Alphabetical listing of the articles in The Berean Expositor Volumes 1 to 56 1909 — 1992

Explanations

Each exposition has been given a volume number in bold type and a page number. 07.049 signifies volume 7 page 49. The zeros have been added for computational reasons.

Volume 3.

There are no references to volume 3. All the articles in volume 3 are listed under volume 2 because it appears that when vols. 2 and 3 were reprinted as a single binding in 1926 all the expositions were grouped together as pages 1 to 156. The presently available combined book, printed in 1966, contains volumes 1 to 3, and vols. 2 and 3 are again treated as pages 1 to 156.

Volumes 4 and 5.

There are no references to volume 5, they are all listed under volume 4.

The original binding of volume 5 was numbered pages 1 to 96. When volumes 4 and 5 were combined, volume 5 occupied pages 107 to 186, the articles having been put together and re-numbered.

References are made in later volumes to articles in volumes 4 and 5 on page numbers which are now incorrect for the current re-prints.

Here are some examples:

Vol. 11, p. 50 line 28	Vol. 3, page 42	Vol. 2/3, page 93

Volume 6

Volume 6 was re-printed in volumes 25 and 26. Articles in volume 6 are therefore also shown as occurring in either volume 25 or 26 as well as volume 6. This is indicated by the bold volume numbers 25.06 and 26.06.

Will any reader who spots a mistake or anomaly please let us know.

THE ABRAHAM COVENANT

As set forth in the Epistle to the Romans

The dispensational position before Acts xxviii.

In our last article we endeavoured to show that the setting aside of Israel as a nation completely altered the dispensational dealings of the Lord. We will now seek to show that prior to the revelation of the mystery hid in God, the blessing upon the Gentiles as well as the Jews was Abrahamic and millennial in character, and that Gentile believers were blessed through Israel or not at all.

The Epistle to the Romans, while containing doctrine as true to-day as when first written, contains also dispensational teaching which has passed away with the pentecostal period. The following list will give some idea as to the prominent position which the Jew occupied before Acts xxviii as compared with the epistles written afterwards:--

Word.	Before ACTS xxviii.	After ACTS xxviii.
	No. of Occurrences.	No. of Occurrences.
Jew.	25	1 "Neither Greek nor Jew" (Col. iii. 11).
Israel.	14	2 (Eph. ii. 12 & Phil. iii. 5).
Israelite.	3	-
Abraham.	19	-
Total.	61	3

When it is observed that the three occurrences are all negative statements, referring back to the past, the contrast will be more clearly seen than ever.

"To the Jew first" (Rom. i. 16; ii. 10).

The use of this expression in Rom. ii. 10 shows that it is not merely stating the historical order of preaching, but shows us the place of precedence assigned to the Jew. This is characteristic of the millennial kingdom, as a reference to Isa. lx. and lxi, Zech. viii. 23, xiv. 12-21, etc., will show. So long as Israel was a people and Jerusalem their city, so long they retained the covenant position, and saved Gentiles came up to Jerusalem to worship, and were linked with the believing remnant by baptism as the channel of their blessing.

Eph.	2	12	That at that time ye were without Christ, being aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, and strangers from the covenants of promise, having no hope, and without God in the world:
Phil.	3	5	Circumcised the eighth day, of the stock of Israel, of the tribe of Benjamin, an Hebrew of the Hebrews; as touching the law, a Pharisee;

Rom. iii. 1 anticipates an objection arising out of the very fact of this Jewish pre-eminence. "If what you say is true, where is the hitherto recognised pre-eminence and profit of the Jew and circumcision?" The answer is, "Much every way." But in verse 9, when the Jew would make his dispensational privilege a ground of merit, when he asks, "Are we better than they?" the answer is, "No, in no wise." Dispensational privileges did not alter the Jew personally, and when we come to consider Rom. ix. we shall see that to be deprived of them does not alter one's standing in Christ. "Is He the God of the Jews only?" (Rom. iii. 29) goes to show the strong Jewish element even in the church at Rome.

Rom. ix.-xi. deal more particularly with the dispensation obtaining from Acts ii.-xxviii. The Jewish objection of iii. 3 recurs again in ix. 6. The objection of iii. 29 is again met in ix. 24. Chapter x. 21 shows the attitude of the Lord during the period of "Acts," which culminated in their rejection, and the destruction of their city.

We now arrive at Romans ix. This chapter has been very sadly misunderstood, and to understand it is, in large measure, to understand the peculiar dispensation that covered the period of the "Acts." Expositors who have been clear about the subject of the "mystery," have felt a difficulty with regard to this chapter, because they assumed that the dispensational position of Romans (which was before Acts xxviii.) was the same as that of Ephesians (which came after Acts xxviii.).

The figure of the olive tree, and the Gentiles as wild olive branches, is certainly not the same as the "one body." To avoid apparent contradiction, the passage has been interpreted of the Gentiles as such, whereas it but states the same truth as Gal. iii., namely, that believing Gentiles up to Acts xxviii. were blessed with faithful Abraham—the father of many nations. The remnant of Israel, saved from apostasy by electing grace, formed the olive tree into which the believing Gentiles were grafted. This remnant is called the "first-fruit" (verse 16), a pledge of the harvest of "all Israel" of verse 26. The Gentiles addressed are said to have received "salvation" (v. 11), "stand by faith" (v. 20), and to partake with saved remnant "of the root and fatness of the olive tree" (v. 17).

We feel sure that no Bible student who understands grace will say that the Pagan world, the Gentiles as such, did then or do now "stand by faith," or enter into any of the blessings set forth in Rom. ix. The apostle further calls the Gentile addressees Brethren (verse 25). If we once perceive that Abrahamic blessing, and kingdom anticipations, were the characteristics of the period covered by the Acts (as they will be once again when the kingdom is set up on earth) no difficulty will remain, and the transitional portions of Romans, Galatians and Corinthians will be better understood.

Rom.	3	1	What advantage then hath the Jew? or what profit is there of circumcision?

Rom.	3	3	For what if some did not believe? shall their unbelief make the faith of God without effect?
	9	6	Not as though the word of God hath taken none effect. For they are not all Israel, which are of Israel:
	3	29	Is he the God of the Jews only? is he not also of the Gentiles? Yes, of the Gentiles also:
	9	24	Even us, whom he hath called, not of the Jews only, but also of the Gentiles?

We must not read into Romans ix. that which had not then been revealed, namely, the "one body" of Ephesians. Some have a difficulty with verses 21 and 22, because they feel that if this passage refers to saved Gentiles it contradicts such a passage as Rom. viii. To be clear as to this point it must be remembered that dispensational privileges must be distinguished from personal standing. With regard to the former—they may be lost; with regard to the latter—they are indefectible. A comparison of Rom. ix. with Gal. iii. will be helpful just here. The "gospel" was never a "mystery hidden away from the ages and generations," but was preached before unto Abraham; we must beware of confounding the gospel with the mystery.

> "Blessed with faithful Abraham" (Gal. iii. 9).
> "That the blessing of Abraham might come on the Gentiles" (Gal. iii. 14) (the same as Rom. ix.).
> "If ye are Christ's then are ye Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise" (Gal. iii. 29).
> "Jerusalem which is above is free, which is the mother of us all" (Gal. iv. 26).

The new Jerusalem was a part of Abrahamic blessing, certainly of Abraham's faith (see Heb. ix. 14-16). After Acts xxviii., instead of a heavenly city which comes down from heaven, we have "heavenly places in Christ," and the "citizenship which is in heaven" (Eph. i. 3 and Phil. iii. 20, Greek). We hope (D.V.) in our next issue to consider the teaching of the pentecostal dispensation as to the second coming of Christ; meanwhile, may writer and reader alike seek grace in understanding the Word of truth.

Summarizing, we have found:--

1. Acts xxviii. is the great boundary between the present dispensation and the past.
2. Those epistles written before Acts xxviii., while containing much doctrinal teaching which remains truth for to-day, also contain much that is transitional, and much that belongs to a dispensation which has passed away.
3. That dispensation was Abrahamic and not that of the one body, as has been hitherto so generally supposed.

Zech.	8	23	Thus saith the Lord of hosts; In those days it shall come to pass, that ten men shall take hold out of all languages of the nations, even shall take hold of the skirt of him that is a Jew, saying, We will go with you: for we have heard that God is with you.

Acts xxviii. 17-31
Its bearing upon the present dispensation.
An introductory study to prepare the way for future expositions on vital dispensational subjects.

Many and varied as the numerous attempts after "Unity" may be, there are some things which they all seem to have in common, namely, they go to the Gospels and Acts for their doctrinal and ecclesiastical arguments, emphasize the ordinances of Baptism and the Lord's Supper, and either imagine they possess, or else desire to possess, "spiritual gifts". We believer that such are labouring under a false interpretation. Just as a stick appears bent in the water, so our understanding of Scripture will be distorted whilst we ignore the differing medium. In other words, if we stand in the dispensation of the mystery, and try to act as though we were in the dispensation of the kingdom, we shall in "that day", if not here, be ashamed, through not rightly dividing the Word of truth.

The careful reader of Scripture can hardly fail to have seen the tremendous influence which the people of Israel have had during their history upon the dealings of God with surrounding nations. The histories of Egypt, Assyria, Moab, of Rahab the harlot, of Ruth, etc., etc., are recorded just so far as they touch this wonderful nation. The Lord blesses or judges particularly with reference to their attitude towards His people. He even "set bounds of the nations according to the number of the children of Israel" (Deut. xxxii. 8). If we might put it tersely, we would say that history is recorded so long as Israel are recognized as a nation, but mystery obtains when Israel become "Lo-Ammi – not My people".

The times of the Gentiles could not begin until captivity had taken practically the twelve tribes out of the land. The unrecorded interval of the present time between sixty-ninth and seventieth seven of Dan. ix. is a case in point (see also Isa. lxi. 1, 2, with Luke iv 18-20 and Rev. v.). We forbear to give further instances of this well-known subject, but now pass on from the general to the particular – the bearing which Israel's national position has upon the present dispensation and preaching of the mystery.

Between the prophecy of Malachi and the so-called New Testament is an interval of several hundred years, unbroken by the voice of revelation. It has been too easily assumed that Malachi finishes the Old Testament, and the Gospels commence the New.* If we will give a moment's thought we shall see that the people addressed in Matthew are the same as those in Malachi (i.e. they are their descendants), the same land, city, temple, law, and character, the great mass being superficial, and a few waiting for the consolation of Israel, and thinking on His name; the great and marvellous difference being this, that whereas Malachi says that Christ the Messiah shall come, Matthew shows us that the Messiah has come. The Lord Jesus in the two-fold capacity of Son of Abraham and Son of David walks their streets, heralds the good news of the kingdom, is rejected and crucified, to be seen no more by the nation of Israel until they "look upon Him whom they pierced." The gospel of the kingdom had good news not only for Israel but for the Gentiles, for David's greater Son was also the Seed in whom all nations should be blessed.

Rom. xv. 8, 9 should be here noticed. "Now I say that Jesus Christ was a minister of the circumcision for the truth of God, to confirm the promises made unto the fathers: and that the Gentiles might glorify God for His mercy", etc. Then follow passages which, strictly speaking, are millennial, and will not be fulfilled until the kingdom comes. In full accord with Rom. xv. 8 is Matt. x. 5-15, "Go not into the way of the Gentiles. . . . but go rather to the lost sheep of the house of Israel". The gospel of the kingdom was refused, as was the King, and the "Go not" is altered to the "Go ye, disciple all nations" of Matt. xxviii. This opened the door of mercy to the Gentiles, as is shown in the Acts, where the kingdom is once more proclaimed, and the "uttermost parts of the earth" are taken into its scope.

The Gospels really are a continuation of the Old Testament, with this difference, "God, Who at sundry times and in divers manners spake in time past unto the fathers by the prophets, hath in these last days spoken unto us in His Son" (Heb. i. 1, 2). The King long prophesied was present. Alas! Israel, like all of Adam's race, needed a Saviour from sin before they could appreciate a kingdom of righteousness, and consequently we read in Matt. xii. 6, 41, 42, that they reject the Lord of glory though greater than any temple, prophet or king. In verses 43-45 the Lord Jesus gives a prophetic picture of Israel's apostasy and end; in verses 46-50 He disconnects Himself from fleshly ties; and to the faithful remnant in Matt. xiii., He for the first time opens up the mystery of the kingdom of the heavens.

The history of Israel virtually finished when they rejected Christ and mystery began, but this was not made open and public until long after when the apostle Paul in Acts xxviii. 26, 27 quoted the same verse openly that the Saviour had spoken privately to His disciples, namely, Isa. vi. 10, and just as Christ then commenced to unfold the mysteries of the kingdom of the heavens, so Paul was enabled to commence the unfolding of a mystery--not the mystery of the kingdom, but the mystery of the one body—the truth for the present time.

Israel, the destined channel of blessing, had for the time failed, and it seems that the apostle Paul in a sense was raised up to do in small measure that which Israel will yet do in fulness when the kingdom comes. The conversion of Saul of Tarsus by the descent of the Son of God is a close parallel to the conversion of Israel "in that day", as recorded in Zech. xii. 10-14. He speaks of himself as being one born out of due time, and in I Tim. i. 16 he speaks of himself and his conversion as a type of those who shall hereafter believe, the word "hereafter" being often used in connection with the kingdom. In Rom. xi. 1 his argument is, I am saved; I am an Israelite; I am a type and a pledge, not only of a remnant then, but of "all Israel' in that day. Isa. lxi. 6 tells us that Israel shall be named "Priests of the Lord", and Paul, in describing his ministry in Rom. xv. 16, speaks of it in connection with the Gentiles, "that the offering up of the Gentiles might be acceptable." A change, however, comes over the apostle's ministry, which was the prelude of the new order of things consequent upon the setting aside of Israel and kingdom things for the time. The first step toward this change is recorded in Acts xix. 8, 9. This is the last synagogue witness, and is followed by the apostle "separating the disciples" and gathering them together, as a distinct company from the synagogue, in the school of one Tyrannus.

"To the Jew first" had been the order (see Rom. i. 16), but that order was to give place. "To the Jew first" is not the order for the time present, neither is it an interpretation of the verse to make it an argument for Jewish missionary work. Jews to-day are saved as sinners, just as the Gentiles, with no respect to any special Messianic or national privileges. Acts xx. shows us that bonds and afflictions awaited the apostle at Jerusalem, the Ephesian saints should see his face no more. Some say the apostle was self-willed and obstinate, and went up to Jerusalem against the will of the Lord—we reserved any comment until we are able to give an article on the subject of Apostolic Mistakes! in some future issue. In Acts xx. 17-27 the apostle looks back upon a past ministry and forward to a future one. The past he summarizes as "testifying both to the Jews, and also to the Greeks, repentance toward God, and faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ", practically the same ministry as that of John the Baptist and Peter. His future ministry he introduce with a "but now", just as he shows the abeyance of the kingdom in Heb. ii. 8. This new ministry is connected with "bonds and afflictions," and it is noteworthy that the three great epistles of the mystery written after Acts xxviii. 26-28 refer, each of them, to the fact that the apostle was a prisoner, a prisoner of the Lord, a prisoner for the Gentiles, a prisoner for the gospel. He further describes this future witness in verse 24, "To testify the gospel of the grace of God".

The apostle now sets out for Jerusalem, and eventually we find him in peril of his life. Now begins a fresh experience. He is about to enter experimentally into the particular phase of truth delivered to him comprised in the words, "with Christ." Like his Lord, he is taken before rulers and priests, false witnesses are summoned, his enemies cry out, "Away with him!" He embarks for Rome—a prisoner. The terrible shipwreck teaches him yet more of the "fellowship of His sufferings." The hiding of sun and stars makes us think of the darkness of Calvary, the condition of salvation to all on the ship being also typical (all with Paul, and altogether as one company); the breaking up of the hinder part of the ship speaks of the bruising of the heel of Christ; the viper, powerless and conquered, like the vanquished serpent—the devil; the healing which took place upon the island, all these speak volumes, and when Paul at length reaches Rome death and resurrection fellowship with Christ has been wonderfully typified; between him and Jerusalem lies that experience, henceforth till the Lord Jesus come and the kingdom be set up Jerusalem passes from view, and with it Israel and all its influence.

The contrast between the two inspired statements of Acts xxviii. 23 & 31 is most instructive:--

> TO THE JEWS.–"To whom he expounded and testified the kingdom of God, persuading them concerning Jesus, both out of the law of Moses and the prophets."
> TO THE GENTILES AND ALL WHO CAME TO HIM.—"Preaching the kingdom of God, and teaching those things which concern the Lord Jesus Christ."

The contrast is sharp and clear. To the Jews it is "Jesus"; to the Gentiles it is "Lord Jesus Christ"—the title of the epistles to the churches. To the Jews it is Messianic witness, "out of the law and prophets"; to the Gentiles it is not so stated. Other passages show that the apostle was directly taught the mystery by the Lord Himself—it was a revelation. Some deny the difference so patent here, but it is a quarrel not with us but with the Holy Ghost. Christ in resurrection, not as King, but as Lord and Head of the one body is now the theme. We may feel quite sure that the apostle would go over the blessed truths which he penned in Ephesians, Philippians and Colossians to those who came to his own hired house. In Eph. vi. 19 he asked them to pray for him that he might have boldness to make known the mystery of the gospel for which he was an "ambassador in bonds." The word "confidence" in Acts xxviii. 31 is the same as the word "boldly" in Eph. vi. 19, and shows how the prayer was answered, if the "two whole years" have any significance they would suggest the period of Israel's setting aside, as in Hosea vi. 2, 3, during which the Gentiles are the particular objects of the dispensational favours of God.

The concluding verses of Acts xxviii. form the great dividing line between the epistles of the mystery and the epistles that include the remnant of Israel and kingdom hopes and accompaniments. At the moment when Paul quoted Isa. vi. 10, the period of the church's "babyhood" finished, and the "perfect man" standard was proclaimed. These subjects we hope to deal separately, and we would ask our readers to reserve their judgment until they have the opportunity of taking our statements to the Word of truth, and seeing "whether these things are so."

The epistles written before the Roman imprisonment are 1 and 2 Thessalonians, 1 and 2 Corinthians, Galatians, Hebrews and Romans. After the imprisonment—Ephesians, Philippians, Colossians, 1 and 2 Timothy, Titus, and Philemon. It is of the utmost importance to see the difference that exists in these two sets of epistles. In the early ones, Israel as a nation has its influence, millennial prefigurings abound, and, humanly speaking, Israel's national repentance might bring the kingdom, and with it the Saviour, even in the very lifetime of those to whom the apostle wrote. After Acts xxviii. this was not the case. There was no Israel. The kingdom was entirely in abeyance, Jerusalem was destroyed. The Gentiles, as such, were aliens to the commonwealth of Israel, strangers to the covenants of promise, and hence if the Lord had any gospel for them it must be a gospel of sovereign grace indeed. This forms the basis of the first epistle of the mystery—Ephesians.

The dispensations that have passed have never ended abruptly, but a certain overlapping has taken place. The Acts of the Apostles is the history of this transition, and the epistles written before Acts xxviii. have much that is transitional in them. It is with the view of opening up these subjects that these introductory statements have been necessary. We are fully aware that writers abler than ourselves have given expression to similar things, but having now laid the foundation we hope to go forward in this wonderful field of research, and we go forward alone, so far as any human aid is concerned. Others have felt that which we feel, others have expressed a belief as to the "possibility" of some of these things, but we believe the time has come for a witness to the first lost truths to begin to be sounded. As time goes on, the Lord willing, we shall take up the subject of "The transitional parts of Romans, etc.," "The gifts of the Spirit," "The purpose of Hebrews," "Hebrews vi.," "The unity of the Spirit," "Christendom," and related subjects.

We conclude this introductory article by summarizing:--

1. Israel have always had, and will yet have, the chief place in the dispensational dealings of God, and the prophetic parts of the Old Testament are entirely connected with their national existence.
2. The great dividing line must be looked for not at Matt. i., nor Acts ii., but where Israel as a nation ceases.
3. That dividing line is clearly drawn at Acts xxviii.
4. I, as a saved Gentile, have nothing to do with the Mosaic law, as such; to this most Christians will agree. Neither may I step over the boundary line drawn by the Holy Ghost in Acts xxviii. without causing hopeless confusion, and failure to appreciate the particular blessings and responsibilities that are mine in this dispensation; to this very few will agree.

We would earnestly ask our readers to search the Scriptures and "see whether these things are so," also to search out their own arguments for their peculiar ecclesiastical or dispensational beliefs, and find whether much has not been brought over from the closing period of a past dispensation.

We have called this magazine "The Berean Expositor" because we desire our readers to be as noble as the Bereans who:

1. Received the Word with all readiness of mind, and
2. Searched the Scriptures daily, to see
3. Whether those things were so (Acts xvii. 11).

We have called it "The Berean Expositor" because our desire is to open up the Word—"to expose" for our joy, instruction, correction, and edification its wondrous teaching to the glory of the Lord. We shall (D.V.) in each issue have two subjects: 1. Dispensational. 2. Doctrinal. Whether the magazine is strictly "quarterly" will depend, humanly speaking, upon the funds, for we shall not issue No.2 until we have sufficient to pay for it. We shall not print poetry or extracts from other journals, but endeavour to keep strictly to our title. "Brethren, pray for us."

Dan.	9	24	Seventy weeks are determined upon thy people and upon thy holy city, to finish the transgression, and to make an end of sins, and to make reconciliation for iniquity, and to bring in everlasting righteousness, and to seal up the vision and prophecy, and to anoint the most Holy.
		25	Know therefore and understand, that from the going forth of the commandment to restore and to build Jerusalem unto the Messiah the Prince shall be seven weeks, and threescore and two weeks: the street shall be built again, and the wall, even in troublous times.
		26	And after threescore and two weeks shall Messiah be cut off, but not for himself: and the people of the prince that shall come shall destroy the city and the sanctuary; and the end thereof shall be with a flood, and unto the end of the war desolations are determined.
		27	And he shall confirm the covenant with many for one week: and in the midst of the week he shall cause the sacrifice and the oblation to cease, and for the overspreading of abominations he shall make it desolate, even until the consummation, and that determined shall be poured upon the desolate.
Isaiah	61	1	The Spirit of the Lord God is upon me; because the Lord hath anointed me to preach good tidings unto the meek; he hath sent me to bind up the brokenhearted, to proclaim liberty to the captives, and the opening of the prison to them that are bound;
		2	To proclaim the acceptable year of the Lord, and the day of vengeance of our God; to comfort all that mourn;
Luke	4	18	The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he hath anointed me to preach the gospel to the poor; he hath sent me to heal the brokenhearted, to preach deliverance to the captives, and recovering of sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that are bruised,
		19	To preach the acceptable year of the Lord.
		20	And he closed the book, and he gave it again to the minister, and sat down. And the eyes of all them that were in the synagogue were fastened on him.
Hos.	6	2	After two days will he revive us: in the third day he will raise us up, and we shall live in his sight.
		3	Then shall we know, if we follow on to know the Lord: his going forth is prepared as the morning; and he shall come unto us as the rain, as the latter and former rain unto the earth.
Isaiah	6	10	Make the heart of this people fat, and make their ears heavy, and shut their eyes; lest they see with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and understand with their heart, and convert, and be healed.

Babes or Full-grown.

A comparison of I Cor. iii. with Heb. v. and vi. and their bearing upon the subject of the mystery.

pp. 29-35

To those who have followed the articles in this magazine hitherto we very earnestly commend the present to their prayerful consideration. The majority of us have been far more zealous for the "traditions of the elders" than for the truth of God, and it is a mercy that we have not been left to follow our blind guides into the ditch of legality and bondage. Our object in writing these articles is to seek to stir up the Lord's people to imitate the Bereans, who "searched the Scriptures daily (to see) whether these things were so." Some fellow-Christians have called us hard names (over that we do not worry), but it would have been far more in harmony with the "mind that was in Christ Jesus" to have pointed out to us where they thought we departed from the truth "as it hath been written."

Many have been displeased upon reading that Acts ii. was not the beginning of the present dispensation, still more when we dared to question the scripturalness of applying I Cor. xii., with its "spiritual gifts," to ourselves. We desire to show, as the Lord shall enable us, something of the glory of the grace that has been reserved for us the most unworthy, reserved until the people of Israel, both in the land and among the dispersion, evidence to the full that they were blind of eyes, dull of hearing, and hard of heart, as set forth in the closing words of Acts xxviii. and Matt. xiii. 13-15.

Not till after Acts xxviii. did the apostle receive the divine warrant for committing to writing the teaching of the mystery (or secret) as revealed in the Epistle to the Ephesians. Although the apostle did not publicly preach the mystery of the one body, nor put it into writing before the close of Acts xxviii., we believe that he did know of it himself, and did communicate some of its blessed teaching to the more spiritual ones with whom he from time to time had fellowship. I Cor. ii. 7 seems fairly clear as to this, "The wisdom of God in a mystery, the hidden wisdom which God ordained before the world unto our glory." The expression "before the world" is peculiar to the great secret. Eph. i. 4 and II Tim. i. 9, etc., speak of a purpose "before the world," whereas Matt. xxv. 34, and other passages which speak of the kingdom, use the term "from the foundation," or "since the foundation of the world."

Eph. iii. 1-9 and Col. i. 24-27 speak of the mystery being "hid." Let us turn to I Cor. ii. and iii. In ii. 1 the apostle shows how he followed out the teaching of chapter i. 31:--

> "He that glorieth, let him glory in the Lord: and I, brethren, when I came to you, came not with excellency of speech, or of wisdom, declaring unto you the testimony of God."

Verse 1 reveals his manner, verse 2 his message, "Christ crucified." A gospel without the atonement is no gospel at all. The cross gives its title to the gospel, "The preaching of the cross. . . . the power of God" (I Cor. i. 18). "We preach Christ crucified. . . . the power of God, and the wisdom of God" (verses 23 and 24). It was thus that Paul preached that their "faith should not stand in the wisdom of men, but in the power of God" (ii. 5).

The Corinthian Christians believed this blessed truth, and were saved. Yet the apostle says that they were "carnal," that only a few could get beyond "Christ crucified," and grasp the wonders of "Christ risen." They knew the power of the cross unto salvation, but they could not go further into the "hidden wisdom" connected with the risen Lord. If we read verses 2 and 6 together, we shall get the same teaching in clearer form. "For I determined to know nothing among you, save Jesus Christ and Him crucified." "Howbeit, we speak wisdom among them that are perfect."

The church at Corinth was ready for the setting up of the kingdom. The gospel preached before unto Abraham had been received; miraculous gifts abounded; the Lord's supper was prominent in its anticipation of the marriage supper of the Lamb. In I Cor. x. we have the camp and "our fathers" (see Hebrews). Chapter x. 2 affords a parallel with the two baptisms of pentecostal times. Baptism in water and cloud unto Moses typified the baptism in water and spirit unto Christ, waiting to enter the promised land and take the kingdom. The question of I Cor. x. 18, "Behold Israel after the flesh: are not they which eat of the sacrifices partakers of the altar?" is echoed in Heb. xiii. 10, "We have an altar, whereof they have no right to eat which serve the tabernacle." Failure to recognized that the kingdom is "not yet" means failure to "go outside the camp."

The teaching of Heb. xiii. 7-9 should be carefully studied in conjunction with Eph. iv. 13, 14. In the one case the "end of the conversation" of the elders is "Jesus Christ, the same yesterday, and to-day, and for ever," the result being "not carried about with divers and strange doctrines." In Eph. iv. the gifts of pastors and teachers, etc., were given:--

> "Till we all come into the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ, that we be no more children, tossed to and fro, and carried about with every wind of doctrine."

In both cases stability in the believer is connected with the fulness and perfectness of the Lord. Those who are carried about are "babes" (nepios), and we shall see presently that this was the character of the Corinthian and Hebrew saints in connection with their inability to receive the teaching of the mystery. Rightly understood, Hebrews is a link between the epistles to the Corinthians and to the Ephesians, written after the kingdom had been set aside, exhorting them to leave the things of the kingdom and go outside the camp unto Christ, to be numbered perchance among the members of His body.

We will now endeavour, as grace is given, to show the wonderful parallel which exists between I Cor. iii. and Heb. v. and vi. To whom did the apostle communicate the mystery in I Cor. ii.? To the "perfect," the full-grown Christian. In chapter iii. he writes:--

> "And I, brethren, could not speak unto you as unto spiritual, but as unto carnal, as unto babes in Christ. I have fed you with milk and not with meat. For hitherto ye were not able to bear it, neither yet now are ye able. For ye are yet carnal; for whereas there is among you envying, and strife, and divisions, are ye not carnal, and walk according to man? For while one saith, I am of Paul; and another, I am of Apollos; are ye not carnal?"

This thought is in ii. 10-14. It is quite true that the unsaved cannot understand the things of the Spirit (we are told so in i. 23—"to the Greeks foolishness"), but the sad part is that many of the Lord's people approximate to the unsaved in their attitude toward anything beyond what they are pleased to call "the simple gospel!" for in ii. 14 such things are said to be foolishness to the natural man. By looking at verse 13, which correctly translated reads, "Explaining (or declaring) to spiritual ones (i.e. spiritual believers), spiritual things," we see that the Corinthian believers placed themselves on the level of the "natural" man, and had to be addressed as unto carnal, and not as unto spiritual. The "milk," or "Christ crucified," was all they could receive, the "meat" which they could not relish or digest was the preparatory teaching to the great mystery concerning Christ and His church. This could only be presented, at the time of writing, to those who were perfect or full grown.

The apostle goes on in chapter iii. to show how the forgetting of Christ, and the magnifying of His ministers, was a clear symptom of their failure. It is still the same to-day. Men fight over their denominations, they make little gods of their leaders, they lose sight of Christ in their zeal for ordinances of eating, drinking, and doing, and they are so consumed with eagerness to form their conceptions of unity, that the risen Lord, without whom unity is a farce, is neglected and forgotten.

I Cor. iii. 10, 11 brings us to the one foundation, and bids us give heed as to how we build thereon, for everything except the temple of God which is "God's building" will be destroyed. We know personally many saints, and are quite sure that they are building upon the true foundation, but we are also equally sure that they are building that which God has thrown down, and consequently, through their failure to "rightly divide the Word of truth," they will have need to be "ashamed," as workmen who have neglected the plans and instructions of the Great Architect. The writer knows from personal experience a meeting where for fifteen months the message for the Sunday morning was an exposition of the Sermon on the Mount! Would that such zeal could be directed to "know what is the hope of His calling, and what the riches of the glory of His inheritance in the holiest."

Let us now turn to Hebrews v. and vi. Here we meet with a similar state of affairs to that at Corinth. The Hebrew believers were not magnifying Paul, Apollos, or Cephas, but were magnifying angels, Moses, their fathers, their temple, their ritual, their priesthood, and their sacrifices, and the result was equally disastrous, for just as the carnality of the Corinthians rendered them unable to understand the deep things of God, so with the Hebrews.

The predominant note of Hebrews is that "in all things HE might have the pre-eminence." In chapter i. Christ is seen to be above angels; in iii. above Moses; in v.-viii. above the Aaronic priesthood; in ix. and x. above the many sacrifices. In xii. 2 we have Christ the "Prince, Leader and Finisher of faith" placed before our eyes after the list of Old Testament heroes of faith in chapter xi. The apostle is pointing them to Christ the risen Lord, just as emphatically as he does in Ephesians. It is the one inspired letter which the apostle to the Gentiles was permitted to pen to his brethren according to the flesh after he had closed the door of kingdom promises in Acts xxviii. It was a last, loving, earnest word of exhortation.

It is in connection with the Melchisedec priesthood of Christ that the apostle had to say in chapter v. very much the same as he said to the Corinthians in I Cor. iii. In speaking of Melchisedec (Heb. v. 11) he says, "Of whom we have many things to say, and hard of interpretation, seeing ye are dull of hearing." The Melchisedec priesthood and the one body are linked together, more perhaps than some of us have discerned. Melchisedec by blessing Abraham showed himself the "greater" (Heb. vii. 7), and the one body has a sphere ("heavenly places in Christ") unknown to Abraham. True, Abraham looked for a "heavenly city," but that is to come down out of heaven, whereas the believer to-day rejoices in a citizenship which "is in heaven," and in the expectation of the upward call of God" to that city (Phil. iii.).

So again in Heb. v. 12 we read, "For when for the time ye ought to be teachers," etc. The word "time" suggests (1) they had been Christians long enough to be capable of teaching others; and (2) the time had come when the kingdom had been placed aside, and because of that they ought to have been ready to receive, and to pass on, the new teaching of God's grace. So deleterious was this clinging to the "old things that had passed away," that they even needed instruction in the "first principles," a word signifying the A.B.C., and translated "rudiments," "element," (Gal. iv., Col. ii.). Verse 13 shows that the "first principles" are likened to "milk," the food for "babes," whereas "strong meat" belongeth to "perfect" or "full grown" ones. This word "full age" is the same as the word "perfect" in I Cor. ii. 6, and is used of those to whom the apostle could give the "meat" of the mystery—identical in both cases. Heb. vi. is so important that we propose (D.V.) devoting a future article to the exposition of the first three verses.

However, to complete our parallel with I Cor.iii., we must consider this chapter. Here in Heb. vi. 1 we have mention of "the foundation," which is not the one foundation, Christ Himself, but a foundation of doctrines and ordinances. These "first words of the doctrine of Christ" they are bidden to "leave," not lay again. Verse 7 and 8 speak of the end of the two pieces of land; the one "blessed," the other "nigh unto cursing, whose end is to be burned"—"saved so as through fire." A field that has been burned is not destroyed, but rendered absolutely naked, just as I Cor. iii., "He himself shall be saved, so as through fire."

In order to more clearly demonstrate that which we have set forth, we give a list of the parallel key words of both passages:--

I Corinthians ii. and iii.		Hebrews v. and vi.
1. Babes	iii. 1	Babes	v. 13
2. Milk	iii. 2	Milk	v. 13
3. Meat	iii. 2	Meat	v. 14
4. Perfect	ii. 6	Perfect	v. 14
5. One foundation	iii. 11	Foundation	vi. 1, 2
6. Fire	iii. 13	Fire	vi. 8
7. Six things erected	iii. 12	Sixfold elements	vi. 1, 2

In these two solemn passages we have the reason why the mystery—the glorious privilege of the present dispensation—is not understood. Instead of being a pet subject for a few fanciful speculators, it is vitally connected with the whole evangel. So true is this, that we know those who once held most clearly the doctrines of grace, who now feel obliged to introduce much of the works of the flesh, "the first principles," simply because they fail to rightly divide the Word of truth. They are so intent upon building upon the one foundation a building according to Acts ii. and the gospel of the kingdom, that they have neither eyes, ears, nor heart for the "heavenlies in Christ." Christendom knows nothing of the truth of Ephesians, but is engulfed in ordinances, and occupied with temples "made with hands." Christendom is an anomaly, the offspring of such were at Corinth and among the Hebrews.

Dear readers, where are we? Are we among those who cry "Back to the nursery?" "Back to bondage?" or do we, like the apostle, "forget the things that are behind, and reach forth unto the things that are before?" Our appreciation of the mystery, and the truth contained in Ephesians, Philippians, and Colossians, will enable us to decide, as before the Lord, whether we are babes or full-grown.

Eph.	i.	4	According as he hath chosen us in him before the foundation of the world, that we should be holy and without blame before him in love:
II Tim.	i.	9	Who hath saved us, and called us with an holy calling, not according to our works, but according to his own purpose and grace, which was given us in Christ Jesus before the world began,
Matt.	xxv.	34	Then shall the King say unto them on his right hand, Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world:

PREFACE

In the year 1914, with the whole hearted fellowship of F. P. Brininger, we were enabled to issue a reprint of Volume 1 of the Berean Expositor.

In 1927 with an expanding circle of readers we issued a third edition. Now in 1966, through the generosity and appreciation of a friend in the USA, we publish a fourth edition. We are aware that there is much demand for these early volumes, now alas out of print, but the cost of reprinting is prohibitive. It was felt however, that this first volume had a certain historic value that would interest the newer readers of today and it is from these friends we hope our contribution will find response.

At the time of issuing the 8-page pamphlet in 1909, I, Charles H. Welch was at an extraordinarily low level, both of health and wealth, with no recognised place in Christian ministry, but we were convinced of the importance of the Key Principle, "Right Division".

The first lines we ever printed read as follows:

It's bearing on the present dispensation.

While this was the main burden of our ministry, we rejoice to observe that in this selfsame Volume 1, as much space is devoted to the Sacrificial Work of Christ, and this two-fold feature has continued ever since.

The Berean Expositor is not the organ of a Sect or Denomination, but is devoted to the exposition of the Scriptures with special emphasis on the need to remember that there are a number of callings, spheres, and dispensations, so that while we rightly rejoice in all the purposes of grace, we should and do seek a clear conception of the "Calling" made known since the setting aside of Israel. Such "calling" is found in the so-called "Prison Epistles", i.e. Ephesians, Philippians, Colossians and II Timothy.

Christ our Surety.

Gen. xliii. 1-10, and xliv. 18-34.

pp. 49-51

Our readers are doubtless familiar with the passages referred to in our title, and it is our intention to examine them with regard to their typical teaching. The action of Israel with regard to their Messiah is foreshadowed in this historic incident, for Stephen in Acts vii. 51, referring to Israel as "stiffnecked and uncircumcised in heart and ears, who always resist the Holy Ghost, as their fathers did," says, "The patriarchs, moved with envy, sold Joseph into Egypt, but God was with him. . . .and at the second time Joseph was made known to his brethren" (Acts vii. 9-13).

Heb. ix. 28 tells us that Christ will appear the second time without sin unto salvation. When the Lord Jesus comes again, "they shall look upon Him whom they have pierced, and shall mourn," even as Joseph's brethren did when they realized that they were in the presence of one who had been so ill-treated at their hands. We do not desire, however, to emphasize the prophetic type so much, as to draw attention to one of the sublimer truths of the doctrine of the atonement which is herein typified, viz.:--

The suretyship of Christ.

"I will be surety for Him" (Gen. xliii. 9).—What is the meaning of a surety? The Hebrew word comes from a word meaning "to mix." At first sight this may not appear to throw much light upon the subject, but we believe it will as we examine one or two passages of Scripture. The Hebrew word for "evening" is literally "the mixture," for then the light and darkness appear to mingle together. The same word supplies us with the "woof" (Lev. xiii. 48, &c.) in weaving, the threads which are "intermixed" with the warp in the production of the cloth. It further comes to mean, "To mix or engage with others in trading," and hence in turn comes to mean, "A place for such intercourse—a market."

This helps us to see that the great underlying principle of suretyship is to become so identified, or interwoven with the cause of another, as to be treated in his room and stead, to be responsible for his debts and failures, to make good his deficiencies, in short, to fulfil to the letter the wonderful doctrine enshrined in the theological term.

Substitution.

This responsibility is further emphasized by the words of Judah, "Of my hand shalt thou require him." For illustration read Gen. xxxi. 39, "That which was torn of beasts I brought not unto thee; I bare the loss of it; of my hand didst thou require it." See also II Sam. iv. 11. Judah further amplifies this by saying that should he fail in execution of his suretyship, "then let me bear the blame for ever." The word rendered "blame" is translated “sin” 165 times in the Old Testament. Hence, looking beyond Judah to the anti-type, we see that if Christ our Surety failed in His work, He must be still bearing sin—a dreadful thought—but, blessed be God, this is effectually disposed of by the resurrection, for “He was delivered because of our offences, and raised again because of our justifying” (Rom. iv. 25). “Sin hath no more dominion over Him.” The substitutionary character of the work of the surety is further emphasized in Gen. xliv. 33, “Let thy servant abide instead of the lad.” Precious word “instead.” “That One who knew no sin was made sin (and a sin offering) for us (or on our behalf), with the object that we might become righteousness of God in Him” (II Cor. v. 21), Christ dying in my stead, and raised from the dead, is pledge of Irreversible salvation.

Gen. xliv. 34 gives a word which enables us to see that the step downward from heaven’s glory to earth’s shame taken by the Lord Jesus when He made our cause His own, is to be followed by a step upward from earth’s shame to heaven’s glory with Him. He who identified Himself with our sorrows has identified us with His joys. Oh, the wonder of it all! Truly “by grace ye are saved”; truly (as one has put it) “the saved are in for favour.” Listen to Judah, but think of Christ, as he says, “How shall I ascend up to my father, and the lad be not with me?” How can Christ who suffered, died, and rose again, ever be satisfied until those for whom He became surety are safely by His side in the Father’s home?

“With me.”—When we contemplate our ruin, our fall, our sin, our doom; what grace, what love, that He, the spotless peerless Son of God should come down and identify Himself “with me!” When we contemplate His glory, His fulness, His holiness, the wonders of the heavenly home, the light of His glorious throne, the nearness to the Father, what transcendent grace and unspeakable mercy do we find in the scripture which tells us that, sinful by nature as we are, we shall one day reach the fruition of redemption by finding ourselves placed securely for all eternity “with Him.”

Let it be repeated and emphasized unremittingly that all is of grace, that He hath “saved us and called us with an holy calling, not according to our works, but according to His own purpose and grace, which was given us in Christ Jesus before the age-times” (II Tim. i. 9). There are some who are so spiritual (?) that the doctrine of the atoning blood is repulsive to them. We can but pity them. In the sight of God that blood is “precious.” On the pages of Scripture we discover that through that precious blood we have peace; we are justified; we are saved from wrath. We know Him, our great Surety, not only as the One who died, but as the One who was raised from the dead to die no more. Still for us He lives; still for us He intercedes; soon for us He is coming. Soon we shall be with Him.

May those who read these words be led fully to realize the blessedness of the truth contained in the type before us, and unflinchingly and unfalteringly hold fast the truth of Christ our Surety.

Gen. xliii.	1. And the famine was sore in the land. 2. And it came to pass, when they had eaten up the corn which they had brought out of Egypt, their father said unto them, Go again, buy us a little food. 3. And Judah spake unto him, saying, The man did solemnly protest unto us, saying, Ye shall not see my face, except your brother be with you. 4. If thou wilt send our brother with us, we will go down and buy thee food: 5. But if thou wilt not send him, we will not go down: for the man said unto us, Ye shall not see my face, except your brother be with you. 6. And Israel said, Wherefore dealt ye so ill with me, as to tell the man whether ye had yet a brother? 7. And they said, The man asked us straitly of our state, and of our kindred, saying, Is your father yet alive? have ye another brother? and we told him according to the Tenor of these words: could we certainly know that he would say, Bring your brother down? 8. And Judah said unto Israel his father, Send the lad with me, and we will arise and go; that we may live, and not die, both we, and thou, and also our little ones. 9. I will be surety for him; of my hand shalt thou require him: if I bring him not unto thee, and set him before thee, then let me bear the blame for ever: 10. For except we had lingered, surely now we had returned this second time.
Gen. xliv.	18. Then Judah came near unto him, and said, Oh my lord, let thy servant, I pray thee, speak a word in my lord's ears, and let not thine anger burn against thy servant: for thou art even as Pharaoh. 19. My lord asked his servants, saying, Have ye a father, or a brother? 20. And we said unto my lord, We have a father, an old man, and a child of his old age, a little one; and his brother is dead, and he alone is left of his mother, and his father loveth him. 21. And thou saidst unto thy servants, Bring him down unto me, that I may set mine eyes upon him. 22. And we said unto my lord, The lad cannot leave his father: for if he should leave his father, his father would die. 23. And thou saidst unto thy servants, Except your youngest brother come down with you, ye shall see my face no more. 24. And it came to pass when we came up unto thy servant my father, we told him the words of my lord. 25. And our father said, Go again, and buy us a little food. 26. And we said, We cannot go down: if our youngest brother be with us, then will we go down: for we may not see the man's face, except our youngest brother be with us. 27. And thy servant my father said unto us, Ye know that my wife bare me two sons: 28. And the one went out from me, and I said, Surely he is torn in pieces; and I saw him not since: 29. And if ye take this also from me, and mischief befall him, ye shall bring down my gray hairs with sorrow to the grave. 30. Now therefore when I come to thy servant my father, and the lad be not with us; seeing that his life is bound up in the lad's life; 31. It shall come to pass, when he seeth that the lad is not with us, that he will die: and thy servants shall bring down the gray hairs of thy servant our father with sorrow to the grave. 32. For thy servant became surety for the lad unto my father, saying, If I bring him not unto thee, then I shall bear the blame to my father for ever. 33. Now therefore, I pray thee, let thy servant abide instead of the lad a bondman to my lord; and let the lad go up with his brethren. 34. For how shall I go up to my father, and the lad be not with me? lest peradventure I see the evil that shall come on my father.

Clean every whit.

"He needeth not save to wash his feet" (John xiii. 10).

pp. 35-37

The thirteenth chapter of John's Gospel marks an important division. The first twelve chapters deal with the Lord's public witness, with its reception on the part of the few, and its rejection on the part of the many. Chapter i. 11 says, "He came unto His own, and His own received Him not." Chapter xiii. 1 says, ". . Having loved His own which were in the world, He loved them unto the end." These "His own," differ from those in i. 11, for these had received Him, whilst His closing words in chapter xii. 48-50 are concerning those had rejected Him.

The incident that occupies the opening verses of chapter xiii. is well known to most of us, and we particularly wish to draw attention to two of the impetuous remarks of Peter, and the Lord's answers to them, for our own edification. The Lord, by girding Himself with a towel, took the lowest place of all, that of the menial slave. Truly "He came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give His life a ransom for many." It will be remembered that Luke xxii. 24 records that at the supper "there was also a strife among them, which of them should be accounted the greatest." Possibly the facts that upon taking their places for the Passover some must necessarily have been found nearer, and some further, from the Lord's person than others, may have caused this argument to have arisen. The Lord Jesus listened to their words, and in His marvellous love and condescension gave them an impressive rebuke by His lowly action. Think for a moment of the utter depths brought out by reading verses 3 and 4 together. Though—

> "Jesus knew that the Father had given all things into His hands, and that He was come from God (the Apostle), and went to God (and Great High Priest of our profession), yet He riseth from supper, and laid aside His garments, and took a towel, and girded Himself."
> "(He) Who, being in the form of God, thought it not a thing to be grasped at to be equal with God, but made Himself of no reputation, and took upon Him the form of a servant, and made in the likeness of men; and being found in fashion as a man, He humbled Himself, and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross" (Phil. ii. 6-8).

It seems that no one had volunteered to do the lowly office of washing the feet, and so the Lord Himself stoops down and girds Himself; what a picture of His wonderful grace in our salvation. Not a sound is heard from any until the Lord reaches Peter. He could not keep silent, "Lord, dost Thou wash my feet? . . . . Thou shalt never wash my feet." The difference between the unworthy Peter and the gracious Lord was too much for him; he felt if others said nothing, he must. The Lord Jesus, pausing in His lowly work, looked at Peter and said, "If I wash thee not, thou hast no part (no portion) with Me." All Peter's qualms fled before the prospect of not having a part with his beloved Master, and he more than undoes what he had previously said by exclaiming, "Lord, not my feet only, but also my hands and my head," rather than forfeit a share with Thee. Again he has to learn the lesson of his own ignorance. This time he goes to the other extreme. The Lord answers him with the words, "He that hath been bathed (leloumenous) hath no necessity save to wash (nipsasthai) his feet, but is clean every whit."

What lessons are here? Do we not see that only those who have been washed by the Lord have any share with Him? May every reader know the completeness of the cleansing once and for ever that results from the application of the atoning blood of Christ. Peter's words, "Not my feet only, but my hands and my head," are echoed daily by many believers, who, seeing their own unworthiness, belittle the fulness that is theirs in Christ, and do not rest upon the gracious words that they are "accepted in the Beloved," that they are "complete in Him." To such the reply of the Lord may come with power, "He that hath been bathed is clean every whit."

Two most important aspects of sanctification are to be found in verse 10:--

1. "He that hath been bathed is clean every whit."
2. Nevertheless, such an one needs to "wash his feet."

We are continually forgetting that these two go together. Not only are we in heavenly places in Christ, but we are also still in the body on the earth. Some, realizing that the Scripture teach that the believer is "complete in Christ," emphasize the first sentence, "they are clean every whit." These either develop some phase of "sinless perfection," or irresponsible license. They forget that there will be a continual need for those who are clean every whit to wash their feet. Others, realizing that since their conversion their feet have strayed from the path of truth, forget their unaltered and unalterable perfectness in Christ, and so not only pray for the washing of their feet, but also their head and their hands. They forget that the Lord has "forgiven us all trespasses"; that He has made us "new creatures in Christ Jesus," and that our "walk" here below cannot alter our "position" in the heavenlies in Christ. The first class develop spiritual pride; the second spiritual despair.

Let us remember the perfectness of His cleansing, but also the imperfectness of our walk as believers. We shall then be able, like Paul, not only to say, "Oh wretched man that I am," but also, "There is therefore now no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus."

> "If we walk in the light, as He is in the light, we have fellowship one with another, and the blood of Jesus Christ His Son cleanseth us from all sin. If we say that we have no sins, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us. If we confess our sins, He is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness. If we say that we have not sinned, we make Him a liar, and His word is not in us. My little children, these things write I unto you, that ye sin not, and if any man sin, we have an Advocate (Paraclete) with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous" (I John i. 7-2:1).

Berean Expositor Volume 1

The gifts of the Spirit

The origin, object, use, and cessation of the gifts of the Spirit (I Cor. xii.-xiv.).

"Concerning spiritual gifts, I would not have you ignorant" (I Cor. xii. 1).

pp. 19-21

We sought to show in the article "The Abrahamic Covenant" that the dispensational dealings of God, from Pentecost to the final setting aside of Israel in Acts xxviii., was Abrahamic in character, and anticipatory of the kingdom. We now desire to direct attention to one element which is particularly marked in this period, viz., that of the gifts of the Spirit.

Some teach that these gifts were granted at the commencement of the church, in order to give it a good start off, and that they ceased when the church had obtained a standing. Others teach that the gifts should have continued, but that they were taken away from the church in chastisement. There are many other opinions, but we do not desire to advertise them; "I hate thoughts, but Thy law do I love," said the Psalmist, and we would echo these words.

Let us open at I Cor. xii. Here is a chapter giving instruction to an assembly of saints, of which each one may expect Satan to be busy. Verse 3 sounds a warning note. To understand it we must also read I John iv. 1-3. Many unsaved ones will say, "Lord, Lord," but that is not the thought here. The apostle gives a divine test which must be applied to anyone speaking under the influence of a "gift." Satan's travesty could go very far, but there was a point at which his servants stayed—they would never confess that Jesus Christ was Lord, and this would immediately expose the blasphemous counterfeit. Continuing, the chapter gives a description of these "gifts" and "manifestations" of the Spirit; the word of wisdom, the word of knowledge, faith, healing, working of miracles, prophecy, discerning of spirits, kinds of tongues, the interpretation of tongues.

To prevent either pride, despising, or envying, the apostle likens this gifted assembly to a body. The use of the word body is ecclesiastical and practical, not dispensational; the dispensation was Abrahamic, that of the one body not having been revealed by Paul. In I Cor. xii. there are mentioned eyes, nose, ears, &c., showing that the body, including the head, was contemplated as being on earth, whereas in Ephesians and Colossians the Head is in heaven, and the members, though down here, are viewed as being in the heavenlies also. I Cor. xii. 27 (A.V.) wrongly reads, "Ye are the body." The original omits the word "the." The words "in particular" (ek merous) are translated in I Cor. xiii. 9, 10 by the words "in part," and are contrasted with "that which is perfect." They have the same meaning in I Cor.xii. 27. The meaning of the passage is this. Although I have used the illustration of the body in connection with the use of these wondrous gifts, you are not yet "the body," for that which is perfect has not yet come; you are of the nature, essence, or character of the body; that is why I say, "Ye are body of Christ," instead of saying, "Ye are the body of Christ," and you are members one of another; but you are only body and members partially, imperfectly, the perfect state is yet to be revealed. It has been so revealed in Ephesians. There we find "the perfect man, the measure of the stature of the fulness of the Christ."

In the last verse of Chapter xii. the apostle speaks of "a more excellent way" than the best gifts; that way is "love," and forms the subject of parenthetical chapter xiii. As we read verses 4-7 of chapter xiii. we shall see that in the one word "love" is summed up all the "lowliness and meekness, the long-suffering and forbearance" that are necessary to an endeavour to keep the unity of the Spirit (Eph. iv.). After this wonderful definition of "the more excellent way," the apostle speaks of the temporary character of the "gifts" (verses 8-11). "Tongues" are to cease. The gifts of prophecy and knowledge are to be "done away." The apostle continues with the illustration of "childish things" being "put away." The word translated "fail," "vanish away," "done away," and "put away" in verses 8, 10 and 11 are one and the same in the original. The argument is one. Seeing that the apostle uses the self-same words in connection with "gifts" as with "childish things," and seeing that "childish things" are contrasted with "becoming a man"; and further, seeing that the "man" is parallel to "that which is perfect," which in its turn is contrasted with that which is "in part," or "partially" (I Cor. xii. 27), the teaching must be that gifts are the accompaniments of the childhood dispensation, but became obsolete when the present dispensation of the perfect man was ushered in. Can we with I Cor. xiii. before us raise the cry, "Back to Pentecost" anymore? Are we not turning back to the nursery, and despising the marvellous grace now opened to sinners of the Gentiles?

I Cor. xiii. 12 is often taken to mean the yet future, but it must be remembered that when we are with the Lord we shall have no more need of hope. The present dispensation is anticipatory of the new creation, and similar expressions are used concerning it as of that yet future day. The gift of tongues, according to I Cor. xiv. 21, 22, was for a sign to Israel, "as it is written" in Isa. xxviii. 11, and given for a similar purpose to that of the call of the Gentiles, "to provoke to jealousy" (Rom. x. 19), "to provoke to emulation" (Rom. xi. 14). Israel, however, went on their climax sin, they resisted the Holy Ghost, they "filled up their sins" in connection with this very matter (I Thess. ii. 16), wrath came upon them, Jerusalem was destroyed, Israel scattered, the kingdom became in abeyance, and consequently the need for signs and wonders ceased also.

One word more before closing, and this a word of solemn warning. In Heb. ii. 4 we read of signs, wonders, miracles (semeion teras dunamis). These refer to the gifts of Pentecost. In II Thess. ii. 9 we read of other "power, signs and lying wonders" (dunamis semeion teras), but these are the work of Satan. The anti-Christian apostasy will be a marvellous parody of Pentecost. How many thousands will be deceived who are ready to accept the marvellous as a sign of divine approval! May we learn the lesson; "Gifts," as such, have ceased; the present dispensation is one of faith apart from sight, and removed from all connection with "earthly things" and the earthly hopes and blessings of Israel.

I Cor. xii.	3	Wherefore I give you to understand, that no man speaking by the Spirit of God calleth Jesus accursed: and that no man can say that Jesus is the Lord, but by the Holy Ghost.

I John iv.	1. Beloved, believe not every spirit, but try the spirits whether they are of God: because many false prophets are gone out into the world. 2. Hereby know ye the Spirit of God: Every spirit that confesseth that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh is of God: 3. And every spirit that confesseth not that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh is not of God: and this is that spirit of antichrist, whereof ye have heard that it should come; and even now already is it in the world.

I Cor. xii.	27	Now ye are the body of Christ, and members in particular.

I Cor. xiii.	9. For we know in part, and we prophesy in part. 10. But when that which is perfect is come, then that which is in part shall be done away.

The six-fold foundation of Hebrews vi.
pp. 37-42

There are many who believe that in Hebrews vi. 1, 2 we have the fundamentals of our faith. There are some who push this further, and teach that no one can be recognised as a teacher who does not hold to and teach these six doctrines. The writer was once among this number, and there are some readers of this magazine who still believe this to be truth. To such we commend this article, and remind them of the Bereans who searched the Scriptures to see whether "those things were so."

In our last article we sought to show by the parallelism of I Cor. ii. and iii. with Heb. v. and vi. that failure to realize Christ as the one foundation led to sectarianism, and prevented the reception of the "deep things of God." We propose to examine the first three verses of Heb. vi.:--

"Therefore leaving. . . . let us go on. . . . not laying again. "

These Hebrew believers were exhorted to "Go on unto perfection, " and this word occurs in but one other passage, viz., Col. iii. 14 "love, which is the bond of perfectness." In Col. ii. Paul had exhorted them to leave the "doctrines of men" and the "rudiments of the world," and in Col. iii. he bids them "seek those things which are above. "That which is perfect" is the "perfect man. . . . the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ," in other words, the "one body." It was to this that the apostle exhorted them. Leave the elements of the pentecostal dispensation now obsolete, and go on unto blessedness of the dispensation of the mystery—the one body. Go outside the camp of Judaism unto the Lord and His church, where there is neither Jew nor Greek, but where Christ is "all and in all." Heb. vi explains they were to leave.

"The principles of the doctrine of Christ."

Did ever words sound more like heresy than these? Did Paul teach men to leave the principles of the doctrine of Christ? The margin of the R.V. gives the literal rendering. "The word of the beginning of Christ." This means not merely "a word," but a discourse, a narrative, setting things in order which were believed among them, and delivered by eye-witnesses who were from the beginning (Luke 1:1-3). The book of the Acts commences thus, "The former treatise (Luke's Gospel) have I made, O Theophilus, of all that Jesus began both to do and to teach."

Hebrews opens with the words, "God, Who at sundry times and in divers manners spake in time past unto the fathers by the prophets, hath in these last days spoken unto us by His Son," and resumes again in the second chapter, "How shall we escape if we neglect so great salvation; which at the first began to be spoken by the Lord?" In Rom. xv. 8 we read, "Now I say that Jesus Christ was minister of the circumcision for the truth of God, to confirm the promises made unto the fathers." "The word of the beginning of Christ," which these Hebrews were to "leave," refers to the "Gospels" and the "Acts" which record the ministry of Christ and the Holy Spirit in connection with the kingdom, Israel, and Jerusalem.

The words "perfect" and "perfection" are from the word telos, which means "the end," and is so translated in verse 8. They were to leave the "word of the beginning" of Christ for a later revelation—the end, that which is perfect, the teaching of the gospel of the glory of Christ, and the mystery. The six-fold foundation of doctrines is specified in verse 1 and 2, and is contrasted with the seven-fold perfection as set forth in Eph. iv. which is the "one foundation" of I Cor. iii. These doctrines are arranged in three pairs as follows:--

Repentance.	\	Internal and Doctrinal
Faith.	/
Baptisms.	\	External and Elemental
Laying on of hands.	/
Resurrection of the dead.	\	Future
Judgment everlasting.	/

It is very probable that many readers will be saying, Where are we going? Are we to leave repentance and faith? Are we to give up the doctrine of resurrection? Are we to abandon eternal judgment? No! There is a great difference between a careless "drifting away" (Heb. ii.), and the conscientious obedience of faith to "leave," "not lay again," and "go on unto perfection" (Heb. vi. 1). Believing that this six-fold summary is divine truth, we nevertheless see that the dispensation has changed, and just as believers can "leave" the divine law given through Moses because they are "in Christ" and "under grace," so we lay aside these elements of a transitional period and step out into the sphere apportioned for us by divine grace. Let us now consider each of these six statements individually:--

1. Repentance from dead works.

Are we then to have no sorrow for sin? No forsaking of evil? Let us not be hasty in our judgment. "Repent!" was the key word of John Baptist's ministry. "Repent!" was the opening word of the "beginning of Christ." "Repent!" was the first word of Peter in Acts ii. 38 the moment he saw that his hearers were convinced of sin. "Repent!" "Repent!" is echoed throughout the whole period of kingdom proclamation.

Let our readers now turn to Ephesians. Here is no making light of sin. Here is a full gospel. Here is full prominence given to the atoning blood of Christ, but the words "repent" and "repentance" are never once used. To show this is no mere coincidence, the companion epistles of the mystery, Philippians and Colossians, equally exclude the words from their pages! Why is it that these words, so frequent in the Gospels and Acts, are so absolutely excluded from these epistles which opened the present dispensation? Is it not that the Lord, by the omission of the key word of the kingdom, would lead us to see that we are dealing with the teaching belonging to a different dispensation?

If we turn to Heb. ix.14 we shall find that the apostle, who told them to leave "repentance from dead works," had a thoroughly satisfactory reason. "How much more shall the blood of Christ purge your conscience from dead works." Reader, which is better? The oft-repeated "repentance" or the once completed purgation from dead works by the blood of Christ? This is the teaching of such passages as Col. ii.13, "Having forgiven you all trespasses." We shall not think lightly of sin if we have abandoned all hope of deliverance by our repentance. We shall find as we study these verses that they all turn the eye of the believer away from himself and others unto the Lord Jesus Christ.

Shall we not then gladly leave these elements of kingdom truth, and enter into the blessedness of the dispensation of the grace of God to the Gentiles? Shall we not "go on unto perfection," to find our rest, our peace, our all in Christ? "For he that is entered into his rest, he also hath ceased from his own works" (Heb. iv. 10). Let us realise the fulness of the gospel committed to us. Let us remember that the "god of this age" would fain have us emphasizing repentance, if by so doing he can keep us occupied with anything else than "the gospel of the glory of Christ" (II Cor. iv. 4). Let us "leave" and "go on unto perfection."

2. Faith toward God.

Here again we must take into consideration the people and the period. We may be perfectly sure that the apostle, who so wonderfully preached justification by faith, is not here advocating its abandonment. Let us look through his other epistles. The epistle to the Galatians is perhaps the anti-Judaic letter, Romans being the more lengthy treatise following. Galatians emphasizes the apostle's meaning in the words, "Leaving .. faith toward God."

"The faith of Jesus Christ" (Gal. ii. 16).
"The faith of the Son of God" (Gal. ii. 20).
"By faith of Jesus Christ" (Gal. iii. 22).
"By faith in Christ Jesus" (Gal. iii. 26).
"Your faith in the Lord Jesus" (Eph. i. 15).
"By faith of Christ" (Phil. iii. 9).
"Your faith in Christ" (Col. ii. 5).
"The faith which is in Christ Jesus" (I Tim. iii. 13).
"Through faith which is in Christ Jesus" (II Tim. iii. 15).

If the context be read, these passages will show that all the blessings of the gospel are vitally connected with faith, but it is faith which rests in Christ. The Jews, by their very nationality, laws, and customs, had God, the God of their fathers, continually before them. Jehovah was the God of Israel. Every Jew prided himself on the fact, so much so that Paul had to write, "Is He not the God of the Gentiles also?" But this national faith, though it fed their pride, could not save them, nor justify them. In the parable of the Pharisee and Publican we have a vivid example. The pharisee had faith toward God; otherwise he would never have troubled to pray as he did. The publican realized that mere faith toward God was not sufficient for his need. His faith needed a propitiation, a sacrifice upon which to rest. Listen to his prayer: "God, be propitious (i. e., be merciful upon the ground of sacrifice) to me, the sinner." The great stumbling block to these Hebrew believers was the levelling character of sin, and the universal need of faith in Christ and His atoning blood; their nationality could not save them. The fact that Abraham was their father could not justify them.

The Gentile, on the other hand, had no national faith to fall back upon, he cast himself upon the unconditional mercy of God through Christ. This was the faith preached by Paul, "The faith of God's elect. . . upon hope of eternal life, which God, who cannot lie, promised (i.e., to Christ as the Surety of His people) before the world began." The Lord Jesus when on earth had said, "Ye believe in God, believe also in Me" (John xiv. 1). The great cloud of witnesses in Heb. xi. does not commence with Enoch's walk of faith, nor Noah's witness of faith, but Abels'offering; faith in atoning blood.

Following the list of the heroes of faith, Paul in Heb. xii, bids us "look off (or away from all else—even these Old Testament worthies) unto Jesus the Author and Finisher of faith." Hebrews reveals Christ as the "one mediator between God and men," "the priest for ever after the Order of Melchisedec." All who come unto God for salvation come unto God "by Him." This is not merely faith toward God, not merely a vague trust in the "Almighty," nor an impersonal Providence, but it is faith which draws near to God by way of the mediation and merits of His Son—"the faith of Jesus Christ."

We must leave the remaining four elements for our next paper.

The six-fold foundation of Hebrews vi.
pp. 46-49

3. The doctrine of baptisms.

The order of the words in the original is "the baptisms of instruction." These baptisms were connected with instruction and reception of it. First let us notice that the word is plural, "baptismS." This leads us at once to contrast it with the passage in Eph. iv where we are emphatically told that there is one baptism. To these Hebrew believers the apostle says, "leave. . the baptismS of instruction." To the Ephesian believers, those who represent the present position, the apostle says, "keep one baptism." Dear reader, how does your practice agree with these two inspired commands? This particular word "baptisms" is translated in Heb. ix. 9, 10 by the word "washings," viz.:--

> "The first tabernacle ... was a figure ... in which were offered both gifts and sacrifices, that could not make him that did the service perfect, as pertaining to the conscience; (which stood) only in meats and drinks, and divers baptisms, and carnal ordinances, imposed until the time of reformation. "

In this passage the Holy Spirit has definitely connected the word "baptisms" with carnal ordinances, and contrasted it with that which is perfect. This word "baptisms" occurs again in Mark vii. 4, 7 and 8:--

> "And when they come from the market, except they baptize, they eat not. And many other things there be, which they have received to hold, as the baptisms of cup, and pots, brasen vessels, and of tables. . . Howbeit, in vain do they worship Me, teaching for doctrines the commandments of men. For leaving the commandment of God, ye hold the traditions of men" (The words in italics all occur in Heb. vi.).

What have we seen? Whether imposed by God (Heb. ix.), or imposed by men (Mark vii.), neither were given to make perfect, and neither touched the conscience. A comparison of Heb. ix.9 with Heb. x. 1 and 2 will show the repetition of such words as "conscience," "perfect," and that these ordinances, including "baptisms," were co-temporary with the sacrifices. Hebrews is the first scripture which definitely says that the sacrifices were to cease. It will be remembered that in the millennial kingdom, sacrifices will again be offered, hence until it was revealed that the kingdom and its accompaniments had become in abeyance, the believing Jew had nothing to tell him that sacrifices were to cease. Seeing that these things are so, we feel that we can no more perpetuate the baptisms, than we can the sacrifices.

There is one more thought for our consideration. During the pentecostal period there were two baptisms, namely, water and spirit. Before Pentecost there was one baptism, namely, water. During the Acts period there were two, namely, water and spirit. After Acts xxviii we again find one baptism, this time spirit. For the benefit of any who may not have seen the wonderful sevenfold unity of the Spirit set out in Eph. iv., showing by the position of the words that the baptism is that of the Spirit, we give it here:--

4. ONE LORD.
3. ONE HOPE. 5. ONE FAITH.
2. ONE SPIRIT. 6. ONE BAPTISM.
1. ONE BODY. 7. ONE GOD AND FATHER.

This sevenfold unity which we are to keep is contrasted with the six-fold foundation of Heb. vi.1 which we are to leave. The Acts of the Apostles, and the epistles of that period, are the only Scriptures that record two baptisms. This period had passed away, new things have been given, and among them one baptism.

4. The laying on of hands.

This is closely connected with the two baptisms. Acts viii.12 "they were baptized"; 17 and 18, "They laid hands on them, and they received holy spirit. And when Simon saw that through laying on of the apostle's hands holy spirit was given, &c." Acts xix.6 "When Paul had laid his hands upon them, holy spirit came on them, and they spake with tongues and prophesied." Acts xxviii. 8 "Paul prayed, and laid his hands on him, and healed him." I Tim. iv.14 and II Tim. i.6 speak of the "gift" by the laying on of hands.

Acts xiii. 3 and I Tim. v. 22 record recognition of ministries by the laying on of hands. Gifts of the Holy Spirit, tongues, prophecies, miraculous healings, and appointment to office once came through the instrumentality of human hands. We are in a dispensation of things "not made with hands," and all gifts and graces come from the risen Lord, without the intervention of hands at all. Like Paul we can say, "not of men, neither by man." "He gave some apostles, &c." (Eph. iv.8-11). Ministry is now independent of the laying on of hands, so also "healing" and all things else. No man now comes between the believer and his Lord.

5. The resurrection of the dead

At first glance it must seem little short of heresy to teach from Heb. vi. 2 "Leaving. ...the (doctrine of the) resurrection of the dead." The difficulty lies in our failure to "prove the things that differ," and in the looseness of translation in our A.V. We make a great mistake when we assume that the resurrection as held by the Pharisees and the Jews is the same as that taught by the apostles.

Anastasis nekrõn are the words of Heb. vi.2, "The resurrection of the dead." Paul used these words when he said, "I am a Pharisee, the son of a Pharisee; of the hope and resurrection of the dead I am called in question" (Acts xxiii. 6). So also Acts xxiv. 21. If we read in connection with Acts xxiv. 14, 15, we have the faith expressed of the orthodox Jew. John xi.24 is also parallel, the resurrection of the last day being all that was known.

Mark ix. 9 and 10 contain something that will help us to understand Heb. vi.2, "...till the Son of man were risen from among the dead (ek nekrõn), and they kept that saying with themselves, questioning one with another what the rising from the dead should mean." Surely if the Pharisees believed the resurrection of the dead, the disciples of the Lord did also; their difficulty was not one of unbelief in resurrection, but a failure to understand the import of a little word ek introduced by the Lord when He spoke of rising "out from among dead ones." This phrase is used of Lazarus in Luke xvi. 31, "neither will they be persuaded, though one rose out from among the dead." This is the expression used in Acts iv. 1, 2, 10, and Rom. i. 4.

In Phil. iii the apostle gives us a wonderful "Profit and Loss account." Christ more than compensated to Paul for all that he had forfeited as a Pharisee. Paul had looked for a resurrection of the dead; now, as a believer in Christ, he looked for a resurrection out from the dead (exanastasis ek). This passage demands a fuller exposition than our present knowledge will justify us in attempting, but here we have that for which the apostle could urge the Hebrew believers to leave the resurrection of the dead. Leave the general resurrection for the blessed hope of being raised out from the dead—the blessed portion of believers of the present dispensation.

6. Eternal judgment.

Space will not allow of our going much into this last clause. It does not mean that we are to leave the scriptural teaching of the finality of the judgment of God, but to leave the contemplation of the general judgment, as of the general resurrection, and remember the judgment-seat of Christ, which was prominent in the parallel passage to Heb. vi., namely, I Cor. iii. 13-15. “Let us go forth without the camp unto Him.” “Leaving..let us go on unto perfection.”

We are conscious that through limited space our remarks may be difficult to follow. May the Lord lead all readers to search the Scriptures, and see whether these things be so.

Hebrews vi.

1. Therefore leaving the principles of the doctrine of Christ, let us go on unto perfection; not laying again the foundation of repentance from dead works, and of faith toward God,
2. Of the doctrine of baptisms, and of laying on of hands, and of resurrection of the dead, and of eternal judgment.
3. And this will we do, if God permit.
4. For it is impossible for those who were once enlightened, and have tasted of the heavenly gift, and were made partakers of the Holy Ghost,
5. And have tasted the good word of God, and the powers of the world to come,
6. If they shall fall away, to renew them again unto repentance; seeing they crucify to themselves the Son of God afresh, and put him to an open shame.
7. For the earth which drinketh in the rain that cometh oft upon it, and bringeth forth herbs meet for them by whom it is dressed, receiveth blessing from God:
8. But that which beareth thorns and briers is rejected, and is nigh unto cursing; whose end is to be burned.
9. But, beloved, we are persuaded better things of you, and things that accompany salvation, though we thus speak.
10. For God is not unrighteous to forget your work and labour of love, which ye have shewed toward his name, in that ye have ministered to the saints, and do minister.
11. And we desire that every one of you do shew the same diligence to the full assurance of hope unto the end:
12. That ye be not slothful, but followers of them who through faith and patience inherit the promises.
13. For when God made promise to Abraham, because he could swear by no greater, he sware by himself,
14. Saying, Surely blessing I will bless thee, and multiplying I will multiply thee.
15. And so, after he had patiently endured, he obtained the promise.
16. For men verily swear by the greater: and an oath for confirmation is to them an end of all strife.
17. Wherein God, willing more abundantly to shew unto the heirs of promise the immutability of his counsel, confirmed it by an oath:
18. That by two immutable things, in which it was impossible for God to lie, we might have a strong consolation, who have fled for refuge to lay hold upon the hope set before us:
19. Which hope we have as an anchor of the soul, both sure and stedfast, and which entereth into that within the veil;
20. Whither the forerunner is for us entered, even Jesus, made an high priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec.

Heb. ix. 14	How much more shall the blood of Christ, who through the eternal Spirit offered himself without spot to God, purge your conscience from dead works to serve the living God?

I Tim. iv. 14	Neglect not the gift that is in thee, which was given thee by prophecy, with the laying on of the hands of the presbytery.
II Tim. i. 6	Wherefore I put thee in remembrance that thou stir up the gift of God, which is in thee by the putting on of my hands.

Eph. iv.	8. Wherefore he saith, When he ascended up on high, he led captivity captive, and gave gifts unto men. 9. (Now that he ascended, what is it but that he also descended first into the lower parts of the earth? 10. He that descended is the same also that ascended up far above all heavens, that he might fill all things.) 11. And he gave some, apostles; and some, prophets; and some, evangelists; and some, pastors and teachers;

Acts xxiv. .	21. Except it be for this one voice, that I cried standing among them, Touching the resurrection of the dead I am called in question by you this day. 14. But this I confess unto thee, that after the way which they call heresy, so worship I the God of my fathers, believing all things which are written in the law and in the prophets: 15. And have hope toward God, which they themselves also allow, that there shall be a resurrection of the dead, both of the just and unjust.
John xi. 24	Martha saith unto him, I know that he shall rise again in the resurrection at the last day..

I Cor. iii.	13. Every man's work shall be made manifest: for the day shall declare it, because it shall be revealed by fire; and the fire shall try every man's work of what sort it is. 14. If any man's work abide which he hath built thereupon, he shall receive a reward. 15. If any man's work shall be burned, he shall suffer loss: but he himself shall be saved; yet so as by fire.

The Immortality of the Soul and The doctrine of demons. pp. 64-66

The first lie that the Bible records is found in the words of the devil in Gen. iii. 4, "Ye shall not surely die," and this initial conceit, held up before the eyes of our first parents, permeates Philosophy, Paganism, Theosophy, Spiritism, Protestantism and Popery. We do not wish it to be understood that Gen. iii.4 really teaches anything specifically touching upon the question of the immortality of the soul; there it was a blasphemous contradiction of the words of God as uttered in Gen. ii. 17, but so completely did its bait beguile, that the father of lies has ever since sought to confuse the tremendous issues of life and death, which the Bible brings forward on every page, by a conflicting jargon of Theology among believers, and a fruitful seed of error among the unsaved. We ask our readers, as Berean believers, to carefully consider the following extracts from spiritistic seances and mediums quoted from the writings of Mr. Miles Grant (The Bible Echo):--

> "If a man would become satisfied of modern Spiritism, he must first be satisfied that he is an immortal being."
> "The visitations and manifestations of the spirit world are to convince you of the immortality of the soul."
> "The first, the greatest, and the grandest truth coming through modern Spiritism is the immortality of the soul."

Here it will be seen that Orthodoxy has nothing to say against these doctrines of demons, but rather, in Pulpit, Press, and Song, this great lie is echoed and enforced, colouring as it does the whole evangel. We gave in our next quotation a Resolution passed at an important Spiritistic Convention, which shows how important a place this doctrine holds in their Creed:--

> "RESOLVED—That Spiritism, according to the modern acceptation of the term, embraces all those who believe in the immortality of the soul. . . . Beyond this common faith, there is no doctrine or creed necessarily incident to modern Spiritism."

It must come as a great shock to many godly Christians, who constantly pray for the "never dying souls" of men, to find themselves sharing a "common faith" with the enemy of truth! Yet so it is. A spirit says of this doctrine, "When once that is established, this one simple germ knowledge will work out all the rest. The first lie of Satan was, "Ye shall not surely die." This was the "simple germ." It will culminate in the fruition of the second lie, "Ye shall be as God," for Spiritism and its doctrines are the precursors and forerunners of antichrist. Another spirit says:--

> "The first great object is to convince sceptics of the immortality of the soul, disrobe death of its terrors, give to men a rational religion, and unite all men in one grand sublime faith, in which angels or spirits of the dead hold intercourse with living men, thus raising the condition of the material world up to that of, and in harmony with, the spiritual. The > design is, through the increase of knowledge and spiritual elevation, to crush, destroy and break in pieces all the existing forms of government on the face of the whole earth. . . . and in place of them build up one common form of government in all the earth, having one common head. . . . in this form of government (which will be a Theocratic Democracy) every man will be his own ruler and his natural demands his highest law!"

Look at the "first great object" and trace its results! The whole passage is pregnant with solemn warning. It is antichristian to the last degree. The design is to usurp the prophesied prerogatives of Christ. He it is who will "crush, destroy, and break in pieces all existing forms of government" (see Dan. ii. 44 and 45). This, Spiritism would give to the "man" who, energized by satan and inebriated with the false idea of immortality, will dare to challenge the very Lamb of God. Spiritism looks forward to "one common head," and of a truth the signs of the times indicate that the coming of the "son of perdition" is near. The leaven is working very near the surface, but God has given this high place to His Son, whom He has appointed heir of all things, "that in the dispensation of the fulness of times, He might gather together under one Head all things in Christ, both which are in heaven, and which are on earth" (Eph. i.10).

The absolute lawlessness inculcated in the closing words of the quotation cited above is entirely in harmony with the testimony of the Spirit of truth:--

> "This know also, that in the last days there will set in perilous seasons; for men will be lovers of their own selves, covetous, ostentatious, arrogant, defamers, disobedient to parents, unthankful, unholy, without natural affection, truce breakers, intriguers, without self-control, fierce, unfriendly to good, traitors, reckless, highminded, lovers of pleasure more than lovers of God" (II Tim.iii. 1-4).

Here the last phase of the mystery of lawlessness is confessedly the goal of Spiritism. A "rational religion" is to take place of revealed redemption, and instead of glorious grace man is to be his own saviour, lawgiver, and god, for they say:--

> "God is man and man is God. . . . no clearer idea of divine existence can possibly be commended to the mind than the statement that He is one grand universal man."

Once more we ask our readers to examine the root, the "simple germ" of this blasphemy. Upon their own repeated witness, Spiritists declare that the acceptation of the doctrine of the immortality of the soul is the seed which, left to itself, produces such envenomed fruit. So also may we learn if we read Gen.3, "Ye shall not surely die. . . ye shall be as God."

We do not intend in this issue to go further into the subject, this we reserve until our next article. We feel that the terrible connection which this doctrine has with the whole antichristian system ought to be clearly seen. During the next few months our readers will have an opportunity of looking to the Word of God which liveth and abideth for ever. There they will find all that is to be known concerning the subject of the soul and of immortality. We might suggest a few questions for those who, Berean-like, will search the Scripture:--

1. Do the Scripture teach that man is immortal?
2. What saith the Scriptures concerning immortality? Who receive it, and when?
3. Collect all the passages which use such terms as, "immortal soul," "never-dying soul," &c., and send the lists on to the Editor.
4. Make a list of the other references to the soul.

We might mention for the guidance of our readers that the Hebrew word for "soul" is nephesh, and is translated in the A.V. "soul," "creature," "life," &c. The Greek word is psuche, and is referred "soul," "life," &c.

What saith the Scriptures concerning the Immortality of the Soul? pp. 71-76

In our last paper we gave a few quotations from Spiritistic sources which were unanimous in their support of the doctrine of the immortality of the soul. We would now turn from these "lying spirits" to the word of truth. So powerful is the hold of tradition upon us, that it seems hardly possible for anyone to approach the Scriptures in an unbiased manner; yet believing, as we do, that all Scripture is given by inspiration of God, and that every word of God is pure, we may confidently turn to this book of books, feeling assured that all that is to be known of the soul will be found within its pages.

The word which the A.V. Old Testament has rendered "soul" is the Hebrew word nephesh. Nephesh occurs 754 times in the Hebrew of the Old Testament. In the A.V. and R.V., it is translated "soul" 472 times, whilst in the remaining 282 places it is represented by 44 different words and phrases. The English word "soul" is in every occurrence the rendering of the Hebrew nephesh, except in Job xxx. 15 and Isa. lvii. 16.

Turning to the New Testament we find that the word rendered "soul" is the Greek word psuche. This word occurs in the A.V. 103 times; 58 times it is rendered "soul," 40 times "life," 3 times "mind," once "heart," and once "heartily." No other word but psuche is translated "soul" in the A.V. New Testament. The reader is now in possession of the simple facts of the case; we have a full, perfect, and authoritative statement by the creator and redeemer of the soul of man as to its nature.

We trust that our readers sufficiently revere the Scriptures as to be ready to submit to every statement, and so should it once be declared that the soul is immortal, we shall bow before the Word; and now, with the immortality of the soul before us, we commence our investigation of these 857 inspired references. We read many and varied statements as to the soul of man, our search carrying us through book after book of Law, Prophets, Psalms, Gospels, Acts, Epistles, and the Apocalypse, and when the last reference has been made we are confronted with the astounding fact that not once in all the 857 verses scattered throughout the whole Bible is there ever found a statement which would lend the remotest colouring to the oft-repeated statement, "the immortal soul," "the never dying soul."

Before prosecuting our studies further we might pause to ask, Is immortality predicated of any one in the Bible? To this we may soon give an answer, as the words do not occur many times in the Scriptures. Aphthartos occurs 7 times, rendered "immortal" and "incorruptible"; aphtharsia occurs 7 times, rendered "immortality," "incorruption," "sincerity"; athanasia occurs 3 times, rendered "immortality." The word is used of God. "The King, eternal, immortal, invisible" (I Tim. i. 17), and it is emphatically declared to be His exclusive possession, "Who only hath immortality" (ITim. vi. 16). Let us remember once again the words of satan, "Ye shall not surely die. . . .ye shall be as God," and let us take our place with the Word of truth and brand the devil's words as a lie. Immortality can only be possessed by man as a gift from God. Rom. ii.7 shows us the manner of seeking it under law, "To them who by patient continuance in well-doing seek for honour, and glory, and immortality (God will render) eternal life."

When we turn to the opening chapters of the Bible we cannot fail to see that a difference is pointedly made between man and the rest of created beings. Gen. i. 24 reads, "And God said, Let the earth bring forth the living creature after his kind, cattle, and creeping thing, and beast of the earth." How different when we come to the creation of man in i. 26, "And God said, Let Us make man in Our image, after Our likeness, and let them have dominion." The deliberate statement of i. 26 shows the superiority of man over all else of the six days' creation. Those who would prove immortality from the expression "in Our image, after Our likeness" prove too much. Why stop at immortality? Why not omnipotence, omnipresence, omniscience, why not go to the whole length of man-elevating and God-dishonouring anti-christianity? Gen. ii.7 gives us the detailed account of the creation of man. "And the Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, and man became a living soul." Let us examine this verse carefully. There is nothing very likely to minister to our pride in the first sentence, "the dust of the ground," but many have seen a warrant for immortality in the second. Apart from the fact to be stated presently, one would have thought that the "nostrils were a most unlikely vehicle for immortality, and would be more likely to have reference to the vivification of the lifeless Adam, who thereby became "a living soul."

The English Bible gives a false argument in this record of man's creation, for those able translators, yielding to the traditional teaching which they had imbibed maybe from infancy, veiled the inspired connection between man and beast which the Holy Spirit had purposely made. We give therefore every passage occurring in the first nine chapters of Genesis:--

"The moving creature that hath a living soul" (i. 20).
"Every living soul which the waters brought forth" (i. 21).
"Let the earth bring forth the living soul" (i. 24).
"That creepeth. . . . wherein there is a living soul" (i. 30).
"Man became a living soul" (ii. 7).
"Adam called every living soul" (ii. 19).
"Every living soul that is with you" (ix. 10).
"Between Me and you and every living soul" (ix. 12).
"Every living soul of all flesh" (ix. 15).
"Every living soul" (ix. 16).

These passages are in sharp conflict with Theology, for the word "soul" is used of animals as well as man. Moreover, the very expression "breath of life" is also similarly used and explained in Gen. vii. 21, 22:--

"All flesh died that move upon the earth, both of:--
(a) Fowl, (b) Cattle, (c) Beast, \ All in whose nostrils was
(d) Creeping thing, (e) Man. / the breath of life."

This breath of life, which, entering the man at his creation, made him become a living soul, is precisely same breath of life which made the beast of the field and fish of the sea become living souls. Solomon, who wrote with inspiration equal to that of Moses or Paul, and who had given him from God a wise and understanding heart, so that there was none like him before or since (I Kings iii. 12), and who, moreover, tells us that "That which was written was upright, even words of truth" (Eccles. xii. 10), declared, "That which befalleth the sons of men befalleth beasts, as one dieth, so dieth the other, yea, they have all one breath (or spirit, Heb. ruach)" (Eccles. iii.19). Cf. Gen. ii.17; iii.19, and Psa. cxlvi.4.

Death comes alike to each. So far as this world is concerned all stand upon a level. "A man hath no pre-eminence above a beast, as one dieth, so dieth the other" (Eccles. iii. 19, 20). Yet a striking difference is indicated between the life of man and beast—we are to live again, they are not. "The spirit (translated 'breath,' verse19) of man goeth upward; the spirit of the beast goeth downward" (Eccles. iii. 21). Different in destiny but not in nature, for "all have one spirit" (Eccles. iii.19). "Then shall the dust return to the earth as it was, and the spirit shall return unto God who gave it" (Eccles. xii. 7).

There are not a few who profess a belief in the inspiration of the Scriptures who, finding their traditions upset by the book of Ecclesiastes, loftily exclaim, Oh! That is "under the sun," we know better than Solomon! This book specializes, shall we say, on the frailty and vanity of man by nature, and for that reason we should pay heed to its teaching. We might as well refuse to believe what Paul wrote concerning the mystery for fear he was prejudiced, or Moses concerning the law. Away with such pretences. Those who must have the immortality of the soul as part of their creed, let them call God's truth a lie if they dare, and we will, at least, credit them with inconsistency, but let them not prate about belief in inspiration while they perpetuate the teaching of the arch-enemy of truth, who ever seeks to minister to the pride of man whose breath is in his nostrils, and to dishonour God "Who only hath immortality."

The New Testament is entirely in agreement with the Old Testament, e.g., read Acts vii. 59. Stephen when dying prayed, "Lord Jesus, receive my spirit" (not 'soul' as tradition demands, but 'spirit,' as Eccles. xii. 7 teaches), that He might keep for him that life till resurrection, "and when he had said this he fell asleep." How refreshing it is to turn from the assumption of the so-called orthodox teachers to the clear commentary of the apostle Paul on Gen. ii. 7. Man sees in the term, "a living soul," a synonym for immortality; not so the inspired apostle:--

"There is a natural (psuchikon, soul-lical) body, and there is a spiritual body. And so it is written, The first man Adam was made a living soul, the last Adam a life-giving > spirit. Howbeit that was not first which is spiritual, but that which is natural (soul-lical), and afterward that which is spiritual. The first man is of the earth, earthy, the second is the Lord from heaven" (I Cor. xv. 44-47).

Note the parallel:--

"The first man Adam was made a living soul."

"The first man is of the earth, earthy."

Immortality is not received through the first Adam: his descendants by nature are all mortals.

Some have believed on the Lord Jesus Christ, and these are awaiting resurrection, when this corruptible and this mortal shall put on immortality. How like the gospel to shut us up to Christ and resurrection for this coveted gift. How like satan and his ministers to preach the natural immortality of man and his independence of God. Death is said to be but the portal into fuller life, and the whole testimony of the Word is thereby set at naught. This doctrine of the immortality of the soul of man is far reaching. It permeates all Theology. It trammels our views of the atonement; it blights our prospects of the future; it is the fruitful source of the Popish purgatory, and the Protestant nightmare of never-ending torment. Manifestly, if one will teach that all souls are immortal, something must be done with them. Consequently, the scriptures which speak of death, destruction, burning like chaff, &c., &c., are tortured and twisted to mean their very opposites, and the passages which refer exclusively to the devil and those who side with antichrist are not only misinterpreted, but mercilessly and indiscriminately applied to all of every age and clime who are without Christ.

Let us not fear what man may say or think, let us hold fast the faithful Word, let us glory in the blessed fact that we once were dead can now look away to the right hand of God, and realize that "our life is hid with Christ in God," going forth with the glad message of the gospel of life for the dead to proclaim Him who is the resurrection and the life, who "shed light on life and immortality through the gospel."

The dispensational place of the Lord's Supper.
The new covenant.
pp. 76-82

Those of our readers who have followed the arguments put forward in this Magazine cannot fail to realize that the re-discovery of the divine dividing line between kingdom and mystery, viz., Acts xxviii., necessarily carries with it changes in accepted doctrine of a rather drastic nature. What effect has this upon the observance of the Lord's Supper? In order that every reader may be in possession of the chronological order of the epistles, we set out again their order and relation to the last chapter of Acts:--

I Thessalonians	52 A.D.	\
II Thessalonians	53	\	Pentecostal and transitional period.-
I Corinthians	57	\	Kingdom truth and preparatory
II Corinthians	57	/	teaching by Paul for the
Galatians	57	/	impending change.

Colossians	62	\
Philippians	62	\	The dispensation of the mystery-
I Timothy	67	/	Standard truth for the time.
II Timothy	68	/

In the first instance we note that we find mention of the Lord's Supper in those scriptures written before the beginning of this dispensation, but not even a hint of it afterwards. We will not, however, limit ourselves to this argument, although, rightly understood, it is final and conclusive. Let us turn to the scriptures where we first read of this institution of the Lord's Supper. When was this ordinance instituted? Matt. xxvi. 26-30 supplies the information:--

> "And as they were eating (i.e. the passover, see verses 17 and 19), Jesus took bread (i.e. passover loaf of unleavened bread), and blessed, and brake, and gave to the disciples, and said, Take, eat, this is My body. And He took a cup and gave thanks, and gave to them, saying, Drink ye all of it; for this is My blood of the new covenant, which is shed for many for the remission of sins. But I say unto you, I will not drink henceforth of this fruit of the vine, until that day when I drink it new with you in My Father's kingdom. And when they had sung a hymn, they went out into the Mount of Olives."

Matt. xxvi.	17. Now the first day of the feast of unleavened bread the disciples came to Jesus, saying unto him, Where wilt thou that we prepare for thee to eat the passover? 19. And the disciples did as Jesus had appointed them; and they made ready the passover.

Thus we see that the Lord's Supper is connected with the Jewish feast of the Passover, and by reading I Cor. xi.23-26 we see that henceforth this feast was not merely to remind them of the deliverance from Egypt, but to "show forth the Lord's death till He come," which is further interpreted in I Cor. v.7 by the words, "For even Christ our Passover hath been sacrificed for us." Both Matt. xxvi. and I Cor. xi. tell us that the wine typified the "blood of the new covenant." What is this new covenant? Is it connected with the mystery hidden since the age-times? Is the new covenant a secret only revealed now, or is it a matter of Old Testament knowledge? Let us turn to Jer. xxxi.:--

> "At the same time (i.e. 'the latter times,' Jer. xxx. 24), saith the Lord, I will be the God of all the families of Israel, and they shall be My people. . . . again I will build thee, ... O virgin of Israel. . . . O Lord, save Thy people, the remnant of Israel. Behold, I will bring them from the north country, and gather them from the coasts of the earth. . . . for I am a Father to Israel. . . . He that scattered Israel will gather him . . . . for the Lord hath redeemed Jacob. . . . Behold, the days come, saith the Lord, that I will make a NEW COVENANT with the house of Israel, and with the house of Judah; not according to the covenant that I made with their fathers in the day that I took them by the hand to bring them out of the land of Egypt (hence the connection between the new covenant, the passover and the Lord's supper). . . . But this shall be the covenant that I will make with the house of Israel (this is God's interpretation of the new covenant). . . . If those ordinances (of the sun, moon and stars) depart from before Me, saith the Lord, then the seed of Israel also shall cease from being a nation before Me for ever. Thus saith the Lord, if heaven above can be measured, and the foundation of the earth searched out beneath, I will also cast off all the seed of Israel for all that they have done, saith the Lord."

No one who believes that God means what He says can help seeing that the new covenant is related to a greater though parallel, exodus than that from Egypt, that it is specifically connected with the future gathering of Israel back to their land, and that the church of the mystery of Eph. iii. finds no place therein whatsoever. The opening words of Exo. xx. teach much the same lesson. "I am the Lord thy God, which have brought thee out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of bondage." Then follows the first covenant, "which they brake" (Deut. xxix. 25), and, "They have forsaken the covenant of the Lord God of their fathers, which He made with them when He brought them forth out of the land of Egypt" (see also Jer. xi. 7, 8; Heb. viii.; Isa. xi. 11, 16).

In Matt. xxvi the Lord Jesus looks forward to "that day," to His "Father's kingdom"; "Thy kingdom come, Thy will be done on earth"; "I appoint unto you a kingdom, as My Father hath appointed Me, that ye may eat and drink at My table in My kingdom, and sit on thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel!" (Luke xxii. 29,30). Where in all this is room and place for, or hint of, the church of the mystery? When we pass the dispensational boundary of Acts xxviii we read in Ephesians not of the kingdom of the heavens, nor of the kingdom of the Father, but of "the kingdom of Christ and of God" (Eph. v. 5). In Col. i.13 we read, "The kingdom of the Son of His love," which is in operation now, and is entirely distinct from the kingdom that hinges upon the restoration of Israel.

Jer. xxx. 24	The fierce anger of the Lord shall not return, until he have done it, and until he have performed the intents of his heart: in the latter days ye shall consider it.

The word rendered “covenant” is never used in those epistles that were written after Acts xxviii without reference to Israel. II Corinthians was written before Acts xxviii. Hebrews, as it title shows, has a message for those of Israel. The one reference in Eph. ii.12 refers back to “the time past” when these Ephesians believers were aliens and strangers, or at most but guests, with regard to the “covenants of the promise.” No covenant is ever mentioned in relation to the “church which is His body.” There is a promise and a purpose given before the age-time (Titus i. 1-3), but not a covenant, old or new. That is exclusively connected with Israel. The new covenant is God’s gracious provision for the very people who failed under the old covenant.

After the supper we read, “They sang an hymn (the Psalms known as the Hallel), and then went out into the Mount of Olives.” The Mount of Olives! The last portion of earth which the Saviour’s feet trod before He ascended, and destined to be the first place touched by His feet when He returns to take the kingdom (Acts i. 12; Zech. xiv. 4). It seems as though everything has been written and arranged to link the Lord’s Supper with the kingdom, and to sever it from the mystery. Who then has blinded the eyes of believers, and made them more zealous concerning a kingdom ordinance, than eager “to know what is the hope of His calling?” Rome has no place for Paul and his doctrine. She has canonised Peter, mutilated the gospel of the circumcision, robbed Israel of their future glory, and finds a stronghold in this ordinance (blasphemously travestied as it is) which belongs to a dispensation past and future. Turning from Matt. xxvi let us consider I Cor. xi.23-26.

This passage at first sight seems to nullify all that has been said before. For twelve months the words “Till He come” prevented us from uttering a word as to our growing conviction of the dispensational character of the Lord’s Supper. We shrunk from touching a subject which appears to deal with the Person of the Saviour, and the loyal affectionate remembrance of His people. We have not arrived at our present conclusions hastily, nor heartlessly, but have sought to know the truth according as it is written. First of all let us consider the statement, “I have received of the Lord.” If we turn to I Cor. xv. 3 we shall read, “For I delivered unto you first of all that which I also received”; or Gal. i. 11, 12, “For I certify you, brethren, that the gospel which was preached of me is not after man, for I neither received it of man, neither was I taught it, but by the revelation of Jesus Christ.” Paul continually declared his entire independence of man, both as to his apostleship and hi-doctrine.

Many at Corinth were being led away by Judaising teachers to doubt or deny his office. “Am I not an apostle?” he cries, “Are not ye my work in the Lord?” (I Cor. ix.1). “In nothing was I behind the very chiefest apostles” (II Cor.xii. 11). The apostle immediately follows his words of censure, “I praise you not” (I Cor. xi. 22), with the reminder of his authority, “For I have received of the Lord.” There is no warrant to make this statement mean more than the immediately preceding context indicates. The institution of the Lord’s Supper was no secret. The apostle Paul received no further teaching regarding it than could be gathered from the records in the Gospels; he emphasizes his words in this way to help the Corinthian believers to be more ready to listen to his rebukes in relation to their abuse of the ordinance.

Let us also consider this, that every one of these Corinthian believers who assembled to partake of the Lord's Supper had some spiritual gift. It was not that a few had gifts, but "every one of you hath a psalm, hath a doctrine, hath a tongue, hath a revelation, hath an interpretation" (I Cor. xiv. 26). These supernatural gifts were in perfect harmony with the dispensation in which they were given; they were, moreover, equally in harmony with all that we have seen relative to the Lord's Supper. Will those who believe that the Lord's Supper is for them, satisfactorily (i.e. scripturally, not traditionally) explain their lack of these qualifications, which were possessed by those to whom the instructions concerning the Lord's Supper were sent? The "Gifts" and the Lord's Supper ceased at the close of Acts xxviii.; we search in vain for the faintest allusion to the ordinance in the epistles written after Acts xxviii. Why should we pick out one item from I Cor. xi and seek to perpetuate that, when we are compelled to confess that the very next verses in chapter xii. are written concerning that to which we can lay no claim?

If we read I Timothy we find the apostle giving Timothy detailed instructions "that he may know how to behave in the house of God." The apostle repeats some of his instructions regarding the ministry of women (cf. I Tim. ii. and I Cor. xi. 1-17), and yet, although the Lord's Supper is the very next item in I Cor. xi., he finds no place for it in his instruction to Timothy. The simple reason is that when the kingdom became in abeyance, everything connected therewith necessarily went with it. Spiritual gifts, the Lord's Supper, the covenants, all went with the kingdom teaching. The apostle was then commissioned to set out the new economy. To him was the grace given "to make all see what is the dispensation of the mystery which from all ages hath been hid in God" (Eph. iii. 9, R.V.).

This was a revelation of something entirely new, unforeseen, unprecedented, something not found in the Scriptures, but hidden by God away from all ages. No one could tell us what was to be observed or omitted except the apostle divinely appointed and commissioned. He has told us. The epistles of Paul written after Acts xxviii contain a complete system of doctrine and instruction for the church of the present dispensation. Where anything that obtained under the previous dispensation was to be repeated, we are told so. The repetition of the ministry of women (I Cor. xi. & I Tim. ii.) is a case in point. Where a modification or alteration was to be made, we are told so. The specific statement as to one baptism in Eph. iv definitely sets aside the two baptisms (water and spirit) which obtained during the pentecostal period covered by the Acts, and gives us to-day one baptism—that of the Spirit.

We do not find a catalogue of things which we are not to do, for the list would be too great, and the record unnecessary. In the epistles after Acts xxviii we have all that is necessary for our guidance, comfort and teaching. We add to the Word of God sent to us by the apostle to the Gentiles at our peril. Those who desire to enter into the blessed realization of the dispensation of the secret will abide by the revelation of God pertaining thereto. Those who cannot rest satisfied unless they see or do something, will perpetuate the observance of ordinances, but not without the inevitable consequences that follow "zeal for God, but not according to knowledge." If we are right to introduce, upon our own initiative, the Lord's Supper into this present dispensation, why not spiritual gifts, tongues, miracles? Why not be thorough? Apart from the silence of the later epistles, the whole weight of their positive testimony is against the introduction or perpetuation of that which was definitely linked with Israel, the new covenant, and the kingdom.

Some reader may interrupt here and say, what do you understand by the words "Till He Come"? The Lord has not come, and it seems that until He does we must perforce continue the observance of this ordinance. This passage is so important that we propose devoting a separate paper to its consideration, rather than hastily deal with it as one point among many.

Of all the Gospels, the one written by John is the one which seems to approach nearer to the truth for the present time than the rest. Nine-tenths of the gospel preaching of to-day is based upon passages from John's Gospel. The hope and comfort of many a believer are enshrined in the sacred words of John xiv.-xvii. There are many who might be willing to go so far as to agree that Matthew was indeed kingdom truth, but, say they, you must leave us John. Is it not striking that the Lord's Supper, so fully described and enjoined in Matthew, the kingdom Gospel, is omitted by John who above all should have taught it if he had a message for believers to-day. It is not as though the feast does not come into the subject of his writing, it does. John xiii tells of the betrayal and many incidents which took place at that supper. This omission must not be lightly set aside; it adds its weight to the evidence we seek to bring from the Word on this important subject.

Let not our faith stand in the wisdom of men; let none give up the Lord's Supper merely because someone has said that it is undispensational. "Search and see," then act according to the teaching of the Word, and though misunderstanding and censure be our portion here, we shall have the joy of being unashamed in that day, through the endeavour to rightly divide the Word of truth.

Titus i.	1. Paul, a servant of God, and an apostle of Jesus Christ, according to the faith of God's elect, and the acknowledging of the truth which is after godliness; 2. In hope of eternal life, which God, that cannot lie, promised before the world began; 3. But hath in due times manifested his word through preaching, which is committed unto me according to the commandment of God our Saviour;

The dispensational place of the Lord's Supper.
Till He Come.
pp. 91-96

In our last paper we considered the relation of the Lord's Supper with the present dispensation, but held over the inquiry into the passage partly quoted in the sub-heading of this article. I Cor. xi.26 says, "For as often as ye eat this bread, and drink this cup, ye do show the Lord's death till He come." The natural conclusion upon reading these words is, the Lord has not come, therefore we must continue to observe the Lord's Supper.

Logic operates within certain fixed boundaries. There is a circumstance, not reckoned in this argument, which alters the case completely, viz., the complete cessation of the dispensation in which I Cor. xi found its place. We must remember that we are not at liberty to take a truth revealed at some later period back into an earlier period in matters of interpretation. To understand the meaning of the words "Till He come," we must acquaint ourselves with the teaching concerning that coming, which falls within the boundary line of that particular dispensation. If we read into I Cor. xi teaching that was not revealed, and which was kept an absolute secret until some years afterwards, we must expect to reap a harvest of confusion for our pains.

There is a word which runs throughout the Scriptures pertaining to kingdom and pentecostal times, which will help us in our studies; that word is in the original tongue, the word parousia, and is translated sometimes "coming," and sometimes "presence." It occurs 24 times in the New Testament. Seventeen of these occurrences refer to Christ, and the remaining seven refer to others, Paul, Titus, Timothy, Stephanas, and antichrist (I Cor. xvi.17; II Cor. vii. 6, 7; x.10; Phil. i. 26; ii. 12; II Thess. ii. 9). The first canonical and historical use of the word occurs in Matt. xxiv., and if we allow the canon of interpretation to be true that the first occurrence of any word supplies the key to its meaning, then most certainly parousia belongs to the kingdom, and not to the mystery. Let us consider the context of this first occurrence:--

> "And as He sat upon the Mount of Olives (inseparably connected with the kingdom, see Zech. xiv. 4; Matt. xxvi. 30; Acts i. 6, 12, etc.), the disciples came to Him privately, saying, Tell us when shall these things be, and what will be the sign of Thy parousia (coming), and the sunteleia (the 'ending together' of events that culminate in the end) of the age?"

The Apocalypse is the inspired record of the sunteleia of the age, and with it the parousia is connected. In answer to the question "When," the Lord gives a series of prophetic utterances commencing with the word "Then" (see Matt. xxiv. 9, 10, 16, 21, 23, 30, 40, and xxv. 1). It must be remembered that the word translated "Then" is a definite mark of time, "then at that time." In Matt. xxiv. 21 we read, "Then shall be great tribulation, such as was not since the beginning of the world to this time, no, nor ever shall be." These words single out this tribulation from any other, consequently Rev. vii. 14 refers to the same period, "These are they which came out of the tribulation, the great." This time of Jacob's trouble" will be brought to an end by the second coming of the Lord. "For as the lightning cometh out of the east, and shineth even unto the west, so also shall the parousia be of the Son of man" (Matt. xxiv. 27).

This coming directly in connection with the false messiahs and false prophets, with their "great signs and wonders," links the passage with II Thess. ii., and consequently with the antichrist. In II Thess. ii. 8, 9 we read:--

> "And then shall that wicked one be revealed, whom the Lord shall consume with the spirit of His mouth, and shall destroy with the brightness of His parousia (cf. 'as the lightning,' Matt.xxiv. 27), even him, whose parousia (the travesty of the Lord's) is after the working of satan, with all power, and signs, and lying wonders."

Remember, satan travesties truth. The false messiah's parousia is connected with "powers, signs and lying wonders." Now these powers, signs, and lying wonders are an exact counterfeit of Pentecost, as a reference to the Greek of Heb. ii. 4 will show, and go to prove that the parousia of the Lord Jesus is that spoken of by Peter in Acts iii. 19, 20, connecting it with Israel, the prophet Joel, and the day of the Lord. Matt. xxiv. 29 continues:--

> "Immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven, and the powers of the heavens shall be shaken: and then shall appear the sign of the Son of man in heaven, and then shall all the tribes of the land mourn, and they shall see the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory."
> "Behold, He cometh with clouds, and every eye shall see Him, and they also which pierced Him, and all tribes of the land shall wail because of Him" (Rev. i. 7).

Isaiah, speaking of "the day of the Lord" (Rev. i.10) in Isa. xiii. 6-11, says in v.10:--

> "For the stars of heaven and the constellations thereof shall not give their light; the sun shall be darkened in his going forth, and the moon shall not cause her light to shine."

See also the following passages, Ezek. xxxii. 7; Joel ii. 30, 31; Amos v. 20; Zeph. i. 14, 15; Acts ii. 19, 20; Rev. vi. 12-17; and again consider the question, What has all this to do with the church of the mystery? Interpreted of Israel and the kingdom, all is clear; strained to fit the church of Ephesians, all is confusion. In Matt. xxiv. 37-39 we read:--

> "But as the days of Noah were, so shall also the parousia of the Son of man be. For, as in the days that were before the flood, they were eating and drinking, marrying and giving in marriage, until the day that Noah entered into the ark, and knew not till the flood came and took them all away; so shall also the parousia of the Son of man be."

To what do the words "eating, drinking and marrying" refer, for of themselves these things are right and good? In Exod. xxxii. 6 in connection with the idolatry of the golden calf, we read, "The people sat down to eat and to drink." Further on in the history of Israel we read in Numb. xxv. 1-3:--

> "And Israel abode in Shittim, and the people began to commit whoredom with the daughters of Moab, and they called the people unto the sacrifices of their gods; and the people did eat, and bowed down to their gods, and Israel joined unto Baal-peor."

The previous chapter gives the record of Balaam, and this throws a lurid light on the prophetic picture of the near future given in Rev.ii. 14, 20:--

> "Thou hast there them who hold the doctrine of Balaam, who taught Balak to cast a stumbling-block before the children of Israel, to eat things sacrificed unto idols, and to commit fornication."
> "Thou sufferest that-woman Jezebel, which calleth herself a prophetess, to teach and seduce My servants to commit fornication, and to eat things sacrificed unto idols."

The parousia of the Son of man will take place when this world has become a very pandemonium of licentiousness and uncleanness (see Rev. iii. 4; ix. 20, 21; xxi. 8, and xxii. 15, where this fearful sin, done under the cloak of a religions observance, is referred to). Some readers may say, Why refer to this awful subject? Scripture abounds with warnings concerning this characteristic of the end. Spiritism is the present-day forerunner of the counterpart of the days of Noah, even as the "sons of God who saw the daughters of men that they were fair," etc., in Gen. vi were the cause of the corruption that necessitated the flood. Let us heed the warning, and have nothing whatever to do with this awful thing. Continuing our study of the use of the word parousia, in I Thess. iv. 15, 16, we read:--

> "For this we say unto you by the word of the Lord, that we which are alive and remain unto the parousia of the Lord, shall in no wise precede them that are fallen asleep. For the Lord Himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trumpet of God, and the dead in Christ shall rise first."

One archangel is mentioned in Scripture, "Michael the archangel" (Jude 9). According to Dan. xii. 1, Michael is "the great prince which standeth for the children of thy people" (see also Dan. x. 13, 21). When Michael stands up there shall be > "a time of trouble, such as never was since there was a nation even to that same time, and at that time thy people shall be delivered, every one that shall be found written in the book. And many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake."

Here we have the connection between I Thess. iv. and Dan. xii., where the archangel is directly related to the resurrection (even as Jude 9), and the people of the kingdom--Israel. James and Peter refer to this parousia of the Lord. Those to whom James wrote attended the synagogue (ii. 2), they were the "twelve tribes scattered abroad" (i.1). Patience during the time of trouble is the exhortation, "Be patient, therefore, brethren, unto the parousia of the Lord" (v. 7, 8). Peter speaks of the parousia several times in his second epistle:--

> "For we have not followed cunningly devised fables, when we made known unto you the power and parousia of the Lord Jesus Christ, but were eye-witnesses of His majesty, for He received from God the Father honour and glory" (II Pet. i. 16).

This passage has reference to the "Transfiguration" (Matt. xvii. 1). The words, "honour and glory" are terms which belong to the kingdom (see Heb. ii. 6, 7, and Psa. viii.). They further refer to the consecration of the priest in his robes of "glory and beauty." "We see not yet. . . . but we see Jesus. . . . crowned with glory and honour" (Heb. ii. 8, 9). The "not yet" of Heb. ii. 8 was a difficulty which Peter confessed. In II Pet. iii.1-13 the scoffers are reported as saying, "Where is the (fulfilment of the) promise of His parousia?" The apostle assures his hearers that the non-fulfilment of the promise is not the result of "slackness" on the Lord's part, it was rather His "longsuffering." He continues by speaking of the day of the Lord coming "as a thief in the night," exactly as Paul does in I Thess. iv. and v. Peter, however, had to refer his readers to Paul's epistles, saying:--

> "Our beloved brother Paul also, according to the wisdom given unto him, hath written unto you, as also in all his epistles, speaking in them of these things, in which there are some things hard to be understood" (II Pet. iii. 15, 16).

The scoffers knew about the parousia; Peter knew of that hoped-for coming, but he did not understand a great deal of the truth committed to Paul, viz., the dispensation of the mystery which comes in the "gap" occasioned by the setting aside of Israel, and the postponement of "the promise of His parousia." In I Cor. xv. 22, 23 we read, "Christ the firstfruits, afterward they that are Christ's in His parousia." In I Thess. iv. the apostle had revealed the fact that some would be "alive, and remain unto the parousia of the Lord," which we saw had a connection with Dan. xii. and Israel. Here in I Cor. xv. he gives further teaching:--

> "Behold, I show you a mystery, we shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trumpet. For the trumpet shall sound (see I Thess. iv. 15, 16), and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed."

Now "when" this shall take place "then" Isa. xxiv. and xxv. 8, 9 will be fulfilled. Then "the kingdoms of the world will have become the kingdoms of our Lord and of His Christ." These words are spoken at the sounding of the seventh trumpet. No trumpet is recorded after this, and so we are justified in speaking of this as the "last trump." If we have to argue that there may be another, it suggests that something is wrong with our theology. The effect of the sounding of the seventh trumpet extends to Rev. xx., where we have the first resurrection, the resurrection of those who have gone through the great tribulation, and who share the glory of the millennial reign on earth.

Space will not allow reference to every occurrence of the word parousia, but the remaining passages will be found to bear out the conclusions we have drawn. So far we have confined our attention to the Gospel of Matthew, I and II Thessalonians, Peter, James, I Corinthians and Revelation; in other words, we have avoided the special epistles of the mystery. If we want to learn in what respect the parousia is connected with the church of the mystery, we shall have to consider the references to it in the Prison Epistles. Our space is exceedingly limited for this most important investigation, but we need not be alarmed, for if we patiently read through Ephesians, Philippians, Colossians, Timothy, and Titus, we shall not find a single reference to the parousia of Christ.

We have found the parousia connected with Israel, antichrist, the great tribulation, the day of the Lord, everything to link it with the kingdom. Surely we need no further argument to prove that the second coming, as taught, believed, and hoped for before Acts xxviii., in I Corinthians, and during the "time of the end," is clearly to be distinguished from "that blessed hope," which lies before the believer during this present peculiar dispensation of the mystery. "Till He come" must refer to this parousia coming; this was the only coming revealed. That coming, like all else connected with the kingdom, has become in abeyance. It has absolutely nothing to do with the members of the one body.

The dispensational place of the Lord's Supper.

Some further thoughts upon difficult themes.
pp. 107-114

We believe that some of our readers will welcome a further word or two upon the deeply important subjects which have exercised our hearts and minds of late, viz., the Lord's Supper, our present position, and future hope.

We may express the feelings of many in language like this, we have followed the line of teaching set forth in the previous numbers of this Magazine, and have felt that there is truth in the position therein advanced. We see more clearly than ever the distinction between the earthly sphere of redemptive operations—the kingdom, and the heavenly sphere—the church of the mystery. We, moreover, feel that the Lord's Supper does undoubtedly belong to that period when Israel was still a nation, and when kingdom hopes were still possible of fulfillment, yet we are reluctant to give up this sacred ordinance. May we not still continue to drink the wine, and break the bread in loving memory of the Lord Jesus Christ, and His atoning mercy? Moreover, it is certainly a fact that in the epistles of Paul written after Acts xxviii. the apostle does not speak so much of Christ's second coming as the hope of the church, but of the believer's manifestation with Christ "in glory" (Col. iii. 4; Titus ii. 13, 14), yet all this seems so intangible, so vague, that we seem to have let go the reality to grasp the shadow.

Let it be clearly understood that all whose thoughts are echoed in the above words have our deepest sympathy. We would not cause a moment's pain to one believer in our Lord if it could be avoided. "Faithful are the wounds of a friend," saith the Scripture, and if any are wounded by the contents of either the past, present, or future issues of this little witness, it is only because the writer would seek to point readers to the truth of the Word, which Word is likened to a sword that pierces, a hammer that breaks, and a fire that burns, as well as the bread and water of life, and the healing balm for our souls. In the first place, we must not shrink back from obedience to the Word of God simply because we do not see where it leads, or what the goal may be. If we follow the written Word we shall of necessity be led in the way of truth, but we must also be prepared to "walk by faith, and not by sight."

We must have the same faith that was so signally manifested in Abraham, "By faith Abraham, when he was called to go out. . . . obeyed." Now notice the character of this obedience of faith, "And he went out not knowing whither he went" (Heb. xi. 8). Abraham did not go out blindly, for he knew that the Lord had spoken, "Faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the Word of God." Some have had "ears to hear" what the Word of the Lord has said. They have sought to act according to that Word. The result is that the bonds of human tradition have severed. They find that "the truth has made them free"; free to believe all that God has said, free to desire to act according to the testimony of our Lord through Paul, His prisoner, the chosen apostle of the mystery—the dispensation of the grace to the Gentiles. They find that many of their former friends are left behind, that the writings of beloved teachers are of little help, that they can enter into fellowship with the apostle who said, "Forgetting those things which are behind, and reaching forth unto the things which are before, I press toward the mark, for the prize of the upward call of God in Christ Jesus" (Phil. iii. 13, 14). It should be no cause for wonder that those who have thus stepped out should, for a while, be like Abraham, who knew not wither he went.

> "One thing we know, that whereas once we were blind, now we see" (John ix. 25).
> "One things have we desired of the Lord, that will we seek after" (Psalm xxvii. 4).
> "One thing we do, forgetting the things behind, and reaching forth unto the things before, we press goalward" (Phil. iii. 13, 14).

Like the blind man in John ix., we may not be able to answer all the queries and quibbles of the Pharisees, but no arguments on their part, nor failures on our own, can alter the fact that whereas once we were blind, now we see. Like the Psalmist, our goal is the Lord in His temple. Not a temple made with hands, but heaven itself where our citizenship is, and from whence we look for a Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall change this body of our humiliation, that it may be transfigured unto the likeness of the body of His glory (Phil. iii. 20, 21).

An infallible test for doctrine has always been its attitude to the Person of the Lord Jesus Christ. "He shall glorify Me" is the Lord's witness to the Holy Spirit's teaching. Our forgetting of things behind has made us relinquish ordinances, dogmas, hopes, fears, and many God-given commands and promises, which we have seen were never addressed to us, but our appreciation of the Son of God, our love unto Him, our view of the grandeur and majesty of His heavenly throne, His present and future glory as raised "far above all," His position as Head of the church which is His body, all these things have become magnified as we have stepped over the boundary line of Acts xxviii. into the epistles of the fulness." Our own position has also changed from that of babes to that of full-grown men. The things which pertained to the days of childhood are forgotten, and found to be unnecessary and a hindrance.The "milk" of the Word has been exchanged for the "strong meat" (cf. I Cor. ii., iii.; Heb. v. 11-14) of the mystery, which was hidden away from all generations.

Let us consider afresh some items of these deeply important things. The connection between the Lord's Supper and the new covenant is established in Matt. xxvi. 28. We are not left in doubt as to the meaning of this new covenant. The very latest reference to it is found in Heb. viii., and there its distinctive Jewish and kingdom bearing is fully set forth. The house of Judah and the house of Israel are unequivocally set forth as the subjects of this new covenant, and its relation to the reinstating of Israel and Judah as the people of God is as clearly taught in Heb. viii. as in Jer. xxxi. That the new covenant of II Cor. iii. is the same as that of Jer. xxxi. and Heb. viii. is clear from the evident allusion to Jer. xxxi. in II Cor. iii. 3. We find no covenant, old or new, in Paul's epistles written after Acts xxviii. The Lord's Supper was instituted on the night of the Passover, which commemorated the exodus from Egypt. The Lord's Supper was a pledge and seal of the new covenant promise to lead a redeemed Israel into the promised land under grace, not law.

Heb. v.	11. Of whom we have many things to say, and hard to be uttered, seeing ye are dull of hearing. 12. For when for the time ye ought to be teachers, ye have need that one teach you again which be the first principles of the oracles of God; and are become such as have need of milk, and not of strong meat. 13. For every one that useth milk is unskilful in the word of righteousness: for he is a babe. 14. But strong meat belongeth to them that are of full age, even those who by reason of use have their senses exercised to discern both good and evil.

Under the old covenant, Israel had to do with the law written on tables of stone (II Cor. iii.), "which covenant they brake" (Jer. xxxi. 32). The new covenant has to do with a sacrifice of infinitely greater worth than the blood of bulls, goats, or lambs; it leads no more to Sinai, and tables of stone, but forward to the inheritance of the land according to the original unconditional covenant made 430 years before the giving of the law (Gal. iii. 17), and to the time when the law of God shall be written upon the fleshy tables of the heart (Heb. viii.; II Cor. iii.).

The church of the mystery is as certainly redeemed by the precious blood of Christ as were the believers of the dispensations past. We love Him because He first loved us. We can enter into the Psalmist's word of praise, the prophet's glowing vision, and the preacher's burning zeal without transgressing the bounds of our inheritance. May we not drink the wine, and break the bread, simply out of loving memory of Him? Dear fellow-believer, it is not a question of love or remembrance. Surely, when we consider what He has done, what grace has accomplished, we need no symbols to keep alive our love or stimulate our hopes; if we do, we have not attained to that position laid down in the epistles of the mystery, which is entirely "in heavenly places in Christ." The apostle exhorts the believer thus, "Set your affections (or minds) upon things above, not on things on the earth, for ye died, and your life is hid with Christ in God" (Col. iii. 3). This is the divine answer to the words of Col. ii. 20, "Wherefore, if ye died with Christ from the rudiments of the world, why, as though living in the world, are ye subject to ordinance?" What can it mean by the words, "as though living in the world"? We are living in the world, and many times are forcibly reminded of it. It is explained by Col. iii. 3, "Ye died, and your life is hid with Christ in God." This is the ground of the present position, whether it be ecclesiastically, dispensationally, or doctrinally considered, all is on resurrection ground, in heavenly places in Christ. All that pertained to the flesh is dead and buried.

Fellow-believer, if you died with Christ, why are you subject to ordinances? What place can these have on resurrection ground? During a period of types, shadows, parables and symbols, water, wine and bread could set forth clearly the blessed teaching of the death, burial, and resurrection of the Lord. The picture book is fitting in the hand of the child; it is not a seemly manual for the full-grown man.

The burden of Col. ii., which has been aptly called "The Christian's Charter of Liberty," may be exhibited thus:--

Col. ii. 8-23.

Doctrine and instruction consequent on having died with Christ.

A | 8. Caution
  B | 9,10. Christ the Head. The fulness of God.
    C | 11-15. Divine ordinances done away in Christ.
A | 16-18. Caution.
  B | 19. Christ the Head. The increase of God.
    C | 20-23. Human ordinances done away in Christ.

Divine ordinances (e.g. circumcision) have received their fulfilment in Christ. Our circumcision is "made without hands." Human ordinances, such as "touch not, taste not, handle not," and all the multifarious rules and regulations of religion, have no power over one who has died with Christ. The ordinances of Believers' Baptism and of the Lord's Supper, while directly connected with faith, were also directly associated with the flesh and things seen in a marked manner. The believer, who has entered into the fulness of the gospel as proclaimed in Ephesians, wherein he sees that he has been quickened, raised from the grave of sin, and seated with Christ in the heavenlies, will not need reminders every week of the debt he owes.

We must realize that we cannot disassociate the Lord's Supper from its typical character, and its dispensational connection with kingdom promises. Nicodemus loved the Lord, or he would not have brought the spices to embalm His body, for by so doing he exposed himself to the hatred of the Sanhedrim. Nicodemus would have loved the Lord better, and with far more reality, if he had believed the Lord's words that He would rise again the third day. The others might have said that Nicodemus did not love the Lord so much had he refrained from sharing in the offices of the dead, but he would really have loved his Lord the more if he had believed in and waited for His resurrection from the dead. So with ourselves, we love the Lord none the less because we set our affections on things above. Our fellow-believers may chide us with coldness, but what of that! our joy is not resting in the approbation of the most saintly; our joy is found in Him and His approval. We know that if we rightly divide the Word of truth we shall be workmen who will have no need for shame in that day, although much misunderstood in man's day.

Again, many feel the loss of I Thess. iv. very keenly. Oh, that they may feel the "gain" of Phil. iii. as Paul did. As a Pharisee, and after his conversion, Paul believed that the dead would be raised, and that Messiah would come in glory to take the kingdom. He believed that the archangel Michael would stand up for Israel during their time of trouble, and that there would then take place the resurrection mentioned in Dan. xii. There is only one archangel mentioned in Scripture, and his name is Michael. He is always connected with Israel (Dan. x. and xii.). "The archangel" of I Thess. iv. is Michael, and the resurrection there mentioned is the same as that of Dan. xii. I Thess. v connects it with "The day of the Lord." Paul willingly gave up all these things, and many other hopes which he had entertained after his conversion. When he had the mystery revealed to him he could gladly "count all things but loss" for the things which were before.

Is it nothing that our hope is related to His glory? Is it to be despised that soon we shall exchange these bodies for bodies like unto that of the glorified Lord? Is there nothing "tangible" in a "citizenship in heaven"? Is the promise "vague" that when Christ who is our life shall be manifested we shall be manifested with Him in glory? Did Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob suffer so much because of the promise that they should inherit the earth, and shall we speak of "the inheritance of the saints in the light" as something not worthy of comparison? We are all so much of the "earth, earthy" that we do not really enter into "the calling wherewith we have been called." The traditions of the ages have so blunted our feelings, and blinded our eyes, that we cannot perceive "what is the hope of His calling." By our attitude we are in reality asking, "What is the hope of His calling, and what the riches of the glory of His inheritance in the holiest of all"? If our eyes have been enlightened, then we may say the prayer of Eph. i. 18-20. The Lord will make plain the hope, and the riches of the glory.

Daniel (Dan. x.), Isaiah (Isa. vi.), Job (Job xlii.), Paul (Acts ix.), and John (Rev. i.) all testify to the exceeding greatness of the heavenly vision. We must not expect to apprehend all at once the things for which we have been apprehended by Christ (Phil. iii.). We want no "word battles." The apostle in Phil. iii. 15 says:--

> "Let us therefore, as many as be perfect (full grown, initiated), be thus minded, and if in anything ye be otherwise minded, God shall reveal even this unto you."

We have no commission to "strive." With meekness and gentleness we seek to teach the truth as far as we see it. We seek grace to be patient, to bear up under evil, in meekness instructing those who oppose themselves, peradventure God will give them a change of mind unto the knowledge of the truth. We can no more have two baptisms, if the Lord says to us in the sevenfold unity of the Spirit that there is but one. We can no more observe "Days" or "Sabbaths"; we can no more observe the Feast of Unleavened Bread, the Day of Atonement, the Passover, the Feast of Weeks or Pentecost, for all these things have passed away. So also the Lord's Supper. Instituted to look back (as the Passover looked forward) to the One who shed the blood of the new covenant, it has its place in the dispensation of the kingdom. The Lord's Supper is to the new covenant what the Passover Feast was to the Jew under the old covenant, and first typical deliverance. Those who are "children of faithful Abraham," whether Jews or Gentiles, are looking for the same inheritance as Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, whose affections, or minds, are connected with the earth and its blessing; these may, with some show of consistency, perpetuate the ordinance of the Lord's Supper, but those who have been blessed with all spiritual blessings in the heavenlies in Christ, who died with Christ, and who have been raised together with Him, whose hopes are not linked with a renewed earth, but with a new heaven, whose citizenship is not in the new Jerusalem which "comes down out of heaven," but is in heaven itself, whose destiny is not to sit upon thrones, judging Israel or the nations, but to show in the ages to come, unto principalities and powers in the heavenlies, the Lord's wonderful grace to them, these will find Christ to be their all, without the aid of type or symbol.

It is pleasant and refreshing to meet together with the Lord's people. The temptation to remain silent on these things is great. Do we show our love to Him who gave Himself for us by participating in a feast over which we begin to fell uneasy? Do we value opportunities of service above faithfulness? The Lord does not accept our service in this way. Let us be willing to limit our sphere of so-called service if it is to be at the expense of faithfulness. Let us be willing to "go out, not knowing"; let us be willing to suffer the loss of the fellowship of believers; let us be content to be misunderstood and misrepresented. He is with us; He knows; He sees the heart; men only see the outward appearance. Though all forsake us, we may say with Paul, "I know whom I have believed."

With some readers the problem is one of inability to see the teaching of the Word. With these we cannot argue; we pray that if they be otherwise minded, the Lord will show even this unto them. With others, however, it is not so much the inability to see the truth, as to do it. “If ye know these things, happy are ye if ye do them.” Our hope is bound up in the heavenly glory of the Lord. Our life is hid with Christ our God. Our walk, our service is on resurrection ground. Brethren, let us stand fast in the faith, and stand fast to the liberty wherewith Christ has made us free. Let us not appoint us a captain to return to bondage; let us go up, and possess the heavenly inheritance by faith, and walk in harmony therewith.

pp. 86-88

The subjects which have been considered in the last few numbers have been of a very controversial character. We do not enter the field of controversy merely for the love of argument, "necessity is laid upon us." We have need for a clear, frank opening up of the Word of truth, regardless of feelings, traditions, or fears. Three occurrences of the phrase "no more" in Heb. x. may provide us with a little help by the way, without entering into the field of controversy.

No more conscience of sins (Heb. x. 2).

What can bring about such a condition as this? Does this mean that the apostle was an advocate of the doctrine known as "sinless perfection"? A careful reading of Rom. vii.; Gal. v. 16-25; I John i. 6-10, and iii. 9 will evidence that the believer is in possession of two natures, one called "flesh," and the other called "spirit"; one "begotten of God," the other "begotten of the flesh," the one ever at warfare against the other. How then can such an one attain to the condition of "no more conscience of sins"? The whole verse and context supplies the scriptural reason and only answer:--

> "For the law having a shadow of the good things to come, not the very image of the things, can never, with the same sacrifices which year by year they offered continually, make the comers thereunto perfect; else would they not, in that case, have ceased being offered, by reason of those rendering the divine service having no more conscience of sins, being once for all purified?" (Heb. x. 1 and 2).

Ah! Yes, the "no more" depends upon the "once for all." This blessed state is not brought about by "turning over new leaves," by belittling sin, by reducing God's holy standard; no, it comes into the very light of the presence of God, it walks in the light as He is in the light, it has fellowship with God, yet never does it say, "I have not sinned," or "I have no sin." The secret of that holy boldness is that "the blood of Jesus Christ, His Son, cleanseth us from all sin," or (as above) "being once for all purified." This is the testimony of the other occurrences of this word "conscience" in Hebrews. The offering of the blood of bulls and goats never touched the conscience, they "could not make him that did the service perfect, as pertaining to the conscience" (Heb. ix. 9). But "if the blood of bulls and goats. . . . sanctifieth to the purifying of the flesh, how much more shall the blood of Christ who through the eternal Spirit offered Himself without spot to God, purge your conscience from dead works" (Heb. ix. 14). Hence Heb. x. 22 says, "Let us draw near with a true heart in full assurance of faith, having our hearts sprinkled from an evil conscience."

The passage under consideration does not mean that the believer will never be troubled by sin any more, this is not the case at all. As he "grows in grace," his own unworthiness and defilement appear to deepen, but all through he has the glad consciousness that the blood of Christ has "once for all" settled the whole question of his sin and sins before God.

> "It is not possible that the blood of bulls and goats should take away sins. . . . but this One, after He had offered one sacrifice for sins for ever, sat down on the right hand of God" (Heb. x. 4-12).

Fellow-believer, He sat down, His work "finished"; can you not rest if He does? Surely nothing more is needed, if He who came to save has "sat down," for by one offering He hath perfected unto perpetuity them that are sanctified" (Heb. x. 14)

No more remembrance (Heb. x. 17).

What is the result of this wonderful offering? The next verse goes on immediately, "Wherefore. . . . their sins and their iniquities I will remember no more." Oh! The joy of it! The sacrifice of Christ not only breathes its blessed "no more" to our conscience, it also says "no more" to the memory of God. "Blessed is he whose transgression is forgiven, whose sin is covered" (Psa. xxxii. 1).

No more offering (Heb. x. 18).

Even this is not all. So complete is the offering, so full the forgiveness and the forgetfulness, so perfect the cleansing, that the Lord can add, "Now where remission of these is, there is no more offering for sin" (Heb. x. 18). No more conscience of sin! No more remembrance of sin! No more offering for sin! This speaks to us of perfection. Never through all eternity will that one offering need repetition. Its efficacy avails "to the uttermost." Sins past, present, and even future (which, O Lord, give grace to reduce) are all met and dealt with by the precious blood of Christ.

Hebrews x.

1. For the law having a shadow of good things to come, and not the very image of the things, can never with those sacrifices which they offered year by year continually make the comers thereunto perfect.
2. For then would they not have ceased to be offered? because that the worshippers once purged should have had no more conscience of sins.
3. But in those sacrifices there is a remembrance again made of sins every year.
4. For it is not possible that the blood of bulls and of goats should take away sins.
5. Wherefore when he cometh into the world, he saith, Sacrifice and offering thou wouldest not, but a body hast thou prepared me:
6. In burnt offerings and sacrifices for sin thou hast had no pleasure.
7. Then said I, Lo, I come (in the volume of the book it is written of me,) to do thy will, O God.
8. Above when he said, Sacrifice and offering and burnt offerings and offering for sin thou wouldest not, neither hadst pleasure therein; which are offered by the law;
9. Then said he, Lo, I come to do thy will, O God. He taketh away the first, that he may establish the second.
10. By the which will we are sanctified through the offering of the body of Jesus Christ once for all.
11. And every priest standeth daily ministering and offering oftentimes the same sacrifices, which can never take away sins:
12. But this man, after he had offered one sacrifice for sins for ever, sat down on the right hand of God;
13. From henceforth expecting till his enemies be made his footstool.
14. For by one offering he hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified.
15. Whereof the Holy Ghost also is a witness to us: for after that he had said before,

16. This is the covenant that I will make with them after those days, saith the Lord, I will put my laws into their hearts, and in their minds will I write them;
17. And their sins and iniquities will I remember no more.
18. Now where remission of these is, there is no more offering for sin.
19. Having therefore, brethren, boldness to enter into the holiest by the blood of Jesus,
20. By a new and living way, which he hath consecrated for us, through the veil, that is to say, his flesh;
21. And having an high priest over the house of God;
22. Let us draw near with a true heart in full assurance of faith, having our hearts sprinkled from an evil conscience, and our bodies washed with pure water.
23. Let us hold fast the profession of our faith without wavering; (for he is faithful that promised;)
24. And let us consider one another to provoke unto love and to good works:
25. Not forsaking the assembling of ourselves together, as the manner of some is; but exhorting one another: and so much the more, as ye see the day approaching.
26. For if we sin wilfully after that we have received the knowledge of the truth, there remaineth no more sacrifice for sins,
27. But a certain fearful looking for of judgment and fiery indignation, which shall devour the adversaries.
28. He that despised Moses' law died without mercy under two or three witnesses:
29. Of how much sorer punishment, suppose ye, shall he be thought worthy, who hath trodden under foot the Son of God, and hath counted the blood of the covenant, wherewith he was sanctified, an unholy thing, and hath done despite unto the Spirit of grace?
30. For we know him that hath said, Vengeance belongeth unto me, I will recompense, saith the Lord. And again, The Lord shall judge his people.
31. It is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God.
32. But call to remembrance the former days, in which, after ye were illuminated, ye endured a great fight of afflictions;
33. Partly, whilst ye were made a gazingstock both by reproaches and afflictions; and partly, whilst ye became companions of them that were so used.
34. For ye had compassion of me in my bonds, and took joyfully the spoiling of your goods, knowing in yourselves that ye have in heaven a better and an enduring substance.
35. Cast not away therefore your confidence, which hath great recompence of reward.
36. For ye have need of patience, that, after ye have done the will of God, ye might receive the promise.
37. For yet a little while, and he that shall come will come, and will not tarry.
38. Now the just shall live by faith: but if any man draw back, my soul shall have no pleasure in him.
39. But we are not of them who draw back unto perdition; but of them that believe to the saving of the soul.

Berean Expositor Volume 1

Bible Numerics.

An aid to interpretation.

pp. 88-91

> "Re-numerics.—I think a few thoughts would be invaluable. We stand open mouthed, as it were, at the data, but want a little guidance as to how to apply the truth revealed to us."

Such was the reply of a beloved colleague to an enquiry as to whether a few words regarding the application of "Numerics" to "Interpretation" would be of use in The Berean Expositor. Many of our readers will be acquainted with the wonderful findings of Mr. Ivan Panin, who has been used of God to show, beyond the faintest possibility of doubt, that the choice of words, grammatical forms, use of vowels, consonants, syllables, and letters in the Originals of the Holy Scriptures are all governed by a most elaborate scheme of numerics. For example, the first eleven verses of Matt.1 have been explored with overwhelming results. We remind our readers of a few only:-- a. This passage has a vocabulary of 49 words (7*7).

b. 28 of these begin with a vowel (7*4), and
c. 21 begin with a consonant (7*3).
d. 7 end with a vowel (7), and
e. 42 end with a consonant (7*6).
f. These 49 (7*7) words have 266 letters (7*38).
g. Of these letters 140 are vowels (7*20), and
h. 126 are consonants (7*18).

NOTE: * = multiply.

We cannot spare space to go further. We have mentioned eight features of sevens; many of more involved character have been tabulated.What are we to learn from this numerical feature? "The words of the Lord (not merely the Word, but the very words) are pure words, as silver tried in a furnace (words of earth, yet) purified SEVEN times" (Psa. xii. 6). In other terms, the Scriptures bear God's hall mark, perfection is stamped upon every syllable, nay, every letter.Thus the knowledge of Bible numerics shows us that the belief in the full, verbal inspiration of Scripture is the only consistent attitude of faith possible. No lower or modified inspiration can be entertained.

Let us now turn our attention for a moment to consider how the numerics of a passage throw light upon its meaning. In the term Numerics we include (a) Gematria, (b) Number of occurrences of words or things, and (c) Number of words used for the same idea. Gematria is the ancient name for the numerical value of the letters of the Hebrew and Greek alphabet. Figures were unknown. A stood for 1, B for 2, and G for 3, and so on. Hence the Gematria of the word "bag" would be 6 (2+1+3). Now we find that the Gematria of "satan," his title and his agents, in Hebrew and Greek, are continually multiples of 13. Thirteen has always been a number of ill-omen among the superstitious; maybe there is some deeper reason for it than we had supposed. The first occurrence of the number links it with rebellion (Gen. xiv. 4).

The inspired explanation of that old serpent—"who is called the devil and satan" (Rev. xii. 9), is 13*13*13. Here we see at a glance that, in the Apocalypse, rebellion has reached its zenith in satan. Travelling back from revelation to the Old Testament, we find that the word satan is 13*28. Here we have further light upon his character. 28 is the number of Gen. i. 1, for that brief verse contains (in Hebrew) 7 words and 28 letters. Seven signifies spiritual perfection, and four is associated with the earth and the creature. The Gematria of the word satan then tells us that into the perfect creation (28) satan introduced rebellion (13). Satan is linked also to man in the awful word "Belial," for that is 13*6. The Greek word "serpent" takes us further, for that is 13*60, while the Gematria of the words, "The son of perdition, who opposeth and exalteth himself above all that is called God, or that is worshipped, so that he, as God, sitteth in the temple of God, showing himself that he is God," tells us plainly that antichrist will be man, satan possessed, for the numerical value is 13*13*13*6.

What shall we say then, when we find that the words "Jesus of Nazareth" have as their Gematria the very same as satan, for it is 13*13*13! How it emphasises the humiliation of our Lord! Truly we see that "Christ hath redeemed us. . . . being made a curse." How fully He fulfilled His own words, "As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of man be lifted up"! Shall we say there is nothing in numerics after this?

Even, this is not all. That offering of Christ as the substitute, though it brought the Lord Jesus under the curse, yet glorified God. Consequently we find the words, "God is glorifed in Him," yielding the same remarkable number, 13*13*13! Thus even numerics show that satan's rebellion is overthrown and overruled by the cross to bring glory to God. Joktan (Gen. x.) is the 13th from Shem. He has 13 sons, the Gematria of his own name is a multiple of 13, and so also is the sum of the names of his children. This throws light upon the omission of his name, and the taking up of Peleg, in Gen. xi. The Bible is full of purpose—that is the secret of its interpretation. Surely we must see design in all this.

Take another illustration of the way in which the Gematria of names indicates the character of the owners. The Gematria of the four names, Noah, Shem, Ham, and Japhet is 936, but if we take away the name of Ham, the father of Canaan, the Gematria of Noah, Shem, and Japhet is 888. The number 888 is significantly the numerical value of the word "Jesus," and stands in contrast to 666, the number of antichrist (Rev. xiii. 18).

The number eleven is worthy of study. Deut. i. 2 tells us that from Horeb to Kadesh-Barnea was a journey of eleven days! Now eleven is one short of twelve, the number of Israel. One more day would have seen them in the promised land; as it was they failed. There are eleven books in the third section of the Hebrew Old Testament called the Psalms, or Kethuveem, i.e., the Writings. These eleven Books give the inner history of Israel's failure. The central book of the eleven is the book of Lamentations. This book is composed throughout of sets of elevens, its chapters containing 22, 22, 66, 22, and 22 verses, respectively. The number of times a word occurs, or the number of words used of one thing, often assists us in arriving at the true meaning. The absolute character of God's truth is emphasized when we find that, although there are many Hebrew words for "error," there is but one for "truth"! Seven words are used in Leviticus for "gold"—a type of Christ and the Word.

Space will not allow of further examples. The numerics of the Original Scripture provide us with a sure test in the case of disputed readings. If the ancient reading of John i. 18, supported by Westcott and Hort, be retained, John i. 1-18 presents a wonderful phenomenom of sevens, which is spoiled if the reading as in the A.V. is used. The numeric structure demands the reading, "GOD, only begotten," instead of "Only begotten SON," which is, moreover, brought into harmony structurally with the first verse (John i. 1-18 being arranged as a simple introversion, verse 1 corresponding with verse 18, 2 with 17, etc.), and gives us definite teaching concerning the deity of Christ.

Let us then be willing and ready to believe that the God who has arranged even this system of numerics in His Word, intends that we should use it to His glory, and our enlightenment.

Gen. xiv. 4	Twelve years they served Chedorlaomer, and in the thirteenth year they rebelled.

John i. 18	No man hath seen God at any time; the only begotten Son, which is in the bosom of the Father, he hath declared him.

pp. 97-99

Peace! What a word is this! How like a balm it soothes and mollifies. How often the apostle was inspired in the opening words of his epistles to wish the saints "Peace!" Peace is one of the Lord's blessings for His people (Psa. xxix. 11). One of the titles of Christ that Isaiah early uses is "The Prince of Peace." Again, it is in Isaiah that we read that comforting passage, "Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace whose mind is stayed on Thee, because he trusteth in Thee. Trust ye in the Lord for ever, for in the Lord Jehovah is the Rock of Ages" (Isa. xxvi. 3, 4).

A most profitable study would be a consideration of the way in which this word is used by the apostle Paul. In the epistle to the Romans we find the word used more than in any other epistle. There it occurs eleven times. Speaking of man by nature the apostle says, "The way of peace have they not known" (Rom. iii. 17), and he prefaces this with the solemn words, "Destruction and misery are in their ways." What a contrast! Their ways, and the way of peace. When we look back upon those ways, what grace, what love it must have been that set our feet in the "way of peace." How accurate is the scripture, "They are all gone out of the way" (the way of peace), singular, whereas "their ways" is plural. Many are the ways of misery and enmity, but one way only is the way of peace. If we would enquire the way of peace, we shall find it stated in chapter v. 1, "Being justified by faith, we have peace with God." The way of peace is not paved with good resolutions; none enter there because they have "turned over a new leaf"; the entrance to this road which leads to life and glory is "justification by faith."

This takes us back again to Rom. iii.; commencing at verse 23 we read, "For all sinned (in the past), and are coming short of the glory of God (in the present)." Here we have the hopeless and helpless condition of the unbeliever and believer alike, in themselves. Notice the words "coming short," and the word "glory." Both are closely connected with the thought of approval. God has a standard, but none have attained to it. Not till 4,000 years had rolled their course since the creation of Adam could the heavens open upon one in whom the Father was well-pleased (Matt.iii. 17). It is interesting to note that the word "well-pleased" (endokeõ) is connected with the word "glory" (doxa). The Lord Jesus alone of all born of women came up to the divine standard; all else have fallen short. In the case of candidates for government posts, to fall short of the required height by half an inch disqualifies as much as a foot; degrees there may be in sins, but not in sin—"All sinned, and are coming short of the glory of God."

The sentence must not be finished here, for this has no word of peace for sinners. It continues, "being justified freely by His grace, through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus." Ah! here is the ground of my peace with God. There is no interval between Rom. iii. 23 and iii. 24; no room for improvement. At the same moment that the sinner is "coming short," that same moment he may be justified. Rom. iv. 5 emphasizes the same blessed truth, "But to him that worketh not, but believeth on Him that justifieth the ungodly, his faith is counted for righteousness." Surely we can now appreciate the words of the apostle when he says, "justified freely."

The words "freely" is translated "without a cause" in John xv. 25. Justified without a cause! surely this is grace indeed, and it is all "through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus." Here then is the ground of our peace; this is the "justification by faith" which brings us "peace with God, through our Lord Jesus Christ." This glorious truth is expanded in Col. i. 20-22:--

> "And having made peace through the blood of His Cross, by Him to reconcile all things unto Himself; by Him, whether they be things in earth, or things in heaven. And you that were sometimes alienated and enemies (not knowing peace) in your mind by wicked works, yet now hath He reconciled in the body of His flesh through death, to present you holy, and unblamable, and unreprovable in His sight."

The peace which is the blessed privilege of the believer here is the anticipation of that final dispensation of the reconciliation of all things, when sin and sorrow shall flee away, and peace, perfect peace, will reign and rule (Col. i. 20; Eph. i. 10). Not only is peace connected with the cross of Christ, it is vitally connected with His resurrection. Rom. v. 1 reads on from Rom. iv. 24, 25, "Who was delivered because of our offences, and raised again because of our justifying; therefore being justified by faith, we have peace with God." There is, however, something more to be learned from this verse. The passage may read, "Therefore being justified, by faith let us have peace with God." We cannot "make our peace" with God (as some erroneously speak), but we may be exhorted, upon the basis of the perfect justification that is ours in Christ, "By faith let us have peace with God."

Why should anything come between now? sin has been dealt with, the sacrifice has been offered and accepted, "the fruit of righteousness shall be peace," "righteousness and peace have kissed each other"; therefore, oh believer, enter by faith into that peace which is yours. Let none say you nay when the Lord says that the peace has been made by the blood of His cross. Not only do we find peace through His blood, but we read the glorious words, "But now, in Christ Jesus, ye who sometimes were far off, are made nigh by the blood of Christ; for He is our peace." Let us dwell upon this (not doctrine merely, but Christ Himself), He is our peace. Well might the apostle say, as the yearning of his heart, "To be found in Him."

If He is our peace, how well we can understand the power that binds together the "Unity of the Spirit"; it is the "binding together of the peace." Man-made bonds cause friction, strife, division; the bond of peace never irritates, never chafes; oh, to know its power more. When men say "Peace," sudden destruction may be near, but when "the Lord giveth quietness, who then can make trouble?" (Job xxxiv. 29). Let us notice the Lord's action as recorded in John xx. 19, 20:--

> "Then. . . . came Jesus and stood in the midst, and saith unto them, Peace be unto you, and when He had so said He showed unto them His hands and His side. Then were the disciples glad when they saw the Lord. "

The Saviour not only said peace, but He pointed to the grounds of peace, the marks of Calvary, and a risen Lord. May we ever see that our peace takes its sole rise from this fount of mercy. May we never lean for peace upon the bruised reeds of man's good works; peace, true lasting peace, is found only by faith in the Lord, who for our sakes died and rose again. This is "peace with God." The peace of God is something different, though of course connected. Perhaps some other time we may have an opportunity of considering this other aspect of peace.

Platform and Programme.

"I believed, and therefore have I spoken."
"Seeing then that we have such a hope, we use great plainness of speech."
pp. 60-61

We believe that a word or two would not be amiss, and will certainly answer the queries of some of our readers as to the Purpose, Plan, Platform, and Programme of this little Pamphlet. We believe implicitly, and as a matter beyond dispute, that the original Hebrew and Greek of the Old and New Testaments are fully and verbally inspired. "All Scripture (graphe, meaning that which is written) is God-breathed" (II Tim. iii. 16). We desire, as grace may be given, to "search the Scriptures daily," and to publish the results regardless of the approval or the disapproval of any. Let it be once understood, the Bible is infallible, but the searcher is not. There will doubtless be much of human error, but we write as a Berean expositor, for Berean readers, trusting that they will test every statement by the Word of truth.

We do not intend to apologize for the Bible, nor for any teaching which may from time to time be brought to light. While we would seek to avoid any appearance of callousness, and would endeavour not to wound the feelings of our brethren, yet we intend, the Lord being our Helper, to turn back for nothing. We desire the same spirit, in at least some measure, that underlies the words of Paul, "None of these things move me." Some readers have written words of encouragement, some of warning and censure. We thank them all, but would publicly ask them to refrain from warning us as to "tendencies," &c., &c. We wish it to be plainly understood that we desire to be kept absolutely regardless of tendencies, &c., if the consideration of such would prevent us from honestly prosecuting our search in the wonderful Word of God.

We are told that we are robbing the Lord's children of their Bible, and of much of their possessions, by our teaching that the mystery was not revealed until after Acts xxviii. We are told that our article dealing with Rom. v savours of "Universalism" and other "isms." We shall be told that we are on "dangerous ground" with regard to the question of the "Immortality of the soul"; we care not for these things, all we ask is that every reader will "search and see whether these things are so." If the soul is immortal—good, let us believe it; if not—still good, let us reject it. We cannot go further with Rom. v. and Genesis iii. until this subject is settled.

One thing more. We wish it to be understood that we are not attempting in this day of corporate failure to organise a primitive church, nor to start another "Meeting," or circle of "Fellowship." We do not refrain by reason of indifference, but from our understanding of the Word of truth. The Bible Readings that are given at different places are purely Bible Readings and nothing more, the truth received thereat working its own way in each individual case. All believers are welcome, and some who do come represent widely differing sections of Christendom. We impose no code or terms of fellowship, but we have the joy of seeing widely differing brethren drawn together by the bonds of truth, and of seeing some who were enslaved in the fetters of tradition realizing the force of the words, "the truth shall make you free."

The enemy is advancing, we have put on the armour of God; let us not "bite and devour one another," but gathering around the glorious truth of God, "Let us stand fast to the freedom wherewith Christ has made us free."

The special and exclusive character of the Present Dispensation. pp. 66-71

In previous articles we have sought to show that the present dispensation is the "dispensation of the mystery which had been hidden away from the ages by God," and moreover that it did not commence until Israel was set aside in the last chapter of the Acts. Before Acts xxviii. the section of the kingdom of God was concerning Jesus, as related to the law of Moses, and the Prophets (Acts xxviii. 23). After the setting aside of Israel, the section of the kingdom of God was concerning the Lord Jesus Christ, without reference to Moses or Prophets. There have been several dispensations, each linked to some God-appointed messenger or representative:--

The dispensation of innocence and federal headship under Adam.
The dispensation of mercy and mediatorial headship under Christ.
The dispensation of conscience under the Patriarchs.
The dispensation of law under Moses.

All these and others have their own marked peculiarities and distinctions. When the dispensation changed a new order took place. Some of the terms of the past maybe were taken over into the successive economy, but some were omitted, some were modified, and some were completely reversed. The apostle Paul stands in relation to the present dispensation and the mystery as Moses did to the dispensation of law. Let us hear what he is inspired to record concerning this, for it is vitally important to us. In the first place we notice in Rom. xv. (the last epistle which Paul wrote before Acts xxviii.) that even there he draws attention to the difference between the ministry of the Lord Jesus when on earth, and that of his servant Paul. For the sake of clearness we quote the passage again:--

> "For I say that Christ became a minister of circumcision, in behalf of the truth of God, that he might confirm the promises made unto the fathers, and that the Gentiles might glorify God for His mercy" (Rom. xv. 8, 9).

In verses 15 and 16 the apostle says of his own ministry:--

> "By reason of the grace of God given unto me, that I should be a minister of Jesus Christ to the Gentiles, carrying on a priestly service with the glad tidings of God."

Here it will be observed the apostle has a connection with the ministry of Christ particularly relating to the Gentiles. Peter was more exactly in line with the personal ministry of Christ, for in Gal. ii. 7, 8 we read:--

> "When they saw that I had been entrusted with the gospel of the uncircumcision, even as Peter with the gospel of the circumcision, for He who energised Peter with a view to an apostleship of circumcision, energised also in me with a view to the Gentiles."

Here again we see Paul with a gospel distinct from that of Peter, and an apostleship distinct also. Some may object to the expression, "A gospel distinct from that of Peter." In Gal. ii. 2 we read that Paul "laid before them the gospel which he heralded among the Gentiels," and this gospel is not merely termed the gospel to the uncircumcision, but the gospel of the unicircumcision. However we will not pause here, these are but hints of the impending change. This difference is not so radical as the next step we indicate. In Eph. iii. Paul writes as "the prisoner of Christ Jesus on behalf of the Gentiles." This imprisonment is connected with the "dispensation of the grace of God which hath been given unto me with a view to you."

> "Unto me, the less than the least of all saints, has this grace been given, that I should preach among the Gentiles the untraceable riches of Christ, and to enlighten all as to what is the dispensation of the mystery which hath been hidden away from the ages by God, who did all things create; in order that now, unto the principalities and the authorities in the heavenlies, might be made known, through the church, the exceeding complex wisdom of God, according to the plan of the ages which He made in Christ Jesus our Lord" (Eph. iii. 8-11).

Here words are multiplied to impress us with the secret, hidden, and unsearchable character of the present dispensation.

Here are riches connected with Christ that are. . . unsearchable (verse 8).
Here is a dispensation which is one of a . . . . . secret (9).
This dispensation of the secret was effectually . . . hidden (9).
The wisdom therein displayed is . . . . . very complex (10).
The whole was only discovered by . . . . . revelation (5).
And Paul was commissioned to . . . . . enlighten all (9).

Words cannot be more emphatic, and yet men will still carry on the work of confusion, endeavouring to "search out" the subject of the mystery in scriptures written before it was revealed, a zeal for God maybe, but not according to knowledge. Let us rather accept the Scriptures, and see that it is in the Prison Epistles of the apostle to the Gentiles that we shall receive "enlightening" as to "what is the dispensation of the secret."

We now turn to Col. i., and there again we read of the same exclusive and peculiar ministry:--

> "Of which I ('I' is emphatic here) have become minister, according to the dispensation of God which hath been given unto me to youward, to complete (or fill up) the Word of God, the mystery which hath been hidden away from the ages and from the generations."

Here the apostle makes the same claims, adding one or two distinctive clauses. This dispensation "fills up (or completes) the Word of God." Peter felt the need for some such dispensation to fully explain the long interval that was taking place between the ascension of the Lord and His second coming (see II Peter iii.). Peter himself, however, could not explain it to his readers other than to say that he was assured that it was not "slackness" on the part of the Lord. He refers his readers to the epistles of Paul, for, says he, in all his writings he speaks of these things, and some of them are hard to be understood. Thus it is that the present dispensation "fills up" the gap that would otherwise have existed between the setting aside of Israel and their repentance and restoration.

The apostle had already referred to "this mystery" of Israel's blindness in Rom. xi. 25, but it is not until after Acts xxviii. that he enters into his special ministry of the present dispensation. In Col. i. 26 he adds one more term, "Hidden away from the ages and the generations." A reference to Col. i. 6 and 9 will show that apo with the genitive can be translated "since." "Since the ages and the generations" would be a good translation of Col. i. 26. The generations will be found to commence in Gen. ii. 4. "The generations of the heavens and the earth." The mystery with its promise and blessings is connect with the period "before the foundation (or overthrow) of the world" (Eph. i. 4), or as in the passages to which we now turn, "before age-times." In order to help the reader see the connection between these passages we place them side by side:--

Titus i. 1-3.	II Tim. i. 9-11.
"Paul, a servant of God, but an apostle of Jesus Christ, according to the faith of God's elect, and the knowledge of the truth which is according to godliness, upon hope of eternal life which God, who cannot lie, promised before age-times (chronõn aiõniõn), but hath manifested in its own peculiar seasons His Word by means of the heralding (kerugmata), wherewith I ('I' emphatic) am entrusted, according to the commandment of our Saviour God."	"Who hath saved us and called us with an holy calling, not according to His own peculiar purpose and grace, which was given to us in Christ Jesus before age-times (chronõn aiõniõn), but hath now been made manifest by the appearing of our Saviour Jesus Christ, who hath abolished death, and hath shed light on immortal life through the gospel, whereunto I ('I' emphatic) have been appointed herald (kerux) and apostle and teacher of the Gentiles."

With these two passages should be read Rom. xvi. 25:--

> "Even the heralding (kerugma) of Jesus Christ, according to the revelation of the mystery which was kept secret during age-times (chronois aiõniois)."

By comparing the two passages quoted above, we see the "promise" made before age-times paralleled by the "purpose and grace given us in Christ Jesus before the age-times," which is none other than Eph. i. 3, 4 in other words. We shall also observe how the period before the age-times is linked with the present dispensation and the apostle's peculiar and exclusive ministry. "Now" is the interpretation of "its own peculiar seasons." If we had continued our quotation from II Tim. i. we should have found that immediately the apostle mentioned his peculiar ministry, he spoke of suffering in II Tim. i. 12:--

> "For which cause also I suffer these things; but I am not ashamed (no, indeed, for he rightly divided the Word, ii. 15). For I know Him whom I have believed, and am persuaded that He is able to guard my deposit (i.e. the dispensation entrusted to Paul) unto that day."

This same opposition to the special appointment of Paul is manifest in the way in which he interjects almost an oath in I Tim. ii. 6, 7:--

"Who gave Himself on behalf of all, to be testified in its own peculiar seasons, whereunto I ('I' emphatic) am appointed herald (kerux), and apostle (I speak the truth and lie not), a teacher of the Gentiles in faith and truth."

Here again it is manifest that the apostle means much more than that he was merely "one of the twelve," &c. The last words, veiled in the A.V. by the rendering "faith and verity," link this passage again with Titus i. 1-3, for there we read of the apostle's commission as being connected with the faith of God's elect, and the knowledge of the truth. The opposition to Paul's threefold office of herald, apostle, and teacher of the Gentiles, led to the denial of the truth of the mystery, as will be observed in the following passages:--

"All they which are in Asia have turned away from ME" (II Tim. i. 15).
"Some shall depart from the faith" (I Tim. iv. 1).
"Some have erred concerning the faith" (I Tim. vi. 21).
"Who concerning the truth have erred" (II Tim. ii. 18).
"They shall turn away their ears from the truth" (II Tim. iv. 4).

Among the means that satan employed to lead away from this faith and truth were the "profane and vain babblings" of I Tim. vi. 20, 21; II Tim. iii. 16, 18, 23. In I Tim. i. 4 we read:-- "Neither give heed to fables and endless genealogies (cf. Titus i. 10, 14 'Jewish,' and I Tim. i. 7 'teachers of law') which minister arguings rather than (further) a dispensation of God which is in (the sphere, not law, nor Jewish fables, but of) faith."

Those who err concerning the truth, overturn the faith (II Tim. ii. 18). Those who are ever learning and never able to come to a knowledge of the truth, these also are disapproved concerning the faith (II Tim. iii. 7, 8). Paul urges upon Timothy to "fight the good fight of the faith" (I Tim. vi. 12), and to "rightly divide the Word of truth" (II Tim. ii. 15), and he could add, "I have contested the good contest. . . . I have kept the faith" (II Tim. iv. 7). It is instructive to compare the opening verses of I and II Timothy and Titus:--

"Paul, an apostle of Christ Jesus by command of God our Saviour, and Christ Jesus our hope" (I Tim. i.).

"Paul, an apostle of Christ Jesus through the will of God, according to the promise of life in Christ Jesus" (II Tim. i.).

"Paul, a servant of God, but an apostle of Jesus Christ, according to the faith of God's elect, and the knowledge of the truth which is according to godliness; upon hope of eternal life, which God, who cannot lie, promised before age-times" (Titus i.).

All these passages go to show the peculiarly exclusive character of Paul's commission, and of this present dispensation. Herein lies the reason why the god of this age keeps God's children busy with the sermon on the mount, the Acts of the Apostles, the gospel of the kingdom even, rather than allow them to realize the truth, the faith, the teacher, and the dispensation which concerns them so vitally.

We trust that the writer and those associated with him are ready to be misunderstood, misrepresented, forsaken and despised even by the Lord's dear children, if they can only be instrumental in leading others to see "what is the dispensation of the mystery," "what is the hope of His calling," and to enable them to step out of the bondage of man into the glory and the liberty of the dispensation of grace. While all Scripture is profitable, nothing can make up the loss which we shall sustain, and the harm we shall do, if we dare to be "ashamed of the testimony of the Lord and of Paul His prisoner." There is much to be said, but we must leave it until a future article. Meanwhile, let us seek grace to "know the things which are freely given us of God."

Does "particular redemption" exhaust the sacrifice of Christ? pp. 55-58

Who among us can claim to have pierced the veil that hangs over the fateful past? "The secret things belong unto the Lord our God, but those things which are revealed belong unto us." Though Scripture is silent respecting many aspects of this tremendous question, there are some phases which are revealed, and they are of greatest importance to us. John viii. 44 declares that the devil was a murderer from the beginning. He it was who deceived Eve into sin, and involved our first parents in far-reaching ruin. Side by side with this we are emphatically told that Christ took upon Himself the likeness of sinful flesh, "in order that He might destroy him that had the power of death, that is, the devil" (Heb. ii. 14). And again, "The devil sinneth from the beginning; for this purpose was the Son of God manifested, in order that He might undo the works of the devil" (I John iii. 8).

The work of Calvary included, among other objects, the destruction of the devil, and the undoing of his works. The Lord Jesus, as He bowed His blessed head and died, said, "It is finished." All that he came to do had been accomplished, and even though time were to run its course before the final and complete fruition of His work, we accept the Word of truth, and believe that He did virtually destroy the devil and undo his works "through death." If our theology does not allow of this, so much the worse for our theology. Turning to Rom. viii. 20, 21, we read:--

> "For unto vanity hath creation been made subject. Not by choice, but by reason of Him who made it subject, upon hope that creation itself also shall be freed from the bondage of corruption into the freedom of the glory of the sons of God."

This passage refers back to Gen. iii. 17, 18, and forward to Rev. xxi. 1-5 and xxii. 3, "Cursed is the ground for thy sake." "No curse shall be any more." Literally it is, "And every curse shall be no more." Here, truly, we see the undoing of the works of the devil.

Turning now to Rom. v. we have further light on this great question. Verses 1-11 lead us on to the love of God which surpasses the highest flights of human love. It was not for "just" ones, or "good" ones that Christ died. God commendeth His love in that whilst we were yet without strength, ungodly, sinners, and enemies, Christ died for us (Rom. v. 6-10). But this does not exhaust the love of God; there is a "much more."

> "Much more then, having now been declared righteous by His blood, we shall be saved from wrath through Him. For if, being enemies, we were reconciled unto God through the death of His Son, much more, having been reconciled, we shall be saved by His life" (Rom. v. 9, 10).
> "But not as the offence is the act of free grace. For if by the offence of the one the many died, much more the grace of God, and the gift by grace, of the one man, Jesus Christ, superabounded unto the many." "Where sin abounded, grace did superabound" (Rom. v. 15, 20).

It will be observed that although there is a marked division v. 12, yet the succeeding verses are connected with the earlier theme, the much more, the superabounding grace and love of God. The question before us as to the cause of the permission of evil, and as to the federal headship of Adam, receives a partial answer as we consider verse 12. This verse is not isolated or disconnected from verse 11, but is most definitely linked to it by the word "therefore" (Greek dia touto=="because of this"). Because of what? The preceding verses have been emphasizing the great love of God and the reconciliation. Scripture would have us link the entrance of sin, the passing through of the guilt and penalty of one man's one sin to the many, with the superabounding love of God, and tells us that Adam was a type of the coming One (verse 14). Verses 13-17 are parenthetical, dealing with the difference observable between the act of judgment and the act of grace. Verse 18 resumes the statement of verse 12, and verse 19 furnishes us with the real answer to the introductory words "because of this."

> "Hence then as through one offence (the sentence was) unto all men unto condemnation, so also through one righteousness (the decree of grace was) unto all men unto justification of life. For just as through the disobedience of the one man, the many were constituted sinners, so also through the obedience of the one, the many shall be constituted righteous."

There are in these verses some statements which are hard for us to accept who have been trained in the traditions of men. Supposing we had no theological views, supposing we received God's word as little children, how should we understand Romans v.? We should see first of all that the sin and ruin of Adam and his race were somehow connected with God's final purpose of reconciliation. We should believe, moreover, that when God says "all men" in verse 12, He means "all men" without exception. And further on when we read in verse 18 "all men," we shall believe the same words in the same verse (linked as they are by the terms of comparison "as" and "so") to mean the same identically. It will be seen that in verse 18 "all men" are mentioned, while in verse 19 "the many" are found instead. Here is a difference, what does it mean?

In verse 18 "all men" are "condemned."
In verse 19 "the many" are "constituted sinners."
In verse 18 "all men" are given "a justification of life."
In verse 19 "the many" are "constituted righteous."

Verse 17 also differs from verse 18, but agrees more with verse 19. "Through the offence of one, death reigned by the one." It then says that "those who receive the superabounding grace and the free gift of righteousness shall reign in life by the one, "Jesus Christ." In verse 18 "all" without exception are meant, and there is nothing said about "receiving." In verse 19 "the many" are in view, while only those who "receive" "reign" in verse 17. It does say that "all" in verse 18 "reign in life," but it does say that they have a "justification of life." The reader should carefully read Ezek.xxxiv. and xxxvii. in this connection, particularly noticing the emphasis on the word "graves" in xxxvii. 11-14, and the character of those thus raised (xxxvi. 6-12 and 22-38).

We have been far too quick in making a clean sweep of the great majority of men. If orthodox belief is correct, a very small percentage of Adam's children will be constituted righteous, whereas Scripture declares that the "many" shall be so constituted. How many of us have believed and taught that those who stand before the great white throne have no end but the lake of fire, yet Scripture does not so teach. Rev. xx. tells us that all the dead who are not raised at the commencement of the millennium stand before God, and are judged according to their works out of the things written in the books. That is the first step. What their various sentences will be we do not know. We do know that they stand before a righteous Judge who delights in mercy, and will certainly not impose a fraction more than justice demands. But the judgment according to their works does not decide their eternal destiny.

Scripture comes down to the individual. Both J. N. Darby and J. R. Rotherham translate correctly, "And if any one was not found written in the book of life, he was cast into the lake of fire." Instead of the orthodox idea of myriads being cast into the lake of fire, Scripture leads us to see that it is to be an intensely individual matter, depending not upon works, but upon the book of life. Do those who are judged according to their works have the justification of life granted them? We ask the question. Readers, maybe, are mentally asking many more. We would not dogmatize here, but we lodge a plea for a closer and fuller study of these tremendous issues. Sin is an intruder. Will it be allowed to mar God's universe for eternity? Many say Yes! What saith the Scripture? Has Christ undone the works of the devil? Will God's universe never be really clean again? If not, has not Satan triumphed and Christ failed?

1. Therefore being justified by faith, we have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ:
2. By whom also we have access by faith into this grace wherein we stand, and rejoice in hope of the glory of God.
3. And not only so, but we glory in tribulations also: knowing that tribulation worketh patience;
4. And patience, experience; and experience, hope:
5. And hope maketh not ashamed; because the love of God is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost which is given unto us.
6. For when we were yet without strength, in due time Christ died for the ungodly.
7. For scarcely for a righteous man will one die: yet peradventure for a good man some would even dare to die.
8. But God commendeth his love toward us, in that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us.
9. Much more then, being now justified by his blood, we shall be saved from wrath through him.
10. For if, when we were enemies, we were reconciled to God by the death of his Son, much more, being reconciled, we shall be saved by his life.
11. And not only so, but we also joy in God through our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom we have now received the atonement.
12. Wherefore, as by one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin; and so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned:
13. (For until the law sin was in the world: but sin is not imputed when there is no law.
14. Nevertheless death reigned from Adam to Moses, even over them that had not sinned after the similitude of Adam's transgression, who is the figure of him that was to come.
15. But not as the offence, so also is the free gift. For if through the offence of one many be dead, much more the grace of God, and the gift by grace, which is by one man, Jesus Christ, hath abounded unto many.
16. And not as it was by one that sinned, so is the gift: for the judgment was by one to condemnation, but the free gift is of many offences unto justification.
17. For if by one man's offence death reigned by one; much more they which receive abundance of grace and of the gift of righteousness shall reign in life by one, Jesus Christ.)
18. Therefore as by the offence of one judgment came upon all men to condemnation; even so by the righteousness of one the free gift came upon all men unto justification of life.
19. For as by one man's disobedience many were made sinners, so by the obedience of one shall many be made righteous.
20. Moreover the law entered, that the offence might abound. But where sin abounded, grace did much more abound:
21. That as sin hath reigned unto death, even so might grace reign through righteousness unto eternal life by Jesus Christ our Lord.

SANCTIFICATION

Its connection with the atonement.

"And the priest shall put of the oil. . . . upon the place of the blood" (Lev. xiv. 28).

What does Scripture mean by sanctification? We read and hear much about "Sanctification of the Spirit," of the "Higher Life" and many other expressions. We have "Holiness Meetings," and "Consecration services," and we are continually exhorted to "Touch not, taste not, handle not," until the antichristian "abstaining from meats" (I Tim. iv. 3) seems to be perilously copied.

Again we say, What is sanctification? Is it primarily the sanctity of the believer's walk, produced by the Holy Spirit in his life by the Word, or is it first of all the unqualified perfect possession and blood-bought birthright of every child of God—from the least to the greatest—sanctification wrought by atoning blood? Rome has canonised her "saints," many believers to-day "make no profession of being saints," whereas Scripture applies without distinction this wonderful title to every redeemed sinner. We give a few out of many passages to illustrate this:--

> "To all that be in Rome (i.e., all believers), beloved of God, called saints" (Rom. i. 7).
> "Unto the church of God which is at Corinth, to them that are sanctified in Christ Jesus, called saints" (I Cor. i. 2).
> "To the saints which are in Ephesus, and faithful ones in Christ Jesus" (Eph. i. 1).

We find next that sanctification, like salvation, is connected with the unalterable, irreversible purpose of electing grace: "He hath chosen us in Him before the foundation of the world, that we should be holy and without blame before Him" (Eph. i. 4).

A reference to Eph. v. 27 and Col. i. 22 will show that this purpose has been fully established by the work of Christ.

> "That He might present it to Himself a glorious church, not having spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing, but that it should be holy and without blemish."
> "In the body of His flesh through death to present you holy and unblameable and unreproveable in His sight."

Thus it will be seen that the death of Christ procures this wondrous blessing of sanctification, unto which we were chosen before the foundation of the world. In the next scripture it will be seen that the sanctification of the Spirit is directly connected with the blood of Christ, and the Spirit of God NEVER leads to sanctification apart from this.

> "Elect according to the foreknowledge of God the Father, through sanctification of the Spirit, unto obedience and sprinkling of the blood of Jesus Christ" (I Pet. i. 2).

This same truth is typically set forth in Lev. xiv. in the cleansing of the leper.

> "The priest shall take some of the blood. . . . and put it upon the tip of the right ear. . . . and upon the thumb of his right hand, and upon the great toe of his right foot" (v.14).
> "The rest of the oil. . . . upon the blood"... (v.17).
> "The priest shall put the oil. . . . right ear, ... thumb. . . . great toe. . . . upon the place of the blood of the trespass offering" (v.28).

Beware of any so-called sanctification that would apply the OIL without first applying the BLOOD, or would seek to put the OIL on any other place except "upon the place of the blood."

For the benefit of any reader who may not know, the words "saint," "sanctify," "holy," "holiness," are words from the same root in the original of the New Testament.

We have already referred to I Cor. i., and we turn to it again for further teaching on the subject of sanctification. Verse 29 gives the divine object in the method of salvation. God hath chosen the foolish, the weak, the base, the despised, yea, the things which are not—"That no flesh should glory in His presence." Verse 31 bears a similar witness, "He that glorieth, let him glory in the Lord." Verse 30 comes in between these statements, and reads, "but of Him are ye in Christ Jesus, who became to us wisdom from God, both righteousness and sanctification, and (as well as) redemption." Christ became unto us sanctification precisely in the same way and degree in which He became unto us righteousness. "He hath made Him to be sin for us, who knew no sin, that we might be made the righteousness of God in Him." So with sanctification, it is imputed to the believer as absolutely as righteousness is. "If Abraham were justified by works, he hath whereof to glory, but not before God." If the children of God were sanctified by their works, I Cor. i. 31 would be nullified.

The subject of "Progressive Sanctification" is by no means denied by what we have written, any more than the scriptural doctrine of justification by faith means irresponsible living, or that because we are under grace we may continue in sin. What we seek to do is put first things first; to lay the foundation before we build the house. The subject of sanctification is several times referred to in the Epistle to the Hebrews. In chapter x. 10 we read, "By the which will we are sanctified, through the offering of the body of Jesus Christ once."

"By the which will."—What does this mean? We have already seen the pre-determining will of God in the sanctification of the believer, but that is not the thought here. The "which will" makes us look back in the chapter. In verse 9 Christ speaks, "Lo, I come to do Thy will, O God." It is in (en) the done will of God--i.e., the obedience of Christ, and through (dia) the offering of Christ, that believers are sanctified (see again I Pet. i., "Obedience and sprinkling of blood.") Their "doing," and the "presenting of their bodies a living sacrifice," is the outcome—the fruit of this blessed possession. Verse 14 contains a wonderful truth. "For by one offering He hath perfected into perpetuity them that are sanctified;" truly all the glory is the Lord's.

We must here leave the subject, but shall (D.V.) take it up again in our next paper. Meanwhile, may we, who have died with Christ from the rudiments of the world, hold the Head, remember our completeness in Him, set our affections on things above where Christ is, and leave the doctrines and commandments of men, the touch not, taste not, handle not satisfying of the flesh, and confess that ALL OUR SPRINGS, O GOD, ARE IN THEE.

SANCTIFICATION
Its connection with the resurrection.

"For I through law, to law died, that I might live Unto God" (Gal. ii. 19).

In our last article we sought to lay before the reader passages of Scripture which taught that the sanctification of the believer, like justification, is primarily and foundationally connected with and results from the atoning death of Christ. We now seek to show that the resurrection also has a great bearing upon this important subject.

Many of our readers will at once think of Col. iii. Before quoting from this chapter, however, let us see what leads up to its wonderful teaching. The saints at Colosse, like all the redeemed, were "perfect," "complete" "made meet," "presented holy" (i. 12-22, ii. 10). Not only had they died with Christ, and had been buried with Him, but they were risen with Him, quickened together with Him (ii. 12, 13), which meant that "the body of the sins of the flesh" had been "put off," the divine inference from these two passages being, "Let no man, therefore, judge you in meat, or in drink, or of sabbath days" (ii. 16); "Let no man beguile you of your reward in a voluntary humility and worshipping of angels" (ii. 18); "Wherefore if ye died with Christ from the religious codes of the world, why as though living in the world are ye subject to ordinances?" "Touch not" (see I Cor. viii. 1 for meaning, and compare the same element in the false holiness of the apostasy in the last days of I Tim. iv. 3), "taste not, handle not" (Col. ii. 20, 21).

Here is sufficient to point the contrast between holiness according to God, and holiness according to man. True holiness is only possible in the power of resurrection. The saved sinner looks back to the cross and sees Christ dying in his stead, and says, "I died there too." He looks up to the right hand of God where Christ sitteth, and says, "I have been raised together with Him." This is the argument of Col. ii. and iii.:--

> "If ye, then, were raised with Christ, seek those things which are above, where Christ sitteth on the right hand of God. Set your mind on things above, not on things on the earth (cf. Phil. iii. 19, 20). For ye died, and your life is hid with Christ in God. When Christ, our life, shall appear, then shall ye also appear with Him in glory. Mortify, therefore, your members which are upon the earth" (Col. iii. 1-5).

In Col. ii. 23 we have the "neglecting of the body" "to the satisfying of the flesh." This comprises all the "will-worship and humility" of Rome, with its fastings, penances, and other inventions for the manufacture of a creature holiness, right down to the Holiness Conventions that would gain holiness by rules and resolutions. In direct contrast to the "neglecting of the body" in the wrong sense, we have in Col. iii. 5 the "moritfying of the members" in the scriptural sense as being a direct result of being raised with Christ and being occupied with Him. Our life is there; our death here. The word translated "mortify" occurs only in two other passages in the New Testament:--

> "And without being weakened in faith, he considered his own body now as good as dead" (Rom. iv. 19, R.V.).
> "Wherefore also there sprang from one, and him as good as dead, so many as the stars" (Heb. ix. 12).

This is the lesson in Col. iii. Just as Abraham, we also are to see by faith that our sinful selves are as good as dead. To believe God's verdict that we died with Christ from the law of God as a means of justification, from all works of the flesh as a means of sanctification, and from all the rudiments, commandments, and doctrines of men. Instead of the word "mortify" countenancing Romish teaching, it teaches just the opposite. As we feed the new nature we starve the old. As by faith we walk in the power of the "new man," which has created in true holiness, we shall "put off the old man with his deeds." Apart from the risen Saviour all sanctification is of the flesh, and is "put on" in a far different sense than that meant by the Scripture.

Some may have observed in a sheltered spot a tree covered with dead leaves, having gone through the winter without actually dropping them to the ground, but when the returning spring forces the new life through the branches, the old leaves must go, being removed by the power of the life within; so to live in the light of Col. iii. 1-4 will of itself bring about the "mortifying" of verse 5. A glance at verses 5-17 of this chapter will show that the believer is called upon to "walk worthily," but verses 1-4 come first, and as the other side of the question is that which appears most prominent in the sermons and literature of to-day, we seek to give prominence to the foundation of all holiness, trusting that then we may build something more acceptable to God. In the Pentateuch we read of "strange incense" and "strange fire." Every time the believer forgets the import of the words "accepted in the Beloved," every time he is prompted to lean on something apart from Christ, he is preparing "strange incense" which cannot please God.

Sanctification includes consecration, for resurrection life is pre-eminently a life unto God. How many times have we reviewed our past and mourned that we have not lived unto God? How many times have we resolved to keep down the flesh and "yield ourselves" to God? How many times have we failed? If one may speak for many, we know what a miserable failure it has always been. Let us, therefore, see whether Scripture does not give some surer way of living unto God than we have hitherto discovered.

Of Christ it is written, "For in that He died, He died unto sin once; but in that He liveth (i.e. in resurrection), He liveth unto God" (Rom. vi. 10). Of the believer, it continues, "Likewise reckon ye also yourselves to be dead indeed unto sin, but alive unto God through Jesus Christ our Lord" (Rom. vi. 11). The power, then, to live unto God comes through believing implicitly the wonderful fulness of the redemptive work of Christ. It is not trying, but reckoning as God has reckoned, and acting accordingly.

> "Whether we live we live unto the Lord" (Rom. xiv. 8).

This is connected with Christ's resurrection in verse 9, and with the futility of the judgment of the others upon such an one with respect to "eating" and "observing days," &c., and all other impositions of men.

> "Judging this, that if one on behalf of all died also."
> "He died on behalf of all, with the object that those who live (i.e. in resurrection life) should henceforth not live unto themselves, but unto Him who died for them and rose again. Wherefore henceforth know we no man according to the flesh. . . . If any man be in Christ, there is a new creation; old things did pass away; behold, there have come into being new things" (II Cor. v. 14-17).
> "For I through law, to law died, with the object that I might live unto God; with Christ I have been crucified, but I live; yet not I, but there liveth in me Christ" (Gal. ii. 19, 20).

These passages of the Word speak more plainly than any comment we can give; life unto God (consecration, sanctification) is found in the sphere of resurrection with Christ.

Rom. vi. 1 commences with the awful question of one who imagines that "free grace" means license. We do not doubt that some who read these pages will likewise question our doctrine, and say it is "dangerous." What answer does the apostle make to the libertine? Does he water down his strong statements? No; he applies them with full force. "How shall we that died to sin live any longer therein?" It is a matter nothing short of life and death. The question goes deeper, however, in verse 15. "Shall we sin because we are not under law, but under grace?" The answer is summarized in verse 22, "But now being made free from sin, and become servants to God, ye have your fruit unto holiness, and the end everlasting life" (see Col. iii. 3, 4). With this compare verse 13, "Yield yourselves unto God, as those that are alive from the dead, and your members as instruments of righteousness unto God."

The epistle to the Galatians deals with the same subject. Under law, and in the sphere of the flesh, means bondage, and seeking to be made perfect according to the flesh (Gal. iii. 2, 3; iv. 3-5, 9; v. 1-3). Under grace means liberty and perfection in Christ alone. Again the apostle has to meet those who abuse this liberty. He says, "Stand fast in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free. . . . For, brethren, ye have been called unto liberty," and then adds:--

> "Only use not liberty for an occasion to the flesh, but by love serve one another. For all the law is fulfilled in one word, even in this; Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself" (Gal. v. 13, 14).

We have already seen that resurrection life is the answer to the question, How may I find power to live unto God? We see here that in this same blessed sphere we are at liberty to fulfil our duties one to another. We will conclude by a reference to Eph. ii.

There we have the dead sinner raised to life—a new creation. Verse 10 tells us that "we are His workmanship, created in Christ Jesus upon good works (i.e. Christ's good works, not ours, form the basis), which God hath before ordained, that we should walk in them." We are to walk in the works and merits of Christ. We are to work out that which has been worked in; or, as Heb. xiii. 21 puts it, "Make you perfect in every good work to do His will, doing in you that which is well-pleasing in His sight."

May the fact of a risen Saviour at the right hand of God, a life hid with Christ, a glorified Head in heaven, our legal death with Christ here, our position as being "raised together, and made to sit together in heavenly places" become more and more to us; and so will the dead leaves and deadly ordinances of men fall and fade, leaving us standing and walking by faith, not by sight, looking for that blessed hope of which, by grace, may we seek to walk worthy.

I Cor.	8	1	Now as touching things offered unto idols, we know that we all have knowledge. Knowledge puffeth up, but charity edifieth.
I Tim.	4	3	Forbidding to marry, and commanding to abstain from meats, which God hath created to be received with thanksgiving of them which believe and know the truth.
Col.	2	20	Wherefore if ye be dead with Christ from the rudiments of the world, why, as though living in the world, are ye subject to ordinances,
		21	(Touch not; taste not; handle not;

Phil.	3	19	Whose end is destruction, whose God is their belly, and whose glory is in their shame, who mind earthly things.)
		20	For our conversation is in heaven; from whence also we look for the Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ:

Gal.	3	2	This only would I learn of you, Received ye the Spirit by the works of the law, or by the hearing of faith?
		3	Are ye so foolish? having begun in the Spirit, are ye now made perfect by the flesh?
	4	3	Even so we, when we were children, were in bondage under the elements of the world:
		4	But when the fulness of the time was come, God sent forth his Son, made of a woman, made under the law,
		5	To redeem them that were under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons.
	5	1	Stand fast therefore in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free, and be not entangled again with the yoke of bondage.
		2	Behold, I Paul say unto you, that if ye be circumcised, Christ shall profit you nothing.
		3	For I testify again to every man that is circumcised, that he is a debtor to do the whole law.

