The method we have adopted to achieve these ends has been that of giving quotations from one or two writers, and comparing them with Scripture. We trust that the interest of the reader is sufficiently aroused to justify an examination of the history of this quest of unassisted wisdom, so that by comparing their guesses at truth with the clear statements of revelation, we may be moved to greater gratitude to the Lord for the gift of His Word.

As Israel, the custodians of the oracles of God, fell from their high position, and sovereignty was transferred to the Gentiles, as the voice of prophecy ceased, and the centuries passed between the close of the O.T. and the announcement of the Forerunner, the Gentile world gave birth to a line of men whose wisdom and prowess are still accounted remarkable, and whose influence is still strong and penetrating.

Before the night of darkness was illuminated by "the Dayspring from on high" at the birth of Christ, human wisdom had about three hundred years in which to attempt to discover the cause of all things, to arrive at the answer to the question "What is good?" to solve the problem of good and evil by its own unaided reason. That it hopelessly failed is a fact we must all acknowledge. That it missed the one essential thing that God alone could provide, is the testimony of our faith; but just as the Lord permitted the people of Israel to manifest for all time the utter failure of Law to justify a sinner, so He permitted the Gentile, and particularly the Greek, to manifest the utter failure of human reasoning to find God.

The remedy for the failure of Israel is expressed in the words:—

> "For Christ is the end of the Law for righteousness to every one that believeth" (Rom. x. 4).

The remedy for the failure of the Greek is expressed in the words:—

> "Christ, in Whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge" (Col. ii. 3).
> "For the Jews require a sign, and the Greeks seek after wisdom, but we preach Christ crucified . . . . Christ the power of God (for the Jew), and the wisdom of God (for the Greek) . . . . Of Him are ye in Christ Jesus, Who of God is made unto us wisdom and righteousness as well as (Gk. te) sanctification and redemption" (1 Cor. i. 22, 24, 30).

It may be useful to give first a few of the outstanding names of those who, after the close of O.T. revelation, filled the interval up to the opening of the N.T.

HERODOTUS—"The Father of History" (484 B.C.).—He was born a hundred years after the death of Isaiah, and twelve years before the first year of Nebuchadnezzar's dominion. He was contemporary with Daniel, and his history is virtually a history of the world as then known, embellished with many digressions both archæological and geographical. The idea that arrogance and pride surely bring with them the punishment of heaven runs through his whole work, but the one glorious undercurrent of the inspired history of the Bible is wanting. He did not know the blessed promise of the "Seed of the woman," Who should bruise the serpent's head.

SOCRATES—Philosopher (469 B.C.).—He is accredited with the invention of the word "philosopher." He accepted the principle, Gnothi seauton, "Know thyself," and held that "the proper study of mankind is man." Where Socrates failed was that he did not know Him "Whom to know is life eternal."

HIPPOCRATES—"The Father of Medicine" (460 B.C.).

PLATO—Philosopher (429 B.C.).—He sought to solve the riddle of the universe by the discovery of the Ultimate Good. His quest was right, but he lost his way, and ended in abstractions. Christ alone makes the Ultimate Good both real and attainable to mortal man. Plato's influence has extended to the present time, and the world of thought will never be free from indebtedness to him—but salvation and life were beyond his ken.

ARISTOTLE—"The Father of Learning" (384 B.C.).—Turning from the Platonic unity of being, Aristotle directed his attention to the variety that is in the world, and as an instrument in this investigation he brought Logic to a very high pitch of completeness. But Logic, however useful in discovering the fallacious, needs revealed truth for its premises, and that revelation Aristotle did not possess. With the Scriptures open before us, we can thankfully use the Syllogism, and discover truth that Aristotle never knew.

ZENO—The Founder of Stoicism (342 B.C.).—At his death a monument was erected to his memory, with the words: "His life corresponded with his precepts."

EPICURUS—The Founder of Epicureanism (340 B.C.).—His motto was: "The greatest good for the entire life." If he had known of the life to come, and had enunciated his motto with that in view, none could find fault. As it was "the entire life" held no certain hope, and without resurrection, Epicureanism degenerated into: "Eat, drink and be merry."

EUCLID—"The Father of Mathematics" (300 B.C.).

CLEANTHES—Philosopher (300 B.C.).—We know him best by a hymn to Zeus, from which the apostle quotes in Acts xvii. 28.

ARCHIMEDES—"The Father of Mechanics" (287 B.C.).—We remember him for his famous discovery in hydrostatics with the exultant cry "Eureka;" for the Archimedian screw, and for his saying, "Give me a lever long enough, and I will move the earth."

HIPPARCHUS—"The Father of Astronomy" (150 B.C.).—He made a catalogue of 1,080 stars, and invented trigonometry.

Such are a few of the outstanding names that contributed to the wisdom of the world during the silent years that followed the close of the O.T. canon. All these men were pre-eminent in their respective subjects, great in thought and of wide-spread influence. They are still admired to-day, and their works underlie much of modern education. Their contribution to the stock of human knowledge can never be estimated, and yet it can all be summed up in the words of another wise man: "Vanity and vexation of spirit."

Without the personal Christ, without deliverance from sin, without acceptance with God, without the blessed hope of resurrection glory, we have the testimony of 1 Cor. xv. that all is vanity. We do not scorn or despise these ancient seekers. We regard their "feeling after God" with keen sympathy, and we turn afresh to the Word, living and written, and say with even deeper meaning:—

"To whom shall we go? Thou hast the words of eternal life."

Paul and his Companions.

No. 6.

Timothy: The son.

Whether or not Paul was married is a moot point with students of Scripture. That he had full liberty in the matter he makes clear in 1 Cor. ix. 5, but we know that no wife ever accompanied him on his travels, or is mentioned by him.

The first of the six hundred and thirteen commandments of Jewish tradition is the law of marriage, and Maimonides says, "He that lives to such an age, and marries not, transgresseth a preceptive law." Paul could hardly have described himself as a zealot for the traditions of his fathers (Gal. i. 14), nor would he have been commissioned by the Sanhedrin, as he was, had he avoided marriage. The truth seems to be that Paul was a widower, and for the sake of the gospel and its ministry he refrained from marrying again. Apparently he stood alone, and had no children. God, in His tender mercy, not only gave helpers, like Barnabas and Silas, who stepped into the breach, fulfilled the purpose of their call, and then retired, but He also bestowed upon Paul a "son," and thus gave him an object for anxious care and solicitude, for He knows as none other the heart of man. Timothy was a young believer living at either Derbe or Lystra; his mother was a Jewess and his father a Greek. We learn from 2 Tim. i. 5, that both his mother Eunice, and his grandmother Lois were believers, and from 2 Tim. iii. 15 that from his earliest childhood (brephos) he had been taught the holy Scriptures. Timothy differed in several respects from Barnabas and Silas.

In the first place Barnabas and Silas were mature believers, and, in the case of Barnabas, Paul was, in the first instance, taken under his wing and introduced into the circle of faith at Jerusalem. Silas was a "leader," one who had hazarded his life for Christ's sake, and a prophet. There is a marked contrast between these men of standing and robust service, and Timothy. Timothy was young, and even as far on in the story as the writing of the first epistle to Timothy, Paul says to him: "Let no man despise thy youth," and in 2 Tim. ii. 22: "Flee also youthful lusts." Timothy was apparently, never very robust in health, and was inclined to lean too much to the abstemious side of life, so that Paul was obliged to write, in 1 Tim. v. 23: "Be no longer a water drinker, but use a little wine for thy stomach's sake and thine oft infirmities." Those who cannot enter into the circumstances of the case have made a difficulty of this interjection about drinking water. But the apparent irrelevance of "elect angels," "impartiality in judgment," and "taking a little wine" vanishes when we enter into the deep concern of Paul for his son in the faith who was placed in so responsible a position. Timothy was not naturally a bold man. The very contemplation of hazarding his life would be an agony. To him Paul writes: "God hath not given us the spirit of cowardice . . . . be not thou therefore ashamed" (2 Tim. i. 7, 8). It was this man who was destined to succeed the intrepid apostle, and who was told in his latest letter that the work of an evangelist and the enduring of afflictions went together (2 Tim. iv. 5).

Secondly, both Barnabas and Silas were Jews. In the case of Silas his usefulness was increased by the fact that he was a Roman citizen, and so was especially adapted for the work he did with Paul in Thessalonica and Corinth. Timothy was connected by birth both with Jew and Greek, and to ensure his acceptance in the synagogue ministry, which was a feature of great importance in the early ministry of Paul, Timothy was circumcised before he set forth on that journey which was destined to bear such fruits of grace.

There is surely a third difference, and one which, perhaps, more than any other, was of special value to Paul himself. Timothy was not independent. Barnabas and Silas helped Paul, but for many years, and perhaps throughout his whole life, Paul continually felt the claim of Timothy upon him. His youth, his delicate constitution, his shrinking spirit, provided just that demand upon the apostle, that perhaps saved him many a time from being overwhelmed with his own griefs. He was obliged to set aside his own sorrows in his anxiety for Timothy. Barnabas was an encourager, and stepped aside when his work was done. Silas was a succourer, who stood in the breach and did yeoman service for a specific time, but Timothy was a son, and as a son he remained to the end.

> "For this cause have I sent unto you Timotheus, who is my beloved son, and faithful in the Lord" (1 Cor. iv. 17).
> "I trust in the Lord Jesus to send Timotheus shortly unto you, that I also may be of good comfort, when I know your state . . . . For all seek their own, not the things which are Jesus Christ's. But ye know the proof of him, that, as a son with a father, he hath served with me in the gospel" (Phil. ii. 19—22).
>
> "Paul an apostle . . . . unto Timothy my own son in the faith" (1 Tim. i. 2).
>
> "This charge I commit unto thee, son Timothy" (1 Tim. i. 18).
>
> "Paul an apostle . . . . to Timothy my dearly beloved son" (2 Tim. i. 1, 2).
> "Thou therefore, my son, be strong in the grace that is in Christ Jesus" (2 Tim. ii. 1).

It should be remembered that the apostle does not use the word huios, "son," in these passages, but teknon, "child." The choice of the word is in harmony with the purpose of Timothy's place, for teknon speaks of affection and endearment, whereas huios has more the sense of the dignity that attaches to sonship and inheritance.

The references to Timothy in the Acts suggest steps in the training fitting him for the great work awaiting. His association with the older man, Silas, must have been of great help, and it must have been an experience for the timid young man to find his leaders thrown into prison. So, also, it was in the nature of discipline for him to remain behind at Berea, with Silas, to cover the departure of Paul (Acts xvii. 14). Again, in travelling from place to place, as for instance the journey from Berea to Corinth, valuable experience would be gained (Acts xviii. 5). On the return journey to Macedonia his companion was Erastus, Chamberlain of the city of Corinth (Acts xix. 22; Rom. xvi. 23). From him he could not but have learned much useful information concerning that city and its ways. In Acts xx. 4, he is found gaining further experience in company with Sopater of Berea, Aristarchus and Secundus of Thessalonica, Gaius of Derbe, and Tychicus and Trophimus of Asia.

Timothy remained true to the apostle throughout the epoch-making days of Acts xxviii., and passed into the glorious fellowship of the mystery, not only as a member of the body of Christ, but as one upon whom was conferred the signal honours of the charge of a church such as that at Ephesus, and succession to the great apostle in carrying forward the ministry of the mystery.

The apostle explained that he suffered in the flesh lest the abundance of the revelations granted to him should engender pride (2 Cor. xii. 7). Possibly, too, he was saved from introspection, self-pity and hardening, during his perilous life, by the constant claims made upon his care, his love, and his pity by his son Timothy. God's gifts are not always in accord with our estimate, and had Barnabas or Silas never left Paul, he might not have been quite the same man of grace that we rejoice to know. Barnabas gave the apostle nerve, and Silas stimulated him to great boldness, but Timothy tugged at his heart strings, and his tears and his fears were as necessary for Paul, as Paul's strength and grace were for his beloved son.

The epistle to the Romans.

No. 59.

The Spirit's intercession (Rom. viii. 22—28).

In the first section of this member of Rom. viii. we have the spirit as the first-fruits, with its effect in patient waiting for the hope which is not seen, but which is nevertheless real to faith. In the second section, which occupies verse 26, we have the Spirit "helping" and "interceding" for the children of God.

> "Likewise the Spirit also helpeth our infirmities: for we know not what we should pray for as we ought; but the Spirit itself maketh intercession for us with groanings which cannot be uttered" (Rom. viii. 26)

The structure of this section is as follows:—

"We know not" (Rom. viii. 26).

A | The Spirit helpeth our infirmity.
B | Prayer.
C | As we ought.

A | The Spirit maketh intercession.
B | Groanings.
C | Cannot be uttered.

The reader will remember that the expression "the Spirit itself" occurs twice in Rom. viii., and that the two occurrences are found in correspondence in the structure (see Vol. xxv., page 72). In his book entitled, "S and s, or The use and usage of pneuma in the New Testament," Dr. Bullinger writes, concerning Rom. viii. 16:—

> "Now we come to the change in the usage of pneuma in this chapter. It is most marked and unmistakeable, because in this verse we have pneuma twice. The first time it is the Holy Spirit Who is spoken of as the One Who, having been the Giver of this wondrous gift of the pneuma, or new nature, now witnesses with it and through it; speaking to us, and communicating with us, through it. 'The Pneuma (or Spirit) Himself beareth witness with our pneuma, that we are God's children.'"

The verse now before us (26) refers in like manner to the Holy Spirit, and His fellowship with the believer, the recipient of His gift.

The verse commences with the word hosautōs, "in the same manner." There is evidently something in verse 26 which is parallel with what has gone before. What is this parallel? In verse 26, we have the Spirit helping our infirmities. These infirmities are but another aspect of the "sufferings," the "bondage of corruption," the "groanings," the "vanity" already referred to; and just as "hope" and "patience" and "expectation" help the believer while pressed on every side with the evidences of corruption and vanity, so, in like manner, we are to learn that the Spirit helps, cheers, assists us in our pilgrim journey.

The word translated "help" is sunantilambanomai, made up of sun, "together with," anti, "opposite," and lambanomai, "to hold or take." Piscator says of antilambanomai that it properly denotes the "supporting of a burden with another person, and, as it were, on the other side." His reference is 1 Tim. vi. 2, where the A.V. renders the word "partaker." The addition of sun to the word emphasises the fellowship and co-operation of the Holy Spirit, Who together with us takes up the burden of our infirmities.

In the days of His flesh, the Lord said:

> "Come unto Me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest. Take My yoke upon you, and learn of Me: for I am meek and lowly in heart; and ye shall find rest unto your souls. For my yoke is easy, and My burden is light" (Matt. xi. 28—30).

Here the essential thought is that of the "yoke," which indicates fellowship in bearing the burden.

It is very evident that the teaching of Rom. viii. 26 is co-operation and not passiveness. True, we are weak and mortal in ourselves; but we are redeemed, we have the the spirit of sonship, and that very spirit quickens our mortal bodies, witnessing with our spirit and helping with our infirmities. J. N. Darby translates this verse: "And in like manner the Spirit joins also Its help to our weakness." In a footnote he writes:

> "Antilambanō is to take up a person's cause, so as to help him. But we have sun, 'with,' added, which I have rendered by the word 'join,' though not satisfied with it."

This co-operating assistance of the Spirit is because of our "infirmity." The A.V. reads "infirmities," but the best texts give the word in the singular. It is not so much each individual weakness that is intended, but the root of all weakness, that which is characteristic of the flesh.

This weakness, characteristic of the flesh, is variously described. In Rom. viii. 3 we learn that the weakness of the flesh in those to whom the law came, rendered the law useless for salvation or life. The apostle recognizes, in Rom. vi. 19, that the infirmity of the flesh extends even to the inability to follow a closely reasoned statement; and, writing to Timothy, he speaks of his "stomach and his oft infirmities," thereby including the weakness that pertains to ill-health.

For the initial helplessness of our fallen condition, nothing less than the death of Christ suffices.

> "For when we were yet without strength, in due time Christ died on behalf of the ungodly" (Rom. v. 6).

Such are ungodly no more. They are, however, not yet in glory, and until they are there, they will always be compassed with infirmity. Here the Spirit helps, and the word huper, which we translated "on behalf of" in Rom. v. 6 above, now comes into use in the words "intercession for us." This is the Scriptural order. First, Christ "for us"; then, the Spirit "for us." The reverse order is impossible.

Out of all the infirmities that might have been recorded, the apostle selects one—the weakness of the believer in connection with prayer. In ministry we often find weakness, as did the apostle himself (1 Cor. ii. 3), but ministry is not on so high a plane as the exercise of the great privilege of audience with God. When one ponders this verse, and then thinks of the long prayers that have been and still are uttered, with well-rounded periods and beautifully chosen words, one wonders. Here, the believer is considered too weak to rise to the heights of this spiritual fellowship, and the Spirit comes to his aid—not to furnish him with a ready tongue, but to intercede with groanings that cannot be uttered.

The idea of the word "intercession" in English always carries with it the thought of "interceding for," but this is not the case with the Greek. Romans provides us with an example of the other meaning; in xi. 2 we read of Elijah who made intercession to God against Israel. The word entugchanō, "intercede," means primarily to fall in with, meet with, apply to, and then, in a special sense, to intercede either for or against others.

The first occurrence of the word in Rom. viii. is combined with huper, "on behalf of." The Holy Spirit falls in with us, meets us, intercedes on our behalf, and by so doing "joins also His help to our weakness." Lower down in the chapter we meet with the statement that Christ at the right hand of God "intercedes on our behalf" (Rom. viii. 34), of which we must speak more particularly in its place.

The intercession of the Spirit on behalf of the saints is because "we know not what to pray for as we ought" (Rom. viii. 26). What a rebuke this statement ministers to those who seem not only cognisant of the whole needs of mankind and the church, but who have no difficulty or hesitancy in telling God so, sometimes going further, and "claiming" answers to their prayers.

Even when the Spirit lends His aid, the prayers are no more eloquent to the outer ear than "groanings," and so far from our being delivered from inability of expression, these groanings "cannot be uttered." We look back from verse 26, to the corresponding verse 15, and there we find that the Spirit of sonship cries, "Abba, Father." In that cry, all prayer is condensed and exhausted. With that word the prayer of Matt. vi. opens: "After this manner therefore pray ye: Our Father . . . . " In John xvii. we read: "Jesus lifted up his eyes to heaven and said, Father . . . . " The central prayer of the church (Eph. iii. 14 - 21) is addressed to "The Father." The more we know that blessed Name, the shorter our prayers will become.

> "They think that they shall be heard for their much speaking. Be not, therefore, like unto them, for your Father knoweth what things ye have need of, before ye ask Him" (Matt. vi. 7, 8).

The fact that the prayer of the believer is likened to a groan, and that a groan is heard arising from the whole creation, reveals the true nature of the struggle within. We are surrounded and beset by infirmity. When we would do good, evil is present with us. Mortality is evident in our highest and best aspirations. Our highest act of fellowship ends in a groan. Like Isaiah we have entered into the holy Presence, only to cry out, "Woe is me."

For all that, we rejoice. We stand accepted; we are unashamed. We are redeemed and justified. Nothing can alter that fact. Our infirmity is conected with the fact that we are not yet glorified. Soon the groan will give place to joy, soon we shall exchange the straitness and weakness of the present for the liberty of the glory that awaits us; but this pertains to resurrection. Meanwhile it is for our peace that we recognise both our weakness and His supply, and that we ever remember that no prayer is so full or so sure of an answer as that single cry of the spirit of sonship, "Abba, Father."

The Hope and the Prize.

Phil. i. 21—25.

What is the right interpretation?

(Reprinted from Volume VI.).

It would add considerable weight to our argument if we were to show the close parallel that exists between Philippians and 2 Timothy, an aspect of truth which we hope to point out in a subsequent number. Two passages only will suffice at present. In Phil. i. 23 we read that the apostle desired (analuō), and in Phil. ii. 17 that even should his ministry involve his being poured out as a drink offering (spendomai) he would rejoice. In 2 Timothy iv. 6 the apostle says, "I am already being poured out as a drink offering (spendomai), and the season for my departure (analusis) has come near." Here the apostle uses the substantive instead of the verbal form, but the parallel is most evident. That which he desired and was willing for in Philippians has come to pass in 2 Tim. iv. There is no possible chance of missing the meaning of analusis. "My analusis" must mean my dissolution, my departure, my return. Phil. i. 23 must be interpreted in the light of the certainty of 2 Tim. iv. 6. The only return that analusis can indicate is death. This also is the meaning of analuō in Phil. i. 23. If there is a difficulty in the linking together of death and of being with Christ, without any explanatory clause to bridge the intervening period, it is not the only one of its kind, and must not influence our decision. 2 Cor. v. 8 brings the two together without feeling the necessity for a parenthetical explanation. If any should say, Is it possible that Paul would desire to die? they could also ask, Is it possible for him to be willing to be absent from the body? for although "and to be present with the Lord" (or to be with Christ) immediately follows, Paul himself had taught that it was not until raised from the dead that any could hope to be "with the Lord." In Phil. i, the apostle is speaking of his own feelings to those who knew well his doctrine and hope. Under such circumstances he expresses himself in a far different manner from the way he would if he were stating formal truth. To have made a digression and explained his belief regarding the state of the dead and any special feature of his own hope since the revelation of the mystery, while it would have been doctrinally true, would have been false to feeling.

One other mistaken view has helped to lend colour to the interpretation that Paul desired the "return of the Lord," and that is, that Paul's hope at that time could be thus expressed. We believe that Paul, entertaining the hope connected with the mystery, was not looking for the Lord to return, but for himself and fellow-members to be "made manifest with Him in glory," "looking for that blessed hope, and the manifesting of the glory of our great God and Saviour Jesus Christ."

The A.V. is not perfect, and many many times we feel how much truth has been hidden or distorted, but we do feel that in this particular case, with the one correction already suggested relative to the words "I wot not," that it is a good rendering. If the R.V. margin be noted, "I do not make known," then all the rest can remain as giving at least the sense of the original. "The pressing out of the two into a third"; the rendering of a word which means return in the sense of the returning of a body to its elements (the scriptural idea of death) as though it could fitly be used of the "return" of the Lord are figments, merely the zeal of those who, while holding the general truth regarding the intermediate state, have intruded this truth into a passage which does not require it.

There are several words which the apostle uses when speaking of the coming of the Lord, there is parousia, meaning "personal presence," epiphania, a "manifestation," apokalupsis, a "revelation," but there is no passage where the Lord is said to have an analysis, a "return." Had such an expression been common to the epistles, some excuse may have been found for reading it in Phil. i. 23, whereas the reading itself is isolated and unsupported by any other scripture. Luke xix. 12 is the only passage that can be brought forward, and this is of itself enough to condemn the application to Phil. i. 23, for the context speaks of going away to receive a kingdom and to return, whereas the apostle's hopes were not connected with any kingdom to which the Lord could return, but with a position where the Lord then was and still is—at the right hand of God "in glory." There is need for us to "know what is the hope of His calling"; when we know that we shall cease from speaking of the Lord's return, and think more of "things above" where we shall be "manifested with Him in glory."

We would call attention in closing to the structure of the passage already given (p. 115). Notice how "Live in the flesh" is balanced by "Abide in the flesh," the "fruit of my labour" being connected with the need of the Philippians. Notice Paul's desire "to be with Christ" and compare it with what he actually experienced "to be with you all."

> "For to me the living (is) Christ and the dying (is) gain. But if the living in the flesh (is Christ) this to me is fruit of (my) work, and what I shall choose I do not make known. But (i.e. instead of making known) I am held in constraint (colloquially 'I am in a fix,' more refined as A.V. 'I am in a strait') by reason of the two,
> (1) Having a strong desire to the return (dissolution, departure, death), and to be with Christ, for it were far better, but
> (2) The abiding in the flesh is more needful for you, and having this confidence, I perceive that I shall abide and continue beside you all for your progress and joy of faith."

The question as to what the apostle really had before him which was "far better" still remains a matter for earnest enquiry.

The Tell-el-Amarna Tablets.

(Reprinted from Volume VI.).

In Table Case F of the Babylonian and Assyrian Room is found a very precious collection of tablets discovered at Tell-el-Amarna in Egypt in 1887. Tell-el-Amarna is the Arabic name of a village built near the ruins of a town, temple, and palace built by Khu-en-Aten or Amenophis IV. These tablets differ in shape from any other cuneiform tablets yet discovered, and the clay of which they were made differs according to the country from which they were sent. No. 1 is of finely kneaded Nile mud; Nos. 8—11 of Syrian clay; Nos. 13, 18, 19, 20 and 24 are of the yellow clay of the Syrian coast. Nos. 10 and 11 are dockets written in Egyptian, recording the date of their arrival. No. 4 is stamped with an Egyptian Scarab; No. 58 with a Babylonian cylinder seal like those already noticed. Archæology places the date of these latter between B.C. 1500 and 1450, the period of the exodus and the entry into the land of Canaan.

The tablets contain letters written between the kings of Egypt and the kings and governors of cities and districts in Palestine. They are, next to the record in the early books of the Bible, the most complete guide to understanding the character of the times in Canaan about the time of the exodus. Enemies of the truth had declared that the stories of the books of Moses and the Judges were largely mythical, and that the geography and chronology of these stories must not be taken seriously. They had further expended a deal of time and energy in showing that the names of God, El and Jehovah, were evidences of two distinct ideas that were pieced together long afterwards. A peasant woman's foot upturning one of these tablets dispelled with one touch the myths of the critics, and brought to light the Palestine of the Bible narrative, exactly in line with its teaching. That the Egyptian kings should have so much correspondence with Syria and Canaan shows how close the connection was in those days.

The tablets may be divided into three groups. (1) The period of Egyptian supremacy. (2) Those that exhibit Egyptian decline (The loss of city after city is reported). (3) Those which deal with southern Palestine and Jerusalem. In these tablets such familiar names as Gaza, Tyre, Aijalon, Megiddo, Lachish, Ashkelon, Carmel and Ura-Salem (Jerusalem) appear. Further, the Biblical name, "The land of Canaan," is found written as the name of the land at that very period. In these tablets it is called Mat Kinahi or Mat Kinanhi, "the country of Canaan." The letters deal with diplomatic business, marriage alliances, and affairs of government. Revolts and sieges are numerous. Piteous letters imploring the military assistance of the Pharaohs are many. The cities are all found in the tablets independent of each other exactly as we find them in the book of Joshua.

The people of Israel seem to be mentioned under the name of the Habiri. One letter to Amenophis III. says, "Since thy father returned to Sidon, since that time the lands have fallen into the hands of the Habiri." Within 30 years of crossing the Jordan, we find the Hebrews in possession of the fertile lands of the Canaanites. Further, the prince of Khazi writes to say that the Hebrews had taken cities and burnt them. From such regions as Gilead, Shechem, and Mount Ephraim no letters come, indicating that the Hebrews were in possession. Abakiba, king of Jerusalem, endures great fear and trouble regarding the Hebrews. "Let troops be sent (he says), for the king has no longer any territory, the Khabiri (Hebrews) have wasted all." A postscript added to a letter of this same king tells its own story, "To the suite of my lord the king, Abd Khiba, your servant. Bring aloud before my lord the king the words, The whole territory of my lord the king is going into ruins." In another letter he says, "If no troops are sent the land will belong to the Khabiri."

The wide distribution of the Hebrews is a noticeable feature. Not only Jerusalem, as cited above, but Itakama says that Namyawaza "has delivered all the cities in the land of Gidshi, and in Ubi (Damascus region) to the Khabiri." The whole of North Palestine and Galilee is involved. A prince named Shubandu writes, "The Khabiri are stong." Another writes, "The governors are destroyed, all the land falls away to the Khabiri." We will not multiply quotations. From the land of Mitsri (Egypt) to North Palestine the terror of the name of the Hebrews was spreading. Further, it is remarkable that in all the list of governors and kings referred to, never once is a king of the Hebrews mentioned. Again, in spite of all the false criticism to the contrary, the Hebrews are found to be against idolatry. Ribaddi, governor of Northern Phœnicia, says, "The hostility of the Hebrews waxes mighty against the land, and against the gods."

Both names of God, El and Jehovah, occur in these tablets; both names being in use therefore before the time of Moses. Thothmes III. mentions a town called Bet Jah, "The House of Jehovah." In other inscriptions he speaks of places named Jacob-el and Joseph-el!

The link between Assyria and Egypt established by these letters explains the words of Isa. lii. 4: "My people went down to Egypt to sojourn there; and the Assyrian oppressed them without cause."

To set out the details of the tablets further would be tedious and unnecessary. We are grateful for their testimony which shows to the world at large the chronological and geographical faithfulness of the O.T. records.

Studies in the epistles of the Mystery.

No. 16.

The blessings of the Son (Eph. i. 7—12).

"The mystery of His will."

(Reprinted from Volume VI.).

In the first article dealing with the blessings of the Son (page 90), we saw that they were three, viz., redemption, mystery, inheritance. We have seen some of the wonders of redeeming love. Let us now turn to the central reference, the mystery. This mystery has been made known to us in all wisdom and prudence. Wisdom is linked with the making known of the mystery or its connections in each of its occurrences in Ephesians. Here, in i. 8; in i. 17, "may give unto you a spirit of wisdom and revelation in the full knowledge of Him"; and in Eph. iii. 9, 10, "The dispensation of the mystery.....may be made known.....the manifold wisdom of God."

Philippians contains no reference to either wisdom or mystery, but Colossians again contains them both. Col. i. 9 refers to the walk; i. 27, 28 speaks of "the riches of the glory of the mystery among the Gentiles.....teaching every man in all wisdom"; ii. 2, 3 speaks of "the mystery of God,.....and of Christ, in Whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge."

Prudence (phronēsis) is wisdom in practice, and has special reference to the management of affairs. In the stewardship of the mystery, the apostle was divinely guided in making it known, not going before the time and not revealing more than the wisdom of God saw fit. The mystery here is spoken of as the mystery of His Will. Some prefer the word "secret," owing to the fact that the word "mystery" has come to mean in English that which is "mysterious." However this may be, we feel justified in retaining the word, first because it is the Greek word musterion transliterated, and secondly by reason of the many parallels that are drawn between the mystery of God and those of the heathen, for which Ephesus was famous. The worship of Isis in Egypt, of Mithras in Persia, of Ceres and Bacchus in Greece, was connected with the heathen mysteries.

The heathen mysteries were divided into the Lesser and the Greater. The Greater revealed the real inner teaching called the Apporheta, "the things that must not be uttered or divulged" (see 2 Cor. xii. 4). The initiates to these mysteries were called teleioi, or "perfect," a word used with somewhat similar meaning in the Epistles (Heb. v. 14, Eph. iv. 13, 1 Cor. ii. 6 and Phil. iii. 15).

The New Testament reveals a series of mysteries, some concerning the church in its wide sense, and some concerning the One Body. The apostle Paul had revealed to him a great number of mysteries which it was his privilege to explain and teach. Out of the twenty-seven occurrences of the word, the apostle Paul uses twenty of them, the remaining seven being divided between the first three Gospels and the Revelation. The twenty references of Paul are divided evenly between the Prison Epistles and the remainder. The references in Ephesians are as follows:—

The mystery in Ephesians.

A | i. 9. The mystery of His Will—a dispensation—which He purposed.
B | iii. 3. The mystery.
C | iii. 4. The mystery of Christ—my knowledge.

A | iii. 9. The dispensation of the mystery—which He purposed.
B | v. 32. The great mystery.
C | vi. 19. The mystery of the gospel made known.

It would appear from the above that the mystery of His Will, which has in view the dispensation of the fulness of the seasons, and the dispensation of the mystery are parallel. In this article we must confine ourselves to the first of these references, the mystery of His Will. Ephesians speaks of three things which pertain to the Will of God. (1) "The good pleasure of His Will," (2) "The mystery of His Will," and (3) "The counsel of His Will" (i. 5, 9, 11). The first and third references have to do with predestination to sonship and inheritance. The second has to do with the present revelation of the hidden purposes of God. By telling us at the outset that the mystery is the mystery of His Will, the Scriptures dispose of any idea of mere fortuitousness, the dispensation of the mystery, the purpose to head up all things in Christ, though not made known in other Scriptures, was all planned and arranged in the purpose of the ages (Eph. iii. 1—10). Moreover, we are assured that this purpose is actuated by the most gracious of motives, viz., "according to His good pleasure, which He hath purposed in Himself" (i. 9). Versions and readings vary as to the word "Himself"; later readings and the R.V. read, "in Him," and so point to Christ. The words "in Him" come again at the end of verse 10, and a double emphasis seems to be given to the fact that in Christ the purposes of God meet and find their fulfilment. The setting of the passage therefore is as follows:—

A | 9. The mystery of His Will.
B | 9. IN HIM.
A | 10. The dispensation of the fulness.
B | 10. IN HIM

In other words, verse 10 is an expansion of verse 9, and the mystery of His Will is revealed in His purpose to gather together under one Head all things in Christ. Let us pause before this revelation. Let us seek more earnestly His face, that to us also may be "made known" in all wisdom and prudence, this marvellous mystery of His Will.

Paul and his Companions.

No. 7.

Luke, the beloved physician.

Who shall be named next in the list of Paul's companions? We have read the narrative of the Acts and have mentioned in the order in which they appear, Ananias, the man who dared to say "Brother Saul"; Barnabas, the man who encouraged Saul; Silas, who stepped into the gap; and Timothy, who served as a son.

The next companions to be named are Aquila and Priscilla (Acts xviii. 2). But there is another, beloved and faithful to the end, who slips into the narrative without being named. He is Luke, "the beloved physician." His presence is known only by a sudden change of pronoun. In Acts xvi. 6—9 we read: "when they had gone," "after they were come," but in verse 10, "Immediately we endeavoured to go," "assuredly gathering that the Lord had called US for to preach the gospel unto them."

When Paul found the doors shut both in Asia and Bithynia, he little knew that those doors were shutting him up to his great ministry, and causing him to pass on to Troas to receive a guiding vision and meet one who was to become a life-long friend.

The unconsciously self-effacing manner in which Luke enters into the narrative is charming and, to one of Paul's temperament, such a companion, ever at his side, quiet, gentle, ministering, must have constituted a valuable gift from above.

The name, Luke, is a translation of Loukas, which is a contraction of Loukanos, and indicates the Gentile descent of Luke. Probably he was a freedman. In the days of the apostle, the work of a physician was done by the higher class servant, and Luke would most probably have attended one of the collegium archiatrorum, or "colleges for physicians," where he would have studied the writings of Hippocrates. Only such slaves as had talent were taught the artes ingenuae, the "liberal arts," and in his writing Luke gives every evidence of the culture and training thus acquired.

Let us reflect, for a moment, on the loving service that such a man as Luke could render to Paul, the apostle, and Paul, the prisoner, of Jesus Christ. There is every reason to believe that Paul suffered from acute ophthalmia. He had been smitten with temporary blindness on the road to Damascus, and like Jacob, when his name was changed to Israel, he may have carried the effects with him for the remainder of his days. Gal. iv. 14, 15 speaks of some defect that made Paul a pitiable object, and the witness borne that the Galatians would have "plucked out their own eyes and given them unto him" seems pointless unless it was his eyes that were afflicted. The reference to the "large letters," or characters, with which he closed the epistle "with his own hand" (Gal. vi. 11), strengthens this probability. Beside this, his trials, scourgings, perils, shipwrecks, prisons and "deaths" demanded either perpetual miracle or loving ministry, and while he shared with Paul the rigours of pioneer evangelization, Luke, the physician, would never be long without a patient. Luke was also of invaluable service to the apostle in another sphere. He is the writer of the Gospel that bears his name. An examination of the "things that differ" between the Gospels of Luke and Matthew shows the eminent suitability of Luke's Gospel for supplementing and supporting Paul's message to the Gentiles. It is Luke that traces the genealogy of the Lord to Adam. It is Luke that records such parables as "The Good Samaritan" and "The Prodigal Son," and the fact that he had "perfect understanding of all things from above" (Luke i. 3) renders his witness authoritative. Luke, moreover, compiled the narrative known to us as the Acts of the Apostles, which abundantly shows the intense interest which he took in the life story of the apostle with whom he had served. There are but three actual references to Luke in the N.T.:—

"There salute thee . . . . Marcus, Aristarchus, Demas, Lucas, my fellow-labourers" (Phile. 23, 24).

"Luke, the beloved physician, and Demas greet you" (Col. iv. 14).

"Demas hath forsaken me . . . . only Luke is with me" (2 Tim. iv. 10, 11).

In each, Luke's name is found with that of Demas, as though the fickleness of the one is used as a foil to the faithfulness of the other.

The order, too, in which the references occur is suggestive. In the first, Luke is one of Paul's "fellow-labourers," in the second, he is "the beloved physician," while in the third, all titles are dropped, and, in the hour of his trial, when all had forsaken him, Paul speaks of Luke as the only one who was "with him."

So we see that Luke was with Paul at that critical moment in Troas, when the call came to preach the gospel among the Greeks: that he was with him once more when he left Philippi for Jerusalem, and that he was with him during his shipwreck and imprisonment at Rome. And so he continued with him, through sunshine and shade, until Paul needed an earthly physician no more. What the Christian church owes to this faithful friend cannot be computed. We honour him for the work he did in giving us both the "Gospel" and the "Acts," but perhaps we love his memory most when we think of his unselfish faithfulness and loving ministry to the great apostle.

Fundamentals of dispensational truth.

Joshua.

No. 10.

Gibeon and Gilgal (Josh. ix).

Had Joshua hesitated to obey the command of the Lord to journey to Mount Ebal, his fears would have cost him dear. His act of faith turned out to have been the wisest policy, for soon after the staggering blow struck at Ai, the neighbouring kings recovered from their momentary paralysis, and gathered themselves against Joshua with one accord. Before we read of any fighting, we are introduced to another phase of attack which is often more disastrous than any actual combat, the "cunning craftiness" and "wiles of the Devil."

How many times has history repeated itself along these lines. Baalam, who failed to curse Israel, afterwards devised a means at Baal Peor of accomplishing their demoralization and destruction. When the enemies of Nehemiah found that he could not be intimidated by threats, they resorted to "conferences" and "open letters." Many who speak loudly of victory and conquest, are most accessible to deceit. The downfall of the believer is Satan's object and the means employed is a matter of indifference.

> "And when the inhabitants of Gibeon heard what Joshua had done unto Jericho and to Ai, they did work wilily" (Josh. ix 3—4).

The Canaanites were devoted to utter destruction; and the Gibeonites, being Hivites (verse 7) were therefore condemned. While Israel were commanded to exterminate the Canaanites, they were restrained from meddling with the affairs of others (Deut. ii. 5, 19). The Gibeonites evidently were aware of this, and so they dressed themselves with old shoes and old garments, carried old and badly rent wine skins and dry mouldy bread, in order that they might deceive the Israelites with their tale that they had come "from a very far country" (verse 9). Deceit cannot be justified, and the Gibeonites lied and deceived. Yet when we look at the history of the Lord's own people, who will be the first to cast a stone? Abraham, the friend of God, knew all too well what a refuge lies may be; and Rebekah and Jacob deceived Isaac, even though their aim was to secure the promises of God. Rahab the harlot, who was saved at the destruction of Jericho, told lies without any apparent qualms of conscience. The Gibeonites when questioned by Joshua as to why they had beguiled the Israelites, replied:—

> "Because it was certainly told thy servants, how that the Lord thy God commanded His servant Moses to give you all the land, and to destroy all the inhabitants of the land from before you, therefore we were sore afraid of our lives because of you, and have done this thing" (Josh. ix. 24).

Apart from the deception involved, this is a very complete confession of faith that the Lord had made a promise which He was well able to perform.

Israel were forbidden to make any covenant with the Canaanites lest they should be ensnared in their idolatry and wickedness (Ex. xxiii. 32, 33), and were commanded to destroy them utterly.

> "Take heed to thyself, lest thou make a covenant with the inhabitants of the land whither thou goest, lest it be for a snare in the midst of thee" (Ex. xxxiv. 12).

> "And when the Lord thy God shall deliver them before thee; thou shalt smite them and utterly destroy them; thou shalt make no covenant with them, nor shew mercy unto them" (Deut. vii. 2).

The reason for this merciless campaign is to be found in the peculiar origin of the Canaanites. Scripture reveals that the "Sons of God," the angels that kept not their first estate (Gen. vi. and Jude 6), became the parents of the Nephilim, or "giants" of Gen. vi. 4 and Num. xiii. 33. Og, King of Bashan was one of them, and so also were the Canaanites. The latter are mentioned in Gen. xiv. 5 and xv. 18—21, including, as we see, another name associated with this evil seed, the Rephaim, variously translated elsewhere "dead," "deceased" and "giants" (Isa. xxvi. 14, 19, Gen. vi. 4, Deut. ii. 20 etc.). These were Satan's tares sown by him in God's field. These tares never become wheat, any more than the "washed sow" of 2 Pet. ii. 22 could become a "sheep." Sheep do not cease to be sheep even when they are "lost." If these elementary facts were kept more in mind, the doctrine of the two seeds that we discover in the Scriptures would be better understood. Satan's seed have never had their names written in the Book of Life.

> "And all that dwell upon the earth shall worship him (the Beast), whose names are NOT WRITTEN in the book of life of the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world" (Rev. xiii. 8).

In spite of the intensity of the judgment that shall fall upon the earth in the last days, men will not repent, but will rather blaspheme God.

Another lesson awaits us in Joshua ix. which is of great importance.

> "And they received the men by reason of their victuals, and asked not counsel at the mouth of the Lord" (Josh. ix. 14).

Israel were as dependent upon the Lord at the moment they met the Gibeonites, as when they were bondmen in Egypt. Their salvation by the blood of the lamb, their passage through the Red Sea, their miraculous maintenance during all the years of wilderness wandering, their triumphant crossing of Jordan, the victory of Jericho and Ai, all these things did not give them the slightest warrant to assume any wisdom of their own. However advanced a believer may be, however long his acquaintance with the Word may be, however varied his experiences, nothing can ever take the place of "Thus saith the Lord." If only the Lord's people would believe this, how many false steps and evil alliances would be avoided. The Gibeonites seem to be very much in evidence to-day. At every turn we are invited to become associated with various "movements." If we trust to our own wisdom, or experiences, or victories, we shall fare no better than did Joshua. Let us ever "ask counsel at the mouth of the Lord," and know no other leading or guidance.

When the children of Israel discovered the trick that had been played upon them, they wanted to break the agreement (verse 18); but covenants solemnly made must be kept even at our own expense. Ishmael should never have been born, and Abraham lived to realize this; but he never stooped so low as to think of repudiating his responsibility to Ishmael, and the Lord honoured his prayer for Ishmael's blessing (Gen. xvii. 18).

We read in Josh. ix. 6 that the Gibeonites "went to Joshua unto the camp at Gilgal." If we consult the Gazetteer, we shall discover that four different places bore that name.

(1) The place near the Jordan and near Jericho where Israel spent the first night after crossing the river (Josh. iv. 19).

(2) A city between Dor and Tirzah (Josh. xii 23).

(3) A city North of Joppa, near the sea (now called Jidjulah). Near Antipatris (Josh. ix. 6; x. 6, 7, 9, 15, 43).

(4) A place twelve miles South of Ebal and Gerizim (now called Jiljiliah) (2 Kings ii. 1, iv. 38).

The first of these we have already noticed. The second reference speaks of the "nations of Gilgal." This may refer to a miscellaneous company of tribes, corresponding to the N.T. "Galilee of the Nations," Galilee being derived from the same root as Gilgal. The third is pure conjecture; and it is far more likely that Joshua would have pitched his camp at Gilgal No. 4 in the very vicinity of Ebal and Gerizim, than at a city North of Joppa.

Commentators have said that it is impossible to think of Joshua going back to the original Gilgal, and that he must have chosen the one situated nearer the sphere of his operations. All this, however, is pure speculation. What Joshua did, or ought to have done, was not regulated by normal rules. It was not normal conduct to circumcise an army of invaders; it was not normal conduct to walk round a besieged city seven times; it was not normal conduct to penetrate as far as Ebal after the conquest of Ai; but Joshua was under Divine instruction and the movements of his army were spiritual pictures. Whether Joshua went back to the original Gilgal, or pitched in another spot of the same name, is a question no living man can answer, but the underlying spiritual fact contained in the reference to Gilgal is plain for all to see. Joshua's camp, the centre from which his movements originated, was the place where "the reproach of Egypt" was rolled away.

Gilgal for us is interpreted in Col. ii. and Phil. iii., where, through spiritual circumcision, "the body of the flesh" is repudiated and there can be "no confidence in the flesh." It is of the utmost importance that all who enter their promised land, should not only experience Gilgal once, but that "No confidence in the flesh" should be their continual watchword. The histories of Abraham, of Jacob, of David and of all the saints, exemplify this necessity. We can only walk "in newness of life," We can only serve "in newness of spirit."

The weapons of our warfare are not carnal, but are mighty through God. We triumph only through the cross of Christ; and that cross robs us of all confidence in the arm and wisdom of the flesh.

Whatever, therefore, the geographical necessities of the case may have been in the days of Joshua, and whether he actually returned to the shore of the Jordan, or pitched his camp at a more convenient spot, the fact remains that Gilgal was the name of the centre of all his activities until the conquest of the land was complete.

May we, who read the account to-day, take to heart the lesson it conveys.

The Acts of the Apostles.

No. 16.

Stephen's twofold charge (Acts vii.).

We now come to the speech of Stephen which, though it cost him his life, won for him a crown that "fadeth not away" —and wrought such conviction in the heart of Saul, that to stifle the urgings of conscience, he asked for authority to conduct persecuting campaigns as far as Damascus.

Stephen goes back to the beginning of Israel's history, and shows that after the call of Abraham, there were two great types of Christ—Joseph and Moses:—

> "At the second time Joseph was made known unto his brethren" (Acts vii. 13).
> "This Moses whom they refused, saying, Who made thee a ruler and a judge? the same did God send to be a ruler and a deliverer by the hand of the angel which appeared unto him in the bush" (Acts vii. 35).

The entry into the land under Joshua (Acts vii. 45), which becomes a fresh start corresponding with the call of Abraham, is followed by David and Solomon, two further types of Christ. Although David was rejected at first but ultimately reigned over Israel, this fact is not mentioned, but instead David is used, in conjunction with Solomon, to substantiate Stephen's teaching concerning the Temple that had so infuriated his hearers. His last words, before the devastating application of his summary of Israel's history, are concerned with this vexed question of the Temple.

> "Howbeit the most High dwelleth not in temples made with hands; as saith the prophet: Heaven is My throne, and earth is My footstool: what house will ye build Me? saith the Lord: or what is the place of My rest? Hath not My hand made all these things?" (Acts vii. 48—50).

The echo of these words in Acts xvii. suggests how deep was the impression made upon the heart of at least one of Stephen's hearers, a fact that will more than compensate Stephen for all his suffering, when Stephen and Paul stand together in that day.

> "God that made the world and all things therein, seeing that He is Lord of heaven and earth, dwelleth not in temples made with hands; neither is worshipped with men's hands, as though He needed anything" (Acts xvii. 24, 25).

When Paul was afterwards charged by the Jews with teaching "all men everywhere against the people, and the law, and this place" (Acts xxi. 28), he must have remembered with feeling the face of Stephen, who had some years before stood in the same place upon a similar charge.

The two main themes of Stephen's speech, namely, the typical character of Joseph and Moses in their rejection and subsequent acceptance by Israel, and of David and Solomon in their testimony concerning the Temple, are given an emphatic place in the structure of the section.

Acts vi. 15—viii. 1.

A	vi. 15—vii. 1.	STEPHEN before the Council. They looked stedfastly and saw his face like an angel.
B	C | vii. 2—36.	JOSEPH and MOSES. Rejected by Israel. Accepted THE SECOND TIME.
	D | vii. 37—45.	Application. Our fathers did these things. Thrust away (39).
B	C | vii. 45—50.	DAVID and SOLOMON. Build Temple. NOT MADE WITH HANDS.
	D | vii. 51—53.	Application. As your fathers did resist (51).
A	vii. 54—viii. 1.	STEPHEN before the Council. He looked stedfastly and saw the glory of God.

Not one word of Stephen's speech could be controverted, but its application was devastating. As the history of the past was unrolled before the Council, as they were reminded of the attitude of the fathers, the application cut them to the heart.

"Ye stiff-necked and uncircumcised in heart and ears, ye do always resist the Holy Ghost: as your fathers did, so do ye" (Acts vii. 51).

Here were the representatives of the people, charging Stephen with blasphemy and with teaching that both the law and the temple were to pass away, and they themselves are found guilty of resisting the Holy Ghost. They "had received the law by the disposition of angels, and had not kept it" (Acts vii. 53).

It would be out of place in this series to examine the various O.T. references in Stephen's speech. In the series entitled Fundamentals of dispensational truth we have considered both Joseph and Moses in their typical character. For our present purpose the important point is that both Joseph and Moses were accepted by Israel at the "second time."

It is easy to see how disturbing it must have been for these rulers of the Jews, to listen to an account of the lapses into idolatry that marked the history of their fathers, and to hear, especially if they remembered the context, the sweeping words of Isaiah lxvi. 1, 2.

The section closes with the solemn words: "And Saul was consenting unto his death" (Acts viii. 1). At the feet of a young man named Saul, the witnesses had laid down their clothing while they cast the first stones. How strange it now seems to us, that this is the first mention of Saul of Tarsus in the record of Scripture. For nearly 1900 years Saul, "who also is called Paul," has been honoured for his faithful stand for the very truth that Stephen gave in embryo. And within about thirty years, Paul himself was to die for that same faith for which Stephen became the first Christian martyr.

The next section of the Acts leads on to the conversion and the commission of Paul. While all Scripture is profitable, and while Acts i.—viii. must be known and understood by any who would enter into the truth of Christ and His work of grace, that part of the Acts which contains the ministry of the Apostle to the Gentiles, must of necessity hold a high place in the hearts of all who live in this present dispensation of grace to the Gentiles. We therefore conclude our present article here, so that we may take up the witness of the Acts concerning Paul, "the Apostle of the Gentiles," in our subsequent studies.

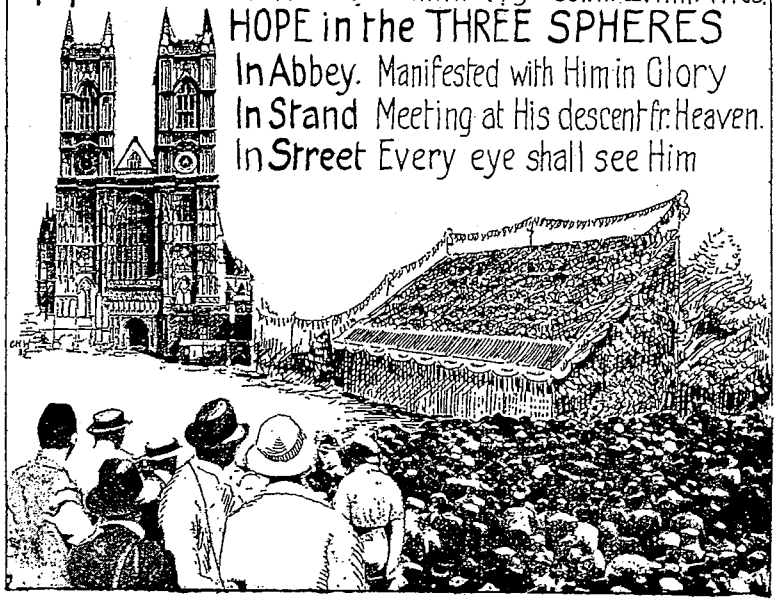
HOPE in the THREE SPHERES

In Abbey. Manifested with Him in Glory
In Stand Meeting at His descent fr. Heaven.
In Street Every eye shall see Him



Hope, in the Scriptures, whether it be the hope of Israel or the hope of the church, whether the church which is the Bride or the church which is the Body, is always focussed upon the Person of the Lord and His presence. For the realization of the hope of creation, of Israel, or of the Kingdom, the personal presence of the Lord on earth is necessary, and this is spoken of in the Scriptures as His "coming" (parousia) or His "revelation" (apokalupsis). There is a heavenly side to the kingdom purpose (Heb. iii. 1), and so we find the word parousia used not only in Matthew xxiv., but in 1 Thessalonians iv. The prison epistles do not speak of the Lord's coming, but of the church's manifestation with the Lord in glory at His appearing (epiphaneia).

The term used in Matthew xxiv. in the question concerning "The end of the world" is the Greek word sunteleia, a word that needed no translation to any Jew who kept the feasts, for it is the word used in the Septuagint version of Exodus xxiii. 16 for the "Feast of the Ingathering."

The Diagram represents the wedding of the King's Son at Westminster Abbey, and divides those who take part into three groups:

(1) Those who had the privilege of actually being in the Abbey itself. This corresponds with the hope of the mystery, the "manifestation with Him in glory," and suggests the place of privilege as "far above Principalities." This is the epiphaneia.

(2) Those who had the privilege of a seat in the grandstand immediately outside the Abbey might be likened to those who are partakers of the heavenly kingdom, who meet the Lord in the air, and

(3) Those who waited in the streets, where "every eye shall see," correspond with those who wait for the coming of the Lord Whose feet shall stand in that day upon the Mount of Olives.

Inspiration has watched over the use and distribution of the three words parousia, apokalupsis, and epiphaneia, and the student who accepts the facts of Scripture regarding these words will have a clear understanding as to the relation of the three phases of the Lord's return and the three spheres of blessing.

NOTE —For fuller treatment of the various phases of this subject our Booklet "That blessed hope" should be procured and circulated.

Light for the last days.

A series of studies in Scripture concerning the character of the closing days of this age.

No. 1.

The beginning of apostacy in the dispensation of the mystery.

The fact that the church of the One Body is called under the dispensation of the mystery, the fact that this mystery is in the nature of a parenthesis in the revealed outworking of the purpose of the ages, the fact that this parenthesis is but an alternative to saying that Israel as a nation is set aside and become for the time being Lo-ammi ("Not My people,") the fact that while Israel as a nation are Lo-ammi, prophetic times are not computable, these facts prove that it is utterly unscriptural as it is futile to attempt to forecast "the time of the end," to envisage the year of the Lord's return, or to introduce into the present time the signs of the end referred to in Matt. xxiv., such as "wars and rumours of wars."

While all this is true, it is nevertheless equally true that the great world goes on around us. Nations are pursuing their policies; changes that plainly herald a crisis are everywhere apparent, and therefore it seems that some notes upon the present aspect of things with a brief summary of what "must shortly come to pass" may be of service.

In the first place we must turn to those epistles which contain the revelation of the mystery, and note anything that is said concerning the trend of affairs that mark the apostacy and the character of the days at the close of the dispensation of the mystery. Though found in the epistles of the mystery this apostacy is antagonistic to it, and will run on and develop into the great prophetic era, when the church of the One Body is complete.

Turning first to the Epistle to the Ephesians, we naturally find that most of its content is devoted to making known the basic truth of the new dispensation. It contains, nevertheless, the germ of the apostacy with which this dispensation closes.

Firstly, this church was "chosen in Him before the overthrow of the world" (Eph. i. 4), and this fact shows that the antagonism which brought about that "overthrow," and which is associated with the fall of the principalities and powers, together with one originally called "the anointed cherub" (Ezek. xxviii. 14) must of necessity be at the root of the spiritual opposition that is expressed in the pages of Scripture, and in the experience of all who have stood for the truth of the mystery.

Secondly, Eph. ii. 2 makes it very clear that there is a mighty spiritual antagonist whose energy ("the spirit that now worketh in the children of disobedience") is so great that it is placed in contrast with the energy ("the working of the mighty power which He wrought in Christ") that raised Christ from the dead and seated Him far above all. The mighty antagonist is called "The prince of the power of the air."

Thirdly, the methods adopted by these evil powers are indicated in Eph. iv. 14 where it speaks of "every wind of doctrine, by the cunning craftiness, whereby they lie in wait to deceive"; and again in Eph. v. 11 and 18: "Have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness"; "Be not drunk with wine, wherein is excess."

Fourthly, the last chapter of Ephesians reveals most definitely the nature of the foe.

> "For we wrestle not against flesh and blood in heavenly places, but against principalities, against powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world, against spiritual wickedness" (Eph. vi. 12), and the whole armour of God is provided in view of "the evil day" (Eph. vi. 13)

We have not put forward any justification for our revised translation in these four phases of truth; this we must do in its own place. We press on for the moment in our quest to discover what is indicated in these later epistles of Paul concerning the character of the age as the dispensation of the mystery nears its close.

The references in Philippians are rather of a general character. They indicate the dangers that lurk within the church and which necessarily contribute to the failure at the end. Such passages as the following give an indication of the leaven that works the mischief.

> "Only let your conversation be as it becometh the gospel of Christ . . . . that ye stand fast in one spirit, with one mind striving together for the faith of the gospel" (Phil. i. 27).
> "All seek their own, not the things which are Jesus Christ's" (Phil. ii. 21).
>
> "Beware of dogs, beware of evil workers, beware of the concision" (Phil. iii. 2).
> "Brethren, be followers together of me, and mark them which walk so as ye have us for an example, for many walk, of whom I have told you often, and now tell you even weeping, that they are the enemies of the cross of Christ" (Phil. iii. 17, 18).

It will be observed that whereas Ephesians reveals the spiritual foes that attack the church from without, Philippians draws attention to the evils that are within, which will help that outside attack. These two aspects are naturally in perfect harmony with the distinctive objects of these two related epistles, those which deal with basic truths being revealed in Ephesians, and those that deal with its outworking being revealed in Philippians.

Turning to Colossians, we have an epistle which traverses much the same ground as is covered by Ephesians, but which also introduces the note of warning and the reference to the prize (Col. ii. 18), which links it on to Philippians. We are warned against "enticing words, philosophy, traditions, rudiments, shadows, voluntary humility and worshipping of angels, ordinances and the neglecting of the body" found in chapter ii., which "beguile of the reward" (verse 18). There is not so much revealed in Colossians concerning the attack of spiritual foes, the revelation being rather the assurance of their overthrow.

> "Who hath delivered us from the authority of darkness" (Col. i. 13).
> "Having spoiled principalities and powers, He made a show of them openly, triumphing over them in it" (Col. ii. 15).

After writing these three prison epistles and the short epistle to Philemon, the apostle was liberated for a time, and occupied his freedom in establishing the church as far as that was possible. The church at Philippi had "bishops and deacons" (Phil. i. 1), and there is no reason why the church of the One Body should not be ruled "decently and in order." Consequently we find both in 1 Timothy and Titus a concern regarding the character and appointment of bishops and deacons.

The evils exposed in 1 Timothy are complicated; we therefore tabulate them, and leave the analysis for subsequent treatment. There is "other doctrine" (1 Tim. i. 3, vi. 3) and the "doctrines of demons" (1 Tim. iv. 1). There are "fables and endless genealogies," "vain jangling," "teachers of the law who understand neither what they say, nor whereof they affirm," and in regard to faith and a good conscience, of some who "have made shipwreck" (1 Tim. i. 4, 7, 19). There is the warning concerning the abuse of prayer, the vanity of outward adornment, and the usurpation of authority by woman over man in the matter of teaching, indicated as contributive causes of failure (1 Tim. ii. 8, 9—12). The moral and spiritual qualifications for bishops and deacons are pointed in their suggestiveness. Take for example one qualification of the bishop:—

"One that ruleth well his own house, having his children in subjection with all gravity (For if a man know not how to rule his own house, how shall he take care of the church of God?)" (1 Tim. iii. 4, 5).

Other statements such as "not given to wine," "not greedy of filthy lucre," "not a novice, lest being lifted up with pride he fall into the condemnation of the devil" (1 Tim. iii. 3, 6) indicate contributory causes to the failure of the testimony.

In 1 Tim. iv., however, the Spirit "speaketh expressly" and definitely reveals that "in the latter times some shall depart from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits, and doctrines of demons . . . . forbidding to marry and commanding to abstain from meats, which God hath created to be received with thanksgiving of them which believe and know the truth" (1 Tim. iv. 1—3). "Profane and old wives fables" and the over-emphasis upon "bodily exercise" follow these solemn utterances (1 Tim. iv. 7, 8), showing how inter-related the doctrines of demons may be with matters of everyday life. Provision for young widows against Satan's snares is made in 1 Tim. v. 11—15, and an undue abstemiousness on the part of Timothy is corrected in 1 Tim. v. 23. Timothy is told to withdraw himself from those who teach "other doctrine" (1 Tim. vi. 3—5), and is warned against the "love of money," the "trust in uncertain riches," and the "vain babblings, and oppositions of science falsely so called" (1 Tim. vi. 10, 17, 20).

Finally in 2 Timothy we have the warning concerning a "spirit of cowardice" that would be ashamed of the testimony of the Lord or of Paul His prisoner, and also the necessity to hold fast a form of sound words received from Paul (2 Tim. i. 7, 8, 13). In chapter ii. we have the many hindrances that are found in the path of him who would run for the crown. There are the "entangling affairs of this life" and "the denying of the Lord" (2 Tim. ii. 4, 12). Great emphasis is placed upon the principle of "right division" so that the workman shall have no need for shame (2 Tim. ii. 15); "profane and vain babblings" are once more mentioned (2 Tim. ii. 16), and the figure of the great house is introduced to urge the believer to "purge himself" so that he may be a vessel unto honour (2 Tim. ii. 19—21). The avoidance of youthful lusts, foolish and unlearned questions, and strife are enjoined (2 Tim. ii. 22—24). 2 Tim. iii. adds to the Spirit's "express" statement of 1 Tim. iv. by saying:—

"This know also, that in the last days perilous times shall come. For men shall be lovers of their own selves, covetous, boasters, proud, blasphemous, disobedient to parents, unthankful, unholy, without natural affection, truce breakers, false accusers, incontinent, fierce, despisers of those that are good, traitors, heady, highminded, lovers of pleasures more than lovers of God; having a form of godliness, but denying the power thereof; from such turn away" (2 Tim. iii. 1—5).

"Evil men and seducers shall wax worse and worse, deceiving and being deceived" (2 Tim. iii. 13).

This awful revelation is supplemented in chapter iv. by the words:—

"The time will come when they will not endure sound doctrine; but after their own lusts shall they heap to themselves teachers, having itching ears; and they shall turn away their ears from the truth, and shall be turned unto fables" (2 Tim. iv. 3, 4).

The forsaking of Paul by Demas because he "loved this present world" (verse 10) must be included as a warning and a symptom in this dreadful foreshadowing of the perilous times that must surely come.

Here, as contributory causes to this one dreadful end, we have such widely divergent agencies as spiritual wickedness and the matter of woman's dress and usurpation of authority over man. We have doctrines of demons closely associated with the matter of diet. We have bodily exercise, young widows, water drinking, neglecting the body, ruling the house well, all closely allied with rightly dividing the word of truth, and being unashamed of the testimony of the Lord's prisoner.

