lord upon ungodliness. Yet he ranges the whole ground of Scripture, and, by bringing forward the angels that sinned, and Michael's rebuke of Satan, penetrates into depths beyond our understanding. It is also evident that to lift Jude 14 and 15 out of its context, and generalize thereupon, will not help us to understand truth.

Enoch's prophecy is connected with a sin in which not only men, but Satan and fallen angels are involved. There is no reticence on Jude's part to indicate something of its evil character. The sin of the angels is likened to that of Sodom and Gomorrah, and those who follow in their evil train are likened to brute beasts that corrupt themselves, being called "spots in their feasts of love". Of both angels and men it is written that they have been "reserved" in darkness for judgment (verses 6 and 13).

Ungodliness.

We have long seen that the words "ungodliness" and "godliness", by reason of their antithesis in the epistles, and the expression "the mystery of godliness", must have a far deeper meaning than "piety" or the lack of this virtue. This depth of meaning is evident in Jude's epistle where the three words asebeia, asebeo and asebes are found six times.

> "Ungodly men, who turned the grace of God into lasciviousness" (verse 4).
> "To convict all that are ungodly, of their ungodly deeds, which they have ungodly committed, by ungodly sinners" (verse 15).
> "Mockers who walk after their ungodly lusts" (verse 18).

The sin of angels, Sodom and Satan, together with the sin that shall be judged at the coming of the Lord, is denominated ungodliness. Peter confirms this, for in his second epistle he speaks of the angels that sinned in the time of Noah, and of Sodom, Gomorrah, and Balaam, and speaks of the flood coming upon the world of the ungodly. Sodom and Gomorrah are examples of those that live ungodly; Lot is an example of the deliverance of the godly, and of the fire reserved by the Lord for the day of judgment and perdition of ungodly men (II Pet. ii., iii.).

We must refer to II Peter again after we have pointed out the necessity of an important revision of Jude 14, 15. A literal rendering of the words of Enoch must read: "Behold, the Lord came." While the true rendering of the aorist of the Greek verb is still somewhat of a moot point, the rightness of the above rendering is confirmed by the general usage and rendering of the A.V. The interested student may test this by noting the occurrences of elthe (part of the verb erchomai, "to come"), which is usually translated "came". If Enoch said, "Behold, the Lord came", he must have been referring back to some judgment that was past when he spoke. To what could he refer? The judgment of the flood had not then taken place, neither had judgment fallen upon Babel. The description given of the judgment could not refer to Gen. iii. or iv. To what then could it refer?

The reader will probably have traveled back in mind to Gen. i. 2, to the katabole kosmou, "the overthrow of the world". This connection is more than countenanced by Peter in his second epistle which we have already found to be parallel with that of Jude.

The second coming and the overthrow (Gen. i. 2).

Jude says:--

> "Remember ye the words which were spoken before of the apostles of our Lord Jesus Christ; how that they told you there should be mockers in the last time, who should not walk after their own ungodly lusts" (verses 17 and 18).

Peter says:--

> "I stir up your pure minds by way of remembrance. That ye may be mindful of the words which were spoken before by . . . . . the apostles of the Lord and Saviour . . . . . there shall come in the last day mockers, walking after their own lusts, and saying, Where is the promise of His coming? for since the fathers fell asleep, all things continue right through as they were from the beginning of the creation. For this they willingly are ignorant of, that by the Word of God the heavens are of old, and the earth standing out of the water and in the water: whereby the world that then was, being overflowed with water, perished" (II Pet. iii. 1-6).

The mockers denied that there had been any interference in the form of judgment ever since the creation. They therefore denied the overthrow of the world in Gen. i. 2.

Enoch took up this line of teaching. He, too, uttered the solemn word: "Behold, the Lord came", and his reference to angels and Satan, as well as to man, removes any sense of disproportion. Enoch named his son Methuselah, which means, "At his death it (namely, the flood) shall be", and in the year that Methuselah died the flood came.

Jude now takes up Enoch's witness, coupled with Peter's words (II Pet. ii., iii.), and links together (1) the overthrow of the world that then was (Gen. i. 2), (2) the flood (Gen. vi., vii.), and (3) the second coming of the Lord, which shall be accompanied by a deluge of fire. This is indeed a solemn aspect of the coming of the Lord.

Two items of importance now demand our attention:--

1. The statement that this Enoch was "the seventh from Adam".
2. The reference to "ten thousands of His saints".

"The seventh from Adam."—Why should it be necessary for Jude to pause in the midst of his utterance to make this remark? The reason is that there is a great need to be on our guard against deception and false prophets, and as there are two named Enoch in the book of Genesis (the one being the true seed of Adam, the other being in the line of Cain), this warning becomes necessary. It may be that the warning should not be passed by without due consideration. Let us go back to the early chapters of Genesis and learn the lesson contained in the note, "Enoch, the seventh from Adam".

Adam's true line omits Cain and his seed. This may be tested by consulting the genealogies given in Gen. v., I Chron. i. 1, and Luke iii. 38, where the order is always the same. Cain was of that wicked one, and his seed are prophetic of the seed of the serpent. The two lines are given in Genesis with the following close parallels emphasized:--

Adam's line (Gen. v.).	Cain's line (Gen. iv. 17-24).
Seth.	ENOCH.
Enos.	Irad.
Cainan.	Mehujael.
Mahalaleel.	METHUSAEL.
Jared.	LAMECH (70*7 vengeance).
ENOCH.	Jabel.
METHUSELAH.	Jubal.
LAMECH (777 years).	Tubal-cain
Noah.

It will be seen that there is evidently some kind of anticipation and counterfeit in some of the names given to Cain's seed. Their likeness, however, is limited to their names only. Enoch, the son of Cain, is connected with the founding of a city in the land of Cain's wanderings, whereas the true Enoch is taken from the earth and its ungodliness. Methusael and Methuselah both name their sons Lamech! Lamech's sons in the line of Cain are concerned in a further attempt to cover with a veneer the earth that is cursed, whereas the true Lamech names his son Noah, looking away to the rest that God alone can give.

The first words of the Lord's answer to the disciples' question concerning the sign of His coming were:-- > "Take heed that no man deceived you, for many shall come in My name, saying, I am the Christ; and shall deceive many" (Matt. xxiv. 4, 5).

Peter gives this warning in II Pet. ii.; so also does Jude whose citation of Enoch's prophecy we are studying. He says:--

> "There are certain men crept in unawares, who were before of old ordained to this condemnation, ungodly men . . . . . woe unto them, they have gone in the way of Cain . . . . . Enoch prophesied of these . . . . ."

Scripture has given us warning that the teaching concerning the coming of the Lord will not escape corruption.

"Ten thousands of His saints."—These words are quoted by Moses in the blessing of Israel:--

> "The Lord came from Sinai, and rose up from Seir unto them; He shined forth from Mount Paran, and He came with ten thousands of His saints: from His right hand went a fiery law for them" (Deut. xxxiii. 2).

There can be no doubt as to the meaning of the word "saints" here. The law of Sinai we know from various Scriptures was mediated by angels (Acts vii. 53; Gal. iii. 9; Heb. ii. 2).

> "The chariots of God are twenty thousand, even thousands of angels: the Lord is among them as in Sinai" (Psa. lxviii. 17).
> "A fiery stream issued and came forth from before Him; thousand thousands ministered unto Him, and ten thousand times ten thousand stood before Him" (Dan. vii. 10).
>
> "For the Son of man shall come in the glory of His Father with His angels" (Matt. xvi. 27; xxv. 31).
> "The Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven with his mighty angels" (II Thess. i. 7).

These quotations are sufficient to prove that the "saints" or "holy ones" of Enoch's prophecy are "angels" and not the redeemed. This also is the meaning of Zech. xiv. 5: "And the Lord my God shall come, and all the saints with Thee", and of Joel iii. 11: "Thither cause Thy mighty ones to come down, O Lord"; also of I Thess. iii. 13: "The coming of our Lord Jesus Christ with all His saints."

We can imagine that though there has been agreement so far, some of our readers will dissent from this last reference being included in the list.

Coming "for" and "with" His saints.

There is quite a school of prophetic thought that stresses the coming of the Lord "for" and the coming of the Lord "with" His saints. Supposing for the purpose of argument we accept this view, how does it stand examination? The Thessalonians were waiting for God's Son from heaven (i. 10), and exercising the patience of hope (i. 3). They were told that their loved ones who had died would not meet the Lord earlier or later than those living at the time, but that both living and dead would be caught up together to meet the Lord in the air (iv. 15, 16). Well then, what are we to make of I Thess. iii. 13:--

> "To the end He may establish your hearts unblameable in holiness before God, even our Father, at the coming of the Lord Jesus Christ, with all His saints."

If these "saints" are His redeemed people, and if the Thessalonians were to wait for the Lord to come with all His redeemed people, then what place do the Thessalonians occupy? They were redeemed, they certainly were not the unwatchful who might have been left behind, for they were to be established "unblameable in holiness", and if such can be left behind, who then shall go? The distinction between "coming for" and "coming with" excludes those to whom the apostle wrote, and contradicts the express statements of I Thess. iv. 15, 16, and v. 10. If we take I Thess. iii. 13 to speak of the "holy ones", the "saints" of Deut. xxxiii. and of Enoch's prophecy, we have the coming of the Lord with His angels and for His people set before us with clearness and without contradictory statements.

It is interesting to note that the Sinaitic MS reads: "ten thousand of His holy angels." The angels that shall come at the end of the age are doubtless the same that were instrumental in bringing about the overthrow of Gen. i. and all the divine interpositions through the ages.

> "And the armies which were in heaven followed Him upon white horses, clothed in fine linen, white and clean . . . . . and the beast was taken, and with him the false prophet . . . . . These both were cast alive into a lake of fire burning with fire and brimstone" (Rev. xix. 14-20).

When once we are clear as to the fact that "the saints" of Enoch's prophecy are the holy angels, we begin to realize their relation in the context with the fallen angels. Moreover, the structure shows that Michael the archangel is placed in correspondence with the Lord and His angels, and both in conflict with Satan. Enoch's prophecy with its reference to Gen. i. 2, taken in conjunction with II Pet. iii., where it is stated that 'the world that then was' was destroyed by water, and the heavens and earth which are now shall be destroyed by fire, lifts the doctrine of the second coming into its true place in the purpose of the ages. There has been a tendency to look upon the second coming as a kind of afterthought, the next best thing that could be done in the circumstances. What we call "the second coming" was demanded by the purpose of the ages, whether Israel had received their Messiah and His prior presentation or not. Let the scoffers say what they will.

> "Behold, the Lord CAME" (Jude 14), and
> "He that SHALL COME will come, and will not tarry" (Heb. x. 37).

#2. The patience of Job.
pp. 69 - 72

> "Oh that my words were now written! Oh that they were printed in a book! That they were graven with an iron pen and lead in the rock for ever!" (Job xix. 23, 24).

What was it that was of such consequence that Job wished a permanent record of it to be kept, comparable to a granite monument with its leaded letters? A Cenotaph, indeed, for the meaning of the word Cenotaph is "An empty tomb", and that is what came before the eye of Job in his distress. He said that He was a stranger to his wife and children, his friends abhorred him, and they whom he had loved turned from him. His bones clave to his skin, and he had escaped by the skin of his teeth. As we read this chapter we get some sense of Job's utter extremity, and then it is that he utters the words that he wished could be graven in the rock for ever. What were they?

> "For I know that my Redeemer liveth, and that He shall stand in the latter day upon the earth: and (following the margin) after I shall awake, though this body be destroyed, yet out of my flesh shall I see God, Whom I shall see for myself, and mine eyes shall behold, and not another. My reins within me are consumed with earnest desire (for that day)" (Job xix. 25-27).

The marginal reading treats the word or, "my skin", as part of the verb ur; "to awake", both of these words are expressed by the same letters in the Hebrew, namely, ayin, vav, and resh. It is difficult for unaided reasoning to come to a conclusion here, and we therefore felt is was an opportunity for the Word to prove itself. Consequently we collected all the occurrences in Job of the verb ur, to awake, and noted what happened when we added Job xix. 26 to the list. The moment we did so we saw the shaping together of the living Word, and this was confirmed by a most strange rendering.

When comparing the first and the last occurrences together, at first sight there did not appear any connection, and we have made it a rule in seeking the structure of Scripture to avoid the invention of headings lest we lead ourselves astray. Then suddenly these two passages took their place; the correspondence can be seen by consulting the margin of Job iii. 8, for there we find the word "leviathan". Into the meaning of the expression "to raise up leviathan" we will not enter, as it has served its purpose by fixing the structure and the inclusion of Job xix. 25-27 seems necessary to avoid breaking that which appears to be an inspired design.

The Hebrew ur, to raise, in Job.

A | iii. 8. Raise up leviathan.
B | viii. 6. Bildad's challenge.
C | xiv. 12-14.

> "So man lieth down, and riseth not, till the heavens be no more they shall not awake, nor be raised out of sleep . . . . . all the days of my appointed time will I wait until my change come."

D | xvii. 8. The innocent raise up against the hypocrite.
C | xix. 26, 27.

> "After I shall awake, though this body be destroyed, yet out of my flesh shall I see God: Whom I shall see for myself."

B | xxx. 29. Job's answer.
A | xli. 10. None dare raise him up (leviathan, verse 1).

The parallel is complete, and as the whole matter turns upon whether we read the Hebrew word as "skin", or part of the verb "to raise", the balance of thought seems clearly to point the way to a solution. The LXX appears to have attempted something in the nature of a compromise. It has accepted the idea as we have stated it and translated ur by anastesai, "to raise up", but it slips in the word derma, "skin", to supply the ellipsis. The Alexandrian version reads soma, "body", instead of derma. We have therefore the added testimony of this most ancient translation to help us.

Our special enquiry, however, is connected with the coming of the Lord. We therefore pass over the title Redeemer, merely drawing attention to the articles on Redemption for its meaning and fulness. Job was not limiting his vision to the truth of the Saviour at Bethlehem, but looked on to "the latter day", a term parallel with "the last day" of the prophets. Moreover, he looked to see his Redeemer standing in the latter day "upon the earth". The parallel passage (Job xiv. 12) tells us that this shall not take place "till the heavens be no more", which refers to the same period as II Pet. iii. 7, 10, 11, Rev. xx. 11, and Isa. li. 6. Job entertained no hope of "going to heaven". He belonged to that company who will wake after the Millennium, when "the heavens be no more".

If Job must be numbered with those who shall stand before the great white throne, and if Job be mentioned in Scripture as an example of patience (James v. 11), and righteousness (Ezek. xiv. 14), it but adds to the problem of those who maintain that all who stand before the great white throne are necessarily doomed. It may be objected that no mention is made in Job xix. of the "coming" of the Lord, and that this passage is not relevant to the subject of this series. The references to the latter day speak of Job's Redeemer at a period far removed from the period of His earthly life. Its close association also with the resurrection necessitates the second coming. Job had a foretaste of this hope even during his life. He could say: "now mine eye seeth Thee" (xlii. 5). "So the Lord blessed the latter end of Job more than his beginning" (xlii. 12).

The proverbial beauty of his daughters, one of whom was named, "A horn for paint" or "Paint box" (verses 14, 15), and the words of xxxiii. 25, viz., "His flesh shall be fresher than a child's; he shall return to the days of his youth", are consistent with the fact that Job was completely restored to health, and furnish a picture of the resurrection of that company wider than either Israel or the Church, whose place in Scripture has not been given the consideration that its importance warrants.

Thus far we have seen the testimony of men who lived before Israel's day. Apart from Balaam's prophetic allusion to the second coming, under the figure of the star and the sceptre, the remaining passages must of necessity be taken from the prophecies and psalms of Israel, but while Jerusalem and the Land, together with the nation of Israel, are central in this great section, we remember that, after all, the blessings that are to follow.

#3. The Prayers of David.
pp. 97 - 101

The song of Moses (Exod. xv. 1-19), uttered at the overthrow of Pharaoh, necessitates the second coming for its true fulfillment, and it can never be complete until it is coupled with the song of the Lamb, sung, not upon the shores of the Red Sea, but of a sea of glass mingled with fire, celebrating a victory, not over Pharaoh, but over the beast and his image (Rev. xv. 1-3). The song of Moses, just before his death (Deut. xxxii. 36-42), equally looks forward to the second coming for its fulfillment. These passages, however, may be considered too vague to stand alone, and can be better appreciated when the more precise statements of other Scriptures have been read. Traversing the history of Israel to the time of the kingdom, we find embedded in the Psalms several testimonies to the second coming of the Lord.

When "Herod, and Pontius Pilate, with the Gentiles and the people of Israel were gathered together" (Acts iv. 27), there was a germinal fulfillment of the opening of Psalm ii. "The kings of the earth", however, are to gather again, with a mightier front: "And I saw the beast; and the kings of the earth, and their armies gathered together to make war against Him that sat on the horse" (Rev. xix. 19).

The answer of the Lord to this rebellion is: "Yet have I set My King upon My holy hill of Zion" (Psa. ii. 6). When this takes place, the kingdoms of this world become the kingdoms of the Lord and of His Anointed (Rev. xi. 15); "the nations are angry" (Rev. xi. 18), and the wrath of the Son has come (Rev. xi. 18; Psa. ii. 12). Then it is that the request of Psa. ii. 8 will be made and answered: "Ask of Me, and I will give Thee the heathen for Thine inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for Thy possession."

Except in a very figurative way, this passage can receive no fulfillment during this dispensation. It is bounded on either side by conditions that are foreign to the church of the mystery, viz.: (1) The Lord must be set as King upon Zion. (2) This inheritance is not explained in the terms of converts and missions, but as the administration of justice and judgment: "Thou shalt break them with a rod of iron; Thou shalt dash them in pieces like a potter's vessel." The time for the fulfillment of this passage is the day of the Lord (Rev. ii. 27, xii. 5, xix. 15), when the Lord's Anointed shall ride forth from heaven as King of kings and Lord of lords. Psa. ii., then, must be included in our survey of the O.T. witness to the second coming.

A whole set of Psalms may be said to assume the fact of the second coming of the Lord. This applies to Psalms that speak of the Lord reigning as king in their midst, or over all the earth, as Psa. xlv., xlvi., xlvii., and also Psa. xlviii. where Jerusalem is seen as the city of the great King.

Psa. l. is more positive in its references to the second coming:--

> "The mighty God, even the Lord, hath spoken, and called the earth from the rising of the sun unto the going down thereof. Out of Zion, the perfection of beauty, God hath shined. Our God shall come, and shall not keep silence: a fire shall devour before Him, and it shall be very tempestuous round about Him. He shall call to the heavens from above, and to the earth, that He may judge His people. Gather My saints together unto Me."

There are many features here that underlie statements in the N.T. The world-wide address reminds us of Matt. xxiv. 27, the fire and the tempest at His coming reminds us of Matt. xxiv. 29, 30, while the call to the heavens seems to refer to "angels" who gather "together His elect from the four winds" (Matt. xxiv. 31). "His saints" are evidently "Israel" (Psa. l. 7).

In his Psalms David looks forward to the coming of the Lord as the great goal of his desire. At the end of Psa. lxxii. he says: "The prayers (or praises) of David the son of Jesse are ended", and this climax is the Psalm of the King's Son. There we read of this great King as the Judge and Deliverer of the poor and needy. Peace and prosperity are the result of His reign. His dominion is from sea to sea, and from the river unto the ends of the earth. All kings fall down before Him, all nations serve Him, and bless Him. The whole earth is full of His glory.

The figure used in verse 6 is apt to be misunderstood: "He shall come down like rain upon the mown grass." There is no word for "grass" in this verse, the word translated "mown grass" being gez, which is also rendered by the word "fleece" and "mowings". To the farmer it is a disaster, not a blessing, for rain to fall upon his new mown grass. What the passage really refers to is the fall of the rain upon the parched earth after the grass has been cut and removed, as expressed in Amos vii. 1: "The beginning of the shooting up of the latter growth: and lo, it was the latter growth after the king's mowings." The figure of Psa. lxxii. is that the coming of the Lord will be like the latter rain. Israel shall grow and flourish a second time, there shall be a blessed aftermath, they shall revive and their end shall be glorious.

II Sam. xxiii. 1-5 should be read in conjunction with Psa. lxxii.: "Now these be the last words of David . . . . . this is all my desire." These words are in much the same spirit as Psa. lxxii. 20. Both passages look forward to "The Kings' Son"; "He that ruleth over men must be just, ruling in the fear of God." The figure, however, is changed from that of refreshing rain upon the grass that has been cut, to the beneficent sunshine after the rain has fallen: "And He shall be as the light of the morning, when the sun riseth, even a morning without clouds; as the tender grass springing out of the earth by clear shining after rain."

These passages help us to answer the question: "What will it be when the King comes?"

Psa. lxxxii. is prophetic of Israel's day of trouble: 'They said, Come, and let us cut them off from being a nation; that the name of Israel may be no more in remembrance." In this extremity they cry to the Lord: "Keep not silence, O God: hold not Thy peace, and be not still, O God." The tumult of the enemies, and the "crafty counsel" taken against the Lord's hidden ones, turn the mind back to Psa. ii. Moreover, remembering that Moab and Ammom are the children of Lot, it is interesting to note that "ten nations" are mentioned in Psa. lxxxiii. 6-8, and these are raised to be "confederate" against the Lord. These foreshadow the ten kings of Rev. xvii. 12.

Coming to Psa. xcvi. we read of millennial conditions. All the earth is called upon to "Sing unto the Lord as new song". His glory is to be declared among the nations, and the Gentiles are called upon to bring an offering and to come into His courts.

> "Say among the heathen, The Lord reigneth . . . . . let the heavens rejoice, and let the earth be glad, let the sea roar and the fulness thereof . . . . . FOR HE COMETH, for He cometh to judge the earth."

This coming is further described in the next Psalm:--

> "The Lord reigneth, let the earth rejoice; let the multitude of the isles be glad thereof. Clouds and darkness are round about Him . . . . . a fire goeth before Him . . . . . The hills melt like wax AT THE PRESENCE of the Lord, at the presence of the Lord of the whole earth."

Psa. xcviii. ends with the words "For He cometh", &c., and gives additional details of that day. Psa. cx. anticipates the coming of the Lord:--

> "The Lord said unto My Lord, Sit Thou at My right hand until I make Thine enemies Thy footstool. The Lord shall send the rod of Thy strength out of Zion . . . . . the Lord at Thy right hand shall strike through kings in the day of His wrath."

The closing words of Psa. cl.: "Let everything that hath breath praise the Lord, Praise ye the Lord", look forward to Rev. v. 13 for the time of their fulfillment.

The witness of the Psalms to the second coming of the Lord shews Israel to be the people, Zion the city, and the Lord's coming like rain and sunshine on the one hand, and like fire and tempest on the other. It is a day of wrath as well as of blessing. The nations of the earth are vitally connected with this coming, and its central idea is that of a coming King. The hope of the church, as such, is not expressed in these Psalms, and however they may minister to our comfort and help, their prophetic burden looks away to a blessed time on the earth, and not to the blessed hope of the manifestation in glory for which the church waits (Col. iii. 4; Titus ii. 11-14).

Enoch's prophecy, Job's patience, Moses' song and David's prayer, all bear their testimony that the Lord is coming to this earth once again. Coming in judgment upon the ungodly (Enoch), coming with resurrection life for those who own Him as Redeemer (Job), coming to lead a mightier exodus than that through the Red Sea (Moses), coming to reign as the greater than Solomon, David's Son and David's Lord.

#4. The Vision of Isaiah.
pp. 136 - 139

We have seen in another series that the burden of all the prophets is the restoration of Israel. This being so, it is impossible for the prophets to be silent upon the second coming of the Lord, for Peter shews the restoration and the coming to be inseparable.

> "The times of refreshing . . . . . and He shall send Jesus Christ . . . . . Whom the heavens must receive until the times of the restitution of all things, which God hath spoken by the mouth of all His holy prophets since the world began" (Acts iii. 19-21).

If we read Acts iii. 21 and I Thess. iv. 16 together:--

> "Whom the heavens must receive until . . . . ."
> "The Lord Himself shall descend from heaven . . . . ."

--it seems clear that the latter passage must refer to this hope of Israel and, seeing that years after I Thess. iv. was written Paul still entertained the hope of Israel (Acts xxviii. 20), the conclusion becomes practically certain.

In chapter xi. 4 is a passage which, taken alone, may not be said to speak of the Lord's coming, yet no N.T. reader who has read II Thess. i. and ii. can avoid the evident connection:--

> "He shall smite the earth with the rod of His mouth, and with the breath of His lips shall He slay the wicked" (Isa. xi. 4).
> "The Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven with His mighty angels, in flaming fire taking vengeance" (II Thess. i. 7, 8).
> "Then shall that wicked be revealed, whom the Lord shall consume with the spirit of His mouth, and shall destroy with the brightness of His coming" (II Thess. ii. 8).

It is, then, fairly evident that II Thess. and Isa. xi. both deal with the same coming, but we shall see fuller corroborative detail when examining N.T. passages.

The results upon earth that follow this coming are set out in the well-known passage that speaks of the wolf and the lamb dwelling together, and of this blessing being intimately connected with the holy mountain of God (Isa. xi. 9). In verse 11 the words "the second time" are used, and we cannot separate these words from the second coming of the Lord:--

> "And it shall come to pass in that day, that the Lord shall set His hand again the second time to recover the remnant of His people."

This feature was impressed by Stephen upon his hearers, when he spoke of Joseph and of Moses:--

> "And at the second time Joseph was made known to his brethren" (Acts vii. 13).
>
> "This Moses whom they refused, saying, Who made thee a ruler and a judge? the same did God send to be a ruler and a deliverer" (Acts vii. 35).
>
> "His citizens hated Him, and sent a message after Him, saying, We will not have this man to reign over us. And it came to pass, that when He was returned, having received the kingdom . . . . ." (Luke xix. 14, 15).
> "Unto them that look for Him shall He appear the second time without sin unto salvation" (Heb. ix. 28).

Isa. xxxiv. and xxxv. deal with "The day of the Lord's vengeance, and the year of recompenses for the controversy of Zion" (Isa. xxxiv. 8). "Behold, your God will come with vengeance, even God with a recompense; He will come and save you" (Isa. xxxv. 4).

Owing to the events that are revealed as accompanying it, there can be but one period when this day of vengeance takes place:--

> "All the host of heaven shall be dissolved, and the heavens shall be rolled together as a scroll: and all their host shall fall down, as the leaf falleth off from the vine, and as a falling fig from a fig tree" (Isa. xxxiv. 4).
> "The day of the Lord will come as a thief in the night; in the which the heavens shall pass away with a great noise, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat, the earth also and the works that are therein shall be burned up" (II Pet. iii. 10).

Not only must Isa. xxxiv. and xxxv. refer to the day of the Lord yet future, but they must refer to the period covered by the sixth seal, for Rev. vi. 12-17 reads:--

> "And I behold when He had opened the sixth seal; and, lo, there was a great earthquake: and the sun became black as sackcloth of hair, and the moon became as blood. And the stars of heaven fell unto the earth, even as a fig tree casteth her untimely figs, when she is shaken of a mighty wind. And the heaven departed as a scroll when it is rolled together . . . . . for the great day of His wrath is come."

"Vengeance" and "recompense" are shown equally divided between Isa. xxxiv. and xxxv. The former chapter speaks of the Lord's sword being filled with blood, streams being turned into pitch, and the dust into brimstone; the latter of the day when the blind shall see, the deaf hear, the lame leap as an hart, and the tongue of the dumb sing; when the ransomed of the Lord shall return and come to Zion, and sorrow and sighing shall flee away.

"Vengeance" and "recompense" are apparent again in Isa. lix. 16-21 where we read: "The Redeemer shall come to Zion, and unto them that turn from transgression in Jacob, saith the Lord" (verse 20). This verse, quoted by Paul in Rom. xi. 26 as taking place when the fulness of the Gentiles shall come in, prevents acceptance of the interpretation that this coming to Zion took place during the earthly life of Christ.

Isa. lxiii. 1-5 takes up the same theme. In Isa. xxxiv. the scene is laid in "Bozrah and Edom"; In Isa. lxiii. it is for Edom; the chapters refer to identical places. Isa. lxiii. moreover, speaks of the same dual object: "The day of vengeance" and "The year of My redeemed" (verse 4).

The reference to the garments of the Lord being stained with blood connects the passage with Rev. xix.:--

> "And I saw heaven opened, and behold a white horse, and He that sat upon him . . . . . He was clothed with a vesture dipped in blood; and His name is called the Word of God . . . . . and He treadeth the winepress of the fierceness and wrath of Almighty God" (verses 11-16).

Isa. lxiii. 3 says, "I have trodden the winepress alone", and its contexts and parallels forbid the poetic interpretation put upon it in the hymn that associates this passage with the Lord's sufferings on the cross.

The last reference we shall make to Isaiah is that of lxiv. 1: "Oh that Thou wouldest rend heavens, that Thou wouldest come down, that the mountains might flow down at Thy presence." Israel recognizes at last that they are the clay, and the Lord the Potter (verse 8): they beseech for mercy on the ground of being the Lord's people (verse 9). Zion and Jerusalem are called the holy cities of the Lord, and they are described as being a wilderness and a desolation (verse 10): the holy and beautiful house, where their fathers had praised the Lord, had been burned with fire (verse 11): and then comes the cry corresponding to that with which the chapter opened: "Wilt Thou refrain Thyself for these things, O Lord? Wilt Thou hold Thy peace, and afflict us sore?"

Isaiah ends on the same note as does John in the Revelation, "Even so, come". The wide creation makes the same appeal, while the church of the mystery is exhorted to "live . . . . . looking for that blessed hope".

There can be no cry to Israel and Jerusalem of, "Comfort ye, comfort ye", without the accompanying "voice of him that crieth in the wilderness,. Prepare ye the way of the Lord". What John the Baptist did at the first coming of the Lord, Elijah is destined to do at the second coming. Restoration and Return are inseparable.

#5. Daniel's Dream.
pp. 177 - 179

Strictly speaking Daniel's dream is recorded in chapter vii. of his prophecy, but under our heading we must include Nebuchadnezzar's dream recorded in Dan. ii. The general outline of the latter is fairly generally known by students of the Word, and until we arrive at the prophecy as a part of our systematic study, the consideration of controversial features must be deferred. Without therefore going beyond what is actually written in Dan. ii., we may say with confidence that at the close of Gentile dominion on this earth, when it shall have passed through the several phases symbolized by gold, silver, brass, iron and clay, this dominion shall be suddenly and violently shattered, and in its place God shall establish a kingdom that shall never be destroyed (see Dan. ii. 44).

Daniel's dream, given in chapter vii., shows that the setting up of this kingdom takes place at the second coming of the Lord. Once more we adhere to the one theme before us, deferring the question as to whether the four beasts are parallel with the metals of Nebuchadnezzar's image, or whether they have a different time period both for commencement and for fulfillment. The theme of the second coming is found in verses 9-14. In these verses we have the apocalypse of the O.T.:--

> "I beheld till the thrones were set, and the Ancient of days did sit, Whose garment was white as snow, and the hair of His head like the pure wool: His throne was like the fiery flame, and His wheels as burning fire. A fiery stream issued and came forth from before Him: thousand thousands ministered unto Him, and ten thousand times ten thousand stood before Him: the judgment was set, and the books were opened . . . . . I saw in the night visions, and behold one like the Son of man came with the clouds of heaven, and came to the Ancient of days, and they brought Him near before Him. And there was given Him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all people, nations, and languages should serve Him; His dominion is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away, and His kingdom that which shall not be destroyed" (Dan. vii. 9-14).

Daniel, desiring fuller information concerning the dream, asked one of them that stood by concerning it. He was told that the saints of the Most High would take the kingdom, and in answer to a yet closer questioning concerning the fourth beast and the ten horns, he was told the condition of things that would obtain at the end, when the beast would blaspheme God, and "wear out the saints of the Most High". This, however, was for a time; oppression would at length give place to judgment.

> "And the kingdom and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven, shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High, Whose kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and all dominions shall serve and obey Him" (Dan. vii. 27).

The sphere of the dream, as also of Nebuchadnezzar's is limited to the kingdoms of this world. It is "under the whole heaven" (vii 27), it fills "the whole earth" (ii. 35), it takes the place of kingdoms ruled by man, and its dominion includes peoples, nations and languages. A reference to Dan. iii. 4 will show that this was the language of Nebuchadnezzar's proclamation when the herald called upon all in his dominion to bow down to the golden image in the plain of Dura. There is moreover a parallel with this in the dominion of Babylon at the time of the end; "The waters which thou sawest . . . . . are peoples, and multitudes, and nations, and tongues" (Rev. xvii. 15). It is also the description of the dominion of the beast: "Power was given him over all kindreds, and tongues, and nations" (Rev. xiii. 7). At the sounding of the seventh trumpet "the kingdoms of this world become the kingdoms of our Lord, and of His Christ; and He shall reign unto the ages of the ages" (Rev. xi. 15). There is no necessity to labour the proof of the identity of the dreams of Daniel and the visions of John. Both refer to the Son of man at His coming to the earth to rule and reign.

A feature that we omitted in the quotation of Dan. vii. 9-14 deals with the beast, his blasphemy and his doom in the burning flame. This is delineated in the latter chapters of Daniel, and is also given prominence in the Revelation. The time of the second coming, referred to by Daniel as the "day of the Lord", is fixed by reference to II Thess. ii.; and it is definitely related to the end of the age in its close association with Israel and the earthly kingdom.

Many items of deep interest that are found in Daniel are necessarily omitted in this survey, but the references in it to the second coming of the Lord are clear and unambiguous. The coming, as depicted here, can have no reference to the church of the mystery and the spiritual blessings in the super-heavenlies. On the contrary, it refers to kingdoms under the whole heaven, and to God's "people" Israel, and "city" Jerusalem (Dan. ix.).

Fundamentals of Dispensational Truth.

#66. The knowledge of the Lord.
pp. 1 - 4

Before we continue our studies in the closing chapters of Exodus, it seems necessary that the subject opened in the previous paper should not be left without the sequel supplied by the N.T.

In Exodus we have seen the knowledge of the Lord, commencing in redemption, progressing through separation and pilgrim supply, and culminating in sanctification. If we gather up some of the teaching of the N.T. upon the subject of knowledge, we shall have before us the same truth in terms applicable to ourselves. No one who realizes the truth of Eph. iv. 18 can ever speak slightingly either of ignorance or knowledge:--

> "Having the understanding darkened, being alienated from the life of God through the IGNORANCE that is in them."

This ignorance alienates from the very life of God! It does not mean merely a little less culture. The passage speaks of the Gentiles, and Rom. i. contains the genesis of their defection:--

> "Even as they did not like to retain God in their knowledge, God gave them up to a reprobate mind" (Rom. i. 28).

Israel likewise failed in connection with knowledge:--

> "They have a zeal of God, but not according to knowledge, for they being ignorant of God's righteousness, and going about to establish their own righteousness, have not submitted themselves unto the righteousness of God" (Rom. x. 2, 3).

The great prayers of the prison epistles give a high place to knowledge:--

> "The spirit of wisdom and revelation in the knowledge of Him . . . . . that ye may know . . . . ." (Eph. i. 17, 18).
> "And to know the love of Christ, which passeth knowledge" (Eph. iii. 19).
>
> "And this I pray, that your love may abound yet more and more in knowledge and in all judgment" (Phil. i. 9).
>
> "That I may know Him, and the power of His resurrection" (Phil. iii. 10).
> "That ye might be filled with the knowledge of His will in all wisdom and spiritual understanding" (Col. i. 9).

The results of the true application of this knowledge must be considered also. Looking again at these great prayers, we find that this knowledge is for a very high and holy purpose. The Ephesian prayers lead on to "fullness":--

> "The fullness of Him that filleth all in all" (Eph. i. 23).
> "That ye may be filled unto all the fullness of God" (Eph. iii. 19).

and the path to this goal is pointed out as a result of knowing the exceeding greatness of resurrection power to us-ward who believe, and of the comprehension with all saints of that which really passes all knowledge—the love of Christ. This same knowledge is to enable us to > "approve things that are excellent (try the things that differ), so that ye may be sincere and without offence till the day of Christ" (Phil. i. 10).

This is a goal that must commend itself to every renewed mind, and if "knowledge" can help towards it, it is indeed of supreme value. The acquisition of knowledge for its own sake is nowhere taught in Scripture. The Colossian prayer seeks knowledge: "That ye might walk worthy of the Lord unto all pleasing" (Col. i. 10). What Paul thought of this glorious knowledge is seen in Phil. iii. 8: "Yea doubtless, and I count all things but loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus my Lord", and the prayer of the Colossian epistle leads on to "increasing in the knowledge of God".

Sin entered into the world in connection with the tree of knowledge, and the new man "is renewed in knowledge after the image of Him that created him" (Col. iii. 10). The light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ is the very "gospel of the glory of Christ" that the god of this age seeks to veil.

The climax and crown of the perfect man is expressed in the words: "Then shall I know even as also I am known" (I Cor. xiii. 12). The sophistry and the intolerance of the Pharisees could not stand before the simple testimony of the man born blind: "One thing I know, that, whereas I was blind, now I see" (John ix. 25). How much service will fail to stand the test of that day, because the deep lesson learned by Paul and expressed in the words of Rom. vii. 18 has never been learned: "For I know that in me (that is, in my flesh) dwelleth no good thing."

What a comfort resides in the blessed words: "We know that all things work together for good to them that love God" (Rom. viii. 28). Think of the repeated phrase—"we know"—in John's epistle with its blessed assurance:--

> "We know that when He shall appear we shall be like Him."
> "We know that He was manifested to take away our sins."
> "We know that we have passed from death unto life."
> "We know that the Son of God is come",

Think, too, upon the wealth of doctrine, practice and consolation that is hung upon the one word "knowing": "knowing that tribulation worketh patience" (Rom. v. 3). Without this knowledge glorying in tribulations would be impossible.

> "Knowing this, that our old man is crucified with Christ" (Rom. vi. 6).
> "Knowing that Christ being raised from the dead dieth no more" (Rom. vi. 9).

Without this knowledge who would contemplate the reckoning of self as dead without shrinking back with dread? So Rom. xiii. 11; II Cor. iv. 14; Gal. ii. 16; Eph. vi. 8, 9;

I Thess. i. 4; II Pet. i. 20, iii. 3, and other places. What was Paul's great stay when all Asia left him? when no man stood by him? when the truth for which he had lived, suffered and was about to die was forsaken and betrayed?

> "Nevertheless I am not ashamed, for I KNOW Whom I have believed" (II Tim. i. 12).

While it is perfectly true that there is a knowledge that puffeth up, a knowledge that is nothing worth, a knowledge that is proud, selfish and false, is this any reason why we should renounce the true because of the counterfeit? "I would not have you ignorant" is still written. "Grow in grace and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ" is still true. "Add to your faith virtue, and to virtue knowledge" is still a divine command. As with Israel of old so now. Redemption, separation, pilgrimage, sanctification are all stages in the knowledge of the Lord, and the glorious goal is foreshadowed in Israel's prophetic history:--

> "After those days, saith the Lord, I will put My law in their inward parts, and write it in their hearts; and I will be their God, and they shall be My people, And they shall teach no more every man his neighbour, and every man his brother, saying, Know the Lord; for they shall all know Me, from the least of them unto the greatest of them, saith the Lord; for I will forgive their iniquity, and I will remember their sin no more" (Jer. xxxi. 33, 34).

#67. The altar of incense, or acceptance through Christ.
pp. 53 - 57

The first article of furniture for the tabernacle that is specified is the ark of the testimony; the last is the golden altar of incense. The ark, together with the mercy-seat, speak of righteousness and atonement; the altar of incense speaks of intercession and acceptance.

Prayer is likened to incense in Psa. cxli. 2: "Let my prayer be set forth as incense, and the lifting up of my hands as the evening sacrifice." In Psa. lxvi. 15 the word "incense" is used in a way that at first appears somewhat strange: "I will offer unto Thee burnt sacrifices of fatlings with the incense of rams." We find, however, that this word is translated "perfume" in Exod. xxx. 35, and in its verbal form (qatar) not only means "to burn incense" (as in Exod. xxx. 7), but to burn "fat" (Exod. xxix. 13), and "the bullock" of the burn offering (Lev. i. 9).

The N.T. references to incense associate it with prayer:--

> "The people were praying without at the time of incense" (Luke i. 10).
> "And another angel came and stood by the altar, having a golden censer; and to him much incense was given, that he should give it to the prayers of all the saints on that golden altar which is before the throne. And the smoke of the incense went up with the prayers of the saints out of the hand of the angel before God" (Rev. viii. 3, 4).

The expression, "give it to the prayers"—a somewhat clumsy rendering of the dative case—is perhaps best explained, with Vitringa and others, as: "that he might give the effect of incense to the prayers of the saints." His intercession makes our prayers possible.

This incense is variously described in Scripture. It is called "perpetual incense before the Lord" (Exod. xxx. 8). Like the shewbread that was to be before the Lord "alway" (Exod. xxv. 30), or the breastplate upon the High Priest's breast "continually" (Exod. xxviii. 30), or the cloud by day and fire by night that guaranteed the presence of the Lord with Israel "alway" (Numb. ix. 16), the symbol of Christ's intercession and perfect acceptance was to be "alway" before the Lord". "He ever liveth to make intercession for us."

Many times it is called "sweet incense". The margin of Exod. xxx. 7 gives it as "incense of spices". This is the correct rendering, and refers to the special composition of the incense given by the Lord, as we read in Exod. xxxvii. 29: "And he made the holy anointing oil, and the pure incense of sweet spices, according to the work of the apothecary." The ingredients of this incense are given in Exod. xxx. 34, 35:--

> "Take unto thee sweet spices, stacte (netaph, a drop, a gum), and onycha (shecheleph, shell of the perfume crab), and galbanum (chelbenah, an aromatic gum); these sweet spices with pure frankincense; of each shall there be a like weight. And thou shalt make it a perfume (incense), a confection after the art of the apothecary, tempered (Heb. salted) together, pure and holy."

The Companion Bible states that there are five ingredients in the incense, evidently counting "sweet spices" as one. Its repetition after the three cited by name, however, would lead one to read: "Take unto thee sweet spices, namely, stacte", etc. The word "tempered" (malach) literally means "salted", and some, including Maimonides, maintain that salt was actually an ingredient. This, however, does not seem to be the truth. Both the Chaldee and Greek versions render the word "mix" or "temper", as though the various spices were mixed together, as salt is mixed with the food over which it is sprinkled. Salt was, of course, offered with every offering on the altar.

The figurative meaning of the word "salt" may be gathered from other usages. Salt was valuable, and stood for the whole of one's keep. We still use the phrase, "He is not worth his salt". So, when we read in Ezra iv. 14: "We have maintenance from the king's palace", the margin tells us that the Chaldee reads: "We are seated with the salt of the palace." There is a suggestion that these men were in a covenant with the kings of Persia, as we read in Numb. xviii. 19 of a "covenant of salt". Be this as it may, the one thing we do not understand when reading Ezra iv. 14 is that these men were actually "salted". Let us, however, not miss the truth because of inability to decide the literal meaning of the language that describes the type. Ainsworth says:--

> "If our speech is to be always with grace, seasoned with salt, as the apostle teaches (Col. iv. 6), how much more should our incense, our prayers unto God, be therewith seasoned?"

The lessons of the incense.

The first feature that strikes one when reading Exod. xxx. 1-10 is the intimate association between the position of the altar of incense and the purpose of the mercy-seat:--

> "And thou shalt put it before the vail that is by the ark of the testimony, before the mercy seat that is over the testimony, where I will meet with thee" (Exod. xxx. 6).

Fellowship with God commences with the death of Christ, but continues through His ever-present intercession at the right hand of God. He has entered with His own blood, and that offering is ever remembered.

The second feature is found in verses 7 and 8:--

> "And Aaron shall burn thereon sweet incense every morning, when he dresseth the lamps . . . . . and when Aaron lighteth the lamps at even, he shall burn incense upon it, a perpetual incense before the Lord throughout your generations."

The lamps stand for testimony. Among the duties of the priest was the "dressing" of the lamps. This would include "snuffing", for "snuffers" are mentioned in Exod. xxxvii. 23. Is it not a cause for real gratitude to remember that, whenever the Lord is obliged to "snuff" our lamps of testimony, He not only does it with "snuffers of gold", but the sweet savour of His own acceptableness ascends before the Father, canceling and covering the offensiveness of our failure, even as the sweet-smelling incense overcame the smell of the badly burning lamp?

The third feature is found in verse 9:--

> "Ye shall offer no strange incense thereon."

We read elsewhere of "strange fire" (Lev. x. 1), and of a "strange god" (Psa. lxxxi. 9). The holy oil was never to be put upon a "stranger" (Exod. xxx. 33). All this testifies to the preciousness of that sweet-smelling savour that ascends on our behalf through the work of Christ alone.

When we really weigh over the two expressions, "strange incense" and "strange fire", we begin to realize something of the abomination that Christendom must be with its religious flesh, its empty ritual and its parade of human wisdom and merit. To the professing church, even as to Israel, the Lord could truly say:--

> "Bring Me no more vain oblations; incense is an abomination unto Me . . . . . when ye spread forth your hands, I will hide mine eyes from you; yea, when ye make many prayers, I will not hear" (Isa. i. 10-15).

Unless Christ be "all" in our worship, God cannot be well pleased.

Perhaps the most solemn references to the symbolism of the incense are the following:--

> "And he shall take a censer full of burning coals of fire from off the altar before the Lord, and his hands full of sweet incense beaten small, and bring it within the vail; And he shall put the incense upon the fire before the Lord, that the cloud of the incense may cover the mercy seat that is upon the testimony, THAT HE DIE NOT" (Lev. xvi. 12, 13).
> "Take a censer, and put fire therein from off the altar, and put on incense, and go quickly unto the congregation, and make an atonement for them . . . . . And he stood between the dead and the living, and the plague was stayed" (Numb. xvi. 46-48).

At first it may seem a strange thing that incense should be used "lest he die" and "to make an atonement", but it will be observed in both cases that the fire is specified as "from off the altar". Sacrifice has been made, blood has been shed, and even the horns of the golden altar of incense have been touched with atoning blood (Exod. xxx. 10). Translated into the truth of the person and work of Christ, if we have been reconciled by His death, we shall be saved by His life. If our initial salvation is found in His blood, we remember with joy that "He is able to save them to the full end that come unto God by Him, seeing He ever liveth to make intercession for them . . . . . now to appear in the presence of God for us" (Heb. vii. 25; ix. 24). The blood of Christ is not only effectual for our initial justification—it is remembered by God in every act of daily cleansing (I John i. 7). He Who gave Himself for His church, will cleanse it and present it blameless before the Lord.

There is no more sacrifice for sin. The Christ Who died, dieth no more, but the fragrance of that offering and its sweet savour ascend as incense before the throne. There, like Aaron, under the cloud of that fragrance, we draw near and meet with God. There our prayers find "the effect of incense" given to them. No prayer should be offered to God that is not presented "for Christ's sake". It is the incense of His blessed Name that accompanies our prayers and makes them acceptable. We often have felt, even when "grace" has been said before a meal, that the omission of the words "for the sake of Christ" has robbed it of its sweet-smelling savour. At our altar of incense our lamps may be trimmed and lighted with acceptableness, for our service is rendered "for the sake of His name".

We saw in a previous study that the true meaning of consecration was to come before the Lord with hands filled with the fullness of Christ; so we see here, that all our acceptableness in prayer and worship is because of that blessed One at the right hand of God, far above all.

> "Accepted in the Beloved" (Eph. i. 6).
> "Unto you therefore which believe IS THE PRECIOUSNESS" (I Pet. ii. 7).

#68. The atonement money (Exod. xxx. 11-16).
pp. 85 - 88

The institution of the half shekel of silver as atonement money in this passage is associated with numbering the children of Israel and with the possibility of plague. At first sight there is no apparent connection between these items, but a consciousness that all Scripture is inspired and profitable is a great help forward in its understanding. The association of these features evidently meant something to Moses and Israel, and it will to us as we allow the Word to enter and give us light.

> "When thou takest the sum of the children of Israel after their number, then shall they give every man a ransom for his soul unto the Lord, when thou numberest them; that there be no plague among them, when thou numberest. This shall they give, every one that passeth among them that are numbered, half a shekel, after the shekel of the sanctuary (a shekel is twenty gerahs): an half shekel shall be the offering of the Lord" (Exod. xxx. 12, 13).

What is the association between numbering, plague and the ransom of half a shekel? And why are we told just here that the shekel is equal to twenty gerahs? It is evident that each person paid ten gerahs, and if we took our stand with this people we should not be long before we saw some association between the ten gerahs and the ten plagues that fell upon Egypt, from which Israel were spared and delivered by redeeming blood. This is no play of imagination, as a reference to Exod. xiii. will show. There we find that by reason of the fact that Israel were spared, while the tenth plague were enjoined to wear the phylacteries as "a sign and a memorial", and to sanctify every firstborn, whether of man or beast, unto the Lord.

> "The males shall be the Lord's. And every firstling of an ass thou shalt redeem with a lamb . . . . . and all the firstborn of man among thy children shalt thou redeem . . . . . when Pharaoh would not let us go, the Lord slew all the firstborn in the land of Egypt, both the firstborn of man, and the firstborn of beast: therefore I sacrifice to the Lord all that openeth the matrix, being males; but all the firstborn of my sons I redeem" (Exod. xiii. 12-15).

Later on another phase of substitution was introduced whereby the whole tribe of Levi was set apart instead of every firstborn of the whole nation.

> "And I, behold, I have taken the Levites from among the sons of Israel instead of all the firstborn . . . . . because all the firstborn are Mine: for on the day that I smote all the firstborn in the land of Egypt I hallowed unto Me all the firstborn of Israel, both man and beast: Mine shall they be: I am the Lord" (Numb. iii. 12, 13).

Then comes the numbering of the Levites in verses 14-39, and the numbering of the firstborn of Israel in verses 40-43. It so transpired that there were 22,273 firstborn males of Israel and 22,000 Levites of one month old and upward, leaving 273 to be specially redeemed by the payment of five shekels apiece. This sum of 1,365 shekels was given to Aaron and his sons (Numb. iii. 45-51).

There is evidently some similar principle at work in Exod. xxx. In this case the numbering is of all who are twenty years old and upward, and the ransom money is appointed for the service of the tabernacle as a memorial (xxx. 16). The number of those who thus paid their half shekel was 603,550 men, and of the total sum 100 talents were used to make the sockets of silver on which the tabernacle rested, while some, at least, of the remainder were used in the making of the silver hooks, chapiters and fillets that were specified.

No distinction was made between rich and poor in the matter of this atonement money: "The rich shall not give more, and the poor shall not give less" (Exod. xxx. 15). Whilst we have a recognition of "each one's several ability" in the distribution of the talents, one receiving five, another two, and another only one, whilst reward for service will be in some measure proportionate to faithfulness, yet, when we deal with such matters as redemption and atonement, "there is no difference", all alike are redeemed by the blood of the Lamb, all alike pay their half shekel, neither more nor less.

It is a blessed thought, that every time an Israelite looked at his own firstborn son, he had a "memorial" of substitution before him. Every time he looked at a Levite accomplishing the service of God, every firstborn male could say: There is one who hath taken my place. Every time he considered the foundations upon which the tabernacle rested, they spoke of his atonement.

What of the spiritual realities of which these are but shadows? Does our conception of service, worship and the present position of Christ at the right hand of God bring vividly to our mind and heart the consciousness that we are not our own; that we are bought with a price?

There is one occasion in the history of David, in which "numbering", "plague" and "ransom" figure, that should be considered as a contrast to this ordinance. David was moved to number Israel and Judah. Even Joab realized that the spirit that prompted this numbering was not good (II Sam. xxiv. 3), and David subsequently confessed that he had sinned greatly (verse 10). The result was judgment, in the form either of famine, defeat, or pestilence, and the sequel was the erection of an altar and the offering of sacrifice. The words of Exod. xxx. 12 come to mind as one reads this tragic chapter:--

> "Then shall he give every man a ransom for his soul unto the Lord, when thou numberest them; that there be no plague among them, when thou numberest them."

The numbering of Israel by David was evidently done either in pride, or in unbelief of the power of God. The grace of God that chose Israel for His own ignored their numerical inferiority as compared with other nations (Deut. vii. 7, 8). While Israel remained true, "one should chase a thousand, and two put ten thousand to flight" (Deut. xxxii. 30), but when they were unfaithful "a small company of men" was sufficient to conquer "a very great host", for the Lord would not be with them.

The solemn numbering of Israel with the accompanying emphasis upon atonement would impress upon them the truth concerning both their own shortcomings and the Lord's grace.

The depths of love were sounded when the spotless Son of God was "numbered with the transgressors". Whenever we think of that, the only numbering that matters to us is that we have been numbered with His saints, and rejoice in the hope of the glory of God.

#69. The brazen laver (Exod. xxx. 17-21).
pp. 117 - 122

Immediately following the record of the atonement money, we have the command to make "a laver of brass to wash withal", and upon examination we discover that there is a closer connection between the two statements than appears on the surface.

Before proceeding to this closer study we would allude to yet a third item, which will be found to add one more example of a similar nature: we refer to the brazen altar. When Korah, Dathan and Abiram died for their sin, we learn that:--

> "Eleazar the priest took the brazen censers, wherewith they that were burnt had offered; and they were made plates for a covering of the altar; to be a memorial unto the children of Israel, that no stranger, which is not of the seed of Aaron, come near to offer incense before the Lord" (Numb. xvi. 39, 40).

This was done at the commandment of the Lord, Who also said: "They shall be a sign unto the children of Israel" (verse 38).

We have, therefore, the brazen altar, closely associated with the sign and memorial of Korah's sin; we have the two silver sockets of the tabernacle made of the atonement money paid by every Israelite over twenty years of age for the ransom of his soul, and now we are to find that the brazen laver is connected with another sinful association with the true worship of God.

Immediately following the record of the making of the altar of brass in Exod. xxxviii., we read:--

> "And he made the laver of brass, and the foot of it of brass, of the looking glasses of the women assembling, which assembled at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation" (Exod. xxxviii. 8).

At first sight we are inclined to look upon this as a free-will offering to the Lord given by a company of godly women, but the note in the margin, "Heb. assembling by troops, as I Sam. ii. 22", sets one thinking. To speak of women "assembling by troops" at the door of the tabernacle has an unpleasant sound, and the dreadful purpose of their assembling is revealed in all its hideousness by a reference to I Sam. ii. 22. The margin of The Companion Bible very gently comments on the word "assembling" in Exod. xxxviii. 8: "doing service, or worshipping according to Egyptian practice." By using the mirrors, therefore, for the construction of the laver, this practice was abolished.

It is not for us to enlarge upon immorality. The teaching of "that woman Jezebel" is associated with what is false worship right down the ages, and Babylon is well called, "the Mother of Harlots". It is common knowledge that many of the temples of Astarte or Venus were famous (or rather infamous) for the practice of the same uncleanness. The brazen mirrors of these women, which possibly symbolized their sensual vanity, were confiscated, and from the metal thus acquired the laver "to worship withal" was made.

Three witnesses, therefore, to human failure, in close association with divine worship, were ever before the eyes of Israel:--

1. The silver sockets made of their ransom money, telling of their need of atonement.
2. The brass covering of the altar, as "a sign" and "a memorial" to all that they stood in need of a true Priest whose offering should be acceptable before the Lord.
3. The brazen laver, a standing witness against all uncleanness, and to the utmost need for care lest the flesh, or earthly beauty, should intrude into that which after all is alone spiritual.

It comes as a shock to the lover of Art, to learn that, lovely as old stained glass may be, ravishing as some Gothic Cathedrals truly are, yet that all this beauty is merely upon the natural or soul-plane, and cannot enter into the worship of God Who is Spirit. Lovers of music also need to remember that the delights of harmony and the soul-exalting strains of beautiful music rise no higher than this self-same plane. God looks for the "ornament" of a meek and quiet spirit, and the "adorning" of the doctrine of God our Saviour. He listens for the "melody" of hearts, and the "songs" of thanksgiving that may at times escape even from the "inmost prison".

The emphasis upon cleansing.

In an Eastern land, where the temperature is high, where sandals are worn, and where food is eaten with the fingers, constant washing would be necessary for cleanliness and health alone, but in addition to this we find (in the commandments of the law) washings of persons, sacrifices, articles, and buildings at every turn. Before Aaron and his sons were invested with the priestly robes, they were washed with water (Lev. viii. 6). Before Israel received the law from Mount Sinai, both their persons and their clothing were washed (Exod. xix. 10-15). No priest was suffered to approach the altar of God, on pain of death, without washing both hands and feet (Exod. xxx. 19, 20), and to this the Psalmist refers when he says: "I will wash my hands in innocency; so will I compass Thine altar" (Psa. xxvi. 6).

Uncleanness could be contracted not only in the ordinary course of life and nature, but in several ways that had something of a ceremonial and typical character. Lev. xii.-xv. details a series.

After childbirth: for a man child 7 days; for a maid child 14 days, and a further period of either 33 or 66 days until the days of purifying be fulfilled. At the end of this time a sin offering was made and atonement accomplished—"and she shall be clean" (Lev. xii. 1-8).

Uncleanness arising from leprosy might be in a man, in his garment, or in a house, and cleansing was effected after the leprosy had departed, or, in the case of a person, if it had covered the whole skin and turned white. Garments were burned or washed in water, houses were demolished, or scraped, and a very elaborate ceremonial cleansing (to which a special paper must be devoted) is described in Lev. xiv.: "The law of the leper in the day of his cleansing."

Other cases of uncleanness are specified in Lev. xv., and the chapter concludes:--

> "Thus shall ye separate the children of Israel from their uncleanness; that they die not in their uncleanness, when they defile My tabernacle that is among them" (Lev. xv. 31).

Certain animals were set aside as unclean, and defilement was contracted even by touching them, to say nothing of eating them. To touch a grave rendered a person unclean; hence arose the custom of whitening sepulchres to make them easily visible. To touch a dead body, or to enter a tent where the dead lay, rendered a person unclean. The scrupulous sanitation of the law of Moses must be studied to be appreciated. For example, the destruction of vessels upon which the carcass of a mouse had fallen was commanded without a reason being given. Modern sanitation warns against mice and rats as carriers of plague, and endorses the teaching of the law. Some commands concerning personal cleanliness are too intimate for our pages, but we believe every one would be at least physically the better for a little more of this "law" in their daily routine.

Spiritual application of this truth.

Taking the great mass of detail concerning uncleanness as read, we must consider the spiritual application which Scripture makes of this matter.

"Wash thine heart from wickedness", says Jer. iv. 14; nevertheless, though nitre and much soap be used, Israel's iniquity would still be marked before the Lord (An opportunity here for a lesson to children, with a handkerchief, marking ink, soap, soda and water).

"Wash you, make you clean, put away the evil of your doings", says Isa. i. 16, yet in i. 18 it is added: "Though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow." This will be accomplished by the Lord Himself, for "in that day there shall be a fountain opened for sin and for uncleanness:" (Zech. xiii. 1), of which Psa. li. supplies a prophetic anticipation: "Wash me thoroughly from mine iniquity, and cleanse me from my sin . . . . . wash me and I shall be whiter than snow."

The N.T. is replete with references to the necessity for cleansing, and for the perfect provision that has been made. We read of the cleansing power of the Word in Eph. v. 26, when the church is presented in glory, having neither spot, nor wrinkle, nor any such thing, but being holy and without blemish. And again:--

> "Now ye are clean through the word which I have spoke unto you" (John xv. 3).
> "Sanctify them through Thy truth, Thy Word is truth" (John xvii. 17).
> "Ye have purified your souls in obeying the truth" (I Pet. i. 22).

In II Cor. vi. 14-16 we have a series of circumstances that bring about spiritual defilement: being yoked with unbelievers, having fellowship with unrighteousness or with darkness, mixing up Christ and Belial, faith and infidelity, the temple of God and idols.

Cleansing is expressed in such terms as, "Come out from among them . . . . .", "Be ye separate . . . . .", "Touch not the unclean thing", and is fully explained in plain language to the church in II Cor. vii. 1: "Let us cleanse ourselves from all filthiness of the flesh and spirit, perfecting holiness in the fear of God."

Writing to the Hebrews, who knew full well the "diverse washings" which they were called upon to make, the apostle says:--

> "For if the blood of bulls and of goats, and the ashes of an heifer sprinkling the unclean, sanctifieth to the purifying of the flesh: How much more shall the blood of Christ, Who through the eternal spirit offered Himself without spot to God, purge your conscience from dead works, to serve the living God" (Heb. ix. 13, 14).

The graves, the bones, the dead that defiled Israel are here seen as types of the dead works that defile the conscience.

> "Let us draw near with a true heart in full assurance of faith, having our hearts sprinkled from an evil conscience, and our bodies washed with pure water" (Heb. x. 22).

Cleansing has much to do with service, as is illustrated by the following passages:--

> "Purge your conscience . . . . . to serve the living God" (Heb. ix. 14).
> "As ye have yielded your membership servants to uncleanness . . . . . even so now yield your members servants to righteousness unto holiness" (Rom. vi. 19).
> "A vessels unto honour, sanctified, and meet for the master's use" (II Tim. ii. 21).

Redemption is for sinners, and releases from their bondage. Atonement is for saints, and makes them nigh. Cleansing is for service, and keeps the vessel meet.

We have seen that cleansing is through the blood of Christ, and by the Word of God. Hearts are purified by faith (Acts xv. 9), and souls are purified by obedience (I Pet. i. 22). Purging is necessary for fruitbearing (John xv. 2), and for service (II Tim. ii. 21). We have not been called unto uncleanness, but unto holiness (I Thess. iv. 7). All the injunctions written in the law concerning the priests are focused upon the believer's walk of the present day in Titus ii. 3: "In behaviour as becometh holiness", which word "holiness" is hieroprepes, "proper to priests".

Such is part of the teaching of the law connected with the brazen altar, "to wash withal". May we hear the voice of the Son of God: "If I wash thee not, thou hast no part with Me" (John xiii. 8).

#70. The holy anointing oil (Exod. xxx. 22-28).
pp. 161 - 164

The last item to be considered in this long and important section has to do with the composition of the holy anointing oil or ointment, and of the incense to which allusion has already been made in the description of the altar of incense.

The holy anointing oil was composed of specified quantities of myrrh, cinnamon, calamus and cassis, compounded together with sufficient olive oil to give it proper consistency. The incense, as we have already seen, is also specified. A prohibition attaches to both of these—the holy anointing oil and the incense:--

> "This shall be an holy anointing oil unto Me throughout your generations. Upon man's flesh shall it not be poured, neither shall ye make any other like it, after the composition of it: it is holy, and it shall be holy unto you. Whosoever compoundeth any like it, or whosoever putteth any of it upon a stranger, shall even be cut off from his people" (Exod. xxx. 31-33).

Light on sanctification.

The prohibitions concerning this anointing oil will throw some light upon the scriptural conception of holiness. It is "holy"; therefore the first prohibition is:--

"Upon man's flesh shall it not be poured."—We read that the holy anointing oil was poured upon the head. The Psalmist said, "It ran down the beard, even Aaron's beard", and even to the skirts of his garment; but it was not to be poured upon man's "flesh". There was an anointing which was a part of the everyday toilet, and an anointing that was used as a mark of respect and favour to a guest. This was not limited to the head and beard, but extended to the "face" (Psa. civ. 15), "feet" (John xii. 3), and "body" (Mark xiv. 8), and was used at "birth" (Ezek. xvi. 9), and "death" (Mark xvi. 1).

We have here a very necessary distinction which we do well to ponder. There is an anointing that belongs to man as such. Sweetness of temper, a kindness of manner, a natural gentleness of disposition may be very fine; they have a fragrance and a smoothness that is all to the good. But we must never make natural qualities in any measure parallel with spiritual graces. The Holy Spirit does not anoint man's "flesh":--

"That which hath been born of the flesh is flesh" (John iii. 6).
"The flesh profiteth nothing" (John vi. 63).
"The mind of the flesh is enmity against God" (Rom. viii. 7).
"Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered the heart of man . . . . . but God hath revealed them unto us by His Spirit" (I Cor. ii. 9, 10).
"The natural (soul-ical) man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God" (I Cor. ii. 14).

"The works of the flesh" are sharply distinguished from "the fruits of the Spirit", and never, until grapes grow on thorns or figs on thistles will the flesh produce anything other than its own works. Consequently we must remember that none can be holy or sanctified outside of Christ, and it is the new man and not the old upon whom the grace of the Spirit descends.

"Neither shall ye make any other like it, after the composition of it. It is holy, and it shall be holy unto you."—This emphasizes from another point of view the necessity to distinguish between the flesh and the Spirit, bringing into prominence this time the danger of counterfeit. If the anointing be not of the Lord, if it be not the fragrance of Christ, if it be not the work of the Spirit, then however near to the true counterpart it may appear, it must be repudiated. It is a holy thing, and it must be kept so. The thought of holiness here, as in all the teaching on the subject in both Old and New Testaments, is very largely that of something specially set apart for God.

Whosoever putteth any of it upon a stranger, shall be cut off.—Some things belong to the Lord's people alone. No stranger could partake of the Passover (Exod. xii. 43). It was a memorial of redemption and national birth. No stranger was allowed to contribute anything towards the offerings of the Lord. This prohibition still holds good regarding Christian service, and condemns all such means of making money as dances, whist drives, and the like, that are everywhere spreading their "corruption" and making all such service "unacceptable" by reason of the "blemishes" (Lev. xii. 25).

No stranger, not of the seed of Aaron, was allowed to draw near to God to offer incense (Numb. xvi. 40). No stranger could be king of Israel (Deut. xvii. 15). No stranger upon pain of death was allowed near the tabernacle when it was taken down (Numb. i. 51), and no stranger could ever be appointed to the priest's office (Numb. iii. 10). Strange fire, strange incense, strange wives, strange gods, a strange vine, strange apparel; these things help us to realize something of the limits set by God regarding that which belongs to His holiness, and speaks of Christ.

The Lord's Anointed.

There are three outstanding offices that are associated with anointing in the Scriptures—those of Priest (Exod. xxviii. 41), King (Psa. xviii. 50) and Prophet (I Kings xix. 16)—and these three offices are filled, and in their fullest measure, by Christ.

His title, "The Christ", is but the Greek form of the Hebrew "Messiah", "the Anointed One".

"God anointed Jesus of Nazareth with the Holy Ghost, and with power" (Acts x. 38).

"The Spirit of the Lord is upon Me, because He hath anointed Me to preach the gospel" (Luke iv. 18).

"For God giveth not the Spirit by measure unto Him" (John iii. 34).

"Thy Throne . . . . . Thy Sceptre . . . . . Thy God hath anointed Thee with the oil of gladness above Thy fellows" (Heb. i. 8, 9).

He is God's Anointed, His Prophet, Priest, and King. We confess that He is the Christ, and we acknowledge this threefold fullness. All true sanctification flows from Him.

There is a phase of the anointing that belongs to the period of miraculous gifts (II Cor. i. 21, 22) which is omitted in the dispensation of the mystery (Eph. i. 13), but the true anointing remains. It is seen in "the unity of the Spirit", which brings us into such vital union with Christ that His anointing becomes ours. We are partakers of His holiness. He is made unto us sanctification as well as redemption (I Cor. i. 30).

While the mystery was never a subject of Old Testament revelation, a very beautiful figure of sanctified unity is given in Psa. cxxxiii. that it would benefit us to ponder:--

"Behold, how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity. It is like the precious ointment upon the head, that ran down upon the beard, even Aaron's beard: that went down to the skirts of his garments: As the dew of Hermon, and as the dew that descended upon the mountain of Zion."

Here we have a double figure of unity. The ointment that was poured upon the head of Aaron extended to the very skirts of his garments. The A.V. of the second figure needs a correction. There is no real "dew" in Palestine, but a "summer sea night mist" rolls in and drenches the parched earth. The mist makes no distinctions. It unites in one Mt. Hermon away in the North and Mt. Zion in the South. So are all in Christ.

The apostle says, "We are unto God a sweet savour of Christ" (II Cor. ii. 16). Just as we found that "consecration" was "filling the hand" with Christ in service and offering, so true sanctification, true unction, true anointing is a life that is so much of Christ, that every act, every word, every thought is just the manifestation of the Anointed One. Words easy to write, words that condemn us as we think of ourselves, words that compel us to flee to Him, to be buried in His death that we may rise to walk in newness of life and serve in newness of spirit.

This holy anointing of ours in Christ comes not "on the flesh"; it resolutely sets aside all counterfeit; it is found where "Christ is all" or not at all, and it is not enjoyed by the alien, the stranger, the foreigner from grace. As we can more fully say, "For me to live is Christ", as we more fully "preach Christ", as the life of Christ is more really the life we now live in the flesh, as the fruit of the Spirit is more evidently manifest, so shall we approximate more to the fulfillment of this sacred type of the holy anointing oil.

John, writing to believers of another calling, expressed the same truth, saying:--

> "The anointing which ye received of Him abideth in you . . . . . it hath taught you, ye shall abide in Him" (I John ii. 27).

So we come to the conclusion of this type of Christ and His work as set forth in the tabernacle. At every step it has spoken of the Son of God. Starting with the ark and mercy seat, pausing at the altar of brass, and finishing with the holy anointing oil and sweet incense, we can truly say that "Christ is all, and in all".

The Epistle to the Hebrews.

#57. Moses. The triumph of faith (xi. 24-28).
pp. 4 - 9

The faith that marked the infant days of Moses was prominent in his after life. One or two notable manifestations of that faith which is the substance of things hoped for, and the evidence of things not seen, are given in the record of Heb. xi.:--

> Substance.—"Refusing . . . . . choosing . . . . . esteeming, for he had respect unto the recompense of the reward" (Heb. xi. 24-26).
> Not seen.—"Forsook . . . . . not fearing . . . . . for he endured as seeing Him Who is invisible" (Heb. xi. 27, 28).

No act of faith is recorded of Moses until "he was come to years". The original has it: "having become great", which is a quotation from the LXX of Exod. ii. 11, and refers to his growth in years as much as, if not more than, to his greatness in wealth and position, although this, too belongs to the expression (see Gen. xxiv. 35).

The example of Moses very aptly illustrates the exhortation of Heb. v. 14; vi. 1: "Them that are of full age . . . . . leaving . . . . . let us go on." When faith is tested there is no make-believe about it. Moses was great, learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians, and mighty in words and deeds (Acts vii. 22). He apparently had a definite offer made by Pharaoh's daughter of formal adoption into the royal house. It was a very real test. Abraham's trial of faith, too, was intensely real. Nothing on earth could have been so dear in his eyes as his beloved son Isaac. Paul's test of faith was real. The renunciation of the position and privilege of being a Hebrew and a Pharisee cannot be easily estimated by such as ourselves to-day.

The activities of faith.

Moses refused, chose, esteemed, had respect, forsook, endured, and kept by faith.

> He refused to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter.
> He chose rather to suffer affliction with the people of God than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season.
> He esteemed the reproach for Christ greater riches than the treasures in Egypt.
> He had respect unto the recompense of the reward.
> He forsook Egypt, not fearing the wrath of the king.
> He endured, as seeing Him Who is invisible.
> He kept the passover and the sprinkling of blood.

To the Hebrews had been written:--

> "Ye took joyfully the spoiling of your goods, knowing in yourselves that ye have in heaven a better and an enduring substance. Cast not away therefore your confidence, which hath great recompense of reward" (Heb. x. 34, 35).

and in Moses they would see a very glorious example. These Hebrews were exhorted to consider the "enduring" nature of their heavenly possessions; they were urged to remember that they were associated with a kingdom that "remains" (xii. 28), that here they had no "continuing" city, but sought one to come (xiii. 14). So then the sinfulness of Egypt's pleasures is not stressed so much as their transience. Moses had a birthright and an adoption that he could not barter for Egypt's pottage (Heb. xii. 16; Rom. ix. 4), and there was a danger that the Hebrews would succumb under the pressure of their trials, and for a brief period of so-called "peace" forfeit their heavenly calling. The essential element in the faith necessary to endure and overcame is that which is manifested in Moses' action, and definitely expressed in Heb. xi. 6: "He that cometh to God must believe that He is, and that He is a rewarder (a recompenser) of them that diligently seek Him."

Hebrews is the epistle of the "right hand of God". There the Great High Priest has sat down, and because the Psalmist said "At Thy right hand are pleasures for evermore". Those whose faith enables them to "see Him Who is invisible" are enabled to esteem, at their true worth, those "pleasures of sin" that are "for a season".

Joseph and Moses.

Joseph's faith led him step by step to the throne of Egypt. Moses' faith led him step by step away from Egypt and its throne to the wilderness and to hardship. Paul had said, earlier, concerning the Patriarchs, that "if they had been mindful of that country from whence they came out, they might have had opportunity to have returned" (Heb. xi. 15). We shall never lack the counsel of Mr. Worldly Wiseman, and our own hearts will often turn us astray. Think how one might have argued the case with Moses:--

1. Joseph's example. See how he used his exalted position for the glory of God and the well-being of his people.
2. Are you not therefore disobedient to the example of such a man?
3. Why not see in your preservation and adoption just the same all-powerful Hand, leading you on to this crisis in you life?
4. Use your influence at Court; get measures put into operation that shall ameliorate the sufferings of your people, and be a deliverer indeed.

Doubtless we can supplement this from our own experience. But all this would be vain, for God had spoken. The promise made to Abraham, and remembered by Joseph (Heb. xi. 22), was nearly due to be performed. God had said that Israel would be afflicted, but at the set time He would bring them out, and Moses' faith, like our own, rested upon "the Word of God" (Rom. x. 17).

By the time Moses was born a new dispensation had dawned; "a new king that knew not Joseph" occupied the throne. So the apostle would press upon the consciences of the Hebrews the necessity of weigh the change of dispensation ushered in by the rejection of their Messiah. They had to "forsake", "go forth unto Him without the camp", rather than continue in those things that had ceased to be the will of God.

By faith he forsook Egypt.

We must now consider a different passage.

> "By faith he forsook Egypt, not fearing the wrath of the king: for he endured, as seeing Him Who is invisible" (Heb. xi. 27).

It is generally reckoned that this cannot refer to the time when Moses fled unto Midian, but to the second time that he left Egypt, at the time of the exodus. There is no need to comment upon the obvious "faith" that enabled Moses to lead Israel out of Egypt, so we ask a moment's attention while we look once again at that earlier flight from Egypt.

"Not fearing the wrath of the king."—When we have read through the chapters of Exodus detailing the attitude of Moses toward Pharaoh, the mighty miracles that were wrought, the power that moved heaven and earth and even the angel of death, it seems rather tame to say of that triumphant departure from Egypt, the Israelites loaded with the "spoil" thrust upon them, that Moses "forsook" Egypt, and did not fear the wrath of the king. He had forsaken Egypt 40 years before, and his return was with the express purpose of leading Israel out, not with any intention of settling down himself. Time after time he stood before Pharaoh, calm, unflinching, master of the situation. There was no wrath of the king to fear when, at the last, Israel moved out of the land, and the attempt of Pharaoh to overtake them at the Red Sea hardly fits the passage in Heb. xi.

There are several points of contact between Heb. xi. and Stephen's speech in Acts vii. Stephen gives a very full account of the occasion that led to Moses' flight from Egypt:--

> "And when he was full 40 years old, it came into his heart to visit his brethren the children of Israel. And seeing one of them suffer wrong, he defended him, and avenged him that was oppressed, and smote the Egyptian, for he supposed his brethren would have understood how that God by his hand would deliver them, but they understood not. And the next day he shewed himself unto them as they strove, and would have set them at one again, saying, Sirs, ye are brethren, why do ye wrong one another? But he that did his neighbour wrong thrust him away, saying, Who made thee a ruler and a judge over us? Wilt thou kill me, as thou didst the Egyptian yesterday? Then fled Moses" (Acts vii. 23-29).

Stephen supplies us with the motive that prompted Moses' action. He supposed that Israel would have risen as one man and acknowledged him as their deliverer. This was not to be. They rejected him. He left Egypt and remained away for 40 years. Then, Stephen continues:--

> "This Moses whom they refused, saying, Who made thee a ruler and a judge? the same did God send to be a ruler and a deliverer by the hand of the angel which appeared to him in the bush. He brought them out" (Acts vii. 35, 36).

It is very evident that Moses' two manifestations to Israel are typical of the first and second coming of Christ. His flight into Midian is parallel with the Lord's ascension to heaven and present period of waiting. Stephen, too, does not say that Moses forsook or left Egypt the second time, but that "he brought them out". Let us look at Exod. ii. 11-14 again. Verse 11 opens with the words "When Moses was grown", which is translated in the LXX by words identical with Heb. xi. 34. Exod. ii. 12 gives a statement not repeated by Stephen:--

> "He looked this way, and that way, and when he saw that there was no man, he slew the Egyptians, and hid him in the sand."

It is easy to say, Moses evidently looked this way and that, to make sure that "no man" should witness the deed, but is that the truth? Stephen tells us that he assumed that Israel would understand his motive, and Isaiah seems to use the expression in such a way as to compel us to believe that Moses was conscious of the Messianic foreshadowing of his act:--

> "He saw that there was no man, and wondered that there was no intercessor; therefore his arm brought salvation unto him" (Isa. lix. 16).
> "And I looked, and there was none to help; and I wondered that there was none to uphold, therefore mine own arm brought salvation unto me" (Isa. lxiii. 5).

While Exod. ii. 14 says "and Moses feared", it does not say he "feared the wrath of the king"; but it appears that he feared something less personal and more vital. Spurrell translates the passage: "Then Moses was afraid, for he said, Surely this transaction is known", which endeavours to draw attention to what was passing in Moses' mind. We know from Stephen that Moses expected Israel to see in this act his credentials as a God-sent deliverer, and that when he was sent later he said: "They will not believe me . . . . . they will say, The Lord hath not appeared unto thee" (Exod. iv. 1), and that the signs of the serpent and the leprosy were given to him.

Let no one judge Moses for the slaying of the Egyptian. Under God he was the instrument of slaying thousands of Egypt's first-born, and of overcoming the flower of their army at the Red Sea. We understand Exod. ii. 14 to mean that at the reply of the quarrelling Israelites Moses was seized with some apprehension that his mission would miscarry, saying: "Surely the intention of my act is evident to them", much in the same way the Lord said to His disciples after He had washed their feet: "What I do, thou knowest not now, but thou shalt know hereafter", which refers to something more than the external act of washing the feet. The only possibility therefore was, that Moses should forsake Egypt. Pharaoh sought to slay him, and his flight out of Egypt was no more an act of unbelief than was the flight for much the same reason of Joseph and Mary, as recorded in Matt. ii.

These points we submit to the reader for careful consideration, believing that many an action may be really "by faith" which, casually judged, may seem the product of some baser motive. We will reserve Moses' last act of faith, "the passover", together with Israel's faith in passing through the Red Sea, with which it is so clearly connected, to a further article.

#58. The faith that triumphs (xi. 28-31).
pp. 40 - 45

We now reach the concluding pair of characters in the sevenfold series of Heb. xi., viz., Israel and Rahab. The key thought is "deliverance from destruction".

Moses is linked with Israel in the keeping of the passover, "lest he that destroyed the first-born should touch them". Israel pass unscathed through the Red Sea, "which the Egyptians assaying to do were drowned". "Rahab perished not with them that believed not."

The faith of Moses is very comprehensive, and at either end of the record in Heb. xi. it overlaps and includes the faith of others. In both it was a preserving faith, and connected with birth:--

> "By faith Moses, when he was born . . . . ." (verse 23).
> "By faith he kept the passover, and the sprinkling of blood, lest he that destroyed the firstborn should touch them" (verse 28).

There is no warrant for the change of expression from "by faith" to "through faith" in verses 27 and 28. It was the same faith acting in the same way that actuated Moses throughout. There is a real distinction intended between "by faith" and "through faith" in Rom. iii. 30 which is considered in its place; here, however, it is a variation in the English version only, and no doctrinal difference is intended.

The passover.

Several items of interest are given concerning Moses and the passover. "By faith he kept the passover." The word "kept" here is poieo, and in its true translation has a wider significance than "kept". It is used of the sprinkling of blood just as much as of the passover, and it would be hardly true to say, "he kept the sprinkling of blood". Paul follows the LXX version here, which in its turn faithfully translates the Hebrew. "To do the passover" (Exod. xii. 47, 48) does not seem good English, and it is not suggested as an alternative, but it points out the meaning, which is expressed in Exod. xii. 50:--

> "Thus did all the children of Israel: as the Lord commanded Moses and Aaron, so did they."

The faith that kept the passover found its warrant in the Word of God. We cannot too insistently bring this forward. All sorts of things are said to be done by the Lord's people "by faith", but it is difficult sometimes to find any warrant for their actions in the Word. Heb. xi. 1 declares faith to be the substance of things hoped for; Rom. x. 17 declares the Word of God to be the substance of that faith. The passover in Exod. xii. is of divine institution. Moses simply "did" what he was told. "And the Lord spake unto Moses . . . . . saying . . . . . Speak ye unto all the congregation of Israel" (Exod. xii. 1-3). The whole passage (Exod. xii. 1-20) is the actual spoken Word of the Lord. Without break or introduction verses 12 and 13 say:--

> "For I will pass through the land."
> "When I see the blood." (For fuller notes on the passover see Volume XIII, pp. 37 & 73).

The sprinkling of blood.

It is perhaps pardonable for the English reader to link these passages with the others in Hebrews that speak of "sprinkling". We have:--

(1). The sprinkling of the water of purification (Heb. ix. 13).
(2). The sprinkling of both the book and the people (Heb. ix. 19).
(3). The sprinkling of the tabernacle and its vessels (Heb. ix. 21).

These find their fulfillment in :--

(1). "The blood of sprinkling, that speaketh better things than that of Abel" (Heb. xii. 24).
(2). "The heart sprinkled from an evil conscience" (Heb. x. 22).
(3). "The sprinkling of the blood of Jesus Christ" (I Pet. i. 2).

All these references use the word rhantizo or rhantismos. The word used in Heb. ix. 28, however, is proschusis, a word occurring nowhere else in the N.T. Believing that the choice of words to express the truth is a part of that inspiration of God which characterizes the Scriptures, we feel that it is fatal to profitable exegesis to confound what God distinguishes. We have, however, the key to the problem. In other articles we have sought to show the distinction that must be made between redemption and atonement. Now all the passages cited above have reference to a people already redeemed, whereas the passover speaks of the great act of redemption itself. There is no reference to cleansing, dedicating or service in the Passover. It speaks of deliverance; consequently the record uses a distinct word. Instead, therefore, of linking Heb. ix. 28 with Heb. xii. 24, we have to make the following comparisons:--

The passover and its sprinkled blood (Heb. xi. 28) must be compared with such a passage as I Pet. i. 18, 19: "Ye were . . . . . redeemed . . . . . with the precious blood of Christ, as of a Lamb without blemish and without spot." The atoning Sacrifice, and it sprinkled blood, must be placed in contrast with "the blood of sprinkling, that speaketh better things than that of Abel" (Heb. xii. 24).

Faith versus assaying to do.

The active faith of Israel begins with the crossing of the Red Sea:--

> "By faith they passed through the Red Sea as by dry land; which the Egyptians assaying to do were drowned" (Heb. xi. 29).

The passage through the Red Sea has occupied our attention in Volume XIV, page 1. There is a lesson here regarding faith that may well detain us for a moment. By comparing the faith of Joseph with that of Moses, as given in Heb. xi. 22 and 24, we learned that the self-same faith in different circumstances may produce very contrary actions. Faith led Joseph to occupy the throne of Egypt. Faith as certainly led Moses to turn his back on it. Now in the case before us we have two people performing the same act. Israel ventured to cross the Red Sea, and the Egyptians ventured to cross the Red Sea. Externally the acts were similar; internally they were wide apart. Israel's faith rested upon the Word of God: "Speak unto the children of Israel that they go forward" (Exod. xiv. 15). Egypt's following of Israel, though the same act, was not by faith but through hardness of heart: "I will harden the hearts of the Egyptians, and they shall follow them" (Exod. xiv. 17). Is there no "assaying to do" on the part of the Lord's people, that ends in disaster?

An outstanding example of faith in modern times is that of Geo. Muller. Doubtless many have thanked God for that noble witness, but does it follow that because Geo. Muller passed through that Red Sea of difficulties triumphantly, all should or could? The Lord's will has as much to do with faith as with obedience. He wills that one should suffer weakness, while He wills that another should be divinely healed. He wills to one pecuniary straitness, while to another He wills a full and plentiful supply. Faith will never seek to over-ride these divine appointments. If it is His will that one should be poor, it will not be "faith" but an Egyptian "assaying to do" if that one seeks to alter this, however plausibly he may speak of the triumph of faith that can move mountains. Let us see to it that our Red Seas are crossed at the Word of God; that will be by faith. Let us have a holy shrinking from any act that looks like faith, but is a counterfeit.

Between Heb. xi. 29 and 30 lies a tragedy of unbelief. Marah, Manna, Meribah, Kadesh Barnea are passed over in silence. In the reckoning of faith they do not exist. There is no gap between the triumph of the Red Sea, and the overthrow of Jericho forty years afterwards. Alas, we all know too well what these driftings and doublings mean on the pilgrim path.

The faith that accomplished the overthrow of Jericho rested upon the Word of God:--

> "The Lord said unto Joshua, See, I have given into thine hand Jericho . . . . . ye shall compass the city . . . . . six days . . . . . and the seventh day ye shall compass the city seven times, and the priests shall blow with the trumpets. And it shall come to pass, that when they make a long blast with the ram's horn, and when ye hear the sound of the trumpet, all the people shall shout with a great shout: and the wall of the city shall fall down flat, and the people shall ascend up every man straight before him" (Josh. vi. 2-5).

Here is the basis of the faith of Heb. xi. 30. We do not attempt a fuller exposition of Josh. vi. in this series, as that will come in its proper course in the studies entitled "Fundamentals of Dispensational Truth".

The faith of Rahab.

We saw in an earlier analysis that the seventh in the double list of witnesses in each instance is a woman. Sarah's faith is positive. Rahab's faith is rather negative: "Rahab perished not with them that believed not" (Heb. xi. 31).

A great deal of unprofitable discussion has taken place over Rahab. Some contend that the Hebrew word zanah may mean just an innkeeper. Schleusner, with many commentators, would derive zanah from zun, "be fed", but the laws of language will not permit this derivation. There is no necessity to soften down the language of Scripture. The grace that can save Saul the Pharisee, Matthew the publican, and the like, can save Rahab the harlot.

> "His mercy is free,
> 'Twas given to Mary, Manasseh and Me."

Another difficulty that some have is the fact that Rahab told lies in defending the spies. Of this the N.T. record takes no notice. It neither minimizes her condition as a harlot, or enters into any justification of her words and deeds. What it does fix upon is that, sinful, erring, ignorant and immoral as she was, she believed God and His Word.

> "I know that the Lord has given you the land, and that your terror is fallen upon us . . . . . we have heard how the Lord dried up the water of the Red Sea for you . . . . . the Lord your God He is God in heaven above, and in earth beneath" (Josh. ii. 9-11).

The more complete consideration of the witness of Rahab must be deferred until Joshua is under review. We can well leave Rahab's morals to grow and expand under the illumination of the law of God. Harlot though she was, and untruthful as she was, she believed God, which is the beginning of all morals and all truth. There is one thing to be said of Rahab's false statements concerning the spies. She did not bear false witness against them. She did not save herself from the charge of lying at the expense of the life of the spies who had put themselves into her hands.

Josh. ii. and Heb. xi. 31 are not written to justify Rahab's morals, but to bear witness to Rahab's faith. She is included to emphasize the many-sidedness of faith, the way in which it is exhibited by those who differ widely in other ways. Sarah and Rahab are in many points at extremes. Moses and Jacob have few points in common, yet each is bound to each by the common bond of faith.

The sevenfold witness.

We believe it will be of service at the close of this study to repeat the structure already given in Volume XVII, page 14, and the diagram of page 12 of the same Volume.

A | Faith in connection with DEATH.—Abel and Enoch.
B | Faith in connection with INHERITANCE.—Noah and Abraham.
C | Faith in connection with PILGRIMAGE.—Isaac and Jacob.
D | Faith in connection with RESURRECTION.—Sarah and Abraham.
C | Faith in connection with BLESSING.—Isaac and Jacob.
B | Faith in connection with EGYPT.—Joseph and Moses.
A | Faith in connection with DELIVERANCE.—Israel and Rahab.

The diagram is based upon the fact that if a glass prism be placed before a light, it has the power of splitting up that light into its constituent colours, as seen in the rainbow. The suggestion is that faith in its perfectness is seen in but one Person, the Lord Jesus Christ, but we may appreciate that perfect faith better if we can see it analyzed for us in Heb. xi.

#59. Faith, and the better thing (xi. 32-40).
pp. 75 - 79

We have now passed in review the fourteen great witnesses to faith that is the substance of things hoped for. We have seen faith in many aspects leading men and women in many ways, but ever resting upon the Word of God. Each example named has been associated with some particular aspect of faith. Before the apostle concludes, he enumerates yet another series of seven, but this time attaches no particular example of faith to any one of them:--

> "And what shall I more say? for the time would fail me to tell of Gideon, and of Barak, and of Samson, and of Jephthae; of David also, and Samuel, and of the prophets" (Heb. xi. 32).

It seems that we should honour this abbreviation, and not spend time in examining the life and doings of Gideon, Samson, and the rest. We shall only be side-tracked from our theme if we stay to discuss the problem of Jephthae's daughter, and it would take a volume adequately to deal with the faith of David and the prophets. Nevertheless the very mention of these names impresses upon the mind the length of the list of witnesses to faith found in the Word, but we pass on, with the apostle, to consider his own summary. He gives an impressive list, the first set bring the positive acts of faith, and the second, faith's endurance. The very tabulation of these acts of faith is solemnizing.

Eleven positive acts of faith.

A | Subdued kingdoms.
B | Wrought righteousness.
C | Obtained promises.
D | Stopped the mouths of lions.
E | Quenched the violence of fire.
F | Escaped the edge of the sword.
G | Were made strong out of weakness.
H | Waxed valiant in fight.
I | Turned to flight the armies of the aliens.
J | Women received their dead raised to life again.
K | Others were tortured, not accepting deliverance.
That they might obtain a BETTER resurrection.

Eleven negative acts of faith.

A | Others had trial of cruel mockings and scourgings.
B | Of bonds and imprisonment.
C | They were stoned.
D | They were sawn asunder.
E | They were tempted.
F | They were slain with the sword.
G | They wandered about in sheepskins and goatskins.
H | Being destitute.
I | Afflicted.
J | Tormented.
K | They wandered in deserts, in mountains,
in dens and in caves of the earth.
God having provided some BETTER thing for us.

Without attempting that which the apostle sets aside as beyond the scope of Heb. xi., we can point out some obvious connections in these lists with the seven names given in verse 32. David subdued kingdoms, as Moab, Ammon, and Edom. The note of triumphant faith is sounded by him in Psa. lx: "God hath spoken in His holiness; I will rejoice . . . . . Moab is my washpot; over Edom will I cast out my shoe . . . . . Through God we shall do valiantly." God had spoken; that was the basis of David's triumphant faith.

Gideon supplies us with a wonderful example of weakness being made strong, and of turning to flight the armies of the aliens. When we read of the stopping of the mouths of lions and the quenching of the violence of fire, it is difficult to deny a reference to Daniel and his three companions. The women who received their dead raised to life were the widow of Zarephath (I Kings xvii. 22-24), and the Shunammites (II Kings iv. 36).

The better resurrection.

We now come to the crux of the passage. By consulting the arrangement of the subject-matter set out above, it will be seen that "the better resurrection" and "some better thing" are focal points.

What is this better resurrection? and how does it harmonize with the balancing clause, "some better thing", the teaching of Heb. xi., in particular, and of the epistle in general? It is sometimes said of the articles in The Berean Expositor that they are somewhat condensed in character, and lest any should fail to realize what has been suggested as our line of study, we will repeat ourselves in more formal fashion.

This "better" resurrection evidently has something to do with the "better" thing provided by God. We must endeavour first to see what this connection may be, then what the relation of this passage is to the teaching of Heb. xi. as a whole and finally how far the teaching concerning "the better resurrection" is supported by the general drift of the whole epistle.

The first thing we propose is to visualize the whole context with these "better" things in view.

Heb. x. 19 - xii. 25.

A | x. 19-24. Exhortation. "Let us." Priest.
B | x. 25, 26. Warning. "No more sacrifice."
C | x. 27-31. He that despised Moses' law died without mercy, how much more . . . . .
D | x. 32 - xi. 40. Faith, and the better thing.
A | xii. 1-4. Exhortation. "Let us." Perfected.
B | xii. 5-24. Warning. "He found no place for repentance."
C | xii. 25. They escaped not who refused Him that spake on earth, much more . . . . .

Such is the broad outline, making x.19 - xii. 25 one large section. This will be useful as we proceed, but for the time being we are more concerned about the relation of subject-matter within Heb. xi., viz., "faith" and the "better thing".

We accordingly amplify the member D | x. 32 - xi. 40, setting it our as follows:--

Faith and the better thing (x. 32 - xi. 40).

D | A1 | x. 32-29. The better substance in heaven.
B1 | xi. 1-12. Faith. Abel's offering and others.
A2 | xi. 13-16. The better and heavenly country.
B2 | xi. 17-35. Faith. Abraham's offering and others.
A3 | xi. -35. The better resurrection.
B3 | xi. 36-38. Faith. Unnamed believers and their sufferings.
A4 | xi. 39, 40. The better thing foreseen.

The section (x. 19 - xii. 25) begins with exhortations in view of what Christ hast done, "Let us draw near", "Let us hold fast". It ends with fuller exhortations in view of what Christ has done, "Let us lay aside", "Let us run". Christ's sufferings and death have, in the first case, consecrated for us a way into the holiest, and in the second, the race and the crown. In the first He is seen as Expiator, in the second as Exemplar. He is first Priest, then Perfecter.

The remainder of the structure is an alteration between faith and the better thing. There are four descriptions of this better thing which we must consider:--

1. The better and enduring SUBSTANCE in heaven.
2. The better and heavenly COUNTRY.
3. The better RESURRECTION.
4. The better THING provided.

It is evident from the context of the first passage that the better substance is something in the nature of a reward. This is implied in the list of sufferings given in Heb. x. 32-34, and expressly stated in the sequel: "Cast not away therefore your confidence, which hath great recompense of reward" (x. 35), a feature that is repeated in xi. 26, and in a similar context.

The second passage sets before us something which the patriarchs had in view that enabled them to be content to become strangers and pilgrims on the earth: "Now they desire a better country, that is an heavenly, wherefore God is not ashamed to be called their God; for He hath prepared for them a city" (xi. 16). This city is the "city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem", of Heb. xii. 22, closely associated with the spirits of just men made perfect, and the portion, not of sons merely, but of firstborn, which we shall see as we read that chapter.

There is nothing said in the O.T. about this heavenly country and city so far as Abraham, Isaac and Jacob are concerned, yet they had it in view, and when Scripture says: "These all died in faith, not having received the promises, but having seen them afar off and embraced them" (xi.13), it is but saying what in other language is expressed in the two remaining occurrences, namely, resurrection and future entry. "These all died in faith" implies "resurrection". "Having seen them afar off" implies "having foreseen some better thing".

The better resurrection is something distinct. Because of it and its excellence some endured torture and refused deliverance. Now it was the hope of the whole twelve tribes that there should be a resurrection (Acts xxvi. 7, 8) quite apart from torture or endurance, quite apart from "giving up" and acting like Abraham or Moses. We are here facing a parallel with the "out resurrection" of Phil. iii. (which are not the hope but the prize of our calling, of our "high calling") and closely involved with "perfecting", "perdition" and heavenly citizenship of Phil. iii. 12, 19 and 20; "end" being the same word as "perdition" in Heb. x. 39, and "conversation" being literally "citizenship". The long waiting, the far-off promises, the dying without receiving, are all explained by the fact that God had planned that all these overcomers should enter their reward together. Abel and Noah, Abraham and Moses, the suffering saints of the apostle's day, and the last one to endure under the economy of grace pertaining to the "Hebrews", shall not "prevent" one another, but "together with them" shall enter into this better thing, this better country, by way of this better resurrection.

We have seen the relation between the better resurrection and the better thing, we have seen their relation with Heb. xi.; there remains only the general theme of the epistle to be considered. In this epistle we have Christ as a Captain, leading faithful Joshuas and Calebs unto there promised possessions. In this epistle He is seen as Melchisedec, the Priest Who blessed the overcoming Abraham. The historic background is the failure of Israel to go on by faith, and the warning is the possibility of drawing back to perdition. Israel is exhorted to run with patience, and reminded of Esau. Their position is to be one of rejection now, "without the camp", for theirs is soon to be the added glory of the overcomer, because though they have no continuing city, they seek one to come.

Ponder the double line of endurance (verses 32-38) and set your mind on things above where Christ sitteth on the right hand of God.

#60. The author and finisher of faith (xii. 1-4).

pp. 105 - 110

The long list of witnesses to faith having been written, "the better thing" emphasized, a giving up and a patient endurance on the part of the faithful pointed out, the apostle turns to the Hebrews to apply the lesson.

Chapter xi. may be looked upon as a great parenthesis, chapter xii., fortified with chapter xi., reverts to the close of chapter x. and gives a fresh application of its truth. Let us refresh our memories by a revisal of x. 32-39. We are in an atmosphere of suffering, yet a suffering illuminated by the prospect of future joys: "Knowing . . . . . that ye have in heaven a better and an enduring substance, cast not away therefore your confidence, which hath great recompence of reward. For ye have need of patience . . . . ." The immediate danger that beset these Hebrews was that of "drawing back", "growing weary", and to encourage them the apostle puts forward three items:--

1. The second coming of the Lord. "Yet a little while" (x. 37).
2. The examples of faith taken from the O.T. (xi.).
3. The example of Christ Himself (xii. 1-4).

It is this third feature which is now before us. Words are used in this passage which demand careful consideration, and it may be well, before attempting the whole passage, to be a little more certain of the words that are used.

WITNESSES (Greek martus).—This word does not mean "spectator". It means one who bears witness, even to the length of suffering martyrdom for it. The English word martyr is the Greek word for witness, and surely no martyr was a mere "spectator". We find the word in Heb. x. 28, "two or three witnesses". Rev. i. 5 speaks of "Jesus Christ the faithful Witness", and Rev. ii. 13 uses the same words of "Antipas, My faithful martyr". Heb. x. 15 says, "the Holy Ghost is a witness", and xi. 4 tells us that Abel "obtained witness".

It may be of service if we give all the occurrences of martus, martureo, and marturion in the epistle to the Hebrews.

"For a testimony of those things" (iii. 5).
"Of whom it is witnessed that he liveth" (vii. 8).
"For he testifieth, Thou art a priest" (vii. 17).
"The Holy Ghost also is a witness to us" (x. 15).
"Died under two or three witnesses" (x. 28).
"The elders obtained a good report" (xi. 2).
"He obtained witness that he was righteous" (xi. 4).
"God testifying of his gifts" (xi. 4).
"He had this testimony" (xi. 5).
"These all having obtained a good report" (xi. 39).
"So great a cloud of witnesses" (xii. 1).

CLOUD (nephos).—The word does not occur elsewhere in Scripture, the usual word for cloud being the related nephale. It is a word in use among Greek writers for a great company. Homer, in the Iliad, has the line: "With him followed a cloud of foot-men." So Herodotus, Euripides and others. The figure was used likewise by Latin writers; Livy has the line peditum equitumque nubes, "a cloud of horse and foot".

PATIENCE (hupomone).—The only references of this word in Hebrews are x. 36 and xii. 1. The word literally means "to remain under". We take note of it here because of its cognates that are not so obvious in the English translation. The verbal form (hupomeno) comes in Heb. x. 32, "Ye endured"; xii. 2, "He endured a cross"; xii. 3, "endured contradiction"; xii. 7, "If ye endured chastening".

Closely allied, and having a very definite bearing upon the theme, is the simple form from meno, "to remain". It occurs six times in Hebrews:--

"Abideth a priest continually" (vii. 3).
"He continueth ever" (vii. 24).
"An enduring substance" (x. 34).
"Those things that cannot be shaken may remain" (xii. 27).
"Let brotherly love continue" (xiii. 1).
"We have here no continuing city" (xiii. 14).

RACE (agon). The word means a contest, a race, a conflict, and the accompanying imagery is borrowed from the Greek games.

"I have fought a good fight . . . . . henceforth a crown" (II Tim. 4:7).
"Everyone that striveth for mastery is temperate . . . . . they do it for a crown. So run that ye may obtain" (I Cor. ix. 24, 25).

A connection hidden from the English reader is found in Heb. xii. 4. "Striving against" is antagonizomai, just the verbal form of agon as used in I Cor. ix. 25, with the prefix anti, against.

The consideration of these words has of itself created the true atmosphere of the passage. It is a race, calling for endurance, beset with peculiar difficulties, having a prize ahead, and a glorious example. We are now ready for the structure, and can then pass on to the argument itself.

Heb. xii. 1-4.

A1 | xii. 1. ENDURANCE (hupomone).
RACE (agon) set before us.

With so great a cloud of witnesses as is found in the Scripture ever with us, we are exhorted to take heart and run with patience or endurance the race set before us. Two things are enjoined, viz., (1) "Lay aside every weight", and (2) "Lay aside the easily entangling sin". He who would go on unto perfection must bear in mind the two sources of hindrance, (1) Weight, (2) Sin. The first is not of itself sinful. To one it will be riches, to another home ties, to another health, to another liberty. Each will know best what it is that hinders in the race. The second is sin in one of its many aspects, "easily entangling". It is not so much external "sins" that are in view, but the old man, the old nature, the flesh. A reference to I Cor. ix. 24-27 plainly shows this:--

> "Know ye not that they which run in a race run all, but one receiveth the prize? So run, that ye may obtain. And every man that striveth for the mastery is temperate in all things. Now they do it to obtain a corruptible crown; but we an incorruptible. I therefore so run, not as uncertainly; so fight I, not as one that beateth the air; but I keep under my body, and bring it into subjection, lest that by any means, when I have preached to others, I myself should be disapproved."

Then follows a passage dealing with Israel and the temptations in the wilderness: this is parallel with Heb. iii. and iv. The passage, "I keep under my body", recalls the opposite walk of those "whose end is perdition", "whose God is their belly"; Phil. iii.—another passage dealing with a prize.

The greatest encouragement however is found not by looking at the great chain of witnesses, and certainly not by contemplating impediments and entanglements, but by the gaze being directed to the Lord. In Heb. x. 37 the soon-returning Lord was the encouragement to endure. In Heb. xii. 2 the victorious Leader at the right hand of God is the attractive power. The word "looking" is really "looking away". Looking away from all lesser patterns, even those of Heb. xi., and from all the weaknesses and hindrances found in self, looking away to Jesus.

He has two titles here that are suggestive. "The Author and Finisher of faith." Author is archegos, and we have the word already in Heb. ii. 10 translated "Captain", and in close association with the next title, "Finisher", for that is really "Perfecter". "It became Him . . . . . in bringing many sons unto glory, to make the Captain (archegos) of their salvation perfect (teleios) through sufferings."

We are back again therefore in Heb. xii. to the original theme: the need to go on unto perfection, the suffering that is associated with it, and the example of those who drew back unto perdition (Heb. iii., iv.).

"Who for the joy that was set before Him."—The word "for" here is anti, usually translated "instead of". This has given rise to an interpretation of the passage to the effect that the Lord gave up the joy that was before Him, and in its stead endured the cross. This, however, is quite untrue. The whole tenor of the epistle in general, and the particular example here is that, because of the joy that lies ahead, we can endure the suffering now.

That is the character of the example of Abraham and Moses, given at length in Heb. xi. For the joy set before Abraham he was content to live a pilgrim and a stranger. For the joy set before Moses he turned his back on the treasures of Egypt. For the joy ahead of these Hebrew believers they were exhorted to endure. In this sense the sentence should be translated. Over and over again our problems would be solved if we allowed the Word more way with us. If instead of giving time to speculation concerning this word anti we were to read on a few verses we should have our answer.

"Esau, who for (anti) one morsel sold his birthright." Here we have contrast. Esau exchanged the future blessing for the present, whereas we are to follow the example of Moses who exchanged present immunity from suffering for pleasures at the right hand of God which are for evermore.

Apart from the passage "crucify to themselves" in Heb. vi. 6, this is the only occurrence of the cross in Hebrews. As in the parallel epistle, Philippians, the reference is to endurance in view of the crown or prize (Phil. ii. 8; iii. 18). In neither of these epistles is the cross mentioned in connection with redemption or atonement. The usage is similar to the earlier references, like those of Matt. x. 38 and xvi. 24. The saying, "No cross, no crown" exactly fits its usage. The cross is prominent in the epistle to the Corinthians—they were carnal. The cross is prominent in the epistle to the Galatians—they were being moved away from the faith. The only allusion to the cross in Romans is in Rom. vi. 6 where the old man is dealt with. The argument of Heb. xii. is, surely, that just as He endured a cross, despising the shame, and is now seated at the right hand of God, so may the believer endure his cross, despise its shame (not "glory in their shame" as Phil. iii. 19), and in God's good time enter into that better thing, by that better resurrection, to enjoy that better and enduring substance in heaven and the heavenly city.

We are bid to "consider" Him Who endured such contradiction of sinners against Himself, lest we be weary and faint. Analogia, from which "consider" is taken, is translated "proportion" and "consider", and here implies the act of weighing and balancing one thing with another. It would mean considering the pros and cons of gaining the whole world and losing one's own soul. It would mean estimating aright the actions of Esau (Heb. xii. 16) and Moses (xi. 24-26), for just as loss now means the gaining of the soul in that day according to Matt. xvi., so does it according to Heb. x. 39.

We are now brought face to face with another cause of stumbling, "the contradiction of sinners", producing weariness. Earlier we had the entangling nature of "sin", now the "contradiction of sinners". Antilogia is translated "strife" in Heb. vi. 16; "contradiction" (vii. 7; xii. 3) and "gainsaying" of Korah (Jude 11).

This last reference bears rather pointedly upon the teaching of Hebrews concerning the One Priest. The four occurrences of antilego in Acts (xiii. 45, 45 & xxviii. 19, 22) give further light upon the special "contradiction" that the Hebrews would be likely to meet. Each occurrence has to do with Jewish opposition to the ministry of Paul. The occurrences are confined to the beginning and the end of his Acts ministry. The only other reference before Acts xxviii. speaks of Israel as "a disobedient and gainsaying people" (Rom. x. 21).

Perhaps it is hardly necessary to explain to our readers that "contradiction" is connected, too, with our own blessed calling—contradiction from those, who, like gainsaying Israel, "have a zeal of God but not according to knowledge". Let us not be weary and faint, even though undoubted men of God call us hard names, thinking they are serving God. This careful and proportionate consideration of what Christ endured will enable us to take up our cross, for none of us suffer anything comparable with the sufferings of Christ.

"Ye have not yet resisted unto blood, striving against sin."—When we see that the "striving" here includes the word agon—race, we realize that the figure of the context is still maintained.

Let us before closing, "consider Him", the great Prince-Leader and Perfect of faith, and see how He embraces all the qualities exhibited in Heb. xi.

His offering "speaketh better things than that of ABEL"
He was the beloved Son in Whom God was "well pleased" (ENOCH).
He saves in a sense that was impossible to NOAH.
He was more intimate than even the "friend of God" could be (ABRAHAM).
He was "The only Begotten Son" offered by the Father (ISAAC).
He was One Who indeed blessed regarding things to come (JACOB).
He will be the great Ruler and Restorer (JOSEPH).
He is the Prophet greater than MOSES.
He embraces all the heroic acts of GIDEON, DAVID and others,

> He endured as none else endured, refusing deliverance, refusing to save Himself, and finally attained unto that better resurrection where He waits the day of His return.

He is indeed the altogether lovely One, the chiefest among ten thousand. Here, as in Col. iii., "Christ is ALL".

#61. Discipline and sonship (xii. 5-14).
pp. 151 - 155

Heb. xii. 5-24 is occupied with a twofold theme: 5-14, Sons; 15-24, Firstborn.

The first section, sons, speaks of that of which all are partakers if they are true children. The second, of that which the firstborn attain, but of which the Esaus fail.

The structure of xii. 5-14 is simply in its broad outlines, though involved when we approach the detail.

Heb. xii. 5-14.

A | 5-10. Mark of sonship. Discipline received.
B | 10. The end. Partakers of His holiness.
A | 11-13. Fruit of righteousness. Discipline exercised.
B | 14. The pursuit. Peace and holiness.

The opening verse of Heb. xi. is twofold in its aspect, viz., (1) faith is the substance of things hope for: this is the theme of Heb.xi. (2) the elengchos of things not seen: this is the theme of Heb. xii. 5-14.

Elengchos is balanced by elengcho in Heb. xii. 5 where it is translated "rebuked". Now the quotation, "the just shall live by faith", in Heb. x. 38, takes us back to the same word, for in Hab. ii. 1 we find it in the word "reproved". In Heb. xii. the apostle quotes Prov. iii. 11, 12, where in the LXX translation we find elengchos as "correction". This "rebuke", "correction", "discipline" is an essential accompaniment of sonship and growth.

Let us now look at one or two passages that illuminate the purpose and instruments of chastening:--

> "Thou shalt remember all the way which the Lord thy God led thee these forty years in the wilderness, to humble thee, and to prove thee, to know what was in thine heart, whether thou wouldst keep His commandments or no. And he humbled thee, and suffered thee to hunger, and fed thee with manna, which thou knewest not, neither did thy fathers know; that He might make thee know that man doth not live by bread only, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of the Lord doth man live. Thy raiment waxed not old upon thee, neither did thy foot swell these forty years. Thou shalt also consider in thine heart, that, as a man chasteneth his son, so the Lord thy God chasteneth thee" (Deut. viii. 2-5).

We are apt to fix our minds upon the painful side of chastening, and by reason of our folly, there is often a need for that phase, but it is good also to notice that a part of this discipline or chastening was the provision of the daily manna, the marvelous preservation of clothing, and the care of the wanderers' feet!

"The Lord knoweth the thoughts of man, that they are vanity. Blessed is the man whom Thou chasteneth, O Lord, and teacheth him out of the law" (Psa. xciv. 11, 12).

"We are chastened of the Lord, that we should not be condemned with the world" (I Cor. xi. 32).

Here is another comfort: chastening is not condemnation. Chastening is for sons, condemnation for the world. Man's thoughts are vain, he needs a twofold treatment; chastening to remove folly, teaching to supply the needed instruction.

Chastening is not only the work of the Father, for Christ Himself says to the church: "As many as I love, I rebuke and chasten: be zealous, therefore, and repent" (Rev. iii. 19).

The apostle puts the matter of this chastening before the reader in a variety of ways. First, the attitude of mind toward it. Do not despise it. Do not faint when rebuked. Perhaps "despise" is too strong a word. Rather what is meant is to hold lightly, to have very little concern about. That is one attitude to be avoided. There is the opposite extreme, however, that is, of magnifying the chastening endured, and so "fainting" at the rebuke. This also is wrong. We have to remember that the chastening has to do with us "as sons" (Heb. xii. 5-7). It comes to us from One Who loves us (Heb. xii. 6). To be without chastening is to be without proof of sonship. The little gutter child, unkempt, uncorrected, uncared for, is free from the discipline, restraint, training, care and correction that loving fatherhood imposes, but who, knowing the truth, would exchange the "discipline" of the one for the "liberty" of the other?

The apostle proceeds to reason from the lesser to the greater. We have had fathers in this life whose discipline was brief, and as far as they knew right, but sometimes in error, yet we held them in respect. God is the Father of our spirits, His discipline is never at fault, and it tends to life. Shall we not then much rather render submission to Him?

The object that the Lord has in view all this time is revealed in Heb. xii. 10: "That we may be partakers of His holiness." Holiness is the atmosphere of Hebrews, as righteousness is of Romans. The sanctification of the believer lies entirely outside his own deeds or endeavours. They are sanctified by the blood of Him Who suffered "without the gate" (Heb. xiii. 12). If they are called upon to go unto Him without the camp, bearing His reproach (Heb. xiii. 13), it is but manifesting in act and character what has been already accomplished. The going without the camp will never sanctify—it may manifest sanctification.

"By the which will we are sanctified through the offering of the body of Jesus Christ once for all" (Heb. x. 10).

"For by one offering He hath perfected for ever, them that are sanctified" (Heb. x. 14).

This "perfecting for ever" is in nowise altered or minimized because the epistle proceeds to urge each to "go on unto perfection", or because it associates perfecting with suffering and obedience. When therefore we read that this discipline has in view the partaking of His holiness, we do not understand that any amount of scourging can sanctify, but that the believer, already perfectly sanctified in Christ, is now trained and encouraged to walk in harmony with such a blessed position.

While the apostle urged the believer to treat with all due reverence the chastening of the Lord, he assumed no stoic indifference. There is something intensely human in the admission: "Now no chastening for the present seemeth to be joyous, but grievous, nevertheless afterward it yieldeth the peaceable fruit of righteousness unto them which are exercised thereby" (Heb. xii. 11).

Three items in this verse demand attention. First, the words "Nevertheless, afterward". While mother-love is immediate and protective, father-love is concerned with the future. The one sees the babe that is now. The other visualized the man that is to be. The underlying thought is very close to that of II Cor. iv. 16-18, which hinges upon the words, "while we look not at the things which are seen".

Then the Greek expression translated "The peaceable fruits of righteousness". We understand this to mean in English, "the peaceable fruits, namely, righteousness". Holiness in Christ is manifest, and imputed righteousness has produced its peaceable fruit. The chastening and the discipline has had the effect of pruning; it has produced fruitfulness. Here is a parallel with Phil. i. 11 which speaks of bringing forth the fruits of righteousness.

All, however, turns upon the third expression: "To them which are exercised thereby", just as the prayer in Philippians urges the need for discernment and trying the things that differ.

Watch the effect of discipline upon two of the Lord's children. One becomes mellow, the other hard and sour. The one is going on unto perfection, the other drawing back unto perdition. Look at Israel in the wilderness. After their first experience at Marah one would have thought that the next problem concerning water would, at once, have thrown them back on the memory of the Lord's earlier intervention on their behalf, and that they would have trusted in quiet confidence. But no, so far as they were concerned, the discipline of Marah was wasted upon them; they were not "exercised" thereby. O let us not pass through trials and reap no reward! Let us ever seek to be "exercised" by the discipline of our pathway, and then it will turn to our profit and the Lord's glory. This "exercise" is the mark of the "perfect"; "But strong meat belongeth to them that are perfect, even those who by reason of use have their senses exercised to discern both good and evil" (Heb. v. 14). A baby has senses, a man has senses exercised. A true son of God is exercised by the chastening of the Lord: he is unworthy of the name if he is indifferent or hardened.

It is not without bearing upon the theme of Heb. xii. that the word "exercise" is gumnazo. The word actually means "to be naked", because in the Greek sports the competitors were stripped. So we have gumnos translated "naked" in Matt. xxv. 36; II Cor. v. 3; Heb. iv. 13 and other places. Coming, as it does, after the exhortation to "lay aside every weight and the easily-entangling sin, and run with patience the race set before us", this word gumnazo is very apt.

Seeing then that chastening, though unpleasant, is fruitful, we are exhorted to: "Lift up the hands which hang down, and the feeble knees, and make straight paths for your feet, lest that which is lame be dislocated; but let it rather be healed. Follow peace with all men" (Heb. xii. 12-14). In other words, we are not to seek martyrdom, we are not to pose as sufferers, we are not to pick the roughest tracks and run the thorniest way. Rather are we to gird up the loins and hope to the end; make the place for our feet as level as we can, not aggravate the lame ankle, but rather get it well, that we may finish our course with joy. Further, we are to follow peace with all men. Our discipline will sometimes come through the permitted oppression of man, and when it does we must bow before the Father's good pleasure. On the other hand we should not go out of our way to irritate our fellows or ask for trouble, but as far as in us lies, we are to make for peace.

Another line of exhortation is discovered here by observing a parallel with Phil. iii. 19, where the believer is urged to mark those who so walk that their end is perdition. So here, those who were running the race are told to make a firm track so that others not so strong or fleet of foot would be encouraged to continue.

> "And holiness, without which no man shall see the Lord" (Heb. xii. 14).

This will cause us to run up against the elements of the world and the tradition of men, and will probably provide all the chastisement that we can endure, but without it, we are warned that "no man shall see the Lord".

The two words that should be emphasized in the while passage under consideration are "endure", and "exercise":--

> "If ye endure chastening, God dealeth with you as with sons" (Heb. xii. 7).
> "Nevertheless, afterward it yieldeth the peaceable fruit of righteousness unto them that are exercised, thereby" (Heb. xii. 11).

"Nevertheless afterward!"

The leading of the Lord.

#1. p. 95

A—I have a friend, whose sincerity I do not doubt, who nevertheless causes me a certain amount of questioning by reason of an expression which is continually in his mouth. It seems that the one answer he makes to all things is: "I felt led", and no matter how others may view his action, or what trouble it may bring in its train, "I felt led" seems to be the beginning and the end of the matter. I should like a little talk on the subject if you can spare the time.

B—It will not be very profitable to discuss your friend, for we have nothing certain to go upon, but if you wish we could turn to the Word and gather some of its teaching upon the subject. Now I suppose that before we go a step further we ought to make sure that the idea of the Lord's leading is a scriptural fact.

A—Of that I have no doubt. One has but to remember Psalm xxiii. to establish that: "He leadeth me beside the still waters . . . . . He leadeth me in the paths of righteousness for His name's sake."

B—You are right. Let us come to the first great type of the Lord's leading, namely, the pillar of cloud that led His children Israel. What do you learn from that?

A—The thought that comes most forcibly to my mind is the association in Exod. xl. between the ark, the mercy-seat, and the cloud: "So Moses finished the work. Then a cloud covered the tent" (Exod. xl. 33-38).

B—The only criticism I have to make on your remark is that you have not gone back far enough. The first appearance of the pillar of cloud is found in Exod. xiii. 21. Here you will find neither ark, mercy-seat, nor tabernacle. Here you have redemption, the "way out", whereas in Exod. xl you have atonement, or the "way in". We have therefore two presentations of the Lord's leading—one by reason of redemption, and one by reason of restored fellowship. If we are the Lord's redeemed He will lead us whether we realize it or not. It is part of the purchase of the blood of the Lamb.

A—That is to say, whether we feel led, or whether we are scarcely awake to the new life, that leading is ours, ours until we reach the Father's home.

B—Yes, and the second lesson is that the Lord's will is that He should dwell with His people, that there should be communion, that there should be access and willing service, and with this is connected the second reference to the cloud and the fire. To "feel led" in the true sense indicates a very close fellowship, and all that fellowship includes, such as walking in the light, and the cleansing from sin.

There are two other points connected with this type that we ought to notice. What would you say the pillar of cloud symbolized?

A—I should say it symbolized the presence of the Lord: "And He said, My presence shall go with thee, and I will give thee rest . . . . . If Thy presence go not with me, carry us not up hence" (Exod. xxxiii. 14, 15).

B—Conscious enjoyment of the presence of God, then, seems to be a necessary accompaniment to feeling led. Do you notice anything else that is a comfort?

A—I cannot say that I do at the moment.

B—It seems to me to be a very gracious provision that the evidence of the Lord's presence was made to fit the circumstance. By day it was a cloud, by night a fire. Had the presence not been visible at all, or only visible by day, the fact would have remained, but see how the Lord condescends to cheer and comfort so that at night as well as by day His children may have the assurance that He is with them and leading them on. It was not only rendered visible at all times, but the last words of Exod. xl. record that it was with Israel "throughout all their journeys".

The Ministry of Consolation.

#29. "Written for our learning . . . . . comfort of the Scriptures" (Rom. xv. 4).

pp. 26, 27

In the three papers preceding this one, we have brought together teaching from the Psalms, which may be summarized as follows:--

> The believer, though bowed down in soul, and surrounded by adversaries, may nevertheless be confident of victory, for he trusts in God Who "perfects" or brings all things to their appointed end, and so his heart is "prepared" and unmoved.
> This attitude of heart is moreover very closely connected with the "exaltation" of the Lord, which foreshadows the ascension of Christ. The exalted Lord is by no means inaccessible, but on the contrary is One Who "hath respect unto the lowly".

It seems fitting that we should not conclude these brief observations without drawing the reader's attention to their N.T. fulfillment.

The "perfecting" God is seen at His blessed work in Hebrews, where "to go on unto perfection" (or the end) is a key passage. Hebrews, moreover, is vitally connected with the ascended Christ, His finished work being emphasized by the fact that He has "sat down on the right hand of the Majesty on high". He has "passed through the heavens" (Heb. iv. 14), and in Him we have One Who, having been touched with the feeling of our infirmities, bids us draw near to the throne of grace to obtain mercy and grace to help in time of need; and as One Who has been made high, yea "higher than the heavens" (Heb. vii. 26), He "ever liveth to make intercession for us". This exalted One is, moreover, Head of the church, the one body, and as the ascended One He gave "gifts unto men" (Eph. iv. 8-11), which gifts in their turn are instrumental in leading on to the "perfect" man.

Whilst (if Eph. iii. 2-11 be true) the dispensation of the mystery cannot be a subject of revelation in the O.T., nevertheless the ministry of consolation is as wide as suffering saintship, and knows no dispensational boundaries.

There is far more of victory in the ascension of Christ than we have as yet perceived, and it is good in the midst of trouble to remember that One at the right hand of God, and also be able, in His triumph, to be "more than conquerors" (Rom. viii. 34-37).

"O magnify the Lord with Me, and let us exalt His Name together" (Psa. xxxiv. 3).

#30. Helpers together (II Cor. 1. 8-11).
pp. 27, 28

Never was there more need than at the present time to remember that among the blessings of redemption is a "sound mind". Both among the orthodox and unorthodox we meet the extremist. In II Cor. i. 8-11 the apostle Paul mingles together the human and the divine in such a way that while the arm of flesh is absolutely set aside, the weaker saint is nevertheless gathered into a most glorious fellowship with "God that raiseth the dead". Let us note the transition:--

1. The utter end of human strength.

   "We were pressed out of measure, above strength, insomuch that we despaired even of life" (verse 8).

2. The utter failure was for a divine purpose.

   "But we had the sentence of death in ourselves, that we should not trust in ourselves, but in God which raiseth the dead" (verse 9).

3. No deliverance can be expected from any source other than God, either in the present or the future.

   "Who delivered us from so great a death (past) and doth deliver (present); in whom we trust that He will yet deliver (future) us" (verse 10).

4. The unexpected call into fellowship of those who, in themselves, are for ever set aside as strengthless.

   "Ye also helping together by prayer for us" (verse 11).

What a light this throws on the condescending grace of God! What a sermon it preaches upon the nature of prayer! What a stress it throws upon the place of fellowship! "Ye also helping together."

Since the creation of man, and the divine statement: "It is not good . . . . . I will make him an help meet for him" (Gen. ii. 18), this element of fellowship has remained.

The Psalmist seems to have had some knowledge of the truth of II Cor. i. for he says in Psalm cxviii. 7: "The Lord taketh my part with them that help me", and Psalm liv. 4 expresses much the same thought: "Behold, God is my helper: the Lord is with them that uphold my soul."

"With them that help me." "With them that uphold my soul." "Ye also helping together." While the flesh can have no place, is it not a comfort to the weakest believer to realize the reality of the words: "Truly our fellowship is with the Father, and with His Son Jesus Christ" (I John i. 3)?

A parallel passage that but confirms this blessed association of the Saviour and the saint is Phil. i. 19:--

> "For I know that this shall turn to my salvation, through your prayer (the saints helping together), and the supply of the Spirit of Jesus Christ (the Saviour). According to my earnest expectation" (the recipient).

Here once again we have this blessed chain that binds us all around the throne of God. Shall we not rise to such a call for fellowship?

#31. "Heights and Depths."
pp. 61, 62

It is beyond our knowledge to be able to say, without reserve, that the apostle Paul was the greatest servant of the Lord Jesus that ever lived, but we do know that he was one of the greatest. We learn much by the noble example he sets us in faith, in hope and in love and its labours. It is, however, written for our consolation that he suffered as we do, felt as we do, prayed as we do, and lived the daily round as we do. In the midst of a passage dealing with the delicate problem of church government, and immediately after giving a charge "before God, the Lord Jesus Christ, and the elect angels", Paul suddenly descends to earth and sends a little private advice concerning Timothy's weak stomach (I Tim. v. 23); and then without ceremony or explanation he resumes his theme concerning church government. The incongruity is only superficial. Timothy, though possessed of spiritual gifts, was an "earthen vessel", and Paul knew that physical disability often interferes with spiritual witness. If we were more spiritual and less shallow we should accept the fulness of truth that can sweep all things into the service of God, and sense no dissonance when reading of elect angels, church officers, Timothy's infirmities, Paul's prescription, and the day of judgment.

In the second epistle to Timothy, Paul's martyrdom is in full view. During his life of service he had suffered as few men ever suffered, yet how refreshing it is to see the utter absence of "pose". We have full, deep and utter consecration, but not one word of the heroic:--

> "The cloak that I left at Troas with Carpus, when thou comest, bring with thee" (II Tim. iv. 13).

The man who was happy in the prospect of "being offered" (II Tim. iv. 6), and who could stand unashamed and unperturbed though all men forsook him (i. 12 and iv. 16), had too great a conception of truth to pander to the flesh and write:--

> Do not think of bringing the cloak from Troas. What is a little cold to one in whose breast burns the holy fire of martyrdom?

This apparent "neglecting of the body" would have been the surest way of "satisfying the flesh". Some children of God seem to go out of their way to look for martyrdom. It would be far better to avoid all pretensions and save oneself up for the eventuality of the real thing. In Acts xx. 24 Paul uttered those stirring words that found their fulfillment in II Tim. iv.:--

> "None of these things move me, neither count I my life dear unto myself, so that I might finish my course with joy."

Yet, look at verse 13 of the same chapter in Acts:--

> "And we went before to ship, and sailed unto Assos, there intending to take in Paul: for so had he appointed, minding himself to go afoot."

Here was no Stoic who could be "unmoved" simply because bereft of human feeling; here was one that gladly availed himself of a little spell of relief from the constant pressure of the lives of others. If we do not misread the passage, Paul was glad to "get away" for a time; it was a kind of safety-valve.

Let us take consolation from these homely, every-day facts revealed for our learning. Abraham lived many a day as humdrum as our own. He was not always "fighting", "believing" or "offering". Paul, with all his strenuous witness, lived the life of a man. However rapt his vision, he found time to eat and drink; however full of zeal, he must have slept, and when he shivered with cold he was too great to be above asking for a cloak. Let us leave the "pose" to others. Let us above all things seek reality, so that our walk shall be worthy in those quiet and unrecorded days as well as during the mountain-top experiences, when such a walk is comparatively easy.

Redemption. New Series.

#19. The forgiveness of sins.
pp. 49 - 53

The immediate result of redemption is the forgiveness of sins:--

> "In Whom we have redemption through His blood, the forgiveness of sins, according to the riches of His grace; wherein He hath abounded toward us" (Eph. i. 7, 8).

Forgiveness, however, is also the result of atonement (according to the O.T. usage of the word):--

> "Blessed is the man whose transgression is forgiven, whose sin is covered" (Psa. xxxii. 1).

We find justification closely connected with both redemption and atonement in Romans:--

> "Being justified freely by His grace through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus; Whom God hath set forth to be a propitiation (the O.T. 'atonement') through faith in His blood" (Rom. iii. 24, 25).

Justification and forgiveness are closely allied as may be seen by reading Acts xiii. and Rom. iv.:--

> "Be it known unto you therefore . . . . . that through this Man is preached unto you the forgiveness of sins, and by Him all that believe are justified" (Acts xiii. 38, 39).
> "Even as David described the blessedness of the man unto whom God imputeth righteousness, without works, saying, Blessed are they whose iniquities are forgiven" (Rom. iv. 6, 7).

The true foundation for heart realization of this great blessing, is not only the experience of it at the hand of the Lord, but the knowledge of it based upon the teaching of His Word. When experience walks hand in hand with revelation we have a fellowship that is real and fruitful.

There are three words used in the Hebrew Scriptures to describe three aspects of forgiveness, viz., nasa, kaphar, and salach. Let us ponder them.

> NASA.—"The Lord is longsuffering, and of great mercy, forgiving iniquity . . . . . as Thou hast forgiven this people from Egypt until now" (Numb. xiv. 18, 19).

The Hebrew word means "to bear", and has a threefold force: (1) lifting up, (2) carrying, (3) taking away. Nasa is used sacrificially for the bearing of sin, but it will be well to see its use in non-doctrinal connections first. It is used frequently of bearing the ark (Josh. iii. 8), and of bearing armour (I Sam. xiv. 1). The first occurrence of the word in the Scriptures shows by the very problem of its translation that from earliest days—even from Eden itself—forgiveness of sin was associated so intimately with the bearing of sin and its attendant punishment, that the same word was used to convey the two separate though related ideas:--

> "My punishment is greater than I can bear" (Gen. iv. 13).
> "Mine iniquity is greater than it may be forgiven" (Margin).

Long before Moses was instructed to give the law and prescribe the great typical sacrifices, the inter-relation of "bearing" and "forgiving" was understood. Joseph's brethren say: "Forgive the trespass of the servants of the God of thy fathers" (Gen. l. 17), using the word nasa ("to bear").

With the addition of the word "face" the meaning of the word extends further and becomes "acceptance", as in Gen. xix. 21: "I have accepted thee concerning this thing."

We are not left in doubt as to what "bearing iniquity" involved.

> "Lest they bear sin for it, and die therefore" (Lev. xxii. 9).

Forgiveness, therefore, as this word testifies, while an act of grace and mercy, has a righteous basis: "He is faithful and just to forgive us our sins." And so we read of the Lord Jesus:--

> "He hath poured out His soul unto death . . . . . He bare the sin of many, and made intercession for the transgressors" (Isa. liii. 12).

The next word we consider is kaphar, which is more frequently translated "to make an atonement" than in any other way. In a previous article in this series we have examined this word, and found that it meant, "the covering of sin by cancellation", and hence, when it is translated "forgive", it approaches very near to the idea of nasa. Forgiven sin is borne sin, borne it is true by another, but lifted up from the sinner and carried by the Saviour: "Who His own self bare our sins in His own body on the tree" (I Pet. ii. 24). So forgiven sin has been "covered". Not "covered up" as some have said, but "covered" in the sense that its liabilities have been met and discharged.

Jeremiah uses an expression with kaphar that makes the figure more vivid: "Forgive not their iniquity, neither blot out their sins from Thy sight" (Jer. xviii. 23). That is scriptural "covering" of sin—"blotted out from God's sight", and he would be presumptious who would say thereafter that O.T. atonement or "covering" was a "mere covering" of sin.

The Psalmist said:--

> "But He, being full of compassion, forgave their iniquity, and destroyed them not; yea, many a time turned He His anger away" (Psa. lxxviii. 38).

Here "forgiveness" is placed in correspondence with "turning His anger away". When the Publican prayed "God be merciful to me the sinner" (Luke xviii. 13), he used the word hilaskonai, "be propitious", alluding to the O.T. kaphar, atonement. The forgiveness of sins is impossible without this propitiation.

> "He is faithful and just to forgive us our sins . . . . . He is the propitiation for our sins" (I John i. 9, ii. 2).

The third word is salach. This word approaches nearest to the English word "forgive". Although it occurs some 45 times or more, it is not found with such varying translations as noted in the case of nasa, or kaphar, being translated either "forgive", "pardon", or "spare". Lexicographers assign to the root of the word the idea "to loose", "to remit", "to relax" and its frequent rendering in the LXX (aphiemi) approaches very closely this basic meaning. The Greek word we will consider presently.

Solomon uses this word in his great prayer recorded in I Kings viii. with its solemn refrain: "And when Thou hearest, forgive." It is the word that comes in Psa. ciii. 3: "Who forgiveth all thine iniquities." So also in the repeated statement of Lev. iv., v., and vi.: "And it shall be forgiven them."

New Testament reality.

While the sacrifices and offerings of the law could never take away sin or touch the conscience, they most clearly pointed to the only way of forgiveness, and that by the shed blood of an accepted offering.

Nasa finds its equivalent in airo, "to bear"; "Behold the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world" (John i. 29). Kaphar fins its counterpart and fulfillment in the "propitiation": "Whom God hath set forth to be a propitiation through faith in His blood, to declare His righteousness for the remission of sins that are past" (Rom. iii. 25).

The Epistle to the Hebrews testifies that, although the offerings of the old covenant are of no avail, it still remains true that "without shedding of blood there is no remission" (Heb. ix. 22).

The two great ideas in N.T. forgiveness are expressed in two passages in Ephesians: (1). There is forgiveness that releases, sets free, remits. (2). There is forgiveness that is an act of gracious kindness.

> (1). "In Whom we have redemption through His blood, the forgiveness of sins" (Eph. i. 7).

This is the word aphesis, meaning release. A good idea of its root meaning is found in Luke iv. 18: "To preach deliverance (aphesis) to the captives . . . . . to set at liberty (aphesis) them that are bruised." It will be seen that the very exodus from the house of bondage was a figure of forgiveness or release. The word is used of the remitting of debts in Matt. vi. 12, and xviii. 32.

(2). "Be ye kind one to another, tenderhearted, forgiving (charizomai) one another, even as God for Christ's sake hath forgiven you (charizomai)" (Eph. iv. 32).

This word conveys the idea of an act of grace:-- "Graced Him with a Name that is above every name" (Phil. ii. 9).

"Freely give us all things" (Rom. viii. 32).

Such is the glorious message of the forgiveness of sins. Those sins have been "put away", "cancelled", "blotted out". Their debt has been remitted, the debtor set free. This forgiveness is found in the shed blood of Christ, and in the rich grace of God, and is so established in righteousness that His righteousness has been manifested even in the remission of sins that were committed before Christ came. Whenever and wherever forgiveness is granted it is the glory of the gospel that "He is faithful and just to forgive", even though the whole scheme and provision is an act of mercy and free grace beyond our power to fathom.

He who minimizes or throws doubt upon the sacrificial work of the Son of God, who discredits the shedding of His precious blood, is an enemy to our true peace, a destroyer of the gospel's sweetest message. It is not only written in Hebrews, in Ephesians, and in Romans (three great epistles indispensable and priceless), that without the shedding of blood is no forgiveness, but it is found in the mouth of the believer in the day of the Lord. Converted Israel cry: "Unto Him that loveth us and loosed us from our sins by His blood" (Rev. i. 5).

"Lord, now lettest Thou Thy servant depart (apoluo, same word "forgive", Luke vii. 47) in peace, according to Thy Word, for mine eyes have seen Thy salvation" (Luke ii. 29).

#20. The precious blood of Christ.
pp. 81 - 85

There are thirty-six references to the blood of Christ in the N.T.; thirty-six references, by six writers, distributed through the four Gospels, the Acts, Romans, I Corinthians, Ephesians, Colossians, Hebrews, I Peter, I John, and the Apocalypse. The blood of Christ is specifically associated with the new covenant, with the provision of life, with the purchase of the Church, with propitiation, redemption, forgiveness of sins, justification, nearness, peace, access, and victory. It is called "precious", is said to have been "shed" and "sprinkled", to speak better things than that of Abel, and to be infinitely more valuable than the blood of bulls and goats. It is too not much to say, therefore, that a denial of the necessity and provision of this sacrificial feature in the purpose of God in Christ, vitiates the whole revelation of God, not only the N.T. with its gospel, but the O.T. with its typical teaching.

These thirty-six references to the blood of Christ in the N.T. deal with twelve great features in the purpose of grace, each one a theme in itself.

1. The new covenant, and the aionion covenant.

Israel's future, their restoration, their forgiveness, their enjoyment of all the promises made unto the fathers, the faithfulness of God to His word and oath, all find assurance and settlement in the blood of Christ.

> "And He took the cup, and gave thanks, and gave it to them, saying, Drink ye all of it, for this is My blood of the new covenant, which is shed for many for the remission of sins" (Matt. xxvi. 27, 28; Mark xiv. 24; Luke xxii. 20).
> "This cup is the new covenant in My blood" (I Cor. xi. 25).
>
> "Behold the days come saith the Lord, when I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel and with the house of Judah" (Heb. viii. 8).
> "Now the God of peace, that brought again from the dead our Lord Jesus, that great Shepherd of the sheep, through the blood of the aionion covenant, make you perfect in every good work to do His will" (Heb. xiii. 20, 21).

The first covenant was not dedicated without blood, for we read that Moses sprinkled the book and all the people, saying: "This is the blood of the covenant, which God has enjoined unto you" (Heb. ix. 20). The old covenant was not found faultless, so it was put aside. The blood of bulls and goats gave no guarantee that this covenant would ever be fulfilled.

The fact that the new covenant was dedicated and confirmed by nothing less than the blood of Christ assures its complete success, and settles for ever the question of Israel's restoration and the fulfillment of all the promises made by God unto the fathers.

2. The blood is the life.

The only references to the blood of Christ in the Gospels which have a doctrinal bearing, other than those that refer to the new covenant, are found in John vi. The statements at first sight appear somewhat repulsive, for we read of "eating His flesh" and "drinking His blood", but when we remember the references to "the bread of life" which gives life to the world, we are supplied with the key to their meaning: "I am the bread of life: he that cometh to Me shall never hunger, and he that believeth on Me shall never thirst" (John vi. 35). Here "coming" and "believing" are used instead of "eating" and "drinking".

In verse 63 we find another guide: "The flesh profiteth nothing: the words that I speak unto you, they are spirit, and they are life." So when we read: "Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink His blood, ye have no life in you", and "Whoso eateth My flesh, and drinketh My blood, hath aionion life; and I will raise Him up at the last day" (John vi. 53, 54), we interpret these words as words of spirit and life. And we realize that "coming" to Christ and "believing" on Him is something more than a passing phase of interest; it is in some way a partaking, an incorporating, a communion. So the passage continues: "He that eateth My flesh and drinketh My blood dwelleth in Me, and I in Him" (John v. 56). These words anticipate those of John xvii. 23: "I in them, and Thou in Me, that they may have been perfected into one."

This idea of intimate incorporation is found in John vi. 57: "As the living Father hath sent Me, and I live by the Father; so he that eateth Me, even he shall live by Me." If we therefore seek instruction and example as to translating this "eating" and "drinking" into spiritual reality, we must closely follow the attitude of heart that characterized the Saviour's absolute faith in the Father: "My meat is to do the will of Him that sent Me, and to finish His work" (John iv. 34).

There is an insistence upon life in the sixth chapter of John:-- > "Labour not for the meat that perisheth, but for that meat which endureth unto everlasting (aionion) life" (27).

> "For the bread of God is He which cometh down from heaven, and giveth life unto the world" (33).
> "I am the bread of life" (35,48).
> "That every one that seeth the Son, and believeth on Him, may have aionion life: and I will raise him up at the last day" (40).
> "The bread that I will give is My flesh, which I will give for the life of the world" (51).
> "Except ye eat . . . . . and drink . . . . . ye have no life in you" (53).
> "The words that I speak unto you, they are spirit, and they are life" (63).
> "Lord, to whom shall we go? Thou hast the word of aionion life' (68).

We have, moreover, seven passages that use the word "living":--

> "The living bread . . . . . shall live unto the age" (51).
> "The living Father . . . . . I live by the Father . . . . . shall live by Me" (57).
> "Shall live unto the age" (58).
> "We believe and are sure that Thou art that Christ, the Son of the living God" (69).

No one familiar with Lev. xvii. 14 ("The blood is the life") will fail to see the close connection between faith, life and the atoning blood of Christ. Indeed, the connection is more than verbal; it is spirit and life, it is fundamental. Faith unites us to Christ in such a way that His very life becomes our own, and His very death is reckoned ours too. John vi. gives in figure what Rom. vi. teaches in plain doctrine.

3. Purchase and redemption.

"Feed the church of God which He has purchased with His own blood" (Acts xx. 28).

A great deal has been written about this impressive and wonderful passage, but after wading through a sea of manuscripts, after weighing over, most carefully, all the evidences, and after waiting upon the Lord for guidance, most expositors have come back to the text as translated in the A.V. It is indeed a tremendous statement. "The church of God" we have read of before, but what a light is thrown upon that church, and that God, when we read: "which He has purchased with His own blood!"

Fairly faced, this passage gathers up unto itself the true meaning and essential condition pertaining to the office of the Kinsman-Redeemer, shows the close intimate connection between the Lord and His chosen, called-out, people, settles all arguments as to the efficacy and preciousness of that blood shed for the church's deliverance, and leaves the deity of Christ unassailable, for none but Jesus Christ is the Redeemer of the church.

The word purchase is peripoieomai, "to acquire", and peripoissis occurs in Eph. i. 14: "Until the redemption of the purchased possession", and in I Pet. ii. 9: "A peculiar people."

Redemption by the blood of Christ issues in forgiveness of sins in Eph. i. 1, and redemption by the precious blood of Christ (as of a Lamb without spot or blemish) is set forth in I Pet. i. 18, 19 as a deliverance from "tradition".

An aionion redemption intimately connected with the new covenant is found in Heb. ix. 12, while in Rev. v. 9, 10, in the new song, we find the Lamb about to break the seals, claim the inheritance, and place Israel in their position as kings and priests on the earth, all this being effected by the blood of the Lamb.

4. Propitiation the "atonement" of the O.T.

"Whom God has set forth to be a propitiation through faith in His blood" (Rom. iii. 25).

Propitiation, here, is "the mercy seat" of Heb. ix. 5, which in its turn gathers up all the great typical teaching found in the O.T. under the word "atonement". Seeing that the apostle Paul uses this O.T. word directly of the work of Christ, we most gladly and thankfully accept the teaching, rejoicing that all the precious typical blessings foreshadowed under the law are ours, in their glorious reality, through the precious blood of Christ. A fuller examination of this passage will be found in the series of expositions on The Epistle to the Romans.

The references in Hebrews to the High Priest entering within the vail once a year, and to the great Antitype entering "heaven itself", "neither by the blood of goats or calves, but by His own blood", teach us the preciousness and the fullness of this wondrous propitiation. The subject is too vast and too important for us to attempt to summarize, so we will leave the remaining references to be dealt with in another paper. Meanwhile let us ponder the depths of grace that are found in the words, "the precious blood of Christ".

pp. 113 - 117

We have already seen that the blood of Christ is most intimately associated with the new covenant, life, redemption, and propitiation, and were nothing else revealed these four items, with all for which they stand, would more than justify the expression, "The precious blood of Christ". We have further blessings, however, to consider, and so we proceed to:--

5. Justification.

> "Much more then, being now justified by His blood, we shall be saved from wrath through Him" (Rom. v. 9).

Justification by faith, without works of law, is fundamental to the gospel of God as preached by Paul. It is, moreover, important to realize that justification is not said to be derived from the life-long obedience of Christ to the law, neither is it said to be based upon His resurrection or present intercession, it is bound in His blood. When the Lord rose from the dead it was "because of our justifying" (Rom. iv. 25), not to obtain it.

6. Sanctification.

Closely allied with justification is sanctification, and this, though having wide and deep spiritual and experimental aspects which are very closely connected with the work of the Holy Spirit, finds its foundation and beginning in the blood of Christ:--

> "Wherefore Jesus also, that He might sanctify the people with His own blood, suffered without the gate" (Heb. xiii. 12).

We have the typical foreshadowing of this in verse 11 "without the gate" answering to the Old Testament ritual: "The bodies of those beasts, whose blood is brought into the sanctuary by the high priest for sin, are burned without the camp." This is the sin offering so graphically described in Lev. iv. 1-12, and it is by the blood of the sin offering that sanctification is provided. All development springs from this source.

Every passage that speaks of holiness, of saints, and of sanctification, speaks aloud of the efficacy of that precious blood. Not only does the blood of Christ provide justification and sanctification—blessings that are referred to under the heading of our "standing"—but it also has to do with our preservation afterwards in a corresponding "state". This we see in the next two features, viz., "Cleansing" and "Victory".

7. Cleansing.

> "How much more shall the blood of Christ . . . purge your conscience" (Heb. ix. 14).
> "The blood of Jesus Christ . . . . . cleanseth us from all sin" (I John i. 7).
> "They have washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb" (Rev. vii. 14).

Sin renders a man unclean. This fact was impressed upon Israel continually. The touching of a dead body, or the eating of certain foods, rendered a man unclean. Uncleanness excluded from the presence of God, or from any act of service to Him. Cleansing was accomplished by sacrifices, baptisms, and the ashes of an heifer, compounded to make a ceremonial purgation. The one statement concerning Christ's sacrificial work in Heb. i. is of this great cleansing: "When He had by Himself purged our sins" (Heb. i. 3).

It is possible that some rather crude theology is extant, especially in certain hymns, but nevertheless we would far rather hear a child of God singing, "There is a fountain filled with blood" than hear the modern intellectual trample Christ's blood under foot.

8. Victory.

> "And they overcame him because of the blood of the Lamb, and because of the word of their testimony; and they loved not their lives unto the death" (Rev. xii. 11).

It is evident that here we have the echo of the victory of Calvary carried forward in the experience of the saints: "The blood of the Lamb . . . . . they loved not their lives unto the death." We are more than conquerors through Him that loved us, and as we appreciate His victory and the spirit of His conquest, so shall we conquer too.

These overcomers were no proud conquerors. In the eyes of the world they were pitiable fools. They appeared to be losers; they went to the death with no miraculous intervention to justify their faith. The earth drank in their blood, while they prayed for their murderers. The blood of Christ, shed at the hands of men, the Lamb of God, dumb before the shearers, the cry: "Father, forgive them", these constituted the testimony and the victory.

9. The blood of sprinkling.

This thought is limited to the circumcision, being connected either with the ratification of a covenant people, or their cleansing and deliverance.

> "Elect according to the foreknowledge of God the Father, through sanctification of the Spirit, unto obedience and sprinkling of the blood of Jesus Christ" (I Pet. i. 2).
> "Having our heart sprinkled from an evil conscience" (Heb. x. 22).
>
> "If . . . . . the ashes of an heifer sprinkling the unclean, sanctifieth to the purifying of the flesh, how much more shall the blood of Christ . . . . . purge your conscience" (Heb. ix. 13, 14).
>
> "Moses . . . . . sprinkled . . . . . all the people, saying, this is the blood of the covenant, which God has enjoined unto you" (Heb. ix. 19, 20).
> "Through faith he kept the passover, and the sprinkling of blood" (Heb. xi. 28).

These features have been seen before, but it is necessary that the reader should be stimulated to discover the meaning of this sprinkling, so that no phase of the blessed work of Christ should be unseen or unappreciated.

10. Made nigh.

> "But now in Christ Jesus ye who sometimes were far off are made nigh by the blood of Christ" (Eph. ii. 13).

The church of the mystery, which is a new creation, a spiritual unity, indeed the unity of the Spirit, is made not by the Holy Spirit Himself, but by the blood of Christ, the Holy Spirit recognizing and hallowing that precious blood, and building into the holy temple only such living stones as bear that sacred mark. No member of the one body is redeemed other than by that precious blood of Christ (Eph. i. 7). No member but is made nigh by that precious blood (Eph. ii. 13), and as we shall see in the next paragraph, there is no bond of peace apart from that same shed blood.

11. Peace.

> "And having made peace through the blood of His cross, by Him to reconcile all things unto Himself" (Col. i. 20).

The reconciliation of all things (even those that are invisible and heavenly) finds its basis in the blood of His cross. The laying down of that life, the pouring out of that blood were absolutely necessary before one member of the body of Christ could know peace. There is no higher spiritual place than that reached in these prison epistles, yet may we remember at all times that even here, in the climax of the purpose of the ages, this thin red line, started at Gen. iii., is found interwoven.

12. Boldness to enter.

In Heb. x. 19 the Epistle reaches a goal. It has emphasized the glorious fullness of Christ in every chapter. Above angels, above Adam, above Moses, above Joshua, above Melchisedec, above all typical sacrifices. The culminating point is the establishing of the "better covenant" upon "better promises" (Heb. x. 1-18), and immediately this has been reached the apostle says: "Having therefore, brethren, boldness to enter into the holiest by the blood of Jesus . . . . . let us draw near" (Heb. x. 19-22).

We have seen elsewhere that redemption may be spoken of as the great exodus, while the word translated in this passage "to enter" is literally the eisodus; the first is the way out, the second the way in. Redemption is not perfected until the people of God are led out of bondage, and into His presence. Eph. i., ii. and iii. have the same sequence:--

> "In Whom we have redemption through His blood" (Eph. i. 7).
> "That He might reconcile the both unto God in one body by the cross . . . . . we both have access by one Spirit unto the Father" (Eph. ii. 16-18).
> "In Whom we have boldness and access with confidence by the faith of Him" (Eph. iii. 12).

Such is the summary. A precious and sacred theme such as this demands fuller and more reverent treatment than this list can present. We trust, however, that having seen in outline the blessings that flow to both saved Jew and Gentile by reason of that blood once shed, we may be provoked to prayer and careful study of the Scriptures so that these "dry bones" may live.

#22. Christ the Surety.
pp. 145 - 151

The theme of the epistle to the Hebrews is the superiority of the sacrifice and the priesthood of Christ over all other sacrifices, offerings and priests of the law. While there are a series of differences, each one being enough in itself to set the Levitical offerings aside, the one that is stressed more than any other in Hebrews is connected with life. This may be seen in Heb. vii. Contrasting the priesthood of Christ with that of Aaron, the epistle says of Christ:--

> "Who is made, not after the law of a carnal commandment, but after the power of an ENDLESS LIFE . . . . . by so much was Jesus made a Surety of a better covenant. And they truly were many priests, because they were not suffered to continue by reason of DEATH, but this Man, because He continueth ever, hath an unchangeable priesthood" (Heb. vii. 16-24).

The sacrifices of the law are set aside: "It is not possible that the blood of bulls and goats should take away sins" (Heb. x. 1-4). Immediately, the epistle goes on to speak of Christ, saying: "Lo, I come (in the volume of the book it is written of Me), to do Thy will, O God." "But this Man, after He had offered one sacrifice for sins for ever, sat down at the right hand of God" (Heb. x. 5-12). In both references to priest and sacrifice "this Man" excels by reason of resurrection life.

A sinner who pays the penalty of his own sins has no claim upon life. He is finished. The sacrifices offered under the old covenant were substitutes for the sinner, but their efficacy was in the fact that they pointed on to a better sacrifice. The penalty was inflicted, death endured, the blood shed, but where was the possibility of life? Were any of the bulls and goats ever raised from the dead? There is something deeper and fuller even than substitution, and that is identification, and it is in this blessed relationship that Christ is seen as the Surety, Whose sacrifice for sin is the only one that could put away sin, and Whose resurrection from the dead alone gives to those identified with Him the hope of glory.

In Hebrews Christ is seen as the Surety of the better covenant. Although the word "surety" is not used in Ephesians and Colossians, we hope to show that every passage that speaks of dying "with Christ" or being raised "with Christ" passes beyond the thought of sacrifice and substitution to that fullest and closest of all relationships expressed by the titles of the Kinsman-Redeemer and Surety.

The meaning of the word.

The word translated "surety" in the O.T. is the Hebrew word arab, which in the form arabon is brought over into the N.T. Greek, occurring in Eph. i. 14 as "earnest". This word corresponds with "pledge" in Gen. xxxviii. 17, 18: "Wilt thou give me a pledge till thou send it?" The root idea appears to be that of mixing or mingling:--

"A mixed multitude" (Margin a great mixture) (Exod. xii. 38).
"The holy seed have mingled themselves" (Ezra ix. 2).
"A stranger doth not intermeddle with his joy" (Prov. xiv. 10).
"In the warp, or woof" (Lev. xiii. 48).

Arising out of this idea of mixing and interweaving comes that of the surety, who is so intimately associated with the obligations laid upon the one for whom he acts that he can be treated in his stead. So we get:--

"Thy servant became surety for the lad" (Gen. xliv. 32).
"He that is surety for a stranger shall smart for it" (Prov. xi. 15).
"We have mortgaged our lands" (Neh. v. 3).
"Give pledges to my lord the king" (II Kings xviii. 23).

In Ezek. xxvii. 9, 27 we find the word translated "occupy" in the sense of exchange or bartering. In a way we understand the expression, "Occupy, till I come", and still speak of man's trade as his "occupation".

Such is the underlying meaning of the word "surety"—one who identifies himself with another in order to bring about deliverance from obligations. This is clearly seen in Prov. xxii. 26, 27: "Be not thou one of those that strike hands, or of them that are sureties for debts. If thou hast nothing to pay, why should he take away thy bed from under thee?" It is evident from this passage that the surety was held liable for the debts of the one whose cause he had espoused, even to the loss of his bed—and this meant practically his all, as may be seen by consulting Exod. xxii. 26, 27: "If thou at all take thy neighbour's raiment to pledge, thou shalt deliver it unto him by that the sun goeth down: for that is his covering only, it is his raiment for his skin: wherein shall he sleep?"

The type.

While some features of suretyship enter into practically every typical sacrifice of the law, and while it is set forth by the laying of the offerer's hand upon the head of the offering, the fullest type of the surety is found before the law was given in the story of Judah and Benjamin (Gen. xlii.-xliv.). It is necessary that these three chapters in Genesis be read so that the scriptural setting of this type may be seen, and we trust that every reader, who has any appreciation of the Berean spirit, will not read a word further until these chapters have been read as before the Lord. We will now point out the steps in the narrative that illuminate the type.

The Cause.—This is found in the famine that was in all lands, against which Joseph had been divinely guided to provide (Gen. xli. 54).

> "Now when Jacob saw there was corn in Egypt, Jacob said unto his sons, Why do you look one upon another? And he said behold, I have heard there is corn in Egypt: get you down thither, and buy for us from thence: that we may live, and not die" (Gen. xlii. 1, 2).

Joseph's ten brethren, therefore, proceed to Egypt, leaving Benjamin behind, for Jacob feared lest his youngest son might be lost to him, even as was Joseph. Upon arrival in Egypt, Joseph's brethren bow before him, and although Joseph recognizes them, they know him not. In order to bring them to repentance for their sin, and to make them to confess concerning Benjamin and his father, Joseph accuses them of being spies, to which they reply: "We are all one man's sons . . . . . thy servants are twelve brethren, the sons of one man in the land of Canaan; and, behold, the youngest is this day with his father, and one is not" (Gen. xlii. 11-13). Joseph then says to them: "Ye are spies . . . . . by the life of Pharaoh ye shall not go forth hence, except your youngest brother come hither" (Gen. xlii. 14, 15).

The brethren were then put into ward for three days, during which time the sin against Joseph their brother came to the surface: "We are verily guilty concerning our brother" (Gen. xlii. 21). The result was that Simeon was taken and put into prison as a hostage, the remaining brethren being sent back home with corn. To their surprise, each man found his money, with which he had paid for the corn, in the sack's mouth, and realized that this portended further trouble for them: "And when both they and their father saw the bundles of money, they were afraid; and Jacob their father said unto them, Me have ye bereaved of my children. Joseph is not and Simeon is not, and ye will take Benjamin away: all these things are against me" (Gen. xlii. 35, 36).

The Remedy.—There are three remedies suggested in this narrative:--

(1). THE HOSTAGE OF SIMEON: "And took them Simeon, and bound him."
(2). THE SACRIFICE OF REUBEN: "Slay my two sons, if I bring him not to thee."
(3). THE SURETYSHIP OF JUDAH: "Send the lad with me, I will be surety for him; of my hand shalt thou require him, if I bring him not unto thee, and set him before thee, then let me bear the blame for ever."

In these three suggestions we may see three ways in which sin can be dealt with.

(1). Simeon's way.—This is futile, for it can neither make reparation nor restoration.

(2). Reuben's way.—This goes further, and sees the need of the sacrifice, but two dead grandsons would be no compensation for Benjamin.

To Reuben's offer might be answered:--

"None of us can by any means redeem his brother" (Psa. xlix.7).
"The law having a shadow of good things to come, and not the very image of the things, can never with those sacrifices which they offered year by year continually make the comers thereunto perfect . . . . . For it is not possible that the blood of bulls and goats should take away sins" (Heb. x. 1-4).

Reuben was giving of his best. So the sacrifices and offerings of the law were the people's best, but they had no power to deliver from sin. Simeon the hostage was no remedy. Reuben's sacrifice was no remedy. What made the difference in Judah's case? Simeon was a hostage, Reuben's sons were substitutes, but Judah was himself a surety, and it is in the combination of the two features, "himself" and "surety", that Judah's remedy transcends that of the "hostage" and the "substitute".

(3). Judah's way.—Judah steps forward when all else has failed and says: "I (emphatic pronoun), I will be surety for him; of my hand shalt thou require him. If I bring him not unto thee, and set him before thee, then let me bear the blame for ever" (Gen. xliii. 9). So, in Heb. x., setting aside all sacrifices and offerings that could not take away sin, the Lord Jesus, the true Judah, steps forward and says: "Lo, I come (in the volume of the book it is written of Me), to do Thy will, O God . . . . . by the which will we are sanctified through the offering of the body of Jesus Christ once for all" (Heb. x. 7-10). Here is not the thought of a hostage, nor merely of substitution, but of suretyship involving identification: "Forasmuch then as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, He also Himself likewise took part of the same; that through death He might destroy him that had the power of death, that is, the devil, and deliver them who through fear of death were all their lifetime subject to bondage" (Heb. ii. 14, 15).

When Jacob's sons journey again to Egypt, taking Benjamin with them, Joseph arranged that Benjamin should be suspected and detained. This led Judah to step forward and make that moving speech which, when Joseph heard, "he wept aloud" (Gen. xlv. 2).

Judah rehearsed the history of their movements, told of Jacob's reluctance to part with Benjamin, and how Jacob would certainly die if Benjamin did not return with his brethren. Judah is the true intercessor, and his pleading reaches its climax in the words: "For how shall I go up to my father, and the lad be not with me?" (Gen. xliv. 34). Judah's word "blame" in the phrase, "Then shall I bear the blame to my father for ever" (verse 32), is the word "sin" in Reuben's statement in Gen. xlii. 22, "Do not sin against the child".

It is surely something to ponder that this word chata ("sin" and "blame") occurs in this narrative in but these two references. There was the sin of Israel's sons, and Judah in his suretyship seems to suggest that he would bear that sin for ever if he failed. While this is but faintly foreshadowed in the type, it is wonderfully true in the reality: "Who His own self bare our sins in His own body on the tree" (I Pet. ii. 24).

Judah, like Aaron, breaks down, as types always must, for Judah had sinned equally with his brethren, but of the true Surety it is written: "He hath made Him to be sin for us, Who knew no sin, that we might be made the righteousness of God in Him" (II Cor. v. 21). Christ is more than Hostage, more than Substitute, He is Surety. As such He has so identified Himself with us, and with our need, that when He died, we died (Rom. vi. 8); when He was crucified, we were crucified (Gal. ii. 20); when He was buried, we were buried (Col. ii. 12); when He was raised from the dead, we were raised (Col. iii. 1); when He was seated in the heavenlies, we were seated in the heavenlies with Him (Eph. ii. 6). This is suretyship. Its essential element is more than substitution; it is interweaving, mingling, identification. As we read Col. iii. 1 and Eph. ii. 6, can we not hear out Surety saying,

> "How shall I ascend to My Father, and the child Benjamin (the son of my right hand) be not with me?"

"With me"—there lies the secret of suretyship, and the reason why it transcends all the offerings of bulls and goats.

What was the first message sent by the risen Christ to His disciples? The message that echoed the words of Judah the surety:--

> "Go to My brethren, and say unto them, I ASCEND unto My Father, and your Father" (John xx. 17).
> "How shall I ASCEND to my father, and the lad be not with me?" (Gen. xliv. 34).

Further, let us not miss the emphasis upon "Himself". Reuben offered his two sons. Judah offered himself. Paul, in Gal. ii. 20 just quoted, glories in the fact that "the Son of God loved me and gave Himself for me". The innocent lamb or the splendid bull died as sacrifices, but it could never be said of such, "It loved me and gave itself for me"? That is where sacrifice and offering fail, and that is why the Surety said, "Lo, I come".

It is "His own blood", not the blood of others (Acts xx. 28; Heb. ix. 12). It is "His own body" (Heb. x. 10; I Pet. ii. 24). It is "His own self" (I Pet. ii. 24). Christ gave "Himself" for our sins (Gal. i. 4). "He loved me and gave Himself for me" (Gal. ii. 20). "He gave Himself for the church" (Eph. v. 25). "He gave Himself a ransom for all"

(I Tim. ii. 6). He offered up Himself (Heb. vii. 27; ix. 14). We therefore glory in the fact that while Christ exhausted all the meaning of the sacrifices and offerings in His own once-offered sacrifice, He did something infinitely more—He became not only Substitute and Sacrifice, but Surety, and this identification with Himself is our great pledge of life: "Because I live, ye shall live also."

Reuben's sons, though slain as promised, would not have brought Benjamin back, or satisfied the father's heart for the loss of his son. Judah's suretyship did not offer to forfeit something if Benjamin were lost. Judah identified Benjamin with himself. If Benjamin stayed, he stayed, and if Judah returned, Benjamin would return with him. The offering of Christ transcends all sacrifices ever offered in many ways, but in this one in particular—He was raised again from the dead. That feature belongs to His position as Surety: "He was raised again because of our justifying" (Rom. iv. 25). As the risen One, He became "the firstfruits of them that slept". The thought of the Surety is also seen in I Thess. iv. 14: "If we believe that Jesus died and rose again, even so them also which sleep in Jesus will God bring with Him."

As our Surety He lives now at the right hand of God. As our Surety He is yet to be manifested as "our life" and we are to be manifested "with Him" in glory. As our Surety He will present us holy and without blemish.

May this blessed fullness of Christ satisfy each heart, as it satisfies the Father.

The Epistle to the Romans.

#17. Righteousness---provided and manifested (iii. 24, 25).

pp. 22 - 26

When speaking of the "freeness" of the grace of justification as presented in the gospel, we used such expressions as "gratuitous", and "without a cause". Having realized the blessed fact that no "cause" for this act of God exists in ourselves, we are able to contemplate that this "causeless" grace not only finds its first great efficient cause in the heart of God Himself, but also finds its meritorious cause, if we may be allowed the expression, in the sacrificial death of Christ.

The sacrificial death of Christ is twofold. It is a redemption, and it is a propitiation, or atonement. While both are accomplished by the one offering of Calvary, they are very different in their meaning, purpose, and results.

Apolutrosis is, both etymologically and doctrinally, deliverance of a captive by payment of a price or ransom. In the N.T. this word is used exclusively by Paul and Luke. The passages using it are as follows, and their inter-relation will provide a profitable study, which, however, we here only touch upon before passing on.

Apolutrosis in the Epistles.

A | Rom. iii. 5. Remissions of sins that are past.
Rom. viii. 23. Resurrection.
B | I Cor. i. 30. Wisdom . . . redemption.
C | Eph. i. 7. Forgiveness. Present.
Eph. i. 14. Inheritance. Future.
Eph. iv. 30. Conduct. Present influenced by future.
B | Col. i. 14. Wisdom (i.9; ii. 3, 8, 23) . . . redemption.
A | Heb. ix. 15. Redemption of transgressions under first covenant.
Heb. xi. 35. Resurrection.

The standpoints of Romans and Hebrews are clearly indicated. Writing to Hebrews, the apostle speaks of transgressions against the first covenant, whereas when writing to the Romans he speaks of the remission of sins of the past. Rom. viii. 23, read in conjunction with Heb. xi. 35 places the future deliverance, issuing in resurrection and sonship, over against the temporal deliverance from present suffering, showing that the "better resurrection" is comparable with the "redemption of the body". Both I Corinthians and Colossians find in the wisdom of the world something that is antagonistic to the cross of Christ, and when read together these passages illuminate one another. In a future series we hope to show that the central feature of Colossians is the cross of Christ in its relation to the five great antagonizing "isms" specified in Col. ii. The three passages in Ephesians speak for themselves.

This redemption that is in Christ Jesus sets forth one aspect of His sacrificial work; the other, its complement, is expressed in the word propitiation (hilasterion).

The mercy-seat.

There are two commonly-received interpretations of this word: 1. the mercy-seat (Heb. ix. 5; Exod. xxv. 18, 19; Lev. xvi. 2, &c.) and 2. propitiation (Rom. iii. 25). It is evident from the double usage of the word in Romans and Hebrews that we have type (mercy-seat) and anti-type (propitiation) clearly set forth.

A word or two with regard to the way the word hilasterion is used in the LXX may be helpful. In some cases hilasterion stands alone; in others it is followed by epithema or "covering", e.g., Exod. xxv. 17: "And thou shalt make a propitiatory, a lid of pure gold." This is an example of hilasterion being followed by epithema. In Lev. xvi. 2: "Before the propitiatory, which is upon the ark of the testimony", hilasterion is not followed by epithema, but by an explanatory clause, "which is upon the ark". In the few places where the word "propitiatory" stands alone, the context speaks of the ark, the cherubim or something to do with the tabernacle, temple, or their furniture. Moses, Ezekiel and Amos are the only users of this word in the Greek O.T. It does not mean a propitiatory victim, or offering so much as the golden mercy-seat upon which the atoning blood was sprinkled.

The Hebrew equivalent of hilasterion in the twenty-one occurrences of the word in the law of Moses is always kapporeth, the mercy-seat. There are only two occurrences of the word in the N.T., viz., Rom. iii. 25, and Heb. ix. 5, and as Heb. ix. 5 most certainly adheres to the O.T. usage of the word, the meaning of Rom. iii. 25 must be regarded as the same. We have gone to this length because a great number of expositors have said that while it is true that the Septuagint usage leads us to the one translation—"mercy-seat", we need not therefore assume that Paul was bound to follow that usage. This, however, is neither good argument nor sound exegesis.

Righteousness---provided and manifested.

As we have seen by structure given in Volume XVIII, page 85, righteousness is to the fore, and it is viewed from two angles.

1. The provision of a righteousness of God by faith of Jesus Christ, which is "through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus."
2. The declaration of God's own righteousness, while He thus graciously deals with past and present sins, which is set forth by the "propitiatory".

The two aspects come together in the words, "That He might be just and the Justifier".

Man has "come short"; there is none righteous among men, whether Jew or Gentile, but the mercy-seat covered the unbroken tables of stone, the unaltered covenant and testimony, so that where the atoning blood was sprinkled God was free to become "the justifier of the ungodly" while Himself remaining "just" in all His ways.

This propitiatory has been "set forth" by God. This expression has been taken to mean "publicly exhibited to the world", and this imported meaning has then been turned against the LXX rendering, "mercy-seat", by raising the question: Was the mercy-seat exhibited to the view of those for whom atonement was made? This would be a legitimate argument IF protithemi meant "exhibit in public". It occurs but three times in the N.T., namely, in the passage in question (Rom. iii. 25) and in the two following passages:--

> "I purpose to come unto you" (Rom. i. 13).
> "His good pleasure, which He hath purposed in Himself" (Eph. i. 9).

These give the scriptural meaning of the word. God "purposed" or set before Himself in His great plan of the ages, the propitiation. He set it forth in the typical mercy-seat, and it was before Him when He passed over the sins of men before Christ actually came to the earth. Its presence in His purpose justified all His ways with sinful men. The Revisers are nearer the truth when they suggest in the margin of Rom. iii. 25, "foreordained", than are those who would make the word mean "publicly exhibited".

"Through faith in His blood." As the words stand in the English it is natural to read them together as though the clause "in His blood" was dependant upon "through faith". Dr. Liddon suggests, with every show of truth, that both expressions are to be regarded as adverbial clauses added to hilasterion, "the propitiatory". "Through faith" is the means of subjective appropriation of the atonement; "in His blood" is the objective medium of its exhibition. Thus:--

The Propitiation	\	Received through faith—Subjective.

This seems to be nearer the truth than that suggested by the expression "through faith in His blood".

The initial cause of this wondrous gift of righteousness is found in the unmerited grace of God, and is expressed in the dorean, the free gift (24). The mediating or meritorious cause is found in the apolutrosis, the redemption that is in Christ Jesus (24). The receptive cause is seen to be "through faith" in Christ as the propitiatory (25). The righteous cause, that makes the propitiation what it is, is found "in His blood" (25), for without the shed blood there could be neither justification nor remission. These all converge in the one ultimate cause, viz., the declaration of the righteousness of God Himself. It is worth while restating this so that it may be realized.

1. The free gift	\		/	The declaration
2. The redemption	\	unto (eis)	/	of
3. The faith	/		\	God's own
4. The blood	/		\	righteousness.

The essential point is "that He might be just", for if that could ever be questioned, of what use would "the righteousness of God by faith" be to us?

While there are several outstanding examples of severe judgment upon sinful men in the O.T., such as the flood, and the destruction of Sodom, the general character of Gentile times is indicated in Acts xvii. 30:--

> "At the times of this ignorance God winked at; but now commandeth all men everywhere to repent."

"The forbearance of God" in passing over sins of the past must ever be interpreted in the light of His purpose concerning the atoning sacrifice of Christ. That justifies all His dealings with sinful men. Apart from that foreseen offering it appears doubtful whether a holy God would have been justified in continuing to provide for the life and sustenance of guilty men. Nations who never heard of Christ received the bounteous gifts of providence only because He was the coming One. Nothing but the fact of Christ's death saves the ungodly from immediate judgment. Quite apart from faith or knowledge, all creation owes all that it enjoys to the sacrifice of Christ.

A slight variation in the wording of the expression "to declare" in verses 25 and 26 calls for a moment's attention.

> Verse 25 has eis endeixin, unto an exhibiting.
> Verse 26 has pros endeixin, towards an exhibiting.

The difference in the two expressions is that eis looks to the ultimate goal, while pros is more immediately concerned with the manifestation of God's righteousness "at this time". Seeing that it was the intention of God that in the provision of gospel righteousness His own personal righteousness should not only be understood but publicly exhibited, let us who speak in His name ever maintain this truth.

God could, so to speak, have saved men without the agony and death of Christ, but His righteousness would have been impaired, which is impossible. Love provided the ransom, but righteousness saw to it that the ransom was paid—not only that a righteousness might be provided for the guilty sinner, but > "That He might be JUST and the JUSTIFIER of him that is of the faith of Jesus" (Rom. iii.26).

#18. "That no flesh should boast in His presence." (iii. 27, 28).
pp. 57 - 60

We now come to the conclusion of this important section (Rom. iii. 21-28).

> "Where then is boasting? It is shut out. Through what law? of works? Nay, but by the law of faith. For we reckon that a man is justified by faith apart from works of law" (Rom. iii. 27, 28).

The question of the apostle, "Where then is boasting?" reveals the innate tendency of the human heart. Salvation has been so planned that no man, however ingenious, will be able to find a foothold for boasting except in the Lord. "Christ crucified", the foolishness of God, the offence of the cross, the centre of the very gospel, all was so arranged by God that "no flesh should boast in His presence" (I Cor. i. 29). Christ is set forth as the one sufficient and only Saviour, Redeemer and Sanctifier. "But of Him are ye in Christ Jesus, Who of God is made unto us wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption" (I Cor. i. 30). Not only that no flesh should boast, but that "he that boasteth, let him boast in the Lord" (I Cor. i. 31). Man can be nothing more than the unworthy recipient of God's unspeakable Gift.

In I Corinthians boasting in human wisdom is the great evil that is cut down:-- > "And again, the Lord knoweth the thoughts of the wise, that they are vain. Therefore let no man boast in men" (I Cor. iii. 18-23).

> "For who maketh thee to differ? and what hast thou that thou didst not receive? Now if thou didst receive it, why dost thou boast, as if thou hadst not received it?" (I Cor. iv. 7).

If trust in the wisdom of the flesh was the snare at Corinth, trust in external works of the flesh was the snare at Galatia.

> "They desire to have you circumcised, that they may boast in your flesh. But let it not be that I should boast, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom the world is crucified unto me, and I unto the world" (Gal. vi. 13, 14).

Eph. ii. declares that salvation is by grace to prevent man from boasting:--

> "For by grace are ye saved through faith; and that not of yourselves: it is the gift of God: not of works, lest any man should boast" (Eph. ii. 8, 9).

"It is the gift of God".—Rom. iii. declares that justification is gratuitous, it is a gift—therefore boasting is excluded. I Cor. iv. 7 states that all things we possess are gifts, therefore boasting is absurd. Ephesians reveals that the whole scheme of salvation is a gift, purposely arranged that no man should boast. The only boasting that is allowable is "in Christ Jesus" (Phil. iii. 3). The man who said this declared that if any man had ground of confidence in the flesh, he had more, but he proceeds to demolish all hope that the works of the flesh or law could provide anything of which man could boast before God. Paul would rather leave his all upon a refuse heap that he may be found in Christ, not having that righteousness which is of the law, but that which is through the faith of Christ.

If anyone could ever be justified by works, that one would have a ground of boasting (Rom. iv. 2), but no one ever has or ever will. In Rom. iii. 27, 28 Paul has in mind the twofold boast of the Jew.

> "A Jew . . . . . and makest thy boast in God" (Rom. ii. 17).
> "Thou makest thy boast in law" (Rom. ii. 23).

"In God" and "in law" Rom. iii. 27-30 proceeds to shatter both these grounds of boasting. The law is dealt with in verse 27 ("By what law?") and the boast in God in verse 29 ("Is He the God of the Jews only?").

The section under our immediate notice is the one dealing with this boast in the law, which it was the apostle's aim ruthlessly to shatter. The Jew "rested in the law", he was "instructed out of the law", he had "a form of knowledge and of the truth of the law", he made "a boast of the law" (Rom. ii. 17, 18, 20 and 23), but what he could not do was to "keep the law". "Moses describeth the righteousness which is of the law, That the man which doeth those things shall live by them" (Rom. x. 5). All his pride of race, of circumcision, of law, was vain and empty before the one great fact that "what things soever the law saith, it saith to them who are under the law: that every mouth may be stopped, and all the world may become guilty before God" (Rom. iii. 19).

"By what law?" asks the apostle. "Of works?", and his answer is: "Nay, but by the law of faith". "The law of faith" may seem at first strange, owing to the close attention that has been given to the law of Moses, or of conscience. Faith, however, though it be totally distinct from the law of Moses, of conscience, or of works, is not lawless. Nothing that comes from God can be apart from law. Sun, moon, and stars are under law. All the activities of life are governed by law. Consequently we must be prepared to find over against the "law of works" the "law of faith", over against the "law of sin and death" the "law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus" (Rom. viii. 2). The setting aside of the law as a means of attaining righteousness cast no slur upon the law itself—that still remained holy, and the commandment holy, and just, and good (Rom. vii. 12).

The weakness of the law was in the flesh (Rom. viii. 3). It was not intended to be a means either of "life" or "righteousness" (Gal. ii. 21; iii. 21), but a pedagogue until the advent of Christ. The dispensation of law was a ministry of condemnation and death (II Cor. iii.), and the spectacle of a man boasting in that which condemned him, which revealed his exceeding sinfulness, which demanded of him an obedience which he could never render, is pitiable in the extreme.

The suggestion made by some that the gospel was a kind of mitigated law, providing an easier code, bringing the possibility of salvation nearer to human attainment, is grossly untrue. Instead of saying: "perfect obedience" to the law is not necessary, we must say:

"no degree of obedience to law is necessary"; all such grounds of acceptance are excluded. Law is as exclusive of faith as a means of righteousness as works are of grace; they cannot exist together. The obedience of faith, the good works that come as a result of salvation, are of course quite another thing. The very passages that most resolutely rule out "works' as a means of salvation, urge them as en evidence and a fruit (Eph. ii. 8-10; Titus iii. 5-8).

The word "conclude" in Rom. iii. 28 is a rendering of logizomai, which comes in Rom. iv. 3, 4, 5 and 6, variously translated "reckon", "count", and "impute". It is a logical reckoning. It is patent to all who have eyes to see, that if "a man is justified by faith apart from deeds of law", then he has no ground of boasting in himself. All he can do is to "boast in the Lord". With the words "a righteousness of God apart from law" (verse 21) the section opened, and with the words "justified by faith apart from law" (verse 28) it closes. Its insistence is upon faith as opposed to law, upon grace as opposed to works, upon gift as opposed to wages. May we who by nature had sinned and come short of the glory of God (Rom. iii. 23) know what it is to be able to "boast in hope of the glory of God" (Rom. v. 2).

> "Thus saith the Lord, Let not the wise man glory in his wisdom, neither let the mighty man glory in his might; let not the rich man glory in his riches, but let him that glorieth glory in this, that he understandeth and knoweth Me" (Jer. ix. 23, 24).

#19. An explanation of the expression "imputed for" (iii. 30 - iv. 25).

As such epistles as that to the Romans or to the Galatians are read, it is impressed upon the reader how strong is the desire of the flesh to find some ground of boasting, some little thing to do or to endure to make salvation secure and justification complete. The apostle has already stripped human nature of its last rags of self-made righteousness, "all the world" of "Jew and Gentile" have had their mouths stopped, and all are brought in guilty before God. Redemption by the blood of Christ, and free unmerited grace, has been revealed as the only ground of acceptance with God. Boasting, law, and works have all been excluded, and the conclusion of the matter expressed in the words of Rom. iii. 28: "Therefore we conclude that a man is justified by faith without the deeds of the law."

This leads the apostle to the question: "Is He the God of the Jews only? Is He not also of the Gentiles?" This can be answered in but one way: "Yes, of the Gentiles also; seeing it is one God, which shall justify the circumcision by (ek) faith, and the uncircumcision through (dia) faith" (Rom. iii. 29, 30). Exactly what distinction the apostle intended by ek and dia may be difficult to decide. Not a few commentators bluntly say that there is no difference, but this hardly accords with the scrupulous choice of language that we have found marks the Scripture of truth. Calvin suggests a shade of irony: "This is the grand difference: the Jew is saved ex fide, the Gentile per fidem!" Possibly the intention of the apostle was to direct the Jew away from his works, and his rites, to the one great source of his justification, ek pisteos, out of faith, while the Gentile, who had no background of law and tradition, was directed rather to the faith as the instrument of his justification, dia tes pisteos, "through the faith", the article being added to give the sense, "through the self-same faith" as that of the Jew.

The law was by no means "made void" through faith. It was rather established, for, whether we look upon "the law" as the whole teaching of the O.T. or of the Mosaic covenant, or limit it to the one rite of circumcision, it is evident that the types, shadows, and living examples set forth in the law, pointed forward to the work of the Lord Jesus as the one and only way of escape and acceptance. Prejudice, however, dies hard, and so the apostle leaves the general references to Jew and Gentile and Jewish failure (i. 18 - iii. 19), and to the typical teaching of the law (iii. 21-26), and takes up the case of Abraham.

Bishop Lightfoot shows that Gen. xv. 6 was a standing feature of contention in the Jewish schools. Philo mentions it at least ten times, and in I Macc. ii. 52 we read: "Was not Abraham found faithful in temptations, and it was imputed unto him for righteousness?" Here we see that Gen. xv. 6 and Gen. xxii. 9, 10 are not kept distinct as they are by Paul in Rom. iv. and by James in Jas. ii. The object, too, of Mattathias in Macc. ii. 64 is the upholding of the law: "Wherefore, ye my sons, be valiant, and shew yourselves men in behalf of the law, for by it ye shall obtain glory."

Paul, as a Pharisee and student of Gamaliel, and one who had been "an exceeding zealot for the traditions of his fathers", knew exactly the difficulties that were in the mind of his kinsmen, and knew that to deal effectively with the case of Abraham was to deal with the very centre of the argument. To enlighten the minds of his bigoted countrymen on the true meaning of circumcision would be to rob them of their last ground of boasting. The whole of chapter iv. is taken up with the lesson drawn from Abraham's faith, but before we give either the structure of the chapter, or deal with the subject-matter, we believe a word or two upon the words "imputed" and "imputed for" will be of service in helping us to appreciate the true relation of faith and righteousness, which, of course, is the main theme of the chapter.

"Imputed" and "Imputed for".

One word, occurring eleven times in this chapter, is so important that it will warrant a separate investigation before proceeding further. Logizomai is translated in Rom. iv. as follows:--

"It was counted unto him for righteousness" (3).
"Reward is not reckoned of grace, but of debt" (4).
"His faith is counted for righteousness" (5).
"To whom God imputeth righteousness without works" (6).
"To whom the Lord will not impute sin" (8).
"Faith was reckoned to Abraham for righteousness" (9).
"How was it reckoned?" (10).

"That righteousness might be imputed unto them" (11).
"It was imputed unto him for righteousness" (22).
"It was imputed to him" (23).
"To whom it shall be imputed, if we believe" (24).

"Counted", "reckoned" and "imputed" are all translations of the one word logizomai, and between them give a fair and full rendering of its meaning. This is not all, however, for these references divide themselves into two sets, viz., those which speak of imputing something, and those which speak of imputing for, imputing one thing for another. The two expressions are logizomai and logizomai . . . eis. We must loot at this list again, therefore, to learn the difference intended.

Imputation in its prime meaning is found in Rom. iv. 6, 8, 10, 11, 23 and 24. In these passages one thing is not imputed for another: wages, righteousness and sin are actualities.

Imputed for is found in iv. 3, 5 & 22, and in these passages "faith" is imputed for righteousness. Rom. ii. 26 supplies us with a use of the expression that must be included: "Therefore if the uncircumcision keep the righteousness of the law, shall not his uncircumcision be counted for circumcision." While we must give full value to faith, we must not go to the extreme of making it, in effect, another work—if we do, we make void the gospel. We are justified gratuitously, "not of works". Faith is not a work. True, it leads to works, but that is another matter.

Before we give a modern illustration of the meaning of "reckon for', it will help us to review the usage of the Hebrew equivalents for both expressions:-- Logizomai is the Greek equivalent of the Hebrew chasab.

Logizomai eis is the equivalent of Chasab V.

Now chasab means to reckon or to impute to one an actual possession. This can be tested in such passages as II Sam. xix. 19, 20: "Let not my Lord impute iniquity unto me, neither do thou remember that which thy servant did perversely . . . . . I have sinned." Further references are Psa. xxxii. 2, Lev. vii. 18, and Lev. xvii. 4. Logizomai is used in this same way in the N.T.:--

"Let it not be imputed to them" (II Tim. iv. 16).
"Not imputing their trespasses unto them" (II Cor. v. 19).

When the Hebrew uses the equivalent for logizomai eis ("to reckon for"), the thing reckoned is put in the accusative case, and the thing for which it is reckoned is put in the dative with the l' before it: "Thou dost count me for an enemy" (Job xiii. 24). Sometimes the thing for which the subject is counted is preceded by the particle ki ("as"): "He counts me as His enemy" (Job xix. 11). The apostle, therefore, in Rom. iv., is using an expression in common use, and the identical phrase is found in Gen. xx. 6: "And He (God) counted it to him as righteousness."

Many of our readers will remember the days when the standard coin of the realm was the golden sovereign. It would not have been a serious matter if one had accidentally dropped a sovereign into the fire, for the resulting piece of gold would still have been worth 20s.. We should not have used logizomai eis when speaking of this coin. We should not have said: "This golden sovereign is reckoned for 20s. worth", for it actually was worth 20s., whatever happened to it. It is quite different with the present paper money. To-day we have a L1 note. Its purchasing value is exactly the same as would be that of a golden sovereign. If two people went into a shop and each purchased L1 worth of goods, both parcels would be of precisely the same value, whether paid for with a paper note or a golden sovereign. It would be very unwise, however, to conclude that the L1 note was actually of the same value as the gold. Some have found this to be true to their cost. We have heard of one poor woman who accidentally screwed up a L1 note with waster paper and threw it into the fire: sadly enough its intrinsic worth was soon discovered to be only that of waste paper. It produced no more heat, it left no more valuable ash; it was only "reckoned for" one pound. We must not, on the other hand, think that the value of the L1 note is fictional. Behind that valueless piece of paper lie all the resources and power of the British Empire. So with faith. Faith itself is not righteousness, but faith is reckoned for righteousness. The real righteousness is found in the Lord. The true merit is found in the "faith of Christ", and because of His faith, my faith may be reckoned for righteousness. Did His faith and righteousness not exist, my faith would have no value, just as the paper money has no value when a country or government collapses.

We remember in August, 1914, meeting a man on the continent, who, though possessed of L5 notes, was nevertheless penniless, simply because the outbreak of war had rendered all paper money valueless for the time being. Had the same man possessed golden sovereigns, he would have found no difficulty in getting them accepted. We would not, however, by this somewhat clumsy illustration give a wrong impression. There is no room for the slightest doubt as to the reality of that righteousness that gives to faith its value.

The word "for" in "counted for" is, strictly speaking, "unto". Just as in i. 16 the power of God is said to be "unto salvation", and in x. 10, man, with the heart "believeth unto righteousness", so this "righteousness of God" is "by faith of Jesus Christ unto all . . . . . that believe". It is no fiction; it is a very blessed fact. Righteousness is actually imputed, but faith is imputed for or unto righteousness.

We have departed a little from our usual method, and spent a longer time upon this illustration than space will generally permit, but we felt that the distinction was important enough to warrant it. Faith is precious, it is blessed, it is the one thing necessary to please God. At the same time let us not magnify it into a procuring cause, or a meritorious work. There, in the great Bank of Heaven, is the genuine gold of perfect righteousness, wrought by another on our behalf, that alone makes our faith of any value.

With this introduction we may approach the teaching of Rom. iv.

#20. The significance of Gen. xv. 6. (iii. 30 - iv. 25).

pp. 122 – 127

Having considered the general bearing of the argument of this section, we must now give the teaching closer study. To prevent us, in the wealth of detail employed, from missing the essential arguments, we may discover from the structure of the passage a threefold theme:--

1. The relation of circumcision to the matter in hand.
2. The "making void" and of "none effect" of promises and faith if the law and works are introduced.
3. The great example of Abraham who believed God, and to whom it was reckoned for righteousness.

The structure is as follows, omitting any elaboration of the two large members C | iv. 1-8., and C | iv. 17-25.:--

Rom. iii. 30 - iv. 25.

A | iii. 30. | a | Circumcision.—By faith.
b | Uncircumcision.—Through faith.
B | iii. 31. | c | Make void.
d | Establish.
C | iv. 1-8. Abraham believed.—Imputed righteousness.
A | iv. 9-13. | b | Uncircumcision.—That believe.
a | Circumcision.—Steps of that faith.
B | iv. 14-16. | c | Make void.—None effect.
d | Sure.
C | iv. 17-25. Abraham believed.—Imputed for righteousness.

Chapter iii. opened with the question suggested by the argument of Rom. ii.: "What advantage then hath the Jew? and what profit is there of circumcision?" Chapter iv. re-opens the question, this time focusing attention upon Abraham.

The Greek texts of iv. 1 vary somewhat, but if we leave the verse as it stands, we must recognize that the order of the Greek words eurekenai kata sarka, requires the rendering "gained in the way of the flesh"; they cannot be joined to the word "father". It is not "Abraham our father, according to the flesh", that is in view, but the question as to what "Abraham our father gained by way of the flesh". While it would scarcely be true to say that "according to the flesh" means nothing more than circumcision, it is evident that this important rite, that meant so much to the Jew, is uppermost in the mind, and that if that can be assailed, the innermost fortress of Jewish prejudice has collapsed.

Conybeare and Howson go so far as to translate the passage: "What then can we say that our father Abraham gained by the fleshly ordinance?" The apostle's argument is as follows:--

> "If Abraham were justified by works, boasting is not excluded in his case. But he has no such ground of boasting before God, for the Scripture tells us that Abraham believed God, and this faith of his was counted for righteousness."
> "Now if a man earn his pay by his work, it is not reckoned to him as a favour, but it is paid him as a debt; but if he earns nothing by his work, but puts faith in Him Who justifies the ungodly, then his faith is reckoned to him for righteousness."
>
> "Even as David also describeth the blessedness of the man, unto whom God imputeth righteousness without works, saying, Blessed are they whose iniquities are forgiven, and whose sins are covered. Blessed is the man to whom the Lord will not impute sin."