Sanctification
Its connection with likeness to Christ.
"As He is" (1st Epistle of John).
pp.22-25

The reader may remember that in our previous articles we have briefly considered sanctification and its connection with the atonement, and sanctification and its connection with the resurrection. We now propose to consider the teaching of one or two passages in I John which shew (1) absolute, and (2) the progressive or responsible aspect of sanctification.

"As He is."—Christ is the centre of all the purposes of God's grace. He is the author, the perfecter, the goal. We have seen the connection between resurrection and sanctification in our last paper. Likeness to our risen Lord is the theme before us now, both during our sojourn here, and in that day when we shall be satisfied upon awaking in His likeness.

First let us briefly "consider Him." "If we walk in the light as He is in the light" (I John i. 7). "He is in the light." Verse 5 declares that "God is light, and in Him is no darkness at all." In the full blaze of the Shekinah glory our Saviour stands. Not only is He there by the right of His own Godhead, but He is there because of the perfectness of His atoning work. Nothing but absolute righteousness and perfect holiness could endure the light in which our great advocate stands. Yet, fellow-believer, weak and failing as we may be in ourselves, that and nothing less is our position in Christ.

Chapter ii. 29 tells us that "He is righteous"; iii. 3 tells us "He is pure," emphasizing that which is involved in the statement quoted above—"He is in the light." I John i. 7 commences with a "But if"; a condition is therefore attached. Before we consider the conditional aspect, let us turn to the verses that reveal the absolute nature of the believer's sanctification "in Christ."

> "In this hath been perfected the love with us, in order that boldness we may have in the day of judgment, that as He is we also are (though) in this world" (I John iv. 17).

God's love to us is the subject under consideration in the verse. The words translated "in this," are of constant occurrence in John's epistle. In this very chapter they are translated "hereby" (v.13), "herein" (v. 10), and "in this" (v.9). To what does the apostle refer when he says "in this" in verse 17? Does he mean that God's love is perfected in this—that believers shall have boldness in the day of judgment? Yes—and yet no—for this but a part of the glorious goal. We believe the verse should be read as follows;--

> "In this is the love with us perfected (in order that we may have boldness in the day of judgment); that as He is so are we in this world."

The love is perfected in this that the believer in Christ is as He is. God Himself knows no higher goal for eternity than that the believer shall be as his Lord, and when these bodies of our humiliation are changed for bodies like unto the glorified Lord, then perfect love will have found its goal. What "grace wherein we stand!" Every believer equally perfect in Christ. The weakest as the strongest, the babe and the full grown, all are equally and altogether complete in Him. There are no "ifs" here. This is no more conditional upon our walk and life than is justification. Results will necessarily follow, but let it always be remembered that they follow, not come before. He that is righteous (in Christ) doeth righteousness (as a result).

"AS HE IS—WE ARE" (I John iv. 17).

AS HE IS—WE SHALL BE" (I John iii. 2).

"We know that when He shall appear, we shall be like Him." Again we deal with that which is absolute. "We shall be like Him," and perfect love will have reached its goal. Can we not better understand the reason why the apostle introduces this marvellous subject with the words, "Behold what manner of love!" What is to be the outcome of this glorious position? "Every one that hath this hope in Him purifieth himself, even as He is pure." According to many, possibly among them some who will see this little magazine, certainty means license. They think that it is presumption to "know" that which God has declared. Scripture does not veil the fact that there will always be those who "turn the grace of God into lasciviousness," but this by no means alters the relationship established between I John iii. 2 and 3. The reasoning of the heart will be, Am I as He is by grace in Christ? Oh, that I may be more like Him in practice. Am I to be like Him in the future? Oh, for grace to be more like Him now.

Keeping I John iv. 17 in mind we turn to I John ii. 5, 6. Again we shall read of God's love being perfected, but this time dealing with the conditional side of sanctification:--

> "But whoso keepeth His Word, in him verily is the love of God perfected. In this know we that we are in Him. He that saith he abideth in Him ought Himself also so to walk, even as He walked."

Even in this conditional setting the keeping of the Word is a proof of our being in Him; not that the keeping of the Word either places us in that blessed sphere, or secures us when we are there. By comparing I John iv. 17 with I John ii. 5, 6, it will be seen that God's love to us, and our love to God, meet together in the Lord Jesus Christ as their great goal; both point forward to likeness to Him. The believer's love to God urges him to seek more conformity to the image as its goal, perfect likeness to Christ in resurrection glory. Be it noted that this verse does not say, "We ought to be as He is," but it says, "We ought to walk as He walked." Many have gone into all kinds of excesses in their endeavour to "walk as He walked," forgetting that I John i. 7 must be included, and that henceforth we know Christ according to the flesh no longer. I John i. 7 speaks of walking in the light. This is how the Lord Jesus always walked whilst here on earth.

In the very presence of God, in the light of the holiest of all; what a position to be found in! what a position to abide in! No creature preparation or perfectness can avail there, in fact, any attempt at such only shows the failure to appreciate the heights of holiness demanded by that brilliant throne. What is our warrant for daring to walk in the light?

"As He is we are."—Is this "sinless perfection?" No! If we say we have no sin we deceive ourselves. If we say we have not sinned we make God a liar. It is not by covering up our sins, neither is it by imagining ourselves to have become sinless, that we draw near to the presence of the Lord. No! it is by reason of the wondrous grace that has made us "accepted in the Beloved," that has made us "meet to be partakers of the inheritance of the saints in the light." With all our imperfections still upon us, with all our sins of omission and commission, we may draw near to walk in the light. Do we make little of sin? No! God does not, but He has made provision. It is not our walk or our talk that will ever keep us fit for His holy presence, but "If we walk in the light. . . . the blood of Jesus Christ His Son cleans*eth* us from all sin."

Such is some small fragment of the teaching of these verses. Let us glorify God by believing His Word, and, seeing that by His grace we are (in Christ) as He is, and that as He is we shall be, let us seek by grace to walk as He walked, to walk in the light, to thankfully confess the glorious efficacy of the blood that cleanseth, and to exemplify in some measure the complete sanctification which is ours in Christ Jesus.

The Dispensation of the Secret.
pp. 52-54

When this series of studies was commenced we desired to set forth the wonderful truth contained in the Prison Epistles (Ephesians, Philippians, Colossians, and II Timothy), but we found it necessary to prepare the way by showing the position of the pentecostal dispensation, its kingdom and Abrahamic connections, and the great division that occurred in the dispensational dealings of God recorded in Acts xxviii.

Election and predestination, a choice that antedates all time, and unconditional purpose are at the very threshold of this dispensation (Eph. i.). Why is this? Let us endeavour to place ourselves in the position of the Gentile believers somewhere about A.D. 68-70. Let us suppose that we have been brought out of heathen darkness into light and liberty through the ministry of the apostle Paul. We had heard of that glorious kingdom which was to be set up over all the earth when the Son of God and Son of man should reign upon the throne of David. We had bowed before the teaching that we were but wild olive branches grafted into the true olive tree; that the "Jew first" was the divine order (Rom. i. 16), and that "in that day" not the Gentiles, but Israel, shall be a kingdom of priests. Very willingly we took our appointed place, glad that we Gentiles should find any place of blessing at all. We earnestly joined our prayers with the apostles that Israel might repent, so that the long promised kingdom, with all its blessing, might be set up.

Imagine our consternation when tidings came to us that the apostle Paul had been inspired by God to pronounce the words of judgment written in Isa. vi. upon the apostate nation. How would this affect us? Could the blessings flow to us if the channel were cut off? What was our dispensational position now? Were we still to look for the return of the Lord, and the setting up of the kingdom? None could answer the question, until one day a letter written by the apostle Paul came to our little assembly (the Epistle to the Ephesians). Therein we read no more of earthly blessings, or Abrahamic promises, but heavenly, and a secret purpose hitherto unrevealed. How we praised the infinite wisdom and grace that, out of such apparent failure, could bring forth such a glorious treasure. We did not quibble about predestination; it was the word of our salvation. We did not seek to explain away "chosen in Him before the foundation of the world," for it answered all our misgivings as to our relationship with Abraham. We no longer looked forward to "inheriting the earth," nor to the "heavenly country," nor to the "city that cometh down out of heaven," for we read that we were "blessed with spiritual blessings in the heavenlies in Christ, according as He chose us in Him before the foundation of the world" (Eph. i. 3, 4). "Who blessed us. . . . according as He chose us."

This is the key to all favour in this dispensation of grace. In whom did He choose us? In Abraham? No! In Christ. Abraham is never mentioned by Paul after Acts xxviii. When did He choose us? Since the foundation of the world? No! Before. What are the blessings? Are they connected with an earthly kingdom? No! They are "all spiritual blessings," and all "in the heavenlies." Before the apostle could unfold the subject of the great mystery and the truth of the one body, he must first reassure his hearers that their case was not so hopeless as they may have imagined. He had to tell them that although Scripture itself was silent as to any hope of blessing apart from Israel, yet that upon Israel's defection the Lord had revealed a purpose of grace hitherto kept secret, that these things were but the working out of His eternal purpose.

Two mysteries in particular are referred to in Eph. iii. 2-9, viz.:--

1. The mystery of Christ.
2. The mystery of the present dispensation, the one being more completely revealed than ever before; the other being revealed for the first time in the history of man. The one, to many apostles and prophets, the other, to one - Paul. Care is required in reading the passage which contains these statement, otherwise we shall be making Scripture contradict itself. We set out the scriptures in their harmony and structure, showing the difference there is between the mystery concerning Christ and His heavenly glories, and the mystery concerning the present dispensation.

> "If ye have heard of the dispensation of the grace of God which is given me to you-ward, how that by revelation He made known unto me the mystery,
> (as I wrote afore in a few words (viz. Eph. i. and ii.), whereby, when ye read, ye may understand my knowledge in the mystery of Christ, which in other ages was not made known unto the sons of men as it is now revealed unto His holy apostles and prophets by the Spirit), > that the Gentiles should be fellow-heirs and fellow-members of the same body, and fellow-partakers of His promise in Christ by the gospel whereof I was made a minister."

The structure of the passage will help to show this distinction even more clearly.

A | 2. The dispensation of the grace of God.
B | 3. The mystery made known to Paul.
C | a | 4. The mystery of Christ.
b | 5. Apostles the ministers (plural).
C | a | 6. The mystery of the dispensation.
b | 7. Paul the minister (singular).
B | 8. The mystery made known by Paul.
A | 9. The dispensation of the mystery (R.V.).

Vitally connected with the "mystery of Christ," which involves His ascension far above all principalities and powers, is the mystery of the present dispensation, which gives us the standing and hope of believers now. Eph. iii. 6 contains a condensed summary of the essential elements of the "dispensation of the grace of God," the "dispensation of the mystery" given to Paul.

Those who have access to the original will not have failed to observe the threefold repetition of the little word sun, meaning "together with." "That the Gentiles should be heirs together, and a body together, and partakers together of His promises in Christ through the gospel." One has only to read such passages as Rom. xi. 24, 25; Isa. lxi. 5, 6, &c., to see that Eph. iii. 6 introduced something entirely new. It was no secret that the Gentiles should be blessed through Christ, but nowhere in the pages of the Old Testament Scriptures is there anything to lead us to believe that a dispensation was reserved by God in which He would bless Gentiles in entire independence of Israel, and bless them together with any Jewish believers on an entirely equal footing, absolutely ignoring all distinctions of circumcision or uncircumcision, dispensing His favours in pure grace, and lifting the whole sphere above the distinctions of flesh or earth to the possession of spiritual blessings in heavenly places, in harmony with a choice and a promise that was made before the disruption of this world's system—a promise made before the age-times.

Eph. iii. 2-9.

2. If ye have heard of the dispensation of the grace of God which is given me to you-ward:
3. How that by revelation he made known unto me the mystery; (as I wrote afore in few words,
4. Whereby, when ye read, ye may understand my knowledge in the mystery of Christ)
5. Which in other ages was not made known unto the sons of men, as it is now revealed unto his holy apostles and prophets by the Spirit;
6. That the Gentiles should be fellowheirs, and of the same body, and partakers of his promise in Christ by the gospel:
7. Whereof I was made a minister, according to the gift of the grace of God given unto me by the effectual working of his power.
8. Unto me, who am less than the least of all saints, is this grace given, that I should preach among the Gentiles the unsearchable riches of Christ;
9. And to make all men see what is the fellowship of the mystery, which from the beginning of the world hath been hid in God, who created all things by Jesus Christ:

Rom. xi.	24. For if thou wert cut out of the olive tree which is wild by nature, and wert graffed contrary to nature into a good olive tree: how much more shall these, which be the natural branches, be graffed into their own olive tree? 25. For I would not, brethren, that ye should be ignorant of this mystery, lest ye should be wise in your own conceits; that blindness in part is happened to Israel, until the fulness of the Gentiles be come in.
Isa. lxi.	5. And strangers shall stand and feed your flocks, and the sons of the alien shall be your plowmen and your vinedressers. 6. But ye shall be named the Priests of the Lord: men shall call you the Ministers of our God: ye shall eat the riches of the Gentiles, and in their glory shall ye boast yourselves.

Some differences between the dispensation before Acts xxviii. and that which followed.

"When that which is PERFECT is come, then that which is PARTIAL shall be done away" (I Cor. xiii. 10).

pp. 25-29

In our preceding articles we have been considering various passages of Scripture which tend to show that the present dispensation began when Israel was set aside by the apostle Paul in Acts xxviii., and the Gentiles became peculiarly the objects of grace. In this article we shall endeavour further to demonstrate the difference between the earlier epistles written before Acts xxviii. and those written later. We first of all call attention to the testimony of the inclusion and exclusion of certain words. Christ is never referred to as "Shepherd" by the apostle Paul, and after Acts xxviii. the Lord's people are not called a "flock," or referred to as "sheep," whilst in the Gospels, Acts, Hebrews, and Peter all these titles are used. Israel were, and will yet be, "the sheep of His pasture."

The following list speaks for itself, the Holy Spirit definitely keeping certain words and phrases within the bounds of the various dispensations.

Many more could be added, but we feel that this list will be sufficient to make it clear that there is an appreciable difference between the economy obtaining from Pentecost to Acts xxviii., and that commencing at the close of Acts xxviii. and still continuing, which is called by Paul "The dispensation of the grace of God to you-ward" (Gentiles).

It will be remembered that in our last paper we found that in I Cor. xii. the one body was explained as being "partial," in contrast with the "fulness" of Eph. i. 23. Upon examining this subject more closely we shall see that during the pentecostal or transitional period, the essential elements of the one body are found scattered through these earlier epistles, but not gathered together and invested with the new and full meaning, as is the case in Ephesians. The unity of the Spirit, one hope of our calling, one Lord, one faith, one baptism, and one God and Father. In this wonderful seven-fold unity the triune God is given His place.

In I Cor. xii. 4-6, in connection with the diversities, administrations, and operations of the gifts which formed the basis of the ecclesiastical body of I Cor. xii. 12-27, we read that it is the same Spirit, the same Lord, and the same God who worketh all in all. In verse 13 we read, "For by one Spirit are we baptized into one body." In I Cor. viii. 6 we read, "Unto us one God, the Father. . . . and one Lord, Jesus Christ." In I Cor. xiii. 13 we read, "And now abideth faith, hope, and love." The words printed in italics are the seven wonderful components of the unity of the Spirit, not yet, however, brought together in order, nor invested with their higher meaning.

I Cor. xii.	4. Now there are diversities of gifts, but the same Spirit. 5. And there are differences of administrations, but the same Lord. 6. And there are diversities of operations, but it is the same God which worketh all in all. 12. For as the body is one, and hath many members, and all the members of that one body, being many, are one body: so also is Christ. 13. For by one Spirit are we all baptized into one body, whether we be Jews or Gentiles, whether we be bond or free; and have been all made to drink into one Spirit. 14. For the body is not one member, but many. 15. If the foot shall say, Because I am not the hand, I am not of the body; is it therefore not of the body? 16. And if the ear shall say, Because I am not the eye, I am not of the body; is it therefore not of the body? 17. If the whole body were an eye, where were the hearing? If the whole were hearing, where were the smelling? 18. But now hath God set the members every one of them in the body, as it hath pleased him. 19. And if they were all one member, where were the body? 20. But now are they many members, yet but one body. 21. And the eye cannot say unto the hand, I have no need of thee: nor again the head to the feet, I have no need of you. 22. Nay, much more those members of the body, which seem to be more feeble, are necessary: 23. And those members of the body, which we think to be less honourable, upon these we bestow more abundant honour; and our uncomely parts have more abundant comeliness. 24. For our comely parts have no need: but God hath tempered the body together, having given more abundant honour to that part which lacked: 25. That there should be no schism in the body; but that the members should have the same care one for another. 26. And whether one member suffer, all the members suffer with it; or one member be honoured, all the members rejoice with it. 27. Now ye are the body of Christ, and members in particular.

Had the nation of Israel repented, and the kingdom would have come as a consequence, these passages would have exactly fitted the prophecy of Zech. xiv. 9, "And the Lord shall be King over all the earth; in that day shall there be one Lord, and His name one." As it is, the kingdom is in abeyance, and instead of one Lord being King, He is exalted as Head of the church, His body; not "over all the earth," but "in the heavenlies," for "earthly things" (John iii. 12) are connected with regeneration and the kingdom of Israel.

The one body of I Cor. xii. is essentially and inseparably connected with gifts. Such gifts as are there described are absent to-day, and it is as foolish to endeavour to regulate an assembly to-day by I Cor. xii., as it would be to try to navigate a sailing-ship with the regulations and orders suitable for a steamship.

> "All these worketh that one and the self-same Spirit, dividing to every man severally as He will, for as the body is one and hath many members, and all the members of that one body, being many, are one body; so also the Christ; for by one Spirit are we all baptized into one body. . . . and have been all made to drink into one Spirit."

The fact that all had a gift is compared to a body having many and varied members, yet all composing one body. The words, "all made to drink into one Spirit," refer to the promise of John vii. 38, 39:--

> "He that believeth on Me, as the Scripture hath said, out of his belly shall flow rivers of living water; but this He spake of the Spirit, which they that believe on Him should receive, for the Holy Ghost was not yet (received), because that Jesus was not yet glorified" (compare Mark 16:14-20; Acts 2:33).

It seems hardly possible that an intelligent Christian should teach that "drinking into one Spirit" meant partaking of the Lord's Supper, but we mention it here in order that any reader who may have received this interpretation may give the passage a prayerful and contextual re-consideration.

A question arising out of what we have been considering is, Does the term "The baptism of the Spirit" of the pentecostal dispensation mean the same as the baptism of Eph.4? We sometimes meet a Christian who tells us that he has "received the baptism of the Holy Ghost," or that he is "praying for the second blessing." "Second blessings" are delusions, resulting from undispensational views. The believers' charter commences (Eph. i. 3) with the fact that God "hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings." The book of the Acts gives us very clear data as to what the baptism of the Spirit meant in pentecostal times. Acts i. 5 and xi. 14-16 make it quite clear as to what the term refers:--

> "And began to speak with other tongues" (Acts 2:1-4).
> "When Simon saw. . . . the Holy Ghost was given" (Acts 8:18).
> "They heard them speak with tongues" (Acts 10:44-46).
> "They spake with tongues and prophesied" (Acts 19:6).

Almost without exception miraculous gifts followed the baptism of the Spirit, but such is nowhere hinted in the epistles written after Acts xxviii. Ministering the spirit and working miracles is connected with justifying faith in Gal. iii. 5,6. Is it so now? The one baptism of I Cor. xii. is essentially connected with miracles and supernatural gifts. Is it so now? Do members of the one body possess the power to prophesy, speak with tongues, take up serpents, and drink deadly things unhurt? Why not? Do Christians really believe the words to be true of themselves; "They shall lay hands on the sick, and they shall recover?"

The baptism of the Spirit in pentecostal times was subsequent to salvation, often by the space of days, weeks and months, whereas Eph. i. 13, 14 says that "we are sealed upon believing with the Holy Spirit of promise, who is the earnest of our inheritance." Eph. ii. 15, 16 links the one body with Calvary; "For to make in Himself of twain one new man." "That He might reconcile both unto God in one body by the cross." When the Holy Spirit quickens a dead sinner into life, He at the same moment links him for ever with Christ. This union with the risen Saviour makes the believer a member of the one body, and neither the laying on of hands can confer, nor the excommunication of men take away this blessed grace-given position. This difference between the baptism of the Spirit before and after Acts xxviii needs careful consideration. The one body of I Cor. xii was evidenced by "signs and wonders." The unity of the Spirit is without any such evidence; it is among the things "not seen" yet "eternal," which are seen by faith.

Some have made havoc of truth by the failure to realize that the one body of Eph. iv. is not the same as I Cor. xii. If we look for corporate unity on earth we shall be sadly disappointed, but if we obey the Word of truth, and "endeavour to keep the unity of the Spirit," we may expect blessing as a result.

Jn. iii. 12	If I have told you earthly things, and ye believe not, how shall ye believe, if I tell you of heavenly things?

Acts i. 5	For John truly baptized with water; but ye shall be baptized with the Holy Ghost not many days hence.
Acts xi.	14. Who shall tell thee words, whereby thou and all thy house shall be saved. 15. And as I began to speak, the Holy Ghost fell on them, as on us at the beginning. 16. Then remembered I the word of the Lord, how that he said, John indeed baptized with water; but ye shall be baptized with the Holy Ghost.

Mark	16		14. Afterward he appeared unto the eleven as they sat at meat, and upbraided them with their unbelief and hardness of heart, because they believed not them which had seen him after he was risen. 15. And he said unto them, Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature. 16. He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; but he that believeth not shall be damned. 17. And these signs shall follow them that believe; In my name shall they cast out devils; they shall speak with new tongues; 18. They shall take up serpents; and if they drink any deadly thing, it shall not hurt them; they shall lay hands on the sick, and they shall recover. 19. So then after the Lord had spoken unto them, he was received up into heaven, and sat on the right hand of God. 20. And they went forth, and preached every where, the Lord working with them, and confirming the word with signs following. Amen.
Acts	2	33	Therefore being by the right hand of God exalted, and having received of the Father the Promise of the Holy Ghost, he hath shed forth this, which ye now see and hear.

Berean Expositor Volume 1

The Word was God.
pp. 42-46

We propose giving a few words of explanation upon the first verses of the Gospel of John, because upon several occasions, and in different places, friends have asked our opinion about a very subtle interpretation which is being promulgated by a certain section of Christendom, and which leads the reader to think that the inspired original tells us that the Word was a God! We do not desire to leave the simple exposition of the Scriptures for declamatory utterances; we would rather allow the truth to come with its own convincing force, but we cannot refrain from remarking that practically every heresy that has arisen in the history of the church, may be found ultimately, if not immediately, to be an attack upon the inspiration of the Scriptures, or the person and work of Christ.

The Edition of the N.T. which contains this evil has both the Greek text and the translation side by side, and we have found it to be our repeated experience, that when pressed upon the point, those who use this edition, and so solemnly and impressively refer to the Greek, confess that they do not understand it, but have swallowed the interpretation of the passage as being truth, and with all the brazenness of ignorance brandish the magic reference to the "inspired original" to degrade Him Who is the glory of that blessed book. We will, however, take a leaf out of their book—so far as method is concerned—by setting the Greek original and literal translation side by side. For the benefit of those who are not conversant with the Greek, we will transliterate the words into English characters, using e for Eta and õ for Omega, and (i) for Iõta subscript.

1. En arche (i) en ho logos kai ho logos en pros ton Theon kai Theos en ho logos.	1. In the beginning was the Word and the Word was with the God and God was the Word.
2. Houtos en en arche (i) pros ton Theon.	2. The same was in the beginning with the God.
3. Panta di'autou egeneto, kai choris autou egeneto oude en, ho gegonen.	3. All things through Him became, and without Him became not one thing, which has become.

The argument brought forward in the interpretation under consideration rests largely upon the use and omission of the Greek article. The Greek article corresponds with our English "the," and in its varied cases to "of the," "to the," &c. The reader will easily follows the order of the words, ho logos is "the Word." When, however, a noun is in the accusative or objective case, the article is declined in sympathy with the noun, and so ho logos would become ton logon. Now as the word Theos (God) is a similar word to logos, the last two words in the third line ton Theon, are simply ho Theos in the accusative case. We mention this not to try to teach Greek, but to prevent misunderstanding on the part of those who may, Berean-like, search out these things, but who may not be possessed of the necessary knowledge to commence their studies. The reader will see that, whilst we have the article before the word "God" in the third line, it is omitted in the "and the God," but "and God." Thus we may read the sentence:--

The Word was God, or, God was the Word.

The use of the Article, however, determines the true subject of the sentence, hence we see that in lines 1 and 4 ho logos—"the Word"—is the subject. Now, seeing that we know which is the subject of the sentence, we need not be so careful to place it at the beginning; therefore we find that emphasis is laid upon the subject, "the Word," by the figure of speech called Hyperbaton. This figure is aptly named, because the word means "a stepping over," and by placing a word out of position renders it more conspicuous. Hence in reading the passage we must emphasize like this—"in the beginning was THE WORD, and God THE WORD was." No amount of explanation which we may give can have any weight unless it can be seen to be in harmony with the Scriptures of truth, and so we will take the reader to other passages, rather than give cut and dried grammatical rules.

If any of our readers are confronted with one of these exponents of the "Greek original" whose interpretation we are considering, they might ask for an evidence of consistency by reading the translation given of another verse in the self-same chapter, viz., verse 14. If kai Theos en ho logos means and the Word was A GOD," why should not kai ho logos sarx egeneto be translated, "and the Word became A flesh?" Such a translation is manifestly absurd, yet it is based upon precisely the same argument, the absence of the article before the word flesh. We might multiply instances. Does ho Theos agape estin mean "The God is A love?"

A moment's reflection will enable any reader to see the truth of the grammatical rule, that the article is employed to demonstrate, whilst its omission describes. "The God" points out the subject of the sentence, "is love" describes His essence. So "the Word became flesh" describes the sphere into which the Word came, namely flesh. So in John i. 1, "the Word" (demonstrative) was, so far as His essence is concerned, "God" (descriptive). Thus we read the two passages together:--

The Word WAS GOD. The Word BECAME FLESH.

In each case the absence of the article describes, whilst the change in the verb tells that in the first instance the condition was one of essential character, "was" (verb "to be"; the other that which He assumed when the fulness of time came, "He became." Before we deal more fully with these two verbs, there is one more verse in the first chapter that claims our attention. "No one hath seen God at any time" (verse18). Here again the word Theos is without the article, and if treated as in the first verse would be rendered, "No one hath seen A God at any time!" God in His essence no one hath seen, yet such passages as Gen. xxxii. 24-32; Josh. v. 13-15; Ezek. i. 26-28, &c., are inspired truth. If the first verse had read, "the Word was the God," we should have to exclude both the Father and the Spirit from the Godhead, for the words being thus placed in apposition would have become exclusive.

We have already mentioned the importance of noting the distinction between the verb "to be" and the verb "to become." In verses 1 and 2 we have the verb "to be" (en), meaning "was," but in verse 3 we have the verb "to become" (egeneto), meaning "became." The English obscures this distinction, but a consideration of the use of these two verbs in one or two other passages will help us to see how complete the testimony is that "the Word was God."

In verse 17 we read, "The law through Moses was given (edothe), but grace and truth became (egeneto) through Jesus Christ." Thus by a comparison of verse 3 and 17 we find that both in the creation of the universe, and in the spiritual sphere of grace and truth, all things "were made," or "became," through Him. When the incarnation is the subject, this same verb is used, the Word became flesh; but not so when speaking of the essential deity of the Word—the Word WAS God. He BECAME flesh. This distinction is clearly seen in John viii. 58, Prin Abraam genesthai, ego eimi. "Before Abram became (or was made), I, I am." If the Lord merely intended to say that He had an existence before Abram, He would surely have said, "Before Abram was made, I was." But no, in full consciousness of His Godhead, He says, "I AM." The words are further emphasized by the pronoun ego. The Greek verb carries the pronoun with it; thus eimi means "I am." Hence, if we add ego we must read, "I am," or "I, I am." Those who can refer to the Septuagint will find further suggestive thought by comparing the words Ego eimi ho on of Exod. iii. 14 with John viii. 58, and iii. 13.

Space will not allow our going further with this subject. Abundant evidence is in the Scriptures to disprove on the one hand the statement that "the Word was a God," while everywhere it joyfully renders to the Son the same homage as to the Father, confessing that He is the true God and eternal life. It will be observed that we have kept to the task of expounding the Scriptures, and not attempted to "search out God unto perfection." It is not our task to endeavour to be wise above that which is written. Mathematics or philosophy can render no tangible illustration or confirmation of the mystery of the Godhead. Suffice it for us that we believe that there is one God, and that there is revealed for our faith the transcendent fact, that, whilst we own one God, we are also called upon to worship God the Father, through our great God and Saviour Jesus Christ, as we are quickened and led by God the Holy Spirit.

May we be kept faithful to the Lord and His truth, and believe and rejoice in the fact that the Word who was made flesh and tabernacled among us, was nevertheless the One of whom it is written, THE WORD WAS GOD.

Gen. xxxii.	24. And Jacob was left alone; and there wrestled a man with him until the breaking of the day. 25. And when he saw that he prevailed not against him, he touched the hollow of his thigh; and the hollow of Jacob's thigh was out of joint, as he wrestled with him. 26. And he said, Let me go, for the day breaketh. And he said, I will not let thee go, except thou bless me. 27. And he said unto him, What is thy name? And he said, Jacob. 28. And he said, Thy name shall be called no more Jacob, but Israel: for as a prince hast thou power with God and with men, and hast prevailed. 29. And Jacob asked him, and said, Tell me, I pray thee, thy name. And he said, Wherefore is it that thou dost ask after my name? And he blessed him there. 30. And Jacob called the name of the place Peniel: for I have seen God face to face, and my life is preserved. 31. And as he passed over Penuel the sun rose upon him, and he halted upon his thigh. 32. Therefore the children of Israel eat not of the sinew which shrank, which is upon the hollow of the thigh, unto this day: because he touched the hollow of Jacob's thigh in the sinew that shrank.
Josh. v.	13. And it came to pass, when Joshua was by Jericho, that he lifted up his eyes and looked, and, behold, there stood a man over against him with his sword drawn in his hand: and Joshua went unto him, and said unto him, Art thou for us, or for our adversaries? 14. And he said, Nay; but as captain of the host of the Lord am I now come. And Joshua fell on his face to the earth, and did worship, and said unto him, What saith my lord unto his servant? 15. And the captain of the Lord's host said unto Joshua, Loose thy shoe from off thy foot; for the place whereon thou standest is holy. And Joshua did so.
Ezek. i.	26. And above the firmament that was over their heads was the likeness of a throne, as the appearance of a sapphire stone: and upon the likeness of the throne was the likeness as the appearance of a man above upon it. 27. And I saw as the colour of amber, as the appearance of fire round about within it, from the appearance of his loins even upward, and from the appearance of his loins even downward, I saw as it were the appearance of fire, and it had brightness round about. 28. As the appearance of the bow that is in the cloud in the day of rain, so was the appearance of the brightness round about. This was the appearance of the likeness of the glory of the Lord. And when I saw it, I fell upon my face, and I heard a voice of one that spake.

pp. 58-60

Who inspired the Scriptures?

"All Scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness" (II Tim. iii. 16).

How should we esteem the authority of the Bible?

"Not as the word of men, but as it is in truth, the Word of God" (I Thess. ii. 13).

Is there any special command with respect to the Scriptures?

Yes! "Study to show thyself approved unto God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the Word of truth" (II Tim. ii. 15).

What does this term "rightly dividing" involve and mean?

It tells us that Scripture must be interpreted in strict accordance with its dispensational setting. If a passage speaks of the "kingdom of heaven," of "Israel," or "Jerusalem," we must not interpret it as of the "church which is His body."

What do you mean by the term "dispensational"?

A dispensation is a particular economy or administration of God's dealings with any particular people, having its own peculiar and distinctive characteristics. For example, there was a dispensation of law under Moses; a dispensation of miraculous gifts during Pentecost. To-day we are in a dispensation of grace, and of the mystery (see Eph. iii.). The right division of truth with regard to the various dispensations is called "dispensational truth".

When do you believe this dispensation began?

After Acts xxviii. 25-28, when Israel as a nation was set aside.

But the majority of believers teach that the "church began at Pentecost"?

A church began at Pentecost, which differed in many respects from every preceding church, or assembly, but "the church which is His body" is entirely different from this and all else. Peter's sermon in Acts ii. is largely an exposition of the prophets Joel, and there is certainly nothing about the body of Christ in Joel. The book of the Acts is a continuation of the witness concerning the kingdom of heaven (see use of the word "began" in Acts i. 1, and Heb. ii. 3,4). The same people are addressed, the same key-word of "Repent" is heard, and the same miraculous accompaniments as are recorded in Matt. x. 1-10 are there. These continue right to the end of the book. Paul there is inspired to quote Isa. vi. 9 and 10 to the representatives of the Jews of the dispersion, and then to turn to the Gentiles.

Did not Christ come to found the church?

No! He came to save His people from their sins, and to proclaim the near advent of the kingdom, the kingdom promise to David. In Rom. xv. 8 we read, "Jesus Christ was a minister of the circumcision for the truth of God, to confirm the promises made unto the fathers," which is in harmony with Matt. x. 5, 6 and xv. 24, "I am not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel." His first ministerial words were, "Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand" (Matt. iv. 17).

Is there any distinctive teaching in Paul's epistles written after the period you believe terminated the past dispensation?

In Eph. iii. 9 Paul speaks of "The dispensation of the mystery, which from all the ages had been hid in God." The reader should consider Eph. iii. 2-9, Col. i. 25, 26 (R.V.).

Does Paul claim to be the special and exclusive apostle of this present dispensation?

Associated with Paul were others who were called apostles, an Order distinct from the Twelve (see I Cor. xv.5-8 and I Thess. ii.6), which includes Timothy and Silvannus.

Space forbids quotations, but a reference to Titus i. 1-3; II Tim. i. 1; ii. 7; II Tim. i. 9, 10, 11-13; ii. 2-8; iv. 17 and Rom. xvi. 25 will show by the recurrence of such expressions as "my gospel," &c., that the apostle does claim in a peculiar manner the dispensation of the grace of God to the Gentiles (see Eph. iii. 2).

The Wages of Sin.

In a previous article we sought to exhibit the meaning of the words commonly translated "for ever" and "eternal" in our A.V., and this naturally leads us on to a consideration of the nature of the punishment of the unsaved. It is held by many that "eternal conscious suffering" is a fundamental, and many have been put out of meetings for being what is called "non-eternity" men. A most important reason why we should be convinced of this matter is the awful libel it must be on the name of God should it turn out to be untrue.

If we have taught that God will punish the unsaved throughout the never-ending ages of eternity, that after millions of years spent in writhing and cursing, the God of righteous judgment has only just commenced the dreadful work of punishment on these unhappy creatures, and finally it should prove to be but the tradition of men, what a shameful calumny will be found in our mouths against the God of all grace! If eternal conscious suffering is God's truth, we can never hold our peace, but must use every possible means to bring before our hearers the horrible doom that awaits the impenitent.

Our minds cannot conceive what eternal torment can mean. Orthodoxy has no room in its dreadful creed for the exercise of the slightest pity. The foul murderer and the simplest child, the ignorant and the debased, all alike are heaped into its horrid "Hell"; all alike are to be placed upon the rack forever. We shudder when we gaze upon the instruments of cruelty of bygone days, but they are nothing, absolutely nothing, when compared to the exquisite tortures reserved by the orthodox believers' God for all the unsaved. It makes one sicken to think of these things; its effect upon those who really believe it may be gathered from such a statement made by Queen Mary years ago:--

> "As the souls of heretics are hereafter to be eternally burning in Hell, there can be nothing more proper than for me to imitate the divine vengeance by burning them on earth" (Bishop Burnett).

Of course, she ignored the words, "vengeance is Mine, saith the Lord," but nevertheless her creed compelled her deed. Dr. Pettingell quotes from Hopkins' Works, Vol. II., and gives the following comment upon the "smoke of their torment":--

> "This display of the divine character and glory will be most entertaining, and give the highest pleasure to those who love God, and raise their happiness to ineffable heights."

Of course, if this is what God will do, His saints must of necessity rejoice therein. He further says that should this fearful scene of torment and unutterable agony > "cease, and this fire be extinguished, it would in a great measure obscure the light of heaven, and put an end to a great part of the happiness and glory of the blessed!"

Oh, Lord, is this true? our hearts cry out, shall we be so changed that we shall, unmoved, witness this writhing, suffering mass, nay, witness the tortures of some of our own dear ones with calm enjoyment, giving glory to God, can it be? Is this the truth of God? We have not overstated the conceptions of Hell that have been expressed by some of our leading evangelical preachers. Who among us has not at some time or another read with profit the Works of Dr. Jonathan Edwards, yet he is quoted in a pamphlet before us as saying:--

> "Imagine yourself to be cast into a fiery oven or a great furnace. . . . Imagine also that your body were to be there for a quarter of an hour, full of fire, and all the while full of quick sense, what horror would you feel at the endurance of such a furnace, and how long would that quarter of an hour seem to u. O, how then would your heart sink if you knew that you must bear it for ever and ever; that there would be no end, that after millions and millions of ages your torment would be no nearer to an end, and that you never, never should be delivered."

Some reader may say, Why fill your pages with such revolting things? Because, dear reader, we are going to face the truth, to shut our eyes to nothing, and if eternal conscious suffering is truth, we desire to receive it in all its horror, and all its despair. Confident are we that were we to fill ten thousand pages with the most harrowing descriptions that the human mind could conceive, it would be as nothing in comparison to the dreadful reality of eternal conscious suffering.

What saith the Scriptures concerning this subject? Certain it is that we read the words, "everlasting punishment." Let us consider this passage; it is found in Matt. xxv. 46, "And these shall go away into eternal punishment, but the righteous into eternal life." We have quoted from the R.V. because it gives the word eternal in both instances. We are often reminded that the duration of the punishment must be the same as the duration of the life mentioned in the same verse, and to this, of course, we most heartily agree. We know of a Mission where the solemn words were exhibited in large characters, "Everlasting Punishment." This method of treating Scriptures is to say the least unfair; let us have the whole truth. If the everlasting punishment of Matt. xxv. is truth for the present time, so also is the everlasting life of Matt. xxv., and upon the terms of Matt. xxv., without any man-made alteration. Who are they that receive everlasting life here, and who everlasting punishment?

> "When the Son of man shall come in His glory. . . . then shall He sit upon the throne of His glory, and before Him shall be gathered all nations."

The whole passage relates to the judgment of the nations who are on the earth at the end of the period covered by the great tribulation. The gospel of the grace of God is not in view; the kingdom and eternal life are the portion of those who gave meat and drink, clothing and consolation to the brethren of the King. Let us then be consistent; let those who apply the everlasting punishment of Matt. xxv. preach everlasting life upon the conditions laid down in that chapter. If they cannot, where is their warrant for thus picking and choosing in this vital matter? Who told them that the method of punishment mentioned here is to be indiscriminately applied to old and young, moral and immoral, sceptic and heathen, during all time and under all circumstances? The whole thing is a piece of unwarrantable and mischievous mutilation of Scripture at the dictation of the needs of their own horrible traditions. The very ones who emphasize the eternal punishment of Matt. xxv. are among the first to condemn a gospel of works, and yet such are the terms for obtaining eternal life in the self-same chapter. Are not such guilty of partiality?

We have not finished with this passage, however; let us thrash the matter out. What is this word "punishment"? Does the word mean "torment," "torture," "suffering"? Yes, say some, all this and more. The word translated "punishment" is kolasis, defined as "restraint" in Dr. Young's Analytical Concordance, and means literally "cutting off," as in the pruning of a tree. This meaning of the word is further emphasized by a parallel passage of the Old Testament (Psalm xxxvii. 22):--

Psalm xxxvii. 22.	Matt. xxv. 34, 41, 46.
"Such as be blessed of Him shall inherit the earth; and they that be cursed of Him shall be cut off."	"Come, ye blessed of My Father, inherit the kingdom. Depart from Me, ye cursed. . . . into everlasting punishment" (cutting off).

There are not a few who tell us that the passage should read everlasting punish*ing*." Let us apply the rule which guides them, to such a passage as Heb. ix. 12, "Having obtained eternal redemption." This should read, if the above is true, "everlasting redeem*ing*." The work of redemption according to this is never finished; all through eternity we are being redeemed, a doctrine flatly contradicted by both the Scriptures, and by the very same preachers who, to suit their purpose, read "punish*ing*" for "punish*ment*" in Matt. xxv. The punishment here spoken of, both in Psalm xxxvii. and Matthew xxv., is to be "eternally cut off." To deprive of life and all that conscious existence means is the highest form of punishment that this world knows, and it is called "capital punishment." It is the punishment prescribed by God to Noah (Gen. ix.), a reflection of the judgment reserved by God Himself for the finally impenitent. How many there are who turn to Rev. xx. 10 as a proof text for eternal torment:--

> "And the devil that deceived them was cast into the lake of fire and brimstone, where the beast and the false prophet are, and they shall be tormented day and night for ever and ever."

First let us notice who they are that are tormented. Three persons:

THE DEVIL. . . . THE BEAST. . . . AND THE FALSE PROPHET.

That these three are supernatural beings is not difficult to prove (cf. Rev. xvi. 13 and xvii. 8), yet punishment of these three awful beings is indiscriminately meted out to all of every race and age among the unsaved. But a further consideration is necessary, the words are "unto the ages of the ages" (rendered "for ever and ever"). "Unto" does not mean "throughout"; these are punished "unto" the dawning of the "ages of the ages," but not "throughout" those ages. We also have an indication, that the period covered by this judgment shall come to an end, by the added words "day and night." Day and night mark the dispensations that lead through from Gen. i. to Rev. xxi., but there comes a time when the words shall be fulfilled, "There shall be no night there" (Rev.xxi. 25), even as there shall be "no more sea," and "no more curse," &c.

The same clause "day and night" must be allowed its bearing upon other similar passages, e.g., Rev. xiv. 9-11. The expression, "the smoke of their torment ascendeth up for ever and ever" (Rev. xiv. 11), and "her smoke rose up for ever and ever" (Rev. xix. 3) is also emphasized by many as teaching the doctrine of eternal torment. If we turn, however, to Isaiah xxxiv. 8-10, we shall find the passage which supplies the figure in Revelation for the imagery of the Apocalypse is that with which the Old Testament prophets were quite familiar. Moreover, the period of time mentioned is Isa. xxxiv. points to the period of Revelation, "The day of the Lord's vengeance, and the year of recompenses for the controversy of Zion" (cf. Rev. i. 10). The judgment pronounced is:--

> "The streams thereof shall become burning pitch. . . . it shall not be quenched night nor day; the smoke thereof shall go up for ever. . . . none shall pass through it for ever."

Let those who will have the passages of Revelation to mean eternity, act honourably with this, and proclaim faithfully to their traditions, but in opposition to the Scriptures, that in the new heavens and new earth this burning pitch, this unquenchable fire, this ascending smoke will mar the perfection of that ultimate of redeeming love. They have only to read the opening verses of the very next chapter in Isaiah to be confuted, "The parched land shall become a pool, and the thirsty land springs of water."

Another passage, so often quoted in this connection, is Mark ix. 44, "Where their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched." Special attention is called to the word "their." We are asked to notice that the Lord does not say "the worm," but "their worm." The gnawing of the individual conscience is among the many things that this expression is made to man. The fallacy of the traditional interpretation, and at the same time, the true meaning of the passage, is found by turning to the Old Testament scripture from which the Lord Jesus quotes, viz., Isaiah lxvi. 24:--

> "And they shall go forth, and look upon the carcasses of the men that have transgressed against Me, for their worm shall not die, neither shall their fire be quenched, and they shall be an abhorring unto all flesh."

Here the Scriptures tell us that carcasses are the objects of this worm and fire, and all the learning and argument in the world cannot make us believe that carcasses can be subject to conscious suffering, yet the word "their" which is so emphasized is found here twice. Further, when we know that the word "Hell" of Mark ix. 43 is Gehenna (the place where the offal and rubbish were consumed outside the city), the figure of destruction is all the more emphasized.

We have not touched upon the positive teaching of the Scriptures as to the "wages of sin," but have sought to lay before the reader some of the statements and proof texts which are used to support that which we have become convinced is a lie, and most God-dishonouring doctrine. In our next article we shall (D.V.) seek to show what the Lord has said with regard to this tremendous subject. Meanwhile, we ask our readers during the next two months to make a collection of the statements of Paul in his epistles upon this subject, for surely, if eternal conscious suffering is a truth of Scripture, the apostle to the Gentiles will say so somewhere. Let us not fear the face of man, but think of the honour of the Lord, the libel upon His sacred name, and the contradiction against His holy Word involved in the Romish (and alas Protestant) doctrine of eternal conscious suffering.

Rev. xvi. 13	And I saw three unclean spirits like frogs come out of the mouth of the dragon, and out of the mouth of the beast, and out of the mouth of the false prophet.
xvii. 8	The beast that thou sawest was, and is not; and shall ascend out of the bottomless pit, and go into perdition: and they that dwell on the earth shall wonder, whose names were not written in the book of life from the foundation of the world, when they behold the beast that was, and is not, and yet is.

Isa. xxxiv.	8. For it is the day of the Lord's vengeance, and the year of recompences for the controversy of Zion. 9. And the streams thereof shall be turned into pitch, and the dust thereof into brimstone, and the land thereof shall become burning pitch. 10. It shall not be quenched night nor day; the smoke thereof shall go up for ever: from generation to generation it shall lie waste; none shall pass through it for ever and ever.

THE WHOLE BURNT OFFERING.

"And he shall put his hand upon the head of the burnt-offering" (Lev.1:4).

Leviticus speaks not only of redemption from sin, but access to God, and acceptance with Him. The first offering mentioned is the whole burnt-offering, something to meet the claims of God, and not so much the needs of man. "Hallowed be Thy name" comes before "Forgive us our trespasses." The fire upon the altar signifies holiness satisfied by perfection; the fire upon the sin-offering outside the camp denotes wrath, holiness meeting sin.

The offerer "draws near," and presents the offering—"without blemish." The words "of his own voluntary will" should read, "for his acceptance." Similarly, after the all-searching eye of Jehovah has examined the offering, the man puts his hand upon its head, and "it shall be accepted for him to make an atonement for him." Where is boasting? it is excluded. No man can really trust in Christ and exalt the flesh or its works. The word "atonement" signifies a "covering." The blood of Christ covers the sinner from the consequences of his sin, and also with His own excellency. This is further shown by the mention of the skin in verse 6. A reference to Gen. iii. 21, Isa. vi. 10, and lxiv. 6 will help to show how this is a type of the righteousness which is imputed to the sinner—the righteousness provided by Christ.

There are two other burnt-offerings in this chapter, a lamb and doves. In one respect they are the same, in another they differ. They represent the varied conceptions held by believers, the varied degrees of faith and appreciation of His wonderful work. In each case (verses 9, 13 and 17) the words are recorded without modification, "It is an offering made by fire of a sweet savour unto the Lord." We are not accepted according to the measure of our faith, but according to God's estimate of the perfect offering, but weak faith can mar our enjoyment and assurance.

Only the first offerer (the man who represents the large conception of Christ's work), only this one "put his hand upon the head" and removed the skin. How few rejoice in imputed righteousness. How few even know of imputed sanctification. To them it is all, "Do this," "Do that," or "Touch not, taste not, handle not." How few know the blessed fact of identification with the sacrifice? How few lay their hands upon the work of Christ and say, "I have been crucified with Christ, I have died with Christ, been buried with Christ, am risen with Christ, and finally shall be forever with Christ." Yet this is typified in the act of laying the hand upon the head of the burnt-offering. Further, the word translated "put" means "to lean for support." In Psa. iii. 5 it is translated "sustain." Some "lean" upon their "good works," they "hope" that they are saved. Others "lean" upon their teachers, but there is no certainty here. What a contrast is the man who "leans" for all acceptance, all his salvation, all his righteousness—for time and eternity—upon the one great offering, Jesus Christ the righteous. This is the only true ground of assurance. Is it yours?

Gen.	3	21	Unto Adam also and to his wife did the Lord God make coats of skins, and clothed them.
Isa.	61	10	I will greatly rejoice in the Lord, my soul shall be joyful in my God; for he hath clothed me with the garments of salvation, he hath covered me with the robe of righteousness, as a bridegroom decketh himself with ornaments, and as a bride adorneth herself with her jewels.
	64	6	But we are all as an unclean thing, and all our righteousnesses are as filthy rags; and we all do fade as a leaf; and our iniquities, like the wind, have taken us away.

Lev.	1	9	But his inwards and his legs shall he wash in water: and the priest shall burn all on the altar, to be a burnt sacrifice, an offering made by fire, of a sweet savour unto the Lord.
		13	But he shall wash the inwards and the legs with water: and the priest shall bring it all, and burn it upon the altar: it is a burnt sacrifice, an offering made by fire, of a sweet savour unto the Lord.
		17	And he shall cleave it with the wings thereof, but shall not divide it asunder: and the priest shall burn it upon the altar, upon the wood that is upon the fire: it is a burnt sacrifice, an offering made by fire, of a sweet savour unto the Lord.

Psalm	3	5	I laid me down and slept; I awaked; for the Lord sustained me.

Wondrous Meeting Places.
pp. 62-63

It is not our purpose to discuss the merits of any particular "Place of Worship," nor to advocate the attendance, or non-attendance at the meeting place of any one sect or denomination; we desire to "preach Christ," and by so doing we shall strike a more powerful blow at sectarianism than by all the denunciations that we might pour forth, and at the same time feed the Lord's people with the true bread which cometh down from heaven.

This wonderful meeting place to which we wish to draw attention is found in Isaiah liii., being symbolized in Exod. xxv. 21 and 22. Let us turn to Exod. xxv. 16-22. The Ark of the Covenant has placed within it the unbroken tables of stone. Let it be remembered that Israel in reality never received the Ten Commandments; they were broken before they could be given them. God's answer was, "Make an ark," not "Give them another chance," or "Give them an easier code." Upon this ark is placed the mercy seat, the propitiatory, which exactly fitted the ark beneath. Here we have Rom. iii. 21-26 set before our very eyes. Atonement has a broad base of righteousness to rest upon. The blood sprinkled upon the mercy seat covers the perfect and unbroken law within, "That he might be just, and the justifier of him that believeth in Jesus." This symbol of the perfect work of Christ is the "ground of meeting" in Exod. xxv. 22. "There will I meet with thee, and I will commune with thee from above the mercy seat." Fellow-believer, "Let us draw nigh"; none can say us nay if He bids us welcome. With this beautiful type in mind let us turn to Isaiah liii.

In Acts viii. 35 we read, "Then Philip opened his mouth and began at the same scripture, and preached unto Him - Jesus." Isaiah liii. is the passage. It is a part of repentant Israel's confession when they look upon Him whom they pierced, when the veil shall be removed, and they shall say:--

> "Surely He hath borne our griefs, and carried our sorrows. . . . All we, like sheep, have gone astray; we have turned every one to his own way, and the Lord hath made to meet on Him the iniquity of us all."

Let us pause and consider this wondrous meeting place. The sufferer is the Son of God; the hands which fashioned the heavens (Heb. i. 10) are nailed to the accursed tree; the brow which is yet to wear "many diadems" is crowned with the thorns that sprang up in consequence of Adam's sin. Why all this? Was there no other way? No! The Lord of glory stepped down from His exalted throne, became a man, a servant, and dies under the imputed guilt which the Lord made to meet on Him. What a tremendous thought is here; how it calls upon us to remember that we are upon holy ground! One sin to an infinitely holy Being must be loathsome, but to think of the combined sin of my lifetime being made to converge upon His sacred head is more than heart can conceive. But the writer is not the only one for whom the Saviour died. Thousands more can rejoice in Him as the great sin-bearer for them. But this is not all. Generation after generation have lived, and sinned, and died, and for many of each the Saviour's blood was shed. Here, like Paul at the end of Rom. xi. (as he goes on to enumerate the multiplied mercy of God), we get out of our depth—we can only bow our heads and say, "O the depth of the riches and wisdom and knowledge of God."

This is not all, however, there is still a "much more." At the end of Isaiah liii. 12 we read of a second meeting place, linked and founded upon the first one in verse 6:--

> "He was numbered with the transgressors, and He bare the sin of many, and made a meeting place for transgressors."

He was first made a meeting place for transgressions, and then, having put away sin by the sacrifice of Himself, He sat down at the right hand of the Majesty on high, where He ever liveth to make intercession for us, to whom we can go at all times by a new and living way. What a glorious meeting place! But even this does not exhaust the depth, nor scale the height, nor comprehend the love that passeth knowledge. We who by faith look back to that solemn meeting place of Calvary, look forward in hope to the consummation of it all, as expressed in the words of the apostle to the Thessalonians. Whether I Thess. iv. is to be interpreted of the church of the mystery is a question with which we must deal by and by, but one thing we know, that the redeemed of all ages and dispensations, whether by rapture or resurrection, whether before or after the great tribulation, whether to inherit the heavenly holiest of all or the earthly paradise, they shall all meet the Lord (I Thess. iv. 17; I John iii. 1-3; Phil. iii. 20 and 21; Col. iii. 1-4; Titus ii. 13; Rev. xx. 4, and xxii. 4).

Exodus xxv.	16. And thou shalt put into the ark the testimony which I shall give thee. 17. And thou shalt make a mercy seat of pure gold: two cubits and a half shall be the length thereof, and a cubit and a half the breadth thereof. 18. And thou shalt make two cherubims of gold, of beaten work shalt thou make them, in the two ends of the mercy seat. 19. And make one cherub on the one end, and the other cherub on the other end: even of the mercy seat shall ye make the cherubims on the two ends thereof. 20. And the cherubims shall stretch forth their wings on high, covering the mercy seat with their wings, and their faces shall look one to another; toward the mercy seat shall the faces of the cherubims be. 21. And thou shalt put the mercy seat above upon the ark; and in the ark thou shalt put the testimony that I shall give thee. 22. And there I will meet with thee, and I will commune with thee from above the mercy seat, from between the two cherubims which are upon the ark of the testimony, of all things which I will give thee in commandment unto the children of Israel.

WORD STUDIES.

For ever.

An examination of the words thus translated in A.V. and R.V.

pp. 82-86

Following upon the study of the Scriptures as to the question of immortality, we instinctively turn to the following expressions which so often occur, viz., "everlasting," "forever," etc. In the great majority of cases the word thus translated is the Greek word aiõn, or the Hebrew olam. The A.V., has rendered the word aiõn by the words "world," "course," "age," "eternal," and in conjunction with the prepositions apo (from), ek (out of), and eis (into), it gives "since the world began," "from the beginning of the world," "forever," "for evermore," "for ever and ever," "while the earth standeth," "world without end,"; while the adjective aiõnios is rendered "eternal" and "everlasting."

If we have no theology to uphold, and if we count the judgment of man as a "very small thing," it is possible that we may venture to wonder how it comes about that one word can be translated "since the world began," and also "world without end"; or again, how the word can be rendered "world" (which certainly had a beginning), and at the same time mean "for ever" and "eternal." It has been forced upon us that in all these diverse renderings we have had a good percentage of man's ideas of accurate and unflinching translation.

Our space is too limited to give many examples, but we draw attention to a few. In Matt.xxiv. 3 we read of "the end of the world." This clearly shows that the word aiõn, translated "world," may have an end. We turn to the very next chapter and find that the word aiõn, when it becomes an adjective, aiõnios, is translated by the words "eternal" and "everlasting," words which admittedly allow of no end (Matt. xxv. 46). One thing seems evident, that a true rendering is not found here. Again, there are three important passages where the word aiõnios is found with the word chronos (time), viz., Rom. xvi. 25; II Tim. i. 9, and Titus i. 2. The A.V. translates thus, "since the world began," and "before the world began," while the R.V., going to the other extreme, renders the words, "through times eternal," and before "times eternal." What can we make of a word which can mean a limited period and eternity?

Rom. xvi. 25	Now to him that is of power to stablish you according to my gospel, and the preaching of Jesus Christ, according to the revelation of the mystery, which was kept secret since the world began,
II Tim. i. 9	Who hath saved us, and called us with an holy calling, not according to our works, but according to his own purpose and grace, which was given us in Christ Jesus before the world began,
Titus i. 2	In hope of eternal life, which God, that cannot lie, promised before the world began;

There is no doubt whatever but that the word aiõn means "an age," and therefore to interpret it as "forever" is not a translation, but a human comment, which may be wrong. If the Translators had rendered the word "age-times" instead of "times eternal"; "this age" instead of "this world"; "unto the ages" instead of "for ever," it would have been consistent, and would have allowed each passage to speak for itself, instead of saying just what traditional prejudice would make it say.

The mistranslation of the word aiõn is but another of the many evidences of man's foolish pride. Man looks forward into the future, or backward into the past. Age upon age stretch away on either side, and seeing no end, and being unable to conceive of one, he calls the space which exceeds his tiny perspective—eternity! Whereas to Him who sitteth in the heavens it is but one link in the vast chain of the ages wherein He deals with men, angels, and the universe. We may learn the meaning of the Greek word aiõn by finding out the Hebrew equivalent. The Septuagint Version uses the word aiõn to translate the Hebrew word olam. Through the careful study of another labourer in the Word we are enabled to give the following list of passages where the Hebrew word olam occurs. First we consider the words me olam, as translated in the A.V.:--

USED OF GOD.	USED OF MAN.
"Ever of old" (Psa. xxv. 6).	"Of old" (Gen. vi. 4).
"From everlasting" (Psa. xli. 13).	"In old time" (Josh. xxiv. 2).
"From everlasting" (Psa. xc. 2).	"Of old" (I Sam. xxvii. 8).
"From everlasting" (Psa. xciii. 2).	"Of old" (Psa. cxix. 52).
"From everlasting" (Psa. ciii. 17).	"Long time" (Isa. xlii. 14).
"From everlasting" (Isa. xliii. 16).	"Since the beginning of the world" (Isa. lxiv. 4).

These are but a few of the passages, but they are enough to help us to see the fitness of the remark that "there is a startling inconsistency here." When applied to God it is always "for ever," or "everlasting," but when applied to man it is never so rendered. Why? Because in no case will the sense bear it. Man and his history do not stretch back to a dateless past eternity. No nation, no prophet has been "from everlasting." If a translator would be guilty of tampering with the prerogatives of God should he render me olam "from everlasting" when referring to the past of man, why should he be labelled a heretic because he questions, equally, the propriety of using the word olam to mean eternity when applied to the future of man? The case of the past is by the nature of things impossible; the future lies before us, and man has ventured his own opinion, tacked it on to the Word of God, and usurping the solemn authority of that holy Word has swayed the minds, influenced the faith, and stifled the consciences of thousands. How many have been embittered by that dread whisper "non-eternity"? How many of God's most faithful witnesses have been hounded down by these modern shibboleth-mongers?

Let us look at some of the uses of the word olam: "If the servant shall say. . . . I will not go out free. . . . he shall serve him for ever" (Exod. xxi. 5, 6). Of the same class of Hebrew servant we read in Lev. xxv. 40, "He shall serve thee unto the year of jubilee" (when his service ends and he is free to go out not merely alone, but with his wife and children). Hannah, speaking to Samuel, says, "I will bring him that he may appear before the Lord, and there abide for ever" (I Sam. i. 22). In verse 11 she interprets these words thus, "I will give him unto the Lord all the days of his life." There is no room for an "until" in our words "for ever," yet in Isa. xxxii. 14, 15 we read, "The forts and towers shall be for dens for ever. . . . until the Spirit be poured upon us." Here the for ever has an end, yet if we dare to suggest that it may be so elsewhere, what a shaking of heads and holy indignation we arouse! Scripture never contradicts itself. If our renderings make inconsistencies, let us alter our renderings a thousand times, but let us not tamper with the Scriptures of truth.

Rev.xxi. 22 tells us of a future period when there shall be no temple, yet the A.V. teaches that both the temple, priesthood, and sacrifices were to be for ever (see Ezek. xxxvii. 26; Exod. xl. 15, and Numb. xviii. 8). We have not finished yet. The word olam is followed many times by the words va ed. The word ed is rendered "till," "to," "unto," "yet," &c., e.g.:--

> "Till thou return unto the ground" (Gen. iii. 19).
> "Since that time even until now" (Ezra v. 16, &c.).

Va is the Hebrew equivalent for "and." Thus, if we retain the A.V. rendering, the words le olam va ed would mean "for ever and still," "for ever and yet further"! That the Hebrew does contain some idea of a period beyond that covered by olam is clear, for the Hebrew Translators of the Septuagint render the words by ton aiõna kai ep aiõna kai eti (Exod. xv. 8), which literally translated is, "the age, and upon the age, and still"! Fifty-one times the A.V. translates eti by the word "yet," besides "further," "any longer," and "still." Surely these facts should make us stop and reconsider this tremendous subject. There is a further consideration which throws its weight against the idea that aiõn or olam mean eternity, and that is that aiõn is frequently found in the plural and the genitive case. If the singular can mean "for ever," what can the plural mean? (we cannot speak of "for evers"—we never shall arrive at the end of eternity, let alone start another). If we keep to the rendering "age" all is clear. We can then have the expressions "unto the age," "unto the ages," and "unto the ages of the ages" without any interference with the divine words, but "eternities of eternities" is absurd.

The root idea of the word olam is something secret or hidden (see Psa. xc. 8, "secret sins"; Eccles. xii. 14, "secret thing"). Because the period is hidden or secret, is undefined or unrevealed, man in his arrogance has jumped to the conclusion that because he cannot see the end, therefore there is none, forgetting that he has limited knowledge and exceedingly limited vision. Olam and aiõn signify a period of time whose end is undefined, or which is hidden from man, but which is by no means "everlasting," for instances such as the Aaronic priesthood, &c., have been given of such periods coming to an end, which were "for ever" according to the A.V. Added to this we have the twenty passages which speak of "unto the age of undefined limits and yet further" translated "for ever and ever" by the English, in spite of both Hebrew and Greek.

Let none imagine that the eternal security of the believer is by any means weakened by these facts. This glorious truth is unquestionably settled by such emphatic words as "incorruptible," "immortal," and by the words, "Because I live, ye shall live also," and "Your life is hid with Christ in God." Let us believe and love the truth, and the truth will make us free; free from the shackles of the traditions of the elders which make void the Word of God; free from the nightmare of Christendom; free from the clogs of error to proclaim "Life to the dead" in the gospel of the glory of Christ.

It is possible that some may be tempted to write to us, and we would anticipate one thing. We have stated facts; we do not hold ourselves responsible for the "words which the Holy Ghost teacheth," neither do we proffer any apology for upsetting anyone's theological beliefs, whatever they may be. We would say in the words of one servant of God to another, "You have your Bible, you have your knees, use them."

Huperbole.

A word study.

Those of our readers who have a knowledge of "Figures of Speech" will recognise in the title of this study the name of the figure of exaggeration. "Walled up to heaven" (Deut. i. 28), "Hate not his father" (Luke xiv. 26), "The world is gone after Him" (John xii. 19) are examples of its use in Scripture. In the New Testament the Greek verb and noun huperballõ and huperbole occur together some thirteen times, and are variously translated, viz., "exceed," "excel," "pass," "above measure," "abundance," "excellency," "far more exceeding," "more excellent," "out of measure." Let us consider a few of the passages wherein they may be found.

"The glory that excelleth" (II Cor. iii. 10). The apostle contrasts the old covenant with the new. The one was inscribed on tables of stone, and was of the letter which killeth; the other was written on the heart of flesh by the Spirit of God, and maketh alive (cf. Ezek. xxxvi. 26). The one was a ministry of condemnation, the other of righteousness; the glory of the one was transient, the other had the "glory that excelleth." Thus, during the pentecostal period, the apostles sought to emphasize the temporary character of the law, and the permanent character of the new covenant. This is the object of Hebrews and the argument of Galatians iii. The new covenant has no place in the dispensation of the mystery.

"A more excellent way" (I Cor. xii. 31), --Better than the "best gifts" is love. The "gifts ceased, but "faith, hope, and love" remained, and are the threefold cord of the present dispensation. Some ignore the words of I Cor. xii. and xiii., and think that tongues, miracles, &c., are the more excellent way. "Love never faileth, but whether there be prophecies, they shall fail, whether there be tongues, they shall cease." If the reader is not enjoying the "more excellent way" of the dispensation of the grace of God to the Gentiles (Eph. iii. 2), he may be zealous for "pentecostal showers," but the true blessedness of the "perfect man, the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ" will not be enjoyed by him. We cannot speak as a child, understand as a child, think as a child (I Cor. xiii. 11), and enjoy the pleasures and blessings of full-grown manhood at the same time. "Babes" cannot understand the "mystery" (I Cor. iii. 1, 2; Heb. v. 11-14; Eph. iv. 14).

In II Cor. i. 8 and iv. 7, 17 there are some important lessons. The words printed in italics represent the word huperbole:--

> "We were pressed out of measure, beyond power" (i. 8).
> "We have this treasure in earthen vessel, that the excellency of the power may be of God, and not of us" (iv. 7).

How wonderfully the use of this word here emphasizes the grace of God. The heavy pressure of i. 8 becomes light when the "weight" of glory is seen; it is "but for a moment" when compared with the glory "age-abiding." There is a suggestive lesson for us in noticing that the apostle who here suffered affliction "out of measure" had, in his unconverted days, persecuted the church of God with like intensity. "For ye have heard of my conversation in time past in the Jews' religion, how that beyond measure I persecuted the church of God, and wasted it" (Gal. i. 13). In the next verse (14) he speaks of this "religion" as coupled with an exceeding zeal for the traditions of his fathers. This has ever been the case, the traditions of men and religion have ever been the persecuting agencies of satan. The truth, like love, "suffereth long, and is kind." They who know the truth are to be "gentle unto all men, apt to teach, patiently bearing up under evil, in meekness instructing those that oppose themselves" (II Tim. ii. 24, 25).

Again, in II Cor. xi. 23, the apostle says of himself, "In labours more abundant, in stripes above measure." So it was, that the most zealous persecutor of the church became by grace its greatest champion, and keenest sufferer. Suffering was among the first things mentioned in his commission, "I must show him how great things he must suffer for My name's sake" (Acts ix. 16). The apostle, in the midst of all his sufferings, could look away to "that day" and, as we have seen in II Cor. iv. 17, speak of his "exceeding heavy trials as "light" in comparison with the "weight" of glory. It is noteworthy that the words translated "a far more exceeding" in II Cor. iv. 17 are huperbolen eis huperbolen, emphasizing the fact that the apostle did not magnify his sorrows, but his hoped-for-joys.

The epistle to the Ephesians has three helpful passages containing this word, viz.:--

> "The exceeding greatness of His power towards us who believe" (i. 19).
> "The exceeding riches of His grace" (ii. 7).
> "The love of Christ which passeth knowledge" (iii. 19).

Here we have faith, hope, and love enriched by this mighty superabundance, for the theme of Eph. i. 19 is faith, and that is the result of resurrection power. Eph. ii. 7 looks forward to the "ages to come," and the riches of grace, while Eph. iii. 19 leads to the fulness of God in the "knowledge-surpassing love of Christ." Eph. iii. 19 is the last occurrence of the word in Scripture. The first occurrence of the noun is Rom. vii. 13, "exceeding sinful"; the last occurrence of the verb is in Eph. iii. 19, "The love of Christ which passeth knowledge." "Where sin abounded grace did superabound." Oh, for grace to appreciate the "exceeding riches of his grace

pp. 114-117 (end).

In a former article we were considering the "dispensation of the mystery," and were reminded of its heavenly character. In this present article we desire to consider the references to the heavenly aspect of this mystery a little more closely. Five times does the word translated "heavenly places" occur in the epistle to the Ephesians, and the spiritual significance of five is grace.

The blessed truth connected with the heavenly places is a fitting witness to the "riches of His grace," and the "glory of His grace." There are not a few who seek to discredit the emphasis upon the peculiar and exclusive teaching of the Prison Epistles by the remark that the word translated "heavenly places" occurs in other passages of Scripture, particularly in Hebrews. Twenty times in all the word occurs in the New Testament, distributed as follows: in the Gospels, twice; in the Epistles before Acts xxviii., five times (grace); in the Prison Epistles, seven times (spiritual perfection); and in Hebrews, six times (the number of man, imperfection, and of that age which immediately precedes the new creation, viz., the millennial kingdom).

There is, however, a most important distinction to be noticed between the five occurrences in Ephesians, and the fifteen elsewhere. The word in Ephesians is in the dative plural, en tois epouraniois, "in the heavenlies"—speaking of locality, whereas the word in the other passages signifies "heavenly," but not necessarily "in heaven." Those who tasted of the "heavenly gift" in Heb. vi. 4 certainly did not taste a gift that was up in heaven, but which was heavenly. So the "heavenly" country or city of Heb. xi. 16 will be seen "coming down from God out of heaven"; it will not be enjoyed "in heaven." The expression "in the heavenlies" (the dative plural) is peculiar to the epistle to the Ephesians. If we deny the distinction, surely we must not resent it if anyone doubts our belief in the inspiration of the Scriptures.

Having seen the unique character of these five passages, we will quote them in their order, and seek to exhibit their blessed meaning. Before we quote the passages, however, we desire to throw light upon the meaning conveyed by this term by reference to another, and then by comparing the passages together we may be enabled to more clearly see the sphere of our blessedness. The word we desire to consider is that translated "saint." Fifteen times does the word hagios (saint) occur in Ephesians. Fifteen is of course 5x3, the superlative of grace (5=grace; 3=completeness, resurrection, &c.), and is consequently connected with the five-fold occurrence of "heavenly places." To many passages in the A.V. we do not take exception, but there is one form in which this word "saint" occurs that may teach much more than our English Version allows.

The genitive plural of hagios is ton hagiõn, in masculine, feminine, and neuter. Consequently the context must decide whether the word means "of the saints" (masc. Or fem.), or "of the holy places or things" (neuter). Heb. ix. 23 and 24 will illustrate our meaning. "Better sacrifices" is the plural of majesty for "the infinitely better sacrifice." Likewise "holy places" refers to the "most holy place." Readers have only to refer back in this chapter for ample evidence that the "holiest of all" is meant here. The most holy place made with hands was a type of the true holiest of all, not made with hands, which Scripture declares to be "heaven itself."

Let us read "of the saints" as "of the heavenly holiest of all" in the following passages, and see how much we learn thereby:--

> "Now therefore ye are no more guests* and foreigners, but fellow-citizens of the heavenly holiest of all, and of the household of God" (Eph. ii. 19).

This is parallel with Phil. iii. 20, "our citizenship (politeuma, fellow-citizen being sumpolitai) is in heaven," heaven itself being the true holiest of all.

> "Giving thanks unto the Father, who hath made you sufficient for the inheritance of the holiest of all in the light" (Col. i. 12).

Believers are not going to have "saints" for their inheritance; they have their inheritance in the light, in heaven itself, the true holiest of all. This lifts the believer above the petty things of sense and time. What has he to do with ordinances, types, shadows, when his inheritance is centred in the real, true holiest of all in the light?

Returning now to the statement of Scripture concerning the "heavenly places," we can see that these, equally, refer to the same position of glory. The five occurrences in Ephesians are related thus:--

A | i. 3. Spiritual blessings.
B | i. 20. Christ raised far above principalities and powers.
C | ii. 6. Christ and His church, raised and seated in the holiest of all.
B | iii. 10. The church a witness to principalities and powers.
A | vi. 12. Spiritual wickedness.

> "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings in heavenly places (or in the holiest of all) in Christ" (Eph. i. 3).

"Ye see your calling, brethren." Let us seek to walk worthy of the calling wherewith we have been called. If our inheritance, our blessing, our sphere is "above, where Christ sitteth on the right hand of God," let us find our all there. Earthly promises, blessings, and inheritances are for the earthly people (Israel), and through them the Abrahamic blessings will flow out unto all nations. For the time being Israel has been set aside, Abrahamic blessings have discontinued, and a mystery, hitherto kept perfect secret, has been made known. Unlike the Abrahamic promises, the Jew takes exactly the same place as the Gentile, both as regards salvation and dispensational blessings.

NOTE: * -- Gentile believers before Acts 28 did not stand upon equality with Israel so far as dispensational privileges were concerned (see Rom.9-11).

We are living under an economy of grace that is unparalleled in its riches, and its glories. It reaches out beyond the pale of Judah to the ends of the earth; it includes in its boundless scope the forgiveness of "all trespasses"; it reaches down to the depths of sin, and places the saved "far above" in the holiest of all; it points the saved sinner away from self unto Him "who hath made us sufficient" for such an inheritance; it shuts the believer up to the Lord of glory, "in whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge." It enjoins no ritual, no observance, no ceremony of any kind whatsoever. These have all, divine and human, been nailed to, and cancelled by, the cross of Christ. Our endeavour is now to be directed to keeping (not making) the unity of Spirit. There faction ends; there peace rules; there is found no confidence in the flesh; there is a blessed condition of absolute independence of all else except the Lord. Once again we repeat,

> "Ye see your calling, brethren."
> "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings in the heavenly holiest of all."

DEAR FELLOW-BELIEVERS,

By the good hand of God upon us we are privileged to issue a second edition of these Volumes. Grace alone is, and must still be, our support and our provision.

The "Platform and Programme" of the witness may be found in three verses of Psalm cxix.:--

"I have chosen the way of truth" (verse 30).

By His grace He chose us, and the response of our hearts has been the choice of the way of truth. It is a rugged pathway, beset with difficulties, obstacles, and hindrances made both by man and satan. Great barriers are erected across this way called "Traditional Views," etc., but we would rather lose all subscribers, their friendship, and their fellowship, than turn aside from full adherence to every "jot and tittle" of God's Holy Word. Therefore we repeat the words:--

"I have stuck unto Thy testimonies" (verse 31).

In vain we speak of faithfulness, of charity, of zeal, unless we stick to God's Word written. Written, not in the books of men, but in the book of God. If by our sticking to the testimonies of God we appear to make men better than ourselves as liars, we have no alternative. Earnestly we pray, "Remove from me the way of lying," "I have chosen the way of truth." Much of the so-called spiritualizing and sermonizing on the Word is nothing more or less than a hiding and distorting of its plain meaning. From such may the Lord ever keep The Berean Expositor.

By grace, we have not only chosen the way of truth, but we also intend to stick to it, and pray that the next clause may also be our own experience:--

"I will run the way of Thy commandments, when Thou shalt enlarge my heart" (verse 32).

Verse 45 says, "I will walk at liberty," and the words "liberty" and "enlarge" are similar in the original. Let us pray for this liberty, freedom from the thraldom of sectarian bias and bitterness, freedom to love all saints, and freedom to believe all that God has written. Let us seek to "adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour." Let us not only choose, and stick, but let us also run.

Oh for grace to practise what we preach, and for the blessed consistency which enable the apostle Paul to link together his "doctrine, purpose, manner of life."

Yours for His glory by immutable grace,

PLATFORM and PROGRAMME

"Seeing then that we have such a hope, we use great plainness of speech" (II Cor. iii. 12).

p. 1

In Volume I., page 65, we gave the "Platform and Programme" of The Berean Expositor. We would repeat a portion here:--

> "We desire, as grace is given, to 'search the Scriptures' daily, and to publish the results regardless of the approval, or the disapproval, of any. Let it be at once understood, the Bible is infallible, but the searcher is not. There will doubtless be much of human error, but we write as a Berean expositor, for Berean readers, trusting that they will test every statement by the Word of truth."

> "We do not intend to apologise for the Bible, nor for any teaching which may from time to time be brought to light. While few would seek to avoid any appearance of callousness, and would endeavour not to wound the feelings of our brethren, yet we intend, the Lord being our helper, to turn back for nothing. We desire the same spirit (in the least some measure) that underlies the words of Paul, 'None of these things move me'."

Once again we have to thank the many friends who have written to us. We are becoming somewhat used to the expressions "an infallible Pope" and "too dogmatic." However, as one writer stated he felt better after having relieved his mind, we shall make no objection here.

If God has spoken (and we know what He has said), traditions twice nineteen centuries old should not close our mouths, or prevent the glorious dogmatism of "Thus saith the Lord."

Let us follow the truth, and the truth shall make us free.

All the Frankincense.
pp. 42-43

Many precious lessons for the child of God may be gathered by a prayerful study of the types of Leviticus, among them the fulness of blessing which may be discovered in the verse which contains our title--Lev. ii. 16. Speaking of the Meal Offering, which exhibits the moral perfection of the Lord Jesus meeting our great lack of perfectness, the Lord said:--

> "And the priest shall burn the memorial of it, part of the beaten corn thereof, and part of the oil thereof, with all the frankincense thereof."

In this offering, as with all others which typified the one great offering of the Saviour, neither leaven nor honey were permitted, but in contrast to this the salt of the covenant and all the frankincense ascended up acceptably unto the Lord. In the beautiful language of the Old Testament, the word for frankincense is l'bonah—something white. What a picture of the believer being covered and accepted in all the fragrance of the name of the Lord Jesus. Something white! Nothing but that which is evil and defiled could the Lord see in any of us by ourselves, but, blessed be His name, just as the twelve loaves of shewbread were covered by the frankincense (Lev. xxiv. 5-7), so the believer is covered by all the worthiness of the Son of God.

As we read the book of Numbers and see Israel continually failing, sinning, murmuring, rebelling, and remember all that is written concerning them, this blessed lesson of the covering frankincense is enforced when we read the inspired words of Balaam, "He hath not beheld iniquity in Jacob, neither hath He seen perverseness in Israel" (Num. xxiii. 21). There is no other explanation of these remarkable words than the fact that this wayward people were God's chosen ones, and that He viewed them in Christ. Truly "all the frankincense" is here. The sweet savour that ascended to God on behalf of Israel was but a type of the Father's crowning mercy, as set forth in Eph. i. 3-6, where sinners of the Gentiles, aliens, and enemies who believe are told upon the authority of God in the Word of His grace that they are "accepted in the Beloved."

Brethren, can we not look up to Him at the right hand of God, and thankfully realize something of the meaning of the words

all the frankincense.

Lev. xxiv. 5-7.

5. And thou shalt take fine flour, and bake twelve cakes thereof: two tenth deals shall be in one cake.
6. And thou shalt set them in two rows, six on a row, upon the pure table before the Lord.
7. And thou shalt put pure frankincense upon each row, that it may be on the bread for a memorial, even an offering made by fire unto the Lord.

Structure of II Timothy.
pp. 90-91

We have been requested by a reader to give the structure of II Timothy, and have been asked whether we would be willing to give other structures when required. We should be very pleased to be of service in this way if light is given to us upon the passage under notice. We, of course, cannot give structures "to order," neither our time nor ability being equal to such a demand. We give below the very barest outline of II Timothy. The importance of Paul's ministry is so emphasized, both negatively and positively, that we felt it would be best to let the structure of each part with its elaboration remain over for some future issue.

Members A and A emphasize the forsaking of Paul and its effects. Members B and B link Paul's words and teaching with suffering and reigning. Members C and C suggest "rightly dividing the Word of truth" as the safeguard against error, and give illustrations of the danger of not so doing:--

A | 1:1-18. Paul and his message forsaken. The Lord his keeper.
Phygellus and Hermogenes, examples of forsakers.
Onesiphorus, "The Lord give mercy."
B | 2:1-13. Teach the things heard of me (exclusive).
Suffering and reigning. "The crown."
C | 2:14-26. Hymenaeus and Philetus have erred concerning the truth.
"Shun." "They will increase unto more ungodliness."
C | 3:1-9. Jannes and Jambres examples of those who withstand the truth."
"Turn away." "They shall proceed no further."
B | 3:10-4:8. "Thou hast fully followed my teaching, etc.
(reference to period before associated with the Twelve).
Suffering and reigning. "The crown."
A | 4:9-22. Paul and his message forsaken. The Lord stood by.
Demas, example of forsakers.
Alexander, "The Lord recompense."

Answers to Correspondents.
pp. 13-14

G.R., Birminigham.—"II Cor. v. 17. What more do you want than being 'in Christ,' as in the text?"

At first sight it would appear that this verse reaches the zenith, but it is not so. II Corinthians and Galatians are to be read together, and the result is this:--

Doctrinal position. . . . . II Corinthians. . . . . "In Christ."
Dispensational position. . . Galatians. . . . . ."With Abraham."

When we turn to the epistle to the Ephesians we shall find that the dispensational and doctrinal positions are the same, viz.:--

Doctrinal position. . . . . Ephesians 1. . . . . "In Christ."
Dispensational position. . . Ephesians 2. . . . . "With Christ."

The use of the terms "doctrinal" and "dispensational" are but arbitrary, they may be ignored. The case is this; once the blessing was "in Christ" and "with Abraham"; now it is both in and with Christ. There is no need for us to enlarge on this, or to say which is better.

II Cor. v. 17. Therefore if any man be in Christ, he is a new creature: old things are passed away; behold, all things are become new.

E.R., Alberta.—You write, "The term 'The kingdom is in abeyance' is contrary to the teaching of the Bible." You then turn to Rom. xi. 11-25, and Matt. xiii. 30, pointing out the "until" and saying, "Where is the abeyance of this gospel to be found here?"

Our answer is, it is not found in either passage. These words were written before the time for Israel to be set aside and the dispensation of the mystery made known.

Will you apply your own argument to Isa. lxi. 2? You would be the last to conflict with the teaching of Christ (Luke iv. 19, 20), yet He divided this verse, but the division is not seen there.

Matt. xiii.	30. Let both grow together until the harvest: and in the time of harvest I will say to the reapers, Gather ye together first the tares, and bind them in bundles to burn them: but gather the wheat into my barn.
Isa. lxi.	2. To proclaim the acceptable year of the Lord, and the day of vengeance of our God; to comfort all that mourn;
	19. To preach the acceptable year of the Lord.
Luke iv.	20. And he closed the book, and he gave it again to the minister, and sat down. And the eyes of all them that were in the synagogue were fastened on him.

By the time "Hebrews" was written the abeyance was a fact, and the apostle could write, "But now we see not yet all things put under Him" (Heb. ii. 8). Strictly speaking, the "abeyance of the kingdom" is untrue, for the kingdom has never been set up yet by Christ. We should be more correct in speaking of the abeyance of the hopes and conditions which were connected with the good news of the kingdom. You will surely see that the gospel of Matt. x. 5-8 is not the gospel of Eph. i., iii.

You will also see that the terms of Mark xvi. 16-20 were fulfilled right up to Acts xxviii. 1-9, but from that moment they abruptly cease. They are then in abeyance, together with all the other accompaniments of kingdom things.

> D.M., Burntisland.—Mark xvi. 15-20 and Col. i. 23 have no reference to each other. The one has relation to the kingdom and miracles; the other is connected with neither. The idea that the gospel was preached to animals is absurd, for animals do not believe, neither are they baptized, neither do they hope for resurrection.

The introduction of the word "new" in "new tongues" (which is omitted in the R.V.) ruins the marvellous numerical design of the passage, which is made to teach that the apostles spoke a new kind of language which animals could understand.

> F.H., Birmingham.—"Will you kindly look at Eph. vi. 12, and when you have time express your opinion as to whether the 'heavenly places' are here referred to as the location of evil spirits. There appears a difficulty in believing that that region of peace (Holy of Holies?) is disturbed by satan's emissaries. . . .

In answer to these questions we would say to the first, Yes, "heavenly places" in Eph. vi. 12 are that habitation of evil spirits; but to the second, No, evil spirits have no access to the heavenly holiest of all, where we are blessed with all spiritual blessings.

Eph. vi. 12. For we wrestle not against flesh and blood, but against principalities, against powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world, against spiritual wickedness in high places.

Turning to the Word itself we shall find out difficulties vanish in the clear light thrown upon the subject in this epistle. Let us examine what is said of these "heavenly places" in Ephesians. The first reference, like the last (the one under notice), does not definitely say anything as to locality; it reads, "Blessed be God. . . . Who hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings in the heavenly places in Christ" (Eph. i. 3). The "spiritual blessings" are echoed by the "spiritual wickedness" of Eph. vi. 12.

The next reference, however, supplies us with more definite information. It occurs in the prayer of the apostle, where he desires that we should know "what is the exceeding greatness of His power, which He wrought in Christ, when He raised Him from the dead, and set Him at His own right hand in 'heavenly places' far above all principality and power. . . ." (Eph. i. 19-21). Two important items immediately appear upon reading this passage, first that Christ is not only in the heavenly places, but also at the very right hand of God Himself, and secondly that His exaltation has placed Him "far above all."

This calls upon us to "prove the things that differ," and to note carefully all that is said before arriving at a conclusion. F.H. lives at Birmingham; the writer lives in London. Both could truthfully say that they live in England, but that would not justify the conclusion, "therefore F.H. and the writer live together." The other fact which we noticed shows us that in the heavenlies pinnacle of all is occupied by the risen Lord, beneath Whose feet spiritual powers, both good and bad, are placed.

In order more fully to realize the exalted position of the Lord, and incidentally our position "in Him," let us notice a few more passages:--

Col. iii. 1 tells us that Christ "sitteth on the right hand of God." Heb. i. 3 tells us that He "sat down on the right hand of the Majesty on high." Heb. iv. 14 tells us that He "passed through (dierchomai) the heavens." Heb. vii. 26 tells us that He is "made higher than the heavens." I Pet. iii. 22 tells us that He "is gone into heaven, and is on the right hand of God, angels, and authorities, and powers being made subject unto Him." Eph. iv. 10 tells us that He "ascended up far above all heavens."

The cumulative evidence of these passages is of great importance, inasmuch as it teaches us to differentiate between those heavenly places which are inhabited by spirit beings, and that exalted position, the sphere of our blessings, far above all. When we have read the prayer of Eph. i. 19-23, and realized in some measure the "glory that excelleth," the second chapter follows with its revelation of grace wherein we learn that the death, resurrection, and high glory of our risen Head is the pledge, pattern, and promise of the death, resurrection, and final glory of every member of His redeemed body.

So Eph. ii. 5, 6 reads, "even when we were dead in sins, hath made us alive together with Christ. . . . and hath raised us up together, and made us sit together in heavenly places, in Christ Jesus." This third reference to the heavenly places shows us that the sphere of our blessings is beyond the intrusion of "angel, principality, or power," and "wrestling" in any form whatever is an impossibility.

The fourth reference is Eph. iii. 10, where we read, "unto the principalities and powers in heavenly places might be known by the church the manifold wisdom of God." The conflict of Eph. vi. 12 is confined to the lower section of the heavens, where fallen spirits, ruled by the "Prince of the power of the air," wage war against those who, through grace, are destined to share the heavenly glory of the church of the mystery.

Dan. x. shows us the powerful agencies which satan pitted against the revealed purpose of God appertaining to Israel, and Eph. vi. 12 teaches us that this foe of truth still antagonises the purpose of God, and that they who believe the revelation of the mystery "wrestle not with blood and flesh, but with principalities, with powers, with the worldholders of this darkness, with spiritual things of wickedness, in heavenly places." Our spiritual foes are beneath the feet of Christ, let us therefore be strong in the Lord and in the power of His might, realizing that just as our life is hid with Christ in God, so our blessings, likewise, are safely guarded in heaven's "holiest of all" in the light, where neither moth nor rust corrupt, nor thieves break through and steal—"far above all."

> W.H.G.T., Toronto, writes:--"I have just read with interest the papers given before the Prophecy Investigation Society, and I observe that your view of Acts and I Thessalonians came in for some criticism. Some time or other I should be glad if you would discuss the point raised by Mr. Hogg, that the Jews had been definitely set aside three years before Paul visited Rome. This point, and also those mentioned, seem to me to call for notice."

Is it true that the nation of Israel was set aside three years before Paul's visited Rome? The statement was made and referred to as "a significant fact," and if it is a fact we ought to know it, and keep it constantly in mind as we study the Word with reference to our particular calling.

The passage referred to is the great dispensational section of the epistle to the Romans—chapters ix., x., xi. We will not argue the matter apart from revelation; like the Psalmist let us say, "I hate thoughts, but Thy law do I love." The great point of emphasis in chapter ix. is the fact that God's elective purposes overrule all things relative to His purposes. The temptation to linger over the opening verses is great, but must be put aside as we are here reading these chapters to see whether the "significant fact" asserted above is true. The first statement which has a particular bearing upon the question before us is found in verses 27-29:--

> "Esaias also crieth concerning Israel, Though the number of the children of Israel be as the sand of the sea, A REMNANT shall be saved. . . . except the Lord of Sabbath had left us a SEED, we had been as Sodoma, and been made like unto Gomorrha."

The period of longsuffering covered by the Acts of the Apostles was in many ways parallel with the time when Isaiah prophesied. It will be remembered how he opened his prophecy with words of solemn denunciation, showing that Israel had become "a sinful nation, a people laden with iniquity, a seed of evil doers." Why was it that the judgment did not fall at once? Isaiah i. 5-6 shows how utterly corrupt the nation was, verses 7 and 8 show desolation and defection had already begun their chastening yet unheeded course. The answer to the question of long delayed punishment is found in verse 9, the verse quoted by the apostle in Rom. ix. A very small remnant saved the situation. Sodom was destroyed because not even ten righteous ones could be found in it. Israel approximated to Sodom in its sin, but there was by grace a remnant reserved unto the Lord, whose presence kept back the threatened wrath to come.

Rom. x. 21 shows the attitude of the Lord and the character of the people during the period of the Acts. "All day long I have stretched forth My hands unto a disobedient and gain-saying people." Yet, just as the remnant prevented the nation at that time from being exactly parallel to Sodom, so chapter xi. immediately follows this quotation (Rom. x. 21) by again showing us that the people as a people were spared by reason of the elect remnant. "I say, therefore, hath God cast away His people"? This is the point at issue, which was answered in the affirmative by the brother quoted in the letter above. The Word of God answers the question in the negative, and supplies the reason--the remnant:-- > "Hath God cast away His people? Let not my reasoning become so (me genoito), for I also am an Israelite. . . . God hath not cast away His people whom He foreknew" (Rom. xi. 1, 2).

Many stop here to argue over the meaning of "foreknew." Scripture goes on to supply us with a concrete example which is much better:--

> "Or know ye not what the scripture says in (the account of) Elijah, when he interceded with God against Israel? Lord, Thy prophets have they slain, Thine altars have they overthrown, and I am left alone, and they are seeking my life" (Rom. xi. 2, 3).

Elijah reckoned, as others have reckoned since, without the Lord:--

> "But what saith the answer of God to Him? I have left me seven thousand men who indeed have not bowed a knee unto Baal" (Rom. xi. 4).

Elijah was therefore mistaken in supposing that even in that fearful period of Israel's history the end of the nation had come. The words which follow emphasize the same truth upon us with regard to the Pentecostal period. Up to the time of writing Rom. xi. Israel had not been "cast away," the reason being the same as in Isaiah i. and in I Kings xix. We do not give it in our own words, for the whole argument, question, illustration and answer are here before us:--

> "Even so (thus, in like manner) in the present season also there is a remnant according to an election of grace" (Rom. xi. 5).

This elect remnant is prominent throughout the Acts, and is contrasted with the remainder of the nation. It is false to fact and to true interpretation to make the apostle's "present season" mean the year 1913; he meant the time then before him, while God's mercy still lingered, and before "wrath came upon them to the uttermost." The "remnant" and the "rest" are again contrasted in verse 7. If we leave out of our reckoning the divine argument of these first seven verses, we shall be unable rightly to understand what follows. Who are meant by "they" who "stumble" in verse 11? Who are meant by "them" who are "cast away" in verse 15? The nation of Israel, say some, and saying so dispose of the whole question in one sweep, arguing to their own satisfaction that Israel was set aside some years before Acts xxviii.

Keeping in mind what we have already seen, we shall perceive that those who "stumbled" and were "cast away" were the "rest," and that the remnant according to the election of grace maintained the position of the people before God for the time. This is clearly stated in verse 17. If they are right who have attempted to discredit the teaching concerning Acts xxviii. being the time when Israel was set aside, they ought to read in Rom. xi. 17, 18 that the olive tree was cut down at the root, or plucked up by the roots, at this time. What do we find, however? Something different from what we might have expected. The bulk of the apostasizing nation is spoken of as "some of the branches," the remnant according to election being still considered as the olive tree still rooted, into which the Gentiles were grafted. That is to say, that no change, other than the lopping off of "some of the branches," and the grafting in of others, had as yet taken place. A tree is not cut down nor destroyed by the cutting off of "some of the branches," and the fact that into that tree other alien branches had been grafted betokened life—yea the word is "root and fatness of the olive tree."

You ask, Why were the branches broken off? The Scripture says, "because of unbelief." Those addressed by the apostle "stood by faith" and were warned that just as these of Israel had forfeited their peculiar privileges through unbelief, so the Gentiles during this same period would also lose the like privileges in the same way. This does not refer to "the love of God which is in Christ Jesus," for "nothing" could separate from that, it refers to dispensational privilege. The difference between standing in grace and dispensational privilege is clearly seen by reading Rom. iii. 1, 2 and 9. "What advantage then hath the Jew? or what profit is there of circumcision? Much every way." This is purely a question of dispensational privilege. "What then? are we better than they? No, in no wise." This is a matter of sin and salvation.

Israel's "advantage" and "profit" are given at length in Rom. ix. 4, 5; these were forfeited through unbelief, and are in view in Rom. xi. Mercy rejoices against judgment throughout this chapter, dark though it may appear. The stumbling of Israel was not "that they should fall," but that salvation might come unto the Gentiles. The God Who cut out "some of the branches" "is able to graft them in again." Election is written large over this wonderful people. Jacob was chosen instead of Esau, without any reference to "either good or evil" (Rom. ix. 11). The remnant stood by faith during the trying period covered by the Acts, because they were "the election," the Gentiles believed because "afore prepared unto glory" (Rom. ix. 23, 24) and the ultimate destiny of "all Israel" (xi. 26) is based upon the selfsame elective grace.

The very ones who as branches were broken off are defined in verse 28 "as concerning the gospel enemies for your sakes," these selfsame enemies "as touching the election are beloved for the fathers' sakes." Why? "For the gifts and calling of God are without change of mind." There is, behind all, the unchanging God of love and grace. "For God hath concluded them all in unbelief, that He might have mercy upon all." Here you have the whole nation spoken of now not "cast away," but looking forward to a future restoration.

Rom. ix.-xi. teaches exactly the opposite of the statement quoted above, and the failure to view the remnant as God viewed it (namely as the olive tree), the failure to take God's estimate, "some of the branches," has led some to think it says all the branches, the stock and root as well. We cannot discover the "significant fact," and believe more firmly than before that the longsuffering of God waited until the all-day conference of Paul with the elders at Rome, and that it was then that the Pentecostal dispensation ended. The firstfruits (Rom. xi. 16) were a pledge of future harvest, and that harvest shall surely come; meanwhile, between the period of the end of Acts and "the end of the age - the harvest," God has put into operation an hitherto unrevealed secret which has no reference whatever to the olive tree of Israelitish privilege.

With regard to the other questions raised, we must consider them more briefly. Dealing with the argument from silence the speaker above quoted said:--

> "The epistle does not use certain words concerning the coming of the Lord, nor tell us that He is coming at all. Are we to conclude that the Lord is not coming? . . . . Further, I do not find any reference to the Holy Spirit in the epistle to the Colossians. Is there no Holy Spirit, no doctrine of the Holy Spirit for us to-day because there is no reference to it in the Colossians letter? I think, brethren, this argument from silence must be dismissed."

The argument, however, is not as represented in these words, neither can it be so easily dismissed. When the reader knows that the subject of the conference was entitled, "The epistles of Paul in connection with the parousia, the epiphaneia, and the apocalupsis of our Lord's coming," he will see that much vital truth is brought to light by considering the presence or absence of either of these words. The usage or non-usage of the word parousia (coming) in Paul's epistles is striking. He uses it repeatedly in I Thess., II Thess., and I Cor. in reference to the Lord's coming, but never uses it when speaking of the Lord's coming after Acts xxviii. The same phenomenom is observed with reference to apocalupsis (revelation). Parousia links the hope of the Pentecostal believers to the "coming" of Matt. xxiv., and apocalupsis links that same hope with the revelation of the Lord as set forth in the Apocalypse, in the Book of the Revelation. Epiphaneia used alone does not occur before Acts xxviii., the reference in II Thess. ii. 8 is with reference to the parousia, and not of the "appearing" used by itself. II Thess. ii. 8 speaks of "the appearing of the parousia," Titus ii. 13 of "the appearing of the glory," already explained in Col. iii. 4. These are "significant facts," which cannot be lightly dismissed.

Further, it must be remembered that Colossians supplements Ephesians, as Ephesians does Colossians. No one has been so absurd as to say that silence in one epistle is a basis of argument. This was our brother's man of straw, which alas seemed conclusive to many. We have contended that the epistles of Paul are divided into two sets, those written after Acts xxviii. having a distinct message, differing not only in degree but also in kind from those written before Acts xxviii.

The speaker further asked a question, "Is it not a very significant fact that the Jews have a greater prominence in the epistle than in any other of Paul's writings, save the epistle to the Romans?" Here is another "very significant fact." The first is that several years before the end of the Acts, and consequently before the writing of Ephesians, Israel was set aside, the second is that though set aside they are more prominent in Ephesians than in any other epistle excepting Romans. Strange "facts" these. Our position is that in Romans the Jew is everywhere prominent because Israel had NOT been set aside, but that they are not taken into account in Ephesians because they had then been set aisde.

We do not know how our brother makes these two contradictory yet "significant facts" harmonize, and we do not believe there is any more truth in his second statement than in his first.

The following "facts" are supplied by a concordance. "Jew," in Romans, eleven occurrences, in I Cor., eight, in II Cor., once, in Gal., five, in I Thess., once, and in Col., once. Evidently we have not struck the right word here, for Ephesians does not even contain the word. Let us try the word "Israel," in Romans, eleven occurrences, in I Cor., once, in II Cor., once, in Gal., once, and in Eph., once. Ephesians does certainly appear under this heading, but it certainly does not rise above the other epistles.

Israelite, in Romans, twice, and in II Cor., once. Let us search further, perhaps we have not lighted upon the word, which when discovered will show how exceedingly Jewish the epistle to the Ephesians really is.

Circumcision, in Romans, fifteen occurrences, in I Cor., once, in Gal., seven, in Eph., once, in Phil., once, in Col., four times, and in Titus, once. To circumcise, in I Cor., twice, in Gal., six times, and in Col., once. Still we seem to have failed to establish the "very significant fact." Let us try the usage of the "Fathers." Abraham, in Romans, nine times, in II Cor., once, and in Gal., nine. Isaac, in Romans, twice, and in Gal., once. Jacob, in Romans, twice. Moses, in Romans, four times, in I Cor., twice, in II Cor., three times, and in II Tim., once.

Our search seems to lead us further away from the conclusions of our brother—the references will have to be overwhelming great soon, or we shall be obliged to "dismiss" the idea in the same way that we do the theory of the evolutionist regarding the missing link—often spoken of and taken for granted, but never produced in evidence. Let us try the city which figures so largely in Israel's history and which was destroyed when Israel was set aside. Jerusalem, in Romans, four times, in I Cor., once, and in Gal., four times. We can spare no more space. We fail to establish by this method the idea tha Ephesians gives the Jew greater prominence than any other Pauline epistle save Romans.

It must be evident to all who have read so far that the Jew with all connected with him is abundantly evident in those epistles written before Acts xxviii., but that he becomes a very small quantity afterwards. If we examine the passages in Ephesians it will be found that even when the Jew is spoken of at all it is only set in contrast with the exceedingly more glorious position of the Gentile under the dispensation of the mystery.

Where is the prominence of the Jew in Eph.2:12, "being aliens from the commonwealth of Israel"? The passage tells the Gentiles what they once were in order to let them see by the contrast the grace and glory of their high calling. The context of the passage will emphasize its teaching. Its arrangement is suggestive also:--

A | Gentiles in the flesh; called uncircumcision.
B | Without Christ.
C | Aliens from the commonwealth of Israel.
C | Strangers from the covenants of promise.
B | Having no hope.
A | Without God in the world.

The passage which follows goes on to show that now the Gentile has a position which was not possible before the revelation of the mystery, the middle wall has been abolished, a new man has been made, they are no more strangers and foreigners, but are fellow citizens with the saints and of the household of God. This is very different from the position of being "a wild olive branch" grafted in. This is a new order of equality, further explained in Eph. iii. 1-9, specially noting verse 6. Other parts of the epistle place this citizenship in the heavenly places where the commonwealth of Israel never was placed. These two passages (Eph. ii. 11, 12), the only references to the Jew, are negative in character, and forbid any approach to the conclusions put forward as quoted above.

How does the epistle to the Ephesians deal with the law, or the Old Testament Scriptures? Perhaps there is such an overwhelming abundance of quotations that all we have hitherto seen will be put in the shade when we consider this aspect. Let us read through the epistle. Everything is new in the first chapter. Not a single quotation from the Old Testament there. The second chapter likewise is revelation without reference to the Old Testament, until we get to verse 17 where a reference to the ministry of Christ occurs which of necessity goes back in time. In verse 20 the precious fact that the church of the mystery is founded upon the selfsame chief corner stone as lies beneath the purpose of the kingdom—yea of all God's purposes—is not peculiarly Jewish. Chapter iii. contains no quotation, and chapter iii. concludes the purely doctrinal portion. Chapter iv.-vi. contain a few quotations which the reader should turn up and consider as before the Lord.

One thing more. The above quoted speaker says of I Thess. iv. and Phil. iii., "Do they not synchronize and refer to the same thing?" I Thessalonians is full of the hope of the parousia. That is explained in Matt. xxiv. as being after the tribulation. I Thess. iv. is connected with the hope of Israel by the archangel, for the Bible knows but one—namely Michael—and he stands "for the children of thy people (the church of the mystery or Israel?), and then shall be a time of trouble such as never was since there was a nation. . . . and many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake" (Dan. xii.).

Here we read of the great tribulation, and the resurrection of the sleeping dead, just as we do in I Thess. iv. and v. It is a great mistake to say that the Thessalonians had nothing to do with the day of the Lord—the reason why the apostle had no need to write to them about times and seasons was a very obvious one—they knew perfectly; they knew that the day of the Lord will come as a thief. Knowing this they will be unlike the unwatchful and drunken world, it will not overtake them as a thief; it does not say, however, that they would not be overtaken by that day at all. II Thessalonians was written to the selfsame people as I Thessalonians. There they were taught concerning the rise of antichrist, of the coming of the Lord in flaming fire taking vengeance, of deliverance from tribulation. What is there in common between all this and Phil. iii.?

In Phil. iii. our citizenship is said to be IN HEAVEN. The hope of I Thess. iv. was to meet the Lord in the air. This word "meet" surely requires no laboured explanation. Did the brethren who went out to meet Paul in Acts xxviii. 15 stay outside Rome, or did they accompany him on his journey? Did the five wise virgins who heard the cry, "Go ye out to meet him," delay the bridegroom in the journey, or did they accompany him to the wedding feast? The hope of I Thess. iv. is that joyful meeting of the Lord as He descends to this earth. Phil. iii. on the other hand looks to that heavenly manifestation of glory which precedes this descent (Col. iii. 4 "in glory," Titus ii. 17 "of the glory").

The one remaining subject—the question of the judgment seat of Christ—is far too important to be dealt with here; the positive teaching concerning this subject will appear (D.V.) in the exposition of the Prison Epistles, particularly Philippians and II Timothy, now running in The Berean Expositior. We have given the points raised this amount of consideration because we felt that it was an attempt to discredit the teaching of the Word regarding the dispensational position of Acts xxviii.

The more we love and read the Word, the more positive evidence we accumulate to show that Acts xxviii.,and not Pentecost or any other period, is the true dividing line of the dispensations so far as we are concerned, and that there is a marked difference observable, in the most vital manner, between the two sets of Paul's epistles which this period makes, and that the teaching for us, saved from the Gentiles during a period when the channel of earthly blessing is temporarily closed up, is found in the epistles written by the apostle Paul during the period covered by his imprisonment.

One "very significant fact" is that three years after Paul wrote Rom. ix.-xi. he said that he was bound with a chain for "the hope of Israel"; and further, at the same period he performed those signs which "shall follow" the preaching of the gospel as set forth in Mark xvi. These are facts, whatever inferences we may draw from them. Let us test all by the only safe, sure guide—the Word of truth.

We do not in any sense challenge the heartfelt love of the Word of those brethren differing from us in our interpretation, neither are we moved in the least by personal feelings, but we dare not allow such statements as have been examined to pass without bringing them to the touchstone of the Word, and we feel that having weighed them in the balances of the sanctuary they are found wanting, and knowing our own failings and shortcomings we earnestly pray for deliverance from that prejudice which unconciously reads into the Word that which it desires to see, and for that grace which will enable us to study to show ourselves approved unto God, workmen having no cause to be ashamed, because we have rightly divided the Word of truth.

The Bible School at Home #5.
I Thessalonians.

1. What is the hope set before the believer in this epistle?
2. Collect the references to the Lord's coming, and carefully note all that is said regarding the accompaniment of His coming.
3. The word which is translated "coming" is the Greek word parousia.
   Trace the usage of this word in the N.T.
4. What do you learn from the absence of this word relative to the second coming in the epistles of Paul written after Acts 28?
5. What do you learn from the fact that the first occurrences of this word parousia are in Matt.24?
6. In I Thess.4 we read of the "Archangel." What is his name? Is he connected with the people of Israel or the church? Where do we first read of him, and where last? What does this teach regarding the hope of I Thessalonians?
7. In I Thess.4 the apostle is ministering comfort to sorrowing and bereaved saints. If the saints who have fallen asleep are in a disembodied state, consciously enjoying the presence of the Lord, why did the apostle omit to mention it? Did he forgot it? Did he believe it? Does Scripture warrant it?

Berean Expositor Volume 2 & 3

The Doctrine of Christ.
pp. 21-25

"And the high priest stood up in the midst and asked Jesus, saying, 'Answerest Thou nothing? What is it which these witness against Thee?' But He held His peace and answered nothing. Again the high priest asked Him, and said unto Him, 'Art Thou the Christ, the Son of the Blessed?' And Jesus said, 'I am'" (Mark xiv. 60, 61).

Some of our readers may have received during the month of September, 1911, an "Open Letter" addressed to the writer, having reference to the important subject, "The Deity of Christ."

Several reasons prevented us from answering the "Open Letter," one being that in our estimation an Open Letter is a most unfair means of dealing with a fellow worker, and that in many instances it savours of the hand of Sanballat (Neh. vi. 5). Our reply may be summarised in the words of Nehemiah, when he declined a conference, "I am doing a great work, so that I cannot come down, why should the work cease, whilst I leave it, and come down to you?" Or, in his prayer after he had received the Open Letter, "Now therefore O God, strengthen my hands."

We desire no personalities to mar our service, but would seek to answer or refrain, in harmony with the silence or answer as recorded in the above quotation from Mark xiv. We shall not advertise the name of the writer of the Open Letter, but knowing that the question of the Deity of Christ is exercising the minds of so many, and that, moreover, the definitions and creeds of Christendom in their wording often exhibit human folly rather than Divine wisdom, we have felt it right to seek to exhibit the teaching of the Word itself, giving as little argument as possible, so that the reader may see for himself what the Scriptures really teach concerning this tremendous theme. In II John 9 we read:--

> "Whosoever leadeth forward (proagõn) and abideth not in the doctrine of Christ, hath not God! He that abideth in the doctrine of Christ, he hath both the Father and the Son. If there come any unto you and bring not this doctrine, receive him not into your house, neither greet him, for he that biddeth him rejoice hath fellowship with his wicked works."

Some teach that by the words, "the doctrine of Christ," we are to understand all that Christ taught. If this be the meaning, there is not a single believer living who comes up to the standard, none fully abide in the teaching, or even a part of that teaching (for example, the Sermon on the Mount). If this be the meaning, fellowship with any saint is at an end, we should have to excommunicate ourselves. Worse than this, the dreadful words, "hath not God," would be uttered over every believer. The words, "the doctrine of Christ," however, do not mean the teaching which Christ gave, but the doctrine of the Scriptures concerning Christ Himself. This can be seen by turning to I John ii. 22, 23 and iv. 3.

The evil in I John iv. 3 is defined as a denial that "Jesus Christ has come in the flesh," whereas the evil of II John 7 is that "many deceivers are entered into the world, who confess not that Jesus Christ is coming in the flesh. This is a deceiver and an antichrist." The doctrine of Christ, therefore, has reference not to His teaching, but to the teaching of the Scriptures concerning Himself, both in relation to His first and second advent. How solemn the warning of verse 9, "Whoso leadeth forward." Think of the "forward movements" of to-day. The modern "Gospels," the "Humanism," as well as its kindred "Spiritism," every one of them seeking to degrade the Lord Jesus Christ to the level of a mere human teacher and example.

Dispensational truth, as compared with the teaching of the times, may be truthfully called, "a leading forward," but the hall-mark upon the final revelation of God (the revelation which the apostles were not able to bear while our Lord was on earth), is indicated in the words, "He shall glorify Me" (John xvi.). In no part of the Scriptures do we find the glory of Christ so prominent a theme, and so transcendently magnificent in its heavenly majesty, as in the epistles of the mystery, the truth for the present time. Not only does the Epistle of John speak concerning Christ's Person in the 4th chapter, but we read in the 5th chapter:--

> "This is He Who came through water and blood, and it is the Spirit Who beareth witness, because the Spirit is the truth; for three there are that bear witness, the Spirit, and the water and the blood. And these three are with a view to the unity" (I John v. 6-8).

This passage, like the rest of Scripture, has suffered at the hand of believer and unbeliever alike. A mistaken zeal, which sees the "Church" everywhere, robs the Saviour of this three-fold witness, in order to bolster up self-devised systems of Church Fellowship. The Spirit is supposed to represent the "gifts" as in I Cor. xii. The water, to represent Believer's Baptism, and the blood, the Lord's Supper. This is supposed to be the "threefold cord" of Church Unity. There is certainly plenty to do and see, ordinances to be performed, and "gifts" to be hoped for, but these are not the "bond of peace" of the only unity worthy the name (Eph. iv.).

Simon's baptism (Acts viii.), the Lord's table of I Cor. xi. 18-34, the Spirit's gifts of Heb. vi. 4, 5, witness to the divisions of the flesh, rather than "the unity of the Spirit." This passage, however, has nothing to do with the Church—it is essentially the "the doctrine of Christ." In verse 9 we have the Scriptural interpretation of the passage, it is "the witness of God concerning His Son."

John was bearing testimony against the blasphemy of the Gnostics. They taught that upon a man, Jesus, there came the "anointing," the "Christ," at His baptism, but that this "anointing," or "Christ," left Him before His death on the cross, leaving a man, Jesus, to die, thereby denying the Scriptures, which not only emphasise the manhood of the Redeemer, but which also say, "The church of God which He hath purchased with His own blood." We may now understand why John so definitely says that Jesus was the Christ before baptism, and after death, "This is He Who came through water and blood, Jesus the Christ." He was Jesus the Christ before His baptism. A reference to John i. 32-34 will show how vividly this is portrayed in I John v. All the words of verse 34 occur in this epistle, and in the same order. The witness that Jesus was the Christ is in the same manner upheld before, at and after the crucifixion (cf. Matt. xvi. 16; xxvii. 54; John xx. 28, and Rom. i. 4).

The Spirit of truth (Matt. iii. 16), the water of Jordan (Matt. iii. 13; John i. 31, 32), and the blood of the Cross (Acts xx. 28), are the three-fold witness to the Person of Jesus the Christ throughout the whole of that wondrous walk on earth. I John v. 9 declares that this is the witness of God concerning His Son, and verse 10 breaks in with the antichrist's denial of I John iv. by shewing that they who reject this witness "make God a liar." Verses 9 and 11 link the truth concerning the Person and work of Christ with the believers' assurance of eternal life:--

> "The witness of God is this, that He hath borne witness concerning His Son" (verse 9).
> "The witness is this, that God hath given unto us eternal life, and this life is in His Son. He that hath the Son hath life" (verse 11).

Here the apostle gathers up his argument. Chapter i. 1-3 speaks of Christ as "that eternal life." Christ is our life, and to know this is to have assurance. The final words of I John v. clinch the two-fold teaching of the epistle:--

> "We know that the Son of God is come, and hath given us an understanding, that we may know Him that is true, and we are in Him that is true, even in His Son Jesus Christ. This One is the true God and eternal life."

Here we see how the two-fold theme is linked together. He that denies the Son hath not God, and he that hath not the Son hath not life. Let us notice the force of the final words of John's first epistle. This One, Who is Jesus the Christ, Who came in the flesh, this One is "the true God and eternal life."

In John xvi. 13-15 and xvii. 1-5 are words which must be remembered in this consideration. "He shall glorify Me" were the words of the promise. This glory is specially connected with the work of redemption. "I have finished the work which Thou gavest me to do, and now, O Father, glorify Thou Me" (cf. Also Phil. ii. 6-11 and Heb. xii. 2). In John xvii. 3 Christ links eternal life with the knowledge of God the Father as the only true God, while the Holy Spirit in I John v. 20 as definitely links eternal life with the knowledge of the Son as the only true God.

The Open Letter referred to above says:--

> "You have taken the honour, the position, and attributes of my Father—God the Creator—and have given them to His creature and Servant-Son, the man Christ Jesus."

We believe that to the fair minded reader, a comparison of John xvii. 1-5 with I John v. 20 will shew that this charge must also be laid against the apostle John (and the Holy Spirit Who inspired the epistle), for He too gives the title and honour of God the Father to Jesus Christ the Son; both are called "the true God," and a knowledge of the Father and the Son are vitally linked with eternal life. These verses should make all who hesitate to ascribe equal honour to the Son as to the Father consider the validity of their claim to eternal life.

The confusion between the great truth that there is one God, and the revelation of the "Persons," as related to creation and redemption, is to be deplored. We must rid ourselves of the creeds and traditions of men, but we must "hold fast that which is good," and realize that the Father and the Son equally share the attributes of Deity. The title "Son of God" of course has reference to the mediatorial office of Christ, and sometimes it is difficult for us to distinguish the line of demarcation between His true Deity ("the true God") and the voluntarily assumed humanity, "Christ come in the flesh." Nevertheless, it is for us to believe that which is written. "Who by searching can find out God unto perfection?" "God is Spirit," and has revealed Himself to men in a way that fills the Scriptures with wonder. It is a delight to study passages of Scripture wherein all the attributes of Deity ascribed to the Father, to Jehovah, or to the Creator as such, are equally ascribed to the Son of God, and which effectually give the lie to the words of the Open Letter, "His creature and Servant-Son," for while the Lord Jesus was man, born of woman, yet He was, nevertheless, according to Holy Writ, "the true God and eternal life."

The title "Son of God" is used by many to belittle the glory of the Lord Jesus. It is clear from the Scriptures that the Jews understood this title to be a blasphemous claim to Divine attributes. They understood him to claim equality with God (John v. 18); and to make Himself God (John x. 33).

Some may object and say, "the Jews misunderstood Him, and we must not build a doctrine upon such a frail foundation." Did they misunderstand Him? It would have been easy for the Lord to have corrected their mistake. It was indeed imperative that He should do so, not only for Himself and for the glory of His Father, but for the sake of these men, who by their mistaken views (if such they were), were thirsting for His blood.

The Lord did not mitigate in one iota the fulness of His claim. He allowed it to remain in all its repulsiveness to the Jewish mind, and died at last upon the cross, giving no sign that His claim had been misunderstood. The Lord Jesus accepted the Jewish interpretation of the title Son of God, and sealed its acceptance with His blood.

The Doctrine of Christ.
pp. 108-109

"A Scriptural answer is asked for the following question: If Christ had no being before birth, when did He Who was rich become poor for our sakes? When after Bethlehem was He rich, and when did He become poor?" (quoted by Critic-see page 17-from Editor's reply).

> Psalm ii. 8: "Ask of Me, and I will give thee the nations for thine inheritance, and the uttermost parts for thy possession."
> John xvii. 9: "I make not request for the world (inheritance)." Satan makes the offer of the kingdoms of the world, but Jesus would not take them from his hand, but renounced them: the way of redemption was by way of the cross. Christ was the "heir of all things," but he beggared himself of his inheritance! The "world inheritance" was his for the asking, but he would not take it up with death upon it, but he would first of all redeem man from the power of death and the grave, and this he could only do by dying, and in dying he destroyed him that had the power of death.

We have quoted the above from a letter received on the subject of the Deity of Christ. Whilst seeking to respect the convictions of others, we feel that the above answer cannot do anything but harm to the position of those who adopt such teaching.

Psa. ii. 8 is referred to to answer the question quoted at the commencement, but Psa. ii. is quoted by Peter and by Paul with exclusive reference to resurrection. Acts xiii. 30-37 has entirely to do with resurrection and its result, and in verse 33 we read, "He hath raised up Jesus again; as it is also written in the second Psalm, "Thou art My Son, this day have I begotten Thee." It is upon this basis, namely, of resurrection, that the words follow, "ask of Me and I will give Thee," &c.

It is utterly untrue to say that the Lord Jesus could have scripturally "asked" for the inheritance before resurrection, and this being so, we again ask, "When, after Bethlehem, was He rich? and when did He become poor?" We are sorry to have to write in this fashion, but the honour of the Lord must come before our desire for peace, or the consideration of other persons' feelings. We earnestly ask those who favour the position advocated by the one whose reply we have quoted to reconsider such an answer and see whether it really is Scriptural.

The statements made in the reply are in measure true so far as they refer to redemption, but they contain no answer to the question. Born at Bethlehem, brought up at Nazareth, living for thirty years as an obscure mechanic's son, "He became poor," but "He was rich." When?

The Greek Article.
pp. 66-67

The nature of this magazine, and its limited size, precludes the idea of attempting to teach Greek. Many of our readers have, however, commenced this interesting study and so we intend, as occasion offers, to insert a page which, while being of interest to all, will be particularly useful for those commencing N.T. Greek.

The article "the."

Some, through not realizing the accuracy and delicacy of the Greek language, are apt to pass over with scant attention the little word "the." The A.V. on numerous occasions omits the article where it should be inserted, and inserts it where it should be omitted.

"The (one) pinnacle of the temple" becomes "a pinnacle" (as though there were many). Instead of "the teacher of Israel," we read of Nicodemus that he was but "a teacher." "The virgin," namely, the one foretold by Isaiah, is translated in Matt. i. 23, "a virgin," thereby losing all the emphasis of fulfilled prophecy. The unwarranted insertion of the article in John iv. 27, "the woman," instead of "a woman," changes the ground of the disciples' wonder. They knew nothing of the woman's history. Their surprise was that the Lord (a Jew and a man), should thus freely be speaking to any woman.

Many of us have realized the importance of the article or its omission in such expressions, "The Spirit"—the Giver, and "spirit"—His gifts. The following summary may be useful:--

The article.

(1) Definite. The, that, this. "The virgin." "This persuasion" (Gal. v. 8).
(2) Explanative. "The adoption, that is to say, the redemption of our body" (Rom. viii. 23).
(3) It denotes a class or kind. "The poor, the man" (mankind, as we say).
(4) It indicates the subject of a sentence, "The Word was God."
(5) When the article is present it demonstrate, "That (Gk. the) good thing" (II Tim.1:14).

When the article is absent it describes the essence or character.

John i. 14. "The Word (demonstrative—one particular person) was made flesh" (i.e. partook of flesh and its characteristics, sin excepted).

We could not say, "The Word was made A flesh," for that would be absurd, yet many, for their own purposes, translate a similar construction, "The Word was A God," because the absurdity is not so apparent.

The article is continually used before abstract nouns, such as "repentance," "righteousness." The idea is that the abstract word is present before the mind's eye. The article also shows when words are used in apposition. "The church which is the body of Him" (Eph. i. 22, 23). The church and the body are here mutually inclusive.

In the construction of phrases the article is continually employed. There is no word "son," or "things," in the phrases, "The (son) of Zebedee, " or "The (things) of Caesar," "son" and "things" being represented simply by "the" (masculine singular), and "the" (neuter plural).

The Greek Prepositions.
pp. 89-90

> "The prepositions, in their variety and delicacy, are a most important element of the Greek language" (Rev. A. C. Kendrick, D.D.).
> "The usage of the prepositions is a matter of no less importance in the interpretation of the New Testament than in the general study of the Greek language" (Rev. T. S. Green, M.A.).

What is a preposition? A preposition is a word "placed before" a noun, or its equivalent, forming a qualifying or adverbial phrase. What is the underlying idea of the prepositions? Whatever figurative or secondary idea may be conveyed by the usage of the prepositions, the simple, primary, basic idea may be said to be that of (a) rest, or (b) motion. Motion covers the idea of "direction," for direction implies a motion towards or a motion from a given point.

The prepositions arranged under their heading of rest and motion.

3. Motion (direction or motion towards a point).—Into, to, eis; towards, down, kata; towards, pros; upon, epi; near by, alongside, para; under, hupo.
4.
5. Motion (direction or motion from a point).—Out of, ek; from, apo; from under, hupo; down from, kata; from beside, para; through, dia.

It will be observed that some prepositions which occur in No.1 occur again in No.2, or No.3, and the natural question arises, how can one word mean both rest and motion?

If the preposition is followed by the Dative case it usually denotes the primary idea of rest, if followed by the Accusative case it usually means motion towards, and if by the Genitive case the idea of motion from, or out of. We will endeavour to explain the meaning of these cases as we come to them in the usage of the preposition.

Notice the way in which the preposition makes all the difference in the following sentences:--

I am going into the room; I am going out of the room; I am going beside the room; over the room; round the room, &c., &.c.

When we come to examine the teaching of the New Testament we shall find that a thorough grasp of these simple words will be of the utmost importance. We have spoken of the primary or basic idea, having reference to rest or motion. When the subject of writing is placed upon a higher plane (the plane of doctrine for example), the simple idea of "out of," "into," &c., is enlarged and takes a figurative signification.

One example must suffice; peri, meaning "around," comes to mean "concerning." The primary idea is always present, and is beautifully felt in such a passage as, "He was not that light, but was sent to bear witness concerning (peri) that light" (John i. 8). John's witness had for its glorious centre "that light"—Christ. His witness revolved "around" Him, keeping Him ever central. This simple illustration must suffice for the time, but we hope to be able to show in the usage of each preposition the importance of remembering the initial idea of the word as set out in this necessarily dry introductory paper.

The Greek Prepositions.
pp. 104-105

In our last paper we sought to show the primary, radical idea of the prepositions, looking at them as a whole. In this paper we commence dealing with them singly. We shall endeavour "to point out with precision the distinctive primary power of each, from which all its secondary significations emanate as from a common centre; and to trace to this (primary meaning) all the various meanings the preposition may have assumed" (Winer).

Anti.—The primary, local and literal meaning of anti as referring to place is "opposite," "before," "over against." Figuratively and secondarily it means "as the equivalent of," "for," "instead of," "correspondency." So in Matt. v. 38 we read, "an eye for an eye." The idea of exchange or barter, the giving of one thing for another, is clearly seen in Heb. xii. 16, where Esau "for (anti) one morsel of meat sold his birthright." Yet more striking is the usage in Heb. xii. 2, speaking of the Lord Jesus, "Who for (anti) the joy that was set before Him endured the cross." Here the meaning is that the joy of resurrection glory was set over against the shame and death of the cross.

The idea of something equivalent is clearly seen in Rom. xii. 17, "Render no man evil for (anti) evil." Matt. ii. 22 shows the force of the word, "Archelaus did reign. . . . in the room of his father Herod."

The word anti enters into composition with other words forming some important theological and doctrinal terms, e.g.:--

Antitype (antitupon).—I Pet. iii. 21 translates the word, "the like figure." The resurrection of the Lord and the typical ordinance of baptism were antitypical. They were to the Jewish believer what the ark and the flood were to Noah and his family when they "saved themselves from that untoward generation."

The word occurs again in Heb. ix. 24, "for Christ is not entered into the Most Holy Place (figure of speech—plural of majesty) made with hands, which is the antitype of the true, but into heaven itself." Here we learn that the tabernacle which Moses built was but a copy or a type of the real heavenly holiest of all. Incidentally we learn the meaning of the word "true." "True" often means that which is shadowy, unreal, typical, as well as the opposite of that which is false.

Antichrist (antichristos).—This word, rightly understood, throws light on the character of the Man of Sin. He is anti (instead of) Christ before he becomes openly against Christ. The travesty of the resurrection in Rev. xiii. 12 is of the same character. The false christs throughout the age have always endeavoured to substitute themselves and their doctrines for Christ and the truth. Perhaps the most precious usage of anti is found in Matt. xx. 28 and I Tim. ii. 6. "The Son of man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give His life (soul-psuche) a ransom for (anti) many." What a Substitute! Speaking of the man Christ Jesus as the One Mediator, I Tim. ii. 6 says, "Who gave Himself a ransom on behalf of all (antilutron huper pantõn), to be testified in due time." Without entering into a battle of words with those who do not like the term, we cannot refrain from emphasizing the claim which the doctrine of "substitution" has upon the believer, both as regards his own grateful acknowledgment, and its place in the testimony of the gospel of the grace of God.

Let the reader search out the usages of this little word, always bearing in mind the primary idea already noted. There are many other words with which anti is combined, and we would suggest that a carefully tabulated index of these prepositions would form an invaluable help to the fuller understanding of the "words which the Holy Ghost teacheth."

The Greek Prepositions.
pp. 122-124

The reader of this page are reminded that we are not attempting to teach Greek. All that we can hope to do is to point out some of the more obvious things, leaving the deeper study for those who may feel inclined to take up this extremely valuable subject for themselves. Last time we touched upon the preposition anti. Another preposition which will repay careful study is apo.

Apo is followed by what is called the Genitive case, the case which speaks of origin, often represented in English by the insertion of the word "of" or "from." Its Latin equivalent ab, abs forms a part of many English words. The first meaning, implying motion, is from, away from, down from. The second meaning, where motion is not so emphatic, far from, at a distance from.

A meaning yet more remote passes from the primary idea of movement to that of time, and then is represented by from, after or since. Let us see something of its meaning by turning to the writings of the New Testament. Literal removal is plainly seen in Matt. xxviii. 2 and Luke xxiv. 2, "rolled away"; Matt. vii. 23, "depart from Me." In these passages it will be observed that the preposition apo occurs in combination with the verb, as well as being used by itself. This usage lends emphasis to the teaching of Col. ii. 20, where the verb "to die" is not thneskõ, but apothneskõ, and so makes the complete separation from the old order of things the more marked.

It will be remembered that there is an important distinction to be observed between the doctrine of the "peace of God." In Rom. i. 7 we have yet another aspect of peace, namely, "peace from (apo) God." Here apo indicates the origin from which this blessing flows. Peace comes from God, He is its efficient Cause. The familiar word "apostle" is taken straight from the Greek. It means "one sent from another." Christ Himself is spoken of as "the Apostle," the sent One, in Heb. iii. 1, and this claim is emphasized in the Gospel of John. No apostle was ever made by man, his title declared that he had been sent by the Lord Himself. So called "apostolic succession" is fittingly connected with the "imposition of hands."

Turning again to the usage of apo we find the transition from the idea of place to that of time in such an expression as "from a child," that is, "ever since" you were a child (II Tim. iii. 15). This note of time occurs in that important passage, Eph. iii., where the apostle claims the exclusive stewardship of the present dispensation. In verse 9 he refers to that remote period "before the age times," using apo with the meaning of "since." "And to enlighten all (as to) what (is) the dispensation of the mystery, which hath been hidden away (apokruptõ) since the ages (apo tõn aiõniõn) by the God Who created all things." J. N. Darby says, "'from the ages,' but in the sense of 'the period lapsed' not 'hidden from them'." The preposition here tells us that since the ages the mystery had been hidden away by God, and was not made known until revealed to the apostle of the Gentiles. Col. i. 26 is a parallel passage. The hiding away since the ages and since the generations being placed in contrast with the words, “but now made manifest.”

Turning briefly to a few examples of the use of apo in combination, we notice:--

Apekduomai and apekdusis.—“Having stript off the old man” (Col. iii. 9). This “stripping off” is no work of man, it looks back to the sacrifice of Calvary, for the very same word is used in Col. ii. 15, translated “spoiled.” Nor is this all, not only is the glorious truth of the new creation connected with the triumphant putting off of principalities and powers, but Col. ii. 11 declares that in the death of Christ we are circumcised with a circumcision not made with hands “in the stripping off of the body of the flesh in the circumcision of Christ.”

Apokaluptõ and apokalupsis.—This word, which gives us the title of the last book of the Bible, the Apocalypse, indicates the removal of a veil. The early occurrences of apokaluptõ (Matt. x. 26; xi. 25, 27 and xvi. 17) testify to the fact that revelation is not a process of reasoning, study or foresight, but, as the contexts of such passages as I Cor. ii. 10, Gal. i. 16 and Phil. iii. 15 declare, it is entirely the work of God. The first clause of the first recorded prayer of the Lord’s prisoner was for “a spirit of wisdom and unveiling” (Eph. i. 17). The “revelation of the Lord Jesus Christ” was the hope during that period covered by the “Acts” (I Cor. i. 7), and of the dispersion (I Pet. i. 7) “the appearing.” This deferred hope of Israel will take place as indicated and described in the book of the Revelation, “when the Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven in flaming fire, taking vengeance.” The word is never used of the hope of the church in the prison epistles.

Further, unless the book of the Revelation has been sadly mis-named, the orthodox interpretation must give place to something more worthy of the title. No book seems to have been so enveloped in mystery by tradition as this book, which purports to be an “unveiling.”

Aphiemi.—This word means to send away or dismiss, Matt. xiii. 36; to give up the life, Matt. xxvii. 50; to put away, as in divorce, I Cor. vii. 11. How striking is the force of this complete dismissal and divorcement when we remember that this word is translated in the A.V. 47 times by the word “forgive,” e.g., Rom. iv. 7, I John i. 9; ii. 12.

Aphesis.—This related word is rendered in the A.V. by “deliverance,” once, “forgiveness,” six times, “liberty,” once, and “remission,” nine times. Thanks be to God for the complete separation from our sin, its defilement and its curse taught by the little word apo.

The reader should examine such words as apostasia, apoluõ, apokeima, apokathistemi, apostellõ, etc. The epistles particularly should be studied, and the bearing of apo upon doctrine, practice and hope carefully noted.

The Greek Prepositions.
pp. 139-141

Dia.--The primary idea of this preposition, governing the genitive case, is expressed by the word "through," and this idea may be seen in the English words which contain it, e.g., diagonal, diameter, diaphragm, &c. The following passages will suffice to show this local meaning of "going through," viz., Matt. xii. 1; xix. 24; John iv. 4; I Cor. x. 1.

The transition is simple from this idea of motion through to the secondary idea of a channel or medium through which the desired result is attained. Examples abound; we cite only a few: John i. 7; Acts i. 2; xiii. 38; Rom. iii. 24; Eph. ii. 8; Col. i. 20. Something is willed and something is accomplished, and the medium through which the will is carried into effect is expressed by the word dia. Winer observes:--

> "Dia but rarely indicates the causa principalis (I Cor. i. 9), in other words, is but rarely equivalent to hupo or para. Even when it does indicate the causa principalis it does not denote the author as a source of an act as such, but strictly as the individual through whose agency or favour, &c., one has obtained something (without specifying whether it flows from him directly or indirectly).

The mediatorial work of Christ in its many phases constantly calls for this preposition (see Rom. v. 1; Eph. i. 7; Phil. i. 11, &c.). Such passages as I Cor. xv. 21; Mark ii. 27; I Cor. xi. 9 should be studied to catch the bearing of this preposition upon the teaching, remembering that I Cor. xv. 21 must not be translated without due consideration of, say, the same preposition if In I Cor. xi. 9. (Mark ii. 27 and I Cor. xi. 29 have the accusative case - see below). The ek pisteõs and the dia tes pisteõs of Rom. iii. 30 show "the uncircumcised as justified by the direct and unqualified instrumentality of the identical faith which operates in the case of the circumcised."

Matt. i. 22 (A.V.) reads, "that it might be fulfilled which was spoken of the Lord by the prophet." The English reader could not be positive as to whether the prophet spoke or the Lord spoke. The R.V. attends to the meaning of the prepositions more carefully here and reads, "spoken by (hupo) the Lord through (dia) the prophet." This witness to the verbal inspiration of Scripture is found in (R.V.) Matt. ii. 5, 15, 23; iv. 14; viii. 17; xii. 17, &c., in all which places "through" is a better rendering of dia than "by." "With patience" (Rom. viii. 25), if rendered "through patience," would show that patience is the medium whereby faith and hope are enabled to bridge the interval of waiting (see also Heb. xii. 1).

When dia is applied to time the basic idea of motion through is still retained, and can be felt in the word "during." See "during all their life" (Heb. ii. 15); "during forty days" (Acts i. 3); "during the night" (Acts v. 19). Sometimes the sense demands the word "after," but even then the idea of going through the stated time is retained. "After three days" (Matt. xxvi. 61, so Mark ii. 1; Gal. ii. 1).

Dia governing an accusative case indicates primarily the ground of an action, and the aim or end only in a secondary way. Consider Matt. xv. 3; Rev. xii. 11; Rom. iv. 25.

This last passage contains an important truth. The Lord Jesus was not raised again in order to procure justification, but on the ground that the work of redemption was finished on the cross. Hence the rendering, "raised again because of our justification," is preferable.

"For. . . . 's sake" is a frequent rendering. See Matt. x. 22; xxiv. 22; Rom. xv. 30; II Cor. iv. 5; II Tim. ii. 10; I John ii. 12, &c. Dia touto (literally "through this," or "on the ground of this") is translated "therefore."

As examples which will repay careful study, the reader is directed to Rom. iv. 25 (the two cases); John vi. 57; II Tim. ii. 2; I Tim. iv. 14; Rom. iii. 25; iv. 11; xiv. 14; Gal. iv. 13; I Thess. iv. 14; Phil. i. 15. Dia in composition is often emphatic and heightens the original meaning, e.g., katharizõ means to cleanse, diakatharizõ means to thoroughly cleanse, to cleanse right through.

The reader should consider diagnõsis, diatheke (in conjunction with diatithemi, and diathemenos), diameno, &c.

Ephesians.

"All Scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable" (II Tim. iii. 16).

"Study to shew thyself approved unto God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the Word of truth" (II Tim. ii. 15).

The above quotations supply us with the very important fact that while all Scripture is for us, all Scripture is not necessarily about us, and that in order to obtain the truth for any particular period, the dispensational dealings of God for the time must be taken into consideration, in other words, Scripture must be rightly divided or apportioned.

There are some who seek to make an argument against this truth out of the fact that so few realize its importance to-day. They use this as an argument against the endeavour to apportion the Scriptures. We must not forget that the prime cause of the confusion everywhere manifest is found in the fact that, even before the apostle Paul died, those who had heard the word forsook him and his message; a Judaistic and philosophic tendency overcame all else; men left this apostle of all spiritual blessings in heavenly places, and became satisfied with ordinances and the externals of a decadent and undispensational religion.

The Scriptural boundary of this dispensation of the mystery is found at Acts xxviii. 25-28, and we now seek grace to examine those epistles, given by inspiration of God and profitable, which are not only written for our learning, but are also addressed to us, and written about us.

The epistles written by Paul after the setting aside of Israel are Ephesians, Philippians, Colossians, I and II Timothy, Titus, Hebrews and Philemon. The epistle to the Hebrews is primarily addressed to the Jewish believers as a word of exhortation and comfort, seeking to lead them, by the contemplation of the present glory of Christ at the right hand of God, outside the camp, if God permit, to all the grace of God revealed for those who believe during this present interval. Hebrews teaches nothing about the "mystery" itself, it supplies the necessary information which a Jewish believer would require to enable him to step out in faith, and attain to the heavenly* calling, which then became the one hope of the Jewish remnant. Philemon is an epistle from which we may learn much, and although it was addressed to an individual concerning a runaway slave, it conveys many precious lessons for the child of God to-day. The epistles which are particularly of importance to us are the following :--

NOTE *: This must be distinguished from the calling of the present time—see succeeding articles.

	A | Eph.	The One Body; in the heavenlies; apostles, &c., given; their special work. The dispensation of the mystery. Paul specially appointed.	"The perfecting (or re-adjusting) of the saints."
Teaching having special reference to the members of the One Body.	B | Phil.	No mention of the One Body, the Head, Or the fulness. The saints with the bishops and deacons. Adorn the gospel; have the mind of Christ. Heavenly citizenship and hope, "Discern the things that differ."	"Unto a work of administration."
	C | Col.	Christ the Head of the Body, the fulness, and the riches of the mystery. No bishops or deacons. Warnings against foes. Charged to hold the Head.	"Unto a building up of the Body of Christ."
	D | Philemon.	Personal application of the truth.
Teaching having special regard to individual servants with respects to their work of administration while the new teaching was being announced.	A | I Tim.	"Abide at Ephesus." Timothy's special instructions in view of the dispensational change. Bishops and deacons appointed; their special work. The mystery connected with proper worship. Paul specially appointed.	"Till we all come to the unity of the faith--i.e. the full knowledge of the Son of God."
	B | Titus.	Left in Crete to set in order the things lacking. Bishops appointed to maintain the truth against Judaistic opposition. "Adorn the doctrine." The present hope.	"Unto a perfect Man."
	C | II Tim.	No bishops or deacon now. The truth of the mystery forsaken. "Rightly divide." "Opposers of the truth."	"Unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ."

These epistles are too full for any outline to do more than suggest their content and view point. It will be seen that the first three have relation to the great doctrinal bases of the dispensation of the mystery, while the second three have regard to the history of the > "re-adjustment of the saints and the work of administration, the building up of the body of Christ, until believers arrived at the unity of the faith, the knowledge of the Son of God, the perfect Man, the measure of the stature of the fulness of the Christ."

The 2nd epistle to Timothy supplies us with the sad fact that Paul was allowed to see in his closing days the precious truth committed to him forsaken and forgotten, and gives us the last word for our guidance until "that blessed hope" is realized. The heavenly realities remain untouched and unmoved, blessed be God, but the earthly exhibition of these things has all but vanished. There is no church in a local sense on earth, the only way in which believers to-day can exhibit in any measure the blessings of the present dispensation is for them to > "walk worthy of the calling wherewith they have been called, with all lowliness and meekness, with long suffering, forbearing one another in love, endeavouring to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace."

It is impossible to understand the "unity of the Spirit" until we know, in some degree, the teaching of the first three chapters of Ephesians which precede it. We will now seek to lay before the reader, therefore, some of the precious things which God has made known in this epistle to the Ephesians.

The first thing to notice is that the epistle is divided into two great sections, chapters i.-iii. being doctrinal, and chapters iv.-vi. being practical. This is not only the order of the epistle, it is the divine order in the gospel. Practice is to flow from doctrine. Good works are to adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour. The teaching of the mystery must be preceded by the gospel as preached by Paul, which he describe as > "the preaching of Jesus Christ, in harmony with the revelation of the mystery" (Rom. xvi. 25).

The great fundamentals of the epistle to the Romans are reiterated and enforced in these later epistles. One expression may be written across the doctrinal section, and that is, "the riches of His grace." Everywhere is seen grace abounding, and the great goal towards which the whole is directed is "glory." Grace as our evangel, and glory as our hope, with mercy and peace to follow us all the days of our life, and love, full, deep, and real as our everlasting portion.

The first two verses of the epistle are introductory in character, the doctrinal section actually commencing at verse 3. We will briefly consider these opening verses, and clear the way for deeper study in our next issue. Following the Greek Text, as used by the Revisers, we read the first two verses as follows:--

> "Paul, apostle of Christ Jesus through the will of God, to the saints who are in Ephesus, and faithful in Christ Jesus, grace to you, and peace, from God our father, and Lord Jesus Christ."

The two names with which the first inspired epistle of the present dispensation commences are Paul the apostle, and Christ Jesus his Lord. Here in the epistle to the Ephesians we shall read "the testimony of our Lord Jesus Christ, and of Paul His prisoner" (II Tim. i. 8). May we never be ashamed of this blessed word.

It is interesting to note in what circumstances the apostle, who was originally known as Saul of Tarsus, is first called Paul. The passage which records the change of name is Acts xiii. We quote from "Dispensational Truth":--

> "The opening and closing sections of Paul's ministry, as recorded in the Acts, are very suggestive. In the opening chapter (xiii.) the Jew is smitten with blindness, and the Gentile believes. Moreover, the Gentile's name is Paulus, and from this moment onwards the apostle to the Gentiles is known by that name too."

There is perfect harmony between the record of the opening and closing scenes of Paul's ministry during the Acts, and this tends to emphasize the peculiar character of his commission, e.g.:--

A | a | xiii. 11. Judicial blindness foreshadowed. \ Antioch.
b | xiii. 12. A typical Gentiles (Paulus) blessed. } Not connected
c | xiii. 14. Paul's independent ministry. / with the twelve.
B | xv.-xxi. Paul's ministry in connection with Jerusalem and the twelve.
A | a | xxviii. 25-27. Judicial blindness fulfilled. \ Rome.
b | xxviii. 28. The Gentiles blessed. } Not connected
c | xxviii. 30, 31. Paul's independent ministry. / with the twelve.

The disposition of the subject helps us to see that the ministry of Paul from Acts xv.-xxi. was parenthetical to his real commission. The independent ministry, unassociated with Jerusalem and the twelve, foreshadowed in Acts xiii., is entered on its fulness in the writing of the epistle under consideration. Let it suffice for us to realize that an apostle is one sent from another. He is a legate, a representative. We do not magnify the earthen vessel, but with the Scriptures we "magnify his office." What Moses, the mediator, was to Israel during the dispensation of law, so Paul is to the present dispensation of grace. Both were servants, yet both had authority and power by virtue of the stewardship entrusted to them.

There is another item worthy of notice. The companion epistles, Philippians and Colossians, open with the names of Paul and Timothy. The epistle to the Ephesians stands alone, it is associated with no other instrument than Paul.

The reader will note the change from the A.V. It is not "Jesus Christ," but "Christ Jesus." The change is important. The former title points to the man Jesus, Who is the Messiah, whilst the latter looks to the glory, where Christ the Messiah is, and realizes that the glorified One is Jesus.

The reader will be interested to know that the epistle is marked with the same marvellous numeric phenomena that has been brought to light recently through the instrumentality of Mr. Ivan Panin. We are not in a position to publish any discoveries in this direction, but one thing has been established, the words "in Ephesus," over which such a deal of scholastic effort has been expended, must be retained as part of the sacred text.

Since the publication of Mills' edition of the Greek New Testament, a great many have adopted his opinion that the epistle to the Ephesians was not written to the church of that name. Some said it was addressed to the church of the Laodiceans, whilst others said that a space was left to be filled in—making the epistle a circular letter. Nearly all the ancient MSS. And versions, including the Syriac, Vulgate, Persian and Arabic, agree in including the words "in Ephesus" in the text. We will not take up precious time over this, however, but shall rest assured that the church mentioned in Acts xx. is the one to which, in the first place, this wondrous epistle was sent for their further instruction. The reader may profitably compare Acts xx. 17-38 with the teaching of the epistle.

Returning to Ephesians i. we consider the salutation. The inspired salutation is one which familiarity has in some degree robbed of its preciousness—"Grace." Who can fathom free unmerited favour? Favour shown to the vile, the worthless, the rebel? Yet so it is. Here in this epistle we shall read of the "riches of His grace," yea, the "exceeding riches of His grace," love unfathomable, mercy from everlasting to everlasting, and then peace. Peace for those who were "children of wrath"! Peace made by the blood of the cross of Christ! Peace, the unifying bond of the present dispensation. Grace was the salutation of the Greek; peace the "Shalom" of the Hebrews, and here we find them brought together, the purchase of a Saviour's blood, standing at the threshold of the epistle to the outcast of the nations, to follow, like "goodness and mercy," all the days of our life, and to be the ground of acceptance and blessed enjoyment when time shall be no more.

Space prevents us from going further into the teaching of these verses of introduction. Oh for largeness of heart to receive the things freely given by God! In our next article we hope to take up the character of our blessings as taught in Eph. i. 3.

Studies in the Epistles of the Mystery.
Ephesians as a whole.
pp. 92-95

In the first article of this series we endeavoured to bring before the reader the seven epistles which include the four called "The Prison Epistles," and to exhibit in some measure their general scope and relationship. Before we proceed to consider the teaching of Ephesians in detail, we must first of all see the general disposition of its subject matter. It will be found that the doctrinal teaching of the first half is echoed by the practical teaching of the second in such a way that it leaves no doubt as to how we are to seek to "walk worthy of the calling wherewith we have been called."

This expression "walk worthy," which comes as the opening word of the practical exhortation, is most fitting, for the word axiõs, translated "worthy," has reference to the beam of a balance, and emphasizes the fact already mentioned, that every doctrine has its corresponding practice. It is sadly possible for a very loud profession of faith to be overturned by wrong practice and walk. Note II Tim. iii. 5, "having a form of godliness, but denying the power thereof," and cf. verse 10, "but thou hast fully known my doctrine manner of life."

I Tim. v. 8 shows how actions speak louder than words, "If any provide not for his own, and specially for those of his own house, he hath denied the faith, and is worse than an infidel." This denial of the faith is to be traced back to I Tim. iv. 10, where we read that "God is the Saviour of all men, specially of those who believe." The word specially in both passages is the same. In I Tim. iv. 12, 13 Timothy is exhorted to be an example in his deeds before being told to give attention to doctrine. So it is with I Tim. iv. 16; vi. 1; and Titus i. 16.

It is our aim to make the spiritual blessings in the heavenlies spiritual realities on the earth by faith, and as a means to this end we direct attention to the Structure of Ephesians as a whole.

A | a | i. 1, 2. Grace and peace to saints and faithful from God our Father and from the Lord Jesus Christ.

d | vi. 19, 20. Saints' prayer for Paul. "may be given"; "make known."
B | vi. 21, 22. Ephesians hear of Paul's affair; result--"comfort."
A | a | vi. 23. Peace with love and faith to the brethren from God the Father and the Lord Jesus Christ.
b | vi. 24. Benediction on all who love the Lord Jesus Christ in incorruption.

The harmony of this epistle is evident upon the surface. The spiritual blessings A | b have but one practical answer according to the corresponding member A | b, namely, "love unto the Lord Jesus Christ in incorruption." All the blessings enumerated in chapter i. 3-14, many of them unknown to the pages of Scripture before, are focussed to one point in the practical issue—sincere love to the Lord. How simple, yet how sublime! Love to all saints in C | c is balanced by prayer for all saints in C | c, a lesson the argument of which needs no more enforcing than its statement. Paul prayed for the saints at Philippi either because he had them in his heart, or they had him in theirs (see various readings of Phil. i. 7). Circumscribed prayer indicates sectarian narrowness and straitened affections.

The might and power exhibited in the resurrection of Christ, and the subjection of all principality and power beneath His feet in D yields a blessed practical word of encouragement in D, for in the "power of His might" (same word as Eph. i. 19) we are enabled to "stand" against the "principalities and powers" already vanquished by our glorious Head. Salvation becomes an helmet, righteousness a breastplate, and faith a shield. How this exhibits the futility of the attempt to meet our spiritual foes with the arm of flesh! Nothing but resurrection power can overcome in this great conflict. The practical outworking of the gospel of grace is emphasised in the corresponding members E and E. death in sin is characterised by "fulfilling the lusts of the flesh." Life in Christ is at God's right hand.

In the practical section, in contrast to this "walk according to the age of this world," we are enjoined to "walk in love." The lusts of the flesh briefly touched upon in chapter v. 3-5. Just as in Eph. ii. we have two walks and their connection with the old and new creation, so in Eph. iv. 17-25 we have the two walks in connection with the old man "which is corrupt," and the new man "which is created in righteousness and holiness of truth." The "afore-prepared good works" of Eph. ii. 10 are echoed by the "working that which is good" of iv. 28. The temple "fitly framed together" of Eph.ii. 19-22 is answered by the practical exhibition of this blessed unity of the One Body "fitly joined together" (same word as in Eph. ii. 21).

The temple is builded together by the Spirit; the practical manifestation down here, after the initial work of the fourfold ministry of iv. 11, builds up itself by love. The foundation laid by the apostles and prophets in Eph. ii. is Jesus Christ Himself, for other foundation can no man lay than this, and these preached not themselves, but Jesus Christ the Lord. This corresponds to the goal of their ministry as set forth in chapter iv.—"the knowledge of the Son of God." In perfect harmony with the divine plan of this epistle, the apostle in the doctrinal section calls himself "the prisoner of Jesus Christ" (iii. 1), but in the practical section (iv. 1) he calls himself "the prisoner in the Lord."

In the member marked G | f we have the revelation of the mystery, its wonderful teaching concerning the union of Christ and the church during the present dispensation, and the central words of the threefold unity of iii. 6, "the same body." This mystery is to be given a practical exemplification, and this is explained to us in member G | f where we are told to endeavour to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace. This is described as a sevenfold unity, commencing with the term "One Body," and having as its glorious centre "One Lord."

The central place in the epistle is not given to the subject of the mystery, nor the unity of the Spirit, but to that prayer which revolves around the love of Christ which passeth knowledge. Here we reach the summit. From this conception of "breadth and length and depth and height," and with this satisfying "fulness," we may contemplate both the glorious doctrine stretching away on the one hand to its opening words of grace and peace, and on the other the practical teaching with its manifestations of unity, its walk in love, and its conflict with spiritual foes, until it too ends with peace and grace. We have need of the exhortation given in Heb. vi., "Let us go on unto perfection." Vast treasures await us, unclaimed possessions are ahead of us, blessings yet unappropriated are contained in these epistles of the mystery. It shall be ours, the Lord being our Helper, to seek to unfold something more of the blessings "exceeding great and precious" which are ours "in Christ."

Studies in the Epistles of the Mystery.
Blessing according to Purpose (Eph. i. 3-14).
pp. 109-113

In our last article we considered the structure of this epistle as a whole. Turning now to the first chapter we find that the epistle proper commences at the third verse, and opens with the words "Blessed be God." Not our blessings but our gratitude marks the threshold of this dispensation. We have nothing to ask for, but everything to praise for, as all things are ours in Christ:--

> "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, Who hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings in the heavenlies in Christ, according as He hath chosen us in Him before the overthrow of the world" (Eph. i. 3, 4).

Before we examine this treasure in detail it will help us if we notice the divine arrangement of the subject matter. Verses 3 to 14 constitute a complete passage, which has a twofold arrangement, (a) to emphasize that our blessings are according to purpose, and (b) that all is the work of our triune God unto the praise of His glory.

Blessing according to Purpose (Eph. i. 3-14).

A1 | 3. Blessing. Spiritual and in the heavenlies. Blessings of the mystery.
B1 | 4. Purpose. "According as He chose us."
A2 | 5. Blessing. Predestination unto sonship. Sonship.
B2 | 5-8. Purpose. "According to good pleasure of His will."
A3 | 9-. Blessing. "Making known the secret of His will" Revelation of the mystery.
B3 | -9,10. Purpose. "According to His good pleasure."
A4 | 11-. Blessing. Predestination unto inheritance. Inheritance.
B4 | Purpose. "According to the purposes. . . . own will."

As we contemplate this wonderful passage can we not sing with all our hearts:--

"How firm a foundation ye saints of the Lord, is laid for your faith in His excellent Word."

Four lines of blessing interlinked with four statements of immutable grace, irreversible will, unfaltering counsel, and unalterable purpose. Notice, also, how the emphasis upon this purpose increases, rather than diminishes as we go on.

Verse 4. "According as He chose us."
Verse 5. "According to good pleasure of His will."
Verse 9. "According to His good pleasure."
Verse 11. "According to the purposes of Him Who worketh all things according to the counsel of His own will."

What a lesson is here for the believer! Jacob and his mother "believed God" with respect to the truth of the promise regarding the younger son, but they seemed to doubt the ability of God to carry it out. Hence it is that we have that despicable fraud practised upon the old man Isaac. God was not bound to make good that which Jacob stole by deceit. How sadly must the words "plenty of corn and wine" (Gen. xxvii. 28) have echoed in his memory when he sent his sons down to Egypt to buy corn! No! Isaac did not bless Jacob then "by faith." Isaac did bless Jacob later concerning things to come, and the coveted blessing was freely given in God's own time and way. And Isaac called Jacob and blessed him:--

(1) "EL SHADDAI (Gen. xvii. 1) bless thee, and
(2) make thee fruitful, and
(3) multiply thee,
(4) that thou mayest be a multitude of people, and
(5) give the blessing of Abraham to thee, and
(6) to thy seed with thee, that
(7) thou mayest inherit the land wherein thou art a stranger, which God gave unto Abraham" (Gen. xxviii. 3, 4).

This "blessing of Abraham" is that which God promised, and which God confirmed to Jacob, and will ultimately fulfil in literality in the future. So with regard to our blessings. No amount of scheming, planning or effort can procure them, ratify them or make them more complete. They are ours in Christ, by grace, fully, freely and for ever, or they are not ours at all. May we be found rejoicing in this almighty God of unfaltering purpose, and, like Abraham, may we be "fully persuaded that what God has promised He is able to perform" (Rom. iv. 21).

Before passing on to consider another important aspect of truth as contained in these same verses (3-14), we would further illustrate the important bearing of the will of God in this epistle by showing the arrangement of the occurrences of the word "will." The word occurs seven times as follows:--

A1. Apostleship (i. 1).
A2. Doctrine (i. 5, 9, 11).
A3. Practice (ii. 3, v. 17, vi. 6).

Sections A2 and A3 form a complete structure as follows:--

A2. Doctrine. | a | i. 5. Good pleasure of His will – Predestination to sonship.
b | i. 9. The mystery of His will – Future dispensation.
a | i. 11. Counsel of His will – Predestination to inheritance.
A3. Practice. | a | ii. 3. Doing the will of the flesh – Children of wrath – once.
b | v. 17. The will of the Lord – Rule for present walk.
a | vi. 6. Doing the will of God – Servants of Christ – now.

The relation of these passages is full of suggestive teaching; we leave it without comment, trusting that our reader will be worthy of the title of "Bereans." Let us now consider the second outline of verses 3-14. It will be observed upon reading these verses that the words, "To the praise of His glory," or a somewhat similar phrase, occur at the close of the three divisions to which we are calling attention. We set forth the whole passage as follows:--

Ephesians i. 3-14.

A1 | 3-6-. The blessings of the Father.
B1 | -6. To the praise of the glory of His grace.
A2 | 7-12-. The blessings of the Son.
B2 | -12. To the praise of His glory
A3 | 13,14-. The blessings of the Spirit.
B3 | -14. Unto the praise of His glory.

Just as we have found the emphasis to be upon the almighty and changeless purpose of God, so the emphasis here is the goal towards which that purpose moves, "To the prasie of His glory." All spiritual blessings in the heavenlies (holiness and blamelessness before Him, predestination to sonship, and acceptance in the Beloved) are the blessings which are peculiarly connected with "the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ." They have a relation to that period known as before "the overthrow of the world," and are destined in the ages to come to be to the praise of the glory of His grace, as Eph. ii. 7 declares, "That in ages to come He might show the exceeding riches of His grace in His kindness towards us in Christ Jesus.

Another very important truth which claims attention is the constant fact that the blessings of the Father are only ours as "in Christ." The spiritual blessings are in the heavenlies, but if they were not also "in Christ" they would be unattainable, for how could we reach them apart from being raised together and seated together in Christ? We were chosen before the overthrow of the world, but that could only be possible "in Christ," for we existed not. We have been predestinated unto sonship, but only "by Jesus Christ." We have been made accepted, but only "in the Beloved." The emphasis is still the same as we consider the blessings which are particularly connected with the Lord Jesus Christ. Redemption is through His blood, forgiveness is according to the riches of His grace. The dispensation of the fulness of times is only glorious inasmuch as all things are gathered together "in Christ," "in Whom" we have obtained an inheritance.

As we appreciate the teaching of the Prison Epistles we shall find that the glory of Christ becomes more and more the transcendent theme. A text which could well be written across these epistles is that found in Acts xix. 17, "The name of the Lord Jesus was magnified." The words uttered by John the Baptist, "He must increase," receive added fulness as read in the light of these messages to the Gentiles. May we, viewing the blessings which are ours set forth in these epistles, ever remember with practical application that these blessings should redound to the praise of the glory of Father, Son, and Spirit. In our next paper we hope to exhibit more in detail some of the blessings which are peculiarly ours "in Christ."

Studies in the Epistles of the Mystery.
The blessings of the Father (Eph. i. 3).
pp. 125-127

We have seen in our studies of the opening verses of this epistle that the blessings which are for us who believe come from the Father (i. 3-6), the Son (i. 7-12), and the Spirit (i. 13, 14). Let us now consider the One Who blesses and the blessings He gives.

"Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ."—Notice the opening words of this epistle. It is not so much our blessings that are to occupy our minds, but it is the overwhelming sense of the grace of God welling up in our hearts that here finds utterance—"Blessed be God!" No petition rises to the throne of grace. No confession, no vows of reform, no statements of failure, but thanks, praise, and worship, full and free, ascend unto the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ. "Blessed be God;" He has blessed us with all spiritual blessings, therefore we have need to ask for nothing, but to praise for everything.

Blessed.—The word is eulogetos, and occurs only once in the epistles of Paul written after Acts xxviii. The same may be said of the related words in the same verse.

Blessed us with blessings.—These words are never again used by Paul in his epistles to the Gentiles. Glorious in their unique isolation, standing at the threshold of this dispensation, are these related all-comprehensive words—"Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, Who hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings." Let us remember this witness to the special character of our blessings, and the special character of our note of praise to the Lord.

The word eulogeõ means to "speak well of." God has spoken well of such as we are. In Christ He has graced us and accepted us; surely we should "speak well" of Him. No murmuring word should escape our tongue, no reflection should ever cast upon His gracious purposes, no intrusion of man's distortions should ever sully the clear and glorious light of His grace and glory.

The opening words of blessing to the "dispersion" through the instrumentality of the apostle to the circumcision (I Pet. i. 3) are worthy of comparison here. We place them side by side in order that their points of contacts and divergence may be clearly seen:--

The Church of the Mystery. Paul.	The Remnant of Israel. Peter.
"Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, Who hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings in the heavenlies (en tois epouraniois) in Christ, according as He hath chosen us in Him before the overthrow of the world" (Eph. i.).	"Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, which according to His abundant mercy hath begotten us again unto a living hope through the resurrection of Jesus Christ from among dead ones, unto an inheritance incorruptible, and undefiled, and that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven (en ouraniois) for you" (I Pet. i.).

When we come to examine the words, "the heavenlies," of Ephesians, we shall see the distinction between that sphere and the heavens of I Pet. i. Before passing on let us notice the way in which this epistle uses the title, "Father." The occurrences are eight in number, the number of resurrection, and the order of their occurrence forms an interesting structure.

"The Father."
(Eight occurrences – Resurrection).

A | i. 2. Grace and peace from God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ.
B | i. 3. Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ.
C | i. 17. The God of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of glory.
D | ii. 18. Access by one Spirit unto the Father.
D | iii. 14. I bow my knees unto the Father.
C | iv. 6. One God and Father of all.
B | v. 20. Giving thanks unto God and the Father, in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ.
A | vi. 23. Love with faith from God the Father and the Lord Jesus Christ.

It will be observed that the central members have reference to access and prayer, which is one of the outstanding ideas in the revelation of the title "Father." Do we appreciate the fulness of this divine revelation? Think what is implied by the term "father" among men. What a world of self-denying care, patience, forbearance, labour, love, planning and providing is enshrined in that name. The Scriptural conception of a father is somewhat different from that which seems to be accepted to-day. In the vast majority of cases the training of the children falls upon the mother, the father, during the child's early years, being someone he sees during the week-end, and who will be told if the child is naughty. Modern business life and civilisation have robbed us of more than it has given.

In Eph. vi. 4 the "bringing up" of the children devolves upon the father. The same is true in Heb. xii. So in Psa. ciii. 13, "Like as a father pitieth his children, so the Lord pitieth them that fear Him." Let us ever remember the magnitude of this title of our God, and let us be fully persuaded that He will always act up to the highest ideal of Fatherhood that we can ever frame. What a difference the full recognition of this would make to prayer. Instead of the paraphernalia of a ritualistic approach, or the trite and rehearsed statements of orthodox utterance, we should go to the Lord as a child to its father, without fear, except filial fear, and without doubt, being fully persuaded that He will hear, and give the very best possible answer. Our worship, too, and our service generally would be equally affected by a real conscious recognition of this wonderful title of our God.

Let us consider the next statement, "of our Lord Jesus Christ." In verse 2 we read of God our Father. God can only be our Father by virtue of redemption. For our sakes "the Word became flesh and tabernacled among us," and they who beheld Him wrote, "and we beheld His glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth" (John i. 14). Fatherhood implies the act of begetting, even as motherhood does that of giving birth.

The title of God as the Father of the Lord Jesus Christ is directly connected with that miraculous act when "The Word became flesh" and took upon Himself the form of a servant. Through Him we who believe are given the authority to become sons of God (John i. 12), and consequently we read in Eph. i. 2, 3 of this dual relationship as quoted above.

The blessings wherewith He has blessed us are wonderful. It shall be our privilege and joy in our next paper to consider them as set forth in this epistle. Meanwhile, let us not forget that which we have already seen, and in heart and voice may we constantly and unitedly say, "Blessed be God. . . . Who hath blessed us."

The Parables.

The word, its meaning and dispensational setting.

pp. 26-34

As the student of Scripture grows in grace and knowledge of the truth, things which once seemed trivial appear of great importance; passages which once he thought he "knew all about" are approached with deepening humility, to be reread and learned afresh. Among our earliest recollections, either as scholars in Sunday Schools or as members of Churches, will be those passages of Scripture known as "The Parables." The time-worn definition, "An earthly story with a heavenly meaning," is doubtless familiar to us all. Do we not begin to realize, however, that these parables contain teaching which our teachers never saw, and that the dispensational key, which has turned the lock of so many difficulties and opened doors into such treasuries, may be profitably applied to these "dark sayings"?

The first thing to do is to be sure of the meaning of the word. The word "parable" has been taken over into the English tongue from the Greek word parabole. Para means "near" or "beside," and bole is from ballõ, "I cast" or "throw." Literally it signifies something "cast beside" another, and as applied to discourse it means a method of teaching which demands the use of similitude or comparison.

All the parables of Scripture are weighty and wise sayings. This may be gathered from the words of the proverb, "The legs of a lame man are not equal, so is a parable in the mouth of fools" (Prov. xxvi. 7). The Companion Bible gives the meaning, "The clothes of a lame man being lifted up expose his lameness, so a fool exposes his folly in expounding a parable" (see also Prov. xxvi. 9). An American writer has given a very helpful translation of Proverbs. Chapter i. 2-6 reads thus:--

> "To know wisdom and admonition; to put a distinct meaning into discriminated speeches; to accept clear sighted admonition is righteousness and judgment and right behavior.
> In order to give subtlety to the simple; to the child knowledge and thorough thought. The wise man will hear and increasingly acquire, and a man already become discerning will gain in capability to guide.
>
> For putting a distinct meaning into a proverb or an enigma; into the words of the wise and their intricate sayings:
> The fear of the Lord is the main knowledge, a wisdom and a discipline that fools despise."

It is in this frame of mind that we approach these "dark sayings," in the fear of God to learn their "secret."

In Matt. xiii. 35 the Lord quotes from Psa.lxxviii. 2 in relation to His speaking in parables, and therefore we may expect to find some help in that Psalm to guide us to the right understanding of the purpose of a parable. The heading of the Psalm is "Maschil of Asaph." The Hebrew word Maschil is from the word Sakal, which means, "to look at," "to scrutinize," and the term Maschil means, "an understanding arising from a deep consideration" (Neh. viii. 8). The title of the Psalm prepares us for deep instruction:--

> "Give ear, O my people, to My law,
> Incline your ear to the words of My mouth.
> I will open My mouth in a parable,
> I will utter dark sayings of old."

The remaining portion of the Psalm is a rehearsal of the history of Israel from Moses to David, showing the inner reasons of their failures. Take for example verse 9 and 10:--

> "The children of Ephraim, armed, carrying bows, > turned back in the day of battle."

Why?

> "They kept not the covenant of God, > and refused to walk in His law."

From this we may infer that a parable urges us to consider deeply the ways of God with His people, and to look for the hidden causes and workings which are veiled from the eyes of the uninstructed.

That a parable has some connection with a secret, a reference to Matt. xiii. will prove. There for the first time in the New Testament do we read the word "mystery" or "secret," and there for the first time occurs the word "parable." Further, the Lord Jesus translates the words, "I will utter dark sayings of old," by the words, "I will utter things which have been kept secret since the overthrow (katabole) of the world" (Matt. xiii. 35).

The first parable of the Bible is one which concerns the people of Israel in relation to their separate calling as a distinct nation and peculiar people:-- > "And he took up his parable and said, 'Balak king of Moab hath brought me from Aram, out of the mountains of the East, saying, Come, curse me Jacob, and, come, defy Israel. How shall I curse whom God hath not cursed? And how shall I defy whom the Lord hath not defied?'" (Num. xxiii. 7; so also xxiii. 18; xxiv. 3, 15).

In Heb. ix. 9 and xi. 19 we find the word translated, "a figure." A parable and a proverb are much alike. The parable of Matt. xv. 13-15 might be termed a proverb. Indeed the word translated "proverb" in Luke iv. 23 is really "parable." The words, "Physician, heal thyself," are called in the original a "parable." That a "proverb" carried the same hidden teaching as did the "parable and dark sayings" can be seen by referring to John xvi. 25 and 29:--

> "These things have I spoken unto you in proverbs, the hour cometh when I shall no more speak unto you in proverbs, but I will shew you plainly of the Father."

In the Old Testament we have "type," in the Gospels we have "parable," and in the Epistles we have "doctrine," as the more prominent features. The parables lead us to contemplate the hidden causes of the failure of Israel in relation to the kingdom, and look forward to the time when all will be put right.

The first occurrence of a word very often decides its fundamental meaning. The first occurrence of the word parable in the New Testament is Matt. xiii. 3. It follows that chapter wherein culminated the rejection of the Messiah by the people in the land. He had been heralded as their Messiah and King. He had vindicated His claims by the fulfilment of numerous prophecies, both with regard to His Person and His works, and in chapter xii. 6, 41, and 42, although greater than the temple, greater than the prophet Jonah, and greater than king Solomon, He yet is "despised and rejected":--

> "The same day went Jesus out of the house, and sat by the sea side. . . . and He spake many things unto them in parables. . . . and the disciples came, and said unto Him, Why speakest thou in parables? He answered and said unto them, because it is given unto you to know the mysteries of the kingdom of the heavens; therefore speak I unto them in parables, because they seeing see not; and hearing they hear not neither do they understand. And in them is fulfilled the prophecy of Isaiah which saith, By hearing ye shall hear and shall not understand; and seeing ye shall see and shall not perceive: for this people's heart is waxed gross, and their ears are dull of hearing, and their eyes they have closed; lest any time they should see with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and understand with their heart, and should be converted, and I should heal them. But blessed are your eyes, for they see, and your ears, for they hear. For verily I say unto you, that many prophets and righteous men have desired to see those things which ye see, and have not seen them; and to hear those things which ye hear, and have not heard them" (Matt. xiii. 1-17).

Such is the setting of the first occurrence of the word parable in the New Testament. The parables were used when Israel manifested that the prophecy of Isa. vi. 10 was fulfilled in them. The parables were not used to make the teaching plainer, but to veil the teaching from the majority. The parables relate to the secrets of the kingdom. They teach things hitherto "kept secret since the overthrow of the world" (Matt. xiii. 35). Prophets desired to see and hear these things, as Matt. xiii. 17 and I Pet. i. 10-12 tell us:--

> "Searching what, or what manner of time the Spirit of Christ which was in them did signify, when it testified beforehand the sufferings of Christ, and the glories that should follow."

Here, as in the majority of Old Testament prophecies, no break is made between the sufferings and the glories. No interval is allowed between "the acceptable year of the Lord, and the day of vengeance of our God" (Isa. lxi. 2, cf. Luke iv. 19). The rejection of God's king was only partly seen, the abeyance of the kingdom was a secret. Thus we may place the two passages together:--

> "I will open my mouth in parables. I will utter things which have been kept secret since the overthrow of the world" (Matt. xiii. 35).
> "Why speakest Thou in parables? Because it is given unto you to know the secrets of the kingdom of the heavens, but to them it is not given" (Matt. xiii. 10, 11).

Everything leads us to expect that just as in Psa. lxxviii. we shall find in these parables some of the inner workings of God's counsels relative to His purposes in Israel, and that to introduce the doctrinal teaching of the gospel of the grace of God, or the dispensational teaching of the mystery which is not a subject of revelation until over 30 years later

(Eph. iii. 1-10), will be to confound things which differ, and signally to fail rightly to divide the Word of truth.

The parables are particularly dispensational in character. Their object is not to provide a moral lesson or a text for a gospel address. How many have gone astray by reason of this mischievous practice. The parable of the Prodigal Son serves those who have no desire for the retention of the atonement with a "proof" text for the universal Fatherhood of God, and of the reception by Him of all who come, irrespective of the one way of acceptance—the sacrifice of Christ. The parable of the Unforgiving Servant is made to teach, in direct opposition to the doctrine of the epistles, that sins once forgiven may be re-imputed, or that a sinner once saved by grace can fall away again.

Let us remember the Scriptural settings of these parables, the reasons which drew them from the Lord Jesus, the dispensation in which they were uttered, and the people and kingdom about which they speak; we shall then have no need to be ashamed of our testimony.

Thus far we have sought to clear the way for the study of these parables. We shall next endeavour to present to the reader the arrangement of the parables of Matthew xiii. and to enter into the teaching of these parables of the secrets of the kingdom of the heavens.

The Parables of Matthew xiii.
pp. 30-34

To understand any passage or verse in the Bible we must take note of the context, otherwise, being ignorant of much that God has written for our guidance, we shall offer "a vision out of our own heart" as the interpretation. In the first place, Matt. xiii. comes in that section which is entirely taken up with the "kingdom" before the Lord had uttered one word of the foundations of the gospel as we know it, namely, His death and resurrection. This fact should deter us from too hastily assuming that in Matt. xiii. we have an elaborate discourse concerning "the gospel."

In order to show that these parables come (1) in the kingdom section proper, and (2) before the Lord's revelation of His death and resurrection, we shall have to give the arrangement of subjects, which is as follows:--

A | Matt. i. 1 - iii. 12. Preparation.
B | Matt. iii. 16, 17. Voice from heaven—"My beloved Son."
C | Matt. xvi. 16. Peter's confession—"Thou art the Christ, the Son of the Living God."
B | Matt. xvii. 5. Voice out of the cloud—"My beloved Son."
C | Matt. xxvii. 54. Centurion's confession—"Truly this was the Son of God.
A | Matt. xxviii. Conclusion.

The "time" divisions of Matthew are two-fold, agreeing with the two-fold message from heaven, and confession on earth:--

(1). "From that time Jesus began to preach and to say, 'Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand" (iv. 17).

(2). From that time forth began Jesus to shew unto His disciples how that He must go unto Jerusalem, and suffer many things of the elders and chief priests and scribes, and be killed, and be raised again the third day" (xvi. 21).

We can now see clearly that the parables of Matt. xiii. comes within the first section of Matthew's Gospel, which has for its subject exclusively "the kingdom."

In examining the book still further, we find that it reveals three main discourses, and a due appreciation of their place and teaching is of utmost importance. They are as follows:--

A	Matt.v.-vii.	On a mountain. (Past).	Precept.	The kingdom explained.
B	Matt.xiii.	Out of the house. (Past & Future).	Parable.	The kingdom rejected.
A	Matt.xxiv.-xxv.	On a mountain. (Future).	Prophecy.	The kingdom set up.

In the Sermon on the Mount the Lord Jesus, as King, sat upon the mountain, and gave His laws and describes the character of the subjects of His kingdom. In the prophetic chapters of Matt. xxiv. and xxv. the Lord Jesus looks forward to the day when His kingdom shall be set up with power and great glory. The interval between the two "mountain" discourses is filled in by the rejection of the Lord by Israel, and the parables of the secrets of the kingdom. We may expect, therefore, to find something to teach us the character and course of the "kingdom of the heavens" during the period of the rejection of the King. One thing we must be quite clear about, and that is, we shall not find depicted a history of events which were to take place after the kingdom of the heavens became in abeyance.

These parables trace the progress of the gospel of the kingdom along its course through the period while the Lord was on the earth, and during the Acts of the Apostles. The present interval of the dispensation of the mystery must of necessity be omitted, and the history of the kingdom be resumed again when God once more takes up His ancient people, for the interpretation of some of these parables takes us to the "end of the age."

Before we examine the parables in detail, we must examine them together. Some of our readers may be surprised to find us speaking of the eight parables of Matt. xiii. It has become almost sacred to prophetic students to speak of the seven parables of Matt. xiii., so that we shall have to set out the complete arrangement in order to demonstrate the fact that the Lord gave eight parabolic or figurative utterances in connection with the "mysteries (or secrets) of the kingdom."

Structures of Matthew xiii.

A | 1-9. The SOWER. | The sowing of the seed into four kinds of ground. They (Israel) did not understand. — The first four parables spoken outside the house to great multitudes.

B | 24-30. The TARES. | Good and bad together. Separated at the harvest (the end of the age); the bad are cast into a furnace of fire, there shall be wailing and gnashing of teeth.

C | 31, 32. The MUSTARD TREE. | One Tree.

D | 33. The LEAVEN. | Hid in three measures of meal.

D | 44. The TREASURE. | Hid in a field.

C | 45, 46. GOODLY PEARLS. | One pearl.

B | 47-50. The DRAG NET. | Good and bad together. Separated at the end of the age; the bad are cast into a furnace of fire, there shall be wailing and gnashing of teeth.

They (disciples) did understand. — The first four parables spoken inside the house to the disciples.

A | 51, 52. The SCRIBE. | The treasure opened to those in the house.

The harmony that exists between the component parts of this structure is quite evident to all. If we can see the disposition of any passage of Scripture, we are in possession of a help to its interpretation. Sometimes a word may have more than one meaning, and the balance in favour of either rendering may be fairly equal. If we can find its place in the structure, we shall often, by so doing, find its meaning also.

Look, at the central pair of parables. The Leaven "hidden" in three measures of meal finds its corresponding member in the Treasure "hidden" in the field. The parable of the Tares finds its complement in the parable of Drag Net. The parable of the Sower is balanced by that of the Scribe, and the Mustard Seed by the Pearl.

We now have considered the parables in their meaning and signification, and have also looked at the contextual setting of these parables of the secrets of the kingdom, so far as their place in the Gospel of Matthew is concerned. We must now examine the immediate cause of their utterance, and we shall then be ready to consider each parable in detail.

Let us go back as far as the commencement of chapter xi. John the Baptist had said, "He that come after me is mightier than I." He had seen the heavens open, he had heard the voice of God saying, "This is My beloved Son, in Whom I am well pleased." But in course of time John, for his faithfulness, was cast into prison, there to suffer not only agony of body, but of mind. Had he made a mistake? Why was he not liberated if this one was the Messiah? Why was the kingdom not set up? So John sent two of his disciples, who said, "Art thou He that should come, or do we look for another?" For answer the Lord replied, "Go and show John again those things which ye do see and hear; the blind receive their sight, and the lame walk, the lepers are cleansed, and the deaf hear, the dead are raised up, and the poor have the gospel preached unto them, and blessed is he, whosoever shall not be offended in Me."

If the reader will turn to Isa. xxix. 18, 19; xxxv. 5, 6; and xlii. 1-7 he will see how this answer would tend to confirm the languishing forerunner. Everything was being done by the Saviour according to the Word and will of God, but unbelief was bringing this witness of the kingdom to a close, for a little further on, in Matt. xi. 20, He began to "upbraid the cities wherein most of His mighty works were done, because they repented not." It is evident that if the mighty works were rejected, the gospel or good news that the kingdom of the heavens had drawn nigh would be rejected also, and the cry, "Repent and believe," would go unheeded.

The Lord Jesus, however, knew that this opposition was to be overruled to the accomplishment of God's ultimate purpose, and with the words, "Even so, Father, for so it seemed good in Thy sight," He awaited the end. It soon came, for in Matt. xii. we reach a climax. There the Lord Jesus is seen "greater than the Temple" (verse 6), "greater than the prophet Jonah" (verse 41), "greater than the king Solomon" (verse 42), and in all these capacities He is rejected. The reason for this rejection is given in verses 43-45.

The captivity of Babylon had cured the Jews of idolatry, but they were like a room "empty, swept and garnished," inhabited by a spirit more evil than that which bound their idolatrous "fathers"; the last state is worse than the first, for rejecting Christ they reached the climax sin. This leads on to Matt. xiii. with its secrets or mysteries. Up to this point nothing had been secret, but now the Saviour reveals to the hearing ear and seeing eye that the rejection of the King and His message was foreknown, that the efforts of the apostles themselves would meet a similar fate, and that not until the end, when the Lord returns to take the kingdom and deliver Israel, will the sowing of the seed of the kingdom yield its bounteous harvest.

The Sower.

We now approach the consideration of this initial parable. Initial, not only because it is the first in order of utterance, but because its interpretation supplies a model for the interpretation of all parables, "Know ye not this parables? and how then will ye know all parables?" (Mark iv. 13).

John tells us that although he has recorded eight "signs" to support the particular purpose of his Gospel (John xx. 31), yet the number actually wrought by the Lord far exceeded this, so much so that "if they should be written every one, I suppose that even the world itself could not contain the books that should be written" (John xxi. 25). What is true concerning the Lord's works is also true concerning His words; each Gospel narrative gives a divinely inspired selection of His wonderful teaching. If this is so, what importance must be placed upon that miracle, parable, or discourse which is repeated twice or even thrice! The parable of the Sower occurs in the three Synoptic Gospels (Matt. xiii. 1-9; Mark iv. 1-9; Luke viii. 4-8). In each record we read of the four sowings, or four kinds of ground. It will be instructive to consider the various ways in which this parable has been recorded.

MATTHEW 13:4-9.	MARK 4:4-9.	LUKE 8:5-8.
"Some fell by the wayside, and the fowls came and devoured them up."	"Some fell by the wayside, and the fowls of the air came and devoured it up."	"Some fell by the wayside, and it was trodden down, and the fowls of the air devoured it."
"Some fell upon stony places where they had not much earth."	"Some fell upon stony ground where it had not much earth."	"Some fell upon a rock."
"Forthwith they sprung up, because they had no depthness of earth, and when the sun was up they were scorched; and because they had no root, they withered away."	"Immediately it sprung up, because it had no depth of earth; but when the sun was up, it was scorched; and because it had no root, it withered away."	"As soon as it was sprung up, it withered away, because it lacked moisture."
"Some fell among thorns; and the thorns sprung up, and choked them."	"Some fell among thorns, and the thorns grew up, and choked it, and it yielded no fruit."	"Some fell among thorns; and the thorns sprang up with it, and choked it."
"Other fell into good ground, and brought forth fruit, some an hundred-fold, some sixty-fold, some thirty-fold. Who hath ears to hear, let him hear."	"Other fell on good ground, and did yield fruit that sprung up and increased; and brought forth, some thirty, and some sixty, and some an hundred. And He said unto them, He that hath ears to hear, let him hear."	"Other fell on good ground, and sprang up, and bare fruit an hundred fold. And when He had said these things, He cried, He that hath ears to hear, let him hear."

One of the differences between Matthew's account and that of Mark is that Matthew speaks always in the plural, "they," "them," whereas Mark speaks of the seed in the singular, "it." Luke adds the words, "and it was trodden down," in the first sowing, and omits the reference to "no depth of earth" and the effect of the sun, telling us that it withered because it lacked moisture. The addition of the words, "with it," in Luke's account of the thorns is also suggestive.

In the interpretation of the parable, the following differences are noteworthy. We print them in tabular form to save space.

John xx. 31	But these are written, that ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God; and that believing ye might have life through his name.

MATTHEW 13:10-23.	MARK 4:10-20.	LUKE 8:9-15.
"The mysteries of the kingdom of heaven."	"The mystery of the kingdom of God."	"The mystery of the kingdom of God."
"The word of the kingdom."	"The sower soweth the word."	"The seed is the Word of God."
"The wicked one."	"Satan."	"The devil."
"This is he which received seed by the wayside."	"These are they by the wayside."	"Those by the wayside."
"He that received seed into stony places, the same is he that heareth the word, and soon with joy receiveth it; yet hath he not root in himself, but dureth for a while; for when tribulation or persecution ariseth because of the word, by and by he is offended."	Similar to Matthew.	"They on the rock are they which, when they hear, receive the word with joy; and these have no root, which for a while believe, and in time of temptation fall away."
"He also that receiveth the seed among the thorns. . . . the care of this world, and the deceitfulness of riches, choke the word, and he becometh unfruitful."	Similar to Matthew but add. --"the lust of other things entering in."	"And that which fell among thorns. . . . choked with cares, riches, and pleasures of this life, and bring no fruit to perfection."
"but he that received the seed into the good ground is he that heareth the word, and understandeth it; which also beareth fruit, and bringeth forth, some an hundred-fold, some sixty and some thirty."	"And these are they which are sown on good ground, such as hear the word and receive it."	"But that on the good ground are they, which in an honest and good heart, having heard the word, keep it, and bring forth fruit with patience."