A survey of the causes that lead to such an end is surely humbling to us all, and we realize that we all have shared in the downward movement. The only reference to "repentance" in Paul's later ministry occurs in 2 Tim. ii. 25, and possibly none can read this article without feeling cause for repentance in many particulars.

We do not intend to dwell on these passages, as they have been assembled so that we shall see what the age will be like when the church of the One Body is complete, and when prophetic times once more begin to run their destined course. In our next article we will step outside these prison epistles to see what is revealed concerning the closing days of the age that is to usher in the millennial reign of Christ and the thousand years' peace.

Charts and Booklets.

The interest of the reader whose testimony we now give was first quickened by seeing a chart that differentiated the Church which is His Body from other assemblies, and showed the hope of I Thessalonians iv. as related to the parousia and the great tribulation. Later, upon enquiring for help to appreciate the teaching concerning "The Body," our reader was given two pamphlets—"United yet Divided," and "Far above All." And his comment is, "The truth made me free." He adds in his letter :—

> "I give the above testimony with the prayer that some may be helped in the use of charts and diagrams, especially as they are now appearing in the Berean Expositor."

Not everyone is interested or helped by charts and diagrams. To some they are curious but not helpful; to others they are of the greatest value. We endeavour to help all classes of reader, and believe that the diagrams we are publishing will be a great help to many.

We are also thankful for the testimony to the two booklets. "United yet Divided" emphasizes the importance of right division, while "Far above All" enables the reader to see the wonderful sphere of blessing that is opened up by the application of this principle.

The charts which are being published at intervals have all been used at meetings up and down the land, and the testimony to their usefulness is most encouraging. It may be of interest to mention that "United yet Divided" was originally written at the request of a friend; the idea of publishing it as a booklet was not thought of until afterwards.

We not only draw encouragement for ourselves from our reader's testimony, but we sincerely hope that many of our readers may be led to use our literature more freely, being sure that if this is done prayerfully and with singleness of eye, others too will be led to enquire concerning "The Body," and by right division realize their position "far above all."

The death of Christ.—Apothnēskō.

(Reprinted from Volume VI.).

The following occurrences of the word apothnēskō seem to be the ones that refer definitely to Christ's work, viewed doctrinally, in the Epistle to the Romans:—

"For when we were yet without strength, in due time (literally, according to a season), Christ died for (huper) the ungodly" (v. 6).

"While we were yet sinners, Christ died for (huper) us" (cf. verse 9, "much more") (v. 8).

"Christ having been raised out from dead ones, dies no more, death hath no more has dominion (kurieuei) over Him" (vi. 9).

"For in that He died, He died to sin once for all, but in that He lives, He lives to God" (vi. 10).

"Who is he that condemneth? Is it Christ Who died; and much more, is risen again; Who also is at the right hand of God, Who also intercedes for (huper) us?" (viii. 34).

"For to this end Christ died and lived again, that He might dominion (kurieusēi) over both dead and living" (xiv. 9).

"Destroy not him with thy food, for (huper) whom Christ died" (xiv. 15).

It will be observed that three references out of the seven speak of Christ dying for (huper) or on behalf of certain ones. He died on behalf of the ungodly, of sinners, and of the weak brother. In vi. 9 we have the blessed fact that having died, He dies no more, which verse 10 emphasizes by stating that He died once for all, while vi. 9 brings in the word "to have dominion." Death has no more dominion over Him, but the object of His death and risen life was that He should have dominion over dead and living (xiv. 9).

Chapter v. continues on from verses 6—8 with the "much more" of resurrection. In viii. 34 it is the same; xiv. 9, by placing "lived" after "died," evidently refers likewise to resurrection. Resurrection is always the "much more."

We have but two passages to record in 1 Corinthians, viz.:—

"And through thy knowledge the weak brother is perishing, on account of whom Christ died" (viii. 11).

"Christ died for (huper) our sins according to the Scriptures" (xv. 3).

2 Corinthians has references only in the fifth chapter, viz., verses 14 and 15:—

"Having judged this, that One died for all, therefore all had died; and He died for all that they who live should no longer live to themselves, but to Him who died for them (huper) and has been raised."

We would draw attention to the apostle's judgment. It is not that one died for all, therefore all shall live or be saved, but that all had died. The word we have rendered "had died" is in the aorist, and "refers to the state Christ's death proved them to be in, in a state of nature. To apply it as a consequence is, I judge, an utter blunder" (see note J.N.D. New Translation). The apostle continues, after having spoken of the death state of all as proved by the necessity of Christ's death for all, to go on to speak of those who live. These must be believers who have been made alive with Christ. To these he speaks to the end that they should no longer live unto themselves, but unto Him, Who for their sakes died and rose again. So sweeping is this new teaching that the apostle goes on to say—not only should we not live any longer to ourselves, but the new ground upon which we stand is so utterly severed from the death state of nature, called "the flesh," that we know Christ even after "the flesh" no longer.

Galatians has but one reference: "If righteousness (is) by law, then Christ has died for nothing" (ii. 21).

Ephesians knows not the word in any connection. Philippians does not use it in connection with Christ. Col. ii. 20 uses it with regard to the believer's identification with Christ in His death, but gives us no statement concerning that death itself. The word does not occur in 2 Timothy. This fact, viz., that the death of Christ does not figure in the Prison Epistles, brings before us the most important truth that the doctrine of the mystery, as presented in the Prison Epistles, is built not upon the wide and universal aspect of the offering of Christ—the death that counterbalanced the death brought in by Adam—but upon a narrower aspect, the offering that involved the shedding of blood, and the ignominy of the cross. Just as the Burnt Offering, the Sin Offering, and the Passover differ very materially from each other in many essential particulars (yet all speak of the one offering of Christ), so in that one offering we must be prepared to find a wondrous variety of applications and provisions, for here is centred the great procuring cause of all the blessings of all the ages and for all the widely differing destinies of man.

1 Thessalonians uses the great covering word when speaking to those who were concerned about the resurrection and the second coming of the Lord:—

> "Who died for (hupēr) us, that whether we may be watching or sleeping, we may live together with Him" (v. 10).

The lesser word thnēskō is not used in the N.T. in a doctrinal way.

The reader may not feel that much has been said in the way of exposition of these references, and we would once more point out that our desire is first of all to lay a foundation of fact, and to feel sure that all our readers have these facts before them. So long as there remain passages and usages unexplored, so long will clear views be impossible. We now know what doctrines are connected by the Spirit of God with the death of Christ. We have also observed in passing that some doctrines (those that more fully express the blessings of the gospel) are united by the same Spirit to other aspects of the great offering, and we are forced to the conclusion that, as every word of God is of design and purpose, we cannot hope to attain to clear views of truth if we use words loosely. The loose usage of words enables the partially instructed to reason that if Christ died for all then all are or will be saved, forgiven, and justified. This kind of reasoning is only valid if the death of Christ is synonymous with the other aspects of His great offering. We have seen otherwise. Some, who have seen enough to prevent them from reasoning in the way mentioned above, are mistaken, we think, in saying that the words, "Christ died for all," mean that Christ died for some. This again is because they too have failed to try the things that differ. We will not, however, attempt any proof until the varied phases of the great work of Christ have been placed before the reader; we hope then that "proof" will be unnecessary.

The Parables.

No. 17.

The faithful and the evil servants (Matt. xxiv. 45—51).

(Reprinted from Volume VI.).

The structure given on page 54 of Vol. 4, page 43 (Vols. iv. /v.) shows that the faithful and the evil servants of Matt. xxiv. 45—51 are balanced by the faithful and the unprofitable servants of Matt. xxv. 14—30. What we shall learn therefore in considering the closing verses of Matt. xxiv. will be of service when we examine the parallel parable in chapter xxv.

We would call attention at the outset to the fact that in these parables salvation is not the theme. There is always a tendency to generalize where God has particularized. We see this with such subjects as the old idea of a general resurrection and a general judgment. We know there are many resurrections and several judgments in the future. The generalizing of all the promises as though the "church" had a monopoly, and the generalizing of the varied sections of the purpose of the ages will likewise occur to us. We have not so clearly seen as yet, however, sufficient discrimination attempted by the majority in connection with the difference that Scripture makes regarding salvation and service. This is particularly noticeable in the way that the Epistle to the Hebrews is treated. Its exhortations to continue stedfast to the end and to endure; its invitation to come to the throne of grace to find help in time of need; its examples of faith; none of these has reference to the sinner needing salvation, but the saint needing perfecting. However, we cannot go into Hebrews here, but we have said so much because service, its reward or its penalty, and not salvation, is the theme of these parables.

The figures introduced are "a faithful and a wise servant," and an "evil servant," but servants both. We cannot agree with the idea that the evil servant was one only in imagination and was not a servant at all. The structure of the parable is as follows:—

Matt. xxiv. 45—51.

A | 45. The faithful and wise servant.
B | 45—47. His deeds and reward.	a | Made ruler over house.
	b | Give meat.
	c | Blessed, when lord cometh.
	b | Found so doing.
	a | Made ruler over all goods.
A | 48. The evil servant.
B | 48—51. His deeds and penalty.	d | Says, lord delays coming.
	e | Smites fellow servants.
	f | Eats with drunken.
	d | Lord comes unexpectedly.
	f | Portion with hypocrites.

The close parallel between the deeds and the reward is worthy of note. The servant who as ruler is found "so doing" faithfully is rewarded by being "made ruler" over many things. The servant who says in his heart, "My lord delayeth his coming," is overtaken by the unexpected coming of his lord. He who "smites" is himself "cut off." He who finds his companions "with" the drunken, finds his portion "with" the hypocrites. In all this we have the same truth that the apostle Paul gives in more than one epistle, "Whatsoever a man soweth that shall he also reap." Gal. vi. shows that it is possible for a believer not only to sow to the spirit, but to sow to the flesh, not only to reap eonian life, but to reap corruption. Matt. xxiv. shows the same thing. The first servant is called both faithful and prudent. These titles, united here in the one example, are subdivided in the following chapter. We have the prudent virgins, and the good and faithful servant.

It has been suggested that the words "Who then" should be taken as a figure called Metonymy, this particular example being the Metonymy of the Subject, where the subject (the thing) is put for that which is connected with it. If this be so the meaning, though not the translation, would be, "How blessed is the faithful and prudent servant," etc. A further thought is that by the use of this rather strange expression the Lord intimates that there will be few such when the Son of man cometh. A reference to Luke xii. 41, 42 may give yet further light. The Lord in verses 35—40 speaks a parable, using the figure of the watching, waiting servant. Peter then says to the Lord:—

> "Speakest Thou this parable unto us, or even to all? And the Lord said, Who then is that faithful and prudent steward, etc."

This seems to say that if Peter and the rest of the apostles did not come within the meaning of the words, who then could? The parable is followed by a statement concerning the few stripes and the many stripes that will be apportioned to fit the case of the well-informed and the ill-informed servants. The prudent and the foolish are brought together first in Matthew at the end of the Sermon on the Mount in connection with obeying or disobeying the words that the Lord had uttered—words not addressed to sinners needing salvation as is evident throughout. Luke xvi. 8 brings before us the prudence of the unjust steward. Phronimos, "prudent," and phroneō, "to think," are related. The usage of this word phroneō in the Prison Epistles is very suggestive. For example, it is absent from Ephesians and 2 Timothy, occurs once only in Colossians (iii. 2), but is found ten times in Philippians. Now Philippians is not dealing with salvation, but service, not a free gift, but a prize, and this accords with the usage of prudence in Matthew. Faithfulness comes out prominently in this connection. Luke xvi. 10 says:—

> "He that is faithful in that which is least, is faithful also in that which is much."

And again in Luke xix. 17 the parallel with Matt. xxiv. is clear. To the overcomer in the book of the Revelation come the words, "Be thou faithful unto death and I will give thee a crown of life." Those who overcome with the victorious Lamb are, like Him, "faithful" (Rev. xvii. 14; xix. 11). Faithfulness to the trust committed, prudence born of watching and waiting for the coming Lord, these are the two outstanding features of the servant who receives commendation. The being made ruler over all the Master's goods finds a ready parallel in the life of Joseph, as indeed does all that is stated of the faithful servant. The reference to being made ruler comes out again in Matt. xxv. This time the servant is not given to rule at first, but as a reward for his faithful use of the five talents, or the two talents, he is made ruler over five or two cities, and equally enters into the joy of his Lord, Who "for the joy that was set before Him endured a cross, despising the shame and is set down at the right hand of the throne of God." To the same effect is Phil. ii. 5—9:—

> "Let this mind (phroneō) be in you that was also in Christ Jesus, Who .....humbled Himself.....wherefore God also highly exalted Him."

The state of heart of the bad servant is reflected in such passages as 2 Pet. iii. 3 - 14, where the scoffing of those who walk after their own lusts regarding the coming of the Lord, the reference to the Flood (see ii. 5) and "being found of Him without spot" are suggestive parallels to Matt. xxiv. The state of drunkenness is also likened to the condition of unwatchfulness that shall overtake those who are in darkness; "for they that be drunken are drunken in the night" (see 1 Thess. v. 1—11).

The fate of the evil servant is "to be cut asunder." The word literally means to be cut in half, and has the meaning "cut in pieces" in the O.T. There is no doubt as to the word itself. The question, however, is what does it mean? Are we to understand that the Lord will literally cut His evil servants into pieces? The word "cut asunder" is dichotomeō and occurs only here and in Luke xii. 46. Dichā enters into the word dichazō, which is rendered "set at variance" in Matt. x. 35, although the word literally means "to divide into two parts." Temno means "to cut" and apotomē is the LXX. rendering of the word "smote off" in Judges v. 26 (Codex Alex.). This word undergoes a change in some of its usages in the N.T., for in Rom. xi. 22 we find apotomia rendered "severity," and apotomōs in Tit. i. 13, "sharply"; 2 Cor. xiii. 10, "sharpness." The idea of "cutting" here is figurative and not literal or physical. This seems to be the meaning in Matt. xxiv. 51. The severity of the punishment is emphasized by the usage of such a word.

Further, the evil servant's portion is to be with the hypocrites. The original meaning of the word hupokrinomai was "to represent another person by acting" as the ancient players did by speaking from behind a mask. It is an easy transition to the meaning, "to feign, pretend, dissemble" (see Luke xx. 20).

Peter acted hypocritically (Gal. ii. 13) by withdrawing himself from the Gentiles. None could have heard the stern denunciations of woe to the "Scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites," as recorded in Chap. xxiii., and not feel the severity of the punishment intended in xxiv. 51.

The words so solemnly uttered at other times of threatened judgment follow, "There shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth." This is said in relation to the children of the kingdom being cast into outer darkness in Matt. viii. 12, and in connection with the casting of all that offends out of the kingdom into a furnace of fire, and also at the severing of the wicked from the just in Matt. xiii. 42, 50. The same is said when the man without the wedding garment is cast into outer darkness (Matt. xxii. 13), and again in the judgment of the unprofitable servant (xxv. 30). The six references to the gnashing of teeth are closely related, and the order of their occurrence should be noted:—

A | viii 12, Kingdom. Reference to Gentiles in place of Israel.
B | xiii. 42, 50. Tares, fish, end of age, and coming of Son of man.
A | xxii. 13. Marriage. Reference to Gentiles in place of Israel.
B | xxiv. 51, xxv. 30. Evil and unprofitable servant, end of age, and coming of Son of man.

In all these references loss of position in the kingdom rather than loss of salvation is in view. Salvation as is evangelically understood had never been propounded when Matt. viii. and xiii. were uttered, for the Lord had not said a word about His death and resurrection (Matt. xvi. 21). The kingdom had been preached. Entry into it had been explained. Warning had been uttered, and this parable shows that the fact of being a servant does not render such immune from very severe punishment and loss. To have a portion among the hypocrites, instead of entering the joy of the Lord, to find the gate shut and access to the wedding feast denied, this causes the weeping and gnashing of teeth. "Blessed are they who are called unto the marriage supper of the Lamb." These will be the ready ones. Even the Bride "makes herself ready" (Rev. xix. 7).

We shall learn more concerning this line of teaching when we examine Matt. xxv. Let us remember that grace does not mean or lead to irresponsibility, but rather constrains unto faithfulness in the little time we have left for fellowship with His sufferings.

Light for the last days.

A series of studies in Scripture concerning the character of the closing days of this age.

No. 2.

The prophecy of Matthew xxiv. and xxv.

Having seen that there shall be an apostacy from the faith at the close of the present dispensation, and having assembled some of the characteristics that lead up to or constitute that apostacy in "the latter times," it may be profitable for us to investigate a little further what Scripture says concerning the dark days that come before the dawn. While such prophetic utterances point to a period beyond the limits of the dispensation of the Mystery, and are by no means contingent upon the hope of the Church of the One Body, they may nevertheless help us in assessing the trend of things, and establish us in the belief we entertain concerning the inspiration of Scripture in relation to the signs of the times.

The Second Coming of Christ and the "end of the age" marks the boundary of our enquiry, and we therefore naturally turn to Matt. xxiv. In Matthew xxiv. 4—28 we have the following prophetic statements, the fulfilment of which leads step by step to the goal of "the appearing of the sign of the Son of man in heaven" (Matt. xxiv. 30).

Deception (xxiv. 5).—Many shall come and say, "I am Christ" (xxiv. 5). This feature is repeated and enlarged in verse 24:—

> There shall arise false Christs.
> And false prophets.
> Showing great signs and wonders.
> If it were possible, deceiving the very elect.

As an expansion of this, the reader should turn to 2 Thessalonians ii. This chapter reveals the following characteristics:—

(1) Deception, by spirit, word, or letter as from the apostle, concerning the day of Christ or of the Lord.

(2) The apostacy must take place before the Lord returns. This shows that much of the teaching that centres round the idea of the betterment of the world in preparation for the setting up of the kingdom, is false.

(3) The Man of Sin, the Son of Perdition, is to be revealed. This title is borne by one other man in Scripture, Judas the Betrayer. The Man of Sin opposes the worship of God, and sits in the temple itself, "showing himself that he is God."

(4) This is the heading up of the mystery of iniquity, the Satanic counterfeit of the mystery of godliness. "Worship" here is sebasma; "godliness" in 1 Tim. iii. 16 is eusebeia. The question of worship underlies the whole controversy of the Scriptures, from Ezekiel xxviii., Gen. iii., Exod. xx. onwards to the worship of the Dragon in Rev. xiii.

(5) The Man of Sin who is to be "revealed" is given the further title of "That Wicked One."

(6) He is to be consumed at the coming of the Lord.

(7) There is also to be a "coming" of the Man of Sin; for the same word parousia is used of the Wicked One as is used of the Second Coming of Christ (2 Thess. ii. 8, 9).

(8) As in Matt. xxiv. we have the way prepared by "all power and signs and lying wonders." The "elect" shall be preserved from deception, but those of whom it can be said that they "believed not the truth" shall "believe the lie" (2 Thess. ii. 11, 12).

Turning to Revelation xiii. we find further explanation of this period of deception that is coming upon the earth.

(1) In Matt. xxiv. there are "false Christs" and "false prophets." In Rev. xiii. they reach their goal in the "Beast" (xiii. 2), and the "False Prophet" (xiii. 11 and xix. 20).

(2) This "Beast" (which must not be confused with "the Antichrist") is the indescribable monster of Dan. vii. 7, and combines in itself the distinctive features of the Gentile kingdoms that have dominated the earth in days gone by.

It was like a "leopard" (cf Dan. vii. 6).
It was like a "bear" (cf Dan. vii. 5).
It was like a "lion" (cf Dan. vii. 4).

What these statements involve must be considered later. We must now return to Matthew xxiv.

Following the general warning concerning deception, we have a reference to the "beginning of sorrows."

The Beginning of Sorrows (xxiv. 6—8).—(1) Wars, and rumours of wars. (2) Nation rising against nation; kingdom rising against kingdom. (3) Famines, pestilences, earthquakes. Interposed between these revelations comes the exhortation: "See that ye be not troubled: for all these things must come to pass, but the end is not yet" (xxiv. 6). The series is concluded with the words: "All these are the beginning of sorrows."

It would lengthen this article unduly if we were to give any further explanation of these items, as we have done in the case of "deception." We will therefore go through the remainder of Matthew xxiv., and then return to the different statements and examine them more carefully later.

Then shall the end come (xxiv. 9—14).—The "beginning of sorrows" is concerned with national and terrestrial movements. The subsequent happenings are more intimately concerned with the Lord's people.

(1) They shall be delivered up to be afflicted.
(2) They shall be killed.
(3) They shall be hated of all nations for the Name of Christ.
(4) Many shall be offended, and betray, and hate one another.
(5) And false prophets shall arise and deceive many.
(6) Iniquity shall abound, and the love of many wax cold.
(7) The gospel of the kingdom must be preached in all the world for a witness unto all nations.

Two statements are made concerning "the end":—

(1) He that shall endure to the end, the same shall be saved.
(2) Then shall the end come.

We shall find on examination that some of the above are allusions to O.T. prophecy. What comes next, however, is a direct reference to the prophecy of Daniel.

Daniel ix. (xxiv. 15—20).—It is made abundantly clear by the introduction of this prophecy from Daniel, that Matthew xxiv. has to do with the closing years of the "seventy weeks" and the last seven years in particular. The setting up of the Abomination of Daniel ix., which is to stand in the holy place, is dated for us in Scripture as "in the midst of the week" (Dan. ix. 27). It is at the close of the first $3\frac{1}{2}$ years of the final seven years of the time of the end. Proof of this must await detailed examination. It also fixes the prophetic period of 2 Thessalonians ii. and Revelation xiii.

The Great Tribulation (xxiv. 21).—This tribulation is without precedent. It stands alone; no such tribulation has ever before been known, and it will never be repeated. This tribulation is referred to in Revelation vii. 9—17:

> "These are they which came out of tribulation—the great one."

It is also referred to in Dan. xii. 1:—

"There shall be a time of trouble, such as never was since there was a nation even to that same time."

The link between Matt. xxiv., 2 Thess. ii., Rev. xiii., and Dan. xii. is unbreakable. 1 Thess. iv., with its reference to the "archangel," is also intimately connected with these passages.

The Coming of the Son of man (xxiv. 29—31).—Immediately after this great tribulation the Son of man returns, and sends out His angels and gathers His elect from the four winds, from one end of heaven to the other.

The Parables of the End (xxiv. 32—xxv. 46).—Following the prophetic unfolding of the sign of the Lord's Coming and of the end of the age, the Lord gives several parables.

(1) THE FIG TREE (xxiv. 32, 33).—The putting forth of the leaves represents the gathering signs of the times. "It is near."

(2) THE DAYS OF NOAH (xxiv. 36—39).—The days of Noah foreshadow the last days in more ways than one. Here the Lord stresses the fact that "the day and hour" were unknown.

(3) THE TWO IN THE FIELD AND AT THE MILL (xxiv. 40—42).—This supplements the necessity for watchfulness already mentioned.

(4) THE THIEF (xxiv. 43, 44).—The Coming of the Lord like a thief in the night stresses yet further the need for readiness.

(5) THE TEN VIRGINS (xxv. 1—13).—This parable reveals the condition of things at the time of the end. The "lamps" and the "oil" must not be made to represent evangelical doctrines. The purpose of the parable is expressed in verse 13: "Watch, therefore, for ye know neither the day nor the hour."

(6) THE TALENTS (xxv. 14—30).—This parable is intended to encourage faithful witness in view of the Lord's return and the judgment-seat of Christ.

(7) THE SHEEP AND THE GOATS (xxv. 31—46).—When the Son of man comes, and sits on His throne, the question as to which nations shall enter the kingdom and which shall not, is settled by their attitude to His "brethren."

Such is a summary of the prophetic forecast of Matthew xxiv. and xxv. Before attempting a fuller analysis, we must consider what the Scriptures reveal concerning the nations of the earth, and the one nation Israel, in relation to the time of the end, and this we will do in subsequent articles.

This is the record.

No. 4.

"But I have greater witness than that of John: for the works which the Father hath given me to finish, the same works that I do, bear witness of Me, that the Father hath sent Me" (John v. 36).

The writer of the above verse, in his first epistle said:—

"If we receive the witness of men, the witness of God is greater" (1 John v. 9).

For a time the Jews had rejoiced in the testimony of John the Baptist, and although he was remarkable both in the occasion of his birth, his manner of life and his testimony, were such that the Saviour said: "Among them that are born of women there hath not risen a greater than John the Baptist" (Matt. xi. 11). Yet the exercise of one element of confirmatory witness was withheld from him, for many who resorted to Christ said: "John did no miracle: but all things that John spake of this man were true" (John x. 41).

The opening of Christ's public ministry shook the land from Galilee and Decapolis to Jerusalem, Judaea and beyond Jordan, with the miraculous healing of all manner of sickness, torment, demon possession, lunacy and palsy, for "He healed them all" (Matt. iv. 23—25). His mighty works were such that had Tyre, Sidon and Sodom witnessed such evidences of divine approval, "they would have repented long ago" and "remained until this day" (Matt. xi. 20—24).

His miracles, moreover, were no mere display of power—Satan himself has worked, and will yet work "lying wonders"—but the miracles of Christ were acted parables setting forth in sign the truth He taught in word, and to accomplish all the glorious implication of which He came to die.

The Gospel of John makes more use of the word ergon, "work," than the other three Gospels together. Mighty as they were, the works of the Saviour were but a prelude and foreshadowing of that mighty work which He came to do by the offering of Himself. We are not, then, surprised to find that the first and last references to the "work" of the Lord in John have a direct correspondence.

"My meat is to do the will of Him that sent Me, and to finish His work" (John iv. 34).

"I have glorified Thee on the earth: I have finished the work which Thou gavest Me to do" (John xvii. 4).

In like manner the verb ergazomai, "to work," occurs eight times in John, and, once again, the opening and closing references suggest an intentional parallelism of light and darkness.

> "But he that doeth truth cometh to the light, that his deeds may be made manifest, that they are wrought in God" (John iii. 21).
> "I must work the works of Him that sent Me, while it is day: the night cometh, when no man can work" (John ix. 4).

In chapter v. we note that, by implication, the Lord made a tremendous claim; so tremendous that if it had been untrue we should have had to justify the Jews in their attempt to stone Him. He said "My Father worketh hitherto, and I work" (John v. 17). This statement is made in connection with a miracle of healing performed on the Sabbath day (John v. 1—16), and the wonderful truth implied by the connection is that the seventh day, on which God rested from the work of creation, is a type and foreshadowing of the results of that work which the Lord Jesus came to finish, for the testimony of Heb. iv. is that neither in Genesis, nor under Joshua nor David did any believer enter into His rest. Continuing this claim of equality, the Saviour said:—

> "For the Father loveth the Son, and sheweth Him all things that Himself doeth: and He shall shew Him greater works than these, that ye may marvel" (John v. 20).

The next nine verses speak of the great work of raising the dead. It was the claim of Christ as the Son, that He had both "seen" and "heard" the Father.

> "The Son can do nothing of Himself, but what He seeth the Father do" (John v. 19).
> "I can of mine own self do nothing; as I hear, I judge" (John v. 30).

If we keep these words in mind we shall better understand His rejoinder in verse 37: "Ye have neither heard His voice at any time, nor seen His shape."

This testimony to the person and office of the Saviour reaches a crisis in John x.:—

> "Then came the Jews round about Him, and said unto Him, How long dost Thou make us to doubt? If Thou be the Christ, tell us plainly. Jesus answered them, I told you, and ye believed not: the works that I do in My Father's name, they bear witness of Me . . . . If I do not the works of My Father, believe Me not, But if I do, though ye believe not Me, believe the works: that ye may know, and believe that the Father is in Me, and I in Him" (John x. 24, 25, 37, 38).

The result of the testimony is that while some sought to slay Him, others said; "John did no miracle: but all things that John spake of this man were true. And many believed on Him there." (John x. 41, 42). Even the disciples did not at first fully realise the stupendous fact in their midst—"God manifest in the flesh," for He had to say:—

> "Have I been so long time with you, and yet hast thou not known Me, Philip? he that hath seen Me hath seen the Father: and how sayest thou then, Shew us the Father? Believest thou not that I am in the Father, and the Father in Me? the words that I speak unto you I speak not of Myself: but the Father that dwelleth in Me, He doeth the works. Believe Me that I am in the Father, and the Father in Me: or else believe Me for the very works' sake" (John xiv. 9—11).

Referring to the non-repentance of the nation, the Lord said:—

> "If I had not done among them the works which none other man did, they had not had sin: but now have they both seen and hated both Me and My Father" (John xv. 24).

With this testimony before us, what must be our only attitude to "Modernism" that brushes aside the miracles of the N.T. as so much unscientific superstitution? We can have neither part nor lot with them. The Christ they preach is not the Christ of God, and if we are to tolerate such an attitude, of what use are the Scriptures to us? Let us prayerfully ponder our Lord's appeal to these mighty works, and let us abide in the faith.

With all thy getting, get understanding.

No. 25.

Figures of Speech.

Figures involving change: Synecdoche.

Metonymy is the figure of exchange between two related nouns; Synecdoche is the figure of exchange between two associated ideas. The word "Synecdoche" is made up of sun, "together with," and ekdoche, "a receiving from," and signifies a figure by which one word receives something from another. The figure is divided into four sections:—

(i.) SYNECDOCHE OF THE GENUS.—The universal for the particular.

(ii.) SYNECDOCHE OF THE SPECIES.—One for many or all.

(iii.) SYNECDOCHE OF THE WHOLE.—Collective for the particular.

(iv.) SYNECDOCHE OF THE PART.—Part for the whole.

(i.) Synecdoche of the Genus.—In this type of figure we find the word "all" representing the greater part:—

"And all the city was gathered together at the door" (Mark i. 33).

"All the goods of his master were in his hand" (Gen. xxiv. 10). (This means, of course, "all that his master had given him"—compare verse 53).

Under this same heading comes the question of universal affirmatives and universal negatives. For example, in the word "whosoever" the genus is put for the species—all of a properly defined class. As this word is often abused, it is important to observe that it is always followed by a qualification. We have "Whosoever believeth," "Whosoever drinketh," "Whosoever calleth," "Whosoever cometh," etc., but never the word "whosoever" alone. To sing: "God said 'Whosoever,' and that means me" is misleading, for God says "Whosoever believeth," and it is the added qualification that makes all the difference.

As examples of the use of universal negatives, we may take the following:—

"The seventh day is the sabbath of the Lord thy God; in it thou shalt not do any work" (Ex. xx. 10). Servile work is forbidden, not work of all kinds whatsoever (Lev. xxiii. 7, 8).

"In secret have I said nothing" (John xviii. 20). The Lord had said many things "in secret," but nothing seditious or criminal.

Words of a wider meaning are by this figure used in a narrower sense. For example, the phrase "all flesh" in Gen. vi. 12 and Isa. xl. 5 does not include the lower animals.

(ii.) Synecdoche of the Species.—In this type of figure we have the opposite of what we have just been considering.

"Many" is sometimes put for "all":—

"He bare the sin of many" (Isa. liii. 12). The "many" here are the "all" of verse 6.

Words of a limited sense are sometimes used with a wider meaning. A familiar example is the use of "man" for the whole race of men, women and children.

Jerome classifies four kinds of "brethren"—brethren by nature (Gen. xxvii. 1), by nation (Deut. xv. 3), by kindred (Gen. xiii. 8), and by affection (Psa. cxxxiii. 1, etc.).

"Son" is used in rather the same way; for example, Christ is called the "Son of David."

Again, some particular species may be put for the whole genus, For example, when the Psalmist says: "I will not trust in my bow, neither shall my sword save me" (Psa. xliv. 6), we are not at liberty to add, "But I can trust in a spear, or an axe." We recognise at once that he intends to include weapons of all kinds.

Verbs may also be exchanged by this figure. For example, "find" sometimes means "receive," and is so translated in some passages:—

"Noah found grace," for example, means that "he received grace."

"Then Isaac sowed in the land, and received (Heb. "found," see A.V. margin) in the same year an hundredfold" (Gen. xxvi. 12).

"To find" sometimes means "to be present with": "And being found in fashion as a man" (Phil. ii. 8).

"And be found in Him" (Phil. iii. 9).

(iii.) Synecdoche of the Whole.—In this type of figure the whole is put for a part. In the following passages, for example, the collective is put for something more particular:—

"All flesh" (Gen. vi. 12) did not include Noah.

"Ye which have followed Me" (Matt. xix. 28) did not include Judas Iscariot.

"All die" (1 Cor. xv. 22) does not include those who shall be "alive and remain" (see verse 51).

A place is sometimes put for the persons in it, as "the world" in John iii. 16 and xii. 19.

Expressions of time are used for certain limited portions of it:—

"He shall serve him for ever" (Ex. xxi. 6) i.e. as long as he lives.

"O king live for ever" i.e. "Long live the king."

(iv.) Synecdoche of the Part.—Here one part maybe put for, and include every other.

"In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread" (Gen. iii. 19).

"Let my soul die the death of the righteous" (Num. xxiii. 10, A.V. and R.V. Margin).

It would be wrong to build any doctrine concerning the nature of the soul on this passage. "My soul" simply means "I myself."

"The body," also, is used for the person himself, rather in the same way as the word "hand" is used for "workman" in modern English.

"If he (i.e. the Hebrew servant) came in with his body (i.e. 'by himself' A.V.)" (Exod. xxi. 3).

So also, with many references to "the heart," "the head," "the feet," etc.

"Beginning from the baptism of John" (Acts i. 22). Here again a part is put for the whole, the distinctive element of John's ministry being put for the ministry itself.

"All the gate of my people doth know that thou art a virtuous woman" (Ruth. iii. 11). The gate was the place of common concourse, where the people assembled.

"Howl, O gate; cry, O city" (Isa. xiv. 31). It is evident that the word "gate" stands for the people, just as does the word "city."

"The hour" is sometimes put for a special time or season, as in John iv. 23: "The hour cometh."

We must now conclude our present study. We have only given a tithe of the illustrations to be found in Dr. Bullinger's "Figures of Speech," and regret that much of interest has necessarily been omitted. We have indeed given "a part for the whole."

Wisdom, Human and Divine.

Being a comparison of the groping after truth of the ancient philosophers with the truth as it is revealed in Scripture, in order that the believer may the better appreciate the Word of God.

No. 5.

The search for the "First Principle" and its result.

"What?" instead of "Who?"

The aim of philosophy is to reduce complexity to simplicity, and so at length to find the ultimate reality. Had the ancient philosophers known the Book of Ecclesiastes, and weighed some of its findings, they might have been led to perceive the futility of their quest. Had they known the Book of Job, they might have learned how impossible such a quest was. Had they read the Book of Proverbs, they would have discovered what constitutes the beginning of wisdom. These three "Wisdom Books" of the Bible will have to be given a place in this series, but first of all we must seek a closer acquaintance with the findings of these men of old, so that, by comparison, we may the better appreciate the simplicity, and yet the fulness, of the Word of God.

In our last article, we spoke of Herodotus as the "Father of History," and mentioned five others, who by their pre-eminence were "Fathers" in their respective spheres. It may have been noticed that no one was there described as "The Father of Philosophy." This title belongs to Thales (640—550 B.C.), and was given to him because he seems to have been the first to turn from the mythology and idolatry of his day, and to attempt by investigation to discover the first principle of all things. The words he uses for the first principle of all things are Tes Toiautes Archē. The reader will at once think of Gen. i. 1 and John i. 1, both of which use the word "beginning," archē. Homer and Hesiod had ascribed to Oceanus and Tethys the origin of all things, but Thales stripped their teaching of its mythology, and announced that Water is the material cause, or first principle of all things. Aristotle summed up the teaching of Thales under three heads:—

(1) The earth floats on water.

(2) Water is the material cause of all things.

(3) All things are full of gods (The magnet, for example, is alive).

One cannot but realise that Thales had stumbled upon the threshold of truth. Peter rebuked the scoffers of his day saying:

> "For this they wilfully forget, that there were heavens from of old, and an earth compacted out of water and amidst water, by the word of God" (2 Pet. iii. 5, R.V.).

With this statement agrees the Psalmist, who writes:

> "The earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof; the world, and they that dwell therein. For He hath founded it npon the seas, and established it upon the floods" (Psa. xxiv. 1, 2).

> "O give thanks unto the Lord, for He is good; for His mercy endureth for ever . . . . To Him that stretched out the earth above the waters" (Psa. cxxxvi. 1, 6).

In Job xxxviii. 6 and 8, and Psa. civ. 3—6, we have allusions to the foundations of the earth and the great deep. Behind the myths of Oceanus and Tethys, and the "first principle" of Thales, lies a truth. That truth the simplest believer may discover by reading Gen. i. 1, 2.

The ancients gave Janus, the double-headed god, the name of Chaos, and in that capacity he was called "The god of gods." All this was but the truth of Gen. i. 1, 2, mystified and paganised. This present world did arise out of the waters of the great deep, and although Thales failed to reach the sublimely simple revelation: "In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth," it may be that he was not much further removed from truth than many a modern exponent of up-to-date philosophy and science. While the words "The magnet is alive" may bring a smile to the face of the scientist, and the words "All things are full of gods" may cause the pious to shudder, let us not forget that modern scientific terms sometimes leave no room for God at all. The "laws of nature" are just as evil in their tendency as the "gods" that they have replaced.

Scripture does not endorse the pantheism of Thales, neither does it endorse the atheism of Science. What we find is that where Thales put "gods," and Science puts "laws," revealed truth puts Christ:—

> "HE is before all things, and by HIM all things consist" (Col. i. 17).
> "Upholding all things by the word of HIS power" (Heb. i. 3).

HE, HIM, HIS—not "gods many," nor godless "laws," but a living Person.

We, therefore, repeat what was said at the beginning of this series. The revealed truth of Scripture speaks always of a Person, while all systems of Philosophy lead to abstractions. This note we shall strike again and again until its beauty and its glorious sufficiency are to some degree appreciated. The tragedy of the philosophic enquiry which commenced with Thales, and was pursued by his successors, is that it asks, "What is the source of all things?" instead of "Who is the source of all things?"

Blessed be God, He has revealed to us things hidden from the wise and prudent. We read the answer to the question of Thales in the face of Jesus Christ.

Paul and his Companions.

No. 8.

Aquila and Priscilla, or "Greater love hath no man than this."

Some of the apostle's companions were definitely called by the Holy Spirit and acknowledged by the church, as was Barnabas (Acts xiii. 2, 3). Some possessed qualifications which practically forced them into the breach that opened before them, as Silas (Acts xv. 26, 27, 32, 40). In the case of Aquila and Priscilla two very different and remote causes worked together for their good, for the apostle's consolation and our lasting benefit. These were the edict of a Roman Emperor, and the teaching of the Talmud.

> "After these things Paul departed from Athens and came to Corinth; and found a certain Jew named Aquila, born in Pontus, lately come from Italy, with his wife Priscilla (because that Claudius had commanded all Jews to depart from Rome), and came unto them" (Acts xviii. 1, 2).

Suetonius, a Latin historian, says that Claudius expelled the Jews from Rome because of the tumults among them stirred up by one, Chrestus. Whether Chrestus was the actual name of some disturber of the peace, or, as some believe, an ignorant misreading of the name Christ, cannot now be determined. We know that there were pious Jews from Rome who heard Peter's message on the day of Pentecost, just as there were Jews from Pontus, the birthplace of Aquila. Whatever the fact may be, one result of this edict was the migration of Aquila to Corinth, and there the apostle found him. There is nothing in the narrative to suggest that Paul was acquainted with Aquila and sought him out. The narrative rather suggests that he looked for suitable shelter in the Jewish quarter of Corinth, and that he was guided by the Lord unknown to himself. However, the narrative continues:—

> "And because he was of the same craft, he abode with them, and wrought; for by their occupation they were tentmakers" (Act xviii. 3).

A harmful affectation sometimes assumed by those having a literary bent, or who pose as scholars, is to boast of their uselessness in manual work as though inability to distinguish between chisel and screwdriver enhanced their pose. Paul needed no such pretension to bolster up his dignity. He was as great while stitching his leather tents as when he wrote Ephesians, for in both he was doing the will of the Lord. It is written in the Talmud:

"What is commanded of a father towards his son? To circumcise him, to teach him the law, to teach him a trade."

Gamaliel said :—

"He that hath a trade in his hand, to what is he like? He is like a vineyard that is fenced."

There are several references by Paul in his writings to the fact that he supported himself by his own manual labour. He did so at Ephesus (Acts xx. 34), at Corinth (1 Cor. ix. 12; 2 Cor. vii. 2); and Thessalonica (1 Thess. ii. 9: 2 Thess. iii. 8), and no doubt these are but typical instances of his habit.

Because cilicium, a hair cloth, was in common use at the time it has been assumed that the tents made by Aquila and Paul must of necessity have been of goats hair. Chrysostum, however, who was born at Antioch, and died in A.D. 407, says on this subject:—

"St. Paul, after working miracles, stood in his workshop at Corinth, and stitched hides of leather together with his own hands, and the angels regarded him with love, and the devils with fear."

We find that after maintaining a witness at Corinth extending over a period of eighteen months, Paul set sail for Syria, Priscilla and Aquila accompanying him. On the journey they touched at Ephesus, and there Paul parted from Aquila for a time (Acts xviii. 18—28). It was at Ephesus that these two companions of Paul did such splendid service in that they took Apollos with them and expounded unto him the way of God more perfectly, This we must consider when dealing with Apollos himself. The apostle mentions these companions in three epistles.

"Greet Prisca and Aquila my helpers in Christ Jesus: who have for my life laid down their own necks: unto whom not only I give thanks, but also all the Churches of the Gentiles. Likewise greet the Church that is in their house" (Rom. xvi. 3—5).

The R.V. here rightly reads "Prisca," as does the A.V. in 2 Tim. iv. 19. This form of the name is probably an affectionate diminutive, and the use of it opens for a moment a door into the private life and homely affections of the great apostle. The genuiness and reality of the apostle's character was such that he had no need, as we say, to stand on his dignity and could indulge in a little playfulness without detracting from the solemnity of his message.

With regard to the passage quoted from Romans xvi. it is written: "Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends" (John xv. 13). So that Aquila and Priscilla had shown the apostle the highest quality of love this world affords. How, where, and precisely what, were all the circumstances which brought out this manifestation of love we do not know. The narrative of the Acts abounds with accounts of riots, plots and murderous attacks upon the apostle, and at least on one of these dangerous occasions the intervention of this homely couple saved the life of the apostle, for which it may truly be said not Paul only but the churches of the Gentiles, ever since, give thanks.

Aquila and Priscilla join the apostle in sending salutations to the church at Corinth, and it is noticeable that while they have evidently removed from one city to another, they still have a church in their house (1 Cor. xvi. 19). The faithful fellowship and affectionate nearness of these companions of Paul continued to the end. "Salute Prisca and Aquila" wrote the apostle on the eve of his martyrdom. At last he was to lay down his neck for the truth he held dearer than life itself, and he cannot forget those whose love was instrumental, under God, in enabling him to finish his course. Apart from the important instance recorded in Acts xviii. in connection with Apollos, we do not associate Aquila or Priscilla so much with teaching as with that equally important ministry of hospitality and loving service, even unto death. What a sanctifying of life for man and wife and home, thus to be consecrated to the Lord! On every hand there are indications that before this dispensation ends the "church" will once more be in "the house" of such believers. What glory may be awaiting some readers of these lines!

May the Lord use the message to accomplish His purposes of grace and prepare His Aquilas and Priscillas for service in the closing days.

The epistle to the Romans.

No. 60.

The mind of the Spirit (Rom. viii. 22—28).

Arising out of the confession of ignorance that occurs in verse 26—"We know not," we find two comforting statements in verses 27 and 28: "He knoweth" . . . . "We know."

We are concerned at the moment with the first of these statements. We know not what to pray for as we ought, and even when the Spirit has helped our infirmity our prayer is but a groan that cannot be uttered. This, if left unexplained, would be disconcerting. Can groans that cannot be uttered mean anything to the Lord? Can we expect such prayers to be answered? It is in order that we may be assured on this point that the verse before us was written:—

> "And He that searcheth the hearts knoweth what is the mind of the Spirit, because He maketh intercession for the saints according to the will of God" (Rom. viii. 27).

The verse opens with the adversative de, "but," as though the apostle would say, "But although these desires cannot find expression in words, remember, you are praying to God and not to man, and it is His glorious prerogative to search the heart and know the thoughts of man before they are framed in speech."

The title "Searcher of hearts" is one that we must not lightly pass over.

> "But the LORD said unto Samuel, Look not on his countenance, or on the height of his stature: because I have refused him: for the LORD seeth not as man seeth: for man looketh on the outward appearance, but the LORD looketh on the heart" (1 Sam. xvi. 7).
> "What prayer and supplication soever be made by any man, or by all Thy people Israel, which shall know every man the plague of his own heart, and spread forth his hands toward this house: then hear Thou in heaven Thy dwelling place, and forgive, and do, and give to every man according to his ways, whose heart Thou knowest (for Thou, even Thou only, knowest the hearts of the children of men)" (1 Kings viii. 38, 39).
> "The heart is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked: who can know it? I the Lord search the heart" (Jer. xvii. 9, 10).

These are but a few of many passages that set forth this great fact. While we desire to give prominence to this wonderful knowledge of God, let us not miss the reason for its introduction here in Rom. viii. 27. He Who searches our hearts knows the mind of the Spirit. He needs no explanation; groans speak as eloquently as the most moving language human lips have ever framed.

Further, there is an evident intention to associate the heart of the believer with the mind of the Spirit, assuring us that here we have co-operation, not mere substitution. The Spirit does not set us aside and pray for us, He rather helps our infirmity. While it is true that He intercedes for us, He does not put into our hearts, or into our lips, petitions that are contrary to our understanding of truth, or contrary to our real desires.

When a child of God has been brought to the extremity suggested by Rom. viii. 26, when the burden of earth's vanity and the bondage of corruption have been so keenly felt as to render prayer a matter of groaning, that child of God will not at the same time be abusing the privilege of prayer for the glorification of self. His very agony of soul reveals the intensity of his desires for right, and his consciousness of utter weakness. It is then that the Spirit helps, and intercedes. It is then that the mute and struggling heart can rest in the consciousness that He knows, and that the unspoken prayer has been heard, that the omitted petition—omitted because of ignorance in the face of overwhelming problems—has been filled in by the Spirit of God Who interprets the inclination of the heart beyond the believer's own knowledge.

The A.V. reads, "Because He maketh intercession" and places "that" as an alternative in the margin. The latter translation is to be preferred. A parallel passage may help to make this clear:—

> "The Lord knoweth the thoughts of the wise, that they are vain" (1 Cor. iii. 20).

It would not make sense to read: "because they are vain." So in Rom. viii. 27: "He knows what is the mind of the Spirit, that He maketh intercession for the saints." He knows what those unspoken sighs mean. He knows that the Spirit is meeting the saint's extremity with His own gracious power.

We must now consider the phrase "the mind of the Spirit." Phronēma occurs only in Rom. viii. 6, 7 and 27:—

> "For to be carnally minded is death; but to be spiritually minded is life and peace. Because the carnal mind is enmity against God" (The margin reads: Gr. The minding of the flesh, the minding of the spirit).

We must remember that there are several Greek words translated "mind," each having its own particular significance.

NOUS.—This word is found only in the writings of Paul in the N.T. and indicates the reflective consciousness as opposed to impulse (Rom. vii. 23).

DIANOIA.—"A thinking through," mature thought (Luke x. 27).

ENNOIA.—What is in the mind (nous), an idea (Heb. iv. 12).

NOĒMA.—That which is thought out, purpose (2 Cor. iv, 4).

PSUCHE.—Soul, the mind as an expression of life (Phil. i. 27).

GNŌMĒ.—The mind made up (Rev. xvii. 13).

PHRONĒMA.—The bent, what one thinks and feels (Rom. viii. 6).

The fact that phronēma is derived from phrēn shows that it is not to be connected with pure reason, but rather with the feelings, for phrēn in the first instance means the pericardium and the diaphragm. It was then transferred in a figure to the mind itself (1 Cor. xiv. 20). The reader will recognise the word in the modern term "phrenology." We find phrontizo translated "be careful" in Titus iii. 8, and periphronitō, "despise" in Titus ii. 15.

The flesh has a bent, and so has the spirit. The thought is expressed in the word "incline" that we find in the Psalms. Returning to Rom. viii., we first of all learn to distinguish between the bent or inclination of the flesh and that of the spirit, and then to realise that He Who searches the heart knows the bent or inclination of the spirit, even though, owing to the infirmity of the flesh, that inclination be not always put into practice. It is a most blessed comfort for every struggling believer to realise that the Lord is not judging his outward acts and his uttered words so much as observing the bent of his heart. Abraham faltered and failed a number of times in his walk of faith, and the failings are recorded for our learning. Nevertheless, we can perceive and the Lord saw clearly that the "inclination" was there all the time, though sometimes deflected by the proximity of other things.

The intercession of the Spirit, the verse concludes, is according to the will of God. The reader will observe that the words "the will of" are in italics. The Greek reads simply kata Theon, "according to God." We may translate kata, "in harmony with" if we wish, and by so doing secure a better rendering. It is in harmony with the great purpose of God that we should be one day conformed to the image of His Son, and that we should attain to the full glory of the adoption. It is also in harmony with His purpose that we should experience something of the vanity and vexation of a world that knows not God. Nevertheless He Who has redeemed us, never leaves us or forsakes us, and in harmony with God, the Holy Spirit has been given to be the Comforter, the Helper, and Intercessor, during the earthly pilgrimage of all whose minds are set on things above.

Did the apostles misunderstand the Scriptures in Acts i.?

(Reprinted from Volume VI.).

There are two very different classes of people who find it fitting to their conception of truth to speak rather freely concerning "Apostolic mistakes." The one class do not believe the Scriptures to be inspired, and therefore any teaching or action of the apostles that does not fall into line with their more advanced ideas is put down to ignorance. The other class believe that Scripture is inspired, but they have failed to discern the things that differ. They approach the Book of the Acts fully persuaded that it deals with the "Church." They find their ideas concerning the church in the Acts of the Apostles continually confronted and challenged by some word or act of the apostles. Hence the convenient term, Apostolic Mistakes. It does not seem to have occurred to them that if the apostles could be so grievously mistaken regarding such fundamental things, their claim to inspiration and God-given authority is undermined, and so in this respect are similar to those who deny the Word of God.

One of the so called apostolic mistakes is the question of Acts i. 6. "Lord, wilt Thou at this time restore again the kingdom to Israel?" We are told that this question betrays a sorry failure on the part of the apostles to understand the true significance of things. To suit the accepted ideas of most orthodox teachers, the apostles should have been found enquiring concerning the "Church."

Before we consider this question, we shall be profited, and possibly humbled, by observing the close parallel existing between the end of Luke xxiv. and the opening verses of Acts i. To make this apparent we set out the verses in parallel columns.

Luke xxiv. 36—53.	Acts i. 1—12.
36—43. "And as they thus spake, Jesus Himself stood in the midst of them.....and said.....Behold My hands and My feet that it is I Myself: handle Me and see; for a spirit hath not flesh and bones as ye see Me have.....and they gave Him a piece of a broiled fish and of an honeycomb. And He took it, and did eat before them."	This lengthy and detailed account (vv. 1 and 2) Luke summarizes without detail in the Acts by the words of verse 3. "To whom also He showed Himself alive after His passion BY MANY INFALLIBLE PROOFS." The reader is supposed to be acquainted with the details previously written.

44. "And He said unto them, These are the words which I spake unto you, being yet present with you, that all things must be fulfilled, which were written in the law of Moses, and in the Prophets, and in the Psalms concerning Me."

In verse 3, this testimony is summarised by the words: "speaking of the things pertaining to the kingdom of God."

It will be of service here to note how the continued reading of Luke xxiv. and Acts i. helps us in understanding Acts xxviii. 23, and incidentally marks two corresponding members in the structure. "And when they (the chief of the Jews) had appointed him a day, there came many to him into his lodging; to whom he expounded and testified the kingdom of God (Acts i. 3) persuading them concerning Jesus, both out of the law of Moses and out of the prophets." The message of the last chapter of the Acts is the same as the last chapter of Luke.

47—49. "Repentance and remission of sins should be preached in His name among all nations, beginning at Jerusalem. And ye are witnesses of these things. And behold, I send the promise of My Father upon you: but tarry ye in the city of Jerusalem, until ye be endued with power from on high."

Luke alludes to this in verses 4—8: "He commanded them that they should not depart from Jerusalem, but wait for the promise of the Father, which ye have heard of Me.....ye shall be baptised with holy spirit not many days hence .....ye shall receive power, after that the (aforementioned) holy spirit is come upon you; and ye shall be witnesses unto Me both in Jerusalem and in all Judæa, and in Samaria, and unto the uttermost parts of the earth."

Luke xxiv. 50—53 further records the leading out to Bethany, the Ascension and the return of the disciples to Jerusalem, each incident being repeated in the opening chapter of the Acts. If once we acknowledge that Luke xxiv. and Acts i. overlap, that they speak of the same period and persons, one great fact emerges which is fatal to the "mistake" theory. Considering the passage in Acts i. alone, we find that the Lord was seen of the apostles for forty days, and that He spoke of the things pertaining to the kingdom of God. The idea we are combating is that though the Lord was speaking about the church, the apostles were under the mistaken notion that He was speaking concerning the kingdom of Israel. Attention is drawn to the fact that whereas the Lord says "kingdom of God," they say "kingdom to Israel," thereby showing how utterly they had failed to understand the teaching of the Lord during those forty days. It all sounds very plausible, especially as it is practically accepted almost as a truism that "the church began at Pentecost." The moment we bring Luke xxiv. to bear upon the passage, we see that the "mistakes" are no longer apostolic, but are the mistakes of their self styled critics.

These critics say the apostles did not understand the Lord's meaning. Luke xxiv. says that they did. "Then opened He their understanding, that they might understand the Scriptures" (45—49). Here is proof positive. To teach that the apostles were ignorant of the Lord's meaning, or that they misunderstood the Scriptures is in direct contradiction of that which is written. To feel a necessity to refuse the testimony of this passage is of itself a conviction that some notion held regarding the message of the Acts is fundamentally wrong. So long as the tradition of man is held that the church began at Pentecost, so long will its adherents make void the Word of God in bowing to their traditions. If there is anything certain arising out of this consideration it is that the question concerning the restoration of the kingdom to Israel was an enlightened one, and one arising out of the fact that they "understood" the "opened Scriptures." The answer of the Lord also points in the same direction. He does not rebuke them for their ignorance or their bias, He simply deals with one part of their question which had to do with the time of Israel's restoration, telling them that these times and seasons were not the subject of revelation.

Studies in the Book of the Revelation.

No. 12.

Rev. i. 8, 9.

(Reprinted from Volume VI.).

"I am the Alpha and the Omega, saith the Lord God, Who is, and Who was, and Who is coming, the Almighty" (R.V. and Numeric N.T.).

If the reader will refer to the structure given on page 3 of Vol. V. (page 107 of IV./V.), he will see that the title Alpha and Omega is balanced by the title taken by Christ, "I am the first and the last." Further, the words, "Who is, and Who was, and Who is coming" are echoed in the title "I am He that liveth, and was dead; and behold I am alive for evermore." The title, "The Almighty" finds its answer in the claim, "I have the keys of hades and of death." This perfect unity and reflection of purpose and attribute has already been before us in verses 4 and 5.

The title Alpha and Omega in Rev. i. 8 is not specifically given to Christ, although the fact that it immediately follows verse 7 would lead one to think it refers to Him as the coming One. Rev. xxii. 12—16 however leaves us in no doubt, and as this chapter structurally corresponds with chapter i., it would seem to settle the matter for us.

> "And behold, I come quickly.....I am Alpha and Omega.....I Jesus have sent Mine angel."

The expression Alpha and Omega is explained by the words, "Beginning and ending, first and last," and we shall have opportunity of considering this title when we come to verse 17. The title that is new to us is the last one, "The Almighty." The title occurs ten times in the N.T., nine of the occurrences being in the Revelation. It is a title therefore that has some peculiar connection with the subject of the book. The passages are as follows:—Rev. i. 8; iv. 8; xi. 17; xv. 3; xvi. 7, 14; xix. 6, 15; xxi. 22, and they deal with the reign and rule of the coming King, judgment, wrath, and blessing as pertain to the purpose of God in Israel and the nations. The one reference outside the book of Revelation is 2 Cor. vi. 18, where the insistent note is separation from uncleanness, "perfecting holiness in the fear of God." The first passage where the LXX. uses the title is 2 Sam. v. 10, where it is rendered in the A.V. by "The Lord God of hosts." The other occurrences in 2 Samuel are vii. 8, 26, 27. Each reference has relation to David, the greatness of his kingdom and the future of his house. This title which occupies so great a place in the Prophets, "The Lord God of hosts" and "the Lord of hosts," seems to be used most in those Prophets that approximate most to the theme of the Revelation. The title comes before us again in James v. 4, "The Lord of Sabaoth," the context urging patience unto the coming of the Lord. John, in Rev. i., continues in much the same strain:—

> "I John, your brother and partaker with you in the tribulation and kingdom and patience in Jesus, came to be in the island which is called Patmos, because of the Word of God and the testimony of Jesus."

John calls himself a "brother and a partaker." The use of the word "brother" in the Revelation is by no means indiscriminate, in fact it appears to be confined to one distinct class, namely, those who are the overcomers by faith, and who spoke forth the Word of God. Rev. i. 9 is the only occurrence of the word in the singular, the remaining four occurrences being in the plural. These four references should be noted here, in order that their light may be used in learning the true significance of John's title.

Martyrdom attaches to the first reference, overcoming to the second, the possession of the testimony to the third, and keeping the sayings of the book to the fourth.

A | vi. 11. Fellowservants and brethren killed for the Word of God and the testimony (verse 9).
B | xii. 10. Accuser of brethren cast down. Overcome by the word of their testimony (verse 11).
A | xix. 10. Fellowservant and brethren that have the testimony of Jesus .....the spirit of prophecy.
B | xxii. 9. Fellowservant and brethren which keep the sayings of this book.

No one reading these passages can doubt but that they are closely connected. What is the common theme? The testimony of Jesus—the spirit of prohecy; in other words, "the sayings of this book" of the Revelation.

Our study of the Scriptures can never be too careful. Nothing is written therein without due regard to all truth. The indiscriminate use of the title "brethren" is a case in point. The fact that the title is used in a restricted sense in Revelation is manifest. It also agrees with one or two other prominent passages. For example, when we read in Matt. xxv. concerning the nations and the treatment of the "least of these My brethren," we must not think that the whole of the nation of Israel is necessarily intended. Rather is it to be interpreted, in the light of the Revelation, to refer to that faithful company who for the "testimony of Jesus" will know what it is to be hungry, and naked, and in prison, and also to "be killed." These, and not the nation of Israel as a whole, are the "brethren" intended.

John also calls himself a "partaker in the tribulation and kingdom and patience." The Greek of this passage, as indeed the English, presents a little difficulty unless we recognise a figure of speech named Hendiatris, "one by means of three." Such a figure occurs in Heb. x. 20, "A new and living way," which is arranged similarly to the words in John. "I am the way, the truth and the life," which should read, "I am the true and living way." The words in Rev. i. 9 mean not three things, but one, and that one defined by two other terms. The one thing is "tribulation," and it is peculiarly that tribulation which is related to the kingdom, and which necessitates much "patience." "We must through much tribulation enter into the kingdom of God" was Paul's testimony as recorded in Acts xiv. 22. (The sudden departure from narrative to quotation here—for Paul's own words are quoted—only emphasizes the more to us the stress which the apostle evidently gave to this utterance.)

Patience is referred to seven times in the Revelation, and its "perfecting work" is seen as the story of the book unfolds. Two passages call attention to the "patience" of the saints during the tribulation which comes about at the time of the Beast.

> "If any one is for captivity unto captivity he goeth; if any one is to be killed with the sword, with the sword he is killed. Here is the patience and faith of the saints" (xiii. 10).
> Here (in connection with the mark of the beast, verses 9–11) is the patience of the saints who keep the commandment of God, and the faith of Jesus.....blessed are the dead who die in the Lord from henceforth" (xiv. 12, 13).

In this kingdom tribulation with its accompanying patience John was a partaker together with all who rightly were "brethren." His next remark links the tribulation with its cause. It is the particular application of the universal truth, "I have given them Thy Word, and the world hath hated them."

John tells us that he "became," or "found himself" as we should say perhaps, "in the island called Patmos," a small island half-way between Rome and Jerusalem, situated in the sea of prophecy, "the great sea." Tradition tells us that John was "banished" to the Isle of Patmos, as it also tells us that the Lord's day means the first day of the week. John tells us in i. 2 that he "bare record of the Word of God, and of the testimony of Jesus, and of all things that he saw," while verse 9 tells us that he received this word and testimony and saw the things written in this book "in the isle called Patmos." Rev. xx. 4 includes "the word of God" among the causes of martyrdom of those who have their part in the first resurrection. Not only so, but "the witness (or testimony, same word) of Jesus" also. This double expression balances the passage in i. 9, these being the first and last occurrences. In xii. 17 the dragon makes war with those who "keep the commandments of God and have the testimony of Jesus." Chapter xix. 10 has already shown it to be both the mark of the brethren, and the spirit of prophecy. These five passages should be well considered, especially i. 9 with xx. 4.

As members of the one body, and those who have believed the truth as given through the ministry of the prisoner of the Lord, we have a tribulation connected therewith, not a tribulation connected with the kingdom, but nevertheless a real one. We too need much patience, we too may overcome, we too must hold fast the faithful word. Though our destinies may be different from those who will reign in the millennial kingdom, there are many close parallels so far as our conduct and experiences are concerned. May we be encouraged to overcome, remembering for our encouragement how verse 9 reads on from verse 8, where we see the "Almighty" ready to help in time of need.

Fundamentals of dispensational truth.

Joshua.

No. 11.

The five kings and the valley of Ajalon (Josh. x.).

The destruction of Jericho and Ai, together with the league made by the great city of Gibeon, caused great fear to take hold upon the king of Jerusalem, whose city appeared to be the one that would probably be next attacked by the conquering Israelites. His name, Adoni-zedec, reminds us of Melchisedec, who in Abraham's day was "King of Salem," and was associated with Abraham's victory over another alliance of kings (see Gen. xiv.). Adoni-zedec calls upon four other kings in the vicinity to join with him in the punishment of Gibeon. These five kings are called "the five kings of the Amorites" (Josh. x. 5), all of them belonging to the "devoted seed" of the Canaanites. The Gibeonites, seeing their peril, call upon Joshua, saying:—

> "Slack not thy hand from thy servants; come up quickly and save us, and help us; for all the kings of the Amorites that dwell in the mountains are gathered together against us" (Joshua x. 6).

If there had been in the hearts of Joshua or Israel any of the cruelty that those who have criticised their obedience to the Divine command to destroy the Canaanites have imputed to them, we might reasonably have expected that the perilous venture to which the Gibeonites called them would have been refused, and the Gibeonites left to their enemies. The ready response of Joshua and the mighty men of valour, together with the Lord's approval and promise of victory, seem to refute such a criticism.