The significance of Gen. xv. 6.

We must now give attention to the actual passage that forms the basis of the apostle's argument, viz., Gen. xv. 6. At the very outset we are confronted with a problem. Abraham believed God before the act recorded in Gen. xv. Heb. xi. 8 is quite clear as to that, saying: "By faith Abraham, when he was called to go out unto a place which he should after receive for an inheritance, obeyed; and he went out, not knowing whither he went." Further, Paul brings Gen. xv. and xii. together in Gal. iii. 6 and 8 without any apparent feeling of difficulty in the matter: "And the Scripture, foreseeing that God would justify the Gentiles through faith, preached before the gospel to Abraham, saying, In thee shall all nations be blessed." Justification by faith, therefore, is involved at the very outset of God's promises to Abraham, and in Abraham's faith in God.

The choice of Gen. xv. as the place in which to record the imputation of righteousness to Abraham seems to be the result of the following facts, all of which have a distinct bearing upon the truth at stake in Rom. iii. and iv. Abraham had come to an end of himself—"I go childless" (Gen. xv. 2). Abraham was told by God, that in spite of apparent impossibility he should nevertheless have a son: "He that shall come forth out of thine own bowels shall be thine heir" (Gen. xv. 4). Abraham was then told to look toward heaven, and see whether he was able to number the stars; which command was followed by the promise: "So shall thy seed be" (Gen. xv. 5). Then comes the statement: "And he believed in the Lord, and He counted it to him for righteousness" (Gen. xv. 6).

The special feature of Abraham's faith.

That this feature of Abraham's faith is the underlying reason for the mention of his justification in Gen. xv. 6, Rom. iv. 17-25 gives abundant proof. This passage, as will be seen by the structure, is the sequel and expansion of Rom. iv. 1-8, the passage under review. Its one great point is the fact that, although Abraham and Sarah were "dead" as far as the natural expectation of parenthood was concerned, nevertheless Abraham "staggered not at the promise through unbelief". What God said Abraham believed, and it revealed the fact that the God Whose Word he trusted was to him the "God Who quickeneth the dead" (Rom. iv. 17).

To make the matter quite certain, leaving no room for doubt, the apostle clinches the argument by saying:--

> "Now it was not written for his sake alone, that it was imputed to him: but for us also, to whom it shall be imputed, IF WE BELIEVE ON HIM THAT RAISED UP JESUS OUR LORD FROM THE DEAD" (Rom. iv. 23, 24).

The insistence here is upon resurrection. The birth of Isaac was the manifestation of resurrection power, for his parents were "as good as dead"; "Therefore sprang there even of one, and him as good as dead, so many as the stars of the sky in multitude, and as the sand which is by the sea shore innumerable" (Heb. xi. 12). And at the offering of Isaac, this same element of faith is prominent: "Accounting that God was able to raise him up, even from the dead; from whence also he received him in a figure" (Heb. xi. 19).

While, therefore, justification is "by His blood", it becomes ours by faith in the God of resurrection. This is emphasized in the last verse of Rom. iv.: "Who was delivered on account of our offences, and was raised again on account of our justification." It is not the truth to say: "He was raised again for our justification", for (dia) followed by the accusative, meaning "on account of". The delivering up of Christ by the Father was the demonstration of our guilt to all, for had no guilt been ours, no death would have been His. In like manner the resurrection of Christ was the demonstration before men and angels of the acquittal of all His people. The debt was paid by His death. The acquittal was received in resurrection, and it is for this reason that Gen. xv. 6, and not Gen. xii. 3 (or elsewhere), is the place where Abraham's justification is revealed. He most implicitly believed in God Who quickens the dead when he believed the promise of a literal seed to himself.

We shall have to give these closing verses of Rom. iv. further attention, but for the moment we must leave them and come back to Rom. iv. 1-8.

The testimony of David.

With the introduction of David, the apostle brings forward the third division of the O.T. It must be remembered that the Hebrew Scriptures are divided into three great sections, viz., the Law, the Prophets, and the Psalms (Luke xxiv. 44). The Law and the Prophets have born their witness (Rom. iii. 21), as seen in the case of Abraham and Habakkuk (Rom. iv. 1-8; i. 17). The quotation from David's words now brings the third and last witness to the gratuitous nature of justification.

David's testimony is particularly useful because of the precision of his language. He describes the blessedness of the man to whom God imputeth righteousness without works, by saying: "Blessed is the man to whom the Lord will not impute sin" (Rom. iv. 8). Here we have balancing terms. To impute sin is to lay sin to the charge of any one, and to treat him as a sinner. To impute righteousness must in the same way set righteousness to one's account, and treat one as being righteous. True, the sin is our own, and the righteousness was another's, but the one is no more a pious fiction than the other. Just as surely as the unsaved man is really a sinner, so the accepted believer is really righteous in Christ. Whether we shall ever disentangle the threads and be able to say just how far "imputed righteousness" becomes "imparted righteousness", or where the legal reckoning blends with personal outworking, we cannot say, but let us not lose the joy of our salvation.

Another item of equal importance is brought out by the balance of thought characteristic of Hebrew poets, supplemented by Paul's introduction.

Paul's introduction.—David describes the blessedness of the man unto whom God imputeth righteousness without works.

David's description.—David does not use the expression "impute righteousness" or "faith is reckoned for righteousness", but uses two expressions, the one positive: "iniquities forgiven", "sins covered", the other negative: "to whom the Lord will not impute sin."

It is evident from the apostle's reasoning that to speak of enjoying the forgiveness of sin, and the non-imputation of sin, is another way of referring to the imputation of righteousness. Some have assumed that a man could be forgiven, and so not be under the imputation of sin, yet not be righteous. This is a misconception. The mind of God on this matter is clearly seen in II Cor. v. 19-21:--

> "God was in Christ, reconciling a world unto Himself, not imputing their trespasses unto them . . . . . that we might be made the righteousness of God in Him."

Again, the twofold reference to sin in the quotation from the Psalm is helpful: "Whose iniquities are forgiven, whose sins are covered." The law is twofold—command and prohibition. Sins are twofold—commission and omission. It follows, therefore, that if sin cannot be imputed to a man, he has neither omitted one commandment, nor committed one breach of the law, so that instead of the non-imputation of sin leaving him neutral, it really indicates that he is righteous. A man is either a sinner or righteous; either right or wrong. There is no outside ground. Consequently forgiveness of sins is but the accompaniment of the imputation of righteousness.

The fact that no middle ground exist between sinnership and righteousness is further evidenced by the strong word "ungodly" in verse 5. Paul had been speaking of Abraham, the father of Israel and of the faith, a man whose name was held in peculiar reverence by his people. Paul was about to refer to David, another name especially beloved among Israel, yet Paul does not scruple to use the word ungodly, nor feel under any necessity to modify its application: "To him that worketh not, but believeth on Him that justifieth the ungodly, his faith is counted for righteousness."

Ungodliness and unrighteousness are brought together in Rom. i. 18. The ungodly and the righteous are brought together in Rom. v. 6, 7. There is no difference—all have sinned and come short (Rom. iii. 22, 23). There is no difference – for the same Lord is rich unto all that call upon Him (Rom. x. 12). All such believe unto righteousness (Rom. x. 10), and that belief is vitally connected with the fact that God hath raised Him (Christ) from the dead (Rom. x. 9; iv. 24). The two classes—sinners and righteous, are seen in the light of resurrection to be the dead and the living, and to anticipate the teaching of Rom. v.—in Adam or in Christ.

While, therefore, the details may well exhaust the mind of the ablest, the issues are simple. Let us keep things in their proper place, put off the old, put on the new, and walk worthily.

> "Little children, let no man deceive you: he that doeth righteousness is righteous, even as He is righteous" (I John iii. 7).

#21. Circumcision, or the repudiation of the flesh. (iii. 30 - iv. 25).
pp. 155 – 160

However strange and even repulsive the rite of circumcision may appear to us, there is no doubt that to the Jew it ranked as of the highest importance. It conferred a sense of superiority and dignity that we are convinced was utterly foreign to its intention. Seeing that so much that is vital to our peace is connected with this typical rite, we must not allow ourselves to pass the subject by because it may have somewhat peculiar features.

With the complete revelation of truth in our hands, we are possessed of the inspired comment upon circumcision which will help us in dealing with Rom. iv. This comment is found in Phil. iii. 3, and is immediately followed by a context parallel to that of Rom. iv.:--

We are the circumcision
- which worship God in Spirit,
- and boast in Christ Jesus,
- and have no confidence in the flesh.

These three features are inherent in the type of circumcision. When writing to the Romans, the apostle takes up the case of Abraham, and cites the testimony of David because of the number of Jewish members in the church at Rome. Writing to the Philippians, however, he cites neither Abraham, David, nor O.T. Scripture, but instead gives his own case as an example:--

> "If any other man thinketh that he has ground of confidence in the flesh, I more.
> 1. Circumcised the eighth day.
> 2. Of the stock of Israel.
> 3. Of the tribe of Benjamin.
> 4. An Hebrew of the Hebrews.
> 5. As to the law, a Pharisee.
> 6. As to zeal, a persecutor of the church.
> 7. As to the righteousness of the law, blameless.
> But what was gain to me, that I counted loss for Christ. Yea, doubtless, I count all things but loss because of the super-eminence of the knowledge of Christ Jesus my Lord, for > whom I have suffered the loss of all things, and count them but dung, that I may gain Christ, and be found in Him; not having my own righteousness of the law, but that which is through the faith of Christ, the righteousness which is of God by faith" (Phil. iii. 4-9).

This quotation from Philippians presents a very comprehensive view of true spiritual circumcision, and the utter repudiation of the flesh so far as righteousness is concerned. The law referred to here is the law of Moses as a means of attaining righteousness.

The epistle to the Colossians supplements this passage by giving another point of view, showing once again the utter repudiation of the flesh, and setting aside all the ceremonial observances that militated against "worshipping".

> "Ye are complete in Him . . . . . in Whom also ye are circumcised with the circumcision made without hands, in putting off the body of the sins of the flesh by the circumcision of Christ . . . . . ye are risen with Him through the faith of the operation of God, Who hath raised Him from the dead. And you, being dead to your sins and the uncircumcision of your flesh, hath He quickened together with Him, having forgiven you all trespasses: blotting out the handwriting of the decrees that was against us, which was contrary to us, and took it out of the way, nailing it to His cross . . . . . Let no man therefore judge you in meat, or in drink, or in respect of an holy day, or of the new moon, or of the sabbaths: which are a shadow of things to come; but the body is of Christ" (Col. ii. 10-17).

Eph. ii., with its references to being dead to sins, to circumcision in the flesh, and to the breaking down of the middle wall of partition, should also be read.

We must not omit here a reference to the epistle to the Galatians, for in that epistle the Jewish fortress of circumcision is carried by storm. Titus, who was not compelled to be circumcised, though present at the Jerusalem conference, is cited as a test case (Gal. ii. 3). Peter's defection was due to his fear of them which were of the circumcision (Gal. ii. 12). Paul now solemnly testifies:--

> "Behold, I Paul say unto you, that if ye submit to circumcision (pres. subj.—not the state of being already circumcised, for this would include Paul, but of submitting to circumcision after having heard the gospel) Christ will profit you nothing. And I repeat my testimony to every man who submitteth to circumcision, that he is debtor to do the whole law" (Gal. v. 2, 3).

That this question of circumcision had a direct bearing upon the matter of justification by faith is shewn by the next verse:--

> "Ye are undone from Christ whosoever ye be, who are seeking justification by law; ye are fallen from grace . . . . . for in Christ neither circumcision availeth anything nor uncircumcision, but faith working by love" (Gal. v. 4-6). Or as Gal. vi. 15 has it, "But a new creation".

Circumcision is connected in its abuse and misrepresentation with "a fair show in the flesh" and "boasting in the flesh" (Gal. vi. 12, 13), whereas, as Phil. iii. most definitely states, it rightfully indicates no confidence in the flesh and, according to Col. ii., repudiates the body of the flesh. The spiritual circumcision of Christ took place at the cross, and was attested and sealed at His glorious resurrection. The knowledge of Christ after the flesh is opposed to a new creation in II Cor. v. 16, 17, and to a perfect righteousness of God in Him (verse 21).

The true meaning of circumcision.

With this added light we return to Rom. iv. to learn the true meaning of circumcision there.

It must have come as a startling revelation to the prejudiced Jew that Abraham was justified by faith while he was, we may say, a Gentile. "How was it then reckoned unto him? . . . . . not in circumcision, but in uncircumcision" (Rom. iv. 10). The absurdity of attempting to exclude the believing uncircumcised Gentile from the full benefits of faith in Christ becomes apparent immediately this fact is remembered. Circumcision was but an external "sign" and "seal" of the righteousness of faith which he had being yet uncircumcised.

This, argues the apostle, enables us to see that Abraham can be the spiritual father of all them that believe, whether circumcised or uncircumcised: "That righteousness might be imputed unto them also." Abraham is not only the father of the circumcision by virtue of lineal descent, but "the father of circumcision to them who are not of the circumcision only, but who also walk in the steps of that faith of our father Abraham, which he had being yet uncircumcised". To the same effect are the words of the Lord in John: "They answered and said unto Him, Abraham is our father. Jesus saith unto them, If ye were Abraham's children, ye would do the works of Abraham" (John viii. 39). John the Baptist taught the same truth: "Bring forth therefore fruits meet for repentance, and think not to say within yourselves, We have Abraham to our father" (Matt. iii. 8, 9).

We shall meet the same argument in Rom. ix. 6-8 where the apostle states: "They are not all Israel, which are of Israel, neither, because they are the seed of Abraham, are they all children, but, In Isaac shall thy seed be called. That is, they which are the children of the flesh, these are not the children of God: but the children of the promise are counted for the seed."

Whether it be in the Gospels or the Epistles, written before or after Acts xxviii., this truth remains constant—true circumcision means the utter repudiation of the flesh.

Circumcision and Gen. xv. 6.

The meaning of this rite becomes more striking when we see how the apostle has linked it with Gen. xv. 6, and balanced it with Rom. iv. 19. Let us seek this lesson.

The complaint of Abraham in Gen. xv. 2 is that he is childless and without an heir. The promise of God is that Abraham shall have a son, and in order that we may be impressed with the physical side of this promise, God says: "This shall not be thine heir (referring presumably to Eliezer); but he that shall come forth out of thine own bowels shall be thine heir" (verse 4). This somewhat strange term is used of both parents, as may be seen by referring to Gen. xxv. 23 and Ruth i. 11. The words were repeated by the Lord when He made His covenant with David: "And when thy days be fulfilled, and thou shalt sleep with thy fathers, I will set up thy seed after thee, which shall proceed out of thy bowels, and I will establish his kingdom" (II Sam. vii. 12).

The more the fact is faced that Isaac, the promised seed was to be in reality the son of Abraham, the more we shall realize the meaning of circumcision. In Gen. xvii. the covenant of circumcision is introduced (verses 10-14), and this is followed immediately by the promise that Sarah should bear Abraham a son:--

> "Then Abraham fell upon his face, and laughed, and said in his heart, Shall a child be born unto him that is an hundred years old? and shall Sarah, that is ninety years old, bear? And God said, Sarah thy wife shall bear thee a son indeed; and thou shalt call his name Isaac (that is, laughter)" (Gen. xvii. 17-19).

This was the laugh of faith, for Rom. iv. says of Abraham that,

> "Without being weakened in faith (for he considered not his own body, now as good as dead—he being about an hundred years old—and the deadness of Sarah's womb) looking unto the promise of God, he wavered not through unbelief" (Rom. iv. 19, 20).

Abraham's age—"being about an hundred years old"—fixes this passage in relation to Gen. xvii., where Abraham went through the rite of circumcision. He was not only very conscious that his own body was "as good as dead", but we realize that circumcision set that fact forth. If Isaac was to be born, he must be a child of promise and not of the flesh—and this he was.

Rightly understood, therefore, circumcision to the Israelite should have been a witness to the deadness and repudiation of the flesh, and the necessity for complete trust in the Lord. Instead, the very rite that symbolized this was distorted into meaning the very opposite, and became a ground of false boasting and of "a fair shew in the flesh".

We cannot speak more plainly here. We believe all will see the lesson intended by this close association of circumcision, birth, resurrection, and promise, as over against the power and will of the flesh, law and works.

When Jacob's name was changed to Israel, it was accompanied by the shrinking of the sinew of his thigh. Triumphant Israel ever afterwards halted upon his thigh, and his descendants always avoided "the sinew that shrank" in their diet (Gen. xxxii. 32). Just as Israel's spiritual triumph was accompanied by the touching of the hollow of his thigh, so the changing of Abraham's name took place at the very time that circumcision—the repudiation of the flesh—was introduced (Gen. xvii.).

Moreover, there is a parallel between Gen. xv. and xvii. After God had made the promise to Abraham, and Abraham had believed, the Lord confirmed the promise by passing between the divided carcasses of the sacrifices. During this time Abraham was in a deep sleep, plainly indicating that he had nothing to do or promise for himself. So, upon the change of his name and establishing of the covenant (Gen. xvii. 1-8), there is brought in the sign and the seal of the covenant of faith, in which is set forth in typical rite the utter setting aside of the flesh.

God's blessing of gratuitous justification is limited to the true circumcision—those who boast in Christ Jesus, and have no confidence in the flesh. Ignorance of this truth led Israel to go about to establish their own righteousness, and not to submit themselves unto the righteousness of God. "For Christ is the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth" (Rom. x. 4).

Satan and the Church of the Mystery.

#1. pp. 129 - 135

In Eph. ii. 2 the apostle gives Satan a new title: "The prince of the authority of the air". Why the air? And why is the title revealed just here? While it may be true of this world that: "Princes have but their titles for their glories, an outward honour for an inward toil", it is not so in Scripture. There, titles are used with doctrinal and dispensational accuracy. In the light of the context, this title of the Devil contains, in germ, the whole doctrine of his relationship with the church of the mystery.

Eph. i. 19 - ii. 7 is a complete section of the epistle. It opens with the exalted position of Christ "in the heavenlies", "far above all", with "all under His feet", and it closes with the church raised and seated in the same glory at the right hand of God. The section also contrasts two great spiritual forces that are at work to-day:--

(1). "According to the inworking of the strength of His might which He wrought in Christ . . . . ." (Eph. i. 19, 20).
(2). "The prince of the authority of the air, the spirit that now inworks in the sons of disobedience" (Eph. ii. 2).

To usward who believe is the mighty resurrection power of the Lord. For the children of wrath is the inworking of him that had the power of death, that is the Devil. To meddle with this distinction, and suggest that Satan can energize those who by death, burial, and risen life are united with Christ, is a denial of truth, and is calculated to help on the cause of the very one it is supposed to resist.

Satan's limitation, expressed in the new title of Eph. ii. 2, is in direct contrast with the glorious position of the church, which, together with Christ, is said to be "far above every principality . . . . . in this or the coming age". "Principality" is arche, and "prince" is archon. It is quite clear that Satan included in the spiritual authorities and dominions of Eph. i. 21, and that the statement holds true now. While Christ is not yet manifestly "Head over all things", He is so "to the church which is His body", for God has "given Him" so to be. Whatever Satan's authority may have been before the overthrow of the world, or even while Christ was in the flesh (e.g., Matt. iv.), it is clear that at the present time he has no authority in heavenly places where Christ sitteth at the right hand of God, for his authority is expressly limited to "the air".

In harmony with this teaching of Eph. i. and ii. is Col. i. 13, which puts the matter beyond all possible doubt:--

"DELIVERED OUT OF the authority of darkness, TRANSLATED INTO the kingdom of the Son of His love."

While those blessed words remain God's truth for us, shall we deny them by admitting for one moment that Satan can have any authority over us? Never! Even John (who did not write for the church of the mystery) taught differently:--

> "The whole world lieth in the wicked one" (I John v. 19).
> "He that is begotten of God keepeth himself, and that wicked one TOUCHETH HIM NOT" (I John v. 18).

Can any honestly believe Col. i. 13 and yet endorse a statement such as the following?

> "One day God may let a storm from the pit break upon you, not because He wants to weaken and overthrow you, but that you may be sure of your foundation, add to your strength, and understand the conditions of your security."

Is it possible that the writer of such a statement can have the remotest idea of the "foundation" and "strength" of our position in and with Christ, or the real "conditions of our security"?

It is a Satanic device of the first importance to attract attention from the Lord to Satan. Does Satan ever whisper into the ear of any of his dupes the blessed words of Col. i. 13? Does he ever torment a soul with the words "delivered", "translated", "presented", and the like? Does he not make them believe that he still has power over them, that God often exposes them? etc. What is it that drives so many children of God to the God-dishonouring conclusion that, as sure as any child of God steps out in faith, and something in the way of illness or trouble follows, the latter is "of the Devil"? Are we to believe that God definitely steps aside, and purposely allows Satan to attack those who seek to trust in Him? We will certainly believe this when we see it written "in the Book", but we have no faith in the mere reasonings and "experiences" of men, and especially of those who seek to introduce into this dispensation of the ascended Christ features that belong to the days of His flesh.

In the last epistle written by Paul before his imprisonment he said:--

> "I am sure that, when I come unto you, I shall come in the fullness of the blessing of the gospel of Christ" (Rom. xiv. 29).
> "The God of peace shall tread Satan under your feet shortly" (Rom. xvi. 20).

He may have spoken of something beyond what he then knew, but however this may be, the subjection of Satan beneath the feet of the church of the mystery is a fundamental truth of Eph. i. To turn from darkness to light, and from the authority of Satan unto God, is the inspired forecast of Paul's prison ministry (Acts xxvi. 18). To allow demon possession or Satanic authority into the realm of the church at the right hand of God, is to assist Satan and his lie and not to resist him.

Peter could rightly say to the dispersion of Israel, to whom he ministered, that "your adversary the devil, as a roaring lion, walketh about, seeking whom he may devour, whom resist" (I Pet. v. 8, 9), but he did not mix the dispensations. He knew the sphere of Satan's patrol (Job. Ii. 2), and his antagonism to the restoration of Israel. Even when we do read in the Scriptures of the rebuking of Satan there is nothing comparable to the tone and language adopted by many to-day. The language and attitude of Michael the archangel (Jude 9) is meekness itself, and would probably be condemned as weak and powerless by many who are vehemently urging us to resist the Devil.

After Enoch was "translated" he was not found (Heb. xi. 5), and though Satan should seek to find and devour a member of the one body, the search would be in vain, for he, too, is "translated", and further, his "life is hid with Christ in God", where Satan can never come.

There are several rallying cries sounding in the church to-day which superficially seem true and splendid, and the cries, "Back to Christ" and "Back to Pentecost", have caught many in their toils. To quote I Pet. v. 8, 9 to a member of the one body may appear to proceed from a strong faith, but in reality it is a denial of the essential condition of security and position of the church, for it ignores the limited authority of the Devil revealed in Eph. ii. 2, and treats with Satan as though he were still an undefeated for, and as though Christ had not led captivity captive, nor spoiled principality and power. The basic truth is that in the dispensation of the mystery we have for the first time a concrete example and foreshadowing of that new creation where God shall be all in all, for the words are used of Christ and the church in Col. iii. 11.

Can anyone imagine that Paul (not to speak of the Holy Spirit Who inspired him) would omit from the great word of warning given in Col. ii. 4-23 the admonition to resist the Devil, if such were to be the crying need of to-day? Can a mountain of the most extraordinary experience outweigh an ounce of inspired truth. Shall we confess that God omitted to warn the church of the one body, in the epistles written to that church, of its most deadly peril. The references in the prison epistles to Satan, the Devil, and the Wicked One can be counted on the fingers of one hand, and even this limited number of references includes those that speak of his defeat as well as of his opposition. When we read books that contain pages and pages of the most minute analysis of the ways of the Devil, when we hear prayers in which the Devil is spoken of as many times as the Lord (in spite of the fact that there is not a prayer recorded for our example that even mentions the Devil), we can only conclude that such writers and pleaders have missed their way, that they are acting as if they were in that dispensation in which it was scriptural to pray "Deliver us from evil", and where forgiveness of sins was withheld from those who did not forgive others (Matt. vi.). Such will be ashamed of their work in that day, for they will have overthrown the faith of some, not realizing the sure foundation of God (II Tim. ii. 15-19).

Returning to Eph. i. 19-23 and its parallel, Col. i. 13, we assert that the whole battery of Satan can be met without moving a finger, and that with all reverence we may emulate Him Who sitteth in the heavens: "He that sitteth in the heavens shall laugh."

We have no need to conquer a beaten foe. All the passages that are quoted to support the teaching that the Devil still has authority over the mind and body of the saint, are taken from scriptures that deal with dispensations other than that of the mystery. Eph. vi., which is appealed to in defence of warfare in connection with the saints and to justify the strange anomaly "prayer-warfare", teaches no such thing. There is not one word in that passage that means warfare, conquest or fighting. What is enjoined is standing, withstanding and wrestling. There is but one weapon provided; not prayer (for prayer is entirely between the believer and the Lord), but the Word of God. We shall more effectually resist the Devil and all his works if we use the sword of the Spirit, and "preach the Word in season and out of season", than if we spend whole days and nights in unscriptural prayer. There is only one weapon that terrifies the Devil, viz., the sword of the Spirit. There is only one effective guard against all the fiery darts of the Wicked One, and that is faith. There is only one conquest of the Devil, and that is the finished work of Christ. It is a denial of our assured position in Christ to adopt all manner of psychic attitudes in our relation to the foe. In that realm he is easily master, and it is no wonder that so many physical and mental wrecks abound. The complete armour of God is held together by the girdle of truth: "the truth shall make you free." But to be "truth" for us it must be dispensational, and without "right division" the armour is ineffective. Hence the number who are defeated in the fight.

We do not base our teaching upon our experiences, but as these are used by others we will for once use such here. We have found that every one with whom we have spoken on this subject has been either clear or befogged in proportion as they were clear or befogged regarding the unique character of this present dispensation. Every one who has either been in bondage to Satan, or who has slipped back into this welter of confusion, has never really acknowledged in its fullness the unalloyed doctrine of the prison epistles. There has always been something belonging to a past dispensation that has spoiled the witness.

Again, Eph. vi. does not teach that our warfare is in the heavenlies. Can there be warfare where Christ now sitteth at the right hand of God? Who is there with whom we can fight? Satan is beneath our feet in Christ; principalities and powers also. Christ has led captivity captive. He has spoiled principality and power. Warfare is impossible at the right hand of God. If we compare Eph. ii. 2 with Col. i. 13 we shall see that the authority of darkness and the authority of the air are in some measure parallel, and find their link in the words of Eph. vi. 12: "the world rulers of this darkness." It is true that a superficial reading of Eph. vi. 12 gives the impression that our wrestling is in heavenly places, but Dr. Bullinger pointed out years ago that this is not so. First of all we are told with whom we do not wrestle, viz., "with flesh and blood". Then at the end of the verse we find at the close of a parenthesis (in Paul's customary way), that we do not wrestle in heavenly places. The parenthesis then supplies the positive side. We do wrestle with spiritual wickednesses, and we wrestle here in "this world".

"For we wrestle not	/	BUT WITH PRINCIPALITIES	\	in heavenly with flesh and blood,	\	. . . . . OF THIS WORLD	/	places."

This has to do with the Christian soldier, and can by no means be brought into the question of demon possession, or of being led captive by the Devil. If anyone is led captive by the Devil, it is folly to exhort him to "put on the armour of God", for he is not in the right position to take it up, and Satan would not allow him to do so if he desired. What is to be done? Shall we listen to the unscriptural "experiences" of men as fallible as ourselves? Or shall we believe the diagnosis and the remedy definitely written in the Scriptures? Let us examine "the law and the testimony".

How many the Devil get a foothold? How did he once energize us? The answer of Eph. ii. 2, 3 is, "through the flesh". It is the same in Eph. iv. Instead of being exhorted to "resist the Devil", the member of the one body is told to > "put off concerning the former manner of life the old man, which is corrupt according to the deceitful lusts; and be renewed in the spirit of your mind, and that ye put on the new man . . . . . putting away the lie . . . . . can you be angry, and sin not? Let not the sun go down upon your wrath, neither give place to the Devil" (Eph. iv. 22-27).

This teaching is not palatable to the carnal mind. The family doctor knows that many a patient would resent the truth that his sickness was attributable to abuse of the dinner table. His vanity must be respected, and another name and cause suggested. So, many a spiritual disease is simply the result of the "deceitful lusts of the old man", but this is highly offensive, and the spiritual sufferer is told that he or she has been specially singled out by the Wicked One. Deliverance is sought in vain, and the bondage grows worse. We are not told to exhort such to "claim" anything, or to "resist the Devil", or to do any of the many things that form the mode of deliverance advocated by the teaching we here reject, but we are told that > "the servant of the Lord must not strive, but be gentle unto all apt, apt to teach, patiently enduring evil, in meekness instructing those that oppose themselves: if God peradventure will give them repentance to the acknowledging of the truth: and that they may be awakened out of the snare of the Devil, who are led captive by him at his will" (II Tim. ii. 24-26).

Here are a series of statements which should be weighed with those that we often hear. The remedy is provided in "teaching", not in resisting or commanding the Devil to depart. Patient endurance of evil is foreign to those who are out to "resist" the Devil, for they say that a believer has no right to submit to evil at all, all such being of the Devil. We, however, prefer Paul as our monitor. The phrase, "If God peradventure" and "repentance" do not harmonize with the system that practically dictates to God what He must do. It is the acknowledging of "the truth" that sets the captive free, not exorcising demons, or muttering on this or that the unscriptural imprecation, "The curse of God".

The snare of the devil is associated with the "novice" who too quickly jumps into so-called service, and with evil living (I Tim. iii. 6, 7), and this we see all around. What a tragedy it would have been for Paul (and also ourselves) had he listened to the advice to "resist the Devil" in the matter of his thorn in the flesh—the messenger of Satan sent to buffet him! How many have missed their blessing by assuming that all illness, all trouble, all apparent disaster is "of the Devil". Far more likely is success to be of his engineering.

Into the question of demon possession and Satanic control we do not enter. These things belong to other dispensations. We leave them where Scripture places them. We are concerned for the truth of the mystery. It is laid upon us to make it known, and subversive doctrine must be withstood. Anything less than this would be unfaithfulness to our stewardship. We shall maintain, as long as God grants us grace to be faithful, that positionally, dispensationally, and doctrinally the church which is His body is "delivered" and "translated" from the authority of darkness, and that only in the realm of the flesh and the old man can Satan find any ground for attack. The armour of God is not for captives but for soldiers, and has nothing to do with those who are already bound. We still believe that the truth makes free, and that we best demonstrate our victory over the Devil by believing and teaching that we are "delivered" and "translated" "far above all".

#2. pp. 167 - 174

When dealing with this subject in our September issue, we did not give much space to the question of the conflict which is the theme of Eph. vi., and lest our scanty reference should be mistaken, we propose an examination of it here.

There are a series of questions which we feel demand an answer from Scripture. For instance, is it not too readily assumed that all believers are "soldiers" of Christ? This assumption we seriously question as being at the root of many failures in Christian practice, and we hope to show that no babe in Christ or novice in doctrine is in view in Eph. vi. There is not the slightest indication therein that the apostle refers either to the enslaved dupe of Satan, or to the believer frantically struggling to throw off his yoke. We do not find there one paralyzed with fear, devil-dogged at every turn, crying out for "victory" that does not come, nor do we find any instructions to practice a species of auto-hypnotism by "repeating aloud" any phrase even though it be a quotation of Scripture. We once more ask this question, and seek an answer to it from the Word: Who are the fighters in view in Eph. vi.?

The first answer that Scripture yields is a correction of our phraseology, for the word "fight" is not used. To use it begs the whole question, for it assumes what is to be proved, viz., that fighting and warfare are actually in view. But one may legitimately interpose, "Armour and weapons indicate warfare". They do, but we will consider this in its place. Before we go so far, we must determine, if we can, who are the contestants, and then the nature of their contest.

> "Every one that useth milk is unskillful in the word of righteousness, for he is a babe" (Heb. v. 13).

An unskillful handler of the sword of the Spirit would be hopelessly outclassed in the conflict of Eph. vi.

"Every male from twenty years old and upward, all that were able to go forth to war" (Numb. i. 20, &c.).

"Not a novice, lest being lifted up with pride he fall into the condemnation of the devil" (I Tim. iii. 6).

Every believer is not necessarily ready to don the armour and take up the sword, any more than he is necessarily fit to preach or to teach simply because he is a believer. Instead of this indiscriminate use of the title "soldier", it will be found that the apostle Paul uses it with great reserve. So also must we if we would be true and well-pleasing to the Lord. Archippus, and Epaphroditus are honoured with the title "fellow-soldier" (Philemon 2 and Phil. i. 25), and from the description given of Epaphroditus we can gather somewhat of the spiritual maturity that attaches to the title. Yet is it not common, to meet enthusiastic men and women using the most advanced military phraseology, and speaking about warfare, victory, &c., who are the veriest babes in Christian doctrine?

In II Tim. ii. 4 the apostle speaks of some essential characteristics of the soldier of Christ.

"No man that warreth entangleth himself with the affairs of this life: that he may please Him Who hath chosen him to be a soldier" (II Tim. ii. 4).

The word translated "life" in this verse is bios, and means "livelihood" rather than "life".

"All her living" (Mark xii. 44).
"Spent all her living" (Luke viii. 43).
"Divided unto them his living" (Luke xv. 12).
"The pride of life" (I John ii. 16).
"This world's good" (I John iii. 17).

Here is a prime qualification for the good soldier of Jesus Christ. Not a word about fighting can be found in the context, except it be the prohibition in II Tim. ii. 24, "The servant of the Lord must not strive".

It will be found that the apostle is only applying to the soldier of Christ the principles which regulated the conduct of the soldier in Israel. In Deut. xx. are defined the rules which were to be observed by Israel in time of battle. The officers were to exempt from combatant service the man who had not yet dedicated a newly-built house; or had not yet eaten of a newly-planted vineyard, or had not yet taken to himself a betrothed wife. The second ground of exemption is to be understood in the light of Lev. xix. 23, 24, where the fruit tree was considered "uncircumcised" until three years had passed.

The foregoing three grounds of exemption have their spiritual counterpart to-day. The "soldier" aspect of the teaching of Eph. vi. is reserved for the "Finally" of verse 10, even as the soldier of Israel must have attained to 20 years of age. No man who has not "dedicated" his house as Eph. v. 22 - vi. 9 indicates can hope to overcome in the contest of the faith. No man whose fruit is not definitely the product of the resurrection ("three years shall it be as uncircumcised") can stand in this conflict. So in Ephesians, before the exhortation to "put on the armour of God" (vi. 11) is found the essential requisite of iv. 24, "Put on the new man, which after God is created in righteousness and true holiness" ["For the fruit of the Spirit is in all goodness and righteousness and truth" (v. 9)]. The "officers" of the Lord's army to-day should make these things clear lest any attempting to engage in this conflict without the presence and blessing of the Lord find themselves in captivity to the devil.

We obtain most helpful light upon the nature of the conflict that is before the church if we carefully note the things said in this connection in II Timothy:-- > "Endure hardness, as a good soldier of Jesus Christ" (ii. 3).

> "I endure hardness, even unto bonds" (ii. 9).
> "If we patiently endure, we shall reign" (ii. 12).
> "I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith, henceforth . . . . . a crown" (iv. 7, 8).

All this is prefaced by the words, "Be strong in the grace that is in Christ Jesus" (ii. 1).

We have followed the same course in our teaching on this subject. First must come the absolute position of "grace in Christ", where all is viewed as complete. Before the believer is called to put on the armour he is assured that he is accepted in the Beloved, delivered out of the authority of darkness, translated into the kingdom of the Son, quickened, raised, and seated far above all. In this sphere he can win nothing, nor can he forfeit anything; all is in grace and all in Christ. The next step is to "be strong" in that self-same grace: "Finally, my brethren, be strong in the Lord, and in the power of His might" (vi. 10). This is the uppermost idea in the closing verses of Eph. i.: "The exceeding greatness of His power to us-ward who believe."

The essence of the relation between Eph. i. and vi. may be seen in the two expressions, to "work in" and to "work out". Unfortunately the A.V. does not show this clearly. In Eph. i. "working" (verse 19) and "wrought in" (verse 20) are translations of the Greek word energeo, "to work in". The expression, "having done all", of vi. 13, is a very free translation of katergazonai, "to work out". The conflict of Eph. vi. is largely the working out of the blessed position and truth of the mystery revealed in chapter i.

Let us now turn to Phil. ii. 12, 13, so that (1) every reader may be assured that we have not given a "private interpretation" of the two Greek words in Eph. i. & vi., and (2) that further light upon the nature of the conflict may be obtained. First the translation: "Work out (katergozonia) your own salvation with fear and trembling, for it is God which worketh (energeo) in you both to will and to work (energeo)." Secondly, the light from the context. Let the reader pass in review every case that he may have known of demon possession, attack, control, satanic dominion over body, mind or estate, and answer as before the Lord this question: "Have you known one solitary case where such a person was in the full light of the truth of the mystery?" Many may have used the terms found in Ephesians. They may have spoken of heavenly places, of membership of the body, and allied subject, but have not these high glories been mixed in their teaching with the previous dispensation of the Acts. Has not the Pentecostal baptism been much dwelt upon? And have not the sign gifts (such as tongues and healing) come prominently into view? We await the answer with confidence. The only power that can enable anyone to fight the good fight of Eph. vi. is the power of Eph. i. 19, 20. If that has not bee worked in, it cannot be worked out, and so poor souls go into battle at their own charges and without the complete armour, attempting to gain victory instead of standing in a victory already theirs. No wonder there are shipwrecks of faith, broken hearts, crushed spirits, and ruined homes.

We have drawn attention in other articles to the peculiar nature of the epistle to the Philippians as compared with that to the Ephesians. The latter may be summed up in the words of Eph. iii. 12, "In Whom we have boldness and access with confidence", whereas the standpoint of the former is expressed in the words of Phil. ii. 12, "Work out . . . . . with fear and trembling". In the one case we have our position, in the other our responsibility. In the first case there can be no element of reward or loss, for all is a gift in absolute grace; in the second case the salvation already possessed is to be "worked out", and in that realm there is room for "gain" and "loss", and for a "prize". In Phil. ii. Christ is not put forward as Saviour, but as Example, His humiliation and subsequent exaltation are applied to the believer as an exhortation, "Wherefore . . . . . work out", and we have the completion in chapter iii. in the apostle's example where he is seen running for the prize, avoiding the entanglements of this life, and forgetting the things that are behind. This last expression may be linked with Numb. xi. 5, "We remember . . . . . Egypt". These were the words of those who, redeemed out of bondage, fell in the wilderness principally through the evil influence of the "mixed multitude" who went with them.

In II Cor. iv. 17 the term "work out" is found in a similar context. "For our light affliction, which is but for a moment, worketh out for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory". Here we return to the teaching of II Tim. ii., "If we endure, we shall reign".

Reverting for a moment to the fact that no Israelite was permitted to bear arms and to go to war before the age of 20 years, we shall find that this further illustrates the distinctive character of the soldier which we have noticed in II Timothy and Philippians, namely, a close association with crown and prize:--

> "Your carcasses shall fall in this wilderness: and all that were numbered of you, according to your whole number, from TWENTY YEARS OLD and upward, which have murmured against Me" (Numb. xiv. 29).

Here we have responsibility, forfeiture and loss for those not standing in grace, and this is true of the soldier in Paul's epistles as in the law of Moses.

A further full comment on the true qualities of the soldier can be gathered from the witness of Scripture to the stand of Caleb and Joshua, which our readers are urged to read in conjunction with Heb. iii. and iv. This relation of the soldier with the overcomer is further set out in the matter of those worthies who were given such a high place in the kingdom of David. Jashobeam, the Hachmonite, Eleazar, the Ahohite, Joab, Benaiah and the rest were all warriors, men who had done valiant deeds in battle (I Chron. xi. 11-47). It is this feature that is carried over into the present time: "Endure hardness . . . . . if we endure we shall reign . . . . . I have fought a good fight . . . . . henceforth a crown."

Before concluding this aspect of our subject let us look at the armour. We have already observed the evident connection in Eph. vi. and iv. between the exhortation to "put on" the armour, and the statement of fact that we have "put on" the new man. "The truth that is in Jesus" is—"your having put off . . . . . and your having put on" (Eph. iv. 21-24). Apothesthai and endusasthai are in the middle voice, whereas analabete, "take unto you", and analabontes, "taking", of Eph. vi. 16 are in the active. The taking up of the armour is the experimental and active entry into all that Christ has been made unto us by God. This "truth in Jesus" is the girdle of our loins, Christ Himself (without the slightest admixture of the principles of law or merit) is our breastplate of righteousness, and so throughout the list.

In Rom. xiii. 12-14 the apostle makes mention of armour, and it will help us to see what is said:--

> "The night is far spent, the day is at hand; let us therefore cast off the works of darkness, and let us put on the armour of light. Let us walk honestly, as in the day, not in rioting and drunkenness, not in chambering and wantonness, not in strife and envying. But put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ, and make no provision for the flesh, to fulfil the lusts thereof."

Here in view of approaching morning, the sleeper is called upon to awake, put off his night attire, and don the armour of light—the only fitting attire for the saint passing through this world. Once again may we insist that the apostle does not say one single word about fighting, but instead he speaks about walking, and just as in Eph. iv. he speaks of the deceitful lusts of the old man, so here he makes no mention of Satan, but immediately indicates the foe by enumerating six "lusts of the flesh". Then more fully to clinch what we have previously seen in Eph. vi., instead of returning to the subject of the armour and referring to its several items, he proceeds at once to the true meaning and says: "Put on the armour of light . . . . . put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ, and make no provision for the flesh, to fulfil the lusts thereof."

Where Eph. vi. enumerates the parts of the armour, Rom. xiii. points to the appropriation of all that Christ is to the believer; and where Eph. vi. particularizes the spiritual foes, Rom. xiii. points out their only vantage ground with the believer, "the making provision for the lusts of the flesh". This, as we have already seen, is in entire harmony with what we may learn from a comparison of Eph. iv. and vi.

In I Thess. v. 5-11 we have another reference to armour, another reference to night and day, another placing of drunkenness over against armour:--

> "For they that sleep, sleep in the night; and they that are drunken are drunken in the night. But let us, who are of the day, be sober, putting on the breastplate of faith and love, and for an helmet, the hope of salvation."

Surely no one who believes that the Scriptures are inspired and sufficient can further deny the obvious fact that the only "warfare" that these passages will allow is waged between what we are "in Christ", and what the old man and the lusts of the flesh (acted upon by unseen spiritual foes) would make us if they could.

In our next paper we shall have to return to some of these passages again, for we have not yet discovered exactly what the object of these evil powers may be. That is a subject too important to attempt here. We must therefore content ourselves with the aspect before us, and so would turn to yet another reference to armour in the writings of the apostle, remembering that the word hoplon, which can be seen in the English "panoply", is translated as "armour", "weapon" and "instrument".

> "The weapons of our warfare are not carnal, but mighty through God to the pulling down of strongholds; casting down reasonings, and every height that exalteth itself against the knowledge of God, and leading captive every thought to the obedience of Christ" (II Cor. x. 4, 5).

A reference to chapter xi. will show that the Corinthians were in danger of having their minds corrupted by Satan and his agents. The methods adopted by the enemy were the preaching of another "Jesus", another "spirit", and another "gospel", while the means of defeating this attack are not expressed in terms of war or resistance, but more simply by bringing all to the touchstone of the faith once given. Appended to the satanic counterfeit—another "Jesus" are the words, "whom we did not preach"; to the travesty of the other "spirit", the words, "which ye have not received"; and to the false "gospel", the words, "which ye have not accepted". A return to the written word is the apostle's one great protection and offensive. He needed no frenzied meetings or agonizing for victory. The truth makes free, and the sword of the Spirit is the Word of God; all other methods which are not found in Scripture we must repudiate as carnal weapons that well be of no avail.

Will the reader note two expressions in the foregoing quotation from II Cor. x.? One is "the height", and the other "leading captive". Among those things that are enumerated in Rom. viii. 38, 39 as possible foes over which the believers is "more than conqueror" will be found "height", and II Cor. x. shows that this spiritual enemy is closely associated with "reasoning that exalt themselves against the knowledge of God". The other expression, "leading captive", is found in Eph. iv. in direct proximity to the giving of apostles, etc., for the purpose of leading the Church on to the "measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ", and so to rise about the cunning craftiness and "wiles" of Satan's agents. A glance at Col. ii. 14-17 will show a close connection between certain principalities, and the imposition of undispensational teaching, shadows instead of substance which substance (or reality) is the blessed prerogative of every member of the Body of Christ.

One further reference must suffice for this paper, viz., Rom. vi. 12, 13:--

> "Let not sin therefore reign in your mortal body, that ye should obey it in the lusts thereof. Neither yield ye your members as instruments (weapons, armour) of unrighteousness unto sin, but yield yourselves unto God, as those which are alive from > the dead, and your members as instruments (weapons, armour) of righteousness unto God."

Here is a use of the word "weapon" which is perfectly intelligible when used in the way that we have seen in Rom. xiii., I Thess. v., and II Cor. x., but utterly impossible of direct interpretation if unscriptural ideas of "warfare" are used.

A summary of our findings will be given at the close of the next article.

#3. pp. 179 - 186

In the previous paper of this series we found our whole space occupied with the questions, "Who are the contestants?" and "What is the armour?" and the investigation necessitated so much reference that a clearly stated answer was crowded out. Before proceeding, therefore, we must attempt to put this first part of our subject before the reader with some degree of clarity.

Who are the contestants? The necessary qualification for the soldier in Paul's teaching, in line with the typical teaching of the law, precludes from the ranks all who are "babes", "novice", and such as are not, for any reason, spiritually mature. The sword of the Spirit is the Word of God, and must be either taught or preached when it is being used. There is no other way of actually "fighting" with the Scriptures, and consequently all those passages of Scripture that indicate that a babe is "unskillful" in the Word, or that maturity in the faith is connected with being ready to teach others, apply equally to the soldier.

We saw, moreover, that the putting on of the armour was explained as the putting on of Christ, and was balanced by the putting on of the new man. With the exception of the passage in Eph. vi., the armour is always used in the conflict with the flesh and its lusts. He who puts on this armour is one who begins to "work out" what has been worked in. The close of Ephesians is really an anticipation of Philippians, the epistle of the soldier, the overcomer, and the prize. Reverting to the fact that the soldier in Israel had to be 20 years old before bearing arms, and that this age limit is mentioned in the case of those who fell in the wilderness, we find in Psa. xci. a suggestion of the security of the believer viewed as simply "in Christ", as contrasted with the responsibility of one who "20 years old and upward" steps out into the arena of conflict, where gain and loss are permissible terms.

> "Thou shalt not be afraid of the terror by night, nor of the arrow that flieth by day; nor for the pestilence that walketh in darkness; nor for the destruction that wasteth at noonday. A thousand shall fall at thy side, and ten thousand at thy right hand, but it shall not come nigh thee . . . . . The dragon thou shalt trample under feet."

This expresses in O.T. terms much the same sense of absolute security and positive exaltation above the Prince and the authority of the air that we find in Eph. i. and Col. i. The Psalm approaches to the "positional" element, which we have sought to show, when it reveals the basis of this perfect security in the words: "He that dwelleth in the secret place of the Most High shall abide under the shadow of the Almighty."

We must now take up our study and consider other equally important questions, and the first shall be an examination of the terms used to describe the conflict. Eph. vi. contains no word that can be translated "fight", "war", "battle", "campaign", "conquest", or any other military term so familiar to those who engage in "prayer warfare", and who use this scripture as their warrant. Should it not cause the believer to halt and consider that if a system of teaching is obliged to go outside the Scriptures for its terms, then that system bears the marks indicating the preaching of "another Jesus", "another Spirit", and "another gospel" of which the apostle warned the Corinthians, and which he characterized as the teaching of Satan transformed into an angel of light?

The words used in Eph. vi. to define the nature of the conflict are, "stand against", "withstand", "stand", and "wrestle". The original uses the Greek word histemi, with pros and anti. Anthistemi is used by both Peter and Paul. It is the word translated "resist" in I Pet. v. 9. Both Peter and Paul have given to their respective charges clear instructions as to their attitude toward the devil and his agents, and both in perfect accord with their respective callings. Trouble is caused by the persistent attempt of some to rule the members of the Body of Christ by the rules that belong to the "royal priesthood and holy nation". The latter pass through a "fiery trial" and wait for the salvation of their souls "in the last time", a salvation of which O.T. prophets spake, but on which the epistles of the church of the mystery are silent.

The word translated "wrestle" is pale, and does not occur elsewhere in Scripture. Fortunately the word is too well-known to students of the history of Greece to admit of argument. Bloomfield gives the following examples of its figurative use in classical Greek:--

> "Socrates wrestles with Miletus with bonds and poison: Plato wrestles with a tyrant's anger, a rough sea, and the greatest of dangers: Xenophon wrestles with the prejudices of Tissaphernes, the snares of Ariaeus, the treachery of Meno, the machinations of royalty; and Diogenes wrestles with poverty, infamy, hunger and cold."

This is a fairly comprehensive summary of the way in which the idea of wrestling can be applied, and if we substitute the man of God for Socrates and the others, and put "principalities and powers" for the snares, machinations, &c., in the above quotation, we shall approach a fairly true understanding of the apostle's meaning. It is, moreover, common knowledge that the Greeks wrestled quite naked, a fact that is still evident to any art student of the "antique", and still with us in the word "gymnasium", which is derived from gymnos, "naked" (Matt. xxv. 36, 38, 43), "bare" (I Cor. xv. 37), and "exercise" (Heb. v. 14). It must be perfectly obvious that if we at this distance can perceive some incongruity in the thought of anyone "wrestling" in complete "armour", the apostle was fully alive to it also.

One commentator cuts the Gordian knot by asserting simply that the word "wrestling" must mean in this one instance "fighting". Such a method cannot, however, be allowed. Truth will not be served by twisting the meaning of words to suit our conception of what is right and fitting, but by humbly bowing to the Divine choice of word and type, and patiently seeking a scriptural reason for the apparent difficulty. We therefore leave Eph. vi. for the moment to gather information elsewhere in the epistles of Paul.

Let us look again at II Tim. ii. The apostle passes easily from the figure of the "soldier" to the "athlete". The word translated "strive for masteries" is athleo, and is found only in this chapter. The great "fight of afflictions" of Heb. x. 32 is athlesis, and the context is entirely devoted to the alternatives of "going on unto perfection" or of "drawing back unto waste" (for this translation see Matt. xxvi. 8). Sunathleo is found only in Phil. i. 27 and iv. 3 where it is translated "striving together for the faith of the gospel" and, "laboured with me in the gospel". Now II Timothy is the epistle of the "crown", Philippians the epistle of the "prize", and Hebrews the epistle concerning those who, like Caleb and Joshua, being over 20 years of age, nevertheless "ran with patience the race set before them".

The only features which the apostle brings forward in II Timothy as characteristic of the "good soldier" equally characterize the "athlete", the "wrestler", and the "runner". With this fact evident before us, are we not compelled to admit that this self-same limitation is intended in Eph. vi., and that we must there, as elsewhere, see the contender in the games, the wrestler, and the overcomer?

Perhaps the word that sums up the idea more clearly than any other is "endure". It comes in two forms in II Tim. ii. "Endure hardness" and "Suffer trouble" of verses 3 and 9 are translations of kakopatheo, which recurs in iv. 5 and links the ministry of the evangelist with the service of the soldier and the endurance of the athlete. In chapter iv. is a very definite wielding of the sword of the Spirit which required all the courage of the soldier and the endurance of the athlete.

The other word for endure in chapter ii. is found in verses 10 and 12: "I endure" and "If we suffer, we shall also reign with Him." This Greek word is hupomeno, literally "to remain under": as the noun hupomone it is translated "patience". Patiently enduring evil is apparently one of the last thoughts of those militant wagers of prayer warfare, whose demands and assertions in "prayer" have to be heard to be believed possible. Note the contrast between the fervid and well-nigh frenzied language used at one of these meetings (when the air is being cleansed of satanic powers, or the deliverance of a dupe of the devil is afoot) with the "bearing up under evil" and the "gentleness" and "meekness" which is the scriptural requirement of II Tim. ii. 24-26.

In II Tim. iv. 7 the apostle says: "I have fought a good fight." The word "fight" is agon, and "to fight" is agonizomai. The same is true of I Tim. vi. 12: "Fight the good fight of faith", where agon and agonizomai are used. Heb. xii. 1 uses the same word agon, where it is translated "race": "Let us run with patience the race that is set before us." The next verse speaking of Christ as the "finisher" of faith, finds an exact parallel in the words of II Tim. iv. 7: "I have finished my course." Here the word "course" is dromos, which still survives in the word "hippodrome", originally a "racecourse for horses".

Every added piece of information is leading to one conclusion, viz., that the word "wrestle" in Eph. vi. is in harmony with the dominant idea, and that the imagery of the armour must be adjusted to the thought of the athlete, and not overweighed with military conceptions. This entirely harmonizes not only with the references to the "fight" which we have just seen, but to the usage of "armour" which we observed in the previous article.

We must ask the reader to turn once more to these passages in Timothy, for their contexts are illuminating. In chapter iii. 7 the apostle speaks of the "snare of the devil", which was connected with the manifest practice of the faith. In vi. 9 he refers to the "snare and temptation" again, this time speaking of those who would be rich. Urging Timothy to flee these things, he continues: "Fight the good fight of faith, lay hold on eternal life." What are we to understand the apostle to mean here? Has he departed from his own teaching that eternal life is a fight? That cannot be. Moreover, the same teaching reappears in verses 17-19. There "uncertain riches" are set aside, and the riches of "good works" are urged in their stead, that by these a good foundation against the time to come may be laid up, and "that they may lay hold on eternal life". Here we are evidently in the realm of Philippians. Here is one who is "working out" the salvation already received. This exhortation is followed by another: "O Timothy, keep that which is committed to thy trust" (I Tim. vi. 20). This is exactly parallel with the closing words of II Tim. iv. 7: "I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith"; and we have already seen a close connection between Christ as the "Finisher of the faith" and Paul as the "finisher of the course".

The more we pursue this theme the more the evidence accumulates that the "fight" of Eph. vi. is the faithful maintaining against all odds of the glorious "deposit" of truth revealed in Eph. i. 3-14. We have shown in earlier numbers that the structure of Ephesians places "all spiritual blessings" (i. 3-14) over against "the panoply of God" and "spiritual wickednesses" (vi.), and that the "worked in" power of Eph. i. 19 is the "worked out" power of Eph. vi. 13. We must now leave this evidence with the reader, and pass on to the consideration of the attack that is in view in the conflict of Eph. vi.

The whole armour of God is provided so that the believer shall be able to stand against the wiles of the devil, and in particular the shield of faith is given wherewith to quench all the fiery darts of the wicked. What are these wiles? If the reader has consulted the writings of a certain school of teaching, he will know that the human mind and spirit are put upon the dissecting table, and the possibilities of demon control over every avenue is so insisted upon, that we can well believe that some timid readers would immediately develop half the mental diseases described. Our process is simpler, for we seek to know what God has written, and would stop where He has stopped. Now the word "wiles" is the translation of the Greek word methodeia, and as this word occurs only here and in

Eph. iv. 14, we cannot expect to understand Paul's second reference if we ignore the first. While the first reference is in a context sad beyond words, there is nothing of the demonism so often associated with the wiles of the devil in Eph. vi., except as will be explained presently. Let us read iv.14:--

> "In order that we may be no longer babes, being tossed and whirled about with every wind of doctrine, which is in the dice-throwing of men, in cunning craftiness with a view to systematized deceit."

We have translated methodeia "systematized". There is somewhat warrant for the freer rendering, "lie in wait to deceive", for Aquila so uses methodeus when translating Exod. xxi. 13. There is certainly a "tossing" and a "whirling" mentioned, but not in the sense of a person possessed or demented. The meaning of the "tossing" and the "whirling" is explained as the result of that itching ear which cannot endure sound doctrine, but is carried away by any new "ism" engineered by seducing spirits with their doctrines of demons. This is where to look for the "wiles" of the devil and the attack of demons. Instead sometimes of spending several hours agonizing in prayer that the meeting-place may be cleansed from all the power of the enemy, it might be more effective if, say, the hymnbooks with their erroneous doctrine had been quietly destroyed. It is in the realm of false doctrine that the wiles of the devil are to be discovered. In chapter iv. these "wiles" are not overcome by fighting, but by attaining to the measure of the perfect man, by being no longer children, by growing up into Christ in all things, by putting off the old man, by putting on the new, by putting off the lie, and by speaking the truth, and by so walking in the power of that new life that no place shall be given to the devil.

We are now once more at the starting point. The soldier is the full-grown man. The conflict is around the truth entrusted to us; the object of the attack is to rob the believer of his crown. Satan has no power over that life which is hid with Christ in God, and the believer is as secure as those who were hidden in the secret place of the Most High. The sphere of possible gain or loss is in the experimental outworking of the truth. There one may be exhorted to "Lay hold on eternal life"; there one may heed the warning, "Hold fast . . . . . that no man take thy crown", or as Paul has written to us: "Beware lest any man make a prey of you . . . . . Let no man deprive you of your prize" (Col. ii. 8, 18). The only way to meet this attack is the scriptural one, and any that cannot stand the test of "chapter and verse" should be rejected absolutely. What is the repeated safeguard of Col. ii.?

> "Beware lest any man spoil you through philosophy and vain deceit, after the tradition of men, after the rudiments of the world, and not AFTER CHRIST, for in Him dwelleth all the fullness of the Godhead bodily, and ye are filled to the full in Him, which is the Head of all principality and power . . . . . having spoiled principalities and powers, He made a show of them openly, triumphing over them in it. Let no man therefore judge you . . . . . which are a shadow . . . . . but the body is of Christ."

Here it will be seen that in opposition to these spoiled agents of the wicked one the believer stands in all the fullness of Christ. Moreover, these spoiled principalities are engaged in fastening upon the One Body the shadows of the past—fasts, feasts, sabbaths, or prohibitions such as “Touch not, taste no, handle not”, which, by engendering a spurious sanctity, but minister to the satisfying of the flesh. The whole armour of God can be summed up in the words of Col. iii. 11, “Christ is all”.

The “evil day” of Eph. vi. 13 may be but one of the “evil days” of Eph. v. 16. As there is a future day of redemption (iv. 30), so there may be a future evil day for which the present is a period of training, but of this we have no knowledge, and therefore we prefer to wait for light. We do know that upon the entry of Israel into their possessions one decisive victory took place, viz., the overthrow of Jericho, and that by faith and not by fighting. The analogy may hold good. There is yet to be war in the heavens between Michael and the dragon, but where Scripture is silent we cannot speak.

There is no thought in Eph. vi. of the soldier fighting to obtain victory. That kind of doctrine suits the devil well, for it disguises the fact that he is already conquered, and that the believer, in Christ, is already “more than conquerors”. Praying and wrestling for victory are similar to the O.T. instance of Hagar and Ishmael dying with thirst, with a well of water hard by. The resurrection and ascension of Christ spoiled “principalities and powers”, “led captivity captive”, placed all things under the feet of Christ, and seated the church in the heavenlies.

The soldier of Christ “stands” for all the truth of God against the lie, and in season and out of season he wields the sword of the Spirit by “preaching the Word”. We shall not serve the truth by going into more detail, and will leave these facts of Scripture with the reader, praying that both reader and writer may be led into all the truth, and that all that is ours in Christ we may “put on”. Then, by grace, “having worked out all”, may we stand.

A review, and sign of the times.

"The Royal Religion, a call to the Nations."
pp. 13-15

A book entitled, "The Royal Religion, a call to the Nations" has been sent for review. In the ordinary way we should not give the book the space of a single line of type, but realizing that readers may profit by having their attention directed to these signs of the times, we draw attention to the following features:--

The cover of the book bears "The sign of the Royal Name", which is the word HATOV, arranged as a cross. Hatov is just Hebrew for "The Good", and is used throughout this book for God. The message of the book purports to be a series of visions given from heaven to "a devout man, a dreamer of dreams, who prayed continually for the consummation and the perfection of the kingdom of God upon earth". This prayer, so fully in line with the purpose of God, is likely to attract the attention of the Lord's people, and may entrap the unwary. We therefore draw attention to the following questions, which provide an acid test not only for this "Religion", but for all:--

1. What is the attitude of this "Religion" to Scripture? "The Holy Book, the Mother of three Great Religious denominations—Judaism, Christianity, Mohammedanism" (page 8).
2. What is its attitude to Christ? In the sixty pages of this book "Christ" does not occur ONCE! Not until we reach page 49 is the Lord mentioned at all, and then He is called "Jesus, the Prophet of Nazareth". This is the only reference to the Saviour and Son of God.
3. What is its attitude to atonement, the cross, the resurrection, and the second coming of Christ? The "Royal Religion" knows nothing at all about these fundamentals.

There is no need for us to go further—here is the gospel of Cain, and one of the many fore-runners of Antichrist. This will be readily seen by comparing Gen. iii. 5, "Ye shall be as God", and II Thess. ii. 3, 4, "The man of sin . . . . . as God", with the following quotations:--

> "The supreme being on earth—the human race" (page 21).
> "Man . . . . . the visible Creator and King on Earth" (pages 21, 57).
> "The man ascended the throne which was erected on the right hand of the Holy Throne of God. And the seven patron Angels surrounded him and crowned him as Visible Creator and King on earth; . . . . . made a little less than Divine, and crowned with glory and honour and made him Creator and trustee of His kingdom of Earth" (pages 30, 31).

Notice that all this is without the personal return or reign of the Lord Jesus Christ (I Cor. xv. 24-28).

The last Saturday and Sunday in the month are set aside for various Festivals, and "the Royal Seer" hears a voice which resounds all over the earth, saying:-- > "Remember and observe to keep the Sabbath Day and the Lord's Day Holy" (page 48). This is called the "The Hatov Sabbath."

> "Lastly, set apart a room for an Hatov Sanctuary, and an Assembly Place. Hang up the tablet of the Hatov Mystery on the East Wall and cover it with a veil with seven rings. The veil should have an inscription on it 'The Hidden One'."

Anyone who has access to Two Babylons" (by Hislop) can discover that Saturn was "The Hidden One", and Saturn has many names. He is Apis, the calf worshipped by Israel before Sinai. He is Pluto, god of the underworld. He is Satan Himself, and Saturday is a survival of his worship, being of course Saturn's day.

There is much more that might have been quoted, but all is in the same direction. It looks to man to accomplish what Christ alone can do. It places man where Scripture places Christ, and without being uncharitable we have no option but to repudiate the "Royal Religion" with the words of inspired truth.

> "But though we, or an angel from heaven, preach any other gospel unto you than that which we have preached unto you, let him be accursed" (Gal. i. 8).

On page 24 the Royal Seer tells us that he "rubbed his eyes and was astounded". What he really needs is that the Lord should open his blind eyes to see his sinnership, and need of the Saviour, His cross and His resurrection, for in spite of the repeated emphasis throughout the book of "The Name" (Hatov), it still stands written:--

> "There is none other name under heaven given among men, whereby we must be saved" (Acts iv. 12).

"Now learn a parable of the fig tree."
p. 175

> "A new Jewish sect has been recently established on the eastern border of Poland, near Vilna, with headquarters at Kucewicze, its adherents numbering, it is stated, about 15,000."
>
> "It has been decided to form a Jewish Church, recognizing the deity of Christ, and also to study the New Testament, adhering, however, to the general rabbinical regulations."
>
> "The recent development of this and other sects is an entirely new feature in Poland, where until lately any movement of this kind has always been extremely insignificant.—Reuter." (Daily Telegraph, 11/10/28).

The seven churches of Asia resemble in constitution the church of Pentecost, and are Jewish in character.

The above suggestive movement in Poland is but another sign that the dispensation of the grace of God to the Gentiles, nears its close. Now is our hope nearer than when we believed.

"When they will not endure sound doctrine."
p. 175

> "Young people of to-day", said the Rev. A. G. Simpson, "want us to stand up to things and argue in the light of all that comes from modern science and philosophy."
> "The more we escape from, and deliberately renounce, a scheme of theology which cannot be justified in the light of modern thinking, and preach that Christianity mainly means a belief in the Fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man, and would apply that to the problems of our time, we shall do something for our generation." (Daily Chronicle, 11/7/29).

This statement made at the United Methodist Conference at Halifax, on 10th July, 1929, is a symptom of the last days. The prevalent unbelief and the compromise everywhere advocated is after all but a confirmation of the truth that is being denied. II Tim. iv. is being fulfilled before our eyes. Let us seek to fulfil its exhortations and commands.

"What is man?"

#1. The usage of "soul" in Gen. i. and ii. considered.
pp. 17 - 21

Readers of The Berean Expositor know that while all Scripture is our legitimate province, the peculiar testimony of the dispensation of the mystery is our primary witness and occupies the bulk of our available space. Such subjects, however, as the doctrine of Scripture regarding sin, redemption, and the deity of Christ have necessarily claimed our earnest attention. Among the doctrines that have been approached is that which deals with the nature of man, and in Volume I appeared an article entitled: "What saith the Scripture concerning the immortality of the soul?" This article gave some of the evidence of Scripture concerning the true nature of the soul, and shewed that such expressions as "immortal soul" and "never-dying soul" are found nowhere in Scripture. Since then, however, other themes have pressed for attention, and this important study has been held over.

It is a sad fact that we are all liable to uncharitable judgments on our fellows, and, lacking love, we oftentimes lack logic too; and some have not hesitated to affirm that, because we do not believe in the immortality of the soul, we must necessarily endorse the most extreme views of those materialistic and Unitarian teachers who happen to believe the same thing as to the soul as we do. Our defence, however, will be in the prosecution of our study in the true Berean spirit, and we therefore propose a more thorough investigation than we have hitherto given of the scriptural teaching concerning the nature of man.

The soul.

As Volume I is now obtainable (having been reprinted), we will not go over the ground there covered, except to recapitulate for the sake of clearness. The following quotations, we trust, will suffice to put the facts before us:--

> "The word which the A.V. Old Testament has rendered "soul" is the Hebrew word nephesh. Nephesh occurs 754 times in the Hebrew of the Old Testament. In the A.V. and R.V. It is translated "soul" 472 times, whilst in the remaining 282 places it is represented by 44 different words and phrases. The English word "soul" is in every occurrence the rendering of the Hebrew nephesh, except in Job xxx. 15 and Isa. lvii. 16.
> Turning to the New Testament we find that the word rendered "soul" is the Greek word psuche. This word occurs in the A.V. 103 times; 58 times it is rendered "soul," 40 times "life," 3 times "mind," once "heart," and once "heartily." No other word but psuche is translated "soul" in the A.V. New Testament.
> The reader is now in possession of the simple facts of the case; we have but to examine these 857 passages, and we have a full, perfect, and authoritative statement by the Creator and Redeemer of the soul of man as to its nature."

Little more was done in the article referred to in Volume I than to show that the Scriptures do not teach that the soul is immortal. We must now acquaint ourselves with what the Scriptures do teach.

Nephesh in Gen. i.

> "The moving creature that hath life (margin soul)" (Gen. i. 20).
> "Every living creature (lit. living soul) that moveth" (Gen. i. 21).
> "The earth bring forth the living creature" (Gen. i. 24).
> "Everything . . . . . wherein (there is) life (margin living soul)" (Gen. i. 30).

Here are the four occurrences of nephesh in Gen. i., and these demand our attention.

First let us note that the LXX consistently renders this word in each case by the Greek psuche. There is need here, as at all times, to verify references. If we accept the marginal reference in Gen. i. 20, A.V., we shall be certain that the word "life" there is nephesh. This we can confirm by the margin of The Companion Bible where the note reads: "life=soul. Heb. nephesh." Nevertheless we have to declare that neither authority is strictly true. "Life" in Gen. i. 20 is the Hebrew word chaiyah, and the exact note to Gen. i. 20 should state that the word "life" stands for two Hebrews words—chaiyah nephesh. It is also well to remember that, whereas in verse 21 the word "creature" is the translation of nephesh ("soul"), in verse 20 "creature" is the translation in a different Hebrew word. In the last reference, the A.V. translated nephesh chaiyah by one word, "life", which is liable to be misleading. In this chapter "life" is already the rendering of chaiyah. That it is not a suitable rendering of nephesh chaiyah is made evident by translating Gen. i. 30 similarly, "Wherein there is living life" or "life of life". If one objects that the translation, "wherein there is soul of life" or "soul life" is not much better, it will nevertheless have the merit of presenting the facts of the case, before formulating a theory, and also be in harmony with the LXX which reads:--

> "Ho echei en heauto psuche zoes"—
> "Which has in itself soul of life."

"Soul" is predicated in this chapter of "creeping creatures" brought forth by the waters (verse 20), "great whales" (verse 21)—elsewhere called "serpents" (Exod. vii. 9), "dragons" (Deut. xxxii. 33), and "sea-monsters" (Lam. iv. 3)—"cattle", "creeping thing", "beast of the earth" (verse 25) and finally,

> "Every beast of the earth, and every fowl of the air, and everything that creepeth upon the earth, wherein there is soul life, or living soul" (verse 30).

We must not fail to observe another fact. Scripture does use the expression, "wherein there is living soul or soul life"; and if Scripture sees no contradiction in saying that these creatures are living souls and that they have living soul in them, neither must we.

Some translations, like Spurrell's, read in verse 30: "breath of life", because, we suppose, nephesh (soul) is cognate with naphach (to breathe). As this phrase, "the breath of life", is a translation already in use for an entirely different set of Hebrews words, it is not to be commended.

Nephesh in Gen. ii.

> "Man became a living soul" (Gen. ii. 7).
> "Adam called every living creature" (Gen. ii. 19).

It is easy for us to point to this passage (ii. 7) as evidence of bias on the part of our translators and to ask why the English reader is led to believe that man differs from the beast and creeping thing. Similarly it is easy in the blindness that pride, even of the truth, can bring, to fall into the equality fatal error of saying that man is nothing more than the beasts that perish. Let us observe one or two facts that are to be found in these two chapters.

> Man is undoubtedly a living soul. Cattle and creeping things and great whales are also as undoubtedly living souls. To stay here, however, is to be content with but half the truth, which, as the poet says, is "ever the blackest of lies".

In chapter i., where the animals are called "living souls", man is not so called. When man is to be made, God does not say, "Let the earth bring forth", but:--

> "Let us make man in our image after our likeness: and let them have dominion . . . . . so God created man in His own image, and in the image of God created He him, male and female created He them" (Gen. i. 26, 27).

Is it necessary, when repudiating the error of the immortality of the soul, to plunge into the equal error of denying all that is implied by this deliberation of God at the creation of man? While man and beast are alike "living souls", man alone was created in the image of God. In Gen. ii. 7 we have the additional statement, not mentioned in Gen. i. 27, concerning the "breath of life" (to a consideration of which we must devote a separate paper).

Again, an essential difference between man and the rest of creation is evident from Gen. ii. 18-23. God said, "I will make a help meet for him". Kinagado, the word translated "meet", means "corresponding to him", literally "according to his front-presence" (see Lloyd's Analysis). The LXX uses two expressions; in verse 18 it reads kat'autou, "suitable to him", "in harmony with him", and, in verse 20, homoios auto, "like to himself". All this is in direct contrast to the animal creation that passed before Adam's view and it impressed upon him that he stood separated from every other living soul by virtue of the likeness and image of his Maker. There is more in this passage than we can well speak of publicly. Sufficient, however, has been said for our purpose.

Were there two Adams?

Before leaving this passage we ought to deal briefly with the suggestion put forward by many students of Scripture, that the differences in the creation of man and woman, as recorded in Gen. i. 26-28 and in Gen. ii. 18-25, shew that two different men are intended. If the second mention in chapter ii. indicates a different creation, then, the reference to the forming of every beast and fowl in ii. 19 might also indicate a separate creation, differing from that of Gen. i.; but we need not multiply arguments, for the apostle Paul has settled the matter once and for all.

Gen. i. 27 tells us that Adam was made in the image of God and that male and female were included under that one common name. Gen. ii. 7 omits all reference to the image, and speaks of Adam as being taken from the earth, and made a living soul, and gives details concerning the making of Eve. Now the Adam of Rom. v. 12-14 is the Adam of Gen. ii. and iii., without peradventure. So is the Adam of I Cor. xv. 22 & 45, and I Tim. ii. 12-14. In I Cor. xi. the priority of creation undoubtedly refers to Gen. ii., but in the same chapter (I Cor. xi. 7) Paul has no hesitation in referring back to Gen. i. 26, 27. To Paul the Adam of Gen. ii. was "the first man Adam" (I Cor. xv. 45).

Psa. viii. refers back to Gen. i., and there is not the slightest suggestion that the Psalmist is thinking of any other man than the Adam who is the father of the race (Gen. v.), and of the same flesh and blood as ourselves (Heb. ii. 5, 6, 14). Gen. ix. 6 most clearly refers to the Adam of Gen. i., and the genealogy of Luke ends with the words:--

> "The son of Seth, which was the son of Adam, which was the son of God" (Luke iii. 38).

There is another consideration connected with these early chapters of Genesis. It is God (Elohim) Who created man in His own image (Gen. i. 26, 27); it is the Lord God (Jehovah Elohim) Who formed man in Gen. ii. 7. The same argument that would make two distinct Adams would as well make two distinct Creators. So far as we are concerned, the problem does not exist. We have in Gen. i. the broad outline, and in Gen. ii. more intimate details of one important section of the self-same creation.

The doctrine of Romans and Corinthians is vitally connected with Adam, and we must not allow any speculations of this kind to imperil its clearness and its force. The same reasoning that demands two Adams by the differences in Gen. i. and ii. could also demand two Noahs as guided by the Higher Critics with their Elohistic and Jehovistic sections. Gen. vi. 19 simply says of the animals that were to enter the ark: "two of every sort . . . . . male and female." In Gen. vii. 2, 3 an additional instruction is given: "of every clean beast thou shalt take to thee by sevens." This is but expanding in fuller detail the original command.

Here we must stay. In our next paper we hope to consider the special bearing upon the status of man of the reference to "the breath of life".

#2. The breath of life.
pp. 65 - 69

In our previous article we saw that man, equally with lower creation, is called "a living soul", but we also saw enough in the record of Gen. i. 26-28 to prevent us from concluding that he was that and nothing more. It is sometimes said that "man is like the beasts that perish", but we should remember that the full statement is: "Man that is in honour, and understandeth not, is like the beasts that perish" (Psa. xlix. 12, 20), which is a somewhat different thought. Eph. iv. 17, 18 says of the Gentiles, that they have "the understanding darkened, being alienated from the life of God through the ignorance that is in them", which cannot be true of the lower creation.

When writing the article previously quoted from Volume I, and confining ourselves largely to the usage and meaning of nephesh = "soul", we referred to Gen. vii. 21, 22 as using the expression "the breath of life" both of man, cattle and creeping thing. This, however, was too general in its sweep, and while it is true that both man and beast "have all one breath" (ruach), there is in Gen. vii. 21, 22 another word which seems peculiar to man alone, and therefore establishes an essential difference.

N'shamah.

This word n'shamah is generally translated "breath" or "breathe" in the A.V. its other renderings being "blast", "inspiration", "soul" and "spirit". The word occurs 24 times, and we believe in 23 of the occurrences man only is the subject. The one passage which demands a more lengthy analysis is Gen. vii. 21, 22.

We propose, therefore, to pass in review the 23 passages, and then consider Gen. vii. 21, 22 to see whether this particular word does, or does not, mark off man from all other creatures. For easy reference we will number each occurrence. Appendix 16 of The Companion Bible gives all references.

1. "And breathed into his nostrils the breath of life and man became a living soul" (Gen. ii. 7).—It may be queried who it is that is said to breathe, God or Adam, for the pronoun "he" does not decide the question. This breath is by the nostrils, and therefore differs in nothing from that of the lower creatures. Be the answers to these questions what they may, here is the introduction of something special in the process of creation, something quite exceptional, occurring nowhere in the record of Gen. i., but finding somewhat of a parallel in the equally distinctive pause and counsel of Gen. i. 26.

2. "Thou shalt save alive nothing that breatheth" (Deut. xx. 16).—We know that sometimes both man and beast were destroyed by the advancing Israelites, as was the case at Jericho. But when taking the next city, Ai, Israel were, by divine command, expressly told to spare the cattle. "And thou shalt do to Ai and her king as thou didst unto Jericho and her king: only the spoil thereof, and the cattle thereof shall ye take for a prey." If we insist that n'shamah in Deut. xx. 16 must include cattle, we introduce a serious problem, but if we leave it to mean man, all is harmony. A glance at Deut. xx. 17, 18 will strengthen this view, for it immediately goes on to enumerate those who were to be utterly destroyed, namely, the Canaanites, and the reason given is "that they teach you not, etc.".

3. "So Joshua . . . . . utterly destroyed all that breathed" (Josh. x. 40).—This is parallel with No. 2.

4 and 5. "There was not any left to breathe . . . . . and all the . . . . . cattle, the children of Israel took for a prey unto themselves: but every man they smote with the edge of the sword . . . . . neither left they any to breathe" (Josh. xi. 11-14).—Here the meaning of n'shamah is obvious. None were left that "breathed", yet all the cattle were spared. According to the true meaning of this word, therefore, cattle did not "breathe".

6. "The blast of the breath (ruach) of His nostrils" (II Sam. xxii. 16).—The reference here is to God, and needs no comment.

7. "He smote all the house of Jeroboam, he left not to Jeroboam any that breathed" (I Kings xv. 29).—This is the fulfillment of the word of Abijah, given in I Kings xiv. 10-14, where the actual descendants of Jeroboam are in view.

8. "There was no breath left in him" (I Kings xvii. 17).—The widow's son is referred to here.

9. "By the blast of God they perish" (Job iv. 9).

10. "Whose spirit came from thee" (Job xxvi. 4).—Spoken to men.

11. "All the while my breath is in me, and the spirit of God is in my nostrils" (Job xxvii. 3).

12. "There is a spirit in man, and the inspiration of the Almighty giveth them understanding" (Job xxxii. 8).—This and the following passages we shall have to consider more fully: for the time we pass them by; they have no reference to the beast, but very intimately connect man with God.

13. "The spirit of God hath made me, and the breath of the Almighty hath given me life" (Job xxxiii. 4).

14. "If He gather unto Himself His spirit and His breath" (Job xxxiv. 14).

15. "By the breath of God frost is given" (Job xxxvii. 10).

16. "At the blast of the breath of Thy nostrils" (Psa. xviii. 15).

17. "Let everything that hath breath praise the Lord" (Psa. cl. 6).—In Psa. cxlviii. the heavens, angels, and all His hosts, sun, moon and stars, waters, dragons and all deeps, cattle and creeping thing, as well as man, are all called upon to praise the Lord, but "everything that hath breath" does not occur there. In Psa. cl., however, man alone is in view throughout, and we force the lower creation unwarrantably into this Psalm if we make "everything that hath breath" go beyond its scriptural connotation.

18. "The spirit of man is the lamp of the Lord" (Prov. xx. 27).

19. "Cease ye from man whose breath is in his nostrils" (Isa. ii. 22).

20. "The breath of the Lord, like a stream of brimstone, doth kindle it" (Isa. xxx. 33).

21. "He that giveth breath unto the people" (Isa. xlii. 5).

22. "The spirit should fail before Me, and the souls that I have made" (Isa. lvii. 16).

23. "Neither is there breath left in me" (Dan. x. 17).

Here are 23 of the 24 occurrences of n'shamah. There are at least eight passages in the above list where the n'shamah spoken of is God's. No. 1 may or may not refer to God, but the parallel in No. 21 is highly suggestive. If we include this there are nine occurrences which refer to God.

A reference to Nos. 11, 12, 14 and 22 shows a close connection between n'shamah and ruach, spirit. This connection is important in more ways than one. It shews that the word are not identical, and therefore it does not follow that all who have ruach must necessarily have n'shamah. No. 16 uses the phrase "the n'shamah of the ruach", which may prove of service later. Nos. 12 and 18 shew a close connection between n'shamah and understanding and conscience—the latter so called because it is a "consciouness of God".

As we allow these facts to weigh with us it becomes more difficult to believe that all this distinctiveness is overset in Gen. vii. 21, 22. As the passage reads in the A.V. it certainly does look as though "the breath of life" could be predicated of all, both man and beast. Let us, however, search and see. Let us first of all compare the A.V. with the R.V.:--

> "And all flesh died that moved upon the earth, both of fowl, and of cattle, and of beast, and of every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth, and every man. All in whose nostrils was the breath of life, of all that was in the dry land, died" (A.V.).
> "And all flesh died that moved upon the earth, both fowl, and cattle, and beast, and every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth, and every man: all in whose nostrils was the breath of the spirit of life, of all that was in the dry land, died" (R.V.).

It will be noticed that whereas the A.V. has the word "of" before fowl, cattle, beast, and creeping thing, the R.V. omits it. The A.V. is truer here, inasmuch as it seeks to give effect to a distinction that is found in the Hebrew. Where "of" occurs in the A.V. the Hebrew particle beth occurs, and this particle is generally translated "in". It will be noticed that there is no "of" before "every man". Whatever the true translation may be, the point for the moment is, that even in this particular, man is separated from the beasts. The R.V. reveals the presence of the word "spirit" as well as "breath" here. The expression "the n'shamah of the ruach" is the same as that used in Nos. 6 and 16 of the list of quotations given above, where the reference is to God.

As the passage stands in the A.V. it appears that we are told twice over that all died: "And all flesh died"; "of all that was in the dry land died." The word "of" in the second of these passages is not the same word as those already alluded to. It means "from" and sometimes suggests some out of a number. The translation suggested by Dr. E. P. Woodward, whose researches along this line have been of considerable help, is as follows:--

> "And all flesh died that moved upon the earth (namely, all flesh), in fowl, and in cattle, and in beast, and in every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth. And every man (all in whose nostrils was the breath of the spirit of life, from among all that was on the dry land) died."

This translation, though perhaps inelegant, does recognize several features that are blurred in the A.V., and their recognition leads to a distinction between the animals that were destroyed in the flood, and man. In Gen. vii. 15, where there is no doubt that only animals are enumerated, we read: "And they went in unto Noah into the ark, two and two of all flesh wherein is the breath (ruach, not n'shamah) of life." It would not be true to say that "all flesh" was exclusively used of the animals at the time of the flood, but the full expression "all flesh wherein is the ruach of life" appears to be used of the animals to the exclusion of man, while the other expression "n'shamah of the ruach of life" does appear to be used of man to the exclusion of the animals. This being so, we have the testimony of these twenty-four passages to prove that while man is physically a member of the animal kingdom, he is severed from that kingdom by something distinctive, the image and likeness of God, the personal touch of God at his creation, the possession of the n'shamah, the breath of the spirit of life. This leaves the question of the immortality of the soul untouched.

#3. Are "spirit" and "breath" synonymous?
pp. 101 - 104

Two words, the one Hebrew, ruach, and the other Greek, pneuma, are translated both "spirit" and "breath". It will be seen therefore that the answer to the above question receives at least a partial answer. Ruach most certainly does mean "breath", but the question to which we seek an answer is not whether ruach ever means "breath", but whether it is true that it never means anything else. In other words, where the A.V. (in 232 cases) translates the word ruach by "spirit", we should understand simply the meaning "breath"? There is only one way to discover the true answer, and that is patiently to search the Scriptures in a spirit of prayerful submission to the Holy Word.

The first occurrence of the word is that of Gen. i. 2: "And the Spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters." Can we limit the word here to "breath" or "wind"? A superficially parallel passage may be found in Gen. viii. 1, where we read: "And God made a wind to pass over the earth, and the waters assuaged." But we must search more carefully before we come to a conclusion.

Consider the bearing of the following passages upon this question:--

> "The Spirit (ruach) of God hath made me, and the breath (n'sjamah) of the Almighty hath given me life" (Job xxxiii. 4).

Here is an evident reference to Gen. ii. 7, and a recognition of its two parts:--

> "And the Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground." \
> "The Spirit of God hath made me." /
> "And breathed into his nostrils the breath of life." \
> "And the breath of the Almighty hath given me life." /

Here it is most evident that "breath" and "spirit" are not synonymous.

Again, Job says in xxvi. 13: "By His Spirit He hath garnished the heavens; His hand hath formed the crooked serpent" (i.e., the constellation so called). And in Job xxvii. 3, 4 he says: "All the while my breath (n'shamah) is in me, and the Spirit (ruach) of God is in my nostrils; my lips shall not speak wickedness, nor my tongue utter deceit." With this we should read Psa. xxxiii. 6: "By the word of the Lord were the heavens made, and all the host of them by the breath (ruach) of His mouth." By reading these three passages together we arrive at the conclusion that the Spirit of God and the spirit of man here are very essentially associated with speech. It is so in Job xxvii. 3, 4 and it may be seen by comparing Job xxvi. 13 with Psa. xxxiii. 6. Turning back to Gen. i. and ii. we find this close association suggested in the opening verses: "The Spirit of God moved . . . . . and God said" (Gen. i. 2, 3).

Following the record of creation, there is a constant emphasis upon this creative word (see verses 6, 9, 11, 14, 20, 24, 26, 28 and 29). This creative word, according to Job, is "the Spirit of God" in creative power; according to Psa. xxxiii. 6, it is the creative breath of His mouth, which is also called "the Word of the Lord".

It will be seen therefore that while we believe "spirit" and "breath" to be interchangeable, this by no means allows us to assume that "spirit" and "breath" are synonymous in our acceptation of the words.

The spirit of man.

It may be objected by the reader, that we are departing from the title of this series, viz., "What is Man?" but this is not so, as the establishing of the true meaning of ruach demands a wider field of search in order to institute comparisons. There must be some one common factor that is true both of "breath" and "spirit", which seems to be the sense of an "invisible force". Just as "water", "bread", "fruit", etc., have their spiritual counterparts, justified by some common factor, so breath and spirit having something in common are both good translations of ruach. We have never yet found anyone insisting that the "water" of life must of necessity be chemically composed of hydrogen and oxygen, or that the "bread" of life must be made of wheaten flour. Christ Himself could say, "My meat is to do the will of Him that sent Me", using the word "meat" in exactly the same way.

Man "became a living soul", according to Gen. ii. 7, not at the moment that he was formed of the dust of the ground, but after some further work of creative power had been performed. There, in Gen. ii. 7, we have discovered that it is the gift of n'shamah, which man does not share with the brute creation. Here we shall find that ruach is a wider term embracing all that live, whether possessing the more exclusive n'shamah of life or not.

There is an old difficulty that is continually cropping up in new forms. Because animals have ruach and man has ruach, the argument has been put forward that men are no better than the brute of creation; but stay, God also has ruach. Can we dare go on with this argument?

We shall have to be pardoned by those who appreciate this point, for the sake of those who do not. Take the following argument: "Devon is in England; I am in England; therefore I am in Devon." As a matter of fact these words are being written in Essex. The fault in this argument lies in the failure to realize that the term "England" is a much wider one than "Devon". Both "Devon" and "Essex" can be in "England" without necessitating the conclusion, "Therefore Devon and Essex are synonymous terms". Change the names to ruach and n'shamah, beast and man. Animals are within the sphere of ruach; man, angels and even God Himself are within the sphere of ruach, but this does not prove that they are all on one common level any more than the former argument proved that Devon and Essex were the same. We have purposely avoided the set phraseology of logic—those who are logicians do not need it.

We must now extend the limits of our survey, for Old and New Testaments have points of teaching that should be considered together. Happily there is no need to demonstrate that the N.T. equivalent for ruach is the Greek word pneuma, and so we shall, without further explanation, quote either word. Let us look at some of the statements of Scripture as to the spirit of man:--

> "Your whole spirit and soul and body" (I Thess. v. 23).
> "The spirit of man which is in him" (I Cor. ii. 11).
> "The spirits of just men made perfect" (Heb. xii. 23).
> "Then shall the dust return to the earth as it was; and the spirit shall return unto God Who gave it" (Eccles. xii. 7).
> "The Lord which . . . . . formeth the spirit of man within him" (Zech. xii. 1).

Each passage quoted demands separate study, and all we can do at the moment is to draw attention to certain obvious facts, viz., that "spirit" is spoken of as part of a "whole" man; that spirit is "in him" and "formed within him"; that at death the spirit returns to God Who gave it, and in resurrection the spirits of just men are made perfect. A disembodied spirit is entirely outside the scriptural account of the condition of man.

The spirit of man is associated with mind, courage, anger, knowledge. We read that Esau's wives were "a grief of mind" to Isaac and Rebecca. Could anyone be found who would demand the translation, "grief of breath"? So with Prov. xxix. 11; Ezek. xi. 5; xx. 32.

Paul makes use of the fact that man has a "spirit in him" which is connected with conscience and inner knowledge: "For what man knoweth the things of man, save the spirit of man which is in him? even so the things of God knoweth no man, but the Spirit of God" (I Cor. ii. 11).

We purposely refrain from including such passages as Rom. viii. 16, "The Spirit . . . . . beareth witness with our spirit", for these refer not to man by nature but under grace and in possession of a new nature called "spirit", which is quite another subject. All that we hope to have accomplished is to have drawn attention to the fact that the belief that man does not put on immortality until resurrection, and the repudiation of the doctrine of the immortality of the soul, do not necessitate the denial that man has "a spirit in him", and that both by creation and by destiny he is far removed from the brute creation, and indeed is "for a little lower than the angels".

#4. "A little lower than the angels" (Psa. viii. 5).
pp. 139 - 143

There are two Psalms in which David asks and answers the question, "What is man?"

> "Lord, what is man, that Thou takest knowledge of him! or the son of man, that Thou makest account of him! Man is like to vanity, his days are as a shadow that passeth away" (Psa. cxliv. 3, 4).

But instead of this conclusion leading David to consider that man has no place in the scheme of things, and that his little world and span are but a drop in the ocean, it causes him immediately to call upon the Lord: "Bow Thy heavens, O Lord, and come down, touch the mountains and they shall smoke" (verse 5). And all this with the object of delivering one who at first sight was of so little account.

When we turn to the other Psalm of David where this question occurs, we find even less reason for unscripturally belittling man:--

> "When I consider Thy heavens, the work of Thy fingers, the moon and the stars, which Thou hast ordained, What is man, that Thou art mindful of him? and the son of man, that Thou visitest him?" (Psalm viii. 3, 4).

Unless we give good heed to the actual teaching of this Psalm, we are liable to become the victims of a false comparison. When man looks away from himself to the vastness of the heavens, the myriads, the immensity of it all is overwhelming, yet is the pessimism of the poet not justified when he wrote:--

> "Stately purpose, valour in battle, splendid annals of army and fleet, > Death for the right cause, death for the wrong cause, shouts of triumph, sighs of defeat.
> * * * * * * *
> Raving politics, never at rest while this poor earth's pale history runs:
> What is it all but the murmur of gnats in the gleam of a million million suns?"

Ecclesiastes expresses a similar thought. Because it ends in death, all such activity is vanity. This is a true conclusion, but the poet has been misled by the mere comparison of size and bulk, which is a false basis to work upon.

An astronomer, similarly overwhelmed by this irrelevant logic of size, as Fitchett aptly calls it in his Unrealized Logic of Religion, observed that if God dispatched one of His angels to discover this tiny planet, Earth, amongst all the glittering hosts of the stars, it would be like sending a child out upon some vast prairie to find a speck of sand at the root of a blade of grass. This would be very terrible if true, but in its implication it is false. Scripture does not speak of these millions of suns and planets, and the earth as one of them. Its constant language is "the heavens and the earth", with no thought concerning their disproportion so far as size is concerned. When dealing with moral worth, do we think in terms of inches and avoirdupois? Does not a mother's love regard the tiny babe at her breast as of incomparably more value than the great house in which she lives?

David was under no misapprehension in the matter when he uttered the words of Psa. viii. Instead of answering his question, "What is man?" as a modern pessimist would do, he looks at it in a God-taught way, and speaks of man's destiny and dominion. He does not speak of man's insignificance as compared with the vastness of the heavens, but he contemplates the moon and the stars, evidently with Gen. i. in mind, he sees that this vast fabric was made with man in view: that God was working out a purpose, and that the magnificence of that purpose puts the argument from relative size completely aside. David does not merely say "What is man?" but, "What is man that Thou art mindful of him, and visitest him?"

The word mindful, zakar, is used in connection with remembering a covenant:--

> "I will remember My covenant . . . . . that I may remember the everlasting covenant" (Gen. ix. 15, 16).
> "And God remembered His covenant" (Exod. ii. 24; also see vi. 5).
> "He will ever be mindful of His covenant . . . . . He hath commanded His covenant for ever" (Psa. cxi. 5 and 9).

From one point of view, man may partake of what is fleeting and insignificant, but it is in his relation to the purpose of the ages that his real position is seen. Israel were reminded of this principle:--

> "The Lord did not set His love upon you, nor choose you, because ye were more in number than any people; for ye were the fewest of all people: But because the Lord loved you, and because He would keep the oath which He had sworn unto your fathers" (Deut. vii. 7, 8).

The word visited, pagad, of Isa. viii. 4 naturally follows upon remembrance of the covenant:--

> "I will visit you, and perform My good word toward you" (Jer. xxix. 10).
> "Blessed be the Lord God of Israel; for He hath visited and redeemed His people . . . . . to perform the mercy promised to our fathers, and to remember His holy covenant . . . . . the Day-spring from on high hath visited us" (Luke i. 68-78).

David therefore in Psa. viii. has in view the fact that man is in covenant relationship with God, and in harmony with that fact is his place in the scheme of things.

In the background (verse 2) and the *sub*scription (which in the A.V. is wrongly placed as the *super*scription of Psa. ix., see The Companion Bible Appendixes 64 and 65, section XIII) is "the enemy and the avenger". Upon muth-labben means "death to the champion". This refers to the death of Goliath. In I Sam. xvii. 4 the "champion" is ish = "man", and habbenayim = "between the two", i.e., "the man between the two (hosts)".

The Septuagint title of Psa. cxliv., to which we have already referred, is "a Psalm of David concerning Goliath". There is, therefore, some scriptural connection between these portions which, rightly appreciated, will help us in our understanding of them. Goliath was not only gigantic in stature, but blasphemous in his defiance of the God of Israel. David was but a "stripling", a "youth" (I Sam. xvii. 33), but we remember that Psa. viii. 2 declares that: "out of the mouth of babes and sucklings hast Thou ordained strength because of Thine enemies, that Thou mightest still the enemy and the avenger." Goliath, we are told, "disdained" the youthful David (I Sam. xvii. 42) and cursed him "by his gods" (I Sam. xvii. 43), but, except for a sling, David went against him unarmed, "in the name of the Lord of Hosts . . . . . Whom thou hast defied" (I Sam. xvii. 45), and was thus assured of victory: "that all the earth may know that there is a God in Israel" (I Sam. xvii. 46). Is there not an echo of this in the opening and closing words of Psa. viii.: "O Lord, our Lord, how excellent is Thy name in all the earth!"

David's conflict with Goliath, and the use made by God of a stripling against the seed of the Serpent and his god, is but a type of the great conflict of the ages, with man placed upon the earth, no match, apparently, for the great spiritual enemy he has to meet, yet ultimately triumphant because of the great purpose of the ages. So David begins to answer his own question:--

> "For thou hast made him a little lower than the angels, and hast crowned him with glory and honour. Thou madest him to have dominion over the works of Thy hands, etc." (Psa. viii. 5-8).

The word "angels" is the Hebrew Elohim, rendered "God" in a multitude of passages. That it can bear a lower meaning Psa. xcvii. 7 testifies: "Worship Him, all ye gods." Heb. i. 6 says, "Let all the angels of God worship Him", and Heb. ii. 7 uses the word "angel" in quoting Psa. viii. Again, Psa. lxxxii. says:--

> "God standeth in the congregation of the mighty; He judgeth among the gods . . . . . I have said ye are gods, and all of you are children of the Most High. But ye shall die like men, and fall like one of the princes."

We know from I Cor. x. 20 that there is a definite connection between idolatry and demons. Satan makes it manifest in the temptation of the Lord and the establishment of the beast (Matt. iv. and Rev. xiii.) that his objects is to divert the worship of mankind to himself. Man by his creation was made after the image and likeness of God, made a little lower than the angels, and, did he but act in harmony with his creation, proof against ever worshipping "the image and likeness" of anything on earth or in heaven.

Man at his creation was given dominion over the works of God's hands. Could we, for example, speak of the noblest specimen of the brute creation, e.g., a horse, or a dog, in any of the terms used in Psa. viii.? That there has been a fall the Scriptures testify. That man can sink lower than the brute creation is seen alike on the pages of Scripture and of secular history. These both call aloud for redemption and restoration. Psalm viii., however, says nothing as to the nature of man. Heb. ii., after quoting part of Psa. viii., adds:--

> "But now we see not yet all things put under him, but we see Jesus, Who was made a little lower than the angels for the suffering of death, crowned with glory and honour" (verses 8 and 9).

In I Cor. xv. the Lord Jesus is called "the last Adam", and "the second man". Rom. v. says that Adam was a figure of Him that was to come. Christ became man, because man, though fallen into the bondage of sin and death, is destined (in resurrection glory) to dominion.

> "For unto the angels hath He not put in subjection the world to come . . . . . For verily He took not hold of angels" (Heb. ii. 5-16).

Members of the church of the one body, though sons of Adam, and fallen at that, are destined to a sphere of glory "far above all principality and power" (Eph. i.). The Corinthians saints were told that they should one day judge angels (I Cor. vi. 3).

With the testimony before us of Gen. i. 26, 27, "image and likeness", 28, "dominion", Gen. ii. 7, the n'shamah, Psa. viii., "a little lower than the angels", we can see that although man, as at present constituted, when compared with the mighty antagonists of the spiritual realm, is indeed a babe, a suckling, a stripling, nevertheless, in due time, the Satanic Goliath shall fall, and the Lord alone be exalted in the heavens and the earth, and man, in blessed association with THE Son of man and His victory over sin and death, shall fulfil his destiny, to the glory of God.

#5. Immortality and the resurrection.
pp. 165 - 167

There are but three passages in Scripture that speak of immortality, viz., I Cor. xv. 53, 54, and I Tim. vi. 16. These are the only occurrences of the word, which in Greek is athanasia. Where we read "immortality" in Rom. ii. 7 and II Tim. i. 10 it is aphtharsia, incorruption, and in I Tim. i. 17 aphthartos, incorruptible, which, though allied to, must not be confused with, the subject of this series.

The contexts in which the word immortality occurs all deal with resurrection, including a resurrection body. Moreover, the word is a negative; it speaks of a state where death is not, and had not Adam brought death into the world, there would have been no necessity to use its negation, *im*mortality.

It will be of service if we observe the way in which this word "immortality" occurs at the moment when the truth is brought forward that resurrection cancels the death brought in by Adam. There had evidently been a controversy at Corinth concerning the resurrection of the dead. Some had said, "There is no resurrection of the dead" (I Cor. xv. 12), while others had said, "How are the dead raised up, and with what body do they come?" (I Cor. xv. 35). To all these questions the apostle gives answer. In the course of his argument he tells us that "by man came death", and that "all in Adam die"; and further, that death, the last enemy, is to be destroyed. Near the conclusion he says:--

> "The dead shall raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed. For this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality" (I Cor. xv. 52, 53).

It is evident that the "we" here who are "changed" are the "mortal" who put on "immortality". It is the term used to express the great change at resurrection. And when this great change shall have come, both to living and dead, then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, "Death is swallowed up in victory" (I Cor. xv. 54).

In Luke xx. 35, 36 we have confirmation of this association of deathlessness with resurrection:--

> "They which shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world, and the resurrection from the dead . . . . . neither can they die any more."

This virtually is immortality. Had this close connection of the word "immortality" with the resurrection been observed, the idea of the immortality of the "soul" would have been impossible. Resurrection from the dead is the distinctive revelation of the Scriptures, and those who hold to its teaching have no need for the false surmises of philosophy.

The word "immortal", as we have seen, is a negative, the positive being the word "mortal". This we find in I Cor. xv. 53, 54; II Cor. iv. 11; Rom. vi. 12 and viii. 11. We have already seen that the references in I Cor. xv. are to literal and future resurrection. The other passages deal with present anticipation of resurrection, or desire for it:--

> "For we which live are always delivered unto death for Jesus' sake, that the life also of Jesus might be made manifest in our mortal flesh" (II Cor. iv. 11).
> "For we that are in this tabernacle do groan, being burdened; not for that we would be unclothed, but clothed upon, that mortality might be swallowed up of life" (II Cor. v. 4).
> "Likewise reckon ye also yourselves to be dead unto sin, but alive unto God through Jesus Christ our Lord. Let not sin therefore reign in your mortal body" (Rom. vi. 11, 12).
> "But if the Spirit of Him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, He that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies by His Spirit that dwelleth in you" (Rom. viii. 11).

There can be no doubt as to this evidence: immortality and a resurrection body (no mere "unclothed" condition will answer) are almost synonymous.

There is only one passage that we have omitted, and that is I Tim. vi. 15 and 16:--

> "The blessed and only Potentate, the King of kings, and Lord of lords; Who only hath immortality, dwelling in the light which no man can approach unto; Whom no man hath seen, nor can see."

This passage, we doubt not, speaks of the Lord Jesus Christ. The title "Potentate" does not seem to be a fitting one for God the Father, for dynastes is used of the Ethiopian eunuch who, though great authority, was nevertheless "under Candace" the Queen (Acts viii. 27). The title, however, is appropriate to the Lord Jesus Christ while the ages run their course. There is no need to prove that "King of kings" and "Lord of lords" are the legitimate titles of Christ. There is, however, a difficulty at first when we think of the Saviour "dwelling in light which no man can approach unto; Whom no man hath seen, nor can see; to Whom be honour and power everlasting"; but when we remember the effect of that glory upon Paul (Acts ix.), and John (Rev. i.), we gain some idea of the impossibility of any man "approaching unto" or "seeing" it until raised and changed into the same glorious likeness.

Christ only hath immortality, for He only has been raised from the dead to die no more. All others, like Lazarus, have been raised, but not "made alive". If this passage speaks of the risen Christ therefore, we have an undivided witness, that "mortal" and "immortal" have reference to the "flesh" and the "body", either in its present state or in that of a glorious resurrection. Let us hold fast the form of sound words.

Words in Season.

#10. "Thou shalt not desire."
pp. 93, 94

In a previous paper we touched upon the question of "desire", and found among other things that both the flesh and the spirit have "desires", and that these are opposite the one to the other. The light in which our "desires" are viewed by the Lord may be seen by observing the opening and closing words of the ten commandments:--

> "Thou shalt have no other gods before Me."
> "Thou shalt not desire thy neighbour's house."

The reader may object to the alteration of the word "covet", but he will find that the A.V. has put the alternative translation of the same Hebrew word in Deut. v. 21.

If the relation between these two commandments means anything, it reveals essentially two deities. To follow one's own desires is incipient atheism. The Gentiles, unilluminated by the law of God, plunged in ignorance and darkness, alienated from the life of God, and living "in the desires of the flesh, doing the will of the flesh and mind" (Eph. ii. 3), were "without God" (atheoi, Eph. ii. 12). In other words, we are, all of us, serving either God or mammon, God or self, God or the flesh; and the vehicle of that service is "desire".

Desire operated in the garden of Eden. We think immediately of the statement concerning Eve:--

> "And when the woman saw that the tree was good for food, and that it was pleasant (margin, a desire) to the eyes, and a tree to be desired to make one wise" (Gen. iii. 6).

Desire is certainly prominent in this temptation, for two different Hebrew words are used, but it should be remembered that not only did the Serpent use desire as a means to his ends, but the Lord used it also.

> "Every tree that is pleasant to the sight" (Gen. ii. 9).

The word "pleasant" here is the word "desire" in Gen.iii. 6.

By our desires we are led, and desire is at the bottom of both sin and service. It was the realization of this that overwhelmed Paul and as he says, "slew him". As a Pharisee of the Pharisees he was "blameless" as touching the righteousness of the law, but, "one day", he says, "the commandment came, sin revived, and I died" (Rom. vii. 9). Now the commandment that "came" was not that which enjoined some extreme obedience; it was simply, "Thou shalt not desire" (Rom. vii. 7), the complement, as we have seen, of the command, "Thou shalt have no other gods before Me". If this be the law, then salvation is impossible under it. This demands a renewed mind—the gift of a new nature, the Spirit, to take the place of the old nature, the flesh.

The crucifixion of the old man is in practice the crucifixion of desire.

> "Walk in spirit, and ye shall not fulfil the desires of the flesh" (Gal. v. 16).
> "They that are Christ's have crucified the flesh with its affections and desires" (Gal. v. 24).

Where does this lead? Are we to be merely passive? No, for that means opening the door to unseen yet great powers of evil. It is for us to recognize that God's will is supreme, that our new nature desires nothing more and nothing less than that will of God. Mere personal desires sink before that perfect will of God. Instead of mere passivity there is a glorious opportunity for real activity.

> "Present your bodies a living sacrifice . . . . . be ye transformed by the renewing of your mind, that ye may prove what is that good, and acceptable, and perfect will of God" (Rom. xii. 1, 2).

The working of these two desires may be seen in Psa. lxxiii., and we may have to confess that the language of Asaph is by no means foreign to our experience. The old desire was manifested in his "envy" at the prosperity of the wicked, which is perhaps best summed up in the words of verse 7 (margin): "Their eyes stand out with fatness: they pass the thoughts of the heart." The new desire expressed is the result of entering into the sanctuary of God. Then the same Asaph can say: "There is none upon earth that I desire beside Thee" (verse 25). When that is the true expression of the heart and life, we shall be led by the Spirit indeed, and shall have approached one step nearer to Him Who could say: "I seek not Mine own will, but the will of the Father which hath sent Me" (John v. 30).

Specially for Young People.

#5. Bethel and Peniel.
pp. 9 - 13

There are two experiences in the life of Jacob that provide valuable lessons for all who seek God and His will. The first is at Bethel, and the second at Peniel.

The circumstances that led to Bethel give point to the grace that was there manifested. Let us note them:--

1. Jacob had practiced deceit upon his father, Isaac (Gen. xxvii. 19).
2. Jacob had incurred his brother's anger (Gen. xxvii. 41).
3. Jacob was compelled to flee for his life (Gen. xxvii. 42, 43).

Yet in spite of these serious departures from truth, he is not sent away from home without receiving the covenant blessing that both he and his mother had plotted in vain to obtain (Gen. xxviii. 3, 4). The journey to Haran begins, and the first halt is made at a place called Luz (Gen. xxviii. 19). Now this name has a bearing upon the story, and we will therefore consider its meaning.

Luz means to turn aside, decline or depart, and in the six places where it occurs (Prov. ii. 15; iii. 21, 32; iv. 21, and Isa. xxx. 12) it is translated "depart", "froward" and "perverse". We are certain that Jacob would be sensitive on this first day of banishment from home, and the significance of his "departure", coupled with his "perverseness", would be impressed upon him. In Gen. xxx. 37 we meet the word luz again in the masculine, where it is translated "hazel", probably because the tree is flexible and easily bent. Now the Arabic word luz means an almond tree, and Jacob would probably be conversant with this fact, although there is another word in the Hebrew for almond, which means "to watch", the almond being one of the first to blossom in Spring. This forms a point of teaching in Jeremiah:--

> "I see a rod of an almond tree . . . . . I will hasten (or watch over) My word to perform it" (Jer. i. 11, 12).
> "Like as I have watch over them to pluck up . . . . . so will I watch over them to build . . . . ." (Jer. xxxi. 28).

Jacob would certainly know the first meaning of luz, "depart" and "perverse"; he might also know the second, "the almond", and whether he at first realized it or not, he was to learn the blessed lesson of free grace, that, perverse as he may be in himself, the Lord would "watch" over His Word to perform it. As a result of the dream that God gave him at Luz, Jacob changed its name to Bethel, which means "The house of God", saying:--

"Surely the Lord is in this place; and I knew it now. And he was afraid, and said How dreadful is this place! this is none other than the house of God, and this is the gate of heaven" (Gen. xxviii. 16, 17).

The gate of heaven.

What is the truth revealed in this gate of heaven? We shall expect that it will be fundamental, elementary, and something suggestive of a beginning. The gate will have to be entered, the house occupied, the Lord of that house known, but these are experiences that will follow. The first feature of this revelation to Jacob is the fact of An unchanging covenant.

"I am the Lord God of Abraham thy father, and the God of Isaac" (Gen. xxviii. 13).

What did this mean to Jacob? God had declared to Abraham that He would establish His covenant with him and his seed after him, "to be a God unto thee, and to thy seed after thee . . . . . I will be their God" (Gen. xvii. 7, 8). What did it mean to Isaac for God to reveal Himself to him as the God of Abraham?

"And the Lord appeared unto him the same night, and said, I am the God of Abraham thy father: fear not, for I am with thee, and will bless thee, and will multiply thy seed for my servant Abraham's sake" (Gen. xxvi. 24).

What did it mean later on in life to Jacob?

"Except the God of my father, the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, had been with me, surely thou hadst sent me away now empty" (Gen. xxxi. 42).

This covenant with Abraham was the first feature in Israel's deliverance from Egypt (Exod. ii. 24; iii. 6, 15; vi. 8). It reappears in Acts iii. 13, 25 in connection with Israel's restoration, and its inner meaning is manifested in Rom. xi. 28, 29:--

"As concerning the gospel, they are enemies for your sakes; but as touching the election, they are beloved for the father's sakes, for the gifts and calling of God are without repentance."

Translated into terms of Christian teaching, this first lesson at the gate of heaven must be expressed in some such language as that of Eph. i. 4: "Chosen in Him before the foundation of the world", or the following:--

"Who hath saved us, and called us with an holy calling, not according to our works, but according to His own purpose and grace, which was given us in Christ Jesus before the world began" (II Tim. i. 9).

"We love Him because He first loved us" (I John iv. 19).

The next lesson that we learn at the gate of heaven is Amazing grace.

Jacob, the cheat, the exile, might well have felt that he had forfeited the favour of the Lord. The idea of meeting God on his journey might well have filled him with terror. But there is no rebuke, no reproach, no allusion to his failure, but a gift and a blessing. "The land whereon thou liest, to thee will I give it, and to thy seed" (Gen. xxviii. 13). This is still the character of God, and is expressed in His gospel:--

> "Where sin abounded, grace did much more abound" (Rom. v. 20).
> "For by grace are ye saved through faith . . . . . it is the gift of God" (Eph. ii. 8).

God is One Who "giveth liberally, and upbraideth not" (James i. 5).

This association of amazing grace and covenant faithfulness is next expressed in a series of promises made to Jacob.

1. I am with thee. PRESENCE.
2. I will keep thee. PRESERVATION.
3. I will bring thee again. PROMISE.

Presence: "I am with thee."

It will be remembered that the presence of the Lord was included in the revelation already cited to Isaac in Gen. xxvi. 24: "I am the God of Abraham thy father: fear not, for I am with thee." When the time came for Jacob to return to his own land, this essential feature is repeated: "Return unto the land of thy fathers, and thy kindred: and I will be with thee" (Gen. xxxi. 3). Moses knew the supreme importance of this blessing: "My presence shall go with thee . . . . . If Thy presence go not with me, carry us not up hence" (Exod. xxxiii. 14, 15). For ourselves, such a passage as Heb. xiii. 5, 6 may well express the truth to us:--

> "He hath said, I will never leave thee nor forsake thee. So that we may boldly say, The Lord is my helper, and I will not fear what man shall do unto me."

Preservation: "I will keep thee."

The Lord will keep his people in "perfect peace" (Isa. xxvi. 3), while the peace of God itself shall keep their hearts and minds through Christ Jesus (Phil. iv. 7). The Lord will keep His people as a man tends a vineyard: "I the Lord do keep it; I will water it every moment: lest any hurt it, I will keep it night and day" (Isa. xxvii. 3).

While thinking of this wondrous "keeping", we do well to remember Who it is that keeps:--

> "My help cometh from the Lord, which made heaven and earth. He will not suffer thy foot to be moved: He that keepeth thee will not slumber. Behold, He that keepeth Israel shall neither slumber nor sleep. The Lord is thy keeper . . . . . the Lord shall preserve thee from all evil: He shall preserve thy soul. The Lord shall preserve thy going out and thy coming in from this time forth, and even for evermore" (Psa. cxxi.).

Jude 24, 25 gives us the Christian equivalent, saying:--

"Now unto Him that is able to keep you from falling, and to present you faultless before the presence of His glory with exceeding joy. To the only wise God our Saviour, be glory and majesty, dominion and power, both now and ever. Amen."

Promise: "I will bring thee again."

Restoration is the blessed goal of the O.T. prophets. Isa. lii. 8 and Jer. l. 19 are but samples. Gen. xlviii. 21, Jacob's dying remembrance of restoration, is echoed by Joseph (Gen. l. 25). Restoration was the uppermost question of the apostles after forty days' instruction by the risen Lord (Acts i. 6), and the burning theme of Pentecost (Acts iii. 19-26).

The words in the English version that begin with re are but various facets of this one blessed truth. Resurrection brings again from the dead, redemption brings back again from bondage; reconciliation brings the exile back to God.

"For I will not leave thee, until I have done that which I have spoken to thee of" (Gen. xxviii. 15).

"I have done that which I have spoken." Here all focuses upon the Lord and His faithful Word. We, to-day, have no other basis for our salvation and our hope. Let us rejoice in the God of Bethel" (Gen. xxxi. 13).

In our next paper we must pursue our journey with Jacob from this gate of heaven and house of God to Peniel where another experience is described for our blessing.

#6. Bethel and Peniel.
pp. 46, 47

In our previous paper we considered some of the lessons that are taught by the record of Jacob's dream at Bethel. This we saw was his first real contact with God; it was the gate of heaven to Jacob. There followed this initial vision a great variety of experiences, all having a special relation to Jacob's peculiar nature and position, but by love and hate, failure and success he was led step by step along the road to the next great experience of his life which took place at Peniel. There is a real connection between Bethel and Peniel, not only in the fact that both places were named by Jacob as a result of his experiences, but because the return journey to Peniel was undertaken upon the express command of the God of Bethel:--

> "I am the God of Bethel, where thou anointedst the pillar, and where thou vowedst a vow unto Me: now arise, get thee out from this land, and return unto the land of thy kindred" (Gen. xxxi. 13).

There is a gracious touch in the way God brings to mind the gratitude of Jacob at Bethel as expressed in the act of anointing the stone, and making the vow.

The experience associated with Bethel we discovered had some connection also with the original place name, Luz. We shall find again here, in this second great experience, that the name of the place contributes to the lesson. Peniel, where Jacob saw the face of God, was on the banks of the ford Jabbok, and Jabbok means emptying (Jer. li. 2; Isa. xxiv. 1). This connection has ever been true.

Job had maintained his integrity; he had said:--

> "My righteousness I hold fast, and will not let it go; my heart shall not reproach me so long as I live" (xxxvii. 6).
> "Oh that I knew where I might find Him! that I might come even to His seat! I would order my cause before Him, and fill my mouth with argument" (xxiii. 3, 4).

But when at last he was led into the presence of God he found himself at his Jabbok—emptying. He, too, was touched in the hollow of his thigh, and instead of argument he said:--

> "Behold I am vile, what shall I answer Thee? I will lay mine hand upon my mouth" (xl. 4).
> "I have heard of Thee with the hearing of my ear; but now mine eye seeth Thee, Wherefore I abhor myself, and repent in dust and ashes" (xlii. 5, 6).

Isaiah had prophesied against Israel, speaking of their rebellion and corruption. He had warned of coming judgment. He had said, "Woe unto them" six times over in chapter v. Then, suddenly, he cries, "Woe is me" (chapter vi.). Isaiah, when he entered the temple, stood upon the banks of his Jabbok—emptying. He, too, had to be touched—this time with a live coal from off the altar. Isaiah who had spoken so directly to the people about their sins, suddenly cries:--

> "Woe is me, for I am undone; because I am a man of unclean lips, and I dwell in the midst of a people of unclean lips; FOR MINE EYES HAVE SEEN THE KING" (Isa. vi. 5).

Other instances will occur to the reader. Daniel, Paul and John, all stood upon the same ford Jabbok as a prelude to Peniel.

It is at this place that we read the first real recorded prayer of Scripture (Gen. xxxii. 9-12). In this passage we find the following features:--

A | The pleading of covenant interest.—"O God of my father Abraham."
B | A reminder of God's promise.—"Return . . . I will deal well . . ."
C | Confession of unworthiness.—"I am not worthy."
C | Acknowledgment of blessing.—" I am become two bands."
B | A request for God's protection.—"Lest he . . . smite . . ."
A | The pleading of covenant interest.—"Thy seed as the sand."

The wrestling at Jabbok is in structural correspondence with this prayer, and the recognition of this will help us somewhat in the understanding of the passage. Further, it must be remembered that the introduction of Esau so prominently here is the echo of the earlier vision at Bethel.

A | Hatred of Esau.
B | Bethel.—His vow.
B | Peniel.—His vow.
A | Reconciliation of Esau.

This, with the omission of much detail, is the ground plan of the passage: the fear of Esau is uppermost throughout.

(To be concluded).

#6. (concluded). Bethel and Peniel.
pp. 62, 63

Consider the following alliterative headings:--

The PRAYER (9-11).		The PRESENT (13, 18, 20).
The PREVAILING (25, 28).	|	The PRINCE (28).
The PRESERVATION (30).	|	PENIEL (30).

Here at Peniel Jacob became Israel. By the ford of Jabbok—where he received that touch cause him ever after to halt—here he saw the face of God, and ceased contending and clung tightly.

Paul's second epistle to the Corinthians breathes much of the atmosphere of Peniel:--

> "We had the sentence of death in ourselves, that we should not trust in ourselves, but in God which raiseth the dead" (i. 9).
> "The light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ" (iv. 6).
>
> "But we have this treasure in earthen vessels, that the excellency of the power may be of God, and not of us" (iv. 7).
>
> "I besought the Lord thrice" (xii. 8).
> "My grace is sufficient for thee; for My strength is made perfect in weakness. Most gladly therefore will I rather glory in my infirmities, that the power of Christ may rest upon me . . . . . for when I am weak, then am I strong" (xii. 9, 10).

Here are both Jabbok and Peniel; the wrestling (II Cor. xii. 8) and the resting (II Cor. xii. 10); the shrinking of the sinew and the halting & limping (II Cor. xii. 9, 10).

Bethel and Peniel represent two stages in Christian progress. The young believer is warned against despondency. At first all goes with a swing, but after a while Jabbok must be crossed, and in the fuller vision of the Lord one's own unworthiness (Gen. xxxii. 10; Eph iii. 8; I Tim. i. 13), and unfitness (Isa. vi.) take on new shapes, boasting in self receives a death blow, and trust in Him that raiseth the death becomes more real and more vital. Thank God for both Bethel and the gate of heaven, with its vows and it encouragement, and thank God for Peniel and its Jabbok, with its confessions and humbling. Both are needed on the pilgrim journey of faith.

DEAR FELLOW-MEMBERS,

As a public testimony The Berean Expositor is now twenty-two years of age, and we are constrained to call upon all who rejoice with us in the revelation of the Mystery to join us both in praise and prayer on this occasion.

Uppermost in our consciousness is the outstanding fact of grace all these years. Grace that first of all chose, grace that sustained, and grace that has been mingled all along with much longsuffering.

While the prison ministry of the apostle Paul must ever be our central theme, a glance at the forthcoming index for the twenty volumes of The Berean Expositor will testify to our love for, and conscious need of, "all Scripture".

We believe the teaching for which we stand magnifies the Lord Jesus as nothing else can to-day, and we confidently anticipate the continued fellowship of all those who rejoice to know that He is exalted.

Yours by grace,

In the unity of the Spirit,

No remedy.
p. 92

We are already aware of the two lines of teaching that are discovered by viewing the epistles of Paul (1) canonically (i.e., in the order that they appear in the New Testament), and (2) chronologically (i.e., in the order in which they were written).

A lesson that may be of help is also discovered by considering the last page of the Old Testament canonically, Malachi, the last of the prophets, is the last of the Old Testament, and his closing theme is the second coming of Christ, the Sun of righteousness, together with the forerunner, Elijah.

The last book of the Old Testament according to the Hebrew canon is II Chronicles, and upon the last page thereof we read the solemn words: "till there was no remedy" (xxxvi. 16).

Surely the opening words of the new Testament may be placed in blessed contrast with this sad ending:--

> "The book of the generation of Jesus Christ . . . . . Thou shalt call His name JESUS; for He shall save His people from their sins" (Matt. i. 1-21).

Here, in the gift of His only begotten Son, is God's remedy for Israel's utter failure, and not for theirs only, but for the world also.

This note is necessarily brief, but sufficient may have been suggested to encourage our hearts, and maybe provide a theme for Bible Class or Sunday School worker.

The testimony of Rom. viii.

These four key words find their exposition in Rom. viii., and we therefore turn to that chapter for illumination. Let us quote the passages first:--

> "For ye have not received the spirit of bondage again to fear: but ye have received the spirit of ADOPTION, whereby we cry, Abba, Father" (Rom. viii. 15).
> "If children, then HEIRS; heirs of God" (Rom. viii. 17).
>
> "Ourselves also, which have the firstfruits of the Spirit, even we ourselves groan within ourselves, waiting for the ADOPTION, to wit, the REDEMPTION of our body" (Rom. viii. 23).
> "Whom He did foreknow, He also did PREDESTINATE to be conformed to the image of His Son, that He might be the firstborn among many brethren" (Rom. viii. 29).

Adoption is closely connected with inheritance here, for that is the sequel of verse 17. Adoption is also most certainly connected with a future redemption, the day of resurrection. By noticing exactly what is said here, we shall better appreciate not only Rom. viii. but also Eph. i.

In verse 15 we are not said to have received the adoption, but "the spirit of adoption". Now if adoption in the future be resurrection, the redemption of the body (viii. 23), then the spirit of adoption will be resurrection anticipated now. This is what we find. Verse 15 is part of an argument that commences at verse 1. There is now no condemnation, for the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus has made us free from the law of sin and death. This Spirit of life is explained as "the Spirit of Him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwelling in us", and it is connected with the quickening of these "mortal bodies" (viii. 11). In verse 14 this Spirit of life is expressed in terms of sonship: "For as many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God."

Now this passage leads on to verse 15 where we read of the Spirit of adoption. It is clearly a continuation of the argument, commencing as it does with the word "For". In verse 15, moreover, we have another way of ascertaining something of the special character of the Spirit of adoption, for it is placed in direct contrast with another spirit, namely, "the spirit of bondage". The Spirit of adoption therefore carries with it "freedom". But what kind of freedom? It has been already defined as, freedom from the law of sin and death. This is further confirmed when we observe that in verse 21 this bondage is specified as "the bondage of corruption", and the freedom as "the freedom of the glory of the children of God". Now if the bondage be that of "corruption", freedom from it will be the "redemption of the body", or resurrection. We arrive therefore at the following important conclusions:--

1. We receive now the Spirit of adoption, but look forward to the adoption itself in resurrection.
2. This Spirit of adoption is placed in opposition to the spirit of bondage. This bondage being called the bondage of "corruption", it follows that the Spirit of adoption anticipates the resurrection.
3. This is manifested in present sonship whereby we cry "Abba, Father". While we are sons of God now, the day of our "manifestation" awaits the resurrection (verse 19) and the freedom experienced by the children of God now is a foretaste of "the liberty of the GLORY" which is to come.

4. What we have therefore is a "firstfruits of the Spirit", and while we are "saved by hope", this does not exempt us at the moment from "groaning within ourselves" as we "wait for the adoption".
5. The word adoption in the Greek is huiothesia—"to place as a son", meaning something more than birth.

By turning to the companion epistle to the Galatians, further light on this wondrous theme may be gathered:--

The testimony of Gal. iv.

> "Now I say, That the heir, as long as he is a child (nepios, infant), differeth nothing from a servant, though he be lord of all: but is under tutors and governors until the time appointed of the father. Even so we, when we were children, were in bondage under the elements of the world; but when the fullness of the time was come, God sent forth His Son, made of a woman, made under the law, to redeem them that were under the law, that we might receive the adoption. And because ye are sons, God hath sent forth the Spirit of His Son into your hearts, crying, Abba, Father" (Gal. iv. 1-6).

Here, instead of the bondage of corruption, we have the bondage of worldly elements. The "time appointed of the father" is parallel with the "manifestation of the sons of God". Redemption is effected by Christ in the same way as is recorded in Rom. viii. 3. The sequel, "Walk in the spirit" (Rom. viii. 4), is found in Gal. iv. 21-31 and v. 16. The difference between the references to adoption and inheritance in Galatians and Romans is that in Galatians the bondage is that of the law of Moses, and the freedom is experienced now and immediately, whereas the bondage of Rom. viii. is that of corruption, and its freedom can only be fully experienced in resurrection. Consequently we have introduced in Romans the "Spirit of adoption". This does not exempt from "groaning" and "suffering" and being "killed all the day long" (Rom. viii. 18, 23, 36), but "in all these things" we may, by faith, be more than conquerors through Him that loved us.

The adoption and the earnest.

In Rom. viii. the Spirit of adoption is spoken of as "firstfruits", and firstfruits is the earnest of future harvest. In Eph. i. we have adoption as the great feature in the Father's will, and the Spirit of adoption, given while we walk by faith and wait patiently, is not called the Spirit of adoption, but "the Holy Spirit of promise which is the earnest of our inheritance, until the redemption of the purchased possession". The inheritance is future, the adoption, or "placing as sons", is future; the earnest of it is the Spirit of promise, the Spirit whereby even now we cry, "Abba, Father".

Another phase of our adoption is expressed in Eph. iv. 13:--

> "Till we all come in the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fullness of the Christ."

This is the Ephesian parallel with Rom. viii. 29: "conformed to the image of His Son." The power that worketh in us is the mighty power which wrought in Christ and raised Him from the dead. It enabled Paul to say: "The life I now live in the flesh, I live by faith of the Son of God." Paul, however, was under no illusion. He knew the outer man was perishing. He knew what suffering meant. He did not "claim" any exemption from these things, but he was more than conqueror in them all.

The day of redemption, which is the day of adoption, has not yet come. Let us beware lest by any excess of zeal we say that "the resurrection is past already". We have the earnest, the leading of the Spirit of God, the indwelling of the Spirit of Him that raised up Jesus our Lord from the dead. We have the assurance that nothing can separate us from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord. For the freedom from the bondage of the elements of the world we are unfeignedly thankful. In the bestowal of the spirit of freedom from the bondage of corruption we rejoice, and for actual and literal emancipation from the bondage of corruption we confidently wait. Let us not miss the fullness of the earnest, which is our present possession, by vainly assuming a position that is ours only when the day of redemption shall have come.

As an appendix we give the following quotation from A historical Commentary on St. Paul's Epistle to the Galatians, by W. M. Ramsay, D.C.L.:--

> "The idea that they who follow the principle of faith are sons of Abraham, whatever family they belong to by nature, would certainly be understood by the Galatians as referring to the legal process called, huiothesia."
> "Adoption was a kind of embryo Will; the adopted son became the owner of the property, and the property could pass to a person that was naturally outside the family only through his being adopted. The adoption was a sort of Will-making; and this ancient form of Will was irrevocable and public. The terms 'Son' and 'Heir' are interchangeable."
>
> "An illustration from the ordinary fact of society, as it existed in the Galatian cities, is here stated: 'I speak after the manner of men'. The Will (diatheke) of a human being is irrevocable when once duly executed. But if Paul is speaking about a Will, how can he say, after it is once made, it is irrevocable?"
> "Such irrevocability was a characteristic feature of Greek law, according to which an heir outside the family must be adopted into the family; and the adoption was the Will-making. The testator, after adopting his heir, could not subsequently take away from him his share of the inheritance or impose new conditions on his succession. The Roman-Syrian Law Book will illustrate this passage of the Epistle. It actually lays down the principle that a man can never put away an adopted son, and that he cannot put away a real son without good ground. It is remarkable that the adopted son should have a stronger position than the son by birth; yet it is so. The expression in Gal. iii. verse 15, 'When it hath been confirmed', must also be observed. Every Will had to be passed through the Record Office of the city. It was not regarded in the Greek law as a purely private document. It must be deposited in the Record Office."

If the reader will read Gal. iii. 15 - iv. 7, and Eph. i. 13, 14 in the light of this Galatian usage of adoption, it will be seen how utterly impossible it is for any subsequent law, sin or forfeiture to deprive the heir of the full benefits of this adoption "when the time appointed by the Father" arrives. We do not omit from our reckoning that which finds no place in the Greek law, namely, that manifestation of love in the gift of the Redeemer. This only makes God's adoption the stronger.

The parallel between Gal. iii. and Eph. i. on this point is so important as to justify a little repetition:--

> "And this I say, that the covenant, that was confirmed before of God in Christ, the law, which was four hundred and thirty years after, cannot disannul, that it should make the promise of none effect" (Gal. iii. 17).

Paraphrasing this passage in the terms of Ephesians, we can say:--

> "And this I say, that the predestination unto adoption and the choice in Christ by God, before the overthrow of the world, the law of sin and death that entered into the world by one man, Adam, at a later period, cannot disannul, that it should make the promise of none effect."

In both cases we have the outworking of a purpose that knows no change. In both the provision of a Redeemer. In both the shutting out of works of merit. In both the simple ground of faith. In both a period when the child, though "lord of all" or "far above all", is nevertheless under tutors and governors (the word "governor" giving us the word "dispensation" of Eph. i. 20, iii. 2, and 9 R.V.) until the time appointed, until we all arrive at the perfect man. In both the freedom we possess now is manifested in deliverance from ordinances (Gal. iv. 9, 10; Eph. ii. 15; Col. ii. 16).

We wait for adoption. We wait for resurrection, the redemption of the body, the day of the redemption of the purchased possession. "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, Who hath blessed us."

Studies in Colossians.

#1. A discovery of its theme.

pp. 56 - 58

The epistles to the Ephesians and the Colossians are a pair, and deal with the same theme. With so few epistles that actually deal with the dispensation of the mystery, one might at first wonder why there should be such repetition. This feature is not, however, limited to these epistles. In the Gospels there are many repetitions, notwithstanding the fact, as John tells us, that if all things which the Lord did were written, he supposed the world would not be large enough to contain the books that must be written.

In Phil. iii. 1 the apostle has said: "To write the same things to you, to me indeed is not grievous, but for you it is safe." While, therefore, we recognize the similarity of these two great epistles, we are prepared to find that they each have a distinctive feature that makes each witness essential. This distinctive feature we desire to make clear in this article, and then to pursue the study of Colossians in a subsequent series.

Ephesians is mainly concerned with positive teaching. Broadly speaking, its three opening chapters are taken up with the revelation of the mystery, and its three concluding chapters with the walk that should accompany such a calling. Warning concerning error or the attack of evil teachers is perceptible in Eph. iv. 14, and one phase of the evil expressed in Colossians is found in Eph. v. 6. Also, the apostle gives clear warning as to the spiritual foes that confront the believer, but in Ephesians he does not enlarge upon their method of attack nor expose the doctrine that is invented by the "cunning craftiness" of those who "lie in wait to deceive". Yet, after all, this knowledge is essential if we are to be saved from the snares that beset us, and it is in the unfolding of that system of evil doctrine, largely connected with "angels, principalities and powers" that Colossians takes its place. Instead of following the outline of Ephesians, Colossians compresses the truth somewhat, both in the doctrinal and practical sections, so that a large central section may be devoted to the great warning that occupies the bulk of Col. ii.

We now proceed to set out in barest outline the teaching of the epistle, leaving the development of detail for subsequent studies:--

A | i. 1, 2. Salutation.
B | i. 3-8. Faithful ministry. Epaphras. The word of truth heard.
C | a | i. 9-12. Prayer for spiritual walk.
b | i. 13-23. Christ before all things, and in Him all things consist.
D | i. 23-28. The mystery manifested by God.
E | i. 28 - ii. 1. Preaching to present perfect.
F | ii. 2, 3. Hid—the treasures of wisdom and knowledge—in Christ.
G | ii. 4-23. BEWARE. A five-fold warning.
F | iii. 1-4. Hid—your life—with Christ.
C | b | iii. 5-15. Christ is all and in all.
a | iii. 16 - iv. 1. Indwelling Word for spiritual walk.
D | iv. 2-11. The mystery manifested by Paul.
E | iv. 12, 13. Prayer to stand perfect.
B | iv. 14-17. Fulfil ministry. Archippus. Epistle to be read.
A | iv. 18. Salutation.

The full justification of this structure must of necessity await the evidence which detailed study alone can supply. Some of the marks of correspondence, however, are sufficiently obvious to establish the general trustworthiness of the whole. For example, no long argument is needed to prove the intimate correspondence suggested by the two members F | ii. 2, 3. and F | iii. 1-4.; in both the key word is "Hid". Then again, the members C | b | i. 13-23. and C | b | iii. 5-15. contain a number of common features, among them the balance indicated in the outline, and also such items as "creation", "image", &c. The two members E | i. 28 - ii. 1. and E | iv. 12, 13. have "perfection" in view, beside both using the words "agonize" and "Laodicea". With these parallels established, we trust the reader will either seek out the proofs of the remainder, or rest assured that they are forthcoming as the time arrives.

The important feature of the epistle is undoubtedly the great central section, labeled "Beware". While all the rest of the epistle is vital truth, we shall realize that it is relative to the warning which is the principal theme. With this introduction to our study we must here stay, trusting that the ministry of the Word that will arise out of the exposition of this great epistle will be blessed to all readers, old as well as new.

#2. Features of a faithful ministry (i. 3-8).
pp. 98 - 103

The association of the name of Timothy with that of the apostle in the opening salutation of this epistle, and the fact that afterwards Timothy was appointed to take charge of the neighbouring Church at Ephesus, suggest the possibility that some of the heresies combated in Colossians have much in common with the "fables and endless genealogies", and "oppositions of falsely-so-called gnosis" dealt with in Timothy. "The neglecting of the body" of Col. ii. 23, and the advice, "Be no longer a water-drinker" of I Tim. v. 23, will be seen as parts of a whole, connected also with the teaching of seducing spirits, "forbidding to marry, and commanding to abstain from meats" (I Tim. iv. 3, 4).

The error of "angel worship" spoken of in Col. ii. may be the reason for the definite stress laid in I Tim. ii. 5 on the statement that: "There is one God, and one Mediator between God and men, the Man Christ Jesus."

These points of contact we hope to deal with more thoroughly when the part of Colossians concerned is under review. Meanwhile we pass on to the opening section of Col. i., which occupies verses 3-8, and is largely taken up with the ministry of Epaphras.

B | i. 3-8. The faithful ministry of Epaphras.

A | 3-5. What Paul heard from Epaphras.
Your faith, love and hope.
B | 5, 6. | a | "Heard."
b | "Truth." Gospel.
c | Come unto you AS in all the world.
c | Brought forth fruit AS also it doth in you.
a | "Heard."
b | "Truth." Grace.
A | 7, 8. What they had learnt of Epaphras.
What he declared to Paul—"your love".

It is a vexed question, and one perhaps that can never be answered, as to whether Paul ever personally visited Colosse. There are as many reasons discoverable in the apostle's writings for asserting that he had visited Colosse, as there are for denying it. While the apostle very definitely establishes his own apostleship and ministry in this epistle, he is also at pains to associate with himself and his teaching others, such as Timothy (i. 1), Epaphras (i. 7; iv. 12), Archippus (iv. 17), and others mentioned in chapter iv. In the ministry of Epaphras we have a glimpse of the way in which the gifts of the ascended Christ were fitted, "for the perfecting of the saints, for the work of the ministry, for the edifying of the body of Christ" (Eph. iv. 7-12).

Faith, Love, Hope.

When the apostle speaks of the ministry of Epaphras, what does he select as of paramount importance? Does he speak of the number on the Church roll? The size of the offering? Or of any of the features that so often take first place in this statistical age? No, he brings forward at once "these three", faith, love and hope. It would seem from this that a faithful ministry will include and specially emphasize these three. When one meditates on the subject, the question comes, Is there any article of our creed that does not include faith, hope and love? And we must admit that there is not.

What the apostle commended in the ministry of Epaphras, he has exemplified himself.

Eph. i. 15-20 deals with "these three": "Wherefore I also, after I heard of your faith in the Lord Jesus, and love unto all the saints . . . . . pray for you that . . . . . you may know what is the hope of His calling." This passage (Eph. i. 15) differs from Col. i. 4, in that the words, "your faith in Christ Jesus" in Col. i. 4 are a translation of ten pistin humon Christo esou, while the words, "your faith in the Lord Jesus" of Eph. i. 15 are a translation of ten kath humas pistin en to kurio Jesou. Colossians speaks of the believer's trust in the Lord, whereas in Ephesians the faith is objective—that special "faith", the "one faith" so closely associated with the "one Lord" in the unity of the Spirit. There is a possibility that the reference to love in Eph. i. 15 should be omitted, but we will not enter into this question here.

We all know the place given to faith, hope and love in I Cor. xiii. 13. They remain when spiritual gifts are done away, and spiritual gifts without them are as tinkling cymbals and sounding brass.

We meet "these three" together in I Thessalonians:--

> "Remembering without ceasing your work of faith, and labour of love, and patience of hope in our Lord Jesus Christ, in the sight of God and our Father" (i. 3).

They come singly in three sections of the epistle:--

> FAITH.—"We sent . . . . . to comfort you concerning your faith, ... I sent to know your faith . . . . . brought us good tidings of your faith and love . . . . . we were comforted by your faith . . . . . praying exceedingly that we might see your face, and perfect that which is lacking in your faith" (iii. 1-10).
>
> LOVE.—"The Lord make you to increase and abound in love . . . . . as touching brotherly love . . . . . ye are taught of God to love one another" (iii. 12 - iv. 12).
>
> HOPE.—"Ye sorrow not, even as others, which have no hope" (iv. 13-18).

And all six words come together once more at the close:--

> "Let us, who are of the day, be sober, putting on the breastplate of faith and love, and for a helmet, the hope of salvation . . . . . And we beseech you brethren to know them which labour among you . . . . . esteem them very highly in love for their work's sake . . . . . be patient toward all men" (v. 8-14).

Again, in Heb. x. 22-24, we find these three together:-- > "Let us draw near in full assurance of faith."

> "Let us hold fast the profession of our hope" (elpis).
> "Let us . . . . . provoke one another unto love."

In Rom.v. 1-8 we find them in pairs:--

> "Therefore being justified by faith . . . . . we have access by faith . . . . . we rejoice in hope of the glory of God . . . . . and hope maketh not ashamed because the love of God is shed abroad in our hearts . . . . . but God commendeth His love toward us."

These are passages that come readily to the mind. There are doubtless others, but sufficient has been shown to make it clear that in the apostle's own ministry, faith, hope and love occupy an important place, and therefore they should be prominent in the teaching of all who profess to follow him.

Faith in Christ Jesus.

We must, however, leave this wider range, and make a closer approach to the teaching of Colossians. The faith here spoken of is "faith in Christ Jesus". The first mention of this expression is found in Gal. iii. 26: "For ye are all the children of God by faith in Christ Jesus." The second reference that uses the expression "faith in" is Rom. iii. 25, where we read of "propitiation through faith in His blood". Eph. i. 15 is practically parallel with Col. i. 4, the only difference being in the title, "the Lord Jesus". In Col. ii. 5, the apostle rejoices because of the stedfastness of their "faith in Christ", but we must observe here a slight difference in the wording. Literally it is "your faith into (or unto) Christ". The expression, "faith in Christ Jesus", occurs throughout the epistles in such a way as to attract attention by the grouping, a feature often found in connection with important themes:--

A | Gal. iii. 26. Children of God.
  B | Col. i. 4. Since we heard.
    C | I Tim. i. 14. Paul put into the ministry (diakonia).
    C | I Tim. iii. 13. Those who have served as deacons (diakoneo).
  B | II Tim. i. 13. Which you heard of me.
A | II Tim. iii. 15. Salvation.

"Faith in God" was not sufficiently precise to meet the situation which Paul was facing. Strictly speaking no one can have faith in God and reject His Christ, but the great conflict for the truth that was commencing at Colosse demanded an explicit recognition of the Lordship of Christ; consequently, it is not simply faith in the Word, or even faith in God, but faith in Christ that the apostle commends.

"Faith in (epi) God" was among the "first principles" that the Hebrews were urged to "leave" if they were to go on unto perfection (Heb. vi. 1). This cannot mean a denial of faith in God, for the same epistle tells us that without faith and belief that He is, it is impossible to please God (Heb. xi. 6). It was necessary that these Hebrew believers should face the fact that "faith in God" must be "faith in Christ Jesus", for His mediation, priesthood, and sacrifice are all involved.

The language of John xiv. 1 is still true: "Ye believe in (eis, into or toward) God, believe also in (eis) Me." Throughout the Gospel of John great stress is laid on believing in Christ, and believing on His name. And in the epistles, where we read of "believing God" (as in Rom. iv. 3), we know full well that the risen Christ is in view (iv. 24; x. 9).

In Galatians Paul says, "Abraham believed God" (iii. 6), but when speaking of himself and Peter he says, "We have believed in Jesus Christ" (ii. 16). We shall realize more fully the necessity to make it plain that our faith in God and His Word is faith in Christ, when we have considered the errors that Col. ii. exposes.

Love unto all the saints.

Not only is faith specified, but the special aspect of love brought forward is: "that love which you have unto all the saints." The ten agapen ten demands the translation, "that love which", marking it out as something distinctive. "Love to all saints" finds an echo in the "holy and beloved" of Col. iii. 12, "saints" and "holy" being the same word, hagios. One reason why this aspect of love is stressed is that the error attacked in Col. ii. is a superficial sanctity, a travesty of the true sanctification of the believer in Christ, and the apostle would encourage the Colossians to remember their calling. He had addressed them as: "The saints and faithful brethren in Christ" (i. 2). They were "made meet for the inheritance of the saints in the light" (i. 12). They were "presented holy, and unblameable, and unreproveable in His sight" (i. 22), and to them as "saints" the mystery had been manifested.

All this is an echo of the teaching given in Ephesians. There the Ephesians are called "saints and faithful" (i. 1), and have been chosen that they should be "holy and without blame" (i. 4). They were to pray for light upon the "glory of His inheritance in the saints" (i. 18). They were "fellow-citizens with the saints" (ii. 19) and were being built up "an holy temple in the Lord" (ii. 21).

We can well understand that many of God's children shrink from using this holy title. To be called by another believer "a saint" makes many a Christian feel that he must immediately refuse the title or else act hypocritically. While this is a feeling shared by all who have the slightest acquaintance with their own hearts as seen in the light of the Word, we must beware lest a false humility leads us to a denial of our blessed acceptance in the Beloved, and makes us imagine that the title "saint" is conferred only upon those who are of special "sanctity". It is hoped that there are no readers of this magazine whose spirituality is as low as that of the Corinthians (I Cor. i. and iii.), yet they were, at the same time, "saints", and were so addressed by the apostle who deplored their carnality (I Cor. i. 2; iii. 1). The apostle revealed to them the ground of their saint-hood: "But of Him are ye in Christ Jesus, Who of God is made unto us wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification, as well as redemption" (I Cor. i. 30).

If we are to presented "holy", it will not be through any sanctification of our own, or because we have brought forth the fruits of the spirit; it will be "in the body of His flesh through death" (Col. i. 22). If the church is to be presented "without spot, or wrinkle or any such thing; holy and without blemish", it is because the Lord Himself "loved the church and gave Himself for it, that He might sanctify and cleanse it" (Eph. v. 25-27). Not one word of what we have here quoted can possibly excuse sin in the believer. All who have such a high and holy calling are exhorted to "walk worthy", but no amount of walking worthy will ever make the believer more fully a "saint" than he is already in Christ. If this had been held firmly by the Colossians, that false and negative sanctity of abstention could never have found a place with them. Holiness is not comprised in what we abstain from ("Touch not, taste not, handle not"), but in what we are in Christ. In Him we have died, been buried, and have risen again, and in that blessed identification we find our holiness, meetness and acceptance.

The third feature, "The hope", cannot be dealt with here, but must be reserved for another article. Let us pray for fuller and deeper insight into the meaning of "faith in Christ Jesus" and "that love which is unto all the saint".

#3. The hope laid up in heaven (i. 5).
pp. 164 - 169

Having spoken of faith and love parenthetically, the apostle reveals the great object of his prayer, namely, hope. Col. i. 5 commences with dia = because, but it is not that the Colossians had love unto all the saints because of the hope, but that hope is the reason for the apostle's prayer:--

> "Praying always for you (Since we heard of your faith . . . . . and love . . . . .), because of the hope which is laid up for you in heaven" (Col. i. 3-5).

Reserved and preserved.

In I Pet. i. 4 we read of "an inheritance . . . . . reserved in heaven for you", while in Col. i. 5 we read of "the hope which is laid up for you in heaven". Do these passages speak of the same thing?

Let us first of all see the actual words used. Peter uses tereo, "reserved". Paul uses apokeimai, "laid up". There is not a great difference between "reserved" and "laid up", and if these two renderings stand we must accept their testimony. We can, however, test the accuracy of translation by comparison with other passages where the word occurs. Associated with eis, "unto", we find the rendering "reserved unto" in II Pet. ii. 4, 9, 17, and iii. 7. In Jude 1 we have the word translated "preserved", and in Jude 6 & 21 both "kept" and "keep", while in Jude 6 and 13 associated with eis, "unto", it is translated "reserve". While "reserve" appears satisfactory in some cases, it is not so in others. For example, we could not say of the angels that "they reserved not their first estate", neither could we translate Jude 21, "Reserve yourselves in the love of God". The word "keep" in the sense of "preserve", however, will fit all these passages:--

"Kept in Jesus Christ and called" (Jude 1).
"The angels which kept not their first estate" (Jude 6).
"For whom is kept the blackness of darkness unto the age" (Jude 13).
"Keep yourselves in the love of God" (Jude 21).

Tereo is translated in the majority of cases "keep":--

"Keep the commandment" (Matt. xix. 17).
"Kept in prison" (Acts xii. 5).
"Keep the unity" (Eph. iv. 3).
"I have kept the faith" (II Tim. iv. 7).

This last reference provides a fair test of the meaning of the two words under consideration, for both occur in close association: "I have kept (tereo) the faith . . . . . henceforth there is laid up (apokeimai) for me a crown" (II Tim. iv. 7, 8). The translation that expresses the difference between these two words is: "I have preserved the faith . . . . . henceforth there is reserved for me a crown."

Carrying these distinctions with us to Col. i. 5 and I Pet. i. 4 we shall observe that I Pet. i. 4 speaks of "preserving" an inheritance in heaven, while Col. i. 5 speaks of "reserving" our hope in heaven. The "preserved" inheritance is seen coming down "out of heaven" in the new Jerusalem, whereas the "reserved" hope will be enjoyed in the super-heavens, "far above all". Peter wrote to the "dispersion" (I Pet. i. 1). Paul wrote to the Gentiles (Col. i. 27). Peter directs the hope of his hearers to "the last times" and to the "salvation of their souls" at the "revelation of Jesus Christ", whereas Paul speaks of the manifestation of Christ, Who is our life, and of our manifestation with Him "in glory".

We have already learned that Colossians supplements Ephesians, and it is to Ephesians that we look for definitions. There, the hope is defined as "the hope of His calling" and "the one hope of our calling", and this, while settling the nature of the hope to all who are already graced with opened eyes and a spirit of wisdom and revelation in the knowledge of Him, leads some to confuse the calling of Hebrews with that of Colossians. We must therefore consider the terms.

The heavenly calling, and In heaven.

Heb. iii. 1 speaks of a "heavenly calling", using the word epouranios; Colossians, however, uses the word ouranos. As epouranios has been prominently associated with the Ephesian position, some are disturbed by its presence in Heb. iii. 1, and the change to ouranos in Colossians.

Ouranos.—This word indicates the heavens in relation to the earth (Matt. v. 18), the starry heavens (Matt. xxiv. 29), the heavens as the throne of God (Matt. v. 34), the abode of angels (Matt. xviii. 10), and the atmospheric heavens (Matt. xxiv. 30). Matthew uses the same word for the heaven that is just above the earth, and for the heavens which are the throne of God, without inconsistency. Similarly Col. i. 5 and I Pet. i. 4 use the same word "heaven", but it does not necessarily follow that Peter spoke of the "far above all" position of Ephesians, or that Col. i. 5 places our hope in the clouds or among the stars. Peter uses the one word "heaven" for the place where Christ now is (I Pet. iii. 22) and the place from which the voice came in the holy mount (II Pet. i. 18).

Epouranios.—Two references in Hebrews speak of the heavenly reality of which the tabernacle was a type (Heb. viii. 5; ix. 23). Two references speak of the heavenly country or the heavenly Jerusalem (xi. 16, xii. 22). Another refers to the miraculous gifts as the "heavenly gift" (vi. 4). We should expect, therefore, the heavenly calling of Heb. iii. 1 to be closely associated with this heavenly country and city. Matthew uses the word once in the expression "heavenly Father" (xviii. 35), and John once in contrast to earthly things (John iii. 12). I Cor. xv. 40-48 shows its close affinity with that which is spiritual.

Apart from Ephesians, the prison epistles contain only two references:--

> "Every knee should bow, of things in heaven" (Phil. ii. 10).
> "And will save me unto His heavenly kingdom" (II Tim. iv. 18).

It will be seen that epouranios, like ouranos, has a wide scope of meaning. The word, however, in Ephesians is used with such precision, and with such added explanatory terms as to leave one with a full realization of the character and the sphere of the hope of His calling. We have in that epistle five passages which contain a phrase to be found nowhere else in the whole range of inspired truth—en tois epouraniois, "in the heavenlies". This expression differs from the usage in Heb. vi. 4, for the miraculous gifts referred to though "heavenly" were not enjoyed "in the heavenlies"; the "heavenly Jerusalem" of Heb. xii. 22 is seen by John "coming down from God out of heaven" (Rev. xxi. 2). The heavenly calling, therefore, of Heb. iii. will not necessarily place those who are partakers of it "in the heavenlies".

Eph. iv. 10 tells us concerning Christ that He "ascended up far above all heavens, that He might fill all things". This illuminate the meaning of "the heavenly places" of Eph. i. 3. These heavenly places are said to be: (1) At the right hand of God. (2) Far above all principality and power (Eph. i. 20, 21). They are inhabited by principalities and powers that are learning through the church the manifold wisdom of God (Eph. iii. 10). We are not left in any uncertainty as to the exact locality in this super-heavenly sphere, in which the church will realize its hope, for chapter ii. 6 says: "And hath raised us up together and made us sit together in the heavenlies in Christ Jesus." The hope of the one body, therefore, is "far above all".

When the apostle uses the simple word ouranos in Eph. i. 10, iii. 15, and vi. 9, there is no confusion of terms; the greater must include the less. For example, it would be true to say that these words are being penned in Essex, or alternatively, in England. The choice of term would be regulated by the object with which the information was given. It would be incongruous to place Essex over against America—that would demand at least the term England, but if the matter were concerned with one part of England as distinct from another, the sub-division Essex would be necessary. So "heavenly" and "heaven" do not at times demand any particularizing, the word ouranos and ouranios being sufficient. Sometimes, however, it is necessary that epouranios should be used, to make a distinction, although this term itself is very embracive. When the apostle would speak of the sphere of the one body, he departs from the usual terms and speaks of en tois epouraniois, "in the heavenlies", which are far above all and at the right hand of God. The hope, therefore, of Col. i. 5, though there said to be laid up in heaven, which is quite true, is particularized in Ephesians as being in the super-heavens, which, while leaving Colossians still true and untouched, tells us just what part of heaven is intended.

Colossians is not so much concerned with the teaching the distinct nature of our hope, as praying that such hope may be fruitful. In both passages of Col. i. fruitfulness is in view:--

> "Praying always for you . . . . . because of the hope which is laid up in heaven . . . . . it bringeth forth fruit and increaseth" (Col. i. 3-5).
> "Do not cease to pray for you . . . . . being fruitful in every good work, and increasing in the knowledge of God" (Col. i. 9, 10).

The words "and increaseth" in verse 6 are found in the R.V. and are warranted by manuscripts. Verse 6 does not assert that all the world had heard the truth; it indicates that no dispensational barrier or restriction now exists. "Which is present with you"—this has the pregnant meaning, "Came to and remain with you".

In both Eph. i. 13 and Col. i. 5, 6 there is strong emphasis upon "hearing" and "the Word of truth". The words that opened the present dispensation were, "Be it known therefore unto you, that the salvation of God is sent unto the Gentiles, and that they will hear it" (Acts xxviii. 28). And this in contrast to Israel's condition: "The heart of this people is waxed gross, and their ears are dull of hearing."

Faith, hope and the Word.

It is of the greatest spiritual importance for us to remember that both faith and hope are vitally connected with "hearing" and "the Word".

> FAITH.—"So then faith comes by hearing, and hearing by the Word of God" (Rom. x. 17).
> HOPE.—"Who against hope believed in hope, that he might be the father of many nations, according to that which was spoken, So shall thy seed be" (Rom. iv. 18).

There is a close connection between these two passages. In the first, the "Word" is rhema, "the spoken word"; in the second it is rheo, "spoken". To us, now that the Scriptures are complete, the "spoken" Word of God is the "written" Word, for II Tim. iii. 16 says, "All Scripture (written) is God-breathed (spoken)".

Both faith and hope are terms very much abused among God's people. We hear believers saying that they have "faith" for this, or "faith" for that; yet many times there is not the slightest foundation for such faith in the "Word". Faith needs something to rest upon. Show me a promise in the Scriptures, and there my faith has a legitimate basis—but faith that rests upon the fancies of the mind, however pious, is largely doomed to disappointment.

With many, hope is almost synonymous with uncertainty. If a person "hopes so" an element of misgiving is generally implied. But hope in Scripture rests as certainly as faith upon the Word of God, for "He is faithful Who promised" (Heb. xi. 11).

While it is true that the second coming of Christ is the hope of all the redeemed, it is not true that all will realize their hope at the same time or in the same place. The word that stands for the hope of Israel and the church up to Acts xxviii. is parousia, which finds its definition in Matt. xxiv. and I Thess. iv. The apostle does not use this word for the hope of the church after Acts xxviii., but uses epiphaneia instead. This we find in Col. iii. 3, 4: "For ye are dead, and your life is hid with Christ in God. When Christ, Who is our life, shall be made manifest, then shall ye also be made manifest with Him in glory." If we bring the two statements together we shall see their connection the better:--

> "The hope which is LAID UP for you in heaven."
> "Your life is HID with Christ in God."

In Titus we have a statement that unites both passages: "In hope of age-abiding life, which God, that cannot lie, promised before age times" (Titus i. 2). This is further defined in Titus ii. 13: "Looking for that blessed hope, and the manifesting of the glory of our great God and Saviour Jesus Christ." Christ Himself is the one Hope of all believers whatever their calling, but prayer and a spirit of revelation in the knowledge of the mystery, and of Christ's exalted position at the right hand of God, is necessary to make clear "that blessed hope".

The apostle in his last hours speaks of "all those who love His manifesting", and to this phase of His coming we cling. So far as the hope of the church of the mystery is concerned, there are no accompanying angels, no signs in heaven or earth; these all take place after the hope of the church is realized at the right hand of God, and are associated with the descent of the Lord "from heaven" (I Thess. iv. 16), whereas the calling of the one body is in "heavenly places" and can only be realized in the position "far above all". It is this hope that is laid up for us "in heaven". This is the "Word" upon which our hope rests. The ascended Lord is before us in faith and hope, whereas in the earlier dispensation, while the ascended Lord was seen by faith, hope looked forward to the Lord "descending" from heaven, and a city "coming down out of heaven". This is very different indeed from the hope of our calling which is laid up for us in heaven, to be enjoyed there "at the right hand of God".

#4. The apostle's prayer (i. 9-12).
pp. 205 - 209

The three great epistles, Ephesians, Philippians and Colossians, contain the prayers of the apostle for the members of the body of Christ, each prayer reflecting something of the special teaching of the epistle. The prayer of Col. i. 9-12 is for a fruitful and spiritual walk. The answer to it is in measure indicated in Col. iii. 16 - iv. 1, a section which we have headed in the structure on page 57, "Indwelling Word for a spiritual walk".

Before we turn our attention to the prayer itself, we will demonstrate the balance of the two passages, and the justification for their place in the structure:--

Col. i. 9-12.	Col. iii. 16 - iv. 1.
"In all wisdom."	"In all wisdom."
"Spiritual understanding."	"Spiritual songs."
"Every good work."	"In word or work."
"Giving thanks unto the Father."	"Giving thanks to God and the Father."
"Unto all pleasing."	"This is well pleasing."
"Made meet for the inheritance."	"The reward of the inheritance."

In his prayer, Paul asks for the Colossians that they "may be filled with a knowledge of His will, in all wisdom and spiritual understanding". That this deep and spiritual wisdom is not something separated from the Word of God itself the balancing passage shews: "Let the Word of Christ dwell in you richly; teaching and admonishing one another in all wisdom" (Col. iii. 16). Prayer for spiritual illumination must go hand in hand with the Word of God. To imagine a spirituality that is independent of Scripture is to entertain a false view, and is likely to lead to "excess" and self-deception.

"Spiritual understanding" and "spiritual songs" are in these two passages in correspondence. To the Corinthians the apostle wrote: "I will pray with the spirit, and I will pray with the understanding also: I will sing with the spirit, and I will sing with the understanding also" (I Cor. xiv. 15). While it is true that he uses here the word nous, "mind" instead of sunesis, "understanding", the lesson is similar in the two cases. A spiritual understanding will express itself in appropriate spiritual songs. It will reject those hymns which use the name "Jesus" in too familiar a way. It will not in its hymnbook any more than in its doctrine confuse the "Bride" and the "Body", "Zion" and the "Church". It will not sing, "One Lord, one faith, one birth", when Scripture says, "One Lord, one faith, one baptism", for baptismal regeneration is a false doctrine. It will not confess that the dead in Christ are asleep, awaiting the awakening of resurrection, and deny this truth by singing about the activities and glories of those loved ones who have fallen asleep in Christ.

The scope of this "worthy" walk is seen in the corresponding section, which embraces wives and husbands, fathers and children, servants and masters. One part of what is implied in the words "unto all pleasing" is found in the obedience of children to their parents—"for this is well pleasing unto the Lord." It is further expressed when servants obey their masters not as "men-pleasers", but in singleness of heart.

Thanksgiving to the Father in Col. i. is restricted to the glorious fact of meetness for the inheritance; in Col. iii. 17 it expands to the sanctifying of every word and work.

The distinctive purposes of the two sections of Colossians are clearly seen in the two references to the "inheritance". In Col. i. we find our standing. There we rejoice that we are "made meet" for the inheritance. Col. iii. 16 - iv 1 gives our subsequent state, our manifesting now the blessed position which is already ours in Christ. There we read, not of meetness for the inheritance, but of "the reward of the inheritance"; not because we are "in Christ", but because we "serve the Lord Jesus Christ".

We trust it is amply demonstrated that the two members Col. i. 9-12 and Col. iii. 16 - iv. 1 are in perfect balance. Not until the prayer of Col. i. receives an answer according to Col. iii. can we rest satisfied that we have entered into its fullness. To some the high thought in Col. i. concerning the inheritance and the saints in the light may seem too lofty for domestic affairs, but it is not. It is utter folly for anyone who disdains the scriptural call to walk worthy as a wife or a husband, to contemplate the higher steps of spiritual attainment. Before a man lays claim to the spiritual wisdom and understanding and worthy walk of Col. i., let his relationship as husband and father, master or servant, be brought "into the light"; otherwise his profession of holiness and spiritual attainment may be characterized in the language of I Cor. xiii. 1-3.

The prayer of Col. i. 9-12.

We now come to the prayer of Col. i. 9-12. It is concerned with the "knowledge of God", and is divided into two parts. The first part deals with prayer "with the object that (hina) ye might be filled as to the knowledge of His will"; the second part using en and eis ("in" and "unto"—"means" and "end") deals with fruit and increase as to the knowledge of God.

The prayer (Col. i. 9-12).

A | 9. Object (hina). | That ye may be filled as to the knowledge of His will.
  B | 9-11. Means (en) and end (eis).
    a1 | 9. Means (en). In all wisdom and spiritual understanding.
      b1 | 10. End (eis). Unto all pleasing. Walk.
    a2 | 10. Means (en). In every good work being fruitful.
      b1 | 10. End (eis). Unto the knowledge of God increasing.
    a3 | 11. Means (en). In all might being strengthened.
      b3 | 11. End (eis). Unto all patience and longsuffering.
A | 12. With (meta). | With joy giving thanks for meetness for inheritance.

The object.—"That ye might be filled with the knowledge of His will." There are five occurrences of the verb "to fill" in Colossians, and if the one translation, "to complete", be used, some idea of the intention of the apostle may be gathered. We do not, however, suggest this word as the best translation of pleroo.

A | i. 9. That ye might be complete as to the knowledge of His will.
B | i. 25. The dispensation . . . . . to complete the Word of God.
C | ii. 10. Ye are complete in Him.
A | iv. 12. That ye may stand perfect and complete in all the will of God.
B | iv. 17. Take heed to the ministry . . . . . that thou complete it.

The prayer of Epaphras (Col. iv. 12) brings together the prayer (Col. i. 9) and the desire (Col. i. 28) of the apostle. It is important enough to justify repetition in this connection:--

Paul's prayer (Col. i. 9).—Complete in knowledge of His will.
Paul's desire (Col. i. 28).—Present every man perfect in Christ Jesus.
Epaphras' prayer (Col. iv. 12).—Perfect and complete in all the will of God.

The desire of Paul (Col. i. 28) is associated with "warning": "Warning every man, and teaching every man in all wisdom, that we may present every man perfect in Christ Jesus." This shows that the prayers of Col. i. 9-12 and of iv. 12 have in mind the great central theme of the epistle (Col. ii. 4-23) summed up in the word Beware.

Moreover, the first great cure for the error that was creeping into Colosse is this same thought. Why, says the apostle, be spoiled by an empty (vain) philosophy? In Christ dwells all the fullness of the Godhead bodily, and ye are complete (filled full) in Him. Why be occupied with shadows? The body is of Christ (Col. ii. 16, 17).

There is a still further connection seen when we compare Col. iii. 16, 17 with Eph. v. 18-20:--

"And be not drunk with wine, wherein is excess, but be filled with the Spirit; speaking to yourselves in psalms and hymns and spiritual songs, singing and making melody in your heart to the Lord. Giving thanks always for all things unto God and the Father in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ" (Eph. v. 18-20).

"Let the word of Christ dwell in you richly; in all wisdom teaching and admonishing one another in psalms and hymns and spiritual songs, singing with grace in your hearts to the Lord. And whatsoever ye do in word or deed, do all in the name of the Lord Jesus, giving thanks to God and the Father by Him" (Col. iii. 16, 17).

The parallel is too obvious to require any elaboration. That which demands attention here is the truth that emerges by comparing the opening words of each quotation. In Ephesians Paul says, "Be filled with the Spirit". In Colossians he says, "Let the Word of Christ dwell in you". What a gigantic system of false teaching has been built upon the words, "Be filled with the Spirit"! It constitutes practically the key-text and basis of all "Pentecostal" movements, and, in spite of the context, has led to much "excess". The parallel leads us to see that to be filled with the Spirit is to be indwelt richly by the word of Christ.

An examination of the original of Eph. v. 18 not only shews the basic error of Pentecostalism, but the true meaning of the apostle. The verb pleroo, "to fill", in the passive, takes two cases following: (1). the genitive, which shows what the vessel is filled with -- (2). the dative, which shows the filler of the vessel. If the "Pentecostal" interpretation is correct, then we shall find the verb followed by the genitive, and the passage will have a meaning similar to that of Acts ii. 4, where "filled with pneuma hagion" refers to spiritual gifts. The fact is that in Eph. v. 18 the verb is followed by the dative, indicating that the Holy Spirit is the Filler. Col. iii. 16 states that with which He fills, namely, the word of Christ. Here is sanity, and true dispensational teaching; the other leads oftentimes to a spiritual Bedlam.

Whereas in Col. i. 9 the apostle prays for a knowledge of His will, in Eph. i. 17 he prays that God may give the spirit of wisdom and revelation in the knowledge of Him. There is, of course, no conflict between the two passages, for Heb. x. 7 says: "Then said I, Lo, I come (in the volume of the book it is written of Me) to do Thy Will, O God." To know Christ is to know the will of God. To walk in Christ is to walk in the will of God. To be perfect in Christ is to stand perfect and complete in all the will of God. This was the apostle's prayer for the Colossians: "I do not cease to pray for you, and to desire that ye might be filled with a knowledge of His will." May it be ours, too, for ourselves and for one another.

The Coming of the Lord.

The O.T. foundation.
#6. The visions of Zechariah.
pp. 22 - 24

There are allusions to the second coming in the minor prophets, such as Hab. ii. 3, 4 (with Heb. x. 37), Hag. ii. 7-9, and Joel iii. 13-16 (with Rev. xiv. 15-18), which the reader should search out in order to make full acquaintance with O.T. testimony to this important aspect of truth. For the present, however, we will turn to the visions of Zechariah:--

> "Rejoice greatly, O daughter of Zion: shout, O daughter of Jerusalem: behold, thy King cometh unto thee: He is just, and having salvation: lowly, and riding upon an ass, and upon a colt the foal of an ass" (Zech ix. 9).

There is a notable omission in the quotation of this prophecy in Matt. xxi. 5 and John xii. 15:--

> "Tell ye the daughter of Zion, Behold, thy King cometh unto thee, meek, and sitting upon an ass, and a colt the foal of an ass."

The multitudes "shouted", they cried "Hosannah", which means "Save now", but not so the inspired writer. He omits the shout and the salvation. Not until the Lord comes the second time will Zion cry out and shout, or salvation be brought to her.

Following the passage quoted from Zech. ix. 9 comes the resulting peace and dominion:--

> "And I will (He shall, LXX) cut off the chariot from Ephraim, and the horse from Jerusalem, and the battle bow shall be cut off: and He shall speak peace unto the heathen: and His dominion shall be from sea even to sea, and from the river unto the ends of the earth."

Our conception of "meekness" does not fit in with the idea of triumph and conquest, and some may object to the application of this passage to Rev. xix. and the Rider on the white horse. Psa. xlv. 4, 5, however, shows that there is no incongruity:--

> "And in Thy majesty ride prosperously because of truth and meekness . . . . . Thine arrows are sharp in the heart of the king's enemies."

Jerusalem is the centre of interest in Zechariah, and is prominent in the prophetic sections that speak of the Lord's coming. For example, chapter xii., verse 2, says: "Behold, I will make Jerusalem a cup of trembling unto all the people round about." And it is in connection with the sore straits of the besieged city that Zechariah speaks of the second coming:--

> "In that day shall the Lord defend the inhabitants of Jerusalem . . . . . and it shall come to pass in that day, that I will seek to destroy all the nations that come against Jerusalem. And I will pour upon the house of David, and upon the inhabitants of Jerusalem, the spirit of grace and supplications, and they shall look upon Me Whom they have pierced, and they shall mourn for Him" (Zech. xii. 8-14).

John xix. 34-37 leaves us in no doubt as to the identity of Him Who was thus pierced, and Rev. i. 7 reveals with equal certainty that Zech. xii. is future:--

> "Behold, He cometh with clouds; and every eye shall see Him, and they also which pierced Him: and all tribes of the land shall wail because of Him. Even so, Amen."

There has never been a national mourning by Israel for the death of Christ, there has never been a destruction of the enemies of Jerusalem since N.T. times, and since the partial beginning at Pentecost there has never been poured out upon Israel the spirit of grace.

The Mount of Olives.

Zechariah resumes the theme of Jerusalem's trouble and the Lord's deliverance:--

> "I will gather all nations against Jerusalem to battle . . . . . Then shall the Lord go forth and fight against those nations . . . . . and His feet shall stand upon the Mount of Olives, which is before Jerusalem on the east . . . . . and the Lord my God shall come and all the saints with Thee" (Zech. xiv. 1-6).

There can be no doubt as to the literality of the Mount of Olives. It is described geographically as being "before Jerusalem on the east". Moreover, to question the identity of the place would be to introduce a serious problem into Acts i.:--

> "A cloud received Him out of their sight . . . . . This same Jesus, which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen Him go into heaven. Then returned they unto Jerusalem from the mount called Olivet."

The direct association between the second coming of Acts i. and Zech. xiv. established by the angel's message, confirms the appropriateness of the apostles' question as to the restoration of the kingdom to Israel (Acts i. 6), and leaves no room for "the church" in this aspect of hope. It can be none other than "the hope of Israel" mentioned by Paul as still obtaining in Acts xxviii. 20.

The visions of Zechariah concerning the second coming can be summed up in his own words: "Jerusalem, Thy King cometh."

From one end of his prophecy to the other, Jerusalem and its deliverance and restoration are prominent, and the coming Lord is set forth as Israel's King when the reign of peace has commenced. This is twice given in Zech. xiv. 16, 17, "The Kings, the Lord of Hosts".

What is true of Zechariah is true of all the prophets.

> "He shall send Jesus Christ . . . . . Whom the heavens must receive until the times of restitution of all things, which God has spoken by the mouth of all His holy prophets since the world began" (Acts iii. 20, 21).

#7. The burden of Malachi.
pp. 64 - 66

The last of the prophets, Malachi, anticipates the dual ministry of the two forerunners of the Messiah, John the Baptist and Elijah. The name Malachi means "My messenger".

> "Behold, I will send My messenger, and he shall prepare the way before Me" (Mal. iii. 1).
>
> "The beginning of the gospel of Jesus Christ, the Son of God; as it is written in the prophets, Behold, I send My messenger before Thy face, which shall prepare Thy way before Thee . . . . . John did baptize in the wilderness" (Mark i. 1-4).
> "John . . . . . sent two of his disciples . . . . . Jesus began to say concerning John . . . . . this is he, of whom it is written, Behold, I send My messenger before Thy face, which shall prepare Thy way before Thee" (Matt. xi. 2-10).

With the purport of these passages before us, we cannot avoid seeing that in Mal. iii. 1, John the Baptist is in view, yet when we read on we are conscious of the conflicting fact that verse 2 introduces a very different atmosphere from that of the four Gospels and John's day. Let us notice the language:--

> "But who may abide the day of His coming? and who shall stand when He appeareth? . . . . . He shall purify the sons of Levi . . . . . then shall the offering of Judah and Jerusalem be pleasant unto the Lord, as in the days of old, and as in former years" (Mal. iii. 2-4).

This passage most surely speaks of the second coming, yet it is closely associated with John the Baptist. In Mal. iv. 1, 2 we read:--

> "For, behold, the day cometh, that shall burn as an oven; and all the proud . . . . . shall be stubble . . . . . but unto you that fear My name shall the Sun of righteousness arise with healing in His wings."

Here there is close association with another messenger and forerunner, namely, Elijah:--

> "Behold, I will send you Elijah the prophet before the coming of the great and dreadful day of the Lord, and he shall turn the heart of the fathers to the children . . . . . lest I come and smite the earth with a curse" (Mal. iv. 5, 6).

What, then, is the connection between these two personages and the two comings? Turning to the New Testament we shall find that the two messengers are intimately related. When the birth of John the Baptist was announced to his father, Zacharias, the angel said of John: "Many of the children of Israel shall he turn to the Lord their God. And he shall go before Him in the spirit and power of Elijah" (Luke i. 16, 17). When John was asked by the priests and Levites, "Art thou Elijah?" he said, "I am not" (John i. 21).

The Lord, however, when He had vindicated John the Baptist, as we have already seen in Matt. xi., spoke of the kingdom of heaven suffering violence and opposition. Then alluding to John, He says: "And if ye will receive it (i.e. the kingdom), this is Elijah, which was for to come" (Matt. xi. 14). That this was a cryptic, or parabolic, utterance seems certain by the added words, "he that hath ears to hear, let him hear" (verse 15).

When the Lord descended from the mount of transfiguration, the disciples raised the question of Elijah's coming:--

> "Why then say the scribes that Elijah must first come? And Jesus answered and said unto them, Elijah truly shall first come, And restore all things" (Matt. xvii. 10, 11).

Here is a plain answer, endorsing the belief that Elijah himself must come before the restoration of all things can take place. But the Lord then proceeds to bring the spirit of the passage to bear upon the time then present, continuing:--

> "But I say unto you, That Elijah is come already, and they knew him not, but have done unto him whatsoever they listed. Likewise shall also the Son of man suffer of them. Then the disciples understood that He spake unto them of John the Baptist" (Matt. xvii. 12, 13).

While there were, therefore, at the first coming of the Lord, provisional arrangements sufficient to remove all idea that the non-repentance of Israel was destined and therefore without responsibility, He Who knew all things in a manner we cannot even imagine, knew that the Messiah would be rejected. John the Baptist was not Elijah, but he came in the spirit and power of Elijah. Except in a typical, anticipatory fashion the kingdom was not set up. The great work of redemption was accomplished, but the real coming and restoration of the kingdom await the day of days toward which all the prophets point.

We have now considered the main witnesses of the O.T. to the second coming of the Lord:--

1. The prophecy of Enoch.
2. The patience of Job.
3. The prayers of David.
4. The visions of Isaiah.
5. The dreams of Daniel
6. The visions of Zechariah.
7. The burdens of Malachi.

They unite in one grand witness to the personal return of the Lord from heaven to earth, there, upon the overthrow of Gentile dominion and Babylon, to set up a kingdom closely connected with the city of Jerusalem, the nation of Israel, and the commencement of that period when the curse shall be removed from the earth, and also the veil from the face of all people, "beginning at Jerusalem".

It must be obvious to all that any system of interpretation that takes up the teaching of the second coming without due regard to this consistent and far-reaching line of witnesses, is of necessity liable to lead its exponents into tremendous mistakes.

We propose examining the N.T. references in much the same way as we have those of the O.T., giving particular heed to two things:--

1. Points of agreement with O.T. prophecy, and
2. Points of departure from, or addition to, O.T. prophecy.

Not until we have so done can we feel safe in expressing our belief concerning many features of this wondrous theme that are often taken for granted.

The N.T. fulfillment.
#8. When the "any moment" coming was possible.
Matthew's Gospel.
pp. 143 - 145

Having reviewed the O.T. teaching concerning the second coming of the Lord, we turn to the N.T. to observe how far its teaching is a confirmation of the O.T. prophecy, and how far it adds to or departs from that which has been already revealed. We propose to carry out this investigation in the following order: (1) The Gospels, (2) The Acts, (3) The Epistles of the Circumcision, (4) The Revelation, (5) The Epistles of Paul, (a) before Acts xxviii., and (b) after Acts xxviii.

The four Gospels.

Coming to the four Gospels, we find their witness divided as follows: (1) The synoptic Gospels, Matthew, Mark, and Luke, and (3) John. Our present paper is devoted to the synoptics, particularly Matthew.

Just as creation of Adam and the dominion given to him necessitates the second coming (see Psa. viii. and Heb. ii.), so the fact that Christ was "born King of the Jews" calls for a crowning day in the future.

First let us deal with the following somewhat problematic passages:--

> "But when they persecute you in this city, flee ye unto another, for verily I say unto you, Ye shall not have gone over the cities of Israel, till the Son of man be come" (Matt. x. 23).

> "For the Son of man shall come in the glory of His Father, with His angels; and then shall He reward every man according to his works. Verily I say unto you, There be some standing here which shall not taste of death till they see the Son of man coming in His kingdom" (Matt. xvi. 27, 28).
> "Ye shall not see Me henceforth, till ye shall say, Blessed is He that cometh in the name of the Lord" (xxiii. 39).
> "Verily I say unto you, This generation shall not pass away, till all these things be fulfilled" (xxiv. 34).

There is in each of these verses an untranslated particle, an, the effect of which is to make the sentence contingent upon something expressed or implied. We can gather from other scriptures, e.g., Acts iii. 19-21, that the second coming of the Lord would not take place while Israel remained unrepentant.

In "The Prophecies of the Last Days", by William Ker, a suggestion is made which is helpful when considering Matt. xxiv. 34. The author draws attention to the fact that punctuation and accent are unknown in the earliest Greek manuscripts. Aute and haute would be written exactly alike, the breathing or its absence being denoted by an accent like our apostrophe. Aute would have the accent turned to the left (’); haute to the right (‘). With the recognition of these facts all difficulty vanishes from Matt. xxiv. 34.

> "Verily I say unto you, THAT generation shall not pass away till all these things be fulfilled."
> "So speedy shall then be the succession of events, so shall the days be shortened (verse 22), that the same generation which witnessed the beginning of these signs shall witness also the end."

The Son of man.

This title occurs in Matt. xvi. 27, 28; xxiv. 30, 39; xxv. 31; and xxvi. 64. The last reference is decisive in its character:--

> "Hereafter shall ye see the Son of man sitting on the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven."

Immediately these words are uttered by the Lord, the High Priest accuses Him of blasphemy. This is understood when seen in the light of Dan. vii. 13, 14:--

> "I saw in the night visions, and, behold, One like the SON OF MAN came with the CLOUDS OF HEAVEN, and came unto the Ancient of days, and they brought Him near before Him. And there was given Him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all people, nations and languages should serve Him: His dominion is an everlasting dominion which shall not pass away, and His kingdom that which shall not be destroyed."

By no legitimate system of interpretation can this dominion be made to refer to "The Church". On the contrary, the passage exactly fits into Matthew’s theme, which is pre-eminently the King and the kingdom.

Matt. xvi. 27, 28 refers to the same coming and kingdom. That coming would takes place either within the lifetime of some who heard the words, or, failing that, would possibly be deferred. This is implied by the particle "an", "if". Israel did not repent; though granted nearly forty years in which to fulfil the implication of the "if". They failed to do so, and when the longsuffering of God reached this limit, they were set aside, and the possibility of the Lord's return during the lifetime of any of His early disciples ceased to be practical truth. The transfiguration which immediately follows Matt. xvi. is a partial fulfillment and prophetic foreshadowing, as Peter himself testifies in II Pet. i. 16-18.

These four passages must be considered together if they are to be understood:--

A | x. 23. Not finish the cities . . . . . till He may have come.
B | xvi. 28. Not taste death till see.
B | xxiii. 39. May not see Me till say.
A | xxiv. 34. That generation not pass till . . . . . fulfilled.

It is not our purpose to tarry long over details or difficulties in this series. However, should readers find difficulty over these passages, we shall be glad to help, but we do not wish to go over ground already covered and so unnecessarily waste time.

We have touched upon these passages together in order to leave the way clear to take up the classic passage on the second coming in the Gospels, namely, Matt. xxiv. To this we hope to give attention in our next paper.

#9. Matthew xxiv.
The sunteleia. The times of refreshing. The presence of the Lord.
pp. 188 - 192

The passages we have looked at in Matthew's Gospel, while adding their quota to the teaching of the N.T. concerning the second coming of the Lord, are nevertheless isolated and fragmentary in character. Matt. xxiv. on the other hand is a discourse wholly devoted to the subject. This notable discourse is introduced by the closing verses of Matt. xxiii.:--

> "O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, thou that killest the prophets, and stonest them which are sent unto thee, how often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not. Behold, your house is left unto you desolate. For I say unto you, Ye shall not see Me henceforth, till ye shall say, Blessed is He that cometh in the name of the Lord" (37-39).

We have here a quotation from Psa. cxviii. 25, 26:--

> "Save now (Hosannah), I beseech Thee, O Lord . . . . . Blessed be He that cometh in the name of the Lord, we have blessed you out of the house of the Lord."

The Hosannah quotation is found in Matt. xxi. 9. It is important to notice that the cry, "Blessed be He that cometh" is closely associated with "the house of the Lord". This adds point to the Lord's words, "Your house is left unto you desolate", and also provides a reason for the disciples' remarks concerning the buildings of the temple. When the Lord told them that there should not be left one stone upon another, it is evident by their threefold question that this desolation was connected in their minds with the coming of the Lord.

The threefold question.

This threefold question and its answer occupies the whole of Matt. xxiv. from verse 3:--

> "And as He sat upon the mount of Olives, the disciples came unto Him privately, saying, Tell us:--
>
> (1) When shall these things be?
> (2) And what shall be the sign of Thy coming.
> (3) And the end of the age?"

In answering the disciples' questions, the Lord deals with them in the reverse order:--

1. The end of the age (4-24).
2. The sign of the coming (25-31).
3. When these things shall be (32-42).

The answer of the Lord as to the end of the age is twofold. First, negative—"The end is not yet"; "all these are the beginning of sorrows". Second, positive—"Then shall the end come". Before going further we must notice that there are two words here translated "end". In verse 3 it is sunteleia. In verse 6, 13 and 14 it is telos. The phrase "the sunteleia of the age" occurs only in the Gospel of Matthew, whilst "the sunteleia of the ages" occurs but once, viz., in Hebrews:--

> "The harvest is the end of the age" (Matt. xiii. 39).
> "So shall it be at the end of the age" (Matt. xiii. 40, 49).
> "The end of the age" (Matt. xxiv. 3).
> "Even unto the end of the age" (Matt. xxviii. 20).
> "Once in the end of the ages" (Heb. ix. 26).

The first occurrence connects the term with the harvest and in this lies the explanation of the word, for the first occurrence of the same word in the LXX of Exod. xxiii. 16 refers to the same period:--

> "The feast of harvest, the firstfruits of thy labours, which thou hast sown in the field: and the feast of ingathering (sunteleia) which is in the end of the year, when thou hast gathered in thy labours out of the field."

At first it may seem that there is a discrepancy between the Lord's words in Matt. xiii. 39 and this passage. The Lord said that the harvest was the sunteleia, whereas Exod. xxiii. speaks of a feast of harvest, as distinct from the feast of the sunteleia. The answer is suggested by the presence of the word "firstfruits", and by the particular kind of harvest in view—"which thou hast sown in the field". A reference to Exod. xxxiv. 22, however, makes all plain: "Thou shalt observe the feast of weeks, of the firstfruits of thy wheat harvest, and the feast of the ingathering at the year's end."

Now, the disciples being Jews and taught in the law, knew the order of their feasts and much of their typical nature. Unless the reader has definitely studied the feasts of Israel he is at a disadvantage here, and before we can hope to appreciate the teaching of Matt. xxiv., we must supply the deficiency. There is one chapter in the law that sets out the feasts of Israel in their order, namely, Lev. xxiii., and to that we must turn.

The feasts of the Lord.

The sabbaths (Lev. xxiii. 1-3). The first of the feasts to be mentioned is the weekly sabbath. This underlies the whole of God's dealings with Israel. There are the following sabbaths mentioned:--

Sabbath of seven days (Lev. xxiii. 3).
Sabbath of seven weeks (Lev. xxiii. 15).
Sabbath of seven months (Lev. xxiii. 34).
Sabbath of seven years (Lev. xxv. 2-7).
Sabbath of seven seven years (Lev. xxv. 8-17).
Sabbath of seventy years (Dan. ix. 2), and finally the Sabbath of seventy times seven (Dan. ix. 24), in which the whole purpose of God for Israel shall be accomplished.

This emphasis is too insistent to be avoided. Underlying the whole history of Israel is this sabbatic element. From verse 4 of Lev. xxiii. feasts "in their seasons" are recorded, which also conform to the sabbatic character. We have, in verse 5, the feast of the first month detailed, and in verses 34 and 39 that of the seventh month described. Between these two all the other feasts are found, so that while Israel's year had twelve months, with an intercalary thirteenth month at intervals, its typical year took note only of seven of these months.

We must now tabulate the feasts in order to place the sunteleia:--

(1) THE SABBATH.—Impressing the character of Israel's typical history (See Heb. iv. 9, Greek).
(2) THE PASSOVER.—Redemption, "out of".
(3) THE UNLEAVENED BREAD.—The sheaf waved (Lev. xxiii. 10).
A firstfruits.
(4) PENTECOST.—Two wave loaves. Fifty days. Jubilee anticipated.
* * * * * * *
(5) FEAST OF TRUMPETS.—Joel ii. 1 and 15; I Cor. xv. 52.
(6) THE DAY OF ATONEMENT.—Repentance (Lev. xxiii. 29).
Reconciliation and access.
(7) TABERNACLES.—The sunteleia. Harvest and ingathering.
The eighth day stressed (Lev. xxiii. 39).

While, experimentally, we must all begin with redemption—Passover, "the first month of the year to you" (Exod. xii. 2), God begins with the Sabbath, and the purpose of the age is to restore that which is past.

Passover, Unleavened Bread, Pentecost and the Firstfruits have received their fulfillment (I Cor. v. 7, 8; Acts ii.; I Cor. xv. 20). Between Pentecost and Trumpets (Nos. 4 and 5 in the list above) is an interval of some months, with no feast to mark it, only a reference to "the poor and the stranger". Here, in these silent months between Pentecost and Trumpets, is where the dispensation of the mystery finds its place.

The Feast of Tabernacles, being the sunteleia, must be given a little closer attention. This feast celebrates both the harvests of "the corn and the wine" (Deut. xvi. 13). At the return of the captivity under Ezra, and again under Nehemiah (Ezra iii. 4 and Neh. viii. 14) this feast was observed, and this is the feast picked out by God for annual observance by all the nations that are left after the coming of the Lord (Zech. xiv. 16-19). The association of "tabernacles" and the coming of the Lord explains Peter's suggestion on the mount of transfiguration, that he should make three tabernacles (Matt. xvii. 4).

After the detailed statement of Lev. xxiii. 34-36, the writer returns to the feast of tabernacles to give further particulars (verses 39-43), thus marking it as of great importance. Here we have the command to take boughs of trees and to dwell in booths or tabernacles. Here also is emphasized the "eighth day" which is "the last day, that great day of the feast" (John vii. 2 and 37), when the Lord spake of the full outpouring of the Spirit—upon His own glorification—partially fulfilled at Pentecost, but awaiting His second coming for its complete fulfillment.

The "eighth day" brings us to resurrection. The tabernacles speak of true "peace and safety", and all these typical observances are covered by the word sunteleia used by the disciples when they came to the Lord with their question: 'What shall be the sign of Thy coming, and the end of the age?" That "end" they knew was harvest, ingathering, rejoicing, peace; all inseparable from the coming of the Lord. Until He is "glorified" that "consummation" devoutly to be wished is as unattainable as Utopia, a mirage, the will-o'-the-wisp of politicians and reformers who have not grasped the essential relation between "the times of refreshing" and "the presence of the Lord". That wholesome lesson it is hoped we have learned. And now, having some understanding of what the question of Matt. xxiv. 3 includes and implies, we can give more earnest heed to the answers that follow.

#10. The Lord's threefold answer as to "When" and "What" (Matt. xxiv.).

pp. 224 - 230

Having seen the scriptural meaning of the "end", and its type in the feast of tabernacles, we now proceed to the continuation of the Lord's answers to His disciples' questions. In verses 4-24 He takes up this question of the "end". The first and last words in this section deal with deception:--

"And Jesus answered and said unto them, Take heed that no man deceive you; for many shall come in My name and shall deceive many" (verses 4, 5).

"For there shall arise false Christs, and false prophets, and shall shew great signs and wonders; insomuch that, if it were possible, they shall deceive the very elect" (verse 24).

Following this opening warning concerning the false Christs the Lord tells of the feature indicative of the beginning of sorrows, but adds, "The end is not yet". Verses 6-14 are occupied with the characteristic features that lead up to the "end" (telos):--

Negative.—"The end is not yet" (verse 6).
Explanatory.—"All these are the beginning of sorrows" (verse 8).
Exhortative.—"Endure to the end . . . . . be saved" (verse 13).
Positive.—"Then shall the end come" (verse 14).