Such is the divine interpretation. We are not called upon to speculate, but to believe. Those to whom these words were first uttered knew the Scriptures of the Old Testament sufficiently well to follow the figurative allusions far more clearly and with greater suggestiveness than we are able to. Moreover, they had no epistle of church doctrine in their minds. We have, and because we will not discern between the things which differ, we introduce confusion into God's Word by our traditional ideas. Let us keep church and kingdom separate; let us not read into Matt. xiii. that which was not revealed until years after, then we shall be able to understand something of the "mysteries of the kingdom of the heavens." The kingdom of God is wider in its scope than the kingdom of the heavens. The latter expression has reference to that Millennial kingdom, when the kingdoms of this world shall be ruled by heaven's King, when Dan. ii. 44 shall be fulfilled; but the term, "the kingdom of God," though wider than the kingdom of heaven, is not used in the Gospels to refer to the church of the present dispensation, for at that time the present dispensation was a secret hidden by God, whereas the secrets of Matt. xiii. are to some extent explained.

There is need for us to repeat that which we gave in our last article, for the exclusively Jewish and kingdom setting of Matt. xiii. is evident to every candid reader (cf. Matt. x. 5, 6; and Matt. xv. 24, which are on either side of Matt. xiii.).

The parable tells us of the secret course of the purpose relative to the kingdom. It depicts the apparent failure of the early ministry, but shows in the fourth ground its fruitful consummation. All who are pictured here under the imagery of the various sowings are those who hear and receive the word of God, particularly the word of God relative to the kingdom (Matt. xiii. 19; Luke viii. 11). This cannot refer to the heathen nations, at least not until we reach the fourth ground; for during the ministry of Christ the word of the kingdom was confined to the limits of the Land of Promise:--

> "Go not into the way of the Gentiles, and into any city of the Samaritans enter ye not; but go rather to the lost sheep of the house of Israel. And as ye go, preach, saying, The kingdom of heaven is at hand" (Matt. x. 5-7).

Perhaps we ought to note some things which the Lord does not say. He does not say, "The sower is the Son of man"; it is merely "a sower," in the parable; and in the interpretation nothing is said of the sower other than the fact that "the sower soweth the word." We have two expositions before us, both of which emphasize that the "sower was the Son of man."

Again, it does not say, "the field is the world." Luke tells us that the various sowings, in various kinds of ground, had reference to the hearts of those who heard the word. When we come to examine the parable of the Wheat and Tares, then we are distinctly told that the sower is the Son of man, and that the field is the world, but if we introduce these into the parable of the Sower, we spoil the intended teaching.

The "seed of the kingdom of heaven" was sown by John the Baptist, the Lord Jesus Christ, and the apostles during the Acts period; this ministry, as we know, was humanly speaking a failure, for although they proclaimed the near approach of the kingdom of heaven, that kingdom is now in abeyance. The kingdom purposes, however, cannot fail, hence prophecy clearly indicates a further preaching and sowing of this same gospel seed, which will be fruitful as depicted in the fourth ground. This is one of the "secrets" or "mysteries" of the kingdom of the heavens. Following hard upon the rejection of the Lord Himself (Matt. xii.) comes the revelation of the whole course of kingdom progress. The Lord, with wonderful fitness, depicts the conditions which were predominant in relation to the four periods of kingdom ministry.

The first ministry mentioned in the New Testament is that of John the Baptist. He preached the good news of the kingdom, and baptism unto remission of sins. Each ministry, however, had something of the four kinds of ground represented among its hearers, but the special characteristic of John's sowing was that it fell upon hearts which, like the wayside, had become hardened with continual treading and tradition, and consequently very few believed his message. Those who heard him "understood not," and the Lord tells us that the Wicked One "caught away that which was sown in their hearts."

Before we proceed further it will be necessary to call attention to an interpretation of this parable which has a great deal of truth in it, but which may be pressed too far. There are some who tell us that this parable of the Sower does not refer so much to the word sown in the heart of the hearer, but to the environment in which the hearer (represented by the seed) is placed. We must not summarily dismiss this from our notice, inasmuch as there is certain amount of truth in the statement; but, like so many things, it is not all true. If we use the R.V. instead of the A.V. we shall see a little more clearly that the seed sown not only represents the word of the kingdom, but the children of the kingdom as well.

In Matt. xiii. 18-23 we have the Lord's own interpretation of the parable. Note the words in italics in the following extracts. "This is he that was sown by the wayside." "And he that was sown upon rocky places, this is he that heareth the word." "And he that was sown among thorns, this is he, &c." "And he that was sown upon the good ground, this is he that heareth the word." The same intermingling is seen in Mark iv. and Luke viii. Nevertheless, both passages definitely tell us that the "seed" is the "word." The primary meaning of the seed is certainly "the word," for the Lord Himself says so. The inclusion of the hearer within the meaning is rather by implication than by definite statement. It appears, then, that to fully understand the parable we must allow its double application. When the application is to those who reject the word, then the seed sown is the word of the kingdom, and the ground represent the characteristics of the hearers. When the application is to those who are really children of the kingdom, then their identity is lost in that of the seed sown—they are linked in type to the truth.

Then, the various grounds speak not of the state of heart of the hearers, but of their environments during the various phases of the history of events. A characteristic example is found in the cases of Peter and Judas. Satan had dealings with each (Matt. xvi. 22, 23; Luke xxii. 3, 31). Peter denied the Lord with oaths and curses; Judas betrayed Him. Peter went out and wept bitterly; Judas went and hanged himself. Peter was a child of the kingdom, but for a while the thorns overcame him. Judas never was a child of the kingdom (John vi. 70, 71), he was one of the thorns, or, as in the next parable, one of the tares, and his heart is represented by the thorny ground itself.

It is evident that the great majority of the Pharisees, and indeed of the multitude that came forth to be baptized of him (Luke iii. 7), did not understand the import of his message and baptism, for looking upon them he cried, "O generation of vipers, who hath warned you to flee from the wrath to come?" Their trust was in "Abraham their father," but John bade them "bring forth fruit meet for repentance." These multitudes and Pharisees, who would have submitted to the rite of baptism as some new ceremonial which pleased their ritualistic self-righteousness, were repulsed by the stern rebuke of John, and satan, taking advantage of the moment, snatched the seed away, and occupied their heart the more for his own fell purposes, for later we find the same people, who boasted of being "children of Abraham," called rather the "children of the Wicked One" by the Lord in John viii. 44.

There were stony ground hearers among the followers of John; of them it is written, "Ye sent unto John, and he bare witness unto the truth. . . . He was a burning and a shining lamp; and ye were willing for a season to rejoice in his light." These stony ground hearers heard the word, "and anon with joy received it," yet they had no root, persecution for the sake of the word discovered their shallowness, and soon they were offended. It was for such that the Lord uttered the words, "Blessed is he, whosoever shall not be offended in Me" (Matt. xi. 6).

The prominent characteristic of John's ministry was, "to prepare the way of the Lord, and make His paths straight." It was hard work, with little apparent result. Two of his own followers proved to be hearers of the good ground variety, for on the second day of his proclamation, "Behold, the Lamb of God," they followed the Lord, one of them being Andrew, Simon Peter's brother. The first sowing of the parable of the Sower is peculiarly descriptive of the first preacher of the kingdom-—John the Baptist.

Following immediately upon John's ministry was that of the Lord Jesus Christ. The Lord commenced his ministry with the same words as John used, "Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand" (Matt. iv. 17 with iii. 2). In association with Himself the Lord sent forth the Twelve (Matt. x.), and the Seventy (Luke x.). This ministry, looked at it from the external standpoint, was not much more successful than that of John the Baptist.

The characteristics of the "stony ground," the second sowing hearers, are seen everywhere. The stony ground hearers were shallow. The wayside hearers rejected the testimony of God against them, but the stony ground hearers received the word with joy—for a while! In Matt. iv. 17-25 we have the preaching and its effect. "His fame went throughout all Syria"; "and there followed Him great multitudes." Mark xii. 37 supplies us with a statement which coincides with the character of the stony ground hearers. "The common people heard Him gladly." "He that received seed into the stony places, the same is he that heareth the word, and anon with joy receiveth it, yet. . . . by and by he is offended."

In John vi. we have a record of defection. After the Lord had uttered that marvellous word concerning Himself as the living bread, and how He came to give His life for the life of the world, we read, "many therefore of His disciples, when they heard this, said, This is a hard saying, who can hear it"? "From that time many of His disciples went back, and walked no more with Him." In Luke iv. 14-29 we have another illustration of this self-same spirit. After the Lord's discourse in the Synagogue, we read, "And all bare Him witness, and wondered at the gracious words which proceeded out of His mouth. And they said, Is not this Joseph's son?" By the time He had finished His message to them, however, we read, "And all they in the Synagogue, when they heard these things, were filled with wrath, and rose up, and thrust Him out of the city, and led Him unto the brow of the hill whereon their city was built, that they might cast Him down headlong."

Herod himself exhibited much the same character. "And when Herod saw Jesus, he was exceeding glad, for he was desirous to see Him for a long season, because he had heard many things of Him, and he hoped to have seen some miracle done by Him. . . . Then Herod with his men of war set Him at nought" (Luke xxiii. 8-11). Matt. xxi. 1-19 furnishes us with another example of the shallowness of the hearers of the word during the ministry of the Lord. "A very great multitude spread their garments in the way. . . . and the multitudes that went before, and that followed, cried, saying, Hosanna to the Son of David; Blessed is He that cometh in the name of the Lord; Hosanna in the highest." Within a few days, in the very same city, the multitude, urged by the chief priests and elders, cried out, "Let Him be crucified!"; "His blood be on us, and on our children" (Matt. xxvii. 19-25). Hence it is that in immediate relation to the ride into Jerusalem, and the shout of Hosannah, we read, "And when He saw a fig tree in the way, He came to it, and found nothing thereon, but leaves only" (Matt. xxi. 19). It is interesting to note that the words "withered away" of Matt. xxi. 19; xiii. 6; Mark iv. 6; and Luke viii. 6 are the same. Such, to a large extent, was the character of the heart of those who heard the gospel of the kingdom from the lips of the Son of God. Thus, while John's ministry is represented by the wayside hearers, the Lord's ministry is likened unto the stony ground hearers.

In immediate succession to the ministry of the Lord Jesus was the ministry of the Twelve in the Acts. This ministry is likened to the sowing of seed among thorns. Peter uses the key word of the gospel of the kingdom, "Repent," and the kingdom ordinance, "Be baptized" (Acts ii. 38). The preaching of the word at Pentecost and after produced a deeper effect than had been evidenced during the "Gospels" period. There was not so much of that spirit which characterized the wayside hearers, for the good seed found a place in many hearts, neither was the stony ground hearer alone represented. The trouble is seen among those who had "tasted of the heavenly gift," and who had been "partakers of the holy spirit," and had "tasted the good word of God and the powers of the world to come." Heb. vi. is a divine commentary upon the cause of failure during the Acts. The figure of the "thorny ground" is actually repeated in Heb. vi. 8, "But that which beareth thorns and briars is rejected." Luke tells us that the stony ground hearers "brought no fruit unto perfection." We find the echo of this in Heb. vi., "Leaving. . . . let us go unto perfection."

The epistle to the Hebrews was addressed to Jews who had received in some measure the seed of the kingdom, and had accepted the Lord Jesus as Messiah, but who were still "zealous for the law" (Acts xxi. 20). The Jews failed to see the perfection that was to be found alone in Christ. "Cares, riches and pleasures of this life, the deceitfulness of riches and the lust of other things" are referred to in Hebrews in such passages as xi. 25, 26, "Choosing rather to suffer affliction with the people of God, than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season, esteeming the reproach of Christ greater riches than the treasures in Egypt." "Ye took joyfully the spoiling of your goods (x. 34). "Be content with such things as ye have, for He hath said, I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee" (xiii. 5).

Ananias and Sapphira (Acts v.), and Simon who believed and was baptized (Acts viii. 13), are examples of the growth of the thorns which eventually choked the good seed. Ananias and Sapphira particularly illustrate the "thorny ground" hearers. They had believed the word, they had evidently been baptized and were recognized by the apostles as members of the fellowship of believers, yet their sad history shows us that Matt. xiii. 22 and Heb. vi. are commentaries upon the causes of failure during the Pentecostal dispensation. They brought no fruit to perfection. The command, "Cut it down" – long delayed – at length was fulfilled; the olive tree of Abrahamic blessing and Jewish privilege was cut down, to remain in that condition until the end of the age. Then, after the fulness of the Gentiles be come in, "all Israel shall be saved," ungodliness shall be turned away from Jacob by the Deliverer sent to them—the Lord Jesus Christ (Rom. xi. 25, 26).

This is represented by the "good ground." "This gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the habitable world (oikoumene—a word relating to the kingdom) (Heb. ii. 5), for a witness unto all the nations, and then shall the end come" (Matt. xxiv. 14). This final witness leads on to the fulfilment of the commission of Matt. xxviii. 19, 20:--

> "Go ye therefore, and make all nations disciples, baptizing them into the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost; teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you, and lo, I am with you always, even unto the consummation of the age."

The final sowing will be fruitful. "Israel shall all be righteous" (Isa. lx. 21), "all Israel shall be saved" (Rom. ix. 26), "they shall revive as the corn, and grow as the vine" (Hosea xiv. 7). After the tribulation of the last days, the Lord "will send those that escape unto the nations. . . . and they shall declare My glory among the Gentiles" (Isa. lxvi. 19). This is the heart of the New Covenant.

From the days of old (Isa. vi. 10), during the earthly ministry of the Lord (Matt. xiii. 14), and throughout the Acts of the Apostles to its close (Acts xxviii. 27), the heart of Israel had been hard, and had "waxed gross," the "lust of other things" had choked the word; but when the time comes for the final sowing, the Lord will send Elijah, who shall accomplish that which was foreshadowed by John the Baptist; he will make ready a people for the Lord.

"The upright in heart" of the Psalms, and "the pure in heart" of the Sermon on the Mount, are those indicated in the final sowing of the seed of the kingdom. The promise to Israel is, "I will give them one heart, and I will put a new spirit within you; and I will take away the stony heart out of their flesh, and will give them an heart of flesh" (Ezek. xi. 19). This is the blessing of the New Covenant, sealed by the blood of Christ by which alone the kingdom can be made secure (Jer. xxxi. 31-40). In II Cor. iii. 3-6 we have the "heart of flesh" contrasted with the "heart of stone" in relation to the New Covenant.

The days shall come when Israel, now cast off, shall bring forth a hundred-fold. An handful of corn in the top of the mountains shall shake like Lebanon. It was towards this glorious consummation that the Lord Jesus looked as He reviewed the "mysteries of the kingdom of the heavens." He knew that His rejection would but subserve the mighty purpose of God. In due time He came to die, and in due time He will come to reign.

The parable of the Sower may supply us with many valuable lessons, but to discover the primary teaching is the object of this series. Let us bring the four sowings together, viz.:--

John the Baptist.	Wayside hearers.	"They seeing, see not, neither do they understand."
The Lord Jesus, the Twelve, and the Seventy.	Stony ground hearers	"Nothing but leaves. . . . it withered away."
Peter and the Twelve.	Thorny ground hearers.	"No fruit to perfection, "Riches, pleasures, the lust of other things" (Heb. vi.).
The final witness. (Matt. xxiv. 14).	Good ground hearers. (the heart of the New Covenant).	"The honest and good heart." "Some hundredfold."

Parallel with this teaching of the Sower is the witness of the same truth in the parables of the Fig Tree (Luke xiii.) and the Great Supper (Luke xiv.), which we must consider after Matt. xiii. is finished. The primary teaching of these parables is not merely to supply a moral or spiritual lesson, but to depict the secret course of the mystery of the kingdom on through its apparent defeat to its glorious close.

The parables of Matt. xiii. which follow supply further details, but have no new subject; all are connected with the rejection of Christ by Israel, and relate to the "mystery of the kingdom of the heavens." We hope next time to consider the parable of the Wheat and the Tares.

The Wheat and the Darnel.
pp. 68-73

In our last article dealing with the Sower, we considered the course of the several ministries, or "sowings," of the word of the kingdom. We saw how the various grounds depicted not only the state of the human heart universally, but the characteristic of the hearers at different points of the history of the kingdom proclamation. To meet the possible difficulty that might arise as to the reason why the gospel of the kingdom should be so long refused is the purpose of the next parable. The key words are "an enemy hath done this." The scene is not changed, but the symbols are. We have a wheat field before the mind, as in the previous parable, but now we are definitely told that "the field is the world." Further, the sower in this instance is "the Son of man." Let us look at the parable before we consider its interpretation.

First consider its structure:--

The Wheat and Darnel.

a	A man sowed good seed.	Statement.
b	Enemy sowed darnel.	Enemy.
c	The blade sprung up.	Growth.
d	Then appeared the darnel.	Fruit.
a	Didst thou not sow good seed?	Question.
b	An enemy hath done this.	Enemy.
c	Shall we gather the darnel?	Growth.
d	Let both grow till harvest.	Fruit.

The very first thing which we must notice is that whereas the parable of the Sower occurs in the three Synoptic Gospels, the parable of the Tares is found only in Matthew. This enables us to see that this particular parable has exclusive reference to the kingdom of the heavens, and must not be applied to outside subjects.

Before going further we will set before the reader a rather more literal rendering than that of the A.V. or the R.V.:--

> "Another parable placed He before them, saying, The kingdom of the heavens hath become like a man sowing good seed in his field; but while men were sleeping, his enemy came and sowed darnel through the midst of the wheat, and went away. But when the wheat sprang up and brought forth fruit, then appeared the darnel also. Then the servants of the householder came near and said to him, Sir, was it not good seed thou didst sow in thy field, whence then hath it darnel? But he said unto them, A man that is an enemy did this. But the servants said unto him. Wilt thou therefore that we go and gather them together? But he said, No: lest at anytime while gathering the darnel ye uproot along with it the wheat. Let both grow together until the harvest, and in the harvest season I will say unto the harvesters, gather together first the darnel, and bind it into bundles with a view to the burning it up; but the wheat bring together into my barn."

Our first consideration must be to settle, if possible, the true meaning of the servants, the wheat, and the tares. Christ's explanation, in answer to the disciples' question concerning the parable, was as follows:--

Parable.	Interpretation.
"He that sows the good seed.	is the Son of man.
And the field.	is the world.
And the good seed.	are the sons of the kingdom.
And the darnel.	are the sons of the evil one.
And the enemy that sowed them.	is the devil.
And the harvest.	is the consummation (sunteleia) of the age.
And the harvesters.	are the angels."

> "Just as, therefore, the darnel is gathered together, and by fire is burned, so will it be in the consummation of the ages: The Son of man shall send forth His angels, and they will gather together out of His kingdom all cause of offence (skandalon means more than a stumbling stone—literally it is 'the catch of a trap'), and those that are doers of lawlessness, and will cast them into the furnace of fire; there shall be wailing and gnashing of teeth. Then the righteous will shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father. He that hath ears to hear, let him hear."

This is the inspired explanation of the parable. It does not deal with the gospel, but with the hearers of the gospel. In the parable of the Sower the seed typifies "the word of the kingdom," while the ground represents the hearts of the various hearers. In the parable of the Tares the whole case is altered. The seed no longer represents the word, but the sons either of the kingdom, or of the wicked one. The ground no longer represents the hearts of the hearers, but the world. Commentaries are worse than valueless, they are positively harmful if they ignore the interpretation given by the Word of God itself.

The parable tells us that the prime cause of the defection and apostasy of Israel is to be seen in the attitude and work of satan. Throughout the course of the ages satan has sought to overthrow the purpose of God in Christ. The primeval promise of Gen. iii. 14, 15 introduces the reader to the conflict of the ages. "I will put enmity between thee and the woman, between thy seed and her seed. It shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise his heel." The purpose of the ages centres in Christ (Eph. iii. 11, R.V. margin). The antagonism of satan is directed against this purpose. Every step of the way this opposition is seen.

Adam and Eve are placed in the garden. Dominion is given them. They are tempted and fall, and if the penalty had fallen upon them, the coming of the seed must have been frustrated. Cain slays Abel, and God gives Seth "instead," thereby showing his brother that "Cain, who was of that wicked one, and slew his brother because he was righteous," was the tool in the hand of satan who sought to prevent the coming of the Seed. The irruption of the "sons of God," and the corruption of the seed of man, ending in the flood (Gen. vi.), was another attempt to prevent the coming of the Seed. As yet satan did not know through which family of the descendants of Adam the promised Seed should come, so he sought to pollute the whole race. Immediately after the flood Noah utters a prophetic word, which pointed out Shem as the chosen one.

Soon Abraham is called, and the promise of the land and of the Seed is given to him. Satan now centres his attack upon this man and this land. Taking advantage of the delay mentioned in Gen. xi. 31, the evil one peopled the land of Canaan with the Nephilim, the Giants, the Sons of Anak and the Rephaim. The reading of Gen. xi. 31 with xii. 5, 6 is very solemn:-- > "And they went forth with them from Ur of the Chaldees to go into the land of Canaan; and they came unto Haran and dwelt there."

> "And they went forth to go into the land of Canaan, and into the land of Canaan they came. . . . and the Canaanite was then in the land."

The denial of Sarai both in Egypt and Gerar (Gen. xii. 10-20, and xx. 1-10) is connected with Sarai being taken into the harem of the monarch, and with divine interposition and warning. The repetition of these things is not merely to show Abraham's frailty, but to show the two-fold attempt of satan to contaminate the line of the Seed. Space will not allow us to trace the ever central attack through the long course of Israel's history. The massacre of the male children by Pharaoh is echoed by the same evil work of Herod. The parable of the Tares gives us the method adopted by satan when he found that in spite of all his efforts the long promised Seed had come, and that the Messiah had proclaimed the gospel of the kingdom, and that some had received the message.

Referring back again to Gen. iii., we must notice that there are two seeds mentioned. The Seed of the woman and the seed of the serpent. Now as we translate the one, we must in all fairness translate the other. Therefore, if the Seed of the woman is Christ, the seed of the serpent is antichrist; if moreover we may extend the term to include believers, so must we allow the term to include unbelievers. The parable before us exposes the policy of the wicked one. Change of purpose he does not know, but change of tactics he will ever allow, so that he may draw nearer to his end.

Among those who were professedly the religious people of the day, and in their own estimation "sons of the kingdom," were those who were really "sons of the wicked one."

Matt. iii. opens with the ministry of John the Baptist. The voice of the forerunner was heard,

> "and Jerusalem and all Judæa, and all the country round about the Jordan went forth unto him, and were being baptized in the river Jordan by him, openly confessing their sins."

By reason of the fact that John proclaimed that "the kingdom of the heavens is at hand," all who came to be baptized were professedly those who desired a place in that long hoped-for kingdom. Here it is that we catch a glimpse of the Devil's seed, ready to be sown among the good wheat:--

> "But seeing many of the Pharisees and Sadducees coming to his baptism, he said unto them, Offspring of vipers, who has warned you to flee from the coming wrath?"

We must not be too hasty in concluding that these Pharisees and Sadducees all turned back; John immediately continued:--

> "Bring forth fruit worthy of repentance, and do not think to say within yourselves, We have Abraham for our father, for I say unto you that God is able of these stones to raise up children unto Abraham."

John warns them that though they may look so much like the wheat so that it would be impossible to distinguish them then, yet when Christ came He would reveal the secrets of many hearts; the fruit would manifest which was wheat, and which was darnel, which were the sons of the kingdom, and which the sons of the wicked one. After referring to the exceeding greatness of Christ, John uses a figure which links this passage very suggestively with the parable before us:--

> "Whose fan is in His hand, and He will thoroughly cleanse His threshing-floor, and will gather together His wheat into the granary, but the chaff will He burn up with fire unquenchable."

Some may have heeded these stern words, but many we know refused the witness, and became the enemies of the Lord and His work. The words of John to the Pharisees and Sadducees find an echo in the words of Christ in later passages. In the very chapter which precedes this one of kingdom parables, and where the rejection of Christ reached a climax, we find reference to these "tares," the seed of the wicked one. The subject (chap. xii. 22-37) refers to satan's kingdom, and in verses 33, 34 the Lord says:--

> "Either make the tree good, and its fruit good, or make the tree corrupt, and its fruit corrupt. For from the fruit the tree is known."

This last sentence is entirely in harmony with the parable. The tares, or darnel, are the Arabian zowan, which grows among the corn. Even the native farmers cannot distinguish between the wheat and the tares with sufficient accuracy to enable them to weed out the latter. The moment, however, that the wheat and the zowan begin to head out, a child could distinguish between them.

Continuing the quotation of chap. xii. 34 we read:--

> "Offspring of vipers, how can ye speak good things, being wicked."

Again in Matt. xxiii. 33 the Lord says:--

> "Serpents, offspring of vipers, how should ye flee away from the judgment of Gehenna?"

In John viii. 30-32 we have the two kinds of believers or disciples:--

> "As He was speaking these things, many believed on Him. Jesus said, therefore, unto the Jews who had believed on Him, If ye abide in My word, ye are truly My disciples; and ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free."

The Lord Jesus "needed not that any one should bear witness concerning man, for He knew what was in man" (John ii. 25). His words, addressed to those who had believed exposed their inner selves. "They answered Him, seed of Abraham are we. . . . our father is Abraham." Here we have a link with the "offspring of vipers" (Matt. iii.), and this is used by the Lord in His reply, "Ye are of your father the Devil, and the lusts of your father ye choose to be doing." How soon the Lord's word divided the wheat from the tares! It is the same in John vi. 59-71:--

> "Many of His disciples, therefore, when they heard, said, This is a hard saying, who can hear it? . . . . There are some among you who do not believe; for Jesus knew from the beginning who they were that did not believe, and who it was would deliver Him up. . . . Did not I make choice of you, the twelve, and yet from among you one is a devil."

The servants could not distinguish the true from the false, but the Lord knew what was within before it developed its fruit.

Satan's attempt to spoil the kingdom purpose will fail, as all else of creature craft must do if directed against the Lord. The harvest time, however, has not yet taken place, that is reserved until the consummation of the age. Matt. xxiv. 30, 31 gives us the commencement of this great harvest.

> "And they will see the Son of man coming upon the clouds of heaven, with great power and glory. And He will send forth His angels with a great trumpet, and they shall gather together His chosen."

Much more could be said, but our space is limited. We believe that sufficient has been produced from Scripture to assist the student in arriving at a true understanding of this parable. The reader should bear in mind the opening words of the parable, "The kingdom of the heavens has become like, &c." The phase which the kingdom had taken consequent upon Matt. xii. is here depicted. We shall have opportunity for dealing with the closing words of the interpretation when we consider the corresponding parable of the Drag Net.

May we be thankful for every exhibition of divine knowledge, wisdom and love, over-ruling and defeating the enemy of truth, and may we ever seek to glorify the Lord our God by fruitful lives, shunning, as we would poison, any approximation to the dissembling and hypocritical spirit which is set forth under the figure of the "darnel."

The Mustard Tree.
pp. 79-83

A great deal of controversy has taken place concerning the true meaning of the mustard plant mentioned in this parable. Some maintain that it does not refer to the plant known to us as the mustard plant, but to another which is, strictly speaking, a tree. We are quite unable to enter into this argument where learned men and botanists disagree. For us, all that we need will be found in the Word itself, and to that we turn.

The statement of verse 31 of Matt. xiii., "The kingdom of the heavens is like to a grain of mustard seed, which a man took and sowed in his field," seems to indicate that we have brought before us a plant which would be naturally sown in fields, and disposes of the idea that it refers to a tree and not to the mustard plant—a herb. The difficulty which some have in the statement of verse 32, "which indeed is the least of all seeds," is easily removed by supplying the ellipsis from verse 31. The seed is the least of all seeds which men sow in their fields.

Before considering the bearing of this parable upon the subject of the "mysteries of the kingdom," we must refer to parallel uses of the figures here employed, in order to be "thoroughly furnished." The word sinapi (mustard) occurs but five times in the N.T. Matt. xiii. 31, Mark iv. 31, and Luke xiii. 19 are the passages wherein the parable of the mustard seed is found; the two other references are Matt. xvii. 20 and Luke xvii. 6, where the reference is to "faith like unto a grain of mustard seed." It would appear that this was a proverbial saying. When, to-day, we speak of a very nominal rent, we sometimes say, "it is a mere pepper-corn," and in like manner the mustard seed was used to denote any thing very small. Let us then fix the first point first. The smallness of the seed must be remembered when considering the interpretation of the parable. The next thing that we must do is to see whether the Lord alluded to any O.T. prophecies, parables, or statements, for if He did the consideration of such passages must help greatly in the elucidation of the parable:--

> "There shall be an handful of corn in the earth upon the top of the mountains; the fruit thereof shall shake like Lebanon" (Psa. lxxii. 16).
> "Thou sawest till that a stone was cut out without hands, which smote the image. . . . and become a great mountain, and filled the whole earth" (Dan. ii. 34, 35).

These two passages have reference to the smallness of the kingdom in its beginnings, and the greatness of the kingdom at its close. The first refers to Israel in the Millennium, the second to the kingdom in relation to the Gentiles and satanic monarchies, which commence with Nebuchadnezzar and end with antichrist:--

> "I saw, and behold a tree in the midst of the earth, and the height thereof was great. The tree grew, and was strong, and the height thereof reached unto heaven, and the sight thereof to the end of all the earth. The leaves thereof were fair, and the fruit thereof much, and in it was meat for all: the beasts of the field had shadow under it, and the fowls of the heaven dwelt in the boughs thereof, and all flesh was fed by it" (Dan. iv. 10-12).

Daniel interprets the tree thus, "It is thou, O king," referring to Nebuchadnezzar. There is close parallel here to the statement of the Lord, "The birds of the air come and lodge in the branches thereof." Ezek. xxxi. 2-18 contains somewhat references to Pharaoh:--

> "Behold the Assyrian was a cedar in Lebanon. . . . all the fowls of heaven made their nests in his boughs. . . . "

The expression, "the fowls of the air," in the parable, would be better translated "the fowls of the heaven"; this establishes more closely the connection between the parable of the Mustard Tree and Daniel iv. and Ezekiel xxi. "The fowls of the heaven" are mentioned in Matt. vi. 26; viii. 20; xiii. 32; Mark iv. 4, 32; Luke viii. 5; ix. 58; and xiii. 19.

In the parable of the Sower as recorded by Matthew and Mark, we simply read "the fowls" came and devoured the seed. In Luke viii. 5, however, we read, "the fowls of the heavens devoured it." This helps us to see that those who devoured the seed which fell on the wayside are those who found a lodging place in the branches of the tree. Now the interpretation of the Sower is given by the Lord, and He declares that the action of the fowls is to illustrate the work of satan; consequently we are driven to the conclusion that whatever aspect of the kingdom may be represented by the Mustard Tree, we must find place therein for satan and his agents. It will be of service if we now compare the three records of this parable as given by Matthew, Mark and Luke:--

Matthew.	Mark.	Luke.
"Another parable put He before them saying, The kingdom of the heavens is like unto a grain of mustard seed, which a man took and sowed in his field, which indeed is less than all seeds, but when grown is greater than the herbs, and becometh a tree, so that the birds of the heaven come and lodge among its branches."	"And He was saying, How shall we liken the kingdom of God, or in what parable shall we compare it? As a grain of mustard seed, which when it is sown springeth up and becometh greater than all herbs, and produceth large branches, so that under the shade thereof the birds of the heaven may lodge."	"He went on to say therefore, Whereunto is the kingdom of God like? And whereunto shall I liken it? It is like unto a grain of mustard seed, which a man took and cast into his garden, and it grew and became a (great) tree and the birds of the heaven lodged among its branches."

The words "How shall we liken?" "Whereunto is the kingdom of God like?" in Mark and Luke suggest that, humanly speaking, the analogy was difficult to frame. The kingdom history had taken such a strange turn that it needed great skill and choice of figures to illustrate the teaching. The first thing we notice is the smallness of the grain of mustard seed. The kingdom purpose of God commenced with the call of one man, Abram, and his descendants. God definitely told Israel that the people cast out of Canaan were "seven nations greater and mightier than thou" (Deut. vii. 1). It is further said:--

> "The Lord did not set His love upon you nor choose you because ye were more in number than any people, for ye were the fewest of all people" (Deut. vii. 7).
> "Thy fathers went down into Egypt threescore and ten persons; and now the Lord thy God hath made them as the stars of heaven for multitude" (Deut. x. 22).

Here we have the teaching of the words, "less than all the seeds." Let us now consider the growth of this small company of people. Deut. x. 22 has already told us that the seventy sons became as the stars of heaven for multitude. This, however, was not permanent. In between the promise of the unconditional covenant made by God in Gen. xii. came the covenant of law and works of Sinai—"All that the Lord hath spoken we will do." Thus in Deut. xxvii. and xxviii. we have blessings and cursings uttered with reference to the law. The curses are terrible, and tell us of the removal of all the privileges and blessings attaching to the chosen people. Among the judgments we note the following:--

> "And ye shall be left few in number, whereas ye were as the stars of heaven for multitude; because thou wouldest not obey the voice of the Lord thy God" (Deut. xxviii. 62).

Those who are acquainted with the history of Israel know how all these things came to pass. First the ten tribes, and then the two, were removed from their land, and the dominion given to Nebuchadnezzar. With this man commenced the "times of the Gentiles"—"it became a tree." These times must run their destined course before "all Israel shall be saved" (Rom. xi. 25, 26). This the apostle declares to be a "mystery," and indeed it is related to the "mystery of the kingdom of the heavens" as recorded in Matt. xiii.

The dominion handed over to Nebuchadnezzar went the same way as it did with Adam and with Israel. From the head of gold it degenerated by stages from silver to brass, from brass to iron, and from iron to clay. We know that Babylon was succeeded by Medo-Persia, which in its turn was succeeded by Greece. This we know not merely from history, but from Scripture (Dan. viii. 18-27). The question as to whether Rome succeeded Greece may form a profitable consideration at some future time; what we know is that when the Lord Jesus was on earth,

> "Satan showed Him the kingdoms of the world (hoikoumene) in a moment of time; and the devil said unto Him, All this will I give Thee, and the glory of them (note "Thine is the kingdom, the power and the glory'), for unto me hath it been delivered, and to whomsoever I will I give it" (Luke iv. 5, 6).

This brings us to the words of the parable again, "the birds of the heavens lodged in its branches." The parable of the Sower has settled the meaning of the birds—satan and his agents. Dan. x. 13 and 20 show us that satan had an emissary at the courts of Persia and Greece, a principality or power conducting affairs for the "prince of this world." Inasmuch as idolatry is allied to demons, it seems probable that the dominion given by God to the Gentiles was given up to satan, who is seen in full possession in the days when the Lord Jesus was on earth.

The normal, or true kingdom growth, and the abnormal, or Gentiles-Satanic development, may be better seen by viewing the parable as follows:--

A1 | "The seed sown." Sowing.	The kingdom
B1 | "Least of all." Its beginning—small.	viewed as from
A2 | "When it is grown." Growing.	Abraham to its final
B2 | "Greatest of herbs." Its real end—great herb.	establishment.
A3 | "Becometh a tree." Becoming.	The kingdom as it
B3 | "Fowls. . . . in branches."	became during the
Its end under Gentiles.	"times of the Gentiles."

Thus the small seed grew into a tree and became a lodging place of satan and his angels. No wonder, then, that the preaching of the kingdom gospel was resisted and ended as it did. The Lord knew that the times of the Gentiles must run their course before the seed would be sown in good ground. Viewed in this light the parable was full of meaning to those anxious hearts who gathered around the Lord in the days of His rejection. Understanding this parable as a revelation of one of the "secrets of the kingdom," they would be upheld in their, apparently, fruitless ministry.

In the next parable the Lord reveals the last factor in this sad history, but that we must leave for our next paper.

The Hidden Leaven and the Hidden Treasure.
pp. 95-103

The parable of the Leaven is the last of the four spoken by the Lord outside the house. It reaches a climax and tells us what the end of the external history of the kingdom of the heavens will be—"the whole was leavened."

The parable occurs in Matt. xiii. 33 and Luke xiii. 20, 21. Matt. xiii. 33 says, "Another parable spake He unto them. The kingdom of the heavens is like unto leaven, which a woman took and hid in three measures of meal until the whole was leavened." Luke xiii. 20, 21 says, "And again He said, Whereunto shall I liken the kingdom of God? It is like leaven, which a woman took and hid in three measures of meal until the whole was leavened." The wording of the two passages is very similar. Luke adds the question, "Whereunto shall I liken the kingdom?" and uses the expression, "The kingdom of God," for "The kingdom of the heavens." The reader will remember that Luke and Mark prefix this question to the parable of the Mustard Tree, and its recurrence is suggestive of something parallel.

Before going further in our investigations we must consider the Scriptural meaning of the word "leaven." The word in Greek is zume, and occurs thirteen times in Scripture. The significance of thirteen is that of rebellion and the work of satan. Practically all the titles of satan are multiples of 13, and the suggestion that leaven is a type of evil is strengthened by this fact.

Let us notice how the word is used in other N.T. passages. In Matthew's Gospel the Lord uses it as a type of corrupt and corrupting doctrine. "Take heed and beware of the leaven of the Pharisees and of the Sadducees. . . . Then understood they how that He bade them not beware of the leaven of bread, but of the doctrine of the Pharisees and of the Sadducees" (Matt. xvi. 6-12). In Mark viii. 15 we read, "Beware of the leaven of the Pharisees, and of the leaven of Herod."

A further explanation is given of the meaning of the leaven of the Pharisees in Luke xii. 1, "Beware ye of the leaven of the Pharisees, which is hypocrisy." Scripture affords us therefore the plain statement that the Lord Jesus used the figure of leaven as a type of evil doctrine and hypocrisy. This of itself should be sufficient to dispose of the idea that the leaven in Matt. xiii. is typical of the truth. Every occurrence of the word, moreover, whether in the N.T. or the O.T., bears out the fixed meaning of the symbol. The apostle Paul uses leaven as a figure in I Cor. v. 6, 7, 8, and Gal. v. 9. He speaks of the "leaven of baseness and wickedness," and contrasts it with "the unleavened bread of sincerity and truth" (I Cor. v. 8). The passage opens with the words, "Know ye not that a little leaven doth leaven the whole lump? Purge ye out the old leaven," and ends with the words, "Remove ye the wicked man from among yourselves" (I Cor. v. 6-13).

In Exod. xii. 15 we read in connection with the Passover, "Ye shall put leaven out of your houses." Exod. xxxiv. 25 and Lev. ii. 11 declare, "Thou shalt not offer the blood of any sacrifice with leaven," and "No meal offering which ye shall bring unto the Lord shall be made with leaven." Here we see that both the sacrifice with blood, and the wonderful bloodless meal offering, must alike be free from leaven. Amos, speaking of Israel's sins, says, "Come to Bethel and transgress. . . . and offer a sacrifice of thanksgiving with leaven. . . . for this liketh you, O ye children of Israel, saith the Lord God" (Amos iv. 4, 5). Leaven is undoubtedly a type of evil as used by the Holy Spirit in the inspired Word.

What of the three measures of meal? They certainly cannot typify the corrupt human heart any more than the corrupting leaven can represent the blessed truth of God. Neither can the three measures of pure meal represent the "Protestant, Roman Catholic, and Greek sections of Christendom." If they do, then the Protestant expositors who are largely the supporters of this interpretation must confess that Rome is looked upon by the Lord in the same light as their own community, and will finally be "leavened the gospel" (to use their own phraseology), like the Protestant and the Greek. Of course the answer will be that the measures of meal represent "Christendom, the professing church," not the true church of Christ. This again yields another difficulty. Will "Christendom, the professing church" be so "leavened with the gospel" that at the end it will be true that "the whole was leavened"? When the Son of man cometh, will He find a completely evangelized and believing Christendom? Facts of everyday life as well as prophecy testify to the exact opposite.

Can we find the Scriptural meaning of the three measures of meal? The word meal in the original is aleuron, and means by its etymology meal produced by grinding. The word occurs nowhere else in Scripture apart from the parable of the Leaven. In the O.T. meal and fine flour were typical of the spotless purity of the offering of the Lord Jesus, and of the perfect character of the Word of truth. In Lev. ii. we have the "meat offering." The word "meat" is an old English word for food (we still say "grace before meat"), but there is no flesh or blood in the "meat offering" of Lev. ii. The instructions given in the first verse tell us of the perfect purity of the offering; "his offering shall be of fine flour; and he shall pour oil upon it, and put frankincense thereon. . . . no meat offering which ye shall bring unto the Lord shall be made with leaven" (verse 11).

Meal was used by the prophet Elisha to counteract the "death in the pot" caused by the "wild vine" which had been gathered, symbolizing the deliverance to be wrought by Christ (II Kings iv. 38-41). In Jer. xxiii. we have the Lord's severe indictment of the false prophets. "They speak a vision of their own heart, and not out of the mouth of the Lord" (verse 16). "The prophets. . . . that prophesy lies in my Name. . . . they are prophets of the deceit of their own heart" (vv.25, 26). "I am against the prophets. . . . that steal my words. . . . that use (or smooth) their tongues, and say, He saith" (vv.30, 31). "He that hath My Word, let him speak My Word faithfully. What is the chaff to the wheat? Saith the Lord" (verse 28). These passages must suffice to show that corn, meal, or fine flour typify the Word of God, living and written.

There is one other symbol to consider and that is "The woman." In the preceding parables it is a man who sows the seed, but now the symbol changes. Students of the Scriptures are familiar with the fact that a woman is used many times to represent a system either good or bad. Thus we have "that woman Jezebel" in Rev. ii. 20, and she is seen very plainly hiding the "leaven" in the meal. "Thou sufferest that woman Jezebel which calleth herself a prophetess to teach and to seduce My servants to commit fornication, and to eat things sacrificed to idols." Here is corruption; this is the doctrine of Balaam as specified in verse 14. In Rev. xvii. 4, 5 we have another woman:--

> "And the woman was arrayed in purple and scarlet colour, and decked with gold and precious stones and pearls, having a golden cup in her hand full of abomination and filthiness of her fornication. And upon her forehead was a name written, a secret, Babylon the Great, the mother of the harlots and the abominations of the earth."

The interpretation given by God is that this woman "is that great city" (verse 18), and Babylon, and all that Babylon stands for, is intended here—the great corrupter. The revival of Babylon forms part of Zechariah's prophecy. In chapter v., under the figure of a lawless woman sitting in the midst of an ephah (a dry measure used for grain, &c.), the prophet depicts the return of wickedness to its original seat—"to build it an house in the land of Shinar." Many commentators look upon the woman as symbolizing Rome. Romanism is certainly one of the polluted streams, but it is not the fountain head, for idolatry and its accompaniments were doing their deadly work before Rome was built, or Romanism founded. It is interesting to note the efforts now being put forward in Mesopotamia for the revival of this ancient seat of rebellion and corruption.

We have seen that leaven signifies corrupt doctrine. We have seen that the meal represents the perfect offering of Christ and the unadulterated Word of God, and we see that the woman has much to make us feel that Babylonianism is behind this corrupting work. In the parable of the Tares we see the enemy sowing his false seed; in the parable of the Mustard Tree he is found supported by the branches of the abnormal growth which typifies the Gentile epoch; and in the parable of the Leaven he is seen using that great system of corruption, of which he was the founder (Gen. x.), to leaven the pure meal of God.

Coming back to Matt. xiii. we ask, with the disciples, why it is that the kingdom of the heavens is delayed, and the King rejected? The answer is "An enemy hath done this." He has sown his tares, he inhabits the tree, he leavens the truth.

We have already seen the connection between the leaven and the doctrine of the Pharisees, Sadducees and Herodians. Here is leaven enough for the three measures of meal. It will be found that this leaven has reference to the Word of God and the Person of Christ. In Matt. xvi. 6-12 the Lord warns His disciples against the leaven of the Pharisees and the Sadducees, and immediately the Scripture records His question, "Who do men say that I, the Son of man, am?" Peter's wonderful confession is immediately followed by an attack of satan, where the cause of the opposition is the revelation of the fact that the Lord Jesus must suffer, die, and rise again. Peter's words, "be propitious to Thyself" (verse 22) savoured of men, and were instigated by satan (verse 23).

The Lord had said, further, that the leaven of the Pharisees was hypocrisy. This leaven is exposed in Matt. xxiii. 13, "Woe unto you, Scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites!

For ye shut up the kingdom of the heavens against men." This is why the King was rejected and the kingdom shut up. In Mark vii. the Lord again unveils their corrupting influence:--

> "Well hath Isaiah prophesied of you hypocrites, as it is written, This people honoureth Me with their lips, but their heart is far from Me. However, in vain do they worship Me, teaching for doctrines the commands of men. For laying aside the commandment, ye hold the tradition of men. . . . full well ye reject the commandment of God that ye may keep your own tradition" (Mark vii. 6-9).

Space will not allow us to multiply examples, those given are sufficient to show the working of the leaven. The leaven was everywhere making its corrupting way. Distorted views obtained concerning (1) the Messiah, (2) the Kingdom, and (3) the Scriptures. The Lord Jesus, standing in the midst of a people thus already corrupted, prophesied that this leavening would go on its evil course until the whole was leavened. "When the Son of man cometh, shall He find faith in the earth?" The apostle Paul, writing in II Thess. ii. of the rise of antichrist, says:--

> "For the mystery of lawlessness already is inwardly working itself, only until He that restraineth become out of the midst, and then shall be revealed the lawless one. . . . because the love of the truth they did not welcome. . . . they believe the lie" (vv. 7-11).

This brings us to the end, "the whole was leavened." This is the state of things as given in the book of the Revelation. The last parable of the external history of the course of the kingdom is sad indeed. The state of Israel at the "time of the end" is deplorable, and may be summed up under the three heads, Pharisaic, Sadducean, and Herodian. Hypocrisy, infidelity and worldliness "like unto Sodom and Gomorrah."

We are thankful that this is not the end of these parables. There is another side of the question, there is the divine standpoint, there is the purpose of Him Who worketh all things after the counsel of His own will. This divine aspect is the common link between the next four parables spoken "inside the house" to the disciples. These we must consider in subsequent articles. Before concluding this paper shall we set out the history of the kingdom of the heavens so far as we have seen it at present?

The Sower.

The ministries of John the Baptist, the Lord Jesus, and the Apostles during the "Acts" were to a large extent, externally, failures, but there is yet to be a gloriously fruitful sowing when the time comes for the New Covenant to be put into operation.

The Darnel.

The reason for the delay in the setting up of the kingdom is discovered in the fact that an enemy is at work, and side by side with the true children of the kingdom are the children of the wicked one, but these are not removed until the end of the age.

The Mustard Tree.

The next reason for the delay is that whereas the small seed of Israel should have flourished and filled the earth with fruit, the sovereignity changed hands, and was deposited with the Gentiles, beginning with Nebuchadnezzar, "until the fulness of the Gentiles be come in." This stage is marked by the words, "it becometh a tree, and the fowls lodged in its branches." That which should have been pre-eminently the kingdom of righteousness, becomes the habitation of satan and his angels.

The Leaven.

The third reason for delay is that the leaven of evil has been put into the meal of God's truth. This will work its course until the rise of antichrist, and the complete corruption of the visible witness for God.

Thus we see that the Lord Jesus had no idea of the gradual uplifting of the masses, and the permeating influence of the gospel. He saw that man had corrupted his way upon the earth, even as it was in the days of Noah. Hence it is that He uses the same words to represent the end. Blessed be God, that out of all this corruption and apostasy He will yet bring His treasure and display His grace. For this creation groans, and the study of this blessed aspect of the divine purpose shall now be our privilege.

We have considered the first four parables and discovered something of their bearing upon the course of the kingdom of the heavens. A division is now observable, emphasized alike by the structural arrangement, the teaching, and the different place in which they were spoken.

The Treasure.

After the parable of the Leaven the Lord dismissed the multitude, and went into the house. There He explained the parable of the Tares, and then proceeded to unfold the inner or Godward aspect of the kingdom in the four parables that followed. Their relation to each other may be summarized thus:--

A | The treasure in the field.–The nation of Israel as distinct from the nations.
B | The one beautiful pearl.—The remnant of Israel as distinct from the nations.
B | The many fish.—The Gentiles nations as distinct from Israel.
A | The treasure in the house.—Israel, viewed as a missionary nation, sent to the nations.

The first of this series (the Hid Treasure) is in direct contrast with the Hid Leaven. These four parables are found only in Matthew's Gospel. "The kingdom of the heavens is like unto a treasure hid in the field, which a man finding, hid, and by reason of his joy, withdraweth and selleth whatsoever he hath, and buyeth that field." Let us examine the terms of the parable in the light of the subject of the kingdom and the Scriptures relating thereto. Just before this parable the Lord had said, "The field is the world," hence the field here (not "a field," as the A.V.) means the world. In this world a treasure was hidden. What is the treasure?

Starting with Gen. xii. we have the inception of the special nation, separated and called to a higher glory than any other nation on the earth. When this people was redeemed from Egypt the Lord said to them, "Now therefore, if ye will obey My voice indeed, and keep My covenant, then ye shall be a peculiar treasure (s'gullah) unto Me above all people: for all the earth is Mine: and ye shall be unto Me a kingdom of priests, and an holy nation" (Exod. xix. 5, 6). No other nation has ever had such a calling or such a title. Deut. xiv. 2 reads, "the Lord hath chosen thee to be a peculiar (s'gullah) people unto Himself, above all the nations that are upon the earth." Again, in Deut. xxvi. 18 we read, "The Lord hath avouched thee this day to be His peculiar (s'gullah) people. . . . to make thee high above all nations. . . ." In Psa. cxxxv. 4 we read, "The Lord hath chosen. . . . Israel for His peculiar treasure (s'gullah)." In Mal. iii. 17 we read, "And they shall be Mine, saith the Lord of hosts, in that day when I make up My jewels" (s'gullah). The "jewels," or peculiar treasure, represent the whole nation of Israel, secured in their position of final blessing by the unchanging love of God (Mal. iii. 10). But in the day of Israel's blessing one jewel brighter than the rest will be seen—the remnant of faithful ones during the days of Israel's sin and apostasy. This will be considered under the parable of the One Pearl. Psa. lxxxiii. 3, 4 supplies another name for Israel, "Thy hidden ones," which should be considered in this connection.

The next item to notice is the statement, "Which a man finding, hid." The hidden treasure is hidden again until the day when the treasure is claimed. When the Lord Jesus came to this world He limited His ministry to the lost sheep of the house of Israel; He came to seek and to save that which was lost. Israel could never qualify under law to be the treasure; they must be redeemed. They will never be a kingdom of priests by virtue of their own deeds, but solely upon the basis of redemption (cf. Rev. i.). Up till Matt. xvi. the Lord had not spoken of His death, but in verses 20 & 21 He hides the treasure, and declares the great price which He is about to pay for its redemption. That death on the cross secured the treasure and the field. There the Lord Jesus gave His all.

In Luke xix. 11-27 we have further light upon this hiding of the treasure. Lest any should think by His words that the kingdom was to be set up at once, the Lord said, "A certain nobleman went into a far country to receive for himself a kingdom and to return." Thus the second hiding of the treasure is symbolical of the abeyance of the kingdom. The day of manifestation is coming when the words will resound, "The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdom of our Lord and of His Christ, and He shall reign unto the ages of the ages" (Rev. xi. 15). This parable declares that in spite of all opposition God's purpose for Israel and the kingdom will be fulfilled. This would comfort the hearts of the disciples. They would see how irresistible is the purpose of Him, Who worketh all things after the counsel of His own will.

Thus has God declared His answer to the evil one. He had hidden his leaven, but the Lord had hidden His treasure. Soon the day will come when the Lord will remove the stain of sin and the corruption of the enemy: soon He will come to make up His jewels, and then shall Israel be a glorious diadem in the hand of their God.

The Pearl of Great Price.
pp. 133-136

It will be remembered that in our exposition of the parable of the Hid Treasure we drew attention to the difference which is made in Scripture between "all Israel" and "the remnant." It appears also in the above parable. Both refer to the people of God's choice--Israel, both are referred to under the figure either of a treasure or a pearl of great price. The very Jews who were "enemies because of the gospel" were nevertheless "beloved because of the fathers," but doubly precious in the sight of God has ever been that believing remnant from Abraham onwards. These are an election from among the elect, and these are dealt with in the parable of the Pearl:--

> "Again, the kingdom of the heavens is like unto a merchant seeking beautiful pearls, and, finding one very precious pearl, departing, he at once sold all things whatsoever he had and bought it" (Matt. xiii. 45, 46).

Let us briefly consider the words used in this parable.

Merchant.--The word is epmoros in the original, giving us our emporium, and occurs five times in the N.T., once in the parable, and four times of the merchants connected with Babylon (Rev. xviii.).

Pearls.--These are mentioned in the N.T. nine times. Two of these occurrences are in the parable, and five are in the Revelation. The harlot is seen decked with precious stones and pearls, but after her destruction the new Jerusalem, the holy city, is seen with its foundation of precious stones, and every gate a pearl. Merchants and pearls are connected with the two cities, and the two systems, the one being the devil's parody of the other.

The N.T. word for a pearl is margarites. Another word, not found in the N.T., but closely resembling the Hebrew word translated "rubies," is the word pinna. The R.V. margin of Job xxviii. 18 gives "pearls" as an alternative reading. Bochart is very strong in his belief that the Hebrew word peninim (rubies) should be translated pearls. The price of wisdom (Job xxviii. 18; Prov. iii. 15) and the worth of a virtuous woman (Prov. xxxi. 10) are placed above the value of peninim or pearls.

Coming now to the meaning of the parable. Right down the ages since the time of Abraham there has been a faithful remnant. These will form one company at the end, and are spoken of as "holy brethren, partakers of the heavenly calling," "who died in faith, not having received the promise." The reader should turn to the following passages before going further, to learn more concerning this remnant according to the election of grace. Isa. i. 9; Isa. vii. 3 (Shear-jashub, the name translated for us in x. 21 by the words "the remnant shall return"); Isa. xi. 11, 16; Ezek. ix. 4-6; xiv. 22; Joel ii. 32 (compare the remnant on the day of Pentecost); Micah ii. 12; Rom. ix. 27; xi. 5.

The overcomers of the Apocalypse, the 144,000 sealed of the tribes of Israel, the various companies mentioned in Rev. xii. 17; xiv. 1-5; xv. 1-3 and xx. 4 all seem to be part of this great company denominated by our Lord "The Pearl of Great Price." Pearls are compared with holiness in Matt. vii. 6; the partakers of the heavenly calling are called "holy brethren" (Heb. iii. 1), and "saints of the Most High" (Dan. vii. 22). Pearls are compared with wisdom in the O.T., and Dan. xii. 3 tells us that "they that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament, and they that turn many to righteousness, as the stars unto the age and beyond." These are the seed of Abraham likened to the stars of heaven, the nation itself being likened to the sand of the seashore. These wise ones "understand" and "instruct many" (Dan. ix. 33); they are subjected to tribulation (Dan. xi. 35) before they enter their glory. Wherever we see this elect remnant we find tribulation and suffering. The words of the epistles of Peter and James, so full of admonition and comfort to those of the dispersion who believed and who were passing through the "fiery trial," were addressed to this remnant.

When we read in the book of the Revelation of "The wife" and "The bride," we have the two companies again who are in view in these parables as the Treasure and the Pearl. Israel's relationship to God is that of a wife who, being unfaithful, has been put away, but the return of Israel is to be like the taking back of the penitent wife, nay, so great is God's grace and love that He says it will be "as a young man marrieth a virgin," even though in reality it will be the taking back again of an unfaithful wife (see Isa. lxii. 4, 5 and Hos. ii. 19, 20, &c.). This relationship, which includes "all Israel," is brought before us in Rev. xix. as the marriage of the Lamb, whose "wife hath made herself ready."

After the thousand years' reign, and in connection with the new heaven and the new earth, we read, "And I, John, saw the holy city, new Jerusalem, coming down from God out of heaven, prepared as a bride adorned for her husband" (Rev. xxi. 2). In verses 9 and 10 we have this fact repeated. The inhabitants of this city are the partakers of the "heavenly calling," who, like Abraham, desired a better country, that is an heavenly, and for them God hath prepared a city. It was this heavenly calling (which must be distinguished from the super-celestial calling of the dispensation of the mystery), so plainly understood and believed by Abraham, that enabled him to be a stranger and a pilgrim on the earth, a sojourner in the land of promise as in a strange country, content with tents and no settled habitation, because he looked for a city which hath the foundations, whose builder and maker is God.

Such as are children of faithful Abraham, not only according to the flesh but according to the spirit, such constitute the bride and the pearl, an elect remnant out from an elect nation. Israel viewed as a whole is likened to a treasure and a wife. The remnant (which will include believing Gentiles during the "Acts" period) are viewed as a precious pearl and a bride. We may set this out more clearly as follows:--

The Elect Nation as distinct from the Nations.	The Elect Remnant as distinct from the Nation.
A treasure.	A pearl.
A wife.	A bride.
Earthly calling, and city.	Heavenly calling, and city.
Seed like sand for multitude.	Seed like stars for multitude.

Once again we see how fully the Lord was meeting the disciples' need, by showing them the way in which God's purpose concerning Israel was to run its course, and how the very trials and hindrances would be made to contribute to the glorious end in view.

The Drag Net.

In the preceding parable we had the remnant of Israel likened to that which is the most valuable treasure of the sea – the pearl. We are now to consider two kinds of fish which are gathered from the sea, and to note their meaning. We have pointed out the fact that structurally and in subject the two parables of the Tares and the Net are very similar. The tares indicate the hypocrites, the counterfeit, that which was sown by the Devil in imitation of the true wheat. We observed that this parable had a particular and primary application to Israel and the state of the kingdom.

The net draws to shore fish both "good" and "bad." So far we see the parallel: the wheat and the tares being two kinds of grain, one good and one bad; the fish being of two kinds, the one good and the other bad. But here comes a noteworthy difference, for whereas it is evident that the tares were intended to counterfeit the wheat, there is not the slightest warrant for supposing that the "bad" fish counterfeited the "good." Further, the wheat and the tares deal with two kinds of seed, whereas the net "gathered of every kind." Another point to be remembered is the different order given with regard to the separation of the two kinds. Let us carefully consider the interpretation given by our Lord of these two related parables, noticing their points of contact and divergence.

Spoken only to disciples.	Spoken only to disciples.
He that soweth the good seed is the Son of man. The field is the world. The good seed are the sons of the kingdom. The tares are the sons of the wicked one. The enemy that sowed them is the devil. The harvest is the end of the age. The reapers are the angels.
As the tares are gathered and burned, so shall it be at the end of the age:	So shall it be at the end of the age.
The Son of man shall send forth His angels, and they shall gather out of His kingdom all things that offend, and them that do iniquity, and shall cast them into a furnace of fire, there shall be wailing and gnashing of teeth	The angels shall come forth, and sever the wicked from among the just, and shall cast them into a furnace of fire, there shall be wailing and gnashing of teeth.
Then shall the righteous shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father.

It will be observed that a more complete explanation is given of the Tares than of the Net, and that in both cases the section dealing with the wicked receives most attention. The wheat and the tares are, the one sons of the kingdom, the other sons of the devil. The good and bad fish are not placed under either heading. Before considering the dispensational teaching of this parable, let us consider more carefully some of the figures that are used.

The Net.—Scripture mentions three different nets:--

1. The cast net (diktuon), cf. John xxi. 11.
2. The circular net (amphiblestron), cf. Matt. iv. 18.
3. The drag net (sagene), only used in this parable.

The Fish.—There are 40 different kinds of fish in the Sea of Galilee: of these there are two common kinds, one a good fish, the bream, the other a fish without scales, and therefore an abomination, having neither fins nor scales (Lev. xi. 10), the flesh of which was salted and sold to the port of Rome, where it received the name of "stinking sheat fish."

The Sea.—The sea is continually used as a type of the nations, particularly in a tumultuous state. "The waters. . . . are peoples, and multitudes, and nations, and tongues" (Rev. xvii. 15).

Let us now look at the parable in the light of prophecy. The drawing of the net to shore at the end of the age is parallel with the gathering of the living nations to the land of Israel. Note, in the parable and in the prophecy, that the fish and the nations are living and not dead. This is not dealing with the judgment of those who are raised from the dead, but that of the living nations, whose relation with the kingdom is to be decided.

Scripture is emphatic upon the fact that towards the end of the age Jerusalem and the land of Israel shall become a "burdensome stone to the nations." The "Eastern Question" already gathers around Asia Minor, and the Powers of Europe jealously regard each other in reference to Jerusalem—the key to the East. Listen to the words of the Prophets:--

> "For behold, in those days and in that time, WHEN I shall bring again the captivity of Judah and Jerusalem, I WILL ALSO GATHER ALL NATIONS, and will bring them down into the valley of Jehoshaphat, and will plead with them there for My people and for My heritage Israel, whom they have scattered among the nations, and parted My land" (Joel iii. 1, 2).
> "Behold, the day of the Lord cometh, and thy spoil shall be divided in the midst of thee, for I WILL GATHER ALL NATIONS against Jerusalem to battle" (Zech. xiv.1, 2).
>
> "My determination is to GATHER THE NATIONS, THAT I MAY ASSEMBLE THE KINGDOMS, to pour upon them My indignation" (Zeph. iii. 8).
>
> "Haste ye and come, ALL YE NATIONS round about, and gather yourselves together; thither cause THY MIGHTY ONES (i.e. the angels) TO COME DOWN, O Lord. Let the nations bestir themselves and come up to the valley of Jehoshaphat, for there will I SIT TO JUDGE ALL NATIONS round about" (Joel iii. 11, 12).
> "When the Son of man shall come in His glory, and all the holy angels with Him, then shall He sit upon the throne of His glory, and before Him shall be gathered ALL NATIONS, and He shall separate them" (Matt. xxv. 31-33).

As we read these prophecies it is abundantly manifested that the gathering of the nations is to be expected at the time of the end. Matt. xxv. shows that the nations who have well treated the "brethren" of the King shall enter into the kingdom, while the nations who have ill-treated the Jew are an offence, and are gathered out of that kingdom. Matt. xxv. is national. As nations they enter the kingdom, or as nations they are debarred. It is quite contrary to the teaching of the passage to make the kind acts of the nations a basis for "doing all things unto the Lord," for these nations did not consciously do what they did to Israel for Christ's sake at all; they only learn that when they stand before His throne.

The peculiar time of Israel's trouble, which is coming, will be a great temptation to all the nations to take advantage of the helplessness of this down-trodden people, but the Lord will reward that nation which acts kindly to His people. "Come ye blessed of My Father, inherit the kingdom"; "the righteous into age-abiding life" (Matt. xxv.34, 46) is typified in the parable by the putting of the good fish into the vessels. "For every one that is left of all the nations that came against Jerusalem, shall even go up from year to year to worship the King, the Lord of Hosts, and to keep the Feast of Tabernacles" (Zech. xiv. 16).

These are the good fish of the parable. The nations who are thus blessed will have a blessed portion in the kingdom; many, however, will forfeit their place when Satan is unbound at the end. Israel's pre-eminent position in the kingdom is emphasized in the parable of the Tares, for of them it adds, "Then shall the righteous shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father." Thus, at the end of the age there will be two siftings and two gatherings in connection with the kingdom. First from Israel itself (as indicated in the "Tares"), He shall thoroughly purge His floor—hypocrites and sons of the wicked one, those who say they are Jews and are not, but who are of the synagogue of Satan (Rev. iii. 9)—and then from the nations round about as already seen in the quotations from the Prophets and Matt. xxv.

These parables show us that great care is necessary in reading the Word that we do not overlook the divisions that are made among various classes in the kingdom. We have the "Treasure," Israel, as distinct from the nations. We have the "One Pearl," the Remnant, as distinct from the nation. We have the good and bad fish, the division made among the nations themselves.

Evil shall not always reign. That kingdom so long looked for will come, and then shall begin the final step towards the goal—"A new heaven and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness."

Berean Expositor Volume 2 & 3.

Review.

We have received for review a booklet (126 pp.) entitled "All in all, the goal of the Universe," published at the Office of "Unsearchable Riches," 2823, E. Sixth Street, Los Angeles, Cal., price 20c.

Whatever difference there may be between the writers of this booklet and the reviewer, however plainly we may speak with regard to any passages which we may feel have not been truthfully interpreted, we desire, even at the risk of appearing unduly solicitous, to discountenance any idea that our love for the brethren concerned is altered, or that we attribute to them any conscious misdealing with the Word of truth. Pioneers of necessity have many difficulties undreamed of by those who sit securely at home, and seeing that The Berean Expositor is also traversing neglected paths and untrod territory, we very really sympathize with all true "Bereans," fallible though they may be as ourselves. Our review must of necessity be brief, but as the subject herein discussed is on our programme to follow the series on the "Wages of Sin," we shall be able to give a more extended commendation or criticism in those articles as we deal with the various sections.

The booklet appears to fall under two headings. The first, for which we thank God, is expository, the second, with which we cannot associate ourselves, is arrived at by a process of deduction and inference. The chapters dealing with the "Ages" contain much that is of the first importance. They set before the reader every passage wherein the Greek words aiõn and aiõnios occur, classified into groups. With this method of research The Berean Expositor (if true to its title) must of necessity be at one. Whether we agree with all the inferences drawn is, however, another question. While there is this commendable element of exposition, its value is marred somewhat by the assumptions and deductions which form a large portion of the argument.

On page 53 the writer speaks of Heb.ix.26 as "a puzzling passage." We are certain that the attempted explanation of the passage will prove a greater puzzle to most readers. "The puzzle" is the result of the assumption that one age, and one only, must be considered as covering the period from the Flood to the Day of the Lord. Right through the book the good exposition is spoiled by the fact that the writers have a theory already formed in their minds. Where direct exposition is of service they are powerful, where they need to go beyond what is written, they fall into the very error which they justly condemn.

Page 6 contains the following true statement, ". . . . and in His Word has given us all necessary knowledge concerning 'things to come'." Page 9 says, "Speculation—the mother of assumption. . . . simply a wild hazard at possible truth." These two sentences seem to contain a summary of the book that contains them. Where the writers are content to go no further than what is written, they do us service, beyond that, all must be "a wild hazard at possible truth," and that is harmful. The awful error of eternal conscious suffering is effectually disposed of in the opening pages, and for this we are indeed thankful.

One of the weakest passages, from an expository standpoint, is that dealing with I Cor.xv. The writer says:--

> "It is generally conceded that in verses 23 and 24 resurrection is spoken of as taking place in the three grand divisions or companies."

Generally conceded! True Bereans concede nothing. And (to quote again from page 9):--

> "When erroneous speculation crystallizes into unquestioned dogma, when its assumptions are foolishly and blindly accepted as incontrovertible fragments of absolute truth, then it acquires an authority, and wields a tyrannous despotism, to which it can advance no rightful claim. . . . this very practice of accepting certain assumptions as being so obviously true as to require no proof. Many a scientific dogma has collapsed the moment its assumptive basis was called into question."

This baneful practice, so rightly condemned on pages 9 and 10, is adopted on pages 31 and 32. "It is generally conceded" on page 31 leads to the astounding assertion on page 32 that the words of I Cor.xv.24, "the end," mean the resurrection of all who become Christ's in the "ages of the ages." This unwarranted assertion, this "wild hazard at possible truth" "crystallizes into unquestioned dogma" on page 63. On the other hand, things which are expressly written for our learning seem to have escaped the attention of the writers. For example, at the foot of page 64 we are told that "those who appear before its (the Great White Throne) awful light shall not live, but die the second death."

A careful reading of Rev.xx. will reveal a state of things entirely contrary to this. The writers "assume" that all who stand before the Great White Throne are cast into the Lake of Fire, and so have to further "assume" that those who are thus cast into the Lake of Fire will be raised out of it again! Scripture is full of evidence on the subject of the resurrection of the dead, but there is no single passage of Scripture written to warrant the idea of a resurrection from the Lake of Fire. We do not see in the book a reason given as to why Death and Hades were cast into the Lake of Fire. If we believed the writers' theories we might hazard a guess that Death and Hades also, together with Satan, his angels, the Beast, and the False Prophet, were to emerge from its dread hold. One may be permitted the equal liberty of believing that Death and Hades, being done with, are cast into the Lake of Fire to be destroyed prior to the new heavens and the new earth.

Another speculation which is quietly assumed as "truth" is found on page 63. "Not only did it (death) come through Adam to his posterity, but its dark stream overflowed to the creatures below as well as the creatures above" (our italics). Even supposing the reading of Heb.ii.9 advocated were to prove the true one, the translation given does not stand the test of the concordance (see chõris in Hebrews). What Scripture is there from Genesis to Revelation which teaches that Adam's death passed beyond the dominion committed to him?

The passing reference to Isa.xxvi.14 is exceedingly weak and unfair. We are taken to Psa.i.5 to show that "rise" in Isa.xxvi.14 does not mean rise, but "stand up"; why were we not taken to the context, to the same word in Isa.xxvi.19? "Thy dead men shall live, together with my dead body shall they arise. Awake and sing, ye that dwell in the dust." The parallelism of "live," "arise," "awake," "death," and "dust" are proof enough that the reference is to resurrection. The truth is that the "Rephaim," together with "every plant which My heavenly Father hath not planted," "the generation of vipers," "the children of the wicked one," "those whose names are not written in the Book of Life," must be carefully considered together, and kept separate from the normal descendants of Adam.

As we said at the beginning, there is much food for thought, and matter for earnest enquiry suggested in this booklet. The argument on Rom.v. is one demanding the utmost attention. Likewise the "alls" of other passages.

A deeply important passage is found in Col.i.15-21, where ta panta is used both of creation and reconciliation. "The moment, however, that we question its universality, we also question the universality of His creation" (page 124). With this should be read the passage on page 82, where the sea and its teeming millions of creatures ("The sea is His, and He made it") do not enter the reconciliation. "And there was no more sea." At once we are confronted with the fact that creation is wider than reconciliation, and all the theories which have been invented to "harmonize" the apparent discrepancies must take this fact into consideration. The sea and its inhabitants form a part of Adamic headship, cf. "and have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over every living thing that moveth upon the earth." Psa.viii. includes "the fish of the sea, and whatsoever passeth through the paths of the sea," yet in the final reconciliation of all things "there was no more sea." The idea contained in the words concerning the creation of the sea, "they were put in there afterwards," would also rule out Adam and his descendants, for they, too, were put there afterwards. The parallel suggested between the omission of the sea, and of the underworld, from the reconciliation is not clearly stated. The trend of the book, however, would go to show that those in the underworld are finally delivered. Is the parallel true of the sea and its inhabitants?

Space forbids further comment; we are thankful for much that the writers of "All in All" have written. We only wish that they would have been content to keep within the bounds of what God has written—we should then have welcomed the fruit of their labours. As it is they have gone beyond the revealed Word, and there we leave them. The idea that mortal man can safely "infer" and "deduce" is a common failing. Who among us could have "inferred" or "deduced" the dispensation of the mystery from the data given in Scripture prior to the end of Acts? The revelation of the secret given in the Prison Epistles must have overturned the "wild hazard at possible truth" of many. So will it be when the Lord reveals that which He has wisely withheld from the Scriptures. The assumptions of this booklet do sadly enough "wield a tyrannous despotism," and though we love the writers for their witness for truth, and for their fight against tradition in the past, here at least we yield subjection, no, not for an hour, and if needs be prefer to go on alone rather than countenance these things, or put our necks again into the yoke of man's doctrines.

Quoting again the words of the booklet (p. 15), “We must let God speak for Himself, and instead of moulding His words into conformity with our philosophies, rather mould and fashion all our thinking into harmony with His truth.” If the writers had only followed this salutary principle, and kept close to what is written, we should have had no cause for criticism.

The sacrificial law designed to teach Substitution.

Lev.16:6.--Before Aaron could offer a sacrifice for the sins of others, he needed one for himself; hence it is plain that if he could not offer a sacrifice till he had offered one, the law was either an inexplicable tangle, or it taught substitution.

Lev.16:13.--The cloud of incense, not the blood, preserved Aaron from death. Hence, although the typical teaching is, no access to God apart from atonement by blood, yet, for Aaron's personal safety, incense is provided. Incense is a type of prayer (Rev.8:3,4). Prayer must rest upon a sacrifice; there is no drawing near without the mercy seat (Num.7:89, cf. Luke 18:13, Be propitious - be merciful - because of atonement), hence, the incense that preserved Aaron must have received its efficacy by virtue of a far greater sacrifice, namely, that of Christ (cf. Rom.3:24-27). It follows, then, that (a) One who needs a sacrifice cannot make one, and (b) One who can make one does not need one. Hence, it must be made by a righteous one for unrighteous ones, which, blessed be God, has been done (II Cor.5:21; I Pet.3:18).

The blemishlessness of the animal was typical of the righteousness required for transference in the true sacrifice.

The Joy of Faith.

We have heard of the "work of faith," and realize increasingly the necessity there is to remember that "faith, if it hath not works, is dead, being alone." We have heard that "faith worketh patience," and can understand even by our own small experience that as we realize by faith all the goodness, grace and glory laid up by virtue of redemption, patience is no effort, but is rather one of the precious fruits of faith.

We seem, however, to hear little of the "joy of faith." All Scripture is given by inspiration of God and is profitable. All Scripture comes to us with a demand for conformity to its teaching. What of the "joy of faith"? Can we have the real faith of the epistles if it is a joyless faith? We know the "faiths" or "creeds" of man's construction (even though framed with the Word in view) often become grievous burdens, and shackle those who subscribe to them as with fetters of iron. We want none of these joyless creeds, but still let us ask, Do we know experimentally "the joy of faith"?

The expression is found in Phil.1:25. The apostle writes, "I know that I shall abide and continue with you all, for your furtherance and joy of the faith." J. N. Darby in a note says, “Progress and joy go together, not 'progress--and joy in faith'.” Whatever the exact meaning of the apostle may be in this passage, the truth which we feel we must emphasize is that to believe the truth of the mystery, to realize the fact of acceptance in the Beloved, to know that we have been raised together and made to sit together in the heavenlies, in Christ, to know that we have been delivered out of the authority of darkness, and translated into the kingdom of the beloved Son of God, this "faith" surely must bring "joy" with it (the very writing of the words stirs our heart with joy), and a furtherance or progress in this faith, while it may deepen our love, increase our sympathy, perhaps cause us much conflict and many tears, yet seeing of Whom it speaks, and the untold riches of grace and glory that it reveals, cannot but bring with it joy.

Already in Rom.15:23, with reference to other things, the apostle had written, "Now the God of the hope (namely of verse 12, trust being hope) fill you with all joy and peace in believing." Or again, in II Cor.1:24, he had written, "Not for that we have dominion over your faith, but are fellow-workers of your joy, for by faith ye stand." "Joy" is a fruit of the Spirit mentioned early in the wondrous cluster, "love, joy, peace," &c. Peter was not a stranger to the "joy of faith," for speaking of the Lord Jesus Christ he said, "Whom having not seen, ye love, in Whom, though now ye see Him not, yet believing, ye rejoice with joy unspeakable, and full of glory."

What is the ground of this joy? A reading of either Philippians, or I Peter, will dispel the idea that external circumstances contributed to this joy of faith. In both epistles suffering and sorrow are emphatic, yet in the midst of it all there breathes a pure unconquerable joy. "Joy" and "rejoice" are keywords of Philippians.

One point of deepest significance, which must not pass unnoticed, arises out of the connection of the theme of the "joy of the faith" with the peculiar object of this epistle. "Philippians" assume that the blessed teaching of "Ephesians" is known and believed. On that basis the apostle speaks of working out our own salvation with fear and trembling (working out, not working for), and has in prospect a prize not attained but sought. It is not until he wrote II Timothy that he knew he had finished his course, and that henceforth there was laid up for him a crown. In Acts 20 he had said that he counted not his life dear unto himself, but that he desired to finish his course with joy. This therefore is the reason why in Philippians the apostle passes from salvation by faith, or justification by faith, to speak of the joy of faith, the anticipation of the crown or prize. The idea may be found in the well-known words of Matt. 25:--

> "Well done, good and faithful servant, thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things; enter thou into the joy of thy Lord."

This joy, connected as it is with reward for faithfulness, may be seen in Heb.12:1,2:--

> "Let us run with patience the race that is set before us, looking unto Jesus, the author and perfecter of faith, Who for the joy that was set before Him endured a cross, despising the shame, and is set down at the right hand of the throne of God."

When the apostle spoke of the fulfilling of his joy it was in respect to the good of others, and not of his own ease or comfort. "Fulfil ye my joy, that ye be likeminded, having the same love, being of one accord" (Phil.2:2). Or again in 4:1, "Therefore, my brethren, dearly beloved and longed for, my joy and crown, so stand fast in the Lord, my dearly beloved." Look at the first six occurrences in the prison epistles of the word "rejoice."

> "What then? Notwithstanding every way (and some of these ways were humanly hard to endure), whether in pretence or in truth: Christ is preached, and therein I do rejoice, yea, and will rejoice" (Phil.1:18).

Had the apostle thought of himself, thought upon the baseness and ingratitude that moved some in their preaching to suppose they thereby added affliction to his bonds, what cause would he have found for rejoicing? He had learned, however, a little of the mind that was in Christ Jesus, he thought of others rather than of himself. He who could say, "Christ shall be magnified in my body, whether it be by life or death," could rejoice in the fact that Christ was preached, even though some who preached sought his injury. Again, this utter regardlessness of self is manifested in his words of 2:17,18:-- > "Yea, and if I be offered upon the sacrifice and service of your faith, I joy and rejoice with you all. For this cause also do ye joy and rejoice with me."

What words are here! The apostle willing to be poured out as a drink offering over the sacrifice and service of their faith, and they, seeing his utter abandonment to the service and glory of his Lord, rejoicing together with him. Can earth furnish such a joy as this? A joy which no tears can blind, but which, the rather, through those tears will take on added lustre as the rainbow from the storm. His "finally" is still the same blessed theme, "Finally, my brethren, rejoice in the Lord" (3:1); "and again I say, rejoice" (4:4). If we rejoice in our attainments we shall fall into grievous error and sorrow. If we rejoice even in the increased light shed upon the Word we must remember the One Who alone is to be praised for the opened eye to see. Let our rejoicing be "in the Lord," then it will be real and full.

Are we joyful enough? We seek grace to manifest the fact that we are fellow-members of the One Body, we seek grace to exhibit all lowliness and meekness, to walk worthy of the calling, but let us not forget "joy." We may in times past have been misled into believing that a solemn face, a funereal air, a joyless, sunless, rigid demeanour, glorified the Lord. Thanks be to God for deliverance from such things. Let us be glad and rejoice in the Lord. The faith which is ours to hold is full enough to fill us all to the brim with "joy unspeakable." We need not be trivial, frivolous, or emotional to experience and shed abroad something of the radiance that should be evident in those who "rejoice in the Lord alway," and who have received the truth in the love of it, and the faith in some measure of its joy.

Moses "wist not that his face shone," but it was evident he had been with the Lord. So, in like manner, may it be ours to reflect something of the radiance of the "joy of faith."

BEREAN EXPOSITOR VOLUME 2 & 3.

The Limitations of Scripture.
pp.142-149

"For I am conscious of nothing in myself, nevertheless am I not justified. . . . So then do not judge anything before the time, until the Lord shall come. . . . Learn in us the lesson of not letting your thoughts go beyond the things that are written" (I Cor.iv.4-6).

We can imagine that some of our readers will read the title of this article with some misgivings, and we hasten to explain our meaning so as to avoid giving unnecessary pain or anxiety to those who love the Word of God. To say what we do not mean will help us to make clear what we do mean by the title. We do not mean to suggest the slightest distrust in the Word of God. We rejoice to be able out of a full heart to say that we believe "All Scriptures is God-breathed." We believe that not only is Scripture inspired in its general outline, but that divine inspiration extends to the very language and choice of individual words and phrases.

What do we mean then by the limitations of Scripture? We mean that the Scriptures nowhere claim that they contain the record of all God's purposes and ways, but that such glimpses of those unfathomable depths and infinite heights are given us as our finite capabilities will allow. If I turn to the writings of men I find that many of them deal with subjects which go entirely beyond the inspired limits of Scripture. Revelation starts with God as Creator, "In (the) beginning God created the heaven and the earth" (Gen.i:1). Man's theology is not content with this, it must probe into that over which God has drawn a veil. Man's theology and philosophy come to us and say, "God never had a beginning." Within the limits of human experience and reason that which never had a beginning does not exist. In vain we attempt to conceive otherwise. The blessed fact we would point out is that God Himself has never burdened our minds with such a statement. He Who on earth could say, "I have yet many things to say unto you, but ye cannot bear them now," has also, in the wider scope of the complete Scriptures, given us just so much as we are capable of understanding here.

Have we never felt when searching the Scriptures upon some theme the desire for some further explanation which God has been pleased to withhold? Is there no truth in the words of Zophar the Naamathite, "Canst thou by searching find out God?" Do we not need the rebuke of Job xxxvi.26, "Behold, God is great, and we know Him not, neither can the number of His years be searched out." Canst thou find out the Almighty unto perfection? In the highest revelation given to us are there not "unsearchable riches"? Are we not endeavouring to get to know the love of Christ which passeth knowledge? Did not the apostle, when concluding the revelation of God's ways with Israel, rightly says:--

> "O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! How unsearchable are His judgments, and His ways past finding out. For who hath known the mind of the Lord (knowledge)? Or who hath been His counsellor (wisdom). Or who hath first given to Him, and it shall be recompensed unto him again (riches)?"

Is there no suggestion of mystery in the destiny of such an one as Pharoah, or of Esau as recorded in Rom.ix.? Does not inspiration anticipate our natural desire to find out more than is revealed, and does it not meet it with the words, "Nay but, O man, who art thou that repliest against God? Shall the thing formed say to him that formed it, Why hast thou made me thus?" There are many who speak as though the Bible deals with eternity; it does no such thing. It begins and ends with time. It is the inspired revelation of some of God's ways and purposes relative to and during the AGES. What took place before the age times began we know very little, and of what will take place when these ages have run their allotted course we know comparatively nothing. Is it not wiser, better, and more befitting us as those who have been saved by grace, to recognize the wisdom and the kindness which underlie this withholding of information?

Think of the errors which have clustered around the wrong translation of aiõn. Instead of honestly rendering the word "age," the translators assumed that it must refer to eternity, and so wherever possible they rendered it by words which indicate eternity, and that which is everlasting. Has not the book of Ecclesiastes been written in order that we may be led to see the utter impossibility of pushing beyond that which it has pleased God to reveal to us? "He hath set the world (olam, the age) in their heart, so that no man can find out the work that God maketh from the beginning to the end" (Eccles.iii.11). Is there no word for us here? Are we quite sure that we, if taught by the Spirit of God, can hope to find out the work that God maketh from the beginning to the end? Some of God's children appear to think so. With all our heart we sympathize with them. Problems press hard upon us all. Believing implicitly in the full inspiration of Scripture, and believing, moreover, that outside its sacred pages there is found no light upon these matters, many have come to the conclusion that by prayerful painstaking study, by careful collocation, the whole range of God's purposes will at length be discovered. Indeed this is no longer a supposition. Many of our readers will have read already articles from the pens of earnest Bible students who believe that they have pieced the whole together, and who do not hesitate to teach us what is to take place after Satan, and those whose names are not found written in the Book of Life, are cast into the Lake of Fire. At this point exposition ceases, and inference enters. There is no written revelation given us as to anything happening to those who are thus consigned to the second death. True, passages of tremendous import are brought to bear upon the subject, but it is only by way of deduction. This immediately puts the whole subject beyond the limits of inspiration, and we distrust our own hearts too much to allow ourselves to be drawn beyond the divine limits.

When the reader opens the sacred volume he soon becomes aware that much must have taken place which is unrecorded. He can discover by what is written in Isa.xlv.18 that the earth was not created "without form and void," but that it became so. He can further discover that "the world that then was, being overflowed with water, perished" (II Pet.iii.5,6), but he will not find recorded the many details which his natural mind would lead him to enquire into. In the third chapter of Genesis the Serpent, who is afterwards discovered to be Satan, is introduced without any explanation as to how he came to be in the condition of enmity against God that we find to be the case. The Scriptures reveal glimpses into the exalted rank, awful ambition, and fearful fall of Satan, but why he was thus allowed to sin and all the many problems of the philosopher regarding the origin of evil remain unsolved.

Is it for us, when Scripture is silent, to attempt to force an answer by turning to the oracles of philosophy and human reason? If God has hidden, shall we not rather bow the knee in submission? Must we know all? Is there no room for faith? Are not the words of Job xlii.1-6 a more fitting attitude of mind? Job was troubled by the problem of evil. His friends sought to administer comfort, but in vain. He never received an answer to the problem. All that we can learn is recorded by James, "that the Lord is very pitiful, and of tender mercy."

There are many expressions in Ecclesiastes which teach us that a calm rest in the Lord, whether we fully understand all His ways or not, is His will for us here. "God shall judge the righteous and the wicked, for there is a time THERE for every purpose and for every work" (Eccles.iii.17). "Surely oppression maketh a wise man mad" (Eccles.vii.7). Those who fail to see that God's purpose is over all must, when they contemplate the oppression on every hand, feel driven almost to desperation, but the consciousness that though HERE evil prospers, there is a time THERE for every purpose and for every work, this will keep us in the right attitude before God. The reason of the dissatisfaction of the writer of Ecclesiastes is recorded in vii.25-29. It is written as an example and a warning. He did not abide by what was written; no, he would find out "the reason of things." What did he find? He found, by a bitter experience that wrecked his whole career, that which he could have known by what had been written for his guidance in the Proverbs. In those proverbs written for the guidance of the young Solomon we read again and again warnings about the flattering woman. Solomon had given to him, in Prov.xxxi.10-31, a description of the woman God would have him choose for his wide. Instead of this he wanted to know by experience the "wickedness of folly," and he says:--

> "I find more bitter than death the woman whose heart is snares and net, and her hands as bands" (Eccles.vii.26).
> "Behold this I have found, saith the preacher, counting one by one to find out the account, which yet my soul seeketh, but I find not: one man among a thousand have I found; but a woman among all those I not found" (Eccles.vii.27,28).

Poor Solomon! We see him with his "three score queens and four score concubines, and virgins without number" (Song of Sol.vi.8) still unsatisfied (I Kings xi.3 reveals the fact that Solomon had 700 wives and 300 concubines, making a thousand in all). What a pitiable object lesson! In the last chapter the preacher gives the "conclusion of the whole matter."

> "Fear God, and keep His commandments: for this is the whole (duty) of man. For God shall bring every work into judgment, with every secret thing whether it be good, or whether it be evil (Eccles.xii.13,14).

All the searching, reasoning and speculating led him no further into truth, but rather entangled him in confusion. Believers to-day, under an entirely different dispensation, and with the added advantage of a complete Bible, are equally frail and human, and the moment we leave what is written for deductions based upon our own limited and prejudiced observations, we too must inevitably make shipwreck. Solomon failed, even though he retained the wisdom which was given him by God. Are we wiser than Solomon when we venture beyond the written Word? We are so conscious of our limited knowledge in view of these tremendous themes, that we dare not assume finality in any one particular doctrine. Our only hope is to keep absolutely loyal to what God had said, and to remember that the moment we go beyond and supplement God's revelation by our deductions and theories, the moment we criticize His right to hide as well as to reveal, that moment we embark on a voyage chartless and rudderless, saved from shipwreck only by a miracle of grace.

Yet one more consideration. In Dan.x.21 and xi.2 there is a statement which is worthy of careful study.

> "And I will shew thee that which is noted in the Scripture of truth."
> "And now will I shew thee the truth."

The angel proceeds to give a most marvellously detailed account, first of the events which were about to take place within a comparatively short time of this announcement, and then of the yet future events of the time of the end, or as he says in Dan.x.14, "Now I am come to make thee understand what shall befall thy people in the latter days." The point to which we would direct the reader's attention is that what the angel came to tell Daniel was already "noted (writing, v.24,25; sign, vi.8,9) in the Scripture of truth." What Scripture? The events foretold in Dan.xi. are not found written in any of the Scriptures which had been given up to the time of Daniel. If this be so, the expression suggests the idea that there may be Scriptures of truth to which the angels have access, and that the Scriptures which we possess contain selections, given by God at different intervals, from that heavenly scroll which contains possibly ever so much more than we can as yet grasp. The angels do not know everything. Principalities and powers are learning now, through the church, the manifold wisdom of God.

We certainly do not possess a complete account of all God's purposes. Dan.xi. shews us that He knew fully, and had recorded in the Scriptures to which the angel had access the doings of the kings of Persia and of Greece. We are sure that His knowledge was not limited in the least, and that He knew the complete course of the history of Greece and Persia, although the Scriptures we have received do not treat of their histories beyond the scope of the particular purpose for which they have been written. Our Bible centres around Israel and Jerusalem. Whenever a nation came into touch with Israel, they came within the scope of revelation. Is it not certain that the One who wrote the history of Israel from start to finish could write the history of England or France equally as well? Certainly, and for aught we know the Scriptures of truth from which the angel took the small portion given in Dan.xi. recorded the rise and fall of the Roman Empire, and the complete histories of all the nations of the earth.

At once we see how limited the Scriptures really are, and that by divine appointment. There are lines of truth which enter the sacred record in Genesis which commenced a long way back before the record of Genesis begins. When we read that Satan abode not in the truth, we have a statement which we believe, but we are all only too conscious that the revelation is also exceedingly limited. We do not know anything of Satan's sin or circumstances; if it had been necessary and right for us to have known, the Lord could have given us a most graphic and detailed account. Ezek.xxviii.17 suggests that by pride he fell. The lesson is clear, but details which would minister to our curiosity are withheld. When the risen Lord spoke His wondrous words to the disciples, as recorded in Luke xxiv., we read that He began at Moses and the Prophets (verse 27). He could have begun much earlier. He could have told of the time when Satan fell, and even have given definite instructions regarding the many problems upon which the minds of men have speculated for all time. He could have settled in a few words the problem of the introduction, permission and purpose of evil. We are not told that He did any such thing, but "beginning at Moses and all the Prophets, He expounded (or interpreted) unto them in all the Scriptures the things concerning Himself."

From our reading of the Word we have come to see that eternity is nowhere its theme. The Bible is entirely taken up with the purpose of the ages. Even then we have to see that the Bible largely passes over much that we would like to know within the limits even of the ages, and focuses our attention first upon the chosen people of Israel, and for a short space upon the church of the present dispensation. Its object is not so much to explain all to us, but to guide us during this our pilgrimage with the happy knowledge that in resurrection glory we shall have time and opportunity to become acquainted with the wider revelation of God's purpose and ways.

Let us not attempt to force back the roll beyond the appointed limits. Let us be content to say of some things that we do not know, because God has not told us. We shall be more pleasing to Him by so doing, than if we take the responsibility upon ourselves of completing the revelation which He has purposely left unfinished. Once more we would remark that in all that we have said we desire it to be understood that we are not questioning or doubting God's Holy Word, but rather bow before His sovereignty, acknowledging equally the sovereign wisdom that lies behind the withholding of much that we might have expected to be written.

Let us keep close to what is written. Let us be content with what God has said, and if some lines of truth appear to conflict, let us not attempt to reconcile them, for the very attempt savours of unbelief, but let us be assured that when we see the complete purpose unfolded, all will be perfect and harmonious, and transcend the highest flight of our present imaginations.

The Ministry of Paul
Its relation to dispensational truth
His Conversion

"It pleased God. . . . to reveal His Son in me" (Gal. i. 15, 16).

pp. 2-7

It has been our endeavour during the last few years to emphasize the claims of the apostle Paul upon believers of the present time; not that Paul is anything of himself, but because to him was given the dispensation of the mystery (Eph. iii. 2-10).

In the endeavour rightly to divide the Word of truth we are sure to have difficulties, one great reason being that centuries of neglect and tradition have left us prejudiced in favour of a system foreign to the teaching of Paul, and further, the low spiritual state of the church as a whole has rendered it incapacitated for the reception of the mystery (I Cor. iii. 1-3).

Those who have had the eyes of their heart enlightened (Eph. i. 18), still find many difficulties and problems, which we must all expect while in the flesh, and among the many causes of difficulty is the fact that the ministry of Paul has a two-fold aspect; in one case he is seen severed from the teaching of the twelve, while in another he is found working in harmony with them. His epistles, covering a space of some sixteen years, are not confined to one period, some epistles being written while he worked in fellowship with Jerusalem, and some being written after Israel was set aside and Paul was a prisoner at Rome.

The book of the Acts records the conversion and early labours of the apostle Paul, so let us turn to the book to learn something more concerning this wonderful ministry. Three cities constitute the three turning points of dispensational interest in the Acts, viz., Jerusalem, Antioch, and Rome. Two ministries occupy the bulk of the record, those of Peter and Paul. Peter's ministry commences at Jerusalem and ends (so far as the record is concerned) with imprisonment. Paul's definite ministry commences at Antioch and ends (so far as the record is concerned) with his imprisonment at Rome.

The Acts commences with "the Jew first" and closes with the Jew set aside. The opening and closing verses are worthy of careful study:--

A | i. 1 - 11. | a | Christ teaching concerning the kingdom of God. \ The Jew
b | "Wilt thou restore the kingdom to Israel?" / prominent
B | i. 12 - xii. Peter's ministry and imprisonment.
B | xiii. - xxvii. Paul's ministry and imprisonment.
A | xxviii. 25 - 31. | a | Paul preaching concerning the kingdom of God. \ The Jew
b | "Salvation of God sent to the Gentiles." / set aside

It will be seen that the Acts opens with the Lord Jesus giving instructions to the apostles concerning the kingdom of God. In answer to their enquiry as to the restoration of the kingdom to Israel, He bids them tarry at Jerusalem until they be endued with power from on high. The closing section reveals Paul as a prisoner at Rome, the final witness to Israel being given, Isaiah vi. 10 quoted for the last time, the door of the kingdom shut to Israel, and the present dispensation of the mystery ushered in.

It is not our purpose in this article to consider the book of the Acts, so we will consider without further introduction the ministry of the apostle, and its bearing upon dispensational truth. The apostle Paul is first introduced upon page of Scripture at the time of the death of Stephen. Stephen seems to have anticipated the teaching given to Paul. The accusation made against him was:--

> "This man ceaseth not to speak blasphemous words against this holy place and the law, for we have heard him say that this Jesus of Nazareth shall destroy this place, and shall change the customs which Moses delivered us" (Acts vi. 14).

This same charge was preferred against Paul in after years:--

> "They are informed of these that thou teachest all the Jews which are among the Gentiles to forsake Moses, saying that they ought not to circumcise their children, neither to walk after the customs" (Acts xxi. 21).

The infuriated Jews who stoned Stephen for his faithfulness found a champion for their traditions in the young man Saul of Tarsus:--

> "The witnesses laid down their clothes at a young man's feet, whose name was Saul; and they stoned Stephen. . . . and Saul was consenting unto his death" (Acts vii. 58 - viii. 1).

What sort of man was this who would consent to the death of such a saint? The secret of his blind, ignorant cruelty was "a zeal for God, but not according to knowledge." Many of the Pharisees knew that Jesus was the Christ. They had said, "This is the heir, come let us kill him." Paul, however, tells us that what he did, he did it "ignorantly and in unbelief" (I Tim. i. 13).

To the English reader, separated by centuries from the period of the Gospels, the term "Pharisee" has taken upon itself a colouring more or less traditional. All Pharisees were not alike, however, even as all Scribes or all Priests were not alike in their zeal or character. The Talmud tells us of seven classes of Pharisees. It speaks of the Shechemite Pharisee, who obeyed for self interest; the tumbling Pharisee (nifki), who paraded humility; the bleeding Pharisee (kinai), who, rather than risk outraging his modesty by seeing a woman, risked a broken skull by walking with his eyes shut; the mortar Pharisee (medukia), who covered his eyes, as with a mortar, for similar reasons; the timid Pharisee, who was actuated by motives of fear; the tell-me-another-duty-and-I-will-do-it Pharisee; and the seventh class, the Pharisee from love. Saul of Tarsus was of the sixth order enumerated above, for in Gal. i. 14 we read:--

> "I was going ahead (a metaphor taken from a ship at sea), in Judaism above many of my co-temporaries in mine own nation, being more vehemently a zealot for the traditions handed down from my fathers."

The choice of the word zelõtes confirms this. The Zelõtai were a sect which possessed great attachment to the Jewish institutions, and undertook to punish, without trial, those guilty of violating them. It was this bigoted or fanatical temper which moved the young man Saul to associate with the murderers of Stephen, and to personally conduct a campaign, with the idea of exterminating the heresy of the Nazarenes. Such was the character of the "chosen vessel" who was destined, by grace, to shake traditionalism and legalism to their fall, and to stand alone with God, preaching "the faith which once he destroyed" (Gal. i. 23).

To stay here, however, would be but to give a one-sided view of the character of Saul of Tarsus. Writing by inspiration of God, in the full light of his acceptance in the Beloved, he says concerning his past, "Touching the righteousness which is in the law, blameless" (Phil. iii. 6).

According to the teaching of the rabbis, there were 248 commands and 365 prohibitions of the Mosaic law, which formed part of the "Hedge of the law." These laws and prohibitions, without exception, in letter as well as spirit, and with the almost infinite number of inferences which were deducted from such laws, were to be obeyed. This was the blameless righteousness of the law. The belief was current that if only one person could attain unto this perfection for but one day, the Messiah would come, and the glory of Israel be ensured. This hope then, together with a nature which must spend and be spent upon that to which for time being the possessor is attached, was the force which actuated Saul of Tarsus, and through him breathed out threatenings and slaughter.

In eight separate passages does Scripture refer to the terrible persecutions with which Saul of Tarsus was prominently associated. It is written, "He made havoc of the church." The word used here is that used in the LXX of Psalm lxxx. 13 of the uprooting by wild boars. He dragged men and women to judgment and prison; he devastated in Jerusalem those that called upon the name of Jesus. In the epistle to the Galatians the apostle tells us how he persecuted the early saints beyond measure. To the Corinthians (I Cor. xv. 9), and to the Philippians (Phil. iii. 6), he recounts with sorrow how he persecuted the church. To the day of his death he never forgot that grace which had changed a blasphemer, a persecutor, and injurious bigot (I Tim. i. 13), the very chief of sinners, into the chiefest of the apostles. Truly, he "persecuted this way unto the death" (Acts xxii. 4).

How fully he was permitted to enter into the sufferings and afflictions of the faith the Scriptures amply testify. Alone, forsaken by all earthly friends, he was permitted to drain to the dregs the bitter cup of religious persecution. Stoned and left for dead, beaten with rods on five occasions by the order of some ruler of the synagogue, imprisoned, betrayed, suffering the anguish of hunger, thirst, nakedness, shipwreck, and finally martyrdom, he fulfilled the opening words of his commission, "I will show him how great things he must suffer for My name's sake" (Acts ix. 16).

As Saul of Tarsus, or Paul the apostle, this man was not content to do things half-heartedly. His zeal had for the time stamped out the activity at least of the heresy of the Nazarenes in Jerusalem, but from the other cities news arrived that this pernicious weed had taken root. Unsated by the blood of the saints shed in Jerusalem, he desired to vindicate his Pharisaic claims by uprooting the Christian faith in the distant city of Damascus. Armed with the necessary warrant from the high priest, the persecutor started upon his journey of 150 miles in a frame of mind expressed in the unparalleled term, "breathing out threatenings and slaughter." How long the journey took we do not know; but taking the nature of the roads, the climate, and the eastern method of travelling, authorities have estimated that it occupied the better part of a week.

What were the thoughts of this man during this week's travel? Nothing is recorded in the Scriptures to tell us, except the words of the Searcher of hearts, "It is hard for thee to kick against the pricks" (or ox goads). Saul, during that fateful journey, had been "kicking against the goads," as the rebellious oxen do in the plough. The whirl of the city, the excitement of the persecutions and scourgings gave place to the isolated meditation of the Damascus journey. The ox goads against which Saul had kicked were of a similar nature, though perhaps of much deeper intensity, to those which many believers and readers of this little witness have had.

Could it be possible that such men as Peter and Stephen were right, and with the whole Sanhedrin were wrong? Pride rose against such a thought; those who spoke against the law and the temple must certainly be accursed. Thus would he reason; he could not give expression to these thoughts to those with him, for that would be suicidal. Did the angel face of Stephen haunt his steps along the road? We know not. Was Gamaliel, his teacher, right in even suggesting that such action as his might prove to be fighting against God? We cannot tell. What we do know is this. Spurred on by the goads of an uneasy conscience, Saul urged his followers to abandon the wonted noon-day rest and press on to the city of their desires.

Then, suddenly, the persecutor was changed into the preacher, the infuriated bigot into the apostle of grace. A light, which eclipsed the Syrian noon-day sun as the gospel did the traditions so tenaciously held by Saul, shone about them. He was struck to the earth; something awful had happened. One man alone knew its solemn meaning and intelligently heard the words from heaven; into the darkened heart of Saul of Tarsus had entered "the light of the knowledge of the glory of God, in the face of Jesus Christ." God had revealed His Son in him. That was the turning-point of his life, for he had seen the Lord.

After the blinding flash of heavenly light there came a voice from heaven speaking in the Hebrew tongue, saying, "Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou Me, it is hard for thee to kick against the goads?" In answer to the trembling cry "Who art Thou Lord?" the voice replied, "I am Jesus of Nazareth, whom thou persecutest." Oh wondrous revelation! Had the voice said "I am Israel's Messiah," or "I am the Son of God," the apostle would have denied the charge, but in the revelation from the heavenly glory that he was persecuting Jesus of Nazareth, and that He indeed was the Lord, the Messiah of Israel, all his hopes, his pride, his tenacious hold upon the traditions of the elders, his self-righteousness and meritorious zeal, all vanished and left him naked and destitute.

What are the few words which Saul as a believer shall utter? They form a key note to his after life, "Lord, what wilt Thou have me to do?" From henceforth he served the Lord Christ; form this time onward for him to live was Christ. He had fallen to the earth a proud, persecuting fanatic; he rose a humble and gracious follower of Christ. How different to what he had dreamed was his actual entry into Damascus and departure therefrom. No longer breathing threatenings and slaughter, but breathing prayers and supplications, for it is written, "Behold, he prayeth!" Not leaving the city with the trophies of his inquisition and the applause of the orthodox, but let out of the city by stealth, in a basket from the wall! After the darkness and the visit of Ananias came the light, for "there fell from his eyes as it had been scales."

The importance of this man's conversion and commission cannot be under-estimated without imperilling the truth committed to him. In our next article we hope to take up the varying commissions of this apostle to the Gentiles, and to show how the right appreciation of his ministry illuminates the Word of truth. Till then, may we all realize in ourselves increasingly the grace that super-abounds.

The Ministry of Paul
Its relation to dispensational truth
His Commission #1.

"A chosen vessel. . . . to bear My name" (Acts ix. 15).

pp. 14-20

In our last article we sought to examine the record of Saul of Tarsus. We now seek to understand his commission as an apostle.

We have already called attention to Acts ix. No record is given us there of what the Lord told Paul other than that he was to go into the city of Damascus and there receive instruction. No word is recorded of the feelings of this stricken man during the three days' blindness in the house of Judas. It is not at all improbable that we get a reminiscence of his feelings in Rom. vii. At the end of Rom. vii. we hear the agonizing prayer, "Who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" In Acts ix. 11 it is written, "Behold, he prayeth"!

In answer to this prayer the Lord sent a certain disciple named Ananias. Ananias was at first loath to go to the man who had persecuted and ravaged the church, but the Lord said unto him, "Go thy way, for he is a chosen vessel unto Me, to bear My name before the Gentiles, and kings, and the children of Israel; for I will shew him how great things he must suffer for My name's sake." The one emphatic note in the commission is the name of the Lord. This name Paul was to bear, and for this name he was to suffer. Nothing is said here about apostleship, preaching or teaching, but just bearing and suffering in relation to that very name he had so intensely hated. From henceforth the name of, "The Hung" (the name of reproach heaped upon Christ by the Rabbis) was his glory. The "Crucified" was henceforth Master and Lord.

We are allowed a glimpse of Saul in Damascus and we can see that the same zealous, consuming temperament is there, but sanctified and mellowed by saving grace and overwhelming mercy. We see in Paul the apostle, not only the impetuous eagerness and vehemence of Saul the Pharisee, but we discern something to which Saul was stranger—humility. That distrust of self and of his gifts and powers, that consciousness of some humiliating appearance, the shrinking and tender spirit that pervades his earnest messages, all tell of the marvellous change. "And straightway he preached in the synagogues Jesus (R.V.), that He is the Son of God." The name of Jesus was the object of his uncovered hatred, the spring of his converted effort, and the cause of the suffering which he bore.

The Jews at Damascus tolerated such men as Ananias, but they sought to kill such as Paul. One able writer has said:--

> "It was, throughout life, Paul's unhappy fate to kindle the most virulent animosities, because, though conciliatory and courteous by temperament, he yet carried into his arguments that intensity and downrightness that awakens dormant opposition. A languid controversialist will always meet with languid tolerance, but any controversialist whose honest belief in his own doctrines make him terribly in earnest, may count on a life embittered by the anger of those on whom he has forced the disagreeable task of re-considering their own assumptions. . . . Out of their own Scriptures, by their own methods of exegesis, in their own style of dialectics, by the interpretation of prophecies of which they did not dispute the validity, he simply confounded them. He could now apply the same principles which in the mouth of Stephen he had found it impossible to resist."

Take the word "name" in Acts ix. above, and notice the witness of the word:--

Verse 14. Saul has authority to bind all who call on the name.
Verse 15. He is chosen to bear the name.
Verse 16. He is to suffer for the name.
Verse 21. He destroys those who call on this name.
Verse 27. At Damascus he preaches boldly in the name of Jesus.
Verse 29. At Jerusalem he speaks boldly in the name of the Lord Jesus.

When besought not to go up to Jerusalem Paul said, "What mean ye to weep and break mine heart? For I am ready not to be bound only, but also to die at Jerusalem for the name of the Lord Jesus" (Acts xxi. 13). When recounting before King Agrippa the days of his unregeneracy, he prefaces the account of his violence by the words, "I verily thought with myself, that I ought to do many things contrary to the name of Jesus of Nazareth" (Acts xxvi. 9). The very memory of the persecutions which he had directed against the believers was rendered odious to him ever after by the recollection of the words from heaven, "I am Jesus Whom thou persecutest."

In Rom. i. 5 he tells of his apostleship with a loving touch, "for His name." The carnal believers at Corinth were loved, for they called upon "the name of Jesus Christ our Lord"; and when the apostle would beseech them to be "perfectly joined together," he knows no term more powerful than, "by the name of our Lord Jesus Christ" (I Cor. i. 10). How he must have rejoiced as he wrote the words of Eph. i. 21, that Christ was raised above "every name that is named." How he must have looked forward to that day when, "in the name of Jesus every knee should bow" (Phil. ii. 10). Or, turning to the practical side, he could enter with all his heart into the exhortation of Col. iii. 17, "Whatsoever ye do in word or deed, do all in the name of the Lord Jesus."

His last recorded use of the word emphasizes the fact that that name has lost none of its power or its sweetness. "Let every one that nameth the name of Christ, depart from iniquity." The use of the word "name" in the epistles of the mystery which have reference to Christ is instructive.

A | Eph. i. 21. Every name that is named. Resurrection (noun and verb).
B | Eph. v. 20. Giving thanks. . . . in the name. Thanksgiving.
C | Phil. ii. 9. The name above every name. Exaltation.
C | Phil. ii. 10. In the name of Jesus. . . . bow. . . . confess. Exaltation.
B | Col. iii. 17. Do all in the name. . . . giving thanks. Thanksgiving.
A | II Tim. ii. 19. Nameth the name. Resurrection (noun and verb).

In this last reference Paul seems to look back to Acts ix. 15, and the connection between the "vessel" and the "name" (II Tim. ii. 19-21) is suggestive.

Ananias was told that Saul was to bear the name of the Lord Jesus before the Gentiles and kings and the children of Israel. The word "Gentile" is used in a bad sense in the two occurrences in Acts prior to chapter ix. "Herod, and Pontius Pilate, with the Gentiles" (Acts iv. 27). "The Gentiles, whom God drave out before the face of our fathers" (Acts vii. 45). The Jew is prominent in the early chapters of the Acts, and it is not until the stoning of Stephen that the first step Gentileward is definitely taken.

The persecution in Jerusalem sent the believers into Judea and Samaria, where they preached the Word, but this did not in any sense indicate that the scattered believers preached to the Gentiles, such a thing was undreamed of by them. Should any reader object to this statement of fact, he has only to read Acts xi. 19:--

> "Now they which were scattered abroad upon the persecution that arose about Stephen, travelled as far as Phenice and Cyprus., and Antioch, preaching the Word to none but unto the Jews only" (The "Grecians" of vi. 1, ix. 29, and xi. 20 refer to Greek-speaking Jews, Hellenists. They used the Septuagint instead of the original Hebrew).

Peter and his associates were "astonished" to find that the holy spirit was poured out upon Cornelius and his household; the ministry of Peter was strictly to the circumcision (Gal. ii. 7, 8), the case of Cornelius, being exceptional and for a special purpose. Cornelius, however, was not a Gentiles in the sense of the word as applied to Paul's apostleship, Cornelius was a "Proselyte of the Gate," he gave alms and prayed, and was held in good report "among all the nation of the Jews" (Acts x. 1, 2, 22).

It was reserved for Saul of Tarsus, a man who was an Hebrew of the Hebrews, who would sooner have died than associate with a dog of a Gentile, to be the chosen vessel of grace to the barbarian and Scythian, the bond and the free, the Greek as well as the Jew. That which would have been looked upon as his lowest degradation is looked upon as his highest glory.

> "I am the apostle of the Gentiles, I magnify mine office" (Rom. xi. 13).
> "That I should be the minister of Jesus Christ to the Gentiles" (Rom. xv. 16).
>
> "He that wrought effectually in Peter to the apostleship of the circumcision, the same was mighty in me toward the Gentiles" (Gal. ii. 8).
>
> "Unto me. . . . is this grace given, that I should preach among the Gentiles the unsearchable riches of Christ" (Eph. iii. 8).
> "I am ordained a preacher and an apostle (I speak the truth in Christ and lie not), a teacher of the Gentiles in faith and truth" (I Tim. ii. 7).

The last reference to the Gentiles in the Acts is in that solemn passage, where, quoting the sixth of Isaiah to the elders of Israel at Rome, Paul closed the door of the kingdom, and opened the door of the mystery. "The salvation of God is sent unto the Gentiles, and they will hear it" (Acts xxviii. 28). Henceforth he was the "prisoner of Jesus Christ for you Gentiles." In view of his approaching death, he wrote to Timothy his last message, thanking the Lord Who had stood with him and strengthened him to finish his course, that by him the preaching might be fully known, and that all the Gentiles might hear (II Tim. iv. 17). Have we thanked the Lord for His gift to men? He gave some apostles, and in Paul we have the chiefest sinner made to be the chiefest of the apostles, and the champion of grace.

Not only does the passage in Acts ix. tell us of Paul's commission to the Gentiles, but it also adds, "and kings." Paul, as we well know, was brought before king Agrippa, and nobly testified to the saving grace of the name of Christ. His appeal unto Caesar gave him audience with the emperor at Rome, and although we have no record of his witness, we feel sure that he delivered himself of his testimony in the power of the name of his Lord. That his witness was faithful is evidenced by that marvellous expression in Phil. iv. 22, "The saints salute you, chiefly they that are of Caesar's household." Saints in Caesar's household! Saints in the employ of that monster! How this rebukes us! If there could be saints there, saints can be found anywhere. Dear troubled brother or sister, your business, your home, your surroundings surely are not quite so bad as was the case of those slaves of Caesar. Let us take courage from their example.

The last clause of the commission which we will consider here is "and the children of Israel." One has but to read the record of the Acts, or the Epistles written during that period, to see how large a place Israel had in the heart of the apostle to the Gentiles. Such passages as Acts xiii. 14; xiv. 1; xvii. 2; xviii. 4, 9; xix. 8; xxvi. 20, and xxviii. 17 will demonstrate how faithful the apostle was to the terms of Rom. i. 16, "to the Jew first." The prominence given to the Jew by Paul in the early Epistles may be demonstrated as follows:--

Before Acts xxviii. (Six Epistles).		After Acts xxviii. (Six Epistles).
Jew	occurs 25 times.	Jew	occurs once. (neither Greek nor Jew).
Israel	14	Israel	twice. (Eph. ii. 12; Phil. iii. 5).
Israelite	3	Israelite	none.
Abraham	19	Abraham	none.
Occurrences	61	Total:	3.

Paul's peculiar dispensation of the grace of God to the Gentiles depended, humanly speaking, upon the foreseen defection of Israel, and had a gospel whose terms did not commend it to Jewish exclusiveness. This laid him open to many bitter attacks. His sensitiveness is everywhere apparent. They said his gospel was of his own invention, hence the moment he mentions it in Rom. i. 1, 2 he adds, "which He had before promised by His prophets in the Holy Scriptures;" so also in Rom. iii. 21. This accounts for the solemn introduction to Rom. ix.:--

> "I have great heaviness and continual sorrow in my heart for my brethren, my kinsmen, according to the flesh (for I used to wish myself to be a cursed thing from Christ)."

His own experience taught him to pity rather than to chide. His own experiences, typical of Israel in each case, figure also in Rom. x. 1-4 and xi. 1, 2. The next few verses of Rom.9 bear witness to pre-eminent position of Israel.

Israel's dispensational privileges (Rom. ix. 3-5).

A | According to the flesh (kata sarka). Brethren.
B | Who are Israelites (descendants of Jacob).
C | To whom the sonship.
D | Glory.
E | Covenants.
E | Legislation.
D | Service.
C | Promises.
B | Whose are the fathers (Abraham, Isaac, Jacob).
A | According to the flesh (kata sarka). The Messiah.

The time for the cutting down of the olive tree of Israel's favour was seen by the apostle to be approaching nearer and nearer. He tells us, however, that God's purposes are by no means thwarted. Israel shall yet be righteous, even though but a remnant believed during the transitional period:--

> "For the gifts and calling of God are not subject to a change of mind; for as indeed ye were formerly not believing in God, but now have been objects of mercy, by reason of the unbelief of others (Jews), so they too have now become unbelieving, that they may also obtain mercy, by reason of the mercy shown to you" (Rom. xi. 29-31).

Here the apostle witnesses to mystery of grace and magnificent mercy beyond our wildest dreams. Truly, our God delighteth in mercy. The Jews gave occasion for greater mercy by their unbelief, the Gentiles by their faith. The promises are yet to be fulfilled. God hath not cast away His foreknown people. All Israel shall yet be saved, ungodliness shall be turned away from Jacob. "As regards the gospel, they are enemies on your (Gentiles) account, but as regards the election, beloved because of the fathers" (xi. 28). Here are God's own words. Here are the words of the One Who is working out His mighty purpose. "Blinded," "hardened," "broken off," "scattered," wanderers for centuries, yet "beloved because of the fathers." They were not forgotten, "for God hath shut up all in unbelief;" Why? Orthodoxy would say, "In order to pour out upon them His wrath," but God says, "that He might show mercy upon all"—and the "all" is the same in each case. No wonder, in such a sea of grace, the apostle should feel out of his depth. It was beyond him, he could not trace it out, but he rejoiced in it, and added his hearty, Amen:--

A | "Oh the depth of the riches (riches),
B | both of the wisdom (wisdom),
C | and knowledge of God (knowledge),
D | how unsearchable are His judgments (unsearchable),
D | and His ways past finding out (untraceable).
C | For who hath known the mind of the Lord? (knowledge).
B | or who hath been His counseller? (wisdom).
A | or who first gave to Him and it shall be recompensed unto him again? (riches).

for of Him, and through Him, and to Him, are all things, to Him be glory for ever and ever, Amen" (Rom.11:33-36).

We must leave the final clause of the commission for consideration next time. Meanwhile, may many be stirred up to follow Paul in so far as he followed his Lord.

The Ministry of Paul
Its relation to dispensational truth
His Commission #2.

"I will show him how great things he must suffer for My name's sake" (Acts ix. 16).

pp. 43-50

In our last study of the ministry of Paul we finished at the clause which spoke of his testimony to the children of Israel. We would now seek to understand the second clause—the suffering for the sake of Christ's name. There is no word "great" in the passage, the expression is rather "how much," or "how many things," he must suffer. The word "must" is important. "It is necessary," "it must needs be" is the meaning (cf. John iii. 7, 14, 30). There was a Divine necessity that Paul suffer as well as preach, and he himself in his last epistle has written that all who will live godly in Christ Jesus shall suffer persecution.

The epistle that gives us an insight into the heart of the apostle more than any other is the second epistle to the Corinthians. The predominant note of this epistle is affliction or tribulation. In 1st Corinthians the apostle sought by the application of sound doctrine and sanctified argument to bring back the wayward Corinthians to the path of virtue; in 2nd Corinthians we find him maintaining with all the zeal of his nature his apostolic claims, so that this epistle becomes the most striking instance of what is the case more or less with all his writings, "a new philosophy of life poured forth, not through systematic treatises, but through occasional burst of human feelings." We shall find that the sufferings of Paul, as recorded in 2nd Corinthians, arose from several causes, among them that embittering source of affliction—misrepresentation.

Everything he did seemed to afford but fresh opportunity for the calumniator. Judaistic feeling ran very high at Corinth. Cepas was exalted at the expense of Paul. They said among themselves, "His letters are weighty and powerful, but his bodily presence is weak and his speech contemptible" (II Cor. x. 10). Why did not this Paul rectify the wrongs of the church as Peter had done in connection with Ananias and Sapphira? The fact that he refrained from receiving financial help was misinterpreted. What depth of feeling must there be in his words, "I will very gladly spend and be spent for you, though the more abundantly I love you, the less I am loved. But be it so. I did not burden you, nevertheless being crafty, I caught you with guile" (II Cor. xii. 15, 16). This insinuation he immediately repudiates, "Did I make a gain of you?"

Again, his apostolic authority was questioned. This was a matter of great delicacy and yet of superabounding importance. As we read, for example, the two opening chapters of Galatians, we realize as never before that the defence of Paul's claims to apostleship was nothing less than a defence of "the truth of the gospel." The "certain men which came down from Judea" could possibly produce their "letters of commendation," and "remember with advantage" before the Corinthians their personal acquaintances among the "pillars at Jerusalem." This Paul could not and would not do. He had not been appointed by the twelve. He had not received his authority from Jerusalem. The difficulty of proving his claim, to such a nature as Paul's, must indeed have been great. He tells them that they compel him to be a fool on his boasting:--

> "Are we beginning again to commend ourselves? or have we need, like some, of commendatory letters unto you, or from you?" (II Cor. iii. 1).
> "We commend not ourselves unto you, but give you occasion to glory on our behalf, that you may have somewhat to answer them which glory in appearance and not in heart. For whether we have been beside ourselves (they had said that he was demented), it hath been for God, or whether we are sober-minded (they had complained of the severe tone in his letters), it is for you, for the love of Christ constraineth us" (II Cor. v. 12-14).
> "Since ye seek a proof of Christ speaking in me, ... be trying yourselves whether ye are in faith, be putting yourselves to the test! or do ye not recognize yourselves (this uncharitable attitude had destroyed their vision), seeing that Jesus Christ is in you, unless perhaps ye fail in the testing. I hope however that ye shall come to know that we fail not in the testing" (II Cor. xiii. 3-6).

The way in which the other apostles were magnified to the detriment of Paul and his authority may be gathered from the strange colloquialism, tõn huperlian apostolõn, "the extra-super apostles" (II Cor. xi. 5). The indignation of this sarcastic title is levelled not at the twelve, but at those who sought to gain authority and to displace Paul by emphasizing the claims of the twelve at Jerusalem. The apostle, with many interjected disparagements of the cause of apparent boastfulness, lays before the Corinthians at least six different points wherein he compared favourably with the twelve, viz., in knowledge (xi. 5, 6), self-denial (7-21), privileges of birth and race (22), labours and sufferings (23-33), the pre-eminent character of his revelation (xii. 1-10), and the signs of his apostleship (11, 12). They are arranged as follows:--

A | xi. 5, 6. Not one whit behind the extra-super apostles in knowledge.
  B | xi. 7-21. Contrast with the false apostles and messengers of satan.
    C | xi. 22. Favourable comparison with their higher claims (birth and race).
    C | xi. 23-33. Favourable comparison by reason of superabounding sufferings.
  B | xii.1-10. Vision of such magnitude, that a messenger of satan is sent of buffet him.
A | xii. 11,12. Not one whit behind the extra-super apostles in miraculous signs.

One writer has said that 2nd Corinthians is the least systematic of all Paul's writings, yet, upon examination, the most impassioned and personal sections bear witness to that "inspiration of God" which lifts them above the words of man to the authoritative "thus saith the Lord."

Examining the structure more closely we find:--

A (II Cor. xi. 5, 6).—The apostle concedes that the other apostles may be his superiors in eloquence, but he yielded no point with regard to his knowledge. "And even if uncultured in my discourse, certainly not in my knowledge."

B (II Cor. xi. 7-21).—Other churches he had taken from readily (it wounded his sensitive nature to have to do it), but though he was in positive want among them he was not burdensome to anyone. "And in everything without burden unto you I kept myself—and will keep." This boast he declares no one shall silence, not because he loved them not (God knew), but that he may cut off any handle or occasion from those who seek it.

The false apostles had pointed out the fact that they did not require support, and the apostle declares that so far as that is concerned, they meet on equal terms. How loathsome to such a high spirit as Paul must all this self-vindication have appeared. "What I am saying, not according to the Lord am I saying, but as to foolishness, in this my boastful confidence! Since many are boasting after the flesh, I also will boast" (xi. 17, 18). He continues by saying that since the Corinthians were so discreet, they would surely tolerate this boasting of a mere fool, since they tolerated such as enslaved them, or devoured them, or took them in, or who assumed the most arrogant pretensions, or who even smote them! "By way of disparagement I am speaking; it shows how weak and foolish I was in not adopting similar tactics. Yet, when one comes to compare their foolish claims with mine (continues the apostle), I can meet them. Whereas in whatsoever any one dareth (in foolishness I speak), I also dare."

C (II Cor. xi. 22).—So far as birth and race privileges were concerned, Paul was their equal:--

"Are they Hebrews? I also.
Are they Israelites? I also.
Are they seed of Abraham? I also."

C (II Cor. xi. 23-33).—When it came however to that ministry which resulted from grace rather than race, the apostle could say, "I something more." Then follows one of the most wonderful biographies ever written. The sufferings of the martyrs with all their harrowing details cannot compare with the sufferings of this chosen vessel. Besides, we know that this list is but a fragment; how much and how many things he suffered, "that day" alone will disclose:--

> "In labours more abundant, in stripes above measure, in prisons more frequent, in death oft. Of the Jews five times received I forty stripes save one. Thrice was I beaten with rods, once was I stoned. Thrice I suffered shipwreck (this is before Acts xxvii.). A night and a day I have been in the deep. In journeyings often, in perils of waters, in perils of robbers, in perils of mine own countrymen, in perils by the heathen, in perils in the city, in perils in the wilderness, in perils in the sea, in perils among false brethren. In weariness and painfulness, in watchings often, in hunger and thirst, in fastings often, in cold and nakedness. Beside those things that are without, that which cometh upon me daily, the care of all the churches" (II Cor. xi. 23-33).

What depths are here! It seems that the apostle would have these Corinthians see that the anxiety for the churches, and for their's among them, was harder to bear than the perils and dangers which were without. He seems to have had this external and internal trouble before him when he wrote:--

> "For, even when we came into Macedonia, no relief at all had our flesh, but in every way we in tribulation, without were figthings, within were fears, but He who encourageth them that are brought low, encouraged us, even God, by the presence of Titus" (II Cor. vii. 5, 6).

"If to boast is needful," adds the apostle, "in the things that concern my weakness will I boast," and then he recounts his ignominious escape from Damascus. This event seems to have impressed itself upon his mind, for his gives this special prominence, after mentioning the long list of perils and sufferings encountered afterwards.

B (II Cor. xii. 1-11).—The apostle now turns to the visions and revelations which he received, and here, once again, suffering was an inevitable result:--

> "On behalf of myself will I not boast, save in my weakness. . . . but I forbear, lest anyone should reckon unto me above what he beholdeth me to be, or heareth from me, even by the exceeding greatness of the revelations. Wherefore, lest I should be unduly lifted up, there was given to me a stake in the flesh, a messenger of satan that he might buffet me. . . . most gladly, therefore, will I boast in my weakness, that the power of Christ may spread a tent over me. wherefore, I take pleasure in weaknesses, in insults, in necessities, in persecutions, in pressure of circumstances, for Christ's sake, for when I am weak, then am I strong. I have become foolish, ye compelled me. I, in fact, ought by you to have been commended" (II Cor. xii. 5-11).

A (II Cor. xii. 11, 12).—

> "For not a whit have I become behind the extra-super apostles; even if I am nothing. . . . the signs indeed of an apostle were wrought among you in all patience, both in signs, and wonders, and in mighty works" (II Cor. xii. 11, 12).

In connection with his claim to be "an ambassador for Christ," we find the same undercurrent of opposition:--

> "In everything commending ourselves as God's ministers, in much endurance, in tribulations, in necessities, in pressure of circumstances, in stripes, in imprisonments, in tumults, in toilings, in spells of sleeplessness, in fastings, in sanctity, in knowledge, in long suffering, in kindness, in holy spirit, in love unfeigned, in the word of truth, in the power of God; through the armour of righteousness on the right hand and left, through glory and dishonour, through ill report and good report; as deceivers, and yet true, as being ignored, and yet recognised, as dying, and behold we live; as being chastened, yet not being slain, as grieving, yet ever rejoicing, as destitute, yet making many rich, as having nothing, yet as having all things in full possession" (II Cor. vi. 4-10).

The apostle appeals to this outburst of feeling to show how indeed his mouth and his heart are opened and enlarged towards them, and urges them to give up the narrow jealousies, "straitened in their hearts' affections" (II Cor. vi. 12), to dissolve their unseemly unity with darkness and infidels, and, perfecting holiness in the fear of the Lord, let them "receive us, for no one have we wronged, no one have we corrupted, no one have we defrauded." All such are black calumnies, not repeated here to condemn, "for I have already told you that ye are in our heart to live and die together" (II Cor. vi. 13 - vii. 3).

Ever before the apostle is the desire to vindicate the sacred office which he held, and the truth committed unto him, yet at the same time to count himself as nothing. He was a chosen vessel, but an earthen vessel too. "We have this treasure in earthen vessels, that the surpassing greatness of the power may be of God, and not from ourselves." Weak in themselves, yet strong in the Lord, on every side:--

"pressed hard,	but not crushed, perplexed,	but not in despair,
persecuted,	but not abandoned,
flung down,	but not destroyed."

We may now be better able to appreciate the opening of this second epistle, with its emphasis upon tribulation and consolation:--

> "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of mercies, and God of all consolation, Who consoleth us in all our tribulation, that we may be able to console those who are in any tribulation by the consolation wherewith we ourselves are consoled by God" (II Cor. i. 3, 4).
> "For we do not wish you to be ignorant, brethren, as to our tribulation which happened in Asia, that exceedingly beyond power were we weighed down, so that we despaired even of life. But we ourselves, within ourselves, have had the sentence of death, that we might rest our confidence not upon ourselves, but upon God Who raiseth the dead" (II Cor. i. 8, 9).

Here is the key to the problem of Paul's sufferings, all were to direct his attention and hope to resurrection. Resurrection and its power are prominent in such a passage as Phil. iii. 10, 11:--

> "That I may know Him, and the power of His resurrection, and the fellowship of His sufferings, being made conformable unto His death, if by any means I may attain unto the out-resurrection out from among the dead."

Here, it will be observed, resurrection power and resurrection hope stand on either side of the sufferings. It is the same in II Cor. iv. 17 - v. 1:--

> "For our light affliction, which is but for a moment, worketh for us a far more exceeding age-abiding weight of glory, while we look not at the things which are seen, but at the things which are not seen: for the things which are seen are temporal, but the things which are not seen are age-abiding; for we know that if our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved; we have a building of God, an house not made with hands, age-abiding in the heavens."
> "Always bearing about in the body the dying of the Lord Jesus, that the life also of Jesus might be made manifest in our mortal body" (II Cor. iv. 10).

The sufferings of Paul, moreover, had close connection with His peculiar ministry of the dispensation of the mystery:--

> "Whereunto I am appointed a preacher. . . . for which cause I also suffer" (II Tim. i. 11, 12).
> "Remember. . . . my gospel, wherein I suffer" (II Tim. ii. 8, 9).

His sufferings, moreover, had a special connection with the church of the one body and the present dispensation:--

> "Therefore I endure all things for the elect's sake, that they may also obtain the salvation which is in Christ Jesus, with age-abiding glory" (II Tim. ii. 10).
> "Who now rejoice in my sufferings for you, and fill up on my part that which is lacking of the afflictions of Christ in my flesh for His body's sake, which is the church, whereof I was made a minister, according to the dispensation of God which was given me to you-ward, to fill up the word of God, even the mystery which hath been hid since the ages and since the generations" (Col. i. 24-26).

One word more. The suffering apostle, though neglected, forsaken and forgotten, and having to write in his old age the sad facts that all in Asia had left him, and that all men had forsaken him (II Tim. i. 15; iv. 16), desiring Timothy to bring his rough sleeveless travelling cloak (II Tim. iv. 13), realized that the last drops of his heart's blood were soon to be poured out as a libation (II Tim. iv. 6), yet above it all his eyes beheld the "crown of righteousness." He had written, "If we suffer, we shall also reign with Him" (II Tim. ii. 12); now the race was nearly finished, the fight nearly over, the glorious "henceforth" gilded his last moments, and his hopes were centred in "His appearing" (II Tim. iv. 8).

May we who believe the same precious truth be made willing to endure, in some degree, the "afflictions of the gospel," realizing that they are after all but "light," and "but for a moment," in comparison with the age-abiding weight of glory.

The Ministry of Paul
Its relation to dispensational truth
His two-fold Commission.

"For the hope of Israel" (Acts xxviii. 20).
"For you Gentiles" (Eph. iii. 1).

In preceding papers we have pointed out that the words addressed to Paul by the Lord on the road to Damascus are not recorded in Acts ix. The reason for this is that it was not expedient that the peculiar mission of Paul should be made known until Israel had had every opportunity to repent and believe. It is not until we read Acts xxvi., and find Paul a prisoner, his synagogue witness over, his face turned toward Gentile Rome, it is not till then that we have revealed the actual commission received by him from the ascended Lord. The apostle says:--

> "At midday, O king, I saw in the way a light from heaven, above the brightness of the sun. . . . I heard a voice speaking unto me. . . . and I said, Who art Thou, Lord? And He said, I am Jesus Whom thou persecutest. But rise, and stand upon thy feet, for I have appeared unto thee for this purpose, to make thee a minister and a witness both of these things which thou hast seen, and of those things in the which I will appear unto thee; delivering thee from the people, and from the Gentiles, unto whom now I send thee. To open their eyes (Eph. i. 18), to turn them from darkness to light, and from the authority of satan unto God (Col. i. 13), that they may receive forgiveness of sins (Eph. i. 7), and inheritance among them which are sanctified (Eph. i. 11; Col. i. 12) by faith that is in Me (Eph. i. 13, 14)" (Acts xxvi. 13-18).

The apostle here speaks of a two-fold ministry, unless the word "both" has lost its meaning. He was to witness concerning:--

(1). The things which he had seen, and
(2). Those things in the which the Lord promised to appear unto him.

The first part of this ministry is described in verse 20. At Damascus, Jerusalem, Judæa, and then to the Gentiles, the apostle proclaimed repentance. This constituted the first part of his commission. The second part, which depended upon a revelation subsequent to the visitation on the Damascus road, now lay before the apostle, and is epitomized in verse 18. This verse contains a wonderful summary of the blessings opened up during the present dispensation of the grace of God to the Gentiles, and is very different from the summary given in verse 20.

In verse 22 he discloses that up till the day in which he was speaking he had said "none other things than those which the prophets and Moses did say should come." When we read the epistles of the mystery (Ephesians, Philippians, Colossians, &c.), we read many things concerning which the prophets and Moses said nothing, for the apostle there opens up the secret which had been hidden by God since the ages and generations, and revealed to him for the first time, as recorded in Eph. iii. 8, 9, "Unto me, who am less than the least of all saints, is this grace given. . . . to enlighten all as to what is the dispensation of the mystery."

A similar passage to this one of Acts xxvi. is Acts xx. There the apostle is contemplating imprisonment, and there he alludes to the two-fold character of his commission. Calling together the elders of the church of Ephesus (verse 17), he reminded them of the nature of his ministry, "testifying both to the Jews, and also to the Greeks, repentance toward God, and faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ." The parallel with Acts xxvi. is further seen by reading verse 27. "I have not shunned to declare unto you all the counsel of God." He had said nothing beyond that which Moses had said, and had declared all the counsel of God. Yet the epistles of the mystery not only contain much concerning which Moses says nothing, but reveal a counsel and a purpose which are entirely distinct from anything hitherto proclaimed in Scripture. Either we must join the ranks of those who by mistaken zeal attempt to "harmonize" the Word of God, or we must see that the apostle contemplated a yet future and distinctive ministry. This change is indicated in verses 22-24:--

> "And now, behold, I go bound in the spirit unto Jerusalem. . . . bonds. . . . abide me. but none of these things move me, neither count I my life dear unto myself, so that I might finish my course with joy, and the ministry which I have received of the Lord Jesus, to testify the gospel of the grace of God."

Here, with bondage before him, the apostle contemplates this new ministry, the "those things" of Acts xxvi., the "prison ministry" of the prisoner of the Lord for the Gentiles. That this does contemplate a future ministry is further confirmed by the fact that at the end of the ministry of the apostle in relation to the dispensation of the mystery, his prayer is answered, and he can say, "I have finished my course" (II Tim. iv. 7). If we will but clearly distinguish between the first part of Paul's ministry, which occupies the period covered by the Acts, and the subsequent ministry into which he entered when Israel was set aside in Acts xxviii., we shall be enabled to see more clearly what our own course must be.

His earlier epistles are necessarily connected with kingdom hopes, Abrahamic blessings, and Jewish teaching. We do not speak thus slightingly, far from it. God, Who inspired the apostle's writings, intended that they should thus accord with the times. From Ephesians onward, however, all these things are dropped. Not two baptisms, but one, and that, not water baptism. No longer blessed with faithful Abraham, but blessed with all spiritual blessings in the heavenlies. No longer related to the earth and earthly hopes, for all our hopes and blessings belong to that other sphere of redemptive purposes—the super-heavenly. No more ordinances, observances, fasts, feasts, and days; all gone, and the Lord Jesus Christ, the Alpha and Omega, the All in All.

The Ministry of Paul
Its relation to dispensational truth
The stewardship of the mystery.

"If ye have heard of the dispensation of the grace of God which is given me to you-ward" (Eph. iii. 2).

pp. 63-66

In our last paper we considered some passages of Scripture which threw light upon the twofold ministry of the apostle Paul. We saw that there was a ministry which Paul fulfilled during the Pentecostal dispensation, and that towards the end of the Acts, when imprisonment and Rome lay before him, indications are given of an approaching change in his ministry. To this new ministry we now address ourselves.

The title "apostle" is applied to Paul seven times in the epistles of the mystery (Eph. i. 1; Col. i. 1; I Tim. i. 1; ii. 7; II Tim. i. 1, 11; Titus i. 1). In two passages the title "apostle" comes in combination with two others, viz., "herald and teacher of the Gentiles" (I Tim. ii. 7; II Tim. i. 11).

Another title, one which is peculiar to the present dispensation, is, "the prisoner." In Eph. iii. 1 he calls himself "the prisoner of Jesus Christ for you Gentiles," in Eph. iv. 1, "the prisoner of the Lord," in II Tim. i. 8, ". . . . the testimony of our Lord, nor of me His prisoner," and in Philemon 1 and 9, "a prisoner of Jesus Christ."

In three passages the apostle refers to himself as a "minister," and in each case the context indicates something peculiar and exclusive. The passages are Eph. iii. 7; Col. i. 23, 25. Each of them commences with the expression, "whereof I was made a minister" (R.V.). For some reason the A.V. has rendered the same verb, "was made" in Eph. iii., and "am made" in Col. i. Of what does the apostle speak? of what was he made a minister? Eph. iii. 7 and Col. i. 23 say, "the gospel," and Col. i. 25 says, "the church." To leave the matter here, however, would be worse than useless, it would be misleading. The contexts of these passages indicate that the apostle is not speaking in general terms, but is making a most emphatic and exclusive claim.

To understand any passage of Scripture we must discover the meaning of the context, we must know what it is all about. For the benefit of those who may not have past numbers of The Berean Expositor, we will show the arrangement of the verses which include the passage under consideration, viz., Eph. iii. 7:--

A | 2. The dispensation of the grace of God.
B | 3. The mystery made known to Paul.
C | a | 4. The mystery of Christ—Personal.
b | 5. Apostles and prophets (Plural).
C | a | 6. The mystery of Christ—Mystical.
b | 7. Paul (Singular).
B | 8. The mystery made known by Paul.
A | 9. The dispensation of the mystery (R.V.).

It will be seen that verse 7 comes in that section wherein the apostle, as distinct from the apostles and prophets, lays claim to an exclusive revelation, and a peculiar ministry. The three-fold fellowship, defined in verse 6, is connected with the promise in Christ by the gospel whereof Paul was made a minister, and is to be distinguished from those promises in the gospel whereof Peter was made a minister. With this passage the reader should compare II Tim. i. 10, 11, ". . . . through the gospel, whereunto I am appointed an herald," and II Tim. ii. 8, "Remember that Jesus Christ, of the seed of David, was raised from the dead according to my gospel."

The other claim, in Col. i. 25, 26, is no less definite, ". . . . for His body's sake, which is the church, of which I became a minister, according to the dispensation of God which is given to me with a view to you, to complete the Word of God, the mystery, which has been hidden since the ages and since the generations, but now is made manifest to His saints." The present interval, or gap, occasioned by the temporary abeyance of the Abrahamic promises is "filled" by the dispensation of the mystery, of which the apostle Paul was the special minister.

Not only does the apostle speak of "my gospel," but he also refers to himself and his message in a very special manner. Regarding teachers he writes, "the things that thou hast heard of me. . . . the same commit thou to faithful men" (II Tim. ii. 2). Still more exclusively he refers to himself and his doctrine by the use of a word which occurs nowhere else in Scripture. The passages are I Tim. i. 16 and II Tim. i. 13. The peculiar word is hupotupõsis, and is translated "pattern" and "form." Its real meaning is, "a preliminary draft before the completed design." In the first passage the apostle refers to his salvation as the Lord's sketch—the type or pattern of the rich grace which is so signally manifest throughout the epistles. In the second passage the apostle refers to his doctrine, "Have a pattern (or sketch) of sound words, which thou hast heard of me." This pattern is that to which we have already referred in II Tim. ii. 2.

Immediately after speaking of his doctrine, the apostle says, "all they which are in Asia be turned away from me," and so in chapter iv. 3 he uses the same word "sound" as he used regarding his own teaching in II Tim. i. 13, “the time will come when they will not endure sound doctrine.” If they left the apostle who alone received, by revelation, the teaching of the mystery, they would soon leave the doctrine which he preached. Timothy is exhorted, nevertheless, to preach the word—that word which Paul enjoined in II Tim. i. 13, even though few gave heed. So to-day, let us in some small measure stand in the breach and proclaim the despised word of the neglected apostle, nay, the testimony of our Lord through Paul His prisoner.

The Wages of Sin

"Not in the words which man's wisdom teacheth, but which the Holy Spirit teacheth" (I Cor. ii. 13).

pp. 8-12

On page 111 of Volume I, we commenced the consideration of the subject of eternal punishment, giving room for some quotations from the writings of the exponents of the doctrine of eternal conscious suffering, and adding a few words upon some texts often misquoted, misinterpreted or mis-applied in the writings and discourses of orthodox believers. We now desire to leave the traditions of men and the phraseology of the schools, to consider the words of God Himself upon this great subject.

As we are all aware, the Bible is written in Hebrew and Greek, from which the various translations have been made. It is utter folly to bolster up arguments and doctrines by words occurring in a translation, our only appeal and absolute authority must be the words of the original Scriptures. We therefore propose to bring under review the various words used in the Scriptures, seeking to explain their meaning not merely from the dictionaries or lexicons, but from the usage of the words themselves within the bounds of written Word.

For the sake of clearness we shall use English letters as equivalents for the Hebrew and Greek, believing that those who desire a fuller acquaintance with the originals will be able to discover the words quite easily. The first word which we will consider is the word abad. It is translated "perish" 79 times in the Old Testament (A.V.); other renderings are as follows, "be perished," 12 times; "be ready to perish," 4 times; "cause to perish," 3 times; "make to perish," twice; "destroy, be destroyed, destruction," 63 times; "be lost," 8 times. Other translations of only one or two occurrences are, "be broken;" "be done;" "be void of;" "fail;" "lose" and "spend."

Let us now consider some of the passages where in this word occurs. "Ye shall perish among the heathen" (Lev. xxvi. 38). The context speaks of "they that are left." The word may not mean utter extinction here, but for the purposes for which Israel were chosen and placed in their land, they are as good as dead, perished. The next reference, however, is quite clear in its usage of the word. "They. . . . went down alive into the pit, and the earth closed upon them, and they perished from among the congregation" (Numb. xvi. 33). This doom is spoken of by Moses in verse 29, "If these die the common death of all men." They went down alive into the pit, but not to live therein, for they died an uncommon death, and thereby perished from among the congregation.

Again in Numbers xvii. 12, 13 the word "perish" is used synonymously wih dying, "Behold we die, we perish. . . . shall we be consumed with dying?" The words are used with full unequivocal meaning by Esther, when she had dared, unbidden, to enter the presence of the king, "If I perish, I perish" (Esther iv. 16). The perishing here is again explained by the words of verse 11, "All the king's servants. . . . do know that whosoever. . . . shall come unto the king into the inner court, who is not called, there is one law of his to put him to death, except such to whom the king shall hold out the golden sceptre, that he may live." Esther dared the death penalty, and expressed her feelings by the words quoted, "If I perish, I perish." The multiplication of terms in Esther vii. 4 is striking, "For we are sold, I and my people, to be destroyed, to be slain, and to perish. But if we had been sold for bondmen and bondwomen, I had held my tongue." Here it is evident that perishing is much more than the horrors of eastern slavery; it is used in connection with destruction and death, not life in misery.

In Jonah i. 14 the cry of the storm tossed sailors is no jugglery with words when they said, "Let us not perish for this man's life." They did not intrude any idle speculation concerning "after death," they knew they were in immediate peril of drowning, hence their cry. So also with the gourd which sprang up over Jonah, "which came up in a night and perished in a night." The gourd had withered, and as far as its purpose was concerned it was the same as if it had been destroyed by fire.

In Deut. ix. 4 we read, "How He made the water of the Red Sea to overflow them. . . . and how the Lord hath destroyed them unto this day." What this destruction was like we may read in Exod. xiv. 28, "There remained not so much as one of them." They had perished, they had been destroyed, although their bodies were seen by the Israelites "dead upon the sea shore." We say nothing about "annihilation;" that word is used by those who wish to cast a slur upon the teaching of the Word in order to keep their own traditions. The dead bodies were there, but life, conscious being, enmity or love, sorrow or joy, were gone; as conscious beings they were destroyed, even although their carcasses lined the sea shore.

Turn again to another passage, Deut. xii. 2, "Ye shall utterly destroy all the places, wherein the nations which ye shall possess served their gods." How were they to destroy them? Were they to sit down and argue concerning the "indestructibility of matter"? Certainly not; their instructions were definite, "Ye shall overthrow their altars, and break their pillars, and burn their groves with fire, and ye shall hew down the graven images of their gods, and destroy the names of them out of that place" (verse 3). Surely words cannot be more explicit.

When Athaliah waded through a sea of blood to the throne, we are told that she "destroyed all the seed royal." When we hear the doom of the "cherub of the anointing" (satan) uttered in Ezek. xxviii. 16, we find the words are, "I will destroy thee, oh covering cherub, from the midst of the stones of fire," but this destruction is explained in verses 18 and 19 by these words, "I will bring forth a fire from the midst of thee, it shall devour thee, and I will bring thee to ashes upon the earth. . . . and never shalt thou be any more!"

Is there any need to continue the study of this word to confirm us in its simple and primary meaning? The instances of Korah and his company, of Esther and her people, of the sailors in the vessel with Jonah, of the overthrow of Pharaoh and his host, and the burning, breaking down, hewing down, and overthrowing of the heathen places of worship, supply us with God's own usage of the word, against which all the sophistry of man is as nothing. As is the case with all languages, words take secondary and even more remote meanings, but none of these can ever lessen the bearing of the primary sense, or alter their original force. Thus we find the word abad translated "lost," as in the case of the lost asses of I Sam. ix. 3, or the lost sheep of Psalm cxix. 176; and again "fail," in Psalm cxlii. 4, "refuge failed me," or "every vision faileth" (Ezek. xii. 22).

The use of this word, translated "spendeth" in Prov. xxix. 3, is full of power. "He that keepeth company with harlots spendeth his substance." This word abad, bearing the meaning the foregoing passages indicate, is used by the Lord as one of the many descriptions of the wages of sin, e.g.:--

> "The way of the ungodly shall perish" (Psalm i. 6).
>
> "The wicked shall perish, and the enemies of the Lord shall be as the fat of lambs; they shall consume; into the smoke shall they consume away" (Psalm xxxvii. 20).
>
> "As wax melteth before the fire, so let the wicked perish at the presence of God" (Psalm lxviii. 2).
> "His breath goeth forth, he returneth to his earth, in that very day his thoughts perish" (Psalm cxlvi. 4).

We shall consider the figures used by the Lord under a separate head, but we cannot help drawing attention to God's simile in Psalm lxviii. 2, or Psalm xxxvii. 20. Melting wax and consuming fire are quite consistent with the teaching of the Scriptures, and the meaning of the word abad. Never-ending torments, and a deathless state are utterly foreign to the meaning of the word, and antagonistic to the figures used by the Lord, or the historic usages of the word. John iii. 16, so often quoted yet so little believed, gives perishing as the alternative to "everlasting life." So far, we are able to see that the Scriptural expression, "the wages of sin is death," needs no modification. As applied to abad it entirely coincides with its meaning and usage.

Before we leave the consideration of this word we would draw attention to the way in which it enters into the name of the king of the supernatural beings mentioned in Rev. ix. 11, "whose name in the Hebrew tongue is Abaddon, but in the Greek tongue hath his name Apollyon." This is of the utmost importance, for it fixes the meaning of the Greek word rendered "destroy," "perish," &c. (which we shall, D.V., consider in subsequent issues), as being equivalent to the word abad. The word abaddon is translated "destruction" in the following passages: Job xxvi. 6; xxviii. 22; xxxi. 12; Psalm lxxxviii. 11; Prov. xv. 11 and xxvii. 20. Note the connection with "Sheol" and "Death."

Another Hebrew word which we must consider is shamad. This word is translated "destroy," 66 times; "be destroyed," 19 times; once only by the following, "destruction;" "be overthrown;" "perish;" "bring to nought;" "pluck down;" and twice "utterly." It will be seen that just as the word abad was translated the greater number of times by the word "perish," so shamad is translated in the majority of cases (86 out of a possible 92 occurrences) by the word "destroy." It occurs in Deut. ix. 3, and is the result of a consuming fire. Again in Deut. ix. 14 it is threatened against Israel, and explained as being the words of God, "Let Me alone, that I may destroy them and blot out their name from under heaven." This reference will show the awful fulness of the word shamad. It is this word which comes first in the decree of the Jews' enemy, "to destroy, to kill, and to cause to perish" (Esther iii. 13).

When the Lord spoke concerning Israel and its punishment He said, "I will destroy it from off the face of the earth; saving that I will not utterly destroy the house of Jacob, saith the Lord" (Amos ix. 8). Here the Lord makes a provision, an exception, a clause which does not follow the threatened destruction of the sinner. Jacob used the word "destroy" in Gen. xxxiv. 30 to mean the effect of being killed (see for further reference such passages as Lev. xxvi. 30; Numb. xxxiii. 52; Deut. i. 27, and Judges xxi. 16). To destroy, abolish, or demolish is the meaning of the word. This is the fate of the wicked, e.g.:--

> "All the wicked will He destroy" (Psalm cxiv. 20).
> "The transgressors shall be destroyed together" (Psalm xxxvii. 38).
> "When the wicked spring as the grass, and when all the workers of iniquity do flourish, it is that they shall be destroyed for ever" (Psalm xcii. 7).

Again we submit that the cumulative witness of the use of these two words confirms the Scriptural statement that "the wages of sin is death," and that the idea of eternal conscious suffering is as foreign to the meaning and usage of shamad as it is to the meaning and usage of abad.

There are one or two more Hebrew words which we must consider together; these we must leave for another occasion. We trust our readers will not think the time or space wasted in thrashing out the true meaning of these words. It is our only way of gaining the truth. Man-made definitions are all contaminated by tradition, for which we have neither regard nor respect, from which we ask no quarter, and to which, for the sake of the truth, "we yield subjection, no, not for an hour" (Gal. ii. 5).

The Wages of Sin.

"Not in the words which man's wisdom teacheth, but which the Holy Spirit teacheth" (I Cor. ii. 13).

pp. 34-41

In our last paper upon this important theme we submitted to the reader the Scriptural meaning and usage of two Hebrew words, viz., abad and shamad, and found that in the first case the word "perish" was an unequivocal and true rendering, and that in the second instance the meaning was "to destroy," or "to be destroyed."

There is another word which is translated "to destroy," and that is the Hebrew word tsamath. The following is a list of the renderings in the A.V., with the number of occurrences: "cut off," 8 times; "consume," once; "destroy," 5 times; "vanish," once; "for ever," twice.

In Psa. ci. 8 we read, "Morning by morning I will destroy all the wicked of the land" (R.V. margin). The Psalm has for its theme, "The coming King and His rule." In that day sin will be summarily dealt with, even as we have a foreshadowing of the kingdom in the judgment which fell upon Ananias and Sapphira, as recorded in the Acts of the Apostles. The Scriptures enlarge upon this meaning in no uncertain way in II Sam. xxii. 41, 43:--

> "Thou hast also given me the necks of mine enemies, that I might destroy them that hate me. . . . then did I beat them as small as the dust of the earth, I did stamp them as the mire of the street, and did spread them abroad."

Making all due allowance for the figurative language of the passage, the meaning is evident to all. There is an interesting illustration of its use in Lev. xxv. 23, 30, the word translated "for ever" being the feminine form of tsamath. "The land shall not be sold for ever (A.V. margin, 'To be quite cut off') for the land is Mine." The land belonged to the Lord, and all transactions relative to its sale were limited by the number of years to the Jubilee, when the possession reverted to the original owner. The case of a "dwelling house in a walled city," however, was different, that was man's erection:--

> "If a man sell a dwelling house in a walled city, then he may redeem it within a whole year after it is sold. . . . and if it be not redeemed within the space of a full year, then the house that is within a walled city shall be established for ever to him that bought it throughout his generations, it shall not go out in the Jubilee" (Lev. xxv. 29, 30).

The use of this word translated "for ever" is striking; when once the house passes beyond redemption it is absolutely beyond recovery. So far as the original ownership is concerned it is "cut off," it has passed away.

Let us think of this when we read Psa. xciv. 23, "He shall bring upon them their own iniquity, and shall cut them off in their own wickedness, yea, the Lord our God shall cut them off." Beyond redemption! Cut off! What a word is this! Jeremiah when cast into the dungeon said, "They have cut off my life in the dungeon, and cast a stone upon me" (Lam. iii. 53). Jeremiah realized that unless the Lord came to his help, he was shut up in that which would prove to be his tomb. Praise be to God, we are taught not to fear those that, after having killed the body, have no more that they can do, but rather to fear Him that is able to destroy both body and soul in Gehenna. Job vi. supplies us with one more illustration. Verses 14-21 of this chapter deal with Job's estimate of his friends:--

> "My brethren have dealt deceitfully as a brook, and as the stream of brooks they pass away. . . . what time they wax warm, they vanish; when it is hot they are consumed out of their place. The paths of their way are turned aside; they go to nothing, and perish."

Job uses a powerful illustration here. The transitory character of the mountain stream, which lasts only until it waxes warm, and then vanishes into the atmosphere. This word

"vanish" is the word tsamath, and once again we are not left in doubt as to its meaning. Reviewing, we find that this word means, "to be cut off," "to be deprived" either of being, existence, identity, or relationship. This is one of the words used to describe the sinner's end. He is to be cut off (tsamath) from the living God, he will be destroyed (shamad), and he will consequently perish (abad).

We will now turn our attention to another Hebrew word, namely, karath. In its various forms it is translated in the A.V. "cut off," 88 times, "be cut off," 59 times, "cut down," 19 times, and "cut," "destroy," "hewn down," "perish." It is further rendered "covenant," twice, and "make a covenant," 84 times. Its primary meaning is "to cut off" as a branch (Num. xiii. 23), "to cut down" as a tree (Isa. xxxvii. 24). The word kerithuth—a feminine noun from karath—is translated "divorce" and "divorcement" in Deut. xxiv. 1, 3; Isa. l. 1; Jer. iii. 8.

Karath is used continually with reference to the cutting up of the bodies of the animals slain for sacrificial purposes (Jer. xxxiv. 18). Psa. l. 5 literally rendered is, "those who have cut in pieces My victim in sacrifice." Gen. xv. 9-17 is an illustration of the practice of cutting or dividing the bodies of the victims, but in this passage another word is used instead of karath. This word karath is used in that solemn prophecy of Dan. ix. 26, "Messiah shall be cut off and shall have nothing." This cutting off was the death on the Cross. "He was cut off (gazer) out of the land of the living."

The repeated threat found in the law against offenders is, "that soul shall be cut off from among his people" (Ex. xii. 15; Lev. xix. 8; Num. xv. 30, &c.). The words of Jer. xlviii. 2, "Come, let us cut it off from being a nation," give us some idea of the force of the word, but when we read it in Gen. xi. 11 in reference to the Flood, we realize how tremendous this cutting off really is. There in Gen. ix. the words "cut off" correspond to the words "destroy" and "die" of vi. 17 and ix. 11, and "curse" and "smite" of Gen. viii. 21.

Turning from these historical references we find that this severe judgment is held over the head of impenitent sinners:--

> "Evil doers shall be cut off" (Psa. xxxvii. 9).
> "The end of the wicked shall be cut off" (Psa. xxxvii. 38).

We have already said that the primary meaning of the word karath had reference to the cutting down of a tree. This is clearly substantiated by reading the closing verses of Psa. xxxvii. The words "cut off" occur five times in this Psalm (verses 9, 22, 28, 34, 38). If in verse 9 we read that the evildoers shall be cut off, we read in verse 10, "For but a little while, and the wicked shall not be," and lest the reader should object to this strong term indicative of extinction, the Scripture continues, "Yea, thou shalt diligently consider his place, and it shall not be."

Verse 28 says, "The seed of the wicked shall be cut off"; the antithesis is given in the sentence before concerning the saints, "They are preserved for ever." Verse 34 says, "When the wicked are cut off, thou shalt see it." We are not left to our own speculation as to what the saints shall see, for verses 35, 36 continue and give us the figure of the wicked "like a green bay tree—yet he passed away, and, lo, he was not, yea, I sought him, but he could not be found." The "end" of the righteous is "peace," but the transgressors shall be destroyed together and the end of the wicked shall be cut off."

Again, by referring to verses 9, 22, 28, and 34 we shall see the wicked shall be "cut off" from the inheriance:--

> "For evildoers shall be cut off, but those that wait on the Lord, they shall inherit the earth."
> "For such as be blessed of Him shall inherit the earth."
> "And they that be cursed of Him shall be cut off" (cf. Matt. xxv. 34-36).
> "The seed of the wicked shall be cut off."
> "The righteous shall inherit the land."
> "He shall exalt thee to inherit the land."
> "When the wicked shall be cut off, thou shalt see it."

This judgment, then, deprives those upon whom it falls not only of any share in the kingdom of the heavens and the peace of God (verses 11 and 37), but blots them out, or cuts them down as a tree, so effectually that twice in this Psalm the words indicative of extinction are used (verses 10 and 36). The reference to a tree is also found in the next occurrence (Prov. ii. 22). "The wicked shall be cut off from the earth, and the transgressors shall be rooted out of it." The one passage in the A.V. wherein the word karath is rendered "perish" has reference to the vegetation of the country perishing by reason of famine, viz., Gen. xli. 36, "that the land perish not through famine."

Again we pause to consider the testimony of this word to the doctrine before us. What are the wages of sin? Abad, to perish; shamad, to be destroyed; tsamath, to be cut off. Every figure used concerning the last two words considered in this present article enforce the meaning. The divorcement of man and wife; the complete loss of the unredeemed dwelling house; the vanishing of the stream; the extinction of the tree whose very place could not be found, all alike testify to the truth of the Scriptures, that the wages of sin is death, and give the lie to the vain deceitful philosophy which says, "There is no death, what seems so is transition," which tells us that death is but life in another place. Oh to believe God! Let men call us what they will. It is required in stewards that a man be found faithful.

We have now considered four of the most important Hebrew words used by God in connection with the wages of sin, viz., abad, shamd, tsamath, and karath. One or two more words of less frequent usage will complete our studies in this section, and then we must turn to the Greek words used in the N.T.

Kalah.–This word is translated by a great many different English words. We give a few of the most important: "to consume, be consumed, consume away," 60 times. Other renderings include, "be accomplished"; "be finished," "cease"; "destroy utterly"; "utter end."

Let us look at the way the word is used, apart from the question of future punishment. "On the seventh day God ended His work which He had made" (Gen. ii. 2). Comment is unnecessary here. Totality and completion are clearly expressed by the context in every passage. "And He left off talking with him, and God went up from Abraham" (Gen. xvii. 22). "The famine shall consume the land" (Gen. xli. 30). "The water was spent in the bottle" (Gen. xxi. 15). "My soul fainteth for Thy salvation. . . . mine eyes fail for Thy Word" (Psa. cxix. 81, 82). "I will not make a full end with you" (Jer. v. 18; xxx. 11). "The consumption decreed shall overflow in righteousness" (Isa. x. 22). Until the day and night come to an end" (Job xxvi. 10).

The underlying idea of the word kalah may be seem in the fact that kol is the Hebrew word for "all" and "every." It signifies, as we have observed, totality and the utter end. It is the word used by the Lord when He said to Moses, "Let Me alone, that I may consume them" (Exod. xxxii. 10), or as in Num. xvi. 21, 41, "That I may consume them in a moment." The Psalmist uses this word when speaking of the ungodly. "Consume them in wrath, consume them that they may not be" (Psa. lix. 13). The added words, "that they may not be" amplify the inherent meaning of the word "consume." Again, in Psa. xxxvii. we read, "But the wicked shall perish (abad) and the enemies of the Lord shall be as the fat of lambs; they shall consume (kalah), into smoke shall they consume away" (kalah). Here we have not only the figure of the utter consumption of fat by fire, but also the parallel word "perish," which we have considered together in the first paper of this series.

Perhaps the passage in the A.V. which gives a complete idea of the nature of the word is Zeph. i. 18, "Neither their silver nor their gold shall be able to deliver them in the day of the Lord's wrath; but the whole land shall be devoured (akal) by the fire of His jealousy; for He shall make a speedy riddance of all that dwell in the land."

Evil is not to be forever; God's universe is to be cleansed; He shall gather out of His kingdom all things that offend; He will make a speedy riddance of evil. Again we pause to consider yet another word used by the Lord in relation to the wages of sin, and again the unfailing testimony is borne by the Scriptures to the fact, that to perish, to destroy, and to consume, in their primary meanings are everywhere the words used by God to describe the penalty of sin.

Nathats.–This word is translated, "beat down," 3 times; "break down," 22 times; and once or twice "cast down"; "pull down"; "throw down"; &c., and "destroy," 5 times. The primary meaning is, "to break down," "to demolish." It is applied to altars (Exod. xxxiv. 13; Deut. xii. 3). To houses, towns, cities, walls (Lev. xiv. 45; Judges xiii. 9; ix. 45; II Kings x. 27, &c.). In Psa. lii. 5 we find the word translated "destroy. . . . take away. . . . root out. . . . pluck out." The Psalm, originally written with reference to Doeg the Edomite, has prophetic reference to the antichrist, "the man who made not the Lord his strength" (verse 7). It is interesting to note that the gematria (the numerical value) of this sentence is 2,197, or 13*13*13, the number of satan and rebellion. When dealing with the doom of antichrist we shall have to remember this passage and the primary meaning of the word.

Muth.—Let us now examine the word which is translated "death." Scripture declares in both Testaments that the wages of sin is death. Much has been written to show that death means everything else except death. The current conception seems to be that death, as a punishment for sin, is endless life in misery. Presumably if tradition had its way it would alter the Scriptures, and would declare that "he that believeth hath everlasting life in happiness, and the wages of sin is everlasting life in misery." The Bible, however, knows no such doctrine.

We have already examined several words and find that the wages of sin is destruction, perishing, a full end, consumption, riddance, death. The oft quoted John iii. 16 declares unmistakably that the alternative to everlasting life is perishing. However, our present studies are devoted to the consideration of the Hebrew words themselves. How is the Hebrew word muth rendered in the A.V.? It is translated "to die," 420 times; "be dead," 60 times; "be put to death," 57 times; "put to death," 60 times; "death," 62 times; "kill," 32 times; "slay," 81 times; and "dead body," "worthy of death," "destroy," "destroyed." We have enough in such a number of occurrences to provide to a demonstration the meaning and usage of the word muth. Let us examine a few passages.

"And all the days that Adam lived were nine hundred and thirty years, and he died" (Gen. v. 5). The word is used throughout Genesis to record the deaths of Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Joseph, &c. It is used of the death of animals (Exod. vii. 18; viii. 13; Lev. xi. 39, &c.). It is this self-same word that is used in Ezek. xviii. 4, "The soul that sinneth, it shall die." Moses used this word in Deut. iv. 22, "I must die in this land." The word muth is used to describe a corpse. "Abraham stood up from before his dead" (Gen. xxiii. 3). "Bury therefore thy dead" (Gen. xxiii. 15). It is precisely the same word "death" in Gen. xxi. 16 as in Ezek. xviii. 32.

Death, physical and inflicted death, was continually presented to the mind of the Jew under the law. "He that smiteth a man. . . . shall be. . . . put to death" (Exod. xxi. 12), so he that smiteth his father, stealeth, or curseth (Exod. xxi. 15, 16, 17). Murder, adultery, witchcraft (Num. xxxv. 16; Lev. xx. 10 and xx.17) were similarly punished. Nowhere, throughout the whole range of inspiration, is man ever told to torture, torment, or in any way foreshadow the horrors of the traditional penalty of sin; the extreme penalty is always death. Thus was it so in the beginning. In Gen. ii. 17 the penalty for disobedience was, "in the day thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die." We are fully aware that this passage has been made to mean death, spiritual and eternal, which in orthodox teaching comes to mean life in conscious torment.

What was the penalty threatened in Gen. ii. 17? "Dying thou shalt die." This is the same idiomatic construction as is translated "freely eat," viz., "eating thou mayest eat" (Gen. ii. 16). It is of frequent occurrence in the Old Testament (cf. Gen. xxvi. 28; xxvii. 30; xliii. 3, 7, 20), and it is false to seek to make the Hebrew idiom (Gen. ii. 17) speak of a process of "dying"! Adam, who was of the earth, earthy, who was not a spiritual being as is so often taught (cf. I Cor. xv. 45-47), was treated by God upon a plane suitable to his nature. His obedience would have meant a continuance in the state of innocence and the temporal blessings of Eden, while his disobedience involved himself and his descendants in the forfeiture of these blessings. What is true concerning the first death is true of the second death also. If the second death means eternal conscious agony, it cannot be justly named the second death, for it differs in its every character. Into the second death God will cast Hades (i.e. gravedom), and death, the last enemy to be destroyed.

The lake of fire is God's great destructor. All things that offend are gathered out of God's kingdom, not to be perpetuated by constant miracle, but to be destroyed, root and branch. We hope to prove this definitely when we have considered the N.T. words. Space will not allow us to go further in this issue. Muth, death, is the expression of abad, periash, shamad, destroy, tsamath, cut off, karath, cut off, and kalah, to make an utter end.

In our next paper we shall have to refer to muth again, as we shall therein consider the word "hell" in the O.T. Meanwhile , let us not rest in the words of man, but let us see to it that our faith rests in the "words which the Holy Ghost teacheth."

The Wages of Sin.

"Add thou not unto His words, lest He reprove thee, and thou be found a liar" (Prov. xxx. 6).

pp. 84-88

We desire to draw attention in this paper to the word which in the Old Testament is translated "hell," and to show its close connection with the word muth (death) which we considered in our last article. The word in its original is sheol. It is translated "grave" 31 times, "hell" 31 times, and "pit" 3 times. The word sheol is dervied from the verb shaal, meaning "to ask" or "to enquire."

Moses used the word sheol 7 times. The first 6 occurrences the A.V. renders by "the grave" and "pit," the last by the word "hell." The passages are as follows:--

> "I will go down into sheol (A.V. the grave), unto my son mourning" (Gen. xxxvii. 35).
> "Then shall ye bring down my grey hairs with sorrow to sheol" (A.V. the grave) (Gen. xlii. 38).
> "My grey hairs with sorrow to sheol" (A.V. the grave) (Gen. xliv. 29).
> "His grey hairs to sheol" (A.V. the grave) (Gen. xliv. 31).
> "If the earth open her mouth, and swallow them up. . . . and they go down quick (alive) unto sheol" (A.V. the pit) (Num. xvi. 30).
> "They went down alive unto sheol" (A.V. the pit) (Num. xvi. 33).
> "For a fire is kindled in Mine anger, and shall burn unto the lowest sheol (A.V. hell), and shall consume the earth with her increase, and set on fire the foundations of the mountains" (Deut. xxxii. 22).

Let the reader try the word "hell" in place of "grave," as used by Jacob and his sons, and then let him ask whether Deut. xxxii. 22 has been translated fairly.

The bias that lies behind this selection of words may be discerned by comparing such passages as Job xiv. 13 with Psa. ix. 17. The former reads, "Oh that Thou wouldst hide me in the grave," whereas the latter reads, "The wicked shall be turned into hell." Let the reader put the word "hell" into the prayer of Job, and its utter absurdity will be evident. The word translated "turned" (Psa. ix. 17) is really "returned" (see Lange), and the meaning is that the second death is the final doom of the "wicked" and the "nations" who forget God. Or again, compare the following:--

> "Thou hast brought up my soul from the grave" (Psa. xxx. 3).
> "For Thou wilt not leave my soul in hell" (Psa. xvi. 10).

The context of these passages confirms the Scriptural meaning ("the grave"), and refutes the traditional error ("hell"). Psa. xxx. 3 reads:--

> "Oh Lord, Thou hast brought up my soul from the grave, Thou hast kept me alive, that I should not go down into the pit," while Psa. xvi. 9, 10 says:--

> "My flesh also shall rest in hope, for Thou wilt not leave my soul in the grave (A.V. hell): neither wilt Thou suffer Thine Holy One to see corruption."

The Hebrew parallel in both cases proves to all that sheol means the grave, and not the orthodox hell. Eccles. ix. 10 declares that "there is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom, in the grave (sheol) whither thou goest." Why did not the translators render this, "hell"? It certainly would have opened the eyes of many to see that the agony, torment and gnawing of conscience of the orthodox "hell" were false; so in this place we have "grave" as the rendering of sheol.

I Sam. ii. 6 bears ample testimony that sheol is to be read as antithetical to life:--

> "The Lord killeth, and maketh alive: He bringeth down to the grave, and bringeth up."

Again in II Sam. xxii. 6 the Hebrew parallelism is strongly marked:--

> "The cords of the grave (A.V. hell), compassed me about, the snares of death prevented me."

The cords of the grave and the snares of death are a beautiful example of parallelism in Hebrew poetry, and at the same time confirm the meaning of the words sheol and muth (death). Sheol is spoken of as a place of darkness and silence; the Psalmist speaks of "making his bed" there (Psa. cxxxix. 8). The A.V. reads, "If I make my bed in hell"—a monstrous distortion, the bed speaking of the sleep of death until resurrection. This the A.V. itself admits by rendering the parallel passage in Job xvii. 13-16 thus:--

> "If I wait, the grave (sheol) is mine house: I have made my bed in the darkness. I have said to corruption, Thou art my father; to the worm, Thou art my mother, and my sister. And where is now my hope, who shall see it? They shall go down to the bars of the pit (sheol), when our rest (cf. made my bed) together is in the dust."

No one can deny that sheol here means the grave; so also it means the same in Psa. cxxxix. 8. Once again notice Isa. xxviii. 15 and Prov. vii. 27:--

> "We have made a covenant with death, and with the grave (A.V. hell) are we at agreement."
>
> "Her house is the way to the grave (A.V. hell), going down to the chambers of death" (Prov. vii. 27).

Look at Ezek. xxxi. 14, 15:--

> "They are all delivered unto death, to the nether parts of the earth, in the midst of the children of men, with them that go down to the pit. . . . in the day that he went down to sheol (A.V. grave)."

Now notice the utter disregard for adherence to the letter of Scripture in the verses which follow (16 and 17):--

> "When I cast him down to sheol (A.V. hell) with them that descend into the pit. . . . they also went down into sheol (A.V. hell) with him."

In Hosea xiii. 14 we read, "I will ransom them from the power of the grave (sheol); I will redeem them from death: O death, I will be thy plagues; O grave (sheol), I will be thy destruction":--

A | Sheol. . . . . ransomed from.
B | Death. . . . . redeemed from.
B | Death. . . . . plagued.
A | Sheol. . . . . destroyed.

Here we read of the destruction of sheol—the grave. Orthodoxy would not permit "hell" here for obvious reasons—the orthodox hell will never be destroyed.

Sufficient, we trust, has been brought forward to warrant the statement that sheol means the grave. We must not confound it, however, with keber, a grave (Gen. xxiii. 4), or bor, a pit, rock hewn (Gen. xxxvii. 20-29), for sheol means THE GRAVE, or Gravedom, rather than a specific burying place.

The word "hell" is an old English word derived from the Saxon hillan or helan, "to hide," or "to cover." The word occurs in Old English literature with this meaning; helling a house meant thatching or covering a house. This is the idea in the word "helmet," which is a covering for the head. The word "heal" also is derived from the same word, the broken flesh of a wound being healed or covered over. In Cornwall and Somerset a thatcher or slater is called a "healer" or "hellier," while in Berkshire and Wiltshire the words "yelming" or "helming" are used for thatching. If this be the meaning of "hell" in modern English, we may let it stand as a translation in our Bibles of the word sheol, but we all know that this is by no means the case; "hell" stands for endless and unutterable torment, and we hesitate not to brand the rendering as a lie.

Some readers complain of our "dogmatism" and of "rudeness." Much as we would desire to consider the susceptibilities of all believers, much as we would ever remember how insignificant we are in comparison with the teachers whose doctrines we deny, yet we would rather be liable to the charge of rudeness than of unfaithfulness. Paul treated those who were his fellow-labourers with courtesy and respect, yet in his defence of the "truth of the gospel" he did not hesitate to speak of the "Somewhats" at the Conference at Jerusalem, when he championed, by grace, the cause of Christian liberty (Gal. ii.). "We use great plainness of speech," he wrote upon another occasion; so would we also. Greek philosophy rather than the written Word of God permeates and dominates the theology concerning the soul, death, the intermediate state and hell.

Sheol is never described except under the imagery of terror, and is always regarded as an evil. Never do we find it likened to the portal of heaven, or the passport to immediate bliss. It is described as an awful abyss and a land of darkness and forgetfulness. The parallels used in relation to sheol (such as destruction, corruption, &c.) confirm the teaching that has already been advanced in the previous papers, that the wages of sin is death (destruction—perishing) and that the dogma of eternal conscious suffering is a libel and a lie.

While dealing with sheol we would draw attention to another word, Tophet. The derivation of this word is somewhat doubtful. It is a name given to a part of the valley of the children of Hinnom which was outside the city of Jerusalem. The idolastrous worship of Molech had been practised in this place and had rendered it odious. When Josiah was raised up to stamp out, for the time, the idolatry of Israel, we read:--

> "He defiled Topeth, which is in the valley of the children of Hinnom, that no man might make his son or his daughter to pass through the fire to Molech" (II Kings xxiii. 10).

This fearful practice is mentioned and prohibited in Lev. xviii. 21:--

> "Thou shalt not let any of thy seed pass through the fire to Molech."

The disgusting idolatry seems to have had a powerful hold over the people, for in Jer. vii. 31 we read:--

> "And they have built the high places of Tophet, which is in the valley of the son of Hinnom, to burn their sons and their daughters in the fire, which I commanded them not, neither came into My heart."

The diabolical institution that inflicted the agonies of the fire for a few moments is repudiated in a manner worthy of our attention. Not only does the Lord say that He did not command such practices, but that they never came into His heart. If this be the case, and analogy be allowed any place, what shall the Lord say of that doctrine so tenaciously held by thousands, of not merely temporary suffering as in the worship of Molech, but an eternal Tophet where the victims writhe and groan in never-ending agonies? The Lord overturns the worship of Molech and says that He will use Tophet as a burying place (Jer. vii. 32), speaking of it as a place of defilement (Jer. xix. 13).

Antichrist, under the figure of the Assyrian, is consigned to Tophet (Isa. xxx. 33), where "the breath of the Lord, like a stream of brimstone," is parallel to the passage in II Thess. ii. 8. It is this valley of the son of Hinnom (used as the place for the worship of Molech, afterwards defiled and used as the place for the destruction of offal, refuse, and the dead bodies of criminals), which supplies the word Gehenna, twelve times translated "hell," in the New Testament.

The witness of every passage in the Old Testament is unanimous; it says with one voice that,

> "The wages of sin is death" (Rom. vi. 23).
> "The candle of the wicked shall be put out" (Prov. xxiv. 20).
> "The wicked is reserved unto the day of destruction" (Job xxi. 30).
> "As wax melteth before the fire, so let the wicked perish at the presence of God" (Psalm lxviii. 2).
> "For yet a little while and the wicked shall not be" (Psalm xxxvii. 10).
> "He is like the beast that perish" (Psalm xlix. 12).
> "Let the sinners be consumed out of the land, and let the wicked be no more" (Psalm civ. 35).
> "They shall be as though they had not been" (Obadiah 16).
> "They shall be as nothing" (Isa. xli. 11).

"To the law and the testimony, if they speak not according to this Word, it is because there is no light in them."

The Wages of Sin .
A consideration of the words used in the Greek New Testaments.
pp.128-130

In the preceding papers of this series we have submitted to a careful examination some of the words most frequently used in the Hebrew Scriptures to denote or to describe the end of the unsaved. We now would direct the reader to the New Testament, and the examination of the words used therein in the teaching, warning, or demonstration of the wages of sin.

Apollumi.—This word is translated in the A.V. as follows: "Destroy," 23 times; "lose," 21 times; "be destroyed," 3 times; "be lost," 10 times; "be marred," once; "die," once; and "perish," 33 times.

In examining "the words which the Holy Ghost teacheth" we must ever remember that the literal sense of the words is primâ facie their true sense. It is this literal sense which is the common, ordinary, fundamental basis of all language, and accurate communication of thought. "Labour not for the meat which perisheth, but for that meat which endureth to age-abiding life" (John vi. 27). "They shall perish, but Thou remainest" (Heb. i. 11). None can fail to see that the word perish in these passages is the opposite of enduring or remaining. By what system of controversies do men seek to explain the Bible when the object of perishing is the sinner? Why should perishing in this special case mean remaining or enduring in conscious suffering? Dean Alford is responsible for the following statement:--

> "A canon of interpretation which should be constantly borne in mind is that a figurative sense of words is never admissible except when required by the context."

To this all will heartily agree who believe that God's Word is His revelation, and to this we seek to adhere. When we read in Heb. xi. 31, "By faith, the harlot Rahab perished not with them that believed not," we do not understand the word "perish" to signify living in agony or remorse, but that Rahab was saved from the fate which awaited the inhabitants of the city of Jericho. Let God be true, though it makes every man a liar. Let Scripture tell us what "perishing" in Heb. xi. 31 means:--

> "And they utterly destroyed all that was in the city, both man and woman, young and old, ox and sheep and ass, with the edge of the sword. . . . and they burnt the city with fire, and all that was therein. . . . and Joshua saved Rahab the harlot alive" (Josh. vi.21-25).

Here inspired comment is absolutely opposite to the orthodox teaching concerning this word "perish."

In Luke vi. 9 the Lord Jesus, speaking with reference to healing on the Sabbath Day, says, "Is it lawful. . . .to save life or to destroy it?" Here the word "destroy" (apollumi) is used in its simple primary meaning, and is contrasted with "save." A reference to Matt. xii. will show, further, that the Lord used as an illustration the case of saving the life of an animal. In Luke xvii. 27 the same word is used of the flood which "destroyed them all," and in verse 29 of the effect of the fire and brimstone which fell upon Sodom and "destroyed them all." When we read Luke ix. 56, "For the Son of man is not come to destroy men's lives, but to save them," why should we distort the meaning of the word? why not believe that the Lord used a fit and proper word, indeed the most suitable word which the language provided?

It is the same word translated "perish" that occurs in that oft-quoted passage John iii. 16, "For God so loved the world, that He gave His only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have everlasting life." Here the subject is lifted to the highest level. Here is no ambiguous phraseology, neither figure, nor parable, but plain gospel spoken in solemn earnestness by the Lord Jesus Himself. He says that there are two alternatives before men, the one - life everlasting, the other - perishing, utter destruction (Heb. ix., Josh. vi.), and from this doom He came to save those who believed in Him. Hence we read in Luke xix. 10, "The Son of man is come to seek and to save that which was lost (apollumi). Man by nature was on the road which leadeth to destruction.

The primary meaning "perish," or "destroy," becomes changed in the transition of language to the derived and secondary meaning "lost." Thus we read of the "lost" sheep, and the "lost" son in the parables of Luke xv., and in the "lost" sheep of the house of Israel in Matt. x. The fragments left over after the miraculous feeding of the five thousand were gathered so that nothing should be "lost" (John vi. 12). It is pitiable to hear those who should know better arguing that because we read of a "lost" sheep, which could not mean a "destroyed" sheep, that therefore the plain, primary meaning of the word must be ignored and the secondary derived meaning be understood in such clear, solemn passages as John iii. 16, &c.

Notice the way in which the Lord uses the word in Matt. x. 28. "Fear not them which kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul, but rather fear Him who is able to destroy both body and soul in hell (gehenna)." Here we have an argument which proceeds from the lesser to the greater. Man can only kill the body. God can destroy body and soul. Man may kill, but he cannot prevent resurrection. The murdered man will as surely rise in the resurrection as the one who dies of natural causes. It is different, however, with God. He can cast men into the lake of fire, which is the second death, from which there is no resurrection. Those who are thus cast in are destroyed body and soul, as being no more fit to live.

The parallel passage to this, Luke xii. 4, 5, shows that to "cast into gehenna" is to be taken as synonymous with "to destroy," or "to perish." This is further evidenced by Matt. v. 29, "It is profitable for thee that one of thy members should perish, and not that thy whole body should be cast into gehenna." Here the plain meaning is that it is better that a limb should perish than that the whole body should perish. There is no thought of agony and torment, for the Lord would have used the word in Matt. x. 28, "Fear Him who is able to torment both body and soul in hell," had He meant to convey such teaching.

The fact that men are "perishing" and need salvation is emphasised again and again. We have noticed the word in John iii. 16. In I Cor. i. 18 we read, "for the preaching of the cross is to them who are perishing--foolishness, but unto them who are being saved--unto us it is given the power of God." It is the same word (translated "lost" in A.V.) in II Cor. iv. 3, "If our gospel is veiled, to them who are perishing it is veiled."

Yet again in I Cor. xv. 18 we read, "If Christ hath not been raised, to no purpose is your faith, ye are yet in your sins, hence also they who are fallen asleep in Christ have perished." What does this mean? Does it mean that believers, apart from the resurrection of Christ, are at this moment suffering the agonies of hell fire? Certainly not. It means exactly what it says. Without resurrection the believer, like the unbeliever, will have perished, will have passed out of being, will have been destroyed. The idea of a conscious intermediate state, with departments in some mythological hades, is foreign to the Scriptures and antagonistic to this passage. Death ends life, and apart from resurrection death means utter destruction. Praise be to God for this blessed hope. Resurrection, which is everywhere the one theme of hope in the Scriptures, is set aside by orthodoxy, and death instead is eulogised as the gate to life.