The record of Joshua's victory over these five kings is chiefly remarkable for the miraculous lengthening of the day.

> "Then spake Joshua to the Lord in the day when the Lord delivered up the Amorites before the children of Israel . . . . Sun, stand thou still upon Gibeon: And thou, moon, in the valley of Ajalon. And the sun stood still, and the moon stayed, until the people had avenged themselves upon their enemies. Is not this written in the book of Jasher? So the sun stood still in the midst of heaven, and hasted not to go down about a whole day" (Josh. x. 12, 13).

Here is the record of a stupendous miracle which, taken literally, involves numerous lesser miracles in its fulfilment.

What are we to say to these things? First let us notice that, whatever our attitude may be to the record of Joshua x., we cannot escape the necessity of believing or rejecting other similar miraculous interferences with the sun and moon, and also the stars. What shall we say of the miraculous going back of the shadow on the sun dial (2 Kings xx. 11 and Isa. xxxviii. 8)? How shall we explain the statement of Amos viii. 9, that the Lord will cause the sun to go down at noon? Is not this as miraculous and as far-reaching as the miracle of Joshua x?

In Isaiah xiii. we read of the sun being darkened and the stars "not giving their light":—

> "The stars of heaven and the constellations thereof shall not give their light; the sun shall be darkened in his going forth, and the moon shall not cause her light to shine" (Isa. xiii. 10).

The context of the passage is concerned with the punishment of the world for its wickedness.

Again, in Zech. xiv., at the coming of the Lord, we read:

> "And it shall come to pass in that day, that the light shall not be clear nor dark: but it shall be one day which shall be known to the Lord, not day, nor night: but it shall come to pass, that at evening time it shall be light" (Zech. xiv. 6, 7).

It is clear that, if we should set aside the miracle of Joshua x. as "impossible," there are many more such miracles awaiting us. If we believe that the sun, moon, stars and earth are all the work of the Creator, that belief must include His supervision and disposal of His works. The so-called "Laws of Nature" as stated by man are but the faulty records of his observations, always subject to alteration and revision as discovery widens his horizon. What God can or cannot do is a subject outside the scope of the human mind. If he has been pleased to give us a glimpse of His ways, should we not gladly and thankfully receive it, realizing that nothing is too hard for the Lord?

If we go back to the time of Egypt and the plagues, it will be remembered that "the gods" of Egypt were included in the Divine judgment poured out on Pharaoh and his land. The frogs, the darkness, the miraculous transforming of the Nile, and the other plagues, touched the national religion at every point. Again, when we remember that Nineveh was the "Fish City" and that Jonah's God was mighty enough to compel a "great fish" to do His will, we perceive at once a special reason to justify the miracle. Not far from Ajalon was a city called Beth-Shemesh, "The House of the Sun," and Jericho itself was the City of the Moon. The Lord had already displayed His power in the earth, at Jordan and at Jericho. Rahab had confessed that the Lord was God "in heaven above, and in earth beneath" (Josh. ii. 11); and in the valley of Ajalon His supremacy in heaven was set forth.

After having seen that there can be no legitimate objection to this miracle, if we are to believe God at all, let us remember also that God is not merely a worker of wonders. We are distinctly told that the miraculous drying up of the Red Sea was brought about by a strong east wind that blew all night (Exod. xiv. 21). When Israel murmured because they had no flesh to eat in the wilderness, the Lord supplied their needs, not by creating flesh miraculously, but we read: "There went forth a wind from the Lord, and brought quails from the sea" (Num. xi. 31).

The O.T. uses two distinct Hebrew words for the "sun," and two for the "moon." For the sun, the words are shemesh and chammah; and for the moon, yareach (whence "Jericho") and lebanah. Shemesh indicates the light of the sun, chammah the burning sun itself. Yareach refers to the light of the moon, lebanah to its white disc. Parkhurst, speaking of chammah, writes:—

> "As a N. fem, chammah, The solar flame or fire as distinguished both from cheres the orb of the sun (Job ix. 7), and from shemesh, the light flowing from it. And for this latter reason it is (i.e. chammah), in the only three passages where it is used in this sense, constantly joined with lebanah, the white of the moon, never with yareach, the stream from it. Occ. Cant. vi. 10; Isa. xxiv. 23; xxx. 26."

To any one who has accepted the Scriptures as a revelation from God, and has accepted the God revealed in those Scriptures, the problems arising out of the miracles recorded do not exist. It is just as easy for us to believe that God stopped the clockwork of the universe at the prayer of Joshua, as that He caused an axe-head to swim or a widow's cruse of oil never to run dry. At the same time we have the Scriptures themselves as witness that the Lord uses means; and any acquaintance with the works of God in creation impresses the observer with the extraordinary adaptation of means to end, and the extreme economy of power and material. We are therefore well advised to give heed to the fact that the different words used for sun and moon convey different ideas. Urquhart uses the following illustration, and as it bears upon this miracle and its explanation, we quote it here.

"Place a shilling in the bottom of a basin and go back till the shilling disappears from sight. Let a little water be then poured into the basin, and the shilling will once more come into view, Go back still further, till it once more disappears. It will appear again, if more water is poured into the basin. This is explained by the bending or refracting of the rays of light. The more dense the medium is through which the rays pass, the greater is the refraction. We see the sun on the horizon, for a short time after it has really sunk beneath it. The Creator might surely have been able so to modify the atmosphere that the sun and the moon might still stand over Gibeon and over Ajalon. There was one incident which was quite in harmony with this suggestion. I refer to the fearful hailstorm which overtook the fleeing foe. 'A wave of intense cold,' says Dr. Harper, 'in that hot country produced this terrible hail-storm. Such occurrences are not uncommon even now in Syria. It is always at a time of intense cold that refraction of the sun appears. Travellers in the Polar regions give many instances when the sun is seen for several days, when they know the orb is one degree below the horizon.'"

Protracted daylight is all that Joshua desired; the way in which it was accomplished was entirely in the hands of the Lord. By analogy with other miracles and from the evidence of His methods in creation, we feel that the type of explanation given above satisfies all that is required, besides giving due attention to the particular words used for "sun" and "moon."

In our last article we drew attention to the fact that when Joshua went from Ai to Ebal, he was travelling in the reverse direction to that in which Abraham entered the land of promise. In Gen. xiv. we find that there were five kings confederate together, Bera king of Sodom, Birsha king of Gomorrah, Shinab king of Admah, Shemeber king of Zeboiim, and the king of Bela, which is Zoar. Abraham fights against the enemies of these kings, rescues Lot, refuses the reward offered by the king of Sodom, sees to it that Aner, Eschol and Mamre, with whom at the time he was associated, were rewarded, and meets with Melchisedec king of Salem, and receives his blessing. In Joshua's day, all this is reversed. The five kings are now enemies: Adoni-zedec king of Jerusalem, Hoham king of Hebron, Piram king of Jarmuth, Japhia king of Laschish, Debir king of Eglon, "five kings of the Amorites." Instead of being confederate with these Amorites, Joshua is expressly forbidden to enter into covenant with them at all, and is told to destroy them. Abraham refused to accept reward, or to appear in any sense a conqueror. He was a pilgrim, a tent-dweller, sojourning in the land. In Joshua's case it is different. He is taking the land in possession, and he calls upon the leaders of Israel to come and put their feet upon the necks of the captured kings, before they are slain and hanged on a tree.

Abraham's attitude is the one which fits the present period, while we are all "pilgrims and strangers on the earth" and our heavenly citizenship still awaits us. To the Romans the apostle wrote: "The God of Peace shall bruise Satan under your feet shortly" (Rom. xvi. 20). In the meantime, the Romans are instructed to act as pilgrims and strangers. "Let every soul be subject unto the higher powers." "If it be possible, as much as lieth in you, live peaceably with all men" (Rom. xiii. 1, xii. 18). Just as the taking of Jericho was prophetic, not of any present-day victory, but of the future overthrow of evil and the coming of the Lord, so the destruction of these five kings does not speak of our attitude at the present time, but looks forward to the day of victory when all enemies shall be placed under His feet, when the world in which we now have to live (as Abraham lived in peace with the Amorites) shall pass away, and the kingdom shall be the Lord's.

The many references to sun, moon and stars in connection with the day of the Lord, the second coming of Christ, and the end of the age, help us to see that the typical teaching of the valley of Ajalon points forward to that yet future time, when the kingdoms of this world shall become the kingdoms of the Lord and of His Christ.

No. 17.

Preparation for the ministry of Paul (Acts viii. 1—xi. 30).

The preaching and martyrdom of Stephen brings the first main section of the Acts to a close. The witness has been given at Jerusalem and several thousands have believed, but the majority remain unrepentant. We remember that the Lord had commanded His apostles to tarry at Jerusalem until endued with power from on high, and that they were then to be witnesses for Him "both in Jerusalem, and in all Judæa, and in Samaria, and unto the uttermost part of the earth" (Acts i. 8). Accordingly with the opening of Acts viii. there comes a widening of the circle of witness. From Jerusalem it now expands to the regions of Judæa and to Samaria.

> "And at that time there was a great persecution against the church which was at Jerusalem; and they were all scattered abroad throughout the regions of Judæa and Samaria, except the apostles" (Acts viii. 1).

But this persecution, divinely overruled, only served further to extend the witness, and instanced, once again, that even the wrath of man can be made to subserve the purposes of grace. That this "scattering abroad" is neither an incident nor an accident, the recurrence of the expression proves. Let us notice how diaspeiro occurs in this section, Acts viii. 1—xi. 30, and let us note its association with the very purpose of the Acts.

Acts viii. 1, 2.	Church at Jerusalem "scattered abroad." Regions of Judæa and Samaria. Reference to Stephen.
Acts viii. 3, 4.	Church persecuted by Saul. "Scattered abroad." "They went everywhere preaching the Word."
Acts viii. 5—40.	Sequel: Philip preaches to Samaritans and Ethiopians. Peter preaches to Cornelius.
Acts xi. 19.	They that were "scattered abroad." Reference to Stephen. As far as Phenice, Cyprus, and Antioch, "preaching the Word to none but Jews only."
Acts xi. 20—26.	Sequel; Saul comes to Antioch. "Christians."

These events were preparing the way for the ministry of Paul, which commences in Acts xiii. with his separation by the Holy Ghost.

We perceive in the ministry of Philip the breaking down of prejudice, for the Samaritans were hated by the Jews, and it is written: "The Jews have no dealings with the Samaritans" (John iv. 9). In spite of this the conversion and acceptance of these Samaritan believers was endorsed by the whole church at Jerusalem, for

> "When the apostles which were at Jerusalem heard that Samaria had received the word of God, they sent unto them Peter and John: who, when they were come down, prayed for them, that they might receive the Holy Ghost" (Acts viii. 14, 15).

It will be remembered that later, when Peter was called in question by the church at Jerusalem for going to Cornelius, this same feature was mentioned as one of overwhelming importance (Acts xi. 15—17).

However complicated this section may appear, and however difficult to perceive the adjustment of every detail, the general trend of the passage is clear. It indicates a further movement away from the exclusively Jewish centre, and prepares the way for the ministry of the chosen vessel to the Gentiles, Paul. We therefore submit the following structure, which, ignoring the mass of detail, focuses attention upon the main movement.

Acts viii. 1—xi. 30.

The widening of the Circle.

A	viii. 1—40.	DIASPEIRO. SCATTERED ABROAD. JUDÆA AND SAMARIA.	STEPHEN. SAUL. PHILIP.	Burial. Havoc. Samaria and Ethiopia.
B	ix. 1—xi. 18.	HELLENISTES (ix. 29). GRECIANS.	SAUL.	"A chosen vessel." Gentiles.
			PETER.	"A certain vessel." Gentiles.
A	xi. 19.	DIASPEIRO. SCATTERED ABROAD. PHENICE, CYPRUS, ANTIOCH.	STEPHEN, dead yet speaking.
B	xi. 20—30.	HELLENISTES (xi. 20). GRECIANS.	BARNABAS.	The grace of God.
			SAUL.	Sought and brought (The chosen vessel).

We must now decide whether we shall best serve the interests of our readers by ploughing through the details of these chapters, discussing the question of the laying on of hands, the record of the sorcerer Simon, the place, in the narrative, of the Ethiopian, the doings of Peter at Lydda in connection with Æneas, and at Joppa with Tabitha; or by keeping directly to the prime object of understanding the place and ministry of Paul as set forth in the Acts, thus regarding the pursuit of that subject as of sufficient importance in this series of articles to justify silence as to subsidiary matters. We believe that we shall be fulfilling the object of this witness if we press on to the things that belong to Paul and his mission. Consequently, yet with some reluctance, we pass over much that is of interest in this section, and again take up the thread in Acts ix. where Saul of Tarsus becomes, by grace, the chosen vessel to bear the name of the Lord before Gentiles, kings and the children of Israel. Accordingly the ninth chapter of the Acts will now occupy our attention, and the record that concerns Paul is found in the first thirty-one verses. We observe that the fact that Saul had authority to bind all that called on the name of the Lord, is mentioned in this chapter three times. Once as a statement that introduces the narrative (Acts ix. 1, 2); once in the objection of Ananias (Acts ix. 13, 14); and once in the exclamation of surprise of the believers at Damascus (Acts ix. 21). The following is an outline of the section that is before us:—

A1 | ix. 1, 2. | Saul threatening. Letters authorizing him to bring bound to Jerusalem any of this way.

B1 | ix. 3—9. | The conversion of Saul. Blind and fasting.

C1 | ix. 10—12. | The call of Ananias to go to Saul that he might receive his sight.

A2 | ix. 13, 14. | Ananias' remonstrance. Reference to Saul's authority to bind all that call on the Name.

B2 | ix. 15—16. | The choice of Saul. His ministry of suffering.

C2 | ix. 17—19. | The ministry of Ananias. Sight restored. Fasting ended.

A3 | ix. 20—22. | The believers' amazement at Saul's preaching. Reference to his destructive work at Jerusalem, and intention to bind believers.

B3 | ix. 23—25. | Persecution of Saul. Escape to Jerusalem.

C3 | ix. 26—28. | Ministry of Barnabas.

B3 | ix. 29—30. | Persecution of Saul.

A3 | ix. 31. | Cessation of persecution in all Judæa, Galilee and Samaria.

Again, we remark that the above is not intended to be a complete literary structure. When dealing with the epistles, where every word is of doctrinal importance, such an analysis would be insufficient, but in the narrative books of the Bible, where the endeavour is to obtain a general idea of the contents of a passage, we may be permitted to be a little less severe both on ourselves and our readers.

It is evident that just as the "persecution and scattering" of the whole section contributed to the purpose of the Lord, so the thrice-mentioned persecution of the saints at Damascus plays a similar part. So far as Paul himself is concerned, we believe that the excess of energy evidenced by this thrust out as far as Damascus was but the endeavour to stifle an awakening conscience.

> "If his own blameless scrupulosity in all that affected legal righteousness was beginning to be secretly tainted with heretical uncertainties, he would feel it all the more incumbent on him to wash out those doubts in blood. Like Cardinal Pole, when Paul IV. began to impugn his orthodoxy, he must have felt himself half driven to persecution, in order to prove his soundness in the faith" (Farrar).

We shall not adequately appreciate Paul's state of mind at this time if we underestimate the intensity of his animosity to the new faith. No less than eight times do we find pointed allusion to his persecuting zeal. He "made havoc" of the church, or more literally, He "ravaged" it (Acts viii. 3). When we learn that the apostle here uses a word found in the LXX. to describe the uprooting by wild boars of a vineyard (Psa. lxxx. 13) we may perceive something of the horrid intensity of Paul's hatred. In Acts ix. 21 Paul is described as: "He that destroyed (or devastated) them which called on this name in Jerusalem." Here Luke uses a word suitable for describing the sacking of a city. The apostle himself refers to his persecuting zeal, in four of his epistles.

> "Ye have heard of my conversation in time past in the Jews' religion, how that beyond measure I persecuted the church of God and wasted it" (Gal. i. 13).
> "I am not meet to be called an apostle, because I persecuted the church of God" (1 Cor. xv. 9).
>
> "As touching the law, a Pharisee, concerning zeal persecuting the church" (Phil. iii. 5, 6).
> "He counted me faithful . . . . who was before a blasphemer, and a persecutor and injurious" (1 Tim. i. 12, 13).

In his speeches, recorded in the Acts, we find him confessing to deeds of blood and savagery, and his epistles make evident how bitter were the memories of those early days.

> "I persecuted this way unto the death, binding and delivering into prison both men and women" (Acts xxii. 4).
> "Many of the saints did I shut up in prison, having received authority from the chief priests; and when they were put to death I gave my voice against them, and I punished them oft in every synagogue, and compelled them to blaspheme; and being exceedingly mad against them I persecuted them even unto strange cities" (Acts xxvi. 10, 11).

With this record before us we can perhaps understand the reference to "suffering" that accompanied his commission (Acts ix. 16). He, as well as those whom he made to suffer, was beaten with stripes in the synagogues; he, too, was stoned, was imprisoned, and many times devoted to death.

> "But I doubt whether any one of these sufferings, or all of them put together, ever wrung his soul with the same degree of anguish as that which lay in the thought that he had used all the force of his character and all the tyranny of his intolerance to break the bruised reed and to quench the smoking flax—that he had endeavoured, by the infamous power of terror and anguish, to compel some gentle heart to blaspheme its Lord" (Farrar).

The impatient journey to Damascus was suddenly interrupted by a blinding light accompanied by a voice from heaven, and there followed for the apostle three days' darkness and prayer. From heaven the awe-stricken Pharisee heard the words: "Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou Me?" (Acts ix. 4).

Saul's first question is "Who art Thou, Lord?" for he had no conception that he was persecuting One Who held that awful title. He was certainly persecuting the heretics who worshipped the despised Jesus of Nazareth, but what must have been his feelings when, in answer to his awe-struck question, the voice from heaven replied, "I am Jesus, Whom thou persecutest"? A man like Paul, at once Pharisee, Hebrew and Scribe, with head and heart filled with O.T. scripture, trained to expect the fulfilment of prophecy and the glorious reign of the Messiah, wanted but these words in these circumstances, to bring about the unshakable conviction, that Jesus was the Christ. Thereafter all was clear.

It is here that we should appreciate the various items in this section that, perforce, we have passed over, particularly, the categorical statement of Philip that the sufferer and sin bearer of Isa. liii. was none other than the Lord Jesus.

> "And Philip opened his mouth, and began at the same scripture and preached unto him Jesus" (Acts viii. 35).

Immediately the apostle was free to speak in Damascus, this was the burden of his testimony:

> "And straightway he preached Jesus (R.V.) in the synagogues, that He is the Son of God" (Acts ix, 20).
> "He confounded the Jews that dwelt at Damascus, proving that this is the very Christ" (Acts ix. 22).

Incidentally these last references show that, to a Jew acquainted with the Scriptures, the fact that Jesus was the Christ would also prove that He was the Son of God (John xx. 31, Matt. xvi. 16), although to the untaught mind such a connection would be neither necessary nor obvious.

Regarding the added words used by the Lord in addressing Saul, "It is hard for thee to kick against the pricks" (Acts ix. 5) it is probable that they have allusion to the ox-goad used in the chastisement of refractory oxen while at the plough. This would indicate that Saul's conscience was already troubling him, and leads us back to the testimony of Stephen as the point at which occurred the initial conviction, which now ends in prostration before the Lord.

We have already spoken at length on the gracious acts of Ananias in the series "Paul and his Companions" (pp. 75-77) and therefore now pass on to the further statement concerning Saul of Tarsus given in Acts ix. 15.

> "He is a chosen vessel unto Me, to bear My name before the Gentiles, and kings, and the children of Israel: for I will shew him how great things he must suffer for My name's sake."

In this passage occurs the seventh reference to the Gentile in the Acts, and the first use of the word in a good sense. The references that precede this one of Acts ix. are:—

"Jews out of every nation" (Acts ii. 5).
"Why did the heathen rage" (Acts iv. 25).
"Pontius Pilate with the Gentiles" (Acts iv. 27).
"The nation . . . . will I judge" (Acts vii. 7).
"The possession of the Gentiles" (Acts vii. 45).
"The people of Samaria" (Acts viii. 9).

Only with the conversion of Saul does the word Gentile appear in a favourable light, and throughout the remainder of his life he magnified his office as "the apostle of the Gentiles" (Rom. xi. 13). The place that Barnabas filled in introducing Saul to the believers in Jerusalem has been dealt with under the series ("Paul and his Companions") that speaks of the ministry of Ananias, to which allusion has already been made. Twice in this chapter do we read of a plot to kill Saul, and twice is his boldness in testifying for the Lord recorded (Acts ix. 27, 29). Twice also is he obliged to make his escape, once by a basket let down over the city wall, at Damascus, and again to Cæsarea, and thence to Tarsus.

We shall hear no more of Saul until the important revelation given to Peter in Acts x. is recorded, and then we shall find Barnabas travelling all the way to Tarsus to seek Saul and to bring him back to the important centre, Antioch, whence as the apostle of the Gentiles Saul is sent on his first great missionary journey.

Of how much that has been passed over in this wonderful chapter, we are very conscious, but time flies, and we desire to make full proof of our ministry. This must be our excuse, if excuse be needed.

After an examination of Peter's testimony to Cornelius, the rest of the Acts will be found to be so interwoven with Paul's early epistles as to demand the most careful and painstaking study. We trust, however, that what has been brought forward in this series already, has indicated with certainty the main trend of events in the Acts, commencing with Jew and kingdom at Jerusalem; passing on to Jew, Gentile and reconciliation at Antioch; and ending at Rome with the Jew set aside and the dispensation of the grace of God to the Gentile at length conferred upon the Lord's prisoner.

Light for the last days.

No. 3.

The nations and the time of the end.

There are many nations that come into touch with Israel during its eventful history, and any attempt to deal with them except in a very selective way is obviously precluded by the vast amount of detail involved. Our interest at the moment, however, is focused upon those nations that have a prominent part to play at the time of the end.

The prophet Isaiah, in his visions of the glorious day that is coming, speaks not only of Israel, but of the nations that shall be associated with Israel in the day of the Lord. He speaks of these nations under the headings "Burdens," "Exclamations," and "Signs." There are ten "burdens," two "exclamations" and one "sign," making a total of thirteen —an ominous number in Scripture, associated with rebellion (see its first occurrence, Gen. xiv. 4).

THE BURDEN OF BABYLON (Isa. xiii. 1—xiv. 27).

(1) THE GATHERING OF THE ARMIES (Isa. xiii. 1—5).—The command to destroy the whole of Babylon is given to the "sanctified ones" ("saints" as in Deut. xxxiii. 2 and Zech. xiv. 5, i.e. "the holy angels") and to the "mighty ones" (i.e. "mighty angels" as in Rev. xviii. 21 and 2 Thess. i. 7) and to the kingdom of nations from a far country.

(2) THE DAY OF THE LORD (Isa. xiii. 6—13).—This period is described as the Day of the Lord, cruel with wrath and fierce anger. The object of this destruction of Babylon is to punish the world for their evil, and to lay low the proud and haughty.

(3) THE DESTRUCTION OF BABYLON (Isa. xiii. 19—22).—The destruction of Babylon will be so complete that:
- (i.) Its overthrow is likened to Sodom and Gomorrah.
- (ii.) It shall never be inhabited again by man.
- (iii.) It shall become the habitation of doleful creatures.

(4) THE SIN OF BABYLON (Isa. xiv. 4—23).—The King of Babylon is charged with being:
- (i.) The oppressor, the staff of the wicked, the sceptre of rulers, the ruler and persecutor of the nations (See also xiv. 4, margin: "the exactress of gold").
- (ii.) Lucifer, Son of the Morning, who said, "I will ascend into heaven, I will exalt my throne above the stars of God . . . . I will be like the Most High." These words link Babylon's blasphemy with the sin of the Anointed Cherub in the past (Ezek. xxviii.) and with the Man of Sin (2 Thess. ii.).

Babylon must be taken to refer to the literal city, and must not be spiritualized. It is called "The beauty of the Chaldees' excellency" (Isa. xiii. 19). The Prophecy of Jeremiah opens with the words: "The Word that the Lord spake against Babylon and against the land of the Chaldees" (Jer. l. 1).

The following parallels from Jeremiah, Isaiah, and Revelation will add further details to the "burden" of Isaiah, and also establish the fact that the Babylon of the Apocalypse is the literal city, which must therefore be restored in the land of the Chaldees.

"O thou that dwellest upon many waters . . . . thine end is come, and the measure of thy covetousness" (Jer. li. 13).

"Babylon hath been a golden cup in the Lord's hand, that made all the earth drunken. The nations have drunken of her wine: therefore the nations are mad" (Jer. li. 7).

"O daughter of the Chaldeans . . . . the lady of kingdoms" (Isa. xlvii. 5).

"Thou saidst, I shall be a lady for ever . . . . Therefore hear now this, thou that art given to pleasures, that dwellest carelessly, that sayest in thine heart, I am, and none else beside; I shall not sit as a widow, neither shall I know the loss of children; but these two things shall come to thee in a moment, in one day, the loss of children, and widowhood" (Isa. xlvii. 7—9).

"I will make thee a burnt mountain" (Jer. li. 25).

"My people, go ye out of the midst of her" (Jer. li. 45).

"As she hath done, do unto her" (Jer. l. 15).

"And it shall be, when thou hast made an end of reading this book, that thou shalt bind a stone to it, and cast it into the midst of the Euphrates; and thou shalt say, Thus shall Babylon sink, and shall not rise from the evil that I will bring upon her" (Jer. li. 63, 64).

"Come hither, I will shew unto thee the judgment of the great whore, that sitteth upon many waters" (Rev. xvii. 1).

"Having a golden cup in her hand, full of abominations" (Rev. xvii. 4).

"The inhabitants of the earth have been made drunk with the wine of her fornication" (Rev. xvii. 2).

"The woman which thou sawest is that great city, which reigneth over the kings of the earth" (Rev. xvii. 18).

"How much she hath glorified herself, and lived deliciously, so much torment and sorrow give her; for she hath said in her heart, I sit a queen, and am no widow, and shall see no sorrow. Therefore shall her plagues come in one day, death, and mourning, and famine" (Rev. xviii. 7, 8).

"She shall be utterly burned with fire" (Rev. xviii. 8).

"Come out of her, My people" (Rev. xviii. 4).

"Reward her even as she rewarded you" (Rev. xviii. 6).

"And a mighty angel took up a stone like to a great millstone, and cast it into the sea, saying, Thus with violence shall that great city Babylon . . . . be found no more at all" (Rev. xviii. 21).

The modern kingdom of Iraq corresponds with ancient Chaldea. It is an independent state, whose first monarch was king Feisal, elected in 1921. By a treaty concluded in 1922, Britain agreed to terminate its mandatory responsibilities when Iraq gained admission to the League of Nations. One of the countries, therefore, of great importance in prophecy is the land of Mesopotamia. Every development there should be watched, for each is a further step towards the end.

THE BURDEN OF PALESTINE (Isa. xiv. 28—32).

Immediately preceding these verses, the prophet writes:

> "I will break the Assyrian in MY land, and upon MY mountains tread him under foot" (Isa. xiv. 25).

Babylon and Jerusalem are the two great cities of prophecy, and Palestine necessarily comes into view. The "burden" is dated: "In the year that king Ahaz died." The record of the life of Ahaz is found in 2 Chron. xxviii., where we read that, because of his idolatry, Judah was delivered into the hands of Syria and Israel. Ahaz robbed the house of the Lord, and shut the doors of the temple, and ruined not only himself but his people.

Palestine is warned not to rejoice because "the rod of him that smote thee is broken" (i.e. at the failure of the king of Judah) "for out of the serpent's root shall come forth a cockatrice." This looks forward to the time of the end, when the troubles in Palestine that are now gathering strength shall reach their climax and Palestine shall be dissolved.

The Lord's answer to the vexed question now agitating Palestine is: "The Lord hath founded Zion, and the poor of His people shall trust in it" (Isa. xiv. 32).

Both in Psa. lx. (verses 6—8) and in Psa. cviii. (verses 7—9) the final triumph of Judah over Philistia is assured.

Great Britain governs Palestine by virtue of powers conferred under the Mandate from the League of Nations. Present-day movements in Palestine are likened to the appearance of leaves on the fig tree: "Ye know that summer is nigh." Every movement in Palestine is of great interest to the child of God, for Israel and their land are the keys of prophecy.

For our present purpose we must pass over Moab and Damascus without comment, except to suggest that the exhortation: "Let Mine outcasts dwell with thee, Moab" (Isa. xvi. 4) may have reference to the days when those in Judæa shall flee to the mountains (Matt. xxiv.).

With regard to the "woe" pronounced in chapter xviii., we cannot agree with the commentators that Ethiopia is addressed. The people addressed are "beyond the river of Ethiopia" and accustomed to send ambassadors by sea. The LXX. speaks of this land as "the land of winged ships." Messengers are sent "to a nation scattered and peeled" (Isa. xviii. 2). Govett translates the passage: "To a nation dragged away and plucked." These words are a wonderful epitome of Israel's experiences, and the words that follow: "A people terrible from their beginning hitherto" (Deut. iv. 33, 34) well describe the early history of the same people.

The association of "ensign" and "trumpet" seems irresistibly to point to Israel's ingathering, and the "rest" of verse 4 might well signify a long period of "the silence of God." The time is the time of "harvest" (Isa. xviii. 5); and "a present" shall be brought to the Lord of hosts, of that scattered and peeled people. This seems to be a prophecy of the restoration of Israel by the help of a nation "beyond the river of Ethiopia." Ethiopia is certainly to have a place at the time of the end, but Ethiopia is not the subject of Isa. xviii.

The word "Woe" is translated "Ho" in Isa. lv. 1: "Ho, every one that thirsteth," and should be so translated in Isa. xviii. 1.

THE BURDEN OF EGYPT (Isa. xix.—xx. 6).

The civil strife indicated in Isa. xix. 2 is referred to by the Lord in Matt. xxiv., where He speaks of the beginning of sorrows being ushered in by "kingdom rising against kingdom."

> "And I will set the Egyptians against the Egyptians, and they shall fight every one against his brother, and every one against his neighbour; city against city, and kingdom against kingdom" (Isa. xix. 2).

This civil war will be followed by their conquest by a foreign power. "A cruel lord and a fierce king" is to rule over them. This must be the "king of fierce countenance" of Dan. viii. 23, who shall have control of the "precious things of Egypt" (Dan. xi. 43). It is surely significant that the only other passage in the A.V. where gasheh is translated "cruel" refers to the "cruel bondage" suffered by Israel in Egypt (Exod. vi. 9). A terrible drought is foretold, a calamity that will threaten the very existence of Egypt. He Who smites Egypt, however, will heal it:

> "And the Lord shall smite Egypt. He shall smite and heal it, and they shall return even to the Lord, and He shall be intreated of them, and shall heal them" (Isa. xix. 22).

This healing of Egypt is one of the astonishing features of the time of the end.

> "In that day shall Israel be the third with Egypt and with Assyria, even a blessing in the midst of the land: Who the Lord of hosts shall bless, saying, Blessed be Egypt My people, and Assyria the work of My hands, and Israel Mine inheritance" (Isa. xix. 24, 25).

The concluding "burdens" of Isaiah's prophecy concern:

"THE BURDEN OF THE DESERT OF THE SEA" (Isa. xxi. 1—10).

"THE BURDEN OF DUMAH" (Isa. xxi. 11—12).

"THE BURDEN OF ARABIA" (Isa. xxi. 13—17).

"THE BURDEN OF THE VALLEY OF VISION" (Isa. xxii. 1—14).

"THE BURDEN OF TYRE" (Isa. xxiii. 1—18).

With reference to the last of these "burdens," the association of Tyre with the sin of the Anointed Cherub (Ezek. xxviii.), and the close parallel of Ezek. xxvii. 28-33, 35, 36 with Babylon in Rev. xvii., xviii. should be noted. The passage in Isaiah speaks of a maritime and merchant power, reviving many features that characterized ancient Tyre. There may be some cryptic prophetic significance here, for at the end of the seventy years (Isa. xxiii. 15) Tyre is to "turn to her hire, and commit fornication with all the kingdoms of the world" (Isa. xxiii. 17).

We trust that enough has been seen of the teaching of the prophets concerning the nations at the time of the end, to encourage the earnest seeker to take heed to this "light that shineth in a dark place."

The seventy sevens of Daniel ix.

A case for discerning things that differ.

(Reprinted from Volume VI.).

In connection with a question raised by a correspondent as to whether the church age began at Pentecost or after Acts xxviii., to whom the common interpretation of the 70 weeks of Daniel ix., viz.,

That the 69th week ended just before the crucifixion of Christ, and that therefore the final seven years are all that remain to complete the number, and that these are entirely future and are found in the Book of Revelation.

presented a difficulty, we would draw special attention to an interpretation (we believe the true one) in which a certain principle is enunciated, viz., that prophetic times do not take into account the periods when Israel are "Lo-ammi" (not My people, Hos. i. 9). In Part I of the Companion Bible, page 70 of Appendixes, will be found a table showing the various "Lo-ammi" times that must be deducted from the number of years before we can arrive at God's time periods. At the conclusion of this table the note runs, "By noting the LO AMMI periods, many other important details will come to light."

We believe the following investigation is directly in line with this suggestion. First, let us establish from the Scriptures the principle that God's prophetic times take no account of Israel's captivities or cast off periods, but only of the times of their recognition. The classic example is that which arises out of the comparison of I Kings vi. I with Acts xiii. 20. According to I Kings vi. I the temple was commenced in the 480th year after the children of Israel were come out of the land of Egypt, while Paul in Acts xiii. 17—22 gives the period as 573 years, a difference of 93 years. We find by examination and the recognition of the principle referred to above, that there is no discrepancy, and that both accounts are exactly right, the one in I Kings vi. omitting the periods when Israel were "Lo-ammi," the other in Acts xiii. giving the entire period without reference to the position occupied by Israel. The 93 years are made up as follows. Israel were captive under:—

Chushan	(Judges iii. 8).	...	8 years.
Eglon	(Judges iii. 14).	...	18 ,,
Jabin	(Judges iv. 3).	...	20 ,,
Midianites	(Judges vi. 1).	...	7 ,,
Philistines	(Judges xiii. 1).	...	40 ,,
		Total.	93 ,,

We learn therefore that to obtain the number of years as from God's standpoint when dealing with Israel, we must subtract the periods when Israel was not recognised by the Lord as a people.

Number in Scripture (by Dr. E. W. Bullinger) draws attention to another period of 70 x 7, which is obtained by the application of this principle.

From the dedication of the Temple to Nehemiah's return in the 20th year of Artaxerxes (Neh. ii. 1).		560 years
Deduct the 70 years' servitude in Babylon (Jer. xxv. 11, 12; Dan. ix. 2). ...	...	70 ,,
	Total.	490 ,,

We draw particular attention to the fact that the 70 years' servitude is reckoned as a "Lo-ammi" period.

We now pass to the next consideration, Daniel ix. itself.

"Seventy sevens are severed off upon thy people and upon thy holy city a | To make an utter end of transgression.

b | To seal up sins.
c | To make atonement for iniquity.
a | To bring in ionian righteousness.
b | To seal up prophetic vision.
c | To anoint the Holy of Holies

Know therefore and understand that from the going forth of the commandment to rebuild Jerusalem unto the Messiah the Prince shall be

7 x 7 — 49

and the street shall be built again and the wall even in troublous times. And after the 62 sevens shall Messiah be cut off, and shall have nothing."

Dan. ix. opens with the recognition of the fact that Jerusalem was at that time "desolate." Verse 7 speaks plainly of the people of Israel being "driven," and verse 11 of the curse being poured over upon them. Verse 12 declares that the visitation upon Jerusalem was unprecedented "under the whole heavens." Verse 16 speaks of "fury" upon Jerusalem and "reproach" upon Israel, and verse 17 speaks of the sanctuary being desolate. Clearly at this period Israel are "Lo ammi," and the time of the desolation of Jerusalem must not be reckoned in the 70 x 7 period which is "severed off" upon Israel.

Now from what we have already learned, we shall find it impossible to commence the reckoning of this 490 years at a period when Jerusalem is still desolate and Israel "Lo-ammi." Yet this is precisely what the accepted interpretation does. The 490 years are made to start from the going forth of the commandment to rebuild Jerusalem, in spite of the angel's warning that the rebuilding would not be completed until another 49 years had gone by! Instead of the angel saying to Daniel that the 70 x 7 started in the 20th year of Artaxerxes when the commandment was given, he definitely says that from that date we may compute the coming of the Messiah, a somewhat different thing. From the date of the command unto the Messiah was 7 x 7, and 62 x 7, or 483 years, which period was divided by the angel into two, according as it was "Lo ammi" time or otherwise. The first period of 49 years must not be reckoned in the period severed off upon Israel, otherwise we shall involve ourselves in confusion.

Where shall we then commence the special period of 70 x 7? When Israel are received back into favour and the temple at Jerusalem again blessed! In the year B.C. 405, when the temple was dedicated at Jerusalem, the 70 x 7 began. It was to be the commencement of a period of "Ammi" years, years when God recognised Israel as His people, a period of 62 x 7, or 434 years, which should reach to the coming of Messiah the Prince. While the crucifixion of Christ marks the close of the 69th seven from the going forth of the proclamation, we must remember that it is the 62nd from the dedication of the temple, and as this commenced the period of Israel's restoration, the crucifixion marks the 62nd seven of the 70 sevens that were severed off upon Israel, leaving 8 sevens to run their course, instead of one as we have hitherto taught.

In other issues of this Magazine we have shown the prominent position that Israel has in the Acts of the Apostles, yet by following the orthodox view it appears that we are compelled to make a two-fold error. First, in spite of the witness of Scripture to the contrary, a period of 49 years, wherein Israel and Jerusalem are out of favour, is introduced into a special period that necessitates Israel and Jerusalem being under favour and security, and it compels us to blot out the whole of the Acts from this special period wherein Israel and Jerusalem manifestly are still receiving mercy. If the 69th seven ended at the crucifixion, there could be no place for Paul's solemn and formal setting aside of Israel at the end of the Acts.

Readers will remember that a rectification was found necessary in the calendar, and that the date of the crucifixion was A.D. 29. This can be seen in Chart 50/vi. on page 61 of Appendixes to Part I of The Companion Bible. From A.D. 29 to A.D. 63, when God finally set aside Israel through the words of Paul, we have 34 years, where, if we include both the years that began and ended the period, we have practically another five sevens which ran on after the crucifixion. The crucifixion being the 62nd seven, Israel becomes Lo-ammi at the end of Acts, in the 67th seven, leaving three sevens to conclude the complete series of 490 years. We must not therefore speak of the "final seven years of Daniel ix." as though they were all the years that are to run. It is true that the chief interest is centred in the final seven, for therein Antichrist and the Beast are active, but there other things to be done before that.

There is a suggestive connection to be observed between the final three sevens and the seven seals, seven trumpets and seven vials that occupy the book of the Revelation. The following diagram, which shows the difference between the two interpretations, may be of help. It will be seen that the marvellous accuracy that has been pointed out regarding the time of the coming of the Messiah is not impaired. It is simply a matter as it were of placing the whole period forward until Israel are a people before God. That period is at the close of the first division, the 7 sevens. Since the setting aside of Israel in Acts xxviii. Israel have been "Lo-ammi." Soon He that scattered them will gather them, and the "final 3 sevens" will then run their course until the consummation foretold in Daniel ix., when prophecy shall attain its goal, sin shall be sealed and atoned for, righteousness be brought in, and God's Holy Temple again anointed. Fundamentals of dispensational truth

No. 6.

The primal creation (Gen. i. 1).

(Reprinted from Volume VI.).

"In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth" (Gen. i. 1).

"We according to His promise look for a new heaven and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness" (2 Pet. iii. 13).

"And I saw a new heaven and a new earth" (Rev. xxi. 1).

Between these two sets of Scripture rolls the great purpose of the ages, occupying "the heavens and the earth which are now" (2 Pet. iii. 7). Gen. i. 1 is severed off from the rest of the Bible. It is unique. At Gen. i. 2 we enter into a sphere of darkness and chaos, which will never be removed until the true light of righteousness shines forth in the new heavens and earth where the "former things" have passed away. For the sake of those for whom these "fundamentals" are written we must explain Gen. i. 1 and 2 a little more in detail.

Graphically it may be considered thus:—

Genesis i. 1.	Genesis i. 2 to Revelation xx.	Revelation xxi.
Creation. Past.	The creation of the six days. Sin and death enter. Sin and death destroyed. The ages span this section.	The new heavens and new earth. Future.

The creation referred to in Gen. i. 1 must not be taken necessarily as referring to the creation of the six days that follow.

To those who find suggestions in the numerical phenomena of Scriptures it may be interesting to note that the words, "The heavens and the earth," occur in the Hebrew Bible fourteen times. Thirteen times with eth, a particle that lends emphasis, and once without. Thirteen indicates rebellion, while fourteen is suggestive of perfection. Perfection is further stamped upon this first verse by the fact that the Hebrew words used are 7 in number, containing 14 syllables (2 x 7) and 28 letters (4 x 7).

The creation "in the beginning" and the creation "in six days" are divided off from each other by the chaos and darkness of the second verse. As the words in verse 2 stand in the A.V., "The earth was without form and void," they seem to support the false idea known as the Nebular Theory, which supposes the gradual evolution of the earth from a gaseous chaotic mass. The words, "without form and void," are in the Hebrew tohu va bohu. In Isa. xlv. 18 we read of the earth, "He created it not tohu." The word "was" in Gen. i. 2 is translated "became" in Gen. ii. 7, "Man became a living soul" —he was not such before—and in iv. 3 "It came to pass" is the reading. Gen. i. 2, if rendered "The earth became without form and void," brings the verse into line with Isa. xlv. 18 and gives the sense of the passage. There is an indication of judgment in the words, "without form, void, and darkness." Notice the way Jeremiah uses the expression in a context of judgment.

> "I beheld the earth, and, lo, it was without form and void; and the heavens, and they had no light.....I beheld, and, lo, there was no man .....I beheld, and lo, the fruitful place was a wilderness, and all the cities thereof were broken down at the presence of the Lord, and by His fierce anger" (Jer. iv. 23—26).

Isa. xxiv. 10 speaks of the city of "confusion" (tohu), and in verses 1, 3, and 19 are such parallel expressions as:—

> "The Lord maketh the earth empty, He maketh it waste, the land shall be utterly emptied and utterly spoiled, the earth is utterly broken down, clean dissolved and moved exceedingly."

The reason is given in verses 20, 21:—

> "The transgressions thereof shall be heavy upon it.....The Lord shall punish the host of the high ones on high, and the kings of the earth upon the earth."

Here it will be observed the punishment of "high ones on high" ("the powers in the heavens" that are to be "shaken," Matt. xxiv. 29) is connected with judgment falling upon the earth. In Isa. xxxiv. 11 we meet tohu and bohu again in a context of judgment, "the line of confusion and the stones of emptiness." This judgment is likewise connected with judgment in the heavens. Verse 4 says:—

> "And all the host of heaven shall be dissolved, and the heavens shall be rolled together as a scroll."

Allusion to the tokens of judgment that followed Adam's sin is found in verse 13 in the words, "thorns, nettles, and brambles." Burning pitch and brimstone indicate Sodom and Gomorrah as further types. Verse 4 already referred to makes us think of 2 Pet. iii. and Rev. vi. 14. In 2 Pet. iii. 10 we are told that "the day of the Lord will come as a thief in the night, in the which the heavens shall pass away with a great noise," and again in verse 12, "the heavens being on fire shall be dissolved." This third chapter from verse 3 to verse 13 is entirely occupied with lessons drawn from the heavens and the earth, past, present, and future. These verses correspond in the structure of the epistle to chapter ii. 1—22. In chapter ii. the flood in the days of Noah, and the destruction of Gomorrah in the days of Lot, are instanced as examples of future judgment. A still earlier judgment is referred to in the third chapter. Verse 4 takes us back to "the beginning of the creation"—clearly Gen. i. 1; verses 5 and 6 speak of this beginning under the terms:—

> "The heavens of old and earth having its subsistence out of water and in water, by the word of God, through which (waters) the then world, deluged with water, perished."

The then world refers to the complete order of things connected with the heavens and earth of verse 5. It is evident that the world that then was refers to the order of things pertaining to the first heavens and earth, because the parallel to the world that then was is the heavens and earth which are now, which came into being in Genesis i. and ii. The types of both are found in 2 Peter ii., as already mentioned. The flood of the days of Noah did not destroy the heavens and the earth, neither did the fire in the days of Lot, but they both set forth in type the judgment and time of the end. It is evident that a close parallel is instituted between the judgment on the first heavens and earth, and that on the second. The one by the word of God is destroyed by water; the other is to be destroyed by fire. The darkness which was upon the face of the deep (the waters whereby the then world perished) is another token of judgment. 2 Pet. ii. 4 and Jude 6 speak of darkness in connection with the judgment of the angels that sinned. Darkness was one of the plagues of Egypt, even as it will be in the days to come upon a greater Pharaoh (Exod. x. 21, 22 and Joel ii. 2, 3). What we learn from the Scriptures leads us to see that into the creation of the beginning sin entered, and in its train came confusion, vanity, and darkness. Man was as then uncreated. Angels and spirit beings there were, and angels sinned and fell. The tempter of Eve was already a fallen being before Adam's transgression. There is a deeply important lesson to be learned by considering how little is told us in this part of Scripture (indeed in any part of Scripture) regarding the primal creation and primal sin. It is possible that the six days' creation is very much more limited in scope than that of Gen. i. 1, yet it is set out in detail.

The Bible is written as a revelation of God to MAN, and many things outside his sphere, though subjects of his enquiry and curiosity, do not come within the scope of Scripture. When man, looking out into this wider sphere and thinking of the destiny of angels and principalities, or of the possibilities that lie beyond the ages to come, when man asks as Peter did, "What shall this man do?" he too is reminded of the need to keep to the things revealed concerning himself, and to find his employment and delight not in adding to the unrevealed things of God, but in seeking a full and clear understanding of what is written.

The present creation, the sphere of man's sin and redemption, is the first great stone in the foundation of the purpose of the ages as pertains to man. This, therefore, will occupy our attention in the next article of this series.

Psalm cxxvii. 1, 2.

"Except the Lord build the house, they labour in vain that build it: except the Lord keep the city, the watchman waketh but in vain. It is vain for you to rise up early, to sit up late, to eat the bread of sorrows; for so He giveth His beloved IN SLEEP."

(Reprinted from Volume VI.).

The last two words of the above quotation are not according to the A.V., nevertheless they give the true rendering of the verses. While it is blessedly true that the Lord gives such peace that it may be likened to "sleep" in the midst of alarms, the truth of this passage is somewhat different.

In contrast to the untiring effort suggested by the building, the watching, the late nights and early rising which, because carried out independently of the Lord, ends in sorrow and vanity, there is placed a picture of "His beloved" just resting on His faithfulness, receiving the gifts of the Lord's grace "in their sleep." This passage does not by any means condemn the building, the watching, the early rising, and the diligent efforts, but it does show the vanity of these things apart from the Lord.

"Trust in the Lord with all thine heart, and lean not to thine own understanding. In all thy ways acknowledge Him, and He shall direct (rightly divide, LXX.) thy paths" (Prov. iii. 5, 6).

Light for the last days.

No. 4.

Gentile dominion.

Daniel ii. and vii.

In our consideration of Isaiah's prophecy concerning the Gentile nations that figure in the conflict of the last days we observed that the first to be mentioned was Babylon. As Babylon also figures largely in the prophecy of Jeremiah and in the Book of the Revelation, it would seem that a careful study of what Scripture has to say about this great city will throw considerable light upon the character of the last days. Babylon stands for political and commercial, as well as spiritual dominion, and it is impossible to understand its full significance apart from a study of the references found in Daniel.

In Daniel ii. we have Nebuchadnezzar's dream and its interpretation; and a study of this chapter will enlighten us regarding the character and duration of Gentile dominion.

The latter days.

To quote the verses that record both the vision and the interpretation would occupy more space than we can afford, but we trust that no reader will be satisfied to read these notes without personal reference to the Scriptures themselves.

From the urgency with which he demanded the interpretation, and the extreme measures he adopted to punish inability to comply with his demand, it is clear that Nebuchadnezzar considered the vision to be of supreme importance. It is blessed to see Daniel and his friends confidently laying the matter before "the God of heaven," and to read the gracious answer given. After a passing reference to the utter failure of the wise men of Babylon to help the king, Daniel says:—

> "But there is a God in heaven that revealeth secrets, and maketh known to the king Nebuchadnezzar WHAT SHALL BE IN THE LATTER DAYS" (Dan. ii. 28).

Evidently the king himself had been thinking seriously about the future of the dominion committed to him, for Daniel continues:—

> "As for thee, O king, thy thoughts came into thy mind upon thy bed, WHAT SHOULD COME TO PASS HEREAFTER" (Dan. ii. 29).

Now while, in one sense, the succession of Medo-Persia to the dominion was something that should come to pass "hereafter," as also was that of Greece, these successive monarchies are only regarded as steps leading to the goal. In ii. 45 Daniel becomes more explicit:—

> "Forasmuch as thou sawest that the stone was cut out of the mountain without hands, and that it break in pieces the iron, the brass, the clay, the silver and the gold: the great God hath made known to the king WHAT SHALL COME TO PASS HEREAFTER"

The "latter days" and the "hereafter" have particular reference to "the days of these kings" of verse 44, when the stone shatters the image and the kingdom of the Lord is set up. When we reach chapter vii. we shall find the same concentration on the "end" and a rapid passing over of the steps leading to it—e.g., "I would know the truth of the fourth beast" (vii. 19).

We give below the various occurrences in the Book of Daniel of the expressions "latter days" and "hereafter":—

"Hereafter."

"What should come to pass HEREAFTER" (ii. 29).
"What shall come to pass HEREAFTER" (ii. 45).
"Another shall come AFTER them" (vii. 24).

"Latter Days."

"What shall be IN THE LATTER DAYS" (ii. 28).
"What shall be IN THE LAST END of the indignation" (viii. 19).
"IN THE LATTER TIME of their kingdom" (viii. 23).
"What shall befall thy people IN THE LATTER DAYS" (x. 14).
"What shall be THE END of these things?" (xii. 8).

Daniel came at the end of a long line of prophets, and the expressions "latter days" and "last days" had a very clear meaning. Their usage can be studied in Gen. xlix. 1, Isa. ii. 2, Micah iv. 1, and other passages.

Gentile dominion.

The succeeding kingdoms symbolised in the great image of Daniel ii. show a marked depreciation. Gold gives place to silver, silver to brass (or copper), brass to iron, iron to clay. We are far more likely to have handled a solid piece of lead than a bar of gold, and many of us would place lead as the heaviest of metals. This, however, would not be correct, for while the specific gravity of lead is 11.4, that of gold is as high as 19.3. Gold is the heaviest metal mentioned in Dan. ii., and it is of that metal that the head is constructed. The image of Gentile dominion is, therefore, top-heavy from the beginning. This can be seen by observing the specific gravity of each material:—

SILVER . . .	10.5.
BRASS	8.5	(COPPER 8.78).
IRON	7.6.
CLAY	1.9.

The arrangement of these metals in the structure of the image indicates depreciation not only in weight, but also in the characteristics of the kingdoms. The kingdom of which Nebuchadnezzar was the head of gold was an absolute monarchy. Of him it could be said, "Whom he would he slew, and whom he would he kept alive." The Medo-Persian kingdom, represented by the silver, was not an absolute monarchy, for Darius was limited by the presidents and princes and by his own laws "that could not be broken." The Grecian kingdom of brass was a military kingdom, and therefore lower still in the scale. We will not consider Rome at the moment, as we have not yet dealt with the question of the fourth kingdom. We can see enough, however, to realize that this prophetic image prevents us from ever believing that the kingdom of heaven will come upon earth as the result of Gentile rule. Rather are we clearly told that Gentile rule must be ground to powder before the kingdom of the Lord can be set up.

Principles of interpretation.

We must now seek the key to the understanding of the unexplained portions of the image. We will first examine what is clearly revealed. Babylon was succeeded by Medo-Persia, Medo-Persia by Greece, and Greece by some kingdom unnamed. Babylon has passed off the scene, but the kingdoms of Persia and Greece have remained to this day. This leads us to our first point. It is not a necessity that the dispossessed kingdom should be either destroyed or absorbed by its successor. The idea that Rome must still exist in a weakened condition, and that the ten kings at the end must be found in the Roman earth is, on this ground, without foundation. Some other principle is at work and must be discovered.

The times of the Gentiles are characterized by one pre-eminent fact: THE CAPTIVITY OF JERUSALEM.

This is the one thing in common that binds the successive kingdoms together. They may differ among themselves as gold differs from silver, or bronze from iron; they may differ in the extent of their dominion as Babylon differs from Rome, but the one essential thing common to them all is, that during the whole time of their dominion, "Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles" (Luke xxi. 24).

There is no question in the mind of the student of history as to the extent of the dominion of Babylon, Medo-Persia or Greece, but there are some who question whether Rome actually comes into the scene at all.

Who was it that sent out a decree that all the inhabited earth should be taxed, and so unwittingly compelled the birth of the Lord Jesus to take place at Bethlehem? It was Cæsar Augustus (Luke ii. 1). Who was exercising dominion over Jerusalem when John the Baptist pointed out the Messiah of Israel? It was Tiberius Cæsar (Luke iii. 1). Who was Governor of Jerusalem, with the power of life and death, when the Lord Jesus was crucified? Again, it was a Roman, Pontius Pilate (Luke xxiii.). To whom did the Jewish nation pay tribute at this time? To none but Cæsar (Luke xxiii. 2). It is, then, very evident that the Roman Empire is in the line of Gentile succession. If the historians are correct, Rome's sovereignty over the earth lasted for 666 years, a number of obvious significance.

It has been objected that the Mohammedan power was never a "kingdom" in the same sense as Babylon, Persia or Greece. This is certainly true, but the fact is quite in harmony with the general scope of the passage. From the time of Israel's rejection and the revelation of the dispensation of the mystery, the history of the nations enters upon a protracted period of indefinite length and character, and not until the time of the end do the special features associated with Daniel's image emerge with any precision. The present time belongs to this protracted period. The next development will be tragic in its reality.

The Mohammedan power no longer dominates Jerusalem. Another change has taken place. When General Allenby received the keys of Jerusalem on 9th December, 1917, the dominion passed from the Mohammedan power to the present British Mandate under the League of Nations.

Let us now see what these events mean, and how far they coincide with the prophetic interpretation of the course of Gentile dominion given by Daniel:

(1) Head of GOLD	BABYLON (Dan. ii. 38).	"Five are fallen" (Rev. xvii. 10).
(2) Breast of SILVER	MEDO-PERSIA (Dan. v. 31).
(3) Belly and thighs of BRASS .	GREECE (Dan. viii. 21).
(4) Legs of IRON	ROME (Luke ii.).
(5) Feet of IRON and CLAY . .	TURKEY (A.D. 636—A.D. 1917).

The line indicates the transition of the present time.

Finally, out of the League of Nations will emerge:

(6) Toes of IRON and CLAY . . The TEN KINGS, "One is" (Rev. xvii. 10).
(7) The STONE cut without hands. Kingdoms of world become kingdoms of Lord.

Here we have the whole Gentile dominion represented as being six-fold, stamped with the number of man and the beast. The position to-day is represented by the junction of the feet and the ten toes. The toes are ten kings, which, presumably, will emerge from the League of Nations. When John wrote the Book of Revelation he was "in spirit" writing in the Day of the Lord. Consequently he could say, "Five are fallen"—Babylon, Persia, Greece, Rome and Turkey, and "One is"—the dominion of the ten kings. The kingdom of the Lord is the true seventh, but, before this is established, Antichrist will present himself—"The other is not yet come."

The word "broken" in Daniel ii. 42 should be "brittle," showing that the "clay" is pottery. Pottery of sufficient thickness would stand the weight of the image, but would shiver to pieces at a blow. It is impossible to fuse iron and pottery together in the same way that two metals may be fused. It is therefore obvious that some radical change is indicated.

The feet are composed of both iron and clay:

"But they shall not cleave one to another, even as iron is not mixed with clay" (Dan. ii. 43).

This does not mean that the communist will not mingle with the monarchist and the democrat with the autocrat. The same verse gives a deeper explanation:

"They shall mingle themselves with the seed of men, but they shall not cleave one to another."

Both communists and kings are the "seed of men"—the democrats equally with the ruling classes. Gold is a metal superior to silver, but of like nature. So also, silver is superior to brass, and brass to iron, yet all are metals. The altogether different materials used in the feet of the image indicate that the "they" of ii. 43 and "the seed of men" are beings of two different orders.

Now the Lord has revealed that at the time of the end it will be as it was in the days of Noah. Genesis vi., therefore, contains enough to enable us to see in the clay feet of the image the revival of the seed of the Wicked One. There are two seeds in view, and the Book of Revelation makes it clear that at the end, demon-possessed rulers under the Satanic Beast and Antichrist will have full, though brief, sway.

In Daniel ii. 44 the prophet says: "In the days of these kings shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom." What kings are these? We find from Daniel vii. 24 that at the time of the end ten kings shall arise. And in Rev. xvii. 12 we read:

> "The ten horns which thou sawest are ten kings, which have received no kingdom as yet: but receive power as kings one hour with the beast."

The ten horns of the beast and the ten toes of the image represent the same ten kings:

> "And as the toes of the feet . . . , in the days of these kings" (Dan. ii. 42—44).

If we are living at the period of time indicated in the structure of the image by the line drawn at November 1917, then we are living in a period that is preparing for the advent of the great Dictator, of whom Hitler and Mussolini are faint anticipations. The prestige of the League of Nations has been undermined, and out of the dissatisfaction and sense of insecurity that will naturally grow from this failure will come the final world ruler.

Further light upon this period and its ruler is provided by the visions of Daniel vii.

The four kings of the end (Dan. vii.).

The vision of Daniel recorded in chapter vii. is written in Chaldee (Aramaic or Syriac), and so belongs to the Gentile portion of the prophecy. In the interpretation of the great image in Daniel ii. reference is made to "the days of these kings" (ii. 44). What we are now to consider is a fuller explanation of these times and the characteristics of these kings. The setting up of the kingdom of the Lord in Daniel ii. is symbolised by the stone becoming a great mountain and filling the earth; in Daniel vii. the prophet describes the investiture of the Son of man with sovereignty. In Daniel ii. the stone crushes the image to powder; in Daniel vii. the same Court that invests the Son of man with dominion, consigns the Beast to the burning flame. These parallels are very evident, but confusion is sometimes introduced by assuming that Daniel vii. and Daniel ii. are co-extensive. It has sometimes been taught that we have the same Gentile dominion, but from two points of view; from man's point of view it appears as a resplendent image, but in God's view as a succession of wild beasts. This, however, is true only with reference to the final phase, as we hope to show presently.

Another fruitful source of confusion is the assumption that there are four, and only four, kingdoms set out in Daniel ii., and that Babylon, Persia, Greece and Rome, represented by the four metals, are again presented as the four beasts of Daniel's dream. The objection to this interpretation is that it is contrary to the actual facts of the vision. We have already shown that the colossus of Daniel ii. is sixfold: Babylon, Persia, Greece, Rome, Turkey, and the League issuing in the ten kings. And further, the kingdoms of Daniel ii. succeed one another, whereas the kingdoms of Daniel vii. are contemporaneous. In Daniel vii. 12 the rest of the beasts, while losing their dominion, are granted a prolongation of their lives —which would be impossible to interpret, if these four beasts represented four kingdoms extending over centuries and succeeding one another.

While this is true, we must at the same time remember that there is often a "germinant" as well as a "terminant" fulfilment. For example, the ram and he-goat of Daniel viii., while primarily referring to "the last end of the indignation" (viii. 19) also foreshadow the nearer history of Alexander the Great.

Historic foreshadowings.

Surveying these four beasts as historic anticipations of the kings of the future, where must we place them in relation to the kingdoms of Daniel ii.? Some say that the first beast, which was like a lion, represents the first kingdom, Babylon, and the fourth indescribable monster, Rome. This, however, cannot be true, for it introduces contradiction into the narrative. Daniel saw this vision when Babylon's last king was in his first year; and Medo-Persia was at this time almost as great in extent as Babylon. Thus neither Babylon nor Medo-Persia could have been included in the "four kings which shall arise" (vii. 17). The first must therefore represent Greece, the second Rome, the third Turkey, and the fourth the Satanic monster, together with the ten kings (for it bears ten horns, vii. 24) described in Revelation xiii.

The relation between Daniel ii. and Daniel vii. may be set out as follows:

Daniel ii.	Daniel vii.
(1) Head of gold.—BABYLON.
(2) Breast of silver.—MEDO-PERSIA.
(3) Belly and thighs of brass.—GREECE.	Lion with wings.
(4) Legs of iron.—ROME.	Bear with three ribs in its mouth.
(5) Feet of iron and clay.—TURKEY.	Leopard with wings.
(6) Toes of iron and clay.—TEN KINGS.	Monster with ten horns.
	"These great beasts, which are four, are four kings, which shall arise out of the earth" (verse 17).
	"The fourth beast shall be the fourth kingdom upon earth" (verse 23).

It will be remembered that the last kingdom of Daniel ii. is "diverse" inasmuch as it is composed of clay whereas all the others are of metals. So also we observe that this fourth kingdom is said to be "diverse from all kingdoms" (Dan. vii. 23). It will devour the whole earth, and "tread it down" —an idea naturally associated with the "feet" of clay.

There is a peculiar repetition given here that may help us to realise that the long historic foreshadowing and the brief prophetic fulfilment are in view:

The fourth beast is said to be "diverse" from the rest.
The little horn is said to be "diverse" from the first.

The fourth beast destroys three kings.
The little horn subdues three kings.

The fourth beast has a mouth speaking great things.
The little horn speaks great words against the Most High.

The conclusion seems to be that the little horn represents a final concentration of the fourth beast. Now we shall discover from Revelation xiii. that this fourth beast concentrates in itself the three that it devours. The three beasts devoured are described as a lion with eagle's wings, a bear, and a leopard having four wings with four heads. The beast described in Revelation xiii. is a composite creature, having some of the characteristics of each of these:

"And the beast which I saw was like unto a leopard, and his feet were as the feet of a bear, and his mouth as the mouth of a lion" (Rev. xiii. 2).

"Having seven heads and ten horns" (Rev. xiii. 1).

In order to obtain all the light that Scripture sheds upon the character of Gentile dominion in the last days, it will be necessary to compare the testimony of Revelation xiii. with what is written in Daniel vii. This the reader should do while the subject is fresh in his mind.

The Hope and the Prize.

No 2.

The three spheres considered.

(Reprinted from Volume VI.).