As with the prophecies of the O.T., such as Isaiah, Daniel, and Zechariah, "the nations" are involved in this period of the "end". Wars and rumours of wars, with nation rising against nation, form part of the beginning of sorrows. Hatred by all nations, yet the preaching of the gospel to all nations for a witness, ushers in the end.

The "end" is marked by "tribulation" in two phases. Firstly, during the "beginning of sorrows", the Lord says: "They shall deliver you up to be tribulated" (afflicted, as in verses 21 and 29). Secondly, there comes "great tribulation, such as was not since the beginning of the world till now, no, nor ever shall be" (verse 21).

We may now visualize the outstanding features of this first answer:--

A | xxiv. 4, 5. Warning against deception by false Christs.
B | 6-14. The beginning of sorrows. "Endure", "saved".
B | 15-22. The tribulation in full course. "Shortened", "saved".
A | 23, 24. Warning against deception by false Christs.

Intermingled with the conflict of nations we have famines, pestilences and earthquakes, as signs of the beginning of sorrows. A gleam of hope is found in these passages of gloom in the word "sorrow". Odin and odino speak, not of sorrow in general, but pains in one particular, “pains that issue in birth”. There are altogether seven occurrences:-- “Whom God raised up, having loosed the pains of death” (Acts ii. 24).

“As travail upon a woman with child” (I Thess. v. 3).

(and in all the other references, viz., Mark xiii. 8, Gal. iv. 19, 27, and Rev. xii. 2).

This last reference is illuminated by Matt. xxiv., and sends back light in return. The birth pains of Rev. xii. 2 are followed by the rise of the beast and the false prophet, and the war on the saints of chapter xiii. There also, in Rev. xiii., is the abomination of desolation spoken of by Daniel the prophet.

A CRITICISM DEALT WITH.

"The Super-heavenlies", "The Three Spheres", and "Far above all".

An attempt to help all critics who "frankly do not know what the Berean Expositor teaches." #1. pp. 109 - 112

There is a true proverb that "two wrongs do not make one right", and in contending for the faith we must ever pray to be preserved from putting out our hand to stay the ark of God, and from using carnal weapons for spiritual ends. This is specially so in the realm of criticism, and perhaps most of all when we seek to refute charges such as those made against us by A.E.K.

At the outset, therefore, we charge ourselves before the Lord to remember that truth is His, and ours is but a stewardship; to remember that in many things we offend all; also to realize that where erroneous charges are made against us, they injure those who entertain them far more than they can injure us. The believer has no warrant, so far as we can see, for attempting his own exoneration—he must leave that, as Paul did, in the hands of the Lord—but stewardship involves the faith of many others, and silence under criticism might be misconstrued. For the truth's sake, therefore, and not for personal victory or vindication, we take up a criticism that is being circulated concerning part of our teaching. A manner of life worthy of the gospel of Christ includes a striving for the faith of the gospel (Phil. i. 27). May the truth of God prevail.

Those who criticizes what we have written in connection with the expression en tois epouraniois used in Ephesians, seem either to have ignored or to have overlooked a very definite statement published in Volume VII of The Berean Expositor in 1917, which gives in brief an indication of all that has been written since.

Closely associated with the translation "super-heavenlies" is the question of "the three spheres". On this matter we quote a statement put forward by our critic:--

> "To begin with, the Word of God knows nothing of the so-called 'three spheres'. In the beginning it commences with two, the heavens and the earth. There is no such 'sphere' as the super-heavenlies. It is non-scriptural, unscriptural and misleading."

Would it not be thought that anyone with a knowledge of the Bible would remember that, subsequent to the creation of Gen. i. 1, the heaven of Gen. i. 8 came into existence? Now let us ask our critic to say, after reading Gen. i. 1-8, whether there are still but two spheres? Is not the heaven of Gen. i. 8 something lower and destined at length to pass away? Yet even that heaven cannot be limited to the aerial heavens, where birds fly (i. 20), for birds do not fly as far as the sun and moon (i. 15). It will be seen that in Gen. i. we have the first and original heaven, and then the heaven of the present creation, which is itself subdivided. If our critic had read what we have written, there would have been no need to ridicule the idea that the church is "far above all" heavens, and therefore outside of heaven altogether, for such an idea is quite meaningless, and not what we have taught. We have definitely associated the church of the one body* with the "heaven" of Gen. i. 1 and with the new heavens, and have dissociated it from the heavens that pass away after the millennium. Perhaps it will be more convincing to quote a statement that has been in print for over twelve years:--

> "One of the distinctive marks of the calling of the one body is its heavenly destiny. The word 'heavenly' is not full enough to convey all that the word used in Ephesians implies—super-celestial is nearer. In the original of the New Testament two words are employed, both translated 'heavenly' (ouraniois and epouraniois). The added word epi signifies upon or over, and refers to the heavens that are above the firmament, and beyond the limitations of the present creation (compare Gen. i. with Psalms cxlviii. 4, I Kings viii. 27, and Heb. vii. 26)."—See Volume VII, page 8.

These words are surely definite enough. The critic we have in mind remarks in connection with one phase of our teaching:--

> "Frankly, I do not know what The Berean Expositor teaches. Neither can I find anyone else who is clear."

What is there that is obscure in the above quotation from Volume VII? The same volume touches upon the subject again:--

> "On many occasions the Scriptures speak of God 'stretching out the heavens'. Psa. civ. 2, 'Who stretched out the heavens like a curtain'; also Isa. xl. 22; xlii. 5; xlv. 12; li. 13; Jer. x. 12; li. 15; Zech. xii. 1 . . . . . When we grasp the significance of the firmament, and the purpose that is carried out within its expanse, we may then see the perfect fitness of the statements of Ephesians, where in the words 'the heavenly places' (epouraniois, a word which literally means 'upon the heavens'), we are taken beyond the firmament . . . . . Ephesians always speaks of the blessings of the one body as being in the epouraniois, the sphere above the heavens. Peter, however, does not pierce the firmament, the inheritance he speaks of is reserved 'in the heavens', not in the sphere above the heavens" (Volume VII, page 45).

It is not, surely, expecting too much from any reader who realizes the value of a context to assume that our statements concerning a sphere "above the heavens" will be understood to refer to the heavens that belong to this present age, the firmament of Gen. i. 8. The critic who labours to destroy something which we do not teach may be very sincere, as the closing paragraph of this criticism assure us, and may really believe, as he says, that our teaching is "malignant" and that The Berean Expositor is now "committed to apostasy", but what of his fitness to criticize?

We give another quotation on this subject from The Berean Expositor:--

[* - This is also criticized, but Eph. iv. 4 is, for us, sufficient.]

> "THE NEW HEAVENS AND THE NEW EARTH.—To this period belong the blessings of the mystery. The only calling or revelation that has pierced the present temporary heaven and touched that which can be spoken of as eternal is that dispensation of the grace of God which has blessed us with all spiritual blessings in the super-heavenlies far above all. This shows the unique character of the church of the one body. It is connected both by time and place with that which begins before the present heavens were made and goes on when the present heavens shall be no more. The church of the mystery is the only link during this age between the time before sin entered and the time when sin shall be no more. All other purposes are 'under the heavens'. This one alone places those who are blessed under its terms 'above the heavens'. If these things are so, it would be very surprising if the doctrine and practice of this peculiar people were not different from all others" (Volume XI, page 76).

If we pay regard to the context, "above the heavens" here refers to a position above those heavens associated with the six days' creation. Taken out of its context it might possibly form the butt for an adverse critic, but such criticism, however sincere, would be harmful and untrue.

One more quotation should be enough to cause any honest critic to retract the accusation that we teach that the sphere of blessing of the church is "far above" the heavens, in the widest significance of the term. We quote the following to show that we are not misrepresenting our critic's attack:--

> "This is true of Christ's exaltation also. He is not outside the heavens, He is highest in them."

This is our critic's statement. Now for our own, taken from our pamphlet Far above all (pages 6-8):--

> "Of no other company of believers is it said their sphere of blessings is IN the super-heavenlies . . . . . The special sphere of blessing which belongs alone to the church of the one body is mentioned five times in this epistle, and a study of these occurrences will supply us with valuable information. First of all we translate the word 'super-heavenlies' in recognition of the presence of the particle epi with which the word begins. It is not simply ouraniois which is the usual word, but epi-ouraniois. Secondly, the information supplied by the five references demands some such translation. Passing therefore to the second reference, we find, in i. 20, 21, that this sphere of blessing is:--
>
> That this tremendous height is the destined sphere of the church of the mystery ii. 6 declares. There the believer is associated with the risen Christ, 'made to sit together in the super-heavenlies in Christ Jesus'. Christ the Head and the Church His Body are blessed together THERE.
> The next two references, iii. 10 and vi. 12, show the super-heavenlies as the abode of principalities, powers and rulers. Be it noted that angels are not mentioned. Angels are heaven's messengers. The church of the one body is blessed even above heaven's nobility. Dominions and thrones are beneath it in its super-heavenly sphere . . . . . While epouraniois is used outside Ephesians, no other company of believers is blessed IN these exalted regions as their sphere. The blessings of the church of the one body are not only 'heavenly' but 'up in heaven'."

As a believer in Christ who owes his all to grace, we refrain from using stronger terms with regard to our critic's statements, but surely the capital type of "IN" and "THERE", as well as the actual wording in the above quotation, give the lie direct to the false criticism that implies that our use of "super-heavenly" or "far above all" indicates some fictitious position outside and beyond the heavens altogether.

We must leave other matter for a subsequent article.

#2. pp. 128 - 132

In our previous paper we reprinted four extracts from The Berean Expositor, two from Volume VII published in 1917, one from Volume XI published in 1921, and one from "Far Above All". In this paper we will consider the criticism of our teaching a little further.

Following the statement we have already quoted from our critic, that "the Word of God knows nothing of the so-called 'three spheres'," is an extract from a concordance, now in preparation, which is excellent. Every occurrence of epouranion-os is given and set out that nominative, genitive, dative and accusative cases, together with number and gender, may be readily distinguished. We are then asked to "note carefully that this term is not confined to the prison epistles, there are as many occurrences in Hebrews alone as in Ephesians and Philippians". Passing by the argument as to grammar, our critic continues:--

> "What possible sense can there be to the occurrences in Hebrews, if the reference is to the 'third sphere', far above the heavens?"

Now, above all things, we want to be fair. We understand these words to mean that, inasmuch as epouranios is used of the Hebrews as well as of the church of Ephesians, the so-called third sphere is an error, and the heavenly Jerusalem and its calling are not essentially distinct from the calling and citizenship of the church. In order to confirm this, however, we will again quote our critic's own words:--

> "Another remarkable statement shows how loosely and blindly this argument had been conducted. We quote: 'We rejoice that God in His grace has not given us a place in the 'heavenly city' that comes down from God out of heaven . . . . ."
>
> "But the word 'heavenly' (ouranios) is never applied to this city, though it is mis-called 'the heavenly Jerusalem' in our versions. It is precisely the same word, and the same case as in Ephesians. Only the 'things' of Ephesians, until it descends. If Ephesians speaks of a 'super-heavenly' sphere, then the new Jerusalem must be 'super-heavenly' also."

It is quite clear from these two quotations that our critic opposes our interpretation, which seeks to differentiate between the two spheres of blessing, keeping the church "far above all principalities and powers", &c., and the new Jerusalem on a lower plane. He says, let us repeat: "The celestial Jerusalem must be one of the on-heavenly 'things' of Ephesians, until it descends."

Moreover, in referring to Phil. iii. 20, our critic seeks to show that the destiny of those spoken of is heaven, the "second sphere" which, according to his interpretation, is the same as the "super-heavenlies", the "third sphere". After quoting Phil. iii. 20, Col. i. 5, and Col. iv. 1, where "heaven" is used, he continues:--

> "Can language be plainer than this? The citizenship of the Philippians saints was not above the heavens, but belonged to them."

It is then very evident that our critic opposes our attempted distinction. We will, however, let him explain still further. In an introduction to the Epistle to the Hebrews, he writes as follows:--

> "The book of the Hebrews deals with the problem of these Pentecostal believers, and takes them back to the same position as was occupied by the patriarchs and prophets of old, as explained in the eleventh chapter. They died in faith, not having received the promises."

So Hebrews is written for the Pentecostal believers, and Heb. xi. takes them back to the position of the patriarchs and prophets of old. Inasmuch, too, as in Heb. xi., the better country is an on-heavenly one, and intimately connected with the city called "the on-heavenly Jerusalem" in xii. 22, and, further, as there is no so-called third sphere (the citizenship of Phil. iii. being in the "second sphere", associated with the new Jerusalem), then there is no essential difference between the spheres of blessing of the church of the mystery, of Pentecostal believers, and of O.T. saints! We do not think that we misrepresent our critic when we say that he definitely opposes us on this point.

Now comes an astonishing volte face. Commenting on Heb. iii. 1, "Partakers of the celestial calling", he writes:--

> "It is not easy, in English, to distinguish between the celestial calling here referred to, and the 'calling above' (Phil. iii. 14) of Paul's later revelation. That which is celestial as to location is often spoken of in Ephesians, as our blessing among the celestials . . . . . the celestial calling is from the ascended Christ, not to heaven, but from heaven. They have no part in the calling above. Their blessings, though celestial in character, are on earth."

We can imagine the reader rubbing his eyes on coming to this passage. He might, indeed, feel constrained to re-read the whole of the quotations, for here we have as complete and inexplicable a contradiction as can well be found.

The Berean Expositor endorses every word of this comment on Heb. iii. 1: it is what we have ourselves taught, and still stand for. But our critic wishes to keep both views. In controversy with his brethren, he is zealous to prove that the calling of Phil. iii. and the calling of Heb. xi. are both in "the second sphere". But when he is dealing only with Scripture itself, he cannot help but teach the exact opposite of his previous statement.

Of course the problem was with him all the time; he says: "The celestial Jerusalem, must be one of the on-heavenly 'things' of Ephesians, until it descends." Until it descends! Exactly; that is the crux of the matter. But when we express ourselves as thankful that we have not a place in that heavenly city that comes down from God out of heaven, that, our critic says, is heading straight for apostasy! When dealing with Heb. iii. 1 he admits the difficulty of expressing, in English, the word epouranios, and confesses that the English "up over all the heavens" is misleading, but hopes that, in time, "up over" the heavens will become acclimatized. No such leniency must be extended to the writer of The Berean Expositor, however, even if he but quotes the A.V. so as to avoid the difficulty. Our critic has said, "Frankly, I do not know what The Berean Expositor teaches". Surely some of our readers, after reading the above statements may, with justice, feel similarly about the writings of our critic.

We will not let the matter rest here, however, but will give, positively, not merely what we would reply now, but what we have already written. We quote from The Berean Expositor, Volume XI, pages 189, 190:--

> "A superficial exposition, which is ever ready to seize upon some verse to refute 'Ultra-dispensationalism', whatever that may mean, says:--
>
> > 'Here is the same word that is used in Ephesians, therefore the Hebrews were members of the One Body, and the whole dispensational distinction is exploded.'
>
> Readers of The Berean Expositor know full well that the peculiar and exclusive character of the dispensation of the mystery rests upon positive Scripture (e.g., Eph. i. 3, 20; ii. 6; iii. 10; and vi. 12, have a special feature to be found nowhere else—but this we leave.
> It is essentially in harmony with the perfecting of the pilgrim character, that those addressed should be called 'partakers of the heavenly calling', and that heavenly calling needs no further exposition than is given in Hebrews itself to make its scope and position clear to us.

> If we trace the teaching associated with this word, we are led on through participation of the 'gifts', which were anticipations of the world to come (vi.), and from the shadow to > the real tabernacle 'heaven itself', to the heavenly country, and heavenly Jerusalem. Heb. xii. 18-21 speaks of Moses, verses 22, 24 of 'Jesus, the mediator of the new covenant'. Connected with the latter is the perfecting of those who were sanctified. There we see them, 'the church of the firstborn, which are written in heaven'. These are associated with 'the spirits of perfect righteous ones' and the 'innumerable company of angels'. How any can confuse such a description with the right hand of God far above all principality and power is beyond our understanding. So far as we are concerned we see a decided difference and keep it so."

Our critic, when he penned a comment on Heb. iii. 1, saw a decided difference too; he definitely says: "They (the Hebrews) have no part in the calling above." We stated this twenty years ago, and we believe it to-day. Our critic said it himself some years ago, yet calls our teaching hard names to-day. Of course he has every right to alter his opinion completely if he believes further knowledge of the Scriptures calls for it. We trust we shall do so whenever we see differently. But we cannot help but feel and regret that to any unbiased reader our critic's testimony is damaged, and those who oppose any attempt to apply II Tim. ii. 15 will be rejoicing.

#3. pp. 148 - 152

Our readers know that we have drawn attention to the fact that while epouraniois occurs in many books of the N.T., the phrase en tois epuraniois is limited to the Epistle to the Ephesians. We have further drawn attention to the fact that the five occurrences of this phrase indicate the sphere of blessing for the church as being:--

(b) Far above all principality and power, and consequently higher than the New Jerusalem and all the heavenly host.

Criticising this teaching our critic speaks as follows:--

> "A change in the grammatical form certainly does not change super-heavenly to sub-heavenly!"

We certainly have never thought such transformation possible, but the ordinary reader may receive the impression that we have done so. We have laboured to show that the whole point of the references in Ephesians is that this company of believers are the only ones who well ever enter into their blessings "up in heaven" or "in the super-heavens"; all others, though having "heavenly" blessings, will enjoy them elsewhere:--

> "It is the same heaven, but the direction of the action is different. So the Ephesians are going to heaven. The Hebrews get their blessings from heaven and enjoy them on earth."

We feel tempted to give no hint as to the source of this last quotation. We believe it to be true. It teaches what we ourselves teach as to the difference between the "heavenly calling" of Heb. iii. 1—"heavenly" in character but not enjoyed "in heaven"—and the blessings of the church which are to be enjoyed "far above all principality and power" at the right hand of God "in the heavenlies". The above quotation might have been given by our critic from one of our own volumes. The remarkable fact is that it is his own recent statement. According to our critic The Berean Expositor is definitely "committed to apostasy", yet his teaching on this point is the same as our own. He differentiates between two callings, both of which are "heavenly"; one "heavenly" company going to heaven, the other receiving its blessings from heaven, but enjoying them on earth. With all these things we are in complete agreement, and it seems that we are perfectly right to emphasize the distinctive sphere of blessing of the church of the mystery in the super-heavenlies.

When dealing with other occurrences of the word epuraniois, our critic, speaking of the "celestial body" referred to by Paul in I Cor. xv. 40, says:--

> "According to this division of the word of truth, Corinthians is concerned with the lower heavenly sphere. Now, in speaking of the resurrection, those who are to be in this second sphere are provided with bodies for the third! How are my dear brethren, who claim the 'super-heavenlies' for themselves, going to keep me out if I am given a 'super-heavenly' body?"

The writer of this statement knows as well as we do that the present system, including the "heavens" of the present creation, are destined to pass away. Some things are to be shaken; some will endure and remain. A resurrection body that is going to pass unscathed through the final conflagration at the end of this system must be connected not with the heavens that pass away with a great noise, and roll up like a scroll, but with the super-heavens, the heavens of Gen. i. 1, the "heaven of heavens" of the O.T., the new heavens of Rev. xxi.

The answer to our critic's question as to how he will be kept out of the super-heavenlies which we claim for ourselves is found in his own words: "It is the same heaven, but the direction of the action is different. So the Ephesians are going to heaven. The Hebrews get their blessings from heaven and enjoy them on earth."

He approaches the answer to his own question when he refers to II Cor. v. 2 and its "home which is from heaven".

If our brother is a member of the body of Christ, nothing can exclude him from his sphere of blessing, not even his own denials or ignorance. If our brother is not a member of that body, the possession of an epuraniois body will not, on the principle which he himself warrants, be sufficient passport to enable him to go to heaven; he may find that this body from heaven is to enable him to enjoy the epuraniois city that comes down out of heaven. If, we do not say it is so, but if there be any analogy between Kadesh Barnea and the revelation of Ephesians, if we despise the highest and the best that love has provided, and attempt to stone our brethren who bring back a good report, surely we should not be surprised if, according to our faith, or rather unbelief, it shall be unto us.

"Far above all" seems, in the eyes of our critic, to be an awful mistranslation of Scripture; we are told that its presence is "a blot on the A.V. translation" and "a corrupting canker that ought to be removed". We note in passing that the R.V. retains the offensive word. We are told, and rightly so, that distance is denoted in Greek by makros and makran. This, however, is beside the mark. The English language has developed during the course of centuries and acquitted many idiomatic expressions which are an intimate part of every speech. When Dickens wrote the words: "I go to do a far, far better thing" he needed, according to our critic, correction in the use of a language of which he is reckoned to be a master. When Paul, in Phil. i. 23, speaks of something "far better", we are to be robbed of our accepted idiomatic use of the word simply because "far" also stands for distance. So in such passages as: "Suffer ye thus far" (Luke xxii. 51); "The day is far spent" (Mark vi. 35). Looking back to the second paragraph of No. 1, we find that we have used the word there: "far more than can hurt us", and "so far as we can see". To our ears certain accepted phrases in use in America are displeasing. Should we be justified in speaking against them in the manner of our critic? He himself uses the word "far" with no thought of distance in his own comment on II Cor. v. 2: "Even the apostle, in his infirmity and distress, never chooses death, but always suggests a far better alternative." Should we be justified in pulling this to pieces because "far" means distance? The expressions, "far above all principalities" and "far above all heavens" represent a justifiable use of the idiom expressing a sense of greatness, distance in feet or miles being entirely absent from the mind. If any sphere of blessing can legitimately be called "above" or "up above" or "over above", by what argument can the addition of "far" turn such truth into a corrupting canker?

Out critic has no mean opinion of his own judgment in these matters:--

> "No teacher who deliberately continues quoting the phrase 'far above all' after having been apprized of the fact that there is no warrant for the word far, is worthy of our confidence . . . . . Withdraw the literature which flaunts this phrase and retract all the false deductions which have been drawn from it."

But suppose this teacher has no regard for the confidence of any man compared with a good conscience that seeks to be unashamed before God? Then the literature will not be withdrawn. The apostle Paul was called "a heretic"; those for whom he suffered in the truth left him, but he remained unmoved; he was still unashamed, he knew Whom he had believed. He recognized the good deposit of the truth that had been entrusted, and though at times, as he said, he became a fool in his boasting, and answered his critics, for the most part he committed his cause to the Lord he served.

One further statement must suffice:--

> "Romans has been wrecked and some of its stones taken to patch up an Ephesian temple."

The booklet referred to—Roman Stones for the Ephesian Temple—and the series in The Berean Expositor under the heading "The Epistle to the Romans", provide a sufficient refutation. We refrain from using stronger terms in the hope that our critic has never actually troubled to read these articles. Quoting from the opening article in Volume XVI, page 33, we read:--

> "Perhaps no one book in the whole of the Scriptures may be considered to have a claim upon all who believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, more than the Epistle to the Romans. Where all exhibit the hall-mark of inspiration comparisons are odious, but inasmuch as a building needs foundations as well as top stones, so we may speak of the epistle to the Romans as essentially fundamental in character . . . . . To those who are vitally concerned with the teaching of Ephesians, Rom. v. 12 - viii. 39 is of supreme importance, for Eph. ii. 1 proceeds upon the assumption that Rom. vi. is practical truth. Philippians, too, does not teach but assumes knowledge of justification by faith (Phil. iii. 9)."

Are these the words of a "wrecker"? If not, what are the words of this critic? Are they words of truth and soberness? The opening page of Roman Stones for the Ephesian Temple contains this paragraph:--

> "May we ask the reader to consider the intimate connection that exists between Romans and Ephesians, so far as doctrine is concerned, even though the dispensational teaching of these same epistles is sundered as far apart as the heavens are above the earth."

Let the reader observe that we definitely teach that the Ephesian dispensational structure is built upon the Roman doctrinal foundation. The only parts of Romans that we set aside are such features as the priority of the Jew—"the Jew first", the teaching of "the olive tree" and similar matters of dispensational significance. Would the reader believe that the self-same critic who accuses us of "wrecking" Romans, on the testimony of his own writings completely sets aside some of the principles pertaining to the Romans period?

Commenting upon Eph. iv. he says:--

> "The saints among the nations (were brought) from the position of proselytes of Judaism to a place entirely independent of Israel."

"Entirely independent of Israel"—yet when we teach the same thing in connection with Eph. ii. and the creation of the new man, this critic tells us that:--

> "Eph. ii. 12 distinctly states that the members of the 'one body' of the mystery, in the era when the Corinthians was written, were 'guests of the promised covenants'. This word 'covenants' definitely links Corinthians and Ephesians, instead of putting an impassable barrier between them. Those to whom Ephesians was written had been guests of a covenant."

We, who are accused of wrecking Romans, teach that Ephesians is built upon the doctrinal foundation of Romans, whilst he, the critic, distinctly states:--

> "We should not build upon all the doctrines of that transitional era, but only such as accord with the present grace. In Romans, 'To the Jew first' (Rom. ii. 10) is now obsolete."

Is this just criticism? If we say that certain features in Romans are transitional, we are said to be "wrecking" the book, even though we "build" upon it. Yet our critic can say that "we should not build upon all the doctrines of the transitional era".

Our critic has also something to say concerning our articles on Satan and the Mystery. He is apparently unable to distinguish between our position in Christ, which is unassailable, the possibility of stepping out into the flesh, where we can give place to the devil, and the conflict that must be endured by those who are engaged in the service of the Lord.

We now conclude this "defence" with the suggestion that we unite in prayer that the Lord will open the eyes of us all, his as well as ours.

The testimony of Daniel,
or The time of the end.

#1. "The Scripture of truth" (x. 21).
pp. 1 - 4

A peculiar Gentile interest belongs to the book of Daniel, for, although it never fails to keep in view the two great foci of all prophecy, namely (1) Israel and Jerusalem, and (2) the kingdom of Christ at His second coming, nevertheless, its prophecies are largely occupied with a period when Israel are set aside, and during which dominion over the earth is held by Gentile powers. This period is known as the "times of the Gentiles", and if the witness of the book was important when the times of the Gentiles were in their infancy, it is certainly not less so for us when those times have nearly reached their close.

Before taking up the prophecy as a whole, it may be as well to face some of the critical attacks upon the book so that we may all, without hesitation or reserve, follow its teaching as a true revelation from heaven. De Wette speaks of it as "fiction"; Cornill calculates that it was written in 164B.C., while modern critics generally hold that it should be dated from the period of the Maccabean wars. This means, if it is true, that the book is but a "pious fraud", that some of its "prophecies" were not written until after the event, and that, consequently, while it may be an interesting relic of Jewish apocalyptic literature, it is that and nothing more. Among other arguments for the lateness of the book Dean Farrar brought forward:--

1. The mention of Greek musical instruments in chapter iii.
2. The mention of Belshazzar as king of Babylon.
3. The use of some official titles.

The critic criticized.

As to the first of these, who does not know that the Phoenicians linked up the known world by the medium of their merchandise, and that the tin of our own Cornwall might equally as well have found its way into Babylon as musical instruments from Greece? Since Dean Farrar wrote, however, excavations at Nippur have shown that commercial communications was established between Babylon and Greece 900 years before Daniel!

As to the second, a visit to the British Museum will prove that king Nabonidus associated his son Bel-sar-utsur (i.e., Belshazzar) with himself upon the throne, which incidentally shows why Belshazzar was able to offer Daniel only the third place in the kingdom (Dan. v. 16).

With regard to the third argument, the allegation is that the word "master" (rab-saris) in Dan. i. 3 indicates a late date, yet the monuments have now yielded this very title. So also the word "herald" (karoza) in Dan. iii. 4 was said to be identical with the Greek word kerux, thus showing the lateness of the book; but again the monuments by their silent witness have since shown it to be a proper Semitic title.

The testimony of language.

We now turn from these vain and refuted criticisms to the testimony of the book itself, and the first feature we deal with is its language. Most students are aware of the peculiarity that it is written partly in Hebrew (like the rest of the O.T.), and partly in Aramaic. The Hebrew portions are Dan. i. - ii. 4, and Dan. viii.-xii., the Aramaic portions being Dan. ii. 4 - vii.

The words: "Then spake the Chaldeans to the king in Syriack" are not a strict translation of the passage. The literal rendering is: "Then spake the Chaldeans—Aramith—O king, live for ever", the word Aramith indicating that from thence the language ceases to be Hebrew and becomes Aramaic. Now Aramaic was the language of mart and chancellory throughout the known world at the time Daniel was in Babylon; its fitness as a vehicle of inspiration for this portion of the book will be better appreciated when we have seen the strong Gentile character of Dan. ii.-vii. At the moment, however, we are thinking more of the evidence, which this language constitutes, of the historic accuracy of Daniel, than of its bearing upon the subject of the book.

Daniel must have been written in a period when both Hebrew and Aramaic were understood by the people. In the days of Hezekiah Israel, as a people, did not understand Aramaic.

> "Speak, I pray thee, to thy servants in the Syrian language (Aramaic); for we understand it: and talk not with us in the Jews' language in the ears of the people that are on the wall" (II Kings xviii. 26).

Here, Hebrew was known by the common people, but Aramaic was unknown. When Ezra read the law of Moses publicly, after the return from captivity, we learn that, "they read in the book in the law of God distinctly, and gave the sense, and caused them to understand the reading" (Neh. viii. 8). The Talmud explains that Ezra, after reading the passage in Hebrew, translated it into Aramaic, thus making what became known as the Chaldee paraphrase.

The book of Daniel, therefore, must have been written at a time after Hezekiah, and before Hebrew ceased to be spoken among Israel, and this simple evidence of language forces us to place the period of Daniel's prophecy exactly where orthodox teaching places it, namely, during the period of the Babylonian captivity and onward.

Positive testimony.

But after all is said there remains for the believer a higher Authority than the testimony of the monuments or the deductions of men. Daniel's prophecy finds its goal in the kingdom of Christ, and, moreover, its strongest proof in the testimony of Christ Himself:--

> "When ye therefore shall see the abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel the prophet, stand in the holy place" (Matt. xxiv. 15).

Notice the nature of this testimony—"Daniel THE prophet". While Matthew speaks of Isaiah the prophet, Christ Himself speaks of but two in this way—and, significantly, two whose integrity is most challenged and whose witness was directed to the Gentiles, "Daniel the prophet", and "Jonah the prophet" (Matt. xii. 39).

We are asked by the modernist to believe that Christ spoke only the language of His day. Be it so. But what shall we do with the majestic assertion recorded within the space of twenty verses from the Lord's confirmation of Daniel's prophecy?

> "Heaven and earth shall pass away, but My words shall not pass away" (Matt. xxiv. 35).

Is this truth, or is it bombast, aye and worse—blasphemy? Again, when the Lord was brought before Caiaphas the High Priest, He bore testimony to the prophetic truth of Daniel:--

> "I adjure thee by the living God, that Thou tell us whether thou be the Christ, the Son of God. Jesus saith unto him, thou hast said: nevertheless I say unto you, Hereafter shall ye see the Son of man sitting on the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven" (Matt. xxvi. 63, 64).

This, said Caiaphas, was blasphemy, for he realized that in so saying, Christ, was appropriating to Himself the prophecy of Dan. vii. So that once again, in that solemn hour of trial, and with death near at hand, the Saviour bears personal testimony to the truth of the book of Daniel. If Christ could by any means prove to be mistaken, all would fall to the ground. It would not matter to us who wrote Daniel's prophecy, or what it contained—for it could be meaningless, and its fulfillment could never be accomplished. If Christ should prove to be fallible, Bible study would be a waste of time; things far more important than the visions of Nebuchadnezzar would concern us; our very salvation would become a myth and a dream; and we should be of all men most miserable.

But such, happily, is not the case. Daniel's prophecy will stand when the last of his critics have perished, and as we consider together its inspired pages, there will be found ample intrinsic proof of its truth. He who could preserve Daniel from the lions, can, and will, shut the mouths of all his critics, and in the day of Christ bring forth His Word in all its triumph and glory. May we ever be kept heart-whole regarding all His Word!

#2. The times of the Gentiles begin (i. 1, 2).
pp. 33 - 36

> "In the third year of the reign of Jehoiakim king of Judah came Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon unto Jerusalem, and besieged it. And the Lord gave Jehoiakim king of Judah into his hand, with part of the vessels of the house of God: which he carried into the land of Shinar to the house of his god" (Dan. i. 1, 2).

With these words the book of Daniel opens, and it may not be too much to say that they are only paralleled by the words of Acts xxviii. in their burden of crisis and dispensational change. With such vast issues hanging upon these momentous words, vast because they cover the whole sweep of Gentile dominion, and vaster still because they lead steadily on to that kingdom of Christ which is to last for ever, with such issues and such a burden, no pains should be spared in acquainting ourselves with all that God has written for our learning in relation to this crisis in the history of man. Space will not permit of the full quotation of Jer. xxv. 1-26. We can but point out one or two features that connect this passage with the opening words of Daniel.

The reader will be struck by the fact that whereas Dan. i. 1 speaks of the "third" year of Jehoiakim, Jer. xxv. 1 speaks of the "fourth" year of that same king in connection with the coming of Nebuchadnezzar against Jerusalem. This apparent discrepancy has not passed unnoticed by the critic, and is one of his many "proofs" of the untrustworthiness of the book of Daniel.

The Hebrew word translated "came" in Dan. i. 1 is bo, and it frequently has the sense of "went" or "marched". This, however, has been denied. Dr. Samuel Davidson says: "The verb bo does not means to set out . . . . . but to arrive at" (Introduction to the O.T., Vol. III., page 181), and, when men of such standing and authority speak thus, who are we to oppose them? Humility is indeed a grace to seek and preserve, but while Gal. ii. remains for our encouragement, we may still dare to bring all statements to the touchstone of the Word. Dr. Davidson's statement but illustrates the uncritical character of so-called "higher criticism", for it has been computed that the Hebrew word bo is used in the sense of "to set out" in each of the five books of Moses, Joshua, Judges, Ruth, Samuel, Kings, Chronicles, Ezra, Nehemiah, Esther, Job, Psalms, Proverbs, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and six out of the twelve minor prophets!

Let us look at Jonah i. 3 and translate it as Dr. Davidson would have it: "And Jonah . . . . . went down to Joppa, and he found a ship arriving at Tarshish!" If this could be sense, then in some miraculous way Jonah would have no sooner set foot on board at Joppa than he would have "arrived" at Tarshish. Doubtless this would have made the journey far more pleasant than it actually was, but the simple fact is that the Hebrew word bo does mean that the ship was "going" or "setting out" for Tarshish. The plain fact of Dan. i. and Jer. xxv. is that the former writer tells us the year in which Nebuchadnezzar "set out" from Babylon, while the latter tells us when he arrived. Moreover, Jeremiah tells us what occupied Nebuchadnezzar on his journey from one capital to the other:--

> "Against Egypt, against the army of Pharaoh-necho king of Egypt, which was by the river Euphrates in Carchemish, which Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon smote in the fourth year of Jehoiakim the son of Josiah king of Judah" (Jer. xlvi. 2).

Instead therefore of discovering a discrepancy in the narrative of Scripture, we have the obvious fact that Nebuchadnezzar took time to accomplish his march from Babylon to Jerusalem, and was obliged to meet and overcame Pharaoh at Carchemish by the Euphrates before he could arrive.

In Jer. xxv. 3 the prophet reminded Israel that since the thirteenth year of Josiah (see Jer. i. 1, 2) the word of the Lord had come urging them to turn from their evil, and because they had not turned He said:--

> "Behold, I will send and take all the families of the north, saith the Lord, and Nebuchadnezzar, the king of Babylon, my servant, and will bring them against this land . . . . . and this whole land shall be a desolation, and an astonishment; and these nations shall serve the king of Babylon seventy years" (Jer. xxv. 9-11).

What God therefore had threatened, He brought to pass in the fourth year of Jehoiakim, and the historic record of the captivity of Jehoiakim is found in II Chron. xxxvi., the last chapter of the Hebrew Bible!

Yet with all this apparent on the surface of Scripture, and needing no more scholarship than ability to read in one's mother tongue, Kuenen in his Historic Critique de l'Ancien Testamen has the audacity to say:--

> "We know by the Book of Jeremiah that no such event (as the siege of Jerusalem, Dan. i. 1) took place in the reign of Jehoiakim."

"We know"! We also know that it is written: "Professing themselves to be wise they became fools", and by such statements they demonstrate that they are but "blind leaders of the blind".

Jehoiakim was appointed king of Judah by Pharaoh-necho in the place of Jehoahaz (II Kings xxiii. 34). He did evil in the sight of the Lord, and filled Jerusalem with innocent blood. He was succeeded by Jehoiachin. In the reign of the latter, Nebuchadnezzar carried out thence all the treasures of the house of the Lord, whereas Dan. i. 1, 2 tells us that at the first he only carried away a part.

Jehoiachin or Jeconiah is deprived of the Jehovah element in his name, and as Coniah is utterly rejected by the Lord:--

> "Thus saith the Lord, Write ye this man childless, a man that shall not prosper in his days; for no man of his seed shall prosper, sitting upon the throne of David, and ruling any more in Judah" (Jer. xxii. 30).

It is evident that Israel is passing: dominion is leaving them and is being transferred for the time being to the Gentiles. This is emphasized by such statements as Dan. i. 2: "And the Lord gave . . . . . into his hand", or Jer. xxv. 1: "The fourth year of Jehoiakim . . . . . that was the first year of Nebuchadnezzar." The times of the Gentiles had therefore begun. And so with Zedekiah the glory departs, and Ezek. xxi. reveals the condition of things that will obtain "until He come":--

> "And thou, profane wicked prince of Israel, whose day is come, when iniquity shall have an end, thus saith the Lord God; Remove the diadem, and take off the crown: this shall not be the same: exalt him that is low, and abase him that is high. I will overturn, overturn, overturn it: and it shall be no more, until He come Whose right it is, and I will give it Him" (xxi. 25-27).

Daniel's prophecies are occupied with this period of overturning, of the exalting of the base and abasing of the high. "This shall not be the same", saith the Lord—"This shall not be this" as the Hebrew reads, i.e., Nebuchadnezzar's dominion and dynasty would not be a real continuance of the throne of David. It would be in character rather a rule and dominion of wild beasts. The words: "It shall be no more, until He come" leave us in no doubt that the throne thus vacated shall be occupied by none other than the Lord Jesus Christ Himself.

The times of the Gentiles are characterized by one great feature, marked by the Lord in Luke xxi. 24: "And Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles, until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled." The kingdoms that succeeded Babylon may have been larger or smaller, more powerful or weaker, more autocratic or less so, but the one essential characteristic of Babylon, Persia, Greece, Rome, Turkey, and the present mandatory power, is the Gentile domination of Jerusalem. That is the great distinguishing feature, and will only be removed when "He comes Whose right it is".

#3. Historic foreshadowings (i., iii., vi.).
pp. 73 - 78

While the prophetic section of Daniel necessarily makes the great appeal of the book, lovers of the Word remember that "all Scripture is given by inspiration of God and is profitable", so that the narrative portions, giving details of the lives and experiences of Daniel and his friends, must have their place in the book and its witness. Let us therefore seek to gather the lesson of chapter i.

We have already seen that the times of the Gentiles began with the fourth year of Jehoiakim, for that is said to be the first year of Nebuchadnezzar (Jer. xxv. 1). We see also that a new dispensation must have begun when we compare Dan. i. 1, 2 with I Sam. v.:--

> "And the Philistines took the ark of God, and brought it from Eben-ezer unto Ashdod . . . . . and set it by Dagon. And when they of Ashdod arose early on the morrow, behold, Dagon was fallen upon his face before the ark of the Lord" (I Sam. v. 1-3).

No such thing takes place at Babylon, however. Times have changed and, in agreement with that change, Nebuchadnezzar could take the sacred vessels from the house of God, and put them in the treasure house of his god without drawing upon himself any visible sign of disapproval.

While this may have been so, God's attitude towards the evil nature of idolatry remained unaltered, and uncompromising opposition to it in all its aspects was manifested by Daniel and his three brethren. This we shall see set forth in three ways:--

1. The refusal to eat or drink food that had been offered to idols (chapter i.).
2. The refusal to bow down to the golden image set up by Nebuchadnezzar (chapter iii.).
3. The refusal to offer prayer to the king of Persia (chapter vi.).

The names of four of the captives of Judah who were chosen for preparation to stand before the king were Daniel, Hananiah, Mishael and Azariah. Each of these names contains a reference to the one true God, El, or Jehovah. The prince of the eunuchs changed these names, introducing the nomenclature of heathen deities in the place of the names of the Lord. Changed names, however, do not necessarily indicate changed hearts, and so we read: "but Daniel purposed in his heart that he would not defile himself with the portion of the king's meat" (i. 8). Daniel's purpose and his choice of "pulse" had no reference to vegetarianism; it went deeper and constituted a protest against idolatry.

There were two ways in which Daniel would have become defiled by eating the king's meat. The first relates to the case of slaughtered animals, in connection with which it is written:-- > "Whatsoever man there be of the house of Israel . . . . . that eateth any manner of blood, I will even set my face against that soul that eateth blood, and will cut him off from among his people . . . . . for it is the blood that maketh an ATONEMENT" (Lev. xvii. 10, 11).

Here is the first great exposure of Babylonian error—it has no regard for the atonement: it perpetuates, in its doctrine, the way of Cain.

The second reason for Daniel's action was that it was forbidden for the Israelites to eat meat which had been offered to idols (Exod. xxxiv. 15). Note also the following:--

> "But I say, that the things which the Gentiles sacrifice, they sacrifice to demons, and not to God: and I would not that ye should have fellowship with demons" (I Cor. x. 20).

That this wicked practice will be re-introduced with the revival of Babylon at the time of the end, Rev. ii. 20 testifies: "That woman Jezebel, that teaches . . . . . to eat things sacrifice to idols."

The noble stand of Daniel and his fellows is the more remarkable, and shows the wonder of the grace of God, when we remember that they were eunuchs. This maltreatment had been foretold by Isaiah:--

> "Behold, the days come, that all that is in thine house, and that which thy fathers have laid up in store until this day, shall be carried to Babylon: nothing shall be left, saith the Lord. And of thy sons that shall issue from thee, which thou shalt beget, shall they take away; and they shall be eunuchs in the palace of the king of Babylon" (Isa. xxxix. 6, 7).

This chapter closes the first half of Isaiah, and indicates the period of Gentile dominion before the cry of restoration is sounded, with which Isa. xl. opens.

Worship or fire.

As a perverted result of the dream and interpretation of Dan. ii., Nebuchadnezzar proceeds to establish emperor-worship and state idolatry. The image of gold that he set up in the plain of Dura may or may not have been the figure of a man; we are not told. But when we know something of the obscenity of paganism, and read the hints given in Ezek. xvi. 17; xxiii. 14 and vii. 20, we can be fairly certain of the character of this abomination. While it does not seem necessary or fitting to enlarge upon this awful subject here, the reader will find much food for solemn thought in the 42nd appendix to The Companion Bible, which would suggest that Dan. i. and iii., taken together, are associated with the devilish doctrine of Jezebel, "fornication and eating things sacrificed to idols".

Something of the symbolic meaning of the image is indicated in its dimensions. Its height was 60 cubits, its breadth was 6 cubits, and its worship was accompanied by music played upon six different kinds of instruments, all of which are specified in Dan. iii. 5, 10 and 15. At the opening of Gentile times, therefore, we meet with the significant numbers 60 and 6.

The same is true of the opening of Israel's kingdom. Goliath of Gath is described in I Sam. xvii. 4-7. His height was 6 cubits and a span, his armour was made up of 6 pieces, namely, helmet, coat, greaves, target, spear and shield, the weight of the spear's head being 600 shekels of iron.

Later we are to learn that the great image representing Gentile dominion is to be destroyed by the impact of a stone (Dan. ii. 34), a fact which removes all need for speculation as to why David, Israel's king, decided to go out against Goliath with sling and stone, or why God used that one smooth stone to bring down the enemy of His people. David was but foreshadowing what Daniel was to interpret.

Who can read the words of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego, in their reply to the king, without feeling impelled to pray for like precious faith?

> "O Nebuchadnezzar, we are not careful to answer thee in this matter. If it be so, our God whom we serve is able to deliver us from the burning fiery furnace, and He will deliver us out of thine hand, O king. But if not, be it known unto thee, O king, > that we will not serve thy gods, nor worship the golden image which thou hast set up" (Dan. iii. 16-18).

"We are not careful."—If we argue long enough, we can often "prove" anything. It is sometimes the truest course resolutely to refuse to debate a question. If it is wrong, it is wrong, and that should suffice. James i. 22 throw light upon this point: "But be ye doers of the word, and not hearers only, deceiving your own selves" (paralogizomai = arguing yourselves aside).

"But if not."—Here is the supreme stand of faith. It is one thing to serve God Who promises as a return to provide food, raiment, health and protection—there is sometimes too much of this bargaining element in our faith and service—but it is another thing, and comes as a shock to some, to face the fact that some of God's most faithful children have suffered hunger, shipwreck, cruel scourgings and mockings, even death itself. Yet none can read Rom. viii. 35-37 or Heb. xi. without seeing that from the days of the first martyr Abel, or of the first apostle to the Gentiles, Paul, the noble words of the three friends have always had their place.

Just how far the church of the One Body will come into contact with the outer fringe of anti-Christian days is not revealed, but it is quite within the range of possibility that some readers of this magazine may have to stand against both the inducements and the persecution of incipient Babylonianism; if any do, let them remember Dan. iii. and take courage.

The one thing that remains throughout the ages is the presence of the Lord. These men may not escape the fire, but Nebuchadnezzar will have to testify:--

> "Lo, I see four men, loose walking in the midst of the fire, and they have no hurt; and the form of the fourth is like a son of God . . . . . Who hath sent His angel, and delivered His servants that trusted in Him" (Dan. iii. 25-28).

For the comfort and encouragement of Israel in the time of their trouble, Isa. xliii. 1-3 is written: "When thou walkest through the fire, thou shalt not be burned", for as in passing through the waters, the Lord can say, "I will be with thee".

The den of lions.

While no explanation is given by Daniel as to how it was that he was not included in the order to worship the golden image or how he escaped the penalty for refusing, there is, notwithstanding, a full exhibition of Daniel's faithfulness under trial recorded in Dan. vi. As we read the story we are impressed with the fact that here is a kingdom inferior to that of Babylon, though the king himself is far more humane than the earlier monarch. Nebuchadnezzar was an autocrat, "whom he would he slew, and whom he would he kept alive" (v. 19), but Darius, king of the Medes and Persians, is shackled by the power of his servants. Playing upon the personal vanity that could hardly in those days absent from an Eastern king, these servants set a trap for Daniel. As was expected, Daniel quietly ignores the decree concerning prayer, and is apprehended. We know the story well. In the issue an angel closes the mouths of the lions, and Daniel's faithfulness is acknowledged. Just as the fire slew those men who bound the three Hebrew friends (Dan. iii.), so the lions slay the men who had plotted against Daniel. A word of comfort and encouragement from these two records of tested faithfulness has been published in an earlier volume and is worth repetition here.

Nebuchadnezzar represents absolute autocracy. The king in whose hand was the power of life and death, tried to kill these three friends, and could not. Darius represents a limited monarchy. Here we have a king who wanted to save Daniel, but could not! These two aspects of the subject will reprove a tendency which sometimes arises to think that one system of government would be safer or better for the Christian than another. Scripture likens all Gentile governments to wild beasts; one is not much better than another, and in the two cases before us, both were powerless for either good or ill. Members of the One Body can find no warrant in Scripture for concluding that they will not be called upon to suffer, to endure, and, if needs be, to die for the truth. When the time of trouble arrives, they will fare no better and no worse under one system of government than under another—in God's hand alone will be the deciding factor, and blessed will be all those who can say, "But if not . . . . . we will not" (Dan. iii. 18).

Idolatry.

The presence and continuance of idolatry to the very end is a matter of solemn concern to all children of God. Although in the present series the subject only arises naturally out of the threefold conflict with those who would impose idol worship upon the captive Hebrews, we dare not, in view of the depth and scope of the truth, try to compress reference to the subject into a closing paragraph. We shall, however, be brought face to face with it when we consider, as a counterpart of these three passages dealing with idolatry, the three decrees published by the idolatrous kings in which they speak of the God of Israel, and we can then devote a little more space to its consideration.

#4. The God of Heaven.
pp. 133 - 139

The series of confessions by the rulers of the people, recorded in this book, shows a growing acknowledgment, on their part, of the one true God. The first of these is recounted in chapter ii. 46, 47, after Daniel had interpreted Nebuchadnezzar's dream. It is not a clear testimony, and is mixed with idolatrous practices, but it marks a step in the direction of light and truth:--

> "Then the king Nebuchadnezzar fell upon his face and worshipped Daniel, and commanded that they should offer an oblation, and sweet odours unto him. The king answered unto Daniel and said, Of a truth it is, that your God is a GOD OF GODS, AND A LORD OF KINGS, and a revealer of secrets, seeing thou couldest reveal this secret."

The three decrees.

Chapter ii. records Nebuchadnezzar's own action and confession. They were not of a very deep nature: they were not accompanied by any change of heart or life, nor did they cause Nebuchadnezzar to refrain from idolatry. Chapter iii. records the setting up of the golden image and the attempt upon the lives of the three captives. As a result of God's intervention on their behalf, Nebuchadnezzar published a decree in the following terms:--

> "Therefore I make a decree, That every people, nation, and language, which speak anything amiss against the God of Shadrach, Meshach and Abed-nego, shall be cut in pieces, and their houses shall be made a dunghill: because there is no other god that can deliver after this sort" (iii. 29).

In addition to this public decree we have the private confession of Nebuchadnezzar himself:--

> "Blessed be the God of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego, who hath sent His angel, and delivered His servants that trusted in Him, and have changed the king's word, and yielded their bodies, that they might not serve nor worship any god, except their own God" (Dan. iii. 28).

This is an advance on the confession of chapter ii. In it Nebuchadnezzar himself blesses God, and prohibits, under severe penalties, any word against Him. But it is in chapter iv. that we get the fullest and most complete recognition of God.

The whole of this chapter is the proclamation of king Nebuchadnezzar. When one has waded through a series of royal proclamations made by kings of Assyria, Babylon or Egypt, full of idolatry, cruelty, and human pride, this proclamation of so mighty a king is seen to be all the more remarkable. It is the one solitary contribution to Holy Scripture made by a Gentile king. In thus becoming a contributor to these holy writings, Nebuchadnezzar must be allowed a place with David, Solomon and Hezekiah. The careful student will, moreover, realize that, in its limited compass, Dan. iv. accomplishes for Nebuchadnezzar what Ecclesiastes does for Solomon who as we know had lapsed into idolatry and worldliness.

Dan. iv. is a long passage to quote in full in these limited pages, yet its value and unique character almost justify our doing so. We refrain, however, and give only the opening and closing section, trusting that any reader not fully acquainted with the passage will read it throughout before proceeding further:--

> "NEBUCHADNEZZAR, the king, unto all people, nations, and languages, that dwell in all the earth; peace be multiplied unto you. I thought it good to shew the signs and wonders, that the Most High God hath wrought toward me. How great are His signs! and how mighty are His wonders! His kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and His dominion is from generation to generation."
> "And at the end of the days I, NEBUCHADNEZZAR, lifted up mine eyes unto heaven, and mine understanding returned unto me, and I blessed The Most High, and I praised and honoured Him that liveth for ever, Whose dominion is an everlasting > dominion, and His kingdom is from generation to generation: and all the inhabitants of the earth are reputed as nothing: and He doeth according to His will in the army of heaven, and among the inhabitants of the earth: and none can stay His hand, or say unto Him, What doest Thou?"

>
> "Now I, Nebuchadnezzar, praise and extol and honour the King of heaven, all Whose works are truth, and His ways judgment: and those that walk in pride He is able to abase."

What a testimony was this to be published throughout the domain of this great king. Here is recognition of the greatness of the heavenly King and kingdom, and, more than that, the light of moral truth breaks in and God is praised not merely in view of His power, but because all His works are truth, and His ways judgment, His will supreme in heaven and among men.

How this revolution was accomplished occupies the bulk of Nebuchadnezzar's proclamation, Dan. iv. 4-36. Summarizing the verses we find the king disturbed by a dream, which none of the wise men of his realm can interpret. Daniel, however, is empowered to do so, and his interpretation reveals that angelic watchers had decreed that Nebuchadnezzar, because of his pride, should suffer a great humiliation. A disease, partly mental, and resembling what is known as lycanthropy, falls upon him in the height of his pride. He imagines that he is an ox, and is driven out into the fields where he suffers this shameful ignominy for "seven times" with the avowed object:--

> "Till thou know that the Most High ruleth in the kingdom of men, and giveth it to whomsoever He will . . . . . Thy kingdom shall be sure unto thee, after that thou shalt have known that the heavens do rule."

The mysteries of the kingdom of the heavens.

Daniel, in this passage, unfolds one of the mysteries ("secret" in iv. 9 is translated "mysteries" in the LXX). Following His rejection by Israel, in Matt. xiii., the Lord reveals a series of mysteries of the kingdom of heaven, which includes a fuller development of Nebuchadnezzar's dream of the great tree.

Let the reader compare the vision of the great tree, which gave lodging-place to the fowls of the heaven, with the parable of the Mustard Seed. Dan. iv. confines itself to Nebuchadnezzar's aspect of the question, while Matt. xiii. traces the transition from the small seed (Israel's kingdom) to the great tree that supported the types of Satanic agency, the fowls of the heaven (Nebuchadnezzar's kingdom). In face of the clear testimony of Dan. iv. it is inexcusable on the part of expositors to try to drag the church into the parables of the kingdom of the heavens. Nebuchadnezzar could have put right most Christian writers in the interpretation of this well-known, but much misunderstood, chapter of Matthew.

There is one more royal proclamation in this book; it occurs at the end of chapter vi. Just as the deliverance of Shadrach and his companions moved Nebuchadnezzar to make a proclamation throughout the realm, so also the deliverance of Daniel from the lions moved Darius to make a proclamation:--

> "Then king Darius wrote unto all peoples, nations and languages, that dwell in all the earth; Peace be multiplied unto you. I make a decree, That in every dominion of my kingdom men tremble and fear before the God of Daniel: FOR HE IS THE LIVING GOD, and stedfast for ever, and His kingdom that which shall not be destroyed, and His dominion shall be even unto the end. He delivereth and rescueth, and He worketh signs and wonders in heaven and in earth, Who hath delivered Daniel from the power of the lions" (Dan. vi. 25-27).

To this testimony we ought to add that of Cyrus, as recorded in Ezra i. 1-4:--

> "Thus saith Cyrus king of Persia, The Lord God of heaven hath given me all the kingdoms of the earth: and He hath charged me to build Him an house at Jerusalem, which is in Judah . . . . . HE is the God . . . . ."

Out of the mouths of kings who were Gentiles by nature, and idolaters by practice, the Lord brought this testimony to Himself:--

> "A God of gods, and a Lord of kings."
> "A revealer of secrets."
> "A God Who can deliver His servants."
> "The Most High God, that liveth for ever."
> "The King of heaven."
> "The Living God, and One Who works signs and wonders in heaven and earth."
> "Whose will is done in the army of heaven."
> "Who setteth up kings and putteth them down."
> "Whose dominion and kingdom is everlasting."

Yet the men who made these public testimonies had doubtless uttered many a prayer like the following portion of a hymn to the Moon God:--

> "In heaven who is supreme? Thou alone art supreme!
> On earth who is supreme? Thou alone art supreme!"
> "As for thee thy word is proclaimed in heaven, and the angels bow down their faces."
> * * * * * * *
> "O Lord, in heaven is thy Lordship, on earth is thy dominion."

The father of Belshazzar has left on record a prayer to the Moon God, opening with these words:--

> "O Sin (i.e., the Moon God), thou Lord of the gods, thou king of the gods of heaven and earth, and the god of the gods, who dwellest in heaven."

In the decrees and proclamations of Nebuchadnezzar we can, at length, see these ascriptions of praise and honour transferred from false gods and rendered to the Living God. If his successors did not profit by his example, we have every reason to believe that Nebuchadnezzar, the first head of Gentile dominion, is numbered among the redeemed.

It is evident from the record of Daniel that there is a very definite recognition of idolatry as being deeply rooted in the affairs of man. We find this not only in the beginning of Israel's national existence, but in the very genesis of human race itself. What was the bait used in the garden of Eden? "Ye shall be as gods (or as God) knowing good and evil" (Gen. iii. 5). When God would deliver Israel from Egypt, He dealt not only with Pharaoh and the Egyptians, but directed His plagues and judgments "against all the gods of Egypt" (Exod. xii. 12). The Nile, the frogs, the flies, the ashes, and the locusts that figure in the plagues had definite reference to Egyptian idolatry.

At the very beginning of the great covenant which God made at Sinai, stands the commandment: "Thou shalt have no other gods before Me" (Exod. xx. 3). It was by an act of idolatry that Israel caused the tables of stone to be broken by Moses (Exod. xxxii. 19). At least thirty false gods are named in Scripture, such as Dagon, Bel, Diana, Rimmon, &c.

Idolatry was prevalent throughout the world at the time of Christ and the apostles. Acts xiv., xvii., and xix. give three diverse examples of the idolatry of the times, to which must be added sorcery (Acts viii. 9-11; xiii. 6-8; xix. 13-20), and divination (Acts xvi. 16-18). In confirmation of this statement let us take Paul's epistles. It might be thought that in setting out the gospel of grace, the nature and object of faith and hope, the regulation of church discipline and ministry, idolatry, as such, would not need to be mentioned. Yet what do we find? Rom. i. 18-23 reveals the close connection between Gentile reprobation and idolatry, which is only overcome by the glorious reconciliation which Paul preached. Gal. iv. 8 alludes to the bondage of idolatry and shows the astonishing fact that when a believer draws back from the glorious liberty of the gospel to the servitude of the law, he is really acting in the spirit of idolatry. In chapter v. 20 idolatry is included in the list of the works of the flesh.

I Corinthians devotes more than one passage to the question of idolatry (viii., x., and xii.). II Cor. vi. 16 asks, What agreement hath the temple of God with idols? I Thess. i. speaks of the repentant Thessalonians as "turning to God from idols". And II Thess. ii. reveals the goal of all idolatry, the man of sin. John in his first epistle does not hesitate to say: "My little children, keep yourselves from idols." Peter warns against "banquetings, and abominable idolatries" (I Pet. iv. 3), while the Revelation shows that, at the time of the end, idolatry with all its obscenity and demonism will be again dominant in the earth (Rev. ii. 14-20; ix. 20; xxi. 8; xxii. 15). In Eph. v. 5 the covetous man is said to be an idolater, and in Col. iii. 5 covetousness is said to be idolatry.

While, therefore, in this land, actual and literal idolatry may not be so evident, the spirit of idolatry as revealed in the pride, vain wisdom and thanklessness of Rom. i. 20-23, in the legalizing of the gospel as shown in Gal. iv., and the magnifying of self as contained in the word covetousness, and revealed in the prophetic utterance, "lovers of pleasure, more than lovers of God", shows that it would be a simple process of devolution to bring back idolatry in all its hideousness, even upon a so-called civilized community.

Rev. xiii. reveals that Nebuchadnezzar's attempt as recorded in Dan. ii. will be repeated, and, blessed be God, xv. 2 reveals that there will, once again, be the Shadrachs, Meshachs, and Abed-negos, who will not bow the knee to this image of Baal.

It is only necessary to visit a country fair, or a world-famous exhibition, to see the booths occupied by the palmist, the fortune-teller and the like. One has only to question the motorist, the professional actor, and others, to learn how much trust is placed in lucky mascots, charms, &c. At intervals the newspaper records the objection of someone to the allotment of the number thirteen to his house or place at table and the like. Even when one would hardly feel it right to attribute ignorance, superstition is by no means dead. Then, further, the rapid strides that spiritism is making, the holding of séances, by the thousand, in this land and others, the prevalent idolatry still openly practiced in India and other lands, all show the deep-rooted nature of this systematic perversion of truth. All idolatry usurps the place of Christ. He, and He alone, is the true image of God. No man can worship God unassisted, for He is Spirit, and can be neither seen, heard nor conceived by man. But God has come down to us in the person of Christ, and idolatry, the worship of one other than our Lord Jesus Christ, is the devil's great anti-Christian attack. There can be little doubt that idolatry sprang into being, full-fledged, at Babel, and from that source can be traced the chief idolatrous practices of the whole earth. The controversy over the Prayer Book in the Church of England is largely centred around the Lord's Supper, which some would approximate to the blasphemous fable of the Mass, which, again, involves idolatry.

Idolatry, therefore, touches the person and work of the Son of God; in its mystery of iniquity, which culminates in a man claiming divine worship, it travesties the mystery of godliness, "God was manifested in the flesh". We have said that we could go back to the beginning of Israel's national history and to the beginning of the history of the human race, and find idolatry—but the full truth is that we can go back until revelation ceases, and there learn that before man was created, idolatry was already the first great sin in the universe of God (see Exek. xxviii. 1-19), and from it, and because of it, springs every other form of evil. Conversely, it is equally true that acceptable worship (translated "godliness" in I Timothy), lies at the root of all righteousness, goodness and truth, for no man can be either righteous, good, or true, who is in error concerning God Himself.

Let us keep ourselves from idols—covetousness, selfishness, and legalism on the one hand, and any approach to outward symbols such as charms, mascots or superstitious practices. If we must believe that some things are "lucky", let us take Wycliffe's translation of Gen. xxxix. 2: "And the Lord was with Joseph, and he was a luckie fellow."

#5. Babylon weighed and found wanting.
pp. 179 - 184

We have looked at the witness maintained against idolatry in Dan. i., iii., & vi., and also the witness for the living God in Dan. ii., iv., and vi. There remains but one more historic feature to be considered before we pass on to prophecy itself, and that is the handwriting on the wall at Belshazzar's feast. Here, then, may be a fit place to show the relationship which exists between the historic and prophetic sections. Nothing is recorded in the historic portion that does not anticipate the future prophecy. This may be illustrated by turning for a moment to a companion prophecy, that of Isaiah. In the midst of the prophecy, and standing in literal correspondence, will be found two historic sections, Isa. vii.-xii., Ahaz, and Isa. xxxvi.-xxxix., Hezekiah.

Events in the life of Ahaz enshrine the great Messianic foreshadowings of Isa. vii. 14 and ix. 7, while episodes in the history of Hezekiah take their place in the prophecy, foreshadowing, in Sennacherib, the anti-Christ, and giving, in his doom, an assurance of Jerusalem's final deliverance.

So is it in Daniel. History foreshadows prophecy. The golden image and the furnace of fire find their antitype in Rev. xiii. We can see this relation of historic type to prophetic reality in the following simple outline:--

Daniel as a whole.
The historic type.	The prophetic reality.
Reign of Nebuchadnezzar foreshadows the duration and character of Gentile dominion (i.-iv.). Reign of Belshazzar foreshadows the doom of Gentile dominion (v.). Reign of Darius foreshadows the last days (vi.).	During of Belshazzar's reign—end of Gentile dominion and the setting up of the kingdom of the Lord (vii. and viii.). During Darius' reign—end of desolations and the final restoration of Israel (ix.). During reign of Cyrus (Darius being a title of Cyrus)—the time of the end more clearly detailed (x.-xii.).

This will suffice for our present study; a fuller structure indicating the very complete inter-relation of the parts of the book will be given when the strictly prophetic section is reached.

The writing on the wall.

> "O sin (i.e. the moon god), thou lord of the gods, thou king of the gods of heaven and earth . . . . . in the heart of Belshazzar, my firstborn son, the off-spring of my loins, set the fear of thine exalted godhead, so that he may commit no sin and that he may satisfied with the fullness of life."

This prayer of Nabonidus was all in vain, for, offered as it was to a god who could neither hear nor see, Belshazzar found in his service no spiritual strength. It is pathetic to read the petition that Belshazzar may be satisfied with the fullness of life, when, as a fact, like the wicked, he did not live out half his days.

In Dan. v. 2 Nebuchadnezzar is called his "father", and the critics have not failed to make capital out of this. Their efforts, however, reflect upon their own intelligence rather than Daniel's veracity, for as there is no equivalent in either Chaldee or Hebrew for our English word "grandfather", and, as even the little-instructed reader knows, the Hebrew idiom uses the word "father" for "ancestor", these critics should first of all tell us what other word Daniel could have used. We know that Daniel had access to Jeremiah's prophecy, to say nothing of his personal knowledge of the exact relationship that Belshazzar bore to Nebuchadnezzar. Jer. xxvii. 7 says of Nebuchadnezzar: "All nations shall serve him (Nebuchadnezzar), and his son (Nabonidus, who offered the prayer cited above), and his son's (Belshazzar), until the very time of his land come."

The banqueting hall in which Belshazzar held his iniquitous feast has been discovered. It is 60 feet wide by 172 feet long, with beautifully decorated walls. Here this last of Babylon's kings made a great feast. Away on a military expedition against Cyrus, his father, Nabonidus, had left his son as co-regent, but instead of looking after the defences of the city he planned this great carousal. We read that he "drank wine before the thousand", and this apparently worked upon his vanity and innate wickedness, so that "whiles he tasted the wine, he commanded to bring the golden and silver vessels which his father, Nebuchadnezzar, had taken out of the temple which was in Jerusalem, that the king, and his princes, his wives, and his concubines, might drink therein" (Dan. v. 2). This was done, and the name of the great Jehovah was contemned, as they praised the gods of gold, and silver, of brass, of iron, of wood, and of stone, but "in the same hour came forth the fingers of a man's hand and wrote over against the candlestick upon the plaister of the wall of the king's palace" (Dan. v. 5).

This emphasizes the fact that the life of the last king of Babylon ends in a blasphemous act, an historic foreshadowing of what is foretold in later chapters:--

> "And he shall speak great words against the most High" (Dan. vii. 25).
> "He magnified himself even to the prince of the host" (Dan. viii. 11).
> "He shall speak marvelous things against the God of gods" (Dan. xi. 36).
> "And there was given unto him a mouth speaking great things and blasphemies" (Rev. xiii. 5).

Goliath, it will be remembered, defied the armies of the living God, and the God of those armies (I Sam. xvii. 10 and 45), and David slew him with a small smooth stone. Sennacherib "blasphemed" and "reproached the living God" (Isa. xxxvii. 4 and 23), and the angel of the Lord smote the camp of the Assyrians, Sennacherib himself perishing at the hand of his sons. So will it be at the end when the last great blasphemer occupies the throne.

The mysterious message written on the wall filled the king with deadly fear. He cried aloud for the Chaldeans and soothsayers, offering the highest place in the realm to any who could show the meaning of the mystic words. But none was able to interpret the message of doom. At this juncture "the queen" came into the banqueting house. Evidently she had not associated herself with the impious carousal, and she it was who remembered Daniel. Daniel, with true spiritual nobility, tells the king to give his rewards where he will, but says that he will interpret the writing. Before doing so Daniel rehearses the story of Nebuchadnezzar's pride and humbling: "till he knew that the most high God ruleth in the kingdom of men, and that He appointeth over it whomsoever He will" (Dan. v. 21). Belshazzar's sin was against light and knowledge: "And thou his son, O Belshazzar, hast not humbled thine heart, though thou knewest all this; but hast lifted up thyself against the Lord of heaven; and they have brought the vessels of His house before thee, and thou, and thy lords, thy wives, and thy concubines, have drunk wine in them; and thou hast praised the gods of silver, and gold, of brass, iron, wood and stone, which see not, nor hear, nor know: and the God in Whose hand thy breath is, and Whose are all thy ways, hast thou not glorified" (Dan.v. 22, 23).

Belshazzar not only stands condemned as an individual, but he is, in turn, a type both of the last Babylonian ruler and of the Gentile world. Look at the parallels that there are between the indictment of Belshazzar by Daniel, and the indictment of the Gentiles world by Paul:--

Dan. v. 22-28.	Rom. i. 21-26.
"Thou knewest all this."	"When they knew God."
"Hast thou not glorified."	"They glorified Him not as God."
"Gods of silver and gold, ... which neither see, hear or know."	"An image made like to corruptible man, and to birds, and fourfooted beasts, and creeping things."
"Thou hast not humbled thine heart."	"Their foolish heart was darkened. Professing themselves to be wise they became fools."
"The Lord God of heaven."	"His eternal power and Godhead."
"Numbered, weighed, divided."	"God also gave them up."

The words written on the wall were in the ordinary Chaldaic language. It was not therefore their literal meaning but their significance that baffled the king and his wise men.

Mene.—The word occurs in Dan. ii. 24, 49 and iii. 12 where it is translated "ordained" and "set", and in i. 5, 10 & 11 "appoint" and "set". It is possible that Belshazzar and his wise men, when they looked at the word Mene, could associate it with none other than the god of that name, which meant the god of destiny, and is written Manu on the Assyrian inscriptions. Isa. lxv. 11, 12 says: "But ye are they that forsake the Lord . . . . . and furnish the drink offering unto Meni (see margin); therefore will I number (Heb. manithi) you to the sword." Here we have a paronomasia on the two words Meni and manithi, similar to Dan. v. where a double reference may have been intended. There was a "wonderful Numberer" (Palmoni) (Dan. viii. 13), of Whom the god Meni was but a pagan shadow, Who indeed had numbered the days of Belshazzar: "God hath numbered thy kingdom, and finished it" (Dan. v. 26).

Tekel is the Chaldee equivalent of the Hebrew shakal, to weigh, from which comes shekel, a weight. With the prefix "m" the word becomes mishkoleth, "the plummet", as in Isa. xxviii. 17: "Judgment also will I lay to the line, and righteousness to the plummet." "Thou art weighed in the balance, and art found wanting" (Dan. v. 27).

Peres.—Many readers of the English Version are somewhat puzzled when they come to this third word. The actual writing on the wall being upharsin, how is it that Daniel says peres? The answer is simple. The actual words translated as they stand are "Numbered, numbered, weighed, and divided". "And" is represented by the letter "u", and this letter coming before the letter "p" softens it, making it for the time being "ph". The letters in are merely an ending, equivalent, so far as our language can afford a parallel, to "en", as in broken, or "ing" as in dividing. Now no one would look in the dictionary for the word "and divided", the "and" would naturally be omitted. Again, it is usual to look for the infinitive, "to divide", rather than, for instance, "dividing" or "divided". This is what Daniel did. He omitted the vav, "and", let the "ph" go back to "p", omitted the ending "in", and took the true word peres.

Just as we saw in Isa. lxv. 11, 12 that meni, as well as being a verb, was a proper noun, so we find peres not only means "divided", but is the name for "Persian", the word thereby revealing by whom the kingdom was to be divided or taken. A parallel might be put in these terms, "You will be scotched", thus conveying the idea that a Scot would do the scotching. Similarly, play could be made upon the names China, Japan, Greece, Turkey, etc. So it was that Daniel who, it must be remembered, was interpreting, not merely repeating, the words written, took the word peres in its double significance:--

> "Thy kingdom is divided, and given to the Medes and Persians" (Dan. v. 28).
> "In that night was Belshazzar the king of the Chaldeans slain, and Darius the Median took the kingdom, being about threescore and two years old" (Dan. v. 30, 31).

Just as Belshazzar was co-regent with his father, so Cyrus, the son of Darius, was acting in a like capacity. His general, Gobryas, took Babylon in the name of Cyrus, who was then about 40 years of age (see Herodotus). Isaiah and Jeremiah had prophesied:--

> "Thus saith the Lord to His anointed, to Cyrus, whose right hand I have holden, to subdue nations before him, and I will loose the loins of kings (see Dan. v.6, 'the joints of his loins were loosed'); to open before him the two leaved gates; and the gates shall not be shut" (Isa. xlv. 1).
> "The Lord hath raised up the spirit of the kings of the Medes; for His device is against Babylon, to destroy it; because it is the vengeance of the Lord, the vengeance of His temple" (Jer. li. 11) (see Dan. v. 2-4).
> "The mighty men of Babylon have forborn to fight, they have remained in their holds . . . . . one post shall run to meet another, and one messenger to meet another, to shew the king of Babylon that his city is taken at one (or each) end" (Jer. li. 30, 31).

Herodotus tells us that the Babylonians retired to the city. Cyrus, having diverted the waters of the Euphrates, entered the city by the bed of the river at each end (Companion Bible note). A tablet is in existence on which is recorded the words: "On the sixteenth day of Tammuz, Gobryas, governor of the land of Gutium, and the army of Cyrus, without fighting, to Babylon descended."

God is the God of heaven. He ruleth in the kingdom of men and giveth it to whomsoever He will. We may not always see the hand of the Lord, but He has never vacated His throne nor ceased to guide and overrule in order that all His purpose may be accomplished.

#6. Nebuchadnezzar's dream (ii.).
pp. 213 - 220

Having acquainted ourselves with some of the outstanding features of the first half of the book of Daniel, and having observed that the historic section foreshadows the greater prophetic portion, we now turn our attention to the prophecies themselves, and commence with the vision of Nebuchadnezzar which occupies chapter ii.

The Gentile character of this vision is indicated by the change of language that occurs at verse 4: "Then spake the Chaldeans to the king in Syriac." The words "in Syriac" mark the place where Daniel ceases to write in Hebrew, and thenceforth to the end of chapter vii. employs the Syriac or Aramaic language.

Before going into detail it may be well to consider one or two interpretations that have been put forward, so that the way may be cleared and out study pursued unhindered.

1. Four kingdoms.—One school of interpretation speaks of the image as representing four kingdoms only--Babylon, Medo-Persia, Greece and Rome. The legs represent the two divisions of the Roman Empire, the eastern and western, and the ten toes, the kingdoms into which it will finally be divided, thus making Rome's dominion either in its full power or in its divided form cover the whole period from before Christ to the present time, and necessitating a revival of ancient Rome at the time of the end. Some who endorse this view believe Rome to be the Babylon of the Apocalypse, whilst others believe that literal Babylon will be rebuilt.

2. The fourth kingdom regarded as Satanic.—Another view of the purport of the vision does not include Rome at all. The view is that Babylon, Medo-Persia, and Greece followed one another, but that by the time the Lord was here upon earth, the devil could claim that the kingdoms of the world had been delivered unto him (Luke iv. 6). Moreover, another objection to Rome having a place in Nebuchadnezzar's vision is said to be the fact that she never really had possession of Babylon itself. We would add, however, that this is not strictly true.

These two points of view are maintained with some recognition of the principles of prophetic interpretation. There are other views, but they are too far removed from the way of truth to justify space for consideration here.

We do not propose analyzing the two methods of interpretation mentioned above, but shall proceed at once to definite exposition, and where such exposition causes us to depart from the views expressed in these interpretations, we shall make any necessary criticism. All that we would say here is that we believe neither to be correct.

The latter days.

To quote the verses that record both the vision and the interpretation would occupy more space than we can afford, but we trust that no reader will be satisfied to read these notes without personal reference to the Scriptures themselves.

From the urgency with which he demanded the interpretation, and the extreme measures he adopted to punish inability to comply with that demand, it is clear that Nebuchadnezzar considered the vision to be of supreme importance. It is blessed to see Daniel and his friends confidently laying the matter before "the God of heaven", and to read the gracious answer given.

After a passing reference to the utter failure of the wise men of Babylon to help the king, Daniel said:--

> "But there is a God in heaven that revealeth secrets, and maketh known to the king Nebuchadnezzar what shall be in the latter days" (Dan. ii. 28).

Evidently the king himself had been seriously thinking about the future of the dominion committed to him, for Daniel continues:--

> "As for thee, O king, thy thoughts came into thy mind upon thy bed what should come to pass hereafter" (ii. 29).

Now while, in one sense, the succession of Medo-Persia to the dominion was something that should come to pass "hereafter", as also was that of Greece, these successive monarchies are, nevertheless, not in mind, except as steps leading to the goal. In ii. 45 Daniel becomes more explicit:--

> "Forasmuch as thou sawest that the stone was cut out of the mountain without hands, and that it break in pieces the iron, the brass, the clay, the silver and the gold: the great God hath made known to the king what shall come to pass hereafter."

"The latter days" and "hereafter" have particular reference to "the days of these kings" of verse 44, when the stone shatters the image and the kingdom of the Lord is set up.

When we come to study chapter vii. we shall find the same concentration on the "end" and a rapid passing over of the steps leading to that end, as witness the words: "I would know the truth of the fourth beast" (vii. 19).

The student should be informed as to the occurrences of these expressions, "latter days" and "hereafter" in the book of Daniel, and we therefore give them:--

Hereafter.

"What should come to pass hereafter" (ii. 29).
"What shall come to pass hereafter" (ii. 45).
"Another shall come after them" (vii. 24).

Latter days.

"What shall be in the latter days" (ii. 28).
"What shall be in the last end of the indignation" (viii. 19).
"In the latter time of their kingdom" (viii. 23).
"What shall befall thy people in the latter days" (x. 14).
"What shall be the end of these things?" (xii. 8).

Daniel stood at the end of a long line of prophets, and the expressions "latter days" and "last days" had a very clear meaning. Their use can be studied in Gen. xlix. 1, Numb. xxiv. 14, Deut. iv. 30, viii. 16, xxxi. 29, xxxii. 20, 29, Isa. ii. 2, Micah iv. 1, and other passages.

Gentile dominion.

The succeeding kingdoms symbolized in the great image of Dan. ii. show a marked depreciation. Gold gives place to silver, silver to brass (or copper), brass to iron, iron to clay. Because we are far more likely to have handled a solid piece of lead than a bar of gold, many of us would place lead as the heaviest of metals. This, however, would be inaccurate, the specific gravity of lead being 11.4, whereas that of gold is as high as 19.3. Gold is the heaviest metal mentioned in Dan. ii., and it is of that metal that the head is constructed, so that the image of Gentile dominion is top-heavy from the commencement. This can be seen by observing the relative specific gravity of each material:--

Silver	10.51
Brass	8.5	(Copper 8.78)
Clay	1.9

The arrangement of these metals in the structure of the image indicates depreciation not only in weight, but also in the characteristics of the kingdom. The kingdom of which Nebuchadnezzar was the head of gold was an absolute monarchy. Of him it could be said, "Whom he would he slew, and whom he would he kept alive". The Medo-Persia kingdom, represented by silver, was not absolute, as was Nebuchadnezzar's. Darius was limited by the presidents and princes, and by his own laws "that could not be broken". The Grecian kingdom of brass was a military kingdom, and consequently lower still in the scale. We will not here speak of Rome, as we have not yet dealt with the question of the fourth kingdom. We see enough, however, to realize that this prophetic image prevents us from ever believing that the kingdom of heaven will come upon earth as a result of Gentile rule; rather are we clearly told that Gentile rule must be ground to powder before the kingdom of the Lord can be set up.

Principles of interpretation.

Let us now seek the key to the understanding of the unexplained portions of the image. First we will examine what is clearly revealed. Babylon was succeeded by Medo-Persia, Medo-Persia by Greece, and Greece by some kingdom unnamed. Babylon passed off the scene, but the kingdom of Persia has remained to this day, and so has Greece. This leads us to our first point. It is not a necessity that the dispossessed kingdom should be either destroyed or absorbed by its successor, and therefore the idea that Rome is still existing in a weakened condition, and that the ten kings at the end must be found in the Roman earth is, on this ground, without foundation. Some other principle is at work and must be discovered.

We devoted the second article of this series to the question of the "Times of the Gentiles", and we there showed that these were characterized by one essential feature, indicated by the Lord in Luke xxi. 24: "And Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles, until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled." Here is the essential prophetic character of the times of the Gentiles. Babylon dominated Jerusalem, and every power that has succeeded to the control of Jerusalem has taken its place in the image of Dan. ii. Does Rome take its place according to this canon of interpretation? Who was it that sent out a decree that all the inhabited earth should be taxed, and so unwittingly compelled the birth of the Lord Jesus to take place at Bethlehem? It was Caesar Augustus (Luke ii. 1). Who was exercising dominion over Jerusalem when John the Baptist pointed out the Messiah of Israel? The answer is Tiberius Caesar (Luke iii. 1). Who was Governor of Jerusalem, with the power of life and death, when the Lord Jesus was crucified? Again, it was a Roman, Pontius Pilate (Luke xxiii.). To whom did the Jewish nation pay tribute at this time? To none but Caesar (Luke xxiii. 2). It is, then, very evident that the Roman Empire is in the line of Gentile succession, and if historians are true and Rome's sovereignty over the earth lasted for the space of 666 years, we may, in its typical character, find food for further thought.

This brings us to another important point. Believers in the Word of God are as certain that God knew the rise and fall of Rome as that He knew the rise and fall of Babylon or Persia. Why did He not definitely name Rome as he had Persia and Greece? For the self-same reason that, in O.T. prophecy, He veiled the rejection of Christ by Israel, the ensuing long interval between the "suffering" and the "glory" and the "times and the seasons" of Israel's restoration.

The principle is brought out in Matt. xi. 14: "If ye will receive it, this is Elias, which was for to come." Now John the Baptist declared most emphatically that he was not Elias (John i. 21). The Lord declared that Elias must first come and restore all things, as Malachi had already prophesied (Matt. xvii. 11, Mal. iv. 5, 6), and that this should herald the great and dreadful day of the Lord. At the birth of John the Baptist it was said of him that he should go before the Lord "in the spirit and power of Elias" (Luke i. 17). If Israel had received the King and the kingdom, then Rome would have rapidly developed into the beast, and Herod was already at hand, a potential antichrist (see Acts xii. 20-23). We are not, however, called upon to discuss what might have been, for that leaves God out of the question. What actually took place was foreknown and provided for: Israel rejected their King and postponed their own restoration. In consequence of their folly a dispensation of hitherto unrevealed grace to an election from among the Gentiles was instituted and no dominating power in the line of Gentile dominion is revealed which would cover this period. Indeed, such would conflict with the fact that, while Israel are not reckoned as God's people, the prophetic calendar is unchecked and the prophetic voice silent. Nebuchadnezzar's vision, however, spans the whole period from his own accession until the coming of the Lord, and Rome, by its manifest sovereignty over Jerusalem, falls into line with the other powers. Rome's dominion over Jerusalem, however, has not lasted throughout this long period. What power succeeded Rome in its hold upon Jerusalem? We know that at the time of the Crusades, in which one of our own kings, Richard I., took part, the city of Jerusalem was held by the Mohammedan power, and so, though unnamed, that power succeeds Rome in the line of Gentile dominion.

It has been objected that the Mohammedan power was never a "kingdom" in the same sense as were Babylon, Persia or Greece. This is so, but instead of that fact being against its inclusion, it is rather in favour of it, because from the time of Israel's rejection, and the revelation of the dispensation of the mystery, the image of Daniel enters a protracted period of indefinite length and character, and not until the time of the end does the image emerge with any precision. The same features characterize gentile dominion at the present moment. The next development will be tragic in its reality.

Does the Mohammedan power still dominate Jerusalem? No, another change has taken place in our own days. When General Allenby received the keys of Jerusalem on 9th December, 1917, the dominion passed from the Mohammedan power to the present Gentile domination of Jerusalem, the British mandate under the League of Nations.

Let us now see what these events mean, and how far they coincide with the prophetic interpretation of the course of Gentile dominion given by Daniel:--

1.	Head of Gold . . .	BABYLON (Dan. ii.).	\
2.	Breast of silver . . .	MEDO-PERSIA (Dan. v. 31).	\ "Five are fallen"
3.	Belly and thighs of brass . . .	GREECE (Dan. viii. 21).	} (Rev. xvii. 10).
4.	Legs of iron . . .	ROME (Luke ii.).	/
5.	Feet of iron and clay . . .	TURKEY (A.D.636-1917)	/
	This line indicates the present moment		\
6.	Toes of clay . . .	LEAGUE OF NATIONS.	} "One is"
7.	The stone cut out without hands.		/ (Rev. xvii. 10).

Here we have the whole Gentile dominion represented as being six-fold, stamped with the number of man and the beast. We stand to-day at the junction of the feet and the ten toes, which are ten kings, and which, presumably, will come out of the League of Nations. When John wrote the book of Revelation he was "in spirit" writing from the Day of the Lord; consequently he could say, "five are fallen", namely, Babylon, Persia, Greece, Rome and Turkey, and "One is", viz., the dominion of the ten kings. The seventh is the kingdom of the Lord, but antichrist will present himself as the seventh—"The order is not yet come"; "he is of the seven and goeth into perdition."

Much that is mysterious in these verses is to be understood only in the light of the fact that at the time of the end the human merges into the superhuman and satanic. Although we have already occupied considerable space in this article, the solemnity of the subject and need for clearness forbids undue brevity, and we shall therefore continue for a little.

The ten toes of the image.

The word "broken" in Dan. ii. 42 should be "brittle", and shows that the "clay" is pottery. Pottery of sufficient thickness would stand the weight of the image, but would shiver to pieces at a blow. It is impossible to fuse iron and pottery together in the same way that two metals may be fused, yet when we reach the feet of the Gentile image, metal gives place to pottery. Some radical change is here indicated. The feet are composed of both iron and clay:--

> "But they shall not cleave one to another, even as iron is not mixed with clay" (Dan. ii. 43).

This does not mean that the communist will not mingle with the monarchist or the democrat with the autocrat, for this same verse in Dan. ii. contains a deeper explanation:--

> "They shall mingle themselves with the seed of men, but they shall not cleave one to another."

"The seed of men."—Are not communists and kings the seed of men? Are democrats only the seed of men and the ruling classes not? To ask the question is to answer it. Gold is a metal superior to silver, but of like nature. So also silver is superior to brass, brass to iron, yet all are metals. But at the feet of the image the altogether different materials used indicate that the "they" of ii. 43 and "the seed of men" are beings of two different orders.

Now the Lord revealed that at the time of the end it should be as it was in the days of Noah. Gen. vi. contains enough to enable us to see in the clay feet of the image the revival of the seed of the wicked one. There are two seeds in view, and the book of the Revelation makes it clear that at the end demon-possessed rulers under the satanic beast and antichrist will have full, though brief, sway.

In Dan. ii. 44 the prophet says: "In the days of these kings shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom." In the days of what kings? Are they Nebuchadnezzar, Darius, or Alexander? Any one of the three is historically impossible. What kings reign at the time when the kingdom of the Lord is set up? We find from Dan. vii. 24 that ten kings shall arise at the time of the end. We read in Rev. xvii. 12:--

> "The ten horns which thou sawest are ten kings, which have received no kingdom as yet: but receive power as kings one hour with the beast."

The ten horns of the beast and the ten toes of the image speak of the same ten kings:--

> "And as the toes of the feet . . . . . in the days of these kings" (Dan. ii. 42-44).

We have said nothing of the seventh feature, the stone cut out without hands. This foreshadows the kingdom of the Lord, and demands an article to itself. The subject comes into view later on in Daniel, and we shall be better able to deal with it then. Meanwhile let us be thankful for the sure word of prophecy. As members of the body of Christ with a calling, hope and inheritance "far above all", these things only remotely touch us. They belong, however, to the Christ we delight to honour, and, though far removed from the scene of His earthly triumphs, we can, with full heart, pray: "Thy kingdom come, Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven".

Who are the "deceased" that shall not rise? (Isa. xxvi. 14).

pp. 193 - 196

Part of a lengthy correspondence with one of our readers included a reference to Isa. xxvi. 14 & 19, and as the subject is of importance we give it consideration here.

> "They are dead, they shall not live: they are deceased, they shall not rise . . . . . Thy dead men shall live, together with my dead body shall they arise. Awake and sing, ye that dwell in dust: for thy dew is as the dew of herbs, and the earth shall cast out the dead" (Isa. xxvi. 14, 19).

The first statement is one that we must not lightly pass over: "They are dead, they shall not live." Let us make sure of each expression so that our conclusions also may be sure. Is the word "dead" the normal one for death? It is the word used of Sarah in Gen. xxiii. 4 and Joseph in Gen. l. 24. In the future tense it is used of Adam in Gen. ii. 17. It is of Noah in Gen. ix. 29, and of Abraham in Gen. xxv. 8. With Heb. xi. as our guide we can be very sure that all these "dead" shall live. Isa. xxvi. 14 speaks of some of the "dead" who shall not live.

They shall not live.—Does this refer to resurrection life? Job uses the same word when he asks, "If a man die, shall he live (again)?" (Job xiv. 14). Hosea vi. 12 uses it for resurrection life: "After two days He will revive us, in the third day He will raise us up, and we shall live in His sight." The same word is used in Hosea xiv. 7: "They will revive as the corn." Quite apart from these references, however, it is obvious that if dead men are to live, that life must be life from the dead or life in resurrection.

There is a very definite contrast in Isa. xxvi. 19: "Thy dead shall live, my dead body (plural or collective) shall arise. Awake and sing, ye that dwell in dust: for thy dew is as the dew of herbs." Here we have the same word for "dead" as in verse 14, and the same word for "live". In addition we have the word "awake", which is used in connection with resurrection in Psa. xvii. 15: "I shall be satisfied, when I awake, with Thy likeness", and also in Dan. xii. 2, "Many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake".

It is categorically asserted in Scripture that all who are in Adam must be raised from the dead: "For as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive" (I Cor. xv. 22). Both I Cor. xv. and Isa. xxvi. are inspired Scripture and beyond argument. Both passages are true. There is but one conclusion possible, that the dead referred to in Isa. xxvi. were never "in Adam"; otherwise they must live again in resurrection.

Can this be substantiated from Scripture? The answer is yes, and its basis is Isa. xxvi. 14 and 19. Let us continue. "They are deceased, they shall not rise." At first sight this seems but a repetition, but upon examination we discover that the word "deceased" is a strange one. It is "The Rephaim". Who were the Rephaim? Were they the seed of Adam? We meet them first in Gen. xiv. 5 in company with Zuzims and the Emims. The Emims are described in Deut. ii. 10, 11: "The Emims dwelt therein in times past, a people great, and many, and tall as the Anakims, which also were accounted giants, as the Anakims."

Zamzummims are mentioned in Deut. ii. 20, and these too were "giants". It is important to realize that the word "giants" here is the word "Rephaim"—the Emims were also accounted Rephaim. In the A.V. the words are used interchangeably. In Josh xv. 8 we read of the "valley of the giants"; in xvii. 15 of the "land of the Perrizites and of the giants"; and in I Chron. xi. 15 and xiv. 9 the same word is found in the expression, "the valley of the Rephaim". In I Chron. xx. 4, 6 and 8, we read of "giants" or "Rephaim" born in Gath, the birthplace of Goliath, whose brother also was a giant (see verse 5). One of these Rephaim had four and twenty fingers and toes, six on each hand and six on each foot, a living symbol of the beast of Rev. xiii.

The earth shall cast out the dead.—Here the word "dead" is the same as the word "deceased", namely, "the giants" or "the Rephaim". They shall not rise, but they are cast out of the earth. What does that mean? The word translated "cast out" is naphal, and is the causative, "cause to fall" as in Gen. ii. 21. "And the Lord God caused a deep sleep to fall upon Adam."

This word naphal gives a name to another race of Giants who come into record of Scripture in Gen. vi. 4, where they are called "the giants". They appear again in Numb. xiii. 33, and are there also called, "the sons of Anak". In the days of Noah no provision was made for the salvation of one of this seed of the wicked one, so serious in the eyes of the Lord was this awful intermingling. In the days of Israel no command was given concerning the Canaanite except that of extermination, and according to Isa. xxvi. they are dead and done with, never to awake, arise or live again.

The Lord plainly tells us that the "tares" sown by the wicked one are not evil doctrines, but the "children of the wicked one". These are bound in bundles and burned before the children of the kingdom shine forth in glory. Did the Lord use a true figure when He spoke of the tares, if the purpose of God is that these "tares" or "children of the wicked one" are to come forth from the lake of fire the redeemed of the Lord? Surely such a mighty doctrine would not be left to hang upon poor human inferences, and we accordingly reject it as being as much a lie as the words, "Ye shall not surely die", uttered in Gen. iii. 4.

As every word in this battle for the truth is of consequence, and as even an unintentional omission may be misconstrued, we must consider one more expression, viz., "They shall not rise". Does this mean resurrection? Job uses the word in xiv. 12 with very definite reference to resurrection: "Man lieth down, and riseth not: till the heavens be no more, they shall not awake, nor be raised from out of their sleep." The word is the Hebrew qum, which is found in the Aramaic form in Mark v. 41: "And He took the damsel by the hand, and said unto her, Talitha cumi: which is, being interpreted, Damsel, I say unto thee, arise."

Isa. xxvi. 14 is written as the partial explanation of a great theme, viz., the question of "dominion":--

> "O Lord our God, other lords beside Thee have had dominion over us: but by Thee only will we make mention of Thy name" (Isa. xxvi. 13).

At the creation of Adam dominion was given to him. This he lost, but it is to be restored in Christ:--

> "For unto the angels hath He not put in subjection the world to come, whether we speak . . . . . Thou madest Him for a little lower than the angels . . . . . we see Jesus, Who was made for a little lower than the angels . . . . . the children are partakers of flesh and blood . . . . . He laid not hold on angels" (Heb. ii. 5-16).

It is the character of the present age that evil triumphs and truth suffers. Cain slew his brother, built a city, and Nimrod his successor assumed dominion over the earth. This principle is true to the end, for Babylon at the close is spoken of as having dominion over the earth. The true seed remain in subjection now, but they shall reign and rule, when these "other lords" shall be no more. The purpose of the ages shall be accomplished in spite of all the opposition of the wicked one, and in spite of the fall and failure of Adam and his sons. Blessed be God for Him Who is the "last Adam". He must reign, till He hath put all enemies under His feet.

Fundamentals of Dispensational Truth.

#71. The sabbath. A sign and a covenant (Exod. xxxi.).
pp. 24 - 30

With the reference in Exod. xxxi. 1-6 to the two men who were specially endowed with wisdom for the making of the tabernacle, and the enumeration of its furniture in Exod. xxxi. 7-11, the description of the tabernacle and its parts comes to an end. Upon the close of the description of the place of worship follows the sign and covenant of the sabbath, the giving of the law on the two tables of stone, and the lapse into idolatry during the absence of Moses.

The Companion Bible shows the inter-relation of these parts very clearly; we give a somewhat condensed copy of the structure here:--

Exod. xxiv. 9 - xxxii. 14.

A | xxiv. 9-11. The worship of the seventy elders.
B | xxiv. 12-14. The tables of stone promised.
C | xxiv. 15-18. The six days and the seventh.
D | xxv. 1 - xxxi. 11. The tabernacle and its furniture.
C | xxxi. 12-17. The six days and the seventh.
B | xxxi. 18. The tables of stone given.
A | xxxii. 1-14. The idolatry of the people.

It has sometimes been felt that the making of such a structure as the tabernacle demanded greater skill than it can be supposed a nation of slaves, whose labour was in the brick fields, could possess, but we must leave God out of our reckoning. He not only gave Moses detailed instructions and a perfect pattern, but fitted specially appointed workers for their task:--

> "I have called by name Bezaleel . . . . . I have filled with the Spirit of God, in wisdom, and in understanding, and in knowledge, and in all manner of workmanship."
> "And I behold, I have given unto him Aholiab . . . . . and in their hearts I have put wisdom, that they may make all that I have commanded thee" (Exod. xxxi. 1-6).

This covers the whole question: the God who gave the command provides the wisdom and skill necessary for its accomplishment. Bezaleel means, "In the shadow of God"; Aholiab means, "The tent of my Father"—two precious and fitting names for men who were to be used of God in the construction of the tabernacle.

While we would make no pretensions to supernatural endowment to-day, we do most certainly believe that when God calls a man to a service He equips him for the work. He may be but a fisherman or a gatherer of sycamore fruit. He may be the wisest of kings or the most learned of pharisees, but, be he whom he may, his fitness for service will be given by the One Who called him to the work.

What a blessed thought, too, is conveyed to the heart of the worker by the name Bezaleel, "In the shadow of God". There is the place where wisdom, knowledge and understanding are first received, and ever after maintained—"Not by might, nor by power, but My Spirit, saith the Lord." There is also a note of instruction in the name Aholiab, "The tent of my Father". Paul stresses the necessity to be occupied with "God's building" when building upon the one foundation: all else passes away in smoke and fire (I Cor. iii.). Just as the tabernacle imaged the person of the Lord when He was made flesh and "tabernacled" among men (John i. 14), so we find the "shadowing" suggested in Luke i. 35: "The power of the Highest shall overshadow thee."

The second half of Exod. xxxi. is devoted to the question of the sabbath, so that, in some sense, we have in this chapter the six days' work (1-11), and the one day sabbath (12-18). This, as the structure shows, falls exactly into correspondence with one special week recorded in Exod. xxiv. 15-18:--

> "And the glory of the Lord abode upon Mount Sinai, and the cloud covered it six days; > and the seventh day He called unto Moses out of the midst of the cloud."

The placing of the covenant of the sabbath immediately after the appointment of the workers of the tabernacle would be a reminder that even work for God must be allowed to crowd out worship. We may all profit by this lesson.

The sabbath.

We will now look into the teaching of Scripture regarding the sabbath.

In the first place it is important to remember that not only is there the weekly sabbath day enjoined upon Israel, but that a system of sevens, from days to years, is found in Scripture. Creation is stamped with the number seven. In the Hebrew of Gen. i. 1 we find seven words, Bereshith bara elohim eth hashshamayin beth haerets—and twenty-eight letters, 7*4. This cannot be shown in English because in that language separate letters for the sounds "th", "sh", &c., must be used.

The present creation is introduced by the word of God: "And God said." In this phrase there are ten Hebrew letters having the following numerical equivalents: Vav 6, Yod 10, Aleph 1, Mem 40, Rosh 200, Aleph 1, Lamed 30, He 5, Yod 10, Mem 40. These figures total 343, which is 7*7*7, or raised to the superlative. If, moreover, the reader will look at this series he will see that exactly seven different letters are used.

The present creation occupies a double set of three days followed by a seventh rest. These sets of three perfectly correspond with each other:--

1st Day	Light.
2nd Day	Firmament and waters.
3rd Day	Dry land. PLANT LIFE.
4th Day	Light bearers.
5th Day	Fowls in the firmament. Fish in the waters.
6th Day	Beasts of field. HUMAN LIFE.

Then the 7th day . . . . . rest.

This sevenfold character lies behind the whole purpose of the ages, and Peter's comment: "One day is with the Lord as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day" (II Pet. iii. 8) suggests that the whole range of time, from the Adamic creation until and including Millennium, will be a series of seven days, each measuring one thousand years. The feasts of Israel, specified in Lev. xxiii., fill up the interval between Creation and Millennium, and foreshadow the purpose of the ages.

We find the following use of "seven" in the scriptures that deal with Israel:--

> Seven DAYS.—"The seventh day is a sabbath of rest" (Lev. xxiii. 3).
> Seven WEEKS.—"Seven sabbaths shall be complete" (Lev. xxiii. 15).
> Seven MONTHS.—"In the seventh month" (Lev. xxiii. 24).
> So far as feasts are concerned the year ends here.
> Seven YEARS.—"The seventh year shall be a sabbath of rest" (Lev. xxv. 4).
> Seven times seven YEARS.—"It shall be a Jubilee unto you" (Lev. xxv. 8-13).
> Seventy times seven YEARS.—"Seventy weeks are determined" (Dan. ix. 24).
> Seven TIMES.—"I will chasten you seven times" (Dan. iv. 16).
> Israel's chastisement the same length of time as Gentile madness.

Here we have a progressive series of seven features, showing that the weekly sabbath was one of a series of ordinances enjoined upon this people.

The sign and the covenant.

Just as blood of the passover lamb (Exod. xii. 13), the unleavened bread (xiii. 9), and the redemption of the firstborn (xiii. 13) were "signs" or "tokens", so the sabbath was a special "sign" to Israel of their separation unto the Lord from all other nations. This sanctification is expressed in Lev. xx. 24-26:--

> "I am the Lord your God, which have separated you from other people. Ye shall therefore put a difference between clean beasts and unclean . . . . . ye shall be holy unto Me, for I the Lord am holy, and have severed you from other people, that ye should be mine."

The scruples discussed in Rom. xiv. as to "days" and "meats" arose out of the relationship of such things to Israel's exclusive position.

The observation of the sabbath was given for an "age-abiding covenant", but it is well to notice that in Exod. xxxi. both the "sign" and the "covenant" are restricted to Israel:--

> "Wherefore the children of Israel shall keep the sabbath . . . . . an age-abiding covenant. It is a sign between Me and the children of Israel for the age" (Exod. xxxi. 16, 17).

There can be no intrusion of others into this covenant. It belongs to Israel, and to those who, by becoming proselytes, are reckoned with Israel. The breaking of the sabbath by the performance of work was punishable by death, and anyone who thus transgressed the commandment was cut off from the people of God; he had broken the covenant. The sabbath, moreover, was to be observed and kept as an age-abiding covenant.

There are reasons for observing the sabbath attached to the various commands that we should notice. The first passage is that which occurs in the ten commandments. The reason given there for sabbath observance is that the Lord, after the six days' creation, "rested the seventh day; wherefore the Lord blessed the sabbath day and hallowed it." So long as Israel observed the sabbath day, they were a witness to the God of creation, and the creation narrative of Gen. i. and ii.

In Exod. xxiii. 12 the sabbath is enjoined so that ox, ass and servant may be refreshed. The words are echoed in Exod. xxxi. 17:--

> "For in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, and on the seventh day He rested, and was refreshed."

The word "refreshed" is naphas, and could almost be translated "had time to breathe". We do not entertain the thought that the mighty Creator becomes weary with work, but it is helpful to see how He stoops to the needs of the creatures made in His image.

Attached to the command to keep the sabbath is a reminder that Israel was once a servant in the land of bondage, so that the institution of the day showed God's mercy to Israel and His concern for others (Deut. v. 12-15). Reverence for the sanctuary of God, also, was associated with the sabbath (Lev. xxiii. 32). Though shrouded in type and symbol, the sabbath, nevertheless, was an opportunity of experiencing and expressing something of the grace of God:--

> "If thou turn away thy foot from the sabbath, from doing thy pleasure on My holy day; and call the sabbath a delight, the holy of the Lord; and shalt honour Him, not doing thine own ways, nor finding thine own pleasure, nor speaking thine own words" (Isa. lviii. 13)

Both the true spirit of the sabbath, and the false representation of it, as it had become by the tradition of the elders, are very vividly brought to view in the Gospels. When the disciples plucked a few ears of corn, and rubbed them in their hands, they broke the sabbath according to the tradition of the Pharisees. Of course reaping and threshing on the sabbath were forbidden by the law, but these formalists taught that to pluck an ear of corn was "reaping", and to rub it in the hand was "threshing", even as walking on grass was a species of threshing!

The persecution of the Lord, and the crucifixion itself, may be traced to His attitude toward the sabbath day:--

> "Therefore did the Jews persecute Jesus, and sought to slay Him because He had done these things on the sabbath day" (John v. 16).

In spite of the fact that the Lord kept every jot and tittle of the law, the Pharisees refused to recognize in His actions any observance of the sabbath. They said: "This man is not of God, because He keepeth not the sabbath day" (John ix. 16). While these things are important, and have in view the great sabbath rest that awaits the children of God (Heb. iv. 9-11), we must not omit the statements concerning the sabbath and other holy days and feasts that are found in Paul's epistles.

The Sabbath, Sunday and the Church.

It is evident that Paul could not have written Rom. xiv. had the sabbath day been binding upon the church. The law of the sabbath does not leave room for "esteeming every day alike" (Rom. xiv. 5), and if this be true regarding such an established institution as the sabbath, it is also most true regarding the first day of the week. When Paul said to the Galatians:--

> "Ye observe days, and months, and times and years, I am afraid of you, lest I have bestowed upon you labour in vain" (Gal. iv. 10, 11).

he made no exception of the sabbath day. His words in Col. ii., however, leave one without a doubt as to the purport of his teaching:--

> "Let no man therefore judge you in meat, or in drink, or in respect of an holy day, or of the new moon, or of the sabbaths, which are a shadow of good things to come: but the body is of Christ" (Col. ii. 16, 17).

With the coming of the full truth of the mystery, there passed off the scene all types and shadows. The inclusion of the "sabbaths" in such a context as Col. ii. should make us doubly on our guard against any specious arguments that "have a show of wisdom", but which lead away from our full and complete position in Christ.

We respect the conscience of the weaker brother regarding the observance of days, the abstaining from meats, and other items that have no longer any value for us. Sunday is not the sabbath, and no manipulation of the references to the first day of the week can make it so. Moreover, we do not seek to impose Sunday observance upon the world of the ungodly, for we realize that no such claim belongs to our calling, or to them. We thankfully accept Sunday as an opportunity for obtaining that necessary one day's rest in seven which our physical nature demands. We, moreover, welcome the opportunity it provides for more completely turning aside from the things of everyday life to the worship of God, and the ministry of His Word, but we see no special sanctity in a meeting held on Sunday, neither would we allow any thought of the "day" to influence our attitude or witness. Concern for the conscience of others is the only bondage to which we are willing to submit in this matter. The bondage of "holy days" is "not after Christ" and is to be rejected.

Whatever the sabbath meant to Israel a rest, a delight, a prophecy of the rest that remaineth, a sign, a covenant, a mark of the high calling of God, this, like circumcision and other rites, we find in full measure in Christ. He is our Sabbath, and we need no shadows of good things to come. We have the blessed substance. While we walk in Him, we need no holy days.

#72. The golden calf (Exod. xxxi. 18 - xxxii. 14).
pp. 67 - 72

The worship of the golden calf and the breaking of the two tables of stone are the closing incidents of this great section of the book of Exodus.

The worship of the calf is in exact correspondence with the worship of the God of Israel by the seventy (Exod. xxiv. 9-11), and the promise of the two tables of stone with their reception by Moses (Exod. xxiv. 12-14 and xxxi. 18):--

A | xxiv. 9-11. Worship of God of Israel.
B | xxiv. 12-14. Tables of stone promised.
* * * * * * *
B | xxxi. 18. Tables of stone given.
A | xxxii. 1-14. Worship of golden calf.

When Moses and Aaron, Nadab and Abihu, and seventy of the elders of Israel ascended the mountain, we are told that "they saw the God of Israel . . . . . and they did eat and drink". Then it was that the Lord spoke of the tables of stone:--

> "Come up to Me into the mount, and be there: and I will give thee tables of stone, and the law, and the commandment WHICH I HAVE WRITTEN, that thou mayest teach them" (Exod. xxiv. 12). (The R.V. corrects the A.V. here, for the Lord spoke of the law, not "a" law and the commandment, not "commandments").

If this passage stood alone it would be sufficient for all who bow before the authority of the Scriptures. The verse distinctly affirms that, before Moses ascended into the Mount, the Lord had already written the tables of stone. It is of course possible to explain the passage as being merely a figure of speech, but the number of times the fact is mentioned leaves no room for doubt. The subject is important enough to warrant a careful tabulation of all the references, which will now be given.

Did God actually write the Law?

Let us read further evidence on this vital question:--

1. Exod. xxiv. 12.—Already quoted above.
2. Exod. xxxi. 18.—"And He gave unto Moses, when He had made an end of communing with him upon mount Sinai, two tables of testimony, tables of stone, WRITTEN WITH THE FINGER OF GOD."
3. Exod. xxxii. 15, 16.—"And Moses turned, and went down from the mount, and the two tables of the testimony were in his hand: the tables were written on both sides; on the one side and the other were they written. And the tables were THE WORK OF GOD, and the writing was THE WRITING OF GOD, graven upon the tables."

4. Exod. xxxiv. 1, 28 (also Deut. x. 1-14).—"And the Lord said unto Moses, Hew thee two tables of stone like unto the first; and I WILL WRITE upon these tables the words that were in the first tables, which thou breakest . . . . . And he was there with the Lord forty days and nights: he did neither eat bread nor drink water. And HE WROTE upon the tables the words of the covenant, the ten commandments."
5. Deut. iv. 13.—"And He declared unto you His covenant, which He commanded you to perform, even ten commandments: and HE WROTE them upon two tables of stone."
6. Deut. v. 22.—"These words (i.e. the ten commandments quoted in verses 6-21) the Lord spake unto all your assembly in the mount out of the midst of the fire, of the cloud, and of the thick darkness, with a great voice; and He added no more. And HE WROTE them in two tables of stone, and delivered them unto me."
7. Deut. ix. 9, 10.—"When I was gone up into the Mount to RECEIVE the tables of stone, even the tables of the covenant which the Lord made with you . . . . . the Lord DELIVERED unto me two tables of stone WRITTEN WITH THE FINGER OF GOD."

Here are seven separate passages of Scripture. One makes promise of the bestowal of the tables, three record the receiving of them, and three more rehearse the fact years after the event.

The testimony is clear and complete.

The ten commandments which formed the "covenant" between Israel and the Lord were written by none other than God Himself. The remaining commandments, statutes and judgments, all spring from these basic commandments and were given to Moses during the forty days, commencing with the law given in the Mount. We may therefore declare that God has not only spoken, but He has written, and thereby made it plain to all His people that He will communicate in written word His will for them. In the language of Paul in I Cor. xv. 3 the reader will doubtless perceive a reflection of Deut. ix. 9, 10: "For I delivered unto you first of all that which I also received."

Worship.

This section, as we have seen, begins and ends in worship, and what is true of this small section is true of the whole age-purpose. The somewhat veiled story of Ezek. xxviii. revolves around the thought of worship. The temptation of the Lord in Matt. iv. reaches its climax in worship. The Beast, at the last, enables Satan to attain his end—worship (Rev. xiii). The times of the Gentiles begin and end with false worship (Dan. iii., Rev. xiii.). Worship is the goal of the mystery of iniquity (II Thess. ii. 4), and the word "godliness" in the phrase "the mystery of godliness" (I Tim. iii. 16) is "good or accepted worship" (eusebeia). The Gentile apostacy was connected with worship (Rom. i. 21-23) at the beginning, and will be so at the end—"a form of worship" (II Tim. iii. 5). The last of all gospels stresses worship (Rev. xiv. 7).

The first and all-embracing term of the covenant of Sinai was: "Thou shalt have no other gods before Me" (Exod. xx. 3), and the first step in transgression is the making of "any graven image, or any likeness of anything . . . . . thou shalt not bow down to them, nor serve them" (Exod. xx. 4, 5). Idol worship is demon worship:--

> "What say I then? that the idol is anything, or that which is offered in sacrifice to idols is anything? But I say, that the things which the Gentiles sacrifice, they sacrifice to demons, and not to God" (I Cor. x. 19, 20).

The gods of Egypt, as well as the Egyptians themselves, were the objects of God's wrath in the plagues (Exod. xii. 12).

The worship of the golden calf.

> "And when the people saw that Moses delayed to come down out of the mount, the people gathered themselves together unto Aaron, and said unto him, Up, make us gods, which shall go before us; for as for this Moses, the man that brought us up out of the land of Egypt, we know not what has become of him" (Exod. xxxii. 1).

There are two points of great importance in this verse. The first has reference to the word "delayed". The word is the piel form of the verb, which generally indicates intensity. The verb itself is bosh, meaning "to be, or to feel, shame", and at first sight the translation "delayed" seems to have no connection. That bosh does mean "to be ashamed" the following passages will show: Gen. ii. 25; Psa. vi. 10; Isa. i. 39, and the A.V. so translates it seventy-one times. Once, the verb is translated "become dry" (Hos. xiii. 15), and yabesh is used in Gen. i. 9 and Exod. xiv. 16 of the "dry land". This, rather than "ashamed", is at the root of the word, and the transition of the meaning is as follows: "To flag, fail, grow flaccid, limp, spiritless", then "to languish at long delay, to feel ashamed, confounded." There is one other reference in the A.V. where the piel preterite is found, viz., Judg. v. 28: "Why is the chariot so long in coming?" Here the mother of Sisera betrays her uneasiness and confusion at the delay of her son.

Exod. xxxii. 1 therefore tells us that Israel began to flag, to dry up, to feel somewhat ashamed at the long delay—they felt that something ought to have been done by then, much as we may feel at being kept waiting for an interview beyond what we may think a reasonable time. Israel did not realize that one of the first phases of worship is expressed in the word "wait":--

> "Let not them that wait on Thee, O Lord God of hosts, be ashamed for my sake" (Psa. lxix. 6).
> "Yea, let none that wait on Thee be ashamed" (Psa. xxv. 3).
> "Let me not be ashamed of my hope" (Psa. cxix. 116).
> "Hope maketh not ashamed" (Rom. v. 5).
> "According to my earnest expectation and my hope, that in nothing I shall be ashamed" (Phil. i. 20).

Habakkuk had to learn the importance of waiting God's time (Hab. ii. 1-4), and the same lesson is rehearsed in Heb. x. 37-39. It was the evil servant who said, "MY Lord delayeth His coming" (Matt. xxiv. 48).

Rom. i. reveals an affinity between idolatry and ingratitude:--

> "They glorified Him not as God, neither were thankful . . . . . and changed the glory of the incorruptible God into an image . . . . ." (Rom. i. 21-23).

Exod. xxxii. 1 shews the same connection:--

> "Up, make us gods, which shall go before us, for as this Moses, the man that brought us up our of the land of Egypt, we know not what has become of him."

"As for this Moses"—It does not sound very respectful; the people fail in their attitude both to God and man.

The idol that was made by Aaron from the golden earrings of the women was in the form of a calf. Memphis, which was near to Goshen, and On, which was in the midst of Goshen, were both famous for the worship of the Sacred Bull. At the death of the Bull, whose name was Apis, it was called Osiris, Apis or Serapis, and a new calf, born of a cow that could have no more young, became the new god. There is a mixture here of the false and the true:--

> "These be thy gods, O Israel, which brought thee out of the land of Egypt. And when Aaron saw it, he built an altar before it; and Aaron made proclamation, and said, To-morrow is a feast to the Lord" (Exod. xxxii. 4, 5).

Here is confusion—"gods" and "the Lord", and Aaron in his answer to Moses manifests that he is a temporizer:--

> "And Moses said unto Aaron, What did this people unto thee, that thou hast brought so great a sin upon them? And Aaron said, Let not the anger of my lord wax hot; thou knowest the people, that they are set on mischief. For they said unto me, Make us gods . . . . . and there came out this calf" (Exod. xxxii. 21-24).

We are warned in Scripture to judge not lest we be judged. With all humility and full consciousness of our own weakness and liability to err, we feel that nothing can be put forward to justify Aarons' action. Three thousand men lost their lives, the whole of the people were shamed, the precious tables of stone written by the finger of God shattered, and the initial term of the covenant broken, all largely because one man did not stand firm for God and His revealed will. What a blessed contrast it is to turn to Gal. ii. and see there the magnificent stand of the apostle for the truth of the gospel, and his subjection to the popular voice "no, not for an hour".

The statement that the people "rose up to play", that they were "dancing" round the golden calf, and that Aaron had made them "naked unto their shame among their enemies", reveals the lascivious character of their worship. Many have found a difficulty in understanding verse 20: "And he took the calf which they had made, and burnt it in the fire, and ground it to powder, and strawed it upon the water, and made the children of Israel drink of it." The modern chemist would probably use tartaric acid in accomplishing this, but the ancient Egyptians used natron. The resulting powder has a nauseous taste, and the action would be symbolical of the bitter result of their folly.

Should any, moreover, feel any difficulty about the amount of gold indicated, he should acquaint himself with the statements of archaeologist and historian. "The rich frequently had ornamental works, statues, and furniture of solid gold. Diodoros mentions a golden statue at Babylon, forty feet high, weighing one thousand Babylonian talents", and a list is given of other similar effigies "making a total of at least 690 talents, reckoned equal to L11,000,000 sterling". Thus Wilkinson in Ancient Egyptians.

Not only did Israel turn back in heart to the leeks and the fish which they did eat in Egypt, thy also turned to their gods—yes, even after the majesty of Sinai and the meditation of Moses. The lapse of forty days was a test, and under that test Israel failed. The number forty is often associated with a test. How wonderfully the Lord Jesus entered into Israel's position, triumphing where they failed. He, too, waited for forty days; He, too, was tempted to worship Satan, but He gloriously triumphed, giving glory to God and honouring His Word. The spies searched the land of Canaan forty days, and again Israel failed, and for forty years wandered in the wilderness.

There is a sad parallel with Exod. xxxii. even to-day. The great Mediator has ascended, the time seems long; ministers appointed by God yield to the pressure of the people; they effect a compromise: "gods" and "the Lord" are brought together, and the One Who accomplished their redemption is slighted.

The outcome of this awful departure from the covenant of God we must consider in our next paper. Meanwhile, let us not miss the solemn lessons that everywhere are apparent in this chapter, for in the scriptures written to us and about us is the warning concerning "heaping to themselves teachers", and "a form of godliness, but denying the power thereof". The added word," From such turn away", is, in measure, an echo of Exod. xxxii. 26, where Moses stood in the gate of the camp and cried: "Who is on the Lord's side? Let him come unto me."

#73. The mediation of Moses (Exod. xxxii. - xxxiii. 3).
pp. 113 - 117

In connection with the worship of the golden calf, there are some solemn features that could not be dealt with in the previous article. The language used by the Lord concerning Israel indicates a change in their relationship: "Go, get thee down, for thy people, which thou broughtest out of the land of Egypt, have corrupted themselves" (Exod. xxxii. 7). The Lord does not speak of "My" people, but "thy" people. He does not say that He, the Lord, brought Israel from Egypt, but speaks of Moses as their leader. Israel had, for the time, fallen out of covenant with God and had become lo ammi, "not My people". There is much the same intention in these words as in those of the Lord Jesus concerning Jerusalem: "Your house is left unto you desolate."

Israel had corrupted themselves. The word used here occurs also in Hosea xiii. 9 where we read: "O Israel, thou hast destroyed thyself." We first meet the word in Gen. vi.—an ominous context: "The earth also was corrupt before God . . . . . And God looked upon the earth, and, behold, it was corrupt, for all flesh had corrupted his way upon the earth" (Gen. vi. 11, 12). We have some small conception of the depth of corruption that filled the earth at the time of the flood—the same word is used of Israel in Exod. xxxii. It is also rendered "destroy" in Genesis: "I will destroy them with the earth"; "I will destroy all flesh" (Gen. vi. 13-17).

The relation between "corruption", destruction", "idolatry" and the "covenant" is seen in Deut. iv.:--

> "Lest ye corrupt yourselves, and make you a graven image, the similitude of any figure, the likeness of male or female."
> "Take heed unto yourselves, lest ye forget the covenant of the Lord your God, which He made with you, and make you a graven image or likeness of any thing, which the Lord Thy God hath forbidden thee . . . . . and shall corrupt yourselves, and make a graven image . . . . . if thou shalt seek Him . . . . . He will not forsake thee, neither destroy thee, nor forget the covenant of thy fathers which He sware unto them" (Deut. iv. 16, 23, 25, 29, 31).

Here we have the same word, shachath, translated both "corrupt" and "destroy". We expect our readers to prove all statements made in these pages, and therefore anticipate the findings of some who may consult The Companion Bible on verse 31. The word there is marked with the reference figure to verse 26, as though shamad is used in verse 31. This is not correct, however, and users of the C.B. would be well advised to cross out the reference to 26 in verse 31. [This comment is in the cause of truth, and entirely after the heart of the editor of the C.B.; it is made by a sincere admirer of this valuable work. We say this lest any should think that we have anything but admiration for the witness of the late Dr. Bullinger].

As we read Deut. iv., we sees how Israel's corruption of true worship reverted in its corrupting and destroying effect upon themselves. The inspiration that governs all Scripture led Paul, in Rom. i., to speak of "the incorruptible God" in a context of idolatry and personal degradation (verses 23-25).

When dealing with Rom. i. we drew attention to the close parallel that exists between the histories of the Gentile and of Israel. It is so important to realize this that we repeat the following quotations:--

Gentile (Rom. i.).	Israel (Psa. cvi.).
"They changed the glory of the incorruptible God into an image . . . . . man . . . . .birds, beasts and creeping things" (23).	"They made a calf in Horeb, and worshipped the molten image. Thus they changed their glory into the similitude of an ox that eateth grass" (19, 20).
"They did not like to retain God in their knowledge" (28).	"They forget God their Saviour" (21).
"Wherefore God also gave them up" (24).	"Therefore He said that He would destroy them" (23).
"Uncleanness . . . . . vile affections" (24-27).	"They joined themselves also unto Baal-peor, and ate the sacrifices of the dead" (28).
"Inventors of evil things" (30).	"They provoked Him to anger with their inventions" (29).

Rom. i. 18-32 has much in common with II Thess. ii. 1-12 and II Tim. iii. 1-8, and the link with Gen. vi. shows that we have the same evil at work in the patriarchal age with Israel as at the end of this dispensation. In like manner we have in II Pet. ii. "destructive heresies, even denying the Lord that brought them", and soon "lascivious ways". Then follows the sin of the angels, and of Sodom and Gomorrah, a reference to the brute beasts that perish in their own corruption, eyes full of adultery, the way of Balaam, and finally servants of corruption, likened to dogs and sows. Here we have the degeneration that sets in upon departure from the truth.

It is because of the close affinity between the glory of the incorruptible God, and the blessing of man, that we find in the covenant of the ten commandments, written by the finger of God, that which preserves not only pure worship, but pure family life. As surely as man corrupts the worship of God, so surely will he corrupt himself, and in seeking to "worship God in spirit and truth" he is at the same time pursuing his own truest interests. The Millennium itself is characterized by the "knowledge of the Lord".

In the tenth verse of our chapter we have the repudiation of Israel: "Now therefore let Me alone, that My wrath may wax hot against them, and that I may consume them; and I will make of thee a great nation" (Exod. xxxii. 10). This leads us back to Gen. xii. where the Lord made the promise to Abraham.

Promise versus Law.

Moses makes no reference to this suggestion, but throws himself and his people upon the grace of God. He will not even repeat the Lord's word with reference to himself, "thy people, which thou broughtest out", but boldly says: "Lord, why doth Thy wrath wax hot against Thy people, which Thou has brought forth out of the land of Egypt?" (verse 11).

Moses reminds the Lord that He is Israel's Redeemer. This sinful, stiff-necked people are the Lord's redeemed, typically, by the blood of the Lamb, "with great power and a mighty hand". Moses further pleads for the name of God among the enemy: "Wherefore should the Egyptians speak and say, For mischief did He bring them out, to slay them in the mountains, and to consume them from the face of the earth?" (verse 12). Finally he reminds the Lord of the covenant established before the law of Sinai. He anticipates the argument of the apostle in Galatians:--

> "And this I say, that the covenant, that was confirmed before of God in Christ, the law, which was four hundred and thirty years after, cannot disannul, that it should make the promise of none effect. For if the inheritance be of the law, it is no more of promise; but God gave it to Abraham by promise. Wherefore then serveth the law? It was added because of transgressions, till the seed should come to whom the promise was made" (Gal. iii. 17-19).

Moses, the man of law, and Paul, the man of grace, speak alike. Moses does not plead the covenant of Sinai—he goes back "four hundred and thirty years" earlier to the covenant with Abraham: "Remember Abraham, Isaac and Israel, Thy servants, to whom Thou swearest by Thine Own Self, and saidst unto them, I will multiply your seed as the stars of heaven, and all this land that I have spoken of will I give unto your seed, and they shall inherit it for ever" (verse 13).

In response to this prayer, the Lord repented of the evil He had purposed against Israel. Over against the Lord's repudiation, Moses had placed the Lord's redemption; against their own corruption, the degrading of the Lord's name among the heathen; against making of Moses himself a great nation, the unconditional covenant made with Abraham, Isaac and Israel.

Levi and Phinehas.

Moses' intercession with God did not by any means indicate a hiding or minimizing of Israel's sin. We read that "Moses' anger waxed hot", and that, seeing that the covenant was already broken, he cast the tables of stone to the ground, breaking them on the mount. He cause Israel to realize their sin by compelling them to drink the bitter fluid compounded of the calcined image, and made Aaron to understand that he had brought a great sin upon Israel.

When Moses saw the extent of their corruption—"they were naked"—he, who had interceded for them with God, now reveals that covenant promises do not mean indulgence for sin, and three thousand men were slain by the sword of Levi, who were spared the wrath of God.

Psalm cvi. brings together the worship of the golden calf, and the sin of Baal-peor, recorded in Numb. xxv. There are several features that are common to the two records. The hint of uncleanness in Exod. xxxii. becomes an obvious fact in Numb. xxv. 1-3, 6-8. The execution by the sons of Levi in Exod. xxxii. corresponds to the command of Numb. xxv. 5: "Slay ye every one his men that were joined unto Baal-peor." The added zeal of Phinehas in some measure counterbalances the sin and fall of Aaron, for the Lord says:--

> "Behold, I give unto him My covenant of peace: And he shall have it, and his seed after him for an everlasting priesthood; because he was zealous for his God, and made an atonement for the children of Israel" (Numb. xxv. 12, 13).

This passage illuminates the true meaning of atonement; it is no "covering up" of sin: "Phinehas . . . . . hath turned My wrath away . . . . . and made an atonement for the children of Israel." In this case the atonement did not save; in our case wrath is turned away, but the atonement is made by death other than our own. In both cases plague follows the idolatry and uncleanness, and with the solemn words of Rom. i. 27 in mind, some medical men believe this is to be the origin of one disease that is spreading among mankind to-day. The sons of Levi had an awful consecration that day (Exod. xxxii. 29). Moses had called: "Who is on the Lord's side? Let him come unto me", and there followed the slaughter of the three thousand men by the sword of Levi.

Once more Moses is the intercessor, this time going so far as to say: "And if not, blot me, I pray thee, out of the book which Thou hast written." But, just as he himself had pleaded the grace of God to save Israel from being blotted out, so the Lord in His turn rejects Moses' suggestion, saying: "Whosoever hath sinned against Me, him will I blot out of My book." Whether Moses had the thought in mind that he could thereby make an atonement, we do not know—he had said to the people: "Peradventure, I shall make an atonement for your sin"—but the passage foreshadows the greater Mediator between God and man, the man Christ Jesus, Who gave Himself a ransom for all.

Israel's sin, while it did not bring about their extinction, yet put them at a greater distance from the Lord: "Therefore now go, lead the people unto the place of which I have spoken unto thee: behold, My angel shall go before thee . . . . . I will send an angel before thee . . . . . I will not go up in the midst of thee" (xxxii. 34 - xxxiii. 3). While angelic leading may be blessed, it was by comparison a severe loss to Israel, for they had forfeited the Lord's presence in their midst. We shall see more of this as we consider chapter xxxiii. The lessons are so many and so solemn that reiteration and application seem out of place. Exod. xxxii. is a chapter to read before the Lord, praying that there may be no present-day parallel with the position of Aaron and the people in our own walk.

Let us not say that the Lord delayeth; let us watch and pray; let us worship God in spirit, boasting in Christ Jesus, and having no confidence in the flesh.

#74. The presence and the glory (Exod. xxxiii.).
pp. 173 - 179

We take up the narrative at the point where the Lord promised to send His angel to go before Israel, but said that He Himself would not go up in the midst of them, lest He consumed them in the way. These were "evil tidings", which brought about a general mourning. No man put on his ornaments, for the wearing of these was a sign of rejoicing, as abstention therefrom was of mourning. The Lord said to Moses: "Say unto the children of Israel, Ye are a stiff-necked people; if I had come one instant among you, I had destroyed you (Horsley and De Wett): therefore now put off thy ornaments from thee, that I may know what to do with thee" (Exod. xxxiii. 5). Here we have, set forth in symbol, the necessity for repentance.

Following this manifestation of repentance came the removal of the "tent" without the camp, indicating the necessity for separation from the prevailing ungodliness, a witness-bearing by active association. This "tabernacle" must not be confounded with the tabernacle already so fully described, for that was not then made. This one is called "The tabernacle of the congregation" (or "assembly"). The LXX translates this, "The tabernacle of witness", and although there is no apparent connection between "congregation" and "witness", we do not get the full intention of the Hebrew word moed unless we include the idea of testimony. Ed is the Hebrew word translated "witness" in Exod. xx. 16; eduth is the word translated, "the tabernacle of witness" in Numb. xvii. 7. Moed, translated "congregation" in Exod. xxxiii. 7, is rendered in Gen. i. 14 "for seasons", and in Gen. xvii. 21 "at this set time"; also "feasts", set feasts", "solemnly", etc.

This removal of the tabernacle "without the camp" was itself a witness, and the congregation that worshipped there was no longer "all Israel", but "every one that sought the Lord went out unto the tabernacle of the congregation which was without the camp". It is plainly around this feature that Heb. xiii. 13 is written, and about this self-same separation that the great cloud of "witnesses" are arrayed in Heb. xi. In this separated congregation we have in germ the idea of a church, "a called-out company" as ekklesia means. Exod. xxxiii. 8-11 must be read as a description of what happened subsequently, that is, when the true seeker after God had given his testimony by going without the camp. Then, each time after that, when Moses entered the tabernacle to communed with the Lord, these same men (and possibly others following their example) rose and worshipped, every man in his tent door. There is a precious lesson here. By his act of separation and devotion, each man turned his own dwelling-place into a sanctuary, much as the early church worshipped in houses, remembering all the time that their great Mediator was in the presence of God, and outside the camp.

There is strong emphasis here upon communion with God: "And the Lord spake unto Moses face to face, as a man speaketh unto his friend" (Exod. xxxiii. 11). What a glorious contrast to the obscene worship of the golden calf! Here is no visible image, just a small tent, and the cloudy pillar to indicate the presence of the Lord.

This peculiar prerogative of Moses is mentioned more than once, to show how specially favoured and honoured he was:--

> "If there be a prophet among you, I the Lord will make Myself known unto him in a vision, and I will speak unto him in a dream. My servant Moses is not so, who is faithful in all Mine house. With him I will speak mouth to mouth, even apparently, and not in dark speeches; and the similitude of the Lord shall he behold" (Numb. xii. 6-8).

It is among the last things said of Moses, at his death, that "there arose not a prophet since in Israel like unto Moses, whom the Lord knew face to face" (Deut. xxxiv. 10).

Moses now faces the altered conditions, and seeks of the Lord guidance and renewed assurance: "See Thou sayest unto me, Bring up this people, and Thou hast not let me know whom Thou wilt send with me. Yet Thou hast said, I know thee by name, and thou hast also found grace in My sight" (Exod. xxxiii. 12). Here we are permitted to hear the communion of Moses with his God. How blessedly simple, intimate and direct it is! Moses neither overrated his own abilities, nor under-estimated the task before him. How was it possible, he argued, to reconcile such a task with the favour in which he stood with the Lord? So he continues: "Now, therefore, I pray Thee, if I have found grace in Thy sight, show me now Thy way, that I may know Thee, that I may find grace in Thy sight: and consider that this nation is Thy people" (verse 13).

Let us observe that Moses does not tell the Lord what to do, nor does he even voice his own conscious need of the Lord's presence, but just asks, "Show me now Thy way", adding, as an additional plea, "Consider that this nation is Thy people".

There is no reference in the Lord's first answer to the "way" or the "people", but He met Moses' initial fear and need by saying: "My presence shall go with thee, and I will give thee rest" (verse 14). Moses had before him, perhaps a task more gigantic than has ever since fallen to man to perform, but here, at the outset, he is assured of rest. From now onward he may enjoy a continual sabbath, for the word for rest here is used by the Lord in Exod. xx. 11. So, when Moses responded to this gracious word of God, he did not speak of "bringing" up the people of Israel himself, but of the Lord "carrying" them: "If Thy presence go not with me, carry us not up hence" (verse 15).

"I will give you rest."

Here service takes on a new form—a more blessed form—it becomes fellowship. We cannot do better than turn to Matt. xi. to obtain an illustration of the principle set forth here. The whole setting of this chapter is one of doubt, disappointment and triumphant trust, John the Baptist had sent from prison saying: "Art thou He that should come, or do we look for another?" The generation that had seen the Lord's miracles and heard His words is next compared to fractious children who will neither mourn at funerals nor rejoice at weddings. The cities of Chorazin and Bethsaida are rebuked for their unbelief, and it is then, at that time, and in these circumstances, that we read: "At that time Jesus answered and said, I thank Thee, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth, because Thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent, and hast revealed them unto babes. Even so, Father: for so it seemed good in Thy sight" (verses 25, 26). It is in this setting and context that the words of comfort follow: "Come unto Me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest. Take My yoke upon you, and learn of Me; for I am meek and lowly in heart: and ye shall find rest unto your souls. For My yoke is easy, and My burden is light" (verses 28-30).

The following sentences taken from With Christ in Palestine, by A. T. Schofield, M.D., are suggestive:--

> "I was looking at a very good commentary as to what 'yoke' is supposed to mean here, and I found it means 'fellowship, restraint, and subjection'. No doubt these are three minor uses of a yoke . . . . . but the chief great primary use of a 'yoke' is seldom grasped by Christian people; most are so occupied with the secondary uses I have named that its great purpose is entirely missed. A yoke first of all is a contrivance to enable oxen to pull a load along the road or across the field; 'yoke' is simply another word for 'harness'. Harness is not put upon an animal primarily for subjection or restraint or fellowship; it is put on to enable it to draw a load.
> Speaking now for a moment as a physician, who sees a great many nervous and broken-down people of all sorts, I find that the greater number are not only sick in their bodies, but also sick in their minds, and what they mostly suffer from is a complaint which I call 'sore neck'.
>
> What, then, had made the neck sore? It is that the collar either does not fit, or it has not been properly padded . . . . . Christ has come to us and says, It is not enough for you to come to Me as weary and heavy laden and find rest for your conscience in Myself: you want some means of shielding your heart from all the petty worries and troubles . . . . . and all the contrariety and meaningless vexations of this world of sorrow . . . . . When the yoke is easy then the burden is light.
> What, then, is this yoke padded with? The two materials mentioned are meekness and lowliness of heart . . . . . I take it, meekness is our attitude towards man, and lowliness is the attitude towards God."

It is something of this that we find in Exod. xxxiii. 15: "And he said unto Him, If Thy presence go not with me, carry us not up hence." Now it is in connection with the very fact that the Lord had spoken to Moses face to face, that we meet the statement: "Now the man Moses was very meek, above all the men which were upon the face of the earth" (Numb. xii. 3). It is evident that this meekness is displayed on many occasions when lesser souls would have given way to impatience. But alas for human nature! the meekest man on earth spoke unadvisedly with his lips and failed; One only could ever be the "perfecter of faith". Moses reasoned that the presence of the Lord was the great evidence of His favour:--

> "For wherein shall it be known here that I and Thy people have found grace in Thy sight? Is it not in that Thou goest with us? So shall we be separated, I and Thy people, from all the people that are upon the face of the earth" (Exod. xxxiii. 16).

The positive side of sanctification.

"So shall we be separated."—Here is a word in season for us all. Separation is, too often, a matter of "separation from", a negative thing, whereas it should be "separation to", the positive truth. Fellowship with the Lord is the great antidote to worldliness, but separation from worldliness alone has produced Pharisees and founded monasteries. Heb. xiii. 13, the oft-quoted passage, does not merely say: "Let us go forth therefore without the camp." What it does say is: "Let us go forth therefore unto Him without the camp."

Israel's separation from the nations was evidence by their observance of clean and unclean meats: "I am the Lord your God, which have separated you from other people. Ye shall therefore put a difference between clean and unclean" (Lev. xx. 24, 25). Israel's separation brought about this observance. It was because the Lord had separated them, that "therefore" they made the difference. Israel were not permitted to intermarry with the Canaanite, but this abstention did not make them separate. They abstained because they had been separated: "Neither shalt thou make marriages with them . . . . . for the Lord thy God hath chosen thee to be a special people unto Himself, above all people that are upon the face of the earth" (Deut. vii. 1-6).

The sanctification which is summed up in a series of negatives is not the real thing. That is not scriptural sanctification which merely does not do this, does not go there, does not drink this, for we are solemnly warned against the false system which says: "Touch not, taste not, handle not." Our positive sanctification is found in Him, and proceeds from this alone.

The Lord's answer to Moses reveals the value, in His sight, of true intercession: "I will do this thing also that thou hast spoken: for thou hast found grace in My sight, and I know thee by name" (Exod. xxxiii. 17).

Show me Thyself!

Answered prayer beget prayer. The Lord's promise of His presence stimulates Moses to a further request: "And he said, I beseech Thee, show me Thy glory." What is the true burden of Moses' request? Together with Israel, he had seen the glory of the Lord manifest upon Sinai, and in the cloud. Moreover, he had entered into the presence of the Lord, and the Lord had talked with him face to face, and the similitude of the Lord he had seen. Yet, upon the gracious promise of the lord's presence with him, he is emboldened to press further and say: "Show me Thy glory."

The word "show" involves seeing. A similar request is found in Song of Sol. ii. 14, "Let me see Thy countenance". Moses said, "Let me see Thy glory". He evidently sought something fuller than he had experienced hitherto. He had been "shewed" the pattern of the tabernacle; this was something he had "seen", and in the Lord's answer to this request he uses the same word, saying, "My face shall not be seen" (Exod. xxxiii. 23). Earlier in Exodus we have means adopted "lest the people break through . . . . . to gaze". When Moses, Aaron, Nadab and Abihu, and the seventy elders ascended the Mount, we read that "they saw the God of Israel". In the passage we are considering Moses must have desired something more than had been vouchsafed on the earlier occasion. Moses said, "Let me see Thy glory". The Lord answered:--

> "Thou canst not see My face" (Exod. xxxiii. 20).
> "While My glory passeth by, I will put thee in a clift in the rock, and will cover thee with My hand, while I pass by: And I will take away Mine hand, and thou shalt see My back parts: but My face shall not be seen" (Exod. xxxiii. 22, 23).

Does it seem evident that in this passage "glory" and "face" are interchangeable in some way? Spurrell translates Exod.xxxiii. 18-23 as follows:--

> "Furthermore he said: O show me, I pray Thee, THINE OWN SELF! . . . . . then will I turn aside . . . . . this the hollow of My hand, and thou shalt behold Me retiring, but My face shall not be seen."

This was the fullest revelation that could then be given to any mortal man.

The prayer of Moses is answered for us all in II Cor. iv. 4 and 6:--

> "The light of the gospel of the glory of Christ, Who is the image of God . . . . . the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the FACE OF JESUS CHRIST."

That this is connected with Exod. xxxiii. and xxxiv. is seen by a reference to II Cor. iii. There we read of the passing glory of the old covenant, and the failing glory of the face of Moses (II Cor. iii. 7). All that the Lord could do for Moses was to let His goodness pass before him and proclaim the Name of the Lord before him. Moses needed protection from the fuller personal revelation of the Lord, and the clift in the rock and covering hand might well speak to Moses of his need of Christ. The glory of the law fades in the presence of "the glory that excelleth" (II Cor. iii. 10, 11). It was nevertheless a gracious revelation to Moses. The proclamation of the Name, its effect upon Moses, the altered covenant, and the summary of its terms given in Exod. xxxiv., must be reserved for our next paper.

The Epistle to the Hebrews.

#62. The birthright (xii. 15-25).
pp. 10 - 14

We now pass from that which is common to all sons to that which is peculiar to the firstborn, namely, the birthright. It will help us in the approach to this section to see the structure first:--

Heb. xii. 15-25.

A | 15. | a | Looking diligently.
b | Lest any man fall back.
B | 16, 17. The birthright bartered (Prototokia).
C | 18-21. Ye are not come. Six "ands". SINAI.
C | 22, 23. But ye are not come. Seven "ands". SION.
B | 23, 24. The birthright enjoyed (Prototokos).
A | 25. | a | See.
b | Lest ye refuse.

The section opens with a warning: "Looking diligently lest any man fail of the grace of God." It does not say "fall from the grace of God", but "fail of the grace of God". Hustereo, "to come short", occurs in Heb. iv. 1, and that passage partially explains what we are considering here: "Let us therefore fear, lest a promise being left us of entering into His rest, any of you should seem to come short of it." The context speaks of Israel's forty years' wandering in the wilderness, and their failure, though redeemed, to "go on unto perfection". We are not dealing with sonship, but with birthright; not salvation, but possession, not deliverance from Egypt, but entry into Canaan. The warning is threefold:--

1. Lest any fail (come short) of the grace of God.
2. Lest any root of bitterness spring up.
3. Lest there be any fornicator or profane person as Esau.

What is this root of bitterness? The apostle is quoting from Deut. xxix., and a reference to that passage will show his meaning clearly. Moses is addressing the people of Israel before his death, at the close of forty years' wandering in the wilderness, and in verse 18 says:--

> "Lest there be among you man, or woman, or family, or tribe, whose heart turneth away this day from the Lord our God, to go and serve the gods of these nations; lest there should be among you a root that beareth gall and wormwood."

Here is the "root of bitterness", a heart that turns away from God, or, in the language of Heb. iii. 12:--

> "Take heed, brethren, lest there be in any of you an evil heart of unbelief, in departing from the living God."

The words of Amos vi. 12 seem to have some reflection upon the "peaceable fruit of righteousness" and the "root of bitterness"; "Ye have turned judgment into gall, and the fruit of righteousness into hemlock." The effect of this root of bitterness is "trouble" and "defilement". A reference to John xviii. 28 will show the nature of the defilement—something that was profane, something from which a Jew would shrink.

We have next to learn in what sense Esau was a fornicator, and what bearing it has upon the teaching of this passage. There are two outstanding events in Esau's history that are recorded against him. One is the selling of his birthright for a mess of pottage; the other his marriage with women outside the covenant:--

> "And Rebekah said to Isaac, I am weary of my life because of the daughters of Heth: if Jacob take a wife of the daughters of Heth, such as these which are the daughters of the land, what good shall my life do me?" (Gen. xxvii. 46).

The word "fornication" is not to be taken literally, but is rather explained by the apostle to refer to "a profane person". Now this word profane (bebelos) is made up of the particle be, denoting privation, and belos, a threshold of a temple; hence one who was debarred from entry into a holy place. In the same way the Latin word profanus means one who stand pro fano—at a distance from a temple; hence, too, our English word "fane", a church. Esau had no appreciation of either his birthright or the holy nature of the covenant of God. He becomes a warning to the Hebrews who were being tempted to cast away the precious and enduring substance of their heavenly birthright for the mess of pottage of present carnal ease.

Verse 17 is a complete explanation of the difficult passage in Heb. vi. There the exhortation is to go on unto perfection. "But", says the apostle, "it is impossible for those who were once enlightened . . . . . if they shall fall away, to renew them again unto repentance". So, of Esau it is written: "For ye know how that afterward, when he would have inherited the blessing, he was rejected: for he found no place of repentance, though he sought it carefully with tears." Esau and his example stand out in the closing portion of Hebrews, as the children of Israel in the wilderness stand out in the opening section (chaps iii. and iv.). The warning is for the Hebrews who, like their fathers and like Esau, were in danger of drawing back, turning aside, losing the heavenly for the sake of the earthly. Heb. viii. 7 continues, "Then should no place have been sought for the second", showing that the two covenants are here in view. The apostle now brings before the mind the two mountains, Sinai and Sion, which are explained in Gal. iv. as representing the two covenants, Sinai standing for "Jerusalem that now is, and is in bondage with her children", and Sion for "Jerusalem that is above, which is free, and the mother of us all" (Gal. iv. 21-23).

We have in Heb. xii. 18-21 Moses, the mediator of the old covenant, and in Heb. xii. 22-24 Jesus, the Mediator of the new covenant, and it is under the new covenant, and not under the old, that the birthright can be enjoyed.

The figure called polysyndeton (or "many ands") is employed in the description of both covenants. Let us notice it:--

> "For ye are not come unto the mount that might be touched, AND that burned with fire, AND unto blackness, AND darkness, AND tempest, AND the sound of a trumpet, AND the voice of words."
> "But ye are come unto mount Sion, AND unto the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem, AND to myriads of angels, a full assembly, AND to a church of firstborn ones having been enrolled in heaven, AND to God the Judge of all, AND to the spirits of righteous ones having been perfected, AND to the Mediator of the new covenant—Jesus, AND to the blood of sprinkling that speaketh better things than that of Abel."

It will be seen that a due observation of these "ands" will help us to keep each feature in its place.

The A.V. leads one to read: "To the general assembly and church of the firstborn", as though it were one company. Paneguris, the word translated "general assembly", means an assembly met together for some festal or joyful occasion, and the construction of the passage necessitates the translation: "And to myriads, a festal assembly of angels."

We learn that myriads of angels were associated with Sinai and the giving of the law; "The chariots of the Lord are twenty thousand, even thousands of angels: the Lord is among them, as in Sinai, in the holy place" (Psa. lxviii. 17; see also Deut. xxxiii. 2). If these angels were at mount Sinai, they shall also be at Mount Sion, and there they will be a "festal assembly", for "marriage of the Lamb" will have come.

This church is the church of the firstborn, a special company, those who did not despise their birthright, nor barter it away for a morsel of meat. This same company is referred to as: "The spirits of just men mad perfect", each expression having been used in the context of chapters xi. or xii. In xii. 9 we read of "The Father of spirits"; in xi. "the righteous" are in view (x. 38; xi. 4, 7, 8), and in xi. 40 it is the perfecting: "God having provided some better thing for us, that they without us should not be perfected."

The close association of the "better thing", the "better country", and the "better resurrection", with this perfecting shows that here in Heb. xii. we are taken to that time when the church of the firstborn shall complete and enter into its inheritance. Here Abraham will set foot in that city for which he looked; Moses will receive that reward unto which he had respect; all who believed, yet died, not having received the promise, shall enter into their birthright. The mediator is not Moses, neither is the blood the blood of bulls and goats: "Jesus" is the Mediator of the new covenant, and this blood of sprinkling speaks better things than that of Abel.

This heavenly Sion is before the apostle right through the epistle. The "so great salvation" of ii. 3 is connected with the "world to come" of which the apostle spoke in ii. 5, and the "glory" unto which the Captain of salvation was leading (ii. 10). The words: "He is not ashamed to call them brethren" (ii. 11), the thought of the Captain being "perfected" through sufferings (ii. 10), find their echo in the words: "God is not ashamed to be called their God, for He hath prepared for them a city" (xi. 16), and the "perfecting" of the spirits of just men in xii. 23.

It was toward this goal that the apostle urged the Hebrew believers to "go on unto perfection". The "weight" which they were counseled to "lay aside" would include those things mentioned in vi. 2, a passage we have already seen in close connection with Esau and his vain seeking for repentance (vi. 4-6, xii. 16, 17).

The section closes with a word of warning, very similar to the warning that precedes chapter xi. In the structure in Volume XIX, page 77, we show it thus:--

C | x. 26-31. "He that despised Moses' law died without mercy, how much more . . . . ."
C | xii. 25. "They escaped not who refused Him that spake on earth, much more . . . . ."

Here we return to the teaching of chapter ii. In that passage the comparison is between the words spoken by angels and the words spoken by the Lord, and the question is put: "How shall we escape if we neglect so great a salvation?" In the other passage the angels are omitted, and the comparison is made between the seriousness of refusing him who spoke on earth, namely, Moses, the servant, and of refusing the "Son", Who has since spoken from heaven.

The epistle opens with the fact that God has spoken, and that He has spoken in two ways; once through His servants, and now in His Son. The Hebrews were in danger of minimizing the sin of refusing to hear what the Lord had said. The epistle as it continues leads away from the ministry of angels, the mediatorship of Moses, the captaincy of Joshua, the priesthood of Aaron, and the blood of bulls and goats, and focuses all its light upon the Lord Jesus Who sums up and outshines them all. He has now spoken from heaven. He is there at the right hand of God. There He ever liveth. There He sits "henceforth expecting".

There are "much mores" of mercy, but in Heb. x. 26-31 and xii. 25 contain "much mores" of warning and judgment.

There remains the concluding passage, Heb. xii. 25-xiii. This we hope to consider in our next paper, and our survey of this wonderful epistle then comes to a conclusion.

#63. Love and accepted service (xii. 25 - xiii. 6).
pp. 41 - 47

The epistle now draws to its conclusion. Much that these Hebrews had prized and valued as permanent has been shattered and is passing away. This element is introduced in the opening chapter. Speaking of the creation, the works of the Lord's hands, it says: "They shall perish, but Thou remainest" (Heb. i. 10, 11). This finds its echo in Heb. xii. 27: "The removing of things that are shaken, as of things that are made, that those things that are not shaken may remain."

All through the epistle there is the exchange of the passing for the permanent. The law concerning the Aaronic priesthood is disannulled and gives place to Christ, the Priest after the power of an endless life (Heb. vii. 16-18). The tabernacle made with hands gives place to the true tabernacle not made with hands, which the Lord pitched and not man (Heb. viii. 1, 2; ix. 24). The old covenant is not found faultless, and is ready to vanish away, giving place to the new covenant of which the Lord is the Mediator (Heb. viii. 7-13; ix. 15). The sacrifices and offerings of the old system pass away in the presence of that one sacrifice offered once for all (Heb. x. 1-14). The Hebrews were to learn that the Mosaic law was transient, and that the kingdom that remains and which cannot be moved is found alone under the sway of the true King-Priest, of the order of Melchisedec, Jesus Christ the Son of God.

Flowing from the contemplation of these solemn issues comes a series of practical exhortations. The first is: "Let us have grace, whereby we may serve God acceptably with reverence and godly fear; for our God is a consuming fire" (Heb. xii. 28, 29). The words: "for our God is a consuming fire" are taken from Deut. iv. 24, and come in a context of deepest solemnity. Chapter iv. opens with a warning concerning adding to or diminishing from the Word of God, and then refers to the evil of Baal-Peor. What took place there is described in Numb. xxv. The close relationship between idolatry and immoral practices will explain the sudden reference to marriage, &c., in Heb. xiii. In Deut. iv. 11, 12 also is the reference to the mountain that burned with fire, and "the voice of the words".

The Hebrews would be warned that the service of God was not something within the authority of man to arrange. God Himself had set aside the visible, external and typical; let them therefore remember that acceptable worship would now be concerned with the heavenly, the true and antitypical. The word "acceptably" is euarestos. It occurs as follows:--

> "With such sacrifices God is well pleased" (Heb. xiii. 16).
> "Working in you that which is well pleasing" (Heb. xiii. 21).

These references look back to the example of Enoch, and to the divine comment: "Without faith it is impossible to please Him."

In close and startling proximity to the need for acceptable service and the fact that God is a consuming fire come the words:--

> "Let brotherly love remain" (Heb. xiii. 1).
> "Be not forgetful to entertain strangers" (Heb. xiii. 2).
> "Remember them that are in bonds" (Heb. xiii. 3).
> "Marriage is honourable in all" (Heb. xiii. 4).

When we remember that the glorious doctrine of Ephesians is linked by the apostle with its practical outworking expressed in the relationship of husband and wife, parent and child, master and servant, and that similar warnings concerning immoral acts are included (see Eph. v. and vi.), we are the more prepared to learn that our whole life, with its complete circle of outgoings, is involved in this blessed and glorious service. Carnal ordinances, baptisms, fasts, feasts and ceremonies have given place to hearts sprinkled from an evil conscience, bodies washed with pure water, and heart service in every sphere of life.

Brotherly love and the entertainment of strangers are a part of acceptable service to God. This is seen by a further reference to xiii. 15, 16: "By Him therefore let us offer the sacrifice of praise to God continually, that is, the fruit of our lips giving thanks to His name." If we stop here, however, we are not rendering acceptable service. Brotherly love and hospitality must be added; therefore the passage continues: "But to do good and to have fellowship, forget not." The words "forget not" are the structural link with Heb. xiii. 1, 2:--

> "Be not forgetful" (verse 2).
> "For with SUCH sacrifices God is well pleased" (verse 16).

This close connection between God and the brotherhood in service has been expressed in Heb. x. 19-24:--

> "Let us draw near . . . . . Let us hold fast . . . . . Let us consider one another."

While we have no room for "humanism", we are also sure that a mere doctrinal exactness is not acceptable with God. The true service embraces the Lord and His people, and is sound both in doctrine and practice. So the third reference to "acceptable" stresses "doing":--

> "Now the God of peace (literally 'of the peace', something already mentioned and understood, Heb. vii. 2; xii. 11, 14), that brought again from the dead our Lord Jesus, that great Shepherd of the sheep, through the blood of the age-abiding covenant, make you perfect in every good work to do His will, doing in you that which is well pleasing in His sight, through Jesus Christ" (Heb. xiii. 20, 21).

Philippians, the parallel epistle of the mystery, has the same emphasis:--

> "Those things, which ye have both learned, and received, and heard, and seen in me, DO: and the God of peace be with you" (Phil. iv. 9).

Hospitality (philoxenia), "the entertainment of strangers" is urged upon believer more than once in the epistle. Rom. xii. 10 and 13 unite "brotherly love" with "hospitality" as does Heb. xiii. 1, 2. One of the qualifications of the bishop was that he should be "given to hospitality" (I Tim. iii. 2; Titus i. 8), and I Pet. iv. 9 says: "Use hospitality one to another, without grudging", for an element of unwillingness blights service to the Lord. The onus of hospitality in our present mode of life often falls upon the woman. Here is an act of acceptable service, as truly rendered to God as the prayer, praise and pulpit utterance of her husband. Indeed, Heb. xiii. 15, 16 shows that worship in the assembly may be vitiated by the lack of consideration for others afterwards. The times for true acceptable service are not only 11 and 6:30, but they may have as much to do with clean sheets as with robes of righteousness, and in dispensing the bread that perisheth as with the Word of truth.

We have had brotherly love and love of strangers (philadelphia and philoxemia). We are now reminded of love that goes out to those who, though not present with us, need our sympathy: "Remember them which are bound" (Heb. xiii. 3). God is ever "mindful" (same word) of man "and visitest him". We are neither to forget hospitality nor to omit sympathy, for the full quotation of verse 3 is much beyond mere remembrance.

> "Remember them which are bound, AS BOUND WITH THEM, and them which suffer adversity, AS BEING YOURSELVES ALSO IN THE BODY."

This sympathy has been spoken of earlier: "Ye became companions of them that were so used. For ye had compassions of me in my bonds" (Heb. x. 33, 34). The intimate relationship between believers has been expressed in I Cor. xii. 13, 14, 26: "Whether one member suffer, all the members suffer with it." So sympathy goes out to those in bonds, as bound with them, and to those in adversity, as being equally in the body. There is much to be said for the interpretation that makes the passage equivalent to, "For you also are still in the flesh, and liable at any moment to similar adversity".

The statement in verse 4 that marriage is honourable, and its most intimate relationships undefiled, seems to have been necessitated by the presence of those who, like the Essenes, taught that marriage should be shunned. The word "undefiled" in this particular is noteworthy, for it occurs in but one other place, namely, in Heb. vii. 26, where it speaks of our "undefiled" High Priest. This is a sufficient answer to those who would impose celibacy upon God's ministers, and is a word in season for us on whom the night of I Tim. iv. 1-3 is fast descending. The danger is all the other way. The decrying of marriage cannot but lead many into the paths of Baal-Peor, the doctrine of Balaam and the teaching of that woman Jezebel. George Bernard Shaw writes on page 666 of John O' London's Weekly under the heading The Right to Motherhood:--

> "No political constitution will ever succeed unless it includes the recognition of an absolute right to sexual experience, and is untainted by the Pauline or romantic view of such experience as simple in itself . . . . . legalizing polygamy, because there are more adult women in the country than men."

Over against this insidious propaganda that fills the columns of certain periodicals, we must place with the utmost resolution the words of Holy Scripture, remembering that Heb. xiii. 4 is not "Pauline", but "given by inspiration of God". And however the evils that are advocated may be glossed under the titles "Free love", "Liberty of the Sexes", &c., it still stands written: "Whoremongers and adulterers God will judge." We are still in sight of the heavenly city, the new Jerusalem, and there we have already seen is "God, the Judge of all". And of that city it is written:--

> "The fearful, and unwatching, and the abominable, and murderers, and whoremongers, and sorcerers, and idolators, and all liars, shall have their part in the lake which burneth with fire and brimstones: which is the second death . . . . . And there shall in no wise enter into it anything that defileth . . . . . but they which are written in the Lamb's book of life" (Rev. xxi. 8, 27).
>
> "The church of the Firstborn, whose names are written in heaven" (Heb. xii. 23).
> "Our God is a consuming fire" (Heb. xii. 29).

For certain purposes we speak of some sins as social sins. Some acts are crimes, some as civil offences, but for the believer (as in the case of David) murder and adultery become sins against heaven and against God (Psa. li. 4). This but anticipates the kingdom of God on earth, when God's will shall then be law as it is in heaven.

We drew attention just now to Deut. iv. with its twofold sin, and we have seen that marriage and its travesty are brought before us in Heb. xiii. Where is idolatry? Were the Hebrews warned against that sin? And were they in any danger of falling into it? The answer is that idolatry is mentioned, and the Hebrews were in danger of committing it.

> "Let your conversation be without covetousness, and be content with such things as ye have" (Heb. xiii. 5).

"Without covetousness" is aphilarguros = "not loving silver". We have, therefore, philadelphia, philoxenia, and philarguros in sequence, with true married love implied in verse 3. True service turns on love, and love out of place or spent on the wrong object is at the bottom of all evil. "The love of money (philarguria) is a root of all evil" (I Tim. vi. 10).

"Men shall be lovers of their own selves . . .	philautoi.
Covetous . . .	philarguroi.
Haters of good men . . .	aphilagathoi.
Lovers of pleasures . . .	philedonoi.
Rather than lovers of God" (II Tim. iii. 2-4). . .	philotheioi.

This catalogue of the evils that shall characterize the "last days" or the "perilous times" begins and ends with false love, and has at its centre lack of love for the good.

Now this covetousness under the form of pleonexia ("the wish to have more") is condemned as "idolatry" (Eph. v. 5; Col. iii. 5). The corrective for "the wish to have more" and for "covetousness" and "the love of money" is the conscious presence of the Lord:--

> "Be content with such things as ye have: for He hath said, I will never leave thee nor forsake thee. So that we may boldly say, The Lord is my helper, and I will not fear what man shall do unto me" (Heb. xiii. 5, 6).

At the risk of wearying the reader with the truth that "Philippians is parallel with Hebrews" we draw attention once more to the teaching of Phil. iv.:--

> "Let your moderation be known unto all men, The Lord is near . . . . . I have learned, in whatsoever state I am, to be content . . . . . Ye have well done, that ye did communicate with my affliction" (Phil. iv. 5, 11, 14).

Covetousness and contentment cannot thrive together. Phil. ii. 13, 14 makes the inworking of God parallel with Heb. xiii. 21, and absence of murmuring parallel with the contentment of Heb. xiii. 5.

Murmuring, fornication and idolatry are brought together in I Cor. x. 7-10, which together with "tempting" the Lord in the wilderness is similar teaching to that of Heb. iii. & iv. and also to the theme of the book. Further, I Cor. ix. 24, x. 1-14, Phil. iii., and Hebrews as a whole, all dealing with running for a prize, being perfected, becoming a "castaway" or disqualified by drawing back to "perdition" or ending in "destruction", with the citizenship, the heavenly city, and inter-related themes are a stronger witness to the peculiar teaching and purpose of these epistles than any criticism can overthrow.

We can spare no more space in this article to go further into the chapter, but before we close we will give the structure of the section so that what had been seen, and what is yet to be studied, may be kept in their right relationship.

#64. Without the camp (xiii. 7-17).
pp. 84 - 90

There are two passages of the O.T. in which appears the promise quoted in Heb. xiii. 5: "I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee." The first is Deut. xxxi. 6; the second, I Chron. xxviii. 20. In the former Moses is addressing the children of Israel, saying:--

> "The Lord thy God, He will go over before thee, and He will destroy these nations from before thee, and thou shalt possess them; and Joshua, he shall go over before thee, as the Lord hath said . . . . . Be strong and of good courage, fear not, nor be afraid of them; for the Lord thy God, He it is that doth go with thee; He will not fail thee, nor forsake thee" (Deut. xxxi. 3-6).

This is exactly in line with the theme of Hebrews—the pressing on into the land of promise, and triumph over opposing forces, encouraged by the presence of the Lord (Joshua here is a type of Christ, the true Captain of salvation).

The latter passage deals with the building of the temple by Solomon:--

> "And David said to Solomon his son, Be strong and of good courage, and do it; fear not, nor be dismayed; for the Lord God, even my God, will be with thee; He will not fail thee, nor forsake thee, until thou hast finished all the work for the service of the house of the Lord" (I Chron. xxviii. 20).

This typifies the house built by Christ, "the Son", as contrasted with that in which Moses was a servant (Heb. iii. 5, 6).

The reader may remember the line of the hymn: "I'll never, no never, no never, forsake." This iteration and reiteration of negatives may be employed merely to meet the demands of metre and rhythm, but even so, it is outdone by the passage, "I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee", which contains in the original, no less than five negatives. Literally rendered it reads:--

> "No, I will not leave thee; nor yet not by no means I forsake thee."

This is the ground of contentment, the antidote for covetousness, the secret of perseverance.

The great Leader (archegos, ii. 10; and xii. 2), the true Joshua, appointed others as subordinates, who also are called "leaders", for the words "them which have the rule over you" are literally "your leaders" in both verses 7 and 17 of chapter xiii. Let us observe what is said of the leaders:--

> "Remember them which are your leaders, who have spoken unto you the Word of God; whose faith follow, considering the end of their conversation, Jesus Christ the same yesterday, and to-day, and unto the ages."
>
> "Obey them that are your leaders, and submit yourselves: for they watch for your souls, as they that must give account; that they may do it with joy, and not with grief; for that is unprofitable for you."

Some very important characteristics of the true leader are given here:--

1. They speak the Word of God.
2. Their faith is such that it is worth imitating.
3. The issue of their conversation is Christ.
4. They watch on behalf of your souls.
5. They will have to render an account.

The reference to "imitating" makes one think of Phil. iii. 17-19: "Be joint-imitators of me, and mark those who walk . . . . . whose end is perdition."

A great variety of opinion has been expressed by writers on the meaning of the word "end" in Heb. xiii. 7. Some take it to refer to the martyrdom or death of these leaders. The word is ekbasis, and occurs in but one other place in the N.T., namely, I Cor. x. 13, where the A.V. translates it "a way to escape". Has it ever struck the reader that it is somewhat strange to read of "a way of escape" being provided, "that ye may be able to bear it"? If we escape the temptation, how do we bear it? A more accurate rendering and one which seems to give the apostle's meaning is, "God . . . . . will not suffer you to be tempted above that ye are able, but will the temptation make the issue, that ye may be able to bear it."

This verse in I Cor. x. is in a context exactly parallel with Heb. iii. and iv. Just as the trial of the Corinthians was bearable because they knew that God held the issues in His hand, because the trials had an object and a purpose of which they had been made aware, so in Heb. xiii. 7 we hear once again the words of Heb. xii. 11, "nevertheless afterward".

In Heb. xiii. 17 the Hebrew believers are exhorted to obey their leaders. Hegeomai, the word for a leader, means to think or esteem, then to lead and to rule. We read in Acts xv. 22 that Judas and Silas were "chief" men among the brethren. In Acts xiv. 12 Paul was reckoned the "chief" speaker. The apostle enjoined a ready obedience and submission to any who were scripturally qualified to lead, and this would be readily yielded by a believer to any who manifested the mark of the true pastor. "They watch for your souls, as they that must give account." The leader who answers to this description has no sinecure. He has a position of utmost responsibility; He is accountable to the Lord, and must continually act in the light of this: "that they may do it with joy, and not with grief: for that is unprofitable for you."

Some connect the words, "that they may do it", with the rendering of an account at the judgment seat of Christ. Others connect the words with the present watching. Possibly the double thought is intended, for whatever is true here has its counterpart when the account is given: "Look to yourselves, that ye destroy not the things which we have wrought, but that ye receive a full reward" (II John 8, R.V.). This reference in II John 8 is followed by a warning concerning the doctrine of Christ.

In Heb. xiii. 8, immediately following the reference to the leaders, and immediately before the warning not to be carried away with divers and strange doctrines, comes the glorious passage: "Jesus Christ the same yesterday, and to-day, and unto the ages." The same truth lies at the threshold of the epistle: "They shall perish: but Thou remainest . . . . . They shall be changed, but Thou art the same" (Heb. i. 11, 12). Through all the changes in this creation, both past and future, the Lord remains unchanged; throughout all changes in the dealings of God with men, the decaying and waning of the old covenant, as well as of the old creation, there is One Who remains the same. This is the bed-rock of our faith. This was the issue of the conversation of the leaders whose faith was to be followed. This was the corrective against the divers and strange doctrines which they were to avoid.

These words are parallel with the titles "Alpha and Omega", "Which was and which is, and which is to come". In the "yesterday" we know that Abraham saw the day of Christ, that Moses esteemed the reproach of Christ greater riches than the treasures of Egypt: in the "to-day" He is still the same. He is still the one great Counter-attraction that more than compensates for all reproach or loss, and this will remain unalterably true throughout the ages.

The divers and strange doctrines that were likely to "carry these believers about" as by adverse currents, were evidently closely connected with "meats", and these can but refer to all those things that had been left behind:--

> "Which was a figure for the time then present, in which were offered both gifts and sacrifices, that could not make him that did the service perfect, as pertaining to the conscience: which stood only in meats and drinks, and divers baptisms, and carnal ordinances, imposed on them until the time of reformation" (Heb. ix. 9, 10).

The glorious standing given to the believer in Christ by the gospel has no room for the shadowy sanctity pertaining to "meats":--

> "But meat commendeth us not to God; for neither, if we eat, are we the better; neither, if we eat not, are we the worse" (I Cor. viii. 8).

These things of the past are on the same level as circumcision:--

> "Circumcision is nothing, and uncircumcision is nothing, but the keeping of the commandments of God" (I Cor. vii. 19).
>
> "For the kingdom of God is not meat and drink; but righteousness and peace and joy in the Holy Ghost. For he that in these things serveth Christ is acceptable to God, and approved of men" (Rom. xiv. 17, 18).

We saw in a preceding article that the thought of "acceptable service" runs through the closing chapter of Hebrews, and his passage from Romans follows the same theme.

To us, at the present time, this scruple regarding meats seems to have no parallel. We are not concerned about food having been offered to idols, neither are we under any law that divides meats into clean and unclean. At the same time it will not take us long to discover that a great deal passes as "holiness" and "privilege" which rests, not upon Christ, but upon accessories that have their basis in the flesh. Let us have none of them. All distinctions have been buried in the tomb, and in the new creation they cannot exist:--

> "We have an altar, whereof they have no right to eat which serve the tabernacle. For the bodies of those beasts, whose blood is brought into the sanctuary by the high priest for sin, are burned without the camp. Wherefore Jesus also, that He might sanctify the people with His own blood, suffered without the gate. Let us go forth therefore unto Him without the camp, bearing His reproach, for here have we no continuing city, but we seek one to come" (Heb. xiii. 10-14).

We may be assisted in the understanding of this passage by the following subdivision:--

A1 | Grace not meats. We have an altar.
B1 | Bodies . . . . . blood . . . . . without the camp.
A2 | Jesus, that He might sanctify.
B2 | His own blood, suffered without the gate.
A3 | Let us go forth unto Him.
B3 | Without the camp.
A4 | His reproach bearing.
B4 | We have no continuing city.

We have here two alternating themes, one dealing with sanctification, the other pointing outside the camp or gate. Sanctification is dealt as something beyond the ceremonial and typical separation involved in "meats": it has to do with "grace" and an altar totally distinct from Israel after the flesh. Some have taught that the words, "we have an altar", refer to the Lord's Table and the Lord's Supper, a doctrine we do not think there is any need to use space in confuting. Others teach that our altar is the cross. The cross throughout the N.T. is spoken of as a symbol of shame, and in Gal. iii. 13 the death on the tree is a death under the curse of the law. Matt. xxiii. 19 declares that the altar is greater than the gift upon it, and that the altar sanctifies the gift. We never read that the cross was greater than the glorious offering of Christ, neither is there the remotest suggestion that the cross sanctified the sacrifice of Christ. Full well we know the reverse is the case.

When we read the O.T. directions concerning the altar and its treatment, we are not left in doubt as to the altar that "we have". The altar built of stone had to be left untouched by the tool of man, for that would pollute it (Exod. xx. 25). The altar was cleansed, atoned for, anointed and sanctified, and it was most holy (Exod. xxix. 36, 37). There is no difficulty to faith in believing both that the Lord, in the offering of that one Sacrifice, became both the redeeming Passover Lamb, the whole Burnt Offering for acceptance, and the Sin Offering under the curse, and, not only so, but that He, at once the Sacrifice and Sin Bearer, was at the same time High Priest, Altar and Mercy Seat, combining the Sin Offering, burnt to ashes without the camp, with the blood of atonement taken within the veil.

The apostle here in Heb. xiii. 11 refers to the offering on the day of atonement, which also figures in Heb. ix., and he quotes Lev. xvi. 27. The actual law upon which the apostle builds his argument is expressed in Lev. vi. 30: "And no sin offering, whereof any of the blood is brought into the tabernacle of the congregation to reconcile withal the holy place, shall be eaten: it shall be burnt with fire."

The position "without the camp" and "without the gate" puts an end to Judaism and the old covenant. Those who have "boldness to enter into the holiest by the blood of Jesus" (Heb. x. 19) will also have grace given to go with Him without the camp, leaving behind the types and shadows that could never perfect nor touch the conscience.

There is a word of warning here that it may not be unprofitable to give and to heed. Heb. xiii. 13 does not say: "Let us go forth without the camp." There are many who, by temperament, are "separatists". Three clauses need to be added to the above quotation to make it true:--

1. The addition of "therefore".
2. The placing of "unto Him" before "without the camp".
3. The closing phrase, "bearing His reproach".

"Therefore."—Our removal from "the camp" of organized and carnal must be based upon the work of Christ, and not upon our own inclinations. Further, we go out "unto Him"; if He is rejected and outside the camp, then we go there too, but in itself, the position of being "outside" has no attractions for us; we go there because it is "unto Him". Then, the added clause, "bearing His reproach", teaches us that we are not dealing with words, but realities, and Heb. xi. 24-27 reveals the seriousness of the step. The experiences of Heb. x. 32-35 are the experiences of His "reproach" and are not to be entered upon lightly.

The statement in verse 14: "For here we have no continuing city, but we seek one to come" turns us back to Heb. xi. 8-16, where Abraham and his seed, though heirs of God, voluntarily became strangers and pilgrims on the earth, declaring plainly by their withdrawal outside the camp, "that they seek a country, wherefore God hath prepared for them a city".

This is true separation and sanctity, and is set over against the "meats and drinks, and divers baptisms, and carnal ordinances" that obtained during the time of type and shadow.

"Christ being come" (Heb. ix. 11) has made the difference. Christ has ascended to the right hand of God, Christ suffered without the gate. These facts give us our twofold position: "Let us draw near!" "Let us go forth!" Hebrews recognizes no middle course.

"Outside the camp" and "within the veil" find their equivalent in the prison epistles where we are seated together in the heavenlies, we find our citizenship in heaven, counting all things but loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ, having no room for the elements of the world, or for its attempts at sanctity. We, too, shall find that as we set our mind on things above, where Christ is sitteth at the right hand of God, there will be a corresponding mortifying of the members that are on the earth.

#65. The Great Shepherd, and the adjusting of the believer (xiii. 18-25).
pp. 123 - 128

We now consider the closing portion of this wonderful epistle: "Pray for us; for we trust we have a good conscience, in all things willing to live honestly. But I beseech you the rather to do this, that I may be restored to you the sooner." Paul continually expressed a desire for the prayers of the saints on this behalf. The following may be taken as samples:--

> "Ye also helping together by prayer" (II Cor. i. 11).
> "Praying . . . . . for all saints and for me" (Eph. vi. 18, 19).
> "Finally, brethren, pray for us" (II Thess. iii. 1).

His reference to a "good conscience" is also quite characteristic, and especially when he has been touching upon the passing of the faith of his fathers:--

> "Men and brethren, I have lived in all good conscience before God until this day" (Acts xxiii. 1).
> "But this I confess unto thee, that after the way which they call heresy, so worship I the God of my fathers . . . . . I exercise myself, to have a conscience void of offence toward God, and toward men" (Acts xxiv. 14-16).

Paul has much to say concerning the conscience, but this is better dealt with as a separate subject.

His request that these Hebrews should pray for him that he might be restored the sooner, and the reference to Timothy being "set at liberty", or "dismissed", show that those to whom the epistle was written knew who the writer was and the circumstances in which he was then placed. We do not, and it is evident that such knowledge is unnecessary for the understanding of the epistle.

The writer of the epistle calls it a "word of exhortation" and "a letter in few words". Whether the word apoluo should be interpreted as "set at liberty", as from prison, or "dismissed" in the sense of being sent on a journey, we cannot decide. The salutation from those of Italy (verse 24) would express the desire for unity between those who were Jews by nature and those who were Gentiles, but whether the writer was actually in Italy at the time of writing cannot be decided from these words.

We now give out attention, in closing, to the prayer of the apostle for the Hebrews to whom he had written this word of exhortation.

> "Now the God of peace, that brought again from the dead our Lord Jesus, that great Shepherd of the sheep, through the blood of the aionian covenant, make you perfect in every good work to do His will, working in you that which is well pleasing in His sight, through Jesus Christ: to Whom be glory unto the ages of the ages. Amen" (Heb. xiii. 20, 21).

The apostle often speaks of the God of peace toward the close of an epistle:--

> "Now the God of peace be with you all. Amen" (Rom. xv. 33).
> "And the God of peace shall bruise Satan under your feet shortly" (Rom. xvi. 20).
> "Be perfect, be of good comfort, be of one mind, live in peace; and the God of love and of peace shall be with you" (II Cor. xiii. 11).
> "Those things, which ye have both learned, and received, and heard, and seen in me, do: and the God of peace shall be with you" (Phil. iv. 9).
> "And the very God of peace sanctify you wholly" (I Thess. v. 23).
> "Now the Lord of peace Himself, give you peace always, by all means" (II Thess. iii. 16).

It was the lot of the apostle Paul continually to stir up strife. He likens his whole life's ministry to a conflict, yet he ever desired, and hoped for peace.

The emphasis here in Heb. xiii. 20 is upon the resurrection, "that brought again from the dead our Lord Jesus". This is the only place in the epistle where the resurrection of Christ is specifically mentioned. In Romans the resurrection is prominent, and this is so in I & II Corinthians, Ephesians and Colossians, but in Hebrews the emphasis is upon the ascension; the seated Priest Who has passed through the heavens to the right hand of God. That there should be no occasion to say that the epistle to the Hebrews takes no cognizance of the resurrection, however, this passage stands written. That resurrection is acknowledged and essential to the doctrine of the epistle, a reference to Heb. vii. 16, 23, 24 and 28 will show, and its presence in the great examples of faith (xi. 19, 22 and 35) confirms its place in the scheme of the epistle.

Christ is here called "that great Shepherd of the sheep". This, it is suggested, is an allusion to Moses: "Then He remembered the days of old, Moses, and his people, saying, Where is he that brought them up out of the sea with the shepherd of his flock?" (Isa. lxiii. 11). Moses was the shepherd of the sheep, Christ the great Shepherd of the sheep. Moses was brought up out of the sea, Christ was brought up again from the dead.

As the Shepherd, Christ is presented to us in a threefold capacity in the N.T. As the good Shepherd He gives His life for the sheep (John x. 11). [The word "life" being strictly "soul" has reference to the shedding of blood]. As the great Shepherd He is seen as the One brought again from the dead (Heb. xiii. 20). As the chief Shepherd He is yet to appear and give a crown of glory to the faithful under-shepherds left in charge of the flock of God (I Pet. v. 2, 4). These three titles correspond with the three "appearings" of Heb. ix. 23-28, the order of the first two being changed.

The word "great" of Heb. xiii. 20 may read with the clause, "through the blood of the aionian covenant", or it may indicate that Christ was raised from the dead because the blood of the covenant had been shed and all things pertaining to sin and salvation had been dealt with.

"Make you perfect" (katarizo) has in it the idea of adjusting to new circumstances. For example, it is used for "mending" nets (Matt. iv. 21). It is rendered, "perfectly joined together", in connection with "divisions", in I Cor. i. 10, Gal. vi. 1 renders it "restore" where a fall or rupture had occurred. Katartismos is the word used in Eph. iv. 12 to explain the work of the new ministry given after the great change of Acts xxviii. This is the intention in Heb. xi. 3, where the "ages were adjusted", and in Heb. x. 5, "the body prepared" for the Lord when the time came for the setting aside of sacrifices and offerings. To offer acceptable service these Hebrew believers were under the necessity of being "fitted", "mended", "restored", or "adjusted" to the new dispensation and to the terms of the new covenant. This is also true of ourselves. If we are members of the one body, blessed under the terms of the mystery, we must be adjusted or fitted to our new calling before we shall be acceptable. Hence the prayer of Eph. i. and Col. i. with this in view. Hence, also, the special ministry of Eph. iv.

This acceptable service is summed up in the words of Heb. xiii. 21, "to do His will", and this is true for every dispensation and phase of the divine plan. It is true of the kingdom of heaven (Matt. vi. 10), as well as of the mystery (Eph. i. 9). It is the goal of all prayer (Col. i. 9, iv. 12). The will of God comprises the whole work for which Christ came, lived and died (Heb. x. 7, 9, 10). The will of God sums up all service (Heb. x. 36; xiii. 21).

All is "through Christ, to Whom be glory unto the ages of the ages, Amen". Here is the purging of the conscience from dead works in order that service to the living God may begin (Heb. ix. 14). This alone makes service acceptable. Throughout the epistle there has been one movement, away from all else to Christ, and it will refresh us to go over the epistle with this in mind before we finish.

Shadow gives place to substance, the transient to the abiding, the old to the new, and, throughout, "Christ is all".

Throughout this series we have given structures in fairly full detail. We now give, in barest outline, the structure of the epistle as a whole, the details of which can be placed together by the student from the articles dealing with the passages themselves:--

The dispensational place of John's Gospel.

#1. pp. 17 - 22

Many phases of scriptural truth have not found a place in these pages simply because The Berean Expositor was published to make known the dispensation of the mystery committed to the apostle Paul, and its limited size allowed no margin for outside subjects. For some time, however, it has been clear to us that we have a responsibility to all believers who are called during this present dispensation, and while we do not entertain the hope that our circulation will be increased by this series, we do hope that our readers will be thereby enabled to minister more intelligently and sympathetically to that great company who give no evidence that they are members of the body of Christ.

Believer's to-day seem to fall into three groups:--

1. Those who believe and stand by all the revelation contained in the prison epistles.
2. Those who have realized the teaching of the apostle Paul up to the central theme of Romans.
3. Those who, while most certainly believing on the Lord Jesus Christ unto eternal life, give no evidence that the great doctrines associated with the apostle Paul have much place in their apprehension.

Such as are included in the second group are often in a preparatory state, and pass on into the fuller light of the mystery as the truth becomes known to them.

Rom. vi. lays the great foundation upon which the mystery is built. It reveals the identification of the believer with Christ—the truth that we have been crucified with Christ, that we have died with Him, been buried, quickened and raised with Him. This great doctrinal foundation is necessary for the added, dispensational feature of Eph. ii.—"seated with Him".

In the present series, we have not the second but the third group before us, the widest circle of believers. What is their calling? What is their place in the present dispensation? What is the word for them? Before seeking a scriptural answer to these questions, it will be necessary to consider briefly to these objections and suggestions. In view of past misunderstanding, we also wish to make it plain in dealing with these that no individual writer is in mind.

What is the exact position of the great company of believers who are called during the dispensation of the mystery, and yet are not of it? Are they enjoying the blessings of the Abrahamic covenant? Are they in the same position and calling as the Pentecostal church? Do they come under the new covenant?

1. Are believers to-day enjoying the blessings of the Abrahamic covenant?

We do not believe that the covenant with Abraham is in force to-day, for as a covenant is dependent upon the keeping of its terms, and as this covenant has special reference to a land and a nation, both of which have been for the time being virtually set aside, the operation of the covenant is impossible, except in some spiritualized sense.

The terms of the covenant of God with Abraham are as follows:--

> "Get thee out of thy country, and from thy kindred, and from thy father's house, unto a land that I will show thee: And I will make of thee a great nation, and I will bless thee, and make thy name great; and thou shalt be a blessing: and I will bless them that bless thee, and curse him that curseth thee: and in thee shall all families of the earth be blessed" (Gen. xii. 1-3).

Here we have a land and a nation vitally connected with the outflow of blessing to other nations.

To Isaac this covenant was repeated (Gen. xxvi. 3), as it was subsequently to Jacob (Gen. xxviii. 3, 4). In each case the land, as well as the seed, form an integral part of it.

In the fullness of time Christ is born, and Matthew writes his Gospel showing that the Christ is the Son of David and of Abraham (Matt. i. 1). Zacharias, filled with Holy Spirit, refers to the fulfillment of the covenant made with Abraham (Luke i. 68-79), and Peter, upon the renewed calling of Israel to repentance, makes it very plain that the Gentiles can only enjoy the blessings of the Abrahamic covenant upon the fulfillment of its conditions:--

> "Ye are the children of the prophets, and of the covenant which God made with our fathers, saying unto Abraham, And in thy seed shall all the kindreds of the earth be blessed. Unto you first God, having raised up His Son Jesus, sent Him to bless you, in turning away every one of you from his iniquities' (Acts iii. 25, 26).

The epistle to the Galatians makes it plain that justification by faith, and sonship, belong to the believing Gentile as to the believing Jew, but it also most emphatically repeats the sentiment of Acts iii. 25, 26:--

> "Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law . . . . . that the blessing of Abraham might come on the Gentiles through Jesus Christ" (Gal. iii. 13, 14).

Israel was the appointed channel through whom would flow the blessing of Abraham to all nations. While they remained a nation in their land, even though they were not all truly converted, the Gentiles were able to partake of the root and fatness of the olive tree (Rom. xi.), but when Israel were set aside in blindness and unbelief (Acts xxviii. 22-31), and subsequently scattered among all nations and temporarily dispossessed of their land, it became obvious that the full enjoyment of the Abrahamic blessing must be postponed until the day when "all Israel" shall be saved, their "receiving back" bringing with it "life" (Rom. xi. 15-26).

2. Are believers to-day enjoying the blessings of Pentecost and the conditions and status of I Cor. xii.?

In Gal. iii. 14 "the promise of the Spirit" is directly connected with the coming of the blessing of Abraham upon the Gentiles, and while Israel remained a nation in their own land, these spiritual gifts were enjoyed and partaken of by the Gentile churches. We are not left in doubt, however, as to the purpose of God in thus allowing the Gentiles to anticipate that day which could only come with Israel's conversion.

> "In the law it is written, With men of other tongues and other lips will I speak unto this people; and yet for all that will they not hear me, saith the Lord" (I Cor. xiv. 21).

The Gentile believers were reminded that they had been grafted into the stock of the true olive, contrary to nature, with the express purpose of "provoking emulation" and "provoking to jealousy" the people of Israel. Israel, however, were not provoked to emulation. Isa. vi. 10, quoted by the apostle in Acts xxviii., showed that the olive tree of Israel was cut down. It is true that Isa. vi. 13 prophesies that, though cut down, it will yet sprout again; that in God's good time "all Israel" shall be saved, but this does not take place until "the fullness of the Gentiles" has come in. (The words, "Cast their leaves" in Isa. vi. 13 should be rendered, "are felled").

Rom. xi. makes it plain that in the first instance the olive tree was entirely Israelitish. At the time of writing that epistle "some" only of the natural branches had been broken off, but during the present time there does not exist the counterpart of this olive tree, that is, an Israelitish calling with a smaller Gentile addition. To-day Israel does not count. Only a false spirituality can attempt to prove that the olive tree now stands. During this present time Gentiles are blessed without association with Israel. Should anyone interpose the suggestion that Gentile believers are still blessed by the Scriptures which came through Israel, are still saved by that salvation which is "of the Jews", are still accepted in Him Who is of the seed of David, and therefore are still partaking of the root and fatness of the olive tree, we would reply that this, if allowed, proves too much, for the epistles of the mystery, though distinct and peculiar, are necessarily linked with all that has gone before, and so the mystery itself could be "proved" to be a continuation of Rom. xi., as some actually interpret Eph. ii. 19.

It throws light upon Rom. xi. and the dispensational position of the Gentile during the Acts period, to remember that Paul is not employing fiction when he speaks of the unusual action of grafting a wild branch upon a cultivated stock, for at the time the apostle was writing it was a process actually used to "provoke" the flagging fruitfulness of an aged olive tree. The enjoyment by the Gentiles of spiritual gifts, "the fatness of the olive tree", during this time was not because the blessing that will result from the promise to Abraham was then actually flowing out to all nations, but because the Gentiles were being used to "provoke to jealousy and emulation" the fast-failing olive tree of Israel. But Israel did not respond, they did not repent, and in due course were set aside.

If the position of the believing Gentiles is truly described as a graft into the olive tree, it follows that when at Acts xxviii. the tree was cut down, a very drastic change must have come over the world of Gentile believers. Pentecostal conditions will be resumed only when the time for Israel's restoration draws near, and in consequence the present interval is marked by other characteristics.

This brief note is, of course, entirely inadequate as an examination of this second position, but we write for those who are fully acquainted with the whole argument. The bearing of I Cor. xii. also has been discussed in these pages, and it is obvious to all who have eyes to see and who refuse to accept substitutes for realities that the conditions of I Cor. xii. do not exist to-day.

3. Are believers to-day blessed under the terms of the new covenant?

Equally with the covenant made with Abraham, this covenant, while finding in Christ the complete ratification of all its terms, nevertheless necessitates a restored Israel as a nation before the Lord. This can be seen by reading the original terms of the new covenant given in Jer. xxxi. 27-49.

The new covenant was in operation during the Acts, as II Cor. iii. and iv. indicate, but, like the covenant with Abraham, its full outflow awaits the day when all Israel shall be saved.

4. Are believers in Christ, who do not believe the revelation of the mystery, necessarily "Christendom"?

This is difficult to answer, for "Christendom" is not a scriptural name, and consequently we can never be sure that we use it exactly as another may intend. Speaking broadly, Christendom stands for that great mass of professing Christians, largely leavened with false doctrine and finally developing into the apostacy, that precedes the end. Accepting this definition we are compelled to say that it would be most uncharitable as well as untrue unceremoniously to sweep aside all those men of God who fail to see the truth of the mystery, and who indeed are sometimes antagonistic to it. Just as it was not necessarily true during the Acts that if Paul was right Peter was wrong, so it does not follow that every believer to-day should be a believer of the truth of the mystery—he cannot be unless chosen of the Lord, and his calling and election may place him in an entirely different company. This, of course, remains to be proved.

5. Are all believers to-day members of the church which is His body, whether they know it or not?

To refute this position we should have to reprint the bulk of the last twenty years' witness concerning the dispensation of the mystery. We cannot find justification for assuming that any believer is a member of the body of Christ unless he believes the Word of God given to make that blessed position known. As that word is found in the testimony of the Lord's prisoner, and is the revelation of a mystery, membership of that body will be manifested by belief of the truth revealed concerning it, as surely as salvation is manifested by the belief of the gospel.

Without, therefore, pretending to have given anything more than a cursory glance at these varied views, we proceed to the examination of Scripture to discover whether there has been written a book, an epistle, or section of the New Testament that embraces all the peculiar conditions that characterize the outer circle of faith among Gentiles to-day. This will necessarily be the subject of another article.

#2. The ministry for the many. An eightfold proof.
pp. 58 - 64

We concluded our opening article with the statement that we should now proceed to the examination of Scripture to discover whether there has been written a book, epistle, or a section of the New Testament that embraces all the peculiar conditions that characterize the outer circle of faith among the Gentiles to-day. What are these peculiar conditions?

1. During the earthly ministry of the Lord Jesus, He limited Himself to the lost sheep of the house of Israel, and at the close commanded His disciples to go into all the world. One of the conditions that belong to the present enquiry is that the message shall be pre-eminently world-wide.

2. It is evident to the most casual reader that the bulk of the Bible was written for Jews. The present condition, however, demands a book that shall give evidence that non-Jewish readers are in view.