We have yet further evidence as to the meaning of this word apollumi by considering the inspired interpretation of the word Apollyon (Rev. ix. 11), which is a derivative of apollumi. The passage gives us the Hebrew equivalent of apollumi, it is the word Abaddon, from abad, which we considered on page 8 of this Volume. The unmistakable meaning of abad is to destroy, and thus we are given, to confirm our faith, the divine warrant that the word under consideration means to "destroy." In the context of Rev. ix. 11 the locusts, whose king is Apollyon, are definitely witheld from destroying or killing (their normal work), and are only permitted to torment men for five months, after which other horsemen receive power to kill those who had not the seal of God in their foreheads. Before passing on to the consideration of the next word, we would like to quote the primary meaning of apollumi as given by Liddell and Scott:--

"Apollumi. To destroy utterly, to kill, slay: of things, to demolish, to lay waste, to lose utterly."

Apõleia.--This word is a noun derived from the word apollumi, and means destruction. It is rendered by the A.V. as follows: "damnation," once; "damnable," once; "destruction," 5 times; "to die," once; "perdition," 8 times; "pernicious ways," once; and with eimi eis and accusative, "perish," once; "waste," twice. The words "damnation" and "damnable" both occur in II Pet. ii. 1, 3, "damnable heresies," and "their damnation." The same word is rendered "pernicious ways" in verse 2, and "destruction" in verse 1. Here the one word apõleia is rendered by the four words in those verses. The R.V. renders the word "destruction," and destruction consistently (the word "pernicious" in verse 2 is not apõleia in the best Greek MSS and is rendered "lascivious doings" in R.V.). In II Pet. iii. 7 the word occurs again, translated "perdition," and finally in verse 16 it is translated "destruction," which passage the R.V. renders as in the second chapter - "destruction."

Once again we shall find that this word, like apollumi, is contrasted with life, "Broad is the way that leadeth to destruction. . . .narrow is the way that leadeth unto life" (Matt. vii. 13, 14). The context immediately continues, "Beware of false prophets," which connects this passage with its inspired exposition in II Pet. ii. 3. In John xvii. 12 we have a solemn passage wherein the Lord uses both apollumi and apõleia. "None of them is lost, but the son of perdition." This is also the title of antichrist in II Thess. ii. 3. Again the word occurs in Acts viii. 20, "Thy money go with thee to destruction." In Rom. ix. 22 we read of "vessels of wrath fitted to destruction." The apostle uses the word twice in Philippians, "token of perdition" (i. 28), and "whose end is destruction" (iii. 19). In I Tim. vi. 9 we have a collection of words, of which the Greek language does not possess any stronger, to express literal death and extinction of being. Hurtful lusts which drown men in destruction (olethros) and perdition (apõleia). Does it not appear unreasonable to say continually that men will perish or be destroyed if they are, in fact, to be kept alive in suffering, and that they are to be miraculously preserved from perishing or from being destroyed?

There is one more point which we must bring forward before closing this article. The subject of the soul, its nature and immortality, is discussed at great length by Plato in the Phædon, a dialogue on Immortality, and therein is discussed the question of the literal destruction and extinction of the soul. Plato wrote in Greek, his native tongue, and the Phædon became the great classic treatise on the subject of Immortality, read, studied and debated throughout the Greek-speaking world during the four hundred years between its writing and the ministry of Christ. Plato's words practically stereotyped the philosophical phraseology of the time. The purpose of the dialogue is to show that in death the soul does not become extinct, that it cannot die, perish, or be destroyed. Modern orthodoxy, therefore, is found ranged with Plato against the Word of God. These words of Plato were known and of fixed meaning in the days of Christ and the apostles. Christ come to reveal the truth. Shall we say that, knowing as He did the meaning of the words used on the subject of the soul, He wilfully, and without explanation, took those very words concerning the very same subject, and used them in an altogether contradictory sense! The idea is impossible. With reference to the philosophic usage of apollumi, we give the following extract from the Phædon:--

> "Socrates, having said these things, Cebes answered: I agree Socrates, in the greater part of what you say. But in what relates to the soul men are apt to be incredulous, they fear. . . . that on the very day of death she may be destroyed and perish. . . . blown away and perishes immediately on quitting the body, as the many say? That can never be. . . . the soul may utterly perish. . . . the soul might perish. . . . if the immortal be also perishable. The soul when attacked by death cannot perish."

To those who knew these words, who taught them, and argued about them, was sent a "teacher from God," and standing in their midst He reiterated the fact that Plato was wrong, that the soul could be destroyed, that it would perish. What would any of that day have thought of the suggestion to make such words convey the sense of endless misery, so diametrically opposed to their meaning? Would he not have been justified in replying in the language of a well-known public school headmaster:--

> "My mind fails to conceive a grosser misinterpretation of language than when the five or six strongest words which the Greek tongue possesses, signifying 'destroy,' or 'destruction,' are explained to mean maintaining an everlasting but wretched existence. To translate black as white is nothing to this."

We believe sufficient has been shown to establish the fact that, in the usage and meaning of apollumi and apôleia, destruction, utter and real, is the true meaning, and that this is the wages of sin.

DEAR FELLOW-MEMBERS,

For the mercies and fellowship that have made possible a reprint of these Volumes we give thanks.

We still desire greater light, deeper love, richer liberty, and fuller life, in Christ.

GREATER LIGHT.—"The entrance of Thy words giveth light" (Psalm cxix. 130). More and more we are learning the value of the Word and words of God. No amount of reasoning or striving about the Word will illumine our darkness. The words must enter. One has suggested that the passage means, T*hy words enter; light is given*. We are in the dark, and in uncertainty concerning some subjects; our desire is to let the Word and words of God have an entrance. This we trust will characterize the articles more and more; not the developing of a preconceived scheme, but the placing of the words before the reader that they may enter.

DEEPER LOVE.—Light without heat and light without love are parallels. To be sound in the faith requires something more than mental acquiescence to truth. May we all earnestly covet this indispensable grace.

RICHER LIBERTY.—Many of us have rejoiced in liberty for some time. May we remember that we have this liberty in order that by love we may serve one another.

FULLER LIFE.—Life, light, love, liberty, fuller, greater, deeper, and richer, are possible only in Christ. We need fear no darkness there, no coldness there, no bondage there, no deadness there.

May our gratitude be expressed by a better realization of these graces.

Yours in love that passeth knowledge,

Doctrine and Practice.
p. 70

Sound doctrine may be contradicted (I Tim. i. 10).
It is linked to the life (“Take heed unto thyself, and unto the doctrine,” I Tim. iv. 16).
The service of slaves could reflect upon it (I Tim. vi. 1).
Paul could connect his doctrine with his “manner of life” (II Tim. iii. 10).
We are privileged to “adorn the doctrine of god our Saviour in all things” (Titus ii. 10).

Points for Preachers.
"For" (Rom. i. 16-18).
p. 106

16. For I am not ashamed of the gospel of Christ: for it is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth; to the Jew first, and also to the Greek.
17. For therein is the righteousness of God revealed from faith to faith: as it is written, The just shall live by faith.
18. For the wrath of God is revealed from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men, who hold the truth in unrighteousness;

1. "For I am not ashamed of the gospel."—"Not ashamed" (cf. Rom. v. 5), a figure of speech where one lessens a thing in order to increase it. Paul really gloried in the gospel. All men, whether wise or foolish, whether Jew or Greek, stood equally in need of this gospel.

2. "For it is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth."—The gospel is not a moral code, it is dynamic; it works, it is the power of God. The clause explains the reason why the apostle was "not ashamed," viz., (a) the gospel was the power of God, (b) it was unto salvation, (c) it was to every one (irrespective of race) who believed.

3. "FOR therein is revealed a righteousness of God from faith unto faith."—Here is the secret of the power of the gospel. The sinner's deepest need, though he may not at first realize it, is not simply the forgiveness of sins (a negative blessing viewed alone), but its scriptural concomitant righteousness (cf. argument of Rom. iv. 6, 7). This righteousness is entirely outside law and works. It begins and ends (ek eis) with faith.

4. "FOR the wrath of God is revealed. . . . against all unrighteousness."—The gospel reveals righteousness. The need for this is emphasized here by reason of the other revelation—the wrath of God upon all unrighteousness.

The above suggestion is merely a skeleton. Let individual study clothe the bones with flesh, and may the Spirit of truth inspire the lifeless preparation with power.

[NOTE.—The Prison Epistles do not preach a gospel to the unsaved, their message being rather addressed to the believer. The doctrinal portions of Romans supply the basis upon which the teaching of the mystery is built.]

Rom. v. 5	And hope maketh not ashamed; because the love of God is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost which is given unto us.
iv.	6. Even as David also describeth the blessedness of the man, unto whom God imputeth righteousness without works, 7. Saying, Blessed are they whose iniquities are forgiven, and whose sins are covered.

Editorial.
pp. 173-175

To speak of the future apart from the Lord, with dangers not only invisible and spiritual but physical and evident, is manifestly foolish. However, if the Lord will, we hope that the witness of The Berean Expositor will be continued monthly and rendered increasingly useful to readers and glorifying to the Lord.

We are thankful to feel that none will ever become subscribers, or constant readers, who do not believe and love the Word of God. We desire to recognize the fact more definitely than we have done hitherto, that our readers are not all of the same degree of advancement, or capacity. For those who are young in the faith, and who desire to understand the rightly-divided Word, we hope to give a series dealing with The Fundamentals of Dispensational Truth. In these articles we shall traverse much that has already been put forward in these pages, but we shall limit each article, as far as possible, to one subject or phase of truth, so that the veriest beginner shall not stumble. Incidentally, more advanced readers may be refreshed and stimulated at reading "things old," and may find help in laying the subject before others.

For those readers who are prepared to go further into the deeper things of the Word, we have in hand a series devoted to The Things that Differ. In these articles subjects will be discussed about which none of us may feel justified in making a final statement, yet which are floating about in our minds, dimly colouring our interpretations and exercising over us an unconscious influence. We want to bring them to the light, and examine them by the teaching of the Word. The expository articles on Ephesians, Revelation, and the Parables we hope to continue, and as occasion offers to resume the little talks about the archaeological treasures in the British Museum. Much as we have desired to give more attention to Answers to Correspondents, limitations of space and lack of time have prevented its accomplishment.

Prayer would be valued regarding the faithfulness of this little magazine. Readers can hardly imagine the continued pressure under which we seek to maintain our stand. Inducements are held out from many sides, either to commit ourselves to unproved teaching, to omit any reference to debatable doctrine, or to take up an attitude for or against certain ideas from the position of the champion of a creed. These things are ever so much harder to meet than direct opposition. They come from well meaning friends, not from open enemies. We do not want to be unkind, but we must speak plainly. Under no circumstances can this magazine champion any one line of teaching to the closing down of enquiry into some other opposing line. Under no circumstances can the magazine hesitate to follow the teaching of the Word merely because in past pages we have made certain statements which would be rendered untrue by such following. We desire the truth, and if the discovery of truth should render null and void every number of The Berean Expositor yet published we should not consider that it had failed of its purpose, but should rather see in this its greatest fulfilment. No reader of the magazine is asked to make it his Bible. All we can do, or dare attempt, is to open up the Word.

Dear reader, if this is your desire we gladly welcome your fellowship. If, however, you have some pet idea which must always be favoured, never discussed and never upset, then we are afraid you will be out of sympathy with our little witness. It is human nature that expresses itself in the words so often uttered or written to us to the effect that we are afraid of facing certain lines of teaching, or that we are prevented from so doing by certain considerations. We feel fairly easy, however, on these points, as the same thing is said from so many sides as to render the statement contradictory. We feel a sympathy with Paul the apostle when we find how much he was misrepresented and abused, though by saying this we do not pretend to be as faithful or as innocent of self-seeking as that man of God, far from it. Readers will pardon, we trust, this somewhat personal note, yet sometimes these statements are necessary to clear the atmosphere and keep us walking in a straight path.

p. 186 (end)

The words “truly” (verse 1), “verily” (v. 13), and “surely” (v. 18), of Psalm lxxiii., are renderings of the same Hebrew word, and may be rendered uniformly by the one Phrase, “after all.” Psa. lxxiii. commences the third book of the Psalms, and gives particular prominence to the sanctuary. The first verse is practically a summary, not merely of the whole Psalm, but of the whole section (lxxiii. - lxxxix.). “After all, God is good to Israel, even to such as are of a clean heart.” This conclusion, however, was not reached by Asaph at once. Verse 2 commences his experimental lesson. Asaph was envious at the arrogant when he saw that they were not in trouble as other men. He, like so many of us, saw merely the external and present, “Until I went into the sanctuary of God, then understood I their end” (verse 17). From that standpoint envy turns to pity. He no longer says that he has cleansed his heart in vain, but confesses, “After all, Thou didst set them in slippery places." We may, by failure to recognise His purposes, be tempted to say the "after all" of verse 13, yet when we attain the view point of the sanctuary we shall certainly re-echo the words, "After all, God is good to Israel."

Psalm lxxiii.

1. Surely God is good to Israel, Even to such as are pure in heart.
2. But as for me, my feet were almost gone; My steps had well nigh slipped.
3. For I was envious at the arrogant, When I saw the prosperity of the wicked.
4. For there are no pangs in their death; But their strength is firm.
5. They are not in trouble as other men; Neither are they plagued like other men.
6. Therefore pride is as a chain about their neck; Violence covereth them as a garment.
7. Their eyes stand out with fatness: They have more than heart could wish.
8. They scoff, and in wickedness utter oppression: They speak loftily.
9. They have set their mouth in the heavens, And their tongue walketh through the earth.
10. Therefore his people return hither: And waters of a full cup are drained by them.
11. And they say, How doth God know? And is there knowledge in the Most High?
12. Behold, these are the wicked; And, being alway at ease, they increase in riches.
13. Surely in vain have I cleansed my heart, And washed my hands in innocency;
14. For all the day long have I been plagued, And chastened every morning.
15. If I had said, I will speak thus; Behold, I had dealt treacherously with the generation of thy children.
16. When I thought how I might know this, It was too painful for me;
17. Until I went into the sanctuary of God, And considered their latter end.
18. Surely thou settest them in slippery places: Thou castest them down to destruction.
19. How are they become a desolation in a moment! They are utterly consumed with terrors.
20. As a dream when one awaketh, So, O Lord, when thou awakest, thou wilt despise their image.
21. For my soul was grieved, And I was pricked in my heart:
22. So brutish was I, and ignorant; I was as a beast before thee.
23. Nevertheless I am continually with thee: Thou hast holden my right hand.
24. Thou wilt guide me with thy counsel, And afterward receive me to glory.
25. Whom have I in heaven but thee? And there is none upon earth that I desire besides thee.
26. My flesh and my heart faileth; But God is the strength of my heart and my portion for ever.
27. For, lo, they that are far from thee shall perish: Thou hast destroyed all them that play the harlot, departing from thee.
28. But it is good for me to draw near unto God: I have made the Lord Jehovah my refuge, That I may tell of all thy works.

Berean Expositor Volume 4 & 5

Answers to Correspondents.

"Be not thou therefore ashamed of the testimony of our Lord, nor of me His prisoner" (II Tim. i. 8). pp. 47-51

> " 'God has spoken unto US in (His) SON.' The Holy Spirit says, 'To-day, if ye will hear HIS VOICE harden not your hearts.' Christ Himself has a solemn warning concerning those who are ashamed of His Words. I ask you to consider solemnly what effect has Dr. Bullinger's teaching upon the attention given by the Lord's people to HIS OWN WORDS? Believe me, my dear brother, there is grave danger here. It is not a question whether or not a new dispensation began when Paul went to prison. Very serious consequences are involved, and I can give you no better advice at this time than to drop 'Things to Come' entirely, and give yourself to prayerful reading of the Word—ESPEC IALLY THE GOSPELS."
> (Extract of letter relating to the teaching of The Berean Expositor and Things to Come. The words in italics indicate that the writer underscored with one line, those in capitals, when he used two or three underscorings).

As we have said when quoting from or alluding to the writings of others in this magazine, we desire no personalities to mar our testimony. We simply consider the doctrine quite independently of the one who may be the author. It is extremely difficult to avoid the appearance of striving, we therefore purposely omit the name of the writer, and trust that all concerned will realize the spirit in which this criticism is given. The extract quoted above, with its emphasized portions, is such a common argument with those who reject the peculiar ministry of the apostle to the Gentiles, that we feel a word or two upon the subject may not be amiss just now.

The apostle wrote, "If there be any virtue, and if there be any praise, reckon these things," and it is a pleasant thing to see that those who use the argument referred to have a big place in their hearts for the truth of God, and the glory of Christ. We meet here on common ground, believing the Word and seeking to exalt our Lord. If the argument of those who agree with the extract quoted above be valid and of force, then one section of Scripture is inspired in a higher degree than another, for if the Gospels of Matthew and of Mark are of more weight and authority than the Epistles of Paul, it must be because the Gospels give us the very words spoken by Christ Himself, whereas the Epistles of Paul do not tell us the very words spoken by Christ Himself, and consequently, while perhaps inspired, are not so absolutely binding as the words of the Gospels, but contain a big element of Paul's "private interpretation."

If we are disposed to retort, or seek merely to argue the subject, we might reply that those who read the Gospels are dependent after all upon the truthfulness of Matthew,

Mark, Luke, or John, for Christ wrote not a word, either in the Gospels or the Epistles, and as far as we know never spoke Greek. If it is fair for some to call us "Paulites," it would be equally fair for us to call them "Matthewites," and in both cases Christ Himself would only be heard through the written words of His servants. For our own part we believe that the Gospels, and the Epistles, together with the rest of the Bible, are equally inspired, and we hear the voice of the Son of God in O.T. Prophets (I Pet. i. 11), the Gospels, the Epistles and the Revelation. We believe that He Who is the Word speaks as plainly from one book as another, and that the idea contained in the emphasized parts of the extract above are radically wrong. We, too, from an entirely different aspect would say, "Believe me, my dear brother, there is grave danger here."

It may be as well if we do read some of the Lord's Own words as recorded in the Gospels, to discover something of His teaching relative to His ministry. In John vii. 16 the Lord says, "My doctrine is not Mine, but His that sent Me." Again in viii. 28, "As My Father hath taught Me, I speak these things." Again in xii. 49, "I have not spoken of (ek = origin) Myself, but the Father which sent Me, He gave Me a commandment, WHAT I SHOULD SPEAK." Again in xiv. 24, "He that loveth Me not, keepeth not My sayings; and the Word which ye hear is not Mine, but the Father's which sent Me." Finally in xvii. 8, 14, "I have given them the words which Thou gavest Me. . . . I have given them Thy Word."

If we really do heed the words of the Lord Jesus Christ Himself, we shall see that, marvellous as the fact may be, He spoke nothing which originated from Himself; every word He uttered was the Word of God, with no added thought or idea of His Own. While we gladly confess that the Lord Jesus Christ was the Word Himself made flesh, that He is the real God (I John v. 20), yet in obedience to His words we must say (as He said) that they were not His words; consequently, when Moses spoke by the inspiration of God, the value of the utterance was on exactly the same level as the words in the Gospels, for both came from the same Author. When Isaiah spoke "Thus saith the Lord," the words were not his, but the One who sent him. When Paul spoke the Word of the Lord it was not "Pauline" (if the Epistles are inspired Scripture), it is as the apostle himself says, "not as the word of men, but as it is in truth the Word of God." We quite realize the solemnity and the attractiveness of the words as spoken by the human lips of the very Son of God, but we are likely to be ashamed of His testimony if we follow the advice given above and read "especially the Gospels," for He has spoken since the words recorded in the Gospels were uttered. Is it blindness that prevents our brethren from seeing this? Is it deafness which prevents them from hearing the voice of the Son of God after His resurrection?

Can anyone read Acts xxvi. 16-18 and say the Lord Jesus had not something to reveal to men which it pleases Him to keep back while on earth, and to speak through the apostle Paul from heaven? Does Acts xx. 24 tell us that Paul invented his gospel and appointed himself to the ministry, or does it tell us that he received his ministry from the Lord Jesus? If so, the Epistles are either inspired, and therefore the Word of God and of Christ, or they are not, and therefore valueless. In the capacity of the "minister of the circumcision" (Rom. xv. 8) the Lord Jesus said:--

> "Whosoever shall be ashamed of Me and of My words, in this adulterous and sinful generation, of him shall the Son of man be ashamed, when He cometh in the glory of His Father with His holy angels" (Mark viii. 38).

In His capacity as Head of one body the church, the same One said through His servant Paul:--

> "Be not thou therefore ashamed of the testimony of OUR LORD, nor of me His prisoner" (II Tim. i. 8).

The apostle leaves us in no doubt as to the importance of the link between the testimony of the Lord, and of himself the prisoner, for in this very epistle he emphasizes repeatedly this special and important fact:--

> "Have a pattern (a sketch before the finished design) of sound words, which thou hast heard of me" (II Tim. i. 13).

Is the personal element here uttered by inspiration, or is it Paul "speaking of himself"?

> "The things that thou hast heard of me, among many witnesses, THE SAME commit thou to faithful men who shall be able to teach others also" (II Tim. ii. 2).

Here again absolute emphasis is laid upon the special teaching of the apostle himself. These are only two passages out of many wherein the apostle Paul urges the calm upon us, believers of the Gentiles, to give heed to Christ'S OWN WORDS, as spoken through His chosen vessel. Where in all the N.T. do we find the Lord Jesus Christ so magnified as in the testimony given through Paul His prisoner? Where in the Gospels can we find such a fulness, such a message of perfect acceptance, such a calling, and such a gospel of grace as the Lord has spoken to us from heaven during Israel's temporary blindness?

We are indeed involved in very grave danger if we turn our backs upon the words of Christ Himself. The pity of it is that some will not have the words which He has spoken to us, but go back to another dispensation to words spoken to others. There is we trust no need to criticise the error contained in the underscoring of the "us" in the quotation from Heb. i. 1. God never spoke to our "fathers" by the prophets; our "fathers" never tempted Him in the wilderness. Our "fathers," like ourselves, were aliens from the commonwealth of Israel. Rom. ix. 4, 5 tells us the only people "whose are the fathers."

> "Who then is Paul. . . . but a minister by whom ye believed"?
> "I have planted"
> "So then neither is he that planteth anything, neither he that watereth, but GOD that giveth the increase."
> "Let a man so account of us as of the ministers of CHIRST, and stewards of the mysteries of GOD."
> "For we are not as many who corrupt the Word of God, but as of sincerity, but as of God, in the sight of God, speak we IN CHRIST."
> "For we preach not ourselves, but Christ Jesus the Lord; and ourselves your servants for Jesus' sake."
> "We have this treasure in earthen vessels, that the excellency of the power may be of GOD and not of us."
> "Since you seek a proof of Christ SPEAKING IN ME. . . . examine yourselves whether ye be in the faith" (I and II Cor.).

They who said "I am of Paul," or "I of Christ" were carnal, and to such the "hidden wisdom" and all pertaining to it was "foolishness." "He that is spiritual descerneth all things."

"If any man think himself. . . . spiritual, let him acknowledge that the things I write unto you ARE THE COMMANDMENTS OF THE LORD, but if any man be ignorant, let him be ignorant" (I Cor. xiv. 37,38).

Acts xxvi. 16-18.

16. But rise, and stand upon thy feet: for I have appeared unto thee for this purpose, to make thee a minister and a witness both of these things which thou hast seen, and of those things in the which I will appear unto thee;
17. Delivering thee from the people, and from the Gentiles, unto whom now I send thee,
18. To open their eyes, and to turn them from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God, that they may receive forgiveness of sins, and inheritance among them which are sanctified by faith that is in me.

No.8.--Do you still regard the translation of aiõn by "for ever," etc., to be erroneous? Should aiõnios be translated "age-long"?--C. S. (Berks.).

On pages 89-93 of the reprint of Volume I. we examined the usage of the Hebrew equivalent to aiõn, namely olam, and there sought to show that the word did not mean "eternal," but referred to a period of undefined limits. The word aiõn also should be translated "age," and its various combinations, "unto the age," "the age of the ages," "the ages of the ages," "the purpose of the ages," etc. The adjective aiõnios is limited likewise in its meaning. It should never be rendered "eternal" or "everlasting," for aiõnian things have an end. "Age-lasting," or "age-abiding" are nearer the meaning, yet as these words limit the idea to time merely, we feel that they may prove as misleading as the A.V. renderings. Aiõn stands not merely for a period of time, but a period during which certain things are done, certain lines of purpose are elaborated, and therefore an aiõn stands for characteristics, as well as length of time. It seems that the only safe thing to do is to transliterate the words and use eon and eonian, supplying mentally the special characteristics which can be learned alone from the Word. The Berean Expositor stands for a rightly-divided Word. Hitherto our efforts have been engaged in pointing out the characteristics of the various dispensations. We have not seen these as fully as we would desire yet, nevertheless we have realized how important this right division is. Now just as a truth under one dispensation may be entirely false under another (as for example many things under Law as compared with the dispensation of the Mystery), so with truth in the ages. Doctrines which are true for this age may be false if projected into the ages to come. The right division of the ages will prove to be even more important and revolutionary than the right division of the dispensations.

Paul is inspired in Eph. i. to indicate some of the most important subjects that must occupy our attention; they are: "What is the hope of His calling, and what the riches of the glory of His inheritance in the saints, and what the exceeding greatness of His power to usward who believe." The wider range of the purpose of the ages can only be rightly understood when viewed from the more immediate standpoint of a true knowledge of the present age. This present age is very complex, being sub-divided into a series of dispensations, and we cannot hope to have very clear conceptions of what lies beyond the ages until the more immediate considerations are in some measure realized. The recognition of these things should, however, deter us from assuming finality on any line of doctrine which runs out to the confines of the great boundaries of inspiration. When we compare the large portion of Scripture which is written concerning that which pertains to the ages, with the space devoted to instruction concerning that which came before, and that which lies beyond the ages, the course of our study will be fairly evident.

No.9.—"The better resurrection" and "some better things for us" (Heb. xi. 35, 40).—Do these passages refer to the Church?

I take it that in your mind there is the idea that possibly the "better resurrection" and "better thing" is equivalent to the "out-resurrection" and "high calling" of Phil. iii. The only safe way to understand Heb. xi. is to be sure that we grasp, at least in some degree, the epistle as a whole.

The question of authorship not being in view, we will accept as proved that the apostle Paul was the human instrument. You will observe that, unlike the other epistles of Paul, there is no introductory salutation. No church is addressed, but instead a people to whose fathers God in time past spake by the prophets, and to whom God had, in the days then running out, spoken by His Son. After a most important parenthesis, in which much necessary teaching concerning the person and glory of the Son of God is brought to light, the apostle urges his readers (iii. 1) who are partakers of the heavenly calling to consider the Apostle and High Priest of their profession, Christ Jesus.

He follows his observations with a most pointed allusion to the days of Israel's wanderings:--

> "For some when they had heard did provoke: howbeit not all that came out of Egypt by Moses. . . . Let us therefore fear, lest a promise being left us of entering into His rest, any of you should seem to come short of it" (iii. 16, iv. 1).

The original sanctification of the Sabbath day was prophetic of a "Sabbath keeping" yet to come, for after Israel had entered the land, and David reigned as King, still the hope of a future entry into rest was held out, showing that Joshua ("Jesus," iv. 8) did not exhaust the promise in the days of old.

Chapter vi. urges readers to go on unto perfection, and to leave the things which are elementary, otherwise they, as Israel in the wilderness, will fade away, and fail to attain unto the "better things," namely, "things which accompany salvation," which are manifested by the exercise of faith, hope and love, in its work, labour and patience (vi. 9-12; cf. close parallel with I Thess. i. 3). "That ye be not slothful, but followers of them who through faith and patience inherit the promises." These promises are connected with the covenant made with Abraham, in connection with Christ in His office as Priest after the Order of Melchisedec, and consequently heavenly (vi. 13-20; vii. 11-22). The goal is something more than salvation. It is inheriting the promises, it is going on to perfection (vi. 1; vii. 11, 19). The "better things" of Heb. vi. 9 are connected with the "better hope" (vii. 19), and the "better covenant" (vii. 22; viii. 6). To encourage their faith they are reminded that though they may suffer the spoiling of their goods, they had in heaven a better and enduring substance. This brings us to Heb. xi. Every example there given is that of an overcomer through faith. In some instances the most pointed reference is made to the fact that their faith took hold upon that which was future and unseen—that is the characteristic of the faith of Heb. xi. as defined for us in verse 1. Noah was warned of God concerning things "not seen as yet"; Abraham "went out not knowing whither he went"; Moses "endured as seeing Him who is invisible." "These all died in faith, not having received the promises, but having seen them afar off." "They desire a better country, that is, an heavenly." They desired a better resurrection and would enter, with all those who thus endured and overcame, the better thing of Heb. xi. 40, which was connected with their being made perfect.

This is touched upon in chapter xii. where we read of "the heavenly Jerusalem, and the spirits of just men made perfect" (verses 22-24). The references from chapter iii., Caleb and Joshua, to Christ Himself in xii. 2, 3, emphasize this fact of overcoming and of entering rest and glory as a result. The argument is concluded in xiii. 13, 14:--

> "Let us go forth therefore unto Him without the camp, bearing His reproach. For here we have no continuing city (cf. Heb. xi. 9-16), but we seek one to come." "God is not ashamed to be called their God for He hath prepared for them a city" (Heb. xi. 16). "And I John saw the Holy City, New Jerusalem, coming down out of heaven. . . . he that overcometh shall inherit these things: and I will be his God, and he shall be My son. . . . Blessed are they that do His commandments (or have washed their robes, cf. vii. 14) that they may have right to the tree of life, and may enter in through the gates into the city" (Rev. xxi. 2, 7; xxii. 14).

The epistle to the Hebrews touches something beyond what we may call salvation simply, it goes on to inheriting promises and being perfected. Typically, at least, those whose carcasses fell in the wilderness were redeemed by the blood of the Passover Lamb. They did not miss salvation, though they missed Canaan, and this is the point of Hebrews, and a help to understanding "the better thing" of chapter xi.

The church which is His body does not come into view either in Hebrews or Revelation, although useful lessons may and should be learned by pondering these weighty things in the light of II Tim. ii. 11-13.

No.10.--F., Eastleigh.—"What is the difference between 'The old man' and 'The flesh'?"

As your question indicates that you have already gone so far as to limit both expressions to a doctrinal character, we will not take up space to discuss their primary meanings. Your difficulty lies in the inability to clearly express just the difference which is evidently intended in Scripture between these two terms when they are used doctrinally.

It may help us if we notice with what other terms they are used, and wherein these other terms either agree or differ.

Rom. vi. 6; Eph. iv. 22; Col. iii. 9 are the references in Scripture to the "old man." Let us look at the context of each passage.

Rom. vi. Deals with the question raised in verse 1, "Shall we continue in sin in order that grace may abound." The apostle's answer emphasizes the fact that believers have died to sin (2), have been baptized into his death (3, 4), and having died with Christ (8), are to reckon themselves dead indeed unto sin. Verse 6 comes centrally with the words, "Knowing this, that our old man was crucified with Him, in order that the body of the sin may be rendered inoperative, that we may no longer be enslaved to the sin." Read also verses 12 and 14. It will be seen that the "old man" in some way signifies something which gives power to the body of the sin, the reign of sin, and the dominion of sin. This reign of sin was introduced by Adam's transgression (Rom. v. 12, 14), and the "old man" is connected with Adam and the result of his fall upon his seed.

In Eph. iv. 22 the "old man" is connected with a manner of life, and is contrasted with the "new man" (verse 24) which has been created in "righteousness and the holiness of the truth." Similarly in Col. iii. 9, 10 we find the old man and the new man connected with a manner of life, and the expressions "put off" and "put on." In Col. ii. 11 you might notice and ponder, "the putting off of the body of the flesh," in conjunction with these verses, and "the body of sin" in Rom. vi. 6. If Rom. vi. tells us of the crucifixion of the old man, Gal. v. 24 tells us of the crucifixion of the flesh with its affections and desires. This, you will observe by the argument of verse 25, compared with Col. ii. 20, is subsequent walk than the initial act of faith. The "old man" is contrasted with the "new man"; the flesh is nearly always contrasted with the spirit. (See Gal. v. 17-25; iii. 3; vi. 8; John iii. 6; Rom. viii. 5, 6, 7, &c.). The flesh seems to stand for a condition of sinfulness (Rom. vii. 5, 18; viii. 8), and to indicate the remainder of natural corruption (Rom. vii. 18, 25). Note well such expressions and their contexts as "after the flesh," "according to the flesh," "in the flesh," "carnal," "carnally."

Without attempting to cramp the mind by a premature definition, the old man seems to indicate that principle of innate corruption and sinfulness which pertains to all descendants of Adam, while the flesh is the medium and sphere of its operations. As the old man is more like the root of the matter, it is not seen so readily, hence the number of passages which deal with the flesh is great, the number dealing with the old man being small. May we rejoice in knowing "the truth in Jesus"; namely, that we have put off the old man, and have put on the new, and may we ever seek to walk in harmony with such truth, to the praise of the God of all grace.

Rom. vi. 6	Knowing this, that our old man is crucified with him, that the body of sin might be destroyed, that henceforth we should not serve sin.
Eph. iv. 22	That ye put off concerning the former conversation the old man, which is corrupt according to the deceitful lusts;
Col. iii. 9	Lie not one to another, seeing that ye have put off the old man with his deeds;

2. Collect other references to "flaming fire," "vengeance," "tribulation," "man of sin."
3. Does this collection seem to link II Thess. with Israel and the kingdom, or with the Church of the Mystery?
4. "So write I" (II Thess. iii. 17). Explain this; II Thess. ii. 2 will help.
5. Find a parallel with II Thess. ii. 9 in Heb. ii., and say what light this throw upon the character of the "last days."
6. The word translated "gathering together" in II Thess. ii. 1 occurs but once more, Heb. x. 25, "assembling together." LOVE.
"Though I. . . . understand all mysteries. . . . and have not love, I am nothing" (I Cor. xiii. 2).
pp. 54-55

We are daily adding to our knowledge of the deeper teaching of the Word; fresh beauties shine forth from the sacred page; we seek increasingly "rightly to divide the Word of truth," and with this increased knowledge and light one might be led to imagine that spiritually nothing much was left to be desired. As we read the Scriptures, however, light and knowledge are not put foremost, love is first and greatest and must be in all times the criterion of our true spiritual advancement. When the Lord was questioned by the lawyer as to which was the great commandment in the law, He replied:--

> "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind. This is the first and great commandment. And the second is like unto it. Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself. On these two commandments hang all the law and the prophets" (Matt. xxii. 37-40).

It should be observed that heart love comes before that of the soul, or of the mind. It is comparatively easy to love with the mind, to love in "word," or in "tongue," but to love "in deed and in truth" (I John iii. 18) necessitates the activity of the heart. When we notice the prayers of the apostle Paul in Ephesians i. and iii., we find that while "the knowledge of Him" and "to know what is the hope of His calling" are prominent in the first prayer, love figures very largely in the second, "rooted and grounded in love," and "to know the knowledge-surpassing love of Christ." In the practical section of Ephesians (iv. - vi.) the apostle exhorts the believer to a worthy walk, and the central occurrence of the word "walk" in that section is the exhortation to:--

This high standard is the basis of the apostle's appeal in Eph. v. 25, "Husbands, love your wives as Christ loved the church, and gave Himself for it." When the apostle would pray for the advancement of the Philippians, although he desired them to have "discernment" and ability to "try the things that differ," these were not the initial petitions. The Spirit of God knew only too well that discernment without love is withering and harsh, and knowledge without love but ministers to pride; therefore the apostle was led to pray first and foremost for the overflowing of their love, "And this I pray, that your love may abound yet more and more" (Phil. i. 9). In the Epistle to the Colossians the apostle speaks of putting on the new man, and as a climax says, "And above all these things, put on love, which is the bond of perfectness" (Col. iii. 14).

Let it be the earnest desire of every reader that our love shall keep pace with our advance in knowledge, otherwise our words must be written off as "sounding brass," and our knowledge as nothing worth. As space allows in subsequent issues we hope to consider some of the aspects of this chief of graces, and first of the Spirit's fruits, "ABOVE ALL. . . . LOVE."

LOVE.
pp. 94-96

The prominence given to the manifestation of Christian love calls upon every believer to consider his own relation to the teaching of the Word on this subject. It may be of service to us all if we endeavour to trace out some of the scriptural definitions of this grace, and to note the contexts of its many occurrences. Scripture speaks of "love without hypocrisy" and "love unfeigned," which makes us feel that there is the danger among believers of a counterfeit love, a feigned love, and causes all who have the truth at heart to desire a knowledge of the real thing itself.

The thirteenth chapter of first Corinthians contains a most striking summary of love, and to that chapter we will turn. After having "weighed in the balance and found wanting" loveless gifts, knowledge, understanding, zeal and almsgiving, the apostle proceeds to tell us something positive concerning love itself. The first statement which he makes is, "love suffereth long and is kind." The first quality which it has pleased God to tell us regarding unfeigned love is that it is longsuffering. Let is be ours at once to seek grace to manifest more fully that which the Lord holds so high.

The word "longsuffering" is a translation of the Greek makrothumeõ. Makrothumos is composed of two words, makros meaning love, or far, and thumos, the mind, anger. Makros is translated "far" in Luke xv. 13 and xix. 12, "into a far country"; "long" in Matt. xxviii. 14, "long prayer." The idea of distance seems to be uppermost, as in the first example.

Thumos.—The A.V. translates this word 15 times by "wrath," "indignation" once, "fierceness" twice. Dr. Bullinger in his lexicon has a full note on the word as follows:-- > Thumos, the mind, the spirit that is breathed out, an intense passion of the mind. . . . the animus, the working and fermenting of the mid, the demonstration of strong passion, which may issue in anger or revenge, though it does not necessarily include it" (p. 905).

Among the many graces which the apostle Paul detailed as proofs that Timothy and himself were approved as the ministers of God is found longsuffering. "In pureness, in knowledge, in longsuffering, in kindness, in holy spirit, in love unfeigned" (II Cor. vi. 6). It will be observed that longsuffering is linked to kindness, and that both are connected with "love unfeigned." As always, it will be found that the apostle practised what he preached. The reference to pneuma hagion (holy spirit) in this verse leads us to Gal. v. 22, where fourth in the list there given comes longsuffering. "Love, joy, peace"

(these are more directly connected with the work of the Holy Spirit), then come three more which may be said to spring out of these—the first of which is longsuffering. Not only do we find love and longsuffering linked in this cluster of spiritual fruits, but in Eph. iv. 1-3 we find that the exercise of longsuffering is a part of our walk, and also an important factor in the keeping of the unity of the Spirit.

> "Walk worthy of the calling wherewith ye are called, with all humility of mind and meekness, with longsuffering, forbearing one another in love, endeavouring to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace."

It will be observed that longsuffering is manifested by "forbearing one another in love." So important is it that we should be made to understand that our walk demands this exercise of longsuffering, that we meet with a parallel to Eph. iv. 2, 3 in Col. i. 10, 11. There, instead of being exhorted to walk worthy of the calling, we are told that the apostle prayed that we might:-- > "Walk worthy of the Lord unto all pleasing, being fruitful in every good work, and increasing in the knowledge of God; strengthened with all might according to His glorious power, unto all patience and longsuffering with joyfulness."

Longsuffering is twice linked with doctrine in II Timothy, once in Paul's own case, and once in the charge to Timothy (iii. 10 and iv. 2). Such is the character of true Christian love, after all but a faint echo of that great longsuffering of the love of God Who is "merciful and gracious, longsuffering, and abundant in goodness and truth." If only believers everywhere exhibited this precious characteristic, what a difference there would be. Yet even those who are truly members of the one body need the word of exhortation. If love suffereth long, should we be so easily annoyed and angered at the waywardness of our fellows? However great their offence against us our attitude is clearly defined. We should exhibit all longsuffering in the most aggravating case, or we have not this grace of love in its highest degree.

One more qualification must be noticed before we leave the consideration of the longsuffering of love, and that is the kindness which glows through the patience manifested. Just as Col. i. teaches us to have longsuffering with joyfulness, so I Cor. xiii. teaches us that love suffereth long and is kind. Love does not suffer long and grumble, or use hard looks and begrudge the longsuffering. Love suffers long and is kind. Love is ever ready to meet the offender more than half way. Offended and outraged, misunderstood and misrepresented, love still has no hard thoughts for those who cause the pain. Let us examine ourselves before the mirror of the Word. Does the reflection cause us to fear that we are in danger of exhibiting impatience, our quickness to take offence, our unwillingness frankly to forgive, let us acknowledge our failure. If we have manifested longsuffering, yet that precious salve may have sent forth an evil smell because of the dead fly of unkindness. The Lord is kind unto the unthankful (Luke vi. 35); He was indeed kind to us (Eph. ii. 7; Titus iii. 4), and should not we, offenders as all of us are, should not we most earnestly pray that we may have a little more of the love that suffereth long, and is kind?

LOVE.
"Love envieth not."
pp. 159

The words are translated "envy" in the A.V. Zelos has sometimes a good sense as in John ii. 17, and Rom. x. 2, as also zeloõ in I Cor. xii. 31, "covet earnestly," and xiv. 1, "desire"; sometimes, and in Scripture oftener, an evil sense, Acts v. 17, "indignation," Rom. xiii. 13, "envying," Gal. v. 20, "emulations." Phthonos on the other hand is not capable of a good signification (see Trench's New Testament Synonyms).

Emulation and zeal can be noble and beautiful, but too often the human heart is unable to behold superior qualities in others without envying them their superiority. Thus, as in sound so in fact, "to be zealous" may soon become "to be jealous"; "to covet" in the right sense of I Cor. xii. 31 may descend to the coveting of a baser and forbidden variety. True zelos beholds the good qualities in another, and desires to raise itself up to that standard. Zelos degenerated to "envy" desires only that the "envied" may be levelled to its own inferior rank.

"Love envieth not." Love can behold the gifts and graces in our brethren, can praise God for their bestowal and manifestation, can earnestly desire to be thus minded, and thus enriched, but love never entertains a jealous feeling against the object recognised as superior. Thus in Phil. ii. 2-4 we read, "that ye be like minded, having the same love. . . . let nothing be done through strife and vainglory (a close relative of envy, see Phil. i. 15, 16), but in lowliness of mind let each esteem other better than themselves." I Corinthians xiii. very pointedly calls this carnally minded church to the neglected spirit of love, without which all their boasted knowledge would but puff up, and their gifts but cause envy and strife.

John ii. 17	And his disciples remembered that it was written, The zeal of thine house hath eaten me up.
Rom. x. 2	For I bear them record that they have a zeal of God, but not according to knowledge.

I Cor. xii. 31	But covet earnestly the best gifts: and yet shew I unto you a more excellent way.
xiv. 1	Follow after charity, and desire spiritual gifts, but rather that ye may prophesy.

"What then?"

"What then? notwithstanding every way, whether in pretense or in truth, Christ is preached, and I therein rejoice, yea and will rejoice" (Phil. i. 18).

pp. 82-84

The words "what then," taken alone, have little or no meaning, but read in the light of the context in which they occur in Phil. i., a very precious lesson may be learned. Possibly the day had been when the apostle would have been roused by the miserable pettiness of those who refrained not from making the sacred proclamation of Christ a means of adding affliction to his imprisonment, and of seeking to make a party in opposition to the blessed unity which the apostle so loved. But now he had learned that the wrath of man even in the cause of truth hindered but never helped. He had learned to find his cause of rejoicing in "things above," and to seek to know "the fellowship of His sufferings" as something far more precious than the peace and quietness of earth. The grand yet difficult lesson of this passage is the complete subjection of everything personal. This is seen very clearly in the structure of the passage which is as follows:--

Phil. i. 12-26.

A | 12, 13. What Paul would have them know. Bonds were for furtherance of gospel.
  B | 14-18-. "Christ is preached." Personal consideration, such as "envy and strife," lost sight of.
    C | -18. Paul rejoicing in result of bonds.
    C | 19-20-. Paul expecting deliverance from bonds.
  B | -20-24. "Christ shall be magnified." Personal consideration, such as "life and death," lost sight of.
A | 25, 26. What Paul knew. His contiuance was for their furtherance of faith.

The two members "B" ("Christ is preached") and "B" ("Christ shall be magnified") are the two foci around which the other passages are arranged. Some were preaching Christ even of envy and strife. Each of the words "envy," "strife," and "goodwill" occur nine times in the New Testament. Envy moved the leaders of Israel to deliver the Lord Jesus to death (Matt. xxvii. 18). It is found in the midst of abominations (Rom. i. 29), and is the work of the flesh (Gal. v. 21). So also strife is found in Rom. i. 29 and Gal. v. 20. It was prevalent among the carnal Corinthians (I Cor. i. 11; iii. 3; II Cor. xii.20).

Goodwill, on the other hand, is a fitting frame for heralding Christ and His gospel (Luke ii. 14). The heart's desire of the apostle to those who were moved with envy and malice against himself was for their salvation (Rom. x. 1). Goodwill (good pleasure A.V.) is the grand setting of the glorious purposes of God according to Eph. i. 5 and 9.

Those who preached out of goodwill were actuated by love. True, in Phil. i., love is linked with knowledge. First, in the prayer of verse 9, the apostle who desired that they may have knowledge and discernment and ability to "try the things which differed" asks that "their love may abound." Knowledge without love would have given an acid tongue and a pharisaic spirit. In the passage immediately before us love is linked with knowledge. Some regarded the imprisonment of the apostle as a judgment from God, but others knew that he had been "set" for the defence of the gospel. In his noble endurance they loved him the more, and, moved by love out of goodwill, carried on the work he loved so well.

There is a solemn note struck here to which we should all give heed. The matter of the preaching was excellent. All preached Christ. The motive, however, was diverse. Those who preached Christ of envy and strife, of contention and retence, did so "not sincerely." The word for sincere is rendered "chaste" in II Cor. xi. 2, and "pure" in Phil. iv. 8, while the noun "pureness" occurs in II Cor. vi. 6 (see parallel though different word in II Cor. ii. 17). This reference leads us to see how the apostle ever sought to make his "doctrine, purpose, manner of life" agree. "Whatsoever things are honest. . . . if there be any virtue, and if there be any praise (logizesthe) think, reckon, impute these things" (Phil. iv. 8). He knew that Christ was preached of envy and strife, of contention and hatred, but he meets it with the glorious "WHAT THEN? Christ is preached." Stop there! he seems to say. Go no further. The Lord alone has the right to judge men and motives; if there be any virtue, if there be any praise, I will reckon these things, I will think on these things. WHAT THEN? Christ is preached, and I rejoice.

The readers of this magazine may at times find themselves the objects of hatred, malice, misrepresentation. Meet it beloved readers with Paul's "What then." If reviled, revile not again, if suffering, threaten not; you are in good hands. The perfect One Himself never attempted self-vindication; how much less His failing followers. If these few words are of any consolation, it is only in fulfilment of the passage, "the God of all comfort, Who comforteth us in all our tribulation, that we may be able to comfort them which are in any trouble, by the comfort wherewith we ourselves are comforted of God" (II Cor. i. 3, 4).

The Greek prepositions.
pp. 15-16

Ek.—The primary idea of the preposition ek is expressed in the words "out of," signifying the "issuing from within (the compass, sphere of) something." This elementary meaning can be seen in such passages as Matt. viii. 28; xv. 19, "coming out of the tombs," "out of the heart," &c. Ek shows the origin or source of anything, hence it is used of birth, cf. Matt. i. 3, "of Thamar." Origin is emphasized in John i. 13, "not out of blood. . . . but out of God." Three passages occur in Matt. xxi. which convey the idea of origin:--

> Verse 16. "Out of the mouths of babes and sucklings."
> Verse 19. "Let no fruit grow out of thee."
> Verse 25. "The baptism of John, whence was it? out of heaven, or out of men?"

How much more intense and true to life is the Greek idea of fruit growing out of a tree than the English expression, fruit growing on a tree. The change of expression is doctrinally important; fruit has direct connection with root, and believers need to remember this continually. The doctrinal importance is further seen in such passages as:-- > "A righteousness of God revealed out of faith unto faith." (Rom. i. 17).

> "Therefore it is out of faith that it might be by grace." (Rom. iv. 16).
> "The judgment was out of one to condemnation; but the free gift is out of many offences unto justification." (Rom. v. 16).

Keeping the idea in mind that ek in its secondary meaning denotes source and cause, out of which something flows, and is applied to both things and persons, the following usages will be worth considering:--

> "And many men died ek the waters" (i.e., the waters were the source of death to the men). (Rev. viii. 11).
> "Should live ek the gospel." (I Cor. ix. 14).
> "Declared to be the Son of God with power. . . ek resurrection of the dead." (Rom. i. 4).

In I Tim. i. 5 ek shows the origin or source of true love, and in Rev. xvi. 21 it indicates the "occasion or incidental origin" of the blasphemy.

"By reason of" is another rendering, given in Rev. viii. 13. The grounds of arriving at a judgment are indicated by ek in Matt. xii. 37, "for by (ek) thy words." Other usages, which still retain the original idea, "out of," are those which indicate a standard or rule; Matt. xii. 33, "by its fruit"; I John iv. 6, "hereby (ek toutou) we know"; price: Matt. xx. 2, "for (ek) a penny"; Matt. xxvii. 7, "bought with (ek) them."

In combination the primary force "out of" is strongly marked:--

Ekballõ.—To cast out (John ix. 34).
Ekdemeõ.—To be absent (II Cor. v. 6), literally "to be out from, or away from one's own people."
Ekklesia.—An assembly, "a called out people" (Acts xix. 39; Matt. xvi. 18, etc.).
Eklegomai.—To choose out (Eph. i. 4 "chosen").

The reader should collect the many other examples of the usage of this interesting preposition which are to be found on almost every page of the New Testament.

Helps by the Way.
The Greek prepositions.
pp. 59-60

Eis.—This preposition (the opposite of ek, out of, considered in our last paper), properly answers the question whither? and may be generally translated "into."

The underlying idea of motion, common to most prepositions, is well seen in this word. "Come into the house" (Matt. ii. 11). "Cast into the fire" (Matt. iii. 10). In Luke x. 36 and Acts iv. 17 it is translated "among," but in each case the direction of the motion, the goal, or end in view, is quite evident.

In Mark xi. 8 and Matt. xxvi. 6 it is rendered "in," and in Mark viii. 23 it is "on." It sometimes is enough to render the word by "to" (thitherward) as in John xi. 38, "Cometh to the grave." To translate the word by "into" would produce a false impression on the mind (cf. v. 41). So in John iv. 5, the Lord came UNTO, but not into Sychar (see verses 8 and 28). So again in John xx. 1, Mary Magdalene came UNTO, but not into the sepulchre (see v. 11). The underlying idea of the direction of motion may be felt in the expression "bind them into bundles" (Matt. xiii. 40). "Rent into two" (Mark xv. 38).

Sometimes eis is best expressed by the word "against," e.g., "Against the Son of man" (Luke xii. 10). "Sinned against heaven" (Luke xv. 18). "Trespass against thee" (Luke xvii. 3). When applied to time it indicates a point of time "against which," "for which," "till which," or a period of time "during." "Unto the next day" (Acts iv. 3). "Unto the end" (John xiii. 1). "Against that day" (II Tim. i. 12). "For many years" (Luke xii. 19). The secondary and figurative use of the preposition signifies aim, purpose, or end, still preserving the idea of the direction of motion. "For a testimony" (Matt. x. 18). "For the remission" (Matt. xxvi. 28). "For good" (Rom. xiii. 4). "To this end" (Rom. xiv. 9). Eis ti is "Why?", "For what?" (Matt. xxvi. 8). "That ye may know" (Eph. i. 18).

The condition into which something is brought is expressed by eis. "Unto an holy temple" (Eph. ii. 21). "Into darkness" (Acts ii. 20).

The results of an action. "Ye come together not for the better, but for the worse" (I Cor. xi. 17). The preposition sometimes indicates the object towards which some feeling is directed. "Use hospitality one to another" (I Pet. iv. 9). "Lie not one to another" (Col. iii. 9). It also indicates the person to whom, or thing to which, some statement refers, as in Acts ii. 25, "David speaketh concerning Him," and Eph. v. 32, "I speak concerning Christ and the church." A desire after something may be expressed by eis as in Phil. i. 23, "Having a desire to depart" (i.e., unto the departing).

The above are only some of the many ways in which this interesting preposition is used, but however remote at first the figurative use may appear from the original meaning of eis, direction of motion will be found to be the constant fundamental idea. In combination it occurs in eisagõ, "to lead in" (John xviii. 16; Heb. i. 6); eisakouõ, "to hear favourably" (literally "to hear towards") (Matt. vi. 7; I Cor. xiv. 21; Heb. v. 7); eiserchomai, eisodos, &c., all of which will repay careful study.

Luke	10	36	Which now of these three, thinkest thou, was neighbour unto him that fell among the thieves?
Acts	4	17	But that it spread no further among the people, let us straitly threaten them, that they speak henceforth to no man in this name.

Mark	11	8	And many spread their garments in the way: and others cut down branches off the trees, and strawed them in the way.
Matt.	26	6	Now when Jesus was in Bethany, in the house of Simon the leper,
Mark	8	23	And he took the blind man by the hand, and led him out of the town; and when he had spit on his eyes, and put his hands upon him, he asked him if he saw ought.

En.—We have considered the prepositions eis (into), and ek (out of), and the preposition en (in) completes this set of three related particles.

The primary signification of en is the result of the action suggested by eis, and indicates the place of rest. The meaning of the preposition is modified according as the usage indicates place, time, agency, &c.

PLACE is the simplest significance, and is nearest in meaning to the primary idea of the word, as "In the heart of the earth" (Matt. xii. 40). Sometimes en may be rendered "on," as Rev. iii. 21, "on the throne"; II Cor. iii. 3, "in tables of stone." The idea of proximity or nearness is conveyed by this preposition. "At the right hand of God" (Rom. viii. 34); "on the right hand" (Heb. i. 3). Many times en is best translated by "among"; cf. I Cor. ii. 6, and Col. i. 27, "among the Gentiles. . . . Christ among you."

TIME is indicated by this preposition, expressed in English sometimes by in (Matt. ii. 1), sometimes by on ("on a certain day"), sometimes by at ("at His coming," "at the last trump"), sometimes by within, e.g., John ii. 19. En ho indicates "in the time that," and is well rendered by the English "while" (John v. 7; Mark ii. 19). Those who sinned "in law" (Rom. ii. 12) are considered as being within its sphere (place) during its time of operation (time). Among the more important usages of en are those indicating:--

AGENCY.—"Through the prince of the demons" (Matt. ix. 34); "With what measure ye mete" (Matt. vii. 2); "Burn her with fire" (Rev. xvii. 16).

The use of en in the N.T. is sometimes equivalent to the Hebrew use of beth. Where the Greek authors would employ the Dative case alone to signify the cause or instrument, the New Testament writers followed the Hebrew, for example, Pataxomen en machaira(i), "Shall we smite with the sword" (Luke xxii. 49). Katapatesosin autous en tois posin auton, "Lest they trample them under their feet" (Matt. vii. 6). See also Rom. xv. 6; Luke i. 51; and Mark xiv. 1.

PRICE.—A further example of Hebraism is the use of en to denote the price of a thing (cf. Rev. v. 9 with I Chron. xxi. 24).

PARTNERSHIP.—"A man with an unclean spirit" (Mark v. 2). "Shall I come with (en) a rod, or in (en) a spirit of meekness" (I Cor. iv. 21).

There are many more examples of the figurative usage or secondary meaning of this preposition which the student is urged to search out for himself. There are also some suggestive combinations which will repay careful study, such as "At home" (II Cor. v. 6), endemeo is literally, "among one's own people." "Glorious" (I Cor. iv. 10; Luke xiii. 17), endoxois is literally "in glory." "To work effectually," energeo is literally to "energize" or "inwork" (see Eph. ii. 2; iii. 20; II Thess. ii. 7). "To think on" (Matt. i. 20), enthumeomai is literally "to have in mind." "Thoughts and intents" (Heb. iv. 12), enthumesis ennoia is literally "the things in the mind (passions, etc.), and in the mind" (understanding).

The reader can multiply examples and should tabulate his findings in such a way that they may be of service in after study.

Berean Expositor Volume 4 & 5

Contributions to the subject of Human Destiny.
The All Things (Ta Panta).
pp. 63-70

We have now completed our consideration of the Hebrew and Greek words used with reference to the Wages of Sin, and have settled once and for all the question which we purposed to answer, namely, Does Scripture teach the doctrine of eternal conscious suffering? The answer from the meaning and usage of the words of Scripture is an emphatic NO.

Our investigations, however, have not been exhaustive enough to warrant us assuming that we have considered the Scriptural teaching concerning Human Destiny in its wide scope. Our faith must comprehend all Scripture. It would be comparatively easy to write the articles in The Berean Expositor if it were the organ of any one particular creed or view; this is not its mission, however. It is not satisfied with what is known as orthodox belief relative to Hell and the future, as its articles have already shown, neither does it feel that the other lines of teaching relative to this great subject, such as annihilation on the one hand, and universal reconciliation on the other, allow the believer to have a faith that accepts all that God has written. The difficulty of the attempt to consider the subject as a whole, and refrain from the temptation of adopting one line of thought which is much simpler, must not defer us.

The general effect of such considerations will not be, superficially, so satisfactory as the effect produced upon subscribers to any one aspect of truth, but the Word of God abounds with problems which cannot be dismissed, which may remain unexplained until in resurrection we see, as now we cannot, the wider and vaster bounds of the purpose of the ages. This being so, all that we can hope to do is to point out the most obvious lines of truth, praying that our readers will not too hastily jump to a conclusion. It is saddening to hear believers speaking airily of these matters as though the problems were not worthy of consideration, or had all been scripturally explained. Among them is the use of the words "all things," a mere undefined term in the minds of many who use it. Before taking up the subject of Human Destiny as a whole, there are several topics which demand consideration, otherwise we shall be using terms with unsettled meanings. We proceed in this article to gather up some of the Scripture teaching relative to this expression, "all things."

Great emphasis has been laid upon the fact that the Scriptures which refer to reconciliation tell us that the reconciliation include all things. All Scripture being verbally inspired, no argument can be entertained which would seek to add to, or subtract from, the words of truth. Believing with all our heart that God has a meaning in every word He has caused to be written, and realizing that so much error has been perpetuated by taking man-made interpretations for granted, we propose a little study of the words,

"all things," in order that we may have an intelligent understanding of the scriptural meaning of them. It has been found in other connections that some have been clinging tenaciously to their idea of the meaning of God, instead of the true scriptural meaning. There are some who deny the inclusive force of "all things," and limit the words to an exceedingly narrow compass, while there are others who take the words to be boundless and absolutely without reserve, including the Devil, the Antichrist, the False Prophet, and those who are cast into the lake of fire.

In studying the use and the occurrences of this expression, it will be found that the article is employed in many instances in such a way as to call our attention to the all things under consideration, and to demand of us that we very earnestly seek to understand the bearing of the article and the context before we conclude that ta panta can be translated or interpreted of all things universally. The term "all things" occurs a little over 60 times in the epistles alone; 40 references are without the article, and the remaining 20 include the article. We intend to direct particular attention to the construction used in the smaller division (ta panta), but must just briefly touch upon the wider expression in passing.

The first occurrences in the epistles of the two constructions, with and without the article, are in Rom. viii. 28 and 32:--

> "We know that all things (panta) work together for good, to them that love God, to them who are the called according to His purpose."

Here, the word is without the article, and includes much that is evil as well as good. In verse 32 we read:--

> "He that spared not His Own Son, but delivered Him up for us all, how shall He not with Him graciously give us the all things" (ta panta).

Of course the article here may be merely the "second mention," and may refer back to verse 28; there are reasons, however, for doubting this. First, the reference is some distance away; secondly, it comes in a new section commencing with the words, "What shall we then say?" of verse 31; thirdly, the fact that the all things of verse 28, which are under the hand of God, may include most conflicting agents (Satan, the world, and evil as well as good), whereas in verse 32 the all things are graciously given "with Him." This seems to lead us to see that "the all things" may be a much less inclusive expression than "all things," and further, that the special term ta panta has been used by the Holy Spirit with a special meaning which it is our wisdom to investigate and to understand.

We meet the expression again in Rom. xi. 36 in a setting which is typical of its usage. After bringing before the reader the amazing grace and matchless mercy of God in His final dealings with Israel, the apostle concludes with the doxology:--

> "For of Him (ek, originating cause), and through Him (dia, efficient and ministerial cause), and unto Him (eis, final cause) are the all things (ta panta). To Him be the glory, unto the ages, Amen."

It will be observed that it does not say that the Lord is the originating cause of all things universally, but of the all things. It does not say that He is the ministerial cause of all things universally, but only of the all things, and it does not say that all things universally are unto Him as the final cause, but the all things. This emphasis at once suggests the question, What all things? and it is with a view to providing a scriptural answer that we continue our investigations. Even in the wider and more universal expression (that is with the article omitted) there are necessary limitations. The apostle said, "all things are lawful," but this is not universally true. Murder, lying, thieving, &c., were no more lawful to Paul the apostle than to Saul the Pharisee. "All things" must be considered in the light of the restrictions imposed by the law of Moses, the traditions of the Elders and the contextual references to various foods, idolatrous connections, &c. Eph. vi. 21, Phil. iii. 8, I Tim. vi. 17, and Titus i. 15 will supply other examples of the limitations of this wider expression.

Returning to the doxology of Rom. xi. 36, we compare it with the statement of the apostle in I Cor. viii. 5, 6. In Rom. xi. the scripture does not differentiate between "Him" of Whom are all things, and "Him" through Whom are all things. He is called "God" and "Lord" in the context (see verses 33 and 34). It is evident that the God of verse 33 is the Lord of verse 34, and the fourfold "Him" of verse 36. The apostle who wrote Rom. xi. had written I Cor. viii. 5, 6, and felt under no obligation to attempt to explain that which superficially is a difficulty to some. In contrast to the heathen conception of gods many and lords many (i.e., Baalim, demons, mediums), the believer recognizes one God, the Father, the originating cause of the all things (ta panta), and one Lord, Jesus Christ, the ministerial and mediating cause in reference to the same "the all things" (ta panta), and consequently to such "an idol is nothing in the world."

Again, the force of the expression (the all things) must be observed. This emphasis upon origin and ministerial cause is met with in the next reference, I Cor. xi. 11, 12:--

> "For as the woman is out of (ek, origin) the man, so also the man is through (dia, ministerial cause) the woman, but the all things (ta panta) are out of (ek, origin) God."

The next passage (I Cor. xv. 27, 28) we must consider together with Heb. ii. 8-10:--

> "For He hath put all things under His feet. But when He saith all things are put under Him, it is manifest that He is expected which did put the all things (ta panta) under Him. And when the all things (ta panta) shall be subdued under Him, then shall the Son also be subject unto Him that put the all things (ta panta) under Him, that God may be all in all."

We must not take it as proved that God cannot be all in all in the destruction of some as in the salvation of others, it is a sentimental conclusion which must not weigh with us here. In this passage we find the wider expression used first, then in repetition the article is used, and in this case it would seem that throughout one aspect is intended. This is further emphasized by the one exception which emphasizes the universality of the all things which are to be subjected beneath the feet of Christ. Heb. ii. 8-10 definitely states this:--

> "Thou hast put all things in subjection under His feet. For in that He put the all things (ta panta) under Him, He left nothing that is not put under Him; but now we see not yet the all things (ta panta) put under Him. . . . For it became Him, for Whom are the all things (ta panta), and through Whom are the all things (ta panta), in bringing many sons unto glory, to make the Captain of their salvation perfect through sufferings."

Returning for a moment to I Cor. xv. 27, 28, we must remember that the context speaks of the subjection and destruction of enemies. In verse 24 we read:--

> "Then the end, when He shall have delivered up the kingdom to God, even the Father, when He shall have abolished (katargeõ) every principality (arche), and every authority (exousia), and power (dunamis). For He must reign till He hath placed all enemies under His feet. The last enemy that shall be abolished (katargeõ) is death."

It is manifest by the sequence of thought that the principalities, authorities and powers which are to be destroyed are enemies, otherwise the connecting of verses 24 and 25 by the word "for" loses its force. Turning to Eph. i. 21-23 we read of the exaltation of Christ as being:--

> "Far above every principality (arche, see above on I Cor. xv. 27, 28), and authority (exousia), and power (dunamis), and lordship (kuriotes), and every name that is named, not only in this age, but also in that which is to come, and hath put all things under his feet, and gave Him to be Head over all things to the church, which is His body, the fulness of Him that the all things (ta panta) with all is filling."

It will be at once noticed that we have the repetition of those spiritual powers which were mentioned so particularly in I Cor. xv. The Epistles to the Ephesians and Colossians speak of principalities and powers several times, and as it is evident that these are largely in view with regard to the subject under consideration, we will take note of the passages before passing on:-- > "To the intent that now unto the principalities (arche), and authorities (exousia) in the heavenlies might be known by the church the manifold wisdom of God" (Eph. iii. 10).

> "For we wrestle not with blood and flesh, but with the principalities (arche), with the authorities (exousia), with the world-rulers of this darkness, with the spiritual things of wickedness in the heavenlies" (Eph. vi. 12).

> "For by Him were created the all things (ta panta), the things in the heavens and the things on the earth, the things seen and the things unseen, whether thrones, or lordships (kuriotes), whether principalities (arche), or authorities (exousia), the all things (ta panta) for Him, and unto Him have been created, and He is before the all things (ta panta), and by Him the all things (ta panta) consists, and He is the Head of the body the church, Who is the Beginning, First-born out of the dead, in order that among all He might become pre-eminent; because in Him it was thought good that all the fulness should dwell" (Col. i. 16-19).

> "Because in Him dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily, and you are filled full by Him, who is the Head of every principality (arche), and authority (exousia)" (Col. ii. 9, 10).

> "Having put off the principalities (arche), and the authorities (exousia), He made a public exhibition of them, having triumphed over them by it" (Col. ii. 15).

The parallelism of these verses is worth noticing:--

A | Eph. i. 21-23. Principalities, authorities, powers, lordships.—
Christ, Head of the body the church. Fulness.
B | Eph. iii. 10. Principalities, authorities.—The church linked with the principalities.
C | Eph. vi. 12. Principalities, authorities, world rulers, spiritual things of wickedness.—The believers' conflict.
A | Col. i. 16. . Principalities, authorities, thrones, lordships.—
Christ, Head of the body the church. Fulness.
B | Col. ii. 10. Principalities, authorities.—The church linked with the principalities.
C | Col. ii. 15. Principalities, authorities.—The Saviour's triumph.

As we read these passages together it seems difficult to think that the different references are all to the same spiritual powers. Some we find are placed beneath the Lord's feet (Eph. i. 22), and this position is not the place of the members of His body—to them He is Head. These same subjected powers (being guided by the parallel in I Cor. xv. and the emphasis there on enemies) seem to be the antagonizing spirits of Eph. vi. 12, and the ones over whom the Lord triumphed by reason of the cross. Others seem to be more closely associated with the church. Some are learning by the church the manifold wisdom of God (Eph. iii. 10), and are linked with the church of the one body by having Christ as a common Head (Col. ii. 10). The believer has been delivered from the authority (exousia) of darkness by the Lord who is the image of the invisible God, First-born of every creature. The meaning of the term "First-born" is defined by the reason given in the next sentence. He is First-born of every creature because by Him were the all things created. As we ponder the creations enumerated in verse 16, and their relation to the pre-eminence of the Son of God, it becomes manifest that we are not dealing with such creatures as are enumerated in Psalm viii.:--

> "All sheep and oxen, yea, and the beasts of the field, the fowl of the are, and the fish of the sea, and whatsoever passeth through the paths of the sea," but with mighty powers and beings over whom the Lord Jesus Christ is pre-eminent. The whole enumeration has reference to visible and invisible dominions and spiritual powers, and by comparison with the other passages referring to the principalities it would seem that some of these mighty beings not only antagonized the church (Eph. vi. 12), and Israel (Dan. x.), but also the pre-eminence of the Lord Jesus Christ Himself, and it is the reconciliation of these "all things" with which Col. i. is particularly concerned. Chapter ii. also shows that the opposition of these angelic powers in reference to "holding the Head" is still prominent in the inspired writer's mind.

It will be further observed that man is not mentioned in verse 16, nor is he included in the all things enumerated in the verse; he is treated quite separately in verse 18, as included in the church. The reconciliation of the all things (ta panta) looks back to those spiritual powers on earth, or in heaven, and man is introduced into the subject of reconciliation quite separately in verse 21. I Pet. iii. 22 emphasizes the subjection of angelic and spiritual powers to the risen Lord:--

> "Who is gone into heaven, and is at the right hand of God, angels, and authorities (exousia), and powers (dunamis) being made subject unto Him."

Rom. viii. 38, 39 includes them among the possible agencies that might be thought antagonistic to the believer:--

> "For I am persuaded that neither death nor life, neither angels nor principalities; neither things present nor things to come (cf. Eph. i. 21); nor powers, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creation shall be able to separate us from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord."

With these passages brought before the reader we would here for the time leave them. They demand careful and prayerful attention. It certainly appears that those angelic dominions are ranged under two heads, some antagonistic to the Lord and His people, and some ranged under the Lord as Head both now and in the fulness of the seasons (Eph. i. 10):--

> "That in the dispensation of the fulness of the seasons He might gather together under one Head the all things (ta panta) in the Christ, the things in the heavens and the things on the earth in Him."

Ta panta by its recurrence and contexts seems to be a term having in most cases a specific meaning. Those who dismiss the subject by saying of Col. i. 16, 17, 18 and 20, it reads "all things" and that is enough for me, are not rendering the homage to verbally inspired Scripture that they imagine. It does not say all things, but THE all things, and the insertion of the article at once defines and narrows the expression. The all things that are to be reconciled are described, they are in the main creatures of which we know practically nothing. Believers are now reconciled, but they are not included in the all things of the verse under notice. All things universally will be placed in subjection beneath the Lord, either beneath His feet or under Him as Head; the narrower expression ta panta is the term used by God when speaking of the reconciliation of all things. Let us keep close to the words of the Word, and may grace be given to both reader and writer to prove all things and to hold fast that which is good.

I Corinthians xv. 23-26

Many of our readers have had their attention directed to the words of the above passage, and hearts have been engaged with the wondrous theme of the glories of redeeming love. It is not our intention to attempt to criticize the doctrine which I Cor. xv. 23, 24 is believed by some of our brethren to yield. We would rejoice if that doctrine could be established scripturally. We fear, however, that injury will be done to the cause of truth by attempting to draw out of this passage arguments which are entirely beyond its scope and purpose, and in which feelings, inferences and foregone conclusions contribute no small share.

The Epistle to the Corinthians was written before Acts xxviii., and consequently before the dispensation of the mystery was a subject of revelation. If there is one epistle from which the mystery is excluded, that epistle is I Corinthians (see ii. 2 and iii. 1-3). Among the "perfect," the full-grown, the initiated, Paul spoke of deeper things, but when writing to the Corinthians he definitely says that they were not able to bear them. This epistle is not meat, but milk, yet I Cor. xv. is made to yield teaching which must be considered as the strongest of meat. The apostle deals with a series of difficulties and errors which had arisen in the church, chapter xv. being devoted to two of them, the gospel in verses 1-11, and the resurrection in verses 12-58. This second subject is further divided by the consideration of the two questions:--

(a) The fact of resurrection.	How? (verse 12), and
(b) The manner of resurrection	How? (verse 35).

The consideration of these questions occupies the remainder of the chapter. Verses 12-58 may be considered broadly together as follows:--

A | 12. The question of the fact of resurrection. "How?"
B | 13-32. The answer. Adam brings in death. Death destroyed by Christ.
C | 33, 34. The exhortation. "Awake to righteousness."
A | 35. The question of the manner of resurrection. "How?"
B | 36-57. The answer. The first man and the second. Death swallowed up in victory.
C | 58. The exhortation. "Be stedfast."

It will be found in the answers B, B, that there are things introduced which are common to both. In both we read of Adam in contrast with Christ. In both we read of death being either destroyed or swallowed up. In both we read of the kingdom, and we should be careful to see that our interpretation of the one section does not go beyond the scope indicated by the structure and by the reference to Adam. Turning to the passage immediately under notice, let us examine its wording:--

> "But each in his own order (or rank): Christ (the) firstfruits, afterward they who are Christ's at His coming. Then the end, whensoever He may deliver up the kingdom unto Him (who is) God and Father; when He shall bring to naught all rule and all authority and power. For He must reign until He shall put all His enemies under His feet. (The) last enemy that is to be destroyed is death."

That system of interpretation which takes into consideration the usage of individual words, and which does not dispense with a Concordance, is that which appeals most strongly to all true Bereans.

FIRSTFRUITS.—Where, how, and with what connection is this word used? The N.T. occurrences are eight in number, suggestive of resurrection:--

> "Because the creation itself also shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption. . . ." "But ourselves also which have the firstfruits of the Spirits" (Rom. viii. 20, 23).
>
> "What shall the receiving of them be, but life from the dead? For if the firstfruit be holy, the lump is also holy" (Rom. xi. 15, 16).
> "Salute my beloved Epænetus, who is the firstfruits of Achaia unto Christ" (Rom. xvi. 5).

"But now is Christ risen from the dead, and become the firstfruits of them that slept" (I Cor. xv. 20).
"Christ the firstfruits" (I Cor. xv. 23).
"Ye know the house of Stephanas, that it is the firstfruits of Achaia" (I Cor. xvi. 15).
"That we should be a kind of firstfruits of His creatures" (James i. 18).
"The firstfruits unto God and the Lamb" (Rev. xiv. 4).

The term "firstfruits" is taken from the O.T. and Leviticus xxiii. supplies us with its setting. The firstfruits followed Passover:--

"Ye shall bring a sheaf of the firstfruits of your harvest unto the priest; and he shall wave the sheaf before the Lord, to be accepted for you: and the morrow after the sabbath the priest shall wave it" (Lev. xxiii. 10, 11).

The first day after the sabbath! that was the very day of the Lord's resurrection. Following the Firstfruits came Pentecost (Lev. xxiii. 17), and at Pentecost a new meal offering was offered "baken with leaven, they are the firstfruits unto the Lord." As the resurrection of the Lord Himself fulfilled the type of verses 10 and 11, the believers at Pentecost and during the period of the Acts were "firstfruits" according to verse 17, with Rom. xvi. 5; I Cor. xvi. 15; and James i. 18. It is noteworthy that just as the firstfruits in Lev. xxiii. is preceded by Passover and followed by Pentecost, so I Corinthians observes the same order:--

"For even Christ our passover is sacrificed for us" (I cor. v. 7).
"Christ the firstfruits" (I Cor. xv. 23).
"I will tarry at Ephesus until Pentecost" (I Cor. xvi. 8).

It will be observed that every occurrence of the word is limited to those Scriptures which were written with reference to Israel and the kingdom; the term is never found in Paul's Prison Epistles.

AT HIS COMING.—The word "coming" is the Greek word parousia. The following sixteen references are all the occurrences of the word as used for the Lord's coming: Matt. xxiv. 3, 27, 37, 39; I Cor. xv. 23; I Thess. ii. 19; iii. 13; iv. 15; v. 23; II Thess. ii. 1, 8; James v. 7, 8; II Pet. i. 16; iii. 4; I John ii. 28. Again we observe that every quotation is taken from those Scriptures written with reference to the people of Israel and the kingdom. The term is never so used in any of the Prison Epistles.

THE END (To telos).—It is noteworthy that the portion of Scripture wherein we find the word parousia for the first time supplies us with the first occurrences of the words to telos (Matt. xxiv. 6, 14 and xxvi. 58). As the verses are read with their context it will be seen that the words have a special meaning when used eschatologically. Marl xiii. 7 and Luke xxi. 9 compelte the references in the Gospels, and the remarkable thing is that they all refer to one and the selfsame exclusive period. The next chronological occurrence is I Cor. xv. 24. Let us read the references together:--

Matt. xxiv. 6.	"The end is not yet."
Matt. xxiv. 14.	"Then shall the end come."
Matt. xxiv. 58.	"To see the end."
Mark xiii. 7.	"The end not yet."
Luke xxi. 9.	"The end not immediately."
I Cor. xv. 24.	"Then cometh the end."

There are thirteen other occurrences of to telos having reference to various subjects only one occurrence being found in the Prison Epistles, viz., Phil. iii. 19, "whose end is destruction." Every other occurrence of the word telos if examined will prove to a demonstration that telos means "end" in the simple meaning of the term, and to suppose an ellipsis and translate I Cor. xv. 24 by the words, ""the end (rank)," does violence to the grammar, ignores the witness of the Concordance, introduces a construction without parallel in any other of its occurrences, and ignores the witness of the link with the parousia, and the message of Matt. xxiv., Mark xiii., and Luke xxi. Christ the firstfruits was pledge of the harvest—"they that are Christ's at His parousia"; this is in perfect accord with the whole tenor of prophecy revealed up to the time of writing I Cor. xv. According to Matt. xxiv., after the harvest came the end; so also is it in I Cor. xv.

DESTROYED (katargeõ).—The word occurs27 times (3*9). What the Lord is to do for all in Adam He has done first of all in His Own case. Just as the pledge of our resurrection is the resurrection of Christ, so the destruction of death is set forth in the same way:--

> "But is now made manifest by the manifestation of our Saviour Jesus Christ, Who abolished (katargeõ) death, and illuminated life and incorruptibility through the gospel" (II Tim. i. 10).
> "That through death He might destroy (katargeõ) him that had the power of death, that is, the Devil" (Heb. ii. 14).

As one has well remarked, "The word must be handled in the same way in each case. If Satan is 'abolished' then he cannot be raised from the lake of fire, and if he is not, then the whole theory drops." Take other passages:--

> "That the body of sin might be destroyed" (Rom. vi. 6).

Will the body of sin ever be revived?

> "Not the wisdom of this age, neither of the princes of this age, which come to nought" (I Cor. ii. 6).

Will this folly or misrule be revived?

> "When I became a man I put away childish things" (I Cor. xiii. 11).

Is it ideal for a man to become childish?

> "The ministration of death. . . . which glory was to be done away" (II Cor. iii. 7).

Is this glory to be revived? (see verses 11-14).

> "Having abolished in his flesh the enmity" (Eph. ii. 15).

Will that enmity be revived again?

> "That wicked one. . . . whom the Lord shall consume. . . . and shall destroy" (II Thess. ii. 8).

> "Then the end. . . . when He shall destroy (katargeõ) all rule, and all authority, and power. For He must reign, till He hath put all enemies under His feet. The last enemy that shall be destroyed (katargeõ) is death" (I Cor. xv. 24-26).

Here we have the same word occurring twice, both having reference to the destruction of enemies. Scripture offers abundant evidence as to the manner in which these enemies are dealt with, and gives also the end and destruction of death itself. What is meant by death in I Cor. xv.? "By man came death"; "The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death"; "Death is swallowed up in victory"; "O death, where is thy sting?" "The sting of death is sin." It is perfectly clear that every reference other than verse 26 means the death which passed upon all men by virtue of Adam's sin. They do not go beyond to the second death—that is quite foreign to the whole passage. What warrant have we then to assume that verse 26 departs from the consistent meaning of every other passage in the context, and means the second death? The "destruction" of verse 26 is parallel with the "swallowing up" of death in resurrection. The subduing of all enemies is balanced by the "victory" of verse 57.

There is no Scripture which teaches resurrection from the second death; and on such a tremendous theme as this inference and deduction may be but blind guides which will only lead us into the ditch. Into the lake of fire, which is the second death, Death and Hades are cast. Why? To preserve them? to again deliver them up to continue their reign of darkness? or to destroy them as having no more place in the economy of the ages? Let it be perfectly understood that the doctrine of the reconciliation of all things is a separate issue. Its understanding must be the result of prayerful consideration of the passages which teach the subject. No good, but indeed positive harm, will follow that system of interpretation which uses the Word as a buttress to support teaching. We must go to the Scriptures as we would to a well of water, drawing forth its precious teaching, but not go to it to hang vast issues upon exceedingly slender inferences which will not stand the test of exegetical criticism.

I Corinthians does not teach anything beyond that which the apostle defined as "milk"; the Corinthians were not able to bear anything approaching the solid meat of the mystery of the gospel. The words used in the passage under consideration, "firstfruits," "parousia," "the end," "all things put under His feet," "destruction of death," are all perfectly consistent with the limited aspect of the kingdom, beyond which, at the time of writing, little or nothing had been revealed.

Let us not be in too much of a hurry to see the meeting point of all the doctrines of the Word. Free will, divine sovereignty, the origin and introduction of evil, and the destruction of the ungodly, present problems which seem to go beyond the grasp of finite minds, and are not explained in any fulness in the Scriptures. We feel that a weak point in the system of interpretation under notice is found in the fact that it consigns ever so many more to the lake of fire than Scripture warrants, and consequently seeks some way whereby they may be delivered out of it in order to agree with the teaching of reconciliation. We have dealt briefly with this question on pages 31-36.

One other consideration too important to miss is the meaning of the expression, "in Christ." Readers of this magazine, we feel sure, heartily believe that the verbal accuracy of the Scriptures is a real part of its inspiration, consequently, when we find two phrases nearly but not quite alike, we at once realize that the difference is worthy of close attention. Strictly speaking I Cor. xv. 22 is the first occurrence of this phrase in the N.T. where the article is used, and should be rendered "in the Christ." A careful study of the usage of the two expressions "in Christ" and "in the Christ" will shew that "in Christ" refers to doctrinal position, whereas "in the Christ" refers to the actual Person of the Lord, without carrying with it, necessarily, what is meant by the blessed term "in Christ." Take an illustration:--

> "All spiritual blessings in the heavenlies in Christ" (Eph. i. 3).
> "Gather together in one all things in Christ" (Eph. i. 10).

It will be seen that while both passages refer to the same blessed Person, two distinct ideas are involved. The words "in Christ" occurs twenty-five times, while the word "in the Christ" occur six times. Following is a list of the six; the reader can consult all other references for the other phrase: I Cor. xv. 22; II Cor. ii. 14; Eph. i. 10, 12, 20; iii. 4. The expression, "even so in the Christ shall all be made alive," must not be made to teach that those thus made alive are necessarily "in Christ" in the sense of the words as used of believers. We do not say they are or are not; what we are seeking is not a buttress for a theory, but the truth of God, whatever it may be.

The death mentioned in I Cor. xv. is Adamic death, and in no wise touches the second death—that is read into the passage from subsequent revelation. Christ is set over against Adam. All Adam's children are included in death; all shall be included in life by reason of the last Adam, the second Man. Death is to be destroyed, death is to be swallowed up in victory. The question which the apostle set out to answer was the question of resurrection. This he does most clearly and fully. To go beyond this to the then unrevealed second death, and the question of universal reconciliation, is to allow one's desires to outrun the true principle of exegesis. We must not add to the Word, even for the truth's sake. The great question of final universal reconciliation is untouched in this chapter. There is surely no one, if he were to give an honest answer to the question, Would you like to find that universal reconciliation was a fact? but would reply, Yes, with all my heart. This desire, however, proves nothing. Only the Word of God considered in all its facts can tell us the truth as to this, as to all else.

The death mentioned in I Cor. xv. is Adamic death. The words, "in Adam," are not only inclusive, but also exclusive. That death goes as far as the appointed death of all men. From that death all will be raised. The second death is entirely outside the scope of Adam's influence. Satan fell before Adam was created. Satan did not and will not die "in Adam." The redemption and reconciliation regarding all who die in Adam does not include Satan and his angels who have no connection with his headship. Yet beloved brethren and able Bible students have allowed their feelings and their wishes to carry them to this false position, forcing I Cor. xv. to teach that which is foreign to it.

Let us be Bereans in reality, believing all that the Scriptures say, but not believing anything that men, good men, better men than ourselves may say that Scripture says, until we have searched and seen whether these things be so.

While being unable to agree with existing interpretations, we do not feel that anything we have yet contributed to the exposition of this passage is either final or even necessarily correct. We still wait on the Lord, and search His Word, and desire to be willing for Him to teach us His truth—and for us take the consequences.

" When He shall have delivered up the kingdom "
(1 Cor. xv. 24-28)

Let us look a little closely into the wording of this passage, endeavouring by the grace of God to keep out our own thoughts, and to just implicitly follow the leading of the inspired Word. Many questions present themselves for consideration. What is "the end" here spoken of? Is there any scriptural teaching to tell us "when" the Lord Jesus will give up the kingdom? What kingdom is here in view? What is meant by "all rule, and all authority and power"? What is meant by the destruction of death as a last enemy? What is meant by the Son Himself being subject? What is involved by the words, "that God may be all in all"?

Regarding the kingdom of the Lord, we must keep one or two passages of Scripture before us, so that our conclusions may be of such a character that they will allow room for all Scripture. In Luke i. 31-33 we read:--

> "Thou. . . . shalt call His name Jesus. He shall be great, and shall be called the son of the Highest, and the Lord God shall give unto Him the throne of His father David. And He shall reign over the house of Jacob for ever (eis tous aiõnas, 'unto the ages'), and of His kingdom there shall be no end."

We must beware of going beyond what is written. The reign over the house of Jacob is "unto the ages," but not necessarily (unless revealed elsewhere) throughout the ages. The words employed convey no more than that this reign leads unto "the ages." What these ages are must be discovered from other Scriptures. While it does not say that the reign over the house of Jacob is for ever, it does say of that kingdom that there shall be no end. Consequently we must always allow room in our conception of the final state (even the new heavens and the new earth) for this kingdom connected with the throne of David. Other spheres will necessarily be involved that do not come within the scope of the Davidic rule, yet not to the exclusion of David's kingdom. This simple statement, duly acknowledged, will preserve us from hasty conclusions relative to the last chapter of Revelation and parallel passages.

Heb. i. 8 is another passage of note in this connection:--

> "But unto the Son He saith, Thy throne, O God, is unto the age of the age" (eis ton aiõna tou aiõnas).

We have here a different title, a different throne, and a different period. Not "Jesus," nor "the son of the Highest," but "God"; not the "throne of David," but simply "Thy throne"; not "unto the ages," but "unto the age of the age." The passage is a quotation from Psa. xlv. The context is a safer guide than any theories which we may have. We are asked the questions, "Is this referring to the new heavens and the new earth?" "Is the sceptre of this Psalm and of Hebrew i. different from the rod of iron of Psalm ii. and Revelation?" Psa. xlv. is written "touching the king" by the sons of Korah. Unless told to the contrary it seems only natural that the Davidic kingdom would be very prominent. The words:--

"Gird Thy sword upon Thy thigh, O mighty One, with Thy glory and Thy majesty. And in Thy majesty ride on prosperously. . . . Thine arrows are sharp; the peoples fall under Thee; (they are) in the heart of the King's enemies," and the close parallel with Rev. xix. must not be forgotten when endeavouring to fix the time of Heb. i. 8. To carry such statements into the new heavens and new earth is manifestly wrong, and any system of interpretation which would necessitate it is thereby put out of consideration. Psa. cx. is quoted in Heb. i. 13 in close connection with the quotation from Psa. xlv., thereby showing that these passages are linked together.

"Sit Thou on My right hand until I make Thine enemies the footstool of Thy feet."

This Psalm is quoted seven times in the N.T. (Matt. xxii. 44; Mark xii. 36; Luke xx. 42; Acts ii. 34; I Cor. xv. 25; Heb. i. 13, and x. 13) and is nearly always connected with that phase of the divine purpose which revolves around the throne of David, the city of Jerusalem, and the people of Israel. The second verse of Psa. cx. continues:--

"The Lord shall send the rod of Thy strength out of ZION; rule Thou in the midst of Thine enemies."

The passage further speaks of the willingness of Israel, the Melchizedek priesthood, the striking of kings, the day of wrath, and the filling of places with dead bodies. It is evident that Psa. cx. does not speak of the new creation. Both Psalms xlv. and cx. have kings and enemies prominent. In Heb. i. another Psalm is quoted, namely Psa. ii., and this in correspondence with the quotation from Psa. cx. already noticed. Briefly the passage may be regarded like this:--

Heb. i. 5-14.

A | Unto which of the angels saith He at any time.
B | Thou art My son (cf. Psa. ii.; Psa. lxxxix.).
C | Angels, spirits, ministers, flame of fire.
D | O God—Throne (cf. Psa. xlv.).
D | Thou Lord—Creation (cf. Psa. cii.).
A | Unto which of the angels saith He at any time.
B | Sit Thou on My right hand (cf. Psa. cx.).
C | Ministering spirits.

Psa. ii. is well known to most readers. There we read of enemies in the shape of nations, rulers, and kings. There we again read of ZION, and "His wrath." Also the "rod"—the "sceptre" of Psa. xlv. It is a rod or sceptre of iron when used in ruling the nations, because it is intrinsically a sceptre or rod of righteousness. There is no scriptural necessity to make the sceptre of Psa. xlv. refer to an age other than that of Psa. ii. Further, the Son of Psa. ii. is the King who is God's King on the holy hill of Zion, and the Priest of Psa. cx., the King Priest of Zech. vi. 13, "a Priest upon His throne." Psa. lxxxix. quoted in Heb. i. still keeps us close to the covenant made to David, relating to his seed and throne. The passage:--

"Also I will make Him my Firstborn, higher than the kings of the earth" (verse 27).

links the theme still more closely to Psalms ii., xlv., and cx., and incidentally to Rev. i. Psa. cii. also takes us to the same period:--

> "Thou shalt arise, and have mercy upon Zion; for the time to favour her, yea the set time is come (cf. Dan. ix., &c.). . . . , So the heathen shall fear the name of the Lord, and all the kings of the earth Thy glory" (verses 13 and 15).

One observation more before we return to I Cor. xv. Some of our readers may remember our notes on Col. i. 16, where we sought to bring out the teaching of the pre-eminence of the Lord Jesus as related to angelic or spiritual powers. In Heb. ii., "let all the angels of God worship Him," and "anointed. . . . above Thy fellows," seem to teach similar truth. So in I Cor. xv. 24; before the kingdom is given up, all rule, all authority and power (arche, exousia, dunamis, the principalities and powers of Col. i. 16, the principalities, powers and might of Eph. i. 21) are abolished. It does not appear that these words must mean that they who reign with Christ are included, for the context speaks specifically of enemies. Those who love the Lord would not need such a drastic word as "destroy" with reference to the yielding up of their crowns, neither is it in harmony with Scripture to class the redeemed with enemies and with death.

Further, as death is one of the enemies (the last of them to be destroyed), it helps us to see that the principalities and powers which are spoken of, and which are linked with death in the closing verses of Rom. viii., are not human beings but spiritual foes, for if death is the last, these others (principalities, &c.) must likewise be reckoned as enemies too, else the word last has no clear meaning. In the evil day these spiritual wickedness will wrestle against us (Eph. vi. 12, 13), but thanks be to God that giveth us the victory (I Cor. xv. 57), namely resurrection life, thanks be to God we are more than conquerors through Him that loved us, who destroyed death (II Tim. i. 10), and him who had the strength of death (Heb. ii. 14), who has removed its sting (I Cor. xv. 56), and liberated those who all their lifetime by fear of death were held in bondage. Resurrection breaks the bondage of corruption, and gives in its place the glorious liberty of the children of God.

We will here pause in the study of our passage. Several other items demand consideration before we can, by dint of sheer force of direct scriptural evidence, put our finger upon the passage of scripture and say that that is the kingdom, and that that is the time when it is handed over to the Father.

Berean Expositor Volume 4 & 5.

Studies in the Epistles of the Mystery.
The blessings of the Father (Eph. i. 3-6).
pp. 1-3.

We have seen something of the fulness of the title of God revealed in this passage--The Father—and now we seek wisdom and a spiritual understanding of the blessings which are peculiarly associated with this precious name. As we have before observed, Eph. i. 3-14 details the blessings which are connected with God under the title of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. Let us consider the first set contained in verses 3-6. The structure of the passage appears to be somewhat as follows:--

The blessings of the Father (Eph. i. 3-6).

A | a | 3-. Blessed be God.
b | -3. The believer blessed in Christ.
B | c | 4-. The Father's choice – us.
d | -4-. The Father's object – that we should be holy and without blame.
e | -4. The Father's motive – in love.
B | c | 5-. The Father's predestination – us.
d | -5-. The Father's object – unto the placing as sons.
e | -5. The Father's motive – the good pleasure of His will.
A | a | 6-. Praise of the glory of His grace.
b | -6. The believer accepted in the Beloved.

We have already considered the meaning of the opening words of Eph. i. 3 in the last article of this series. Let us commence our studies with the second half of the third verse, "Who hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings in the heavenlies in Christ." We first dwell for a moment upon that wonderful little word "all." All spiritual blessings; forgiveness of all trespasses; far above all principality and power; filled unto all the fulness of God; with all lowliness; with all prayer and supplication; so the precious teaching of these epistles continues. Fulness everywhere, unalloyed grace, unmixed mercy are ours "in Christ."

The blessings emphasized here are spiritual. Spiritual blessings call for spiritual songs of gratitude (v. 19), and will also be accompanied for this little while by some measure of conflict with spiritual wickedness (vi. 12). The spiritual blessings of the present dispensation are contrasted with the earthly blessings of the kingdom:--

> "For the Lord God bringeth thee unto a good land, a land of brooks of water, of fountains and depths that spring out of valleys and hills, a land of wheat, and barely, and vines, and fig trees, and pomegranates; a land of oil olive and honey; a land wherein thou shalt eat bread without scarceness, thou shalt not lack anything in it, a land whose stones are iron, and out of whose hills thou mayest dig brass. When thou hast eaten and art full, then thou shall bless the Lord thy God for the good land which He hath given thee" (Deut. viii. 7-10).

The believer of that dispensation could say, Blessed be God Who hath blessed us with all earthly and carnal blessings in this land of promise. We saved ones of the Gentiles (irrespective of Abrahamic blessings) can equally bless God for spiritual blessings which He has given us in the heavenlies. When once we realize the character and sphere of our blessings, we can read such a passage as Deut. viii. 7-10, and without robbing Israel of one iota of its fulness, may see some of our spiritual blessings in the terms of the earthly blessings.

Readers may remember that in Vol. I., page 125, and in Vol. III., page 56 (Vol.II./III., page 105), we have dealt with the special meaning and teaching of the words translated "heavenly places." We will not repeat all we have there said, but just summarize the meaning and usage of the expression. The expression in one form or another occurs twenty times in the New Testament, and is distributed as follows. In the Gospels, twice; the Epistles before Acts xxviii., five times; Hebrews, six times; the Prison Epistles, seven times.

There is a most important distinction to be observed between the five occurrences in Ephesians, and the fifteen elsewhere. The peculiarity of the expression in Ephesians is that it is in the dative plural, en tois epouraniois ("in the heavenlies"), speaking of locality, whereas the word in the other passages signifies heavenly, but not necessarily in heaven. Those who tasted of the "heavenly gift" (Heb. vi. 4) certainly did not taste a gift which was "up in heaven." The heavenly country or city of Heb. xi. 16 will be seen coming down from God "out of heaven," whereas the citizenship of the present dispensation is "in heaven" (Phil. iii. 20). The five occurrences of this expression in Ephesians have a relation to one another which will be seen if set out as follows:--

A | i. 3. Spiritual blessings in the heavenlies.
  B | i. 20. Christ raised to the right hand of God, far above all principality and power.
    --"Exceeding greatness of power."
    C | ii. 6. Christ and His church raised and seated together.
  B | iii. 10. The church a witness unto principalities and powers.
    --"Manifold Wisdom."
A | vi. 12. Spiritual wickedness in the heavenlies.

The difficulty arising from the fact that the Lord Himself, the believers' blessings, and spiritual foes, are all spoken of as being "in heavenly places" has been considered at some length in Volume III., previously referred to, to which the reader is asked to turn if these thoughts should still present any difficulty, space being too limited to warrant a repetition here.

Our investigations in this connection have led us to see that the blessings of the present dispensation are quite distinct from any that have preceded it. A new sphere of blessing has been revealed consequent upon the temporary setting aside of Israel, and with them the Abrahamic and Davidic covenants. These covenants will yet have their beneficent fulfilment; Israel and the nations will yet be blessed; the earth and the heavens shall yet respond to the millennial reign of Christ, but the super-celestial glory pertaining to the universal kingdom of Christ is the glorious prospect opened for the first time in Scripture to the eye of faith in these words of Eph. i. 3.

Two words conclude the verse, viz., "in Christ." Without these all would be valueless, spiritual blessings an impossibility, and heavenly (or earthly) blessings unattainable. "In Christ" all things are possible, and all things are secure. We were "chosen in Him," and "accepted in Him;" without Him we are helpless and hopeless. "Blessed be God. . . . Who hath blessed us."

Studies in the Epistles of the Mystery.
The Father'choice of us (Eph. i. 4).
pp. 19-23

In our last article we considered the song of praise with which this epistle commences as recorded in verse 3. Let us now look at some of the actual blessings themselves. We remember that they are all spiritual, all in the heavenlies, and all in Christ. This places the whole scope of blessings before us, emphasizing its great outstanding characteristics.

"In Christ" is not exclusively the character of our blessings, for God has purposed that in Christ, not only the church which is His body, but all assemblies, Israel, the nations, and things in heaven as well as on earth, shall be blessed. Spiritual blessings are not exclusively the character of our blessings either, for all blessings which come from above are of that nature in one way, even though they touch temporal and earthly things, the peculiarity in this dispensation, however, is the special emphasis upon the spiritual character of our blessings, and the comparatively small place given to temporal blessings. The one element which does appear as distinct from all other dispensations is the locality of these spiritual blessings – "in the heavenlies," which is further explained to be "at His own right hand" far above all principality, &c. This special sphere, the super-celestial, is the peculiar character of the mystery, and never entered into the hope of Israel or the church before the revelation of the mystery was given.

There are many degrees of glory revealed in the Word. Israel's position will be above the nations, while being a channel of blessing to the nations; the faithful remnant (together with the pentecostal church) will have a position in the new Jerusalem which will be a higher privilege than that possessed by Israel as a nation. The church which is His body finds its place of blessing in the heavenlies at the right hand of God, far above all, and is connected not only with Jerusalem and the land of promise, the renewed earth and the nations, the heavens and the new Jerusalem, but the wide universe which will be placed beneath the glorious administration of the Lord Jesus Christ. Just as this future sphere of blessing differs from all that had been revealed before, so we learn that it was planned and prepared long before the purposes concerning the kingdom and its connections were revealed.

Verses 3 and 4 are linked together by the words "according as." Familiarity robs many expressions of their native force, and the idea of perfect accord and harmony is hardly felt in these words. Kathõs and kata, if translated "in harmony with," while not being better as a translation, may be better in suggesting the perfect agreement and accord which it is intended should be seen. The peculiar sphere of our blessings in the heavenlies is in perfect harmony with the equally peculiar period of our election to them, "before the foundation of the world."

The first word to consider in this detailed list of blessings, therefore, is the word translated "chosen." The first occurrence of the word is in Mark xiii. 20, where it is linked with the word "elect"—"whom He hath chosen." This relation is further emphasized by noticing the parallel term in Eph. i. 4, 5, "According as He hath chosen us. . . . having predestinated us." The words of John xv. 16 are as true in relation to Eph. i. 4 as they were regarding the apostles, "Ye have not chosen Me, but I have chosen you." The noun ekloge and the adjective eklektos are respectively translated "election," and "elect" (Rom. ix. 11, viii. 33, and Titus i. 1). Whatever difficulties may be in the mind regarding this subject, it seems perfectly clear that the choice was the Lord's; He chose us, we did not choose Him. This is still further emphasized by the words which follow. As to the sphere of this choice, it is "in Him" as to time—"before the foundation of the world." No proof is needed we trust that the words "in Him" preclude man's efforts or choice, and the reference to the time of that choice removes the whole action beyond the power of man at all.

A parallel passage which illuminates Eph. 1. 3, 4, and receives in return light from these verses is Titus i. 1, 2, "According to the faith of God's elect. . . . upon hope of age-abiding life, which God that cannot lie promised before age-times." Here we have the word elect, cognate with the verb to choose, here also we have the reference to a period long before man appeared upon this scene, pro chronõn aiõniõn, parallel with the expression "before the foundation of the world" of Eph. i. 4.

The remoter context of II Tim. i. 1 supplies us with one more parallel. Titus tells us that a promise was made before the age-times, yet does not specify how or to whom. II Tim. i. completes the statement, "according to the promise of life, which is in Christ Jesus." This gives us the required balance to the words "chosen in Him" of Eph. i. 4. To show that II Tim. i. and Titus i. are dealing with this blessing, II Tim. i. 9 uses the words pro chronõn aiõniõn:--

> "Who hath saved us and called us with a holy calling, not according to our works, but according to his own purpose and grace, which was given us in Christ Jesus before age-times."

Here one more item is added to our knowledge. Just as the "purpose and grace" could be given us in Christ long before age-times, so also could the promise of life and the election unto the peculiar blessings of the calling pertaining to the mystery. One more expression in Eph. i. 4 demands our attention, viz., that which has reference to the period of the choice, "before the foundation of the world." Here the word translated world is kosmos. In the passages cited above (II Tim. i. 9 and Titus i. 2) the A.V. reads, "before the world began." This can hardly be called the translation, it is a paraphrase at best.

These passages deal not with the kosmos, and by comparing these three passages together we shall see that the A.V. gives us truth, but veils a great deal more than it reveals.

A considerable amount of thought has been given to the word translated "foundation." In the original it is katabole, which etymologically means a casting or a laying down. Some say that it means to lay as a foundation, others, that it means to overthrow. Let us briefly consider the usage of the word. The following are all the occurrences of the word katabole in the N.T.:--

"From the foundation of the world" (Matt. xiii. 35; xxv. 34; Luke xi. 50; Heb. iv. 3; Rev. xiii. 8 and xvii. 8).
"Since the foundation of the world" (Heb. ix. 26).
"Before the foundation of the world" (John xvii. 24; Eph. i. 4; I Pet. i. 20).
"Received strength to conceive seed" (Heb. xi. 11).

It is clear from the above occurrences being translated "foundation," with the exception of one passage, and being practically the same expression, either from or before the foundation of the world, that we must look elsewhere for some means of testing its meaning.

The verb kataballõ occurs in II Cor. iv. 9; Heb. vi. 1; and Rev. xii. 10, and is translated in the A.V., "cast down" and "laying." II Cor. iv. 9 certainly means that the apostle was thrown down; it cannot mean anything to do with laying a foundation. Turning to the Septuagint (the Greek version of the O.T. in use at the time when the N.T. was written) we find the verb kataballõ used to translate the following Hebrew words (we give some of the A.V. translations of them):--

Haras.—Beat down, break down, overthrow, pull down, ruin.
Shachath.—Destroy, batter, waste, mar.
Naphal.—Fall, overthrow, to fell (Psa. lxxiii. 18).
Parats.—To break down, make a breach, break up.
Shaphel.—To lay low, abase, cast down (Isa. xxvi. 5).

These are some of the Hebrew words which kataballõ is used to translate, and these five words, as also the others, mean to overthrow, break up, &c. Such passages as II Sam. xx. 15 and Psa. cvi. 26, 27 should be read, substituting "foundation" or "establishing" for overthrow, &c., and the utter incongruity and untruthfulness of the rendering will be apparent. A consideration of alternative translations to kataballõ of the various Hebrew words will further assist us in arriving at a just conclusion. For instance, in Prov. xxv. 28 we read, "He that hath no rule over his own spirit is like a city that is broken down and without walls." In this passage the LXX renders "broken down" by kataballõ. In Neh. ii. 13 the same Hebrew word occurs, "and viewed the walls of Jerusalem which were broken down." This time the LXX renders it by kathaireõ, which is the verb used with its noun in II Cor. x. 4, 5 and 8, and is translated in the A.V., "pulling down," "casting down," and "destruction."

Isa. xxvi. 5 furnishes another example, "The lofty city He layeth it low, He layeth it low even to the dust." The first phrase, "He layeth it low," is rendered in the LXX by kataballõ, the second by katago, which means to bring down as in Rom. x. 6. It seems from theabove usages that kataballõ means to cast down, break down, or overthrow. The cognate word katabole cannot be made to mean the exact opposite without doing violence to the words, as well as the Word of God.

The word kosmos, translated "world," is a word of importance. It does not necessarily mean the earth, but directs attention rather to the system. Whatever meaning we may ultimately fix upon, it must allow for such usages as, "The field is the world," "Go ye into all the world," "God so loved the world," "The prince of this world," &c. World (kosmos) and age (aiõn) are related in Scripture. He who is prince of this world is also the god of this age. The choice which antedated the katabole of the world, also antedated the age-times. K*osmos* carries with it the idea of beauty, order, rule. K*atabole* carries with it the idea of marring, overthrowing, chaos.

The blessed fact which shines out from the passage in Eph. i. 4 is that before sin entered the world, before chaos took the place of order, before darkness was upon the face of the deep, we—sinners of the Gentiles as we were (and are in ourselves)—were chosen in Christ! What a calling! What a walk is necessitated if we are enjoined to walk worthy of this calling! The present course of things covered by the age-times is not a part of our calling. Just as we were chosen in Christ before the overthrow or the disruption of the world, and before age-times, so we do not look forward to the millennial kingdom as our goal and our glory, but to the universal administration spoken of in Eph. i., Phil. ii., and Col. i., when the ages shall have their goal in the exaltation of the Son of God, and we shall be "manifested with Him in glory."

Mark xiii. 20	And except that the Lord had shortened those days, no flesh should be saved: but for the elect's sake, whom he hath chosen, he hath shortened the days.

John xv. 16	Ye have not chosen me, but I have chosen you, and ordained you, that ye should go and bring forth fruit, and that your fruit should remain: that whatsoever ye shall ask of the Father in my name, he may give it you.

The Father's object (Eph. i. 4).
pp. 39-42

In our last article we saw something of the fulness contained in "The Father's choice of us." We now turn our attention to the object of that choice as revealed in the words, "That we should be holy and without blame before Him in love." It is as well to observe what is omitted from this statement. Heaven's glory is not mentioned, life in Christ is not spoken of, all the blessings which figure so prominently in the hope and faith of God's children are not prominent, the qualification which alone befits us for them all is here emphasized.

If the reader will turn to the Structure on page 1 he will see that the Father's choice, object, and motive are repeated. The choice of us in Christ before the overthrow of the world is amplified in the words of verse 5, "having predestinated us." The object, "that we should be holy," is taken a step further in the words, "unto the placing as sons." The motive, "love," is further defined by the words, "the good pleasure of His will," and we shall see how fitting it is that the order as written in Ephesians be kept, viz.:--

1st. The qualification.—"That we should be holy and without blame before Him."
2nd. The realization.—"Unto the placing as sons by Jesus Christ unto Himself."

For a wealthy yet philanthropic person moving in high society to take a dirty, unkempt, ill-mannered gutter child straight from its sordid surroundings to the brilliance, luxury, and refinement of the drawing room without the necessary washing, re-clothing, training, and preparing, would not be kind nor wise. So with ourselves. Until the salvation of God was sent to us, we were worse than the gutter child. God, Who chose us in Christ, and Who predestinated us to the "adoption," also made a perfect provision in His Son for all necessary qualification. This qualification is stated positively and negatively. Positively – holy. . . . Negatively – without blame.

We have met men who do not hesitate to claim "goodness," who deny their sinnership, but we have never met one who claimed as a personal unaided quality absolute and positive holiness. It is written, ". . . . holiness, without which no one shall see the Lord" (Heb. xii. 14). We would point out in passing that the context of this verse is instructive, for, just as Eph. i. 4, 5 links holiness with sonship, so Heb. xii. 9-14 speaks of the Father's discipline that we might be partakers of His holiness. Holiness, like righteousness, is not the work of the flesh. Believers may be urged to "perfect" holiness, even as they are enjoined to bring forth the "fruit" of righteousness, but this is parallel to the words, "work out your own salvation." The possession of salvation is assumed, the command is to work it out as one would a mine. The possession of holiness is assumed, the "perfecting of holiness" refers to its manifestation during our walk through life.

One passage in Ephesians disposes of any idea that the believer can accomplish the Father's object, and that is Eph. v. 27. There the blessed and comforting truth is declared, that the Father's object is accomplished by the sacrifice of His Son:--

> "Husbands, love your wives, as Christ loved the church, and gave Himself for it, in order that He might sanctify (hagiazõ – 'holy' is hagios) and cleanse it with the washing of water by the word, in order that He might present it to Himself a glorious church, not having spot or wrinkle or any such thing, but in order that it should be holy and without blemish" (Eph. v. 25-27).

The words are exactly the same as those rendered "holy and without blame" in Eph. i. 4. What fulness! what assurance! The Father's object accomplished by His Son, our Lord. Oh that the Lord's people could rest here, cease their vain strivings, and rest in the words of blessing – "it is finished." Col. i. 12-22 brings before us the same blessed truth. There again we find the Father and the Son in perfect accord:--

> "Giving thanks unto the Father, Who hath made us meet (sufficient) unto the portion of the inheritance of the saints (or holy place, hagiõn) in the light. Who hath delivered us from the authority of darkness, and hath translated us into the kingdom of His beloved Son. . . . You that were sometimes alienated, and enemies in your mind by wicked works, yet now hath He reconciled in the body of His flesh through the death, to present you holy and unblameable (the same word as used in Eph. i. 4 and v. 27) and unreprovable in His sight."

Meetness for the inheritance, the Father's object (Eph. i. 4, Col. i. 12), is the result of the offering of His Son, our Lord (Eph. v. 25-27; Col. i. 22). Positively holy, negatively without blame or blemish, made meet by the Father, presented perfect by the Son, surely none can refrain from the words of praise, "Blessed be God Who hath blessed us." The condition of "blamelessness," and "spotlessness" (Eph. i. and v.) is that which pertained to the Lord Jesus in the capacity of the great sacrifice for sin:--

> "The precious blood of Christ, as of a lamb without blemish (cf. Eph. i. 4), and without spot (Eph. v. 27), Who verily was preordained before the overthrow of the world" (I Pet. i. 19, 20).

In this passage we learn that not only is the believer's state of blemishlessness exactly the same as that of the Lord Jesus, but that the same mark of time (before the overthrow) is spoken of them as it is of the Lord as the fore-ordained Lamb.

Every additional verse we have read in this connection has strengthened and deepened our knowledge and faith in the completeness and perfectness of our standing "in Him." Eph. i. 4 adds one more clause which is too important to miss. All this perfectness and holiness is "before Him." The expression "before Him" is no vague term, but is the rendering of a very intense and searching word, katenõpion. In II Cor. ii. 17 the apostle uses this strong word (according to the received text) when seeking to show that he was not a corrupter of the word, but "as of sincerity (tested by sunlight), as of God, speak we in Christ" (cf. II Cor. xii. 19; Jude 24).

Eph. I renders katenõpion autou "before Him"; Col. i. 22 "in His sight." The less emphatic word enõpion occurs several times (see Rom. xii. 17; Rev. iv. 5, &c.). The qualification is stated positively – holy, negatively – without blame, and positionally – before Him. If the holiness provided by the Saviour can endure the light of God's presence, we have that which is perfect and complete. To attempt to improve it or make it more secure is to fail miserably. This perfect standing before God, this completeness in Christ, is the basis of the words of Col. ii. 18:--

> "Let no man, though he wishes it, defraud you of your prize, persuading you to self humiliation and the worship of angels."

The seraphim veil their faces in the divine presence, "but we all with unveiled face, as in a mirror, behold the glory of the Lord." We have "boldness of access with confidence by the faith of Him." We do not glorify this wondrous grace by depreciating the perfectness of the holiness which is ours in Christ. In ourselves we are nothing, but He is all. Of ourselves we are darkness, but we may walk in the light as He is in the light, for the precious blood of Christ cleanseth from all sin.

This then is the object of the Father's choice. What a calling is ours! Those who are thus holy in Christ are called saints. These demand our love (Eph. i. 15), our prayers (vi. 18), and only as we, in spirit, embrace all saints shall we begin to understand the fulness of the love of Christ (iii. 18). We cannot make ourselves holy, we cannot keep ourselves holy, but the Lord asks us to "walk worthy of the calling" (Eph. iv.), for He has "saved us and called us with a holy calling" (II Tim. i. 9). In our next article we must consider the motive which is revealed in this glorious passage.

Heb. xii.	9. Thou hast loved righteousness, and hated iniquity; therefore God, even thy God, hath anointed thee with the oil of gladness above thy fellows. 10. And, Thou, Lord, in the beginning hast laid the foundation of the earth; and the heavens are the works of thine hands: 11. They shall perish; but thou remainest; and they all shall wax old as doth a garment; 12. And as a vesture shalt thou fold them up, and they shall be changed: but thou art the same, and thy years shall not fail.

Rom. xii. 17	Recompense to no man evil for evil. Provide things honest in the sight (enõpion) of all men.
Rev. iv. 5	And out of the throne proceeded lightnings and thunderings and voices: and there were seven lamps of fire burning before (enõpion) the throne, which are the seven Spirits of God.

The Father's motive – in love (Eph. i. 4).
pp. 61-63

We have considered together the Father's choice and the Father's object. We now go on in our study to contemplate the motive, the great first cause of the grace unfolded in these verses, and we find it contained in the little word, in love.

Readers will observe that in the corresponding member B e, the Father's motive is, "the good pleasure of His will." In either case the cause of our blessings is seen to be outside of ourselves; they arise in their entirety out of the love, good pleasure, and will of the Father. There is a close parallel here with the history of the Lord's dealings with Israel. In Deut. vii. 6-8 we read:--

> "Thou art an holy people unto the Lord thy God (cf. 'that we should be holy and without blame before Him'); the Lord thy God hath chosen thee (cf. 'according as He chose us') to be a special people unto Himself (cf. 'having predestinated us unto the placing as sons'), above all people that are upon the face of the earth (cf. 'blessed us with all spiritual blessings in the heavenlies'). The Lord did not set His love upon you, nor choose you, because ye were more in number than any people. . . . but because the Lord loved you."

If this marvellous statement is examined it resolves itself into this, the Lord loved Israel because He loved them—a defective argument from the standpoint of human reasoning, but a powerful comfort to those who have learned their own utter ruin and unworthiness. The Lord loved us, Gentiles, aliens, far off, dead in and by sins, because He loved us. Deut. vii. 8 continues with a supplementary reason, "and because He would keep the oath which He had sworn unto your fathers," but this does not go back as far as the causeless love of the initial choice. So in Ephesians, the election to the calling there revealed originates in God's great love, and is related to the "purpose and grace which was given us in Christ Jesus before age-times" (II Tim. i. 9), "before the overthrow of the world" (Eph. i. 3).

There is something peculiarly sacred in this word "love" which we are considering, inasmuch as it is unknown outside the Scriptures. The word agape never occurs in the profane Greek writings, and is entirely absent from the writings of Philo and Josephus. Philanthrõphia was the highest word used by the Greeks (Dr. Bullinger's Critical Lexicon and Concordance). God has given us a new word in agape, for the language of men contained nothing high enough to denote this "love in its fullest conceivable form." Agape is from agapaõ, "to love," as in John iii. 16, Rom. viii. 37, and Eph. ii. 4.

Not only is the word "love" an exclusively Scriptural one, but the expression "in love" demands attention. The R.V. gives as an alternative to the construction, "holy and without blemish before Him in love," a marginal note, "having in love foreordained us." Rotherham in his version gives no alternative, but ends the sentence with "holy and blameless in His presence," commencing a fresh line with, "In love making us out beforehand." Conybeare and Howson also join "in love" with verse 5. It is very probable that the words "in love" are to be considered as linking both verses, lending colour to each, and showing us the sphere both of our perfectness and of the Lord's predestination. Once only do we read these words in connection with the Godward aspect of the teaching of the epistle, but five times does it occur in connection with the believer's attitude, environment and walk. The following is the order of occurrences of the words "in love" in Ephesians:--

A | i. 4. The Father's motive.
  B | iii. 17. Rooted and grounded (figures of growth and building).
    C | iv. 2. Forbearing one another.
    C | iv. 15. Being true.
  B | iv. 16. Increase and edification (figures of growth and building).
A | v. 2. The children's walk {"Be ye imitators of God" (v. 1)}.

It will be observed by comparing the first and last member together that the force of the apostle's teaching in chapter v. 1, 2 is emphasized. There he writes, "Be ye therefore imitators of God, as beloved children, and walk in love, even as Christ also loved you." The Father's motive becomes the children's example. If the sphere of our calling is "in love," so must our walk be if it is to be worthy of it. In love we are to be rooted and grounded, in love the whole body increases and is built up. In love we are to forbear one another and endeavour to keep the unity of the Spirit. In love we live out the truth we have been taught (cf. Eph. iv. 15 with iv. 21, 25). Love must ever be uppermost in our thoughts and in our dealings. It was when the apostle heard that the Ephesians had "love unto all the saints" (i. 15) that he prayed for their further enlightening. Love with faith is the centre of the benediction with which the epistle closes. The rich mercy of God toward us flows from His great love (ii. 4), and the second great prayer of Ephesians includes among its greatest petitions a knowledge of the knowledge-surpassing love of Christ (iii. 19).

One of the most precious titles of the Lord Jesus in the epistles is, "The Beloved" (Eph. i. 6), in whom we are accepted. The only other occurrences of agapaõ in Ephesians are found (5 passages) in Eph. v. 25-33 in the great practical demonstration of Christ's love to the church as set forth by the love of the husband to the wife. As one looks around at the lack of love everywhere manifest in home, in church, in business, in state, how one yearns for a return to this illuminating and blessed spirit. Let us remember "His great love," let us remember how loveless we were, and indeed are, in ourselves. Let us keep well in mind that our acceptance is only in "The Beloved," even as our calling originated "in love," as shown in Eph. i. 4, 5. Then let us, by grace, see to it that our walk shall not belie our calling, but forbearing, speaking the truth, growing, and walking, the Father's motive shall in measure be our motive, it shall be in love.

The Father's predestination – us (Eph. i. 5).
pp. 84-87

Referring to the structure on page 1 we shall find that the subject now turns upon itself by way of amplification. In the first member relating to the Father's choice our minds were directed to the Person in whom the choice was made ("in Him"), and the period when that choice was made ("before the overthrow of the world"). There for the time the subject was left, while we passed on to consider the object and the motive. Having gained this additional knowledge, we are prepared to come back to a further consideration of the Father's choice which is described in the opening words of verse 5, "Having predestinated us." What does this word "predestination" mean, and what does it involve? Calvin in his Institutes 3. 21-5, writing on predestination, says:--

> "Predestination whereby God adopted some into the hope of life, and judgeth some to eternal death, no man that would be accounted godly dare simply denie: but they wrap it up with many cavillations, specially they which make foreknowledge the cause of it. We indeed do say that they be both in God, but we say that one is wrongfully made subject to the other."

Calvin speaks truthfully when he says that foreknowledge is not the cause of predestination, but appears to miss the mark when he teaches that predestination is either to life or to eternal death.

First of all with regard to foreknowledge. We read in Rom. viii. 29, "For whom He did foreknow, He also did predestinate," and in I Pet. i. 2, "Elect according to the foreknowledge of God the Father." Here election and predestination alike are linked with foreknowledge. Those who deny the full force of election and predestination, as Calvin says, "wrap it up with many cavillations" and say that because God foreknew that certain men would believe, He could then elect or predestinate them upon this foreseen faith. This is rather flattering to the mind of man, as it makes God's choice depend upon the act of the creature. Let us test this idea by the Scripture, and we need not argue about the matter; we need the verb "to foreknow" again, but this time translated in A.V. "foreordained." Speaking of the Lord Jesus Christ as a lamb without blemish and without spot, the apostle continues, "who verily was foreordained" (foreknown as in i. 2), "before the overthrow of the world." If the word proginõskõ here means that God foresaw that Christ would come in time to be the Redeemer, there seems to be something wrong with the rest of the verse which says that this coming was not foreknown as an act in the then future time, but foreknown at a period before the overthrow of the world. It is moreover set in correspondence with the word "manifest' as will be seen thus:--

A | Foreknown, or foreordained.
B | Before the overthrow of the world.
A | Manifested.
B | In these last times.

We need not search far in the Word to find evidence that the coming and the offering of the Lord Jesus was not some foreseen contingence, but an act according to "the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God" (Acts ii. 23), and that though the betrayal and crucifixion of the Lord wasa accomplished by "wicked hands," it nevertheless is written, "Herod, and Pontius Pilate, with the Gentiles, and the people of Israel, were gathered together, for to do whatsoever Thy hand and Thy counsel determined before to be done" (Acts iv. 27, 28).

The other contention, that predestination is either to life or to eternal death, is not spiritual. It is common idea with those who believe the doctrine of election and predestination, that there is no hope outside these decrees, and that God has elected unto salvation a very minute proportion of His creatures unto life and blessing, and has either "reprobated" or "left" the huge remainder to eternal misery. The full consideration of this theme comes under the teaching of Human Destiny rather than that of the Epistle to the Ephesians, but we would anticipate our findings there by saying that it is becoming more and more manifest that, during the course of the ages, there is no other phase of God's dealings in operation so prominent as those which are elective.

All down the ages God may be said to have been "taking out a people for His name." Genesis shows us the election of one nation and the passing over of the nations. Within that one elect nation some were chosen to a higher calling than the majority, whose hopes were correspondingly higher, and who will not merely enter into the unconditional promises pertaining to all Israel and the land of promise, but will also have the right to enter into "the city which hath the foundations, whose maker and builder if God." Only the "election" obtained the righteousness of faith provided by Christ, the rest were hardened (Rom. xi. 7). Election takes absolutely no account of works either good or bad, as may be seen from Rom. ix. 11, but we must not be tempted into this line of teaching here; let us come back to the actual word "predestinate."

Proorizõ is a compound word made up of pro (before), and horizõ (to bound, limit or determine). Turning to this word horizõ we find that it comes from horos (a bound, limit). The LXX uses the word horizõ in Numb. xxxiv. 6, Josh. xiii. 27, and many other places, to translate the Hebrew word gebul (border). In the N.T. the word usually means to determine, decree, appoint or set. Acts ii. 23, "determinate counsel"; Acts x. 42, "ordained of God to be the Judge"; Acts xvii. 26, "hath determined the times before appointed,"; Acts xvii. 31, "whom He hath ordained"; Heb. iv. 7, "Again, He limiteth a certain day"; Rom. i. 4, "declared to be the Son of God." The word horizõ has come into English in the word "horizon" which is the apparent line of demarcation or boundary between earth and sky. Proorizõ consequently means, "to decree, determine, or mark off beforehand." Acts iv. 28, Rom. viii. 29, 30, I Cor. ii. 7, and Eph. i. 5, 11 are all the occurrences of the word in the N.T.

At the forefront of the Epistle to the Ephesians and, for that, of the dispensation of the mystery, are election and predestination. Every member of the one body is an elect member, mark off beforehand, chosen in Christ before the overthrow of the world. Argument, teaching, preaching cannot enable one solitary soul to step over the decreed boundary. There are many believers who have never been predestinated to the position indicated in Ephesians. This does not warrant the idea, however, that there are no other spheres of blessing; that is grossly erroneous, and is the outcome of the man-made dogma that two dispensations cannot be running at the same time. Any number of dispensations can be in operation together. The Bible is full of such instances. God dealing with Israel under one economy and the nations under another. Then with some of Israel in a narrower circle of calling than that which embraced the whole nation. Among believers to-day there are those who are found under the dispensation indicated by Paul's administration during the Acts, whose doctrine, practice and hopes are largely founded upon Romans, I Corinthians and I Thessalonians. While that is still obtaining to-day, God is putting into operation that purpose in which He predestinated some believers to a higher calling. That is what we have to grasp here. We hope to consider unto what we are predestinated in our next article.

The Father's object – unto the placing as sons (Eph. i. 5).
pp. 119-122

The reader will remember that we found the structural arrangement of these verses repeats itself, and the last article dealt with the first member of this correspondence. The Father's object, as revealed in the first half of the structure, was found to be "that we should be holy and without blame." This now receives its amplification in the words, "unto the placing as sons."

We have purposely translated the word huiothesia, "placing as sons," rather than by the word "adoption," partly to draw attention to it, and partly because the English expression "adoption" conveys a somewhat different meaning from that which the Greek word and its usage allows. We are apt to think, if we are guided only by the A.V., that by the act of adoption those who are believers are adopted by God into His family. This, however, always leaves an unsatisfactory feeling. An adopted child may be loved, cared for, and brought up with all the attention that could be bestowed, yet its comforts and privileges would never make it a real child of its foster parents. It could never be so near as a real child born of those foster parents. It may be more lovable, better behaved, more creditable than the real child, but these traits, enviable as they may be, could not alter the relationship, it would still be merely "adopted."

The Scriptures abundantly testify that those who believe, and who are called children of God, are children indeed, either by regeneration, or by a new creation; that they do not look up to the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ as a guardian or a foster parent, but that as surely and as really as they have had fathers in the flesh, quite irrespective of their manners or behaviour, so God Himself is their Father in Christ Jesus His Son.

Five times does the word huiothesia occur in the N.T. and then only in the Epistles of Paul. One passage is a reference to the special privilege of Israel, one refers to the equally special privilege of the members of the One Body, and the remaining three refer to the blessed privilege extended by grace to both Jew and Gentile under the preaching of the gospel of God. If we examine these occurrences with their contexts, we shall have all the material which the Spirit of God has given us wherewith to arrive at the meaning of the expression which is set forth in Eph. i. 5 to indicate the Father's object towards us in grace.

Rom. viii. 15 contains the first passage: "For ye received not a spirit of bondage again to fear, but ye received a spirit of adoption, whereby (or in whom) we cry, Abba, Father." The most important item in this passage is the setting of the spirit of adoption over against the spirit of bondage. Adoption must include some special liberating factor in order to justify the contrast. Keeping this in mind, we note the next passage:--

> "For the earnest expectation of the creature awaiteth the revelation of the sons of God. For the creature was subjected to vanity, not of its own will, but by reason of Him who subjected it, in hope that the creature itself shall also be freed from the bondage of corruption into the freedom of the glory of the children of God. For we know that the > whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain together until the present time. And not only so, but ourselves also, who have the firstfruit of the Spirit, we ourselves also groan within ourselves, awaiting adoption, the redemption of our body" (Rom. viii. 19-23).

Here again in direct contrast to bondage is placed adoption. The bondage of corruption is to give place to the freedom of the glory of the children of God. Creation is earnestly awaiting something. In the first case it is "the unveiling of the sons of God," in the second it is "the adoption." Again it will be observed that creation is not awaiting the birth of the sons of God, but their manifestation; it is not awaiting mere freedom, but the freedom connected with the glory of the children of God. Our glory is yet future; our unveiling or revelation as sons is future also. The salvation of this passage is something yet future, "for we are saved by hope." These Roman believers were already saved, yet a salvation was ahead of them. They were already free (vi., vii.), yet freedom was ahead of them; they were already children, yet adoption was ahead of them, "to wit, the redemption of our body." The day of the public manifestation of God's children is future; in resurrection they will enter into the freedom of the glory, they will be delivered from the bondage of corruption. The precious lesson is enforced as we consider these two passages together. We are not yet in actual resurrection—we await that. We are earnestly awaiting adoption, to wit, the redemption of our body. The pledge of our future resurrection is given us here:--

> "But if the Spirit of Him who raised up Jesus from the dead dwelleth in you, He that rasied up Christ Jesus from the dead shall make alive also your mortal bodies through His Spirit that dwelleth in you. . . . ye received a spirit of adoption, whereby we cry, Abba, Father."

The future adoption is linked to the present time by the "spirit of adoption." We are, in spirit, already free, already raised from the dead. We await its actual and literal fulfilment. Passing the reference to Israel's national privilege in Rom. ix. 4, we turn to Gal. iv. 1-5 which is so helpful in the consideration of this subject:--

> "Now I say, for as long a time as the heir is a child, he differeth nothing from a slave, lord of all though he be, but is under guardians and stewards until the period predetermined by the father. So we also, when we were children, were enslaved under the rudiments of the world. But when the fulness of time came, God sent forth His Son, born of a woman, born under the law, that He might redeem those under law, that we might receive the adoption of sons."

Here, again, we find the contrast between bondage and freedom, bondage and adoption. This passage clearly shows that adoption touches the question of a time appointed by the Father, when the child who is an heir shall come into his inheritance. It is the revelation of the sonship, the freedom of it, and the glory of it. Roughly speaking, our English "coming of age" is a good illustration of the meaning of the word translated "adoption." We have received that spirit now. We shall attain unto our majority and our inheritance at resurrection. We return to Ephesians, and read again the special blessing as recorded there:--

> "Having in love previously marked us out for adoption (placing us manifestly as sons, as heirs who are no longer children under tutors and governors) through Jesus Christ unto Himself" (i. 5).

"In Whom also we have obtained an inheritance, having been previously marked off. . . . " (i. 11).

This then is "the adoption." To think that such glories are in store for us! We are to be "revealed," we are to have "glory," we are to enter into all the privileges and blessings of recognized sons and heirs! May grace be given us to walk as children of light, even as we have been made meet for the inheritance of the saints in the light.

Studies in the Epistles of the Mystery.
The Father's motive – the good pleasure of His will (Eph. i. 5).
pp. 175-178

The consideration of the Father's motive brings us to the third and last clause of the second central member. We again draw attention to the way in which the subject before the apostle is amplified as he proceeds. This the structure enables us to see at a glance. The Father's choice is further explained by the word predestination. His object, that we should be holy, is amplified by the "adoption"; His motive, "in love," will now be seen to have its bearing upon the subject before us, viz., "The good pleasure of His will." We have the comforting assurance, before we start investigating, that His will and His good pleasure are but the wondrous manifestations and expressions of His love. Will and good pleasure of themselves tell us little or nothing of their character. A tyrant has a will, and the most horrible deeds may be according to his good pleasure. How thankful we should be then to realize that this will and this good pleasure, while sovereign and absolute, are not the exhibition of tyranny or caprice, but of LOVE - a love that passeth knowledge.

The words "according to" (kata) may be freely rendered "in harmony with." It is only saying the same thing with different words, but familiarity often blunts the edge of expressions. Our predestination to sonship is in harmony with the good pleasure of His will. Let us therefore turn our attention to the will of the Lord as revealed in this epistle. No one can read through the opening verses of Ephesians without being struck with the emphatic position accorded to the will and purpose of God. Eph. i. 3-14 may be well summarized as "Blessing according to purpose," which will be evident if set out as follows:--

A1 | 3. BLESSING.--Spiritual and in heavenlies.
B1 | 4. PURPOSE.--"According as He chose us."
A2 | 5. BLESSING.--Predestination to sonship.
B2 | 5-8. PURPOSE.--"According to the good pleasure of His will."
A3 | 9. BLESSING.--Revealing the secret of His will.
B3 | 9, 10. PURPOSE.--"According to His good pleasure."
A4 | 11. BLESSING.--Predestination to inheritance.
B4 | 11-14. PURPOSE.--"According to the purpose of Him Who worketh all things after the counsel of His own will."

All blessings past, present, or future, realized or anticipated, are according to, and in subservience to, His will. If we count the number of occurrences of the word will (thelema) in Ephesians we shall find that it is seven, the number always connected with spiritual perfection. The seven occurrences are as follows:--

A1 | i. 1. Apostleship.
A2 | i. 5, 9, 11. Doctrine.
A3 | ii. 3; v. 17; vi. 6. Practice.

It will be seen that doctrine and practice are equally related to this mighty will.

Doctrinal.

A2 | a | i. 5. Good pleasure of His will.--Predestination to sonship.
b | i. 9. Mystery of His will.--The fulness of the seasons.
a | i. 11. Counsel of His will.--Predestination to inheritance.

Such is the blessed doctrine; what shall the practical answer be? Shall we be blessed with sonship and inheritance, shall we contemplate the heading up of all things in the Christ without at least a desire to "walk worthy"? The remaining references seem designed to answer the question.

Practical.

A3 | c | ii. 3. Doing the will of the flesh.--"Once."
d | v. 17. The will of the Lord.--Present rule.
c | vi. 6. Doing the will of God.--"Now."

Let us look again at the three doctrinal references. We have the "good pleasure," the "mystery (or secret)," and "the counsel" of His will. This is the will of One Who is infinitely gracious, this is the will of One Who is seeking the blessing of His people. The first qualifying term "good pleasure" is the one we will pause to consider here. The word translated "good pleasure" is the word eudokia, which occurs nine times in the N.T. In Matt. xi. 26 and Luke x. 21, "So it seemed good"; Rom. x. 1, "My heart's desire"; Luke ii. 14 and Phil. i. 15, "good will" as opposed to envy and strife, and in conjunction with "peace"; Phil. ii. 13 and II Thess. i. 11,"good pleasure." These last two passages are helpful by reason of the light which they throw upon the relation of good pleasure to the will of God. Phil. ii. 13, "For it is God Who worketh in you both the willing and the working on account of (His) good pleasure"; II Thess. i. 11, "And fulfil all the good pleasure of (His) goodness and the work of faith with power." What depths of grace and graciousness are here! "This," as Blackwell observes, "is the shortest and most charming emphatical representation that is anywhere to be found of the immense graciousness and admirable benignity of God, which no words or thoughts can fully express as here." Eudokia comes from eudekeõ, "to think well"; dekeõ, "to think," also means to decree or determine (see "dogma," "dogmatic"). "It seemed good to me"; dekeõ supplies the idea of "to try, prove, assay, experience by trial"; and yet again it gives us doxa, "glory, esteem, honour, praise."

While it may be impossible to convey in a translation these reflected lights and family connections, we can remember, as we read the Father's motive, that His good pleasure speaks to us of immeasureable goodness, benevolence and kindness, but not indulgence or shortsighted affection; graciousness which does not ignore our failings, but which has mercifully provided for them in Christ. All His blessings move in the sphere of love; all His favours are according to this wonderful good pleasure and this marvellous will. Let us rest here. This good and perfect and acceptable will of God may be "proved" or "experienced" by us. Rom. xii. 1, 2 indicates the way and means. May these things be not merely doctrines with us, but life-giving realities, working in us a realization even now of all the good pleasure of His goodness.

Study of the words, and their usage, that have reference to the Offering of Christ.
pp. 71-72

"Tabulate and analyze as far as possible all references to

1. The death of Christ.
2. The cross of Christ.
3. The blood of Christ.
4. The sufferings of Christ.
5. 'He gave Himself,' &c.
6. 'He gave His life,' &c."

The above is a note written about a year ago by the Editor for private use. Time has passed and still the search has not been commenced. We believe that it is essential to a correct understanding of the teaching of Scripture that our use of words should be more accurate than it is. We speak of the death of Christ and the extent of its blessing, and then imagine that the doctrine which pertains to the death of Christ must necessarily pertain to the blood of Christ, and the cross of Christ also. While it is blessedly true that the death and the cross, the shedding of blood and the sufferings combine in the one great offering, yet there are lines of teaching which arise from the death of Christ which are nowhere predicated of the shedding of His precious blood.

It is just here that the consideration of these terms as used in Scripture will throw light upon the question of human destiny. We shall find the death of Christ has reference to men under one aspect, the cross of Christ to men under another, and the blood of Christ to men under yet another. No one can explain the great question of human destiny with any scriptural authority who has not searched out these weighty matters. In conversation with one or two fellow-labourers the Editor mentioned his feelings as to the necessity of this investigation, but confessed that time was already so occupied that it seemed impossible to attempt it. One of the brethren volunteered to undertake the somewhat laborious task of providing a concordance to these subjects, and it is as an introduction to his labours that these few words are written. We feel sure that all who are interested in the question of human destiny, the reconciliation, and kindred subjects, will appreciate this contribution to our studies.

The Parables.
The Scribe (or Householder).
pp. 11-15

This parable brings us to the last of the series in Matt. xiii., and like the first it does not commence with the formula, "The kingdom of heaven is like unto."

The parable of the Sower dealt rather with the ministry of the word of the kingdom than with the kingdom itself, and the closing parable deals rather with the minister than the kingdom, the householder rather than the house. This parable is preceded by a question, "Have ye understood all these things?" and this question exactly corresponds (see structure, Vol. II., page 68, Vols. II./III., page 32) to the statement of the Lord concerning Israel as a nation, that they did not understand (Matt. xiii. 10-16). In answer to the question of the Lord as to whether they had understood all these things, the disciples reply, "Yea, Lord," and upon this basis the last parable is uttered. We must at once confess that the disciples have an advantage over us, for although we believe that by the grace of God the exposition of these parables in our pages has been in harmony with His Word, we could not presume to say that we understand all these things. There are many who are completely in error regarding these parables who do not blush to speak of "apostolic mistakes" whenever an action or word of an inspired apostle crosses their idea of the teaching of Scripture, but such would hardly dare to answer, as the apostles did, "Yea, Lord." Let us first of all consider the words of the parable:--

> "Wherefore (or for this reason) every scribe discipled into the kingdom of the heavens is like a man, an householder, who putteth forth out of his treasure things new and old" (Matt. xiii. 52).

It will be seen by the opening word "wherefore" (or because of this) that the parable is connected with the claim of the disciples to have understood all things which were intended to give them a complete history of the progress of the kingdom of the heavens. This emphasis upon the word "understanding" not only contrasts the disciples with the nation, but leads us to consider other passages where a few amongst Israel will have understanding, particularly at the time of the end, when these parables will reach their fulfilment. Dan. xi. referring to the time of antichristian apostasy says in vv. 33 & 35:--

> "And they that understand among the people shall instruct many."
> "And some of them of understanding shall fall, to try them, and to purge and to make them white, even to the time of the end,"

and in Dan. xii. 3, 10:--

> "And they that be wise (margin, teachers) shall shine as the brightness of the firmament."
> "Many shall be purified and made white and tried. . . . the wise shall understand."

The wise ones with understanding have relation to the time of the end, and particular reference to Israel and the kingdom. Hearing the word, and understanding it, is characteristic of the final and yet future sowing of the seed of the kingdom, as we have seen in Matt. xiii. 19, 23. This understanding is not necessarily connected with education or ability of mind, but rather that understanding which comes from a heart acquaintance with the word of God, and the Lord Himself. Thus the Psalmist could say, "I have more understanding than all my teachers; for Thy testimonies are my meditation" (Psa. cxix. 99). Those therefore who have such understanding are like a householder, and only such are here in question.

The word householder is oikodespotes, and occurs twelve times in the New Testament. Four times it is rendered "goodman of the house," and once "goodman." The first occurrence is in Matt. x. 25, and the last in Luke xii. 11. It is bounded by the period covered by the gospel of the kingdom, and the number of its occurrences, viz., twelve, also links it with Israel and the kingdom. Such a scribe, such a householder, is said to be "discipled" into the kingdom of the heavens.

The word "instructed," which we have rendered "discipled," occurs four times in the N.T., viz., Matt. xiii. 52; xxvii. 57; xxviii. 19; Acts xiv. 21, and is translated "instructed," "disciple," "teach." The marginal readings of Matt. xxviii. 19 and Acts xiv. 21 suggest "make disciples." Matt. xxviii. 19, 20 looks forward to a future ministry when the sent ones of the Lord shall "make nations disciples." Matt. xxviii. says nothing about preaching the gospel, although many thus misquote it. It speaks of "discipling," whatsoever the Lord Jesus had commanded them. They who will be fitted for this wonderful ministry are before us in this parable. Before they can disciple all nations they must have been "discipled into the kingdom" themselves; they must be learners. Further, the parable does not say "every one," but "every scribe." The scribe was one who had to do with the word of God, the grammateus. No ordinary scribe, however, is here in view. The teacher must also be the learner. The scribe must also be the disciple. He must have the wide range of prophetic view as given in these parables of the mysteries of the kingdom before he can be likened to a householder.

The Scribes in the day of Christ were as degenerate as their fellows the Pharisees, and against them, equally with the Pharisees, the Lord uttered His solemn woes. Speaking of the passage, "He taught them as one having authority, and not as the Scribes," a learned writer (Dean Farrar) says:--

> "The teaching of their Scribes was narrow, dogmatical, material; it was cold in manner, frivolous in matter, second-hand, and iterative in its very essence; with no freshness in it, no force, no fire; servile to all authority, opposed to all independence, at once erudite and foolish, at once contemptuous and mean; never passing a hair's breadth beyond the carefully watched boundary line of commentary and precedent; full of balanced inference, and orthodox hesitancy, and impossible literalism, intricate with legal pettiness, and labyrinthine system, elevating mere memory above genius, and repetition above originality, concerned only about Priests and Pharisees, in Temple and Synagogue, or School or Sanhedrim, and mostly occupied with things infinitely little. It was not indeed wholly devoid of moral significance, nor is it impossible to find here and there among the debris of it a noble thought, but it was occupied a thousandfold more with Levitical minutiæ about mint and anise and cummin, and the length of fringes and the breadth of phylacteries, and the washing of cups and platters, and the particular quarter of a second when new moons and Sabbath days begin."

Such were the Scribes of the days of Christ, and were it not uncharitable one might almost say that they seem to still have a following to-day. The disciples of the Lord who heard His words, and noted how different His speech and teaching were, how utterly opposed to the Scribes His manner and matter, would understand the clause, "every Scribe who is discipled into the kingdom." The word of God was at the finger tips of these Scribes, but it never entered their hearts. Those contemplated in the parable knew that unless their righteousness exceeded the righteousness of the Scribes and Pharisees, they could not enter into the kingdom of the heavens.

A day is coming when not merely a few but a whole nation shall be righteous. This synchronizes with the fourth sowing of the first parable, the ministry under the new covenant, when the stony heart will be removed, and a heart of flesh given; when the law shall be written in the heart and not on tables of stone; when the Scribe will be worthy of the name, and when he too will teach "as one having authority," because he also has "learned of Him." Out of his treasure he will then bring things new and old. What these new and old things may be it is not for us to say with any definiteness. The contrast between the old and the new covenant, the old and new Jerusalem, the old and new heaven and earth will form mighty themes for the messengers of the Lord. It would appear in the parable that the extent of this ministry is to be limited by the word "householder," while in Matt. xxviii. the wider sphere is the command to "disciple all nations."

We trust that some little light has been thrown upon these important parables, and as we pursue the theme of their fulfilment in the Revelation, and of the times in which their final heading up – the harvest – is set, we shall have continual reason to see that these parables are what indeed the Lord said they were, "The mysteries of the kingdom of the heavens."

Matt.	13	10	And the disciples came, and said unto him, Why speakest thou unto them in parables?
		11	He answered and said unto them, Because it is given unto you to know the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven, but to them it is not given.
		12	For whosoever hath, to him shall be given, and he shall have more abundance: but whosoever hath not, from him shall be taken away even that he hath.
		13	Therefore speak I to them in parables: because they seeing see not; and hearing they hear not, neither do they understand.
		14	And in them is fulfilled the prophecy of Esaias, which saith, By hearing ye shall hear, and shall not understand; and seeing ye shall see, and shall not perceive:
		15	For this people's heart is waxed gross, and their ears are dull of hearing, and their eyes they have closed; lest at any time they should see with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and should understand with their heart, and should be converted, and I should heal them.
		16	But blessed are your eyes, for they see: and your ears, for they hear.

Matt.	13	19	When any one heareth the word of the kingdom, and understandeth it not, then cometh the wicked one, and catcheth away that which was sown in his heart. This is he which received seed by the way side.
		23	But he that received seed into the good ground is he that heareth the word, and understandeth it; which also beareth fruit, and bringeth forth, some an hundredfold, some sixty, some thirty.

The Parables.
Matt. xv. 10-20.
pp. 24-31

We have now concluded our consideration of the parables of Matt. xiii. As we have seen, these parables of the mysteries of the kingdom form a complete line of teaching by themselves. After this series of parables was concluded the Lord Jesus revealed the fact that He must not only be rejected, but be crucified, die, and be raised again the third day. The parables of the second section accordingly take a somewhat different turn. One parable is spoken after chapter xiii. before the revelation of the Lord's death in Matt. xvi. After this the second series of parables follows, ending in the prophetic words of Matt. xxiv. and xxv. This series makes a complete set marked by a special aspect of dispensational teaching, just in the same way that the parables of Matt. xiii. are marked by a special aspect of dispensational truth.

Before considering this group, however, we will look at the parable recorded in Matt. xv. 10-20. It throws light upon the nature of the opposition, and the forces at work which had rejected the kingdom and finally would crucify the King. It arose out of the question of the Scribes and Pharisees concerning eating with unwashen hands. The Lord does not here, as He does in Matt. xxiii, fully and unreservedly strip off their mask of hypocrisy, for His hour had not yet come. In parable form, however, He enforces the lesson of the previous words addressed to the Scribes and Pharisees. These formalists were far more concerned about ceremonial washings, than about fruit of heart love. The transgression of some minute point of rabbinical tradition was far more serious in their eyes than the breaking of the law of God.

In answer to the question, "Why do Thy disciples transgress the tradition of the elders?" the Lord said, "Why do ye also transgress the commandment of God by your tradition?" Opposition had been gathering, and many attempts to entrap the Lord had been made. His free intermingling with the publicans and sinners wounded the pride of the teachers of the law. His freedom regarding the sabbath was much resented and opposed. It appears that on some occasion the Pharisees had noticed that the disciples had not observed the tradition regarding washings before meals, and this supplied them with a weapon of attack. The oral tradition laid peculiar emphasis upon these ceremonial ablutions. No doubt we have all heard of Rabbi Akiba, who when imprisoned and supplied with only enough water to maintain life, chose rather to perish with thirst and hunger than to eat without the necessary washings. What a pitiable misconception! What a God these people had invented! We can imagine the feelings with which these men came down with this charge upon the disciples of the Lord. They did not expect the Lord to reveal the superficial nature of their teaching, which He did so incisively by his reference to their despicable gloss in relation to "the first commandment with promise":--

> "Ye hypocrites, well did Isaiah prophesy of you saying, This people draweth nigh with their mouth, and honoureth Me with their lips, but their heart is far from Me. But in vain they do worship Me (solemn words for all dispensations), teaching for doctrines the commandments of men (Matt. xv. 7-9).

Turning from these votaries of littleness, the Lord called the people together and said:--

> "Hear and understand. Not that which goeth into the mouth defileth a man, but that which cometh out of the mouth, this defileth a man" (Matt. xv. 10, 11).

In these few words the Lord brushed aside the external and the ceremonial, establishing in their place the real and the essential. The record in Mark vii. 15 should be compared:--

> "There is nothing from without a man that, entering into him, can defile him, but the things which comes out of him, these are they that defile a man."

These words were sufficiently understood by the Pharisees to offend them, but the Lord in His reply shows how little He thought of man's judgment, "Let them alone; they be blind leaders of the blind." Peter now asks for an explanation of the parable, and Matt. xv. 16-20 contains the Lord's answer:--

> "And Jesus said, Are ye also yet without understanding, that whatsoever entereth in at the mouth goeth into the belly, and is cast into the draught? but those things which proceed out of the mouth come from the heart, and they defile a man. For out of the heart proceed evil thoughts, murders, adulteries, fornications, thefts, false witness, blasphemies. These are the things which defile a man, but to eat with unwashen hands defileth not a man."

Mark gives one or two additional statements which are too important to pass over unnoticed:--

> "Do ye not perceive, that whatsoever thing from without entereth into the man, it cannot defile him, because it entereth not into his heart" (Mark vii. 18).

Thus the whole subject revolves around the words "not into his heart" and "out of the heart." "Their heart is far from Me." The A.V. continues, "but into the belly, and goeth into the draught, purging all meats." The last clause has caused a great amount of unprofitable matter to be written. The true meaning is given in the R.V., "This He said, making all meats clean," i.e., abolishing for ever the scrupulosities of mere ceremonial distinctions. The list of evil things is different from that given in Matt. xv.:--

> "Evil thoughts, adulteries, fornications, murders, thefts, covetousness, wickedness, deceit, lasciviousness, an evil eye, blasphemy, pride, foolishness" (Mark vii. 21, 22).

We would now draw attention to one or two important words and expressions used in this parable, and then show the light it casts upon the times and circumstances of this closing section of Matthew's Gospel.

DEFILED (koinos).--It must be remembered that the subject of defilement or uncleanness in this parable is ceremonial, it in no wise touches upon the desirability of having clean hands at meal times, neither does it teach that we may eat anything with impunity. If we perceive the truth nothing can make us ceremonially unclean, but some things may do us a deal of harm physically. The word koinos has nothing whatever to do with uncleanness in a physical sense; it means defilement only in a ceremonial sense. The following are its occurrences:-- Koinos.

"Defiled (that is to say unwashen) hands (Mark vii. 2).
"All things common" (Acts ii. 44; iv. 32).
"Commom or unclean" (Acts x. 14, 28; xi. 8).
"There is nothing unclean of itself, but to him that esteemeth anything to be unclean, to him it is unclean" (Rom. xiv. 14).
"The common faith" (Titus i. 4).
"An unholy thing" (Heb. x. 29).
"The common salvation" (Jude 3).

Koinoõ.

"Defile a man" (Matt. xv. 11, 18, 20; Mark vii. 15, 18, 20, 23).
"Call not thou common" (Acts x. 15; xi. 9).
"Brought Greeks also into the temple, and hath polluted this holy place" (Acts xxi. 28).
"Sprinkling the unclean" (Heb. ix. 13).
"There shall in no wise enter into it any thing that defileth" (Rev. xxi. 27).

It will be seen by the above passages that the idea defile must be considered from the ceremonial standpoint. The apostle does not hesitate to speak of the "common faith," not because there was anything unclean about it, but because it was not the exclusive possession of a privileged few, it being now proclaimed to the Gentiles as well as the Jew. The ceremonial ablutions were jealousy guarded and observed not so much out of a desire for holiness or personal cleanliness, but out of a cramped, narrow and bigoted pride. To the pharisaic mind there was but one class, "the elect," all others were either "Gentiles dogs," or "the people who know not the law" who are cursed. This narrow exclusive spirit was a fundamental cause of the great rejection, for in Matt. xxiii. 13 the first woe uttered by our Lord touches this very point:--

> "But woe unto you Scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye shut up the kingdom of heaven against men, for ye neither go in yourselves, neither do ye suffer them that are entering to go in."

Luke xi. 52 adds another weighty word:--

> "Woe unto you lawyers! for ye took away the key of knowledge, ye entered not in yourselves, and them that were entering in ye hindered."

The reference to "the blind guides" in Matt. xxiii. 16 is a further link with Matt. xv. So also the sentiment of verses 23-27. The charge is very severe, and must have caused, as indeed we know it did, intense hatred. These men, who were so scrupulous about the outside as in Matt. xv., were within "full of all uncleanness."

HEART.--The way in which the Lord uses the word "heart" is full of deep teaching. In the Beatitudes He had said, "Blessed are the pure in heart," the word "pure" being the Greek word katharos. The next time the Lord uses the word in Matthew it is in direct continuance of this passage in Matt. v.:--

> "Thou blind Pharisee, cleanse first that which is within the cup and platter, that the outside of them may be clean also" (Matt. xxiii. 26).

The clean in heart, not the ceremonially and externally clean, not as the whitewashed sepulchres, these and these alone should see the kingdom. So superficial had become the ideas of men at the time of Christ, that He early disturbed the self-righteous complacency of those who thought that they were safe:--

> "Ye have heard that it was said by them of old time, Thou shalt not commit adultery, but I say unto you, that whosoever looketh on a woman to lust after her hath committed adultery with her already in his heart" (Matt. v. 28).
> "The tree is known by his fruit. O generation of vipers, how can ye, being evil, speak good things? for out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh" (Matt. xii. 32, 34).

Thus the Lord would teach that just as the fruit of a tree indicates the nature of the tree itself, so the fruit of the lips will show the nature of the heart which gives that fruit origin. Once again, in answer to the lawyer's question, the Lord puts the heart in the first place:--

> "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind" (Mat.. xxii. 37).

Heart first, mind last. The mere intellectuallism which always accompanies a pharisaical spirit is placed by its advocates foremost, while the heart is placed last. Not so, in the Lord's estimate. He does not call upon us to quibble over the petty details which occupied the little minds of these formalists, but urges love of heart first and foremost.

The word of the R.V. of Mark vii. 19, "T*his He said*, making all meats clean," should be noted. These words are the trend of His teaching and the effect of His work. It lifted the one who believed Him above the sphere wherein such observances were of service. It entirely discountenanced the teaching of the Pharisees. The spirit of the lesson is echoed in an apocryphal addition to Luke vi. 5 found in the Codez Bezae:--

> "On the same day, seeing one working on the Sabbath, He said to him, O man, if indeed thou knowest what thou doest, thou art blessed, but if thou knowest not, thou art accursed, and a transgressor of the Law."

Let us now examine the list of sins which the Lord said did defile a man, coming as they did out of the heart.

EVIL THOUGHTS.--The word "thought" is dialogismos:--

> "When Jesus perceived their thoughts, He answering said unto them, What reason ye in your hearts?" (Luke v. 22).
> "The Scribes and Pharisees watched Him, whether He would heal on the Sabbath day, that they might find an accusation against Him, but He knew their thoughts" (Luke vi. 7, 8).

So also Luke ii. 35; ix. 46, 47; xxiv. 38; and James ii. 4. The word "evil" is poneros:--

> "Wherefore think ye evil in your hearts" (Matt. ix. 4).
> "O generation of vipers, how can ye (Pharisees, see verse 24), being evil speak good things? for out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh. . . . An evil and adulterous generation" (Matt. xii. 34, 39).

It seems fairly clear that the Lord had the Pharisees and Scribes in view when He uttered the words in the parable concerning evil thoughts.

MURDERS (phonos).--The word occurs in connection with Barabbas in Mark xv. 7 and Luke xxiii. 19, 25. "Destroyed those murderers, and burnt up their city" (Matt. xxii. 7). Refer back to the related parable in Matt. xxi. 38, 39 for the full force of this passage: note verses 45 and 46, and xxii. 15, and see how the Pharisees realize that the Lord meant to indicate them under this awful title. Matt. v. 21 has already made it clear how "murder" may be charged against these plotting enemies of the Lord. The Pharisees and Scribes are again charged with this foul crime in Matt. xxiii. 31-39.

ADULTERERS (moicheia).--"The Scribes and Pharisees brought unto Him a woman taken in adultery" (John viii. 3). These hypocrites were not concerned about the evil of the act (for they were guilty themselves, see verse 9), they simply desired to catch the Lord and involve Him in His words (verse 6). The exceeding looseness with which many of the Pharisees held the marriage tie involved them in the sin of adultery before God (see Matt. v. 31, 32, and xix. 3-9). As with murder, so with adultery, the desire of the heart constituted guilt (see Matt. v. 27, 28). On several occasions the Lord denounced these evil men as "a wicked and adulterous generaton" (see Matt. xii. 39 and xvi. 4).

FORNICATIONS (porneia).--It is remarkable fact that this plague figures more conspicuously in the Epistles and in the Revelation than in the Gospels. Once the enemies of the Lord use it (John viii. 41), an insult which His holy nature must have felt keenly, but how gracious and calm was His reply! Although specific instances of this sin are not given in the Gospels, we know the Lord sufficiently to imagine that He would not use a word so foul, unless He knew only too well that the charge was actually true. Its prominence in the Apocalypse, and the practical absence of adultery, throw a vivid light on the character of the last days.

THEFTS (klope).--This word occurs nowhere else except in the parallel passage of Mark. The cognate word kleptes ("thief") is used in John x. 1, 8, 10, and includes the Scribes and Pharisees, as the context shows. The devouring of widows' houses (Matt. xxiii. 14; Mark xii. 40; and Luke xx. 47), the traditions (Matt. xv. 5, 6), and the turning of the House of Prayer into a den of thieves (Matt. xxi. 13), involve the Pharisees in this sin.

FALSE WITNESS.--This word in all its hideous nakedness is written against the "chief priests, and elders, and all the council" (Matt. xxvi. 59) in relation to the deep-laid plot against the life of the Lord Jesus Christ. This is the more significant when we consider the fact that these two passages contain all the occurrences of the word in the New Testament.

BLASPHEMY.--Mark iii. 29 shows that the Scribes were guilty of the most unpardonable blasphemy.

We will not go through the list given in Mark, readers should make a study of the words there given. One thing is prominent in this parable. The Pharisees were guilty of breaking the very law in which they boasted so much. Listen to our Lord's summary of the Law:--

> "Jesus said (observe the order here and in Matt. xv.), Thou shalt do no murder, thou shalt not commit adultery, thou shalt not steal, thou shalt not bear false witness. Honour thy father and thy mother (cf. Matt. xv. 4-6), and thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself" (Matt. xix. 18, 19).

How weak, how beggarly, the petty observances and mere trifling externals of the Pharisees appear when seen from the standpoint of love. The apostle Paul, writing to the Romans, seems to have the pharisaical spirit before him. First in Rom. ii. we read:--

> "For wherein thou judgest another, thou condemnest thyself. . . . Behold, thou art called a Jew, and restest in the law, and makest thy boast of God, and knowest His will, and approvest the things that are more excellent, being instructed out of the law, and art confident that thou thyself art a guide of the blind (cf. Matt. xv. 14), a light of them which are in darkness, an instructor of the foolish, a teacher of babes, which have the FORM of knowledge and of the truth in the law (cf. II Tim. iii. 5); thou therefore that TEACHEST another, teachest thou not thyself? thou that PREACHEST a man should not steal, dost thou steal? Thou SAYEST a man should not commit adultery, dost thou commit adultery? thou that abhorrest idols, dost thou commit sacrilege? thou that makest thy boast in the law, through breaking the law dishonourest thou God. . . . who by the letter and circumcision dost transgress the law? (Matt. xv. 3). for he is not a Jew who is one outwardly (see Matt. xiii. 28). . . . circumcision is that of the HEART, in the spirit, and not in the letter (cf. II Cor. iii. 6), whose praise is not of men, but of God."

The sequel is found in Rom. xiii. 8-10:--

> "Owe no man anything, but to love one another; for he that loveth another hath fulfilled the law. For this, thou shalt not commit adultery, thou shalt not kill, thou shalt not steal, thou shalt not bear false witness, thou shalt not covet, and if there be any other commandment it is briefly comprehended in this saying, 'Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself'."

Returning to the parable of Matt. xv. with the knowledge we have now gained, do we not see that it foreshadowed that spirit which manifested itself in all its hollowness and sham, and whose loveless creed culminated in the basest act that the world has ever witnessed. The second set of parables in Matthew's Gospel becomes luminous in the light of this one. Into what a ditch these blind guides led that poor blinded people! The Lord disowns them, they were never planted by Him, they were sown by the Devil, they shall be rooted up (Matt. xiii. 29). They are the tares, the children of the wicked one. The burden of guilt rested chiefly upon the rulers and leaders of the people. They neither entered into the kingdom of the heavens themselves, nor allowed the common people, who desired to enter, to do so.

While it is of the utmost importance to realize the dispensational setting and bearing of this parable, it is essential to our joy and peace that we take to heart the solemn teaching for ourselves. May we remember that the mere observance of ceremonies is nothing. Love is the fulfilling of the law. Our walk is to be "in love." Let us take heed and beware of the "leaven of the Pharisees, and of the Sadducees."

Matt. xv.	10. And he called the multitude, and said unto them, Hear, and understand: 11. Not that which goeth into the mouth defileth a man; but that which cometh out of the mouth, this defileth a man. 12. Then came his disciples, and said unto him, Knowest thou that the Pharisees were offended, after they heard this saying? 13. But he answered and said, Every plant, which my heavenly Father hath not planted, shall be rooted up. 14. Let them alone: they be blind leaders of the blind. And if the blind lead the blind, both shall fall into the ditch. 15. Then answered Peter and said unto him, Declare unto us this parable. 16. And Jesus said, Are ye also yet without understanding? 17. Do not ye yet understand, that whatsoever entereth in at the mouth goeth into the belly, and is cast out into the draught? 18. But those things which proceed out of the mouth come forth from the heart; and they defile the man. 19. For out of the heart proceed evil thoughts, murders, adulteries, fornications, thefts, false witness, blasphemies: 20. These are the things which defile a man: but to eat with unwashen hands defileth not a man.

The Parables.
Matt. xvi.-xxv.
pp. 42-44

Having considered the important parable which threw such a lurid light upon the cause of Israel's failure, we pass on to another series of parables which have a peculiar relation to the second section of the Gospel according to Matthew. It will be remembered that in Matthew the ministry of the Lord is divided into two sections by the words, "from that time":--

> "From that time Jesus began to preach and say, Repent for the kingdom of heaven is at hand" (iv. 17).
> "From that time forth began Jesus to shew unto His disciples how that He must go unto Jerusalem, and suffer many things of the elders and chief priests and scribes, and be killed, and be raised again the third day" (xvi. 21).

Just as the parables of Matt. xiii. are the mysteries of the kingdom of the heavens, and have very special reference to the aspect of the Lord's ministry commenced at Matt. iv. 17, so the series of parables contained in the second division of the Gospel have a special relation to the new aspect of truth opened up by the Lord in His words concerning His sufferings and death at the hands of the rulers of the people at Jerusalem. These are divinely given keys, to ignore which is fatal to a true understanding.

Now just as we saw that the eight parables of Matt. xiii. had a very definite structure, so we shall see that the parables now under consideration have an orderly and suggestive arrangement. (next page)

The imagery is derived from three classes of people, (1) servants (good and bad), (2) labourers and husbandmen in a vineyard, and (3) guests at a marriage. These were divinely chosen to set forth the state of the nation regarding their position before God, their failure, and the consequences. One of the features of these parables is that on the one hand they set forth the failure of the nation, whilst on the other they give a position to the outside publican and sinner which the exclusive ideas of the Jews would not allow. This is seen in the parable of the marriage feast (xxii.), the two sons (xxi.), and the wicked husbandmen (xxi.).

Matt. xxiii. Says in plain words what this set of parables had taught in figure. The nation had degenerated into a wicked people. viewed as sons they were rebellious and disobedient, as husbandmen in charge of their Lord’s vineyard they were envious, murderers, and thought only of themselves. Viewed as labourers they were discontented with their wage. Viewed as servants the majority were unfaithful and unprofitable. To their charge was laid the death of both the Lord’s servants and His Son (xxi. 38; xxiii. 34). The destruction of the city (Jerusalem) is plainly foretold, and the Gentile-ward movement of the Acts of the apostles is clearly shown. It is of the utmost importance that we keep the whole range of the parables before us. We must keep the series of Matt. xiii. in mind, and also the one parable in Matt. xv. Which is both a link between the set of Matt. xiii. and the set of Matt. xx.-xxv., and a light which illuminates the character of the actors in this awful tragedy.

In our next article we hope to commence a more detailed exposition of the first parable of this series.

The Parables.
The Wicked Servant (Matt. xviii. 23-35).
pp. 87-91

We have learned that the series of parables which we are about to consider are linked together by a common theme, the disclosure of the temper and spirit of Israel and the causes which led up to their rejection of the Lord Jesus, and the rejection in turn of themselves from their position as an elect nation before God. The parable was spoken in answer to Peter's question:--

> "Lord, how oft shall my brother sin against me, and I forgive him? Till seven times?"

It seems that Peter felt the responsibility of the charge laid upon him. In Matt. xvi. 19 the Lord had said to him:--

> "I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of the heavens. . . . and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven."

The words are repeated in Matt. xviii. 18, the singular "thou" being changed to the plural "ye," and are there linked by the Lord to the question of forgiving an offending brother. Another link with the original commission to Peter as given in Matt. xvi. is the reference to the church. Matt. xvi. 18 and xviii. 17 are the only references to the church (or ekklesia) in the Gospel of Matthew, and in both passages the reference is linked with this power of binding and loosing, and with the kingdom of the heavens.

It seems that Peter was not merely asking the question for his own private information, but was urged to inquire by reason of the great responsibility he felt at having the keys of the kingdom committed to him, and the power in a special manner of binding and loosing connected therewith. How long should he exercise forbearance and forgiveness? The Rabbis taught from Amos i. 3, &c., to forgive three times and no more. This seems to receive some colour from the words of the Lord in Matt. xviii. 15-17:--

(1). "Between thee and him alone," then
(2). "If he will not hear, take with thee one or two more," then
(3). "If he neglect to hear the church, let him be unto thee as an heathen man and a publican."

Peter seemed to realize something of the new spirit, and ventures to put a tentative reply to his own question by saying, "Till seven times?" If Peter had any hesitancy in advancing beyond the tether of Rabbinical teaching it was entirely dispelled by the glorious fulness given in the Lord's answer, "I say not unto thee, Until seven times, but, Until seventy times seven." These words seem to refer back to two passages of Old Testament Scripture, both written during the times of the Gentiles, the one uttered before the nation of Israel had been formed, the other after they had been taken captive to Babylon.

The first reference is Gen. iv. 24, "If Cain shall be avenged sevenfold, truly Lamech seventy and sevenfold." Lamech is often spoken of as arrogating to himself divine prerogatives; it may be, however, that he has been blamed by Commentators for that which he did not intend. Cain was protected by the Lord, a token was appointed for him in mercy (nearly every one speaks of the "brand of Cain" as though God set a mark upon him in wrath), the word mark in Gen. iv. 15 being the word token, used of the bow in the clouds (Gen. ix. 12), and of the blood of the passover (Exod. xii. 13). Lamech seems to say to his wives, Be still, fear not, for if Cain who was a murderer was thus protected by a sevenfold avenging, surely I shall be avenged seven and seventy-fold; for the words relative to the slaying and wounding in verse 23 may indicate to a query rather then a state a fact. There seems to be an emphasis, markedly so in the case of Cain, upon the great longsuffering and mercy of our gracious God.

The other reference to this seventy times seven is found in Dan. ix., and there in a light infinitely worse than that of Cain or of Lamech. The Lord intervenes and tells the anxious prophet that his prayers shall receive an abundant answer. Daniel had prayed for the forgiveness of his people (ix. 19), and in answer the angel Gabriel is sent to reveal the future of his people to him. "Seventy-sevens are severed off upon thy people and upon thy holy city." Seventy-sevens – the period of time seems to convey also some lesson of the Lord's longsuffering and forbearance with His rebellious people. If ever a people could be expected to exercise forgiveness to others Israel surely should be the first, for have they not had extended to them untold forbearance from a longsuffering God? The Lord did not omit this from the kingdom prayer of Matt. vi., "Forgive us our debts, as we forgive our debtors" has a direct bearing upon the parable of the servant who, having been forgiven "all that debt," would not forgive his fellow-servant who was his debtor to a much less extent. How many of our readers could say, without reference, what one clause of the Lord's prayer is immediately expanded after the conclusion of the petition? It is not the reference to hallowing the Name, nor the coming kingdom, but just this very clause:--

> "For if ye forgive men their trespasses, your heavenly Father will also forgive you, but if ye forgive not men their trespasses, neither will your Father forgive your trespasses."

These words are echoed in the closing verse of Matt. xviii. Here in this parable we have in all its hatefulness one of the factors of Israel's failure. They forgave not; they were not forgiven. Their measure of iniquity was filled up when in their implacable antagonism to the widening mercy of God they forbade the apostle to speak to the Gentiles that they might be saved, and so wrath came upon them to the uttermost (I Thess. ii. 16). This passage from I Thessalonians should read with the parable before us, when the "wrath to the uttermost" echoed in the words, "His lord was wroth," and "till he should pay all that was due unto him." This last clause compels us to consider another passage in the Sermon on the Mount, that message calculated to reveal the failure of Israel's attempt at attaining a righteousness by law, and to bring them to repentance. In Matt. v. 22 the Lord says:--

> "But I say unto you (in contradistinction to what had been taught them), that whosoever is angry with his brother shall be liable to the judgment."

The words "without a cause" must be omitted; anger is to be "put away," whether with or without a cause. Continuing the Lord said:--

> "Therefore, if thou bring thy gift to the altar, and there rememberest that thy brother hath ought against thee, leave there thy gift before the altar, and go thy way, first be reconciled to thy brother, and then come and offer thy gift. Agree quickly with thy prosecutor while thou art in the way with him. . . . and thou be cast into prison. Verily I say unto thee, thou shalt by no means come out thence, till thou hast paid the uttermost farthing."

Verses 22-26 of Matt. v. must be considered together, the threefold punishment in verse 22, Judges, Sanhedrin, and Gehenna of Fire being balanced by the Judge, the Officer, and the Prison of verse 25. "The uttermost farthing" is parallel to the words of the parable, "all that was due." These words are entirely out of place, nay, they are absolutely untrue the moment they are taken out of their dispensational setting, and are interpreted of the present time. Israel will pay to the uttermost farthing. They did not forgive, and the word is being fulfilled—they are not being forgiven. A day will come, however, when the prison shall be opened, when the Lord shall say that Israel has received double for all her sins (Isa. xl. 2). There are many who repeat the words, "forgive us our debts, as we forgive our debtors," who do not believe that the Lord intended to put this principle in operation. The parable of the unforgiv*ing* servant is also the parable of the unforgiv*en* servant. The forgiveness granted is cancelled, and payment in full demanded. This is not evangelical doctrine, this is not the truth of the epistles of Paul, it is on an entirely different platform and under an entirely different economy.

We have considered the outlying context of the parable rather than the parable itself; its interpretation is simple if we see its connection with Israel and the kingdom. As we consider the other parables of the series, further illustration will be given of the factors which contributed to Israel's rejection. When the Lord Jesus was shamefully and cruelly crucified, even then He said, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do." Forgiveness of "all that debt" was proclaimed in the Acts to the very people guilty of the blood of Christ, but Israel did not enter into blessing, the keys that unlocked the doors of the kingdom closed them again, the loosing was followed by binding, and Israel, scattered and homeless, have been delivered unto the tormentors until the Lord's own good time shall come.

Thanks be to God that the forgiveness granted under the dispensation of the grace of God cannot be rescinded; we are not forgiven as we forgive others. The teaching is reversed; we forgive others because, whether we forgive or not, God in Christ has forgiven us (Eph. iv. 32). For the help of those who desire to take up the parable for detailed study the following outline may be of service:--

Structure of Matt. xviii. 21-35.

The Parables.
The Householder and the Vineyard.—The call of the Labourers. (Matt. xx. 1-16).
pp. 115-119

When considering the first parable of this series, the Unforgiving Servant, we noticed that it was particularly addressed to Peter in answer to his question regarding the extent of forgiveness. The parable of the Householder and Vineyard is also addressed to Peter in reference to his question concerning the reward of service. This is indicated by the word "For" with which the parable commences.

Looking back into chapter xix. we shall find the inspired introduction to the parable which it is essential to keep in mind. Chapter xix. records the fact that the Lord left Galilee and came to Judæa, and while there the Pharisees tempted Him with questions relating to divorce. The disciples were rather disconcerted by the Lord's answer to the Pharisees (verse 10), but the Lord told them that "All men cannot receive this saying, save they to whom it is given. . . . He that is able to receive it, let him receive it" (verses 11, 12). The disciples evidence their misunderstanding of the words of verse 12 by the fact that they rebuked those who brought little children to the Lord. The Lord disposed of this false deduction, blessed the little children, and with them the ordinance of marriage which began to be questioned in the mind of the disciples, and then departed.

He was then met by a rich man who desired to know what good thing he must do to have eternal life. It is not our purpose to enter into this passage here, other than to lodge a protest against the idea often read into it that the Lord meant to teach the doctrine of the Epistles—faith without works. The commandments are stated as the way to enter into life, and added to that He said, "If thou wilt be perfect, go and sell that thou hast, and give to the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven, and come follow Me." Nothing but the assumption that the Gospel of Matthew speaks in the same terms as the Pauline Epistles could have made men teach from this passage the doctrine of justification by faith without works. However, we pass on. The test was too severe for the young man, and the Lord said to His disciples:--

> "Verily I say unto you, that a rich man shall enter with difficulty into the kingdom of heaven. And again I say unto you, it is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle, than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God" (Matt. xix. 23, 24).

Again the disciples are amazed at His teaching. If such as the rich young man should find difficulty, amounting almost to an impossibility, then said they, "Who then can be saved?" The elective element is again introduced (as in verse 11) by the words, "With men this is impossible, but with God all things are possible." Peter seems to have been turning the matter over in his mind. The young man had failed at the test of giving up all his possessions and following the Lord. It was a perfectly natural thing for Peter to think that at least he and his fellow disciples had the advantage here, for they had left all. He therefore turns to the Lord and says, "Behold, we have forsaken all, and followed Thee; WHAT SHALL WE HAVE THEREFORE?" This question, the manifestation of its spirit, and the needed rebuke, is the one great feature of the parable, while the emphasis upon the sovereignty of grace as related to service and its reward is the other. The Lord is gracious in His reply. He fully recognizes what they had done and suffered, and He tells them of their reward first, adding afterwards words of warning, and illustrating His point by the parable under consideration:--

> "Verily I say unto you, that ye which have followed Me, in the regeneration when the Son of man shall sit on the throne of His glory, ye also shall sit upon twelve thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel."

After having said this much in answer to Peter's question, the Lord continues:--

> "And every one that hath forsaken houses, or brethren, or sisters, or father, or mother, or wife, or children, or lands, for My name's sake, shall receive an hundred-fold, and shall inherit everlasting life."

The hundred-fold seems to indicate the highest, as may be seen in the parable of the Sower (Matt. xiii. 23). There is no hint that hundred-fold will be given for one amount of forsaking, and sixty-fold or thirty-fold for another, indeed the truth we all need to learn here is that reward for service and the opportunity to serve is as much an act of grace as salvation. Who among us will dare to say that we have "earned" the "far more exceeding age-long weight of glory"? We need to remember the words of Phil. i. 29, "For unto you it is given in grace in the behalf of Christ, not only to believe on Him, but also to suffer for His sake." The very word translated "given" in Phil. i. 29 is translated "forgive" elsewhere. We want to remember that after all our service, whatever it may be, we may still truthfully say we are but "unprofitable servants."

The closing words of Matt. xix., "But many that are first shall be last, and the last shall be first," are the point of the parable following, recurring at its conclusion with added emphasis on an elective principle, "So the last shall be first and the first last; for many be called, but few chosen" (Matt. xx. 16). A comparison between the rich young man and the disciples who forsook all illustrates the difference between the "called" and the "chosen," the opportunity to serve being as much elective grace as salvation. Readers will notice that the parable of the Householder is balanced by the parable of the Marriage, and among other points for comparison is this statement, "many are called, but few chosen" (see structure page 43). The one parable has to do with labourers, the other with guest. The one has to do with servants, being particularly addressed to the apostles, and after them to "every one that hath forsaken," &c.; the other, addressed to the Pharisees, has to do with the nation of Israel, and the invitation to the marriage of the King's Son. Some have seen a reference to Acts ii. 15 in the "third hour," and to Acts x. 3, 9 in the "sixth" and "ninth" hours. If there is any allusion to these events it would certainly indicate that those of Israel called early (Acts ii.) would not receive more than such as Cornelius (Acts x.), or of those called at the eleventh hour, the overcomers of the seven churches of Rev. ii., iii. for example. Those who had worked all day would have been quite content with their penny had it not been for the graciousness displayed towards the last comers. The last to serve are also first to be paid, and this again would teach that grace, not debt, is here operating. The words, "Is it not lawful for me to do what I will with mine own?" are echoed in Rom. ix. 18-21, where the natural mind raises the question concerning the fairness of God's dealings:--

> "Therefore hath He mercy on whom He will have mercy, and whom He will He hardeneth. Thou wilt say then unto me, Why doth He yet find fault? For who hath resisted His will? Nay but, O man, who art thou that repliest against God? Shall the thing formed say to Him that formed it, Why hast Thou made me thus? Hath not the potter power over the clay, of the same lump to make one vessel unto honour and another unto no honour?"

The parable is a rebuke to the bargaining spirit so prevalent among us. In our investigation of the purposes of God we must ever leave a margin for the truth supplied by the above passage. He is God. He has surely as much power as the potter. He will give "unto this last" even as unto those who may seem by comparison to have merited more. It is only while we adopt the false system of "measuring ourselves by ourselves" that we can feel any pride or satisfaction in our puny efforts, or speak of future rewards as though they were debts.

After speaking of His death and resurrection, the theme of the parable is again revived by the coming of the mother of Zebedee's children with her sons, worshipping and desiring a certain thing of Him. In response to the question, "What wilt thou?" she said unto Him, "Grant that these my two sons may sit, the one on Thy right hand, and the other on Thy left, in Thy kingdom." The Lord's reply practically dismissed the request. They knew not what they asked. They may indeed suffer with Him, "but to sit on My right hand, and on My left, is not Mine to give, but for whom it is prepared of My Father." If the reader will consider the parallel passages where this spirit is manifested, e.g., Luke xxii. 24-30, he will see how humility in service is emphasized rather than the idea of earning a reward. There are other passages (indeed one in this very set of parables definitely gives the other side of the question, namely, the parable of the Talents), where the one who has gained five talents and the one who has gained two receive precisely the same commendation. The servant not using his talent has it taken away and given to the one that had ten in accord with the words, "For unto every one that hath shall be given," which bring fresh lines of teaching before the mind. Again, in Luke xix., another principle is seen operating, he who had gained ten pounds received authority over ten cities; he that had gained five pounds received authority over five cities. The servant who had not used his money to profit is deprived of the pound, it being given to the one who had made ten pounds.

It must be noticed that these servants, even the one who lost all, are differentiated from "those mine enemies" of Luke xix. 27. I Cor. iii. 15, "he shall suffer loss, but he himself shall be saved, yet so as by fire," and the parallels, should be noticed. It will be found that the "servants" and "enemies" brought together in the one parable of the Pounds in Luke xix. are treated separately in the two corresponding parables of Matthew—the Labourers (xx.) and the Guests (xxii.). The parable of Matt. xx. requires practically no explanation, it is easily read in the light of the context which we have sought to indicate. Its parallel and connection with the last verse of chapter xix. are of great importance, and as an aid to further study we suggest the following points of comparison:--

A | xix. 27. "We have forsaken all, what shall we have therefore?"
  B | xix. 28. "Ye shall sit on twelve thrones," &c.
    C | xix. 29. "And every one that forsaketh. . . . shall receive a hundred-fold."
      D | xix. 30. "Many first shall be last, and the last first."
A | xx. 1-8. Hire of labourers.
  B | xx. 1-8. Agreement to pay a penny, or that which is right.
    C | xx. 14. "I will give unto this last even as unto thee."
      D | xx. 16. "The last first, and first last. For many be called, but few chosen."

Luke xxii.	24. And there was also a strife among them, which of them should be accounted the greatest. 25. And he said unto them, The kings of the Gentiles exercise lordship over them; and they that exercise authority upon them are called benefactors. 26. But ye shall not be so: but he that is greatest among you, let him be as the younger; and he that is chief, as he that doth serve. 27. For whether is greater, he that sitteth at meat, or he that serveth? is not he that sitteth at meat? but I am among you as he that serveth. 28. Ye are they which have continued with me in my temptations. 29. And I appoint unto you a kingdom, as my Father hath appointed unto me; 30. That ye may eat and drink at my table in my kingdom, and sit on thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel.

The Parables.
The two Sons and the Vineyard (Matt. xxi. 28-32).
pp. 178-181

Matt. xxi. 28-32.

28. But what think ye? A certain man had two sons; and he came to the first, and said, Son, go work to day in my vineyard.
29. He answered and said, I will not: but afterward he repented, and went.
30. And he came to the second, and said likewise. And he answered and said, I go, sir: and went not.
31. Whether of them twain did the will of his father? They say unto him, The first. Jesus saith unto them, Verily I say unto you, That the publicans and the harlots go into the kingdom of God before you.
32. For John came unto you in the way of righteousness, and ye believed him not: but the publicans and the harlots believed him: and ye, when ye had seen it, repented not afterward, that ye might believe him.

We have already pointed out that the central theme developed, enlarged, and illustrated in this set of parables is service with reference to the kingdom, and that sometimes it is viewed nationally, and sometimes individually. Three parables use the illustration of the vineyard, but the vineyard as a place of service, not as a place of growth. In other words, the emphasis is not on the thought that those addressed are members of the true vine, but on those who are servants and labourers in the vineyard. In xx. 1-16 the idea uppermost is the difference of service, yet the equality of the reward. In xxi. 28-32 it is not degrees of service, but the sharp contrast between serving or not serving, while in xxi. 33-46 the emphasis is the wickedness of serving oneself, and of robbing God. It is further of importance to a true interpretation that we observe the close connection that is intended between the two parables in Matt. xxi. This will be made evident by noticing the structure as follows:--

The relation of the two parables (Matt. xxi. 23-46).

A | 23-. Chief priests and elders.
B | -23-25. | a | Question—"By what authority?"
b | Question regarding John's baptism.
C | 26. | c | We fear the multitude.
d | All hold John as a prophet.
D | 28-32. | e | The parable.
f | The question—"Whether of the twain?"
Parable of Two Sons. g | The answer—"They say unto Him, The first."
h | Jesus saith—Publicans and harlots go into the kingdom before you.
i | Statement concerning John's baptism.
D | 33-44. | e | The parable.
f | The question—"What will he do?"
Parable of the Wicked Husbandmen. g | The answer—"They say unto Him, He will destroy."
h | Jesus saith—"The kingdom of God taken from you and given to a people producing fruit."
i | Question and statement regarding "The stone."
A | 45-. Chief priests and pharisees.
B | -45. Perception—"He spake of them."
C | 46. | c | They feared the multitude.
d | They held Him as a prophet.