Before we can deal with the distinctive hope that is held by the One Body, it will be necessary to point out that the future destinies of mankind fall within three spheres.

There is the earthly.—Israel as a nation must occupy the chief place among the nations of the earth, fulfilling the unconditional covenants made by God with the fathers. This covenant of God relative to Israel's future position as a great nation is entirely removed from any condition of faith on their part. The very ones who were "enemies" because of the gospel were "beloved" because of the fathers, "for the gifts and calling of God are without repentance."

There is the heavenly.—This sphere is connected with faith. Abel, Enoch, Noah, Abraham, and all the attested ones of Heb. xi., believed God and walked by faith. These, of whom Abraham is the example, looked for a heavenly country and a heavenly city. They did not enter it at death; and the same hope was carried over into the times of the New Testament and was entertained by those who believed the gospel. These had visions of the New Jerusalem, the Holy City; these expected to meet the Lord in the air; for these the Lord Jesus said he was going to prepare a place.

There is the super-celestial.—At the revelation of the dispensation of the mystery, a new sphere was opened up as a place of blessing and of hope. This sphere we may term the super-celestial, it is "above the heavens," that is, above the firmament of this present creation, it is far above all, it is at the very right hand of God. This sphere is the sphere of the hope of those who are members of the One Body. If Paul's prison ministry in connection with the teaching of Ephesians is exactly the same as that of the earlier epistles (Corinthians, Thessalonians, etc.), then the hope is the same, and it may still be true that we entertain "the hope of Israel" (see Acts xxviii.). If, however, Paul's prison ministry commenced a new line of teaching altogether, if it revealed a new dispensation, and had a new sphere for its operations, then the hope of that dispensation must correspond with the new sphere of its calling.

It may be that some readers have not given much thought to the claims of the apostle Paul to a two-fold ministry, and as it is vital to a true understanding of our hope, we feel that none will begrudge the space given up to its re-consideration. It will be remembered that it was the continual practice of the apostle to go to the synagogue of the town he visited, notwithstanding that he may have been most cruelly treated in the synagogue or by the Jews in the town previously visited. There came a stage, however, when he entered a synagogue for the last time. This final synagogue witness is recorded in Acts xix. 8, 9, and we find that the apostle:

> "went into the synagogue and spake boldly for the space of three months, disputing and persuading the things concerning the kingdom of God. But when divers were hardened, and believed not, but spake evil of that way before the multitude, he departed from them, and separated the disciples, disputing daily in the school of one Tyrannus."

From this point the synagogue drops out of notice. Accounts of his visits to Macedonia, Troas, and Miletus, are given, but it is only among disciples that he is found. His course is now set for Jerusalem, and he is in haste to be there by the day of Pentecost. Instead therefore of journeying to Ephesus, he called for the elders of the church to meet him at Miletus. What is the burden of his message to them? It divides itself into four parts:—

(1) A resumé of his ministry, as something that had been completed and closed (Acts xx. 18—21).

(2) A revelation of a future ministry, with which imprisonment is a close accompaniment (Acts xx. 22—24).

(3) A statement to the effect that these Ephesians would see his face no more, and that he had not shunned to declare unto them all the counsel of God (Acts xx. 25—27).

(4) A warning concerning the "wolves" who should enter in after his departure (Acts xx. 28—35).

It will be seen that this address indicates something unusual. The apostle's usual topic and manner is well expressed in Acts xvii. 2, 3:—

> "And Paul, as his manner was, went in unto them, and three sabbath days reasoned with them out of the Scriptures, opening and alleging that Christ must needs have suffered, and risen again from the dead; and that this Jesus, whom (said he) I preach unto you, is Christ."

Now he calls the earnest attention of his hearers to that ministry as though he had concluded it, summarizing it in Acts xx. 21 by the words:—

> "Testifying both to the Jews and also to the Greeks, repentance toward God, and faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ."

Here for the last time does the kingdom word repentance come from either the lip or pen of the apostle as a part of his gospel. Verse 22 commences a new phase, "And now." What of the future? Paul says:—

> "And now, behold, having been bound in the spirit, I go unto Jerusalem not knowing the things that shall befall me there; save that the Holy Spirit witnesseth in every city, saying that bonds and afflictions await me."

The apostle had no doubt as to his destination and destiny. Not once nor twice but in every city, the Spirit bore witness to the fact that he was to be the Lord's prisoner. Before ever the shackles of Rome bound him, Paul was already "bound in the spirit," and never does he allow the outward and secondary to take from him his clear title and calling as "the prisoner of the Lord." The witness concerning bonds and imprisonment often resulted in advice being given him to turn aside from such a goal, e.g., in xxi. 11, 12, but it was always set aside and, like his Master, Paul set his face stedfastly to go to Jerusalem. He could therefore say:—

> "But none of these things move me, neither count I my life dear unto myself, so that I might finish my course with joy, and (or even) the ministry which I received from the Lord Jesus, to testify the gospel of the grace of God" (Acts xx. 24).

Here it is evident the apostle looks forward to a new ministry. He stands as it were at the beginning of a course, and prays that he may finish it.

In the last chapter of 2 Timothy—his last epistle (the dying words of the apostle whose time for departure was at hand) he could say, "I have finished my course." Repeatedly in this last epistle he refers to his chain, and once more he refers to himself as the prisoner of the Lord (i. 8).

This ministry is set in contrast to that summarized in Acts xx. 21. There he had testified repentance and faith, now he was to testify the gospel of the grace of God. This gospel is directly connected with the prison ministry of the apostle who claims in Eph. iii. to have received "the dispensation of the grace of God." This ministry Paul says "he received of the Lord Jesus." Now, the time when he received it, and the fact that it differed from his earlier ministry is explained in Acts xxvi. Most would turn to Acts ix. to find the words of the Lord to Paul, but they are not fully recorded, they stop short at the most important part, which omission is as much dispensational as the better known example of the Lord's quotation of Isa. lxi. 2. Not until "repentance" had been fully preached could it be made known that God had provided against Israel's foreseen unbelief and obstinacy. So it is that Paul the prisoner tells what Paul the free man could not tell.

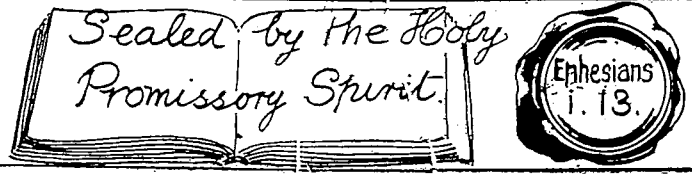
Berean Chart No: xii. C.H.W. 35.

Be ready always to give an answer to every man that asketh you a reason of the hope that is in you.



Berean Charts.

No. 12.

"Writing maketh an exact man," said Bacon, and while it is easy to assume a position if one is not compelled to give a detailed account of oneself, it is another matter when the inquisitor demands specific answers to his questions. These we should welcome, as the answering will but confirm what is true and expose what is false.

It is easy to make the sweeping assertion that every believer at the present time is a member of the Body of Christ, but it is disconcerting to be obliged to give chapter and verse for the assertions. We suggest that the reader should fill up for himself some such form as is suggested in the chart, not for the benefit of others, but for his own sake.

Identity is a matter of every-day confirmation. Three items (name, address, sex) are usually sufficient to separate the individual from the millions on the earth.

We can imagine some readers objecting to the name "Faithful," but examination of the Scriptures will reveal that no church is thus called except the church of the mystery. Others will look askance at the words "Baptized Believers" because it has been so long assumed that only baptism in water could be intended. This we cannot allow. Surely if a rite or ceremony can entitle to the name "Baptised Believer" then the glorious union of the believer with the Lord in His death, burial, and resurrection—which is also called a "Baptism"—entitles to the name, unless we are to assume that a ceremony or sign is greater than the thing signified.

If the words of Peter (1 Pet. iii. 15) quoted on the chart have a message to us, as well as the Dispersion, then it seems imperative that some such self-examination be undertaken, if we are to give a reason for the hope that is in us. This examination may reveal weaknesses of apprehension which can be rectified, and gaps that can be filled, and if it enables any to get to know "What is the hope of His calling" then it will have accomplished that which is pleasing to the Lord, for it will bring about in its measure the answer to the prayer of Eph. i. 18.

This is the record.

No. 5.

"And the Father Himself, Which hath sent Me, hath borne witness of Me. Ye have neither heard His voice at any time, nor seen His shape" (John v. 37).

In this remarkable section of John's Gospel (John v. 31—47) we have a series of witnesses to the Lord Jesus Christ. There is first His own testimony. He said, "I am the resurrection and the life," and the statement is not in any sense less true because He bore the testimony Himself. There is also the testimony of John the Baptist, the foretold forerunner who went before the Lord in the spirit and power of Elijah. There is also the testimony of the mighty works which were wrought in co-operation with the Father. And there is the testimony of Scripture and particularly of Moses.

We shall search history in vain for a fuller attestation of truth, yet we have still not exhausted the evidence. John v. contains one more witness, the witness of the Father Himself.

At the Jordan, and on the Mount of Transfiguration the heavens opened and a voice was heard saying:

"This is My beloved Son, in Whom I am well pleased" (Matt. iii. 17).

"This is My beloved Son, in Whom I am well pleased. Hear ye Him" (Matt. xvii. 5).

Concerning this testimony, John writes in the first chapter of his Gospel:—

"I knew Him not: but that He should be made manifest to Israel, therefore am I come baptizing with water. And John bare record, saying, I saw the Spirit descending from heaven like a dove, and it abode upon Him. And I knew Him not: but He that sent me to baptize with water, the same said unto me, Upon Whom thou shalt see the Spirit descending, and remaining on Him, the same is He which baptizeth with the Holy Ghost. And I saw, and bare record that this is the Son of God" (John i. 31—34).

There is no warrant in Scripture for believing that any one else heard the voice or saw the dove except the Lord Jesus Himself and John the Baptist. A select company of three disciples—Peter and James and John—accompanied the Lord on the Mount of Transfiguration, and these saw the vision and heard the voice, as Peter testifies:

"We were eye-witnesses of His majesty. For He received from God the Father honour and glory, when there came such a voice to Him from the excellent glory: This is My beloved Son, in Whom I am well pleased. And this voice which came from heaven we heard, when we were with Him in the holy mount" (2 Pet. i. 16—18).

This witness of the Father was not public, neither was it for the multitude. It was the seal of the Father upon the heart of His Son. It is just as valid a witness as the seal of the Spirit upon the believer, although no believer can show this seal to the outside world.

To the unbelieving Jew, the Lord said: "Ye have neither heard His voice at any time, nor seen His shape" (John v. 37). This is an evident reference to the voice and the dove at the Jordan; and the added statement, "I receive not honour from men" (v. 41) should be read in the light of the "honour and glory" given Him at the second attestation of the transfiguration.

In confirmation of this view of the Father's witness at the Jordan, John refers to another occasion when the Father spoke from heaven:

"Now is My soul troubled; and what shall I say? Father, save Me from this hour? (No, how can I say that?) But for this cause came I unto this hour. (Rather will I say) Father, glorify Thy name. Then came there a voice from heaven, saying, I have both glorified it, and will glorify it again. The people, therefore, that stood by, and heard it, said that it thundered: others said, An angel spake to Him. Jesus answered and said, This voice came not because of Me, but for your sakes" (John xii. 27—30).

The reader will call to mind a very close parallel with this in the experience of Paul. He alone heard the voice and understood the words; those with him heard nothing but a great noise and saw only a great light (See Acts ix. 3—9; xxii. 6—11; xxvi. 13—18).

This witness and seal of the apostle was ever present to his mind, even though he could not bring forward one witness who had actually "heard the voice" or "seen the shape" of the Lord Who met him on the road to Damascus.

It need not trouble us to-day, that we did not hear this voice or see this shape, for the Lord added: "And ye have not His word abiding in you: for Whom He hath sent, Him ye believe not" (John v. 38).

In the same way Peter says, after his own testimony to the "voice" and the "shape" on the holy mount:

"We have also a more sure word of prophecy; whereunto ye do well that ye take heed in your hearts" (2 Pet. i. 19).

"He Whom God hath sent speaketh the words of God" (John iii. 34), and all who are of the truth recognise Him.

"But ye believe not, because ye are not of My sheep, as I said unto you. My sheep hear My voice, and I know them and they follow Me" (John x. 26, 27).

Or again, as the Saviour said to Pilate:

"To this end was I born, and for this cause came I into the world, that I should bear witness unto the truth. Every one that is of the truth heareth My voice" (John xviii. 37).

Anaximander loses his way and finds only an "Eternal Something."

When we say that Thales, who began with Creation, started where the Bible starts, the statement is not strictly true. "Creation" implies a Creator, and Thales had no knowledge of such a Creator. He was seeking an answer to the question "What"? instead of the question "Who"? This is quite at variance with the teaching of Scripture. The Bible does not open with Creation but with God. In other words, what Thales vainly sought is revealed in Gen. i. 1, but is nowhere proved.

The witness of Scripture is summed up in Heb. xi. 6:

"He that cometh to God must believe that He is, and that He is the rewarder of them that diligently seek Him."

Just why these two features are brought together here, we must consider after Human Wisdom has been given an opportunity to speak.

The teaching of Thales was soon submitted to criticism, and was set aside by Anaximander, who was born in B.C. 610, twenty years after Thales. Anaximander set aside Water as the primitive ground of things, and looked for something less determinate. He said: "The ground of all things must be without form and boundless." These words are very close to the Hebrew of Gen. i. 2: "without form and void"; and so, while rejecting the Water of Thales (which seemed to look back to Gen. i. 2), he accepts Chaos in its place. He is supposed to be the first to use the term Archē, as "the eternal, infinite, indefinite ground, from which, in order of time, all arises, and unto which all returns." This eternal principle he called "The Infinite," To apeiron, though he shrinks from the total emptiness of unbounded space, and speaks of an "unbounded substance" analogous to the ether. How Anaximander was unconsciously crying out for the Son of God, the Image of the Invisible, the express Image of His substance, the Word made flesh! Instead of finding Christ, he found a void, and taught that there was an eternal something out of which (ek), and unto which (eis) are all things. What Anaximander would have given his right hand to have discovered is plainly written for our learning in the Holy Scriptures.

> "O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! How unsearchable are His judgments, and His ways past finding out! . . . . For of Him, and through Him, and to Him, are all things: to Whom be glory for ever. Amen" (Rom. xi. 33–36).
> "But to us there is but one God, the Father, of Whom are all things, and we in Him; and one Lord Jesus Christ, by Whom are all things, and we by Him" (1 Cor. viii. 6).
>
> "Who is the image of the invisible God, the Firstborn of every creature. For by Him were all things created . . . . all things were created by Him, and for Him: and He is before all things, and by Him all things consist" (Col. i. 15—17).
> "Thou art worthy, O Lord, to receive glory and honour and power: for Thou hast created all things, and for Thy pleasure they are and were created" (Rev. iv. 11).

The contexts of these passages refer not only to the material creation, but also to things invisible, to the purpose of the ages, and to the baffling elements that defy human wisdom to explain. All this Anaximander sought, but did not find. He says that things rise and pass away once more:

> "As is meet: for they make reparation and satisfaction to one another for their injustice according to the ordering of time."

These words, being only a brief extract, may not sound very intelligible, but what Anaximander was seeking was an answer to the baffling mystery of the inequality of life's experiences. He endeavours to supply an answer by saying that contraries, such as cold and heat, are but the developments of the undivided elemental infinite substance, and that all will return to this state once more. While this, in a crude way, expresses some recognition of the great cycle of the ages, it fails to see a purpose in it, a personal Will that has planned, a personal power that upholds, and a personal God of love Who attracts and does not repel His creatures. All that Anaximander could offer to mankind was an impersonal unbounded substance, and an ever-recurring cycle of contrary events, which find satisfaction only in their return to chaos. Can any reader, instructed in the purpose of the Ages, knowing the glorious goal of redeeming love and the blessed fact that "Christ is all," contemplate the dreariness and coldness of Anaximander's Universe, without a feeling of thankfulness for the fact that we are now able to see the Creator and Upholder and Consummator of all things "in the face of Jesus Christ"? We make no apology for striking this one distinctive note again and again. A personal Creator, instead of a "first cause"; a purpose of the ages, instead of a never-ending cycle of contraries; an Universe that speaks of love, instead of a "boundless substance" called Infinity; these things are ours through the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ.

Figures of Speech.

Figures involving change: Hendiadys.

The name of this figure is composed of hen "one," dia "by means of," and dis "two." Two words are used, but only one idea is intended. A simple illustration may, perhaps, help. When we speak of "bread and butter" we do not intend two things, we really mean "buttered bread." Possibly an emphasis upon the "butter" is intended, and so the word is promoted from the rank of an adjective to that of a noun. The following examples are of interest, not only as illustrating the figure, but because of the doctrine associated with them.

> "The law was given by Moses, but grace and truth came by Jesus Christ" (John i. 17).

There was both "grace" and "truth" in the law; Israel were chosen by grace and not through merit, and the law of God is true in every part. Yet the law seems to be contrasted here with "grace and truth." When we perceive, however, the figure of Hendiadys, we begin to realise the intention of the passage. The words "truth" and "true" often stand for something that is real instead of something that is typical, as for example, "the true bread," "the true vine." What John i. 17 actually teaches is that whereas the law was given by Moses, "true grace," "real antitypical gospel grace," came by Jesus Christ.

"Ministry and apostleship" in Acts i. 25 is really "apostolic ministry" with a stress on the adjective "apostolic."

"Oxen and garlands" (Acts xiv. 13) really means "oxen garlanded," and so ready for sacrifice.

"Hope and resurrection" (Acts xxiii. 6). This is as though the apostle said, "Hope, yes, and resurrection hope too."

"Philosophy and vain deceit" (Col. ii. 8). Here again it is not two things but one. "A vain deceitful philosophy" is intended, with a stress on the words "vain" and "deceitful."

The figure Hendiatris or "One by means of three," is a variant of Hendiadys, and can be considered with it.

"All the people, nations, and languages" (Dan. iii. 7). Here we understand the passage to mean: "All the people, yes, and people of all nations and languages, fell down and worshipped."

"I am the way, and the truth, and the life" (John xiv. 6). The subject is "the way," and the Lord emphasises that He is not only "The Way," but "The true and living Way" to the Father.

We must next consider briefly Catachresis, the Figure of Incongruity. The name is made up of kata "against," and chreesthai "to use"; hence "to misuse."

In METONYMY there is a relation between the words used.

In SYNECDOCHE there is some association between the words used.

In HENDIADYS there is a real connection between the words used.

In CATACHRESIS all this is wanting.

For example, the expression "The foolishness of God" (1 Cor. i. 25) is incongruous, but we are arrested by the use of this bold figure.

"Ye have made our savour to stink in the eyes of Pharaoh" (Exod. v. 21). The association of "stink" with "eyes" is incongruous, but nevertheless very intense.

The mere plain statement of fact is not necessarily the whole truth, and the use of a figure, while departing from the cold matter of fact, often intensifies the truth and makes it live. Many interesting figures must necessarily be omitted in this survey. The reader should acquaint himself, for instance, with Euphemy, or the change of an unpleasant thing to something more pleasant, a figure still much used to-day. Other figures will be noted in passing where it is impossible to deal with them in this series. The subject is too full for anything but a selection at the best.

The Blessings of the Son (Eph. i. 7—12).

The dispensation of the fulness of the seasons.

(Reprinted from Volume VI.).

In the previous paper of this series we expressed our belief that verse 10 is an expansion of verse 9, and to enable the reader more easily to take up the connection we repeat the setting of the passage.

A | 9—. The mystery of His Will.
B | —9. IN HIM.
A | 10—. The dispensation of the fulness of the seasons.
B | —10. IN HIM.

The mystery of His will, here revealed in all wisdom and prudence, has reference to a dispensation—that of the fulness of the seasons.

There are three references to a dispensation in Ephesians.

(1) A dispensation of the fulness of the seasons (i. 10).
(2) The dispensation of the grace of God (iii. 2).
(3) The dispensation of the mystery (iii. 9, R.V.).

An essential character of a dispensation is that it involves a stewardship. Luke xvi. 2, 3 thus translates the word. A day is coming when stewardship as at present understood will have passed away and "God will be all in all" (1 Cor. xv. 28). It is hardly in keeping with the fundamental idea of a dispensation to speak of that culminating period as a dispensation. The fact that Ephesians i. 10 speaks of a gathering together in one of all things in Christ, has made many believe that Eph. i. 10 refers to the same period that is indicated in 1 Cor. xv. 28. What scriptural necessity is there for Eph. i. 10 to be future?

To Paul was given the dispensation of the grace of God to the Gentiles, "the mystery.....that the Gentiles should be fellow-heirs," etc; he also speaks of "the dispensation of the mystery" (R.V.). In Eph. i. 10 the title of the dispensation is "the fulness of the seasons." When Christ was born into the world, Gal. iv. 4 declares that it was "the fulness of the time." Time still rolls on, even though its fulness was reached over nineteen hundred years ago. The word we translate season occurs four times in Ephesians, twice in the doctrinal, and twice in the practical section. Eph. ii. 12 speaks of "that season" when the Gentiles were without Christ and aliens from the commonwealth of Israel. The contrast with "that season" is given in verses 13—22. "But now," when the both (Jews and Gentiles) are reconciled in one body. The blessings here spoken of are a direct outcome of the glorious facts given in Eph. i. 18—23. This being so, we may be allowed to say that the state of things described in i. 18—23 being set in contrast with "that season," will be closely parallel with the dispensation of the fulness of the seasons.

Let us compare the statement in i. 10 with i. 18—23. Eph. i. 10 speaks of the "fulness of seasons." Verse 23 speaks of the "fulness of Him that filleth all in all." Chapter i. 10 speaks of a gathering together in one. The original is a compound of the Greek word kephalē, meaning "head," and means "to head up," or "to gather together under one head." In verse 22 we read that Christ has been given "Head over all things to the church." Chapter i. 10 speaks of the things in the heavens and the things on the earth being gathered together under one Head. In verses 21, 22 we read that the Lord has been raised "far above all principality, and power, and might, and dominion, and every name that is named, not only in this age, but also in the coming one: and hath put all things under His feet." The words "not only" are an important evidence that the Ephesians knew that "in this age" the Lord was above principalities, etc.; these seem to refer back to verse 10.

We cannot help seeing how these passages correspond. Colossians brings this headship of heavenly powers and the members of the body (the church) together in i. 18 and ii. 10. "He is the Head of the body, the church," "the Head of all principality and authority." This does not refer to the future, but has reference to the present position of the Lord while at the right hand of God. Now He exercises this dual Headship, now He has reconciled things in the heavens and things on the earth. While, therefore, we look forward to the day when in fullest measure the blessings of grace will be fully enjoyed under the Headship of Christ, when reconciliation on earth and in heaven will be experienced by all the redeemed of all times, we must not lose the equally important truth that appears in Eph. i. 10, that now, in this dispensation of grace, in this dispensation of the mystery, the reconciling of things in the heavens and things on the earth, has taken place. That now is the dispensation of the fulness of the seasons, and that now, and not only in the future, the Lord Jesus Christ has been made Head over all, and has gathered under His Headship all things. The day of manifestation has not arrived, but when it does come it will be but the realization of this blessed fact.

Ephesians limits us for the time to the Headship of Christ as connected with the church and the things in the heavens, but He is Head over all now, even though rejected and unknown. Israel may have rejected their Messiah, the Gentiles may have turned away from the promised seed of the woman, but He has been made Head, and Colossians at one stroke gives Him the all-embracing title when it declares that He Who was the First-born of all creation is now First-born from among the dead, that in all things He might have the pre-eminence. Peter declares that when the Lord Jesus ascended into heaven, "angels and authorities and powers were subjected unto Him." What a wondrous revelation of the mystery of His will. The death, the cross, the rejection, all leading to this glorious goal. It is in this sphere of fulness that our lot is cast.

Eph. i. 11 goes on to tell us concerning our inheritance and its connection with this dispensation of the fulness of the seasons. This is the third section under the division we have called, "The blessings of the Son," and so we will leave the consideration of the theme until we take up the subject in the next paper.

Sidelights on the Scriptures.

No. 13.

The Fourth Egyptian Room.

(Reprinted from Volume VI.).

The Tell-el-Amarna Tablets noticed in our last paper linked the Assyrian and Babylonian language with Egypt, and so render the transition to the Egyptian rooms the easier. Wall Case 175, which is on the left immediately we enter the room, contains a number of typical sun-dried bricks. It has been said that the art of brick-making was introduced into Egypt from Southern Babylonia, where the clay is eminently suitable for the purpose. The Nile mud was not so suitable, and it was found necessary to mix chopped straw, reeds, hair, etc., with the mud in order to bind it together. The pieces of straw can be clearly seen in many of these specimens—straw chopped at the period when Israel was in Egypt, if not actually the work of their hands, and still retaining after these millenniums a yellow tinge.

No. 14 is of interest inasmuch as it is stamped with the name of Rameses II., the Pharaoh of the oppression. We shall have better opportunity of considering the various Pharaohs when we are reviewing the exhibits in the Egyptian Galleries. In Wall Cases 182—187 we find a large collection of toilet objects; razors, mirrors, combs, tweezers, hair pins, tubes for eye paint, and handles of fans, making a vivid impression on the mind of the close parallel that must have existed in the home life of these ancient folk and that of our own times. A reference to "shaving" it will be remembered comes in Gen. xli. 14; this is perfectly in accord with the times. Joseph as a Hebrew would have a beard, especially as he was in prison. No Egyptian was allowed to have a beard except the Pharaoh, or his Queen. These were always false beards, fastened to the chin by a band running up over the head. This is plainly seen on many of the heads of the statues in the Museum.

The eye paint is referred to by Ezekiel (xxiii. 40), and the mirrors the women of Israel brought out of Egypt, with which the brazen laver was made, must have been identical with those contained in this collection. In many cases the eye paint is contained in four tubes. No. 43 is a good specimen, the tubes being inscribed with the signs for life, good luck, stability, and the owner's name. In No. 46 we have four tubes to contain eye-paint for different seasons of the year, one for spring, one for summer, one for the inundation, and one for every day. The combs look quite up to date. Some are ornamented with animal forms on the back; some have teeth in two sizes. The razor marked 68 may have shaved the royal chin of the original of the great head and arm in the Gallery below, for it is inscribed with the prenomen of Thothmes III. On the shelf below are to be seen pieces of the colours used for painting the papyri, together with mullers and slabs for grinding them.

Standard Case C. contains some objects of interest. On the second shelf will be seen a series of children's toys and dolls. Some of the dolls are round, some are flat. Some have strings of mud beads to represent hair. One toy which ought to be noticed is a model of a cat or other animal, having a movable jaw to which a string is attached. When we learn that these were the toys of the period in which the sons of Israel went down to Egypt, can we believe that they would not bring back some such souvenir of their visit to the foreign land? One can legitimately imagine some of Jacob's grandchildren receiving a flat doll or a toy animal that moved its mouth, as shown in this collection. There are also balls made of porcelain, papyrus, and leather, stuffed with chopped straw, etc. Several draught boards and sets of draughtsmen are also shown. On the floor of the Case is a model of a granary, taken from a tomb of the seventh dynasty. Here we may see something that will enable us to imagine how Joseph stored the wheat during the seven years of plenty. The grain is poured into small holes at the top of the bin, of which there are seven in this model.

In Table Case J may be seen a collection of rings. No. 198 belonged to Thothmes III. who reigned between the end of Genesis and beginning of Exodus. No. 390 is a silver ring of Amen-hetep IV., the last of the line before the rise of the "new King who knew not Joseph." We can easily imagine therefore what the ring looked like that was given to Joseph by Pharaoh.

In Standard Case L is a large wooden toilet box which belonged to the wife of the scribe Ani, whose work we shall consider presently. The box contains a terra cotta vase and two alabaster vases containing ointments, a piece of pumice stone, eye paint, a medicinal paste to be used when the air is filled with sand, an ivory comb, a bronze "shell," a pair of gazelle skin sandals with turned up toes, tanned pink, and three cushions for the elbows, As a final evidence that "there is nothing new under the sun," Wall Case 150 contains a "boomerang" inscribed with the name of Amen-hetep IV.

The wonderful collection of articles in this room present to us evidence of the highly developed life, social and domestic habits, and doings of this ancient people. As we go back in history we find these traces of "civilization." We never find a nation's history emerging from savagery, although that is often its end. While some still cling to the idea that man is evolving upward, archæology shows that man has fallen. (Considerable re-arrangement of exhibits has been made since this article was written).

This is the record.

No. 6.

"And he that saw it bare record, and his record is true: and he knoweth that he saith true, that ye might believe" (John xix. 35).

In our last article we quoted John i. 32—34. This passage speaks of the baptism in Jordan and the descent of the Spirit, and ends with the words:

"And I saw, and bare record that this is the Son of God" (John i. 34).

Let us turn now to the last specific witness in the Gospel, which is found in John xix. 35. The chapter is dealing with the solemn events of the day of crucifixion, and the record of suffering and shame proceeds until in verse 30 we become blessedly conscious that the crucified Sufferer is nevertheless a Conqueror.

"He said, It is finished; and He bowed His head and gave up the ghost" (John xix. 30).

In all the tragic events of that day, there is strangely no witness recorded, except the Lord's own witness to the truth (xviii. 37), until death comes. And then something takes place which is so important that John could write:

"And he that saw it bare record, and his record is true; and he knoweth that he saith true, that ye might believe. For these things were done, that the Scripture should be fulfilled, A bone of Him shall not be broken. And again, They shall look on Him Whom they pierced" (John xix. 35—37).

We can readily see that the fact that Scripture was fulfilled was of great importance, but the Scripture was equally fulfilled when the Lord cried, "My God, My God, why hast Thou forsaken Me?" Scripture was also fulfilled when the Roman soldiers pierced His hands and His feet, and parted His garments among them, and when He said, "I thirst." Yet John does not feel it necessary to say that he bare record of these facts, and that "his record is true." After the mighty work of the cross is finished, the acts of the rough soldiers are recorded; and these are the subject of John's final witness.

"The Jews, therefore, because it was the preparation, that the bodies should not remain upon the cross on the sabbath day (for that sabbath day was an high day), besought Pilate that their legs might be broken, and that they might be taken away. Then came the soldiers, and brake the legs of the first, and of the other which was crucified with Him. But when they came to Jesus, and saw that He was dead already, they brake not His legs. But one of the soldiers with a spear pierced His side, and forthwith came there out blood and water" (John xix. 31—34).

To this the apostle bears witness, and to this as something of great importance we must turn our worshipping attention.

There is no difficulty in understanding the significance of the unbroken bones. Such a condition fulfilled the type of the Passover lamb (Exod. xii. 46), and set forth the blessed fact of the holiness of the Victim. The Psalmist says that the "righteous," though he may have "a broken heart," will not have broken bones (Psa. xxxiv. 18—20). And David confesses in Psa. li. 8 that he was "unrighteous" and that his bones had been broken.

The first point, then, in John xix. is the testimony to the fact that the Lord Jesus was the true Passover Lamb, and that He was indeed without blemish. But there is something further than this. "One of the soldiers with a spear pierced His side," apparently intending to make perfectly sure that He was dead; and it is to this part of the story that John's solemn testimony more particularly refers. "And forthwith came there out blood and water."

It has been too hastily assumed that the words, "Reproach hath broken My heart" (Psa. lxix. 20) can only have a figurative sense. The fact so solemnly recorded here is not unknown to medical science. Although the expression, "a broken heart" is usually a figure of speech, in this case it indicates an intensely literal and physical fact. Under great stress and sorrow the walls of the heart have been known to rupture, and one of the signs that this has taken place is the presence of "blood and water."

In emphasising the wickedness of man that crucified the Son of God, we must never lose sight of one fact without which the offering of Calvary would have been of no avail—the fact that the offering of Christ was of His own voluntary will.

"Therefore doth My Father love Me, because I lay down My life, that I may take it again. NO MAN TAKETH IT FROM ME, but I lay it down of Myself" (John x. 17, 18).

In the Garden of Gethsemane the Lord gave proof that no man could have taken Him, had He not been perfectly willing:

"As soon as He had said unto them, I am He, they went backward, and fell to the ground" (John xviii. 6).

There is an emphasis in Scripture on the "shedding of blood," and while the scourging, the nails and the thorns would have drawn blood, the breaking of the Saviour's heart under the stroke of God was the supreme fact that fulfilled the Scriptural types and shadows. Man did his part and then was set aside, while in the darkness the Father and the Son were alone. There under the forsaking of God the atoning work was done—and the soldier's spear proved that the work was accomplished. It is for this reason that the apostle insists so strongly upon the truth of this fact.

There are other records given in the Scriptures concerning the person and work of the Lord, but for the moment we leave the subject here, trusting that what has been seen will not only strengthen our faith, and enable us to bear our witness with no uncertain sound, but draw out our hearts to Him Who is the centre of all Scriptural witness.

"If we receive the record of men, the record of God is greater; for this is the record of God which He hath testified of His Son" (1 John v. 9).

The Acts of the Apostles.

No. 18.

Preparation for the ministry of Paul (Acts viii. 1—xi. 30).

The vision that Peter had of the great sheet, and his subsequent visit to Cornelius, form part of the great movement that we see taking place in Acts viii.—xi., which prepares the way for the work of Paul, the Apostle to the Gentiles. It will be found that there is nothing in Acts x. to warrant the idea that Peter had a ministry among the Gentiles, for the vision of the sheet and the visit to Cornelius were exceptional. They accomplished their purpose, but Peter was left free to pursue his ministry among the circumcision.

The subject before us falls into four parts:—

(1) THE VISION OF CORNELIUS (Acts x. 1—9).
(2) THE VISION OF PETER (Acts x. 9—24).
(3) THE MINISTRY OF PETER (Acts x. 24—48).
(4) THE EFFECT UPON THE CHURCH (Acts xi. 1—18).

As we have already seen that the burning words of Stephen anticipates the wider ministry of the apostle Paul, so it is possible that the way was partly prepared for Peter, by the work done among the Samaritans and in the interview with the Ethiopian, by Philip. Speaking humanly, it is most certain that, had Peter not received this revelation from heaven, and had he not been instrumental in the conversion of the Gentile, Cornelius, the opposition that met Paul's emancipating message would have been even more bitter and intense than it was. The God of grace is all-sufficient, and Paul would have endured to the end, whatever had happened to Peter, but God in His grace uses means, and Stephen, Philip and Peter were used to prepare the way for this new and wider ministry. There is a most marked contrast between the character of Cornelius and that of the heathen to whom Paul was sent. Cornelius is described as > "A devout man, and one that feared God with all his house, which gave much alms to the people and prayed to God alway" (Acts x. 2).

Paul's converts are described variously as:—

> "Ye know that ye were Gentiles, carried away unto these dumb idols, even as ye were led" (1 Cor. xii. 2).
>
> "When ye knew not God, ye did service unto them which by nature are no gods" (Gal. iv. 8).
> "At that time ye were without Christ, being aliens from the commonwealth of Israel and strangers from the covenants of promise, having no hope, and without God in the world" (Eph. ii. 12).

Yet it is abundantly clear from Acts x. that had he not had the vision of the sheet Peter would have called the devout, prayerful Cornelius "common and unclean." How is this attitude possible if it is true that the Church began at Pentecost? Many commentators incline to the opinion that Cornelius was a proselyte, and it will be of service if we pause here to make sure that all our readers appreciate the status of a proselyte.

The word "proselyte" is made up of pros = "towards" and eleutho = "to come," and is used by the LXX for the stranger or foreigner who came to dwell among the Jews and embraced their religion (Exod. xii. 48, 49; Lev. xvii. 8). In the N.T. the word refers to a convert from heathenism, but does not necessarily imply that the convert actually lives among Jewish people. These proselytes of Acts ii. 10 came up to Jerusalem to keep the feast.

The initiation of the proselyte involved the observance of three rites. He must be circumcised; he must be baptised; and he must offer a sacrifice. The Jew looked upon the proselyte as though he were a newborn child. Maimonides says:—

> "A Gentile who is become a proselyte, and a servant who is set at liberty, are both as it were new-born babes, and all those relations which he had while either a Gentile or a servant, now cease from being so."

There is a possibility that our Lord in His conversation with Nicodemus referred to this initiation. Calmet and his followers distinguish two kinds of proselytes, namely the Proselyte of the gate—these observed the seven precepts of Noah, but were not circumcised—and the Proselyte of righteousness—these were converts to Judaism, who were circumcised and observed the whole law. Cornelius was "uncircumcised" (Acts xi. 3), and therefore was not a proselyte, yet he is called "a devout man, and one that feared God." The dispersion of the Jew throughout the Roman world had of necessity influenced Gentile thought, and there were accordingly some who, though uncircumcised and outside the Hebrew pale, were nevertheless worshippers of the true God. Lydia, a woman of Thyatira, is said to be one who "worshipped God" and is found at the place of prayer (Acts xvi. 14). At Thessalonica there were "a great multitude of devout Greeks" (Acts xvii. 4); at Athens Paul disputed with devout persons (Acts xvii. 17); and at Corinth Paul found a refuge in the house of one named Justus who "worshipped God" (Acts xviii. 7). It was to this class that Cornelius belonged, for if he had been a proselyte he would not have been looked upon by the Jew as "common and unclean." This conclusion is further strengthened by Peter's confession:—

> "Of a truth I perceive that God is no respecter of persons: but in every nation he that feareth Him, and worketh righteousness, is accepted with Him" (Acts x. 34, 35).

If preachers and teachers had perceived the truth which the latter part of verse 35 enunciates, in connection with the status of Cornelius, no problem would have arisen concerning justification by faith, and the fact that by works of righteousness no man can be saved.

We must now turn our attention to the vision given to Peter, which produced so great a revolution.

Joppa! Did Peter ever think of Jonah? Was not Peter's name "Simon bar Jonah"? Did not Jonah remonstrate with God because of His mercy to Gentiles? Were the problems of the expanding gospel forcing themselves upon Peter? We are not told, but we believe that he would have been neither human nor an apostle, if such were not the burden of his thought.

Falling into a trance upon the housetop he saw a vessel descending from heaven, and containing all the fourfooted beasts, reptiles of the earth, and fowls of the air, and a voice said to him: "Rise, Peter, slay and eat." It is hardly possible for any Gentile to enter into the thoughts that would fill the mind of a Jew, whether Christian or otherwise, who received such a command. We can, however, acquaint ourselves with the law that governed this matter of clean and unclean animals and see what is written.

> "These are the beasts which ye shall eat among all the beasts that are on the earth. Whatsoever parteth the hoof, and is clovenfooted, and cheweth the cud, among the beasts, that shall ye eat" (Lev. xi. 2, 3).

Then follows the long list of prohibited animals, with the recurring sentiment:

> "These are unclean to you" (xi. 8).
> "Ye shall have their carcases in abomination" (xi. 11, 20, 23).

Not only so, but

> "These are unclean to you among all that creep: whosoever doth touch them, when they be dead, shall be unclean until the even" (xi. 31).

All this prohibition is because Israel were a separated people,

> "For I am the Lord your God: ye shall therefore sanctify yourselves, and ye shall be holy; for I am holy . . . . this is the law of the beasts, and of the fowl, and of every living creature that moveth in the waters, and of every creature that creepeth upon the earth; TO MAKE A DIFFERENCE between the unclean and the clean, and between the beast that may be eaten and the beast that may not be eaten" (Lev. xi. 44—47).

This instruction to "make a difference" is reiterated in the corresponding section of Leviticus, namely, chapter xx.

> "I have said unto you, Ye shall inherit their land, and I will give it unto you to possess it, a land that floweth with milk and honey: I am the Lord your God, which have SEPARATED YOU from other people. Ye shall therefore PUT A DIFFERENCE between clean beasts and unclean . . . . which I have SEPARATED from you as unclean. And ye shall be holy unto Me, for I the Lord am holy, and have severed you from other people, that ye should be Mine" (Lev. xx. 24—26).

It was in this atmosphere that the Jew was born, lived, moved and had his being. Practically from cradle to grave, from morning till night, waking or sleeping, marrying or giving in marriage, buying or selling, he was continually reminded that all the Gentiles were unclean, and that his own nation alone was holy unto the Lord. This separation to the Lord was seriously enforced upon his conscience by the scrupulous observances of the Levitical law.

If we observe the words that are used in the passages cited as translated by the LXX. into Greek, we shall perceive many a connection with N.T. teaching that may have passed unnoticed. "Make a difference" in Lev. xi. 47 is diasteilai, and is found in Rom. iii. 22 and x. 12, where it occurs as the noun diastole. While accepted by us today as obviously true, Paul's statement, "There is no difference," regarding either sin or salvation, was, when first uttered, revolutionary in its effect. In Lev. xx. 24 and 25 the LXX uses two related words to translate "I have separated you." In the first of the verses the word is diorizo, and in the second it is aphorizo. This word is also used to translate the words "put a difference" in Lev. xx. 25. Diorizo does not occur in the N.T., but aphorizo does. An examination of the ten occurrences of aphorizo in the N.T. will enable us the better to understand Peter's attitude to Cornelius.

"The angels shall . . . . sever the wicked from among the just" (Matt. xiii. 49).

"And before Him shall be gathered all nations: and He shall separate them one from another, as a shepherd divideth his sheep from the goats" (Matt. xxv. 32).

"Blessed are ye, when men shall hate you, and when they shall separate you from their company" (Luke vi. 22).

"The Holy Ghost said, Separate me Barnabas and Saul" (Acts xiii. 2).

"He departed from them, and separated the disciples" (Acts xix. 9).

"Paul . . . . separated unto the gospel of God" (Rom. i. 1).

"Wherefore come out from among them, and be ye separate saith the Lord, and touch not the unclean thing; and I will receive you" (2 Cor. vi. 17).

"When it pleased God, Who separated me from my mother's womb" (Gal. i. 15).

"For before that certain came from James, he (Peter) did eat with the Gentiles, but when they were come, he withdrew and separated himself, fearing them which were of the circumcision" (Gal. ii. 12).

The last reference reveals that Peter had been attracted by the freedom enjoyed by the converts of Paul's gospel, and had ventured even to eat with them, but the old upbringing was too strong for him, and the coming of those of the circumcision caused him to separate himself once more, his dissembling causing even Barnabas to be carried away.

There are many passages in the Gospels, Acts and Epistles that show what an hold these Levitical laws had upon the Jewish conscience. Take the word koinoo, which means "to make common." This is sometimes translated "to defile" as in the following passages.

> "Not that which goeth into the mouth defileth a man" (Matt. xv. 11).
> "To eat with unwashen hands defileth not a man" (Matt. xv. 20).
>
> "And when they saw some of His disciples eat bread with defiled, that is to say, with unwashen hands, they found fault. For the Pharisees, and all the Jews, except they wash their hands oft (margin with the fist or up to the elbow, i.e. a ceremonious washing, not a washing that is required for ordinary cleanliness), eat not" (Mark vii. 2, 3).

The following quotation will give some idea of the intensity of feeling that arose in connection with this matter of eating with a Gentile.

> "He who eats with an uncircumcised person, eats, as it were, with a dog; he who touches him, touches, as it were, a dead body; and he who bathes in the same place with him, bathes, as it were, with a leper" (Pirke Rabbi Eliezer, 29).

The bearing of all this upon the words and attitude of Peter in Acts x. is most evident by the following references.

> "Not so, Lord, for I have never eaten anything that is common or unclean" (Acts x. 14).
>
> "What God hath cleansed that call not thou common" (Acts x. 15).
> "Ye know how that it is an unlawful thing for a man that is a Jew to keep company, or come unto one of another nation; but God hath shewed me that I should not call any man common or unclean" (Acts x. 28).

Here are the words of Peter himself. If we accept the chronology of the A.V., this incident occurred eight years after Pentecost, and Peter is still by his own confession "A man that is a Jew." He, at least, did not believe that "the Church began at Pentecost." Not only was he still a Jew, though a believer, but he was still under the Law. "It is an unlawful thing," said he. How then can we tolerate the tradition that the Church began at Pentecost? He told Cornelius to his face that he would have treated him as "common and unclean," for all his piety and prayers, had he not received the extraordinary vision of the great sheet. Yet at Pentecost

> "All that believed were together, and had ALL THINGS COMMON" (Acts ii. 44).

When taken with Acts x. this is absolute proof that no Gentile could have been there. Yet the tradition that the Church began at Pentecost persists!

Peter moreover makes manifest his state of mind by adding; "Therefore came I unto you without gainsaying, as soon as I was sent for" (Acts x. 29). Can we imagine the apostle Paul speaking like this even to the most abject of Pagans? No; the two ministries of these two apostles are poles apart. Further, Peter continued: "I ask therefore for what intent ye have sent for me?" (Acts x. 29). Can we believe our eyes? Do we read aright? Is this the man who opened the Church to the Gentile on equal footing with the Jewish believer? He asks in all simplicity, "What is your object in sending for me?" Again, we are conscious that such words from the lips of Paul would be not only impossible but ridiculous. He was "debtor" to wise and unwise, to Jew and Gentile, to Barbarian and to Greek. Not so Peter. He was the Apostle of the Circumcision (Gal. ii. 8), and therefore the call of Cornelius seemed to him inexplicable.

"For what intent have ye sent for me?"—Can we imagine a missionary in China, India or anywhere else on the broad earth, asking such a question, or asking this question in similar circumstances? Any Mission Board would ask such a missionary to resign his post, and rightly so. No! every item in this tenth chapter is eloquent of the fact that Peter had no commission to the Gentiles.

At last Peter "began to speak" (Acts xi. 15). Let us listen to the message he gives to this Gentile audience.

> "Of a truth I perceive that God is no respecter of persons (first admission), but in every nation he that feareth Him, and worketh righteousness, is accepted with Him (second admission). The word which God sent unto the children of Israel (note, not as Paul in Acts xiii. 26), preaching peace by Jesus Christ: He is Lord of all (third admission) . . . . published throughout all Judæa . . . . in the land of the Jews, and in Jerusalem . . . . preach unto the people (i.e. the people of Israel) . . . . whosoever believeth in Him shall receive remission of sins" (Acts x. 34—43).

One cannot but be struck with the attitude of Peter. He does not preach directly to the Gentile audience, he rehearses in their hearing the word which God sent to Israel, saying nothing of a purely gospel character until the very end.

But for the further intervention of God we cannot tell how long Peter would have continued in this way. It is doubtful whether he would have got so far as inviting Cornelius and his fellows to be baptised, as his own words indicate:—

"Can any man forbid water, that they should not be baptised, which have received the Holy Ghost as well as we" (Acts x. 47).

The upshot of this work at Cæsarea was that even Peter was called upon to give an account of himself.

"The apostles and brethren that were in Judæa heard that the Gentiles had also received the word of God. And when Peter was come up to Jerusalem, they that were of the circumcision contended with him, saying, Thou wentest in to men uncircumcised, and didst eat with them" (Acts xi. 1).

We find no remonstrance from Peter to the effect that seeing that the Church began at Pentecost, the conversion of Cornelius should have been anticipated and be a matter for rejoicing. No, Peter patiently, and humbly, and apologizingly, rehearsed the matter, even to the pathetic conclusion: "What was I, that I could withstand God?" (Acts xi. 17). Why should Peter ever think of withstanding God, if he knew that the Church began at Pentecost? It is abundantly evident that neither Peter, the other apostles, nor the brethren at Jerusalem had the remotest idea of any such thing.

"When they heard these things, they held their peace, and glorified God, saying, THEN hath God ALSO to the Gentiles granted repentance unto life" (Acts xi. 18).

We shall learn when we come to Acts xv. that the response of Peter to the call of Cornelius played a considerable part in stopping the extremists at Jerusalem in their attempt to shackle the Church of the Gentiles, and how it proved to be a preparation for the great ministry of Paul, the Apostle to the Gentiles. In this we rejoice, and see how the purpose of grace gradually unfolds as the narrative proceeds.

The abundance of material in these passages makes it difficult either to select or to stop, but needs must, and so we leave the reader to the profitable employment of studying this passage in all its bearings, being confident that in the atmosphere of the Scriptures, truth will blossom and the tradition of the elders wilt and die.

Symbols of Service.

Sharpeners and Sweeteners.

When considering symbols of service under the letter "R" we might have spoken of such obvious titles as the "ruler," but instead of this, as the reader will remember, we dealt with the less prominent service of "refreshing." If we think next of the denominating letter "S," the service of "stewardship" comes immediately to mind. But, while stewardship is perhaps one of the most important aspects of service that the apostle mentions, we have often considered it before, especially in connection with the ministry of the mystery; and we therefore turn to less well-known aspects, in the hope that some reader may find a guide, an invitation, an incentive, in considering the wonderful variety of service awaiting the activities of the redeemed. The two kinds of ministry that we wish to bring before the reader are represented by the titles "Sharpeners" and "Sweeteners."

As we write these words, we call to mind a parable from "The Wit and Wisdom of Safed the Sage." Safed had been grieved with the follies and sins of men, and from his pulpit had rebuked the people. Some of the congregation felt that he had been a little too severe, and this feeling was shared by his wife Keturah. However, she did not tell him in so many words, but when Safed mentioned that he thought of going to the barber, she said "Go, my lord. But another time, go thou on the day that precedeth the Sabbath . . . ." Safed observed that the barber's tools were very sharp, and he said to himself:

> "Here also is a man who needeth sharp instruments in his business, even as I do. And I spake to the barber, and I said, Behold thou dost use in thy business only things that are sharp."

The barber, however, told him that the razor and the shears and the clippers represented only a small part of his equipment.

> "I use cold cream that sootheth: and Bay Rum that feeleth mighty good after a shave; and ointment that healeth wheresoever the razor goeth over a place where the skin hath any manner of hurt. Yea, and I have lotions and Talcum Powder, and lots of stuff to make a fellow feel good. Otherwise must I go out of business. And I meditated much on what the barber said to me. And I said to my soul, If the barber needeth healing lotions and emollients in his business, much more do I. I will not attempt to run my business with sharp instruments only . . . . And I told it to Keturah. And Keturah spake to me and said, Tell it to all men who preach; for among them are many men who possess as little wisdom as doth my lord. Yea, and there may be a few who know even less" (William E. Barton).

"Sharpeners" and "Sweeteners" go, therefore, together. Let us look at what the Word has to say of them.

"Ointment and perfume rejoice the heart: so doth the sweetness of a man's friend, by hearty counsel" (Prov. xxvii. 9).

"Iron sharpeneth iron; so a man sharpeneth the countenance of his friend" (Prov. xxvii. 17).

Here, in this one chapter, we have the sharp instruments and the soothing lotions together.

The amateur often looks with a critical eye at the craftsman sharpening his tools. He would not waste all that time, he thinks, before beginning work. In Ecclesiastes we read:

"If the iron be blunt, and he do not whet the edge, then must he put to more strength: but wisdom is profitable to direct" (Eccles. x. 10).

It is evident that wisdom is the whetstone, and without wisdom our good intentions will miscarry. The same spirit that criticises the use of the whetstone as a waste of good time, criticises the attempts of the The Berean Expositor to make words live, to sharpen the understanding, to give point to the teaching of the Scripture by all and every means at our disposal.

The Psalmist speaks of the wicked, "who whet their tongue like a sword" (Psa. lxiv. 3). We refer to this, not that we should emulate them, but that we should realize that the figure is applicable to speech. Sharpness, in the good sense of the word, demands the whetstone of 2 Tim. ii. 15. Clearness of proclamation presupposes clearness of understanding. If we are uncertain ourselves of our calling, we shall not impress others, except with our dulness.

We must not spend all our time, however, on the Sharpeners, or we shall be considered by Keturah as even less wise than her husband Safed. Let us remember that the same friend who sharpens, can also soothe. This is accomplished, as Prov. xxvii. 9 says, by "hearty counsel." When we minister the Word of God, those to whom we minister may be able to say: "How sweet are Thy words unto my taste" (Psa. cxix. 103). Our walk in love, and any little kindness we can do for Christ's sake, may merit the words of Eph. v. 2 or Phil. iv. 18:

"I have received of Epaphroditus the things that were sent from you, an odour of a sweet smell, a sacrifice acceptable, well pleasing to God."

Any ministry that can be spoken of in the terms that describe the great sacrifice of Christ Himself, must be ministry indeed. The Shulamite said of her beloved, that his lips were like lilies "dropping sweet-smelling myrrh" (Song of Sol. v. 13), and when we realise that the mouth speaketh out of the abundance of the heart, we may well pray that our "meditation of Him shall be sweet," for only so shall we become sweeteners of others.

The epistle to the Romans.

No. 61.

All things work together for good (Rom. viii. 22—28).

In verse 26, the believer has to say "We know not"; but in verse 28, he can gladly say "We know." What is the difference between these two statements?

In the first, the believer, surrounded by evil, realising only too well that in his flesh dwells no good thing, knowing that often the sufferings through which he is called to pass may be but blessings in disguise, acknowledges that with these limitations, he finds it sometimes impossible to pray. Shall he ask for deliverance? Shall he pray for strength to endure? Has he done something which calls for chastening? Is he suffering in fellowship with Christ? "We know not."

In the midst of this perplexity two bright beams illuminate the darkness. "I may not know, but He knows." "I may not know what to pray for, but I do know that all things work together for good to them that love God." We have already considered the first of these statements. We must now consider the second.

"And we know that all things work together for good to them that love God; to them who are the called according to His purpose" (Rom. viii, 28).

The experiences of Job will throw some light upon the bearing of this verse and its relation to the context.

> "Behold I go forward, but He is not there; and backward, but I cannot perceive Him. On the left hand, where He doth work, but I cannot behold Him; he hideth Himself on the right hand, that I cannot see Him" (Job xxiii. 8, 9).

Job could indeed say "We know not," but he adds, "He knoweth"; and this saves his reason and his faith. He realises, too, that the trials through which he is called upon to pass are governed by purpose, and planned by love.

> "But He knoweth the way that I take: when He hath tried me, I shall come forth as gold" (Job xxiii. 10).

In the same way, the believer to-day, however baffled he may be, has one anchorage in it all—the Lord knows, and makes all things work together for good.

We have on other occasions drawn attention to the necessity of distinguishing between "all things" (panta), and "the all things" (ta panta). The passage before us together with the context illustrates the difference very clearly. We scarcely need to be told by inspiration of God that the things of God, the things of the Spirit, the things of Christ, are for our good. To question this would simply indicate that we were irrational. What does, sometimes, present a problem is the question of things which are in themselves evil. The evil and the good are so intermixed, motives are often so complex, the results of actions so widespread, that we might sometimes begin to doubt whether such things could make for good. The verse before us assures us that all things (panta)—all things without discrimination or exception—work together for good.

> "All things (panta) are yours, whether Paul, or Apollos, or Cephas, or the world, or life, or death, or things present, or things to come; all are yours; and ye are Christ's; and Christ is God's" (1 Cor. iii. 21—23).

As we read these sweeping statements, our minds travel back to Rom. viii. 38, 39:

> "For I am persuaded that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord."

In contrast with this universal aspect of "all things" (panta), including both good and evil, we read:

> "He that spared not His own Son, but delivered Him up for us all, how shall He not with Him also freely give us all things (ta panta)"? (Rom. viii. 32).

Here we see the two terms. "All things" (panta) work together for good; "the all things" (ta panta) are graciously given us with Christ. We must remember to distinguish these "things that differ."

Among "all things" in the widest sense of the term must be included those sinful acts of men that are transgressions of the will of God. These cannot in any sense be said to be "graciously given us with Christ." The idea is impossible and unscriptural. Nevertheless, we do know that the Lord makes even the wrath of men to praise Him.

We dare not teach that God put it into the heart of the fraudulent Bank Managing Director so to act that our small deposit vanished, but we can and do teach that the miracle of the widow's cruse has had its modern equivalent. We do not teach that God intended that men should slander us and accuse us wrongfully, but we do teach that He overrules all such attacks and opposition in order to reveal us to ourselves, and to cast us the more upon Himself. The believer can safely say of all life's experiences:

> "The Lord may not definitely have planned that this should overtake me, but He has most certainly permitted it. Therefore, though it be the attack of an enemy, by the time it reaches me it has the Lord's permission, and therefore all is well. He will make it work together with all life's experiences for good."

To them that love God.—The title of the believer here seems to have been specially chosen for his encouragement. This is the first occurrence of agapaō in the epistle. At the close of chapter viii., we read:

> "Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? . . . , Nothing shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord."

We love Him because He first loved us; and the love of God is manifested in the gift of His Son. Is there a single passage of Scripture which teaches that God loves man apart from Christ and His redemptive work? If there be such a passage, we have yet to meet it. Consequently, if it be true that "the love of God is in Christ Jesus our Lord," it is a love that has dealt with our sins, reconciled us to Himself, given us of the spirit of Sonship, and made us to cry, "Abba, Father." How can we, therefore, have the slightest doubt?

Because the love of God is shed abroad in our hearts, tribulations work patience, patience works experience, experience works hope and all things work together for good.

Joseph realised the truth of Rom. viii. 28, when he said:

"But as for you, ye planned (Heb. chasab) evil against me, but God planned (Heb. chasab) it for good, to bring to pass as it is this day, to save much people alive" (Gen. l. 20).

To return to Rom. viii., we must not fail to observe that the saints are given a double title the second being in some measure a saféguard to the interpretation of the first. "To them that love God, to them who are the called according to His purpose" (Rom. viii. 28). As has already been quoted, "We love Him because He first loved us." This additional title gives us the only "reason" why God should ever have loved us—it was "according to His purpose."

"The Lord did not set His love upon you, nor choose you, because ye were more in number than any people; for ye were the fewest of all people. But because the Lord loved you, and because He would keep His oath which He had sworn unto your fathers" (Deut. vii. 7, 8).

"The Lord loved . . . . because He loved." He "chose . . . . because He would keep His oath."

If we turn to Eph. i. we meet the same argument.

"Blessed be . . . . God . . . . Who hath blessed us . . . . according as He hath chosen us . . . . in love . . . . in the Beloved . . . . according to the purpose of Him who worketh all things after the counsel of His own will" (Eph. i. 3—11).

Here then is our haven in life's storms, our rock while tempests rage, our fortress and our high tower, summed up for us in words that must presently be studied: "If God be for us, who can be against us?"

In order that our study shall be as complete as possible, we will present as a conclusion to the present article, the structure of the section now covered.

Romans viii. 22—28.

A | WE KNOW (22—25).

No. 5.

The blood of Christ; its covenant limitations.

(Reprinted from Volume VI.).

The first doctrinal reference to the blood of Christ in the N.T. is found in Matt. xxvi. 28: "This is My blood of the new testament" (diathēkē). The parallel passages in Mark xiv. 24 and Luke xxii. 20 exhaust the first three Gospels on the subject, and in each reference in the A.V. the words "new testament" occur.

The R.V. renders the word diathēkē by "covenant," but omits the word "new" from Matthew and Mark, calling attention in the margin to the fact that "many ancient authorities insert new. The Numeric New Testament supports the R.V. reading. With regard to the rendering "covenant" in preference to "testament," we believe all who remember the O.T. teaching on the subject will see that "covenant," is the consistent rendering.

Luke's record makes it clear that the covenant of Matt. xxvi. and Mark xiv. is the new covenant, but the omission of the word "new" leads to very important truth which otherwise might not have been so definitely seen. Keeping closely to the original, Matt. xxvi. 28 reads: "For this is my blood, that of the covenant, that which is shed concerning many for forgiveness of sin." The blood of Christ is the blood of a covenant, but a covenant which is not left undefined. It is the blood of a covenant that has a prominent place in it for the forgivensss of sins. The epistle to the Hebrews is most emphatic on the truth that the sacrifices of the old covenant never put away sins :—

> "For if the blood of bulls and goats.....sanctifieth to the purifying of the flesh ; How much more shall the blood of Christ.....purge your conscience from dead works to serve the living God ? And for this cause He is the Mediator of a new Covenant, that a death having taken place for redemption of the transgressions against the first covenant, those having been called might receive the promise of eonian inheritance. For where there is a covenant, the death of that which makes the covenant, (diathēkē, covenant ; diathemenos, he who makes a covenant) it is necessary to be brought to bear. For a covenant is firm over dead ones (i.e. the sacrifices) since it has no force when that which makes the covenant is living. Hence not even the first (covenant) hath been dedicated without blood" (Heb. ix. 13—18).

It is perfectly clear that there was no redemption for sins under the old covenant, for the blood of Christ includes in its scope the redemption of the transgressions made against the old covenant. Chapter x. carries the subject to a definite conclusion.

> " For it is not possible that the blood of bulls and of goats should take away sins ; wherefore coming into the world He saith, Sacrifice and offering Thou didst not desire, but a body hast Thou prepared Me .....He takes away the first (covenant) that He may established the second.....The priest standing daily offering the same sacrifices oftentimes, which are never able to take away sin ; but He, having offered one sacrifice for sins for ever, sat down at the right hand of God..... wherefore the Holy Spirit is witness.....this is the covenant that I will make with them.....their sins and iniquities will I remember no more " (Heb. x. 1—18).

The epistle further speaks in xii. 24 of " Jesus the Mediator of the new covenant and the blood of sprinkling (see ix. 19, 20) that speaketh better things than that of Abel"; and finally, in xiii. 20, speaks of " that great Shepherd of the sheep, by the blood of the eonian covenant, prepare you in every good work, etc."

There can be no doubt that the blood of Christ is the blood of the new covenant, and that it is under the new covenant and not the old that sins are forgiven. Further, the blood is shed for many. When the Scriptures speak of the death of Christ, it is for all, but when the blood of the covenant is spoken of it is for many. We believe all means something different from many ; and this difference illustrates the narrowing tendency of the doctrine under view. The death of Christ as viewed in relation to the state of man in Adam is one thing; the death of Christ as the appointed ratification of the new covenant by the shedding of His blood is another. It does not follow that because it is written, "As in Adam all die, so in Christ shall all be made alive," that all are necessarily forgiven, saved, justified, and blessed with the blessings of redemption. The covenant is not co-extensive with the extent of Adam's fall, but it operates within that universal sphere.

Continuing our study of the passage in Matt. xxvi., we note that the body of Christ is referred to as well as His blood, and it will be remembered that in Heb. x. we read that "it is impossible for the blood of bulls and of goats to take away sins," but we do not read in the sequel that the blood of Christ does, but rather, "a body hast Thou prepared Me;" "sanctified by the offering of the body of Jesus Christ once for all." Turning to the Gospel of John, we find no parallel to the passage of Matt. xxvi. 28. In John vi. we read of the body and blood of Christ in another setting. By examining the parallels of the context we find that "believing on Christ" and "drinking His blood" are synonymous; both result in "eonian life," and that as the expression "drinking His blood" is figurative (compare verse 47 with 53 and 54), these passages can hardly be taken as being doctrinal references to the blood of Christ such as we are considering in this series.