3. The Gospel of Matthew does not speak of the rejection of Christ by Israel until chapter xii.; Paul's earlier epistles give considerable prominence to Israel, whilst Peter at Pentecost calls upon the nation to repent and be saved. The book we seek should take it for granted, or should early state that Christ was rejected by Israel, and that its message is addressed to those who have believed after that rejection has reached its climax.

4. The Lord's Supper is directly connected with "the new covenant" (Matt. xxvi. 28; I Cor. xi. 25), so that the message we seek will of necessity omit this feast of remembrance, seeing that its terms cannot be put into operation until Israel as a nation are restored (Jer. xxxi.).

5. The present position of the Lord Jesus is that of ascension, ascribed to Him in the prison epistles, and we must find our message in a book giving due prominence to this exalted position.

6. The epistles of the mystery do not speak of Christ as the Son of Abraham, or the Son of man, but go back behind all these to the wondrous title of the Image of the invisible God, Who is, moreover, the Creator of all things visible and invisible. This revelation of His Person will colour the message that is addressed to the outer circle to-day.

7. We shall find in that message the great desire expressed by the Lord, that, though He was rejected by His own, the world might yet believe and know that He was the Sent One of God.

8. There will be an indication that the gift of "miracles" possessed by the church, as at Corinth, no longer obtains.

By common consent the Gospel according to John was written when Paul's ministry was finished, and corresponds fully to the conditions suggested above, as well as to many more to be entered into later. Let us for the present, however, confine ourselves to noticing how John's Gospel deals with these peculiar conditions.

1. The world.

"The world was made by Him" (John i. 10).
"The Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world" (John i. 29).
"For God so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son" (John iii. 16).
"The Christ, the Saviour of the world" (John iv. 42).
"Giveth life unto the world" (John vi. 33).
"I am the light of the world" (John ix. 5).

These and many more come immediately to the mind, and it is common knowledge with students of the Word that John's Gospel is pre-eminently the presentation of Christ to the world.

Kosmos (world) occurs in Matthew's Gospel nine times, in Mark three times, in Luke three times, but in John it occurs about seventy-nine times. Matthew's Gospel tells us concerning the Lord that He was called "Jesus, for He shall save His people from their sins" (Matt. i. 21). Luke's Gospel records the Lord's instructions to His disciples that "remission of sins should be preached in His Name among all nations beginning at Jerusalem" (Luke xxiv. 47). John, however, speaks of, "sin" not "sins", "the sin of the world" and "the sins of His people".

The reader will remember the wide scope in the standpoint of the first Epistle of John: "He is the propitiation for our sins; and not for ours only, but also for the whole world" (I John ii. 2). John's Epistles account for another twenty-one occurrences of kosmos, so that out of a total of one hundred and eighty-eight occurrences in the whole N.T., John's Gospels and Epistles use one hundred of them. If we seek for a message that has the world in view, can we find one more suitable than this Gospel according to John?

2. Not written for Jews.

Our next condition was that the matter should be tested not only by the positive address to the world, but by parallel internal evidence that Jews were definitely not in the writer's mind. Every Jew knew the purpose of the six water pots at the wedding feast of Cana, but John informs us that they were "after the manner of the Jews" (John ii. 6). Every Jew knew the history and import of the Passover, but John writes: "The Jews' Passover was at hand"; "the Passover, a feast of the Jews, was nigh"; "the Jews' Passover was nigh at hand" (John ii. 13, vi. 4, xi. 55). Added to these are the further informative statements: "There was a feast of the Jews" (v. 1), "the Jews' feast of tabernacles" (vii. 2). Again, note John x. 22: "It was at Jerusalem the feast of the dedication and it was winter", which is as though we should write, "It was Christmas day in London and it was winter".

Further, what Jewish reader of John's Gospel, though he lived at the ends of the earth, would need the explanation given in iv. 9: "for the Jews have no dealings with the Samaritans"? Would a Jewish reader need the added interpretation given to the name of the pool of Siloam—"which is by interpretation, Sent" (John ix. 7)? Would they not know, too, the meaning of the name Cephas, "stone"? (John i. 42).

We have abundant evidence therefore that John wrote his Gospel with the world of non-Jewish readers specially in view.

3. The rejection.

The message that fits the wider circle of believers during the present time must recognize the fact that the Lord was rejected by His own people. This we find at the very forefront of the Gospel by John: "He came unto His own, and His own received Him not, but as many as received Him . . . . ." (John i. 11, 12). Here it is evident that the "many" who received Him are a different company from "His own" who received Him not. Matthew's Gospel waits until the twelfth chapter before rejection is reached, but John opens with it. There is a foreshadowing of Acts xxviii. at the close of John ix: "For judgment I am come into this world, that they which see not might see, and that they which see might be made blind." The critical passage (Isa. vi. 10) is quoted immediately after the warning to walk while the light lasts, lest darkness come upon them, and towards the close of the passage come the solemn words: "He that rejecteth Me, and receiveth not My words, hath One that judgeth him" (John xii. 48).

It will be remembered that where Matthew quotes Isa. vi. 10, we find the parables of the kingdom of heaven, which, while revealing the interval of failure and corruption, nevertheless look forward to the day when, under the new covenant, the word of the kingdom shall be received in an honest and good heart (Jer. xxxi. 27-33). The quotation of Isa. vi. 10 in John xii. is not accompanied by the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven, but focuses attention upon the rejection of the Lord by His own people.

4. The Lord's Supper.

It is not our purpose to discuss the vital association of the Lord's Supper with the new covenant—that can be seen both in Matt. xxvi. and I Cor. xi. The terms and parties of the covenant are distinctly set out in Jer. xxxi. and repeated in Heb. viii. It is not a matter for discussion, but of believing what God has said. The Gospel according to John makes no mention of the Lord's Supper, and the omission is as eloquent as the non-Jewish and world-wide evidences already brought forward. During the Acts period Gentile churches observed this feast of remembrance, but with the setting aside of the covenant people, the covenant feast was discontinued, and John, who was present and knew all about it, was as inspired to omit it as Matthew, Mark and Luke were inspired to include it.

5. The ascended Lord.

Paul's prison ministry is impossible apart from the ascension "far above all". Matthew's record ends without reference to the ascension; Mark and Luke close their accounts with it, but John speaks of it as early as the third chapter: "And no man hath ascended up to heaven, but He that came down from heaven, even the Son of man which is in heaven" (John iii. 13). Again, in John vi., the Jews objected to the Lord's statement that He was the true bread that came down from heaven, saying: "Is not this Jesus, the son of Joseph, whose father and mother we know? How is it then that He saith, I came down from heaven?" (John vi. 42). Also, when the disciples were offended with His teaching He said: "What and if ye shall see the Son of man ascend up where He was before?" (John vi. 62). It is John alone who tells us the Lord's first message after His resurrection, and that He ascended to the Father on that first day of the week, forty days before the visible ascension from the Mount of Olives. "Touch Me not; for I am not yet ascended to My Father; but go to My brethren, and say unto them, I ascend unto My Father and your Father; and to My God and your God" (John xx. 17).

The reader should add to the above the passages which use the phrase: "Because I go unto the Father", and similar expressions.

6. "The image of the invisible God . . . . . the Creator."

John's Gospel is distinguished from the synoptics by the opening words:--

> "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God . . . . . All things were made by Him . . . . . No man hath seen God at any time, the only begotten Son, Which is in the bosom of the Father, He hath declared Him" (John i. 1-18).
>
> "Before Abraham was, I am" (John viii. 58).

Here also, in close harmony with the standpoint of the dispensation of the mystery, are the wondrous words of John xvii. 24:--

> "Father, I will that they also, whom Thou hast given Me, be with Me where I am; that they may behold My glory, which Thou hast given Me; for Thou lovedst Me before the foundation of the world."

True, beholding this glory, and being manifested with Him in glory, having this body of humiliation fashioned like unto the body of His glory (Col. iii. 4 and Phil. iii. 21) are very different; yet if there is a circle of believers, called into blessing during this parenthetical period, but not constituting the body, it is appropriate that their blessings should in some way be associated with the ascended Christ, and the glory that was His before the world was. The distinction to be observed between the glory of John xvii. 24 and that of the epistles of the mystery must be considered in some future article, for it is too great a subject for the present survey.

7. The prayer that the world may know.

If the standpoint of John's Gospel be as we have indicated, we can understand the burden of the Lord's prayer in John xvii., in which He asks that though "His own" refused Him as the Sent One, yet that the world might believe and that the world might know that the Father had sent Him.

8. Discontinuance of miracles.

The word usually translated "miracle" (dunamis) is entirely absent from John's Gospel, and in its place we have a series of "signs".

While the unity of the body is not mentioned in John, there is a unity which is very close. This and many other items of importance must now be reviewed, and we trust that the result of these studies will be not only a deeper appreciation of the supreme blessedness of the calling that places us "far above all" at the right hand of God, but further ability to speak with no uncertain sound to saints and sinners who while giving no evidence of being destined to this high calling, yet cannot, by reason of the dispensational conditions in which they find themselves, yield faith or obedience to Pentecostal and new covenant messages.

#3. Christ, the Image and the Word.
pp. 103 - 108

We have arrived at the conclusion that the Gospel according to John very specially meets the need and position of that great company of believers who, though called during this present time, do not seem to come under the dispensation of the mystery. Naturally our present findings will modify some statements made in earlier volumes. For this we feel there is no need to apologize, but rather give thanks for added light. However, it may be well to repeat, without detail or proof, the eight features found upon the surface for John's Gospel, which reveals the special fitness of his message for the time:--

1. The message must be world-wide in its scope.
2. It must give evidence that it is written for non-Jewish readers.
3. It must start with the fact that Christ came and was rejected.
4. It will omit the Lord's Supper.
5. It will give prominence to the ascension.
6. It will give a title to the Lord, which is in some way parallel with "The Image" and the "Creator" of Col. i.
7. It will convey the Lord's desire that, though rejected by "His own", the world may yet believe and know Him as the Sent One.
8. It will not use the word "miracle", but will substitute some other word in recognition of the fact that Pentecostal conditions have passed.

We believe that the distinctive nature of these prominent features carry the matter beyond debate into the region of fact and faith. We therefore spend no time in "proofs", but proceed to the more edifying labours connected with exposition.

The Word.

This Gospel opens with a wonderful revelation concerning Christ as the Word. Now there is a principle (found fairly constantly throughout the N.T.) that in harmony with the line of blessing which is to be developed in any one Gospel or Epistle, there will be found either in that Epistle or Gospel, or in a book connected therewith, some special aspect of the person and glory of the Lord Jesus Christ. This must be so, for there are no blessings, promises, callings, or hopes apart from Him, and before we can be told of either earthly or heavenly hopes, we must first be assured and instructed as to the position of Him on Whom all our hopes must rest.

Ordinarily we should leave this statement unelaborated and pass on, but as we trust these studies will be useful to those who may be engaged in ministering the Word to the wider circle of which we speak, we will give one or two illustrations of the principle.

Matthew.—The opening chapter is occupied with the genealogy (Son of David, Son of Abraham, and Son of the virgin), birth and work ("for He shall save His people from their sins"), of the Lord Jesus, which lays the foundation for all that is subsequently written in the Gospel.

Romans.—Here the Lord is the Seed of David according to the flesh, declared to be the Son of God with power according to the Spirit of holiness, by the resurrection from the dead. The opening thought is the presentation of Christ as the risen One.

Ephesians.—In the opening chapter Christ is shown as the One in Whom all who form the Body were chosen before the foundation (or overthrow) of the world, and Who was not only raised, but seated at the right hand of God far above all. That revelation concerning Christ Himself made possible the associated revelation concerning the Church which is His Body.

Revelation.—The Lord says, "I am He that liveth, and was dead; and behold, I am alive for evermore, Amen". Here in the vision of chapter i. we have the great Priest-King after the order of Melchisedec.

The presentation of Christ by John, however, differs from that of the synoptic Gospels. Before He is presented as either Son of God, Son of man, Son of David, or Son of Abraham, He is revealed as "The Word". While the repeated use of the name "Word" by the Targumists (paraphrase of the Hebrew in Chaldee) could be adduced to illustrate the way in which this word had become generally recognized as a title of the Lord, the meaning is evident by a comparison of verses 1 and 18 of John i.:-- a | In the beginning was the Word.

b | The Word was with God.
c | The Word was God.
* * * * *
c | No man hath seen God.
b | In the bosom of the Father.
a | He hath declared Him.

It is the function of a word to make manifest the inaudible thought, and this is plainly seen in the last clause, "He hath declared Him". Exegeomai means to lead or bring out, and is translated "declared" and "tell". There is a parallel here with the revelation of Col. i. 15, but the latter is upon a higher plane. This we may set out as follows:--

John i.	Colossians i.
The Word.	The Image.
The Only Begotten.	The Firstborn.
All things made.	All things created.
His fullness-full of grace and truth.	All fullness.
The Word made flesh.	The body of His flesh.
Preferred before . . . . . was before.	He is before all things.
	He has pre-eminence.

First, let us observe that there is no such parallel as this discoverable in the other Gospels. Here John is evidently ministering truth that approximates to the dispensation of the Mystery, without actually touching it. Having observed the likeness we must also note the difference.

The Word and The Image.—The Word deals with sound, the Image with light, and most know enough of elementary physics to understand the difference. Even when John writes: "No man hath seen God at any time", he does not continue: "The Only Begotten Son hath made Him visible", but passing by the thought of invisibility, he adheres to the figure that belongs to the Word—"hath declared Him".

The Only Begotten and The Firstborn.—Care must be exercised when dealing with these different titles. The one, "the Firstborn", goes back to "the beginning"; the other, "the Only Begotten", begins at Bethlehem.

Prototokes, "firstborn", occurs in Matt. i. 25; Rom. viii. 29; Col. i. 15, 18: Heb. i. 6, xi. 28, and xii. 23.

Monogenes, "Only Begotten", occurs in Luke vii. 12; viii. 42, ix. 38; John i. 14, 18, iii. 16, 18; Heb. xi. 17, and I John iv. 9.

Monogenes is limited to the flesh; Christ is never named "the only begotten Son" until it is declared that "the Word became flesh".

Prototokes is, however, used with wider significance. In Heb. xi. 28 it has the meaning of the first-born after the manner of men, but it is readily seen that a fuller meaning attaches to it in Col. i. 15, 18. If "Firstborn" in verse 15 is to mean that Christ had no existence before He became the Image of the invisible God, the Firstborn of all creation, how will this interpretation answer in verse 18? Had He no existence before resurrection? The assumption is impossible and reveals the folly of the argument. Let us adhere closely to the language of Scripture. Before Bethlehem, Christ is called "The Word" and "The Image", but after, when He had become flesh, He is called "The Only Begotten Son", "The Son of God", "The Son of man".

All things made and All things created.—There is a deeper significance in the word "create" of Col. i. than in the word "made" in John i. In John, moreover, nothing is specified: "He made all things"; "The world was made by Him." That is all that the dispensational teaching of John necessitates. Colossians, however, is addressed to a people who have a high calling, so high that it goes far above principalities and powers into the highest heavens. Consequently Col. i. gives a fuller enumeration concerning creation, and emphasizes the heavenly and invisible side, where John emphasizes the visible, earthly side:--

> "For by Him were all things created, that are in heaven, and that are in earth, visible and invisible, whether they be thrones, or dominions, or principalities, or powers; all things were created by Him, and for Him; and He is before all things, and by Him all things consists."

The language of II Cor. iii. 10 seems almost necessary as we compare these two records.

His fullness and All the fullness.—The fullness of John i. is that fullness of grace and truth which was seen in Christ as the Only Begotten of the Father. John's usage of "true" and "truth" gives to the words "grace and truth" the thought of "real grace". See his usage in the expressions "the true light" (i. 9), "the true bread" (vi. 32), and "the true vine" (xv. 1). Shadow and typical grace had come through Moses, for the law had a shadow of good things to come, but not the very image or substance, so John says: "The law was given by Moses, but grace and truth (i.e., real grace) came by Jesus Christ" (John i. 17). This is the meaning of the expression, "grace for grace", where the word "for" is anti—"in the room of", "in the stead of". So: "Of His fullness have all we received"—real antitypical grace in the room of the shadowy grace of the law.

This is indeed wonderful, but the fullness of Colossians transcend it. There it is "all the fullness", which is further enlarged in Col. ii. 9, 10 as: "For in Him dwelleth all the fullness of Godhead bodily, and ye are filled to the full in Him, which is the Head of all principality and power." Fullness of grace, as opposed to types and shadows, is one thing—this is the message both of John and Paul (see Col. ii. 16, 17), but Paul's ministry goes deeper: all the fullness of the Godhead bodily, the church filled full in Him, and He, not only Head of the church, but also of principalities and powers—this is a revelation necessitated by the high glory of the dispensation of the mystery.

Preferred before and He is before.—John the Baptist recognized something of the pre-eminence of the Lord, and there are several statements to this effect in the opening chapters of John's Gospel:--

> "He was not that light" (I. 8).
> "He is preferred before me, for He was before me" (I. 15).
> "I am not the Christ . . . . . I am a voice" (i. 20-23).
> "He must increase, I must decrease . . . . . He that cometh from heaven is above all" (iii. 31).

Let us not miss the beauty of verse 23. Christ was The Word; John was but a voice. Christ was The Light, John was but a bright and shining lamp (John v. 35). John glimpsed something of the glory when he said: "He that cometh from heaven is above all", but, in the main, the position is that Christ is greater than John the Baptist. When we come to Ephesians and Colossians, however, the greatness of the Lord is beyond the flight of imagination. He is before all things; thrones, dominions, principalities, powers. He has pre-eminence over all. It will be seen that while John ministers things that are associated with Christ during His rejection by Israel, and reveals the Lord in a light quite different from that of the other Gospels, he by no means deals with the mystery, neither does he speak of Christ in terms that compare with the revelation of Ephesians and Colossians. There is, however, sufficient likeness to enable us to see that the teaching found in John's Gospel fits the condition of many children of God to-day.

We do not pretend to have given an exposition of John i. 1-18; the matters contained therein are too weighty for such slight treatment. There is perhaps need for one word on John i. 1 before closing, and that is a reference to the translation sometimes suggested, "The Word was a god". The following are the occurrences in John i. 1-18 of Theos =

God, without the article "the", and we have but to adopt the translation "A god" to manifest its inaccuracy when used of John i. 1:--

> "The Word was A god" (verse 1).
> "There was a man sent from A god" (verse 6).
> "Power to become children of A god" (verse 12).
> "Which were born of A god" (verse 13).
> "No man hath seen A god at any time" (verse 18).

It is also well to remember that some MSS, namely, Lm., Tr., WH., Rom., with the Syriac, read "God, only begotten" in John i. 18: this is found, moreover, in the confession of the church of Antioch. While therefore much more should be considered were we purposing an exposition of John's Gospel, or of the doctrine of the deity of Christ, sufficient for our present purpose has been brought forward to establish the link and yet to manifest the difference between John's ministry and the prison ministry of the apostle Paul. Other phases of truth we must leave for future studies.

#4. Three relationships in which believers who are not members of the One Body stand to-day.
pp. 139 - 142

Let us look at some of the figures that are used in John's Gospel to indicate the relationship that exists between the believer and His Lord. We know that in the dispensation of the mystery, the believer forms part of the church which is the Body of Christ, the fullness of Him that filleth all in all. No such figure of course occurs in John, but there are in it certain symbols of relationship indicative of the calling of those to whom it ministers.

Bridal relationships.—It must not be inferred that we deny the occurrence of bridal relationships in the other Gospels; they are there, and we recognize them, but what we wish to draw attention to is that bridal relationships are perpetuated now among that great company of believers outside the Body at the present time:--

> "He that hath the bride is the bridegroom, but the friend of the bridegroom, which standeth and heareth him, rejoiceth greatly because of the bridegroom's voice. This my joy therefore is fulfilled" (John iii. 29).

Now it is nowhere said, either in the synoptic Gospels, or in John, that those addressed actually formed part of the bride; neither, therefore, do we. John the Baptist makes it clear that he formed no part of the bride, his being a special relationship as, "the friend of the bridegroom". In Matthew, Mark, and Luke the disciples are spoken of as "children of the bride-chamber", who, of course, are not the bride, and in Matt. xxv. virgins go out to meet the approaching bridegroom, not as brides, but to be present at the marriage feast.

The bride is distinguished from those blessed ones who are called to the marriage supper of the Lamb in Rev. xix. 7, 9, as also in Matt. xxii., so that all we can say here is, that while the bride herself may not be in process of formation during this present period, the great company who are called to the marriage supper of the Lamb are being gathered out.

Light on the subject may be obtained from the parable of Matt. xxii. We have first of all the invitation to the wedding of those "who had been bidden". Following their refusal the invitation is repeated, with the urgent addition, "All things are ready". This they made light of. The word translated "made light" here is rendered "neglect" in Heb. ii. 3. As a consequence these refusers are destroyed and their city burned. This clearly refers to the destruction of Jerusalem in A.D.70.

But after this date, and consequently after the ministry of Peter and Paul in the Acts, a further invitation is sent out, this time into the highways, with the result that the wedding is furnished with guests. This exactly corresponds with the subsequent ministry of John in his Gospel, which extends the marriage feast invitation to believers now.

Again, the first of the eight signs of John's Gospel is that given at the marriage feast in Cana of Galilee. There the water was turned into wine, and there the Lord manifested forth His glory. At this feast Christ is not the bridegroom, both He and His disciples being present as "guests". This first sign therefore suggests that those who came under John's ministry here form the great company who shall be invited to the marriage supper of the Lamb.

The other sheep.—The Lord's people are never called sheep in the epistles of the mystery, neither is the Lord called their Shepherd. It is Israel who say: "We are His people and the sheep of His pasture" (Psa. c. 3). During our Lord's earthly ministry He said: "I am not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel" (Matt. xv. 24). John's Gospel, however, contains a revelation concerning "other sheep" which the Lord had and which He would gather:-- > "And other sheep I have which are not of this fold; them also I will bring, and they will hear My voice; and there shall be one flock and one Shepherd" (John x. 16).

Who are those other sheep? The answer that comes most readily and acceptably is, "Israel of the Dispersion", but is this the right answer? The other sheep are declared "not out of (ek) this fold".

We must distinguish between the two words translated "fold" in the A.V. of verse 16. Aule is "fold", while poimne is "flock". Aule is most probably derived from the Hebrew ohel, tent or tabernacle. Primarily it means an open courtyard, and John himself uses the word in xviii. 15, where it is translated "palace". Originally sheepfolds were in the open court of the house, and the word is so used in II Chron. iv. 9; Psa. lxv. 4; cxxxv. 1; Isa. i. 12, and many other passages. These other sheep were not "of this fold", were not connected with those courts of the Lord into which it was the peculiar prerogative of Israel to enter. The dispersion could hardly be so designated.

The word poimne, flock, is intimately associated with poimen, shepherd, the flock being viewed not so much as so many sheep, but as so many sheep under one shepherd. Poimnion, the diminutive, is found in Acts xx. 28, 29 where it most certainly is used of the church of God:--

> "Take heed, therefore, unto yourselves and to all the flock, over which the Holy Ghost hath made you overseers, to feed the church of God which He hath purchased with His own blood. For I know that after my departure shall grievous wolves enter in among you, not sparing the flock."

If Paul could use the word "flock" in its diminutive sense for the church as constituted in Acts xx., the Lord could use the words, "one flock" of a company composed of the gathered sheep of the house of Israel, and of the "other sheep" who, though not of Israel's fold, would, nevertheless, under the one great Shepherd, constitute one flock. While this is far removed from the unity expressed by the One Body, with the Lord as Head, it nevertheless as in consonance with that blessing which must necessarily take its character from the present position of the ascended Lord, and while not being in the full blaze of that central glory, nevertheless basks, as it were, in its penumbra.

Peter was definitely commissioned to feed the Lord's sheep and lambs, but his curiosity was not satisfied when, concerning John, he asked: "And what shall this man do?" Peter and John are associated very closely in their early ministry with the Lord and the twelve, and it looks as though both were to be under-shepherds, though tending different folds. Gal. ii. 9 indicates that John, like Peter, had a ministry to the circumcision, but we are not thereby justified in concluding that God could not send John to another company—such a conjecture is beyond our right or ken.

We know that Paul had a twofold ministry. Why, then, should not John be similarly commissioned? In the same way there is no more difficulty in believing that Gentile believers may be called "other sheep" than they are likened to a "wild olive". And if Gentiles could be grafted on to the stock of Israel, there is nothing to render it impossible that they should form part of that great "flock", though never of the "fold of Israel".

Partakers of the true bread.—None but those who came out of Egypt ate the manna in the wilderness:-- > "Our fathers did eat manna in the desert; as it is written, He gave them bread from heaven to eat" (John vi. 31).

The Lord, when replying to this, and declaring Himself to be the true bread that came down from heaven, speaks of the world as recipients:--

> "For the bread of God is He which cometh down from heaven, and giveth life to the world."
> "The bread that I will give is My flesh, which I will give for the life of the world."

Here then are three relationships in which, we hold, believing Gentiles stand to-day who are outside the sphere of the dispensation of the mystery. They are associated with the Bride, they are associated with the Flock, and they partake of the Living Bread, and so of a common life.

#5. Nicodemus and heavenly things.
pp. 184 - 188

> "If I have told you earthly things, and ye believe not, how shall ye believe, if I tell you heavenly things?" (John iii. 12).

The record of the Lord's dealings with Nicodemus may throw some light upon the way in which seekers after truth belonging to the great outer circle may be led on and encouraged. Nicodemus appears three times in this Gospel, viz., John iii. 1-12, vii. 50-52 and xix. 39. In each case the reader's attention is drawn to the fact that he came by night:--

> "The same came to Jesus by night" (iii. 2).
> "He that came to Jesus by night" (vii. 50).
> "Which at the first came to Jesus by night" (xix. 39).

In the first case Nicodemus approached the Lord with evident desire to learn of Him, but very probably with no other really fixed idea. Considering the greatness of Nicodemus, who is described as "the teacher of Israel", and the great wealth which Rabbinical tradition ascribes to him, his manner of addressing the Lord, Who was, externally, but a Galilean peasant, was respectful and conciliating. He called Him "Rabbi", and admitted that God must be with Him.

The occasion of his second appearance is less peaceful. A division was coming among the people because of the Lord. Some said, "Of a truth this is The Prophet", others said, "This is The Christ", whilst some asked, "Shall Christ come out of Galilee?" (vii. 40, 41). This division among the common people, however, was not a matter likely to move a man of the standing of Nicodemus, for the attitude of the rulers to common people was one of contempt, as is expressed in vii. 49, "But this people that knoweth not the Law are cursed". But what does seem to indicate a move in the direction of faith on this second occasion is the fact that, in spite of the Pharisees having asked, "Have any of the rulers or the Pharisees believed on Him?" (vii. 48), Nicodemus had dared to interpose the question, "Doth our law judge any man before it hear him, and know what he doeth" (vii. 51).

Again, while he shared the same unbelief concerning the resurrection of the Lord as was common among the disciples, his third appearance finds him coming into the open as a self-confessed disciple, bringing his offering of myrrh and aloes. Certainly we may cherish the thought that Nicodemus was numbered among the 120 who met together in the upper room of Acts i.

Now, this is the man to whom the Lord said, "If I have told you earthly things, and ye believed not, how shall ye believe, if I tell you heavenly things?" It is evident from these words that all that the Lord has said to Nicodemus up to that point was concerning "earthly things", "If I have told you earthly things". What had the Lord told Nicodemus? He had said:--

> "Verily, verily, I say unto thee, Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God."
> "Verily, verily, I say unto thee, Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God. That which has been born of the flesh is flesh; and that which hath been born of the Spirit is spirit. Marvel not that I say unto thee, Ye must be born again. The wind bloweth where it listeth, and thou heareth the sound thereof, but canst not tell whence it cometh, and whither it goeth: so is every one that is born of the Spirit" (John iii. 3-8).

This new birth therefore belongs to earthly things. The Greek word gennao is used in the N.T. for both begetting and birth. This dual use may be seen in Matt. i. 16: "And Jacob begat Joseph the husband of Mary, of whom (i.e., Mary, whom being feminine) was born Jesus." Nicodemus evidently understood the Lord to speak of birth, but the Lord's words are better understood of the begetting of the Father. "Again" is anothen = "from above". It is so translated in iii. 31. No sense is made of the verse by translating it, "he that cometh again". So we hear of authority given "from above" (xix. 11), of the Lord's coat woven "from the top" (xix. 23), and many other instances. "Ye must be begotten from above" is a better rendering of the Lord's words.

In answer to Nicodemus' question, "How?' the Lord expands His statement, the words "from above" being omitted and "of water and spirit" substituted. From this passage baptismal regeneration has been taught, the baptism being that of water. A reference to John vii. 38, 39 gives guidance: "He that believeth on Me, as the Scripture hath said, out of his belly shall flow rivers of living water, but this spake He of the Spirit." Here we have Scripture for in that "living water" can be a type of "Spirit". We did not quote fully John vii. 39 above, which we now do: "But this spake He of the Spirit, which they that believe on Him should receive, for the Holy Ghost was not yet given: because that Jesus was not yet glorified." This combines the two thoughts "from above" and "Spirit" referred to in John iii.

In what way are we justified in speaking of the gift of the Holy Spirit at Pentecost as an "earthly thing?" We cannot use it if we mean by "earthly" anything that is sinful or base. But this is not the meaning of the expression "earthly things" in John iii. 12. The word so translated is epigeios, and is found in I Cor. xv. 40, "There are also celestial bodies and bodies terrestrial". The subject of this passage is "the resurrection body". "How are the dead raised up? and with what body do they come?" In the answer we learnt that some resurrection bodies will be celestial, or heavenly (epourania), while some will be terrestrial or earthly (epigeia), but far from the earthly being despised the apostle declares that, like the heavenly, they have their distinct "glory".

Verse 44 adds a further pair of words, "a natural body", and, "a spiritual body", "natural" being psuchikon, pertaining to the soul. Inasmuch as the purpose of the ages embraces things in the heavens and things on earth, and both spheres of blessedness are to be occupied by a redeemed people, it follows that for "spiritual blessings in heavenly places", "spiritual" and "heavenly" resurrection bodies will be necessary, while for the meek, who are to inherit the earth and enjoy the delights of Paradise with its twelve manner of fruits, earthly and physical bodies will be required.

Birth from above, therefore, may well be one of the many "earthly things" which the Lord had to tell Nicodemus.

Peter who wrote to the "Dispersion", whose salvation was the salvation of their "souls", a salvation spoken of by the O.T. prophets, and whose destiny was to be "a royal priesthood, an holy nation, and a peculiar people", speaks of this birth from above, "Being begotten again, not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible, by the Word of God, which liveth and abideth for ever" (I Pet. i. 23). James, who writes to the twelve tribes scattered abroad, says, "Of His own will begat He us with the Word of truth, that we should be a kind of firstfruits of His creatures" (James i. 18). John, in his first epistle, has much to say about those who are "born of God" (see I John ii. 29, iii. 9, iv. 7, v. 1-4 and 18). Peter, James and John looked forward to sitting upon thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel.

Paul's use of the term in I Cor. iv. 14, 15, and Philemon 10 is not strictly parallel:--

> "As my beloved sons I warn you. For though ye have ten thousand instructors in Christ, yet have ye not many fathers: for in Christ Jesus I have begotten you through the gospel."
>
> "I beseech thee for my son Onesimus, whom I have begotten in my bonds."

The distinctive teaching of Paul's epistles is not the new birth, but a new creation. Some may set this aside as a quibble, but we record it as one of the many distinctions that must be observed between things earthly and heavenly.

We learn from John iii. that the new birth belongs to the outer circle of truth to-day. It may be perfectly right to emphasize the necessity for this new birth when preaching the gospel, so long as we are clear that such does not belong to the ministry of the apostle Paul, nor afford an entrance into the church of the One Body. New creation and identification "with Christ" in His death and resurrection is something deeper and higher.

"Ye must be begotten from above" belongs to earthly things.

#6. The Samaritan woman and true worship (iv.).
pp. 221 - 224

We have seen that Nicodemus was warned that unbelief concerning earthly things would prevent him from hearing of heavenly things, these heavenly things being intimately associated with the Lord's ascension (John iii. 12, 13). In John iv. a very different character is introduced, a Samaritan woman, yet to her was made a marvelous revelation concerning true worship. The statement in John iv. 21-24 resembles the words of Paul in Phil. iii. 3:--

> "Believe Me, the hour cometh when ye shall neither in this mountain, nor yet at Jerusalem, worship the Father. Ye worship ye know not what: we know what we worship; for salvation is of the Jews. But the hour cometh, and now is, when the true worshippers shall worship the Father in spirit and in truth; for the Father seeketh such to worship Him. God is Spirit; and they that worship Him must worship Him in spirit and in truth" (John iv. 21-24).
>
> "We are the circumcision, which worship God in the spirit, and rejoice in Christ Jesus, and have no confidence in the flesh" (Phil. iii. 3).

To Nicodemus the "must" concerned the new birth. To the Samaritan woman the "must" dealt with worship.

In the record of the Lord's dealings with this poor woman we find that He speaks to her seven times, gently leading on to the final revelation of Himself as the Messiah. The woman's first reply was:--

> "How is it that THOU, being a Jew, asketh drink of me, which am a woman of Samaria?" (verse 9).

Upon the Lord's reply she asks:--

> "Art THOU greater than our father Jacob?" (verse 12).

Following the conviction she receives concerning her mode of life, light begins to break in, and she says:--

> "Sir, I perceive that THOU art a prophet" (verse 19).

At first sight we may be disposed to think that the sudden introduction into the conversation of the question of worship was a ruse adopted by the woman to avoid further reference to her own manner of life. As we pursue the story, however, it becomes evident that the simple revelation of her sinful life created a deep impression. Though the Lord unfolded to her the wondrous prospect of a spiritual worship that would set aside both Samaria's mountain and Jerusalem's temple, she says not a word about it, but, as though still holding on to the one great fact of the Lord's knowledge of her dark life, she interjects a further remark concerning the Lord's prophetic knowledge. And by her use of the title Messiah it is easy to see that already the thought was forming in her mind, "Can this Prophet be indeed the Messiah?"

> "The woman said unto Him, I know that Messiah cometh, which is called Christ; when He is come, He will tell us all things" (verse 25).

Then comes the Lord's revelation of Himself:--

> "I that speak unto thee am He" (verse 26).

The impression and conviction wrought in this woman's heart abides. It is the burden of her testimony to her friends and neighbours:--

> "Come, see a Man which told me all things that ever I did: Is not this the Christ?" (verse 29).

This simple testimony of a repenting soul was owned by the Lord:--

> "And many of the Samaritans of that city believed on Him for the saying of the woman, which testified, He told me all that ever I did" (verse 39).

The conclusion of this witness leads once more to the world-wide aspect of the Saviour's mission:--

> "We have heard Him ourselves, and know that this is indeed the Christ, the Saviour of the world" (verse 42).

We cannot help seeing in the repentance, confession and evangelistic testimony of this woman, a contrast with Israel's lack of repentance, and consequent failure to recognize their Messiah and to fulfil their ministry among the nations.

The insistence upon the Lord's knowledge of the human heart is not confined to this chapter. It is found in chapter i., and prefaces chapter iii. Nathaniel is converted and acknowledges the Lord largely because of this divine knowledge. "Whence knowest Thou me?"—and upon his confession the Lord again asserts His intimate knowledge:--

> "Because I said unto the, I saw thee under the fig tree believest thou?" (John i. 48-50).

Immediately preceding the conversation with Nicodemus are the words of John ii. 24 - iii. 1:--

> "He knew all men, and needed not that any should testify of man; for he knew what was in man. There was a man of the Pharisees, named Nicodemus."

In all probability Nicodemus could have maintained a good argument concerning the question of worship, but he was not permitted to do so. To this great doctor of the law, the Saviour speaks of the new birth. To a poor ignorant and sinful woman the Lord reveals the truth concerning spiritual worship. Whether the Samaritan woman grasped His teaching is not our concern—let us not miss its import.

"The hour cometh and now is."—We have here a period that follows on the destruction of the temple at Jerusalem, the reference to the place of worship at Jerusalem being read in the light of Matt. xxiii. 37 - xxiv. 2. This passage covers the present interval.

"True worshippers."—There is no allusion here to the false worship of idols—John uses "true" and "truth" many times with the sense of "real": "For the law was given by Moses, but grace and truth came by Jesus Christ" (John i. 17). Here "grace and truth" means "true grace" or "real grace" in contrast with the "type and shadow" grace of the law. "My Father giveth you the true bread from heaven" (John vi. 32). Here the use of the words "true bread" does not mean that the manna in the wilderness was false, but that it was in itself a type or shadow of the "real bread"—the Lord Himself.

Perhaps the most precious word in the whole statement is the word "seeketh"—"The Father seeketh such". Is not this a revelation of the heart of God? The Father seeks the true worshipper as the Son seeks the lost. The Father goes out to us in our worship perhaps more than we can ever go out to Him. What a blessed thought, that as surely as we draw near to Him, He is drawing near to us!

Worship lies behind the original purpose of Satan's creation and underlies his terrible fall (Ezek. xxviii.). Worship is the first cause in the covenant with Israel. Worship was the desire of the tempter in the wilderness (Matt. iv.), and worship is the goal of the great antichristian apostacy at the end (Rev. xiii.).

The church of the mystery, and its association with heavenly places, is intimately connected with worship. This church is itself a holy temple (Eph. ii.). As the true circumcision its worship is entirely spiritual (Phil. iii.), and its members, holding the Head, repudiate any imposition upon them of the worship of angels (Col. ii.). The oft-recurring word "godliness" in the epistles to Timothy, literally means "good or acceptable worship".

If John's Gospel ministers to the needs of believers who are to-day on the outer fringe of the dispensation of the mystery, then the Lord's words to the Samaritan woman are words in season. Just as the Lord told Nicodemus that to stumble at the revelation concerning earthly things precluded all reference to heavenly things, so we shall find that where believers are entangled with "places" of worship, ensnared in denominational jealousies, subscribing to carnal ordinances, ceremonials and the like, they are unlikely to hear the truth committed to the apostle Paul.

The leading of the Lord.

#2. pp. 14 - 16

A—Seeing that the Lord's leading is so intimately connected both with redemption and atonement, it seems to be important enough to warrant a further talk. I shall be glad of further help.

B—When we speak of "leading" we use a word that suggests a path or a way. Let us see what the Scriptures have to say on that phase:--

> "He led them forth by the RIGHT WAY" (Psa. cvii. 7).

I take the truth of this passage to be fundamental. Wherever, however, whoever; if the Lord is leading, the way is right. To question this is to overthrow the whole issue of redemption. Now it is fairly certain that the way of the Lord will often appear wrong in the eyes of men.

A—Scripture says:--

> "Every way of a man is right in his own eyes" (Prov. xxi. 2).
> "There is a way that seemeth right unto a man, but the end thereof are the ways of death" (Prov. xvi. 25).

B—The fact that the ways of the Lord are so different from the ways of the world will often cause us to pray like Ezra:--

> "To seek of Him a right way . . . . . for I was ashamed to require of the king a band of soldiers" (Ezra viii. 21, 22).

That is a "shame" that is enviable.

There are two principles which we may link together: (1) The Lord's way is right always; (2) Seek of the Lord that right way, and seek it of Him.

The next feature I feel we should notice is that the Lord leads not only in a right way, but often in a roundabout way, for reasons unknown to us at the time:--

> "God led them not through the way of the Philistines, although that was near . . . . . but God led them ABOUT through the way of the wilderness of the Red Sea" (Exod. xiii. 17, 18).

Here the Lord was leading them "not into temptation", but by the roundabout path, "delivering them from evil".

A—This is true, and fits any case. How we chafe because the Lord does not take us by the short cut! It was "near", but it was not the "right way". Unknown to us there may lurk in that near way the Philistine who would cause us to repent of our calling and turn back. This I have seen in my own small measure, and I trust that this reminder may keep me patient and willing.

B—Yes, we are all too eager for the "near" way, and far too unconcerned that it shall be the "right way".

There is, however, another important lesson to learn from this record of the roundabout way. It was not only to save Israel from too early contact with war, but for their own good also:--

> "The Lord thy God led these forty years in the wilderness, to humble thee, and to prove thee, to know what was in thine heart . . . . . that He may make thee know that man doth not live by bread alone" (Deut. viii. 2, 3).

To humble, to prove, to know! to know what is in our heart! How the leading of the Lord brings us face to face with the man within! We say, "Lord, we will lay down our lives for Thy sake", but He knows that we shall take but one more step along the road to hear the cock crow over our denial. And yet the knowledge is not all sad, for we gain a knowledge of the Lord and learn that man does not live by bread alone:--

> "Thy raiment waxed not old, neither did thy foot swell these forty years."

The Lord may lead us to Elim, with its twelve wells, or into the midst of famine, but if He does, He can also lead us to a poor widow whose barrel of meal and cruise of oil shall not fail. Depend upon it, the "roundabout" way is often the "right" way.

A—There is something sobering about all this. Is our general experience in this life to be that of discipline, privation, self-denial, humbling? It seems a hard pitch to look forward to.

B—Scripture does not hide the fact that the path is not always easy; in fact a little further on in Deut. viii. we read not only of a wilderness, but of > "That great and terrible wilderness, wherein were fiery serpents, and scorpions, and drought, where there was no water" (Deut. viii. 15).

But there is compensation, for it is recorded:--

> "Who brought forth water out of the rock of flint; Who fed thee in the wilderness with manna" (Deut. viii. 15, 16).

A—Yes, I see the end:--

> "To do thee good at thy latter end" (Deut. viii. 16).

B—And so we may sum up in the words of Isa. lvii. 17, 18:--

> "He went on frowardly in the way of his own heart, I have seen his ways, and will heal him: I will lead him and RESTORE COMFORTS unto him."

#3. pp. 31, 32

A—We have had two interesting talks on the leading of the Lord, and the knowledge gained makes me thirsty for more.

B—Let us take note of some of the characteristics of the path we have to tread. The Psalmist says: "Show me Thy ways, O Lord: teach me Thy paths: Lead me in Thy truth and teach me" (Psa. xxv. 4, 5). Thy ways, Thy paths, Thy truth.

We have already learned that all the paths of the Lord are "right". We now see that they are all in truth, and as this truth is connected with teaching, all the paths of the Lord are in harmony with His Word. This being so we must unhesitatingly reject any tendency to believe that the Lord is leading to any action that contradicts His Word. True, the child of God is led by "the Spirit", but that Spirit is the "Spirit of truth", and it was He Who inspired the Word. The words: "In all thy ways acknowledge Him", will often settle the problem of the path we should take.

A—Tell me more of this. I want to see the point clearly.

B—You must let me give the passage, with one alteration, taken from the Greek version:-

> "In all thy ways acknowledge Him, and He shall rightly divide thy paths" (Prov. iii. 6).

In our life's walk we often come to a place where the road divides. Sometimes the way is clear and we have no hesitation as to which road to take. Sometimes, however, we are far from certain. Now in such circumstances we can make a right decision if we know the path we are not to take. If we perceive that by taking the one path we cannot acknowledge Him in all our ways, it may be sufficient guidance to enable us to take the other, if there be no evident compromise in that direction.

A—Are there any other prayers like that in Psa. xxv. 4, 5? They seem to supply me with a petition for my own case. At times the way seems so tangled, and one is very conscious that every stumble is marked and criticized by unfriendly eyes.

B—Stay, your words are but a paraphrase of Psa. xxvii. 11:--

> "Teach me Thy way, O Lord, and lead me in a PLAIN PATH, because of those which observe me."

How truly up-to-date are these words of old! How they fit the most modern of men in his latest circumstance!

A—This is indeed a help; it gives one fresh courage to see one's condition anticipated and provided for.

B—We have had two prayers: "Lead me in Thy truth", and "Lead me in a plain path". Let us add a third to complete the story:--

> "Lead me to the Rock that is higher than I" (Psa. lxi. 2).

If we need a plain path because of our enemies, we need also this Rock, when the heart is overwhelmed:--

> "From the end of the earth will I cry unto Thee. When my heart is overwhelmed, lead me to the Rock that is higher than I."

We can safely add: "and that Rock was Christ."

> "To whom shall we go?"
> "Whom have I in heaven but Thee?"

The way of the Lord is right, however, roundabout, and it is not only in truth, but it leads to Christ, and to a Christ higher than the highest, a Rock in the sea, a Rock in a weary land. If, as we saw, the leading of the Lord is to do us good at the latter end, here we see that the source of all that good is Christ.

#4. pp. 90 - 92

A—While I suppose the words we have before us: "Lead me to the Rock that is higher than I", practically sum up the Lord's leading, there must be other aspects that would be profitable for us to consider.

B—Yes, there are, and I think we might look at some of the agencies that are used in the leading of the Lord's people. Take Psa. xliii. 3, where we read: "O send out Thy light and Thy truth: let them lead me." Darkness and deceit come from Satan, and the blessedness of the Lord's leading can be appreciated when one contrasts it with the horror of being led astray by Satan sending out his darkness and lies. The Lord's leading, moreover, always has one goal: "Let them bring me unto Thy holy hill, and to Thy tabernacles." Satan's objective is not holiness, but the reverse.

A—You will not understand me in what I am going to say, I trust, but we have had leading in truth, and now we have leading by truth, yet I seem to feel a desire for something more intimate, something, may I say it? more human.

B—I think I know what you desire, and I believe it is a right desire, and provided for. The Lord not only says, "I will guide thee—through the Scriptures", but "I will guide thee with Mine eye" (Psa. xxxii. 8). This is not divorced from the teaching of the Word, but arises out of it, for the complete verse reads: "I will instruct thee and teach thee in the way which thou shalt go: I will guide thee with Mine eye."

A—I remember once being in the maze of Hampton Court, and when unable to discover the right path, an attendant, standing on a central platform, just indicated by a nod which turn to take.

B—It is good to feel that the intricate maze of life also is like an open book to the Lord, and while you were speaking I remembered that Spurrell's version gives, as an alternative to "guide", the words "nod to", which makes the figure more complete.

"I will guide thee with mine eye." This necessitates at least one thing in the person guided: he must be looking up to the Lord: "Unto thee lift I up mine eyes" (Psa. cxxiii. 1). Verse 2 of the same Psalm continues: "Behold, as the eyes of servants look unto the hand of their masters . . . . . so our eyes wait upon the Lord our God." It seems therefore that to be guided by the eye implies something more than relationship; it appears to suggest some measure of service.

Being guided by the eye is put in contrast with the guidance of the horse with bit and bridle: "Be not like the uninstructed horse and mule, whose jaws must be held in with bit and bridle, lest they come near unto thee" (Psa. xxxii. 9). How much better to be guided by the Lord's eye, than to be held in by bit and bridle.

A—I suppose one of the reasons why the Lord's leading is so often hard is that we are behaving like an obstinate mule instead of a willing servant. Is there any help in Scripture that would enable us to attain to this higher level?

B—There was a child of God who was envious at the foolish, when he saw the prosperity of the wicked. He had a wretched time of it, until, to use his own words, "he went into the sanctuary of God". That changed his point of view. He then saw things from a new and true angle, and came out of that sanctuary saying: "Thou shalt guide me with Thy counsel (instead of the counsel of the ungodly that had began to weigh with him), and afterward receive me to glory" (Psa. lxxiii. 24).

The single eye presupposes the single heart, and the single heart can be found only where Asaph found it:--

> "Cause me to know the way wherein I should walk; for I lift up my soul unto Thee" (Psa. cxliii. 8).

#5. pp. 145 - 147

A—I am rather afraid this will be the last opportunity we shall have together for some while, and therefore I should like, before we close this subject, to have a word or two from the N.T.

B—As a connecting link let us turn to John x. where the great figure of Psa. xxiii. is carried over. The Shepherd speaks: "He calleth His own sheep by name, and leadeth them out, and when He putteth forth His own sheep, He goeth before them, and the sheep follow Him: for they know His voice" (John x. 3, 4). The sheep are "His own", they are redeemed by His blood as the Lamb, before they are led by Himself as the Shepherd. Psa. xxii. comes before Psa. xxiii.

"When He putteth forth His own sheep, He goeth before them". This statement receives illumination from the preceding chapter. There, one of His sheep, the man born blind, had been "cast out". Now this is the same word that is used in x. 4, translated "putteth forth". It is blessed to know that while the hatred of men was casting this follower of Christ out of their fellowship, the Lord was using that very action to put forth one of His sheep, that he might follow Him. For if the sheep are thus treated, it is a comfort to remember that the Shepherd Himself was cast out, too. In all things "He goeth before". This is the most intimate form of guidance, the personal. "They know His voice", and His voice still speak in the Word. This is the simplest reference to leading in the N.T.

A—I suppose we must expect to find the N.T. references more definitely linked with doctrine than those of the O.T. and we must use the one to help in the understanding of the other.

B—The most important passages on the subject in the N.T. are found in Paul's epistles, the very nature of which makes their presentation of truth more complex than that which enters the Gospels or the O.T. Scriptures. Let us look at Rom. viii. 14: "For as many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God." The context of this passage is profound. From the first verse there is established a contrast between "flesh" and "Spirit". We have "the law of the spirit of life", and "the law of sin and death". The Spirit is called "the Spirit of God", "the Spirit of Christ", "the Spirit of Him that raised up Jesus from the dead", and "the indwelling Spirit". It would take a volume to attempt an exposition of these differences, and yet they are all in view in the verse we have quoted. To be led by the Spirit means, at least, that we are led by the risen Christ away from the things of the flesh, and a glance at verse 13 will show that the leading here is a direct outcome of the work of the Spirit in mortifying the deeds of the body—"for as many as are led by the Spirit", etc.

A—As one faces the depths of teaching that precede this mention of being led by the Spirit, it is easier to understand your attitude towards those who speak rather glibly of "feeling led". The mortifying of the deeds of the body will prove a sufficient reason for keeping my own silence on the subject for some time to come.

B—When we squarely face this deep and solemn aspect we may then appreciate the fact that holiness and liberty are nearer together than we may at first have believed. "If we are led of the Spirit, ye are not under the law" (Gal. v. 18). This passage is followed by two contrasting lists, the one of the works of the flesh, the other of the fruit of the Spirit, and concerning those who produce this fruit, the apostle adds, "against such there is no law". To be led by the Spirit, therefore, will manifest itself in the fruit of the Spirit, or as verse 25 concludes: "If we live in the Spirit, let us also walk in the Spirit", the walk being the sphere of the leading.

A—It seems that these two passages exhaust the actual references in the N.T., but I can quite see that they are very full.

B—They practically focus the whole teaching of the O.T. In these two passages we may discern the pillar of cloud, the presence of the Lord, the leading in, and by, truth, the humbling and proving: in other words the "mortifying" experiences of Israel, and the Rock that is higher.

What remains in the N.T. on the subject is by way of example, and particularly the example of Paul.

Seeing that this example has been specially given, we must give it a place in our survey:--

> "Be ye followers of me" (I Cor. iv. 16).
> "Be ye followers of me, even as I also am of Christ" (I Cor. xi. 1).
> "Be ye followers together of me, and mark them which walk so as ye have us for an example" (Phil. iii. 17).

A—I Cor. iv. contains some arresting statements. The apostles says: "We are fools for Christ's sake . . . . . we are weak . . . . . we are despised." He gives a list of unequalled sufferings and indignities which reach their climax in the words: "We are made as the filth of the world, and the off-scouring of all things."

B—And yet, at the end of such a list, he says, "Follow me"! Can we dare to trifle with the question of the Lord's leading with this chapter before us? The context of I Cor. xi. manifests a spirit ready to give up rights and pleasures, "Not seeking mine own profit, but the profit of many . . . . . be ye followers of me".

A—And what a contrast in Phil. iii.—Paul counting all things loss for Christ, and the others making a god of their belly and glorying in their shame.

B—If sin and death meant the cross for Christ, the leading of His Spirit can be in one direction only. We are not here in this world to "have a good time", we are here found as sinners, saved by grace, with a wilderness path to tread and glory on before. He leads us out that He may lead us in. He leads from death that He may lead to life. He leads from the pleasures of sin for a season to the pleasures that are for evermore.

The "out-resurrection".

#1. The scope of Philippians seen in its parallel with the epistle to the Hebrews.

pp. 209 - 212

Quite a number of readers have expressed either by letter or in conversation differing points of view, problems or theories regarding the "out-resurrection" of Phil. iii., but in no instance has the bearing of the epistle as a whole been given its true place. If the scope of an epistle be ignored, isolated verses can soon be found to substantiate a theory which cuts across the true scope, but if the scope of the epistle be given its full place, a positive contribution to the exposition of any one verse is obtained and the accuracy or falsity of an interpretation is more surely detected.

We are happy in the knowledge that no reader of The Berean Expositor requires proof of this assertion. It has been our continuous practice in all studies to place before the reader the structure of any part of Scripture under review, so that the true scope of the passage shall be discovered. Much light can also be obtained by observing parallel passages. Putting this into practice, as a side-light upon the question of the distinctive purpose of the epistle to the Philippians, we draw attention to the evident parallel that is found between Philippians and Hebrews.

To avoid possible misunderstanding, let us say at once that we do not believe that Hebrews ministers to the One Body, neither do we teach that Philippians and Hebrews deal with the same thing. What we do see is that in both epistles there is the outworking of a common principle found both in old and new testaments, in kingdom and in church, and to discover this is the surest and first step to the understanding of any one verse in either epistle.

Focal points common to both.

Both the epistles to the Philippians and to the Hebrews revolve round two common focal points, viz., PERFECTION and PERDITION, and these alternatives dominate the whole message. Salvation from sin is not in view in Hebrews; the gospel is not preached in Philippians. In both epistles it is assumed that those addressed are saved people, and the epistle urge them to "go on", not to "draw back", to "work out" and attain to those things that "accompany salvation".

The key references in Hebrews are vi. 1 and x. 39. Those of Philippians are iii. 11, 18 and 19.

Some readers may fail to find "perdition" in Phil. iii., and we therefore draw attention to the fact that "perdition" in Heb. x. 39 and "destruction" in Phil. iii. 19 are translations of the one Greek word apoleia. The primitive meaning of apoleia is seen in Matt. xxvi. 8 where it is translated "waste". Perfection, teleiotes, conveys the concept,

"going on to the end", and the alternatives put before the reader of these epistles are either the leaving of the elements and the pressing on to the full personal realization of all that Christ can mean, or the drawing back, for a variety of specified reasons, unto "waste":--

> "Leaving . . . . . let us go on unto perfection" (Heb. vi. 1).
> "We are not of them who draw back unto perdition" (Heb. x. 39).
> "Not as though I had already attained, either were already perfect, but I follow after . . . . . forgetting the things which are behind" (Phil. iii. 11-13).
> "Many walk . . . . . whose end is destruction" (Phil. iii. 18, 19).

Things associated with perfection and perdition.

Linked with these two focal terms are a series of others which find parallels in each epistle. Closely associated with the overcoming faith of Abraham is the fact of a heavenly citizenship:--

> "For he looked for a city which hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God" (Heb. xi. 10).
> "Ye are come unto Mount Sion, and unto the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem" (Heb. xii. 22).
> "Our citizenship is in heaven" (Phil. iii. 20).

Both epistles have a "prize" or a "reward" in view. Both speak of "pressing toward the mark" or of "running the race set before them", and in both epistles Christ, and His endurance of the cross, are used, not so much as the basis of redemption, but as an example in attaining the reward. Corresponding with this it will be seen that in both epistles Christ's exaltation to the right hand of God is viewed as in the nature of a reward:--

> "Wherefore seeing we also are compassed about with so great a cloud of witnesses, let us lay aside every weight, and the sin which doth so easily beset us, and let us run with patience the race that is set before us, looking unto Jesus, the Author (Captain) and Finisher (Perfecter) of faith, Who for the joy that was set before Him, endured the cross, despising the shame, and is set down at the right hand of the throne of God" (Heb. xii. 1, 2).
> "Being found in fashion as a man, He humbled Himself, and became obedient unto death of the cross. Wherefore God also hath highly exalted Him" (Phil. ii. 8, 9).
> "Forgetting those things which are behind, and reaching forth unto those things which are before, I press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus" (Phil. iii. 13, 14).

Both epistles foster the spirit that willingly gives up the present for the future, and that weighs over against present "loss" future "gain":--

> "Yea doubtless, and I count all things but loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus my Lord; for Whom I have suffered the loss of all things, and do count them but dung, that I may win Christ" (Phil. iii. 8).
> "Ye endured a great fight of afflictions . . . . . cast not away therefore your confidence, which hath great recompense of reward" (Heb. x. 32-35).

"Esteeming the reproach of Christ greater riches than the treasures of Egypt: for he had respect unto the recompense of the reward" (Heb. xi. 26).

Both epistles inculcate the spirit of "moderation":--

"These all died in faith, not having received the promises, but having seen them afar off, and were persuaded of them, and embraced them, and confessed that they were strangers and pilgrims on the earth" (Heb. xi. 13).

"Let your moderation (yieldingness) be known unto all men" (Phil. iv. 5).

There is also a parallel in such passages as the following where the cross of Christ is spoken of in a special way:--

"I tell you even weeping, that they are the enemies of the cross of Christ" (Phil. iii. 18).

"They crucify to themselves the Son of God afresh, and put Him to an open shame" (Heb. vi. 6).

The words: "Esau, who for one morsel of meat, sold his birthright" (Heb. xii. 16), and the Philippian passage, "Whose God is their belly" (Phil. iii. 19) are closely parallel.

Both Hebrews and Philippians use athletic terms:--

"Ye endured a great fight of (athlesis) of afflictions" (Heb. x. 32).

"Striving together (sunathleo) for the faith of the gospel" (Phil. i. 27).

"Help those women which laboured (sunathleo) with me in the gospel" (Phil. iv. 3).

There is a parallel also between Heb. xiii. 21 and Phil. i. 6, and between Heb. xiii. 21 and Phil. ii. 13:--

"Make you perfect in every good work to do His will" (Heb. xiii. 21).

"He which hath begun a good work in you will perform it until the day of Jesus Christ" (Phil. i. 6).

"Working in you that which is well pleasing in His sight" (Heb. xiii. 21).

"For it is God which worketh in you both to will and to do of His good pleasure" (Phil. ii. 13).

There is a number of other minor details which we omit here, but which the reader may discover, all of which help to increase the total evidence and make the parallel too complete to be ignored.

(To be concluded).

1. (concluded).
The scope of Philippians seen in its parallel with the epistle to the Hebrews.
pp. 230 - 232

We conclude with one more parallel which lies near the very heart of Philippians, namely, the "out-resurrection":--

> "If by any means I may attain unto the out-resurrection, out from the dead ones" (Phil. iii. 11).
> "Therefore leaving . . . . . not laying again; and others were tortured, not accepting deliverance, that they might obtain a better resurrection . . . . . these all died in faith, not having received the promise, God having provided some better thing for us, that they without us should not be made perfect . . . . . and to the spirits of just men made perfect" (Heb. xi. 35, 40, xii. 23).

Heb. xi. 35 makes it abundantly clear that the "better resurrection" which was "obtained" was in the nature of a recognition of willing suffering for the Lord, and the special mention of the spirits of "perfected righteous ones" is associated with the "first-born", and the contrast with Esau's temporizing. These all contribute to the very evident parallel.

The "out-resurrection" of Phil. iii. is not the hope of the church, but is an added prize. The hope of the church can neither be lost nor won. Just as the revelation of the heavenly city is something over and above the inheritance revealed in Genesis, so the "out-resurrection" is the means of attaining to some "better thing" for those who have diligently followed on unto perfection.

We set out the parallel between the two epistles as follows:--

Need we repeat that Hebrews does not minister to the church which is the body of Christ? What we have learned is that there is a parallel in the ways of God with His redeemed people, whether they are members of the bride or the body, the kingdom or the church. And as the principle of Hebrews has been so fully developed, it is necessary that we should acquaint ourselves with it, so that we shall perceive the true place which Philippians has in regard to the church.

The hope of the church cannot be taught from Philippians. There is no room for the words, "If by any means I might attain" in connection with our blessed hope. Philippians deals with those things which accompany salvation, and is therefore rightly associated with a prize, with pursuing, with examples.

Here for the moment we must stay. We hope to give further notes on this important theme, and to analyse, with some degree of fullness, the important words that are translated, "the resurrection of the dead", "this vile body" and other related expressions.

To some, this article and its fellows may seem devoid of "life" and spiritual application. This we leave to the Lord Himself, our part being to put the Word of truth in as clear a light as grace will permit, and to look to God to give the increase.

PREFACES to PRAYER.
pp. 170 - 172

It is the custom in most meetings to "open with prayer", and this is well, for it manifests the sense of dependence that all should feel. It expresses the utter need of the Lord's guidance, teaching and blessing, without which service is vain, and it does, or should, bring every heart into loyal and loving subjection to the Lord of life and glory, that from unfeigned lips may ascend the prayer: "Speak, Lord, for Thy servant heareth."

There have been occasions, however, when it has been felt that those who were engaging in prayer needed some check, some anchor, some leading, and it will often be found a great help if, before prayer is actually made, some portion of the Scriptures be read which shall steady and direct the thoughts in a true and right channel.

It may help some of our readers who have the responsibility of meetings if we briefly record one or two passages of Scripture which we have used when circumstances seemed to call for such assistance.

Phil. i. 1-21.

(a) Verse 6.—God will "finish". Remember this promise; it will modify any tendency to undue anxiety. We start with a consciousness of God and His faithfulness.

(b) Verse 7.—This promise of verse 6 is not incompatible with our responsibility. We have a blessed privilege as fellow-workers of God.

(c) Verse 9.—The actual prayer of the apostle is enlightening. Do we in our measure pray in a similar wisdom and spirit?

(d) Verses 12-18.—Notice the spirit of Paul, and his one ground of rejoicing—"notwithstanding, every way, Christ is preached."

(e) Verses 19, 20.—How Paul expected answer to prayer: (1) Your prayer, (2) The Lord's supply, (3) My expectation.

Psalm lxxiii.

To catch the sense, translate the words "Truly", "Verily", and "Surely" of verses 1, 13 and 18, by the colloquial, "After all". Verse 1 is only to be learned "in the sanctuary" (verse 17). Note the change in point of view (verses 3-12, and 24-26). Prayer can lead us into this sanctuary experience.

Phil. iv. 5-7.

(a) Moderation means "yieldingness", if such a word is permissible. This quality must not of course be shown in stewardship—in such a capacity we may yield nothing, "no, not for an hour". But in the matter of our own rights and liberties we can afford to let much go for the sake of Christ and His people, as did Paul.

(b) Prayer is not worry, it is a committal to God.

(c) God assures one answer to every true prayer: "The peace of God . . . . . shall garrison your hearts and minds."

Psalm lxi.

(a) What is prayer?	It is a cry.
(b) Where may I pray?	From the ends of the earth.
(c) When may I pray?	When heart is overwhelmed.
(d) What shall I say?	Lead me to Christ; higher than I.
(e) What is my assurances?	Thou hast been . . . . . I will trust.

Numb. vii. 89.

> "And when Moses was gone into the tabernacle of the congregation to speak with Him, then He heard the voice of one speaking with him from off the mercy seat that was upon the ark of the testimony, from between the two cherubim: and he spoke unto Him."

The basis of prayer is the offering of Christ, for without the "sacrifice of peace offerings" of verse 88, Moses would not have drawn near. Since "He is our peace" we have "access" (Eph. ii. 14-18).

The association of prayer is the recognition of "all saints". It was in "the tabernacle of the congregation". The goal of prayer is the same as the symbolic teaching of the cherubim "from between the two cherubim". This of course must be learned from Scripture. The cherubim at the gate of the garden of Eden, on the mercy seat, leaving and returning with the glory of the Lord, as described by Ezekiel, and present during the book of the Revelation, where the A.V. calls them "the four beasts", are pledges of the restoration of man and his lost dominion. "We see not yet all things put under him (Adam, Psa. viii.), but we see Jesus." These features being present and recognized, the prayers of the Lord's people will be less likely to wander and miss their mark.

Eph. ii. 16, 18, 22; iii. 1, 14 and 17.

> "That He might reconcile both unto God in one body by the cross."
> "Through Him we both have access by one Spirit unto the Father."
> "In Whom ye are also builded together for an habitation of God in Spirit. For this cause . . . . . I bow my knees unto the Father . . . . . that Christ may dwell in your hearts by faith."

The idea in selecting these verses is that of personal realization of what is already ours in Christ. The passage before us suggests this in two ways. First, taking Eph. ii. 16 and 18. What has been already accomplished through the cross of Christ is the reconciliation of the church in one body to God. What awaits the individual response is the access of each reconciled member in one Spirit to the Father. The corresponding terms, "reconcile" and "access", "body" and "spirit", "God" and "Father" tell their own story. Secondly, the same truth is given point in Eph. ii. 22, iii. 1, 14 and 17.

The believers of this dispensation are being built together as the dwelling place of God, therefore the apostle prayed that the individual member of that temple should himself attain unto some experimental acquaintance with such a privilege and realize, by faith, the dwelling of Christ also in the heart. In both examples, the idea of being merely content with what is true of the mass is seen to be insufficient for full robust Christian profession.

The above are a few passages that have been used before meetings. Each servant will of course use those scriptures which fit the occasion. The above are but examples that may illustrate a possible course where a steadying of those gathered seems necessary.

"Take heed you words and turn to the Lord" (Hos. xiv. 2).

The Epistle to the Romans.

#22. The promise versus the law (iii. 30 - iv. 25). pp. 4 – 9

In Rom. iii. 31 the apostle meets the charge of making void the law through faith. He now retorts, with effect, that law and works make faith void and the promise of none effect (iv. 14).

Our study will largely be the relation of promise to law. In the first place let us take note what is said concerning the promise of God:--

> "The promise that he should be heir of the world was not to Abraham or to his seed, through the law, but through the righteousness of faith" (Rom. iv. 13).
>
> "For if they which are of the law be heirs is made void, and the promise made of none effect" (Rom. iv. 14).
> "Therefore it is of faith that it might be by grace, to the end the promise might be sure to all the seed" (Rom. iv. 16).
> "Being fully persuaded that what He had promised, He was able also to perform" (Rom. iv.21).

We see here certain important connections. The promise is essentially associated with inheritance, but not by the operation of law, for this is contrary to both faith and promise. The reason why faith is the principle is that the whole may be by grace, and grace and works of law cannot agree. The fact that the promise rests on the principle of grace and faith, and not works of law, makes it sure, and at the last the certainty of the promise is derived not from the faith of the believer, but the faithfulness of the Promiser. In this group of passages promise, grace and faith are ranged against law, instability and works.

The next group is found in Rom. ix.:--

> "To whom pertain the adoption . . . . . and the promises" (verse 4).
>
> "They which are the children of the flesh, these are not the children of God; but the children of the promise are counted for the seed" (verse 8).
>
> "For this is the word of promise, At this time will I come, and Sarah shall have a son" (verse 9).

The relation of adoption to promise is clearly established by the structure of the passage.

Romans ix. 3-5.

A | According to the flesh.—Brethren.
B | Who are Israelites.
C | To whom pertaineth the ADOPTION.
D | And the glory.
E | And the covenants.
E | And the giving of the law.
D | And the service of God.
C | And the PROMISES.
B | Whose are the fathers.
A | As concerning the flesh, Christ came.

The reason for this connection will more easily be appreciated after we have seen the teaching of Galatians. The other references repudiates the flesh. This is the item added to those already seen in Rom. iv.

The third group of passages is found in Galatians:--

> "Christ has redeemed us from the curse of the law . . . . . that the blessing of Abraham might come on the Gentiles through Jesus Christ, that we might receive the promise of the spirit through faith" (Gal. iii. 13, 14).
>
> "Now to Abraham and his seed were the promises made" (Gal. iii. 16).
>
> "This I say, that the covenant, that was confirmed before of God in Christ, the law, which was four hundred and thirty years after, cannot disannul that it should make the promise of none effect. For if the inheritance be of the law it is no more of promise: but God gave it to Abraham by promise . . . . . the law . . . . . was added . . . . . till the seed should come to whom the promise was made" (Gal. iii. 17-19).
>
> "Is the law against the promise of God? Let it not be! The Scripture hath concluded all under sin that the promise by faith of Jesus Christ might be given unto them that believe" (Gal. iii. 21, 22).
>
> "If ye be Christ's then are ye Abraham's seed and heirs according to the promise" (Gal. iii. 29).
>
> "Abraham had two sons, the one by a bondmaid, the other by a free woman, but he who was after the bondwoman was born after the flesh; but he of the freewoman was by promise . . . . . these are the two covenants" (Gal. iv. 22-24).
> "Now we, brethren, as Isaac was, are the children of promise" (Gal. iv. 28).

The theme in this group is related to the covenant, and upon examination the following items come to light. The law has a curse, and is therefore quite contrary to the blessing of Abraham. The latter is related to the promise of the Spirit through faith. This is a partial answer to the question of Gal. iii. 3: "Received ye the Spirit by the works of the law, or by the hearing of faith?" The remaining references are to be understood in the light of the Greek law of adoption in force in Galatia at the time the epistle was written. The existence of this law and its application is not within the range of pure exegesis, and under God we owe the knowledge of its bearing upon the theme to the research of Sir William Ramsay, D.C.L. The following is a condensation of his remarks upon the passage in Gal. iii.

A man's will, diatheke (Gal. iii. 15-18).

An illustration from the ordinary laws of society, as they existed in Galatian cities, is here used: "I speak after the manner of men." While diatheke in other places refers to the covenant, old or new, here, "after the manner of men", it refers to the Galatian will.

The word is often found in this sense in the inscriptions. Paul speaks of this will as though it were irrevocable, and it is this difficulty that has made the commentators on the passage reject, almost unanimously, the sense implied by the figure of a will. They do not try to determine what was the nature of a will among the Galatians, but assume that it was much the same as it is to-day. Here, however, we are confronted with a legal idea that the duly executed will cannot be revoked by a subsequent act of the testator. Such irrevocability was a characteristic feature of Greek law. The appointment of an heir was the adoption and was irrevocable. The testator, after adopting an heir, could not subsequently take away from him his share in the inheritance or impose new conditions on his succession.

Sir William Ramsay gives an array of proofs which we do not here stay to quote. We pass on rather to the bearing of the law on the argument of Gal. iii. If, says the apostle, a man's will among you is unalterable and never changed by circumstances that may come about later, how much more God's Will!

> "And this I say, that the covenant, that was confirm before of God in Christ, the law which was four hundred and thirty years after cannot disannul, that it should make the promise of none effect" (Gal. iii. 17).

Under the law, the heir and lord of all is likened to a child under tutors and governors, but when the time arrives for him to enter into his possessions, he reaches his "adoption". Now let us put together the two references to redemption that come on either side of this argument concerning the covenant, promise and the law:--

> "Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law . . . . . that the blessing of Abraham might come on the Gentiles through Jesus Christ; that we might receive the promise of the Spirit through faith" (Gal. iii. 13, 14).
> "God sent His Son . . . . . to redeem them that were under the law, that we might receive the adoption . . . . . God hath sent forth the Spirit of His Son into your hearts, crying, Abba, Father" (Gal. iv. 4-6).

All dispute as to the meaning of "the promise of the Spirit" is settled in the light of this parallelism. "The promise of the Spirit" is "the Spirit of His Son", which is explained in Rom. viii. 15 to be "the Spirit of adoption whereby we cry, Abba, Father". This is placed over against "the spirit of bondage", and so is closely allied to the theme before us.

Faith and the Word.

We now return to Rom. iv., realizing that promise is in an entirely different category from law, works, flesh, and bondage. The introduction of law brings about instability, for the law worketh wrath where the flesh is concerned. Faith is always associated with grace: "Therefore it is of faith, that it might be by grace." Grace alone can make anything sure, for the flesh of man is weak and untrustworthy. "To the end the promise may be sure." Let us not omit the place that the Word has in all this: "Who against hope, believed in hope, that he might become the father of many nations: according to that which was spoken, So shall thy seed be" (Rom. iv. 18). What God had promised, Abraham believed. The same was true of Sarah: "She judge Him faithful who had promised" (Heb. xi. 11).

Again, in Rom. iv. 17 the promise to Abraham is introduced by the words: "As it is written." This is a truth for all time, and cannot be uttered too often, that: "Faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the word of God" (Rom. x. 17).

If we believe.

The apostle draws to a conclusion, telling us that these things were not written for Abraham's sake alone, but for us also "if we believe".

> "The gospel is the power of God to every one that believeth" (Rom. i. 16).
> "The righteousness of God by faith of Jesus Christ is unto all them that believe" (Rom. iii. 22).
> "He is just and the Justifier of him which believeth (is of the faith of) Jesus" (Rom. iii. 26).
> "Abraham believed God and it was counted unto him for righteousness" (Rom. iv. 3).
> "It shall also be counted to us if we believe" (Rom. iv. 24).
> "Christ is the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth" (Rom. x. 4).
> "With the heart man believeth unto righteousness" (Rom. x. 10).
> "Without faith it is impossible to please God" (Heb. xi. 6).
> "Ant they that are in the flesh cannot please God" (Rom. viii. 6).

In addition to the Word, faith is closely associated with resurrection. This is evident in Gen. xv. 6, for the one who believed was "as good as dead". Rom. iv. defines Abraham's faith as faith in "God Who quickeneth the dead". The faith that justifies now is the same:--

> "It shall be imputed, if we believe on Him that raised up Jesus our Lord from the dead" (Rom. iv. 24).
> "If thou shalt believe in thine heart that God hath raised Him from the dead, thou shalt be saved" (Rom. x. 9).

Rom. iv. 4-25 had been one long exposition of Gen. xv. 6. The heads under which this exposition may be profitably studied or brought before others are:--

Gen. xv. 6 in Rom. iv. 4-25.

1. The negative.—How Abraham was not justified.
   (i.) Not by works (Rom. iv. 4-8).
   (ii.) Not be circumcision (Rom. iv. 9-12).
   (iii.) Not by law (Rom. iv. 13-16).
2. The positive.—How Abraham was justified.

(i.) Faith as related to resurrection power of God (iv. 17).
(ii.) Faith as it faced human inability (iv. 19).
(iii.) Faith as it is related to the promise and the word (iv. 17, 18, 20).

3. The personal.—How may I be justified?
(i.) Not for his sake alone. The analogy of Scripture (iv. 23).
(ii.) If we believe. The importance of faith (iv. 24).
(iii.) Raised again for our justification. The place of resurrection in the gospel (iv. 25).

The structural outline of Rom. iv. 17-25 is as follows:--

Rom. iv. 17-25.

A | Faith and resurrection (iv. 17, 18).
a | As it is written.
b | Father of many nations.
c | Before Him Whom he believed.
d | God Who quickeneth the dead.
d | Called things that are not.
c | Against hope believed in hope.
b | Father of many nations.
a | As that which was spoken.
B | Faith and the death of self (iv. 19-21).
g | Now weak in faith.
f | Considered his own body as dead.
f | Also deadness of Sarah's womb.
e | Not stagger through unbelief.
e | Strong in faith (eudunamao).
f | Glory to God.
f | Fully persuaded.
g | Strong to perform (dunatos).
B | The analogy of faith (iv. 22-24).
e | It was imputed to him.
f | Not written for his sake alone.
f | But for us also.
e | It shall be imputed to us.
A | Faith and the purpose of resurrection (iv. 24, 25).
a | Who was delivered.
b | For our offences.
a | And raised again.
b | For our justification.

#23. Boasting in hope of the glory of God (v. 1-11).
pp. 36 – 41

We now approach the closing section of this great opening up of the basic doctrine of the gospel, viz., Justification by faith. The battle for the first important phase of the truth has been fought, and now the blessed fruits are brought to light. Upon the basis of justification by faith the apostle proceeds to show its result in the blessed fruit of the Spirit:--

> "PEACE with God, through our Lord Jesus Christ."
> "ACCESS by faith into grace."
> "STANDING."—"Wherein we stand."
> "HOPE."—"We rejoice in hope of the glory of God."

Fortified therefore by all that this new relationship means, the believer finds new strength. He can even rejoice in tribulation, for he has learned that "all things work together for good, to them that love God". The love of God is shed abroad in his heart, and he begins his first lesson in the school of divine logic: "Much more therefore"; "For if when we were enemies . . . . . much more . . . . ." He begins to taste the blessedness of an ever-present salvation flowing from an ever-living Saviour:--

> "For if, when we were enemies, we were reconciled to God by the death of His Son, much more, being reconciled, we shall be saved by His life" (Rom. v. 10).

Perhaps the most important, or at least the first lesson to learn, is the essential relation between the two states suggested by the verbs "to be", "to have", and "to receive".

> "Therefore BEING justified by faith, we HAVE peace . . . . . we HAVE access" (Rom. v. 1, 2).
> "Much more, BEING reconciled . . . . . we HAVE now received the reconciliation" (Rom. v. 10, 11).

There in MS authority for the R.V. rendering of Rom. v. 1: "Let us have peace with God." If this rendering be accepted, the teaching of the apostle instead of being weakened is strengthened, for he now assumes justification by faith to be establish beyond argument, and is exhorting the believer to press forward and enjoy its fruits. There are a good many reasons, however, for rejecting it, one, that can be followed by most, being the coupling of di'ou kai ("through whom also") with the words ten prosagogen ("we have access"), which would demand the words, "let us have access" for which no MS authority exists. It is truth for which we can never be too grateful that as a result of being justified by faith, we have peace with God, and can well heed the exhortation, "Let us have peace" (experimentally).

Rom. v. 1-11 (the closing portion of this outer section) accomplishes a transition by introducing reconciliation. While it is unwise to generalize, speaking broadly we might say that Rom. i.-iv. deals with the justification of sinners, the transition; Rom. v. 1-11 the reconciliation of enemies; and the inner section, Rom. v. 12 - viii., the emancipation and victory over sin itself. Rom. i.-iv. is the gospel for the sinner; Rom. v.-viii. the gospel for the believer; Rom. v. 1-11, the transition, gathering up the teaching and emphasizing the objective aspect of the death of Christ:--

"Christ died FOR the ungodly" (Rom. v. 6).
"Christ died FOR us" (Rom. v. 8).
"Justified by His blood" (Rom. v. 9).
"Reconciled by the death of His Son" (Rom. v. 10).

When next the death of Christ is brought in, identification with that death is greatly emphasized:-- "Buried with Him by baptism INTO death" (Rom. vi. 4).

"Planted together in the LIKENESS of His death" (Rom. vi. 5).
"If we DIED WITH Christ" (Rom. vi. 8).
"Reckon ye yourselves to be DEAD indeed unto sin" (Rom. vi. 1-11).

It will be seen that a very different doctrine is emphasized in Rom. vi. The recognition of this fact will help us as we consider the teaching of Rom. v. 1-11, the passage now before us.

The structure of Rom. v. 1-11.

It is now time to ascertain the structure of the passage, so that our study may be kept within the true lines of argument. In the "conclusion" of Rom. iii. "boasting" is excluded (iii. 27). In the introduction of Rom. iv. Abraham is found to have no ground of boasting before God. But in the verses before us boasting in the Lord appears three times. As a reference to Phil. iii. 1-3 will show, this is the position of the true circumcision. The structure is as follows:--

Rom. v. 1-11.

A1 | 1, 2. Boasting. | a | In hope.
b | Reconciliation experienced (prosagoge).
B1 | 3-. Not only so.
A2 | -3-10. Boasting. | a | In tribulation.
b | Reconciliation effected (katallasso).
B2 | 11-. Not only so.
A3 | -11. Boasting. | a | In God.
b | Reconciliation received (katallage).

Our study, therefore, will be an enquiry into the ground established in Scripture for this threefold boasting, and in this article the first of the three.

"The hope of glory."

Some change of the greatest moment has taken place in the standing of man before God, for in Rom. iii. 23 it is written of both Jew and Gentile: "All have sinned, and come short of the glory of God", while here it is written that we "rejoice in hope of the glory of God". For an examination of the meaning of "glory" in Rom. iii. 23 and v. 2 we must refer our readers to article #15 of this series. All that we need do here is to remind the reader of the three passages (Rom. iii. 23; iv. 20-22; and v. 2) which form a connected line of teaching:--

1. Man by nature through sin has come short of the glory of God.
2. Abraham by faith that justified gave glory to God.
3. Believers similarly justified rejoice in hope of the glory of God.

Where sin and legal works of the flesh failed to pass the "test", the righteousness of faith is fully accepted. So Rom. v. 1 opens with the fact of justification, and proceeds to develop its fruits.

It is essential that we observe the order of words here: "Being . . . . . we have . . . . . we stand . . . . . we rejoice." "Being" comes first. What we "are" in Christ lies at the root of all we "have" in Him. Peace and access are related together as cause and effect, and both are phases of reconciliation. This is seen by comparing Rom. v. 1-11 with Eph. ii.:--

Romans v.	Ephesians ii.
Boasting only in the Lord.	Not of works, lest any man should boast.
Hope of glory.	Having no hope.
Peace.	He is our peace.
Enemies reconciled.	Enmity slain.
Access.	Access in one Spirit.
Reconciliation.	Reconciled both in one body by cross.

The first result of justification by faith is stated in Rom. v. 1: "We have peace." The English idea conveyed by the word "peace" is not quite the same as that of the Hebrew word shalom or the Greek word eirene. Our first thought concerning peace is "calm", "repose", "tranquility", but God's thought goes deeper and is expressed in Isa. xxxii. 17: "The work of righteousness shall be peace, and the effect of righteousness, quietness and assurance for ever." "Work" here signifies the thing made, and "effect" indicates the service that results from it. The two words "work" and "effect" are used together in Isa. xxviii. 21: "His strange work . . . . . His strange act."

Peace is not quietness, but produces it. The underlying idea of peace is found in the word shalom, which is translated: "be at peace", "finished", "restore", "pay", "recompence", "make good", and "perfect'. The idea is expressed in the one word "completeness". Instead of peace being a mere cessation of hostilities, ready to break out again, it indicates a complete settlement of the issue by restoration, finishing, perfecting. It is the work of righteousness: "Therefore being justified by faith, we have peace with God." Sin with its guilt and condemnation can never again intrude, and the consciousness of this blessed standing leads to "quietness and assurance". Paul, who knew the meaning of Hebrew, could therefore rightly substitute the "bond of perfectness" in Col. iii. for the "bond of peace" in Eph. iv. While their own special meanings they are nevertheless closely allied. The usage of the word "peace" in the Greek Scriptures indicates that it means something more than the absence of strife. It is opposed to kaka = "evil" in Isa. xlv. 7, Jer. xxix. 11. It is also opposed to thlipsis = "tribulation" in Zech. viii. 10; John xvi. 33. In Rom. v., Eph. ii. and Col. i. the usage leads us to see that it indicates:--

> "The new relationship between man and God brought about by the atonement (reconciliation)."—Cremer.

The word "with" in the expression "peace with God" is not meta = "in association with", implying something held in common, or para = "by the side of", but pros = "towards", implying that God is the great object before the renewed mind, which is reaching out for fullest fellowship. It is the word used by John in that glorious passage: "The Word was with God"; not only "with" in the sense of place, but "with" in the completeness of personal choice and agreement.

Pros reappears in the word "access" of Rom. v. 2, where the original reads prosagoge. Peter has expressed similar truth in I Pet. iii. 18: "For Christ also hath once suffered for sins, the just for the unjust, that He might bring us (prosago) to God." Here, righteousness provided by the great sacrifice of Christ is the procuring cause of this "access". So in Heb. x. the perfect acceptance of the believer because, of the one sacrifice offered for sins for ever, leads to "boldness to enter into the holiest by the blood of Jesus".

The access of Rom. v. is "into this grace wherein we stand". The believer's "standing" is no longer in Adam, but in Christ, no longer in law, but in grace, and because of the fulness of the Saviour's work, and the grace of God that is his in Christ, he, the erstwhile sinner who had come short of the glory of God, is now enabled to "rejoice upon hope of the glory of God". "In hope" is not exact enough, for in verse 3 we have the expression: "we boast in tribulations also." We need to distinguish the boasting that is resting upon (epi) hope of the glory of God, and that boasting which is in (en) tribulations. There is an allusion here to Abraham, who against hope, on (epi) hope believed" (Rom. iv. 18).

Rom. i. 1 - v. 2 is expressed as follows in the figurative language of the Psalms:--

> "He brought me up also out of an horrible pit, out of the miry clay, and set my feet upon a rock, and established my goings. And He hath put a new song in my mouth, even praise unto our God" (Psa. xl. 2, 3).
> "Therefore, being justified by faith, we have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ: by Whom also we have access by faith into this grace wherein we stand, and boast upon hope of the glory of God" (Rom. v. 1, 2).

Here is our ground of boasting, here is our "standing", here is our "introduction" (as access has been translated); here is peace, the completely finished thing. Not one word has been uttered of experiences; all rests upon Christ and the grace of God. Not until this has been established does anything experimental come into view. Only the one who is rejoicing upon hope can rejoice in tribulations also.

The second boasting of the structure must next be examined. Meanwhile let us not forget that those who have been thus "made nigh" should "draw near", and let us glory in the completeness of our acceptance in Christ which gives us "boldness and access with confidence by the faith of Him" (Eph. iii. 12).

#24. Patience and proof (v. 1-11).
pp. 78 – 83

To quote, detachedly, the words of Rom. v. 3, "we glory in tribulations", is to misrepresent Scripture: at the very least we must go on to say, "we glory in tribulations also". No sane man boasts in tribulations for their own sake; this boasting depends upon the earlier one:--

> "We boast on hope of the glory of God."
> "We boast in tribulations also."

The hope is our foundation and rock upon which we stand secure. Tribulation is but an environment, the storm that tests but never moves us from our strong tower.

In II Cor. xii. 9 Paul says that he boasts in his infirmities, but again such a statement, apart from its context, does not convey the truth. Paul was not a man who nursed his misery, who was only happy when he was ill or sad; the context reveals the reason of his strange boast:--

> "He said unto me, MY grace is sufficient for thee; for My strength is made perfect in weakness. Most gladly therefore will I rather boast in my infirmities, that the power of Christ may rest upon me."

In Rom. iv. 18 hope resting upon the flesh is placed over against hope that trusts in the God that quickeneth the dead: "Who against hope believed on hope." In Rom. v. we start with hope securely fixed in the grace of God, and then, by tribulation and trial, make that hope experimentally ours. "We boast on hope of the glory of God . . . . . tribulations . . . . . patience . . . . . experience . . . . . hope." Hope is depicted as an anchor, and the storms of tribulations test and prove that true hope "enters into that within the veil" (Heb. vi. 19). An anchored ship stems the current; the unanchored ship drifts.

Tribulation.

It will be necessary to survey the teaching of Scripture as to tribulation. Thlipsis is translated "tribulation", "affliction", "persecution", etc., and comes from a word meaning to squeeze or press. The contrast between tribulation and peace, seen in the two aspects of teaching in Rom. v., are found in John xvi. 33: "in Me ye might have peace. In the world ye shall have tribulation."

Affliction, or tribulation, accompanying the reception of the Word is an indication of the election of God: "Knowing, brethren beloved, your election of God, for our gospel came not unto you in word only . . . . . having received the Word in much affliction, with joy of the Holy Ghost" (I Thess. i. 4-6).

Tribulation because of the Word is a test: "Yet hath he not root in himself, but dureth for a while: for when tribulation or persecution ariseth because of the Word, immediately he is offended" (Matt. xiii. 21).

Tribulation will never be allowed to separate the believer from his Lord: "Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? Shall tribulation . . . . .? Nay, in all these things we are more than conquerors through Him that loved us" (Rom. viii. 35-37).

Tribulation, if endured in a true Christian spirit, appears light, for it has a real relation with the glory yet to be: "For our light affliction, which is but for a moment, worketh for us a far more exceeding, age-abiding, weight of glory, while we look not at the things which are seen' (II Cor. iv. 17, 18).

Tribulation, being a part of the appointed process of Christian development, should not move us: "That no man should be moved by these afflictions: for yourselves know that we are appointed thereto" (I Thess. iii. 3).

Rom. xii. 12 says: "Rejoicing in hope; patient in tribulation." Just as Heb. xii. declares that chastening and discipline are the necessary accompaniment of true sonship, and that though, for the time being, discipline seemeth "not joyous, but grievous, nevertheless afterward it yieldeth the peaceable fruit of righteousness unto them which are exercised thereby", so Rom. v. shows that, though tribulation may come as a test to the believer who is justified by faith, yet it will work patience and give proof that shall establish him in this blessed position of grace and acceptance. Just as II Cor. iv. 17 tells us that affliction works out for us a weight of glory, so Rom. v. 3 tells us that tribulation works out patience.

Patience and proof.

Patience is closely connected with hope. The well-known prayer in I Thess. i. 3 comes to mind immediately: "Your work of faith, and labour of love, and patience of hope in our Lord Jesus Christ." Just as "faith without works is dead, being alone", so hope without patience becomes barren and fruitless. The man who has the blessed hope in his heart will not be so concerned with the ups and downs of life. Gains or losses, success or failure, that would have meant so much while unsaved, now become, relatively, of small consequence.

By comparing Rom. v. 3 with James i. 3 we get light upon both tribulation and patience:--

> "Knowing that tribulation worketh patience."
> "Knowing that the trying of your faith worketh patience."

The passage in James sheds light on another part of Rom. v.: "Patience works experience." Now the word "experience" is dokime, and the word "trying" is dokimion, which indicates that there is a process of testing going on all the way. Tribulation, when it tests faith and finds it true, works patience. Patience, when it is tested, manifests this proof and leads on to experimental appreciation of that hope which is ours already, by grace.

Peter expresses similar truth in his first epistle, chapter i. 2-9. There, as in Romans, is the "living hope through the resurrection of Jesus Christ". There, too, is the hope of glory, "an inheritance incorruptible . . . . . reserved in heaven for you". There, again, are accompanying trials, "for a season, if need be", and these manifold temptations are "that the trial (dokimion) of your faith, being much more precious than of gold that perisheth, by means of fire being tried (dokimazo), may be found unto praise and honour and glory (doxa) at the revelation of Jesus Christ". Here another item of truth is added, the words "trial", dokimion, and "glory", doxa, being allied.

The teaching of Rom. v., then, may be expressed in some such terms as these:--

> "By being justified by faith through Christ, you have a perfect standing, and, in Him, you can even boast upon the hope of a full approval after the most searching test of God (doxa). Let not this future acceptableness be wasted, let it have its full effect now upon your life and service. Tribulation and the trial of faith will be like fire that tries gold, and the experimental proof (dokime) thus made will produce in you a blessed assurance."

There is, however, no false introspection advocated here. We are to be thankful for the trial that reveals the true gold, but we are not to look to experiences to justify us before God. When we do look within it is to see, not self, but "the love of God shed abroad": not the work of the flesh, but the fruit of the work of "the Holy Ghost which is given unto us." This is the spirit of sonship, as we shall learn later. The believer who thus has the answer of a good conscience, and who sees the fruit of the spirit, "faith, love, patience" (I Tim. vi. 11; II Tim. iii. 10; Titus ii. 2) is nevertheless brought back swiftly and surely to the great foundation of all his hope, and is once again told, uncompromisingly, that this whole standing is in grace, is by pure, unmerited, favour. So it is that, immediately following this experimental passage, we read: "For when we were yet without strength, in due time Christ died for us", and the argument proceeds to a double "much more":--

> "Much more, being justified by His blood, we shall be saved from wrath through Him."
> "Much more, being reconciled, we shall be saved by His life."

The one great basis.

Readers who have the volume entitled The Apostle of the Reconciliation will find the structure of Rom. v. 6-10 set out in it on page 205. We set it out afresh here, omitting some detail in the last member, in order that the contrast between the "scarcely" and "peradventure" of man's love may be the better contrasted with the "much more" of the love of God. We make this comment lest any reader should be disturbed at finding an apparent difference in the two structures. We may here state that we shall not hesitate to modify, alter, or extend any published structure, as closer search reveals clearer outlines, and we are sure that our readers will appreciate the Berean spirit actuating this purpose.

Rom. v. 3-10.

A | 3-6. | a | God's love shed abroad.
b | YET without strength.
c | Christ died for ungodly.
B | 7. Scarcely. \ Man's attitude to "righteous"
Peradventure. / and "good".
A | 8. | a | God's love commended.
b | YET sinners.
c | Christ died for us.
B | 9, 10. Much more. \ God's attitude to "enemies"
Much more. / and "reconciled".

This passage is often made the basis of a gospel address to the unsaved, and it is truly a blessed message of saving grace, but what we want to remember here is that it was primarily written by the apostle to those who were already justified and saved. They are reminded that when they were yet without strength, Christ died for them, and that if they have "begun in the spirit, they are not now to be perfected in the flesh" (Gal. iii. 3). They were received by Christ as they were, "sinners and ungodly", "without strength" and "enemies". Here there can be no room for the flesh or its distinctions.

The apostle has this fact in mind, when, having disposed of the "doubtful disputations" that arose solely from fleshly distinctions, he says: "Wherefore receive ye one another, as Christ also received us to the glory of God" (Rom. xv. 6, 7), and this "glory of God" is, by Rom. v. 2 and 3, seen to be the "hope of the glory of God". "Now the God of the hope fill you with all joy and peace in believing" (Rom. xv. 13).

The love of God, as "poured out" and "commended", which enters into the argument of Romans for the first time in chapter v., is in view right through the heights and depths of doctrine in chapters vii. & viii., and emerges once more, when the very foundations have been laid bare, in the glorious burst of praise.

> "Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? Shall tribulation? (the very argument of Rom. v.). Nothing shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord" (Rom. viii. 35-39).

Between these two utterances we are to plumb the depths of original sin, and creature failure. We are to hear uttered, in almost the same breath, "O wretched man that I man" and "There is therefore now no condemnation", but the great basis of all our hope remains the same, viz., "Christ died for us". We may learn more of what that death involves as we read Rom. vi., but at the end we still "look off unto Jesus" rather than look within.

Rom. v. prepares us for Rom. viii. in this, that it speaks of a salvation not only through the death of Christ, but "by His life", which truth finds it echo in the glorious words of Rom. viii. 34: "Christ that died, yea rather, that is risen again, Who is even at the right hand of God, Who also maketh intercession for us."

There is a descending scale in the description of sinners in Rom. v. 6-10 that is instructive. Four titles are used, two being negative, saying what men are not, or have not, and two being positive, expressing what they are in nature and practice:--

Negative.	\	WITHOUT strength.—To save self.
	/	Ungodly.—To serve God.
Positive.	\	Sinners.—by nature.
	/	Enemies.—In practice.

For all men, in all their needs, without making any distinctions, Christ died. Their justification is in His blood, their salvation by His death and risen life, their reconciliation through the death of God's Son.

Reconciliation.

It is here that the transition between Rom. i.-iv. and Rom. v. 12 - viii. is effected. We pass on from the justification and forgiveness of sinners and ungodly to the reconciliation of enemies and the victory over sin and death.

This must be our theme when next we deal with this wonderful epistle.

#25. The reconciliation received (v. 1-11).
pp. 118 – 122

We must now give our attention to the teaching of Rom. v. on the subject of reconciliation, and as a preface to the study we must obtain a scriptural understanding of (1) the meaning of the different words translated "reconciliation"; and (2) the associations of the doctrine of reconciliation. The following Greek words enter into the make-up of the word considered: katallasso, apokatallasso, katallage, allasso and allos. The root of the word is allos, which means "other", and indicates a change. Allasso is translated "change", as follows:--

ALLASSO.—
"Change the customs" (Acts vi. 14).
"Changed the glory" (Rom. i. 23).
"We shall be changed" (I Cor. xv. 51, 52).

As can be seen by the three examples given, the word indicates a change of a very radical kind. The change from law to grace was profound; the changing of the glory of God to the likeness of animals was a terrible departure; while the changing of the body at the resurrection is beyond our understanding.

KATALLASSO.—
"Enemies reconciled . . . . . being reconciled" (Rom. v. 10).
"Reconciled to her husband" (I Cor. vii. 11).
"God hath reconciled us" (II Cor. v. 18).
"God was in Christ reconciling" (II Cor. v. 19).
"Be ye reconciled to God" (II Cor. v. 20).

KATALLAGE.—
"The atonement" (Rom. v. 11).
"The reconciling of the world" (Rom. xi. 15).
"The word of reconciliation" (II Cor. v. 18, 19).

APOKATALLASSO.—
"Reconcile the both" (Eph. ii. 16).
"Reconcile all things" (Col. i. 20).
"You . . . . . hath He reconciled" (Col. i. 21).

The translation of katallage by "atonement" in the A.V. is confusing, for the number of occurrences of the word in the O.T. has already fixed its meaning. There its corresponds to the word translated "propitiation" in Rom. iii. 25. It is safe to say that no one can receive the "atonement" in the O.T. sense of the word, for that propitiation was offered to God, not man. The reconciliation flows out of the atonement or propitiation, and this is the meaning of Rom. v. 11. The R.V. has corrected the error, reading: "through Whom we now received the reconciliation."

This matter is so close to the heart of the gospel that we would be at pains not to be misunderstood. Because for the truth's sake we prefer the translation "reconciliation" to "atonement", let no one miscontrue our motives into a denial of the atonement of the Lord Jesus Christ. That atonement so fully and carefully set forth in O.T. type is assured in its N.T. reality by the word translated "propitiation", which comes to us from the Greek version of the O.T. The blood of bulls and goats never took away sin or touched the conscience. The blood of Christ has "covered by canceling", and has made the one and only true atonement for our sins. The reader is directed to the series entitled Redemption in previous volumes for fuller teaching upon this wondrous theme.

Cremer's note on the two words katallasso and apokatallasso is suggestive:--

> "Apo, referring to the state to be left, and kata to the state to be sought after . . . . . katallasso is the setting up of a relationship of peace not before existing; apokatallasso is the restoration of a relationship of peace which has been disturbed; c.f. apokathistemi, apokatorthoo."

Exclusive to Paul.

Of all the N.T. writers, it will be observed that the words katallasso, katallage and apokatallasso are used only by Paul, for to him was committed the fulness of grace that provided for the sinner and the ungodly complete acceptance in Christ. Moreover, to Paul was entrusted that stewardship toward the Gentiles which

(1) Dealt with their alienation from God in Adam, apart from personal sins (Rom. v. 12).
(2) Dealt with their alienation from God as Gentile nations (Rom. i. 8 and xi.).
(3) Dealt with their alienation from God by sins committed (II Cor. v.).
(4) Dealt with the alienation perpetuated by the distinctions of circumcision and uncircumcision, which was abolished in the new man of the mystery (Eph. ii.).
(5) Dealt with the alienation of the whole church of the one body from its destined sphere "in the heavenlies far above principalities and powers" (Col. i.).

The study of the first of these, the reconciliation that set aside the alienation introduced by Adam, lies immediately before us in Rom. v. 12 in the general course of the series. For the moment, therefore, we pass on to consider the remaining four items.

The reconciliation of the Gentile nations as such.

The question of reconciliation takes us back to the days of Abraham. Up to Gen. xi. no one nation was more favoured than another, but in the days of Nimrod and Babel it appears that the nations gave up God by plunging into idolatry, and that God gave up the nations, leaving them to walk in darkness. This is not only taught in Rom. i. 18-32, but in Acts xvii. 30, where the apostle speaks of a period when the nations walked in darkness and ignorance, while Israel had light and law. In Gen. xii. we have the call of Abraham and the promise that of him the Lord would make a great nation. While this had ultimate Gentile blessing in view, it operated for the time in restricting the purpose of God to Israelitish channels, and as Israel came into prominence and favour the Gentile nations lapsed more and more into ignorance. This aspect of truth is treated at some length in Volume XVII, page 129.

Just as the giving of the nations coincided with the taking up of Israel, so, in its turn, the reconciling of the nations is made known as Israel fall into ignorance and are set aside: "For if the casting away of them (Israel) be the reconciling of the world, what shall the receiving of them (Israel) be, but life from the dead?" (Rom. xi. 15). This is the reconciliation viewed nationally.

The reconciliation of the Gentile viewed as sinners.

"So that, if any man be in Christ, there is a new creation; old things have passed away; behold, it has become new! Yet all things are of that God Who is reconciling us to Himself through Christ, and is giving us the ministry of the reconciliation (same word as 'atonement' in Rom. v. 11); how that God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto Himself, not reckoning their offences to them, and placing in us the word of reconciliation. On behalf of Christ, therefore, are we ambassadors for Christ, as if God were beseeching through us, we pray on behalf of Christ, Be ye reconciled to God. For Him Who knew no sin, on behalf of us He made (to be) sin, in order that we might become (the) righteousness of God in Him" (II Cor. v. 17-21).

These words are a great depth: they must either be studied with some measure of fulness, or left in all their grace. For our present purpose they speak for themselves, and the parallels with Rom. iv. that suggest themselves will be sufficient comment.

The full reconciliation as pertaining to the mystery.

The word apokatallasso is reserved for the revelation of the mystery. Eph. ii. establishes the complete and full agreement between every member of the body of Christ by totally destroying all fleshly distinctions and creating one new man in Christ. This church is reconciled to God in one body, complete and perfect. Col. i. brings reconciliation to its goal, by the final adjustment of the church of the one body in the new creation, with its heavenly associates—the principalities, powers, and invisible yet mighty dwellers in the super-heavenlies.

If Rom. v. speaks of boasting in the hope of the glory of God, Col. i. overwhelms us with it. There, as in Rom. v., aliens and enemies are fully reconciled. "The access" of Rom. v. is filled out to the full in Eph. ii. 18, iii. 12. The "grace wherein we stand" of Rom. v. is eclipsed by the "meetness for the inheritance of the saints in the light", and the presentation of the reconciled believer "holy, and blameless, and irreproachable, in His presence" is a marvelous expansion of the believer's perfect standing in Christ. The hope of glory of Rom. v. finds its echo in Christ, "the hope of glory", in Col. i. 27. Just as tribulations are closely associated with access and reconciliation in Rom. v., so we find them in Col. i. 24: "I now rejoice in my sufferings for you, and am filling up the remainder of the tribulations of Christ in my flesh, on behalf of His body, which is the church."

Paul's apostleship to the Gentiles is first of all indicated in Gal. i. & ii., and II Cor. xi. & xii. The stress upon Abraham and the Gentile in Galatians and Romans shows the reconciliation in progress. A great preparation for its acceptance is made in I Corinthians, followed by its proclamation in II Corinthians, and it underlies the whole of the teaching in the epistle to the Romans, which we summarize as follows:--

Romans and reconciliation.

(1) RECONCILIATION AND THE NATIONS.
Rom. i. 18-32 shows the Gentiles' utter need. Rom. iii. 29, 30 shows the leveling effect of the gospel, and Rom. xi. 15 the reconciliation in its dispensational character.

(2) RECONCILIATION AND THE LAW.
The presence of the law, and its connection with the old covenant and works of the flesh, emphasized fleshly distinctions as between circumcision and uncircumcision, and barred reconciliation (Rom. iii. 10-20; iv. 15; v. 20; vii. 7).

(3) RECONCILIATION AND PRACTICE.
The acceptance of the Gentiles by God is seen in Rom. xv. 16, and, in turn, their acceptance by believing Hebrews is prayed for in Rom. xv. 30, 32. All were to be received as Christ had received them, so that with "one mouth" both Jewish and Gentile believers might glorify God" (Rom. xv. 6, 7).

(4) RECONCILIATION AND THE SECRETS.

The secret of Rom. xvi. does not refer to Eph. iii., but to the inner teaching of Rom. v. 12 - viii. The relationship of Adam to the race provides a type of the relationship of Christ to the race, and leads on as a direct result of the reconciliation of Rom. v. 11: "We have now received the reconciliation"; "Much more being reconciled, we shall be saved by His life" (Rom. v. 10, 11).

Reconciliation operates now, as a basis, not a goal in itself. Reconciliation is to be received, to be enjoyed, as the ambassador beseeches us to be reconciled to God. The reconciliation of the world came into operation when the national privileges and distinctions of Israel passed away, but it must not be confused with the resulting blessings that have come in its train. There is "much more" than reconciliation.

If we have received this reconciliation, we have entered into peace with God. No sin is reckoned against us. We have become the righteousness of God in Christ; before us is the hope of glory, and for our present and continuous salvation He Who died for us now lives for us. The argument of Rom. v. 10 is echoed in Rom. viii. 31, 32:--

"For if, when we were enemies, we were reconciled to God by the death of His Son, much more, being reconciled, we shall be saved by His life" (Rom. v. 10).

"What shall we then say to these things? If God for us, who can be against us? He that spared not His own Son, but delivered Him up for us all, how shall He not with Him also freely give us all things?" (Rom. viii. 31, 32).

#26. Adam and Christ (v. 12-21).
pp. 155 – 158

We now enter the great central section of this epistle, and deal with that revelation of the mystery which was kept secret since age-times (Rom. xvi. 25). We leave behind the question of sins for the deeper question of sin, the disobedience to the law of Sinai for the one transgression of the garden of Eden. Moses and Abraham fade from view, and Adam is revealed as the channel of sin and death and its dominion. Here we are to learn the utter ruin of the creature as something deeper than the failure of the Gentile under the law of conscience, or of the Jew under the law of Moses. Here we shall plumb the depths of the depravity of our nature, here we shall come face to face with the dread fact that in our flesh dwelleth no good thing. This is a more terrible revelation than that of Rom. iii. 12. There we read that there is none that doeth good; here we are to learn that, apart from deeds altogether, there is none that is good or that has any hope or possibility, in himself, of pleasing God.

The cry of Rom. vii. 24: "O wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" will startle us, as though we heard the echo of our own heart's cry beat back to us. One great dominant theme runs through Rom. v. 12 - viii. 39, and this may expressed in the language of Rom. viii. 2: "For the law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus hath made me free from the law of sin and death." Our studies will reveal what is the nature and effect of this law of sin and death, and what is the nature and effect of this law of the spirit of life. The one we shall see is derived from Adam, the first man, the other comes alone from Christ as the last Adam, and the second Man. Both of these titles of Christ belong to Him in resurrection triumph, and lead up to the words: "The sting of death is sin; and the strength of sin is the law, but thanks be to God, which giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ" (I Cor. xv. 56, 57).

Here, in this quotation of I Cor. xv. is written the first summary of Rom. v. 12 - viii. 39. Rom. v. 12-21 shows that by one man sin entered into the world and death by sin—"The sting of death is sin." Rom. vi.-viii. proclaims that sin shall not have dominion over those who are not under the law, but under grace, and that the law hath dominion over a man as long as he liveth, which dominion can be broken only by death and resurrection—"The strength of sin is the law." Rom. vii. ends in the cry for deliverance, which is answered, in Rom. viii., by the law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus, the spirit of sonship, whereby we cry Abba, Father, the present intercession of Christ—"saved by His life"—ending with the triumphant words, "more than conquerors", echoing I Cor. xv. 57: "Thanks be to God, which giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ."

We enter, therefore, upon the study of Rom. v. in no unchastened spirit of curiosity. Too often the deep things revealed in Rom. v. have been abused by immature reasonings concerning election and predestination, all of which partake somewhat of the spirit of rebellion rather than humility. Here we are going to be told simple facts, not the underlying principles hidden in the heart of God. And yet, in His condescension, Rom. v. 12 does open with a revelation of the grace that included all in Adam that they may be included in Christ. This gracious purpose is found in the words of Rom. v. 12: "Wherefore as" (Dis touto hosper). Dia touto means "because of this", "on this account", and is translated "wherefore" in Eph. i. 15 and vi. 13, where the connection with that which goes before is obvious.

The Ephesian saints were sealed until the redemption of the purchased possession, and had the earnest of their inheritance in the spirit of promise. Because of this Paul could pray that they might know what is the hope and the glory of this inheritance, and the power of present anticipation. So in Eph. vi. 13, the wrestling—not being with flesh and blood, but with spiritual wickedness—the necessity for the whole armour of God is introduced by the words, "because of this". In Romans itself dia touto is found in i. 26, xiii. 6, and xv. 9 translated "for this cause", and in iv. 16, "therefore", where the reader will find that the full sense is given by rendering the words each time "because of this". Hosper, "as", is translated "like as" in Rom. vi. 4, and when read with Rom. v. 12 brings into vivid contrast the two chief actors in the scene, Adam and Christ:--

> "As by one man sin entered into the world and death by sin" (Rom. v. 12).
>
> "We are buried with Him by baptism into death, that like as Christ was raised up from the dead by the glory of the Father, even so we also should walk in newness of life" (Rom. vi. 4).

The theme introduced by "as" in Rom. v. 12 is continued in verses 19 and 21:--

> "For as by one man's disobedience" (Rom. v. 19).
> "That as sin hath reigned unto death" (Rom. v. 21).

We now return to Rom. v. 12 and ask why this section is introduced by the word translated "because of this", "like as". The answer is "reconciliation"—the last word of Rom. v. 1-11. Enemies reconciled by the death of Christ, and saved by His life—"because of this reconciliation, as Adam . . . . . so Christ." Because one man's one sin could involve all, in him, in death, so one Man's one act of righteousness could involve all, in Him, in life. That is the simple issue. It is further developed to prove that the work of Christ goes further, and deals with "many offences" as well. Moreover, there is no act of faith in being involved in either Adam's one act, or Christ's one act, but there is, in addition, "the receiving" of the gift and consequent "reigning in life". All this we have yet to see.

Before we go further, however, it will be necessary to have Rom. v. 12-21 before us, as without some guide we shall find the argument very involved. Moreover, it is vital to our peace and victory to see the teaching of this passage with some degree of clearness, and we shall not consider the space ill-used if we give the entire passage instead of the mere outline. It would further complicate this already complicated passage to depart from the A.V. here, or to insert any notes whatever: all this we reserve and subordinate to the one necessity—a survey and large view of Rom. v. 12-21 as a whole.

 * Rom. v. 12-21 (Structure - see next page). * ***

It will be seen that verses 15-17 form a large parenthesis, the theme of verses 12-14 being resumed and restated in verses 18-21. Conybeare and Howson in a note to Rom. v. 12 say:--

> "Much difficulty has been caused to interpreters here by the hosper (which introduces the first member of the parallel) having no answering houtos (nor anything equivalent to it) to introduce the second."

The difficulty vanishes when we perceive by the structure that the argument is restated in verses 18-21, where the needed "even so", that is absent in verses 12-14, is found in its proper place. We shall make fewer exegetical errors and practice a truer humility, if, as our guiding principle, we take the words of Psa. cxix. 128: "I esteem all Thy precepts concerning all things to be right; and I hate every false way."

Rom. v. 12-21.

A | 12-14. | a | "Wherefore, as, through one man, sin entered into the world, and death by sin; and so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned.

b | For until the law sin was in the world: but sin is not imputed when there is no law.

c | Nevertheless, death reigned from Adam to Moses, even over them that had not sinned after the similitude of Adam's transgression, who is the figure of Him that was to come.

B | 15. | d | But not as the offence, so also is the free gift.

e | For if through the offence of one many be dead.

f | Much more the grace of God, and the gift by grace, which is by one Man, Jesus Christ, hath abounded unto many.

B | 16, 17. | d | And not as it was by one that sinned so is the gift for the judgment was by one to condemnation, but the free gift is of many offences unto justification.

e | For if by one man's offence death reigned by one.

f | Much more they which receive abundance of grace and of the gift of righteousness, shall reign in life by one, Jesus Christ.

A | 18-21. | a | Therefore as by the offence of one judgment came upon all men to condemnation: even so by the righteousness of one the free gift came upon all men unto justification of life. For as by one man's disobedience many were made sinners, so by the obedience of one shall many be made righteous.

b | Moreover the law entered, that the offence might abound. But where sin abounded, grace did much more abound.

c | That as sin hath reigned unto death, even so might grace reign through righteousness unto eternal life by Jesus Christ our Lord.

#27. The one man (v. 12).
pp. 196 – 200

The first item of teaching in Rom. v. 12 is contained in the reference to Adam—"By one man." The most casual perusal of the chapter can hardly fail to bring under notice the repetition of this feature, and a careful examination shows that in the ten verses 12-21, there are no less than twelve occurrences of this word "one" in various connections:--

> "By one man sin entered into the world" (Rom. v. 12).
> "If through the offence of one many be dead" (Rom. v. 15).
> "The gift by grace, which is by one man, Jesus Christ" (Rom. v. 15).
> "Not as it was by one that sinned" (Rom. v. 16).
> "The judgment was by one to condemnation" (Rom. v. 16).
> "For if by one man's offence, death reigned by one" (Rom. v. 17).
> "They which receive . . . . . shall reign in life by one" (Rom. v. 17).
> "By the offence of one judgment came upon all men" (Rom. v. 18).
> "By the righteousness of one the free gift came upon all men" (Rom. v. 18).
> "As by one man's disobedience" (Rom. v. 19).
> "So by the obedience of one" (Rom. v. 19).

Emphasis to the extent of twelve references to one subject in ten verses can hardly be equaled in passages dealing with any other doctrine. What is there in chapters vi.-viii. to demand this forceful preparation? It is found in Rom. vi., for there we shall learn that there is something deeper and fuller than substitution, and that is identification, a truth that is vital to this section of the epistle. Statements such as "Baptized into His death", "planted together in the likeness of His death", "our old man crucified with Him", "if we be dead with Christ", which are found in chapter vi., require substantiation by something more intimate than substitution. Justification is related to the death of Christ "for us", but "newness of life", and freedom from "the dominion of sin", are more strictly the result of identification with Christ.

This doctrine of identification, if it is to be something more than a legal fiction, must be shown to exist as a fact, and this is demonstrated by the scriptural doctrine of the organic unity of the human race. Just as we found Gen. i. essential to the teaching of Ephesians and Colossians, so shall we find the literal facts of the creation of man vital to the teaching of Rom. v. and viii. The essential oneness of the race with Adam is the insistent note of Rom. v. 12-21. It re-appears in Rom. vi. in the reference to the "old man"; we have it in Rom. vii. 14 in the confession "sold under sin", and it is plainly visible in Rom. viii. 19-21 in the references to the groaning creation and its subjection to vanity. Eve was created in such a way that she should share this essential oneness of the race with Adam. The careful genealogies of Gen. v. and x. are vital to this truth. Looked at from this standpoint salvation hangs upon the genealogies of Matt. i. and Luke iii., and Paul found this truth important enough to include in his address to the Athenians—"He hath made of one (blood) all nations of men."

From time to time the theory is revived that the account of the creation of man in Gen. i. does not refer to the same man as does Gen. ii. The reference to the "image of God" in Gen. ix. is an allusion to Gen. i. In Gen. v., there is an explicit statement concerning the identity of the Adam of Gen. i. with the Adam of Gen. ii.:--

> "This is the book of the generations of Adam. In the day that God created man, in the likeness of God made He him; male and female created He them and blessed them and called their name Adam, in the day when they were created" (Gen. v. 1, 2).

This is a direct reference to Gen. i. The passage proceeds:--

> "And Adam lived an hundred and thirty years and begat a son in his own likeness, after his image; and called his name Seth" (Gen. v. 3).

This is a most positive reference to the Adam of Gen. ii. & iii., and the teaching that has recently been revived that there are two Adams in view must be repudiated as mischievous error.

The organic unity of the race with the first man Adam being established, we must next ascertain whether Christ, as the Second Man and the Last Adam has any vital and real union with the race. If we find it to be so, identification becomes a glorious fact. Underlying this doctrine lies the Hebrew conception of the Kinsman-Redeemer (which has been dealt with in our Redemption Series, Volume XII) which makes it imperative that Christ should have been made partaker of flesh and blood. The truth is set forth most clearly in Heb. ii. 14, 15:--

> "Forasmuch as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, He also Himself likewise took part of the same, that through death He might destroy him that had the power of death, that is the devil, and deliver them who through fear of death were all their lifetime subject to bondage."

Christ, to fulfil all His great mission, must come as the Seed of the woman, the Seed of Abraham, the Seed of David, the Son of man and the Son of God. The kingdom purpose required that His genealogy should go back to David and Abraham (Matt. i. 1), but the gospel committed to Paul necessitated that He should have a lineage that went back to Adam (Luke iii.). The virgin birth of Christ made it possible for Him to be related to man, without partaking of the awful entail that came to the race from Adam. The genealogy of Luke iii. goes back, and back, until we read that Adam was a son of God. There is not the slightest difference between the wording of the last clause of this genealogy and those that go before: "Tou Kainan, tou Enos, tou Seth, tou Adam, tou Theou."

There is no warrant for hiding, or slurring, this great truth, in order to emphasize the sinfulness and the fall of man. The same Bible that teaches the one teaches the other, and we shall never understand redemption aright, or appreciate the relation of redeemed man to Christ, if we reject any item of truth regarding man himself. The doctrine of Rom. v. is impossible apart from the organic unity of the human race, the headship of Adam and the new headship of Christ. This doctrine we express in the one word Identification.

What this identification carries with it we learn in chapters vi. and vii.; here we are but learning the basic fact.

Closely associated with this unity and headship is the scriptural revelation of the two seeds in the earth. This is seen in Gen. iv., for I John iii. 12 says, "Cain was of that wicked one". Physical connection with Adam does not constitute participation in his headship or prove inclusion in his seed:--

> "They are not ALL ISRAEL, which are OF ISRAEL, neither because they are the seed of Abraham, are they all children; but in Isaac shall thy seed be called. That is, They which are the children of the flesh, they are not the children of God; but the children of the promise are counted for a seed" (Rom. ix. 6-8).

Cain, Ishmael and Esau were "children of the flesh", but that does not constitute them the true seed. The true seed are the children of promise, they are "in Isaac" if true Israelites, and "in Christ" in the wider application of the figure. The Lord had dealings with men who were literal descendants of Abraham, yet children of the devil. He allowed that they were Abraham's seed, yet He denied that Abraham was their father:--

> "We be Abraham's seed . . . . . I know that ye are Abraham's seed . . . . .Abraham is our father . . . . . If ye were Abraham's children ye would do the works of Abraham . . . . . ye do the deeds of your father . . . . ye are of your father the devil" (John viii. 33-44).

There are men who, though "of Adam", are not "in Adam"; such was Cain. For all "in Adam" Christ became Kinsman-Redeemer, and their names are in the book of life. We shall find in Rom. v. that the interchange in the use of "all" and "many" is because at one time the whole of the true seed are in view by themselves, "all", and, at another, the whole of the physical descendants of Adam, when the true seed are differentiated and spoken of as "the many". There are, moreover, differences observable among the true seed. Just as one star differs from another, though both be in glory, so we shall find that, when it is a question of "receiving" and "reigning", "many" is used, but when it is a matter of justification unto life "all" is the word employed.

When once we see that "all in Adam" does not include all that are "of Adam" every text of Scripture can be accepted at its full value. We do not become Universalists and spoil the insistent teaching of Scripture concerning the Kinsman-Redeemer. We have no need to alter the wording of I Cor. xv. 22. All "in Adam" and all "in Christ" are co-extensive. Only by closing our eyes to the divine principle of Rom. ix. 5-7 can we assert that "all Israel" of Rom. xi. is as universal as the physical connection. If the objection is put forward that Rom. ix. 5-7 refers to an election, we have only to read on in Rom. xi. 28 to find that "all Israel" is an election, too. The same is true of all "in Adam". As a whole they are an election, a seed of promise, while at the same time different destinies and callings await them by that "election within an election" of which we have spoken before.*

When we examine Rom. v. 12 - viii. 39, it is evident that we are pursuing a very different phase of truth from that which occupies Rom. i. - v. 11. In the opening section the words "faith" and "believe" occur 35 times, whereas there is but one reference to them in the whole inner section v. 12 - viii. 39, and that in quite a different sense from the doctrinal use in i.-iv. "We believe that we shall live with Him" (Rom. vi. 8). This is because we are dealing, not with faith, but with headship, representation, and identification. Adam's sin and death cover me with all their hopeless misery, whether I "believe" it or not, and Christ is the new Head of all the true seed, quite irrespective of their faith. Faith lays hold of added blessings; it has to do with sins committed, not the one sin of Adam, and with reigning in life. But of all this we shall see more presently.

Some find a place of blessing in the millennial kingdom, corresponding to those who "reign in life". Some are not raised from the dead until the thousand years are finished, yet it is evident from Rev. xx. that some of these have their names in the book of life, even though they have missed the reign. Personal overcoming is connected with reigning, whether in Rev. xx. or in Rom. vi.-viii., and we need to distinguish things that differ if we are fully to understand the great work of the Lord.

Let us not allow doctrine belonging to other aspects of our need to intrude into Rom. v. There we are prepared to learn the truth concerning the "one man", whether of Adam, and his legacy of sin and death, or of Christ, and His blessed legacy of righteousness and life. Let us be glad and rejoice that "because of this,"—the great principle of reconciliation—God shut up all the seed in Adam's guilt that He might just as surely shut them all up in Christ's righteousness.

Satan's two lies.

pertaining to (i.) The first death (Gen. iii. 4), and (ii.) The second death (Rev. xx. 15).

pp. 153, 154

Every student of the Scriptures who has the smallest acquaintance with their structure and plan, knows how fully Genesis finds its complement in Revelation. We will not take up space in setting out what is generally accepted, but pass on to its application in one important feature. When we read Gen. iii. we have revealed to us the liar and his methods. Satan meddled with the word of God relative to death:--

> "Yea, hath God said, Ye shall not eat of every tree of the garden?" (Gen. iii. 1).
> "Ye shall not surely die: for God doth know that in the day ye eat thereof, then your eyes shall be opened, and ye shall be as gods (or God), knowing good and evil" (Gen. iii. 4, 5).

What Satan has done with regard to the first death he has also done regarding the second. God has said:--

> "And whosoever was not found written in the book of life was cast into the lake of fire. And I saw a new heaven and a new earth . . . . . Behold, I make all things new" (Rev. xx. 15 - xxi. 5).

This lake of fire is called "the second death" (Rev. xx. 14), and so complete is its destructive power that when death and hades are cast into it they shall be no more (xxi. 4). No other part of Scripture describes the judgment of the great white throne; all we know about it is revealed here. We are solemnly warned in Rev. xxii. 18, 19 against either adding to or taking away from the words of this book. Inferences and deductions from other Scriptures may be true or false. We cannot build up an elaborate and far-reaching doctrine upon the sandy foundation of mere inference.

Had it not been for the fact of resurrection, the first death would have been total and complete destruction, for, says the apostle, if the dead rise not, "then they also which are fallen asleep in Christ are perished" (I Cor. xv. 18). What is true of the first death is true also of the second. Apart from resurrection the second death, with its brimstone and its fire, must be utter destruction.

Whence, in spite of all the positive testimony to the contrary, comes the teaching that those whose names are not found written in the book of life, who are cast into the lake of fire, the second death, will ultimately emerge, the redeemed of the Lord? From none other than the liar, who is again employing methods once so terribly effective in the garden of Eden.

First he says: "Yea, hath God said?" He uses specious arguments about the love of God, the nature of sin, the sovereignty of God, the idea that unless all are saved God has failed: as if the salvation of all must of necessity be the purpose of the ages. When he has sufficiently played upon the sentiments of his dupes, he brings forward his second line of attack, "Ye shall not surely die", by bluntly denying the completeness of the revelation concerning the second death, and by wresting from I Cor. xv. teaching specially written to enlighten the Corinthians concerning the death brought in by Adam. What Scripture says concerning the wheat, Satan misapplies to the tares. Eve was deceived, and she has many followers. She thought that Cain, who was of that wicked one, was "the man Jehovah", and multitudes are being prepared to receive the man of sin as the true Christ.

We have never felt called upon to undertake a campaign, nor to attack all the false teaching that is springing up around us, but we do feel it incumbent upon us to call upon those who have perceived the truth of the mystery, not to allow this specious lie to spoil their witness. It is with great reluctance that we have publicly to make known that in loyalty to the Lord, His work and His word, it is impossible for us to be associated in ministry with any who advocate this lie concerning the second death, known as "Universal reconciliation". Reconciliation, redemption, resurrection and restoration pertain to the true seed, and not to the seed of the wicked one, which seed is set forth in Scripture under the types of Cain, the giants, the Canaanites, and the tares, and summed up in the last dread statement, "whose names were not written in the book of life".

#1. Christ Himself the Faithful Witness.
pp. 53 - 56

Throughout the twenty years ministry of The Berean Expositor it has been taken for granted that the Scriptures are the inspired Word of God. Of late it has been impressed upon us that we should do well to give the matter some space. There is nothing so fundamental as the inspiration of Scripture. Apart from the Word of God we know nothing of God, Christ, gospel, grace or glory. The ages, if they have a purpose, are dumb concerning it; we know it not apart from revelation. Creation itself, while it bears its limited testimony to the invisible power and deity of the Creator, never reveals to the most patient scientist the sublime message of John iii. 16.

Those who are fully persuaded as to the inspiration of Scripture will rejoice to see some testimony to that blessed fact in these pages, and those who are sorely pressed by the evil age in which we live may be strengthened for the conflict by seeing more clearly the rock foundation of our faith. We believe that we should in our day and generation give our witness concerning this vital subject.

Having concluded that it is a right and necessary thing to do, we have next to consider by what means we shall seek the truth concerning the inspiration of Scripture.

It is open to us to attempt to prove the inspiration of Scripture a priori, that is by demonstrating the necessity for an inspired revelation to be authoritative in matters so vital and far-reaching. We might first of all wade through the sea of proofs that belong to the question of the canonicity of the books that make up the Scriptures. We might attempt an argument based on the marvels of prophetic fulfillment, the sublimity of scriptural doctrine, the mighty sweep of the purpose of the ages. We pass all these by, however, for an argument that is nearer to the heart of things.

The readers of these pages are not infidels but believers—believers in Christ, and we know no argument so final or so full as a presentation of what the Lord Jesus Christ Himself taught concerning the truth, accuracy and authority of the Scriptures. If we admit that He could possibly be mistaken in this or any matter, all argument is at an end. What do we care whether Moses is fact or fiction if Christ be fallible? How does it concern us that Paul held such ravishing views of the person and glory of his Lord, if that Lord did not know a tithe of what the youngest student in our Higher Critical Colleges takes for granted? For us in this matter, as in all others, Christ is all, and we are fully prepared to allow the whole question of the inspiration and authority of Scripture to be settled for us by the attitude and teaching of our Lord:--

> "The disciple is not above his master, nor the servant above his lord. It is enough for the disciple that he be as his master, and the servant as his lord" (Matt. x. 24, 25).

What, therefore, is viewed as Scripture by Christ our Lord, is Scripture to His servants. If in the estimation of Christ our Master Scripture cannot be broken, then it shall remain impregnable to His disciples. If we must trust to Him alone for justification and peace, for present grace and future glory, we must equally trust Him to tell us what our attitude must be toward the Scriptures. In His presence we bow, and with unfeigned meekness say: "Speak Lord, for Thy servant heareth."

We now come to the first great fact to be faced. Setting aside for the moment any conception we may have of the deity of Christ, we learn from His own statements that the words He spoke and the doctrine He gave were not His own personally, but the Father's. Consequently if we reject His testimony concerning the truth of the Old Testament, we are either indirectly charging Him with blasphemy, or we must believe that the Father endorsed erroneous teaching and mere human tradition. The fact is set out for us with overwhelming clearness in the Gospel of John:--

> "The Jews marveled, saying, How knoweth this man letters, having never learned?" (John vii. 15).

The word "knoweth" is oida, and differs from ginosko in that it means to know intuitively, and without effort. "Letters" (Greek gramma) is used of the five books of Moses (John v. 47), and of all Scripture (II Tim. iii. 15). How did the Lord attain to so profound a knowledge of the Scriptures without ever becoming a disciple of one of the great Rabbis of His day? Let Him answer: "My doctrine is not Mine, but His that sent Me" (John vii. 16). This doctrine includes the very point before us, for in the self-same context the Lord Who declared His doctrine to be given by the Father, asserted that Moses gave the law, and the law of circumcision (John vii. 15-23). Let us hear further:--

> "I do nothing of Myself; but as My Father hath taught Me, I speak these things" (John viii. 28).
> "He that rejecteth Me, and receiveth not My words, hath one that judgeth him: the word that I have spoken, the same shall judge him in the last day. For I have not spoken for Myself; but the Father which sent Me, He gave Me a commandment, what I should say and what I should speak" (John xiii. 48, 49).

Can words be set in a more solemn context? In view of the judgment of the last day, the Lord avers that the words He speaks are the Father's commandment: "He gave Me a commandment, what I should say", and we have no alternative but to believe that He obeyed that commandment implicitly:--

> "Believest thou not that I am in the Father, and the Father in Me? The words that I speak unto you I speak not of Myself: but the Father that dwelleth in Me" (John xiv. 10).

Here the claim of the Lord passes our understanding. Here, unlike the prophets of old, is One not only sent from the Father, but One in perfect union with the Father, so that it can be said: "He that hath seen Me hath seen the Father." In connection with that mystic union the Lord declares He speaks the Word of God: "The word which ye hear is not Mine, but the Father's which sent Me" (John xiv. 24).

Lastly, in that holy communion of the Son with His Father, in view of approaching death, resurrection and ascension, in full consciousness of the glory that He had before the world was and the glory that was yet to be, we hear once more the emphatic statement:--

> "Now they have known that all things whatsoever Thou hast given Me are of Thee. For I have given unto them the words which Thou gavest Me . . . . . I have given then Thy Word" (John xvii. 7, 8, 14).

Surely this is enough for any servant, disciple or believer in Christ. If after this most wonderful revelation we find the Lord endorsing the Mosaic authorship of the five books of the law, that for us is no longer an open question, and however uncharitable it may appear, we must refuse the title "Christian" to anyone or any system that runs counter to the express testimony of Christ.

What is that testimony? What was His attitude—nay, what did the Father command Him to speak concerning the Scriptures? We know before we proceed further with the subject, for from cradle to cross, in childhood and manhood, always, the O.T. Scriptures were to Him the written unbreakable Word of God, and so shall they be to us.

The examination of the Lord's utterances concerning the Scriptures will occupy our attention in the subsequent article; meanwhile we conclude with the pointed words of John v. 46, 47:--

> "For had ye believed Moses, ye would have believed Me: for he wrote of Me. But if ye believed not his writings, how shall ye believe My words?"

#2. The testimony of Christ.
pp. 93 - 98

In the opening article of this series we concentrated our attention upon the teaching of Scripture concerning Christ Himself, and the fact that the words He spoke and the doctrine He taught were not "from Himself" but were "given" and "commanded" by the Father. We would now direct attention to the Lord's testimony to the Scriptures, being fully assured that the attitude of Him Whom we call Master and Lord, must be ours also towards the Word of God.

Let us take up the theme at the solemn passage with which we closed the last article: "For had ye believed Moses, ye would have believed Me, for he wrote of Me. But if ye believe not his writings, how shall ye believe My words?" (John v. 46, 47). It is clear that Christ recognized Moses as an individual and not as a mythical personage. He believed that Moses "wrote" and speaks of "his writings". Moreover, He believed that Moses was a prophet—"He wrote of Me." In chapter vii. the Lord is more explicit. Not only does He affirm that Moses wrote, and wrote as a prophet, but He declares that Moses gave the law, and refers to one of the commandments, "Thou shalt not kill": "Did not Moses give you the law, and yet none of you keepeth the law? Why go ye about to kill Me" (John vii. 19).

At the end of the parable of the rich man and Lazarus, the Lord says: "If they hear not Moses and the prophets, neither will they be persuaded, though one rose from the dead" (Luke xvi. 31). Here the standing testimony of the written Word is presented as greater evidence of truth than the mighty miracle of raising the dead. Let the written revelation of God take the supreme place with us that it had with our Lord.

In the foregoing quotation, not only is Moses mentioned, but with him, "the prophets". When we deal with the question of the canon of Scripture, we shall find that "the prophets", according to the accepted arrangement, is the title of the second portion of the O.T. Scriptures. Christ does not speak of the prophet merely in a collective way: He refers to several individual prophets and quotes their writings. He speaks of Isaiah the prophet, of the fulfillment of his prophecy both in Himself, and the people, and characterizes the prophecy as Scripture:--

> "In them is fulfilled the prophecy of Isaiah" (Matt. xiii. 14).
> "The book of the prophet Isaiah . . . . . He found the place where it was written . . . . . This day is this Scripture fulfilled in your ears" (Luke iv. 17-21).
> "Well hath Isaiah prophesied of you hypocrites" (Mark vii. 6).

The Lord also speaks of Daniel the prophet: "When ye therefore shall see the abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel the prophet, stand in the holy place" (Matt. xxiv. 15, 16). The second quotation of Daniel in Matthew is set in a scene of the utmost solemnity. The high priest before whom Christ stands upon trial for His life speaks: "I adjure Thee by the living God, that Thou tell us whether Thou be the Christ, the Son of God. Jesus saith unto him, Thou hast said: nevertheless I say unto you, hereafter shall ye see the Son of man sitting on the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven" (Matt. xxvi. 63, 64).

At this solemn moment Christ quotes from Dan. vii., and surely the charge of blasphemy is not too severe against those who would dare to say that the Lord in the hour of His trial quoted with approval the writings of a forger?

He speaks also of Jonah the prophet: "The sign of the prophet Jonah. For as Jonah was three days and three nights . . . . . so shall the Son of man . . . . . the men of Nineveh shall rise in judgment . . . . . they repented at the preaching of Jonah" (Matt. xii. 39-41). We are told that the book of Jonah is allegory and myth. Could the Lord have declared that men who had no existence except in myth would rise in the judgment, and that these mythical men repented at the preaching of a mythical prophet? Moreover, if the three days and three nights of Jonah's experience be but fiction and not fact, what of the resurrection? The "as" and the "so" go together.

The third division of the O.T. is called "The Psalms", including not only the Psalms themselves, but such books as Proverbs and Job. This third section is not without testimony from the Lord:--

> "And David himself saith in the book of the Psalms, The Lord said unto my Lord" (Luke xx. 42).
> "How then doth David in spirit call Him Lord" (Matt. xxii. 43).

The Lord on one occasion when quoting the Psalms refers to them as "the law": "Is it not written in your law?" (John x. 34—quoting Psa. lxxxii.). He pauses in the midst of His explanation to warn His hearers that "the Scriptures cannot be broken". Here the Lord is teaching and maintaining the most marvelous doctrine of Scripture, His Own deity, and using the poetry of the Psalms with as much confidence as we should the testimony of Col. i. 15, calling this Psalm the "law" and pausing to interpolate that "the Scriptures cannot be broken".

From the very earliest days the Lord knew and revered the written Word of God. See Him at the age of twelve years sitting in the temple and astonishing the doctors of the law with His knowledge of the Scriptures (Luke ii. 46). See Him at the commencement of His ministry "opening the book" and finding His full commission in its pages (Luke iv. 17-21). See Him meeting the temptation of the devil in the wilderness with three quotations from the law of Moses (Matt. iv. 1-11). Hear Him in the "sermon on the mount" tell the people that He had not come to destroy the law or the prophets, but to fulfil them: "For verily I say unto you, till heaven and earth pass, one jot or tittle shall in no wise pass from the law, till all be fulfilled" (Matt. v. 18). The "jot" is the Hebrew yod, and equivalent to the Greek iota and the English "i" or "y". It is the smallest letter in the Hebrew alphabet. The "tittle" is a small decoration added to certain letters, and carefully tabulated by the Massorah. Modern scholars confess they do not know their purpose, but our ignorance does not justify the conclusion that these tittles are meaningless; the Lord assures us that the smallest letter and even the Massoretic notation shall not fail of fulfillment.

John the Baptist's enquiry, "Art Thou He that should come, or do we look for another?" is another by an appeal to Scripture (Matt. xi. 1-10; Isa. xxix. 18; xxxv. 4-6, lxi. 1). The Sadducees' quibble regarding the resurrection is stilled by the use of a single word in the O.T., "I am the God of Abraham", the argument depending upon the tense of the verb. God did not say, "I was", but "I am"—He is not the God of the dead, but of the living (Matt. xii. 23-33).

Everywhere and at all times we find Christ and the Scriptures at one. Not one word ever escaped His lips that cast the faintest shadow of doubt upon the Old Testament Scriptures. He Whose birth fulfilled the words of the prophets, Whose ministry was full of the Word of God fulfilled that Word in His death, burial, resurrection and ascension to glory.

His betrayal by Judas was already known to the Lord in the Scriptures:--

> "Those that Thou gavest Me I have kept, and none of them is lost, but the son of perdition; that the Scripture might be fulfilled" (John xvii. 12).
>
> "I know whom I have chosen: but that the Scripture may be fulfilled: He that eateth bread with Me, hath lifted up his heel against Me" (John xiii. 18).

His crucifixion between the thieves was in harmony with the word of prophecy: "And the Scripture was fulfilled which saith, And He was numbered with the transgressors" (Mark xv. 27, 28).

The giving of the wine mingled with gall, the parting of His vesture and the casting of lots, the very words, "My God, My God, why hast Thou forsaken Me?" (Matt. xxvii. 34, 35, 46) all set their seal to the truth of the Word of God.

Perhaps the Lord's most striking testimony to the supreme place the Scriptures held in His sight is found in John xix. 28-30:--

> "After this, Jesus knowing that all things were now accomplished, that the Scripture might be fulfilled, saith, I thirst . . . . . When Jesus therefore had received the vinegar, He said, It is finished: and He bowed His head, and gave up the ghost."

As by faith we gaze at that cross, as we see indissolubly linked together the finished work of Calvary and the finished Word of God, there we take our stand, and with heart and life declare that our Saviour's Bible is our Bible, that His deep reverence for the written Scriptures shall be our example, and that we shall look upon all adverse criticism or denial in the light of that cross, and see behind the pen of the critic the hand of the wicked one.

Fulfillment of Scripture did not end with the Lord's death. The Roman soldiers did not break His bones—they could not, for Scripture had declared otherwise. They pierced His side—they could not refrain, for Scripture had declared that they should look upon Him Whom they had pierced. Joseph of Arimathea comes out of obscurity and buries the Lord in his sepulchre, for Scripture had associated the Lord's death not only with the wicked, but also with the rich.

The crowning testimony is yet to be considered. He Who died with the Word of God in His heart rose again. Did He rise from the dead to teach His disciples that He had now revised His opinions of the Jewish Scriptures? The testimony of the risen Christ is more complete and definite than before:--

> "O fools and slow of heart to believe all that the prophets have spoken: Ought not Christ to have suffered these things and to enter into His glory? And beginning at Moses and all the prophets, He expounded unto them in all the Scriptures the things concerning Himself" (Luke xxiv. 25-27).

Christ, risen from the dead, believed all that the prophets had spoken. He did not speak words of wisdom and power independently, but "expounded" the Scriptures. Beginning at Moses, and pursuing His study through all the prophets, He found in them all "things concerning Himself". Here is our example.

On one occasion He appeared to His disciples in such a way that they were terrified, thinking they had seen a spirit. Was Christ, raised from the dead, possessing the spiritual body of resurrection, still as loyal to these books of Scripture?

> "These are the words which I spake unto you, while I was yet with you, that all things must be fulfilled, which were written in the law of Moses, and in the prophets, and in the Psalms concerning Me. Then opened He their understanding, that they might understand the Scriptures, And said unto them, Thus it is written, and thus it behoved Christ to suffer, and to rise from the dead the third day" (Luke xxiv. 44-46).

Surely everyone upon whom that blessed Name is called will realize that the inspiration, authority and infallibility of the Scriptures is no longer an open question. It is as settled and fixed as is the doctrine of salvation or any other revelation from God.

We welcome all efforts to ascertain the exact meaning of every word used by God, we welcome textual criticism that seeks to remove human accretions from the text of Scripture, and in subsequent articles of this series we hope to show something of what has been accomplished along these lines. The textual critic, however, is not sitting in judgment upon the Word. He has no more warrant to set one verse aside because, forsooth, he cannot see its purpose, than has a surgeon to put into practice his views that certain organs of the body are superfluous. Some of the glands now regarded so highly were but a short time ago considered merely vestiges of former condition from which we were supposed to have "evolved".

Here once more we must stay. We trust every reader has felt the weight of the testimony of the Lord Jesus Christ to the Word of God, and that this testimony from henceforth shall be ours, to maintain until we finish our course.

#3. The inspiration of Scripture.
pp. 159 - 164

The personal testimony of Christ to the truth of Scripture is so complete, full, and direct, that for the rest of our study we shall have no need to "prove" anything, but simply learn what has been written for our guidance.

How were the Scriptures written? How did they come? Paul supplies an answer to the first question, and Peter to the second:--

> "All Scripture is given by inspiration of God" (II Tim. iii. 16).
> "Holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost" (II Pet. i. 21).
> HOW WAS SCRIPTURE GIVEN?—"By inspiration of God."
> HOW DID SCRIPTURE COME?—"Holy men were moved by the Holy Ghost."

Let us give earnest heed to these statements and examine them in the light of their contexts. Both are the utterances of men in view of death, and there is a suitable solemnity about the two epistles containing them that pervades their whole doctrine. In both instances the immediate contexts speak of death:--

> "The time of my departure is at hand. I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith" (II Tim. iv. 6, 7).
> "Shortly I must put off this my tabernacle as the Lord Jesus Christ hath shewed me" (II Pet. i. 14).

Thus, on the eve of martyrdom, both Paul and Peter give unambiguous testimony to the absolutely divine origin of the Scriptures. How, then, can we hope to finish our course, how keep the faith, how entertain the hope of a crown or a "well done" if we deny or trifle with the Scriptures held so dear by these two servants of the Lord?

> "From a child thou hast known the holy scriptures, which are able to make thee wise unto salvation through faith which is in Christ Jesus. All scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness: that the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works" (II Tim. iii. 15-17).

Two titles are here given to the Scriptures:--(1) "HOLY SCRIPTURES", Hiera grammata = "Sacred letters" (the reader will call to mind the hiera-glyphics of Egyptian monuments). (2) "SCRIPTURE", Graphe = "Writing".

Hieros stands for that which is sacred, revered, related to God. The neuter, to hieron, indicates a sacred place, the temple or sacred thing, the sacrifice (I Cor. ix. 13). Hiereus is a priest. Grammata indicates a letter of the alphabet (Gal. vi. 11), or a letter (Acts xxviii. 21), but among the Jews it had a special significance, meaning the Holy Scriptures themselves. "How knoweth this man letters, having never learned?" (John vii. 15). As the word hieros gives us the word "priest" (hierus), so grammata gives us the companion word, "scribe" (grammateus).

Graphe is practically an English word, having been in use in our language for a great while. It occurs in such words as photo*graphy*, geo*graphy*, *graph*ic, etc., and always means something written. While graphe could, of course, refer to anything written at any time by anyone, it assumes a special meaning in the Word of God, and when used without qualification always means "The Scriptures", The Writings par excellence. So gegrapti—"It is, or hath been, written" is a phrase that indicates the Scriptures. We trust that no more need be said to stress the fact that we are dealing, not with thoughts, ideas, or even spoken words, but something written. As will be seen in the sequel this is most important.

The O.T. abounds in references to writing and to books. Moses wrote all the words of the Lord in a book (Exod. xxiv. 4). So did Joshua (Josh. xxiv. 26). Over and over again appeal is made to the written law (Exod. xxxi. 18; Deut. xxviii. 58; Josh. viii. 31). The foundation of our faith is written testimony.

What does Scripture say as to the way in which the subject matter of these holy writings was given? Paul answers in one word, Theopneustos. Theos is the Greek word for "God" and is too well known to need comment here. Pneustos is the third person singular, perfect, passive, of pneo, to breathe. This also gives us pneuma, which is usually translated "spirit". The close association of pneuma with breath is seen in our words pneumatic and pneumonia, while to inspire, to respire, to perspire and to transpire are all processes of breathing either in or out by nostril, pore or cell. Let us now put together the two parts of Paul's great utterance. All Scripture that is written, is given by inspiration of God, that is God-breathed.

Now if what is written is what was breathed by God, there is no interval for the prophet or the writer to give a vision of his own heart. However intelligently the writer might cooperate with the divine Spirit, or however mystified he might be by the words given him to write, when it was a question of the making of Scripture, and the receiving of the oracles of God, the writers ceased to act merely in the capacity of thinkers, theologians or philosophers, and became instruments. Thus while personality is stamped upon every page of Scripture, Moses differing from Isaiah, Paul from Peter, Matthew from Luke, yet all its writers are instruments in the hand of God. The reader of The Berean Expositor will never see the actual words written by the Editor that later appear on its pages, neither will the printer nor the proof readers. The manuscript will be turned into type-script, to save the time and temper of the compositors, and the type-script into the printed page. Each stage will have had its peculiar characteristics, yet each will convey the same thing. It would be but a quibble to say that the Editor did not actually write the article.

So with the writing of Scripture, "God, at sundry times and in divers manners, spake in time past by the prophets" (Heb. i. 1). However divers the manners, one thing remained constant, it was God Who spoke. Moses was peculiarly favoured by God. "Hear now My words: If there be a prophet among you, I the Lord will make Myself known unto him in a vision, and will speak with him in a dream. My servant Moses is not so, who is faithful in all mine house. With him will I speak apparently, and not in dark speeches: and the similitude of the Lord shall he behold" (Numb. xii. 6-8).

Into the question of how the revelation of truth was given we will not enter further here, but turn to the testimony of Peter, as given in II Pet. i. Speaking of the second coming of the Lord, Peter declares first of all: "We have not followed cunningly devised fables, when we made known unto you the power and coming of our Lord Jesus Christ" (II Pet. i. 16). His testimony now divides into two parts: (1) His own personal experience, and (2) The testimony of the word of prophecy.

Peter's experience on the mount of transfiguration was blessedly real and true. So far as Peter was concerned nothing could remove the impression he there received. But he was commissioned to preach, not his experiences, but the Word. Experiences are worthless, compared with one clear statement of Scripture. Yet many a child of God is misleading himself and others by experiences. While we may be ready to grant that the experience is real and true, the fallibility of the interpreter of those experiences is generally too obvious to allow us to trust them. And, strictly speaking, the experiences themselves often become very small when stripped of all associations and sentiments, and submitted to a cross-examination. Peter, therefore, turns even from the true experience of the mount of transfiguration to something "more sure":--

> "We have also a more sure word of prophecy; whereunto ye do well that ye take heed in your hearts, as unto a light that shineth in a dark place, until the day dawn, and the day star arise" (II Pet. i. 19).

The word of prophecy is "sure", sure as the promise (Rom. iv. 16), steadfast as the word spoken by angels (Heb. ii. 2), fast as the anchor of hope (Heb. vi. 19).

As the passage stands in the A.V. the day star is to arise in our hearts, which is precisely what many teach who deny the personal return of the Lord. "In your hearts" should be read with the words "take heed", and not connected with the rising of the day star. What does Peter put forward to show why this prophetic word is "more sure" than the sublimest "experience"? It is that, in the matter of prophetic inspiration the human element is entirely sub-servient—all is of God.

> "Knowing this first, that no prophecy of the Scripture is of any private interpretation. For the prophecy came not in old time by the will of man: but holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost" (II Pet. i. 20, 21).

What are we to understand by the words "private interpretation"? Does Peter impose upon us the bondage of Romanism? Are we to surrender to the approved interpretation of Scripture by the "Church"? "Private" is idios, a word occurring 114 times. It is nearly always rendered "own". Only once is idios rendered "private". The word translated "interpretation" occurs nowhere else in Scripture. It is epilusis. In a verbal form it is found in the N.T. twice (Mark iv. 34 and Acts xix. 39). In the LXX it is found in Gen. xli. 12, and "interpretation", therefore, is a good rendering. It means "to interpret" in the sense of "letting loose", "breaking open", or "unfolding". It is found in classical Greek with the meaning of letting loose dogs to chase a hare, or breaking open a letter. In this verse, moreover, the word "is" is not the verb to be, but ginomai, which means "to come into being". Peter is not speaking about systems of interpretation, but of the trustworthiness of Scripture itself, which, he says, is found in this fact: "No prophecy of Scripture came into being of its own unfolding." He then proceeds to show why this is so, by adding: "for prophecy was not brought at any time by the will of man."

It is important to keep the rendering "brought" in this passage, as phero occurs again in the passage that follows. We therefore have the subject negatively and positively; how it was not brought, and how it was brought. "But being borne along (phero) by holy spirit, holy men of God spake." If we would see something of the force of this word phero we should read through Acts xxvii., with its vivid description of the storm, the wreck, and the utter helplessness of man in the tempest. Look at the words of verse 15: "We let here drive", phero, and again in verse 17, "strake sail, and so were driven", phero. The human element was of no avail in that driving euroclydon, and was brushed aside. Even so is it with the mighty driving power of inspiration.

The word "interpretation" could remain in this passage, so long as the reader understands that prophecy did not arise from the attempt of the individual prophet to interpret or unfold the purpose of the ages. Such a thing was impossible. The matters were all too vast. God alone could, and did, make them known. The position is somewhat parallel with the teaching of Heb. xi. 3, where we read: "By faith we understand the ages to have been fitted together by the declaration of God, to the end that, not out of things appearing should that which is seen have come into existence."

Apart from revelation, the wisest men are baffled and but blind leaders of the blind. "Canst thou by searching find out God? canst thou find out the Almighty unto perfection?" (Job xi. 7). This is a question we do well to ponder, and to read with it the statement of the wise men: "He hath set the age in their heart, so that no man can find out the word that God maketh from the beginning to the end" (Eccles. iii. 11). No eye can see far enough, no human foot climb high enough, no brain or mind has the capacity to grasp or express the purpose of the ages and the way and will of God.

> "Eye hath not seen, nor ears heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love Him: but God hath revealed them unto us by His Spirit" (I Cor. ii. 9, 10).

Like all doctrines of Scripture, the blessed doctrine of the inspiration of the Word of God humbles the pride of man and exalts the Most High. "And God spake all these words."

#4. "God hath spoken . . . . . by the prophets."
pp. 201 - 204

We have sat at the feet of Christ and heard His testimony to the truth of the Scriptures. We have also heard the teaching of Paul and Peter upon the same theme, and from these two servants of God we learn that:--

1. All Scripture is given by inspiration of God, and
2. That holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost.

There is no formal statement in Scripture as to the precise mode of inspiration. We are assured that the Scriptures are inspired and that the writers were irresistibly move by the Holy Spirit, but further than that we are not told. It does not follow that because all Scripture is inspired that all the writers were led in the same way. Indeed the words of Heb. i. 1, "diverse manners", point to "a diversity of operations", while the remainder of the verse, "God spake . . . . . by the prophets", assures us that, however diverse the mode of inspiration, the result was in all cases the same. The chief consideration for us is the fact that "God hath spoken", and that, in His sovereignty, He has ensured that all the truth He intended should be recorded has been recorded, and that without human admixture.

It may strengthen our grasp of this important fact if we survey the evidence of Scripture and consider the many claims it contains to divine authorship. First let us collect some of the passages where Scripture declares that the Lord hath spoken:--

"And God spake unto Noah" (Gen. viii. 15).
"And the Lord talked with Moses" (Exod. xxxiii. 9).
"And God spake all these words" (Exod. xx. 1).
"Speak unto the children of Israel" (Lev. i. 2).

This is the recurring burden of the books of Moses, and not only of the books of Moses, but of all the O.T. Scriptures. "The mouth of the Lord hath spoken it" (Micah iv. 4; Jer. ix. 12) is the recurring statement of the prophets. "Hear the word of the Lord" is the way in which many prophecies are introduced (Isa. xxviii. 14, Jer. x. 1). Again and again we read that "the word of the Lord came" to the prophets:--

"The word of the Lord came to Nathan" (II Sam. vii. 4).
"The word of the Lord came to Shemaiah" (I Kings xii. 22).
"The word that came to Jeremiah from the Lord" (Jer. xi. 1).

Then we have more specific statements, like the following:--

"Now therefore go, and I will be with thy mouth, and teach thee what thou shalt say" (Exod. iv. 12).
"With him will I speak mouth to mouth" (Numb. xii. 8).
"The Lord put a word in Balaam's mouth" (Numb. xxiii. 5).
"That the word of the Lord, spoken by the mouth of Jeremiah, might be accomplished" (II Chron. xxxvi. 22).
"I have put my words in thy mouth" (Isa. li. 16).
"The Lord said unto me, Behold, I have put My words in thy mouth" (Jer. i. 9).

The testimony of Peter, recorded in the Acts, is very emphatic on this point:--

"This scripture must needs have been fulfilled, which the Holy Ghost, by the mouth of David, spake before concerning Judas" (Acts i. 16).

Here we have reference to a Psalm in which David records in the first instance his own sorrows and afflictions; yet is the writer so under the control of the Holy Ghost that what he writes is "Scripture", words "which the Holy Ghost by the mouth of David" indicted. This is no isolated instance. What is true here of David is also true of all the prophets:--

"But those things which God before had shewed by the mouth of all His prophets, that Christ should suffer, He hath so fulfilled" (Acts iii. 18).
"The time of restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all His holy prophets since the world began" (Acts iii. 21).

It is evident from this testimony that, whoever the individual speaker may have been, the mighty Moses, or the lowly Amos, the royal seer, or the runaway Jonah, the ungodly Balaam, or the wicked Caiaphas, it was God Who spoke and it is His word that we hear.

The inspiration of Scripture is ascribed to God in each of His three manifestations or Persons:--

> "God spake all these words" (Exod. xx. 1).
> "God hath spoke" (Acts iii. 21).
> "Searching what . . . . . the spirit of Christ which was in them did signify" (I Pet. i. 11).
> "Wherefore as the Holy Ghost saith" (Heb. iii. 7).

However varied the mode of inspiration may have been, we see that by the time the message was uttered and recorded it was in the fullest sense the word of God. Some of the ways in which the Lord gave His word are revealed, but many may have received His message in ways that are unrecorded. The fact of inspiration is blessed and needful, but the general manner of inspiration is not a subject of revelation; it might but minister to our curiosity to be told, and possibly it belongs to a realm the workings of which cannot be expressed in human terms. We do, however, read that visions were sometimes employed, for Abraham received the word of the Lord in a vision (Gen. xv. 1), also Ezekiel, Daniel, Isaiah, Habakkuk and others, not forgetting the apostles Paul and John (II Cor. xii. 1, Rev. i. 1). Dreams were another means used by the Lord in the cases of Joseph, Pharaoh, Solomon and Nebuchadnezzar, which are examples that come readily to mind.

There may be indications in other parts of Scripture as to other ways in which the Lord gave His word, but we are not concerned about the matter. What we do rejoice in is that we have in the Scriptures the inspired Word of God. Prophets, priests and kings may have uttered the words, yet they were but the mouthpieces of the Most High.

There are ten passages in Matthew which, in the Greek, put this matter of the instrumentality of the prophets beyond dispute. The subject is of such importance that we shall give each reference in full, inserting also in each case the vital Greek prepositions:--

> "Now all this was done that it might be fulfilled which was spoken BY (hupo) the Lord THROUGH (dia) the prophet saying" (Matt. i. 22).
> "For thus it hath been written THROUGH (dia) the prophet" (Matt. ii. 5).
> "That it might be fulfilled which was spoken BY (hupo) the Lord, THROUGH (dia) the prophet" (Matt. ii. 15).
> "That it might be fulfilled which was spoken THROUGH (dia) the prophet" (Matt. ii. 23).
> "That it might be fulfilled which was spoken THROUGH (dia) the prophet" (Matt. xiii. 35).
> "That it might be fulfilled which was spoken THROUGH (dia) the prophet" (Matt. xxi. 4).

In these six references, the prophets' names are not mentioned, but we name them below to show how the same formula is applied to men of widely different times and character:--

Matt. i. 22 quotes	Isaiah.
Matt. ii. 5 quotes	Micah.
Matt. ii. 15 quotes	Hosea.
Matt. ii. 23 speaks	of prophets in the plural.
Matt. xiii. 35 quotes	a Psalm of Asaph, and
Matt. xxi. 4 quotes	Zechariah.

The remaining four references give the name of the prophet quoted. They are as follows:--

> "That it might be fulfilled which was spoken THROUGH (dia) Isaiah the prophet" (Matt. iv. 14, viii. 17 and xii. 17).
>
> "Then was fulfilled that which was spoken THROUGH (dia) Jeremiah the prophet" (Matt. xxvii. 9).

This last reference we hope to deal with when we come to some of the alleged inaccuracies of Scripture. We believe that we shall be able to show that the passage is true as it stands. The general argument is that the prophet referred to is Zechariah, and various attempts have been made to meet the difficulty.

As we face these ten references to that which was spoken through the various prophets, it will be realized that there is no way of evading the problem by saying that the passage was not "written" either by Jeremiah or Zechariah, but "spoken" by Jeremiah, because such comment could similarly be made upon the other nine references. It can, therefore, be set aside. At present, however, our endeavour is to gather from the Scriptures their own testimony to their inspiration. Difficulties and alleged errors will come under consideration in their place. We have seen enough to remove all difficulty from the acceptance of the claim of inspiration for any book in the Scriptures, while it remains written, "The Holy Ghost, by the mouth of David, spake".

In the light of this and parallel statements, all difficulty is removed, and assurance given that our faith and hope rest, "not in words which man's wisdom teacheth, but which the Holy Ghost teacheth" (I Cor. ii. 13).

DEAR FELLOW-MEMBERS,

The closing months of 1931 have been overshadowed by political and financial complications. While the dispensation of the mystery and the hope of the church which is the body of Christ are unrelated to "times and seasons" in the prophetic sense of the term, the calling of that church takes place during "the times of the Gentiles", and no one who is taught in the Word can look upon the movements among the nations and among Israel without echoing the words of an earlier dispensation: "Now is our salvation nearer than when we believed."

Let all who are interested in the right division of the Word of truth realize that "the night is far spent, and that the day is at hand", and by word and by deed "occupy" until the day of glory shall dawn.

We believe The Berean Expositor and its publications are a definite witness raised up and sustained by the Lord, and we unreservedly commend its testimony to the loving sympathy and prayerful support of all those whose eyes have been enlightened as to what is the hope of His calling.

Your fellow-witnesses to the dispensation of grace,

CHARLES H. WELCH

The first man (The figure of Him Who was to come)	The second Man.
By man came death. AS in Adam all die. The first Adam a living soul. The first man of the earth. AS we have borne the image of the earthy.	By Man came the resurrection (21). EVEN SO in Christ all made alive (22). The last Adam a life-giving Spirit (45). The second Man, the Lord from heaven (47). We shall ALSO bear the image of the heavenly (49).

If we limit ourselves to what is written, we shall find a full answer to the question as to how Adam could be a figure of Christ, without making the unwarranted statement that Adam could only have been a figure of Christ if God had intended that he should be a priest to offer up a sacrifice for sin previously committed by earlier beings, which was a part of the suggestion alluded to above.

A Fourfold fellowship.
#1. The doctrine of Christ.
p. 220

> "That which we have seen and heard declared we unto you, that ye also may have fellowship with us" (I John i. 3).

The editors of the Greek MSS indicated by the letters LTTrA and W, insert the word "also" after the word "declare". By reading the verse again, paying attention to the two occurrences of the word "also", we learn that the first element of fellowship is the mutual recognition of revealed truth:--

> "That which we have seen and heard declare we ALSO unto you, that ye ALSO may have fellowship with us."

Fellowship arises out of the relationship implied by the three words "seen", "heard", and "declared". These words are somewhat similar to those of Paul in I Cor. xv. 3:--

> "For I delivered unto you first of all that which I also received."

We have, too, in Acts xxii. 15, the words:--

> "For thou shalt be His witness unto all men of what thou hast SEEN and HEARD."

If we ask what Paul had seen and heard, we have the answer in the same chapter:--

> "The God of our fathers hath chosen thee, that thou shouldest know His will, and SEE that Just One, and shouldest HEAR the voice of His mouth" (Acts xxii. 14).

Paul had seen and heard a person:--

> "When it pleased God . . . . . to reveal His Son in me, that I might preach HIM among the Gentiles" (Gal. i. 15, 16).

When we look back to the opening verses of the first epistle of John, we find the same personal emphasis. What John had "seen and heard" is plainly stated in verses 1 and 2:--

> "That which was from the beginning, which we have HEARD, and which we have SEEN with our eyes, which we have LOOKED upon, and our hands have HANDLED, of the Word of life (for the life was manifested, and we have seen, and bear witness, and shew unto you that eternal life which was with the Father, and was manifested unto us), that which we have SEEN and HEARD declare unto you."

Studies in Colossians.

#5. Pleasing, power and patience (i. 10, 11).
pp. 12 - 19

The central section of this prayer must now engage our attention. As we have seen already, it is occupied with a series of "means" and "ends" expressed by the words en and eis. The first pair alternates with the knowledge of the Lord's will and the walk that is worthy, thus:--

A | "That ye might be filled with a knowledge of His will."
B | Means.—"In (en) all wisdom and spiritual understanding."
A | "That ye might walk worthy of the Lord."
B | End.—"Unto (eis) all pleasing."

From this opening prayer it is evident that to walk worthy one must have knowledge of His will, that to be "all pleasing" one must have wisdom and spiritual understanding, and that the complete end is the worthy walk unto all pleasing.

Enoch seems to be the figure that aptly illustrates this prayer. Not only do we read that "Enoch walked with God", and that "he pleased God", but like the Colossian believers, he was "translated":-- "By faith Enoch was translated" (metatithemi, Heb. xi. 5).

"And hath translated us into the kingdom of His dear Son" (methistimi, Col. i. 13).

While the two words "translate" are not identical, they are very close to each other in meaning, the word in Col. i. 13 having the meaning "transfer", while the word in Heb. xi. 5 means "transport".

The likeness to Enoch appears again in Col. ii. 20: "Why as though living in the world, are ye subject to ordinances?" The wisdom and spiritual understanding for which the apostle prayed were to enable believers to walk worthy of the Lord.

The meaning of "worthy".

The Greek word translated "worthy" here is axios. The idea of the word is that of being "comparable", or put into the opposite scale. This is clearly seen in Rom. viii. 18:--

"For I reckon that the sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory which shall be revealed in us."

It will be seen that the words, "to be compared", are in italic type in the A.V., being necessary to complete the sense. The R.V. retains the words, but prints them in ordinary type as being a part of the translation of axios. In Gen. xxiii. 9 the LXX has argurion ton axion: "The money it is worth", and in verse 16 we see that this silver was "weighed". Indeed the Hebrew word shekel is from shakal = "to weigh", which in Chaldee becomes tekel, the word written on the wall of Belshazzar's palace.

In each of the epistles to the Ephesians, Philippians and Colossians we find the exhortation to worthiness:--

> "Walk worthy of the vocation wherewith ye were called" (Eph. iv. 1).
> "Let your manner of life be worthy of the gospel" (Phil. i. 27).
> "Walk worthy of the Lord unto all pleasing" (Col. i. 10).

In one scale is placed the glorious calling of the dispensation of the mystery with its spiritual blessings and heavenly places, and in the other the walk that is in love. What a marvelously balanced walk there is here, and who, apart from grace, could dream of attaining it?

Then in Philippians we learn that our "conversation" is in heaven (iii. 20): so we are exhorted to "let our conversation be worthy of the gospel". Conversation includes the idea of citizenship (politeuma), and we are to make a balance between the heavenly citizenship that awaits us, and the reflection of it upon life and walk down here, borrowing from the life of Abraham a lesson—for he let his moderation be known to all men, living in a tent, a pilgrim and a stranger in the land of promise, looking for a city which had foundations, whose Maker and Builder was God.

These two passages are wonderful enough, but what shall we say of the theme of the prayer of Col. i.? If it be all that renewed life and grace can do to walk worthy of calling and gospel, how are we to walk worthy of the Lord in regard to both calling and gospel? Can we dare to contemplate placing all His glorious excellencies in the scales? Can any saved sinner hope to effect a balance there? In ourselves it is impossible, but in the "walk" side of the scales are placed such weighty facts as these:--

> "He hath made us meet to be partakers of the inheritance of the saints in the light" (Col. i. 12).
> "In the body of His flesh through death to present you holy and unblameable and unreproveable in His sight" (Col. i. 22).
> "Ye are complete in Him" (Col. ii. 10).
> "Christ is our life" (Col. iii. 4).
> "Christ is all and in all" (Col. iii. 11).

True wisdom and spiritual understanding see that Christ and His excellencies are placed on both sides. Nothing but Christ in the believer and for the saint can be "worthy of the Lord", or be "unto all pleasing". Like the O.T. conception of consecration we must "fill the hand" from the altar itself before we can offer anything back to the Lord (Exod. xxix. 9, 10 and 24. See verse 9, margin). And in the language of David we must continually say, "Of Thine own have we given Thee".

If our walks is to be unto "all pleasing", it is evident that it cannot be so if it is in the flesh, for it is written: "They that are in the flesh cannot please God" (Rom. viii. 8). If the flesh is excluded, faith must be as surely included, for it is written: "Without faith it is impossible to please God." Here then we have the means and the end of this part of the prayer: "In all wisdom . . . . . unto all pleasing." This is the first aim of the new life, to be well-pleasing unto Him.

It is not always possible to discover the origin of words, but there is a possibility that aresko, "to please", comes into the Greek language from the Hebrew ratson, "to conciliate". This is the opinion of Parkhurst, and if there is truth in it, it will enable us to perceive that here in this worthy walk unto all pleasing (conciliation) is the believer's response to the great reconciliation effected by the blood of the cross (Col. i. 20).

Full as this opening petition is, it is not to be taken as an end in itself, but as a preparation for a further phase of Christian fullness. What is the meaning of "all pleasing"? The word is abstract, and we are apt to miss its force and fullness. The following part of the passage replaces "all pleasing" by "all good works".

> MEANS.—"In every good work being fruitful."
> END.—"Unto the knowledge of God increasing."

The most important words here are "fruitful" and "increasing". Both speak of growth, contrary to toiling and striving. "Consider the lilies of the field, how they grow, they toil not." The only good works that are unto "all pleasing" are those that are "fruit" and the result of "growth"; all else is vanity and vexation of spirit. Sanctification that is the result of labour and struggle is a deception. The real thing flows out of living union with the Lord. The principle of John x. 4 is true for the one body:--

> "Abide in Me, and I in you. As the branch cannot bear fruit of itself, except it abide in the vine; no more can ye, except ye abide in Me."

The walk of the believer in Col. i. is associated with fruit. The walk of the believer in Col. ii. 6, 7 is associated with root:--

> "As ye have therefore received Christ Jesus the Lord, so walk ye in Him: rooted and built up in Him."

He who would bear fruit upward must "take root downward" (II Kings xix. 30), and where the root is dry, fruit will fail (Hos. ix. 16).

Eph. iii. 17 speaks of being rooted and grounded in love. The interchange of the figures of growing and building may seem to us a trifle incongruous, but God uses them together. He speaks of "all the building growing" (Eph. ii. 21), for He deals with living stones. This growth or increase is found alone in Christ, and only as we "hold the Head" shall we "increase with the increase of God".

Fruit unto God is only possible by union with the risen Christ, and it can only be produced in those who have died in Him to the old nature and its "fruit unto death" (Rom. vii. 4, 5). Thanksgiving is called "the fruit of the lips" (Heb. xiii. 15), service in the gospel and our fellowship with those who serve is called "fruit" (Phil. iv. 17), and in contrast with the works of the flesh we have the "fruit of the Spirit" in Gal. v. 22.

Growth and fruitfulness, though matters of everyday experience and controlled by sun and shower, seed-time and harvest, yet remain a mystery and a miracle. The poet plucking a flower from the crannies could say that did he know it root and all, and all in all, he would know what God and man are. While we may dissent somewhat and believe that there is a limit to "what may be known of God" from the works of His hand, our consciousness of the miracle of fruit, flower and growth deepens with knowledge and observation. This leads us to the third and closing part of the prayer, the prayer for power.

If we have come to a complete end of ourselves, so complete that such terms as "dead and buried" are to be taken in their fullest meaning, it is abundantly evident that "fruit" and "growth" are possible only when life is present. Consequently the third clause is the prayer that speaks of the "power of His resurrection".

> MEANS.—"In (en) all might being strengthened, according to the power of His glory."
> END.—"Unto (eis) all patience and longsuffering with joyfulness."

The words "strengthened" and "might" in the Greek are dunamoo and dunamis, words generally translated "power". The phrase, "His glorious power", reads literally, "the strength of His glory". When "glory" is used in this way it often includes the thought of resurrection:--

> "Said I not unto thee, that, if thou wouldst believe, thou shouldst see the glory of God?" (John xi. 40).
> "Christ was raised up from the dead by the glory of the Father" (Rom. vi. 4).

Here then is the power and strength of resurrection, the power that can alone produce fruit and give the divine growth and increase. For this same power the apostle prayed in Eph. i. 19, 20:--

> "And what is the exceeding greatness of His power to usward who believe, according to the working of the strength of His might, which He wrought in Christ, when He raised Him from the dead."

The "power" is often rendered "miracle", as in Acts ii. 22. We should not be wrong if we sometimes quoted Rom. i. 16 and Phil. iii. 10 as follows:--

> "I am not ashamed of the gospel of Christ, for it is the miracle of God unto salvation."
> "That I might know Him, and the miracle of His resurrection."

There are eight references to dunamis, "power", in Ephesians, Philippians and Colossians, and three references in the closing epistle, II Timothy. Both numbers are suggestive of resurrection. This great power, this strength of His glory is needed if those who have died with Christ are to bring forth fruit unto God.

We found the all-embracive term “all pleasing” expressed in tangible form by “all good works”. We now have some of these good works particularized, viz., “all patience and longsuffering”. Neither of these would come in the forefront of any list of good works framed by ourselves. Neither patience nor longsuffering “make a fair show in the flesh”, but they are chosen here and shown in their heavenly beauty.

The first reference to patience in the N.T. associates it with fruit-bearing:-- > “Having heard the word, keep it, and bring forth fruit with patience” (Luke viii. 15).

Patience has a place in one of the many titles of God:--

> “The God of patience and consolation grant you to be likeminded” (Rom. xv. 5).

Patience was the first in a series of proofs of Paul’s ministry:--

> “But in all things approving ourselves as the ministers of God, in much patience . . .” (II Cor. vi. 4).

Patience is mentioned as the great qualifying term in a list of signs of apostleship:-- > “Truly the signs of an apostle were wrought among you in all patience” (II Cor. xii. 12).

And in his last epistle Paul draws attention to his “patience” in connection with doctrine and manner of life (II Tim. iii. 10). Here also the apostle speaks of “longsuffering”.

This modest and retiring grace is honoured in the Word by being mentioned fourteen times. Longsuffering comes first in the account of Christian love in I Cor. xiii.:-- > “Love suffereth long, and is kind” (I Cor. xiii. 14).

Longsuffering enters into the walk that is worthy of the calling (Eph. iv. 2), as it does into the walk that is worthy of the Lord (Col. i. 11). It meets us in the passage quoted above (II Cor. vi. 6); it is one of the fruits of the Spirit (Gal. v. 22); and it is to be put on by the elect of God as part of the new man (Col. iii. 10-12). The true teacher ever blends with his doctrine “longsuffering” (II Tim. iv. 2).

At first sight “patience” and “longsuffering” seem a very lowly end of so mighty a means, yet patience and longsuffering may stand firm under pressure and persecution where more prominent gifts give way. Patience and longsuffering may be more effective in ministry than the tongue of angels or the knowledge of all mysteries, and as the apostle had the “perfecting” of these saints in mind (Col. i. 28), patience was essential. As James has said:-- > “Let patience have her perfect work, that ye may be perfect and entire, wanting nothing” (James i. 4).

It is difficult to decide whether the words “with joyfulness” belong to the prayer, or whether they belong to the giving of thanks that follows. Perhaps they stand midway as a concerning link, much as the words “in love” do in Eph. i. 4, 5. It is certainly true that patience and longsuffering to be well-pleasing must be with joyfulness, just as love that suffers long is also kind. There is no room for that “patience on a monument” that is ever impressing others with its virtue or its grief. Here in the brief compass of this prayer we have had all wisdom, all pleasing, all good works, all power, and all patience, a five-fold fullness that is alone possible in the risen Christ.

Not only is there a close connection between the three occurrences of “worthy” in Eph. iv., Phil. i. and Col. i., but we find that the great prayers of the three epistles are intimately associated. This relationship we will set out before the reader before closing this article:--

The four prayers.

A	Eph. i.	Faith and love heard of.
		Power and might, spirit of wisdom, hope.
		Inheritance in the saints.
		Principality and power far above all.
		Christ the Head and the Fullness.
B	Eph. iii.	Love of Christ exceeding knowledge.
		Comprehend what is the breadth, etc.
		Filled with all the fullness of God.
		Unto the generation of the ages of the ages.
B	Phil. i.	Love of saints abounding in knowledge.
		Prove the things that differ.
		Filled with the fruits of righteousness.
		Unto the day of Christ.
A	Col. i.	Faith and love heard of.
		Power and might, all wisdom, hope.
		Inheritance of the saints.
		Authority of darkness, translated.
		Christ the Head and the Fullness.

#6. The inheritance in light (i. 12).
pp. 51 - 55

We now come to the concluding thanksgiving of the prayer of Col. i. 9-12: "With joyfulness, giving thanks unto the Father." This thanksgiving is repeated from verse three, with which the epistle opens. It will be seen that we have a parallel with the opening of Ephesians:--

> "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, Who hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings in heavenly places in Christ" (Eph. i. 3).
> "Giving thanks to God and the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ . . . . . giving thanks unto the Father, Which hath made us meet for the inheritance of the saints in light" (Col. i. 3 and 12).

It becomes apparent that the inheritance of the saints in light is another way of referring to the spiritual blessings in heavenly places. First of all we must notice the words translated, "of the saints". While they refer to the believers who have been sanctified in Christ, they also refer to the fact that these believers are being built into an holy temple in the Lord.

Ton hagion, the words translated "of the saints", may be in the masculine, feminine or neuter gender as the context demands, and so it does not follow that every occurrence of these words must be translated "of the saints", for sometimes the intended meaning may be "of the holy places", which by a figure explainable by Heb. ix. 23, 24 means "the most holy place".

Let us settle this figurative feature first. There is a figure of speech, named heterosis, meaning "different", which is given to that form of enallage or "exchange" that has to do with the exchange of the person, gender, etc., of words. In the case of heterosis of number it can be:--

(1) The singular put for the plural, "The horse and his rider" (Exod. xv. 1).
(2) The plural for the singular, "better sacrifices" (Heb. ix.23).
(3) The plural for the indefinite, or of one of many, as "such power unto men" (Matt. ix. 8).

The second example is the one that bears upon our theme. "The better sacrifices" of Heb. ix. 23 really means, the one great sacrifice, as also in Psa. li. 17. The holy places (ta hagia) of Heb. ix. 24 is translated, in Heb. ix. 12, "the holy place", and in ix. 8, "the holiest of all". This figure is named by some "the plural of majesty". Heb. ix. 24 shows that "the holiest of all" in the tabernacle was a type of "heaven itself".

We can now examine the words ton hagion in their contexts:--

> "Now therefore ye are no more strangers and foreigners, but fellow-citizens with the saints, and of the household of God" (Eph. ii. 19).

Verses 19-22 speak of a building. There we find mention of "the foundation", the chief corner stone", "the whole building", "a holy temple", and "a habitation of God". These references lend weight to the translations, "Fellow-citizens of the holiest of all", or "heaven itself". Now Phil. iii. 20 declares that "our citizenship exists (as a fact) in heaven", and seeing that "fellow-citizens" in Eph. ii. 19 is sumpolitai, and the word "conversation" is politeuma, the connection is plain.

In Eph. iv. 12 we have another passage that yields to investigation, viz., "for the perfecting of the saints". Here again ton hagion, while referring to saved persons, may refer to them in their capacity as a holy temple for the Lord. This is strengthened by the contextual reference to Psa. lxviii. 18, where we read:--

> "Thou hast ascended on high; Thou hast led captivity captive: Thou hast received gifts for men; yea, for the rebellious also, that the Lord God might dwell among them."

The word "dwell" here is shaken, "tabernacle". Here, then, in Eph. iv. we read of the re-adjusting of the most holy place, for the most holy place no longer was found on earth, but in the heavenly places. So Col. i. 12, "giving thanks unto the Father, Who made us meet to be partakers of the inheritance of the most holy place, heaven itself—in the light". It is no wonder that the opening words of Ephesians are "Blessed be God", or of Colossians, "We give thanks" for this high and heavenly glory for which the Father has "made us meet".

"To make meet", hikanoo, is derived from hikano, to reach or attain, and has the meaning "to make sufficient, to fit, or to qualify". In II Cor. iii. 6 it occurs in the expression, "Who also made us able ministers". In II Cor. iii. 5 Paul had said, "not that we are sufficient (hikanos) of ourselves to think anything as of ourselves, but our sufficiency (hikanotes) is of God". Hikanos is translated "worthy" in five places, e.g., "Whose shoes I am not worthy to bear" (Matt. iii. 11). Once in the N.T. and many times in the LXX it is translated "enough" in the phrase, "It is enough". In Acts xvii. 9 we meet the expression, "and when they had taken security of Jason", where the Greek reads, to hikanon. The Latin equivalent for this word in Roman Law is satisdatio, bail or surety (See pp. 145-151 of Volume XIX).

We are sufficient because He is sufficient. We are made meet through His meetness, we are accepted in the Beloved, and in Him every requirement has been fully met. This full acceptance, this sufficiency for the share of the inheritance of the holiest of all, is "in the light". This finds its complement later in the chapter in the words of verse 22, "In His sight", and putting the two passages together we shall see wherein the "meetness" consists:-- > "Which hath made us meet to be partakers of the inheritance of the holiest of all in the light" (Col. i. 12).

> "In the body of His flesh through death, to present you holy and unblameable and unreproveable in His sight" (Col. i. 22).

Here we see that our meetness is through the death of Christ, and what a meetness it is! Here holiness is the positive side of this complete meetness, while unblameableness and unreproveableness indicate the two negative sides of this meetness. These will have to be considered more closely when we reach verse 22. A parallel is found in Eph. v. 27:--

> "That He might present it to Himself a church in glory, not having spot or wrinkle, or any such thing; but that it should be holy and without blemish."

That is the sufficiency, the meetness for which the apostle gives thanks. This sufficiency is with a view to a share or a part of the inheritance.

The only other occurrence of meris, "part", in the epistles is in II Cor. vi. 15, "What part hath he that believeth with an infidel?" The inheritance, kleros, refers to the stone which was cast into the vessel, the "lot" which decides the inheritance. Both meris and kleros come together in Acts viii. 21, "Thou hast neither part nor lot in the matter". The fact that the inheritance is associated with the casting of lots, goes back to Israel's division of the land of Canaan, and also to the annual practice in the Palestinian villages, which underlies the words of Psa. xvi. 5, 6: "Thou maintainest my lot, the lines are fallen unto me in pleasant places: yea, I have a goodly heritage." If we turn to Micah ii. we shall get a little light on this practice. Reading the opening verses we gather that there had been dishonest practices among the people whereby a man was dispossessed of his inheritance. The Lord threatens all such with retribution:--

> "In that day shall one take up a parable against you, and lament with a doleful lamentation, and say, We be utterly spoiled; he hath changed the portion of my people, how hath he removed it from me! Instead of restoring he hath divided our fields. Therefore thou shalt have none that shall cast a line by lot in the congregation of the Lord" (Micah ii. 4, 5).

The land surrounding the village was "common" land, and was appointed every year by lot. It so happened that some positions would be good, and some bad, and the one whose lot fell upon the good ground felt specially favoured. David, alluding to this custom, seems to say that God had seen to it that his lot should fall upon a fair portion, and his line in pleasant places. As we think of these things and remember that as Gentiles we were strangers from the commonwealth of Israel, and to us could have been said, "Thou hast neither part nor lot" in this inheritance, what shall we say when we realize the inheritance in the light that has been allotted to us in grace? Can we do anything less than seek to answer the prayer of which this is the happy conclusion, and with all wisdom seek to be fruitful in all good works, unto all pleasing, seeking to walk worthy of so gracious a Lord, so wonderful a calling, and so glorious a gospel. As we read Col. i. 12 we have to say that "our lines are fallen in pleasant places, yea, we have a goodly heritage:--

> "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, Who hath indeed blessed us."

pp. 97 - 100

In our last article we were rejoicing together with the apostle in the grace of God that made us meet to be partakers of the inheritance of the most holy place in the light. We now go forward with the apostle to contemplate the pit from which we have been delivered, and the blessed means by which our rescue has been brought about:--

> "Who hath delivered us from the power of darkness, and hath translated us into the kingdom of His dear Son" (Col. i. 13).

In this statement we have two important words that will repay careful study, "delivered" and "translated".

Deliverance may be accomplished by a variety of means, and may deliver from a variety of evils. There is the deliverance which is a "setting free" from captivity and bondage, aphesis (Luke iv. 18). There is the deliverance of the creature, at resurrection, from the bondage of corruption, eleutheroo (Rom. viii. 20). There is the deliverance of those who were held in bondage by fear of death, apollasso (Heb. ii. 15). There is the deliverance from afflictions (Acts vii. 10 and 34), and from this evil age, exaireo (Gal. i. 4). Each of these word has its own peculiar force and shade of meaning, but not one of them is used in Col. 1. 13, where we have the word rhuomai. We could now give the reader the bare meaning of the word and pass on, but this is not our practice; we desire to search and see together. The word is found in the LXX sometimes combined with ek, "to deliver out of" and sometimes with apo, "to deliver away from"; the following examples will give a good idea of the meaning implied.

Rhuomai ek.

> "The angle which redeemed me from all evil" (Gen. xlviii. 16).
> "Thus the Lord saved Israel . . . . . out of the hand of the Egyptians" (Exod. xiv. 30).
> "The Lord . . . . . who have delivered them out of the hand of all their enemies" (Judges viii. 34).
> "I delivered thee out of the hand of Saul" (II Sam. xii. 7).

Rhuomai apo.

> "The king saved us out of the hand of our enemy" (II Sam. xix. 9).
> "Deliver my soul from the wicked" (Psa. xvii. 13).

The above are but samples taken from a long list, but they are sufficient to indicate the direction in which our thoughts must flow.

Coming to the N.T. we find the verb used without either ek or apo in Matt. xxvii. 43, "Let Him deliver Him", and in II Pet. ii. 7, "And delivered just Lot". Here we have two good illustrations of the underlying idea of the word—deliverance from present or impending evil. In combination with ek, we have the following occurrences: Rom. vii. 24, II Cor. i. 10, II Tim. iii. 11, iv. 17 and II Pet. ii. 9. Here we have deliverance from "the body of this death", deliverance from "so great a death", from "persecutions and afflictions", from "the mouth of the lion", and from "temptations". With apo the word is used in Matt. vi. 13, II Tim. iv. 18, Rom. xv. 31, I Thess. i. 10, and II Thess. iii. 2. In this category we have the prayer, "Deliver us from evil", the confidence expressed that the Lord will deliver from "every evil work", Paul's prayer that he might be "delivered from them that do not believe, in Judea", the assurance of deliverance from "the wrath to come", and the prayer for deliverance from "unreasonable and wicked men".

Cremer's note is abundantly confirmed by all these examples. Speaking of the petition, "Deliver us from evil" (Matt. vi. 13), he states that rhoesthai never has reference to any doing or behaviour of its object, but always to the suffering or injury coming from without.

What, then, is the deliverance in view in Col. i. 13?

> "Who hath delivered us from the authority of darkness."

The thought of redemption from sin is not prominent here, but there is promised a rescue from the dominion of Satan, and his power over mind and body. Just as Israel, redeemed by the blood of the passover lamb, could speak of being "rescued" out of the hand of the Egyptians when they stood upon the further side of the Red Sea, so each member of the church which is His body can give thanks for a "rescue" from the authority of a darkness greater than that of Egypt, and an oppression greater than that of Pharaoh. The church can look forward to a "rescue" from groaning deeper than that of Israel, the groaning of creation, awaiting the liberty of the glory of the children of God.

The authority of darkness is spoken of in Eph. ii. 1-3:--

> ". . . . . trespasses and sins, wherein in time past ye walked according to the age of this world, according to the prince of the authority of the air, the spirit now energizing in the sons of disobedience, among whom also we all lived in times past in the desires of our flesh, doing the wills of the flesh and of the thoughts, and were by nature children of wrath, even as those who were left."

This is the authority that once held us, but from which we have been delivered. It was the authority of a mighty energizing spirit, dominating our manner of life, and influencing our desires and our thoughts. Moreover, let us not pass lightly over the concluding words—"even as others" or "even as those who were left." Though the church of the one body was chosen in Christ before the overthrow of the world, this truth does not in any way touch the essential organic oneness of all mankind with Adam. Whatever the company to which we belong—Jew, Gentile or Church of God—"by nature" we are all sons of Adam, needing the self-same redemption, needing the gift of life, with no way out of this awful dominion but by the blessed hope of resurrection, or change, "even as others".

Returning to the O.T. examples of rhuomai, and in particular to Israel in Egypt, we see that Israel were not only "rescued" but "translated":-- > "By strength of hand the Lord brought us forth out of Egypt" (Exod. xiii. 16).

> "They are entangled in the land, the wilderness hath shut them in" (Exod. xiv. 3).
> "The children of Israel went into the midst of the sea upon the dry ground" (Exod. xiv. 22).
> "Then sang Moses and the children of Israel, they sang unto the Lord' (Exod. xv. 1).

For Israel to have been rescued from the tyranny of Pharaoh without the Red Sea being placed between them and the land of bondage would not have been sufficient. The opening of the Red Sea and the safe transport of Israel to the further shore is an O.T. equivalent of the "translation" of Col. i. 13, without of course encroaching upon the distinctive characteristics of the N.T. passage.

If Eph. ii. reveals something of the authority from which we have been rescued, Eph. i. supplies material for understanding the nature of the translation:--

> "What is the exceeding greatness of His power to us-ward who believe, according to the energizing of His might power, which He energized in Christ, when He raised Him from the dead, and set Him at His Own right hand in the heavenly places, far above all principality, and authority, and might and dominion, and every name that is named, not only in this age, but also in that which is to come, and hath put all things under His feet, and gave Him to be the Head over all things to the church, which is His body, the fullness of Him that filleth all in all" (Eph. i. 19-23).

The "energy" of the mighty evil spirit that dominated our lives has been rendered inoperative by the greater "energy" of the resurrection. The ascension of Christ "far above all", the fact that, so far as the church is concerned, He has all things under His feet, and the further fact that, in Spirit, by faith, the church is raised and seated there with Him, these are the realities of our "translation". No member of His body is in the realm over which Satan has authority; in Christ he is raised "far above" his dominion. We would safeguard this statement concerning our position by reminding every reader that just as Israel "turned back in their hearts again to Egypt" (Acts vii. 39), so the believer to-day, by not putting off the old man, can give place to the devil (Eph. iv. 27), and while he can never be "lost", he may "lose".

That the "translation" of Col. i. 13 was to have a practical effect is evident from Col. ii. 20:--

> "If ye died with Christ from the rudiments of the world, why as though living in the world are ye subject to ordinances?"

These believers are not really "living in the world", though they were certainly finishing their lives "on the earth". Israel, on the other side of the Red Sea, still needed food, raiment and sleep, as in Egypt, but they no longer lived in Egypt. So the believer, while still here in the flesh, needs food, raiment and sleep, just like his unsaved neighbour, but he has nevertheless ceased to "live in the word". The Lord speaks of being "in the world, but not of it" (John xvii. 11, 16).

(To be concluded).

#7. Rescued out of; translated into (i. 13).
(concluded). pp. 119, 120

There is a still further analogy in connection with Israel's deliverance from Egypt. I Cor. x. 1, 2 states that when Israel passed through the Red Sea they "were all baptized unto Moses". Now Col. ii. says of the rescued and translated members of the church of the one body that they were "buried with Him in the baptism, wherein also ye were raised with Him through the faith of the energizing of God Who raised Him out of the dead" (Col. ii. 12).

The overthrow of the principalities and powers in Col. ii. 15 finds its analogy in the destruction of the Egyptian host, the words "in it" (Col. ii. 15) indicating that the same sea that was a path of safety for the Israelites was the doom of the Egyptians, and that the same cross that rescued and delivered the church was the means of destroying the antagonizing spiritual powers of darkness.