It will be observed that, like so many parables, this one concerning the two sons was given partly as a result of the questions of the chief priests and elders. They asked, "By what authority? and Who gave the authority?" to the Lord to perform the miracles that attested His Messiahship? His reply took them back to the testimony of John the Baptist. We often lose sight of the prime object of John's baptism. Matt. iii. is devoted to the beginning of John's ministry, and the concluding verses show us that its goal was the manifesting of the Son of God. This is plainly expressed in the questions put to John by the Jews, and John's answers. John said:--

> "This is He concerning Whom I said, After me cometh a man, who has become before me, because He (was) before me. And I knew Him not, but in order that He might be made manifest to Israel, I am come baptizing in water. . . . He Who sent me to baptize in water, He said unto me, Upon whomsoever thou shalt see the Spirit descending and abiding upon Him, the same is He who baptizeth in holy spirit, and I have seen and testified that this One is the Son of God."

John i. 35-51 gives us some examples of those who received this testimony. The Pharisees, however, set this counsel aside, not being baptized of John. Luke vii. 29-35 shows us the two classes that are set forth under the image of the two sons:--

> "All the people that heard Him, and the publicans, justified God, being baptized with the baptism of John. But the Pharisees and the Lawyers frustrated the counsel of God with regard to themselves, being not baptized of him."

The two sons in Luke xv. set forth the same people and lesson. We must be careful to keep within the limits of the divine Word. Much of our failure to understand the Word results from that mischievous practice of taking that which is true of the particular as true of the whole. Many words are addressed to "this generation." Matt. xi. 16, "Whereunto shall I liken this generation?" xii. 39, "An evil generation seeketh after a sign"; xii. 41, 42, "The men of Nineveh, and the Queen of the South shall rise in judgment with this generation"; xii. 45, "The last state of that man is worse than the first; even so shall it be with this wicked generation"; xvi. 4, "A wicked and adulterous generation seeketh after a sign." So in Mark and Luke. In Luke vii. 31 the Pharisees' attitude toward John the Baptist and the Lord is introduced by the words, "Whereunto then shall I liken the men of this generation? and to what are they like?" In Luke the Pharisees are likened to peevish, refractory children. In Matt. xxi. they are likened to a disobedient son.

> "But how does this seem to you? A man had two sons: coming unto the first, he said, Son, go, to-day, work in my vineyard. And he answering said, I (will) do it, and went not. And coming unto the second he said the same. And he answering said, I will not: but afterwards repenting he went. Which of the two did the will of the father? They say, The latter. Jesus saith unto them, Verily I say unto you, the tax collectors and the harlots go before you into the kingdom of God. For John came unto you in a way of righteousness, and you believed him not; but the tax collectors and the harlots believed him; but you having seen it, did not afterwards repent so as to believe him."

The difference between the words of Matt. xxi. 31, "go before," and those of xxi. 41, "miserably destroy," must be kept clear. "Go before," as used by Matthew, never means going before to the exclusion of others. ii. 9; xiv. 21; xxi. 9, 31; xxvi. 32 and xxviii. 7 are all occurrences of the word. There are other passages where more drastic words are used.

> "Many shall come from the east and the west, and shall sit down with Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob in the kingdom of heaven. But the children of the kingdom shall be cast out into outer darkness; there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth" (Matt. viii. 11, 12).

A superficial reading may leave us with the idea that the message of Matt. viii. 11, 12 is particularly the same as that of xxi. 31. This is not so, however. With the inspired precision of Holy Scripture, one passage says, "cast out," the other says, "go before." The one says, "the kingdom of heaven," the other says, "the kingdom of God." Now while the parallel passage of Luke xiii. 28 uses the words kingdom of God, we must not forget that Matthew uses the two expressions, and it is for us to observe the difference. Taking Matthew's witness as complete in itself, we may learn that, difficult as it may be for our limited knowledge to enable us to grasp it, a difference is intended. Matthew tells us that some of the children of the kingdom will be cast out of the kingdom of the heavens, but he does not say they will be cast out of the kingdom of God, but that the despised publicans will "go before" them. The kingdom of God is infinitely wider than the kingdom of the heavens. The generation whose carcases strewed the wilderness, who failed to enter into the land, may be used as an illustration of the distinction intended. They were cast out of the kingdom of heaven, but not necessarily out of the kingdom of God. For them Ps. xc. was written, and numbered with them was Moses himself, who though shut out of the land of promise was not cast out of the wider sphere of God's love.

Repentance was the great emphatic note of John Baptist and the Lord with reference to the kingdom of the heavens. Repentance involved deeds as well as words. To the Pharisees and Sadducees John had to say, "Bring forth therefore fruits worthy of repentance, and think not to say. . . ." (Matt. iii. 8, 9). Here, as in the parable of the two sons, we have the contrast between "saying" and "doing." The omission from the parable of the penalty falling upon the unrepentant son is noteworthy. In other parables which are somewhat parallel, "outer darkness" and "weeping and gnashing of teeth" are spoken of. Here, a milder case is intended, "the publicans and harlots go into the kingdom of God before you." To observe the distinction which Scripture draws between different servants is an important item in true interpretation. While many will not be lost, they shall suffer loss, and this parable of the two sons seems to have that aspect before it. This parable is not intended to teach the way of salvation, and failure to realize its primary setting, as in the case of most of the parables, has led to serious evangelical errors. We may all, nevertheless, take heed to the lesson and see to it that, by grace, we are not "hearers of the word only," but doers also.

John i.

19. And this is the record of John, when the Jews sent priests and Levites from Jerusalem to ask him, Who art thou?
20. And he confessed, and denied not; but confessed, I am not the Christ.
21. And they asked him, What then? Art thou Elias? And he saith, I am not. Art thou that prophet? And he answered, No.
22. Then said they unto him, Who art thou? That we may give an answer to them that sent us. What sayest thou of thyself?
23. He said, I am the voice of one crying in the wilderness, Make straight the way of the Lord, as said the prophet Esaias.
24. And they which were sent were of the Pharisees.
25. And they asked him, and said unto him, Why baptizest thou then, if thou be not that Christ, nor Elias, neither that prophet?
26. John answered them, saying, I baptize with water: but there standeth one among you, whom ye know not;
27. He it is, who coming after me is preferred before me, whose shoe's latchet I am not worthy to unloose.
28. These things were done in Bethabara beyond Jordan, where John was baptizing.
29. The next day John seeth Jesus coming unto him, and saith, Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world.
30. This is he of whom I said, After me cometh a man which is preferred before me: for he was before me.
31. And I knew him not: but that he should be made manifest to Israel, therefore am I come baptizing with water.
32. And John bare record, saying, I saw the Spirit descending from heaven like a dove, and it abode upon him.
33. And I knew him not: but he that sent me to baptize with water, the same said unto me, Upon whom thou shalt see the Spirit descending, and remaining on him, the same is he which baptizeth with the Holy Ghost.
34. And I saw, and bare record that this is the Son of God.

John i.

35. Again the next day after John stood, and two of his disciples;
36. And looking upon Jesus as he walked, he saith, Behold the Lamb of God!
37. And the two disciples heard him speak, and they followed Jesus.
38. Then Jesus turned, and saw them following, and saith unto them, What seek ye? They said unto him, Rabbi, (which is to say, being interpreted, Master,) where dwellest thou?
39. He saith unto them, Come and see. They came and saw where he dwelt, and abode with him that day: for it was about the tenth hour.
40. One of the two which heard John speak, and followed him, was Andrew, Simon Peter's brother.
41. He first findeth his own brother Simon, and saith unto him, We have found the Messias, which is, being interpreted, the Christ.
42. And he brought him to Jesus. And when Jesus beheld him, he said, Thou art Simon the son of Jona: thou shalt be called Cephas, which is by interpretation, A stone.
43. The day following Jesus would go forth into Galilee, and findeth Philip, and saith unto him, Follow me.
44. Now Philip was of Bethsaida, the city of Andrew and Peter.
45. Philip findeth Nathanael, and saith unto him, We have found him, of whom Moses in the law, and the prophets, did write, Jesus of Nazareth, the son of Joseph.
46. And Nathanael said unto him, Can there any good thing come out of Nazareth? Philip saith unto him, Come and see.
47. Jesus saw Nathanael coming to him, and saith of him, Behold an Israelite indeed, in whom is no guile!
48. Nathanael saith unto him, Whence knowest thou me? Jesus answered and said unto him, Before that Philip called thee, when thou wast under the fig tree, I saw thee.
49. Nathanael answered and saith unto him, Rabbi, thou art the Son of God; thou art the King of Israel.
50. Jesus answered and said unto him, Because I said unto thee, I saw thee under the fig tree, believest thou? thou shalt see greater things than these.
51. And he saith unto him, Verily, verily, I say unto you, Hereafter ye shall see heaven open, and the angels of God ascending and descending upon the Son of man.

Luke vii.

29. And all the people that heard him, and the publicans, justified God, being baptized with the baptism of John.
30. But the Pharisees and lawyers rejected the counsel of God against themselves, being not baptized of him.
31. And the Lord said, Whereunto then shall I liken the men of this generation? and to what are they like?
32. They are like unto children sitting in the marketplace, and calling one to another, and saying, We have piped unto you, and ye have not danced; we have mourned to you, and ye have not wept.
33. For John the Baptist came neither eating bread nor drinking wine; and ye say, He hath a devil.
34. The Son of man is come eating and drinking; and ye say, Behold a gluttonous man, and a winebibber, a friend of publicans and sinners!
35. But wisdom is justified of all her children.

Berean Expositor Volume 4 & 5

The reconciliation of all things.
Foreword.
pp. 132-142

Readers of this Magazine may remember that we gave a series of papers under the heading The Wages of Sin, wherein every word used in the Old or New Testaments relative to the subject was analyzed, and its meaning ascertained. During the writing of the last few papers we were continually receiving letters urging us to take up the subject of U*niversal Reconciliation*, some writers not refraining from a little intimidation by suggesting that we were afraid to express our convictions on the subject. We continued however the course before us and concluded the subject of The Wages of Sin, but the review of the booklet All in All plunged us into a controversy regarding details and side issues before we were able to take up the subject of the reconciliation of all things as a subject for positive teaching. The questions with regard to the true interpretation of I Cor. xv. have arisen out of this controversy, and we feel that the time has come to drop these side issues, which have thrust themselves so prominently into notice, and to take up the subject of the teaching of Scripture regarding the reconciliation of all things itself. We feel this will be more profitable, and probably many will realize, by the time we finish the series, that there will be no need to return to I Cor. xv., for they may then be able to see that that chapter has nothing whatever to do with the subject.

Seeing that we have, whether we desired it or no, taken notice of existing teaching regarding the reconciliation, we feel that in this foreword we ought to give up some space in order to exhibit its scope, at least in outline. The one great conception which has dominated the whole teaching referred to, is that the goal of the universe is "THE FUTURE UNIVERSAL RECONCILIATION." Reconciliation

> "will be extended to the whole universe. That which has been destroyed during the eons is not annihilated, but will be raised and reconciled at the consummation" (U.R. Vol. IV., No. 3, "In Defence").

Believing that Scripture teaches future universal reconciliation they

> "long for that climax of the Ages when the last enemy, Death, shall be conquered and destroyed, when the victims of its rule shall come forth" (U.R. Vol. III., No. 2, p. 23).

By their own confession, the belief in the future universal reconciliation not only impelled them to believe that those who were cast into the second death shall be ultimately revived and take their place among the reconciled ones, but the stern logic of their doctrine made them write:--

> "But if Satan alone were to suffer such a fate (tormented for ever and ever), and even if he be consigned to the remotest corner of the universe, his single case would not allow us to speak of the reconciliation as *universal. We need to consider most carefully, then, the words which seem to teach the endlessness of Satan's doom" (U.R. Vol. III., No. 5, p. 205).

The belief in the future universal reconciliation, even to the inclusion of Satan, caused the author to consider the meaning of the words translated "for ever" and "everlasting." His findings on this subject so far as the meaning of the words are concerned are valuable, and we do not hesitate, with others, to acknowledge help received in this study. We state the fact, however, to show how every doctrine, every aspect of truth, every interpretation offered has had behind it, either manifest or hidden, confessed or unrealized, the inexorable necessity, that if the goal and consummation of the ages be the reconciliation of all things, then they that have perished only for the eons, that they whose "end is destruction" have blessing beyond that "end," that even those whose names were not found in the book of life must sometime live again. The absence of the remotest hint of any such thing at the end of Rev. xx. must not prevent us from believing that it MUST be so, even to Satan himself.

> "What though we do not understand how it can be possible (argues the author), what though it jars our theology, what though it *seems to us contrary to some other of His statements—these are no excuse for denying the record of God concerning His Son. His Son is supreme! And His supremacy depends upon His reconciliation of the universe" (U.R. Vol. IV., No. 6, p. 279).

We need quote no more to prove that the interpretations of Scripture put forth by those who believe the future universal reconciliation have not resulted from an unbiased study of the passages themselves, but from the felt necessity enforced by the pre-conception as to the ultimate goal of the universe. Consequently we refrain from further word battles over I Cor. xv. Without the impelling necessity of the future universal reconciliation the death spoken of in I Cor. xv. would never have been thought to mean other than that which the context declares it to be, viz., that connected with Adam. We come to the subject itself. We ask the question, Supposing Scripture does not teach that the goal of the universe is the reconciliation of all things? IF the Scripture teaches that as the climax and the goal, then we must believe it "though it seems to us contrary to some other of His statements," but IF it does not, shall we not be guilty of wresting the Scriptures even though we may have conceived the idea of adding to the glory of God thereby?

We believe that our studies together of the subject will prove that very many of God's people have been obsessed with man-made doctrine. There is NO SUCH DOCTRINE to be found in Scripture as that the goal or consummation of the ages is the reconciliation of all things. Reconciliation as taught by Paul is dispensational, it does not reach out to the consummation of the ages. Reconciliation as taught by Paul has to do with nations in relation to Israel in its first stage, and with the two-fold aspect of the church of the one body in its second stage. Reconciliation as taught by Paul is finished and done with long ago. Reconciliation as taught by Paul is by no means synonymous with salvation, life or justification, these are spoken of as being "much more" than reconciliation. Reconciliation as taught by Paul does not embrace the second death, is unaffected by the translation of olam and aiõn, has no relation (except as is the case with all the aspects of redemption) with the future.

Readers are earnestly asked not to turn away from the subject. Be true Bereans, search and see whether these things are so. What though you have committed yourself to the fascination of the idea; truth to you is still more entrancing. What though you have imagined additional lustre has been added to the glory of the Lord; truth is the only lustre that never tarnishes. Were we able to re-write some clauses found in previous numbers of The Berean Expositor, and in the volume Dispensatinal Truth, we would alter the wording of some passages where, unthinkingly, we give some place to the idea we here refute. In order that the subject may be seen as a whole, as soon as possible we propose devoting as much space as convenient to the subject. We would not appear as those who delight in pulling down the work of others. We seek the truth, and give the fullest credit to those from whom we differ, admitting that they do not yield to us in devotion to the same object.

The words used in the Scripture.

It will be necessary, before attempting the exposition of the passages which deal with the subject, to consider the words used by the Holy Spirit in the Scriptures that refer to it. Our desire is to take up this study with perfect freedom, coming to the Word itself, and as far as possible banishing from our minds and from these pages any reference to the various interpretations which have from time to time been put forth. Although to some the subject is by no means new, yet as we are desirous that all our readers shall have it placed before them as clearly as possible, we crave the indulgence of the few for the benefit of the many while we review the meaning of the words used.

The words are as follows, katallassõ, apokatallassõ, katallage. Coupled with these we must note diallassomai and allassõ, as these will be of service in the consideration of the meaning of the words. The root idea goes back to the word allos, which means "other." It indicates a change from one state or one position to another. This is observable in the occurrences of the word *allassõ, which conveys in all passages the idea of "change." The occurrences are Acts vi. 14; Rom. i. 23; I Cor. xv. 51, 52; Gal. iv. 20; and Heb. i. 12. Diallassomai occurs in Matt. v. 24. It is used of man in relation to his fellow man, and signifies that change from enmity to friendship which has been effected between them.

K*atallassõ* occurs in Rom. v. 10 (twice); I Cor. vii. 11; II Cor. v. 18, 19, 20. K*atallage* in Rom. v. 11, xi. 15; II Cor. v. 18, 19. Apokatallassõ in Eph. ii. 16; Col. i. 20, 21.

[* - Some texts and lexicons read tt instead of ss.]

It will be observed that reconciliation between man and man is indicated by the preposition dia, whereas reconciliation between man and God is indicated by the addition of kata. K*ata* usually gives an intensive force when used in combination; it may also retain its primary meaning of downward motion, suggestively indicating that this reconciliation is from above. The one remaining word apokatallassõ not only retains the kata, but also prefixes apo which ordinarily means "away from." We may obtain a little help with regard to this word by observing another word having similar prefixes.

Apokatastasis is translated in Acts iii. 21 by "restitution." This word is from apokathistemi, "to restore" (Matt. xii. 13). K*athistemi* signifies "to constitute," as in Rom. v. 19. Histemi, "to set, place" or "cause to stand," see Rom. v. 2. Without pursuing this line too far we can catch the idea of completeness which apo gives to the words "restore" and "restitution." This too seems to be the case in the last word translated "reconciliation." When we read apokatallassõ we must be prepared to find reconciliation in its highest sense. We defer further explanation until we consider the passages in which the teaching occurs. Before pointing out that which has doubtless struck many already with regard to the dispensational position of this special word, we would draw attention to the fact that the words katallassõ, katallage and apokatallassõ are used exclusively by Paul. Neither Peter, James nor John could have used them, their ministries precluded the whole idea conveyed by the terms.

Having seen that the usage of the word is peculiar to Paul, we next observe that the lesser terms katallassõ and katallage are found in the epistles written beofre Acts xxviii., and are not employed afterwards, while apokatallassõ is found only in the prison epistles written after Acts xxviii. This is an important item; and must be kept clearly before the mind as we deal with the respective passages. By omitting to give every occurrence of the word parousia some time since, and by confining ourselves to those passages which spoke of the Lord's parousia alone, motives wholly foreign to us were imputed. We therefore disarm any possible misunderstanding by saying that the first occurrence of katallassõ, speaking chronologically, is I Cor. vii. 11, which, though it has nothing whatever to do with the subject before us, nevertheless gives us as plainly as can be the literal meaning of the word.

II Corinthians and Romans are two epistles wherein we find the word used, and we must take particular note of these epistles if we would realize the full meaning of the term. The second of Corinthians is largely occupied with the question of the apostle's ministry. Romans treats exhaustively of the grand theme of that gospel which Paul so pointedly denominated MY GOSPEL, and of the dispensational relationship of Jew and Gentiles then obtaining. We must therefore turn our attention to these epistles, seeking in the light of the large context to obtain the true meaning of the reconciliation.

The ministry of reconciliation (II Cor. v.).

We have already indicated that 2nd Corinthians is concerned very largely with the question of the ministry of the apostle Paul. Such words as "commendation" and "commend" recurring as they do are suggestive. That these words are intended to provide a key to the epistle, at least in some degree, is manifest from the careful arrangement of the words, a phenomenon with which we are already acquainted.

"Commend" (II Corinthians).

A | iii. 1. Do not begin again to commend selves, nor need letters of commendation to or from you.
B | iv. 2. By manifestation of truth commending to conscience in sight of God.
C | v. 12. Not commend again, but give occasion to boast, in contrast to those who boast in appearance and not in heart.
D | vi. 4. In all things commending selves as ministers of God in much patience.
E | vii. 11. Reference to Corinthians.
D | x. 12. Not compare with those who commend selves.
C | x. 18. Not he that commends self is approved.
B | x. 18. But whom the Lord commendeth.
A | xii. 11. I ought to have been commended of you; in nothing behind chiefest apostles.

If the context of these eight passages is noticed, one cannot fail to observe that the apostle has before his mind an antagonist, and that the antagonistic party is connected with Israel and the old covenant; also that they still find a place for the "flesh." Humanly speaking, it is probable we should never have such an insight into the ministry of the apostle had his authority and gospel been unchallenged. He confesses that he is a fool in his boasting, but that the Corinthians by their attitude had compelled him. Leaving the reader to pursue this line of study, we draw attention to the word closely connected with this commendation, namely, "ministry" (diakonia).

Speaking of the new covenant as contrasted with the old, he says of one, "the ministration of death" (iii. 7), and "the ministration of the spirit" (iii. 8), and "the ministration of righteousness" (iii. 9). Here also he tells us that God had made him and those with him "able ministers of the new covenant" (iii. 6). This ministry is accompanied by a manifestation of the truth, commending these ministers to every man's conscience in the sight of God. In chapter v. we have another ministry, "the ministry of reconciliation," and again, as in chapter iv., it is followed by a commending of this ministry in a series of unparalleled afflictions for the truth's sake. The next set of passages dealing with ministry has reference to the financial fellowship which the Corinthian saints had with the poor saints at Jerusalem (viii. 4, ix. 1, 12, 13). This last reference (ix. 13) shows the connection of this ministry to the saints with the reconciliation, and we shall see this more clearly when we understand what is this reconciliation really means:--

II Cor. iii. 6-9.

6. Who also hath made us able ministers of the new testament; not of the letter, but of the spirit: for the letter killeth, but the spirit giveth life.
7. But if the ministration of death, written and engraven in stones, was glorious, so that the children of Israel could not stedfastly behold the face of Moses for the glory of his countenance; which glory was to be done away:
8. How shall not the ministration of the spirit be rather glorious?
9. For if the ministration of condemnation be glory, much more doth the ministration of righteousness exceed in glory.

> "For the ministry of this service not only supplieth the want of the saints, but also aboundeth through the many thanksgivings to God, for they, through the proof of this ministry, are glorifying God for your avowed subjection to the gospel of Christ."

It is fairly evident, we trust, that "ministry" is the dominant theme in this epistle.

We must now approach our subject by way of the ministry of the new covenant. Readers must not be impatient, as it is important that we get the right view, and that is obtained not by speculation, but by submissive study of the Word. II Cor. ii. 17 to vii. 4 is largely occupied with the two ministries, namely, that of the new covenant and that of the reconciliation. This will be seen more clearly if we have the whole epistle spread out before us.

II Corinthians.—The epistle as a whole.

A | i. 1, 2. Salutation.
B | a | i. 3-11. Thanksgiving for comfort in affliction.
b | i. 12. The apostle's manner of life.
C | i. 13-ii. 13. Subject matter of writing.
Visit, vindication, no rest in spirit, Macedonia.
B | a | ii. 14-16. Thanksgiving for triumph in affliction.
b | ii. 17-vii. 4. The apostle' ministry.
C | vii. 5-xiii. 10. Subject of writing.
Visit, vindication, no rest in flesh, Macedonia.

Chapter ii. 17 - vii. 4 sub-divide into four sections:--

A | ii. 17-iv. 7. The ministry of the new covenant. "No need of commendation."
B | iv. 8-v. 11. Resurrection power in great tribulation.
A | v. 12-vii. 3. The ministry of reconciliation. "Commendation of sufferings."
B | vii. 4. Exceeding joyful in tribulation.

It will be observed that the apostle's experiences are made either to correspond with, or to alternate with, his ministry. Upon examining these experiences, two connected truths stand out prominently, namely, (1) the complete discounting of the flesh, and (2) the supreme importance of the resurrection not only as a future hope, but as a present factor doctrinally, practically, and, as we shall see dispensationally.

Consolation in deepest affliction, and that directly connected with resurrection, meets us in the first chapter:--

> "For we do not wish you to be ignorant, brethren, as to our tribulation which happened to us in Asia, that exceedingly beyond power were we weighed down, so that we despaired even of life. But we ourselves within ourselves have the sentence of death, that we might rest our confidence not upon ourselves, but upon God who raiseth the dead" (II Cor. i. 8, 9).

This "sentence of death" in himself the apostle realized also in connection with his ministry:--

> "But we have this treasure in earthen vessels, that the excellency of the power may be of God and not of us. . . . always bearing about in the body the dying of the Lord Jesus, that the life also of Jesus might be made manifest in our body. . . . in our mortal flesh" (II Cor. iv. 7, 10, 11).
> "Commending ourselves as the ministers of God. . . . as dying and behold we live" (II Cor. vi. 4-9).

This same line of teaching continues through the last chapter. There the apostle, making his final appeal relative to his ministry, adduces a parallel which once again brings in death and resurrection:--

> "Since ye seek a proof of Christ speaking in me (who unto you is not weak, but is mighty in you, For even He was crucified through weakness, yet He lives through the power of God; and though we also are weak in Him, yet we shall live with Him, through the power of God unto you), examine yourselves," &c. (II Cor. xiii. 3-5).

In the personal experience of the apostle he had ceased to know Christ after the flesh. His personal experiences seem to have always kept pace with the development of his ministry (a theme worthy of separate consideration), and it is so very manifestly here. Judaism recognized the flesh. The ministry of Peter was limited to the "Circumcision" (Gal. ii. 9), and the hybrid teaching that was undermining the faith in Corinth and Galatia had, at the bottom, the belief that there was still some possibility for the flesh. The apostle in Galatians leaves it crucified with its affections and desires (Gal. v. 24), and repudiates it in all its forms in II Corinthians. He set aside "fleshly wisdom" (i. 12) and "fleshly weapons" (x. 4). He did not purpose according to the flesh; he urged the Corinthians to cleanse themselves from its filthiness (vii. 1). He repudiated the charge that he walked according to the flesh (x. 2), or warred according to the flesh (x. 3), and if he makes his boast in the flesh (xi. 18), it is as a fool, and received a "thorn in the flesh" lest he should be exalted above measure by the visions and revelations he had received (xii. 7). It is not surprising therefore that in introducing the ministry of the reconciliation he should say, as an outcome of the result of the resurrection:--

> "Wherefore henceforth know we no man after the flesh; yea, though we have known Christ after the flesh, yet now henceforth know we Him no more" (II Cor. v. 16).

The parallel thought to this in the ministry of the new covenant is the emphasis upon the Spirit. Israel's blindness is brought prominently to view in chapters iii. and iv., which must be kept in mind when we consider Rom. xi. Much as we should like to open out the rich teaching of this section (chapter iii.), we must concentrate for the time upon chapter v.

The ministry of reconciliation.
(II Cor. v. 12 - vii. 4).

A | v. 12. Not commending selves. "Appearance, not heart."
B | v. 13, 14. Love of Christ.
C | v. 15. Not live to self—contrary to resurrection.
D | v. 16-18-. The reconciliation. Effect upon fleshly distinctions.
E | v. –18-vi. 3. Ministry of reconciliation. Received. Exercised.
Appeal made not to receive in vain. No offence. Not blamed.
A | vi. 4-10. Commending ourselves as ministers of God.
B | vi. 11. Our heart enlarged.
C | vi. 12. Straitened in selves—contrary to reconciliation.
D | vi. 14-vii. 1. The promises. Effect upon fleshly connections.
E | vii. 2-4. The ministers. Receive us. Their unblameable character.

The ministry of the reconciliation does not go back to David or Abraham; that would be a ministry which perpetuated the fleshly distinctions of Israel. This ministry goes back to a period before Israel, to a time when God "gave up" the nations, and set them aside. Just as the apostle contrasts the fading glory of the face of Moses with the lasting and blessed glory seen in the face of Christ when comparing and contrasting the old covenant with the new, so here he teaches us that for those "in Christ" the "old things" pass away, and a new creation, and, as he had already told the Corinthians, a second Man, the last Adam, the Lord from heaven, are vitally connected with the reconciliation. The ministry of the reconciliation is defined:--

> "Namely, that God was by Christ reconciling a world unto Himself, not imputing to them their trespasses, and hath put in us the word of the reconciliation" (II Cor. v. 19).

The structure just suggested puts "The promises" (D D) in correspondence with "The reconciliation." These promises, "I will dwell among them, and walk among them, and I will be their God," look forward to Revelation xxi. 1-7. There, when all things are made new, the tabernacle of God will be with men (not merely with Israel), and He will dwell with them, and they shall be His people, the distinction between Israel and the nations having passed away. Israel, as a nation, were blind to this truth. The Corinthians were "straitened" (vi. 12), narrowed and cramped by the Judaistic teaching they were imbibing. "The love of Christ" held the apostle back from any other reckoning than that > "If one died for all, then they all died, with the object that the living should live no longer unto themselves, but to Him Who on their behalf died and rose again" (II Cor. v. 14, 15).

We had hoped that the series of studies dealing with the various issues that were connected with the death of Christ, as distinguished from the doctrine of the cross, or the shedding of blood, or the sufferings, would have by this time prepared our minds to observe the great difference between the truth that Christ died on behalf of all, and the further teaching of redemption. The outbreak of war prevented our brother from continuing his researches, and so we must call attention to the fact that the death of Christ for all as the basis of the reconciliation must not be confounded with salvation, forgiveness, justification, &c., which Scripture links not only with death simply, but with death on the cross, with the shedding of blood, and with sufferings. Further, the difference between sin and sins, and the extreme care used by the Spirit of God when speaking of the offering of Christ as relating to the one or the other, should cause us to be exceedingly guarded in our terms. It has been rather hastily assumed that the fact that Christ died for all is synonymous with the salvation of all. Those who have combated the idea have, instead of accepting the scriptural statement, endeavoured to limit the meaning of "all," not seeing that redemption and atonement, justification and forgiveness are linked with other aspects of the death of Christ.

It is the death of Christ which is emphasized in the reconciliation, as the reader can easily see for himself. That death put away the estrangement, put away the distinctions made in the flesh, and is the great basis of reconciliation. To understand more clearly the basis and doctrine of the reconciliation we shall have to turn to the epistle to the Romans.

The reader may feel that no definite statement has yet been made as to the scope and nature of the reconciliation. That is so. We intend going through the passages in Romans, and drawing attention to the scriptural necessity of the reconciliation before reaching the conclusion of this first section. It is our hope that by that time the scriptural position will have forced itself upon the understanding of all our readers, and that we shall not be under the necessity of proving anything. The Epistle to the Romans contains the apostle's explanation of the ministry of reconciliation, and readers are directed to what he has been inspired to explain, rather than to what we may say that he meant.

Ministry to the Gentiles and the reconciliation. pp. 146-152

It will be necessary, before turning to the next occurrence of katallassõ, to consider the position of the Gentile world, and to note the scriptural necessity for the reconciliation. If a ministry to the uncircumcision was to be carried out without being called in question, the ministry of reconciliation was a necessity. The Jews never realized the reconciliation, and consequently opposed most bitterly the ministry of the apostle Paul. This opposition came not merely from unconverted Jews, but from many who believed. When Paul went up to Jerusalem a free man for the last time, feeling was very high, and measures were adopted to pacify the opposition which was everywhere manifest.

Upon arrival at Jerusalem the apostle went before James and the elders, > "and when he had saluted them, he declared particularly what things God had wrought among the Gentiles by his ministry. And when they heard it, they glorified the Lord, and said unto him, Thou seest, brother, how many thousands of Jews there are which believe, and they are all zealous of the law: and they are informed concerning thee, that thou teachest all the Jews among the Gentiles to apostalize from Moses, telling them not to circumcise their children, neither to walk after the customs" (Acts xxi. 19-21).

As a result of complying with the suggestion made by James, Paul was taken a prisoner by the Roman guard, and gaining permission to speak to the infuriated mob he addressed them in the Hebrew tongue. This made them keep silence, and they listened to his words without interruption, even when he spoke of Jes*us of Nazareth*, even when he reminded them of the stoning of Stephen, but one word inflamed them beyond all bounds:--

> "Depart, for I will send thee far hence unto the GENTILES. And they gave him audience unto this WORD, and then lifted up their voice and said, Away with such fellow from the earth; for it is not fit that he should live" (Acts xxii. 21, 22).

In I Thess. ii. 15, 16 the same spirit is evident. Now while this ungracious antagonism to the Gentiles is to be mourned as an exhibition of religious pride and selfishness, there are other passages of Scripture which make a clear distinction between Jew and Gentile, but which demand another explanation.

If we take the ministry of Peter and his fellow-workers, for example, in the Acts, we shall find that the Gentiles, as such, had no place in it. On the day of Pentecost his audience was composed of "devout Jews out of every nation under heaven," and this might have been looked upon as exhausting the meaning of the commission of Luke xxiv. 47, "unto all the nations," which clause is omitted in Acts i. 8. Peter addressed them as "Ye men of Judæa," "Ye men of Israel," and "House of Israel" (ii. 14, 22, 36). In chapter iii. 12, 13, 25, 26 he speaks to "Ye men of Israel," "The God of our fathers," "Ye are the children of the prophets," "Unto you first." It is the same in iv. 8-10 and in v. 30, 31:--

> "Him hath God exalted with His right hand to be a Prince and a Saviour, for to give repentance to ISRAEL, and forgiveness of sins."

Stephen follows the same line in chapter vii. (see verses 2, 37, 38, 44, 45, 52). There is no word to the Gentile. Chapter xi. 19 says:--

> "Now they which were scattered abroad upon the persecution that arose about Stephen travelled as far as Phenice, and Cyrus, and Antioch, preaching the word to NONE BUT UNTO THE JEWS ONLY."

The Samaritans, though hated by the Jews, were not Gentiles, for they claimed Jacob as their father (John iv. 12). To them Philip went, as is recorded in Acts viii. The Ethiopian was not a Gentile in the sense of the term that is associated with the ministry of Paul. He was evidently a believer in the God of Israel, for he had come up to Jerusalem for to worship (verse 27). The same is true concerning Cornelius. He is called a "devout man" (eusebes). Paul's ministry took him to asebes, the ungodly (Rom. v.). He "feared God with all his house, gave much alms to the people, and prayed to God always" (x. 2). He is told by the angel that his prayers and his alms had come up for a memorial before God (x. 4), a vastly different type from the blank heathenism of Paul's hearers. Yet so strong was the idea of Jewish preference and Gentile distance, that Peter does not hesitate to class Cornelius, with all his prayers and piety, along with the unclean! This statement is not too strong, as can be easily proved by comparing verses 11-15 with 28. The inference from Peter's words is that he would have reckoned Cornelius "common and unclean" had not the vision of "all manner of fourfooted beasts of the earth, and wild beasts, and creeping things, and fowls of the air" been explained to him.

In Acts x. Peter has arrived practically at the conclusion of his ministry so far as it is recorded in the Acts, yet it is evident, whatever deductions we may draw, that the Gentiles in the wider sense of the term never came within its scope. How the church, in the common acceptation of the term, could have commenced at Pentecost passes all comprehension. As the record stands it evidently had no place for a Gentile in it, and if it was wrong to have thus limited its embrace, then we are faced with a still bigger problem, namely, apostles and prophets, endued with power from on high, with miraculous gifts, and attestations of their ministry (Heb. ii. 1-4), perpetuating erroneous ideas and Jewish prejudice at the expense of truth.

If we go back to the Gospels we shall find, as most know, that the Gentiles do not come within the scope of the Lord's earthly ministry. Matt. x. 5, 6 and xv. 24 prove this. The Greeks who desired to "see Jesus," "came up to worship at the feast" (John xii. 20, 21), and therefore come under the same heading as Cornelius. There is no statement in John xii. that the Lord granted their request; the record seems to point the other way. The case of the woman of Canaan (a Greek-speaking native of Syrophœnicia, Mark vii. 26) does not alter the general fact. The Lord did not go to her nor to her home—she came to Him. When she took upon her lips the title "Son of David" He answered her not a word, and repeated to His disciples the fact that He was not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel. When the woman, dropping the peculiar Israelitish title, addressed the Saviour as "Lord," He answered her by reminding her still more pointedly of the difference that existed between Israel and the nations. "It is not meet to take the children's bread, and to cast it to the little dogs" (puppies, not full grown dogs). There was great graciousness in the choice of words here. Had the Lord said "dogs," all hope would have vanished. Dogs are never allowed in the house, they are driven out and live upon the offal of the towns, unclean and unowned. Little puppies, however, are allowed for a time a place in the house, and are petted by the children. The woman's faith grasped this, and she replied, "Truth Lord; yet the puppies eat of the crumbs which fell from their master's table." Here is no equality of blessing such as is the glory of Paul's message. The Gentile woman is compared to a "puppy," and is thankful for "crumbs"; Israel are called "children," and are recognized as "masters" or "lords" (kurion). There is an interesting paronomasia here, the two important words having a somewhat similar sound, kunaria (puppies), kurion (lords).

The centurion of Matt. viii. likewise comes to the Lord, and just as in the case of Syrophœnician's daughter, the centurion's son was healed at a distance. The Lord did not go to, speak to, nor touch either of them. This is the more emphasized by noting that on either side of the incident the Lord touched a leper (viii. 3), and touched Peter's wife's mother (viii. 14). The Lord, when He would raise Jairus' daughter, went to the house and took her by the hand. The blind men's eyes were touched in the same chapter (ix.). It seems fairly clear that a great gulf separated the nation of Israel from the nations around them.

It may be of service to enquire further into the history of the past to see the reason of this; clearness in this particular will mean clearer vision in the case of the reconciliation. Nations are unknown to the Bible from Adam to Noah. It is not until the generations of the sons of Noah are given that we read of nations and Gentiles. In Gen. x. the subdivision of the earth and the bounds of the nations are indicated:--

> "These are the families of the sons of Noah, after their generations, in their nations: and by these were the nations divided in the earth after the flood" (Gen. x. 32).

In Deut. xxxii. 8 we read:--

> "When the Most High divided to the nations their inheritance, when He separated the sons of Adam, He set the bounds of the people according to the number of the children of Israel."

The seventy nations of Gen. x. were given their place in the earth preparatory to the call of the elect nation. Gen. xii. commences the history of that nation in the call of Abraham, and the promise that the Lord would make of him a great nation, and that in him all families of the earth should be blessed. From this time onward the nations drop out of the divine administration. Providential mercies were still given. The covenant of seed time and harvest was faithfully kept, but spiritually they were left. No laws were written by the inspiration for them; no promises were made to them; of Israel the Lord could say:--

> "You only have I known of all the families of the earth" (Amos iii. 2).
>
> "The Lord thy God hath chosen thee to be a special people unto Himself, above all people that are upon the face of the earth" (Deut. vii. 6).
>
> "He showeth His word unto Jacob, His statues and His judgments unto Israel. He hath not dealt so with any nation" (Psa. cxlvii. 19, 20).
> "For ask now of the days that are past, which were before thee, since the day that God created man upon the earth, and ask from the one side of heaven unto the other whether there hath been any such things as this great thing, or hath been heard like it" (Deut. iv. 32, read on to verse 38).

In the Acts of the Apostles it is from Paul, not Peter, that we learn of the change of attitude that had set in regarding Israel and the nations. In the initial ministry of Acts xiii. the apostle turns to the Gentiles (verse 46). In Acts xiv. a light is thrown on heathendom by the words of verse 15-17. There we learn that "in times past" God the Creator "suffered all nations to walk in their own ways," giving them no oracles or laws, but the witness of nature and providence. At Athens the apostle spoke on these lines again, with additional explanations:--

> "God that made the world and all things therein (note Creator aspect), seeing that He is Lord of heaven and earth, dwelleth not in temples made with hands. . . . hath made of one all nations of men for to dwell on all the face of the earth, and hath determined the times before appointed, and the bounds of their habitation. . . . the times of this ignorance God looked over; but now commandeth all men everywhere to repent" (Acts xvii. 16-32).

The "but now' marks a change. That change is nothing else than the reconciliation. Peter says that the Lord Jesus was exalted by the right hand of God to give repentance unto ISRAEL; Paul here says that by reason of that same resurrection God NOW commands all men everywhere to repent. Romans i. contains the apostle's teaching upon the subject of the nations as clearly as anything written during this period. In verses 14-16 he declared his indebtedness to Greek and barbarian, and indebtedness absolutely foreign to Peter's experience, and only possible if the estrangement of the nations had been mercifully dealt with. In i. 18 - ii. 1 he shows us the state of the nations and the necessity of the reconciliation if ever he was to preach to them the gospel of God. This passage is often rather hastily considered by some who deal with the doctrine of the epistle, and yet it is vital to a true understanding that the passage should be well considered. The important points will be seen more clearly if the reader will note the following outline:--

Rom. i. 18 - ii. 1.

The *paredoken of the nations.

A | i. 18-20. | a | The wrath of God.
b | Against those who hold down the truth.
c | Without excuse.
B | i. 21-23. The nations gave up God.
Results—"change glory" (allassõ), "change truth" (metallassõ).
B | i. 24-31. God gave up the nations.
Results—"change nature" (metallassõ), "reprobate mind."
A | i. 32-ii. 1. a | The judgment of God.
b | Those who have pleasure in sin.
c | Inexcusable.

[* - "To give up" (see verses 24, 26, 28).]

In these few verses the apostle to the nations exhibits the crying need of the reconciliation. The attention of the reader is particularly called to the words translated "change." Just as there is a threefold "giving up," so there is a threefold change revealed. The glory of the incorruptible God is changed, and the very nature of those thus far fallen is changed. These words are the translations of a word which is the basis of the Greek word reconciliation. "Change" in this chapter is either allassõ or metallassõ, while "reconcile" in Rom. v. and vi. is katallassõ. Here is the need for the ministry of reconciliation. Rom. i. 18 not only speaks of a future revelation of wrath, but points to the history of the nations and God's dealing with them. verses 19 and 20 declare most emphatically that the nations had a knowledge of God, limited indeed when compared with revealed truth, but a knowledge sufficient to render them in the eyes of Him Who judgeth righteously as being "without excuse." "That which is known of God is manifest in them." Some translate among them, others emphasize in them, and point to the mental discernment of the next verse. Chapter ii. clearly states that conscience plays an important part in the dealings of God with the nations, and we believe that we have in this passage a twofold witness, namely, conscience and nature.

This manifestation was not something which the nations were left to find out themselves, for the verse continues, "For God hath manifested it to them." The eternal power and divinity (not Godhead in the higher sense as revealed in Christ) of the Creator is clearly seen by His works (Psa. xix.), so much so that the nations are left without excuse for their lapse into idolatry. Verses 21-23 show how this God-given knowledge was lost, and verses 24-32 show the threefold giving up. God gave them up, or aside, and this giving up resulted in uncleanness, dishonourable passions, and reprobate mind.

In order the more thoroughly to demonstrate that the state of things described in Rom. i. is that which is antithetical to reconciliation, a reference to Eph. iv. 17-19 will be of service. Ion Rom. i. 18-32 uncleanness and degradation is preceded by their being "vain in their imaginations, and their foolish heart was darkened."

Eph. iv. gives the same order. The > "Gentiles walk in the vanity of their mind, having the understanding darkened, being alienated (antithetical to reconciliation) from the life of God through the ignorance that is in them (cf. Rom. i. 19, 'in them') because of the hardness of their heart, who being past feeling have given themselves over (same word as 'give up' in Rom. i.) unto lasciviousness, to work all uncleanness with greediness."

It will be observed that Rom. i. 18-32 says nothing of Adam. Responsibility is fixed upon the nations themselves, and reconciliation deals with them in that relationship, NOT WITH MANKIND AS INVOLVED WITH ADAM. The fall of Adam and its consequences demanded something "much more" than reconciliation—righteousness and life.

Sufficient we trust has been brought forward to show the true necessity of the ministry of the reconciliation, and how it was necessitated by the giving up of the nations by God, and the sending to the nations of a special apostle with the gospel of God to them.

The reconciliation, a basis, not a goal (Rom. v. and vi.). pp. 152-158

We have given a passing glance at the claim and setting of the ministry of the reconciliation, where we found it to be distinctly connected with Paul and his associates, and with Christ in resurrection, without regard to fleshly distinctions or privileges. Three expressions which come very prominently in this statement of the ministry of the reconciliation now demand consideration:--

1. "Who hath reconciled us to Himself (God) by Jesus Christ."
2. "God was by Christ reconciling a world unto Himself."
3. "Not imputing their trespasses unto them."

Two courses are now open to us. We may still keep II Cor. v. before us, and investigate these items as from that standpoint, or we can turn to another epistle where these items have been explained and amplified by the apostle himself. No Berean will hesitate to choose the latter course, and accordingly we turn to the Epistle to the Romans, where in chapters v. and xi. the apostle makes his meaning very plain.

The first eleven verses of Rom. v. teach us much with regard to the first item, "Who hath reconciled us to Himself by Jesus Christ," for there we read such a close parallel as, "When we were enemies we were reconciled to God by the death of His Son." Both in II Corinthains and in Romans v. the word "boasting" (glorying) comes forward prominently (see e.g., II Cor. v. 12; xi. 16, 18; xii. 1, 5, 9, 11). The reconciliation gives a death blow to boasting in the flesh, for it emphasizes the failure of all of Adam's line. We shall observe this to be a structural point in Rom. v. 1-11.

Rom. v. 1-11.

A1 | 1, 2. | a1 | Peace, access, i.e., reconciliation realized (cf. Eph. ii. 14-18).
b1 | Boasting upon hope of the glory of God.
B1 | 3-. But not only so.
A2 | -3-11. | b2 | -3-5. Boasting in tribulation also; experimental proof.
a2 | 6-11. Reconciliation accomplished.
/ A | 6. | a | We being yet without strength.
/ b | Christ died for ungodly.
The basis, / B | 7. Man's love—"scarcely," "peradventure."
6 – 8. \ B | 8-. God's love—"commended."

Rom. v. 1-11 is the last passage in one of the great sections of the epistle, which section embraces the teaching of i. 18 - v. 11. In i. 18 - iii. 20 we have put before us the absolute estrangement of all men, both Jew and Gentile, their complete failure, and the demonstration that all stand in need of righteousness. It is connected that circumcision brings an advantage dispensationally, but not in connection with justification. Chapter iii. 21-30 shows us how this righteousness has been provided through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus, speaks of the passing over of past sins, reveals the fact that all come short of the glory of God, ruling out all boasting in the flesh for ever. In iii. 31 - iv. 25 Jew and Gentile are again before us, and the case of Abraham is cited to show that circumcision gives no advantage in the question of justification. Chapter v. 1-11 shows us the true ground of boasting (cf. iii. 27 in the first section), reveals the reconciliation of Jew and Gentile through the death of Christ, gives ground for rejoicing in the hope of the glory of God, and shows that justification is based upon this reconciliation.

Peter, who had no share in the ministry of the reconciliation, had no room nor place in his message for justification. If the reader will turn up the passages in Peter's epistles where dikaiõs (I Pet. iii. 12, 18; iv. 18; II Pet. i. 13; ii. 7, 8); dikaiosune (I Pet. ii. 24;

iii. 14; II Pet. i. 1; ii. 5, 21; iii. 13); and dikaiõs (I Pet. ii. 23) are used, and compare the usage with that of Paul, he will gain a great insight into an important division of truth. He never uses logizomai (impute, reckon) in connection with righteousness, a phrase which is so eminently prominent in the message which Paul calls "my gospel." Further, as we read through the first half of the Acts where Peter was the prominent figure, we find therein recorded several of his discourses. In them he speaks of repentance, remission, faith, baptism, but never justification. Peter knows Christ "after the flesh." The choice of Matthias is connected with the statement that he had companied with them all the time that the Lord went in and out among them, beginning from the baptism of John (Acts i. 22). His opening words on the day of Pentecost (whatever figure of speech may underlie the expression) tell of the pouring out of the Spirit upon all flesh. He speaks of the Lord as "Jesus of Nazareth, a man approved of God among you by miracles, and wonders and signs." He refers to the Psalm which says, "My flesh shall rest in hope," and tells us that David knew "that God had sworn with an oath to him, that of the fruit of his loins, according to the flesh, he would raise up Christ to sit upon his throne." He particularly charges his hearers with the murder of the Lord (Acts ii. 23-28; iii. 13, 15, 18, 19; iv. 10, 11; v. 30, 31, 33; x. 36-43).

Peter and those with him address themselves exclusively to Israel (Acts ii. 5, 14, 22, 36; iii. 12, 13, 26; iv. 2, 8, 10; v. 30, 31; vii. 2, 37, 38, 44, 45; xi. 19). The exceptions are noteworthy, Cornelius (chap. x.), and the Ethiopian (chap. viii.). Those who preached to these Gentiles were especially commanded by a vision, or by the angel of the Lord. It was not a normal part of their ministry. The reconciliation is noticeable by its absence in Acts i.--xii. Its drawing light first appears with the call and commission of Saul of Tarsus. To bear the name of the Lord before the Gentiles is the first clause of the ministry of Paul as revealed in Acts ix. 15, while Peter several years after (A.V. chronology) says, "it is an unlawful thing for a man that is a Jew to keep company or come unto one of another nation," and explains the exceptional circumstances that altered his attitude. The estrangement of the nations (Rom. i. 24, 28) still obtained so far as Peter's ministry was concerned. Peter knows nothing of the "new creation" as a present fact; his message is a call to repentance, to conversion, unto forgiveness; he speaks of being "begotten again" by the Word of God (I Pet. i. 3, 23). He never teaches that through the resurrection of the Lord Jesus those who are "in Christ" are a "new creation"; that demands the reconciliation. Further, the glorious truth enshrined in the words "in Christ," so frequent in Paul's teaching, have no place in Peter's ministry. Once only does he use the expression (I Pet. iii. 16), and then it has no meaning parallel to Paul's usage. The differentiation of the ministry and message of Peter and Paul demands a much fuller rendering than the rest of this study will permit, but until we see the constricted aspect of the gospel until the time came for Paul to be commissioned with the ministry of the reconciliation, we shall fail to appreciate the grace of God therein revealed to a world alien and ignorant. We must content ourselves with a passing survey first, coming back to the important details when the survey is completed.

It will be observed in Rom. v. that the death of Christ is emphasized as procuring the reconciliation, the blood, righteousness, obedience of Christ, and His resurrection procuring and evidencing justification (Rom. iii. 24, 26; iv. 25; v. 9, 18, 19). We fear that we shall be misunderstood, but we hope to make our meaning clear in subsequent issues, but when we read that Christ died for all we must not assume that Scripture means that He made an atonement for all, that He shed His blood for all, and that He became a curse for all. The death of Christ goes back to Adam, and while it also is spoken of as "for sins," it deals particularly with the original state of man as covered by the sin and death brought in by Adam. Adam was not begotten nor born, he was created, and the aspect of truth revealed through the apostle Paul does not deal with re-birth so much as with new-creation. To make this possible, the enmity, the distance which originated in Adam, and which was magnified by the giving up of the nations and the choice of one nation, emphasized in the case of that one nation by the almost endless round of ceremonies, sacrifices, ordinances, commands, fasts and feasts, must be put away. The message of reconciliation accomplishes this. At the death of Christ the veil in the temple was rent. The veil prevented access. Scripture teaches us that the veil which prevented access typified "His flesh" (see Heb. ix. 7-10, x. 20). Reconciliation was accomplished "by the body of His flesh through death," and reconciliation consequently knows Christ after the flesh no longer. We anticipate the teaching of Eph. ii. here by pointing out how this truth is sustained in verse 15 in the words, "the enmity in His flesh."

Based upon the reconciliation accomplished by the death of His Son is a "much more." There is something beyond reconciliation. Something that goes deeper than the removal of estrangement, of the clearing away of moral, ceremonial, and spiritual barriers. The death of Christ was for all, all without reference to their faith, knowledge or capacity to know. Reconciliation has been effected. Salvation, however, in the epistle to the Romans is not on the same level. The gospel "is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth" (i. 16), "If thou shalt confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus, and shalt believe in thine heart that God hath raised Him from the dead, thou shalt be saved" (x. 9). The same may be said of justification. While reconciliation is accomplished by the death of God's Son, irrespective of knowledge or faith, justification is > "through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus, Whom God hath set forth to be a propitiation through faith in His blood. . . . the justifier of him that believeth in Jesus. . . . justified by faith. . . . Abraham believed God and it was reckoned unto him for righteousness. . . . now it was not written for his sake alone, that it was imputed to him; but for us also, to whom it shall be imputed, if we believe on Him that raised up Jesus our Lord from the dead" (Rom. iii. 24 - iv. 24).

No one but he who has some theory that necessitates otherwise can fail to see the force and emphatic place given to faith in connection with justification. Reconciliation has mad justification a possibility; reconciliation is not a future goal, but a basis upon which God rests the gospel committed to Paul. Rom. v. 12-21 demands close study, and we hope to return to it and consider its bearings upon reconciliation presently. We then may be able to understand the better the meaning of the expression in verse 11 concerning receiving the reconciliation, and the parallel in II Cor. v., "Be ye reconciled to God."

Rom. xi. must, however, be considered before we close this article, for there we find the apostle's words, "reconciling a world," explained. Here again the whole passage demands more elaboration than it is possible at the moment to give it. We will just point out that which bears most directly upon our subject, leaving the wider context (which, however, is absolutely essential) for future study. Rom. xi. speaks of things from a purely dispensational standpoint. The Jew, as a nation, is being set aside, a remnant retain the continuance of the root and fatness of the olive tree, but some of the branches have been broken off, and the wild branches, the Gentiles, have been grafted in. The apostle repudiates the notion that the Jew has stumbled in order that he might fall; the blessing of the Gentiles rather is in view. Note the way in which the apostle speaks of their fall and their fulness, their rejection and their reception (Rom. xi. 12, 15):--

> "Now if the fall of them be the riches of the world, and the diminishing of them the riches of the Gentiles, how much more their fulness?"
> "For if the casting away of them be the RECONCILING OF A WORLD, what shall the receiving of them be, but life from the dead?"

Here is Paul's inspired explanation of the term already noted in II Cor. v. 19. The world, indicating according to Rom. xi. 12 the Gentiles particularly, has been reconciled. No longer is there a nation on earth whose priesthood, laws, and exclusiveness keep the nations at a distance. No longer is Christ limited to the Messianic prophecies and hopes of Israel, and the restrictions of "the flesh." He is declared to be the Son of God with power by the spirit of holiness, by the resurrection from the dead.

The apostle gives some further statements bearing upon the reconciliation in Rom. xv. which it is important to notice. Those who have studied the structure of the epistle to the Romans are aware that a new section, a dispensational section, commences with Rom. xv. We must not forget, however, that the section is connected with the preceding verses. The true reading of verse 8 is not "now I say," but "for I say." What is the connection? The question that runs through chapter xiv. to xv. 7 is the one of "reception." The chapter opens with the words, "Him that is weak in the faith receive ye." It then discusses the difference between weak faith and strong faith, between the one who eateth all things and the one who eateth only herbs, between the one who regards a day and the one who does not regard a day. The section closes with the words:--

> "That ye may with one mind and with one mouth (i.e. in place of the 'disputations' between the Judaistic and Gentile parties) glorify God. . . . wherefore receive ye one another, as Christ also received us to the glory of God."

It is then that the apostle says:--

> "For I say that Jesus Christ was a minister of the circumcision. . . . and that the Gentiles might glorify God for His mercy."

The words "glorify God" in verse 6, as a result of the unity there established between Jew and Gentile, are linked with their recurrence in verse 9, as a result of the extension of the blessings (primarily sent to Israel) to the Gentiles. Two ministries are in view here:--

1. Jesus Christ—a "minister of the circumcision" (Rom. xv. 8).
2. Paul—the "minister of Jesus Christ to the Gentiles, ministering the gospel of God, that the offering up of the Gentiles might be acceptable (cf. xii. 1 and xiv. 18, the very case in point), having been sanctified by the Holy Spirit" (Rom. xv. 16).

The fact of the reconciliation is to-day taken so much as a matter of course that the question as to whether Gentile worship and ministry might not be acceptable to God never enters into our minds. Indeed, to-day, many have gone to the other extreme, and deny any future blessing to Israel. It is only because the world has been reconciled to God by the death of His Son that the gospel can go forth to the Gentiles at all. Blessed as this is, we have not reached the height of grace. Still further and further blessings were to be made known. If the estrangement of Israel could thus be blessed to Gentiles, we may well believe that the setting aside of Israel at Acts xxviii. might be the basis of still richer grace. This is indeed the case as we shall more fully see when we turn to the concluding reference.

The Gentile members of the one body (Eph. ii. 11-22). pp. 160-168

We have considered briefly, and with the omission of much detail, the ministry of reconciliation. The dispensational place of the reconciliation, and its connection with the setting aside of the unbelieving Jew, and the position of the nations (spoken of as "the world" from the Jewish standpoint) rendered this reconciliation absolutely necessary before Paul could go to the far off Gentiles with the good news of God. We have further seen that this reconciliation has as its basis the death of the Son of God. We have not yet read that the world was "made nigh," or had "boldness of access," but simply the fact that the reconciliation has been accomplished, that all men everywhere were called upon to "be reconciled to God," to "receive the reconciliation," and following upon this reception we find the higher blessings of justification, forgiveness, &c. We saw that the grace of God was magnified by the way in which He over-ruled the apostasy of Israel to the blessing of the hitherto estranged Gentiles.

This principle, laid down in Romans xi., we find obtains in fullest measure when we turn to the epistles of the mystery. The first of the prison epistles which refer to the reconciliation is Ephesians, and there, as in Col. i., the richer, fuller word apokatallassõ is employed exclusively. The argument seems to be that if katallassõ is brought in by reason of the breaking off of "some of the branches," then apokatallassõ will be the reply of grace when Israel as a whole passes off the dispensational platform. Eph. ii. contains the only occurrence of the word Israel in the prison epistles. This reference it will be seen is to the past, and eloquently bears testimony to the Gentile character of this set of inspired writings. In contrast to the one reference to Israel stand the seven references to the Gentiles in these prison epistles, which supply the positive witness to the same truth.

The first reference to the Gentiles is in Eph. ii. 11, where our study really commences. Time and space will not allow us to consider the whole of chapter ii., but we would point out, for the sake of any who find the larger context a guide (an admirable and safe canon), that the whole chapter may be summarized as follows. Verses 1-10, Death and Life, with the contrastive words "in time past" and "but God." Verses 11-22, Distance and nearness, with the same contrastive words "in time past" and "but now." This being the case, verses 11-22 refer more to the dispensational aspect of the truth than to the doctrinal (we use these cumbersome words for the lack of better). Sin, death, life, salvation and perfect acceptance are dealt with first. Privileges and dispensational changes are dealt with second. That this is no man-made distinction is evident when we examine the statements made concerning the same Gentiles from the two aspects.

It is a point of first importance to observe in which section of this clearly divided chapter the word reconciliation comes. It occurs in the dispensational section, a section in which the question of sin does not enter, a section in which enmity is not the enmity of the carnal mind as such, but that enmity which is connected with the fleshy distinctions of circumcision and uncircumcision, of ordinances and commandments. The peace spoken of we shall see is not the peace effected between the sinner and his God, but is decidedly dispensational, and assumes that the evangelical (shall we call it) peace is already enjoyed. In order to see more clearly the general teaching of this passage, together with the position in that teaching which is occupied by the reconciliation, a careful and detailed analysis will be necessary. This can be accomplished by pages of exposition, or by the simpler method of discovering the literary structure. Both space and efficiency alike demand the structure, which we accordingly set out as follows:--

Eph. ii. 11-22.

The past and present. Dispensationally.

A	11, 12. The past.	a	Gentiles in the flesh.
		b	Without Christ.
	Dispensational	c	Aliens from the polity of Israel.
	disadvantages	c	Strangers from the covenants of the promise.
		b	Having no hope.

B	13-22. The present.	d	But now made nigh.
		e	Reconciliation.
	Dispensational	d	No longer strangers.
	privileges	e	Fitly framed together.

Section B will require further expansion presently, but we will first draw attention to what is said under section A. There we have the condition of the world outside of the boundary of Israel, its sphere and its state. The first item against the world at large was that they were G*entiles*. It will be seen at once that although the division of mankind into Jew and Gentile had its origin in the giving up of the nations, and the leaving of them to their ignorance, yet to be a Gentile was not individually a personal responsibility such as being a thief. That (in the language of Scripture) Gentiles and sinners were almost synonymous terms can be gathered from Gal. ii. 15, and "a Gentile man and a publican" are words used to signify one outside the pale of blessing (Matt. xviii. 17).

Two words follow the reference to the Gentile, en sarki, "in flesh." It will be corrective to any false ideas at once to note that the words occur again in this verse as indicating the sphere likewise of Israel's covenant relationship. The words are not used here morally, but dispensationally. The Gentile distance was "in the flesh," but so also was the Israelite nearness. Until there were those who could be called the circumcision, there were of course none who could be called the uncircumcision. Israel's distinctive privilege was not only "in the flesh," but was also "hand made." This is in entire contrast of which ("for we are the circumcision," Phil. iii. 3) is "made without hands" (Col. ii. 11). Gentiles "in the flesh," and the circumcision "in the flesh" meant enmity. This is entirely removed in the one body, and in a new sphere, the direct antithesis to the flesh, they "the both" have access "in one SPIRIT" to the Father. Perfect reconciliation has been accomplished in this particular. It can therefore be said that regarding the enmity (for reconciliation always implies enmity) that existed between Gentile and Israel, between circumcision and uncircumcision "in the flesh," it has been entirely cancelled by the "reconciling of the both in one body to God."

The next revelation of the condition of these Gentiles in the flesh is that they are "without a Messiah." Israel again claims the distinctive privilege. "Who are Israelites. . . . of whom as concerning the flesh the Messiah came, Who is over all, God blessed unto the ages" (Rom. ix. 4, 5). When the apostle to the Gentiles would define his gospel, he shows us clearly that Israel claims the Messiah "according to the flesh," for in Rom. i. 1-4 he tells us that "he was separated unto the gospel of God. . . . concerning His Son Who was born of the seed of David according to the flesh, and marked off Son of God in power according to the spirit of holiness, by means of a resurrection from the dead." It is the risen One, whose physical connection with Israel has been transcended by the spiritual extension of His power in resurrection, that Paul had to proclaim. In II Cor. v. 16 it is the same truth in the same connection. Again, reconciliation has brought the far off and the nigh together "in Christ," and they who were "without a Messiah" rejoice that they are blessed "in and with Christ."

The two central members c c, the pivot and turning point of the structure, emphasize with no uncertainty the "dispensational" as distinct from the "doctrinal" condition under notice. The Gentiles were "aliens" and "strangers." In another passage (Eph. iv. 18) we have an alienation of a moral kind, "alienated from the life of God." This has to do with walk, and is an explanation of the passage which declares that we were "dead in (or to) sins," and walked according to the age of this world. The alienation from the life of God, but from the "commonwealth of Israel." The word 'commonwealth" is politeia, and in its one other occurrence (Acts xxii. 28), it is rendered in the A.V. "freedom in a very suggestive context, emphasizing the difference between the purchasing of a citizenship, and the being born a freeman of the city. The reconciliation altered this condition. While "in the flesh" is followed by "being aliens from the citizenship of Israel," "in the Spirit" is followed by "now therefore citizens (sumpolites) with the saints (appallotrioõ) are both derivatives from the same word allos, which we have already found in the word translated "change" in Rom. i. (allassõ) which necessitated the reconciliation (katallassõ) of Rom. v. Every item in this passage demands a volume, for the Old Testament is full of illustration and precept regarding this alienation and this citizenship, and its exclusiveness can be traced in the Gospels and the Acts. Without the reconciliation (apokatallassõ) it could never have been written that the Gentiles were "joint heirs and a joint body and joint partakers of His promise in Christ by the gospel of whereof I (Paul) was made a minister," any more than the gospel of God could have been sent to the Gentiles without the reconciliation (katallassõ) of Rom. v. and vi. being in operation.

It must be kept in mind, further, that there is no element of universality in this passage. The reconciliation is between "the both," and these are created into one new man, have access to the Father, are fellow-citizens with the saints, and are being builded into a holy temple. This is not true universally; it is only true of those who believe, and have been saved by grace through faith. This has no reference to mankind as a whole, and to use the term humanity in this connection is to introduce an element at variance with the peculiar and elective nature of the subject.

The next item, "strangers from the covenants of the promise," places yet another barrier between the Gentile and blessing, to be removed and swallowed up only in the reconciliation. The word "strangers" is not so emphatic as the word "aliens." It is translated "host" in Rom. xvi. 23, and in the LXX sometimes it means "guest," although this rendering does not occur in the A.V. The stranger had an allotted place in the economy of the Law. He shared the feasts and many of the privileges pertaining to circumcision, but he was a "stranger" nevertheless, and had not the same position that the true born child possessed. The covenants (except those made prior to Abraham) belong to Israel. Both covenants and promises are included in Israel's possessions by the apostle in Rom. ix. 4. The Gentiles who participated however little, or however much, did so as a "stranger" or as a "guest." To be a "fellow-partaker" necessitated the reconciliation.

It should be kept in mind that no covenant whatever is mentioned in connection with the church of the mystery. Neither are promises (plural); it is always the promise (singular), defined and separated by several marks from the promises made unto the fathers, or pertaining to Israel. The two central members aliens and strangers show us beyond the shadow of a doubt that we are dealing with dispensational position, not doctrinal.

The next item is none the less emphatic, "Having no hope." The structure reveals the reason, "Not having a Messiah." The Bible knows of no hope without Christ. Until it could be made clear that Christ had a ministry and a claim regarding the Gentiles independently of Israel (which is a question different from the inclusion of the Gentile with the Jew under the Abrahamic Covenant), they, being without a Messiah, were of necessity without hope. The reconciliation has changed all this. The Messiah raised far above all in the spiritual sphere is preached to the Gentiles independently of Israel. This truth is definitely stated in the only other passage which refers to the reconciliation, viz., Col. i. 26, 27:--

> "The mystery which hath been hid from ages and from generations, but now is made manifest to his saints: To whom God would make known what is the riches of the glory of this mystery among the Gentiles; which is Christ among you, the hope of glory."

Just as en with dative plural is translated "among" the Gentiles, so ought it be translated "among" you. So many refer to this passage as though it taught that the indwelling of Christ in the individual is here said to be the hope of glory. No, the very fact that now the hidden secret has been made known, and has revealed the purpose of God regarding those who were chosen before the overthrow of the world, that fact revealing the Son of God as Saviour and Lord and Head without reference to Israel, the fact that Christ was preached "among" the Gentiles of itself gave the pledge and hope of glory. They who once in their distant and uncovenanted condition had no hope, and who, if they did believe, shared in "the hope of Israel," now that Israel and its hope are for the time set aside had hope, a unique hope, and one definitely connected with the mystery. It is this new hope that is the object of the apostle's prayer, "what is the hope of His calling." It is this hope that forms one part in the seven-fold unity of the Spirit. "One hope," the "one hope of your calling." "His calling" and "your calling" are terms which mark off the hope of Ephesians from the hope of Israel or of creation.

Passing to the last clause we read, "Without God in the world." This should be read together with the first member, "Gentiles, in the flesh." To be one of the nations was to be atheos. The term does not necessarily imply wickedness (although that will ever be the result of being without God), for Pagan Gentiles called the Christians atheoi (without a god), rather than "godless" or "ungodly." Throughout the history of Israel, God, Who created the heavens and the earth, is continually set before us as the God of Israel. "I am the God of Abraham," and "I will be your God" are expressions found everywhere in the O.T., and also in some parts of the N.T. Paul's question, Is He the God of the J*ews* only? (Rom. iii. 29) would be without point to-day; in fact, in many assemblies it would have to be reversed, Is He the God of the Gentiles only? for the faithfulness of God regarding His promises to Israel is discounted by many.

It is well for us to "remember" what our state as "Gentiles in the flesh" was. It must not be thought that the alternative to that state is that the Gentiles have been made "Israel," or have usurped Israel's promises. The hope of Israel remains untouched; another hope figures in the epistles of the mystery. The citizenship of Israel remains untouched; a citizenship of quite a different character ("in heaven") belongs to the church of the one body. A promise dating from before times of ages, before the overthrow of the world, is enjoyed instead of the covenants of the promise which pertain to Israel. Christ is to the church of the mystery something very different from the Messiah of Israel. The sphere "in the flesh" is changed for that "in the spirit," and in that new sphere every conflicting element of flesh and ordinance has been removed as a result of the reconciliation.

We must now direct attention to the second member of the structure (B) which speaks of the present dispensational privileges as contrasted with the darkness and distance which we have just considered. It appears that we may read on from verse 13 to verse 19, putting verses 14-18 into a parenthesis. Verse 13 tells us that those who once were far off have been made nigh by the blood of Christ, and verse 19 continues, "so then ye are no longer strangers, but fellow-citizens." How this is accomplished is explained briefly in verse 13 by the words, "by the blood of Christ," and more fully in the parenthetical verses 14-18.

We have already called attention to the careful use of terms in the Scriptures with reference to the offering of the Lord Jesus Christ. In the lesser aspect of reconciliation, which is its wider aspect too, the death, not the blood, nor the cross are prominent. It is exceedingly difficult to express oneself on this wondrous and holy theme without being misunderstood. We, of course, know that the Lord's death was occasioned by the cross, and accompanied by great suffering and the shedding of blood, and readily admit that sometimes the death of Christ may be taken to include all that preceded and accompanied it. Yet with such careful and elaborate distinctions as are given in the opening chapters of Leviticus, we feel we dare not assert that the distinctions are mere hair-splitting. The whole burnt offering consumed on the altar is a totally different conception from the sin offering burnt without the camp, and both again differ from the passover lamb, yet Christ at one and the same time by one offering fulfilled them all. The death of Christ, without reference to the shedding of blood, or the cross, is the wide basis which includes every son of Adam in the reconciliation (katallassõ). The death of Christ, viewed by itself, answers to the death which passed upon all men through Adam, and removes it, for as in Adam ALL die, so in Christ shall ALL be made alive. To tamper with the inspired logic and inspired words, "as. . . . so" and "all. . . . all," betrays a prejudice, a prejudice fostered largely by the error that the death of Christ in this wide aspect is tantamount to salvation and justification in their evangelical meaning. The reconciliation, is not related merely to the death of Christ, but to the blood and the cross of Christ. While we are fully aware that the enduring of that awful cross and the shedding of that precious blood resulted in death, yet that death is not here mentioned as the cause of this full reconciliation, just as, conversely, that cross and that blood are not mentioned as the procuring cause of the lesser reconciliation. So, therefore, in Eph. ii. 13 we read, "But now, in Christ Jesus, ye who once were far off, have been made nigh by the blood of Christ."

The apostle now proceeds to amplify this wondrous statement. The cast off nations had already been "made nigh" as a result of the death of Christ, but that was a dispensational change, giving them facilities and possibilities of blessing which had been denied them during Israel's ascendancy. To be made nigh by the blood of Christ, however, was something more than a possibility of blessing, it was a glorious, unchangeable blessing itself, not, as in the katallassõ reconciliation, world wide, but, though addressed to Gentiles, it addressed a predestinated and elect company of them. To stumble at the absolute, unconditional election on the threshold of Ephesians is to make an initial and fundamental mistake. Eph. ii. speaks of the same class as Eph. i. a predestinated elect number, and to apply the reconciliation of this passage universally is a fatal error.

We are indebted to those whose position we feel justified in thus describing for the structure of these parenthetical verses, and the near approach to the truth evidenced in so many passages in their writings only emphasizes the blinding power of the preconceived error that reconciliation is universal and future, and that it is the goal of the ages.

Expansion of B e, Eph. ii. 14-18.

The Reconciliation.

B e | a1 | He is our peace.
b1 | "The both" made one (ta amphotera).
c1 | The middle wall broken.
d1 | The enmity in His flesh.
c1 | Law, commandments, ordinances abolished.
b1 | "The two" created into one new man.
a1 | Making peace.
a2 | Reconciliation to God.
b2 | "The both" in one body (tous amphoterous).
c2 | Through the cross.
d2 | The enmity slain.
c2 | Preaching peace to far and near.
b2 | "The both" in one spirit (oi amphoteroi).
a2 | Access to the Father.

This section is so full that it is difficult to know where to start, as so much seems to claim attention. Let us first of all carefully observe the answering clauses in the structure. Under the letter "a" we have peace, reconciliation and access, truths that are linked together very intimately as we hope to show. Under "b" we have the parties concerned in the reconciliation, "The both," "The two." Under the same letter we also have "one," "one new man," "one body," "one spirit." Under "c" we have commandments and ordinances, likened to the middle wall of partition, broken down and abolished, and peace preached to far and near as a direct result of the cross. The central members "d" speak of enmity, the one showing that it had connection with the flesh and ordinances, the other that this enmity was slain at the cross.

We must now consider the terms used. We have already called attention to the fact that sin is nowhere in view in this section, that we are dealing with dispensational distance. We shall now find that the peace of this epistle, and the enmity of this section, are also entirely connected with the same aspect, and do not refer to the peace which is experienced by the sinner upon believing unto life and salvation. As this is important, and may be seriously questioned if we give no further explanation, we will examine the subject of peace in the epistle before proceeding. Seven times do we read of "peace" in this epistle, a significant number, but how fitting! Not only is the number of occurrences suggestive, but the order in which the passages are written unfolds a line of teaching that will justify the space occupied by the structure.

Peace in Ephesians.

A | i. 2. Peace from the Lord.
B | ii. 14. He is our peace.
B | ii. 15 - vi. 15. Results of this truth.
a | ii. 15. Making peace—connected with unity.
b | ii. 17. Evangelizing peace—to us.
a | iv. 3. Bond of the peace—connected with unity.
b | vi. 15. Evangel of peace—to others.
A | vi. 23. Peace to the brethren.

In Eph. iv. 3 we read, "Endeavouring to keep the unity of the Spirit, in the bond of the peace." The article before the word peace seems to compel us to look back to chapter ii. to find what it is, and by comparing the two chapters together we shall see that the unity of the Spirit is the realization of the truth expressed in the words, "the both made one"; "the two created into one new man," "the both reconciled in one body to God"; and "the both having access in one spirit to the Father." Limitation of space, and the demands of our present subject, prevent us from going further into the intensely interesting relationship of chapters ii. and iv.; this we hope to deal with in the ordinary course of our studies in the Epistle. It will be observed that peace was preached not only to those who were far, but also to those who were near. If the words "far" and "near" referred to the question of sin and salvation, those "near" would not need peace preached to them. If, however, the terms "far" and "near" express dispensational position (which is evidently the meaning as a reference to verses 12 and 13 will show), then the two, both the Jew and the Gentile, upon the revelation of the mystery, had preached to them a peace hitherto unknown, and by that peace, as a sacred bond, the unity of the spirit was to be kept.

Peace is necessarily contrasted with enmity. If the enmity be the enmity of sin, the answering peace will be of the same character. If the enmity has to do with dispensational difference, the answering peace will be dispensational in character. The enmity of this passage is closely connected with "the flesh" and "commandments contained in ordinances." It is further likened to the middle wall of partition, is spoken of as being broken down, abolished, and slain, the result being the proclamation of peace to those afar off and those near.

"The middle wall of partition" refers to the chel, the wall that separated the Court of the Gentiles from the Court of Israel in the Temple. The following is a translation of the Greek inscription:--

> "NO ONE BEING A FOREIGNER MAY ENTER WITHIN THE ENCLOSURE AROUND THE HOLY PLACE. WHOEVER IS APPREHENDED WILL HIMSELF BE TO BLAME FOR HIS DEATH WHICH WILL CERTAINLY FOLLOW."

Until the revelation of the mystery and of the full reconciliation (apokatallassõ) a difference in point of privilege and access was maintained between the Jewish believer and the believing Gentile. Peter and Cornelius may possibly have gone up to the Temple together, both confessing the same Lord and the same truth, yet there would come a time when the distinctions of race and of ordinances would make an impassable barrier, and Cornelius would be left outside while Peter could pass in. This "enmity," this "middle wall of partition" has been broken down, "For through Him, we, the BOTH, have access in one spirit unto the Father." It is somewhat difficult to make a clear translation of verses 14 and 15 owing to the position of the words, "the enmity of His flesh." The A.V. makes good sense by boldly translating, "Having abolished in His flesh the enmity," which reading is retained by the R.V. Rotherham in his Emphasized New Testament, adhering more closely to the order of the words in the original, has the following, "The enmity, in His flesh—the law of commandments in decrees—bringing to naught." Where we have put a comma between "enmity" and "in," Rotherham uses a "half comma," indicating a close connection. The New Testament of J.N. Darby reads, "Having annulled the enmity in His flesh, the law of commandments in ordinances." The moment we get away from the A.V. and the R.V. to the original, we are conscious that instead of the abolishing of the enmity having been accomplished "in His flesh," the enmity itself seems to be closely connected with His flesh. A reference to Heb. x. 20 will show that "His flesh" was typified by "the veil," which kept man at a distance from God, and that not until the veil was rent, His flesh stricken, smitten, and dying, could access in the higher sense be possible. The enmity of Eph. ii. which was overcame by the reconciliation is figured by the middle wall of partition, linked with Christ according to the flesh, and is crystallized in the commandments concerning ordinances. This enmity was slain at the cross. The apostle had more to say about this wondrous fact, but as it involved a reference to one section of principalities and powers about which he had said nothing specifically as yet, he reserves further details until he has explained the relation of the reconciliation to the spiritual powers in Col. i., and then feels free to add to what he has here said regarding the enmity, the ordinances, and the cross.

The close parallel in Col. ii., and in some sense the epitomizing of Ephesians i. and ii., are worthy of careful consideration. We will set out the parallel, but cannot digress from Eph. ii. long enough to attempt an explanation.

Eph. i. and ii.	Col. ii.
"Far above all principality and power."	"Who is the Head of all principality and power."
"The circumcision in the flesh made by hands."	"A circumcision not made by hand, in the putting off of the body of the flesh."
"The exceeding greatness of His power to usward who believe according to the inworking of His mighty power which He wrought in Christ when He raised Him from the dead."	"Risen with Him through the faith of the inworking of God Who hath raised Him from the dead."
"And you being dead in trespasses and sins. . . . even we also being dead in trespasses, hath made us alive together with Christ. . . . and hath raised us up together."	"And you being dead in trespasses and in the uncircumcision of your flesh hath He made alive together with Him."
"The enmity in His flesh—the law of commandments in ordinances having abolished. . . . by the cross, having slain the enmity by it."	"Blotting out the handwriting of ordinances that was against us, which was contrary to us, and took it out of the way, nailing it to His cross, and having put off principality and power, He made a show of them openly, triumphing over them by it."

Much more is yet to be learned from Eph. ii., but enough has been said for the moment to exhibit the scope and meaning of the reconciliation in this chapter. It differs from that which has gone before in that it is perfect and full, and that it is directly connected with the blood of Christ ("made nigh by the blood of Christ"), and the cross of Christ ("that He might reconcile both unto God in one body by the cross"). The reconciliation is of "the both" to God, the enmity which was related to "his flesh" and commandments in ordinances giving place to access in one Spirit, and perfect freedom from commands and ordinances. One thing we trust is abundantly clear, and that is, that this passage does not contain the slightest warrant for applying the reconciliation outside the limits of the peculiarly elect company of the one body, and that it does not look forward to the future either for its fulfilment, or great development.

We must follow the leading of the inspired Word, and leave the further amplifications of Eph. ii. that are found in Col. ii. until we have considered the only other reference to the reconciliation contained in the Word. The remainder of Eph. ii. from verse 19 to 22 the reader will see is the glorious result of the reconciliation, verse 19 in particular more than compensating for the state of verse 12. These verses will be dealt with in due course in the series dealing with the Epistle; we therefore leave the subject here and will consider Col. i. in our next article on this subject.

Studies in the Book of the Revelation.
The relation of the book to the rest of the Bible.
pp. 4-7

Much of the failure to understand the Scriptures arises from the fact that we approach its pages thinking that we have to explain the Bible, instead of realizing that the Bible has been written to explain things to us. Further, we approach the various books of the Bible, as though they had no connection with the rest of Scripture, and thereby fail to perceive the beautiful design running through the entire Word. In approaching the book of Revelation it is of the utmost importance to notice its place in the canon of Scripture, and the relation which it holds to the remainder of the inspired Word. The simplest and at the same time the most obvious relation is the connection of this last book with the first, viz., Genesis.

G*enesis* tells us of the creation, the Serpent's deception, the loss of Paradise, the forfeiture of the right to the tree of life, the entrance of sin, death, and the curse. Revelation tells us of the new creation, the end of the Serpent's deception, the restoration of Paradise, the right to the tree of life, and the blessed fact that there shall be "no more death," and "no more curse." Gen. iii. contains in a brief statement the great prophecy concerning the Seed of the woman, and the seed of the Serpent. Revelation shows us in fuller detail the final and complete fulfilment of this basic prophecy.

Coming to the New Testament we find in the opening book, the Gospel of Matthew, a striking and obvious connection between this Gospel of the Kingdom, and the Revelation. Matthew presents us with the coming of the "Son of man" in lowliness, finally showing us His rejection by Israel as their King, His head crowned with thorns, and the Gentiles successor of Nebuchadnezzar's dominion preferred to the King of God's appointment.

The Revelation has an answer to this, just as it had an answer to all that was said in Genesis. In the Revelation the Lord is seen coming again, still as the Son of man, this time in great glory, this time crowned with many crowns, this time to enter into His place as heaven's appointed King to rule with a rod of iron, to overthrow the final blasphemous development of Gentile dominion, and to usher in that perfect kingdom concerning which all the prophets had spoken.

In studying the teaching of the New Testament books, a great deal can be gathered from the way in which they use the Old Testament Scriptures. When we find that Matthew refers to the Old Testament Scriptures about 92 times, and that the epistle to the Hebrews contains in its short compass 102 O.T. references, we are at once impressed with the fact that these books contain some line of teaching which has a real connection with the purpose and people of Old Testament times. When we consider the Prison Epistles, and note how very few references they contain to the Old Testament, we are at once in possession of that which helps us to see that these epistles are not the continuation of the teaching of the Old Testament, but they are a revelation of something new, even as they themselves claim (see Eph. iii.).

What shall we say then when we find no less than 285 references to the Old Testament in the book of the Revelation, or more than the references of Matthew and Hebrews put together? surely this is a witness which must not be overlooked. Further, the visions, the symbols, the general character of the language of the Revelation is similar to that of Daniel, Zechariah, Joel, and the Old Testament prophets generally. If we approach the Revelation with a mind stored with the teaching of the prophets of old, we shall not need explanations of much that otherwise would mystify us, and shall be spared the utterly vain attempt to find an explanation by ransacking the history of Europe to get something approaching to an interpretation.

For some years past we have been forced to the belief that the Bible explains itself, and that all necessary information is found within its pages. If the child of God must possess a knowledge of the acts of Goths and Vandals, and of the tortuous intricacies of European and Roman history before he can understand this book, then but a very few can possibly hope to acquire sufficient data even to commence the study. This shuts us up to the few whose opportunities for research have been more advantageous than the majority, and finally calls us to rest upon the conflicting findings of these frail and erring teachers, fallible as ourselves. No, this is not the case at all. The simplest believer who may never have heard of Caligula, nor of Alaric, to whom such phrases as "political heavens" and "ecclesiastical suns" may be utterly unintelligible, may nevertheless understand all the mind of God as revealed in this book without one single additional outside or historic allusion. Revelation studied in the light of Isaiah, Ezekiel, Daniel, Joel, Zechariah and Malachi is luminous, and in turn reflects light on some otherwise difficult passages in those prophecies.

As we read the O.T. prophecies written before the captivity, and those written during and after the captivity, we shall find a marked change. Ezekiel's prophecy is full of symbols, so also is Daniel's; Zechariah devotes six chapters to symbols. This change, this important place given to symbols, is worthy of notice. During the time of Israel's decline and failure symbolic prophecy is in the ascendant. When we come to the Revelation we find these symbols referred to as "mysteries," e.g., "the mystery of the seven stars" (Rev. i. 20). Mystery first appears on the page of Scripture in Matt. xiii., when Christ, as Israel's King, had been rejected by the nation (see Matt. xii.). It was because of this that He spoke in parables, and it is because Revelation deals with this same people, their final trouble and restoration, that we have so many signs or symbols in it. It is not until the seventh angel sounds his trumpets that:--

> "the mystery of God shall be finished, as He hath declared by His servants the prophets. . . . And the seventh angel sounded; and there were great voices in heaven, saying, The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord and of His Christ; and He shall reign unto the ages of the ages" (Rev. x. 7 and xi. 15).

Many opponents of the inspiration of the book of the Revelation have brought forward, among other arguments, the style and language of the book. One need not have a very learned acquaintance with classic Greek to be able to point out many departures from recognized rules of syntax which are to be found in the Revelation. What is important to observe is that these departures from pure Greek are not "barbarisms," as Dionysius Alexandrinus called them, but are to be traced to the strong Hebrew current of theme and style running through this prophecy. The imagery of the book is peculiarly Jewish throughout; temple, tabernacle, ark, manna, covenant, altar, incense, priesthood, the rod of iron, the holy city New Jerusalem, Jezebel, Balaam, Sodom, Egypt, the plagues so closely parallel to those of Exodus, all horses of Rev. vi., and the two witnesses of Rev. xi. are direct references and continuations of the same visions and prophecies of Zechariah. The angel of Rev. x. 5, 6 is a direct reference to Dan. xii. 7, while opening vision of the Son of man in Rev. i. 1 is closely parallel to that of Dan. x. Surely none have any hesitation in believing that Daniel and Zechariah prophesied concerning the future of Israel and Jerusalem?

It has been pointed out already by others that the titles of Christ used in this book link the Lord to the kingdom purpose, and not to the church of the mystery. The student is recommended to make a list of these titles. He is called,
The Son of man; The Almighty; The Lord God; The First and Last; The Prince of the kings of the earth; The One Who is to come;
The One Who liveth; The Lamb; The Lion of the tribe of Judah; The Morning Star; The Root and Offspring of David; He Who has the key of David.

When we examine more closely the first chapter we shall see how full that opening passage is of illusions to the people of Israel, and the time of the end with reference to them. We will not anticipate our findings, however, but hope to take up the consideration of the Revelation itself in our next paper.

Rev.	10	5 6	And the angel which I saw stand upon the sea and upon the earth lifted up his hand to heaven, And sware by him that liveth for ever and ever, who created heaven, and the things that therein are, and the earth, and the things that therein are, and the sea, and the things which are therein, that there should be time no longer:
Dan.	12	7	And I heard the man clothed in linen, which was upon the waters of the river, when he held up his right hand and his left hand unto heaven, and sware by him that liveth for ever that it shall be for a time, times, and an half; and when he shall have accomplished to scatter the power of the holy people, all these things shall be finished.

Studies in the Book of the Revelation.
The book as a whole.
pp. 45-47

In the introductory article of this series we sought to show the setting of the book with reference to the general plan of the Bible, and saw that it is the gathering point both of the prophecies of the book of Genesis (the heavens and earth, the Seed, the serpent, the nations, &c.), and the Gospel of Matthew (the King, the kingdom, the judgment, discipling of the nations, &c.). Let us now look at the book as a whole in order to gain a large and comprehensive understanding of its purport. This will not only teach us what the book is about, but will act as a corrective when looking at details and smaller passages. Let it be remembered that no one verse or passage must be so interpreted that it goes beyond the scope of the book as a whole, oversteps its place in relation to the rest of Scripture, or isolates it from the divine plan observable throughout the inspired record.

To illustrate our meaning. A verse taken by itself may refer to the Reformation, to Constantine, to the early Church, or to Rome, &c., but its context may demand that it refers to Antichrist, Israel, Babylon, Jerusalem, &c., and however much the isolated passage may seem to fit the historical reference, that will be only a superficial agreement, and must be rejected if it runs counter to the unity of purpose exhibited in the book as a whole. Therefore, before we venture a consideration of chapter i., or a theory as to the "seven churches," or "the woman clothed with the sun," &c., we will look at the book as a whole.

Different arrangements of the book have been given by various writers, but none seem to commend themselves to us so much as that of the late Dr. Bullinger, where the structural indications in the book itself have been diligently followed and tabulated, thereby discovering the Spirit's own arrangement, rather than inventing one of man's own. This being the case, we have no hesitation in presenting it before the reader, feeling that although Dr. Bullinger is the honoured instrument, the structure itself is that of the Lord, the Inspirer of the Apocalypse. It will be found that while retaining the divisions as given by Dr. Bullinger, we have departed at times from his words of explanation.

This survey presents to the eye the whole book, and demonstrates at a glance the fact that the central member "C" is indeed not only central in position, but is the pivot or platform of the whole. The seven-fold division of visions is of great importance, the whole series being found in pairs, that which takes place upon the earth being the result of that which has taken place in heaven. It will be observed that the seven assemblies are brought into direct line with the new heavens and earth, and the new Jerusalem, and that one theme runs throughout the entire book. We do not intend giving more than this short resume in this number. The consideration of these first two articles will prepare the way for closer study, and we ask all readers to whom the subject matter is already a part of their own knowledge of the subject, to cheerfully allow the time and space in order that those readers less acquainted with this preliminary yet important aspect may have a similar advantage. In our next article we hope to take up a consideration of the opening chapter.

Studies in the Book of the Revelation.
The Introduction.
pp. 73-78

The introduction to the apocalypse occupies not the first chapter, as some have been led to think, but the first three verses and part of the fourth of the first chapter. These verses contain much that is of service to us in the understanding of the rest of the book, inasmuch as they give such important items as the theme, agents, means, recipients, and time during and by which the things herein revealed shall come to pass.

The theme of the book is introduced into the first sentence. It is The revelation of Jesus Christ. The word translated "revelation" is apokalupsis, and means "an unveiling." The usage of this word in other scriptures lends great weight to the teaching that we have in this title, which is pre-eminently the revelation of the Lord Jesus Christ in Person.

"The manifestation of the sons of God" (Rom. viii. 19).
"Waiting for the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ" (I Cor. i. 7).
"When the Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven" (II Thess. i. 7).
"Might be found unto praise and honour and glory at (the) revelation of Jesus Christ" (I Pet. i. 7).
"At the revelation of Jesus Christ" (I Pet. i. 13).
"When His glory shall be revealed" (I Pet. iv. 13).

These passages are sufficient to show that before the book of the Revelation was written, Scripture had already fixed the meaning of the word apocalypse as having direct reference to the visible appearing of the Lord Jesus Christ, and that this constituted the hope of God's believing people during the time covered by the Acts, and even afterward, as expressed by Peter's epistle. As we proceed we shall find that all which is written prior to Rev. xix. 11 is introductory to the great theme of the book. There in Rev. xix. is at length described THE apocalypse, in view of which all the rest of the book is written. In the book of the Revelation, however, that which is yet future history is brought before the apostle in vision, consequently the next clause tells us how this revelation was shown to John before its actual fulfilment in fact. "God gave it unto Him to shew unto His servants." The word "shew" is of importance. It is often used in connection with shewing by means of signs. Its first occurrence in the N.T. is not only indicative of this meaning, but opens up to the mind many lines of thought in relation to the special aspect of Matthew and the Revelation considered together:--

"Again the devil taketh Him up into an exceeding high mountain, and sheweth Him all the kingdoms of the world, and the glory of them" (Matt. iv. 8).

That which the Lord Jesus refused to take at the hand of the prince of this world, He will receive in the appointed time from the hand of the Father, for a day is coming when the words shall echo through the spaces of heaven and earth:--

"The kingdoms of this world (same as Matt. iv. 8) are become the kingdoms of our Lord, and of His Christ" (Rev. xi. 15).

The use of the word "shew" in the Revelation itself will give us its meaning more clearly than any other explanation.

Shew (deiknuõ).

A | i. 1. The revelation shewn by the angel. In promise.
B | iv. 1. Things hereafter. The throne and worshippers.
C | xvii. 1. The whore (Note seven vials, and "he carried me away in the spirit").
D | xxi. 9. The bride (Note seven vials, and "he carried me away in the spirit").
C | xxi. 10. The city descending out of heaven from God.
D | xxii. 1. The river proceeding out of the throne of God.
A | xxii. 6. Things shewn by the angel.
B | xxii. 8. The angel who shewed the things refusing worship.

The things shown to us by John in this book are further said to be "things which must come to pass with speed." The words are a direct reference to Dan. ii. 29, and we would here emphasize with all the power we may possess the utter impossibility of understanding or appreciating either the message, or the means used to convey that message, in this book, without a fairly comprehensive knowledge of the Old Testament prophecies. Not only Isaiah, Jeremiah and Ezekiel, but Daniel and the so-called Minor Prophets need careful study. How many there are who fail to understand the book of the Revelation, who never blame themselves for ignoring the first commentaries ever written, namely, Hosea, Joel, Amos, Obadiah, Jonah, Nahum, Habakkuk, Zechariah, Haggai, Zephaniah and Malachi! The statement as to the speedy fulfilment of these things shown is again emphasized in verse 3, "for the time is near." No amount of reasoning can make this speedy fulfilment the well-nigh two thousand years which have intervened between the uttering of these words and their yet distant accomplishment.

The words "with speed" and "is near" were not written from the standpoint of A.D. 96, but from the standpoint from which the visions were seen, viz., The day of the Lord. Time will then be shortened for the elect's sake, the final seven years of Dan. ix. will quickly run their course, and the Lord will rend the heavens and come down. The reference to such passages as II Pet. iii. 8 is a gloss invented to explain away the apparent difficulty, a difficulty which vanishes by adjusting the view-point to the time when the visions were seen and the words heard. This urgent note is repeated in the messages to the seven assemblies, "Repent, or else I will come unto thee quickly" (ii. 16), "Behold, I come quickly" (iii. 11). The same meaning must be given here as to the words in Rev. xi. 14. The book closes with repeated emphasis upon the nearness of the Lord's coming (Rev. xxii. 7, 12, 20), and helps us to see that the whole book is written from the future standpoint of the day of the Lord, and has no historic or prophetic reference to the course of events which have transpired during the interval filled by the dispensation of the mystery, or of the church in its wider aspect.

The word "signified" in Rev. i. 1, as the English word suggests, is derived from the word "sign," or "symbol," and indicates that in the book of the Revelation we are to have described and explained a prophecy which was made known to John by an angel through the medium of a series of signs or symbols. The word semainõ, "to signify" (from semeion, "a sign"), occurs only six times in the N.T. John xii. 33, xviii. 32, and xxi. 19 have reference to symbolic words. In Acts xi. 28 Agabus signified by the Spirit that there should be a dearth. How he did it we are not told, but the manner in which he prophesied the bondage of Paul in Acts xxi. 11 by a sign may suggest his method in Acts xi. The only other reference is Acts xxv. 27.

The introduction of the angel in the opening verse is important. This angel does not leave the apostle until the last chapter is reached. The first six chapters of Zechariah afford a striking parallel. Angels figure largely in Israel's history. They are found with Abraham (Heb. xiii. 2), they were connected with the giving of the law (Acts vii. 53, Gal. iii. 19). They are prominent in the Gospels and the Acts. They figure prominently in the second coming of the Lord (Matt. xvi. 27; xxiv. 31; I Thess. iv. 16; and II Thess. i. 7), and the Epistle to the Hebrews contains twelve references to them. The Revelation contains more than 70 references to angels, linking the book with Israel and the kingdom, and severing it from the church which is the body by the fact that in the prison epistles angels are only mentioned once, and that by way of contrast (Col. ii. 18). Let the reader open any concordance and observe the continuous angelic ministry of the Revelation. There is the angel sent to John, there are angels who have control of the vials, the seals, the plagues, the trumpets, the woes, the waters, the winds, and the seven assemblies. We emphasize the last clause because of the unwarranted license taken with Scripture which makes these seven angels (so prominent elsewhere in the Revelation as real angels in the true sense) into bishops, deacons, synagogue overseers, and the like. The archangel Michael is the prince that standeth for Israel (Dan. x. 21, xii. 1), and it would seem that he delegates these seven angels to watch over the people of the Lord during their time of fierce trial.

Of those who deny or ridicule the idea of angelic ministry we would say that they only need their eyes opened (see II Kings vi. 16 and 17). Heb. i. 14 declares that they are ministering spirits, and such they appear throughout the Revelation.

The description of the message as testified by John is of importance. It is threefold, (1) The Word of God, (2) The testimony of Jesus, and (3) All things that he saw; but these three are not divided, they are one. What John saw in the vision was the Word of God and the testimony of Jesus. What is this testimony? How shall we decide its meaning? The usage of these words in the book itself will help us. There are seven references to this testimony of Jesus, four of them being linked to the other description, "the Word of God."

A | i. 2. John testifies. The angel his instructor.
  B | i. 9. John in Patmos for the testimony.
    C | vi. 9. "Souls." Martyrs promised judgment and told to wait.
      D | xii. 17. The remnant who keep this testimony.
A | xix. 10. The angel linked with John.
  B | xix. 10. The prophecy (cf. verse 11 "and I saw heaven opened").
    C | xx. 4. "Souls." Martyrs and their judgment awarded.

Whatsoever our conception of this testimony may be, one thing is clear; it is that to which the faithful remnant cling, it is the "word of My patience" spoken of by the Lord to the overcomer, and it is the theme and essence of the spirit of prophecy which fills the book. This consideration leads us to one of the most important points in the interpretation of the book of the Revelation. It is not addressed to the world at large, but it is addressed principally to those who are exhorted to "overcome." For their encouragement the seven letters to the assemblies are addressed, for their strength the whole course of events is foreshadowed. Against them the whole force of the dragon, the false christ, and the false prophet is directed. They are the ones who are sealed and kept. They are the ones who seal their testimony with their blood, they are the ones who have their blessed part in the first resurrection, they are the ones who have found access to the new Jerusalem. These are therefore addressed in the last verse of the introduction (i. 3). The blessing promised is echoed in chapter xxii. There in verses 18 and 19 threatening takes the place of blessing, which includes the adding of the plagues written in the book, and the taking away of their part out of the tree of life, the holy city, and the things written in the book, followed by the words, "He which testifieth these things saith, Surely I come quickly," just as verse 3 of chapter i. ends with the words, "for the time is at hand."

The rationalistic professor who adds or takes away from the words of this prophecy, though he will be dealt with in the judgment unless forgiven here, is not visited by the plagues which are described in this book. Once again the passage becomes luminous in the light of the fact that it is addressed to a yet future remnant exhorted to overcome in the yet future day of the Lord. To such primarily the blessing is addressed in chapter i. 3. To such the promises and threatenings to the seven churches are addressed. We append the structural outline of this introduction in order that these studies may be as helpful as possible.

Studies in the Book of the Revelation.
Introductory message to the seven churches (i. 4-20).
pp. 107-111

Passing from the deeply interesting introduction of verses 1-3, we commence the book proper in the fourth verse.

We find no warrant for making the prophetic section of the book commence at chapter iv. One would imagine that the words of iv. 2, "I was in spirit," occur here for the first time by the way this passage is treated by many commentators. They occur for the first time in the Revelation in chapter i. 10, "I was in spirit in the Lord's day." Let us first of all, however, consider the scope of the chapter before us. It is evident that chapter ii. commences a new section, so that the chapter division here is a true one. We do not feel satisfied with any structure of this opening chapter that we have yet seen, and although realizing the imperfection of the following suggestion, we think that by adhering to the terms of the Scriptures themselves, rather than by inventing headings, we approach nearer to the true arrangement.

Rev. i. 4-20.

A | 4. The seven assemblies and seven spirits.
B | a | 5-. Christ the first begotten from the dead.
b | -5, 6. Result of that death. Redemption.
C | c | 7. His coming. Effect on tribes when they see Him.
d | 8. Title. Alpha and Omega. I AM.
D | 9, 10. John in Lord's day for testimony.
E | 11. Seven assemblies particularized.
D | 12-17-. Son of man in glory testifying.
C | c | -17-. His glory. Effect upon John when He saw Him.
d | -17. Title. First and Last. I AM.
B | a | 18-. Christ. I am He that liveth and was dead.
b | -18. Result of that death. Power.
A | 20. The seven assemblies and seven angels.

It will be observed that a fair balance of thought is indicated by the above arrangement, and one or two important aids to interpretation are educed. Let us consider verse 4.

John to the seven assemblies which are in Asia.--First we must spare a moment to look at the word "assembly," translated "church" in A.V. We have no objection to the word church; it is only because so many have limited the meaning of it that we prefer the wider and more open word "assembly." The word ekklesia is composed of two words, ek, meaning "out of," and kalein, "to call, or summon." The LXX uses the word ekklesia to translate the Hebrew word Q*ahal*, "to call together, or assemble," seventy times. Q*ahal* is variously rendered "congregation," "assembly," "company," and "multitude." The first occurrence of q*ahal* is important. Gen. xxviii. 3, 4 records the ratification of the Abrahamic covenant with Jacob. Let us observe its setting:--

1. "EL SHADDAI bless thee (cf. Gen. xvii. 1), and
2. Make thee fruitful, and
3. Multiply thee,
4. That thou mayest be a multitude (margin, assembly) of people, and
5. Give the blessing of Abraham to thee, and
6. To thy seed with thee,
7. That thou mayest inherit the land wherein thou art a stranger, which God gave to Abraham."

Here it will be noticed that the "assembly," or "church," is the central member of this sevenfold promise. It will be further seen that the Abrahamic covenant is the only covenant in view; Jacob's seed are the heirs together with Jacob and his forefathers, and the inheritance of the land of Israel is the final clause of this wonderful promise. It will be remembered that Abraham, Isaac and Jacob NEVER INHERITED THE LAND, although God had made the promise unconditionally. Scripture is not silent upon this fact. It calls attention rather to this evident truth. Stephen says concerning Abraham, "He removed him into this land wherein ye now dwell, and He gave him NONE inheritance in it, NO, NOT SO MUCH as to set his foot on." Heb. xi. 13 says, "These all died in faith, not having received the promises, but having seen them afar off." One word, and one word only will constitute an answer that shall meet all requirements, and that word is resurrection. Apart from resurrection practically no promise of Scripture can be fulfilled.

This is emphasized by the context of the first N.T. occurrence of the word ekklesia, Matt. xvi. 18, "On this rock I will build My church, and the gates of hades shall not prevail against it." This "church" is not to be confounded with the teaching revealed later through the apostle Paul. This church has direct connection with the kingdom of the heavens, and with Peter's ministry in the Acts, particularly as laid down in Acts ii., and its references to the day of the Lord, is linked on to the book of Revelation. The Lord Who spoke of building His church in Matt. xvi. is seen in Rev. i. with the evidences of His power. He told Peter that the gates of hades should not prevail against it. Here in Rev. i. we see Him victor over death, and possessing the keys of death and hades.

There is no warrant for the idea that the church as indicated in the Prison Epistles, or the church in its wider aspect known as Christendom, is in view here. The seven assemblies are constituted of believers who shall be found on the earth in the last days, to whom this book of Revelation is particularly addressed. The days will be rife, and the words of exhortation to overcome, and the promises and warnings of the seven letters to the churches, will be needed as never before.

These seven assemblies are in Asia. Asia in Scripture does not refer to the vast continent known by that name to-day, but to a portion of that part spoken of as Asia Minor. Ephesus, Smyrna, Pergamos, and the rest have been spiritualized into many mystic meanings, but we do not remember reading the mystic symbolism of Asia, nor yet of Patmos. When Peter addressed his epistle to the sojourners of the dispersion, in Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia and Bithynia, he meant those actual districts to be understood, and not some mythical or fanciful meaning that might be extorted from them. It will be seen from this reference that Asia is only a small place. Ephesus was its principal city, and consequently to Ephesus the first epistle is addressed. The order in which the assemblies are named is the order in which a messenger would visit them. A glance at the map will show that from Ephesus the road runs north to Smyrna, the second assembly mentioned, then on still further north to the third church Pergamos, then it turns south-east to Thyatira, Sardis, Philadelphia, and Laodicea. The order is as fixed as though they were stations on a railway. The developments which are being made in Mesopotamia will cause the province of Asia to become of great importance, for it is on the line of development, and just a little north of Pergamos in Bithynia that the railroad which joins the East with the West commences.

The prophecies of the Revelation, and indeed of the O.T. Prophets, cluster around Jerusalem and Babylon, and in the closing days immediately preceding the revelation of the Lord the region round about these cities will be the arena of the most awful activities. Indications are not wanting at this moment that this region will be the scene of international contention. The Lord knows that in those days there will be little gatherings of faithful ones under sore pressure who will need the words of this book. To these, primarily, the book of Revelation is addressed. The overcomers are before the mind from first to last. The various subjects revealed in the book are all concerning them. Every epistle in chapters ii. and iii. is urgent in its word, "to him that overcometh" (ho nikon). Chapters iv. and v. bring before us THE true overcomer (nikaõ v. 5). Chapter vi. 1, 2 introduces a view of the false christ, "conquering and to conquer" (nikõn kai hina nikesei), and so on through the book. The overcomers are seen arrayed in white robes, they overcome because of the blood of the lamb, and finally we see them, according to the promise to the church of Laodicea, sitting upon the throne (xx. 4), inheriting the all things of xxi. 7, and having a right to the tree of life (xxii. 14). Just as the nations and their doings are recorded in the O.T. according as they figure in Israel's history, so the Beast, the False Prophet, the plagues, the persecutions, the conflicts in heaven and earth are all described and explained in their relation to the feeble remnant of faithful ones, and written for their encouragement and guidance.

Of course we too can learn much for our blessing. Others also beside these seven churches will receive the blessing and need the exhortation of these epistles, and these seven churches, literal and actual as they are, in their turn do become in this symbolical book representations of the people of God on the earth at the time. This is quite in harmony with the trend of the book, and is not to be confused with the other idea of making the seven churches typify seven phases of Christendom.

Asia is mentioned some fifteen times in the Acts, and was the scene of much spiritual activity. Peter, as we have seen, addressed the dispersion in Asia, and to two cities, Ephesus and Colosse, the apostle Paul addressed epistles from his prison at Rome. It is no wonder then that seven churches in Asia should be addressed as representative assemblies during the period immediately before the Day of the Lord. Events in the near East may demonstrate still more clearly how prominent this corner of the earth is yet to be. When we reach verses 10 and 11 we shall find that these seven churches are in evidence in the future scene of the prophecy, and that the primary interpretation must have these future assemblies in mind.

We will not occupy time with the discussion regarding the historic fact that no church was known at Thyatira during the first few centuries, nor into the many conflicting interpretations which have spiritualized these churches away into the history of Christendom. We believe the reader will value positive exposition, and with the thought of the direct future interpretation of the whole book before us we will leave the remainder of the verse for our next article.

Studies in the Book of the Revelation.
The Salutation (i. 4-6).
pp. 126-130

The book of Revelation, addressed to the seven churches in Asia (and through them to all who are in a similar dispensational position), affords many points of contrast with the message addressed to the seven churches by Paul (and through them to all who are in a similar dispensational position). One such contrast is immediately before us. To the seven assemblies John send salutation and wishes of grace and peace, as do Peter and Paul to the churches addressed by them, but the title given to the Lord in connection with the greetings are of a different character, and should be noted. Paul's invariable salutation to the churches was, "Grace to you and peace from God our Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ" (see Romans to II Thessalonians). The salutation before us is:--

> "Grace to you and peace, from the One who is, and who was, and the coming One; and from the seven Spirits which are before the throne, and from Jesus Christ, the faithful witness, the firstborn of the dead, and the Prince of the kings of the earth."

Before proceeding with the examination of the titles included in this salutation, let us observe the general arrangement of the passage:--

Rev. i. 4-6.

A | a | Grace \ To you.
b | Peace /
B1 | "From" | c | One who is.
d | Was.
e | Coming.
B2 | "From" | f | Seven Spirits.
g | Before the throne.
B3 | "From" | h | Jesus Christ.
i | Faithful Witness (ref. to death).
j | Firstborn from the dead (ref. to resurrection).
h | Who loveth us.
i | And loosed us from our sins by His own blood (ref. to death).
j | And made us a kingdom of priests (in resurrection).
A | a | Glory \ To Him.
b | Might /

One of the most striking and deeply suggestive differences observable in the titles of the epistles of Paul, and in these epistles to the seven churches in Asia, is the use of that of Father. With Paul it is often "O*ur* Father"; with John in the Apocalypse it is NEVER "O*ur* Father."

The references to the Father in Revelation are as follows:--

"Made us a kingdom of priests unto God and HIS Father" (i. 6).
"Even as I received of MY Father" (ii. 27).
"I will confess his name before MY Father" (iii. 5).
"Even as I am set down with MY Father" (iii. 21).
"Having His name and the name of HIS Father" (xiv. 1).

These occurrences, taken together, not only emphasize the different relationship maintained in the Revelation from that of the Church Epistles, but contain a complete line of truth which, while we cannot digress so far as to pursue it for the moment, yet anticipates our future findings by indicating the trend of the teaching as follows:--

The teaching linked with the "Father" in Revelation.

A	i. 6. A kingdom of priests unto God.	"His."
B	ii. 27. Rule. "Even as I."	"My."
C	iii. 5. Confession.	"My."
B	iii. 21. Throne. "Even as I."	"My."
A	xiv. 1. "Firstfruits unto God."	"His."

It will be seen how prominent the throne and the kingdom are in these passages; there is nothing of "Church" truth in them. We are on different ground. This will be the more realized as we examined the titles used.

Ho õn kai en kai ho erchomenos.--At first sight there appears to be something wrong with the grammar of this passage. The preposition apo ('from") governs what is called the genitive case, which is something like our possessive. This rule is observed in the clause, "from the seven spirits" and "from Jesus Christ." In the passage before us, however, the title is in the nominative case. Some manuscripts had inserted the genitive tou after apo ("from"), which makes it read, "from Him, the One who is," &c. While there does not seem sufficient authority for this insertion, that evidently is the meaning.

Possibly the reason why no attempt is made to ease over the departure from ordinary grammatical rules is because the Holy Spirit would have us see in this title the Old Testament name Je*hovah*, which in the Hebrew remains unchanged by any grammatical necessities. The Hebrew name Jehovah is the title of God as viewed in covenant with His people, and from the call of Abraham, His people Israel. Two passages in the O.T. will help us to see the difference between God as such, and God in the relationship of Jehovah. First in the case of Noah and the animals:--

> "And they that went in, went in male and female of all flesh, as God (Elohim) had commanded him: and the Lord (Jehovah) shut him in" (Gen. vii. 16).

Secondly, in the case of Jehoshaphat and the Syrians:-- > "Jehoshaphat cried out, and the Lord (Jehovah) helped him; and God (Elohim) moved them to depart from him" (II Chron. xviii. 31).

In Gen. xxi. 33 Abraham "called upon the name of Jehovah, the everlasting God," or better, the God of the age. If the reader will turn up the occurrences of olam (translated "for ever" and "everlasting" in Genesis) he will see that the conception of eternity is beside the mark (Gen. ix. 16; xiii. 15; xvii. 8, 13, 19; xxi. 33; xlviii. 4, and xlix. 26). The first reference is to the covenant made between God and every living creature on the earth. The last has reference to the superior blessing given by Jacob to Joseph. The others refer to the covenant made by God relative to the land of Canaan, and the covenant of circumcision. Every reference is limited to the earth, and to purposes and promises pertaining to the earth. Jehovah is the title of God in covenant, the G*od of the age*, against whom Satan as the god of this age is in direct opposition.

The name Jehovah is used in combination with ten other words, forming titles which are expressive of his peculiar relationship with Israel:--

JEHOVAH-JIREH = The Lord will provide (Gen. xxii. 14).
The provision of redemption.
JEHOVAH-ROPHEKA = The Lord that healeth thee (Exod. xv. 26).
The application of redemption.
JEHOVAH-NISSI = The Lord my banner (Exod. xvii. 15). Warfare.
JEHOVAH-MEKADDISHKEM = The Lord that doth sanctify you (Exod. xxxi. 13).
Worship.
JEHOVAH-SHALOM = The Lord (send) peace (Judges vi. 24). Overthrow of Baal.
JEHOVAH-ZEBAOTH = The Lord of Hosts (I Sam. i. 3).
Continually used by Prophets of restoration, e.g. Zechariah.
JEHOVAH-TSIDKENU = The Lord our righteousness (Jer. xxiii. 6; xxxiii. 16).
Under the new covenant.
JEHOVAH-ELYON = The Lord most High (Psa. vii. 17; xlvii. 2; xcvii. 9).
Above mere nations and gods.
JEHOVAH-ROHI = The Lord my Shepherd (Psa. xxiii. 1).
Israel are the sheep of His pasture.
JEHOVAH-SHAMMAH = The Lord is there (Ezek. xlviii. 35).
The ultimate blessing of Jerusalem.

All the promises and purposes covered by these many variations or appendages to the name of the covenant-keeping God of the age find their complete fulfilment in the Revelation. The title "Who is, was, and is coming" may be looked upon as the Greek equivalent to the Hebrew Jehovah. The Targum of Jonathan, on Deut. xxxii. 39 reads, "Ego ille qui est et qui fuit et qui erit. . . .Et ipse fuit, et ipse est, et ipse erit." This title, in varied order of its parts, occurs four times in the Revelation.

In i. 4, 8, "Who is, and was, and is coming." The hope of His people.
In iv. 8, "Was, and is, and is coming." The hope of creation.
In xi. 17, "Who art, and wast." The kingdom set up.

The words "is to come" are omitted from the third reference by R.V and all critical editions. The promise of the coming is fulfilled in Rev. xi. by the taking of the great power and reigning of the Lord. There is more than a superficial reference back to Exod. iii. 14, 15:--

> "And God said, I AM THAT I AM: and He said, Thus shalt thou say unto the children of Israel, I AM hath sent me unto you. . . . Thus shalt thou say unto the children of Israel, The Lord God of your fathers, the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob, hath sent me unto you: this is My Name unto the age, and this is My memorial unto all generations."

This title, which resembles one part of the full title Jehovah, is revealed at the commencement of the deliverance from Egypt. This was the first covenant. Here was redemption by blood, and the overthrow of Pharaoh accompanied by many awful plagues and miraculous preservation. Antichrist and the False Prophet take the place of Pharaoh and his magicians, the two witnesses fill the office of Moses and Aaron, the blood of Christ our Passover is the blood of the new covenant, which new covenant both Jer. xxxi. 31-40 and Matt. xxvi. 28 link with the Passover. What the deliverance of Israel from Egypt was in type, the deliverance under the new covenant in the Revelation will be in actuality. The fearful judgments of Exodus foreshadowed the great and dreadful day of the Lord (cf. Rev. i. 10), which day is linked with the purpose and view point of the whole of this prophecy.

Sufficient we feel has been said to show how very different is the relationship indicated by the titles of the passage under notice to those which describe the relationship of the Lord with the church of the mystery. We leave the remaining titles for a further article.

Studies in the Book of the Revelation.
"The Seven Spirits." (i. 4).
pp. 142-146

Passing from the "seven churches" we pause to consider the "seven spirits." Much has been written on the meaning of these seven spirits. Some believe that they represent God Himself, Who is perfect Spirit; some believe that they represent the Holy Spirit, and at first sight the position which they occupy certainly justifies a careful consideration of the Word before we place created beings in the sphere of the divine benediction. The sevenfold spiritual endowment of Isa. xi. 2 has been brought forward to show that the Holy Spirit is intended. It is worthy of remark that in all the salutations and benedictions written by the apostle Paul, the Holy Spirit is only included once (II Cor. xiii. 14). If we will turn to the structure, page 107, we shall be at once struck with the way in which the first and last members help one another in the matter of interpretation. We put them together:--

A | i. 4. The seven assemblies and seven spirits.
A | i. 20. The seven assemblies and seven angels.

This is at least a suggestive variation, and puts forward the third interpretation to view, that these seven spirits are the presence angels. First notice where they are. "The seven spirits which are before His throne." These are mentioned again in Rev. iv. 5, "There were seven lamps of fire burning before the throne, which are the seven spirits of God." In Rev. viii. 2 we read, "And I saw the seven angels which stood before God." The use of the article, "THE SEVEN angels," implies that they are either well known or have been mentioned before.

Heb. i. 14 is a clear indication that angels are called "spirits," and the "seven lamps" of Rev. iv. 5 seem to have some connection with the description given of the living creatures of Ezek. i. 13, "their appearance was like the appearance of lamps." In Rev. i. the structure brings together the seven spirits, the seven stars, and the seven angels. In Rev. iii. 1 without any structural arrangement we read:--

> "These things saith He that hath the seven spirits of God, and the seven stars."

Further, in Rev. v. 6 we read:--

> "And I beheld, and lo, in the midst of the throne and of the four living creatures, and in the midst of the elders, stood a Lamb as it had been slain, having seven horns and seven eyes, which are the seven spirits of God sent forth into all the earth."

The reader will remember that we urged a careful reading of the Minor Prophets as a preparation for the imagery of the Revelation. This verse is a case in point. To those who have a good knowledge of the prophecy of Zechariah this passage will speak very plainly:--

> "For behold the stone which I have laid before Joshua; upon one stone (i.e. fixed upon, see Deut. xi. 12, 'the Land,' I Kings ix. 3, 'the House') shall be seven eyes" (Zech. iii. 9).

In Zech. iv. 2 we read of "the seven lamps," and in iv. 10:--

> "They shall rejoice, and shall see the plummet in the hand of Zerubbabel, these seven (lamps which thou sawest, iv. 2), these are the eyes of the Lord, which run to and fro through the whole earth."

While the seven eyes which are the seven spirits of the Lord run to and fro in the earth, other messengers which figure in the Revelation occur in Zechariah, and are said to "walk to and fro in the earth." There are the chariots and horsemen of i. 8-11 and vi. 1-7. These charioteers are said to be "the four spirits of the heavens." Thus we have seven spirits and four spirits. In Rev. vi. we read of these chariots, and in vii. 1 we read of the four angels standing on the four corners of the earth. The seven are said to run, and the four are said to walk to and fro in the earth. Ezekiel i. describes the wonderful living creatures which he saw, afterwards defined as the cherubim, which chapter should be read by the student. Angelic ministry is very prominent in the record of God's dealings with Israel:--

"The angel which redeemed me from all evils bless the lads" (Gen. xlviii. 16).
"Behold I send an angel before thee" (Exod. xxiii. 20, so xxxii. 34 and xxxiii. 2).
"Blessed be the God of Shadrach, Meshach and Abednego, Who hath sent His angel, and delivered His servants that trusted in Him" (Dan. iii. 28).
"My God hath sent His angel and hath shut the lions' mouths" (Dan. vi. 22).
"The angel of His presence saved them" (Isa. lxiii. 9).
"The angels of the Lord by night opened the prison doors" (Acts v. 19).
"There stood by me this night the angel of God" (Acts xxvii. 23).

Scripture testifies to the great number of angels that there are waiting to do the Lord's bidding:--

"The chariots of the Lord are twice ten thousand thousand, even thousands upon thousands" (Psalm lxviii. 17).
"The heavenly Jerusalem, to an innumerable company of angels" (Heb. xii. 22).
"Behold the Lord cometh with His holy myriads" (Jude 14).
"I heard the voice of many angels. . . . the number of them was ten thousand times ten thousand, and thousands of thousands" (Rev. v. 11).
"Thousands thousands ministered unto Him, and ten thousand times ten thousand stood before Him" (Dan. vii. 10).

At the giving of the law angels had an active part:--

"The word spoken by angels" (Heb. ii. 2).
"Who hath received the law by the disposition of angels" (Acts vii. 53).
"The law. . . . was ordained by angels in the hand of a mediator" (Gal. iii. 19).

Angels are prominent in the second coming of Christ (see Matt. xxiv. 30, 31; xiii. 39-41; I Thess. iv. 16; II Thess. i. 7). That angels are connected with the nations seems to be made known to us in the book of Daniel. In Dan. x. 5-13, 20, 21, under the title of princes we have, if we are not mistaken, angelic beings over the affaires of the nations. The prince of Persia and of Greece are unnamed, but by withstanding Michael seem to imply that they are the angels of Satan, who, watching over his interests in the development of the Gentiles power under the successive monarchies of Babylon, Persia, and Greece, finally assumes the kingdoms and the glory of this world as shown in Luke iv. Dan. xii. 1 speaks of Michael as "the great prince that standeth for the children of thy people."

The four winds (Rev. vii. 1, 2), fire (xiv. 10), waters (xvi. 5), and the sun (xix. 17) are at different times under their power. An angel is used to reveal the word of the Lord to Zechariah (chapters i.-vi.) in much the same manner that the angel "signifies" to John the Apocalypse. The word "angel" occurs in the R*evelation* over 70 times, in Hebrews 13 times, in the four Gospels and the Acts over 70 times, in Peter's Epistles 4 times, in Paul's Epistles, apart from Hebrews, 14 times, of which number one occurrence only is found in the Prison Epistles, and that one a negative statement (Col. ii. 18). These facts alone will help us to see the close connection which the Revelation and its angelic ministry has with kingdom purposes.

In I Tim. v. 21 Paul says, "I charge thee before God, and the Lord Jesus Christ, and the elect angels." This is closely parallel with Rev. i. 4, 5. While we would not say that the seven spirits are the angels of the seven churches, Rev. i. 20 and iii. 1 help us to see some connection between them. The teaching of Scripture as to the ministry of angels will prevent us from taking the seven references to the angels of the churches to mean some office in the church or synagogue. Angel means angel in its ordinary sense throughout this book. Angelic ministry follows Israel from the nation's beginning up to the nation's end (for a time) at the close of the Acts. Angelic ministry, like supernatural gifts, ceases with the national existence of Israel, but revives when the time for Israel's national restoration approaches. Our limited knowledge prevents us from saying that the seven spirits before the throne, the seven angels of the churches, of the trumpets, of the vials, and the elect angels are all the same, but the contemplation of the picture of the mighty spiritual myriads, ever doing the Lord's service, as revealed in the Scriptures, should cause us to glorify Him Who is raised far above all principality and power, angels and principalities and powers being made subject unto Him.

In our next article we shall endeavour to draw the reader's attention to some of the glories of the Lord Jesus Christ as set forth in the verses following.

Studies in the Book of the Revelation.
The person and titles of Christ (i. 5, 6).
pp. 181-184

We pass from the seven spirits which are before the throne to the contemplation of the person and titles of the Lord Jesus Christ. The best manuscripts omit the title Christ in several of the passages where the A.V. reads J*esus Christ*, and the evidence seems sufficient to prove that in i. 5 we meet with the title for the last time, unless we include the last verse of chapter xxii. Omitting this last verse, for it does not really come under this heading, the title Jesus Christ occurs but thrice, viz., i. 1, 2, and 5. The almost exclusively Pauline title Christ Jesus never occurs in the Revelation.

The first title that follows is, "the faithful witness." The order of the words in the original gives the emphasis to the word faithful, "The witness, the faithful one." In Rev. ii. 13 the A.V. translates the same words, "My faithful martyr." This is corrected in the R.V., but it is well to remember that true witnessing carries with it incipient martyrdom. Every witness may not necessarily die a martyr's death, but if faithful to his trust he will be willing thus to die rather than surrender truth. Such a witness was the Lord Jesus Christ while on earth. Such was He when from heaven He spoke to John. The faithfulness of this testimony is emphasized in the Revelation. In iii. 14 the Lord is spoken of as "The faithful and true witness." In xix. 11 He is called, "faithful and True," while in xxi. 5 and xxii. 6 faithfulness and truth are predicated of the words and sayings of this book. When the Lord stood before Pilate He linked His kingship with His testimony to truth:--

> "Thou sayest that I am a king. To this end was I born, and for this cause came I into the world, that I should bear witness unto the truth" (John xviii. 37).

The next title, "The first begotten of the dead," calls our praiseful attention of His glories. The word translated first begotten occurs nine times in the N.T. One reference (Heb. xi. 28) speaks of the Egyptians, leaving eight, the number of resurrection, for those that speak of Christ and His people. The word is used of Christ in connection with three different periods:--

(1) With reference to CREATION (Col. i. 15).
(2) With reference to HIS BIRTH at Bethlehem (Matt. i. 25; Luke ii. 7).
(3) With reference to HIS RESURRECTION (Col. i. 18; Heb. i. 6; Rev. i. 5).

It is also used in its secondary meaning (apparently) in Rom. viii. 29, where His pre-eminence is the thought more than birth or resurrection. A reference to Col. 1. 15-18 will show that this title carries with it power and authority. Heb. i. 6 shows that authority to be divine, "When He again bringeth in the first-begotten into the world He saith, And let all the angels of God worship Him." We often overlook the fact that the Lord Jesus Christ Himself could not become king to Israel apart from resurrection. Psa. ii., and its N.T. quotations, apart from many other Scriptures which testify of the glories that were to follow the sufferings of the Lord, will prove this. As the risen One He claimed all power in heaven and in earth. In the Revelation we see Him putting forth that mighty power which is not retraced until the new heavens and the new earth need that rule no longer. The next title, "The prince of the kings of the earth," leads us to Psa. lxxxix. There we find the three titles of Rev. i. 5 together:--

> "I will also make Him MY FIRSTBORN, higher than the KINGS OF THE EARTH. . . . His throne. . . . shall be established. . . . as a FAITHFUL WITNESS in heaven" (verses 27, 36, and 37).

Psa. lxxxix. and the Book of Revelation have truth in common. The former speaks of the covenant made with David with respect to his throne and his Seed. It is to David in the first sense that the above quotations apply. "I have found David my servant." Concerning this one we read, "Thou hast profaned his crown, casting it to the ground," and again, "and cast his throne down to the ground" (verses 39 and 44). David's hopes were in his greater Son. Acts ii. 25-36 declares that David understood that the promises concerning "the fruit of his loins" necessitated resurrection, "He seeing this before spake of the resurrection of Christ." "The last words of David" (II Sam. xxiii. 1-7) speak of the righteous rule of his greater Son. "He that ruleth over men must be just, ruling in the fear of God." David knew that he, personally, had not fulfilled the requirements of the ideal ruler, but he knew that God's covenant made it certain that One, the Son of David, was going to fulfil them. Rev. i. 5 presents us with One who should rule and reign in righteousness. One of the prophecies He will fulfil is, "His throne shall be. . . . as a faithful witness in the heavens." Three times is David mentioned in the Revelation, each time with reference to Christ. In Rev. iii. 7 Christ is seen as the true Eliakim (God shall cause him to rise), the One who bears the key of David upon His shoulder. Who shall be for a "glorious throne to his fathe's house" (Isa. xxii. 15-25). In v. 5 He is seen as "the lion of the tribe of Judah, the Root of David" prevailing to open the seven sealed book. In xxii. 16 He is once again presented as the "Root and the Offspring of David." The kings of the earth over whom the Lord is Prince figure repeatedly in prophecy (cf. Psa. ii. 2; cii. 15; cxxxviii. 4; cxlviii. 11; Rev. vi. 15; xvii. 2, 18; xviii. 3, 9; xix. 19; xxi. 24).

From these passages it will be seen that some of the kings of the earth are among the enemies of the Lord, while others rejoice with His people in His glory. In Rev. i. 5 the Lord is spoken of as Prince of the kings of the earth. In xix. 16 He is seen as King of kings. Isaiah speaks of Him as the "Prince of peace." Daniel calls Him the "Prince of princes." In the Acts He is spoken of as the "Prince of life," and as a "Prince and a Saviour," which is in strong contrast to the “prince of this world.” One of the reasons why this title comes in Rev. i. will be found in Hos. iii. 4, "The children of Israel shall abide many days without a king and without a prince." The days of their long rejection draw to a close, and the title given to the Lord indicates that the nation of Israel is again to come into relationship with God. The word prince (archõn) is linked with the title, "The beginning" (archee, Col. i. 18), and indicates that the Person thus titled is First, pre-eminent. The word is also translated R*uler*. How grateful we should be to know that the kings of the earth are to have a Ruler. How the whole world is crying out for one. So great will be the felt need of a Ruler that the kings of the earth will hail the advent of the Anti-Christ with approbation. Dark apostasy lies between our day and the righteous reign of the Prince of peace, but we rejoice in the testimony of the Revelation that a day is coming when He shall take unto Him His great power and reign. The Lord be praised for the promise of the Day Star. May we, too, be found "looking for a Saviour."

The Biblical Manuscripts.
pp. 37-39

In our last issue we gave an outline of subjects of biblical interest which are to be found in The British Museum. We propose to consider some of these wonderful witnesses, and trust that when the series is complete it will constitute a real help to all who believe and love the Word of God.

Manuscripts Saloon.

The MSS. which are of the most importance to us are:

Hebrew Manuscript of Pentateuch.—This fine specimen is probably the oldest Hebrew MS. of any substantial part of the Old Testament now in existence, having been written in the ninth century. It will be noticed that there are three columns of large writing (which is the text itself), and that in the margins are words written in smaller characters. This smaller writing is a part of what is known as "The Massorah."

A word or two concerning the Massorah may be of service to the reader. The earliest direct evidence as to the text of the Hebrew Scriptures is found in the TARGUMS, or paraphrases of Scripture into the Aramaic dialect. Another source of literary criticism is found in the TALMUD. The Talmud differs from the Targums in that while the Targums simply paraphrased the Hebrew text, the Talmud explained and commented upon it. The period of the Talmudists extends from A.D. 270-500. Following these came the MASSORETES. The work of the Massoretes was to sift out from the accumulated mass of tradition and exposition written in the Talmud all that pertained to the Hebrew text. They practically edited the Old Testament. To the Massoretes we owe the present system of vowel pointing and accentuation. They tabulated the number of occurrences of every letter and word. It is interesting to note that "M" occurs 77,778 times. They enumerated the verses which contain the whole, or nearly the whole alphabet. They were scrupulous to the degree of superstition relative to the literary purity of the text. Nothing was altered by them, but when they found evidence for what appeared to be a superior reading, they used signs to indicate k'ri ("read") and k'thib ("written"), meaning that although they allowed a word to remain "written" the margin indicated how it must be "read." No one MS. contains the whole Massorah, but most important copies contain portions of it. An abridgement was necessary in order to conveniently place the notes in the margin, and this abridgement was called M*asora parva*, the little Massorah; this being found too short, a fuller abridgement was prepared called M*asora magna*, the great Massorah. The specimen contains both, the little Massorah being written in the margin a little left of the columns, the great Massorah being written at the top and bottom of the page.

A volume of the CODEX ALEXANDRINUS*, a MS. of the Bible i Greek, written in Uncial letters on very thin vellum in the fifth century*.—This is one of the three earliest and most important MSS. of the Scriptures containing both the Old and New Testaments. It includes the four books of the Maccabees and the Epistles of Clement of Rome. There are evidences that the text has been corrected by several different hands. The MS. is usually indicated by the letter A.

Above this MS. are two photographs of pages from the CODEX SINAITICUS, indicated in books dealing with the manuscripts by the Hebrew letter aleph, and the CODEX VATICANUS, indicated by the letter B. The Sinaiticus was discovered at the monastery of St. Catherine at Mount Sinai by Constantine Tischendorf in 1844, who rescued forty-three pages of this precious MS. from the fuel box of the monastery. The VATICANUS contains the whole Bible in Greek, written in the fourth century. As its name indicates, it is in the great Vatican Library at Rome.

A PALIMPSEST manuscript containing portions of the Gospel according to Luke, in Greek, in large Uncials of the sixth century.—This Greek has been partially effaced, and at the right angles to it there has been written right across it a treatise in Syriac. These palimpsest manuscripts present considerable difficulty to those engaged in translation and collation of the text.

The Peshitto (or "simple") Syriac version.—The Old Testament was translated into Syriac about the second or third century after Christ, the copy in The British Museum is a copy made in the year 464; it is the oldest dated copy of the Bible in existence. It is interesting to look upon the writing of this MS., as it presents, with just a few dialetic differences, the language spoken by our Lord and His disciples (known as Aramaic).

Buddhist Room.

In this case will be found a collection of great interest to the Bible student. Here may be seen the scroll of the law, with its breastplate, pointer and mantle. The Rabbis teach that it is obligatory for every Israelite to write the Pentateuch, and Deut. xxxi. 19 is interpreted to mean the five books of Moses. For public use the law must be written in black square characters, on the skin of a clean animal. Every line must contain 30 letters, nothing must be written from memory, but every word must be pronounced distinctly before writing. To this scrupulous care we owe, under God, the purity of the Hebrew Text (see page 37 hereof for "M*assorah*").

The phylacteries (tephilin) spoken of in Matt. xxiii. 5, which the scribes and pharisees "made broad," were worn in literal obedience to Ex. xiii. 9 and Deut. vi. 8. These are made of black calf skin, one containing four compartments in which are quotations from Ex. xii. 1-16 and Deut. vi. 4, 9, and are worn, one on the forehead, and one upon the left arm during prayer. Elaborate instructions are given for the proper winding of the leather thongs around the arm and head, and the appropriate prayers to be recited during the performance. Rabbi Hana says on Ex. xxiii. 23, "I will take away My hand and thou shall see My back parts," that this proves that God revealed to Moses the proper way to knot the phylacteries, and that this proves that the Eternal Himself wears them! To think that the revelation of all the Lord's goodness, as revealed to Moses, should be passed over for such trivialities! Rabbi Abba Benjamin proves that the Lord Himself wears the phylacteries by Isa. lxii. 8, "His right hand," and Deut. xxxiii. 2. According to the teaching of the Scribes, "He who has tephilin on his head and arm, and tsitsith on his garments, and the mezuzah on his door, has every possible guarantee that He will not sin"! what blind leaders of the blind, and into what a ditch of formalism they fell!

Here also is the talith or prayer shawl referred to in a spiritual sense in II Cor. iii. 15. The shawl worn over the head signified to the apostle the veil over the heart. The Hebrew name tististh (or "fringes") takes us back to Num. xv. 38 and Matt. ix. 20. At the corner of the shawl is a knotted cord of eight strands made of white wool. Five knots and eight strands represent the number 13, which is the great factor in the name of God. JJehovah = 26 (13 X 2), echad = 13, Jehovah is one. The numerical value of the word tsitsith is 600, which added to 13 gives the number of precepts of the law framed by Moses Maimonides. The directions for winding this cord are rather elaborate, savouring of a fetish or a charm. First the cord is wound seven times and fastened with a double knot, then eight times with a double knot, then thirteen times with a knot. The five knots represent the Pentateuch. The great rabbi Rashi says, "The first and great commandment of the law is about the fringes"! When this statement is weighed over against the words of the Lord Jesus in answer to the question, "Which is the first and great commandment in the law?" the essential difference between the petty ritual of the scribes and the glorious fulness of the teaching of the Lord is felt.

The mezuzah is a box containing portions of the law (Deut. vi. 4-9 and xi. 13-21) written in twenty-two lines, and fixed in a slanting position to the door post. The lower part to be a hand breadth from the outer edge of the post. It is obligatory for every resident. Pious Jews touch it upon leaving or entering the house and pray that they may be kept in their going out and their coming in. Other objects of interest, together with those detailed above, are depicted upon the picture accompanying this issue. Every article there shown was painted by the Editor from his own drawings made from the actual objects. Nothing is imaginary.

Deut.	31	19	Now therefore write ye this song for you, and teach it the children of Israel: put it in their mouths, that this song may be a witness for me against the children of Israel.

Matt.	23	5	But all their works they do for to be seen of men: they make broad their phylacteries, and enlarge the borders of their garments,

Ex.	13	9	And it shall be for a sign unto thee upon thine hand, and for a memorial between thine eyes, that the Lord's law may be in thy mouth: for with a strong hand hath the Lord brought thee out of Egypt.
Deut.	6	8	And thou shalt bind them for a sign upon thine hand, and they shall be as frontlets between thine eyes.

II Cor.	3	15	But even unto this day, when Moses is read, the veil is upon their heart.

Numb.	15	38	Speak unto the children of Israel, and bid them that they make them fringes in the borders of their garments throughout their generations, and that they put upon the fringe of each border a cord of blue:
Matt.	9	20	And behold, a woman, who had an issue of blood twelve years, came behind him, and touched the border of his garment:

Deut.	6	4. Hear, O Israel: Jehovah our God is one Jehovah: 5. and thou shalt love Jehovah thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy might. 6. And these words, which I command thee this day, shall be upon thy heart; 7. And thou shalt teach them diligently unto thy children, and shalt talk of them when thou sittest in thy house, and when thou walkest by the way, and when thou liest down, and when thou risest up. 8. And thou shalt bind them for a sign upon thy hand, and they shall be for frontlets between thine eyes. 9. And thou shalt write them upon the door-posts of thy house, and upon thy gates.
	11	13. And it shall come to pass, if ye shall hearken diligently unto my commandments which I command you this day, to love Jehovah your God, and to serve him with all your heart and with all your soul, 14. that I will give the rain of your land in its season, the former rain and the latter rain, that thou mayest gather in thy grain, and thy new wine, and thine oil. 15. And I will give grass in thy fields for thy cattle, and thou shalt eat and be full. 16. Take heed to yourselves, lest your heart be deceived, and ye turn aside, and serve other gods, and worship them; 17. and the anger of Jehovah be kindled against you, and he shut up the heavens, so that there shall be no rain, and the land shall not yield its fruit; and ye perish quickly from off the good land which Jehovah giveth you. 18. Therefore shall ye lay up these my words in your heart and in your soul; and ye shall bind them for a sign upon your hand, and they shall be for frontlets between your eyes. 19. And ye shall teach them your children, talking of them, when thou sittest in thy house, and when thou walkest by the way, and when thou liest down, and when thou risest up. 20. And thou shalt write them upon the door-posts of thy house, and upon thy gates; 21. that your days may be multiplied, and the days of your children, in the land which Jehovah sware unto your fathers to give them, as the days of the heavens above the earth.

The Cuneiform Writing.

The Babylonian and Assyrian Room.

Here awaiting our inspection are the relics of antiquity, taking us back to the times of the books of Nehemiah, Daniel, Jeremiah, the Kings, and Genesis. Here are the authentic and original records of such Bible characters as Nebuchadnezzar, Sennacherib, Cyrus, Darius and Merodach-Baladan. Here we may read the actual names of such as Belshazzar, Hezekiah, and Omri. Here are references to Babylon, Ur of the Chaldees, Jerusalem, and Susa (Shusan). Surrounding us are records of kings, armies, statesmen, commerce, religion, and art. The relics consist of rock inscriptions, inscriptions on temple walls, tombs, monoliths, obelisks, pavement slabs, bricks, foundation stones, boundary stones, seals, tablets, laws engraved upon stone, and a real tangible "Ebenezer." Surely such a resumé should evoke from every believer a note of praise to God for such a demonstration in these days of the veracity and absolute trustworthiness of His inspired Word.

Before examining the objects of interest, the reader may value a word or two relative to the strange language which everywhere presents itself to the eye. The Assyrian writing known as Cuneiform (or "wedge-shaped" writing), was not invented by the Assyrians; they only adopted and adapted the style of writing from their predecessors, the Accadians. The Accadians did not use an alphabet, but a system of heiroglyphics. Consequently, when the Assyrians adopted the signs already in use, these signs became possessed of a bewildering variety of powers and pronunciations.

Perhaps a simple illustration will help the mind. An Englishman looking at the figure 5 pronounces the sign "five," while a Frenchman looks at it and says "cinq," so the same sign has two distinct sound values, although the same meaning. Now if these sound values be used alphabetically, irrespective of their original meaning, in some words the "f" sound will be intended, in others the "c" sound, just as the word is English or French in origin. Take another example from our own language. We write viz. and call it "namely," we put i.e. and call it "that is." To us it presents no difficulty, but imagine a Chinaman endeavouring to find out how the three letters v i z could by any system of juggling be pronounced "namely," and you will appreciate the problem and the key to the Assyrian language. The key to the English examples are, (1) the desire to abbreviate, and (2) the use of a dead language. This is precisely the case with the Assyrian. This is a crude attempt to illustrate the reason of the difficulty met with by the decipherers and translators.

Assyrian presents to the enquirer some four or five hundred distinct characters, each of them possessing more than one value. The Assyrians themselves felt the difficulty, and their Scribes drew up tables of words giving the Accadian and Assyrian word meanings and signs, which by the providence of God are in our possession to-day. When the inexperienced observer is told that certain curious shapes originally represented certain objects, the likeness is so far removed that he is at first inclined to be sceptical. The fact that writing was done in such material as clay accounts for this departure and conventional treatment. We give as an example the transition of the word "sun," showing its modification both by reason of the nature of the material (clay), and the gradual transition from the simple reference to the sun itself to that which is more remotely connected with it – the month.

If the reader will attempt to draw a circle quickly in clay, he will appreciate the straight lined suggestion of figure "b." The sign for a month (figure "d") is simply the numeral 30 placed within the sign of the sun, indicating the fact that there are 30 suns, or days, in a month.

A comparison of Egyptian with Babylonian heiroglyphics is suggestive both of the different temperaments exhibited, and of the environments which suggested the signs.

One of the most important items of interest to the Bible student is the fact that Assyrian is a Semitic tongue. Many obscure words have been illumined by the Hebrew, and also some Hebrew words have received fresh power by the usage of its parallel in the Assyrian inscriptions. The Semitic inhabitants of Babylonia are called Casdim in the Old Testament, and Prof. Sayce connects this with the Assyrian Casadu, "to Possess" or "conquer," the word conveying the historic note that the Casdim were the Assyrian conquerors. W. St. Chad Boscawen, F.R.H.S., gives some interesting lists of linguistic affinities between Assyrian and Hebrew, from which we cull a few examples:--

ASSYRIAN.	HEBREW.	MEANING.
Resu	Resh	Head
Kakkadu	Kodkod	Head
Panu	Panim	Face
Libbu	Leb	Heart
Pu	Peh	Mouth
Samamu	Shamayim	Heaven
Irtsitu	Erets	Earth
Naru	Nahar	River
Tiamtu	Tehom	Sea
Samas	Shemesh	Sun
Yumu	Yom	Day
Abnu	Eben	Stone

With this brief note upon the language which is so prominent in this section of the Museum, the reader should note the BEHISTUN INSCRIPTIONS. The Behistun Inscriptions figure largely in the history of the decipherment of this strange language. The inscriptions were written in three languages, viz., Persian, Scythic (Median), and Babylonian (cf. the inscription over the Cross in Hebrew, Greek, and Latin). This threefold inscription shows the transition and simplification of the cuneiform writing very well. The Babylonian column uses five hundred symbols, ideograms, phonograms, and homophones; the Medic column is written in ninety-six pure syllabic signs; while the Persian gives us the same history with thirty-six alphabetic signs, retaining only a few of the primitive ideograms. Ideograms remain with us in English to-day. Certain parts of the body were and still are standards of measurement. The hand, foot, bosom (Anglo-Saxon foethem, i.e., "fathom," the distance between both arms extended); the digits i., ii., iii., iiii. (latin digitus "a finger") and v., a representation of the closed fingers and extended thumb, will suffice to illustrate this fact.

After great labour, by the good hand of God, the Persian inscription was found to contain 42 characters, and that one recurring word at the beginning of each inscription stood for the title "King." In 1802 a student named Grotefend succeeded in deciphering the names of Hystaspes, Darius, and Xerxes. Sir Henry Rawlinson in 1837 succeeded in drawing up a working alphabet of the Persian cuneiform characters. He took as his text two short inscriptions identical throughout with the exception of two groups of signs in each. These groups he conjectured contained the names of the Kings, and possibly the King's father. It was further noticed that the (supposed) father in one inscription was the (supposed) King in the other. History provided the names of the Kings of the period under consideration, and upon examination the names Darius, Hystaspes and Xerxes were indicated. The discovery of the Syllabaries and Grammars at Nineveh, and the discovered affinity between Assyrian and Hebrew, were instrumental in the unlocking of these records of Babylonian and Assyrian history. With this brief summary we must conclude, but shall consider in detail some of the monumental evidences in our next article.

Nebuchadnezzar.
pp. 103-105

The Babylonian and Assyrian Room.

The strange signs at the head of this article represent the name of one of the greatest monarchs in the world's history, Nebuchadnezzar II.

The Assyrian and Babylonian Room contains objects of interest from the times of ancient Assyria down to Belshazzar, the last of the Babylonian kingdom. It will be seen, therefore, that in directing attention to Nebuchadnezzar we are not following the chronological order of the specimens. To do so would involve a much more careful investigation than it is our purpose to follow in this series of articles. We intend to touch lightly on these deep subjects, hoping thereby to provide a species of healthy recreation in these by-paths of scriptural research. Babylon comes early in the history of the nations, as recorded in the book of Genesis, but of the old Babylonian Empire very little is known. The Scriptures tell us that Nimrod was the founder of Babylon:--

> "The beginning of his kingdom was Babel, and Erech, and Accad, and Calneh, in the land of Shinar. Out of that land (he) went forth (into) Asshur, and builded Nineveh, and the city boulevards, and Calab, and Resen between Nineveh and Calab, the same is a great city" (Gen. x. 10-12).

Rebellion saw the foundation of Babel, rebellion saw its overthrow under the reign of Belshazzar, and rebellion will be its work at the end (see Revelation). At some subsequent period the Semites (descendants of Shem) invaded the territory, and settled in Ur, Nippur, and other cities.

The earliest historical king is Sargon of Agade. Later on a Semitic king named Khammuribi (identified with the Amraphel, king of Shinar, of Gen. xiv.) made his power felt. About B.C. 1800 Babylonia was invaded by the Cassites. The Semitic emigration northwards to Assyria already commenced was increased under the oppression of the Cassites, and about B.C. 1700 the northern portion of the empire asserted its independence, and Assyria became an independent kingdom. Gradually the Assyrian power ascended and the Babylonian waned, until about B.C. 1275 Tukuli Adar I., king of Assyria, effected the conquest of Babylonia. A succession of kings, some figuring in Israel's history like Shalmanezer II., Tiglath Pileser III. (Pul, king of Assyria, II Kings xv. 19), and Sennacherib carry on Assyria's eventful history, until after reaching a most dazzling pitch under Ashur-bani-pal Nineveh was besieged by the combined forces of Cyaxares of Media, and of Nabopolassar (an Assyrian general holding a command in Babylonia), captured and destroyed, and the empire divided among its conquerors. Babylonia and some other territory fell to the share of Nabopolassar who founded the New Babylonian Empire. This new empire was destined to have a brilliant but brief existence. It lasted seventy years, the time strangely enough of Israel's captivity, and fell under the stroke of God by the instrumentality of Cyrus.

Turning now to Wall Cases, we shall see a collection of bricks bearing the name and titles of Nebuchadnezzar. On some of them may still be seen traces of bitumen (the "slime for mortar" of Gen. xi. 3). This is clearly seen on brick No. 165. No. 90,851 is a bronze step from the lower part of a flight of steps in the ancient temple of Ezida at Borsippa. The name and title of Nebuchadnezzar are inscribed on the edge. Nebuchadnezzar has left us some remarkable accounts of his great architectural activities, and the following quotations from the translation of Rev. C. T. Ball will throw a great deal of light upon the mind and works of the great king:--

> "Nebuchadnezzar, King of Babylon, the prince exalted, the favourite of Merodach, the pontiff supreme, the darling of Nebo, the mild, the possessor of wisdom, who the way of their godhead seeketh after, who hath feared their lordship, the ruler unwearied who for the maintenance of Esagilla and Ezida (see the bronze door step) daily is careful, and the weal of Babylon and Borsippa seeketh after steadfastly, the wise, the prayerful. . . . the princely son of Nabopolassar, King of Babylon, am I."

> "Silver, gold, glitter of precious stones, bronze, sycamore wood, cedar wood, what thing soever's name is precious, a large abundance, the produce of mountains, the fulness of seas, a rich present, a splendid gift to my city of Babylon, into his presence I bore. . . . The gate of Hilibu, the gate of gladness, and the gate of Egida (see above) (and) Esagilla, I had them made brilliant as the sun. . . . the choicest of my cedars which from Lebanon the noble forest I brought, for the roofing of Ekua, the sanctuary of his lordship I selected. . . . for the making of Esagilla daily I besought the King of the gods, the lord of lords."

Table Case G. contains several barrel-shaped cylinders which record some of the wonderful building operations of this remarkable man. The completion of the great wall and of the moat of Babylon are minutely described. We give a few extracts, which, together with the records of the magnificent temple and palaces, may help us to understand Nebuchadnezzar's pride of heart when he said:--

> "Is not this great Babylon, that I have built for the house of the kingdom by the might of my power, and for the honour of my majesty?" (Dan. iv. 30).

> "Imbugel and Nimittibel, the great rampart of Babylon, which Nabopolassar, King of Babylon, the father that begat me, had made and not finished the work of them; whose moat he had dug, and two strong entrenchments with gypsum and much brick had constructed along its border. . . . the ramparts of Babylon, I finished. . . . that shaft of battle to Imbugel, the wall of Babylon, might not reach, what no King before me had done; for four thousand cubits of ground on the banks of Babylon, from afar, unapproached, a mighty rampart at the ford of the sun-rising, Babylon, I threw around. Its moat I dug, and the bank of it with bitumen and brick I bound together, and a mighty rampart on the marge of it mountain high I built. . . . that foes might not present the face, the bounds of Babylon might not approach, great water like the volume of the sea the land I carried around, and the crossing of them was like the great sea, of the briny flood. An outburst of that within them not to suffer to befall, with a bank of earth I entrenched them, and walls of kiln-brick I threw around them. The bulwark skilfully did I strengthen, and the city of Babylon I made a fortress."

Here for the time we must leave the records of this head of Gentile power. We have several items of interest to mention that are too important to crowd into this article. We hope to deal with these in the future.

Sidelights on the Scriptures.
The Tower of Babel.
pp. 130-131

The Babylonian and Assyrian Room.

In our last set of notes we were reviewing some of the accounts which have been preserved to us of the great architectural operations of Nebuchadnezzar. Not only did Nebuchadnezzar devote himself to the erection of new buildings, and of the fortifications of Babylon, but he also repaired the temples of the gods which had fallen into ruins. One of these reconstructions is of very great interest to Bible students, and that is the shrine of the god Nebo at Borsippa. In this department is a series of barrel-shaped cylinders, one of which gives an account of the rebuilding of this ancient shrine at Borsippa, the modern Birs Nimrod. Schrader's translation runs as follows:--

> "We announce the following: The temple of the seven lights of the earth, the tower of Borsippa, which a former king (E. Lenormant translates 'the most ancient king,' thus taking the temple back to the beginning of Babylonian history) had erected and had completed to a height of 42 yards, whose pinnacle, however, he had set up, since remote days had fallen to ruin. There was no proper care of the gutters for its water; rain and storm had washed away its bricks; the tiles of its roofing were split; the bricks of the building were flooded away to heaps of ruins. To restore it the great god Merodach urged (?) my mind; its site, however, I did not injure, did not change its foundation walls. In a month of good fortune, on an auspicious day, I improved the bricks of its building, and the tiles of its roofing, into a compact edifice; renewed its substructure, and put the inscription of my name on the cornice of its edifice. To restore it and set up its pinnacle I raised my hand; as it was ages before, I built it anew; as it was in remote days, I erected its pinnacle."

The fact that Nebuchadnezzar speaks of this ruin as dating back from "ages before," "remote days," and to the "most ancient king" shows the extreme antiquity of the building. Archeologists have identified this tower, renewed by Nebuchadnezzar, with the TOWER OF BABEL. In the wall cases can be seen coloured tiles, which Nebuchadnezzar used to reface the tower. He constructed it as a seven-staged building, giving each stage its own colour. The description of the New Jerusalem seems to have something in common with the idea suggested here. The tower was called Ziggurat, or Zikkurat, which has been connected with Zakar, to remember (see the meaning of the name Zechariah). The meaning of the word ziggurat is " a memorial." Gen. xi. tells us that one of the objects of the builders was to make a "name." The mound of ruins covers an area of 49,000 square feet, and is nearly 300 feet high. When Alexander the Great sought to repair the ruined structure, 10,000 workmen, labouring for two months, failed to clear the rubbish away sufficiently to commence successful building operations, and therefore the work was abandoned.

The Scriptures tell us that the brick was burned "thoroughly," and that they had "slime (or bitumen) for mortar." One writer, speaking of a part of the masonry, says that it is "so compact that no stone can be loosened from it, apparently indestructible, and, though split from one end to the other by some unknown catastrophe, still standing erect with its bricks elegant and perfect." It is very probable that the Lord has arranged that this memorial of human pride and rebellion shall remain until He comes in judgment upon Babylon. The bronze door step (No. 90,851) was taken from the ruined temple at Birs Nimrod, and contains the name and titles of Nebuchadnezzar.

Sidelights on the Scriptures.
Belshazzar.
pp. 184-186

The Babylonian and Assyrian Room.

Among the names of ancient characters that have been preserved in the Bible, though lost for centuries to history, is the name of Belshazzar. So completely unique was the testimony of Scripture, that the critics of the Word concluded that Belshazzar was a myth. Yet the fact that the simpliest peasant who read his Bible had information which went beyond the knowledge of the Universities, or of Archeology.

There is a heap of ruins in Chaldea, on the west bank of the Euphrates, called locally Mugeyer, or Mukeyyer, which means, "The city of asphalt," because the bricks were covered with asphalt, the "slime" of Genesis xi. The remains of the city reveal that it was a city of wealth, learning, science, and luxury. Cylinders discovered in the ruins tell us that this is Ur of the Chaldees, the city of Abraham. Abraham became a wanderer and tent dweller by faith, not from inclination. He left a city and its many advantages for a pilgrim's journeyings, but Scripture tells us that he had outweighed the claims of Ur. Abraham had his Phil. iii. Ur was devoted to the worship of the moon-god, and Mr. Taylor, Vice-Consul of Busrah, discovered four cylinders, one in each corner of the temple. These were embedded in the brick work at a depth of six feet from the surface. Their inscriptions give an account of the rebuilding of the temple by Nabonidus, and in one of them (No. 91,125), occur these words:--

> "In the heart of Belshazzar, my firstborn son, the offspring of my loins, set the fear of thine exalted godhead, so that he may commit no sin, and that he may be satisfied with the fulness of life."

Here then is the historical Belshazzar, a real personage. Again the historical accuracy of the Word is manifest, while confusion is brought to the critics by the excavators's spade. So jealous were these ancient kings of possible rivals, that they did not name their sons upon their inscriptions unless already sharing their throne. Canon Rawlinson could find only two other instances of the sons of kings of Assyria and Babylonia being mentioned on the inscriptions of their royal parents. When Belshazzar would offer Daniel a reward for interpreting the handwriting on the wall, he said, "Thou shalt be third ruler in the kingdom." Why "third"? We know now. Belshazzar, who shared the throne with Nabonidus his father, was second ruler, and hence he could offer nothing higher to Daniel. The tragic end of Belshazzar, and with him of the first kingdom of Gentile dominion, foreshadows the greater blasphemer and his end spoken of both by Daniel and John in the Revelation.

May these occasional sidelights, as they make Scripture characters more real and tangible, impress us with the absolute veracity, authority and sufficiency of the Word of the living God. We need no "proofs," but these sidelights are of service.

Berean Expositor Volume 4 & 5

The Wages of Sin.
Greek words used.
pp. 7-11

In our last paper in Vol. III., page 84 (Vols. II./III., page 128), we considered the meaning and usage of the words apollumi and apõleia, and found that the words destroy and destruction in their plain unequivocal sense gave the scriptural meaning.

There are not a few who speak with borrowed but inexperienced weight against this meaning, and dismiss it with some such expression as, "It is unphilosophical – nothing can be annihilated." So far as The Berean Expositor is concerned we care not how apparently "unphilosophical" we may appear, so long as we speak according to the Word of God. Yet if we step down from the high plane of inspired truth to the lower plane of human speculation, truth still triumphs. If annihilation be unphilosophical, so also must be creation. Creation as explained by this same philosophy is the calling into being that which before had no existence. Shall we therefore be called unphilosophical if we believe that He Who did the former creative act can also do the latter destructive act, and send created things back into non-existence once again? Surely creation is greater than annihilation! Surely as much wisdom and power were necessary to create a world out of nothing, as will be necessary to send some created things back to nothing? Let those who oppose be consistent. Let them deny creation, and affirm the eternity of matter; then, although grossly unscriptural, they may use the term philosophical, but not before. We are not careful to answer in this matter. We desire to know the revealed will of God, even though such knowledge constitutes us fools in the eyes of those who are wise in this world's wisdom. Let us now return to our examination of the Greek words.

Olethros occurs four times, and is translated in each case "destruction" (I Cor. v. 5; I Thess. v. 3; II Thess. i. 9; I Tim. vi. 9). II Thess. i. 9 is the only verse calling for any comment, not because of any obscurity in the text, but because of a certain gloss frequently met with in the writings of those who defend the doctrine of eternal conscious suffering. The verse reads, "Who shall be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of His power," and the word "from" is taken to indicate that the "destruction" is banishment away from the presence of the Lord, just as it is said that "death" is life apart from the presence of the Lord.

I Cor.	5	5	To deliver such an one unto Satan for the destruction of the flesh, that the spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus.
I Thess.	5	3	For when they shall say, Peace and safety; then sudden destruction cometh upon them, as travail upon a woman with child; and they shall not escape.
II Thess.	1	9	Who shall be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power;
I Tim.	6	9	But they that will be rich fall into temptation and a snare, and into many foolish and hurtful lusts, which drown men in destruction and perdition.

At first glance it seems that there may be some force in the notion, although we may fail to see the appropriateness of such a strong word as olethros (destruction). II Thess. i. 9, however, is one verse only, it is not independent of all Scripture, and therefore if the interpretation offered be true, it will stand the most vigorous investigation. Turning to Acts iii. 19 we read the identical words, "from the presence of the Lord," and if the translation of apo in II Thess. i. 9 means "away from," implying the removal of those "destroyed" into some remote region, it should mean the same here. Let us test it: "When there shall come seasons of refreshing away from the presence of the Lord," that is at some long distance far removed from the presence of the Lord, seasons of refreshing shall operate, while in the presence of the Lord, despair and desolation shall hold undisputed sway. No reader of the Scriptures needs to be told that such an idea is obviously too stupid to need refuting.

The meaning of the word apo (from) governing the genitive case indicates the efficient cause:-- > "Wisdom is justified OF (apo) her children" (Matt. xi. 19).

> "We would see a sign FROM (apo) Thee" (Matt. xii. 38).
> "And suffer many things OF (apo) the elders" (Matt. xvi. 21).

Nothing could be more foreign to the idea of this usage than to say, "We would see a sign away from (or separated from) Thee." Does "peace from God" (Rom. i. 7) mean that peace is found somewhere far removed from God? Does "seasons of refreshing from the presence of the Lord" mean anything else but that the active and efficient cause of such refreshing is the very presence of the Lord on earth? How can we then arbitrarily speak of an identical usage of the same word concerning another phase of the same coming, as meaning the exact opposite? The destruction comes from the presence of the Lord as the efficient cause, explained in other language regarding Antichrist himself in II Thess. ii. 8. It is by means of this specious scholarship that many humble souls are fortified in their errors; the tremendous responsibility resting upon their teachers is something to be considered with fear and trembling.

Olethreuõ.—This verb is derived from olethros, and means "to destroy." It occurs only in Heb. xi. 28, "Lest the destroyer of the firstborn should touch them." This word occurs in the LXX. of Exod. xii. 23; Jer. ii. 30, &c., and as one well-known lexicographer says, "It seems in the LXX. a strong word, and to denote entire destruction" (our italics).

Olothreutes is connected with this word, and occurs only in I Cor. x. 10, "destroyed by the destroyer."

II Thess.	2	8	And then shall that Wicked be revealed, whom the Lord shall consume with the spirit of his mouth, and shall destroy with the brightness of his coming:

Exod.	12	23	For the Lord will pass through to smite the Egyptians; and when he seeth the blood upon the lintel, and on the two side posts, the Lord will pass over the door, and will not suffer the destroyer to come in unto your houses to smite you.
Jer.	2	30	In vain have I smitten your children; they received no correction: your own sword hath devoured your prophets, like a destroying lion.

Thus the list grows, the evidence advances, and the conviction deepens that the final doom of the impenitent is destruction or perishing. This is emphasized in those passages which speak of "the end":--

> "The end of these things is death" (Rom. vi. 21).
> "Whose end is destruction" (Phil. iii. 19).
> "Whose end is to be burned" (Heb. vi. 8).

Whatever sorrows may fill the pathway of transgressors, there is an end, and that end is death and destruction:--

> "Sin, when it is finished, bringeth forth death" (James. i. 15).
> "But, these as natural brute beasts, made to be taken and destroyed shall utterly perish in their own corruption" (II Pet. ii. 12).

The words and usage of the word rendered "torment" must now be given a careful consideration. Chiefest among them is the word basanizo, but we will just look at the occurrences of but one or two others first, and then devote our undivided attention to this most important word.

Kolasis.—"Fear hath torment" (I John iv. 18). The word is the same as that used in Matt. xxv. 46 which is rendered "punishment." As we have seen in a previous issue the meaning is that of cutting off, as we would cut off a useless branch of a tree.

Kakouchoumenos.—"Being destitute, afflicted, tormented" (Heb. xi. 37). The word means to suffer or bear ill usage, and is translated in Heb. xiii. 3, "them which suffer adversity." It would have been well if the translators had used the second rendering in both passages.

Odunomai.—"I am tormented," "thou art tormented" (Luke xvi. 24, 25). The word has occurred already in Luke ii. 48 in the words of the mother of the Lord Jesus, "Thy father and I have sought thee sorrowing." Luke again uses the words in Acts xx. 38 to express the sorrow of the Ephesian elders at the prospect of never seeing the face of Paul again. The cognate odune in Rom. ix. 2 and I Tim. vi. 10 is rendered by the word "sorrow." It will be seen that the translation "torment" is confined to the passage concerning the rich man and Lazarus. As we hope to deal with this passage under the separate heading of ""The Parables" we will not spend further time over it here, the reference to the usage of the words translated "torment" being our primary object.

The only words to be now considered are those which are the translations of basanizo and its derivatives.

Basanizo occurs twelve times in the N.T. Eight times it is rendered "torment," and once "pain, " "toss," "vex," "toil," Basanistes occurs once, and is rendered "tormentor." Basanos occurs thrice, and is rendered "torment." Basanismos occurs five times, and is rendered "torment." Considering the exceptional renderings first, we notice the following:--

"Travailing in birth, and pained to be delivered" (Rev. xii. 2).
"The ship. . . . tossed with the waves" (Matt. xiv. 24).
"Vexed his righteous soul" (II Pet. ii. 8).
"He saw them toiling in rowing" (Mark vi. 48).

Dr. Young in his Concordance gives as the first meaning of the word basanizo:--

"To try and then test, inquisition, torment."

Dr. Parkhurst in his Lexicon gives the following order of the meaning of the word:--

"i. To examine, try. ii. To examine by torture, Hence, iii. To torture, torment. The word comes from basanos, which was a stone by which gold was tried."

Liddell and Scott's Greek Lexicon gives:--

"Basanizo—To rub upon the touch stone (basanos), to try the genuineness of a thing, test, make proof, e.g., to convict, to put to the torture."

These are independent witnesses whose statements are confirmed by many other authoritative Lexicons and Dictionaries. It will thus be seen that the primary root idea of the word throughout is that of "testing," with the added idea of tormenting in the process. The original idea, that of testing for gold, is observable in the passages to which we will return shortly. If the gold is to be found, this testing will evidence its presence; if not, the testing, though prolonged and severe, is not continued for eternity, it ends in the lake of fire, and the final destruction of the second death. Proof of this, however, we will reserve until we have considered the passages. Turning to the book of the Revelation, which gives us the prophetic history of the day of the Lord, we read:--

"They shall be tormented five months" (ix. 5).
"The two prophets toemented them" (xi. 10).
"He shall be tormented with fire and brimstone" (xiv. 10).
"Shall be tormented day and night for ever and ever" (xx. 10).

Here for the present we must leave the subject; we hope to devote a complete article to the teaching of punishment as found in the book of Revelation in a future issue.

I John	4	8	There is no fear in love; but perfect love casteth out fear: because fear hath torment. He that feareth is not made perfect in love.
Matt.	25	46	And these shall go away into everlasting punishment: but the righteous into life eternal.

Acts	20	38	Sorrowing most of all for the words which he spake, that they should see his face no more. And they accompanied him unto the ship.
Rom.	9	2	That I have great heaviness and continual sorrow in my heart.
I Tim.	6	10	For the love of money is the root of all evil: which while some coveted after, they have erred from the faith, and pierced themselves through with many sorrows.

The Wages of Sin.
Terms used in book of Revelation.
pp. 31-36

Under this heading we have considered from time to time the various Hebrew and Greek words which are used in Scripture to teach the nature of the Wages of Sin, and without exception, whether considered etymologically, or whether considered in the light of its context and usage, every word demonstrated the fact that utter destruction and perishing was the wages of sin.

Before, however, we conclude this series and take up related subjects, we will consider the testimony of the book of Revelation on this question, as some readers have a few difficulties, which it may be well for us to clear up. First let us notice the expression, "The book of life." There are seven passages wherein this phrase occurs in the A.V., but the best Greek texts omit Rev. xxii. 19. This leaves six passages for consideration, and they occur in the following order:--

The Book of Life.

A | iii. 5. Overcomers.
  B | a | xiii. 8 Earth dwellers—worship.
    b | xvii. 8. Earth dwellers—wonder.
  B | a | xx. 12. Judgment.
    b | xx. 15. Judgment.
A | xxi. 27. Those who enter the city.

We would point out that in xvii. 8, xx. 12, and xxi. 27 the word translated book is biblion (a little book), whereas in iii. 5, xiii. 8, and xx. 15 it is biblos (a book), although, at present, the exact bearing of this distinction is not evident to us. The first and last passages need not detain us in the present consideration, although they demand, and we hope will receive, careful exposition in the series of articles just commenced entitled, "Studies in the Book of the Revelation." Let us notice the four passages which touch upon the question of the wages of sin. The first pair are used in connection with the "earth dweller":--

> "And all who dwell upon the earth will worship him, (each one) whose name hath not been written from the foundation of the world in the book of life of the Lamb slain" (xiii. 8).
> "The beast which thou sawest was, and is not; and is about to ascend out of the abyss, and to go into perdition: and those who dwell on the earth shall wonder, whose name is not written in the book of life from the foundation of the world, when they behold the beast; because he was, and is not, and shall be present" (xvii. 8).

Without entering into the extremely interesting exposition of the verses here, it will suffice for us to notice the fact that not one of those who worship the beast, or who wonder at his travesty of the resurrection, has his name written in the book of life. It must be also noticed that it does not say that upon worshipping the beast their names were blotted out, but rather that the worshippers of the beast are they who have not their names written in the book of life from the foundation of the world. Passing on for the moment to the second pair we are brought into the context of judgment:-- > "And I saw the dead, the great and the small, standing before the throne; and books were opened; and another book was opened, which is the book of life" (xx. 12).

>
> "And whosoever was not found written in the book of life was cast into the lake of fire" (xx. 15).

This passage has suffered somewhat at the hands of those who really believe the Word of God, and therefore we would call attention to one or two facts which are of importance:--

1. There are two sets of books.
2. There are two distinct sentences passed.
3. There are two classes who stand before the great white throne.

First as to the two sets of books. The Scripture calls particular attention to the "books" which were opened, and "another book," which is the book of life. The sentences passed differ, the one being connected with the books, and the other with the book of life. The first sentence to be passed is judgment according to works. "The dead were judged out of those things which were written in the books, according to their works." This judgment according to works gives the needed room for the "few stripes" and the "many stripes," for the "more tolerable" judgment upon Sodom and Gomorrha than that to be inflicted upon Capernaum.

It is a most unwarranted assumption to teach that all who are thus judged are cast into the lake of fire and suffer the judgment of the second death, for this dread doom is not only kept quite distinct, but is reserved for one class only, as we shall see in the next reference. Note the change from the plural to the singular. Verses 12 and 13 bring before us with strong emphasis the great multitude who stand before the great white throne. Verse 15 by its sudden change to the singular calls for more careful attention, especially if we keep in mind the dreadful character of the subject: kai ei tis ouch eurethe en te biblõ, &c.:--

> "And if anyone was not found written in the book of life, he was cast (singular) into the lake of fire."

The title "The book of life" must be noticed. It is not the book of the kingdom and its glories, for there might still be hope for those who had forfeited these blessings. It is not the book of rewards, it is life; and for those not found in that book, the lake of fire becomes, not a place of loss of privilege, loss of pleasure, loss of reward; not a place of custody until these periods of glory have passed away, but it becomes the reverse of life, namely, death. Revelation xx. passes immediately into xxi., with its new heaven and new earth. If resurrection from the second death were true, here is the place where such a tremendous subject would be mentioned.

Resuming our consideration of this passage we further ask, "Where is the warrant for the teaching that "all who stand before the great white throne will be cast into the lake of fire?" The idea is a perversion. That which is so intensely particular has again been made exceedingly general. It is evident that none will cast into that lake of fire, but those whose names are not found written in the book of life. Multitudes will have lost all share in the glories of the kingdom. They will have had none of the blessings of the first resurrection, but they will still be distinguished from those whose names are not found written in the book of life. As our subject here is the wages of sin, we reserve further comment upon this large, but neglected, class until dealing with the "reconciliation" aspect of the subject.

The lake of fire, as verse 14 declares, is the second death. This second death is not Adamic death. From this second death there has been offered no ransom. The death of Christ upon Calvary's cross was endured with reference to the sin and punishment connected with Adam and his race. This second death is something peculiar and different. This may be noticed under the heading of the two classes here brought before us. During the antichristian ascendancy those who have not their names written in the book of life worship the beast. We have no record that one solitary soul whose name is in the book of life will ever do so. When we have examined the other references to punishment in the Revelation, we shall find that this special class are under notice practically the whole time, and that the judgments are special and peculiar, as also are those who endure them, namely, the beast, the false prophet, and the dragon. What careless exposition is that which applies the punishment reserved for such superhuman creatures as this infernal trinity to all sinners alike, regardless of age, clime, period or light.

Before turning to other passages let us ask, What is this lake of fire? Scripture supplies the answer. It is "the second death." Its purpose can be ascertained by noticing verse 14, "And death and hades were cast into the lake of fire; this is the second death," even the lake of fire. Why were death and hades cast in? To perpetuate them? to revive them again at some later period? No, for Revelation xx. 1-4 says, "There shall be no more death. . . . for the former things have passed away." Death and the grave are among the "former things" of this present creation which are to pass at the advent of the new creation. Death is never converted. Death is an enemy to the last. For those whose names are found in the book of life the first death will have been swallowed up of life. Those whose names are not thus found will, together with death, be consigned to the second death, which brings them all to an end.

If the lake of fire was intended to be purgatorial in character, if ever "the victims of its rule" should emerge the redeemed of the Lord, then the casting in of death and hades would not denote their entire extinction, but rather their preservation and possible resuscitation. This emphatic destructive agency this second death, is the fulfilment of the Scriptures which speak of the destruction, and total annihilation of the ungodly. Just as we find two classes indicated in Rev. xx., so in other parts of the book we find the same distinction observed. The locusts who arise out of the abyss are commanded not to hurt anything "but those men which have not the seal of God on their foreheads" (Rev. ix. 4, note also ix. 20, 21). In xiv. 9-11 we read:--

> "If anyone worship the beast and his image, and receiveth his mark on his forehead, or on his hand, even he shall drink of the wine of God's fury, which is mingled undiluted in the cup of His wrath; and he shall be tormented with fire and brimstone in the presence of the angels and in the presence of the Lamb; and the smoke of their torment ascendeth up unto ages of ages: and they have no rest day nor night who worship the beast and his image, and whoever receiveth the mark of his name."

Care must be observed in the rendering of some of these solemn words. For example, in the clause "they have no rest day nor night who worship," &c., we must note that hoi proskunountes is the present participle denoting that they have no rest day nor night while they are worshipping. "Receiveth" also is the present tense. "Day and night" is associated with time, not with eternity. The torment here threatened must indeed be horrible; how long it will last before it ends in destruction we cannot tell. The smoke ascends unto (eis, unto, no hint of throughout) ages of ages, but the torment itself, and the tormented, cannot enter the new creation (xxii. 3). In Rev. xvi. the seven plagues are poured out upon the worshippers of the beast:--

> "The men which had the mark of the beast, and upon them which worshipped his image" (verse 2).
> "They have shed the blood of saints and prophets" (verse 6).
> "The throne of the beast"; "blaspehemed and repented not" (verses 10 and 11).

The fate of the "eighth" who is "of the seven" is that he "goeth into perdition" (xvii. 11). In xix. 19 we read:--

> "And the beast was taken, and with him the false prophet. . . . these both were cast alive into a lake of fire burning with fire and brimstone."

That these super-human beings continue to live in this lake of fire seems evident by reading xx. 10:--

> "The Devil that deceived them was cast into the lake of fire and brimstone, where the beast and the false prophet (are), and shall be tormented day and night unto the ages of the ages."

Whilst it is true that the word "are" is not in the original, and could just as well read "were," yet the next word "tormented" is plural, and must be translated, "they shall be tormented," which seems to imply that the beast and the false prophet are referred to. Torment is spoken of in relation to this lake of fire with reference to these three, but when, as we have seen, the passage relates to those who have not their names in the book of life, then the statement is added, "which is the second death."

We have brought these several passages from the book of Revelation together in order that the reader may observe that in the majority of cases, and in connection with the passage which uses the strongest terms, the special class of antichristians are intended, and that these particular terms must not be interpreted in a general way of sinners of all times. No countenance is given even in these passages to the idea of eternal conscious suffering. This is the one idea which we set before us at the commencement of these series. Does the Scripture teach the eternal conscious suffering of sinners as the wages of sin, and if not, what does it teach? We believe that we have demonstrated that the traditional Hell is a lie, a libel against God, and a slur upon a simple faith in God's written Word. Death, perishing, destruction is everywhere taught as the judgment of sin, and the analysis of Hebrew and Greek terms yielded much information of a positive character.

The enquiry, however, is not exhausted. Having completely settled the question of eternal conscious suffering must not too hastily conclude that we have settled the far wider subject of human destiny. We need to revise our findings and view them in the light of other Scriptures. May grace be given in the study, and may the Lord be glorified in the result.

The Wages of Sin.
Concordance Study.
pp. 56-59

Before concluding this series and passing on to further studies dealing with the destinies of the saved and unsaved, heaven and earth, and the Scriptures pertaining to these great themes, we feel that a summary of our findings will be of service.

It will be remembered that certain words have been considered with regard to their primary etymological meaning, their secondary or figurative meaning, and their usage. We now provide a concordance to the subject, giving as full particulars as is possible in the limited space. For the arguments, &c., the reader is referred to the various pages of the magazine given in the last column.

The primary question before us throughout this series was, What does Scripture teach regarding the wages of sin? and as a secondary consideration, How does the doctrine of eternal conscious suffering appear in the light of Holy Scripture? The investigations, summarized in this article, provide a complete answer to that question. Surely we need never fear, nor apologize for holding a doctrine as truth, if we have examined every word used by God Himself upon the subject. We call our readers to witness that we have not frittered away valuable time nor space with mere negations, nor with profitless controversy over other men's opinions; we have gone to the fountain head, and by the evidence adduced we abide.

Eternal conscious suffering is not the wages of sin. Scripture declares that death, destruction, and perishing, preceded by more or less suffering, is the wages of sin. it must be kept in mind, however, that while we have negatived the idea of eternal conscious suffering, there lies before us much that requires patient and prayerful investigation. We have to consider who are involved, how far it applies to all whom we call "unsaved," and whether it obtains for the ages, or for eternity. The passages which deal with the reconciliation of all*, the ransom for all, the mercy that endureth, and the wrath for a little while, demand our most earnest attention. Our only safe course is to continue searching into what God has said, searching out the very words of inspiration, and trusting that He will abundantly fulfil the promise of the words, "the entrance of Thy Word giveth light," or as one has suggested as an alternative rendering, Thy words enter, light is given.

ENGLAND

DEAR FELLOW-MEMBERS,

Once more we are privileged to pen the prefatory words to another volume of The Berean Expositor, and thankfulness for sustaining grace and delivering mercies is uppermost in our hearts.

The sad distractions and difficulties, which none can escape, have made the production and delivery of the magazine more difficult, but, nevertheless, the Lord has provided and enabled, and the completion of yet another volume (and that of monthly parts) constitutes a veritable Ebenezer.

The spirit in which we should seek to serve our brethren is expressed in the words of II Cor. i. 3, 4:--

> "Blessed be God, even the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of mercies, and the God of all comfort; Who comforteth us in all our tribulation, that we may be able to comfort them which are in any trouble, by the comfort wherewith we ourselves are comforted of God."

We can only give out what He first of all gives to us. If we teach things beyond our experience, they may be the truth, but we feel they will lack vital power.

Earnestly praying that "the peace of God that passeth understanding" may still garrison our hearts and minds in Christ Jesus,

Yours in that blessed hope,

CHARLES H. WELCH

WHAT THE LAW COULD NOT DO 83

"What do ye more than others?" p. 15*

The man of the world, equally with the children of God, is obliged to suffer the inconveniences and trials occasioned by the fact that this nation is at War. He, too, is continuously putting his hand in his pocket to help pay for comforts and necessities for the soldiers and sailors. To the believer, however, come the words, "What do ye more than others?" We must not do less than the man who loves not God, but we might do more. An opportunity of helping in the spiritual side of the War is afforded in the matter of a leaflet enclosed with this number. It is for free distribution among soldiers and sailors and may be obtained of the Editor free. Further printings and other leaflets will be prepared should the reader of The Berean Expositor feel able to help in the witness. The accounts will be kept entirely separate from the funds of the magazine.

“They shall perish, but Thou remainest.”
p. 15*

With the present new arrangement whereby The Berean Expositor becomes a monthly, comes the sad news that Things to Come has ceased publication with its December issue. There are many witnesses for an infallible Bible, and a Word of truth rightly divided. HE Who raised up a Joshua to succeed Moses still abides. Whether it is His will to raise up a similar witness we cannot tell. The gap in the battle front thus widened only makes our need of grace and the need for a determined witness seem the more emphatic. The Editor will value the prayerful fellowship of all who realize the need for a continued insistent witness on the lines of II Tim. ii. 15.

Who Will Respond?
p. 30*

We print an extract from a letter of a reader trusting that if it be in line with the will of the Lord, such will be made manifest:--

“DEAR MR. WELCH.—In the June No. (1912) of the ‘Berean’ is a letter addressed to fellow believers. ‘The readers of this magazine are scattered, and in many cases isolated; can anything be done whereby we may mutually help one another? . . . .’ May I forward a tentative proposition? Readers of the ‘B.E.’ who are interested in the teaching may like to correspond with other readers on subjects advanced in the magazine and on Scriptural matters generally. . . . I am not suggesting a society or league or mission, or any of these ‘progressive’ ideas ‘for the promotion of universal brotherhood.’ I simply suggest that readers who are thinkers, and who find pleasure in the study, may get into touch with one another. . . . Those willing and prepared to confer with other readers could send in their names and addresses to one (whose quarters need not be in London) to apportion out the list. If any one is prepared to allocate them voluntarily the cost would be little, if each enclosed a stamped addressed envelope for reply. Each one could say how many he is prepared to correspond with, and the topics that specially interest him, if he wishes to follow these up. The correspondent would still be free to write to the Editor if he desired. There would be no bands, bonds, badges, or ties of any sort: only that of mutual fellowship in the study of God's Word.'

Yours in the Lord,

- - K."

Let us know the result of your prayer over this matter.

Who Will Respond?

p. 79*

We give below a digest of a letter received from a reader in China.

I suppose your correspondent --K. wishes to know what special Bible Studies are occupying the minds of your readers. Since 1890 general knowledge of the Scriptures has given place, in my case, to the following:--

1. The shape of composition, in whole and parts, of Epistles and Psalms.
   Founded on works of Thos. Boys (1824, 1825) and R. B. Roe (1857).
   Noting pronouns "we" and "you" in Prison Epistles; the grouping of participles and finite verbs; synonymous use of pairs of prepositions and cases. Place and relation of every word "for."

2. Trajection, or postponing to the end of a paragraph of a clause belonging to the beginning because its elaboration is to succeed.
3. The use and distribution of Divine Names and Titles, in whole and in parts.
4. Other characteristic words in whole and parts. The symmetrical positions of Nos. 2 and 3 proves correct analysis of composition.
5. Antonyms and Synonyms in context of parts, as well as negative and positive statements. Founded on J. A. Bengel's (English 1873) Figure of Ellipsis.
6. Number, grouping and order in context of abstract qualities (ethics) good and bad. This study of numerics should precede that put forward by J. H. Lynn in each book, and I. Panin in whole Bible.
7. Old Testament sources of subject and language, quotations, allusions, parallels, and proper names.
8. Note which Hebrew idioms equal English idioms.
9. Functions with varied forms of expression; apposition, definition, sequence, adnoun, genitive.
10. Hebrew etymologies or concrete origin of abstract words and the evolution of cognates and derivatives.
11. The Scheme of the Ages.
12. Internal evidence for readings of unique M. S. B. Vatican.

Many of our readers will find in the above helpful suggestions towards real Bible Study. Some may be unable to investigate the original languages, but a large field of research nevertheless is opened up by this system. We may be able to give suggestive illustrations of these heads of study in subsequent numbers.

The Editor's Wider Ministry Fund

It is indeed a pleasure to be able to write about a "Fund" without feeling under any necessity to plead for help.

We desire to gratefully acknowledge the good hand of the Lord and the fellowship of His people, and to indicate a little the resulting ministry.