The Acts of the Apostles contains but two references to the blood of Christ. Acts v. 28 has no doctrinal connection, and so we pass it by. Acts xx. 28 has, and we will consider its statement: "The church of God, which He hath purchased with His own blood." The last clause, "with His own blood," presents a difficulty, and has been rendered by many, "with the blood of His own." Heb. ix. 12 and xiii. 12 give us what the normal form of the expression should be, dia tou idiou haimatos. In Acts xx. 28 the form is dia tou haimatos tou idiou. Whatever the true rendering may be, we may learn, for the time being at least, that the blood of Christ purchased or acquired the church of God.

The word "purchase" is peripoieō, and literally means, "to make over and above; to acquire." The word comes in Gen. xxxi. 18, "The cattle of his getting"; xxxvi. 6, "which he had got in the land of Canaan." It occurs in only one other place in the N.T., viz., 1 Tim. iii. 13, "purchase to themselves a good degree." Peripoiēsis, meaning an acquiring or an obtaining, occurs in a few passages. 1 Thess. v. 9, "Obtain salvation," 2 Thess. ii. 14, "Obtaining the glory:" 1 Pet. ii. 9, "A peculiar people." This last reference, "a people for an acquisition," is an echo of Mal. iii. 17, esontai moi, legei Kurios Panto kratōr eis peripoiesin: "They shall be to Me, saith the Lord Almighty, for an acquisition."

The Hebrew word of this passage is segullah, something peculiarly precious, and of private rather than general interest, Here in Mal. iii. 17 it is rendered "jewels." In Ex. xix. 5, Psa. cxxxv. 4, and Eccles. ii. 8 it is rendered "a peculiar treasure." In Deut. xiv. 2 and xxvi. 18, "peculiar people." In 1 Chron. xxix. 3 David uses the word to indicate his own private possessions ("mine own proper good") as distinct from the national offerings.

Whatever differences of opinion there may be regarding the translation of the last clause of Acts xx. 28, there can be no uncertainty as to the fact that the church of God there said to be an acquisition, a peculiar possession, purchased by the blood of Christ, is to be considered as distinct from the world of mankind generally who died in Adam and must live again. The blood of the covenant was shed for many, the blood also made a purchase of a peculiar and special people, the church of God. This is the sustained testimony of the Scripture, and is one of "The things that differ" that it is necessary for us to take to heart, that while the death is spoken of as of universal application, the shedding of blood is within the bounds of a covenant, is for the many, and acquires an election from among the great mass of men.

The Parables.

The Ten Virgins (Matt. xxv. 1—13).

(Reprinted from Volume VI.)

The parable of the ten virgins expands and further explains the need for watchfulness and readiness that has already been uttered in Matt. xxiv. 42, where similar words are used to those with which the parable of the Virgins closes. It is most important in considering the structure, to observe the way in which the verbs made up of erchomai, "to come" or "to go," occur, not only because they subdivide the parable for us, but, as we shall see, they form an important link with the next parable and continue the line of teaching. The verbs are exerchomai, "to go forth" and "to go out;" aperchomai, "to go away;" eiserchomai, "to go in;" and erchomai, "to come." Any structure that omits these pivotal words will fail to illuminate as a structure should the essential teaching.

Matthew xxv. 1—13.

A1 | 1—12. The Parable. Wise and foolish virgins.

A2 | 13. Watch, ye know not.

The Parable (Matt. xxv. 1—12).

A1 | xxv. 1. The ten virgins "went forth" to meet the Bridegroom (exerchomai).

B1 | 2—5. Where they differed.
- a | Five were prudent.
- b | Five were foolish.
- b | Foolish took no oil.
- a | Prudent took oil.

C1 | 5. Where they were alike.—They all slumbered and slept.

A2 | 6. The ten virgins bidden to "go forth" to meet the Bridegroom (exerchomai).

C2 | 7. Where they were alike.—They all arose and trimmed.

B2 | 8, 9. Where they differed.
- a | The foolish ask for oil.
- b | The prudent refuse.

A3 | 10. The five unready ones "went away" to buy (aperchomai).

B3 | 10. The Bridegroom "came" (erchomai).

C3 | 10. The door was shut.

A4 | 10. The five ready ones "went in" to the marriage (eiserchomai).

B4 | 11. The others "came" (erchomai).

C4 | 11. Open to us.

The parable opens with a note of time—then. The loose way in which the word is used in English has prevented many from seeing this parable in its true place. It does not say that all through the history of the Christian Church this has been the state of affairs, but it says, "Then, at that time, the kingdom of the heavens will become like ten virgins." It is important to remember that the Lord is still answering the question of the disciples raised in xxiv. 3. They asked, When? and What? "When shall these things be?" and "What shall be the sign of Thy coming, and (what shall be the sign) of the suntelia (that period which is the gathering point of all things just before the end, telos) of the age." Matt. xxiv. and xxv. supply the answers to these questions.

The "When" is answered in verses 5—14 by "Then shall the end come," and in verse 21, "Then shall be the great tribulation." The "What" as to the sign of the Lord's coming is answered in verse 27 by, "As the lightning cometh out of the east and shineth even unto the west," and in verses 27—31 fuller details of the effect in the heavens are given. These answer the question concerning the sign of His coming. The "What" as to the ending of the age is answered in the parable of the Fig-tree and the type of Noah. The Lord expands this section in the parable we are considering, and so the Ten Virgins commences, "Then will the kingdom of the heavens be likened unto ten virgins." Then, at that time, in the days when the fig-tree has put forth its leaves, and the days of Noah are being re-enacted, then the kingdom of the heavens will be comparable to ten virgins who took their lamps, and went out to meet the bridegroom. Notice the statements: (1) they took their lamps; (2) they went out with the express object of meeting the bridegroom. There is no suggestion that the five foolish virgins were not as earnest as the wise. There is no suggestion that they were hypocrites or unbelievers. The whole point is that they were unready, unprepared—a warning not to sinners, but rather to saints.

The change from servants to virgins is also suggestive. Rev. xiv. 4 shows that in the Scriptures the title virgin may be applied to either sex, and indicates chastity and purity. Further, as immorality will have reached a fearful depth, and will constitute once more a part of the religion of the end time, a very real separation is evidenced by the word. Yet further, the word is in some measure equivalent to the O.T. reference to Noah, who was "perfect in his pedigree." The virgins of Rev. xiv. have the Father's name written in their foreheads, in strong contrast to the idolatrous worshippers of the beast who have the number of the beast in their right hand, or forehead (xiii. 16). The reference to the teaching of Balaam (ii. 14), and Jezebel (ii. 20), beside the fearful things said of the woman, Babylon, all point to the same end. The kingdom of the heavens at that time will be found only among a separate people who are "virgins." The point of the parable is not questioning their virginity, nor their intentions, but their failure, their failure to Watch.

Not every one who is a subject of the kingdom of the heavens will enter into the marriage supper of the Lamb. They that are ready go in. In 1 Thess. iv. 13—18 we have the hope of the believers of that period set out, and it includes a "meeting" of the Lord in the air. Chapter v. immediately develops along the line of Matt. xxiv. and xxv. There we read of the "coming as a thief in the night"; there, as in the days of Noah, when they say "peace and safety" sudden destruction is at hand and escape is impossible. Watchfulness is urged in contrast to sleeping and drinking, just as in Matt. xxiv.

Further, life together with the Lord is in no wise connected with watchfulness or sleepiness, just as readiness or unreadiness in no wise alters the virginity of those who went out to meet the Lord. This principle obtains also in the prison epistles: For living with Him depends upon having died with Him, whereas reigning with Him depends upon patiently enduring. If this be absent a denial of this reward must follow, although faithlessness on our part will never cause Him to deny Himself, for living with Him remains our unalterable privilege (2 Tim. ii. 11, 12). There are many who unhesitatingly take to themselves passages of Scripture, who seem to forget the character of those to whom the promises were made. Let those who lay claim to 1 Thess. iv. see to it that they have the qualities mentioned in 1 Thess. i. 3—8.

These virgins go out to meet "The Bridegroom." In Rev. xix., immediately upon the fall of Babylon, the marriage of the Lamb is announced. "The marriage of the Lamb is come and His wife hath prepared herself"; then follows a statement as to the blessedness of those who are invited to the marriage supper of the Lamb. In Rev. xxi. 2 John says that he "saw the holy city, New Jerusalem, coming down from God out of heaven, prepared (same word as "made ready" in xix. 7) as a bride adorned for her husband." This New Jerusalem has special relation not to saints in general, but to overcomers in particular; not to virgins as such, but to virgins who were "prepared." The epistle to the Hebrews treats of this class, and this class only (as we may be able to show later), and to this class are addressed the words of Heb. xii. 18—24 which includes "the heavenly Jerusalem," the "city which hath the foundations" for which Abraham and others looked, endured, and overcame (Heb. xi. 16). The virgins who go into the marriage supper are not the bride; that is certain. They are differentiated in Rev. xix. and Psa. xlv.

There is a close connection between the first and last discourses related in Matthew. Most of us know that the eight beatitudes of Matt. v. are balanced by the eight woes of Matt. xxiii. At verse 13 of chapter vii., the subject turns to the question of "entering" into the kingdom of the heavens, and the words "I never knew you" of verse 21—23 are echoed, though not repeated as to the actual words, in xxv. 12. This solemn statement in Matt. vii. is immediately followed by a "likened" (so also Matt. xxv. 1) to a prudent and a foolish builder. Their prudence or their folly consisted in their obedience or disobedience to the Lord's words. The prudent virgins heeded the word "Watch"; the foolish did not. The wise and foolish builders figure in 1 Cor. iii. There again the apostle raises no doubt as to whether they are on the true foundation: what he is concerned about is "how they build thereon."

> "If any man's work shall abide which he hath built thereon, he shall receive a reward. If any man's work shall be burned up, he shall suffer loss, but he himself shall be saved; yet so as by fire."

The effect of the "delay" is brought out in these parables. "My Lord delayeth (chronizō) His coming." "While the bridegroom tarried (chronizō). "After a long time" (chronon polun). This is the key to Hebrews x., xi. and xii.

> "For yet a little while, and He that shall come will come and will not tarry (chronizō). Now the just shall live by faith.....these all died in faith not having received the promises.....they desire a better country, that is, an heavenly.....the recompense of the reward."

The word "ready" or "prepared" is a connecting word in this context. "All things were ready" (Matt. xxii. 4—8). "Be ye also ready" (Matt. xxiv. 44); "They that were ready went in" (Matt. xxv. 10); "Inherit the kingdom prepared for you" (Matt. xxv. 34); "Depart from me ye cursed into the eonian fire prepared for the devil and his angels" (Matt. xxv. 41).

A further link with the next parable is found in the repetition of eiserchomai and aperchomai. The one who received one talent went away (aperchomai) and hid the money. Those who were commended were bidden to enter into (eiserchomai) the joy of the Lord. These words, as we have pointed out, are important words in the parable of the Virgins.

If we may so say, the failure of the five foolish virgins may be attributable to thinking that their calling was easy, while the failure of the servant with the one talent was because he felt his lot to be too hard. May we avoid both errors and have spiritual understanding, or as the word means, "a putting together," that we may see the combined truth of responsibility and sovereign grace, and so "walk worthy of the Lord unto all pleasing."

DEAR FELLOW-MEMBERS OF THE ONE BODY,

While the dispensation of the mystery may have no direct relation with prophetic times, it is obvious to all who have eyes to see, that the day cannot be far distant when the last member of the one body shall have been gathered in and our testimony finished.

In a small measure we trust that our publications have been and still will be used to "make all men see what is the dispensation of the mystery", and to that end we dedicate another Volume of The Berean Expositor to the glory of our ascended Head and to the blessing and encouragement of the members of His body.

Till the end of our course we rejoice to know that we shall be able to take to ourselves the words: "Notwithstanding the Lord stood with me", and in that faith we look forward to another year's witness.

With grateful acknowledgments to all who have encouraged us to hold fast in troublous times.

Yours for the truth "rightly divided".

A tribute to the late George Kerr, Clydebank, Glasgow.
p. 101

Those of our readers who are acquainted with the early Volumes of The Berean Expositor and its history, will remember the regular occurrence of the initials "G.K. and Friends" under the heading "Gal. vi. 6". These initials were those of George Kerr, and it was with a sense of deep loss that we learned a week before our visit to Scotland this April that our old friend had fallen asleep. Tribute was paid at the Glasgow meetings to the help and strength he had been to many—quite a number owe their introduction and subsequent confirmation in dispensational truth to the labours and scholarship of George Kerr. We remember with what surprise, and yet with his own hand, in book form for the benefit of others, the articles we contributed to Things to Come commencing in 1909. George Kerr was not easily convinced, and therefore his loyal support was all the more valuable.

Although for the past twenty-five years he was more or less an invalid, his cheery smile and stalwart faith were inspirations to many. He now awaits that glorious day when this body of humiliation shall be changed for the body of glory. We commit his widow and family to the tender mercies of our God, and feel that we who are left will honour "G.K.'s" memory best, by endeavouring to fill the breach that his death has made, and to hold fast the good deposit, seeking by grace, as he sought, to be "approved unto God" (II Tim. ii. 15).

The Acts of the Apostles.

#19. Antioch: The centre of the second section of the Acts (xi., xii.).

pp. 23 - 29

No student of Scripture needs to be told that a knowledge of the history of Jerusalem is essential to the understanding of the O.T. This is so whether the point of view be the chronicles of Israel's history, the prophecies of the minor or major prophets, the rise and dominion of Nebuchadnezzar and his successors, or, to come to the N.T., the record of the Gospels, the Acts, many of the epistles, and lastly the book of the Revelation. This city dominates the opening section of the Acts. Whether it is the preaching of repentance to Israel, or the evangelizing of Judæa and Samaria, Jerusalem is the divinely appointed centre. However, the second section of the Acts, which we are now to consider, takes us outside the "promised land". Another city now comes into prominence. With this city the evangelization of the Gentile world, the ministry of Paul and the name "Christian" will for ever be associated.

What do we know of Antioch? With our present information, what sort of answers should we give to a general knowledge paper covering its history and geography? Antioch has been called the third city of the Roman Empire and its importance to all Gentile believers is such that no apology is needed for the present article, which seeks to bring before the reader something of the character and position of a city so intimately associated with all that we as "Christians" hold dear.

For the sake of clearness we would remind our readers that two cities named Antioch are mentioned in the Acts. The first is referred to in Acts xi. 19, xiii. 1 & Gal. ii. 11, and is a city of Syria, about 300 miles north of Jerusalem, whereas the second is in Pisidia, in Asia Minor. Both were founded by Seleucas Nicator and both were named after his father Antiochus. No place was so suited as Antioch for the great work that was about to commence. It was called the Queen of the East, the third metropolis of the world, and the official residence of the Imperial Legate of Syria was there.

In Paul's day, the population of the city numbered perhaps as many as 500,000 and was composed of native Syrians, Greeks, Jews and Romans. There were the usual slaves and artists, and the sychophants who, alas, characterized every oriental city where East and West intermingled. So cosmopolitan was this place that Libanius said that he who sat in the Agora of Antioch might study the customs of the world. We are indebted to the writings of Josephus, and the books of the Maccabees for information concerning the history and appearance of Antioch, all of which we must pass by owing to limitation of space. Perhaps we may be justified in quoting from M. Renan's Les Apotres, a passage which vividly brings before the mind the character of the city associated with the evangelization of the Gentiles.

> "It was an unheard of collection of jugglers, charlatans, pantomimists, magicians, thaumaturgists, sorcerers, and priestly impostors; a city of races, of games, of dances, of processions, of festivals, of bacchanalia, of unchecked luxury; all the extravagancies of the East, the most unhealthy superstitions, the fanaticism of orgies. In turns, servile and ungrateful, worthless and insolent, the Antiocheans were the finished model of those crowds devoted to Cæsarism, without country, without nationality, without family honour, without a name to preserve. The great Corso which traversed the city was like a theatre, in which, all day long, rolled the waves of a population empty, frivolous, fickle, turbulent, sometimes witty, absorbed in songs, parodies, pleasantries, and impertinences of every description."

Let us retrace our steps a little in order to link up Paul's movements with this city of Antioch.

In Acts ix. we find that on two occasions Paul's life was at stake, and that although he spoke boldly in the name of the Lord at Jerusalem, he was persuaded to go back to his home at Tarsus. On the surface and lacking further explanation, this circumstance might lie open to question. Did Paul's courage give way? Did he too easily allow himself to be persuaded to seek refuge in Tarsus? Would it not have been more to his credit if he had braved the storm by continuing to witness at Jerusalem? All that we know of that ardent soul leads us to suppose that he would have so stayed. Yet he retired into obscurity. There is however full and legitimate explanation, though it does not come to light until the twenty-second chapter of Acts is reached.

> "And it came to pass that, when I was come again to Jerusalem, even while I prayed in the temple, I was in a trance: and saw Him saying unto me, Make haste, and get thee quickly out of Jerusalem: for they will not receive thy testimony concerning me. And I said, Lord, they know that I imprisoned and beat in every synagogue them that believed on Thee: and when the blood of Thy martyr Stephen was shed, I also was standing by, and consenting unto his death, and kept the raiment of them that slew him. And He said unto me, Depart: for I will send thee far hence unto the Gentiles" (Acts xxii. 17-21).

This is the Paul we know and love. At any cost he wished to remain in the place where he had sought so hard to destroy the faith; but this might have savoured of more heroics and the Lord had greater work for this chosen vessel; therefore, disregarding the misunderstanding to which his action might lay him open, he returns to Tarsus, to abide the call that he knows must surely come.

We learn that as a result of the persecution that arose about Stephen, many "traveled as far as Phenice" (a harbour on the south of Crete), "And Cyprus" (an island on the East coast of Cilicia in the Mediterranean), "and Antioch, preaching the word to none but unto the Jews only" (Acts xi. 19). Some of the men who traveled thus far, were men of Cyrene, a city of Lybia, in North Africa, and these, when they came to Antioch, spake unto the Grecians, preaching the Lord Jesus (Acts xi. 20). There is a difference of opinion among experts as to the true reading here. The Received Text reads Hellenistes, and means Greek-speaking Jews. The Revised Text reads Hellenes, Greeks, that is uncircumcised Gentiles. It is almost impossible to decide which is the true reading. Let us consider the alternative readings and their bearing on the narrative.

First, the Received Text Hellenistes, "Greek-speaking Jews". Almost without exception, this is the reading of B, D, E, G, H, and the cursive MSS. Supporting this reading is the statement of James in Acts xv. 14. "Simeon hath declared how God at the first did visit the Gentiles." For if these at Antioch were "Gentiles" Peter could hardly have been called "the first". To this may be added Peter's own testimony "That the Gentiles by my mouth should hear the word of the gospel" (Acts xv. 7).

While in their sequence in the sacred page verses 19 and 20 of Acts xi. follow the narrative concerning Cornelius, the events they describe occurred at a much earlier period, when the persecution arose about Stephen. This was before the conversion of Paul. At first these scattered believers limited their ministry "to Jews only", but later, certain men from Cyrene and Cyprus evangelized the Greek-speaking Jews, the Grecians. Stephen had been martyred largely at the instigation of Hellenistes, or Greek-speaking Jews (Acts vi. 9), and it was the same class that plotted the assassination of Paul after his conversion (Acts ix. 29). It would therefore be a signal triumph of the gospel for a great company of these Greek-speaking Jews to be brought to acknowledge the Lord. The fact that Barnabas was cognizant of the Grecian plot against the life of the apostle makes it doubly interesting that he should seek Saul and bring him back from Tarsus to Antioch.

Second, the Revised Text: The margin of the R.V. reminds the reader that while "Greeks" is placed in the text, many ancient authorities read "Grecian Jews". The main arguments in favour of the Reviser's reading are (1) The trend of the narrative rather leads us to expect an added triumph, yet it would make no point if these conversions at Antioch were merely among the Jewish population. (2) The conversion of a number of Greek-speaking Jews at Antioch would not have excited special notice, nor necessitated that special mission of Barnabas.

> "The entire context, therefore, conclusively proves that Hellenes, 'Greeks', is the right reading, and it has accordingly been received into the text in spite of external evidence against it by all the best editors" (Farrar).

But we should not be content to introduce a reading into the text because of the deductions of commentators. Our first concern is to ascertain what is written in the Scriptures, and then to seek explanation. If we are to allow our opinion as to the fitness of a rendering to override evidences, where will it lead us? Our own conclusion is that the ministry of the dispersion at Antioch did not go so far as the inclusion of the uncircumcised Gentile, and that as there had already arisen grave troubles at Jerusalem on account of the conversion of the "Grecians", those in authority made no delay in sending Barnabas, "a good man" (Acts xi. 24), and one most likely to conciliate where friction might occur.

When Barnabas had studied the situation at Antioch, he seems to have felt that the case demanded something freer and less cramped than any ministry that might be expected to emanate from Jerusalem: someone of the stamp of the martyred Stephen was needed. Immediately there would come to his mind Saul of Tarsus. Without hesitation he traveled north, and not without difficulty, as the original indicates he found Saul.

Twice, therefore, the Gentile church is indebted to Barnabas for bringing the apostle Paul forward.

A whole year passed while Paul and Barnabas taught much people. The results seem to have crystallized in the emergence of the new name of, "Christian". "And the disciples were called Christians first at Antioch" (Acts xi. 26).

The word "Christ" is the Greek translation of the Hebrew word "Messiah". To the Greek mind it meant little or nothing. We have historical evidence that the Romans mixed up the title "Christos" with "Chrestus", for the decree expelling the Jews from Rome by Claudius (Acts xviii. 2) uses the term, and Chrestianus is common in inscriptions. It is most unlikely that the Jews would have given the title to the hated heretics. To do so would have meant the dragging of the very name of the Messiah in the mud of the street. The term used by the Jews was "the sect of the Nazarenes" (Acts xxiv. 5). They were more likely to perpetuate the reproach of the name of "Christian". The word "Christian" is a Greek rendering of a Hebrew word with a Latin termination, foreshadowing the worldwide movement to be associated with Antioch and the ministry of Paul. There is abundant evidence that the termination is Roman. We have such names as Cæsariani, Pompeiani, Ciceroniani, etc., etc.

Ignatius wrote:--

> "Whosoever is called by any other name than this of Christian is not of God, and it is our duty not only to be so called, but to be."

Gregory Nazian said:--

> "I honoured Peter, but I am not called Petrianus; I know Paul, but I am not called Paulianus. I will not consent to be named of men, having been born of God. If I worshipped a creature I should not be a Christian. For why is the name of Christian precious? Because Christ is God."

The Antiochians were noted for inventing names of ridicule, (see Julian Misopogon, where he answers their insults regarding his beard, and what Zozimus says of his emperor's visit, iii. II page 140), and there is every reason to believe that this epoch-making name originated in the darkened wit of some loose living Antiochene. But there is another side of the matter. Not even the wit of Antioch could have invented the name of "Christian" had there been no material upon which to work. That material was most certainly provided by the ministry of Paul. The first record of Paul's public witness is given in Acts ix., where we read:

> "And straightway in the synagogues he proclaimed Jesus that He is the Son of God . . . . . proving that this is the Christ" (Acts ix. 20, 22).

Later in Acts xvii. we learn that this was his usual procedure;--

> "And Paul, as his manner was, went in unto them, and three Sabbath days reasoned with them of the Scriptures . . . . . that this Jesus, Whom, said he, I proclaim unto you is the Christ" (Acts xvii. 2, 3).

Paul's preaching left so strong an impression on the mind of Luke that instead of writing "this Jesus, Whom he preached", a normal method of recording a past event, he records the actual words of Paul: and the Revisers, perceiving this, have inserted the words, "said he". At Corinth we have the same insistence:--

> "Paul was constrained by the word, testifying to the Jews, that Jesus was the Christ" (Acts xviii. 5 R.V.).

The Person and work of Christ are the glory of Paul's epistles, and we can easily imagine that this blessed title, and the repeated insistence upon its meaning and worth, soon became associated with the little gathering at Antioch.

Reference is made at the close of Acts xi. to Claudius, and in chapter xii. to the death of Herod. As these references enable us to fix the date of Acts xii. with reasonable accuracy we will deal with them here, in order that the way may be left clear for the commencement of our study of the ministry of Paul in Acts xiii.

There is ample confirmation of the accuracy of the record that a famine befell the inhabitants of Judæa in the reign of Claudius. In his Antiquities, Josephus refers to it in three places, namely, iii. 15, 3; xx. 2, 5; and 5, 2. Acts xii. records the tragic death of Herod, and Josephus gives us a vivid description of his dreadful end.

We further learn for Josephus that Herod Agrippa died on 6th August, A.D.44, in the fifty-third year of his age, and in the seventh of his reign, having reigned four years under Caligula, and three years under Claudius.

> "Now when Agrippa had reigned three years over Judæa, he came to the city of Cæsarea, which was formerly called Strabo's tower; and there he exhibited shows in honour of Cæsar, upon his being informed that there was a certain festival celebrated to make vows for his safety."

Claudius had just returned from completing the conquest of Britain. His son received the name Britannicus in honour of this acquisition to the Empire. The date of the return to Rome from Britain was January, A.D.44, and the festival held at Cæsarea "for his safety", during which Herod died, enables us to fix the date of Acts xii. Accordingly we close this article with the following diagram which shows the Acts of the Apostles in relation to secular dates.

#20. The intimate association of Paul's epistles with the Acts of the Apostles. A preliminary study to the second section of the Acts.

pp. 64 - 69

The opening verse of the Acts, suggests that in that narrative intends to give a record of the things "that Jesus" continued "to do and teach" after His ascension. While Peter and Paul, Barnabas and Philip may be the active agents, they are but agents, the true Actor and Teacher throughout the record being Christ Himself.

We must remember that the record called "The Acts of the Apostles", did not exist as we have it until the items recorded were past history. If the fact that Paul founded the churches of Galatia is a part of the acts of the apostles, does it not follow that the epistle to the Galatians is an integral part of the acts? True, Luke does not mention the epistles, but he had no need to, for they were contemporaneous with and supplementary to the history he wrote. Seeing that Paul's visit to Thessalonica is recorded in Acts xvii. and his visit to Corinth in Acts xviii., it is not gain but loss to segregate the epistles to the Thessalonians or the Corinthians, and not allow them full place in the Acts. To assert that Paul in one set of his acts could teach one thing, and in the epistles written during the same period and to the same churches, another, is manifestly inaccurate, and therefore unacceptable to lovers of Truth. For us there is but one deciding voice in all these matters, and that is the actual testimony of the Scriptures themselves. Accordingly we set out below references to the Acts made by the apostle in his epistles, and by their testimony we shall abide.

When the time comes for examination of the chronology of the epistles written during the Acts, we shall put forward evidence that goes to show that Galatians was written first. As however that evidence has yet to be adduced, we will follow the order of the epistles in the A.V. and commence with Romans, though every student knows it was written last of this series of epistles.

Romans and The Acts.

EPISTLE.—"Paul, a servant of Jesus Christ, called to be an apostle, separated unto the gospel of God" (Rom. i. 1).

ACTS.—"Separate Me Barnabas and Saul" (Acts xiii. 2).

EPISTLE.—"Now I would not have you ignorant, brethren, that oftentimes I purposed to come unto you (but have been let hitherto), that I might have some fruit among you also, even as among other Gentiles" (Rom. i. 13).

"But now having no more place in these parts, and having a great desire these many years to come unto you; whensoever I take my journey unto Spain, I will come to you . . . . . When therefore I have performed this, and have sealed to them this fruit, I will come by you unto Spain" (Rom. xv. 23, 24, 28).

ACTS.—"After these things were ended, Paul purposed in the spirit, when he had passed through Macedonia and Achaia, to go to Jerusalem, saying, After I have been there, I must also see Rome" (Acts xix. 21).

EPISTLE.—"For I will not dare to speak of any of those things which Christ hath not wrought by me, to make the Gentiles obedient, by word and deed, through mighty signs and wonders, by the power of the Spirit of God; so that from Jerusalem, and round about unto Illyricum, I have fully preached the gospel of Christ" (Rom. xv. 18, 19).

ACTS.—"And when he had saluted them, he declared particularly what things God had wrought among the Gentiles by his ministry" (Acts xxi. 19).

"And God wrought special miracles by the hands of Paul" (Acts xix. 11).

"He departed for to go into Macedonia. And when he had gone over these parts" (note the map. Illyricum was contiguous with Macedonia), "and had given them much exhortation, he came into Greece" (Acts xx. 1, 2).

EPISTLE.—"Now I beseech you, brethren, for the Lord Jesus Christ's sake, and for the love of the Spirit, that ye strive together with me in your prayers to God for me; that I may delivered from them that do not believe in Judæa; and that my service which I have for Jerusalem may be accepted of the saints" (Rom. xv. 30, 31).

ACTS.—"And when we were come to Jerusalem, the brethren received us gladly . . . . . they said unto him . . . . . they are informed of thee, that thou teachest all the Jews which are among the Gentiles to forsake Moses . . . . . This is the man that teacheth all men everywhere against the people . . . . . they took Paul, and drew him out of the temple" (Acts xxi. 17-30).

EPISTLE.—"Greet Priscilla and Aquila" (Rom. xvi. 3).

"Timotheus my work-fellow and Lucius, and Jason and Sosipater, my kinsmen, salute you" (Rom. xvi. 21).

"Erastus the chamberlain of the city, saluteth you" (Rom. xvi. 23).

ACTS.—"After these things Paul departed from Athens and came to Corinth; and found a certain Jew named Aquila, born in Pontus, lately come from Italy, with his wife Priscilla" (Acts xviii. 1, 2).

"He sent into Macedonia two of them that ministered unto him, Timotheus and Erastus" (Acts xix. 22).

"Now there were in the church that was at Antioch certain prophets and teachers: as . . . . . Lucius of Cyrene" (Acts xiii. 1).

"The Jews . . . . . set all the city on an uproar, and assaulted the house of Jason" (Acts xvii. 5).

It is evident that the apostle had no intention of keeping the epistle to the Romans distinct from his other acts, but sought rather to interest them in the movement that was everywhere around them, and of which they and he formed an integral part. The epistle to the Romans therefore must be studied together with the Acts. Any attempt to divorce them should be looked upon with suspicion, especially when an attempt is made to teach one aspect of hope from the Acts, and another from the epistles of the very same period.

I Corinthians and the Acts.

EPISTLE.—"Paul, called to be an apostle of Jesus Christ through the will of God, and Sosthenes our brother, unto the church of God which is at Corinth" (I Cor. i. 1, 2).

ACTS.—"After these things Paul departed from Athens, and came to Corinth . . . . . Then all the Greeks took Sosthenes, the chief ruler of the synagogue, and beat him before the judgment seat" (Acts xviii. 1, 17).

EPISTLE.—"Now this I say, that every one of you saith, I am of Paul; and I of Apollos" (I Cor. i. 12).

"Who then is Paul, and who is Apollos, but ministers by whom ye believed . . . . . I have planted, Apollos watered; but God gave the increase" (I Cor. iii. 5, 6).

ACTS.—"A certain Jew named Apollos, born at Alexandria, an eloquent man, and mighty in the Scriptures, came to Ephesus . . . . . And when he was disposed to pass into Achaia (Corinth was the capital. See also I Cor. xvi. 15), the brethren wrote, exhorting the disciples to receive him: who, when he was come, helped them much which had believed through grace" (Acts xviii. 24, 27).

EPISTLE.—"I thank God that I baptized none of you, but Crispus and Gaius" (I Cor. i. 14).

ACTS.—"And Crispus, the chief ruler of the synagogue, believed on the Lord with all his house; and many of the Corinthians hearing, believed, and were baptized" (Acts xviii. 8).

The reader will find many other allusions to the Acts, but the above are enough for our present purpose. The epistles of Paul are surely a part of his acts. Why rule them out? If, then, as we have shown, I Corinthians reveals many links with the Acts, it will be superfluous to "prove" anything regarding II Corinthians. Both epistles go together. Accordingly we pass on:

Galatians and the Acts.

EPISTLE.—"Ye have heard of my conversation in time past in the Jews' religion, how that beyond measure I persecuted the church of God and wasted it" (The R.V. translates it "made havoc") (Gal. i. 13).

ACTS.—"As for Saul he made havoc" (R.V. translates "laid waste") "of the church" (Acts viii. 3).

EPISTLE.—"I profited in the Jews' religion above many my equals in mine own nation, being more exceeding zealous of the traditions of my fathers" (Gal. i. 14).

ACTS.—"I am verily a man which am a Jew, born in Tarsus, a city of Cilicia, yet brought up in this city at the feet of Gamaliel, and taught according to the perfect manner of the law of the fathers; and was zealous toward God, as ye all are this day" (Acts xxii. 3).

EPISTLE.—"When Peter was come to Antioch, I withstood him to the fact, because he was to be blamed . . . . . and the other Jews dissembled likewise with him; insomuch that Barnabas also was carried away with their dissimulation" (Gal. ii. 11, 13).

ACTS.—"Then departed Barnabas to Tarsus, for to seek Saul, and when he had found him, he brought him unto Antioch. And it came to pass that a whole year they assembled themselves with the church" (Acts xi. 25, 26).

EPISTLE.—"Then fourteen years after I went up again to Jerusalem with Barnabas, and took Titus with me also. And I went up by revelation, and communicated unto them that gospel which I preach among the Gentiles . . . . . but neither Titus, who was with me, being a Greek, was compelled to be circumcised . . . . . Why compellest thou the Gentiles to Judaize?" (Gal. ii. 1, 2, 3, 14).

ACTS.—"And certain men which came down from Judæa, taught the brethren saying, Except ye be circumcised after the manner of Moses, ye cannot be saved. When therefore Paul and Barnabas had no small dissension and disputation with them, they determined that Paul and Barnabas, and certain other of them, should go up to Jerusalem unto the apostles and elders about this question" (Acts xv. 1, 2).

EPISTLE.—"That no man is justified by the law in the sight of God, it is evident: for, The just shall live by faith" (Gal. iii. 11).

"Christ is become of no effect unto you, whosoever of you are justified by the law" (Gal. v. 4).

ACTS.—"And by Him all that believe are justified from all things, from which ye could not be justified by the law of Moses" (Acts xiii. 39).

The epistle to the Galatians abounds with links that associate its teaching with the Acts. We have not forgotten the problems that await us in the parallel passages Acts xv. and Gal. ii., but that they are parallel, if not identical, calls for no further proof.

I Thessalonians and the Acts.

EPISTLE.—"Paul, and Silvanus, and Timotheus" (I Thess. i. 1).

ACTS.—"At midnight Paul and Silas prayed . . . . . they came to Thessalonica" (Acts xvi. 25 and xvii. 1).

EPISTLE.—"For yourselves, brethren, know our entrance in unto you, that it was not in vain; but even after that we had suffered before, and were shamefully entreated as ye know, at Philippi, we were bold in our God to speak unto you the gospel of God with much contention" (I Thess. ii. 1, 2).

ACTS.—"And when they had laid many stripes upon them, they cast them into prison, charging the jailor to keep them safely" (Acts xvi. 23).

EPISTLE.—"For verily, when we were with you, we told you before that we should suffer tribulation; even as it came to pass, and ye know" (I Thess. iii. 4).

ACTS.—"The Jews . . . . . set all the city on an uproar, and assaulted the house of Jason . . . . . crying, these that have turned the world upside down, are come hither also" (Acts xvii. 5, 6).

There are other allusions to the Acts, in I Thessalonians ii. and iii., but the above are sufficient for our purpose. As with II Corinthians so with II Thessalonians, to establish the relationship of the first epistle establishes also the relation of the second. For our present purpose we are not concerned to prove the association of Hebrews with the Acts, because that epistle lies outside Paul's ministry to the Gentiles, and no good purpose will be served by merely multiplying evidence.

Following the apostle's example where he sometimes uses the objections of an imaginary opponent, we remind ourselves of the fact that there is no evidence to prove that the title "The Acts of the Apostles" is inspired. This is true, and although we have used it to emphasize the fact that there could be no book until the "acts" recorded therein were finished, and that, for instance, the epistle written to the Corinthians was most certainly as important an "act" of Paul as those recorded in chapter xviii. of the Acts, our argument is in no wise impaired should this narrative be called by any other name. The writer himself compares it with a "former treatise" in which he had recorded "all that Jesus began to do and teach", and the implication is that "the Acts" is a second treatise of all that Jesus continued to do and teach, after His ascension. This strengthens our argument, for the epistles of Paul make frequent reference to the fact that, though Paul is writing, the doctrine of which he writes was received by revelation. Christ still teaches in the epistles of Paul, and to omit them from a narrative that sets out to record "all" that the ascended Lord "continued" to do and teach, would be a calamity. Our argument depends not upon the title of the book but upon its purpose. It is a strange mentality that can talk of the Acts as though it were an independent fact, altogether separated from the epistolary activities of the same apostle, ministering to the same churches, at the same time as that with which the record deals.

We append a chart that may be useful in visualizing this interdependence of Acts and Epistles, and this chart must be looked upon as a supplement to the one published in Volume XXV page 8.

#21. The twofold ministry of Paul (xiii.-xxviii.).
pp. 104 - 108

In the opening article of this series, appearing in Volume XXIV, page 1, we set out the structure of the book of the Acts as a whole, and found it to be sub-divided as follows:

(1) THE FORMER TREATISE . . . . . Acts i. 1-14.
(2) THE PRESENT TEATISE . . . . . Acts i. 15 - xxviii. 31.

The present treatise, we found, fell under two heads:

(1) THE MINISTRY OF PETER . . . . . Acts i. 15 - xii. 23.
(2) THE MINISTRY OF PAUL . . . . . Acts xii. 24 - xxviii. 31.

Having arrived at Acts xiii., we must look at this second portion of the present treatise as a whole, when, again, we find that it, too, falls under two heads, namely the twofold ministry of the one apostle Paul.

We draw the reader's attention to a necessary modification of the structure given on page 3 of Volume XXIV. Instead of section C referring to Paul's ministry independently of the twelve, ending with xiv. 28, it should end with xv. 39, and section D, referring to Paul's ministry with the twelve, should open with xvi. 6. This slight alteration is necessary in order to include the whole of the early Galatian controversy, chapters xiii.-xvi. 5, as one whole. Otherwise the general arrangement remains unaltered.

Acts xii. 24 - xxviii. 31.
The Twofold Ministry of Paul.

A | ANTIOCH. xii. 24 - xvi. 5.
"The Holy Ghost said." |
A JEW withstands gospel. Stricken with blindness.
A GENTILE (Paulus) believes.
PAUL, "After reading of law and the prophets", "Say on".
Warning.—"Beware lest that come upon you which is spoken in the prophets."
Paul's independent ministry foreshadows xxviii. 17-31. |
Result.—"Lo, we turn to the Gentiles."
Conclusion.—"the word published throughout all the region."
"The door of faith opened unto the Gentiles."

B | PAUL'S MINISTRY AFTER SEPARATING FROM THE SYNAGOGUE.
"I must also see Rome" (xix. 21). |

C | xix. 21-41. TEMPLE AT EPHESUS. |
Uproar at Ephesus.
Temple of Diana, scene of trouble.
Paul not allowed to enter the theatre.
Intervention of town clerk.
Not blasphemous.
Danger of being called in question for unlawful attitude.

"So must thou bear witness also at Rome" (xxiii. 11).

C | xxi. 27 - xxiii. 22. TEMPLE AT JERUSALEM. |
Uproar at Jerusalem.
Temple of the Lord, scene of trouble.
Intervention of Roman Captain.
Charge of polluting holy place.
Paul permitted to stand on stairs.
Is it lawful to scourge a Roman?
Take heed what you do.
Caesarea to Rome. Felix, Festus, Agrippa.

B | PAUL'S MINISTRY DURING DETENTION BY ROMANS.
xxiii. 23-xxviii. 16

A | ROME. xxviii. 17-31.
"Well spake the Holy Ghost." |
The JEWS believe not, and blindness comes on them.
The GENTILE now the object of salvation.
PAUL, "The law of Moses and the prophets", "Be it known unto you".
Warning.—What the prophet threatened now comes to pass.
Paul's prison ministry foreshadowed xiii., xiv. |
Result.—Two whole years unrestrained ministry to all that come to him.

At Antioch occurs the separation of Barnabas and Paul, and several features of this opening ministry fore-shadow the close of the Acts. For example: Paul's first miracle contrasts with Peter's first miracle. Peter heals a Jew; Paul blinds a Jew. This Jew withstands the truth, and a Gentile, who bears the same name as the apostle, believes. Resulting from the opposition of the Jews at Antioch, there is a local turning from the Jew to the Gentile and Paul utters that word of warning which anticipates the dreadful quotation of Isa. vi., with which the Jew was set aside in Acts xxviii. At the close of chapter xiii. we read:

> "And the word of the Lord was published throughout all the region" (Acts xii. 49).

and at the close of chapter xiv. we read:

> "And when they were come, and had gathered the church together, they rehearsed all that God had done with them, and how He had opened the door of faith unto the Gentiles" (Acts xiv. 27).

There is a very remarkable contrast found in Acts xiii. and Acts xxviii.

> "But the Jews stirred up the devout and honourable women, and the chief men of the city, and raised persecution against Paul and Barnabas, and expelled them out of their coasts" (Acts xiii. 50).

In contrast with this action of the devout, the honourable, and the chief men, let us read Acts xxviii.:

> "And the barbarous people shewed us no little kindness: for they kindled a fire, and received us every one, because of the present rain, and because of the cold . . . . . In the same quarters were possessions of the chief man of the island, whose name was Publius; who received us, and lodged us three days courteously" (Acts xxviii. 2 and 7).

It is encouraging to observe the record of the Holy Spirit in these matters; the names of the "devout", the "honourable" and the "chief", who expelled Paul, have gone down into oblivion, but wherever the Scriptures are read, the name of Publius is recorded with gratitude.

The ministry commencing at Antioch finds its sequel in the conflict concerning the status of the uncircumcised believing Gentile and the imposition of the decrees. This, as we shall see, constituted the middle wall of partition between the two parties in the early church. The next section commences at Acts xv. 40. Except to call attention to the fact that the synagogue was the centre of this witness, we have given no details of these chapters. In them comes the vision of the man of Macedonia and the consequent preaching of the gospel in Europe for the first time. Here also is the record of Paul's visit to and testimony at Athens, and the beginning of the fellowship between Paul and Aquila and Priscilla. Acts xix. 21 evidently constitutes a fresh section, for the words "after these things were ended" seem to imply a new movement. It is precisely here that the narrative records the fact that the synagogue was visited for the last time (xix. 8), and that the disciples were separated, and met subsequently in the school of Tyrannus. Thus anther link with Jerusalem and the Jew was snapped. Here, such is the evident comparison intended between the uproar caused at the Ephesian Temple and the uproar caused at the Temple at Jerusalem, that we give a few details.

The relation of these two sections is, moreover, strengthened when we observe that it was "the Jews which were of Asia" (Acts xxi. 27) that stirred up the people, and that the uproar arose over "Trophimus an Ephesian" (Acts xxi. 29). While the Temple of Diana at Ephesus was the shrine of an idol, and the Temple at Jerusalem was the Temple of the Lord, yet the inspired narrative seems to place them over against one another, as much as to say that, in spirit, there was now little to choose between them. The action of the Town Clerk, the Roman Captain, and other parallels, will speak for themselves.

For the time being we have left the central section, xx. 1 - xxi. 26, undeveloped. In it are recorded journeys made from Macedonia to Jerusalem, and also that, at Miletus, the apostle made known that a new ministry, associated with prison, awaited him (Acts xx. 17-38). Most significant, also is the fact, that at the opening of this division, Paul expressed the desire "to see Rome" (Acts xix. 21); and at the close, at Jerusalem, the Lord stood by the apostle and said:

> "Be of good cheer, Paul; for as thou hast testified of me in Jerusalem, so must thou bear witness also at Rome" (Acts xxiii. 11).

The third sub-division B xxiii. 23 - xxviii. 16, is concerned with the various trials of the apostle under Felix, Festus and Agrippa, and ends with the shipwreck at Melita, and the eventual arrival at Rome.

The reader is earnestly requested to make the outline of this important part of Scripture his own. Let him remember that the time and trouble which he takes in checking the references and seeing "whether it is so" must necessarily be small when compared with the time and patience expended in discovering the outline at the first. This we have gladly done, giving the results freely, and we therefore feel that we can, without apology, ask all readers to give it more than a passing glance, for this part of the Acts is most important to us as believers of the Gentiles. It was during this period that the apostle made known the great foundation of justification by faith, upon which the truth of the mystery was subsequently to rest. The dispensation of the mystery was not given to Paul, nor did he make known that new revelation, until the Jew was set aside. Consequently the earlier epistles know nothing of it. Nevertheless, however high the building may be; however it may soar into heavenly places; it must rest solidly upon a good foundation, and it is in the Epistle to the Romans that that foundation is laid. There are dispensational features in Romans that have been superseded by others, more glorious, but Redemption, Righteousness and Resurrection remain the three R's, whether of Galatians and the opening of Paul's ministry, Ephesians in its highest glory, or II Timothy at its close.

#22. The first missionary journey (xiii. - xvi. 5). "Separate Me Barnabas and Saul."

pp. 146 - 151

We generally speak of Acts xiii. as being the commencement of the apostle Paul's great ministry, but if the details are examined we shall be reminded that, actually, this new ministry starts earlier, namely at xi. 22, and, for a time, overlaps the ministry of Peter. A feature of the Acts already noted helps to confirm this. We refer to the recurrence of divine comment at different points of the narrative. This we exhibit so that the reader may be provided with all possible means of Berean-like study.

Geographical.	Theme.	Ministry.	Summary.
i. 1 - ii. 46. JERUSALEM. Jews only.	Commission of the Twelve. Pentecost.	Peter and the Twelve.	ii. 46, 47. "And the Lord added those that were to be saved" (See J. N. Darby's New Translation).
iii. 1 - vi. 6. JERUSALEM.	Dispensational miracle. Hellenists come forward.	Peter and John. The seven Deacons.	vi. 7. "And the Word of God increased, and the number of the disciples multiplied IN JERUSALEM greatly; and a great company of the priests were obedient to the faith."
vi. 8 - ix. 30. Samaria. Damascus.	Stephen's witness and martyrdom. Philip's witness to Samaritans and Ethiopians. Saul's persecution and conversion.	Stephen, Philip, Peter and John. Saul.	ix. 51. "Then had the churches rest throughout all JUDÆA and GALILEE and SAMARIA, and were edified; and walking in the fear of the Lord, and in the comfort of the Holy Ghost, were multiplied."
ix. 32 - xi. 20. Cæsarea.	Cornelius and Hellenists evangelized.	Peter and those scattered at persecution.	xi. 21. "And the hand of the Lord was with them, and a great number believed, and turned to the Lord."

END OF ACTS OF PETER.

BEGINNING OF ACTS OF PAUL.

xi. 22 - xii. 23. ANTIOCH. Jews, Hellenists and Gentiles.	Development in Antioch suggests that Saul be sought. Herod kills James and is himself smitten.	Barnabas and Saul.	xii. 24. "But the Word of God grew and multiplied."
xii. 25 - xvi. 4. Asia Minor.	Saul separated. Dispensational miracle. First missionary journey. Defends gospel of uncircumcision.	Paul, Barnabas, Silas and Timothy.	xvi. 5. "And so were the churches established in the faith and increased in number daily."
xvi. 6 - xix. 19. Europe.	Paul enters Europe; founds churches. Second and Third missionary journey.	Paul, Timothy and Silas, Aquila, Priscilla and Apollos.	xix. 20. "So mightily grew the Word of God and prevailed"
xix. 21 - xxviii. 30. ROME. Gentiles only.	"I must see Rome" and "Spain". Paul a prisoner. First ministry finished. Looking forward to the new ministry. Taken to Rome. Israel set aside.	Paul.	xxviii. 31. "Preaching the kingdom of God, and teaching those things which concern the Lord Jesus Christ, with all confidence, no man forbidding him."

It will be seen from this tabulation that Acts xii. 24, 25 must be included in the new section of the Acts, which reveals the growth of the Word, in spite of Herod's actions, which are those of a potential antichrist (Acts xii. 20-22). Barnabas and Saul returned from Jerusalem, and took with them "John, whose surname was Mark" (Acts xii. 25). This disciple's mother was Mary, to whose house Peter made his way after being liberated from prison by the angel (Acts xii. 12). John Mark was the minister of Barnabas and Saul when they sailed from Antioch on their first missionary journey (Acts xiii. 5). But at Perga in Phamphylia he parted from them and returned to Jerusalem. Col. iv. 10 informs us that John Mark was "sister's son", or "cousin" (R.V.) to Barnabas, and it would seem that this blood relationship may have prevented Barnabas from viewing Paul's objection dispassionately, which led to the separation of Barnabas and Paul on the threshold of the new journey into Europe (Acts xv. 37-39). Nevertheless it is good to record, not only for John Mark's sake, but also for the sake of the apostle who once had refused his further services, that, later, Paul could write:

> "Take Mark, and bring him with thee: for he is profitable to me for the ministry" (II Tim. iv. 11).

These gracious words were said to one who had been called to the Lord's service almost immediately after the defection of Barnabas, and would have the effect of silencing discouraging criticism. The apostle mentions "Marcus" (exactly the same name as "Mark") in Philemon 24, and Peter calls Marcus his "son" in I Pet. v. 13. Whether these references are to the same man we cannot tell, nor can any affirm whether or not "John Mark" is the writer of the "Gospel according to Mark". Tradition has it that John

Mark is the Evangelist Mark, but there is no evidence on this point. It is not clear why one who served both at the beginning and the close of Paul's ministry should be the "interpreter", as Mark is called by Peter, but again, that does not constitute evidence on either side.

This introduction leads us to Antioch and the movement that commenced there. It is with this that we are concerned, and so we pass on.

Acts xii. 24 - xvi. 5.
Justification by faith.

A | xii. 24. "But the word of God grew and multiplied."
B | xii. 25. | a | Barnabas and Saul.
b | John Mark taken with them.
C | xiii. 1-3. Barnabas and Saul "separated" by the Holy Ghost.
D | xiii. 4 - xiv. 28. |
c1 | Departure from Antioch.
d1 | Justification by faith apart from law of Moses.
c1 | Return to Antioch.
D | xv. 1-35. |
c2 | Men from Judæa raise the question.
d2 | Except ye be circumcised after the manner Moses, ye cannot be saved.
c2 | Men that had hazarded their lives for the Lord Jesus bring the answer.
B | xv. 36-39. | a | Barnabas and Saul.
b | John Mark taken to Cyprus.
C | xv. 40 - xvi. 4. Saul and Timothy approved by the brethren (xv. 26, 27 and xvi. 2).
A | xvi. 5. "And so were the churches established in the faith, and increased in number daily."

At its opening Paul's ministry circled round a statement of truth and a conflict for that truth. The statement was the glorious doctrine of justification by faith (xiii. 39): the conflict was the fight against the Judaism which imposed law and circumcision as necessary to salvation. We are therefore to become witnesses of one of the most important controversies that the world has known; a controversy ever fresh in its applications; a fight for the faith in which we are called upon to engage to this day.

By this time the church at Antioch had been established for at least a year (Acts xi. 26), and the two men who played so prominent a part in its inception and upbuilding were present among the prophets and teachers there assembled (Acts xiii. 1). The passage concerning the apostle's namesake would probably flash across his mind: "Is Saul also among the prophets?" (I Sam. x. 11, 12; xix. 24); and, if it did, we can well imagine his prayer for grace to finish his course, and not turn aside in the tragic manner of his namesake. He would probably remember that Saul had persecuted David, even as he had persecuted the Lord.

We observe that Barnabas stands first and Saul last in the list of prophets and teachers given in Acts xiii. 1. That order was soon to be reversed, but it is encouraging to remember that the great apostle Paul himself knew a few years' discipline before he became competent for the fight.

We know practically nothing of Simeon, that was called Niger, nor of Lucius of Cyrene. Manaen is of interest seeing that he was foster brother of Herod the Tetrarch. Both were children nourished at the same breast (suntrophos), yet one is found numbered with the prophets, while the other killed one of the greatest of prophets, and was banished in A.D.41.

> "As they ministered to the Lord and fasted, the Holy Ghost said, Separate Me Barnabas and Saul for the work whereunto I have called them" (Acts xiii. 2).

The words "I have called" (proskeklemai) are the perfect passive of proskaleo, and indicate that the call had already been given to Barnabas and Saul, and was now to be put into effect. Hitherto the title of apostle had not been used of either Barnabas or Saul, but from this time onward it became theirs. "When the apostles, Barnabas and Paul heard" (Acts xiv. 14). Paul had been chosen as an apostle on the road to Damascus: "Unto whom now I send (apostello) thee" (Acts xxvi. 16-18). As he tells us, he had already been "separated from his mother's womb" (Gal. i. 15). Yet he needed more than this commission and separation fully to qualify him for the service. This confirmation was now added. The Holy Ghost called upon the assembled church to "separate Me, Barnabas and Saul". The particle de is not translated in either the A.V. or the R.V. Weymouth's translation reads:

> "Set apart for Me, now at once, Barnabas and Saul. When therefore the brethren had fasted and prayed, and laid their hands on them, they sent them away" (Acts xiii. 2, 3).

While there are passages in the Acts that show that the gift of holy spirit was conferred by the laying on of hands, it is not always so. For example, Stephen was a man "full of the Holy Ghost", yet the apostles laid their hands on him (Acts vi. 5, 6), and there is no suggestion that any gift was conferred upon Barnabas and Saul on this occasion. It seems rather to have been a means of expressing hearty agreement with their call to service, and is actually explained in the words of Acts xiv. 26, "recommended to the grace of God for the work". The apostle evidently referred to this occasion when he wrote:

> "Paul, a servant of Jesus Christ, called to be an apostle, separated unto the gospel of God" (Rom. i. 1).

The first step taken by the apostles Barnabas and Saul for the evangelization of the Gentiles is now recorded:

> "So they, being sent forth by the Holy Ghost, departed unto Seleucia: and from thence they sailed to Cyprus" (Acts xiii. 4).

Barnabas was of the country of Cyprus (Acts iv. 36) and after the rupture with Paul he took John Mark with him back to Cyprus (Acts xv. 39). While, as in the case of Barnabas and John Mark, family affection may sometimes prove a hindrance to spiritual work, there is no reason, in itself, why it should not be a help. So in the decision to make Cyprus the first sphere of labour, love of country may have had some weight.

The great mission had now been launched, and the course set. In our next article we shall be free to take up the record of the ministry accomplished on this island and to learn its most important dispensational lesson.

#23. The first missionary journey (xiii. - xvi. 5). Saul, who also is called Paul.

pp. 184 - 188

As the little vessel leaves the shores of Syria carrying, on their great adventure, the two emissaries of a despised faith, what insignificant persons must they have appeared. There seems to have been no "send off", except that lowly one in the atmosphere of prayer and fasting (Acts xiii. 3). As they traversed the miles of sea, slowly reducing the distance from the place of their initial ministry, there could have been little realization of the tremendous issues that hung, humanly speaking, upon their faithfulness and courage.

The strongest might have felt the task too great: still more such a man as Paul. His bodily presence is described by the Corinthians as "weak" and as we hope to prove, he reminds the Galatians that he was with them on this very journey, during a bout of sickness (Gal. iv. 13). Before the journey is accomplished and the apostle is back again at Antioch, he is to meet with the opposition of sorcery, the contradiction and blasphemy of the Jew, persecution at the hands even of the honourable and the devout, despiteful handling by the combined attack of Jew and Gentile, and the ordeal of stoning and being left for dead: yet is he sustained and preserved. The grace of God, to which they had been recommended (Acts xiv. 26), proved all-sufficient, and the door of faith had been opened to the Gentiles.

No particulars are given of the work done upon the island. The verb kateggellon used in Acts xiii. 5 suggests a "continuance" of preaching in the synagogues of the Jews, a number of which may therefore have been visited at Salamis. The island is about 150 miles long, and the distance between Salamis and Paphos is 100 miles. It appears from the narrative, and from the relative positions of Salamis and Paphos, that, excepting the promontory east of Salamis the whole of the island (Acts xiii. 6) was traversed and the gospel preached. Yet not until the arrival at Paphos does the inspired chronicler find reason to record details, so that we do not know whether any or all of the fifteen other towns of considerable note (Pliny) were visited. Paphos, now called Baffa, was, at the time of the apostles, a port, where were the seat of the Roman Deputy and the site of one of the more famous temples dedicated to the worship of Venus. The Deputy is one named Sergius Paullus. Here it will be profitable to pause and see how the record bears witness to the trustworthiness of Luke as an historian.

The critics used to maintain that Sergius Paullus must have been Pro-praetor, not Pro-consul (Deputy), as Luke avers. There were many changes in the administration of Roman Government: at one time a country would be Imperial; at another it would be a Senatorial province. Amid all the changes Luke never falters, his every statement having been proved accurate. So here. Recently a coin has been dug up in Cyprus, bearing the inscription: "In the Pro-consulship of Paullus."

In 1912 Sir William Ramsay brought to light an inscription referring to Lucius Sergius Paullus, the younger, whose father was a Roman official. Galen, a heathen physician, writing about 100 years after Acts xiii., speaks of one, Sergius Paullus, as well versed in philosophy, while Pliny the Elder, in his Natural History, three times refer to Sergius Paullus as a person interested in intelligent research, and as Pliny wrote about 20 years after the incident in Acts xiii., there is every likelihood that he refers to the same man. It may therefore have been that having wide interests he could tolerate Elymas, and at the same time proffer an invitation to the preachers of the Word. In any case, we can but rejoice that he heard, saw and believed, a marked contrast with those spoken of by Isaiah, whose eyes were shut, whose ears were closed, and whose heart was hardened (see Acts xxviii. 25-28).

At first it may cause surprise that so prudent a man as Sergius Paullus, should permit a sorcerer to be near his person, but we must not introduce into ancient times modern attitudes. Even so, with all our boasted civilization, the reader will discover a vast amount of superstition among all classes to-day. The horse-racing fraternity, whether they gamble in pounds or pence, are proverbially superstitious. The newspaper find ready readers intent on knowing all about their horoscopes and lucky days. Jewellers' shops exhibit a series of "lucky stones" suitably set in silver or gold, and clairvoyants find among their clientele cute business men.

This sorcerer was a Jew who bore the name Bar-Jesus, but who assumed the title Elymas, which is, perhaps, derived from the Arabic Elim, and Hebrew Elemoth, both meaning a wizard. Greek and Roman literature is full of references to the credulity of this skeptical period. Rome greedily welcomed the Syrian fortune-tellers, and to adopt the language of Juvenal, "The Orontes (the river upon which Antioch stood) itself flowed into the Tiber".

> "The Jewish beggar-woman was the gipsy of the first century, shivering and crouching in the outskirts of the city, and telling fortunes, as Ezekiel had said, of old 'for handfuls of barley, and for pieces of bread'." (Conybeare and Howson).

Pompey, Crassus and Cæsar sought the aid of oriental astrologers, and the great satirist, Juvenal, pictures the Emperor Tiberius "sitting on the rock of Capri, with the flock of Chaldeans round him" (Juvenal x. 93).

Concerning the hold of these sorcerers upon the public, Tacitus, the great historian, says, with scathing sarcasm, that they "will always be discarded and always cherished" (Tac. Hist. i. 22). Pliny tells us that at Paphos there were two schools of soothsayers, one of which professed connection with Moses, Jannes and Jotapes, who were Jews, and tauto recentior est Cypria, "a much more recent Cyprian one". We have already mentioned that Pliny wrote of Sergius Paullus, and there is a possibility that in the words quoted he refers to the school of Elymas the Sorcerer. However that may be, there is no doubt that whether Elymas was officially connected with the Deputy, or whether he was only a mere hanger-on, there would be a financial aspect of the association that would cause him to view with jealousy, and oppose with ferocity, any new claimant for favour.

It is significant that Sergius Paullus called for Barnabas and Saul, not they for him. It will be remembered also that it was the Gentiles who asked Paul to preach to them in Acts xiii. 42. Thus it will be seen that the time for direct evangelizing of the Gentile irrespective of the Jew had not yet come.

The opposition of the sorcerer Bar-Jesus, and Paul's denunciation of him, is closely parallel with the experience of Peter recorded in Acts viii. This is no accident. The parallels that are discernible in the Acts between Peter and Paul would fill several pages of this magazine, and would make a contribution to our understanding of their specific ministries. For the moment we must be satisfied with observing a few points in connection with the two sorcerers, Simon Magus, and Elymas.

Acts viii. 9-24. PETER.	Acts xiii. 6-12. PAUL.
Consequent upon gospel in Samaria.	Consequent upon gospel in Cyprus.
SIMON the SORCERER.	ELYMAS the SORCERER.
Attack by imitation: "Thou art in the gall of bitterness and the bond of iniquity."	Attack by perversion: "Thou child of the devil and enemy of all righteousness."
Simon, a type of Israel with opportunity still left for repentance: "Pray for me, that none of these things come on me."	Elymas, a foreshadowing of Israel in Acts xxviii., stricken with blindness: "Immediately there fell on him a mist and a darkness."

At this point, the inspired writer tells us that Saul possessed a Gentile name, Paul. It cannot be mere accident that the first convert in this new mission bore the same name as the apostle himself, Paullus and Paul of course being identical. There are many examples both in the Scriptures and in secular history of the possession of a double name. We think of Abram, Joseph and Daniel. Esther was known to the Persians as Hadassah. Hillel was known to the Greeks as Pollio. Peter was also called Cephas. Augustine in his sermon says:

> "Paul suffers what Saul had inflicted; Saul stoned, and Paul was stoned; Saul inflicted scourgings on Christians, and Paul five times received forty stripes save one; Saul hunted the church, Paul was let down in a basket; Saul bound, Paul was bound."

It was, and still is, the custom, for a Jew to have a Hebrew and a Gentile name. In our own Whitechapel it would be easy to find someone known familiarly in the street as Bill or Tom who, within the family circle, would be Isaac or Moses. The custom has indeed provided a joke in an illustrated Yiddish paper. Moreover, the names adopted by the Jew are contemporaneous with his times. In Persian and Babylonian times we have "Nehemiah" and "Belteshazzar": under Greek influence we have such a name as "Philip". In Roman times we have "Justus", "Niger" and "Pricilla". In the Middle Ages we find Jews bearing the name "Basil" or "Leo". (For a fuller treatment of the subject see Zunz Namen der Juden). Jerome refers to the Roman custom of adopting the name of a country that had been conquered, such as Scipio, who, having conquered Africa, took the name Africanus. Certainly there is intentional emphasis upon the Gentile convert's name here. There is every likelihood that, as Paul was a freeman, his family took the name of some Roman family immediately associated with this freedom. So, from this time onward, the apostle is known as Paul; never again is he called by the old Hebrew name, which, with his old self and past, was dead and buried.

#24. The first missionary journey (xiii. - xvi. 5). Justification by faith. The opening of the door of faith to the Gentiles (xiii. 14-49).

pp. 224 - 230

The remaining part of the story of this journey centres chiefly in Antioch of Pisidia, and in it occurs the first record of an address by Paul. We have no inkling as to the mode of guidance in the itinerary, but as the nearest land was the mainland of Asia Minor, and as travelers in those days had little option regarding the chartering of vessels, the most natural thing was, that finding a vessel about to leave for Perga in Pamphylia, the apostles should accept the fact as sufficient guidance, believing, most assuredly, that a "work" had been mapped out for them, and that guidance as well as grace was theirs.