Acts vii. 39-41 shows that when Israel turned back in heart to Egypt they became idolaters. Gal. iv. 8-11 repeats the lesson:--

> "Howbeit then, when ye knew not God, ye did service unto them which by nature are no gods. But now, after that ye have known God, or rather are known of God, how turn ye again to the weak and beggarly elements, wherein ye desire again to be in bondage? Ye observe days, and months, and times, and years. I am afraid of you, lest I have bestowed upon you labour in vain."

The Galatians had literally been worshippers of idols. If, after having been saved, they turn back to the weak and beggarly elements of the law expressed in the observance of days, it constitutes incipient idolatry: they are like Israel in the wilderness, putting up another golden calf.

No one who knows the teaching of Col. ii. can miss the evident parallel here. Following baptism and resurrection with Christ, and the spoiling of principalities, so evidently parallel with the overthrow of the host of Pharaoh, we read:--

> "Let no man therefore judge you in meat, or in drink, or in respect of an holyday, or of the new moon, or of the sabbath days, which are a shadow of things to come . . . . . why, as though living in the world, are ye subject to ordinances?" (Col. ii. 16-20).

A "rescued" and "translated" people should realize that the Red Sea rolls between them and Egypt. For the church, the Red Sea is the "one baptism" of Eph. iv. which unites its members with Christ their Head.

The "translation" of Col. i. 13 is "into the kingdom of the Son of His love", a complete contrast with the rescue "out of the authority of darkness". It is a scriptural principle that needs continual emphasis, that the "out of" aspect of redemption demands the "into" aspect of atonement, access and making nigh, the personal, experimental going on and growing up. And into what a kingdom have we been translated! The kingdom of the Son of His love. What a contrast to that dominion of hate with its sin and death, with desires and thoughts swayed and energized by the prince of the authority of the air.

He "hath made us meet"; He hath delivered us; He "hath translated us". Truly a threefold cord, not easily broken.

#8. Creation, old and new (i. 13-23).
pp. 130 - 134

In our previous consideration of Col. i. 13 we limited our study to the verse in question, dealing mainly with the truth involved in the two words "delivered" and "translated". Before we go further, we must consider the section as a whole.

Col. 1. 13-23.

A | 13, 14. Rescue. Translation. Redemption. "Through His blood."
B | 15-17. |
C | 15. | a | Image of invisible God.
b | Firstborn of every creature.
D | 16, 17. | c | CREATION. "By Him." Heaven and earth.
d | He is before all.
e | In Him all things consist.
B | 18-20. |
C | 18. | a | The Beginning. Head of the body, the church.
b | Firstborn from the dead.
D | 18-20. | d | In all things pre-eminent.
e | In Him all the fullness dwells.
c | RECONCILIATION. Through blood of cross. Earth and heaven.
A | 21, 22. Reconciliation. Presentation. "Through death."

While the Revised Text rightly omits the words, "through His blood", in verse 14, they are nevertheless implied, as a reference to Eph. i. 7 will show. This implication is balanced by the sequel in verse 22--"In the body of His flesh through death"; and we have therefore given it a place in the structure.

The structure shows that two creations are before us: first, the material creation in which Christ is pre-eminent as the Image of the Invisible God, and then the new spiritual creation in which Christ is pre-eminent as the Head of the body, and the One in Whom all the fullness dwells. This new and spiritual creation is considered more fully in the corresponding section in Col. iii. 5-15. Let us observe the relationship between these two parts.

Col. i. 13-23 and iii. 5-15.

G | i. 15, 16. The Creator. The Image.
H | i. 20. Reconciliation of heaven and earth.
I | i. 17, 18. Christ pre-eminent. All in Him.
J | i. 20. Peace and forgiveness of sins.
K | i. 22. Holy, blameless unreproveable.
G | iii. 10. Created after Image.
H | iii. 11. Reconciliation of Jew and Greek.
I | iii. 11. Christ is all and in all.
J | iii. 13, 15. Peace. Forgive quarrel.
K | iii. 9, 12. Put off, put on, holy and beloved.

It is evident that there is an intentional parallel here, and we must not attempt an exposition of Col. i. 13-23 without giving it a place. The subject is so vast that one falters at the threshold. Who can hope to handle aright such truth as is involved in the doctrine of the Invisible God, and of Christ His Image? The mighty sweep of creation here unfolded almost leaves the mind stunned; and even more wonderful is the transition from the Headship of creation to the Headship of the church. That God should create is natural, but that He should redeem and reconcile is a revelation of greater glory; and unless we have a true conception of His purposes and ways more harm than good may come from an attempt to unfold the apostle's teaching. The surest safeguard for the expositor is to observe not only the immediate setting, but also the remote context; and here the remote context embraces every other passage of Scripture that speaks of kindred themes. To explore this vast territory would be a life-work; to attempt to summarize it on paper would demand a large volume. We can do little more than draw attention to the obvious and give a few guiding principles.

While we maintain that the distinctive message of Colossians concerns the dispensation of the mystery, as will be made clear when Col. i. 23-29 is before us, this does not preclude the use of other scriptures when they deal with the same or parallel lines of teaching. While the Image of the Invisible God is a title which occurs only in Colossians, it would be unreasonable to disregard such a passage as John i. 18 in an endeavour to appreciate its meaning.

John i.	Colossians i.	Hebrews i.
The Word.	The Image.	The express Image.
God never seen.	The Invisible God.	The Substance.
All things made by Him.	All things created by Him.	Ages, heaven and earth made by Him.
Preferred before John.	Pre-eminent in all.	Superior to angels.
His fullness.	All the fullness.	Heir of all things.
- - -	All things by Him consist.	All things upheld by Him.
The Word was God.	- - -	Thy throne, O God.
The only begotten Son.	Firstborn.	Firstborn.

Continuing our study from Heb. i. we learn that there is a creation which is to perish and wax old like a garment (Heb. i. 11, 12); while in contrast we have the words, "Thou remainest" and "Thou art the same". Towards the close of the epistle, where the apostle gathers up the threads of his theme, we learn that while this present creation is to perish, there will be a kingdom that cannot be shaken, but, like the Lord Himself, will "remain" (Heb. xii. 27, 28). The thought of Heb. i. 12, "Thou art the same", is repeated in Heb. xiii. 8:--

> "Jesus Christ, the same yesterday, and to-day, and for the ages."

The passing of the former creation is described in Rev. xxi. 1-5:--

> "And I saw a new heaven and a new earth, for the former heaven and the former earth were passed away, and there was NO MORE sea . . . . . there shall be NO MORE death, neither sorrow, nor crying, neither shall there be ANY MORE pain: for the former things are passed away . . . . . Behold, I make all things new."

If the statement of verse 5 were taken out of its context, it might well be made to teach that all things without reserve or distinction, will be made new, but in the light of the context, it will be seen that much that belongs to the present creation is destined to pass away and will find no place in the new creation of the future.

In a similar way, the reconciliation of Col. i. 13-23 has been explained as co-extensive with creation in its literal sense, and consequently universal in scope, not only with reference to every human being, but also to the seed of the wicked one, to the angels that sinned and even to Satan himself. Yet we have only to read as far as Col. ii. to discover that this cannot be true. Reconciliation in Col. i. is vitally associated with the cross of Christ, and we know no other ground of reconciliation.

Among those included in the creation of Col. i. 16 are "principalities and powers", and such are included also in the reconciliation of verse 20. We must not, however, teach that all principalities and powers are reconciled, for Col. ii., speaking of the same cross as in verse 20, says:--

> "Having spoiled principalities and powers, He made a show of them openly, triumphing over them in it" (Col. ii. 15).

It would be just as true to teach from Col. ii. 15 that not one of the principalities and powers will be reconciled as to teach universal reconciliation from Col. i. A true interpretation must not take account of either passage by itself, but must embrace both; then we are upon solid rock.

Turning to the passage before us, and verse 14 in particular, we observe that this is practically a repetition of Eph. i. 7. The subject of redemption and forgiveness has been recently studied in the series entitled, "Redemption", and the reader should refer to these articles if help is needed in the exposition of this wonderful theme.

When dealing with Eph. i. 7 we noted that redemption is not limited to the question of sin and its forgiveness, but has to do also with the purchased possession (verse 14).

Col. i. and Eph. i. traverse the same ground. The new creation of Col. i. 18-20 headed up in Christ finds its parallel in Eph. i. 10:--

"That He might head up again all things in Christ, both which are in heaven and which are in earth."

The reconciliation and the inheritance of the saints in light is but another presentation of the truth of Eph. i. 14, the redemption of the purchased possession by the great Kinsman Who has met every claim and "made us sufficient". The place of redemption here cannot be ignored; and in its scriptural meaning it must be the work of the Kinsman-Redeemer and no other. The Egyptians who were dead upon the sea-shore had no Passover lamb offered for them (Isa. xliii. 16, 17); the principalities and powers who were "spoiled" at the cross had no Kinsman-Redeemer. The seed of the wicked one, the Rephaim, are not even to rise from the dead (Isa. xxvi. 14); they were never "in Adam" and never will be "in Christ".

Creation must be viewed in the light of the purpose of the ages. Sin and death are at present exercising their dreadful dominion over the true seed, but a day is coming when that seed shall be fully delivered. Some will occupy a place of glory far above all heavens, some will hold a position in the New Jerusalem, and some will be blessed in the renewed earth; but just as it will be true of that future temple that "there shall be no more the Canaanite in the house of the Lord of Hosts" (Zech. xiv. 21), so will it be true throughout the universe. The former things will have passed away. Nothing will come through that great dissolution but that which is vitally linked with Him Who is the Firstborn from the dead.

#9. Creation, old and new (i. 13-23).

"Who is the image of the invisible God, the firstborn of every creature, for by Him were all things created" (Col. i. 15, 16).

The parallel passage in John i. 1 enables us to perceive that we are here dealing with events "in the beginning". It is not so much the six-days' creation that is in view as the primal creation of heaven and earth at the beginning. In that beginning He was the Word, and in that beginning He was the Image. Both titles indicate manifestation; in the person of Him Who, in fullness of time, became the man Christ Jesus, the invisible God was expressed.

God is so infinitely above His highest creation that some self-limitation and manifestation was necessary. Quite apart from sin, creation needed a Mediator, and that Mediator was Christ. When Adam was created he was made after the image and likeness of God, and the new man must be "renewed in knowledge after the image of Him that created him" (Col. iii. 10). The present creation also is the work of His hands, and one day He that sitteth upon the throne shall make all things new. In this capacity Christ is the Firstborn of every creature. A superficial reading of this title has led some to teach that Christ was the first created Being, but that is not the divine reason given. He is called the Firstborn of every creature because He created all, and consequently holds the position of pre-eminence. In the new creation He becomes the Firstborn from the dead with the same object—"That in all things He might have the pre-eminence." John declares that "all things were made by Him", and that "the world was made by Him"; Hebrews that, "He laid the foundations of the earth", and the heavens were the work of His hands. The same epistle declares that "He that built all things is God" (Heb. iii. 4). God alone is the Creator:--

> "For thus saith the Lord that created the heavens; God Himself that formed the earth and made it . . . . . I am the Lord; and there is none else . . . . . a just God and a Saviour; there is none else . . . . . I have sworn by Myself . . . . . that unto Me every knee shall bow, every tongue shall swear" (Isa. xlv. 18-23).

Isaiah is emphatic that the Creator is God and none else, and that one day every knee shall bow unto Him. Col. i., John i., and Heb. i. are equally emphatic that Christ is the Creator of all things and that He is "God" and "Lord". And Phil. ii. teaches that what is foretold in Isa. xlv. 23 of God alone, will be fulfilled in Christ: "In the name of Jesus every knee shall bow."

We have no need to "explain"; we are called upon to "believe". While there is nothing unreasonable in God's revelation, we can well understand that such subjects as the Godhead are so far removed from human knowledge and experience that no language can adequately express the truth concerning them. Neither do they conform to human logic. It is certainly true in ordinary life that one person cannot be in two distinct places at the same time. It is certainly true of all mundane things that that which never had a beginning cannot now exist. But dare we extend this logic to the higher realm of the things of God? Let us rather acknowledge with true humility of mind that confessedly great is the mystery of godliness, and not seek to intrude into things beyond our range. Some reader may interpose the objection that we have just been guilty of the thing we condemn, and urge us to refrain from speaking of the deity of Christ. But this is not a legitimate criticism; we have every warrant for a faith that holds the truth of both Isa. xlv. and Col. i., without attempting either philosophy or demonstration.

What a tremendous statement is that of Col. i. 17: "By Him all things consist." It is paralleled only by the impressive words of Heb. i. 3: "Upholding all things by the word of His power." The word "consist" appear in Peter's account of the primal creation:--

> "For this is hidden from them by their willfulness, that there were heavens of old and an earth out of water and by means of water, consisting by the word of God" (II Pet. iii. 5).

We are taught that particles of matter are held together by a force called cohesion, but strictly speaking this statement tells us nothing. "Cohesion" is simply the Latin for the words, "hold together", so that we are left at the starting-point. Who holds all things together, and how? Science cannot tell. It speaks of forces of gravity, of cohesion, of elasticity. But these are only labels; what underlies these forces is beyond human knowledge. Is it not refreshing to turn from a mechanical and, logically, an impossible universe to find the problem solved by the recognition of a Person? In the material as well as in the spiritual realm, He must have the pre-eminence.

We have seen that the title of "The Firstborn of every creature" has its spiritual counterpart in "The Firstborn from the dead". The reason in both cases is the same—that He might have the pre-eminence:--

> "For to this end Christ both died and rose and lived again, that He might be Lord both of the dead and living" (Rom. xiv. 9).

The title, "The Image of the invisible God" corresponds to the title, "The Head of the Body, the church: Who is the beginning". The word for "beginning" is arche, the plural of which occurs in verse 16, translated "principalities". The word "prince" is here seen with its twofold meaning of a "ruler", and one who stands "first". The title appears in Rev. xxi. 6: "I am the first and the last." Its fitness is clearly seen in this passage, for here the new heaven and the new earth have come into being, and He Who was the Beginning is now seen as the End. If only we could grasp this thought! It seems a tremendous thing for us to see our election "before the overthrow of the world", but let us remember that Christ, our Head, is Himself the Beginning, "the Beginning of the creation of God" (Rev. iii. 14), without Whom creation would never have been. We think of the various destinies of the redeemed, and particularly of the surpassing glory of our own destiny "far above all", yet He, our Saviour, is the End, without Whom this creation would be without purpose and without goal. If we would be "in tune with the Infinite" this is the only way. Only when Christ is our Beginning and our End shall we echo the sacred chord of heaven.

As an expression of this title, Rev. xxii. 13 adds the words: "The First and the Last", a title used by Isaiah with no ambiguity:--

> "I am He; I am the first, I am also the last, Mine hand also hath laid the foundation of the earth, and My right hand hath spanned the heaven; when I call unto them, they stand up together" (Isa. xlviii. 12, 13).

Here we have undoubtedly the basis of Heb. i. 10; and the expression "stand together" is very similar to the verb "consist" in Col. i. Both of these passages speak of Christ. The title is used again in Isa. xliv. 6: "I am the first, and I am the last; and beside Me there is no God." Isaiah declares this title to belong to God alone. Revelation and Hebrews declare that it belongs to Christ, a doctrine that is much associated with the creation.

As related to the church, Christ is the Beginning by virtue of resurrection, being the Firstborn from the dead. None but those who are associated with that resurrection can form part of the new creation. He Who in resurrection glory became Head of the church, became also, and at the same time, "the Head of all principality and power" (Col. ii. 10), and one day will head up all things in heaven and in earth—that is, all those things that are allied to His resurrection, for apart from this they must pass and "vanish away". There is a wonderful mystery in this relationship of the invisible God with the church which is the Body. This is seen, in measure, in the unity of the Spirit of Eph. iv.: "There is one Body . . . . . one God and Father . . . . ." Further, what Christ is to the Godhead, the church is to Christ. In Him all the fullness dwells, and the church is the fullness of Him Who in His own time and way is the one Who filleth all in all.

The structure places in correspondence the two statements:--

> "In Him all things consists."
>
> "In Him all fullness should dwell."

What is the principle underlying this comparison—the thought of "consisting" balancing that of "fullness"? We believe the reader will share our wonder at the perfect fitness of the words of Scripture as the truths of this correspondence unfold.

II Pet. iii. has already supplied the fact that in Gen. i. 1 the earth "consisted" out of and through water. Peter continues: "Whereby the world that then was, being overflowed with water, perished" (II Pet. iii. 6). This is the "overthrow" of Gen. i. 2: "The earth was without form and void, and darkness was upon the face of the deep."

Now the antithesis of the scriptural conception of "fullness" is not mere "emptiness", but a "rent" or "schism". This may be seen in the first occurrence of the word "fullness" in the N.T.:--

> "No man putteth a piece of new cloth unto an old garment, for that which is put in to fill it up ('the fullness', pleroma) taketh from the garment, and the rent (schism) is made worse" (Matt. ix. 16).

Gen. i. 2 is the great "rent" and in Christ all the "fullness" dwells. Of this fullness the church forms a heavenly part, and it is destined that at "the last" God shall be "all in all" (I Cor. xv. 24-28). It was because God knew the end from the beginning, both the "rent" of Gen. i. 2 and His perfect plan to restore and renew, that He placed in correspondence the "consisting" of the original creation and the "fullness" of the new creation, leaving it for His children, as led by Himself, to discover with delight these wonders of His truth.

We have still to consider creation and resurrection, but such a theme is too vast for the close of an article. May we with humility, born of a realization of wonderful grace, be thankful for that revelation of love which discloses the position assigned to poor outcast Gentiles in this dispensation of the mystery.

#10. Col. i. 13-23 (concluded). Reconciliation, and a special note on adoption in the three spheres.

pp. 211 - 216

Looking back, by faith, to Gen. i. 1, to the period before the great overthrow, we learn from Col. i. that Christ occupied a twofold relationship: (1) to the invisible God, and (2) to every creature. To the One He was the Image; to the other He was the Firstborn, and, as such, He not only created all things in heaven and earth, but was before all things and in Him all things consisted, or were held together.

Entering now the region of grace we find Christ is the Head of the body, the church, the Beginning, the Firstborn from the dead, that in all things He might have the pre-eminence. There is a close connection between the Image and the Head, as may be seen from the account of the creation of Adam. Immediately following the statement, "Let us make man in our Image", come the words, "and let them have dominion". Headship and image come again in I Cor. xi. 1-7.

Turning once more to Col. i. we observe that creation gives place to reconciliation in the scheme of the passage (see structure page 130), and this must be our next consideration. The word used in Col. i. 20 and 21 is apokatallasso, and occurs but once elsewhere, namely, in Eph. ii. 16. It is the climax of a series of words, all of which indicate some form of change. To be able to appreciate in any measure its wondrous intent, we must all be acquainted with the derivation of this term. Lying at the root of the word is allos, meaning "other", indicating that a change from one state to another is in view. Allaso, the next development, shows this more plainly, inasmuch as it is translated "change"; "change the customs" (Acts vi. 14), "changed the glory" (Rom. i. 23), "we shall be changed" (I Cor. xv. 51, 52), "change my voice" (Gal. iv. 20).

To indicate varying shades of "change" this word allasso is supplemented by the prefixes dia, kata, and apokata.

Diallassomai occurs in Matt. v. 24, where it is a question of the reconciliation of equals, "Be reconciled to thy brother".

Katallasso occurs as follows:--

> "Enemies reconciled . . . . . being reconciled" (Rom. v. 10).
> "God . . . . . hath reconciled us" (II Cor. v. 18).
> "God was in Christ reconciling" (II Cor. v. 19).
> "Be ye reconciled to God" (II Cor. v. 20).
> "Reconciled to her husband" (I Cor. vii. 11).

Katallage is translated "atonement" in Rom. v. 11, which would be a good rendering if the word had not such a fixed meaning in the O.T. As it is, "atonement" has lost its original meaning of reconciling, or making "at one", and is now understood as making a propitiation. It is therefore better in Rom. v. 11 to translate the word "reconciliation", and thus avoid the thought that we have ever received the atonement or propitiation—God alone received that.

> "The reconciling of the world" (Rom. xi. 15).
> "The word of reconciliation" (II Cor. v. 18, 19).

Apokatallasso appears in the following passages:--

> "Reconcile the both" (Eph. ii. 16).
> "Reconcile all things" (Col. i. 20).
> "You hath He reconciled" (Col. i. 21).

If the reader will read through the above references, he will see that katallasso, katallage and apokatallasso are used exclusively by Paul.

We have written elsewhere upon the bearing of these facts upon the ministry of the apostle Paul (see "The Apostle of the Reconciliation") and must here confine ourselves to the epistle we are studying. We cannot, however, exclude the companion epistle to the Ephesians, for these two epistles are complemental and present the truth of the mystery from all angles.

Someone may ask the significance of the change of expression from katallasso to apokatallasso. It will be observed that the two words are not used indiscriminately, but are kept strictly to the two sets of Paul's epistles. The lesser word is used before Acts xxviii.; the fuller word is used only in the epistles of the mystery. The lesser word is used of a reconciliation made, but not necessarily experienced (see Rom. v. 10, xi. 15; II Cor. v. 19), whereas apokatallasso indicates a reconciliation made, entered into and appreciated—in other words, apo lends something of the thought of the word "mutual".

In Eph. ii. 16, where it occurs first, the reconciliation is confined to the two elements that entered into the creation of the new man:--

> "And that He might reconcile the both unto God in one body by the cross."

Its association with a new creation is important, and the reader should note that the word translated "make" in verse 15 really means "create":--

> "For to create in Himself of the twain one new man" (Eph. ii. 15).

Reconciliation and new creation are as much here in Eph. ii. as they are in Col. i. This church thus created is called "the fullness" in Eph. i. 23, of which Christ is the Head (Eph. i. 22). In the practical outworking of the doctrine of Eph. ii. we have the "new man which after God is created in righteousness and holiness of truth" (Eph. iv. 24), which still stresses the place that the new creation has in this teaching. The reconciliation of Eph. ii. is between the two sections forming the One Body—the enmity necessitating this reconciliation being represented by the middle wall of partition, which has been destroyed (see Col. ii. 14-17, where the word "ordinances" re-appears).

This reconciled church, however, has a destiny "far above all" and is composed of sinners who, before salvation, were alienated and enemies from all that is holy. The alienation that was cancelled in Eph. ii. was the alienation of the Gentile from all covenant relationship with God (see Eph. ii. 12). Here, the alienation to be cancelled is the alienation of enemies by reason of wickedness, so that they shall be "made sufficient" for their glorious and holy position at the right hand of God.

Distant Gentiles were "made nigh" by the blood of Christ (Eph. ii. 13): alienated sinners are reconciled by the blood of His cross, and in the body of His flesh, through death (Col. i. 20-22). The reconciliation of Eph. ii. brings about peace among the members of the body: the reconciliation of Col. i. brings about peace with regard to that body and the holy inhabitants of heavenly places. If we look at Eph. i. 23 we shall see that "the fullness", to pleroma, is balanced by "the all things", ta panta, and this is also true of Col. i. 19, 20:--

> "Because in Him it was well-pleasing that all the fullness, pan to pleroma, should dwell, and through Him to reconcile the all things, ta panta, unto Him, having made peace by the blood of His cross, whether things in earth or things in heaven."

The "all things" here cannot be considered universal, because by the self-same cross and at the self-same time those principalities and powers that were antagonistic were "spoiled" and "triumphed over" (Co. ii. 15).

There is much more than first meets the eye in the question of principalities and powers in relation to the church and the heavenly places. First, it will be seen that Christ is said to be the Head of both the church and principalities. There is, therefore, something in common between them. The church was chosen in Christ before the overthrow of the world, and our studies in the usage of the word "overthrow", katabole, and the Hebrew words tohu and bohu, "without form and void", left us without doubt that there was a defection and fall among these high spiritual powers whereby they lost their high position "in heavenly places". Further, a principle is evidently laid down in Deut. ii. which applies to the church and its heavenly inheritance, for there, over and over again, we read that giants, Anakim, etc., were dispossessed of their inheritance in the land of Canaan, and that Esau, Moab and others "inherited them":--

> "As Israel did unto the land of his possession" (Deut. ii. 12).

As we have already shown, the word "fullness" supposes a "rent" to be filled, a "schism" to be healed, and, in the heavenly section of the great restoration, the church of the one body is the "fullness" of Him Who, in His turn, will one day fill the "all things", so that from the highest glory to the ends of the earth there shall be one complete and glorious fullness that will bring about the saying that is written:--

> "That God may be all in all, ta panta en pasin" (I Cor. xv. 28).

Adoption in the three spheres.

In each sphere of blessing there is one special company who receive the adoption. On the earth among the nations the adoption belongs exclusively to Israel:--

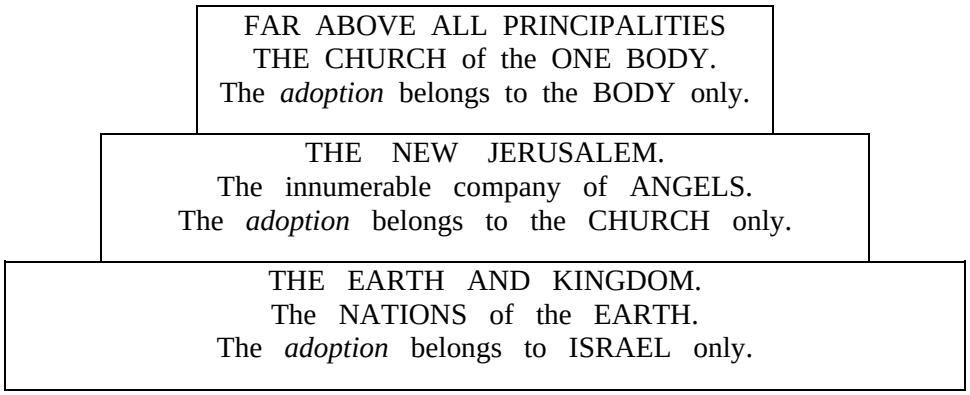
> "To whom pertaineth the adoption" (Rom. ix. 4), and Israel shall be "head and not tail" (Deut. xxviii. 13) in that day.
>
> "For the nation and kingdom that will not serve thee shall perish" (Isa. ix. 12).
>
> "But ye shall be named the priests of the Lord, men shall call you ministers of our God" (Isa. lxi. 6).

The second sphere is variously described as the New Jerusalem, Jerusalem which is above, the heavenly country and the heavenly city, and forms part of the teaching of Galatians, Hebrews and Revelation. The heavenly Jerusalem is the abode of angels:--

> "But ye are come unto Mount Zion, and unto the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem, and unto an innumerable company of angels, to the general assembly and church of the firstborn (the adoption) which are written in heaven" (Heb. xii. 22, 23).

Instead of being head among nations, as Israel will be upon the earth, those who receive the adoption (as taught in Gal. iv. 5) will inherit this high dignity in the New Jerusalem—sinner saved being raised "higher than the angels", and forming the blessed adoption in that second sphere.

The full blaze of glory, however, is reserved for the third and highest sphere. Here angels are not mentioned. Around the throne in ever widening circles are the principalities, the powers, the dominions and the thrones, but not one of these high beings have the adoption—that is reserved for the church chosen before the foundation of the world, and predestinated unto this adoption by God Himself. Higher than the highest principality or throne in the super-heavens is reserved the place of honour for that church which has been raised from the very lowest and degraded of mankind. Here is grace beyond dreams, and the great reconciliation between that chosen church and all the blessed occupants of that higher glory has been accomplished. Let us not pass this matter by too hurriedly, but let us re-state in diagram form what we have seen, so that its bearing upon our subject shall be fully realized.



So complete is the work of reconciliation, that this church, composed of aliens and enemies, shall be presented > "holy and unblameable and unreproveable in His sight" (Col. i. 22).

The heavenly host will have been already reconciled to this high privilege. Never again shall defection enter into the creation of God, for all are now vitally united to the Son of God Himself, Who is Head over all.

While the actual word "adoption" does not appear in Col. i., it is really incipient in the dual title of the Lord, "The Firstborn". Israel is God's Firstborn on the earth (Exod. iv. 22). The church of the New Jerusalem is the church of the Firstborn in that sphere (Heb. xii. 23). The church of the One Body is the church of the Firstborn "far above all". What grace! What glory! What a walk that must be that can be called "worthy"!

The Coming of the Lord.

#11. The N.T. fulfillment.
The testimony of John's Gospel.
pp. 21 - 23

We come now to the Gospel of John to discover whether it contains statements concerning the second coming of the Lord distinctive enough to justify the idea that here we find the hope of the church as something distinct from the hope of Israel. The first allusion to the coming of the Lord is found in John i. 51:--

> "Verily, verily, I say unto you, hereafter ye shall see heaven open, and the angels of God ascending and descending upon the Son of man."

Taking it for granted for the moment that this does speak of the second coming, what do we learn? In the first place there can be no doubt as to its reference to Jacob's dream at Bethel. That dream confirmed to Jacob the covenant made with Abraham and Isaac. Its burden was the "land", the multiplication of the "seed", and the great promise that in that seed all families of the earth should be blessed. Should any be tempted to introduce an argument from Galatians to the effect that the "seed" includes believing Gentiles, we would reply that the believing Gentiles cannot at the same time be both the "seed" and the "families of the earth" blessed by that seed. Details apart, however, there is nothing pre-eminently church-like in this reference to Gen. xxviii. Perhaps the context in John i. will supply the lack.

Nathaniel is described as "an Israelite indeed, in whom is no guile", and the Lord is described as the Son of God and the King of Israel. This is immediately followed by the wedding feast of Cana. We have therefore added to our knowledge of the second coming, but not one word have we learned concerning the distinctive hope of the church, for all is in line with Israel's hope.

In John v. 28 we have another reference that we may find speaks of the second coming. Take it for granted at the moment that it does speak of that coming, what do we learn?

> "The hour is coming, in which all that are in the graves shall hear His voice, and shall come forth; they that have done good, unto the resurrection of life; and they that have done evil, unto the resurrection of condemnation."

As it is a fact of the first importance that the hope of the church precedes the resurrection of the last day, we must see that while this passage is, in itself, a wonderful revelation of truth, there is nothing distinctive of the church here.

The next references are found in John xiv. 3, 18, 28:--

"And if I go to prepare a place for you, I will come again, and receive you unto Myself, that where I am, there ye may be also" (John xiv. 3).

"I will not leave you comfortless: I will come to you" (John xiv. 18).

"I go away, and come again unto you" (John xiv. 28).

We must remember that, however wide the application of these passages may be, they were spoken in the first place to the little band of disciples for their comfort and strength at the time of the Lord's apprehension and death. In John xvii. 20 the Lord differentiates between those addressed here, and those who should hereafter believe through their word, and unless we are to disregard all the statements of Matthew, and make the twelve apostles members of the church of the mystery, we must beware of reading into the revelation given in John xiv. truth unrevealed at the time.

Seeing that the Lord was ministering to the comfort of those who would be left "orphans" (xiv. 18), we do not get the details or the view point of prophecy, but instead the statement that although the Lord was leaving them to go to the Father (verse 28), When He came again He would receive them, be with them, and share with them the prepared places in the house of many mansions. It does not require much scriptural knowledge to see in this a reference to the holy city which shall come down out of heaven. To dwell in the house of the Lord for ever was the hope of the writer of Psa. xxiii. and of all the O.T. saints. The "Father's house" we suggest is the "tabernacle of God" which John describes in Rev. xxi. 3 and 9-27.

We know, of course, that many children of God look to the New Jerusalem as the abode of all the redeemed, and would most certainly include the apostles of the Lamb in the "church". To such we have no word here, for the argument would necessitate a resumé of the purpose of the ages; moreover, the subject is dealt with in the pamphlet entitled United yet Divided. Our words are at the moment directed to those who have learned to discern between Israel and the church, and between the bride and the body. Such will fail to discover in John's Gospel any direct or distinct testimony to the second coming that would sever it from the teaching of Matthew and the O.T. Prophets. John's remark in xxi. 23 has no real bearing upon the matter, and with this reference our examination of the testimony of the Gospels is brought to a conclusion. The witness is one. The coming of the Lord is set before us as the coming of the Son of man to take the kingdom and to reign, coming to give blessing and peace to those Israelites indeed who are without guile, and to sit on the throne of His glory and divide the nations in connection with their entry into the kingdom.

The next book to be examined is the Acts of the Apostles, and as this is a continuation of the four Gospels, we shall have a check upon our findings by the comparison of the two sets of teaching on this great subject.

#12. The N.T. fulfillment. Acts, and the hope of Israel.
pp. 61 - 64

The testimony of the Acts of the Apostles to the second coming of the Lord is found at the very opening of the book. As a result of forty days' instruction, opened Scriptures, and opened understanding, the apostles asked: "Lord, wilt Thou at this time restore again the kingdom to Israel?" (Acts i. 6).

Restoration.

While the actual time and season were not matters of revelation, the restoration of the kingdom to Israel was a very real scriptural hope of Israel, as the testimony of the O.T. and of the N.T. proves. At the ascension of the Lord the disciples are found steadfastly looking toward heaven, and two men in white apparel, evidently angels, say to them:--

> "Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into heaven? This same Jesus, which is taken up from you into heaven, SHALL SO COME IN LIKE MANNER as ye have seen Him go into heaven" (Acts i. 11).

This ascension took place from the mount of Olives (verse 12), and the words of the angels are a direct reference to Zech. xiv. 4, Dan. vii. and Matt. xxiv. 30. The words, "shall so come in like manner" spoken on the occasion, in the place, and circumstances detailed, compel us to understand that the Lord's coming, as referred to here, will be

(1) In connection with the restoration of the kingdom to Israel.
(2) With the clouds of heaven.
(3) Accompanied by angels (the men in white).
(4) To the mount of Olives, near Jerusalem.

If these accompaniments are legitimately included in the words "so come" and "like manner", we have but added to the kingdom passages and O.T. references, and have introduced no feature that can be distinctly called "church truth", unless it be the elective character of the company that witnessed the ascension. As there was not a single Gentile in the company, this exclusiveness cannot be made to indicate the church.

Between the opening reference to the second coming and the next statement in Acts iii. 19-26 comes Pentecost, and if the statement that "the church began at Pentecost" is true, we may find a very distinct development in doctrine. It will be found that Peter addresses "men of Israel", and speaks of God as "the God of Abraham, and of Isaac, and of Jacob, the God of our fathers" (Acts iii. 12, 13).

> "Repent ye therefore, and be converted, that your sins may be blotted out" (Acts iii. 19).

These opening words have a more evangelical note than those of Acts i. 11, yet they are but the necessary prelude to the blessings in store for Israel. This is no gospel message to the "unsaved" as such. Further, this repentance, conversion, and blotting out of sins are > "so that seasons of refreshing may come from the presence of the Lord, and He may send Jesus Christ, Which before was preached unto you: Whom heaven must receive until the times of restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all His holy prophets since (the) age" (Acts iii. 20, 21).

If the opening reference of Acts i. 11 be connected with the "restoration" of the kingdom to Israel, this second reference is intimately connected with the "restoration" of all things that had been spoken by God through the prophets. This restoration is so clearly defined in the prophets (see series entitled "Studies in the Prophets" in Volume XVII), as to preclude anything distinctly applicable to the "church", and provides a most definite answer to the apostles' question: "Wilt Thou at this time restore again the kingdom to Israel?"

The closing verses of Acts iii. but add their quota in confirmation of this same fact:--

> "For Moses . . . . . all the prophets from Samuel . . . . . ye are the children of the prophets, and of the covenant, which God made with our fathers, saying unto Abraham, And in thy seed shall all families of the earth be blessed. Unto you first God, having raised up His Son Jesus, sent Him to bless you, in turning away every one of you from his iniquities" (Acts iii. 22-26).

As an immediate outcome of the healing of the lame man at the gate of the temple, Peter uttered the words we have just considered in iii. 19-26. Being further opposed by the rulers, Peter urges the typical nature of this miracle—it was the nation's restoration in miniature:--

> "This is the stone which was set at nought of you builders, which is become the head of the corner. Neither is there THE HEALING (i.e., the national one) in any other . . . . ." (Acts iv. 11, 12).

Here we have further light upon iii. 19, 20. The heavens must receive Him until the time of restoration, because He was set at nought and will not return until the time for Israel's healing has come.

A reference to the Psalms here quoted by Peter will show that he had the second coming in view:--

> "The stone which the builders refused is become the head stone of the corner . . . . . Hosannah (save now) . . . . . Blessed is He that cometh in the name of the Lord; we have blessed you out of the house of the Lord" (Psa. cxviii. 22-26).

This quotation, moreover, will show the connection between Matt. xxiii. 38, 39 and xxiv. 1, 2, a connection obvious to those who were familiar with O.T. Scripture, as the disciples were, but to the less instructed apparently without true sequence.

Rejection.

The fact that the restoration is deferred to future times indicates rejection. Stephen touches upon this in the speech that led to his martyrdom. His words revolve around two typical incidents in the lives of Joseph and Moses:--

> "And at THE SECOND TIME Joseph was made known to his brethren" (Acts vii. 13).
> "This Moses whom they refused, saying, Who made thee a ruler and a judge? The same did God send to be a ruler and a deliverer" (Acts vii. 35).

These two typical events Stephen brought to bear upon Israel's rejection of the Lord and of His second coming, and when his hearers were cut to the heart, Stephen looked up into heaven and said, "I see the heavens opened, and the Son of man standing on the right hand of God" (Acts vii. 55, 56), which is but another reference to Dan. vii.

The Judge of quick and dead.

Peter and Paul refer to the second coming by stating that the Lord Jesus was to be the Judge of the quick and the dead:--

> "He commanded us to preach unto the people, and to testify that it is He which was ordained of God to be the Judge of quick and the dead" (Acts x. 42).
> "He hath appointed a day in the which He will judge the world in righteousness by that Man Whom He hath ordained' (Acts xvii. 31).

The charge against Paul, in this same chapter, was that he preached "another King, one Jesus" (Acts xvii. 7). The statement in Rev. xi. 18: "the time of the dead, that they should be judged", is at the sounding of the seventh trumpet when great voices in heaven proclaim that "the kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord and of His Christ" (Rev. xi. 15-18). It needs the introduction of another word to bring these passages into the range of the hope of the church, and that word is not used of the second coming during the Acts.

The last reference we turn to is found in Acts xxviii. Paul's ministry as recorded in this book is drawing to its close. A fresh, unexplained ministry is in view. Whatever name the apostle shall give to the hope he entertained in this chapter when the epistles to Galatians, Thessalonians, Corinthians and Romans had already been written, must indicate the hope that covers all that period. In verse 20 he tells us that it was "for the hope of Israel" that he was bound with a chain. Now if the hope of the church during the Acts was something peculiar, something secret, something special, how could Paul,--the preacher of truth, the advocate of right division, the steward of the mysteries--how could he say such a thing? The blessing of the nations under the Abrahamic covenant is not "church" truth, but is involved in the "restoration" made known by the holy prophets (Acts iii. 19-26). Throughout the Acts ministry, for this selfsame reason, Paul put the "Jew first" (Acts iii. 26; Gal. iii. 13, 14; Rom. xv. 8, 9, 12, 13).

So far, the testimony of the Acts, both before and after Pentecost, is in perfect harmony with that of the four Gospels and the O.T. Prophets. The Epistles and the Revelation must now be studied, and we shall then have considered all that has been written for our learning, and refrain from attempting to draw conclusions without sufficient information.

#13. The N.T. fulfillment.
The witness of Peter and James to the dispersion.
pp. 101 - 104

As all that we have yet seen of our subject has been very definitely connected with Israel, it would seem wise to leave Paul's testimony until we have completed our study of the remainder of the N.T., and considered the testimony of James, Cephas and John as ministers to the circumcision (Gal. ii. 7-9). Accordingly we turn to the epistle of James.

The true rendering of the word "James" is "Jacob". That the translators of the King James' Version should use this name is not surprising when we remember that followers of King James were called "Jacobites". The opening verse of the epistle reads, therefore:--

> "Jacob, a servant of God, and of the Lord Jesus Christ, to the TWELVE TRIBES which are scattered abroad."

If any reader maintains that the "twelve tribes" is an appropriate title of the church which knows neither Greek nor Jew, we cannot approve of his logic, though we can readily admit his inconsistency if he takes to himself the whole epistle; but for those who have learned to distinguish things that differ, a letter addressed to the twelve tribes, though it may possess the full authority and blessing which belong to "all Scripture", must of necessity contain much that cannot strictly refer to the church.

The theme of the epistle is that of patience in tribulation, with glory in prospect at the end. With this theme the first chapter opens, and with it the last chapter closes:--

> "Be patient, therefore, brethren, unto the coming of the Lord. Behold the husbandman waiteth for the precious fruit of the earth, and hath long patience for it, until he receive the early and latter rain. Be ye also patient: stablish your hearts: for the coming of the Lord draweth nigh . . . . . ye have heard of the patience of Job . . . . ." (James v. 7-11).

James here refers to some of the O.T. prophets for his figures:--

> "After two days He will revive us, in the third day He will raise us up, and we shall live in His sight . . . . . He shall come unto us as the rain, as the latter and former rain unto the earth" (Hos. vi. 2, 3).

Joel, also, speaks of the former and latter rain in direct connection with the restoration and Pentecost (Joel ii. 23-31). It is not by accident that towards the close of chapter v.

James speaks again of the rain, this time of its withholding from the earth for a period of three years and a half (James v. 17). As we have already seen, James writes to Israel, urging patience, and using the figure of the husbandman; and he includes the actual period of three and a half years that Revelation indicates to be the time of Israel's greatest testing (Rev. xiii. 5). Moreover, in chapter v., he speaks of the "Judge standing before the door" (James v. 9).

We now pass on to the fuller testimony of Peter. In the opening greeting of the epistle of James the wording is literally, "To the twelve tribes, to those in the dispersion" (en te diaspora). Peter follows the same course and addresses his epistle to the "sojourners of a dispersion" (diasporas). The word diaspeiro implies the thought of sowing, as seed, the choice of the term being in harmony with the prophecy of Hos. ii. 23, and the title of Jezreel.

James speaks of the need of patience during the time of tribulation; Peter also speaks of the need of patience and of a similar time of fiery trial. In connection with this period of trial the apostle brings into prominence the second coming of the Lord:--

> "That the trial of your faith, being much more precious than of gold that perisheth (though it—i.e., perishing gold—be tried with fire), might be found unto praise and honour and glory at the revelation of Jesus Christ" (I Pet. i. 7).

It is necessary to keep distinct the two words, "appearing" and "revelation". The translators of the A.V., not having seen the dispensational distribution of terms dealing with the Lord's coming, have used the word "appearing" here for "revelation", but this is not sufficiently accurate. Apokalupsis should always be translated by the word "revelation"; the translators themselves have rendered its verbal form "revealed" in James i. 5 and 12, and in verse 13 the actual word is correctly rendered:--

> "Wherefore gird up the loins of your mind, be sober, and hope to the end (or perfectly) for the grace that is to be brought unto you at the revelation of Jesus Christ."

The apostle reverts to the fiery trial and its connection with the coming of the Lord in chapter iv.:--

> "Beloved, think it not strange concerning the fiery trial which is to try you . . . . . but rejoice inasmuch as ye are partakers of Christ's sufferings, that, when His glory shall be revealed, ye may be glad also with exceeding joy" (I Pet. iv. 12, 13).

This perfect balance of teaching is the more strikingly emphasized when we remember that the true rendering of I Pet. i. 11 is not, "the sufferings of Christ", but the "sufferings for Christ, and the glories that should follow". This does not, of course, by any means deny the truth that the one great basis of all glory is the suffering of Christ, and to this Peter refers before his epistles closes:--

> "The elders that are among you I exhort, who am also an elder, and a witness of the sufferings of Christ, and also a partaker of the glory that shall be revealed: feed the flock of God . . . . . And when the Chief Shepherd shall appear, ye shall receive a crown of glory that fadeth not away" (I Pet. v. 1-4).

In this passage we have portrayed the intimate connection between the sufferings of Christ, and the sufferings for Christ, for a "witness", here, is not a mere spectator, but one who is willing, if need be, to seal his testimony by death. The word is translated "witness" and "martyr" in the Revelation (i. 5 and ii. 13). Martyrdom was not far away from those to whom Peter wrote, and in his closing words he still has this in mind:--

> "But the God of all grace, Who hath called us unto His eternal glory by Christ Jesus, after that ye have suffered awhile, make you perfect . . . . ." (I Pet. v. 10).

The second epistle does not add materially to the teaching of the first on this subject, but is concerned with the denial of the Lord's coming and the problem of its apparent delay. "Knowing this first" are the key-words:--

> "Knowing this first, that no prophecy of the Scripture is of its own unfolding" (II Pet. i. 20).
> "Knowing this first, that there shall come in the last days scoffers" (II Pet. iii. 3).

The first passage deals with the certainty of the fulfillment of the prophecy concerning the Lord's coming; the second deals with those who, by misunderstanding the results of certain dispensational changes, denied the fulfillment of the promise altogether. In both contexts there is, as we shall see, an appeal to Scripture:--

> "For we have not followed cunningly devised fables, when we made known unto you the power and coming of our Lord Jesus Christ" (II Pet. i. 16).

This statement the apostle establishes in two ways: first, by introducing the type of the Mount of Transfiguration; and secondly, by the word of prophecy made more sure.

In chapter iii. Peter still holds most firmly to the truth, and will not for a moment admit that the Lord is slack concerning His promise. It is unwise, the apostle declares, even to measure length of time by our own understandings, for in some things a day may be as a thousand years, or a thousand years as a day. The coming of the Lord for which Peter waited, however, was that coming which is connected with the day of the Lord, the dissolving of heavens, and the burning up of the elements, events that usher in the new heavens and the new earth. There is no uncertainty as to what Peter hoped for; the uncertainty comes in at the point where the subject passes from Peter's province to Paul's. Referring to the apparent delay in the fulfillment of the promise of the Lord's return, Peter says:--

> "Account that the longsuffering of our Lord is salvation, even as our beloved brother Paul also according to the wisdom given unto him hath writings unto you, as also in all his epistles, speaking in them of these things; in which are some things hard to be understood, which they that are unlearned and unstable wrest, as they do also the other scriptures, unto their own destruction" (II Pet. iii. 15, 16).

Several items of importance are contained in these words:--

1. Paul's epistles are classed with "the other scriptures", and these Peter has already testified to be inspired (II Pet. i. 16-21).

2. Peter, though an apostle, confesses that some of Paul's teaching is "hard to be understood".
3. The fact that the coming of the Lord had not taken place as had been expected must not, says the apostle, be considered "slackness", but concerning a full and inspired explanation of the purpose of God during this interval, one man only had received a message, and that man was Paul.

Not one word has been added by either James or Peter that is not a legitimate expansion of O.T. prophecy. The second coming of the Lord is rooted deep in the scriptures of the old covenant.

#14. The N.T. fulfillment. The witness of John.
pp. 147 - 150

We have already considered the testimony of James and Peter; and we have now to deal with the testimony of the apostle John, who was also a minister of the circumcision. His three epistles and the book of the Revelation will complete this phase of survey, as Jude's witness has already received attention. The first reference to the Lord's coming is I John ii. 28:--

> "And now, little children, abide in Him; that, when He shall appear, we may have confidence, and not be ashamed before Him at His coming."

While the general teaching of this passage is true for all the saints, there are some features that hedge it about and limit its interpretation. The "abiding" here is, in a special sense, connected with the "anointing":--

> "But the anointing which ye have received of Him abideth in you, and ye need not that any man teach you; but was the same anointing teacheth you of all things, and is truth and is no lie, and even as it hath taught you, ye shall abide in Him."

This anointing is a feature of the period when supernatural gifts obtained in the church, and its character may be gathered from the statement that the anointed person needed no one to teach him. By comparing II Cor. i. 21, 22 with Eph. i. 13, 14 we observe an inspired omission that reveals plainly the distinctive difference between the two dispensations:--

> "Now He which stablisheth us with you in Christ, and hath anointed us, is God; Who hath also sealed us, and given the earnest of the Spirit in our hearts" (II Cor. i. 21, 22).
> "Ye were sealed with the holy promissory Spirit, which is the earnest of our inheritance' (Eph. i. 13, 14).

It will be seen that the sealing and the earnest apply both before and after Acts xxviii., but that in II Cor. i. there is the added thought of "stablishing" and also the "anointing". The anointing in a special way taught the believer "to abide in Him", with the second coming in view. That coming would be a time of judgment for the works of the redeemed, and the anointing would lead them so to live that they might not "be ashamed before Him at His coming".

Chapter iii. continues the consideration of the effect of the hope of the Lord's coming upon the present life of the believer:--

> "We know that when He shall appear, we shall be like Him; for we shall see Him as He is. And every man that hath this hope on Him, purifieth himself, even as He is pure" (I John iii. 2, 3).

It would often help us if we could more readily conform to the principles of Scripture concerning knowledge: "We know not"—"But we know." There is a fascination about the unrevealed that often obscures the necessity for putting into practice the truth for the present. The Corinthians were lacking in spirituality; and it is the Corinthian church that raises the question, "With what body do they come?" (I Cor. xv. 35). They were more concerned with the unrevealed future than with the necessity to walk worthy of their calling:--

> "We know not what WE SHALL BE, but WE KNOW . . . . . we shall be like Him" (I John iii. 2).

There is, possibly, a reference to the second coming in the Second Epistle of John:--

> "For many deceivers are entered into the world, who confess not that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh. This is a deceiver and an anitchrist" (II John 7).

In the first epistle we have a similar passage:--

> "Every spirit that confesseth not that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh is not of God: and this is that spirit of antichrist" (I John iv. 3).

In the originals of these two passages there is a difference in the verb, I John iv. using eleluthota—the perfect participle—and II John 7, erchomenon—the present participle. The intention of the writer in the use of these two participles seems to be to refer to the first and the second comings. In the first epistles, the Lord "has come"; while in the second, He "is coming". Antichristian teaching denies both that the Lord has come and that He will come again in the flesh.

There remains the book of the Revelation. The latter is so largely concerned with the subject of the Lord's coming that we can do little more here than refer to the series of articles concluded in Volume XV on that book. The coming of the Lord is the theme of the book and is connected with the establishment of Israel as a kingdom of priests, and of the Lord as "Prince of the kings of the earth". It is a fulfillment of the prophecy of Zech. xii. 10, and has to do with "the tribes of the land", and "the day of the Lord". All this is contained in the first chapter.

The actual revelation of the Lord is described in Rev. xix., and is closely associated with the destruction of Babylon, the marriage of the Lamb, the great slaughter which is called the supper of the great God, and the millennial reign. He comes to "smite the nations" and to "rule them with a rod of iron"; and He "treads the winepress of the fierceness and wrath of Almighty God", a fulfillment of the prophecy of vengeance in Isa. lxiii. 1-3. With the promise, "Surely I come quickly", and the answering prayer, "Even so, come, Lord Jesus", the testimony of this book closes.

We have now to review the teaching of the apostle Paul in order to compare it with what we have already seen. We shall then be in some degree fitted to come to a conclusion on the matter. To this study we must address ourselves in subsequent papers.

#15. The N.T. fulfillment. The patience of hope (I Thessalonians).

pp. 190 - 194

We have now passed in review the teaching of the Scriptures concerning the second coming of the Lord, with the exception of the epistles of Paul. These epistles fall into two groups, those written before the end of the Acts, and those written during the Roman imprisonment. The first group contains six epistles:--

A | GALATIANS.
B | I & II THESSALONIANS.
B | I & II CORINTHIANS.
A | ROMANS.

We have discussed the question of the date of Galatians in our book entitled, The Apostle of the Reconciliation, but as the subject of the second coming does not occur in this epistle, the matter of its date is not important here. The first epistle in this group that deals with the second coming is I Thessalonians.

The patience of hope.

Are we justified in using this title for the first epistle to the Thessalonians? The answer to the question reveals an important fact that Paul is the apostle of hope.

Elpis, "hope", does not occur once in the four Gospels, but in Paul's Epistles, including Hebrews, the word is used 41 times. Of the eight occurrences in the Acts Peter is responsible for one, and Paul for six. There are only four other occurrences, so that out of a total of 53 occurrences of elpis ("hope" or "faith") Paul is responsible for 47. Much the same is true of the verb elpizo, "to hope" or "to trust". It occurs 31 times, and of this number Paul is responsible for 21. The word is not used by Paul or by the other writers of the N.T. exclusively of the second coming, but the fact remains that whether the hope be the second coming, the resurrection, the hope of Israel, or some more personal and immediate aspect, it is Paul who is its chief exponent.

Returning to the Thessalonian epistle:--

"Remembering without ceasing your work of faith, and labour of love and patience of hope in our Lord Jesus Christ" (i. 3).

This is enlarged in verses 9 and 10:--

"Ye turned to God from idols to serve the living and true God; and to wait for His Son from heaven . . . even Jesus, which delivered us from the wrath to come" (i. 9, 10).

That the verses 9 and 10 are an expansion of verse 3 seems to be clear from the structure:--

I Thess. i. 3-10.

A | i. 3. | a | Work of faith.
b | Labour of love.
c | Patience of hope.
B | 4, 5. "For." The gospel to. | d | Not only.
e | But also.
f | What manner.
C | 6. Followers of us.
D | 6. The word received.
C | 7. Examples to others.
B | 8, 9. "For." The word from. | d | Not only.
e | But also.
f | What manner.
A | 9, 10. | a | Turned to God.
b | Serve God.
c | Wait for His Son from heaven.

A comparison between the original words for "patience" and "waiting" is very suggestive. "Patience" is hupomone, from hupomeno, and "to await" is anameno. The word meno, "to abide", is common to both; to one is added hupo, "under", and to the other ano, "above". There is a wealth of meaning here. We may not be able to find English equivalents for these words, but the instructed believer will appreciate the dual teaching. He finds strength to "remain under" because in spirit he "remains above". So in Col. iii. we are exhorted to set our mind on things above (ano); and in Phil. iii. we learn that our citizenship already exists in heaven, and from that standpoint we expect the Saviour.

The words of verse 3, "Patience of hope in our Lord Jesus Christ", should, literally, be rendered, "The patience of the hope of our Lord Jesus Christ", a reading which must be taken into account when seeking the meaning of II Thess. iii. 5, which, as the margin shows, should read: "The love of God, and the patience of Christ." The bearing of I Thess. i. 3 and 10 seems to justify the A.V. in its rendering of II Thess. iii. 5, unless of course we interpret I Thess. i. 3, as the patience of hope that characterized the Lord Himself, which, however, does not fit the context.

It is time we looked at the testimony of the epistle as a whole to the second coming.

I Thessalonians.

A | i. 3. The patience of hope.
B | i. 10. Waiting for God's Son. "Wrath."
C | ii. 19. Servant's joy at Lord's coming. "Our."
D | iii. 13. Lord's coming with holy ones (angels).
D | iv. 15, 16. Lord's coming with shout (archangel).
C | v. 2, 3. World's sorrow at Lord's coming. "They."
B | v. 8, 9. The hope of salvation. "Wrath."
A | v. 23. Preserve blameless.

It will be seen by comparing i. 10 with v. 8, 9, that deliverance from wrath by the coming of God's Son from heaven constituted the believer's helmet, "the hope of salvation". The reader will remember that the aspect is changed in Eph. vi. where the helmet is simply "the helmet of salvation". The wrath that hung over the Acts period was closely associated with the day of the Lord and with Israel, for we read in I Thess. ii. 16, that "wrath is come upon them to the uttermost".

The patience of hope in i. 3 is connected with the Thessalonians' manifest "election"; the "preserving blameless" in v. 23 is connected with their "calling". The reference in verse 23 to the hope of being preserved in spirit, soul and body blameless at the coming of the Lord has special reference to the hope of living and remaining on the earth at that time. Sanctification is stressed in iv. 3-7, but the sanctification here seems to include the preservation of the individual, the word "wholly" being oloteles—"completely whole". It has reference to the preservation of "spirit and soul and body", a preservation expressed in iv. 17 as being "alive and remaining" until the coming of the Lord. This hope of living and remaining until the coming of the Lord is a characteristic of the Acts period; it is warranted by the testimony of Acts iii. 19, 20, as well as of Matt. xvi. 27, 28 and other passages.

It has often been taught that chapter v. indicates that "times and seasons" did not belong to the Thessalonians as members of the church, and that the coming of the Lord for them was unrelated to the day of the Lord or to any time fulfillment of prophecy. We must remember this when we turn to the second epistle, but even in chapter v. of this epistle we find a very different reason given by the apostle:--

> "But of the times and the seasons, brethren, ye have no need that I write unto you . . . . ."

Why? Because the hope of the church was unrelated to times and seasons? No, rather for the obvious reason given by the apostle:--

> "For yourselves know perfectly that the day of the Lord so cometh as a thief in the night."

This does not teach that the coming of the Lord is to be considered as a "secret rapture". The passage simply states that unlike the world, proclaiming "peace and safety" with sudden destruction imminent, the church was so instructed as to know that the day of the Lord was to come like a thief in the night, and that, knowing this, it would not be "overtaken". The church is contrasted with the "overtaken" world as children of light are contrasted with darkness. They are urged to vigilance and to put on the armour in view of the hope of salvation. This exhortation arises naturally out of the earlier verses as written, but it has no meaning if this church expected to be taken away before that day had come.

There is an intimate connection which may be easily seen between the close of I Thess. iv. and the opening of I Thess. v. I Thess. iv. 13 opens with the words "I would not have you ignorant", and in v. 2 the apostle continues, "You yourselves know perfectly". Both sections deal with "sleep" and both end with the thought of "comfort". In I Thess. iv. 14 we read:--

> "For if we believe that Jesus died and rose again, even so them also that sleep in Jesus will God bring with Him."

If we interpret this to mean, that when the Lord Jesus returns He will bring the saints who have fallen asleep with Him from heaven, what can be the meaning of the next verses, which distinctly teach that the living shall take no precedence over the saints who have died, but that together they shall meet the Lord in the air, and "thus" and thus only be for ever "with the Lord"? The passage refers to the resurrection: "We believe that God will bring—ago—(from the dead) with Him" (Who was also brought from the dead—anago—Heb. xiii. 20). The apostle was ministering the comfort of the Scriptures to those who were sorrowing for the dead in Christ, and his comfort is resurrection at the Lord's coming. The actual return of the Lord is described in I Thess. iv. 16:--

> "The Lord Himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God."

We see no reason to teach that the "Lord Himself" is the "archangel" here. We have already seen, in considering the teaching of Jude, that "Michael the archangel" is closely linked with the Lord's coming. Moreover, Dan. xii. 1, 2 is a passage which must not be lightly set aside:--

> "And at that time shall Michael stand up, the great prince which standeth for the children of thy people, and there shall be a time of trouble, such as never was since there was a nation even to that same time: and at that time thy people shall be delivered, every one that shall be found written in the book. And many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake."

Now if the archangel of I Thess. iv. be the Michael of Dan. xii., we have a strong link established between the hope of Israel and the hope of the church during the Acts. Further links come to light in II Thess., but our space is limited, and we may be able to look back to this epistle when dealing with the second letter to the same church.

If it should be asked how it has come about that so many errors have been introduced into the teaching of these epistles, we can only put it down to the fact that as a result of confusing the two dispensations divided by Acts xxviii., truth gathered from Paul's later ministry has been brought back into this earlier period.

#16. The N.T. fulfillment.
Rest from tribulation (II Thessalonians).
pp. 230 - 234

Unless it had been very seriously urged upon us that the teaching of I Thessalonians deals with a secret phase of the Lord's coming, while that of II Thessalonians refers to an aspect very different from the hope of the church, we should not feel it necessary to draw attention to the obvious fact that these two epistles were written to the same church upon the same theme, and that there is not the slightest warrant for the teaching that they have been used to support.

We have already seen in I Thess. i. 3 that the apostle remembered their work of faith, their labour of love, and their patience of hope. In II Thess. i. 3, 4 he takes up this same theme:--

> "We are bound to thank God always for you, brethren, as it is meet, because that your faith groweth exceedingly, and the love of every one of you all toward each other aboundeth; so that we ourselves glory in you in the churches of God for your patience and faith in all your persecutions and tribulations that ye endures."

This church had received the word in tribulation (I Thess. i. 6), and in every place their faith had gone forth. In II Thessalonians this tribulation had continued. And the churches of God heard of the Thessalonians' attitude through the apostle's boasting concerning them. In each of the three qualities, faith, love and hope, had these saints grown. Yet we are asked by some teachers to believe that a special secret rapture awaited I Thessalonian believers, while the believers of the second epistle were to pass through the tribulation of the day of the Lord and experience the sufferings of the reign of the beast.

While it may be easy at this distance to settle the hope of these early saints, it would have proved more difficult to have persuaded the Thessalonians themselves by such illogical deduction. The process of reasoning seems to be somewhat as follows: I Thess. iv. must be a secret rapture; and, from I Thess. v., an event having no connection with times and seasons or the day of the Lord. II Thess. ii., however, speaks of the coming of the Lord as not taking place until after the manifestation of the man of sin, and of the coming of the Lord in flaming fire. It is therefore assumed that the coming of I Thess. iv. takes place before the rise of the man of sin, and the coming of II Thessalonians after that manifestation.

The recognition that the true "secret rapture" belongs to the prison ministry of the apostle sets us free from this vain attempt to find the hope of the one body in the earlier epistles. The saints here, sorrowing for those who have fallen asleep, are comforted by the fact that they, together with those who have fallen asleep, and at the same time, shall meet the Lord in the air. The same saints in their sorrow on account of their own tribulation through which they are passing, are comforted by the fact that "rest" shall be theirs.

> "When the Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven with His mighty angels, in flaming fire taking vengeance on them that know not God" (II Thess. i. 7, 8).

It was of this same event that the apostle had written in I Thess. iii. 13:--

> "To the end He may establish your hearts unblameable in holiness before God, even our Father, at the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ with all His holy ones" (angels).

And in verse 3 the apostle speaks of sending Timothy to comfort them—"that no man should be moved by these tribulations".

We have not to rest our faith merely upon deduction, comparison and inference, for in II Thess. ii. 1, 2 the apostle declares that those who were spreading abroad the teaching that the day of the Lord was at hand, were false teachers, speaking the doctrine of demons:--

> "Now we beseech you, brethren, by the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, and by our gathering together unto Him, that ye be not soon shaken in mind, or be troubled, neither by SPIRIT, nor by WORD, nor by LETTER, as from us, as that the day of Christ (or the Lord) is at hand."

This was a threefold attempt to deceive.

The words, "by spirit", refer to the miraculous gifts in the church, which, being travestied by Satan, required to be "tried" to see that they were "of God". The evil is countered in this chapter by that sanctification of "the Spirit" that is associated with "belief of the truth" (ii. 13).

"By word" refers to the method of passing on the instruction. The apostle, at the close of chapter ii., reminds them of the source of authority:--

> "Hold the traditions which ye have been taught, whether by word, or our epistle."

And in iii. 17 he pointedly refers to the false "epistle":--

> "The salutation of Paul, with mine own hand, which is the token in every epistle; so I write."

Returning to chapter i., we find that the apostle declares that a series of prophetic events must take place before the Lord's coming:--

1. The apostacy must come, for such is the word "falling away".
2. The man of sin must be revealed.
3. The revelation of the wicked one must take place.
4. This will be preceded by great Satanic signs, and wonders and lying miracles.

When these things have come to pass, then only will the coming of the Lord take place:--

"Whom the Lord shall consume with the spirit of His mouth, and shall destroy with the brightness of His coming" (ii. 3-12).

This takes us back to the first chapter, unless we are to understand that upon two separate occasions the Lord shall be revealed in flaming fire taking vengeance. As we have no warrant for this suggestion, we conclude that the "tribulation" from which these believers should find "rest" at the coming of the Lord is the tribulation connected with the "man of sin" of chapter ii. This tribulation is "such as was not since the beginning of the world to this time, no, nor ever shall be" (Matt. xxiv. 21). This unparalleled intensity of tribulation irresistibly takes us back to Dan. xii., where Michael the archangel is connected with a time of trouble "such as never was since there was a nation even to that same time". Unless we can believe the contradiction of two unprecedented times of trouble, I Thess. iv. and II Thess. i. & ii. must be inseparable and refer to one event. This being so, the hope of I & II Thessalonians coincides with that of Matt. xxiv., for we have the same events foretold in each case:--

1. The desolation in the holy place (Matt. xxiv. 15 and II Thess. ii. 4).
2. The great tribulation (Matt. xxiv. 21 and II Thess. i. 6, 7; I Thess iv. 16; Dan. xii. 1).
3. The false Christs and false prophets (Matt. xxiv. 24 and II Thess. ii. 3-8).
4. The great signs and miracles (Matt. xxiv. 24 and II Thess. ii. 9, 10).
5. The brightness of His coming (Matt. xxiv. 27 and II Thess. i. 8, ii. 8).
6. The coming of the Lord after the tribulation, and the "gathering" of His "elect" (Matt. xxiv. 29-31; II Thess ii. 1, episunago).
7. The angels and the trumpet (Matt. xxiv. 31; I Thess iv. 17, iii. 13; II Thess. i. 7).
8. The parable of the fig tree. "When ye see . . . . . it is near" (Matt. xxiv. 32, 33; II Thess. ii. 1-9).

The attempt to divorce the hope of Israel from that of the church of the Acts fails completely. No attempt to do so would have been made if it had been recognized that the church of the one body came into being after Acts xxviii. The church of Thessalonica held the teaching of Matt. xxiv. and Dan. xii. as their own, and knew that their hope found its setting amid the "blood and fire and pillars of smoke" of the Pentecostal remnant. This leads us to the day of the Lord, the great unveiling, and the book of the revelation of Jesus Christ.

I Corinthians xv. and the second death.
pp. 5 - 7

We have in earlier issues set forth the reasons that are provided in I Cor. xv. itself for limiting its references to death and resurrection to the death brought in by Adam; which necessarily excludes any reference to the lake of fire in I Cor. xv. 26. We did not at the time draw attention to the parallel that exists between the events of I Cor. xv. and of Rev. xx., xxi. As the question is one of great importance, and as I Cor. xv. 24-27 is the basis of the teaching that those cast into the second death must be revived, we need make no apology for this added note.

The records in I Cor. xv. and Rev. xx., xxi. keep pace so completely, that the parallel when set out speaks for itself. After settling the question concerning the fact of the resurrection, the apostle in I Cor. xv. 21, 22 commences the revelation of its teaching, taking us back to the first Adam, with his entail of death, and on to the last Adam, with His gift of life (I Cor. xv. 45). It is perfectly gratuitous to interpolate in verse 26 a reference to the second death which is unconnected with Adam or Adam's sin.

I Cor. xv. and Rev. xx., xxi.

THE DEAD.

"As in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive" (I Cor. xv. 22).
"I saw the dead, small and great, stand before God" (Rev. xx. 12).

THE ORDER.

"Every man in his own order. Christ the Firstfruits: afterward they that are Christ's at His coming" (I Cor. xv. 23).
"Blessed and holy is he that hath part in the first resurrection; on such the second death hath no power" (Rev. xx. 6).
"The rest of the dead lived not again until the thousand years were finished" (Rev. xx. 5).

THE END.

(i.) "That God may be all in all" (I Cor. xv. 28).
"Behold, I make all things new" (Rev. xxi. 5).
(ii.) "He must reign, till He hath put all enemies under His feet" (I Cor. xv. 25).
"They lived and reigned with Christ a thousand years" (Rev. xx. 4).
"He that sat upon the throne said, Behold, I make all things new" (Rev. xxi. 5).
(iii.) "The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death" (I Cor. xv. 26).
"Death and hades were cast into the lake of fire" (Rev. xx. 14).
"There shall be no more death" (Rev. xxi. 4)

Here everything is accounted for, and nothing is left to the imagination. The resurrections are from the same death; the order is the same. Paul was not making known the dispensation of the mystery in I Cor. xv., neither was he teaching the doctrine of the ages. He was dealing with the question of resurrection, and traversed the same order of events which led up to the same goal, as John saw in the apocalypse.

At the time of writing to the Corinthians the apostle declared that at their low spiritual level they were not able to bear any teaching that was stronger than “milk”. We believe the apostle’s own statement beyond the conjectures of any man, and to foist the doctrine of resurrection from the second death upon I Cor. xv. is reprehensible.

We trust that this simple note will lead the reader to “search and see”.

#7. The vision of the great tree (iv.).
pp. 33 - 39

Chapter iv. of Daniel is perhaps one of the most remarkable in the Bible, for it was not written by Daniel, but by or at the order of Nebuchadnezzar himself. That some mighty change was wrought in this king, going down and undermining the very depths of his faith in the gods of his fathers, will be evident if we place side by side an extract from the India House Inscription B.C.606 (an ascription of praise by Nebuchadnezzar to one of his heathen gods) and en extract from Dan. iv.:--

India House Inscription.	Dan. iv. 1-3, 30, 37.
"To Merodach my lord I prayed and lifted up my hand. O Merodach, firstborn of the gods, mighty prince who didst create me, and has entrusted to me the sovereignty over hosts of men; as my own precious life I do love the nobility of thy divinity. In all the inhabitable earth I have seen no city fairer than thy city Babylon . . . . . I, the king, am thy adorer . . . . . appointed a priest-king to be the restorer of all thy cities. By thy command, O Merodach, merciful one, may this temple which I have made endure for ever."	"Nebuchadnezzar the king, unto all the people, nations, and languages, that dwell in all the earth; Peace be multiplied unto you. I thought it good to show the signs and wonders that the high God hath wrought toward me. How great are his signs! and how mighty His wonders! His kingdom, and His dominion is from generation to generation . . . . . Is not this great Babylon that I have built . . . . . the kingdom is departed from thee . . . . . Now I, Nebuchadnezzar, praise and extol and honour the King of heaven, all whose works are truth, and His ways judgment: and those that walk in pride He is able to abase."

For further details regarding this remarkable testimony and its related decrees in Daniel, the reader is referred to #4 of this series.

We approach this fourth chapter again in order to obtain its testimony to the theme of Daniel, the time of the end, and in order that its place in the general scheme of the book may be discovered. We have already shown that the book is divided into two parts, (1) Historic foreshadowings (i.-vi.), (2) Prophetic fulfillments (vii.-xii.). It is now time that this twofold character should be more thoroughly exhibited. Not only will the discovery of the underlying structure bear eloquent testimony to the truth and unity of the book, but it will place in true correspondence and relationship the outstanding portions, thus enabling us to gather information and light from the simple, historic sections for the illumination of the more complex prophetic portions. Accordingly, we ask the reader's careful attention to the following structure of the book of Daniel as a whole, and would mention that this outline has not hitherto appeared in any other work on the prophecy.

It will be seen that the vision of Dan. vii., where the four beasts are described, and where dominion is given to the Messiah, is to be read as a sequel to the vision of Gentile dominion and its destruction at the time of the end. The fiery furnace heated by Nebuchadnezzar's orders, and the ordeal of the faithful three, is reversed in the days to come. The fiery furnace shall destroy the beast, and no deliverance is revealed as there was for Shadrach, Meshach and Abed-nego. Nebuchadnezzar sees a form like unto a Son of God, which is interpreted later by the words, "God hath sent His angel". Daniel, too, sees one like unto the Son of man, and ten thousand times ten thousand angelic ministers accompany that august enthronement. The "seven times" of Nebuchadnezzar's peculiar malady and madness find an echo in Israel's seventy sevens, and in particular the last seven years of Dan. ix. We therefore draw attention to one or two features in the record of the king's madness that may be of service in the understanding of its prophetic foreshadowing. The record may be divided as follows:--

1. The vision of the tree and its import.
2. The intervention of the watchers.
3. The band of iron and brass.
4. The seven times.

Let us briefly touch upon these headings.

1. The vision of the tree and its import.—The tree seen in the vision stood in the midst of the earth, an expression aptly fitting the world dominion given to Nebuchadnezzar. The tree "grew until its height reached unto the heaven, and the sight thereof to all the earth". A sinister meaning attaches to the words, "The fowls of heaven dwelt in the boughs thereof". The language is too close to that of the parable of the mustard tree to be mistaken: this tree supported satanic agencies. Daniel makes it clear that Nebuchadnezzar himself was represented by the tree: "It is thou, O king" (iv. 22).

2. The intervention of the watchers.—"A watcher and a holy one came down from heaven" (iv. 13) is the description given by Nebuchadnezzar. The well-known figure of hendiadys will be recognized here; the force of the expression is—"a holy watcher", with intentional stress on the word "holy". Chapter x. gives a glimpse of one of these holy watchers over the kingdom of men, and the many references in the book of the Revelation to angelic mediation and agency give still further light.

3. The band of iron and brass.—This detail is peculiar. The cutting down of the tree is a figure easy to be understood. So also is the leaving of the stump of the roots. Both have their immediate fulfillment in the smiting and the restoration of the king. But why should brass and iron bands be mentioned? It will be remembered that the two kingdoms, represented by metals, that come at the end of the Gentile dominion symbolized by the great image, were Greece and Rome—brass and iron. The fourth beast in Daniel's vision, described in vii. 19, has teeth of iron and nails of brass. The feet of the heavenly visitant mentioned in Dan. x. are likened to polished brass, and the feet of the risen Lord, the great Priest-King, described in Rev. i. 15, are likened to fine brass.

The cutting down of the tree sets forth the overthrow of Babylon, the leaving of the stump in the earth sets forth the fact that Babylon will be revived, while the bands of iron and brass indicate that that revival will be retarded until the part of the prophecy indicated by the feet of the image becomes history. Instead of looking forward to a revival of the ancient Roman Empire, and assuming that the ten kings must necessarily conform to a tenfold partition of the Roman world, the teaching is that Babylon is to be revived at the time of the end.

This fact is repeated or suggested in more ways than one. When the stone strikes the feet of the image, it does not simply destroy the clay, but "then was the iron, the clay, the brass, the silver and the gold broken to pieces" (ii. 35). This suggests that all the Gentile powers will be represented at the end. Again in chapter viii. Greece and Persia are seen in conflict and, while at first sight it appears to deal with Greece and Persia long since past, the words of viii. 17, "for at the time of the end shall be the vision", clearly teach that the true prophetic period is yet future: "In the latter time of their kingdom, when transgressors are come to the full" (viii. 23). Further, the prophecy of Dan. ix. while it speaks of seventy sevens, nevertheless focuses attention upon the last seven years (ix. 24-27). So, once more, in chapter x., the heavenly messenger declares that the revelation contained in chapters xi. and xii. are prophetic of "what shall befall thy people in the latter days" when Persia and Greece again come upon the scene. Finally a comparison of Dan. vii. with Rev. xiii. shows the fourth indescribable beast to be the great satanic revival of Babel at the time of the end.

Coming back to Dan. iv., it may be contended that the judgment pronounced fell upon Nebuchadnezzar, in person, and that it was Nebuchadnezzar in person who was restored. This, of course, is true, but we have seen that the historic happenings recorded in Daniel foreshadowed the future, and Nebuchadnezzar's madness sets forth the character of Gentile dominion as God sees it, first, generally, over the whole course of its duration, and then, especially, at the intensely awful period covered by the final seven years.

4. The seven times.—We learn from Dan. xi. 13 that "times" mean "years". "After certain years" reads, in the margin, "at the end of times, even years". If the vision of Dan. iv. had referred only to Nebuchadnezzar, having no further significance, there would have been no reason for saying, "and let seven times pass over him", for the words "seven years" would have been simpler and sufficient. But if these seven years were, in their turn, prophetic, then the more cryptic term is justified, stimulating us, as it does, to close enquiry.

There are some who teach from Lev. xxvi. 18 that the punishment of Israel will be "seven times", and computing by the "day for a year" theory we have the 2,520 days which make up seven years, symbolizing 2,520 years, which are supposed to be the extent of Israel's punishment and of Gentile dominion. Taking Nebuchadnezzar's reign as commencing 600B.C., we arrive at 1917A.D. as the time of the end. We have stated this view not because we endorse it, but in order that our readers may face it, and also that it may be manifest that we are aware of it. All such date-making respecting the time of the end we resolutely avoid as being unscriptural, quite apart from the fact that it would take a wiser man than Solomon to prove that the date of this present year is actually 1931A.D., or even to get within a few years of accuracy. We believe God has purposely confused the calendar. He who gave definite chronology from Adam to Christ has, of set purpose, given no more—let us abide by that. As the structure partly suggests, the cryptic seven times of Nebuchadnezzar's madness finds its echo in the final seven years of Dan. ix.

A superficial reading of the words of the holy watchers in Dan. iv. 17, "He setteth up over it the basest of men", is likely to lead to a wrong inference. We at first think of moral baseness, and conceive of the idea that Gentile dominion is rotten to the core. It may be that it is, but the lesson of Dan. iv. 17 is a happier one. Sh'phal and its Hebrew equivalent shaphal mean "to humble", and "to be humbled", and comes again in Dan. iv. 17 where Nebuchadnezzar says, "And they that walk in pride he is able to abase". To Belshazzar, Daniel used the same word when he recalled Nebuchadnezzar's pride and fall:--

> "But when his heart was lifted up, and his mind hardened in pride, he was deposed from his kingly throne . . . . . and thou his son, O Belshazzar, hast not humbled thine heart, though thou knewest all this" (Dan. v. 20-22).

This attitude towards the proud is characteristic of the Day of the Lord:--

> "The lofty looks of man shall be humbled, and the haughtiness of men shall be bowed down, and the Lord alone exalted in that day" (Isa. ii. 11) (See also Isa. ii. 12, 17; v. 15; x. 33; xiii. 11; xl. 4).

Shephelah, the feminine form, is rendered "valley", "vale", "plain", and to those who knew the association of the words "base", "humble" and "valley", such utterances as Zech. iv. 6, 7 would have fuller and richer meaning. "Who art thou, great mountain? Before Zerubbabel thou shalt become a plain." By pride fell the angels. By pride fell Babylon. The pride of Israel testified to their fall. God resisteth the proud, and it is part of His purpose to hide pride from men. Nebuchadnezzar appears to have learnt the lesson but the Gentile powers will pursue their proud course until the blasphemy and arrogance of the beast brings it down before the wrath of God.

#8. The four kings of the end (vii.).
pp. 70 - 74

The vision of Daniel recorded in chapter vii. is written in Chaldee (Aramaic or Syriac) and so belongs to the Gentile portion of the prophecy. In the interpretation of the great image in Dan. ii. reference is made to "the days of these kings" (ii. 44). What we are now to consider is a fuller explanation of the times and character of these kings. The setting up of the kingdom of the Lord, in Dan. ii., is symbolized by the stone becoming a great mountain and filling the earth. In Dan. vii. the prophet describes the investiture of the Son of man with sovereignty. In Dan. ii. the stone crushes the image to powder; in Dan. vii. the same court that invests the Son of man with dominion, consigns the beast to the burning flame. These parallels are very evident, but confusion is sometimes introduced by expositors by assuming that Dan. vii. and ii. are co-extensive. It has been taught that we have the same Gentile dominion, but from two points of view, that from man's point of view it appears as a resplendent image, but in God's view as a succession of wild beasts. This, however, is true only with reference to the final phase, as we hope to show presently.

Another fruitful source of confusion is the assumption that there are four, and only four, kingdoms set out in Dan. ii., and that Babylon, Persia, Greece and Rome, represented by the four metals, are again presented as the four beasts of Daniel's dream. The objection to this interpretation is that it is contrary to the actual facts of the vision.

First we have shown that the colossus of Dan. ii. is sixfold; Babylon, Persia, Greece, Rome, Turkey, and the League issuing in the ten kings. Further, the kingdoms of Dan. ii. are contemporaneous, for in Dan. vii. 12 the rest of the beasts, while losing their dominion, are granted a prolongation of their lives. This would be impossible of interpretation if these four beasts represented the four kingdoms extending over centuries and succeeding one another. While this is true, we must at the same time avoid missing what has been called the "germinant", as well as the "terminant" fulfillment. For example, the ram and he-goat of Dan. viii., while primarily referring to "the last end of the indignation" (viii. 19) are nevertheless foreshadowed by the nearer history of Alexander the Great.

Historic foreshadowings.

Surveying these four beasts as historic anticipations of future literal kings, where must we place them in relation to the kingdoms of Dan. ii.? Some say that the first beast, which was like a lion, represents the first kingdom, Babylon, and the fourth indescribable monster, Rome. This, however, cannot be true, for it introduces contradiction into the narrative. Daniel saw this vision when Babylon's last king was in his first year; and Medo-Persia was at this time almost as great in extent as Babylon. Thus neither Babylon nor Medo-Persia could be included in "four kings which shall arise" (vii. 17), for at the time of the prophecy they were all future. The first must therefore represent Greece, the second Rome, the third Turkey, and the fourth the Satanic monster together with the ten kings (for it bears ten horns, vii. 24), which are found at the end and described in Rev. xiii.

The relation of Dan. ii. with Dan. vii. can be set out thus:--

Daniel ii.	Daniel vii.
(1) Head of gold. BABYLON.	- - - - -
(2) Breast of silver. MEDO-PERSIA.	- - - - -
(3) Belly and thighs of brass. GREECE.	Lion with wings.
(4) Legs of iron. ROME.	Bear with three ribs in mouth.
(5) Feet of iron and clay. TURKEY.	Leopard with wings.
(6) Toes of iron and clay. TEN KINGS.	Monster with ten horns.

There is a fitness about these symbolic animals. Alexander in thirteen years conquered the world; he moved with great rapidity and could well be likened to a lion with wings. The complete description may not be true of Alexander, but will fully fit the king who is yet to arise. Rome was ponderous and slow. It was the great road-maker. It is sheer guesswork to attempt to interpret the meaning of the three ribs—they may stand for Babylon, Persia and Greece in the historic foreshadowing, but they await fulfillment in their own time, when the meaning will be obvious to all believers. The cruelty of the leopard may aptly symbolize the character of the Turkish power that succeeded Rome. We leave this conjecture with the reader for what it is worth, and pass on to consider the real and full interpretation of the vision. It is evident that the chief interest is focused upon the fourth beast.

Unto the end (vii. 26).

> "After this I saw in the night visions, and behold a fourth beast, dreadful and terrible, and strong exceedingly; and it had great iron teeth: it devoured and brake in pieces and stamped the residue with the feet of it: and it was diverse from all the beasts that were before it: and it had ten horns" (Dan. vii. 7).

"The residue" is translated "the rest" in verse 12, and refers in each case to the three beasts described in verses 4-7. The words "before it" appear at first to indicate that the fourth beast succeeded the other three, but "before" here means "in front of" as in verses 10, 13 and 20:--

> "I considered the horns, and, behold, there came up among them another little horn, before whom there were three of the first horns plucked up by the roots: and behold in this horn were eyes like the eyes of a man, and a mouth speaking great things" (Dan. vii. 8).

The interpretation given to Daniel is the interpretation given to us, and we are not at liberty to attempt a fuller explanation than that given here:--

> "These great beasts, which are four, are four kings, which shall arise out of the earth" (Dan. vii. 17).
> "The fourth beast shall be the fourth kingdom upon earth" (Dan. vii. 23).

If the fourth is to be reckoned as successive in any foreshadowing way, it will be seen, in the parallel set out above, that it falls into its place at the end:--

> "Which shall be diverse from all kingdoms, and shall devour the whole earth, and shall tread it down, and break it in pieces" (Dan. vii. 23).

It will be remembered that in the great image of Dan. ii. the last kingdom was "diverse", inasmuch as it was composed of clay, whereas the earlier kingdoms were of differing metals. So with the beast that corresponds with the clay period; it is diverse, and is not described as the others are.

There is a peculiarly involved repetition given that may help us to realize that the long, historic foreshadowing, and the brief, prophetic fulfillment are in view:--

> The fourth beast is said to be "diverse" from the rest.
> The little horn is said to be "diverse" from the first.
> The fourth beast destroys three kings.
> The little horn subdues three kings.
> The fourth beast has a mouth speaking great things.
> The little horn speaks great words against the Most High.

The conclusion seems to be that the little horn represents a final concentration of the fourth beast. Now we shall discover from Rev. xiii. that this fourth beast concentrates in itself the three that it devours. The three beasts devoured are described as a lion with eagle's wings, a bear, and a leopard having four wings with four heads. The beast described in Rev. xiii. is a composite creature, having some of the characteristics of the lion, bear and leopard:--

> "And the beast which I saw was like unto a leopard, and his feet were as the feet of a bear, and his mouth as the mouth of a lion" (Rev. xiii. 2).
> "Having seven heads and ten horns" (Rev. xiii. 1).

Even the seven heads are to be found in Dan. vii.; three of the beasts were single-headed, while one had four heads, making a total of seven. The mouth speaking blasphemy is to be found in Revelation (see xiii. 5). Moreover the length of time that the little horn continues his blasphemy in Dan. vii. 25 is said to be "a time, times, and the dividing of times", which is exactly the period of the beast in Rev. xiii.—"forty and two months." Those needing proof of this computation will find it discussed at length in a future article.

We do not pretend to be able to piece together all the prophetic imagery. Daniel found much that was sealed to him, and while may sealed things are opened for us in the book of the Revelation, it is the very nature of prophecy to veil as well as to reveal until the time is at hand.

The Most High takes the kingdom.

Dan. viii. 9-14 is perhaps the grandest apocalyptic passage of the O.T., and is comparable with the glorious passages of the Revelation. The destruction of the beast and the consignment of its body to the burning flame usher in the kingdom of the Most High. A close parallel is found in Rev. xi. 15-18:--

> "And the seventh angel sounded, and there were great voices in heaven, saying, The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord and of His Christ; and He shall reign for ever and ever . . . . .Thou hast taken to Thee Thy great power and hast reigned . . . . . and shouldest destroy them which destroy the earth."

The remaining prophecies of the book of Daniel are unfoldings, in fuller detail, of the great and dreadful events that usher in the time of the end. The interest centres in the feet of the image, the fourth beast and especially the ten horns. These will engage our attention as we continue our studies. We would most earnestly exhort our readers to read and re-read the actual prophecy itself—our notes can at best be but a few fingerposts pointing out the way.

#9. The eastern question (viii.).
pp. 112 - 116

Daniel's vision of the four beasts, which was given in the first year of Belshazzar, was followed in the third year of that king by a supplementary vision of two beasts. We know from Daniel's own statement at the end of chapter vii. that he pondered the meaning of the vision very seriously:--

> "Hitherto is the end of the matter. As for me, Daniel, my cogitations much troubled me, and my countenance changed in me: but I kept the matter in my heart" (Dan. vii. 28).

Daniel would have no great difficulty in understanding the general teaching of chapter vii.; he would rejoice in the revelation given of the establishing of Messiah's kingdom, yet evidently there was something that troubled him. It changed his countenance, and apparently affected his health, but he kept the matter to himself. Much the same is said in viii. 27:--

> "And I Daniel fainted, and was sick certain days: afterward I rose up, and did the king's business: and I was astonished at the vision, but none understood it" (Or "I was dumfounded at the vision, but none became aware of it," just as vii. 28, "I kept the matter in my heart").

We are left with the impression that Daniel was staggered by the revelation of what was coming on the earth, and as we survey the series of visions that were given we shall discover that they all focus attention upon the period under the ten kings, and the doings of the little horn who is first described in chapter vii. Daniel tells us that he particularly enquired the meaning of the fourth beast:--

> "And of the ten horns which were in his head, and of the other which came up, and before whom three fell; even of that horn that had eyes, and a mouth, that spake very great things, whose look was more stout than his fellows. I beheld, and the same horn made war with the saints, and prevailed against them; until the Ancient of Days came, and judgment was given unto the saints of the Most High; and the time came that the saints possessed the kingdom" (Dan. vii. 19-22).

Daniel is now to be put into possession of further information concerning this terrible blasphemer and oppressor, and in a vision sees a conflict between a ram and a he-goat. The ram had two horns, one higher than the other, the higher one coming up last: the he-goat had a very prominent horn between its eyes. The ram was overcome, and his two horns broken, while the goat waxed great, but its notable horn was broken. At the breaking of this great horn, four came up towards the four winds of heaven, and from one of them came a little horn who grew and pushed his conquests to the south, the east, and to the pleasant land of Israel. Then it assayed still further conquests and trampled down the host of the stars to the ground, and magnified itself even against God Himself. The daily sacrifice was stopped, and truth was cast to the ground. At this point one angel is heard speaking to another, and asking how long this desolation should last. The answer made in Daniel's hearing was that it should be unto 2,300 days and then the sanctuary should be cleansed. The interpretation of the vision is now given to Daniel, and we may set out the details as follows:--

THE RAM.—This represents the kings of Media and Persia. The ram was the symbol of Persia, and is found upon ancient Persian coins: it was worn by kings, and used, with its curling horns, as pillar capitals and volutes at Persepolis, the metropolis of the kingdom.

THE HE-GOAT.—This is the symbol of Greece. According to legend, an oracle directed the first settlers to follow a goat, and the word Egeae, which is still found on the map, is from aix, a goat. The great horn is said to represent "the first king" (verse 21), and so stands for Alexander the Great.

THE FOUR.—At the death of Alexander, his kingdom was divided amongst his generals. Ptolemy took Egypt, Palestine, and parts of Asia Minor; Cassander, Macedonia and Greece; Lysimachus, Thrace and Bythinia, and Seleucus, Syria and East of the Euphrates. Just as the silver kingdom of Persia is said to be "inferior" to the golden kingdom of Babylon, so, at the death of Alexander, his kingdom waned: it was not held together by these four heads "in his power".

Thus far we have a prophecy of what is now history. But Daniel, however, had no information from which he could tell whether the interval between the fourfold division of Alexander's kingdom and the rise of the little horn would be long or short. In this respect, we have the advantage, for we know that a very long interval was intended. However, the interval, whether long or short, is passed over in silence, and we come to the time when the little horn should appear.

THE LITTLE HORN.—This is a king of fierce countenance or mighty presence, who understood dark sentences. The latter characteristic is indicative of something deeper than mere "skill in dissimulation", for it indicates that he will be acquainted with the depths of satan. "A dark saying" is an expression used in Psa. xlix. 4, lxxviii. 2, and Prov. i. 6 for deep parabolic utterances or "mysteries", and is found in Chaldee form in Dan. v. 12. Immediately following the statement concerning his understanding of dark sentences is a further revelation concerning the secret of his power: "His power shall be mighty, but not by his own power" (viii. 24). Rev. xiii. 2 and II Thess. ii. 9, 10 have since been written to make clear to us the satanic source of this king's power.

THE TIME.—This all takes place in the latter time of the kingdom of the four heads of Grecian dominion, and is still further defined by the added statement, "when the transgressors are come to the full". This appears to be a principle upon which God acts. Abraham was told that his seed would have to wait four hundred years, and in bondage for a part of that time, because "the iniquity of the Amorites was not yet full" (Gen. xv. 16). The longsuffering of God waited through the period covered by the Acts until Israel had filled up the measure of their fathers (Matt. xxiii. 32 and I Thess. ii. 16). The mystery of iniquity is at work at present beneath the surface. Day by day it approaches nearer to the moment when it will stand forth revealed in all its anti-christian blasphemy.

BLASPHEMY.—II Thess. ii. reveals the fact that when the moment arrives for the manifestation of the man of sin, he will be found seated in the temple of God claiming divine worship. So also in Rev. xiii. Satan, in the temptation in the wilderness, offered the kingdoms of the world and the glory of them to Christ for one act of worship, and what was refused by the Christ of God will be rendered by the man of sin. So again in Dan. viii., "He waxed great, even to the host of heaven". He causes the daily sacrifice to cease, and casts down the place of the sanctuary, which tells us that we are in that period covered by the seventh week of Dan. ix.—which, though now known to us, was not, then, to Daniel—a period when Israel shall be back in their land, their temple built, and their worship re-established. Note, further, the character of this king. He is "little", but waxes great. "He magnifies himself", he "destroys wonderfully". "Policy", "craft" and "peace" are his weapons and instruments.

THE SAINTS.—The prophecy shows that this king shall "wear out the saints of the Most High", and they are given into his hands for "a time, times, and dividing of times". These saints are the object of the little horn's hatred in Dan. viii. "The host of the stars" is interpreted as of the "mighty and holy people" (viii. 24). These passages give us the first glimpse of the great tribulation and time of Jacob's trouble, and it was the contemplation of these awful times that staggered Daniel and left him prostrate. But in Dan. vii. it is revealed that at the time of the end the horn shall forfeit his dominion, and that "the saints of the Most High take the kingdom", the end of this awful king being swift and complete, for "he shall be broken without hand". Just as the image of Dan. ii. was smashed to pieces by a stone cut out without hands, so is it here. Human agencies can never bring in the millennium, neither can they destroy the evil that is here. That is the work of the Lord.

THE 2,300 DAYS.—The time periods of the book of Daniel are of extreme importance, and rather than spoil the subject by a brief note here, we would ask the reader to wait for an article specially dealing with the subject and which will be more appropriate later.

THE EASTERN QUESTION.—Enough has been said to show the supreme importance of what is called "The Eastern Question". Public opinion is divided as to the wisdom of Britain holding the mandate in Palestine, but there is something greater even than the voice of the people, it is the Will of God. No one would have thought in 1914 that the great European War could not end until Jerusalem had been transferred from Turkish authority to the League of Nations, but the hour had come, and the wrath of man can be bent to praise Him Who ruleth in the heavens.

Out of one of the four divisions of Alexander's kingdom, the final great apostate will spring. We who have received such wondrous grace as to be numbered among those who are the members of the body of Christ, will never see those days that troubled Daniel, nevertheless we cannot be unconcerned in regard to any part of the great purpose of the ages, and we rejoice to know that the saints of the Most High will yet take the kingdom, and, above all, that the Son of man Himself shall one day, and that soon, enter into His glory.

#10. The prophecies of Jeremiah (ix.---Part 1).
pp. 150 - 155

Our studies hitherto in the book of Daniel have not been light, neither have they made easy reading, but in comparison with those of Dan. ix. our previous difficulties have been relatively simple. They have but prepared the way for the difficult truths now before us.

While Dan. ix. is complete in itself, it follows chapter viii., supplying fuller details, just as chapter viii. supplements chapter vii.; and it will be wise to retain what we have already seen for our present help. Daniel's increasing concern has been regarding the prophetic future and that which concerns the little horn and his own people. He has been taught that past history foreshadows future events, and we are therefore prepared to find that a seventy-year period of Jerusalem's desolation and Israel's captivity has a corresponding period of seventy-times-seven associated with Israel, Jerusalem and desolation. Chapter ix. is in itself a considerable theme, but, as Dan. ix.-xii. forms a section of the book, it will perhaps be wise to exhibit the general structure of the passage before entering into detail.

Daniel ix.--xii. as a whole.

A | ix. 1. First year of Darius.
B | ix. 2-9. Fasting. Daniel understood.
C | ix. 20-23. The man Gabriel. Daniel, "greatly beloved".
D | ix. 23-27. "I am come to shew thee."
A | x. 1. Third year of Darius.
B | x. 1-3. Fasting. Daniel understood.
C | x. 4-21. The man clothed in linen. Daniel, "greatly beloved".
D | xi. and xii. "I will shew thee."

It will be seen in the above structure (members D and D) that chapters xi. & xii. are a further expansion of the seventy weeks and the abomination of desolation spoken of in Dan. ix. 23-27. Chapters xi. and xii. have, in addition, an interrelated correspondence, which we hope to show in its proper place.

We return now to Dan. ix., knowing at least that we are still pursuing the one theme of the book, the time of the end; though we may differ from others in our understanding of the true approach of that end, the ultimate theme is unaffected. In the fullness of time Christ came, whether we name the year A.D.1, B.C.4, or refrain from assigning a date at all. And so Christ will come again at the close of the seventy weeks, whether they be weeks of days, weeks of years, or, as some believe, of both. Whether we are able to compute the time or not, He will surely come.

To enable the reader to follow the theme without confusion, we divide our study into four sections:--

(1) The prophecy of Jeremiah (Dan. ix. 1, 2).
(2) The prayer of Daniel (Dan. ix. 3-23).
(3) The principle of computing prophetic times.
(4) The prophecy of the seventy weeks.

The prophecy of Jeremiah.

Daniel himself was a prophet, to whom had been granted the spiritual ability to see the meaning of Nebuchadnezzar's visions, and to witness the two visions dealing with the end of the indignation. It is with this event, linked with Jeremiah's prophecy, that Dan. ix. opens. We have in Zechariah positive proof that the "time of indignation" and "the seventy years" of Jeremiah refer to the same period:--

> "O Lord of Hosts, how long wilt Thou not have mercy on Jerusalem, and on the cities of Judah, against which Thou hast had indignation these threescore and ten years" (Zech. i. 12).

From Isa. x. 5 we learn that the Assyrian is the rod of the Lord's anger—"And the staff in their hand is mine indignation." The Assyrian is sent against "an hypocritical nation . . . . . to tread them down like mire in the streets". The Assyrian nation does not, however, intend to be of service of the Lord: it is but fulfilling its own schemes of conquest:--

> "Wherefore it shall come to pass, that when the Lord hath performed His whole work upon Mount Zion and on Jerusalem, I will punish the fruit of the stout heart of the king of Assyria, and the glory of his high looks" (Isa. x. 12).

We are prepared by our previous studies to find that the indignation accomplished against Jerusalem by the Assyrian is a foreshadowing of "the last end of the indignation", a future period alluded to in Isa. xxvi. 20. This period is in mind in Dan. ix:--

> "In the first year of his (Darius') reign I Daniel understood by books the numbers of years, whereof the word of the Lord came to Jeremiah the prophet, that He would accomplish seventy years in the desolations of Jerusalem" (Dan. ix. 2).

Among the passages written by Jeremiah that Daniel would have read is Jer. xxv. 11:--

> "And this whole land shall be a desolation, and an astonishment, and these nations shall serve the king of Babylon seventy years."

Another passage that would have attracted Daniel's attention is Jer. xxix. 1-10:--

"To all the people whom Nebuchadnezzar had carried away captive from to Babylon . . . . . For thus saith the Lord, That after seventy years be accomplished at Babylon, I will visit you, and perform my good word toward you, in causing you to return to this place."

A further passage that would have been of help to Daniel is found in Jer. xxvii. 7:--

"And all nations shall serve him (Nebuchadnezzzar, verse 6), and his son, and his son's son (Belshazzar), until the very time of his land come; and then many nations and great kings shall serve themselves of him."

The proclamation of Cyrus.

Another item that bears upon this part of our study is found in Dan. ix. 1:--

"In the first year of Darius, the son of Ahasuerus, of the seed of the Medes, which was made king over the realm of the Chaldeans."

Sir H. Rawlinson has shown that the name Ahasuerus is, like Pharaoh, an appellative, meaning "Venerable King", and not used exclusively of any one monarch. Similarly the name Darius, according to Professor Sayce, means, "The Maintainer", an appellative of more than one king—rather like the English, "Defender of the Faith", which belongs to no one monarch in particular. It is considered by those who have made chronology their study that the Darius of chapter ix. is the Cyrus of chapter x.; the reader will find Appendixes 50 (vii. 5) and 57 of The Companion Bible helpful in this connection. It would be an unwarranted digression here to enter into the arguments concerning the genealogy of the kings of Persia; but we do feel that our readers should realize the importance of the conclusion that the Ahasuerus of Esther i. 1, the Artaxerxes of Ezra vi. 14 and Neh. ii. 1, and the Darius of Dan. v. 31 represent the same person under different names. The king married Esther, whose son is the Cyrus of Scripture.

It is most interesting to see that Daniel's prayer in chapter ix. concerning the restoration of Jerusalem is dated in the first year of the king under whose edict the restoration was commenced.

We must now consider, together with Dan. ix., the opening words of Ezra i.:--

"Now in the first year of Cyrus, king of Persia, that the word of the Lord by the mouth of Jeremiah might be fulfilled, the Lord stirred up the spirit of Cyrus, king of Persia, that he made a proclamation throughout all his kingdom, and put it also in writing, saying, Thus saith Cyrus, king of Persia, The Lord God of heaven hath given me all the kingdoms of the earth; and He hath charged me to build Him an house at Jerusalem, which is in Judah. Who is there among you of all His people? his God be with him, and let him go up to Jerusalem, which is in Judah, and build the house of the Lord God of Israel (He is the God), which is in Jerusalem. And whosoever remaineth in any place where he sojourneth, let the men of his place help him with silver, and with gold, and with goods, and with beasts, beside the freewill offering for the house of God that is in Jerusalem" (Ezra. I. 1-4).

The proclamation of Artaxerxes.

Before we are fully prepared to continue our study of Dan. ix., there is one further proclamation to be brought into line. We read in Neh. i. 1:--

> "It came to pass in the month Chisleu, in the twentieth year, as I was in Shushan the palace."

This twentieth year of Artaxerxes (see Neh. ii. 1) dates as forty-two years from the beginning of the Babylonian servitude, thirty-five years from Jehoiachim's captivity, twenty-three years from the destruction of Jerusalem, and twenty-five years from the beginning of the desolations (see The Companion Bible).

There are three distinct periods of seventy years that must be kept distinct, if we are to avoid confusion: the Servitude began in the first year of Nebuchadnezzar, and ended with the decree of Cyrus just quoted. The Captivity is dated by Ezekiel as from the eighth year of Nebuchadnezzar, when Jeconiah was carried away captive. The Desolations commenced with the last siege of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar, and are the subject of Daniel's prayer in chapter ix. While, therefore, Daniel is associated with the seventy years' desolation, Nehemiah is connected with the seventy years' captivity:--

> "The remnant that are left of the captivity there in the province are in great affliction and reproach; the wall of Jerusalem also is broken down, and the gates thereof are burned with fire" (Neh. i. 3).

The effect of this report upon Nehemiah is very similar to the effect of Jeremiah's words on Daniel; to appreciate the parallel, Dan. ix. and Neh. i. should be read together.

In Neh. ii. things reach a crisis. As the king's cupbearer, Nehemiah held a high office, for, in effect, he stood between the king and possible death by assassination or poisoning. To have appeared at all distraught in the royal presence might have proved fatal; for he might have fallen under suspicion and have been executed immediately. So, when the king comments upon his sad looks, we read: "Then was I very sore afraid" (Neh. ii. 2). Nehemiah then tells the king of the condition of the city of Jerusalem, and the king asks, "For what dost thou make request?" Then we read, "So I prayed to the God of heaven. And I said unto the king" (Neh. ii. 4, 5).

We pause a moment to observe this true conception of prayer. In Nehemiah's day ritual was of divine institution; and place, time and attitude in prayer were ordained by law. But Nehemiah was no formalist, for true prayer is ever above all forms. Without any apparent interval, a prayer winged its way into the presence of a greater King than Artaxerxes and deliverance followed.

One other point of interest is contained in Neh. ii. 6. Nehemiah requests of the king that he may be granted leave of absence to go into Judah and rebuild the city of Jerusalem. The king replies to Nehemiah (the queen also sitting by him), "for how long shall thy journey be, and when wilt thou return?" The queen here mentioned in the parenthesis is none other than Esther, who had already been instrumental in the deliverance of her people as recorded in the book bearing her name. The presence of the queen here is one of the links in the working out of God's purpose. Under Mordecai, Esther saved Israel: her presence here evidently influenced Artaxerxes, and her son, Cyrus, has his own place in the scheme, as we have seen.

The read is asked to keep this twentieth year of Artaxerxes in mind as reference will be made to it when dealing with the seventy-sevens of Dan. ix.

#11. The prayer of Daniel (ix.---Part 2).

pp. 195 - 197

Before going further, the reader would be well advised to re-read the previous article (page 150), so that what has already been considered shall be fresh in mind.

There is so much in this prayer, that we cannot hope to do justice either to its form or to its subject-matter. We can only point out some of its essential features. The nature of the section—Dan. ix. 3-19—makes any attempt at an outline difficult, but the following will throw into prominence the main features of the petition, and will therefore be of some service.

Dan. ix. 3-19.

A | 3. Daniel's face set unto the Lord God.
B | 4. Prayer and confession.
C | 4, 5. Covenant-keeping God. We have sinned.
D | 5-10. Rebellion. THE PROPHETS.
a | 5. Rebellion.
b | 6. Disobedience to message of prophets.
c | 7-9. Righteousness belongeth unto the Lord.
Confusion belongeth unto us.
Mercies belong unto the Lord.
a | 9. Rebellion.
b | 10. Disobedience to message of prophets.
D | 11-14. Curse. THE LAW.
a | 11. The curse.
b | 12. Confirmed words.
a | 13. The evil, as Moses said.
b | 14. Watched evil.
C | 15. Covenant kept of old by God. We have sinned.
B | 16, 17. Hear prayer and confession.
A | 17-19. The Lord's face to shine upon the Sanctuary.

Daniel's prayer centres round the fact that Israel's terrible desolation is the outcome of rebellion against the word of God, sent from time to time through the prophets, and is but the fulfillment of the curse and the oath, written in the law of Moses long before.

God evidently keeps His word, and Israel have most surely merited their punishment. Yet Daniel reminds himself that God not only watches over the evil to perform it, but in the mighty deliverance of Israel from Egypt in days gone by, He was true to His covenant promises, even though Israel had failed. The prayer, therefore, while a confession of Israel's sin, reminds God of His covenant relationship with the people and the city.

There is a beautiful progression in the prayer. At first Daniel speaks of his people without any term of association with the Lord. He speaks of our kings, our princes, our fathers, and the people of the land; of the men of Judah, the inhabitants of Jerusalem, and of all Israel near and far. Not until we reach the tenth verse is any link established; there Daniel speaks of the Lord our God, and again in verses 13, 14 and 15. In verse 15 a fuller claim is made; this rebellious people are "Thy people". In verse 16 the desolate city is "Thy city", "Thy holy mountain"; and "Thy people have become a reproach". In verse 17 "Thy sanctuary". Then it all comes pouring forth. Reserve is abandoned. Before this covenant-keeping God, Daniel pours out his petition:--

> "O my God, incline Thine ear and hear, open Thine eyes and behold our desolations, and the city which is called by Thy Name: for we do not present our supplications before Thee for our righteousnesses, but for Thy great mercies. O Lord, hear; O Lord, forgive; O Lord, hearken and do; defer not, for Thine own sake, O my God; for the city and Thy people are called by Thy Name" (ix. 18, 19).

The curse and the covenant.

Because an expression used by Daniel in his prayer is used also by Jeremiah in exactly the same way, it does not follow that Daniel borrowed it from Jeremiah. But on the other hand, Daniel could hardly have read Jeremiah's prophecy without realizing how the word "watch" suited his need. The word shaqad occurs in Dan. ix. 14: "Therefore the Lord watched over the evil, and brought it upon us." In Jeremiah the words shaqed and shaqad are translated "almond", "hasten" and "watch". At first sight there seems little connection between these words, but let us examine the mater more closely:--

> "What seest thou? And I said, I see the rod of an almond tree. Then said the Lord unto me, Thou hast well seen: for I will hasten My word to perform it" (Jer. i. 11, 12).

The almond is very early in blossom, and so is suggestive of alertness, vigilance, watchfulness. We have, therefore, a paronomasia (a high order of the common pun): "An almond tree (shaked) . . . . . I am watching" (shoked). The Lord watches over His word of judgment: "Behold, I will watch over them for evil, and not for good" (Jer. xliv. 27). Daniel recognized this; the Lord had kept His word. The curse pronounced by Moses and the oath sworn by God had been fulfilled, for, as Moses had said, a nation of fierce countenance had come upon them, destroying their possessions, regarding not age nor sex, besieging their cities, and causing them to be scattered from one end of the earth to the other (Deut. xxviii.). There was, however, another aspect of the truth. Was God so faithful to His threat of wrath, and would He be less faithful to His covenant and mercy? So Jeremiah continues:--

> "It shall come to pass, that like as I have watched over them to pluck up, and to break down, and to throw down, and to destroy, and to afflict; so I will watch over them to build and to plant, saith the Lord" (Jer. xxxi. 28).

This faithfulness of the Lord issues in the making of a new covenant, which is placed in contrast with the old covenant and the coming out of Egypt. The new covenant is not vaguely stated; it has as its objective the restoration of Israel (see Jer. xxxi. 36, 37). Daniel knew this. He dares, therefore, to recall the deliverance from Egypt, and to couple this fact with the fact of Israel's sin. No promises are made of reform. He throws himself and his people upon the "mercies and forgiveness of God". He rests his case entirely upon covenant grace. He sees through the centuries the coming Messiah, Who was to be "cut off, but not for Himself", and anticipates the "blood of the new covenant", shed for many, for the forgiveness of sins. His prayer is honoured and answered:--

> "Whiles I was speaking . . . . . Gabriel . . . . . touched me and said . . . . . I am now come forth to give thee skill and understanding . . . . . I am come to show thee, for thou art greatly beloved" (Dan. ix. 20-23).

#12. The principle of computing prophetic times (ix.---Part 3).
pp. 234 - 240

How many different ways of computing the seventy weeks of Dan. ix. have been put forward by earnest men of God? We do not know, but there are many; and the fact that such diversity exists must humble us before the Lord. Differences of opinion exist as to where the reckoning begins, where the reckoning ends, whether the "weeks" are weeks of days or of years, and whether the prince that shall come be Titus (A.D.70) or the beast of the Apocalypse. Most affirm that there is now only the last week of Dan. ix. to be fulfilled; while others believe that the seventy weeks are literal weeks of days all yet future. Facing this monument of human failure and contradiction it seems at first an act of impertinence to step forward and make even a tentative suggestion. Yet it is impossible to avoid the subject, and, therefore, with every recognition of the faithfulness and ability of others, we humbly place on record the way in which we have been led by scriptural principles to a conclusion in the matter.

The first principle that demands recognition is that which deals with the "Lo-ammi" periods of Israel's history. For the benefit of those who may not know the meaning of this term we state that it has reference to Hosea i. 9: "Call his name Lo-ammi, for ye are not My people." The principle we have in mind is that those periods when Israel are out of favour—and so "Lo-ammi"—are not reckoned in the prophetic calendar. So far as God's scheme of time is concerned, such periods do not exist. They are, however, reckoned in the calendar of the world, and consequently must be taken into account.

Perhaps a rather homely illustration will help to make the point clearer. A man, let us suppose, has an account at the bank, and upon enquiry he learns that his balance stands at $500. From one point of view he may truthfully say that he owns $500. There is another point of view, however; he owes $200 on his house, and other outstanding bills total $200; so that although his bank book shows $500, he actually owns only $100. The bankbook figure represents the calendar of the world, and the residual figure the prophetic times. The "Lo-ammi" periods correspond with the debts and must be subtracted to obtain the prophetic periods.

The "Lo-ammi" principle applied.

We do not know whether Mr. G. H. Pember should be credited with the following illustration of this principle, but we acknowledge our indebtedness in the matter to his book, "The Great Prophecies of the Gentiles". In I Kings vi. 1 we are told that Solomon began to build the temple in the fourth year of his reign, and in the four hundred and eightieth year after the exodus from Egypt. In Acts xiii. 18-21 we find a different computation. Paul there speaks of 40 years in the wilderness, 450 years under the Judges, and 40 under Saul. If to this we add the 40 years of David's reign (I Kings ii. 11) and the 3 years of Solomon's reign before he commend to build (I Kings vi. 1) we have a total of 573 years. The two figures are therefore 573 and 480, shewing an apparent discrepancy of 93—a discrepancy which needs explanation. Reverting to our previous illustration, the 573 represent the balance as shown by the bankbook, the 93 represent the unpaid bills still owing, and the 480 the actual amount in credit. In other words there are 93 "Lo-ammi" years to be accounted for—years which are omitted in Solomon's computation, but included in Paul's. We must first point out that in I Kings vi. 1, as The Companion Bible makes clear, it is an ordinal and not a cardinal number—480*th* and not 480. This leaves room for the idea that this time is part of some longer period.

There were five occasions when the Lord "sold" His people into the hands of their enemies, and for these five periods the prophetic clock stopped and time was unrecorded. These periods are all found in the book of Judges:--

MESOPOTAMIA . . .	8 years Lo-ammi (Judges iii. 8).
MOAB . . .	18 years Lo-ammi (Judges iii. 14).
CANAAN . . .	20 years Lo-ammi (Judges iv. 3).
MIDIAN . . .	7 years Lo-ammi (Judges vi. 1).
PHILISTINE . . .	40 years Lo-ammi (Judges xiii. 1).
	---
	93 years.

Of course no time can be reckoned "Lo-ammi" that is not connected with the whole nation; raids and bondage that affected only some of the tribes are not included.

The first principle, therefore, that we must observe when computing prophetic periods is that which allows for the non-reckoning of "Lo-ammi" periods. This applies in both directions; we cannot allow a period of time to be excluded while Israel is a nation before God, any more than we can allow a period to be reckoned when Israel is temporarily set aside. This we shall find compels us to include the Acts of the Apostles in the seventy weeks, and also compels us to exclude the period when Jerusalem was still unbuilt in Nehemiah's day.

The seventy weeks.

"Seventy weeks are determined upon thy people and upon thy holy city" (Dan. ix. 24).

If we understand the word "week" to mean seven days", we have a period of a little more than one year and four months to consider, and of this a smaller period is occupied in building and restoring Jerusalem—certainly a short time for such an operation. When, however, Daniel wishes to make us understand literal weeks, each of seven days, he adds the words "days":--

"I Daniel was mourning three full weeks" (literally, weeks of days) (x. 2).
"Till three whole weeks were fulfilled" (literally, weeks of days) (x. 3).

To make the matter certain, the angelic visitor declares that on the first day of Daniel's fasting his words had been heard and the angel sent, but that for "one and twenty days" he had been withstood. This carefulness on Daniel's part is one argument in favour of the view that ordinary weeks of days are not intended in Dan. ix. A further argument is that Daniel had been occupied with prophecies that dealt with a period of seventy years, and the angelic announcement of the seventy weeks seems but an expansion.

Another argument in favour of the years' interpretation is provided by the scriptural treatment of the last week. It will be observed that this last of the seventy weeks is divided into two parts:--

"He shall confirm the covenant with many for one week, and in the midst of the week he shall cause sacrifice and oblation to cease" (ix. 27).

Now Daniel refers more than once to a peculiar period at the time of the end:--

"A time and times and the dividing of time" (vii. 25).
"A time, times, and a half" (xii. 7).
"Let seven times pass over him" (iv. 16).

A consultation of the margin of Dan. xi. 13 will show that "times" may be synonymous with "years". If that is so, then a time, times and a half may be a prophetic and cryptic way of describing three-and-a-half years. This being just half the seven year period exactly meets requirements of Dan. ix. 27.

We have, however, clearer evidence in the book of the Revelation:--

"A time, and times, and half a time" (Rev. xii. 14).

This is the period during which the woman is nourished in the wilderness. In Rev. xii. 6 we read:--

> "They should feed her there 1,260 days."

It is difficult to avoid the conclusion that 1,260 days, and a time, times, and a half, are periods of the same duration.

There is evidence in Scripture of the recognition of a year of 360 days. For example, it is computed that between the seventeenth day of the second month, and the seventeenth day of the seventh month is 150 days (Gen. vii. and viii.), a computation which supposes a month of thirty days. Dividing 1,260 by 30 we have 42 months, or three-and-a-half years. Now Scripture speaks of a period of 42 months, and places it in such proximity to that of 1,260 days as to remove all doubt as to the length of the prophetic year:--

> "The holy city shall they tread under foot 42 months" (Rev. xi. 2).
> "My two witnesses shall prophesy 1,260 days" (Rev. xi. 3).

We have already seen that Rev. xiii. speaks of the time when the fourth beast of Dan. viii. shall be in power; and if Dan. ix. speaks of this same power and period, we may expect to find here some confirmation:--

> "He shall confirm the covenant with many for one week (a period of 7 years) and in the midst of the week (after the period of 3-1/2 years, 42 months, or 1,260 days) he shall cause the sacrifice and oblation to cease" (Dan. ix. 27).
> "And there was given unto him a mouth speaking great things and blasphemies; and power was given unto him to continue 42 months" (Rev. xiii. 5).

That the Hebrew language can refer to "Sabbaths of years" is shewn in Lev. xxv. 8, where a period of 49 years is also called "seven sabbaths of years, seven times seven years".

These things furnish sufficient proof that the final week of Dan. ix. is a period of seven years. And if the last week be a week of years, it follows that the seventy weeks are also weeks of years, so that the seventy weeks "determined" represent a period of 490 years.

When does the period of 490 years commence?

After revealing to Daniel a prophetic period of 490 years marked off on the divine calendar, the angel proceeds to divide the number of years up in a rather strange way. We first learn that during the 490 years the following events are to be fulfilled:--

> "To finish transgression, and to make an end of sins, and to make reconciliation for iniquity, and to bring in everlasting righteousness, ... and to anoint the most holy" (Dan. ix. 24).

The angel next proceeds to give further light upon this time by saying that the period from the commandment to restore and build Jerusalem to the coming of Messiah the Prince will be 7 weeks and 62 weeks, and that after the 62 weeks have elapsed the Messiah will be cut off. We found it useful when speaking of "Lo-ammi" periods to use a simple illustration to make the matter clearer. It may be of service to use the same method here. Suppose that a motorist is being directed to a certain destination and that, instead of being told that his goal is 69 miles away, he is told that it is 7 miles and 62 miles away. If after that somewhat cryptic statement, a remark is added about some feature in the road that marks a junction, the obvious thing for the motorist to do would be to travel the first seven miles and then look out for some change. If at the end of 7 miles of rather bad country lane the car emerged into a new, well-made road which continued for the remaining 62 miles, he would realize the reason for dividing the distance. Moreover, if he had been told that at the end of 62 miles he would come to a cross, he would look for it at the end of 62 miles of new road, for so the direction had indicated.

Now it must be obvious that when the angel speaks of 7 weeks as distinct from 62 weeks, he has some special reason for it. The angel also speaks of the building of the wall and the street of Jerusalem as an event related to the time periods with which his message deals. The Companion Bible in Appendix 58 gives the history of Nehemiah and Ezra. It is much too long to quote here, but we give two extracts to prove our point. We must leave our readers to test the matter further by consulting that appendix for themselves.

B.C.455.	|	Neh. i. 11 - ii. 8.—Hanani's report in the month Chisleu leads |	to the "going forth of the commandment to rebuild
	|	Jerusalem" (Dan. ix. 25).

	|	This ends the "seven sevens" from the going forth of
	|	the commandment in 454B.C.

This, then, is the first space covered, the building of the wall corresponding to the seven miles of bad road in the illustration. We now arrive at the most important feature of our discussion, and one that we have seen canvassed in no other work of Daniel. It follows from the logical application of the "Lo-ammi" principle. The question is whether or not the 490 years, set apart for the achievement of God's purpose in Israel, begin at the going forth of the proclamation to rebuild Jerusalem. To this question expositors give an affirmative answer, but the "Lo-ammi" principle demands a negative one. We read in Nehemiah:--

> "The remnant that are left of the captivity there in the province are in great affliction and reproach. The wall of Jerusalem also is broken down, and the gates thereof burned with fire" (Neh. i. 3).

Do these expressions describe Jerusalem as in favour of in desolation? There is only one answer. Nehemiah saw in these events the fulfillment of the curse threatened by law and prophets:--

> "If ye transgress, I will scatter you abroad among the nations" (Neh. i. 8).

Daniel also uses terms that imply "Lo-ammi" conditions. Jerusalem is "desolate" (ix. 2); Israel are driven (verse 7); the curse is poured upon them (verse 11); the visitation upon Jerusalem is unprecedented (verse 12). And in verse 16 there is anger and fury and reproach.

The seventy-sevens cannot commence until Jerusalem is rebuilt and the curse removed; this makes clear the reason for the division of the years into seven sevens and sixty-two sevens. The seven sevens of 49 years represent the time occupied in the rebuilding of the wall and street of Jerusalem by Nehemiah in time of trouble, and the period ends at the dedication of the temple (Ezra vi. 16-18; Neh. xiii. 6).

To revert to our illustration, the period covered by the building of the wall up to the dedication of the temple corresponds with the first 7 miles of country road. At the dedication of the temple at the end of the seven sevens the "Lo-ammi" period ends; the new high road is reached. It is then a distance of 62 miles to the Cross; or, leaving the illustration, an unbroken period of 62 sevens to the time of "the Messiah the Prince". Those who include the 49 years of rebuilding, include a period when Israel was "Lo-ammi", and they have no alternative to excluding from their reckoning the whole period of the Acts of the Apostles. But it is quite certain that Israel were not set aside as a people until Acts xxviii., so that the period of the Acts must be included. Our interpretation has required only 62 sevens; so that there is still scope remaining. From A.D.29 to A.D. 63, the usual dates now given for the Crucifixion and Acts xxviii., respectively, is a period of 35 years; this accounts for 5 sevens. Three sevens, therefore, remain for the future, and these are dealt with in the book of the Revelation: seven seals, seven trumpets, and seven vials. The final "seven" is concerned with the beast, the false prophet, antichrist and Babylon, as we read in Dan. ix.

Figure 1 in the diagram shown in Volume VI, page 169 exhibits the orthodox scheme, which includes 49 "Lo-ammi" years, and finds no room for the Acts. Figure 2 sets forth the interpretation suggested in this article, where the "Lo-ammi" conditions are recognized both in Nehemiah's day and in subsequent times. We must reserve for another article the exposition of the divine purpose for which this period of 490 years was set apart.

Do you wear a vail?
A word of vital importance to all believers.
pp. 217 - 219

The first item in the equipment necessary for the interpretation of Scripture is surely the belief that it is absolutely true. The second is revealed in II Tim. ii. 15, and is called "rightly dividing the Word of truth".

In this paper we desire to draw attention to the necessity of this right division by referring to the teaching of the apostle Paul in II Cor. iii. and iv., where he shews the distinction between law and gospel, and between old and new covenants. He speaks also of the activity of Satan, who does not scruple to bandage the eyes of believers with truth that belongs to another dispensation, if he may so prevent them from seeing the light of the glory of Christ.

Scripture abounds with figures drawn from ordinary life, but we must never lose sight of the fact that all the manners and customs that are referred to on almost every page of Scripture are the manners and customs of the East.

When seeking to show the distinction that exists between the old covenant and the new, the apostle in II Cor. iii. and iv. makes continual reference to the vail. Those who know anything of Jewish customs will know that the orthodox Jew covers his head with the talith (or vail) during prayer. Whether this custom is derived from the action of Moses recorded in Exod. xxxiv. 33, we will not here debate; it is sufficient that the apostle mentions them together. In II Cor. iii. 13 he reminds his readers that Moses "put a vail over his face", and that Israel's "thoughts" are to this day "blinded", for until this day the same vail remains untaken away in the reading of the old covenant.

In this third chapter the apostle draws some severe distinctions between the old and new covenants. The old covenant was engraven in stone; the new was written in the fleshy tables of the heart (II Cor. iii. 3 and 7). The old is the letter that killeth; the new the spirit that giveth life (II Cor. iii. 6). The one is the ministration of death and condemnation; the other the ministration of the spirit and righteousness (II Cor. iii. 7-9). The glory of the one was transient; the glory of the other was abiding and excelling (II Cor. iii. 7, 10, 11, 13). Moses, the minister of the old covenant, vailed his face; Paul, the minister of the new, used great boldness of speech, not as Moses who put a vail over his face (II Cor. iii. 12, 13). The glory that shone from the face of Moses transfigured no man; the glory that shines from the face of Jesus Christ changes those who behold it from glory to glory (II Cor. iii. 18 and iv. 6).

The A.V. robs the reader of the point of II Cor. iii. 18 by the translation "open face", but it is restored by the R.V. which reads "unvailed face":--

> "We all, with unvailed face beholding as in a mirror the glory of the Lord, are transfigured into the same image from glory to glory, even as from the Lord, the Spirit."

The contrast between vailed Israel under the law and the unvailed believer under grace is carried over into the opening words of II Cor. iv. concerning the ministry of Paul himself:--

> "Therefore seeing we have this ministry, as we have received mercy, we faint not, but have renounced the hidden things of dishonesty, not walking in craftiness, nor handling the Word of God deceitfully: but by manifestation of the truth commending ourselves to every man's conscience in the sight of God" (II Cor. iv. 1, 2).

Here we have a parallel with the "great boldness of speech" which the apostle placed in contrast with the vailing of the face of Moses, "And not as Moses" (II Cor. iii. 12, 13).

If we have in II Cor. iv. 1, 2 a parallel with the "great boldness of speech", where have we in this chapter the parallel with the vail over the face of Moses and over the hearts of Israel? All can see that we have it in verses 3-6. But once again the force of the passage is vailed by the A.V. The words of the third verse, which read, "But if our gospel be hid, it is hid to them that are lost", should be read as in the R.V., "If our gospel be vailed". So far as Paul was concerned the gospel was preached without reserve. If there was a vail over that gospel it was made by another, and the inference from the first verse is that such would be largely the result of "handling the Word of God deceitfully".

Before we go further, we must draw attention to the very strong language used by the apostle in describing the transient character of the old covenant and its glory. He says that it is to be "done away" and "abolished" (iii. 7, 11 and 13). That the language is strong, the following passages testify:--

> "Who hath ABOLISHED death" (II Tim. i. 10).
> "That the body of sin might be DESTROYED" (Rom. vi. 6).
> "Make the promise of NONE EFFECT" (Gal. iii. 17).

Speaking of these two covenants in Hebrews he says:--

> "For if the first covenant had been faultless, then should no place have been sought for the second, for finding fault with them, He saith, etc." (Heb. viii. 7, 8).
> "He taketh away the first, that He may establish the second" (Heb. x. 9).

Referring to the backward drift of the Galatians from grace to law, from faith to works, for spirit to flesh, and from liberty to bondage, Paul says:--

> "But now, after that ye have known God, or rather are known of God, how turn ye back to the weak and beggarly elements, whereunto ye desire again to be in bondage" (Gal. iv. 9).

These references we desire to bring to bear upon the words of II Cor. iv. 3, where, instead of speaking of the unsaved by the words, "them that are lost", the apostle is referring to the old covenant that had been abolished. In effect, he says that the god of this age, by deceitful handling of the Word of God, had fabricated a vail out of truth that belonged to a past dispensation, and had so bandaged the eyes of the people with the letter that killeth, that they could not see the glory that excelleth. Taking these facts into consideration, the translation which we have been compelled to accept is as follows:--

> "But if our gospel be vailed, it is vailed by those things that are perishing (i.e., the things of the old covenant that had been abolished, as, for example, circumcision, which now severs from Christ and from grace, Gal. v. 2-4), by which the god of this age blinded the thought (see Gal. iii. 14) of them that believe not, that the light of the gospel of the glory of Christ, Who is the image of God, should dawn upon them" (II Cor. iv. 3, 4).

Satan would have us occupied rather with the transient glory of Moses, than the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ. In all this we do not intend to suggest that the law of Moses is untrue, or that any part of the O.T. is less inspired than the N.T.; what we seek to show is, that by allowing oneself to be occupied with the truth that belongs to a dispensation past and gone, we allow the god of this age, by the deceitful handling of the Word of God, to "blind our thoughts" and hide the "gospel of the glory of Christ". It will be seen, therefore, that the principle of rightly dividing the Word of truth is of supreme importance to all believers, for its neglect may vail the glory of the ascended Lord.

A Fourfold fellowship.
#1. The doctrine of Christ.
p. 220

> "That which we have seen and heard declared we unto you, that ye also may have fellowship with us" (I John i. 3).

The editors of the Greek MSS indicated by the letters LTTrA and W, insert the word "also" after the word "declare". By reading the verse again, paying attention to the two occurrences of the word "also", we learn that the first element of fellowship is the mutual recognition of revealed truth:--

> "That which we have seen and heard declare we ALSO unto you, that ye ALSO may have fellowship with us."

Fellowship arises out of the relationship implied by the three words "seen", "heard", and "declared". These words are somewhat similar to those of Paul in I Cor. xv. 3:--

> "For I delivered unto you first of all that which I also received."

We have, too, in Acts xxii. 15, the words:--

> "For thou shalt be His witness unto all men of what thou hast SEEN and HEARD."

If we ask what Paul had seen and heard, we have the answer in the same chapter:--

> "The God of our fathers hath chosen thee, that thou shouldest know His will, and SEE that Just One, and shouldest HEAR the voice of His mouth" (Acts xxii. 14).

Paul had seen and heard a person:--

> "When it pleased God . . . . . to reveal His Son in me, that I might preach HIM among the Gentiles" (Gal. i. 15, 16).

When we look back to the opening verses of the first epistle of John, we find the same personal emphasis. What John had "seen and heard" is plainly stated in verses 1 and 2:--

> "That which was from the beginning, which we have HEARD, and which we have SEEN with our eyes, which we have LOOKED upon, and our hands have HANDLED, of the Word of life (for the life was manifested, and we have seen, and bear witness, and shew unto you that eternal life which was with the Father, and was manifested unto us), that which we have SEEN and HEARD declare unto you."

Fundamentals of Dispensational Truth.

#75. The new covenant anticipated (Exod. xxxiv. and xxxv.).
pp. 23 - 29

In preparation for the proclamation of the Name of the Lord, and the partial revelation of His glory to Moses, the Lord instructs Moses to hew two tables of stone like to the two that had been broken, and to be ready in the morning to ascend the mount. Precautions were to be taken that neither man nor beast should be near. This being accomplished, we read: "And Moses rose up early in the morning, and went up unto mount Sinai, as the Lord commanded him, and took in his hand the two tables of stone" (Exod. xxxiv. 4). The proclaiming of the name of the Lord immediately followed:--

> "Then the Lord passed before him, and proclaimed, Jehovah, Jehovah God, tenderly compassionate and gracious, long-suffering and abounding in mercy and truth, reserving mercy for thousands, bearing away iniquity and transgression and sin, and that will by no means clear the guilty, visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children, and upon the children's children, unto the third and fourth generation" (Exod. xxxiv. 6, 7).

There is by no means unanimity among Hebrew scholars as to the correct reading of the phrase: "And that will by no means clear the guilty." We may see by the italic type that "the guilty" are words added to complete the sense. The words "by no means" are the rendering of an idiomatic use of the verb with which most students are familiar. For example, "Thou shalt surely die" is a good English translation, yet literally the words are, "Dying, thou shalt die". Here in Exod. xxxiv. 7, "Clearing, He will not clear" represents the order of the words. Spurrell translates the passage: "And justifying the unjustified; yet visiting the iniquity of the father", etc. Dathe and Boothroyd, after De Dieu, render the passage: "And do not altogether destroy the impious." Boothroyd, moreover, in his "Bible" translates it: "Clearing him that is not clear."

There is no essential difference between "clearing the guilty" and "justifying the ungodly". The introduction of the words, "That will by no means clear the guilty", in some measure nullifies the gracious words that precede. There we read that the Lord forgives or "bears away" the iniquity, transgression and sin which constitute a person guilty. Surely, it is the blessed truth taught alike to Abraham, Moses and David, and made abundantly plain by Paul in Rom. iii. and iv., that He Who bears away our sin does "clear him who is not clear".

The proclamation of the name Jehovah involves a two-fold attitude to sin: an attitude of graciousness, mercy, long-suffering and faithfulness in bearing away sin, yet, by no means condoning sin or compromising God's own Holiness. This shows that sin, though it be forgiven, often leaves behind a crop of trouble that must be reaped. For example, David was forgiven, yet as a result of his sin, even though forgiven, war never departed from his house. Moses was forgiven, but he nevertheless never entered the promised land. So here, sin will be forgiven, yet the iniquity of the fathers is visited upon the children. The sins of a believer to-day are forgiven, but the effects of his sin go on.

Once more we see Moses grasping the intention of the Lord by faith, and daring to urge yet more grace:--

> "And Moses made haste, and bowed his head toward the earth, and worshipped. And he said, If now I have found grace in Thy sight, O Lord, let my Lord, I pray thee, go among us: FOR IT IS A STIFF-NECKED PEOPLE; and pardon our iniquity and our sin, and take us for Thine inheritance" (Exod. xxxiv. 8, 9).

Surely Moses knew that God did "clear him who is not clear". Look at the holy boldness that faith possesses when standing on the ground of grace. The Lord had said that the reason why He would not remain with Israel was that they were "a stiff-necked people" (Exod. xxxii. 9, xxxiii. 3 and 5), yet Moses, with the vision of the glory still fresh and the proclamation of the name of the Lord still present to his memory, urges this as a reason for the Lord to alter His threat, to turn away His wrath and to go among them once more. Truly, the principles of grace and merit are at the two extremes.

The re-stated covenant.

Following this manifestation of grace the Lord re-states covenant conditions in verses 10-17, following it up in verses 18-26 with a selection of the commandments which are the working out of the terms of the covenant. It will be observed that, in this new statement, practically one item only is stressed, the matter of idolatry and the making of a covenant with idolaters. Every covenant must have at least two parties, with mutual obligations. Consequently verses 10-17 are distributed under the pronouns "I" and "Thou".

"I."

A | Behold, I will make a covenant.
B | Before all thy people I will do marvels.
B | It is a terrible thing that I will do with thee.
A | Behold I drive out before thee the Amorite.

"Thou."

A | Take heed lest thou make a covenant with inhabitants.
B | Ye shall destroy their altars.
C | Thou shalt worship no other God.
A | Lest thou make a covenant with the inhabitants of the land.
B | Lest thou take of their daughters unto thy sons.
C | Thou shalt make thee no molten gods.

The omission of the remaining nine commandments from these words of the covenant does not imply that they were not repeated (see verse 28), but the insistence upon the first commandment would cause Israel to realize that the worship of God alone was the first essential. No amount of obedience to any other command would compensate for the breaking of this, the essential clause.

When Israel came out of Egypt many marvelous plagues attended their deliverance; but the Lord says here that He will, in the working out of this covenant, "do marvels", and that it will be a "terrible thing" that He will do with Israel. Moreover these marvels will be such as have not been seen in all the earth, nor in any nation. There are hints of this scattered throughout the history of Israel. A very definite statement is found in Micah vii. 15-17:--

> "According to the days of thy coming out of the land of Egypt will I show unto him marvelous things. The nations shall see and be confounded at all their might: they shall lay their hand upon their mouth, their ears shall be deaf. They shall lick the dust like a serpent, they shall move out of their holes like worms of the earth: they shall be afraid of the Lord our God, and shall fear because of thee."

It is evident, when we survey the teaching of Scripture, that these unprecedented marvels are not described in their full import until we reach the book of the Revelation. When we compare the opening of the Revelation with the original covenant of Sinai, we perceive the change that is brought about by the changed covenant:--

> "Ye have seen what I did unto the Egyptians, and how I bare you on eagles wings, and brought you unto Myself. Now, therefore, if ye will obey My voice indeed and keep My covenant, then ye shall be a peculiar treasure unto Me above all people: for all the earth is mine; and ye shall be unto Me a kingdom of priests, and a holy nation" (Exod. xix. 4-6).

This is the original covenant, and upon hearing its term Israel said, "All that the Lord hath spoken we will do" (Exod. xix. 8). Alas, the flesh cannot fulfil such promises. But a few weeks pass and Israel break the covenant and are threatened with extinction. Though the people will never become a kingdom of priests on the terms of their own law-keeping, the words of Rev. i. indicate that by the grace of God, and through the redemption of Christ, they will ultimately attain to this glorious position:--

> "Unto Him that loveth us and loosed us from our sins by His own blood, and hath made us kings and priests unto God and His Father, to Him be glory and dominion for ever and ever, Amen" (Rev. i. 5, 6).

The covenant of marvels is fulfilled by the Lord in this book of the Revelation. The vials of His wrath are poured out upon the earth and, sun, moon and stars share in the judgment. Micah vii. tells us that the nations shall come out of their holes like worms. Revelation tells us that they shall hide themselves in the dens and in the rocks of the mountains (Rev. vi. 15).

What Israel failed to attain by law, they shall reach through redeeming love: and this re-stated covenant of Exod. xxxiv. follows the wonderful exhibition of divine forbearance and forgiving grace revealed at the intercession of Moses.

Following the new terms of the covenant of marvels is a repetition of one or two commandments that arise out of it.

The commandments (Exod. xxxiv. 18-26).

A | 18. | a | Thou shalt keep. The feast of unleavened bread.
b | Seven days shalt thou eat it.
c | Thou camest out of Egypt.
B | 19, 20. Firstborn of cattle—redeemed.
Firstborn of ass—break his neck.
Firstborn of sons—redeemed.
C | 21. Six days work. Seventh day rest.
A | 22-24. | a | Thou shalt observe. Feast of Weeks, Firstfruits, Ingathering.
b | Thrice in the year—No leaven.
c | I will cast out the nation—No leaven.
B | 26. Firstborn of land—bring.
No seeth kid in mother's milk.

The commandments so put forward, and thereby emphasized and enjoined upon this people, are as follows:--

1. The four feasts that mark out their ecclesiastical year.—Unleavened bread is a reminder of their separation from evil unto the Lord, but the statement in verse 25 concerning the unleavened sacrifices would remind Israel that it is by the blood of atonement, and not by the works of the law, that they can ever hope to find acceptance. The last feast, the ingathering, symbolizes all Israel's hope, and keeps it before them.

2. Redemption.—This is selected for repetition. The firstborn of man and beast belong to the Lord. This, as we find by referring back to Exod. xiii. 12-15, was ordained to keep perpetually in mind the deliverance of Israel and the slaying of the firstborn in Egypt. The firstling of an ass did not come into the same class as the firstling of an ox or sheep, for the ass was not an animal fit for sacrifice. It must either be redeemed by the sacrifice of a lamb, or its neck must be broken. All firstborn sons, too, like the ass must be redeemed.

The injunction at the close against seething a kid in its mother's milk, guards the mind against what might appear indifference to animal suffering or cruelty. God's commands concerning animal sacrifices were necessitated because of sin, but He would have His people follow the paths of love and kindness.

3. The observance of the sabbath knew no exceptions.—Ploughing and harvesting are exacting periods in the life of an agricultural people, nevertheless, however pressing the apparent need, the seventh day sabbath must be preserved. It was, as we have seen, a sign between Israel and the Lord.

4. The first of the firstfruits were to be given to the Lord.—This is much in line with the many customs still existing in virtue of which some tangible tribute is paid annually to an overlord in recognition of his dues and demands upon the fealty of the one in covenant. As we shall see later, these firstfruits were a foreshadowing of resurrection.

What was the effect upon Moses of this new covenant of graciousness? The skin of his face shone. He could not but catch something of the glory. True, both the record here and the inspired comment in II Cor. iii. show that the glory was transient, yet it foreshadowed the fuller blessings of the new covenant where they who behold the glory of the Lord with unveiled face are transfigured. Moses, we are told, "wist not that the skin of his face shone". To boast of modesty is to be immodest. To parade humility is to be proud. True sanctity walks hand in hand with conscious unworthiness. Boldness of access by reason of the faith of Him, and fear and trembling when working out that salvation, go together. Paul did not know his own greatness. He rather marveled at the grace given to the least of all saints. David was a man after God's own heart, but he knew what it was to pray for forgiveness of deep and awful sin.

Others will take knowledge of us when we have been in the presence of the Lord, just as the priest who had been offering incense would carry some of the fragrance with him on returning from the sanctuary.

The section concludes with one more reference to the sabbath, this time particularizing its effect in the household:--

> "Ye shall kindle no fire throughout your habitations upon the sabbath day" (Exod. xxxv. 3).

The law of the sabbath suited Israel's land. Even the law concerning fires on the sabbath would mean sickness and death if applied to a northerly country such as England. The climate of this country would not allow the sabbatic year to be kept, unless the Lord accompanied the command with perpetual miracles. But these are particular features of the covenant made between the Lord and Israel.

After this last reference to sabbath rest, the remainder of Exodus is occupied with the description and making of the tabernacle under the guidance of Bezaleel and Aholiab. When the work was finished, the gracious promise of the Lord's presence was kept:-- > "Then a cloud covered the tent of the congregation, and the glory of the Lord filled the tabernacle" (Exod. xl. 34).

The closing words of Exodus tell us that the token of the Lord's presence never again left the people. He Who led them out, led them in. The redeemed of the Lord have no need to plead for His leading, for it is theirs as part of His one great act of love. What they need is eyes to see the cloud and the fire, and hearts responsive to the indications of His will.

Thus all things are now ready for the great covenant worship with which the ten commandments open. The book of worship, so far as details are concerned, is the book of Leviticus, and this must be our next study.

#76. Leviticus. The book as a whole.
pp. 64 - 67

In the series entitled "Redemption" in Volumes XVII and XVIII we have given the five great offerings with which Leviticus opens a fairly close study. We now pass on to a wider consideration of the book, asking all our readers to refer to the articles dealing with Lev. i.-vii. in the Volumes referred to above, so that their study may be as complete as possible.

Before attempting a detailed exposition, it is incumbent upon us to seek the general disposition of subject matter, and at the outset we must confess that the task appears formidable. However, believing Leviticus to be a part of inspired Scripture, we approach it with the same confidence that we should an epistle of Paul, expecting to find beneath the surface those evidences of its divine composition which we have observed so frequently in other parts of the Word.

The complicated character of the book and the mass of intricate detail preclude all idea of an exhaustive analysis, but the following presents a survey of the teaching of the book without the omission or suppression of any section.

Leviticus as a whole.

A | i.-vii. Five offerings. Worship.
a | i. Whole Burnt Offering.
b | ii. Meal Offering.
c | iii. Peace Offering.
a | iv., v.-. Sin Offering.
b | -v.-vii. Trespass Offering.
B | viii.-xv. | d | viii., ix. Priests' service.
e | x. Warning to priests. Nadab destroyed.
f | xi.-xv. A clean people. "Make a difference."
C | xvi., xvii. Atonement for sins. Blood sprinkled seven times.
B | xviii.-xxv. | f | xviii.-xxii. A clean people. "Put a difference."
d | xxiii.-xxv. People's service.
e | xxiv. 10-16. Warning to people. Blasphemer stoned.
C | xxvi. Punishment for sins. Seven times.
A | xxvii. Five vows and the redemption.
a | 1-13. Devoted persons or beasts.
b | 14, 15. Devoted houses.
c | 16-24. Devoted fields.
a | 26-29. Devoted man or beast.
b | 30-34. Devoted tithes.

All that is necessary at the moment is to indicate in a few words the obvious relationship of the various parts. Leviticus opens and closes with freewill offerings. Five great basic sacrifices occupy the opening chapters, and five separate sets of vows, and their redemption, occupy the closing chapter. While there is not an exact parallel between these two sets of five, it is noticeable that in both cases the opening offering is the highest in character. In Lev. i. it is the whole burnt offering, entirely devoted to God. In Lev. xxvii. it is the devotion of persons, men, women or children, to the Lord. The second offering is the meat (or meal) offering, while the second vow is the sanctification of a house. The third offering is the peace offering and the third vow the sanctification of a field and its produce. The sin offering and the firstling of beasts come fourth, and include one kind that can never be redeemed (xxvii. 28). Lastly we have the trespass offering and the redemption of tithes. The fuller exposition of Lev. xxvii. must await its place in the series.

The two sections under the letters B and B should be read and compared together. The first is occupied with the sanctifying and the service of the priests. The second with the feasts and service that were incumbent upon all Israel. In both there is a most impressive warning. The sacred nature of the priest's office is most tragically enforced by the destruction of Nadab and Abihu, when they offered strange fire before the Lord. The equally sacred responsibility of the people is enforced by the tragic end of "the son of an Israelitish woman, whose father was an Egyptian", who for cursing the name of the Lord was stoned to death.

Associated with both of these groups is the law concerning clean and unclean things. Chapter xi. gives a long list of clean and unclean animals, and its true object is revealed in the words: "Ye shall sanctify yourselves . . . . . make a difference" (Lev. xi. 44-47). Chapter xii. is occupied with the purification of women after child-birth; xiii. and xiv. deal with the plague of leprosy and the law of its cleansing, and xv. with various physical causes of uncleanness. Chapters xviii.-xxii., which supplement xi.-xv., take up the question of defilement and uncleanness once more, dealing with unlawful marriage relationships and unchaste acts. Chapters xvii. and xix. are concerned with the abominable rites of Molech and further unchastity, xx. with defilement by death and physical blemishes, and xxi. with the peculiar separateness of Aaron and his seed. Once again the teaching of these chapters focuses upon the separateness of Israel: "Ye shall therefore put a difference . . . . . I have severed you from other people" (Lev. xx. 24-26). The two outstanding features that remain are the atonement and the punishment for sins in chapters xvi., xvii. and xxvi.

It would serve no useful purpose to attempt the exposition of any one feature at this stage; we leave the outline with the prayerful student, trusting that he will not only compare it with the various outlines put forward at different times by other servants of God, but above all test it by close reference to the Book itself. In subsequent studies we hope to deal with a series of salient features that are of importance in the school of faith.

#77. Leviticus. Some phases of holiness.
pp. 105 - 109

The laws enumerated in Leviticus were all given by the Lord from Mount Sinai. This is plainly stated four times. At the end of chapter vii., where the five great offerings are detailed, we read:--

> "This is the law of the burnt offering, of the meat offering, of the sin offering, and of the trespass offering, and of the consecrations, and of the sacrifice of the peace offering; which the Lord commanded Moses in Mount Sinai, in the day that He commanded the children of Israel to offer their oblations unto the Lord, in the wilderness of Sinai" (Lev. vii. 37, 38).

Again at the beginning of xxv. and end of xxvii. we read:--

> "And the Lord spake unto Moses in Mount Sinai."
> "These are the commandments, which the Lord commanded Moses for the children of Israel in Mount Sinai."

Throughout the book there are indications that Israel are living in camp. Both the incidents that break into the narrative, namely, that of Nadab, and that of the blasphemer (chapters x. and xxiv.), speak of the camp, and their very introduction indicates that the actual giving of the law was in progress.

The time occupied in the giving of the law in Leviticus is just one month. This is discovered by referring to the following:--

> "And it came to pass in the first month in the second year, on the first day of the month, that the tabernacle was reared up" (Exod. xi. 17).
> "And the Lord spake unto Moses in the wilderness of Sinai, in the tabernacle of the congregation, on the first day of the second month, in the second year after they were come out of the land of Egypt" (Numb. i. 1).

Under the shadow of the law and its threatenings, therefore, was given this gracious typical provision for sin. The laws of Leviticus come with the same divine authority as the ten commandments of Exod. xx. The book of Leviticus contains more of the spoken words of God than any other, and while we do not intend by this statement to imply that it is more inspired than the rest of Scripture, nevertheless, the fact should give pause to any waverer who listens to the critic who relegates the whole to later times, and speaks of it as a pious forgery. Leviticus, moreover, is quoted in forty places in the N.T. and these quotations are not confined to one section, but are found in the four Gospels, the Acts, Hebrews, Peter, James, Jude, Revelation, I and II Corinthians, Galatians, Romans, Ephesians and Colossians.

The fundamental basis of the book is holiness, and it is no exaggeration to say that holiness is implied in every law, every ordinance and every offering. Qadosh, "holy", and its variants occur over one hundred times, variously translated, "holy", "hallow", "sanctify", and "sanctuary". Closely allied with this holiness are the various laws and ceremonies that deal with uncleanness and purification. Redemption from sin is not in view in these. The great central offering for sin is seen in the institution of the day of atonement.

Uncleanness.

As one patiently seeks out the varied laws that deal with uncleanness in Leviticus, and as the scriptural emphasis upon the many and varied causes of contamination begin to be translated by the Spirit into their spiritual equivalents, one feels like Isaiah who, in the presence of the Lord, cried, "Woe is me, for I am undone, because I am a man of unclean lips", and more than ever are we thankful for that precious blood "that cleanseth us from all sin". In this book we discover that even the natural workings of the body may nevertheless be unclean, and we learn that, irrespective of any fault of our own, there are many outside sources of defilement that may render us unclean. There is one case, where the near relation of the dead is definitely permitted to make himself unclean out of love and devotion, but, though permitted, this uncleanness is nevertheless not allowed to pass; it must be removed, as must all other (See Lev. xxi. 1-4).

In Leviticus, cleanness is used as a synonym for holiness, and to know this is a valuable help in the understanding of the will of God concerning our sanctification:--

> "Put difference between holy and unholy, and between unclean and clean" (Lev. x. 10).

In Lev. xi. we have the law regulating the matter of clean and unclean beasts that might or might not be eaten by an Israelite:--

> "These are the beasts which ye shall eat among all the beasts that are on the earth . . . . . and in the waters."

A long list is given of prohibited beast, fish, fowl and creeping thing, and then come the concluding words:--

> "Ye shall not make yourselves abominable with any creeping thing that creepeth, neither shall ye make yourselves unclean with them, that ye should be defiled thereby. For I am the Lord your God; ye shall therefore sanctify yourselves, and ye shall be holy; for I am holy: neither shall ye defile yourselves with any manner of creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth. For I am the Lord that bringeth you up out of the land of Egypt to be your God: ye shall therefore be holy, for I am holy" (Lev. xi. 43-45).

Profaneness.

Another opposite to holiness, in Leviticus, is profanity.

> "They shall be holy unto their God, and not profane the name of their God" (Lev. xxi. 6, 7).
>
> "He shall not go in unto the vail, nor come nigh unto the altar, because he hath a blemish; that he profane not My sanctuaries: for I the Lord do sanctify them" (Lev. xxi. 23).

"If a man eat of the holy thing unwittingly, then he shall put the fifth part thereto . . . . . they shall not profane the holy thing" (Lev. xxii. 14, 15).

"Neither shall ye profane My holy name; but I will be hallowed among the children of Israel; I am the Lord which allow you" (Lev. xxii. 32).

The word translated "profane" is chalal, and means "to penetrate", and so, in its more intensive forms, it means ruthlessly to violate all sacred bounds, brazenly to enter holy ground. The adjective chol is rendered "unholy" in Lev. x. 10, where it is placed in contrast with "holy" and "clean":--

"That ye may put a difference between holy and unholy: and between unclean and clean."

The idea of being "common" in opposition to "sacred" can be seen in Ezek. xlviii. 12-15, where chol is translated "profane":--

"This oblation of the land . . . . . a thing most holy . . . . . and the five thousand that are left in the breadth . . . . . shall be a profane place for the city."

That this "profane" place simply means, the place for the common people is seen by the concluding words of the verse, "for dwelling, and for suburbs".

Blemish.

Not only are uncleanness and profaneness placed in contrast with holiness, but, in the setting aside from holy service all that are physically blemished, another aspect is typified.

"Speak unto Aaron, saying, whoever he be of thy seed in their generation that hath any blemish, let him not approach to offer the bread of his God . . . . . he hath a blemish; that he profane not My sanctuaries" (Lev. xxi. 17-23).

What is true of the priest is also true of the offering:--

"Whatsoever hath a blemish, that shall ye not offer; for it shall not be acceptable for you . . . . . it shall be perfect to be accepted: there shall be no blemish therein" (Lev. xxii. 18-25).

How these types force us to the blessed realization of the fullness of the Lord Jesus Christ! Both as Offering and High Priest He was "without blemish and without spot", "holy, harmless, undefiled, separate from sinners", and can we not see in Eph. i. 4-6 the close connection between holiness, and acceptance in the Perfect One?

"That we should be holy and without blame . . . . . accepted in the Beloved."

Holiness and sin.

The removal of defilement in order to attain to holiness is set forth in a great variety of ways in Leviticus. We have rinsing in water, washing in water, sprinkling with blood, anointing with oil, and the making of atonement, in order to cleanse. Some of these different processes we must consider, but the only aspect we propose to notice before closing this article is a special word translated "cleanse" which shows the intimate connection between unholiness and sin:--

> "And he shall take to cleanse the house . . . . ." (Lev. xiv. 49).
> "And he shall cleanse the house with the blood of the bird . . . . ." (Lev. xiv. 52).
> "And Moses took the blood . . . . . and purified the altar" (Lev. viii. 15).

These words "cleanse" and "purify" are the piel form of the verb chata, "to sin", and there can be no true holiness that is not intimately connected with the sacrifice of Christ. True, we read of the sanctification of the Spirit, and the sanctifying by the Word, but this is subsequent to, and based upon, the sanctification which is by His blood. This we shall see more clearly in the passage we hope to consider in our next article.

Thou shalt put a difference.

When Israel were redeemed out of Egypt, we read that the Lord "put a difference" between Israel and the Egyptians (Exod. xi. 7), and where, in Exod. viii. 23, we read, "I will put a division between My people and thy people", the margin reads, "(Heb.) a redemption", for "a division". What, therefore, is holiness or sanctification but redemption carried to its logical conclusion? The teaching of Leviticus is expressed in the words of Lev. x. 10:--

> "And that ye may put a difference between holy and unholy, and between unclean and clean."

This putting a difference between righteousness and unrighteousness, between light and darkness, Christ and Belial, believer and infidel, is summed up in II Cor. vii. 1, as "perfecting holiness in the fear of God", and separation from evil unto God, perceiving, and acting out the difference that grace has made, is the essence of true sanctification. While the law made nothing perfect, and Levitical cleansings and offerings failed to touch the conscience, they foreshadowed the great work of Christ, "the very image", and are a preservative against that emotional and fleshly "holiness" that passes, with some, for the real thing. "True holiness" is ours in Christ (Eph. iv. 24).

#78. "The law of the leper in the day of his cleansing." (Lev. xiii. and xiv.).

pp. 141 - 147

The great outstanding type of cleansing in Leviticus is that of the leper, given in chapter xiv.—"The law of the leper in the day of his cleansing." Before we can hope to appreciate the blessing of this typical cleansing we must have some understanding of the nature of the defilement, and this necessitates a consideration of chapter xiii. also. In xiii. the priest pronounces the leper unclean, while in xiv. he pronounces him clean.

Alongside the main subject of the leper and his cleansing are the related subjects of leprosy in a garment or in a house. Leprosy in the person is typical of sin within, it is indeed "deeper than the skin" (Lev. xiii. 2). Leprosy in the garments is typical of our "habits"—the English idiom retains the figure, for we still speak of some clothing as a "habit", e.g., "a riding habit". Scripture uses the figure continually. "Be clothed with humility." "The robe of righteousness." "Put on (as clothing) the new man." The house speaks of relationships—home, witness, service, etc., "The house of God", "The household of God", "The household of faith". The subject matter of Lev. xiii. and xiv. is disposed as follows:--

The law of leprosy (Lev. xiii. and xiv.).

A | xiii. 1-46. The leper. Pronounced unclean.
B | xiii. 47-57. Leprosy in a garment.
C | xiii. 58. Cleansing of garment.
D | xiii. 59. "The law."
A | xiv. 1-32. The leper. Pronounced clean.
B | xiv. 33-47. Leprosy in a house.
C | xiv. 48-53. Cleansing of house.
D | xiv. 54-57. "The law."

Upon reading Lev. xiii. one of the first impressions received is the extraordinary care that the priest must exercise in judging as to whether the person before him is, or is not, suffering from leprosy. No hasty judgment is allowed. No indiscriminate generalizings, for leprosy cuts a man off from fellowship with God and his neighbours, deprives him of all visible means of grace, all domestic and social privileges, and consequently it must be dealt with most carefully. The priest is given the most detailed account of the symptoms, and his diagnosis does not depend upon his feelings or his reasoning, but upon the Word of God. Then, observe the care that must be exercised whenever there is a doubt in the mind of the priest.

"Then the priest shall shut up him that hath the plague seven days" (Lev. xiii. 4).

If at the end of that time there is still uncertainty, the suspected person must be shut up for yet a further seven days (xiii. 5). How this should warn us against hasty judgments, uncharitable interpretations, or biased opinions of the actions of others.

"It is but a scab" (xiii. 6). The whole subject is loathsome, but also is sin, and we are but looking into the mirror of the Word. A scab may, or may not, be a cause for putting away. The one great point that the priest was to observe was that "it spread not". If, however, spreading be evident, "he shall be seen of the priest again", then, if the spreading continues, the dread sentence goes forth, "it is leprosy". Here is a lesson that should give us pause. The person is pronounced leprous and unclean when the plague with which he is afflicted spreads! If we would have this interpreted for us in spiritual language, we may heed the apostle's statement:--

> "I know, and am persuaded by the Lord Jesus, that there is nothing unclean (or common) of itself: but to him that esteemeth anything to be unclean, to him it is unclean" (Rom. xiv. 14).
> "All things indeed are pure, but it is evil for that man that eateth with offence" (Rom. xiv. 20).
>
> "Hast thou faith? have it to thyself before God. Happy is he that condemneth not himself in that thing which he alloweth" (Rom. xiv. 22).
> "We know that an idol is nothing in the world . . . . . howbeit there is not in every man that knowledge: for some with conscience of the idol unto this hour eat it as a thing offered unto an idol . . . . . and through thy knowledge the weak brother is perishing, for whom Christ died" (I Cor. viii. 4-11).

While we live and walk in this world it is impossible to avoid contact with evil somewhere, and while this is to be deplored, it is but an indication of the present state of things, and the effect upon us is described in the language of the type as, it is but a scab". Though by no means spiritual or right, such things are not a sufficient ground for the breaking off of fellowship, for "then must ye needs go out of the world". But where anything tends to "spread", and weaker brethren are stumbled, then it is time to judge the thing and pronounce it unclean.

The law of cleansing.

While we should not too quickly turn away from the awful picture of sin given in chapter xiii., our immediate object is rather the cleansing of the leper, which is given in chapter xiv. Referring to the structure on page 141, we see that the section dealing with the cleansing of the leper occupies verses 1-32. This, we shall discover upon reading, is further divided into two sections. First the full ceremonial (1-20), then the provision for one who might be too poor and unable to afford so much. This, therefore, reduces our field of investigation to the first twenty verses. The intricate detail of this passage is apt to overwhelm the reader, and he may thus miss one or two most essential distinctions. To enable all to see these features we set out verses 2-20 as follows:--

A1	xiv. 2-7.	Out of the camp.
A2	xiv. 8, 9.	Into the camp.
A3	xiv. 10-20.	At the door of the tabernacle.

It is vital to the understanding of this lesson that these three divisions shall be kept distinct. Each has its own ceremonial, and what is done at the door of the tabernacle would be impossible either outside the camp, or during the seven days tarrying abroad in the camp. We can now fill in the detail of each section:--

A1 | xiv. 2-7. Out of the camp.
a | The two birds.
b | Cedar, scarlet, hyssop.
a | The two birds.
B1 | xiv. 7. "HE SHALL PRONOUNCE HIM CLEAN."
A2 | xiv. 8, 9. Into the camp.
c | Wash clothes, shave and wash flesh.
d | Seven days tarrying.
d | Seventh day.
c | Shave, wash clothes and wash flesh.
B2 | xiv. 9. "AND HE SHALL BE CLEAN."
A3 | xiv. 10-20. At the door.
e | Trespass offering.
f | Wave offering.
g | The blood applied.
g | The oil applied.
e | Sin offering.
f | Burnt offering and meat offering.
B3 | xiv. 20. "AND HE SHALL BE CLEAN."

As we observe what is said regarding the cleansing of the leper, we shall find food for thought. In the first section he is "pronounced clean". In the second, he begins to take active part "that he may be clean" (verse 8). "And he shall be clean." In the third, there seems at first to be a set-back. He is spoken of as "the man that is to be made clean" (verses 11, 18 and 19), and not until atonement has been made do we read, "and he shall be clean" (verse 20). It is evident that deep teaching is here. May we look ever to the Lord that we may be guided into the truth.

The two birds.

First let us consider the initial act of cleansing. The margin tells us that the birds may be sparrows, and there is a possibility that the English word is derived from the Hebrew, which is tsippor. With these two birds are taken cedar wood, scarlet and hyssop. Perhaps we may never penetrate the typical intention, yet these things are written for our learning. A variety of suggestions have been made from time to time, which it would serve no useful purpose to repeat here. But two N.T. passages come before the mind that seem to point the way to the truth intended. The spiritual equivalent of leprosy is found in the words:--

"Hating even the garment spotted by the flesh" (Jude 23).
"Keep himself unspotted from the world" (James i. 27).

The flesh and the world are the two great sources of spiritual defilement, and nothing but the cross of Christ can deliver the believer from their contamination:--

> "They that are Christ's have crucified the flesh" (Gal. v. 24).
> "The world is crucified unto me" (Gal. vi. 14).

By nature we are all defiled and unclean. "In the flesh . . . . . and in the world" is the centre and circumference of the natural man (Eph. ii. 11, 12). The combination of cedar and hyssop makes one think of I Kings iv. 33, where the whole range of the vegetable kingdom seems comprehended in the words: "He spake of trees, from the cedar tree that is in Lebanon, even unto the hyssop that springeth out of the wall." Scarlet is what we know as cochineal, and the combination may indicate the world and the flesh, the contaminating agents, being placed under the power of the death and resurrection of Christ. However this may be, the great feature of this offering is found in the two birds.

It is not often that we have, in one offering, so vivid a picture of both the death and resurrection of Christ as we have here. One of the birds was taken and killed in an earthen vessel over running water (the same word as "living" in verse 6), and then the living bird, together with the cedar wood, scarlet, and hyssop, were dipped into the blood of the bird that was killed: the leper was then sprinkled seven times, and the living bird let loose into the open field.

The two aspects of cleansing.

As a result of this, the man is "pronounced clean". Here is the initial cleansing. All this while the leper has done nothing. He is brought to the priest. The priest goes out of the camp to inspect him. The priest commands to take for the leper the two birds. The priest kills the one bird, the priest dips the bird, the priest sprinkles the leper, the priest pronounces him clean. But immediately following this extremely passive attitude comes one of personal activity:--

> "He shall wash his clothes, and shave off all his hair, and wash himself in water, that he may be clean" (Lev. xiv. 8).

"That he may be clean." What does that mean? He had been pronounced clean already, yet upon his own washing and shaving the words are added, "that he may be clean". The same idiom and the same explanation are found elsewhere:--

> "Love your enemies . . . . . that ye may be the children of your Father" (Matt. v. 45).

Does any one understand this to mean, that a man may bring about his own regeneration by loving his enemies? No, it is understood to mean "that ye may be manifestly the children of your Father". The lesson is this. First our cleansing is entirely the work of God in applying to our need the death and resurrection of the Lord Jesus Christ. Then when this is done, and we are "pronounced" clean, the newly awakened soul begins to stir itself, that it may be in act, what it is in fact. This is set forth by the washing of the clothing—the habits, and the flesh—by our own act, and the shaving off of all the hair which has been associated with the disease (see Lev. xiii.), and II Cor. vii. 1 is a commentary upon the type:--

> "Let us cleanse ourselves from all filthiness of the flesh and spirit, perfecting holiness in the fear of God."

To this same Corinthian church the apostle had already written:--

> "But ye are washed, but ye are sanctified, but ye are justified in the name of the Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of our God" (I Cor. vi. 11).

The same sequence is the same as in Lev. xiv.:--

I and II Cor.	Lev. xiv.
"Ye are washed."	"Pronounced clean."
"Let us cleanse ourselves."	"He shall wash himself."

Another precious parallel is found in John xiii. 10 where a due consideration of the two words translated "wash" is most helpful:--

> "He that hath been bathed needeth not save to wash his feet, but is clean every whit."

The eighth day.

The washing and shaving is repeated on the seventh day after the admission back into camp, and the word then goes forth, and he shall be clean. With the eighth day, however, we seem to start all over again. We read now of "the priest that maketh him clean", and "the man that is to be cleansed". The man is now "presented" at the door of the tabernacle, and full acceptance, conscious access, real service is in view, and for that a further preparation is necessary. In other articles we have shown that redemption (exodus) and atonement (eisodus) are complementary. The former is set forth by the two birds, with never a word about trespass, sin or acceptance, and the latter is set forth by the full fourfold offering—trespass, sin, meal and burnt offering—fully set out in Lev. i.-vii., and analysed with some care in other articles of this magazine. In this cleansing, the whole man is not sprinkled, but three representative members are touched, first with the blood and then with the oil. The right ear, the thumb of the right hand, and the great toe of the right foot. This is a symbol full of service. The servant must hearken in order to obey, and then hand and foot are engaged in loving obedience. All this takes place on "the eighth day", the day of circumcision, which finds its exposition in Phil. iii. and Col. ii.:--

> "We are the circumcision, which worship God in the spirit, and rejoice in Christ Jesus, and have no confidence in the flesh" (Phil. iii. 3).
> "In Whom also ye are circumcised with the circumcision made without hands, in putting off the body of the flesh (R.V.) by the circumcision of Christ" (Col. ii. 11).

Here is the resurrection stand. Here is where and when the four great offerings of Lev. i.-vii. have their place. Redemption is for the sinner, atonement for the saint. First deliverance from, and then access to.

The oil on the blood.

Here is a most important order, a corrective to much mischievous teaching that is abroad to-day. Sanctification of the Spirit is taught in the Word. Cleansing by the Word is scriptural. But the Spirit is powerless, and the Word unavailing, unless behind and beneath all is the precious blood of Christ. An undue emphasis upon the Holy Spirit may not be from God. It is the Spirit's office to glorify the Son of God. The true order in sanctification is that of Lev. xiv. First the application of the blood, then the application of the oil "upon the place of the blood" (xiv. 28). Just as the initial cleansing of Lev. xiv. 2-7 underlies all that follows, so the initial sanctification by the blood of Christ underlies all progressive appreciation on our part. The trespass offering speaks of personal acts of sin, the sin offering speaks of inherent, radical sinfulness, the burnt offering is the recognition of the satisfaction which the Father found in His beloved Son, and the bloodless meat offering, the gift of thankfulness for mercy received.

The Lord, Who cleansed the leper, and whose once-offered sacrifice did away, for ever, with all the offerings of the law, endorsed the whole typical teaching of Lev. xiv., and bade the cleansed leper "offer the gift that Moses commanded, for a testimony unto them" (Matt. viii. 4).

We do most earnestly pray that every reader, after pondering the teaching of Lev. xiv. together, will appreciate perhaps more than ever the blessed meaning of the words, "The blood of Jesus Christ, His Son, cleanseth us from all sin".

#79. Azazel. The Scapegoat (Lev. xvi.).

pp. 185 - 190

The day of Atonement has always been held to be a very solemn and searching type of that One Sacrifice, once offered, for sin, by the Lord Jesus Christ. Like all types of divine things, we shall find that it utterly breaks down in some features. Yet even these are not to be regarded as faults, but inherent in the very nature of the case. For example, observe how, in Heb. ix., the Holy Spirit lays hold upon several such inadequacies in type:--

> "Into the second went the high priest alone once every year, not without blood, which he offered for himself and for the errors of the people" (Heb. ix. 7).
> "But Christ . . . . . by a greater and more perfect tabernacle . . . . . neither by the blood of goats and calves, but by His own blood He entered in once into the holy place" (Heb. ix. 11, 12).

Here we have heaven itself instead of the tabernacle made with hands; here we have "His own blood" instead of the blood of bulls and goats; and here we have no need for an offering for His own sins, for this High Priest was holy, harmless, undefiled, separate from sinners.

The immediate cause for the great symbolic rite of the Day of Atonement was the action of Nadab and Abihu in offering strange fire unto the Lord. While access to the presence of the Lord is a most blessed privilege of the redeemed, unholy familiarity must not be allowed, lest it breed contempt, and consequently > "The Lord spake unto Moses, after the death of the two sons of Aaron, when they offered before the Lord, and died: and the Lord said unto Moses, speak unto Aaron thy brother, that he come not at all times into the holy place within the vail before the mercy seat, which is upon the ark; that he die not" (Lev. xvi. 1, 2).

"That he die not" has allusion to the fate of the two sons, Nadab and Abihu. It is repeated in verse 13, where, in contrast with the strange fire that called down judgment, Aaron was to take > "A censer full of burning coals of fire from off the altar before the Lord, and his hands full of sweet incense, beaten small, ... that he die not" (Lev. xvi. 12, 13).

Our earlier studies of the offerings will have prepared us to appreciate more readily a good deal that is written in Lev. xvi., and as the scapegoat has become the most controversial subject in the passage, we shall at once devote ourselves to its consideration.

The goat for Azazel.

The peculiar feature of this atonement is that, not one, but two, goats are presented before the Lord, one being subsequently slain and the other, the living goat sent away and let go in a land not inhabited. The margin of the A.V. draws attention to the fact that the word rendered "scapegoat" is the Hebrew word Azazel, and further investigation shows that, placed in juxtaposition, are the expressions "one lot for the Lord" and "the other lot for Azazel", which has lent colour to the suggestion that Azazel must be a person. We do not think that it would be edifying to indicate the many different explanations of the allocations of these lots that have, from time to time, been put forward, but we give a few in order that the reader may be able to judge of the matter for himself:--

> NEWBERRY gives a note explanatory of Azazel, "Heb. Hazah-zeel, from hez a goat, and ahzal to depart".
>
> ROTHERHAM says: "Azazel is a title of an evil being, opposed to Jehovah, to whom, on the great day of propitiation, the live goat was sent, not as a sacrifice to Satan, but rather because of the death of the other goat, in virtue of which he cries aloud to Satan, 'Slay me if thou durst, I claim to live! I have already died in my companion whose death is accounted mine'."
> THE OXFORD GESENIUS translates Azazel, "entire removal", which is very similar to the view of Tholuck and Bahr, who take the word as a form of azal, to remove.

Another view is that the goat of Azazel is not a type of Christ at all. This interpretation holds that it symbolizes the unbeliever, who is sent away from the presence of the Lord bearing his sin, and Barabbas is mentioned as the antitype of the goat whose life was spared. Taking this last view first, we cannot accept it because of the simple statement in Lev. xvi. 5: "Take two kids of the goats for a sin offering." Surely, if the Lord intended us to understand that only one of the goats was a type of the Lord's offering, this statement would have been qualified. The fact that no one knew which goat would be for the Lord and which for Azazel necessitated that they should both be without blemish, and therefore types of Christ.

The scapegoat.

Let us now examine the Scripture afresh, and go back, beyond modern speculation, to the interpretations of earlier times. The Latin Vulgate renders Azazel by Hircus emmisarius, which means "a goat for sending away". The LXX translates Azazel by apopompaios, which is a word made up of apo, "away" and pempo, "to send". In non-biblical usage this word meant "the turner away", "the averter", and carried with it a good deal of superstition, but there is no reason for rejecting the simple meaning of the LXX, "the sent away". Now "the goat for sending away" is the literal meaning of the Hebrew words Az Azel. Az is a Hebrew word for "goat" and is so translated in the A.V. fifty-five times. In five other places it is translated "she goat" and once "kid". Some find difficulty here, as the "kids" taken in Lev. xvi. 5 are not "she goats". On the other hand there are two words available when "he goats" are to be specified, attud (Numb. vii. 17 and in sixteen other places), and tsaphir (II Chron. xxix. 21 and in four other places).

The words used in Lev. xvi. are more general, and do not constitute a legitimate objection. Azel is the verb, "to send away". With the simple etymology of the word before us, coupled with the ancient testimony of the Septuagint, of Symmachus, of Aquila and of the Latin Vulgate, we believe the A.V. is correct and that the goat for Azazel is the goat for sending away, the "escape" goat, the one set free.

This live goat is atoned for. Verse 10 reads, "to make an atonement with him". There are some who uphold this rendering, but as the same preposition is used in verses 6, 16 and 18 it must be rendered similarly, "to make an atonement for him". The note in The Companion Bible on Lev. xvi. 10 is as follows:--

> " 'With him', Heb. 'for him'. See verses 16, 18. The scapegoat was not used to make atonement, but atonement was made for it. Hence he was to be 'let go' free. See verse 22."

The two goats are therefore to be considered together as exhibiting God's method of dealing with His people's sin. The idea expressed by some, that the live goat symbolizes those whose sins are unforgiven is disposed of by the following facts:--

First, the goat on whom the Lord's lot fell is killed; its blood makes atonement.

> "Because of the uncleanness of the children of Israel, and because of their transgressions in all their sins" (Lev. xvi. 16).

"In all their sins." This must not be minimized. Atonement has been made concerning all the sins of the people.

Secondly we read:--

> "And when he hath made an end of reconciling the holy place" (Lev. xvi. 20).

This is a reference to verse 16, and assures us that the work of atonement was "finished", "ended", "accomplished", as the word kalah is translated. Even in dealing with types of the offering of Christ, it is a serious thing to introduce any measure of uncertainty.

Thirdly:--

> "When he hath made an end of reconciling the holy place . . . . . he shall bring the live goat . . . . . and confess over him all the iniquities of the children of Israel, and all their transgressions in all their sins, putting them upon the head of the goat" (Lev. xvi. 20, 21).

By comparing verse 16 with verse 21 we find that atonement was made for Israel's transgressions in all their sins, and confession was made of all these transgressions in all their sins. These confessed sins were forgiven sins, and the whole point of the passage turns upon confession. Psa. xxxii. and Psa. li. bear eloquent and moving testimony to the need for the confession of sins, even though they be atoned for.

> "When I kept silence my bones waxed old . . . . . I acknowledged my sins . . . . . I said I will confess my transgressions" (Psa. xxxii. 1-5).
>
> "Wash me . . . . . cleanse me . . . . . for I acknowledge my transgressions" (Psa. li. 2, 3).
> "If we confess our sins, He is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness" (I John i. 9).

Some have asked whether, if the epistles assure us that God has forgiven us all trespasses, it is of faith that we ask to be forgiven. The Scriptures written for our learning do not teach us to ask for forgiveness, but it is for our moral good that, while rejoicing in the freedom of His grace, we nevertheless confess our sinnership. It is just as true for us as for Israel that we should both confess and forsake all known evil (Psa. xxviii. 13), otherwise we may come under the judgment of Rom. vi., and be found teaching that, because we are under grace, we may continue in sin.

Fourthly, these atoned-for and confessed sins are now sent away:--

> "Confess over him . . . . . and shall send him away by the hand of a fit man into the wilderness . . . . . unto a land not inhabited: and he shall let go the goat in the wilderness" (Lev. xvi. 21).

Jewish tradition has unwarrantably mutilated this part of the inspired law. We read in their account that the live goat was taken to some precipitous place and there dashed to pieces down the rocky slope. Sadly enough, some Christian expositors have enlarged upon this imagination as though it were resident in the type. The truth is all the other way. There can be no second sacrifice for the same sins in a type like this. The live goat carries away confessed sins, atoned sins, into a land of "separation". The live goat is "let go".

In Lev. xiv. we have the same words used in connection with another double symbol. There, two birds, one dead and one living, instead of two goats, one dead and one living, the words "let loose" and "let go" in Lev. xiv. 7 and 53 being the same as are used of the live goat. The living bird is dipped in the blood of the bird that was slain, and then "let loose". In the case of the live goat, sins that have been atoned for are confessed over it instead, and it, too, is then "let go".

The word "forgiveness" in Eph. i. 7 is aphesis, which, in works outside the Scriptures, is variously translated "let go", "to set free", "quittance", "discharge", "divorce". Luke iv. 18 this word "forgiveness" occurs twice in the phrases "deliverance to the captive", "to set at liberty them that are bruised".

The scapegoat seems to be in the mind's eye of the prophets when they wrote:--

> "I will forgive their iniquity (the goat slain) and I will remember their sins no more" (the goat set free) (Jer. xxxi. 34).
>
> "Who is a God like unto Thee, that pardoneth iniquity? (the goat slain) . . . . . Thou wilt cast all their sins into the depths of the sea" (the goat set free) (Micah vii. 18, 19).
> "Thou hast, in love to my soul, delivered it from the pit of corruption (the goat slain), for Thou hast cast all my sins behind Thy back" (the goat set free) (Isa. xxxviii. 17).

We have touched upon the symbol and pledge of resurrection, in the live goat, for though it may be deduced, it is not prominent, the complete removal of sin being the immediate purpose of this glorious type. Let us all thank God for the sacrifice slain—"let us not omit praise for Azazel, "the goat that was sent away".

Let us pray.

#1. A sanctuary experience.
pp. 159, 160

What is prayer? Why do we pray? To whom and where? What may we scripturally hope for from prayer? Is it according to revealed truth to speak of "warfare" in prayer? These and other like questions are not to be lightly set aside.

Starting from a point which we believe will command the assent of every true child of God, we say that prayer is the greatest privilege that any mortal can enjoy, for prayer is nothing if it is not audience with God with Himself. It is an unspeakable mercy to be able, through the written Word, to hear God speak to us, and it is surely no less a privilege to have the right to draw near and to speak with God.

Even in days when, by the command of God, there stood a temple built especially that it might be "a house of prayer", even then the wider thought was recognized that > "The heaven and the heaven of heavens cannot contain Thee: how much less this house that I have built" (I Kings viii. 27).

When, therefore, prayer was offered in that glorious temple, Solomon said:--

> "Hear Thou in heaven Thy dwelling place, and when Thou hearest, forgive" (I Kings viii. 30).

Both tabernacle and temple were but "figures of the true" and of "heaven itself" (Heb. ix. 8-12, 24). It is to no less a place than heaven itself "where Christ sitteth at the right hand of God" (Col. iii. 1) that prayer rises to-day.

Let us turn for a moment to see what this sanctuary experience can accomplish. Psa. lxxiii. supplies a good answer. Putting Asaph's thought into modern language, we translate "Truly", "Verily" and "Surely" of verses 1, 13 and 18 by the colloquial expression, "After all":--

> "After all, God is good to Israel, even to such as are of a clean heart" (Psa. lxxiii. 1).

Verses 2-12 show his brooding and conclusions from contemplating the prosperity of the wicked and their exemption from trouble:--

> "After all, I have cleansed my heart in vain, and washed my hands in innocency. For all day long have I been plagued and chastened every morning" (Psa. lxxiii. 13, 14).

Verses 14-16 show that, as to this apparent inconsistency, he could neither speak of it to others nor contemplate it himself without pain, until he went into the sanctuary of God, then understood he their end (verse 17).

> "After all, Thou didst set them in slippery places" (Psa. lxxiii. 18).

(To be continued).

#1. (concluded). A sanctuary experience.
pp. 198, 199

The point of view, changed by his entry into the sanctuary, altered the whole case. The wicked were still prospering, Asaph and his fellows still enduring, but the murmuring and doubting had ceased, and full, open, heartfelt praise had begun:--

> "Thou shalt guide me with Thy counsel, and afterward receive me to glory. Whom have I in heaven but Thee? and there is none upon earth that I desire beside Thee" (Psa. lxxiii. 24, 25).

All is summed up in the words that express our first definition of prayer, "It is good for me to draw near to God" (verse 28). Prayer is essentially a drawing near to God in the sanctuary, and for us, to-day, prayer can only be heard and answered in the Person of the One Mediator, the Lord Jesus, in the presence of God the Father. This blessed truth is expressed in various ways:--

PRAYER IS IN HIS PRESENCE (FACE).

> "Let us come before His presence with thanksgiving" (Psa. xcv. 2).
> "When Thou sadist, Seek ye My Face, my heart said unto Thee, Thy face, Lord, will I seek" (Psa. xxvii. 8).

PRAYER IS COMMUNION.

> "The mercy-seat . . . . . there will I meet with thee and commune with thee from above the mercy seat" (Exod. xxv. 22).

Putting this aspect of prayer into terms proper to the present dispensation, we quote such a passage as Eph. iii. 12-14:--

> "In Whom we have boldness and access with confidence by the faith of Him . . . . . I bow my knees unto the Father."

There can be but one all-covering answer to any and every prayer that is ever breathed in full harmony with this passage, and that is, "The peace of God that passeth all understanding". It matters not what the trouble, the anxiety, the opposition, the doubts or the fears that have burdened us, when we really do draw near and enter into the true sanctuary, we come into the presence of One Who knows the end from the beginning, Who has declared that He will accomplish all His will, Who makes even the wrath of man to praise Him, Who makes all things (and not merely some things) to work together for good to them that love God, who are called according to His purpose, and the result of communion in that presence is quietness and assurance. Asaph discovered there a new point of view. The wicked and their condition remained unchanged; it was Asaph that underwent the change, and he saw things in their true perspective. If this, and this alone, was the outcome of prayer, it would be blessed indeed.

There are other aspects, however, and these we hope to enjoy together in subsequent papers. Meanwhile, as we pray let us treasure the boldness and the access with which we may draw near.

pp. 201 - 204

There are many and weighty utterances distributed throughout the Holy Scriptures concerning the immutability of the counsel of the Lord, the absolute certainty that all His will shall be accomplished: that whether His people serve Him faithfully or whether they are lax and faithless (and, alas, this can be laid to their charge throughout their history), His purpose shall yet be accomplished, none being able, finally, to hinder or alter it. Pharaoh may vacillate, change, repent, harden his heart over and over again, but when the "time and the season" had arrived, concerning which God had previously told Abraham (Gen. xv. 13-16), then the Egyptians themselves would thrust Israel out:--

> "It came to pass at the end of the four hundred and thirty years, even the self-same day it came to pass, that all the hosts of the Lord went out from the land of Egypt" (Exod. xii. 41).

While we rejoice in all this glorious certainty, a question arises in the hearts of many: If this be so, of what use is prayer? Let us face the question. Can prayer, however earnest and prolonged, and made by those who agree concerning the request; can prayer alter, modify, enlarge or contract one iota of the purpose of God?

> "James and John, the sons of Zebedee, came unto Him, saying, Master, we would that Thou shouldest do for us whatsoever we shall desire. And He said unto them, What would ye that I should do for you? They said unto Him, Grant unto us that we may sit, one on Thy right hand, and the other on Thy left hand, in Thy glory . . . . . To sit on My right hand and on My left hand is not Mine to give; but it shall be given to them for whom it is prepared" (Mark x. 35-40).

This, we are aware, is self-evident. No one could rightly expect an affirmative answer to such a request, but it may be that often we ask for things that are really just as impossible, for there can be little or nothing in our lives and experiences that are not connected in some way or other with the great purpose of the ages. There are, however, statements in the Word that are often taken in much the same spirit as that evidenced by the sons of Zebedee. For example,

> "All things, whatsoever ye shall ask in prayer, believing, ye shall receive" (Matt. xxi. 22).
> "What things soever ye desire, when ye pray, believe that ye receive them, and ye shall have them" (Mark xi. 24).

In the face of unanswered prayer, how are we to understand such passages? There is a limit implied in the very statements, which is expressed in plain terms in I John v. 14, 15:--

> "And this is the confidence that we have in Him, that, if we ask anything according to His Will, He heareth us; and if we know that He hear us, whatsoever we ask, we know that we have the petitions that we desired of Him."

Where the statements in the Gospels cited above have "believe", the passage from I John v. has "we know", because the petition is "according to His will". It is, therefore, most important that we should keep to the scriptural idea of faith, namely, that it is intimately associated with the Word of God, and that God will keep His promise (Rom. x. 17, and iv. 18-21). Whoever "believes" this will not ask anything contrary to the will of God, and whoever uses the word "believe" in a sense which is contrary to this principle makes it something not far removed from a charm or mascot.

Moses experienced the truth of this relationship of prayer with the will of God when he prayed:--

> "Let me go over and see the good land that is beyond Jordan, and that goodly mountain Lebanon. But the Lord was wroth with me for your sakes, and would not hear me" (Deut. iii. 25, 26).

Samuel cried unto the Lord all night when he heard of the rejection of Saul, but the Lord said to Samuel:--

> "How long will ye mourn for Saul, seeing I have rejected him?" (I Sam. xv. 11, xvi. 1).

Other examples could be given to illustrate this truth. We return, therefore, to our earlier question. If this be so, What is the use of prayer? Scripture does not shelve but deals with his most important question. For example, Ezek. xxxvi. contains many wonderful promises dealing with the restoration of Israel, things bound up with the very faithfulness of God, as, for instance, the promises of restoration in verses 8-12, 26-28, and the promises ending with the unconditional statement of verse 36:--

> "I the Lord have spoken it, and I WILL DO IT."

Do we then say, What is the use of prayer? If we do, there must be something wrong with our conception of prayer, for the very next verse says:--

> "Thus saith the Lord God, I will yet for this be inquired of by the house of Israel, to do it for them."

There can be no possibility of misunderstanding the teaching here. The Lord does not say that Israel will be restored only if they inquire about it. On the contrary, in His own time and way, according to that purpose that cannot be frustrated and which He has pledged Himself to fulfil, the Lord declares that He will do this thing:--

> "I the Lord have spoken it, and I will do it . . . . . yet . . . . ."

If Israel's prayer be not here viewed in the light of a factor in bringing about their restoration, then we may ask, What purpose does it fulfil? An illustration borrowed from everyday life may help better than a lengthy argument.

A mother knows that fruit is good for her children, consequently a bowl of oranges and apples is kept at hand. The children, too, know that the fruit is provided for them, yet is anyone surprised to find that, in spite of these facts, the mother should say to her children:--

> "While I want you to have fresh fruit each day because it is good for you, I also would like you to come to me and say, Mother, may I take an orange or an apple?"

Surely this is what takes place at home continually, and no one feels at all conscious of a problem. If vitamins were all that were involved, there might be no need that the children should ask, but if something more is in view, if the training, the good manners, the cultivation of fellowship between parent and child is also an object, then the parent's desire for the child's personal request is natural.

God has something more in view than the restoration of Israel to their land and the revival of Edenic conditions there. He desires His people's restoration to Himself, that they shall be led by spiritual insight to ally themselves with all that constitutes the will of God. The Scriptures reveal that will, but those who are its object are not formed of wood or stone, neither are they automatons, and the Lord as surely wills that their hearts shall be touched, their desires quickened, their fellowship manifested, and prayer is the means to this end. Here is a nobler conception of prayer than that which looks upon it merely as a means of obtaining from God that which otherwise He would not have bestowed.

There is a phase of prayer that does come under this description and we hope to give it its place, but in the first instance prayer is necessitated by the fact that God is dealing with creatures possessing some power of choice. He would not drive them, but He would lead them. The Scriptures says, "This is the will of God": prayer says, "Thy will be done".

Without forging shackles for ourselves or our readers, may we say that one aspect of prayer is that it affords an intelligent and willing acquiescence on the part of the receiver of blessing, with the Lord—the One Who bestows the blessing? This will require expansion and definition, but we cannot do this until we have seen other aspects that are indicated in the Scriptures.

The relationship of the Lord's Supper to the Jewish Passover forms the theme of a series of articles written by Mr. S. Van Mierlo in the Dutch Magazine Uit de Schriften published in Holland. He has kindly permitted us to make extracts from these articles, and to give a resumé of several important features therein for the benefit of English readers.

The Jewish Passover and the Lord's Supper.

The question of the observance or non-observance of the Lord's Supper is a matter of conscience; but conscience is not an infallible source of truth, though, enlightened by the truth, it may prove to be a faithful monitor. So far as the witness of The Berean Expositor is concerned, the question has been considered, and the fact that the Lord's Supper is associated with the new covenant has settled the question once and for all so far as the members of the church of the One Body are concerned. There are, however, confirmatory arguments it were well that readers should consider.

The Covenants and the Law.

Mr. Van Mierlo rightly insists that we must recognize a distinction between the law as a covenant, and the law as a moral code. We give our own paraphrase for the benefit of the English reader.

The old covenant should not be mixed up with the law. The old covenant is a covenant where in their own strength Israel promises to keep the law, supposing it possible to be righteous on the basis of the works of law (Rom. x. 5). The new covenant was given to Israel to deliver them from their vow. Christ, the "Husband" (Jer. xxxi. 32—see Numb xxx. 1-8 for the dissolving of a woman's vow), redeemed Israel from the curse of the law (Gal. iii. 13), delivering them from bondage and leading all who believed into sonship (Gal. iv. 3-24). The believer died to the law "with Christ", and in this sense Christ became the "end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth" (Rom. x. 4). So far as a "covenant" is concerned they were no longer "under the law" but "under grace" (Rom. vi. 14).

The introduction of the new covenant did not, however, set aside the law, as such. The Lord Himself Who established the new covenant also declared:--

> "Till heaven and earth pass, one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass from the law, till all be fulfilled. Whosoever shall break one of these least commandments, and shall teach men so, he shall be called least in the kingdom of heaven . . . . ." (Matt. v. 18, 19).

Our Lord and His disciples, belonging as they did to Israel, observed the requirements of the law, while rejecting the superimposed traditions of the Elders.