Without this fellowship, humanly speaking, the visit to Canada would have been beset by difficulties that might have made it impossible. We can therefore rejoice in something of a missionary element in this wider ministry.

We have again been enabled to give our services to those who, however willing are unable to cover the expenses of such ministry, and we are sure that this aspect alone will commend itself to all who have the mind of Christ.

We would indicate here another cause for thanksgiving. About a year ago we had a visit from a fellow believer from Amsterdam, and we have now received a copy of a booklet entitled "Het Voornemen there Eeuwen en de Gemeente there Verborgenheid" by "Aristarkos." To be obtained from S. Van Mierlo, Stefaniestraat, 55, Anterwerpen, Fr. 2. 80. The title being interpreted is:-- "The Purpose of the Ages and the Dispensation of the Mystery." In the foreword of the book there is a paragraph which reads:--

> "The English Bible Students have 'The Berean Expositor.' If there is a sufficiently great number of Dutch-reading people who are interested in it, we may investigate the possibility of publishing a small monthly magazine, which keeps in mind the right division of the Word of truth, and consequently also the special position of the Church of the Mystery. . . . The possibility of publishing some of the writings of Mr. C. H. Welch in Dutch will also be investigated."

The written ministry has, and we trust will have in an increasing degree, a wider sphere than hitherto.

As far as possible, friends are asked to arrange for meetings in 1928, early, so that the months August to November may be kept free for a return visit to Canada, should the Lord will.

We trust that both the written and spoken ministry will be abundantly blessed this coming year.

"Ye also helping together by prayer."

November, 1927.

"For He must reign till He hath put all enemies under His feet" (I Cor. xv. 24-28).

pp. 94 - 95

It is evident to all readers that the reign of Christ here referred to is to continue until every enemy is subdued or destroyed, and by the further teaching of the passage, that when those enemies are subdued or destroyed, the object and purpose of the reign will be achieved, and then that Kingdom will not come to an end, but be handed back to the Father as needing no longer a Mediator—when God will be all in all.

A most important passage for our consideration is that which says, "the last enemy that shall be destroyed is death."

Our English version has reversed the place of the article. In the original the word "last" is without the article, but the word "death" has it. The usage of the word rendered "last" (eschatos) is worth noticing in passing. We give only some of its occurrences.

It will be found that many passages contrast the "last" with the "first," and the idea underlying the word and its usage seems to convey that of the last of a series. Matt. xix. 30, "the first shall be last." The word occurs ten times in Matthew, and each passage either actually refers to or implies the presence of the first (Matt. v. 26; xii. 45; xix. 30; xx. 8, 12, 14, 16; xxvii. 64). It is so in Mark and Luke. In John the frequent reference is to the "last day." That the "last day" need not necessarily mean that after that period there would be no more days is indicated by John vii. 37, "in the last day, that great day of the feast"—the last of the series of days which comprised the feast. The word occurs five times in I Corinthians.

iv. 9. "For I think that God hath set forth us the Apostles last" (cf. Luke xiv. 9).
xv. 8. "Last of all He was seen by me."
xv. 26. "A last enemy that is destroyed is the death."
xv. 45. "The last Adam a life-giving spirit."
xv. 52. "At the last trump."

It will be seen that I Cor. xv. contains four of the five references, and that the idea of last of a series is still uppermost.

In the case of xv. 8 it is the last of a number of above 500 witnesses of the resurrection; in xv. 45 it is the last of a series of two only, the parallel being between the first Adam and the last Adam, and the first man the second man.

While it may be true that death is to be destroyed last of all, the truth of I Cor. xv. 26 is that death is the last of a series of enemies which are to be destroyed. The other enemies which form the series are enumerated under the terms, "all rule all authority and power" death being the last of them to be destroyed. Among the enemies of the believer we find principalities and powers as indicated in Eph. vi. These same foes are seen in Col. ii. 15.

It may be as well if we have placed before us the passages where exousia, translated "authority," and dunamis, translated "power," in I Cor. xv. 24 are used in connection with spiritual beings.

Exousia.

"The power of darkness" (Luke xxii. 53).
"The power of Satan" (Acts xxviii. 18).
"The Prince of the power of the air" (Eph. ii. 2).
"The power of darkness" (Col. i. 13).
"The Dragon gave him his . . . . . great authority" (Rev. xiii. 2).
"He executeth all the power to the first beast" (Rev. xiii. 12).
"The Dragon which gave power to the beast" (Rev. xiii. 4).
"Angels and authorities and powers being made subject unto Him" (I Pet. iii. 22).

"Principalities and powers in the heavenlies" (Eph. i.21; iii. 10; vi. 12; Col. i. 16; ii. 10, 15).

It will be seen that exousia is a word which is used very often with reference to angelic or spiritual authorities.

Dunamis.

"The powers of the heavens shall be shaken" (Matt. xxiv. 29; Mk. xiii. 25; Luke xxi. 26).
"All the power of the enemy" (Luke x. 19).
"Angels, principalities, powers" (Rom. viii. 38).
"Angels, and authorities and powers" (I Pet. iii. 22).
"The Dragon gave him his power" (Rev. xiii. 2).

Returning to I Cor. xv., it would appear that the rule, authority and power which are to be destroyed are to be viewed together with death as enemies.

Revelation xx. as a final act shows the destruction of death in the Lake of Fire after all other enemies have been dealt with, and immediately before the New Creation with which Rev. xxi. commences.

I Cor. xv. 24-28.

24. Then cometh the end, when he shall have delivered up the kingdom to God, even the Father; when he shall have put down all rule and all authority and power.
25. For he must reign, till he hath put all enemies under his feet.
26. The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death.
27. For he hath put all things under his feet. But when he saith, all things are put under him, it is manifest that he is excepted, which did put all things under him.
28. And when all things shall be subdued unto him, then shall the Son also himself be subject unto him that put all things under him, that God may be all in all.

PSALM CXXVII. 1, 2.
p. 159

"Except the Lord build the house, they labour in vain that build it: except the Lord keep the city, the watchman waketh but in vain. It is vain for you to rise up early, to sit up late, to eat the bread of sorrows; for so He giveth His beloved IN SLEEP."

The last two words of the above quotation are not according to the A.V., nevertheless they give the true rendering of the verses. While it is blessedly true that the Lord gives such peace that it may be likened to "sleep" in the midst of alarms, the truth of this passage is somewhat different.

In contrast to the untiring effort suggested by the building, the watching, the late nights and early rising which, because carried out independently of the Lord, ends in sorrow and vanity, there is placed a picture of "His beloved" just resting on His faithfulness, receiving the gifts of the Lord's grace "in their sleep." This passage does not by any means condemn the building, the watching, the early rising, and the diligent efforts, but it does show the vanity of these things apart from the Lord.

"Trust in the Lord with all thine heart, and lean not to thine own understanding. In all thy ways acknowledge Him, and He shall direct (rightly divide, LXX) thy paths" (Proverbs iii. 5, 6).

The Abrogation of the Sin-offering.

Heb. ix. 26.
God's answer to the oft asked question concerning offerings.
pp. 61 - 63

The first and most important means of obtaining the meaning of any particular word used in the Scriptures is not its etymology, but the context. The second is the usage of the word in the other places. These being ascertained, further light may be found by examining the word itself. To reverse this order is usually fatal to true interpretation. Suppose I want to study "law," before I enter into details I must be sure that I am clear as to the wider aspect of my study. Do I mean "law" as used in natural philosophy, or do I mean "law" as used in the administration of justice? Do I mean English law, or the law of some Foreign Country? I must always settle the wide division of my subject first before I commence details, or as it is put, genus must come before species, telescope before microscope. The accuracy of this rule is particularly manifested in the renderings of the verse before us. The word in the verse to which we draw attention is athetesis, translated "to put away." Before we consider the word itself, let us take note of the context.

Chapter vii. commences an explanation concerning the superiority of the Melchisedec priesthood which continues through to chapter x. 18. Chapter vii. 1-10 shows that Melchisedec was superior to Abraham and Levi; vii. 11-x. 18 develops this by showing the superiority of the Melchisedec priesthood and offering of Christ to the priesthood and offerings of Aaron and the Levites.

The key word of this section is the word "perfection." This word indeed in various forms constitutes the main theme of the whole book and the abrogation of all priesthood and sacrifices is a part of the argument. To show how it punctuates the chapters before us, we draw attention to the design that governs its use, which will not only be of service now, but may be of use in studying other verses within this section.

Hebrews vii. 11 - x. 18.

A | vii. 11. No perfection under Levitical priesthood. \
B | vii. 12-18. But in the priesthood of endless life. \ Priesthood.
A | vii. 19. No perfection under the law. /
B | vii. 20 - ix. 8. But in the oath that perfects the Son. /

A | ix. 9. No perfection to conscience in typical service. \
B | ix. 10-28. But in the true tabernacle. \ Offerings.
A | x. 1. No perfection to conscience in typical sacrifices. /
B | x. 2-18. But in the one offering that perfects the sanctified. /

This is a broad outline of the passage. The contrast between the type and the real is magnified, and perfection is alone found in the heavenly priesthood and the one Offering of Christ. There is another line running through this section which bears immediately upon the text we are studying. Every section of the above structure is not only marked by the words "no perfection," but also by the abrogation of the commands and offerings of the law and the setting aside of the Old covenant itself. This we set out separately in order that it may be seen quite clearly.

C | vii. 18. The putting away of the commandment concerning priests. (athetesis).
D | viii. 8. The finding fault with the 1st covenant.
C | ix. 26. The putting away of the sin offering. (athetesis).
D | x. 9. The taking away of the 1st covenant.

It will be seen that for every statement concerning the failure to bring to perfection, there is also a statement concerning annulling or putting aside. Regarding the first covenant the words are, "finding fault" as over against "making new," and "taking away" as over against "establishing" the second. No proof is required as to the meaning of these passages. In vii. 18 and ix. 26 the word athetesis occurs. In vii. 18 it is the "disannulling (or abrogation) of the commandment"—the "carnal commandment" (verse 16), the appointment of the Levitical priesthood. In ix. 26, by every argument of structure, parallel, and context, it must mean the disannulling or abrogation, not of the sin of the believer, but of the typical Sin-offering of Israel's priesthood. This is the insistent theme of chapter ix. from verse 12 to the end. "Neither by the blood of goats and calves, but by His own blood . . . . . how much more shall the blood of Christ." The first covenant was dedicated with the blood of bulls and goats. The patterns of things in the heavens were purified with these, but the heavenly things themselves with an infinitely better sacrifice than these. "Now once upon an end of the ages, for an abrogation of sin offering by the sacrifice of Himself, He has been manifested." Chapter x. is even more explicit. "Sacrifice and offering Thou wouldest not, but a body hast Thou prepared Me." The oft repeated offerings of the Levitical priesthood pass away before the once offered sacrifice of Christ. "For where remission of these, there is no more offering for sin."

USAGE.--Heb. x. 28 contains the only other reference in the epistle, "He that despised Moses' law." Gal. iii. 15 speaks of disannulling a covenant. Luke vii. 30 reads "rejected (mar. frustrated) the counsel of God." I Cor. i. 19 renders it "bring to nought." A reference to the LXX but confirms this conclusion. Psa. xxxiii. 10, "He maketh the devices of the people of none effect." Psa. lxxxix. 34, "My covenant will I not break, nor alter the thing that is gone out of my lips." The next word teach the same as Hebrews, namely, the permanence of that covenant established by oath. Other renderings, despise, rebel, etc., point in the same way Usage confirms the demand of structure. Sin is often synonymous with sin-offering.

No. 11.--S.F.K., SOUTH AFRICA.

(a) "Why does Paul class himself in Eph. i. 12 with the fore-hopers ('We who have before hoped in Christ')? and again in Heb. xiii. 14 with those whose hope is a city ('For we have not here an abiding city')?"

By the wording of your question you evidently do not consider the word translated in A.V., "who first trusted," to have reference to priority of realization, but that the word proelpizõ means to "hope before," as proeideõ (Gal. iii. 8) means "to see before, or to foresee."

This is in harmony with the usage of the preposition in composition. The suggested rendering that makes the passage mean that the Apostle, and those who believed with him, were to realize their hope before other "orders," though doctrinally true, is not a true interpretation of this word. "We who had (or have) hoped beforehand" is the meaning of the word. You ask why Paul links himself with these. You assume that Paul must of necessity be referring back to a previous dispensation when he with others shared in the "hope of Israel." There is no necessity for this; all that the passage says is that Paul and those with him (the "we") hoped in Christ before the Gentile believers (the "ye" of verse 13).

Even though it were to be proved that Paul did refer back to the hope which he shared with others before the revelation of the Mystery, it should constitute no difficulty. Faith and hope rest upon revealed truth. Until the dispensation of the Mystery was made known, all who believed could truthfully include themselves in such as expression as "we which are alive and remain unto the coming of the Lord" (I Thess. iv. 15), even though they were to relinquish that hope upon the proclamation of the Mystery. If there is any difficulty in believing this, then no Jew who believed under the Law could ever come under Grace, no disciple of John Baptist could ever become a disciple of Christ. To become a member of the One Body, whether previously a Jew, a Christian of the Pentecostal assembly, or a Pagan, necessitated as the outward expression just faith in "the word of truth" (Eph. i. 13), as made known through the Apostle Paul (Eph. iii. 8, 9), and if that new revelation made any change in the doctrine of hope (as we know it did), that was accepted as a matter of course.

Regarding Heb. xiii. 14, "For here we have no continuing city, but we seek one to come," the Apostle is urging the separation which the epistle emphasized throughout. He, Paul, would go "outside the camp," whatever different things that "camp" may indicate. He, Paul, had no continuing city, but he sought one to come. There was no necessity for the Apostle to interfere with the main argument to turn aside and say, "But you must understand that I, as a member of the One Body, no longer look to that New Jerusalem, the Holy City, as the realization of my hopes." We must be careful not to make difficulties, for the Apostle simply says, "we seek one to come," and although he may have been commonly understood to be referring to the New Jerusalem, the expression would be equally true of himself if the "citizenship" of Phil. iii. 20 had been in his mind. Whatever the city might be, the principle would remain the same, and that was the main things to keep clear.

After having said all this, there remains another consideration. When the Apostle said, "How shall we escape if we neglect so great salvation" (Heb. ii. 3), or, when in Titus iii. 3 he links himself with idolatrous Gentiles, or when Peter says, "For the time past of our life may suffice us to have wrought the will of the Gentiles, when we walked in lasciviousness, lusts, excess of wine, revelings, banquetings, and abominable idolatries," there is no warrant to say that these things did actually attach to the writers personally. We must perceive the figure which identifies the writer with his hearers, without necessarily including him in every particular.

(b) "In Phil. iii. 11-14 there appears to be uncertainty with Paul as to the Prize. In II Tim. iv. 8 that uncertainty is gone. Does that necessitate the same uncertainty with us until our course is finished?"

Yes! the same uncertainty must be in the mind of every believer who, like Paul, seeks to "press toward the mark."

We feel that unless we can answer this question with a fair amount of fulness we shall create a wrong impression. The crux of the matter is, What is the Prize? May I ask you to exercise still more patience (these questions were asked in September, 1915), until opportunity is afforded for articles dealing with our hope and the prize of the high calling? [not included in Volume XXV reprint]

(b) 1. Does I Tim. and Titus justify the 'present-day' system of ministers, elders and deacons?
2. What light do the prison epistles give on the instrumentality in the divine plan for diffusing the truth in our present dispensation?
3. Does the "till" of Eph. iv. 13 mark the end of the initial fourfold ministry of verses 11 and 12?

1. What is the present-day system? There are so many conflicting ideas as to the ministry, that your real question is liable to get lost. I presume you are concerned as to whether in the Church of the one body an order of ministry such as elders, bishops and deacons is warranted.

An elder (presbuteros), and bishop or overseer (episkopos) are the same (see Titus i. 5-7). A deacon is a minister (diakonos) (Eph. iii. 7; I Tim. iii. 8). The qualifications for a bishop as given in I Tim. iii. are searching, and have reference solely to the man's life, not his learning. The expanded qualification (verses 4 and 5) does not seem to be applied in "present-day systems." The Church at Philippi, to whom Paul addressed one of his Prison Epistles, had "bishops and deacons." Order is not inconsistent with the dispensation of grace, neither is the ruin of corporate testimony a ground of boasting.

In II Tim. there are no bishops, elders or deacons; an intensely individual note is sounded. The manifestation of the One Body had ceased.

2. The instrumentality for diffusing the truth in our present dispensation is narrowed down to one class of men, who have no other title than that they are "faithful," who have no other "gift" than that they are "able to teach others," and who have no other doctrine than that which Timothy had heard from Paul among many witnesses. II Tim. ii. 2 is the last word concerning ministry. All other claims are pretentious (possibly honest), but have no scriptural warrant so far as the Church of the One Body is concerned.

3. Yes, the "till" of Eph. iv. 13 marks the end of the special ministry of apostles, prophets, evangelists, pastors, and teachers who were given by the risen Christ at the beginning of the dispensation of the mystery to lead the believers to their new standing in Christ. That this was not intended to indicate the future blessedness of the Church in resurrection is shown by the words that follow, "that ye be no longer children, etc." Those who have "arrived" at the unity of the faith may nevertheless be very far short of individual perfection, and may be exhorted to "grow up into Him in all things." The subsequent ministry of the One Body is based upon the position of the perfect man, the measure of the maturity of the fulness of Christ. Because every man who believed was accepted in the Beloved, the Apostle laboured that he might present every man perfect in Christ Jesus.

"The various Sabbaths of the Levitical feasts—perhaps other 'babes' require such 'milk,' and there may be a chance to reply now the Berean is a monthly."

The history of Israel is punctuated by Sabbaths and sevens. They not only had a Sabbath day, but from Passover to Pentecost a seven of weeks (49 days). The seventh month also was an important month, for in it were the Day of Atonement and Feast of Tabernacles. There were also sabbatical years (Lev. xxv. 2-7) called the Sabbath of the land. Its neglect is referred to by Moses (Lev. xxvi. 33-35). Further, there were Sabbaths of Sabbaths of years. When seven sabbatical years had passed the 50th year was called the Jubilee (xxv. 8). The word Jubilee probably comes from jabal "to restore," and contains in type the prophecy of restoration for Israel and the nations. Slaves were set free, and forfeited inheritances were restored. All went back to their respective families. Further, high festivals were Sabbaths. Lev. xxiii. 24 says that the first day of the seventh month "shall ye have a sabbath." The tenth day also "shall be unto you for a sabbath of rest" (Lev. xxiii. 32). On the fifteenth day also a sabbath was to be observed (verse 39).

It will be seen that these sabbath would necessarily be additional to the ordinary weekly sabbath, even though one or even two should occasionally coincide. If, for example, the ordinary weekly sabbath came on the second of the month, that would mean that there would be two sabbaths to observe in one week, as the first would be a special sabbath connected with the feast. This fact provides a solution of the difficulty that arises in the record of the Passover Week at the time of the Lord's death, and must not be omitted from the calculation when endeavoring to analyze the record of that momentous week. Heb. iv. 3-9 links the 7th day rest with its future realization, "There remaineth therefore a rest (sabbatismos) to the people of God."

"Will you give us a little instruction re the use of the prayer given by our Lord to His disciples in Matt. vi. 9, also Luke xi. 2 . . . . . It seems to me unsuitable for Christians in this dispensation."

This question may be answered broadly or particularly. By examining the wider subject of the dispensational place of the prayer, or by examining the narrower subject of the details of the prayer itself. Those who use this prayer as if intended for themselves forget or are in ignorance concerning a vital fact, namely, that the dispensation under which we now live, service and worship are entirely different from that which obtained while our Lord was in the flesh and limited to Israel. He Himself at the close of His earthly ministry told His disciples that He had many things to tell them that they could not then bear. Among the new things they learnt was their attitude toward the Lord Himself in prayer. "Hitherto," He said, "Ye have asked nothing in My Name. Ask . . ." The prayer of Matt. vi. is not in the Lord's Name. It knows nothing of His mediation, it knows nothing of His sacrifice, the disciples who used the prayer did not know till much later the fundamental fact of redemption (see Matt. xvi. 21, 22). Eph. 18-23; iii. 14-21; Phil. i. 9-11; and Col. i. 9-13 are inspired prayers to teach us how to pray if we are members of the One Body.

"How would you explain why the Apostles still went to the Temple (Acts ii. 46, iii. 1) when we remember what had taken place, and all that Pentecost implied?"

It is extremely difficult to feel sure that any answer we may give will satisfy, as you do not give any idea what you believe "Pentecost implied." We can hardly believe that you hold that "The Church began at Pentecost." Those who hold that necessarily have a problem regarding many of the acts of the Apostles, and are not above labeling them Apostolic mistakes!

Pentecost was the commencement of the fulfillment of the prophecy of Joel, and seven out of the fourteen items therein mentioned found fulfillment on that day (Acts ii. 17, 18). The remaining seven (Acts ii. 19-21) await fulfillment as recorded in the book of Revelation. Lev. xxiii. 15-21 indicates the prophetic type of Pentecost and its reference to Israel. The two loaves, together with the two sticks (Ezek. xxxvii. 15-20), look forward to the spiritual union of Judah (Acts ii. 14) and Israel (Acts ii. 5-11).

The temple is an essential part of Israel's national life, and the plans of Ezek. xl.-xliii., together with the instructions regarding the priests and the offerings (in conjunction with Zech. xiv. 16-21), indicate clearly that Israel will in the day of their blessing have a glorious temple, a "house of prayer for all nations." You will see that until you definitely say what you believe Pentecost implied, it is impossible to discover your real difficulty.

No. 15.—J.A., DARLINGTON.

"When does the resurrection and judgment of 'the just' take place? Is it during the millennium? Does this include all the O.T. saints who have lived since Adam? Do the rest wait for their resurrection till after the millennium? Who are included in the judgment of the great white throne? When does the persecution and flight of the church (i.e., 'the woman' of Rev. xii. 6) into the wilderness take place?"

Your questions will be difficult to answer in a short space, largely owing to the need there is to dispossess our minds of the idea that the millennium is the period during which all unfulfilled prophecy will reach its fulfillment. The millennial kingdom is largely one of reward; all who enter it by the first resurrection (Rev. iii. 21; xx. 4) will be those who have definitely suffered for the witness of Jesus and for the word of God—the "overcomers" concerning whose history the book is full. After the 1,000 years, and before the great white throne is a period whose length we have no means of measuring; it is spoken of as "the ages of the ages" (Rev. xx. 10) during which much O.T. prophecy will be fulfilled. Dan. xii. 1, 2 places resurrection in close conjunction with the great tribulation, and makes no mention of the intervening thousand years of the millennium, just as in John v. 29 those that come forth to the "resurrection of life" are not separated by any time mark from those who come forth to a resurrection of judgment. This may be explained on the principle which applies to the close proximity of the suffering and the glory of the Lord Jesus, the interval being silently passed over, or it may indicate that all of these are raised together. O.T. saints, like believers now, differed much in their faithfulness and watchfulness, and differences of position so far as reward is concerned are indicated in regard to them. Some obtained a good report through faith, who thereby will obtain a better resurrection (Heb. xi. 35). This seems to indicate that some O.T. saints will be raised in a different company and for a different glory than others.

As to those who stand before the great white throne, the Scripture speaks of them simply as "the dead" (Rev. xx. 12, 13), giving no moral titles other than "small and great." They are judged according to their works. The Gentiles who knew not the law (Rom. ii.) will be among them. It is not a necessary conclusion to say that if any one stands before the great white throne that such a one is lost. It is true that he has lost the eonian kingdom and glory, but it by no means follows that he will be cast into the lake of fire. The words of the original of Rev. xx. 15 are definite:--

> "If ANY ONE (singular) was not found written in the book of life HE was cast into the lake of fire."

Fuller answers to your questions will come in the articles on the Revelation. Regarding the time of the woman's persecution (Rev. xii.), Matt. xxiv. 15 indicates it as the time of the Antichrist's open desecration of the temple. This seems to be the same period as "the midst of the seven" of Dan. ix. 27. Rev. xii. 6, 14 gives periods of time equal to three and a half years (see also Rev. xi. 12).

Do not allow your mind to be bound by the idea that only one period of seven years ("the last seven of Dan. ix.") is necessarily the only prophetic period left. We have before us strong scriptural evidence that a threefold seven is indicated by Dan. ix. As possible for the time covered by the Revelation. This we shall put forward in due course.

No. 16.—UNSIGNED.--"Who is the Porter in John x. 3?"

It is impossible to answer with certainty. It is part of a "proverb" (verse 6) translated there "parable." In the explanation that follows (verses 7-18) the interest centres around the Shepherd as the door of the sheep, and the one who gives His life for the sheep. The only passage in these verses that has the remotest reference to the Porter is verse 15. "As the Father knoweth Me." Subsequently, in verses 24-42 the question concerning whether the Saviour was "the Christ" or not is revived. His answer is a reference to the works which He did in His Father's name. This is followed by the words, "My sheep hear My voice, and I know them and they follow Me." Here we are taken back to the opening verses of John v.; and it will be seen that where, in the "proverb," Christ speaks of the "Porter," in the two explanations He speaks of the witness of the Father.

There is a special reference here also to the witness of John the Baptist. He declared that the reason why he came baptising was "that He (Christ) should be made manifest to Israel," and John it was that opened the door to the Good Shepherd in the first instance, which, combined with the voice from heaven (Matt. iii.) proved to all who had ears to hear that here, in the Person of the Saviour, was the true Shepherd. This seems to be the meaning of the "Porter" in John x. 3.

No. 17.—"What is the meaning of first part of Isa. liii. 12?"

"Therefore will I divide Him a portion with the great,
And He shall divide the spoil with the strong" (A.V.).

These words are a part of a section devoted to the reward and triumph who follow the great work of redemption. This section includes verse 10 to verse 12.

The following is a simple structure of the portion:--

A | 10-. His soul made an offering for sin.
B | -10, 11-. Reward; seed, days, pleasure, satisfied.
C | -11. Justification and bearing iniquities.
B | 12-. Reward; therefore spoil divided with strong.
A | -12. Because He poured out His soul unto death; sin, intercession.

The word translated twice "divide," is from the Hebrew Chalag "to be smooth, even, equable." In Isa. xxxiv. 17 we may see its close connection with the apportioning of an inheritance. The idea underlying the word is that there is a perfectly equable distribution made. When you also observe that in the large structure of Isa. lii. and liii., the passage

lii. 13-15, corresponds in the structure to liii. 10-12, this equal apportioning is emphasized. "AS many were astonished at Thee"—by reason of the marks of His suffering—"SO" shall they be surprised at the evidence of His glory when He is "exalted and extolled" and shall be "very high."

We next observe that this dividing is connected with two persons.

> "Therefore will I divide . . . . . and HE shall divide," and also observe "with the great" and "with the strong."

There is something of a parallel here to such passages as, "Ask of Me, and I will give the heathen, thine inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth thy possession" (Psa. ii. 8).

The reward of the Saviour is, in part, entered by those who by His grace overcome. Take for example Rev. iii. 21, "To him that overcometh will I grant to sit with Me in My throne, even as I overcame, and am set down with My Father in His throne." Still closer to the point is Rev. ii. 26, 27, for there Psa. ii. 8, 9, which originally is the fulfillment of "I will divide," is quoted as of the believer, "he shall divide."

Heb. i. 9 throws light on the expression "therefore will I divide Him a portion with the great," for it declares that "God hath anointed Thee with the oil of gladness above thy fellows." Or again in Heb. i. 4, "he hath by inheritance obtained a more excellent name than" the angels, being indeed raise far above principality and power.

You might notice the context of the first occurrence in Isaiah of "dividing the spoil" (ix. 3). It is the time of deliverance and of the accession of the Son of David to His throne. Or in xxxiii. 23, where Israel's restoration is in view, and the King is seen in His beauty, in direct contrast, and in answer to Isa. liii., where His visage being more marred than any man, had no beauty that Israel should desire Him. We trust these few thoughts will point you in the direction of a fuller understanding of this and related passages.

No. 18.—T.J.M.—"Regarding Rom. xvi. 25, 26: I have never yet been able to interpret this Scripture as referable to the members of the One Body."

Neither do we believe that this passage refers to the mystery as revealed in Ephesians. In Romans xvi. 25, the mystery under consideration is qualified by the following statements.

(1) It hath been silenced in age times.
(2) It was made manifest at the time of writing the Epistles.
(3) It was made known to all nations for the obedience of faith.

Of the mystery of Ephesians it is written that it had been hidden by God since the ages—a much stronger expression than "silenced" or "hushed." The mystery of Ephesians was not revealed through Paul until he was a prisoner. In the epistle to the Romans he is a free man, making plans for wider missionary efforts.

The reference to "all nations for the obedience of faith," links this passage with the first chapter (i. 5). To us, now, there is possibly no mystery as to the evangelizing of the Gentiles, but until the Apostle Paul received the ministry of the reconciliation, even a pious Gentile like Cornelius would be reckoned by Peter as "common and unclean" (Acts x. 28). The estrangement of the Gentiles (Rom. i. 18-32) necessitated the reconciliation. But that this would take place, and when, and how, was not spoken of in the Scriptures. So it is that in Rom. xvi. 25 Paul's gospel is linked with the mystery that had been hushed or kept quiet during the age times, but was made manifest when he, the Apostle to the Gentiles, received the commission unto all nations for the obedience of faith. The One Body and the mystery of Ephesians is nowhere in sight. Your emphasis in your letter on "SINCE" the world began is based on the A.V. There is no word for "since" in the original of this passage.

No. 19.—M.M.B.--"Re Eph. i. 15, 16. Should these verses be translated as follows, leaving out ten agapen as Lachman, or should they be retained?"

'Therefore, I, too, hearing of the faith which relates to you in the Lord Jesus, and that which is for all the saints.' The editor of another magazine omits these two words also. He says, 'What is the force of the contrast between you and all the saints? In the Apostle's day there were many of the circumcision still alive who were looking forward to an earthly allotment. Their faith is not our faith. But here the Apostle speaks of a faith which refers to us in contrast to that which relates to them, and he prays, etc.

The weight of evidence, supported by the Numerics New Testament is in favour of omitting the words translated "the love."

It is certainly true that the faith of the members of the One Body differs essentially in many respects from those called under other dispensations. If this be the meaning of the passage, "all the saints" must be taken to mean not "all," but all those outside the One Body. While there is scriptural usage for the limitation of "all," we cannot ourselves believe that this is the meaning of the passage. We too might ask what is the force of the Apostle's reference to his "hearing" of these two phases of faith? We would ask your consideration of another way of looking at the passage, and then leave the decision with you. "All the saints," in iii. 17-19 is an expression that means, there, the believers in the One Body—even though the word "you" is used as well. Again, in vi. 18, "all the saints" refers to those who believe with the same faith as the Ephesian believers, even though contrasted with Paul's personal "me." So far as the addresses of this Epistle are concerned, the Apostle does not recognize any distinctions between them. The "both" are regarded as "made one" when the Epistle was written. Some make a distinction between "the saints" that were at Ephesus, and "the faithful" that were in Christ Jesus. May not the passage, which some say teaches a distinction, be there to teach the exact opposite? With peculiar emphasis the Apostle has said that for the members of the One Body there is "one faith," and he speaks also of "the unity of the faith." So essential is this, that the members of the One Body can never comprehend what is breadth, and length and depth and height, or know the love of Christ which passeth knowledge, or be filled unto all the fulness of God, apart from comprehending it with "all the saints." Their prayers too must embrace all who in every place are members of the One Body; they pray for "all the saints." So in Eph. i. 15, 16, the faith of the Ephesians believers was one with "all the saints." Instead of instituting a contrast the Apostle draws a comparison. Their faith in the Lord Jesus was the same as that for all the saints. That the saints here are members of the One Body seems evident by their inclusion in verse 18, where, definitely linked with the exclusive hope of His calling, is the riches of the glory of His inheritance in the saints. Scripture and the structure would lead us to believe that the "saints" are the same people in both verses, even as they are in ii. 19, iv. 12, v. 3. This, of course, is but the expression of belief of one who is still learning, and still unlearning, but, as the interpretation suggested is likewise merely the belief of another such learner, we do not hesitate to place before you the alternative, which in our judgment is nearer the true meaning of the passage.

> No. 20.—C.H.K., MINN.--"My difficulty lies in getting hold thoroughly of the truth as to whether the church begins at Pentecost or after Acts xxviii. The latter would be clear to me if the 70 weeks of Daniel did not hinder. It is generally supposed that the Kingdom was suspended at the cutting off of Messiah until after the church age. But I see clearly that the dispensation of Israel was not set in abeyance until the period of the end of Acts xxviii."

The writer enclosed a diagram illustrating the generally accepted view, namely, that the 69th week ended just before the crucifixion of Christ, and that therefore the "final seven years" are all that remain to complete the number, and that these are entirely future and are found in the Book of the Revelation.

We wonder how many (or perhaps how few), there are who have faced this problem? The answer to the question is too important to reply to hastily in the space we have before us. Before we endeavour to set forward the answer, we would seek to make the importance of the question, and its real significance, evident. C. H. K. recognizes that the evidence in favour of Acts xxviii. as the starting point of the church as against Acts ii. is strong, but the interpretation of Dan. ix., upheld by names he mentions, but which we refrain from repeating, deters him. It ought also to deter others. If the accepted interpretation of Dan. ix. be true, the Acts of the Apostles comes in the gap, and Israel is not reckoned with. We have shown, and there is abundant evidence in the book, that Israel is prominent in the Acts, and that the hope of Israel is entertained to the end. For the answer to this question we are indebted to the labours of two brethren, whose studies in this subject we believe have been blessed of God. After having weighed the matter over for some time, we have arrived at the conclusion that our inveterate enemy, tradition, is still at work here.

C. H. K. says, "The latter (i.e. Acts xxviii. as the beginning of the church period) would be clear to me if the 70 weeks of Daniel did not hinder." We suggest that the truer statement would be, "The latter would be clear to me if the traditional interpretation of the 70 weeks of Daniel did not hinder." The true interpretation of Daniel ix. confirms instead of hinders the teaching concerning Acts xxviii. We shall endeavour to find space in our next number to deal with this question, and trust, meanwhile, that our readers will ponder the problem and consider whether they can consistently believe that

(1) The Acts deals with Israel as a people until the last chapter.
(2) That God's dealings with them as a people ceased at the crucifixion of Christ, and will not be resumed again until the 70th week is reached.
(3) That in the face of the definite Scriptural division of the periods in Daniel ix., we are justified in adding together and calling "the 69th week" what God has kept asunder, and calls the 62nd week?
(4) Supposing that to reconsider Dan. ix. should lead to controverting the teaching of beloved children of God—should this deter us in our quest for truth? Page 28 "Dispensational Truth" perpetuates the error of the "69th seven."

"Apostolic Mistakes."
pp. 155 - 157 (158?)

There are two very different classes of people who find it fitting to their conception of truth to speak rather freely concerning "Apostolic mistakes". The one class do not believe the Scriptures to be inspired, and therefore any teaching or action of the apostles that does not fall into line with their more advanced ideas is put down to ignorance. The other class believe that Scripture is inspired, but they have failed to discern the things that differ. They approach the Book of the Acts fully persuaded that it deals with the "Church". They find their ideas concerning the church in the Acts of the Apostles continually confronted and challenged by some word or act of the apostles. Hence the convenient term, Apostolic Mistakes. It does not seem to have occurred to them that if the apostles could be so grievously mistaken regarding such fundamental things, their claim to inspiration and God-given authority is undermined, and so in this respect are similar to those who deny the Word of God.

One of the so called apostolic mistakes is the question of Acts i. 6. "Lord, wilt Thou at this time restore again the kingdom of Israel?" We are told that this question betrays a sorry failure on the part of the apostles to understand the true significance of things. To suit the accepted ideas of most orthodox teachers, the apostles should have been found enquiring concerning the "Church".

Before we consider this question, we shall be profited, and possibly humbled, by observing the close parallel existing between the end of Luke xxiv. and the opening verses of Acts i. To make this apparent we set out the verses in parallel columns.

Luke xxiv. 36-53.	Acts i. 1-12.
36-43. "And as they thus spake, Jesus Himself stood in the midst of them . . . . . and said . . . . . Behold My hands and My feet that it is I Myself: handle Me and see; for a spirit hath not flesh and bones as ye see Me have . . . . . and they gave Him a piece of a broiled fish and of an honeycomb. And He took it, and did eat before them."	This lengthy and detailed account (verses 1 and 2) Luke summarizes without detail in the Acts by the words of verse 3. "To whom also He showed Himself alive after His passion BY MANY INFALLIBLE PROOFS." The reader is supposed to be acquainted with the details previously written.

44. "And He said unto them, These are the words which I spake unto you, being yet present with you, that all things must be fulfilled, which were written in the law of Moses, and in the Prophets, and in the Psalms concerning Me."	In verse 3, this testimony is summarized by the words: "speaking of the things pertaining to the kingdom of God." It will be of service here to note how the continued reading of Luke xxiv. and Acts i. helps us in understanding Acts xxviii. 23, and incidentally marks two corresponding members in the structure. "And when they (the chief of the Jews) had appointed him a day, there came many to him into his lodging; to whom he expounded and testified the kingdom of God (Acts i. 3) persuading them concerning Jesus, both out of the law of Moses and out of the prophets". The message of the last chapter of the Acts is the same as the last chapter of Luke.
47-49. "Repentance and remission of sins should be preached in His name among all nations, beginning at Jerusalem. And ye are witnesses of these things. And behold, I send the promise of My Father upon you: but tarry ye in the city of Jerusalem, until ye be endued with power from on high."	Luke alludes to this in verses 4-8: "He commanded them that they should not depart from Jerusalem, but wait for the promise of the Father, which ye have heard of Me . . . . . ye shall be baptized with holy spirit not many days hence . . . . . ye shall receive power, after that the (aforementioned) holy spirit is come upon you; and ye shall be witnesses unto Me both in Jerusalem and in all Judea, and in Samaria, and unto the uttermost parts of the earth."

Luke xxiv. 50-53 further records the leading out to Bethany, the Ascension and the return of the disciples to Jerusalem, each incident being repeated in the opening chapter of the Acts. If once we acknowledge that Luke xxiv. and Acts i. overlap, that they speak of the same period and persons, one great fact emerges which is fatal to the "mistake" theory. Considering the passage in Acts i. alone, we find that the Lord was seen of the apostles for forty days, and that He spoke of the things pertaining to the kingdom of God. The idea we are combating is that though the Lord was speaking about the church, the apostles were under the mistaken notion that He was speaking concerning the kingdom of Israel. Attention is drawn to the fact that whereas the Lord says "kingdom of God", they say "kingdom to Israel", thereby showing how utterly they had failed to understand the teaching of the Lord during those forty days. It all sounds very plausible, especially as it is practically accepted almost as a truism that "the church began at Pentecost". The moment we bring Luke xxiv. to bear upon the passage, we see that the "mistakes" are no longer apostolic, but are the mistakes of their self styled critics.

These critics say the apostles did not understand the Lord's meaning. Luke xxiv. says that they did. "Then opened He their understanding, that they might understand the Scriptures" (45-49). Here is proof positive. To teach that the apostles were ignorant of the Lord's meaning, or that they misunderstood the Scriptures is in direct contradiction of that which is written. To feel a necessity to refuse the testimony of this passage is of itself a conviction that some notion held regarding the message of the Acts is fundamentally wrong. So long as the tradition of man is held that the church began at Pentecost, so long will its adherents make void the Word of God in bowing to their traditions. If there is anything certain arising out of this consideration it is that the question concerning the restoration of the kingdom to Israel was an enlightened one, and one arising out of the fact that they "understood" the "opened Scriptures". The answer of the Lord also points in the same direction. He does not rebuke them for their ignorance or their bias, He simply deals with one part of their question which had to do with the time of Israel's restoration, telling them that these times and seasons were not the subject of revelation.

CRUCIFIED (Gal. ii. 20).
pp. 75 - 77

The statement of Paul in Gal. ii. 20, "I have been crucified with Christ," is one to be pondered over and not to be lightly taken on to our lips.

True it may be that by the grace of God we may take our stand with Paul and say that we have died with Christ, but the added thought of being crucified together with Him seems to convey something more. The term is used again in Gal. v. 24 & vi. 14., and these passages seem to teach that crucifixion with Christ involves the passions and desires of the flesh, and the crucifixion of self to the world.

> "But they who are Christ's crucified the flesh, with the passions and desires. If we live by spirit, by spirit we should also walk."
> "But it may not be for me to boast, save in the cross of the Lord Jesus Christ, through which the world has been crucified to me, and I to the world . . . . . a new creation . . . . . walk by this rule."

The life lived after having been crucified does not follow the leadings of the flesh nor seek the things of the world. Its walk is by spirit and according to the new creation. The thought seems to be not so much the fact that they who have died with Christ live by Him, but that having by grace penetrated somewhat into the "offence of the cross," and learned God's opinion of the flesh and the world, they seek grace to manifest the life they have in Christ by a walk in harmony with their calling. Oh for grace to rise to such heights as these!

"The life I now live in the flesh" (Gal. ii. 20).

We are apt sometimes to forget that the blessings of redemption operate now. The Apostle Paul was keenly awake to the present claims of God in Christ. When rebuking Peter for not walking in accord with the truth of the gospel he makes the interesting personal statement:--

> "I have been crucified with Christ; yet I live, yet no longer I, but Christ lives in me, but the life I now live in the flesh, I live by the faith of the Son of God, Who loved me, and gave Himself up for me."

If Paul could say that he had died to the law, and had been crucified with Christ (Gal. ii. 20), he must have lived a resurrection life if he lived at all. He says, "yet I live," but explains, "yet no longer I, but there liveth in me—Christ." To make his meaning quite clear he continues, "The life I now live." There is no doubt about it being present, still further he says, "in the flesh." There is no doubt that it is not merely dealing with spiritual promises or experiences. These words bring before us the tremendous fact that the redeemed believer may experience "the power of His resurrection" before resurrection comes.

II Cor. iv. 10, 11 is no less emphatic:--

> "Always bearing about in the body the putting to death of the Lord Jesus, in order that the life also of Jesus may be manifested in our body. For always we who are the living, are delivered unto death for Jesus' sake, in order that the life of Jesus also may be manifested in our mortal flesh."

So also from Rom. viii. 11:--

> "He Who raised up Christ from the dead will also quicken your mortal bodies through the indwelling of His Spirit in you."

Rom. iv. provides us with a scriptural example of one whose physical mortal body was actually "quickened" (read verses 17-20), and Rom. xii. declares that our bodies may be yielded as living sacrifices.

May these possibilities stirs up to pray more intelligently that we may know what is the exceeding greatness of the power which He wrought in Christ when He raised Him from the dead.

"This Vile Body" (Phil. iii. 21).

We suppose it to be unnecessary to labour the proof that the R.V. rendering, "the body of our humiliation," is the correct one. Phil. iii. 21 is not speaking of "the flesh" in its connection with sin and corruption. While it is true that all have by nature a body of flesh which is the seat and instrument of sin, Col. ii. 11 tells us the happy news that it has been "put off" in Christ. "The body of humiliation" has reference to quite different teaching. In Phil. ii. 5-9 we read:--

> "Let this mind be in you that was also in Christ Jesus . . . . . Who humbled Himself . . . . . wherefore God also hath highly exalted Him."

In Phil. iv. 12 we read that Paul could say:--

> "I know both how to be abased (to be humbled), and I know how to abound."

"The body of humiliation" refers to the experience that Paul had of fellowship with the sufferings of Christ. He humbled Himself and was glorified, and no one has the right to presume that "conformity to the body of His glory" is his assured destiny who knows not here and now "conformity to His death" (iii. 10). Mind and body must agree. If we look forward to having a body of glory like unto the Lord, is it too much to ask that we have now the mind that was in Christ Jesus, or at least some approximation to it? Unless there be harmony between mind and body there is insanity and the Scripture gives no warrant that every believer may claim as his own, as a matter of course, either the body of humiliation or the body of glory. Paul with this in view could say, "Christ shall be magnified in my body."

We shall all be with the Lord in glory; some, however, will reign with Him (II Tim. ii. 12), some will receive the prize (Phil. iii. 14), for such will have suffered with Him and shared consciously and willingly in His humiliation.

The Hope and the Prize need to be carefully distinguished.

ETERNAL LIFE.
pp. 105 - 110

Among the doctrines which come before the student of Scripture in his search into its teaching regarding human destiny, is that of eternal or everlasting life. In order to avoid the traditional interpretation, and also to keep out of sight any ideas of our own, we shall transliterate the word translated "Eternal," and call it aionion throughout this enquiry. Our present quest is to discover as far as possible all that Scripture says regarding aionion life, to whom it is given, upon what basis, whether it is exclusively proffered to faith, or to works, or to both; whether it is a present possession, or a future one; whether it has to do with the final or a transition state, and anything further that may be learned by a careful and prayerful study.

The first occurrence of the words aionion life is in Matt. xix. 16, "good Master, what good thing shall I do that I may have aionion life." It will be observed that "doing good" is directly associated with "having aionion life." The Lord, it is true, corrects the error contained in the loose usage of the word "good," but does not correct the idea that good works, or keeping the commandments, were necessary for the attainment of this life, for He said:--

> "If thou wilt enter the life (the article seems to indicate the life under consideration, namely, aionion life), KEEP THE COMMANDMENTS."

Reading further, we find the Lord speaking of "being perfect," and of telling the young man to go and sell all that he had and give to the poor, to follow the Lord, and that he would have "treasure in heaven." We know how the young man failed. Although he had "kept from his youth up" all the commandments, yet he did not reach the standard necessary for "aionion life," or "for treasure in heaven."

One cannot help comparing these two expressions together, and asking whether they both refer to the same thing. In verses 27-29 Peter asks a question arising out of the failure of the young man, and is answered, and there again a twofold description is given of the result of "forsaking all and following." To the disciples the Lord held out the prospect of sitting upon twelve thrones in the regeneration, and supplements that by a promise to "every one that hath forsaken . . . . .", that they "shall receive an hundred-fold, and shall inherit aionion life." Here, in place of "treasure in heaven," is found "sitting on thrones" and "receiving a hundred-fold." We must also bear in mind that the Lord did not say that a rich man could not enter into the kingdom of heaven, but that he would only enter with great difficulty.

It will be observed that the Lord uses the word "inherit" with aionion life. He never misused words, and it will be our wisdom to keep this idea of an inheritance before us as we continue our study. Mark and Luke record the incident of the rich young man, and in their Gospels the word "inherit" is used by the young man himself. Readers must not think this to be a discrepancy. The young man in all probability spoke Aramaic, and the Holy Spirit has given us in the translation two Greek words, "To have" and "to inherit," to help us to understand the meaning of the term. Mark's record clarifies our conception somewhat as may be seen by the following slight variation from Matthew's record, Mark x. 17-31, "what shall I do that I may inherit aionion life?"

We have heard it said that the young man was very wrong to have boasted that he had "kept all these things from his youth up," yet Mark tells us that when the young man had made this statement, "Jesus beholding him, loved him, and said, One thing thou lackest, etc."

Yet one other item is explained by Mark and Luke. Matt. xix. 29 leaves us with no settled knowledge as to when the "hundredfold" should be received. The record in Mark is very explicit, "he shall receive a hundred-fold now in this time . . . . . and in the coming age life aionion." So also in Luke xviii. 30. Luke records two occasions when the Lord was definitely asked the way to obtain aionion life. In chapter xviii. we read of the rich young ruler as in Matthew and in Mark, and in Luke x. 25-28 a certain lawyer asks the question tempting Him, but to him also it was shown that inheriting aionion life is linked with doing the commandments.

Many have felt how diametrically opposed to the way of justification and life these passages are to the doctrine revealed through Paul, and, failing to discern the things that differ, they have attempted to make the Lord teach the rich young ruler that aionion life was to be attained only by faith and not by works. In no other branch of study would such biased reading be tolerated. Nothing is clearer than that aionion life was connected with doing, keeping, forsaking, and following. Matthew, writing with the kingdom of the heavens before him, uses aionion life with special reference to that period. The Lord Himself links it with the kingdom and the regeneration, and the time when He shall sit upon the throne of His glory.

Once again, and only once, He refers to that throne, and it is there we find the next and last reference in Matthew to aionion life. Matt. xxv. 31, 32, "He shall sit upon (the) throne of His glory and before Him shall be gathered all the nations." The nations are divided into two sections, the one section hear the words, "Come ye blessed of My Father, INHERIT the kingdom prepared for you since the overthrow of the word . . . . . the righteous into life aionion." Here it will be seen that these nations "inherit a kingdom," are "righteous," and enter into "aionion life." What is the basis of the entry? We unhesitatingly say, with the scripture before us, Works! This is the Lord's own explanation. "FOR I was an hungered . . . . . thirsty . . . . . Then shall the RIGHTEOUS answer Him saying, Lord, when saw we Thee an hungered . . . . . thirsty, etc.?" They had done it unto His brethren, and were not conscious that it was received by the Lord as being rendered unto Himself. This therefore rules out the idea often read into the passage that it was an act of faith; faith does not enter into the passage. The rest of the nations are addressed as "Ye cursed," and while the righteous inherit the prepared kingdom, they enter the prepared fire, "aionion fire prepared for the devil and his angels." "These shall go away into aionion punishment."

The basis for this punishment is the negation of the kind deeds shown by the righteous. This is the Lord's own explanation. "FOR I was a hungered . . . . . thirsty . . . . . Then shall they also answer Him, saying, Lord, when saw we Thee an hungered . . . . . thirsty, etc."

The way in which the Lord deals with these two classes shows how exactly He will keep to the law, "Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself." Failure to observe this cost these nations the kingdom and aionion life. Instead, they received aionion punishment in aionion fire. The relation which is observed between the subject of aionion life and the set of parables under consideration in other articles is important.

The parable which precedes the first reference to aionion life in Matthew is the parable of the wicked unforgiving servant. He is delivered to the tormentors (same root as the word used so often in the Revelation), till he should pay all that was due. This is parallel with the passage in Matt. v. 26, "Verily I say unto thee, thou shalt by no means come out thence, till thou hast paid the uttermost farthing." The parable which immediately follows Matt. xix., and which commences with the word "For," is the parable of the householder and vineyard where the penny a day seems to be in the parable what the aionion life is in the plain statement of xix. 29.

The parable that immediately precedes the last reference to aionion life in Matthew is the parable of the faithful and unprofitable servants. The faithful enters into the joy of his Lord, the unprofitable servant is cast into outer darkness, where there is weeping and gnashing of teeth. All these parables have service or manner of life before them, with their consequent rewards and punishments. It is so with regard to the way in which aionion life, punishment, and fire are used in Matthew.

There are many who do not hesitate to affirm that the aionion fire of Matt. xxv. is the second death of Rev. xx. 14. Colour is given to this interpretation by the fact that in Rev. xx. 10 we read that:--

> "The devil that deceived them was cast into the lake of fire and brimstone, where the beast and the false prophet (are), and they shall be tormented day and night unto the ages of the ages."

Let us not be too hasty in our conclusions. In the one case the fire is for torment day and night unto the ages of the ages. In the other case it is definitely called the second death. Death and Hades are cast into the second death and nothing is said about Satan. So far as we have any knowledge, the devil has never yet died, and if he be cast into the lake of fire of Rev. xx. 14, it would be the first death, not the second, for him.

The special emphasis upon "the overcomer" in the Revelation has already been pointed out in the articles dealing with that book. It should be kept in mind when considering the meaning of the passages relating to punishment. Note the alternatives in the addresses to the seven churches in chapters ii. and iii. So far as we can understand the term, aionion life may be for a limited period, and may end. Life in Christ is another matter, and must on no account be confused with it.

In Matt. vii. 14, and xviii. 8, 9 are the only other references to "life" found in Matthew. We there learn of the "strait gate and narrow way that lead to life" with its alternative "destruction"; and in xviii. 8, 9 we read that it is better to enter into life halt, or maimed, rather than having two hands or two feet to be cast into the aionion fire. This aionion fire is further interpreted for us by the fact that the next verse says, "rather than having two eyes to be cast into the Gehenna of fire." The danger of the Gehenna of fire is first mentioned in Matt. v. 22; a parallel passage with xviii. 9 is found in Matt. v. 29, 30. The destruction of soul and body is referred to Gehenna in x. 28 (this should be considered over against the losing of the soul in Matt. xvi. 25, mistranslated "life"). The proselytes of the Pharisees and Scribes are asked, "How can ye escape the judgment of Gehenna?" (Matt. xxiii. 33). Gehenna occurs only in Matthew, Mark, Luke, and James. It is exclusively used in connection with the kingdom, and never comes into sight in the Church Epistles; it is the divine explanation of the aionion fire as used by Matthew.

Enough has been shown that aionion life and aionion punishment as found in Matthew have an entirely different aspect from that evangelical offer of life connected solely with faith in the sacrifice of the Lord Jesus. Neither faith nor the atonement are ever in view in the passages we have been studying. We hope to continue our studies in future issues.

Fundamentals of Dispensational Truth.

#1. Right Division.

pp. 1 - 3

From time to time, as new readers are added, it becomes necessary that a word should be given so that the beginner in these studies may not feel himself quite unprovided for.

We feel it unnecessary, we are thankful to say, to elaborate the first great fundamental, namely, the absolute inspiration of the original Scriptures, an inspiration extending to the very words and letters. We cannot conceive of any who deny the inspiration of Scripture finding much to their liking in The Berean Expositor. The fundamental that we would lay before the reader just now is contained in II Tim. ii. 15, "rightly dividing the Word of truth."

Accepting the Scripture as the Word of truth, we must exercise reference to the varying dispensations under which man has been placed. What was true under the dispensation of Law, may be false under the dispensation of Grace. One has only to read such epistles as Romans, or Galatians, to realize how true this is. The differences also that are mentioned as found under the Old Covenant and the New, are emphasized in the epistle to the Hebrews, and II Cor. iii. & iv. The teaching of the Gospel according to Matthew, with its emphasis upon the gospel of the kingdom of the heavens, is entirely different from the gospel say of the Epistle to the Ephesians. The presence and service of miraculous gifts, as recorded in the Gospels, the Acts, and the early Epistles of Paul, and the absence of such gifts in his prison ministry, demonstrate again the fact that under different dispensations God has been pleased to deal with men in different ways. The hopes of varying periods, too, differ in important details. The hope of Israel was centred in the Personal presence on the earth of the Messiah, and vitally connected with the throne of David. The hope of Abraham, and all who, like him, obtained a good report through faith (see Heb. xi. and Book of Revelation), was connected with "the city which hath the foundations," "the new Jerusalem, the holy city." The hope of the church of the one body is, that when "Christ, Who is our life, shall be made manifest, we shall also be made manifest with Him in glory" (Col. iii. 4).

The various ordinances that were enjoined at different times constitute another witness to the need for right division. Circumcision was enjoined very emphatically, as also the keeping of the Sabbath, yet one has only to read Paul's epistles to find a complete and drastic change. Baptism in water was once essentially connected with the gospel proclamation, repentance, and remission of sins. Water baptism, however, does not constitute a part of the teaching of the Word that relates to the church of the mystery. The Lord's Supper, with its inseparable link with the New Covenant, has no place in the dispensation of the mystery.

The order of Apostles, and the ministry generally, differ under different dispensations. Priesthood and sacrifices have ceased, and have no place at present with us. The Apostles of the Lamb do not include in their number the Apostles of the mystery connected with Paul. The organized gatherings of believers differ also. God's "people" are Israel, they constitute, or will constitute, a kingdom. An election from among them will constitute "a royal priesthood." The church formed during the period covered by the Acts of the Apostles will, together with an elect remnant of Israel, constitute the Bride (as distinguished from the Wife, who is to be restored after a long period of separation). The Church formed by God during the period covered by Israel's rejection commencing with the end of the Acts, constitutes not the Bride of Christ, or the subjects of the kingdom of the heavens, but the Body of Christ, the fulness of Him that filleth all in all.

Now the reader who has not studied the Scriptures very fully, will perhaps have a host of objections and questions which he would interject were we speaking to him instead of writing. We sympathized with all such, and the preparation of this series is our tangible expression of that sympathy. In this article we have called attention to the need for right division. In subsequent issues we shall hope to take up point by point, and show the teaching of the Word concerning it. It will be our endeavour to write simply, and to confine ourselves as far as possible to one subject at a time, avoiding the tendency to use parenthesis, which we find is somewhat characteristic of our pen.

Letters from those for whom the articles are written will be appreciated, and will indicate what are the special difficulties with which we ought to deal.

#2. The Bible a Book of Purpose.

pp. 37 - 41

Having considered the fact that there are many and great differences in the various dispensations, it will be well to observe that all these different lines of truth are united, inasmuch as God is working out a mighty purpose, affecting heaven and earth, and that these changes of dispensational dealings instead of indicating experiment of caprice, are so many links in a wondrous chain. None but a superficial reader of the Bible will assume that the Scriptures are given to explain everything, or to answer all the enquiries of the human mind. There are some things which God kept secret for thousand of years, never revealed until He committed them to the Apostle Paul (see Eph. iii.). There are some things concerning which we are told hardly anything. Take for example the Bible record of Satan. His first introduction into the page of Scripture is as a fallen being (Gen. iii.). No explanation is offered, no reason is given. We start the record of the purpose of God as pertains to man with the revealed yet unexplained fact. As it is with Satan's beginning, so with the last we hear of him. In Rev. xx. he is put into the lake of fire there to be tormented unto the ages of the ages. What happens to him at the end of that period Scripture does not say. Satan may be referred to under the figure of the king of Tyre in Ezek. xxviii. 11-19, but it may refer to some other being, and cannot be used as a definite argument.

The nearer Scripture approaches that section of God's purpose that is connected with Israel, the plainer and more definite it becomes. Israel's history fills the bulk of the Bible. The Nations have a comparatively small space, while the Church occupies a small portion of the New Testament. The things in heaven, the spiritual powers, are connected with the great purpose unfolded in the Word, yet we know very little of what their place in that purpose will be.

There are many references in the Scriptures to the fact of a purpose, and it may be well for us to establish this before we proceed to enquire into the details of that purpose.

Rom. viii. 28, ix. 11, Eph. i. 11, and II Tim. i. 9 are sufficient to show that the salvation of men is part of a purpose. The word prothesis means "a placing before," and indicates a well-considered plan. That this plan or purpose is unalterable Eph. i. 9 and Jer. li. 29 will be sufficient to prove.

The words in II Tim. i. 9, "Before the world began," are not strictly true as a translation. The original reads pro chronõn aiõniõn, and should be rendered "Before age-times." Another occurrence of this same expression is found in Titus i. 2, where a somewhat parallel doctrine is discovered. Before the age-times, then, the purpose of God was formed, and in harmony with this is the teaching that the members of the One Body were "chosen in Him before the foundation of the world" (these words will be dealt with shortly, D.V.). Not only is it important to see that the purpose or plan of God was made before the age times, but that the very ages themselves are necessary part and platform for the unfolding and ripening of that purpose. Eph. iii. 11 (A.V.) speaks of an "eternal purpose." Now while the thought in these words is very majestic, the teaching of the passage is not strictly rendered by them. The word "eternal" is an adjective, whereas in Eph. iii. 11 it is not the adjective aiõniõs that is used, but aiõn, "age." The true rendering of the passage, therefore, should be, "According to a purpose of the ages."

The Bible is occupied with that purpose. The Bible spans the ages. What was before the ages, and what lies beyond, is not strictly within the scope of the Book. Men labour to explain and emphasize eternity. Philosophy may burden the mind with the effort to grasp "that which has neither beginning nor end, that which has neither centre nor circumference," but the Bible does not. Scripture commences with, "In the beginning God." From that basis, the Scriptures commence to unfold the purpose of the ages.

Having surveyed the Scriptures with regard to the fact of the purpose, we next consider some passages which relate to its fulfillment. Here at once we learn that the accomplishment of God's purpose does not rest with the creature, but with God Himself. Eph. i. 11 is emphatic on this:--

> "Being predestinated according to the purpose of Him Who worketh all things after the counsel of His own will."

Isa. xlvi. 9-11 also shows that the O.T. equally with the New demonstrates this fact:--

> "I am God, and there is none like Me, declaring the end from the beginning, and from ancient times the things that are not yet done, saying, My counsel shall stand, and I will do all My pleasure . . . . . yea I have spoken it, I will also bring it to pass; I have purposed it, I will also do it."

We will not multiply passages, the Bible is insistent on this grand fact that the God Who purposes is the God also Who fulfils. This was the secret of Abraham's faith, for it is recorded in Rom. iv. 17-21:--

> "Before Him Whom he believed, even God Who quickeneth the dead and calleth those things which be not as though they were . . . . . being fully persuaded that what He had promised He was able also to perform."

Nothing is so strengthening to faith, even in the small details of daily life, as this glorious fact that God is the fulfiller of His own will.

The next truth we would bring to notice is that the great centre of the purpose of the ages is the Lord Jesus Christ. Going back into the past we find that creation is the work of the Son of God. John in chapter i. of his Gospel speaks of Christ as the Word, Who was God (verse 1), Who became flesh, the only begotten of the Father (verse 14), and says:--

> "All things were made by Him, and without Him was not anything made that was made" (John i. 3).

Heb. i. 10 says of Him:--

> "And Thou, Lord, in the beginning has laid the foundation of the earth; and the heavens are the works of thine hands."

Col. i. 16 speaks further of the creation, not only of visible but of invisible and mighty beings in the heavens, yet all the creatures of the Son of God. The first man Adam is "a figure of Him that was to come" (Rom. v. 14), and is placed in contrast with "the last Adam", who is a life-giving spirit, "the second man" who is the Lord from heaven (I Cor. xv. 45-47). The promise of the seed of the woman (Gen. iii.) finds its fulfilment in the Person and work of the Son of God. All typical events and institutions, such as the Ark built by Noah, the Passover Lamb, the Tabernacle, the Offerings, the Priesthood, all find their anti-type and fulfilment in Christ.

Every prominent figure of the Old Testament pre-figures either Christ or Antichrist. We have only to think of some like Joseph, David, Moses, Pharaoh and Joshua to see how fully this can be demonstrated. However stupendous may have been such interferences with the course of nature at the Flood, the redemption from Egypt, the giving of the Law from Sinai, or however important such events as the fresh start after the flood, the entry into Canaan, the setting up of David's throne, yet all these events but lead on to one point called by God "the fulness of the time," marked by the most wonderful event made known to men:--

> "When the fulness of the time was come, God sent forth His Son, made of a woman, made under the law; to redeem them that were under the law" (Gal. iv. 4, 5).

So the purpose unfolds, ever revealing more and more the central place that the Son of God holds in its development, until we read of its fruition and full accomplishment when the Son, having brought the purpose of the ages to a glorious consummation, hands over to God a perfected kingdom, that God may be all in all (I Cor. xv. 24-28).

Not only have we the fact, the fulfilment, and the glorious centre of this purpose, but we further learn that all creatures are in some way agents in the mighty plan. So far as mankind is concerned it is divided into three classes, two of them racial and one spiritual. First, we have the two national divisions of Jew and Gentiles. Israel's agency in the great purpose may be summed up in three particulars: (1) a chosen people, (2) a city (Jerusalem), and (3) a king (David typically, but Christ really). The Church, the spiritual agency, made up of an election from Jew and Gentile, constitutes the third agency. These three divisions run along the appointed ways without fusing, but draw near together by two great outstanding events, namely, the first and second coming of Christ.

Satan works along lines that closely resemble the working of God in some particulars, and his activities constitute a great opposing feature, overruled and made to contribute finally to the outworking of the purpose of the God of all grace.

After we have made clear, in another paper, the meaning of the purpose of the ages, we shall then be able to take up a little in detail the dispensations into which it is subdivided.

#3. The Ages.
The words aiõn and olam.
pp. 69 - 72

Much has been written regarding "eternity." Some teachers and preachers give one the impression, by their emphasis and repetition, that the soundness of their doctrine, their estimate of salvation, and their abhorrence of sin, will be largely gauged by the frequency and the vehemence with which the words eternity and eternal are employed.

We have not only of eternal life, eternal punishment, eternal gospel, eternal purpose, etc., which, as they are quoted from the A.V. may in some degree be excused, but we hear also of eternal sin, eternal death, and other phrases which find no warrant even in the A.V. Those for whom these papers are written should acquaint themselves with the fact that the words rendered eternal, everlasting, for ever, etc., signify a period or periods of time, which have had or will yet have a beginning, and which have had or will yet have an end; which are not only spoken of in the singular, but in the plural. In Volume I, pages 82-86, we touched just briefly upon the meaning of the Hebrew word olam, and the Greek word aiõn, words translated as of eternity, but words which by meaning and usage are limited to time. Our object then was a consideration of the teaching of Scripture relative to punishment; our object now is to consider the teaching of Scripture which is connected with these words themselves so far as they are fundamental to dispensational truth.

In the great majority of cases the word translated "everlasting," "eternal," "for ever", are renderings of the Greek aiõnios, aiõn, and the Hebrew olam. The A.V. renders aiõn by "world", "course", "age", "eternal", and, in conjunction with various prepositions, etc., "since the world began", "while the world standeth", "world without end," "from the beginning of the world," "for ever," "for evermore," and "for ever and ever."

The translation of a word that ranges from a world which had a beginning and will have an end, to an eternity which confessedly has neither beginning nor end, is too wide to be of service, especially when the choice of translation largely depends upon the bias of the translator. Olam, the Hebrew word, comes from a word meaning something hidden or secret (see "secret faults," Ps. xix. 12), and indicates a period of undefined limits. Aiõn, the Greek word, is used by the translators of the Septuagint to render the Hebrew olam into Greek, and this is the only true consistent meaning that we can give the word.

Students of the purpose of the ages will often find themselves turning the pages of Ecclesiastes, realizing in THE PREACHER one whose problems and experiences with regard to these things are often much like their own. In Ecclesiastes the word olam occurs seven times, and is translated by the A.V. as follows:--

i. 4. "The earth abideth for ever."
i. 10. "It hath been already of old time."
ii. 16. "There is no remembrance of the wise more than of the fool for ever."
iii. 11. "He hath set the world in their heart."
iii. 14. "I know that whatsoever God doeth, it shall be for ever."
ix. 6. "Neither have they any more a portion for ever."
xii. 5. "Man goeth to his long home."

Here we have "for ever," "old time," "world," and "long" as translations of the one word olam. Such a variety of renderings gives no connected thought, and consequently the evident relation of these passages is missed. Supposing we take the original word in each passage and translate it by the word "age," we at once realize that seven such references may contain much helpful teaching. Their order and connection likewise are made apparent, and their claim upon our attention is emphasized.

Olam in Ecclesiastes.

A | i. 4. The earth abideth to the age.—The passing generation.
B | i. 10. It hath been already in or to the ages.—Nothing new under the sun.
C | ii. 16. No remembrance of the wise more than of the fool to the age.—Forgotten in the days to come.
D | iii. 11. He hath set the age in their heart.—Beginning to end of God's work past finding out.
C | iii. 14. Whatsoever God doeth, it shall be to the age.—God's work remains.
B | ix. 6. Neither have they any more a portion to the age.—No portion under the sun.
A | xii. 5. Man goeth to his age home.—The passing generation.

Leaving these passages until we are more prepared to consider their teaching in detail, we pass on to another cluster of seven, this time in New Testament, namely, in Ephesians. There the word aiõn is translated as inconsistently as we found its parallel olam in Ecclesiastes.

i. 21. "This world."
ii. 2. "The course of this world."
ii. 7. "The ages to come."
iii. 9. "From the beginning of the world."
iii. 11. "Eternal purpose."
iii. 21. "Throughout all ages world without end."
vi. 12. "Rulers of the darkness of this world."

Here we have a strange assortment. This world, which had a beginning, but which has no end, the course of this world, and the eternal purpose. Translate the word aiõn consistently, and order, light, and instruction take place of human tradition and confusion.

Aiõn in Ephesians.

A | i. 21. Rulers of this and the coming age.—Subject to Christ in resurrection.
B | ii. 2. The age of the world.—Satanic energy (energõ).
C | ii. 7. Ages to come.—Display of divine grace (future).
D | iii. 9. Hid since the ages.—The mystery.
C | iii. 11. The purpose of the ages.—Display of divine wisdom (now).
B | iii. 21. The generations of the age of the ages.—Divine energy (energõ).
A | vi. 12. Rulers of the darkness of this age.—
Withstood by believers in resurrection power.

All lovers of the Word must see how great is the loss which we all have sustained through the traditional translation. "The eternal purpose" sounds very grand, it gives a certain sound of reality and indefectibility to the purpose of God, yet it is a double violation. The noun aiõn is translated as though it were the adjective aiõnion, apart from the mistake of putting eternity where age should have been. What we have to learn is that the Bible does not speak of eternity. It was not written to tell us of eternity. Such a consideration is entirely outside the scope of revelation. Many, many undreamed wonders will doubtless be unfolded when the ages are no more. What they will be and what they will involve is idle and profitless speculation. The Word of God as it has been given is a complete system of teaching for us; it does not treat fully of the creation around us, much less of the time before or after. While we acknowledge that there is much which our curiosity would tempt us to ask about, we do most heartily bow before the divine boundaries of our studies, realizing that by the repeated emphasis upon the teaching of the ages, and the absence of teaching concerning eternity, that the Lord is still showing us (as is expressed in Ecclesiastes) that the time has not yet arrived when we may "find out the work that God maketh from the beginning to the end."

We have already, in Answers to Correspondents (page 79), indicated that our minds are likely to bring unscriptural notions along with the words "age" and "age-long," beside the fact that aiõnios means something more than length of time. Therefore, while retaining in the title the English "ages," in the articles themselves we shall transliterate the word and use aiõn, allowing the reader the same liberty and scope that he would have were he reading the original.

#4. The Ages made and adjusted.
pp. 100 - 102

> "God, Who at sundry times and in divers manners spake in times past unto the fathers by the prophets, hath is these last days spoken unto us by (His) Son, whom He hath appointed heir of all things, through whom also He made the ages." (Heb. i. 1, 2).
> "Now faith is the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen. For in this the elders were attested. By faith we perceive the ages to have been adjusted by a declaration of God that the things which are seen have not come to pass out of things which are apparent" (Heb. xi. 1, 2).

Here in the epistle to the Hebrews we find two important passages that must not be passed over hurriedly by the earnest student. The ages were made, the ages were adjusted, the existing economy did not arise merely as a matter of course. The contexts of the two passages must be considered. In the first, the wondrous glory of the Son of God shines forth; in the second, the faith of the overcomers, leading on to the author and finisher of faith (xii. 2), is prominent. In both, the final word is either, "sat down on the right hand of the Majesty on High," or, "is set down at the right hand of the throne of God," and in both there is a reference to redemption, "purged our sins," and "endured a cross."

It will be necessary to make the meaning of these passages as clear as possible in order that subsequent consideration may not be rendered ineffective.

Before looking at the contexts, and gathering up the teaching of the verses quoted above, we must endeavour to settle the meaning of one or two words.

Dia hou, "Through whom."—Some translators have rendered these words, "For whom," and as it is of great importance to understand which of these two phrases is the true one, we will give a little time to their study.

Dia, followed by the genitive case, signifies the efficient cause, through or by; followed by the accusative, the final cause, for, on account of. Such is the grammatical rule. It can be easily illustrated from the New Testament usage. With the genitive:--Rom. i. 5, "Through Whom we received grace"; v. 1, "Peace . . . . . through our Lord Jesus Christ"; iii. 24, "Through the redemption'; John i. 3, "all things were made through Him." With the accusative:--I Cor. ix. 23, "This I do for the gospel's sake; Rom. iv. 23-25, "For His sake . . . . . but for us . . . . . on account of our offences . . . . . on account of our justifying." These few instances will be sufficient for a general view.

The distinction between dia hou and dihon is made for us in the very epistle we are considering. Heb. ii. 10, "For whom (accusative) are all things and by whom (genitive) are all things." While we believe it to be true that the ages were made for or on account of Christ, yet that is not the truth of the verse before us. Just as John i. 3 declares that all things were made by him (dia autou), and Col. i. 16 that all thing were created by Him (dia autou), so Heb. i. teaches us that the ages are a part of His work. He made them. They form a part of the great purpose that necessitated them. The quotation from Heb. xi. 3 is more difficult to apprehend, and a few helps to its understanding may be welcomed.

The word translated "framed" (katartizo) is used elsewhere in Hebrews, namely, Heb. x. 5, "A body hast Thou prepared Me," and Heb. xiii. 21, "make you perfect." The word occurs thirteen times in the N.T., and the first occurrence, Matt. iv. 21, "mending their nets," conveys one of the principal ideas of the word, namely the restoration, mending, or readjustment of parts; the idea of "fitted" seems best in Rom. ix. 22, "fitted to destruction."

We shall probably obtain most help by a more careful study of the use of the word in Hebrews itself. In Heb. x. 5, "a body hast Thou prepared Me," cannot convey the meaning of restoration, sometimes attaching to the word katartizo. The verse is a quotation from Ps. xl. 6, yet when we turn to that passage we read, "mine ears hast Thou opened" (margin, Heb. "digged") instead of "a body hast Thou prepared me." "Opened" is misleading; the passage does not refer to the "hearing," but to the custom of Ex. xxi. 6. It was the sign of willing submission. This is carried out in the parallelism, "I come to do Thy will, O Lord." Hence, while Heb. x. 5 is not a literal quotation, it is an inspired commentary, and the "prepared" body of the Lord is referred to in Phil. ii. 7, "made Himself of no reputation, and took upon Him the form of a servant," in contrast to the glorious "form" of God. The same sense will apply to Heb. xiii. 21, and it would seem that we must keep to that aspect of its meaning in Heb. xi. 3, "By faith therefore we understand that the ages were prepared and adjusted by the word of God."

We must not confuse the expression "by the word of God," with the Logos ("The Word") of John i. 1. The word here is rhema, and occurs in Hebrews four times, the first passage being i. 3, "Upholding all things by the word of His power." He who can thus uphold all things, also perfectly adjusted the ages by the same word. This perfect adjustment, among other reasons, had the one in view which is written here, "that the things which are seen have not come to pass out of things which are apparent." The succeeding verses contain illustrations of this truth. Noah prepared an ark when warned of things "not seen as yet"; Abraham, going out "not knowing whither he went"; Moses endured "as seeing Him Who is invisible." The secret of their faith was that they did not judge by outward circumstances. They understood that the ages were perfectly fitted together, knew they were all prepared by God, and they relied upon His unalterable word. Even the dispensations which are within the ages have somewhat the same character. The dispensation of the mystery certainly would never have been anticipated by any before its revelation. The purpose of the ages, and the making of the ages are both in His hands, and we rest content that it is so.

Ex. xxi. 6. Then his master shall bring him unto the judges; he shall also bring him to the door, or unto the door post; and his master shall bore his ear through with an aul; and he shall serve him for ever.

#5. The Dispensations.
pp. 133 - 137

We have seen that the Bible records the purpose of the ages, and that those ages are the periods during which various phases of that wondrous purpose are developed.

In a great house there are rooms set apart for different purposes, the performance of which is proper in their place. In an army, or a kingdom, there are varying ranks and duties. So also it is with regard to the development of the purpose. The ages are not only characterized by some one covering title, viz., "this evil age," "the age to come," etc., but are also subdivided into what we may call dispensations. The word is not used of all these divisions in the Scripture, but we use it because no other word seems so fitting. Nothing is included in the Scriptures that is irrelevant to the unfolding of this purpose. Creation is a part of this great plan. To grasp this will alter to a great extent our outlook. Traditional orthodoxy seems to teach that having created man upon the earth, and man having failed, God then devised the scheme of redemption. We shall find that this is not so. Redemption, as a part of the purpose of the ages, was settled before man was made.

Creation must be considered in two aspects. First there is the primal creation recorded in Gen. i. 1. Although the earth is full of the geological remains of a creation prior to that of the six days, no details are given in the Bible. We must not suppose, however, that this primal creation of heaven and earth has no place in the purpose of God. It was in that creation that angels and principalities were created. In that creation Satan had a place of honour and that creation ended with darkness and judgment. Heb. ix. tells us that the heavenlies need the cleansing of redemption as well as the earth. As that early creation, however, has not so much to do with the first revealed truth concerning man, two short verses suffice at the commencement of the Bible. The creation that follows is given with more detail; the six days' work ending with the seventh day's rest being typical of the earthly and manward development of the purpose of the ages. Earthly we say, by way of excluding that calling enunciated in the prison epistles, but kept secret since the ages, but not earthly to the exclusion of the heavenly calling as set forth in Hebrews, I & II Peter, and Revelation. The term, "the heavens and the earth," opens the Bible. Gen. i. 1 tells us of the first which ended in the darkness and chaos of verse 2. Gen. ii. 1 tells of the second which continues until the day of God; while II Pet. iii. 13 tells us that there shall be a new heavens and new earth wherein dwelleth righteousness.

It is necessary to make a distinction between the "earth" and the "world." The word "world" indicates arrangement and order, and it has been pointed out to us that II Pet. iii. 16 tells us that the "world," not the earth, perished in the time referred to by Peter.

Covering the great span of the ages we find "times and seasons." "Time" (chronos) conveys the idea of periods that are measured of, within which certain events take place, whereas "seasons" (kairos) speaks rather of the fitness of those times to the event. We use two words in English with similar distinction, The time that some event happened may be 30th September at 4p.m.; the season would be summer. Several "days" are mentioned too. There is "man's day," translated "man's judgment" in I Cor. iv. 3, there is also the day of the Lord, the great and terrible day of the Lord, the day of God, and there is also (hidden by our A.V.) the day of (the) age (II Pet. iii. 18). Coupled with this we read of "the acceptable year of the Lord and the day of vengeance of our God."

When we examine in greater detail these various phases of the great outworking, we shall see that the six days' creation, followed by the seventh day's rest, is the great initial foreshadowing of the purpose in boldest outline, afterwards filled in with more and more detail during the various "times," "ages," "seasons," and "days," and including the heavens and the earth, time past, present, and to come, until the cycle of the ages shall have become completed in the new heavens and the new earth wherein dwelleth righteousness.

These times, seasons, ages, and days are subdivided into what are termed "dispensations." Do not use the terms "dispensation" and "age" as though they meant the same thing. During one age many dispensations may have run their course. During one age two or more dispensations may be running side by side. The very fact that God has a purpose of election will necessitate this. It is not pretended that the following series of dispensations is necessarily true either in number or in the period covered. All we can hope to do is to point out obvious changes in God's administrations, leaving an open mind for further light and fuller detail. Perhaps it would be more correct if we say that this series keeps close to the central thread of the purpose, closely following its development along the line of election of man, nation or church, leaving nations and individuals who are outside the elective sphere unaccounted for.

For instance, during the time that the dispensations covering Israel's existence were in operation, there was a distinctly different dispensational attitude toward the nations. It was a period when God condoned ("winked at") their ignorance. Following, however, the main line of purpose from Adam, through Seth, to Noah and Abraham, we shall find the following sub-divisions to be helpful in our study, and fairly close to the division that Scriptures indicate.

The Dispensations.

1st. The six days'creation to the fall of Adam.
2nd. From the fall of Adam to the flood.
3rd. From the renewed world after the flood to the call of Abraham.
4th. From the call of Abraham to the Exodus from Egypt.
5th. From the deliverance from Egypt to the entrance into Canaan.
6th. From the entrance into Canaan to the setting up of the kingdom.
7th. From David to the Babylonian captivity.
8th. From the captivity to the birth of Christ.
9th. From the birth to the death and resurrection of Christ.

10th. From the day of Pentecost to Israel's rejection in Acts xxviii.
11th. The prison ministry of Paul called "the dispensation of the mystery."
12th. Commences with the recognition of Israel and is characterized by wrath.
13th. Occupies the thousand year reign of Christ. The millennium.
14th. Occupies the period that follows the millennium unto the great white throne.
15th. Completes the series commencing with the new creation and ending with "God all in all."

In one sense of course numbers 4-10 might be included under one head, from the call of Abraham to the rejection in Acts xxviii., but we feel that the divisions suggested will make the unfolding of the purpose clearer. While we keep before our mind the divisions of the Word, and note the different aspects of truth that are peculiar to each dispensation, it will be well to remember that underlying all dispensations are one or two items of the greatest importance that enter the first dispensation and remain until the last. We refer to sin and death. Without the awful presence of sin and death the dispensational unfolding of God's purpose could never have taken the form it has done. Accompanying sin and death are varying manifestations of law, grace, mercy and judgment. In some dispensations one will be found more prominent than another, so that one dispensation will be known as that of law, although grace and mercy are very evident in many of the dealings recorded.

We shall devote our attention, the Lord willing, to the consideration of these fifteen dispensations, and we believe that when these are seen in their large outlines, the difficult and detailed study of the dispensation more closely to do with ourselves will be entered with greater profit.

Without promising to reply personally to letters on this subject, should any point need further clearing up as we go along, a card or letter from any enquirer will be kept in mind and if possible dealt with in its place in the series.

#6. The Primal Creation (Gen. i. 1).
pp. 169 - 173

"In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth" (Gen. i. 1).
"We according to His promise look for a new heaven and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness" (II Pet. iii. 13).
"And I saw a new heaven and a new earth" (Rev. xxi. 1).

Between these two sets of Scripture rolls the great purpose of the ages, occupying "the heavens and the earth which are now" (II Pet. iii. 7). Gen. i. 1 is severed off from the rest of the Bible. It is unique. At Gen. i. 2 we enter into a sphere of darkness and chaos, which will never be removed until the true light of righteousness shines forth in the new heavens and earth where the "former things" have passed away. For the sake of those for whom these "fundamentals" are written we must explain Gen. i. 1 and 2 a little more in detail.

Graphically it may be considered thus:--

Genesis i. 1.	Genesis i. 2 to Revelation xx.	Revelation xxi.
Creation.	The creation of the six days.	The new heavens
	Sin and death enter. Sin and death destroyed.	and new earth.
Past.	The ages span this section.	Future.

The creation referred to in Gen. i. 1 must not be taken necessarily as referring to the creation of the six days that follow.

To those who find suggestions in the numerical phenomena of Scripture it may be interesting to note that the words, "The heavens and the earth," occur in the Hebrew Bible fourteen times. Thirteen times with eth, a particle that lends emphasis, and once without. Thirteen indicates rebellion while fourteen is suggestive of perfection. Perfection is further stamped upon this first verse by the fact that the Hebrews words used are 7 in number, containing 14 syllables (2*7) and 28 letters (4*7).

The creation "in the beginning" and the creation "in six days" are divided off from each other by the chaos and darkness of the second verse. As the words in verse 2 stand in the A.V., "The earth was without form and void," they seem to support the false idea known as the Nebular Theory, which supposes the gradual evolution of the earth from a gaseous chaotic mass. The words, "without form and void," are in the Hebrew tohu va bohu. In Isa. xlv. 18 we read of the earth, "He created it not tohu." The word "was" in Gen. i. 2 is translated "became" in Gen. ii. 7, "Man became a living soul"—he was not such before, and in iv. 3, "It came to pass" is the reading. Gen. i. 2, if rendered "The earth became without form and void," brings the verse into line with Isa. xlv. 18 and gives the sense of the passage. There is an indication of judgment in the words, "without form, void and darkness." Notice the way Jeremiah uses the expression in a context of judgment.

> "I beheld the earth, and, lo, it was without form and void; and the heavens, and they had no light . . . . . I beheld, and, lo, there was no man . . . . . I beheld, and, lo, the fruitful place was a wilderness, and all the cities thereof were broken down at the presence of the Lord, and by His fierce anger" (Jer. iv. 23-26).

Isa. xxiv. 10 speaks of the city of "confusion" (tohu), and in verses 1, 3, and 19 are such parallel expressions as:--

> "The Lord maketh the earth empty, He maketh it waste, the land shall be utterly emptied and utterly spoiled, the earth is utterly broken down, clean dissolved and moved exceedingly."

The reason is given in verses 20, 21:--

> "The transgressions thereof shall be heavy upon it . . . . . The Lord shall punish the host of the high ones on high, and the kings of the earth upon the earth."

Here it will be observed the punishment of "high ones on high" ("the powers in the heavens" that are to be shaken," Matt. xxiv. 29) is connected with judgment falling upon the earth. In Isa. xxxiv. 11 we meet tohu and bohu again in a context of judgment, "the line of confusion and the stones of emptiness." This judgment is likewise connected with judgment in the heavens. Verse 4 says:--

> "And all the host of heaven shall be dissolved, and the heavens shall be rolled together as a scroll."

Allusion to the tokens of judgment that followed Adam's sin is found in verse 13 in the words, "thorns, nettles, and brambles." Burning pitch and brimstone indicate Sodom and Gomorrha as further types. Verse 4 already referred to makes us think of II Pet. iii. and Rev. vi. 14. In II Pet. iii. 10 we are told that "the day of the Lord will come as a thief in the night, in the which the heavens shall pass away with a great noise," and again in verse 12, "the heavens being on fire shall be dissolved." This third chapter from verse 3 to verse 13 is entirely occupied with lessons drawn from the heavens and the earth, past, present, and future. These verses correspond in the structure of the epistle to chapter ii. 1-22. In chapter ii. the flood in the days of Noah, and the destruction of Gomorrha in the days of Lot, are instanced as examples of future judgment. A still earlier judgment is referred to in the third chapter. Verse 4 takes us back to "the beginning of the creation"—clearly Gen. i. 1; verses 5 and 6 speak of this beginning under the terms:--

> "The heavens of old and earth having its subsistence out of water and in water, by the word of God, through which (waters) the then world, deluged with water, perished."

The then world refers to the complete order of things connected with the heavens and earth of verse 5. It is evident that the world that then was refers to the order of things pertaining to the first heavens and earth, because the parallel to the world that then was is the heavens and earth which are now, which came into being in Genesis i. and ii. The types of both are found in II Pet. ii., as already mentioned. The flood of the days of Noah did not destroy the heavens and the earth, neither did the fire in the days of Lot, but they both set forth in type the judgment and time of the end. It is evident that a close parallel is instituted between the judgment on the first heavens and earth, and that on the second. The one by the word of God is destroyed by water; the other is to be destroyed by fire. The darkness which was upon the face of the deep (the waters whereby the then world perished) is another token of judgment. II Pet. ii. 4 and Jude 6 speak of darkness in connection with the judgment of the angels that sinned. Darkness was one of the plagues of Egypt, even as it will be in the days to come upon a greater Pharaoh (Exod. x. 21, 22 and Joel ii. 2, 3). What we learn from the Scripture leads us to see that into the creation of the beginning sin entered, and in its train came confusion, vanity, and darkness. Man was as then uncreated. Angels and spirit beings there were, and angels sinned and fell. The tempter of Eve was already a fallen one before Adam's transgression. There is a deeply important lesson to be learned by considering how little is told us in this part of Scripture (indeed in any part of Scripture) regarding the primal creation and primal sin. It is possible that the six days' creation is very much more limited in scope than that of Gen. i. 1, yet it is set out in detail.

The Bible is written as a revelation of God to MAN, and many things outside his sphere, though subjects of his enquiry and curiosity, do not come within the scope of Scripture.

When man, looking out into this wider sphere and thinking of the destiny of angels and principalities, or of the possibilities that lie beyond the ages to come, when man asks as Peter did, “What shall this man do?”, he too is reminded of the need to keep to the things revealed concerning himself and to find his employment and delight not in adding to the unrevealed things of God, but in seeking a full and clear understanding of what is written.

The present creation, the sphere of man’s sin and redemption, is the first great stone in the foundation of the purpose of the ages as pertains to man. This, therefore, will occupy our attention in the next article of this series.

Studies in the Epistles of the Mystery.

#12. To the praise of the glory of His grace" (Eph. i. 6).

(See member A | a of Structure, Volume IV/V, page 1).

We have now completed the review of the blessings peculiarly related to the Father in these opening verses. The reader will remember that we started this section with the words, "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, Who hath blessed us with every spiritual blessing in the heavenlies in Christ." We conclude with an exact parallel, Praise taking the place of Blessed, and Accepted in the Beloved taking the place of All spiritual blessings . . . . . in Christ. Thus do we begin and end with praise and glory; no room anywhere for the intrusion of self, all is of grace and all unto glory.

The word translated "Praise" occurs but three times in Ephesians; in i. 6, 12, and 14. We have already pointed out the way in which this threefold praise follows the recounting of the blessings which flow to us from the Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit. The three passages differ in one respect, that whereas in verse 6 we have "to the praise of the glory of His grace," in verses 12 and 14 it is, "to the praise of His glory." The inspired Word never misuses a single syllable. To those who bow before its every utterance, its every utterance speaks volumes. Glory, of itself, does not come so prominently before the mind in contemplating that wondrous love which chose us in Christ before the overthrow of the world, which predestinated us to sonship, which made us accepted in Beloved, but grace does. Here grace is glorified. The prospects opened out by the revelation concerning the fulness of the seasons (verse 10), and the inheritance (verse 11), and of the acquirement of the purchased possession (verse 14), while presupposing grace, very emphatically bring before us glory. Hence among the reasons for the change is the influence of the view point; past and present--grace; future--glory.

The expression, "The glory of His grace," has been often rendered "His glorious grace"; while we must be ever mindful of the fact that all language is replete with figures of speech, and that a slavish adherence to literality may be in some degree untrue to meaning, yet we sometimes feel that the believer is robbed of much real instruction and teaching by too easily assuming the presence of figures which necessitate the setting aside of some of the words of God. We very seriously question whether we are nearer the mind of God when we translate Rom. v. 2, "And rejoice in God's glorious hope," or II Cor. iv. 6, "The knowledge of the glorious God," or Titus ii. 13, "The glorious appearing."

Look at Rom. vi. 4, "Like as Christ was raised up from the dead by the GLORY of the Father." To add the word "power," and read "glorious power" is a serious responsibility. Can we not believe that the glory of God is a real power of itself? Then again in Eph. i. 17, "The Father of glory" leaves room for the Spirit of God to teach us further and fuller, but to translate "glorious Father" shuts out all further progress in understanding. Praise in Eph. i. 6 is directed to the glory of His grace. This by no means minimizes grace, but adds to its fulness; we praise the glory of it. Truly we can say as one of old, "The Lord will give both grace and glory." Of the Prison Epistles Ephesians is pre-eminently the Epistle of grace. The word occurs twelve times, and the order and arrangement of the occurrences is instructive.

Charis (grace) in Ephesians.

A | i. 2. Grace to you.—Salutation.
B | i. 6. Grace exhibited in salvation.
a | i. 7. Riches. Redemption.
b | ii. 5. Saved.
a | ii. 7. Riches in ages to come.
b | ii. 8. Saved.
C | iii. 2. Dispensation of the grace of God.—Dispensation.
B | Grace manifest in service.
a | iii. 7. According to gift of grace.
b | iii. 8. Grace given to preach.
a | iv. 7. According to. . . . gift of Christ.
b | iv. 29. Grace ministered to hearers.
A | vi. 24. Grace be with all that love our Lord Jesus Christ.—Benediction.

How truly does the divine arrangement of this word emphasize its place and importance. No salutation is complete without it, and the parting benediction is enriched by it. It runs through the whole fabric of redemption, covering the ages past and to come with its unction. It gives its name to the special dispensation committed to the Apostle Paul, marking it off as pre-eminently one of grace. It vitalizes the outcome of redemption, namely service, being as much necessary for the inspired and gifted Apostle while preaching the Word, as for the individual believer in his everyday conversation. To realize grace is to realize God's purpose. To realize that all law, and all possible demand upon the flesh, is at an end, to be able to say that we are justified by the faith OF Christ, and that we live by faith OF the Son of God (Gal. ii. 16-20), is to realize in some measure the meaning of grace. Grace and works, grace and merit, grace and the flesh, are antipodal.

The praise that is unto the glory of His grace has a twofold argument presented to it by the context. On the one hand we have a progressive series of blessings, on the other we have them all crystallized into one glorious statement.

Blessed with all spiritual blessings in the heavenlies in Christ.
Chosen in Him before the overthrow, to be holy and without blame, predestinated unto sonship.

All fully met and included in the words "Accepted in the Beloved."

Is it any wonder that the inspired writer speaks of the GLORY of His grace? Is it any wonder that he breaks into his summary of blessings with the note of praise? Praise should be continually in our hearts, and on our lips; murmurings and disputings, alas, too often are heard instead. "Whoso offereth praise glorifieth Me" saith the Lord, Who is said to inhabit "the praises of Israel." "Praise is comely," and like mercy "His praise endureth unto the olam (age)." If the Lord can say of Israel, "This people have I formed for Myself, they shall show forth My praise," shall He not say it much more of those whom He has created in Christ Jesus? It is well to remember the words of Ps. cvi. 2, "Who can utter the mighty acts of the Lord, who can shew forth all His praise?" for as Neh. ix. 5 declares, that His blessed Name "is exalted above all blessing and praise." As fresh revelations are made of His grace, so fresh calls are made for His praise, until in a fulness which perhaps never entered the mind of the human instrument who wrote Ps. cl., we shall be able to say, "Let everything that hath breath praise the Lord. Hallelujah. "

#13. "Accepted in the Beloved" (Eph. i. 6).

(See member A | b of Structure, Volume IV/V, page 1).

pp. 49 - 51

In the Structure the corresponding member is "The believer blessed in Christ," which in verse 3 is subdivided into spiritual blessings, and the heavenlies. Here in verse 6 the teaching, after having carried us along the line of purpose dating back from "before the overthrow of the world," now returns to praise the glory of His grace, wherein, it declares, He hath made us accepted in the Beloved.

Twice in this passage do we get the word "in"; "in which," "in the Beloved." The little word which agrees in gender with the word grace, and we are here instructed that it is "in" that grace that we are made accepted "in the Beloved." We have already considered a little the fulness of that grace (pages 17-20), as it is set forth in this Epistle. Very similar to this passage are the words of II Tim. i. 9:--

> "Who saved us, and called us with an holy calling, not according to our works, but according to His own purpose and grace which was given us in Christ Jesus before eonian times."

We now devote our limited space to considering the remainder of the verse, He hath made us accepted.

The word "grace" (charis) appears in these words, "To make accepted" (charitoõ). Grace has graced us. Grace has come down and completely removed from sight all ungraciousness, supplying in its place all the grace that resides in the Lord Jesus.

Two figures occur in the book of Leviticus which seem to have something of this precious teaching in them. The first is found in Lev. i. 4, 17:--

> "He shall lean with his hand upon the head of the burnt offering: and it shall be accepted for him to make an atonement for him . . . . . a burnt sacrifice, an offering made by fire, of a sweet savour unto the Lord."

Here the acceptance of the offerer is found in the offering. The consciousness of the blessedness of this truth is expressed by the words, "He shall LEAN," not merely "put."

Lev. ii. 2, speaking of the meal offering, says:--

> "He shall take his handful of the flour thereof, and of the oil thereof with ALL the frankincense thereof: and the priest shall burn the memorial of it upon the altar, to be an offering made by fire, of a sweet savour unto the Lord."

ALL the frankincense was required. It was that, called in the Hebrew "something white," which gave the "sweet savour." Some may be inclined to regard a reference to Leviticus as an indication of failure "to try the things that differ," and so, for any such, and indeed for us all, we would notice Eph. v. 2:--

> "Walk in love, as Christ also hath loved us, and hath given Himself for us an offering and a sacrifice to God for a sweet smelling savour."

In Luke i. 28 we meet the word translated "made accepted"; there it is rendered "highly favoured." As we review the blessings which are ours in Christ, can we not truly say that we are "highly favoured"? By nature children of wrath, dead in and by our sins, Gentiles, aliens, and enemies by wicked works, walking according to the age of this world, and according to the vanity of our minds—and now accepted!

One further reference from Leviticus is very much to the point here:--

> "It shall be perfect to be accepted; there shall be no blemish therein" (Lev. xxii. 21).

This completely cuts away all hope in the flesh or in legal observance. "The law made nothing perfect," the flesh cannot offer anything but what is blemished. Only One could offer Himself "without spot to God," and, blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, we are "accepted," "highly favoured" in Him. Chosen to be holy and without blemish, we are so in Him, and shall be presented "holy and without blemish" (Eph. i. 4 and v. 27).

Every step forward gives us added reason for the praise of the glory of His grace. Yet further. We are accepted "in the Beloved." Of all the titles of the Lord Jesus which are used in the Epistle, this one is chosen. Some titles are more official than others, such as "Christ" and "Lord." Some have special relationships with various phases of the divine purpose, such as Son of man and Son of God. "The Beloved," however, seems to be a title that transcends the limitations of time and dispensation, and it is in The Beloved that we are accepted!

The three occasions in Matthew upon which the Lord Jesus was spoken of as "The Beloved" are connected, in each case, with the added words, "In whom I am (or, My soul is) well pleased" (Matt. iii. 17; xii. 18; xvii. 5). A somewhat similar title occurs in Col. i. in a context which, like Eph. i. 6, speaks of the believer's acceptance, redemption through blood, and forgiveness.

"Giving thanks unto the Father Who hath made us meet to be partakers of the inheritance of the saints in the light; Who hath delivered us from the authority of darkness, and hath translated us into the Kingdom of His dear Son (or Son of His love), in whom we have redemption through His blood, the forgiveness of sins" (Col. i. 12-14).

The word "in" sometimes suggests the idea, "on account of," as e.g., Matt. vi. 7, "on account of their much speaking," or Eph. iii. 13, "on account of my tribulations." There is a practical outcome of this truth as we shall see, God willing, when we go through the Epistle. Those who are thus highly favoured in the Beloved are exhorted to "walk in love," and the concluding benediction particularly singles out this quality.

"Grace be with all them that love our Lord Jesus Christ with incorruptibility." (Eph. vi. 24).

May the sphere of our acceptance be increasingly the motive and substance of our walk and witness. His Name is upon us; we are spoken of as God's beloved ones. May we walk in love as Christ also hath loved us.

#14. The Blessings of the Son (Eph. i. 7-12).
pp. 81 - 84

We have reviewed "The blessings of the Father" as recorded in verses 3-6; we have now to consider those of the Son and those of the Spirit (verses 7-14).

The Blessings of the Son (Eph. i. 7-12).

C1 | 7-. Redemption (en hõ, "in Whom").
D1 | -7, 8-. According to riches of grace.
C2 | -8-10. Mystery.
D2 | 9. According to good pleasure.
C3 | 11-. Inheritance (en hõ, "in Whom").
D3 | -11, 12. According to purpose.

It will be seen that the blessings we have to consider are three, redemption, which includes the forgiveness of trespasses, mystery, which includes the dispensation of the fulness of the seasons, and inheritance.

REDEMPTION (apolutrõsis).—The word means "releasing on the receipt of a ransom." It is rendered "deliverance," apparently in a non-doctrinal sense, Heb. xi. 35, and shows the real meaning of the term. In Eph. i. the word is used with references to the two spheres of its operations. "By Whom we have the redemption, through His blood" (verse 7). That deliverance effects the forgiveness of our trespasses. "Unto a redemption of the purchased possession" (verse 14), and "sealed unto a day of redemption" (Eph. iv. 30), look forward to a future phase of deliverance. Ephesians is not the only epistle that sets forward this twofold aspect. Rom. iii. 24, "Being justified freely by His grace through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus." Faith in His blood and the question of sins comes prominent here, while in Rom. viii. 23, "Waiting for the placing as sons—the redemption of our body," looks forward to deliverance from the bondage of corruption and vanity. The word without the prefix apo occurs in Luke i. 68, ii. 38, and Heb. ix. 12. The passages of Luke may indicate a very different phase of redemption from that of Rom. iii. or Eph. i. Lutron indicates the price of freedom, as Matt. xx. 28, "To give His life a ransom for many," evidences. A stronger word, antilutron, emphasizing the fact that the ransom was a perfect equivalent, occurs in I Tim. ii. 6. It is upon this fact that Scripture declares, "Ye were bought with a price" (I Cor. vi. 20).

The first blessing then that is ours through Christ is this full redemption. The lesser words lutrõsis and lutroõ do not occur in the prison epistles, it is apolutrõsis, the perfect loosing away by reason of an accepted ransom. What was the ransom? "His blood." Peter speaks of it as the "precious blood of Christ" and contrasts it with corruptible silver and gold. In Matthew, Mark and Luke the blood of Christ is definitely connected with the New Covenant, and for sins and transgressions in relation thereto. See also Heb. ix. 15, xiii. 20, I Cor. x. 16 and xi. 25. In John (vi. 53-56) the one thought is that the blood of Christ gives life. The one reference in Acts (xx. 28) speaks of the purchase of the church with the blood of Christ. Rom. iii. 25, v. 9 tell of a mercy seat and of justification in connection with that blood.

The epistle to the Hebrews insists on the infinite value of the blood of Christ and the utter incapacity of the blood of bulls and goats to take away sins or to make the offerers perfect, but the blood of Christ does purge the conscience from dead works (ix. 14), does give access to the holiest (x. 19), does sanctify the people (xiii. 12), and, as a blood of sprinkling, it speaketh better things than that of Abel (xii. 24).

The book of Revelation also bears witness to the value of the blood of Christ. In i. 5 we read, "loosed from our sins by His own blood"; v. 9 speaks of redemption; vii. 14 of being made white; xii. 11 of overcoming by the blood of the Lamb. So in the dispensation of the mystery. The blood of Christ brings redemption. We may ask the reason why the blood of Christ should be the chosen instrument of our redemption. It is evidently deeply connected with our nature and our need. Lev. xvii. 11 tells us of the typical teaching of the use of blood in the offerings under the law.

> "For the soul of the flesh is in the blood: and I have given it to you upon the altar to make a covering for your souls: for it is the blood that maketh a covering by reason of the soul" (see R.V.).

The reason is given. The blood is the seat of the soul. When the life-blood is given, the souls is poured out unto death and made an offering for sin (Isa. liii. 10, 12). The blood of bulls and goats could only provide a covering. The sacrifices offered under the law never made an atonement in the full meaning of that word, they simply provided a covering for sin until the great redemption was effected by the blood of Christ. The only atonement ever made was made by Christ. For the word means to reconcile (see Rom. v. 11), to answer or make a satisfaction for, and clearly carries its meaning on the surface, "at-one." The outcry made against this meaning (viz., at-one) was simply the result of confusing things that differ. Atonement never was made under the law. By the offerings sins were COVERED, but how infinitely greater is the redemption of Christ! He does not cover our sins, He PUTS THEM AWAY. The word used by the Lord with reference to His future blessing upon Israel and the world is not so much kaphar or kopher, translated mainly by "redeem," "redemption" and "redeemer."

So in Ephesians "we have redemption through His blood." What that deliverance includes will be more fully seen when we examine the closing verses of chapter i. and the teaching of chapter ii.

Heb. ii. 14, 15 shows the necessary link between the persons to be redeemed and the Person of the Redeemer; that is established in the common possession of flesh and blood.

> "Since then the children have been partakers in blood and flesh, He also, in like manner, partook of them . . . . . and might deliver those who by fear of death were through all their life held in bondage."

The blood of Christ is mentioned in three connections in the prison epistles. Eph. i. 7, "redemption," Eph. ii. 13, "made nigh," and Col. i. 20, "peace." It is our joy to know that the redemption which we have in Christ has fully settled the whole question of sin, death, inheritance and resurrection glory. It is to His praise that we realize in some measure the price He paid, "His blood."

The question of the forgiveness of our sins we will consider in the next paper.

#15. The Blessings of the Son (Eph. i. 7-12). The Forgiveness of Trespasses.

pp. 113 - 116

The first blessing given under this heading—Redemption through His blood—is particularized by the words, "the forgiveness of trespasses."

What a gracious word this is. What a relief to the sin-burdened mind to realize the forgiveness of sins as a present personal fact. There may be many precious results of the redemption of Christ, but the entry into them would be hindered, and their enjoyment rendered impossible, unless the barrier and guilt of our sins had been removed. Moreover, it is not the question of sin here.

The depravity and fall of our nature inherited from Adam, and the utter ruin of the creature, is not so much in view as the personal sins and failures which we know we have committed. The Apostle Paul uses the word hamartia, "sin" and "sins," over eighty times; the prison epistles having only three of these occurrences.

The question of sin evidently is not the leading theme of the epistles of the mystery. To understand how God has dealt with that, Romans and Hebrews will supply full teaching. The prison epistles, moreover, do not differentiate between SIN and SINS, or rather, they deal only with sins, sin itself not coming within their scope. While, however, it may be true that other themes than the question of sin and justification are before us (God in His condescension puts our hearts at rest regarding this), redemption carries with it the forgiveness of our sins. The word forgiveness is aphesis.

Emission, dismission, and remission are among its most primitive meanings. It is derived from aphiemi, which means "to send away." "Then Jesus sent the multitude away" (Matt. xiii. 36); and "Jesus cried with (emitted) a loud voice" (Mark xv. 37). "Let not the husband put away his wife" (I Cor. vii. 11).

It will be seen that the root idea of dismissal is the leading one and it can be easily traced in the secondary meaning "forgiveness." Let us learn the lesson while it is before us, not to read back secondary meanings. The same applies to the rendering "forsook" in Matt. xxvi. 56. Rom. iv. 7 declares that it is a blessed condition to be in, to have one's sins forgiven, and may we not forget this as we contemplate all the spiritual blessings that are ours in Christ.

An inspired corollary to forgiveness, and an exceedingly comforting one, is that forgiven sin is forgotten sin. "Their sins and their iniquities will I remember no more" (Heb. x. 17, 18). The same chapter indicates further that by virtue of the once offered sacrifice, "we being once cleansed have no more conscience of sins" (Heb. x. 2). If under the law with its typical blood of bulls and goats which can never take away sins there was blessedness, how much more ground of rejoicing have we who have the much better reality? The sins that have been "dismissed" have not been merely driven off to return again and imperil our peace. They have been "borne" in the body of Christ on the tree (I Pet. ii. 24). For them He suffered (I Pet. iii. 18), for them He died (I Cor. xv. 3). Christ has made a purification for sins (Heb. i. 3), He has made a propitiation for the sins of His people (Heb. ii. 17), He has put away sin by the sacrifice of Himself (Heb. ix. 26), He has died unto sin once for all (Rom. vi. 10). All this and more lies at the foundation of forgiveness. We trace the mercy of God in this blessing of forgiveness, but we trace no more; we see a display of His righteousness. "He is faithful and JUST to forgive us our sins" (I John i. 9), as He is "JUST and the justifier of him that believeth in Jesus" (Rom. iii. 26). Herein is our confidence and boasting, and already we begin to anticipate the conclusion, "to the praise of His glory."

The word translated "sins" in the A.V. of Eph. i. 7 should have been translated "trespasses." There is a DIFFERENCE, God does not use different words without intent. Eph. ii. 1 uses both words together. Sin (hamartia) means a missing of the mark, a coming short; trespass (paraptõma) means a falling aside. Rom. xi. 11, 12 renders it "fall," Rom. v. 15 "offence," Gal. vi. 1 "fault," Col. ii. 13 "trespass." This last passage adds to the ground of our assurance by saying "having forgiven you ALL trespasses."

In this passage a different word is used for forgiveness. Instead of aphiemi the word is charizomai, to deal graciously to be gracious. It is this word that comes in Eph. iv. 32, "tender-hearted, forgiving one another, even as God for Christ's sake hath forgiven you," although the A.V. would lead the reader to think it was the same as in i. 7. In Eph. i. 7 the fundamental thought is not so much "forgiveness" as "deliverance from," which is even deeper.

The fulness of this blessing appears augmented when we read that it is "according to the riches of His grace which He cause to abound towards us." Here we have the first of a series of riches such as never entered the mind of man, many of them never coming within the ken even of the inspired writers of Scripture. Here we have riches of grace abounding in the forgiveness of trespasses; in i. 18 we read of "the riches of the glory of His inheritance in the saints"; in ii. 7 we are taken to the future where 'in the ages to come, He might show the exceeding riches of His grace, in kindness upon us in Christ Jesus."

In iii. 8, in conjunction with the mystery, the Apostle preaches among the Gentiles the "unsearchable riches of Christ," and finally in iii. 16 the Apostle prays that the saints may be strengthened "according to the riches of His glory."

The riches of His grace have overflowed towards us. The word translated "abound" indicates entire absence of restraint or barrier. We find the word in another form in Eph. iii. 20, "exceeding abundantly." The thought has already been expressed by the continual use of "riches." Chapter ii. 8 calls our attention to the fact that the "grace-by-faith-salvation" is God's gift. He makes all the overtures, He provides, He gives, He overflows in His grace towards us. In i. 8 we must make a stop. To read on as in the A.V. and the R.V. is to confuse things that differ. The passage needs to be re-cast. The first part of verse 8 belongs to verse 7.

While we are sure that there is no prodigality in the liberal grace and overflowing love of God, yet that does not appear to be the first thought here. Place a full stop after the words "abounded towards us." Then commence a new sentence thus: "In all wisdom and prudence having made known unto us the mystery." Here we are viewing two distinct spheres of the Lord's gracious operations. While He lavishes His grace with unstinting hand, He makes known the mystery "in all wisdom and prudence," revealing as much as we can bear at a time. It is for us to earnestly seek an answer to the Apostle's prayer, "that He may give you a spirit of wisdom and revelation in the knowledge of Him."

It is our desire that these pages may, under God's blessing, help us forward in this direction.

#16. The Blessings of the Son (Eph. i. 7-12). "The Mystery of His Will."

pp. 145 - 147

In the first article dealing with the blessings of the Son (page 113? {81}), we saw that they were three, viz., Redemption, Mystery, Inheritance. We have seen some of the wonders of redeeming love. Let us now turn to the central reference, the mystery. This mystery has been made known to us in all wisdom and prudence. Wisdom is linked with the making known of the mystery or its connections in each of its occurrences in Ephesians. Here, in i. 8; in i. 17, "may give unto you a spirit of wisdom and revelation in the full knowledge of Him"; and in Eph. iii. 9, 10, "The dispensation of the mystery . . . . . may be made known . . . . . the manifold wisdom of God."

Philippians contains no reference to either wisdom or mystery, but Colossians again contains them both. Col. i. 9 refers to the walk; i. 27, 28 speaks of the "riches of the glory of the mystery among the Gentiles . . . . . teaching every man in all wisdom"; ii. 2, 3 speaks of "the mystery of God, ... and of Christ, in Whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge."

Prudence (phronesis) is wisdom in practice, and has special reference to the management of affairs. In the stewardship of the mystery, the Apostle was divinely guided in making it known, not going before the time and not revealing more than the wisdom of God saw fit. The mystery here is spoken of as mystery of His Will. Some prefer the word "secret," owing to the fact that the word "mystery" has come to mean in English that which is "mysterious." However this may be, we feel justified in retaining the word, first because it is the Greek word musterion transliterated, and secondly by reason of the many parallels that are drawn between the mystery of God and those of the heathen, for which Ephesus was famous. The worship of Isis in Egypt, of Mithras in Persia, of Ceres and Bacchus in Greece, was connected with the heathen mysteries.

The heathen mysteries were divided into the Lesser and the Greater. The Greater revealed the real inner teaching called the Apporheta, "the things that must not be uttered or divulged" (see II Cor. xii. 4).

The initiates to these mysteries were called teleioi or "perfect," a word used with somewhat similar meaning in the Epistles (Heb. v. 14, Eph. iv. 13, I Cor. ii. 6 and Phil. iii. 15).

The New Testament reveals a series of mysteries, some concerning the church in its wide sense, and some concerning the One Body. The Apostle Paul had revealed to him a great number of mysteries which it was his privilege to explain and teach.

Out of the twenty-seven occurrences of the word, the Apostle Paul uses twenty of them, the remaining seven being divided between the first three Gospels and the Revelation. The twenty references of Paul are divided evenly between the Prison Epistles and the remainder. The references in Ephesians are the following.

The Mystery in Ephesians.

A | i. 9. The mystery of His Will—a dispensation—which he purposed.
B | iii. 3. The mystery.
C | iii. 4. The mystery of Christ—my knowledge.
A | iii. 9. The dispensation of the mystery—which He purposed.
B | v. 32. The great mystery.
C | vi. 19. The mystery of the gospel—made known.

It would appear from the above that the mystery of His Will, which has in view the dispensation of the fulness of the seasons, and the dispensation of the Mystery are parallel. In this paper we must confine ourselves to the first of these references, the mystery of His Will. Ephesians speaks of three things which pertains to the Will of God, (1) "The good pleasure of His Will," (2) "The mystery of His Will," and (3) "The counsel of His Will." (i. 5, 9, 11). The first and third references have to do with predestination to sonship and inheritance. The second has to do with the present revelation of the hidden purposes of God. By telling us at the outset that the mystery is the mystery of His Will, the Scriptures dispose of any idea of mere fortuitousness, the dispensation of the mystery, the purpose to head up all things in Christ, though not made known in other Scriptures, was all planned and arranged in the purpose of the ages (Eph. iii. 1-10). Moreover, we are assured that this purpose is actuated by the most gracious of motives, viz., "according to His good pleasure, which He hath purposed in Himself" (i. 9). Versions and readings vary as to the word "Himself," later readings and the R.V. read, "in Him," and so point to Christ. The words "in Him" come again at the end of verse 10, and a double emphasis seems to be given to the fact that in Christ the purposes of God meet and find their fulfilment. The setting of the passage therefore is as follows:--

A | 9. The mystery of His WILL.
B | 9. IN HIM.
A | 10. The dispensation of the fulness.
B | 10. IN HIM.

In other words, verse 10 is an expansion of verse 9, and the mystery of His Will is revealed in His purpose to gather together under one head all things in Christ. Let us pause before this revelation. Let us seek more earnestly His face, that to us also may be "made known" in all wisdom and prudence, this marvellous mystery of His Will.

#17. The Blessings of the Son (Eph. i. 7-12). The Dispensation of the Fulness of the Seasons.

pp. 177 - 179

In the previous paper of this series we expressed our belief that verse 10 is an expansion of verse 9, and to enable the reader more easily to take up the connection we repeat the setting of the passage.

A | 9. The mystery of His WILL.
B | 9. IN HIM.
A | 10. The dispensation of the fulness.
B | 10. IN HIM.

The mystery of His will, here revealed in all wisdom and prudence, has reference to a dispensation, that of the fulness of the season.

There are three references to a dispensation in Ephesians.

a. A dispensation of the fulness of the seasons (i. 10),
b. The dispensation of the grace of God (iii. 2),
c. The dispensation of the mystery (iii. 9, R.V.).

An essential character of a dispensation is that it involves a stewardship. Luke xvi. 2, 3 translates the word thus. A day is coming when stewardship as at present understood will have passed away and "God will be all in all" (I Cor. xv. 28). It is hardly in keeping with the fundamental idea of a dispensation to speak of that culminating period as a dispensation. The fact that Eph. i. 10 speaks of a gathering together in one of all things in Christ, has made many believe that Eph. i. 10 refers to the same period that is indicated in I Cor. xv. 28. What scriptural necessity is there for Eph. i. 10 to be future?

To Paul was given the dispensation of the grace of God to the Gentiles, "the mystery . . . . . that the Gentiles should be fellow-heirs," etc.; he also speaks of the dispensation of the mystery (R.V.). In Eph. i. 10 the title of the dispensation is "the fulness of the seasons." When Christ was born into the world, Gal. iv. 4 declares that it was "the fulness of the time." Time still rolls on, even though its fulness was reached over nineteen hundred years ago. The word we translate season occurs four times in Ephesians, twice in the doctrinal, and twice in the practical section. Eph. ii. 12 speaks of "that season" when the Gentiles were without Christ and aliens from the commonwealth of Israel. The contrast with "that season" is given in verses 13-22. "But now," when the both (Jew and Gentiles), are reconciled in one body. The blessings here spoken of are direct outcome of the glorious facts given in Eph. i. 18-23. This being so, we may be allowed to say that the state of things described in i. 18-23 being set in contrast with "that season," will be closely parallel with the dispensation of the fulness of the seasons.

Let us compare the statement in i. 10 and i. 18-23. Eph. i. 10 speaks of the fulness of seasons." Verse 23 speaks of the "fulness of Him that filleth all in all." Eph. i. 10 speaks of a gathering together in one. The original is a compound of the Greek word kephale, meaning "head," and means "to head up," or "to gather together under one head." In verse 22 we read that Christ has been given "Head over all things to the church." Chapter i. 10 speaks of the things in the heavens, and the things on the earth, being gathered together under one Head. In verses 21, 22 we read that the Lord has been raised "far above all principality, and power, and might, and dominion, and every name that is named, not only in this age, but also in the coming one: and hath put all things under His feet." The words "not only" are an important evidence that the Ephesians knew that "in this age" the Lord was above principalities, etc.; these seem to refer back to verse 10.

We cannot help seeing how these passages correspond. Colossians brings this headship of heavenly powers and the members of the body, the church, together in i. 18 and ii. 10. "He is the Head of the body, the church," "the Head of all principality and authority." This does not refer to the future, it has reference to the present position of the Lord while at the right hand of God. Now He exercises this dual Headship, now He has reconciled things in the heavens and things on the earth. While, therefore, we look forward to the day when in the fullest measure the blessings of grace will be fully enjoyed under the Headship of Christ, when reconciliation on earth and in heaven will be experienced by all the redeemed of all times, we must not lose the equally important truth that appears in Eph. i. 10, that now, in this dispensation of grace, in this dispensation of the mystery, the reconciling of things in the heavens and of things on the earth, has taken place. That now is the dispensation of the fulness of the seasons, and that now, and not only in the future, the Lord Jesus Christ has been made Head over all, and has gathered under His Headship all things. The day of manifestation has not arrived, but when it does come it will be but the realization of this blessed fact.

Ephesians limits us for the time to the Headship of Christ as connected with the church and the things in the heavens, but He is Head over all now, even though rejected and unknown. Israel may have rejected their Messiah, the Gentiles may have turned away from the promised Seed of the woman, but He has been made Head, and Colossians at one stroke gives Him the all-embracing title when it declares that He Who was the First-born of all creation, is now First-born from among the dead, that in all things He might have the pre-eminence. Peter declares that when the Lord Jesus ascended into heaven, "angels and authorities and powers were subjected unto Him." What a wondrous revelation of the mystery of His will. The death, the cross, the rejection, all leading to this glorious goal. It is in this sphere of fulness that our lot is cast.

Eph. i. 11 goes on to tell us concerning our inheritance and its connection with this dispensation of the fulness of the seasons.

This is the third section under the division we have called, “The blessings of the Son,” and so we will leave the consideration of the theme until we take up the subject in the next paper.

The Parables.

#14. The Marriage of the King's Son (Matt. xxii. 1-14).
pp. 52 - 59

On page 43 of Volume IV & V we gave the arrangement of the Parables occurring in Matt. xvi.-xxv., but as some of our readers may be unacquainted with it, we will take out the two corresponding members in order that the place of the parable we are to consider may be seen:--

B | xx. 1-16. The Householder and Vineyard.—The call to the labourers:--
1. Early. \
2. Third hour. \ Many called,
3. Sixth and ninth hours. / but few chosen.
4. Eleventh hour. /

* * * * * * *

B | xxii. 1-14. The Marriage.—The call to the guests:--
1. Bid those who were bidden. \
2. Again tell them. \ Many called,
3. Go therefore to highways. / but few chosen.
4. The wedding garment. /

It will be seen that we have something of a parallel, yet a contrast, for instead of a householder we have a certain king, and instead of labourers we have guests. The concluding words of each parable, however, are the same in the A.V., "Many called, but few chosen." The retention of these words, however, in Matt. xx. 16 is extremely doubtful, and we may be on more certain ground if we say that the closing words of the Parable of the Labourers are, "So the last shall be first, and the first last," while the closing words of the Parable of the Marriage Feast are, "For many are called, but few are chosen."

The parable, like those which have already been considered, was addressed to the Pharisees (cf. xxi. 45, and xxii. 1). "Jesus answered, and spake unto them again by parables." It will be noticed, by the use of the word "again," that in the Parables of the Householder, the Wicked Husbandmen, and the Marriage Feast, there is an emphasis upon the fact that an action was repeated.

xx. 5. "Again, he went out about the sixth and ninth hour," after having hired two sets before.

xxi. 36. "Again, he sent other servants, more than the first," after the first messengers were beaten and killed.

xxii. 4. "Again, he sent forth other servants," after the refusal to come to the feast.

This element of longsuffering and renewal of invitation is a feature that is essentially a part of the parable. Let us first of all examine the figures used, and then attempt with the knowledge gained to understand its import.

The characters introduced are, a king, his son, servants, and guests. The parable centres around a marriage feast. This parable contains the first reference to a marriage feast in the N.T., and apart from this the word occurs but once more in Matthew, namely, in xxv. 10. It is the same word that comes in Rev. xix. 7, 9, and is connected by the added word "supper" of the latter verse to the parallel parable of Luke xiv. 16.

The king's son of course is Christ Himself, and the marriage feast is the marriage supper of the Lamb (Rev. xix.). It will be seen that the servants of the king go out three times, twice to the same people, and once, after the destruction of their city, into the highways. Those to whom the servants went the first time are called, "them that were bidden." The expression is almost a title, and is rendered, "the persons invited," by Darby. The chief thought is that the servants did not give the original invitation, but that it had been given already. They went out to invite them that had been invited. This message met with refusal. Again the king sent the message of invitation, adding the words:--

> "Tell them that have been invited, behold, I have prepared my dinner, my bullocks and the fatlings having been killed, and all things ready, come unto the marriage."

These added words are by no means accidental. These two invitations, together with their differences, give us in parable form the ministries that occupy the period commencing with John the Baptist and ending with the close of the Acts of the Apostles. "Them that were bidden" are the people of Israel. Readers of these pages will not need citations from the Scriptures to prove or to demonstrate this statement. John the Baptist, the last of the prophets according to the Old Testament order, announces the good news, "The kingdom of the heavens hath drawn nigh," and further is spoken of as "the friend of the Bridegroom." The Lord Himself, the twelve, and the seventy continue this witness. We know how sadly true the words of the parable are, "they would not come." The second invitation commences with the Acts of the Apostles. There, Peter and the twelve, and those associated ("them that heard Him," Heb. ii. 3, 4), went forth again with the invitation, this time being able to add, "all things are ready."

The message of Matthew differs from that of the Acts in this particular. Matt. x. for instance shows us the servants going forth to proclaim the good news, but Matt. xvi. 21, 22 makes it clear that those who carried that invitation could not have said "all things are ready," for not only was Peter ignorant of the fact that the Lord must "suffer . . . . . and be killed and be raised again the third day," but he even urged the Lord to abandon the idea. Peter's attitude in the Acts is very different. Every recorded address that he gives has the suffering, the death and the resurrection of the Lord as its basis:--

> "But those things, which God before had shewed by the mouth of all His prophets, that Christ should suffer, He hath so fulfilled, Repent ye therefore" (Acts iii. 18, 19).

The initial ministry, that of John the Baptist, was to "prepare the way of the Lord" (Matt. iii. 3), "prepare" being the same word as "ready." It was also "to make ready for the Lord a prepared people" (Luke i. 17). Note, not to make everyone ready, but to make ready a prepared people. In Rev. xix. 7 we read:--

> "Let us rejoice and exult, and give Him glory; for the marriage of the Lamb is come and His wife has made herself ready."

And in xxi. 2:--

> "And I saw the holy city, new Jerusalem, coming down out of heavens from God, prepared as a bride adorned for her husband."

In the second ministry, that of the Acts of the Apostles, the servants who gave the invitation could indeed lay emphasis upon the fact that all things were ready. "But they neglected it." The word translated "made light of," is the word which occurs in Heb. ii. 3:--

> "How shall we escape if we have been negligent of so great salvation, which at the first began to be spoken by the Lord (the first invitation), and was confirmed unto us by them that heard Him (the second invitation), God also bearing witness both with signs, and wonders, and divers miracles, and distributions of holy spirit, according to His will?"

This is the second invitation of the parable. That "the signs, wonders, divers miracles, and distributions of holy spirit" are to be read as equivalent to "All things are ready," may be seen by reading Acts ii. 1-14, 22, 23, 43; iii. 12-16; iv. 9-12 (note the reference to the stone rejected by the builders, and Matt. xxi. 42, which immediately precede the parable of the Marriage Feast), and v. 30.

What was the result of this added testimony? "They neglected it." The parable says that "one went to his own field, and one unto his traffic." Readers may remember that in the Parable of the Sower the third sowing indicated the ministry of the Acts (without necessarily precluding the thought that, at the end, all these sowings will be true of the period then). That third sowing "fell among thorns, and the thorns choked them," which by interpretation means:-- > "That which among thorns being sown, this is he who hears the word and the cares of this age and the delusion of riches, choke the word and it (he) becomes unfruitful" (Matt. xiii. 22).

This same cause is expressed in the words, "his own field," and "his traffic." Here is the divine statement as to the failure of the second invitation. This is not all, however. While some "did not care for it," but preferred the things of this age, "the rest" violently opposed. "They seized the servants, insulted and killed them." The Lord Jesus had told His disciples that if the world had hated Him, it would hate them, that He sent them forth as sheep amid wolves. That the days would come when they should be delivered up to be afflicted, hated and killed. This we find in measure in the Acts. Some were imprisoned (Acts iv. 3; v. 18; viii. 3; ix. 1, 13, 21). Stephen was stoned (Acts vii. 59); James was killed with the sword (Acts xii. 2). At the first rejection, which culminated in the betrayal and brutal death of the Lord Jesus, the Lord in wondrous mercy withheld the punishment of which they themselves had thought themselves worthy (Matt. xxi. 41), and sent to those who were guilty of such sins the second ministry of pardon and invitation. The neglect of this "so great salvation," accompanied by the ill-treatment of His servants, was not a second time passed over. This time they had "crucified unto themselves afresh the Son of God, and put Him to an open shame," and "that which beareth thorns and briers is rejected and is nigh unto cursing, whose end is to be burned" (Heb. vi. 8). They had "trodden under foot the Son of God." "For if they escaped not who refused Him that spake on earth (first invitation), much more shall not we, if we turn away from Him that speaketh from heaven" (Heb. xii. 25) (second invitation). And so we read:--

> "But when the king heard thereof he was wroth: and he sent forth his armies, and destroyed those murderers, and burned up their city."

Between verses 7 and 8 of Matt. xxii. comes the dispensation of the mystery, just as it comes between "the acceptable year of the Lord, and the day of vengeance of our God." When the Lord once again takes up the threads of this purpose, the words of verse 8 onwards become true. "The wedding feast is ready, but they which were bidden were not worthy." Because of their rejection of the head stone of the corner, "the kingdom of God will be taken from them, and given to a nation producing the fruits of it." Because of their refusal and neglect they made themselves "unworthy," and failed. The day will come when they shall see those who have come from the east and the west, and from the north and the south, sitting down with Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob in the kingdom of the heavens, but themselves cast out. They knew not the day of their visitation. To no generation of Israel or of men had such exceptional favours been given. They proved unworthy, and forfeited their place. The day will come when the dispersed sons of Abraham will be gathered from the four corners of the earth to sit down in the kingdom. Those who so miserably failed during the two ministries of the Gospels and the Acts will be there, but not in a position of blessedness such as shall those who have thus been gathered in. Weeping and gnashing of teeth (terms that demand a separate study) accompany the vision they have. They were not worthy.

It is interesting to note that the word axios, "worthy," and the word hetoimazõ, "to make ready," occur prominently in Matthew and in Revelation. Axios occurs seven times in the Revelation. Hetoimazõ occurs seven times in the Gospel of Matthew, and seven times in the Revelation. It seems that there is a connection between the being made ready, and the being worthy.

If we view the parable and its teaching from the standpoint of the Epistles of the Mystery, we shall be conscious of a difficulty to reconcile the very distinct aspects of truth presented. If we keep within the sphere of the kingdom, the teaching will be clear. In Matt. x. the twelve who were sent forth were to enquire in each village for a "worthy person," and a "worthy house." Verses 37, 38 tell us what constituted "worthiness." Axios occurs seven times in the Acts. There we read that the Jews "judged themselves to be unworthy of eonian life" to the blessing of the Gentiles (Acts xiii. 46-52; compare verse 51 with Matt. x. 14), and that Paul had echoed the words of John the Baptist (Matt. iii. 8) in urging "fruit worthy of repentance" (Acts xxvii. 20).

In Rev. iii. 4 we read of some who shall walk with the Lord in white (robes), "for they are worthy," and in xvi. 6 of some who shall have blood to drink because "they are worthy." Of similar import is Luke vii. 4 and xii. 48. It is evident from the usage of the word that it carries with it the idea of meriting or deserving. This is further substantiated by referring to the following:--

> "Those who are accounted worthy to obtain that age . . . . ." (Luke xx. 35).
> "And take heed to yourselves lest at any time your heart be burdened with surfeiting, and drunkenness, and the cares of life, and that day come upon you unawares . . . . . watch ye therefore, and pray always, that ye may be accounted worthy to escape all these things . . . . . and to stand before the Son of man" (Luke xxi. 34-36).

Here is a close parallel to the condition of heart indicated by "the one to his own field, the other to his traffic," and "the cares of this age, and the deceitfulness of riches." Such attitude of mind is observed in the "wicked servant" of Matt. xxiv. 48-51, where the unexpected coming of the Lord, and the intemperance of the servant, are brought together. It will be observed, further, that the statement concerning the fate of the wicked servant is immediately followed by the words, "Then shall the kingdom of the heavens be likened unto ten virgins," etc., which introduces under another set of figures the two classes of those who have entrance into the marriage feast in view. The same thought (unreadiness) is noticeable; it is that and that alone which distinguishes the two classes of virgins.

In the parable before us, those who finally are gathered together, who are found in the highways, are "bad and good"; worthiness is no longer spoken of. These seem to be the elect, who are gathered together by the angels from the four winds, from one end of heaven to the other. A somewhat parallel change is seen in Luke xiv. 16-24, where, after the servants had been sent to say, "Come, for all things are now ready," and those who were invited made various excuses of a shallow nature, the Lord is angry with them, and sends out first to the streets, and lanes of the city, and causes to be brought in the poor, the maimed and the halt and the blind, and subsequently sends as far as the highways and hedges, compelling them to come in. No worthiness attaches to these, neither are they invited, they are "brought" and they are "compelled."

The scenes of the parable in Matt. xxii. change at verse 11, and we are taken into the feast room. The King enters to see the guests, and observes one not clothed with a wedding garment. Upon being questioned as to his entry in that condition, the man is speechless. The King gives orders to his servants to bind him hand and foot, and to thrust him into the outer darkness, where there is weeping and gnashing of teeth. The reason that is given, and with which the parable closes, is, "For there are many invited, but few elected."

The wedding garment given by the King to all who were brought into the feast was an outward symbol of election. The Lord had said, "Except your righteousness shall exceed the righteousness of the Scribes and Pharisees, ye shall in no case enter into the kingdom of the heavens." "Fine linen is (or represents) the righteous acts of the saints" (Rev. xix. 8). Peter says to the dispersion, "Give all diligence, add to your faith . . . . . give diligence to make your calling and election sure" (II Pet. i. 5-11). Just as fruit is the sign of growth and life, so the wedding garment is the sign of election.

There are other aspects to be considered, and further truth to be discovered along this course which will be the more clearly understood by continuing the study of the parables rather than by attempting an exhaustive study of this one. By way of application, it is well for us, although having something very different from the marriage supper of the Lamb before us either as bride or guests, to remember the exhortation to "walk worthy," and to note particularly the reference to "reigning," a "crown," and a "prize" in the Prison Epistles.

The question of the difference between the bride, the wife, the virgins, and the guests will be dealt with in subsequent articles, either in those which deal with the Parables, or those which deal with the Revelation.

#15. The Parable of the Fig Tree (Matt. xxiv. 32-51).
pp. 84 - 88

We now approach the concluding set of parables in the Gospel of Matthew.

Two kinds of servants. (Matt. xxiv. 32 - xxv. 30).

A | a | xxiv. 32-44. "Noah"—Coming as a thief while the goodman slept.
"Ye know not what hour the Son of man cometh."
b | xxiv. 45-51. The faithful and evil servant.
The one made ruler, the other has his portion with the hypocrites.
"Weeping and gnashing of teeth."
a | xxv. 1-13. The wise and foolish virgins.
"Ye know neither the day nor the hour."
b | xxv. 14-30. The faithful and unprofitable servants. The reckoning.
The one made ruler, the other cast into outer darkness.
"Weeping and gnashing of teeth."

It will be observed that the first two parables are introductory and preparatory to the more important and detailed parables of chapter xxv. The statement that follows the reference of the days of Noah, "Ye know not what hour your Lord doth come," is echoed in the word that conclude the parable of the Ten Virgins, "Ye know neither the day nor the hour." So is it with the other pair.

Let us then, while we examine xxiv. 32-44, remember that it is providing a setting and preparing us for the parable of the Ten Virgins.

The parable divides itself into two parts, both parts leading up to the thought that the day and hour of the coming of the Son of man are not within the knowledge of man, and therefore watchfulness is imperative. This will be seen better if we give the structure of the parable as follows.

Matt. xxiv. 32-42.

A | 32-25. THE FIG.—Its lessons concerning what may be known.
A1 | 32, 33. a | Branch tender, and puts forth leaves.
b | Ye know that summer is near.
a | When ye shall see all these things.
b | Ye know that He is near at the doors.
B1 | 34, 35. c | This generation will not have passed away.
d | Till all these things shall have come to pass.
c | The heaven and the earth shall pass away.
d | But My words shall not pass away.
B | 36. What no one knows. e | Concerning that day and hour.
f | No one knows.
f | Not even the angels of heaven.
e | But My Father (knows) only.

A | 37-41. THE DAYS OF NOAH.-Its lessons concerning the coming of the Son of man.
A2 | 37. a | The days of Noah \ The
b | The coming of the Son of man. / days.
B2 | 38, 39-. c | Eating, drinking, marrying. \

d | Till the flood came. / people.
c | And swept them all away. /
A3 | -39. a | Even so (like days of Noah). \ The
b | The coming of the Son of man. / days.
B3 | 40, 41. c | Two men in field \
d | One taken, other left. \ The c | Two women grinding at mill. / people.
d | One taken, other left. /
B | 42. What no one knows. Ye know not what day your Lord cometh.

The majority of our readers will require no proof that the fig tree typifies Israel in the Scriptures, and together with the Olive and the Vine presents its destiny under the three phases, National, Covenant Privilege, and Blessing. The fig tree is used particularly in the Gospels, where national fruitfulness and national excision is in view. The Olive figures prominently in Rom. xi. where Covenant Privileges are in view. The Vine in Isa. v. and Psa. lxxx. speaks of blessing. Apart from the reference in Matt. xxiv. 32 the fig tree is mentioned in one other place in that Gospel, namely, in chapter xxi. 19, 20, 21. There the tree, having "nothing thereon but leaves only," is cursed and withers away. This typified the fruitless condition of Israel when the Lord came "seeking fruit." Luke's Gospel provides another reference which supplements the statements of Matthew.

> "He spake also this parable: a certain man had a fig tree planted in his vineyard, and he came and sought fruit thereon and found none. And he said to the vine dresser, Behold these three years I come seeking fruit on this fig-tree, and find none, cut it down, why should it render the earth unproductive" (Luke xiii. 6, 7).

The "fruit" is explained by John the Baptist:--

> "Bring forth therefore fruits meet for repentance . . . . . and now also the axe is laid unto the root of the trees . . . . ." (Matt. iii. 8, 10).

At the first coming of Christ Israel proved a failure, there was "nothing but leaves," and the national fig tree was cut down.

As the days shorten, and the coming again of the Son of man draws near, the fig tree begins to show signs of life. The fig tree is putting forth its leaves. Once again eyes are turning to Jerusalem and Palestine. Within a short time we may see great things transpiring in connection with Israel and the Holy Land. Luke xxi. 29 adds the words, "Behold the fig tree and all the trees." This addition refers to the "times of the Gentiles" of verse 24. The times of the Gentiles will "be fulfilled" when Israel comes forth from its long night of rejection.

In Matt. xxiv. 34 we read, "This generation shall not pass till all these things be fulfilled." The expression, "this generation," must not be quickly disposed of as having reference only to those who lived during what we call the lifetime of a generation—it carries with it something more than length of time—it indicates character also.

Sixteen times do we read of "this generation" in the Gospels, besides other expressions like, "an evil generation"; "adulterous and sinful generation"; "the men of Nineveh and the queen of the south shall rise in judgment with this generation, and shall condemn it"; "of this generation shall be required the blood of ALL the prophets which was shed from the foundation (or overthrow) of the world" (Matt. xxiii. 34-36, Luke xi. 49, 50). This seems to indicate something more than a reference to those who were born and lived during the time of the Lord on earth. Heb. iii. 10 speaks of the Lord being grieved with "that generation," and the reader will find many parallels in the O.T.

Further, the words of Col. i. 26, speaking of the mystery being hid "from the ages, and from the generations," will help us further in seeing that the word has a wider meaning than the primary idea. The words of verse 34, "be fulfilled," should be rendered, "begin to be," or "may have begun to arise." If we glance back to verses 29-31 we shall see what was to "begin to arise." The sun was to be darkened, the moon was not to give her light, the stars were to fall from heaven, the powers of the heavens were to be shaken. Some may say that these things have not yet taken place. True, but they "began to arise," although cut off through Israel's failure. This may seem an assertion without foundation, but we believe a comparison of two passages of Scripture will help us.

The margins of most of our Bibles refer us back from Matt. xxiv. 29 to Joel. In Joel ii. 10 we read words very similar to those of Matt. xxiv. 29. There, wonders shewn in heaven have a prelude on earth. The spirit was to be poured out upon all flesh.

> "Your sons and your daughter shall prophesy, your old men shall dream dreams, your young men shall see visions. And also upon the servants and upon the handmaids in those days will I pour out My spirit. And I will show wonders in the heavens and in the earth, blood and fire and pillars of smoke. The sun shall be turned into darkness, and the moon into blood, before the great and terrible day of the Lord come."

Peter on the day of Pentecost in Acts ii. positively declared that the outpouring of the spirit then manifest was what had been prophesied by Joel. He not only quotes the references of Joel to the spiritual gifts, but makes a complete quotation concerning the whole of these wonders with reference to the sun, moon and stars. In all there are fourteen items. Seven of them have been fulfilled; seven of them await fulfilment. They will be fulfilled when Israel repents (Acts iii. 19-21). The coming of the Son of man is preceded by these things.

The "generation" of Matt. xxiv. 34 is in view in Acts ii. 40, "Save yourselves from this untoward generation." It is perfectly true therefore to say that the generation alive during the ministry of Christ, and during the period covered by the Acts, did not pass away without these things "beginning to be." They will be resumed when the time comes, and Rev. i. goes on from Acts ii. and iii., the interval of Israel's rejection not being reckoned. Just as surely as the Lord could say, "this generation shall not pass," so He could say, "heaven and earth shall pass away, but My words shall not pass away."

> "The day of the Lord will come as a thief in the night, in which the heavens shall pass away with a great noise, and the elements shall melt with a fervent heat, the earth also and the works that are therein shall be burnt up" (II Pet. iii. 10).

Here the connection with Matt. xxiv. 35 and 43 is evident, strengthened moreover by Peter's allusions to the flood and to Noah.

Some men, not seeing the break that has come in the dispensational dealings of God, have said, "Where is the promise of His coming?" They maintain, with wilful ignorance that all things have continued right through without break since the beginning of the creation. Their wilful ignorance of the interposition of judgment at Gen. i. 2, and again at the flood, prevent them from seeing that once again the Lord has allowed a break to come in the unfolding of His purposes. "The Lord is not slack concerning His promise." The thousand years or so of Israel's blindness are but a day, the Apostle Paul in all his epistles treats of the purpose of God in the long interval between Acts and Revelation.

Reader, the fig tree seems about to bud. If so, the present parenthetical dispensation draws near to its conclusion. While we see no prophetic word concerning this period in Matt. xxiv., yet by application we may learn the same insistent message, "Watch therefore, for ye know not the hour." We have considered the moral principle of the parable (the Fig Tree); in our next paper we must consider the type (Noah and his days).

#16. The Days of Noah (Matt. xxiv. 37-41).
pp. 116 - 120

In the study of the parable of the Fig Tree, we found that its teaching was echoed, not by another parable, but by reference to a typical event in history, "As it was in the days of Noah."

The book of Genesis gives a vivid picture of the days of Noah. Gen. vi. has been robbed of its significance by the failure to see that "The sons of God" are not men but angels. Job i. 6, ii. 1, xxxviii. 7, Psa. xxix. 1, lxxxix. 6, Dan. iii. 25 (see verse 28), use this title of angels. The LXX of Gen. vi. 2 renders the words "sons of God" by "angels." Jude 6 makes it clear that some of the angels fell. What that fall involved is hinted in the same verse, "they left their own oiketerion." This word occurs again in II Cor. v. 2 where it has reference to resurrection. Whether it means there a resurrection body, or a heavenly abode, we are not at the moment prepared to say.

In Jude 7 further light is given; the sin of the angels was "in like manner" to the sins of Sodom and Gomorrha. Further, I Pet. iii. 20 and II Pet. ii. 5 link this fall with the days of Noah. The result of this unseemly irruption led on to the corruption and violence that necessitated the flood. "The giants," or as the Hebrew calls them, the Nephilim, were monsters and had to be destroyed first by the flood, and afterwards by the sword of Israel. The sons of Anak were of the Nephilin (Numbers xiii. 33). The giant cities of Bashan, and the gigantic buildings still standing from antiquity testify to their skill and strength.

> "And the Lord said, I will destroy man whom I have created . . . . . but Noah found grace in the eyes of the Lord. These are the generations of Noah, Noah was a just man and perfect in his generations, and Noah walked with God" (Gen. vi. 7-9).

Not only was Noah a second Enoch in that he "walked with God," but he like Enoch witnessed against the ungodliness of the people, and "god took him" by means of the ark, as completely as He took Enoch by translation. The words "perfect in his generations" should read "uncontaminated as to his pedigree." God had preserved the line from Adam through Noah from the awful Satanic attempt to prevent the coming seed of the woman. But why all this? How does this help our understanding of Matt. xxiv.? Scripture gives no uncertain sound regarding the activity of evil spirits and fallen angels during the time of the end. The apostle Paul tells us that "in the latter times some shall depart from the faith giving heed to seducing spirits and doctrines of demons" (I Tim. iv. 1). Spirit and angelic interference are prominent in the book of the Revelation, for example, the unclean spirits, spirits of demons who work miracles and who gather the kings of the earth to their destruction (Rev. xvi. 13, 14). This passage is immediately followed by the warning, "Behold, I come as a thief, blessed is he that watcheth," and so is linked still more with Matt. xxiv. Parable, prophecy and type tell us of days that shall be "as the days of Noah."

The record given in Gen. vi., vii. and viii. is full of instruction. We will draw attention to one point more, namely, the mark of time:--

1. Noah's age – 600 years (Gen. vii. 6).
2. Forty days and nights the rain was upon the earth (Gen. vi. 12).
3. The Ark rested on the seventh month (Gen. viii. 4).
4. And on the 17th day of the month (Gen. viii. 4).
5. The removal of the cover of the Ark was in the six hundred and FIRST year, in the FIRST month, the FIRST day of the month (Gen. viii. 13).

The 600 years of Noah's life seem to indicate the end of man, six being the number of man. It is considered by many that the age of the world up to the coming again of Christ will be 6,000 years. The forty days and nights refer to a period of judgment and testing. The resting of the ark on the seventh month typifies the Millennium, the thousand years, the "rest" (sabbatismos) that remaineth unto the people of God. The 17th of the seventh month is the 17th of Nisan, three days after Passover, bringing us to the typical day of resurrection. The threefold emphasis on the word first in connection with the drying of the ground is very suggestive.

Not only shall the character of the times be similar, but the character of the people shall be the same, "For as in the days that were before the flood . . . . ." There we find men going about their affairs with absolute disregard of the warnings of Noah or the building of the ark. So we find that Scripture tells us that in the days that are coming men will be in the field, women at the mill; one shall be taken and the other left. Many expositors read this passage as though it teaches that the one taken is taken away for judgment, and the one left is left for blessing. A superficial connection is also seen between the "taking away" by the flood, and being "taken" by the invisible hand of God. This is not the meaning, however. Those taken are taken into the ark of the parousia, those left are left to the storms of tribulation.

The word used of the taking away by the flood is the same used of the depriving of his talent of the unprofitable servant (Matt. xxv. 29). The other word, "one shall be taken," means to take to one's self as a companion, and indicates the conferring of a favour. When the Lord selected Peter, James and John to view the transfiguration (Matt. xvii. 1), and to see the raising of Jairus'daughter (Mark v. 37), or to witness the agony in Gethsemane (Matt. xxvi. 37), He used this word "to take" in each case. Further, the point seems definitely settled by John xiv. 3, where the Lord says, "I will receive you unto myself" (same word). Hence, in Matt. xxiv. one shall be received by the Lord, the other left. To be left is a term of judgment. "Let them alone" was said of the blind guides (Matt. xv. 14); "left" as a desolate house (xxiii. 38); "forsook" as did the disciples (xxvi. 56); and, in conjunction with "to take," compare John xiv. 3 with xiv. 18, "I will receive," "I will not leave you comfortless." The obvious conclusion is that those not taken will be left comfortless.

Rev. xii. brings before us in vision and symbol the same teaching as Matt. xxiv. 40, and when we deal with this passage in our papers on the Revelation we shall be able to show more clearly than here that the "man child" does not refer to the birth and ascension of Christ. Rev. ii. 26, 27 gives a clue:--

> "He that overcometh and keepeth my works unto the end, to him will I give authority over the nations, and he shall rule them with a rod of iron."

The instruction of this authority takes place when the man child is caught up "to God and His throne," for

> "To him that overcometh will I grant to sit with Me in My throne, even as I also overcame, and am set down with My Father in His throne" (Rev. iii. 21).

The words of Rev. iii. 3, 4 are also related to the same time and event:--

> "If I therefore thou shalt not watch, I will come on thee as a thief, and thou shalt not know what hour I will come upon thee . . . . . Thou hast few names . . . . . they are worthy."

The words of Luke xxi. 36 seem to refer to the same time and people:--

> "Watch ye and pray always that ye may be accounted worthy to escape those things that shall come to pass, and to stand before the Son of man."

While the hope and the reward of the various bodies or callings of believers differ, there is unity of principle regarding them that it is well for us to observe. I Thess. iv. speaks of the same period as Matt. xxiv., and I Thess. v. equally warns against being found sleeping (Mark xiii. 35), and speaks of the coming as like a thief in the night. We cannot shut our eyes to the conditions that are attached to the participation in the reward aspect of the believer's service (which is the aspect of Matt. xxiv. and xxv.). Matt. xxiv. 42, Luke xxi. 36 and Rev. iii. 3, "Watch therefore," or as in the case of the householders, and virgins, "readiness" is the word. By confounding the hope with the prize, either of the church, or the heavenly calling, or of Israel, a great deal of wrong teaching has arisen. One system maintains that by reason of grace all believers will of necessity escape the great tribulation, others who see a line of teaching urging watchfulness, readiness, and being accounted worthy, etc., say that some only will escape. These subjects are too great to be decided upon in these articles, they demand a separate study.

It is important however to note that the parables that follow in Matt. xxv. emphasize the need of "readiness" (verse 10), "faithfulness" (verse 21), and "kindness" (verse 40) as a prerequisite for entering the marriage feast, for being made ruler over many things, and for entering into the kingdom. These varying degrees and aspects are summed up in the word "taken" (Matt. xxiv. 40), and in the appointment of verse 47. The sad alternatives, outside the marriage feast, outer darkness, and eonian fire, are summed up in the word "left" (Matt. xxiv. 40), and in the appointment of verse 51.

The hope and prize of the One Body (Eph. i. and Phil. iii.) are nowhere in view in Matt. xxiv. or xxv. Nevertheless, we do well to take heed to the words, "What I say unto you I say unto all, Watch."

#17. The Faithful and the Evil Servant (Matt. xxiv. 45-51).
pp. 150 - 155

The structure on page 43 of Volume IV & V shows that the faithful and the evil servants of Matt. xxiv. 45-51 are balanced by the faithful and the unprofitable servants of Matt. xxv. 14-30. What we shall learn therefore in considering the closing verses of Matt. xxiv. will be of service when we examine the parallel parable in chapter xxv.

We would call attention at the outset to the fact that in these parables salvation is not the theme. There is always a tendency to generalize where God has particularized. We see this with such subjects as the old idea of a general resurrection and a general judgment. We know there are many resurrections and several judgments in the future. The generalizing of all the promises as though the "Church" had a monopoly, and the generalizing of the varied sections of the purpose of the ages will likewise occur to us. We have not so clearly seen as yet, however, sufficient discrimination attempted by the majority in connection with the difference that Scripture makes regarding salvation and service. This is particularly noticeable in the way that the Epistle to the Hebrews is treated. Its exhortations to continue steadfast to the end, and to endure; its invitation to come to the throne of grace to find help in time of need; its examples of faith, none of these has reference to the sinner needing salvation, but the saint needing perfecting. However, we cannot go into Hebrews here, but we have said so much because service, its reward or its penalty, and not salvation, is the theme of these parables.

The figures introduced are "a faithful and a wise servant," and an "evil servant," but servants both. We cannot agree with the idea that the evil servant was one only in imagination and was not a servant at all. The structure of the parable is as follows:--

Matt. xxiv. 45-51.

A | 45-. The faithful and wise servant.
B | -45-47. His deeds and reward.
a | Made ruler over house.
b | Give meat.
c | Blessed, when lord cometh.
b | Found so doing.
a | Made ruler over all goods.
A | 48-. The evil servant.
B | -48-51. His deeds and penalty.
d | Says, lord delays coming.
e | Smites fellow servants.
f | Eats with drunken.
d | Lord comes unexpectedly.
e | Cut off.
f | Portion with hypocrites

The close parallel between the deeds and the reward is worthy of note. The servant who as ruler is found "so doing" faithfully, is rewarded by being "made ruler" over many things. The servant who says in his heart, "My lord delayeth his coming," is overtaken by the unexpected coming of his lord. He who "smites" is himself "cut off." He who finds his companions "with" the drunken, finds his portion "with" the hypocrites. In all this we have the same truth that the Apostle Paul gives in more than one epistle, "Whatsoever a man soweth that shall he also reap." Gal. vi. shows that it is possible for a believer not only to sow to the spirit, but to sow to the flesh, not only to reap eonian life, but to reap corruption. Matt. xxiv. shows the same thing. The first servant is called both faithful and prudent. These titles, united here in the one example, are subdivided in the following chapter. We have the prudent virgins, and the good and faithful servant.

It has been suggested that the words "Who then" should be taken as a figure called Metonymy, this particular example being the Metonymy of the Subject, when the subject, the thing, is put for that which is connected with it. If this be so the meaning, though not the translation, would be, "How blessed is the faithful and prudent servants," etc. A further thought is that by the use of this rather strange expression the Lord intimates that there will be few such when the Son of man cometh. A reference to Luke xii. 41, 42 may give yet further light. The Lord in verses 35-40 speaks a parable, using the figure of the watching, waiting servant. Peter then says to the Lord:--

> "Speakest Thou this parable unto us, or even to all? And the Lord said, Who then is that faithful and prudent steward, etc."

This seems to say that if Peter and the rest of the apostles did not come within the meaning of the words, who then could? The parable is followed by a statement concerning the few stripes and the many stripes that will be apportioned to fit the case of the well-informed and the ill-informed servants. The prudent and the foolish are brought together first in Matthew at the end of the Sermon on the Mount in connection with obeying or disobeying the words that the Lord had uttered—words not addressed to sinners needing salvation as is evident throughout. Luke xvi. 8 brings before us the prudence of the unjust steward. Phronimos, "prudent," and phroneõ, "to think," are related. The usage of this word phroneõ in the prison epistles is very suggestive. For example, this word is absent from Ephesians and II Timothy, occurs once only in Colossians (iii. 2), but is found ten times in Philippians. Now Philippians is not dealing with salvation, but with service, not a free gift, but a prize, and this accords with the usage of prudence in Matthew. Faithfulness comes out prominently in this connection. Luke xvi. 10 says:--

> "He that is faithful in that which is least, is faithful also in that which is much."

And again in Luke xix. 17 the parallel with Matt. xxiv. is clear. To the overcomer in the book of the Revelation come the words, "Be thou faithful unto death and I will give thee a crown of life." Those who overcome with the victorious Lamb are, like Him, "faithful" (Rev. xvii. 14; xix. 11). Faithfulness to the trust committed, prudence born of watching and waiting for the coming Lord, these are the two outstanding features of the servant who receives commendation. The being made ruler over all the Master's goods finds a ready parallel in the life of Joseph, as indeed does all that is stated of the faithful servant. The reference to being made ruler comes out again in Matt. xxv. This time the servant is not given to rule at first, but as a reward for his faithful use of the five talents, or the two talents, he is made ruler over five or two cities, and equally enters into the joy of his Lord, Who "for the joy that was set before Him endured a cross, despising the shame and is set down at the right hand of the throne of God." To the same effect is Phil. ii. 5-9:--

> "Let this mind (phroneõ) be in you that was also in Christ Jesus, Who . . . . . humbled Himself . . . . . wherefore God also highly exalted Him."

The state of heart of the bad servant is reflected in such passages as II Pet. iii. 3-14, where the scoffing of those who walk after their own lusts regarding the coming of the Lord, the reference to the flood (see ii. 5) and "being found of Him without spot" are suggestive parallels to Matt. xxiv. The state of drunkenness is also likened to the condition of unwatchfulness that shall overtake those who are in darkness; "for they that be drunken are drunken in the night (see I Thess. v. 1-11).

The fate of the evil servant is "to be cut asunder." The word literally means to be cut in half, and has the meaning "cut in pieces" in the O.T. There is no doubt as to the word itself. The question, however, is what does it mean? Are we to understand that the Lord will literally cut His evil servants into pieces? The word "cut asunder" is dichotomeõ, and occurs only here and in Luke xii. 46. Dicha enters into the word dichazõ, which is rendered "set at variance" in Matt. x. 35, although the word literally means "to divide into two parts." Temno means "to cut" and apotome is the LXX rendering of the word "smote off" in Judges v. 26 (Codex Alex.). This word undergoes a change in some of its usages in the N.T., for in Rom. xi. 22 we find apotomia rendered "severity," and apotomõs in Titus i. 13, "sharply"; II Cor. xiii. 10, "sharpness." The idea of "cutting" here is figurative and not literal or physical. This seems to be the meaning in Matt. xxiv. 51. The severity of the punishment is emphasized by the usage of such a word. Further, the evil servant's portion is to be with the hypocrites.

The original meaning of the word hupokrinomai was "to represent another person by acting" as the ancient players did by speaking from behind a mask. It is an easy transition to the meaning, "to feign, pretend, dissemble" (see Luke xx. 20), Peter acted hypocritically (Gal. ii. 13) by withdrawing himself from the Gentiles. None could have heard the stern denunciations of woe to the Scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites," as recorded in chapter xxiii. and not feel the severity of the punishment intended in xxiv. 51.

The words so solemnly uttered at other times of threatened judgment follow, "there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth." This is said in relation to the children of the kingdom being cast into outer darkness in Matt. viii. 12, and in connection with the casting of all that offends out of the kingdom into a furnace of fire, and also at the severing of the wicked from the just in Matt. xiii. 42, 50. The same is said when the man without the wedding garment is cast into outer darkness (Matt. xxii. 13), and again in the judgment of the unprofitable servant (xxv. 30). The six references to the gnashing of teeth are closely related, and the order of their occurrence should be noted:--

A | viii. 12. Kingdom. References to Gentiles in place of Israel.
B | xiii. 42, 50. Tares, fish, end of age, and coming of Son of man.
A | xxii. 13. Marriage. Reference to Gentiles in place of Israel.
B | xxiv. 51, xxv. 30. Evil and unprofitable servant, end of age, coming of Son of man.

In all these references loss of position in the kingdom rather than loss of salvation is in view. Salvation as is evangelically understood had never been propounded when Matt. viii. and xiii. were uttered, for the Lord had not said a word about His death and resurrection (Matt. xvi. 21). The kingdom had been preached. Entry into it had been explained. Warning had been uttered, and this parable shows that the fact of being a servant does not render such immune from very severe punishment and loss. To have a portion among the hypocrites, instead of entering the joy of the Lord, to find the gate shut and access to the wedding feast denied, this causes the weeping and gnashing of teeth. "Blessed are they who are called unto the marriage supper of the Lamb." These will be the ready ones. Even the Bride "makes herself ready" (Rev. xix. 7).

We shall learn more concerning this line of teaching when we examine Matt. xxv. Let us remember that grace does not mean or lead to irresponsibility, but rather constrains unto faithfulness in the little time we have left for fellowship with His sufferings.

#18. The Ten Virgins (Matt. xxv. 1-13).
pp. 183 - 188

The parable of the ten virgins expands and further explains the need for watchfulness and readiness that has already been uttered in Matt. xxiv. 42, where similar words are used to those with which the parable of the Virgins closes. It is most important in considering the structure, to observe the way in which the verbs made up of erchomai, "to come," or "to go," occur, not only because they subdivide the parable for us, but, as we shall see, they form an important link with the next parable and continue the line of teaching. The verbs are exerchomai, "to go forth," and "to go out"; aperchomai, "to go away"; eiserchomai, "to go in"; and erchomai, "to come." Any structure that misses out these pivotal words will fail to illuminate as a structure should the essential teaching.

Matt. xxv. 1-13.

A1 | 1-12. The parable. Wise and foolish virgins.
A2 | 13. Watch, ye know not.

The Parable (Matt. xxv. 1-12).

A1 | 1. The ten virgins "went forth" to meet the Bridegroom (exerchomai).
B1 | 2-5. Wherein they differed. a | Five were prudent.
b | Five were foolish.
b | Foolish took no oil.
a | Prudent took oil.
C1 | 5. Where they were alike.—They all slumbered and slept.
A2 | 6. The ten virgins bidden to "go forth" to meet the Bridegroom (exerchomai).
C2 | Where they were alike.—They all arose and trimmed.
B2 | 8, 9. Where they differed. b | The foolish ask for oil.
a | The prudent refuse.

A3 | 10. The five unready ones "went away" to buy (aperchomai).
B3 | 10. The Bridegroom "came" (erchomai).
C3 | 10. The door was shut.
A4 | 10. The five ready ones "went in" to the marriage (eiserchomai).
B4 | 11. The others "came" (erchomai).
C4 | 11. Open to us.

The parable opens with a note of time.—then. The loose way in which "then" is used in English has prevented many from seeing this parable in its true place. It does not say that all through the history of the Christian Church this has been the state of affairs, but it says, "then at that time the kingdom of the heavens will become like ten virgins." It is important to remember that the Lord is still answering the question of the disciples raised in xxiv. 3. They asked, "When?" and "What?" "When shall these things be?", and "What shall be the sign of Thy coming, and (what shall be the sign) of the sunteleia (that period which is the gathering point of all things just before the end, telos) of the age?" Matt. xxiv. and xxv. supply the answers to these questions.

The "When" is answered in verses 5-14 by "Then shall the end come," and in verse 21, "Then shall be great tribulation." The "What" as to the sign of the Lord's coming is answered in verse 27 by, "as the lightning cometh out of the East and shineth even unto the West," and in verses 27-31 fuller details of the effect in the heavens are given. These answer the question concerning the sign of His coming. The "What" as to the ending of the age is answered in the parable of the Fig-tree and the type of Noah. The Lord expands this section in the parable we are considering, and so the Ten Virgins commences, "Then will the kingdom of heavens be likened unto ten virgins." Then at that time, in the days when the fig-tree has put forth its leaves, and the days of Noah are being re-enacted, then the kingdom of the heavens will be comparable to ten virgins who took their lamps, and went out to meet the bridegroom. Notice the statement: they took their lamps; they went out with the express object of meeting the bridegroom. There is no suggestion that the five foolish virgins were not as earnest as the wise. There is no suggestion that they were hypocrites or unbelievers. The whole point is that they were unready, unprepared—a warning not to sinners, but rather to saints.

The change from servants to virgins is also suggestive. Rev. xiv. 4 shows that in the Scriptures the title virgin may be applied to either sex, and indicates chastity and purity. Further, as immorality will have reached a fearful depth and will constitute once more a part of the religion of the end time, a very real separation is evidenced by the word. Yet further, the word is in some measure equivalent to the O.T. reference to Noah, who was "perfect in his pedigree." The virgins of Rev. xiv. have the Father's name written in their foreheads, in strong contrast to the idolatrous worshippers of the beast who have the number of the beast in their right hand, or forehead (xiii. 16). The reference to the teaching of Balaam (ii. 14), and Jezebel (ii. 20), beside the fearful things said of the woman, Babylon, all point to the same end. The kingdom of the heavens at that time will be found only among a separate people who are "virgins." The point of the parable is not questioning their virginity, nor their intentions, but their failure, their failure to Watch.

Not every one who is a subject of the kingdom of the heavens will enter into the marriage supper of the Lamb. They that are ready go in. In I Thess. iv. 13-18 we have the hope of the believers of that period set out, and it includes a "meeting" of the Lord in the air. Chapter v. immediately develops along the line of Matt. xxiv. and xxv. There we read of the "coming as a thief in the night"; there, as in the days of Noah, when they say peace and safety, sudden destruction is at hand and escape is impossible. Watchfulness is urged in contrast to sleeping and drinking, just as in Matt. xxiv.

Further, life together with the Lord is in no wise connected with watchfulness or sleepiness, just as readiness or unreadiness in no wise alters the virginity of those who went out to meet the Lord. This principle obtains also in the Prison Epistles. For living with Him depends upon having died with Him, whereas reigning with Him depends upon patiently enduring; if this be absent a denial of this reward must follow, although faithfulness on our part will never cause Him to deny Himself. Living with Him remains our unalterable privilege (II Tim. ii. 11, 12). There are many who seem to forget the character of those to whom the promises were made. Let those who lay claim to I Thess. iv. see to it that they have the qualities mentioned in I Thess. i. 3-8.

These virgins go out to meet "The Bridegroom." In Rev. xix., immediately upon the fall of Babylon, the marriage of the Lamb is announced. "The marriage of the Lamb is come and His wife hath prepared herself"; then follows a statement as to the blessedness of those who are invited to the marriage supper of the Lamb. In Rev. xxi. 2 John says that he "saw the holy city, New Jerusalem, coming down from God out of heaven, prepared (same word as "made ready" in xix. 7) as a bride adorned for her husband." This New Jerusalem has special relation not to saints in general, but to overcomers in particular, not to virgins as such, but to virgins who were "prepared." The Epistle to the Hebrews treats of this class, and this class only (as we may be able to show later) and to this class are addressed the words of Heb. xii. 18-24 which includes "the heavenly Jerusalem," the "city which hath the foundations" for which Abraham and others looked, endured, and overcame (Heb. xi. 16). The virgins who go in to the marriage supper are not the bride; that is certain. They are differentiated in Rev. xix. and Psa. xlv.

There is a close connection between the first and last discourse related in Matthew. Most of us know that the eight beatitudes of Matt. v. are balanced by the eight woes of Matt. xxiii. At verse 13 of chapter vii., the subject turns to the question of "entering" into the kingdom of the heavens, and the words "I never knew you" of verses 21-23, are echoed, though not repeated as to actual words, in xxv. 12. This solemn statement in Matt. vii. is immediately followed by a "likened" (so also Matt. xxv. 1) to a prudent and a foolish builder. Their prudence or their folly consisted in their obedience or disobedience to the Lord's words. The prudent virgins heeded the word "watch"; the foolish did not. The wise and foolish builders figure in I Cor. iii. There again the Apostle raises no doubt as to whether they are on the true foundation, what he is concerned about is "how they build thereon."

> "If any man's work shall abide which he hath built thereon, he shall receive a reward. If any man's work shall be burned up, he shall suffer loss, but he himself shall be saved; yet so as by fire."

The effect of the "delay" is brought out in these parables. "My Lord delayeth His coming" (chronizõ). "While the bridegroom tarried" (chronizõ). "After a long time" (chronon polun). This is the key to Hebrews x., xi. and xii.

> "For yet a little while, and He that shall come will come and will not tarry (chronizõ). Now the just shall live by faith . . . . . these all died in faith not having received the promises . . . . . they desire a better country, that is, an heavenly . . . . . the recompense of the reward."

The word "ready" or "prepared" is a connecting word in this context. "All things were ready" (Matt. xxii. 4-8). "Be ye also ready" (Matt. xxv. 10). "Inherit the kingdom prepared for you" (Matt. xxv. 34). "Depart from me ye cursed into eonian fire prepared for the devil and his angels" (Matt. xxv. 41).

A further link with the next parable is found in the repetition of eiserchomai and aperchomai. The one who received one talent went away (aperchomai) and hid the money. Those who were commended were bidden to enter into (eiserchomai) the joy of the Lord.

These words as we have pointed out are important words in the parable of the Virgins. If we may so say, the failure of the five foolish virgins may be attributable to thinking that their calling was EASY, while the failure of the servant with the one talent was because he felt his lot to be too HARD.

May we avoid both errors and have spiritual understanding, or as the word means, "a putting together," that we may see the combined truth of responsibility and sovereign grace and so "walk worthy of the Lord unto all pleasing."

"Perfected for Ever" (Heb. x. 14).

"What the law could not do" (Rom. viii. 3).

pp. 91 - 93

On page 61 of the present Volume we drew attention to the true teaching of Heb. ix. 26, namely, the abrogation of the sin offering. An equally important change is necessary in the rendering of Heb. x. 1.

The little controversy centres around the meaning and position of the words translated "continually." The Greek words thus translated are eis to dienekes, literally, "unto (or for) the unbroken continuance." The words occur four times in Scripture, and the whole four are found in Hebrews. We give the A.V. references first.

> "Abideth a Priest continually" (vii. 3).
> "One sacrifice for sins for ever sat down on the right hand of God" (x. 12).
> "For by one offering He hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified" (x. 14).

It will be seen that the words have reference to the vital teaching of Hebrews. In connection with the infinite superiority of the Melchisedec Priesthood of Christ, one of the most important features is its permanence in contrast with the temporary character of the Aaronic order. In the Melchisedec type we have a "Priest continually." This continuance is in the "power of an endless life" (vii. 16), and is "intransmissible." (vii. 24). This as will be seen is set in contrast with a "carnal commandment," and the fact that the Aaronic Order could not remain unbroken in the person of one priest, by reason of death. The Priesthood being dealt with, the Apostle approaches the Offerings, and together with the Old Covenant they are put away (chapters viii. and ix.).

Chapter x. 12 has been variously rendered. Some put the comma after the words for ever (as in A.V.) and refer the words to the one sacrifice. Others say no, the words "for ever" should read on to the next statement thus, "for ever sat down," in contrast to the many sacrifices offered by the priests. We shall be better able to decide this when we have considered the remaining occurrences. The two other passages (x. 1 and x. 14), structurally balance each other. Verse 14 is clear. "For by one offering He hath perfect for ever them that are sanctified." Here there is no doubt but that the words "for ever" rightly attach to the word perfect. In x. 1 both versions read the words "for ever" with the word "offer." "The same sacrifices which they offer year by year continually." We can see that an offering made "year by year" must of necessity be one that is "oft repeated" (verse 11), but is that the meaning of eis to dienekes? We believe it is not. The "continual" priesthood of Christ was such by reason of the fact that it was never to be repeated or passed on. The "continual" or "for ever" quality in the sacrifice of Christ is like His Priesthood, it is "one sacrifice," "offered once for all." The fact is we have been misled by the looseness of an English word. "Continually" stand for two very different ideas, (1) Permanently, without repetition, (2) Frequently. Now "permanently" is the idea of eis to dienekes, and the impression made by the rendering "year by year continually" is false. This is easily demonstrated by the changing the word thus, "year by year permanently or without repetition." Heb. x. 14 gives us the key. The one offering of Christ "perfects for ever," whereas Heb. x. 1 declares the annual offerings under the law could not "perfect for ever." This rendering of course necessitates a revision of the sentence. The order of the Greek words is given in the following.

> "Every year by the same sacrifices which they offer for ever never is able those drawing near to make perfect."

The meaning is that the law being merely a shadow, by the annual sacrifices which they offer, it could not make those who draw near perfect for ever, whereas the one offering of Christ can and does. This is the insistent message of this passage.

Regarding x. 12 the teaching is that He offered one sacrifice for sins for ever—never to be repeated. The idea sometimes given, "for ever sat down," is not the meaning of the passage.

We may now be better prepared to consider the structure of the section x. 1-18. In the large view it is divided between the Law and the New Covenant.

A1 | 1-9. The Law.—Shadow.
A2 | 9-18. The New Covenant.—Real.

Taking the passage a little more in detail we get the following:--

A | 1. a | The yearly offerings.
b | Are not able to perfect for ever.
c | Those who draw nigh.
B | 2-4. d | Argument.—Cessation of offerings.
e | Argument.—Remembrance of sins.
C | 5-10. f | The prepared body.
g | No pleasure in sacrifices.
h | I come to do Thy Will.
i | The FIRST taken away.
i | The SECOND established.
h | By the which will.
g | Sanctified through one offering.
f | The body of Jesus Christ.
C | 11-13. f | The priest standing.
g | The repeated sacrifice.
h | Never take away sins.
g | Christ's one sacrifice.
h | For sins.
f | He sat down.
A | 14. a | By one offering.
b | Perfected for ever.
c | Them that are sanctified.
B | 15-18. e | Argument.—No remembrance of sins.
d | Argument.—Cessation of offerings.

A comparison of verse 1 with verse 14 in the structure shows that what the law could not do, Christ has done. Its many offerings could not perfect for ever; His one offering does. There is, further, another connection established which we hope to enquire into in some future paper; "those that draw nigh" in x. 1 are balanced by "them that are sanctified" in x. 14. Initial salvation in not in the scope of Hebrews, but rather, the perfecting of saint is in view.

The Reconciliation of All Things.

#4. Col. i. 15-22.
A study of the context.
pp. 3 - 13

Truth out of its context, like teaching outside of its dispensation, may become untruth. One has only to think of such subjects as the sabbath, the offerings, the priesthood, the miraculous gifts, to realize that this is so.

The study of the reconciliation, as taught in Col. i. 15-22, must be conducted with due regard to the limits of the epistle. If the epistle be written to an elect company of believers by a specially appointed Apostle who claims an exclusive ministry, and if that ministry be defined as pertaining to the church of the body, and to the dispensation of the mystery, a ministry that fills up the Word of God, and bridges the gulf which commenced at Acts xxviii., then we must accept these restrictions, and so interpret any detail of the epistle that it shall not transgress the spirit or the letter of these terms.

We therefore feel sure that the reader will desire a consideration of the context before dealing with the actual verses which contain the last reference to the reconciliation.

We have seen by our study of Eph. ii. that the reconciliation, the apokatalassõ, the new word of the mystery epistles, is a step beyond the katalassõ of the earlier epistles, but must not be considered merely as a continuation, or fruition; it is quite distinct. The reconciliation of Eph. ii. was effected between "the both," making "the both one," "creating of the two, one new man," "Reconciling the both in one body to God." The setting aside of the unbelieving majority of Israel (blindness in part) had been overruled to the blessing of the Gentiles, "the reconciling of a world"; the argument of the context would make us see that, possibly, the complete setting aside of that people would be used to produce a still greater blessing. This is what actually took place. The world, though reconciled to God by the death of His Son, as a whole did not receive the reconciliation. The distance which had been maintained ever since the threefold "giving up" and the threefold "change" of Rom. i. 18-32 ("change" being cognate with "reconcile") was no longer perpetuated. God had "opened a door of faith to the Gentiles" (Acts xiv. 27) by the reconciliation (katalassõ), but comparatively few "received" it.

Eph. ii. presents a deeper and fuller truth. Full and complete reconciliation has been effected with regard to the Church of the One Body. The two opposing elements—the Circumcision and the Uncircumcision, the Jew and the Gentile, aggravated by the distinctions in the flesh and the ordinances of revealed religion—these opposing elements have been completely obliterated by a new creation; the two are made one, one new man, one body, and as such are fully reconciled to God.

Col. i. takes us a step further, and gives the final word. Not only is it essential to the purpose of God that the unity of the one body should be for ever secured, not only is it necessary to that end that its component parts should be fully reconciled, it became also a necessity that the place and sphere of its ultimate glory should contain no possibility of enmity or disunity. The sphere of the one body is "in the heavenlies." The preposition en followed by the plural is often better translated "among" (cf. Matt. iv. 23; xi. 11; xvi. 7; John i. 14; Rom. i. 5, 6, etc.), and the teaching is, "among heavenly ones," i.e., principalities and powers, thrones and dominions, etc. Now just as the one body was fully reconciled as to its component parts (Eph. ii.), so must it be with regard to its environment (Col. i.).

Before dealing with the verses in Col. i. which treat of the reconciliation, it will be necessary to see what the epistle is about, or at least the opening section of it. In i. 4 we read, "since we heard of your faith in Christ Jesus, and of the love which ye have to all the saints," and we find that the words are an introduction to a prayer, which has among its prominent petitions many things which are parallel to a similarly introduced prayer in Ephesians.

The many points in common between these two epistles are sufficiently numerous and specific to provide a safeguard in interpretation, and prevent us from interpreting Colossians in such a way as to run counter to the teaching of Ephesians. As we are writing for those who love the Word, we are sure the following list or parallels will be acceptable.

We shall find that some of the passages which form the context of the reconciliation in Col. i., are to a large extent repetitions and expansions of the truth already given in Ephesians. This being the case, it will be exceedingly unwise to attempt an exposition of Col. i. without allowing this inspired commentary a prominent place. We have not given every parallel (they are too numerous), but we have given those which appear to be most relevant, quoting some, and giving references only to others, according as they are nearer or more remote from the subject in hand.

EPHESIANS.	COLOSSIANS.
"After I heard of your faith in the Lord Jesus, and love unto all the saints, cease not to give thanks for you, making mention of you in my prayers" (i. 15, 16).	"We give thanks to God and the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, praying always for you, since we heard of your faith in Christ Jesus, and of the love which ye have to all the saints" (i. 3, 4).
"That the God of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of glory, may give unto you the spirit of wisdom and revelation in the knowledge of Him" (i. 17). "I . . . . beseech you that ye walk worthy of the calling" (iv. 1).	"We. . . . do not cease to pray for you, and to desire that ye might be filled with the knowledge of His will in all wisdom and spiritual understanding that ye might walk worthy of the Lord" (i. 9, 10).
"That ye may know Who (masc.) is the hope of His calling, and Who (masc.) the riches of the glory of His inheritance in the saints" (i. 18).	"To whom God would make known Who (masc.) is the riches of the glory of this mystery among the Gentiles, which is Christ among you, the hope of the glory" (i. 27; see also i. 5, 23). "The inheritance of the saints in light" (i. 12).
"Far above all principality and authority and	"For by Him were all things created, that are in might, and dominion, and every name that is named, not only in this age, but also in that which is to come" (i. 21).	heaven, and that are in earth, visible and invisible, whether thrones, or dominions, or principalities or authorities; all things were created by Him, and for Him, and He is before all things. . . . Who is the beginning, the first-born from the dead, that in all things He might have the pre-eminence" (i. 16-18).

"And hath put all things under His feet, and gave Him to be the Head over all things to the church which is His body" (i. 22, 23).	"And He is the Head of the body, the church" (i. 18). "The Head of all principality and authority" (ii. 10).
"The fulness of Him that filleth all in all" (i. 23). "That ye may be filled with all the fulness of God" (iii. 19).	"For it was well pleasing that in Him should all fulness dwell" (i. 19). "For in Him dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily, and ye are filled to the full in Him" (ii. 9, 10).
"And you who were dead in trespasses and sins" (ii. 1). "Even when we were dead in trespasses, hath quickened us together with Christ" (ii. 5).	"And you, being dead in your trespasses, and the uncircumcision of your flesh, hath He quickened together with Him" (ii. 13).
"The prince of the authority of the air" (ii. 2).	"Who hath delivered us from the authority of darkness" (i. 13).
"That in the dispensation of the fulness of the seasons, He might gather together under one Head all things in Christ, both which are in heaven, and which are on earth; even in Him; In whom also we have obtained an inheritance" (i. 10, 11).	"By Him to reconcile all things unto Himself, by Him, I say, whether they be things in earth or things in heaven. And you, that were sometimes alienated, and enemies in your mind by wicked works, yet now hath He reconciled" (i. 20, 21).
"For He is our peace, Who hath made the both one, and hath broken down the middle wall of partition: the enmity in His flesh having abolished, the law of commandments in ordinances. . . . by the cross, having slain the enmity thereby" (ii. 14-16).	"Blotting out the handwriting of ordinances that was against us, which was contrary to us, and took it out of the way, nailing it to His cross; and having spoiled principalities and authorities, He made a show of them openly, triumphing over them thereby" (ii. 14, 15).
"And what is the exceeding greatness of His power to usward who believe according to the inworking of His mighty power, which He inwrought in Christ, when He raised Him from among the dead" (i. 19, 20).	"Ye are also risen with Him through the faith of the inworking of God, Who hath raised Him from the dead" (ii. 12).
"Since ye have heard of the dispensation of the grace of God which is given me to you-ward. How that by revelation He made known unto me the mystery. . . . whereof I was made a minister. . . . and to make all see what is the dispensation of the mystery, which from the ages hath been hid in God, Who create all things, in order that now unto principalities and authorities among the heavenlies might be known by the church the manifold of God" (iii. 2, 3, 7, 9, 10).	"His body. . . . which is the church, whereof I am made a minister, according to the dispensation of God which is given to me for you, to fulfil the Word of God, even the mystery which hath been hid from the ages and from the generations, but now is made manifest to His saints" (i. 24-26). "For by Him were all things created. . . . all things were created by Him" (i. 16).

Ephesians.	Colossians.	Ephesians.	Colossians.
iv. 1.	i. 10.	v. 18, 19.	iii. 16.
iv. 8.	ii. 15.	iv. 20-32.	iii. 8-15.
iv. 16.	ii. 19.	v. 22 - vi. 9.	iii. 18 - iv. 1.
iv. 3.	iii. 14.

Arising out of this close parallel comes the conviction that Colossians is dealing with the same theme as Ephesians, and that we must be careful so to interpret the passages in Colossians as to avoid conflict with the teaching of similar verses in Ephesians, and not to go beyond its elective scope. Let us consider together some passages which will throw light upon the context of the reconciliation, for if we can define the limits of the context, we shall more truly perceive the meaning of the special verses.

In Eph. i. 18, 19 we have the prayer of the Apostle, that the Ephesian believers may know Who is the HOPE of His calling and Who the RICHES OF THE GLORY and what the exceeding greatness of the power. Col. i. supplies the answer to the twofold question of Eph. i. 18. Christ, He is the hope, He is the riches of the glory, Christ among you. The fact that although Israel had been completely set aside, the gospel could still be preached among the Gentiles, was abundant proof of the reconciliation, and to know Christ in this new sphere, the risen, exalted Head, was to know Who was the hope, the riches, and the glory of the calling and of the mystery.

It will be observed that Christ is spoken of as Head in both Ephesians and Colossians, and, with the exception of I Cor. xi. 3 ("the head of every man is Christ"), no other of Paul's epistles speaks of Him in this capacity.

In Ephesians the Lord Jesus Christ is spoken of as "Head of the church," and in Colossians "He is the Head of the body the church." But not only is Christ the Head of the church, He is spoken of as Head over all things to the church, and "Head of all principality and authority."

This Headship, uniting together as it does the church of the one body, and the heavenly beings known as "principalities and powers," necessitates the special phase of the reconciliation that is brought forward in Col. i.

The parallel in Ephesians is somewhat hidden from the English reader. In Eph. i. 10 the word translated in the A.V. "gather together in one," and in the R.V. "sum up," is anakephalaiomai, which contains in verbal form the word kephale, which is translated "Head." This passage therefore must be considered together with the others which give the title of Head to the Lord. The word can be translated, "to head up," or "to gather together under one Head," and although this rendering may not be elegant, it will preserve the truth for us, which is of more importance.

The parallel between Eph. i. 10 and Col. i. 20, 21 has already been indicated, and we can now see that the heading up of all things (ta panta) which are in heaven and earth, the reconciling of all things (ta panta) which are in heaven and earth, the headship of the one body, and the headship of the principalities and powers, are passages which are linked together. The time when this heading up takes place is given in Eph. i. 10 as "The dispensation of the fulness of the seasons." We must note that it is a dispensation, secondly, that it is characterized as being a fulness, thirdly, that it is of the seasons. The word "dispensation" is the rendering of the Greek word oikonomia; literally the word means the administration of a household, and is translated "stewardship" in Luke xvi. 2, 3, 4. The word occurs three times in Ephesians, "The dispensation of the fulness of the seasons" (i. 10), "The dispensation of the grace of God which was given me to you-ward (iii. 2), and "The dispensation of the mystery" (iii. 9 R.V.). A careful comparison of these three passages yields the following parallel lines of teaching.

In each case we have the verb "to make known." The mystery of His will is made known to us (i. 9), the mystery was made known by revelation to Paul (iii. 2), and the manifold wisdom of God is made known by the church to the principalities and powers (iii. 10). In each case we have a mystery. The mystery of His will, the mystery . . . . . that the Gentiles should be fellow-heirs, etc., and the dispensation of the mystery. The first and third references seem to complement one another, and what is brought together in one place in Col. i., is divided into two sections in Ephesians. In Col. i. the reconciliation follows hard upon the statements regarding the creation, the fulness and the pre-eminence. Col. i. gathers up the lines of truth dealt with separately in the various passages in Ephesians. This may be seen more clearly if we put the reference together.