At Perga a sad thing happened.

> "John departing from them returned to Jerusalem" (Acts xiii. 13).
> "He went not with them to the work" (Acts xv. 38).

Ergon, work, ergazomai, to work, occur seven times in the narrative:

> "Separate Me Barnabas and Saul for the work whereunto I have called them" (Acts xiii. 2).
> "Behold, ye despisers, and wonder, and perish: for I work a work in your days, a work which ye shall in no wise believe, though a man declare it unto you" (Acts xiii. 41).
> "And thence sailed to Antioch, from whence they had been recommended to the grace of God for the work which they fulfilled" (Acts xiv. 26).
> "Known unto God are all His works from the beginning of the world" (Acts xv. 18).
> "But Paul thought not good to take him with them, who departed from them from Pamphylia, and went not with them to the work" (Acts xv. 38).

From these references it would appear that "the work" actually began when the apostles, by themselves, evangelized the cities of Asia Minor, and it must also be noted that on the return journey Cyprus was not included. Moreover, when Paul proposed to visit "every city where we have preached the Word of God" (Acts xv. 36) he apparently had no intention of revisiting Salamis or Paphos in Cyprus, for he went through Syria and Cilicia and on to Derbe. Pamphylia, as its name means, was "the-all-tribe" land. Cyprus was under one governor, and was tolerably peaceful, but Pamphylia and the countries beyond were likely to inspire the traveler with dread. For years Pamphylia had been a stronghold of pirates and robbers, and in the lower regions of the country malaria was rife. The apostle's words: "In journeyings often, in perils of rivers, in perils of robbers" (II Cor. xi. 26) would well describe the dangers that intimidated John Mark. We, in our own land, have no experience of a flooding river such as would menace the safety and life of a traveler in Asia Minor. To a wavering disciple the vast central plain of Asia Minor, rising higher than Ben Nevis, with inland seas of salt to make the journey even more harassing, would also be daunting.

The facts that Paul made no stay in Perga at his first visit, but preached there on his return (Acts xiii. 13, 14; xiv. 25) suggests that the apostle had taken ship for Cyprus at the "opening" of the sea, that is in March, and so would arrive at Perga about May. Earlier in the year, the passes would be blocked with snow, and later the approaching winter would render the journey unsafe. In the month of May the inhabitants of Perga moved from the plains to the hills. Within recent times these yailaks, or summer retreats, have been described by travelers. If therefore Paul found the majority of the inhabitants of Perga on the move, it would account for his silence, and, possibly, also for John Mark's sudden fright. Moreover we find that the apostle often passed by smaller towns for the great centre of commerce or government, leaving to the church formed by his efforts the work of evangelizing the surrounding district. Whatever the cause, Antioch in Pisidia was the apostle's goal.

Antioch was a Roman colony and a centre of great importance.

> "They came to Antioch in Pisidia, and went into the synagogue on the sabbath day, and sat down. And after the reading of the law and the prophets the rulers of the synagogue sent unto them, saying, Ye men and brethren, if ye have any word of exhortation for the people, say on. Then Paul stood up and beckoning with his hand said . . . . ." (Acts xiii. 14-16).

As the synagogue plays such an important part in the early spread of the gospel, we take this opportunity of describing its officers and order of service, and giving other particulars that illuminate the Scripture record.

A synagogue could only be formed where there were at least ten men, preferably students of the law. The fact that the Lord used the number ten in His parables is reminiscent of this fact.

The Talmud says:

> "What is a great city? That in which were ten men of leisure. If there be less than this number, behold, it is a village."

These men of leisure, Batlanin, were so described from their being unencumbered with worldly things. They "were at leisure only to take care of the affairs of the synagogue". Of these men, three bore the magistracy and were called "The Bench of Three". These were called "Rulers of the Synagogue". Then there was the Chazan, or Bishop, of the congregation: "He oversees how the reader reads (cf. Paul's concern 'give attention to the reading,') and whom he may call out to read the law." This office is the origin of the "Overseer", Episkopos, or Bishop, of the early church. There were also three Deacons, or Almoners, on whom rested the care of the poor, and who were called Parrasin, or Pastors. The reader will see how natural it was for the apostles to appoint the seven deacons in Acts vi.

Another officer was the "Interpreter", for the law was still read in the Hebrew even though none of the congregation understood it. Beside the Sabbath meetings, meetings were held on the second and fifth days of the week. To this the words of Acts xiii. 42 may refer, for "the next sabbath" is to metaxu sabbaton, and metaxu means "between" and so might refer to these weekly meetings that came between the Sabbath days. It is however only just to say that Josephus uses the word in the sense of "after" (Bel. v. 42). The Companions Bible reads "one of the weekly gatherings".

Entering the synagogue we should find ourselves in a building unadorned, and differing from the heathen temples around them by the complete absence of any sculptured figure. On one side, behind a lattice window, sit the women. In the centre is the reader's desk, and toward the side facing Jerusalem, is the Ark which contained the sacred scrolls. All round the building are seats so that "the eyes of all that are in the synagogue" can be "fastened" on the speaker. The chief seats are reserved for the rulers of the synagogue.

The service being begun, the minister calls out seven to read the law. First a priest, then a Levite, if present, then five Israelites. Thus in some editions of the Hebrew Bible one can still see, marked in the margin of the Law, 1st Priest, 2nd Levite, 3rd, 4th, 5th, 6th, 7th. The first lesson is then read. This is called the Parashah. Read in Hebrew, it is translated verse by verse by the Interpreter. After the Parashah, a short portion from the Haphtorah, which is a selection from the prophets, is read, the translation this time being at the end of every three verses. Then comes the Midrash, or sermon. This is not delivered by one set minister, but any qualified stranger or visitor could be invited by the ruler of the synagogue to give a word of exhortation.

This is just what happened at Antioch, where Paul readily and eagerly responded to the invitation of the rulers of the synagogue. The modern conception of a sermon, where a text is made the basis of an address more or less remotely connected with it, is not the Midrash of the synagogue. The Midrash arose naturally out of the reading of the law and the prophets.

In the present list of Jewish lessons, Deut. i. - iii. 22 and Isa. i. 1-22 form the forty-fourth in order, and Bengel makes the happy suggestion that this was the lesson on the day of Paul's visit to the synagogue at Antioch. Farrar draws attention to the occurrences of two words used in Paul's address, one of unusual form, etrophophoresen (Acts xiii. 18), "carried them as a man carries his little son" (LXX Deut. i. 31), and the other, hupsosen, employed, most unusually, to convey the sense of "He brought them up" (Acts xiii. 17; Isa. i. 2). The fact that these two words are found, respectively, in the first of Deuteronomy and the first of Isaiah, combined with the circumstance that the historical part of Paul's exhortation turns on the subject alluded to in the first of these two chapters, and that the promise of free remission is directly suggested by the other, makes Bengel's suggestion extremely probable, i.e., that these were the two chapters which had just been read.

In some respects Paul's address differs from that of Peter recorded in Acts ii., while in others it is similar to it. Where Peter limits his remarks to the people of Israel and Jewish proselytes, Paul addresses his audience as "men of Israel", "ye that fear God", "children of the stock of Abraham" and "whosoever among you feareth God". Whereas Peter when preaching to Cornelius said "the word which God sent unto the children of Israel" (Acts x. 36), Paul said to the whole congregation, "To you is the word of this salvation sent" (Acts xiii. 26).

The apostle begins his address with a resumé of Israel's history and focuses attention on David. He then comes to his point.

> "Of this man's seed hath God according to His promise raised unto Israel a Saviour, Jesus" (Acts xiii. 23).

He then pauses to bring in the witness of John the Baptist, afterwards proceeding to show that the very hatred of the Jew was but a fulfilling of the Scriptures they read every Sabbath day. Pilate's testimony to the Saviour's innocence is also adduced, and the fulfillment of all that was written, even to the particulars of His burial, is impressed upon them. Then, once more, he stresses his point: "But God raised Him from the dead" (Acts xiii. 30), and lays before them the further witness of those who saw the risen Lord over a period of many days. He returns to the glad tidings that God had fulfilled the promises to the fathers.

After yet further proofs of the resurrection, the apostle comes to his glorious conclusion:

> "Be it known unto you therefore, men and brethren, that through this man is preached unto you the forgiveness of sins; and by Him all that believe are justified from all things, from which ye could not be justified by the law of Moses" (Acts xiii. 38, 39).

Here Paul reaches the great doctrine of his early ministry, "Justification by faith without the deeds of the law", a doctrine that finds its exposition in both the Epistle to the Galatians and the Epistle to the Romans. A structure of the exhortation follows.

Acts xiii. 16-41.
Paul's exhortation in synagogue of Antioch.

A | 16-21. Resumé of Israel's history. Lo-ammi periods.
B | 22. David. After own heart.
C1 | 23. A Saviour. Jesus.
D | 24, 25. Witness. John Baptist.
C2 | 26. Salvation.
E | 27-29. Fulfillment, by rulers at Jerusalem, and by death and burial.
F | 30. God raised Him from the dead.
D | 31. Witness. Seen many days.
C3 | 32. Glad tidings.
E | 32. Fulfillment, by promise.
F | 33. He hath raised up Jesus again.
B | 34-37. David. Sure mercies.
C4 | 38, 39. Forgiveness. Justification.
A | 40, 41. Beware. Lo-ammi period threatened (fulfilled at Acts xxviii.).

Some explanation will be demanded of the insertion at the opening and close of Paul's address of the words "Lo-ammi". We have dealt with this feature in the series, "Fundamentals of Dispensational Truth" (p.207), where it treats of the Book of Judges.

The years that Israel were in servitude were "Lo-ammi" years, and therefore not reckoned in the divine calendar. What had already happened to Israel happened again, when, as recorded in Acts xxviii., they once more went out into another Lo-ammi period, which still obtains, and has already reached nearly two thousand years.

We must remember that it is quite inaccurate to teach that Paul turned from Israel as a whole to the Gentiles as a whole, in Acts xiii. 46, for in Acts xiv. 1 we find him as usual in the synagogue. The explanation is that the turning from the Jew at Antioch was local and prophetic. It foreshadowed that great turning away of Acts xxviii., as we have shown by the balance of teaching of the whole section xiii.-xxviii.

The closing verses of this witness at Antioch are:

> "And when the Gentiles heard this, they were glad, and glorified the word of the Lord; and as many as were ordained to eternal life believed. And the word of the Lord was published throughout all the region" (Acts xiii. 48, 49).

It should be noted that the A.V. has given an unfortunate turn to the meaning of the word in translating tasso, in this verse, "ordained". The word means to set in order, and while by no means denying the sovereign grace of God, looks also to the fact that whereas the Jews "judged themselves unworthy of everlasting life", the Gentiles who heard rejoiced at the message and glorified God for His grace.

We have dealt with Paul's doctrine of justification, apart from the law of Moses, in Volume XVIII, page 83, and as this article has already reached its limits, we must refer the reader to that article for further notes on this great subject.

Two Ministries since Acts xxviii.
pp. 126 - 128

- - - I l l u s t r a t i o n - - -
(BE-XXVII.126).

The Gospel of John differs from the Synoptic Gospels in that it was written after Acts xxviii. and in full consciousness of Israel's rejection:

> "He came to His own, and His own received Him not; but as many as received Him to them, ..." (John i. 11, 12).

If we examine the parable of the marriage of the King's Son, in Matt. xxii., we find that it deals with three invitations to the marriage. First during the earthly ministry of the Lord, then again to the same people during the Acts, and a third time after the rejection of Israel and the burning up of their city in A.D.70. It is in connection with this third invitation to the wedding that John's Gospel has its place.

At the present time there is a small inner circle who respond to the prison ministry of the apostle Paul, and a large world-wide company who find their gospel and hope in that according to John. The one ministry is building up the perfect man, the other is gathering the guests for the marriage, while during the Acts the company that constitute the Bride was in formation.

That John's Gospel was not written for Jewish readers is manifest. No Jew needed to be told that the Passover was a "Feast of the Jews". No Jew was ignorant of the feud that existed between them and the Samaritans; no Jew needed the interpolation of the meaning of "Rabboni" in the record of the resurrection.

While the dispensational position of the two companies differs as the Body differs from the Guests, and there is no idea that John taught anything concerning the mystery; yet seeing that he wrote after Paul's message had been given to the church, he was obliged, in the nature of the case, to minister the same aspect of the offices and glory of Christ that now fills our vision, rather than the Christ of the early Acts. This is clear from the comparison suggested between Paul's revelation of Christ as the "Image", and John's revelation of Christ as the "Word". These would run together, whereas Christ as the "King of the Jews" would not. So also the other items which are set out for comparison. John is the only other writer to mention the period "Before the foundation of the world", and he more than the other evangelists stresses the ascension. The other sheep are clearly not of Israel, and provide a sphere for the “Pastors” who have a place in the church of the One Body.

The full force of the relation of these two ministries will only be felt by those who make the subject their own. The chart and these notes are but suggestions for those who have ears to hear.

A Criticism.

"Weighed in the balances and found wanting."

pp. 215 - 218

In The Berean Expositor for June 1911, we published an article entitled "The Dispensational Place of the Lord's Supper". We knew at the time that such an article would shut many doors of service, and create a good deal of opposition and criticism. For all this, however, we were, by grace, prepared. From time to time there have been published articles and booklets exposing the error of our ways, which is quite natural. For over twenty-five years, however, we have awaited a criticism of our attitude to the Lord's Supper, written by one who held the following qualifications and beliefs:

(1) An unshakeable belief in the inspiration of Scripture.
(2) Freedom from sectarian bias.
(3) Knowledge of the Greek originals.
(4) Knowledge of dispensational truth.

Such qualifications are certainly very limiting, for while there are still some left, thank God, who believe the inspiration of all Scripture, and still some who are free from sectarian bias, there are not many who combine with these the two other qualifications indicated. We felt that a criticism penned by one who possessed this fourfold qualification would (1) either so completely expose our "error" as to demolish the position we have occupied all these years, or (2) the method and nature of the criticism would be so evidently self-contradictory as to leave our position unassailable. Such a criticism at last has been published, from which we give extracts:

> "If we have difficulty with the figures of speech used in connection with the Lord's dinner, let us examine them, rather than alter what is clear and unmistakable."

To this, every true Berean must be in hearty agreement. But, the statement leads on to the idea that the words "New Covenant" in II Cor. iii. 6 and in our Lord's own reference are "figures of speech' and need "altering" if we are not to be misled.

> "Paul speaks of being the dispenser of a new covenant, not of the letter, but of the spirit, for the letter is killing, yet the spirit is vivifying (II Cor. iii. 6). But Paul really had no covenant. He simply called it that because it replaced the old covenant, and there was no name which would so clearly express what he meant . . . . . It is the same with the 'new covenant' in which blessing will come through His blood alone. Even that was figurative, for it is not a real covenant" (Our italics).

Here, therefore, is the criticism for which we have waited a quarter of a century. To undermine the fundamentals of our position, any criticism must deal with the New Covenant. Any other item is but the outside fringe of the subject, but this is vital. For an opponent to admit that inspired Scripture actually means "The New Covenant" by the words He Kaine Diatheke, would of course be fatal. We are consequently told that neither our Lord nor Paul really intended what those words meant to every Jewish reader. "Paul really had no covenant." "It is not a real covenant." We must also modify our acceptance of verbal inspiration, for it seems that God had some difficulty in finding suitable words in which to convey His truth; "There was no name which would so clearly express what He meant"; and yet "what He meant" is not what He said so clearly.

This attitude of mind we expect from a modernist, but our critic is a believer in verbal inspiration! Moreover, if our critic be right, we must set aside one of our most valued helps to the study of the Greek Testament, namely, the Greek Concordance, for that Concordance brings together Matt. xxvi. 28; Luke xxii. 20; I Cor. xi. 25; II Cor. iii. 6 and Heb. viii. 8. This is a grave state of affairs and one that makes some protest imperative. Neither The Berean Expositor nor its Editor are mentioned in the article we have before us, but the truth for which we stand is one, whoever the human instrument may be through whom it is distributed and made known.

The version of the N.T. published by the writer whose criticism we have been considering contains the following notes to the passages where the words "New Covenant" occur.

> "Matt. xxvi. 28. See Ex. xxiv. 8; Lev. xvii. 11; Jer. xxxi. 31-34. Mark xiv. 24. The new covenant is with the nation of Israel (Jer. xxxi. 32; Ezek. xxxvi. 24-30; Heb. viii. 7-12; x. 15-17) even as the old one was. The first was dedicated with the blood of calves and he-goats (Ex. xxiv. 8), but the new with the precious blood of Christ (Heb. ix. 15-27). The first was conditional on their obedience, the second on His.
> Luke xxii. 19, 20. Compare Matt. xxvi. 26-28; Mark xiv. 22-24; I Cor. xi. 23-26; I Cor. xi. 25. At this time the believers among the nations were still subordinate to Israel. They were still partakers of their spiritual things, hence they were considered as coming under the blessings of the new covenant. The later revelations, contained in the Perfection Epistles, gave them an independent standing outside the new covenant which Jehovah made with Israel.
>
> II Cor. iii. 6. No comment relevant to our discussion.
>
> Heb. viii. 8 . . . . . To speak of the Greek scriptures as 'The New Testament' is most misleading, because, as a matter of fact, the new covenant is found in the 'Old Testament'. Jeremiah gives it in full (Jer. xxxi. 31-34). It has never been in force yet, and 'New Testament times' will not come until after the time of affliction when Jehovah calls Israel and Judah back to himself . . . . .
> Heb. ix. 15. This new covenant is for Israel and Judah only. The nations have no part in it at all . . . . ."

With all that is here quoted, most of our readers will be in complete harmony, but it seems impossible to retain these comments, and at the same time to explain away the literality of the New Covenant, when it conflicts with one's own views of the Lord's Supper, without involving something deeper than mere inconsistency.

We cannot do better than quote from the closing paragraph of the article referred to where, speaking of other matters, the writer says:--

> "The grave feature of this method of handling God's Word is this: It definitely denies (quite unconsciously, no doubt), what God has said, and then actually reasons away vital > elements of the mystery by illogical deductions . . . . . May God give us grace to cling closely to His Own disclosures, to distrust our own deductions."

In the light of the previous quotations by the same writer, what meaning is there in the expressions "definitely denies" "reasons away" and "cling closely to His Own disclosures"? Our application of them compels us to believe that both our Lord and the Apostle Paul actually meant the New Covenant when they used the words, and while we cling closely to such a belief, we must maintain that the introduction of a New Covenant memorial feast into the Mystery is unscriptural.

We thank our critic for the unintended testimony he has given to the strength of our position, but we are sorry that his attack should have (quite unconsciously no doubt) questioned what God has said, discredited the concordant method of study, and substituted human reasoning for simple acceptance of what is written.

Fruits of Fundamental Studies.

#1. Creation implies a purpose.
pp. 41 - 44

Nearly twenty years ago, the series of studies entitled "Fundamentals of Dispensational Truth" commenced, the first article appearing on Page 1 of Volume VI. After a few introductory studies dealing with the principle of right division, the meaning of the "ages" and kindred subjects, the Book of Genesis was opened, and from that time to this, the studies have proceeded, giving attention to structure and theme, type and shadow, but of necessity passing over many allied subjects without comment. We have no intention of discontinuing the series, for we believe nothing can compensate for a first-hand acquaintance with "all Scripture", and we are sure that these studies have proved a great help to many. We feel, however, that the time is ripe for using the material thus assembled; and we can now with freedom select our passages, knowing that the books as a whole have been analysed, and that the structures are at hand whenever they are wanted.

Beginning with God as Creator and man as creature, yet made in the image of God, it is evident that God and His relation to man, and man and his relation to God must be very near the starting point of all our attempts to apprehend His Word and ways. Arising out of this relationship, many questions present themselves for consideration, which must be answered if we are rightly to understand the great doctrines of the faith. The question of how far God's omnipotence is above or subservient to right, and the question of how far His omnipotence allows freedom to man, demands an answer. Does foreknowledge mean foreordination? Can a moral agent be responsible if he is not free? These and kindred themes arise out of the simple facts and relationships of creation, Creator and creature. The presence and the problem of sin, the meaning of "good and evil", the Divine method of the removal of sin and the reconciliation of the sinner, are subjects that meet us at every turn, in the record of historic facts, in the institution of type and ceremony, and in the foreshadowing of prophetic word and deed.

Creation being the starting point, let us use what space we have in this article to get a Scriptural idea of what is meant by the word "create". The popular idea of "something out of nothing" may be a fit subject for philosophical debate, but if our guide is the Scriptures we shall be spared the necessity of pursuing this theme, for there is not a single passage from one end of the Scriptures to the other that raises the question, "Where did matter come from?" The Scriptures begin, not with the creation of "the stuff of the worlds", but with the creation of "the heaven and the earth".

While, therefore, modern teaching concerning the atom and the fact that solid objects are nothing more than "bundles of force", enable one to see that the visible, tangible creation may after all be but the expression in terms of physics of the mind, will and power of the invisible God, this theme, though intensely interesting and attractive, finds little basis in the Scriptures themselves. The same thing is true of God Himself. The Bible does not open with an abstract argument for the existence of a First Cause; He is presented to us at work. It is not possible for any man to prove the negative statement, "There is no God", for to be able to do so would demand the omniscience of God Himself. For the atheist to prove that there is no God, he must have traversed all space and all time, for unless he has investigated every nook and corner of the universe, and seen with eyes that not only take in the visible but the invisible, he cannot be sure that the necessary evidence to prove the existence of God is not somewhere to be found, even though he has not yet found it. The argument from design, as exemplified in Paley's famous illustration, we must considered later. For the moment, let us concentrate our attention on the word translated "create" in the Hebrew Scriptures. The word is bara, and its first occurrence Gen. i. 1. Let us see how it is used elsewhere.

> "And God created great whales" (Gen. i. 21).
> "So God created man . . . . . in the image of God created He him, male and female created He them"(Gen. i. 27).

It is evident that the word bara in these occurrences does not bear the meaning "to create out of nothing".

Associated with bara there are two other words: asah, "to make" and yatsar, "to form". We find the three words used together in Isa. xliii. 7: "I have created (bara) for My glory: I have formed (yatsar); yea, I have made (asah) him." While Gen. i. 27 uses the word bara, "create", Gen. ii. 7 uses yatsar: "And the Lord God formed (yatsar) man of the dust of the ground."

Coming back to Isaiah, we read in xlv. 18:

> "For thus saith the Lord that created (bara) the heavens, God Himself that formed (yatsar) the earth and made (asah) it; He hath established it, He created it not in vain, He formed (yatsar) it to be inhabited."

The Scripture uses the word "create" both of the heavens and of the earth, but seems to change here to "form", "make" and "establish" when the purpose of habitation is in view.

In this same chapter of Isaiah we read:

> "I form the light, and create darkness: I make peace, and create evil: I the Lord do (asah) all these things" (Isa. xlv. 7).

Here it is evident that "to make" (asah) includes both "creating" and "forming". So, in the N.T. we read:

> "We are His workmanship (poiema, from poieo, to make) having been created (ktizo) in Christ Jesus" (Eph. ii. 10).

God is spoken of in the O.T. Scriptures as "The Creator" (Bara) in Eccles. xii. 1 (where the word is plural), Isa. xl. 28 and Isa. xliii. 15. He is referred to as "The Maker" in the following passages: Yatsar—in Isa. xlv. 9, 11; Asah—in Job iv. 17; xxxii. 22; xxxv. 10; Psa. xcv. 6; Prov. xiv. 31; xvii. 5; xxii. 2; Isa. xvii. 7; li. 13; liv. 5; Jer. xxxiii. 2; Hosea viii. 14; and Paal ("to work") in Job xxxvi. 3.

Creation is spoken of in the Scriptures as the outcome of God's wisdom, His word, His understanding, His power, and the work of His hands.

> "He hath made the earth by His power, He hath established the world by His wisdom, and hath stretched out the heaven by His understanding" (Jer. li. 15).
>
> "By the word of the Lord were the heavens made; and all the host of them by the breath of His mouth" (Psa. xxxiii. 6).
> "Mine hand also hath laid the foundations of the earth, and My right hand hath spanned the heavens; when I call unto them, they stand up together" (Isa. xlviii. 13).

It will be seen that whereas philosophy has endeavoured to probe into the origin of things, the Scriptures are more concerned that we should perceive the intention of things. Creation is brought before us as the product of wisdom, understanding and power, but these three, unregulated by purpose, would work in vain.

Many subjects arise out of the fact of Creation which we cannot attempt to deal with in these pages, but some at least must be considered. Among them we must note:

(1) THE ARGUMENT FROM THE EVIDENCE OF DESIGN FOR THE EXISTENCE OF GOD.
(2) THE CREATION AS AN EXAMPLE NOT ONLY OF THE MIGHTY POWER BUT OF THE SELF-LIMITATION OF THE OMNIPOTENT.
(3) THE LIGHT OF REVELATION ON THE PERSON OF CHRIST AS THE CREATOR OF ALL THINGS.

These three subjects at least we must include in our studies, besides giving a passing glance at other related themes.

Let not the reader think such considerations are of little practical importance. The whole fabric of the Christian faith rests upon the solid basis of the relationship between the Creator and the creature, and wrong views entertained here at the beginning are bound to influence the whole of the super-structure.

#2. Creation bears evidence that "God is".
pp. 70 - 73

We have already seen in our opening study that creation implies a purpose, and as we proceed it becomes clear that this purpose necessitates a Person.

It is one thing to be confident that one is right, it is another thing to be able to convince others. For ourselves we are convinced that creation and its implications are at the very root of revelation, redemption and ultimate restoration. We recognize, however, that the reader has the right to ask for evidence before acknowledging the truth of this statement. We are writing for those to whom the testimony of Scripture is final, and we therefore pass over without comment the philosopher's pursuit of the Absolute, and content ourselves with the fact that Scripture does appeal to the works of creation as sufficient evidence of a Creator. This being granted, the rest follows.

Let us take a simple argument first:

> "He that planted the ear, shall He not hear? He that formed the eye, shall He not see?" (Psa. xciv. 9).

Could anything be more direct and simple than these questions? Yet is there any argument invented by man that can abate their force? For the moment, however, we are not so much concerned with the power of the argument, but simply with the establishing of the fact that such argument is Scriptural.

The basic doctrine of Christianity is perhaps, justification by Faith, and it is therefore interesting to find that this doctrine is introduced into the experience of man and into the pages of Scripture by a reference to Creation.

> "And He brought him forth abroad, and said, Look now toward heaven, and tell the stars, if thou be able to number them. And He said unto him, So shall thy seed be. And he believed in the Lord, and He counted it to him for righteousness" (Gen. xv. 5, 6).

Should anyone object that while Genesis is the first book of the Bible, Abraham's experience in Gen. xv. actually occurred after the experience of Job, we would point out that the answer in the Book of Job to the question: "How shall man be just with God?" (Job ix. 2) is the overwhelming answer of Creation. "Who can read the opening verses of Job xxxviii. unmoved? "Where wast thou when I laid the foundation of the earth?" (verse 4). And as we read on through the remaining chapters to the end, we discover that a view of the magnificence of creation was all that was necessary to humble Job and to convince him of his need of righteousness.

As the Psalmist writes: "The heavens declare the glory of God; and the firmament sheweth His handywork" (Psa. xix. 1).

We gave an instance above of the close association between the doctrine of Justification by Faith and the evidences offered by creation, and we now seek to show that the apostle Paul was not only conscious of this fact, but definitely used it in his ministry.

When the idolaters of Lystra would have offered sacrifice to Barnabas and Paul, Paul prevented them saying:

> "We also are men of like passions with you, and preach unto you that ye should turn from these vanities unto the living God, which made heaven, and earth, and the sea and all things that are therein; Who in times past suffered all nations to walk in their own ways. Nevertheless He left not Himself without witness, in that He did good, and gave us rain from heaven, and fruitful seasons, filling our hearts with food and gladness" (Acts xiv. 15-17).

When the apostle stood on Mars Hill, his testimony before the learned Greeks was much the same:

> "As I passed by, and beheld your devotions, I found an altar with this inscription, TO THE UNKNOWN GOD. Whom therefore ye ignorantly worship, Him I declare unto you. God that made the world and all things therein; seeing that He is Lord of heaven and earth, dwelleth not in temples made with hands, neither is worshipped with men's hands, as though He needed anything, seeing He giveth to all life, and breath, and all things . . . . ." (Acts xvii. 23-25).

At the time of the end, when the world shall have become to a great extent Antichristian, the gospel of creation shall be preached to all that dwell on the earth:

> "Fear God, and give glory to Him; for the hour of His judgment is come: and worship Him that made heaven and earth and the sea, and the fountains of waters" (Rev. xiv. 7).

The association of the Creator with "judgment" that is found in this proclamation, and in Acts xvii. 31, must be reserved for separate study, but we call attention to it in passing because of its importance. He Who is Creator must also be Moral Governor, and from this follows the necessity for Law.

The Epistle to the Romans, that great exposition of Justification by Faith, contains the most emphatic and searching statement concerning the witness of creation that we have yet considered:

> "For the wrath of God is revealed from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men, who hold the truth in unrighteousness" (Rom. i. 18).

This statement is not limited to those who have received the revelation of the Scriptures; it is applied to those who, though they have never heard a verse of Scripture, have before them the evidence of creation, which is sufficient for its purpose.

> "Because that which may be known of God is manifest in them, for God hath shewed it unto them" (Rom. i. 19).

The phrase “That which may be known” indicates the limits of creation’s testimony. No man by observing the works of God’s hands would ever arrive at the gospel of redeeming love, but they provide sufficient evidence to make idolatry inexcusable.

> “For the invisible things of Him from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made, even His eternal power and Godhead, so that they are without excuse” (Rom. i. 20).

These passages are more than sufficient to establish the fact that the Scriptures appeal to the works of creation as evidence for the existence of God.

Many of our readers will be acquainted with the writings of Archdeacon Paley. Paley’s deduction of the existence of a watchmaker from the design of a watch has been attacked by various sophistries, but it remains as unassailable to-day as when it was first put forward. Dr. Chalmers makes some interesting remarks in this connection. He bases his argument not so much on the bare circumstances of matter, but on the wisdom manifested in its disposition. The sheer bulk of matter that constitutes what we speak of as the Universe might have remained for ever a universal chaos, but the order and adaptation of that universe is an argument that is beyond refutation. For example, the phenomenon of refraction in optics is governed by a certain “law”, but the situation and nature of the two different humours in the eye, together with the lens and the retina and the muscles which regulate the degree of convergence of the refracted light—these are not laws but dispositions, without which the laws themselves could never have brought about the required result.

The whole observable creation presents in multitudinous variety this principle of disposition, this adaptation to an end. Such adaptation demands intelligence, and the almighty intelligence demanded by creation is sufficient evidence to establish “His eternal power and Deity”, and to render all without excuse. The first demand made upon any who would “come to God” is that they should believe “that He is” (Heb. xi. 6); and the faith that thus believes does not rest upon fancies or imaginings, but upon the solid foundation of creation.

So far we have considered the evidence afforded by creation for the existence of God. In our next study we must continue to the logical and Scriptural conclusion.

#3. God, the moral Governor.
pp. 108 - 111

In our last paper we arrived at the conclusion, drawn from the evidence of design and purpose in creation, that "God is", and that ignorance of this basic fact is inexcusable. Most of our readers probably realized, when we quoted from Heb. xi. 6, that we stopped short of its conclusion. We take up the matter now, and give the complete quotation:

> "He that cometh to God must believe that He is, and that He is a rewarder of them that diligently seek Him" (Heb. xi. 6).

The connection between God's existence and God's moral governorship is evidently fundamental, and it is this question that we are to consider in the present paper. "He is . . . . . He is a Rewarder."

We must not allow ourselves to be side-tracked at this point into an argument concerning "law" and "grace". Reward in the sense of Rom. iv. 4 can have no place in the scheme of salvation by grace. This, however, is but one aspect of the subject. The intimate association between "reward" and moral government is set forth, for example, in the two following passages in the Apocalypse:

> "And the nations were angry, and Thy wrath is come, and the time of the dead, that they should be judged, and that Thou shouldest give reward unto Thy servants the prophets, and to the saints, and them that fear Thy Name, small and great: and shouldest destroy them which destroy the earth" (Rev. xi. 18).
> "Behold, I come quickly; and My reward is with Me, to give every man according as his work shall be" (Rev. xxii. 12).

In the general use of the word to-day, "reward" is often placed over against "punishment", but this does not convey the full truth. "Reward" in the full sense of the word includes "punishment". We find, for instance, the following passage in a writer as late as 1874: "Hanging was the reward of treason and desertion."

And in II Sam. iii. we read: "The Lord shall reward the doer of evil according to his wickedness" (II Sam. iii. 39).

It is, therefore, clear that the term "reward" must not be used merely as an antonym for "punishment", but rather as conveying the idea of an "award" of impartial justice.

The word "recompense" is used in the same way:

> "Behold, your God shall come with vengeance, even God with a recompense" (Isa. xxxv. 4, see also Isa. lix. 18; lxvi. 6).

"Reward", "recompense", "punishment", are terms that are meaningless apart from moral government. The initial requirement of faith is to believe that God is, and flowing immediately from the recognition of His Being, is the recognition of His sovereign right to rule.

In this connection, we would draw attention to the use of the word "worthy", which occurs seven times in the Book of Revelation.

"Worthy."

A | iii. 4. They shall walk in white, for they are worthy.
B | iv. 11. Thou art worthy to receive glory.
C | v. 2. Who is worthy to open the book?
D | v. 4. No man was found worthy.
C | v. 9. Thou art worthy to take the book.
B | v. 12. Worthy is the Lamb to receive power.
A | xvi. 6. Given them blood to drink, for they are worthy.

We cannot conceive of any reader requiring proof that in these passages the "worthiness" ascribed to the Lord is moral, and not mechanical. If this be so, what shall we say of the last reference? No difference in meaning or in choice of language is apparent between the opening passage (iii. 4) and the closing passage (xvi. 6). Both passages associate "worthiness" with choice, intention and performance. In the first passage those addressed are exhorted to "remember', to "hold fast", to "watch"; and those who have not defiled their garments are said to be "worthy". It would be an obvious perversion of the passage to introduce the idea that those addressed are not responsible for their actions, that their will is not free to choose between defilement and its opposite, or that the reward of walking with the Lord in white is not contingent upon their actions. So, in Rev. xvi., the Angel is heard ascribing righteousness to the Lord, Who has poured out upon the earth the vials of His wrath, turning the sea, the rivers and the fountains of waters into blood. The reason is given:

> "For they have shed the blood of saints and prophets, and Thou hast given them blood to drink; FOR THEY ARE WORTHY" (Rev. xvi. 6).

Flewelling writes:

> "If we really did believe that men are the helpless victims of impulse, there would be neither rhyme nor reason in punishing crime. In fact there would be no crime, there being no moral responsibility."

This is as serious as it is true. If a man believes a theory that compels him to deny freedom of choice in moral agents, then whatever he may say superficially, he is logically bound to deny "the exceeding sinfulness of sin". The fact that rewards and punishments follow the actions of men proves two things: first, that God is the moral Governor of His creatures, and, secondly, that man is a responsible moral agent.

We shall be obliged to deal more fully with this matter of punishment and of free moral agency under another heading. For the moment we are only concerned with the fundamental fact that the Creator of man is the righteous Ruler of man, and that this relationship permeates His attitude towards man, whether sinner or saint, and whether under law or under the terms of the gospel.

God as Creator governs the world by absolute laws. God as the moral Governor of moral agents governs them by contingent laws. It is, for example, an absolute law that magnetic ore should attract a piece of iron. No one thinks of praising or rewarding the North Magnetic Pole for always attracting the needle in the mariner's compass. Thanks are certainly due to God Who thus endowed insensate nature with such a useful power, but that is another thing entirely. On the other hand, we find a completely different law at work when we turn from the mariner's compass to the mariner himself. The mariner can either resist or obey the laws that govern his being. The moral Magnetic Pole exerts its influence upon his conscience, but unlike the magnetic needle, he can refuse to obey. This possibility of refusal indicates the power of choice, and is the essence of moral responsibility. In this sphere we must admit contingency; in this sphere God can say "If you . . . . . then I".

Should the reader ever have to do with the advocates of determinism (who deny freedom of choice to the moral agent) he will discover that their theory is not applied in their everyday life. If you steal their money you will not find them excusing you by explaining that you are not responsible for your actions. In other words, the theory does not work.

> "Contingency is the privileged possessions of personality alone . . . . . We choose only as we see the before and after, and conceive the possible relations of events" (Flewelling).

Contingency has been described as "That which is, or may be, but which might not have been, or might be different from what it is". This element of contingency is apparent in Gen. ii. & iii., and is in strong contrast with the principles governing Gen. i. In Gen. i. we have God dealing with creation. In Gen. ii. we have the Lord God dealing with man. In Gen. i., "God said . . . . . and it was so"; it is impossible to introduce any contingency here. When God said, "Let there be light" and, "Let the earth bring forth", there could be but one result—"There was light" and "It was so". But when the Lord placed man in the garden and commanded him to abstain from the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, there was no inevitable sequence. Man was under no compulsion either to obey or to disobey. The fact that the Lord God appended to the commandment a warning as to the penalty that would follow its infringement makes it clear that this is a different sphere from the sphere of Gen. i. The mind cannot imagine the introduction of a penalty in Gen. i. 3 or 11.

Let it be true of us, whatever others may teach, that we come to God, believing that "He is" and that "He is the rewarder of them that diligently seek Him".

#4. God, the Moral Governor. Is might right?
pp. 144 - 146

When we begin to think about the great basic fact of God as the Moral Governor of His creatures, several items of far-reaching importance present themselves. The subject that we are to consider in this article is so important, involving as it does the believer's appreciation of the atonement itself as well as the whole realm of morals, that we must spare no pains to make the matter clear.

Our enquiry may be put in the form of the question: Is righteousness arbitrary? That is, Is a thing right because righteousness is an eternal truth, or is it right because God has said so? Is righteousness a matter of enactment merely? If right be right simply because God so wills it, and wrong be wrong for the same reason, then—since whatever God's will has made His will can unmake—if it pleased Him, He could by the arbitrary enactment of His will make all that is now right, wrong, and all that is now wrong, right. This very statement carries with it its own refutation. Scripture will not permit us to entertain such an idea. It assures us that the omnipotence of God is under the control of righteousness and truth. Were it not so, mere unregulated omnipotence could turn the universe into a nightmare.

Scripture tells us that God "cannot deny Himself" (II Tim. ii. 13). This involves a self-limitation of His power, for ou dunati means "He is not able". And since no creature, great or small, has the ability to stay the almighty power of the Lord, the only cause for such holy ability must be sought in the nature of God Himself. Righteousness is no arbitrary enactment that Will can alter; it is resident in the heart of God Himself, and is the abiding character of His throne (Psa. xlv. 6). Scripture tells us that God "cannot lie" (Titus i. 2). The A.V. here is rather free in its rendering of ho apseudes Theos, but it is nevertheless true to fact. An honest man, placed before an open safe, if tempted to steal, would say: "I cannot do this." The impossibility of the action is not due to any lack of physical power, but exists because the presence of moral integrity within the man brings about this noble inability. God is the "God of truth and without iniquity, just and right is He" (Deut. xxxii. 4).

Let us be glad and rejoice that the Almighty God admits the impossible: "It was impossible for God to lie" (Heb. vi. 18). Impossible, not because of anything that mortal or angelic opposition could accomplish, but because of His own inherent integrity. With the knowledge that we have received from the Scriptures concerning the nature of God, we should be obliged to reject the testimony of even an angel from heaven, if we were told that God had somewhere decreed that 2 plus 2 = 6, or that somewhere in the universe the three angles of a triangle were equal to three right angles, or that two straight lines could enclose a space. These mathematical axioms are independent of time and place. They are and ever must be unalterably true. It is because man has been given these elementary axioms as the foundation of thought that any advance in the recognition of truth is possible. This we hope to consider more fully when we come to the creation of man in the image of God. It is blessedly true for us, who know God, that a thing is true simply because He says so, but this is because we have learned to know Him as the God of truth.

The influence of a wrong conception of God's sovereignty is every evident in the theology of Calvinism, of which it has been said:

> "Calvinism is not accidentally, but essentially immoral, since it makes the distinction between right and wrong a matter of positive enactment, and thereby makes it possible to assert that what is immoral for man is moral for God."

The apostle, in Rom. iii., repudiates the principle of "Let us do evil that good may come" not only for himself, but for the Lord he served (Rom. iii. 4-8). God overrules evil, and for this we cannot be too grateful, but to teach that He definitely plans evil that good may come, or that He will beat down all criticism simply by the weight of his omnipotence, is utterly false.

> "Is God unrighteous Who taketh vengeance? . . . . . For then how shall God judge the world?" (Rom. iii. 4-6).

This is the attitude of Scripture and of all who believe its teaching.

If omnipotence were all, God could have saved sinful man without an atoning sacrifice, yet we know that He spared not His only Son, but freely gave Him up for us all, in order that He might be just and the Justifier of the believing sinner.

The scriptural doctrine of omnipotence is that God can do all things, except that which His own rational and moral nature forbids and that which would violate His purpose in making man in His own likeness. Those who emphasize God's omnipotence are sometimes apt to deny His right to create a moral creature with the power of saying "Yes" or "No".

We hear little of the condescension of God, and His voluntary self-limitation, but without these things neither creation nor salvation would be possible or rational.

#5. The Self-limitation of Omnipotence.
pp. 188 - 191

We can quite understand that some of our readers will not feel together comfortable about a title which speaks of the "limitations of omnipotence", even though they are "self-limitations". It may be well, therefore, to show how such an idea permeates the whole scheme of salvation before we turn our attention to the wider issues raised.

That the Lord Jesus Christ possesses the title "Omnipotent" none can question. The word Pantokrator is translated in the A.V. "Almighty" nine times, and "Omnipotent" once.

> "I am Alpha and Omega, the Beginning and the Ending, saith the Lord, Which is, and Which was, and Which is to come, the Almighty" (Rev. i. 8).

In structural correspondence with this verse we have verses 17 and 18, which remove any doubt as to whether verse 8 refers to the Lord Jesus Christ.

"Fear not; I am the First and the Last. I am He that liveth and was dead, and behold I am alive for evermore, Amen; and have the keys of hell and of death" (Rev. i. 17, 18).

The titles "Alpha and Omega" and "Beginning and Ending" are exchanged for "the First and the Last", while the title "Almighty" corresponds with the possession of the "keys of hell and of death".

In Rev. xix. 6, when the "Marriage of the Lamb is come", the proclamation is made: "The Lord God Omnipotent reigneth." In Rev. xi. it is Christ Who is to reign (verse 15), and once again the title "Almighty" is given to Him:

> "We give thanks, O Lord God Almighty, Which art, and wast (The best texts omit the words 'and art to come', for He is now conceived of as present), because Thou hast taken to Thee Thy great power and hast reigned" (Rev. xi. 17).

There is no need to multiply proofs that the title "Almighty" belongs to Christ. Neither is there any need in these pages to prove that for our sakes "He made Himself of no reputation". We glory in the fact that He Who was rich for our sakes became poor. Without the self-limitation of omnipotence, neither Bethlehem nor Calvary would ever have known the presence of the Son of man.

With this reassurance, we must now go on to consider the question of omnipotence in relation to creation and the sphere of moral government. The Lord has limited His omnipotence in order that righteousness and holiness may work their wondrous way and love have its fullest scope without compromising the throne of glory.

It does not need a very great knowledge of Scripture, or very much logical ability, to realize that Creation presupposes power, and power to such a degree as to be rightly called Omnipotence. We do not intend to enter further into this aspect of the subject, which is vouched for both by Scripture and by common-sense. There is, however, another aspect that appears to have escaped the attention of the majority—the fact that, in the very act of creating a world, God necessarily entered into responsibilities as its Moral Ruler and Upholder. Before creation, God was self-sufficient. He needed nothing. Creation came into being by His good pleasure, and love is revealed to have been at the bottom of it all. Even if creation had been purely mechanical, the "upholding of all things by the Word of His power" would have made a very real demand upon the Creator. The Scriptures, too, are full of references to His tender care over the works of His hands. The Creator is something far more than an all-powerful Wizard. Creation is "the work of His hands", and is upheld by His omnipotent care. The sun, and moon, and stars are held in their courses by a watchful beneficence. Day and night, spring-time and harvest never fail. The very hairs of our head are numbered, and the fall of the sparrow is noted.

Creation, however, does not stop here. There is also a moral realm, a realm in which creatures of God's hand, made in the image of their Creator, are endowed with reason, with intelligence, with the power of choice. Have we ever stopped to think what an undertaking such a creation must inevitably be? When God brought into being a world wherein evil was possible (and this He did when He created man and placed him in the Garden of Eden), what possibilities of rebellion, of wounded love, of ingratitude did He not stoop to endure? Infinite foreknowledge would make it plain that such a universe would make demands that only infinite love could meet. Creation involved the fore-ordination of the Lamb.

When we read of God Himself that "it grieved Him at His heart", we cannot nullify the statement by saying: "It is a Figure of Speech." Even Figures of Speech have a meaning. If God does not "grieve" as man does, there is evidently something that corresponds. If God has no "heart" in the human sense of the word, the figure must represent a reality.

We read in Ecclesiastes:

> "God hath made man upright; but they have sought out many inventions" (Eccles. vii. 29).

God had so made man that he could obey or disobey, and here we see his God-given power exercised for his own ends.

As we think over these things we begin to realize more fully that the Creator is not an abstract, unfeeling Deity, but One Who in the fullness of time came to be known as Father.

We may have little in common with the celebrated American philosopher William James, but we sympathize with him when he says:

> "In fighting against the God of the Absolutist, I am fighting for the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob."

A God near, and not afar off. A Person, not merely an unfeeling power. C. C. J. Webb writes:

> "A God Who cannot be limited by His character were a wholly indeterminate Being, a mere directionless impulse and therefore ineffective and impotent."

Power in itself may heed no limitations, but power working by love will stoop and deny itself, for such is the very essence of love, and love is of God.

Let us worship Him, the almighty and self-sufficient One, but let us remember that we never could have worshipped Him as such, had He not in His love as well as His power, made the world and man as they are.

#6. The Foreknowledge of God.
pp. 230 - 233

In the teachings of men there are two main schools of thought concerning the foreknowledge of God. One school teaches that with God there are no limitations of past, present and future. His knowledge is underived and immediate. He knows infallibly all that will come to pass without necessarily being in any way the cause of it. This view leaves man a free moral agent who can rightly be rewarded or punished for his deeds. The alternative view is tantamount to fatalism. It suggests that whatever God foreknows He Himself has planned to be so, and inasmuch as God knows all things, the evil as well as the good, this doctrine makes Him morally responsible for all human sin. If every human action is inevitably fixed, "law" and "gospel" are indifferent terms, and invitation and warning meaningless mockery. The revealed meaning of sin is denied, for sin is the missing of a mark, the transgression of a law. If God from all eternity has predetermined all that is to come to pass, then all is in obedience to His will, and sin cannot exist. Wherever we find a denial of the freedom of the moral agent, we shall find, either latent or expressed, this emptying of the meaning of sin, and the attributing of God of the authorship of moral evil.

Professor Hamon in his book "The Universal Illusion of Free Will" writes:

> "Scientifically, man is the inevitable product of the surroundings in which he lives and in which his ancestors lived. Logically, he is not responsible for his actions, for he could not help wishing them, the conditions once given . . . . . we ought no more to consider the man who acts responsible, for he is as much an automation as the tiger and the falling rock. General irresponsibility, such is scientific truth."

What a conclusion to reach! This indeed is the fruit that grows from a denial of freedom of choice to the moral agent.

Professor Gunther writes:

> "In reality the world has no place for duty from the scientific point of view. The cosmic process goes on inexorably. How ridiculous and aimless it must be in view of this conception of things, to direct a man how he shall act. As if he could make the slightest change in the exorable march of cause and effect."
>
> "In a world like this there can be no 'ought' and the ten commandments appear foolish."

It is a big step from Professors of Science, to the infidel Editor of The Clarion, but in effect they say the same thing:

> "The tramp who murders a child on the highway could not help doing it. The actions of a man's will are as mathematically fixed as the motions of a planet in its orbit" (Blatchford).

If this teaching were confined to the scientist, the philosopher and the infidel, we should not need to give it any further attention. It is, however, the teaching of some who claim to "preach the Word" and who believe that by this teaching they glorify God. One thing, however, is true of all men whatever they may believe doctrinally. Nobody of normal intelligence acts upon the supposition that man is not free and responsible. The man who has spoken strongly in favour of determinism, denying the freedom of human will, will most rightly, although most illogically, resent any attack upon his person or property. His doctrine has no practical value, and he would indignantly brush aside the excuse of the murderer or the thief if he pleaded irresponsibility or claimed predetermination as the cause of his deeds.

To use the word "will" and at the same time to say that the will is not "free" is a contradiction in terms. A will completely determined by some outside power ceases to be a will at all; it would have to be called by some other name. The will represents conscious action, and as such must be free. We do not and cannot speak of the will of a motor car or even of a plant. Consciousness, personality and freedom of choice are essential. However bound a man may be by sin and its consequences, he is still the object of appeal, of invitation, of warning, and is addressed being free to choose.

While in many respects we hold the writings of John Calvin in high esteem, that part of his creed that deals with the doctrine of eternal decrees, predestinating some to salvation, and others just as irrevocably to damnation, justly merits the censure of Aubrey L. Moore, who writes:

> "Calvinism is not accidentally, but essentially immoral, since it makes the distinction between right and wrong a *matter of positive enactment, and thereby makes it possible to assert that what is immoral for man is moral for God."

(* - This question has been dealt with on pages 144-146)

This is but another way of saying that "Might is Right", a doctrine that has drenched the earth with blood and tears. Whatever else of the teaching of Kant may be set aside, his "categorical imperative" remains. "I ought" implies "I can".

Let us now turn to the passages which assert the foreknowledge of God.

The words proginosko and prognosis occur seven times in the N.T. as follows:

A | Acts ii. 23. The delivering up of Christ as a Sacrifice for sin.
B | Acts xxvi. 5. Manner of life known beforehand.
C | Rom. viii. 29. \
Rom. xi. 2. } Elect according to foreknowledge.
I Pet. i. 2. /
A | I Pet. i. 20. Christ as the Lamb of God.
B | II Pet. iii. 17. Ye know these things beforehand.

Of these seven passages, the two labeled B and B call for no comment here since they speak of human foreknowledge, which no one asserts carries with it any predestinating power. The two references A and A speak of Christ, and the three under C speak of the believer and the people of Israel. It is with these last three references that we are chiefly concerned here. We must, however, give some attention to Acts ii. 23 because of the clear distinction there made between God's foreknowledge of human action, and man's responsibility in spite of the fact that his action is foreknown.

> "Him, being delivered by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God, ye have taken, and by wicked hands have crucified and slain" (Acts ii. 23).

A passage in some respects parallel to this is that found in Luke xxii. 22:

> "And truly the Son of man goeth, as it was determined; but woe unto that man by whom He is betrayed!"

The "determinate counsel" of God, in Acts ii. 23, is distinguished from His "foreknowledge" and is sharply contrasted with the "wicked" actions of men. To say that God foreordained that man should act wickedly is to overthrow the faith. Moreover, like all evil, it is illogical. What God ordains cannot be wicked, for it is His will, and only that which transgresses His will can be called anomos, "lawless". The foreknowledge of God does not deprive man of his freedom nor determine his acts beforehand.

In Rom. viii. 29 "foreknowledge" is differentiated from "predestination". Only those are predestinated to be conformed to the image of His Son, whom He foreknew. The same principle is plainly taught in I Pet. i. 2: "Elect according to the foreknowledge of God the Father."

He Who foreknew the acts of all men could predestinate each to a particular sphere, but to imagine that all men are predestinated either to salvation or to damnation by an arbitrary decree, does violence to the whole tenor of revealed truth. We are obliged to await events before we know, but God is under no such limitation. He knows the end from the beginning, and consequently can make His plans with infallible certainty. Such knowledge may be beyond our understanding, but it is not contrary to the moral law that pervades the Word of God.

Fundamentals of Dispensational Truth. (Second Series).

JOSHUA.

#12. Taking the land, and possessing it--a difference (xi.-xiii.).

pp. 15 - 18

The confederacy of the five kings of the Amorites, recorded in Josh. x., is followed by another confederacy, recorded in chapter xi. These two confederacies must be carefully distinguished from each other, and typify two different phases of the conflict of the ages.

Adoni-zedec, "Lord of righteousness", leads the first confederacy (Josh. x.); Jabin, "Intelligence", leads the second (Josh. xi.). The overthrow of the first, in Gibeon, is accompanied by signs in the sun and moon suggestive of the Second Coming of Christ. The second confederacy assembles at Merom ("High Place"), a word that comes very significantly in the prophetic passage in Isaiah:

> "The Lord shall punish the host of the high ones (marom) that are on high (marom)" (Isa. xxiv. 21).

Kings of the earth are not the only enemies that are to be dealt with in that day, and "the high ones that are on high" are typified by this second confederacy of Josh. xi. The wording of Josh. xi. 4, 5, is so like that of Rev. xx. 7-9 that the parallel cannot be other then intentional.

> "And they went out, they and all their host with them, much people, even as the sand that is upon the sea shore in multitude, with horses and chariots very many. And when all these kings were met together, they came and pitched together at the waters of Merom, to fight against Israel" (Josh. xi. 4, 5).
> "And when the thousand years are expired, Satan shall be loosed out of his prison, and shall go out to deceive the nations which are in the four quarters of the earth, Gog and Magog, to gather them together into battle: the number of whom is as the sand of the sea. And they went up on the breadth of the earth, and compassed the camp of the saints about, and the beloved city; and fire came down from heaven and devoured them" (Rev. xx. 7-9).

In the twenty-third verse of chapter xi. we read:

> "So Joshua took the whole land, according to all that the Lord said unto Moses; and Joshua gave it for an inheritance unto Israel according to their divisions by their tribes. And the land rested from war."

Yet the thirteenth chapter opens with the words:

> "Now Joshua was old and well stricken in years; and the Lord said unto him, Thou art old and stricken in years, and there remaineth yet very much land to be possessed."

A superficial reading of these two verses has led quite a number of critics to conclude that there is a mistake here. It is assumed that every city must have been actually taken or destroyed and every individual Canaanite slain, before it could be truly said: "Joshua took the whole land." But this is not a true interpretation. The taking of the land by Joshua is said to be "according to all that the Lord said unto Moses". In Josh. xxiii. we read:

> "Ye have seen all that the Lord God hath done unto all these nations because of you; for the Lord your God is He that hath fought for you. Behold, I have divided unto you by lot these nations that remain, to be an inheritance for your tribes, from Jordan, with all the nations that I have cut off, even unto the great sea westward. And the Lord your God, He shall expel them from before you" (Josh. xxiii. 3-5).

It is evident from this passage that the taking of the land, the giving of the land for an inheritance, and the dividing of the land by lot, must not be confused with actual "possession". After the statement of xi. 23 where we read "Joshua took all the land", we read in xiii. 1 that there was very much land still to be "possessed". Surely we can perceive the truth here. The Lord had given the land, Joshua had subdued all his opponents, and even though much yet remained to be "possessed", the whole land was theirs. Is there no parallel here with the fact of "all spiritual blessings in heavenly places" being ours in Christ, and its relation to our experimental "possession" of them? Yet, is it right for a member of the Body to limit the gift of God by his own experiences?

The statement, "According to all that the Lord said unto Moses" takes us back to Exod. xxiii.:

> "I will send My fear before thee, and will destroy all the people TO WHOM THOU SHALT COME, and I will make all thine enemies turn their backs unto thee."

This is what the Lord had said unto Moses, and this was fulfilled. The promise continues:

> "I will not drive them out from before thee IN ONE YEAR; lest the land become desolate, and the beast of the field multiply against thee. BY LITTLE AND LITTLE I will drive them out from before thee, until thou be increased and inherit the land" (Exod. xxiii. 27-30).

Instead, therefore, of any discrepancy existing between Josh. xi. 23 and xiii. 1 all is exactly in line with the promise of God.

Joshua, whose age is remarked upon in xiii. 1, was reminded that he need not wait until all the land was "possessed" before it was "divided" (verse 7). There are parallels in N.T. doctrine to the principle manifested here that should be carefully traced. For example, the "old man" was crucified with Christ, as Rom. vi. 6 testifies, and there are those who teach from this passage the complete eradication of sin in the believer. This is confusing the gift of the land in the promise of God, and the actual possession of it at any one time. If Joshua had assumed the complete eradication of all his foes, he would speedily have been taught the truth by bitter experience. It is true of us, as it was true of Israel, that it is "little by little", "until thou be increased", even though in Christ we are already "new creatures", and "seated together" in the heavenlies.

In both xi. 23 and xiv. 15 we read that "the land rested from war". The conquest was achieved and full possession awaited the children of Israel.

We must not omit from our review of all that the Lord had said unto Moses, the passage that speaks of the possibility of Israel failing to drive out the Canaanites.

> "If ye will not drive out the inhabitants of the land from before you; then it shall come to pass that those which ye let remain shall be pricks in your eyes, and thorns in your sides, and shall vex you in the land wherein ye dwell. Moreover it shall come to pass, that I shall do unto you, as I thought to do unto them" (Num. xxxiii. 55, 56)

When, therefore, we read that the land was taken according to all that the Lord had said to Moses, we must remember that He had said many things. Had Israel gone on conquering, had they pressed onto their inheritance, they would have enjoyed a far vaster tract of country than that which eventually became theirs, and this would have been according to what the Lord had said unto Moses. When they failed to press on to the full end of their calling, the failure to possess all that was given to them was still according to what the Lord had said unto Moses. And when they not only failed to possess all, but actually became affiliated with the Canaanites of their land, their total loss of all things, instead of invalidating the promise of God, only fulfilled another part of what the Lord had said to Moses.

Grace is a wonderful word, and runs through the epistle to the Ephesians like a thread of gold, yet so is Faith, and that too interpenetrates the same epistle. The assurance of Col. i. 22 does not make the warning of Col. i. 28 unreal or unnecessary.

The twelfth chapter of Joshua sums up the conquest of the land, and on both sides of Jordan the land is said to be "possessed" (xii. 1, 7, 8). This constituted an assurance and a pledge of the fuller "possession" mentioned in chapter xiii. Thirty-three kings are enumerated, two from the east side of Jordan, and thirty-one from the west. Eleven, the number of misrule (being one less than twelve), and three, the number of Divine perfection and resurrection, are here brought together in the figure 33.

The way is now clear for us to consider the third and largest section of Joshua—chapters xiii.-xxiv., which deals with the possession and dividing of the land.

#13. The difference between "the inheritance" (Col. i. 12) and "the reward of the inheritance" (Col. iii. 24) illustrated from Josh. xiv. and xv.

pp. 52 - 58

The reader may not have very vividly in mind the fact that the structure of Joshua is concerned very largely with "the land" and its division and possession, and as we are now entering upon the third great sub-division of the book. An abbreviated outline of the whole structure may perhaps be appropriate.

Joshua as a whole.

A | i. 1. DEATH OF MOSES.
B | i. 2 - vii. ENTRY INTO THE LAND.
(a) Divided.
(b) Espied.
(c) Entered.
C | viii.-xii. CONQUEST OF THE LAND.
B | xiii. - xxiv. 28. POSSESSION OF THE LAND.
(a) To be possessed.
(b) I have divided.
(c) Of the Amorites.
A | xxiv. 29-33. DEATH OF JOSHUA AND ELEAZAR.

In our last article we drew attention to the difference between "taking" the land, and "possessing" it. Something of the truth implied in this distinction can be seen by comparing together the following passages:

> "So Joshua took the whole land" (Josh. xi. 23).
> "How long are ye slack to go to possess the land, which the Lord God of your fathers hath given you?" (Josh. xviii. 3).

Here we have a glimpse of an important principle found not only in the Old Testament but also in the New. Christ has conquered. He is the great Overcomer. Nevertheless slackness on the part of the believer robs him of much that he might otherwise enjoy.

Immediately following the words quoted above from Josh. xviii., comes the command to Israel to choose "three men for each tribe", to be sent by Joshua to go through the land, and describe it upon their return. It is not surprising, when we know something of the construction of Scripture, to find that between the statements of Josh. xi. 23 and xviii. 3 comes the record of one who had previously spied out the land—Caleb the Overcomer, whose story is the very antithesis of the "slackness" condemned by Joshua.

The word translated “slack” is the Hebrew raphah. In II Sam. xxi. 16, 18, 20 and 22 it occurs as a noun and is translated “giant”, as though it were the Hebrew word rapha, from which rephaim is derived. Both the A.V. and the R.V. seem a little uneasy about translating this word “giant”, for both state in the margin that the Hebrew word is raphah. We believe that the word conveys a deeper meaning than appears in these translations. If raphah the verb means “to slack”, raphah as a noun could mean “The Appaller, one who makes others faint of fail”. This is the view taken by Parkhurst, and it is certainly borne out by the effect upon the ten spies, as their own words testify.

> “There we saw giants, the sons of Anak, which come of the giants: and we were in our own sight as grasshoppers, and so we were in their sight” (Num. xiii. 33).

The play upon two like-sounding words rapha and raphah is a common feature in the Hebrew O.T.

There is one fundamental of dispensational truth which we have reiterated almost to the weariness of our readers. We have often referred to the distinction between the “hope” and the “prize”, between that which is a question of sheer grace and that which, though still by grace, is in the nature of a reward, and has to do with conflict and overcoming. We have stressed the difference between the position of Ephesians with its “boldness with confidence” and that of Philippians with its “fear and trembling”. We have drawn attention in the Epistle to the Hebrews to the fact that while Abraham had the land of promise given to him as a gift by an unconditional covenant, he also had, although this is not revealed in the O.T., the promise of the heavenly city as a reward for his faithfulness (Heb. xi.-xii.). This same kind of distinction we shall find again as we consider the teaching of Josh. xix. and xv. In these chapters we have the division of the land and the portion that fell to Judah in accordance with God’s promise, and also the special Overcomer’s portion, the added “reward of the inheritance” (Col. iii. 24), the “prize of the high calling” (Phil. iii. 14) claimed by Caleb and Othniel.

The account in the section before us—Josh. xiv. 6 - xv. 63—alternates between Judah the tribe and their inheritance, and Caleb the Overcomer and his inheritance.

Josh. xiv. 6 - xv. 63.