It is true the outward observances had no power nor value in themselves; they were an outward sign of internal realities. As long as Israel are a people before God, the law is to be observed, and is therefore in evidence during the entire period covered by the Acts of the Apostles. Of course, they who believed in Christ served in a new spirit (Rom. vii. 6; II Cor. iii. 6), they delighted in the law of God after the inward man (Rom. vii. 22) and, under grace, found that they were at liberty to obey the law (Rom. viii. 4), which was not possible while the law represented a covenant of works.

All enlightened believers knew that the offerings of the law pointed to the one true offering of Christ. This is not only true of the past, but of the future. Circumcision in the flesh (Ezek. xliv. 9) and offerings (Ezek. xl.-xlv.), together with many other typical features, will remain until the new heaven and new earth (Matt. v. 18, 19).

After Acts xxviii. there is a complete change. Israel as the people of God are set aside, and with them the new covenant, the law, ceremonies, etc. Scripture gives no warrant for a single outward observance now, not even for Israel.

The following diagram will help to visualize the distinction to be observed between the old covenant and the law:-- i l l u s t r a t i o n.

The observation of the Law during the Acts.

The apostles and Christian Jews attended temple and synagogue (Acts v. 20; xiii. 14). We read of their fastings (Acts xiii. 2), and the circumcision of Timothy (Acts xvi. 3). Peter in Acts x. 28 is still "a Jew" intent upon observing the law. Acts xv. reveals that twenty years after Pentecost circumcision was still practiced by the church and apostles. Thirty years after Pentecost Paul associates himself with the Nazarite vow and the temple (Acts xxi. 21-26) in order to give a public proof that the sayings of his enemies were not true. He denied the report that he had taught the Jews that they need no longer circumcise or observe the law. In Acts xxv. 8 Paul says:--

> "Neither against the law of the Jews . . . . . have I offended any thing at all."

Mr. Van Mierlo offers in extension of this subject some helpful notes upon such passages as Rom. iii. 21, 28, "without the law"; Rom. vi. 14, "ye are not under the law"; Rom. x. 4, "Christ is the end of the law", which passages to some might seem to negative what had been said as to the observance of the law during the Acts. The difficulties vanish when we realize that the law is in these passages considered as a means of attaining righteousness, in other words, the old covenant. This is indeed done away. As we believe our readers are clear on this important point, we pass on to

The testimony of Eusebius as to the observance of the law during the first Century.

The following comments are upon extracts from the "Ecclesiastical History":--

It will be seen how much reference is made to the observance of the law and to what was derived from it. It is also important to note how much insistence is placed on what the twelve apostles of Israel said and did. They were the examples; Paul and the great mystery are entirely ignored. In the 39th chapter of the 3rd book we see many names mentioned, but not Paul's. Papias enquired much about the traditions of the twelve, and places these traditions above what is written. All this has, of course, drawn the attention of the critics, and men like Baur and Renan have understood that Paul was then completely abandoned and that this teaching was not accepted. These critics did not understand and believe Paul's latest writings, and they supposed therefore that all that Eusebius tells us was only during a temporary revival of Judaism in the "church", replacing Paul's gospel. They seem to think that the majority came back to Paul. It is, however, easy to show from history that this supposition is not substantiated, and this has been done by Bishop Lightfoot. He says that, amongst many others, Irenaeus would certainly in this case have mentioned something about this "revolution" in the "church". On the contrary, he always shows a gradual unfolding, starting from John and passing to Papias, Polycarp, etc. There was no temporary change in the opinions of the first Christians. We must conclude from this that they went on abandoning Paul. When we understand the special character of Paul's teaching, we can quite see how it is possible for Papias to turn away from Paul without being a real Judaising Christian. It was then that, not believing Paul, they stuck to the twelve, because the only solution for them was to suppose that the "church" came in the place of Israel. For us it is clear that those who left Paul did not provoke a revolution, because practically the whole "church" did so from the time of Paul on, as he himself says in II Timothy. At the time of the Reformation some came a certain way back to Paul, and then we see a revolution. We who want to recover all the truth revealed to this apostle are also treated as peace breakers.

Bishop Lightfoot, in his introduction to the Epistle to the Colossians, wonders why it was still necessary, 300 years after this Epistle was written, for the Council of Laodicea (363?) to curse those who kept not the Sabbath.

We need not be astonished about that, because the whole of Christendom did not pay much attention to Paul's writings, and listened to the teaching of the twelve.

Concerning the ceremonies, it is interesting to note from Eusebius and others the relationship between the Jewish Passover, the Christian Passover, the Roman Mass and the Lord's Supper. We have no space here to show that the Roman Mass is a copy of the Jewish ritual. From Eusebius we have seen how the Jewish feast was in part imitated by the Christians. Those in Asia, including Polycarp, and the apostles, John and Philip, followed carefully the Jewish ritual and added to it, three days later, a resurrection feast. They ate a passover lamb on the evening of the 14th Nisan exactly as the Jews. This day could of course be any day of the week. Their first difficulty was, therefore, that the resurrection feast, which had to be held three days later, did not usually fall on a "Sunday". Their second difficulty was that the meals of the Passover did interrupt the fasting three days before the feast of the resurrection. For such reasons most the "churches" outside Asia transferred the Passover to the Saturday evening following the 14th Nisan. In this way the feasting was not interrupted and the resurrection feast could be held on a Sunday. They had "Christianized" the heathen day of the sun lord and preferred to keep the feast of the resurrection on that day rather than on the "first of the Sabbaths" indicated in the Scripture.

In all this we have certain indications that the apostles and all Christian Jews kept the Passover during Acts. Gentile Christians were very careful to imitate them. They would have been only too glad to reject anything from the Jews if the apostles had not observed it. In the course of time many things were changed gradually, but, in principle, all present ceremonies come from the practices of the twelve apostles and therefore from the law.

Had the conditions of Acts remained, all this would be very good, at least for Christian Jews. As it is, however, hopeless confusion reigns. So arise all the conflicts, unbelief and criticism of the past, present and future. This is the penalty of not resting on Scripture by believing Paul, and rightly dividing the Word of truth.

The later writings show the gradual changes. The Christian Passover became more especially a resurrection feast, and the Jewish ritual was more or less preserved in the Mass and the Lord's Supper. We will examine this further. In A.D.325 the Council of Nicea decided that all churches should keep the Passover on Sunday. But even then some preferred to adhere entirely to the tradition of the twelve, and kept it on the 14th Nisan. They were called Quartodecimans (See Mosheim. Hist. Christ. Saec. 2 Ç 71). In Latin quartodecim is 14.

The ritual of the Jewish Passover.

A broad outline can be obtained from Exodus, Leviticus and Numbers. In later times the feast could not be held exactly as in Egypt, because the circumstances were very different. The oldest source which gives us information about the manner in which it was kept in the time of our Lord is the Mishna (recorded in the 2nd century from the teaching of the Rabbis in the previous three centuries). Some references are also to be found in the Tosiphta (a complement of the Mishna). Further, there are also some considerations of later Rabbis concerning these things in the two Gemaras (4th and 5th centuries).

We should notice that the lamb was considered as an offering. It was killed in the temple, and its blood was sprinkled by the priests on the altar. The fat was burned and the flesh eaten. After the destruction of the temple, this could, of course, no longer be done. The ritual was then adapted to the new circumstances.

It will be sufficient here to give only a short summary of the Passover. Four cups were circulated. The first was that of that Kiddush, or the dedicating; the second was related to the Haggada, or the Passover tale for the children; the third was connected with the blessing, and the fourth with the Hallel, or praise song. Between the second and the third cups was an ordinary meal, which did not belong to the ritual, but was inserted in it.

The following gives an outline of the feast:--

Pouring in of the first cup.
Dedicating (KIDDUSH).
Drinking of the first cup.
Breaking, blessing and eating of a piece of hard flat unleavened bread dipped in sauce.
Pouring in of the second cup.
Passover tale (HAGGADA).
Drinking of the second cup.
Breaking, blessing and eating of unleavened bread dipped in sauce.

* * * * *

Meal apart from the ritual. Eating of the Passover lamb.
Eating of unleavened bread and drinking of wine.

* * * * *

Pouring in of the third cup.
Blessing.
Drinking of the third cup.
Pouring in of the fourth cup.
Praise song (HALLEL), Psa. cv.-cviii.
Drinking of the fourth cup.

Even if there is uncertainty about some details, the existence of a meal between the second and the third cups is agreed by all. We shall see the importance of this when examining the texts of the N.T. referring to the Lord's Supper.

The Roman Mass and the Jewish Passover.

We will not write much about this question here. The Roman Church recognizes and even boasts in the fact that the ritual of their Mass is closely related to that of the Jewish Passover. A detailed study of this question can be found in a booklet by Dr. G. B. Bickel entitled "Messe and Pascha" (1872). He compared the various old Christian rituals in use in the 5th century, the result being that all seem to be derived from the oldest one. When this oldest ritual is compared with the Jewish Passover, the correspondence is striking, particularly if one adds the words pronounced by our Lord when He kept it the last time.

There is no other explanation than that the Mass is a copy of a part of the Passover. This, of course, is also true of the Anglican ceremony. The Roman and Anglican Churches are in this and many other things the most "apostolic", i.e., they are following closely the twelve apostles of the circumcision. But they are also the most distant from Paul's teaching. They assume that they replace Israel, and so prove that they do not rightly divide the Word of truth, and that their foundation is unscriptural. The Reformation was not consistent. The Reformers came back in part to Paul, but tried also to follow the twelve. In this way there was still more confusion, and divisions were inevitable.

To be logical, if one wants to keep to the tradition of the twelve, he or she should consider the Passover as they did, viz., as an offering. The Roman Mass has this character and seems, therefore, to approach to the ceremonial of the twelve. During the Acts, while the temple stood, the Jewish priest had his part in the Passover. Had the church replaced Israel, and had no new dispensation commenced after Acts xxviii., the Roman Church would have been consistent in referring to the teaching of the twelve and to the tradition of the first century.

The Churches of the Reformation will remain in confusion so long as they adhere to the new covenant and the twelve, but do not follow their traditions. If we will but leave to Israel what belongs to Israel, and believe the testimony of the apostle Paul as to the dispensation of the mystery, all will be clear.

The Lord's Supper.

This expression is only used once (I Cor. xi. 20). The other references speak of a "meal", and of a "cup" after the meal (I Cor. xi. 23). Let us examine the passages that refer to the Lord's Supper.

MATT. XXVI. 26-29.—We observe that the Passover is mentioned in verse 19, and in verse 23 is mentioned the dipping of the bread. Mark xiv. 22-25 is very similar.

LUKE XXII. 15-20.—If this is a new institution, it is remarkable that there is no instruction as to manner, time and circumstance for the guidance of future observes. As it stands it is obviously a part of the Passover.

JOHN XIII. mentions the Passover, but gives no details about the bread and the cups. As John's Gospel was written after Acts xxviii. (see articles in Volume XX on "The dispensational place of John's Gospel") at a time when the Passover was no longer to be observed because Israel had by then been set aside, nothing is said about them. If it had concerned a new institution, it would have been very necessary to give all details in order to ensure that all would keep the ordinance according to the will of God.

I COR. X. 16; XI. 20-26.—Paul gives no new detail, not even about the time. All he says is, "as often as". When Luke xxii. 20 and I Cor. xi. 25 speak of a cup "after the meal", it can only be the third cup of the ritual. This is confirmed by I Cor. x. 16, where this cup is called by the very Jewish name, "The cup of blessing".

The Word of God teaches nothing about a new institution for Christians, but shows, on the contrary, that the Lord's Supper was a perpetuation of the Passover feast, with this difference, that Christ Himself is the true Passover, and the covenant in view is not Sinai (as it was at the Exodus), but Calvary and the new covenant in His blood. Every item in the New Testament record refers to the non-ritual meal, and the explanations given only explain more fully the significance of this part of the ceremony. To take a part of it and apply it to the "church" is not scriptural.

Why in I Corinthians?

There is another difficulty. One may agree that the first Epistle to the Corinthians concerns another sphere of blessing than that of the great mystery, but may think that all believers, including the Gentiles, of that sphere had to keep the Lord's Super because this epistle is addressed to all. Our answer is that at that time there was a separation, a middle wall, according to the flesh (not "in Christ"), between the Jews and the Gentiles. The first company did observe the law, the other did not. When we try to place ourselves in these circumstances, it will be seen that if in an epistle something is said about a Jewish feast, it applies only to those who keep the feasts. For them this must have been a matter of course. But this sounds too much like mere reasoning, and it is always necessary to refer to the Word. That chapters x. and xi. especially concern the Jews is clear from the way they commence:--

> "Moreover, brethren, I would not that ye should be ignorant, how that ALL OUR FATHERS were under the cloud, and all passed through the sea; and were all baptized UNTO MOSES in the cloud and in the sea . . . . ." (I Cor. x. 1, 2).

We know from Heb. i. 1 and Rom. ix. 3-5 that these fathers belonged to Israel only. When Paul comes to chapter xii. of I Corinthians, which concerns both Jews and Gentiles, he specially mentions the latter (I Cor. xii. 1-3).

Did the believers of the nations lose anything because they had not the ceremonies of their Jewish brethren? No. The spiritual significance of the Lord's Supper applied also to them: salvation through His blood and unity in Christ. Those who followed Paul in his later ministry came into a still higher sphere of blessing in the on-heavenlies, far above all. There indeed was a unity, a joint-body, where a covenant had no longer any place, and where a ceremony referring to the earthly sphere could only hinder a clear view of the high position given through grace.

Conclusion.

While the Passover has received a deeper significance by what our Lord did and said when He kept it before His death, it was not a new institution for Christians which replaced the Passover of the Jews, but the Supper was part of the Jewish Passover, to be held once a year on the 14th Nisan. By keeping this Jewish feast, the Christians of the first century confirm that it was not replaced by any other ceremony. Such was introduced later without any foundation in the Scriptures.

The spiritual significance of the Passover is for all believers, but the ceremony is for Israel only. They alone were allowed to observe the feasts of the Lord. When it is seen that the Gospel according to Matthew in no way concerns the church of the mystery, it follows that Matt. xxvi. 26-28 does not abruptly introduce a new institution for a church which then had no existence. The Lord was addressing only the twelve apostles of Israel.

Later Paul received some indications of a change, but this was before he was commissioned to make known the great mystery. The Lord showed him the deeper significance: it was not only a remembrance of the exodus from Egypt, but pointed specially to the future realization of this type, the great exodus of Israel out of all nations. As long as this was not realized, the Passover (including the Supper) had to be kept, and was specially a proclamation of the death of the Lord, the true Passover Lamb, showing all Israel that everything was ready for their salvation. Or course, this proclamation was interrupted when Israel were set aside after Acts xxviii. and the kingdom postponed.

Notwithstanding, in our dispensation every sinner must be saved through the blood of the Lamb, and the Jewish feast has, therefore, great significance spiritually. The blood of Christ is still "precious". In our very life we are called upon "to show that Lord's death", resurrection and ascension. The blood of Christ has made us "nigh" in a sense unknown to those under the new covenant.

We believe our readers will be interested to read the above resumé of our brother's witness in Holland, and we hope that some of the new points of view brought forward will but confirm those who have already settled in their own mind their relation to the memorial feast of the new covenant.

The Ministry of Consolation.

#32. The beloved of the Lord---in sleep.
pp. 19, 20

"The beloved of the Lord shall dwell in safety by Him" so we read in Deut. xxxiii. 12. The theme is pursued in another passage, Psa. cxxvii. 1, 2:--

> "Except the Lord build the house,
> They labour in vain that build it;
> Except the Lord keep the city,
> The watchman waketh but in vain.
> It is vain for you to rise up early, to sit up late,
> To eat the bread of sorrows,
> For so He giveth His beloved IN SLEEP."

This seems to be the true import of the passage, as may be seen in The Companion Bible, and many commentaries, among them the Oxford Gesenius. Spurrell's translation is: "Since He giveth unto His beloved when sleeping." There is, of course, no word here against legitimate labour. There is no excusing the sluggard, and if burning the midnight oil sometimes is hereby condemned, then some of the articles in The Berean Expositor should never have been written.

The point of the passage is expressed in the opening verse. It is necessary, when a house is wanted, that there should be builders. Building is not condemned; the wrong is to leave the Lord out in the matter. It is the duty of all to watch that the keeping power of the Lord is unfelt or unwanted is wrong. The stress, therefore, must be placed upon the word "Except". The three statements linked together by the words "in vain":--

> Except the Lord build the house, they labour IN VAIN.
> Except the Lord keep the city, they watch IN VAIN.
> To labour for the bread of sorrows is IN VAIN.

The Companion Bible gives five examples from the O.T. of those to whom the Lord gave "in sleep":--

> ADAM (Gen. ii. 21-24).
> "And the Lord God caused a deep sleep to fall upon Adam . . . . . This is now bone of my bone . . . . . she shall be called woman."

No helpmeet was found for Adam in the whole range of creation, and to emphasize the graciousness of the gift, it was given to God's beloved "in sleep".

> ABRAHAM (Gen. xv. 2, 3, 12, 18).
> "And Abram said, Lord God, what wilt Thou give me . . . . . to me Thou hast given no seed . . . . . a deep sleep fell upon Abram . . . . . unto Thy seed have I given this land."

JACOB (Gen. xxviii. 3, 4, 11, 15, 20).

"And God Almighty bless thee . . . . . and give thee the blessing of Abraham . . . . . and lay down in that place to sleep . . . . . Behold, I am with thee, and will keep thee . . . . . and will give me bread to eat, and raiment to put on . . . . ."

SAMUEL (I Sam. iii. 3, 4).

"And ere the lamp of God went out in the temple of the Lord, where the ark of God was, and Samuel was laid down to sleep, that the Lord called Samuel."

SOLOMON (II Sam. xii. 25 and I Kings iii. 5-16).

"And He called his name Jedidiah (The beloved of the Lord) because of the Lord."

"In Gibeon the Lord appeared to Solomon in a dream by night, and God said, Ask what I shall give thee."

To these, examples from the N.T. could be added, such as the deliverance of Peter from prison (Acts xii.), the deliverance of Paul and all on board from the shipwreck (Acts xxvii.) and even the mighty resurrection of God's Beloved Son from the power of the grave. Enough has been brought forward. Here is a corrective to that feverish haste and vain labour that attempts the impossible without the Lord.

"Not by might, nor by power, but by My Spirit, saith the Lord."

#33. The beloved of the Lord. "The safe dwelling." pp. 39, 40

No title of the Lord Jesus is more full than that which God used when He broke the silence of centuries at the waters of Jordan: "This is My beloved Son, in Whom I am well pleased" (Matt. iii. 17). Perhaps no summary of blessing is so precious as that which concludes the will of the Father in Eph. i. 6, "accepted in the Beloved", and there is certainly no title given to His people that is nearer to His heart than the one given to Israel in Deut. xxxiii. 12, "The beloved of the Lord". A meditation upon some of the occurrences of this title will surely be a means of consolation to many if not all our readers.

In the ministry of consolation we do not attempt analysis, and are not too much concerned with dispensational distinctions, realizing that in the realm of love, such differences, if they exist, are not too evident:--

"The beloved of the Lord shall dwell in safety by Him; and the Lord shall cover him all the day long, and he shall dwell between His shoulders" (Deut. xxxiii. 12).

The special blessing attached to this title that we here consider is the provision for the beloved of the Lord of a safe dwelling, both during life's pilgrimage, and when we shall reach the house of the Lord to dwell therein for ever.

The first blessing to be stated is really a prophecy of the future, and so full is this blessing that it is used to express the final state of all Israel's blessedness, when they shall at last enter into their inheritance:--

> "The eternal God is thy refuge, and underneath are the everlasting arms . . . . . Israel then shall dwell in safety alone . . . . . who is like unto thee, O people saved by the Lord!" (Deut. xxxiii. 27-29).

There are several words used in the O.T. to convey the idea of dwelling. There is the "sojourning" of a stranger (Lev. xix. 34), but this is no sojourning of strangers. Here the word means to dwell in a tent or in a tabernacle. Its significance can be gathered by consulting Deut. xxxiii. 16: "The goodwill of Him that dwelt in the bush." This "dwelling" rendered the place "holy ground", and we should realize its meaning better if we translated the blessing of Deut. xxxiii. 12: "The beloved of the Lord shall tabernacle in safety by Him." So, when Israel were first brought into covenant relationship with the Lord, He said to Moses: "Make Me a sanctuary that I may dwell (tabernacle) among them" (Exod. xxv. 8). The beloved of the Lord therefore can take to themselves the words of the Psalm: "And I shall dwell in the house of the Lord for ever" (Psa. xxiii. 6).

Another cause of great joy is the statement that not only shall the beloved of the Lord dwell by Him, but that they shall "dwell in safety". Among other features that this particular blessing sets forth are the following:--

1. IT MEANS THAT RIGHTEOUSNESS HAS BEEN ACCEPTED ON OUR BEHALF.—"Wherefore ye shall do my statutes, and keep my judgments and do them: and ye shall dwell in the land in safety" (Lev. xxv. 18).
2. IT MEANS THAT THE PEACEABLE FRUIT OF RIGHTEOUSNESS IS ENJOYED.—"And the land shall yield her fruit, and ye shall eat your fill, and dwell therein in safety" (Lev. xxv. 19 and xxvi. 5, 6).
3. IT MEANS, IN DEUTERONOMY, THE CESSATION OF WAR.—"But when ye go over Jordan . . . . . and He giveth you rest from all your enemies round about, so that ye dwell in safety" (Deut. xii. 10).
4. IT TYPIFIES THE REIGN OF THE PRINCE OF PEACE.—"And Judah and Israel dwelt safely, every man under his vine and under his fig tree, from Dan even to Beersheba, all the days of Solomon" (I Kings iv. 25).

The second blessing pronounced in Deut. xxxiii. 12 to the beloved of the Lord is: "And the Lord shall cover him all the day long." The special thought here in this word "cover" is not the covering by atonement, nor the covering as a protection merely, but the covering that pertains to marriage. It gives us the word meaning "marriage canopy", which should be substituted for the word "defence" in Isa. iv. 5 (In the remaining occurrences [Psa. xix. 5 and Joel ii. 16] "bridegroom" and "bride" are actually mentioned. In one case the "cover" is the "chamber" of the bridegroom and in the other the "closet" of the bride).

(To be concluded).

#33. The beloved of the Lord. "The safe dwelling." (concluded).
pp. 57, 58

While as members of the one body we rejoice in our own special nearness to the glorious Head, we may enter into this intimate covering which the Lord has promised to His beloved "all the day long".

Thus the wilderness journey is amply provided for, both in this covering and in the third blessing mentioned, viz.: "And he shall dwell between His shoulders." The shoulders of the High Priest carried the names of the twelve tribes before God (Exod. xxviii. 12). The shoulders, too, of the seeking shepherd carried the lost sheep back to the fold (Luke xv. 5).

Surely there is a message of cheer in these words for every one who, by grace, is numbered among God's beloved. The beloved of the Lord is assured of a safe and certain dwelling when the tabernacle of God shall be with men. He is also most intimately associated by ties of love to His Lord, as intimately as bride with bridegroom or body with head, and he is assured of "traveling mercies" through the perils and trials of the wilderness, being borne upon the shoulders of the great High Priest and Shepherd of the sheep. May every reader be able to say out of a full heart, "My Beloved is mine, and I am His".

#34. The beloved of the Lord. The election of God.
pp. 58 - 60

Writing to the church of the Thessalonians, the apostle said:--

> "Knowing, brethren beloved, your election of God" (I Thess. i. 4).

To some, this seems a strange statement. How could Paul or the Thessalonians really "know" their election of God? Surely that would be one of the secret things that belong to the Almighty. The book of life is not accessible to search as are the documents at Somerset House. Yet it is perfectly true, and the whole secret is wrapped up in the word "love". It goes without saying that if "beloved", then "elect".

> "Herein is love, not that we loved God, but that He loved us, and sent His Son to be the propitiation for our sins" (I John iv. 10).

The same is true with reference to the presence of our love toward God:--

"And we know that all things work together for good TO THEM that love God, TO THEM who are called according to His purpose" (Rom. viii. 28).

It stands for ever true, "He that loveth not knoweth not God" (I John iv. 8). The beloved of the Lord, however, are not left without evidence of their calling, and they lie thick around our text in I Thess. i.

How may the beloved of the Lord "know" their election? Well, how did the apostle "know" that they had "faith"? They manifested it in "the work of faith". How was he sure of their "love"? The exercised themselves in "the labour of love". How could he be certain as to their "hope"? They showed it by their "patience". They did not merit the title "Beloved" because of their "labour of love", but as God's beloved it was incumbent that such a title should not remain empty.

The apostle, however, more fully explains himself in the verses that follow:--

"Knowing, brethren beloved, your election of God. FOR
(1) Our gospel came not unto you in word only, but also in power, and in the Holy Ghost, and in much assurance.
(2) Ye became followers of us and of the Lord, having received the word in much affliction, with joy of the Holy Ghost.
(3) For from you sounded out the word of the Lord.
For they themselves shew of us what manner of entering in we had unto you, and
(1) How ye turned to God from idols.
(2) To serve the living and true God, and
(3) To wait for His Son from heaven" (I Thess. i. 4-10).

Here we have a twofold witness:--

(1) Knowing YOUR election, followed by three references to the Word.
(2) Showing OUR entering in, followed by three references to the Lord.

The three references to the Word have one feature in common which is expressed in the first clause—"not in word only."

In the first case the gospel was not received in word only, "but in power, and in the Holy Ghost, and in much assurance".

In the second case the reception of the Word is shown to be living and real, by the fact that they who received this Word "became followers of the apostles and of the Lord", and "received the Word in much affliction, with joy of the Holy Ghost".

In the third case the sounding out of the Word of the Lord was something more than mere "sound", for they who thus sounded out the Word were "ensamples to all that believe", and in every place their faith to God-ward was spread abroad.

This faith "to God-ward" is next shown to have a threefold character. Faith to God-ward is manifested in their:--

(1) Turning to God from idols.
(2) Serving the living and true God.
(3) Waiting for His Son from heaven.

This faith covers past, present and future phases of life. They had turned in the past—this was a "work of faith"; they were serving in the present—this was a "labour of love"; they had assurance for the future—this was their "patience of hope".

Using the language of Peter in the same connection we can surely say to all who believe:--

> "If these things be in you, and abound, they make you that ye shall neither be barren nor unfruitful in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ . . . . . give diligence to make your calling and election sure" (II Pet. i. 8-10).

To the elect of God His gospel is a living, spiritual power, and on its truth they rest with assurance. As the elect of God they follow in the steps of the apostle and of his Lord, enduring with spiritual complacency and joy whatever afflictions their belief in the Word may entail.

The elect of God not only receive, not only suffer, not only follow, but they sound out the Word themselves that others may hear. As Peter says in a similar context:--

> "Add to your faith . . . . . give diligence to make your calling and election sure" (II Pet. i. 5-10).

To the beloved of the Lord there may come a settled conviction, a peace, an assurance, a joy, which tribulation cannot remove, and which trouble cannot shake.

Every beloved one is an elect one, chosen by the God of love for Himself:--

> "The Lord did not set His love upon you, nor choose you, because ye were . . . . . but because the Lord loved you" (Deut. vii. 7, 8).

He chose us because He loved us. He loved us because He chose us. Leave it there. Rejoice in it, take no credit to self, but "rest in His love".

#35. One aspect of answered prayer.
pp. 81 – 83

While to suggest that in this brief note we should deal with the question of answered prayer would be so evidently unreasonable as to need no refutation, yet it may certainly be a real ministry of consolation to many to have their minds illuminated by the teaching of Scripture upon one of the many aspects of this vital theme.

Apart from higher spiritual aspirations to Christ likeness, fellowship, and conscious entry into His blessed victory, most prayer falls under one of the following categories: prayers for protection; prayers for provision; and, combining these two, prayers for the presence of Him Who is both Protector of and Provider for His people.

Protection.

Let us now read II Kings vi. 8-17. The king of Syria was at war with Israel, and because he had learned that Elisha kept the king of Israel posted as to the movements and intentions of his foe, he compassed the city, wherein Elisha was staying, with horses and chariots and a great host. When Elisha's servant beheld this huge encircling host he was naturally much afraid, saying:--

> "Alas, my master! how shall we do?" (II Kings vi. 15).

Elisha's reply supplies the point of our message regarding answered prayer:--

> "And he answered, Fear not: for they that be with us are more than they that be with him. And Elisha prayed, and said, Lord, I pray thee, open his eyes, that he may see. And the Lord opened the eyes of the young man; and he saw: and behold, the mountain was full of horses and chariots of fire round about Elisha" (II Kings vi. 16, 17).

The great truth for us at the moment is that answer to Elisha's prayer was not the sending of the horses and chariots of fire, but the opening of the eyes to see that they were there already. It is evident, therefore, and a matter of consolation to us all, that sometimes we need to pray that our eyes may be opened that we may see what has already been provided for our protection in Christ.

Provision.

Turn now to Gen. xxi. 9-19. Sarah views with dismay the mocking of Isaac by Ishmael, and prevails upon Abraham to dismiss Hagar, her handmaid, with her son. Let it be said to Abraham's credit that, though he now realized his error in the matter of Ishmael, he did not lightly set aside his responsibilities, and the dismissal of Hagar and Ishmael was very grievous in his sight. However, being assured that this was in line with the will of the Lord, he gave Hagar some bread and a bottle of water, and sent her and Ishmael away, and they wandered in the wilderness of Beer-Sheba. Although Abraham had dug a well in this wilderness (verses 22-31), Hagar, apparently, had no knowledge of it:--

> "And the water was spent in the bottle, and she cast the child under one of the shrubs. And she went, and sat here down over against him a good way off, as it were a bowshot: for she said, Let me not see the death of the child. And she sat over against him and lift up her voice and wept . . . . . And God opened her eyes, and she saw a well of water . . ." (Gen. xxi. 15-19).

Once again, the need is met, not by the miraculous gushing forth of water in the wilderness, but by the opening of the eyes to see that which had already been provided.

Presence.

Refer now to Luke xxiv. 13-32. Two disciples are walking along the road in the direction of Emmaus, some sixty furlongs from Jerusalem. Their conversation was of the things that had occurred at Jerusalem, and the record is that they were sad. As they thus walked and talked, the risen Lord drew near, and went with them:--

> "But their eyes were holden that they should not know Him" (Luke xxiv. 16).

Here was protection and provision in one—the risen Christ. Once again the provision is there already, needing but the opened eyes to see it:--

> "And their eyes were opened and they knew Him . . . . . Did not our hearts burn within us . . . . . while he opened to us the Scriptures?" (Luke xxiv. 31, 32).

To this might be added:--

> "Then opened He their understanding, that they might understand the Scriptures" (Luke xxiv. 45).

Here we have brought together, opened eyes, opened Scriptures, and opened understandings.

Is it true God-honouring prayer to ask for that which is already ours in Christ? Should we not rather learn from these passages that we might often rightly pray, "Open Thou mine eyes, that I may behold", rather than pray for either provision or protection.

Beloved reader, if you are in Christ, you are more safely garrisoned than was Elisha. Pray for the opened eyes to see this. You are more fully provided for than Hagar. With you walks daily the Son of God; and if your eyes are holden it may be slowness of heart to believe that which is written, for had the two disciples really believed the Word of the Lord, they never could have said, "and beside all this, to-day is the third day since these things were done".

The problem of the New Jerusalem.
Answers to correspondents.
pp. 161 - 165

> "There is one thing I did not find anything upon it, and that is 'The problem of the New Jerusalem'. Is Rev. xxi. and xxii. all in the new creation? If so, and Death is abolished at the Great White Throne, why the tree of life? I have come to think that the New Jerusalem in Rev. xxi. 9 and onward is on the present earth after the Millennium; and it reappears in the new earth, and that Rev. xxi. 5—'Behold I make all things new'—is the last point, future, of prophecy, and that the unveiling then goes back to before the Great White Throne . . . . . if anything has been written in extenso on this, I should be very glad to have the reference . . . . . I paused here, and referred again to the 'Comprehensive Index' you sent me, for which I thank you very much indeed. In Volume XV, page 79, first complete paragraph, the very point is brought up."

The above is an extract from an interesting letter received from a much esteemed reader, and while a few words privately written would probably suffice in this case, we believe a more extended reply will be of service to the general reader. We have in mind two things:--

(1) To deal with the actual problem.
(2) To draw attention to the Comprehensive Index to Volumes I to XX of this magazine, and to assist the reader in its use.

In the letter, partly quoted, it will be seen that the writer bethought him of the Index, whereby he was able to locate the paragraph in question in Volume XV, page 79, which is as follows:--

> "There in that renewed paradise shall be the throne of God and of the Lamb, there His servants shall serve Him and see His face, bearing His name upon their foreheads. Basking in the light that the Lord God Himself shall give, they shall reign unto the ages of the ages. THIS IS THE FARTHEST POINT TO WHICH THE BOOK TAKES US IN THE OUTWORKING OF THE GREAT PURPOSE OF GOD. One by one the barriers are broken down. The last to go here is the temple with its priesthood. Paul places the topstone upon the edifice by revealing that when the reign of Christ has brought everything into line and order, the goal of the ages will then be reached and God shall be all in all."

It will be gathered from this extract that we see in Rev. xxi. - xxii. 5, "the farthest point to which the book takes us in the outworking of the purpose of the ages", and moreover that we render Rev. xxii. 5, "and they shall reign unto the ages of the ages". Our suggestion to the interested reader is that he should explore this subject further, and in order to get what help there is available in The Berean Expositor, he should make good use of the Comprehensive Index. For example, the translation "unto the ages of the ages" is suggestive of much. We open the "Index of Subjects", and under the heading "Ages of ages", are directed to Volume XV. 41, where we read:--

"The expression 'for the ages of the ages' (eis tous aionas ton aionon) occurs in the Book of the Revelation 13 times, and is distributed as follows:--

For the ages of the ages.

A | i. 6. The kingdom of priests ascribe glory and dominion to Christ.
B | i. 18. Christ. Living for the ages of the ages.
C | Worshippers of God (fourfold).
a1 | iv. 9. The living creatures.
b1 | iv. 10. The twenty-four elders.
a1 | v. 13. Every creature.
b1 | vii. 12. All the angels.
A | x. 6. The mighty angel. The mystery of God finished.
B1 | xi. 15. He shall reign.
C | Worshippers of Satan (fourfold).
a2 | xiv. 11. Smoke of torment.
b2 | xv. 7. The seven angels.
a2 | xix. 3. Smoke of torment.
b2 | xx. 10. The Devil, Beast and False Prophet.
B2 | xxii. 5. They shall reign.

* * * * * * *

The ages of the ages is the great converging point of all time. There the smoke ceases to ascend, there every enemy is subjected, there the reign of the saints reaches its goal, there in fact the Son Himself shall vacate His mediatorial throne, and having accomplished the purpose of the ages He shall: 'Deliver up the kingdom to God, even the Father . . . . . that God may be all in all' (I Cor. xv. 24-28).

The reader will understand from the above, therefore, that any feature of promise or prophecy that falls within the ages of the ages must be before the great act of I Cor. xv. 24-28, and that Rev. xx. 10 and xxii. 5 fall within the limits of the ages. We are consequently in agreement with our reader, although we have not, perhaps, stated the matter as definitely as he has.

We now turn up the "Index of Scripture References", and note that Rev. xx. 4-6 is dealt with in Volume XIV. 56. Nothing is actually listed in the Index concerning Rev. xx. 1-3, but it is a simple thing to go back from page 56 to the preceding article. There on page 29, we read:--

"The thousand year reign of Christ will not be the final and perfect kingdom; it will be preparatory."

In Volume XIV, page 56, we read:--

"The millennial reign is bounded at its two extremes by a series of events which indicate the peculiar character of that kingdom.

At the beginning.	At the close.
1. Satan bound for 1000 years.	1. Satan loosed when 1000 years finish.
2. Nations deceived no more until 1000 years finish.	2. Nations deceived after 1000 years finish.
3. Thrones and judgment given to saints.	3. The camp of the saints encompassed.
4. The first resurrection. Priests of God and of Christ.	4. The resurrection of the rest of the dead.

* * * * * * *

The millennium ends exactly as every other dispensation has ended, i.e., in failure. This one fact enables us to see that instead of understanding this kingdom to be the beginning of the Lord's work of power and glory, it is to be understood rather as the last of His dealings with men."

A further reference to Rev. xx. 4-6 is found in Volume XIV. 97. Space forbids the quoting of that article (it should be read through), but we will give a short citation, omitting the proof texts contained in the article itself:--

"The millennial kingdom is Israel's sphere of blessedness wherein all the promises related to them as a peculiar people to the Lord shall be fulfilled. The millennium foreshadows the perfect kingdom. What will take place over the breadth of the earth after the millennium, takes place during the thousand years in Israel's land only. One nation, Israel, shall be 'born at a stroke' (Isa. lxvi. 8). One people, Israel, 'shall be all righteous' (Isa. lx. 21), and the days of their mourning shall be ended. But the ends of the earth will slowly learn the lesson. A brighter and better day succeeds the thousand-year reign of Christ and His people. The royal priesthood will have accomplished its purpose."

Under the heading "Revelation—all things new" in the "Index of Subjects", we find that xxi. 1-5 and xxi. 1 - xxii. 5 are referred to in Volume XV, page 65. We accordingly turn up this reference and find the following subdivision:--

"During the ages which span this section the wondrous purposes of grace and redemption are worked out. The last act which pertains to this section is that of casting death and hades into the lake of fire. The millennium is the day of the Lord (II Pet. iii. 10), and this is followed by the day of God (II Pet. iii. 12).

* * * * * * *

The subject 'the new heaven and new earth' occupies chapters xxi. 1 - xxii. 5. First we have a brief statement occupying xxi. 1-5, then secondly we have an expansion of one aspect . . . . .

The new creation and its heirs.

A1	xxi. 1-5.	All things new.
A2	xxi. 6 - xxii. 5.	These things inherited.

The first part of the subject is general—'all things'. The second part of the same subject is that which is peculiar to the overcomer—'he that overcometh shall inherit these things'. Five verses are sufficient to tell of the new heavens and new earth, while twenty-seven verses are taken up with the description of the inheritance of the overcomer.

* * * * * * *

We look in vain in this chapter of Revelation for any further description of the new heaven and new earth. Immediately following the briefest of introductions John focuses upon one phase of this new world:--

> 'And I, John, saw the holy city, new Jerusalem, coming down from God out of heaven, prepared as a bride adorned for her husband' (xxi. 2).

* * * * * * *

At the close of the description (xii. 1-5) we read Eden, paradise restored. It will be seen therefore that there are to be a series of steps ever back to 'as it was in the beginning'.

> (1). THE MILLENNIUM.—Jerusalem on earth, a holy city.
> Special feature THE TEMPLE (Ezek. xl.-xlvii.)
> (2). THE NEW HEAVEN.—Jerusalem, the heavenly city.
> Special feature THE TABERNACLE.
> (3). THE NEW EARTH.—Paradise, 'The day of the age' (II Pet. iii.).
> Special feature THE TREE OF LIFE."

It will be observed from these various extracts that we see in Rev. xxi. 5 the last word, future, of prophecy, and that the new Jerusalem with which the Revelation is so concerned is rather in the nature of an inheritance, entered by the overcomer at the beginning of the Millennium, and enjoyed right through the succeeding day of God, up to the end of the ages of the ages, when the goal of redemption will be reached.

The presence of the tree of life in Rev. xxii. 2 does not necessarily suppose the presence of death, any more than it did in the beginning (Gen. ii. 9). It indicates that the final step has been reached before the "end", which "end" will bring about the last great correspondence, and Gen. i. 1 will find its echo in the words, "that God may be all in all".

Our correspondent is making a special study of the place occupied by the new Jerusalem, and the relationship of chapters xxi. and xxii. to the great white throne and the lake of fire. We look forward to these studies, and may be able to write further upon the subject which, involving as it does "the end", includes us all, whatever our distinctive dispensational sphere. We trust moreover, by the example given above, that the reader will be stimulated to use the Indexes, and so make as much use as possible of what has been written and discovered, remembering all the time to "search and see" whether these things be so.

The "out-resurrection".

#2. The usage of ex and ek with anastasis.
pp. 29 - 33

The words translated in Phil. iii. 11, "the resurrection of the dead", are found nowhere else in exactly the same form. This fact has its place in exposition. We have discovered, however, that among quite a number of Christians with whom we have spoken on the matter, there exists an impression that ek is never elsewhere used with anastasis, and that, in consequence, doctrine that is quite untenable has been entertained. We have in earlier volumes drawn attention to these facts, but the importance of them and the claims of new readers make it imperative that they be reiterated and made as plain as possible.

The Received Text of Phi. iii. 11 reads, eis ten exanastasin ton nekron. The Revised Text, upon which there is practical unanimity among the Editors, reads, eis ten exanastasin ten ek nekron.

As it may be of service to other readers similarly placed, we mention the following incident. Upon remarking that while Phil. iii. 11 was unique, but by no means the only occasion where ek is used with anastasis, one friend replied, "But Young's concordance gives but one occurrence, that of Phil. iii. 11". The entry in Young's is as follows:--

> "RESURRECTION. A standing up out of, exanastasis, Phil. iii. 11."

We must remember that while Young's is an analytical concordance, it is, after all, a concordance of the A.V., and if the A.V. does not translate ek by some word like "out of" it will not be recorded by Young. A concordance is an excellent servant, but if one's knowledge of Greek is limited to the concordance rather than a patient investigation of the original N.T., extreme care must be exercised lest a little knowledge should prove a dangerous thing. While great importance attaches to the little words ek and ex in Phil. iii. 11, we must not allow their presence to upset our balance. One word in the passage remains unchanged, the word anastasis, and it always means resurrection, never translation, or change. Phil. iii. may speak of an "out-resurrection", but while due heed must be given to the qualification conveyed in the prefix "out", we must also remember that the fact referred to is still that of a resurrection. It may take place individually, it may anticipate, by a brief period, the hope of the whole church, it may have many peculiarities, but they will all be peculiarities of resurrection. Had the Holy Spirit wished to speak of a translation there was a suitable word available, as Col. i. shows.

But let us begin at the beginning, and approach the supreme revelation of Phil. iii. 11 step by step. We shall then be fortified with scriptural usage.

> "I am a Pharisee, the son of a Pharisee: of the hope and resurrection of the dead (anastasis nekron) I am called in question" (Acts xxiii. 6).

Here the simple term anastasis nekron expressed the hope of the Pharisee, which was confined to "a resurrection of dead ones". This was the hope of Martha, "Thy brother shall rise again . . . . . I know that he shall rise again in the resurrection at the last day". It was this doctrine that the Hebrews were urged to "leave" because a "better resurrection" was in view:--

> "Wherefore leaving . . . . . let us go on unto perfection not laying again the foundation of . . . . . resurrection of the dead" (anastasis nekron) (Heb. vi. 1, 2).

We now take a step forward, and consider the first introduction of the new term, ek, "out of".

There is no need for us to attempt to prove that the disciples of the Lord believed at least as much as the Pharisees and Martha did concerning the resurrection, yet, upon the Lord bidding them to tell no man what they had seen, till the Son of man be risen from the dead, they manifest a sudden perplexity. The result of the Lord's remark is that they question one with another what the rising from the dead should mean. The cause of this questioning is apparent when we consult the original. Into the accepted formula, anastasis nekron, the Lord introduced the preposition ek (Mark ix. 9, 10). We record the words of this passage, therefore, as marking a step in advance of the primitive doctrine.

Ek nekron anaste, "The rising out from the dead".—This referred to the Lord's personal resurrection, and it is essential that we should see that the introduction of the word ek, while it speaks of the Lord's resurrection as a firstfruits, does not alter in any way the simple, glorious literality of that resurrection from the grave.

It may be well to include another passage from the Gospels, viz., Luke xvi. 31:--

> "If they hear not Moses and the prophets, neither will they be persuaded though one should rise out from dead ones" (ek nekron anaste).

A reasonable objection here would be that this but touches one half of the subject, the more important half, namely, the junction of ek with anastasis, still remaining true only of Phil. iii. 11. It may come as a surprise to some to find that this is not altogether the fact:--

> "Saying none other things than those which the prophets and Moses did say should come: that Christ should suffer and that He should be the first that should rise from the dead" (Acts xxvi. 22, 23).

Here we have the expression ex anastaseos nekron, which approaches nearer than before to Phil. iii. 11. It is also of supreme importance to observe that this peculiar expression is associated with "none other things than those which Moses and the Prophets did say should come".

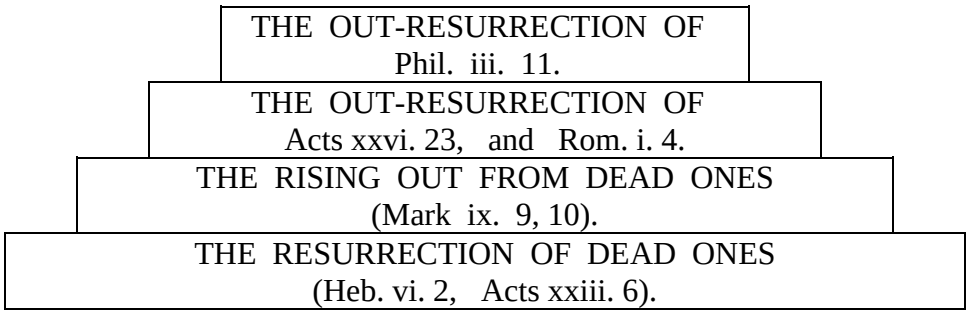
Turning to Rom. i. 4 we read, "Declared to be the Son of God with power . . . . . by the resurrection of the dead" (ex anastaseos nekron). From these passages it is evident that the Lord's personal resurrection is spoken of in Scripture with the prefix ek sometimes before nekron and sometimes before anastaseos.

In Luke xx. 35 the words, tes anastaseos, tes ek nekron occur, which give one more approximation to Phil. iii. 11, and, moreover, supply a context that should not be ignored:--

> "But they which shall be accounted worthy to obtains that age, and that resurrection which is out from dead ones (tes anastaseos, tes ek nekron) neither marry nor are given in marriage."

The double article tes . . . . . tes is seen to much the same effect in the words tou aionos ekeinou, "the age, that one". The articles here particularize and point out, just as they do in Phil. iii. 10, 11, and we have indicated their influence by writing "that . . . . . that . . . . . which" in italics. The context throws further important light on the subject. It speaks of being "accounted worthy to obtain" that resurrection. This brings it nearer to the conception of Phil. iii. 10, 11, where the context speaks of, "if by any means I might attain" and "the prize of the high calling".

One further feature which is of the utmost importance is the unchanging meaning of the words "of dead ones", or, "of the dead". Christ's own resurrection was out from literally dead ones, not from those spirituality dead. The resurrection spoken of in Luke xx. is from among the literally, physically, dead. What authority can any man possess to-day to set aside this canon of interpretation, and if Phil. iii. 11 is a special resurrection out from among literally, physically, dead ones, the semi-gnostic teaching that is being foisted on to it vanishes. Phil. iii. 11 is unique, but it is not isolated, neither must it be so interpreted as to remove from under this top stone the steps that assuredly lead up to it.



> "That I may know Him, and the power of His resurrection, and the fellowship of His sufferings, being made conformable unto His death" (Phil. iii. 10).

Here the apostle, already a believer, already a member of His body, steps out into voluntary association with the suffering and death of His Lord. He cannot make his place in Christ more secure thereby; he cannot make the attainment of the blessed hope more sure thereby; membership and hope alike are ours completely, fully and irrevocably in Christ. For the truth's sake, not for our reputation's sake, we ask the reader to perceive that we do not bring any uncertainty into the question of our hope. Those who go to Phil. iii. for the hope, place that hope in an atmosphere of uncertainty, of pursuing, of attaining, and by so doing take the truth that belongs to the prize, which may be won or lost, and attach it to the hope which cannot be gained or forfeited. This voluntary conformity unto the death of Christ, the apostle continues, is so that if by any means I might attain unto the out-resurrection, that which is out from among the dead ones. Here is something parallel with the "better resurrection" of Heb. xi. 35. The attainment of this special resurrection was greatly desired by the apostle because it was the entry into the added prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus.

We will not go further in this article; we prefer to leave with the reader this witness of the use of the words ex and ek. While we pray that not one word of ours may blunt the edge of Scripture or rob Phil. iii. 11 of all the unique features that legitimately belong to it, yet we pray that any who have been misled as to the usage of Scripture may so desire "truth" above all things that they may gladly be prepared to unlearn again and again rather than entertain one false idea about so vital a theme.

#3. "Roused" and "Raised".

pp. 55 - 57

Scripture never speaks of our having been "raised together", anastasis being never so used. If the reader has been perusing several pages of an article in which the word used for resurrection has been exclusively anastasis, and has read with delight the wondrous truth that the believer has been "raised with" Christ, and has been instructed that this word "with" is sun, it is only logical that he should assume that Scripture not only speaks of an ex-anastasis, but also of a sun-anastasis. One friend with whom we had an earnest conversation based a good deal of his belief that Phil. iii. 11 taught an immediate translation to glory at death, on the fact that, as he put it, the believer had already been raised with Christ. It will come as a surprise, and perhaps a shock, to some to learn that, while we keep to the one word anastasis, such a doctrine as being raised with Christ is not found in Scripture.

Upon reading this some reader may turn to Col. ii. 12, iii. 1, or Eph. ii. 6, and point to the fact that in each of these passages we have the expression:--

> "Buried with Him in baptism, wherein also ye are risen with Him through faith of the operation of God, Who hath raised Him out of dead ones" (Col. ii. 12).
>
> "If ye then be risen with Christ, seek those things which are above, where Christ sitteth on the right hand of God" (Col. iii. 1).

"And hath raised us up together, and made us sit together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus" (Eph. ii. 6).

But the word used in each of the above occurrences is sunegeiro. Now egeiro is not anistemi, and a doctrine that is obliged to quote the one as though it were the other is immediately open to serious question. The distinct meaning of the two expressions happily is found in Ephesians itself:--

"Awake thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee light" (Eph. v. 14).

Here "awake" is egiero, and "arise" is anasta. Both words are used to describe the resurrection of Christ, but only one is chosen when Scripture teaches our union with that rising: that one is egeiro, leaving the "resurrection" in its full sense yet literal and future:--

"He was asleep, and His disciples came to Him, and awoke Him" (Matt. viii. 25).
"It is high time to awake out of sleep" (Rom. xiii. 11).

The words "awoke" and "to awake" are translations of egeiro. The more emphatic diegeiro, "to thoroughly awaken", is used as follows:--

"The Joseph being raised from sleep" (Matt. i. 24).
"He was asleep on a pillow, and they awake Him . . . . . and He arose . . . . ." (Mark iv. 38, 39).
"He fell asleep . . . . . they came to Him and awoke Him . . . . . then He arose . . . . ." (Luke viii. 23, 24).

Peter uses the word twice, viz., in II Pet. i. 13 and iii. 1, where it is translated "stir up". The stirring up of the mind means its being awakened or aroused to alertness. It is evident that where we persist in using only one English word to translate two Greek words we shall be the prey of false inference and imbibe serious error. We cannot of course provide our own version of the Scriptures, but we should never blunt the edge of inspiration by this slip-shod exegesis. Egeiro means "to rouse", leaving anistemi to be translated "to raise". We have been "roused" with Christ, and are awaiting the blessed resurrection when we shall be "raised".

There is the same simple testimony to the meaning of anistemi and anastasis as we have found for egeiro.

"And there stood up one of them named Agabus" (Acts xi. 28).

Anastas . . . . . ex, parallel to ex anastasis, is used here for "stood up out from them".

"Also of your own selves shall men arise speaking perverse things" (Acts xx. 30).

Ex . . . . . anistemi. Here again we have a "rising up out of".

"Stand upright upon thy feet" (Acts iv. 10).

Here the word anistemi is simply translated “stand”.

It may be well to include in this survey the occurrences of exanistemi (the verbal form of exanastasis of Phil. iii. 11), Mark xii. 19, Luke xx. 28, and Acts xv. 5.

Whatever the true interpretation of Phil. iii. 11 may be, let it not be spoiled by wrenching words out of their true place. We desire the truth, and by this we do not mean ourselves alone. We are sure that many who entertain some of the false views exposed here equally desire the truth. We write to help, not hinder, and it can do nothing but help to have a true unassailable scriptural basis for any doctrinal argument we may bring forward.

For the benefit of any who are unacquainted with the original, yet who are found so often speaking of the exanastasis, we would say that anistemi is the verb of which anastasis is the noun, one meaning “to rise”, the other “the rising”.

#4. “He humbled Himself.” “The body of our humiliation.” pp. 67 - 70

What is the body of our humiliation? The phrase is taken from Phil. iii. 21:--

> “For our citizenship is in heaven, from whence also we look for a Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall transfigure the body of our humiliation to a conformity with the body of His glory” (Phil. iii. 20, 21).

Those who thus translate this passage have already seen that the conception of a “vile” body is not in view, and therefore we need not take time over that. Let it be observed that in this passage there is no alteration or departure from the theme of Phil. iii. 11, and that to deal with verses 20 and 21 without due regard to their place in the epistle will therefore not lead to a true exposition.

The first link with the earlier portion is found in the words expressed in the A.V. by “fashioned like unto His glorious body”. “Fashioned like” is summorphos, and in verse 10, where we read of “being made conformable unto His death”, we find summorphoumai. There the apostle expresses his willingness and his desire. Not only does he rejoice in the established fact that he has died with Christ and must therefore live with Him, but he presses on to fuller realization, knowing, as he himself taught, that beyond the dying with and living with Christ was the enduring and the reigning with Him (II Tim. ii. 11-13).

Phil. iii. 10 does not commence with crucifixion and death, but with resurrection, and that as a present power to usward who believe: “That I may know Him and the power of His resurrection." This is the energy spoken of at the end of the chapter by which He is "of power" even to subdue all things unto Himself.

Laying hold upon this resurrection, however, the apostle's next step is to enter into the fellowship of Christ's sufferings, not for salvation, but for the subsequent outworking of that salvation. This leads to conformity unto the death of Christ, and this, again, is a preclude to one thing, viz., "If by any means I may attain unto the out-resurrection, that which is out from among the dead ones".

While fellowship with the sufferings of Christ is not necessary to assure any member of the body of his place in the blessed hope, it is essential if the added prize is sought.

"If by any means I may attain unto" is absolutely foreign to the standing in grace that is taught in the epistle to the Ephesians. It belongs properly to the epistle that urges the believer to go on, with the added prize in view. The reader should read on in this third chapter. No break is discoverable in the argument. The apostle is pressing on with the goal in view, and calls upon others to do likewise. He warns against some who mind earthly things, and places them in contrast with those who remember that their citizenship is in heaven. Just as I Thess. iv. and I Cor. xv. place together resurrection and "change" before the respective companies in view, so does the apostle in Philippians. The out-resurrection is explainable in the terms of the "change" of those who await the Saviour. Just as I Cor. xv. declares that, though all shall not sleep, yet all shall be changed, so is it here. All will not pass through death and the grave, but all who have attained this out-resurrection know that their glory will be entered when this body of humiliation is conformed to the body of His glory.

Again let us ask the question, What is this body of humiliation? The reference to Phil. iii. 10 gives us an inkling of the truth, that it has special reference to those who not only believe the teaching of the epistles of the mystery, but enter into fellowship with and conformity to the Lord's death and sufferings, and this is substantiated by a closer examination of verse 21. The word we translate "humiliation" is tapeinoseos, and fuller light upon its meaning will be found in chapter ii. There the death of Christ, even the death of the cross, is introduced not as a basis of salvation, but as an example to follow, the whole reference being introduced by the words, "Let this mind be in you":--

> "Let this mind be in you which was also in Christ Jesus, Who being in the form of God . . . . . made Himself of no reputation . . . . . and being found in fashion as man, He humbled Himself and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross. Wherefore God also hath highly exalted Him . . . . . Wherefore work out your own salvation" (Phil. ii. 5-12).

"He humbled Himself", etapeinosen heauton. Here is the body of His humiliation, closely associated with the death of the cross, and leading on to subsequent and related exaltation and glory. Heb. xii. 1-3 is a close parallel and should be studied together with Phil. ii. 5-12.

Conformity unto His death will be that of the cross, in contrast with which the apostle speaks of those whose God is their belly, who mind earthly things, and so constitute themselves the enemies of the cross (Phil. iii. 18, 19). Have all believers the body of humiliation? If we take into account the scope of Phil. ii. & iii. and the evident association of the example of Christ's sufferings and humbling with the apostle's voluntary fellowship therewith, we are led to doubt whether it can be true of all believers. Just as the prize, though open to all, is attained only by those who follow the example of Paul here set forth, so the words of Phil. iii. 21 are to interpreted, in their first and fullest sense, not of all members of the body, but of those in view in this epistle, viz., those who leave all and press on, who not only have died with Christ, but who have had fellowship with His sufferings and who have been so conformed to His death that they have shared the likeness of the body of humiliation that was His.

Paul uses this same word "humiliation" in Phil. iv. 12: "I know both how to be abased, tapeinoo" (same word in ii. 8). Whatever our view may be as to the applicability of this term to all believers, one thing is beyond argument and that is, that the body of the believer here and the body of resurrection glory are intimately connected. We are too fully aware of the apostle's rejoinder in I Cor. xv. 36 to speculate here, and as we know that in the resurrection God giveth a body as it pleases Him, we are not justified in speaking slightingly of the body or of adopting the language of spiritism in our zeal. The Corinthians to whom I Cor. xv. was written were also told that their body was the temple of the Holy Ghost, and that in those very bodies they might glorify God.

We may come nearer to Phil. iii. than that, for in Phil. i. Paul says: "Christ shall be magnified in my body, whether it be by life or by death" (Phil. i. 20).

Anastasis never means translation, and even when qualified by ex remains a resurrection still. The theme of Philippians is not the basic teaching of the church which is His body, where the standing is all of grace, but rather is it an exhortation to the members of the body to run with patience the race set before them, with fellowship in the humiliation of Christ here, and the transfiguring of the body of humiliation when the out-resurrection or the blessed change is experienced and the prize of the high calling is won.

#5. "The high calling" or "The upward call"?
pp. 91 - 94

Many translate the words of Phil. iii. 14 as though they teach a future summons on high. "The on-high calling" and "the upward call" are phrases in common use, implying the thought of a future summons on high. While we do not need the names of other teachers to support our witness, a remark of Sir Robert Anderson in this connection is worth weighing over. With reference to the "upward call" he remarked that those who used the phrase never completed the quotation. The complete statement, "The upward call of God in Christ Jesus", does not so readily fit in with the thought of a future summons.

However, we have a greater witness than man; we have the consistent usage of the Word, and those for whom we write will be convinced by this, though they may be unmoved by a university. The word in question is klesis and occurs eleven times in the N.T., being translated once "vocation" and ten times "calling". Let us note these passages before proceeding further:--

> "The gifts and calling of God are without repentance" (Rom. xi. 29).
> "For ye see your calling, brethren" (I Cor. i. 26).
> "Let every man abide in the same calling" (I Cor. vii. 20).
> "That ye may know what is the hope of His calling" (Eph. i. 18).
> "Walk worthy of the vocation (calling) wherewith ye are called" (Eph. iv. 1).
> "The prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus" (Phil. iii. 14).
> "That God would count . . . . . worthy of this calling" (II Thess. i. 11).
> "Called us with an holy calling" (II Tim. i. 9).
> "Partakers of the heavenly calling" (Heb. iii. 1).
> "Make your calling and election sure" (II Pet. i. 10).

There is scarcely any need to debate the meaning of "calling" in these passages. The calling of Rom. xi. 29 refers back to ix. 7 and might well be rendered "vocation". The calling of I Cor. i. 26 refers back to i. 9—again a vocation, not a future summons from God. The calling of I Cor. vii. 26 is most definitely a man's means of livelihood, his profession or business. Eph. iv. 1 translates the word unambiguously "vocation". And there is no reason why the same rendering should not be adopted in Phil. iii. 14:--

> "The prize of the high vocation of God in Christ Jesus."

It is true proverb that a little knowledge is a dangerous thing. We have often had an argument pressed upon us based on the fact that the word "high" in Phil. iii. 14 is an adverb, the reasoning put forward being as follows:--

> "Adverbs govern verbs; therefore 'calling' must have here be a verb and refer to a call yet to be given by God—a call or summons on high, for which the church is waiting."

If we were dealing with the English language, this argument would command respect; but the language concerned is Greek, and the N.T. contains more than one example of ano, the adverb, being used in the same way as we use an adjective, i.e., to qualify a noun:--

> "I will show wonders in heaven above" (Acts ii. 19).
> "Jerusalem which is above is free" (Gal. iv. 26).
> "Seek the things which are above" (Col. iii. 1).
> "Set your affection on things above" (Col. iii. 2).
> "I am from above" (John viii. 23).
> "They filled them up to the brim" (John ii. 7).

Here we have ano used with nouns not in its strictly adverbial sense of "upward", for we cannot reasonably speak of "upward heaven", of "Jerusalem that is upward", or of "things that are upward".

The calling of Phil. iii. 14 is a high calling, and must be interpreted in accordance with its parallel in II Tim. i. 9. There the "holy calling" refers to the vocation whereunto we are called and not to a future rapture or ascension to glory. Moreover, the prize is not the high calling. The latter, of which we are enjoined to walk worthy, has, associated with it, a prize, and not the calling, that is the summons on high.

The very presence of the word prize should for ever prevent us from introducing, in this connection, that which is ours by gift and grace alone. The apostle has used the word with a precision which leaves no room for doubt or debate:-- > "Have ye not perceived that those that are racing in the stadium, are all indeed racing, but one obtains the prize: so run that you may lay hold; but every man who striveth in the games, in all things useth self control. They indeed, then, that a corruptible crown they may obtain, but we an incorruptible. I, therefore, so am racing, as not uncertainty, so am boxing as not thrashing air, but I am beating my body under and leading it captive, lest by any means, to others having proclaimed (as a herald) the contest, I myself should be disqualified" (I Cor. ix. 24-27).

Not one word of this passage belongs to salvation by grace, or calling, or position in Christ; the whole context belongs to that "working out" of salvation of which Philippians speaks. The principle involved extends to I Cor. x. where the lesson is learned by observing the all and the many. All came out of Egypt, and did eat and drink, but with many God was not well pleased, and they fell in the wilderness. This does not jeopardize salvation—for all were redeemed. It speaks rather of the failure of some to press on, forgetting the things left behind in Egypt.

It is doubtless unwise to press analogies beyond their legitimate warrant, but any analogy of Scripture is of far greater weight than any opinion of uninspired expositors like ourselves. Of all those over twenty years of age that came out of Egypt, only Caleb and Joshua attained entrance into the land of Canaan. Did they go in immediately while the murmurers wandered their forty years in the wilderness? Or did they not, rather, wait until all Israel crossed the Jordan together? We know the answer. They waited; but they did not lose their reward. The eleventh chapter of Hebrews centres round two themes—

"the better country" and "the better thing" (xi. 16 and 40), closely allied with "the better resurrection" of verse 35. Did those who qualified for "the better country" enter it at death? Did those who suffered and obtained a "better resurrection" enter it at death? Heb. xi. tells us that they did not:--

> "They all, having obtained a good report through faith, received not the promise, God having provided some better thing for us, that they, without us, should not be made perfect" (Heb. xi. 39, 40).

The record of Caleb and Joshua is beyond question; the statement of Heb. xi. is explicit too. And surely the evident parallel that we have already seen between Hebrews and Philippians also has a bearing here. The "better resurrection" is to the "heavenly calling" of Hebrews (iii. 1) what the "out-resurrection" is to the "high calling" of Philippians. As we said before, the analogy must be taken for what it is worth, but let us not forget that it is worth a whole book of unenlightened exposition, however spiritual and elevation such exposition may appear to be.

#6. What resurrection was taught as being "past already"?
pp. 109 - 112

We have already exhibited the close parallel that exists between Hebrews and Philippians, and before we leave the debated theme of these articles, we want to use the parallel that exists between Philippians and II Timothy to call attention to a solemn word of warning that appears to be related to this subject.

We have no need to demonstrate that Ephesians and Colossians are a pair of epistles; that is self-evident. This leaves us Philippians and II Timothy of the four great prison epistles. Are these a pair? Let us see.

Philippians.	II Timothy.
"Try the things that differ" (i. 10).	"Rightly divide the Word of truth" (ii. 15).
"Striving together for the faith" (sunathleo) (i. 27).	"Strive for the masteries" (athleo) (ii. 5).
"I press toward the mark" (iii. 14).	"I have finished my course" (iv. 7).
"For the prize" (iii. 14).	"No man is crowned except he strive lawfully" (iv. 8). "Henceforth a crown" (iv. 8).
"Desire to depart" (analuo) (i. 23).	"The time for my departure is at hand" (analusis) (iv. 6).
"Yea, if I be offered" (spendomai) (ii. 17).	"I am now about to be offered" (spendomai) (iv. 6).

Here is evidently unity of theme—the crown, the prize, the contest, the athlete. If every other item were removed, the most evident parallel between the desire to depart and the time of departure, or the willingness to be offered and the fact that the offering was now due, would make a bond between these two epistles which no objection or argument could shake, these words being found in no epistles other than these two.

One pair we have omitted because they constitute the case in point:--

> "The out-resurrection, that which is out from among the dead" (Phil. iii. 11).
> "Saying that the resurrection is past already" (II Tim. ii. 18).

It was objected by one friend that, had the apostle intended a reference to Phil. iii. 11, he would have said, " 'the out-resurrection' is past already". We have already learned that the resurrection of Christ Himself was an "out-resurrection" (Acts xxvi. 23), yet in Phil. iii. 10 Paul does not feel under any necessity to say, "That I may know Him, and the power of His out-resurrection", the simple, covering, term being quite sufficient, and the same is true of the reference in II Tim. ii. 18.

Let us ask ourselves just what resurrection could have been taught by these false teachers as having taken place already. Observe, they did not deny the resurrection, but asserted that it had taken place already. They could not have meant the personal resurrection of the Lord, for it is most surely the foundation of our faith that His resurrection is past already, blessed be God! They must then have referred to the resurrection of His people. But who? It might have been said that the resurrection of those who had died had passed already, but how would that have ate as a gangrene, or have overthrow the faith of some? There appears to be but one solution.

Hymenaeus and Philetus taught that because the Lord Jesus rose, and His people are said to have been "raised with" Him (although, as we have shown, the epistles never use anistemi, but always egeiro, when teaching this blessed fact), therefore resurrection is a thing of the past with us; that at death we go immediately to glory, by reason of the fact that we are already raised together with Him.

When one reads an article in which it is stated that the resurrection of I Cor. xv., or I Thess iv., is, of course, not past but future, and this fact is contrasted with the "out-resurrection" and the believer's intimate association with the resurrection of the Lord; and when many have openly and plainly asserted that such is what they believe the "out-resurrection" and being raised together with Christ mean, surely it is not only kindly, but imperative, that Paul's warning should be sounded. Virtually such teaching is saying that the resurrection is past already, and, seeing that it is in exact correspondence with the "out-resurrection" teaching of Philippians, there is no room for doubt but that this new error that is spoiling some of Christ's members, is as old as the times of Paul himself. We omit names, and only those who have imbibed the doctrine we seek to expose will know to whom reference is made. We are not attacking any child of God, but we are seeking to defend the faith and protect those who have not sufficient means to test the accuracy of many assertions put forward as being the teaching of the original.

We believe, as our articles on The Hope and the Prize show, that this "out-resurrection" is a most sacred and unique thing. We have left the question as to whether it is entered separately, one at a time, collectively, some time before the resurrection of the church as a whole, or whether, like Caleb and Joshua, or those who obtained the "better resurrection" of Heb. xi., the distinctiveness does not depend upon the question of the time at which it is entered, but upon what follows in the glory. These things being left unexpressed in the epistles, we also would leave them undefined, but we do earnestly ask every reader to beware of that false teaching that misuses words (as anistemi for egeiro), and which fails to exhibit the usage of basic expressions (like ex with anistemi or klesis, "calling", as shown in this series). Whether from ignorance, bias, or indolence, the mischief is the same, and the subject is too vital to allow our desire for peace to overrule the necessity to contend earnestly for the faith, if needs be.

The Epistle to the Romans.

#28. The sin that entered into the world (v. 12).
pp. 1 - 5

The first reading of the Scriptures leaves one with an overwhelming sense of the complexity of things. Angels and men, heaven and earth, God and Satan, law and grace, in one place a kingdom upon earth; and in another a sphere of blessing far above all heavens, these subjects with their individual ramifications are not easy to follow. Patient and prayerful study, however, with a consistent endeavour rightly to divide the Word of truth, brings into prominence the underlying purpose. The moment the present six days creation comes into existence this purpose is seen working itself out. It explains the necessity that Adam should have been made in the image of God. It illuminates the temptation in the garden of Eden, it makes the history of the children of Israel a real and necessary factor, and unites in one common whole all the dispensations, whether they look for a renewed earth or for a glory at the right hand of God. It links all the ages together from that phase which dates from before the foundation of the world to that in which time shall be no more.

It is very possible that the reader, while assenting to all this, may ask, But how does this concern Rom. v. 12? To explain this is our present object, but to make our meaning clear it is necessary that the reader shall remember (in general outline at least) what has been previously shown concerning the two great sections of Romans.

Rom. i. - v. 11 and ix.-xvi. constitute the outer section of the epistle. In this section we read of sins, of propitiation, of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, of Israel, of Jew and Gentile. Rom. v. 12 - viii. 39 constitutes the inner section of the epistle. There we read no more of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, but of Adam. There sins are in the background, the entry and dominion of sin being the theme. There Sinai and its law are scarcely perceptible, but Eden and its prohibition are prominent. The outer teaching of Romans is associated with the gospel of God which He had promised afore by His prophets in the holy scriptures (Rom. i. 1, 2; iii. 21). The inner teaching of the epistle is associated with the revelation of a secret kept silent during the age-times, but made known with the publication of the epistle to the Romans (Rom. xvi. 25-27).

Upon examination it will be discovered that all the mysteries mentioned in Scripture lead back to one place and one period, and may be ranged under one or other of two heads, viz., The mystery of iniquity and The mystery of godliness. While these two mysteries differ much as light does from darkness, they are nevertheless comparable, for both pursue one goal.

The mystery of iniquity may be expressed in the language of II Thess. ii. 1-12, of which we quote a part:--

> "The son of perdition, who opposeth and exalteth himself above all that is called God, or that is worshipped: so that he as God sitteth in the temple of God, showing himself that he is God . . . . . whose coming is after the working of Satan . . . . . that they should believe the lie . . . . ."

The mystery of godliness may be expressed in the language of I Tim. iii. 16:--

> "And without controversy great is the mystery of godliness: God was manifest in the flesh, justified in the Spirit, seen of angels, preached unto the Gentiles, believed on in the world, received up into glory."

Rev. xiii. is the prophetic fulfillment of the mystery of iniquity, and Phil. ii. 5-11 the prophetic declaration concerning the fulfillment of the mystery of godliness. Whilst the one is a blasphemous usurpation, the other is the inherent and inherited right of the Lord.

The mystery of Rom. xvi. indicates that the inner teaching of Romans (Rom. v. 12 - viii. 39) has something to say about this great conflict of the ages. Rom. v. 12 opens with a reference to Adam, and Rom. viii. closes with a triumph that includes angels, principalities and powers. The opening words of Rom. v. 12 are: "Wherefore, as by one man sin entered into the world", and the question we propose to answer from the Scriptures is: "What sin was it that entered into the world?"

The word eiserchomai, which is translated "entered into" in Rom. v. 12, is translated "enter" 107 times, and "enter in" 17 times; and a study of the concordance will make it quite plain that the meaning of the word is that of someone or something passing from one place to another. The mind picture conjured up by the word "entered into" in Rom. v. 12 is of sin waiting outside this world of Adam, ready to enter in at the first opportunity, and actually accomplishing this entry by the disobedience of the man.

Rom. v. 12 takes us back to Gen. iii. The actors in that tragic scene are the serpent, the man and the woman. Whatever views we may entertain as to the literality of the serpent, Rev. xx. 2 and II Cor. xi. 3, 14 make it plain that Satan, either as the shining one, or using the serpent as a medium, was the tempter. Satan had sinned and fallen long before the creation of man, and his sin is expressed in the words of Ezek. xxviii. 2:--

> "Thine heart is lifted up, and thou hast said, I am a God, I sit in the seat of God."

This is a blasphemy echoed by Babylon, by Pharaoh and by other types of the future man of sin, and the past fallen cherub. "The sin" that entered into the world was the one basic sin of all sins, the idolatrous claim of the Devil. It was dangled before the eyes of the woman—"Ye shall be as God" (Gen. iii. 5).

We read in I John iii. 8 that "the devil sinneth from the beginning", and that even though the Saviour was manifested to take away our sins, He had an additional work to accomplish:--

> "For this purpose the Son of God was manifested, that He might destroy the works of the Devil" (I John iii. 8).
> "Through death He might destroy him that had the power of death, that is, the Devil" (Heb. ii. 14).

While the names of sins may be legion, sin that lies at the root is one—it is idolatry. At first this may be questioned. Idolatry is the setting up of self in the place of God. The whole fabric of the Mosaic legislation rested upon the opening commandment of the decalogue: "Thou shalt have no other gods before Me" (Exod. xx. 3). This command might be broken by the crude worship of graven images, but it could be broken just as surely by the act of coveting, as Eph. v. 5 and Col. iii. 5 (with Exod. xx. 17) make plain. One man may express his idolatry by bowing down to "stocks and stones"; another by bowing down to stocks and shares.

Murder attacks the image of God, for

> "Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed: for in the image of God made He man" (Gen. ix. 6).

False witness is "the lie" in expression, and Satan the self-worshipper is > "a murderer from the beginning . . . . . when he speaketh a lie, he speaketh of his own, for he is a liar, and the father of it" (John viii. 44).

Ethical teaching stresses the right relation of man with his neighbour, but Bible teaching reveals that man's right relationship with his neighbour is possible only as he is in right relationship with God.

It is common knowledge that where one finds idolatry one finds immorality, indeed the Lord uses adultery to envisage the sin of idolatry when dealing with His people Israel.

When Moses descended from the mountain and saw the worship of the golden calf, he did not destroy one table of stone; he destroyed both, for in breaking the first commandment Israel, like Adam, had let "the sin entered into their world, and death by sin".

The history of the nations is exactly the same. In Rom. i. 18-32 we find the same sequence:--

> "For the invisible things of Him from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made, even His eternal power and Godhead; so that they are without excuse: because that, when they knew God, they glorified Him not as God, neither were thankful; but became vain in their imaginations, and their foolish heart was darkened, professing themselves to be wise, they became fools, and changed the glory of the uncorruptible God into an image made like corruptible man . . . . . dishonour their own bodies . . . . . who changed the truth of God into a lie, and worshipped and served the creature more than the Creator, Who is blessed for ever, Amen. For this cause God gave them up to vile affections . . . . . reprobate mind . . . . . filled with all unrighteousness, fornication . . . . . murder . . . . . disobedient to parents . . . . ."

As with Adam, so with the nations, they let "the sin enter into their world" and then proceeded to break every commandment that was "written in their hearts" (Rom. ii. 15).

"The sin" which entered into the world when Adam fell was a blow aimed at the prerogative of Christ, "The Image of the invisible God" (Col. i. 15). This sin attacked the glory of God in the person of Adam, who was made in the image of God, and in the dispensation of the mystery we have the first definite reversal of this satanic sin:--

> "And have put on the new man, which is renewed in knowledge after the image of Him that created him" (Col. iii. 10).

Eph. iv. 27 glances back to the entrance of sin when it says: "Neither give place to the Devil."

There is no need to enlarge upon this further. Once we get the right view of the matter in Gen. iii. the truth becomes patent. It is more than piety; it is the soul of our high calling that Christ is all and in all. Col. ii. reveals a veritable pantheon of "gods many", with their "Touch not, taste not, handle not", all of which are placed upon the throne that should be occupied by none except the Lord. Members of the one body, with Eph. v. 5 before them will realize that John's words, "Keep yourselves from idols" (I John v. 21), may be but a variant of the exhortation, "Putting away the lie" (Eph. iv. 25).

The mystery of the inner teaching of Romans deals with this sin which is behind the fall of man and the chaos of Gen. i. 2. In Rom. v. 14 & 21 sin and death are said to "reign". In Rom. vi. 9 & 14 sin and death are said to have "dominion". Just as there is a oneness about righteousness, so is there about iniquity. "The sin" that underlies all "sins" can be well expressed in the words that describe the attitude of Amalek:--

> "Because the hand of Amalek is against the throne of the Lord" (Exod. xvii. 16, margin).

#29. Death, in Adam and in Christ (v. 12-14).
pp. 41 - 46

We have given consideration to the doctrine that inheres in the repeated reference to "one man" in Rom. v. 12-21. We now have to consider what this one man did: "By one man sin entered into the world." Immediately we are aware of a blessed connection found in Heb. x. 5: "Therefore when He entered into the world." Here we have a highly illuminating contrast. As we think of Adam, his disobedience, his offence, his condemnation, and how the consequences of that one act passed through to all his seed, we gratefully remember that Christ ("this Man", Heb. x. 12) contrastingly came to do the will of God, and by doing it sanctified all the true seed.

In contrast with the one act of disobedience and the one offence of Rom. v. 15 we have in Heb. x. 10 and 14 the "one sacrifice" and "offering" of the Lord Jesus Christ, "once". There is, moreover, in Heb. x. the same insistence that we found in Heb. ii. 14: "A body hast Thou prepared Me." There can be no identification of the sons of Adam with the Son of God, except He, too, shall become flesh. Prominence is given to this in Rom. viii. 3: "For what the law could not do, in that it was weak through the flesh, God sending His own Son in the likeness of sinful flesh" did do. Christ must become one with us, before we can become one with Him. Bethlehem must come before Calvary. He must be the firstborn of Mary, before He can become the firstborn from the dead.

Returning to Rom. v. 12-14, we seek, exactly, the truth that it contains, and we find that it is summed up in the words of verse 16, "death reigned". The whole argument of Rom. v. 12-21 is to show the end of the reign of sin and death, through Adam, and the establishment instead of the reign of grace, through righteousness, unto life through Jesus Christ our Lord. This reign of sin and death is the uppermost thought in Rom. vi.:--

> "Death hath no more dominion over Him" (Rom. vi. 9).
> "Let not sin reign in your mortal body" (Rom. vi. 12).
> "For sin shall not have dominion over you" (Rom. vi. 14).
> "Ye were the slaves of sin" (Rom. vi. 20).

Rom. vii. introduces an added dominion, namely, that of "law", for, as I Cor. xv. 56 says, "the strength of sin is the law":--

> "The law hath dominion over a man as long as he liveth" (Rom. vii. 1).
> "I find then a law, that, when I would do good, evil is present with me" (Rom. vii. 21).
> "I see another law in my members, warring against the law of my mind, and bringing me into captivity to the law of sin which is in my members" (Rom. vii. 23).

Rom. viii. shows the one, and only, way to freedom from this dominion:--

> "The law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus hath made me free from the law of sin and death" (Rom. viii. 2).

The four outstanding words of chapters v., vi., vii. and viii. are, chapter v. Death, chapter vi. Sin, chapter vii. Law, and chapter viii. Spirit. In chapter v. it is a matter of death and life, in chapter vi. of sin and righteousness, in chapter vii. of law and grace, and in chapter viii. of flesh and spirit.

Death reigns because of sin. That is the outstanding fact of Rom. v. Its glorious sequel in Christ is given in the closing verse:--

> "That as sin hath reigned unto death, even so might grace reign through righteousness unto eternal life by Jesus Christ our Lord" (Rom. v. 21).

Death by sin.

This is the statement of Gen. ii. 17, "In the day that thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die." It is the solemn assertion of Rom. vi. 23, "The wages of sin is death". So important is this doctrine and so far-reaching its effect that we shall count no effort too great that leads us into clearer understanding. Let us therefore first address ourselves to the consideration of the various words used for death, and the various ways in which they are employed in these chapters. We shall first give every reference as it stands in the

A.V. without alteration or comment, then, with these words "which the Holy Ghost useth", we may seek grace to enter into their teaching.

"For I am persuaded that neither death . . . . . shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord" (Rom. viii. 38, 39).

Here is a list of forty-six references in the short space of these three and a half chapters; a list formidable enough in itself to establish its supreme importance without further argument.

In Rom. v. 12-21 we found the whole section dominated by the word "ONE". We can now see that the entire passage is concerned with the death brought in by ONE (Adam), and the death we die in ONE (Christ). Every additional item of truth, every turn of expression, every modification of a word bears upon this great basic doctrine, life from death. Service, liberty, victory, all are associated with this twofold theme.

Instead of attempting an analysis of the words and their contexts here, we feel it will be better if we come fresh to the subject next time, and we therefore ask each reader to have this present number of the magazine handy then, so that reference may be made to these passages easily. We will conclude this article with a reference to the teaching of Rom. v. 12-14 which, till now, has been passed over in silence:--

"Wherefore, as by one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin; and so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned: For until the law sin was in the world: but sin is not imputed where there is no law. Nevertheless death reigned from Adam to Moses, even over them that had not sinned after the similitude of Adam's transgression, who is the figure of Him that was to come" (Rom. v. 12-14).

Eph ho, "for that", margin, "in whom". This phrase is variously translated "whereon", "wherein", "wherefore", "for that", "in whom", and "whereof". It is made up of two words, "upon" and "which". It marks "the basis, or foundation, and also the ethical basis, the occasion or cause of an action or emotion, also the moving principle or suggesting motive" (Dr. Bullinger's Lexicon). It does not mean "in whom"; it reasons that if death is universal all must in some way be under the imputation of sin. Immediately the argument takes up an objection. Sin is not imputed where there is no law, yet sin was in the world before the law of Moses, as is witnessed by the presence of death during all that period. Moreover death reigned over those who did not sin after the similitude of Adam's transgression. What does this imply?

"Sinning after" sounds a little like copying Adam, but that is not the sense of the expression. "According to" is a better rendering. The passage referred to is Hosea vi. 7, and its recognition here saves fruitless speculation: "They, like Adam, have transgressed the covenant." Those who sinned thus are Israel. Those who did not sin thus are the Gentiles who "have not the law". Yet it mattered not, for both Israelite and Gentile alike were seen to be under the dominion of death. Nor is this all. Untold millions have died in infancy; many more have never known a moment's sanity, yet these also died. It is therefore evident that death has come in not because of Israel's law-breaking or the individual sins of Gentiles, but because of SIN, and that it goes back to Adam alone. "By one man SIN entered into the world and DEATH by sin." Except to show the superabounding grace of God (verse 16), Rom. v. 12-21 does not treat of sins, but SIN: what I am, not what I have done, a difference that must be observed both when dealing with ourselves and when considering the work of Christ.

Rom. iii. 12 says "there is none that DOETH good". Rom. v. 12-21 says "there is none good", quite apart from deeds. Likewise the battle in Rom. vi. and vii. is not against external actions merely, but against a "law" in the members that leads to slavery, contradicting the very desires and intentions, and which is altogether too much for human nature to withstand.

Closely associated with the fact that death is here, quite irrespective of our personal evil actions, is the statement: "Adam, who is the figure of Him that was to come." This is seen in a very full sense in II Cor. v. 14: "For the love of Christ constraineth us, judging this, that if ONE died on behalf of all, THEN ALL DIED."

While there are many characteristics of Adam which are typical of Christ, it would be an intrusion, rather than a help, to bring them forward here. The one thing that matters here is expressed in II Cor. v. 14. Just as Adam, the head of the race, involves all "in Him" in death by reason of his one sin, so Christ, the last Adam and the second man, the new head of the race, involves all "in Him" in life by reason of His ONE act of righteousness.

The following paraphrase by Henry Linton may clinch the teaching so far as we have gone:--

> "But first, in proof that death passed upon all men by reason of one's transgression, let it be noted that sin and death were in the world before and until the giving of the law, which they would not have been, had no command been broken. And yet death reigned from the time of Adam to that of Moses, over all, even over those (infants, for instance) who had never sinned as Adam did, nor in their own persons broken any law, a plain proof that they died in Him, and were regarded and treated as sinners by reason of his transgression; so that in this respect he was a type of the promised Messiah, all believers being made alive in the one, as all mankind died in the other."

The reader will be sensible of the weakness of the last sentence. There is no need to add the word "believers", for we have already seen that the term "all in Adam" refers to a promised seed for whom, without exception, Christ became Surety and Kinsman-Redeemer. Apart from that it is helpful. "Believing" does not belong to this section of Romans, but to the earlier section which deals with individual sin, justification and forgiveness.

#30. He that is dead is freed (v. 12 - viii. 39).
pp. 83 - 87

We now take up the important study of the usage of the word death in Rom. v. 12 - viii. 39, and, if the reader is to make full use of these aids to study, it will be necessary that a preceding article, pages 41-46, be opened at the list of words translated "death", "die", and "dead". As will be seen, apothnesko occurs 13 times:--

> "If through the offence of one, the many be dead" (Rom. v. 15).
> "How shall we that are dead to sin live any longer therein?" (Rom. vi. 2).

In both cases, there is a death which we die in another; the first through Adam's offence, the second through identification with Christ. In the first, the many are dead because of sin; in the second they are dead to sin. There is no other way of escape from both the penalty and the dominion of sin. Death is a necessity:--

> "He that is dead is freed from sin" (Rom. vi. 7).

The word "freed", here, means something more than "set at liberty". It is the word dikaioo, "justify", used in vi. 18, where the freedom spoken of has the sense of acquittal. Ecclesiasticus xxvi. 29 states that "an huckster shall not be freed from sin", and the statement appears in the Talmud that "when a man dies, he is freed from the commands".

In Rom. vii. 1-3 the same truth is presented from the other point of view. There, instead of the wife dying to the law, the law (in the person of the husband) dies, and so she is loosed from the law of her husband, and "if her husband be dead, she is free from that law".

We have in the statement at the head of this paper a doctrine of fundamental importance:--

> "He who dies hath become justified from sin."

The justification is from "sin", not from "sins". Now all men die, and because of "sin", not "sins"; so that every one that dies in this way is "justified from sin". The penalty has been paid, and even if no soul were saved, sin would have been righteously dealt with. This, however, leaves man dead. He has no claim upon life; he possesses no righteousness before God. The fact that a murderer, when hanged, is "justified" in law does not give him life again. He who has died to sin in Christ, however, is freed, or justified, from sin, its penalty, and its dominion, and has a share in the new life that Christ came to bestow. This is the superabounding grace of the gospel, for immediately there follows the statement of vi. 7:--

> "But if we died with Christ, we believe that we shall also live with Him" (Rom. vi. 8).

Why should we thus believe, and why should this death with Christ give such assurance?

> "Knowing that Christ, being raised from the dead, dieth no more. Death lords it over Him no more, for in that He died, He died to sin once, but in that He liveth, He liveth unto God" (Rom. vi. 9, 10).

Death ends dominion. The dead slave is free from his master and all his claims. The next three references emphasizes this. Paul addresses the Jew particularly, as knowing the law. His figure is that of the law of marriage. A woman is bound by the law of her husband, and if she should, during her husband's life, enter into marriage relationship with another man, she is called an adulteress. But, if the husband should die, she is "loosed", and "free", and may, without blame, be joined in marriage to another man.

This truth is brought to a focus in verses 5 and 6. The A.V. of verse 6 reads: "that being dead wherein we were held"; the margin—Or "being dead to that". The reading apothanontos,, says Alford, has no place in the discussion, as it appears to be but a conjecture of Beza's. We therefore translate verse 6:--

> "But now we have been discharged from the law, having died to that wherein we were holden."

The two remaining passages, viii. 13 and 34, we leave for the time, as they belong to the sphere that results from this deliverance rather than to the deliverance itself.

It will be worth while attempting a summary of the doctrine of identification with Christ, in death, contained in the references of Rom. vi. 2 - vii. 9, just passed in review. Rom. vi. 2 declares the simple fact that we are dead to sin, and verse 7 adds the blessed detail that he that is dead is justified from sin. This twofold relationship, "to sin" and "from sin", cannot result from any act of our own, for we are already under the dominion of sin and death, through relationship with the first man, Adam. We learn, therefore, in the next reference, that another Head has been provided, in grace, and that this death to sin, and justification from sin, is due to our having "died with Christ" (vi. 8). Then comes the assurance that this deliverance is complete and lasting. Christ, in Whom we died, was raised again from the dead, and the Scripture affirms that He dieth no more, death having no more dominion over Him. He died to sin once and now liveth unto God; and in this He is still our blessed Head and Representative, so that we not only died with Him, but we are raised with Him.

The great principle that death breaks all law's dominion is illustrated by the law of marriage, and our complete and perfect deliverance is found in the fact that we are dead to that which once held us—"dead to the law by the body of Christ" (vii. 4 and 6). This reference, vii. 4, is the only passage of the three under the heading thanatoo that is included in our theme, the two in chapter viii., like the two under the heading apothnesko, belonging rather to the application and outworking of the fact.

With regard to the next list—the occurrences of nekros (substantive)—it will suffice for the moment to say that the word means a corpse, a dead person, or body, and that all the references are to be taken literally. In the following list, however, where nekros is used as an adjective, the word is employed doctrinally. Just as Christ was raised from out of the dead, literally, so likewise reckon ye also yourselves to be as a dead body, a corpse, unto sin. Without the law and its incitements sin was corpselike and inactive, and viii. 10 applies the truth one more, declaring that if Christ be in us the body is like a corpse, so far as sin is concerned, but alive because of the Spirit. In other words, the resurrection of Christ from the dead is re-enacted in the case of all who are united with Him.

The word thnetos, "mortal", appears here as a corrective. Identification with Christ in His death and resurrection, while it has immortality as its goal (I Cor. xv. 51-54), does not render this corruptible body, inherited from Adam, immortal here and now. We must all be changed, either by this mortal putting on immortality, or by this corruptible putting on incorruption. Only in resurrection will the full fruit of identification with Christ be experienced:--

> "So also is the resurrection of the dead. It is sown in corruption; It is raised in incorruption . . . it is sown a natural body, it is raised a spiritual body" (I Cor. xv. 42-44).

It will mean disaster if we assume that "this mortal body" is no longer for us, and that we have attained a "spiritual body" of "resurrection glory". Nevertheless the dominion of the law of sin and death has been cancelled, and we may, even now, in mortal bodies, prove the truth of the victory of Christ. Once again the two references are distributed according to theme, that in chapter viii. being the application, the present power of life operating in mortal bodies by His Spirit—"the life I now live in the flesh, I live by the faith of the Son of God."

The next list speaks only of death itself. All the references in chapter v. refer to the actual result of Adam's sin. Three succeeding references as surely refer to Christ's death, and our baptism, burial and "planting together" into it. Thus, being joined together with Him in His death, and learning that death hath no more dominion over Him, we rejoice to know that we, too, have passed out of its dread dominion. We stay but for two other references in the long list, viz., vii. 24 and viii. 2 They express utter need and complete supply, the prayer and its answer:--

> "Who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" (Rom. vii. 24).
> "The law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus, hath made me free from the law of sin and death" (Rom. viii. 2).

All these passages will come up again for fuller exposition as we come to them in order of the chapters: the foregoing analysis is but to prepare the way and indicate the trend of the subject. It is not now possible to attempt any further study of the subject or attempt to apply what we have seen. As to practice, it is entirely beyond the power of anyone to do more than assemble the facts. It is the work of Him Who is the Spirit of all truth to breathe on the dry bones and make them live. Faced with mortality and the workings of death, as we are in these chapters, we are more than ever made conscious that He alone is sufficient for these things.

#31. "The fall" in Adam and "The standing" in Christ (v. 12-21).
pp. 134 - 139

The word translated "sin" in Rom. v. 12 is hamartia, and it is illuminating to observe the way in which the word is used in the epistle:--

Rom. i. - v. 11.	Four occurrences.
Rom. ix. - xvi.	Two occurrences.
Rom. v. 12 - viii. 39.	Forty occurrences.

It is evident that while sin comes into view in the section that deals with the gospel, it is by no means prominent, whereas the forty occurrences in the inner section reveal how vital it is to the theme there. The associate of sin in Rom. v. 12 is death, thanatos. This word occurs as follows:--

Rom. i. - v. 11.	Once.
Rom. ix. - xvi.	No occurrences.
Rom. v. 12 - viii. 39.	Twenty occurrences.

We have already drawn attention to the absence of the words "faith" and "believe" from this inner section. This we will set forth in the same manner as we have the words above:--

Pisteuo.—"To believe."

Rom. i. - v. 11.	Nine occurrences.
Rom. ix. - xvi.	Eleven occurrences.
Rom. v. 12 - viii. 39.	One reference.

Pistis.—"Faith."

Rom. i. - v. 11.	Twenty-six occurrences.
Rom. ix. - xvi.	Thirteen occurrences.
Rom. v. 12 - viii. 39.	No occurrences.

In place of pisteuo, "to believe", the inner section of Romans uses eideo, "to know", or "to perceive"; "Knowing that Christ being raised from the dead dieth no more" (Rom. vi. 9), and ginosko, "to know personally": "Knowing this, that our old man is crucified with him" (Rom. vi. 6). The two words eideo and ginosko come together in Rom. vii. 7:--

"I had not known sin (ginosko, a personal knowledge that influences one), but by the law, for I had not known (eideo, known anything of, perceived) lust, except the law had said, Thou shalt not covet."

While faith is most intimately connected with salvation (Rom. i. 16, x. 10), and righteousness (Rom. i. 17, iii. 22) in the inner section, perception, knowledge, reckoning and yielding take the place of faith and believing. In Rom. iv. God alone does the "reckoning", "imputing" and "counting", whereas in Rom. vi. 11 it is the believer himself who is exhorted to "reckon" himself dead indeed unto sin, but alive unto God through Christ. Rom. vi. 13 speaks of "yielding", vii. 6 speaks of "serving", which yielding and serving are foreign to the earlier portion of the epistle. We must allow these facts place, our understanding must be governed by them, and not by what we think, feel or expect.

Let us now return to Rom. v. to learn a little more of its teaching. Verses 13-17 form a parenthesis, and we must see to it that we do not miss its lesson. The parenthesis is in two parts, each part being subdivided into three sections, and each corresponding section commencing with the same words. Surely we ought to praise God for so graciously placing these guides in His Word where at first the difficulties seem overwhelming.

Rom. v. 15-17.

d | 15. "But not as" (All'ouch hos).
e | 15. "For if by the (fall) of one" (Ei gar to tou henos).
f | 15. "Much more" (Pollo mallon).
d | 16. "And not as" (Kai ouch hos).
e | 17. "For if by the (fall) of one" (Ei gar to tou henos).
f | 17. "Much more" (Pollo mallon).

"But not as the offence, so also is the free gift."
"And not as it was by one that sinned so is the gift: for the judgment was by one to condemnation, but the free gift is of many offences unto justification."

THE OFFENCE (paraptoma).—This word is used as an equivalent or variant of hamartia, "sin" in verse 12. It is sin given a further definition. Hamartia, like the Hebrew chattah, means "to miss the mark", "to come short". This is called a "transgression" in verse 14, because it was not a sin of ignorance. This word transgression is parabasis from parabaino, "to go beside", "to deviate". It is called an "offence" (paraptoma) in verse 15. This word is sometimes translated "sin" (Eph. i. 7, ii. 5; Col. ii. 13), "trespass" (Eph. ii. 1; Col. ii. 13), "fault" (Gal. vi. 1; James v. 16), and "fall" (Rom. xi. 11, 12).

Parapipto, the verb from which "offence" comes, is found in Heb. vi. 6, "fall away", and in the LXX it sometimes has the meaning of apostacy. Pipto means "to fall". To fall, as a house (Matt. vii. 27). To fall, as a seed sown (Matt. xiii. 4, 7, 8). To fall, as crumbs (Matt. xv. 27). To fall on one's face as a suppliant (Luke v. 12). To fall into a ditch (Luke vi. 39). To fall after stumbling (Rom. xi. 11). To fall, in contrast with standing (Rom. xiv. 4). The word is sometimes translated "to fail" (Luke xvi. 17). In combination with ek, "out of", en, "in", and epi, "upon", the word retains the radical idea of "fall", and there is no reason for departing from this sense when translating paraptoma. Accordingly we shall not use the word "offence", but "fall aside", wherever paraptoma occurs in our reading.

One other word is used in Rom. v. to complete the tale of sin, and that is "disobedience" (v. 19): "For as by one man's disobedience"—words that show that "disobedience" is but another aspect of "the sin" that brought death into the world. Parakoe is the word translated "disobedience" in Rom. v. 19, and means literally "to hear aside". Parakouo, the verb, is translated "neglect to hear" in Matt. xviii. 17. Faith comes by hearing (Rom. x. 17). Salvation in both phases comes by hearing (Eph. i. 13, iv. 21). To "hearken" in the O.T. is synonymous with obedience. Adam "heard aside", as parakouo means, and this is definitely stated in Gen. iii. 17-19:--

> "Because thou hast hearkened unto the voice of thy wife . . . . . in the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread, till thou return unto the ground; for out of it wast thou taken; for dust thou art and unto dust shalt thou return."

This is the parakoe, the "hearing aside", of Rom. v. 19.

The parabasis, the "stepping aside", is seen in Gen. iii. 6:--

> "And when the woman saw that the tree was good for food . . . . . she took . . . . . and did eat, and gave also unto her husband with her; and he did eat."
>
> "Adam was not deceived, but the woman having been deceived became in the transgression (parabasis)" (I Tim. ii. 14).

and Adam with her.

The paraptoma, the "fall aside", is seen in Gen. iii. 8:--

> "Adam and his wife hid themselves . . . . ."

and its sequel in Gen. iii. 24, "So he drove out the man".

Here we have three definitions of that one sin that brought death into the world, each definition being compounded with para, which means "aside". Adam when he sinned "came short", that is its first meaning. He stepped aside, when he heard aside, and as a result he fell aside, and involved us all in his fall. As surely as Abel and Seth were born outside the garden of Eden and involved with the curse on the ground, so all Adam's sons find themselves outside with him.

Hamartia.--	/	Parabasis.—Transgression.—"A stepping aside."
Falling short,	{	Paraptoma.—Offence.—"A falling aside."
sin.	\	Parakoe.—Disobedience.—"A hearing aside."

For this cause was Christ "given aside" (paradidomi):--

> "The Son of God, Who loved me and gave Himself aside for me" (Gal. ii. 20).

For this cause was Christ "given aside" by Judas:--

> "The Son of man is betrayed (paradidomi) into the hands of sinners" (Matt. xxvi. 45).

For this cause was Christ "given aside" by the Father:--

> "He that spared not His own Son, but delivered Him up (paradidomi) for us all" (Rom. viii. 32).

God's answer to Adam's sin, transgression and fall is the gift and the "giving aside" of His Son. Consequently, we find this stressed in Rom. v. 15-17. There, in contrast with "sin", is the free gift:--

> "And not as it was by one that sinned, so is the gift" (dorema) (Rom. v. 16).

In contrast with the "fall" is the overflowing grace gift:--

> "But not as the fall, so is the free gift (charisma), for if by the fall of one many died, much more the grace of God (charis), and the gift (dorea) in grace (charis), which is by one Man, Jesus Christ, abounded unto many" (Rom. v. 15).
>
> "The free gift (charisma) is of many fallings unto justification" (Rom. v. 16).
> "Those who received the abundance of grace (charis), and the gift (dorea) of righteousness, shall reign in life through the One, Jesus Christ" (Rom. v. 17).

Words are heaped together here to emphasize the freeness and the graciousness of the gift of Christ and His righteousness to fallen man. It reaches its climax in Rom. v. 20: "Where sin abounded, grace did superabound (huper eperisseusen)." This free gift of Christ not only undoes all that Adam did, but goes far beyond. Adam brought in death; Christ brings in life. Adam brought condemnation; Christ brings in justification of life. Adam puts death on the throne; Christ puts His people on the throne. Adam's one fall is counteracted by Christ's one righteous act; Adam's disobedience by Christ's obedience. And just as surely as by the disobedience of Adam we were all "constituted sinners", so by the obedience of Christ are we all "constituted righteous".

There is no "legal fiction" about our sinnership and its condemnation, neither is there as to our righteousness in Christ. Where once we "fell", in Adam, we "stand", in Christ (Rom. v. 2), and in grace. Here we learn that not only did Christ deal with Adam's one act, but with all the subsequent sins and fallings of His people. What grace, what love, what a Saviour! Surely this hard and difficult task of analysis and word study, if conducted in the true spirit, cannot but lead us to His feet, crying "Worthy is the Lamb that was slain!"

In conclusion, let us observe the statement in Rom. v. 20 concerning the place of the law, so that all will be clear for the study of Rom. vi. when next we take up this series. Here we have one more compound of para: "The law came in alongside, in order that the fall might abound." The law was never given to save, or to give life; it came to reveal the utter impossibility of the flesh to do anything except sink deeper into the mire. "What the law could not do" (Rom. viii. 3).

Rom. vii. is largely occupied with the law as a means of revealing the utter need we have of Christ. The story is now complete, and so important is it that we venture to repeat the series already given, adding the place of the law, that we too may rest alone in the grace-gift of God.

> THE NEED.—Adam's sin is threefold. It is a parabasis, a paraptoma, a parakoe, that is, a stepping aside, a falling aside, a hearing aside.
>
> THE NEED MADE EVIDENT.—The law was brought in first, alongside, pareiserchomai (see Gal. ii. 4).
>
> THE NEED SUPPLIED.—In the "giving aside", paradidomi, of the Son of God.

The very nature of our study, with its careful tabulation of words, their derivations, usages and meanings, must of necessity make these preliminary articles of the inner section of Romans somewhat heavy. But the words of God pave the way that leads to glory, and surely the possibility of condemned and fallen sinners "reigning in life" and becoming "more than conquerors" should be enough warrant for incurring ten times the fatigue involved both in study and in reading. In this connection we would quote a few lines from a previous number of this magazine dealing with the subject of the High Priest of Israel, in the hope that they may help to keep all hearts in the right attitude before the Lord while we search and dig to ascertain the meaning of His wondrous Word:--

> "If we could only and ever keep the close association that this makes between the High Priest and the Scriptures, every study would become a sanctuary; the spirit would rejoice as the understanding was illuminated; worship ands work, grammar and grace, glossaries and glory would be blessedly intermingled, and the lexicon and concordance would be but rungs in the ladder that leads from earth to heaven, to the right hand of the Majesty on high."

#32. "The reign in life" (vi.--vii.).
pp. 165 - 169

By reason of the nature of the material and the necessity for accuracy, the last two or three articles have been somewhat involved, and there is always a possibility that some reader may in the mass of detail miss the great essential. Without losing anything of the accuracy and information we have gathered, we may profitably seek for this essential feature. It is found in v. 17:--

> "For if by the fall aside of one, death reigned by one, much more they which receive the abundance of grace and the gift of righteousness shall reign in life by one, Jesus Christ."

All leads up to, and away from, that one statement, "They shall reign in life". It is not merely to live, not merely to have aionion life, not merely to have justification of life, but to reign in life. So we have the revelation that "death reigned" and "sin reigned" and "grace reigns", that we may see how the dominion of sin may be broken, and how those who were once in its thrall may now rise as conquerors and reign. Chapter vi. is devoted to this reign in life; so also are chapters vii. and viii. The subject is approached from all angles; it is the truth which animates the whole section.

We prepare for the teaching of Rom. vi. by observing the conditions for reigning in life given in Rom. v. First, we learn from verse 21 that the reign of sin and death has been displaced by the reign of grace unto life, through righteousness, by Jesus Christ as Lord. This is the great basis; but the reign of the redeemed in life is something more. It is a solemn fact that every redeemed believer does not reign in life. He may be justified, constituted righteous, and saved, yet he may not "reign". It is important therefore to see the conditions governing this position. In verses 12, 13, 14, 15, 18, 19, 20 and 21, there is not a single personal or individual reference to the believer, whether to his own personal sin, or faith, or acquiescence, or agreement, or acceptance. All is outside of his volition; it is either in Adam or in Christ. The first personal note is struck in verse 16 in the reference to "many fallings aside", the personal sins of individuals as distinct from the one sin of Adam. The second personal reference occurs in the next verse: "They which receive . . . . . shall reign."

These two words and their connection are important—"receive" and "reign". The word "receive", lambano, needs to be translated by a more active word to give it its true force. Dechomai in the original corresponds most closely to the word "receive", in the sense of receiving something brought by another, whereas lambano more properly signifies to take, to apprehend, to grasp, to hold. Labein is translated in Rev. iv. 11: "Thou art worthy to receive glory", and in Rev. v. 9: "Thou art worthy to take the book." So in Phil. iii. 12 lambano is translated "attained", and in Phil. iii. 12, 13, prefixed by kata, it is rendered "apprehend". If we would "reign in life", then we must take, lay hold of, obtain, and accept the "abundance of grace and the free gift of righteousness" in all their victorious fulness. We may be "saved so as by fire" without it, but who could feel any gratitude for the great love of God in Christ, and not desire to "lay hold of that for which he has been laid hold of by Christ Jesus"?

Before we attempt an analysis of the teaching of Rom. vi. we must seek to discover the divine disposition of its subject-matter, which we call the structure. There are so many suggested divisions of this chapter that it is all the more important that the true key should be sought and found. The key is contained in the four times quoted expression, "God forbid" (vi. 2, 15, vii. 7, 13). The words "God" and "forbid" do not occur in the original. Darby renders the expression each time, "Far be the thought". Rotherham has, "Far be it". Me genoito, "Not may it become". The phrase must be considered as written with a shudder, an expression of horror at the mere suggestion. "Let it not come to that" is perhaps the nearest equivalent in English. With this as a guide, we find the structure of chapter vi. and vii. to be as follows:--

Rom. vi. and vii.

A1 | vi. 1. Shall we continue in sin that grace may abound?
B1 | vi. 2. Let it not come to that.
C1 | vi. 2-14. Answer. Know ye not? Dead to sin (katargeo).
A2 | vi. 15. Shall we sin because under grace?
B2 | vi. 15. Let it not come to that.
C2 | vi. 16 vii. 6. Answer. Know ye not? Dead to the law (katargeo).
A3 | vii. 7. Is the law sin?
B3 | vii. 7. Let it not come to that.
C3 | vii. 7-12. Answer. I had not known. I died (katergazomai).
A4 | vii. 13. Was that which is good made death unto me?
B4 | vii. 13. Let it not come to that.
C4 | vii. 13-25. Answer. We know. The body of this death (katergazomai).

It will be seen that in the four answers there are three repeated features: knowledge, death, and work:--

Knowledge.	Death.	Work.
vi. 3. "Are you ignorant?" (agnoeite).	vi. 2. "We died" (apethanomen).	vi. 6. "May become inoperative" (katargethe).
vi. 16. "Do you not perceive?" (ouk oidate).	vii. 4. "You died" (ethanatothete).	vii. 2. "She is outside its operation" (katergetai).
vii. 1. "Are you ignorant?" (agnoeite).	vii. 9. "I died" (apethanon).	vii. 8. "Works" (kateirgazato).
vii. 7. "I had not known" (egnon).	vii. 13, 24. "Death" (thanatos).	vii. 13. "Working" (katergazomene).
vii. 7. "I had not perceived?" (edein).
vii. 14. "We perceive" (oidamen).

The examples given in this list do not by any means exhaust the references; they are only those that come nearest to the opening sentence of the clause. When each section is considered separately every reference will be dealt with.

Some of the Lord's people tend to underestimate the value of knowledge, and emphasize faith as though that were all-sufficient. We have already seen that faith dominates the opening section of Romans, but we must equally bow to the fact that knowledge takes an equal place in Rom. vi.-viii. Faith is the first step, knowledge the second; and while there are wonderful things that are received solely by faith, that must not lead us to underrate the equally valuable things that come by knowledge. So Peter says, "Add to your faith virtue, and to virtue knowledge" (II pet. i. 5). And also: "Grow in grace and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ" (iii. 18). Paul follows the same sequence: "After I heard of your faith . . . . . I pray . . . . . may give unto you a spirit of wisdom and revelation in the knowledge of Him . . . . . that ye may know" (Eph. i. 15-23). So, in replying to the suggestion of Rom. vi. 1, the apostle asks: "Are you ignorant, that so many of us were baptized into Jesus Christ, were baptized into His death?" Ignorance of that basic fact will rob the believer of the remotest chance of reigning in life. Without that knowledge the usurper will still claim his dues, even though they are claimed wrongfully.

The apostle uses the word "ignorant" several times in Romans, and in each instance we find that ignorance leads to trouble and misunderstanding (Rom. i. 13-16). Ignorance of the apostle's attempts to visit Rome seems to have led to a suspicion that he was not quite prepared to preach the gospel "at Rome also", and that he was somewhat ashamed of the gospel when he considered the magnificence of Rome. This suggestion he entirely dispels.

Ignorance of the fact that the goodness of God leads to repentance made some despise the longsuffering and forbearance of God, and erroneously conclude that "wrath" could have no place with Him (Rom. ii. 4-11). The apostle, dealing with the important fact that death ends the jurisdiction of Mosaic law, asks, "Are you ignorant, brethren, how that the law hath dominion over a man as long as he liveth?" (Rom. vii. 1). The Hebrew believers were timid in breaking free from the dominion of the law, and the apostle uses the figure of marriage to show them their true position. Israel had a zeal of God, but not according to knowledge, for they were ignorant of God's righteousness, and so remained under the delusion that by their own efforts they could produce a righteousness acceptable before God (Rom. x. 3). Ignorance of the purpose of God regarding the future restoration of Israel would have led the Gentile believers into a false conception of their place in the scheme of things during the Acts period. They are shown in Rom. xi. 25 that the full Gentile dispensation had not then commenced. In connection with the repudiation of the old man with which Rom. vi. deals, the apostle in Col. iii. 9, 10 says:--

> "Ye have put off the old man with his deeds, and have put on the new man, which is renewed in knowledge after the image of Him that created him."

Adam's fall was an act of disobedience, seeking knowledge apart from righteousness and apart from God. The history of man, since that tragic moment, has been characterized by an insatiable thirst for knowledge, drinking only to thirst again. Man boasts of his scientific advance; the store of knowledge now at his disposal is immense—yet with all this advance sin abounds, death reigns, evil grows, and the world sinks in decay and ruin.

Those who have been justified by faith and are now "in Christ" have received a renewal of knowledge, linked with a time before the fall, after "the image of Him that created him. They know Christ; they know the truth. As the Lord Himself said:--

> "Ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free" (John viii. 32).
> "If the Son therefore shall make you free, ye shall be free indeed" (John viii. 36).

Rom. vi. contains truth, which, if known, makes free. We shall therefore seek grace from the Lord to enter into this knowledge for ourselves, and also that we may be enabled to pass on this liberating truth to others.

> "Thanks be to God, which giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ" (I Cor. xv. 57).

#33. Rom. v. 12 - viii. 39.
Key-words: The body.
pp. 204 - 208

The doctrine of Rom. v.-viii. is so vital to the subsequent teaching of the epistles of the mystery, that we feel that every reasonable avenue must be explored that will yield fuller and more accurate knowledge of the mind of the Spirit on this subject. Among the subjects that by their frequency of occurrence and important bearing claim individual attention are the following:--

THE BODY; THE MEMBERS; THE MIND; THE SPIRIT; THE FLESH, AND LIFE.

Let us concentrate our attention for the moment upon the usage of the word "body", for around this revolves much vital truth, and associated with it has sprung up a great deal of false teaching.

When the epistle is being considered in the ordinary course of exposition we shall receive instruction upon many vexed questions that relate to the body. For the moment we are rather surveying the material, noticing what we may of its teaching in general, in order to gather any light that may be shed upon the theme by the distribution of the words, and the correspondence of passages.

Reading through the section Rom. v. 12 - viii. 39 we find the body of the believer mentioned seven times, and the body of Christ, as the representative of His people, once. As we consider these eight occurrences more closely, we observe that the body is called "mortal" twice, and that the verb, which strictly means, "put to death", is also used twice. We are sufficiently acquainted with the wonderful structural basis of all Scripture to regard these features as aids to our understanding, and when these corresponding passages are placed in their proper position the following structure results:--

The eight references to the body.
Rom. v. 12 - viii. 39.

A | vi. 6. The body of sin made inoperative.
  B | vi. 12. Let not sin reign in your mortal body.
    C | vii. 4. Put to death to the law by the body of Christ.
      D | vii. 24. Who shall deliver me from this body of death?
A | viii. 10. The body indeed is dead by reason of sin.
  B | viii. 11. He shall quicken your mortal bodies.
    C | viii. 13. If ye through the Spirit do put to death the deeds of the body.
      D | viii. 23. Waiting for the adoption, the redemption of our body.

As we contemplate this handiwork of God, as we begin to realize the marvels of inspiration, as we contemplate the progress of truth indicated here, from the cross to resurrection glory, from the crucifixion of the old man to the redemption of the body, the study becomes a sanctuary and we pause in our investigations to bow the head in silent praise.

A few remarks upon the bearing of these related members is all that is called for here. Let us compare the first two corresponding members, A, A (Rom. vi. 6 & viii. 10):--

> "Knowing this, that our old man is crucified with Him, that the body of sin might be made inoperative, that henceforth we should not be enslaved to sin" (vi. 6).

Here what is most stressed is the negative side of the truth: the old man crucified, the body of sin rendered inoperative, the negation of sin's service. The negative side of truth, however, is not sufficient. The putting off of the old man must be completed by the putting on of the new; the powerlessness of the body of sin requires the inflow of a new energy; the emancipation from sin's slavery must be followed by the opening up of a spiritual sphere if life is to be operative. So, in the corresponding member, the apostle continues:--

> "So then, they that are in the flesh cannot please God. But ye are not in the flesh, but in the Spirit, if so be that the Spirit of God dwell in you. Now if any man have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of His. But if Christ be in you the body indeed is dead by reason of sin, but the Spirit is life by reason of righteousness" (viii. 8-10).

Here we have not only the negative but the positive side. It is still taught that the body is dead by reason of sin, but if Christ be in us, if the Spirit of God dwell in us, that Spirit is life by reason of righteousness, the righteousness of God in Christ, apart from which we are hopeless and undone.

The same lesson from another angle awaits us in the next pair of references, B, B:--

> First the Negative.—"Let not sin therefore reign in your mortal body, that ye should obey it in the lusts thereof" (vi. 12).
>
> Then the Positive.—"But if the Spirit of Him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, He that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies by His Spirit that dwelleth in you" (viii. 11).

In both passages the mortal body is in view. Mortality is not put off at conversion. The body, still mortal, may be delivered from the reign of sin and obedience to its lusts, and the body, still mortal, may be quickened by the Spirit of the risen Lord. Whatever ambiguity some may find in Rom. viii. 11, causing them to hesitate in applying this truth to the present time, there is no ambiguity in Gal. ii. 20:--

> "Christ liveth in me . . . . . the life I now live in the flesh."

The words, "I now live in the flesh", admit of no alternative interpretation. The doctrine of the quickening of the mortal body has been mishandled by most of the "healing" cults, but this does not justify us in modifying it in the opposite direction out of fear or protest. We still need the truth, and need it all.

"Let not sin reign" must be followed by "He shall quicken", for just as the reign of sin ends in death, so grace reigns through righteousness unto life.

The third pair of passages (C, C) are linked together by the recurrence of the verb that means "to put to death".

> "Wherefore my brethren, ye also have been put to death to the law by the body of Christ, that ye should be married to another, even Him Who is raised from the dead, that we should bring forth fruit unto God" (vii. 4).
> "For if ye live after the flesh, ye shall die; but if ye through the Spirit do put to death the deeds of the body, ye shall live" (viii. 13).

Here we have set before us two aspects of a tremendous subject, and too much importance cannot be placed upon the verbs used. In vii. 4 the verb is passive; in viii. 13 it is active. We ourselves were put to death to law and to sin in the body of Christ our Representative. In this we had no part; all was accomplished for us, and all by grace. The active verb is used when the subject is the "deeds" of the body, not the believer himself. The one is the outworking of the other.

There are many of the Lord's people who are distressed almost to the verge of insanity, because they have been taught that they must crucify themselves—a doctrine quite contrary to Scripture, and, if true, rendering the crucifixion of Christ for us vain. What we are to do, as a result of His death and resurrection and the emancipation they have brought to us, is to put to death the "deeds" of the body; and this, not by crucifixion, but "through the Spirit", the Spirit of resurrection. The cross deals with the old man; but the new man has to do with the risen Christ.

The fourth pair of passages (D, D) completes the series. The first passage plumbs the depths of despair; the second is radiant with the hope of glory:--

> "O wretched man that I am! Who shall deliver me from this body of death?" (vii. 24).

In answer comes the passage in the next chapter:--

> "We groan within ourselves, waiting for the adoption, namely, the redemption of our body" (viii. 23).

This is the great lesson of the section. The body of sin may be rendered inoperative, but there is no teaching that suggests it can be improved or altered. Sin need no longer reign in this mortal body, but nothing less than actual resurrection will ever enable the Christian to "put on immortality". The quickening of the mortal body here, by reason of union with the risen Christ, does not in any sense remove the absolute necessity for resurrection. Though we may have been put to death to law in the body of our great Representative, there will ever be the need to put to death the deeds of the body while in this life. There is no deliverance, no escape except by the one way—"the redemption of the body". Just as, rightly understood, redemption in its prior evangelical sense is quite incompatible with mere reform, improvement or development, so this second redemption of the body precludes all idea of improving or the divesting of this present mortal body. It remains mortal even after salvation. The "outward man" of Paul was perishing, like that of the ungodly.

We do not find substantiation in Scripture for the claims of the various cults of healing. Rather are we told that true, full and complete deliverance from "this body of death" will only realized at the true adoption, the redemption of the body. The most effective anticipation of that blessed day of emancipation we may gather from the apostle's words: "the Spirit of adoption"; "the Spirit of Him that raised up Jesus from the dead"; "the life I now live in the flesh, I live by the faith of the Son of God, Who loved me and gave Himself for me" (Gal. ii. 20).

Nothing deeper or fuller than a survey of the subject has been attempted in this article, yet we already have a sense of rest and satisfaction in the bare contemplation of the completeness of the material and its onward movement to resurrection glory. This we trust will deepen and grow as the other key-passage are considered.

or
Holiness, without which no man shall see the Lord.

#1. The defilement of death.
pp. 181 - 185

However diverse the manifestations of sin may be, they may be ranged under two main heads. Under the first, sin is regarded as a crime; its penalty is condemnation and death. The figures used in this connection suggest a court of law; we read of judge and advocate, and the sinner may either be condemned or acquitted. The only possible hope is the gift of righteousness proclaimed in the gospel; and the epistle to the Romans with its doctrine of justification is God's gracious means of meeting the case.

In the second aspect of the question sin is viewed as defilement, and the sinner as unclean. The atmospheres is not so much that of a court of law as of a temple. In place of justification, sanctification and cleansing are the terms used, and the subject is considered most fully in the epistle to the Hebrews. Having said so much we must add as a corrective that we are speaking only in general terms; sanctification is not absent from Romans, nor righteousness from Hebrews.

One way in which the various view-points of the books of Scripture may be discovered is by observing the occurrences of distinctive words. Let us notice the way in which hagiazo, "to sanctify" occurs in Romans and in Hebrews. The only occurrence in Romans is in xv. 16:--

> "That I should be the minister of Jesus Christ to the Gentiles, ministering the gospel of God, that the offering up of the Gentiles might be acceptable, being sanctified by the Holy Ghost."

This aspect of sanctification is dispensational, not individual. Once, the Gentiles, as such, were "far off", "common and unclean" (Acts x. 28). The ministry of reconciliation had made the offering up of the Gentiles as acceptable as that of the circumcision. This is a sanctification by the Holy Ghost.

This aspect is absent from Hebrews, where we find sanctification is always connected with the offering of Christ. It is significant that hagiazo occurs seven times in Hebrews, a usual number of occurrences when a word is of importance in a particular book.

Hagiazõ in Hebrews.

A | ii. 11. Jesus, one with His brethren (two occurrences).
B | ix. 13. The blood of bulls and goats.
C | x. 10. The offering of the body of Jesus Christ.
C | x. 14. The one offering that perfects the sanctified.
B | x. 29. The blood of the covenant.
A | xiii. 12. Jesus, one with His people.

Let us consider each of these passages. The first stresses the oneness of Him that sanctifies with those that are sanctified—"He is not ashamed to call them brethren". He partook of flesh and blood and died to deliver them from the bondage of sin and death. "In all things it behoved Him to be made like unto His brethren, that He might be a merciful and faithful High Priest in things pertaining to God, to make expiation for the sin of the people. For in that He Himself hath suffered being tempted, He is able to succour them that are tempted" (Heb. ii. 17, 18). Sanctification, here, is associated with priesthood and expiation, with the Lord's present life at the right hand of God, and with the temptations of a wilderness journey. It is a personal aspect quite different from that of Rom. xv.

The last reference, that of Heb. xiii. 12, directs our attention not so much to the holiest of all, but to the place of the sin offering—"without the gate", indicating that true practical sanctification involves separation, leading us "without the camp" unto Him. In the first reference, He succours us from the throne; in the last, we bear His reproach outside the camp.

We shall find upon examination that the references that are placed between the two extreme members of the structure supplement and expand the teaching already given. This is one of the characteristics common to most structures. A doctrine is stated, and then elaborated, the central references reaching a climax. The original subject is reintroduced with the increased light thrown upon it, and the record is then complete. This sequence is followed here. The basic doctrine of sanctification is evidently concerned with "oneness", or, to use another term, "identification". This oneness is not merely true by virtue of incarnation, although that is included, but it is essentially a oneness in the matter of sacrificial death.

The first of the intervening references takes us back to the O.T. types, and tells us that the O.T. sanctification was "unto the purifying of the flesh", whereas the antitypical sanctification accomplished by the blood of Christ "purged the conscience from dead works". We shall find in this passage further light upon members A and A of the structure, that may not be evident at first sight. The O.T. type is explained in detail in Num. xix., where we read that the ashes of an heifer were to be gathered and laid up "without the camp" in a clean place, and kept as "a water of separation". We need no further comment upon the expression of Heb. xiii. 13—"without the camp"; it is adequately supplied here, and with direct reference to sanctification. The antitypical sanctification of Hebrews is concerned with the purging of the conscience from "dead works", a clear reference to Num. xix. 9-16, where defilement is contracted by contact with a dead body, a bone or a grave.

We have now gained fuller light upon Heb. ii. That sanctification which is "all of one" necessitated that the Lord partake with His brethren of "flesh and blood", with the one great object:--

"That through DEATH He might destroy him that had the power of DEATH, that is the devil; and deliver those through fear of DEATH were held in bondage" (Heb. ii. 14, 15).

Heb. ii. thus illuminated is seen to be closely allied to the teaching of Rom. vi. It is death, brought in by sin, that corrupts and defiles. Sin needs justification; and death, sanctification. So in Rom. vi.-viii. we read:--

"Death hath no more dominion over Him" (Rom. vi. 9).
"The law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus hath made me free from the law of sin and death" (Rom. viii. 2).

The different view-point of Romans is seen in chapter vi. of this epistle, where the basis for sanctification is set forth as righteousness. Romans lays the foundation preparatory to the second phase of the believer's full acceptance:--

"As ye have yielded your members servants to uncleanness and iniquity unto iniquity; even so now yield your members servants to righteousness unto holiness . . . . . your fruit unto holiness" (Rom. vi. 19 and 22).

While the whole work of grace—justification, sanctification and acceptance—was all accomplished in the one offering of the Lord Jesus Christ, the experimental order and the order of revelation is that suggested by Rom. vi. 19: "Righteousness unto holiness." First justification, then sanctification. First the fact that Christ died for the ungodly; then the fact that, when He died, His people died with Him.

The essential connection between sanctification and union with Christ we hope to consider in another article; for the present we must continue the survey of "sanctification" in Hebrews.

Heb. x. 10 carries forward the thought of the previous passage where the apostle declares that "It is not possible that the blood of bulls and goats should take away sins" (Heb. ix. 13). When He cometh into the world, He saith: "A body hast Thou prepared Me" (Heb. x. 5). He partook of flesh and blood in this great work of sanctification, and the body which He took was prepared for sacrifice:--

"Through death" (Heb. ii. 14).
"Through the offering of the body of Jesus Christ once for all" (Heb. x. 10).

A glance at Heb. x. 14 will show that the theme of the epistle—"perfection"—is dependent upon sanctification:--

"For by one offering He hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified."

The only remaining reference to sanctification in Hebrews is that of x. 29, shewing that the blood of the covenant sanctifying His people is that wherewith He Himself was sanctified:--

"He that sanctifieth and they that are sanctified are all of one" (Heb. ii. 11).

There are other aspects of sanctification, as for example, the sanctification of the Spirit. There are also various terms such as "cleansing", "purifying", "separation", which must be included in our study. But underlying it all is the sevenfold sanctification of the epistle to the Hebrews, with its insistence upon the identification of the believer with the Lord. The apostle expresses this "oneness" in Rom. vi.: "crucified with"; "dead with"; "buried with"; "raised with". The Christian is identified with the one offering of the Lord, His precious blood, and its complete delivering power from the defilement of death.

Rom. v. reveals that by one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin, and that sin and death reign. Romans meets the dominion of sin by justification; Hebrews meets the dominion of death by sanctification. When both sin and death are rendered inoperative, the path is open for progressive and experimental sanctification, in obedience to the exhortation to go on unto perfection.

Here we must stay. Further aspects of this important subject we reserve for future articles.

#2. Separation, the underlying idea of sanctification.
pp. 208 - 211

Our first article was intended to quicken the interest of the reader in this important phase of redemption, and we now take up the teaching of Scripture on the subject a little more systematically.

Before we deal even with types and shadows, we must seek to determine the primary or underlying meaning of the words that are used in Scripture to express holiness and sanctification. We are prepared from a reading of the epistle to the Hebrews to learn that the ceremonial law governing the Levitical economy was designed visibly to set forth the moral and spiritual qualities of holiness in images. We therefore turn to the Old Testament Scriptures. We find, as we should expect, that the main teaching concerning holiness begins with the book of Exodus, but there is one isolated yet important occurrence of the word "sanctify" (Hebrew qadesh) in the book of Genesis that throws light upon the intrinsic meaning of which we are in search:--

> "And God blessed the seventh day and sanctified it: because that in it He had rested from all His work which God created and made" (Gen. ii. 3).

One day of twenty-four hours cannot differ intrinsically from another day of twenty-four hours because it is the seventh of a series. The seventh day received a special sanctity because it was signally marked off from the preceding six days of the creation week, and was accordingly set apart by God as specially associated with Himself.

As a result of the revelation of the Scriptures, we now rightly understand sanctification and holiness as involving moral and spiritual qualities, but we have first to learn that its primary meaning was that of separation to some specific purpose, whether good or evil. This statement, especially the suggestion that evil as well as good finds a place in the primary conception of sanctification, may seem very strange; and we must not delay an explanation.

We have given the one reference in Genesis of qadesh, translated "sanctify", and though the subject may be disagreeable, we must give the only other occurrences of the word as an aid to the understanding of its basic meaning. The next occurrence to be considered is in Gen. xxxviii. 21, 22, where the noun form, qedeshah, is translated "harlot". The reader may well ask in what possible way the sanctifying of the seventh day can be associated with immorality. The answer is that these two apparently opposing passages have in common some special element of separation. By referring to I Kings xiv. 24, xv. 12, and Hos. iv. 14, with the knowledge that these vile names are but substantives derived from the verb "to sanctify", it will be realized that the underlying idea of the Hebrew word is that of separation to any person or service, whether in itself good or bad.

We may trace this idea of separation in other connections by referring to one or two other usages. For example, the words of the Lord to Israel in Lev. xx. 24-26:--

> "I am the Lord your God which have separated you from other people . . . . . And ye shall be holy unto Me, for I the Lord am holy and have severed you from other people, that ye should be Mine."

Again, by comparing Deut. xix. 2 with Josh. xx. 7 the same relationship is exhibited:--

> "Thou shalt separate three cities for thee in the midst of the land" (Deut. xix. 2).
> "And they appointed (Margin: Heb. sanctified) Kedesh in Galilee" (Josh. xx. 7).

The translators of the LXX version have boldly translated the Hebrew qadesh in this verse by the Greek diasteilan, "they severed".

In Gal. i. 15, where Paul appears to allude to Jer. i. 5, he uses aphorizein, "to separate", as an equivalent for the qadesh of Jer. i. 5. When the Lord in this passage speaks of Jeremiah being sanctified from before his birth, there is no suggestion that Jeremiah was thereby cleansed from the pollution of sin that belongs to all until redeemed, but rather that the Lord had separated him to this work to which in His own time He called him.

In Numb. iii. 13 God is said to have hallowed all the firstborn in Israel, both of man and beast, unto Himself. There is the possibility of reading into the "hallowing" of the sons of men some moral significance, but this is impossible in the case of the animals—the firstling of a sheep, though "hallowed", could not experience any moral sanctification. The primary significance is still that of separation for and to some special purpose.

The Hebrew words chol and chalal, "profane" and "to profane, make common or pollute", are used in opposition to qadesh—an opposition which gives further light upon the underlying meaning of sanctification:--

> "Her priests have violated My law, and have profaned Mine holy things: they have put no difference between the holy and the profane, neither have they showed difference between the unclean and the clean, and I am profaned among them" (Ezek. xxii. 26).
> "It had a wall round about . . . . . to make a separation between the sanctuary and the profane place" (Ezek. xlii. 20).

By referring to Ezek. xlviii. 15 it will be seen that the word "profane" need not necessarily imply evil, for the very city planned by God Himself is to have a "profane" place, where dwelling-houses can be erected.

A rather obscure passage in Deut. xxviii. 30 will show how the people of Israel understood the words "holy" and "profane":--

> "Thou shalt plant a vineyard, and shalt not gather the grapes thereof."

The margin explains that the word "gather" is really "profane". Now this can have no morally evil meaning here, for in Deut. xx. 6 a man who has not eaten or "profaned" the fruit of his vineyard is sent back from the battle in order that he may do so. Taken alone, these passages would present a real and almost insuperable difficulty; but, in the light of the law in Lev. xix. 23-25, the difficulty disappears:--

> "When ye shall come into the land, and shall have planted all manner of trees for food, then ye shall count the fruit thereof as uncircumcised; three years shall it be as uncircumcised unto you; it shall not be eaten of. But in the fourth year all the fruit thereof shall be holy to praise the Lord withal. And in the fifth year shall ye eat of the fruit thereof."

We will conclude this article with one more reference, showing how the word "holy" is associated with the idea of separation:--

> "The people of Israel, and the priests, and the Levites, have not separated themselves from the people of the land . . . . . for they have taken of their daughters for themselves, and for their sons; so that the holy seed have mingled themselves with the people of those lands" (Ezra ix. 1, 2).

"Mingling" is the antithesis of "separation", and separation is the basic significance of sanctification and holiness.

There are further aspects of the truth of sanctification to be considered, but these must be reserved for future studies.

The volume of the Book.

#5. The canon of the O.T.
pp. 7 - 12

The testimony of the Lord Jesus Christ to the Old Testament Scriptures as a whole, and to their various parts, is the supreme witness that the church has or needs. Without diminishing that supreme authority, it may be helpful if we enquire into the evidences we possess of the canonicity of the Old and New Testaments.

The word "canon", from the Greek word kanon, in its primary sense means a "reed", thence a "cane", a "cannon", and the "canon". Each derived word is related to the idea of something straight; hence "canon" comes to mean "rule", and is so translated in Gal. iv. 16 and Phil. iii. 16. When we speak of canon of scripture we therefore mean those sacred books which are genuine, authentic and authoritative. It may be as well to see clearly the distinction, between these three related terms.

Genuine.—A book is genuine if it was actually written by the person whose name it bears, or, if anonymous, if it contains evidence that it was written at the time when it purports to have been written, either expressly or by undersigned evidence of its contents.

Authentic.—A book is authentic if the matters of fact with which it deals actually occurred.

Authoritative.—In the case of the Scriptures, by their very nature, if they are both genuine and authentic, they necessarily become authoritative.

Now a book may be genuine but not authentic as, for instance, Gulliver's Travels by Dean Swift. There is no doubt as to its genuineness, but no one believes that the events described by Dean Swift ever occurred. A book may be authentic without being genuine, that is, it may contain actual facts, but be written by a person pretending to be another, and in another age. If, however, it is established that Moses wrote the books of the law, and if it be established further that the things recorded actually took place, then the very nature of the books, once so proved, makes them of supreme authority. Matters of fact such as these depend for their proof upon external and internal evidences, the external evidence being the testimony of witnesses; the internal, the evidence of language, style, reflected colour, etc.

At the time of Christ the canon of the O.T. was fixed, and we remember how He endorsed its threefold composition when He spoke of "The Law, the Prophets and the Psalms" (Luke xxiv. 44). There is a consistent testimony to this canon of the O.T. extending from the days of Christ to the days of the Prophets. Let us call some of the witnesses.

The witness of Josephus.

Flavius Josephus, a Jew of a distinguished priestly line, was born in A.D.37. He wrote "The Wars of the Jews", "The Antiquities of the Jews", an Autobiography, and a treatise against Apion. The following is the weighty opinion of Bishops Porteous and Scaliger:--

> "The fidelity, the veracity and the probity of Josephus are universally allowed; and Scaliger in particular declares that, not only in the affairs of the Jews, but even of foreign nations, he deserves more credit than all the Greek and Roman writers put together."

Here is the testimony of Josephus concerning the Old Testament Scriptures:--

> "For we have not an innumerable multitude of books among us, disagreeing from and contradicting one another, but only twenty-two books, which contain the records of all the past times; which are justly believed to be divine; and of them, five belong to Moses . . . . . the prophets, who were after Moses, wrote down what was done in their times in thirteen books. The remaining of four books contain Hymns to God, and precepts for the conduct of human life.
> How firmly we have given credit to these books of our own nation is evident by what we do; for during so many ages as have already passed, no one has been so bold as either to add anything to them or take anything from them, or to make any change in them; but it becomes natural to all Jews, immediately, and from their birth, to esteem those books to contain divine doctrines, and to persist in them, and, if occasion be, willing to die for them" (Apion, Bk. 1, Par. 8).

Here is the testimony of a man who most evidently expresses his deep conviction, and not his own only, but that of the national mind as well. We draw attention moreover to the fact that this man, who would sooner die than add to or take away from the sacred Scriptures, declares that the Hebrew canon consists of twenty-two books only. Most readers are aware that the English O.T. contains 39 books, but this is because the twelve minor prophets are reckoned separately, and double books like I and II Chronicles are counted as two. In the Hebrew canon Ruth is reckoned with Judges, Nehemiah with Ezra, Lamentations with Jeremiah, and as we have said, the twelve minor prophets are treated as one.

Some reader may object that The Companion Bible gives in Appendix 1 a list of 24 books of the O.T., but this is only true if Ruth and Lamentations be considered as separate books. Josephus and others deal with the books as they were associated together, and the placing of Ruth and Lamentations with larger books makes the difference.

We would supplement Josephus by one or two other authorities of high standing.

> ORIGEN enumerates the books of the O.T. and says the Hebrew canonical books number "Two and twenty, according to the number of the (Hebrew) Alphabet."

ATHANASIUS says in his synopsis: "Our whole Scripture is divinely inspired, and hath books not infinite in number, but finite, and comprehended in a certain canon. The canonical books of the O.T. are two and twenty, equal in number to the Hebrew letters."

CYRIL OF JERUSALEM says, "Read the divine Scriptures, the two and twenty books."

We could quote others, but what has been cited is surely sufficient. The interested reader will find further confirmation in the writings of Hilary, Nazeanzen, Epiphanius, Ruffinus, Gregory the Great, and Jerome. The value of this testimony will be better understood when we have reviewed the canon of the N.T.

Perhaps it would be well, seeing that we have referred to The Companion Bible Appendix 1, to show that the structural arrangement suggested there remains practically unchanged. We will therefore repeat the "Prophets" and the "Psalms" with the necessary adjustment.

The Prophets.

A | JOSHUA.—"The Lord of all the earth", etc.
B | JUDGES AND RUTH.—"Israel forsaking and returning to God."
C | SAMUEL.—Man's king rejected.
D | KINGS.—Decline and fall under the kings.
D | ISAIAH.—Final blessing under God's king.
C | JEREMIAH AND LAMENTATIONS.—Human kings rejected.
B | EZEKIEL.—God forsaking Israel and returning.
A | THE MINOR PROPHETS.—The Lord of all the earth.

The reader may have observed that the addition of Ruth to Judges is a very blessed confirmation of the description "Israel forsaking and returning to God", and that gain instead of loss is ours by this adjustment.

The Psalms.

A | THE PSALMS.—Praises. God's purposes and counsels.
B | PROVERBS.—Words which govern or rule man's life.
C | JOB.—"The end of the Lord." Shown in Satan's defeat.
D | CANTICLES.—Virtue rewarded. Read at Passover.
E | ECCLESIASTES.—The Preacher. Read at Tabernacles.
D | ESTHER.—Virtue rewarded. Read at Purim.
C | DANIEL.—"God's judgment." Final defeat of Antichrist.
B | EZRA-NEHEMIAH.—"Men who governed God's people.
A | CHRONICLES.—"Words of days." God's purposes and counsels.

It will be noted that the removal of Ruth and Lamentations, lettered respectively E and F in The Companion Bible, makes no difference to the structure as a whole.

We have seen in a previous article that the Lord Jesus Christ accepted this Hebrew canon, and so did also His apostles as may be seen by a perusal of their epistles and recorded speeches. We have moreover the most absolute testimony to the fact that the canon was fixed centuries before Christ.

The book of Ecclesiasticus was written in Syro-Chaldaic about A.M.3772, or two hundred and thirty-two years before Christ, and was translated by the author's grandson into Greek. In the prologue he speaks of his grandfather giving himself to the reading of "the law, and the prophets, and the other books of our fathers", which is sufficient proof that such a recognized collection of sacred books then existed.

We have, however, a more ancient and reliable witness than the son of Sirach, viz., the testimony of the Septuagint Version. We hope to devote at least one article to this version and its value—we may have to write a series—so that we will not go into details and dates here. Speaking roughly, 280 years before Christ the Greek version of the O.T Scriptures, known to us as the Septuagint, was complete, and the books there translated are identical with our own O.T. We are so accustomed to handling this book that its extreme antiquity is lost upon us.

Let is be remembered that there is no evidence for any other ancient book that approaches the evidence that we posses of the genuineness and authority of the books of the Bible. There is no authentic book that goes back as far as the books of the O.T.

Such is, in brief, the external witness to the O.T. canon. On the other hand, the witness of language, allusions to manners and customs, times and circumstances, form a vast amount of internal evidence, alike too important and too extensive for an article like this. When the subject has been reviewed in its main lines, we shall hope to return to these internal evidences and study them separately. Meanwhile, we leave the O.T. and the subject of its canonicity, in order to provide the reader with a similar survey of the equivalent evidence we possess in regard to the N.T. This we hope to do in our next article.

The following analysis of the way in which the O.T. writers and books are quoted in the N.T. may form a useful appendix to this article, although the important subject of O.T. quotation in the N.T. must await its turn in the order of our studies.

In the Gospels the Lord quotes all the books of Moses. He quotes several of the Psalms, and the prophets Isaiah, Jeremiah, Daniel, Hosea, Jonah, Micah, Zechariah and Malachi as Scripture and authoritative. This is, of course, in addition to the references to "the Law", and to "the Scriptures", embracing the whole canon. The Lord does not quote from any of the Apocryphal books.

The Acts quote Genesis, Exodus, Deuteronomy, Samuel, Psalms, Isaiah, Joel, Amos and Habakkuk.

Paul quotes Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Deuteronomy, Joshua, Samuel, Kings, Job, Psalms, Proverbs, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Hosea, Joel, Habakkuk and Haggai.

James quotes Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Kings, Chronicles, Proverbs, Isaiah and Job.

Peter quotes Exodus, Leviticus, Psalms, Proverbs and Isaiah.

The Revelation quotes Genesis, Numbers, Proverbs, Isaiah, Ezekiel, Daniel, Hosea, Joel, Zephaniah and Zechariah.

The manner of quotation, and the fact some quotations agree with the LXX, some with the Hebrew, and some with neither, must be a matter for separate study. We give the above list simply as further evidence in the matter of the O.T. canon.

#6. The canon of the N.T.
pp. 46 - 51

The twenty-seven books that compose the New Testament, written by Matthew, Mark, Luke, John, Paul, James, Peter and Jude, have the uninterrupted testimony of antiquity to their genuineness, and there is absolutely no reason for supposing imposition or fraud. Michaelis says that in the case of the writings of the N.T. the testimony is much stronger than in the case of any other ancient writings, such as Xenophon, Caesar, Tacitus and the like, for the books of the N.T. were addressed to large societies in widely distant parts of the world, in whose presence they were often read, and who acknowledged them as being the autographs of the writers themselves.

We must remember that, unlike other, writings that have come down to us from antiquity, those of the N.T. were read over three quarters of the known world, and that an unbroken succession of writers, from the very age of the apostles to our own time, make continual reference to, or quotation from, the N.T. Scriptures, and further that these writers include not only friends but foes.

One quotation from the writings of Peter makes it very evident that the early church was quite prepared to receive as Scripture the writings of the apostles and prophets, for he speaks of "all the epistles of Paul" (II Pet. iii. 16) and speaks of them as on an equality with "the other Scriptures", which, when we know the mind of the Jew on the matter, is a very great admission. Somewhat similar is the association by Peter of O.T. and N.T. writings as of equal authority when he uses the exhortation:--

> "That ye be mindful of the words which were spoken before by the holy prophets, and of the commandment of us the apostles of the Lord and Saviour" (II Pet. iii. 2).

As Paul had used the term "old covenant" in II Cor. iii. 14, it was quite natural that the writings of the apostles should be known as the "new covenant" (Eusebius H. E. VI. 25), or "The Gospels and the Prophets" (Clement of Alexandria, Ignatius, Justyn Martyr and others), just as Christ spoke of "The Law and the Prophets". Before the close of the second century translations of the N.T. began to be made, and this effectively prevented any alteration, addition, or subtraction, for such a fraud would immediately become known and exposed, unless, indeed, we are credulous enough to believe that both friend and foe, of different nations, languages, and opinions, should all, without exception, and by some tremendous miracle have agreed to countenance such a fraud.

The third edition of the Encyclopaedia Britannica says:--

> "This argument is so strong, that, if we deny the authenticity of the N.T., we may with a thousand times greater propriety reject all the other writings in the world."

Look at the following facts that traverse any legitimate objections to the canonicity of the books of the N.T.:--

(1) It cannot be shown that any one doubted the authenticity of any book of the N.T. in the period when such books appeared.
(2) No account is on record that would lead one to reject any such book as spurious.
(3) No great length of time elapsed after the death of the writers before the N.T. was widely known.
(4) The books of the N.T. are actually mentioned by writers living at the same time as the apostles.
(5) No facts are recorded which actually happened after the deaths of the writers, apart, of course, from prophecy.

Let us now bring forward a few eminent witnesses to the canon of the N.T.

Irenaeus, born A.D.120, calls the books of the N.T., Kanona tes aletheias, "the Rule of the Truth". Tertullian said of Marcion, the Gnostic, that he appeared to make use of a complete document. Clement of Alexandria, speaking of those who quoted from the Apocrypha, exclaims against those who followed any authority besides "the true evangelical canon". Origen was zealous in maintaining the ecclesiastical canon, recognizing "four Gospels only, which alone are received without controversy in the universal church spread over the whole earth". He has given us the list of the canonical Scriptures, "that is Scriptures contained in the New Testament". Athanasius speaks of three sorts of books:--

(1) The canonical, those recognized at the present time.
(2) The ecclesiastical, which were allowed to be read in assemblies.
(3) The apocryphal, which had no place in the canon at all.

When, in A.D.364, the Council of Laodicea ordained that no other book should be read in the churches but the canonical Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments, there was no idea that there they had for the first time the conception of a canon: on that contrary it was the enforcement of a principle already established in the church.

We will now consider a little more carefully the witness of three of those cited above, Irenaeus, Clement of Alexandria and Tertullian. First of all, in order that these names may represent to the reader real persons, we give a brief biographical note:-- IRENAEUS (A.D.120-202).—Born in Smyrna, educated under Polycarp, who knew the apostle John personally. He became Bishop of Lyons in 177, and his writings make a folio volume of about 500 pages. He was martyred under Serverus.

CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA (A.D.150-215).—Became master of the Catechetical School at Alexandria in 190.

TERTULLIAN (A.D.155-230).—A Roman, born at Carthage. His writings fill a large folio. Vincentius said, "What Origen was for the Greeks, that is to say first of all, Tertullian has been for the Latins, that is to say incontestably the first among us."

These three men, representing three great areas, Greek, Coptic and Latin, are witnesses that cannot be denied.

The testimony of Irenaeus.—Irenaeus is the most voluminous of all ancient writers who quote the N.T. Scriptures. The N.T. could almost be reconstructed from his works, so full are his citations. He was born only seventeen years after the death of the apostle John. No amount of extracts or lists of quotations can give the same effect as the perusal of a few pages of this man's writings. Many of his citations are without reference, as, for example, the following:--

"For in that blessed dwelling place, heaven, there will be that distance placed by God Himself between those who have borne fruit, some a hundredfold, some sixty and others thirtyfold, and this is the reason why our Savoiur said, that in His Father's house there are many mansions."

We cannot of course quote Irenaeus, but must be satisfied with a summary. He speaks of the Gospels of Matthew, Mark, Luke and John as "the gospel with the four faces", from which it is evident that there were four, and no more, at the time. He quotes the Acts of the Apostles over sixty times, and shows the harmony of the Acts with Paul's epistles. He cites I Corinthians over 100 times, Romans over eighty times, Ephesians over thirty times, Galatians nearly thirty times, Philippians eleven times, I Peter eleven times, II Thessalonians ten times, I Timothy five times, II Timothy four times, Titus three times, I John three times, and I Thessalonians twice.

Clement of Alexandria.—Clement himself says in the first book of his Stromata that he "approached very near the days of the apostles". Kirchhoper says:--

"Clement, almost in every page, cites passages taken from the New Testament, from all the Gospels, the Acts of the Apostles, each of Paul's epistles, the 1st and 2nd Epistles of John, that of Jude, that of Hebrews, and the Apocalypse."

Tertullian.—Although Tertullian is the latest of these three, he is the most ancient of the Latins whose writings have been preserved. Lardner says of Tertullian:--

"The quotations made by this father alone from the little volume of the New Testament are more extensive and more abundant than those from the works of Cicero by all the writers of all kinds and all ages."

While the testimony of these three men is sufficient to prove that at a very early date the canon of the N.T. was recognized and accepted, it is but a tithe of the witness available. Others of the many more who attest the canonicity of the books of the N.T. are:--

THEOPHILUS, Bishop of Antioch, converted A.D. 150.
ATHENAGORAS, a philosopher of Athens, flourishing A.D.177.
DIONYSIUS, Bishop of Corinth about A.D.170.
ASTERIUS URBANUS, Bishop of Galatia about A.D.188.
IGNATIUS, Bishop of Antioch, died a martyr, A.D.107, and CLEMENT of Rome, died A.D.99.

It is only right to say that every book of the N.T. is not quoted by every writer, nor perhaps by all together. It is easily understandable, for instance, that such an epistle as Philemon or III John should escape, and that not because it was doubtful, but because it may not have served the purpose of the writer, for the strength and beauty of these testimonies is in the unconscious confirmation they give of the canon, the writers having a variety of objects in view, but never the mere presentation of catalogues of books set out for the purpose of proving canonicity. There are such catalogues, and we must include their testimony, but for the present we have seen sufficient.

The importance of the fact that the Hebrew canon numbers twenty-two may now be seen. The number of books in the N.T. is twenty-seven, and thus 22+27 gives us 49, the perfect number, for the complete canon Old and New. Moreover, of this forty-nine there are seven catholic epistles, seven Pauline epistles written before Acts xxviii., seven Pauline epistles written after Acts xxviii., and the book of the Revelation is composed of epistles sent to the seven churches in Asia. We have therefore the great basis of Law, Prophets, Psalms, Gospels and Acts, supporting the seven columns of Epistles, crowned with the sevenfold cornice of the Apocalypse. A temple of truth, complete, perfect, and all of God.

#7. The Apocrypha.
pp. 75 - 78

The word apocrypha is probably derived from apokrupto, “to hide”, and is applied to those books which, though closely associated with the inspired Scriptures, are nevertheless not inspired or canonical writings. There is another possible derivation of the word apocrypha, and that is apo tes kruptes, “away from the crypt, chest or ark” in which were deposited the sacred books of Israel. Whatever the origin of the term, all writers, both ancient and modern, “agree in using it to denote some kind of inferiority to the canonical Scriptures” (Churton).

It may be as well, while we are dealing with the subject of the canon of Scripture, to give the Apocrypha at least a passing glance. At some future time we hope to show the value of these apocryphal writings, and the way their phraseology evidently influenced men like Paul, but this has nothing to do with their inspiration, but is akin to the evident influence of, say, Shakespeare or Bunyan upon a modern writer. Let us look at one or two internal and external evidences.

1. With the exception of Esdras, Judith, Tobit and 1st Maccabees, the apocryphal books were written by Alexandrian Jews in Greek:--

> "It is an historical fact that the Greek language was not known to the Jews until long after the inspiration had ceased, and the canon of the Old Testament was closed" (Horne).

2. In the prophecy of Malachi (iv. 4-6) it is intimated that no prophet would arise until the forerunner of the Messiah, and it is the unanimous testimony of the Jew that the prophetic spirit ceased with Malachi, who is called "The seal of the prophets" in consequence. When the author of the apocryphal book of Wisdom sought acceptance for his work, he pretended that it was written by Solomon. He betrays himself, however, by quoting from Isaiah's prophecy, and by speaking of Israel as being in subjection to their enemies, and further by borrowing expressions from the Grecian games.

3. In very marked contrast with the inspired Scriptures, no writer of the Apocrypha advances in direct terms any claim to inspiration. The son of Sirach in his prologue to Ecclesiasticus asks pardon for any failure to correctly interpret the Hebrew of his grandfather.

In Maccabees iv. 46, ix. 27 and xiv. 41 is an express admission that there was no prophet among them. II Maccabees is an abridgment of five books written by Jason of Cyrene (II Macc. ii. 23), and at the conclusion the writer says:--

> "If I have done well, and as is fitting the story, it is that which I desired; but if slenderly and meanly, it is that which I could attain unto" (xv. 38).

4. The apocryphal books contain many statements that are (a) fabulous, and (b) unscriptural, e.g.:--

(a) FABULOUS STATEMENTS.—The story of Bel and the Dragon is a fiction, and contradicts the plain statement of Dan. vi. The books must be read through to sense this element in them.

(b) UNSCRIPTURAL STATEMENTS.

(i.) Historical inaccuracy.—Baruch is said to have been carried into Babylon at the very time Jeremiah tells us he was carried into Egypt.

The first and second Maccabees contradict one another on a great number of points. Haman, in the apocryphal addition to Esther, is called a Macedonian as well as an Agagite.

(ii.) Doctrinal inaccuracy.—Prayers for the dead, and prayers of the dead, in II Macc. xii. 43, 44, and Baruch iii. 4 are clearly unscriptural. The doctrine of the transmigration of souls is found in Wisdom viii. 19, 20. Almsgiving is said to "deliver from death, and shall purge away all sin" in Tobit xii. 8, 9.

"Atonement for sins" is made by honouring our father, and alms not only saves one's own soul, but gives repentance to one's children. "to forsake unrighteousness is a propitiation" (Ecclesiasticus iii. 3, 30; xvii. 22; xxxv. 3). Magical incantations are introduced into Tobit vi. 16, 17.

Internal evidence is against the inspiration of these apocryphal books:--

> "A book cannot be from God which contains falsehood, or which expressly contradicts doctrines which we know to be from God. The self-evidencing power of the Scriptures attests their divine authority; but the self-contained evidence of the apocryphal books tends to prove that they have not the character of the oracles of God, and have no right place among them" (Dewar).

Josephus, whose testimony we have cited as to the Canon of the O.T. Scriptures, says of the apocryphal books:--

> "It is true, our history has been written since Artaxerxes, very particularly, but hath not been esteemed by our forefathers, because there hath not been a succession of prophets since that time" (Against Apion Bk. i. 8).

While we have hinted at the possible influence of religious phraseology exercised by the Apocrypha upon the writers of the N.T., such influence was largely unconscious. There are no definite quotations from the Apocrypha in the N.T.

Whatever sins may be laid to the charge of Israel one fact remains, that to them were entrusted the oracles of God, and with a jealousy bordering upon fanaticism, and a reverence akin to superstition and idolatry, they have watched over the letter of the Word, even though dead to its spirit. Modern Jewish opinion is the same as ancient Jewish opinion as to the Apocrypha, and interested readers can find these in Thesaurus Philologicus of Hottingeri.

Since the dispersion of Israel, it is utterly impossible to have brought about a universal alteration of the canon, and the testimony of scattered Israel is united in this respect, viz., that the Apocrypha never had a place in the canon.

Without unduly lengthening this article, the testimony of two whose evidence is weighty might be profitably included.

Athanasius (A.D.326).

> "Forasmuch as there are some who have undertaken to compose for themselves books called the apocryphal, and to mingle these with the inspired Scriptures, respecting which we have been fully persuaded, as eye-witnesses and ministers of the Word from the > beginning have delivered to the fathers, it seemed good to me also, being exhorted thereto by my genuine brethren, and having made myself acquainted with the subject, to set forth from the beginning and in due order the canonical books which have been delivered to us, and believed to be divine; so that everyone, if he is led away by deceit, may learn well to know those who have seduced him, while he who remains pure may rejoice in having this admonition again repeated.

>
> All the books of the Old Testament, then, are twenty-two; as many, according to report, as the alphabetical letters of the Hebrews."

Athanasius then gives the books of the Bible as now received with the exception of Esther. No one knows how or why this book was omitted by him.

Jerome, the most eminent of the Latins, divides the Old Testament into three groups, and in summing up says:--

> "Thus, in all, there are twenty-two books of the Old Law: that is five books of Moses; eight of the Prophets, and nine of Hagiographa, though some reckon Ruth and Lamentations among the Hagiographa, and thus make the number twenty-four. This prologue may serve as a helmeted introduction to all the books of Scripture, which we have translated from Hebrew into Latin: so that we may be able to know that whatever is beyond these, is put among the apocryphal books. Therefore Wisdom, which is commonly called Solomon's, and the book of Jesus, the Son of Sirach, and Tobit, and the Shepherd are not in the canon. The first book of Maccabees I have found in Hebrews; the second in Greek, as is evident from its phraseology."

So far we have dealt with the apocryphal writings associated with the O.T.

There are evidences that a great literary activity sprang into being during the apostle's lifetime. In Luke i. 1 reference is made to the many who had taken in hand to write a narrative of the life of Christ. Paul warns the Thessalonians against the possibility of a forged letter (II Thess. ii. 2), so that we are not surprised to find a great number of apocryphal writings associated with the N.T. Into these we do not intend to go further than to say that most of them were published together in 1920 under the title "Apocryphal New Testament", and that their best refutation is for them to be read in conjunction with the N.T.

We conclude this article of quotations with the following from the Eclectic Review, Volume XV.:--

> "We know that the cause of Revelation has already sustained every species of assault which cunning could contrive, or power direct. It has had its enemies among the ignorant and among the learned, among the base and among the noble. Polite irony and vulgar ribaldry have been the weapons of its assailants. It has had its Celsius, and its Porphyry, and its Julian. And what were the effects of their opposition? The same as when the 'rulers and elders and scribes' united against it—its purification and increase."

#8. Some so-called "lost Scriptures".
pp. 87 - 91

The preservation of the Scriptures by the God Who inspired them is self-evident and requires no proof. The fact that to-day, in spite of the most appalling opposition, the Bible remains complete and unbroken is of itself nothing short of a miracle. Is it to be believed that God numbers the hairs of our heads, takes note of even a sparrow's fall, guides the stars in their courses, and works all things according to His purpose, and yet cannot or will not preserve intact the Holy Scriptures?

We have now to consider a supposition that some books of the Scriptures have been lost. The books that various writers have supposed to have been lost are the following:--

The Book of the WARS OF JEHOVAH (Numb. xxi. 14).
The Book of JASHER (Josh. x. 13; II Sam. i. 18).
The Book of GAD (I Chron. xxix. 29).
The Book of NATHAN (I Chron. xxix. 29).
The Book of AHIJAH (II Chron. ix. 29).
The Book of SHEMAIAH (II Chron. xii. 15).
The Book of IDDO (II Chron. xiii. 22).
The Book of the ACTS OF SOLOMON (I Kings xi. 41).
The Epistle to LAODICEA (Col. iv. 16).
An Epistle to the CORINTHIANS (I Cor. v. 9).

We are not concerned with the many suggestions profferred by Rabbis and commentators concerning these books. The Book of the Wars of Jehovah may be, as Aben Ezra suggested, the Book of Numbers. The Book of Jasher ("The Right") may be the book of the law, as the Targums teach. All this is beside the point. Are we to believe that Moses wrote nothing besides the Pentateuch? Did David never pen a line beyond the Psalms that bear his name? Did Isaiah write nothing in addition to his prophecy? There is no ground for such an assumption. John, in concluding his record of the earthly life of Christ, tells us that if all the things that the Lord did were recorded, the world would not hold the books that must be written. And there is no reason to suppose that every book written by apostle or prophet was included in the great revelation of the purpose of the ages. The Book of the Wars of the Lord may have had much in it to guide Joshua and the kings of Israel, but it may not have been of any lasting service to the churches of all ages. The histories of Israel's kings contained much that was of no value and, though recorded by Gad, Nathan, Iddo and others, they were not intended to be part of the sacred Canon of Scripture written for our learning.

We must now consider the reference in Col. iv. 16 to the epistle to Laodicea. Let us observe exactly what is written:-- > "And when this epistle is read among you, cause that it be read also in the church of the Laodiceans, and that ye likewise read the epistle from Laodicea."

All that we may legitimately infer from this passage is that the apostle urged an exchange of letters. It is pure assumption to say that the epistle from Laodicea was that known to us as the epistle "to the Ephesians". It may have been so, for some copies contain no name and suggest that the letter was copied and sent to several churches, but the suggestion is simply a theory without foundation. All we can say is that the Laodiceans had a letter, presumably from Paul, which would have been helpful to the Colossians. In the same chapter we read that Tychicus would tell the Colossians of Paul's state (iv. 7), information most interesting and necessary for Colosse, but of no lasting service for the church of all time. So we have not only an epistle that was never preserved as a part of "all Scripture", but many oral messages that were never recorded. The reader will call to mind other statements, such as that in II Thess. ii. 5:--

> "Remember ye not, that, when I was yet with you, I told you these things?"

But God has not seen fit to place these things on record. In Heb. ix. 5 the apostle, speaking of the ark and the cherubim, says:--

> "And over it the cherubim of glory shadowing the mercy seat; of which we cannot now speak particularly."

While we may entertain the thought that we should value the apostle's opening up of the meaning of the cherubim, God has not seen fit to allow him to go further with the subject. None of these things are "lost"; they were never included in the Canon and consequently have gone the way of all the earth.

It is worthy of remark that the actual statement of Col. iv. 16 is "the epistle from Loadicea", ten ek Laodikeias, which, according to Calim, was "an epistle which had been sent from Laodicea to Paul, and which he thought it desirable to be read by the Colossians". The considered opinion of such a scholar as Calim cannot be lightly brushed aside, and if this be the true meaning of the apostle, it destroys the last shred of argument in favour of the suggestion we have been considering, and Col. iv. 16 does not refer to an epistle that has been "unfortunately lost".

Another epistle that is said to have been lost is one sent to the Corinthians. Before examining the passage, we may remark that what has been said above applies equally here. Supposing the apostle did write an epistle to the Corinthian church, before that which we call "The first Epistle to the Corinthians", this would not mean that a book of the sacred Canon had been lost, for we have no reason to believe that such an epistle was ever included. That the Corinthians were acquainted with some of Paul's "epistles" (hai epistolai) II Cor. x. 10 shows, but as to how many they were, or to whom addressed, nothing is clearly related. The passage under consideration is I Cor. v. 9-11:--

> "I wrote unto you in an epistle . . . . . but now I have written unto you . . . . ."

Before we can deal justly with this statement, we must be more accurate in our translation. For example, the English reader would assume that "I wrote" in verse 9, and "I have written" in verse 11, represent two tenses of the verb, but this is not so. The verb is identically the same in both verses, being in each case the Aorist, egrapsa. So, therefore, no argument that is built upon the difference between "I wrote" and "I have written" is of any value. Further, the A.V. is vague—"I wrote unto you in an epistle." This also is an incorrect translation, en te epistole being strictly, "in the epistle", and, as we will show immediately, meaning "in this epistle". In four other passages the translators have so understood the article:--

> "I, Tertius, who wrote this epistle" (Rom. xvi. 32).
> "And when this epistle is read" (Col. iv. 16).
> "I charge you that this epistle be read" (I Thess. v. 27).
> "If any many obey not our word by this epistle" (II Thess. iii. 14).

The apostle's words in I Cor. v. 9-11 are therefore as follows: "I have written* unto you in this epistle not to company with fornicators."

This is evident from the first four verses of the same chapter. The apostle feels, however, that he must draw attention to what he does not teach lest the Corinthians should be led to a totally impracticable conclusion. He says, in effect, My strong denunciation of this sin, and the necessity that you should keep yourselves from contact with those who practice it, may lead some of you to withdraw from all the relationships of daily life. If this is to be, then "you must needs go out of the world". Let me, therefore, repeat what I have already said: "But now I have written to you not to company with any one named a brother" if he be guilty of these things, no not so much as to eat with him. But this rule of conduct applies only to the church, and not to the outside world:--

> "For what have I to do to judge them that are without? ('also' omitted in Vat. MSS). Do not you judge them that are within? But them that are without God judgeth. Therefore put out the wicked person from among yourselves."

The use of egrapsa, the Aorist, in the sense of something just written, can be seen in I Cor. ix. 15, II Cor. ii. 3, Gal. vi. 11, Eph. iii. 3, and Philemon 19, 21.

It is not to be imagined that the apostle, upon whom came the burden of all the churches, did not write countless epistles beside the fourteen that are found in the N.T., but, as Calim says:--

> "The Lord has by His providence consecrated as a perpetual memorial those which He knew were necessary for His church; and, however little there may be, this was not a matter of chance, but by the wonderful counsel of God the volume of the Scripture has been formed as we have it."

[* -- The use of the English Perfect for the Aorist is allowable in many instances, but the whole question of the true translation of this most important tense still awaits further and fuller research.]

No record is given of much that the Lord said to Moses and the prophets. Hardly anything is recorded of the forty days' ministry of the Lord after the resurrection (Luke xxiv. and Acts i.). The ministry of Paul covers about thirty years; that of Isaiah sixty, and that of Daniel about ninety. It would be a poor estimate of the ability of these writers to regard their total literary output as limited to what is found in the Bible.

I Kings iv. 32 tells us that Solomon spake three thousand proverbs. The most liberal computation will not include more than nine hundred proverbs in the whole book of that name, and of this number Solomon is the author of about six hundred. The remaining proverbs spoken by Solomon may have been very wise sayings, but were of no permanent value and were never given by inspiration of God to be included in the Canon of Scripture. Solomon also wrote one thousand and five songs, but of these only two have been placed in the Canon—The Song of Songs, which is Solomon's, and Psa. cxxvii. preserved most probably by Hezekiah.

As further evidence concerning the integrity of the Canon of Scripture, consider that from the days of Moses until the present day, a period of over three thousand years, in spite of the most appalling judgments and dispersions of Israel, nothing has prevented the steady growth of the sacred oracles among them, and nothing has ever induced them to add to, take away from, or to transpose anything in them. When "the seal of the prophets", Malachi, had uttered his message, about four hundred years before Christ, the completed Scriptures were then what they have ever since been, one unbroken and perfect whole, the thirty-nine books of the English version. Whether in Alexandria, in Greece, in Babylon, or in Rome, all Israel gives one testimony. We are confident that He Who watched over Israel, watches over His Word, and that not a jot or tittle of inspired truth has ever been, or ever can be lost.

#9. The transmission of the text.
pp. 116 - 119

We have briefly considered the claims of the Scriptures to inspiration, and have also indicated the grounds we have for accepting, as truly canonical, all and only those books which are now contained in the collection known as the Bible. Here we might leave the matter, but such a treasure as the very Word of God is an abiding source of delight, and teems with points of interest that cannot but be attractive to every believer. Consequently we hope to pursue some profitable by-paths in Bible knowledge; and in this article we take up the question of the way in which the text of the original has been preserved, and of the means we have of arriving at a conclusion upon the matter.

When the student of Scripture takes up his Bible, he will not read far before he comes across a marginal note to the effect that, "Some ancient authorities read ---" It is natural to ask who these ancient authorities are, and how it comes about that there are alternative readings. These questions we will endeavour to answer.

Before the invention of printing, every book, of necessity, was written by hand. This manuscript work, however, faithfully undertaken, becomes, in time, partly automatic, and slight errors are bound to occur. When we remember that, in some cases, the scribe was a poor, badly educated believer, making his copy in secret, under the shadow of possible apprehension and martyrdom, we can understand how the possibilities of error in transcription were multiplied. Yet, if the reader will but think for a moment, none of these errors need prevent him from understanding what was the original text. Suppose this present article were given to twenty different persons, of all grades of education and appreciation of the subject-matter to copy. It is possible that not one copy would be absolutely free from some typographical fault; yet, though every copy should contain errors, a careful examination of them all would enable any judicious reader to discover the original text, for it is certain that where, say, five would make the same mistake, the other fifteen would correct it.

We shall find that the mistakes of transcription fall into several clearly defined groups. Sometimes it is but a matter of spelling, that leaves the sense unimpaired. Often it is the result of two lines of the manuscript ending with the same word. The eye of the copyist falls upon the second line instead of the first, so that the whole line is omitted; or the process may be reversed, and the whole line repeated. Again, this is not a serious matter, and is easily corrected by comparison with other manuscripts.

Errors that are more difficult to deal with are those which are not mechanical, as are the above instances, but mental. Something goes on in the copyist's mind which we cannot know, and in a momentary lapse a wrong word is inserted. A very common form of this error is the alteration of a passage to one that is remembered in another part of the book. For example, the words of Luke vi. 48 in the A.V. are identical with those of the parallel passage in Matt. vii. 25: "For it was founded upon a rock." The reader of any critical Greek testament, however, will observe that Tischendorf and Tragelles found sufficient evidence to warrant the reading, "Because it had been well builded", which is the reading adopted by the R.V. There is every likelihood that those MSS of Luke vi 48 that agree with Matt. vii. 25 were written by a scribe whose mind retained the earlier reading although his eye read what the R.V. has in the text. The most serious of all modifications, of course, is intentional alteration, but the fact that copies of the Scriptures were multiplied all over the earth, and were connected with differing schools of thought, provides an effective check in nearly all cases. These remarks may at first appear rather disconcerting, but we hasten to assure the reader that they are not so. Dr. Hort, whose learning and labours give him a high place in matters of textual criticism, says of the various readings of the N.T., that by far the greatest part of these are concerned merely with differences in order and other unimportant variations, and that "the amount of what can in any sense be called substantial variation . . . . . can hardly form more than a thousandth part of the entire text".

It had been said that if an avowed enemy of the truth should have access to all the MSS of the Scriptures in existence, and should from them compile the most contradictory version possible, the ordinary uncritical reader would not know that he was not still reading the A.V. Dr. Kenyon says:--

> "It cannot be too strongly asserted, that in substance the text of the Bible is certain."

Hebrew and Greek manuscripts are scattered all over the world in libraries, private collections and museums; and these have all, or nearly all, been examined. Whenever a manuscript is found to disagree with another or with the majority of readings, an application of the following principles will usually lead in the direction of the true text:--

1. The reading may be obviously wrong. It may come under one of the heads mentioned above; an omission, an insertion, a transposition, or a mis-spelling.
2. The reading may not belong to the first class. If this is so, the examiner must weigh over the trustworthiness of the differing manuscripts. Some will have already been found to be very liable to certain types of error; and manuscripts emanating from particular sources are very likely to perpetuate certain errors, peculiar to their source.
3. As a general rule, though not of course as an absolute rule, the older the manuscript is, the nearer it is to the original, and the more likely it is to contain the true reading.

These and many other rules, only to be appreciated when the work is actually in hand, give some idea of the check and countercheck we have in this field of research. This, however, is but one avenue of approach. The Scriptures have been translated into other language, and some of the translations are very ancient. The Samaritan Pentateuch, the Septuagint Greek Version, the Syriac and the Latin Versions, were all written at a much earlier date than any of the corresponding original Greek or Hebrew manuscripts which we now possess. For instance, the oldest Hebrew manuscript we now possess dates back to the eighth century, whereas the Septuagint was written centuries before Christ. The oldest Greek manuscript of the N.T. that we now possess dates back to A.D.350, whereas the Syriac and Latin translations go back as far as A.D.150. Their testimony, therefore, is most valuable.

There is yet one more check upon the text of the differing manuscripts—the testimony of the so-called "Fathers". The bibles used by Irenaeus, Origen, or Jerome, have long ago perished; they were more ancient than any we possess. When these early writers are preaching or expounding the Scriptures, the words they quote, the important features they bring out, are all evidences of the text they were using. This testimony is useful, but it is used with caution and moderation, for the early "Fathers" had no idea that we should in later days search their writings to check the copies of the text of Scripture; many of the quotations are given from memory, with consequent inaccuracy. However, they have their place, and, together with the Versions and existing manuscripts, enable the study of the text to be very nearly an exact science.

We are now ready to consider some further points in connection with our subject—the history of the Hebrew text, the question of the Hebrew characters, the bearing of the Targums, the Talmud, the work of the Sopherim and the Massorites, the methods adopted by the Hebrew scribe to ensure accuracy, and other considerations of interest and importance. This we hope to do in our next article.

#10. The preservation of the Hebrew text.
pp. 125 - 130

We have now to consider the history of the Hebrew text of the O.T.

One of the reasons why there are no Hebrew manuscripts of a date earlier than the eighth century is that the Jews took the precaution of destroying a scroll whenever it showed signs of wear, lest it should lead to mistakes in reading. Dr. Davidson has given a fairly clear account of the scrupulous care that the Hebrew copyist exercised in the transcribing of the Sacred Text. When the reader has read the extract below, he will cease to wonder how it is that the Hebrew manuscripts have remained so accurate up to the present time. The precautions taken may seem trivial, or even superstitious, but they were effective in hedging about the Holy Books:--

> "A synagogue roll must be written on the skins of clean animals, prepared for the particular use of the synagogue by a Jew. These must be fastened together with strings taken from clean animals. Every skin must contain a certain number of columns, equal through the entire codex. The length of each column must not extend over less than forty-eight, or more than sixty lines; and the breadth must consists of thirty letters. The whole copy must be first lined; and if three words be written in it without a line, it is worthless. The ink should be black, neither red, green nor any other colour, and be prepared according to a definite receipt. An authentic copy must be the exemplar, from which the transcriber ought not in the least to deviate. No word or letter, not even a yod, must be written from memory, the scribe not having looked at the codex before him . . . . . Between every consonant the space of a hair or thread must intervene; between every word the breadth of a narrow consonant; between every new parshiah, or section, the breadth of nine consonants; between every book three lines. The fifth book of Moses must terminate exactly with a line: but the rest need not do so. Besides this, the copyist must sit in full Jewish dress, wash his whole body, not begin to write the name of God with a pen not newly dipped in ink, and should a King address him he must take no notice of him . . . . . The rolls on which these regulations are not observed are condemned to be buried in the ground or burned; or they are banished to the schools to be used as reading books" (Dr. Davidson).

> "The Hebrew language, probably one of seven* branches of the old Semitic stock which was probably the primeval speech of mankind, has been subject, like all others, to a series of changes . . . . . In its earliest written state it exhibits, in the writings of Moses, a perfection of structure which was never surpassed . . . . . The great crisis of the language occurs at the time of the captivity in Babylon. There, as a spoken tongue, it became deeply tinged with the Aramaic . . . . . But while these changes were taking place in the vernacular speech, the Hebrew language itself still maintained its existence. It is a great mistake to call Hebrew a dead language. It has never died. It never will die" (Etheridge).

[* -- Assyrian, Babylonian, Syriac, Phoenician, Hebrew, Arabic and Ethiopic.]

Modern Hebrew manuscripts are written in what are called square characters, but these are not the characters of the original. The Samaritan Pentateuch is written in the earlier Hebrew letters, similar to those used on the Moabite Stone and the Siloam inscription. The Moabite Stone dates from about B.C.890, and the Siloam inscription about B.C.700. The modern square characters are supposed to have been brought back from Babylon by Ezra, but this explanation is merely a traditional attempt to account for the fact that a change actually occurred about Ezra's time.

One of the peculiar features of ancient Hebrew is that it contains no vowels, only the consonants being written. It may help to make this point clear if we give an example in English by way of illustration. If the reader had before him the letters BLL, he would not know whether the word was BILL, BELL or BULL. But if the sentence containing the word declared that the BLL had been paid, it would not require much learning to realize that BLL stood for BILL. Similarly, the BLL might be tolled, or led out to grass. Some momentary hesitation might occur if the manuscript stated that the BLL was RNG. A bell may be rung, and also a bull—the latter by the insertion of a ring in the nose—but the context will immediately settle the matter. We have resorted to these homespun illustrations in order to avoid using Hebrew type and loading our pages with matter requiring considerable translation to make the point clear. In the Variorum Bible will be found several instances of the way in which vowels were at times wrongly supplied, and cases where a division of opinion still exists. For example, in Deut. xxviii. 22, either "sword" or "drought" may be intended; the same consonants occur in both words, sword being chereb and drought choreb, and the context leaves the question undecided.

The fact that no manuscripts exist of a date earlier than the eighth century compels us to seek light upon the sacred text from other sources, and the furthest point we can reach as to the state of the test is that provided by the Targums. The latter are paraphrases written in Aramaic, or, as it is called in the A.V., Chaldee, and the scene described in Neh. viii. 1-8 shows how these paraphrases became necessary. Dr. Kitto's Cyclopaedia mentions eleven Targums, of which the most important are those of Onkelos, of Jonathan Ben Uzziel and the Jerusalem Targum.

The Targum of Onkelos is described by Kenyon as "a very simple and literal translation of the Pentateuch, and . . . . . for that reason the more useful as evidence for the Hebrew text from which it was taken". Onkelos was a disciple of Hillel. Hillel was the grandfather of Gamaliel, at whose feet Paul was brought up as a Pharisee. The style of this Targum approaches to that of Daniel or Ezra. It follows the original, word for word, except where it deals with figures of speech, and where the Deity is spoken of under the figure of a man (anthropomorphism). Wherever Onkelos departs from what is called the Massoretic text (a term to be explained later), he is almost invariably supported by ancient versions. The reader will readily appreciate the value of such a paraphrase to a scholar seeking the text of the Hebrew original.

The Targum of Jonathan Ben Uzziel is of value in deciding the text of the Prophets. The Jerusalem Targum agrees generally with the Pseudo Jonathan, and is in the dialect of Palestine. The other Targums are not, from the critical point of view, of such importance.

The Targums are followed by the Talmud, both in time and purpose. The word Talmud is equivalent to our word "doctrine", and the object of the book was to embody all that had previously been written in a series of rules, laws and institutions governing the civil and religious life of Israel.

The Talmud consists of the Mishna and the Gemara. These divisions are explained by the fact that the Jews believed that, in addition to the written law, Moses received an oral or spoken law, which they venerate as of equal authority. In the time of Christ, this tradition of the elders had taken a place higher than the law itself. Dr. Lightfoot writes:--

> "Whoso nameth the Talmud nameth all Judaism, and whoso nameth Mishna and Gemara, he nameth all the Talmud . . . . . The Talmud is divided into two parts . . . . . this is the Jews' Council of Trent, the foundation and groundwork of their religion . . . . . The son of Hamlai saith, 'Let a man always part this life in three parts: a third part for the Scriptures, a third part for Mishna, and a third part for Gemara'. The Mishna is the 'text', the Gemara the 'completion', and together they are considered final."

It is not our present purpose to enlarge upon this work or to show its bearing upon the doctrine of the N.T.; this can be done later. For the moment we are only passing in review those works of antiquity that provide means for checking the text of the Hebrew Bible, and in spite of all the fables and complicated reasonings that make the reading of the Talmud a weariness to the flesh, we must gratefully include this monumental work among our valued witnesses.

We must now go back to an earlier time and review the labours of the Sopherim, whose work dates back to the days of Nehemiah and Ezra. The Talmudic interpretation of Neh. viii. 8 clearly explains the nature of their labours. The Sopherim were "The Scribes", a name given to Ezra in Neh. viii. 4. The reader should read the whole of Neh. viii.; space will only permit a short quotation here:--

> "And Ezra opened the book . . . . . so they read in the book of the law of God distinctly, and gave them the sense, and caused them to understand the reading" (Neh. viii. 5-8).

The Gemarists in the Jerusalem Talmud, referring to Neh. viii. 8, writes: "Whence came the custom of having an interpreter? Rabbi Zeora in the name of Rabbi Hananeel saith":--

> "From that place 'They read in the book of the law'—that meaneth the reading (in the original tongue); 'distinctly'—that meaneth the interpreting (the Chaldee paraphrase); 'and gave the sense'—that meaneth the exposition (and the division of words, &c.); 'and caused them to understand the reading'—that meaneth the Massoreth, or points and accents (originally Hebrew was without vowel points)."

The Sopherim in effect produced an Authorized Version, which it was the business of the Massorites to preserve for all time. The student who uses The Companion Bible will be familiar with Appendices Nos. 31, 32 and 33, where some of the labours of the Sopherim are recorded.

With the labours of the Massorites the final stage in the history of the Hebrew text is reached. The word "Massorah" is derived from masar, "to deliver something into the hand of another". The labours of the Massorites had a twofold object—the exhibition of a perfect *orthoepic standard for the Hebrew language, and the recording of a correct and inviolable text of the Hebrew Scriptures.

To accomplish their task the Massorites first collected all that could be found in the Talmud concerning the traditional vowel points and punctuation, and produced a text provided with a series of points indicating vowel sounds. The Hebrew Bible at that time had neither chapter nor verse, and the Massorites divided the several books into parashiotts--greater sections, sedarim--orders, perakim--chapters, and pesikim--verses. When the division was completed, the number of verses in each book was notified by a technical word. The middle verse, or clause, and the middle letter were registered, and the number of letters in each book counted. Notes were made of places where words or letters appeared to have been altered, omitted or added, and a whole mass of intricate detail recorded that still leaves the mind overwhelmed by its sheer mass. The results of this prodigious labour were placed in the margin of the Scrolls, and those who know anything of the labours of Dr. Ginsburg will have some idea of the range and distribution of these notes. The Massorites, moreover, introduced a series of accents that were intended to answer four purposes:--

(1). To certify the meanings of words.
(2). To indicate the true syllables.
(3). To regulate the +cantillations of synagogue reading.
(4). To show the emphasis of an expression.

The Massorah is truly called, "A Fence to the Scriptures". It does not contain comments; but registers only facts. However trivial some of the calculations of the Massorites may appear to modern eyes, for example the counting of the number of occurrences of each letter in a given book, they had the effect of fixing the text, so that in literal truth, not one jot or tittle could pass away or be lost. If we consider the Massoretic labours, together with the minutely detailed instructions to the copyist, we shall realize how very certain we may be to-day that we have the text of the Hebrew Scriptures unaltered as it left the hands of the Sopherim who, under Ezra, began the great work of standardization.

#11. The witness of the Versions.
pp. 155 - 159

In our previous paper we saw how the text of the Hebrew Scriptures as authorized by the Sopherim was fixed beyond the possibility of alteration by the labours of the Massorites. We now look further afield for evidence concerning the actual text with which the labours of the Sopherim were occupied; and for this we must turn to the various ancient versions.

The Samaritan Pentateuch.—Within the strict meaning of the word, this is not a version at all, for it is written in ancient Hebrew, being the oldest manuscript containing the Hebrew text in existence. It is mentioned by Eusebius, Cyril and Jerome, and a considerable range of opinion has from time to time been expressed as to its age and authority. This is not the place to bring forward the arguments involved in so technical a subject, and we can only state the result. In spite of the arguments of Gesenius, the most reasonable hypothesis dates the Samaritan Pentateuch some time after the schism of the tribes under Rehoboam. When the various characteristics of the Samaritan Pentateuch are considered they appear to fit the circumstances indicated in II Kings xvii. 24-41 very closely. After the division of Israel, the ten tribes were taken away captive into Assyria, and instead of the children of Israel, men of other nations were placed by the Assyrian king in the cities of Samaria. These people feared not the Lord, and were moved to petition the king by reason of lions that slew some of them. Their petition was as follows:--

> "The nation which thou hast removed, and placed into the cities of Samaria, know not the manner of the God of the land. Therefore He hath sent lions among them" (II Kings xvii. 26).

In answer to this petition the king of Assyria sent back one of Israel's priests that he should teach the people the fear of the Lord. It is almost certain that this priest took back with him the law of Moses, so that the Samaritans should be taught, as they put it, "the manner of the God of the land".

The grammatical revision is about the same stage as the Hebrew of the time of Hezekiah, and some adjustments to the Samaritan dialect occur in the narratives of Elijah and Elisha. But these changes are too highly technical to consider in detail. The introduction of square Hebrew letters into the Hebrew MSS probably originated in the Jewish revulsion against anything Samaritan. The Samaritan Pentateuch is in the older form of Hebrew such as is found in the Siloam inscription, and for this reason was set aside.

The importance, too, of the Samaritan Pentateuch is considerably lessened by the fact that the part of the O.T. which is in the best state of preservation is the Pentateuch, so that the manuscript gives most light where it is not so urgently needed. We leave, therefore, this ancient witness for one that is more valuable—the version of the O.T. known as the Septuagint, often indicated by the letters LXX.

The Septuagint.—Most readers are acquainted with the traditional origin of the Septuagint, and the story of the seventy-two translators and their miraculous agreement. For our present purpose it will be sufficient to say that the LXX version was made in Egypt by Alexandrian Jews, and that it was in use a century before Christ. It became the Bible of the Greek-speaking Jews, and was used in Palestine as well as in the countries of the dispersion. At the time of Christ, Greek was the literary language of Palestine, Aramaic the spoken language, Hebrew being known only to the Rabbis and their students. A very large proportion of the O.T. quotations that are given in the N.T. are from the LXX, and particularly is this true of the quotations made by the Lord Jesus Himself, as reported in the Gospels.

As Christianity spread, the Greek Bible went with it. When, however, the Jews realized what a powerful instrument the church possessed in the Septuagint version in the controversy concerning the Messiah, the Jews repudiated it, and another Greek version was made by a certain Aquila. This version is an exceedingly literal rendering of the Hebrew, so much so that at times it almost ceases to be intelligible. Its value lies in its slavish adherence to the Hebrew original. The date of this version is about A.D.150, and towards the close of the same century another Greek translation of the O.T. Scriptures was produced by Theodotion, a Christian of Ephesus. This version was a set-off against the version of Aquila, and though based upon the authorized Hebrew text, is very free in its rendering. Theodotion's version of Daniel, however, was so much better than the translation contained in the LXX itself, that it took its place, and only one copy of the LXX has come down to us containing the original version. About A.D.200 a further version was prepared by Symmachus, who seems to have profited by the work of Aquila and Theodotion. "The special feature of this translation is the literary skill and taste with which the Hebrew phrases of the original are rendered into good and idiomatic Greek" (Kenyon).

The Hexapla of Origen.—It will be seen that by the beginning of the third century, there were three Greek versions of the O.T. in use, in addition to the Septuagint. This led the great Alexandrian scholar Origen (A.D.186-253) to produce the monumental work known as the Hexapla. As the word indicates, this was a "six-fold" version of the O.T. Scriptures, as follows:--

1.	2.	3.	4.	5.	6.
The Hebrew Text.	The Hebrew in Greek letters.	Aquila translation.	Symmachus' translation.	The Septuagint.	Theodotion's translation.

Origen's object was to bring the LXX into line with the existing Hebrew text, and while his methods may be disappointing to students of the Greek version, his work is a valuable contribution to the knowledge of the Hebrew versions.

As a result of Origen's labours, increased interest in the Septuagint version produced three more important editions, those of Eusebius, Lucian and Hesychius. These editors were practically contemporary (about A.D.300), but each version was circulated in a different region.

No further revision of the Septuagint is known to us, but we have still to consider how it has reached us in this present century, for there is not one original of any of the versions or editions now in existence. The oldest copy of the Hebrew MSS known to us does not go back earlier than to the eighth or ninth century. The oldest copies of the Greek Bible are of far greater age, and take rank with the most venerable of textual authorities.

A further account of these Manuscripts we hope to give when dealing with the N.T. We give the names of some of them below:--

CODEX SINAITICUS (4th Century).—This manuscript is indicated by the Hebrew letter Aleph. The remarkable story of its discovery we reserve for some future article.
CODEX ALEXANDRINUS (5th Century).—This is preserved in the British Museum. It is indicated by the letter A.
CODEX VATICANUS (4th Century).—Indicated by the letter B.
CODEX EPHRAEMI (5th Century).—Indicated by the letter C.
THE COTTON GENESIS (5th Century).—Indicated by the letter D.
THE BODLEIAN GENESIS (8th Century).—Indicated by the letter E.

The list might be continued, but we do not propose to go into detail here. We pass on now to one or two other important versions.

The Samaritan recension and the Septuagint version were made before Christ; all other remaining versions of the O.T. were produced under the influence of Christianity. The first of these to call for notice is the Syriac version. The nearest country to Palestine is Syria, and as the gospel spread from Jerusalem as centre, the demand for the Scriptures spread also, so that very early in the history of the church came the Syriac version. The translation of the O.T. is known as the Peshitto, or "simple" version, and was made about the second or third century after Christ. The British Museum contains a copy of this, which has the distinction of being the oldest copy of the Bible of which the exact date is known. It was written in A.D.464.

The Coptic Versions were produced for use in Egypt. They are more important as evidences for the N.T. than for the Old, as the O.T. portion was translated from the Septuagint and not from the Hebrew. They are, however, of considerable help to the student of the LXX. The two most important Coptic versions are the Memphitic, used in Northern Egypt, and the Thebaic, used in Southern Egypt. Both of these versions appear to have been made in the third century.

Ethiopic, Armenian, Arabic, Georgian, and Slavonic versions are of interest, but not of any great value as all appear to have been translated from the LXX.

The Latin Versions.—The necessity for a Latin version of the Scriptures did not arise in Rome, but in the Roman province of Africa. There were a number of copies in use, and these exhibited considerable differences. In order to correct the provincialisms and other defects of the African translation, an edition was published in Rome, to which Augustine refers as the Itala, which can be traced back as far as the second century.

To eliminate the differences and imperfections of the Latin copies, Jerome commenced a revision of the text, as Origen had previously done for the Greek. Realizing, however, the need for some more drastic change, he prepared a translation of the O.T. in Latin direct from the original Hebrew, a work which occupied nearly twenty years. This version of Jerome's became known afterwards as the Vulgate (or current version), and was the Bible of Europe until the Reformation.

What light do these versions throw upon the text of the O.T Scriptures?

We observe that the Coptic, Ethiopic and Old Latin versions were made from the LXX, and while helping us to ascertain the true text of that version do not throw any light upon the Hebrew original. The Syriac and the Vulgate, though translated from the Hebrew, can only give us the Massoretic text, a text which we already possess.