Ephesians.	Colossians.
"In whom (the beloved) we have redemption through His blood, the forgiveness of trespasses, according to the riches of His grace which He cause to abound unto us. In all wisdom and prudence having made known unto us the mystery of His will according to His good pleasure (eudokia) which He purposed in Himself, unto a dispensation of the fulness of the seasons, to head up the all things in the Christ, those upon the heavens and those upon the earth, in Him." * * * * * * * "The exceeding greatness of His power. . . . which He wrought in Christ, when He raised Him from among the dead, and set Him at His own right hand in the heavenlies, far above every principality and authority and power and dominion and every name that is named, not only in this age, but also in the coming one, and hath put all things under His feet, gave Him to be Head over all things to the church which is His body, the fulness of Him that filleth all in all, and you, being dead by trespasses and sins. . . . hath He quickened. . . . that at that time ye were. . . . aliens. . . . reconciled unto God in one body through the cross. . . . since ye heard of the dispensation of the grace of God which was given to me for you, that by revelation He made known unto me the mystery. . . . the dispensation of the mystery which hath been hidden from the ages by God Who created the all things."	"In Whom (the Son of His love) we have redemption, the forgiveness of sins; Who is the image of the invisible God, firstborn of all creation; because by Him were created the all things, in the heavens and upon the earth, the visible and the invisible, whether thrones, or dominions, or principalities or authorities, the all things have been created through Him and unto Him, and He is before all, and the all things by Him are compacted. And He is the Head of the body the church, Who is the beginning, firstborn from among the dead, that in all things He might have pre-eminence. For it was well pleasing (eudokeõ) that in Him all the fulness should dwell, and through Him to reconcile the all things unto Himself, having made peace by the blood of His cross, through Him, whether the things upon the earth, or the things in the heavens, and you that were sometime alienated and enemies in mind by wicked works, yet now He hath reconciled in the body of His flesh through death. . . . according to the dispensation of God which is given to me for you to fill full the Word of God, the mystery which hath been hidden from the ages and from the generation"

The dispensation of the fulness of the seasons, and the time of the reconciling of all things in heaven and earth appear to synchronize, and the many points in common between Eph. i. 9, 10 and iii. 9, 10, when viewed in the light of Col. i., make it appear that the dispensation of the fulness of the seasons is NOW, and not, as is often supposed, a future period. The dispensation of the mystery committed to Paul is vitally linked with the reconciliation of the things in heaven and earth in Col. i. The great theme of these epistles is the mystery. This mystery does not touch mankind as a whole, but an election only. Of mankind as a whole it is not written that they were chosen in Him before the overthrow of the world, and mankind as a whole are not blessed with every spiritual blessing in the heavenlies. Mankind as a whole do not form the body of Christ. The dispensation covered by these Prison Epistles is elective in character, and present in operation. The references to the future are concerning this elect company, and not concerning Israel and the Nations as such. It is utterly unscriptural, in the face of the repeated emphasis of the Apostle, to teach from these statements, divinely limited and elective, doctrines which are universal and general. With the exception of Eph. i. 10, every reference to a dispensation in the Scriptures is to a period either past or present, never future.

What is stated in Eph. i. 10, and 22, 23, is the same as is found in Col. i. 18 and ii. 10. This dual Headship of things in the heavens and on the earth, this reconciling of things in the heavens and the earth, is an accomplished fact; the very tense of the word in Col. i. testifying to this.

We must not imagine that because the Scriptures speaks of the dispensation of the fulness of the seasons, that it means that the dispensation is a future one, or is the last and grand conclusion of the seasons. A parallel may be seen in the expression "the fulness of the time" in Gal. iv. 4. The fulness of the time then could not mean the conclusion, although it may well be represented by an apex or focus.

"The fulness" is the overwhelming title of the church (Eph. i. 22, 23), the goal of its growth in love (iii. 19), and the measure of its faith (iv. 13). If ever a dispensation claimed the title, the present dispensation of the mystery does. In doctrine, in practice, in hope, the one word fulness expresses truth which cannot be so applied to any other dispensation. Of all the seasons that have run or have to run their appointed course, the dispensation of the mystery claims to be the fulness. The present season, the present dispensation, is put into contrast with the dispensation which preceded it, for in Eph. ii. 12, when speaking of the dispensational disadvantages of the Gentiles, the Apostle speaks of "that season" (kairos). There are other season mentioned in the Word. Rom. iii. 26 speaks of a season in contrast to the period before the proclamation of righteousness by faith. Rom. xi. 5 speaks of the same season during which there was a remnant of Israel according to election, and viii. 18 tells us that it is a season of suffering. Rom. v. 6 translates it "due time." I Tim. ii. 6; vi. 15; and Titus i. 3 definitely teach that certain lines of truth are apportioned to different seasons for their manifestation. The present dispensation of the mystery is the fulness of the seasons. The fulness of time was marked by the birth into this world of the Lord Jesus Christ; the fullness of the seasons is marked by the resurrection glory of that same Christ during the period of His rejection by Israel and by man.

Col. i. 20 speaks of the same period as Eph. i. 10. In Colossians "reconcile" is used; in Ephesians "head up." These are not so widely different as may at first appear. If things in heaven and things on earth are to be united under one Head, then of necessity they must be reconciled, and if reconciled, then they will both confess the same Lord. The church does acknowledge that the Lord Jesus is Head and Lord. To the church He is indeed pre-eminent. Principalities and authorities also are taught the same mighty lesson. He also is Head of principality and authority. It is in connection with the exaltation of the Lord Jesus "far above all principality," that Eph. i. 22 tells us that He was given as the Head over all things to the church. These erstwhile divided companies are to be divided no longer.

The fact that the sphere of blessing for the one body is "among the heavenlies," and "in heaven," is emphasized in Ephesians, Philippians, and Colossians. Ephesians speaks of our being blessed with all spiritual blessings in or among the heavenlies, Philippians tells us that our citizenship is in heaven, and Colossians declares that our hope is laid up in heaven. This hope is linked to that of Ephesians by the words, "whereof ye heard before in the word of the truth, the gospel of your salvation" (Eph. i. 12, 13). This heavenly hope, a part of the gospel which was peculiar to the prison ministry of Paul (Col. i. 23-27), went out into the whole Gentile world. No restrictions whatever bounded it in its breadth, while its height embraced thrones, dominions, principalities and powers, the visible and the invisible, the things in heaven, and on earth. Such is the reconciliation as it pertains to the mystery, which reconciliation must be kept distinct from the reconciliation of Rom. v., xi., and II Cor. v. No dispensational barrier keeps the nations at a distance, or exalts Israel above them, for the reconciliation (katalassõ) has been proclaimed, and within the sphere of the mystery the members of the one body, together with their heavenly and spiritual environment and associates, are completely and fully reconciled (the apokatalassõ, elective and exclusive, Eph. ii. and Col. i.). To apply this teaching of the dispensation of the mystery universally is most unwarranted.

An Explanation.

As some of our words on pages 73 and 74 of Volume V. have cause a little misunderstanding, we gladly respond to the suggestion that we should give an explanation. We do so for one only of the two reasons given. The clearing of our good name, etc., we do not undertake, but if we have appeared to fail with regard to our attitude towards others, we hasten to seek a way of putting things straight. We are glad to be able to say that the writer whose teaching we believe to be in error does not apply the reconciliation of Eph. ii. universally, nor to the future, and the words objected to should be read as applying to the united message of Eph. ii. and Col. i. As we see the reconciliation of Eph. ii. and Col. i. as one, and past, having no reference to that which is future or universal, we mentally carried over the remarks to the, as then, unpublished portion of our article. The current issue contains our demonstration of the essential oneness of the two epistles, and while some may not be inclined to agree with our findings, we trust that none will attribute to us any other motives than those of a sincere desire for the truth. For any unnecessary pain our words may have caused we express our most sincere regret, and pray that grace may be given to enable us more than ever to speak the truth in love, and to avoid even the appearance of evil.

#5. Col. i. 14-22.
Things in earth and heaven.
pp. 20 - 27

We pass from the larger context of the Epistle to the immediate verses which treat of this great subject. The close parallel with the epistle to the Ephesians, together with the internal witness of the Epistle itself, emphasizes the exclusive, elective character of its teaching. What it has to say concerning the ages has entirely to do with their relation to the mystery, not in any sense an exposition of what the ages themselves will bring (Col. i. 26). If the reader will look at the eleven references to the ages that occur in the Prison Epistles, he will see how exceedingly conservative the teaching is. Nothing is mentioned outside the boundary of the Mystery and the One Body, unless we except those references which ascribe glory to God.

A complete structure has not been attempted, but we think the following will be sufficient to show the balance of the various clauses that constitute the range of the passage before us.

Col. i. 14-22.

A | 14. Redemption.
B | 15-17. C | 15. Image, Firstborn.
D | a | 16. Creation. By Him. Through Him. For Him. Heaven and earth.
b | 17. Pre-eminence.
B | 18-20. C | 18. Head. Beginning. Firstborn.
D | b | 18. Pre-eminence.
a | 19, 20. Reconciliation. By Him. Through Him. For Him. Earth and Heaven.
A | 21, 22. Peace.

Several items now call for careful attention before we summarize. First we must keep in mind the "remoter context" of Eph. ii. It will be remembered that in that passages we have the word "create" occurring twice. Eph. ii. 10, "For we are His making, having been created in Christ Jesus"; and ii. 15, "In order that the two He might create in Himself into one new man, making peace." The new creation only is in view here. In Colossians we have not only the new creation, but the old creation as well brought before us. The reason for this is plainly given. In both spheres Christ is Chief, Head, First. He is the Prototokos of all creation. He is the Prototokos from among the dead. "He is before all" is written after the list of created powers is given. "That He might become among all pre-eminent" is the reason given regarding His position in resurrection and the new creation.

To catch the import and connection of verses 15-17 we must go back to verses 12 and 13. There we read that the believer has been made meet for the portion of the inheritance of the saints in the light, and that he has been delivered from the authority of the darkness, and has been translated into the kingdom of the Son of His (God's) love. A complete change has been made. An authority has been broken, the darkness has given place to the light, the authority of darkness has been changed for the kingdom of God's Son. This has moreover been effected by deliverance and translation. It will be remembered that Enoch was translated with the result that men sought for him in vain. So, in a spiritual sense, even now it can be said to the believer, "Why as though living in the world," "Your life is hid with Christ by God." The authority of darkness is evidently the same as "The prince of the authority of the air" of Eph. ii., and "The world holders of this darkness" of Eph. vi. 12. Here we have two spheres, one dominated by the authority of darkness, the other by the Son of God. We shall see presently that the two spheres are brought into sharp contrast at the Cross. With regard to the extent of creation in verses 15 and 16, First, there is the wondrous sweep of all creation, yet as we go further in to the detailed account we are impressed with an obvious selection and purposed limitation. The twofold sphere, the heavens and the earth, and the twofold distinction, visible and invisible, suffice to prove that creation in its widest sense is ascribed to the Son of God. This is not the real object of the passage, however. When we examine still further the things in the heavens, we find that the invisible things alone are tabulated. Elsewhere we find other lists which include the sun, the moon and the stars, the seas and all therein, but the object of Col. i. does not require such to be introduced. The heavenly and invisible alone are specified, and of these, apparently, the highest orders, thrones, lordships, principalities, authorities, yet high above them all, by virtue of both creative and redemptive right, is the Son of God. Eph. i. emphasizes the same truth. At the resurrection of Christ, He was seated at the right hand of God among the heavenlies, far above all principality and authority and power and lordship. He must have the pre-eminence.

Another connection, the more detailed study of which will yield a wealth of teaching, is that of Col. i. 19 and ii. 9. Both passages speak of the fulness dwelling in the Lord, and ii. 10 immediately adds, "Who is Head of all principality and authority." Yet another connection is noteworthy. In Col. i. 20 we read, "Through Him to reconcile the all things unto Him, having made peace by the blood of His cross," while in Col. ii. 15 we read, "Having stripped the principalities and authorities, He made a public exhibition of them, triumphed over them by it" (the cross, verse 14). First notice that the verb "to reconcile" in i. 20 is a past action; the verb is in the Aorist, and refers to a definite act in the past. Any theory therefore that necessitates or desires that this should have been in the future tense must be ruled out by all who bow before the inspired Word. Next note that by comparing the two passages together we learn that at the same moment that the Lord reconciled all things, He also stripped the principalities and the authorities, made a public show of them, and triumphed over them by the very same cross.

Now if we say that Col. i. 20 teaches future universal reconciliation, we make two statements which are contrary to these Scriptural facts, the first fact being, that in Col. i. 20 the reconciliation is viewed as a past completed act, and the second fact being that at the same moment that this past reconciliation was accomplished, some of the very same orders specified as being reconciled were spoiled, exhibited, and triumphed over. If the word reconciliation had been future, then there would have been opportunity for believing that it was possible that the spoiled principalities might be ultimately reconciled. The facts as they stand show clear division and make us believe the truth is that the principalities and authorities were either reconciled or spoiled.

The question now presents itself, Why is it that these spiritual, heavenly, invisible beings are particularized, and what have they and their reconciliation to do with the dispensation of the mystery? Heb. ix. 23 makes it clear that the blood of Christ was necessary for the cleansing of heavenly things. This aspect, however, is not dealt with to any extent in the Scriptures. The human side, naturally, occupies the bulk of the revelation made to man. There is another point we have already indicated, that the expression "in heavenly places" might be rendered "among heavenly beings." Both the exalted position of the Church "far above all principality," and the emphasized pre-eminence of Christ are among the most prominent features of the context, and seem to be very closely connected with the need for the reconciliation. Whether the sin that necessitated cleansing and reconciliation among these high beings had reference to the high glory of the Son of God, we do not clearly see, yet the insistence which is here made upon the recognition of His Headship would incline us to believe it to be so. Moreover, when the Church of the One Body attains this exalted position it will then be nothing less than "The fulness of Him, the One Who filleth all in all." This, equally with the Lord's pre-eminence, we find in close association with the reconciliation. "For it was well pleasing that in Him all the fulness should dwell, and through Him to reconcile all things unto Him." "For in Him dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily, and ye are filled to the full in Him Who is Head of all principality and authority." This reconciliation, taken together with that of Eph. ii., provides absolute harmony for the Church of the One Body in every connection; its erstwhile estranged components—Jews and Gentiles—made one and reconciled as such unto the God in one body by the cross, and the invisible thrones, dominions, principalities, and authorities, are brought into complete harmony with this astounding exhibition of divine grace.

The fact that universal creation is ascribed to the Son of God, while four invisible spiritual powers are enumerated, is a point too important to be lightly brushed aside. Had the object of the passage been to speak of the creation at large, other orders of beings would of necessity have been included. If we insist upon the reconciliation of this passage being co-extensive with creation, we must remember that man is only one out of thousands of created beings, and if we do so insist, we must be prepared to believe that every creature from the tiniest microcosm up to the highest spiritual power, is included in the reconciliation, even though it necessitates the absurdity that one section of man's dominion (Gen. i. 26) will change its natural element and live on dry land (Rev. xxi. 1).

If we limit the reconciliation of all things to mankind upwards, we thereby set aside its universality. Once we do thus limit the reference to all things in creation, we either become a law unto ourselves, or, by recognizing that we have here a new principle of interpretation, are compelled to limit the extent of the reconciliation to the enumeration given. The passage under consideration does not even include man, but is taken up with the higher ranks of spiritual beings among whom the members of the One Body are to enjoy their inheritance. Man is not introduced until verse 21, and then as a distinct class. Then again verse 21 does not speak of man universally, but of those who were believers in the truth proclaimed by Paul (verses 23-27). The "now" of verse 21 has been made by some to contrast with a future reconciliation, but the Scripture, as in Eph. ii., contrasts its "now" with "sometime," or "once" in the past.

There is a great amount of patient detailed analysis and careful prayerful study yet to be brought to bear upon this and the other passages passed under review. Our endeavour in the first instance has been, not to meet every difficulty, nor to explain every aspect, but to show the important Scripture teaching first of all that reconciliation is not a future goal of the ages, but is a past accomplished fact. Summarizing, we find that (1) reconciliation is essential to the ministry of Paul if he was to evangelize the nations; (2) that the lesser word katalassõ is confined to the period covered by the Acts, while the fuller word apokatalassõ is used exclusively in those Epistles which have as their theme the dispensation of the Mystery and the One Body from which mankind, considered universally, is quite absent; (3) that the term has no reference to the AGES either past or future, but is DISPENSATIONAL in character; (4) that the setting aside of the unbelieving Jews was the occasion for bringing the estranged nations near, and that the complete setting aside of Israel was made the occasion for a perfect reconciliation to be effected between believers of either Jew or Gentile origin, who believed the truth committed to Paul as the prisoner of the Lord for the Gentiles, and that, moreover, perfect reconciliation had been effected among the glorious beings with whom, yet far above whom, the Church as the fulness was to receive its glorious inheritance. The lesser reconciliation is based upon the death of God's Son. The fuller reconciliation is connected with the blood of His cross. Reconciliation is a basis, not a goal. The future destiny of mankind as a whole is in nowise altered by the reconciliation.

We do not anticipate that those of our readers who have become committed to any system of teaching will readily renounce their beliefs, particularly, as many express themselves, as deriving such comfort out of their new views. This we readily grant, even as we do to those who are comforted by the thought that their deceased loved ones are even now in heaven.

There are many passages of Scripture which demand our earnest attention, such as, "Who willeth all men to be saved, and to come to a full knowledge of the truth" (I Tim. ii. 4). "Who gave Himself a ransom for all, to be testified in due time" (I Tim. ii. 6). "Who is the Saviour of all men, especially of them that believe"

(I Tim. iv. 10). The "alls" and the "many" of Rom. v., and such statements as, "In those days they shall say no more, The fathers have eaten a sour grape, and the children's teeth are set on edge. But every one shall die for his own iniquity: every man that eateth the sour grape, his teeth shall be set on edge" (Jer. xxxi. 29, 20); the omission of the tribe of Dan from Rev. vii., yet its inclusion in Ezek. xlviii.; the promise that Sodom shall be restored (Ezek. xvi. 53); that Egypt and Assyria are to be blessed (Isa. xix. 24, 25); these, and many more passages must be dealt with. But this could not be undertaken with any fairness so long as the mind is obsessed with the idea that whatever the Scripture may say, yet finally there is to be a universal reconciliation which necessitates a revival from the lake of fire and sets us on the search to find a passage which may be taken as teaching it.

Our study of the Word has made us repudiate the Pagan teaching of man's inherent immortality, and likewise the orthodox teaching concerning eternal conscious torment. We have been led to see that the Bible has not eternity as its theme, but the ages. We find that the vast majority of earth's teeming myriads have been allowed to die with the same carnal mind with which they were born, and that the natural man is utterly incapable of performing the slightest act that will in any sense procure his salvation. We have been compelled to see that no one has received life and salvation except he has been already elected, but we have learned sufficient truth to avoid the error of Calvinism (though rejoicing in much that is true therein), that the non-elect are necessarily reprobated and predestined to irrevocable condemnation. We believe that the Word teaches that all men are dead in trespasses and sins, and that the elect only receive life now, but that as surely as Adam brought death upon all, so surely does Christ bring life to all. What we do not believe, however, is that this life given to all is synonymous with the life given to believers, and that it is equivalent to justification and glory.

Until the reconciliation is seen in its true light it will be impossible to approach such subjects as these unbiased. The reconciliation being dispensational in character, and past in time, cannot have any effect upon these themes, and consequently we shall be free to consider each passage on its own merits, and not feel compelled to interpret it according to some prior conclusion.

We have been asked why it is we have not adopted the translation "conciliation," and "reconciliation," for katalassõ and apokatalassõ. While we appreciate the manifest desire to exhibit the different words used, yet as the suggested translation gives colour to the idea that the "reconciliation" grows out of, or is the development of "conciliation," we cannot accept it. The reconciliation of the epistles before Acts xxviii. has no necessary connection with that of Ephesians and Colossians. It would have been complete, and have fulfilled its purpose, had the dispensation of the mystery never been revealed. We still feel the need of some translation that will point out the difference, but which will, at the same time, prevent the mind from concluding that the fuller word is but the lesser word received and enjoyed. Those who "received the reconciliation" (Rom. v.) were not enjoying the reconciliation of Eph. ii. or Col. i. We shall welcome help from any reader relative to a good translation of katalassõ and apokatalassõ.

Studies in the Book of the Revelation.

#8. The Great Deliverance (i. 5, 6).

(See member B | b of Structure, Volume IV & V, page 107).

pp. 33 - 36

The threefold titles of the Lord Jesus—Faithful Witness, the First-born of the dead, the Prince of the kings of the earth—are followed by a threefold ascription. He is said to be one who loves, who loosed from sins, and who made them a kingdom of priests.

TO HIM THAT LOVETH US.—Of all the manifestations of the attributes of God as revealed by the Lord Jesus Christ, love is singled out for first mention. The first words recorded as coming from the heart of redeemed man in this book direct us to the fountain head. Our A.V. tells us He loved, but the R.V., following all the critical Greek texts, tells us He loveth.

The love of God in Christ lies at the foundation of His mighty purpose. How prominent is the love of God to Israel. In the blessing wherewith Moses the man of God blessed the children of Israel before he died we read, "Yea, He loved the people." Deut. vii. 7, 8 we read, speaking of Israel:--

> "The Lord did not set His love upon you, nor choose you, because ye were more in number than any people . . . . . but because the Lord loved you."

The prophet Hosea speaks of the same period:--

> "When Israel was a child, then I loved him . . . . . I drew them . . . . . with bands of love" (Hosea xi. 1-4).

In Jer. xxxi. 3 we read:--

> "The Lord hath appeared of old unto me, saying, Yea, I have loved thee with an eonian (Heb. olam) love; therefore with lovingkindness have I drawn thee."

The words "of old" (me-rachog) have reference rather to distance than time, and might be rendered "from afar" (see R.V. margin). To Jeremiah the Lord appeared "from afar." To the prophet's eyes appeared the long looked-for day when "He the scattered Israel, will gather him," when the Lord makes a new covenant with the house of Israel (see the whole chapter). Jeremiah looked down the ages, and his eye prophetically looked upon Rev. i. 5, and read the words, "Him Who LOVETH us." This age-enduring love remains true and unshaken, even though it is sadly true that Israel has forgotten "the love of her espousals" (Jer. ii. 2), and "the time of love" (Ezek. xvi. 8). The recognition of this point shows the tender grief which is behind the first charge of Rev. ii., "Thou hast left thy first love."

The love of God is pre-eminently linked with redemption. We often use the love of God when we speak of His watchful care, His faithfulness, His guiding hand, His providence, but we speak not fully in harmony with the Word of truth—love is peculiarly sacred to redemption.

> "God commendeth His love toward us in that while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us."
>
> "For God so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son."
>
> "Herein is love, not that we loved God, but that He loved us, and sent His Son to be the propitiation for our sins."
>
> "The Son of God who loved me and gave Himself for me."

These and similar passages will immediately come to mind. So in Rev. i., "He loveth" is followed by "and loosed us from our sins by His blood." The A.V. reads "washed" (lousanti), but later Greek texts read "loosed" (lusanti), which reading is supported by the test of numerics. Adding this occurrence, the word "to loose" occurs seven times in the Revelation. Once used of sins, twice of seals (v. 2, 5), twice of angels (ix. 14, 15), and of Satan (xx. 3, 7).

To realize the meaning of this term we might look at one or two references outside the book of Revelation, viz.:--

> "For this purpose the Son of God was manifested that He might destroy the works of the devil" (I John iii. 8).
>
> "The elements shall melt . . . . . All these things shall be dissolved . . . . . the heavens being on fire shall be dissolved" (II Pet. iii. 10-12).
> "Having broken down the middle wall" (Eph. ii. 14).

We must be ready to find the word used in its secondary as well as its primary meaning, and not imagine that it is necessarily a truth that we must always translate one Greek word by one English word. John i. 27 and ii. 19 show how one writer uses the word, first in its primary meaning "loose," secondly in its more figurative meaning "destroy," and a rigid concordant or etymological system would be insufficient. To loose, to melt, to dissolve, to destroy, these are the words that are used to convey something of its meaning. What fulness there is in those triumphant words of praise, "Unto Him Who loveth us and LOOSED us from our sins." Vitally linked with this expression is the word translated ransom, "to give His soul a ransom (lutron, the loosing price) for many" (Matt. xx. 28), or redemption in Heb. ix. 12. What a prospect is in store for the redeemed! Sin's claims dissolved, melted, gone.

"Dead to sin" is a somewhat parallel though fuller expression. We say fuller for two reasons. "Dead to" involves something more than "loosed out of," and "sin" is deeper than sins. We shall find a better opportunity for a thorough investigation of this difference under the series Things that Differ. It may be as well, however, to point out that the word hamartia as used by Matthew (the Gospel of the kingdom) always has the plural, or the present manifestation in view, never SIN is reckoned with in other ways. Here in Rev. i. the redeemed give thanks for being loosed from sins, and that "by His blood." From the first recorded offering in Genesis to the last mention of redemption in Revelation, throughout all dispensations (Patriarchal, Mosaic, Mystery), the blood of Christ is prominently placed with respect to forgiveness and redemption. When theology and creed have said their all, a mystery profound is still unfathomed with respect to the necessity for the shedding of blood. It is for us to accept the truth and ever to set it forth.

The word blood occurs 19 times in the Revelation, but of these only four passages have reference to redemption (i.5; v. 9; vii. 14; xii. 11). These references are divided into two by the lines of truth they contain: i. 5, "Loosed from sins"; v. 9, "Made a redemption"; vii. 14, "They made them white"; xii. 11, "They overcame." These two aspects of the efficacy of the blood of Christ are important guides to the special aspect of the Book of the Revelation. First it is deliverance from sins, and a redeemed people. Then it is the overcomer in the power of that redemption, and, as we have before hinted, the overcomer is the character of the Book.

The reference to the blood here in Rev. i. 5 takes us back to Matt. xxvi. 28, where the Lord, as Passover, referred to His blood as the blood of the New Covenant shed for many for the remissions of sins. Revelation, as we have seen, completes and corresponds with Genesis. It also has many parallels with Exodus. A greater than Pharaoh oppresses Israel here; an overthrow greater than that of the Red Sea is here; mightier magicians than those who withstood Moses work their black arts; greater plagues fall than those of the first Exodus. Again the people are sustained in the wilderness and miraculously fed. The Passover Lamb is no longer offered—the true Passover, the blood of the New Covenant, has been shed (see Jer. xxxi. 31, 32 for connection between New Covenant and deliverance from Egypt). The first exodus was a failure; two only, Caleb and Joshua, overcame. The second exodus will be a glorious success. As always, that which is first is not spiritual, but natural. Israel shall yet possess the inheritance given by covenant to Abraham. This may be the reason that the word "loosed" is used in this verse. The cleansing from sins is a part of redemption, but also is deliverance. The exodus from Egypt was pre-eminently a deliverance, and not so much a cleansing. After the Red Sea was passed the cleansing aspect came into prominence. The Tabernacle, the Offerings, the divers Washings, the Priests, these all came afterwards. So in Rev. i. 5, the loosing from sins is followed by the making of verse 6, this subject, however, is too important to deal with now, we must give verse 6 the space that such a passage demands.

We do pray that readers who realize the special interpretation of Revelation will not forget that many precious lessons may be learned by application and analogy. Let us serve, walk, witness and live in the power of the words, "Unto Him that LOVETH us, and LOOSED us from our sins." "Sin shall not have DOMINION over you."

#9. The Kingdom of Priests (i. 6).
pp. 65 - 69

Some are redeemed that they may walk the streets of the New Jerusalem, some to people a renewed earth, some to constitute the fulness of Him that filleth all in all. In Rev. i. 5, 6 redemption has in view the forming of a kingdom.

> "And He made us a kingdom, priests to God and His Father."

The A.V. reads "kings and priests," but the critical Greek Editions read "kingdom, priests." The word "priests" must not be understood as something separate, but as filling out the word kingdom. It is not an ordinary kingdom that is in view; it is a priestly kingdom, or as Peter puts it, "a royal priesthood" (I Pet. ii. 9). This is the LXX rendering of Ex. xix. 6, "a kingdom of priests."

In Rev. v. 9, 10 we have another ascription of praise which is in many ways parallel:--

> "Worthy art Thou to take the book, and to open the seals thereof: because Thou wast slain, and didst make a purchase to God with Thy blood out of every tribe, and tongue, and people, and nation, and madest them a kingdom and priests to our God; and they shall reign upon the earth."

The fulfilment of this is found in Rev. xx. 6:--

> "Blessed and holy who hath part in the first resurrection: over these the second death hath no authority; but they shall be priests of God and of Christ, and shall reign with Him a thousand years."

As we view these three passages of Scripture together, it seems that the priestly kingdom is the millennial kingdom, and that only those who have overcome, and who have had their part in the first resurrection constitute its members. We cannot help but feel that Old Testament prophecies concerning future blessings have been too hastily generalized as millennial. We believe investigation will prove that much that has been considered millennial does not take place till the thousand years are finished, and that a place in the millennial kingdom is largely a matter of being "accounted worthy." This will be considered in its place. If it is established, it will be nothing short of revolutionary in its effect upon the teaching of Scripture relative to the ages to come. To one people only has the promise or the possibility been given of becoming a kingdom and priests, and that is Israel. The various companies of believers that are called churches at different times have their place in the kingdom of God, or the kingdom of the heavens, but that is not being constituted a kingdom as the passage before us states.

It will be well if we turn back to the passage in Exodus xix. which speaks of this royal priesthood, and note the context. In the third month from the exodus from Egypt the Lord gives a message to Israel:--

> "Ye have seen what I did unto the Egyptians, and how I bare you on eagles wings, and brought you unto Myself. Now therefore, if ye will obey My voice indeed, and keep My covenant, then ye shall be a peculiar treasure unto Me above all people, though all the earth is mine: And ye shall be unto Me a kingdom of priests, and a holy nation . . . . . And all the people answered together, and said, All that the Lord hath spoken we will do."

Here we have a reference to the coming out of Egypt, of a covenant, of a promise and of an undertaking by Israel. Jer. xxxi. 31, 32 supplies us with the result of this compact. It takes us back to the coming out of Egypt, and shows us that the covenant entered into by Israel was broken by them. By the old covenant and creature effort, Israel could not become a kingdom of priests. Only under the new covenant could this be possible.

> "Behold the days come, saith the Lord, that I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel, and with the house of Judah. Not according to the covenant that I made with their fathers in the day that I took them out of the land of Egypt; which My covenant they brake, and I rejected them*, saith the Lord."

The gracious words continues, dealing with their sins and ensuring the permanence of Israel as a nation (verse 36). Though rejected in the past, they shall be "cast off" no more (verse 37). It will be noticed, however, that the highest blessing ("a kingdom of priests") is not repeated. That which was placed before all Israel under the old covenant, is reserved for an elect company under the new. Isa. lxi. 6 gives further statements concerning the priestly functions of Israel:--

> "But ye shall be named the priests of the Lord: men shall call you the ministers of our God."

These words are addressed to "those that mourn" (verses 2 and 3), who "shall be comforted" (Matt. v. 4).

"The nation and kingdom that will not serve thee shall perish" (Isa. lx. 12), saith the Lord of Israel in that day; "the Redeemer shall come to Sion, and unto them that turn from transgression in Jacob" (Isa. lix. 20). This is quoted in Rom. xi. 26 to prove that "all Israel shall be saved." All Israel are an elect nation (Rom. xi. 28), yet within the elect nation there was an election unto higher glory (Rom. xi. 7). The rest who were "blinded," mentioned in verse 7, are again mentioned in verse 25. The national position of Israel has no reference to their individual obedience. Their sins shall be taken away (Rom. xi. 27), they, though enemies, are beloved for the fathers' sakes, and the gifts and calling of God are without repentance. But though all Israel shall enter into their blessed portion by the mercy of God, an election from the elect nation already anticipate fuller blessings. Israel is now blind and dead in sin. This election have had their eyes opened, have believed, have suffered, have endured, and they will constitute the kingdom of priests, the royal priesthood, the ones who have their part in the first resurrection, who as priests reign as kings during the thousand years.

Peter addresses his epistles not to the whole nation, but to this elect company among them.

[NOTE: * - "Although I was an husband unto them." The Hebrew word ba'al has two meanings, (1) Lord, (2) To reject. Heb. viii. 9, "And I regarded them not," settles the matter.]

> "Peter, an Apostle of Jesus Christ, to the strangers scattered throughout Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, Bithynia, Elect according to the foreknowledge of God the Father, through sanctification of the Spirit, unto obedience and sprinkling of the blood of Jesus Christ" (I Pet. i. 1, 2).

Such have been begotten unto a living hope, they have an incorruptible, undefiled, and unfading inheritance reserved in heaven. Israel, as a nation, had no such hope. They shall inherit the earth. This elect company pass through fiery trial which shall issue in honour and glory at the "REVELATION of Jesus Christ. . . . hope to the end for the grace that is to be brought to you at the REVELATION of Jesus Christ" (I Pet. i. 3-13). The hopes of this company centre in the revelation, the apocalypse of Jesus Christ, and take us to Rev. i. Of them it is written:--

> "But ye are a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, an holy nation, a peculiar people . . . . . which in times past were not a people, but are now the people of God: which had not obtained mercy, but now have obtained mercy" (I Pet. ii. 9, 10).

They thus anticipate Israel's restoration (see Hos. i. 9, 10; ii. 23, etc.). They, like Abraham and all overcomers, are "strangers and pilgrims" (I Pet. ii. 11 & Heb. xi. 13). They are exhorted as follows:--

> "Beloved, think it not strange concerning the fiery trial which is to try you, as though some strange thing happened unto you: but rejoice, inasmuch as ye are partakers of Christ's sufferings, in order that in the revelation of His glory, ye may rejoice exultingly" (I Pet. iv. 12, 13).

Once again fiery trial, followed by glory at the revelation, is the theme. Yet further:--

> "The God of all grace, Who hath called us unto His eonian glory by Christ Jesus, after that ye have suffered awhile, make you perfect, stablish, strengthen, settle you" (I Pet. v. 10).

The second Epistle continues in the same strain. Chapter i. 11 speaks of an abundant entrance into the eonian kingdom. Chapter ii. vividly depicts the times of the book of the Revelation, and its testing of the elect remnant. Noah, Sodom, fallen angels, and Balaam figure in the story. Chapter iii. deals with the long deferred coming, and the introduction of the new heavens and new earth. It is further of interest to note that the Apostle addresses believers in Asia Minor, the same district as the seven churches of the Revelation. He also addresses them from Babylon, which plays so prominent a part in the Revelation too.

To understand the special teaching of the Revelation, we must keep prominently before us that the millennial kingdom is largely one of reward, it is the eonian glory and kingdom, entrance into which is by suffering. It particularly deals with an elect company who are consistently spoken of throughout as "the overcomers." Failure to perceive this exclusive character has made the millennial kingdom a kind of dumping ground for all unfulfilled prophecy, leaving the "Ages of Ages" which follow it a blank prophetically, and has also introduced into the book those who have no part nor lot there at all. Christendom or the Church are not in view. Israel, and particularly the faithful remnant of overcomers, are the chief human interest. Read I and II Peter again and again—they will give clear light on the teaching of The Apocalypse.

#10. The Glory and Dominion. The first Amen (i. 6).
pp. 97 - 99

With this ascription of glory and strength we reach the first of a series of eight Amen's which run through this book.

The glory of redemption is His; He is the "stronger than the strong man armed"; He it is that has the keys of Hades and of death. The glory also of the kingdom is His.

The first time we read of glory in the N.T. is in Matt. iv. 8, where the tempter showed the Saviour the kingdoms of the world and the glory of them. We know how futile the temptation was, and here in Rev. i. we rejoice to see Him acknowledged as the One rightly to receive the glory as a sequel to His redeeming love.

The word translated "dominion" is kratos, and means "strength." v. 13 renders it "power," and these are the only occurrences in the Revelation. The word is used in Eph. i. 19:--

> "And what the exceeding greatness of His power towards us who believe according to the inworking of the strength of His might which He wrought in Christ when He raised Him out from dead ones."

This great strength seems to have reference to "him who has the strength of death, that is, the devil" (Heb. ii. 14).

Peter links glory and strength together in I Pet. iv. 11, "To Whom be praise and dominion" (glory and strength), and v. 11 also. Col. i. 11 links glory and strength for our practical walk now in the phrase, "according to His glorious power," literally "the strength of the glory." One thing at least is clear, we have here no empty glory, but a glory resting upon a solid foundation. He who had the strength of death has been vanquished, the glory long usurped is to be his no longer. It will be remembered that in Psa. viii. 2 we read, "Out of the mouth of babes and sucklings hast Thou ordained strength." The LXX and Matt. xxi. 16 give "perfected praise." This shows that the word "strength" must be the Figure of Metonymy, where the ascription of praise is called forth by the great strength of the overcomer.

Most of our readers will know that the title, "to the chief musician upon Muth-labben," which stands over Ps. ix. is really the conclusion of Ps. viii. This expression is taken to mean "the death of the champion," indicating in the first place the destruction of Goliath, and prophetically the overthrow of antichrist and satan, "the enemy and the avenger." A further and fuller light shines on Ps. viii. when we realize that "through death, and it is quite possible that the "champion" may refer more to Christ Himself than to the antitype of Goliath. This is strengthened by the quotation of Psa. viii. in Heb. ii., where it continues "but we see Jesus, ... for the suffering of death, crowned with glory and honour."

The dual ascription of "glory and strength" is found in Psa. xxix. 1, and verse 2 continues, "give unto the Lord the glory due unto His name." Verse 3 says, "the voice of the Lord is upon the waters, the God of glory thundereth," and verse 11 concludes with the comforting assurance that He to Whom glory and strength is ascribed "will give strength unto His people." As we read Psa. xxix. and then read in Rev. i. of the voice that is like the sound of many waters (verse 15) and see the strengthening power of His right hand (verse 17), we realize that the King of Psa. xxix. is before us.

Psa. xcvi. introduces " a new song," and in verse 7 the "kindreds of the people" are called upon to ascribe to the Lord "glory and strength," and to "say among the heathen the Lord reigneth" (verse 10), "for He cometh, for He cometh to judge the earth" (verse 13). We cannot help thinking of Rev. i. 7, "behold He cometh with clouds."

The more we search and examine the O.T. prophecies, the more we realize the culminating fulness of the words of Rev. i. 6. The glory and strength thus ascribed is His "unto the ages of the ages.'

There are three variations of this usage of "age." We have in Heb. i. 8, "Thy throne, O God, is unto the age of the age," in Eph. iii. 21, "The age of the ages," and Rev. i. 6 "The ages of the ages." Just as we have the expression "King of kings," "Holy of holies," "Servant of servants," "Hebrews of Hebrews," "Pharisees of Pharisees," so we have "Ages of ages," not merely an indication of length of time, but of superlative excellence. During the ages that are to ensue, commencing as far as we can perceive with the millennial reign, the glory and strength of them will be ascribed unto the Lord. Here we see Him crowned with glory and honour, highly exalted, and given the Name that is above every name. This enables us to look beyond the conflict of earth to the peace that shall come, with confident expectancy. To this glorious ascription of praise heaven adds its first apocalyptic Amen. The use of this word "Amen" in Revelation is suggestive. We find it used in three connections. It follows:--

1. The ascription of praise to the Lord,
2. The statement of and prayer for His coming, and
3. It is the title of the Lord Himself.

Amen.

A | i. 6. Glory to Him, etc.
B | i. 7. He cometh. Yea, Amen.
C | iii. 14. The Amen, the faithful and true Witness.
A | a | v. 14. Four living ones, and twenty-four elders.
b | vii. 11, 12. Angels.
a | xix. 4. Four living ones and twenty-four elders.
B | xxii. 20. I come. Yea, Amen.

It will be seen that v. 14, vii. 12, and xix. 4 suggest an expansion of the first passage (i. 6), and a careful study of these verses will throw further light upon the One who is the Prince of the kings of the earth, the throne upon which He sits, and the circumstances under which He reigns.

We with the inspired book add our hearty Amen. To His glory we too say, Amen, to His coming again, Amen, and looking forward to the wonderful and manifold promises of God we say with the Apostle, "In Him is the Yea and in Him the Amen, unto the glory of God" (II Cor. i. 20).

#11. Rev. i. 7.
pp. 129 - 133

We have reached the first Amen of this book, and find that the section bounded by the word deals with the revelation of the Lord Jesus and the manner of its delivery to John (by an angel), the ones to whom John is to send the written record of the visions, and the great theme, the fulfilment of God's promises to Abraham and David in the future regeneration and blessing of Israel as a kingdom of priests. Verse 7 which follows is in turn bounded by another Amen. This is the briefest section of the book, yet how important it is may be gathered not only from its contents, but by its unique position. The words of verse 7 are introduced by "Behold," a word that occurs some thirty times through the book. The last occurrence (xxii. 12) deals with the same great topic—the coming of the Lord. "Behold, He cometh with the clouds."

So often are clouds spoken of in connection with the coming of the Lord that we can readily believe that when the Apostle says, "Behold, look, He cometh with THE clouds," he would have us understand that he means that here is the fulfilment of the many passages which declares them to be the accompaniment of the returning Lord. The great passage referred to here is Dan. vii. 13, 14. It occurs after the "little horn" had spoken "great things," and the body of the beast was "given to the burning flame" (cf. Dan. vii. 8-11, 21-25, with Rev. xiii. and xix.).

> "I saw in the night visions, and behold, one like the Son of man came with the clouds of heaven . . . . . His (dominion) shall not pass away and His kingdom shall not be destroyed" (Rev. vii. 13, 14).

The parallel between this chapter and the book of Revelation is very marked and must be kept much in mind. Matt. xxiv. 30 speaks of the clouds in the same connection, "and they shall see the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven, with power and great glory." Matt. xxvi. 64 deals with the same theme. "Hereafter shall ye see the Son of man sitting on the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven." This thought is evidently of great importance, for it finds a place also in Mark and Luke. Acts i. 9 speaks of the ascension of the Lord from the mount of Olives, "and a cloud received him out of their sight." Verse 11 declares, "He shall so come in like manner as ye have seen Him go into heaven." I Thess. iv. 17 tells us that the hope of those who are dispensationally described as the Church at Thessalonica is to be "caught up together in clouds, to meet the Lord in the air." A comparison of the teaching of I and II Thessalonians with Revelation will show that they refer to the same period. The word cloud (nephele) is one of the words that occur seven times in the Apocalypse, and is associated with the Lord's coming, the time of reaping the harvest of the earth, the finishing of the mystery of God, and the triumph of those who loved not their lives unto the death. (It is interesting to know that among the Jews of early times the Messiah was called "Cloud-comer" and "Son of a cloud.")

> "And every eye shall see Him, even those who pierced Him, and all the tribes of the land shall wail because of Him."

The statement "every eye" seems to be qualified in this sentence by the words that follow. Matt. xxiv. 30 undoubtedly refers to the same event, and says, "Then shall appear the sign of the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory." The "tribes of the land," and the mourning of those who pierced Him, take us back to Zech. xii. 9-14—

> "And it shall come to pass in that day, that I will seek to destroy all the nations that come against Jerusalem. And I will pour upon the house of David, and upon the inhabitants of Jerusalem, the spirit of grace and supplication: and they shall look upon Me whom they have pierced, and they shall mourn for Him as one mourneth for his only son."

This passage contributes several particulars that are essential to the true interpretation of Rev. i. 7.

(1). The occasion and time of its fulfilment is after the nations have come against Jerusalem. This event is spoken of again in Zech. xiv. 12-16. The fearful judgment that falls upon those who have fought against Jerusalem is echoed in Rev. xix. 18.

(2). Those who "look upon Him whom they have pierced and mourn," are the "house of David and the inhabitants of Jerusalem," more fully particularized into houses and families, "Nathan, Levi, Shimei, etc." By no legitimate interpretation can these definite particulars be made to mean the church of the N.T.

(3). This "look" and this "mourning" results from the "spirit of grace and supplication." Repentance at last will be given, and the Lord "shall send Jesus Christ . . . . . whom the heavens must receive until the times of restitution of all things, which God hath spoken by the mouth of all His holy prophets since an age" (Acts iii. 19-21).

Together with Zech. xii. 9-14 see xiii. 1. "In that day there shall be a fountain opened to the house of David and to the inhabitants of Jerusalem for sin and for uncleanness." Rev. i. 5, 6 has already referred to this. Further, Zech. xiv. 2-4 must be read:--

> "For I will gather all nations against Jerusalem to battle . . . . . then shall the Lord go forth to fight against those nations . . . . . and His feet shall stand in that day upon the mount of Olives, which is before Jerusalem."

This reference links the passages up still more. The reader is prevented from spiritualizing "the mount of Olives" by the topographical statement, "which is before Jerusalem." This and much more in Zechariah (as indeed in all the so called minor prophets) throws light upon the time and locality of Rev. i. 7.

Referring again the Matt. xxiv. 29, 30, we learn one more item:--

> "Immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven, and the powers of the heavens shall be shaken. And then shall appear the sign of the Son of man in heaven, etc."

Rev. i. 7 then takes place not only in direct connection with Jerusalem, but "immediately after the tribulation." Now there is no possibility of doubt as to when this tribulation takes place. Matt. xxiv. 15-21 says:--

> "When ye therefore shall see the abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel the prophet, stand in the holy place . . . . . then shall be great tribulation, such as was not since (the) beginning of the world until now, no, nor ever shall be."

There can only be one such tribulation in history, and therefore to this Rev. vii. 14 refers:--

> "These are they which came out of the tribulation, the great one."

Rev. i. 7 must therefore take place after Rev. vii. 14. Further, this tribulation is directly the result of setting up of the "abomination of desolation spoken of by Daniel the prophet." This is set out in detail in Rev. xiii. and the tribulation is connected with refusing to receive the mark of the beast. The unparalleled tribulation of Matt. xxiv., which is immediately followed by the coming of the Son of man as in Rev. i. 7, is referred to in Dan. xii. 1-3:--

> "And at that time shall Michael stand up, the great prince which standeth for the children of thy people, and there shall be a time of trouble, such as never was since there was a nation even to that same time; and at that time thy people shall be delivered, every one that shall be found written in the book. And many that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, these to eonian life, and those to shame and eonian contempt. And they that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament; and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars unto the age and beyond."

This passage emphasizes the "overcomer" as plainly as does the book of the Revelation. The reference to Michael takes the reader on to Rev. xii. 7-10:--

> "And there was war in heaven, Michael and his angels fought against the dragon . . . . . Now is come salvation, and strength, and the kingdom of our God and the power of His Christ."

The whole teaching of the Prophets and the Gospels bears one united witness to the fact that Rev. i. 7 is the hope of Israel, is to be literally connected with the Mount of Olives, (as Acts i. 11, 12) and Jerusalem, that it will immediately follow the great tribulation, which takes place when Michael drives Satan to earth and the Antichrist arises in blasphemy. To be a kingdom or priests is Israel's destiny. To none other is such a promise made. To fulfil that promise the Lord Jesus as the King Priest returns, and Rev. i. 7 records that coming.

Rev. i. is as much future as Rev. xix. The traditional interpretation that makes the first three chapters past and present, and the future section to start from Chapter iv. is wrong.

The Apostle concludes this solemn verse with a double confirmation, "Yea, Amen." He uses the same expressions in xxii. 20:--

> "Yes, I am coming speedily. Amen! Come Thou, O Lord Jesus."

This is the revelation of the Lord Jesus. Till this takes place earth will be a wilderness to faith, and a fruitful soil for sin. Till this takes place the God of this age will rule as the prince of the authority of the air. While the hope of the One Body is not expressed in any of the passages referred to, yet they, in sympathy with a groaning creation, a down-trodden and blinded Israel, and a doomed Gentile world, can also add heartily and prayerfully, "Yea, Amen. Even so, Come, Lord Jesus."

#12. Rev. i. 8, 9.
pp. 161 - 165

> "I am the Alpha and the Omega, saith the Lord God, Who is,
> and Who was, and Who is coming, the Almighty" (R.V. and Numeric N.T.).

If the reader will refer to the structure given on page 107 Volume IV & V, he will see that the title Alpha and Omega is balanced by the title taken by Christ, "I am the first and the last." Further, the words, "Who is, and Who was, and Who is coming" are echoed in the title "I am He that liveth, and was dead; and behold I am alive for evermore." The title, "Almighty" finds its answer in the claim, "I have the keys of hades and of death." This perfect unity and reflection of purpose and attribute has already been before us in verses 4 and 5.

The title Alpha and Omega in Rev. i. 8 is not specifically given to Christ, although the fact that it immediately follows verse 7 would lead one to think it refers to Him as the coming One. Rev. xxii. 12-16, however, leaves us in no doubt, and as this chapter structurally corresponds with chapter i., it would seem to settle the matter for us.

> "And behold, I come quickly . . . . . I am Alpha and Omega . . . . . I Jesus have sent Mine Angel."

The expression Alpha and Omega is explained by the words, "beginning and ending, first and last," and we shall have opportunity of considering this title when we come to verse 17. The title that is new to use is the last one, "The Almighty." The title occurs ten times in the N.T., nine of the occurrences being in the Revelation. It is a title therefore that has some peculiar connection with the subject of the book. The passages are as follows:--Rev. i. 8; iv. 8; xi. 17; xv. 3; xvi. 7, 14; xix. 6, 15; xxi. 22, and they deal with the reign and rule of the coming King, judgment, wrath, and blessing as pertain to the purpose of God in Israel and the nations. The one reference outside the book of Revelation is II Cor. vi. 18, where the insistent note is separation from uncleanness, "perfecting holiness in the fear of God." The first passage where the LXX uses the title is II Sam. v. 10, where it is rendered in the A.V. by "The Lord God of hosts." The other occurrences in II Samuel are vii. 8, 26, 27. Each reference has relation to David, the greatness of his kingdom and the future of his house. This title which occupies so great a place in the Prophets, "the Lord God of hosts" and "the Lord of hosts," seems to be used most in those Prophets that approximate most to the theme of the Revelation. The title comes before us again in James v. 4, "The Lord of Sabaoth," the context urging patience unto the coming of the Lord. John, in Rev. i., continues in much the same strain:--

> "I John, your brother and partaker with you in the tribulation and kingdom and patience in Jesus, came to be in the island which is called Patmos, because of the Word of God and the testimony of Jesus."

John calls himself a "brother and a partaker." The use of the word "brother" in the Revelation is by no means indiscriminate, in fact it appears to be confined to one distinct class, namely, those who are the overcomers by faith, and who spoke forth the Word of God. Rev. i. 9 is the only occurrence of the word in the singular, the remaining four occurrences being in the plural. These four references should be noted here, in order that their light may be used in learning the true significance of John's title.

Martyrdom attaches to the first reference, overcoming to the second, the possession of the testimony to the third, and keeping the sayings of the book to the fourth.

A | vi. 11. Fellowservants and brethren killed—for the Word of God and the testimony (verse 9).
B | xii. 10. Accuser of brethren cast down. Overcame by the word of their testimony (verse 11).
A | xix. 10. Fellowservant and brethren that have the testimony of Jesus . . . . . the spirit of prophecy.
B | xxii. 9. Fellowservant and brethren which keep the sayings of this book.

No one reading these passages can doubt but that they are closely connected. What is the common theme? The testimony of Jesus—the spirit of prophecy; in other words, "the sayings of this book" of the Revelation.

Our study of the Scriptures can never be too careful. Nothing is written therein without due regard to all truth. The indiscriminate use of the title "brethren' is a case in point. The fact that the title is used in a restricted sense in Revelation is manifest. It also agrees with one or two other prominent passages. For example, when we read in Matt. xxv. concerning the nations and the treatment of the "least of these My brethren," we must not think that the whole of the nation of Israel is necessarily intended. Rather is it to be interpreted, in the light of the Revelation, to refer to that faithful company, who for the "testimony of Jesus" will know what it is to be hungry, and naked, and in prison, and also to "be killed." These, and not the nation of Israel as a whole, are the "brethren" intended.

John also calls himself a "partaker in the tribulation and kingdom and patience." The Greek of this passage, as indeed the English, presents a little difficulty unless we recognize a figure of speech named Hendiatris, "one by means of three." Such a figure occurs in Heb. x. 20, "A new and living way," which is arranged similarly to the words in John, "I am the way, the truth and the life," which should read, "I am the true and living way." The words in Rev. i. 9 mean not three things, but one, and that one defined by two other terms. The one things is "tribulation," and it is peculiarly that tribulation which is related to the kingdom, and which necessitates much "patience." "We must through much tribulation enter into the kingdom of God" was Paul's testimony as recorded in Acts xiv. 22. (The sudden departure from narrative to quotation here [for Paul's own words are quoted] only emphasizes the more to us the stress which the Apostle evidently gave to this utterance).

Patience is referred to seven times in the Revelation, and its "perfecting work" is seen as the story of the book unfolds. Two passages call attention to the "patience" of the saints during the tribulation which comes about at the time of the Beast.

> "If any one is for captivity unto captivity he goeth: if any one is to be killed with the sword, with the sword he is killed. Here is the patience and faith of the saints" (xiii. 10).
> "Here (in connection with the mark of the beast, verses 9-11) is the patience of the saints who keep the commandment of God, and the faith of Jesus . . . . . blessed are the dead who die in the Lord from henceforth" (xiv. 12, 13).

In this kingdom tribulation with its accompanying patience John was a partaker together with all who rightly were "brethren." His next remark links the tribulation with its cause. It is the particular application of the universal truth, "I have given them Thy Word, and the world hath hated them."

John tells us that he "became," or "found himself" as we should say perhaps, "in the island called Patmos," a small island half-way between Rome and Jerusalem, situated in the sea of prophecy, "the great sea." Tradition tells us that John was "banished" to the Isle of Patmos, as it also tells us that the Lord's day means the first day of the week. John tells us in i. 2 that he "bare record of the Word of God, and of the testimony of Jesus, and of all things that he saw," while verse 9 tells us that he received this word and testimony, and saw the things written in this book "in the isle called Patmos." Rev. xx. 4 includes "the word of God" among the causes of martyrdom of those who have their part in the first resurrection. Not only so, but "the witness (or testimony, same word) of Jesus" also. This double expression balances the passage in i. 9, these being the first and last occurrences. In xii. 17 the dragon makes war with those who "keep the commandments of God and have the testimony of Jesus." Chapter xix. 10 has already shown it to be both the mark of the brethren, and the spirit of prophecy. These five passages should be well considered, especially i. 9 with xx. 4.

As members of the one body, and those who have believed the truth as given through the ministry of the prisoner of the Lord, we have a tribulation connected therewith, not a tribulation connected with the kingdom, but nevertheless a real one. We too need much patience, we too may overcome, we too must hold fast the faithful word. Though our destinies may be different from those who will reign in the millennial kingdom, there are many close parallels so far as our conduct and experiences are concerned. May we be encouraged to overcome, remembering for our encouragement how verse 9 reads on from verse 8, where we see the “Almighty” ready to help in time of need.

The seventy sevens of Daniel ix.

A case for discerning things that differ.

pp. 165 - ???

In connection with a question raised by a correspondent as to whether the church age began at Pentecost or after Acts xxviii., to whom the common interpretation of the 70 weeks of Dan. ix., viz.,

> That the 69th week ended just before the crucifixion of Christ, and that therefore the final seven years are all that remain to complete the number, and that these are entirely future and are found in the Book of Revelation.

presented a difficulty, we would draw special attention to an interpretation (we believe the true one) in which a certain principle is enunciated, viz., that prophetic times do not take into account the periods when Israel are "Lo-ammi" (not My people, Hosea i. 9). In Part I of the Companion Bible, page 70 of Appendixes, will be found a table showing the various "Lo-ammi" times that must be deducted from the number of years before we can arrive at God's time periods. At the conclusion of this table the note runs, "By noting the LO-AMMI periods, many other important details will come to light".

We believe the following investigation is directly in line with this suggestion. First, let us establish from the Scriptures the principle that God's prophetic times take no account of their recognition. The classic example is that which arises out of the comparison of I Kings. vi. 1 with Acts xiii. 20. According to I Kings vi. 1 the temple was commenced in the 480th year after the children of Israel were come out of the land of Egypt, while Paul in Acts xiii. 17-22 gives the period as 573 years, a difference of 93 years. We find by examination and the recognition of the principle referred to above, that there is no discrepancy, and that both accounts are exactly right, the one in I Kings vi. omitting the periods when Israel were "Lo-ammi", the other in Acts xiii. giving the entire period without reference to the position occupied by Israel. The 93 years are made up as follows. Israel were captive under:--

Chushan	(Judges iii. 8)	8 years.
Eglon	(Judges iii. 14)	18
Jabin	(Judges iv. 3)	20
Midianites	(Judges vi. 1)	7
Philistines	(Judges xiii. 1)	40

	Total.	93 years.
		===

We learn therefore that to obtain the number of years as from God's standpoint when dealing with Israel, we must subtract the periods when Israel was not recognized by the Lord as a people.

Number in Scripture (by Dr. E. W. Bullinger) draws attention to another period of 70X7, which is obtained by the application of this principle.

From the deduction of the Temple to Nehemiah's
Return in the 20th year of Artaxerxes (Neh. ii. 1).	560 years.
Deduct the 70 years' servitude in Babylon
(Jer. xxv. 11, 12; Dan. ix. 2).	70

Total.	490 years.
	=========

We draw particular attention to the fact that the 70 years' servitude is reckoned as a "Lo-ammi" period.

We now pass to the next consideration, Dan. ix. itself.

"Seventy sevens are severed off upon thy people and upon thy holy city

a | To make an utter end of transgression.
b | To seal up sins.
c | To make atonement for iniquity.
a | To bring in eonian righteousness.
b | To seal up prophetic vision.
c | To anoint the Holy of Holies.

Know therefore and understand that from the going forth of the commandments to rebuild Jerusalem unto the Messiah the Prince shall be

7 X 7 - 49

and the street shall be built again the wall even in troublous times. And after the 62 sevens shall Messiah be cut off, and shall have nothing."

Dan. ix. opens with the recognition of the fact that Jerusalem was at that time "desolate". Verse 7 speaks plainly of the people of Israel being "driven", and verse 11 of the curse being poured over upon them. Verse 12 declares that the visitation upon Jerusalem was unprecedented "under the whole heavens". Verse 16 speaks of "fury" upon Jerusalem and "reproach" upon Israel, and verse 17 speaks of the sanctuary being desolate. Clearly at this period Israel are "Lo-ammi", and the time of the desolation of Jerusalem must not be reckoned in the 70X7 period which is "severed off" upon Israel.

Now from what we have already learned, we shall find it impossible to commence the reckoning of this 490 years at a period when Jerusalem is still desolate and Israel "Lo-ammi". Yet this is precisely what the accepted interpretation does. The 490 years are made to start from the going forth of the commandment to rebuild Jerusalem, in spite of the angel's warning that the rebuilding would not be completed until another 49 years had gone by! Instead of the angel saying to Daniel that the 70X7 started in the 20th year of Artaxerxes when the commandment was given, he definitely says that from that date we may compute the coming of the Messiah, a somewhat different thing. From the date of the command unto the Messiah was 7X7, and 62X7, or 483 years, which period was divided by the angel into two, according as it was "Lo-ammi" time or otherwise. The first period of 49 years must not be reckoned in the period severed off upon Israel, otherwise we shall involve ourselves in confusion.

Where shall we then commence the special period of 70X7? When Israel are received back into favour and the temple at Jerusalem again blessed! In the year B.C.405, when the temple was dedicated at Jerusalem, the 70X7 began. It was to be the commencement of a period of "Ammi" years, years when God recognized Israel as His people, a period of 62X7, or 434 years, which should reach to the coming of Messiah the Prince. While the crucifixion of Christ marks the close of the 69th seven from the going forth of the proclamation, we must remember that it is the 62nd from the dedication of the temple, and as this commenced the period of Israel's restoration, the crucifixion marks the 62nd seven of the 70 sevens that were severed off upon Israel, leaving 8 sevens to run their course, instead of one as we have hitherto taught.

In other issues of this Magazine we have shown the prominent position that Israel has in the Acts of the Apostles, yet by following the orthodox view it appears that we are compelled to make a two-fold error. First, in spite of the witness of Scripture to the contrary, a period of 49 years, wherein Israel and Jerusalem are out of favour, is introduced into a special period that necessitates Israel and Jerusalem being under favour and security, and it compels us to blot out the whole of the Acts from this special period wherein Israel and Jerusalem manifestly are still receiving mercy. If the 69th seven ended at the crucifixion, there could be no place for Paul's solemn and formal setting aside of Israel at the end of the Acts.

Readers will remember that a rectification was found necessary in the calendar, and that the date of the crucifixion was A.D.29. This can be seen in chart 50/vi. on page 61 of Appendixes to Part I of The Companion Bible. From A.D.29 to A.D.63, when God finally set aside Israel through the words of Paul, we have 34 years, where, if we include both the years that began and ended the period, we have practically another five sevens which ran on after the crucifixion. The crucifixion being the 62nd seven, Israel becomes Lo-ammi at the end of Acts, in the 67th seven, leaving three sevens to conclude the complete series of 490 years. We must not therefore speak of the "final seven years of Dan. ix." as though they were all the years that are to run. It is true that the chief interest is centred in the final seven, for therein Antichrist and the Beast are active, but there other things to be done before that.

There is a suggestive connection to be observed between the final three sevens and the seven seals, seven trumpets and seven vials that occupy the book of the Revelation. The following diagram, which shows the difference between the two interpretations, may be of help. It will be seen that the marvelous accuracy that has been pointed out regarding the time of the coming of the Messiah is not impaired. It is simply a matter as it were of placing the whole period forward until Israel are a people before God. That period is at the close of the first division, the 7 sevens. Since the setting aside of Israel in Acts xxviii. Israel have been "Lo-ammi". Soon that He that scattered them will gather them, and the "final 3 sevens" will then run their course until the consummation foretold in Dan. ix., when prophecy shall attain its goal, sin shall be sealed and atoned for, righteousness be brought in, and God's Holy Temple again anointed. (Figure I represents the orthodox view; Figure 2 the view set forth in this article).

Sidelights on the Scripture.

#8. Cyrus, Darius, etc.,
pp. 13 - 15

Passing from the interesting relics of Nebuchadnezzar and Belshazzar, we notice in the same Table Case G a portions of an inscribed cylinder of Cyrus (No. 90,920). Prof. Sayce tells us that the inscriptions of Cyrus are more Hebraic than any other of the cuneiform texts known to us, and that it seems in some way or other that Cyrus had come under the influence of Jewish ideas. The cylinder before us tells of the taking of Babylon. It tells us that Marduk "sought out a righteous prince, a man after his own heart." The description of the taking of Babylon is very similar to the Scriptural account. "Without battle and without fighting Marduk made him enter into his city of Babylon; he spared Babylon tribulation." The last sentence quoted shows what a great difference there must have been between Cyrus and the Kings of Assyria. These inscriptions seem full of bloodshed and cruelty. So far as our present knowledge enables us to say, we hear for the first time such records words of compassion and pity. Prisoners are freed, exiles restored, gods replaced in their ancient temples (see The New Biblical Guide, Urquhart). This was the man who restored the Jews to their land, and, in harmony with the records of his character, gave them perfect freedom regarding their religion. Isa. xlv. speaks of Cyrus, and Ezra tells of his decree of restoration. Ezra's account gives a little more than does II Chron. xxxvi. 23, and we particularly note the words, "The Lord God of Israel (HE IS THE GOD)." Had Cyrus learned to acknowledge the living God like Nebuchadnezzar before him? See Daniel iv. It seems so; truly great is the grace of our God.

In Table Case D will be found another connection with Babylon. In the lower Case will be found a collection of seals and their impressions on white plaster. No. 89,132 (top row near the centre) is a seal of Darius, with his name and titles in the Persian, Scythic, and Babylonian languages. Some such seal would have been used by the Darius of Dan. vi. 17. Seal No. 89,326 shows a man and woman seated on either side of a tree, with a serpent standing behind the woman. This has been identified as the Babylonian equivalent to the temptation of Eve as recorded in Genesis. A very ancient name for Babylon in the Sumerian language is Tin-Tir-Ke, which means "The place of the tree of life." A tablet speaking of the temptation and fall says:--

> "In sin one with another in compact joins,
> The command was established in the garden of God.
> The Ansan-tree they ate, they broke in two,
> Its stalk they destroyed.
> The secret juice which injures the body.
> Great is their sin. Themselves they exalted.
> To Merodach their Redeemer he (the god Sar) appointed their fate."

Two other seals (Nos. 89,349 and 89,771), give representations of Tsir-napishtim, the Babylonian Noah, in an ark, being steered over the waters of the flood. In Table Case E

(No. 92,687), is a Babylonian map of the world. It shows the ocean surrounding the world, and marks the position of Babylon on the Euphrates, the mountains at the source of the river, and other details.

Near by (No. 92,668) is another interesting object, formed in the shape of a human liver, and inscribed with magical formulæ. This was used for the purpose of divination, and explains the strange words of Ezek. xxi. 21, "He consulted with teraphim, he looked into the liver."

In the same case (No. 92,693) is a Babylonian Syllabary or spelling book. This gives names, pronunciations, meanings of a number of cuneiform characters. These Syllabaries are numerous and have proved of great value in the interpretation of the cuneiform inscriptions. This particular spelling book is dated the 10th year of Artaxerxes, and takes us therefore to the days of Nehemiah. No. 46,226 is a Tablet giving the names of plants in the garden of Merodach-Baladin II., King of Babylon. Another Tablet in this Case referring to Sennacherib we leave until next time when we take notice of all that is said of that King in this Room.

#9. Sennacherib and Hezekiah.
pp. 41 - 42

II Kings xviii. 13-16.

13. Now in the fourteenth year of king Hezekiah did Sennacherib king of Assyria come up against all the fenced cities of Judah, and took them.
14. And Hezekiah king of Judah sent to the king of Assyria to Lachish, saying, I have offended; return from me: that which thou puttest on me will I bear. And the king of Assyria appointed unto Hezekiah king of Judah three hundred talents of silver and thirty talents of gold.
15. And Hezekiah gave him all the silver that was found in the house of the Lord, and in the treasures of the king's house.
16. At that time did Hezekiah cut off the gold from the doors of the temple of the Lord, and from the pillars which Hezekiah king of Judah had overlaid, and gave it to the king of Assyria.

In II Kings xviii. 13-16 we have an account of the invasion of Judah by Sennacherib, king of Assyria. Hezekiah is appointed by Sennacherib to pay 300 talents of silver, and 30 talents of gold, to pay for exemption from the siege that was threatened. In Table Case H will be found a six-sided cylinder bearing the number 91,032, which gives Sennacherib's own account of the same event. The cylinder contains a record of eight campaigns, one of them, the third, including the invasion of Palestine and the siege of Jerusalem. The inscription which deals with Hezekiah reads as follows:-

> "I then besieged HEZEKIAH OF JUDAH who had not submitted to my yoke, and I captured forty-six of his strong cities and fortresses and innumerable small cities which were round about them with the battering of rams and the assault of engines and the attack of foot soldiers, and by mines and breaches (made in the walls) . . . . . (Hezekiah) Himself, like a caged bird, I shut up within JERUSALEM HIS ROYAL CITY . . . . . The > fear of the majesty of my sovereignty overwhelmed Hezekiah and the Urbi and his trusty warriors, whom he had brought into his royal city of Jerusalem to protect it, deserted. And he despatched after me his messenger to my royal city Nineveh to pay tribute and to make submission with 30 talents of gold, 800 talents of silver, precious stones, eye paint, ivory couches and thrones, hides and tusks, precious woods, and diverse objects . . . . .”

Before proceeding a word may not be amiss relative to the different amounts of silver that Hezekiah is said to have paid. The Scripture says Hezekiah was appointed to pay 300 talents of silver, whereas Sennacherib himself says he received 800 talents. We will not occupy space by recounting the many ingenious suggestions put forward by commentators to harmonize these, apparently, conflicting accounts, for there is no discrepancy, both statements being perfectly true. Mr. Basil T. A. Everts, formerly of the Assyrian Department of The British Museum, tells us that “The Palestinian talent of silver was exactly eight-thirds of the Babylonian; the talent of gold, on the other hand, was the same in both countries.” This of course settles the question. Simple arithmetic demonstrates the perfect agreement of the two accounts.

A question has been raised as to why Sennacherib, after receiving the tribute from Hezekiah, should come “with a great host against Jerusalem.” Urquhart in The New Biblical Guide says, “The change in Sennacherib’s attitude is not formally explained in the Bible statement, and yet the Bible has all along contained the explanation. II Chron. xxxii. 5 gives us special information which puts in our hands the key to this enigma. We read there that Hezekiah > ‘built up all the wall that was broken, and raised it up to the towers, and another wall without, and repaired Millo in the city of David.’

“Hezekiah strengthened the defences of Jerusalem. This was apparently done just after the tribute was paid. . . . it was an act that looked like preparation for a fresh rebellion; and Sennacherib himself tells us that this was the cause of his assault upon Jerusalem. In another inscription, which also details the incidents of this third campaign, he says:--

> ‘As for himself, like a bird in a cage, inside Jerusalem his royal city I shut him up, FOR HE HAD GIVEN COMMAND TO RENEW THE BULWARKS OF THE GREAT GATES OF HIS CITY.”

In Table case E (No. 92,502) will be found a clay tablet inscribed in the Babylonian characters. This is a Babylonian Chronicle, and gives a list of the principle events that took place between the third year of Nabunassir, King of Babylon, and the first year of Shammash-shum-ukin. In column iii., lines 34, 35, we read:--

> “The 20th Tebet, Sennacherib was slain by his son in a revolt.”

Isaiah xxxvii. 38 records his assassination, and also mentions the names of the two sons implicated in it—Adrammelech and Sharezer. The Prophet goes on to tell us that Esarhaddon reigned in the stead of Sennacherib. Esarhaddon was not the eldest son, but was the favourite of Sennacherib, whose will, the earliest will extant, confers upon him much treasure (Records of the Past, Vol. I., page 138).

In different parts of the Museum there are many other records of Sennacherib, but these must be left until we arrive at the rooms containing them.

#10. The Moabite Stone.
pp. 72 - 75

The Moabite Stone is one of the most precious monuments in this section of the Museum, and will well repay careful examination.

The stone measures 3 feet 10 inches high, 2 feet wide and 14½ inches thick. The inscription consists of thirty-four lines of writing. This writing, both with regard to its characters and phraseology, is very much akin to Hebrew. Professor Sayce says:--

> "The language of the inscription is noteworthy. Between it and Hebrew the difference are few and slight. It is a proof that the Maobites were akin to the Israelites in language as well as in race. The monument was raised by Mesha, king of Moab, and records the deliverance of his land and people from the dominion of Israel."

The second book of Kings opens with the words:--

> "Then Moab rebelled against Israel after the death of Ahab."

This brief statement is expanded in chapter iii. At verse 4 commences a more detailed account of the rebellion:--

> "And Mesha, king of Moab, was a sheepmaster, and rendered unto the king of Israel an hundred thousand lambs, and an hundred thousand rams, with the wool. And it came to pass, when Ahab was dead, that the king of Moab rebelled against the king of Israel."

The record goes on to describe the combination of the three kings of Israel, Judah and Edom, and the defeat of the Moabites:--

> "Then he (Mesha) took his eldest son, that should have reigned in his stead and offered him for a burnt offering upon the wall. And there was great indignation against Israel: and they departed from him, and returned to their own land" (verse 27).

There is a problem in the reference to the "great indignation" which we do not undertake to solve here, our point being rather its bearing upon the Moabite Stone. The record of Mesha declares plainly that he had experienced some signal deliverance, and seeing that it followed upon the sacrifice of his first-born, what so natural as to infer that it was the hand of his god Chemosh put forth for his salvation.

EBENEZER.—None can help being interested in the fact that here we have a literal Ebenezer, or "A Stone of Help." Professor Sayce translates line three:--

"And I erected this stone to Chemosh at Kirtsha, a (stone of) salvation."

Here then is king Mesha's Ebenezer reared in gratitude to his god Chemosh. Does Mesha's action rebuke our lack of gratitude?

JEHOVAH.—The name of the God of Israel is engraven on this stone and presents the most ancient written example of the Hebrew word Jehovah yet discovered. The sacred name is spelt exactly the same as it is found in the Hebrew Old Testament. The higher criticism finds the spade of the excavator a remarkably powerful opponent.

MOAB.—The origin of Moab is recorded in Gen. xix. 37, and has been treated, like much else in that book, by so called Higher Criticism as a "myth." The Moabite Stone testifies to the fact that the Moabites spoke the same language and wrote with the same characters.

The whole record reads like a chapter from the Old Testament, and "the language of Moab differed less from that of the Israelites than does one English dialect from another."

TRANSLATION.—There have been some who, in their attacks upon the inspired Word, have said that the Hebrew was originally written without any break between the words, and therefore we are not certain that the division that is now accepted is true. We know that the Greek originals had no separation between the words, and this has never been a problem, except to the unlearned. The Moabite Stone, however, disposes of this weak attack, for it contains a careful system of pointing. Each word is separated by a dot, and each sentence by upright lines, as follows:--

I.MESHA.SON.OF.CHEMOSH-MELECH.KING.OF.MOAB.THE.DIBONITE |
MY.FATHER.REIGNED.OVER.MOAB.THIRTY.YEARS.AND.I.REIGNED.A
FTER.MY.FATHER | etc.

Israel, speaking a similar tongue and using a similar writing, would not be ignorant of this system, nor fail to avail themselves of it, if indeed Moab did not take it with his language from Israel.

IDOLATRY.—Chemosh is referred to as the God of Moab, but Ashtor-Chemosh and Moloch also are mentioned. Seven thousand men, women and female slaves were killed or devoted to Ashtor-Chemosh.

"The Arels (lion-like men?) were torn before Chemosh."

These words indicate the condition of the people who were closely akin to Israel, and whose ways were continually having their dire effect upon them.

HISTORY.—Omri is spoken of as being king of Israel, and in his days Moab was oppressed.

"Omri took the land of Medeba and (Israel) dwelt in it during his days and half the days of his son, altogether forty years."

That we are dealing with history the following will prove:--

Omri reigned	12 years
Ahab	22
Ahaziah	2
Joram (half 12 years)	6
	---
	42 years

The odd two years present no difficulty, for we are not told that Omri commenced his oposition of Moab immediately he ascended his throne.

These few items must suffice to demonstrate the value of this Stone of Help, the heathen Ebenezer, preserved by the God of the whole earth to bear witness to the truth in His own times.

#11. The Code of Khammurabi.
pp. 102 - 105

Near to the entrance to the fourth Egyptian Room* stands a tall black stone pillar engraved with cuneiform letters.

This is the famous code of laws inscribed by order of Khammurabi. The stone is of great antiquity, possible the oldest monument in this Assyrian Room, for it dates back to the days of Abraham. Some of us may remember the words of Wellhausen concerning Abraham, viz.:--

"We may not regard him as a historical person; he might with more likelihood be regarded as a free creation of unconscious art"!

Since these words of so called criticism were penned, God has brought to light many wonderful witnesses to the historical accuracy of the Bible. Cherdorlaomer becomes a living person, the dominance of Elam, as given in Gen. xiv., but denied by critics, proves to be an established fact; Arioch, King of Ellasar, is found in the inscription as Eri Aku, King of Larsa. Tidal (Tid-gal in the Hebrew, and Tud-Khula, or Tud-Ghula, in the inscriptions) has also been found. Amraphel has been identified with the name Ammurabi-ilu, "Khammurabi the god," the Amraphel of Gen. xiv. being the Khammurabi of the stone pillar we are now considering.

[NOTE: * - The British Museum is temporarily closed. Already there is some re-arrangements in progress and therefore the position of many of these antiquities will have to be verified.]

We are not endeavouring to prove anything directly connected with Abraham, but the link with Amraphel is noteworthy, as also the clear light of the Scripture on these ancient times. In Gen. x. 25 we are told that "unto Eber were born two sons; the name of one was Peleg . . . . . his brother's name was Joktan," and from Joktan came the various tribes of Arabia. Peleg's descendants remained nearer their ancestral home, and when Abram was born are found in the Babylonian city Ur. Documents written in the days of Abraham, and in the land in which he lived, have brought to light his very name! In the Assyrian Eponym Canon we find the name Abu-ramu, or Abram, a name of one of the inhabitants of Abraham's land in Abraham's day.

The ancient records of Arabia, moreover, make it plain that Khammurabi was from that same region, and that his language is closely allied with the Hebrew. Professor Sayce says that Khammurabi, like the rest of his dynasty, is not Babylonian, but South Arabian. The words of which they are compounded, and the divine names which they contain, do not belong to the Babylonian and Assyrian language, and there is cuneiform tablet in which they are given with their Assyrian translation. We may be able to deal more fully with this line of things when considering various passages of Scripture in the light of Archaeology. We pass on to consider the Code of Khammurabi itself.

The existence of this stone, with its codified laws eight hundred years before Moses, disposes of the fiction which we sometimes still hear that it was not possible in the time of Moses for a stone to be engraved with laws as is definitely set forth in Exodus.

> "These laws of Khammurabi governed the peoples from the Persian Gulf to the Caspian Sea, and from Persia to the Mediterranean, and were in force throughout Canaan." (Companion Bible, Appendix No. 15).

This same appendix tabulates nine of the laws of Khammurabi operating in Genesis. We give a condensed summary for the sake of any who may not possess a copy of this invaluable work.

1. The law of Adoption. Gen. xv. Code 191.
2. The giving of Hagar to Abraham. Gen. xvi. Code 146.
3. Commercial enactments. Gen. xxiii. Code 146.
4. Taking of life of stealing. Gen. xxxi. 32. Code 6.
5. Taking of life by burning. Gen. xxxviii. 24. Code 110.
6. Death for theft from palace. Gen. xliv. 9. Code 6.
7. Special portion to favourite son. Gen. xlviii. 22. Code 165.
8. Reuben's punishment. Gen. xlix. 4. Code 158.
9. Inability of Abram to sell Hagar. Gen. xvi. 6. Code 119.

The laws of Khammurabi include other interesting items. If a surgeon kills a patient he must lose both his hands. If a house falls and kills anyone, the jerry-builder must be put to death. If a wife be not economical, but is a goer-about, she must be thrown in the river!

Some of the penalties it will be seen are rather drastic. Where stealing is punished under the law of Moses by having to restore double, Khammurabi's Code condemns the thief to death. Some of the laws savour of the acceptance of man's person. For injuring a slave the law of God gave the slave his freedom, but Khammurabi's Code compensated the master. A rich or a poor man being injured, the law of Moses penalized the offence by inflicting identical injury. Khammurabi's Code differentiates between rich and poor. The rich man's injury is punished as under the law of Moses, but the poor man's is expiated by paying a fine of one mina of silver.

We do not expect to find "statutes and judgments so righteous as all this law" that was given to Israel (Deut. iv. 8) in the Code of Khammurabi. The fact of a code of laws at all, their witness to a high state of civilization, their reflection in the very customs recorded in Genesis make this monument of great value. As we get nearer to the belonging, so we find traces of a knowledge of God becoming more distinct. Romans i. distinctly declares that the nations had a knowledge of God, but perverted it and were given up by God. Many of the problems that have arisen in connection with some of the laws of Moses would be easily solved did we know more of the times and customs prevailing. For example. To us, from the light of subsequent revelation, "an eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth" seems very lacking in mercy, and yet when we remember that the custom of blood feud meant that for an eye, a life, or possible many lives would be sacrificed, the strict equity of the Mosaic law becomes tinged also with mercy and grace. The Bible student we feel sure cannot look upon this venerable witness of Abraham's day without a very real interest.

#12. The Tell-el-Amarna Tablets.
pp. 140 - 142

In Table Case F of the Babylonian and Assyrian Room is found a very precious collection of tablets discovered at Tell-el-Amarna in Egypt in 1887. Tell-el-Amarna is the Arabic name of a village built near the ruins of a town, temple, and palace built by Khu-en-Aten or Amenophis IV. These tablets differ in shape from any other cuneiform tablets yet discovered, and the clay of which they were made differs according to the country from which they were sent. No. 1 is of finely kneaded Nile mud; Nos. 8-11 of Syrian clay; Nos. 13, 18, 19, 20, and 24 are of the yellow clay of the Syrian coast. Nos. 10 and 11 are dockets written in Egyptian, recording the date of their arrival. No. 4 is tamped with an Egyptian Scarab; No. 58 with a Babylonian cylinder seal like those already noticed. Archaeology places the date of these latter between B.C. 1500 and 1450, the period of the exodus and the entry into the land of Canaan.

The tablets contain letters written between the kings of Egypt and the kings and governors of cities and districts in Palestine. They are, next to the record in the early books of the Bible, the most complete guide to understanding the character of the times in Canaan about the time of exodus. Enemies of the truth had declared that the stories of the books of Moses and the Judges were largely mythical, and that the geography and chronology of these stories must not be taken seriously. They had further expended a deal of time and energy in showing that the names of God, El and Jehovah, were evidences of two distinct ideas that were pieced together long afterwards. A peasant woman's foot upturning one of these tablets dispelled with one touch the myths of the critics, and brought to light the Palestine of the Bible narrative, exactly in line with its teaching. That the Egyptian kings should have so much correspondence with Syria and Canaan shows how close the connection was in those days.

The tablets may be divided into three groups. (1). The period of Egyptian supremacy. (2). Those that exhibit Egyptian decline. (The loss of city after city is reported). (3). Those which deal with southern Palestine and Jerusalem. In these tablets such familiar names as Gaza, Tyre, Aijalon, Megiddo, Lachish, Ashkelon, Carmel and Ura-Salem (Jerusalem) appear. Further, the Biblical name, "The land of Canaan" is found written as the name of the land at that very period. In these tablets it is called Mat Kinahi or Mat Kinanhi, "the country of Canaan." The letters deal with diplomatic business, marriage alliances, and affairs of government. Revolts and sieges are numerous. Piteous letters imploring the military assistance of the Pharaohs are many. The cities are all found in the tablets independent of each other just exactly as we find them in the book of Joshua.

The people of Israel seem to be mentioned under the name of the Habiri. One letter to Amenophis III says, "Since thy father returned to Sidon, since that time the lands have fallen into the hands of the Habiri." Within 30 years of crossing the Jordan, we find the Hebrews in possession of the fertile lands of the Canaanites. Further, the prince of Khazi writes to say that the Hebrews had taken cities and burnt them. From such regions as Gilead, Shechem, and Mount Ephraim no letters come, indicating that the Hebrews were in possession. Abakiba, king of Jerusalem, endures great fear and trouble regarding the Hebrews. "Let troops be sent (he says) for the king has no longer any territory, the Khabiri (Hebrews) have wasted all." A postscript added to a letter of this same king tells its own story, "To the suite of my lord the king, Abd Khiba, your servant. Bring aloud before my lord the king the words, "The whole territory of my lord the king is going into ruins." In another letter he says, "If no troops are sent the land will belong to the Khabiri."

The wide distribution of the Hebrews is a noticeable feature. Not only Jerusalem, as cited above, but Itakama says that Namyawaza "has delivered all the cities in the land of Gidshi, and in Ubi (Damascus region) to the Khabiri." The whole of North Palestine and Galilee is involved. A prince named Shubandu writes, "The Khabiri are strong." Another writes, "The governors are destroyed, all the land falls away to the Khabiri." We will not multiply quotations. From the land of Mitsri (Egypt) to North Palestine the terror of the name of the Hebrews was spreading. Further, it is remarkable that in all the list of governors and kings referred to, never once is a king of the Hebrew mentioned. Again, in spite of all the false criticism to the contrary, the Hebrews are found to be against idolatry. Ribaddi, governor of Northern Phoenicia, says, "The hostility of the Hebrews waxes mighty against the land, and against the gods."

Both names of God, El and Jehovah, occur in these tablets; both names being in use therefore before the time of Moses.

Thothmes III mentions a town called Bet Jah, "The House of Jehovah." In other inscriptions he speaks of places named Jacob-el and Joseph-el!

The link between Assyria and Egypt established by these letters explains the words of Isa. lii. 4: "My people went down to Egypt to sojourn there; and the Assyrian oppressed them without cause."

To set out the details of the tablets further would be tedious and unnecessary. We are grateful for their testimony which shows to the world at large the chronological and geographical faithfulness of the O. T. records.

#13. The Fourth Egyptian Room.
pp. 188 - 190

The Tell-el-Amarna Tablets noticed in our last paper linked the Assyrian and Babylonian language with Egypt, and so render the transition to the Egyptian rooms the easier.

Wall Case 175, which is on the left immediately we enter the room, contains a number of typical sun-dried bricks. It has been said that the art of brick-making was introduced into Egypt from the Southern Babylonia, where the clay is eminently suitable for the purpose. The Nile mud was not so suitable, and it was found necessary to mix chopped straw, reed, hair, etc., with the mud in order to bind it together. The pieces of straw can be clearly seen in many of these specimens—straw chopped at the period when Israel was in Egypt, if not actually the work of their hands, and still retaining after these millenniums a yellow tinge.

No. 14 is of interest inasmuch as it is stamped with the name of Rameses II., the Pharaoh of the oppression. We shall have better opportunity of considering the various Pharaohs when we are reviewing the exhibits in the Egyptian Galleries. In Wall Cases 182-187 we find a large collection of toilet objects; razors, mirrors, combs, tweezers, hair pins, tubes for eye paint, and handles of fans, making a vivid impression on the mind of the close parallel that must have existed in the home life of these ancient folk and that of our own times. A reference to "shaving" it will be remembered comes in Gen. xli. 14; this is perfectly in accord with the times. Joseph as a Hebrew would have a beard, especially as he was in prison. No Egyptian was allowed to have a beard except the Pharaoh, or his Queen. There were always false beards, fastened to the chin by a band running up over the head. This is plainly seen on many of the heads of the statues in the Museum.

The eye paint is referred to by Ezekiel (xxiii. 40), and the mirrors which the women of Israel brought out of Egypt, with which the brazen laver was made, must have been identical with those contained in this collection. In many cases the eye paint is contained in four tubes. No. 43 is a good specimen, the tubes being inscribed with the signs for life, good luck, stability, and the owner's name. In No. 46 we have four tubes to contain eye-paint for different seasons of the year, one for spring, one for summer, one for the inundation, and one for every day. The combs look quite up to date. Some are ornamented with animal forms on the back, some have teeth in two sizes. The razor marked 68 may have shaved the royal chin of the original of the great head and arm in the Gallery below, for it is inscribed with the prenomen of Thothmes III. On the shelf below are to be seen pieces of the colours used for painting the papyri, together with mullers and slabs for grinding them.

Standard Case C contains some objects of interest. On the second shelf will be seen a series of children's toys and dolls. Some of the dolls are round, some are flat. Some have strings of mud beads to represent hair. One toy which ought to be noticed is a model of a cat or other animal, having a movable jaw to which a string is attached. When we learn that these were the toys of the period that the sons of Israel went down in Egypt, can we believe that they would not bring back some such souvenir of their visit to the foreign land? One can legitimately imagine some of Jacob's grandchildren receiving a flat doll or a toy animal that moved its mouth, as shown in this collection. There are also balls made of porcelain, papyrus, and leather, stuffed with chopped straw, etc. Several draught boards and sets of draughtsmen are also shown. On the floor of the case is a model of a granary, taken from a tomb of the seventh dynasty. Here we may see something that will enable us to imagine how Joseph stored the wheat during the seven years of plenty. The grain is poured into small holes at the top of the bin, of which there are seven in this model.

In Table Case J may be seen a collection of rings. No. 198 belonged to Thothmes III who reigned between the end of Genesis and beginning of Exodus. No. 390 is a silver ring of Amen-hetep IV., the last of the line before the rise of the "new King who knew not Joseph." We can easily imagine therefore what the ring looked like that was given to Joseph by Pharaoh.

In Standard Case L is a large wooden toilet box which belonged to the wife of the scribe Ani, whose work we shall consider presently. The box contains a terra cotta vase and two alabaster vases containing ointments, a piece of pumice stone, eye paint, a medicinal paste to be used when the air is filled with sand, an ivory comb, a bronze "shell," a pair of gazelle skin sandals with turned up toes, tanned pink, and three cushions for the elbows. As a final evidence that "there is nothing new under the sun," Wall Case 150 contains a "boomerang" inscribed with the name of Amen-hetep IV.

The wonderful collection of articles in this room present to us evidence of the highly developed life, social and domestic habits, and doings of this ancient people. As we go back in history we find these traces of "civilization," we never find a nation's history emerging from savagery, although that is often its end. While some still cling to the idea that man is evolving upward, archaeology shows that man has fallen. (Considerable re-arrangement of exhibits has been made since this article was written-BE.XXVI.264).

The Hope and the Prize.

#1. Phil. i. 21-25.
What is the right interpretation?*
pp. 120 - 127

[NOTE: * - We would particularly draw attention to the fact that the interpretation given in this article was formulated by the writer early in 1914. The present article has been held over for a convenient opportunity, and its appearance now must not be connected with any modern contribution to the subject.]

"For to me to live is Christ, and to die is gain. But if I live in the flesh this is the fruit of my labour: yet what I shall choose I wot not.

For I am in a strait betwixt two, having a desire to depart, and to be with Christ; which is far better.

Nevertheless to abide in the flesh is more needful for you.

And having this confidence I know that I shall abide and continue with you all for your furtherance and joy of faith" (A.V.).

The passage of Scripture quoted above has been interpreted in a variety of ways, the original being confessedly difficult to fully express. Most interpretations can be placed under one of two heads. The one given by those whose orthodox views led them to this passage as a proof text to show that "we may infer that he had no knowledge nor expectation of a middle state of insensibility between death and the resurrection" (Dr. Macknight). In other words, that upon the death of the believer he is at once taken to be "with Christ" apart from resurrection. The other group of interpretations are put forward by those who do not believe that "sudden death is sudden glory," but who believe that the scriptural term "sleep" aptly describes the state between death and resurrection, and that there is no "hope" of being "with Christ" until the resurrection takes place.

The crux of the controversy is the meaning of the word translated "depart," the orthodox seeing in it the death of Paul, the other interpreters the return of the Lord.

In this article we are going to approach the passage from neither standpoint. We believe that such methods of interpretation are (unconsciously, no doubt) biased. The second set of interpreters which look upon "depart" as meaning the second coming of the Lord were inspired not so much by an independent examination of the passage, but by an endeavour to prove the other school of teaching to be wrong. Words have been mistranslated, renderings have been adopted which under other circumstances would have been very much questioned, and parallels have been ignored. In ordinary reasoning all inferences which reach beyond their data are purely hypothetical, and proceed on the assumption that new events will conform to the conditions detected in our observations of past events. Even supposing the Universe as a whole to proceed unchanged, we do not really know the Universe as a whole." Students of Scripture will readily admit that what is true of our limited knowledge of the works of God, is equally true of our knowledge of the Word of God. To limit ourselves by the alternatives, that (1) either believers when they die go straight to be with Christ, or (2) they fall asleep and are unconscious until the resurrection, is to assume that we have such a complete knowledge, that there is no possibility of a third or a fourth position if, in the course of revelation, it should be made known.

Let us come to Phil. i. 21-25, and seek out its meaning, regardless of what the result may be. God is responsible for what is written, and if we dare to turn His words to fit our theories, however scriptural those theories may be, we call in question the wisdom of His inspiration and shut the door upon the possibility of further and fuller understanding. Let us first set out the structural disposition of the passage.

Phil. i. 21-26.

A | 21. To me (emoi) to live. Christ.
B | 22, 23. a | Live in flesh. Fruit.
b | Paul's desire. Not made known.
c | Paul's desire. With Christ.
B | 24, 25. a | Abide in flesh. Needful.
b | Paul's confidence. I know.
c | Paul's continuance. With you all.
A | 26. By me (emoi) my presence. Glorying in Christ.

A strong argument has been made out of the fact that we read that the Apostle in one breath tells us that he did not know what to choose between life and death, and yet that he had a strong desire for something which was far better. Now if the Apostle did say this, then it seems reasonable to conclude that he was pressed out of the two by a third, namely, the return of the Lord, which is admittedly so much better than either living or dying. Two fallacies are here which demand immediate exposure. The first is an error of reasoning, the second of interpretation.

It is assumed that what Paul chose, and what Paul desired, would be the same. If Paul had been an average selfish person, this reasoning might be good, but the context clearly condemns the inference. The whole of the chapter shows us a man who has risen above all selfish motives. His bonds have fallen out to the furtherance of the gospel, he rejoices that Christ is preached, even though some who preach Him seek to add to the Apostle's sufferings. His magnificent "what then" is a rebuke to the narrow-minded inference that he would necessarily choose what he most desired. To Paul, to live was summed up by the one word – Christ, and to die by the one word – gain. " 'Christ' shall be magnified in my body, whether by life or by death." The context, therefore, together with the statement, "For I have no one of equal soul (with myself), for all seek their own," denies the inference. Christ (ii. 21) and His people (i. 24) come first, and even though Paul's desire may lead in one direction, there is every probability that he would choose that which ran counter to his desire, if by so doing he could the better serve his Lord, or bless His people.

The second fallacy is the wrong interpretation of a word. Much emphasis has been laid upon the statement that Paul says he did not know what to choose, and yet he did have a very pronounced desire for something very far better.

Is this true? The A.V. and the R.V. seem to say it is, but the R.V. margin exposes the error.

The word rendered here "I wot," or "I know," is gnorizõ. Out of the twenty-four occurrences of the word, Paul uses it eighteen times, and out of that eighteen eleven occur in the three prison epistles (Ephesians, Philippians, and Colossians). We will not quote all occurrences, but give the whole of the references in these epistles, the only other occurrence in Philippians being shown first:--

Phil. iv. 6. "Let your requests be made known unto God."
Eph. i. 9. "Having made known unto us the mystery of His will."
Eph. iii. 3. "By revelation He made known unto me the mystery."
Eph. iii. 5. "Which in other ages was not made known unto the sons of men."
Eph. iii. 10. "Unto principalities . . . . . might be made known through the Church" (R.V.). "Might be known by" (A.V.) of course means the same.
Eph. vi. 19. "That I may open my mouth boldly to make known the mystery."
Eph. vi. 21. "Tychicus . . . . . shall make known to you all things."
Col. i. 27. "To whom God would make known what is the riches."
Col. iv. 7. "All my state shall Tychicus declare unto you."
Col. iv. 9. "They shall make known unto you all things."

The word is rendered "to make known" sixteen times in A.V., "certify" once, "declare" four times, "do to wit" once, "give to understand" once, and "wot" once. The last case is the passage in question; all others without exception can have but one meaning—"to make known, tell or declare." The fallacy that Paul did not know what to choose is therefore exposed by a consideration not only of his own usage, but of the usage of the word in the whole of the N.T. It is evident that he did know what he would choose, otherwise, to say "I do not tell" would be the empty equivocation of a braggart, who covered his ignorance by assuming knowledge. Under the word "Wot" in Dr. Bullinger's Critical Lexicon and Concordance is written, "gnorizõ, to make known: declare, reveal."

Following on the idea that Paul did not know what to choose, we are told that he "was pressed out of the two, by reason of a third." Here again we must drop all theories, and take the facts of Scripture as they stand. The word, "I am in a strait," means to press together, to hold, to constrain. The A.V. renders the word as follows, "constrain" once, "keep in" once, "press" once, "stop" once, "throng" once, "man that holdeth" once, "be taken with" three times, "lie sick of" once. Again the Concordance proves a stubborn thing—quite impartial and unmoved by the most desirable of theories. Dr. Bullinger's Critical Lexicon and Concordance says of sunechõ, "constrain to hold, or keep together, confine, secure, hence constrain, hold fast." Let us observe the usage:--

Luke xxii. 63. "The men that held Jesus, mocked Him."
Luke viii. 45. "The multitude throng thee and press thee."
Luke xix. 43. "And keep thee in on every side."
Acts vii. 57. "And stopped their ears."
II Cor. v. 14. "For the love of God constraineth us" (i.e. shuts us in to the one course indicated in verses 13 and 15).

Luke xii. 50. "But I have a baptism to be baptised with, and how am I straitened till it be accomplished." (Until the Lord was crucified and raised again from the dead, He was "straitened," "confined," His ministry was confined to Israel, He said "Tell no man until after the resurrection).

Every passage demands the plain meaning "to hold fast," "to keep in," "to stop."

Following the words, "I am in a strait," the A.V. reads "betwixt two." The word betwixt is the rendering of the preposition ek. If betwixt does not accord with the meaning of ek, to have rendered sunechomai ek "to press out," certainly conflicts with the constant meaning "to keep in," "to throng," "to hold fast." It is easy to demonstrate how false or meaningless the translation "betwixt" may become in some passages—that however does not settle the meaning of Phil. i. 23; it only settles the meaning in a negative way for those particular passages. John iii. 25 says, "there arose a question between (ek) some of John's disciples and the Jews." Now while this is the only passage where ek is translated "between" in the A.V. and while it would be easy to show how absurd is such a rendering as "the resurrection between the dead," or to say how could we be "absent between the body?" yet that would only prove that ek was capable of bearing more than one meaning, and would by no means prove that "between" did not convey the sense of the original of John iii. 25.

The average reader who may have been led to think that "out of" is the only unquestioned rendering of ek, may feel a trifle surprised to hear that while in the great majority of cases "out of" is the best rendering, that it also is rendered "by means of" once, "through" twice, "with" twenty-five times, "by" fifty-five times, "by reason of" three times, "because of" three times, or eighty-nine times in all.

Take the rendering "with."

Matt. xxvii. 7. "They brought with them the potter's field."
Mark xii. 30. "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind, and with all thy strength."
John iv. 6. "Wearied with His journey."
John xii. 3. "Filled with the odour."
Rev. xvii. 2-6. "Drunk with the wine . . . . . with the blood o the saints."

It would be quite easy to insert "with" in some passages where it would be absurd, but that would not prove the above passages to be wrongly translated. Again, look at the passages where ek is rendered "by."

Matt. xii. 33. "The tree is known by his fruit."
Matt. xii. 37. "By thy words thou shalt be justified."
Acts xix. 25. "By this craft."
Rom. ii. 27. "Uncircumcision which is by nature."
Titus iii. 5. "Not by works of righteousness."
I John iii. 24. "By the Spirit."
Rev. ix. 18. "By the fire . . . . . which issueth out of their mouths." (Here in Rev. ix. 18 ek is rendered "by" and "out of" in the one verse).

Rev. viii. 13 renders ek, "by reason of." One could not very well translate "woe to the inhabitants of the earth out of the other voices," unless we intended by "out of" origin, cause, or occasion. Again in Rev. ix. 2 and xviii. 19 it is rendered "by reason of."

To translate ek "out of" in II Cor. i. 11 would be manifestly unscriptural, for the gift of the Apostle Paul was "by means of," not "out of," many persons. In Rev. xvi. 11 we read, "and blasphemed the God of heaven because of their pains and because of their sores." "Out of" as meaning place would be untrue, "out of" as meaning origin or cause would be true and is better expressed in English by "because of." To translate ek in Phil. i. 23 "out of" is only possible if we mean origin or cause. To use "out of" as meaning place is contrary to the meaning of the word rendered "press," which everywhere demands the idea, to hold fast, to keep in, to constrain.

The A.V. rendering "betwixt" is perhaps a little free but conveys the meaning of the passage (Dr. Bullinger's Lexicon gives "literally, constrained by"), whereas "out of" while literally and etymologically true would be in reality false. "By reason of" is the most suitable rendering. J. N. Darby's rendering, "I am pressed by both," is true to the meaning, although rather free in the use of the word "both." Paul was held in some suspense "by reason of the two." He was not pressed out of the two into some hypothetical "third"—that is an invention. He immediately places before us "the two" and his double feelings can be easily understood.

For I am held in constraint by reason of the two (here follows "the two," thus) (1) "Having a desire to depart and to be with Christ, which is very far better," but (2) "to remain in the flesh is more necessary for you."

Here the Apostle presents the alternatives which were before him. Something "very far better" for himself is contrasted by something "more necessary for others." "Departing" is balanced by "remaining in the flesh." His "desire" to depart is outweighed by the remaining "for you."

The choice which he did not tell is fairly manifest. At least, if we dispute the point as to whether he really did choose the harder path, he certainly does tell us that he knew he would remain, and seems to be joyful at the prospect of thus "spending and being spent."

We must now examine the word "depart." The original word is analuõ, which is thus defined in Dr. Bullinger's Critical Lexicon and Concordance:--

> "Analuõ, To loosen again, set free; then, to loosen, dissolve or resolve, as matter into its elements (hence, Eng. Analysis); then, to unfasten as the fastening of a ship, and thus prepare for departure (and with the force of ana, back) to return."

Schrevelius' Lexicon thus defines the word:--

> "Analuõ, To unloose, free, release, relax, untie, undo; dissolve, destroy, abolish; solve, explain, analyse; weigh, anchor, depart, die; return from a feast."

As the word occurs in but two passages in the N.T., and is rendered once "return" and once "depart," it will be seen that it would be just as logical to say that the rendering of the first passage should conform to the second, as vice versa. Phil. i. 23 renders analuõ "depart," Luke xii. 26 "return." Those who advocate the teaching that analuõ means "the return of the Lord" in Phil. i. 23 turn to Luke xii. 36 to support their argument. It is not established beyond all controversy that "return" is the true meaning of Luke xii. 36. J.N.D. renders the passage, "whenever He may leave the wedding." Rotherham gives the somewhat strange rendering "he may break up out of the marriage feast." This somewhat strange rendering will not be so strange to some who are acquainted with the schoolboy's idea of "breaking up" for the holidays. Here lies the secret of the various renderings. There is no doubt whatever that analuõ means exactly the same as our English derived word "analyse"—to break up into its elements. The secondary meaning "to return" is somewhat parallel to the schoolboy's "break up." It came to have this meaning from the way it was used for loosing the cables of ships, in order to sail from a port (see Odyss ix. 178, xi. 636, xii. 145, xv. 547).

Luke xii. 36 speaks of the "coming" of the Lord as something subsequent to the "returning." It is perfectly true that they will not open the door when He departs from the wedding, but when He arrives. Scripture clearly differentiates between the "departing" or "returning" from the feast, and the subsequent "coming" and "knocking." So far as light upon Phil. i. 23 is concerned, Luke xii. 36 gives no warrant for departing from the elementary meaning of analuõ. The references in the LXX are equally indecisive. Sometimes the passage speaks of "returning," as Luke xii. 36, once the pure meaning "resolve into its elements" as melting ice.

#1. (Concluded from page 127).

pp. 137 - 140

Let the reader pause for a moment and ask whether a word which primarily means to "resolve a thing into its elements," and so return to its original state, is a fitting word to use for the Second Coming of the Lord Jesus Christ. In what way will it be an "analysis?" In what way will it be "a return," in the sense of analysis?" Surely there must be indubitable evidence for such a rendering before it can be accepted, and that evidence is not only not found, but is practically denied by the context of Phil. i. 23 when truly presented, and by the larger context of II Timothy to which we now turn.

It would add considerable weight to our argument if we were to show the close parallel that exists between Philippians and II Timothy, an aspect of truth which we hope to point out in a subsequent number. Two passages only will suffice at present.

In Phil. i. 23 we read that the Apostle desired analuõ, and in Phil. ii. 17 that even should his ministry involve his being poured out as a drink offering (spendomai) he would rejoice. In II Timothy iv. 6 the Apostle says, "I am already being poured out as a drink offering (spendomai), and the season for my departure (analusis) has come near." Here the Apostle uses the substantive instead of the verbal form, but the parallel is most evident. That which he desired and was willing for in Philippians has come to pass in II Tim. iv. There is no possible chance of missing the meaning of analusis. "My analusis" must mean "my dissolution," my departure, my return. Phil. i. 23 must be interpreted in the light of the certainty of II Tim. iv. 6. The only return that analusis can indicate is death. This also is the meaning of analuõ in Phil. i. 23. If there is a difficulty in the linking together of death and of being with Christ, without any explanatory clause to bridge the intervening period, it is not the only one of its kind, and must not influence our decision. II Cor. v. 8 brings the two together without feeling the necessity for a parenthetical explanation. If any should say, Is it possible that Paul would desire to die? they could also ask, Is it possible for him to be willing to be absent from the body? for although "and to be present with the Lord" (or to be with Christ) immediately follows, Paul himself had taught that it was not until raised from the dead that any could hope to be "with the Lord." In Phil. i. the Apostle is speaking of his own feelings to those who knew well his doctrine and hope. Under such circumstances he expresses himself in a far different manner from the way he would if he were stating formal truth. To have made a digression and explained his belief regarding the state of the dead and any special feature of his own hope since the revelation of the mystery, while it would have been doctrinally true, would have been false to feeling.

One other mistaken view has helped to lend colour to the interpretation that Paul desired the "return of the Lord," and that is, that Paul's hope at that time could be thus expressed. We believe that Paul, entertaining the hope connected with the mystery, was not looking for the Lord to return, but for himself and fellow-members to be "made manifest with Him in glory," "looking for that blessed hope, and the manifesting of the glory of our great God and Saviour Jesus Christ."

The A.V. is certainly not inspired, neither is it perfect, and many many times we feel how much truth has been hidden or distorted, but we feel that in this particular case, with the one correction already suggested relative to the words "I wot not," that it is a good rendering. If the R.V. margin be noted, "I do not make known," then all the rest can remain as giving at least the sense of the original. "The pressing out of the two into a third"; the rendering of a word which means return in the sense of the returning of a body to its elements (the scriptural idea of death) as though it could fitly be used of the "return" of the Lord are figments, merely the zeal of those who, while holding the general truth regarding the intermediate state, have intruded this truth into a passage which does not require it.

There are several words which the Apostle uses when speaking of the coming of the Lord; there is parousia, meaning personal presence, epiphania, a manifestation, apokalupsis, a revelation, but there is no passage where the Lord is said to have an analysis, a "return." Had such an expression been common to the epistles, some excuse may have been found for reading it in Phil. i. 23, whereas the reading itself is isolated and unsupported by any other scripture. Luke xix. 12 is the only passage that can be brought forward, and this is of itself enough to condemn the application to Phil. i. 23, for the context speaks of going away to receive a kingdom and to return, whereas the Apostle's hopes were not connected with any kingdom to which the Lord could return, but with a position where the Lord then was and still is - at the right hand of God "in glory."

There is need for us to "know what is the hope of His calling"; when we know that we shall cease from speaking of the Lord's return, and think more of "things above" where we shall be "manifested with Him in glory."

We would call attention in closing to the structure of the passage already given (page 122). Notice how "living in the flesh" is balanced by "abiding in the flesh," the "fruit of my labour" being connected with the need of the Philippians. Notice Paul's desire "to be with Christ" and compare it with what he actually experienced "to be with you all."

> "For to me the living (is) Christ and the dying (is) gain. But if the living in the flesh (is Christ) this to me is fruit of (my) work, and what I shall choose I do not make known. But (i.e. instead of making known) I am held in constraint (colloquially 'I am in a fix,' more refined as A.V. 'I am in a strait') by reason of the two,
> (1) Having a strong desire to the return (dissolution, departure, death), and to be with Christ, for it were far better, but
> (2) The abiding in the flesh is more needful for you, and having this confidence, I perceive that I shall abide and continue beside you all for your progress and joy of faith. "

The question as to what the Apostle really had before him which was "far better" still remains a matter for earnest enquiry. We believe that we shall be able to show that it is directly connected with the "out-resurrection" and "prize" of Phil. iii.

The Spirit of the Pioneer.
With special reference to "The Hope and the Prize."
pp. 142 - 143

Pioneers in the long neglected teaching concerning the dispensation of the mystery would not be human did they not at times err. The Berean Expositor values the labours and reveres the memory of devoted pioneers in dispensational truth too much to stereotype their mistakes or assume their infallibility. We catch their spirit, and perpetuate their true labours the most when we refuse all attempts on the part of any to bind the Word of God by the traditions of the most saintly men. We know how they, many times over, did acknowledge that with increased light some of their own teachings were shown to be erroneous, and we seek the same grace to repudiate error whether found in our own writings or in theirs.

#2. The Three Spheres Considered.
pp. 173 - 175

Before we can deal with the distinctive hope that is held by the One Body, it will be necessary to point out that the future destinies of mankind fall within three spheres.

THERE IS THE EARTHLY.—Israel as a nation must occupy the chief place among the nations of the earth, fulfilling the unconditional covenants made by God with the fathers. This covenant of God relative to Israel's future position as a great nation is entirely removed from any condition of faith on their part. The very ones who were "enemies" because of the gospel were "beloved" because of the fathers, "for the gifts and calling of God are without repentance."

THERE IS THE HEAVENLY.—This sphere is connected with faith. Abel, Enoch, Noah, Abraham, and all the attested ones of Heb. xi., believed God and walked by faith. These, of whom Abraham is the example, looked for a heavenly country and a heavenly city. They did not enter it at death, and the same hope was carried over into the times of the New Testament and was entertained by those who believed the gospel. These had visions of the New Jerusalem, the Holy City, these expected to meet the Lord in the air, for these the Lord Jesus said he was going to prepare a place.

THERE IS THE SUPER-CELESTIAL.—At the revelation of the dispensation of the mystery, a new sphere was opened up as a place of blessing and of hope. This sphere we may term the super-celestial, it is "above the heavens," that is, above the firmament of this present creation, it is far above all, it is at the very right hand of God. This sphere is the sphere of the hope of those who are members of the One Body. If Paul's prison ministry in connection with the teaching of Ephesians is exactly the same as that of the earlier epistles (Corinthians, Thessalonians, etc.), then the hope is the same, and it may still be true that we entertain "the hope of Israel" (see Acts xxviii.). If, however, Paul's prison ministry commenced a new line of teaching altogether, if it revealed a new dispensation, and had a new sphere for its operations, then the hope of that dispensation must correspond with the new sphere of its calling.

It may be that some readers have not given much thought to the claims of the Apostle Paul to a two-fold ministry, and as it is vital to a true understanding of our hope, we feel that none will begrudge the space given up to its re-consideration.

It will be remembered that it was the continual practice of the Apostle Paul to go to the synagogues of the town he visited, notwithstanding that he may have been most cruelly treated in the synagogue or by the Jews in the town previously visited. There came a stage, however, when he entered a synagogue for the last time. This final synagogue witness is recorded in Acts xix. 8, 9, and we find that the Apostle

> "Went into the synagogue and spake boldly for the space of three months, disputing and persuading the things concerning the kingdom of God. But when divers were > hardened, and believed not, but spake evil of that way before the multitude, he departed from them, and separated the disciples, disputing daily in the school of one Tyrannus."

From this point the synagogue drops out of notice. Accounts of his visits to Macedonia, Troas, and Miletus, are given, but it is only among disciples that he is found. His course is now set for Jerusalem, and he is in haste to be there by the day of Pentecost. Instead therefore of journeying to Ephesus, he called for the elders of the church to meet him at Miletus. What is the burden of his message to them? It divides itself into four parts:--

(1). Acts xx. 18-21. A resume of his ministry, as something that had been completed and closed.
(2). Acts xx. 22-24. A revelation of a future ministry, with which imprisonment is a close accompaniment.
(3). Acts xx. 25-27. A statement to the effect that these Ephesians would see his face no more, and that he had not shunned to declare unto them all the counsel of God.
(4). Acts xx. 28-35. A warning concerning the "wolves" who should enter in after his departure.

It will be seen that this address indicates something unusual. The Apostle's usual topic and manner is well expressed in Acts xvii. 2, 3:--

> "And Paul, as his manner was, went in unto them, and three sabbath days reasoned with them out of the Scriptures, opening and alleging that Christ must needs have suffered, and risen again from the dead; and that this Jesus, whom (said he) I preach unto you, is Christ."

Now he calls the earnest attention of his hearers to that ministry as though he had concluded it, summarizing it in Acts xx 21 by the words:--

> "Testifying both to the Jews and also to the Greeks, repentance toward God, and faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ."

Here for the last time does the kingdom word R*epentance* come from either the lip or pen of the Apostle as a part of his gospel. Verse 22 commences a new phase, "And now." What of the future? Paul says:--

> "And now, behold, having been bound in the spirit, I go unto Jerusalem not knowing the things that shall befall me there: save that the Holy Spirit witnesseth in every city, saying that bonds and afflictions await me."

The apostle had no doubt as to his destination and destiny. Not once or twice, but in every city the Spirit bore witness to the fact that he was to be the Lord's prisoner. Before ever the shackles of Rome bound him, Paul was already "bound in the spirit," and never does he allow the outward and secondary to take from him his clear title and calling as "the prisoner of the Lord." The witness concerning bonds and imprisonment often developed into advice to turn aside from such a goal, as may be seen in xxi. 11, 12, but it was always set aside and, like his Master, Paul set his face stedfastly to go to Jerusalem. So he could say:--

> "But none of these things move me, neither count I my life dear unto myself, so that I might finish my course with joy, and (or even) the ministry which I revealed from the Lord Jesus, to testify the gospel of the grace of God" (Acts xx. 24).

Here it is evident the Apostle looks forward to a new ministry. He stands as it were at the beginning of a course, and prays that he may finish it.

#2. (Concluded from page 175).
pp. 190 - END

In the last chapter of his last epistle (the dying words of the Apostle whose time for departure was at hand) he could say, "I have finished my course." Repeatedly in this last epistle (II Timothy) he refers to his chain, and once more he refers to himself as the prisoner of the Lord (i. 8).

This ministry is set in contrast to that summarized in Acts xx. 21. There he had testified repentance and faith, now he was to testify the gospel of the grace of God. This gospel is directly connected with the prison ministry of the Apostle Paul who claims in Eph. iii. to have received "the dispensation of the grace of God." This ministry Paul says "he received of the Lord Jesus." Now, the time when he received it, and the fact that it differed from his earlier ministry is explained in Acts xxvi. Most would turn to Acts ix. to find the words of the Lord to Paul, but they are not fully recorded, they stop short at the most important part, which omission is as much dispensational as the better known example of the Lord's quotation of Isa. lxi. 2. Not until "repentance" had been fully preached could it be made known that God had provided against Israel's foreseen unbelief and obstinacy. So it is that Paul the prisoner tells what Paul the free man could not tell.

"Things that Differ."

#1. Introductory.

pp. 27 - 30

From the day that the first page of The Berean Expositor was written to the present moment, the outstanding feature of its witness, to the glory of God and the building up of the One Body, has been the setting forth of what is termed Dispensational Truth, the principles and the results of putting into effect II Tim. ii. 15. An endeavour has been made to emphasize the supreme importance of distinguishing between the truths that pertain to one dispensation from those of another. Many and precious things have been discerned in the light of II Tim. ii. 15, as those who have tasted of the riches of grace in the Epistles given through Paul the prisoner of the Lord can testify.

It is becoming evident, however, that the time has come for another step to be taken in the direction of rightly dividing the Word. We must go on from Ephesians to Philippians. We know "the dispensation of the grace of God" which was given to Paul with a view to the Gentiles. That we learn from Ephesians. We must now give heed to the necessity indicated in Phil. i. 10 (margin), we must seek the abounding love that gives the knowledge and discernment that tries "the things that differ." Unless we take this step, much confusion will never be dispelled. So much of current belief is based upon the assumption that certain parallel lines of truth are synonymous. Clear understanding is impossible unless we definitely "try the things that differ." This principle applies not only to dispensational distinctions, but to those doctrines that belong to all or most dispensations. The doctrine of Sin, for example, belongs to every dispensation since the fall of Adam until the New Heavens and New Earth. There are differences with regard to this one doctrine, the discernment of which is vital to our understanding.

Just as the Word of God, inspired and authoritative from one end to the other, presents successive revelations and an ever widening horizon, so the God of the Word, the same unchanging One, is revealed under a variety of titles, titles that mean something, and are not merely empty appendages. In one dispensation one attribute is prominent, in another dispensation quite a different aspect of God's character is presented. Under one dispensation He reveals Himself by a cluster of glorious titles, under another He reveals Himself by but one. It is very important, when considering the teaching of any portion of Scripture, that we give due regard to the title under which God is for the time regarded. Is He acting as JEHOVAH? Is He revealed as ELOHIM, or EL-SHADDAI? Is He the "God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob," "the Lord of Hosts," or "the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ"? The revelation of the Father by the Son takes us a long way in advance of O.T. revelations. The Son Himself also is revealed under a variety of titles, involving distinct and distinguishable characteristics. As Son of Man, Son of David, or Son of God, His actions and relations vary. Truth connected with the Saviour as Head of the Body the Church may be foreign to the teaching pertaining to the same Lord as King of Israel. Even the titles JESUS CHRIST, CHRIST JESUS, and JESUS are used with accuracy and inspired selection. No one could justly charge us with preaching "another Jesus" because we held to these obvious distinctions; they are manifest and upon the surface.

The great fundamental teaching of redemption and redemptive purposes has suffered considerably from "generalizing." Things that differ most vitally and essentially are considered to be synonymous. Conclusions at variance with the teaching of the Word are drawn from passages dealing with the redemptive work of Christ that speak of two or more completely separate issues. With many, the death of Christ that is placed over against the death of Adam, and the cross of Christ which is something more than death, and is not so contrasted with Adam, are just one and the same thing. With such, the statements of Scripture that show that Christ died for all, are taken to mean that all are, or will be, "saved," or, rejecting this, that the word "all" means "some." Neither of these inferences are true, the fallacy arising from failure to try the things that differ. If we had no Old Testament Scriptures excuse might be found, but we have them, and the fact is patent.

In the Epistle to the Corinthians the offering of Christ is referred to as "our Passover." In Hebrews, He "suffered without the gate," in Ephesians He "offered Himself an offering and a sacrifice to God, for a sweet-smelling savour," in Galatians He "became a curse." The book of Leviticus prepares us for this marvellous variety. How it was possible for the Lord to fulfil the type of the sweet savour offerings consumed in acceptance upon the altar, and at the same time fulfil the type of the sin offering suffering the unmitigated wrath of God without the camp, is beyond our understanding, and we are never called upon to explain. Yet further, the same offering of the Lord was not only whole burnt offering and sin offering, it was also peace offering, meal offering and trespass offering. Further still, He was the true Passover Lamb of deliverance, and the true offering typified on the day of atonement. The same cross that delivered from the curse of the law (Gal. iii.), spoiled principalities and powers (Col. ii.), reconciled principalities and powers (Col. i.), and procured peace (Eph. ii.). The blessed Offerer, and the wondrous Offering are one, yet who is there that does not realize the things that differ? If the theme of justification is before us, a different aspect of the offering of Christ will be presented, than, for instance, the basis of the words "all shall be made alive."

The offering of Christ, accompanied by distinctive issues, includes (1) Death, (2) The shedding of blood, (3) The crucifixion and cross, (4) The sufferings, (5) The giving of life, (6) The laying down, and pouring out of the soul, (7) The being made a propitiation.

It is with no light hand we pen these words. We realize how sacred and how wonderful are the facts herein expressed. Yet Scripture is explicit, and it behoves us to follow its teaching and example. If the only requirement of Christ had been death, why the sufferings? for death is possible without them. If suffering was essential, why the shame of the Cross? Why the shedding of blood? for death is possible without either. Every aspect of that wondrous offering is essential, and connected with each is a distinct line of truth forming part of its wondrous purpose.

Had it not been for the outbreak of war, we should by now, under the Lord's enabling, have a series of concordance studies of the words and phrases used in the Scriptures with regard to this sacred theme. As it is, the introductory set which appeared in Volume IV, pages 84 and 85, has had no successor, and our brother, Mr. Soper, who had commenced the investigation, will be unable to resume until this awful state of affairs in the Continent of Europe has been changed for peace. Certain aspects of truth, however, are beclouded to many, owing to confused notions regarding these things, and we therefore submit these studies with all lowliness of mind, urging all to accept them merely as a means to get back to what the Word actually says. Our brother's concordance studies may be the better appreciated afterwards.

#2. The Death of Christ.
pp. 59 - 61

If we were to be asked to quote the verses where the death of Christ is stated to have its place in the purpose of the ages, it is possible that we should imagine that the passages were too many for one to hope to keep them in memory.

Seven passages, however, are all that contain the word "death," and it will do us good just to see what they teach us as to the results and objects of that death. If we accept (as the writer does) that Paul is the human author of Hebrews, the first surprise will be that he alone of all the apostles uses this word in a doctrinal connection. Coupled with this statement, and essentially linked with it as a doctrine, is the fact that, with the exception of the references in Luke iii. 38 and Jude 14, no other writer in the N.T. speaks of Adam. Paul speaks of Adam also seven times, a series of references that demand separate attention we shall see, however, that the death of Christ has a great deal to do with the death brought in by Adam, therefore we mention it here. The following passages are all that occur in the N.T. where the word death is used of the Lord Jesus Christ, connected with some doctrinal statement:--

> Rom. v. 10.—"For if, being enemies of God, we were reconciled to God through the death of His Son, by how much more, having been reconciled, we shall be saved by His life."
>
> Phil. ii. 8.—"And being found in fashion as a man, He humbled Himself, becoming obedient unto death, even of a death of a cross."
>
> Phil. iii. 10.—"To know Him, and the power of His resurrection, and the fellowship of His sufferings, being conformed to His death."
>
> Col. i. 21, 22.—"And you who once were alienated and enemies in mind by wicked works, yet now hath He fully reconciled in the body of His flesh through the death, to present you holy and unblameable and irreproachable before Him."
>
> Heb. ii. 9.—"But we see Jesus, Who, made some little inferior to angels, on account of the suffering of the death, crowned with glory and honour; so that by the grace of God He should taste death on behalf of all."

Heb. ii. 14.—"Since therefore the children partake of blood and flesh, He also, in like manner, took part of them, in order that through the death He might render inoperative him who has the power of death, that is the devil; and might set free those, as many as by fear of death, through all their life were held in slavery."

Heb. ix. 15-17.—"And for this reason He is the Mediator of a new covenant, so that death having taken place for redemption of the transgressions against the first covenant, those having been called might receive eonian inheritance. For where there is a covenant, the death of the appointed (victim) it is necessary to bring in, for a covenant is firm over dead ones, since it is never of force when the appointed victim is living."

Upon analyzing these passages, it will be found in several instances that the death of Christ is a basis, and is universal in its scope, but that a narrower class is spoken of in relation to a subsequent revelation of God's purpose. The three passages quoted from Hebrews show this double aspect. Heb. ii. 9 tells us that the Lord tasted death for all, the next verse goes on to speak of "many sons" and "they who are sanctified . . . . . brethren."

The power of death in the hands of Satan is universal, and that strong one has been rendered inoperative by the death of Christ (Heb. ii. 14). The teaching, however, is linked with the "children," "the seed of Abraham," and leaves the wide domain of universal death to the setting free of "as many as, through all their life by fear of death were held in slavery."

Heb. ix. 15-17 first speaks of the death of Christ as making a redemption with regard to the transgressions against the first covenant, but it does not go on to say, Therefore all who were under the first covenant, and whose transgressions have been dealt with in the death of Christ, have salvation and glory. On the contrary, it speaks of a smaller class, "those having been called," who receive the eonian inheritance. Heb. ix. 15-17 like Rom. xi. 29 makes it clear that all Israel as an elect nation shall be blessed, but some out of Israel are elected unto greater glory than others. Rom. v. 10 likewise moves from the universal base to the particular structure. The death of the Son of God accomplished worldwide reconciliation, His resurrection life is needed to bring about salvation. The context speaks of those who "receive the reconciliation," and who "receive the abundance of grace"; of such, higher and greater blessings are spoken than of those who without exercise of faith receive "a justification of life." The death of Christ operates irrespective of faith, and in that aspect it is parallel to the death which passed through to all men from Adam. In neither case is man consulted or addressed. We do read of "faith in His blood," of "fellowship of His sufferings," of "conformity to His death," but these are all elective circles within the larger circle of the death of Christ.

We can do no more in these initial papers than collect passages, and point out one or two features. The series is specially intended for those who have sufficient knowledge of the Word to be able to contemplate new or strange aspects of teaching, without being persuaded by feelings or little knowledge to jump to hasty conclusions.

#3. The Death of Christ.---Apothnesko.
pp. 88 - 91

We have considered the word thanatos ("death") so far as it is used in the N.T. in a doctrinal connection with the Lord Jesus Christ. We now turn our attention to the word apothneskõ ("to die") in its doctrinal connection with Christ. In John xi. 50-52 is recorded the prophetic utterance of Caiaphas that the Lord Jesus should "die for the nation that the whole nation perish not," and further that the children of God who were scattered abroad should be gathered together in one. "This spake he not of himself: but being high priest that year, he prophesied that Jesus should die for that nation." To this the Lord Himself had already referred in John x. 15, 16.

> "I lay down My life for the sheep. And other sheep I have which are not of this fold; them also I must bring, and they shall hear My voice. And there shall be one flock and one Shepherd."

"The other sheep," "the children of God scattered abroad," "the nation," these are the ones for whom the death was accomplished, "to bring into one flock," "to gather together in one," "that the whole nation perish not," these are the objects for which the Lord died. What is understood by us the gospel is not prominent in these verses, but rather the national preservation and restoration of Israel.

> "Now is (a) judgment of this world; Now shall the Prince of this world be cast out. And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto Me. But this He said, signifying by what death He was about to die" (John xii. 31-33).

The kind of death is here indicated by the Lord, as well as some of its consequences. "Lifted up." Already this word has been used by Him in earlier passages. In John iii. 14 we meet it, "And as Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of man be lifted up." John viii. 28, "when ye have lifted up the Son of man, then shall ye know that I am He."

First as the antitype of the brazen serpent, lifted up by the command of God for the salvation of those who were perishing; then as one lifted up by a people in their ignorance and blindness, being unknown to them until thus shamefully treated, and finally, lifted up from the earth with a power to draw all men toward Himself. This consequence or effect (John xii. 31-33) is ever hardly dealt with contextually, and its full force is therefore scarcely ever perceived.

The word translated "draw" (helkuõ, and helkõ), leaving out John v. 44, and the passage before us the meaning of which we have to determine, is always used in the N.T. of drawing with force, not merely exercising an attractive influence. John xviii. 10 uses it of the drawing of a sword; John xxi. 6-11 of the dragging of a net full of fish; Acts xvi. 19 of dragging Paul and Silas into the market place; Acts xxi. 30 of dragging Paul out of the temple; James ii. 6 of dragging men before the judgment seats. To substitute the milder idea of "exercising an attractive influence" for the word "drag" would simply create nonsense. Are we to believe then that the Lord Jesus meant to say that by reason of His death and the manner of it, He would forcibly drag all towards Himself? Yes, that is so, but such a way of putting it may lead to false conclusions apart from the great safeguard—the context. The Lord has said:--

> "Now is a crisis (or judgment) of this word, Now shall the Prince of this world be cast out, AND I (kagõ, emphatic, and in strong contrast), if I be lifted up from the earth, will drag all men towards Myself."

Light upon the Lord's meaning will be found in Luke xi. 20-23.

> "If I by the finger of God cast out demons (cf. cast out the Prince of this world), no doubt the kingdom of God is come upon you. When the strong one fully armed guardeth his own court, his goods are in peace, but when a stronger than he shall come upon him, and overcome him, he taketh from him his whole armour wherein he trusted, and divideth his spoils."

By the death of Christ all men are taken by force from the tyranny and bondage of the evil one. Contend as he will, a stronger than he has come upon him, and "through death has destroyed (or rendered powerless) him who has the strength of death, that is the devil." This does not necessarily imply that forgiveness, life and glory are therefore the possession of all. Faith is not spoken of in this passage. While in various other ways the death of Christ is referred to in John, these two passages are all that use apothneskõ in a doctrinal connection. John xviii. 32; xix. 7 are the only other references that need be mentioned in this Gospel. It will be seen, as far as we have gone, that the death of Christ is here connected with two related phases of God's purposes.

(1) The national blessings of Israel.
(2) The overthrow of the authority of Satan.

These aspects of truth need to be kept well before the mind lest we confuse things that differ, and limit the great offering of Christ to the salvation of the elect, as is the case with those who rigidly adhere to what is called Particular Redemption, a truth indeed in its place, but an untruth when exalted to a place never intended for it in the purpose of the ages. The Acts of the Apostles does not use the word in reference to Christ. The remaining occurrences are found in the writings of Paul, a large number of which come in the Epistle to the Romans. These references we must consider in our next paper as the subject is too important to deal with briefly.

#4. The Death of Christ.---Apothnesko.
pp. 147 - 150

The following occurrences of the word apothneskõ seem to be the ones that refer definitely to Christ's works, viewed doctrinally, in the Epistle to the Romans:--

v. 6. "For when we were yet without strength, in due time (literally, according to a season), Christ died for (huper) the ungodly."
v. 8. "While we were yet sinners, Christ died for (huper) us" (cf. verse 9, "much more").
vi. 9. "Christ having been raised out from dead ones, dies no more, death no more has dominion (kurieuei) over Him."
viii. 34. "Who is he that condemneth? Is it Christ Who died; and much more, is risen again; Who also is at the right hand of God, Who also intercedes for (huper) us"?
xiv. 9. "For to this end Christ died and lived again, that He might dominion (kurieusei) over both dead and living."
xiv. 15. "Destroy not him with thy food, for (huper) whom Christ died."

It will be observed that the three references out of the seven speak of Christ dying for (huper) or on behalf of certain ones. He died on behalf of the ungodly, of sinners, and of the weak brother. In vi. 9 we have the blessed fact that having died, He dies no more, which verse 10 emphasizes by stating that He dies once for all, while vi. 9 brings in the word "to have dominion." Death has no more dominion over Him, but (xiv. 9) the object of His death and risen life was that He should have dominion over dead and living.

Chapter v. continues on from verses 6-8 with the "much more" of resurrection. In viii. 34 it is the same; xiv. 9, by placing "lived" after "died," evidently refers likewise to resurrection. Resurrection is always the "much more."

We have but two passages to record in I Corinthians, viz.:-- viii. 11. "And through thy knowledge the weak brother is perishing, on account of whom Christ died."

xv. 3. "Christ died for (huper) our sins according to the Scriptures."

II Corinthians has references only in the fifth chapter, viz., verses 14 and 15:--

"Having judged this, that One died for all, therefore all had died; and He died for all that they who live should no longer live to themselves, but to Him who died for them (huper) and has been raised."

We would draw attention to the Apostle's judgment. It is not that one died for all, therefore all shall live, or be saved, but that all had died. The word we have rendered "had died" is in the aorist, and "refers to the state Christ's death proved them to be in, in a state of nature. To apply it as a consequence is, "I judge, an utter blunder" (see note J.N.D. New Translation). The Apostle continues, after having spoken of the death state of all as proved by the necessity of Christ's death for all, to go on to speak of those who live. These must be believers who have been made alive with Christ. To these he speaks to the end that they should no longer live unto themselves, but unto Him, Who for their sakes died and rose again. So sweeping is this new teaching that the Apostle goes on to say—not only should we not live any longer to ourselves, but the new ground upon which we stand is so utterly severed from the death state of nature, called "the flesh," that we know Christ even after "the flesh" no longer.

Galatians has but one reference:--

> "If righteousness (is) by law, then Christ has died for nothing" (ii. 21).

Ephesians knows not the word in any connection. Philippians does not use it in connection with Christ.

Col. ii. 20 uses it with regard to the believer's identification with Christ in His death, but gives us no statement concerning that death itself.

The word does not occur in II Timothy. This fact, viz., that the death of Christ does not figure in the Prison Epistles, brings before us the most important truth that the doctrine of the mystery, as presented in the Prison Epistles, is built not upon the wide and universal aspect of the offering of Christ—the death that counterbalanced the death brought in by Adam—but upon a narrower aspect, the offering that involved the shedding of blood, and the ignominy of the cross. Just as the Burnt Offering, the Sin Offering, and the Passover differ very materially from each other in many essential particulars (yet all speak of the one offering of Christ), so in that one offering we must be prepared to find a wondrous variety of applications and provisions, for here is centred the great procuring cause of all the blessings of all the ages and for all the widely differing destinies of man. I Thessalonians uses the great covering word when speaking to those who were concerned about the resurrection and the second coming of the Lord:--

> "Who died for (huper) us, that whether we may be watching or sleeping, we may live together with Him" (v. 10).

The lesser word thneskõ is not used in the N.T. in a doctrinal way.

The reader may not feel that much has been said in the way of exposition of these references, and we would once more point out that our desire is first of all to lay a foundation of fact, and to feel sure that all our readers have these facts before them. So long as there remain passages and usages unexplored, so long will clear views be impossible. We now know what doctrines are connected by the Spirit of God with the death of Christ. We have also observed in passing that some doctrines (those that more fully express the blessings of the gospel) are united by the same Spirit to other aspects of the great offering, and we are forced to the conclusion that, as every word of God is of design and purpose, we cannot hope to attain to clear views of truth if we use words loosely. The loose usage of words enables the partially instructed to reason that if Christ died for all then ALL are or will be saved, forgiven, and justified. This kind of reasoning is valid if the death of Christ is synonymous with the other aspects of His great offering. We have seen otherwise. Some, who have seen enough to prevent them from reasoning in the way mentioned above, are mistaken we think in saying that the words, "Christ died for ALL" mean that Christ died for some. This again is because they too have failed to try the things that differ. We will not, however, attempt any proofs until the varied phases of the great work of Christ have been placed before the reader; we hope then that "proof" will be unnecessary.

#5. The Blood of Christ; its Covenant Limitations.
pp. 180 - 183

The first doctrinal reference to the blood of Christ in the N.T. is found in Matt. xxvi. 28. The parallel passages in Mark xiv. 24 and Luke xxii. 20 exhaust the first three gospels on the subject. In each reference in the A.V. the words "new testament" occur.

The R.V. renders the word diatheke by "covenant," but omits the word "new" from Matthew and Mark, calling attention in the margin to the fact that "many ancient authorities insert new." The Numeric New Testament supports the R.V. reading. With regard to the rendering "covenant" in preference to "testament," we believe all who remember the O.T. teaching on the subject will see that "covenant" is the consistent rendering.

Luke's record makes it clear that the covenant of Matt. xxvi. and Mark xiv. is the new covenant, but the omission of the word "new" leads to very important truth which otherwise might not have been so definitely seen. Keeping closely to the original, Matt. xxvi. 28 reads:--

> "For this is my blood, that of the covenant, that which is shed concerning many for forgiveness of sin.'

The blood of Christ is the blood of a covenant, but a covenant which is not left undefined. It is the blood of a covenant that has a prominent place in it for the forgiveness of sins. The Epistle to the Hebrews is most emphatic on the truth that the sacrifices of the old covenant never put away sins:--

> "For if the blood of bulls and goats . . . . . sanctifieth to the purifying of the flesh: How much more shall the blood of Christ . . . . . purge your conscience from dead works to serve the living God? And for this cause He is the Mediator of a New Covenant, that a death having taken place for redemption of the transgressions against the first covenant, those having been called might receive the promise of eonian inheritance. For where there is a covenant, the death of that which makes the covenant (diatheke, covenant; diathemenos, he who makes a covenant) it is necessary to be brought to bear. For a covenant is firm over dead ones (i.e., the sacrifices) since it has no force when that which makes the covenant is living. Hence not even the first (covenant) hath been dedicated without blood" (Heb. ix. 13-18).

It is perfectly clear that there was no redemption for sins under the old covenant, for the blood of Christ includes in its scope the redemption of the transgressions made against the old covenant. Chapter x. carries the subject to a definite conclusion.

> "For it is not possible that the blood of bulls and of goats should take away sins; wherefore coming into the world He saith, Sacrifice and offering Thou didst not desire, but a body hast Thou prepared Me . . . . . He takes away the first (covenant) that He may establish the second . . . . . The priest standing daily offering the same sacrifices oftentimes, which are never able to take away sin; but He, having offered one sacrifice for sins for ever, sat down at the right hand of God . . . . . wherefore the Holy Spirit is witness . . . . . this is the covenant that I will make with them . . . . . their sins and iniquities will I remember no more" (Heb. x. 1-18).

The Epistle further speaks in xii. 24 of "Jesus the Mediator of the new covenant and the blood of sprinkling (see ix. 19, 20), that speaketh better things than that of Abel"; and finally, in xiii. 20, speaks of "that great shepherd of the sheep, by the blood of the eonian covenant, prepare you in every good work, etc."

There can be no doubt that the blood of Christ is the blood of the new covenant, and that it is under the new covenant and not the old that sins are forgiven. Further, the blood is shed for many. When the Scriptures speak of the death of Christ, it is for all, but when the blood of the covenant is spoken of it is for many. We believe all means something different from many; and this difference illustrates the narrowing tendency of the doctrine under view. The death of Christ as viewed in relation to the state of man in Adam is one thing; the death of Christ as the appointed ratification of the new covenant by the shedding of His blood is another. It does not follow that because it is written, "As in Adam all die, so in Christ shall all be made alive," that all are necessarily forgiven, saved, justified, and blessed with the blessings of redemption. The covenant is not co-extensive with the extent of Adam's fall, but it operates within that universal sphere.

Continuing our study of the passage in Matt. xxvi., we note that the body of Christ is referred to as well as His blood, and it will be remembered that in Heb. x. we read that "it is impossible for the blood of bulls and of goats to take away sins," but we do not read in the sequel that the blood of Christ does, but rather, "a body hast Thou prepared Me"; "sanctified by the offering of the body of Jesus Christ once for all." Turning to the Gospel of John, we find no parallel to the passage of Matt. xxvi. 28. In John vi. we read of the body and blood of Christ in another setting. By examining the parallels of the context we find that "believing on Christ" and "drinking His blood" are synonymous, both result in "eonian life," and that as the expression "drinking His blood" is figurative (compare verse 47 with 53 and 54), these passages can hardly be taken as being doctrinal references to the blood of Christ such as we are considering in this series.

The Acts of the Apostles contains but two references to the blood of Christ. Acts v. 28 has no doctrinal connection, and so we pass it by. Acts xx. 28 has, and we will consider its statement.

"The church of God, which He hath purchased with His own blood." The last clause, "with His own blood," presents a difficulty, and has been rendered by many, "with the blood of His own." Heb. ix. 12 and xiii. 12 give us what the normal form of the expression should be, dia tou idiou haimatos. In Acts xx. 28 the form is dia tou haimatos tou idiou. Whatever the true rendering may be, we may learn, for the time being at least, that the blood of Christ purchased or acquired the church of God.

The word "purchase" is peripoieõ, and literally means, "to make over and above; to acquire." The word comes in Gen. xxxi. 18, "The cattle of his getting"; xxxvi. 6, "which he had got in the land of Canaan." It occurs in only one other place in the N.T., viz., I Tim. iii. 13, "purchase to themselves a good degree." Peripoiesis, meaning an acquiring or an obtaining, occurs in a few passages. I Thess. v. 9, "Obtain salvation," II Thess. ii. 14, "Obtaining the glory"; I Pet. ii. 9, "A peculiar people." This last reference, "a people for an acquisition," is an echo of Mal. iii. 17, esontai moi, legei Kurios Pantokrator EIS PERIPOIESIN "They shall be to Me, saith the Lord Almighty, for an acquisition."

The Hebrew word of this passage is segullah, something peculiarly precious and of private rather than general interest. Here in Mal. iii. 17 it is rendered "jewels." In Ex. xix. 15, Ps. cxxxv. 4, and Eccles. ii. 8 it is rendered "a peculiar treasure." In Deut. xiv. 2 and xxvi. 18, "peculiar people." In I Chron. xxix. 3 David uses the word to indicate his own private possessions as distinct from the national offerings, "mine own proper good."

Whatever differences of opinion there may be regarding the translation of the last clause of Acts xx. 28, there can be no uncertainty as to the fact that the church of God there said to be an acquisition, a peculiar possession, purchased by the blood of Christ, is to be considered as distinct from the world of mankind generally who died in Adam and must live again. The blood of the covenant was shed for many, the blood also made a purchase of a peculiar and special people, the church of God. This is the sustained testimony of the Scriptures, and is one of "The things that differ" that it is necessary for us to take to heart, that while the death is spoken of as of universal application, the shedding of blood is within the bounds of a covenant, is for the many, and acquires an election from among the great mass of men.

DEAR FELLOW-MEMBERS,

It is our exceedingly joyous task, in the midst of all the sad evidences of sin and its works, to pen a few lines of gratefulness for the continuance of the witness of this expository monthly.

This continuance through another year, involving as it does time, health and money, beside the higher gifts of the Lord's grace, is of itself a witness to the faithfulness and sufficiency of our gracious God.

We feel it to be our mission, should the Lord continue His mercy toward us, still to keep zealously to the confines of our title, The Berean Expositor, and to avoid all temptations to turn aside into reasonings and disputings, or deal with topics that are outside the expositor's sphere.

We hope, D.V., before the conclusion of 1918 to have commenced the exposition of two other books of the Bible.

May we all still find "grace sufficient".

Yours in that blessed hope,

Moses, a type of Christ.
Exodus iv.
p. 47

The two signs given to Moses at the commencement of his work as Israel's deliverer are very suggestive when taken as a type of Christ.

(1). Power over the Serpent.
(2). Power over the Leprosy.

The serpent is, throughout Scripture, typical of Satan and the deliverance that would foreshadow redemption must not merely deliver from hard bondage.

Leprosy, too, is a constant type of sin. These two signs are presented doctrinally in I John iii. 5 and 8.

> "He was manifested to take away our sins."
> "For this purpose was the Son of God manifested, that He might destroy the works of the devil."

No. 21.—K.J.M., SMARDEN.

"If Timothy's ministry depended on his 'not neglecting', 'remembering', and 'stirring up' the gift given by the laying on of hands, how can others expect to be successful ministers without it? . . . . The gifts of Corinthians are subject to various interpretations; but that there are Christian men (not so-called, but whose lives abound in Him) who exercise the gift of healing at the present day, one cannot deny. Prophecy or ministers equally therefore are not the works of evil spirits or demons. These are the verses I want to understand clearly:--

I Tim. i. 18. 'This charge. . . . according to the prophecies which went before on thee.'

By the laying on of hands.

'Prophecies' (I Cor. xiii. 8-10). Given by the Spirit.

I Tim. iv. 14. 'Neglect not. . . . by prophecy, with the laying of the hands of the presbytery' (elders). N.B.—Prophecy. Laying on of hands.

II Tim. i. 6.—'Wherefore I put thee in remembrance that thou stir up the gift of God. . . . putting on of my hands.' N.B.—Gift of God. My hands.

II Tim. i. 14.—'That good thing which was committed unto thee.'

? Not by Paul.

? By the Holy Spirit, and the laying on of hands."

In seeking to be as helpful as possible in answering your questions, we will first examine the subject of the laying on of hands.

The laying on of hands.—We meet with this practice in the opening book of the N.T. Matt. ix. 18 says, "My daughter is even now dead, but come and lay thy hand upon her and she shall live". Here, not merely healing, but life from the dead is the result. In Matt. xix. 15 the Lord lays His hands upon the little children, evidently an outward sign of blessing well known at the time (see verse 13). Mark vi. 5 speaks of the laying on of hands for healing, and xvi. 18 includes this among the signs that should follow the preaching of the gospel as commissioned to the apostles. Acts vi. 5, 6 shows the laying on of hands in the appointment of Stephen and the others. That this laying on of the apostles' hands did not necessarily impart any added spiritual power may be inferred from verse 3, where the men selected were to be "full of spirit and wisdom", where the word "spirit" refers to the "gifts", not the "Giver". The same is not the case with the next reference (Acts viii. 17), for it is definitely said that holy spirit was given them by the laying on of the apostles' hands, that it was to confer this that they went to them (15), and that an unsaved man could see that through the laying on of the apostles' hands the spirit was given (18). Acts xiii. 3 however is not in the same category; Barnabas and Saul had been separated by the Spirit of God unto a special work. Barnabas we know was already "full of holy spirit" (xi. 24), and the laying on of the hands of their fellow "prophets and teachers" did not confer any gift, but simply gave a solemn ratification of the call of the Spirit. Chapter xix. 6 is a repetition of the case cited in chapter viii., for the holy spirit came upon the men when Paul laid his hands upon them. Paul also in chapter xxviii. 8 lays his hands on the father of Publius and heals him. In I Tim. v. 22 Timothy is charged to "lay hands suddenly on no man", and the context (see iii.) speaks of the great care necessary in appointing "bishops and deacons" over the church of God. I Tim. iv. 14 speaks of the laying on of the hands of the elders, while II Tim. i. 6 speaks of something imparted by the laying on of the hands of the apostle ("my hands"). The whole teaching of the laying on of hands therefore may be reduced to three heads.

(1). The healing of the sick and raising of the dead.
(2). The imparting of "the Holy Spirit".
(3). The confirmation of an appointment to some office in the Church.

Looking at the facts recorded in the Acts, only the apostles had the power to confer "holy spirit", while both the apostles and others are said to lay their hands on men who had been set apart for some special ministry. The references to Timothy come under headings 2 and 3, for not only is there no indication that Timothy had the gift of healing, but on the contrary there is definite witness that he was advised to resort to the medical value of a little wine for his "often infirmities". Let us examine the passages cited in your letter.

> "This charge I commit to thee, son Timothy, according to the prophecies as to thee preceding, in order that thou mightest war by them the good warfare, maintaining faith and a good conscience; which (last) some having put away, have made shipwreck as to faith" (I Tim. i. 18, 19).

Timothy is here spoken of as a man concerning whom prophecy went before, and indicated him as a minister chosen by Christ. The apostle, therefore, because of this special calling, deposits or entrusts to Timothy a special "charge". What is this charge? It appears from the passage quoted to have reference to the endeavour to "maintain faith and a good conscience" among those who were making shipwreck of faith. Earlier in the chapter the apostle had defined "the charge"; Timothy was to remain at Ephesus that he might "charge" some not to teach other doctrines (i. 3). Verse 5 reads, "now the end of the commandment", and by the rendering "commandment", the mind of the reader is turned aside from the true current of the apostle's thought. Translate the verse, "now the end of the charge is love out of a pure heart, and of a good conscience, and of faith unfeigned, which some having swerved have turned aside, etc.", and its connection with "this charge" of verses 18, 19 is very evident. "The charge" receives amplification in chapters ii. and iii. where various items of doctrine and practice are specified. The attitude of the church toward kings and governments, the place of man and woman in the ministry, the relation of husband and wife, the qualifications necessary for the office of bishop and deacon. The careful direction of these things was to be Timothy's difficult task at Ephesus. Paul therefore reminds him that there had been special marks of divine favour fitting him for this work: the charge concludes for the time in iii. 14, 15 by the apostle saying:--

> "These things I write unto thee, hoping to come unto thee shortly, but if I tarry long, that thou mayest know how to behave thyself in the house of God."

Chapter iv. opens with a reference to the departure from the faith as a result of giving heed to seducing spirits and doctrines of demons, whose conscience is seared. Verses 6 and 11 shew that all this is a part of the charge given to Timothy. The greatness of the task, and the nature of the opposition seem to have made Paul specially anxious to stimulate Timothy to resolute action and faithfulness; "let no man despise thy youth", he says, "be an example", "attend to the reading, the exhorting, the teaching, neglect not the gift that is in thee, which has been given to thee through prophecy, with laying on of the hands of the eldership".

Chapter v. indicates that the discipline of the church was to be undertaken by Timothy. Elders, and elderly women and widows, were to be dealt with; verse 7 uses the word "charge" again. Timothy is also evidently in charge of the distribution of the funds for the ministering brethren (verses 17, 18); further, he sits as judge to hear cases brought by one member against another, and he is solemnly adjured to conduct these things without partiality or prejudice. Timothy also had the appointing of elders and deacons, for he is warned not to lay hands hastily on any man. In chapter vi. 13 the apostle returns to his "charge", encouraging Timothy by the example of faithfulness exhibited by his Lord, and again in verse 17. The closing words of the epistle express the apostle's concern for Timothy's faithfulness, the temptations that surrounded him, and again he makes his appeal to the special trust that Timothy had received. In the second epistle the apostle expresses his confidence that the unfeigned faith he so much emphasized in his first charge, dwelt in Timothy; because of this the apostle reminds him to rekindle the gift of God which is in him by the laying on of the apostle's hands. Again, this "gift" has no reference to "healing", but directly to the special ministry of Timothy:-- > "For God has not given us a spirit of cowardice, but of power, and of love, and of a sound mind, therefore be not ashamed. . . . the good deposit entrusted to thee, guard, through pneuma hagion (the gift that Timothy and Paul possessed) that dwelleth in us".

Timothy is solemnly adjured to "preach the word" and to make full proof of his ministry (iv. 1-5). What was this ministry? We have seen something of its responsibility and all-round activity in the first epistle; here the apostle gives it a name, and throws fuller light upon its character:--

> "Do the work of an evangelist, make full proof of thy ministry, FOR I am now ready to be offered, and the time of my departure is at hand."

From this it is evident that Timothy was to do the work of an evangelist, and that he was to take the place of the departing apostle; he had partly entered into this, as is evident from the first epistle. The "evangelist" is the one omitted from I Cor. xii. 28, where a "gifted" ministry associated with prophecy, miracles, and healing, is spoken of. The evangelist's office, which Timothy was about to enter, is that mentioned in Eph. iv. 11, 12:--

"And he gave some, apostles; and some, prophets; and some, evangelists; and some, pastors and teachers; for the perfecting of the saints."

The order of the apostles was not continued; no successors were appointed who were called apostles. The evangelist succeeded the apostle, as the teacher succeeded the prophet. By viewing the four orders of ministry mentioned in Eph. iv. 11 we find that they are in two pairs, the first possessing miraculous gifts, the second not necessarily so.

A	Apostles.	\	Inspired.
B	Prophets.	/
A	Evangelists.	\	Uninspired.
B	Pastors and Teachers.	/

There is no mention in the Scriptures of any one being called an evangelist after this, the only one of the four of Eph. iv. 11 that is spoken of as having continuance is that of "teacher" (see II Tim. ii. 2).

The work of Timothy was closely allied to the work of the apostle. During Paul's life-time he was entrusted with responsibility that approached that of the apostle, with the exception of supernatural powers. Paul, not Timothy, delivers to Satan, but Timothy exercises a fulness of uninspired powers in the church. At the apostle's death, Timothy enters into another phase of his ministry, the work of an evangelist; that men are called evangelists to-day, and that their work is very different from that indicated by Paul to Timothy only shows that we have used the term loosely.

Preachers, teachers, and ministers to-day do not necessarily take Timothy as their model. Qualifications are given in detail for the office of bishop (or overseer or elder) and deacon. These qualifications make no difference whatever to the possession of any "gift", although Timothy would lay his hands upon them in token of recognition.

It would appear then that we need to distinguish between the three uses to which the laying on of hands is put, to distinguish between the special work of Timothy in the early days of the transition, and that of the teachers who should succeed him, and to observe that the gift of healing has no place whatever in the passages dealt with.

The enquiry into the exercise of healing powers by godly persons can only be safely conducted upon first hand evidence, and should there be evidence that dead had been raised, or blind made to see, poisons taken with immunity, and lepers cured by a touch, as well as less defined sicknesses dispelled, it would approach nearer to the powers exercised by the early church. We can only be guided by the teaching of the Word. That binds us. If the Lord, in special circumstances, does go outside the limits of this dispensation, that must be considered as exceptional and in no wise to be taken as a guide for ourselves. We trust that you will consider the case of Timothy afresh, and that you will continually and patiently seek to "try the things that differ".

"Apostolic Mistakes."
pp. 73-77

The second of the so-called "Apostolic mistakes" recorded in the Acts of the Apostles, is the appointment of Matthias to the place forfeited by Judas. Traditional teaching says in effect that the vacancy was reserved for the Apostle Paul, who was chosen and appointed in God's own time, and that Matthias was appointed because of the over anxiety of the Apostles to make up the number.

Let us remember that the Lord had occupied the better part of forty days in giving the Apostles instruction concerning the kingdom of God. This would be based upon "Moses and the prophets" (Acts xxviii. 23). We are told that upon one occasion, during the ten days that intervened between the Lord's ascension and the day of Pentecost, Peter stood up and drew attention to the gap in the apostolic number. The Lord had already linked the number of the Apostles with the number of the tribes (Matt. xix. 28), and the day was drawing near when, endued with power from on high, the Apostles were to herald once again the gospel of repentance and restoration.

Peter's procedure is to draw attention to the testimony of Scripture to the betrayal of the Lord by Judas.

> "Men and brethren, this Scripture must needs have been fulfilled which the Holy Ghost, by the mouth of David spake before concerning Judas, which was guide to them that took Jesus" (Acts i. 16).

There is no apparent difference between Peter's manner and delivery here, before Pentecost, and that recorded in Acts ii. 25-36. David is cited as prophesying that which had taken place, and legitimate inferences were drawn. Peter goes on in verses 17-19 to recount the history of Judas, how he was numbered with the Apostles, took part of the ministry, and finally died an awful death in "Aceldama, the field of blood". This leads up to the second reference to Scripture in verse 20:--

> "It is written in the book of Psalms, Let his habitation be desolate, and let no man dwell therein".

This was fulfilled by calling the field Aceldama, a place that would pass under a ban and be considered accursed. "And his bishoprick let another take", continues the quotation. The Psalm quoted here reads in the A.V., "And let another take his office" (margin charge), and the A.V. margin of Acts i. 20 reads "office or charge". The Apostle evidently quoted from the LXX version. Peter's action so far runs parallel to what is written. He now puts the legitimate deduction into practice.

> "Wherefore of these men which have companied with us all the time that the Lord Jesus went in and out among us, beginning from the baptism of John, unto that same day that He was taken up from us, must one be ordained to be a witness with us of His resurrection" (verse 22).

There must have been some clear reason in Peter's mind for so particularly defining the qualifications that were essential to become one of the twelve. First, it was not sufficient that the person thus chosen should have known the Lord for a part of His ministry, he must have "come together" (same word as in i. 6) with them from the beginning. This we shall find is confirmed by the Lord's words in Luke xxii. 28-30:--

> "Ye are they which have continued right through (without a break, see force of diamenõ in II Pet. iii. 4) with Me in my temptations. . . . ye may. . . . sit upon thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel."

From Matt. xix. 28 we learn there will be twelve thrones, and consequently there must be twelve apostles. Of all the company gathered on this occasion (and Acts i. 15 tells us there were one hundred and twenty), two only fulfilled this condition. We do not read anything of "Joseph called Barsabas who was surnamed Justus", or of "Matthias" in the Gospel narrative. So far, all has been in perfect harmony with the scriptural requirements in view of the complete witness to be given on the fast approaching day of Pentecost. At this point, however, Peter and the rest turn to the Lord.

> "And they prayed, and said, Thou Lord, which knowest the hearts of all men, shew whether of these two Thou hast chosen, that he may take part of this ministry and apostleship, from which Judas by transgression fell, that he might go to his own place. And they gave forth their lots; and the lot fell upon Matthias: and he was numbered with the eleven apostles."

The use of the lot is in entire conformity with Scripture teaching. Already in this chapter the word has occurred twice, translated "part", viz., in verse 17, and also in verse 25. The casting of lots as a means to discover the Lord's mind figures early in Scripture. Aaron cast lots upon the two goats on the day of atonement, the land of promise was divided by lot. No believer would venture to suggest that it was all a matter of chance as to which portion of the holy land became that the Lord had already planned the inheritance and the casting of the lot was His method of communicating His will just as surely as by the Urim and Thummim, or the pillar of cloud. Proverbs xvi. 33 says very definitely:--

> "The lot is cast into the lap, but the whole disposing thereof is of the Lord."

This we take to be true in Acts i. We do not believe that Matthias was appointed by the Lord on that occasion, but that the Lord's appointment was at that time made known.

In I Cor. xv. the Apostle Paul very definitely teaches two things, (1) The "twelve" were in existence and could see the risen Lord some time before His ascension (verse 5); and (2) that Paul himself was not of the twelve (verse 8). The arrangement of the witnesses to the resurrection in verse 5-8 is suggestive:--

A | Seen of Cephas (one Apostle).
B | Then the twelve (all the Apostles).
C | After that 500 brethren (not of the twelve).
A | Seen of James (one Apostle).
B | Then all the apostles (the twelve).
C | Last of all of Paul (not of the twelve).

Ephesians iv. tells us of an order of Apostles which was instituted not before the Lord ascended, but "when He ascended up on high and gave gifts unto men. . . and He gave some Apostles". As far back as Matt. x. we have the names of the twelve Apostles given to us.

The tradition that Paul was the twelfth Apostle is the cause of the attempt to explain this passage as another "Apostolic Mistake", whereas the fact is the mistake of mixing up Church and Kingdom is the cause of this well meaning higher criticism.

The ordinary reading of the words of Acts i. 25 is that Judas fell from his apostleship "that he might go to his own place". The verse has been included in the number that provide a solemn warning concerning judgment to come. It is possible that another meaning attaches to the words altogether. The assembly prayed to the Lord to select one (to take the place of Judas, from which he fell), that he (that is, the selected on, Matthias) might go to his own place (that is, among the twelve Apostles), and they gave the lot, and the lot fell upon Matthias; and he was numbered with the eleven. This we believe to be the true interpretation of the passage, and believing this we see divine warrant for the inclusion of Matthias as the appointed by the Lord.

Immediately following this appointment comes the record of the day of Pentecost, a clear attestation that all was ready. Peter stands up "with the eleven" (ii. 14). In chapter iii. Peter could urge repentance in view of the coming o the Lord and the restitution of all things, which would necessitate the setting up of the twelve thrones for the twelve apostles, and Paul was not converted until two years after. So far we find perfect accord in all parts of Scripture, and more and more do we feel that the "mistakes" are those of the would be correctors and adjusters of Scripture.

Eternal Life.
pp. 77-80

In our issue of July 1916 we drew attention to the way in which aionian life was used in Matthew's Gospel. There is a marked difference when we consider the teaching of John's Gospel. While works are constantly associated with aionian life in Matthew, faith is the constant accompaniment in John. The first occurrences are typical. John iii. 14-16, Here aionian life is definitely linked with faith, and with the offering of Christ. The reference to the serpent lifted up, shows very definitely that faith in Christ as the offering for sin is in view. The Lord Himself used the expression "lifted up" to signify "what death He should die" (John xii. 33). The last verse of John iii. testifies to the same truth. "He that believeth on the Son hath aionian life: and he that believeth not the Son shall not see life; but the wrath of God awaiteth for him".

John v. 29 is one of the passages introduced by the solemn words "verily, verily", the terms are somewhat different, but faith is still the essential, "He that heareth My word, and believeth on Him that sent Me, hath aionian life, and shall not come into condemnation, but is passed from death unto life". John vi. records the miracle of the feeding of the five thousand, and the subsequent effect upon the people. The Lord rebuked their mere desire for food, saying to them, "Labour not for the meat that perisheth, but that meat which endureth unto aionian life, which the Son of man shall give unto you: for Him hath God the Father sealed". The argument is continued throughout the chapter. It reappears in the words of John xvii. 3; that argument is faith in Christ as the sent One. "This is aionian life, that they might know Thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ, Whom Thou hast sent". Speaking of the disciples the Lord says, "they have believed that Thou didst send Me" (xvii. 8). Again, in verse 18, the Lord refers to being "sent into the world". His prayer continues and looks forward to the time when the "world may believe that Thou hast sent Me" (verse 21); and finally, "that the world may know that Thou hast sent Me". This is evidently a most important theme.

Returning to John vi. we make the following correction in verse 27, "Work not" instead of "labour not". The reason for this is found in the question of verse 28: "What shall we do in order that we might work the works of God?" The answer that Christ gave to this question was, "This is the work of God, in order that ye believe on Him Whom He hath sent" (29). "They said therefore unto Him, What sign shewest Thou?" It is important that we follow the argument here. What is the cogency of the word "therefore"? In answer to their question about working the works of God, the Lord said, "This (i.e. this miracle already witnessed) is the work of God, with the object that ye might believe on Him whom He hath sent". Their unbelief at once seized upon the words "the work of God". This miracle then is the work of God, "What sign showest thou therefore, that we may see and believe thee, what dost thou work" (i.e. of thyself). For, the argument continues, Moses who was sent by God proved his mission by the miracles he wrought, as for example the fact that the Scriptures record, "He gave them bread from heaven to eat" (31). Again they had to be corrected. "Moses gave you not that bread from heaven; but My Father giveth you the true bread from heaven". The correction is two-fold. First, Moses did not give the manna in the wilderness, but God; and secondly, the manna in the wilderness was not the true bread, the real thing, it was but a type.

> "For the bread of God is He which cometh down from heaven, and giveth life unto the world. Then said they unto Him, Lord, evermore give us this bread, and Jesus said unto them, I am the bread of life; he that cometh to Me shall never hunger, and he that believeth on Me shall never thirst. . . . For I came down from heaven not to do mine own will, but the will of Him that sent Me" (verses 33-38).

He is the sealed one (27) and the sent one (38). In connection with this emphasis upon being the sent One is the will of the Father and the election unto life. Verse 37 is very strong, "All that the Father giveth Me shall come to Me". Verses 39 and 40 emphasize the will, the gift, and the sent One. Of those given to Him He was to lose nothing. In John xvii. these thoughts recur. Aionian life He gives to as many as the Father gave Him (2); "Thine they were and Thou gavest them Me" (6); "I pray not for the world, but for them which Thou hast given Me; for they are Thine" (9). In verses 11 and 12 we have the fact stated "that none of them is lost" who were given to the Lord. Judas being known from the commencement as being "a devil" is mentioned in verse 70, of the chapter (vi.) which we are considering. The elective character of the subject of chapter vi. is emphasized by the Lord, for continuing in verse 44 He says, "No man can come to Me, except the Father which hath sent Me draw him".

The Lord also makes reference to resurrection. In verse 39 being raised again at the last day is supplemented in verse 40 by having aionian life. Verse 44 and 45 say the same thing. Aionian life therefore is resurrection life, life which is something different from the life that is possessed by creatures in this world. The fathers who ate the manna "are dead". The Lord, as the sent One, is the living bread, and He gives "to live unto the age" (51). He testified that man by nature had "no life" in him. The utter dependence upon Christ for life is further brought out by the parallel in verse 57. "As the living Father has sent Me, and I live by the Father: so he that eateth Me (the living bread, the sent One), even he shall live by Me". Many, even of the disciples, when they heard this, said, "This is an hard saying; who can hear it?" Again the Lord emphasizes His place with the Father (62), the elective character of the subject (64, 65). All but the twelve "went back". The Lord asks them:--

> "Will ye also go away? Then Simon Peter answered Him, Lord, to whom shall we go? Thou hast the words of aionian life, and we believe and are sure that Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God."

Here then is the full meaning of believing the Lord as the sent One. It is a faith in Him as "the Christ, the Son of the living God". Towards the close of the book the Apostle clearly indicates its purpose:--

> "These (signs) are written, that ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that believing ye might have life through His name" (xx. 31).

The opening chapter records the blessing that follows belief "in His name" – power to become the sons of God. This too is in a setting that emphasizes election unto life.

(Conclusions). pp. 95, 96

The witness of John the baptist points to Christ as the sent One. The reference to aionian life in John iv. 36, is in a somewhat different connection, and is the one reference which is not linked with faith, but rather with service. John v. 39 is a somewhat misapplied verse. Verse 36 speaks of the works that the Lord performed as His witness that the Father had sent Him. Further, He said, "Ye have not His word abiding in you: for whom He hath sent, Him ye believe not". They may have had a vast acquaintance with the letter of the word. They could glibly instruct the wise men that Messiah would be born in Bethlehem, but they did not act upon their knowledge and go and worship Him! They had not His word abiding in them.

> "Ye search the Scriptures, for in them ye think ye have aionian life, AND THEY ARE THEY WHICH TESTIFY OF ME, and ye will not come to Me that ye might have life".

What a testimony! Search the Holy Scriptures merely for the receiving of honour from men (41, 44), and failing to see Christ "The sent One", the One concerning Whom the Scriptures speak, and without Whom the Scriptures are void.

May we ever pray to be kept from any approach to such a condition. This, then, seems to be the special aspect in which aionian life is present in the Gospel of John. It differs in several essential respects from the aspects of Matthew's Gospel. We do not attempt here to solve the problem which arises out of this difference; we first of all state the facts, reserving our conclusions until the various phases of the subject have been passed under review.

Fundamentals of Dispensational Truth.

The Six Days of Creation.
pp. 10-15

The first act of God that is recorded as taking place in the present order of things is an act of restoration, an act of giving life out of death, and light out of darkness. This present creation was ushered in by an act of grace, even as it will be followed by the fruit of glory. Many of our readers may remember arguments designed to adjust Gen. i. with geology. Genesis is God's revelation, geology is man's imperfect discovery. We do not need to adjust God's revelation to man's imperfect discoveries. We have to be careful, however, to distinguish between God's revelation and man's interpretation.

Here geology and theology stand more upon equal terms. The one is the finding of erring men in the records of God's works, the other, the finding of erring men in His Word. These findings may continually disagree, but between His works and His Word there can exist nothing but harmony. One set of interpreters tell us that the earth was brought into existence, was created in the absolute sense of the term, about 6,000 years ago. Another set tell us that they require countless millions of years to account for what they see in the crust of the earth. Some demand a period wherein the fossilized remains of extinct animals, and the fossilized forests that make the coal fields, shall have lived and flourished. Others, by reason of their attachment to another interpretation, have gone so far as to assert that the rocks were created with the fossils in them just as we find them! The microscope turns the chalk cliffs of Dover into masses of minute shells, shells which once contained living organisms. When once we have seen that the present creation which occupied six days in making is a successor to one that was created "in the beginning", the demands of the geologist for as many million years as he may require make not the slightest alteration necessary in the revelation of God. The six days' creation is set out in detail, and the order and arrangement as given seem to be purposely designed to foreshadow the sequence of events that constitute the outworking of the purpose of the ages. Six days are occupied in work, one in rest. That there is some definite arrangement may be seen in the following.

1st day.	A	|	Day and Night. Division. Light.
2nd day.	B	|	Waters. Division. The Firmament.
3rd day.	C	|	Earth. Division. Grass, herb and fruit.
4th day.	A	|	Day and night. Division. Light bearers.
5th day.	B	|	Waters. The Firmament.
6th day.	C	|	Earth. For cattle, grass. For man, seed and fruit.

It will be observed that the first three days complete the extent of creation, that is to say, they deal with light, heaven, and earth. In the second set of three those creatures that are to appropriate and enter into the creation already brought forth are created. The light of the first day is concentrated on the fourth day; there we have not light, but luminaries or light-bearers. The day and the night which were divided from one another in the first day, are ruled over by the moon and the sun, respectively, on the fourth. The waters and the firmament are dealt with on the second day. The waters already exist (they are not created on the second day), but a firmament is made which divides the waters from the waters. Some of the waters with which "the world that then was perished" have been lifted up above the firmament which God called heaven. These waters are referred to in Psa. cxlviii. 4, "Praise Him, ye heavens of heavens, and ye waters that be above the heavens", and again in Psa. civ. 2, 3, "Who stretchest out the heavens like a curtain (the idea of the word firmament); who layeth the beams of His chambers in the waters". There is something here that has not yet entered into astronomy. The waters that were left on the earth are made to produce not only sea creatures, but also "fowls to fly above the earth in the open firmament of heaven". So the fifth day completes the second. The third day deals with the earth. First its separation from the waters, and then the fruitfulness of the earth, spoken of as grass, herb yielding seed, and the fruit tree yielding fruit after his kind, whose seed is in itself. The sixth day sees the creation of beast and man. To the lower animals is given every green herb for meat. To man, the herb bearing seed, and the tree in which is the fruit of a tree yielding seed.

Thus the whole creation is rounded off, all is adapted and prepared for its use, from the sun that rules the day to the provision of the green herb for the creeping things on the earth.

The seventh day God ended His work which He had made, and He rested on the seventh day from all His work which He had made. The two words translated "finished" (Gen. ii. 1), and "ended" (Gen. ii. 2), are translations of a word which indicates totality. The creation thus brought about was finished and ended. Any subsequent work or creation that may be attributed to God must therefore be of another creation than this present one. Where it speaks of God resting, it is "from all His work which He had made", and "created and made" (Gen. ii. 2, 3). The work of the seven days occupied in the creation and making of "the heavens and the earth which are now" contains all the elements and provide the platform necessary for the outworking of the great plan of the ages.

We must be prepared to learn many lessons that may at first prove hard, by a recognition of this fact. On every hand we are faced with the fact that there are not only wonderful creatures, animal, vegetable, and mineral, that easily typify all that we mean by the word "good", but that created by the same hand there are countless other creatures, animal, vegetable, and mineral, that aptly typify all that we mean by the word "evil". The venomous snake is the creature of the same One who fashioned its harmless victim. The One who so marvelously sealed up the fruiting bud to preserve the precious life within, also created an insect armed with the necessary boring appliances to pierce through that protective covering, and deposit an egg which should produce devastation. These things are mysterious and are unanswerable upon any basis that ignores the purpose of the ages. That purpose definitely moves on beyond this present life. Vanity is written from beginning to end of this creation, and the teeming life, with its types of good and evil, its sheep and its goats, its serpents and its doves, its thorns and its figs, its darkness and its light, these speak plainly of the moral and spiritual state through which the creation is passing and urges us onward to "the rest that remaineth". When pursuing various lines of research into the purpose of the ages, we are apt at times to fall into the error of laying down a law as to what God can and cannot do. While we know that He can do nothing unrighteous, we should be very careful that our standard is not self originated. In many instances when the Scripture brings us up against some problem, we are definitely faced with a fact that silences much argument, viz., GOD IS CREATOR. A well known instance is that reply of Paul given in Rom. ix. 20. Who among us has not had searchings of heart before the revelation of the purpose of election. Who has not felt at one time or another a questioning spirit that would, if allowed to go on, arraign the great God before the bar of our understanding? Or, when attempting to meet the objections put forth by others, how many times have we elaborated the argument concerning the sovereign grace of God? The Apostle embarks upon no long reasoned explanation. The questioner is taken immediately into the presence of the Creator, "Nay but, O man, who art thou that disputest with God? Shall the thing formed say to Him that formed it, Why hast Thou made me thus?" Another typical example is found in the case of Job. Stoutly and persistently Job argues his case against the three friends. Job had "justified himself rather than God", and Elihu proceeds to reprove him. Job had complained that God had unjustly sought occasion to afflict him (xxxiii. 8-11). What is Elihu's answer to this? "Behold, in this thou art not just. I will answer, not God is more righteous than man, but greater, and that He giveth not an account of any of His matters. Elihu returns to this statement again in xxxv. 5, and again in xxxvi. 26. Then from the storm Jehovah spake to Job, and again there is the direct appeal to the stupendous work of creation. Job is overwhelmed with the appalling greatness of the One against whom he had dared to murmur. "Where wast thou when I laid the foundations of the earth?" "Hast thou searched the secrets of the deep?" "Where is the way where light dwelleth?" "Canst thou bind the sweet influences of Pleiades?" "Doth the hawk fly by thy wisdom" Job is brought low by this first utterance of the Lord, saying, "Behold, I am vile" (xl. 4). Again the Lord addresses Job, and again there is an overpowering exhibition of the strength of the Creator. The Lord draws Job's attention to the Behemoth (probably the hippopotamus) and to Leviathan (probably the crocodile). There is no reference to God's righteousness in the passage, but simply the impotence of any to stand against Him. Of the crocodile God can say, "None is so fierce that dare stir him up", and follows that remark by saying, "who then is able to stand before Me?" Again the Lord continues His description, and again, without one word of teaching concerning the question of whether God can rightly do this or do that with His creatures (the case in point), Job utterly breaks down. Job answers (we quote from the beautiful metrical version of the late Dr. Bullinger):--

"I know, I know, that Thou canst all things do:
No purposes of Thine can be withstood.
[Thou askedst (xxxviii. 3; xl. 2)]—
'Who is this that counsel hides,
And darkens all, because of knowledge void?'
'Tis I! I uttered things I could not know;
Things far too wonderful, beyond my ken.
Hear now, I pray thee: let me speak this once.
[Thou saidst (xl. 2)]—
''Tis I who ask thee: Answer Me.'
I heard of Thee by hearing of the ear,
But now mine eye hath seen Thee, I abhor [Myself]. In dust and ashes I repent."

The reader will call to mind many other passages where the Lord refers in a similar way to the great initial and unanswerable fact of creation. To say that because the term righteousness is not mentioned by the Lord, that therefore it is excluded, however, is not true. If we will only think for a moment we shall see that the creation involves righteousness as a fundamental.

If an engineer does not act righteously in design and construction, his machine will fail. Scrupulous care in measurement, adjustment, and material are first principles in successful work. The fact that creation has come into being so perfectly adapted for its multitudinous functions, so true in its response to the "laws of nature", reveals to the anointed eye righteousness on every hand. Instead of endeavouring to frame an abstract standard the actions and purposes of God, we shall, when we have the closer acquaintance with God that Job had, realize that those very works and deeds that at first we hesitated not to question, carry with them their own justification, for if they were not right they could not be. While this view will simplify the issues in one respect, it will increase the problem in another, for we shall learn with chastened Job that in saying what God can or cannot do with the work of His hands, we have uttered things we could not know; things far too wonderful, beyond our ken.

Job xxxviii.-xli. asks us questions which deal with the realm which is within the bounds of scientific investigation, and, with all our boasted knowledge, what can we answer to the questions of the Lord. This, scripturally, should close our mouths from uttering what God will do in ages yet to be.

The Six Days of Creation.
The Firmament; its relation to the Ages.
pp. 42-45

There are one or two items of importance that must be observed before we pass on from the creation of the six days as a whole, to the creation of man in particular.

On the first day God said, "Light be, and light was", and "God saw the light that it was good". This last expression follows the appearing of the dry land and gathering of the waters into one place (verse 10). Again, on this third day the expression occurs after the earth brought forth the herb and the fruit tree (12). The appointment of the sun and moon ruling over the day and night is also "good" (18). The creation of the inhabitants of the waters and of every winged fowl is pronounced good (21).

The sixth day saw the earth bring forth cattle, the beast and the creeping thing, and these are pronounced good (25). Man, too, is created on this day, and he is blessed (28), while the sixth day does not end without the record, "And God saw everything that He had made, and behold it was very good". Seven times in the six days therefore do we find the word "good". Twice does the expression occur on the third day, and twice on the sixth. The one day where the word is not recorded is the second, the day when "God made the firmament" which He called "heaven". The question arises immediately as to why the Lord did not say that this was good.

The reader will observe that while the first verse tells us of the creation of both the heavens and the earth, verse 2 goes on to speak of only one section of that creation, namely, the earth. It is the earth that becomes without form and void, and it is upon the face of the waters that the Spirit of God moves. The heavens are not mentioned here. We are not told that the heavens became involved in chaos, nor, if they were, that they were brought through into light again. When we come to the second day we read that God makes a firmament, and this firmament He "called heaven". This means the heavens that are now are not the heavens of Gen. i. 1. There has come in a temporary "heaven", which is to last only for the course of the ages. Its first name is "a firmament", this name is descriptive of its nature, and in the A.V. margin is given "Heb. expansion". The Hebrew word is rakia, and comes from raka—"To stretch forth". Job xxxvii. 18 uses this word, "Hast thou with Him spread out the sky, which is strong, and as a molten looking glass?" Exodus xxxix. 3 keeps close to the meaning of the word in the passage from Job, "And they did beat the gold into thin plates." So again in Isa. xl. 19, "the goldsmith spreadeth it over with gold." Rakia occurs 17 times in the O.T., being always rendered "firmament". Gen. i. contains nine of these occurrences.

Let us endeavour to find out all that is written concerning this firmament, the heavens of the present, which were not seen to be "good" in the eyes of the Creator. Gen. i. 6 makes the primary purpose of the firmament plain. (1) It was to be "in the midst of the waters", and (2) it was to "divide the waters from the waters". Verse 7 shows that this purpose was put into operation, "and God made the firmament, and divided the waters which were under the firmament from the waters which were above the firmament: and it was so." "It was so." When we look out over the "expanse" (rakia) away to the blue sky, however far the extent of that expanse may be, we know that above it are waters, and that it was made to divide the waters. Further, verse 8 tells us that God called the firmament heaven. It appears, therefore, that while the creation of the six days is in view, "the heavens" always refer to this firmament. The next reference to the firmament, by the use of the "Genitive of Apposition", draws our attention to this "the firmament of the heavens" of verse 14, meaning the firmament which is the heavens. In this firmament God placed two great lights, for signs and for seasons, and for days, and years, to give light upon the earth. Verse 20 concludes the references to the firmament by telling of the fowls that fly above the earth in the open firmament of heaven.

The next time we meet the word the limitation of the term is prominent. "The heavens declare the glory of God; and the firmament showeth His handiwork" (Psa. xix. 1). The sun, placed in the firmament according to Gen. i., is here seen running his appointed course "from the end of the heavens, and his circuit unto the ends of it" (verse 6). Psa. cl. Calls for praise to God (1) in His sanctuary and (2) in the firmament of His power. Ezekiel and Daniel alone of the Prophets refer to the firmament. A careful study of Ezek. i. 22-26, a highly complex passage, will, we believe, reveal that the firmament of Ezek. i. is not that of Gen. i., but that it gives us in symbol what the firmament of Gen. i. is with regard to God and the outworking of His purposes.

Verse 22 commences, "And the likeness of the firmament." Likeness figures largely in the descriptions given in this chapter. Instead of saying, "Out of the midst thereof came four living creatures," we read, ". . . . came the likeness of four living creatures (verse 5). The likeness of the firmament was upon the heads of the living creatures, and under the firmament were their wings. Above this firmament was the likeness of a throne, and upon the likeness of the throne was the likeness of the appearance of a man above upon it. Here, this likeness sets forth hidden realities and their import. Above the firmament upon a throne sits One who is like man—this is none other than Christ, the Image of God. Beneath the firmament are four living creatures, called Cherubim in chapter x.

Daniel xii. 3 is the only other reference. It is to this firmament that Scripture refers at the time of the flood when it says, "The windows of heaven were opened," and we have been told already of the waters that are above the firmament. Here for the time is the throne of God (Psa. xi. 4). His glory, however, is above the earth and the heavens (Psa. cxlviii. 13). At verse 4 in this Psalm reference is made to the waters that are above the firmament, and to the heavens of heavens, which is the higher sphere of God's activity, beyond the limitations of "the heavens and earth which are now". To this age limit refer all the references of Ecclesiastes, "under the heaven", and "under the sun". To this refers Dan. iv. 26, "After that thou shalt know that the heavens do rule." Here also is "the kingdom of the heavens" of Matthew, and here also the scenes of the Revelation.

On may occasions the Scriptures speak of God "stretching out the heavens". Psa. civ. 2, "Who stretched out the heavens like a curtain"; also Isa. xl. 22; xlii. 5; xlv. 12; li. 13; Jer. x. 12; li. 15; Zech. xii. 1. These passages should all be read with their contexts, noting how closely they are connected with the theme of God's purpose, as though the act which formed the firmament, the heavens of the present creation, was connected with the purposes that have this creation for its sphere. Limited as it is by the creation of Gen. i. 1, and the new creation of Rev. xxi. When we grasp the significance of the firmament, and the purpose that is carried out within its expanse, we may then see the perfect fitness of the statements of Ephesians, where in the words "the heavenly places" (epouranios, a word which literally means "upon the heavens"), we are taken beyond the firmament. Some blessings outside the scope of Ephesians are heavenly, but none are said to be "in the super-heavenlies". We remember reading a letter from a well taught servant of God, who characterized our teaching as erroneous and dangerous, and he sought to dispose of the teaching we have given from Ephesians by saying that the 1st chapter of the 1st Epistle of Peter is so identical that to read it is to be convinced that they both teach the same thing. We hope later on to institute a comparison, but for the time we note one point. Ephesians always speaks of the blessings of the one body as being in the epouranios, the sphere above the heavens. Peter, however, does not pierce the firmament, the inheritance he speaks of is reserved "in the heavens", not in the sphere above the heavens. Before the overthrow of the world (A.V., foundation of the world) and before the ages times (AV., times eternal) there was no firmament, and the blessings that Scripture connects with that period are not so limited as those which are from or since the overthrow of the world, and since the ages. We do not know what Astronomy has to say about the firmament and the waters that are above it, but we have the revelation of Him who "stretched out the heavens like a curtain: Who layeth the beams of His chambers in the waters", and we know His Word is Truth.

The Six Days of Creation.
"For Signs and for Seasons."
pp. 70-73

Any attempt to indicate the bearing that the six days' creation has upon the purpose of the ages, would be lacking in completeness if no reference was made to the work of the fourth day. We considered in our last paper the object for which the firmament was made, and the present paper deals with the heavenly bodies that were appointed therein to rule the day and the night, to give light upon the earth, to divide the light from the darkness, and to be for signs and for seasons, and for days and for years. The familiar name sun does not occur in Gen. i., indeed not till Gen. xv. is the name referred to. The name moon is not mentioned until Gen. xxxvii. The titles of Gen. i. are "the greater light" and "the lesser light". It must be remembered that the stars are linked with these two great lights in connection with their appointment. It should not read as in the A.V., "He made the stars also", as though the stars are a kind of afterthought; the words, "the stars also," must read on from the words, "to rule the night." This is seen to be true by reading Psa. cxxxvi. 8, 9:--

> "The sun to rule by day: for His mercy endureth for ever. the moon and the stars to rule by night: for His mercy endureth for ever."