A1 | xiv. 6. JUDAH comes to Joshua in Gilgal.
  B1 | xiv. 6-15. CALEB, THE OVERCOMER.—
    The promise made in Kadesh-Barnea. Hebron. Rest.
A2 | xv. 1-12. JUDAH.—Inheritance divided among families. The borders.
  B2 | xv. 13-19. CALEB, THE OVERCOMER.—
    Sons of Anak driven out.
A3 | xv. 20-62. JUDAH.—Inheritance divided among families. The cities.
  B3 | xv. 63. NOT LIKE CALEB.—Not overcomers.
    Did not drive out the Jebusites.

It is suggestive that Joshua is found at Gilgal when the division of the inheritance is to be put in hand. Gilgal was the place where the reproach of Egypt was rolled away, and we are again reminded that there is no inheritance either in earth or in heaven that is not associated with the Cross of Christ.

Before the tribe as a whole come forward to receive their portion, Caleb is heard and rewarded. Caleb makes his appeal to Joshua and bases everything upon "the thing that the Lord said". He refers to an oath sworn by Moses. Most marginal notes refer back to Deut. i. 34-36, but the words quoted by Caleb in Josh. xiv. 9 are not found in this passage. This need not cause us a moment's anxiety, for it is exactly in line with the fact that nowhere in the O.T. do we read that Abraham had any knowledge of the heavenly Jerusalem, yet Heb. xi. assures us that he had.

Caleb was forty years old when the promise was made to him in Kadesh-Barnea, and now he is eighty-five. The Lord had kept His word. Although, as Psalm xc. tells us, those who fell in the wilderness averaged about threescore years and ten (and any reaching fourscore years would only find labour and sorrow), yet Caleb found the Lord his Shield and Buckler, and was delivered from "the snare of the fowler" and the "noisome pestilence". He had had no need to fear the "terror by night", nor the "arrow that flieth by day". A thousand might fall by his side and ten thousand at his right hand, but no harm could come near him. With long life the Lord had promises to satisfy him, and so at eighty-five years of age he can say:

> "As yet I am as strong this day as I was in the day that Moses sent me; as my strength was then, even so is my strength now, for war, both to go out and to come in" (Josh. xiv. 11).

To Caleb was given the mountain which included the city named Hebron. This city had hallowed associations. After Abraham's separation from Lot and the command, "Arise, walk through the land", he removed his tent to the "plain of Mamre, which is in Hebron" (Gen. xiii. 18). Here also Sarah died, as we read in Gen. xxiii. 2: "And Sarah died in Kirjath-arba; the same is Hebron in the land of Canaan". In Hebron, also, in the cave of Machpelah were buried Abraham and Sarah, Isaac and Rebekah, Jacob and Leah (Gen. xlix. 29-33). We are reminded both in Gen. xxiii. and in Josh. xiv. that Hebron had borne another name, Kirjath-arba, the city of Arba, one of the Anakims, or Giants. At the time of which we are speaking, it was in the possession of three sons of Anak who were driven out by Caleb (Josh. xv. 14).

There is an important statement in Josh. xiv. 15 which we must now consider: "And the land had rest from war." The same words are found in Josh. xi. 23, when Joshua "took the whole land". The Companion Bible, in Appendix 50/iv. has the following note:

> "The 'Wars of the Lord' end. Joshua then relinquishes his leadership to Eleazar the Priest (Josh. xiv.). 'And the land had rest from war'." (Josh. xiv. 15).
> "The First Sabbatic Year of Lev. xxv. 1-7."

Here we have brought together two features of great importance. The first is the association of Joshua from this time onward with the Priest. The immediate necessity for the intervention of Eleazar was probably the fact that he only could divide the country

"by lot" as the Priest alone had the "Urim and Thummim". There is, however, something more than this to be learnt. We have here a prophetic foreshadowing of the day when the Lord Jesus Christ shall fulfil the words of Zechariah:

> "He shall sit and rule upon His throne: and He shall be a Priest upon His throne, and the counsel of peace shall be between them both" (Zech. vi. 13).

The Gospel according to Matthew sets forth the Lord first as the Son of David, the King (Matt. i. - xvi. 20), and then (Matt. xvi. 21 - xxviii.) as the Son of Abraham, the Offering (and also the Priest). In the Book of the Revelation these offices are combined, for He Who is "Prince of the kings of the earth" (Rev. i. 5) is seen also as the Great High Priest (Rev. i. 12, 13).

The second feature of prophetic importance is the fact that the statement, "The land had rest from war" (Josh. xiv. 15) is made during the first sabbatic year of Israel's history, and is a pledge and foreshadowing of the "rest that remaineth to the people of God", the thousand years of peace before the end (Rev. xx.).

The structure of Josh. xiv. and xv. alternates the whole tribe of Judah and the allotment of their inheritance, with Caleb the Overcomer; and at the end the whole tribe are placed in contrast with Caleb, for they fail as Overcomers in the matter of the Jebusites.

Josh. xv. 1-12 is of importance as a legal document, but we do not feel that a detailed examination of these geographical boundaries would justify the space involved. We draw attention, however, to the following points, which are of interest to all the people of God.

(1) No writer who did not possess first-hand information would expose himself to detection as the writer of Josh. xv. had done. The detailed account of the country, the names of the cities and the added comments are evidence that the Book of Joshua cannot have been a "pious forgery".

(2) The size of the territory allotted to Judah was a piece of country about 45 miles in length by 50 miles in breadth, and it is clear from the chapter that the land literally teemed with people.

Colonel Condor writes:

> "The geographical chapters (of Joshua) are most clearly explained by the aid of the long list of 119 towns conquered by Thothmes III. in Palestine before the Exodus. We thus are able to prove that many of them were standing long before the Hebrew conquest. Others are mentioned in the Canaanite letters (found at Tel-el-Amarna) as already detailed."

(See Volume VI, page 140 for fuller details).

(3) Some of the names of these cities indicate their strength as fortresses, e.g., Azmon (Josh. xv. 4), while others reveal the nature of the false worship carried on, e.g., Adar (Josh. xv. 3), which means "Fire God", Beth-Shemesh (Josh. xv. 10) meaning "House of the Sun", and Chesil or Cesil (Josh. xv. 30), which refers to the star group Orion. The name of the city Kirjath-sepher (Josh. xv. 15) is important, as the word means "Book Town".

This point leads us to the record of Othniel, Caleb's brother or nephew, who went up to Kirjath-sepher, also called Debir ("Oracle"), and smote it. This is a most suggestive lesson and must be associated with Caleb's faithful following of the Lord, when we consider him as a type of the Overcomer. All true overcoming is intimately concerned with the Word of God. The fight is the fight of faith. The contention is for the faith once delivered to the saints. The Lord Himself has left us His own glorious example, for He overcame temptation in the days of His flesh by an appeal to "It is written" (Matt. iv.). And in the days of His glory He will appear riding out of heaven as the King of kings and Lord of lords, still bearing the title: "The Word of God." So also it is written of the Overcomers in Rev. xii.:

> "And they overcame him because of the blood of the Lamb, and because of the word of their testimony; and they loved not their lives unto the death" (Rev. xii. 11).

The failure of Judah to drive out the Jebusites from Jerusalem may teach a deeper lesson than the inability of many of God's children to overcome their spiritual foes. Caleb drove out the Anakim from Hebron, and Othniel took Kirjath-sepher. Fellowship (Hebron) was thus restored, and the false teaching of the enemy (Sepher = "Book") destroyed. This, however, does not touch the seat and origin of iniquity. That is enthroned in the royal city Jerusalem. It was left for David the King, and type of Christ, to drive out the Jebusite from the royal city. Let us, however, not undervalue the lesser victory of faith, for David was crowned King in Hebron before he reigned as King over all at Jerusalem.

As he contemplates the nature of Joshua's foes, the awful character of their idolatry (including as we find in xv. 8 the savage worship of the valley of Hinnom, the "Gehenna" of the Gospels), the essential features of the Overcomer, the Priest-King suggested by the co-operation of Joshua and Eleazar, the sabbatic year, and the failure to expel the Jebusites, the reader will not fail to appreciate how fully these records of Israel's history foreshadow the spiritual conflict of practically every believer throughout the ages.

In conclusion, may we once more emphasize the necessity to try the things that differ and to distinguish between the inheritance which all Judah received as a gift, and that special portion which Caleb of the tribe of Judah received as a reward. The same principle underlies the Epistle to the Ephesians (the free gift) and the Epistle to the Philippians (the prize), and those who ignore this distinction are bound to suffer themselves and mislead others.

JOSHUA.
#14. Shadows of good things to come (xviii.-xxiv.).
pp. 83 - 89

We have already given some attention to the record of Josh. xiv. and xv., where the allotment of Judah's portion of the land is described. Joseph's double portion comes next, and, according to promise, this is divided between Ephraim and Manasseh.

In Josh. xvi. we observe the sad fact that: "The Canaanites dwell among the Ephraimites unto this day, and serve under tribute" (Josh. xvi. 10). This proved to be a fatal compromise for Ephraim, and in later years the prophet Hosea uses the name Ephraim as representing the two sins of covetousness and idolatry.

> "Ephraim is joined to idols: let him alone" (Hos. iv. 17). "He is a merchant (Heb. Canaanite), the balances of deceit are in his hands" (Hos. xii. 7; see also xii. 14, xiii. 1).

The tribute that was paid by the Canaanites really put the Ephraimites themselves under tribute, instead of their occupying their rightful place as children and heirs of God. Any complicity with our spiritual Canaanites, however apparently advantageous, must of necessity prove the undoing of our spiritual life and service. When the woman possessed by the spirit of Python cried after the apostles: "These men are the servants of the Most High God, which show unto us the way of salvation" (Acts xvi. 17), her words were true; and had the apostle been of the same mind as the Ephraimites, he might have accepted the testimony. However, as we read in Acts xvi, he would not tolerate any fellowship of this kind, however superficially true, and said: "I command thee in the name of Jesus Christ to come out of her" (Acts xvi. 18). As a result the apostle received ill-treatment and imprisonment, but the fruits of his faithfulness in his first witness to Europe are ours to this day.

We noticed in a previous article, when speaking of Caleb and his claim, how he based it all upon the word of the Lord to Moses, and in the passage before us, we find the same thing with the daughters of Zelophehad (Josh. xvii. 3, 4).

In Josh. xvii. 12-18, we find Joshua administering a well-deserved rebuke to Manasseh, and the passage contains a lesson that is true for all time. At the beginning Manasseh could not drive out the Canaanite. This meant lack of faith, for God had promised that all that was needed was faith in Himself. When "the children of Israel waxed strong", instead of using their strength to fulfil the Lord's command, they fell instead into the same snare as Ephraim, and put the Canaanites under tribute. In spite of their failure we find that "the children of Joseph" came to Joshua and boasted of their greatness and blessedness, and asked why they had received but one lot and one portion.

> "And Joshua answered them, If thou be a great people, then get thee up to the wood country, and cut down for thyself there in the land of the Perizzites and of the giants, if mount Ephraim be too narrow for thee" (Josh. xvii. 15).

True greatness will always find room for expansion. There will always be territory to reclaim from the enemy until the day of glory dawns. We have our inheritance, and with that as the base, we shall find countless opportunities, as did Caleb and Othniel, of realizing something of the mighty power that is towards those that believe.

We cannot, of course, consider in detail the many chapters devoted to the settlement of the tribes in the land, but if we take a bird's eye-view of the section, we shall find an alternation of the "civil" and the "sacred". The "sacred" sections are lettered "B" in the structure below and are concerned with the setting up of the tabernacle at Shiloh and the setting apart of the "cities of refuge" and the "cities of the Levites".

Joshua xiii.-xxii.

A | xiii.-xvii. Land divided among the tribes.
B | xviii. 1. The tabernacle at Shiloh.
A | xviii. 2 - xix. Land divided among the tribes.
B | xx.-xxii. Cities of refuge and of the Levites.

> "And the whole congregation of the children of Israel assembled together at Shiloh, and set up the tabernacle of the congregation there. And the land was subdued before them" (Josh. xviii. 1).

This gathering of the people and the division of the land is an anticipation of the day spoken of by Jacob in Gen. xlix. 10: "Until Shiloh come: and unto Him shall the gathering of the people be." Shiloh means "Peace", and is practically at the centre of the land of Palestine, about 20 miles north of Jerusalem.

We learn from the narrative of Josh. xviii. that seven tribes still remained without inheritance, and that three men of each tribe were sent to make a survey and to report thereon:

> "And the men went and passed through the land, and described it by cities into seven parts in a book, and came again to Joshua to the host at Shiloh. And Joshua cast lots for them in Shiloh before the Lord: and there Joshua divided the land unto the children of Israel according to their divisions" (Josh. xviii. 9, 10).

This survey made a kind of Doomsday book and mapped out the portions of each division so that no doubt should exist in future days as to the bounds of each inheritance.

The feature that is typical and of importance to us is contained in the statement: "And the land was subdued before them" (Josh. xviii. 1).

We have here an echo of the words of Gen. i. 28: "Replenish the earth and subdue it."

And we have the authority of the N.T. for associating together Gen. i., Psa. viii., and the day when all enemies shall be subjected under the feet of Christ (Heb. ii. 6-8,

I Cor. xv. 24-28)—showing how fully the occurrences in Joshua are shadows of things to come. Although the individual tribes might fail in taking full possession of their inheritance, yet at Shiloh, in the tabernacle of the congregation and before the Lord, the land was subdued.

The tabernacle remained at Shiloh until the days of Eli (I Sam. iv. 12). We hear of it at Nob in the days of Saul, and at Gibeon in the days of Solomon. Reference to the transference of the ark from Shiloh to Jerusalem is found in Psalm lxxviii., where the historic truth of Josh. xviii. is endorsed:

> "They provoked Him to anger with their high places, and moved Him to jealousy with their graven images. When God heard this He was wroth and greatly abhorred Israel: so He forsook the tabernacle of Shiloh . . . . . He refused the tabernacle of Joseph, and chose not the tribe of Ephraim" (Psa. lxxviii. 58-60, 67).

From Josh. xviii. 11 to xix. 50 the inheritances of the remaining seven tribes, together with Joshua's own portion are described. While we must not stay to consider the passages dealing with the seven tribes and their portions, the inheritance of Joshua himself calls for attention. Caleb receives his inheritance first (Josh. xiv.) and, although Joshua had as much right as Caleb, it is not until "an end of dividing the land" has been accomplished that Joshua enters into his own. The wording here is remarkable:

> "The children of Israel gave an inheritance to Joshua the son of Nun among them" (Josh. xix. 49).

Above and beyond the evident meekness and unselfishness of Joshua personally, we certainly have here a foreshadowing of the greater Joshua. Joshua himself had nothing to leave or to give up, but the Lord Jesus laid aside His glory that He might find a dwelling-place among His people. The city for which Joshua asked was called Timnath-serah, a word which means, according to Gesenius, "A portion that was over and above". In Heb. i. 1-3 we have revealed something of the glory of the Lord Jesus, which He laid aside when He stooped to die. And verse 4 continues:

> "Being made so much better than the angels, as He hath by inheritance obtained a more excellent name than they."

Why does this passage assure us that Christ is so much better than angels? Such a statement seems, at first sight, hardly necessary. But the point of Heb. i. 1-4 is that what was His by right, is His now by merit or inheritance—and therefore, that what could never have been shared by man before, can now be shared by all His own. The true Joshua receives an inheritance from His people, and comes and builds a dwelling-place for Himself among them.

The name of Joshua's city in Judges ii. 9 is given as Timnath-heres, meaning "A portion of the sun". The Rabbins have not been slow to interpret this as being due to the representation of the sun on Joshua's grave, in memory of the miracle at Gibeon. This is highly improbable, the simpler explanation being that the letters "s" and "h" have been transposed, an occurrence that frequently happens when copying a manuscript, and of which there are several examples in the Scriptures.

The twentieth chapter of Joshua is taken up with the appointing of the cities of refuge. The same God Who had commanded the extermination of the Canaanites, provides for the safety of the man-slayer—i.e., one not guilty of willful murder. The "avenger of blood" was not permitted to touch the man-slayer when once he had found refuge in one of these cities. He remained there until the death of the High Priest* (*This is referred to in Heb. ix. 27, 28. For a fuller explanation, see Volume XVI, pages 54, 55).

These cities of refuge were so situated as to be accessible to all the tribes. The three cities on the West of Jordan—Kedesh, Shechem and Hebron—had been closely associated with the history of the people. Kedesh was near the scene of Joshua's great victory over the confederate kings, and so, in type, is associated with the final glorious victory of Christ (Josh. xi.). Shechem was the place where Abraham built his first altar in the land of Canaan (Gen. xii. 7). And Hebron was associated with Abraham, Isaac and Jacob as well as with the overcomer Caleb.

After the appointing of the cities of refuge, the Levites came to Eleazar the Priest and to Joshua, and reminded them of the command of the Lord that they should have cities to dwell in and suburbs for their cattle (Josh. xxi. 1, 2). These were settled by lot, a total of forty-eight cities, and with this allotment, the Scripture sums up:

> "There failed not ought of any good thing which the Lord had spoken unto the house of Israel; all came to pass" (Josh. xxi. 45).

The time had now come for the tribes of Reuben and Gad and the half tribe of Manasseh to be permitted to cross the Jordan and enter into the inheritance which they had chosen in the land of Gilead (Josh. xxii. 9). Joshua recognizes that they have fulfilled their agreement to stand by the rest of the tribes until all have received their inheritance; and, with an exhortation to be diligent in giving heed to the commandment and the law, to love the Lord and to walk in all His ways, Joshua blesses the people and sends them on their way (Josh. xxii. 5, 6).

And now a strange thing happens:

> "And when they came unto the borders of Jordan, that are in the land of Canaan, the children of Reuben and the children of Gad and the half tribe of Manasseh built there an altar by Jordan, a great altar to see to" (Josh. xxii. 10).

Immediately this news reaches Shiloh, all Israel gather themselves together for war against the two and a half tribes. And Phinehas demands an explanation of their action, reminding them of the judgment that fell at Peor, and suggesting that if the land of their choice be deemed unclean because of its separation from the Tabernacle, Israel would willingly find room for them in the land—

> "But rebel not against the Lord, nor rebel against us in building you an altar beside the altar of the Lord our God" (Josh. xxii. 19).

The two and a half tribes vehemently repudiate the charge of rebellion, and deny that there had been any intention of using the altar for sacrificial purposes; it had been built in order that their children in days to come should realize that they still had part with the tribes across Jordan.

> "Behold the pattern of the altar of the Lord, which our fathers made, not for burnt offerings, nor for sacrifices; but it is a witness between us and you" (Josh. xxii. 28).

This explanation satisfies Phinehas and he says:

> "This day we perceive that the Lord is among us, because ye have not committed this trespass against the Lord" (Josh. xxii. 31).

How are we to regard this question of the building of the altar? The Law of Moses most certainly forbad the offering of sacrifice anywhere else but at the door of the tabernacle (Lev. xvii. 8, 9). Were the two and a half tribes justified in partly transgressing this commandment? With the fact of the history of Israel before us, and the knowledge of how easily they lapsed into idolatry, we cannot but feel that the erection of this altar was a sad mistake, and that no policy can justify departure from any commandment of the Lord. The Companion Bible expresses no opinion on the question. Some commentators are very much in its favour, others strongly condemn. It is difficult, perhaps, to avoid the charge of being uncharitable, but we cannot help feeling that, however good the intentions of the builders might have been, the whole action was a mistake. Anything in the nature of putting out one's hand to stay the ark of God, however, well intentioned, is wrong. The whole trouble seems to have been the natural fruit of their initial act of self-will. In Num. xxxii. 1 there are arguments that remind us strongly of Lot's fatal choice, and Moses denounces their choice as but a repetition of the false action of the ten spies (Num. xxxii. 14). It is true that an agreement was made with these tribes, and that the land of their choice was granted to them; nevertheless, we have learned both from experience and from the Scriptures that self-willed choice, even if it is permitted, generally ends in disaster. In all this history there is much that reminds us of those in Phil. iii., who minded earthly things, instead of being willing to forego all inheritance until over Jordan and in the land of promise.

The Book of Joshua concludes with an address by Joshua to all the people, in which he warns them of the results of departure from the Lord, and encourages them to adhere closely to all that had been written in the law. The passage ends with a solemn covenant on the part of the people, and the setting up of a great stone as a witness.

At the age of one hundred and ten years Joshua dies and is buried in the border of his inheritance. The bones of Joseph are buried in Shechem; and Eleazar the Priest is buried in mount Ephraim.

> "And Israel served the Lord all the days of Joshua, and all the days of the elders that overlived Joshua, and which had known all the works of the Lord, that He had done for Israel" (Josh. xxiv. 31).

There is something about this verse that makes one anticipate the sad departure that set in later, which is characteristic of the Book of Judges. The LXX has an addition to the last chapter of Joshua, and tells us that the sons of Israel worshipped Astarte and the gods of the nations round about them, and that the Lord delivered them into the hands of Eglon the King of Moab, who ruled over them eighteen years. While, therefore, the Book of Joshua is full of valuable teaching for the believer to-day, it is also a revelation of the utter failure of all men apart from the finished work of the Lord Jesus Christ, and it is significant that its last words record the death of the High Priest. None but He Who ever liveth can save His people to the uttermost; all others, though types and shadows of the true, must ever fall short of perfection.

JUDGES.
#1. The Book as a Whole (i. - xxi.).
"There was no king in Israel."
pp. 128 - 131

The first reading of the book of Judges leaves the reader with a feeling of perplexity. What is the purpose of the book? Upon what plan has it been written? That it reveals an awful state of affairs is most evident, and it is also obvious that this terrible condition arose directly out of the fact that "There was no King in Israel, every one did that which was right in his own eyes" (Judges xxi. 25).

While somewhat detailed accounts are given of such judges as Gideon and Samson, of others, though their names and the number of years of their judging of Israel are recorded, not a single event in their lives is chronicled. For example:

> "And after Abimelech there arose to defend Israel Tola the son of Puah, the son of Dodo, a man of Isaachar, and he dwelt in Shamir in mount Ephraim. And he judged Israel twenty and three years, and died, and was buried in Shamir" (Judges x. 1, 2).

From such an entry, we gather that in this book we are dealing with actual history, but from the evident selection of incident we also conclude that the books is not only historical but also typical in its teaching. All Scripture is "profitable" for doctrine, for reproof, for instruction in righteousness, therefore that man of God who knows not the teaching which is associated with such names as Othniel, Barak, Gideon or Samson will not be "thoroughly furnished".

Upon making a list of the names of those who judged or ruled Israel, we are immediately struck with the ominous fact that there are thirteen. Twelve of these were raised up by God, and one, Abimelech, a usurper, likened, in Jotham's parable, to a Bramble, evidently foreshadowed the Antichrist.

Before giving an analysis of the book as a whole and pointing out its moral, let us set out the names of these judges, together with any features suggestive of their typical teaching.

(1) OTHNIEL.—Enemy, Mesopotamia. Rest 40 years (iii. 9-11).
(2) EHUD.—Left-hand. Dagger. Enemy, Moab. Rest 80 years (iii. 15-30).
(3) SHAMGAR.—Ox-goad. Enemy, Philistines (iii. 31).
(4) DEBORAH.—Tent peg. Enemy, Canaan. Rest 40 years (iv.-v.).
(5) GIDEON.—Lamps and Pitchers. Enemy, Midian. Rest 40 years (vi.-viii.).
ABIMELECH.—"Then said all the trees unto the bramble, Come thou and reign over us" (ix. 14).
(6) TOLA.—He judged Israel twenty-three years (x. 1, 2).
(7) JAIR.—He judge Israel twenty-two years (x. 3-5).
(8) JEPHTHAH.—The rash vow. Enemy, Ammon (xi. - xii. 7).
(9) IBZAN.—He judged Israel seven years (xii. 8).
(10) ELON.—He judged Israel ten years (xii. 11).
(11) ABDON.—He judged Israel eight years (xii. 13, 14).
(12) SAMSON.—Jawbone of ass. Enemy, Philistines (xiii.-xvi.).

Abimelech is not given a number, as he was self-chosen, and therefore not appointed by God.

Preparatory to a closer study, let us now take a survey of the book, noticing its broad outlines. In the opening chapter we find a recognition of the Lord.

> "The children of Israel asked the Lord, saying, Who shall go up for us against the Canaanites first, to fight against them?" (Judges i. 1).

Judah is chosen and, for a time, there is progressive victory. As we proceed, however, we find marks of failure.

(1) "He could not drive out the inhabitants of the valley, because they had chariots of iron" (i. 19).
(2) "The Jebusites dwell with the children of Benjamin in Jerusalem" (i. 21).
(3) "The Canaanites would dwell in that land" (i. 27).
(4) "They put the Canaanites to tribute and did not utterly drive them out" (i. 28).
(5) "The Asherites dwelt among the Canaanites" (i. 32).
(6) "The Amorites forced the children of Dan into the mountain: for they would not suffer them to come down to the valley: but the Amorites would dwell in mount Heres in Ajalon and in Shaalbim" (i. 34, 35).

Here is a solemn progression in failure. The chariots of iron, though formidable, had been spoken of by Joshua, who had said "For thou shalt drive out the Canaanites, though they have iron chariots, and though they be strong" (Josh. xvii. 18). Thus it is clear that all that Israel lacked was faith in the Word of the Lord. Instead of maintaining their separate position, Israel began to allow the Canaanites to dwell with them, and put them under tribute. But in course of time the process becomes reversed, and we find the Asherites dwelling among the Canaanites, words eloquent in typical teaching. Finally, the Amorites assume the role of conquerors. They are the ones that use force, and the humiliation is all the more pronounced that it takes place at Ajalon, the scene of such a mighty triumph under Joshua (Josh. x. 12).

In Judges ii. 6-20 we read in solemn language the Divine synopsis of the whole book:

> "The people served the Lord all the days of Joshua, and all the days of the elders that outlived Joshua . . . . . And there arose another generation after them, which knew not the Lord, nor yet the works which He had done for Israel . . . . . they forsook the Lord God of their fathers . . . . . and served Baal and Ashtaroth . . . . . He delivered them into the hands of spoilers . . . . . He raised up judges which delivered them . . . . . yet they would not hearken."

In these circumstances, instead of driving out the nations from before Israel, the Lord said He would use them to "prove" Israel, much as He had used the experiences of the forty years' wandering in the wilderness (Deut. viii. 2).

From this point to the end of Judges xviii. we have the history of the judges, and the closing chapters depict the fearful condition, both spiritually and morally, into which Israel had fallen. As, in these closing verses, we three times hear the sad refrain, "There was no king in Israel" (xviii. 1; xix. 1 and xxi. 25), so the subject of kingship will be found running throughout the story of the judges. Gideon's brethren "resembled the children of a king". He himself was invited to rule over Israel but refused, and his son Abimelech, born of a concubine, in Shechem, usurped the kingdom. Again, Jephthah is invited to be head over all Gilead, and the sad confession is made in the days of Samson: "Knowest thou not that Philistines are rulers over us?" (Judges xv. 11).

Equally with the absence of the true king in all this turmoil and misrule, is felt the absence of the true priest. Even Gideon made a Ephod to the undoing of Israel (viii. 24-27). This finds an echo in the Ephod made by Micah (xvii. 5). Truly the whole sad history cries out for the one King-Priest after the order of Melchisedec, even the Lord Jesus Christ. At every turn its typical teaching illustrates the condition and character of the world and of the church, while He is absent, or while He is not recognized as Lord over all to the church.

With this review of the book in mind the reader will perhaps the better appreciate the following structure of the book as a whole, which places the items we have surveyed in their respective places, and demonstrates the design of the book and the intended lesson.

Judges.---The Book as a whole.

A | a | i. 1-15. "The children of Israel asked the Lord."
b | i. 16 - iii. 9. FAILURE. | Judah and the Canaanites.
Not destroyed utterly.
Wives taken.
B | iii. 10 - viii. 32. THE JUDGES. | The form of a King (viii. 18).
Rule over us (viii. 22).
The Ephod (viii. 24-27).
The need for the King-Priest felt.
C | ix. ABIMELECH.—THE ANTICHRIST. | The Olive, Fig, Vine.
The Bramble.
Reign thou over us.
B | x. - xviii. THE JUDGES. | Be our head (xi. 8).
Philistines rule (xv. 11).
No King in Israel (xvii. 6).
The Ephod (xvii. 5).
The need for the King-Priest felt.
A | b | xix. - xxi. 24. FAILURE. | Judah and Benjamin.
Destroyed too many.
Wives refused.
a | xxi. 25. "No King in Israel: every man did that which was right in his own eyes."

JUDGES.
#2. The root cause of failure (i. 1 - iii. 9).
pp. 166 - 171

Before we come to the exploits of the judges, we must make a closer acquaintance with the section that introduces us to their history, viz., i. 1 - iii. 9. We are distinctly told that, after the death of Joshua and the elders that outlived him, Israel went astray, so that we must be prepared to find the seeds of departure even in the opening chapter.

> What could be more reasonable, one might ask, than the opening request in Chapter i.: "Who shall go up against the Canaanites first?" (i. 1).

But we must remember that all Israel were commanded to fight, and that the Canaanites were one nation out of seven that were specified as their enemies (Josh. iii. 10). After Judah had been commanded to go up against the Canaanites and the Canaanites & the Perizzites had been delivered into their hand, we read: "And they found Adoni-bezek in Bezek" (Judges i. 5). Now we must remember that God Himself had commanded the utter destruction of the Canaanites:

> "And when the Lord thy God shall deliver them before thee: thou shalt smite them, and utterly destroy them" (Deut. vii. 2).
> "Of the cities of these people, which the Lord thy God doth give thee for an inheritance, thou shalt save alive nothing that breatheth" (Deut. xx. 16).

These commands included Adoni-bezek, but, like Saul who spared Agag, Judah spares Adoni-bezek from utter destruction. Doubtless there were some who questioned God's command. Perhaps, with some glimmerings of His love, they argued, as some do to-day, that utter destruction of any of His creatures would be a contradiction of this wonderful attribute of love. There are some to-day who teach that there is no such thing as the destruction of body and soul in Gehenna, and offer translations to prove the salvation of Judas and the restoration of Satan. With all such reasoning we have nothing to do. What God has said should settle the matter for us all.

Adoni-bezek was caught, and his thumbs and his great toes were cut off (Judges i. 6). This was a practice in those barbaric days calculated to render captives incapable of further warfare. Adoni-bezek acknowledged that he had himself so treated seventy other kings. At the time of their consecration, the thumb and great toe of Aaron and the priests were touched with blood, so that the cutting off of these members in the case of Adoni-bezek would seem to indicate incapacity for the Lord's service. It is interesting to notice, in passing, that in Exod. xxix. and Lev. viii. the right ear is mentioned first indicating that, without obedient hearing, hand and foot could not be truly consecrated.

The name "Adoni-bezek" means "The Lord of lightning", and is a figure of Satan. Satan disabled the nations of the earth, which were reckoned as seventy in number (Deut. xxxii. 8 and Gen. x.) and he himself is to be imprisoned for a thousand years. At the end of that period he is found to be as bad as ever, and is cast into the lake of fire and brimstone. Inasmuch as both Death and Hades are cast into this same fire, it is evident that the intention is destruction.

Here, in this first chapter of Judges, we have the beginning of all the future troubles of the people of God. Implicit, unquestioning obedience would have meant victory, peace and prosperity. Instead, one compromise led to another, resulting eventually in failure and defeat. It is scarcely necessary to point the moral. Each heart knows its own bitterness, and its natural tendency to spare or only partially mutilate what God has said must be destroyed.

Before we go into further detail, it will help us to see the general disposition of the subject-matter in structural form.

Judges i. 1 - iii. 9.

A | i. 1-20. |
a1 | i. 1-4. Judah and Simeon fight against the Canaanites.
b1 | i. 5-7. Adoni-bezek. Jerusalem.
a2 | i. 8-11. Judah fights against Jerusalem, Kirjath-arba and Kirjath sepher.
b2 | i. 12-15. Othniel. Kirjath-sepher.
a3 | i. 16-19. Judah and Simeon slay the Canaanites.
b3 | i. 20. Caleb. Hebron. Three sons of Anak.
B | i. 21-26. Benjamin fails to drive out the Jebusites.
The man of Luz perpetuates idolatry.
C | i. 27. Neither did Manasseh.
i. 29. Neither did Ephraim.
i. 30. Neither did Zebulun.
i. 31. Neither did Asher.
i. 33. Neither did Nasphtali.
B | i. 34-36. Amorites force Dan into the mountains.
Joseph exacts tribute.
A | ii. 1 - iii. 9. |
a | ii. 1-5. Angel of the Lord. Nations as thorns.
I will not drive them out.
b | ii. 6-10. Joshua and all that generation.
b | ii. 10-13. Another generation that knew not the Lord.
a | ii. 14 - iii. 9. Anger of the Lord.
I will not drive them out. Left to prove Israel.

In i. 10-15 and i. 30 we have a re-statement of what has already been recorded in Josh. xv. 13-19. Caleb was an overcomer, and so also was his younger brother Othniel. The story is repeated here in order to show the root cause of Israel's failure. They did not wholly follow the Lord as did Caleb; they did not utterly destroy the seed of the wicked one but spared them, and dwelt with them, and took tribute of them. All this would be acclaimed as very human and humane, very worldly-wise and civilized, but after all disobedient and ruinous.

Just as Adoni-bezek is a type of Satan, so Kirjath-arba and Kirjath-sepher are types of Satan's activities. Kirjath-arba is associated with the Giants, the sons of Anak. These were the seed of the Wicked One, and, like the "tares"" in the parable, were devoted to destruction. Kirjath-sepher means "The City of the Book". Its name was changed to Debir which means "Oracle", as Kirjath-arba was changed to Hebron, which means "Fellowship". The doctrine of demons, the false gospels and teachings that form part of Satan's propaganda, must be destroyed if true success is to be achieved. God's oracle, the inspired Scriptures (Debir) must take their place, and fellowship with the Lord (Hebron) must be our strength—and not the "strength of Baal", which is the meaning of the name Arba.

In contrast with this uncompromising attitude which characterizes all true overcomers, is the incident connected with the man who was an inhabitant of Bethel. The name

Bethel, or "The house of God", had been given to the place by Jacob, but it had still retained its original name of Luz. Worldly wisdom would have commended the action of the tribe of Joseph. The spies see a man coming out of the city and promise him mercy if he will show them the entrance into it. The city is taken and the man and his family spared. Instead of accepting the change, however, and remaining as one of the first citizens of the renamed city of Bethel, we read:

> "The man went into the land of the Hittites, and built a city, and called the name thereof Luz: which is the name thereof unto this day" (Judges i. 26).

Paul's comment seems apposite here:

> "If I build again the things which I destroyed, I make myself a transgressor" (Gal. ii. 18).
> "How turn ye again to the weak and beggarly elements?" (Gal. iv. 9).

We next come to the central section of the structure: Judges i. 27-33. The repetition of the word "Neither" here is a solemn witness of failure.

> "The Canaanites would dwell" (Judges i. 27).

The word rendered "would" is the Hiphil form of yaal, and is variously translated in the A.V. "begin", "be content", "please", "assay", and "would". Perhaps in the passage under consideration the modern phrase "made overtures" gives a fairly good idea of the Canaanites' attitude. The Canaanites expressed their willingness to pay tribute or do anything asked of them in exchange for permission to dwell in the land; and counsels of worldly wisdom and that much praised quality "humanity" prevailed.

> "The Asherites dwelt among the Canaanites" (Judges i. 32).

This is ever the sequence. First the world comes into the church; then the church finds its place in the world. Give the Canaanite an inch and he will soon claim a yard, for the yard has already been conceded in principle. The word "among" is gereb, which is elsewhere translated "bowels", "heart", and "inward part", indicating how complete was Israel's failure. The subsequent decline and fall described in the succeeding chapters of Judges is incipient in these tragic verses of chapter i.

> "The Amorites forced the children of Dan" (Judges i. 34).

Here the full tale of degradation is told, for the word translated "forced" is the word used in Exod. iii. 9:

> "I have also seen the oppression wherewith the Egyptians oppress them."

Israel, redeemed from the bondage of Egypt, and beyond both the Red Sea and the Jordan, enter again into bondage. The N.T. equivalent is found in Galatians:

"But now, after ye have known God, or rather are known of God, how turn ye again to the weak and beggarly elements, whereunto ye desire again to be in bondage?" (Gal. iv. 9).

Paul's "No, not for an hour" (Gal. ii. 5) is as vital to-day as it was in his own time, and as it would have been in Judges i.

"And the Angel of the Lord came from Gilgal to Bochim" (Judges ii. 1).

Gilgal was the place where the reproach of Egypt was rolled away, where the rite that set forth "no confidence in the flesh" was performed. Bochim means "Weepers" and was so named by Israel (ii. 5).

The Lord sworn that He would never break His covenant with Israel, but many forget, when they criticize His change of attitude, that a covenant implies two parties, and when Israel had grievously broken their part of the contract, the covenant obligations of the Lord at once ceased. The terms of the covenant included the condition that Israel should make no league with the inhabitants of Canaan, and in this they failed.

"Wherefore I also said, I will not drive them out from before you; but they shall be as thorns in your sides, and their gods shall be a snare unto you . . . . . that through them I may prove Israel" (Judges ii. 3-22).

The changes that is observable between Ephesians and II Timothy suggests something of a parallel, and explains the presence of so much evil in and around the church.

"For there must also be heresies among you, that they which are approved may be made manifest among you" (I Cor. xi. 19).

Even Paul's "thorn in the flesh" takes on a fuller meaning when seen in the light of Judges ii.

We will conclude this article by giving the necessary expansion of the two members A | a | ii. 1-5. and A | a | ii. 14 - iii. 9. in the structure set out on page 168.

_A_ | a | Judges ii. 1-5.

A | a | ii. 1. The angel of the Lord came . . . . . and said.
b | ii. 1. BOCHIM.
B | ii. 1-3. | c | I said, I will never break My covenant.
d1 | Ye shall make no league.
Ye shall throw down their altars.
d2 | Ye have not obeyed My voice.
Why have ye done this?
c | I also said, I will not drive them out.
d3 | They shall be as thorns.
Their gods shall be a snare.
A | a | ii. 4. The Angel of the Lord spake these words.
b | ii. 5. BOCHIM.

A* | a | Judges ii. 14 - iii. 9.

A | a | ii. 14. The anger of the Lord was hot.
b | ii. 14. He delivered them to spoilers.
c | ii. 16-18. He raised up judges which delivered them.
B | ii. 19. Israel followed other gods to serve them.
B | iii. 6-7. Israel served their gods . . . . . Baalim.
A | a | iii. 8. The anger of the Lord was hot.
b | iii. 8. He sold them to the King of Mesopotamia.
c | iii. 9. He raised up a deliverer, Othniel.

Space will not permit a fuller investigation into these opening sections. We trust sufficient has been indicated to kindle the reader's interest, and we can confidently leave the application of much searching "correction and instruction in righteousness" to the Spirit Himself.

JUDGES.
#3. "Lo-Ammi" (iii. - xiii.).
A prophetic principle examined.
pp. 207 - 211

Among the many items of dispensational importance in the Book of Judges, one question of outstanding interest is the way in which Israel and Israel's affairs influence the computation of times and dates. The question at first seems simple enough. All one has to do is to add up the periods of the judges' rule and the intervening years of rest, and the thing is done. As there is no better way of producing conviction than to try things out for oneself, let us set about this calculation and see what results are obtained.

	Judges.	Years.
FIRST SERVITUDE.—Mesopotamia.	iii. 8.	8
OTHNIEL.—REST.	iii. 11.	40
SECOND SERVITUDE.—MOAB.	iii. 14.	18
EHUD.—REST.	iii. 30.	80
THIRD SERVITUDE.—CANAAN.	iv. 3.	20
DEBORAH and BARAK.—REST.	v. 31.	40
FOURTH SERVITUDE.—MIDIAN.	vi. 1.	7
GIDEON.—REST.	viii. 28.	40
TOLA.	x. 2.	23
JAIR.	x. 3.	22
JEPHTHAH.	xii. 7.	6
IBZAN.	xii. 9.	7
ELON.	xii. 11.	10
ABDON.	xii. 14.	8
FIFTH SERVITUDE.—PHILISTINES.	xiii. 1.	40
	Total: --	369

It will be observed that we have put down all the periods concerned, whether they be periods of servitude or of rest.

Turning now to the N.T. we find that the Apostle Paul has something to say about this period, and we therefore turn to Acts xiii. 16-22, in order to check our total.

	Acts.	Years.
WILDERNESS WANDERING.	xiii. 18.	40
PERIOD OF JUDGES.	xiii. 20.	450
SAUL'S REIGN.	xiii. 21.	40
	Total: --	530

Ignoring, for the moment, the years in the wilderness and the reign of Saul, we observe that Paul's statement regarding the period of the Judges differs from our own conclusion by 81 years, a difference too great to be covered by the suggestion that the Apostle is using round numbers when he says "About the space of 450 years".

There are other checks, however, that we must take into account. Jephthah, who lived at the very period under discussion, tells us (Judges xi. 26) that the disputed territory had been held by Israel for 300 years, dating from the end of the 40 years' wandering. Solomon also speaks very definitely about the number of years that intervened between the Exodus from Egypt and the year in which he began to build the Temple of the Lord. He speaks of this year as "the 480th year after the children of Israel were come out of the land of Egypt", and the fourth year of his reign (I Kings vi. 1). If we compare Solomon's period with that given by Paul in Acts xiii., we find a difference of 93 years, which, again, in conjunction with the period covered by Solomon's account.

	Years.
WILDERNESS WANDERING.	40
PERIOD OF JUDGES.	450
SAUL'S REIGN.	40
DAVID'S REIGN.	40
SOLOMON'S FIRST THREE COMPLETE YEARS (I Kings vi. 1).	3
	573
DEDUCT—SOLOMON'S COMPUTATION.	- 480
TOTAL TO ACCOUNT FOR: --	93

Let us now look back over the list of items given in the chronology of the Book of Judges, on page 207. We observe that there are five periods of servitude, varying in length from 7 years to 40. Adding these periods together we have the following:

	Judges.	Years.
FIRST SERVITUDE.	iii. 8.	8
SECOND SERVITUDE.	iii. 14.	18
THIRD SERVITUDE.	iv. 3.	20
FOURTH SERVITUDE.	vi. 1.	7
FIFTH SERVITUDE.	xiii. 1.	40
	Total: --	93

This is indeed a revelation. The very number of the years of Israel's servitude is equal to the difference between the accounts of Solomon and Paul. If we look more attentively at Solomon's statement, we find that he does not say that the total number of years that intervened between the two points was 480, but that "in the 480th year" the Temple was commenced. The number is ordinal (480th), not cardinal (480), showing that while Paul was using the calendar of the Lord, and in that calendar no notice is taken of periods when Israel are in bondage. From this emerges a principle. When Israel are Lo-ammi, time is not counted prophetically.

Before proceeding let us endeavour to understand clearly what is meant by the Lo-ammi periods of Israel's history. The term is borrowed from Hosea i. 9 where we read the Hosea's son was named Lo-ammi, meaning, "Not My People", the name being prophetic of Israel's long night of rejection. This period of rejection is also predicted in Hosea iii. 3-5:

> "For the children of Israel shall abide many days without a king . . . . . Afterwards shall the children of Israel return."

Before applying this principle further, one other detail demands consideration. We read in Judges x. 8 that the children of Ammon and the Philistines "vexed and oppressed the children of Israel" for 18 years. Why is this period not included in the list given above? The reason is that it was confined to "the other side of the Jordan" until the close of the 18 years (Judges x. 8, 9), and so cannot be reckoned as a Lo-ammi period for all Israel.

The important principle enunciated above has a profound influence upon the interpretation of Dan. ix. In this chapter we have a period of 490 years in which all the purposes and promises of God for Israel are to be fulfilled. Inasmuch as this promise was made to Daniel some 490 years before Christ, it is manifest that something is intended other than the normal reckoning of 490 years on the calendar of the world. Since Acts xxviii. Israel have been Lo-ammi; the prophetic clock has stopped and will not begin again until Israel's day once more dawns. Moreover, during the captivity of Israel in the time of Daniel, Israel were as much Lo-ammi as they were under the servitude at the time of the Judges. The 490 prophetic years of Dan. ix. cannot include the period when Jerusalem was a ruin, the Temple unbuilt, and the walls and gates destroyed. Consequently we can appreciate the reason why the angel did not give Daniel a simple period of years in Dan. ix. 25, but broke it up, the Lo-ammi period of seven weeks (49 years) being occupied with the restoration of the city, while the threescore and two weeks commenced when the city and people were back again into favour. This has already been discussed in Volume VI (which has recently been reprinted in Volumes XXV and XXVI) and the reader is referred to the article in Volume XXVI, page 232, together with the diagram.

This principle also has a solemn application to ourselves individually. While the believer can never be "lost" I Cor. iii. 15 makes it clear that he may "suffer loss". This applies both to the period of the Acts and to the dispensation of the mystery, and is found in Col. iii. 24, 25, and II Tim. ii. 11, 12. When one ponders the years of so-called service that one has rendered, and then considers how much may fail to stand the test, the history of Israel and the omission of centuries of time from their calendar assumes a solemn aspect, and prompts us to pray: "So teach us to number our days, that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom" (Psa. xc. 12).

Some expositors see in the various oppressors of Israel during the period of Judges, types of the great spiritual enemies of the Church.

MESOPOTAMIA.	Judges iii. 8.	THE WORLD.
MOAB.	Judges iii. 14.	THE FLESH.
CANAAN.	Judges iv. 3.	THE DEVIL.
MIDIAN.	Judges vi. 1.	EARTHLY THINGS.
PHILISTINES.	Judges xiii. 1.	CARNAL RELIGION.

Whether these suggestions can be justified only patient study will reveal. We give them, however, for what they are worth, praying that we may all be made wiser by these examples written for our learning, and experience more of the triumphs of faith and the periods of rest, and less of the dark days of servitude when prophetic time ceases and nothing but "loss" is registered.

Great plainness of Speech.

#1. The Dispensational Boundary.

pp. 182 - 184

If the interested reader opens any Volume of The Berean Expositor, and consults its pages upon almost any topic, it will be observed that the subject under consideration has been presented according to a plan. The words which teach the doctrine concerned and their meanings established by usage. Usually a number of references have been given in order that the reader may be able to see for himself both meaning and usage. Then, seeing that verses of Scripture, wrenched from their contexts, may easily be used in support of false doctrine, we have sought out and presented the structure of the passage; and sometimes, to make doubly sure, we have given the structure of a whole book. Not until the words have been examined, and the structure discovered, have we sought to press the point at issue or to established the doctrine. While the majority of our readers are well able to follow these methods, and would not have us act otherwise, there are some who find it difficult to follow the main argument amidst the rather abundant detail which surrounds it. Further, those who read our pages and are hostile in their attitude give clear evidence by their criticisms that they have not understood our message.

We therefore propose, in this series, to state what we believe to be the truth on a number of important themes, avoiding detailed explanation. We shall not examine the meanings of words, we shall not set out the structures of the passages concerned, but instead, we shall refer the reader to those articles where all the proofs may be discovered. In this way we hope that some who have missed our meaning will be helped, and those who are engaged in the work of instructing others may be assisted also. It must be understood, however, that in this series we shall not present anything new. All fresh teaching will be presented as before, with proofs from the Word to substantiate all that is taught.

The first words printed in The Berean Expositor are these:-- > Acts xxviii. 17-31.

> Its bearing upon the present dispensation.

Let us attempt to use "great plainness of speech" as we set forth the importance of this passage to the understanding of dispensational truth:

> Acts xxviii. 17-31 is a dispensational boundary. As a boundary it necessarily divides contrasting dispensations. The outstanding characteristics of the Acts period is the presence and pre-eminence of Israel. The outstanding characteristic of the dispensation of the mystery is the complete absence of Israel as a nation. The hope of Israel is entertained throughout the Acts, right up to this dispensational boundary. The hope of the dispensation that ensues is the hope of the calling of the mystery. The covenant with Abraham is fundamental to the calling during the Acts, but it finds no place in the epistles of the mystery. In the epistles of the mystery we are taken back to a time before the "foundation (overthrow) of the world", and to a promise made before the age times.

We therefore set aside the traditional teaching that the church began at Pentecost, believing that the church of the body of Christ came into being when Israel were set aside, and Isa. vi. quoted for the last time.

The reader who desires proofs of the above assertions is directed to the following articles:

Volumes i. 28 (i. 25); xviii. 49, 72, 73, 81; xiii. 98; xiv. 19.
The structure of the passage	Vol. xviii. 75.
Abraham and the Acts	Vol. i. 14, 17 (i. 14, 19).
Miracles and dispensational truth	Vol. x. 173.
The Mystery and Acts xxviii.	Vol. xviii. 72.
Paul's twofold ministry	Vol. i. 4; ii. 65 (ii./iii. 50).

We believe that the reader who consults the above articles will not fail to understand the importance we have attached to Acts xxviii. as a dispensational boundary, and to appreciate the many proofs that justify such a belief.

[NOTE.—A double reference thus: i. 28 (i. 25) or ii. 65 (ii./iii. 50) indicates that these Volumes have been re-printed. The italic figures within brackets refer to the re-printed Volume.]

#2. The Covenant with Abraham and Paul's early Ministry. pp. 223, 224

Acts xxviii. being the dispensational boundary, marking off the revelation of the Mystery from all earlier revelations, it follows that all that was written either by Paul or by any other writer before that dispensational boundary, must necessarily conform to the particular phase of the purpose of the ages that was then in operation. That phase, which is dealt with in Paul's early ministry, revolves round two covenants, the one made with Abraham, and the other the New Covenant made with the house of Israel and the house of Judah. The statement that "Ye are all one in Christ Jesus" found in Gal. iii. 28 is not written with any reference to the constitution of the then-unrevealed dispensation of the Mystery, but to show that all such were "Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise" (Gal. iii. 29).

The constitution of the Church during the Acts is likened to an olive tree, with some of its branches removed and replaced by grafts from the wild olive, a constitution far removed from that of the "one new man" that was created to form the "Body" of Ephesians.* In Romans the Jew is still first, and the apostle has to fight hard for the recognition of the fact that believing Gentiles could be heirs of the promise made to Abraham.

We now put forward the following statement, and append references so that the interested reader may find proofs and fuller details.

> Acts xxviii. is the dispensational boundary. The covenant with Abraham is fundamental to the calling during the Acts. This covenant with Abraham is incipient in the seven epistles of Paul written during the Acts, and is definitely expounded as fundamental in Galatians and Romans. Recognizing this essential difference, we believe and teach that, while the gospel of justification by faith remains unaltered to-day, the dispensational teaching which deals, not with forgiveness and life, but with sphere of blessing and destiny, has entirely changed. To go back, therefore, to the epistles of the Acts for any teaching as to the Mystery, its hope, its sphere or its constitution, can only result in confusion. In other words we must distinguish between "Doctrine", which deals with sin and salvation, and "Dispensation", which deals with sphere and destiny.

The reader who desires fuller explanation and more detail should consult the following articles in The Berean Expositor:

Light for the last days.

A series of studies in Scripture concerning the character of the closing days of this age.

#5. God's answer to the problem of the Suez Canal.

pp. 1 - 8

In the year 1854 the Viceroy of Egypt, Said Pasha, gave the first concession to Ferdinand de Lesseps for the construction of the Suez Canal. The concession was for a lease of 99 years dating from the opening of the canal. The canal was actually opened on 17th November, 1869, so that the year in which it will revert to Egypt will be 1968, or 32 years from the date of writing.

The canal is such a vital feature both commercially and strategically, and the whole question of its future involves so many political difficulties, that one fears that war will be inevitable. While we do not intend to convey the impression that the Suez Canal is actually mentioned in Scripture, there seems to be abundant evidence to prove that it is linked up with the events of the future.

Several great changes are predicted that have to do with the configuration of the land. Among these predictions there is a definite statement that the tongue of the Egyptian sea (into which the Suez Canal enters at Suez) is to be smitten, and that another "canal" is to opened, joining the Mediterranean Sea with the Dead Sea, and thence, via the Gulf of Abakah, with the Red Sea.

(BE-XXVII.2).

In order to appreciate the prophecies that deal with this theme, several subsidiary studies will have to be prosecuted in order that the geography of the Scriptures may be intelligible, and the weight of evidence felt. Let us first of all acquaint ourselves with the statement made by Isaiah with reference to this subject.

> "And the Lord shall utterly destroy the tongue of the Egyptian sea; and with His mighty wind shall He shake His hand over the river, and shall smite it into seven streams, and make men go over dryshod. And there shall be an highway for the remnant of His people, which shall be left, from Assyria; like as it was to Israel in the day that he came up out of the land of Egypt" (Isa. xi. 15, 16).

We shall have to refer sooner or later to the map that accompanies this article, and there is one point in this connection which we will explain at once. In the year 1855,

Major I. Scott Phillips wrote a small book entitled "Approximations of Prophecy" in which he developed the idea which stimulated our own search and is to some extent the basis of this article. It will be seen that the book was published in the year following concession to de Lesseps to begin the Suez Canal. No reference, of course, to this canal is found in the book, as it was not then in existence. Major Phillips was concerned with a mightier "canal" that shall enrich Jerusalem and heal the Dead Sea. In his map he quotes the reference given above to the smiting of the river into seven streams, and places the citation across the delta of the Nile. With this, however, we are not able to agree. The word yeor is usually the word found in the original when the reference is to the Nile, while the word "The River" without qualifications (usually the Hebrew Naharas as in Isa. xi. 15) generally refers to the Euphrates. The R.V. makes two alterations:--

(1) The word "River" is printed with a capital "R" indicating the Euphrates.
(2) The words "Smite it into seven streams" are translated as though the river Euphrates were to be subdivided into smaller streams.

The object is that there may be a highway "from Assyria" and "like . . . . . Egypt"—which would not be intelligible if the Delta of the Nile had been intended. The exodus from Egypt underlies many of the prophecies of Israel's final restoration (cf. Isa. ix. 11; Jer. xxxi. 31, 32; Exod. xxxiv. 10). The "smiting" of the river in Isa. xi. 15 corresponds with the "smiting" of the "wicked one" in verse 4 of the same chapter.

In our article referring to the nations at the time of the end we cited "The burden of Egypt" from Isa. xix. We paid little or no attention at the time to the lengthy reference that is made to an extraordinary failure of the Nile. We must now consider this point:-- > "And the waters shall fail from the sea, and the river shall be wasted and become dry. And the rivers shall stink; the canals of Egypt shall be minished and dried up . . . . . the fishers also shall lament" (Isa. xix. 5-8).

At the end of this chapter is another reference to the "highway", not only out of Assyria as stated in chapter xi., but also out of Egypt (as implied in chapter xi. by the reference to the tongue of the Egyptian sea).

The drying up of the sea, and the making of the rivers into a wilderness is referred to once again in Isa. l. 2.

Judgment is to fall upon Egypt, and in Ezek. xxix. we read:--

> "Behold, I am against thee, and against thy rivers, and I will make the land of Egypt an utter waste and desolation from MIGDOL to SYENE, and even unto the border of Ethiopia" (Ezek. xxix. 10 R.V. margin).

The word translated "tower" in the A.V. is Migdol, the name of the city mentioned in Exod. xiv. 2. If the reader will turn to the map given on page 2 he will see that Migdol is vertically above Syene, which is now called Asouan.

A series of prophecies are made against Egypt in Ezekiel, in which there is an interweaving of past history (see the reference to Nebuchadnezzar in xxx. 10) with "the Day of the Lord" (xxx. 3). Like the prophecy of Ezek. xxvii. and xxviii. concerning Tyre, they look forward for their real fulfillment to the time of the end.

We learn from these chapters that the King of Babylon will attack Egypt in the future, and the effect, unlike anything which has yet been accomplished in that country, will be that "they shall know that I am the Lord" (Ezek. xxx. 26).

Almost up to the time of the end, Palestine will have been a reproach and a wasted land, and Arabia a desert. The tables, however, are to be turned. Egypt is to be utterly wasted, the Nile is to be dried up, while Palestine shall become a delightsome land, and "the desert shall blossom as the rose".

Another prophecy associating the gathering of Israel with geographical disturbances is found in Zech. x.

> "I will sow them among the peoples . . . . . I will bring them again also out of the land of Egypt, and gather them out of Assyria . . . . . And shall smite the waves in the sea, and all the depths of the Nile shall dry up . . . . . and the sceptre of Egypt shall depart away" (Zech. x. 9-11).

The association of the house of Judah with the house of Joseph (Zech. x. 6) shows that this passage looks forward to the future day of Israel's restoration.

The above citations are enough to satisfy the reader that, at the time of the end, considerable geographical changes are to take place in Egypt, particularly in connection with the Nile. We now turn to one or two passages that speak of geographical changes at the same time in the land of Israel itself.

In order to appreciate the first of these references in Isa. xxxiii. a knowledge of the context is essential. We give below, without elaboration, the main structure:--

Isaiah xxxiii. 13-24.

A1 | 13-17. THE KING.—Seen in the land.
  B1 | 18, 19. THE ENEMY.—Not seen.
A2 | 20, 21. THE LORD.—Jerusalem seen as quiet.
  B2 | 21. THE ENEMY.—Not seen.
A3 | 22. THE LORD.—He will save.
  B3 | 23. THE ENEMY.—Destroyed.
A4 | 24. THE INHABITANTS.—Forgiven.

The particular passage with which we are concerned at the moment is Isa. xxxiii. 21 and 23.

> "But there the Lord will be with us in majesty, a place of broad rivers and streams; wherein shall go no galley with oars, neither shall gallant ship pass thereby . . . . . Thy > tacklings are loosed; they could not strengthen the foot of the mast, they could not spread the sail" (R.V.).

At no time in history has Jerusalem been "a place of broad rivers and streams"; and it is meaningless to say that no galley with oars or gallant ship shall pass a city if it is miles from the sea, and without a navigable river. The structure relates these references to the enemy, of whom Israel need have no fear, but that only makes it more emphatic that a great geographical change involving sea and river must have come about. Let the reader ponder the following passages in the light of these predicted changes.

> "When thou passest through the waters, I will be with thee; and through the rivers, they shall not overflow thee" (Isa. xliii. 2).

There is a reference to the crossing of the Red Sea here, for in verse 3 the Lord says: "I gave Egypt for thy ransom." However, Israel are told not to remember "the former things":--

> "Remember ye not the former things . . . . . Behold I will do a new thing: now it shall spring forth . . . . . I will even make a way in the wilderness, and rivers in the desert . . . . . I give waters in the wilderness, and rivers in the desert" (Isa. xliii. 18-20).

Turning to Isa. xi. we read:--

> "They shall not hurt nor destroy in all My holy mountain: for the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea" (Isa. xi. 9).

How are we to understand this last phrase: "As the waters cover the sea"? The expression is a strange one, for the sea itself is a gathering together of the waters. How then can we speak of "waters" covering the "sea" as at the time of the flood, but "waters covering the sea" seems a strange figure. The difficulty disappears if we regard these words as representing a literal fact in relation to the Dead Sea. Water flowing down from Jerusalem will cover the Dead Sea, and this fact is used as a figure of the fruitful results of the knowledge of the Lord. The reader may perhaps ask how it is possible for waters from Jerusalem to cover the Dead Sea, and to this problem we must now address ourselves.

The last nine chapters of Ezekiel are devoted to the restoration of Israel's land and temple in the last days. In chapter xlvii. we read of waters that flow from Jerusalem becoming a river that a man might "swim in", a river that cannot be "passed over". Ezekiel's attention is drawn to the direction in which this river flows:--

> "These waters issue out toward the east country (i.e. they flow inland, not down to the Mediterranean), and go down into the desert (Arabah, the plain, Deut. ii. 18—associated with the Jordan and the "sea of the plain, even the salt sea", that is the "Dead Sea") and go into the sea (i.e. the Dead Sea), which being brought forth into the sea, the waters shall be healed" (Ezek. xlvii. 8).

That the Dead Sea is meant is rendered certain by verse 10, for Engedi stands on its western shore (see map).

The prophet Zechariah describes how these living waters that heal the Dead Sea come our from Jerusalem:--

> "I will gather all nations against Jerusalem to battle . . . . . His feet shall stand in that day upon the Mount of Olives, which is before Jerusalem on the east, and the Mount of Olives shall cleave in the midst thereof toward the east and toward the west, and there shall be a very great valley; and half of the mountain shall remove toward the north, and half toward the south . . . . . for the valley of the mountains shall reach unto Azal . . . . . And it shall come to pass in that day that living waters shall come out from Jerusalem; half of them toward the former sea (Eastern, i.e., the Dead Sea), and half of them toward the hinder sea (Western, i.e., the Mediterranean)" (Zech. xiv. 2-8).

Here we have definite statements that cannot be explained away. East and West, North and South are geographical points.

A very great valley reaches to Azal. The Companion Bible comments: "A new place, yet to have this name, at one extremity of the valley." The reader will see that the A.V. spells it Azal, and the R.V. Azel. A glance at the map will show that Rollins in his "Ancient History" marks two names close together near the site of Ashkelon, namely Afcalon-Azol. Jeremiah seems to refer to this in chapter xlvii:--

> "O thou sword of the Lord . . . . . the Lord hath given thee a charge against Ashkelon, and against the sea shore" (Jer. xlvii. 6, 7).

When we remember that the Mediterranean is 1300 feet above the level of the Dead Sea, we can well imagine what would happen if a "very great valley" extended from Ashkelon or Azal on the coast, as far as the Jordan valley in the East. The rapid rise of water at the Dead Sea would cause the Jordan to find its old river bed and flow out into the Gulf of Akabah (see map). R. Stephenson writes:--

> "The Wadi-el-Arabah appears in part to be an old sea beach, deeply grooved by torrents."

And Keith says of this valley that "without doubt it was the ancient bed of that river (the Jordan) before the volcanic eruption which formed the actual basin of the dead Sea".

The "tongue of the Egyptian sea", the sea of Suez, will be destroyed, the land slightly raised, and where the Delta of the Nile and the Suez Canal now exist, men shall walk dryshod. Micah speaks of the Lord clearing a valley like wax and of the waters pouring down a steep place (Micah i. 3, 4). Joel tells us that "all the rivers of Judah shall flow with waters, and a fountain shall come out of the house of the Lord, and shall water the valley of Shittim" (i.e., the plains of Moab bordering the Dead Sea) (Joel iii. 18).

The words of the well known Psalm may be far more literal than many have supposed:--

> "God is our refuge and strength, a very present help in trouble. Therefore will not we fear, though the earth be removed, And the mountains be carried into the midst of the sea;

> Though the waters thereof roar and be troubled. Though the mountains shake with the swelling thereof. Selah (i.e., "Look on this picture; now look on that").
> There is a river, the streams whereof shall make glad the city of God, The holy place of the tabernacle of the Most High" (Psa. xlvi.).

The passage speaks of the contrast between the roaring torrent falling 1300 feet from Azal to the Dead Sea, the moving of the mountains and other accompaniments of this great moment, and the river of living waters that flows out from the holy place at Jerusalem.