The Septuagint is much the most important of all the versions. Together with the existing Massoretic text it provides us with sufficient material for arriving at a fairly clear understanding of the true meaning of the original Scriptures. The believer may take comfort in the fact that with all the mass of textual material available the divergences are so slight, and their effect upon doctrine so negligible, that for all practical purposes we may say that we posses to-day the Scriptures as originally given by inspiration of God. We should be thankful for the great crowd of witnesses that gather around the sacred text and testify that we still have in our hands "God's Word written".

#12. The MSS and versions of the N.T. With a brief survey of the history of the English Bible.

pp. 169 - 176

In this, the last paper of the series, we present in as concise a form as possible the story of the manuscripts of the N.T., together with a survey of some of the most important versions. Into the question of textual criticism we do not enter. The conflicting theories and methods espoused by such critics as Scrivener, Greisbach, Lachmann, Tischendorf, Tragelles, Westcott and Hort, will not submit to a condensed presentation; the whole subject lies outside our scope. The interested reader who is already sufficiently advanced to profit by any remarks that we could make here, is already adequately equipped to go on alone. Textual criticism calls for the highest scholarship, acumen and spiritual insight, and we should be sad indeed if what we have written should cause any to lay unprepared hands upon so sacred a subject, with issues so far-reaching. We therefore leave this sacred science, for such it is, and turn to the survey of some of the chief manuscripts and versions by which the Greek text is ascertained.

The MSS of the Greek N.T. are divided into two classes, the uncials and the cursives. The uncials are written in capital letters, each letter being formed separately, while the cursives are written in a running hand, the letters being joined together. The uncials are the more ancient, the cursives not appearing until the ninth century. The chief uncial MSS are the Sinaiticus, the Vaticanus, the Alexandrinus; the cursives are too numerous to mention here. In 1896, the number of cursive MSS known was 2,429, besides 1,723 lectionaries, containing the lessons for the year.

The chief versions are the Syriac, the Egyptian and the Latin. Of the "Fathers" whose writings furnish evidence for the text, we must include Justyn Martyr, Tatian, Irenaeus, Clement of Alexandria, Hippolytus of Rome, Origen of Alexandria, Tertullian, Eusebius and Jerome. Into this evidence we shall not be able to enter, the sheer amount of material making it impossible. We have mentioned the names so that the fact of their evidence shall be included in our survey seem necessary and profitable. We now return to the three great uncial MSS.

Codex Vaticanus (Fourth century).—This is perhaps the most ancient and most valuable of all the manuscripts of the Greek Bible. It is indicated by the letter "B", and the reader should weigh over any reading that has this manuscript as its authority. Originally this codex contained the complete Scriptures, but time has taken its toll. The beginning has been lost, the MS commencing at Genesis xlvi. 28. In addition, Psalms cvi.-cxxxviii. are missing. The N.T. also has suffered; the whole of the Apocalypse, and the catholic epistles are missing, together with the latter part of the epistle to the Hebrews—from ix. 4 to the end. We rejoice, however, that Paul's epistles to the churches have been preserved, together with the Gospels and the Acts.

Codex Sinaiticus (Fourth century).—The discovery of this important manuscript is of unusual interest. In 1844, Constantin Tischendorf visited the Monastery of St. Catherine at Mount Sinai. He found that the monks there were using as fuel, sheets of vellum bearing the oldest Greek writing he had ever seen. He succeeded in rescuing forty-three leaves, but learned to his deep regret that two basket-loads had already been used for lighting the monastery fires. He paid two more visits to the monastery, and in 1859, under the patronage of Alexander II., made one more attempt to gain possession of the rest of the manuscript which he knew had been preserved. At first he met with a flat refusal, but upon showing his own copy of the LXX, the Steward showed him a bundle of loose leaves wrapped in a cloth. He realized this time the necessity to conceal his feelings, and asked if he might be allowed to take the manuscript to his bedroom. "That night", he said, "it seemed sacrilege to sleep". The manuscript eventually passed into the possession of the Czar, and is still to be found in the Imperial Russian Library at Leningrad. It has been most carefully corrected, and the corrections so often agree with the text of the Vatican MS that their testimony is regarded as of extreme value.

Codex Alexandrinus (Fifth century).—Like the Codex Sinaiticus, it originally contained the complete Scriptures, but has suffered some losses in the course of time. It is the glory of the British Museum Manuscript Section, and for a long time was the only ancient manuscript accessible to scholars. In 1707-1720 was published the Old Testament, and in 1786 the New Testament. A photographic reproduction was made in 1879-1883.

We now turn our attention to the next set of evidences, the ancient versions, in which all the tongues spoken at Pentecost have contributed their quota. While the Vatican and Sinaitic manuscripts take us back as far as about A.D.350, we possess translations of the N.T. that go back before A.D.150, and so give most valuable evidence of the text then in use. First and foremost come the Syriac versions.

The Old or Curetonian Syriac.—Dr. Cureton, an officer of the British Museum, translated this manuscript. In his preface he contends that this version gives us the actual words of the Lord's discourses in the language in which they were originally spoken. We cannot discuss this question further here.

The Peshitto Syriac.—This standard version of the Ancient Syriac Church was made not later than the third century (some scholars suggest the second). Peshitto means "simple" or "common". "It is a smooth, scholarly, accurate version, free and idiomatic, without being loose, and it is evidently taken from the Greek text of the Syrian family" (Kenyon).

The Philoxenian Syriac.—In 508, Philoxenus, Bishop of Maburg, in Eastern Syria, revised the Peshitto throughout, and the latter was again revised by Thomas of Harkel in 616.

The Palestinian Syriac.—This is in a different dialect from that of the Syriac of the other versions. It is generally reckoned to be the result of a fresh translation from the Greek, although Dr. Hort considered that part of it rested upon the Peshitto.

From the Syriac versions, we turn to the Coptic.

The Memphitic or Bohairic Version.—This was current in Northern Egypt. The oldest MS known at present is dated A.D.1173-4.

The Thebic or Sahidic Version was current in Southern Egypt. It exists only in fragments, but these are very numerous, and if put together would form an almost complete N.T. and a large portion of the O.T. Many fragments date back to the fifth and fourth centuries.

There are other Egyptian versions, which we do not mention here. And we can only give the titles of the remaining Eastern versions. They are the Armenian (5th century), the Gothic (4th century), the Ethiopic (about the year 600), several Arabic versions, Georgian, Slavonic and Persian. We must now consider the Western versions.

The Old Latin was made long before any of the manuscripts which we now possess, and takes us back to within a generation of the time when the original Scriptures of the N.T. were penned. Three groups of this Old Latin can be traced and have been named: the African, the European, and the Italian. Thirty-eight manuscripts of this version exist to-day. As a certain amount of confusion was caused by the existence of these three families of the Old Latin, Pope Damascus commissioned Jerome to produce a revision of this version.

The Vulgate.—This is the name given to the new Latin version produced by Jerome. The N.T. was completed first. The O.T., which was translated from the Hebrew—a further step forward—was not finished until twenty years later. There are countless copies of the Vulgate in existence, and for centuries it was the Bible of Western Christendom. To attempt to trace the history of the Latin Vulgate would be to give the history of the Church during the Middle Ages; this we cannot do. Though access to the Greek and Hebrew Scriptures is our prized privilege, no one who has any sense of proportion can look upon Jerome's great work without respect and thankfulness.

Our task is now finished. With all the evidence available of all ages and countries, in many languages and dialects, we have abundant means of checking and counterchecking the manuscripts and of arriving so near to the original as to approach almost to complete certainty.

In conclusion, we will briefly give the history of the English versions and so bring our story up to date. It may be said that for twelve hundred years, the English people have not been entirely without an English Bible. Let us watch the growth of this version in the English tongue.

The Paraphrase of Caedmon, written in the dialect called Anglo-Saxon, about A.D.670.

The Psalter of Aldhlem (about A.D.700).—This is the first true translation of any part of the Bible into the English language.

Bede (A.D.674-735).—At the time of his death he was engaged in the translation of the Gospel of John. Cuthbert, his disciple, tells the never-dying story of the conclusion of the Gospel.

On the eve of Ascension Day 735, the great scholar lay dying. The closing chapters of the Gospel translation were dictated by his dying lips. On the Ascension morning one chapter remained unfinished. At evening the youth who was taking down the translation said, "There is yet one sentence unwritten, dear Master". "Write it quickly", was the answer. "It is written now", said the boy. "You speak truth", answered the dying man. "It is finished now." And so he died.

No trace of this translation has reached us, but its influence was felt, and its existence shows an early attempt to give the common people the Scriptures in their own tongue.

The Gospels of the Tenth Century.—The oldest manuscript was written by one Aelfric at Bath about the year 1000.

The Old Testament of Aelfric about A.D.990.

Verse translations of the thirteenth century, the Psalters of William of Shoreland and Richard Rolle, bring us to the days of Wycliffe.

Wycliffe's Translation represents the first complete Bible in the English language. About 170 copies of Wycliffe's Bible are known to be in existence, including two versions. Some of the expressions in Wycliffe's Bible remain in the A.V., although, of course, the spelling has changed, e.g., "compass sea and land"; "first-fruits"; "strait gate"; "make whole"; "son of perdition"; "enter thou into the joy of thy Lord". Wycliffe's version, however, was written while the English tongue was still in the making, and many words became obsolete in the next century. It set the example, however, and prepared the way.

After the days of Wycliffe there was a revival of the study of Greek and Hebrew, and in 1484 was born William Tyndale, whose translation underlies every succeeding version to the present day.

Tyndale's Bible (1525).—The presence of Erasmus at Cambridge drew Tyndale from Oxford; and it was at Cambridge that Tyndale made the resolve which he so resolutely carried out, with a faithfulness that was literally "unto death". "If God spare my life, ere many years I will cause a boy that driveth the plough to know more of the Scriptures than thou dost." Tyndale completed his translation of the N.T. in 1525. It was solemnly burned in London at St. Paul's Cross, and the Bishops subscribed money to buy up all obtainable copies; but it transpired that they were merely providing funds for proceeding with the work. Tyndale's N.T. differed from all that preceded it, in that it was translated direct from the Greek. Tyndale's words as he stood at the stake at Vilvorde in Belgium were: "Lord, open the king of England's eyes."

Coverdale's Bible (1535).--

> "Tyndale was burnt, but he, with even greater right than Latimer, might say he had lighted such a candle by God's grace, in England, as should never be put out" (Kenyon).

Miles Coverdale, in 1535, produced a translation that laid no claim to greatness, as its author made no profession of Greek or Hebrew learning, and translated mainly from the German and Latin. His English, however, was dignified and chaste, and appears in the A.V. His version was not authorized, but it was circulated freely, and was the first translation of a complete Bible to be printed in English. Coverdale departed from Tyndale, by bringing back into the English translation the ecclesiastical terms which Tyndale had excluded.

Matthew's Bible (1537).—The publisher of this version was John Rogers, Chaplain to the English merchants at Antwerp. It is really a completion of Tyndale's work. It was dedicated to Henry VIII., and sold by his permission. So that Tyndale's translation, which the same king had proscribed in 1525, was sold by his permission in 1537. The Bible, however, was not yet "authorized".

Coverdale was again employed to revise Matthew's Bible, and in 1539-41 produced--

The Great Bible.—In accordance with Cromwell's orders. Copies of this Bible were set up in all churches and were eagerly read.

The Geneva Bible (1557-1560).—Fugitives from England gathered at Geneva, attracted there by the great personality of John Calvin and of the great biblical scholar Beza. Here the Geneva Bible was produced; and it soon became the English Bible, not to be displaced from its position until the arrival of the Authorized Version. It is of interest to some to find that Shakespeare's quotations are generally from the Geneva Bible.

The Bishops' Bible (1568).—With the accession of Elizabeth to the throne came a fresh demand for the free reading of the Scriptures, and a revision was made by several Bishops. On the whole it was not a success, and the Geneva Bible more than held its own with the people. In 1607 the work on a new version commenced, and in 1611 the Authorized Version was published.

The Authroized Version (1611).—The A.V. is closely associated with the religious life of England, and with the very language that we speak, that it would be impertinent to attempt a judgment upon it at the close of an article. With its publication the history of the English Bible practically closes.

The Revised Version (1885).—After holding a dominant position for nearly three hundred years, and wielding an influence beyond computation, a revision of the A.V. was called for, and in 1885 The Revised Version was published. The revisers had access to manuscripts unknown in the year 1611. It must be remembered that the A.V. translators were less proficient in Hebrew than in Greek, so that the R.V. is probably superior in the matter of O.T. translation. The reception of the R.V. was not enthusiastic, and while it may be used with considerable profit, it is doubtful whether it will ever occupy the place held for so long by the A.V.

We will not pursue our subject further. Most readers know that other translations have appeared from time to time, each having a distinct place in the student's equipment, but not being of sufficiently universal importance to justify inclusion here.

In this series we have purposely avoided the technicalities of the subject, and have kept the simpler reader in view. May we all rejoice in that watchful providence that has so preserved the sacred Scriptures up to this day, and has surrounded us with so great a cloud of witnesses that we may, without reserve and with a full heart, take up the Scriptures which we now possess, and accept them as the Word of God.

Words in Season.

#11. Every high priest is taken from man . . . . . for man. . . . . to God (Heb. v. 1, 2).

pp. 79, 80

The following statement was once made in a letter to the Editor:--

> "When I speak of the desire for a Person, I do not mean the actual presence in bodily form."

This is perfectly right as II Cor. v. 16 will confirm, yet at this point there is a possibility of missing one of the greatest blessings of our faith. Those who know of our teaching by hearsay, with its strong emphasis upon "all spiritual blessings", "the super-heavenlies", the leaving behind dispensationally of the "Gospels", and the fact that we do not use the name "Jesus", may conclude that we do leave out the "humanity side of things", but this would be untrue, for we seek to keep together what God has joined.

Paul puts together the words:--

> "Unholy and without natural affection" (II Tim. iii. 2, 3).

God would have holiness and natural affection united. He enjoins husbands to love their wives as Christ loved the church. All this but leads to the point, that while avoiding the error of a "presence in bodily form", we should avoid missing the true humanity of the Son of God.

John i. 14 declares that "the Word was made flesh", and Luke i. 27-35 tells how in truthful simplicity. The only begotten Son of God was a man, a weary man sometimes, a man of sorrows. A man who could grace with his presence both weddings and funerals (John ii. and xi.), and manifest His glory thereat (John ii. 11 and xi. 4). So far was He removed from that travesty of spirituality which "neglects the body", that His true human sympathy was misinterpreted by His enemies, who called Him "a gluttonous man and a wine bibber".

Look at Heb. iv. 15. What does "priest-hood" conjure up in your mind? Robes, vestments, incense, ritual, ceremonial? These are certainly elaborated in Scripture. The first note struck in Hebrews, however, is not ceremony but sympathy:-- > "For we have not such a High Priest unable to SYMPATHIZE with our weakness, but in all points was tempted like as we are, sin excepted" (Heb. iv. 15).

Preceding this is a passage that strikes a note of terror (iv. 12, 13) which only shows how futile is the attempt to dissemble in that presence. He knows, not only because of His deity, but because of His humanity. He has walked this wilderness Himself. We go to Him as to our nearest and dearest friend. He "upbraideth not". All we think we might find in poor humanity (and find not) we can find in Him. Here is a Friend that sticketh closer than a brother, and Whose love passes that of husband, wife or parent. It is a thousand pities to wait until "other helpers fail and comforts flee" before we find out His fullness. In His name we may play with our children. In His fellowship we may enjoy a holiday, have the blessings of home sanctified to us, as well as suffer for His sake and for His truth.

Heb. v. 1, 2 makes clear this same gracious provision in Christ. Every high priest is taken from man . . . . . for man . . . . . to God and has compassion, for He Himself has suffered being tempted.

Here is a verse from F. W. H. Myers' Saint Paul that may help:--

> "Oh could I tell, ye surely would believe it!
> Oh could I only say what I have seen!
> How should I tell or how can ye receive it,
> How, TILL HE BRINGETH YOU WHERE I HAVE BEEN."

Make the act of prayer an act of confidence. It is easier for some to trust the Lord for eternity than for next week, and while this shows we are indeed human, it makes "the Man Christ Jesus" a more blessed reality and provision.

#12. "Whom having not seen, ye love" (I Pet. i. 8).
pp. 95 - 97

There is, in many of us, a lurking thought that if only the Lord Himself were here to-day as He was in the days of His flesh, our attitude would be quite a different one. We feel that love would be spontaneous and unreserved, and that faith and obedience would be implicit and immediate. Now Peter had known the Lord personally and intimately, and precious must the memory have been, but nowhere in his writings do we find any expression to warrant the thought that his communion with the Lord was any more intimate than that of the humblest believer who had never seen the Lord in person. Indeed, in his second epistle, he seems to put the "personal" side in the second place. He is speaking of the second coming of the Lord, and refers to the words spoken on the Mount of Transfiguration. He was an "eye-witness" of His majesty, and the words spoken from heaven were heard when they "were with Him in the holy mount" (II Pet. i. 18). This statement, however, is immediately followed by something further:--

> "We have also a MORE SURE WORD of prophecy, whereunto ye do well to take heed" (II Pet. i. 19).

We imagine that many of our readers would not readily endorse Peter's statement, nor would it be agreed that the "word of prophecy" was of so sure a character and so personal as the actual presence with the Lord on the holy mount. Yet that is Peter's contention. There is almost a note of holy envy in the text quoted at the head of this paper:--

> "Whom having not seen, YE LOVE; in Whom, though now ye see Him not, yet believing, ye rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory" (I Pet. i. 8).

Peter had seen. What a blessed thing to love, to believe, to rejoice, even though one had never seen! Did not the Lord Himself utter the benediction:--

> "Thomas, because thou hast seen Me, thou hast believed; blessed are they that they have not seen, and yet believed" (John xx. 29).

Some feel a longing for the personal Christ. Here at least is one note of cheer; His blessing rests upon those who, though they have never seen Him, yet believe. How is the believing produced? John proceeds at once to say:--

> "But these signs are written that ye might believe" (John xx. 31).

Peter leads on from personal contact to the "word of prophecy"; John to that which is "written".

The Lord, in Luke xvi., rebukes the spirit that lies behind the preference for the "personal" and the impatience with the "written". The rich man asks that some one should go and warn his five brethren:--

> "And He said unto him; If they hear not Moses and the prophets, neither will they be persuaded, though one rose from the dead" (Luke xvi. 30, 31).

John, many years after the ascension of the Lord, writes:--

> "That which was from the beginning, which we have heard, which we have seen with our eyes, which we have looked upon, and our hands have handled of the Word of life" (I John i. 1).

Here John is referring to his personal association with Christ which he had in such marked preference. Yet how does he continue?

> "That which we have seen and heard declare we unto you, that ye also may have fellowship with us; and truly our fellowship is with the Father, and with His Son Jesus Christ; and these things write we unto you, that YOUR JOY MAY BE FULL" (I John i. 3, 4).

John does not seem to entertain the possibility of their joy being limited or barren, because their fellowship with the Lord was through the medium of the written Word and not a close personal fellowship like that of the disciple who reclined on the Saviour's bosom. When we remember, moreover, that Christ continually declared, "My doctrine is not Mine, but His that sent Me" (John vii. 16), and that inability on the part of many of His hearers to receive Him was due to the Father's Word not abiding in them (John v. 38), we may realize that even in the days of His flesh the Lord attracted or repelled in so far as the Scriptures were believed or rejected. And so it will ever be. It is vain to seek Him, and forsake the Word in which He is revealed.

At another time we must consider Paul's remarkable words:--

> "Wherefore henceforth know we no man after the flesh: yea, Though we have known Christ after the flesh, yet henceforth know we Him no more" (II Cor. v. 16).

As they stand, however, they speak of a possible knowledge and fellowship with Christ that transcends the personal and intimate acquaintance of the Gospels.

Returning to our subject, I Pet. i. 8, let us not forget that, though we have never seen Him, we may love Him, and rejoice with joy unspeakable. The link between the love and the joy is faith—"yet believing". And we know that "faith cometh by hearing and hearing by the Word of God" (Rom. x. 17). Prayer alone is not sufficient. To avoid the written Word is to turn from the path of God's appointment. We must, therefore, be patient, and accept the problems associated with the study of the Scriptures as so many small tests of our willingness to endure, if so be we may find Him. His name is "The Word". May He speak to our hearts, and may we have ears to hear.

#13. "Oh that I knew where I might find Him" (Job xxiii. 3).
pp. 139, 140

In a communication at one time made to the writer, it was stated that after studying Paul's epistles the reader was quite unmoved, and still cried out for the person of Christ, and not for doctrines and theological arguments.

It would appear that there is something wrong with any child of God who can read Paul's epistles and fail to see at every turn the personal Christ. Paul, with all the doctrine and deep argument that is associated with his name, was first of all a preacher of the personal Christ. First, look at his conversion. We have the record in Acts ix., and Paul's comment in Gal. i. His first words, on the road to Damascus, were:--

> "Who art Thou, Lord? Lord, what wilt Thou have me to do?" (Acts ix. 5, 6).

Here, at the commencement, we have vividly set forth Paul's contact with the living Person.

The Lord's own words, too, in this same chapter, bind Paul very closely to Himself:--

> "He is a chosen vessel unto ME, to bear MY name . . . . . I will show him how great things he must suffer for MY name's sake" (Acts ix. 15, 16).

Paul was pre-eminently one who suffered for his Lord. Can we then, as we read that list of sufferings, drawn from him with so many apologies (II Cor. xi. 22, 23), can we speak of him as a mere doctrinaire, a pedant, a theology-monger, a splitter of hairs?

His own words in Gal. i. equally emphasize the Person of the Lord:--

> "When it please God . . . . . to reveal His Son in me that I might preach Him" (Gal. i. 15, 16).

Once again the revelation is concerning "His Son", and not a barren doctrine; the preaching is concerning "Him", and not an empty argument. Gal. ii. will provide another illustration:--

> "I am crucified with Christ: nevertheless I live; yet not I, but Christ liveth in Me: and the life which I now live in the flesh I live by faith of the Son of God, Who loved me, and gave Himself for me" (Gal. ii. 20).

Here, the whole epistle to the Romans, the whole doctrine for which the apostle stood and suffered, is expressed without one technicality or purely theological term, but in burning, personal, affectionate words that revolve around the glorious Person of the Saviour, "Who loved and Who gave Himself". Take the words of Phil. i. 20, 21:--

> "As always, so now also Christ shall be magnified in my body, whether by life or by death. For to me to live . . . . . Christ."

One word, one Person sums up Paul's doctrine, preaching and life, viz., Christ. His prayer, too, in the same epistle is, "that I may know Him". And when at last, forsaken and condemned, with the heart-break that is so often the only mead of self-denying service, viewing "all Asia" turning from him, finding himself deserted at his trial by all but God, he can still cling with unbroken faith and simple loyalty to that blessed Person, the Rock beneath his feet, and the Crown and Goal before him.

> "Nevertheless I am not ashamed, for I know WHOM I have believed" (II Tim. i. 12).

From Acts ix. to II Tim. iv.; from conversion to martyrdom; Paul's one ambition, one aim, one message, one all-consuming love and constraining motive, was the living, personal, Christ.

May spiritual perception be granted to all readers.

DEAR FELLOW-MEMBERS,

Again, by the good hand of God our Father, we are enabled to reach the conclusion of another Volume of The Berean Expositor.

From the beginning we have held as fundamental:--

(1) THE VERBAL INSPIRATION OF ALL SCRIPTURE.
(2) THE NECESSITY FOR ITS RIGHT DIVISION.
(3) THE ACKNOWLEDGMENT OF THE DEITY OF CHRIST.
(4) THE ALL-SUFFICIENCY OF HIS ONE SACRIFICE FOR SIN.

Twenty-three years of intensive study, of public witness, of adverse criticism, of new discovery, have but deepened our belief that these four features are fundamentally true. Our chart is the Word of God, our compass points ever to Christ in all His fullness, our goal is expressed in Eph. iii. 19:--

> "To know the love of Christ, which passeth knowledge, > that ye might be filled unto all the fullness of God."

To all of like precious faith we extend the invitation to share with us the privileges and the responsibilities of such a witness.

Yours in the unity to the Spirit,

CHARLES H. WELCH

p. 20

G. J. P. Scheveningen, Holland, writes to the following effect:--

> Would you kindly verify the reference in the "Hopes of the Church", by J. N. Darby, that speaks of the coming in of the doctrine of the immortality of the soul into the early church, as I gather some later editions omit it?

In answer to this request the British Museum Library has been visited and the following extract made. The actual Readers' Slip with date, press mark and issuing officer's signature has been posted to our questioner, so that there shall be no possibility of doubt.

The Hopes of the Church by J. N. Darby, published in 1841 by Francis Baisler, 124, Oxford Street. On page 50 occurs the paragraph in question:--

> "We would express our conviction that the idea of the immortality of the soul (author's own italics) has no source in the gospel; that it comes, on the contrary, from the Platonists, and that it was just when the coming of Christ was denied in the church, or at least began to be lost sight of, that the doctrine of the immortality of the soul came in to replace that of the resurrection (author's own italics). This was about the time of Origen. It is hardly needful to say that we do not doubt the immortality of the soul: we mark the fact only that this view has taken the place of the doctrine of the resurrection of the church, as the epoch of its joy and glory."

It is surely a comment upon the binding power of tradition for such words as: "has no source in the gospel"; "it comes from the Platonists"; "it came in to replace the resurrection", to be followed by: "we do not doubt the immortality of the soul."

One would have thought that no greater condemnation or exposure would be necessary to convince the reader that such a doctrine was erroneous than the "conviction" with which J.N.D. opens this paragraph.

Studies in Colossians.

#11. Continuance, an evidence of our calling (i. 23).
pp. 14 - 18

> "If ye continue in the faith grounded and settled, and be not removed away from the hope of the gospel, which ye have heard, and which was preached to every creature which is under heaven" (Col. i. 23).

The reader who has followed the exposition of the passage commencing at Col. i. 12 may feel that this twenty-third verse is somewhat out of harmony with the sense of perfect acceptance and eternal security that belongs to that salvation and inheritance that goes back in origin to the beginning of creation—an inheritance that scales the heights of heaven as its sphere, that is linked with Christ the Firstborn as Head, and with those who are to be presented holy, solely upon the ground of Christ's finished work at Calvary.

While we must never allow our feelings to influence our faith, there is a realm in which a sense of fitness is not to be despised. Both Job and Elihu testify that "the ear trieth words as the palate tasteth meat" (Job xii. 11, xxxiv. 3).

The words "If ye continue" seem to indicate an abrupt transition from the glorious assurance of the verses immediately preceding; and one is therefore anxious to examine the actual expression used. The word translated "if" here is not the usual ei bu eige, and the added particle needs careful translation. Sometimes this little particle, ge, is left untranslated, as in Rom. viii. 32, where our version reads: "He that spared not His Own Son", instead of the true rendering: "Surely He Who spared not His Own Son." I Cor. iv. 8 rendered in the A.V.: "I would to God ye did reign." This is an unnecessary use of the name of God, for it is simply a very free translation of ge. The passage should be rendered: "I wish indeed (or, I wish most sincerely) that ye did reign." In I Cor. ix. 2 ge is rendered "doubtless". Parkhurst's comment is: "It is postfixed to several other particles, but seems always to preserve somewhat of its affirmative meaning." It will now be of value to examine one or two instances of the use of eige. The first is in II Cor. v. 3: "If so be that, being clothed, we shall not be found naked." In this sentence there is no possible room for doubt. No person can at the same time be "clothed" and "naked"; so that the expression, "if so be", indicates rather an affirmation than a doubt. The idea is expressed by the rendering: "And surely, having been clothed upon, we shall not be found naked."

Again, in Eph. iv. 21, we have the rendering, "if so be": "If so be, that ye have heard Him . . . . . as the truth is in Jesus." But we know from Eph. i. 13 and 15 that the Ephesians had both heard and believed. Again in Eph. iii.: "If ye have heard of the dispensation of the grace of God which is given me to you-ward" (Eph. iii. 2). This passage could also be rendered, "Since indeed", or "Since surely".

Returning, therefore, to Col. i. 23, we find that we are not dealing with a doubt, but with a strong affirmative. When the Lord said, "If I go away, I will come again", it was not the expression of a doubt; and Colossians is equally certain. The continuing in the faith, having been grounded and settled (for so the perfect tense should be translated), is the fruit that gives sure evidence of the root beneath the soil. Much the same teaching is repeated in Col. ii. 5-7. The apostle is rejoicing in their order and in the steadfastness of their faith, and says: "As ye have therefore received Christ Jesus the Lord, so walk ye in Him, having been rooted and built up in Him and established in the faith."

Walk is a manifestation of life as Col. iii. 7 shows: "In the which ye also walked some time when ye lived in them."

A special prominence is given to the hope of the gospel here in Col. i. 23. As the epistle to the Hebrews shows, hope is an anchor, and when fellow-believers become uncertain of their hope, or lose the apprehension of its distinctive character by merging it with the hope of the epistles written during the Acts, there is need for prayer and watchfulness, for this is often the beginning of more serious delusion. The statement of verse 23 should be read in conjunction with verses 5 and 6:--

> "For the hope which is laid up for you in heaven, whereof ye heard before in the word of the truth of the gospel which is come unto you, as it is in all the world; and bringeth forth fruit, as it doth also in you, since the day ye heard it, and knew the grace of God in truth" (Col. i. 5, 6).
> "The hope of the gospel, which ye have heard, and which was preached to every creature which is under heaven" (Col. i. 23).

It is hardly necessary to point out that these verses do not affirm that every creature under heaven actually heard this message. What it does convey is that all barriers are gone. This gospel knows no limits under heaven; its parish is "all the world".

In connection with Col. i. 23, and its emphasis upon the evidences of faith, we add the following which may be of service to any who have been concerned by the question there raised: Does membership of the Body depend upon knowledge?

Those readers who have read the articles dealing with the dispensational place of John's Gospel, or who are well acquainted with the witness of The Berean Expositor, will be aware that we do not consider membership of the Body of Christ to be co-extensive with salvation. We believe that it is not true to say that every believer to-day, whatever his attitude to the revelation of the mystery, is necessarily a member of the Body of Christ. When we instance those who not only do not believe the truth of the prison epistles, but who actively oppose it, we are sometimes met with the objection: "You make membership of the Body depend upon knowledge." It may be of service to consider the validity of this objection.

Suppose for a moment we leave the question of the Body, and turn our attention to the matter of salvation in its broader issues. Let us take the declaration of Acts xvi.: "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved" (Acts xvi. 31). It would be possible to raise a similar objection to this statement, implying that salvation depends upon believing as a procuring cause. The reader will not need any array of quotations to prove that salvation is procured by the finished work of Christ, the One Who died for us while we were "yet" sinners, and indeed before we were born. It is evident that "faith" has its place, but not the place represented in the supposed objection.

To the Thessalonian church, the apostle writes: "Knowing brethren beloved, your election of God" (I Thess. i. 4). Are we to assume from this statement that the apostle was a privileged person who, in virtue of his high office, had been permitted to read the book of life? No; he knew the election of these Thessalonians as we may know our own or that of our friends:--

> "For our gospel came not unto you in word only, but also in power, and in the Holy Ghost, and in much assurance" (I Thess. i. 5).

Would anyone be so foolish as to maintain that Paul intended us to believe that these Thessalonians had put themselves into the book of life because they had received the gospel? The true order is just the reverse—it was because these Thessalonians' names were in the book of life that God saw fit that His gospel should reach them in saving power. They had certainly turned to God from idols, and were waiting for His Son from heaven, Who had delivered them from the wrath to come (I Thess. i. 9, 10), but underlying this turning, this waiting and deliverance, is the truth of v. 9:--

> "For God hath not appointed us to wrath, but to obtain salvation by our Lord Jesus Christ" (I Thess. v. 9).

The election of God includes not only the finished work of Christ, but all the ways and means that are necessary to bring the elect to a knowledge of the truth.

The same truth underlies the teaching concerning the Body of Christ. This church is an elect company "chosen in Him before the foundation of the world" (Eph. i. 4). This company will be saved and called in accordance with the purpose and grace of God given to them in Christ Jesus before age-times (II Tim. i. 9). Inasmuch as Eph. i. reiterates the glorious fact that such "chosen" ones are also "predestinated", and that "according to the good pleasure of His will", it is quite certain that both faith and knowledge of the truth are to be kept in their places and not to be thrust forward into the position rightly occupied by the electing grace of God. Known unto God is every member of that church, not only before he believes, not only before he is born, but before the overthrow of the world.

How do the members of that Body know their calling? And how do we know that fellow-members are in the same blessed company? None of us has access to the book of life, none of us knows the secret purposes of the Lord; we can only predicate life by its manifestations, and the root by the evidence of the fruit. Holding an important place in all such evidence is faith; and faith leads on to knowledge. So Titus i. 1:--

"According to the faith of God's elect, and the acknowledging of the truth which is according to godliness."

God's messengers must deliver the letters entrusted to them according to the addresses which are written upon them, and the epistle to the Ephesians is addressed to "the faithful in Christ Jesus" (i. 1). Further teaching is given upon the assumption that the Ephesians have "faith in the Lord Jesus" and that "the eyes of their heart" have been already enlightened (i. 15, 18). To those who had been quickened together with Christ, the further revelation of Eph. ii. was addressed, and only to those who had heard of the dispensation of the grace of God given to Paul for the Gentiles could be given the wondrous teaching of chapter iii. The walk of chapter iv. assumes that the calling is known, and the same principle of interdependence is apparent in the subsequent chapters.

When we meet with some of the Lord's people who violently oppose this faith of God's elect, whose eyes have not been enlightened regarding the revelation of the mystery, who do not walk in line with Eph. iv., and would introduce many conflicting elements into the unity of the Spirit, we dare not say, "These are not the members of the Body"—all we can say is that they give no evidence of being members of the Body, and we can but pray that the Lord will lead every pre-known son into the full light of his high calling.

And so the objection we have been considering is not valid. We do not make membership of the body depend upon faith or knowledge; and we have no warrant to teach that every believer to-day, whatever his attitude to the revelation of the mystery, is a member of the Body. If we keep close to Scripture we shall "know" our election, as did the Thessalonians. More than this we cannot do.

#12. The mystery manifested by God (i. 23-28). "The afflictions of Christ."

pp. 50 - 56

Those who are acquainted with the teaching of the epistle to the Ephesians will remember that we have to observe a distinction between "the mystery of Christ", which was a matter of progressive revelation through the ages, and "the mystery", which was never revealed until made known to Paul (Eph. iii. 1-13). This twofold mystery has been the subject of several articles in The Berean Expositor, and for any to whom the distinction is not clear we give the following extract from the Comprehensive Index, indicating articles that may prove helpful:--

Two mysteries of Eph. iii. . . . . Volume I.58 (I.53); XII.56, 87, 88 and XIV.146.

We have just concluded an exposition of Col. i. 13-23, which is practically a further and fuller revelation of the mystery of Christ, and is followed, in the section now under review, by a revelation concerning the mystery itself. In Volume XX, page 57, is given the structure of the epistle to the Colossians as a whole. A slight correction of this structure is necessary under letter "D", where i. 23-27 should read i. 23-28, so as to include the opening words of verse 28 in the member. When writing the epistle to the Ephesians the apostle declared that the mystery had been made known to him by revelation, and subsequently that it had been made known by him, in the first instance, as the only appointed channel:--

> "If ye have heard of the dispensation of the grace of God which is given me to you-ward: How that by revelation He made know unto me the mystery" (Eph. iii. 2, 3).
> "Unto me, who am less than the least of all saints, is this grace given, that I should preach among the Gentiles the unsearchable riches of Christ; and to make all men see what is the dispensation (R.V.) of the mystery, which since the ages hath been hidden in God Who created all things (ta panta) by Jesus Christ" (Eph. iii. 8, 9).

The two items brought forward here in Eph. iii. are repeated in Colossians. This will be shown by reference to the structure of the epistle as a whole already alluded to (Volume XX, page 57), under members D and D where we find:--

D | i. 23-28. The mystery manifested by God.
D | iv. 2-11. The mystery manifested by Paul.

We are, therefore, about to receive a further presentation of this most important feature in Paul's ministry.

We must now turn our attention to the passage immediately before us, and, in the first place, in order that its most important features shall be thrown into prominence, seek to discover its literary structure. We set this out as follows:--

Colossians i. 23-28.

A | i. 23. THE HOPE OF THE GOSPEL.
a | Which was preached.
b | In all creation.
B | i. 23-26. THE MINISTER.
c | I became a minister.
d | Sufferings for you.
e | Fill up afflictions of Christ.
f | The body, the church.
c | I became a minister.
d | Stewardship for you.
e | Fill up the Word of God.
f | The mystery.
B | i. 26. THE MYSTERY.
g | Hidden.
h | From ages and generations.
g | Manifested.
h | To saints.
A | i. 27, 28. THE HOPE OF THE GLORY.
b | In you.
a | Whom we preach.

Before passing on to the exposition of these verses, let us spend a moment with this structure in order that we may appreciate the light that it throws upon the theme. It is bounded by "Hope"; in the first section by the hope of the gospel, in the last section by the hope of the glory. Two words are used in these opening and closing sections for "preach", the first is kerusso, "to proclaim as a herald"; the second is kataggello, "to preach", and that with eagerness, as the intensive prefix kata suggests. The hope of the gospel is heralded "in all creation that is under heaven": the hope of the glory is the riches of the glory of the mystery which is being proclaimed among the nations (the preposition en being translated, in verse 23 in the A.V., by "to", in the clause "to every creature", and by both "among" and "in" in verse 27—"among the Gentiles" and "in you"). We draw attention to this without comment here in order that the reader of the A.V. may the better be enabled to see the force of the parallel.

Under the heading "The Minister", Paul twice asserts that he "became a minister", and that both his sufferings and his stewardship were "for you", the first phrase meaning "on your behalf" (huper), the second "unto you" or "with a view to you" (eis). The "filling up" of afflictions is balanced by the "fulfilling" of the Word of God. We have used the same words "fill up" in both cases, and will show the reason later.

The great themes of this special ministry of the apostle are said to be "his body, the church", and "the mystery". These two statements are complementary, the dispensation of the mystery being concerned with that church which is being called out now to form the body of Christ.

The special character of the mystery is that it was hidden in God, whereas the special character of the present dispensation is that this hidden mystery is now made known.

We are particularly concerned, however, with "The mystery manifested by God", and now turn our attention to certain features of outstanding interest. As already mentioned, twice the apostle affirms that he was made "a minister" in connection with this revelation. In the first case, in verse 23, he links his special ministry with that hope of the gospel which knows no limits in its proclamation, but is addressed to every creature which is under heaven. Better understanding of this expression is gained by a consideration of its parallel expression in verse 27. A glance at this verse will show that the "Hope of the gospel" and the "Hope of the glory" are intimately connected with "this mystery among the Gentiles": Paul was made a minister of that truth.

The second mention of his ministry is connected with the body "which is the church", whereof Paul is made a minister. It is very clear from these two statements that Paul's ministry was intimately associated with the Gentiles, the mystery, and the church, which is His body.

The word used by Paul for "minister" is diakonos, which is easily recognizable in its English form, deacon. We must distinguish between doulos and diakonos. Doulos means a bond slave, and emphasizes relationship, diakonos indicates rather the actual ministry performed. Some have derived the word from dia, "through", and konis, "the dust", as of one who runs with speed, but this is a fanciful derivation, and, as Trench says, forbidden "by the quantity of the second syllable". It is more probably derived from dioko, "to pursue", "to hasten after". In the prison epistles the apostle uses the word seven times, and it may be of service to tabulate the occurrences:--

> "That the Gentiles should be joint heirs, and a joint body, and joint partakers of His promise in Christ by the gospel whereof I was made a minister" (Eph. iii. 7).
> "Tychicus, a beloved brother and faithful minister in the Lord, shall make known to you all things" (Eph. vi. 21).
>
> "Paul and Timothy, bond slaves of Jesus Christ, to all the saints in Christ Jesus, which are at Philippi, with the bishops and deacons" (Phil. i. 1).
>
> "Epaphras, our beloved fellow bond slave, who is for you a faithful minister of Christ" (Col. i. 7).
>
> "The hope of the gospel . . . . . whereof I Paul was made a minister" (Col. i. 23).
>
> "The church, whereof I am made a minister" (Col. i. 24, 25).
>
> "All my state shall Tychicus declare unto you, who is a beloved brother and a faithful minister and fellow bond slave in the Lord" (Col. iv. 7).

The Lord in the days of His flesh emphasized the lowly character of the ministry of a diakonos, saying:--

> "Whosoever will be great among you let him be your minister . . . . . even as the Son of man came not to be ministered unto but to minister, and to give His life a ransom of many" (Matt. xx. 26-28).

The close association of lowliness and self-sacrifice that marked the ministry of the Saviour is found in its degree in His follower, Paul:-- > "Giving no offence in anything, that the ministry be not blamed. But in all things approving ourselves as the ministers of God, in much patience, in afflictions, in necessities, in distresses, in stripes, in imprisonments, in tumults, in labours, in watchings, in fastings" (II Cor. vi. 3-5).

This lowliness and self-sacrifice are distinctive features in Paul's ministry of the mystery. First, his lowliness—see how he interposes the words: "Unto me, less than the least of all saints, is this grace given" (Eph. iii. 8), in that passage where his claims for exclusive revelation are highest. Or again, when writing to Timothy of the glorious gospel put into his trust, he immediately adds: "He counted me faithful, putting me into the ministry, who was before a blasphemer, and a persecutor, and injurious" (I Tim. i. 12, 13). Then consider his sufferings as a direct outcome of his ministry:--

> "He is a chosen vessel unto Me, to bear My name before the Gentiles, and kings, and the children of Israel: For I will show him how great things he must suffer for My name's sake" (Acts ix. 16).

If a "great and effectual door" was opened to Paul, there were inevitably "many adversaries" (I Cor. xvi. 9). A catalogue of the sufferings of Paul is a revelation. By sea and by land, in city or in desert, at the hands of the mob, or at the hands of opposing believers, he was beset with suffering. Not only did he suffer physical hardships, but the added indignity of bonds, beatings and stripes, both at the hands of fellow-countrymen and of the Romans. Even when he was in the Roman prison, some outside went so far as to preach Christ of contention, hoping thereby to add to his afflictions. As we ponder these things, and consider the very small amount that we have been called upon to endure for Christ's sake, we must feel ashamed of our rebellion, our lack of grace, our impatience.

Writing to the Colossians from prison, the apostle speaks of "filling up that which is behind of the afflictions of Christ", and it is to this close association of suffering with his ministry that he alludes. Let us mark his words carefully:--

> "Now I rejoice in my sufferings for your sake, and fill up on my part that which is lacking of the afflictions of Christ in my flesh for His body's sake, which is the church; whereof I was made a minister" (Col. i. 24, 25).

No one instructed in the Scriptures would tolerate for a moment any interpretation of the above passage that made the apostle's sufferings supplement the atoning work of Christ. In that great sacrifice for His people the Lord was alone. It is only in the subsequent ministry to that people that "fellowship with His sufferings" is possible. The language of the apostle in this chapter, both as to the work of Christ, and his own ministry, leaves us without doubt that there is an intentional parallel, which, once seen, places the sufferings endured by the apostle in their true place. In the preceding section, he had spoken of the reconciliation and blameless presentation of the church "in the body of His flesh through death". Just as Christ's great work presents the church holy, and unblameable, and unreproveable in His sight, so the goal of Paul's ministry was to present every man perfect in Christ Jesus. Just what that presenting perfect may involve must be left until we reach the verse which deals with that subject, but it has such bearing upon the ministry of Paul that we must include it here:--

In the body of His flesh	\	Christ's work for His church
Through death	}	in which none may share
To present holy, etc.	/	(Col. i. 22).
In my flesh for His body's sake	\	Christ's work for His church
Through afflictions	}	in which members of His body may share
To present every man perfect.	/	(Col. i. 24-28).

When the apostle, speaking of the sufferings of Christ, used the expression, "fill up that which is behind", he had a definite quantity before his mind. This may sound crude to some, but it is resident in the initial statement of Acts ix. 16. A similar figure is used when speaking of "filling up" sins (I Thess. ii. 16); or of the filling up of the measure of the fathers (Matt. xxiii. 32). It becomes less offensive and more consoling as we pursue the thought, and remember that the very hairs of our heads are numbered, and that the tears of the saints are put into the Lord's bottle for remembrance.

Apart from those sufferings that are necessary result of our own foolishness or lack of faithfulness, it is a joy to know that all sufferings connected with true ministry are, first of all, the sufferings and afflictions of Christ. Just as the apostle, when speaking of his imprisonment, always associates it with the Lord, "the prisoner of the Lord", "the prisoner of Jesus Christ", "an ambassador in bonds", and never with the malice of Israel, or of Satan, or Rome, so may all the children of God take comfort from the fact that by the time any affliction reaches them it has done so by divine permission, and we may cease to think of the human or spiritual adversary, while we glory in the fact that all such may become "afflictions of Christ", and be endured by us as members of His body.

At first we are apt to think that the expression, "the afflictions of Christ", should read, "the afflictions for Christ", and in our anxiety to preserve the truth concerning His one great sacrifice, we may be tempted, as it were, to put out our hand to save the ark of God.

In II Cor. i. 5 we meet with a similar expression: "For as the sufferings of Christ abound unto (eis) us, so through (dia) Christ abounds also the consolation." In Eph. iii. 13 he says: "Wherefore I desire that ye faint not at my tribulations for you, which is your glory", and in II Tim. ii. 9, 10, he says: "I suffer trouble as an evil doer, even unto bonds . . . . . Therefore I endure all things for the elect's sakes, that they may also obtain the salvation which is in Christ Jesus with aionion glory."

These things, while having a fullness of meaning when written of the apostle Paul, are not entirely without application to ourselves. No service rendered in the name of Christ for the truth of the mystery, and for the church which is His body, will be devoid of some measure of affliction, but it will be a priceless comfort to us all if we can ever remember that such sufferings are "of Christ" and "for His church", and that they are permitted, overruled and sanctified.

#13. The mystery manifested by God (i. 23-28). "The stewardship that fills up the Word of God."

pp. 92 - 96

In the preceding article, we set out the structure of Col. i. 23-28, and afterwards devoted most of the space to that aspect of ministry which is associated with the sufferings of Christ for His body's sake, which is the church. The ministry of the mystery expounded in Col. i. 23-28 is twofold, and in order that none shall miss this fact, we will repeat here one section of the structure which will be found complete on page 51:--

B | i. 23-26. THE MINISTER.
c | I became a minister.
d | Sufferings for you.
e | Fill up afflictions of Christ.
f | The body, the church.
c | I became a minister.
d | Stewardship for you.
e | Fill up the Word of God.
f | The mystery.

Here every feature is in harmonious balance. Paul's stewardship "for you" is no mere office, it is accompanied by afflictions "for you" that would be enough to daunt the boldest. This stewardship or dispensation "filled up" the Word of God, but not without a personal appreciation of the afflictions of Christ, which were also to be "filled up". The object for which the sufferings were borne was "the body, the church"; the dispensation which filled up the Word of God was "the mystery", and "the mystery" is the name of that phase of God's dealings with men under which He reveals His secret purpose concerning a particular company of the redeemed. These are taken out mainly from among Gentiles, who are blessed beyond the highest aspirations of Israel, or the terms of their covenants. Thus is revealed a secret purpose never committed to writing until found a place in the prison ministry of the apostle Paul.

We therefore take up our study at the second division of the apostle's ministry, and consider what he intends to convey in the words: "According to the dispensation of God which is given to me for you." The word translated "dispensation" is oikonomia. It is the word translated "stewardship" in Luke xvi. 2. The word is made up of two Greek words meaning "house management". In meaning, the old English word "steward" is not far removed from it, for literally a steward was a sty-ward, from the Anglo-Saxon stigu, a farm, and weard, a ward or guard.

The apostle refers to this particular stewardship in Eph. iii. 2 and 9 (R.V.), and in Col. i. 25. Though the references are not many in number, they are so complete and full that nothing but unbelief or blindness can prevent the reader from seeing how distinct this ministry of the apostle must be from all that went before, and from all that was going on around him:--

> "I Paul, the prisoner of Christ Jesus for you Gentiles, if ye have heard of the dispensation of the grace of God which is given me to you-ward. How that by revelation He made known unto me the mystery" (Eph. iii. 1-3).

Several items of importance in this statement need bringing into prominence.

(1) Paul's dispensation or stewardship is here intimately connected with his imprisonment as "the prisoner of Christ Jesus."—We therefore regard as synonymous his stewardship of the mystery and his prison ministry. They are, so far, interchangeable. Not until he became the prisoner of Christ Jesus was the dispensation of the mystery entrusted to him, for until his earlier activities ceased with imprisonment, he was fulfilling another office. Paul was always the apostle of the Gentiles and a steward of the mysteries of God (I Cor. iv. 1), such as the mystery of change (I Cor. xv. 51), or the mystery of Israel's blindness (Rom. xi. 25), but the ministry of his earlier epistles, though to the Gentiles, did not minister to them "the mystery".

(2) This imprisonment is definitely "for you Gentiles" and to "you-ward".—While the believing Jews is not actually excluded from this stewardship, the fact remains that few Hebrew believers in Christ ever seem to embrace the doctrine of the prison epistles. The mystery is essentially concerned with the Gentile believer.

(3) This dispensation is called "the dispensation of the grace of God".—Grace is the characteristic of the whole administration, and legalism in any shape or form is an intruder. One has but to read Eph. ii. 11 and 12 to get some idea of the utter necessity of grace if those there described are to saved and blessed.

(4) This stewardship is primarily the stewardship of "The mystery".—This term is explained both in Eph. iii. and Col. i. as that section of God's age-purpose that had not been made a part of the Scriptures, or even alluded to in them, but was kept entirely a secret until Israel's defection was seen to be complete at Acts xxviii.

(5) Finally, this mystery, which is the grand theme of this dispensation, was made known to Paul by "revelation".—Neither the wit nor the imagination of man could have foreseen what God intended to do when Israel, the appointed channel of blessing to the nations, so signally failed. Unless God had made known His purposes of grace "by revelation" we should all still be as much in the dark as ever.

> "Unto me, who am less than the least of all saints, is this grace given, that I should preach among the Gentiles the unsearchable riches of Christ, and to make all men see what is the dispensation of the mystery, which has been hidden from the ages in (or by) that God Who created all things . . . . . according to the purpose of the ages" (Eph. iii. 8, 9, 11).

Here again are items that challenge investigation:--

(1) One of the characteristics of this dispensation of the mystery is the making known of those riches of Christ which are "unsearchable". This is the very essence of a mystery, and should shut the mouths of those who oppose and say that they can discover this "so-called mystery" in the Old Testament or the Gospels.

(2) Another similar feature of this dispensation of the mystery is that it is hidden "from the ages" or "since the ages": known unto God, but unrevealed since before the foundation of the world.

(3) While not forming a part of Scripture up to this time, the fact that it was "according to the purpose of the ages" shows that there will be perfect harmony between this ministry and all other ministry that is of God as soon as each is seen, rightly divided, in its allotted place.

The third reference to Paul's stewardship of the mystery is found in the passage before us (Col. i. 25, 26):--

> "His body, which is the church, of which I became a dispenser, according to the dispensation of God, which was given me for you, to fill up the Word of God, the mystery which has been hid from the ages and from the generations, but now is made manifest to His saints."

The additional items that come to light in this passage are:--

(1) The dispensation of the mystery, given to Paul as the Lord's prisoner, and made known to him by revelation, concerns a church, whose special constitution and character is that it is "The body of Christ". While references to a "body" may be found in I Cor. xii. (see "The Apostle of the Reconciliation", pages 154-157), or Rom. xii. in close association with spiritual gifts, it is evident that here we have a new company in harmony with the new commission and stewardship now introduced.

(2) Further, this revelation of the mystery "fills up" the Word of God. While the same words can mean "to fulfil", as with some of the O.T. prophecies (for example, Matt. i. 22), a slightly different shade of meaning attaches to the word in the Prison Epistles. Pleroo occurs exactly 14 times in this set of epistles, as follows:--

"The fullness of Him that filleth all in all" (Eph. i. 23).
"That ye may be filled unto all the fullness of God" (Eph. iii. 19).
"That He might fill all things" (Eph. iv. 10).
"Be filled with the Spirit" (Eph. v. 18).
"Being filled with the fruits of righteousness" (Phil. i. 11).
"Fulfil ye my joy" (Phil. ii. 2).
"I am full" (Phil. iv. 8).
"My God shall supply all your need" (Phil. iv. 19).
"That ye might be filled with the knowledge of His will" (Col. i. 9).
"To fill up the Word of God" (Col. i. 25).
"Ye are complete in Him" (Col. ii. 10).
"Complete in all the will of God" (Col. iv. 12).
"The ministry . . . . . fulfil it" (Col. iv. 17).
"That I may be filled with joy" (II Tim. i. 4).

It is at once evident that the idea expressed by this word is in most cases that of completion, filling up to the complete measure. That is what the revelation of the mystery does in regard to the rest of Scripture.

The revelation of the remaining part of the purpose of the ages with which the rest of Scripture is concerned, is in itself complete, for it has in view two spheres only, and with these it deals thoroughly. It reveals a sphere of blessing in the earth, and another sphere of blessing in the New Jerusalem, the heavenly city. The revelation of the mystery crowns the whole by making known a yet higher sphere of blessing, even in the heavenlies, or at the right hand of God. As Eph. i. 10 indicates, by this ministry the highest pinnacle of heavenly glory is united with the very ends of the earth.

(3) This mystery is said to have been hidden either by God, or in God, since, or away from, the ages and the generations, but it is now made manifest to His saints. "Ages" contain an element of time, "generations" contain an indication of character; both are maintained in the words "now" and "saints". The contrast is important enough to justify a restatement:--

"HIDDEN"	over against	"MANIFEST".
"AGES"	over against	"NOW".
"GENERATIONS"	over against	"SAINTS".

Past and present ages and generations have, alas, been antagonistic to the purpose of God, but a literal rendering of Eph. iii. 21 reads: "unto all the generations of the age of the ages", and suggests that in that day there will be a complete reversal of this attitude towards the things of God.

While to those who have seen the truth of the mystery, with its unique character, and intimate connection with the prison ministry of the apostle, these scriptures are overwhelmingly convincing, it is, nevertheless, a fact that many apparently sincere and earnest children of God oppose and debate every item brought forward. It is a blessing to realize that the last word is with the Lord, and while we must use every legitimate means to make known the truth, we must not strive, but, having given our witness, leave it in the hands of the Lord, Who only is able to convince and to convert. To those of us who do yield the assent of heart and lip to the glorious fullness of the apostle's later ministry comes the word of admonition:--

> "Be not ashamed of the testimony of our Lord, nor of me (Paul), His prisoner" (II Tim. i. 8).

#14. The mystery manifested by God (i. 23-28). "The hope of glory."

pp. 131 - 135

Following upon the manifestation of the mystery to the saints is the statement that God would also have them know "what is the riches of the glory of this mystery among the Gentiles, which is Christ among you the hope of the glory, Whom we preach" (Col. i. 27, 28). By including, as we may, Col. i. 29, with its reference to "His inworking, which inworketh in me in power" we find here the three features contained in the great prayer of Eph. i. 15-20:--

> "That ye may know what is the HOPE of His calling, and what the RICHES of the GLORY of His inheritance in the saints: and what is the exceeding greatness of His POWER to us-ward who believe, according to the INWORKING of His mighty power."

The Ephesians were taught to pray for that which God "would make known". Prayer for this knowledge without the corresponding assurance would have been unwarranted.

The making known of these riches of glory is in harmony with another statement of the apostle's in verse 8:--

> "That I should preach among the Gentiles the unsearchable riches of Christ" (Eph. iii. 8).

Because they are “unsearchable”, they can also be called “the riches of the glory of this mystery”. Both passages—Col. i. 27 and Eph. iii. 8—declare that these riches are made known “among the Gentiles”.

The words “Christ in you” should be translated “Christ among you”. En followed by the plural is so translated many times, and is actually found in the same verse—“among the Gentiles.” So that the reader may see for himself that such is a consistent translation, we give a few out of more than one hundred passages, where the A.V. renders en followed by the plural as “among”:-- > “None other name . . . . . given among men” (Acts iv. 12).

> “Inheritance among them which are sanctified” (Acts xxvi. 18).
> “Obedience to the faith among all nations” (Rom. i. 5).
> “Christ, Who was preached among you” (II Cor. i. 19).
> “That I might preach Him among the heathen” (Gal. i. 16).

The doctrine of the indwelling Christ or of the indwelling Spirit is not here in view. The glory that is here made known is not the glory of God in connection with the salvation of the Gentiles. It is definitely stated to be “the riches of the glory of this mystery” which, as explained in the sequel, is associated with “the hope”. So that this glory must be the glory of which the Gentiles hope to become partakers as the result of the revelation of the mystery.

This hope of the glory is evidently something different from anything hitherto revealed, for it forms a definite feature of the prayer in Eph. i. 15-19. Moreover, it is called “the hope of His calling”, because that calling is very intimately associated with “the hope of the glory”. Again, in Eph. i. 15-19 “the riches of the glory” are linked with “His inheritance in the saints”, a connection which finds a parallel in Col. i.:-- > “Giving thanks unto the Father, which hath made us meet to be partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light” (Col. i. 12).

It would seem reasonable to expect that a consideration of the usage and occurrences in the prison epistles of the word “riches” would throw some light upon the particular “riches of the glory” of Col. i. 27. We give a list of these occurrences below:--

> “The forgiveness of sins, according to the riches of His grace” (Eph. i. 7).
> “What the riches of the glory of His inheritance in the saints” (Eph. i. 18).
> “That . . . . . He might show the exceeding riches of His grace in His kindness toward us in Christ Jesus” (Eph. ii. 7).
> “That I should preach among the Gentiles the unsearchable riches of Christ” (Eph. iii. 8).
> “That He would grant you according to the riches of His glory” (Eph. iii. 16).
> “My God shall supply all your need according to His riches in glory by Christ Jesus” (Phil. iv. 19).
> “What is the riches of the glory of this mystery” (Col. i. 27).
> “Unto all riches of the full assurance of understanding, to the acknowledgment of the mystery of God—Christ” (Col. ii. 2).

The riches of grace that have already been enjoyed by faith and which are associated with redemption and forgiveness are to be "exceeded" in the ages to come by the riches of grace and kindness yet to be shown to us. Faith looks back, but hope looks forward, and in these exceeding riches yet to be displayed we shall find one phase of "the riches and the hope of the glory".

Philippians is an epistle of practical outworking, so that the use of the word "riches" here does not take us back to redemption nor on to future ages, but in the "supply of all our needs" introduces the blessed present-day anticipation of the glorious future.

Another important occurrence is the last, in Col. ii. 2. There we have "all riches of the full assurance of understanding" that comes with the acknowledgment of the great central fact of the mystery of God, which is Christ, Who is all and in all. This brings us back to Col. i. 27. We are not left in doubts as to what constitutes the riches of the glory of the mystery. It is immediately defined: "Which is Christ among you, the hope of the glory." Eph. ii. 11, 12 has already made clear the fact that the Gentiles before Acts xxviii. were "without Christ", and that they had "no hope". Since the revelation of the mystery, such a standing has been replaced by one of nearness, access, acceptance and hope that transcends all previous revelations of grace and glory. The very fact that "among the Gentiles" "Christ" was preached, independently of Israel or covenants, was in itself the pledge of their "hope of glory". It opened to them all the riches of glory that belong to heavenly places and the new dispensation. To understand this was to receive added riches—the riches of full establishment in the truth of the new revelation (Col. ii. 2).

The strong personal note of Col. i. 27—"Christ among you"—is found also in Eph. ii. 17:--

> "And came and preached peace to you which were afar off and to them that were nigh."

The concluding words of this section—"Whom we preach"—indicate the way in which it could be said that Christ was among the Gentiles, and that He had come preaching peace. The Word of truth that makes Him known among the Gentiles to-day is, in a sense, equivalent to His own personal ministry among men. If only we believed this as wholeheartedly as we should, with what reverence we should treat the Scriptures that thus set Him in our midst. Just as there is a mystery in the great basic fact that God was manifested in the flesh, so there is, in a lesser degree, a mystic union between the living Word and the written Word:--

> "Confessedly great is the mystery of godliness: God was manifest in the flesh . . . . . preached unto the Gentiles . . . . ." (I Tim. iii. 16).

He was "received up in glory", and the consummation of "the hope" is that "when Christ, Who is our life, shall be made manifest, then shall we also be made manifest with Him in glory" (Col. iii. 4).

The word “Gentile”, which is of great importance in the revelation of the mystery, occurs eight times in the prison epistles (the same number of occurrences as of the word “riches”). The passages concerned will repay study:--

“In times past Gentiles in the flesh” (Eph. ii. 11).
“The prisoner of Christ Jesus for you Gentiles” (Eph. iii. 1).
“That the Gentiles should be fellow-heirs” (Eph. iii. 6).
“That I should preach among the Gentiles the unsearchable riches of Christ” (Eph. iii. 8).
“That ye henceforth walk not as other Gentiles” (Eph. iv. 17).
“The riches of the glory of this mystery among the Gentiles” (Col. i. 27).
“I am appointed . . . . . a teacher of the Gentiles” (II Tim. i. 11).
“And . . . . . all the Gentiles might hear” (II Tim. iv. 17).

The five references in Ephesians are complete in themselves as may be seen below:--

A | ii. 11. The past life. “In the flesh.” “Aliens.”
B | iii. 1. The prisoner . . . . . the mystery.
C | iii. 6. The mystery itself. “Fellow.”
B | iii. 8. The preacher. The unsearchable riches.
A | iv. 17. The past walk. “In the vanity of the mind.” “Alienated.”

We can now bring together the opening and closing members of this section:--

A | Col. i. 23. The HOPE of the gospel.
a | Heard . . . . . Preached.
b | Every creature under heaven.
A | Col. i. 27, 28. The HOPE of the glory.
a | Riches of glory.
b | Among Gentiles.
b | Among you.
a | Hope of glory.

We may perhaps, add that the expressions, “Every creature under heaven” of verse 23, and “All the world” of verse 6, must be interpreted in the light of verse 27.

Before we pursue our studies into Col. i. 28, it will be helpful to consider the corresponding member in the fourth chapter:--

D | iv. 2-11. The mystery manifested by Paul.

The position of this member in the structure of the epistle as a whole may be seen by referring to Volume XX, page 57.

#15. The mystery manifested by Paul (iv. 2-11).
pp. 170 - 175

Reference to Volume XX, page 57, will show that the passage we have just considered, Col. i. 23-28, is balanced by Col. iv. 2-11 thus:--

D | i. 23-28. The mystery manifested by God.
D | iv. 2-11. The mystery manifested by Paul.

There are one or two features in this second member that appear to reflect the teaching given in the first, and so indicate to us the most essential parts of the passage. They can be seen as follows:--

Colossians i. 23-28.

D | a | i. 25. The Word filled up.
b | i. 26. The mystery manifested.
c | i. 24. Afflictions for body's sake.
d | i. 25. Paul's ministry and dispensation of God.

Colossians iv. 2-11.

D | a | iv. 3. A door of the Word.
b | iv. 4. Make mystery manifest.
c | iv. 3. Bonds for the mystery.
d | iv. 11. Paul's fellow-workers unto the kingdom of God.

It will be seen that both sections speak of the Word in relation to the ministry of the mystery; both speak of the manifesting of the mystery, the first by God Himself, the second by Paul, His servant; both speak of afflictions or bonds for the sake of the mystery and the church; and both allude to the ministry associated with this revelation. These four points of correspondence, while sufficient to establish the link between the two sections and to fix their place in the main outline, do not in any sense set forth section iv. 2-11 in its true structure. This passage, like all others in Scripture, conforms to a structural disposition of its subject-matter which we must now make clear:--

Colossians iv. 2-11.
The mystery manifested by Paul.

In the first chapter of this epistle, the apostle prays for the Colossians that they may be filled with all wisdom, and that they may walk worthy of the Lord (Col. i. 9, 10). Here he requests a place in their prayers.

In correspondence with "prayer, and watching in the same with thanksgiving", is placed the passage: "Walk in wisdom toward them that are without, redeeming the time." There is a closer relationship between prayer and walk than we sometimes credit:--

> "If I regard iniquity in my heart, the Lord will not hear me" (Psa. lxvi. 18).
> "Ye ask and receive not, because ye ask amiss, that ye may consume it upon your lusts" (James iv. 3).

Paul desired the prayers of the saints on his behalf, but it would not have been fitting that those whose walk was not in harmony with their calling should enter into this most sacred fellowship. "The effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much" (James v. 16). And so for effectual prayer on his behalf, the apostle not only exhorts the saints to pray, but to walk, not only to give thanks, but to redeem the time, not only to watch in their praying, but to watch the effect of their walk upon those without.

For what did the apostle ask their prayers? He was a prisoner. Did he ask for deliverance? Roman prisons were not visited by inspectors, were not regulated by Parliament, and possessed no welfare committees. Material for urgent prayer was on every hand, yet not a word about his tribulation or weariness does the apostle intrude into his request. His one great objective is still "The Word". The A.V. translation reads: "That God would open unto us a door of utterance." The R.V. renders the same passage: "That God may open unto us a door for the Word." An open door is a figure used several times by the apostle, to suggest not merely an opportunity but rather an opportunity for service definitely indicated by God:--

> "A great door and effectual is opened unto me, and there are many adversaries" (I Cor. xvi. 9).
> "A door was opened unto me of the Lord" (II Cor. ii. 12).
> "How He had opened a door of faith unto the Gentiles" (Acts xiv. 27).

Let us not pass these passages by without a glance at their message. The first passage (I Cor. xvi. 9), where the open door is associated with many adversaries, has become almost proverbial. We seem instinctively to realize that the two things go together. This is to be expected, for if there is an active enemy of the truth, we must not be surprised to find him and his agents doing their utmost to block the way. This principle can be seen at work in Acts xiv. and xv.

Immediately following the opening of the door of faith to the Gentiles come certain men from Judaea with circumcision and law to block it (Acts xv. 1-5).

While the principle we are discussing is true, we must not be misled into the belief that all shut doors are of the devil, and that all open doors are of the Lord. The reference to the open door in II Cor. ii. 2 speaks of Troas. Now if we read Acts xv. 1-10, we shall find there two doors shut by the Lord—doors in Asia and in Bithynia (Acts xvi. 6, 7). These were divine prohibitions with the object of forcing the apostle on to Troas, so that there he might receive the vision of the man of Macedonia, and enter the open door into Europe. In each case the open door was an opportunity for the ministry of the Word, and Col. iv. 3 is no exception. In no case did the apostle open the door for himself—"Is opened", "was opened", "He had opened" are the words used. He lived in the spirit of the words written by John: "I have set before thee an open door, and no man can shut it" (Rev. iii. 8).

It is suggestive that it is to the church of Philadelphia, to which no rebuke is addressed, that the opened door is given. If the prayer for Paul revolves around "the Word", that mystery of Christ for which he was in bonds, his solicitude for the Colossians is also concerned with the same subject—for the original reads: "Let the Word of you be always with grace." This translation—rather than the A.V.: "Let your speech be always with grace"—makes more evident the parallel given in the structure.

The Athenians were celebrated for their elegance in conversation and discourse; such a quality of speech was called by the ancients "Attic salt". The apostle, however, repudiates most emphatically the mere wisdom of words (I Cor. i. 17), and uses the figure of salt for grace. The fact that salt adds savour to food, and is a great preservative against corruption, is evidently in mind in the figure:--

> "Let no corrupt communications proceed out of your mouth . . . . . minister grace unto the hearers" (Eph. iv. 29).

In the expression, "redeeming the time" we have a word that is parallel with our "forestall", which originally meant to "buy an article before it was put on the stall in open market". It seems to indicate an eye for a bargain—but, in this case, a bargain for the Lord's service. The word translated "time" (kairos) is twice rendered "opportunity" (Gal. vi. 10; Heb. xi. 15), and once, with a negative, is used to indicate lack of opportunity (Phil. iv. 10). When the apostle uses the same word in II Tim. iv. 2: "Preach the word; be instant in season, out of season", the same idea of "redeeming the opportunity" is evident.

If we are to pray intelligently for one another, it is necessary that we should know something of one another's affairs. So it is that both in Eph. vi. 18-24, and in Col. iv. 2-11 the request for prayer is followed by the sending of Tychicus to make known "all my affairs and how I do" and "all my state". Tychicus was of Asia (Acts xx. 4) and is mentioned several times in the epistles, viz., Eph. vi. 21; Titus iii. 12 and II Tim. iv. 12. To him the apostle gives the title, "A beloved brother and a faithful minister and fellow-servant in the Lord" (Col. iv. 7).

To one who endured to the end of the apostle's ministry such titles seem fitting, but how wonderful to read of Onesimus, once a runaway slave, that he too could be called by the apostle "a faithful and beloved brother". When we read Paul's letter to Philemon, a letter written at the same time as that to the Colossians, we can appreciate the bond that existed between Paul, the apostle, and Onesimus, the runaway slave:--

> "I beseech thee for my son, Onesimus, whom I have begotten in my bonds . . . . . Received him, that is, mine own bowels . . . . . If thou count me, therefore, a partner, receive him as myself" (Philemon 10, 12, 17).

These two, Tychicus and Onesimus, were entrusted with the epistles to the Ephesians, to the Colossians and to Philemon, and were also given instructions to comfort the hearts of the saints by declaring all things pertaining to the apostle and his ministry.

Three others are next mentioned, Aristarchus, Marcus and Jesus, called "Justus". Aristarchus appears for the first time in Acts xix. 29, where he is spoken of as a man of Macedonia, and one of Paul's companions in travel. He, together with Gaius, was rushed into the theatre at Ephesus, and for the gospel's sake endured some rough treatment. He accompanied the apostle on his journey back to Jerusalem (Acts xx. 4), and on his voyage to Rome (Acts xxvii. 2). He is called a man of Macedonia, and a Macedonian of Thessalonica, but that he was not a Gentile is evident from Paul's statement in Col. iv. 11. The inclusion of Mark here is an encouragement to us all. As a younger man he had failed at a critical moment, and had left the service of the apostle. Here he is very graciously re-instated and commended to the church. This gracious attitude of the apostle is again evident in II Tim. iv. 11, where, in an atmosphere of desertion, the apostle can speak of the erstwhile deserter as "profitable to me for the ministry". Better to be a Mark than a Demas. Instead of following the A.V. here: "sister's son to Barnabas" we should read: "cousin to Barnabas." Anepsios is used by Eusebius when he calls Symeon ton anepsion of Christ, because Cleophas, his father, was the brother of Joseph. This meaning of the word is found in the LXX (Tobit vii. 2), and in the classical writers. The third person who joined in the sending of greetings to the church was Jesus, who is called "Justus". We can quite understand that the name Jesus, common enough among the Jews, would appear too sacred a name to be put to common use among believers, and so Jesus was also called by the Latin name Justus:--

> "Of the circumcision, these only are my fellow-labourers for the Kingdom of God, who have been a comfort to me."

It appears that very few Hebrew Christians associated themselves with the great ministry of the apostle. Those who did thus serve together with the apostle, are mentioned with joy, but we must remember that the dispensation of the mystery and the imprisonment of Paul were "for the Gentiles". While, therefore, the first section, Col. i. 23-28, speaks of the revelation of the mystery by God, and the exclusive dispensation received by the apostle, the second section, Col. iv. 2-11, shews that this exclusiveness did not render the apostle in the wrong sense independent. Most gladly he welcomed the intercession of the saints, and prized even the fellowship of a runaway slave, or of a re-instated Marcus. There is here a wonderful blending of deep doctrine and simple-hearted living, the mystery of God with its riches and glory, and "all my state" and the "comfort of hearts".

We must now return to the fist chapter and take up the thread of the epistle at verse 28, to find, as the structure of the epistle indicates, that we must turn back to Col. iv. once more to discover the sequel.

#16. Preaching and prayer that presents perfect (i. 28 - ii. 1 and iv. 12, 13).

pp. 212 - 217

We have now considered the two members of the epistle that deal with the ministry and manifestation of the mystery, viz., Col. i. 23-28 and iv. 2-11. In the first case, the mystery was manifested by God to Paul, and in the second it was manifested by Paul to all who had, and have, ears to hear.

As a sequel, we have, as indicated in the structure, both preaching and praying, with the perfecting of the believer in view. The two members stand thus in the structure of the epistle as a whole, which is set out in Volume XX, page 57:--

E	i. 28 - ii. 1.	Preaching to present perfect.
E	iv. 12, 13.	Prayer to stand perfect.

In order that this new section shall be seen from the Word itself, and not merely from our disposition of the matter, we will quote the two passages from the A.V.:--

"Warning every man and teaching every man in all wisdom: that we may present every man perfect in Christ Jesus: Whereunto I also labour, striving according to His working which worketh in me mightily. For I would that ye knew what great conflict I have for you and for them at Laodicea, and for as many as have not seen my face in the flesh" (Col. i. 28 - ii. 1).

"Epaphras, who is one of you, a servant of Christ, saluteth you, always labouring fervently for you in prayers, that ye may stand perfect and complete in all the will of God. For I bear record, that he hath a great zeal for you, and them that are in Laodicea, and them in Hierapolis" (Col. iv. 12, 13).

The items that link these two passages together are the double reference to Laodicea, the use of agonistic terms, agon = "conflict" (Col. ii. 1), agonizomai = "striving" (Col. i. 29), and "labouring fervently" (Col. iv. 12). These are subordinate, however, to the central theme:--

"That we may present every man perfect in Christ Jesus" (Col. i. 28).
"That ye may stand perfect and complete in all the will of God" (Col. iv. 12).

The correspondence will be the more readily perceived if set out as follows:--

Paul (Col. i. 28 - ii. 1).

A | METHOD.—Warning and teaching.
B | ACCOMPANIMENT.—Striving (agonizomai).
C | OBJECT.—Present perfect.
D | ANNOUNCEMENT.—For I would that you should know.
E | ACCOMPANIMENT.—What great conflict I have for you.
F | OBJECTS.—For Laodicea and for as many as have not seen my face in the flesh.

Epaphras (Col. iv. 12, 13).

A | METHOD.—Prayers.
B | ACCOMPANIMENT.—Labouring fervently (agonizomai).
C | OBJECT.—Stand perfect.
D | ANNOUNCEMENT.—For I bear him record.
E | ACCOMPANIMENT.—That he hath great zeal for you.
F | OBJECTS.—For Laodicea and for Hierapolis.

Let us follow the teaching of these passages step by step. First as to the methods adopted by these two servants of the Lord. The one employed "warning and teaching", the other "praying". The apostle has recognized this double ministry elsewhere:--

"I have planted, Apollos watered; but God gave the increase. So then neither is he that planteth anything, neither he that watereth; but God that giveth the increase. Now he that planteth and he that watereth are one; and every man shall receive his own reward, according to his own labour. God's fellow-workers are we, God's husbandry, God's building are ye" (I Cor. iii. 7-9).

The ministry of the apostle in this special labour for the Colossians is described as "warning and teaching". If the reader will refer to the structure of the epistle given in Volume XX, page 57, he will see that the central member commences with the word "Beware". The great difference between Ephesians and Colossians is in this central section (Col. ii. 4-23) with its warning notes:--

"And this I say lest any man beguile you."

"Beware lest any man spoil you."

"Let no man therefore judge you."

"Let no man beguile you of your reward."

Admonition or warning belongs to the training and discipline of children: it presupposes life and position in the family:--

> "Ye fathers, provoke not your children to wrath, but bring them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord" (Eph. vi. 4).

Admonition or warning belongs to growth, to walk, to the things that accompany salvation, to the prize or reward, not so much to salvation in its first place:--

> "Know ye not that they which run in a race run all, but one receiveth the prize. So run that ye may obtain . . . . . All our fathers were under the cloud, and all passed through the sea, and were all baptized . . . . . all did eat . . . . . all drank . . . . . but with many of them God was not well pleased . . . . . Now all these things happened unto them for ensamples: and they are written for our admonition" (or warning) (I Cor. ix. 24 - x. 11).

"Warning and teaching" are related as "practice and doctrine" are related.

We must now turn our attention to the central theme. In this chapter there are two "presentings", and they are intimately associated:--

(1) "In the body of His flesh through death to present you holy and unblameable and unreproveable in His sight" (Col. i. 22).
(2) "That we may present every man perfect in Christ Jesus" (Col. i. 28).

The reader is sufficiently taught, we trust, to realize that the work of Christ on our behalf is so complete, that to speak of adding to it or "perfecting" it is nothing short of treason. The words used preclude all possible addition. What can be added to holiness? and what improvement can there be upon a condition which is both unblameable and unreproveable in God's sight. That which is unreproveable there is surely unimproveable here; and yet the fact remains that Paul does say, and in the near context, "That I may present every man perfect", even though the ink that wrote verse 22 was scarcely dry.

The difficulty lies in the word "perfect", and the meaning that it has attached to it in modern speech. The derivation of the English word, however, takes us nearer to the meaning of the Greek original. "Perfect" has come into English through the old French parfait, which in its turn comes from the Latin per = "thoroughly" and facere = "to make". Now the word "fact" comes from the same verb facere, and if we can see in the word "perfect" the idea of making that which is a "fact" in Christ, a "fact" also experimentally, we shall be near the truth contained in the two presentings of Col. i. There is, however, only one true method of arriving at the meaning of a word, and that is by a canvass of its usage together with its etymology.

The word translated "perfect" in Col. i. 28 is teleios, and if we bring together the various words that are derived from the same root or stem, we shall be in a position to understand its essential meaning.

(1) Telos . . . . . An end . . . . . "Then cometh the end" (I Cor. xv. 24).
(2) Teleo . . . . . To end . . . . . "I have finished my course" (II Tim. iv. 7).
(3) Teleios . . . . . What has reached its end . . . "Every man perfect" (Col. i. 28).
(4) Teleiotes . . . . Perfection . . . . . "Let us go on unto perfection" (Heb. vi. 1).
(5) Teleioo . . . . . To finish . . . . . "That I might finish my course" (Acts xx. 24).
(6) Teleios . . . . . Perfectly . . . . . "Hope to the end" (I Pet. i. 13).
(7) Teleiotes . . . . Finisher . . . . . "Author and Finisher" (Heb. xii. 2).

There are other words used in the N.T. derived from the same source, and also quite a number of compounds, but we have sufficient for our purpose in the list above. The etymology of the word suggests that "perfect" has something to do with the "end" with a "finish". The usage of the word leaves us without any doubt. It is found as an antithesis to "begin" and "beginning", and is employed in association with the running of a race with a prize in view. It is used of Christ Himself in connection with the "finishing" of His work, although the idea of His "being made perfect" as a result of his sufferings cannot be tolerated, if by the word "perfect" we mean moral or spiritual improvement. Let us take a few occurrences of the word "perfect" in order to establish its meaning by its usage:--

> "Having begun in the Spirit, are ye now made perfect by the flesh?" (Gal. iii. 3).

Here the word is used in its natural meaning. Over against "begun" the apostle places "made perfect", where the mind thinks of the idea of "ending" or finishing"":--

> "Therefore leaving the word of the beginning of Christ (A.V. margin), let us go on unto perfection" (Heb. vi. 1).

Here once more a literal rendering throws "beginning" and "perfection" or "ending" into prominence:--

> "That as he had begun, so he would also finish" (II Cor. viii. 6).

Here, the word translated "to make perfect" in Gal. iii. 3 is translated "to finish":--

> "I have fought a good fight, I have finish my course, I have kept the faith" (II Tim. iv. 7).

The figure that occurs with the use of this word both in I Corinthians and Hebrews, also in Ephesians, is that of a full-grown adult:--

> "Howbeit we speak wisdom among them that are perfect . . . . . I could not speak unto you as unto spiritual, but as unto carnal, even as unto babes in Christ. I have fed you with milk and not with meat" (I Cor. ii. 6; iii. 1, 2).
>
> "For when for the time ye ought to be teachers, ye have need that one teach you again which be the first principles of the oracles of God, and are become such as have need of milk, and not of strong meat. For every one that useth milk is unskillful in the word of righteousness: for he is a babe. But strong meat belongeth to them that are perfect (of full age), even those who by reason of use have their senses exercised to discern both good and evil. Therefore leaving the word of the beginning of Christ, let us go on unto perfection" (Heb. v. 12 - vi. 1).
> "Till we all come . . . . . to the perfect man . . . . . that we henceforth be no longer children" (Eph. iv. 13, 14).

With the knowledge that we now have of the word under discussion, we can return to Col. i. and realize that there is no intrusion into the finished work of Christ by Paul's statement, but rather the idea that the believer, whose holiness is already an unalterable fact in Christ, should by teaching and admonition make that fact real experimentally, that he should take to the end, or to its logical conclusion, such a glorious position as is his by grace. When the same apostle speaks of yielding the body as a living sacrifice, he calls it a "reasonable" or "logical" service, in other words, the exhortation of Rom. xii. is but the logical sequel of the doctrine of Rom. vi., or the "perfecting holiness" of II Cor. vii. 1.

When we come to the great central section with its warning "Beware!" we shall find that it largely deals with a false sanctification that had its base in the flesh, and was not the outcome of that completeness in Christ, which is the glory of the revelation of the mystery. The apostle knew too well that it is easy to become simply a doctrinaire; this he had already countered in Ephesians—with its perfect balance of doctrine with practice, and in Philippians—with its exhortation to "work out" because it was God Who "worked in".

A further expansion of this truth is found in the next corresponding section of Colossians, viz., ii. 2, 3 and iii. 1-4. To these passages we must turn in our next articles.

The Coming of the Lord.

#17. The N.T. fulfillment.
The revelation of the Lord (I Corinthians).
pp. 23 - 27

We saw that to the Thessalonians the apostle opened up his teaching on faith, love and hope, and we found them "waiting for God's Son from heaven". I Corinthians defers the glorious development of the theme of faith, love and hope until chapter xiii., but gives a place in the opening chapter to another aspect of this writing:--

> "I thank my God always on your behalf, for the grace of God which is given you by Jesus Christ. That in everything ye are enriched by Him, in all utterance, and in all knowledge; even as the testimony of Christ was confirmed in you; so that ye come behind in no gift; waiting for the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ" (I Cor. i. 3-7).

The word that is used for the second coming in I and II Thessalonians is parousia, a word which is used in Matt. xxiv. 3, 27, 37 and 39. The occurrences of the word in both epistles to the Thessalonians are six in number: I Thess. ii. 19, iii. 13, iv. 15, v. 23 and II Thess. ii. 1 & 8. Omitting those passages that use the word of an individual "coming" (as in Titus), the remaining references to the parousia are I Cor. xv. 23; James v. 7, 8; II Peter i. 16, iii. 4, 12 and I John ii. 28. These passages provide a complete revelation of the character, time and accompaniments of the second coming and, on examination, they will be found to associate this coming entirely with the hope of Israel. The observant reader will have noticed that there are no references to the parousia of the Lord in the epistles of the mystery. This we must consider at some later time.

The Apocalypse.

The word used in I Cor. i. 7 is not parousia but apokalupsis, and should be rendered revelation. The word usually refers to a mode of inspiration (as in Gal. ii. 2—"I went up by revelation"), but in several passages it is used of the second coming of the Lord (see II Thess. i. 7; I Pet. i. 7, 13; iv. 13; Rev. i. 1 and I Cor. i. 7). To the churches at Corinth and Thessalonica, therefore, the apostle uses both words to express the hope before them: parousia—the personal presence, and apokalupsis—the unveiling of that Person. II Thess. i. 7 associates the unveiling with "flaming fire" and "vengeance", and this statement is but a summary of the great book of the unveiling—"The Book of the Revelation."

It was this that occupied the hearts of the church at Corinth and at this revelation the Corinthians were warned that there would be another unveiling—that of their own works: "For the day shall declare it, because it shall be revealed by fire" (I Cor. iii. 13). The close association of the sins of fornication and the eating of things sacrifice to idols found in I Cor. vii. and viii. becomes more intense when we read these chapters in the light of Rev. ii. 14 & 20, and of the covenants, old and new. The Corinthians were encouraged to remember that, at this revelation, to those who had "so run", the award of an incorruptible crown would be given.

The hope of the church during the period of the Acts was the coming of the Lord as set forth in Matt. xxiv. and in the Revelation, and, closely associated with this phase, we find, in I Cor. i. 3-7, a strong emphasis upon supernatural gifts.

Spiritual gifts.

The apostle thanks God for the rich enduement received by the Corinthians: "That in everything ye are enriched by Him, in all utterance, and in all knowledge" (I Cor. i. 5). The word logos, translated here "utterance", refers to the spiritual gifts detailed in I Cor. xii. 8: "To one is given by the Spirit the word of wisdom: to another the word of knowledge, by the same Spirit." "All knowledge" is linked with prophecy, the understanding of all mysteries, and the faith that removes mountains (I Cor. xiii. 2). And in verse 8, in association with prophecies and tongues, "knowledge" is among the gifts that shall vanish away. The apostle speaks of these gifts not only as an enrichment, but as a confirmation: "Even as the testimony of Christ was confirmed in you" (I Cor. i. 6). This confirmatory character of spiritual gifts is found in other passages, for example, in Heb. ii. 3, 4:--

> "Which at the first began to be spoken by the Lord, and was confirmed unto us by them that heard Him, God also bearing witness, both with signs and wonders, and with divers miracles, and distributions of holy spirit (the gifts, not the Give), according to His own Will."

Again, in writing a subsequent letter to the Corinthians, the apostle refers to this same thing:--

> "Now He which confirmeth (the same word as in I Cor. i. 6) us with you in Christ, and hath anointed us, is God; Who hath also sealed us, and given the earnest of the Spirit in our hearts" (II Cor. i. 21, 22).

While the inward "seal and earnest" is found in Eph. i. 13, 14, the external anointing and confirmation belong to this earlier period which is governed by the hope of Israel. The spiritual gifts are not to be separated from the hope of the Lord's coming; they are essentially connected with it: "So that ye come behind in no gift: waiting for the revelation of our Lord Jesus Christ" (I Cor. i. 7).

"Till He come."

The hope of the church as expressed in I Cor. i. cannot be different from that of the same church mentioned in I Cor. xi. No details concerning the Lord's coming are given in the latter chapter because it is only introduced to convey the thought of the continued remembrance of the Lord's death "till He come". That this coming, however, is the revelation of the Lord already referred to in I Cor. i. 7, is indicated by its close proximity to the same spiritual gifts (I Cor. xii.). If it is argued from I Cor. xi. 26 that as the Lord has not come, we must still observe the Supper, could it not also be argued from

I Cor. i. 3-7, that as the Lord has not come, we must still "come behind in no gift: waiting for the revelation of our Lord Jesus Christ"?

In the second instance the fallacy of the argument is more manifest, for we do not possess the gifts. In the first instance, however, the gathering round the Lord's table would appear to fulfil all the requirements, but, when we take into account the solemn statements of the closing verses of this chapter, it is manifest that the mere observance of the ordinance may only be an apparent obedience.

> "Guilty of the body and blood of the Lord . . . . . For this cause many are weak and sickly among you and many sleep" (I Cor. xi. 27-34).

Again, in I Cor. x. 16, 17, a vital connection is established between the "one body" and the "one loaf". As this "one body" is clearly the one church possessed of the varied spiritual gifts (I Cor. xii. 12, 13, 27), it is clear that the continuation of the Lord's Supper by those who have not spiritual gifts, is as lacking in scriptural justification as the observance of the Supper based upon the argument that the words "Till He come" cover the present dispensation. When the hope of Israel passed away from the immediate horizon, gifts passed with it.

The connection between the Lord's Supper and the new covenant is another feature linking this coming with the restoration of Israel. The reader is referred to the series "Studies in the Prophets" in Volume XVIII, page 37, for an article showing the connection of the restoration of Israel with the new covenant. The church of the mystery is so far removed from the restoration of Israel, that it has its place during the very period when Israel are set aside. The phase of the Lord's coming that constitutes the hope of that church differs in many respects from the hope of the church during the Acts. It is connected neither with spiritual gifts to confirm, nor with symbolical rites to remember, nor with the new covenant (which cannot be severed from the hope of Israel—see Jer. xxxi. 31-37). The "new testament" of Matt. xxvi. 28 is exactly the same as the "new covenant" of Heb. viii. 8.

The parousia.

The parousia, or "personal presence" aspect of the Lord's coming occurs in I Cor. xv. 23: "Christ the firstfruits; afterward they that are Christ's in His parousia. Then the end." The reader is referred to Volume XX, page 188, for the connection between firstfruits and the second coming. While much else must be said in the exposition of this passage as a whole, in its reference to the second coming of the Lord, it is but one of a series of passages that present an unbroken testimony. It is evident that the particular resurrection of those who are in Christ at His parousia, that is in view here, is described with fuller detail in verses 51-58. In so doing the apostle is not inspired to add anything to prevent his readers associating the "last trump" here with the last trump of which John subsequently writes in the Apocalypse; neither does he see anything in the coming of the Lord as then taught and expected that would prevent him from intimately connecting that coming with Israel's restoration, as witness the "When . . . . . then" of I Cor. xv. 52, and Isa. xxv. 1-9. In Matt. xxiv. the Lord associates His coming with, and indeed dates it as, the period "after the tribulation". In II Thess. ii. that coming is directly connected with the man of sin, and must therefore come after the church of the one body has ceased on the earth: the same is true in I Cor. xv.

One cannot have the hope associated with the early part of the Acts, with its baptisms, its gifts and its close connection with Israel, and at the same time hold to the one hope of our calling, with its one baptism, its absence of gifts, and its dissociation from Israel. That many attempt this incongruous combination, and are apparently blessed in so doing, cannot justify any trifling with truth or the setting up of an argument of mere expediency. If the Lord were swift to mark iniquity, or if He refused to accept anything short of perfection in service, who of any of us would stand?

#18. The N.T. fulfillment.
The hope before Jew, Gentile, and "the creature" (Romans).
pp. 65 - 68

In bringing our investigation of the earlier epistles of Paul to a close we have to consider the testimony of the epistle to the Romans. We shall not find in it the precision of I Thess. iv., because the hope was by that time well taught and believed. Instead, we have references to the various accompaniments of the Lord's coming, these being necessary to complete the revelation of truth.

The seven passages in Romans.

Seven passages in the Epistle refer to the coming of the Lord, or to some event that necessitates it. These passages taken together form a complete whole:--

A | ii. 1-6. Jew and Gentile. Reward and punishment.
  B | viii. 17-25. Deliverance from bondage of the creature.
    C | xi. 26. The Deliverer. Isa. lix. 20 quoted.
      D | xiii. 11-14. Salvation nearer than when we believed.
    C | xiv. 9-12. The Judge. Isa. xlv. 23 quoted.
A | xv. 12, 13. Jew and Gentile. The hope.
  B | xvi. 20. Satan bruised shortly.

Jew and Gentile.

The first passage is one of judgment, and judgment yet to come: "The day of wrath and revelation of the righteous judgment of God" (Rom. ii. 5). This judgment of God is administered by the Lord Jesus Christ: "In the day when God shall judge the secrets of men by Jesus Christ, according to my gospel" (Rom. ii.16). Jew and Gentile are in view in this passage, but there is appended the statement that "there is no respect of persons with God" (Rom. ii. 11).

The parallel passage of Rom. xv. 12, 13 brings Jew and Gentile together in hope. The force of this passage is blunted in the A.V. by the rendering of the word "hope" in verse 12 as "trust". The passage should read:--

> "There shall be a Root of Jesse, and He that shall rise to reign over the Gentiles: in Him shall the Gentiles HOPE, now the God of the HOPE fill you with all joy and peace in believing, that ye many abound in the HOPE through the power of the Holy Ghost."

The argument of chapter ii. is that the Jew, equally with the Gentile, shall be judge; the argument of chapter xv. is that the Gentile, equally with the Jew, shares in the hope brought in by the "Root of Jesse". These trains of thought we must take up more fully in the series devoted to the epistle to the Romans. For the moment we pass on to chapter viii.

The creature.

Here we leave Jew and Gentile, and deal with the creature as such. In Rom. v. 12 Adam is introduced, and from that verse to the end of chapter viii. we are dealing with deeper issues than those connected with either Gentile or Jew, considered separately. Here we find suffering endured in view of glory.

> "The glory that shall be revealed in us. For the earnest expectation of the creature waiteth for the revelation (apokalupsis) of the sons of God" (Rom. viii. 18, 19).

Here we have "the creature", a deeper principle than that of nationality, Jew or Gentile. Here, too, we have "sons of God", equally a greater sphere, and going back to Adam and Eden (Luke iii. 38).

This revelation of the sons of God awaits resurrection, when

> "the creature itself also shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption in the liberty of the glory of the children of God . . . . . awaiting for the adoption, the redemption of our body" (Rom. viii. 21-28).

This "salvation by hope" that looks forward to the complete emancipation of "the creature", the "redemption of the body", demands such intimate acquaintance with the arguments of chapters v., vi. and vii. that we leave this passage also for closer study in due course. For the moment the one thing that concerns us is the gathering up of the varied items in Romans that illuminate the doctrine of the Lord's coming.

With this passage, that goes back to Adam and Eden, it is only natural that we should take Rom. xvi. 20 that likewise goes back to the same occasion:--

> "The God of peace shall bruise Satan under your feet shortly" (Rom. xvi. 20).
> "I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed; it shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise his heel" (Gen. iii. 15).

While in the first instance this prophecy looks to Christ Himself at Calvary, it also looks forward to the second coming when all the "seed" shall have entered by "adoption" into their glorious portion. Rom. viii. and xvi. deal with phases of the hope that transcends all limitations and dispensational boundaries, and make no difference to the most exclusive presentation of truth as given in the epistles written either before or since Acts xxviii.

Deliverer and Judge.

Rom. xi. 26 is part of a large section, occupying chapter ix.-xi., which deals with the dispensational positions of Israel and the Gentiles. Rom. xiv. 9-12 is part of a section, occupying the whole of chapter xiv. and part of xv., which deals with the particular interrelationship of Israel and the Gentile, the latter being now received and saved by the same Christ. In Rom. xi. 26 Gentiles are warned that a limit is set to the period of Israel's blindness: "And so all Israel shall be saved: as it is written, There shall come out of Sion the Deliverer, and shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob." The hope of Israel can only be deferred to God's good time: it can never fail.

A salutary word is given in Rom. xiv., possibly to the Gentile believer in his new-found liberty, wherein he was liable to despise the weaker scruples of his Hebrew brother:--

> "But why dost thou judge thy brother? or why dost thou set at nought thy brother? for we shall all stand before the judgment seat of Christ" (Rom. xiv. 10).

That judgment seat will be set up at the coming of the Lord, and is in view in I John ii. 28 and other similar passages. It remains therefore to heed the last central word, viz., Rom. xiii. 11-14:--

> "It is high time to awake out of sleep: for now is our salvation nearer than when we believed. The night is far spent, the DAY IS AT HAND: let us therefore cast off the works of darkness, and let us put on the armour of light."

Whether it be Peter (II Pet. iii. 11), James (Jas. v. 7), John (I John iii. 1-3), or Paul (Rom. xiii. 11-14), all agree in the moral issue, the practical outcome of the doctrine of the Lord's coming, viz., "Be ye also ready".

#19. The mystery that fills up the Word of God. "The one hope of your calling" (Ephesians).

pp. 110 - 112

We have now considered the complete scriptural teaching concerning the second coming of the Lord, with the exception of that of the prison epistles of Paul and of those pastoral epistles which were written after Acts xxviii. One thing at least has been established by this study—that the doctrine of the second coming is not by any means peculiar to the New Testament. Indeed it has been forced upon us by the sheer weight of the available evidence that there is not one N.T. reference to the second coming yet noticed, that is not either a quotation from the O.T. or an expansion of its teaching. The reader may find profitable study in traversing the ground already covered to discover the O.T. links. They are manifestly on the surface in Matt. xxiv. and in the Apocalypse. I Thess. iv. 16, 17 is not a new revelation; the mystery mentioned in I Cor. xv. 51 relates, not to the coming of the Lord, but to the "change" of the living believer at His coming; and the mystery of Rom. xi. 25 refers, not to the coming of the Deliverer, but to the duration of Israel's blindness.

The one hope of your calling.

If the prison epistles belong to the same dispensation as that which obtains throughout the rest of the N.T., or even in that part of it which follows the Gospels, then the hope will be the same, and will be expressed in similar terms. It will take place at the same time, in similar circumstances, and in the same sphere. There need be no mystery about our quest here; we have but to "search and see". While it is true that spiritual things can only be spiritually discerned, it is also true that the spirit of wisdom and revelation is not needed to count the number of times the parousia is mentioned in Ephesians, or to determine whether or not the archangel's voice is said to arouse the members of the one body.

In Eph. i. 17-23 we have a wonderful prayer recorded. It was in the first instance the prayer of the apostle Paul for the Ephesian saints, and he prays for nothing less than the spirit of wisdom and revelation in the knowledge of "Him"—either of Him (the Lord) or of it (the mystery) or probably of both, for they are inseparable (Col. ii. 2, R.V.). This spirit is in the first instance that "ye may know what is the hope of His calling". Now if the hope before the Ephesians had been already expounded in Paul's earlier epistles and public ministry, why should teaching cease at Eph. i. 16, and prayer for revelation commence? The prayer includes three subjects, two of which are confessedly new:--

> "The riches of the glory of His inheritance in the saints" and
> "The exceeding greatness of His power to usward who believe . . . . . when He raised Him from the dead . . . . . far above all."

The hope of His calling forms one of the seven features in the unity of the Spirit given in Eph. iv., where it is called "the hope of your calling". This one hope cannot be severed from the "one body" and the "one Spirit", for they are linked by the words "even as ye are called—in one hope of your calling".

There is no actual mention of the second coming of the Lord in Ephesians, but one or two statements are given that look forward to the end, and we must consider the evidence which they provide. "The dispensation of the fullness of times" when all things shall be gathered up in Christ, whether things in heaven or in earth, may refer to the great consummation towards which the purpose of the ages moves, but if it does, nothing is said as to the Lord's coming from heaven to earth.

The prior hope.

In Eph. i. 12 we read: "That we should be to the praise of His glory, who first trusted in Christ." The word for "first trusted" is, in the original, proelpizo, and does not occur elsewhere in either the N.T. or the LXX—its literal meaning is "pre-hoped". The passage is in correspondence with the words of verse 6, as shown in the structure:--

Eph. i. 5, 6.	A	Predestinated as children.
	B	According to the good pleasure of His will.
	C	To the praise of glory of His grace.
	D	Highly favoured in the Beloved.
* * * * * * *
Eph. i. 11, 12.	A	Predestinated as to inheritance.
	B	According to purpose . . . . . will.
	C	To praise of His glory.
	D	Who fore-hoped in Christ.

Pro in composition indicates place, time or preference. Instances of the third meaning are found in Rom. iii. 9 and xii. 10: "Are we better than they?" and "In honour preferring one another". And this meaning harmonizes with the parallel, "highly favoured", of verse 6. The hope of Ephesians is "prior" not only and not so much in the sense of time, although this is undoubtedly true, but rather in the sense of high favour and dignity—indeed, "far above all principality". "The exceeding riches of His grace" follow closely upon the statement of our being "made to sit together in the heavenlies in Christ Jesus" (Eph. ii. 6, 7).

It must be acknowledged that positive teaching concerning the second coming of the Lord does not enter into the revelation of the mystery in this epistle. If, however, we believe that "the hope of Israel was entertained by the apostle up to the time of his visit to Rome and his all-day conference with the leaders of the Jews there, then we are faced with two alternatives: either we must believe that the one hope concerning which the apostle prayed so deeply in Eph. i. was a hope known to all familiar with those O.T. passages considered in this series, or we must believe that with the revelation of the mystery was made known a new and corresponding hope. If the latter of these alternatives is not true, then the character of our hope is not, after all, distinctive or unique, and our calling, associated with a mystery hitherto unrevealed (Eph. iii.) and a sphere and period hitherto unknown (Eph. i. 3, 4) has no corresponding hope. But such is not the case; our hope and our calling are in harmony.

We have other epistles to examine before our study is complete, and we shall find in them evidence which is both positive and conclusive. To this investigation we must address ourselves in our next article.

#20. The mystery that fills up the Word of God. "The hope of glory" (Colossians).

pp. 146 - 149

It will be remembered that in writing to both the Thessalonians and the Corinthians, the apostle brings together in very vital connection "faith, hope and love". This blessed trio is found both in Ephesians and Colossians. In Ephesians we read:--

> "That we should be to the praise of His glory, who had a prior hope in Christ . . . . . after I heard of your faith in the Lord Jesus, and love unto all the saints" (Eph. i. 12-15).

The passage in Colossians is somewhat similar, the order, however, being reversed, and hope mentioned last:--

> "We give thanks . . . since we heard of your faith in Christ Jesus, and of the love which ye have unto all the saints, on account of the hope which is laid up for you in heaven, whereof ye heard before in the word of the truth of the gospel . . ." (Col. i. 3-5).

The subject that receives the fullest attention in this passage is "the hope". Let us note the various items in its definition.

(1) It is laid up in heaven.
(2) It formed part of the "word of the truth of the gospel".
(3) Which had all the world in view.

A superficial reading has led some to make of this passage a close parallel with I Pet. i. 4: "An inheritance . . . . . reserved in heaven for you." The words "reserve" and "lay up", however, are different, and the occasion when this inheritance is entered is very different also. "To lay up" is the translation of apokeimai, which occurs four times in the N.T.:-- > "Here is thy pound which I have kept laid up in a napkin" (Luke xix. 20).

> "The hope which is laid up for you in heaven" (Col. i. 5).
> "Henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness" (II Tim. iv. 8).
> "As it is appointed unto men once to die" (Heb. ix. 27).

The first occurrence, a non-doctrinal usage, gives the elementary meaning of the word, "laid up as in a napkin". The parallel passage (Matt. xxv. 18) indicates that this man "went and digged in the earth, and hid his lord's money".

We are already acquainted with the fact that the mystery as revealed in Ephesians and Colossians is said to have been "hidden" from ages and generations (Col. i. 26; Eph. iii. 9), and that the very life of the members of the one body is said to be "hid" with Christ in God, so that a hope "laid up" as a talent in a napkin is in harmony with a life "hid" and a mystery hitherto unrevealed.

This hope is laid up "in heaven". In one sense this is true of all blessings, for "every good and every perfect gift cometh from above", but it is not true that every blessing will be enjoyed "in heaven". Some will be enjoyed on earth, and some in the new Jerusalem. Those blessings that are not only heavenly in character, but which can only be enjoyed "in the heavenly places far above all", are those which pertain to the high calling of the mystery.

This special hope was made known to the Colossians by "the word of the truth of the gospel", an expression so in line with Eph. i. 13 as to be an intentional reference to the same thing. Let us put them together:--

> "Who had a prior hope in Christ, in Whom, ye also, upon hearing THE WORD OF TRUTH, THE GOSPEL of your salvation . . . . . having believed, were sealed with the holy spirit of promise."
>
> "For the hope that is laid up for you in heaven, whereof ye heard before in THE WORD OF THE TRUTH OF THE GOSPEL which . . . . . bringeth forth fruit . . . . . your love in the spirit."

This gospel had come unto the Colossians and all the world. The word "come" does not imply that when the apostle wrote these words the gospel referred to had actually been preached "in all the world". The word "come" is parontos, a participle of the verb pareimi, "to be beside", which also supplies us with the more familiar parousia, which means the actual, personal, presence of the Lord.

Peter, it will be remembered, emphasized that which he called "present truth" in II Pet. i. 12, which had in view the coming of the Lord as the day-star of Old Testament prophecy (II Pet. i. 16-21). That phase of truth was "present", or, as we sometimes say, "obtained", for the dispersion for whom he wrote. In the same sense the "laid up" hope of the mystery was "present", or "obtained", for those to whom Paul ministers in these prison epistles. This is "the present truth" for us, and just as Peter prayed that his hearers might be established in the present truth, so Paul prayed also (Col. i. 28, ii. 13). What we do well to remember is that a redeemed Israelite, called under the dispensation ministered by Peter, could not be "established" in truth that belonged to members of the one body; it would not be present truth to him. And just in the same way, the members of the one body cannot be established in truth outside that which is present to them, but only in that which has to do with the high calling of the mystery.

The apostle expands this idea of "present truth" a little later in the same chapter. After claiming the ministry of the one body as something very exclusively his own by reason of a dispensation given to him by God, "even the mystery" hitherto hidden from ages and generations, he proceeds:--

> "But now is made manifest to His saints (see 'all saints' in i. 4): to whom God would make known what is the riches of the glory of this mystery (see Eph. i. 18: 'The hope of His calling, the riches of the glory of His inheritance in the saints'), among the Gentiles (see Col. i. 6: 'Unto you and all the world') which is Christ among you the hope of glory" (Col. i. 26, 27).

The very fact that, in spite of the setting aside of Israel, and in spite of the cessation of supernatural gifts, Christ could be preached "among the Gentiles" necessitated some basis other than that given in earlier Scriptures. For where, apart from the mystery epistles, can we find warrant for going with a message of supernal grace and glory to Gentiles, independently of Israel, the new covenant, and the promises made to Abraham? Neither Israel, the new covenant, nor the promises to Abraham enter into the gospel and hope of the church which is His body.

The third chapter contains a further statement concerning our hope:--

> "When Christ, Who is our life, shall be made manifest, then shall ye also be made manifest with Him IN GLORY' (Col. iii. 4).

With this passage we should read Titus ii. 13:--

As we should like to devote rather more space than we have at our disposal now to a consideration of one or two other distinctive features of this hope, we reserve further comment until we write the next article of the series. For the moment we have seen that the same exclusiveness that belongs to the mystery itself belongs also to the hope of the mystery. We leave with the reader the thought that while some may look forward to the high privilege of meeting the Lord in the air, and others of going in with Him to the marriage feast, those blessed with all spiritual blessings according to the terms of Eph. i. 3-14 entertain the hope of one day being made manifest with Him in glory.

#21. The mystery that fills up the Word of God. His appearing (II Timothy).

pp. 186 - 189

In our last article we paused at the comparison between Col. iii. 4 and Titus ii. 13. These passages have two features in common which are specially connected with the hope of the mystery.

The first is the word "appearing'; the second the word "glory". In Col. iii. 4 "appear" in the original is phaneroo, and in Titus ii. 13 it is the cognate word epiphaneia. Before Acts xxviii. Paul uses the two words parousia and apokalupsis ("coming" and "revelation") when speaking of the Lord's coming, using epiphaneia once when speaking of the "brightness" of the parousia (II Thess. ii. 8). After Acts xxviii. he never again uses either of the words parousia or apokalupsis to define the second coming of the Lord, but takes up and uses the word epiphaneia. The very distinction of terms is eloquent. If the inspired apostle thus indicates a difference by the marked way he uses terms, it is for us, if we really believe God's Word, to acknowledge the difference and approve the things that are more excellent.

Epiphaneia occurs in Paul's epistles after Acts xxviii. as follows:--

> "Keep . . . . . until the appearing of our Lord Jesus Christ" (I Tim. vi. 14).
> "The appearing of our Saviour Jesus Christ" (II Tim. i. 10).
> "The Lord Jesus Christ, Who shall judge the quick and the dead at His appearing and His kingdom" (II Tim. iv.1).
> "Them also that love His appearing" (II Tim. iv. 8).
> "The glorious appearing of the great God" (Titus ii. 13).

The first reference in II Timothy does not relate to the second coming, which leaves us four passages. This "appearing" was the object, not only of the apostle's hope, but also of his love. He speaks of a crown of righteousness which shall be given not to himself only, but also to all those who love His appearing. That this is a most practical thing is evident by reading the verses that follow. In direct contrast with those who "love His appearing' is the pitiable example of Demas, who forsook the apostle—"having loved this present age".

There are some who put the doctrine of the second coming aside as being most impracticable teaching, and likely to breed a company of mere dreamers. II Tim. iv. reveals that this is far from being the truth, and Titus ii. is most positive in its teaching concerning the practical value of the hope of the church.

Titus ii. gives words of practical instruction to old and young; men and women. Servants, or more strictly speaking slaves, are exhorted to "adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour in all things", and this practical exhortation is emphasized by the passage dealing with the hope of the church:--

> "For the grace of God that bringeth salvation hath appeared to all men, teaching us that, denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously, and godly, in this present world; looking for that blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ; Who gave Himself for us, that He might redeem us from all iniquity, and purify unto Himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works" (Titus ii. 11-14).

The gist of this passage appears to be that the grace of God not only saves, but teaches us how to live subsequently, and that new life is expressed negatively by the denial of worldly lusts, and positively by righteousness, which, in its turn, is further expanded by placing in contrast "this present world" and "the glorious appearing", as in II Tim. iv. 8-10.

The simple sentence shorn of all explanatory matter is—"The grace of God teaches us that we should live looking." This is in marked contrast with II Tim. iv., where Demas "loved this present age": here, we are taught how to live "in this present age". There Demas is contrasted with those who "love His appearing"; here the true life in this present age is characterized by "looking for . . . . . the appearing". The words "glorious appearing" should be remembered that in Col. i. 27 we found that the preaching of Christ among the Gentiles during this parenthetical period ("to fill up the Word of God", Col. i. 25) was the pledge of their hope of glory, and that when Christ, Who is our life, shall be made manifest, then ye also, shall be made manifest with Him in glory. So it is with Titus ii. 13, the blessed hope is the manifestation of the glory. When hope is realized, then that which has only been partially enjoyed "by faith" will be entered in reality. Even now "by faith" we are raised together and made to sit together in the heavenlies: then, when hope is realized, we shall sit there in reality.

It would not be a realization of my calling to find myself in the millennial kingdom, however blessed and far beyond all merit such a lot would be. It would not be a realization of my calling to find myself, for any possible reason, occupying one of the twelve thrones of the apostles. No, my faith has received the testimony of God concerning this dispensation of the mystery, and the hope of that calling can only be realized "far above all". At present the Lord Jesus waits until the time appointed shall come. Before He descends, with all His angels, to take the kingdom and reign, He will be made manifest "in glory". There will be a moment which will be "the manifestation of the glory of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ". When that takes place, every member of the blessed company that constitutes "the church which is His body" shall be "made manifest with Him in glory". How do they get there? We are not told, and some questions of a similar nature are not answered (I Cor. xv. 35). No one, whatever be his calling, can enter into the realization of it apart from resurrection, but whether the resurrection of this church will be individual or collective, visible or invisible, is not revealed. The church of the mystery is not numbered among the denominations of Christendom. Its sudden cessation would have no effect upon the religious world. Its inception, its course, and its conclusion, are alike secret. Some will hear the archangel's voice; some will hear the last trump; but not so the church of the one body. Before that archangel speaks, or that last trump shall have sounded, every member of His body shall have been "manifested with Him in glory".

We have not included Phil. iii. 20 in our study, believing that there the apostle deals with the prize of the high calling and not its hope. We mention this in case our readers should think that it had been overlooked. This "blessed hope" is unconnected with signs of the times, except that as we see on the horizon the gathering together of events prophesied in Scripture, we know that our own hope is nearer. If only we could just "live . . . . . looking", this present age would have no hold upon us; we should indeed "love His appearing".

We have now given the doctrine of the Lord's coming a survey, in which, though we have had to pass over many interesting details, we have not consciously omitted any item of importance. Apart from the hope of the one body, the whole doctrine of both the O.T. and the N.T. on this subject is one and indivisible. While we dare not attempt to decide for others what constitutes their hope, it is plain to ourselves that I Thess. iv. is not the blessed hope of Titus ii. or of Col. i. and iii.

Here we must take leave of the subject, and in closing return to the point from which we commenced. The second coming of the Lord, as generally received, is not the theme of the prison epistles, and as their peculiar message is the basis of our own testimony, the absence of that doctrine from our pages in the past can be easily understood. We do, however, entirely endorse the teaching that the world can never grow better apart from the personal presence of the Lord, neither can the great and precious promises to Israel, the nations, or creation itself, be realized apart from His return. All this is true, without altering our own sphere of blessing and hope. Though different companies of the redeemed have as their respective hopes varying phases of the Lord's manifestation, differing as greatly as the hope of those whose inheritance is found "above all principality" differs from that of those meek ones who shall "inherit the earth", nevertheless all—kingdom, church, body and bride—are united in the one blessed fact that the Lord Himself is their hope. "Let us "live . . . . . looking".

The testimony of Daniel,
or The time of the end.

#13. The prophecy of the seventy weeks (ix.---Part 4).
pp. 27 - 33

The prophecy of the seventy weeks of Dan. ix. is divided into three parts, each of which is devoted to an explanation of events associated with one of the great time-periods of the prophecy. This can be seen more easily if set out as follows:--

Dan. ix. 24-27.

A1 | ix. 24. SEVENTY SEVENS.
a | Finish transgression.
b | Make an end (chatham) of sin.
c | Make atonement for iniquity.
a | Bring in everlasting righteousness.
b | Seal up (chatham) vision and prophecy.
c | Anoint the Most Holy.

A2 | ix. 25, 26. SEVEN SEVENS and SIXTY-TWO SEVENS.
a | The City.—Restoration.
b | The Messiah.—Coming.
c | Seven sevens and sixty-two sevens.
c | After sixty two sevens.
b | The Messiah.—Cut off.
a | The City.—Destroyed.

A3 | ix. 26, 27. THE ONE SEVEN. THE MIDST OF THE SEVEN.
a | Desolation decreed (shamem). End of Desolator.
b | Covenant made.
c | One seven.—7 years.
c | Midst of seven.—3½ years.
b | Covenant broken.
a | Desolation decreed (shamem). End of Desolator.

"Seventy weeks are determined upon thy people and upon thy holy city."—The word "determined" means "to cut off", and the passage indicates that God has set apart this period of time in which He will accomplish His purposes for the people and the city. At first there appears to be an undue repetition in the words of verse 24: "To finish the transgression, and to make an end of sins, and to make reconciliation for iniquity." But on examination the verse is found to be both true, like all Scripture, and prophetic.

"To finish" is a translation of kala, which means "to restrain", or "shut up", as in a prison: "Zedekiah . . . . . had shut him up" (Jer. xxxii. 3). As a substantive it is translated "prison", as in I Kings xxii. 27, II Kings xvii. 4 and eight other places. "The transgression" that is to be "shut up", or "imprisoned", has already been spoken of in Daniel. Pesha, "transgression", and pasha, "transgressor", occur in Daniel only in viii. 12, 13 and 23. To read these occurrences in their contexts is of itself sufficient indication that the period of the last seven of Dan. ix. is the setting, and as to what "transgression" is to be "imprisoned":--

> "The little horn . . . . . magnified himself against the prince of the host, and by him the daily sacrifice was taken away, and the place of the sanctuary was cast down. And an host was given him against the daily sacrifice by reason of transgression . . . . . the transgression of desolation . . . . . in the latter time of their kingdom when the transgressors are come to the full" (Dan. viii. 11-13, 23).

In Dan. ix. and Matt. xxiv. 15 it is "the abomination of desolation": here it is "the transgression of desolation". This refers to the violation of the temple and it sacrifices, and the desolation, once more, of Jerusalem. The day, however, is fixed when this desolation shall for ever cease, and the Desolator be imprisoned. It does not require great perception to see here a forecast of the incarceration of the Beast, the False Prophet and Satan as revealed in the Apocalypse.

"To make an end of sins."—The word "chatham" occurs again in the sentence: "To seal up the vision and prophecy." Job uses the expression: "My transgression is sealed up in a bag and thou sewest up mine iniquity" (Job xiv. 17). In Deut. xxxii. 34 the Lord is quoted as saying: "Is not this laid up in store with Me, and sealed up among My treasures?" and goes on to speak of the day of vengeance. In Dan. xii. 4 there is a paronomasia, "shut up" being satham, and "seal" being chatham, and this is repeated in verse 9, "shut up" being there "close up". It appears that the sense of "sealing" here is not so much that of confirmation as of "closing" or "shutting up". The one other reference to "sealing" in Daniel is in connection with the den of lions (vi. 17), and the object of that sealing is given: "That the purpose might not be changed concerning Daniel." The statement as to the sealing up of Israel's sins must be read with such other wonderful expressions as:--

> "Thou wilt cast all their sins into the depths of the sea" (Micah vii. 19).
> "Thou has cast all my sins behind Thy back" (Isa. xxxviii. 17).
> "I will remember their sin no more" (Jer. xxxi. 34).

The reason why God can righteously seal up Israel's sins, sew them in a bag, and cast them behind His back, is that the great atonement has been accomplished by Christ.

"To make reconciliation for iniquity."—Here the word is kaphar, and means "to make atonement". This is vital. This is precious. It belongs to no one section of the redeemed. In spite of what certain words in the English translation may from a superficial reading appear to teach, atonement belongs to both Old and New Testaments. This vital theme is too vast to be dealt with here, but we have devoted some space to it in the series entitled "Redemption", which should be consulted.

Thus end the first three blessings that are to come. Three more follow as a sequel:--

> "To bring in age-abiding righteousness."
> "To seal up the vision and prophecy."
> "To anoint the Most Holy."

Righteousness is to be the characteristic of Jerusalem and her people at the time of the end:--

> "Thou shalt be called the city of righteousness, the faithful city" (Isa. i. 26).
> "A King shall reign in righteousness" (Isa. xxxii. 1).
> "For Zion's sake will I not hold my peace, and for Jerusalem's sake I will not rest, until the righteousness thereof go forth as brightness" (Isa. lxii. 1).

It is not easy to arrive at an understanding of the words, "to seal up vision and prophecy". Some think that their purport may be that vision and prophecy will have finished their work and be no more needed. The statements may mean that God will set His seal to vision and prophecy and all will be fulfilled. Or, as Dan. xii. 4 indicates, a sealing up of the prophecies until the time of the end may be foreshadowed. Malachi is called in Rabbinical writings, "The Seal of the Prophets" because, with him, O.T. prophecy comes to an end. At present, however, we feel it wise to refrain from expressing a decided opinion as to the true interpretation, and we think that our readers will hold, with us, that rather than risk the perpetuation of error it is better thus to refrain.

"To anoint the Most Holy."—In Scripture the words translated "Most Holy" are never used of persons, but always of things dedicated to God. They should be rendered "Holy of Holies", and refer to the cleansing of the sanctuary spoken of in Dan. viii. 14.

These six items cover the glorious restoration that is to take place, but events of great magnitude occur before the goal is reached—events that revolve around the persons and work of Christ, and Anti-Christ:--

> "From the going forth of the commandment to restore and to build Jerusalem unto an Anointed One, a Prince, shall be 7*7 and 62*7; the street shall be built again: and the wall, even in troublous times. And after 62*7 shall Messiah be cut off, but not for Himself" (Dan. ix. 25, 26).

Some of our readers may have noticed that we did not trouble to show that this prophecy was accurately fulfilled. As to this it is common knowledge that the received date for the 20th year of Artaxerxes is B.C.454, and 62*7 or 434 years + the 7*7 or 49 years after B.C.454 brings us to A.D.29, the received date for the crucifixion, but when we faced the involved accounts of Herodutus, Thucydides, Xenophon and others, and the evidence of the Behistun Rock that must be unravelled before B.C.454 could be arrived at, we felt that little good would be accomplished by the survey—and it is contrary to our principles to accept any testimony without investigation. Let it be quite clear, however, that we implicitly believe that Dan. ix. is correct; whatever may be proved or fail to be proved from secular history. It would not, for instance, shake our faith in the slightest if some archaeological discovery called for another readjustment of dates; no one, however learned, would be prepared to go into the witness box and declare on oath the exact number of years after Christ this present year called A.D.1932 really is. From Adam to Christ chronology is constant in Scripture. Since then God has written no chronology in Scripture, and seeing that the calendar of the period after Christ is so muddled and involved, it is questionable whether God has not intentionally frustrated the attempts at forecasting prophetic dates. The interested reader will find a helpful summary on the subject in The Companion Bible, Appendix 57. When we are dealing with the statements of Scripture, however, we are on solid ground. The Lord rode into Jerusalem, and was acclaimed by the people as the Son of David, when it was near to Passover, and therefore in the month Nisan (Matt. xxi. 1-16), which is the same month in which the decree was issued by Artaxerxes (Neh. ii. 1). "After" this Messiah was to be cut off. "To be cut off" implies death by violence, e.g., "Neither shall all flesh be cut off any more by the waters of a flood" (Gen. ix. 11). The expression is, moreover, in constant use in the law where it is used as of the cutting off of an offender from all covenant relations, and of the consequent bearing of his own iniquity: "That soul shall be utterly cut off, his iniquity shall be upon him" (Num. xv. 31). It is most blessedly true that when the Messiah was cut off it was, as the A.V. renders it, "not for Himself", but the original of Dan. ix. 26 does not justify that translation, for it says, "and have nothing". Instead of a throne, He had a cross. Instead of many diadems, He wore a crown of thorns. Instead of a kingdom, He had a tomb. Of all the glories spoken of by the prophets, "He had nothing"! We are thankful for the earlier vision of Dan. vii., which reveals that in God's own time He should be invested with sovereignty, but that meanwhile iniquity was to rear its head and make its final grasp at world-wide dominion before the end came.

This is the revelation of the final week of Daniel. The people of a prince that shall come destroy the city of Jerusalem. Is this limited to the destruction under Titus in A.D.69? Jerusalem was again destroyed by the Romans in A.D.135. Again in A.D.559, in 636, in 1098, 1099, 1187 and 1244 was this city besieged, plundered and destroyed, by Persian, Saracen, Crusader and Turk—all people of the coming Gentile prince who shall be the incarnation of anti-Semitic cruelty. The focal point of Dan. ix. 27 is the confirmation, by this mighty prince, of a league. While the word berith usually refers to the covenants of God, it is used in a lower sense. The word is used when the "league" between king Asa and Ben-hadad, and the breaking of a "league" between Ben-hadad and Baasha are spoken of. In Isa. xxviii. 15 it is called a "covenant with death and sheol", and inasmuch as this awful covenant was made as a refuge from a threatened overflowing scourge, we can see that it speaks of the same prophetic period as does Dan. ix. 27. As the apostle Paul has declared, covenant breaking belongs to the time of the end (Rom. i. 31; II Tim. iii. 3). Apostates shall forsake the holy covenant, and do wickedly against it (Dan. xi. 30-32), and deceitful dealings, even after a league has been made, are spoken of in Dan. xi. 23.

Apparently, the little horn, the final Satanic king, will enter into an agreement with Israel at the opening of Daniel's last week. At the expiry of 3½ years he breaks his word, turns round upon this people and their worship, and attempts to blot out all sign and evidence of Israel's God and worship. What has been going on in Russia is a faint foreshadowing of his policy:--

> "He shall cause the sacrifice and oblation to cease."
> And for the overspreading of abominations he shall make it desolate" (Dan. ix. 27).

Al kanaph, "overspreading", means "a wing". Ginsburg, whose authority in matters of the Hebrew text is beyond our estimation, suggests that the true reading should be

Al kanno, "in its stead", as we read in i. 7, where it is translated "in his estate". If this reading be the true one, the passage would read:--

> "He shall cause the sacrifice and the oblation to cease, and IN ITS STEAD shall stand in the holy place" (see Matt. xxiv. 15) "the abomination that maketh desolate".

Scripture uses the word "abomination" for an idol.

This blasphemy and wicked opposition lasts no longer than 3½ years, as Rev. xiii. 5 confirms:--

> "Even unto the consummation, and that determined shall be poured upon the desolator" (Dan. ix. 27).

Here is a reference to the future outpouring of the vials of wrath, ending with the consignment of the beast to the burning flame (Dan. vii. 11 and Rev. xix. 20). With this the prophecy of Dan. ix. ends.

The remaining chapters (x.-xii.) are an expansion of detail bearing upon the closing seven years and the activities of the evil king at the end. This has been demonstrated in the structure of Dan. ix.-xii. given in Volume XXI, page 150. To these more intimate details we must address ourselves in the closing articles of this series.

#14. Principalities and powers (x.).
pp. 68 - 72

The prophecy of the seventy sevens, recorded in Dan. ix., is marked by two main features: (1) Israel's final restoration and blessing, (2) The rise of the antichristian power at the time of the end. These two features are intimately related, so that it is practically impossible to study one without studying the other. The three concluding chapters of Daniel, viz., x., xi. and xii., are one, and should be considered together with chapter ix. This we have already demonstrated in the structure of ix.-xii. set out in Volume XXI, page 150.

The two great sections, ix. and x.-xii. are allied, as may be seen by comparing the statements made in each. We make one comparison here:--

> "And he shall confirm the covenant with many for one week; and in the midst of the week he shall cause the sacrifice and the oblation to cease, and for the overspreading of abominations he shall make it desolate, even until the consummation, and that determined shall be poured upon the desolate" (or the desolator) (Dan. ix. 27).
> "And arms shall stand on his part, and they shall pollute the sanctuary of strength, and shall take away the daily sacrifice, and they shall place the abomination that maketh desolate. And such as do wickedly against the covenant shall be corrupted by flatteries but the people that do know their God shall be strong, and do exploits" (Dan. xi. 31, 32).

The opening revelation of Dan. x. forbids the success of all human schemes for peace and world improvement. The true sense is disguised in the A.V. under the translation: "but the time appointed (tsaba) was long." The Companion Bible corrects this by translating: "but (concerned) a long warfare", and Rotherham's version renders the clause: "a great warfare." The same word, which we translate here "warfare", occurs in Numb. xxxi. 3, 4, 5, 6, where it is consistently rendered "war".

The word tsaba in Dan. x. 1 is translated elsewhere in Daniel by the word "host" (viii. 10, 11, 12, 13), and is used in the title of the Lord, "The Lord of Hosts". Again in Isa. xl. 2 the A.V. itself endorses the translation of Dan. x. 1 suggested above, "Her warfare is accomplished", by adopting it.

Israel's warfare will be accomplished when Dan. ix. is fulfilled, and the theme of Dan. x.-xii. is stated by the angel to be "warfare, great". A warfare not only on earth, but in heaven, a warfare waged not only between armies of flesh and blood, but among principalities and powers. Rev. xii, with its "war in heaven", finds its place in these chapters. The war with the Lamb of Rev. xvii. 14 finds its place here too. The war of the beast against the two witnesses of Rev. xi. 7, the war of the dragon against the seed of the woman of Rev. xii. 17, and the war with the saints of Rev. xiii. 7 are all included in this "warfare, great".

There is special interest here for those who see their calling defined in the epistle to the Ephesians, for the veil is removed for a moment, and a glimpse is given of those mighty "principalities and powers, world-holders of this darkness, spiritual wickedness", who are the foes of all who seek to press on with the prize of the high calling of God in view.

We are told that from the first day that Daniel set his heart to understand, and to chasten himself before his God, his words were heard, and a heavenly messenger was sent to make the truth known (Dan. x. 12), yet we learn from verses 2 and 3 that Daniel mourned and fasted for three weeks before the message was delivered. Had no explanation of this long delay been given, we might have ventured upon a variety of conjectures, all of which would most likely have been false. But the heavenly messenger makes known the reason for the delay. Let us first of all get some idea of the glory of this messenger, and then the character of his opponent will be the better understood:--

> "Then I lifted up mine eyes, and looked, and behold a certain man clothed in linen, whose loins were girded with fine gold of Uphaz: His body also was like the beryl, and his face as the appearance of lightning, and his eyes as lamps of fire, and his arms and his feet like in colour to polished brass, and the voice of his words like the voice of a multitude" (Dan. x. 5, 6).

The close parallel with the description of the Lord found in Rev. i. will be apparent to every reader. The effect, too, upon Daniel is not unlike that upon John. John fell at the feet of the Lord as "dead". Daniel's' strength vanished, his comeliness turned into corruption, and he became in a deep sleep with his face toward the ground.

This mighty one revealed to Daniel that "the prince of the kingdom of Persia withstood him twenty-one days". It is at once obvious, that this would have been no ordinary prince of flesh and blood, for if Daniel, the beloved servant of the Lord, collapsed in his presence, surely the earthly prince of Persia would no less have done so. Not until Michael, one of the chief princes, came to his help, could this mighty one accomplish his mission and reveal the truth to Daniel.

Here, then, the veil is lifted for a moment. We see that there are not only kings and princes upon earth, but that there are satanic representatives at the courts of kings, ever seeking to frustrate the purpose of God. Michael, the Archangel, is said to be "your prince" (Dan. x. 21), and "the great prince that standeth for the children of thy people" (Dan. xii. 1). With the light of this revelation we can see that the prince and the king of Tyre of Ezek. xxviii. are more than men.

The heavenly messenger explains the prophetic character of Dan. xi. and xii. by saying:--

> "Now I am come to make thee understand what shall befall thy people in the latter days; for yet the vision is for many days" (Dan. x. 14).

Here is very clear testimony. The events befall Daniel's "people"—Israel. The period is "the latter times". And the revelation of Dan. xi. and xii. supplements that of Dan. ix., explaining with more detail "the one week", when the covenant made shall be broken "in the midst of the week", and a vivid light is thus thrown upon the blasphemous character of "the desolator".

A remarkable statement is made in Dan. x. 21:--

> "But I will show thee that which is noted in the scripture of truth."

First, the Hebrew word rasham, "noted", is exactly equivalent to the Chaldee resham of Dan. v. 24, 25; vi. 8, 9, 10, 12, 13, where five of the references deal with the signing of a royal decree, and two with words of doom written on the wall in Belshazzar's palace.

Secondly, to what did the angel refer when he spoke of the "scripture of truth"? Taken out of their context we might be excused for saying that the words referred to the writings of the O.T.; but, inasmuch as the revelation given to Daniel, and recorded by him, is unknown to the rest of the O.T., the question remains—To what scripture did the angel refer? Seeing that the earthly tabernacle was made after the pattern of the heavenly reality, may we not ask whether there is any reasonable objection to the suggestion that our Scriptures are an earthly shadow of a complete record accessible to the heavenly host, and which, as Psa. cxix. 89 declares, is "for ever settled in heaven"? It must be kept in mind that there are many features that are not the subject of revelation in the Scriptures, which nevertheless form a part of the great purpose of the ages. For example, Gen. iii. 1 reveals the presence and the character of the Serpent, which later revelation declares to be Satan, but Gen. i.-iii. makes no attempt to explain how such a being could be found in God's creation. However, for a fuller discussion of Dan. x. 21 the reader is referred to the article entitled "The Limitations of Scripture" in Volume III.102 (ii./iii.142).

The opening verse of chapter xi. must be read with the preceding chapter and not with chapter xi. The new revelation, and that which the messenger of God came to give Daniel, commences with the words of xi. 2, "and now will I shew thee the truth, Behold . . . . ."

With the preparation of heart given to Daniel he could endure the terrific unveiling of wickedness that was to usher in the end. No earthly power will ever be permitted either utterly to crush Israel or fully to restore Israel. Not only is Israel especially the care of the Lord Himself, but angelic ministry has been their portion all the time they have been in favour. Daniel and his believing people would be comforted as they looked back over the past. Not all the might of Pharaoh could save his firstborn; neither could the boastful Assyrian host save themselves from the destruction that came from the Angel of the Lord. Jericho's walls fell flat without the aid of battering ram or soldier, and the Red Sea stood as a wall at the word of the Lord. It is perfectly fitting that the grand sequel to Daniel, viz., the book of the Revelation, should be filled with angelic powers, some for and some against the Lord and His people.

At this point we leave the examination of this important section of the prophecy, and hope to take up the study of Dan. xi. armed with the knowledge that it pertains to Daniels' "people", and deals with the "latter days".

#15. Egypt, Syria, and the man of sin (xi.).
pp. 103 - 110

We now approach what is perhaps the most difficult and intricate chapter in prophecy, viz., Dan. xi. One of the chief elements of difficulty is due to the blending together of type and antitype and of history and prophecy. The problem is to determine the point at which the division occurs, to find the verse at which we may say, Here history ceases and prophecy begins. Chapter xi. contains a number of sections which we set out below for the clearer understanding of our problem:--

(1)	2-4.	Persian and Greek kings, ending in the "mighty king", Alexander the Great.
(2)	5-9.	The division of Alexander's empire among his generals. The introduction of two kings named the "king of the north" and the "king of the south".
(3)	10-20.	The alternating histories and policies of these kings of the north and south.
(4)	21-45.	The vile person and the willful king. The antichrist and the beast. The little horn of Dan. viii. 9.

The first section of this prophecy (verses 2-4) establishes a link with the earlier visions, and particularly with that of chapter viii. So that, although we have already considered this chapter, we must go back to it here, in order to establish the close association that is intended between the history of Persia and Greece and the future antichristian king:--

> The RAM of Dan. viii. 3 is interpreted as being Media and Persia (viii. 20).
> The HE-GOAT of Dan. viii. 5 is interpreted as being the king of Greece (viii. 21).
> The GREAT HORN between the eyes of the he-goat represents the first king of Greece, and the FOUR NOTABLE ONES that arose toward the four winds of heaven, are interpreted as four kingdoms that shall stand up in his stead (viii. 21, 22).

The angelic interpreter of Dan. xi. makes a fuller reference to these two great powers. We now learn that there were to stand up three kings in Persia, and that the fourth, richer than they all, would by his strength through his riches stir up all against the realm of Greece. Alexander is spoken of as a mighty king who shall rule with great dominion, and do according to his will, whose kingdom shall be divided toward the four winds of heaven. So far, the chapters are parallel. Returning, however, to Dan. viii. we find that here we immediately leave the fourfold sub-division of Alexander's kingdom for a consideration of the yet future dominion of the beast of the Apocalypse:--

> "And out of them came forth a little horn, which waxed exceeding great toward the south, and toward the east, and toward the pleasant land" (viii. 9).

This passage is interpreted in viii. 23-25 as follows:--

> "And in the latter time of their kingdom, when the transgressors are come to the full, a king of fierce countenance and understanding dark sentences shall stand up. And his power shall be mighty, but not by his own power: and he shall destroy wonderfully, and shall prosper and practice, and shall destroy the mighty and the holy people. And through his policy also he shall cause craft to prosper in his hand; and he shall magnify himself in his heart; and by peace shall destroy many: he shall stand up against the Prince of princes; but he shall be broken without hand."

It will be seen that in Dan. viii. no record is given of the history that intervenes between the break-up of the kingdom of Alexander and the advent of the antichristian king. This has an important bearing upon the interpretation of Dan. xi., for the prophecies concerning the kings of the south and north in xi. 10-20 are usually interpreted as being fulfilled in the doings of Ptolemy I, II, III, IV, V and VI, of Seleucus I, II, III and IV, and of Antiochus II, III and IV. Instead of commencing future prophecy at xi. 21, however, we follow the lead of Dan. viii. 23 and the explicit statement of Dan. x. 14 (viz., that the revelation of Dan. xi. and xii. concerns Israel "in the latter days"), and commence the prophetic and future section of Dan. xi. at verse 5, seeing in the activities of Ptolemy and Antiochus foreshadowings only and not fulfillments of the earlier verses.

Before proceeding further, it will be helpful to see the whole prophecy set out before us. The subject-matter is, of course, too vast and too involved for us to attempt to include every member, or to account for every detail. All we can do is to point out the most obvious features, leaving the reader the difficult but joyous task of seeking fuller details for himself.

Daniel xi. 3 - xii. 3.

A1 | xi. 3. A king. He shall do according to his will.
B1 | xi. 6. The king's daughter.
C1 | xi. 7-10. In his estate.
D1 | xi. 14. They shall fall.
A2 | xi. 16. A king. He shall do according to his will.
B2 | xi. 17. The daughter of women.
C2 | xi. 20. In his estate.
D2 | xi. 35. Some shall fall.
E | xi. 21-34. The vile Person.—In his estate.
a | 21. Flattery.
b | 22-32. | c1 | Heart against holy covenant.
d1 | He shall do (exploits).
c2 | Indignation against holy covenant.
d2 | So shall he do.
c3 | Forsake the holy covenant.
d3 | Place the abomination.
c4 | Against the holy covenant.
d4 | They shall do (exploits).
a | 33, 34. Flatteries.
A3 | xi. 36. A king. He shall do according to his will.
B3 | xi. 37. The desire of women.
C3 | xi. 38. In his estate.
D3 | xii. 1-3. Many shall awake.

We have only to look at this outline to perceive the unity of the prophecy, despite its involved character. At the time of the end there shall be a king who shall do according to his will. And not only is this king foreshadowed by Alexander the Great (xi. 3), but the doings of Alexander's successors also foreshadow yet future history leading up to the manifestation of the man of sin. Moreover, the strange break in the structure, occasioned by the introduction of the vile person and the setting up of the "abomination that maketh desolate", warns us to keep distinct the two important figures of prophecy, the beast and the false prophet.

We must go back to ancient history to discover the kingdoms associated with the rise of the man of sin. At Alexander's death, his kingdom was divided among his four generals as follows:--

(1) PTOLEMY took EGYPT and PLESTINE.
(2) SELEUCUS took NORTHERN SYRIA.
(3) CASSANDER took MACEDONIA and THRACE.
(4) LYSIMACHUS took ASIA MINOR.

It will be noticed that Dan. xi. 5 assumes that we shall recognize the identity of the king of the south, and verse 6 speaks familiarly of the king of the north. We have been prepared for some such terms as these by Dan. viii. 8, where the fourfold division of Alexander's kingdom is said to be towards the four winds of heaven. In agreement with this, we find in Dan. vii. 2, 3:--

> "Four winds of the heaven strove upon the great sea, and four great beasts came up from the sea, diverse from one another."

It is impossible for us at the present time to say which of the four successors of Dan. vii. 4-8 is the lion with eagle's wings, or which is the bear or the leopard or the monster. But that they speak of the future resuscitation of these four kingdoms is a matter beyond doubt. Taking everything into account we learn from scriptural prophecy to watch closely the "north" and the "south" kingdoms—northern Syria and Egypt. The wars and the policies that have been connected with these two powers in the past but foreshadow the "Eastern Question" of the time of the end. The endeavour to promote alliances by marriages such as that of Berenice, daughter of Ptolemy II to Antiochus II; or of Cleopatra to Ptolemy V, will again be attempted but prove futile. In this connection the structure proves of great value, for it reveals the fact that the final antichristian king will be proof against such allurements. This may, at first, seem strange, but it is in keeping with the doctrines of demons exposed in I Tim. iv., which will include "forbidding to marry".

It will be seen from the structure that the words, "in his estate" occurs four times. The Hebrew word ken means a base (as in I Kings vii. 31), and in the first three references of Dan. xi. in the LXX is translated by the word etoimasia, "a preparation". The latter is used in the N.T. of the work of a forerunner. Does this not seem to indicate that Satan, ignorant of the "times and seasons" which the Father has kept in His own power, is perpetually "prepared" with his man. Here, in Dan. xi., we have several kings in readiness, should the end have come. To this principle may be ascribed the close likeness which some outstanding characters in history have had to the prophetic picture. Quite a number of prophetic students believed that Napoleon was the man of sin. More recently Mussolini has been named. There may be many more, but at the end, Satan will be prepared with his man.

It would appear from Dan. xi. that towards the time of the end, and arising out of either Syria or Egypt, there will be several very marked anticipations of the man of sin. The description of the first abortive attempt is given in Dan. xi. 7-19, where we read of war between the kings of the north and south, and of an unsuccessful attempt to make Judaea independent, and so to "establish the vision". The verse concerned in the latter phrase needs some revision. The words, "the robbers of thy people" (Dan. xi. 14) may mean "the violent ones among thy people". These would be revolutionists who would league themselves with an apostate power to gain their own ends. They shall fail, however, for God alone is able to restore Israel to their land.

While Babylon and Nineveh have passed away, Egypt, Greece and Persia remain to this day, and it is from among these kingdoms that the last great oppressor shall arise.

Time would fail us in the attempt to deal with the details of this chapter, but perhaps the following analysis may be of help.

Main features of the future.

Daniel xi. 5.

A prince originating in Egypt possesses a great dominion. When this development in the near east takes shape—"Know that summer is nigh."

Daniel xi. 6.

A marriage alliance between Egypt and Syria for the purpose of making "an agreement" proves a failure.

Daniel xi. 7-19.

Conflicts between these two kingdoms will result in dire trouble in the "glorious land, which by his hand shall be consumed" (xi. 16) and end in a "staggering" defeat (xi. 19).

Daniel xi. 20.

Satan's attempt proving abortive, "in his estate" a raiser of taxes arises, who shall exact heavy tribute from Israel and the land of Palestine. His end shall be sudden and mysterious: "within a few days he shall be destroyed, neither in anger, nor in battle."

Daniel xi. 21-35.

Still undismayed, Satan causes to stand up "in his estate" one who is described as a "vile person". This one, instead of devastating the land, "comes in peaceably", and "obtains the kingdom by flatteries". "After the league made with him he shall work deceitfully with a small people; he shall enter peaceably even upon the fattest places." After stirring up strife against the king of the south, and apparently involving more than one king (xi. 27), he returns to his land with great riches, and at length manifests his true intent: "His heart shall be against the holy covenant" (xi. 28). This covenant is referred to in Dan. ix. 27: "He shall confirm the covenant with many for one seven."* In the midst of the seven years he breaks the covenant, causing sacrifice and offering to cease, "and in its stead (see note of The Companion Bible on Dan. ix. 27) the abomination that maketh desolate".

[NOTE * - The time that elapses from the making of the covenant to verse 31 is 3½ years. The career of blasphemy of verses 36-45 occupies the other 3½ years of the last seven of Dan. ix.]

So, from Dan. xi. 28 onwards, he has indignation against the holy covenant, and seeks out those who "forsake the holy covenant" so that he might break it. They "pollute the sanctuary" (xi. 31), "take away the daily sacrifice" which had been restored under the terms of the seven years' covenant with Israel, and place in the temple "the abomination that maketh desolate" (xi. 31). Those who have become apostate he will corrupt with flatteries, but those who know their God shall be strong and do exploits.

It is necessary to distinguish between the antichrist and the beast. The antichrist is the vile person (foreshadowed by Herod in Acts xii.) who has to do with Israel, and the breaking of the covenant. The beast is a vast political power, with whom the antichrist works, as Herod worked with Rome. Antichrist is not mentioned in the Revelation; his characteristics are given in the first epistle of John. His sphere is a religious one; that of the beast is more political.

Daniel xi. 36-38.

The way being prepared by the vile person in the breaking of the covenant, the willful king of Dan. xi. 36 arises. He is the king described in Rev. xiii., whose sway is not for the whole seven years, but, as Rev. xiii. 5 shews, for the last three years and a half:--

> "And the king shall do according to his will; and he shall exalt himself, and magnify himself above every god, and shall speak marvelous things against the God of gods, and shall prosper till the indignation be accomplished" (Dan. xi. 36).

A reference to II Thess. ii. 1-12 and Rev. xiii. 5-7 will remove any doubt that this willful king of Dan. xi. 36 is the man of sin himself. While Dan. xi. 36, 37 states that this king shall magnify himself above every god, verse 38 declares that he shall, "in his estate", honour a strange god, a god of forces, whom he shall acknowledge and increase with glory. This "strange god" is none other than Satan himself. When the Lord Jesus was tempted in the wilderness Satan offered him all the kingdoms of the world, for an act of worship. The beast of Rev. xiii. not only received worship and sat on the dragon's throne, but we read that "they worshipped the dragon which gave power unto the beast, and they worshipped the beast, saying, Who is like unto the beast? Who is able to make war with him?" He honours a "god of forces" (Heb. fortresses), and has dealings "in the inmost strongholds of a strange god", so that the cry is raised, "Who is able to make war with him?"

Attacked by the kings of the south and the north, he shall repulse them, and enter into "the glorious land", overthrowing many countries. While in the Holy land unpleasant tidings from the east and north trouble him, and he vents his fury upon many. He plants his tent between the seas (i.e., the Mediterranean and the Persian gulf, the extent of Israel's land being "from sea to sea"), and so attempts a further usurpation of the Messiah's glory. Yet he shall come to his end and none shall help him. Other scriptures make it plain that this mighty king is smitten of God, e.g., "He shall smite the earth ('earth' is eretz; some readings give ariz, 'the oppressor') with the rod of His mouth, and with the breath of His lips shall He slay the wicked" (Isa. xi. 4). To the same effect is the statement in II Thess. ii. 8.

This brings us to the rising up of Michael, the great tribulation, and the resurrection detailed in xii. 1-3. Owing to lack of space, we defer any comment upon this section to our next article, but we desire to impress upon the reader that it is an integral part of the prophecy of Dan. xi. The epilogue of the whole book begins at xii. 4.

In conclusion let us remind ourselves of the importance of the association between the prophecies of the four chapters—vii., viii., ix. and xi. They may be visualized as follows:--

Daniel vii.

Four beasts. One having ten horns, and developing the man of sin. Destroyed by the Lord Himself.

Daniel viii.

Four kingdoms develop out of Greece. The king of fierce countenance arises from one of these. He is characterized by blasphemy and craft, and he shall be broken without hand.

Daniel ix.

At the time of the end, a covenant shall be made with Israel for seven years. This shall be broken in the midst, being followed by the placing of the abomination in the holy place.

Daniel xi.

This chapter associates the four divisions of Alexander's kingdom with the vile person, who breaks the covenant and sets up the abomination, and the willful king, who comes to his end at the hand of the Lord "in the glorious holy mountain".

#16. Michael, tribulation and resurrection.
pp. 142 - 146

The opening verses of Dan. xii. belong to the prophecy of Dan. xi., and must not be confused with the epilogue of the book which begins at verse 4.

Our study of the eleventh chapter brought us to the period covered by the last "week" of Dan. ix., and the doings of the "vile person" and the "willful king":--

> "At that time shall Michael stand up, the great prince which standeth for the children of thy people: and there shall be a time of trouble, such as never was since there was a nation, even to that same time: and at that time thy people shall be delivered, every one that shall be found written in the book. And many that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt. And they that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament; and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars for ever and ever" (Dan. xii. 1-3).

The statements in these verses are so definite and are quoted so clearly in other parts of Scripture that there is no difficulty in distinguishing the events which will occur at the time of the end. Let us tabulate them:--

(1) The end of the "warfare great", that eventuates in the destruction of the man of sin, is signalized by the standing up of Michael. We are told in Jude 9 that Michael is the Archangel, and in Dan. xii. 1 that he stands for the people of Israel.
(2) When Michael stands up, two unparalleled events take place:--
  (a) A time of trouble greater than any other, either before or since.
  (b) A resurrection of the dead.

It is unnecessary to prove that there can be but one such time of trouble, and that if we read elsewhere of an unparalleled tribulation it must refer to the same period. Such a reference occurs in Matt. xxiv. 15-22:--

> "When ye therefore shall see the abomination of desolation spoken of by Daniel the prophet stand in the holy place . . . . . flee . . . . . for then shall be great tribulation, such as was not since the beginning of the world to this time, no, nor ever shall be."

When studying Dan. xi., we were directed to II Thess. ii. for light upon the subject of the "willful king". Now the two epistles addressed to the church at Thessalonica deal with the same theme, the second epistle correcting come misinterpretations of the first. And as we were directed to the second epistle by Dan. xi., so we are directed to the first by Dan. xii.:--

> "For the Lord Himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the Archangel, and with the trump of God" (I Thess. iv. 16).

The presence of Michael the Archangel is always associated with resurrection (Dan. xii. 1; I Thess. iv. 16; Jude 9) or spiritual war (Dan. x. 13; Jude 9; Rev. xii. 7).

It is utterly impossible to read into any of these passages the hope of the church of the mystery. The Thessalonians knew nothing of such a company, but were clearly told that they belonged to that part of God's purpose connected with the rise of the man of sin. Matt. xxiv. and I & II Thess. are intimately connected. Michael stands for Israel. Years after he had written I Thess. iv. 16 Paul could say, "For the hope of Israel I am bound with this chain" (Acts xxviii. 20). The hope entertained throughout the period covered by the Acts is this hope of Israel.

"Many that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake."—This is a simple yet full statement, for it includes the whole doctrine of the state of the dead, and the nature of the resurrection. Death is called a "sleep", a term that belongs to both Old and New Testaments, and is found in both the Gospels and the Epistles. This sleep is "in the dust of the earth", a statement void of meaning if the dead are at the same time fully awake in Paradise. Resurrection is the awakening of the sleeper, as in Eph. v. 14. Comment of these questions would be quite unnecessary if unscriptural doctrines arising out of the idea of the natural immortality of the soul had not darkened the truth of God.

The margin of The Companion Bible draws attention to the need for care in handling the verse we are considering. Dr. Tregelles gives the following translation, which he justifies:--

> "And many from among the sleepers of the dust of the earth shall awake; these shall be unto everlasting life; but those (the rest of the sleepers, who do no awake at this time) shall be unto shame and everlasting contempt."
>
> "It is clearly not a general resurrection; it is 'many from among'; and it is only by taking the words in this sense, that we gain any information as to what becomes of those who continue to sleep in the dust of the earth."

The word translated here "contempt" is found again in Isa. lxvi. 24, where it is translated "abhorring":--

> "And it shall come to pass, that from one new moon to another, shall all flesh come to worship before Me, saith the Lord. And they shall go forth and look upon the carcasses of the men that have transgressed against Me; for their worm shall not die, neither shall their fire be quenched: and they shall be an abhorring unto all flesh."

These two prophecies are parallel; Dan. xii. 2 is to be explained in the light of Isa. lxvi. 24 and vice versa.

Reverting to the great tribulation of Dan. xii. 1, we observe that:--

> "At that time thy people shall be delivered, every one that shall be found written in the book."

If we turn to I and II Thessalonians we shall not only read of the man of sin and his destruction, and of that resurrection which is associated with the Lord's coming and the Archangel, but we shall also see the parallel to the deliverance of Dan. xii. 1:--

> "And to wait for His Son from heaven, Whom He raised from the dead, even Jesus, which delivers us from the wrath that is coming" (I Thess. i. 10).

Jer. xxx. 7 says of this same period:--

> "Alas, for that day is great, so great that none is like it; it is the time of Jacob's trouble, but he shall be saved out of it."

The reader may remember that in the structure of the whole book given in Volume XXI, page 35, the deliverance of Daniel from the den of lions is placed as an historic foreshadowing of this greater and future deliverance:--

> "And they that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament: and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars for ever and ever" (Dan. xii. 3).

The glories of heaven, and of the risen saints, whatever their sphere of blessing, are invariably described in terms of brightness. The particular word used here is zohar, which occurs only once elsewhere:--

> "Then I beheld, and lo a likeness as the appearance of fire: from the appearance of his loins even downward, fire; and from his loins even upward, as the appearance of brightness, as the colour of amber" (Ezek. viii. 2).

Daniel had felt all his comeliness turn to corruption at the appearance of the heavenly vision recorded in Dan. x., but in resurrection glory, both Daniel and those who shall stand with him, will themselves "shine as the brightness of the firmament".

There is a special place given here to those who shall remain faithful in the fiercest days of antichristian persecution. In Dan. xi. 30-35, where the holy covenant is forsaken and the abomination set up, the people are sharply divided into two classes: (1) "Such as do wickedly against the covenant"; (2) "The people that do know their God". These two classes seem to be again in mind in Dan. xii. 2. "These", the first class, shall awake to everlasting life; "those", the second class, to shame and everlasting contempt.

The first class is further sub-divided: "They that understand among the people shall instruct many" (Dan. xi. 33). It is clear from verses 33-35 that this instruction will be given at a time of fierce trial. It will not then be a conventional activity; it will be accomplished at the risk of life itself.

Those that awake unto everlasting life will, similarly, differ in degrees of glory. All in this company will attain to hayi olam, "age life", but some among them will shine as the firmament and as the stars. And, as I Cor. xv. shows, "one star differs from another star in glory".

Here, then, is the end of "warfare great", an end that God alone could foreshadow or achieve. "Weeping may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning." Here, too, is the end of Daniel's prophecy. The remaining verses of the chapter are in the form of an epilogue which, while containing matter of importance and giving further light upon some of the details, does not include any further prophetic event. With this epilogue we must conclude the present series on the book of Daniel.

#17. The epilogue (xii. 4-13).
pp. 182 - 185

The epilogue of the prophecy of Daniel occupies Dan. xii. 4-13. Before setting out the structure of this closing section, attention must be drawn to alternative readings of verse 4: "Many shall run to and fro, and knowledge shall be increased." The word translated "run to and fro" is the Hebrew shut, which occurs in Amos viii. 12:--

> "And they shall wander from sea to sea, and from the north even to the east, they shall run to and fro to seek the word of the Lord, and shall not find it."

Swete's edition of the LXX reads here: heos an apomanosin, which means: "till many shall have gone raving mad." The Companion Bible margin says that with the change of the word from shut to sut (which does not remove any letter of the original text but only a point added by the Massoretic scribes), the word there means to revolt or apostatize. Further, in the clause "knowledge shall be increased" Dr. Ginsburg suggests that hadda'ath should read hara'oth, which changes the word "knowledge" to "wickedness". The Septuagint translation does not decide the question, for while Theodosian's version renders the word by gnosis, Swete's edition (A) reads adikias ("wickedness"), showing that from very early times the reading was questioned. The reading that we have adopted is the one suggested by Ginsburg and by the editions of the Septuagint mentioned, viz.:--

> "Many shall apostatize, and wickedness shall be increased."

With this explanation we now proceed to the structure of the epilogue.

Daniel xii. 4-13.

A | 4. Shut up the words, and seal the book.
B | 4. | a | Many shall apostatize.
b | Wickedness shall be increased.
C | 5-7. The three and half years.
D | 8. What shall be the end?
A | 9. The words are closed and sealed.
B | 10. | a | Many shall be purified.
b | The wicked shall do wickedly.
C | 11, 12. Two periods beyond the three and half years.
D | 13. Thou shalt stand in thy lot at the end.

The first item that demands attention in this epilogue is the double statement concerning the shutting up and sealing of the book:--

"Shut up the words, and seal the book, even to the time of the end."
"The words are closed up and sealed till the time of the end."

These words have been variously interpreted. Some think they refer to the official seal being set upon the whole book of Daniel at its completion, guaranteeing it to be authentic and canonical. This view does not seem tenable in the light of the added words: "even to the time of the end", and "till the time of the end". Another view is that the prophetic utterances found in Daniel are only to be fully understood in the light of the Book of the Revelation. This is nearer to the truth, but not quite, for it looks to the Lord's people instead of the Lord Himself. We believe the shut book will be opened together with its seals "at the time of the end" by the Lord Himself, as so graphically stated in Rev. v. and vi.:--

"And I saw in the right hand of Him that sat on the throne a book written within and on the backside, sealed with seven seals . . . . . the Lion of the tribe of Judah, the Root of David, hat prevailed to open the book, and to loose the seven seals thereof."

The opening of the seals is described in Rev. vi., which sets forth the features of the time of the end already prophesied in Daniel and by the Lord Himself in Matt. xxiv.:--

Revelation vi.	Matthew xxiv.
The WHITE horse. The RED horse. The BLACK horse. The PALE horse.	False christs. Wars. Famines. Pestilences.
"All these are the beginning of sorrows."
The martyrs. Signs in heaven.	The martyrs. Signs in heaven.
"The day of wrath come."

That Matt. xxiv. speaks of the same prophetic period as does Daniel, verses 15-21 make quite clear:--

"When ye therefore shall see the abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel the prophet, stand in the holy place . . . . . then shall be great tribulation" (Matt. xxiv. 15-21).
"There shall be a time of trouble . . . . . the abomination that maketh desolate set up" (Dan. xii. 1 and 11).

The closing of the book, moreover, has a significance that is made clear by a reference to Luke iv. 16-21. There the Lord read a portion of the prophecy of Isaiah, ceased half way through a verse, closed the book and said: "This day is this scripture fulfilled in your ears." Upon examination it will be seen that the Lord ended His reading at the words: "the acceptable year of the Lord." Had He read on and included the words: "the day of vengeance of our God", He could not have said: "This day is this scripture fulfilled", because two distinct dispensations would have been confused, the one of mercy and the other of wrath. The closed book in Luke iv. and in Dan. xii. indicates that an interval must be allowed, and that the prophetic visions of Daniel belong to the yet future, rather than to the time when grace is calling out a church from among the Jew and Gentile.

The time periods of this closing section are complicated. We have already explained the meaning of the words: "A time, times and half a time", as being the period of three and a half years which runs from the setting up of the abomination "in the midst of the week" (Dan. ix. 27) until the "end". The end deals with the destruction of the desolator, but for those who are saved and await the glory of the Lord, there are two short preparatory periods to intervene. The first is the 1290 days, and the second the 1335 days. Now three and a half years are 1260 days, so that we have two periods extending beyond the close of Daniel's seventieth week.

Israel are to repent, look upon Him Whom they have pierced, and mourn for Him (Zech. xii. 10-14), and it will be remembered that Aaron and Moses were both mourned by Israel for a period of thirty days (Numb. xx. 29; Deut. xxxiv. 8). Blessed is he that comes to the 1290 days, for mourning shall then have passed away. The remaining forty-five days that end with the close of the 1335 days may well be occupied in the returning of the dispersion from among the Gentiles. The Companion Bible suggests that the Psalms that bear these numbers, namely, xxx., xlv. and lxxv. have an intended connection with this period. Certainly the sentiment of these Psalms is appropriate to the time whether their numeration be intended or not. This the reader can test for himself.

The prophet Daniel appears to have been reluctant to withdraw, and twice the heavenly visitor says to him: "Go thy way." To none is it permitted to receive all the truth, or to understand it all. Daniel's work was done, and he is directed to go his way, and rest when his time shall have come, in the sure and certain hope of a blessed resurrection. The callings and the spheres of blessing may differ as much as the earth differs from the heavens, but one feature is constant, and that is that flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God, and corruption cannot inherit incorruption. We shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed, whether our hope be with Daniel in his lot, with the Bride in the New Jerusalem, or with the Church at the right hand of God.

From one end of the book to the other one consistent theme is found. The first unfolding shows Gentile dominion from its inception to its destruction, and in the prophetic visions that follow attention is concentrated upon the "end", the period indicated by the feet and ten toes of the image, "the days of those kings"—the ten horns of the later visions. While the prophetic visions sweeps the centuries, and comprehends the rise and fall of dynasty and nation, the attention is focused upon the prophetic period of 490 years, and of that final seven covers the bulk of the prophecy.

We named this series: "The testimony of Daniel or the time of the end", for it is the time of the end that is the dominant factor. The only possible solution of the troubles of Israel and of all the earth is the coming again of their rejected King. Instead of "civilization" growing and developing until it ushers in the kingdom of God, we find it smashed to atoms before the true kingdom can be set up. Instead of faith and knowledge increasing and righteousness covering the earth, we find wickedness increasing until it rivals the days of Noah. Instead of “peace and safety”, the astonished prophet learns of “warfare great”. There is, however, a day coming when it shall be said:-- > “Comfort ye, comfort ye My people, saith your God. Speak ye comfortably to Jerusalem, and cry unto her, that her WARFARE is accomplished, that her iniquity is pardoned: for she hath received of the Lord’s hand double for all her sins” (Isa. xl. 1, 2).

Death to sin and to sins.
pp. 237 - 240

We trust that the following record of conversation over a deep problem may prove to be a "word in season" to someone who is weary in the strife against sin.

A.—I am in difficulty as to my own personal position regarding certain passages of Scripture, and would much appreciate your help. I want to be honest, and not to assume experiences that do not exist. I hear so many who speak of "victory", of having attained "the throne position"; others pray that they may be enabled to "crucify" some special sin or disposition. Some affirm that for years they have "never sinned"; others tell me that the "old nature in them has been entirely eradicated"; so that I almost come to doubt whether I have been saved.

B.—In these remarks you have brought together quite a number of important items of doctrine, and unless we deal with one thing at a time, our conversation will probably but deepen your confusion. Suppose you tell me, first of all, what you do unfeignedly believe, not of course the whole range of doctrine, but that which is intimately related to your immediate problem.

A.—That very suggestion seems to give at once a sense of relief. Let me say that I believe with all my heart the teaching of Rom. v. 6-8, that "Christ died for the ungodly", and that I have been "justified freely by His grace through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus" (Rom. iii. 24). On the question of my full acquittal before God, and of my acceptance in Christ, I am thankful to say I have no doubts at all. My difficulties begin when I get to Rom. vi. There I read, "dead to sin", "our old man crucified", "reckon yourselves to be dead indeed unto sin, but alive unto God through Jesus Christ our Lord".

B.—Far be it from me to say one word that would minimize sin, or lead one step away from the highest ideal of holiness of life, but it will probably help you to see things in a clearer light if we observe what is actually said in Rom. vi., remembering as we read that right division enters into every phase of the truth.

Suppose we take the opening section that occupies verses 1-14, and divide its teaching up into two columns, according as it speaks of an accomplished fact, or of a present or future effect. Let us denominate the one column "Root" and the other column "Fruit" and see what is learned therefrom.

Root.	Fruit.
How shall we that are dead to sin	Live any longer therein?
We were baptized unto His death. We are buried with him by baptism into death	That like as Christ was raised up from the dead by the glory of the Father, even so we also should walk in newness of life.
Our old man is crucified with Him, that the body of sin might be destroyed	That henceforth we should not serve sin.
If we be dead (or died) with Christ	We believe that we shall also live with Him.
Reckon ye also yourselves to be dead indeed unto sin, but alive unto God through Jesus Christ our Lord. For sin shall not have dominion over you, for ye are not under the law, but under grace.	Let not sin reign in your mortal bodies that ye should obey it in the lusts thereof. Neither yield ye your members as instruments of unrighteousness unto sin: but yield yourselves unto God, as those who are alive from the dead, and your members as instruments of righteousness.

Let us take the last statement first. What is the one reason given by the apostle for the statement: "Sin shall not have dominion over you?"

A.—It is simply that we are not under law, but under grace.

B.—That indicates a complete change brought about by God alone through Christ, and becomes effective to all who believe. If you should sometimes fail in your walk, and not manifest the new life that is yours, does that cancel that great change?

A.—No, I am still under grace, and treated as such, even though I should at times fail to manifest my new relationship.

B.—Let us go back another step in the passage. You are told to "Reckon yourselves to be dead to sin, but alive unto God". How is this possible?

A.—Why, by the words you have omitted, "through Jesus Christ our Lord".

B.—You mean by that, I suppose, that when Christ died for you as your surety, God reckoned that you died too, and that when He rose from the dead, God reckoned that you rose too? Just exactly, therefore, what have you to do in the matter?

A.—I am to reckon what God reckons.

B.—Does this imply a kind of fiction?

A.—No, for previously he says most plainly: "We died with Christ"; "Our old man is crucified with Him"; "We are dead to sin".

B.—Does it tell you anywhere in these verses to "put yourself to death"? to "crucify yourself, or your sinful nature"?

A.—No, it rather tells me that all this is done.

B.—What does it actually say to us then?

A.—It tells us not to allow sin to reign in our mortal bodies, because the great change is an accomplished fact. It tells us not to yield our members unto sin, but unto God, as those who are alive from the dead. It tells us that this service is now possible because the old man has been crucified with Christ, and that we may walk in the power of the new life.

B.—It appears, therefore, that we must take as actual truth the statements: "you are dead", "you are alive unto God"?

A.—Yes, I do not see that we can do anything else with them.

B.—It appears, therefore, that the dominion of sin has been broken?

A.—Yes, the very fact that the old man is crucified leads on to the words: "that henceforth we should not serve sin."

B.—Now I suggest that you proceed with Rom. vi., still dividing between that which is a solid fact in Christ, and that which should grow therefrom. Observe, in verse 16, that it is assumed that you are now free to yield your service either to sin or to righteousness, and the result of that choice is plainly set forth as fruit—either of shame or of life.

You remember that Eph. ii. 1 should read: "dead to trespasses and sins", and not "dead in trespasses and sins".

A.—Yes, I remember that the same order of words come in I Pet. ii. 24 & Rom. vi. 10, where the A.V. reads "dead to sins" and "dead to sin".

B.—Well, will you observe the point of difference between Rom. vi. 2 and Eph. ii. 1, and between Rom. vi. 6 and Col. iii. 9 and Eph. iv. 22?

A.—I will read these verses together:--

> "How shall we that are dead to sin, live any longer therein" (Rom. vi. 2).
> "And you being dead to trespasses and sins" (Eph. ii. 1).
> "Our old man is crucified with Him, that the body of sin might be destroyed" (Rom. vi. 6).
> "Ye have put off the old man, with his deeds" (Col. iii. 9).
> "Ye have put off concerning the former conversation the old man" (Eph. iv. 22).

B.—Now do you see the great point of difference in these two sets of Scripture?

A.—They appear to me to be speaking of the same thing.

B.—Look again, and think of Root and Fruit.

A.—Yes, I see, Rom. vi. 2 says "dead to sin"—that is the root, that is the dominion which has gone. Eph. ii. 1 speaks of being "dead to sins"—that is the outcome, the result worked out in our lives. The one is a fact once for all accomplished. The other is a goal towards which the whole of God's gracious work is leading.

And again, Rom. vi. 6 speaks of the old man being crucified, and the body of sin rendered inoperative, whereas Col. iii. 9 and Eph. iv. 22 speak of his "deeds" and his "former conversation". The old man is to be "put off" by us, but not "crucified"—that is beyond our powers, and is the sole work of the Son of God, Who loved us and gave Himself for us.

B.—You have answered a part of your own problem in the best possible way. You have allowed entrance to the Word that giveth light.

A.—I thank you for throwing me back upon the Word, and not upon experiences, either your own or that of others.

B.—That question of "experiences" is one which we must deal with separately. It lies very near to the root of a great deal of trouble. For the time being prayerfully ponder Rom. vi.

A Fourfold fellowship.

#1. The doctrine of Christ (concluded).

p. 19

> "That which we have seen and heard declared we unto you, that ye also may have fellowship with us" (I John i. 3).

\- - - - - - - - -

The word "handled" here reminds us of the passage in Luke's Gospel:--

> "Jesus Himself stood in the midst of them, and saith unto them, Peace be unto you. But they were terrified and affrighted, and supposed they had seen a spirit. And He said unto them, Why are ye troubled? and why do thoughts arise in your hearts? Behold My hands and My feet, that it is I Myself. HANDLE Me and see, for a spirit hath not flesh and bones as ye see Me have" (Luke xxiv. 36-39).

John tells us in his first epistle that the spirit of antichrist denies that Jesus Christ came in the flesh, whereas the declaration that He had been seen, heard and handled was proof that he had so come. From the second epistle we gather that it is impossible to have fellowship with any who deny this essential fact:--

> "For many deceivers are entered into the world who confess not Jesus Christ coming in the flesh. This is a deceiver and an antichrist . . . . . If there come any of you, and bring not this doctrine (see verse 9), receive him not into your house, neither say to him, Hail. For he who says to him, Hail, HAS FELLOWSHIP with his works of evil" (II John 7-11).

By giving the word rendered "partaker" its correct translation, the two passages, I John i. 1-3 and II John 7-11, are brought into vivid contrast. Fellowship is essentially bound up with the personal Christ.

While we may deplore the many false interpretations of Scripture that exist, we fail to find one passage of Scripture that states that the basis of fellowship is agreement in doctrine. What we do see, in the teaching of these two passages, is that there is a distinct cleavage between those who hold the doctrine of Christ and those who deny it. Those who deny it "have not God" and are forerunners of antichrist.

This, then, is the first basis of Christian fellowship. There is ample room for the distinctive ministries of Peter, James, John and Paul, for, though they may have received different messages concerning Him, and have worked in different spheres, they all believed and preached the same Christ.

#2. The joy of this fellowship.
pp. 56, 57

It will be remembered, that in our last article we compared I John i. 1-3 with II John 7-11, and saw that fellowship among saints was limited to those who held the doctrine of Christ. In quoting the passage from the second epistle we omitted verse 9. This we must now consider as it has a distinct bearing upon the next constituent of fellowship brought forward in the first epistle:--

> "Whosoever goeth forward and abideth not in the doctrine of Christ, hath not God. He that abideth in the doctrine of Christ, he hath both the Father and the Son" (II John 9).

With this we may compare the second feature: "And our fellowship indeed is with the Father, and with His Son Jesus Christ" (I John i. 3).

> He who denieth the Son denieth the Father also (I John ii. 23).
> He who denieth the doctrine of Christ hath not God (II John 9).
> He that hath seen the Son hath seen the Father (John xiv. 9).
> "He that hateth Me (said Christ) hateth My Father also" (John xv. 23).
> "These things will they do unto you, because they have not known the Father nor Me" (John xvi. 3).
> "He that honoureth not the Son, honoureth not the Father" (John v. 23).
> "He that despiseth Me despiseth Him that sent Me" (Luke x. 16).

Examples could be multiplied to show this one great fact: that it is vain for any man to boast of a knowledge of God, or of the Father, who does not believe the Scriptures concerning the Son. To enter into the blessed fellowship of I John i. 1-3, it is essential to pass through the one Door, and Christ has declared: "I am the Door." To find that fellowship which is with both the Father and the Son, it is necessary to travel one Way, and Christ has declared:--

> "I am the true and living way, no man cometh unto the Father, but by Me" (John xiv. 6).

This, then, is the second feature of fellowship. To this the apostle adds the words:--

> "And these things write unto you, that your joy may be full" (I John i. 4).

This statement, moreover, finds its echo in II John 12, where, after warning the child of God concerning that fellowship with evil which is connected with denial of the doctrine of Christ, the apostle says:--

> "Having many things to write unto you, I would not write with paper and ink; but I trust to come unto you, and speak face to face, that your joy may be full."

The reader may remember that instead of following the A.V. in II John 10, 11 by quoting the words, "God-speed", we used the word "Hail". In the original the word is chairo, and means "rejoice", "greet", etc. In II John 4 it is translated "rejoice", where the rejoicing is in the truth. This word is closely allied to chara which is rendered "joy" in I John i. 4, II John 12 and III John 4.

Combining all these items, we arrive at the conclusion that true fellowship is centred in the Person of the Son of God, and the true joy of that fellowship is in the blessed recognition of the truth that in the Son, and in Him alone, can we have access to fellowship with the Father. If we rejoice in this truth, how can we at the same time, say "Hail", "Rejoice", or "God-speed" to any that deny it?

#3. Life made manifest in light.
pp. 117 - 119

The fourfold fellowship of I John i. is divided, as is nearly all Scripture, into two parts—doctrine and practice. In order to see the relationship between the parts we must look at the four phases as a whole.

Fellowship in I John i.

A | 1-3. That which was seen and heard and declared. \ LIFE.
B | 3. With the Father and with His Son Jesus Christ. /
A | 5, 6. The message heard and declared. \ LIGHT.
B | 7. With one another. The blood of Jesus Christ His Son. /

The word that is insistent in the first pair of passages is LIFE—the Word of life, the life manifested, the eternal life which was with the Father. The word that is insistent in the second pair is LIGHT—"God is light"; "If we walk in the light"; "He is in the light". The first group represents basic fact, the second resultant walk. The first is cause, the second effect; the first, the root, and the second the fruit.

The whole subject is summarized in the words of John i. 4: "In Him was life and the life was the light of men." We see first in the structure above the declaration concerning the Person of Christ and the privilege of access unto the Father; and then the declaration of the character of this fellowship and the provision made for its permanence:--

> "This then is the message which we have heard of Him, and declare unto you, that God is light, and in Him is no darkness at all. If we say that we have fellowship with Him, and walk in darkness, we lie, and do not the truth" (I John i. 5, 6).

We may test the principle that darkness and light are concerned with practice and walk by observing the other passages in which they occur in this epistle:--

> "Again, a new commandment I write unto you, which thing is true in Him and in you, because the darkness is past and the true light now shineth. He that saith he is in the light, and hateth his brother, is in darkness even until now. He that loveth his brother > abideth in the light, and there is no occasion of stumbling in him. But he that hateth his brother is in darkness, and walketh in darkness, and knoweth not whither he goeth, because that darkness hath blinded his eyes" (I John ii. 8-11).

This quotation exhausts the references to light and darkness in this epistle, and proof is not needed that here the subject is pre-eminently practical. The same is true of the phase that appears in i. 6:--

> "If we say that we have fellowship with Him, and walk in darkness, we lie, and do not the truth."

The words, "If we say", are repeated in verses 8 and 10, and the variant, "He that saith" in ii. 4, 6 and 9. The first occurrence of the latter expression is evidently parallel with i. 6:--

> "He that saith, I know Him, and keepeth not His commandments, is a liar, and the truth is not in him" (ii. 4).

To say we have fellowship with God while we ourselves walk in darkness is to lie, and to "do not the truth". The statement in verse 10 is similar:--

> "If we say that we have not sinned, we make Him a liar, and His word is not in use" (i. 10).

The word "liar" occurs again in ii. 4, which we have just quoted; and is the title of antichrist, who denies the Father and the Son. The great basis of fellowship is life, but we can only see life by light, and this raises the practical side of the question connected with our walk.

While we may not be able to discover an example in the Scriptures of a Christian being excluded from manifest fellowship on account of immorality—in other words, for an inconsistent walk. So far as our understanding of the teaching of the Word is connected, we believe that fellowship among believers is as extensive as manifest life, but that fellowship in ministry is not only concerned with life and walk, but also with light. To use more modern terms, the pulpit is much narrower than the pew. A solemn responsibility rests upon any child of God who refuses fellowship with any other child of God on the ground of differences of "light". But an equal responsibility rests upon those leaders and teachers of God's people who open pulpit and platform to any child of God simply because he has "life".

In matters of teaching, the apostle is very exacting:--

> "The things that thou hast heard of me, the same commit thou to faithful men who shall be able to teach others also" (II Tim. ii. 2).

Let us remember that the fellowship of life demands a corresponding fellowship in light. The fellowship with the Father and the Son should be manifested by a walk that is worthy.

#4. As He is, and the cleansing blood.
pp. 138, 139

> "If we walk in the light as He is in the light, we have fellowship one with another, and the blood of Jesus Christ His Son cleanseth us from all sin" (I John i. 7).

The key-words of this fourth phase of fellowship are "As He is", and these words occur five times in this epistle as follows:--

As He is.

A | i. 7. As He is in the light . . . . Walk.
B | iii. 2. As He is . . . . . Like Him.
C | iii. 3. As He is pure . . . The hope.
A | iii. 7. As He is righteous . . . . Do righteousness.
B | iv. 17. As He is . . . . . So are we.

"Fellowship", the translation of the word koinonia, is derived from koinoo, "to partake", and is allied with koinos, "common". Essentially, fellowship is having something in common. Now what is there in common between light and darkness? That is the question which underlies this fourth reference to fellowship:--

> "This then is the message which we have heard of Him and declare unto you, that God is LIGHT, and in Him is no DARKNESS at all. If we say that we have fellowship with Him, and walk in DAKRNESS, we lie, and do not the truth: but if we walk in the LIGHT, as He is in the LIGHT, we have fellowship" (I John i. 5-7).

For the true maintenance of this fellowship, which involves a walk in the light, there is gracious provision of the cleansing from all sin. Apart from the provision of the cleansing blood of Christ, it is right that we should shrink from the searching character of that light, but it is dishonouring to the Lord to continue in darkness under a false excuse of personal unfitness, for that denies the very provision here made. By nature none is worthy of such fellowship. Sinful man has nothing "in common" with God. But Christ makes all the difference:--

> "For ye were sometimes DARKNESS, but now are ye LIGHT in the Lord: walk as children of LIGHT . . . . . have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of DARKNESS" (Eph. v. 8-11).

Here we have the other aspect presented, "Have no fellowship with darkness", while I John i. 7 bids us have fellowship with Him Who is light. In this passage of I John i. we have the basis of fellowship, while II Cor. vi. and vii. carries it to its true conclusion:--

> "What communion hath light with darkness . . . . . touch not the UNCLEAN thing . . . . . let us CLEANSE ourselves . . . . . perfecting holiness in the fear of God" (II Cor. vi. 14 - vii. 1).

Here, as I John i., we have the question of the fellowship of light and the fellowship of darkness, but instead of the primary and basic fact of the cleansing of the blood of Christ being brought forward, the secondary and supplemental fact, namely, the avoidance of the unclean and the cleansing of ourselves is uppermost. This is the "perfecting" of holiness, or the carrying to its true end the initial sanctification which is ours in Christ. John does not touch upon this aspect so particularly. He does, however, speak of the "perfecting" of love in I John ii. 5 and iv. 17, 18.

Coming back to the first thought, "As He is" must ever be the true touchstone of fellowship and walk. We shall be like Him, for we shall see Him "as He is". We should be like Him even here in this world. This is the argument of iii. 2, 3 and iv. 17.

Summarizing the four phases of fellowship we find:--

(1) Fellowship is centred in the personal Christ: not in agreement in the interpretation of Scripture, or membership of any particular company of believers.

(2) Fellowship is with the Father and the Son—nothing less—and this fellowship is the gateway to fullness of joy.

(3) Fellowship in its particular outworking is governed by the revelation that God is light.

(4) Fellowship in the light is preserved and guaranteed by the cleansing power of the blood of Christ, and draws its inspiration from the truth that clusters round the words, "As He is".

Fundamentals of Dispensational Truth.

#80. A dispensational forecast (Lev. xxiii.).

pp. 6 - 11

This chapter of Leviticus is distinguished from the rest of the book, by the fact that it surveys the typical year of Israel's fasts and feasts, and sets forth, so far as the people of Israel and those associated with them are concerned, the purpose of the ages. A reading of the chapter impresses one with the important sabbatic principle that underlies the whole purpose. The chapter opens with a reference to the weekly Sabbath (verses 1-3), and then proceeds to outline the feasts and fasts that occupy the first seven months of the year.

It will be remembered that at the Passover, first instituted in Exod. xii., a change was made in the calendar, and Abib became "the beginning of months". The seventh month, therefore, and the twelfth month of the respective reckonings would overlap, and so, for the purposes of typical teaching, Israel's year is limited to the first seven months, the remaining months being allowed to run their course unnoticed.

The sabbatic principle.

The sabbatic principle is not confined to the written revelation of God. It is found throughout the works of His hand. All are familiar with the seven-hued rainbow, and most know that in the diatonic musical scale there are seven notes, the sequence being repeated at the eighth or octave. Turning to the observations of men of science we may mention the periodic law of the elements. Sir William Crookes said of this law:--

> "I am convinced that whoever grasps the key to the periodic law will be permitted to unlock some of the deepest mysteries of creation."

Dr. E. J. Pace, in his book The Law of the Octave, shows by a series of diagrams, too complicated to describe and perhaps unnecessary so far as we are concerned, that the elements composing the universe all obey this law of the seven sequence. Dr. Bullinger's Number in Scripture will supply further information of interest. We are, however, more concerned with the presence of the number seven in the typical and dispensational foreshadowings of Scripture. We find that there are seven features, developed in an orderly sequence—a seven of days, a seven of weeks, a seven of months, a seven of years, a seven times seven of years, a seven times seventy of years, and a period of seven times.

I.	7 days.	"Remember the Sabbath day" (Exod. xx. 8-11).
II.	7 weeks.	"Seven Sabbaths shall be completed" (Lev. xxiii. 15).
III.	7 months.	"In the seventh month – a Sabbath" (Lev. xxiii. 24).
IV.	7 years.	"In the seventh year – a Sabbath" (Lev. xxv. 2-5).
V.	7 * 7 years.	"Seven times seven years – Jubilee" (Lev. xxv. 8-10).
VI.	7 * 70 years.	"Seventy weeks are determined" (Dan. ix. 24-27).
VII.	7 times.	"Punish seven times for sins" (Lev. xxvi. 24; Dan. iv. 16).

Here we have orderly and regular progression.

The only passages that may be questioned in this series are Dan. ix. and Lev. xxvi. That Dan. ix. implies a period of years we show in the series dealing with Daniel's prophecy. That the term "times" is prophetic of a period we discover by studying its usage in Daniel. Lev. xxvi. 33, 34 suggests that the "seven times" of Israel's punishment is co-extensive with the period of Gentile dominion (the seven times of Nebuchadnezzar's madness. These questions are dealt with more extensively in the series on Daniel. It is sufficient for our present purpose that we recognize this sabbatic principle at work.

This series of sevens leads up to the octave, the new beginning, the new heaven and earth "wherein dwelleth righteousness". So that we find the seventh feast of the year expanded, and prominence given to one part of it—"the eighth day" (Lev. xxiii. 39). In this last phase we see, in type, Israel's wonderful restoration—the steps leading up to it being set out, as we shall see, in strictly historical order.

The feasts mentioned in Lev. xxiii. are the following: The weekly Sabbath, Passover, Unleavened Bread, Pentecost, Trumpets, Day of Atonement, Tabernacles, and the Eighth Day of the Feast. Their interrelation may be demonstrated as follows:--

The feasts of the Lord (xxiii.).

A | THE WEEKLY SABBATH (1-3)
B | PASSOVER. Redemption by the blood of Lamb (5-8).
THE FIRST-FRUITS.
C | UNLEAVENED BREAD. The present attitude (9-14).
D | PENTECOST. The end of the first harvest (15-21).
The uniting of the nation.
The Jubilee anticipated.
References to Holy Spirit.
Provision for the stranger (22, 23).
Interval of Israel's blindness.
Israel's regathering inaugurated by
A | THE BLOWING OF TRUMPETS (24, 25).
B | THE DAY OF ATONEMENT. Atonement by blood (27-32).
Israel "the second time".
C | TABERNACLES. (34-38).
D | THE INGATHERING (The sunteleia) (39-44).
THE EIGHTH DAY OF THE AGE.

In the series dealing with the Second Coming of Christ, the expression, "The sunteleia of the age", used by the disciples in Matt. xxiv. 3, is shown to correspond to the feast of ingathering. Three of these feasts have been fulfilled; four await fulfillment. And just as those that have been fulfilled have been fulfilled literally and in historic sequence, so we may confidently expect the remainder to be fulfilled in the same way when the appointed time comes.

The Passover.

No reader of the four Gospels, who is taught of God, can fail to see that Christ Himself was the true Passover Lamb. He was the Lamb of God (John i. 9; Exod. xii. 3-5). He was without spot or blemish (Heb. ix. 14; I Pet. i. 19; Exod. xxii. 5). And He was most severely scrutinized as was the passover lamb from the 10th to the 14th day of the month (Luke xxiii. 4, 15, 22, 41, 47).

The passover was slain "between the two evenings", and Lev. xxiii. 32 makes it clear that a day began and ended with an evening—"from even unto even". It was therefore possible for the Lord to partake of the passover lamb and Himself be offered upon the 14th Nisan—an impossibility had the Jewish day begun at midnight.

I Cor. v. 7 makes it perfectly clear that Christ fulfilled the great type of the passover: "For even Christ our Passover is sacrificed for us." And the typical meaning of the feast of unleavened bread was entered into by the believer: "Therefore let us keep the feast . . . . . with the unleavened bread of sincerity and truth" (I Cor. v. 8). Pentecost, too, was fulfilled to the exact day, as Acts ii. demonstrates.

It is interesting to see that the feasts of Israel are all recognized in the epistle to the Corinthians:--

PASSOVER.—"Christ our Passover" (I Cor. v. 7).
FEAST OF WEEKS.—"Let us keep the feast" (I Cor. v. 8).
"On the first of the Sabbaths" (I Cor. xvi. 2).
THE FIRST-FRUITS.—"Christ the First fruits" (I Cor. xv. 23).
PENTECOST.—"I will tarry . . . . . unto Pentecost" (I Cor. xvi. 8).

After Pentecost comes the long interval which spans the whole of the period from Israel's rejection to the sounding of the trumpet that ushers in the day of their ingathering. One critic has objected to the statement made by the writer that the parable of the sower covers the whole time period from the day of the Lord's earthly ministry to the future day of the Lord, on the ground that this would include the dispensation of the mystery. But we must realize that if Matt. xiii. or Dan. ix. or any other prophecies leap over the present interval, they must necessarily include the actual period now occupied by the manifestation of the mystery. These prophecies, however, contain no indication of the revelation to be made known during this uncharted period. So, while it is true that the dispensation of the mystery was never a subject of O.T. prophecy, we can nevertheless see, now that the revelation has been made, that the gap between Pentecost and the seventh month leaves provision for the present dispensation. The rest of the dispensational purpose as foreshadowed in Israel's ceremonial year will be fulfilled as surely as were the four feasts from Passover to Pentecost.

Trumpets.

"He shall send His angels with a great sound of a trumpet, and shall gather together His elect from the four winds, from one end of heaven to the other" (Matt. xxiv. 31).

"We shall be changed, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump" (I Cor. xv. 51, 52).

"For the Lord Himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God" (I Thess. iv. 16).

"In the days of the voice of the seventh angel, when he shall begin to sound, the mystery of God should be finished, as He hath declared to His servants the prophets" (Rev. x. 7).

Day of atonement.

"Ye shall afflict your souls" (Lev. xxiii. 27).

"I will pour upon the house of David and upon the inhabitants of Jerusalem, the spirit of grace and of supplications; and they shall look upon Me Whom they have pierced, and they shall mourn for Him, as one mourneth for his only son . . . . . the land shall mourn, every family apart" (Zech. xii. 10-14).

"Behold He cometh with the clouds; and every eye shall see Him, and they also which pierced Him, and all the tribes of the land shall wail because of Him" (Rev. i. 7).

"Christ has . . . . . entered into heaven itself . . . . . and unto them that look for Him shall He appear the second time without sin unto salvation" (Heb. ix. 24-28).

Tabernacles.

"I will remove the iniquity of that land in one day. In that day, saith the Lord of Hosts, shall ye call every man his neighbour under the vine and under the fig tree" (Zech. iii. 9, 10).

"They shall beat their swords into ploughshares . . . . .they shall sit every man under his vine and under his fig tree; and none shall make them afraid" (Micah iv. 3, 4).

"I will go up to the land of unwalled villages, I will go to them that are at rest, that dwell safely, all of them dwelling without walls, and having neither bars nor gates . . . . ." (Ezek. xxxviii., xxxix.).

The Ingathering.

"The feast of the ingathering, which is in the end of the year, when thou hast gathered in thy labours out of the field" (Exod. xxiii. 16).

The LXX here reads: "the sunteleia" where the A.V. reads: "the feast of the ingathering". This is referred to by the disciples in Matt. xxiv.: "Tell us when shall these things be? And what shall be the sign of Thy coming, and of the sunteleia of the age?"

The Eighth Day of the Feast.

"In the last day, that great day of the feast, Jesus stood and cried saying, If any man thirst, let him come unto Me and drink. He that believeth on Me, as the Scripture hath said, out of His belly shall flow rivers of living waters. But this He spake of the Spirit" (John vii. 37-39).

There is a reference here to several prophecies, such as Ezek. xlvii. The last feast is therefore parallel with Pentecost and an expansion of it. What Pentecost foreshadowed was not the church of the mystery, but the ingathering of Israel and the pouring out upon them of the Spirit as a life-giving stream. Here, therefore, given to the people of type and shadow, was a sacred calendar, a period of seven months in which was foreshadowed, so far as the earthly side was concerned, the unfolding purpose of the age.

The creation week, with its six days of work and one of rest, the fact that Heb. iv. 9 speaks of a rest or Sabbath keeping for the people of God, the fact that the sabbatic principle underlies the whole scheme, lends colour to the Rabbinical view that the ages will conform to the same principles. The Rabbis taught that the world was two thousand years without the law, two thousand years under the law, and two thousand years under the Messiah. The Revelation tells us of the thousand years of glory at the close. The world draws near to the end of its sixth day.

It is folly to attempt the computation of the time of the end, for at least two reasons. It transgresses the evident prohibition of Acts i. 7 and Matt. xxiv. 36, 44; and it assumes that chronology since Christ is trustworthy. At the best we can only say that this present year of grace is approximately A.D.1932. There is no proof—and we believe the uncertainty to be of God.

The church of the mystery finds no exposition in Leviticus; its hope is entirely separated from the hope of Israel. This does not, however, clash with the obvious deduction, that if the hope of Israel draws near to its realization, how much nearer must our hope be? Grace now; and glory soon. What manner of persons ought we to be?