The sun is mentioned six times in Genesis, and each reference has special relation to the covenant purpose of God. There is no ordinary every day reference to the sun in this book. The first mention is in Gen. xv. The sun is going down, and the darkness which follows is symbolical of Israel's night in Egypt. Gen. xix. 23 speaks of the sun's rising—here it is blessing. Lot enters Zoar and is safe. Again the sun sets. In Gen. xxviii. 11 Jacob has left his home, and becomes a stranger and a wanderer. In his sleep he has the vision of the steps up to heaven; here he receives the blessing and covenant of Abraham, and he calls the place Bethel. Gen. xxxii. 31 ends the night of wrestling, Jacob newly-named Israel passes over Penuel, the sun rises upon him and he is safe. The last reference is that which comes in Joseph's dream. The sun, the moon, and the eleven stars make obeisance to him, foreshadowing not only his own personal elevation to the throne of Pharaoh, but that of the Lord Jesus Christ at His second coming.

* * * * * * *

The number of times the Hebrew word kokab (star) occurs is 37, the Greek aster occuring 24, and astron 4.
Chammah (Hebrew "sun", "heat") occurs 6 times, cheres 3 times, and shemesh 118 times.
The Greek helios ("sun") occurs 30 times.

The symbolic meaning of the sun setting, and the sun rising may be gathered from such a passage as the following:--

> "Thy sun shall no more go down. . . . for the Lord shall be thine everlasting light" (Isa. lx. 20).
>
> "But unto you that fear My name, shall the Sun of righteousness arise with healing in His wings" (Mal. iv. 2).

When the Lord spoke to Job, He spoke of the "ordinances of heaven". Dr. Bullinger's metrical version of Job xxxviii. 31-33 reads:--

> "Canst thou bind fast the cluster Pleiades (seven stars)?
> Or, canst thou loosen (great) Orion's bands?
> Canst thou lead forth the Zodiac's monthly Signs (twelve)?
> Or, canst thou guide Arcturus and his sons (The Bear)?
> The statutes of the heavens: Know'st thou these?
> Didst thou set their dominion o'er the earth?"

The certainty of the "ordinances of the heavens" forms a basis for proclaiming the equal certainty of God's promises (see Jer. xxxi. 35-37, and xxxii. 20-26 which should be read).

The ordinary seasons of the year "seedtime and harvest", "summer and winter", are not the only seasons that are indicated in Gen. i. The word moed (seasons) means "an appointed time", and that there are such appointments in the purpose of the ages the Scripture abundantly prove.

Take Daniel's prophecy as an example. "At the time appointed the end shall be," (viii. 19; xi. 27, 29, 35). "A time" (xii. 7).

Gen. i. 14 says also, "let them be for signs." "The signs of heaven" according to Jer. x. 2 caused dismay among the heathen, and there are many indications that the signs of the heavens were originally understood by men. To set out the witness of the sun and the stars to prophetic truth would necessitate a volume. Such a volume is Dr. Bullinger's Witness of the Stars, of which a most useful abridgement may be found in the Companion Bible, Part I., Appendix 12. Psa. xix. is the great Scripture classic on this subject. It is divided into two main sections, the first dealing with the witness of the sun in the heavens, the name El (God) being used; in the second section the witness of the Word is the theme, and the name Jehovah (Lord) is used. There we read that the heavens are telling the glory of God without audible speech, and that their witness extends to the ends of the world. In these heavens the sun goes through his revolutions. Psa. cxlvii. 4 (R.V.) says:--

> "He telleth the number of the stars, He giveth them all their names."

Here is an inspired statement to the truth that God both numbered and named the stars. Some of these names are given in the Bible, others have come down from antiquity; many have been corrupted or lost. Ash, Cesil and Cimah (Arcturus, Orion, and Pleiades)

(Job ix. 9). Job xxxviii. 32 says, "Canst thou bring forth Mazzaroth in his season?" The margin gives it "the twelve signs". In the sign Virgo (the Virgin) is preserved the ancient name Tsemach ("The Branch"), a prophetic title of Christ as the virgin's seed, and many interesting prophecies still remain enshrined in the ancient star names that have come down to us.

A prophecy was handed down in the East that in the constellation of Coma (the desired one), a new star would appear at the birth of Him whom it foretold. Balaam prophesied concerning the appearance of a star in connection with a Sceptre.

> "There shall come forth a star at (or over) the inheritance of Jacob. And a sceptre shall rise out of Israel."

The wise men from the East were led by a star, the meaning of which they were perfectly certain.

The heavenly bodies are God's great pledge and timepiece. For signs of the One to come, and the things to come; for seasons or cycles of time, as indicated and measured by the movements of the heavenly bodies. To attempt to go further into this complex subject would carry this paper far beyond its intended limits. To those who feel desirous of investigating the subject more fully, we heartily recommend The Witness of the Stars by Dr. Bullinger.

The sign of the Lord's coming, referred to in Matt. xxiv., together with the darkening of the sun and moon, will doubtless come to mind. Also the quotation from Joel in Acts ii. 19, 20, together with parallels in the book of the Revelation will suggest further lines of study. For our immediate purpose it is sufficient that we have shown that the firmament, with its sun, moon and stars, are all a part of a great design not created for their own sakes, not created merely for their physical effects, but created and arranged in view of their testimony to the faithfulness of the great Purposer, and the fixedness of His great Purpose.

The Creation.--Man. (Gen. i. 26-31 and ii. 7). pp. 102-108

The work of the sixth day of creation commences in much the same way as do the other days, "Let the earth bring forth," but the record suddenly takes an individual and more personal character when the creation of man is described. For the first time a conference is indicated in the counsels of the Most High. "And God said, Let Us make man in Our image, after Our likeness." The Companion Bible refers this statement to the figure of Hendiadys, and suggests the reading, "In the likeness of Our image." Ten times in this chapter do we read of various parts of creation being made "after his kind", and now we have the marvellous statement quoted above. To the simple mind, this early introduction of plurality in the reference to the Persons of the Godhead is self-explanatory, and we do not feel that we are justified in embarking upon a series of controversial articles on this subject. The dispensational place of the creation of man is our more immediate concern. If we accept the rendering, "In the likeness of Our image," the first question that seems to demand an answer is, To what does this image refer? If we take the expression to have reference to the attributes of God, it hardly seems possible to draw a line and say, "From this point the likeness ceases." Man as created was neither Omnipotent, Omniscient, nor holy. The fact that man after the fall is spoken of as being the image and likeness of God (Gen. ix. 6; I Cor. xi. 7; James iii. 9), shows that we are not to look for the likeness on the moral plane. Yet it does appear a difficulty to think that man, physically, is the image of God, Who is Spirit. We must give heed for a while to the teaching of Scripture regarding Christ, and this will enable us to understand, at least in some degree of clearness, the meaning of Gen. i. 26.

Col. i. 15, 16 ascribes the creation of all things visible and invisible to "the Son of His (the Father's) love". It is written, "God is Spirit", "God, Whom no man hath seen, nor can see", and therefore from the first moment of creation the creature has needed a mediator. The supplemental title therefore, if we may use the expression, that follows in Col. i. 15, is that He Who is the image of the invisible God, is the firstborn of all creation. II Cor. iv. 4, in a different context, speaks of "the gospel of the glory of Christ Who is the image of God." If man therefore was made in the likeness of the image of God, he was made in the likeness of Christ, for He is the image of God. This places man upon the earth in a typical capacity. That the first man was a type of Christ is readily seen from Scripture. Take for example I Cor. xv. 45-47, "The first man Adam was made a living soul; the last Adam a life-giving spirit." "The first man is of the earth, earthy; the second man is the Lord from heaven." The passage immediately goes on to speak of the image of the earthy, and the image of the heavenly. There are some honoured teachers who believe that the creation of man in Gen. i. 26 refers to a totally different person from the man who was made out of the dust of the earth as recorded in Gen. ii. It is beyond question that the first man Adam is the one whose creation is recorded in Gen. i. 26, where the word "man" is in the Hebrew Adam. He is the first Adam. I Cor. xv. 45 says that it is written, "the first man Adam was made a living soul," but this is not written in Gen. i., but in Gen. ii., which links the two passages together. Rom. v. 14, under another aspect, tells us that Adam was a figure, or type, of Him that was to come. In both cases the type is eclipsed by the antitype. The true and last Adam is a bearer of glory and blessing that the first knew not of.

Something of the typical position of man is indicated in Gen. i. 26 by the words, "let them have dominion." Notice that the pronoun "them" is used four times. We are by no means limited to one man and one woman in this passage, although actually only one man and one woman were created. Mankind is viewed in this work of the sixth day, and not the individual of the species. We are told that man, unlike the other orders of creation, was created in the likeness of the image of God, that he was given dominion over the fish, the fowl, the cattle, all the earth, and every creeping thing. In chapter ii. we are told how God made man of the dust of the earth, and not only so, but when this took place, "in the day, etc.," verse 4. Verse 4 commences the first of the eleven generations that sub-divide the book of Genesis. "The generations of the heavens and the earth when they were created." When we read in Gen. v. 1, "This is the book of the generations of Adam," we are likewise given a definite time from which to start:--

> "In the day that God created man, in the likeness of God made He him; male and female created He them; and blessed them, and called their name Adam, in the day when they were created."

This man Adam, whose creation is recorded in Gen. i. 26, lived 130 years and had a son whose name is Seth. The Adam of Gen. i. and the Adam of Gen. ii. are therefore identical. The generations of Adam, of Noah, and of others, are their immediate descendants. This must be the meaning, however figuratively interpreted of the first reference, the generations of the heavens and of the earth.

Special attention is drawn in Gen. ii. 4, 5 to the fact that the creation of "every plant of the field" must be believed to have taken place "before it was in the earth," and "every herb of the field before it grew". This indicates that a great amount of detail is withheld from us in Gen. i. When we read, "Let the earth bring forth grass, the herb yielding seed," we are to remember that Gen. ii. 4, 5 tells us that a creative work had already been done. So when we read, "Let us make man", we are prepared to find that further details will be given of that which so vitally concerns ourselves. These details are given in Gen. ii. under the generations that there commence. Man was created in the image of God (Gen. i. 27), he was formed of the dust of the ground. The elements that enter into the composition of the herb, the tree, and the cattle, enter into the composition of man. The generic name for man, as well as the name of the first man, is Adam, for he was formed of the dust of the ground (adamah). Man is of the earth, earthy. But, one may interpose, "You forget that of Adam it is written, 'and man became a living SOUL,' a statement that is not said of the lower creatures in Gen. i." It is true that the word soul does not occur in the A.V. until the record concerning man is reached, but this is by reason of the power of tradition. The translators of our wonderful authorised version apparently believed that man was possessed of an immortal soul, and consequently, when they met the Hebrew words translated "living soul" in the passages that speak of animals and creeping things, they assigned to them a lower meaning; the ordinary reader is consequently at a serious disadvantage. A ray of light is shed from the margin of Gen. i. 30, where the reader will discover that the word "life" in the sentence, "everything that creepeth upon the earth, wherein is life," has the marginal note, "Hebrew, a living soul." This fact shatters the conception that man alone is a living soul, and with it goes the fabric of error that has grown up upon that fundamental falsehood.

In Gen. i. 20, 21, 24 and 30, the Hebrew word nephesh ("soul") is used of the lower orders of creation. In chapter ii. two words occur twice. When they have reference to man they are translated "a living soul", but when they have reference to animals they are translated "living creature". Out of the first thirteen times that nephesh occurs in Genesis, ten of these occurrences refer to animals. It is evident that the Apostle Paul, when writing to the Corinthians, had no idea that Gen. ii. 7 taught the immortality of man, for he uses this very passage to prove the reverse. In I Cor. xv. 44 he says, "It is sown a natural body, it is raised a spiritual body." We must bear in mind that the word "natural" is literally "soul-ical", if such a word is allowable (psuchikos). In this state it is "sown". The reader will observe that the "soul-ical" condition is also linked with corruption (42), "dishonour" and "weakness" (43). It is not a necessary, nor an illuminating interpretation that makes the "sowing" to mean the burial of the dead. Dead seed is not sown. The entry of man into this world is his "sowing". Since Adam's fall that sowing has introduced his children into corruption, dishonour, and weakness. The Apostle clinches his argument concerning the low estate of man by nature by referring to Adam himself, and not to Adam fallen, but Adam as he left the hands of his Maker, "and so it is written, the first man Adam was made a living soul, the last Adam a life-giving spirit". The first man is also "earth" in contrast to the second man who is "heavenly". After emphasizing the contrast between the "earthy" and the "heavenly", the Apostle concludes:--

> "And I say this, brethren, because flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God; neither doth corruption inherit incorruption."

It will be observed that Adam, as created and unfallen, is unfit for the kingdom of God. Man by nature is of the earth, independently of sin.

> "The soul of the flesh is in the blood. . . . an atonement for your souls; for it is the blood that maketh an atonement by reason of the soul" (Lev. xvii. 11, R.V.).

It is clear from this inspired reasoning that the "soul" is linked to "flesh and blood", and is in no sense "spiritual" in its nature. Indeed, "soul" is contrasted with "spirit". Heb. iv. 12 distinguishes between the two, as does I Cor. xv. 44. The "natural" man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God (I Cor. ii. 14).

In James iii. 15 we have the word psuchikos translated "sensual". "This wisdom descendeth not from above, but is earthly, sensual, demonical." The whole of the teaching of Scripture regarding the soul points to it as the sum of natural life. All that goes to make up the individual feelings, desires, and experiences of each living being is expressed under the Bible word "soul". Just as man became "a living soul", so he becomes at death "a dead soul" (Num. xix. 11, margin). Hunger, and the pleasures and functions of eating (Prov. vi. 30, xiii. 25, xix. 15, xxvii. 7), and all the natural enjoyments of this life (Eccles. ii. 24, margin, "delight his senses", Luke xii. 19) are attributes of the soul. One of the strangest series of passages, and a series whose testimony is as opposite to the ordinary conception of the soul as can be imagined, is that in which the O.T. associates it with the various organs of the body, these organs as it were in their functions making up the living soul. We will give a few examples:--

Gen. xlix. 6.	"O my soul. . . . Mine liver" (A.V. "honour").
Psa. xvi. 9.	"My hearth is glad, my liver (A.V. 'glory') rejoiceth."
Psa. xxxi. 9.	"Mine eye. . . . yea, my soul and my belly."
Prov. xiii. 25.	"Satisfying of his soul; but the belly of the wicked shall want."
Psa. xvi. 7.	"My kidneys" (A.V. "reins", Jer. xvii. 10).

The figurative use of the organs of the body are based upon a fact, namely, that the combined organism is the soul.

It is common mistake to speak of the soul of man as something separate from himself; Gen. ii. 7 does not say man became the possessor for the time of a living soul, but that man himself became a living soul. A living man is a living soul, a dead man is a dead soul, an immaterial independent "spiritual" something is not the "soul" of the Bible. The Hebrew word "soul" (nephesh) is closely related to the word "to breathe", which is naphach. Ex. xxiii. 12, "be refreshed", naphash, have time to breathe. The Hebrew word "nostril" is also similarly connected, aph meaning a breathing organ. Seeing the close connection that the inspired language makes between "soul", "breath", and "nostril", and having seen sufficient to dispose of the general teaching that the soul is synonymous with the spirit, we may be able to learn the lesson of man's lowly place from Gen. ii. 7, instead of finding there a God-breathed immortality. We have often heard the idea urged that the fact that God breathed into Adam must of necessity convey to Adam something of the Divine nature. "The breath" of life of Gen. ii. 7 is used in Josh. x. 40 ("utterly destroyed all that breathed") as an equivalent for "soul" in verse 37 ("utterly destroyed all the souls"). So also Josh. xi. 11, 14. Has it ever struck the reader that the "nostrils" are a strange entrance for immortality to enter into man? The fact that man is one whose "breath is in his nostrils" is used in the Scriptures to indicate his helplessness; if tradition were truth it would lend encouragement to the doctrine that man by nature is allied with the Godhead. Gen. ii. 7 gives no warrant for teaching that there was anything spiritual about Adam at all. As every other "soul" that was to become a "living soul", he breathed with (not "into", see usage of Hebrew preposition beth) his nostrils the breath of life, and man became a living soul (a "breather", nephesh). The passage does not say, "God breathed"; it says "he breathed", and the context alone can decide to whom the "he" refers.

We feel that it is essential, if we would not make a most fundamental error, to see the true nature of man at his creation. As a perfect man he was placed upon the earth, but the perfect man was "natural", not super-natural. He was "flesh and blood". He was innocent, nevertheless he was not righteous. His communion with God was that of an unfallen creature. All that is said of his surroundings were of a nature to attract "a living soul", the fruit trees good for food, the garden, etc., but nothing for the spirit. I Cor. xv. tells us that the spiritual was not first, that man as a living soul was not spiritual, he was earthy, and flesh and blood. A being that is not spiritual cannot have a spiritual fall. If he transgresses, his sin and his punishment must be within his own sphere. The death penalty threatened to Adam could not have been "spiritual death" unless Adam had a "spiritual" nature. The "spiritual" nature of man came after the fall, where faith and hope were called into exercise, where sacrifice and worship and longing for the new life began to take hold upon those who believed. Adam as created was placed at the head of physical creation. From this position he fell, and that position will be taken up with added glory by the Son of man when He comes again.

The Creation.—The Fall of Adam (Gen. iii.). pp. 132-136

The first dispensation (see Vol. VI., page 136) ends with the fall of Adam. There seems no reason to doubt but that this first dispensation was the briefest of all. A Rabbinical interpretation of Psa. xlix. 12 refers it to Adam, who "abode not a night", but who, on the tenth day from the commencement of the creation week, fell, thereby necessitating the day of atonement to be observe on the tenth day of the month. To read Gen. ii. 8-25 one is not impressed with a sense of a long period. The description given of the garden planted in Eden is limited to the trees, and the river that watered the garden. Of the many trees wherewith that garden was planted two only are given names. One is the tree of life, the other is the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, to eat of which meant death. Much has been written concerning this tree of knowledge of good and evil, and the penalty that followed transgression, yet much seems to be but the guesswork and imaginings of men, who have introduced into the subject themes that belong to another sphere. Adam was told not to eat of this tree, for in the day that he ate he should surely die. The word are simple, and were easy of comprehension. Something connected with the knowledge of good and evil involved death, just as the eating of some poisonous berry might have been prohibited for similar reasons. That God should plant a tree bearing such fruits is only explainable by the fact that He had a great purpose. We may safely assume that up to the time of eating of this tree neither Adam nor his wife had a knowledge of good and evil. Spiritual enjoyments and aspirations are never mentioned in relation to Adam before the fall. Adam, so far, lived in a realm of types and symbols. The true paradise of God with its river of life and tree of life was unrevealed, yet how many have spoken of Adam's shadow as though it were the true substance!

In considering the teaching of Scripture as to the purpose that God had in view, we must remember that there were already, unseen and probably unknown by man, fallen spirits. Gen. iii. 1 is proof enough of this. Scripture does not speak of the purpose of redemption as something which God had to bring in to remedy the evil introduced by Adam's disobedience. Redemption was planned before man was created, for Christ was foreordained as the Lamb before the foundation of the world. The great outstanding feature of the command to Adam is its simplicity. All that Adam has to do is to abstain. He is not under a law of positive precepts, the keeping of which involved a great care, labour, and watchfulness. He was under the easiest of conditions. Surrounded by everything that was good and pleasant, he simply had not to take of the forbidden tree. It was a passive obedience. Human nature was put upon the simplest of trials. Another feature of the trial it is important to remember is that no promise was attached to obedience. There is no alternative made to Adam. Some teach that had he continued obedient to the divine prohibition he would have been transferred to heaven and have received eternal life, but that is pure speculation. What was this knowledge the attaining of which was fraught with such consequences? The references to "good and evil" in this passage are four. Gen. ii. 9 and 17 speak of the tree itself, its position in the garden, and the prohibition regarding its fruit, Gen. iii. 5 and 22 speak of the consequences of eating of it: "Ye shall be as gods" (or God), and "Behold, the man is become as one of Us, to know good and evil". The tempter mingled truth with his lies at the beginning as he has done ever since. His lie was, "Ye shall not surely die". There was no lie in the words, "Ye shall be as gods (or God), knowing good and evil". That which was forbidden to Adam under pain of death is held out as a mark of spiritual growth in Heb. v. 14. The full-grown ones, the perfect, have their senses exercised to discriminate between good and evil. Whatever Adam may have done had no outside influence been brought to bear upon him is not a matter for us to speculate upon. Scripture records the introduction of an item that completely altered the whole aspect of the trial and its consequences. That item was the temptation by a wise and superior being, enforced by deception and guile. If we cannot recognize any alteration of the test by the introduction of this outside temptation we may also refuse to recognize any modification of the penalty, but we believe a little consideration will show that the introduction of an outside temptation made a very great difference. Think for a moment of the book of Job; Satan is allowed to test Job to the extreme, yet Job in the end receives double for his loss, and Satan has the mortification of knowing that by the record of the book of Job, there is on permanent record a classic example of how he overreached himself, and that out of intended evil God brought ultimate good. Such we believe is the case in connection with the fall of Adam. In the case of Job we are allowed a glimpse of the heavenly and invisible side of the history, a glimpse denied to Job himself. We are, however, allowed no such insight in the case of the temptation of Eve. With suddenness the tempter is introduced into the narrative of Scripture. "Now the serpent was more subtil than any beast of the field which the Lord God had made." He raises questionings regarding the will and word of God. He holds out the bait, "Ye shall be as gods" (or God); he lies by saying, "Ye shall not surely die". The woman was deceived, "the serpent beguiled Eve through his subtilty" (II Cor. xi. 3), "Adam was not deceived, but the woman being deceived was in the transgression". When Adam was asked by the Lord, "Hast thou eaten of the tree whereof I commanded thee that thou shouldest not eat?" Adam replied, "The woman whom Thou gavest to be with me, she gave me of the tree, and I did eat". We cannot believe that Adam was trifling. He stood in his shame before his God. We believe he truthfully stated his case. He was not deceived like his wife was, but went into sin out of attachment to the woman who had been given him. The Lord apparently accepted his reply, for He addressed the woman, "What is this that thou hast done?" The woman's reply also stated truthfully the case, "The serpent beguiled me and I did eat." No word of censure, no word of judgment is addressed to the guilty pair, but the curse is pronounced upon the serpent. Enmity also is pronounced as between the woman and the serpent, between her seed and his, and in the pronouncing of the serpent's sentence comes the first great Messianic promise, "it shall bruise thy head, and Thou shalt bruise his heel". Adam and Eve must have wondered at this first great exhibition of grace. The evil one had overreached himself. Intent upon accomplishing the downfall of man, his very temptation provided an opportunity for the exercise of mercy. To the woman who had sinned under the influence of deception, and whose action and invitation had involved Adam, the Lord says:--

> "I will greatly multiply thy sorrow and thy conception; in sorrow shalt thou bring forth children; and thy desire shall be unto thy husband, and he shall rule over thee."

Sorrow is the word that is most emphasized. It occurs again in the words spoken to Adam:--

> "Cursed is the ground for thy sake; in sorrow shalt thou eat of it all the days of thy life, thorns and thistles shall it bring forth to thee; and thou shalt eat the herb of the field; in the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread, till thou return unto the ground; for out of it wast thou taken; for dust thou art, and unto dust thou return."

Sorrow enters into creation together with sin and death. Yet the words which tell them of their sorrow, tell them that where sin abounded grace was to superabound. If Adam was to eat in sorrow, he was nevertheless to be spared to eat "all the days of his life". The death sentence is held back. As an outside spiritual force had entered into the case on the one side, an outside spiritual force shall enter into the other. If the serpent could not restrain himself, but must attempt to hasten man's ruin, the Lamb of God can step in and bring about His redemption. Already the great conflict that runs throughout the Scriptures has become apparent. Man, though responsible for his disobedience, was not entirely alone in the deed. He must suffer the wages of sin, but he shall learn before he returns to the dust "good and evil". As a living soul he had no exercise of faith, no patience of hope. As a fallen sinner, seeing on the one hand the "evil" of the serpent's motives, and the "good" of the Lord's provision, he might learn for his eternal welfare lessons which in his original state he was not capable of learning. The ways of God are wonderful, and altogether beyond us. Sin and sorrow and death are nevertheless beneath His sway. Adam commences a new experience. The creation around him becomes no more a delight. A curse rests upon it, never to be lifted until the last Adam comes as the life-giving spirit to deliver the groaning creation from its bondage of corruption. Adam's experiences become one lesson of good and evil. A spiritual conception is now a possibility. In a new life beyond the grave lies all the hope of man. Adam is prevented from further access to the tree of life. Life unto the ages can only be his now by virtue of the promised Seed, and the pledge of the redemption of creation and of man is found in the cherubim tabernacled at the east of the garden. So ends the first dispensation, the first step so far as the human race is concerned of the purpose of the ages.

It shows us man standing between the wiles of the serpent and the wisdom of God. The cherubim that are referred to constitute a great pledge of redemption, and were understood so to mean by those who first peopled the earth. We must consider something of their message in our next article before we go on to the section which covers the period from the fall to the flood.

The Cherubim (Gen. iii. 24).
The hope of Creation.
pp. 164-167

Gen. iii. is a complete section of Scripture, as its wonderfully complete structure shows. We do no more here, however, than call attention to the opening and closing members. The chapter opens with the "serpent" and closes with the "cherubim". The serpent is connected with the tree of knowledge of good and evil, the cherubim with the tree of life. The serpent is the medium of a supernatural tempter, the cherubim, afterward described as comprised of animal and human forms, are always associated with the Divine presence and purpose. The fact that the structure of Gen. iii. puts the serpent and the cherubim in correspondence should make us consider what the parallelism teaches. There is a passage in Ezekiel xxviii. that will throw light upon the subject. Ezekiel's prophetic lamentation upon the king of Tyrus uses language that goes beyond the possibilities of any human king.

> "Thus saith the Lord God; Thou sealest up the sum (thou art the finished pattern), full of wisdom and perfect in beauty. Thou hast been in Eden the garden of God. . . . thou art (wast) the anointed cherub that covereth; and I have set thee so: thou wast upon the holy mountain of God; thou hast walked up and down in the midst of the stones of fire. Thou wast perfect in thy ways from the day that thou wast created, till iniquity was found in thee" (verses 12-19).

We believe that this passage can find its fulfillment in but one person – Satan. As a fallen being he is introduced into the narrative of Gen. iii. He had, by then, been deprived of his character of the covering cherub, and after the fall of Adam the cherubim appear—this time a combination of symbols taken from the six days' creation. "By pride fell the angels". Lucifer, son of the morning, said,

> "I will ascend into heaven, I will exalt my throne above the stars of God. . . . I will be like the Most High" (Isa. xiv. 12-14).

Here, the king of Babylon is linked with this supernatural being, like the king of Tyrus was in Ezek. xxviii. His temptation to man was along similar lines, "Ye shall be as God".

It would seem from a due consideration of these things that into the place forfeited by Satan, the cherubim of Gen. iii. were placed. It appears from Ezekiel that one of the functions of the cherubim was to "cover". Heb. ix. 5 speaks of "the cherubim of glory shadowing the mercy seat", and I Kings viii. 7 tells "the cherubim covered the ark", showing that this was in some measure continued. The cherubim occur in the symbolism of the Tabernacle and of the Temple (Exod. xxv. 18-22; xxxvi. 35; I Kings vi. 23-29). They are specially connected with God's dwelling place (I Sam. iv. 4; II Kings xix. 15; I Chron. xiii. 6; Psa. lxxx. 1; xcix. 1; Isa. xxxvii. 16), and throne (Ezek. i. and x.).

The description given of the living creatures in Ezek. i. is the description of the cherubim (see x. 20). Ezekiel tells us that they had "the likeness of a man" (i. 5). They had four faces, and one was the face of a man, one of a lion, one of an ox, and one of an eagle (i. 10). These cherubim are seen under the throne, which had the appearance of a sapphire stone, and upon the likeness of the throne was the likeness as the appearance of a man above upon it. The cherubim are particularly connected in Ezekiel with the purposes of God pertaining to Israel. The departing, and the returning glory (iii. 23 and xliii. 2) is associated with them. The living creatures of the book of the Revelation (wrongly called "beasts") are likewise associated with the throne, the glory and with Israel, and also, forming a link with Genesis, the living creatures are closely associated with creation. The serpent is judged and set aside, while the cherubim are placed to preserve the way of the tree of life. The long line of redemptive purposes, passing from Eden to the Tabernacle, from the Tabernacle to the Temple of Solomon, from the desecrated Temple of the Captivity to the Temple yet to be, is definitely linked with the cherubim. Man had dominion over the cattle, the beast of the field, and the fowl of the air. These are all represented in the cherubim. The sea and its inhabitants do not figure in these symbols, and stand rather as types of evil. The pledge that God's purpose in creation should stand was given at the east of the garden of Eden.

In Gen. iii. 24 the word translated "placed" is literally, "to dwell as in a tabernacle". The fire that turned every way, represents the same word as used in Ezek. i. 4, "infolding itself"; the word "keep" means to preserve. Gen. iii. 24 therefore may read:--

> "And He tabernacled (between) the cherubim at the east of the garden of Eden, and a fierce fire infolding itself to preserve the way of the tree of life."

The cherubim foreshadow the great work of Christ in its redemptive aspect. The way of the tree of life has been preserved. Man fallen and undone as he is need not be hopeless, for even Adam and Eve had this blessed symbol and tabernacle of hope before them, telling of a day when this groaning creation shall enter into the liberty of the glory of the children of God. The dark ending of the first dispensation is illuminated by promise and hope. Every succeeding dispensation partakes of this character. This earth, cursed for Adam's sake, ceases to be his rest or his hope. Over the darkness and death of creature failure grace has triumphed. No longer surrounded by everything that was good for food and pleasant to the eyes (which require no spirituality to appreciate), Adam and Eve are turned into the world outside of the garden, to walk by faith, to worship by faith, to live by faith (in short, a spiritual experience had become a possibility), and are pointed to the only escape from the effects of disobedience.

Truly, the Lord overruled the tempter's designs for good, and while by no means condoning sin, did of His own rich grace provide a Saviour. As in our case:--

"He commanded light to shine out of darkness."

"The Last Word."

"A man's heart deviseth his way, but the Lord directeth his steps."

"The lot is cast into the lap; but its every decision is of the Lord."

While many of the Lord's children are blessedly and fully blessed in Christ, they do not always enjoy those blessings as they might. One of the causes that is at the root of much disappointment is the failure to realize the Lord's purpose, and consequently failure to arrange one's life in conformity with it. Failure to understand the gracious purpose of God leads to making plans and schemes that can never be fulfilled. How blessed it is, however, having seen the purpose of the Lord, to so direct one's plan in life that those plans may be graciously blessed and established.

With the object of bringing such a thought before our readers, we draw attention to Proverbs xvi. 1-9:--

Structure of Proverbs xvi. 1-9.

A | a | -1. The plans of man.
b | -1. The final decree of the Lord.
B | c | 2-. The ways of man.
d | -2. The spirit weighed by the Lord.
C | e | 3-. Roll works unto the Lord.
f | -3. Thy plans shall be established.
C | e | 4-. All things made for that final decree.
f | -4. Even the lawless one.
B | d | 5. The wicked punished by the Lord.
c | 6-8. The ways that please.
A | a | 9-. Man's heart deviseth.
b | -9. The Lord directeth.

A little revision is necessary to enable the reader to obtain the true message. Verse 1, "preparations" = plans; "answer" = the final decree, or, as The Companion Bible says it may be rendered , "the last word". Verse 3, "commit" = roll; "thoughts" = plans. Verse 4, "for himself" = same word and meaning as "answer" of verse 1.

The meaning of the passage is better expressed therefore as follows:--

"To man (pertain) the plans of his heart, but from the Lord comes the last word."

Verse 2 warns that conscience of itself is no safe guide in the making of our plans, verse 3 and 4 continue:--

"Roll thy works unto the Lord, and thy plans shall be established." The Lord hath made all things with regard to His last word, yea even a lawless one for the day of evil."

The Lord, then, has no delight in frustrating our plans. When we begin to "roll our works" in His direction, then, our plans will also be crowned with success. Nothing is outside this final decree. The wicked as the righteous can go so far and no more. Verse 9, which completes the structure, balances the true interpretation of verse 1, and verse 33 emphasizes it. Oh for eyes to see His purpose, then for hearts to plan along His way, for works directed toward Himself, and a continual and grateful recognition that "the last word" must always come from the Lord.

Proverbs xvi. 1-9 (KJV).

1. The preparations of the heart in man, and the answer of the tongue, is from the Lord.
2. All the ways of a man are clean in his own eyes; but the Lord weigheth the spirits.
3. Commit thy works unto the Lord, and thy thoughts shall be established.
4. The Lord hath made all things for himself: yea, even the wicked for the day of evil.
5. Every one that is proud in heart is an abomination to the Lord: though hand join in hand, he shall not be unpunished.
6. By mercy and truth iniquity is purged: and by the fear of the Lord men depart from evil.
7. When a man's ways please the Lord, he maketh even his enemies to be at peace with him.
8. Better is a little with righteousness than great revenues without right.
9. A man's heart deviseth his way: but the Lord directeth his steps.

Verse 33: The lot is cast into the lap; but the whole disposing thereof is of the Lord.

Studies in the Epistles of the Mystery.

The Blessings of the Son (Eph. i. 7-12).
The Inheritance and the Prior Hope.
(A new light upon a much debated theme).
pp. 17-21

The third blessing particularized in this series is that of inheritance. This inheritance is directly linked with the glorious sphere of blessing brought to light in verse 10. In Him, the One Who heads up all things in the dispensation of the fulness of the seasons, in that One also we have obtained an inheritance. The R.V. reads, "We were made a heritage". Rotherham reads, "We were taken as an inheritance". It will be seen that the A.V. speaks of our obtaining an inheritance, while the R.V. speaks of our being made a heritage—presumably for the Lord Himself (see verse 18).

In I Sam. xiv. 41 the Septuagint uses this word in relation to the casting of lots, "And Saul and Jonathan were taken", i.e., were taken by lot. The primary idea in the word translated "inheritance" is something taken by lot. Israel as distinct from the nations are spoken of not only as receiving an inheritance, but of being an inheritance. "But the Lord hath taken you. . . . to be unto Him a people of inheritance" (Deut. iv. 20); "For the Lord's portion is His people; Jacob is the lot of His inheritance" (Deut. xxxii. 9). By a special decree, the tribe of Levi and the priestly family of that tribe had no inheritance in the land.

> "And the Lord spake unto Aaron, Thou shalt have no inheritance in their land, neither shalt thou have any part among them. I am thy part and thine inheritance among the children of Israel" (Numb. xviii. 20).

In the future restored kingdom of Israel this will still hold good (see Ezek. xliv. 28). The passage in Eph. i. 11, if read in the light of God's dealings with His earthly people, seems to take a more definite shape. The first thought is not that we have obtained an inheritance, but that we have been taken by the Lord to be His heavenly inheritance. Verse 18 records the prayer that we might know what is the riches of the glory of His inheritance in the saints. Surely there can be no honour, no heritage so great, there can be no glory so high, as that of being the Lord's heritage. To the most favoured tribe of Israel God did not give even an equal inheritance in the land, He deprived them rather, and gave them in a special sense their heritage in Himself. To the most favoured of all those companies that are outside the commonwealth of Israel the Lord has not given an inheritance so much, as He has glorified them in making them His inheritance. What can we covet more than being able to say in the language of the faithful Shulamite, "My Beloved is mine, and I am His?"

God has described the very stones that form the foundation of the New Jerusalem. We know its measurement; we can picture its street of gold, and its gates of pearl, but where is there in the Prison Epistles any attempt to describe the "inheritance of the saints in the light"? It is a present glory to know that we have been taken to constitute His inheritance, just as the parallel tells us that the church of the one body is the fulness of Him that filleth all in all.

At this point predestination re-appears. The first passage (verse 5) deals with our being "placed as sons", which by comparison with the opening verses of Gal. iv. is made parallel to being recognized as the heirs. In verse 11 we find that predestination has settled the high glory of that chosen company. The "placing as sons" was "according to the good pleasure of His will, to the praise of the glory of His grace, wherein He highly favoured us in the Beloved." The "taking for a heritage" was "according to the purpose of Him Who worketh all things after the counsel of His own will, that we should be to the praise of His glory, who first hoped in Christ."

That there is a close parallel between verses 5, 6, and 11, 12 the most casual reading will show. A more attentive consideration will throw light upon a vexed question. The words of the A.V., "first trusted," are corrected in the R.V. to "before hope," "a state of prior expectancy." Some view the passage as referring to Israel, e.g.:--

> "This is a proper characteristic, or distinguishing mark of the Jews. They had the promises of the Messiah" (Chandler quoted by Dr. Macknight).

Others have taught (and we ourselves were included in this company for a time), that those who had "a prior hope" were the members of the one body, whose hope will be realized before the hope of Israel, etc. In the one interpretation, the word pro refers to the act of hoping, in the other, of the effect of that hope in the future. A writer quoted in Things to Come for August, 1915, says:--

> "A Greek Concordance will show that the preposition pro, when in composition, invariably attaches to the verb of which it is the prefix, and never has reference to the effect produced by such verb."

If this be the case, and the Concordance gives much weight to the remark, then "the prior hope" must refer to the act of "hoping before", and not to being called into a company whose hope is to take place before the hopes of other companies are realized. The reader may feel that with such a contradictory set of statements—all made by those who reverence and love God's Word—the hope of arriving at a satisfactory conclusion is rather uncertain.

We drew attention above to the close parallel that exists between the statements of verses 5, 6 and 11, 12. This parallel we believe will provide the solution of the difficulty, and emphasize the glory of the calling that has taken us to be "His inheritance."

Let us look at the parallel verses.

5, 6.	A		Predestinated as children.
		B	According to good pleasure of His will.
			C To praise of glory of His grace.
			D Highly favoured in the Beloved.
11, 12.	A		Predestinated as inheritance.
		B	According to purpose. . . . will.
			C To praise of His glory.
			D Who pre-hoped in Christ.

It will be seen at a glance that the passage in question is echoed by the words, "Wherein He hath highly favoured (A.V. accepted) us in the Beloved." Before taking this further, it will be necessary to consider the little word pro, translated in the A.V. "first" and in the R.V. "before". In both renderings the idea of time seems prominent. Pro in composition may indicate, before of place, time, or preference. Romans iii. 9 is an instance of the third meaning, "Are we better than they" (proechomai). Rom. xii. 10 is another, "In honour preferring one another." Being guided by the structure (members D. D.) we are led to see that the emphasis is not so much on time, or place, as in the greatness of the favour bestowed. This secondary use in common to English also. We speak of "a prior engagement," but we also speak of "a Prior," meaning one next in dignity to an Abbot. The nearest approach we can get to the meaning of the passage before us, as guided by the words used and the direction of the structure, is to translate tous proelpikotas, "those who have a prior hope," meaning by the prior hope the exalted and high dignity which pertains to those who have been so "highly favoured in the Beloved" as to be made the members of His body, the church of the dispensation of the mystery, the fulness of Him that filleth al in all, and His inheritance.

This view of the passage makes no reference to those who, being Jews, had hoped in Messiah before the Gentiles, and does not necessarily say anything as to whether this hope will be realized before all others (although we believe such will be the case), but the outstanding thought is priority in dignity, excellence, and exaltation. Eph. ii. 6, 7 echoes the call to praise with which Eph. i. 12 concludes, and for similar reasons.

> "And hath raised us up together, and made us sit together in the heavenlies in Christ Jesus, that in the ages to come He might show the exceeding riches of His grace in His kindness toward us through Christ Jesus."

May we, in contemplating this high calling, remember the praise that is due.

The Blessings of the Spirit (Eph. i. 13, 14). The Seal, the Earnest, the Redemption. pp. 49-52

The blessings that have been before us in the papers that have dealt with Eph. i. 1-12, have had as their basis the purpose of the Father carried to fruition by the work of the Son. To remind ourselves of this will not be waste of time. Eph. i. 4 tells us that the purpose of the Father was, among other things, "that we should be holy and without blame". The work of the Son accomplishes this, for > "Christ loved the church and gave Himself for it. . . . that He might present it to Himself a glorious church, not having spot or wrinkle, or any such thing; but that it should be holy and without blemish" (v. 25-27).

To understand the true place of the passage now before us, we should turn for a moment to Col. i. There in verse 22 we read:--

> "In the body of His flesh through death, to present you holy and unblameable and unreproveable in His sight."

There we have, as the outcome of the Father's grace (Col. i. 12, 13) and the Son's redemption, our inalienable position. We have been "made meet", just as we have been highly favoured in the Beloved, and nothing we can do or fail to do can alter this standing in Christ. Nevertheless, Col. i. 23 immediately proceeds with an if. It is not the ordinary "if", it is modified a little, and may be rendered, "if at least", or "if indeed". It will not be true, however, to take away the meaning "if" altogether. Verse 23 leads on to verse 28, where we reach its true import. The work of Christ, without any conditional stedfastness on our part, assures the presentation of verse 22. Verse 28 has something more in view, "that we may present every man perfect in Christ Jesus". How can Paul hope to present any one perfect in Christ Jesus? Can he hope to improve upon the holiness and unblameableness of verse 22? Verse 23 onward steps into the sphere of the believer's responsibility.

As in Philippians ii., here we see the outworking of salvation. It has reference to continuing in the faith, not simply by believing, of not being moved away from the hope, not simply hoping; it has relation to the sufferings of Paul, sufferings that could never take away one sin, or render even the sufferer himself acceptable before God. Yet Paul speaks of these afflictions as being "that which is behind of the afflictions of Christ", which he, Paul, suffered in his flesh "for the church". To the same effect is II Tim. ii. 10-12:--

> "Therefore I endure all things for the elect's sake, that they may also obtain the salvation which is in Christ Jesus WITH EONIAN GLORY. . . . if we endure we shall also reign with Him."

The apostle emphasizes the hope, the hope of the glory (Col. 1. 23, 27), in connection with this phase of truth. The presentation of every man perfect that was in the Apostle's heart, has reference to the walk here, the endurance, the fellowship with His sufferings, the learning obedience by the things suffered, the attaining unto the "reigning with Him", the "prize of the high calling", the "crown of righteousness". This subject in relation to the word "perfect" finds further exposition in the series, The Hope and the Prize, now running, but so much has been necessary to enable us to appreciate in some measure the teaching of Eph. i. 12-14.

The Spirit seals, and gives the earnest. He bridges the interval up to the day of redemption.

The following arrangement may help us in studying this passage.

Eph. i. 12-14.

A | Doxology for the work of Christ.
B | The exalted position of our hope.
C | Hearing. \ Faith.
D | Believing. /
C | Sealing. \ Hope.
D | Earnest. /
B | The purchased possession.
A | Doxology for the witness of the Spirit.

There is no need for the italicised word "trusted", nor for the word "after", as given in the A.V. of verse 13. The passages reads:--

> "In Whom ye also, upon hearing the word of truth, the gospel of your salvation; in Whom also, upon believing ye were sealed with that Holy Spirit of promise, Who is an earnest of our inheritance, unto redemption of the purchased possession, unto praise of His glory."

In the section governed by the Spirit, we read of "hearing the word" and of "believing". The truth mentioned here is not truth in general, not even the whole truth of Scripture, it is specifically "the word of the truth, the gospel of your salvation". The practical bearing of the truth, the special truth preached by the apostle Paul as minister of the One Body, is well seen by noticing all the references in Ephesians. They are i. 13, iv. 21, 24, 25, v. 9, vi. 14. It will be seen that every reference is in a practical setting. Some may say, chapters iv., v., and vi. are practical, but chapter i. is in the doctrinal section. This is so, but we have already pointed out that of the threefold blessings described in chapter i., those under the Spirit have reference to the practical outworking of the truth. It will make this fact more illuminating if we show the arrangement of the references.

Truth.

A | i. 13. The word of truth. Gospel of your salvation.
B | a | iv. 21. Taught. Truth in Jesus. "Put off."
b | iv. 24. New man. Righteousness and holiness of truth.
a | iv. 25. Speak truth. "Put away."
b | Children of light. Goodness, righteousness, truth.
A | vi. 14. The girdle of truth. "Work out" (A.V. "having done all").

To have heard this truth, to have believed this truth, to have been created anew, and taught of God, this, is being sealed with the Holy Spirit of promise. That this sealing is directly connected with the reception and outworking of the truth taught in Ephesians, is proved by a further reference to chapter iv. Following the exhortation concerning the truth in verses 21-25, comes a practical exposition of it, in works (28), and words (29), and then, "grieve not the Holy Spirit of God, whereby ye are sealed unto the day of redemption". The three terms that head our article are borrowed from the market place. The buyer puts down the earnest money, a deposit, thereby securing the goods. They are then sealed to show the new ownership, and await the day of full possession. In the passage before us, the believer is sealed, and the Holy Spirit of the promise becomes the earnest of the believer's inheritance. Some prefer to translate the passage, "the promise Holy Spirit". The Holy Spirit is here seen as the Spirit of the promise, rather than the promised Spirit. The promise is future in its fulfillment. The "Holy Spirit" is amplified by the "earnest", and the "promise" by the "purchased possession".

The redemption that is here mentioned is not referring to the redemption which brings the deliverance from trespasses (i. 7), it has in view the redemption of an inheritance. Students of Scripture will be familiar with the story of Ruth, where Boaz as kinsman-redeemer redeems the forfeited inheritance of Naomi. Eph. i. 14 must be read in the light of this Biblical custom. The inheritance is not yet ours, but we have the earnest, the O.T. "surety" (see LXX of Gen. xliv.). It is a possession to be entered when our exalted hope is realized. To this Titus ii. 13, 14 directs our view:--

> "Looking for that blessed hope, and the manifestation of the glory of our great God and Saviour Jesus Christ, Who gave Himself for us, that He might redeem us from all iniquity (the redemption of Eph. i. 7) and purify unto Himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works" (the purchased possession).

From this flows the great unfolding that occupies the remainder of the chapter. The apostle would that these believers should know the riches of the glory of His inheritance in the saints, and the hope of His calling. May it be ours to receive an abundant answer to the Apostle's prayers.

The Prayer; its Introduction. (Eph. i. 15-23). pp. 81-84

The great threefold basis of the dispensation of the mystery has now been reviewed. We have traced the purpose of the Father being carried into effect by the work of the Son, and being sealed and secured by the pledge of the Spirit.

The apostle introduces as his next theme a prayer for those who have "like precious faith", and it is to the study of this wonderful prayer that we now address ourselves.

The prayer seems to divide itself first of all into two themes, viz.:--

A | 15. Faith according to you (kath' humas).
B | 16-19-. Revelation concerning Christ and His inheritance.
A | -19, 20. Faith according to resurrection power (kata ten energeian).
B | -20-23. Revelation concerning Christ and His body.

The passage opens with the word "Wherefore". The words that are thus translated are dia touto, which may be rendered "on this account". It is evident therefore that the prayer we are about to consider is directly related to the subject of verses 3-14. Possibly the connection will be more manifest as we go on, but verse 14, with its reference to the inheritance, supplies part of the basis for the apostle's prayer.

"On this account", because The Father has chosen you in Christ before the overthrow of the world, because the Son has redeemed you and taken you for an inheritance, because your hope places you in the highest rank (the fore-hopers), because the Spirit is the seal and the earnest until the day of complete acquisition, for this cause I pray.

There is a two-fold reason, however, for the apostle's prayer, not only because of the grace just referred to, but also because that grace had been received and that truth believed, "After I heard of your faith in the Lord Jesus". The faith here referred to is the same that is spoken of in verse 13, where it is related to "the word of truth, the gospel of your salvation". Here, in verse 15, their faith is said to be "in the Lord Jesus". It is a title that Paul uses on several occasions, Rom. x. 9; II Cor. iv. 14; Gal. vi. 17; Phil. ii. 19; Col. iii. 17 being some of the references. The title seems to imply a great love to the Lord, a desire to honour that name which once was despised and which was connected with His lowliness and suffering. It is essentially a resurrection title. To believe that Jesus is LORD is to believe that He rose from the dead. These Ephesian saints had this faith. Moreover, it was the faith that characterized all the members of the one body.

> "Wherefore, I, too, hearing of the faith which relates to you in the Lord Jesus, and that which is for all the saints."

There is sufficient evidence, we feel, to warrant the omission of the word "love" from this verse. The faith which was according to them, was also that which "all the saints" shared. There is such a thing as "the unity of the faith", and such forms the basis for the apostle's prayer. "The saints" whose faith is mentioned in verse 15, are the saints in whom the Lord has His inheritance in verse 18. If the faith of verse 15 is that which characterizes "all the saints", so is the second great prayer of Ephesians (iii. 14-21)—the comprehension of what is depth, length, breadth and height is only possible as entered into "with all saints".

The apostle mingled praise with his prayers. For all that grace had wrought he says, "blessed be God"; he obeyed the precept given to others, "with thanksgiving let your requests be made known to God". He tells us also that "without ceasing" he prayed for these believers. This ceaseless ministry of intercession is referred to in Col. i. 9, "For this cause we also. . . . do not cease to pray for you." The context of this passage has many points of resemblance with Eph. i. 15, 16. The hope is prominent, the inheritance of the saints is there, the exalted position of Christ "far above all" is repeated. In II Tim. i. 3; Rom. i. 9; and I Thess. i. 2, 3, ii. 13 we read:--

> "I thank God. . . . that without ceasing I have remembrance of thee in my prayers night and day."
>
> "For God is my witness. . . . that without ceasing I make mention of you always in my prayers."
>
> "We give thanks to God always for you all, making mention of you in our prayers, remembering without ceasing your work of faith."
>
> "For this cause also thank we God without ceasing."

and so it is that this consistent and conscientious minister could write to the churches:--

> "Pray without ceasing, in everything give thanks" (I Thess. v. 17, 18).

Most of us find the stress of things at times is apt to crowd out prayer and thanksgiving for other saints, yet this apostle, upon whom came the burden of all the churches, could "pray without ceasing". We who envy him his gifts might be better occupied in practicing his graces.

With these two verses the prayer itself is introduced. Like the parallel prayer in chapter iii. it is addressed to the Father. In i. 17 it is to "the God of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of glory", in iii. 14 it is to "the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ".

It may be wise, before going into the prayer itself, to notice, by way of comparison, the special burden of its petition:--

Eph. i. 15-23.	and	Eph. iii. 14-21.
THE PRAYERS ARE ADDRESSED TO
The God of our Lord Jesus Christ.	|	The Father of our Lord Jesus Christ.
THAT HE MAY GIVE
A spirit of wisdom and revelation.	|	Strength by His Spirit in the inner man.
THAT YE MAY KNOW
What Christ has been made to you.	|	What Christ may be in you.
BOTH SPEAK OF SOMETHING "EXCEEDING" (HYPERBALLON).
"Exceeding" power wrought in Christ.	|	"Exceeding" love of Christ.
THE MEANS MAY BE SUMMARIZED AS
We in Christ.	|	Christ in us.
THE POWER IS
The energy (energeia) of Christ.	|	The energy (energeõ) in us.
THE MIGHT (ischus) IS
The might exhibited in the resurrection.	|	The might necessary to understand.
THE GOAL IS IN EACH CASE
The fulness.	|	The fulness.
THE HEAVENLY POWERS ARE MENTIONED.
Every name that is named.	|	Every family in heaven and earth is named.

This is not put forth as exhaustive, or in anything like regular sequence, it aims rather at giving a comparison.

In the first prayer the believer is directed to the work and glory of Christ for him, and to view himself in Christ, whereas the prayer of chapter iii. speak of the inner man, and of Christ dwelling in the heart by faith. The first prayer declares the one body to be "the fulness", whereas the second prayer prays "that ye might be filled with all the fulness of God."

The prayers of the apostle Paul would be of the greatest interest to the believer, in whatever way they might be found or handed down, but when God includes those prayers in His inspired Word, and moreover, when we think of the exceedingly limited space occupied by the prison epistles, then these prayers must make petition for vital things, petition which should form the basis for the prayers of all members of the one body, and prayers which bring into prominence the doctrines concerning which it is most necessary that the believer should have a full knowledge.

The Prayer; its Threefold Preparation (Eph. i. 15-23). pp. 113-117

The apostle, in verses 17 and 18, gives us the threefold preparation for which he prayed on behalf of the saints. This threefold preparation comprises first, a spirit of wisdom, secondly, of revelation, and thirdly, of enlightened eyes. This petition he makes to "the God of our Lord Jesus Christ, THE FATHER OF THE GLORY". It is certainly true that these words may mean "the glorious Father", but we must remember that in scripture the word "father" carries a somewhat wider meaning than it usually does in English. Gen. iv. 20, 21 will illustrate this wider meaning. In II Cor. i. 3 we read of the Father of mercies, and in James i. 17 of the Father of lights. In each case there is a strong reason in the context for this usage. In II Cor. i. the Father of mercies is also the God of all comfort, and from Him alone can true consolation flow. In James i. the reader is warned against attributing any temptation to sin unto the Lord, He is the Father of lights, and only good gifts can come from Him. So in Eph. i., God is the Father of the glory. He it is Who provides it, and holds it in hope for us. To Him therefore the apostle prays, that He may grant us to know what is the riches of the glory of His inheritance. Before this can be possible, however, a spiritual preparation is necessary, and this forms the first part of the apostle's prayer.

> "That the God of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of glory, may give you a spirit of wisdom and revelation in full knowledge of Him (the eyes of your heart having been enlightened), that you may know, etc."

Gen. iv. 21. And his brother's name was Jubal: he was the father of all such as handle the harp and organ.
22. And Zillah, she also bare Tubalcain, an instructer of every artificer in brass and iron: and the sister of Tubalcain was Naamah.

Do we realize the great importance of spiritual wisdom? In our many petitions does the prayer for wisdom find a place? Solomon, when he chose wisdom, received signal manifestations of the Lord's pleasure. The place of wisdom is emphasized in such passages as, "Happy is the man that findeth wisdom" (Prov. iii. 13); "Get wisdom, get understanding" (iv. 5); "Wisdom is the principal thing. . . . get wisdom" (iv. 7); "Wisdom is better than rubies" (viii. 11). When we remember that it is used in relation to Christ, we see still more its importance; Christ is not only the power of God unto salvation, but the wisdom of God after salvation.

> "But of Him are ye in Christ Jesus, Who of God is made unto us wisdom, as well as (a free rendering of the presence of the particle, te) righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption" (I Cor. i. 30).

Wisdom is connected with our walk, "See then that ye walk circumspectly, not as fools, but as wise" (Eph. v. 15); "Walk in wisdom to them that are without" (Col. iv. 5). While Eph. i. prays for a spirit of wisdom in order to know the deeper things pertaining to our calling, Col. i. 9 prays for "wisdom and spiritual understanding" in order that such may "walk worthy of the Lord unto all pleasing". The two subjects are not so far removed from one another as they may appear. To none but those who were "perfect" could the apostle speak of the "hidden wisdom" in I Cor. ii., and to none will be revealed the full glories of our calling but to those who seek by grace to walk worthy of it. As it was said of old, "then shall we know if we follow on to know", so it is to-day. When God saved us, the riches of His grace abounded towards us (Eph. i. 7, 8), but when He reveals the mystery of His will, it is with all wisdom and prudence.

There is a fact relating to the usage of the word wisdom which is worth recording. The word occurs nine times in the prison epistles, but is only found in the epistles that speak of Christ as the Head, and which tell of His fulness. In the three passages n Ephesians where wisdom occurs, we find knowledge and the mystery mentioned also. (See i. 8, 9, 17, and iii. 10). Wisdom differs from knowledge. Wisdom has reference to the capacity to make good use of knowledge, the ability to discern. How much we need this, how seldom we seek it! Not only does the apostle pray for wisdom as a preparation to full knowledge, but he prays for revelation. There is no ambiguity about the word used here. It is the same as that used by the apostle when he claimed to have been given the dispensation of the mystery, "by revelation He made known to me the mystery" (Eph. iii. 3), or when he claimed to have received the gospel "by the revelation of Jesus Christ" (Gal. i. 12). It does not mean that to each believer is given a revelation in order to add to inspired truth—no further "revelation" in that direction is warranted—but it means that a revelation is needed before we can understand what has already been written. Not a few of our readers will agree to this fact. To them, as to the writer, many passages of Scripture were read and re-read; their meaning, so far as the human side was concerned, was plain, but we read as it were through a veil; this, God alone can do. The moment we realize this, we shall cease to wonder why so many of our friends "cannot see" that which is so plain to us. Israel, when they read the Scriptures, have a veil over their hearts, even though the original Hebrew may present no difficulties to them. We can plainly see that the O.T. points to the Lord Jesus Christ; they, however, do not see this; the veil has not been removed from their hearts (II Cor. iii.). Tradition forms a thick veil, and covers the eyes of many. The unveiling that is prayed for is "in the knowledge of Him". Epignosis means "full of knowledge", used much, though not exclusively, in reference to the mystery. It would not only be failure of perception, but disloyalty not to point out that the word "knowledge" does not stand alone, it is in the full knowledge of HIM. A loveless, Christless knowledge "puffeth up", but "this is aionian life, that they might know Thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ, Whom Thou hast sent" (John xvii. 3).

The second prayer in Ephesians (iii. 14-21), has in it the petition "to know even that which surpasses knowledge—the love of Christ". The apostle, in the height of his faithful ministry, and even after he had received so many revelations of inspired truth, tells us that his heart's prayer still was, "that I may know Him" (Phil. iii. 10). The unity of the faith is given as "the full knowledge of the Son of God" (Eph. iv. 13). The somewhat parallel prayer in Col. i. prays that we may be "filled with a full knowledge of His will" and increase "in the full knowledge of God". In this full knowledge the believer is "renewed after the image of Him Who created Him" (Col. iii. 10). It is important to "know" the original language of inspired truth, it is helpful to "know" the many branches of learning that go to comprise "Divinity", but to "know Him" glorifies such lower attainments, and to fail to "know Him" writes across such scholarship Ichabod. Said the apostle, "though I understand all mysteries, and all knowledge. . . . and have not love I am nothing." He could have said instead, "and know not Christ", with equal truth.

There is a difference of opinion as to whether the pronoun "Him" in this verse refers to the Father of glory, or to Christ. Tracing the sustained reference through the succeeding verses ("His calling"; "His inheritance"; "His power"; "He wrought in Christ when He raised Him from the dead"), we feel sure that the reference is to the Father.

This is the beginning, the unity of the faith culminates in "the knowledge of the Son of God", and "the love of Christ which surpasses knowledge". Here in this introduction our eyes are directed to the Father of glory, what He has done, what riches and glory and power He has, and how He has exalted the Lord Jesus Christ to His own right hand. But eyes must be enlightened before they can see. Verse 18 should not read as though the apostle was praying for the eyes of these believers to be enlightened, but because they had been enlightened, "The eyes of your heart having been enlightened."

The A.V. reads, "the eyes of your understanding", but the critical Greek text, supported by the Numeric text, reads "heart" instead. The reference to the heart goes deeper than the understanding. "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thine heart" comes before loving Him with "soul" and "mind". The apostle assumes that the eyes of the heart of those for whom he prays this mighty prayer have been enlightened; he heard of their faith in the Lord Jesus, and so he can unreservedly pray that this faith may grow, and that those enlightened eyes may see Him and His glory, which are invisible.

This, then, is the threefold preparation. There immediately follows the threefold petition, with which we hope to deal in the next paper.

The Prayer. Its Threefold Petition (Eph. i. 18-23). pp. 145-148

We have seen the threefold basis of the prayer in the work of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit in 3-14; we have seen the threefold preparation for this prayer in the spirit of wisdom and revelation, and in the enlightened eyes. We now consider the threefold petition of the prayer itself.

The first petition is "that ye may know what is the hope of His calling". The second concerns "the riches of the glory of His inheritance in the saints", and the third "the exceeding greatness of His power". Let us consider these petitions in their order.

WHAT IS THE HOPE OF HIS CALLING? Chapter ii. 12 makes it clear that "in that season" [which is set in contrast to "the dispensation of the fulness of the seasons" (i. 10), which we believe to be "the dispensation of the mystery" (iii. 10)], the Gentiles, being aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, and strangers from the covenants of promise, and, moreover, being without Christ, had no hope. The hope that we find the apostle Paul entertained in the last chapter of the Acts is "the hope of Israel", and to have no part then with the hope of Israel was to be without hope at all. "But now" a change has taken place. Access independently of Israel or covenants is made known: "Now, therefore," believers in the Lord Jesus Christ are no more strangers and foreigners (see verse 12), but are blessed as members of His body, having received a new calling, and therefore a new hope. Should the reader question this connection between "hope" and "calling", we would point out that where the believer's hope is mentioned in Ephesians, his calling is mentioned too. In chapter iv. we read, "There is one body and one spirit, even as ye are called in one hope of your calling." "His calling" and "your calling" are alike linked with one hope. What is hope? Is it not the realization and entry into those things that we have now by faith? If we settle in our minds our calling, we shall also settle the question of our hope. Our calling, according to II Tim. i. 9, is a holy calling, and is connected with a purpose that goes back "before age-times", parallel in fact to the statement of Eph. i. 4 which places God's choice of the members of the one body "before the foundation (or overthrow) of the world". His calling places us "in heavenly places", "where Christ sitteth at the right hand of God." Where our calling places us we enter now by faith, and hope looks forward to the day of realization. The apostle, therefore, by linking the hope with the calling, seems to indicate that there is this close relation between them, and therefore it follows that the more clearly we see what our calling is, the more clearly we shall see what our hope is.

A passage which has a bearing upon this petition is Col. i. 27, "Christ among you (Gentiles) the hope of glory". Without Christ, and outside the commonwealth of Israel, the Gentile was without hope. The middle wall has, however, been broken down. Christ is preached among the Gentiles with no reference to Israel, or Israel's covenants. This constitutes a new calling, and the apostle definitely says so in the verses of Col. i. which immediately precede the verse quoted. He speaks of it as a mystery hidden from the ages and generations, but NOW made manifest to the saints. These saints are members of the one body (Col. 1. 24), and the dispensation "completed the Word of God" (25).

We have pointed out before, and there are many who ask relating to the point, that nowhere in the prison epistles is the hope so clearly defined as, for example, is the hope of Israel. But this is in harmony with the highly spiritual character of the calling. We know that resurrection and the change of the body of humiliation into conformity with the body of His glory is a part of this blessed hope. We know that when Christ Who is our life shall be made manifest, then shall we also be manifest with Him in glory. Historic details are entirely absent. Details that are perfectly fitting in connection with the hope of Israel, that figure in Daniel and the Revelation, are entirely out of place in connection with the hope of this calling. We know that His calling and our calling have placed us "far above all principality", and that we shall one day "be manifested with Him in glory". No definite explanation is given as to the manner of our reaching that blessed sphere, no parallel to I Cor. xv. or I Thess. iv. is found in the epistles of the mystery. The hope like the calling is a part of a secret or mystery. It can be known, and the way is indicated—by receiving your calling, KNOW HIM. As His glory unfolds itself to the enlightened eye, and the spirit of wisdom and understanding perceives its true import, so will the conception of our calling expand, and with it a truer appreciation of our hope.

We have already drawn attention to the connection between Col. i. 27 and this passage, viz., that Christ Himself is the riches of the glory of the mystery, and the hope of the glory. The personal element in Col. i. 27, 28 is very prominent. We are not concerned there with what, but Who, viz., Christ personally. By purely grammatical necessity the Greek language uses the personal Tis (Who) in the first two petitions of Eph. i. 18, and without the revelation of Col. i. 27 we should have no warrant for rendering the word other than the A.V. "what". We know, however, that the hope of the glory is Christ, and therefore we cannot help seeing some reference to this "knowledge of Him" in Eph. i. 18. "Who is the hope", and "Who the riches", are not necessary from a grammatical point of view, but from the knowledge we have through such passages as Col. i. 27 we see the grammatical peculiarity being used to include a blessed fact. We do not think that any of our readers are likely to start introducing absurdities into their renderings simply because Greek words, unlike English, are often given a masculine or a feminine gender; but this by the way, and for those who have access to the original. Let us also remember it for ourselves, and for one another. Oh that we may know more fully and more truly "the hope of His calling". Possibly that knowledge is linked with our consistent walk, and as we "walk worthy of the calling" the hope of the calling will be made more manifest to us.

The Prayer. Its Threefold Petition (Eph. i. 18-23)
pp. 177-179

The second petition in this great prayer is for a perception as to "What is the riches of the glory of His inheritance in the saints." The reader may remember, that in the series "The Blessings of the Son" page 17-21 of this volume, when dealing with Eph. i. 11, we found that the teaching led us to see that the high privilege and blessing of the saints was not that they had obtained an inheritance so much, as that they themselves had been taken to constitute the Lord's inheritance. We referred to Deut. iv. 20, where Israel's peculiar and sacred privilege is expressed in similar terms. The church of the one body is His inheritance. What they will inherit in the ages to come does not concern them. Like the Corinthians, they can say that all things are theirs, for they are Christ's and Christ is God's. The second petition does not ask that the saints should receive a knowledge of what the inheritance may be, but what the riches of the glory of that inheritance may be.

The Prison Epistles are full of riches. Riches of grace, and riches of glory; riches for the present, and riches for the future. The references to riches in Ephesians arrange themselves in the following manner:--

A | i. 7. Forgiveness according to the riches of His grace.
B | i. 18. Prayer concerning the riches of His glory.
C | ii. 7. The exceeding riches of His grace in the future.
B | iii. 8. Preaching concerning the unsearchable riches of Christ.
A | iii. 16. Strength, according to riches of His glory.

It will be observed that all the references are in the doctrinal section of the epistle. The epistle to the Philippians, which makes no reference to the headship of Christ, His fulness, or the mystery, has but one reference to "riches", and that in a most practical setting, "My God shall supply all your need according to His riches in glory by Christ Jesus".

Colossians differs again from both Ephesians and Philippians. In the two occasions where the apostle speaks of riches, it has to do directly with the knowledge of the mystery (Col. i. 27, ii. 2). The riches concerning which the apostle prays in Eph. i. do not stand alone, they are the riches of the glory; even then that is not all. The glory is the glory of His inheritance, and this inheritance is in the saints.

Glory is spoken of in many connections in the Scriptures. There is the glory of the kingdom (Matt. vi. 13), there is the glory of the Only begotten Son as the Word made flesh (John i. 14), and as the Coming One (Matt. xxv. 31). There is the glory which the Saviour had with the Father before the world was (John xvii. 5), the light of the knowledge of the glory of God is seen in the face of Jesus Christ (II Cor. iv. 6). There is the glory that may be obtained as accompanying salvation (II Tim. ii. 10). There is the hope of one day being fashioned like unto the glorious body of the risen Lord (Phil. iii. 21), and of being presented a glorious church to the Lord (Eph. v. 27). From the many manifestations of glory, one is singled out by the inspired apostle as a subject for prayer—the riches of the glory of His inheritance in the saints. In verses 21 and 22 of chapter ii. we read:--

> "In whom all the building fitly framed together groweth into an holy temple in the Lord. In whom ye also are builded together for an habitation of God through the Spirit".

The saints are His inheritance, the saints are His holy temple. Some have not felt happy at the suggestion that the words tõn hagiõn may have a wider meaning than, "of the saints", and may include the meaning, "of the holiest of all". We do not wish to import O.T. types into the mystery, but Eph. ii. speaks of the saints being builded together and growing into a holy temple, and consequently there is the thought that in the highest of the heavenlies the Lord's inheritance will be in His chosen ones who will themselves constitute the living stones of that holy temple. Temples of themselves indicate the presence of sin and the need for a mediator. The glory of the new Jerusalem is not in a temple whose stones outshine the glistening city walls, or whose gleaming pavements eclipse the streets of gold. The glory of the new Jerusalem is that it has NO TEMPLE, for the Lord God and the Lamb are the temple of it. We believe the same can be said of the heavenly places. The riches of the glory is in no resplendent temple other than the temple formed of the Lord and His body the church. It is the hope of His calling that we pray to know. It is the riches of the glory of His inheritance that we must seek to comprehend. As we do so we shall find that the knowledge of His inheritance will give us greater joy, and open larger vistas than by merely contemplating what our inheritance may be. It is too often overlooked in the wonder of our own future blessedness, that God Himself awaits that day too. Now He is comparatively unknown, misrepresented, misunderstood. Only a very few feebly realize His love and His truth; He will yet joy over a returning Israel with singing, He will yet rejoice to say, "the tabernacle of God is with men"; He will yet receive from the hands of His beloved Son a perfect kingdom, and when the varied ranks of the redeemed shall enter into their allotted inheritances, when Abraham shall become the heir of the world, and the Lord Jesus Christ shall be acclaimed as "the heir of all things", "the riches of the glory of His inheritance", the inheritance of God Himself, in that day of universal rejoicing, will be closely related to the high and holy calling of those, once dead in sins, but then presented holy and without blemish before Him. If such our destiny, what manner of persons ought we to be? In the darkness and the temptations of the present world let us encourage ourselves by a constant remembrance that we shall form His inheritance, and continually pray that we may get to know more fully what constitutes the riches of its glory.

The Parables.

The Talents (Matt. xxv. 14-30).
pp. 21-25

The last recorded parable of the Gospel of Matthew deals with reward or loss consequent upon service rendered to an absent Lord.

The parable opens much like the Sower, for in each case the formula, "The kingdom of the heavens is like unto," is omitted. The first parable (for parable it is, see xiii. 18), starts with the words, "Behold the Sower went forth to sow"; the last with the words, "For as a man travelling into a far country". Both parables speak of results. There is the ground that produces no fruit, and the ground that does. Then again the fruitfulness varies, some thirty-fold, some sixty-fold, some an hundred-fold; this is exactly echoed in the parable before us. There is the unprofitable servant, there are the profitable ones. Their profitableness, though similar in ratio, is nevertheless different in amount, one produces five talents, the other two.

There is another comparison which we must remember. On page 43 of Volume IV. & V. is set out the structure of this second set of parables which commences with xviii. 23-35, the wicked servant, and introduces the word sunairõ, "to reckon", which occurs nowhere else except in the last parable of Matthew, which is the one at present under notice. This set of parables is bounded by the idea of a reckoning with servants, and comes in that section of Matthew where the public ministry of Christ becomes less and the private ministry more prominent. Moreover, in both parables there is a reference to "talents".

The parable of the talents divides itself into three sections, the nobleman's prospective going, his absence, and return. Each action of the nobleman has a bearing upon his servants; to them in the first place the goods are delivered, in the second they trade with the goods or otherwise, and in the third they are rewarded or punished accordingly. This will be seen clearly if set out as follows:--

Matt. xxv. 14-30.

A1 | 14. The journey contemplated.
  B1 | 15-. The delivery of the goods to the servants.
A2 | -15. The departure.
  B2 | 16-18. The use of the goods by the servants.
A3 | 19. The return and the reckoning.
  B3 | 20-30. The reward or punishment of the servants.

It will be observed that the period of service is during the Lord's absence. The commission is given just before his departure, and the reward is given upon his return. At the close of each of the four Gospels, the soon departing Lord gives various commissions to His disciples. John shows in the difference between the ministry given to Peter and that given to himself a reflection of the words, "according to his several ability". We can readily see that the Apostles who heard the Lord utter these parables would seen their own place therein. To them perhaps were given the five talents, and mighty works were done by the Apostles through the gift of the Spirit during the period of their ministry. To others two talents were given. In I Cor. xii. various gifts of the Spirit are enumerated, closing with the words, "But all these worketh that one and the selfsame Spirit, dividing to every man severally as He will" (verse 11). In the parable the talents are divided "according to his several ability."

With this parable it is helpful to read that of the pounds in Luke xix. In this case one pound is given to each servant instead of a different amount to each as in the parable of the talents. Then, instead of saying, "Behold I have gained" so many talents, as in Matthew xxv., the servants says, "Thy pound hath gained" ten or five pounds. In the case of the evil servants of Matthew xxv., he digs in the earth and hides the Lord's money, while in the parable of the pounds he keeps it laid up in a napkin. Again, in each case the evil servant gives a similar excuse for his action. In Matt. xxv. it is, "I knew thee that thou wert an hard man, reaping where thou hast not sown, and gathering where thou hast not strawed; and I was afraid". In Luke it is, "I feared thee because thou art an austere man: thou takest up that thou layedst not down, and reapest that thou didst not sow".

In both parables the reply of the Lord is that the money ought to have been so used that he would have received his own with interest. In both is emphasized the principle, "Unto every one that hath shall be given, and from him that hath not, even that he hath shall be taken away from him." The parable of the talents is followed by the judging of the nations, whereas the parable of the pounds concludes with the judgment upon the nation "which would not that I should reign over them."

Let us consider some of the points a little. First, the difference between the amounts given. When the Lord divides his goods "according to their several ability", the servants can say, "I have gained five talents," but when the Lord gives to each the same—one pound, the servant says, "Thy pound hath gained." Here we have a twofold view that is most important for us to see clearly. The principle is stated doctrinally, and in higher connections, by Paul in Philippians ii. 12, 13, "Work out your own salvation"; this is the talent aspect, the "several ability", the "I have gained" position. "For it is God which worketh in you", that is the one pound aspect, the "Thy pound hath gained", with no reference to the individual ability. The reference to "gains" is not absent from Philippians either, but is really a vital part of its teaching. "For me to live is Christ, and to die gain"; "That I may win (have for my gain) Christ"; "What things were gain to me."

In both parables the unprofitable servant hides the money; the one in the earth, the other in a napkin. Matt. v. 14-16 says, "Ye are the light of the world. A city that is set on a hill cannot be hid. . . . let your light so shine". This takes us again to Phil. ii., for there, immediately following the words already alluded to, "work out your own salvation", the apostle says, "among whom shine ye a light in the world", this being further connected with the wish, "that I may rejoice in the day of Christ". The Apostle tells them that he "desired fruit that may abound to their account" (iv. 17).

There is food for thought in the repetition of the unprofitable servant's words that he knew his Lord "reaped where he had not sown". Although the light in which the servant saw this was wholly false, the fact itself does not appear to be so. The Lord does expect to reap where He has not sown, namely, through the loving service of His people. They, however, are only too conscious that this service is only possible "as He works in". The reward in each case is commensurate with the amount gained. No difference is made in the case of the one who could say, "I have gained", or the one who said, "Thy pound hath gained". In each case they are made "rulers", a reward peculiarly given to "him that overcometh". The words, "made thee ruler" of Matt. xxv. 21, and Matt. xxiv. 45-47, are the same and emphasize the fact that the parable of the Talents is an expansion of the shorter parable. The word in Luke xix. 17, "have authority", is echoed in Rev. ii. 26. The words of Matt. xxv. 27 are of great moment. "I should have received mine own with interest." To this end the Apostle wrote in Titus ii. 10-14, "that they may adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour in all things. . . . zealous of good works"; or in I Tim. vi. 18, 19, "that they be rich in good works. . . . laying up in store for themselves a good foundation against the time to come." The punishment of the unprofitable servant is no more severe than that of the one who "sows to the flesh", for Gal. vi. 8 tells us, "he shall of the flesh reap corruption", or of the one who, building upon the true foundation that which does not stand the test, suffers loss, and is saved so as by fire (I Cor. iii.). The unprofitable servant is still a servant, and is differentiated from "the enemies" in Luke xix. 27.

When we were considering the first parable we saw that the various sowings were reflections of the various ministries of the Lord and His apostles. There is therefore every likelihood that in this last parable, with its different talents, the apostles' ministries are in view. Although various parallels have been drawn between the five talents and the ministry of Peter, the two talents and that of the twelve, and the one talent and that of the teaching of the Epistle to the Hebrews, we do not feel that we can do more than mention them, and refer to leave the subject open.

In thus drawing this series to a close, we feel that the reader who has followed the articles and studied the passages will be at least clearer in his view as to the two great subjects of the two sets of parables, and while taking to himself many lessons and receiving much help, will see that to introduce "the Church" into these parables is to miss their real testimony.

We purpose (D.V.) taking up another line of study in place of the parables, and hope later to consider the parables of Luke's Gospels, as we have those of Matthew.

May we receive the application of the teaching of the parable of the talents, and be enabled to fulfil it in the terms of the Epistle to the Philippians.

The Apostle PAUL

"Doctrine, Manner of Life, Purpose," (II Tim. iii. 10). pp. 46-47

There is a well known and oft-quoted trio of graces, "faith, hope and love". The three items that form our title are not quite so well known, but are in everyway as noteworthy. The Apostle in this second epistle to Timothy is sending his final message. Apostolic inspiration apart, we should expect that words written under such solemn circumstance as those in which this epistle was written, would be of weight and of importance.

The A.V. reads, "But thou hast fully known my doctrine," etc., but the margin gives as an alternative, "thou hast been a diligent follower of my doctrine," etc. In I Tim. iv. 6 the same word is rendered "attained", where the context is in some ways parallel with II Tim. iii. It will be seen that the words of I Tim. iv. 16, "Take heed unto thyself and unto the doctrine", link together the "doctrine and manner of life". Timothy is urged to "fully follow", and what power accompanies the exhortation of one whose doctrine, manner of life, and purpose are so harmonious and true.

It is not possible, in the space we have, even to outline the Apostle's "doctrine", to exhibit the many blessed and in any detail his "purpose", yet our studies along these lines have led us to see that his doctrine, his manner of life, and his purpose were all expressed in the one word "Christ". The Apostle's doctrine was focused upon the risen and glorified Christ of God. His grand unfolding of justification by faith, or his glorious revelation of the dispensation of the mystery, was only comprehended by comprehending the relation that Christ bore to the subject. His manner of life, also, was a manifestation of Christ. If Paul preached a risen Christ, he lived as one who had died indeed unto sin, but was alive unto God. If Paul preached that Christ had indeed been raised from the dead, he set his mind upon things above. If Paul preached "Christ, and Him crucified", he too lived as one who had crucified the flesh with its affections and desires, and to whom the world was crucified and he unto the world. He died daily, that "the life of Jesus" might be manifest in him. This vital connection between doctrine and practice figures prominently in the first of Paul's Epistles. There we find him speaking of the work of faith, the labour of love, and the patience of hope of the Thessalonian believers. Not only were they consistent in their walk, but the apostle refers to the "manner of life" of those who preached the gospel to them. "For our gospel came not unto you in word only. . . . as ye know what manner of men we were among you for your sakes, and ye became followers of us, and of the Lord" (I Thess. i., ii.). Sound doctrine we must have and hold, but a priceless adorning of the doctrine of God our Saviour is a consistent manner of life and purpose that can be expressed in such words as, "One thing I do. . . . I press toward the mark", or in such breathings as "that I may know Him". May we be "followers together" with such a teacher, following His Lord as we have him for an example.

"That I may finish my course." (Acts xx. 24).
pp. 125-128

We have given a passing glance at the apostle's words in II Tim. iii. 10 on page 46. Let us consider some of the objects that he, by his own confession, had before him. To have a purpose in any sphere is a long way in the direction of its accomplishment. How often we are struck by the coincidence, that perhaps the very day following our interest in some peculiar theme, a friend drops a word about it, or we open a book and read about it; there is every probability that the words would have been spoken or read if we had not previously thought of them, but we noticed them because we were interested. There are many things happening all around us that pass unheeded because we have no use for them. To have a definite purpose in life make many of the hitherto unperceived and unused incidents contribute to its achievement. Paul calls the attention of his son in the faith not only to his doctrine and his manner of life, but to his purpose, that which he had placed before himself, prothesis. Acts xx. 24 contains a statement of the apostle's purpose; let us consider it. The R.V., following the critical Greek Texts, omits the words, "none of these things move me". This omission is supported by the Numerics text. Sometimes when trials beset us we have had to confess that the apostle's "unmoved" condition was far ahead of our own experience; we may feel greatly moved, yet in spite of all our fears hold on our way, and this seems to be the spirit exhibited in Acts xx. 24. Bonds and afflictions awaited the apostle, yet he says:--

> "But I make of no account, nor hold I my soul valuable to myself, so that I may finish my course, even the ministry that I received from the Lord Jesus, to bear full testimony to the gospel of the grace of God."

Here is a man careless of life, but not because of indifference or unbelief: an all-absorbing purpose holds him on his way, and in view of its accomplishment nothing in life can enter into consideration. It is important to note that the apostle does not speak of his life, but of his soul; this he did not hold as precious to himself. To translate the word correctly brings this passage into line with the others that testify to a similar line of truth, and we may see more fully the apostle's meaning concerning himself by noticing how other scriptures, as well as his own epistles, refer to the disciple (or the witness) and the soul.

The classic passage of the Gospels is Matt. xvi. 24-27.

> "If any one wills to come after Me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow Me. For whosoever may will to save his soul, shall lose it, and whoever may lose his soul on My account shall find it. For what is a man profited, if the whole world he may gain, and his soul he shall forfeit? or what shall a man give in ransom for his soul? For the Son of man is about to come in the glory of His Father, with His angels, and then He will give back to each one according as his work".

The soul, as used in Scripture, stands for all that goes to make up the man, his life, his faculties, and his activities; it indicates the capacity to enter into all the possibilities of ours being. But we are in an alien country; our Lord here has been rejected and crucified, we therefore are called upon to choose between following Him in His rejection, which will involve the denial of SELF and the loss of SOUL, that we may sow to the SPIRIT, and reap in the day of Christ. One may gain the "whole world" now at the price of faithfulness (the Lord Himself knew the temptation, see Matt. iv. 8), but the soul would be forfeited in the day when faithful ones would "find" theirs. These words "forfeit" and "find" have their equivalents in Heb. x. and xi. The Hebrew believers had suffered for their faith, they had suffered together with prisoners, they had submitted to the spoiling of their goods with joy, for they knew that they had more enduring and better possessions, they lost their souls in this life that they might find them (x. 34). The "forfeiting" of the soul of Matt. xvi. seems echoed in Heb. x. 38, 39, "if any draw back", "we are not of those drawing back unto destruction", the "finding" of the soul, being echoed in the words, "but of faith unto the acquiring of the soul". Heb. xi. follows with a long list of those who lost their souls in this life, who gave up much of that which they might legitimately have enjoyed, in view of the better resurrection. The question, "What shall a man give in ransom for his soul", (apparently if forfeited by reason of seeking selfish interests in this life), is echoed in the account of Esau, who having bartered the spiritual for the temporal found no place for repentance (Heb. xii. 17). The "gaining" or "winning" of the whole world finds reflection in the apostle's own confession in Phil. iii., where he willingly loses all his "gains" that he may "win" or "gain" Christ. He says that he did not hold his souls as valuable, honourable, precious. (See usage of timios, Acts v. 34, I Cor. iii. 12, I Pet. i. 19; and time, Rom. ix. 21, II Tim. ii. 20, 21; and atimia, I Cor. xi. 14, II Cor. vi. 8). He knew what it was to be classed among the "offscouring of all things". Among the sustaining powers that enabled him to rise above persecution, disgrace, libel, and opposition, that enabled him to reckon his dearest possessions as so much refuse, was the great purpose of his life, "so that I may finish my course". That he did so finish, his last epistle testifies, for writing to Timothy he says, "I have finished my course. . . . henceforth a crown". That every reader of The Berean Expositor may be able so to say is one of the definite objects before the writer. May it be our blessed privilege.

"That we may present every man perfect in Christ Jesus." Col. i. 28. pp. 142-144

We have seen the inflexible purpose that sustained the apostle in his endeavour at all costs to "finish his course, even the ministry he had received of the Lord Jesus". We now consider a passage where he shows the goal he set before himself regarding his ministry of the truth of the mystery among the saints. His purpose is expressed by the words, "that we may present every man perfect in Christ Jesus". Two presentations are spoken of in Col. i., and they are related to each other as fruit is to root, or building to foundation. The first is spoken of in verse 22:--

> "In the body of His flesh through death, to present you holy and unblameable and unreproveable in His sight."

This presentation is unconditional, it is the work of Christ in harmony with the purpose of redemption, and is the basis of the meetness, the deliverance, and the redemption of verses 12-14. Continuance in the faith grounded and settled, and not being moved away from the hope of the gospel, these are the evidences of growth, without which the believer remains barren and unfruitful. It is in connection with this aspect of truth that the apostle's sufferings were said to be for the hope of the glory of the mystery among the Gentiles that the apostle says:--

> "Whom we preach, putting every man in mind, and teaching every man in all wisdom, with the object that we may present every man perfect in Christ Jesus."

The apostle speaks of his "striving" (verse 29), and the word used in the original is agõnizomai. Chapter ii. continues the theme, for he says, "for I would that ye knew what great conflict (agõna) I have for you"; this conflict was with the object detailed in verse 2. Looking at the passage as a whole, we find that the explanation of what constitutes being presented perfect is the condition of spiritual attainment indicated in verses 2 and 3 of chapter ii. The structure will help us to see the balance of parts.

A	|	i. 27. The riches of glory.
B	|	i. 28. Every man presented "perfect".
C	|	i. 29. The striving to this end (agõnizomai).
C	|	ii. 1. The conflict to this end (agõna).
B	|	ii. 2. Detailed description of "the perfect".
A	|	ii. 3. The treasures of wisdom and knowledge.

Verses 2, 3, following the critical texts, read:--

> "In order that their hearts may be comforted, being knit together in love, and unto all the riches of the full assurance of the understanding, unto full knowledge of the mystery of God--Christ--in Whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge".

When the apostle desired to present every man perfect, he desired the attainment of these verses. The "perfect" ones will find comfort of heart in the teaching of the mystery, and not only intelligent appreciation. They will also be knit together by the "bond of perfectness", while refraining from bonds that are fetters. Their understanding of the mystery of God will give them a holy confidence which no criticism or adversity can shake, and which is rich in its revelation of grace and glory.

Finally, the "perfect" will have reached the centre of all things. They will recognize that which is the beginning, middle and end of the mystery of God, they will know that CHRIST IS ALL. By reason of this they will probably be the most misunderstood of all, as the Apostle has said, "he that is spiritual discerneth all things, but is discerned of no man". To the majority the "perfect" will be an enigma. Observing neither days nor ordinances, being outside man's denominations, their path is a lonely but a blessed one.

The consideration of the question of what the Scriptures mean by being perfect, is outside the scope of this article which has the purpose of the apostle as its theme. The reader should ponder such passages as Matt. v. 48; xix. 21; I Cor. ii. 6; xiii. 10;

Eph. iv. 13; Phil. iii. 15; Col. iv. 12; Heb. v. 14; James i. 4, 17, and the passages which speak of "perfectness", "perfecting", and the whole epistle of Hebrews.

It is something to provoke one to emulation to see how the apostle did not remain satisfied with seeing men saved from sins, but suffered and strove to present them perfect in Christ Jesus. He, like Peter, desired the babes to grow, to ever keep before them "the perfect Man, and to remember that the measure of our faith is "The stature (of full age) of the fulness of the Christ".

"Christ shall be magnified in my body" (Phil. i. 20, 21). pp. 167, 168

The apostle who allowed nothing to turn him aside from finishing his course, who pressed on through all opposition in his desire to present every man perfect in Christ Jesus, did not forget his Master in his zeal for His service, nor his Lord in his desires for His saints. Writing to the Philippians the apostle could say of himself:--

> "With all boldness, as always, so now also, Christ shall be magnified in my body whether by life, or by death, for to me to live is Christ, and to die gain."

What faithful service must lie behind the ability to say that, "as always, so now also"! The magnifying of Christ in the body is a deeper experience than the words may at first indicate. To the Philippians themselves the apostle speaks of standing fast in one spirit, and with one soul striving together for the faith of the gospel. We should probably have placed the spirit highest, and the body lowest; it is not so in Christian experience. The new convert to the faith may magnify Christ in his spirit, but may shrink from the ordeal of magnifying Christ in his body. There is in this distinction a most important principle; the believer first knows Christ as the risen One at the right hand of God, the One Who is far above all principality and power, then as the truth lays hold upon his heart and life, as the life begins to evidence itself in growth, the believer is taken backward in his experience, he begins to learn not only the glory of the resurrection, but the teaching of death and burial; the cross too becomes something experimental in his life and knowledge, he seeks not only to "know Him" in His present glory, but begins to desire to "know Him" in relation to having fellowship with His sufferings, and conformity to His death. Joined with Christ as the risen One he entertains doubt of sharing that resurrection life, yet as he enters into deeper fellowship of his sufferings it is "if by any means" he may attain unto a resurrection which is connected with being made perfect, or reaching a goal, and off gaining a prize. It is this that the apostle has to teach us when he speaks of spirit and soul in the case of the Philippians, but reserves the reference to the body to himself.

We endeavoured some time ago to draw attention to the interpretation of Phil. iii. 21, where the "vile body" is the "body of humiliation". This humiliation does not necessarily call attention to indwelling sin or natural corruption, which is common to every child of Adam, but to the body of the believer who shares the humiliation of his Lord (ii. 8 and iv. 12 "abase"). Speaking personally, we feel that the "out resurrection", "the prize of the high calling", and the "body of glory" are all parts of one line of teaching, just as the "fellowship of His sufferings", "the loss of all things", and "the body of humiliation" are also phases and aspects of the condition that is necessary to attain to these glories.

The apostle had this well before him in Phil. i. 20, 21, for he says in immediate connection with the words:--

> "Christ shall be magnified in my body, whether by life or by death, FOR, to me to live is Christ, and to die gain."

The apostle at the cost of the loss of all things sought to have Christ as his gain (iii. 8). Here he tells us that while life is granted to him, Christ shall be magnified in his body, the body of humiliation, and when it shall please his Master to allow him to suffer death for His sake, Christ shall make that death turn out to his gain, the battered and scarred body of His faithful servant shall be conformed to the likeness of His body of glory.

Many times it may be true of us that "the spirit is willing, but the flesh is weak". For the believer to have reached the position of being able to "glorify God in his body" as well as in his spirit, indicates that he has made a step forward in the development of the teaching of the mystery. When we reach this stage the exhortation, "be anxious for nothing", will not seem so far above our condition as sometimes it may do now.

"For I determined not to know anything among you, save Jesus Christ, and Him crucified" (I Cor. ii. 2). pp. 169, 170

To understand the reason for the apostle's determination to know nothing among the Corinthians, but Jesus Christ and Him crucified, one must go back to the first chapter, begin at verse 10, and read through to the second chapter.

Divisions and contentions marred the witness of the church at Corinth; they exhibited a sectarian spirit; even Paul, however he might have detested it, could not prevent some from saying, "I am of Paul", yet it is very probable he had to bear the blame of some for seeking to lead away disciples after himself: the Corinthians could not be spoken to as unto spiritual, but as unto carnal; they were babes, they walked as men. While it was true that they were on the one foundation, the Lord Himself, the apostle entertains great fears regarding the structure they were raising. There was a glorying in men, and in a worldly wisdom, which spoke ill for them. In direct contrast to the wisdom of the Greek, and the religion of the Jew, the apostle declared, "We preach Christ crucified", saying that "the preaching of the cross is to them that perish foolishness". He concludes chapter i. with the words, "That according as it is written, He that glorieth, let him glory in the Lord", and continues in chapter ii. 1, "And I brethren, when I came to you", indicating that his line of action was parallel with that of the verse quoted in i. 31. Excellency of speech is well in its way, but to those who were taking pride in the flesh, who were being enamoured of the wisdom of this world, the apostle saw in it grave danger.

He had the mystery* of God to declare, but that mystery, like that of Eph. i., must be made known with all wisdom and prudence; carnal believers were babes, babes can only take the milk of the Word, and therefore the apostle tells us that he reserved the "wisdom of God in a mystery" for those who were "perfect" (verse 6), and "spiritual" (verses 12-16). Paul's determination among carnal believers was to preach the offence of the cross. To realize the teaching of the cross was to give the death blow to the flesh, its wisdom and its ways. The apostle does not hide from us the fact that he understood the offensiveness of his doctrine, he reminds the Corinthians that he was with them > in weakness, in fear, and in much trembling, that his speech and his preaching were not in persuasive words of wisdom, but in a demonstration of spirit and power.

Toward the end of chapter iii. the apostle returns to the subject of "glorying in man", and in chapter iv. returns to the question of his stewardship of truth. Some may have adversely criticized the apostle's refusal to speak on the deeper subject of the mystery; he acknowledges that he was in fear and trembling, nevertheless he stood fast to his determination.

In chapter iv. he tells the Corinthians to account of him and his fellow-workers as "the ministers of Christ, and stewards of the mysteries of God". As a steward of the mysteries he had to be faithful, even though he might offend some and be misjudged by others. The opinion of others, he tells us, was to him a very small thing, indeed he did not judge or examine himself. "I know nothing against myself", he confesses, but this does not justify him; the Lord is his judge, and when He comes He will make manifest the counsels of the hearts. All this the apostle declares he had written so that the Corinthians might learn how wrong it was to say, "I am of Paul", or "I am of Apollos", that no one be puffed up for one against another.

The determination of the apostle to meet the allurements of the flesh by preaching Jesus Christ AND HIM CRUCIFIED cost him many tears, and many sorrows. It is a determination that we do well to remember, and when we know full well that our doctrine and our message will not be palatable, we must remember our stewardship, our responsibility alone to the Lord, our utter independence of human opinion, and, whether men will hear, or forbear, we must preach the Word that the Lord gives us.

Paul and his Adversaries.

pp. 171-174

When we consider the stedfast way in which the apostle Paul pursued the great purpose of his life, we miss much teaching and encouragement if we omit a fairly comprehensive review of the difficulties and problems that beset his path.

When the apostle was bidding farewell to the elders of Ephesus, he referred to one of the elements of severe trial that had marked his pathway. Speaking of the ministry that was then closing he says:--

> "Ye know, from the first day that I came into Asia, after what manner I have been with you at all seasons, serving the Lord with all humility of mind, and with many tears, and the temptations which befell me by the lying in wait of the Jews" (Acts xx. 18, 19).

The treatment he received at the hands of the Jews figures prominently in the list of sufferings that pertained to his ministry:-- > "Of the Jews five times received I forty stripes save one. . . . in perils of mine own countrymen" (II Cor. xi. 24, 26).

Again in I Thess. ii. 14-16 the opposition of the Jews is mentioned as something the apostle had already encountered, this being his first epistle. The ninth chapter of Acts tells us of his conversion, and the deadly opposition of the Jews is seen in the selfsame chapter:--

> "And after that many days were fulfilled, the Jews took counsel to kill him, but their lying in wait was known of Saul. And they watched the gate day and night to kill him" (24).

In verse 29 we find that Paul

> "Spake boldly in the name of the Lord Jesus, and disputed against the Hellenists (Greek-speaking Jews, not Greeks); but they went about to slay him".

In Acts xiii., where the apostle has a foreshadowing of his independent Gentile ministry, his opponent is a Jew, who seeks to turn away the Gentile deputy from the faith (verses 6-12). As a result of his preaching at Antioch in Pisidia, the Jews were > "filled with envy, and spake against those things which were spoken by Paul, contradicting and blaspheming. . . . the Jews stirred up the devout and honourable women, and the chief men of the city, and raised persecution against Paul and Barnabas, and expelled them out of their coasts" (xiii. 44-50).

Leaving Antioch the apostle reaches Iconium, where > "the unbelieving Jews stirred up the Gentiles, and made their minds evil affected against the brethren. . . . and when there was an assault made both of the Gentiles, and also of the Jews with their rulers, to use them despitefully and to stone them, they were ware of it, and fled unto Lystra and Derbe" (xiv. 1-6).

The intense hatred that the Jews of Iconium felt against the apostle urged them to follow the devoted messenger from both Antioch and Iconium, where they > "persuaded the people, and having stoned Paul, drew him out of the city, supposing he had been dead" (xiv. 19).

The revival of the apostle is not less wonderful than the courage exhibited, for he returned again to Lystra AND to Iconium, AND to Antioch, > "confirming the souls of the disciples, and exhorting them to continue in the faith, and that we must through much tribulation enter into the kingdom of God" (xiv. 21, 22).

Words were enforced by example, and the confirmation and exhortation must have been very impressive. So vividly does the writer of the Acts recall the same, that he does not merely tell us in his own words what Paul said, but suddenly leaves the narrative form for quotation, "we must", etc., quoting Paul's own words to the disciples.

Chapter xv. introduces another line of assault; the enemy of truth used the hatred of the Jew to bring about, if possible, the death of the appointed messenger. This failing, he tries another method; he uses the Jews to attack the apostle's message.

> "And certain men which came down from Judæa taught the brethren, that if you are not circumcised with the rite of Moses you cannot be saved."

Nothing daunted, the apostle and Barnabas "had no small discussion, and disputation with them." After having suffered so much already at the hands of the Jews, it must have been exceedingly trying to be punished at the hands of the Gentiles for being Jews, for that was the charge laid against Paul and Silas, which brought the stripes and imprisonment (xvi. 20). Yet they could sing praises unto God in the inner prison!

Leaving Philippi, the apostle reaches Thessalonica, "where there was a synagogue of the Jews". Do we read that Paul, having received such continual ill-treatment at the hands of the Jews, avoided their place of worship? No!

> "And Paul, AS HIS MANNER WAS, went in unto them."
> "The Jews which believed not, moved with envy, took unto them certain lewd fellows of the baser sort, and gathered a company, and set all the city on an uproar" (xvii. 1-5).

The brethren sent away Paul and Silas by night unto Berea: who coming, "went into the synagogue of the Jews". Oh wondrous faith! Oh stedfast love! May we follow this example of unflinching faithfulness. The Lord graciously gave the apostle a season of refreshing at Berea, which, however, lasted only for a short space,

> "But when the Jews of Thessalonica had knowledge that the word of God was preached of Paul at Berea, they came thither also, and stirred up the people" (xvii. 13).

Paul is the name that is hated, Silas is not mentioned; it is Paul who is sent away "to go as it were to the sea"; but Silas and Timothy remained. It is also not devoid of emphasis to read in verse 15 that the brethren "conducted" Paul to Athens.

Chapter xviii. finds the apostle at Corinth, reasoning n the synagogue, and testifying to the Jews, who opposed and blasphemed. When he at length did feel that he must shake his raiment and say to his disbelieving countrymen, "your blood be upon your own heads", he adjourned to the house of one Justus, "whose house joined hard by the synagogue." Then we read:--

> "And Crispus, the chief ruler of the synagogue, believed on the Lord with all his house. . . . Then spake the Lord. . . . Be not afraid, but speak, and hold not thy peace, for I am with thee, and no man shall set on thee to hurt thee".

Throughout all the blaspheming opposition, and murderous plotting, the Lord had not seen any necessity to speak in a vision for Paul's encouragement, but the sudden conversion of the chief ruler of the synagogue is immediately followed by the word of encouragement. The apostle's fear of being "set upon by man" shows that he was of like infirmity as ourselves. The apostle does not leave Corinth, however, without being the subject of a Jewish insurrection (xviii. 12). The synagogue witness of the apostle comes to a conclusion at Ephesus (a fitting place), for it was to the elders of Ephesus that he explained his twofold ministry (xx. 17-27), and to that church he wrote the epistle of the mystery some years after. Although the apostle had entered the synagogue for the last time, he had not finished with Jewish opposition. Chapter xx. 3 tells us that the Jews laid wait for him as he was about to sail to Syria. At Cæsarea the prophet Agabus took Paul's girdle and bound his own hands and feet, and said:--

> "Thus saith the Holy Spirit, so shall the Jews at Jerusalem bind the man that owneth this girdle, and shall deliver him into the hands of the Gentiles" (Acts xxi. 11).

Like his master before him, Paul had to set his face stedfastly toward Jerusalem, with some knowledge at least of what awaited him. When the apostle did arrive at Jerusalem, no fellow-apostle opened his door to give him brotherly hospitality or recognition, Mnason of Cyprus, an old disciple, had that honour. The suggestion made by James and the elders that Paul should purify himself in the Temple, led to his recognition by some Asiatic Jews who had come up to Jerusalem to keep the feast; again the apostle's life was endangered, and the Jews only left beating Paul when they saw the Roman soldiers running toward them. The Jews waited with patient hatred through the two years of Paul's imprisonment under Felix, and when Festus took his place, they approached him on the subject, thinking he might be more likely to hand Paul over to them and send him to Jerusalem. Festus prevented this attempt to obtain hold upon Paul, and the apostle was finally delivered from the Jews by his appeal unto Caesar.

Thus far we have considered the attack upon this devoted servant from one quarter only, yet how great was the opposition to the apostle's ministry toward the Gentiles, and how great the grace given that enabled him to triumph over it all, and to be able to write after such incessant and implacable hatred:--

> "My heart's desire and prayer to God for Israel is, that they might be saved" (Rom. x. 1).

We in our small spheres find the opposition of those who are our own kin trying in the extreme, and often this opposition is enough to deflect us from the purpose of our lives. May we take heart at seeing the courage and the stedfastness of the apostle of the Gentiles. Other methods of attack were used by the evil one, which we must consider in another paper.

"Without were fightings, within were fears."
pp. 175, 176

The opposition to the apostle Paul that came from his own people, the Jews, would constitute as much as the faith of most of us could endure. When we examine the Scriptures, however, we find that the opposition and persecution of the Jews were but a part of a great campaign organized against this chosen vessel. The apostle's life was continually embittered, and his lot made almost unbearable by the uncharitable opposition of believers. The chapter in Acts that tells of his conversion, and of the beginning of Jewish hatred against him, tells also of the beginning of another trial, a trial that must have cut deeper, because it came from those nearer and dearer than any fleshly tie. After standing so boldly at Damascus, and having his life threatened by the Jews, Saul came to Jerusalem, and

> "assayed to join himself to the disciples: but they were all afraid of him, and believed not that he was a disciple" (Acts ix. 26).

The suspicion was a natural result of his former violent attitude toward the believers, yet it must have come like a blow in the face to the new convert evidently seeking to prove the reality of his profession. The earliest epistle that the apostle wrote is I Thessalonians; in it he reminds them that > "Even after that we had suffered before, and were shamefully entreated, as ye know, at Philippi, we were bold in our God to speak unto you the gospel of God with much contention, for our exhortation was not to deceit, nor of uncleanness, nor in guile" (ii. 2, 3).

Why should an apostle speak like this in a letter unless cowardice, deceit, uncleanness and guile had been put to his charge? Or again, what a deal of heart-breaking misrepresentation is behind his statement before God as his witness, when he says:--

> "Neither at any time used we flattering words, as ye know, nor a cloke of coveteousness, nor of men sought we glory, neither of you, nor yet of others, when we might have been burdensome as the apostles of Christ" (ii. 5, 6).

Someone must have accused him of such things, and that more than once, to call for so strong a negation as this. The apostle had on many occasions to give his very heart's love only to find it trampled under foot. Instead of deceit and guile, and pretexts for greed, the two figures he uses to illustrate his attitude are that of a nursing mother (not merely a nurse), and that of a father. "We were gentle, even as a nursing mother would cherish her own children. . . .". The apostle reminds them of his yearning over them, and how he not only imparted the gospel to them, but was willing to impart his very soul if needs be; "for you remember", he continues, with a yearning for their full trust in his integrity, "our labour and travail, for labouring night and day, because we would not be chargeable unto any of you, we preached unto you the gospel of God". "Ye are witnesses", he cries, "and God also, how holily, and justly and unblameably we behaved ourselves among you that believe" (ii. 7-12).

"Without were fightings, within were fears." (Conclusions) pp. 189-191

The epistles written to the next church are even more the outbursts of a heart sore with misrepresentation, shameful in gratitude, and shattered hopes.

However strongly the apostle may have abominated sectarian and party movements, he had the mortification of hearing that a party saying, "but I am of Paul", formed one of the divisions at Corinth (I Cor. i. 12). He is obliged to defend his determination to know nothing among them save Jesus Christ and Him crucified (chapter ii.), while he declared it was to him "a very small thing" that he should be judged of them, yet to be judged unjustly is no light trial (chapter iv.). That the apostle had already sounded deep waters is soon evident, for in verses 9-13 he uses words that seem to freeze the mind as one prayerfully faces their true import. In verse 9 he likens his condition to the criminals who were exposed in the arena last, and who were devoted to certain death:--

> "a spectacle unto the world, and to angels, and to men. We are fools for Christ's sake, we are weak, we are disgraced. Even unto this present hour we both hunger and thirst."

One would at least have expected the apostle to have been relieved of anxiety concerning his daily bread, but no, at the time of writing his epistle hunger and thirst were known by him, while the Corinthians were "full", "rich", and "reigned as kings" (verse 8). Not only so, but he continues, "we are naked, and are buffeted, and are homeless". Ill clad, hounded from city to city by the Jews who sought his life, a homeless, weary fugitive—such is the Bible picture of the chiefest of the apostles. The care of all the churches, and the authority he had as an apostle, would seem to demand that he should be free to discharge his difficult office, but no, "we labour", he says, "working with our own hands". In Acts xx. 34 indeed he tells us, "these hands have ministered unto my necessities, and to them that were with me"; he, the great apostle, worked for others beside himself. "Yea, ye yourselves know". Again, in II Thess. iii. 8, he reminds the church:--

> "Neither did we eat any man's bread for nought; but wrought with labour and travail night and day, that we might not be chargeable to any one of you".

Continuing the awful list in I Cor. iv., the apostle says, "being reviled, we bless; being persecuted, we suffer it; being blasphemed, we entreat", then comes, as it were from the depth of his tortured spirit, the last word of shame.

> "We are made as the FILTH OF THE WORLD, and are the OFFSCOURING OF ALL THINGS unto this day".

When we consider that most of this is additional to the fierce persecution he received from the Jews, we can realize a little how much he had to endure. Chapters v. - viii. are occupied with some of the problems of the church at Corinth, and then the apostle returns to the charges of his traducers. They questioned his apostleship (ix. 1, 2), they questioned his motives and right regarding eating and drinking (4), of marrying (5), and working for his own living (6). He proves from the analogy of every day life and of nature (7), as well as by the teaching of the law (9-11), that he would be quite within his right to be supported in temporal things by the churches. "Nevertheless", he says, "we have not used this power, but suffer (love beareth all things, xiii. 7) all things, lest we should hinder the gospel of Christ". This noble self-denial, however, was cruelly misrepresented:--

> "Have I committed an offence in abasing myself that ye might be exalted, because I have preached to you the gospel of God freely? I have robbed other churches, taking wages of them, to do you service" (II Cor. xi. 7, 8).
>
> "I will gladly spend and be spent for you; though the mire abundantly I love you, the less I be loved".

Then one can almost hear the sigh that escapes him,

> "Be it so, I did not burden you, but being crafty, I caught you with guile" (xii. 15, 16).

He could not, however, let it appear that he really had been crafty, his whole being revolted against the injustice of these charges, "Did I make a gain of you"? he cried, and refuted the charge so repugnant to his desires and motives.

Thus beside the murderous hatred of his own countrymen, the very churches that owed, humanly speaking, their spiritual existence to his self-denying endeavours, contributed to the apostle's sufferings of mind and body, yet, with every evidence that every injustice and unkindness was keenly felt, and that the physical sufferings were a severe strain upon the "earthen vessel", he pursued his course, and it is a joy to us to know that he could write the inspired statement, I have finished my course.

May grace be given us to follow this devoted servant in so far as he followed his Lord.

Studies in the Book of the Revelation.

"The Day of the Lord" (Rev. i. 10); the prophetic period of the Book. pp. 1-5

"I came to be in spirit in the day of the Lord, and I heard behind me a loud voice as of a trumpet."

Verse 9 tells us that John came to be in Patmos for the word of God and the testimony of Jesus; verse 10 tells us that he came to be in spirit in the day of the Lord, and verse 11 completes the parallel by saying, "What thou seest write in a book." The word and testimony were received by signs ("He sent and signified," verses 1 and 2) in the isle called Patmos, and are vitally connected with the statement "in spirit in the day of the Lord."

There are four occasions where John tells us that he was "in spirit," viz., Rev. i. 10, he became in spirit in the day of the Lord; iv. 2, he became in spirit, and saw the throne in heaven; xvii. 3, he is carried away into a desert in spirit to see the woman sitting on the scarlet beast; xxi. 10, he is carried away in spirit to see the holy city. When John is to be taken to a desert or a mountain he is "carried away in spirit," and when he is transported into time, "the day of the Lord," or to the future heavenly sphere, he writes, "I became in spirit."

The four references made by John find an echo and an explanation in the statements to a like effect made by Ezekiel.

> "The spirit lifted me up, and brought me into the east gate of the Lord's house" (Ezek. xi. 1).
>
> "And afterwards the spirit took me up and brought me in a vision by the spirit of God into Chaldea, to them of the Captivity. So the vision that I had seen went up from me" (Ezek. xi. 24).
>
> "The hand of the Lord was upon me, and carried me out in the spirit of the Lord, and set me down in the valley which was full of bones" (Ezek. xxxvii. 1).

In Ezek. xl. 2 we have a close parallel to Rev. xxi. 10:--

> "In the visions of God brought He me into the land of Israel, and set me upon a very high mountain, upon which was as the frame of a city on the south."

The man with the measuring reed (verse 3), and the command to declare what he saw (verse 4), also find their parallels in the Revelation. This and the seven succeeding chapters are punctuated by the words, "then, and, or afterwards, he brought me." Ezek. xliii. 5 records similar words. Ezekiel was not merely taken in vision from one locality to another, but was taken into the yet future even as was John.

In Ezek. viii. 1-3 the parallel with Rev. i. is most pronounced.

> "And it came to pass in the sixth year, in the sixth month, in the fifth day of the month, as I sat in mine house, and the elders of Judah sat before me, that the hand of the Lord God fell there upon me. Then I beheld, and lo, a likeness as the appearance of fire: from the appearance of his loins even downward, of fire; and from his loins even upward, as the appearance of brightness, as the colour of amber. And he put forth the form of an hand, and took me by a lock of mine head; and the spirit lifted me up between earth and heaven, and brought me in the visions of God to Jerusalem."

The description of the wondrous being who appeared to Ezekiel is very similar to the description of the Lord Who appeared to John. The vision is a prelude to a revelation of dark apostasy and the retiring glory of God. It is also in the book of the Revelation.

There is no mystery about the meaning of John when he tells us that he "came to be in the day of the Lord in spirit." It cannot possibly mean that he felt in a specially spiritual frame of mind on a Sunday—such a suggestion is too trivial to require refuting. We should, moreover, be thankful that the expression "I became," has been used in verse 9 in a sense that is literal. John became in Patmos literally and really. He became in the day of the Lord in spirit, and not literally and really. There are a great number of believers who, if they were asked for their Scriptural warrant for calling the first day of the week "the Lord's day," would immediately point to Rev. i. 10 as their authority. Further, many of those who use this title of the Lord's day abstain from using the word Sun-day because of its pagan connection (though to be consistent they should follow the society of Friends and omit the names of days altogether, for Moon-day, or Thors-day are equally as bad). It would doubtless come as a shock to such that their term "Lord's day" is equally Pagan! The title for the Sun is "Lord." In Hebrew it is Baal. The Syrians call in Adonis, from adonai, Lord. Pagan Rome called the first day of the week Dies Dominica, omitting the word "Sol" because the Sun was pre-eminent. Other days had the planets mentioned by name. There is nothing to choose therefore between Sun-day and Lord's-day as applied to the first day of the week—both alike are pagan—one masking the paganism by a traditional sanctity.

The book of the Revelation is taken up with something infinitely vaster than days of the week. It is solely concerned with the day of the LORD. To read that John became in spirit on the Lord's day (meaning Sunday), tells us practically nothing. To read in the solemn introduction that John became in spirit in the Day of the Lord, that day of prophetic import, is to tell us practically everything. Traditional bias is seen even in the rendering of en by "on" instead of "in." The Hebrew language does not allow such a construction as "The Lord's day," it can only be expressed by "The day of the Lord." The Greek language, however, like the English, permits of both modes of expression, and the one used here is "The Lord's day," making the word Lord's an adjective. There can be no difference between the thing signified, whichever mode of expression be chosen, it is the same day, the difference is one of emphasis. Rev. i. 10 means "the Lord's DAY"; had it been set out as in the Hebrew it would have meant "the LORD'S day," but no other day than this could be meant by either expression.

A parallel expression is found in I Cor. iv. 3 where the A.V. translates, "man's judgment"; it should read "man's day," the construction being the same as Rev. i. 10. Man's day manifestly means man's day of judging, as evidenced by the context.

Rev. i. 10 takes us to a future day, when the Lord and not man shall be the judge, "The day of the Lord" in the O.T. is either Yom Jehovah, or Yom l'Jehovah, "a day for the Lord." Isa. xiii. 6 gives some idea of the day of the Lord.

> "Howl ye (referring to Babylon), for the day of the Lord is at hand; it shall come as a destruction from the Almighty."

Verses 9-13 go further and closer to the imagery of the Revelation:--

> "Behold the day of the Lord cometh, cruel both with wrath and fierce anger. . . . for the stars of heaven and the constellations thereof shall not give their light; the sun shall be darkened in his going forth, and the moon shall not cause her light to shine. . . . in the wrath of the Lord of Hosts, and in the day of His fierce anger."

The prophecy of Joel is entirely taken up with that day. "Alas for the day, for the day of the Lord is at hand, and as a destruction from the Almighty shall it come" (i. 15). Chapter ii. 1, 2, and 11 show how terrible will be that day; iii. 14 links that day with the harvest, and the judgment of the nations. Obadiah 15, 16 speaks of it as a day of retribution for the heathen in words that are very similar to Rev. xviii. 6-8. Zech. xiv. 1-11 tells us that in the day of the Lord the nations will be gathered against Jerusalem, that He will go forth and His feet shall stand upon the mount of Olives, that He shall be King over all the earth, and Jerusalem shall be safely inhabited.

We have endeavoured to bring to the readers' attention in these papers the great importance of studying the Prophets (all of them, including the "Minor Prophets"). If this is not done, the Revelation must remain a book of unexplained imagery and intention, but to a mind already charged with the purpose, language, and symbols of the Prophets who spoke so much and so often of the day of the Lord, the Revelation will be the great gathering up of all their threads, the capstone of their united building.

If in Rev. i. John is taken, in spirit, to the future day of the Lord to see the visions and to write them in a book, ALL the book that he writes, including chapters i., ii. and iii. must be future in their interpretation. There is no part of the prophecy or vision that is not "in the day of the Lord." That day is the point of time from which all time must be measured. When John says anything "it is present," or "it shall arise," he speaks from the standpoint of his vision—the day of the Lord, and not A.D. 96. No vision has been given to John as far as we have gone in our study. All is preparatory and introductory. Immediately, however, the prophetic point of time is settled, the visions begin, for as soon as he "became in spirit in the day of the Lord" he "heard a great voice, as of a trumpet." This is a reference to Zeph. 1. 14-16 where "the voice of the day of the Lord" is linked to "a day of the trumpet." The voice said to John:--

> "What thou art seeing write in a book, and send it to the seven churches, unto Ephesus, and unto Smyrna, and unto Pergamos, and unto Thyatira, and unto Sardis, and unto Philadelphia, and unto Laodicea."

These places are all found in that part of the earth adjoining the land of Canaan called by us Asia Minor. The reason why this spot of earth and not another is chosen is for the simple yet awful fact that it is directly connected with the place of Satan's Throne, for that will be at Pergamos, as Rev. ii. 13 shows. The development of things in the near East (written March 1916) makes this spot of earth to be more and more important, and here the scene of the Revelation is laid; round about this part much will happen, and members of the assemblies in these places will come prominently into view during the time of tribulation and persecution.

The Vision of the Son of Man (Rev. i. 12-17). pp. 33-37

In our last paper we found that the Apostle John was taken "in spirit" to the day of the Lord, a period concerning which Old Testament prophecy is specially clear. From that standpoint the Apostle sees the visions of the Apocalypse, and is here instructed to write them in a book, and send it to the seven churches which are in Asia. We can well believe that as Paul was commissioned to write to seven churches, which should be representative of the Gentile section of believers particularly, so these seven churches in Asia may have been selected in order to show the character of the church in the last days.

The trumpet voice that John heard when translated to the day of the Lord caused him to turn to see the One Who thus spoke. The vision of the Son of man in the midst of the seven golden lampstands is presented to him. This is the opening vision of the book. To miss its character is to be turned into by-paths of error.

The structure of the passage shows how the mind is concentrated upon the person and dignity of the Son of man.

Rev. i. 12-17.
The Opening Vision.

A | 12. John. "I saw."
B | 13-16. The Son of man. His person and glory.
A | 17. John. "I saw."

The member B | 13-16, being the most important, demands expansion, viz.:--

The Son of Man (13-16).

B | a | In the midst of the seven golden lampstands.
b | Clothed to the foot.
c | Girt with girdle.
C | d | Head and hair like snow.
e | Eyes as a flame of fire.
e | Feet like brass in a furnace.
d | Voice like sound of many waters.
B | a | In right hand seven stars.
b | Out of His mouth a sword.
c | Countenance as sun.

The Son of man is seen standing in the midst of the seven lampstands and holding in His right hand the seven stars. Revelation itself tells us what these represents.

> "The mystery of the seven stars which thou sawest in His right hand, and the seven golden lampstands, the seven stars are the angels of the seven churches, and the seven lampstands which thou sawest are the seven churches."

We cannot help feeling that any attempt to "explain" this inspired explanation is apt to mislead. If the angels are not angels as the rest of the angels in this book, then the explanation given to John needs an inspired solution.

Two passages of Scripture seem to be referred to under the symbol of the seven golden lampstands. Exodus xxv. 31-40, which speaks of the six-branched lampstand in the tabernacle, and Zech. iv. 2. We ought to note, in passing, that Solomon, who like Moses received a pattern to work by, has ten golden lamps instead of seven (I Kings vii. 49).

The seven lamps link the vision of Rev. i. to wilderness times rather than the kingdom of peace. Zech. iv. refers to the lampstand of gold, with its seven lamps, as bearing a light in a day of small things. Connected with these seven lamps, and supplying them with oil, are two olive branches. Rev. xi. 4 uses the symbol as of the two witnesses. From this we gather that the seven assemblies constitute the Lord's witnesses in a corrupt day. In their midst stands the Son of man, and watching over them are angels, who are held responsible for their charges.

The description given of the Son of man is parallel with the description given in Daniel x., so that if the Apostle had wanted to make us connect the subject matter of Rev. i. with things distinctly to do with Israel, he could not have done it better. In order that the parallel may be clearly seen, we put the two descriptions together:--

Dan. x. 5, 6, 8-14.	Rev. i. 13-17.
Behold, one—a man.	A Son of man.
Clothed in linen.	Clothed with a garment to the foot.
Loins girded with fine gold of Uphaz.	Girt about the paps with a golden girdle.
His body was like the beryl.	His head and hair like wool and snow.
His face as the appearance of lightning.
His eyes as lamps of fire.	His eyes as a flame of fire.
His feet like polished brass.	His feet like fine brass.
His voice like voice of a multitude.	His voice as the sound of many waters.
There remained no strength in me: for my comeliness was turned in me into corruption. . . . then was I in a deep sleep on my face, and my face touched the ground.	And when I saw Him I fell at His feet as one dead.
And behold a hand touched me, which set me upon my knees and the palms of my hands.	He laid His right hand upon me.
Fear not, Daniel.	Fear not.
I am come to make thee understand what shall befall thy people in the latter days.	Write the things which thou hast seen. . . . the seven stars are. . . .
Shut up the words and seal the book to the time of the end (xii. 4).	Blessed is he that readeth, and they that hear. . . . and keep those things that are written, for the time is at hand (i. 3).

The close parallel that is evident here leads to one conclusion. The time, place and people of the two books are the same. "Thy people" is Israel, "the latter days" bring us to the period of the Revelation, "the day of the Lord," the difference between the two accounts is that Daniel was told to shut up the words and seal the book to the time of the end, whereas John is told, "Blessed is he that readeth, and they that hear the words of the prophecy, and keep those things that are written therein, for the time is at hand."

Having such a definite connection with Israel and the time of the end impressed upon the opening vision of the Revelation, we wonder how it is that so many see the "church" in this passage. However, it is not for us to question the views of others, but rather to get to know more and more of the truth of God for ourselves. Turning to the vision that John beheld, we find that in the midst of the seven golden lampstands was the Son of man.

THE SON OF MAN.—Titles, when used of Deity, are dispensational. God is spirit. The invisible God has made Himself known under a variety of titles. In the Incarnate Word He is revealed as the Saviour, the Shepherd, the Head, the Son of God, and many other titles. Each has its distinctive connection. The Son of man is related to the earth; not the earth in a wrong or unspiritual sense, but to God's purposes of blessing in the earth. The first occurrence in Scripture is found in Psa. viii., where He has "dominion over the works of Thy (God's) hands." The title occurs 84 times in the N.T., and is never used by Paul in his Church Epistles. The one other reference in Revelation is xiv. 14, where, crowned with a golden crown, He comes to reap, for the harvest of the earth is ripe.

The seven references in Matt. xxiv. & xxv. to the Son of man link the title closely with the parousia, the great tribulation, the days of Noah, the throne of glory, and judgment of the nations. Something of the glory of this Son of man is gathered from John's description. The garment which reached to the foot was the robe worn by both Kings and Priests. When Isaiah "saw His glory," he tells us "His train (or the hem of His garment) filled the temple." The golden girdle is met with again in xv. 6, as worn by the seven angels who came out of the Temple of God. When Daniel saw the Ancient of days (vii. 9), he says, "the hair of His head was like pure wool," which John says of the Son of man. "White" is mentioned more times in the Revelation than in the rest of the N.T. To the overcomer it is given to walk with the Lord in white, to receive a white stone, to be clothed in white raiment. The Son of man sits upon a white cloud, rides a white horse, and finally occupies a great white throne. Righteousness at length shall be brought in, even as Daniel ix. declares it shall be. The all-searching eyes of the Son of man are seen in the "flame of fire." Those eyes saw the evil in the Church of Thyatira (ii. 18), and when He at length rides forth upon the white horse to rule the nations, still it is written, "His eyes were as a flame of fire" (xix. 12). "His feet were like unto shining copper, as if they burned in a furnace." When Ezekiel saw the Cherubim, he tells us that their feet sparkled like the colour of burnished copper (i. 7). When we wish to indicate the failing and earthly character of even the best, we use a figure and say, "After all, they have feet of clay." Nebuchadnezzar's image that he saw in vision, while having a golden head, had feet of clay. The heavenly Cherubim, and the Son of man, have feet that shine like purified burnished copper. John says that His voice sounded like many waters. Ezek. xliii. tells us that when he saw the returning glory of the God of Israel

> "His voice was like the noise of many waters, and the earth shined with His glory. . . . and He said. . . . the place of My throne, and the place of the soles of My feet. . . . shall the house of Israel no more defile."

Rev. i. is preparatory to this returning glory. John saw that the Son of man had control of the seven angels, for "he had in His right hand seven stars." This clause is repeated in ii. 1 and iii. 1. He also had proceeding out of His mouth a sharp two-edged sword. This is referred to in ii. 12 and 16. This sword is to be used in the smiting of the nations (xix. 15-21). If it should seem strange to speak of a sword proceeding from the mouth of the Son of man, Heb. iv. 12 will show the appropriateness of the figure. The word translated "sword" in Rev. i. occurs 6 times in the book, and only once elsewhere, namely Luke ii. 35.

The final description given by John is that His countenance was as the sun shineth in his strength. John had once before seen this glory foreshadowed, when the Lord was transfigured, for we read that "His face did shine as the sun, and His raiment was white as the light." Upon this mount, Peter tells us, the Lord Jesus received "honour and glory." The only occurrence of Son of man in Paul's writings is in Heb. ii. 6, and connects the "honour and glory" with the dominion of Psa. viii. and is given as a pledge of the kingdom over which as Son of man He will reign (Heb. ii. 5-9). Here in Rev. i. John beholds the glorified Son of man, the King Priest after the Order of Melchisedec. The result of this glorious vision upon John was that he fell at His feet as one dead.

Let us rejoice as we think of the high glory that awaits the King of kings, and Lord of lords, and let us not hesitate to render to Him His due.

The Victor of Death. The Prophetic Pledge. (Rev. i. 17-20).

(Special note on the interpretation of verse 19).

pp. 65-69

It may be of service to repeat a portion of the structure of this chapter, which is given in full in Volume IV. & V., page 107. The portion we give shows the parallel of verses 17, 18 and 5, 6.

B | a | 5-. Christ the first begotten from the dead.
b | -5, 6. Result of that death. Redemption.
C | c | 7. His coming. Effect on tribes when they see Him.
d | 8. Title. Alpha and Omega. I AM.

C | c | -17-. His glory. Effect upon John when He saw Him.
d | -17. Title. First and Last. I AM.
B | a | 18-. Christ. I am He that liveth and was dead.
b | -18. Result of that death. Power.

It will be recognized that throughout this chapter the glory and the power that pertain to the Son of man is in virtue of His resurrection. He is the first begotten from the dead—behold, He is alive unto the ages of the ages. He it is Who looses from sins. He also it is that has the keys of hades and of death.

The effect upon the tribes of the land when they see Him whom they pierced is mourning; the effect upon John, who is called the disciple whom Jesus loved, the disciple who seemed to have had the closest intimacy with his Lord in the days of His humiliation, the effect upon him is even greater, he fell at His feet as dead.

When Job, who had heard of the Lord by the hearing of the ear, saw Him, he said, "I am vile," and abhorred himself. When Isaiah could say, "mine eyes have seen the King," he was forced to say, "I am a man of unclean lips." Daniel, as we have seen, tells us that his comeliness turned into corruption and he retained no strength; and John, who had leaned on his Master's bosom, who had taken the Saviour's mother under his protection, he fell at His feet as dead.

All the loud boastings of the men of this world, all the creature-glorifying that constitutes so great a bulk in the travesties of truth that are spreading over the earth, all these pretensions vanish as a summer cloud when the creature stands before the risen glory of Him Who was, and is, and is to come. Though we see Him not with our eyes, this is His high position now. To us He never can be "Jesus"; He is our Lord.

The right hand which held the seven stars was laid upon John, and the first words of the Son of man are heard saying, "Fear not; I am the first and the last." The first time that the Lord said the words, "Fear not," is in Luke viii. 50. The messenger from the house of Jairus came and said, "Thy daughter is dead, trouble not the Master." But He Who, though found in fashion as a man, was to overcome death itself said, "Fear not," and taking the girl by the hand said, "Maid arise." While we do not wish to imply any connection between this first and last utterance of the words, "Fear not" with the glorious title that immediately follows, it is significant that in both cases we find the Lord exercising His authority over death. The connection between the title, "The first and the last" and resurrection is noticeable in ii. 8, "These things saith the first and the last, which was dead and is alive." The original of Rev. i. 17 is more emphatic than in the A.V. The risen Lord does not merely say, "I am the first and the last," but, I I am the first and the last. Isaiah xli. 4 uses this title in connection with God's purpose in Israel, saying, "Calling the generations from the beginning, I the Lord, the first, and with the last." He who called the generations from the beginning, the generations before the call of Abraham, as well as the special generation of the line of the promise through Abraham, He will be also "with the last" when He gathers Israel and blesses the Gentiles. Notice in the context a reference to the making of idols. In xliv. 6 we find the title again, "thus saith the Lord, the King of Israel, and His redeemer the Lord of hosts, I am the first and I am the last, and beside Me there is no God." Note again how verse 9 renews the reference to the making of idols. We meet the title once more in Isa. xlviii. 11, 12, "I will not give my glory unto another. Hearken unto Me O Jacob and Israel, My called; I am He, I am the first, I also am the last." Again see in verse 5 a reference to an idol, graven image, and molten image. These are the three O.T. references to the tile. The title occurs in Revelation also three times. Rev. i. 17, ii. 8, and xxii. 13. There is no doubt when we read Isaiah that this title is claimed exclusively by God. He will not give His glory to another. In the Revelation it is just as exclusively used by Christ as the risen One. We have no argument to set forth. We accept this series of facts as a revelation to our faith and recognize in the Son of man One Who is also the Most High God. Not only does the Lord take to Himself these high glories, but He unfolds the fuller reasons for our confidence in Him, "I am He that liveth, and was dead, and, behold, I am alive unto the ages of the ages, Amen; and have the keys of death and hades." Romans xiv. 9 says, "For to this end Christ both died, and rose, and lived again, that He might be Lord both of the dead and living." Romans vi. 9 says, "Christ being raised from the dead dieth no more; death hath no lordship over Him." He who died, lives, and more than that, He has dominion. He has the keys of death and hades. Keys denote authority. The resurrection of Christ has taken the victory away from death and hades.

The fact that in this opening vision of the Revelation this authority over death and hades is emphasized, links the first chapter with the twentieth, which ushers in the new heavens and new earth.

> "He will swallow up in this mountain the face of the covering covered over all people, and the veil that is spread over the nations. He will swallow up death in victory; and the Lord God will wipe away tears from off all faces" (Isa. xxv. 7, 8).

Hos. xiii. 14 says in a context which speaks of Israel's restoration, "I will ransom them from the power of the grave (sheol, equivalent to hades); I will redeem them from death: O death, I will be thy plagues; O grave I will be thy destruction." He Who has the power of death has been vanquished. A stronger than he has overcome him. This world, still lying in the wicked one, still ruled by the prince of this world and the god of this age, is to give place to the rule of righteousness of heaven's deathless King. Fear not, he says to John, you are about to see evil at the worst development. Satan and Antichrist and demons will conspire together, with death and hades (Rev. vi. 8) as confederates, to fix the curse of sin upon this earth. Fear not John, I live, I control, and finally thou shalt see death and hades, together with Satan and his accomplishes, cast into destruction. With this encouragement, John is told to write that which he sees. Verse 19 has been used as the basis for division of the Revelation in such a way that it has held in its grasp the minds of thousands. This verse is supposed to teach the threefold division of the book.

(1). The things which thou hast seen.
(2). The things which are.
(3). And the things which shall be hereafter.

According to this system of interpretation the messages to the seven churches are the things which are, and consequently the seven churches are taken as the history of the professing church down the age, generally indicating the church of Philadelphia as having special reference to the particular persuasion of the writer for the time being.

The future prophetic part of the book is commenced at chapter iv., where John is told that he will be shewn things which must be hereafter. There is another rendering that adheres closely to the literal wording of the passage and also to the sense of the context, which runs as follows:--

> "Write therefore what things thou sawest, and what they are, even what things are about to happen hereafter."

Alford, Rotherham, Moses Stuart, and Dr. Bullinger among others, have given this as the meaning. That the expression, "and what they are", is a good rendering, meaning "what they represent or signify," may be seen in the very next verse. The seven stars ARE the angels, and the seven lampstands signify the seven churches. Verse 19, therefore, instead of indicating a threefold division of the Revelation, testifies to its unity. John is told to write the things which he sees, say what they signify, and to know that these visions which he interprets are the things that are to take place hereafter. Verse 20 immediately begins to do this for us.

(1). John had seen the seven stars and the seven lampstands.
(2). He is told what they signify, viz., angels and churches.
(3). And he knew that they were to be hereafter.

Instead, therefore, of ransacking the history of Christendom to find something that accords with the statement made in the addresses to the seven churches, we see that the Lord has shown us the things that shall be hereafter. On the earth, in this fast-approaching day of the Lord, will be a believing and tried people (they will not constitute the church of the one body), and for the encouragement and warning of these churches who are the "overcomers" of the rest of the book, this prophecy is written.

In subsequent papers which will deal with these seven churches, we hope to show how closely connected they are with the rest of the book.

We accept the interpretation of the seven stars as all-sufficient. They are seven angels. To re-interpret this as meaning a bishop, or a synagogue overseer is nothing but presumption. Angels figure enough in this book to fix the meaning beyond controversy. It is no new thing for Israel to be placed under the care of angels; Michael the Archangel is their prince, and throughout their history (see Heb. i., ii., Gal. iii. 19, Acts v. 19, Dan. iii.28; vi. 22), angelic ministry was the rule, not the exception. It is perfectly normal therefore to find, in a book which draws aside the veil and shows us some of the heavenly activities, that the little companies of believers in their day of trial are given into the care of angelic custodians.

The Epistles to the Churches. (Rev. ii., iii.).

(A demonstration of the essential unity of the Book).

pp. 97-101

In our last article we drew attention to the marked connection that is made with the book of Daniel, thereby establishing more clearly than ever the truth that the book of the Revelation has special relation to the people of Israel. We further drew attention to what we consider to be the true interpretation of Rev. i. 19, which disposes of the idea that the seven churches must refer to the history of professing Christendom. We saw that the passage taught that what John saw, and what the visions meant, were the things that should be hereafter. If this be so, chapters ii. and iii. contain an unfolding of the mystery of the seven stars and the seven golden lampstands, and relate to the future.

Before we consider the epistles to these churches in detail, we would draw attention to the way in which they fit into the remaining part of the book. Some will be more obviously connected than others, but we believe we shall be able to indicate sufficient points of contact to establish the important fact that the period to which these seven epistles refer is identical with the period covered by the remainder of the Revelation. In other words, the seven epistles throw light upon the spiritual history of the churches from WITHIN, while the remaining visions throw light upon the spiritual history of the same period from WITHOUT. Now although it is not a necessity that the inner history of any particular period should always at all points reflect the outer history, yet we should expect, at places, to find some reflection, and it is to that reflection we now call attention.

In Vol. IV. & V., page 46, the reader will find the structure of the book as a whole. The central member covers chapters iv. to xx., and exhibits a seven-fold division of the visions. In order to show the connection between this seven-fold series of visions, and the seven churches, we will call the first section of this seven-fold division Ephesus, the last Laodicea, and the intervening members according to the order of the seven churches. We can then note anything that seems to connect the attitude of the church with the period indicated by its name.

The Ephesus Church (ii. 1-7).	In the midst seven stars in right hand. Threat to remove lampstand out of its place.
The Ephesus Period (iv. 1 - vii. 3).	In the midst seven-sealed book in right hand. Seven lamps, eyes, spirits. Mountains and islands “moved” (same word as above) out of their places.
The Smyrna Church (ii. 8-11).	Tribulation; faithful unto death; second death; hurt.
The Smyrna Period (vii. 9 - xi. 14).	The great tribulation; two witnesses slain; death; slay; hurt.

The Pergamos Church (ii. 12-17).	Hold fast My name; Satan's throne; the hidden manna; the doctrine of Balaam.
The Pergamos Period (xi. 15-19).	Fear Thy name; the kingdoms of this world become Christ's.
The Thyatira Church (ii. 18-29).	The woman Jezebel; the morning star; the rod of iron; depths of Satan; keep works; faith and patience; false prophetess; her children killed.
The Thyatira Period (xii. and xiii.).	Woman clothed with sun; the twelve stars; the rod of iron; Satan; keep commandment; patience and faith; false prophet; God's children killed.
The Sardis Church (iii. 1-6).	A few with undefiled garments; They shall walk with me in white; Name confessed before the Father.
The Sardis Period (xiv.).	144,000 not defiled; they follow the Lamb; without fault before the throne of God.
The Philadelphia Church (iii. 7-13).	Worship before thee; a pillar in the temple; the name of the City of God – New Jerusalem; the trying of them that dwell on the earth; the hour; I will keep thee out of the hour.
The Philadelphia Period (xv. - xviii.).	Worship before Thee; the temple; the great city Babylon; they that dwell on the earth; one hour; come out My people.
The Laodicea Church (iii. 14-22).	White raiment; supper; faithful and true; Amen; Spue out of mouth; sit in My throne; stand at door.
The Laodicea Period (xix. and xx.).	Fine linen; marriage supper; faithful and true; the Word of God; Out of His mouth a sword; sets on thrones; the Judge.

Such is a summary of the points of resemblance. Let us consider their bearing upon the prophetic unity of the book.

The first church that is addressed is the Church at Ephesus. The Lord speaks of Himself as the One Who holds the seven stars in His right hand, and Who walks in the midst of the seven golden lampstands. The tree of life is spoken of as being "in the midst" of the paradise of God. In the vision which covers the "Ephesus" period, John sees the Lord as a Lamb as it had been slain, having seven horns and seven eyes which are the seven spirits of God sent forth into all the earth. He alone was found worthy to take the seven-sealed book out of the right hand of Him that sat upon the throne. There is a threat made to the church at Ephesus of the removal of their lampstand out of its place. If this threat is taken in conjunction with the actual effect produced by the opening of the sixth seal, when, "every mountain and island were moved out of their places," its force will be the more felt in chapter vii. we read of devastation which is about to fall upon the earth, the sea, and the trees, and this makes the promise to the overcomer of being granted to eat of the tree of life which is in the midst of the paradise of God of greater moment.

Turning to the church at Smyrna we enter into an atmosphere of tribulation; this is the note that is struck in the opening of the Smyrna section. There we find those who came out of great tribulation arrayed in white robes. Death is on every hand, the sea becomes blood, and a third part of its creatures die; many men die of the waters also, that were tunred to wormwood. Not only death, but strange beings who have power to "hurt" (chapter ix.) are spoken of. A limitation is set to their power to hurt, namely, "only those men which have not the seal of God in their foreheads." This lends emphasis and point to the promise to the overcomer at Smyrna—he shall not be "hurt" of the second death. Men may "kill the body," even as they do the faithful believers of chapter xi., hence the exhortation and example, "Be thou faithful unto death" like those two witnesses.

The Church at Pergamos is said to hold fast the Saviour's name, and in the Pergamos section rewards are spoken of for those that "fear Thy name." Satan's throne is at Pergamos, but the church there must remember that soon the true King will reign, according as we read in the corresponding section that the seventh angel sounds, announcing the advent of heaven's King. The promise of the hidden manna takes the mind back to the pot of manna that was laid up in the holiest of all in the Tabernacle, it is appropriate therefore to read in chapter xi. of the temple being opened and the Ark seen; the reference to the doctrine of Balaam is parallel to the reference to those who destroy (or corrupt, see margin) the earth.

The Thyatira Church emphasizes the corrupt state introduced by "that woman Jezebel," and the promise is made to those who have not known the depths of Satan. Those "depths" are seen in the Thyatira section, when the dragon stands upon the sand of the sea, and calls up the beast and the false prophet. "The woman clothed with the sun" is in strong contrast with "that woman Jezebel." Jezebel was a false prophetess, reflecting in the church the presence of the false prophet outside. There is the parallel between those who "keep the works," and those who "keep the commandments." Among other qualities that are commended by the Lord are "faith and patience," and in the corresponding section of the book the "patience and faith" of the saints is a subject to which the reader's attention is particularly drawn. Here again a close parallel is observed between the promise made to the overcomer, and the man child of chapter xii. Both are to "rule the nations with a rod of iron," and so to the end of the series. The diligent student will compare the passages, and see how perfectly the whole fits together.

In the Sardis Church and section the great parallel is that between those who have not defiled their garments, and the 144,000 undefiled ones of chapter xiv.

Philadelphia has many parallels which are obvious in the list already given; the reference to worshipping before them and before the Lord, the two contrasted cities, the emphasis in both sections on "the hour" are important.

Laodicea is the only Church that speaks of "supping," and its corresponding section is the one that contains all the other references to "supper" in the Revelation (xix.). The counsel to buy "white raiment" is evidently in view of the "fine linen" wherewith the bride is clothed. He Who speaks to the church is called the faithful and true witness; He who rides out of heaven in the corresponding section is the same—"faithful and true." The promise to the overcomer, that of sitting with the Lord in His throne, is realized in chapter xx. 4, where those who live and reign, and sit upon thrones are those who have proved themselves faithful witnesses during the time of antichristian oppression. The reference in Rev. iii., "I stand at the door," is linked with the "Judge" by James v. 9, and so with Rev. xx.

This close comparison seems to establish beyond dispute the close interrelation of the seven churches with the rest of the prophecy. Here is a field of search open to the humblest possessor of a Bible. The interpretation that necessitates an intimate knowledge of the history of Christendom for the past nineteen centuries is by force of circumstances limited to the very few. The interpretation we have been led to adopt is absolutely independent of any source of information outside the covers of the inspired Word.

The Nicolaitanes.—The Bane of the Seven Churches. pp. 129-132

When the apostle Paul was inspired to write his epistles to the churches, we find that he wrote to seven. When the Spirit of God would give us a picture of the spiritual state of the day of the Lord, He causes John to write to seven churches in Asia. In our last article we attempted to show the close relation that existed between these seven churches and the remainder of the prophecy of the Revelation.

It is not our intention to take each epistle in detail; we shall content ourselves with drawing attention to one item before passing on to chapter iv.

THE NICOLAITANES.—The church at Ephesus is commended for hating the deeds of the Nicolaitanes. The church at Pergamos is said to have those who hold the doctrine of Balaam and the doctrine of the Nicolaitanes. The church of Smyrna is not associated with the Nicolaitanes by name, but it has to suffer at the hands of those who are called by the Lord, "the synagogue of Satan," just as to the church at Thyatira it is said to as many as have not "this doctrine," and have not known the "depths of Satan." The church at Sardis has some "defiling" tendencies at work among them, and the synagogue of Satan figures again in the church of Philadelphia.

The way in which the doctrine of Balaam is linked with the doctrine of the Nicolaitanes suggests a connection between them. We know from O.T. history, as well as the details given in Rev. ii. 14, what the "doctrine of Balaam" was. When we realize that the Bal-aam means, "lord of the people," and Nikos-laos means "conqueror of the people," we shall possibly perceive that the doctrine of Balaam is the type of the future apostacy of which the doctrine of the Nicolaitanes is the fulfillment or antitype. At the time of the end we see indicated by these epistles a movement set on foot to promote the making of the covenant between Israel and false Christ; to accomplish this end the wicked one introduces his "tares," and among the true worshippers at Ephesus are those who practice the abominable deeds of the Nicolaitames. It would also appear that an attempt had been made to impose upon them an order of false apostles; these had been tried and found to be liars. The deeds of the Nicolaitanes had been also treated with commendable hatred. It would seem from the words of the Lord to the church in Smyrna, that Satan, defeated in his first attempt, resorts to more violent methods. Those who said they were apostles, and were not, are replaced by those who say that they are Jews, and are not; this seems to indicate an attempt to swamp the faithful by numbers of false professors. There is also evidence that persecution is to be stirred up against these faithful ones; the devil is to cast some into prison, and a ten days' tribulation, culminating apparently in the martyrdom of many, will prevail.

At Pergamos we have Satan's throne; there he will dwell. The "deeds" of the Nicolaitanes have now become the "doctrine" of Balaam or of the Nicolaitanes. It appears that prison and persecution having failed to promote the design of the false Christ, persuasion is next attempted. Balaam, who failed to curse Israel from the top of the mountain, taught Balak a most effective way to ensnare that separate people. The church at Pergamos is to be enticed through the medium of the flesh; they will be enticed first of all to eat things sacrificed to idols, and then to the most abominable excesses that have ever been cloaked under the title of religion. By the time we reach the central church we reach the period when the dread covenant with hell and death will be made, and the covenant with Israel broken. The harlot nation is exalted by the beast and is fitly typified by the false prophetess, "that woman Jezebel." Verse 20 compared with verse 14 shows the plague spreading: here we reach the 'depths of Satan."

Death and defilement are visible in the church at this time, a name to live, and ready to die, are the words of the Lord. A few had not defiled their garments, but it seems that many had fallen into the snare. The church in Philadelphia and the church in Laodicea seem set in contrast as indicating the end, the one faithful and overcoming is kept out of the hour of temptation, the other is about to be spued out of the Lord's mouth. No greater picture of their moral rottenness could be presented than is done by this reference to the nausea caused by the condition of the church.

Both Peter and Jude refer to the "error of Balaam" as prophetic of the end, and while there are many things dealt with in these epistles, the gradual leavening of the churches by the evil doctrine and deeds of the "conquerors of the people" seems to underlie most of the failure and the opposition.

A composition between the story of these churches with the history of Israel in the past is very helpful, and readers will find much profit in studying the work of the late Dr. Bullinger, "The Apocalypse, or the Day of the Lord," on this subject. The progress also of the promises, starting with the tree of life in the paradise of God, including the wilderness by the references to the manna, and Balaam, and ending with the kingdom, throne, city, and temple, is also helpfully treated in the same work.

In the midst of the trials and temptations by which the church will be surrounded in the day of the Lord, the faithful are warned and encouraged by having their remembrance of the Lord's dealings with their fathers brought vividly before them, and of the prophecies that point on to the "rest that remaineth" for those who "endure to the end."

In conclusion, may we point out that the overcomer is the one to whom the final words are addressed, whatever state the church may be in as a whole, whether commended or spoken of as being dead, whether faithful or being merely luke-warm. To the individual among them the Lord addresses words of encouragement and cheer. The varying experiences of these overcomers are traced through the remaining chapters of the Revelation; they continually appear either as a persecuted and suffering people, or as raised and crowned and victorious.

While we do not believe that the seven churches of the Revelation as a whole speaks of the church of the mystery, they speak to it. There are lessons of parallel failings, and parallel triumphs, which it is wise for us all to receive with meekness.

"The Throne set in heaven" (Chapter iv.). pp. 161-164

In turning to the teaching of the fourth chapter, we commence the study of the great seven-fold centre of the book. On page 46, Volume IV. & V., will be found the structure of the Revelation as a whole, and the central member, occupying chapters iv. to xx. is made up of a series of seven pairs of visions, the first in each pair being something seen or heard "in heaven," the second being the result or effect "on earth."

The opening heavenly vision occupies chapters iv. and v. The main features are connected with the throne, the book, the Lamb, and the living ones.

The structure is simple and emphasized the two-fold theme of the section, together with the contrast intended to be observed between the elders and the living ones, and the Lamb.

The first vision in heaven (Chapters iv. and v.).

A | iv. 1-8-. The throne. Elders and living ones.
B | -8-11. The saying of the living ones and elders.—Creation.
A | v. 1-7. The throne, book, Lion, Lamb.
B | 8-14. The song of the living ones and elders.
The saying of angels.—Redemption.

From chapter i. 10 to the end of chapter iii. The apostle had been "in the spirit." As the second verse of chapter iv. tells us that he was again "in spirit," we have a sufficient indication that we are dealing with a new vision. The words, "after this," do not necessarily mean that chapter iv. succeeds chapter iii. in order of fulfillment. John hears through the open door of heaven the former voice which he had heard sounding like a trumpet (i. 10) speaking with him, and saying, "come up hither, and I will show thee what things must come to pass hereafter." "Immediately I came to be in spirit," continues the writer, "and, behold a throne was set in heaven." Let it be duly pondered, that at the forefront of this central section we have brought into prominence a THRONE SET IN HEAVEN. It is the day of the Lord, a day of justice, of vengeance, of reward. The Revelation is the book of the throne. Thronos occurs sixty-one times in the N.T., fifteen of these occurrences are apportioned between the books of Matthew to Jude, the remaining forty-six occurrences being found in the Revelation, or more than three times as many as the rest of the N.T. It is not the standing or atmosphere of the church. The throne set in heaven is the central, governing fact of the Revelation. We dare not hurry over our exposition, every item in this opening vision being pregnant with meaning, and containing illumination for the remainder of the visions.

The opening vision of chapter i., which spoke of Him Who ruled among the churches, shewed us the vision of One Who was heaven's Priest. The vision that now opens shows us the throne of heaven's Judge and King. It is suggestive of the change of subject to note the difference carefully.

Chapter i. The voice as a trumpet.	Chapter iv. The voice as a trumpet.
I saw seven golden lampstands. In the midst One like the son of man clothed with garment to the foot, girded with golden girdle, hair like wool and snow, eyes like flame of fire, feet like burnished copper, voice like many waters.	Behold, a throne was set in heaven. One sat thereon. He was like a jasper and a sardine stone: there was a rainbow round the throne like an emerald; lightnings, thunderings and voices.

In chapter i. John sees no other beside the Son of man, but in chapter iv. there are many accompaniments of kingly state. To realize the prophetic import of the words, "a throne set in heaven," we must turn for awhile to O.T. scriptures. Psa. ciii. 19-22 is parallel; we not only have the throne set, but the call to the heavenly powers to bless the Lord, as they do in Rev. iv., "The Lord hath prepared His throne in the heavens; and His kingdom ruleth over all."

Proud Nebuchadnezzar had to learn that "the Most High ruleth among the kingdoms of men," and John, who was to behold in vision the awful days of tribulation, apostacy, and blasphemy, is shewn first of all the throne, that he may know, and that we may know, that all is still within the hollow of His hand, and that "that day" shall vindicate the wisdom, the righteousness and the holiness of Him Who sitteth upon the throne. This is brought out very fully in Psa. xi. There the psalmist says that in the Lord he had put his trust, and the wicked are about him ready to shoot privily at the righteous. "If," says he, "the foundations be destroyed" (as they must be when the righteous are persecuted and the wicked triumph), "what can the righteous do?" For answer he continues, "the Lord is in His holy temple, the Lord's throne is in heaven"; he also summarizes in verse 6 the plagues of the Revelation, "Upon the wicked He shall rain snares, fire and brimstone, and an horrible tempest: this shall be the portion of their cup."

The cluster of Psalms xciii.- xcix. are worthy of close study in relation to our subject; we can only give one or two notes as specimens.

> "The Lord reigneth, He is clothed with majesty" (Psa. xciii.).
> "O Lord to Whom vengeance belongeth. . . . shew Thyself" (Psa. xciv.).
> "O sing unto the Lord a new song. . . . for He cometh, for He cometh to judge the earth" (Psa. xcvi.).
> "The Lord reigneth, let the earth rejoice. Righteousness and judgment, are the habitation of His throne" (Psa. xcix.).
> "The Lord reigneth, Let the people tremble.
> He sitteth between the cherubim, let the earth be moved" (Psa. xcix.).

The balance of thought between the "reigning" and the "sitting between the cherubim" is suggestive, especially in the light of Rev. iv.

Dan. vii. 9-14 seems to speak of this throne.

> "And I beheld till thrones were set, and the Ancient of days did sit, whose garment was white as snow, and the hair of His head like pure wool: His throne was like the fiery flame, and His wheels as burning fire. . . . the judgment was set and the books were opened. . . . . I saw in the night visions, and, behold, one like the Son of man came with the clouds of heaven, and came to the Ancient of days, and they brought Him near before Him, and there was given to Him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all people, nations, and languages, should serve Him."

The importance of the vision of the throne "set" will be appreciated in proportion as we realize the awful character of the time of the end. To us, believers of an entirely different dispensation, the passage is not wanting in its lesson, surrounded as we may be by wickedness and strife. It is our peace to know that unseen and unknown, the Lord is at the right hand of the majesty on high. To us, as to all of every time, the words come, "Be still, and know that I AM GOD," not merely, I am a Deliverer, or a Provider, or a King, or a Consoler, but I AM GOD—to know this, is to reach the goal of our being, and to have learned the lesson of the ages.

Sidelights on the Scriptures.

The Third Egyptian Room.
pp. 29-31

Table case A contains a good set of sandals of various periods. As we look at these, and remember that Israel's shoes did not wear out, neither did their feet swell even though they walked miles in the sandy wilderness, we can appreciate the better both the kindness and the miracle.

Table case B contains a series of weapons, axe-heads, daggers and spears being prominent. Table case C contains a series of writing examples and implements. No. 7 is interesting. It is a school copy, to be hung up for the young students to copy. No. 10 is particularly interesting. It is a working drawing for either a bas-relief or statue of Thothmes III. At the side are a series of rough sketches of the bent arm. What is most striking is the fact that the drawing is made out on a basis of red squares exactly as an architect or engineer would work to scale to-day! This is older than Moses. No. 20 is a school exercise, a geography lesson. The names of Keftin, or "hinterlands", the southern corner of Asia Minor and the Island of Crete are copied out. In this table case there is also a collection of Scribes' palettes. The colour of the paint, red and black chiefly, is quite clear, although some of these palettes were old in Abraham's day.

Table case E contains a collection of wool, combs, spindles, needles, and needlework. No. 1 is marked with "indelible ink", with surely a guarantee behind it that no modern ink can put forward.

Standard case F and G contains a series of vignettes and hieroglyphic texts from the Book of the Dead, as they appear in the Papyrus of Ani, the scribe whose wife's toilet box we described in our last paper. This papyrus measures 78 ft. by 1 ft. 3 ins. The full title of Ani is > "Veritable (i.e. not merely honorary) royal scribe, scribe and accountant of the divine offerings of all the gods, the governor of the granary of the lords of Abydos, scribe of the divine offerings of the gods of Thebes."

His wife was a priestess in the temple of Amen-Ra at Thebes. The papyrus contains some sixty two chapters, there being only a portion of the whole, for the sixty-second chapter of the papyrus is the one hundred and eighty sixth of the whole collection. It would be wearying to the reader to give the chapter headings of all this set, we give one or two that are most suggestive.

2.	Of coming forth by day, and living after death.
17.	Of coming forth by day, of playing at draughts, of sitting in the Sekh hall, and of coming forth as a living soul.
44.	Of dying a second time.
45.	Of not suffering corruption.
77, 78.	Deal with changing into a golden hawk, a god, a lotus, a crocodile, etc.

The true title of this great book is “Per-em-hou”, “The book of the coming forth by day”, from the title of the first chapter. Several chapters are devoted to amulets. For example, a ladder symbolized the ladder by which Osiris ascended to heaven. When the deceased needed a ladder, he simply recited the chapter of the ladder, and he has a ladder to hand as long as he may need. Man in the Egyptian conception is a very complex organization. The material part of man was called the khat or body, through mummification and the due recitation of prayers that body became possessed of knowledge, power, and glory whereby it became incorruptible. This glorified body was called a sãku. One text from this section reads, “my flesh germinateth”. A man also had an abstract personality, a ghostly double, a genius. This was called ka. Provision was made in the tomb for the ka, in the shape of food and drink. A statue was made to represent the deceased, and after a ceremonial, the ka was supposed to enter it. This ka or double could leave the statue and wander abroad. It could even take up its abode in the body of a man from whom his own ka had temporarily gone forth. Thus spiritism and demon possession were rendered quite easy. It is very probable that a reference to the ka is found in Jer. vii. 18, and xliv. 19, the “cakes” or small images of dough are in the Hebrew khavan, Greek khapanos or khabon, which through the Latin still exists in the “hot cross bun” of so called “Good Friday”. Lev. xix. 28 says, “Ye shall not imprint upon yourselves any tracing of an image”, the word “marks” (A.V.) being qa-qa.

The hearts or ab was the seat of life and fountain of good and evil thoughts. This heart was dual, material and spiritual. The spiritual could be stolen by magic. Connected with the ka was the sekhem or vital power, while the mental and spiritual attributes were grouped in the khu. The khu seems to have been a shining intangible essence, and seems to correspond to our word spirit.

The ba was the everlasting part of man and meant the soul. A text of the fifth dynasty reads, “Ba ar pet, sat ar ta,” “Soul to heaven, body to earth.” The souls was usually accompanied by the khaibit or shadow. This sevenfold division of man, subdivided into many mysterious and conflicting functions, gave scope for the lengthy rituals and observances that accompanied the embalming and entombment of the dead. The tradition that man possesses an immortal soul lies at the basis of Egyptian belief. One text reads, “Thou shalt exist for millions of millions of years”. Another approximating to many a modern utterance says, “My soul is God, my soul is eternity.”

It is of course utterly impossible to deal with the Book of the Dead in these pages, the interested reader will find the subject elaborately treated in the publications of the British Museum authorities, but we hardly think the study would be profitable, the Word of truth is our “book of life”, and we need no “Book of the Dead”.

The Second Egyptian Room.
pp. 93-95

The feature of interest to which we draw attention in this room is related to some strange customs of the Egyptians in connection with embalming, and we venture to speak of the rather unpleasant details because we believe there lies buried beneath the accretion of Egyptian idolatry remnants of primitive truth.

In wall case No. 74 will be seen a collection of jars, as shown in our illustration:-- These jars are called Canopic Jars, by reason of some real or supposed connection with Canopus, the pilot of Menelaus. These jars received the internal organs of the deceased. Each Canopic jar was dedicated to one of the four sons of Horus, or Osiris. These were also the gods of the four cardinal points. The jars were provided with the lids which were fashioned to represent the god to whom they were dedicated. The names of the gods are:-

1.	Mestha.	Man-headed.	Protector of stomach and larger intestines.
2.	Hapi.	Dog-headed.	Protector of the smaller intestines.
3.	Tuatmutef.	Jackal-headed.	Protector of the lungs and heart.
4.	Jebhsennuf.	Hawk-headed.	Protector of the liver and gall bladder.

It will be seen that the vital organs, or at least some of them, are placed under the protection of the sons of Horus. Horus was worshipped in Egypt as the child—in the arms of his mother Isis. The Messiah in the Old Testament is sometimes called "Lord" (Heb. Adonai), so Tammuz (another name of Horus) was called Adon or Adonis. As Mithras he is worshipped as the Mediator. As head of the covenant he is called Baal-berith. In India as Vishnu the Preserver, he was worshipped as the great "Victim-Man", and in the exercise of his office as the Remedial god he is said to "extract the thorns of the three worlds." (See Hislop's Two Babylons, Index "Horus"). It will be seen that the four sons of Horus are somehow related to the Pagan conception of redemption. That conception is not pure myth, but rather a distortion of the truth once given to primitive man.

We can well imagine that the awful tragedy of the fall of Adam, and his expulsion from the garden in Eden, would be impressed upon the mind and memories of his children, and that however far they went into idolatry and superstition, something of the original truth would be retained. Satan saw to it that the titles and attributes of the "Seed of the woman" should find a fulfillment in the false Messiahs of Paganism. At the end of Gen. iii. we read of the cherubim that were placed at the gate of Eden's garden, connected with the flaming sword that kept the way of the tree of life. The cherubim are described in Ezekiel and in the Revelation as having the likeness of a lion, an ox, a man, and an eagle. Together they form a pledge that fallen creation shall be restored, that man, with his lost dominion (the cattle, the beast of the field, the fowl of the air), shall ultimately be restored.

The four sons of Horus, with their faces of man, dog, jackal and hawk, perpetuate the same story. Their custody of the vitals of the deceased, speak strongly of the idea that they stand for the preservation and restoration of man.

We do not know that any Authority, either Egyptologist or Expositor, has suggested this connection, but we feel that it is so evident, that it has but to be mentioned to Bible students for them to appreciate the connection. What the Egyptian did perhaps as a meaningless ceremonial, or perhaps under the influence of false hopes, the believer in the Lord Jesus Christ possesses. In fact, for this "the whole creation groaneth. . . . waiting" (Rom. viii. 19-23).

The Egyptian Gallery. The Shepherd Kings. pp. 156-158

The Egyptian Gallery is so arranged that entering it from the north and traversing its length, the monuments and antiquities are placed as far as possible in chronological order. Egyptology divides the history of Egypt into the Ancient Empire, which ends with the eleventh dynasty. The Middle Empire, which ends with the nineteenth dynasty, the New Empire, which ends with the thirtieth dynasty. Then come the Ptolemaic Period, the Roman and the Christian Periods. The Sculptures in the first part of the gallery form a link between the time of Abraham, Joseph, and Moses.

The dynasty to which the Pharaoh belonged who reigned during the time of Joseph was a foreign one. These kings were not Egyptians at all; they were known as the Hyksos, or "Shepherd Kings". Hyk means "king", and sos is derived from shasu, which meant primarily "a robber", the nomad desert man, who plundered the caravans. Later, shasu meant merely "pastoral desert tribes". We can well understand why the "shepherd" was an abomination to the Egyptian, for he was the symbol of their conqueror; we can understand also the reason why Joseph instructs his brethren to tell Pharaoh that they had had dealings with cattle from their youth. The children of Israel found in Pharaoh one of a race much more akin to themselves than to the people over whom he ruled. There seems every reason to believe that the Pharaoh of the time of Joseph was the last of his line, Apophis II. or Apepi. We are told that this Hyksos king "chose the god Set as his master, and served no other god that was in Egypt", and risked civil war in the endeavour to have one god only worshipped in Egypt. The reason for this remarkable turning to monotheism is not far to seek. The one true God had delivered his land from famine; this fact may lessen the difficulty that we may feel regarding the marriage of Joseph with the daughter of a Priest of On. We are told in Gen. xxxix. 1, 2, that Potiphar was (1) an officer of Pharaoh, and (2) an Egyptian. Why should it be noted that Potiphar was an Egyptian? The reason is that it was somewhat rare for the kings of a conquered people to allow one of them an office of responsibility and importance. If we walk along the gallery into the Southern section we shall find in Bay 22 and 20, the head and seated figure in colossal proportions of a Pharaoh; the name inscribed upon the statue is that of Osorkon II., but this king seems to have indulged in the vain-glorious habit of erasing the names of the originals of these monuments, and of appropriating them to himself. (See for other examples Vestibule, West doorway, No. 1146, and Bay 2, No. 688). This colossal figure was discovered at Bubastis; the cartouche of Apepi (the Pharaoh of Joseph) was found, on a door jamb close by, in connection with an inscription which states that he had erected "many columns and bronze doors" in honour of some god, whose name is missing. The Ra-name also of Apepi has been found quite near.

There is a remarkable reference to the famine with which Joseph is so connected in an inscription upon a tomb in El-kab. These are the words:--

> "I collected corn as a friend of the harvest god; I was watchful at the time of sowing, and when a famine arose lasting many years, I distributed corn to the city each year of famine."

This official was living at Thebes at the very time that Joseph was ruling at Memphis.

It may be a fitting place here to give a word as to the title Pharaoh. The word is taken bodily out of the Hebrew and written in English letters. The word, however, is not a Hebrew word, the Hebrew preserves the Egyptian word for us. This title, however, seemed to be limited to the Scripture record, for no such title had been discovered upon the monuments; this omission, as may be supposed, was used against the integrity of the Scriptures, but more recent discoveries have proved the accuracy of the Bible title: a hieroglyph was found to occur as a regular title of the king which signified GREAT HOUSE. The idea contained in the title is current to-day in Turkey, for the Sultan is spoken of as The Sublime Porte, or door. While the meaning of the hieroglyph was known, the way in which the ancient Egyptians pronounced it was not so easy of discovery or of proof. M. de Rouge, however, discovered the true pronunciation, and brought back the long-lost "Pharaoh" of the Hebrew Scriptures. While speaking of this title, it may be of interest to know that the Pharaohs had five great names each, viz.:--

1. A Horus name, as the descendant of the god Horus.
2. A Nepti name, as representative of Nekhebit and Vatchit, the great goddess of the South and North.
3. A Horus of gold name. This has reference to the supposition that the blood of the Sun god was made of gold, consequently as the divine blood ran in the veins of Pharaoh, this name was given to him.
4. A Suten Bat name, as King of the South (Suten) and of the North (Bat).
5. A Son of Ra name, or personal name of the King.

Pharaoh was absolute; every man, woman, and child, together with the whole country, were given to him by the gods, he was believed to be a god, was worshipped as a god, his statues were placed among the statues of the gods, and received adoration. The Egyptians were practically serfs, and Pharaoh held the life of all men in his hand. Such is the measure of the height to which Joseph was advanced; these facts enable us also to understand the nature of Pharaoh's opposition to the "god" of Israel, when he said "Who is the Lord?"

In Egypt and in Egypt's religion we have a mirror held up to the face of human nature left to itself. Rom. i. 19-32, in speaking of the inexcusability of the nations for their lack of the knowledge of the truth, seems to have had Egypt in mind, for it says:--

> "Professing themselves to be wise, they became fools, and changed the glory of the incorruptible God into an image made like to corruptible man, and to birds, and fourfooted beasts, and creeping things."

In our next paper we shall consider the monuments of this gallery, noting the Sidelights on Scripture as we pass through.

The Hope and the Prize.

The Three Spheres Considered.

(Concluded from page 191, Volume VI.).

pp. 5-10

Acts xxvi. 16 states that after the Lord had said, "I am Jesus Whom thou persecutest," He added:--

> "But arise, and stand upon thy feet: for I have appeared unto thee for this purpose, to appoint thee a minister and a witness (note the word "both"; it must indicate more than one, and they are distinguished) both
>
> (1). Of what thou didst see,
> (2). What I shall appear to thee in."

Here it is evident that after Acts ix. Paul was given to expect another commission to be given by the risen Christ at some subsequent date. Acts xx. 24 supplies that date, for Paul is found there looking back on a past ministry, and forward to another of a different character. The word "now" in Acts xxvi. 17 must be omitted. The statement of verse 18 should be compared with Acts xx. 21 on the one hand, and with the parallel passages in Ephesians and Colossians on the other.

One other passage will suffice for the present purpose, that is Eph. iii. 1-11. Again we are met with the designation, "the prisoner of Jesus Christ," but now this prison ministry is more clearly defined, it was "for you Gentiles" (iii. 1). It is immediately connected with a special dispensation, that of the grace of God, which was given to the Apostle with regard to the Gentiles (iii. 2), and it was further connected with "the mystery" which was made known to the Apostle Paul by revelation (iii. 3). This special message is directly connected with a special blessing to the Gentiles, and is exclusively linked to the gospel whereunto Paul was made a minister (iii. 6, 7). Unto Paul was this grace given that he should preach among the Gentiles the unsearchable riches of Christ, and to enlighten all as to the dispensation (R.V.) of the mystery which has been hidden from the ages by (or in) God Who created all things (iii. 8, 9).

Attached to this new dispensation is a new calling, a new sphere of blessing, and a new hope. We shall be able, with this introduction, to take up the theme of the hope and the calling in our next installment.

The Hope of the Calling.

Hope as used in the Scriptural sense is very far from being a vague desire entertained with doubts and fears. Hope is the realization, the fruition, the tangible actuality of all that God has addressed now to our faith, and all that Christ has been made to us. The Hope will bring nothing radically new. It will of course transcend all our fondest imaginings, for in every dispensation it will hold true that "eye hath not see, nor ear heard, neither have entered the heart of man the things that God hath prepared for them that love Him," and it is equally true that in each case it may be added, "but God hath revealed them to us by His Spirit." The definition of faith given in Heb. xi. is often misapplied. Like the Epistle to the Hebrews itself, the faith there mentioned is not the faith that is connected with salvation from sin; it is the faith of the saint in connection with the patience of hope. It is set in strong contrast with Heb. x. 38, 39, where "drawing back" is put in opposition to believing to the "acquiring of the soul." There in Heb. xi. we read, "Now faith is the substance of thins hoped for, the evidence of things not seen." Hope, therefore, will simply be faith realized. There are those who think, despite the fact that some believers totally deny the distinctive ministry of Paul, the unique calling of the One Body, and the peculiar character of the dispensation of the Mystery, that they will nevertheless find themselves enjoying the hope of that elect company in the day to come. That there is commendable humility and charity in the thought we readily admit, but we do not believe it to be true nevertheless. Faith now is linked with hope, it is the substance of things hoped for. Many a believer if asked to detail his hope would be found expecting the heavenly calling on the same grounds as Abraham. The hope of one day entering the New Jerusalem, the Holy City, or of meeting the Lord in the air as He comes to earth once more, these are the things that constitute his hope. The position resolves itself into this. "You tell me your calling, and I will tell you your hope." Hence it is that in Ephesians we read twice of hope as connected with a distinctive calling. Chapter i. 18, "That ye may know what is the hope of His calling," and iv. 4, "One body and one Spirit, even as ye are called in one hope of your calling." Here hope is related to His calling and to your calling. The word "His" in i. 18 refers to God, as may be seen by reading on to verses 19, 20, "His power. . . . which He wrought in Christ." Our hope is connected with the calling of God. We cannot help seeing something more than mere grammatical necessity that makes as a possible reading, "Who is the hope of His calling"—for Col. i. 27 very clearly links the hope, the riches, and the glory of Eph. i. 18, not with something, but with Someone—"To whom God would make known what (or who) is the riches of the glory of this mystery among the Gentiles, which (or who) is Christ among you, the hope of the glory." When we turn to the practical section commencing with chapter iv. then we read not of "His calling," but of "your calling." It is clear from the statement made, that the one body is connected with one hope, which in turn is connected with the definite and particular calling revealed in the Epistles of the mystery.

One of the distinctive marks of the calling of the one body is its heavenly destiny. The word "heavenly" is not full enough to convey all that the word used in Ephesians implies—super-celestial is nearer. In the original of the New Testament two words are employed, both translated "heavenly" (ouranios and epouranios). The added word epi signifies upon or over, and refers to the heavens that are above the firmament, and beyond the limitations of the present creation (compare Genesis i. with Psalms cxlviii. 4, I Kings viii. 27, and Heb. vii. 26).

Further, there is used in Ephesians with this word epouranios, the words which indicate a real locality, and not merely a heavenly character. The words are en tois, "in the." Matt. v. and vi. make several references to the heavens in the same way. "In the heavens" en tois epouranios. "Great is your reward in heaven" (v. 12). The church of the one body looks above these heavens for the hope of its calling. That church is blessed en tois epouranios, in the super-heavenlies. We may learn a little concerning this wondrous sphere by considering several passages in Ephesians. The expression en tois epouranios occurs nowhere else in the N.T.

First in Eph. i. 3 we are told that there is the sphere of our blessing, "Blessed with all spiritual blessing in the super-heavenlies." The next occurrence adds considerably to our understanding. It is where the Lord Jesus Christ went when raised from the dead, where the Father "set Him at His own right hand in the super-heavenlies" (i. 20). Not only is this lofty position defined as such, but it is also further explained as being "far above all principality and power" (i. 21).

Is it necessarily true that because the same words are used of Christ and of His church that they are to be in the same exalted position? As a matter of reasoning we should say no, it does not necessarily follow. The very principalities and powers that are beneath the feet of the Lord are nevertheless in the super-heavenlies (compare i. 21, with iii. 10 and vi. 12 margin). Where reasoning fails us, however, revelation satisfies, for Eph. ii. leaves us in no doubt:--

> "Even when we were dead in sins, hath quickened us together with Christ (be grace ye are saved); and hath raised us up together and made us sit together in the super-heavenlies in Christ Jesus" (Eph. ii. 5, 6).

It seems that in all dispensations Christ can say to His own, "Where I am there shall ye be also." Now the hope of such a calling will have its realization not on earth, not in the millennial kingdom, not in the New Jerusalem, but there, far above all, in the super-heavenlies. It sounds too good to be true, but it is just the overflowing grace of God. "That in the ages to come He might shew the exceeding riches of His grace in His kindness towards us in Christ Jesus." (Eph. ii. 7). Philippians iii. 14 speaks of "the high calling of God." The whole verse will come under notice when we are dealing with the prize (here we are considering the hope), but this passage must not be passed over in our review of the calling. We have seen that it is super-heavenly, it is far above all; here the Apostle calls it high calling. We are aware that many will correct us and say that the passage should be rendered "our calling on high," referring to a time when God will call us from this scene up to Himself. The word "high" is anõ, and anõ is an adverb. It is the rule in English grammar that adverbs qualify the verbs, and adjectives the nouns. Anõ being an adverb, "calling" therefore must be a verb and for clearness sake we should translate it, "the summons on high," or "the upward summons." Before we can consider the matter settled, however, we must face the fact that the word "calling" is not a verb, and cannot mean a future summons or call, but means a present vocation. It is the same word that comes in Eph. iv. 1, "The vocation wherewith ye were called." In our English tongue the one word "calling" may be either a noun, a calling, as we speak of someone's profession, or a verb, someone calling us. The fact that we are dealing with a vocation, and not a summons, brings us back to the adverb anõ in Phil. iii. 14. Col. iii. 1 says, "Seek those things which are above." Here we find the words are simply ta-anõ. In John viii. 23 we read, "I am from above" (ek tõn anõ). Gal. iv. 26 provides us with an exact parallel to Phil. iii. 14, "But Jerusalem which is above" (he anõ Hierousalem). In all these passages, as in Phil. iii. 14, the article is used, and just as Gal. iv. 26 can mean nothing else than the Jerusalem which is above, so Phil. iii. 14 can mean nothing more than the vocation which is above, or as rendered in the A.V., "the high calling." We want no false hopes or expectations. Many of the Lord's believing children have entertained the hope of an "upward calling" by reason of the interpretation given to this verse. If there be such a calling on high for the members of the one body it must be founded upon some other scripture than this. We have a high and a super-heavenly calling. With this our hope is definitely linked.

Further phases of this wondrous subject we hope to consider in our next article.

"The Hope of the Glory."
pp. 25-28

When the Lord Jesus Christ is met in the air by those who shall be gathered to Him, He will already have been proclaimed throughout the heavens. The clarion cry, "The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord and His Christ," will have been heard above.

The Lord will have at length risen up from His place at the right hand of God, for His enemies will have been prepared as a footstool for His feet. The times of refreshing which are to flow from the presence of the Lord will have drawn near. Heaven's King will be about to take the sceptre and reign. At what point of this great scene does the church of the one body realize its hope? Are they summoned by the Archangel Michael, the Prince who stands for the people of Israel? Do the members of His body, whose whole sphere of blessing is in the super-heavenlies, do they meet the Lord in the air? If they do, the usage and meaning of the word "meet" indicate that like the virgins in the parable, or Paul's friends who met him on the way to Rome, they accompany Him on His journey and return with Him to the earth. This, however, seems hardly to accord with the expression, "the hope of your calling," for that calling is clearly connected with the super-heavenlies.

It will be remembered that a few verses in Col. i. restate the teaching of Eph. i. 18, adding information in several particulars and in one especially to the point just now. Col. i. 25-27 tells us that Paul was made a minister of the church of the one body according to the dispensation of God given him to you (Gentiles, Eph. iii. 1, 2), which ministry filled up the Word of God. This completing of the Word was the mystery which had been hidden since the ages and since the generations (which generations commenced in Gen. ii.), but is now manifested during this dispensation to His saints, to whom God would make known Who is (or what is) the riches of the glory of this mystery (see ii. 2, 3) among (en) the Gentiles, which is Christ among (en) you, the hope of the GLORY. The fact that God could deal with the Gentiles irrespective of Israel, was evidenced by the proclamation of Christ among them in the terms of the mystery, and was itself the pledge of a hope which Ephesians i. had already defined as "the hope of His calling," and here defined still further as "the hope of the glory." There is a parallel here to the much discussed passage of I Tim. iii. 16, to which we may be able to refer later. The added information which Col. i. supplies is that the hope of those to whom Christ has been preached under the terms of the mystery, is the hope of the glory.

Now, of itself this is nothing new, for glory characterizes the hope of creation, of Israel, of the heavenly calling, of the overcomers as well as the church of the one body. We know, however, that just as there is one glory of the sun, and another glory of the moon, so the glory that forms the hope of, say, Israel as a nation, is a different glory from that which forms the hope of the faithful overcomer. The third chapter will throw light upon our enquiry. Verse 4 says, "When Christ Who is our life shall be made manifest, then shall ye also be made manifest WITH HIM IN GLORY." The context emphasizes the fact that "things above" are to occupy our minds, "where Christ sitteth on the right hand of God." There, our life is hid, there, in Christ we are already seated, there, our hope is to be realized. The Lord Jesus Christ will one day "be manifested in glory," not merely to the inhabitants of the earth, nor to those who are caught up to meet Him in the air, but to principalities and powers in the heavenlies. The knees of "things in heaven" as well as on the earth are to bow in recognition of His glory (Heb. i. 6); and there in that super-heavenly manifestation of His glory our hope shall be realized.

A very homely illustration may help us here. When the King of England was crowned, many thousands lined the route of the Royal procession, and gave expression to their loyalty by so doing, some, however, for various reasons did not do so, and among them were those who by rank and privilege had access to the Abbey and to the actual coronation. What need had they, the privileged nobility, of standing in the streets to greet the King? So, may be illustrated the hope of the church of the one body. Privileged by wondrous grace to be present at the coronation of heaven's King, their hope will be realized before that of others, of different rank, who will rise to meet Him in the air, or enter into the holy city.

Titus ii. 13 has a similar testimony to that of Colossians, "looking for that blessed hope, even the manifesting of the glory of our great God and Saviour Jesus Christ."

Some have said that this teaching is all so vague, and draw attention to the detailed statements of Scripture wherein the hope of Israel is set before the reader. Chapter after chapter of Old Testament Prophets unfolds the glories that are coming. Details too are given concerning the hope of the believer in the Gospels and earlier Epistles. Points of time, marks in history, signs and indications are given so that the proximity of the realization of their hope shall be known, but this hope, this is so vague! Instead of such a remark proving our exposition to be wrong, it lends a strong confirmation when considered in the light of Ephesians i.

We believe that in "The Bible" we have "all Scripture," no revelation has been given since the writing of the Book of the Revelation that was intended to form part of Holy Writ. Further, we do not believer that any part of Holy Scripture has been lost, or will be discovered. Many of the writings of Apostles and others may have perished, but not one that was given by inspiration for the use of the Church for all time. Yet, look at Eph. i. 15-23. Taking as his basis the fact of faith in the Lord Jesus, the Apostle declares that he prayed to God that He would give unto them the spirit of wisdom and revelation in the knowledge of Him (the eyes of your heart having been enlightened) that ye may know what is the hope of His calling. The Apostle does not say that he was about to give them further teaching, nor that he was about to reveal anything to them, he simply tells them that he prayed for them that they might have a revelation. Further, this prayer was not temporary in character, awaiting the full written statement, but was incorporated into Scripture itself; it is truth for us now that all Scripture has been completed.

The knowledge of the Scriptures must be supplemented by a spirit of wisdom and revelation in the knowledge of Him. Illuminated hearts may have revealed to them "What is the hope of His calling." Others will truthfully say, "I cannot see it." To entertain the hope of the glory will be accompanied by the desire to be presented perfect in Christ Jesus (Col. i. 27, 28). To look forward to being manifested with Him in glory will be followed by a desire to mortify the members that are on the earth and to set the mind on things above (Col. iii. 1-5). To have before one the blessed hope, even the manifesting of the glory, will mean that we shall live soberly, righteously and godly in this present age (Titus ii. 12, 13). So it is with the only other occurrence of the word glory in Colossians. They who have before them the hope of the glory, and of being manifested in glory, are "strengthened with all might according to the strength of His glory unto all patience" (Col. i. 11). The patience of the hope is here before us. The glory that is to be revealed provides the strength for present patience.

May grace be given to all who have such a hope to be able to walk in the strength of it now with all patience, longsuffering, and joyfulness, for they have an inheritance in the light (Col. i. 12), which is a parallel expression to the two words that summarizes our hope, "in glory."

The Prize of the High Calling.
pp. 38-41

We have already endeavored to show that the words, "The high calling," refer to the vocation wherewith we are called and not to a future "calling on high," even though such an event may be a truth of Scripture. To read Eph. i. and ii. will dispose of any idea that this high calling is in any sense a "prize," it is in every sense a free gift of unmerited grace. The expression, "the prize of the high calling," therefore, cannot be rendered "the prize, that is to say, the high calling." The expression conveys the teaching that connected with the free grace calling there is a prize. Now it is in the nature of a prize that it must be won. It is the crown of effort and desire. Associated with the idea of running for a prize will always be a measure of uncertainty, and also of the need for the exercise of disciple and endurance. I Cor. ix. 24 gives many of these items.

> "Know ye not that they which run in a race run all, but one receiveth the prize? So run, that ye may obtain. And every man that striveth in the games exerciseth self control in all things. . . . I therefore so run, as not uncertainly, so I strike (the word for boxing) as not beating air; but I severely keep under (really give a black eye - another boxing term) my body, and lead it captive, lest by any means, after having proclaimed to others, I myself should become disqualified."

Turning now to Philippians iii., let us note the context of the passage which deals with the prize of the high calling. The understanding will be helped by observing the corresponding section of the epistle to that which deals with Paul and the prize. Omitting all detail for the present, the following will exhibit the chief points:--

Phil. i. 27 - iv. 2.

A | i. 27-ii. 4. Stand fast, same love, same soul.
B | ii. 5. "The mind of Christ."
C | ii. 6-11. The sevenfold humiliation and consequent exaltation of Christ.
D | ii. 12-30. The Philippians. Paul. Timothy. Epaphroditus.
C | iii. 1-14. The sevenfold loss and gain of the Apostle Paul.
B | iii. 21. "The body of His glory."
A | iv. 1, 2. Stand fast, same mind.

The members B and C are the most important at present. The teaching of B | ii. 5 and B | iii. 21, the intimate relation between the mind of Christ and the future body of glory, we must leave till later. The members C | ii. 6-11 and C | iii. 1-14 are those requiring immediate attention.

Before we proceed we must ask our readers to put aside any suggestion regarding this epistle which they have not tested, particularly the one that Philippians is corrective of failure to understand the teaching of Ephesians. A careful study of the epistle fails to substantiate such an idea. What we have found is that unless Ephesians is believed and understood, Philippians will remain a sealed book. Instead of Philippians being on a lower plane than Ephesians, it is a step forward. It takes for granted that its readers entertain the hope of the calling, and so leads them on to consider their place in relation to the prize of the high calling. While the wonders of Ephesians arise from the fulness of Christ, the marvels of Philippians flow from His self emptying, and the fellowship of His sufferings. Philippians i. 29 shows what a step forward is taken when it says:--

> "For unto you it is graciously given in the behalf of Christ, not only to believe on Him, but also to suffer for His sake."