#81. The Book of Numbers.
My breach of promise (Numb. xiv. 34).
pp. 41 - 44

The English title of this fourth book of Moses is taken from the one given it by the LXX. Arithmoi, which has its origin in the fact that the opening chapter deals with the numbering of the tribes of Israel. The title of the book in the Hebrew Bible, however, is B'midbar, "In the wilderness", which indicates the true setting of its tragic story. Perhaps the verse that best epitomizes the book is Numb xiv. 34:--

> "After the number of the days in which ye searched the land, even forty days, each day for a year, shall ye bear your iniquities, even forty years, and ye shall know my breach of promise."

"My breach of promise"! What an expression to come from the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob! What a revelation of the complete apostacy of His people! It was for the guidance and comfort of this people that Moses wrote Psa. xc. and also, as we believe, Psa. xci. Most readers know that the Psalms are divided into five books, each of which corresponds with one of the books of Moses. The fourth of these comprises Psalms xc.-cvi., and is the Numbers section, which is appropriately opened by the Psalm of Moses. This Psalm has a direct bearing upon the condition of those men who, being twenty years old and upwards, were condemned to die in the wilderness, while Psa. xci. speaks to those, their children, who were to be spared and carried triumphantly through the wilderness and into the promised land.

The references in Psa. xc. to the 40 years' wandering in the wilderness are:--

> "Thou turnest man to destruction, and sayest, return ye children of men" (verse 3).
> "All our days are passed away in Thy wrath, we spend our years as a tale that is told" (verse 9).
> "The days of our years are threescore years and ten" (verse 10).
> "So teach us to number our days, that we may apply our hearts to wisdom" (verse 12).

The statement concerning the threescore years and ten refers primarily to the children of Israel. Any man who was twenty years of age when Israel were turned back into the wilderness could "number his days"—he would die at, or before, attaining 60 years—so with all the rest, 70 years being a fair average.

In this plight Israel's hope is in the Lord and His "return", which will be the better realized when we consider the general structure of the Psalm. But before this is set out, we must consider the relationship of the two Psalms together. The Companion Bible says that "Psalms xc. and xci. are evidently one Psalm in two parts", and the reader of the Hebrew Bible will find nothing to suggest the end of one Psalm and the beginning of another. In the absence of any division it is more easily seen that the opening verse of Psa. xc. corresponds with the opening verse of Psa. xci.:--

> "Lord Thou hast been our dwelling place in all generations" (Psa. xc. 1).
> "He that dwelleth in the secret place of the Most High shall abide under the shadow of the Almighty" (Psa. xci. 1).

The two Psalms, taken together, exhibit the following theme:--

Psalms xc. and xci.

A	xc. 1, 2.	The Lord. The dwelling place of His people.
B	xc. 3-17.	Result of being expelled from this security.
A	xci. 1.	The Lord. The dwelling place of His people.
B	xci. 2-15.	Result of abiding under His shadow.

While Psa. xc. speaks to Israel as condemned to die in the wilderness, Psa. xci. assures their children that none of the instruments of destruction—the snare of the fowler, the noisome pestilence, the terror by night, the arrow by day, the lion and the adder—shall come nigh or hurt them.

The expansion of that part of Psa. xc. which shows Israel's condemnation and hope is as follows:--

Psalm xc. 3-15.

A | 3. Return. Spoken in wrath.
B | 4. 1,000 years are but as yesterday and as a watch in the night.
C | 5. Carried away as with a flood.
D | a | 6. In morning flourish. In evening cut down.
b | 7, 8. Consumed by Thine anger . . . . . wrath.
C | 9, 10. Passed away as a tale told.
D | b | 11. Power of Thine anger . . . . . wrath.
a | 12. Teach us to number our days.
A | 13. Return . . . . . repent.
B | 14, 15. According to the days of affliction. Satisfy us in the morning.

It is not our present purpose to give an exposition of these Psalms, but they have been quoted here because of the light they throw upon the lessons of the Book of Numbers. Psa. xcv. also makes pointed reference to the Book of Numbers and is, in turn, quoted at length in the Epistle to the Hebrews. Chapters ii. and iv. of that Epistle particularly allude to Israel's failure in the wilderness. In them Joshua's leadership is used as a type of the great Captain Who shall yet lead many sons to glory, "Jesus" in Heb. iv. 8 being not the Lord, but Joshua.

Closely associated with the numbering of Israel and their failure in the wilderness is the appointment of the Levites, the rebellion of Korah, and the inability of the priesthood to lead the people. All this, as Hebrews teaches, reveals the need of Christ, the one true, perfect High Priest.

What we must keep in mind as we seek the typical lesson of the Book of Numbers, is that this people, rebellious though they were, suffering loss as they did, were nevertheless a redeemed people. The truth is summed up in the words of I Cor. iii. 15: "If any man's work shall be burned, he shall suffer loss: but he himself shall be saved; yet so as by fire."

The wilderness journeyings of Israel fall into two parts. The first of these was according to divine purpose. It commenced at the shores of the Red Sea, led through Marah and Elim to Sinai, and thence to Kadesh Barnea. From the 1st of Abib, in which the Exodus commenced, to the time of the arrival at Kadesh Barnea was sixteen months. As we have said, this period of Israel's wilderness experiences was of divine purpose, and in it were taught them many precious lessons, as at Marah, Elim, and again in connection with Amalek. During that period the law was given from Sinai and the tabernacle built. The forty years' wandering, however, was a result of unbelief and we must be careful to keep these two periods distinct. Some having seen the forty years of unbelief have said, "There is no wilderness experience for the believer to-day", and so become an easy prey to those who would urge them to act as though heavenly places were already attained, and reigning a present reality. We would urge any such to consider the fact that the earlier part of Israel's wilderness experiences was by God's ordering for their teaching and profit; like Abraham, their father, they did not enter immediately into possession of the land, but became strangers and pilgrims, tent-dwellers, ever moving on. The sixteen months' wilderness experience of Israel and the life-long pilgrimage of Abraham (Heb. xi.) are examples of how we may enjoy the blessings that are ours in Christ, by faith. The actual entry into the land, and the fall of Jericho under Joshua, anticipate the day of redemption and the redemption of the purchased possession.

The book of Exodus, and Numb. i.-xii. record the first wilderness experience, and contain much that illuminates the believer in his experience to-day. The remainder of the Book of Numbers deals with the period of unbelief and resumption of the journey. Deuteronomy concludes the story, and Joshua, a type of the risen Christ ("Moses My servant is dead: now therefore arise", Josh. i. 2), leads Israel into the land of promise.

The truth of the mystery is of course entirely dissociated from what we have been considering. So far as the dispensational teaching of the epistle to the Ephesians is concerned, it is an act of unbelief to attempt to discover in the O.T. that which God never revealed there. Its distinctive doctrine, too, transcends anything that is set forth in type in the law, yet we may learn from these O.T. types the broad principles that underlie the distinction between the truths of Hope and Prize, between Ephesians and Philippians, between Living and Reigning, between the Overcomers, like Caleb, and Overcome, like those who perished in the wilderness. It is naturally outside the scope of these articles to attempt a detailed exposition of these books—all that we can hope to do is to point out those more obvious passages that illuminate the ways of God and His people, suggest lines of practical teaching, and generally set forth those underlying fundamentals of dispensational truth which it is the prime object of The Berean Expositor to make plain.

#82. The numbering, every one according to his service (Numb. i. - iv.).

pp. 83 - 88

Two numberings of Israel are recorded in the book of Numbers. They are recorded in chapters i.-iv. and xxvi.-xxvii. Two distinct objects are in view. In the first numbering, service is before us; in the second, inheritance. In both, ability to go forth to war is specified.

In the numberings of the tribes of Israel, Levi is omitted, and Joseph is represented by both Ephraim and Manasseh, thus retaining the number twelve. The numbering of the tribe of Levi was done separately, and is recorded in Numb. iii. 14-29, where a special reason for this distinction is given.

> "And I, behold, I have taken the Levites from among the children of Israel instead of all the first-born that openeth the matrix among the children of Israel, therefore the Levites shall be Mine; because all the firstborn are Mine: for on the day that I smote all the firstborn in the land of Egypt I hallowed unto Me all the firstborn of Israel, both man and beast: Mine they shall be; I am the Lord" (Numb. iii. 12, 13).

The total number of the firstborn males of all Israel amounted to 22,273 (Numb. iii. 43), whereas the total number of the Levites, who were the substitutes for these firstborn, only amounted to 22,000. This left 273 unaccounted for, and these had to be redeemed at the price of five shekels a head. The numbering of Israel had the following objects in view:--

(1) To discover how many of an age of twenty years and upward were able to go forth to war (Numb. i. 45).
(2) To set apart the tribe of Levi for the service of the tabernacle (Numb. i. 50).
(3) To ensure order when Israel encamped or marched (Numb. ii. 1-34).
(4) To settle the particular service of the three sections of the Levites (Numb. iii. 21-37).

The tribe of Levi was sub-divided according to the sons of Levi—Gershon, Kohath and Merari. These had their allotted places: the Gershonites west of the tabernacle (Numb. iii. 23), the Kohathites south of the tabernacle (Numb. iii. 29), the Merarites north of the tabernacle (Numb. iii. 35), leaving Moses and Aaron and his sons the east side of the tabernacle. Each section of Levites, moreover, had its special charge. The Gershonites had the care of the tabernacle, the hangings, the door, the court and the cords of the tabernacle. The Kohathites had charge of the ark and all the furniture and vessels of the tabernacle. The Merarites took charge of the boards, bars, pillars and sockets, and pins and cords of the court (Numb. iii. 21-37).

The Lord not only regulated the position and service of each son of Levi, but every tribe had its allotted place for encampment:--

> "Every man of the children of Israel shall pitch by his own standard, with the ensign of their father's house; over against about the tabernacle of the congregation shall they pitch" (Numb. ii. 2).

The ensigns of the twelve tribes are not described in the Scriptures. Judah's ensign, the lion, is fairly familiar to all Scripture students, but for the rest we must accept the voice of tradition for what it may be worth. The targum of Jonathan, a paraphrase in Chaldee, gives to each tribes one of the signs of the Zodiac:--

Tribe.	Sign.	Constellation.
JUDAH.—East.	The Lion	Leo.
ISSACHAR.	The Crab.	Cancer.
ZABULUN.	The Virgin.	Virgo.
REUBEN.—South.	A Man.	Aquarius.
SIMEON.	Fishes.	Pisces.
GAD.	The Ram.	Aries.
EPHRAIM.—West. \	The Ox.	The two horns of the
MANASSEH. /		bull Taurus.
BENJAMIN.	The Twins.	Gemini.
DAN.—North.	The Eagle.	Scorpio.
ASHER.	The Archer.	Sagittarius.
NAPHTALI.	The Goat.	Capricornus.
LEVI.—In the midst.	/ The Scales.	Libra. Ancient name
	\ Earlier, possibly the Altar.	Tulka, the Sacred Mound.

The witness of the stars (Gen. i. 14-19; Psa. xix.) was, from Adam to Moses, the ancient testimony to the purpose of the ages. When Israel, the people of type, sign and symbol, were formed, the significance of the twelve "signs" in the heavens was perpetuated by the tribal "ensigns". This important testimony is carefully explained and illustrated in Dr. Bullinger's Witness of the Stars, and a most helpful synopsis is given in Appendix 12 of The Companion Bible.

It will be observed that, at the four cardinal points, East, South, West and North, are symbols that also appear with the Cherubim:--

> "They four had the face of a man, and the face of a lion on the right side; and they four had the face of an ox on the left side: and they four also had the face of an eagle" (Ezek. i. 10).
> "The first living creature was like a lion, and the second living creature like a calf, and the third living creature had a face as a man, and the fourth living creature was like a flying eagle" (Rev. iv. 7).

The fourfold picture of the Lord Jesus, as set forth in the four Gospels, focuses the witness of the heavens, the testimony of the ensigns of Israel, and the pledge of the cherubim upon the Person and work of the Saviour:--

MATTHEW.	The lion.	Behold your KING.
MARK.	The Ox.	Behold my SERVANT.
LUKE.	The Man.	Behold the MAN.
JOHN.	The Eagle.	Behold your GOD.

Returning to the tribe of Levi and their particular service, we find careful details set out in Numb. iv. It was not left to chance to decide the order in which these Levites approached their respective tasks. Aaron and his sons come first. These take down the vail and cover the ark with it. Full instructions are given in Numb. iv. 1-4 as to the covering of the various articles of tabernacle furniture:--

> "And when Aaron and his sons have made an end of covering the sanctuary, and all the vessels of the sanctuary, as the camp is to set forward: after that, the sons of Kohath shall come to bear it: but they shall not touch any holy thing, lest they die. These things are the burden of the sons of Kohath in the tabernacle of the congregation" (Numb. iv. 15).

The Gershonites come next, bearing the curtains, hangings, etc., as already mentioned (Numb. iv. 24-28), and last of all the Merarites:--

> "According to the commandment of the Lord, they were numbered by the hand of Moses, every one according to his service, and according to his burden" (Numb. iv. 49).

In this concluding verse we have the three underlying principles that relate to all scriptural service, viz.:--

> According to THE COMMANDMENT of the Lord.
> According to HIS SERVICE.
> According to HIS BURDEN.

What is the supreme and only authority for service? Surely that it be "according to the commandment of the Lord".

The commandment.

"He called . . . . . He gave them power" (Matt. x. 1).
"Have not I chosen you twelve?" (John vi. 70).
"Ye have not chosen Me, but I have chosen you and ordained you" (John xv. 16).

What is true of the ministry of the twelve apostles is true of all subsequent ministry; it must be according to the Lord's command. In the days of the Law, death followed transgression in service (see Numb. iv. 15, 19). While physical death does not follow transgression in service now, who can say how much spiritual deadness results from it here, and how much loss will result there when the service is tried by fire? If the Lord called some to be evangelists, and some to be teachers, it is surely evident that He needs both. The criticism of friends counts for nothing in these matters. Some have "problems" respecting the ministry of women, but the "commandments of the Lord" are plain, vide I Cor. xiv. 34, I Tim. ii. 12-15, and Titus ii. 3-5. There is an order in later ministry that is as definite as any given in Numb. i.-iv.:--

"God hath set some in the church, first apostles, secondarily prophets, thirdly teachers" (I Cor. xii. 28).
"He gave some apostles, and some prophets, and some evangelists, and some pastors and teachers" (Eph. iv. 11).

Whatever dispensation is in view, order is to be observed. Apostles and prophets came first. They were the foundation ministry of the church of the mystery (Eph. ii. 20). Evangelists (II Tim. iv. 5) came next; then teachers (II Tim. ii. 2).

His service.

"Having then gifts differing according to the grace that is given to us, whether prophecy, let us prophecy according to the proportion of faith; or ministry, let us wait on our ministering; or he that teacheth, on teaching; or he that exhorteth, on exhortation; he that giveth, let him do it with simplicity; he that ruleth, with diligence; he that showeth mercy, with cheerfulness" (Rom. xii. 6-8).
"If the foot shall say, Because I am not the hand, I am not of the body, is it therefore not of the body? If the whole body were an eye, where were the hearing? The eye cannot say unto the hand, I have no need of thee. God hath set the members every one of them in the body, as it hath pleased Him" (I Cor. xii. 15-21).

And yet, for example, we meet with some, eminently fitted to be the hosts of the church, who spoil a good witness by persistently trying to teach or preach. Others, whose business abilities are demanded by the Lord, leave the church the poorer while they indulge some foolish whim of their own.

His burden.

> "And unto one He gave five talents, to another two, and to another one: to every man according to his several ability" (Matt. xxv. 15).
>
> "All these worketh that one and the selfsame Spirit, dividing to every man severally as He will" (I Cor. xii. 11).
> "But let every man prove his own work, and then shall he have rejoicing in himself alone, and not in another, for every man shall bear his own burden" (Gal. vi. 4, 5).

We have not been careful to draw attention to the different dispensations that the above scriptures represent, our idea being merely to show that, in all dispensations, true service must be accepted and regulated according to the threefold principle of Numb. iv. 49. Service that is not according to plan is disobedience, a waste of time and opportunity, robbing someone else of service that might have been rendered, eliminating any possibility of reward, and resulting in failure to glorify the Lord. The appeal to apparent success, or expediency, and all the shifts of human reasoning leave us unmoved. The word of God, unaltered, is our basis of salvation, and nothing lower or less can be the basis of our service.

To every reader of this magazine we make a personal appeal. See that you have your "marching orders" direct from the Word of God. If you have, happy are you. But if there is the slightest tampering with "His commandment", the slightest departure from "his service", the smallest attempt to avoid "his burden"—what kind of servants are you?

As we have already seen, the people of Israel carried the ensigns of the cherubim, God's great pledge that He will surely accomplish His purposes of man's redemption and restoration. An obedient Israel will have the inestimable blessedness of being fellow-workers together with God. In like manner obedient servants of God to-day may enjoy this privilege; but what a world of tragedy is found in the closing words of the second numbering recorded in Numb. xxvi.:--

> "These are they that were numbered by Moses and Eleazar the priest, who numbered the children of Israel in the plain of Moab by Jordan near Jericho. But among these there was not a man of them whom Moses and Aaron the priest numbered, when they numbered the children of Israel in the wilderness of Sinai. For the Lord had said of them, They shall surely die in the wilderness. And there was not left a man of them, save Caleb the son of Jephunneh, and Joshua the son of Nun" (Numb. xxvi. 63-65).

I Cor. ix. 24 - x. 13 and I Cor. iii. 11-15 show us that Israel in the wilderness and Belshazzar in Babylon are not the only ones of whom it shall be said: 'Numbered . . . . . weighed . . . . . and found wanting."

May we truly pray the apostle's first prayer, "Lord, what wilt Thou have me to do?" (Acts ix. 6).

#83. Separation and blessing precede service (Numb. v. & vi.).
pp. 123 - 128

At the dedication of the altar described in Numb. vii., twelve princes of the tribes of Israel bring their offerings consisting of twelve chargers, twelve silver bowls, and twelve spoons of gold, besides meal, oil, incense, bullocks, rams and lambs. Between the numbering of Israel and the apportioning of the service of the Levites, and this offering of the princes comes a somewhat strange section dealing with leprosy, trespass, jealousy and the Nazarite vow. There must be some lesson for us here, and to its discovery and understanding we now apply ourselves. First of all let us see what connection these separate items have, for we do not endorse the critical view that we have, in this fourth book of the law, merely a miscellaneous collection of laws and incidents strung together without method or purpose:--

Numb. v. and vi.

A1 | Among whom I dwell.
A | v. 1-4. Threefold separation from the Lord:
LEPER; ISSUE; DEAD.
B | v. 5-10. Trespass. In general: against the Lord.
B | v. 11-31. Trespass. In particular: against husband.
A | vi. 1-21. Threefold separation to the Lord:
WINE; RAZOR; DEAD.
A2 | My Name upon Israel.
A | vi. 22-27. Threefold blessing:
BLESS . . . . . KEEP;
FACE SHINE . . . . . BE GRACIOUS;
LIFT UP FACE . . . . . GIVE PEACE.

Not till all this is traversed do we hear any more of tabernacle service. Here is a solemn word concerning ministry and service unto the Lord, which is true in principle for all time.

Just as the blessing is threefold, so the cause of separation (uncleanness) is threefold. The trespass offering is twofold. First, trespass in general, with its added fifth; then the particular trial of jealousy. The Nazarite section is twofold. First the loss and defilement of the days of separation by unavoidable contact with sudden death; then the true consecration of the days of separation, with its special offering of the Nazarite's hair. Let us now pass these sections in review that the lessons they teach may not be lost upon us:--

> "Command the children of Israel that they put out of the camp every leper, and everyone that hath an issue, and whosoever is defiled by the dead. Both male and female shall ye put out, without the camp shall ye put them; that they defile not their camps, in the midst whereof I dwell" (Numb. v. 2, 3).

These three causes of defilement seem to be chosen to enforce the fact "that in my flesh dwelleth no good thing". Leprosy is contagious; it is a defilement contracted through the everyday intercourse of man with man. It teaches us that, however innocent we may be, or however legitimate our callings and dealings, the very fact that we are "in the world" calls for the cleansing which the precious blood of Christ alone can give. The defilement by the various issues that are specified in the law occur in the ordinary course of nature, revealing to us that there is a deeper need of cleansing than that of our personal and voluntary transgressions. That, since the sin of Adam, we are indeed rendered unfit by the very depravity of our natures. Here we have "the flesh", as such, and its natural uncleanness. The defilement by the dead was not contracted involuntarily, but in the very exercise of humane and kindly ministry. Here we have service in a world of death, and the Christian worker would do well to remember that while His Lord could be a friend of publicans and sinners, yet remain holy, harmless, undefiled and separate from sinners, it is not at all easy for the best of us to follow in His steps uncontaminated. Here, therefore, are three causes of defilement, three occasions that brought about separation from the conscious enjoyment of the presence of God:--

LEPROSY.—Contagion in a world of sin, in the daily round of business and life.
ISSUES.—Natural weakness. The flesh. This body of death.
DEFILEMENT BY THE DEAD.—Ministry itself exposes us all to defilement.

"Speak unto the children of Israel, when a man or woman shall commit any sin that men commit, to do a trespass against the Lord, and that person be guilty; then they shall confess their sin which they have done: and he shall recompense his trespass with the principal thereof, and add unto it the fifth part thereof, and give it unto him against whom he hath trespassed. But if the man have no kinsman to recompense the trespass unto, let the trespass be recompensed unto the Lord, even to the priest; beside the ram of the atonement, whereby an atonement shall be made for him" (Numb. v. 6-8).

Prominence is given in this case to the individual recognition of personal responsibility, notwithstanding the fact that the ram for atonement is there in the background. Let us note the following features:--

(1) The trespass is against the Lord.
(2) Yet the principal, and added fifth, is to be rendered unto a fellow-creature. (Verse 8 does not conflict with this as it makes provision for one who had no kinsman).

It is essential that true views of sin and trespass shall be entertained by all the people of God. Sin against my brother is really sin against God. David sinned grievously against Uriah the Hittite, but it was perfectly true in his confession to say that he had sinned against God (Psa. li. 4). The prodigal son sinned against the father, and outraged common decency, yet he confessed that he had sinned against heaven. Two things are necessary if we are to preserve a clear conscience at all times: confession and reparation:--

They shall CONFESS their sin.
He shall RECOMPENCE the principal and add a fifth part.

The fifth part is a double tithe, two tenths. Thus there is a double recognition of sin against God and against man, even as the whole law is summed up as love to God and neighbour.

A very special form of trespass follows: "If any man's wife go aside, and commit a trespass against him" (Numb. v. 12). The reason why adultery was so severely dealt with in Israel includes the following:--

(1) It typified the apostacy of the nation from the covenant made with the Lord, the figure of marriage and its terms being used throughout their history to set forth their close attachment to the Lord.
(2) In a nation whose laws of inheritance were of so exacting a nature, adultery and illegitimacy introduce vexing and disturbing elements.
(3) True marriage had in view "a seed of God" (Mal. ii. 15); adultery gave place to the devil.

Spiritual adultery makes blessing and service hopelessly impossible: "The woman shall be a curse among her people" (Numb. v. 27). Defilement and trespass, treated separately in verses 2-8, are seen to be but two parts of one whole, for in verse 12 the defilement of the woman is said to be a trespass against her husband.

There now follows the positive side of the lesson: the real, personal, voluntary separation from all defilement, both natural and moral, unto the Lord, the separation of the Nazarite. The word Nazarite is simply the Hebrew word nazir, which is translated: "him that was separated from" in Gen. xlix. 26, and Deut. xxxiii. 16. In Numb. vi. nezer is translated "separation" eleven times, and "consecration" twice. A most important secondary meaning of nezer is "crown". It is so translated eleven times in the A.V. We give hereunder those found in the law. When we read these passages it is quite easy to see how the same word that is translated "separated" and "consecrated", and which gives us the word "Nazarite", can also mean a "crown":--

"Thou shalt put the mitre upon his head, and put the holy crown upon the mitre" (Exod. xxix. 6).

"And they made the plate of the holy crown of pure gold, and wrote upon it a writing, like to the engraving of a signet, HOLINESS TO THE LORD" (Exod. xxix. 30).

"Upon the mitre, even upon his forefront, did he put the golden plate, the holy crown" (Lev. viii. 9).

"He that is high priest among his brethren, upon whose head the anointing oil was poured . . . . . shall not go in to any dead body, nor defile himself for his father, or his mother: neither shall he go out of the sanctuary, nor profane the sanctuary of his God; for the crown of the anointing oil of his God is upon him" (Lev. xxi. 10-12).

In some measure the Nazarite was separated to God even as was the high priest himself. The nezer (crown) was not limited to the high priest; it was also used of kings, e.g., II Sam. i. 10; II Kings xi. 12, for they also were the Lord's anointed. Samson, too, the judge and deliverer of Israel, was a Nazarite (Judges xiii. 5), and all point forward to the true Nazarite of God, the Lord Jesus, Who was holy, harmless, undefiled, separate from sinners (Heb. vii. 26), and Who for our sakes sanctified Himself (John xvii. 19).

Considerable difference of opinion exists among lexicographers as to the connection between Nazareth and the word Nazarite. Although etymologically the likeness is accidental and not real, who can avoid comparison of the two estimates—man's and God's—expressed in the two following inscriptions?

> "And Pilate wrote a title, and put it on the cross. And the writing was, Jesus of Nazareth, the King of the Jews" (John xix. 19).
>
> "And they made the plate of the holy crown (nezer) of pure gold, and wrote upon it a writing . . . . . Holiness to the Lord" (Exod. xxxix. 30).

Man called Him the Nazar*ene*: God saw in Him the true, anointed, separated, and devoted Nazar*ite*.

Just as anyone, a man or a woman, could take the Nazarite vow without usurping the priesthood, so to-day sanctification and Christ-likeness are open to all without in any sense encroaching upon the exclusive glory of the risen Lord.

The Nazarite's separation to the Lord was to be manifested in three connections (Numb. vi. 3-6):--

(1) ABSTIENENCE FROM THE PRODUCT OF THE VINE.—"Wine, strong drink, vinegar of wine, vinegar of strong drink, liquor of grapes, dried grapes. Anything made from the vine, from the kernels even to the husk."
(2) ABSTINENCE FROM CUTTING THE HAIR.—"All the days of the vow of his separation there shall no razor come upon his head: until the days be fulfilled, in the which he separateth himself unto the Lord, he shall be holy, and shall let the locks of the hair of his head grow."
(3) ABSTINENCE FROM CONTACT WITH THE DEAD.—"All the days that he separateth himself unto the Lord, he shall come at no dead body."

In no circumstances was the Nazarite allowed to break the last rule. It could not be relaxed even for father, mother, brother or sister, when they died, and if it should happen that someone suddenly died at their side, the number of days already passed were considered lost, the head of his consecration was defiled, he had to shave his head, offer sin offering, burnt offering and trespass offering, and begin again.

While Scripture warns against some kinds of wine, it commends others, and, apart from wine altogether, grapes are most wholesome and good for food. Here then is the principle of voluntary abstinence from things innocent in themselves, which finds its parallel in the pilgrim path of the believer to-day:--

> "And they that use this world, as not using it to the full" (I Cor. vii. 31).
>
> "Let your moderation be known to all men" (Phil. iv. 5).

Jeremiah, lamenting the downfall of Israel, says: "Her Nazarites were purer than snow, they were whiter than milk" (Lam. iv. 7), and calls upon Jerusalem to act like the Nazarite who had become defiled, whose days of separation were lost. "Cut off thine hair (nezer), O Jerusalem, and cast it away" (Jer. vii. 29). The Nazarite who had fulfilled his vows offered his hair to the Lord, and it was put into the fire under the peace offerings. Space will not permit a fuller study of the Nazarite here, but it will come before us when dealing with Samson.

We have seen sufficient to realize the importance of the command:--

> "Be ye clean, that bear the vessels of the Lord" (Isa. lii. 11).
> "If a man therefore purge himself from these, he shall be a vessel unto honour, sanctified and meet for the Master's use, and prepared unto every good work" (II Tim. ii. 21).

Such exhortations as "shun", "flee", "turn away" in II Tim. ii. 16, 22 and iii. 5 are equivalent to-day to the abstinence enjoined upon the Nazarite of old.

#84. Numbers xi.
"Mark them . . . . . whose god is their belly."
pp. 162 - 166

Following the law dealing with the Nazarite are a series of chapters that deal with the dedication of the tabernacle and its service (chapters vii.-x.). As we considered the tabernacle in the articles which dealt with the book of Exodus, we will pass on to other features, taking up our study in chapter xi. which begins to deal with the chief feature of the book, and the one of most important in its lessons for ourselves.

Chapter xi. commences a series of events, accompanied by significant movements and journeyings of Israel, that have been incorporated into the practical parts of some of the epistles, and demand a prayerful as well as a careful study. We have already had before us the provoking of the Lord by Israel at the Red Sea, at Marah, in the wilderness of Sin, at Rephidim and at Horeb. The book of Numbers records three more provocations, viz., at Taberah (Numb. xi. 1), at Kibroth Hattaaveh (Numb. xi. 4), and at Kadesh Barnea (Numb. xiv. 2) where they filled up their measure and lost the promised land. Of the first of the three acts of provocation recorded in Numbers no specific details are given, but the simple statement:--

> "And when the people complained, it displeased the Lord: and the Lord heard it; and His anger was kindled, and the fire of the Lord burnt among them" (Numb. xi. 1).

Murmuring or complaining is not treated with the seriousness that it merits, and there will doubtless be many sad cases where believers will suffer loss as a result of failure to mark and forsake the sin of unbelief and ingratitude. If we really believed that God was leading us, we could not complain: it is only when we commence to doubt His care that complaining can possibly begin. It is not without true reason therefore the chapter x. ends with the reference to the ark and cloud, symbols of God's presence and leading. To murmur in the very presence of God, and in sight of that pillar of cloud was unbelief, and the fire of the Lord consumed to the uttermost parts of the camp.

I Cor. x. 6-10 uses this wilderness experience to enforce a lesson, saying:--

> "Neither murmur ye, as some of them murmured, and were destroyed of the destroyer."

Philippians, while it does not actually refer to this period, treats of the same aspect of truth—the going on like Caleb and Joshua—and in that epistle comes the exhortation:--

> "Do all things without murmurings and disputings" (Phil. ii. 14).

A murmuring or complaining member of Christ is giving the lie to his calling. It is the first step to a wasted life, the "perdition" of Heb. x. 39, the "destruction" of Phil. iii. 19. Philippians counters this spirit by implicating joy. A rejoicing believer is proof against the temptations of the wilderness.

Following this general reference comes one that is specific:--

> "And the mixed multitude that was among them fell a lusting: and the children of Israel also wept again, and said, Who shall give us flesh to eat?" (Numb. xi. 4).

This mixed multitude has appeared before, viz., in Exod. xii. 37, 38. They had evidently come out under the shelter of the passover, and they had come through the Red Sea, as we find them here in Numb. xi. This mixed multitude were the result of mixed marriages contracted while in Egypt. Lev. xxiv. 10 speaks of the son of an Israelitish woman whose father was an Egyptian. When Israel returned to Jerusalem under Nehemiah, mixed marriages again were a source of trouble (see Neh. xiii. 23 and Ezra ix. 1, 2). Jehoshaphat's ruin is traceable to his "affinity" with Ahab. This mixed multitude, when expressed in spiritual equivalents, appears in II Cor. vi. 14-18, and hinders that "perfecting" of holiness which is the goal before us (II Cor. vii. 1).

Israel, when they wept, said:--

> "Who will give us flesh to eat? We remember the fish, which we did eat in Egypt freely; the cucumbers and the melons, and the leeks, and the onions, and the garlick. But now our soul is dried away: there is nothing at all, beside this manna, before our eyes" (Numb. xi. 4-6).

It is not without significance that Egypt's food is given as six items. Before the Israelites lay the land of promise, and the food items mentioned in Deut. viii. 8 are seven in number. Behind them lay the viands of Egypt, ahead the fruits of the land of promise, and around them, before their very eyes and fresh every morning, was the manna, with its taste like fresh oil. One of the seven items of Canaan's food was olive oil, and the manna seems to have been a foretaste, a sort of "earnest of the inheritance".

That it was to be accepted gratefully and highly prized, the references in Scripture testify. A golden pot of manna was among the few items that were laid up in the holiest of all (Heb. ix. 4), and the Psalmist speaks of it as "The corn of heaven" and "angel's food" (Psa. lxxviii. 24, 25). Yet, did we not know, alas too well, our own hearts, we should hardly believe that a redeemed people, so recently sighing under the bitter bondage of Egypt, should so soon forget the bitterness and remember the tasty morsels like leeks, onions and garlick. They said "we remember", and the apostle in Phil. iii. 13 says, "forgetting those things which are behind", and Heb. xi. 15 says: "Truly, if they had been mindful of that country from whence they came out, they might have had opportunity to have returned." Stephen, in Acts vii. 39, tells us that Israel turned back again in their hearts unto Egypt, while in Numb. xiv. 4 we read that they actually said: "Let us make a captain, and let us return unto Egypt."

No one with a knowledge of Hebrews, with its double reference to "The Captain of our salvation" (Heb. ii. 10), and "The Captain and Perfecter of faith" (Heb. xii. 2), will fail to see the solemn bearing of this spirit upon the alternatives of Hebrews, viz., "On to perfection" or "Back to perdition". The poet has said: "Distance lends enchantment to the view", and Israel's memory was biased; they forgot the bondage while they remembered the fish, etc., and we do well to profit by this lesson.

How awful the words sound when we think of their setting:--

> "There is nothing at all, beside this manna, before our eyes" (Numb. ix. 6).

It is almost like crucifying to themselves the Son of God afresh, and putting Him to open shame. It is comparable with Esau who for one morsel of meat sold his birthright. It is parallel with those who were failing of the prize as these Israelites were, whose "god was their belly". It is not without deep reason that the first temptation of Adam, and of Christ, revolved around something to eat. This is the first avenue of temptation, and sometimes it is enough.

There is something infectious about evil. The mixed multitude start lusting, the children of Israel begin to weep and complain, and now Moses under the heavy strain begins to speak:--

> "Wherefore hast Thou afflicted Thy servant? . . . . . Have I conceived all this people? Have I begotten them, that Thou shouldest say unto me, Carry them in thy bosom, as a nursing father beareth the sucking child, unto the land which Thou swearest unto their fathers?" (Numb. xi. 11, 12).

Poor Moses—mighty leader as he was, man of faith that so wondrously overcame—he was nevertheless a shadow only of Him Who was to come:--

> "For it became Him . . . . . in bringing many sons unto glory, to make the Captain of their salvation perfect through sufferings" (Heb. ii. 10).

There came a day when the patience of Moses snapped, he spoke unadvisedly with his lips and lost entry into the land of promise. He was a saved man, he appeared upon the Mount of Transfiguration, he was faithful, as a servant, in all his house—few, if any, have even walked so closely with the Lord or been so highly honoured—yet the greatest and the best are unworthy to loose the latchet of the Saviour's shoes. Every crown must be placed at the feet of the Redeemer, He alone is worthy: no flesh shall glory in His presence.

The Lord meets Moses' difficulty by appointing seventy men of the elders of Israel to share his burden, even as He had deputed Aaron to share the work at the first.

Then the Lord takes up the complaint of Israel and their desire for flesh:--

> "Ye shall not eat one day, nor two days, nor five days, neither ten days, nor twenty days, but even a whole month, until it come out at your nostrils, and it be loathsome unto you: because that ye have despised the Lord which is among you, and have wept before Him, saying, Why came we forth out of Egypt?" (Numb. xi. 19, 20).

We know how the Lord fulfilled this dreadful pronouncement. A wind brought quails from the sea, which flew so low that they were easily caught. All that day and all that night and all the next day the people gathered quails:--

> "And while the flesh was yet between their teeth, ere it was chewed, the wrath of the Lord was kindled against the people" (Numb. xi. 33).

The following passages of Scripture seem to be a fitting comment and conclusion to this solemn passage:--

> "We remember" (Numb. xi. 5).
>
> "They soon forgat His works; they waited not for His counsel, but lusted exceedingly in the wilderness, and tempted God in the desert. And He gave them their request; but sent leanness into their soul" (Psa. cvi. 13-15).
>
> "I have learned, in whatsoever state I am, to be content . . . . . I can do all things through Christ which strengtheneth me" (Phil. iv. 11-13).
>
> "Be content with such things as ye have: for He hath said, I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee" (Heb. xiii. 5).

#85. Numbers xi. - xiv.

"These things are examples, to the intent we should not lust after evil things" (I Cor. x. 6).

pp. 202 - 208

It is one thing to perceive glimpses of truth—and for the smallest ray of light how can we be too thankful—it is quite another matter to so perceive the trend of a passage as to receive illumination, both upon detail and upon the general scope. While we most gratefully seize upon the veriest crumbs of doctrine or practical teaching which we may receive from such a book as the book of Numbers, readers of The Berean Expositor will feel, somehow, that unless we can get larger views than just a survey of a few verses, we shall probably miss many essential points.

As we turn the pages of Numb. xi., xii. and xiii. onward, the task seems too great to be able to discern order and design in such a wealth of detail and such a mass of description. Yet the words of Numb. xi. 23: "Is the Lord's hand waxed short?" is a challenge to faith, and consequently, before we proceed with our study of Numb. xii. we seek for light upon the scope of this section. And first where does the section that commences at chapter xi. end? We read on until we arrive at the close of chapter xiv. to find that chapter xv. opens with laws that were to be enforced when the people entered the land. This evidently marks a dividing line for us. It would be good discipline for us all if we had time and space to take the reader step by step through the intervening chapters so that the discovery of the underlying unity should be received as a gift from the Lord, and not, as we fear it will appear, as a matter of course. The structure or the scope of a passage is of the first importance.

Quoting from the opening chapter of the book: "The Foundations of Dispensational Truth" by the late E. W. Bullinger, D.D., we read:--

> "There is one great foundation principle in the science of LOGIC which will meet all the difficulties, if we are careful to observe it. It is this: We cannot reason from the particular to the general. The difficulties experienced by some of our readers are due to the fact that they arise from a consideration of only parts of the truth. To find the answer to them, it is vain to continue the discussion of them as separate difficult points: we mean difficulties connected with the earlier Pauline Epistles written before Acts xxviii., such as ordinances, the one body of I Cor. xii. or the spiritual gifts of I Cor. xiii., xiv., etc."

These words may help our readers to appreciate any light that can be cast upon the scope of a passage, so that we may reason from the general to the particular, which is of course the only true way.

A strictly literary structure is too vast an undertaking, but the following synopsis will make it clear that a purpose runs through the record of Israel's murmurings, and to see that will suffice:--

Numb. x. 33 - xiv. 45.
God's breach of promise.

	KADESH.	The people presume. The Amalekites discomfit them.

Quite a number of items that bear upon the teaching associated with Philippians and our own calling call for attention. Let us briefly pass them in review.

The ark goes before to search out a place of rest. Can we not find help here? Speaking to those who were His disciples, the Lord said: "I go to prepare a place for you" (John xiv. 2), and this blessed promise is precede by a statement of principle: "If it were not so I would have told you." This is still true for the Church of the One Body. To learn of the hope, we need to know where Christ is now, and if details and explanations are not always given, surely the promise still holds good: "I would have told you." We shall see presently that the sending of the spies was a contradiction of trust in this fact.

The mixed multitude, and the ten spies, are a type of the effect upon the believer of failure to abide by such scriptures as:--

> "Why, as though living in the world, are ye subject to ordinances" (Col. ii. 20).
> "No man that warreth entangleth himself with the affairs of his livelihood" (II Tim. ii. 4).

Ephesians says to us "Remember"; Philippians says to us "Forget". We are to remember that we were hopeless aliens, but Israel remembered the onions and garlick instead. We are to forget the things that are behind, and to set our mind on things above.

Even the two passages that speak of the resistance of Moses are important to us. Moses was not moved by jealousy when he heard that Eldad and Medad, who had remained in the camp, had prophesied. And when God said in His wrath: "I will smite them with pestilence, and disinherit them, and will make of thee a greater nation and mightier than they" (Numb. xiv. 12), Moses did not entertain the thought for a moment, but pleaded with the Lord to pardon the people and remember His Own glorious Name. Here is a concrete example of the spirit inculcated in Phil. ii. 3, 4:--

> "Let nothing be done through strife or vain glory; but in lowliness of mind let each esteem other better than themselves. Look not every man on his own things, but every man also on the things of others."

Miriam's leprosy and her being shut out of the camp for seven days, and the jealous spirit manifested, typify Israel in her lo-ammi (not my people) condition between the first coming of Christ when the kingdom was preached, and the second coming of Christ when it shall be established. The meekness of Moses is here mentioned, anticipating that other period of rejection, when the Lord should say: "I am meek and lowly in heart" (Matt. xi. 29).

Let us now concentrate our attention on those sections that are most prominent. It will be seen that the two features of greater importance are members B and B. The first looks back with longing eyes to Egypt and its flesh-pots; the second looks with bias upon the land of promise and exaggerates its difficulties. The ten spies are said to have brought up a "slander upon the land" (xiv. 36), and above all comes the revelation of God's breach of promise.

How often has the sad history of chapters xi. and xii. been repeated after Egypt, and turn against a true man of God among them, putting up some trumpery charge against him, largely to cover their own baseness, as was the objection against the Ethiopian wife of Moses. Whenever we have to meet the parallel of Numb. xii., let us immediately look for the parallel of Numb. xi., and see it manifested by the failure of Numb. xiv.

Our study for this paper must now concentrate upon the story of the spies and the result of their report:--

> "And the Lord speak unto Moses, saying, Send thou men that they may search the land of Canaan, which I give unto the children of Israel" (Numb. xiii. 1, 2).

Has it ever struck the reader that there is a note of pain, a sense of distrust in the words: "that they may search the land of Canaan, which I give"? Why search? Why send men to see "what the land is, whether it be fat or lean" (xiii. 20), if God had described it and given it Himself? Does it not sound like unbelief? It not only sounds like distrust, but it was. The command to take the twelve men and send them as spies did not originate with God: it was an answer to their own request, and once again, it brought leanness into their soul. When Moses rehearsed the affair in the ears of Israel he reminded them of their unbelief:--

> "Behold, the Lord thy God hath set the land before thee: go up and possess it, as the Lord God of thy fathers hath said unto thee; fear not, neither be discouraged. And ye came near unto Me every one of you and said: We will send men before us, and they shall search out the land, and bring us word again by what way we must go up, and into what cities we shall come . . . . . Yet in this thing ye did not believe the Lord your God, Who went in the way before you, to search you out a place to pitch your tents in; in fire by night, to shew you by what way ye should go, and in a cloud by day" (Deut. i. 21-23).

A reference to Ezek. xx. 5, 6 shows that at the time when the Lord delivered Israel out of the land of Egypt, He had already "espied for them" a glorious land. Israel's request for the spies therefore was sheer unbelief, it was a despising of the Lord, a slighting of His loving care and provision. It has its analogy to-day.

Quite a number of those who believe the teaching of the epistles of the mystery have expressed themselves as unsatisfied by the scantiness of the revelation there contained as to (1) just what constitutes the glory of our inheritance, and (2) just exactly by what way the Church shall enter into its hope. There is a looking back to the hope of an earlier dispensation, a sort of envy at the lavish description of the millennial kingdom, or the wonders of the heavenly city, and one senses something petulant in the request, "Where is our hope described in the epistles of the Mystery? Why are there no details given to us as to others?" There is also a querulous complain that whereas I Thess. iv. or I Cor. xv. are most explicit, one cannot be sure from the prison epistles whether the Church of the One Body will be caught up by rapture, will die off and pass through death and resurrection, whether all will go together, whether there will be angelic accompaniments, etc., etc. All this, which superficially sounds like earnest enquiry, is but the old unbelief of Israel re-expressed. They wanted to know more than God had revealed about "the land" which was their inheritance, and they wanted to know more than God had revealed as to "what way we must go up". Both these questions were already answered by faith. God had espied the land and had called it good. God went before them with fire and with cloud "to shew them by what way they should go". Faith needs nothing more.

If our inheritance at the right hand of God, "far above all", is so transcendentally above all human thought and experience, what words of human language could describe the riches of the glory of that inheritance of the saints? If in the resurrection and translation we need such adjusting to the new sphere of blessing "in the heavenly places", how should we be the better if God described the process. It is enough for us that as we receive a spirit of wisdom and revelation in the knowledge of "Him", the ascended Lord, and of "it", the mystery, we shall receive as full an answer to our quest for knowledge as God sees fit to give. If we are assured that: "when Christ Who is our life shall be manifested, we also shall be manifested with Him in glory", what does it matter that "the way we must go up" is left unexplained? We shall arrive—praise God. We do not know how—well, that is His responsibility, not ours.

Our refusal to be turned back to I Thess. iv. as the hope of the Church is to be understood in the light of Numb. xiii. and xiv. We seek the spirit that enabled Caleb and Joshua to believe God, and leave the consequences. As we pointed out when dealing with Col. i. 23 (see Volume XXI), the great evidence of progress in the truth, or of the beginning of decline, are closely associated with holding steadfast to "the hope". Caleb and Joshua were threatened with stoning for the stand they took. We shall probably get its equivalent again and again; but as in their case, so in ours, His truth shall be our shield and buckler.

One of the reasons why the Lord was not too explicit about the land of Canaan, and the way up, was because it was inhabited by a monstrous seed of the wicked one, the giants, the sons of Anak, and viewing such antagonists with the eyes of the flesh, the spies said: "We were in our own sight as grasshoppers, and so we were in their sight." The cities were walled and very great—and grace was not given in the wilderness to deal with these remote difficulties. When at last Israel did stand before the walls of Jericho, they fell down flat at the shout of faith.

The pathway to our inheritance is blocked by principalities and powers, spiritual wickedness and world holders of darkness. If we should see them with the eyes of the flesh, we should crumple up as did Daniel. God mercifully spares us this vision. We believe His Word; that is enough. If we knew the formidable strongholds of Satan that must be overcome in "the evil day", we should recoil in fear and unbelief. We shall not face them until we are all assembled beneath the banner of our true Captain, the greater Joshua, with Jordan behind us, and the land of promise immediately before us. Why not take a leaf out of this book of experience; why not believe what God has revealed, and lovingly accept as best what He withholds?

Two Psalms should be read in connection with this passage of Israel's history. Psa. xc. speaks of those who, being over twenty years of age, died in the wilderness: they were taught to number their days. Psa. xci. speaks of their children, who grew up at their sides, and who saw the pestilence and the arrow doing their work, yet knew that they should not come nigh them.

While a sinner may be saved at the eleventh hour, it would appear from many passages of Scripture that a believer who is saved, and who puts his hand to the plough, who looks back like Lot's wife, who does not press toward the mark, who like Demas loves this present evil age, or like the Hebrews of Heb. vi. or Esau of Heb. xii. exchange their birthright for a little ease here, are running a serious risk of suffering loss in that day, of losing their crown or their reward. Caleb and Joshua, on the other hand, are examples of those who press on unto perfection, who attain "the better resurrection" of Heb. xi., or the "out-resurrection" and "prize" of Phil. iii.

May we draw attention to one more feature. "The better resurrection" of Heb. xi. is a close parallel with the "out-resurrection" of Phil. iii. Now we are not left to surmise as to when the better resurrection was entered, for Heb. xi. declares that those who looked for the better country all died in faith, not having received the promise, "God having provided some better thing for us, that they without us should not be made perfect" (Heb. xi. 40).

Caleb and Joshua were not permitted by the Lord to go on to the inheritance at once. No, they had to wait the forty years just like the rest. The overcomers of Heb. xi. did not enter the heavenly city immediately after death, no, they had to wait until the whole of their company were raised together, the "better resurrection" referring not to the time when it is entered, but to the prize appertaining thereto which would be presented when the time had come.

So with Phil. iii. The out-resurrection need not take place before the resurrection and translation of the whole Church, but it will qualify for "the prize of the high calling", which is parallel with Caleb's additional inheritance when God's time comes.

It is not without significance that Paul's other reference to a "prize" should be most intimately associated with Israel's failure in the wilderness (I Cor. ix. 24, x. 13), nor should we slight the precious lesson of the closing sentence: "But will with the temptation make the end (or goal), so that ye may be able to bear it."

The trials of the pilgrim path are for our future glory. He knows; therefore, follow on.

"Helpers of your joy"

#1. The place that joy occupies.
pp. 61, 62

It is surprising, in one sense, to note the emphasis which the apostle puts upon "joy". When we come to think of the life he lived, the nature of the revelation made known to and through him—the stewardship of the mystery—his bonds and imprisonment, the loneliness and the abuse that seemed his daily meat, we should not be surprised, speaking after the manner of men, if "joy" never entered his vocabulary.

But, thank God, we do not speak after the manner of men, having seen enough of the grace of God to be prepared for songs in the night and psalms from the innermost prison. Again and again in the epistle to the Philippians Paul bids his readers "rejoice", even though some brethren (not merely pagan enemies) were endeavouring to add affliction to his bonds.

The ministry for which The Berean Expositor was first called into existence, and which justifies its continuance, is one so fraught with problems, and which makes such demands upon both reader and writer, that it is absolutely necessary that into all the hard study, and in some cases isolation that the truth entails, should be brought the remembrance that faith is not cold but warm and living, and that there is a "joy of faith" (Phil. i. 25), as well as the subject-matter of the faith, the fight of faith and stedfastness in the faith. Faith not only leads to justification, acceptance and life, blessings indeed beyond computation, but to "joy and peace in believing" (Rom. xv. 13) with which we should be as much filled, as "with the spirit".

Some of the fruits of the Spirit are enumerated in Gal. v. 22, 23 which sets forth a veritable cluster of Eschol, nine in all, including gentleness, temperance and faith. The first in order of mention is "love", without which all knowledge, faith and even martyrdom are reduced to nothing; and second in order of mention is "joy". Can we conceive of gentleness without joy and still associate it with the Spirit? Temperance without joy may be a mischief-worker and a cause of stumbling. A joyless faith producing a joyless creed neither commends the gospel nor glorifies the Lord. Joy differs from happiness. In the everyday sense of the word much so-called "happiness" largely depends upon what "happens", whereas joy is deeper, being independent of circumstances. The apostle may at one time be exalted and at another depressed; he may be full or hungry, be in comparative comfort or in lonely neglect. He may be even in fetters and prison—but his joy remains unchanged.

Strictly speaking, there should be no need in a magazine of this type specifically to deal with such a subject. We should all be so keen to learn all that is possible concerning the Lord and His Word, that the pursuit of some intricate piece of grammar should be a joyful undertaking, the labour of discovering or of verifying and using a structure should be as joyful a piece of work as the singing of a lovely melody. Indeed, a peep behind the scenes would sometimes reveal that when, after hours of close study, some intricate point had been resolved, or a complicated structure discovered, the writer's manner of celebrating the event was far removed from the deportment we usually associate with such studies. Such exuberance not only echoes Archimedes' famous cry of Eureka, but, and which is more to the point, is an echo of a joy such as that of Jeremiah, who exclaimed: "Thy words were found and I did eat them; and Thy word was unto me the joy and rejoicing of mine heart" (Jer. xv. 16), or of the Psalmist who said: "I rejoice at Thy word, as one that findeth great spoil" (Psa. cxix. 162).

However, none of us attain even nearly to the ideal, and some concession must be made. We therefore deliberately set aside a few pages each month in order that we may minister to the "joy" as well as to the "soundness" of the faith. "Rejoice" is as much an exhortation to be heeded, by grace, as any other found in Scripture. Let us then enter into the joy of faith, in blessed anticipation of that future entry into the joy of the Lord.

#2. "I will not leave thee."
pp. 81, 82

The subject of Christian joy may be approached from several angles, and it is associated with a variety of themes, but the one theme that calls for immediate expression seems to be the close association that Scripture indicates as existing between joy and the presence of the Lord. We might establish the truth of this by an appeal to the epistle to the Philippians, where one of the key-words is "rejoice", and where in chapter iv. the secret is revealed that "The Lord is near". We might appeal to the Psalmist who said: "In Thy presence is fullness of joy" (Psa. xvi. 11), and realize that all such enjoyment of the Lord's presence in this life is an anticipation of that future day of resurrection when we shall be satisfied (Psa. xvii. 15).

But in the first epistle of John we read: "These things write I unto you that your joy may be full" (I John i. 4). Upon examination it will be discovered that John is writing about fellowship with the Father and with the Son, of walking in the light as He is in the light. In other words he associates joy with the presence of the Lord.

Looking back to the verse in Psa. xvi. preceding that quoted above we read: "For Thou wilt not leave my soul in hell" (Psa. xvi. 10), and this reference provides us with the first of many aspects of that experimental enjoyment of the presence of God, which is our theme.

"Thou wilt not leave."—These words of the Lord spoken in the very valley of the shadow of death are calculated to minister to the joy of all who trust in Him. We observe that:--

(1) The promise, "I will not leave thee" arises out of salvation itself:--

> "Hide not Thy face far from me: put not Thy servant away in anger: Thou hast been my help: leave me not, neither forsake me, O God of my salvation" (Psa. xxvii. 9).

As the God of our salvation we can confidently call upon Him to "leave us not", and when we contemplate all that salvation has cost Him, we may gladly rest upon the fact that He will not leave those to perish who have been bought with such a price.

(2) "I will not leave thee" is also implicit in the fact that we so belong to the God of our Salvation, that we are called by His name:--

> "O Lord, though our iniquities testify against us, do Thou it for Thy NAME'S sake: for our backslidings are many; we have sinned against Thee. O the Hope of Israel, the Saviour thereof in time of trouble, why shouldest Thou be as a stranger in the land, and as a wayfaring man that turneth aside to tarry for a night? Why shouldest Thou be as a man astonished, as a mighty man that cannot save? Yet Thou, O Lord, art in the midst of us, and we are called by Thy NAME: leave us not" (Jer. xiv. 7-9).

The context of this passage is one of terrible retribution. Not until Daniel, in his prayer of the ninth chapter, pleads for the city "which is called by Thy name . . . . . and Thy people (that) are called by Thy name" (Dan. ix. 18, 19) does an answer of peace come. Nevertheless, in spite of the long wait of 70 years, the prayer was heard. We are called by His name; He has called us by our name, and we can confidently put up the plea: "We are called by Thy name: leave us not."

(3) "I will not leave thee" is implied in the promises of God:--

> "And behold, I am with thee, and will keep thee in all places whither thou goest, and will bring thee again into this land; for I will not leave thee, until I have done that which I have spoken to thee of" (Gen. xxviii. 15).

Here is a ground of strong confidence. "I am with thee"; "I will keep thee"; "I will bring thee" are all implied in the words: "For I will not leave thee until . . . . ."

(4) "I will not leave thee" is our strength in the conflict and our pledge of victory:--

> "Be strong and of a good courage, fear not, nor be afraid of them: for the Lord thy God, He it is that doth go with thee; He will not fail thee, nor forsake thee" (Deut. xxxi. 6).

As a contribution, therefore, to that fullness of joy which may be enjoyed by reason of the presence of the Lord, we commend to the reader the words of the Lord: "I will not leave thee."

#3. "I will not forsake thee."
pp. 101, 102

Whenever we hear the words, "I will not leave thee", we immediately add, if only mentally, the words, "neither will I forsake thee". In one sense "leaving" and "forsaking" have an almost synonymous meaning, and, indeed, the same original word is sometimes rendered "leave" and sometimes "forsake". There are, however, one or two passages that we ought not to omit from our study together, and we trust that the survey will minister something of the joy of faith to any who may know something of what it means to be forsaken here below.

At the dedication of the temple, Solomon blessed the Lord, saying:-- > "Blessed be the Lord, that hath given rest unto His people Israel, according to all that He promised: there hath not failed one word of all His good promise, which He promised by the hand of Moses His servant. The Lord our God be with us, as He was with our fathers; let Him not leave us, nor forsake us" (I Kings viii. 56, 57).

The way in which Solomon links together the fulfillment of the promise with the plea, "leave us not, neither forsake us", leads our thoughts back to the beginning of Israel's history in the land, under Joshua:--

> "As I was with Moses, so I will be with thee: I will not fail thee nor forsake thee . . . And behold, this day I am going the way of all the earth: and ye know in all your hearts and in all your souls, that not one thing hath failed of all the good things which the Lord your God spake concerning you: all are come to pass unto you, and not one thing hath failed thereof" (Josh. i. 5, xxiii. 14).

Let us notice one or two features that minister to the comfort of the believer.

(1) The fact that the Lord will not forsake His people is a pledge of their preservation: "For the Lord loveth judgment, and forsaketh not His saints: they are preserved for ever" (Psa. xxxvii. 28). Surely it must minister to our joy to realize that in spite of all the opposition of the enemy, and of the betrayal of our own failings, the saints are not forsaken, and their preservation is assured.

(2) The fact that the Lord will not forsake His people is a part of His great purpose of grace: "For the Lord will not forsake His people for His great name's sake: because it hath pleased the Lord to make you His people" (I Sam. xii. 22).

(3) The fact that the Lord will not forsake His people is because He is gracious and merciful, and slow to anger:--

> ". . . . . in their rebellion appointed a captain to return to their bondage: but Thou art a God ready to pardon, gracious and merciful, slow to anger, and of great kindness, and forsookest them not. Yea, when they had made them a molten calf, and said, This is thy > God that hath brought thee up out of Egypt, and had wrought great provocations; yet Thou in Thy manifold mercies forsookest them not in the wilderness: the pillar of cloud departed not from them by day, to lead them in the way; neither the pillar of fire by night, to show them light, and the way wherein they should go . . . . . Yet many years didst Thou forbear them, and testified against them . . . . . Nevertheless for Thy great mercies' sake Thou didst not utterly consume them, nor forsake them; for Thou art a gracious and merciful God" (Neh. ix. 17-19, 30, 31).

(4) The fact that the Lord will not forsake His people delivers them from the bondage of fear: "Be content with such things as ye have: for He hath said, I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee. So that we may boldly say, The Lord is my Helper, and I will not fear what man shall do unto me" (Heb. xiii. 5, 6).

Many children of God are compelled to walk in lonely paths. Faithfulness often cuts them off from fellowship. Natural ties also are severed, and friends prove false or fail. It is to such that the blessed assurance comes, with all its sweetness, that the Lord will not forsake them:--

> "When my father and mother forsake me, then the Lord will take me up" (Psa. xxvii. 10).
>
> "Can a woman forget her sucking child . . . . . Yea, they may forget, yet will I not forget thee" (Isa. xlix. 15).
>
> "At my first answer no man stood with me, but all men forsook me: I pray God that it may not be laid to their charge. Notwithstanding the Lord stood with me" (II Tim. 16, 17).

The Apostle knew a little of the fellowship of His Lord's sufferings. He, like the Saviour, was forsaken by his own, but there the parallel ceases. Paul could add, "notwithstanding the Lord stood with me", but his Saviour, and ours, had to cry, "My God, My God, why hast Thou forsaken Me?" (Matt. xxvii. 46).

Let us never forget in all the joy that comes to us by His gracious presence, that part of the price for such blessing included the forsaking of the Holy One for our sakes.

#4. "I will be with thee."
pp. 121, 122

The Lord has promised that He will neither leave, nor forsake, His own, and in this double promise of His presence we rejoice. The words "not leave" and "not forsake", however, are negatives, and so we will turn to a positive declaration:--

> "He shall call upon Me, and I will answer him: I will be with him in trouble" (Psa. xci. 15).

There is no promise in Scripture that the believer be exempt from trouble, but what is promised is that he need never be alone in his trouble. The Lord has said: "I will be with him in trouble." The saint may pass through fire and water, but the Lord will be with him and sanctify to him his deepest distress:--

> "When thou passest through the waters, I will be with thee; and through the rivers, they shall not overflow thee" (Isa. xliii. 2).

Joseph passed through a long period of trial and testing, yet in the midst of it all the Scriptures reveal the hidden source of his joy. First of all he was sold by his brethren into Egypt. At this the iron entered into his soul:--

> "Whose feet they hurt with fetters: he was laid in iron" (Psa. cv. 18).

or, as the margin says, "His soul came into iron". It must surely have been a bitter experience for the beloved son of Israel to be sold as a slave, and sold by his very brethren; yet one blessing, at least, was his; the Lord was with him:--

> "Potiphar . . . . . bought him . . . . . and the Lord was with Joseph and he was a prosperous man" (Gen. xxxix. 1, 2).

or, as Wycliffe's quaint version puts it, "He was a lucky fellow".

But Joseph suffered yet deeper humiliation. He was falsely condemned and put into prison, a position not conducive to joy or peace, which often produces resentment and rebellion:--

> "Joseph's master . . . put him into the prison . . . but the Lord was with Joseph . . . and that which he did, the Lord made it to prosper" (Gen. xxxix. 20-23).

We are too apt to gauge our prosperity by our possessions or our standing in society, but these words reveal that true prosperity is independent of circumstances: imprisonment may go hand in hand with prosperity, the deciding factor being the presence or absence of the Lord. The three men who were cast into the fiery furnace at the command of Nebuchadnezzar were certainly in an extremely perilous position, yet of them it could be written that upon their body the fire had no power, nor was an hair of their heads singed:--

> "Did not we cast three men bound into the midst of the fire?"

asked the king, and he continued,

> "Lo, I see four men loose, walking in the midst of the fire, and they have no hurt; and the form of the fourth is like the Son of God" (Dan. iii. 24, 25).

Caleb, who wholly followed the Lord, knew the power of this blessed fellowship. At the division of the land under Joshua, Caleb came forward and reminded Joshua of what the Lord had said concerning both himself and Joshua forty-five years earlier:--

> "Now therefore give me this mountain, whereof the Lord spake in that day: for thou heardest in that day how the Anakims were there, and that the cities were great and fenced: If so be the Lord will be with me, then I shall be able to drive them out, as the Lord said . . . . . Hebron therefore became the inheritance of Caleb" (Josh. xiv. 12-14).

Caleb's one qualification was: "if so be the Lord will be with me." That being granted, success was certain. The name of the place inherited by Caleb was Kirjath-arba and was named after Arba, a great man among the Anakims. The name was changed to Hebron, a word that means fellowship, and therefore enshrines the very thought of the gracious presence that Caleb so desired.

In His presence is fullness of joy, and that presence includes the promises: "I will not leave you", "I will not forsake you", and "I will be with you". Thus does the conscious enjoyment of the presence of the Lord minister to our joy.

#5. "The joy of Thy salvation."
pp. 141, 142

Despite the pressure of circumstances, the depressing effect of ill-health, the corrosion of care, and the anxieties that pertain to this life, the fact that God so loved the world as to give His only begotten Son, should lighten our every experience with joy.

The wise men from the east exemplify this. They had traveled far in search of the One that had been born King of the Jews, and, "when they saw the star, they rejoiced with exceeding great joy" (Matt. ii. 10). Notice how the inspired narrative emphasizes their joy. It is not enough to say that "they were glad" or that "they rejoiced". They not only rejoiced, they rejoiced with joy—and more than that, with exceeding joy, yea exceeding great joy. And all this because the star at length stood over Bethlehem. What therefore ought to be our state of mind and heart who know not only the grace of Bethlehem, but the glory of Calvary, the triumph of the resurrection, and that ascension far above all!

Before the wise men found cause for rejoicing, the promise even of the forerunner of Christ was associated with joy. To Zacharias, the father of John the Baptist, the angel said: "And thou shalt have joy and gladness; and many shall rejoice at his birth" (Luke i. 4).

When Christ was born, not only did men rejoice, but angels, too, were moved to say, "Behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy" (Luke ii. 10).

The gospel is not only the glad tidings of great joy that heralded the Saviour's birth, but an ever-living power unto salvation, and this, too, should lead us to rejoice. The Lord assures us that "there is joy in the presence of the angels of God over one sinner that repenteth" (Luke xv. 10). In spite of the darkness of the present day, sinners are still repenting, and joy is still experienced in heaven. Shall we not also share this joy? Shall we not find a ground of rejoicing in every trophy of grace?

The report that God has opened a door of faith in any district, should, if we are in the right spirit, fill us with joy: "They passed through Phenice and Samaria, declaring the conversion of the Gentiles: and they caused great joy unto all the brethren" (Acts xv. 3). Paul and Barnabas were on their way to Jerusalem to battle for the faith. They might have caused a great deal of harm had they discussed this matter with the churches in Phenice and Samaria. They chose the better path, and left great joy behind them.

Let us be unselfish in this matter of joy, and it will flow like a river.

#6. "The joy set before."
pp. 161, 162

Writing to the church of the Thessalonians the Apostle says that he gives thanks and prays unceasingly concerning their work of faith, labour of love, and patience of hope in our Lord Jesus Christ, in the sight of God and our Father, and then proceeds to tell them that he knew that they were the elect of God: "Knowing, brethren beloved, your election of God" (I Thess. i. 4).

While the apostle had been the recipient of an abundance of revelations, and had received the stewardship of the mysteries of God, and had been caught away to paradise, there to hear unspeakable words, there is nowhere any suggestion that Paul or any man could ever look into the Book of Life, or that any man ever received from God private information concerning His elective purposes. Yet Paul knew that the Thessalonian saints were elect of God. He knew it by their fruits.

We may on some occasion have walked through an orchard. We may have admired and sampled some of its luscious fruits. Throughout the whole of our exploration of that orchard we should probably have not seen one single root, yet we should "know" that the invisible roots were there and functioning properly by reason of the visible fruit. So Paul saw the fruits of faith:--

> "For our gospel came not unto you in word only, but also in power, and in the Holy Ghost, and in much assurance; as ye know what manner of men we were among you for your sake. And ye became followers of us and of the Lord, having received the word in much affliction, with joy of the Holy Ghost" (I Thess. i. 5, 6).

The place that joy occupies here is only seen in true perspective as we view it in juxtaposition with the "much affliction". This is a spiritual joy, the fruit of the Spirit, and therefore in no wise dependent upon external circumstances. The reception of the gospel in its saving power, though accompanied by afflictions without, was accompanied by joy within, a joy that no man takes away.

In like manner, the Hebrew saints: "took joyfully the spoiling of their goods" (Heb. x. 34). Unless there be some compensating element, no person takes joyfully the spoiling of his goods, and these Hebrews believers were not abnormal; they no more liked to see their property ruined than we should, but their joy was an anticipation of future glory:--

> "Knowing in yourselves that ye have in heaven a better and an enduring substance" (Heb. x. 34).

This is the spirit of the Lord Himself:--

> "Who for the joy that was set before Him, endured the cross, despising the shame, and is set down at the right hand of the throne of God" (Heb. xii. 2).

Thus all present joy is an anticipation of those pleasures which are for evermore at God's right hand. To live looking for that blessed hope will minister to our joy even though goods are spoiled and afflictions suffered.

#7. A great cause of rejoicing.
pp. 181, 182

If we were asked what constituted our greatest joy, what should we answer? Our individual answers would probably reveal degrees of spiritual apprehension. One very old saint has left on record what constituted his greatest joy, and we may profit by considering it:--

> "I rejoiced greatly, when the brethren came and testified of the truth that is in thee, even as thou walkest in the truth. I have no greater joy than to hear that my children walk in truth" (III John 3, 4).

Here is a ground of rejoicing, far removed from personal feelings or motives, that we should do well to know. In his first epistle, it will be remembered, this same apostle had much to say concerning those who say and those who walk (I John i. 6-10). Further, he wrote:--

> "He that saith, I know Him, and keepeth not His commandments, is a liar, and the truth is not in him" (I John ii. 4).
>
> "He that saith he abideth in Him ought himself also so to walk, even as He walked" (I John ii. 6).

John sums up his teaching in the words of I John iii. 18:--

> "My little children, let us not love in word, neither in tongue; but in deed and in truth."

He speaks scathingly of the boast of light that is accompanied by hatred of the brethren (I John ii. 9). He tells his readers that the doing of righteousness is the finest evidence that they are born of Him (I John ii. 29). He declares that all the boasted possession of the love of God is nullified by lack of charity (I John iii. 17; iv. 20). He had written telling them of the many antichrists and of the domination of the lie. In his second epistle he said: "I rejoiced greatly that I found of thy children walking in truth" (II John 4), and, as we have seen, in his third epistle he says that he has no greater joy than to hear that his children walk in truth.

Some of us are apt to look around with the eyes of Elijah and say: "I only am left, and they seek my life." The Apostle tells us to consider others better than ourselves, and if there be any virtue, and if there be any praise, to reckon, or impute, these things. If we do not rejoice greatly whenever we hear of the Lord's children putting into practice the doctrine they have learned, we have missed a real cause of joy, and allowed one part of our spiritual life to remain undeveloped. True joy is unselfish, and finds its cause in the blessing of others.

#8. "Count it all joy."
pp. 201, 202

We found that John had no greater joy than to hear that his children walked in the truth. What should we say we counted "all joy" if we were asked? James writing to the dispersion said:--

> "My brethren, count it all joy when ye fall into divers temptations" (James i. 2).

This is certainly not a natural point of view. Most of us would count it all joy if we had escaped divers temptations. James, however, makes it clear that he is no misanthrope, no man who is only happy when he is miserable. He proceeds to explain:--

> "Knowing this, that the trying of your faith worketh patience. But let patience have her perfect work, that ye may be perfect and entire, wanting nothing. Blessed is the man that endureth temptation: for when he is tried he shall receive the crown of life, which the Lord hath promised to them that love Him" (James i. 3, 4, 12).

He can count it all joy and be called blessed, not because of the temptations themselves, but because of their issue.

In their meaning in modern usage, the words "temptation" and "tempt" are somewhat limited, but the true meaning, that of making trial, is still found in the word "attempt", into which none dream of reading any idea of temptation. Temptation, or trial, can then be contemplated with joy by reason of its effects. It works patience, it leads to full maturity, it may at last lead to a crown. Much in the same spirit are the words of Paul in Rom. v. 3, 4: "We glory in tribulation", he said not for tribulation's own sake, but because we know that "tribulation worketh patience, and patience experience, and experience hope". Peter also conveys much the same thought when he says:--

> "That the trial of your faith, being much more precious than of gold that perisheth (though it be tried with fire), might be found unto praise and honour and glory at the appearing of Jesus Christ" (I Pet. i. 7).

Joy therefore may accrue from the most joyless of circumstances. We look beyond the present and immediate experience to see what its outworking will be. And if the temptation or trial produces patience, then we may rejoice in hope of the glory of God. It is good to cultivate an eye for this joy, or it may remain hidden and unseen in many a dark circumstance.

#9. "Unspeakable joy."
pp. 221, 222

Zachariah was smitten with dumbness because of his unbelief. Christ was as a lamb dumb before her shearers. Yet again, some are rendered dumb through very excess of joy. The nearer any experience is to the heart of things the less inclined are we to discuss it or to talk about it. There is a peace that passeth understanding, and there is a joy that is unspeakable:--

> "Whom having not seen, ye love; in Whom, though now ye see Him not, yet believing, ye rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory" (I Pet. i. 8).

There is a close connection between the invisible—"Ye see Him not"—and the unspeakable in this verse. At times we are tempted to endorse the desire expressed in the children's hymn where it says:--

> "I wish that His hands had been placed on my head,
> That His arms had been thrown around me;
> And that I might have seen His kind look when He said,
> 'Let the little ones come unto Me'."

Yet the Saviour Himself pronounces a blessing upon those who believed although they had not seen Him:--

> "Jesus saith unto him, Thomas, because thou hast seen Me, thou hast believed: blessed are they that have not seen, and yet have believed" (John xx. 29).

And the apostle Paul wrote to the Corinthians:--

> "Wherefore henceforth know we no man after the flesh: yea, though we have known Christ after the flesh, yet now henceforth know we Him no more" (II Cor. v. 16).

One of the characteristics of faith is that it sees Him Who is invisible, and consequently it endures (Heb. xi.). Both joy and peace arise out of believing (Rom. xv. 13), and faith rises beyond the realm of time and sense and embraces all the fullness of the risen and ascended Lord. The realization of all that He is to His people is beyond all power of expression. In our degree we are, as it were, caught away, by faith, to the third heaven, and there hear inexpressible words, and receive a joy that is unspeakable.

There is a precious fellowship of grace, for blessings shared are blessings multiplied. There is a sacred "having in common" among the saints. But every heart entertains some memories that are not made common property, some sorrow or joy that belongs to the inner recesses of the holiest of all:-- > "The heart knoweth his own bitterness; and a stranger doth not intermediate with his joy" (Prov. xiv. 10).

The unspeakable joy of I Pet. i. is found in a context of fiery trial; of enduring in view of the approaching glory. Those who are enemies of the truth and persecutors of the saints may marvel at their endurance or curse them for their stubbornness, but they can never intermeddle with unspeakable joy. Just as faith will one day be exchanged for sight, so will unspeakable joy become rapturous rejoicing when at last we see Him Who loved us and gave Himself for us.

Let us pray.

#3. "Do as Thou hast said" (I Chron. xvii. 23).
pp. 21 - 23

If prayer is the highest spiritual transaction open to believer to-day, if it has to do most essentially with access into the presence of God, and if it is used by the Lord as a means of leading His children ardently to desire the very thing that He most surely wills to grant (see articles Volume XXI, pp. 159 and 198), then it appears very evident that true prayer will always seek the accomplishment of the will of God, and inasmuch as the will of God is expressed in His Word, true prayer will ever be associated with the Scriptures.

In our second article we chose for illustration the passage in Ezek. xxxvi. 36, 37, where the restoration of Israel is in view. When that blessed day comes, repentant Israel will find, ready to their hand, true prayers with which to ask, to seek and to knock:--

> "Take with you words, and turn to the Lord: say unto Him, Take away all iniquity, and receive us graciously . . . . . for in Thee the fatherless findeth mercy" (Hos. xiv. 2, 3).

Isa. liii. 3-6 will be the very confession of Israel when they do at last look upon Him whom they have pierced, and mourn for Him.

This principle that places the Word of God and the believer's prayer in such proximity is well illustrated by two statements made by David. The first occurs in I Chron. xvii. 1 where we read that David entertained the very commendable purpose of building a house for God; saying: "Lo, I dwell in a house of cedars, but the ark of the covenant of the Lord remaineth under curtains." This project, however, was not allowed to go forward at that time, and David had to listen to the overwhelming grace of God that spoke to him, not of a house for the worship and service of the Lord, but of the ultimate blessing and establishment of his, David's, house "according to the law of the Man (Adam) who is from on high—Jehovah God" (I Chron. xvii. 17; I Cor. xv. 47).

David is left with little to say: "What can David speak more to Thee?" (verse 18). And so he gathers up the meaning of all true prayer in the pregnant words, "Do as Thou hast said."

> "Therefore now, Lord, let the thing that Thou hast spoken concerning Thy servant and concerning his house be established for ever, AND DO AS THOU HAST SAID" (I Chron. xvii. 23).

In the presence of his God, flooded as his soul was with overwhelming grace, David finds no petition of heart or lip, except that the will of the Lord be done.

Surely there can be nothing more pleasing to God than the sight of one of His children so led along the path of understanding and fellowship, that his prayers grow smaller, his words fewer, his petitions less, and his one consuming desire becomes a desire that whatever God intends to do, whatever His purpose is, whatever He has promised or spoken, that, unaltered and supreme, might be the burden of his prayer.

Prayer, in this spirit, is like going into the presence of the Lord and having an opportunity of presenting our desires, wishes and plans, and finding that our highest flight of ambition is exactly what God has prepared, that our deepest need is that which God has already prepared to meet, that our dearest plan, our most loved scheme, is, after all, exactly what God Himself has planned and intends to carry out. Here is prayer in the highest sense, absolute and unconditional alliance of the thought, plan and desire of the believer with that of his Lord.

Such prayer asks for little, thanks for much, and knows no faltering.

In Psa. lxxii. David expresses himself much in the same way as he did in I Chron. xvii. The Psalm has to do with the same theme—this time seen as the glorious kingdom of David's great Son. Under that blessed rule, peace, righteousness, deliverance and blessing spread over the face of the earth, and at the conclusion David says, "Let the whole earth be filled with His glory, Amen and Amen. The prayers of David the son of Jesse are ended".

It would be sad to think that David never again drew near to God in prayer, and this is not the meaning of "ended" in verse 20, but rather that David's prayers here reach their goal. This, he had said, in his last words, was all his desire:--

> "Although my house be not so with God, yet He hath made with me an everlasting covenant, ordered in all things and sure: for this is all my salvation and all my desire" (II Sam. xxiii. 5).

Here all David's desires were met, here all David's prayers were exhausted—"Lord, do as Thou hast said."

This, then we can say, that instead of prayer being a means whereby we can turn God from His purpose, or whereby we can obtain uncovenanted gifts, it is rather that highest of all expressions of oneness with the will of God, the very fullness of which deprives of speech. All that we need to do is to come into the presence of God, and with heartfelt sincerity tell the Lord that we have no wish that lies outside of His will. We find no scheme or plan half as attractive as the purpose of the ages, and see no calling half as wonderful and desirable as our own calling. If we could choose, or will, or bring to pass, we could not choose, or will, or bring to pass anything so good, so true, so altogether blessed as the good and perfect and acceptable will of God. This is truly high ground, and the writer does not intend that his readers shall assume that this is his constant and unchanging state of heart. Nevertheless, nothing less than this can fill out the measure of true prayer, and should our present attainments appear puny and weak and selfish as compared with this standard of the Word, we may be assured that the prayer for more grace to pray like this will be abundantly answered.

#4. Watch and pray.
pp. 62 - 65

In previous articles we have seen that prayer is our high privilege, entailing access to the Father through the mediation of Christ: that it has our own spiritual growth in view, and that its highest expression may be found in the utterance of David, "Do as Thou hast said".

The Lord and His apostle Paul have linked prayer and watching, and it is with this element in prayer, and its relation to apparently unanswered prayer, that we hope to deal in this article. First let us consider some passages that illustrate this:--

> "Take ye heed, watch and pray, for ye know not when the time is" (Mark xiii. 23).
> "Watch ye therefore, and pray always" (Luke xxi. 36).
> "Praying always, with all prayer and supplication in the spirit, and watching thereunto with all perseverance and supplication for all saints" (Eph. vi. 18).

In these passages the word "watch" is agrupneo, to be sleepless. The figure of a sentinel aptly indicates the attitude, and is seen in Eph. vi. 18 as a sequel to the armour and the wrestling in the context:--

> "Watch and pray, that ye enter not into temptation" (Matt. xxvi. 41).
> "Continue in prayer, and watch in the same with thanksgiving" (Col. iv. 2).

Here "watch" is gregoreo, to be awake, vigilant.

> "The end of all things is at hand, be ye therefore sober, and watch unto prayer" (I Pet. iv. 7).

Here "watch" is nepho, abstinent, not drunk.

It will be seen that the first and last references cited are connected with the element of time:--

> "Ye know not when the time is,"
> "The end of all things is at hand," and this factor of time is closely associated with the watching attitude of prayer. We can illustrate the point best by turning to the prophecy of Habakkuk, which opens with the burden of unanswered prayer:--

> "O Lord, how long shall I cry, and Thou wilt not hear? Even cry out unto Thee of violence, and Thou wilt not save?" (Hab. i. 2).

This passage discloses a state of mind common to many, and it is to help such to a firmer position that we write these words. Why did God not answer? We do not know the circumstances fully enough to attempt an answer. We have a simpler task, however, and that is to point out that at last an answer did come, and to show how the two features of "watching" and "time" entered into it. Instead of Habakkuk being disheartened or complaining, we find him coupling prayer with watching:--

> "I will stand upon my watch, and set me upon the tower, and will watch to see what He will say unto me, and what I shall answer when I am reproved. And the Lord answered me, and said, Write the vision and make plain upon tables, that he may run that readeth it. For the vision is yet for an appointed time, but at the end it shall speak, and not lie: though it tarry, wait for it; because it will surely come, it will not tarry" (Hab. ii. 1-3).

The point of the passage is this, there is a time and a season for every purpose under heaven, and prayer has not been given so that we may retard or accelerate that time, but to associate us so fully with the mind and will of God that we shall uncomplainingly and intelligently wait His time.

To Habakkuk was revealed the following facts: facts that must colour all prayer everywhere:--

1. God has a time for every part of His purpose.
2. Prayer is not granted to us that we may importunate God on this matter: we are told to "wait".
3. A deferred answer must not be construed as no answer: "at the end it shall speak."

The contemplation of a world of believers all praying concerning varied parts of God's great purpose, and all desiring certain parts to be fulfilled according to their own conception of time and place, reduces the whole system of things to chaos. There are some prayers God cannot answer, and any prayer that includes the slightest idea that God's "time and season" can be altered by that prayer is doomed to disappointment. Daniel's example is a good one to follow:--

> "I, Daniel, understood by books the number of years, whereof the word of the Lord came to Jeremiah the prophet, that He would accomplish seventy years in the desolations of Jerusalem . . . . . and I prayed" (Dan. ix. 2-4).

There is not the slightest hint in Daniel's prayer that he expected that by it he could prevail upon the Lord to reduce the period of desolations to sixty or even sixty-nine years. He accepted the word of the Lord, and when the time of its accomplishment drew near, then, Daniel prayed, confessed the righteousness of the judgment, and was heard.

There are some earnest believers who translate II Pet. iii. 12, "hasting unto the coming", as "hastening the coming", but this cannot be. The second coming of the Lord is pivotal to the whole scheme of the future: to imagine that it can be "hastened" therefore is a delusion. The R.V. reads, "earnestly desiring the coming", which is a correct rendering. The true explanation of the passage is seen when we perceive in it the use of the figure hendiadys (the "one-by-means-of-two" figure, whereby emphasis is placed upon certain words, like "digged and went deep" [Luke vi, 48, R.V.]; "digged deep" [A.V.]). The hendiadys stresses the second word, "Looking for and being eager for", meaning "Eagerly looking for", with stress on the eagerness.

Let us therefore remember that just as there is a time and season for every purpose under heaven, so answers to our prayers may be delayed simply because the hour has not yet come for the answer to be in line with the will of God. Here then comes the need to watch as well as pray, to wait as well as want, and to possess our souls in patience while we gladly bow to the whole will of God.

The Ministry of Consolation.

#36. Lift up your heads.
"My glory and the lifter up of mine head" (Psa. iii. 3).
pp. 79, 80

We often hear it said, especially with reference to someone in distress or trouble, that a "lift up" is needed. Christians will speak in the same way about a helpful meeting, as "quite an uplift". Prayer, too, is spoken of as "lifting up the hands", and in many other ways the expression does service. There are few of God's children who do not at times feel the need of such an "uplift", and for such this ministry of consolation is planned.

One of the titles of the Lord, invented by gratitude, is that found in Psa. iii.:--

> "But Thou, O Lord, art a shield for me, my glory, and the lifter up of mine head" (Psa. iii. 3).

The writer of these words is David, and the occasion was "when he fled from Absalom his son". And there can be few blows that strike more deeply than those aimed by one's own children:--

> "And the King kissed Absalom. And it came to pass after this . . . . . Absalom stole the hearts of the men of Israel . . . . . There came a messenger to David, saying, The hearts of the men of Israel are after Absalom. And David said unto all his servants that were with him at Jerusalem, Arise and let us flee; for we shall not else escape from Absalom" (II Sam. xiv. 33 - xv. 14).

Absalom's rebellion was not limited to Absalom himself, for the bulk of the nation rebelled with him. The word "increased" is rabab, and "many", rabim. "Many" had risen against David, and "many" had adopted an attitude against him as against one who had lost favour with God. It was in this hour of deep distress that David uttered the words already quoted—"But Thou, O Lord, art a Shield for me."

How many times the Psalmist speaks of the Lord as a Shield: "My defence (shield) is of God" (Psa. vii. 10). So sang David when suffering at the hands of Cush the Benjamite:--

> "As for God, His way is perfect: the word of the Lord is tried: He is a Buckler (Shield) to all those that trust in Him" (Psa. xviii. 30).

So sang David in the day that the Lord delivered him from the hand of all his enemies, and from the hand of Saul.

Others beside David had learned to hide beneath this Shield, for to Abraham long before had come the words: "Fear not, Abram: I am thy Shield" (Gen. xv. 1).

In the record of David's flight from Jerusalem, we read:--

> "And David went up by the ascent of the mount Olivet, and wept as he went up, and had his head covered, and went barefoot" (II Sam. xv. 30).

But in spite of appearances, and in spite of the most serious alarms, we learn from this Psalm that instead of a disturbed and anxious night, peace and calm assurance settled down upon David's troubled spirit. Under that Shield, he says: "I laid me down and slept; I awaked; for the Lord sustained me."

Here, then, is a title for us to remember in our own time of trial. He, the mighty God, the Creator of heaven and earth, is "The lifter up of mine head".

#37. Lift up your heads. "Shall I lift up mine eyes to the hills?" (Psa. cxxi. 1).

p. 140

The margin of the A.V. of Psa. cxxi. 1 suggests that the opening line be read as a question: "Shall I lift up mine eyes to the hills?"

It is entirely foreign to the teaching of Scripture to suggest that our "help" comes from "the hills". Indeed, Jeremiah has said: "Truly in vain is salvation hoped from the hills, and from the multitude of mountains: truly in the Lord our God is the salvation of Israel" (Jer. iii. 23). We can understand, perhaps, the poor idolater saying of Israel: "Their gods are gods of the hills: therefore they were stronger than we; but let us fight against them in the plain, and surely we shall be stronger than they" (I Kings xx. 23), but he whose God is the Lord, the Creator, in Whose presence the hills "melted like wax" (Psa. xcvii. 5), at Whose touch the hills "smoke" (Psa. civ. 32), surely his eyes will not be "unto the hills", but he will say: "From whence cometh my help? My help cometh from the Lord, which made heaven and earth" (Psa. cxxi. 1, 2).

When Isaiah would show the vanity of idolatry, he says:--

> "Who hath measured the waters in the hollow of His hand, and meted out heaven with the span, and comprehended the dust of the earth in a measure, and weighed the mountains in scales, and the hills in a balance? . . . . . And Lebanon is not sufficient to burn, nor the beasts thereof for a burnt offering" (Isa. xl. 12-16).

Why should Israel look to the hills, "everlasting" though they may be called? The promises of the Lord will stand when mountain and hill have vanished: "For the mountains shall depart, and the hills be removed; but My kindness shall not depart from thee, neither shall the covenant of My peace be removed, saith the Lord that hath mercy on thee" (Isa. liv. 10).

We are not likely to look to actual "hills", but whenever we are subjected to trouble or testing, let us be on guard against that natural tendency to turn our eyes unto our bank balance, our friends, their influence, or the many lesser "helps" that may fail us in our hour of need. "Our help cometh from the Lord." When this is established in our hearts, we shall find that His help does not set aside bank balances, friends, influence; in fact He uses all these, but if we would know stable peace, and walk worthy of the Lord unto all pleasing, we must learn to see, behind all, the hand of our Father. "Shall I lift up mine eyes to the hills? (No) My help cometh from the Lord."

#38. Lift up your heads. "Who will show us any good? Lord, lift Thou up the light of Thy countenance upon us" (Psa. iv. 6).

pp. 199, 200

When the many said of David in the time of Absalom's rebellion: "There is no help for him in God", his reply was: "Thou, O Lord . . . . . art the lifter up of mine head" (Psa. iii. 2, 3).

In Psa. iv. we get the other side of the question. Instead of the statement that there was no help for David in God, the many now said: "Who will show us any good?" (Psa. iv. 6). This time David's answer is: "Lord, lift Thou up the light of Thy countenance upon us" (Psa. iv. 6).

He is the "Lifter up of mine head"—and this is an all-sufficient answer to the gibe that, for David, there was no help in God. "He will lift up the light of His countenance upon me"—and who shall then say, "Who will show us any good?"

There is no good outside His favour and His presence:--

> "In His favour is life. Weeping may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning" (Psa. xxx. 5).
>
> "In Thy presence is fullness of joy, at Thy right hand there are pleasures for evermore" (Psa. xvi. 11).

Psa. lxxx. is the psalm of the Lord's countenance: It is divided into four parts, each indicated by the words, "Turn again" ("Return" in verse 14 being the same in the original).

PRAYER (1-3).
"Turn us again, O God, and cause Thy face to shine; and we shall be saved."
THE PEOPLE (4-6).
PRAYER (7).
"Turn us again, O God of hosts, and cause Thy face to shine; and we shall be saved."
THE VINE (8-13).
PRAYER (14).
"Return, we beseech Thee, O God of hosts, look down from heaven."
THE VINE (16-18).
PRAYER (19).
"Turn us again, O Lord God of hosts, cause Thy face to shine; and we shall be saved."

It is not sufficient for us merely to plead for the restoration of the Lord's favour. Not only is there prayer to God that He may "return", but for ourselves that He may "turn us".

With Him is no darkness, the light never leaves His countenance; but if our backs are turned to the sun we see only the shadow. If we are to know the secret of His presence we must learn this lesson. We must be ever "turned to Him" if we are to enjoy the light of His countenance.

One of the blessings consequent upon our being in the light of the Lord's countenance is salvation from shame:--

> "Make Thy face to shine upon Thy servant: save my for Thy mercies' sake. Let me not be ashamed, O Lord" (Psa. xxxi. 16, 17).

Paul's words in the second epistle to Timothy are a splendid comment on this passage:--

> "Nevertheless I am not ashamed, for I know Whom I have believed" (II Tim. i. 12).

Another blessing derived from the same source is indicated in Psa. cxix. 135. If we observe the correspondence of the verses in this section (129-136), we shall read verse 130 with verse 135:--

> "The entrance of Thy words giveth light; it giveth understanding unto the simple" (130).
> "Make Thy face to shine upon Thy servant; and teach me Thy statutes" (135).

The study of the Word is not mere book-reading; its great illuminant is the presence of the Lord:--

> "For with Thee is the fountain of life; in Thy light shall we see light" (Psa. xxxvi. 9).

But perhaps the chief reason for the blessedness of the Lord's uplifted countenance is that it speaks of the mercy-seat, of sins forgiven and of acceptance in the Beloved; for it is the chief element in the priestly blessing of Numb. vi. 24-26:--

> "The Lord bless thee and keep thee:
> The Lord make His face shine upon thee, and be gracious unto thee:
> The Lord lift up His countenance upon thee, and give thee peace."

The Epistle to the Romans.

#34. Romans v. 12 - viii. 39.
Key-words: The members.
pp. 11 - 14

In previous articles of this series we were much helped by observing the manner of the distribution of the word "body" in this section of the epistle. We are now to consider a closely related key-word, "the members". Examination shows that melos, "member", occurs in the section seven times. The occurrences are as follows:--

> "Neither yield ye your members as instruments of unrighteousness to sin: but yield yourselves to God, as those that are alive from the dead, and your members as instruments of righteousness to God" (Rom. vi. 13).
>
> "For as ye have yielded your members slaves to uncleanness and to iniquity unto iniquity, even so now yield your members slaves to righteousness unto sanctification" (Rom. vi. 19).
>
> "For when we were in the flesh, the passions of sins which were by the law, did work in our members to bring forth fruit unto death" (Rom. vii. 5).
>
> "But I see another law in my members, warring against the law of my mind, and bringing me into captivity to the law of sin, which is in my members" (Rom. vii. 23).

and they are grouped as follows:--

A1 | vi. 13, 19. Yielding.
  a1 | Negative. Instruments of unrighteousness.—To sin.
    b1 | Positive. Instruments of righteousness.—To God.
  a2 | As slaves to uncleanness and iniquity.—Unto iniquity.
    b2 | So slaves to righteousness.—Unto sanctification.
A2 | vii. 5. Working. Passions of sins, work.—fruit to death.
A3 | vii. 23. Warring.
  a3 | Law of mind.—War.
    b3 | Law of sin.—Captive.

In the description of the relation of the members of the body to the great theme of sin and death, and righteousness and life, the figures used are changed from "instruments" to "slaves", from "slaves" to "fruit", from "fruit" to "war".

Once again, we attempt nothing in the way of exposition, except to point out the connections that are near the surface, and indicate the trend of the teaching. Although the occurrence of the word "member" is limited to seven times, examination of the context of each reference leads to the discernment of four parts, vii. 5 forming but one part of an argument started in verse 4, where the words "fruit to God" contrast with "fruit to death". Fro clearness sake we will set out these four pairs so that examination of them shall be facilitated.

1st PAIR.—Your members as instruments of unrighteousness.
Your members as instruments of righteousness (Rom. vi. 13).
2nd PAIR.—Your members slaves to uncleanness.
Your members slaves to righteousness (Rom. vi. 19).
3rd PAIR.—Bring forth fruit unto God.
Bring forth fruit unto death (Rom. vii. 4, 5).
4th PAIR.—Another law in my members.
The law of sin which is in my members (Rom. vii. 23).

Let us look at the contexts of these four pairs. The first pair of references, namely, those that occur in Rom. vi. 13, have as their context an emphasis upon the reign and dominion of sin:--

"Let not sin therefore reign in your mortal body" (Rom. vi. 12).
"Sin shall not have dominion over you" (Rom. vi. 14).

This dominion and reign takes practical effect through the members of the mortal body. Those particularized in Scripture are: the right eye (Matt. v. 29); the right hand (Matt. v. 30); the foot, the hand, the ear, the eye, the nose, the less honourable members, uncomely members (I Cor. xii. 15-24); the tongue (James iii. 5, 6).

A further list is given in Col. iii. 5, but there a figure of speech is used, and the members which commit certain sins are passed over and the sins themselves substituted. We must therefore include this verse in our list of members: "Fornication, uncleanness, inordinate affection, evil concupiscence and covetousness." These members, and their frightful working, belong to the reign and dominion of sin, but with the new disposition to righteousness, the self-same members belong to the reign of grace. How blessed to know that there is such a possibility! Apart from that knowledge, Rom. vii. 24 would be our continual cry.

The context of the second pair of references (Rom. vi. 19) speaks of slavery and freedom:--

"His slaves ye are . . . . . Ye were the slaves of sin . . . . . Being then made free from sin . . . . . Ye were free as to righteousness . . . . . Now being made free from sin, and become slaves to God" (Rom. vi. 16-22).

In both the first and second pair we find the idea of "yielding":--

"Neither yield ye your members . . . . . unto sin, but yield yourselves unto God" (Rom. vi. 13).
"To whom ye yield yourselves servants to obey" (Rom. vi. 16).
"As ye have yielded your members servants to uncleanness" (Rom. vi. 19).

This word and the doctrine associated with it come to light again in Rom. xii. 1, where it is translated "present".

Here is a new cause for praise. The reign of sin, with its cruel bondage, gives place to the reign of grace and righteousness, with its glorious freedom. The gospel proclaims liberty to the captive, it sets the prisoner free, free to serve.

In the third pair, namely, Rom. vii. 4, 5, the figure employed is changed from that of the slave, to that of the relationship of husband and wife. The key-thought, however, is not so much the enjoyment of marital privileges, as it is that of "freedom from the law" that bound to the first husband, in order to be at liberty to marry a second time, the two husbands standing for law and Moses, and grace and Christ. As a result of the "death" of the law, the believer is free to be joined to the risen Christ; and the fruit of the old union with law is contrasted with the fruit of God. Finally we are shown the unalterable antagonism of these two forces. In the members pulsates the law of sin, and that law of sin is ever seeking to bring the believer into captivity; seeking to subject the mind to the flesh. Galatians speaks of this antagonism in terms of the "flesh" and "spirit" (Gal. v. 17).

The entrance of sin and death into this world is here seen as a terribly literal and practical fact. It lays hold of every member of the body, whose allegiance it claims. The word and deed, the eye and ear, that should glorify God, have all been commandeered. The end, too, of these things is death. We are to learn that the law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus has set us free from the law of sin and death, and if that be so, it should be our reasonable service to present these bodies of ours to the Lord for His glory.

The fourth pair stresses the close relation that exists between the law of sin and the members of the body, even though the mind may be already delighting in the law of God after the inward man.

We do not stay to say more now, our intention being to pass these key-words in review before we come to the chapters containing them. There are others to consider, and until they are studied in their contexts we shall not feel sufficiently equipped to attempt examination of these mighty themes.

#35. Romans v. 12 - viii. 39.
Key-words: The mind.
pp. 58 - 60

When studying the key-words "body" and "members", our task was simplified by the fact that only one Greek word is used in each case, and the translation is consistent throughout. There are two words used for "mind" in this section, nous and phronema, and it will be of service to explain something of their distinctive meaning:-- > "Nous belongs to the same root as gignosko, and signifies (i.) the organ of mental perception and apprehension, the organ of consciousness preceding actions, specially the organ of moral thinking or contemplation. (ii.) Then nous means thinking, moral thinking and knowing, understanding, sense. In Paul's epistles it has a clearly developed meaning, reflective consciousness, I Cor. xiv. 14, 15, 19, as distinct from the impulse of the spirit" (Cremer).

>
> "The nous takes cognizance of external objects, and denotes the reasoning faculty, Its chief organ is the brain, but all the senses serve it actively or passively. Nous is the human side of God's Spirit in man: as to its source, it is Spirit; as to its action in man for intellectual purposes it is mind, i.e., the product of the Spirit" (Dr. Bullinger).

> "Phronema, what one has in mind, what one thinks and feels: hence, mind, thought, feeling, will: knowledge or wisdom as being the product of the mind" (Dr. Bullinger).

For our present purpose this explanation will be sufficient. When we are studying the subject more closely, we shall pursue our ordinary method of studying the words as they are used in Scripture. Nous occurs in Rom. vii. 23 and 25:--

> "But I see another law in my members, warring against the law of the mind" (Rom. vii. 23).
>
> "So then with the mind I myself serve the law of God; but with the flesh the law of sin" (Rom. vii. 25).

Phronema occurs in Rom. viii. 6, 7 and 27. Phroneo, the verb, to think or to mind, occurs in Rom. viii. 5-7 and 27:--

> "For they that are after the flesh do mind the things of the flesh; but they that are after the Spirit the things of the Spirit. For the mind of the flesh is death, but the mind of the Spirit is life and peace. Because the mind of the flesh is enmity against God" (Rom. viii. 5-7).
>
> "And He that searcheth the hearts knoweth what is the mind of the Spirit, because He maketh intercession for the saints according to the will of God" (Rom. viii. 27).

These references complete the occurrences in this section, and, without assuming to understand their distinctive meanings before seeking the light of other references, we can at least observe that nous comes in chapter vii., and phronema and phroneo in chapter viii. In vii. we see the mind at the centre of the being; in viii. the mind in its manifestations; what is in it, what it feels and chooses. Fuller light will come when we observe the usage of these words elsewhere:--

Nous.—"And even as they did not approve to retain God in their knowledge, God gave them up to an unapproving mind to do those things that are not seemly" (Rom. i. 38).

"Ye henceforth walk not as other Gentiles walk in the vanity of their mind, having the understanding darkened, being alienated from the life of God through the ignorance that is in them because of the hardness of their hearts: Who having cast off all feeling gave themselves up to licentiousness" (Eph. iv. 17-19).

These passages supplement one another. In the first, God gave them up to an undiscerning mind and the result was that they gave themselves up to all uncleanness with greediness. The mind cut off from God and the knowledge of Him is death; it is alienation from the life of God. So Rom. viii. 6, 7 declares that the mind of the flesh is death and enmity.

We next discover that the nous, when under the dominion of the flesh, can constitute a serious menace to Christian doctrine and practice:--

"Let no man beguile you of your reward . . . . . vainly puffed up by the mind of his flesh, and not holding the Head" (Col. ii. 18, 19).

"Perverse disputings of men of corrupt minds, and destitute of the truth" (I Tim. vi. 5).

"So do these also resist the truth: men utterly corrupted in mind, reprobate as regards the faith" (II Tim. iii. 8).

"Even their mind and conscience is defiled . . . . . unto every work reprobate" (Titus i. 15, 16).

Here it is evident that the mind is the seat of the trouble. It is useless to attempt to deal with the members while the main-spring is out of gear. Romans and Ephesians, which we found to be parallel in describing the evil (Rom. i. 28 and Eph. iv. 17-19), are parallel also in their description of the remedy:--

"Be not conformed to this age, but be ye transformed by the renewing of your mind, that ye may approve what is that good, and acceptable, and perfect will of God" (Rom. xii. 2).

Notice, in passing, the recurrence of the word "approve". A glance back to the references given will show that an unapproving mind is the cause of the mischief; and here we see the mind being renewed.

A close parallel in Ephesians is found in chapter iv.: "To be renewed in the spirit of your mind . . . . . which according to God is created in righteousness and holiness of the truth" (Eph. iv. 23, 24). With this should be read the parallel passage in Col. iii. 10: "And have put on the new man which is renewed in knowledge after the image of Him that created him."

We have probably all at some time wondered why the test and temptation of Adam with its awful consequence, should have centred around the question of knowledge. Does it appear from these passages that the Creator, and Satan in his measure, knew that the mind was the citadel? If this is taken, the members of the body immediately become slaves to sin, and not until the mind is renewed and the knowledge of God and the ability to approve His will are regained, is it of any use to think of words or deeds. God's order places first the mind, the inner man, the new man; then, in resurrection, the body in its full measure.

Rom. xii. 2 gives us the fashioning and transforming of the mind now (suschematizo, metamorphoumai). Phil. iii. 21 reveals the fashioning and conforming of the body in the future (metashematizo, summorphos).

With the renewing of the mind (nous) there comes the renewing of the phronema, and of phroneo, the thinking. Immediately following the reference to the renewal of the mind (nous) in Rom. xii. 2 comes the adjustment of the thinking (phroneo) in verse 3: "Think (phronein) soberly" (sophronein). "Soberly" is simply the word, "to think" with the word for salvation prefixed: Think now with a saved or healed mind. Such a mind is entirely opposed to pride (see Rom. xii. 3 and 16, where phroneo is used).

The association of nous, the mind, with phroneo, the resultant thinking or feeling, is seen in Rom. xiv. 5, 6:--

> "Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind (nous). He that regards (phroneo) the day, regards (phroeno) it unto the Lord."

The mind in its actions, attitudes and intentions is seen in Phil. ii. 2, 5; iii. 13, 16 and 19:--

> "Mind the same thing." "Let this mind be in you." "Be thus minded . . . . . otherwise minded." "Let us mind the same thing." "Who mind earthly things."

Col. iii. 1, 2 sums up the new attitude of the Christian: "If ye then be risen with Christ, seek those things which are above, where Christ sitteth on the right hand of God. Set your mind (phroneo) on things above, not on things on the earth."

#36. Romans v. 12 - viii. 39.
Key-words: Spirit.
pp. 97 - 100

A most important key-word is now before us. With one exception, which occurs in Rom. vii., all the references to pneuma are found in Rom. viii., the message of which they characterize. In this chapter there are 21 occurrences, which is roughly one reference for every two verses.

Rom. vii. 6 sums up the argument, Rom. viii. 4 sets it out in doctrinal terms, and the remaining references expand its several features. Let us see for ourselves.

(1) The summing up of the argument of Rom. v. 12 - vii. 5.

> "But now we are freed from the law, having died to that in which we were held, so that we may serve in newness of spirit, and not in oldness of letter" (Rom. vii. 6).

(2) The doctrinal setting-out of this summary.

> "For the law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus, set me free from the law of sin and death" (Rom. viii. 2).

(3) The expansion of essential features of this setting-out.

(i.) The relation of this spirit to law.
(ii.) The relation of this spirit to liberty.
(iii.) The relation of this spirit to life.

(i.) LAW.—"That the righteous requirements of the law may be fulfilled in us, who walk not after the flesh, but after the spirit" (Rom. viii. 4).

(ii.) LIBERTY.—"For you received not a spirit of bondage again to fear . . . . . the freedom of the glory of the children of God" (Rom. viii. 15-21).

(iii.) LIFE.—(a) Newness of life.
(b) Sphere of this life.
(c) Nature of this life.
(d) Expression of this life.

(a) Newness of life.

> "For they that are after the flesh do mind the things of the flesh; but they that are after the spirit the things of the spirit" (5).
> "For the minding of the flesh is death, but the minding of the spirit is life and peace" (6).
> "If Christ be in you, the body is dead because of sin: but the spirit is life because of righteousness" (10).
> "For if ye live after the flesh ye shall die; but if ye through the spirit do mortify the deeds of the body, ye shall live" (13).

"Likewise the Spirit also helpeth our infirmities: for we know not what we should pray for as we ought: but the Spirit itself maketh intercession for us with groanings which cannot be uttered, and He that searcheth the heart knoweth the mind of the Spirit, because He maketh intercession for the saints according to the will of God" (26, 27).

(b) The sphere of this life—In spirit.

"But ye are not in the flesh, but in the spirit, if so be that the Spirit of God dwell in you. Now if any man have not the spirit of Christ, he is none of His" (9).

(c) The nature of this life—Resurrection.

"But if the Spirit of Him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, He that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies, by His spirit that dwelleth in you" (11).

(d) The expression of this life—Sonship.

"As many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God" (14).

"Ye have not received the spirit of bondage again to fear; but ye have received the spirit of adoption (or sonship), whereby we cry, Abba, Father" (15).

"The Spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit, that we are the children of God" (16).

"And not only they, but ourselves also, which have the firstfruits of the spirit, even we ourselves groan within ourselves, waiting for the adoption (or sonship), to wit, the redemption of our body" (23).

Before leaving this analysis it may be helpful to indicate which passages in the above list refer specifically to the Holy Spirit Himself, and which to His gifts. It is not our practice in these pages to extensively quote from the writings of others, and though we are continually indebted to all sorts and conditions of men, the resulting studies published in The Berean Expositor are essentially first hand and our own. Those of our readers, however, who know Dr. Bullinger's contribution to the teaching of Scripture concerning the usage of pneuma, will realize that he has summed up the matter so ably that it would be difficult to go over the ground independently. We therefore depart from our usual practice and give the following seven ways in which pneuma is employed in the N.T., in the form of an extract from "Things to Come", Volume X, page 61.

The use of pneuma in the New Testament.

Let us next note the various ways in which the Greek word pneuma is employed; i.e., the way in which it is used (apart from its meaning, or the sense which is given to it: i.e., its usage):--

(i.) It is used alone, in two ways:
  (1) Without the article: simple pneuma.
  (2) With the article: to pneuma, the pneuma.

(ii.) It is employed with hagion, holy, in four ways:
  (1) pneuma hagion (holy Spirit): Matt. i. 18, and in 49 other places.
  (2) hagion pneuma (Spirit holy): I Cor. vi. 19, etc.
  (3) the hagion pneuma: Matt. xxviii. 19, etc.
  (4) the pneuma the hagion: Matt. xii. 32, etc.

(iii.) It is used with the pronouns: e.g., the pneuma of me, i.e., my pneuma: Matt. xii. 18, etc.

(iv.) It is used with the prepositions, which affect its sense:
  (1) en pneumati, by or through the Spirit: denoting agency.
  (2) Adverbially, as meaning spiritually and sometimes, like en dolo, craftily (II Cor. xii. 16); thus turning the phrase into an adverb.

(v.) It is employed in combination with the Divine names in seven different forms; of which four have the article, and three are without: e.g., pneuma Theon; pneuma Christon, etc.

(vi.) It is employed with ten other nouns in the genitive case, which (by ehallage) qualify the meaning of pneuma. These again are used with and without the article: e.g., a pneuma of sonship (Rom. viii. 15), i.e., a sonship-pneuma.

(vii.) It is employed with a second noun with which it is joined by a conjunction (hendiadys). Thus used it becomes a superlative adjective.

These are seven different ways in which pneuma is used and which Dr. Bullinger tabulated for our better guidance. The use of the word reveals the various ways in which God has employed it in making His truth known. The usage indicates the various senses in which this word is employed.

Pneuma is used of God Himself "God is pneuma" (John iv. 24).
Pneuma is used of Christ in resurrection. "A life-giving Spirit" (I Cor. xv. 45).
Pneuma is used of the Holy Spirit and His gifts and operations.

The gifts of the Holy Spirit must ever be distinguished from the Holy Spirit Himself. Acts ii. 4 is a good example:--

"And they were all filled with pneuma hagion, holy spirit, the gifts, and began to speak in other tongues as the Spirit, the Giver, gave them utterance."

This usage is fairly widely accepted. What we want to press upon the notice of the believer is that many times the word pneuma refers to the new nature:--

"That which is born of The pneuma is pneuma" (John iii. 6).
"The pneuma of sonship" (Rom. viii. 15).

Let us now return to the chapters of Romans that are our present study, and, before we leave this analysis of pneuma, go through the list again, to place each reference.

Rom. vii. 6. "Serve in newness of pneuma.—The contrast, "oldness of letter", shows that the expression is adverbial, "a spiritual manner" (see Rom. ii. 29 and II Cor. iii. 6).

Rom. viii. 2. "The law of the pneuma of life."—Here we have the sense that is specially associated with Paul's ministry, and indicates the law of the new nature, which is in contrast with the law of sin and death. Spirit is contrasted with flesh, and Christ with Adam.

Rom. viii. 4. "According to flesh . . . . . according to pneuma."—Here again the two natures are in view.

Rom. viii. 5, 6.—Here flesh and spirit are again contrasted, this time the mind that pertains to the spirit, or new nature, being in view. The end of one is death, the end of other peaceful life.

Rom. viii. 9.—"In (the) pneuma" is here contrasted, as before, with flesh, and then is given two titles. Pneuma Theon and pneuma Christon, spirit of God, and spirit of Christ. Here, still, the subject is the new nature. It is called Divine (of God) and Christ spirit.

Rom. viii. 10.—We now have a contrast between "the body", which is dead because of sin, and "the spirit", which is life because of righteousness.

Rom. viii. 11.—This new nature is here definitely associated with resurrection, and the indwelling of that spirit brings quickening, even to the mortal body.

Rom. viii. 13.—The life lived by pneuma, that new nature which is not flesh, and which is so intimately connected with the risen Christ, is an "earnest" of future resurrection—"Ye will live."

(To be continued).

#36. Romans v. 12 - viii. 39 (concluded).
Key-words: Spirit.
pp. 119, 120

Rom. viii. 14.—The flesh leads the children of disobedience; the pneuma Theon, the new nature which is of God and which is spirit, leads the sons of God.

Rom. viii. 15.—Compare the "freedom pneuma" with the "sonship-pneuma", which but crystallizes into two terms all that has been said before. The sonship, is the spirit of God, and the spirit of Christ, the spirit of resurrection, of life and of peace, and is found not "in Adam", but "in Christ" alone.

Rom. viii. 16 is the first mention of the Holy Spirit Himself. "The Spirit Himself beareth witness with out spirit." He it is also Who is spoken of in verses 26 and 27.

Rom. viii. 23 reveals that the new nature, the spirit of sonship, is a "firstfruits", an "earnest", a pledge of future literal resurrection, "to wit, the redemption of our body".

It will be seen that the doctrine of the Spirit is very intimately interwoven with the doctrine of Rom. viii., and we feel sure that due recognition of its importance will fully justify the space afforded to its survey. The fuller bearing of each reference on the unfolding of the wondrous teaching of the inner section of Romans must await more detailed exposition. We trust, however, that sufficient has been seen to justify clearly the distinction between the operation of the Spirit here, and the outpouring of His gifts at Pentecost.

#37. Romans v. 12 - viii. 39.
Key-words: The flesh.
pp. 135 - 138

The fact that "the flesh" is antithetical to "the Spirit" means that in our survey of the references to "the Spirit" in these chapters, we have necessarily made many references to "the flesh". The subject, however, is too vital to pass over, and we therefore propose a survey of the occurrences of the expression "the flesh" in much the same way as we have dealt with other key-words of Rom. v.-viii.

The truth unfolded in the references to the flesh may be visualized as follows:--

A | vi. 19. The weakness of the flesh.
B | vii. 5. In the flesh passions of sin.
C | vii. 18. In my flesh DWELLETH no good thing.
D | vii. 25. With the flesh I serve the law of sin.
A | viii. 3. The weakness of the law because of the flesh.
a | viii. 3. Christ sent in likeness of flesh of sin.
b | viii. 3. Condemned.
c | viii. 4. Law's requirements fulfilled.
a | viii. 5. The life and mind of flesh.
b | viii. 6. Death.
c | viii. 7. Law's requirements unfulfilled.
B | viii. 8. In the flesh cannot please God.
C | viii. 9. Not in the flesh. Spirit of God DWELLETH in you.
D | viii. 12, 13. Not debtors to the flesh: its wages is death.

Its utter weakness, hopeless enmity and incurability are seen at a glance, and a fuller examination will but intensify the conviction that nothing short of a miracle of grace can accomplish salvation for those in such abject bondage.

In Rom. v. 6-8 there is this fourfold description of those for whom Christ died: "Without strength", "Ungodly", "Sinners", "Enemies".

There is a fourfold division of the subject in Rom. v.-viii., and while there may not be an actual parallel, yet weakness (vi. 19, viii. 3), enmity (viii. 5, 6), sinnership (vii. 25), and ungodliness (viii. 8) are very evidently associated with "the flesh".

The expression "in the flesh" is a comprehensive one. In some cases it may merely convey the sense of being alive upon this earth, without any moral significance (I Cor. vii. 28; II Cor. xii. 7; Gal. ii. 20). In Rom. v.-viii., however, it is the state in which man is found before he is united to the Lord that is referred to, and therefore the expression is there used in a moral sense.

When the apostle says in vii. 18 that he knows that in his flesh dwelleth no good thing, he is not speaking of flesh and blood physiologically, but of the carnal man, in whom resides no moral good whatever. It is a comfort to observe the two "dwellings" of vii. 18 and viii. 9. The references to the flesh are, however, so interwoven with the argument of the epistle that further and fuller exposition is not easy until we settle down to a careful study of the whole teaching of the section.

Cremer, in his Biblico-Theological Lexicon, subdivides the meaning of sarx, "flesh", into six different phases. Omitting the great mass of quotation and detail with which he illustrates and proves his points, the reader may find the following digest of service:--

i. Flesh. James v. 3. Flesh and bone, the substance of the body, Luke xxiv. 39; Eph. v. 30.

ii. Corporeity according to its material side, which, as an organic whole, is called soma, body. So I Cor. xv. 39. The corporal part of man, Acts ii. 26.

iii. It mediates and brings about man's connection with mature. Gen. ii. 23, 24; I Cor. vi. 16. So the contrast between "children of the flesh", Rom. ix. 8, and "children of the promise", Rom. iv. 19. It indicates kinship, Rom. ix. 3; xi. 14; i. 3, and all mankind are designated "all flesh", John xvii. 2.

iv. It denotes human nature in and according to its corporeal manifestation. I John iv. 2. "Jesus Christ came in the flesh." I Tim. iii. 16. "Manifested in the flesh."

v. All that is peculiar to human nature in its corporeal embodiment is said to belong to it. This is specially the aspect of Paul's epistles and his use of sarx. It is in contrast with the new creation, II Cor. v. 16, 17. It stands in contrast with pneuma, Spirit, the divine nature, in a meta-physical and moral sense. Rom. viii. 3; Gal. iii. 3; v. 17. Thus sarx comes, at length, in distinct and presupposed antithesis to pneuma, to signify--

vi. The sinful condition of human nature, in and according to its bodily manifestation. So we have "the flesh of sin", Rom. viii. 3; "satisfying of the flesh", Col. ii. 23, "an occasion of the flesh", Gal. v. 13. such expressions as "the mind of the flesh", Rom. viii. 6, 7; "the lusts of the flesh", Gal. v. 16, 24, and "the wills of the flesh", Eph. ii. 2, may be explained by the fact that sarx denotes sinfully conditioned human nature.

In addition to sarx, "flesh", we must take note of sarkikos and sarkinos, "fleshly" and "fleshy". Thus we have sarkinos, II Cor. iii. 3, "the fleshy tables of the heart": sarkikos, "not as spiritual but as carnal" (fleshly) (I Cor. iii. 1). The reading in Rom. vii. 14 is doubtful. The received text reads sarkikos, "fleshly" but the critical texts read sarkinos, "fleshy". Textual criticism appears simple until it is attempted and then it sometimes baffles the keenest research and intuition. We shall discuss the alternative readings of Rom. vii. 14 in their proper place; here we give only the meanings of the two words.

What an awful picture of human nature does this study reveal! But what a blessing beyond words it is to know that the statement can be true of us:--

> "Ye are not in the flesh, but in the spirit, if so be that the Spirit of God dwell in you" (Rom. viii. 9).

#38. Romans v. 12 - viii. 39.
Key-words: Life, live, quicken.
pp. 175 - 179

The great theme of Romans is given in Roma. I. 17" "The just shall live by faith." In the opening chapters of the epistle we have learned what constituted this righteousness, and what this faith is, but the matter of life and living is the theme of the inner section, viz., v.-viii. We have to consider therefore in this article the key-words "life" and "live", zoe and zoa:--

Zao, "To live" (12 occurrences).

> "How shall we, that are dead to sin, live any longer therein?" (vi. 2).
> "In that He died, He died unto sin once: but in that He liveth, He liveth unto God" (vi. 10).
> "Likewise reckon ye also yourselves to be dead indeed unto sin, but alive unto God through Jesus Christ our Lord" (vi. 11).
> "Yield ourselves unto God, as those that are alive from the dead" (vi. 13).
> "The law hath dominion over a man as long as he liveth" (vii. 1).
> "Woman . . . . . is bound by the law to her husband as long as he liveth" (vii. 2).
> "If, while her husband liveth, she be married to another man, she shall be called an adulteress" (vii. 3).
> "I was alive without the law once: . . . . . sin revived, and I died" (vii. 9).
> "We are debtors, not to the flesh, to live after the flesh" (viii. 12).
> "For if ye live after the flesh, ye shall die: but if ye through the Spirit do mortify the deeds of the body, ye shall live" (viii. 13).

These twelve occurrences fall into three groups, as they deal with sin, law and the flesh:--

SIN.	(a) Negative. vi. 2; vi. 11.
	(b) Positive. vi. 10; vi. 13.
LAW.	Dominion. vii. 1, 2, 3.
	Death. vii. 9.
FLESH.	(a) Negative. viii. 12, 13.
	(b) Positive. viii. 13.

Zoe, "Life" (11 occurrences).

> "They which receive abundance of grace and the gift of righteousness shall reign in life by One, Jesus Christ" (v. 17).

"Even so by one righteousness the free gift came upon all men unto a justification of life" (v. 18).

"That as sin hath reigned unto death, even so might grace reign, through righteousness, unto eternal life, by Jesus Christ our Lord" (v. 21).

"Like as Christ was raised up from the dead by the glory of the Father, even so we also should walk in newness of life" (vi. 4).

"Being made free from sin, and become servants to God, ye have your fruit unto holiness, and the end everlasting life" (vi. 22).

"The gift of God is eternal life, through Jesus Christ our Lord" (vi. 23).

"The commandment, which was ordained to life, I found to be unto death" (vii. 10).

"The law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus, hath made me free from the law of sin and death" (viii. 2).

"The mind of the spirit is life and peace" (viii. 6).

"The spirit is life because of righteousness´(viii. 10).

"Neither death, nor life, ... shall be able to separate us" (viii. 38, 39).

The references in chapter v. deal with the question of reigning: reigning in life, and the reign of grace. The references in chapter vi. deal with walking and serving.

The reference in chapter vii. deals with the failure of the law to give life. The references in chapter viii. deal with the liberating law of the spirit of life.

Zoopoieo, "To make alive", "To quicken" (1 reference).

"He that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies by His Spirit that dwelleth in you" (Rom. viii. 11).

One feature is indelibly stamped upon these references to life, and that is, that resurrection life (alive from the dead) alone counts with God. Rom. v.-viii. deals with Adam and Christ from one angle; I Cor. xv. deals with Adam and Christ from another angle, but both angles project their lines of teaching to meet in the glorious truth of life from the dead.

At the risk of apparent repetition, and because we feel the subject to be so important, we draw attention to the way in which death and life alternate with one another in these passages. "Life" stands for resurrection life:--

"Death reigned . . . . . reign in life" (v. 17).
"Sin hath reigned unto death, even so might grace reign . . . . . unto eternal life" (v. 21).
"Dead to sin . . . . . live any longer therein?" (vi. 2).
"Buried . . . . . unto death . . . . . walk in newness of life" (vi. 4).
"He died to sin once; . . . . . He liveth unto God" (vi. 10).
"Reckon . . . . . yourselves . . . . . dead . . . . . unto sin, but alive unto God" (vi. 11).
"Yield yourselves . . . . . as . . . . . alive from the dead" (vi. 13).
"End of those things is death, ... end everlasting life" (vi. 21, 22).
"Wages of sin is death . . . . . gift of God is eternal life" (vi. 23).
"Bound by law so long as husband liveth . . . . . loosed if he be dead" (vii. 2, 3).
"I was alive without the law . . . . . sin revived and I died' (vii. 9).
"Commandment ordained to life, I found to be unto death" (vii. 10).
"Law of Spirit of life . . . . . law of sin and death" (viii. 2).
"Mind of flesh is death, mind of spirit is life" (viii. 6).
"Body dead because of sin, spirit is life because of righteousness" (viii. 10).

"If ye live after the flesh ye shall die . . . . . if . . . . . mortify the deeds of the body ye shall live" (viii. 13).

"Neither death, nor life" (viii. 38).

The importance of this fact, and its bearing upon the doctrine of Romans, we shall see more clearly later, but this column of references itself is a standing witness.

Dr. E. W. Bullinger, in his lexicon and Concordance, says of these words:--

"Zao, to live (akin to ao, aemi, to breathe) to have zoe (life). Not 'to be happy', but to have life in all or any of its manifestations, from the life of God down to the lowest vegetable. Not 'to exist' for a thing can exist without living. To live, is to have that peculiar property communicated by God to some parts only of His creation. He originates and sustains all life by giving it out of Himself. 'In Him we live, and move, and have our being'."

Cremer says: "Zoe is only the antecedent condition or basis of bios." Bios being the manner of life a man leads, and of course necessitating the presence of life within before it can express itself. The difference between the two words is seen in zoology and biography. We might write the zoology of any creature, but we can write the biography of man only. Cremer further says of zoe that it is "life, the kind of existence possessed by individual being, to be expanded as self-governing existence, which God is, and man has or is said to have, and which, on its part, is supreme over all the rest of creation.

We have now reviewed the occurrences, general teaching, arrangement and meanings of six key-words, "body", "members", "mind", "spirit", "flesh" and "life". There are other important words, but with these six more or less defined, we may hope to see the truth of these vital chapters, under God's blessing, with some degree of clearness. We will therefore resume our exposition in another article, and trust that the time spent upon this analysis will be more than justified, as the blessed truths of our new position in Christ shine before us in the sacred page.

#39. The fourfold question concerning sin and law (Rom. vi. and vii.).

pp. 222 - 226

It will be remembered that upon reaching the end of Rom. v. we called a halt in order that some important key-words of this section (Rom. v. 12 - viii. 39) should be considered. In article #33 we looked at the use of the word "body"; in #34 we looked at the use of the word "members"; in #35 the word "mind"; in #36 the word "spirit"; in #37 the word "flesh"; in #38 the words "life", "live" and "quicken". With the light received from the study of these key-words we must now proceed, although it must be remembered that there are others, such as "sin" and "law", and these will of necessity demand careful thought during the exposition of the next three chapters.

For the moment our studies are limited to chapters vi. and vii., these forming a distinct section in that inner portion (v. 12 - viii. 39). These two chapters are occupied with a series of questions that arise out of the doctrine enunciated at the close of Rom. v., namely:--

> "Moreover the law entered, that the offence might abound, but where sin abounded, grace did much more abound; that as sin hath reigned unto death, even so might grace reign through righteousness unto eternal life by Jesus Christ our Lord" (Rom. v. 20, 21).

The position and nature of the law, the connection between sin and grace, the reign and dominion of sin and death, and the end—"eternal life", together with their inter-relations with sanctification, licence, bondage, and other matters of great importance, are canvassed in this set of questions and answers.

However involved the subject-matter may be, it is manifest to all who give the matter a moment's consideration, that the structure of these two chapters must hang upon the fourfold question with its fourfold "God forbid" which we find in Rom. vi. 2, 15; vii. 7 & 13, and which occupies the whole of these two chapters. Moreover, it will be seen that each question arises out of a statement of doctrine made by the apostle. We accordingly set out the structure, omitting the expansion of the larger clauses for the time being:--

Rom. v. 20 - vii. 25.

A1 | v. 20, 21. STATEMENT.—Where sin abounded grace did much more abound.
B1 | vi. 1. QUESTION.—Shall we continue in sin that grace abound?
C1 | vi. 2. REPUDIATION.—God forbid (me genoito).
D1 | vi. 3-14. ANSWER.—
| The dominion of sin and death (vi. 9, 14).
| The body of sin "destroyed" (katargeo) (vi. 6).
| Newness of life (vi. 4).
A2 | vi. 14. STATEMENT.—Ye are not under the law but under grace.
B2 | vi. 15. QUESTION.—Shall we sin because not under law but grace?
C2 | vi. 15. REPUDIATION.—God forbid (me genoito).
D2 | vi. 16 - vii. 6. ANSWER.—
| The dominion of law (vii. 1).
| The law "delivered from" (katargeo) (vii. 2-6).
| Newness of spirit (vii. 6).
A3 | vii. 6. STATEMENT.—We were delivered from the law.
B3 | vii. 7. QUESTION.—Is the law sin?
C3 | vii. 7. REPUDIATION.—God forbid (me genoito).
D3 | vii. 7-12. ANSWER.—
| The law of God and the law of sin (vii. 7, 12).
| The conflict (vii. 8, 11).
| "I died"; "unto death"; "slew me" (vii. 9-11).
A4 | vii. 12. STATEMENT.—The law is holy . . . . . just and good.
B4 | vii. 13. QUESTION.—Was that which is good made death unto me?
C4 | vii. 13. REPUDIATION.—God forbid (me genoito).
D4 | vii. 13-25. ANSWER.—
| The law of God and the law of (vii. 13-23).
| The deliverance (vii.24, 25).
| The body of this death (vii. 24).

We have retained the A.V. translation "God forbid", but would draw attention to the fact that me genoito simply means: "Let it not become so." Looking at the four great answers which constitutes the bulk of these chapters, we find that the first is occupied with the dominion of sin and of death, the second with the dominion of law, the third and fourth with the law of God and the law of sin, and the conflict and the deliverance connected with them respectively. The intention of the writer in the use of the word katargeo in vi. 6, where he speaks of the body of sin being "destroyed", is illuminated by the sequel in Rom. vii. 2 and 6, where it is used of the "loosing" and "delivering" from the law. "The body of this death" (vii. 24) is prepared for by the statements: "I died", "I found to be unto death" and "sin . . . . . by it slew me" (vii. 7-12).

Quite a feature of these chapters is the appeal to knowledge, and the apostle has been led to use a variety of words in his endeavour to make the matter clear. Let us observe those used and their different shades of meaning:-- Agnoeo.

"Know ye not, that so many of us as were baptized into Jesus Christ were baptized into His death?" (vi. 3).

"Know ye not brethren . . . . . how that the law hath dominion over a man as long as he liveth?" (vii. 1).

Ginosko.

"Knowing this, that our old man is crucified with Christ" (vi. 6).
"I speak to them that know the law" (vii. 1).
"I had not known sin, but by the law" (vii. 7).
"For that which I do I allow (know) not" (vii. 15).

Oida.

"Knowing that Christ being raised from the dead dieth no more" (vi. 9).

"Know ye not, that to whom ye yield yourselves servants to obey, his servants ye are to whom ye obey" (vi. 16).

"I had not known lust, except the law had said, Thou shalt not covet" (vii. 7).
"We know that the law is spiritual" (vii. 14).
"I know that in me, that is in my flesh, dwelleth no good thing" (vii. 18).

It is extremely difficult to distinguish the differences that are resident in the two words ginosko and oida. Perhaps the difficulty will be recognized if we give the following usages:--

"Then will I profess unto them, I never knew (ginosko) you" (Matt. vii. 23).
"Verily I say unto you, I know (oida) you not" (Matt. xxv. 12).

It assists us to remember that these passages occur in the same Gospel, and therefore suggests some real distinction.

We notice that in Matt. vii. 23 the words of repudiation are followed by: "Depart from Me, ye that work iniquity", but that no such severe statement follows the second reference (Matt. xxv. 12). Both, however, are united by the fact that in each case "the wise and the foolish" are in view, in the one builders, in the other virgins. The trouble with the foolish virgins was that they were not "ready", on the other hand, those repudiated in chapter vii. had made great profession, but had not done the will of God. The foolish builder heard the Lord's sayings, but did them not.

Now of the two, ginosko expresses the more intimate knowledge, and so fits the context. Epignosko is translated sometimes "acknowledge", and this meaning well fits the usage of ginosko in Rom. vii. 15: "For that which I do I do not acknowledge", and, moreover, it makes good sense with the other three references:--

"Acknowledging this, that our old man is crucified with Christ" (vi. 6).
"I speak to them that acknowledge the law" (vii. 1).
"I had not acknowledged sin, but by the law" (vii. 7).

Oida is less personal. It is allied to the verb "to see", whereas ginosko is allied to nous, "the mind". The word "perceive" can be well substituted for the five occurrences given under oida.

Place two passages together for comparison:--

> "I had not acknowledge (ginosko) sin, but by the law" (vii. 7).
> "I had not perceived (oida) lust, except the law had said, Thou shalt not covet' (vii. 7).

Now as these two different words come together in the same verse, and deal also with the same thing, their distinctive meanings ought to reveal themselves. Most of the standard translations and commentaries recognize the difference intended by these two words, and give expression to it in different ways. All, however, point to the conclusion at which we have ourselves arrived.

Conybeare and Howson indicate the difference thus:--

> "I should not have known what sin was."
> "I should not have known the sin of coveting."

Alford gives:--

> "I had not recognized such a thing as sin."
> "For neither had I known anything of concupiscence."

Weymouth translates the passage:--

> "What follows? Is the law itself a sinful thing? No, indeed; on the contrary, unless I had been taught by the law, I should have known nothing of sin as sin. For instance, I should not have known what covetousness is, if the law had not repeatedly said, Thou shalt not covet."

We trust sufficient evidence has been brought forward to justify "acknowledge" and "perceive" as the translation of these two words in this section of Romans. Their further and fuller bearing will be manifest when the whole passage containing them is under review.

Sanctification
or
Holiness, without which no man shall see the Lord.

#3. Separation "to" as well as separation "from".
pp. 1 - 5

We have seen in the second article of this series that the primary idea of the word "sanctification" in the Hebrew O.T. is that of separation. It is necessary, however, to pursue the question in the N.T. also before we can be convinced that the primary meaning of the word is necessarily a part of its doctrinal significance. Let us take for example the words of John x. 36:--

> "Him Whom the Father hath sanctified and sent into the world."

Here there can be no idea of cleansing from defilement, for the Son of God was always "holy, harmless, undefiled, separate from sinners" (Heb. vii. 26). The word here bears its primary meaning of setting apart for some special purpose, and the passage is in measure equivalent to I Pet. i. 20: "Who verily was foreordained before the overthrow of the world."

This idea of separation from common use is seen in I Tim. iv. 4, 5:--

> "For every creature of God is good, and nothing to be refused, if it be received with thanksgiving. For it is sanctified by the word of God and prayer."

This passage is part of a rather involved section dealing with the doctrines of demons, which forbid marriage and command "to abstain from meats which God hath created to be received with thanksgiving". The church was being assailed by false teachers, "desiring to be teachers of the law: understanding neither what they say nor whereof they affirm" (I Tim. i. 7). The believer to-day is not under law. The ceremonial distinction between meats has been swept aside. And the Lord Himself has said: "There is nothing from without a man that, entering into him, can defile him" (Mark vii. 15). To the pure, all things are pure. Whatsoever is sold in the market it is legitimate to eat, asking no question for conscience sake. It is sanctified. This does not mean that it is made holy, or rendered free of pollution, but rather that it is "set apart" as fit and proper food.

Referring to Mark vii. 15-23, the apostle writes in his epistle to the Romans:--

> "I know, and am persuaded by the Lord Jesus, that there is nothing common of itself, but to him that esteemeth anything to be common, to him it is common" (Rom. xiv. 14).

Here we have the word "common" ("unclean", in the A.V.) as the antithesis of "sanctification" in I Tim. iv. In both cases it is not a question of a moral quality intrinsically belonging to the food, but rather of the acceptance of the word of God, "making all meats clean".

The thought of separation as necessary for acceptable service, a thought which is implied in sanctification, is clearly seen in II Tim. ii. 21:--

> "If a man shall therefore purge himself from these, he shall be a vessel unto honour, sanctified, and meet for the master's use."

No man can become holy by purging himself, but in separating from error and those who teach it he may become "sanctified", set apart for acceptable service.

A passage to which the mind naturally turns in this matter of the relationship between separation and sanctification is II Cor. vi. 14 - vii. 1:--

> "Be ye not unequally yoked together with unbelievers: for what fellowship hath righteousness with unrighteousness? and what communion hath light with darkness? And what concord hath Christ with Belial? or what part hath he that believeth with an infidel? And what agreement hath the temple of God with idols? for ye are the temple of the living God; as God hath said, I will dwell in them and walk in them, and I will be their God, and they shall be My people. Wherefore come out from among them, and be ye separate, saith the Lord, and touch not the unclean thing: and I will receive you, and will be a Father unto you, and ye shall be My sons and daughters, saith the Lord Almighty. Having therefore these promises, dearly beloved, let us cleanse ourselves from all filthiness of the flesh and spirit, perfecting holiness in the fear of God."

A simple analysis of this passage reduces its teaching to the following outline:--

A | vi. 14-16. Sanctification viewed negatively. "Be not."
  B | vi. 16. Promises. As God hath said.
    C | vi. 17. Wherefore come out . . . Touch not . . . Be separate.
  B | vi. 18 - vii. 1. Promises. Said the Lord Almighty.
    C | vii. 1. Let us cleanse ourselves.
A | vii. 1. Sanctification viewed positively. "Perfecting."

Let us examine the terms that are used in this short passage, each one being a facet of the many-sided doctrine of sanctification as viewed in the light of separation: "unequally yoked; fellowship; communion; concord; part; agreement; come out; be separate; touch not; cleanse from filthiness". Here are ten expressive terms all of which are gathered up in the conclusion—"perfecting holiness". Their examination will repay us.

The unequal yoke.—It is natural to think of this figure as indicating service, and the Lord's words in Matt. xi. 29, and those of Paul in Phil. iv. 3, fully justify this application. We think also of the prohibition in Deut. xxii. 10: "Thou shalt not plow with an ox and an ass together." It is not, however, patent to the English reader as it would be to a Jew who knew the Levitical law, and was acquainted with the LXX (as most Jews were), that the idea of the word heterozugeo would also include that of marriage. For the only occurrence of the word in the LXX is found in Lev. xix. 19, where our version renders it "gender".

The two great divisions of mankind insisted upon here at the beginning of the list are not those of rich and poor, high and low, Jew and Gentile, but of believer and unbeliever. It is vain to think of practical sanctification where believer and unbeliever become yoked together. This does not mean, of course, that no relationships can be entered into, for then as the apostle has said, "ye must needs go out of the world". As fellow-creatures we may help all men, and transact the affairs of daily life with them, whatever their attitude to God. If this were not so, the baker, the 'bus-driver, and indeed, all who compose the social fabric of life would be debarred from intercourse with the believer unless they, too, were of like precious faith. This relationship, however, is very different from that of being "unequally yoked together". This distinction is found in John xvii. 15:--

> "I pray not that Thou shouldest take them out of the world, but that Thou shouldest keep them from the evil."

The Christian's true position is "in the world" (John xvii. 11), but not "of it".

Fellowship._-The word translated "fellowship" is metoche, the related word metochos being rendered "fellow" (Heb. i. 9), "partaker" (Heb. iii. 1, 14, vi. 4 and xii. 8), and "partner" (Luke v. 7). The apostle's teaching clearly shows that any dealings between the Lord's people and the unsaved that can be regarded as the formation of a "partnership" are not in accord with the principle of sanctification and do not lead to the full end—the perfecting of holiness.

Communion (koinonia).—The basis of this word is the idea of having something in common. It is four times translated "fellowship" in I John i. 3-7, where we find again the alternatives of "light and darkness" as in the passage before us. There can be no common ground between light and darkness; they are extreme opposites and cannot exist together.

Concord (sumphonesis).—This gives our word "symphony", as applied to a musical composition, the word sumphonia being actually translated "music" in Luke xv. 25. Instead of harmony, nothing but discord will sound in the ears of the Lord if we allow the combination of which the apostle speaks, and only an uncertain sound will go forth to men.

Part (meris).—If we remember that this word is translated "partaker" in Col. i. 12, and that the almost synonymous meros is used in John xiii. 8, no additional comment is needed.

Agreement (sugkatathesis).—By pure etymology, this is "a putting down together with", and by usage and association is linked with the casting of a vote by putting together in the same urn the tickets of those holding the same opinion. It will be seen that the "agreement" questioned here in II Cor. vi. 16 is a voluntary participation implying something in common. And what common ground can there be between the temple of God and idols? One is of the truth; the other, of the lie.

While the lesson conveyed by the use of these five words—"fellowship", "communion", "concord", "part", and "agreement"—is necessarily a negative one, enforcing the truth that sanctification is an entire negation of such fellowship and agreement; we must not miss the vital importance of the true fellowship.

We have already seen this in our second article, where we referred to the opening words in the teaching of Hebrews on sanctification:--

> "Both He that sancitifieth and they who are sanctified are all of one" (Heb. ii. 11).

Perhaps a very homely illustration will enable the reader to grasp our meaning. Suppose that you knew an exemplary husband and father, who was accustomed every evening, as soon as the office closed, to make straight for home. What would he think if you accosted him one day and said: "Oh, Mr. -----, I am so glad to see that you are 'separated' from cinemas, billiards and whist drives"? The active and positive principle governing his action was his love for wife and family and all the ties of home; the other things were "not done", they did not come into the scheme at all.

So with true sanctification, "separation from" is but the negative and less important side; "separation to" is living and active. Heb. xiii. is often misquoted, stress being laid on the negative side only: "Let us go forth, therefore, without the camp bearing His reproach." The passage rightly reads: "Let us go forth, therefore, unto Him without the camp bearing His reproach." The next verse often suffers similar maltreatment, being quoted as: "For here we have no continuing city." The true lode-stone, however, is not found in the absence of a city here, but in the presence of a city there—"but we seek one to come."

Returning to II Cor. vi., we find there the same features. Not only do we read of "coming out", of "being separate" and of "touching not the unclean thing", but we read also of the temple of the living God:--

> "Ye are the temple of the living God."
> "I will dwell in them."
> "I will receive you and will be a Father unto you, and ye shall be My sons and daughters, saith the Lord Almighty."

In all this, of course, there is no intention of minimizing the absolute need for separation. What we are seeking to show is that we are to be separate from the evil because we are joined to the good—"separation from" something is not in itself the fulfillment of the scriptural idea of sanctification.

The conclusion expressed in II Cor. vii. 1 it will be more appropriate to consider later in this series. The thought of "perfecting holiness" is the chief corner-stone of the structure; and we have other features still to examine that are nearer to the foundation.

#4. "A figure for the time then present" (Heb. ix. 9).
pp. 44 - 50

In our last article we were considering II Cor. vi. 14 - vii. 1 so far as it illuminated that particular aspect of the main subject which has in view the principle of separation "to" as well as "from". In that passage we found the exhortation to not only "come out and be separate", but to "touch not the unclean thing" and to "cleanse ourselves from all filthiness of the flesh and spirit". This is a most important principle of sanctification which we will now proceed to consider.

In the epistle to the Hebrews there is employed a number of terms such as "purge", "purify", etc., with a consideration of which we could commence our study. The writer of Hebrews, however, turns back to the types and shadows of the law to enforce his teaching, and in consonance with this we, too, are convinced that unless the weight of the instruction given under the ceremonial law is really felt, we shall never fully appreciate the teaching of the epistles. Should the reader have seen a book entitled "Philosophy of the Plan of Salvation" by the Revd. James B. Walker, D.D., he will recognize our indebtedness to this writer for some of the lines of thought here developed. Dr. Walker raises this point:-- > "It was necessary, therefore, in order to promote right exercises of heart in religious worship, that the Israelites should be made acquainted with the holiness of God. The precise question then for solution is, How could the idea of God's holiness be conveyed to the minds of the Israelites?

> There was not an object in the material world which could convey to the mind the idea of God's holiness. The idea, therefore, would have to be originated, and thrown into their mind, through the senses, by a process instituted for that express purpose. The plan to originate the idea, in order to meet the constitution of the mind, must consists of a series of comparisons."

This series of comparisons, where one class is set apart as more clean than others, underlies much of the ceremonial law, and the time occupied in acquainting ourselves with it will be fully repaid.

Although the goal of the ceremonial typology was to reveal the holiness of God, it was necessary to begin at the outer edge, and work step by step toward the centre. This outer edge was the line of demarcation drawn between the one nation of Israel and the rest of the nations of the earth.

Israel a holy nation.

> "Thus shall ye deal with them" (Israel's enemies), "ye shall destroy their altars, and break down their images, and cut down their groves, and burn their graven images with fire. For thou art a holy people unto the Lord thy God. The Lord thy God hath chosen thee to be a special people unto Himself, above all people that are upon the face of the earth" (Deut. vii. 5, 6).

"Ye shall be a peculiar treasure unto Me above all people, for (or though) all the earth is Mine. And ye shall be unto Me a kingdom of priests and an holy nation" (Exod. xix. 5, 6).

"They shall call them, The holy people" (Isa. lxiii. 12).

This is the first grand division. For the nations no approach to God was possible apart from this "kingdom of priests". To them the Oracles of God were entrusted, and of them the Messiah was to come. Salvation was of the Jews.

The next step was to separate a portion of the earth for their special inheritance.

Palestine a holy land.

"The Lord shall inherit Judah His portion in the holy land" (Zech. ii. 12).
"The land shall not be sold for ever: for the land is Mine" (Lev. xxv. 23).
"The land of the Lord." "My land" (Isa. xiv. 2, 25).
"My land and Mine heritage" (Jer. ii. 7).

First of all, then, we have the nation of Israel separated from all the nations of the earth, and, after that, their country equally marked off from all other lands. This, however, is but the beginning.

It is not enough for Israel to be a separate people: they are to be taught the infinite holiness of their God, and accordingly only one out of all tribes of that holy nation is chosen to engage in tabernacle or temple service. This tribe is the tribe of Levi.

The tribe of Levi separated from the nation.

"The Lord separated the tribe of Levi, to bear the ark of the covenant of the Lord, to stand before the Lord to minister unto Him, and to bless His name" (Deut. x. 8).

"Behold the rod of Aaron for the house of Levi was budded" (Numb. xvii. 8).

"Thou shalt give the Levites unto Aaron and to his sons: they are wholly given unto him out of the children of Israel . . . . . and the stranger that cometh nigh shall be put to death" (Numb. iii. 9, 10).

It must not be thought, however, that the holiness of God was sufficiently impressed upon this people by the segregation of Levi. Levi itself was to learn, and learn by a terrible lesson, that there was a circle smaller than themselves, into which they must no more penetrate than might a stranger penetrate into theirs.

Aaron and his sons separated from Levi for priesthood.

"The Lord said unto Aaron, Thou and thy sons and thy father's house with thee shall bear the iniquity of the sanctuary: and thou and thy sons with thee shall bear the iniquity of your priesthood . . . . . And I, behold, I have taken your brethren the Levites from among the children of Israel: to you they are given as a gift for the Lord, to do the service of the tabernacle of the congregation. Therefore thou and thy sons with thee shall keep your priest's office for everything of the altar, and within the vail" (Numb. xviii. 1-7).

"Hear I pray you, ye sons of Levi: seemeth it but a small thing unto you, that the God of Israel hath separated you from the congregation . . . . . and seek ye the priesthood also?" (Numb. xvi. 8-10).

"No stranger which is not of the seed of Aaron (shall) come near to offer incense before the Lord: that he be not as Korah and as his company" (Numb. xvi. 40).

It will be observed that although the whole tribe of Levi had been separated by God from the rest of Israel, the further distinctive office of priest was so far removed from them that it was a matter of death to step over the appointed boundary.

But there is drawn yet one more line of demarcation in order that mortal man shall be sufficiently impressed with the awful holiness of the God he was called upon to serve.

Aaron, as high priest, was separated from his sons, the priests.

"There was a tabernacle made; the first, wherein was the candlestick, and the table, and the shewbread: which is called the sanctuary. And after the second veil, the tabernacle which is called the Holiest of all . . . . . the priests went always into the first tabernacle, accomplishing the service of God. But into the second went the high priest alone once every year, not without blood, which he offered for himself, and for the errors of the people" (Heb. ix. 1-7).

As we face these scriptures, the extraordinary emphasis upon the character of man's approach to God begins to be felt, yet, thus far, but one feature has been taken into account, the separation of a nation, a tribe, a family, and, lastly, an individual for the office of the high priesthood.

But we have not yet given any place to the repeated offerings, washings, and ceremonial preparation that accompanied the process of approach. This we must now do, or our survey would be but half finished, and its full effect lost upon us.

We return, therefore, to the outermost edge, the separation of the entire nation. How was it done? There are at least two phases, the one being the elective purpose of God, exercising His sovereign choice, the other the redemptive purpose of God, taking cognizance of the sinful character of all nations, not excluding the chosen nation, Israel, and, therefore, impressing them, in particular, at the outset with the fact that God's choice of them was, notwithstanding, associated with an intolerance of sin among them in any shape or form. We will not quote the promise made to Abraham, as recorded in Gen. xii. and elsewhere, but, instead, take up the witness of the Scriptures at the time when the people are about to emerge as the elect and separated people of God.

Israel, as a nation, were separated by the shedding of blood.

"This month shall be unto you the beginning of months . . . . .take . . . . . a lamb . . . . . the whole assembly of the congregation of Israel shall kill it in the evening" (Exod. xii. 1-6).

"What one nation in the earth is like Thy people, even like Israel, whom God went to redeem for a people to Himself" (II Sam. vii. 23).

Israel, as a nation, were also separated by baptism.

"All our fathers were under the cloud, and all passed through the sea, and were all baptized unto Moses in the cloud and in the sea" (I Cor. x. 1, 2).

"The pillar of the cloud went from before their face and stood behind them; and it came between the camp of the Egyptians and the camp of Israel; and it was a cloud and darkness to them, but it gave light by night to these . . . . . and Moses stretched out his hand over the sea . . . . . and the children of Israel went into the midst of the sea upon the dry ground" (Exod. xiv. 19-21).

Israel were moreover separated by miraculous interposition.

"Ask now of the days that are past, which were before thee, since the day that God created man upon the earth, and ask from the one side of heaven unto the other, whether there have been any such thing as this great thing is, or hath been heard like it? . . . . . hath God assayed to go and take Him a nation from the midst of another nation, by temptations, by signs, and by wonders, and by war, and by a mighty hand, and by a stretched out arm, and by great terrors, according to all that the Lord your God did for you in Egypt before your eyes?" (Deut. iv. 32-34).

Israel were still further separated by the blood of the Covenant.

"When Moses had spoken every precept to all the people according to the law, he took the blood of calves and of goats, with water, and scarlet wool, and hyssop, and sprinkled both the book, and all the people saying, This is the blood of the covenant which God hath enjoined unto you" (Heb. ix. 19, 20).

Here at the outer edge we meet with a whole series of separating and cleansing processes such as one might have felt were sufficient to give the whole nation access to God. But not so, they are but the beginning of the cleansing process. There follows the separation of the tribe of Levi from the rest of Israel, and that "not without blood".

The Levites were taken in place of the firstborn son of each family.

"All the firstborn of man among thy children shalt thou redeem . . . . . the Lord slew all the firstborn in the land of Egypt . . . . . therefore . . . . . all the firstborn of my children I redeem" (Exod. xiii. 13-15).

"And I, behold, I have taken the Levites from among the children of Israel instead of all the firstborn" (Numb. iii. 12).

The Levites were then sanctified by atonement and washings.

"Thou shalt bring the Levites before the Lord: and the children of Israel shall put their hands upon the Levites, and Aaron shall offer the Levites before the Lord . . . . . and the Levites shall lay their hands upon the heads of the bullocks; and thou shalt offer one for a sin offering and one for a burnt offering, unto the Lord, to make an atonement for the Levites . . . . . thus shalt thou separate the Levites. And the Levites were purified, and they washed their clothes" (Numb. viii. 10-14 and 21).

In spite, however, of the savour of these God-appointed offerings and cleansings, we have already seen that the intrusion even of the privileged Levite into the priest's office involved death.

Time and space, however, fail to permit of the pursuit of this theme in detail. We can but summarise the remainder, trusting that the reader will not fail to get for himself the impression that an actual reading of the entire record gives.

The priest were separated from the Levites to their distinctive office by distinctive garments "for glory and for beauty", by anointing, by sacrifice, by unleavened bread, and by the sanctifying of the ear, hand and foot with blood and oil. Aaron, as high priest, was moreover separately consecrated and robed for his distinctive work. Again, Exod. xxviii. and xxix. must be carefully read if the reader is to get the details. Here at long last is the one man set apart by all these concentric cleansings. But even he must wash his flesh, must never omit the blood for his own sins, must have the protecting cloud of incense, "that he die not", and, in order further to impress upon him and the people the holiness of the Lord he served, this separated high priest was permitted to enter within the veil but once every year.

Our consideration of holiness, as exhibited in these ceremonials, however, is not yet complete. What of the sprinkling and cleansing of altars and vessels? What of the washing of sacrificial animals, already certified "without blemish"? What of the laws concerning clean and unclean meats, and the elaborate ceremonial attached to the cleansing of the leper?

> "The camp was purified, the people were purified; everything was purified and re-purified, and each process of the ordinances was designed to reflect purity upon the others until finally that idea of purity formed in the mind and rendered intense by the convergence of so many rays, was by comparison referred to the idea of God, ... thus they learned in the sentiment of Scripture that God was of too pure eyes to look upon iniquity" (Philosophy of the Plan of Salvation).

If we again took up the question of the land of Israel, we should find that, while the whole land is called the Holy Land, there is yet in that land one place more holy than the rest, the holy city Jerusalem, "My holy mountain". And so the lesson is impressed form every side. Sufficient, however, has been set forth to enable us to appreciate in some degree that glorious sanctification which is ours through the blood of Christ, that not only makes us near, but gives us "boldness of access", yea, "seats us together" in His Presence.

It is no wonder that they sang on the bank of the Red Sea:--

> "Who is like unto Thee, O Lord, among the gods? Who is like Thee, glorious in holiness, fearful in praises, doing wonders?" (Exod. xv. 11).

#5. "Sanctify them through Thy truth" (John xvii. 17).
pp. 88 - 92

The Gospel according to John falls into two great divisions: i.-xii., and xiii.-xxi. There are naturally sub-divisions, but for our present purpose they can be ignored. Both of these sections refer to "His own", and to the Lord's relationship with the Father before His coming to the earth, and to both His own and His disciples' relationship with the world:--

> "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God" (John i. 1).
>
> "When Jesus knew that His hour was come that He should depart out of this world unto the Father . . . . . and that He was come from God and went to God" (John xiii. 1-3).
>
> "He came unto His own, and His own received Him not" (John i. 11).
>
> "Having loved His own which were in the world, He loved them unto the end" (John xiii. 1).

From chapter i.-xii. the great fact insisted upon is that Christ is the Sent One, but from xiii. to xxi. the Sent One speaks in view of a work finished and His return to the glory with the Father. The words of Heb. iii. 1 could be well taken as a summary of this double aspect of John's Gospel:--

> "Consider the Apostle (the Sent One) and High Priest (the One Who went within the veil, 'heaven itself') of our profession" (Heb. iii. 1).

The section from John i.-xii. we may sum up as the Lord's intent, that He came to give life.

It is our immediate concern to discover the intention of the second half of the Gospel, but let us first sort out some of the material. The Lord was soon to depart out of this world (xiii. 1), whereas His own were in the world (xiii. 1). In a little while the world should see Him no more (xiv. 19). But He would not leave His disciples comfortless: He would, through the ministry of the Holy Spirit, manifest Himself unto them as He could not manifest Himself unto the world, sending them the Spirit of truth which the world could not receive, and leaving them a peace given not as the world gives (xiv. 16-27). The disciples' relationship to the world was to be the same as that of their Lord. Soon, He told them, the prince of this world would come and have nothing in Him (xiv. 30), and in xiv. 18, 19 He speaks of a similar attitude towards His disciples also:--

> "If the world hate you, ye know that it hated Me before it hated you. If ye were of the world, the world would love his own: but because ye are not of the word, but I have chosen you out of the world, therefore the world hateth you."

It is evident that these disciples were in, yet not of, this world. In xvi. 28 the Lord brings together in one verse the two aspects of John's Gospel, saying: "I came forth from the Father, and am come into the world: again, I leave the world, and go to the Father."

He then gives them further light upon the attitude of the world to themselves, saying, "In the world ye shall have tribulation", but adds "Be of good cheer; I have overcome the world" (xvi. 33).

The great High-Priestly prayer of John xvii. is a direct outcome of this statement. It opens with: "These words spake Jesus", and then, upon the basis of that finished work which He had been sent to accomplish, He prays for "His own that were in the world". He refers to them as "the men which Thou gavest Me out of the world" (6). He prays for them, not for the world (9). Again the fact is faced: "And now I am no more in the world, but these are in the world, and I come to Thee" (11). And the Saviour prays to the Father to keep them through His own name that they may be one. Because He had given them the Word of God, the world had hated them, "because they are not of the world, even as I am not of the world" (14). Here, the glorious truth of Heb. ii. 11 breaks through—the Sanctifier and the sanctified are "all of one", a unity so marvelous that John xvii. 21-23 exhausts the resources of language to describe its glory.

A very important item is the prayer of verses 15 and 16:--

> "I pray not that Thou shouldest take them out of the world, but that Thou shouldest keep them from the evil. They are not of the world even as I am not of the world."

The reference to sanctification is now made in the words: "Sanctify them through Thy truth: Thy word is truth" (17). The Lord had given them the "Word" and the "Words" (8 & 14), and that Word, being truth, would sanctify and keep through all the evil that was in the world.

This survey will have prepared us to see the symbolic fact of John xiii., the washing of the disciples' feet, as a part of a whole. Let us now note some of the features that are common to John xiii. and xvii.:--

(1) In both, there is the fact that the Lord came from, and went to, the One that sent Him (xiii. 1, 3; xvii. 8, 12, 13).
(2) In both, the betrayal by Judas Iscariot is commented upon, and "no part" with Christ is seen to be his (xiii. 2, 8, 10, 11; xvii. 12).
(3) In both, the imminent betrayal is associated with the glorifying of the Father and the Son (xiii. 31, 32; xvii. 1, 5).
(4) In both, the sanctifying of the believer from contact with the world is supermost. In chapter xiii. it is set forth in the language of symbol: in xvii. in the language of simple fact. In other words, the washing of the disciples' feet, and the prayer, "Sanctify them through Thy truth", are complimentary. Midway between stand the words: "Now ye are clean through the word which I have spoken unto you" (xv. 3).

In full consciousness of His High-Priestly work the Saviour, "knowing that He was come from God, and went to God . . . . . took a towel and girded Himself . . . . . and began to wash the disciples' feet" (xiii. 3-5).

In an astonished silence one after another was thus lovingly treated. Peter, however, could not keep back the thoughts that doubtless were rushing through the minds of all.

"Peter saith unto Him, Lord, dost Thou wash my feet? . . . . . Thou shalt never wash my feet" (xiii. 6, 8).

It has been pointed out in The Companion Bible that the double negative here employed by Peter is too strong for human nature, and that wherever it was used by a human being, the speaker never fulfilled his word. Peter used it three times, viz., Matt. xvi. 22, xxvi. 35, and John xiii. 8.

The Lord's reply to Peter overwhelmed that impetuous soul with dismay, and led him to go to the other extreme. "If I wash thee not, thou hast no part with Me" (xiii. 8). In effect Peter replies, "No part with Thee! O my Lord, rather than that, I will submit to anything", for he says: "Lord, not my feet only, but also my hands and my head" (xiii. 9).

The Lord's gentle answer to this outburst contains the pith and marrow of the doctrine of sanctification we are here seeking to expound. It will be necessary to depart from the A.V. a little in order to give the emphasis that the Lord intended:--

> "He that HAT BEEN BATHED needeth not save to WASH HIS FEET, but is CLEAN EVERY WHIT" (xiii. 10).

Let us take the two statements separately:--

(1) He that hath been bathed is clean every whit.
(2) He needs no further cleansing than the washing of his feet.

There is a designed contrast between the bathing and the washing. The one has been accomplished once and for all, and covers the whole person. The other is a continuous process of cleansing that part which becomes soiled through contact with the road while walking through the wilderness of this world. The initial sanctification looks back to that one offering, never to be repeated. The continuous cleansing is the daily ministry of the Word of God, applying, in all its wide and wondrous power, that gracious work on our behalf.

Be it noted that Judas was present at this washing; nevertheless he was not clean, neither had he any part with Christ. Washing by the water of the Word will never make one fit for glory: it is only of power when one is already saved and sanctified by the blood of Christ. It is surely as fundamental as the atonement itself that "no man can by any means redeem his brother". Yet regarding this foot-washing the Lord says: "If I, then, your Lord and Master, have washed your feet, ye also ought to wash one another's feet" (xiii. 14). Our initial salvation is not by example, but by expiation, but this washing of the feet is an example: "I have given you an example, that ye should do as I have done to you" (xiii. 15). Here is a ministry of love open to all who serve Him.

Does the contemplation of our high calling make us proud or boastful? Should it not rather be accompanied with "all lowliness and meekness"? In full consciousness that He was about to "go to God", the Lord laid aside His garments and stooped to perform the lowliest office of an eastern house. "Moab is my washpot—over Edom have I cast out my shoe", cried the exultant and victorious David, designating the most menial offices for his vanquished enemies. "He took a towel and girded Himself" is the lowly action of David's greater Son.

The washing of the feet is the symbol of that which is expressed in literal terms all through chapters xiii.-xvii., where, as cited above, we read of the believer's relations with this evil world. The Saviour loved His own in the beginning. He loved them to the end. He not only died for them, but He lives for them. He not only sanctifies them once for all by His one offering, but He sanctifies them daily by the washing of the water of the Word. Every Bible study, therefore, should be conducted in the sanctuary. Its precious teaching should be received as a ministry from the ascended Lord. As the Holy Spirit takes of the things of Christ and shows them unto us, we are sanctified by the Spirit, but we are also sanctified by the truth, for He is the Spirit of truth, and never works apart from the Word. And inasmuch as the testimony of the Spirit through the Word is to direct us back to Calvary and up to the throne of grace, we may take the words of I John i. 7 as but another facet of the same blessed message:--

> "If we walk in the light, as He is in the light, we have fellowship one with another, and the blood of Jesus Christ His Son cleanseth us from all sin."

#6. Fellowship, sin and cleansing.
pp. 128 - 131

Our last article led us to I John i. 7, and in the present article we shall seek from this passage further light upon the question of sanctification.

In the first place we must remember that the epistle to the Colossians makes it clear that the sphere of our acceptance is "in the light", and that "in His sight" we shall be presented holy, unblameable and unreproveable (Col. i. 12 and 22). This blessed and wonderful result of the death of Christ and the grace of God does not, however, mean that it is unnecessary for the apostle, in the same chapter, to warn and teach, so that he may present every man perfect in Christ Jesus (Col. i. 28). Position is one thing; a walk that is worthy of it is another.

Turning to I John i. 7, we must first of all realize that the passage deals with "walk". If we realize this we shall have no difficulty about the thought of a daily cleansing.

John, early in the epistle, reveal his message:--

> "This then is the message which we have heard of Him, and declare unto you, that God is light, and in Him is no darkness at all" (I John i. 5).

This revelation of the essential nature of God makes it imperative that sin shall be dealt with wherever and whenever it appears. The epistle is not treating of life; that is the theme of John's Gospel. It is addressed, rather, to those who have known the Lord from the beginning, who have overcome the wicked one, and whose sins are forgiven for His Name's sake (I John ii. 12-14). It is not a question, therefore, of life, but of light, of love and of fellowship:--

> "And these things write we unto you, that your joy may be full" (I John i. 4).

Turning to I John i. 7, we observe that it is part of a statement extending to ii. 1, characterized by the repeated us of the word, "If":--

> "IF we say that we have fellowship."
> "IF we walk in the light."
> "IF we say that we have no sin."
> "IF we confess our sins."
> "IF we say that we have not sinned."
> "IF any man sin."

There is an alternation here of "saying" and "doing", "If we say" being contrasted with "If we walk" and "If we confess".

Because God is light, it is impossible to walk with Him and to walk in darkness. But it must not be assumed from this fact that those who do walk with God "have no sin" or have not sinned", for the apostle makes it clear that any who claim such exemption deceive themselves, and the truth is not in them and, worse still, they make God a liar. It follows, therefore, that those who do walk in the light in fellowship with God are those who have sinned and who know that they have sin. This may seem at first to raise an insuperable difficulty, but when the great foundation of all acceptance comes into view—"the blood of Christ"—the difficulty vanishes. This is so important to our subject and so vital to our peace, that we must seek all grace and wisdom in understanding its bearing upon our walk and fellowship with God.

"The blood of Jesus Christ His Son."

While we can never eliminate faith in our relationship with the great atonement of Christ, it is well to realize that in this passage the blood of Jesus Christ stands as the actual objective cause, once for all, of our justification, sanctification, access and peace. We could never walk in the light with God were it not for that precious blood once shed.

Turning to verse 9, we shall see that a distinction is made between "forgiveness of sins" and "cleansing from all unrighteousness". This is further amplified in ii. 1:--

> "If any man sin, we have an Advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the Righteous."

Just as we distinguished righteousness from sanctification, so we should distinguish cleansing from forgiving. He Who justified also sanctified. Our very walking in the light will reveal sin and sins unseen and unknown before, but instead of being turned away from that holy place by them, we have the assurance that full provision has been made for this very uncleanness. And we learn to our joy (I John i. 4) that not only have we been sanctified once and for all in the offering of Christ, that not only may we look forward to the day when we shall be presented holy, but that it is gloriously true that in the continuing present "the blood of Jesus Christ His Son is cleansing us from all sin". The symbolic washing of John xiii., with the Lord's differentiation between the one bathing that renders the believer "clean every whit", and the daily cleansing of the feet that contact with the world and our present imperfect condition render necessary, helps us to appreciate the teaching of I John i. 7.

Not only is the walk in view, but fellowship: "We have fellowship one with another, and the blood of Jesus Christ His Son cleanseth us from all sin." So, in the Gospel, the Lord had said: "If I wash thee not, thou hast no part with Me" (John xiii. 8). If we wait until we "have no sin" before we "walk in the light", we shall never in this life know fellowship with God. We are invited to walk in the light with the assurance that daily cleansing is provided.

Grace is so far beyond our ordinary thoughts that there is always the likelihood, as the apostle Paul knew only too well, that some will say, "Shall we continue in sin that grace may abound?" So in I John i. 7. There is no minimizing of sin, but rather detestation of it. Even the redeemed, who are so at one with the Lord that a description of their unity seems to exhaust the resources of language (John xvii.), even they must realize that sin is so deep-dyed, so part of our very nature, that even those who walk in the light and have fellowship with God cannot dispense with the continual cleansing of His precious blood. So, in I John ii. 1, the apostle checks any false conclusions that may have been forming in the minds of some by saying:--

> "My little children, these things write I unto you, in order that you may not sin. And if any man sin, we have an Advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the Righteous."

The word here translated "Advocate" is paraclete, which in John's Gospel is translated "Comforter". If we read I John ii. 1 in the light of Heb. vii. 25, we shall see that the high-priestly intercession is in view here rather than the pleading of an advocate in a court of law. Cleansing has no place in a court of law; it pertains to the temple, to access, worship, and fellowship.

There is an O.T. passage which should be read with I John i. 7 because it illuminates other facets of the truth regarding the important question of sin, confession and cleansing and the presence of the Lord. It hardly seems fitting, however, to attempt to crowd its message in at the end of an article, and we therefore reserve comment upon this passage for our next paper.

#7. Confession, cleansing, commission.
pp. 166 - 170

Our meditations upon I John i. 7, and the relation between sin and the light of God's presence, will be enlarged and confirmed if we turn to the sixth chapter of Isaiah. Much is said in the prophecy of Isaiah concerning uncleanness, but the crisis in the prophet's experience seems to have come when the light of the Lord's presence revealed to him sources of defilement in himself which before had been unknown. Isaiah had rightly testified that the nation of Israel had become like a leprous man. The disease was so grave as to appear beyond remedy:--

"Why should ye be stricken any more? ye will revolt more and more: the whole head is sick, and the whole heart faint. From the sole of the foot even unto the head there is no soundness in it: but wounds and bruises and putrifying sores" (Isa. i. 5, 6).

In the succeeding verses Isaiah continues his burning denunciation, and likens the nation to Sodom and Gomorrah (i. 10). His exhortation begins with the words: "Wash you and make you clean", and points to the only remedy, a cleansing sacrifice that washes as white as snow (i. 16-18). Further denunciations follow. The city is likened to a harlot, and to silver that has become dross—and so through many a chapter.

The special point we wish to make will be more readily seen if we notice one feature of chapter v. Six consecutive woes are there pronounced by the prophet upon the people—"Woe unto them", "Woe unto them", in verses 8, 11, 18, 20, 21 and 22. But the seventh woe is personal—"Woe is me" (Isa. vi. 5). Drawing near to the Lord and catching a glimpse of the seraphims veiling their faces and crying, "Holy, holy, holy", the prophet who had seen the uncleanness of the people now sees himself. He who had once said "Woe unto them" is now to say, "Woe is me":--

> "Then said I, Woe is me! for I am undone, because I am a man of unclean lips, and I dwell in the midst of a people of unclean lips: for mine eyes have seen the King, the Lord of hosts" (Isa. vi. 5).

There was but one means of cleansing. Water could not wash away the uncleanness; the seraphim applied to Isaiah's lips a live coal from off the altar of sacrifice, and the sin was purged.

Let us give a little closer attention to this chapter in Isaiah's spiritual experience. The structure of the section is necessary for a full exposition, but such detailed examination must be deferred. Three focal points in the structure are formed by the words of the prophet, "Then said I", in verses 5, 8 & 11, and they will conveniently divide up the subject-matter for us. His first explanation is:--

> "Then said I, Woe is me! for I am undone: because I am a man of unclean lips, and I dwell in the midst of a people of unclean lips: for mine eyes have seen the King, the Lord of hosts" (Isa. vi. 5).

What has the prophet experienced in the opening verses of this chapter that leads him to make this great confession? Let him speak again: "For mine eyes have seen the King, the Lord of hosts." Who is this King, and what is there about Him to cause such a self-revelation of uncleanness? In the first place this King is a direct contrast to king Uzziah, in the year of whose death the vision was seen. King Uzziah died a leper:--

> "And the Lord smote the king so that he was a leper unto the day of his death, and dwelt in a several (separate) house' (II Kings xv. 5).

Here, then, is Isaiah witnessing to a leprous people (Isa. i. 5, 6), with a leprous king living apart because of his uncleanness. In vivid contrast is placed "The King" sitting in the temple, whose holiness is such that even heavenly seraphims use four wings to cover face and feet while they cry, "Holy, holy, holy". Suddenly, in that holy presence, Isaiah realized his oneness with that poor leper king and that polluted nation. "Woe, is me, for I am undone."

We are not told that the anger of the Lord waxed hot against Isaiah for daring to enter His holy presence. We are not told that one of the mighty seraphims flew towards him to exclude him. No, Isaiah is "in the light" (I John i. 7), and if that light reveals sin, as the sunbeam reveals the floating mote, it needs but to be confessed to be cleansed away. Let us not miss this lesson, for it comes also in the epistle of John. We do not read, "If we ask for forgiveness", but, "If we confess" (I John i. 9). In the practical outworking of grace, it would be a moral disaster to cleanse away recognized yet unconfessed sin. So here, Isaiah does not attempt to mitigate; he confesses at once—"I am a man of unclean lips." He adds, moreover, "I dwell in the midst of a people of unclean lips"—an O.T. way of confessing "sin" and "sins" (I John i. 8 and 10), confessing identification with a fallen humanity, as well as personal complicity with its evil.

Let us notice for our joy (I John i. 4) that cleansing is immediate: "The blood of Jesus Christ His Son is cleansing us from all sin" (I John i. 7):--

> "Then flew one of the seraphims unto me, having a live coal in his hand, which he had taken with the tongs from off the altar. And he laid it upon my mouth, and said, Lo, this hath touched thy lips: and thine iniquity is taken away, and thy sin purged" (Isa. vi. 6, 7).

Nothing but the blood of Jesus Christ cleanses in I John i. 7, and nothing but the live coal from the altar purges in Isa. vi. 6, 7. John calls the evil by its true name of "sin", and the seraphim does not excuse or modify it—it is "iniquity" and "sin". Isaiah is now ready for service.

The prophet's experience is later to be the experience of all Israel when they "look" upon Him Whom they had pierced, for a reference to Zech. xii. and xiii. will show that this look (xii. 10) accompanied by confession (xii. 10-14) is to be but the prelude to the opening of a fountain for sin and uncleanness (xiii. 1).

Isaiah's experience here anticipates the fifty-third chapter of his prophecy, and a comparison of Isa. i. with liii. will shew what was symbolized by the live coal from off the altar. The description of Israel, given in Isa. i. 4-6, is that of a leper. With this in mind read again Isa. liii.:--

> "He hath no form nor comeliness . . . . . no beauty . . . . . He is despised and rejected of men . . . . . and we hid as it were our faces from Him" (Isa. liii. 2, 3).

Spurrell's version reads here: "As from one with covered lip we turned our faces from Him", and gives as a footnote: "Here seems to be an allusion to the leper, who was commanded to cover the upper lip." That glorious King, before Whose holiness Isaiah felt leprous, was the Lord Jesus Christ—"These things said Isaiah, when he saw His glory, and spake of Him" (John xii. 41)—The holy One became as a leper that we, the leprous, might be made clean.

In Isa. liii. 4 we read that Israel esteemed Him "stricken, smitten of God, and afflicted". The word "smitten" is translated "stricken" in Isa. i. 5: "Why should ye be stricken any more?" Israel could never be saved or sanctified by anything that they could endure or suffer; it became necessary for the Lord to lay upon Him, His holy One, the iniquity of us all.

Israel were full of wounds and bruises. The word "bruises" in Isa. i. 6 is the word "stripes" in Isa. liii. 5: "And with His stripes we are healed." Nothing short of this could heal the disease of sin. Mollifying ointment or bandages are of no avail. Isa. i. 5 speaks of "the whole head" being "sick". The word reappears as "grief" in Isa. liii. 3, 4: "Acquainted with grief . . . . . surely He hath borne our griefs, and carried our sorrows."

It is interesting to notice that Matthew's reference to the fulfillment of this prophecy occurs almost immediately after the account of the miraculous healing of a leper, of the healing of a man sick of the palsy, and of a woman sick of a fever (Matt. viii.)—all of them types of sin, and of Israel's condition. It is not without significance that the first miracle specifically mentioned in Matthew is the cleansing of a leper.

Isaiah is now given a dreadful message. With a chastened heart he bows before the Lord Who sends him. He does not look up to the Lord and say, Yes, Lord, I will scorch them with my indignation, and with my utterance of "Woe unto them", as hitherto. No, the unspoken language of "Then said I, Lord, how long?" (vi. 11) would be more like this:--

> Lord, I will go, sad as the errand may be, but the experience I have just passed through, the revelation I have had of myself and of Thy grace, must for ever temper my words and my attitude. Wrath must come. Judgment must fall. I will speak, and not withhold, but, Lord, how long? For mercy rejoiceth against judgment.

Can we not dare to say, that if ever Isaiah drew near to the heart of the Lord and pleased Him, it was at this time?

If we once learn Isaiah's lesson, and in that holy presence realize the utter collapse of all creature effort, and the impossibility of human attainment, if we are once touched with the reality of which the live coal is but a symbol, we shall indeed walk with God, but we shall also walk with all lowliness, considering ourselves lest we also . . . . .

Those who are helped by the sequence of words will find in the three like-sounding expressions, "Woe", "Lo" and "Go" the true scriptural sequence of confession, cleansing, and commission.

#8. "Holiness" is "Wholeness".
pp. 209 - 212

By comparing the statements of I Tim. iv. with II Tim. iii., iv. we discover that the Spirit of God has most accurately foreshadowed the twofold nature of error that is seen on every hand to-day. Those who depart from the truth may be divided into two classes:--

(1) Those who have a form of godliness, but who deny the power. Those who turn away their ears from the truth and are turned unto fables (II Tim. iii., iv.).
(2) Those who are deceived, and who pursue a false system of holiness (I Tim. iv.).

It is of the second company and their particular stumbling-block that we desire to speak. It is very often the most earnest souls who are swept into this error, by their very desire after sanctification, and it is with a view to helping such, and also of "warning every man and teaching every man in all wisdom, that every man may be presented perfect", that we take up this aspect. The particular feature of I Tim. iv. to which we draw attention is the outcome of "seducing spirits and the doctrines of demons":-- > "Forbidding to marry, and commanding to abstain from meats, which God hath created to be received with thanksgiving of them which believe and know the truth" (I Tim. iv. 3).

This approaches the error that was spoiling the Colossians:--

> "Touch not; taste not; handle not; which all are to perish with the using: after the commandments and doctrines of men. Which things have indeed a shew of wisdom in will worship and humility, and neglecting of the body; not in any honour to the satisfying of the flesh" (Col. ii. 21-23).

The conception of holiness that assists this doctrine of demons is that which associates it with asceticism, austerity, neglect of the body; with the hermit, the recluse, the Anchorite. This is a distortion, and is entirely opposed to the scriptural conception of holiness. Because all men are sinners, and the flesh incapable of producing holiness, there must needs be the cross, with its mortification; there must needs be the buffeting of the body, and the denial of self. This, however, is not the essential characteristic of true holiness. God is holy. He needs no self-denial, no buffeting, no mortification. Holiness, rather, is the very self-expression of God.

The Church of the Mystery was chosen before there was any mention of sin, that it should be holy (Eph. i. 4). Before the age-times it had received a holy calling (II Tim. i. 9). True, it can never be presented "holy and unblameable and unreproveable" in the sight of God apart from the offering of the body of Christ (Col. i. 22): true, the church must be cleansed by the washing of the water by the Word, and by that offering of the Son of God Who loved the church and gave Himself for it, before it can be presented "holy and without blemish" (Eph. v. 26, 27). Sin and holiness are so opposed, that death and burial must take place before the latter is secured. Yet, holiness does not consist in death, crucifixion, burial, neglect, mortification; these have to do with the flesh and with sin that would prevent holiness.

We return, therefore, to the question as to what is holiness? In the earlier articles of this series we considered something of the underlying meaning of the Hebrew word qadesh ("sanctify"), and upon this and kindred teaching much of our doctrine on the subject is built. At the moment, however, we find the point of argument in the English word "holy". It is equivalent to the Middle English, hool, "whole", with the suffix "y", and therefore closely allied to whole. "Health" also and "to heal" are closely allied with holiness, the Anglo-Saxon hal being a common ancestor of "heal", "whole" and "holy".

The very last thing that holiness implies is neglect, loss, austerity. While certainly it is better to enter into life maimed, than to be cast into Gehenna with all one's limbs, nevertheless, holiness cannot be expressed by any set of terms that indicate a maiming or crippling, such being contrary to the root idea.

Now this is equally true of the teaching of Scripture. Holiness indicates the normal, not the abnormal. Holiness is fully attained when the believer stands in the resurrection likeness of his Lord. Holiness goes with completeness and perfection. Holiness is the full expression in perfect balance and harmony of the whole being; anything less fails of the "wholeness" that is resident in "holiness".

There are quite a number of terms used to describe salvation and its issues that contain this feature. We will draw attention to one particular before closing, and that is the association of the words: "Holy and without blemish":--

> "According as He hath chosen us in Him before the foundation of the world, that we should be holy and without blame before Him in love" (Eph. i. 4).
>
> "That He might present it to Himself a church in glory, not having spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing; but that it should be holy and without blemish" (Eph. v. 27).
>
> "In the body of His flesh through death, to present you holy and unblameable and unreproveable in His sight" (Col. i. 22).
>
> "The precious blood of Christ, as of a lamb without blemish and without spot" (I Pet. i. 19).
>
> "Who through the eternal Spirit offered Himself without spot to God" (Heb. ix. 14).
>
> "Unto Him Who is able to keep you from falling, and to present you faultless before the presence of His glory" (Jude 24).

> "In their mouth was found no lie, for they are without fault before the throne of God" (Rev. xiv. 5).

The Greek word "without blemish" is amomos, the privative a and the word momos. This Greek word is evidently closely allied with the Hebrew mum, which occurs in Lev. xxi. 17, 18, 21; xxii. 20, 21; Numb xix. 2 and II Sam. xiv. 25. These passages deal with physical perfection, and throw light upon the scriptural idea inherent in holiness. Look at the physical qualifications of the priesthood.

> "Whatsoever man he be that hath a blemish, he shall not approach; a blind man, or a lame, or he that hath a flat nose, or anything superfluous. Or a man that is brokenfooted, or brokenhanded, or crookbackt, or a dwarf, or that hath a blemish in his eye, or be scurvy, or scabbed, or hath his stones broken. No man that hath a blemish of the seed of Aaron the priest shall come nigh to offer the offerings of the Lord made by fire" (Lev. xxi. 17-21).

We must, of course, remember that this physical perfection was typical of things moral and spiritual, and we rejoice to-day to know that the blind and the lame, and the crookbackt and the dwarf may render acceptable service unto the Lord. Nevertheless, we must recognize that such are used in spite of such blemishes, and not otherwise. We cannot conceive of an angel of heaven being flat-nosed, lame, scabbed or ugly—and perfect holiness is unreached until body, soul and spirit alike attain to their full and complete expression—in other words, holiness and the resurrection likeness to the Lord are practically synonymous.

The demands of God are no less stringent when we come to the offering than when we consider the priest. Lev. xxii. 20-25 contains another list of blemishes that disqualify a sheep, ox or goat from being accepted. The verses should be read. They summed up in the words:--

> "It shall be PERFECT to be accepted: there shall be no blemish therein" (Lev. xxii. 21).

Here "perfect" (Hebrew tamin) means something "whole or complete", and suggests that further light upon the inherent meaning of holiness will be found in the study of the scriptural use of the term "perfect".

Mere physical perfection, of course, is not holiness, nor can ever approach it, the case of Absalom in II Sam. xiv. 25 being sufficient to show this. All that we intend by these references is that the reader should be made aware of the figure called to mind in the words, "Holy and without blemish", remembering that even in Ephesians we have the expression "spot, wrinkle, or any such thing". While beauty may not be holy, true holiness will always be beautiful, and the more we realize that holiness means the complete and the perfect, and not the neglected, the stunted, and the dwarfed, the more we "grow", "are strong", and approximate to the image of Christ, the nearer shall we approach to that holiness without which none shall see the Lord.

Seven precious things.

#1. The seven items found in I & II Peter.
pp. 219, 220

The epistles of Peter are addressed to the "dispersion", a term indicating the "twelve tribes scattered abroad", and there are many statements in these epistles that are true only of Israel. For example, there is no scriptural warrant for any Gentile believers to take to themselves the title: "A royal priesthood and an holy nation." When however we are clear regarding this elementary canon of interpretation, we shall find many passages in those scriptures not addressed to the Church of the One Body which nevertheless contain much that is of help, comfort and blessing to the members of that Church. For example, the callings and hopes of the two companies respectively addressed in the epistles of Peter and in the epistle to the Ephesians are very distinct, yet the redemption of both I Pet i. 18, 19 and of Eph. i. 7 are one and the same. It is not our purpose in these articles to deal with dispensational or controversial themes, but rather to seek to bring out that wherein the wearied saint may find rest and encouragement.

In the epistles of Peter we find seven precious things—a perfect number of precious things, seven jewels of great price. The seven references are as follows:--

> "That the trial of your faith being much more precious than of gold that perisheth, though it be tried with fire, might be found unto praise and honour and glory at the appearing of Jesus Christ" (I Pet. i. 7).
>
> "Ye were not redeemed with corruptible things, as silver and gold . . . . . but with the precious blood of Christ, as of a lamb without blemish and without spot" (I Pet. i. 18, 19).
>
> "A living stone, disallowed indeed of men, but chosen of God, and precious" (I Pet. ii. 4).
>
> "Behold I lay in Sion a chief stone, elect, precious: and he that believeth on Him shall not be confounded" (I Pet. ii. 6).
>
> "Unto you therefore which believe He is precious" (I Pet. ii. 7).
>
> "To them that have obtained like precious faith with us" (II Pet. i. 1).
>
> "Exceeding great and precious promises" (II Pet. i. 4).

The word of God is likened to an ornament in such passages in Proverbs as the following:--

> "For they shall be an ornament of grace unto thy head, and chains about thy neck" (Prov. i. 9).
>
> "She shall give to thine head an ornament of grace: a crown of glory shall she deliver to thee" (Prov. iv. 9).
>
> "As an ear-ring of gold, and an ornament of fine gold; so is a wise reprover upon an obedient ear" (Prov. xxv. 12).

These seven precious things of Peter form an ornament of grace set with seven precious stones.

The first jewel in the series is more precious than gold, and it is not so much faith itself that is in view as its trial and its proving. This jewel may well be a crystal, the crystallized tears of those who have suffered for their faith.

The second jewel is indeed one in which suffering predominates: it is "the precious blood of Christ." This jewel also is infinitely above such corruptible things as silver and gold.

The next two references are to the living stone of God's election and of man's reprobation, teaching us that "preciousness" depends largely upon the point of view—God's or man's.

The fifth jewel in this ornament of grace is the Lord Himself: "He is precious" in Himself, but His preciousness is apparent only to the believer. Others see no beauty in Him that they should desire Him.

The sixth jewel speaks of faith itself—"like precious faith". Faith therefore can be "common" because shared or possessed by many, and yet precious, unlike so many precious things that are esteemed in the world largely because of their rarity.

The last jewel of the series refers to the great and precious promises of God.

This string of gems is as much our possession as it is that of the dispersion who believe, and we trust that our meditation together upon these precious things may indeed augment for us all the joy of faith.

A review, and sign of the times.

The "blessed hope" of Science.
p. 40

Extract from News and Chronicle of 2nd November, 1931.

"When the earth dies.

Life after death was the theme of the All Saints' Day sermon at the Chapel Royal, St. Jame's, by the bishop of Birmingham (Dr. Barnes) yesterday.

'So long as the earth was deemed central and unique in the cosmos, with man specially created to place upon it, by the direct action of God some six thousand years ago', he said, 'the fact of a future life is not only credible but natural. But with our recent enlargements of knowledge doubts and difficulties have become many'.

On this earth life would flicker out when the solar heat passed away, but in some other realm, he was forced to assume, all that was of value in his personality would endure."

Date of Exodus.
p. 80

From The News Chronicle of January, 1932.
"Princess who found the infant Moses."

"The tombs of the Kings of Jericho found by Professor John Garstang, director of the Marston Archaeological Expedition, contain pottery and Egyptian scarabs which will definitely settle the date of the Exodus, and will help to place beyond dispute the chronology of the Old Testament.

Sir Charles Marston, who has received a report of the discovery, said yesterday:

'One tomb is dated as of the joint reign of Hatasu and Thotmes III, and this is of exceptional interest in fixing the date of the Exodus. Hatasu was the most masterful princess in Egyptian history, and it is extremely probable that it was she who discovered the baby Moses among the bulrushes. The Bible dates coincide'."

The walls of Jericho.
p. 120

From the "Daily Telegraph" of 4th April, 1932.

"How the walls of Jericho fell to the trumpets of JOSHUA has been discovered, Sir CHARLES MARSTON tells us, by the last excavations. Earlier and rather conjectural skepticism had instructed us that the narrative in the Old Testament was rhetoric and metaphor. 'The wall fell down flat', one orthodox modern commentary interprets, 'is merely literary hyperbole'. But Professor GARSTANG's excavations show that the wall did actually fall down, and fell outwards in the manner most convenient for a besieging force to enter the city. The cause of the collapse was indeed not the march of the Hebrew host, or its trumpet peals, but an earthquake.

If this is confirmed, the picturesque Biblical narrative will be closer to the fact than the corrections of critical scholarship. The general accuracy of the tribal traditions on which the early books of the Old Testament are based is indeed to be expected, and the process of interpreting it by subtracting all that does not seem sufficiently probable to a twentieth-century mind is not likely to be invariably valid."

"This God is our God."

#1. The being of God.
"I am" (Exod. iii. 14): "He is" (Heb. xi. 6).
pp. 151 - 154

While it must ever be the aim of any Christian ministry to preserve a balance of truth, it is not possible for any one human witness so to present the truth that there shall not, at times, be given the impression of undue emphasis upon some one particular doctrine. In fact, the circumstances associated with a witness may call for insistence upon some one feature to the practical exclusion of much else that is profitable. We could enumerate quite a number of useful organs that give voice to some one particular doctrine or group of doctrines—one stand for the inspirations of Scripture, another for the exposition of prophecy, a third for the purity of Protestanism; and we might continue the list at considerable length.

The Berean Expositor is primarily a witness for the truth of the mystery, and that being so, the prison epistles of the apostle Paul, and related themes, must always hold the first place. It is, however, our desire, as indeed it has been our practice from the first Volume, to give as full a presentation of truth as our space will permit, and a glance at our indices is a sufficient rejoinder to the unjust charge that four epistles constitute our Bible.

Underlying the whole revelation of Scripture, the obvious or hidden reason for all doctrine, and the goal of all prophecy, is the knowledge of God Himself. At bottom, sin is an ignoring or an ignorance of God, a denial of God, a substitution of something else for Him. If we meditate upon the purpose of redemption, the basis of righteousness or sanctification, the glory of heaven, the blessedness of hope, we shall be led at length to see that the knowledge of God Himself and love to Him lie close to the heart of them all, and that every line of truth in Scripture converges upon the statement: "That God may be all in all." We propose, therefore, to prosecute a series of studies that shall enable us to repeat, with meaning, the words of the Psalmist: "This God is our God" (Psa. xlviii. 14).

Into the metaphysical side of such a study, we do not propose to enter, except that we draw attention to the importance of estimating the magnitude of the subject, and, correspondingly, our own limitations. If a finite creature could, in the full sense of the word, really "know" God, then God would cease to be "infinite", and not the God of Scripture. All knowledge of God, however received, whether through the dim light of nature, the brighter light of Scripture, or in the Person of Christ, must be relative and conditioned. We cannot know God at all unless He reveals Himself, and unless in that revelation He condescends to our low estate, and speaks in human terms. So far as the nature and attributes of God are concerned, we must remember that the whole of language is symbolic, and that in every utterance concerning Himself, the revelation is limited by the necessity of using human forms of thought. Perhaps some reader may, at this point, object that we are wasting time in speaking of metaphysics at all—if the Scripture reveals all that we can apprehend of the infinite and eternal God, surely this is sufficient for our needs, and the metaphysics may well be left alone. With the attitude of our critic we are in complete agreement; and if we were never tempted to pursue lines of teaching beyond scriptural limits, nothing more need be said. But the question is an important one, because whole systems of theology are built up upon what it is conceived God will do, or should do, or even must do. Such arguments assume a knowledge of God that lies outside the scope of revelation.

We may remind ourselves of the question of Zophar, the Naamathite:--

> "Canst thou by searching find out God? Canst thou find out the Almighty unto perfection?" (Job xi. 7).

The answer to both questions must be negative. We cannot find out God by searching. We are shut up to revelation, and know nothing, absolutely nothing, apart from that source; and what we do know, however penetrating our perceptions or large our faith, will never "find out the Almighty unto perfection"—we shall still only "know in part". Yet we must by no means allow these limitations to damp our enthusiasm or quench our eagerness, for Scripture itself urges us to pray that we may get to know something that in reality transcends our knowledge—the love of Christ (Eph. iii. 19). Such a statement involves neither contradiction, nor impossibility.