We must bring this article to a close, particularly as the subject is not one that comes strictly within the orbit of our ministry. Enough, we trust, has been brought forward to throw some light on another feature of the last days.

There is, however, one further point which may be mentioned in conclusion. The only reserve that we might feel over accepting Major Phillips' map is that, whereas he shows no water-way other than that of the Mediterranean, the prophecy speaks also of living waters that issue out from Jerusalem. This calls for some adjustment, which may not be possible with our present knowledge. The fact, however, remains that Major Phillips has put forward something that appears to be in general harmony with the Word, however incomplete the scheme may be. If all the details do not prove to be correct, the general teaching of prophecy concerning the land of Israel leaves us perfectly certain that in the glorious kingdom yet to come, God will not only blot out man's canal at Suez, but will make His own at Azal, and moreover sweeten the Dead Sea, so providing a symbol of blessing for the whole earth.

#6. "All faiths" instead of "The faith of God's elect".

pp. 21, 22

We have considered in the preceding articles a few of the outstanding features that characterize the last days. We have gathered that an anti-christian system of worship will predominate, that Egypt, Babylon, Greece, Persia, the Mediterranean, and of course Palestine, will figure largely at the time of the end, and that great and even catastrophic changes must be expected in some parts of the earth, particularly in the neighbourhood of Egypt, Assyria and Palestine. Moreover, the "kings of the east" are mentioned (Rev. xvi. 12). The exact identity of these kings we do not present know. It is clear that Japan will probably play an important part in any future international dispute, but whether Japan will be one of these "kings" we do not pretend to say. Some think that the names Meshech, Tubal, and Rosh (translated "Chief prince" in Ezek. xxxviii. 2) refer to Moscow, Tobolsk and Russia. But this again we must confess we do not know. The LXX uses names here that refer to nations inhabiting the district round about the Caucasus. God and Magog in the same verse (Ezek. xxxviii. 2) refer to some nation or nations north of Palestine.

We shall endeavour to preserve and record from time to time under the heading "Light for the last days" any item of interest that touches upon the various features connected with the last days. These articles will not occupy much space, as the theme is only distantly related to the dispensation of the mystery.

We give below an extract from an article published in the "News Chronicle" of 19th May, 1936, which is an indication of the way in which "religion" is drifting.

> "To unite the inspiration of all Faiths upon the solution of man's present problems."
>
> I take this phrase from the prospectus of the World Congress of Faiths, which is to meet in London from July 3 to 18. It represents the ultimate purpose of a remarkable gathering, which will bring together notable spokesmen of many religions and will see them uniting in devotion, not only at their daily meetings in University College, but also at St. Paul's and in Canterbury Cathedral.
>
> "Mankind", says the prospectus, "is crying out for peace. But there can be no true and lasting peace until we get down to the very roots of the present world unrest, and quicken into more active life that feeling of fellowship which, through all appearances to the contrary, is ever latent in the hearts of men."
>
> "To intensify this sense of fellowship is, then, the main aim of the Congress. Since only those of profound spiritual insight are capable of arousing this feeling, such men are being brought together from many countries."
>
> Here, at least, is recognition of the fact, so consistently ignored by the politicians, that at root the world's disease is spiritual, demanding a spiritual remedy. And the list of those who are to speak or contribute papers is striking proof that the spiritual ferment, of which we of the Christian faith have long been aware, is something affecting all mankind.
>
> The "present problems" of which the Congress will have to take note are tabulated thus:--
>
> (a) Fear.
> (b) Hate.
> (c) Nationalism, in excess or defect.
> (d) Racial animosity.
> (e) Class prejudice.
> (f) Poverty.
> (g) Ignorance.
> (h) Religious differentiation.
> Opposed to them is the ideal of world fellowship, and it will be the aim of those who contribute to the discussions to show how that ideal may be attained through religious channels. Just think of the possibilities of a convention which links, for example, Dr. Parkes Cadman with the Sheik-Rector of Al Azhar, Cairo's great Moslem University, Dame Elizabeth Cadbury with Dr. Pen-Chun Chang of Tientsin, and Sir Herbert Samuel with M. Berdiaeff, of the Greek Orthodox Church, and Professor Suzuki, of Kyoto.

Comment is hardly necessary. Some such world-wide religion is bound to come, but it will not be of God. The rise of the Beast and the dictatorship that will be in force at the time of the end, will mean not only commercial and political slavery, but a fierce opposition to "all that is called God or worshipped". The Congress tabulates eight problems that are "at the root of the world's disease" and the solemn omission is the word "Sin". Or again, in the remedies proposed, while we have such vague terms as the "feeling of fellowship" and "the inspiration of all faiths", we look in vain for the Person and Work of the Son of God. It is indeed true that "mankind is crying out for peace", but the World Congress is heading straight for that "peace and safety" that shall be followed by "sudden destruction".

Let us continue to pray and to bear our testimony to an inspired Bible, an infallible Christ, an all-sufficient Sacrifice, and a "blessed hope".

#7. Arab Opposition to the Jews in Palestine.
pp. 44, 45

The Arabs in Palestine are strongly opposed to the influx of the Jews, and are demanding that their immigration into Palestine shall be curtailed. The Scriptures indicate that the Jews will return to their land in unbelief, and that the nations of the world will become so incensed against them that they will say:--

> "Come, and let us cut them off from being a nation; that the name of Israel may be no more in remembrance."
>
> "For they have consulted together with one consent: they are confederate against Thee: the tabernacles of Edom, and the Ishmaelites; of Moab, and the Hagarenes, Gebal, and Ammon, and Amalek; the Philistine with the inhabitants of Tyre" (Psa. lxxxiii. 4-7).

What we see in Palestine to-day is but the spark that will eventually blaze out into a devouring flame at the time of the end.

The following extract from the News Chronicle (May 1936) will give some idea of the state of things at Jerusalem at that time:--

Jerusalem (Wednesday).

> Throughout Palestine the Arab general strike will continue indefinitely in an attempt to force the British Government to stop the flow of Jewish immigrants into the country.
>
> This ultimatum, defying the High Commissioner's statement that he will enter into no negotiations until law and order have been restored, was given me to-day by Abdul Hadi, Secretary of the Higher Arab Committee.
>
> ARAB'S LAST STAND.
>
> We Arabs, he said, are prepared to commit economic and racial suicide in Palestine rather than be suffocated by the increasing flow of Jewish immigration.
>
> We are making a last stand for our rights, and we are prepared to lose everything in this struggle rather than submit to economic conquest by the Jews.
>
> With Jews coming into this country at the rate of over 60,000 a year, Arabs will be in a minority in ten years' time. The Jews are building a paradise for themselves and a hell for the Arabs.

Already a third of the arable land has been bought up. Unless we have justice all Arabs will become wage-slaves.

The bitterness of Arab feeling is reflected in the widespread campaign of violence throughout the country. While there is a slight lull in the shooting and rioting, following police and military action, Palestine still echoes with the crack of rifles and the crash of bombs.

TROOPS ENGAGE SNIPERS.

Early this morning Cameron Highlanders engaged in a half-hour skirmish with snipers on the Jerusalem-Nablus road. At Gaza 18 barricades were removed by police during the night, and the townsfolk, threatened with punitive measures, removed a blockage from the railway line.

Sticks of detonating gelignite were found on the railway line near Tel Aviv, and in a disturbance at Jafta, police opened fire and threw hand grenades.

So far over 900 Arabs have been arrested and 40 agitators placed under restraint. About 300 Jews have been arrested, the majority for breaking the curfew regulations.

#8. Kings of the earth, and the King of Kings.
pp. 61 - 63

In tracing the growing opposition that culminates in the terrible days with which this age ends, we find ourselves constantly dealing with the lives of kings and the character of their rule. At the end of the age, we read in Rev. xi.:--

> "The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord, and of His Christ: and He shall reign unto the ages of the ages" (Rev. xi. 15).

It would appear from this passage that the kings and kingdoms of this world are inimical to the Kingdom of the Lord, and that the Lord will not reign until all other kings and kingdoms are set aside. In speaking of kings, we do not intend to differentiate between a Monarchy and a Republic, between Dictatorship and Democracy. All forms of government are included in the conception of sovereignty; and all rule, authority, and power must be placed beneath the feet of the Lord, before the end comes.

Having seen this fact concerning the end of the age, let us now leave the Book of the Revelation and trace the general record of kingship through the Scriptures. We shall notice, however, that, although we shall be leaving the Book of Revelation for the Book of Genesis, we shall still be dealing with the same characteristics, and even with the same geographical centre.

After the flood, Noah's three sons re-people the earth; and Ham's descendants soon assume the dominance.

> "And Cush begat Nimrod; he began to be a mighty one in the earth. He was a mighty hunter before the Lord. Wherefore it is said, Even as Nimrod the mighty hunter before > the Lord. And the beginning of his kingdom was Babel . . . . . Nineveh . . . . . the same is a great city" (Gen. x. 8-12).

The name "Nimrod" is from the Hebrew marad, to rebel, so that the first kingdom to be established on earth is associated with "rebellion" and "confusion" (Babel). Moreover, this Kingdom was a usurpation, for it was the Divine plan that the king of God's approval should come from the line of Shem. Further on in the same book we read: "The sceptre shall not depart from Judah . . . . . until Shiloh come" (Gen. xlix. 10). And Balaam, in Numb. xxiv., prophesied concerning the coming king: "A sceptre shall arise out of Israel" (Num. xxiv. 17). Kings were promised among the descendants of Abraham and Sarah (Gen. xvii. 6, 16) and of Jacob (Gen. xxxv. 11).

After the prophecies of Genesis we next meet with "another king"—the oppressing King of Egypt. It is surely significant that the title "King of Egypt" occurs in Exodus just thirteen times, this number being closely associated with rebellion and Satan.

The next kings of whom we read, in the Book of Numbers, are the kings of the Canaanites, Arad, Sihon and Og, and Balak, King of Moab (Num. xxi., xxii.). There is no need to enlarge upon the fact that each of these kings carries on the thought of Satanic rebellion.

In the Book of Deuteronomy, which completes the record of Moses, no new kings are introduced, but in chapter xvii. Moses foretells that Israel would say:--

> "I will set a king over me, like as all the nations that are about me" (Deut. xvii. 14).

Laws are given to regulate the King's conduct, but these instructions and the prediction that such a time would come, do not alter the fact that Israel by so choosing were turning away from the Lord, and departing from His true purpose. It would appear that not only Saul, but all the kings that followed (even David and Solomon) were concessions to Israel's evil choice rather than the direct will of the Lord. The laws that follow Deut. xvii. 14, were applied not only to Saul but to all the succeeding kings. Every king and every throne is in some measure an indication that the Lord is not yet accepted. Before He can reign, the kingdoms of the earth must pass away. The only kings that will be tolerated when the Lord sits upon His throne will be those who will form a kingdom of priests unto the Lord, and those kings of the earth who will bring their glory and honour to the light and rule of the Lamb in the New Jerusalem.

Before passing on to the Book of Joshua we give below three passages in the Law of Moses that look forward to the time of the end:--

> "Melchisedec, King of Salem . . . . . Priest of the Most High God" (Gen. xiv. 18).
> "The shout of a king is among them" (Num. xxiii. 21).
> "He was a king in Jeshurun" (Deut. xxxiii. 5).

In Josh. xii. 9-24 thirty-one kings are named as smitten by the victorious Israelites upon entering into their inheritance. The Book of Judges ends on the note: "There was no king in Israel." In the next book, Ruth, we have the name of Naomi's husband Elimelech, which means "My God is King". In I Sam. ii. Hannah's song ends with the words "king" and "anointed" (I Sam. ii. 10). Later in the same book Saul is chosen king by the people, and David is chosen by God.

Turning to the Book of the Psalms, we read:--

> "Why do the heathen rage, and the people imagine a vain thing? The kings of the earth set themselves, and the rulers of the people take counsel together, against the Lord, and against His anointed" (Psa. ii. 1, 2).

God's answer to this spirit of rebellion is found in verse 6: "Yet have I set My King upon My holy hill of Zion."

The opening pages of the N.T. record the birth of the King. The story of the Gospels, however, is one of rejection, and as "Kings of the Jews" the Lord of glory dies. Israel had already lost her kingship in the earth, and Nebuchadnezzar and his successors were occupying the throne. Now their rightful King is despised and rejected, and the times of the Gentiles run on their way until the crisis is reached in the clash of arms and other terrible events connected with the Beast and the brief reign of the ten kings, of which we read in the Apocalypse.

"The prayers of David, the son of Jesse" shall at length be answered (Psa. lxxii.) and many other glorious prophecies fulfilled, but not until heaven's King is recognized as King of kings and Lord of lords can these prophecies of blessing be fulfilled and peace come to the earth.

It is hardly necessary, we trust, after having considered these things, to stress the importance of the movements of kings and rulers in interpreting the signs of the times. In our next article we hope to deal with Nebuchadnezzar's dream which covers the whole course of Gentile dominion up to the time of the Coming of the Lord.

#9. The Kings of the East
pp. 81 - 83

In our previous study of the geographical changes that will take place at the time of the end, we referred to the passage in Isa. xi. which speaks of the "tongue of the Egyptian sea":--

> "And the Lord shall utterly destroy the tongue of the Egyptian sea; and with His mighty wind shall He shake His hand over the river (which we saw was the river Euphrates) and shall smite it in the seven streams, and make men go over dry-shod" (Isa. xi. 15).

There appears to be a further reference to this in Rev. xvi. 12, where we read:--

> "And the sixth angel poured out his vial upon the great river, the Euphrates, and the water thereof was dried up, that the way of the Kings of the East might be prepared."

This seems to be a fuller explanation of Isa. xi. 15, revealing that among the "men" who will go over dry-shod, there will be eastern kings and their armies. That war is in view, the verses that follow make plain. Supernaturally evil influences gather the kings of the whole world to battle, and the battle-ground is Armageddon. This valley had already played an important part in Hebrew history, for here Deborah and Barak had destroyed Sisera (Judges iv. 19), and in Zech. xii. we find slaughter and lamentation associated with Megiddo (Zech. xii. 9-11).

Who are these "Kings of the East" that meets in arms in the land of Palestine before the end comes? We cannot say with any certainty, but if we listen to those who view these things from the standpoint of national defence and diplomacy, it seems evident that Japan must be included. If, moreover, it be true, as the writer we quote below claims, that Japan is moved by a great religious motive, we can the more readily understand the reference to demoniacal influence.

In John Bull, June 13th, 1936, there appeared an article by W. N. Ewer, an authority on Foreign Affairs, which contained the following statements:--

> At the other end of the world, a whole nation is convinced that it has divine mission to conquer and rule all the Far East. And not only the Far East, but all the world. That is why there is danger of war in Eastern Asia and in the Pacific, in which, should it come, Great Britain can hardly help being involved. Not so much because of Japan's economic need for expansion as because of Japan's religion. Economic wants can be met by compromise and concession. There is no compromising with a religion. And, as never before perhaps in history, imperial expansion is with the Japanese an article of religious faith, as binding as the obligation on a pious Christian to preach the gospel to the heathen. The Emperor is Akitsu-Kami, the Living God. The way of the Emperor is the Great Law of the Universe. The Divine Virtue of the Emperor must be extended to all parts of the world, equally and indiscriminately. That, quite seriously and earnestly, is the inspiration of Japanese policy.

When the new Japan was in the making, the Lord Hotta, one of its founders, laid down the line to be followed:--

Our object must always be to lay the foundation for securing hegemony over all nations. We must, when we are strong, punish the nations which are contrary to the principle. We must declare our protection over harmless nations. The nations of the world will come to look up to our Emperor as the Great Ruler of all the nations. They will follow our policy and submit to our judgment.

That was in 1858.

"In the middle of the twentieth century Japan will meet Europe on the plains of Asia and wrest from her the mastery of the world", said Prime Minister Count Okuma.

That was in 1915.

"Our great missions from heaven are to promote our national expansion and to liberate the peoples of the Orient, who are groaning under the oppression of the white race", wrote General Tada, Commander of the Japanese Army in China.

That was in 1936.

And the Japanese who dies for this mission, whether criminal or good man, general or private or common citizen, at the moment of shouting 'Banzai' to the Emperor, becomes united in the Great Life of the Universe and lives for ever as a guardian deity of the nation.

* * * * *

For forty years Japan has been patiently, steadily, unremittingly, preparing the conquest of China. She has attacked from without, she has undermined from within: she has advanced, paused, even retreated: she has use money and arms, threats and cajolements. The means have been skillfully varied: the end has never changed.

Already she has carved out of China a continental empire far larger than her own territory. She took Formosa and the Pescadores in 1895, the Liaotung peninsula in 1905; she annexed Korea in 1910.

Those were the prelude. In 1931 came the big advance. In less than five years Japan had conquered and brought under her own dominion the three provinces of Manchuria, Jehol, and Chahar. She controls Hopei and Seiyuan, and can take them when she chooses. An area as big as half Europe, with a population as big as that of Germany, containing one of the biggest cities in Asia, with incalculable resources.

Mussolini's conquest of Abyssinia is petty larceny by comparison with this great steal.

* * * * *

Checked for the moment in Mongolia, the drive has turned again southward towards the heart of China. But it may turn, it may be forced to turn, westward again, to deal with the Chinese Communist armies (no negligible force) which are now in Shenshi and Kansu.

Suppose (it is more than likely) that Tokyo orders an "anti-Red" campaign: that the Red Armies (which are Chinese peasant armies) retreat westward to the Mongolian border: that they ask aid in their extremity from the Russians? Supposing a dozen other alternatives? Every time you come back to the stark facts. Japan, under the double influence of economic need and religious fervour, is moving forward steadily, unceasingly to the conquest of China, of all the East, of all Asia.

Accompany this article was a map with Japan depicted as the body of an octopus, with tentacles outstretched to Manchukuo, China, India, Sumatra, Borneo, the Philippine Islands, New Guinea, and North Australia.

Once again we would make it plain that The Berean Expositor has no politics. We neither approve nor disapprove, we merely record; and we do so only because these things, when viewed from the standpoint of prophecy, may throw some light on the events of the last days.

#10. The trouble in Palestine.
pp. 101 - 104

> "Behold, I will make Jerusalem a cup of trembling unto all the people round about . . . . . And in that day will I make Jerusalem a burdensome stone for all people: all that burden themselves with it shall be cut in pieces, though all the people of the earth be gathered together against it" (Zech. xii. 2, 3).

It is evident from Scripture that Palestine and the people of Israel are to be the centre of world-wide controversy before the day of the Lord finally comes and settles the matter for ever. Already the elements of unrest, that will work like leaven through the nations, are becoming manifest. At the present time the ferment has been brought about by the resentment of the Arabs against the Jewish immigration into Palestine. We give below extracts from an article that appeared in the Sunday Dispatch for 14th June, 1936, by Emile A. Ghory, secretary of the Palestine Arab Party.

> "He knows politics: began at school when he presented Lord Northcliffe with an address on injustices to Arabs in Palestine in 1922. Studied for four years in America, graduated Master of Arts in political science. Owned three newspapers in Palestine. They were all suppressed. Now he comes to tell Britain what the 100 million Arabs and Moslems under the Union Jack think of British handling of the situation; and what the other 250 million Mohammedans think of it."
>
> "Britain is called upon to save her prestige in the East, to prove that she plays fair. Arabs in Palestine will die in maintaining the general strike rather than accept the annihilation which is inevitable if the present system continues."
>
>
> "I am a Christian . . . . . Twelve per cent (105,000) of the Arab population of Palestine are Christian. They are as active as the Moslems in opposing the influx of the Jews.
>
> Every Arab there is convinced that Jewish immigration should cease and that Jews should be debarred from purchasing more land. We are really afraid of Jewish domination.
> In 1918 there were 53,000 Jews in Palestine; in 1931 175,000. Now there are 400,000.

Immigration has gone far beyond the absorptive capacity of the country. Yet it still increases. Those figures are official. But they would be much greater if the Jews who have entered the country illicitly were included."

* * * * *

"Britain has 100 million Arabs and Moslems. They are being alienated by Zionism. Throughout the world there are 350 million Mohammedans. Palestine to them is a sacred land. It is important that British policy does not antagonize them.

Since Italy is establish in Abyssinia the route through the Suez is no longer permanently safe for British shipping.

Britain must have an alternative route from the Mediterranean to India and her other Eastern possessions, and that route lies through Arab lands. Their friendship is essential for the solidarity of British imperialism. But at present there is an increasing hostility to Britain because of the administration in Palestine.

Syria and Transjordania joined the general strike, collected funds for it, organized protests. In Iraq the Arabs have formed committees to collect funds and to co-operate with the Arabs in Palestine. These Arabs threaten to march to the assistance of the Arabs in Palestine. The tribes are armed and war-like.

In Iraq the Officers of the army (which is Arab) state that they cannot hold their men much longer unless Jewish immigration to Palestine is stopped."

* * * * *

"We demand a constitutional government in which the populations will be represented proportionally to their numbers.

Under the mandate it was obligatory on Britain to establish self-governing institutions. Owing to Jewish pressure that has never been done.

We have, indeed, less freedom of Government under Britain than we had under the Turks.

We have appealed to Britain for 18 years."

In the conflict between Jew and Arab, "Lawrence of Arabia" is being freely spoken of. King Feisal added a footnote in Arabic to the agreement signed in London on January 3, 1919, and it is being circulated that Lawrence "mellowed it down" considerably in his translation.

We give first Lawrence's translation, and then a translation made direct from King Feisal's own handwriting.

Being unable to read English, Feisal added a protective footnote to the treaty in Arabic. This, translated by Lawrence on to Dr. Weizmann's copy and signed later by Feisal, reads as follows:--

"If the Arabs are established, as I have asked in my manifesto of January 4th addressed to the British Secretary of State of Foreign Affairs, I will carry out what is written in this agreement. If changes are made I cannot be answerable for failing to carry out this agreement."

A photographic copy of Feisal's own Arabic reveals stronger sentiments. It reads:--

> "Should the Arabs obtain their independence, as asked in our report submitted to the British Foreign Office on January 4, 1919, I agree to what was included in the Articles herein, and should the slightest change or alteration take place I shall neither be responsible nor obliged for any word and this treaty will be considered null and void and of no consequence. Nothing whatsoever could asked of me."

These documents may prove to be of great historic interest later on as things develop, and the close association of an actual "King of Babylon" with the affairs and fate of the land of Israel must necessarily be of interest to all readers of the Scriptures.

In our next article we hope to give extracts from the reply made in the Sunday Dispatch by the Rev. M. L. Perlzwig, Director of Political Information of the Zionist Organization.

We make no comment. We have no political opinions to offer, either for or against. We give these extract for what they are worth, as indicating a movement that we believe will grow, until breaks out finally into the vast upheaval indicated by prophecy.

#11. Palestine, Arab and Jew.
pp. 124, 125

In the previous article of this series, we quoted some of statements made by the Secretary of the Arab party in The Sunday Dispatch. The same newspaper also provided an opportunity for a Jewish leader, the Rev. M. L. Perlzwig, Director of Political Information of the Zionist Organization, to reply. The following is the short biographical note given by The Sunday Dispatch:--

> "For nearly 20 years a leader of British Zionism. Was elected an international leader at the World Zionist Congress held at Lucerne last summer. Is chief of the Political Information Department. Graduated in History at London University and Oriental Languages at Cambridge. Was an active member of the Cambridge Union and was made a life-member of the committee. While an undergraduate he refused a request to stand as parliamentary representative for Cambridgeshire. He founded the Young Zionist Movement. Is chairman of the World Union of Jewish Students and is a rabbi at the largest synagogue in the British Empire."

The following are some extracts from the article concerned:--

> "One of the worst mistakes is to regard this strife as an armed conflict between Jews and Arabs. It is nothing of the sort. The Jews have all to lose and nothing to gain; above all, they want peace to develop and expand their property and trade in Palestine. So much Jewish capital is sunk in the country that it would be madness to want otherwise."
> "The Arabs point to the immigration figures and say that the Jews are swamping them. This charge cannot be substantiated by the facts. Since the war the Jewish population has increased by 350,000, while the Arab population has increased by 393,000. Before the coming of the British Mandate and the establishment of the Jewish National Home the conditions were so bad that there was a continual Arab emigration and the population remained stationary. It is only since the arrival of the Jews that the process has been reversed. The immigration of Arabs into the country from purely Arab territories bordering Palestine is now continual and in many instances illegal."

"The real object of the attack on the Jews is Britain. The chief centres of disturbance are places like Nablus, Jenin, Tulkarem and Gaza, where there are no Jews. The insurgents are a minority. They have no backing from the Muslims. The strike costs £3,000 a day, yet Arab contributions amount only to £1,000. The total expenditure on strike pay is estimated at £100,000. Where does the money come from? It is a point that asks for consideration and enquiry. Communist agitation has played its part in arousing on the Jews. The British troops have been subjected to subversive propaganda."

"To the Arab world has been assigned Syria, Iraq, Egypt, Transjordania and Arabia. Why should anyone begrudge us a foothold in the country of our ancestors?"

Arab leaders are charging Dr. Chaim Weizmann with a breach of faith for publishing at this stage of the dispute his copy of the Arab-Jewish Treaty of Friendship.

"Dr. Weizmann had not the courage to produce the document in Feisal's lifetime because he knew it would instantly be discredited. The most Dr. Weizmann could do in the past was to hint at its existence. Now Feisal is dead and cannot reply. If it is genuine why did not the Jews produce the document to the Shaw Commission in 1929?"

Mr. Arthur Lourie, Political Secretary of the Jewish Agency for Palestine, writes in reply to this charge:--

"May I point out that the full text of this treaty was published in the year 1924, many years before King Feisal's death? It is to be found on pages 188-189 in Volume iii. of 'Documents of the Peace Conference of Paris' edited by David Hunter Miller (Legal Adviser to the American Delegation to the Peace Conference)."

The question of the rightful ownership of "the Land" is destined to be a factor of central importance in the controversy of the last days, and we can see even now the gathering forces that are preparing for the final outburst.

#12. The ships of Chittim (Dan. xi. 30).
pp. 141 - 144

The Mediterranean Sea is destined to be the highway for the great conflict of nations at the time of the end, with Palestine as the final battle-ground. Already there are important developments in this region that are causing the rulers of the earth to think seriously.

If we take a map of the world and draw a line from London to Sydney in Australia, the line will pass through North Italy, Palestine, Colombo and—very nearly—Singapore. Since 1869 this line has ruled the strategy of the British Navy. A great change, however, has come about in recent years. Italy has acquired possessions in Tripoli and, now that the aeroplane is an important factor, this places Malta in a precarious position. At the other end of the Red Sea, Italy has now acquired possession of Abyssinia, and consequently, as things are at present, in time of war the Suez Canal would become a death-trap. In these circumstances it is not to be wondered at that the eyes of those who have the control of these things have turned to Cyprus, lying as it does so near to Palestine and within easy reach of the Suez Canal. The following is quoted from an article by Philip Jordan in the News Chronicle for 12th June, 1936:--

> "What had been British strength is now British weakness. A menaced Red Sea means, perhaps, an untenable Mediterranean; for you cannot blow up one part of a by-pass without making the whole of it unfit for traffic."
>
> "Outside home waters British naval strategy was based on the Mediterranean as a highway for sea traffic; but it may well prove that Italian tactics have turned it into a lake from which, in time of trouble, British ships will find it difficult to leave in safety, for between Gibraltar and the Canal is a narrow channel separating Sicily from Tunis. It is guarded in the middle by Italy's fortified island of Pantellaria."
>
> "The times are out of joint for pre- and post-war naval strategy. The Mediterranean, once a flowing tide of ships, may become the focal point in another war. In such a war the British fleet would suffer damage that might be irreparable. Its danger lies in its comparative immobility: its safety in the impregnable air base which lies at the eastern end of that land-locked sea. For Palestine is the hope of its salvation. Behind that narrow country lie the immeasurable deserts of biblical antiquity: before it, the sea."
>
> "Operating from a base out of range of any hostile navy or air force, the wings of Britain could spread themselves, rise and destroy and then return comparatively undamaged. Under the aegis of those wings now falls the safety of the Suez and of the wealth of Egypt; and under their aegis, in future, the Mediterranean must operate."

The reader will see that it is inevitable that Palestine must figure largely in the future plans of the great conflicting nations of the earth.

There are several references in the Scriptures to a place called "Chittim". This is the ancient name of the island of Cyprus, and is probably used in Scripture much as we use the term "The Levant", including not only Cyprus itself but some of the coast-land of the adjacent countries. For the moment, however, we will leave the wider sphere and concentrate upon the island of Cyprus itself.

The references to Chittim are six in number: Num. xxiv. 24, Isa. xxiii. 1, 12, Jer. ii. 10, Ezek. xxvii. 6, and Dan. xi. 30. Of these references, the last is of most importance to us at the moment. The context speaks of the day when the "vile person", who comes in peaceably and obtains the kingdom by flatteries, shall return from battle against the King of the South. And in verse 30 we read:--

> "The ships of Chittim shall be against him; therefore he shall be grieved, and return and have indignation against the holy covenant" (Dan. xi. 30).

The next verse, which speaks of the "abomination that maketh desolate", fixes the time as being that of the end. It would appear that some sea power, associated with Cyprus, is to be an antagonist of this "vile person", who is opposed to the holy covenant.

The history of Cyprus is briefly as follows. According to the earliest records we have, it was first colonized by the Phoenicians. From them it passed to the Greeks; and Assyrians, Persians, Egyptians, Romans and Byzantines have since occupied it in turn. In 1878 a convention was concluded with the Sultan of Turkey, by virtue of which Cyprus was ceded to Great Britain, an annual tribute of £92,800 being paid to the Sultan. When Turkey entered the Great War in November 1914 the island was annexed by Great Britain.

The following map is taken from The Observer for 14th June, 1936.

(BE-XXVII.143).

> " 'Cyprus is the Key of Western Asia', wrote Lord Beaconsfield to Queen Victoria in 1878. Sir Roland Stokes, Governor and Commander-in-Chief in Cyprus 1926-32 wrote: 'Cyprus is an indispensable and might easily become an invaluable link in the chain of our Imperial defences.' This saving possibility a grateful Empire owes to that practical visionary of genius, Beaconsfield. In Bismarck's phrase: 'Der alte Jude, das ist der Mann'."

The following extracts are from an article by Captain Norman Macmillan, A.F.C., D.F.C., which appeared in the Daily Mail for 9th June, 1936.

> "Italy has now turned from war conditions in Abyssinia to a process of colonization."
>
> "The construction of aerodromes in Abyssinia in recent months, and the creation of more that is now taking place, will enable the Italians to control that country as surely and certainly as the British Air Command controlled Iraq."
>
> "Cyprus is British. There we can do what we will. There is no need to negotiate treaties to determine what armed stations we create, what garrisons we employ."
>
> "Money expended there will be expended upon a part of Empire territory that is held in fee simple. There is no fief to local government, no qualified occupation under mandate from the treaties of the great war."
>
> "On the seaboard, concrete shelters could be provided for submarines, together with underground accommodation for oil, spares, victuals, and repair shops. Thus munitioned as a great submarine and air fortress, Cyprus could dominate the Eastern Mediterranean, and give us security for our trade route and possessions in and about that ocean."
>
> "By utilizing Cyprus as a base, we have it in our power to make provision for the safety of our people both at home and overseas. Let us get on with it before it is too late."
>
> "It can be made invincible if the Navy and the Air Force combine to make the principal Mediterranean base for British aircraft and submarines—Cyprus."

To prevent the slightest misunderstanding we must state again that The Berean Expositor has no politics. We give the quotations above as signs of the times, but express no opinion either way thereon, for this lies entirely outside our province.

#13. Does Scripture say anything concerning war in the air. pp. 174 - 177

A superficial reading of II Thess. ii. would lead one to believe that at the time of the end complete atheism will prevail, for in verse 4 we read:--

> "Who opposeth and exalteth himself above all that is called God, or that is worshipped; so that he as God sitteth in the temple of God, showing himself that he is God" (II Thess. ii. 4).

The phrase: "All that is called God, or that is worshipped" would include even false gods, and false worship. To such an extent will the ruler of the last days be opposed to any thought of God that he will tolerate no act of worship. And yet one god remains in spite of all, for this Man of Sin places himself in the temple, "showing himself that he is God". So, when we turn to the passage in the Book of the Revelation which corresponds to II Thess. ii., we find, in a day when God will be denied, and the Beast shall open his mouth and blaspheme God and His name (Rev. xiii. 6), that all the world will wonder after the Beast, and will "worship the Dragon which gave power unto the Beast; and will worship the Beast, saying, Who is like unto the Beast? Who is able to make war with him?" (Rev. xiii. 4).

The word here translated "power" is exousia, and means "authority":--

> "All this authority (said the Devil) will I give Thee, and the glory of them: for that is delivered unto me: and to whomsoever I will give it. If Thou therefore wilt WORSHIP ME, all shall be Thine" (Luke iv. 6, 7).

Here is the direct contrast to Rev. xiii. 4. What Christ refused, the Man of Sin accepts.

Satan is called, in Eph. ii. 2, "The prince of the authority of the air", and his agents are described as the "world-holders of this darkness" (Eph. vi. 12). There are only seven occurrences of aer ("air") in the N.T. and there can be no doubt that the "air" in the commonly accepted sense of the word is intended. "They cried out, and cast off their clothes, and threw dust into the air" (Acts xxii. 23). Had the passage read "threw dust in their eyes" we might have felt that a figure of speech was intended out, but, as the passage stands, the meaning must be literal.

So I Cor. ix. 26: "beateth the air", I Cor. xiv. 9: "speak into the air", I Thess. iv. 17: "meet the Lord in the air", are all to be taken literally. When we read in Rev. ix. 2 that the sun and the air were darkened, the reason given—the smoke coming out from the pit—is a sufficient explanation, and no figure need be introduced.

In Rev. xvi. we find the kings of the earth gathered together by demoniacal powers to battle. The place where they assemble is called Armageddon; and immediately this is stated, we read that the lost of the seven vials is poured out into the "air" (Rev. xvi. 13-17).

Satan has the "authority of the air". When he gives this authority to the Beast, the whole world realizes immediately that he is invincible, and their thoughts turn at once to war. The last of earth's battles is to be fought at Armageddon, and it will be brought to an end when the angel pours out his vial into the "air".

Leaving this passage for the moment, let us go back to the Apocalypse of the Old Testament, the Book of Daniel. The eleventh chapter reveals the character of the time of the end:--

> "And the king shall do according to his will, and he shall exalt himself and magnify himself above every god, and shall speak marvelous things against the God of gods . . . . . neither shall he regard the God of his fathers . . . . . but in his estate shall he honour the god of forces . . . . . Thus shall he do in the most strong-holds with a strange god, whom he shall acknowledge and increase with glory" (Dan. xi. 36-39).

The Hebrew word maoz, "force", occurs seven times in Dan. xi.:--

> "Also I in the first year of Darius the Mede, even I, stood to confirm and to strengthen him" (xi. 1).
>
> "Out of the branch of her roots shall one stand up in his estate, which shall come with an army, and shall enter into the fortress of the King of the North" (xi. 7).
>
> "His sons shall be stirred up, and shall assemble a multitude of great forces (chayil, "army" as in Dan. xi. 7, 13, 25, 26): and one shall certainly come and overflow and pass through: then shall he return, and be stirred up, even to his fortress" (xi. 10).
> "Then he shall turn his face toward the fort of his own land" (xi. 19).
>
> "And arms shall stand on his part, and they shall pollute the sanctuary of strength, and shall take away the daily sacrifice, and they shall place the abomination that maketh desolate" (xi. 31).
>
> "He shall honour the god of forces" (xi. 38).
> "In the most strong holds" (xi. 39).

The first reference in this chapter is to the angelic power that strengthened Darius the Mede when he became king over the realm of the Chaldees (Dan. ix. 1). The closing references are to the supernatural powers that will be involved by the Man of Sin.

One of the continual ascriptions of praise offered to God in the O.T. is that He is the Strength of His people, the same word maoz being used:--

> "He is the saving strength of His anointed" (Psa. xxviii. 8).
> "He is their strength in the time of trouble" (Psa. xxxvii. 39).

The Man of Sin is opposed to God and all His ways, and naturally turns elsewhere for strength. Psa. lii., while speaking in the first place of Doeg the Edomite, is prophetic also of the Man of Sin:--

> "Is this the man that made not God his strength (maoz) . . . . . and strengthened (azaz) himself in his wickedness?" (Psa. lii. 7).

Psa. lxviii. is also prophetic of the time of the end. It speaks prophetically of Christ's ascension: "Thou hast ascended on high" (verse 18), and also of His second coming: "His strength is in the clouds" (verse 34).

In the blessing pronounced by Moses, when he looks down the ages to the time of the end, he says:--

> "There is none like unto the God of Jeshurun, Who rideth upon the heaven in thy help, and in His excellency on the sky" (Deut. xxxiii. 26).

This is the prophetic answer to the world's cry at the empowering of the Beast: "Who is like unto the Beast? Who is able to make war with him?" If the power of the Beast is the power of the "air", it is equally true that the Deliverer of Israel "rides upon the heaven . . . . . and on the sky". In Psa. lxviii., also, we read: "Who rideth upon the heavens" (Psa. lxviii. 4, 33).

Isaiah speaks of the day to come when Israel will be tempted to trust in chariots and horses, instead of looking to the Holy One of Israel (Isa. xxxi. 1). This will be following the policy of the Man of Sin, "the man who made not God his strength". After rebuking Israel for their trust in the arm of flesh, the passage goes on to speak of the deliverance that will be accomplished by the Lord:--

> "So shall the Lord of hosts come down to fight for Mount Zion, and for the hill thereof. As birds flying, so will the Lord of hosts defend Jerusalem; defending also He will deliver it; and hovering over He will preserve it" (Isa. xxxi. 4, 5).

We are anxious not to fall into the mistake of misusing the prophets by attempting to prophesy ourselves. We simply draw attention to a series of facts, which have an obvious bearing on the subject before us, and leave the reader to draw his own conclusions. It is clear that the great world power at the time of the end will be considered invincible. Its leader will receive power from Satan, and will worship one god only, a "god of munitions" (Dan. xi. 38 Margin). As we also know that he will worship Satan it seems clear that this god of munitions must be Satan himself. The Scriptures refer to Satan as the Prince of the authority of "the air", and it is the general conviction among all nations that supremacy in the air and world-wide dominion will, in the future, go together. It is clear also that the allusions to the deliverance of Israel by the Lord, Whose "strength is in the clouds", Whose excellency is "on the sky", and Who will at length defend Jerusalem "as birds flying", cannot be explained away. The Second Coming of Christ is often associated with "clouds", so much so that the Rabbins gave the Messiah the title: "The Cloud Comer." Taking all these things into consideration the conclusion seems irresistible that we are living in days when the last weapon is being perfected, the weapon which will be used by Satan and his agents in their final bid for world power.

While we cannot help feeling saddened at the way in which all nations are preparing for Armageddon, we are thankful to know that there is another Power that is to be as supreme in the air as in heaven and earth, and that at the critical moment it shall be said: “Behold, He cometh with clouds.” In that day the Wicked One shall be destroyed, the authority of the air shall be broken, and “the kingdoms of this world shall become the kingdom of our Lord, and of His Christ”.

Light upon the purposes of prayer.

#1. Revelation and realization.
pp. 95 - 99

From time to time we receive enquiries relative to the place of prayer, especially in the light of the revelation of the mystery. We therefore endeavour in these articles to suggest a word of help to all who may be seeking light upon this most important subject. It is not given to us however to write pages of matter "without the Book". Our method is and must continue to be both expository and Berean in character, and we believe our readers would not have it otherwise.

If we make our search in the Scriptures regardless of dispensational divisions, we shall discover many precious lessons that belong to the matter of prayer, and which are true for all time. In so doing, however, we shall, unless we keep a watchful eye on the things that differ, be in danger of incorporating some items belonging to the prayers of one dispensation with those of another. For example, such an indiscriminate use of scripture would lead to the inclusion, as legitimate for the present time, of the practice of the anointing with oil and the prayer of faith for the saving of the sick, found in James v. 14, 15.

Again, thousands still use the prayer that includes the words: "Forgive us our debts, AS we forgive our debtors" (Matt. vi. 12), without ever realizing the weighty explanation added by the Lord in Matt. vi. 14, 15, and expanded into a parable in Matt. xviii. 21-35.

> "So likewise shall My heavenly Father do also unto you, if ye from your hearts forgive not every one his brother their trespasses" (Matt. xviii. 35).

It seems fitting therefore to take our enquirers to their own dispensational scriptures, and we propose to illustrate the place and office of prayer in this dispensation by passages taken from the prison epistles.

To most of our readers the general outline of the epistle to the Ephesians will be familiar, and we shall not be under the necessity of occupying space by the setting out of the subject-matter before us. We suggest that any reader who is unfamiliar with the structure and general outline of the epistle would find much to help in this direction by consulting our latest book: "The Testimony of the Lord's Prisoner", or by using the Index to the bound volumes of The Berean Expositor.

The first prayer we have to consider is found in Eph. i. 15-19, which we will here quote so that all readers may have the actual passage before them.

> "Wherefore, I also, after I heard of your faith in the Lord Jesus and love unto all the saints, cease not to give thanks for you, making mention of you in my prayers, That the God of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of glory, may give unto you the spirit of wisdom and revelation in the knowledge of Him; the eyes of your understanding being enlightened: That ye may know what is the hope of His calling, and what is the riches of the glory of His inheritance in the saints: And what is the exceeding greatness of His power to us-ward who believe" (Eph. i. 15-19).

The first word of this passage is one of great importance, inasmuch as it shows us the relationship that is intended between the previous revelation of Eph. i. 3-14 and the subsequent prayer—"Wherefore (dia touto) because of this." We perceive that the prayer is of a threefold nature:

(1) What is the hope of His calling.
(2) What is the riches of the glory of His inheritance in the saints.
(3) What is the exceeding greatness of His power to usward who believe.

Let us also be clear on this point, that the prayer is not that we may know what is the calling, or what is the inheritance, or what is faith—these are already known—but has to do with the expansion of these basic features with a view to the enrichment of the understanding. Now in Eph. i. 3-14 we have a threefold revelation.

(1) The will of the Father (3-6).—This is His calling.
(2) The work of the Son (7-12).—Here we find our inheritance.
(3) The witness of the Spirit (13-14).—Here we first read of believing.

Here we have "wisdom and revelation", but the prayer that follows is that we may have "the spirit of wisdom and revelation". When this is given we shall not only know that we were chosen before the overthrow of the world, but we shall have the spirit of this choice. Not only shall we know that our blessings are all spiritual, and all in heavenly places, but we shall receive the hope of this high calling of God in Christ Jesus. So with the second part of the revelation, and the second clause of the prayer. The revelation shows that the inheritance forfeited by sin becomes ours by the redemption of Christ, and by His exaltation to headship over heaven and earth, "in Whom we have obtained an inheritance". While the fact of the inheritance is there, and the security is revealed, the spirit of it is a subject which awaits the added prayer. Revelation makes the inheritance known: prayer reveals "What is the riches of the glory of His inheritance in the saints". Surely we perceive the difference here.

So with the third part of the revelation and the third item of the prayer. Revelation has indicated the "word of truth, the gospel of your salvation" as the object of belief. This is accompanied by the "seal and the earnest", but it is the office of prayer to reveal the spirit of this revelation, namely, "What is the exceeding greatness of His power to usward who believe", and thereby the faith of the believer is associated with the risen and ascended Lord, a source of strength, indeed!

What do we learn then by this relation of prayer to revealed truth? Let us endeavour to illustrate it by a simple analogy. Without fear of contradiction or overstepping the bounds of fact, the revelation of truth contained in the scriptures may be represented by the figure of food. It is indeed a common scriptural figure.

Let us therefore suppose that ten persons sit down at the same table, and partake of the same dishes. It is evident that each guest's plate may contain the same element of food, but in no two cases will the results be exactly alike. In some cases full nourishment may be obtained from the food. In others mastication will be faulty, and again in others, digestive troubles will prevent the eater from getting the benefit from certain parts of the diet. In effect this is saying that the possession of food does not necessarily ensure that the possessor is fed. So also with the Word of God. If its mere possession meant illumination and salvation, all booksellers, printers and publishers who handled the sacred volume would be saved persons. The words of the Prayer Book are full of sound sense and doctrine which exhort to "read, mark, learn and inwardly digest". The lesson we learn from the connection of revealed truth with prayer in Eph. i. is just this one of the relation of food to digestion. The Scriptures supply the "wisdom and revelation", and prayer supplies "the spirit of wisdom and revelation", and just as "the body without the spirit is dead, being alone", so the printed page of the Word remains but "the letter" unless it be prayerfully partaken of and its truth spiritually digested.

One further feature before we conclude this article. This spirit of wisdom and revelation is in the "knowledge of Him". In article #35 of the Epistle to the Romans, we have discussed the various words translated "know". We will not repeat the whole process here, but merely quote one section which will suffice for our purpose.

> "Oida is less personal than ginosko. It is allied to the verb "to see" whereas ginosko is allied to nous, "the mind". The word 'perceive' can well be substituted for the five occurrences given (in the article) under oida. Place the two passages together for comparison:
>
> 'I had not acknowledged (ginosko) sin, but by the law' (Rom. vii. 7).
> 'I had not perceived (oida) lust except the law had said, Thou shalt not covet' (Rom.vii. 7)."

The word translated "knowledge" is epignosis, the added epi (on) giving the sense not only of acknowledgement but of realization. The words: "That ye may know" in Eph. i. 18, are a translation of oida, "to perceive". Hence the "eyes of understanding being enlightened" precedes this prayer.

What we have discovered therefore comes to this. First, God must graciously give us the truth itself: apart from that we are unsaved and hopeless. Then, He must give "the spirit" of this wisdom and revelation, so that we may both "acknowledge" and "realize" Him, His calling, inheritance and our faith. Finally: the eyes of the understanding being enlightened, He can lead us on to "perceive" what is the hope, the riches, the glory, the power, apart from which the revelation of Scripture remains like undigested food, containing all the elements of life and growth and well being, but of no avail unless partaken of, digested, and converted to the use of the eater.

It should of course be realized that there has been no attempt in this article to deal with "What is the hope of His calling"—that has been considered in other articles. In this series we have kept to the subject before us, "Light upon the purposes of prayer", and have found that the teaching of Eph. i. 15-19 sheds some light upon the subject.

Our first finding, then, is that prayer is to the Word what digestion is to food. This calls for one further remark, obvious enough in daily life, but sometimes sadly missed in spiritual things. If, before it yields up its life-giving goodness, the Word necessitates prayer, prayer correspondingly needs the Word, for whoever heard of anyone growing strong and tall merely because he had a good digestion? A good digestion is valueless unless there be good food to digest: so prayer without the Word is a process without material. Prayer that is not ever and always acting upon the revealed truth of the Word will but lead to spiritual starvation. When both are together—the spiritual food and the spiritual digestion—then the Word will live and become the very food for spiritual growth.

If, to some, reference to the processes of digestion seems rather unseemly, such may be able better to appreciate the relation of the Word of God and prayer if expressed thus: Revelation and realization.

#2. Revelation and Anticipation.
pp. 137 - 139

We have seen in Eph. i. the intimate connection that exists between the revelation of truth, and its realization. We now turn to the next great prayer of Ephesians, seeking further light upon the purpose of prayer. This prayer occupies a central place in the complete epistle, uniting by its position the seven sections of doctrine (Eph. i. - iii. 13) with the seven sections of practice (Eph. iv.-vi.). The place occupied by the prayer largely indicates its purpose. But, first, let us acquaint ourselves with the letter of the Word so that we may appreciate its spirit.

> "For this cause I bow my knees unto the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, of Whom the whole family of heaven and earth is named, That He would grant you according to the riches of His glory, to be strengthened with might by His spirit in the inner man; that Christ may dwell in your hearts by faith: that ye, being rooted and grounded in love, may be able to comprehend with all saints, what is the breadth and length and depth and height, and to know the love of Christ which passeth knowledge, that ye might be filled with all the fullness of God" (Eph. iii. 14-19).

We observed that the first prayer opened with dia touto, "because of this", and we observe that this second prayer opens with Toutou charin. Charin is translated "for the sake of" in Titus i. 11, and this we adopt here to mark the distinction. We should next ask "For the sake of what" does the apostle bow his knees and pray? We look at the preceding context, with its revelation of the dispensation of the mystery, and upon reaching verse one of this chapter we once more meet with the words "For the sake of this".

Upon examination, we shall discover that Eph. iii. 2-13 is a parenthesis, explaining and justifying the apostle's claim to be the prisoner of the Lord for the Gentiles. The connection therefore of the prayer of chapter iii. is really with the close of chapter ii., the closing section of which reveals the church as a temple fitly framed together, "builded together for an habitation of God in spirit". "For the sake of this" is the prayer of the apostle. This habitation being "in spirit" he first prays for the strengthening of spirit in the inner man, with this object "that Christ may dwell in your hearts by faith". "Dwell" is katoikeo, "habitation" is katoiketerion.

Here we may see one of the purposes of prayer. Collectively and dispensationally we are a temple, a dwelling place for God in Spirit. This is revelation; prayer leads to realization. The Scripture reveals the glorious calling of the whole church; prayer makes it an individual appropriation. Prayer desires that what is true of me as one of a great company, shall in some measure be experienced by me as an individual believer. We are however warned against a selfish isolation in this quest for experimental realization, for the prayer indicates that the mightiest realization of all can only be as we "comprehend with all saints". So also the earlier preparation of the prayer. "The whole family in heaven and earth" is placed prominently before us. This prayer really ranges the whole revelation already given in the first three chapters of Ephesians, turning revelation into realization.

The comprehension of breadth, length, depth and height, takes account of the four great distinguishing features of the revelation of the mystery. Breadth is mentioned first, in iii. 6, where the threefold equality of the new calling is indicated. Such breadth had never before been known. Such being our blessed privilege, the prayer is that we may enter into its fullness. The length is found in ii. 7 and i. 4, where in the working out of this great purpose the ages to come are linked with the period before the overthrow of the world. Depth and height are both indicated by the revelation of ii. 6, "raised us up" and "made us sit together in heavenly places", Eph. ii. 11, 12, revealing the abject character of those thus raised up, aliens, strangers, Christless, hopeless, godless. While "exceeding power" is the climax of the first prayer, "knowledge-exceeding love" is the heart and centre of the second. We have not yet reached the goal of this second prayer, however, for spiritual strength, experimental realization of the "temple" character of our calling, the mighty comprehension of breadth, length, depth and height, and the even mightier attempt "to know the love of Christ which passeth knowledge", are but steps to that goal.

"In order that you may be filled unto all the fullness of God" (Eph. iii. 19).

"The fullness" is the goal of the ages. In its first occurrence in Matt. ix. 16 the word so translated is used to indicate the opposite of a "rent" or "schism". This "rent" was in mind when "The whole family in heaven and earth" was named. It was in mind when the heading up of all things in heaven and earth was revealed, in Eph. i. 10. The purpose of this prayer is nothing less than the believer should be led so to acknowledge Christ as His Head, so to take his place in the mighty scheme, so to anticipate that day when every knee shall bow, so to anticipate that day when God shall be all in all, that, as expressed in the language of the poet, he may be able to say: "I feel now the future on the instant."

Prayer links us to the revealed purpose. Prayer enables us most earnestly to desire the accomplishment of that purpose, and prayer creates the desire in the heart that what shall yet be true of the whole, in the future, shall be true of me, in my degree and capacity, now, in the present. We may by its power become "living epistles" indeed. We may each become an embodiment of anticipation of the ages to come.

If therefore we were able to sum up our first examination and say that the relationship of the Word and prayer could be expressed as revelation and realization, we can now take a step further and say that prayer leads to realization, comprehension, and, above all, personal anticipation of the truth of divine revelation. It is much like that "faith which is the substance of things hoped for". We sometimes hear our children singing: "Make the Book live to me, dear Lord." This is the office of prayer, and the goal of this prayer is particular and personal anticipation of the divine purpose.

#3. Revelation and Participation.
pp. 177 - 179

There is one more prayer used in the epistle to the Ephesians that will throw light upon the "purposes of prayer" in this dispensation of the mystery. The first prayer had relation to the three items of revelation given in Eph. i. 3-14, and led into the spirit of this revelation, acknowledging Him, and perceiving what are the hope, riches and power belonging to this calling. The second prayer led to the desire that what God planned to do when the ages should reach their goal, He might do in us, in spirit, now, as a small yet real anticipation of that day. The third prayer has not the vastness of scope of the second, but is more intimate and personal. Let us have the passage before us.

> "Praying always with all prayer and supplication in the spirit, and watching thereunto with all perseverance and supplication for all saints; and for me, that utterance may be given unto me, that I may open my mouth boldly, to make known the mystery of the gospel, for which I am an ambassador in bonds; that therein I may speak boldly, as I ought to speak" (Eph. vi. 18-20).

The great basis of the two prayers just considered was the revelation of truth contained in the Scriptures. This revelation should ever have this basic place in our hearts and minds. Alas, the reverse is often the case. We do not always "seek first the kingdom of God", but are much more concerned with what we shall eat, and what we shall drink, or wherewithal we shall be clothed. These things are known unto God, and prayer is not to be used merely as a means of satisfying our temporal needs, but for satisfying the more pressing needs of the spirit.

When we examine this prayer of Eph. vi., we find a blending of scriptural facts with personal affairs. We have only to continue a perusal of the chapter to find that this prayer was the expression of a desire to turn all the apostle's circumstances to good account; consequently, after asking for the prayers of the Ephesian church the apostle adds,

> "But that ye also may know my affairs" (ta kata eme, balancing in the first prayer ten kath humos pistin), "and how I do, Tychicus, a beloved brother and faithful minister in the Lord, shall make known to you all things, whom I have sent unto you for the same purpose, that ye might know our affairs, and that he might comfort your hearts" (Eph. vi. 21-22).

In this passage we meet once more the two words for "know", oida and ginosko:

> "In order that you may perceive the things according to me (my affairs), and what I am doing."
> "In order that you may know the things concerning me" (peri, around me, my circumstances)."

What were Paul's affairs, doings, circumstances? We can only surmise in the light of his epistles and the close of the Acts, from which we get some idea of the facts of his imprisonment. The more we know of the conditions of prison life at that time, the more urgent does Paul's need appear. Yet let us observe that before sending Tychicus to tell them all his affairs, Paul had already limited the prayers of the Lord's people on his behalf. He does not ask them to pray for his deliverance. Why? He was the prisoner of the Lord, and such a prayer would therefore express dissatisfaction with his position and consequent disloyalty to his Lord. Why does he not ask for assistance that his lot might be made more tolerable? It was because of what he had already told the Philippians when he said that he had learned a quieting and steadying lesson that made such prayers superfluous.

> "I have learned, in whatsoever state I am, to be independent. I know both how to be abased, and I know how to abound; everywhere and in all things I am instructed to be full and to be hungry, both to abound and to suffer need. I can do all things through Christ which strengtheneth me" (Phil. iv. 11-13).

But if Paul asks prayer neither for deliverance, nor amelioration of his prison lot, for what will he ask? The answer is that his great concern was his own faithfulness to the ministry which God had given him.

He asked for "utterance", logos; he asked that he might open his mouth "boldly", his great desire being "to make known the mystery of the gospel". He was a prisoner. Yes, but that fact impinged upon his very ministry and their prayers. The only place that Paul would allow his imprisonment to have in the prayers of the saints on his behalf was that he might be enabled to live in full accord with its meaning and import.

> "The mystery of the gospel, for which I am an ambassador in bonds."

His language here is a glorious testimony to the power of faith. Where we might have said "prisoner" he says "ambassador", and who would ask the prayers of the saints that the Lord's ambassador be dismissed?

Here, then, is a third purpose of prayer. Prayer was not to be used to accomplish deliverance from prison or soften its austerities, but rather to enable the servant of Christ to triumph over them, and make them subserve the Lord's will and purpose.

Circumstances may enchain us; "our affairs", if described in the language of men, may seem mean, poor, colourless, miserable. Prayer lays hold of these circumstances, and the prison wall cannot prevent the truth from sounding out to the whole Gentile world. The prisoner becomes the honoured ambassador of the Most High, and his desires are so far above the, by comparison, mere pressure of outward circumstances that, as a matter of consideration, they cease to exist. He knows a holy independence of them all, and his one concern is for personal faithfulness.

The three prayers of this Epistle may therefore be summed up as follows:

(1) Revelation turned into Realization (Eph. i. 15-19).
(2) Revelation turned into Anticipation (Eph. iii. 14-19).
(3) Revelation turned into Participation (Eph. vi. 18-22).

#4. Root and Fruit.
pp. 213 - 215

The prayers recorded in any one book of the Bible will necessarily take their colouring from the special aspect of truth characterizing that book. This we have seen exemplified in the three prayers of Ephesians. The basic truth of the dispensation of the mystery is never absent from these three prayers.

In the pursuit of our enquiry we next turn to Philippians. In Chapter i. 9-11 of this Epistle we have the apostle's prayer for those who had had such fellowship with him in the gospel as eclipsed the efforts of all other assemblies.

> "And this I pray that your love may abound yet more and more in knowledge and in all judgment. That ye may approve things that are excellent; that ye may be sincere and without offence till the day of Christ; being filled with the fruits of righteousness which are by Jesus Christ, unto the glory and praise of God."

When considering the three prayers found in Ephesians we did not attempt an analysis of the Epistle, nor can we here give an analysis of the Epistle to the Philippians. Suffice it to say that the key words of Ephesians, namely "Head", "Body", "Mystery" and "Fullness" are absent, and, instead, we have "No reputation", "Prize", "Striving as athletes", "Fellowship of His sufferings", etc. Philippians, instead of dealing with the "ground and the root", is more concerned with the "fruit". Instead of stressing a salvation which is not or works, it urges believers to "work out their own salvation". Instead of "access with boldness" we have fear and trembling" and "if by any means". In this prayer for the Philippians it is the love of the believer that is in view, "that your love may abound", whereas in the Ephesian prayer it is "the love of Christ" that is central. We do not usually think of abounding love and keen discernment together, yet it is for this that the apostle prays. The word "judgment" is aisthesis. Etymologically this word means "perception by the external senses" such as seeing or hearing something, etc.

Aistheterion means the organ of sensation, and in the definitions of Galen, the aistheterion is defined as "the organ to which any sense is entrusted—either the eye, or the nose, or the tongue". For this word we turn to Heb. v. 14.

> "But strong meat belongeth to them that are of full age (perfect) even those who by reason of use have their senses (sense organs) exercised to discern both good and evil."

It has been our earnest contention for years, that the epistle to the Hebrews and the epistle to the Philippians, though they ministered to two distinct companies, were nevertheless parallel. The above occurrences of aisthesis and aistheterion are all that are to be found in the N.T., and the passage in Hebrews helps us to understand the prayer of Philippians. Heb. v. deals with the sufferings of Christ and with His being made perfect. Phil. iii. deals with fellowship with His sufferings and the believer being made perfect.

The idea of perfection is expressed in the terms of growth, from babyhood to manhood, from the period when senses, though possessed, are unexercised, to that in which they are put to full use; from mere knowledge to discrimination. While the component parts of aisthesis speak of the physical senses, the usage of the N.T. is against the interpretation that the etymology suggests, namely, "sensibility", and it must not be forgotten that the usage of a word is of even more importance than its composition. In this case the usage would indicate something akin to "perception", "discernment", "discrimination", with the underlying thought of the spiritual equivalent of the five senses. The prayer of Phil. i. is for growth: that abounding love may quicken every spiritual sense: that the eyes of the understanding, opened in Eph. i., may now be quickened to discern and approve differences and excellencies. That the spiritual ear may be enabled ever to distinguish between the Word of truth and its counterfeit, and that the other spiritual senses may, by reason of use, be enabled to discriminate in their various functions. This immediately follows in the prayer itself, "That ye may approve things that are excellent" or, as the margin puts it, "That ye may approve things that differ".

Dokimazo, the word translated "prove" and "try" must never be dissociated, in the mind, from the testing or trying of metals. Peter uses it in full recognition of this sense, when he says:

> "That the trying (dokimion) of your faith, being much more precious than of gold that perisheth, though it be tried (dokimazo) with fire, might be found unto praise and honour and glory at the appearing of Jesus Christ" (I Pet. i. 7).

Philippians has in view the day of Christ, and the glory and praise of God.

The idea of growth is still employed in the expression of the desire for the more advanced "fruits of righteousness".

Here therefore the goal before the Apostle in the prayer is the growth, the adulthood, and the perfecting of the believer. That the root should bear fruit; that the senses should be exercised; that life should manifest itself in living. In view of this conception of root, growth and fruit, the twofold ministry of the Word and prayer can be easily expressed in the language of the apostle.

> "I have planted (the root, the Word), Apollos watered (the growth, the prayer), but God gave the increase" (in both), for revelation is from Him and prayer is ever to Him.

#1. The Edicts of Julius Caesar in favour of the Jews.

pp. 163 - 166

"The faith of God's elect and the truth which is after godliness" (Titus i. 1) may at first sight seem rather far removed from such mundane things as Roman laws. And yet, when we remember that the writer of the Epistle to the Ephesians was a prisoner in Rome, and that he was not only a Hebrew, but also a Tarsian, a freeman and a Roman citizen, we begin to realize that there is some connection. The apostle Paul was protected by several Roman governors, and was the instrument for the conversion of at least one (Sergius Paulus: Acts xiii. 12). He reasoned with another on the subject of righteousness, temperance, and judgment to come (Acts xxiv. 25), while yet anther, King Agrippa, had said upon hearing his defence: "Almost thou persuadest me to be a Christian" (Acts xxvi. 28).

Not only does Paul come into direct touch with Rome and its law, but in connection with the Saviour Himself—at His birth, at the commencement of His public ministry, at His trial and at His crucifixion under Pontius Pilate—there is a series of points of contact with the Roman power. We remember also that both Paul and his Lord have something to say about paying tribute and recognizing authority. Taking all these things into account, therefore it would seem that a knowledge of Roman history and Roman laws would provide valuable sidelights upon the New Testament. We are nevertheless aware that it is not every reader who will find the subject of great interest, and we do not intend to give prominence to a study which is, after all, a side-issue. The articles of this series will be kept within modest bounds so that more important Scriptural exposition shall not be crowded out, but we hope that no reader will find the subject so uninteresting that he cannot find at least one item each time that will prove of use in the study of the Word of God.

The Roman Emperors who figure in the New Testament are: Augustus, Tiberius, Gaius, Claudius, and Nero. Before we speak of these rulers, however, we will go back a little before the birth of Christ to Julius Cæsar, whose influence, both among the Jews and in the Roman world, was very strong, both in the days of our Lord and of His apostles.

Julius Cæsar was the first of the Roman Emperors, and died by assassination in B.C.43. The important point with which we are concerned at the moment is his attitude towards the religion of the Jews. When we remember the jealous way in which Rome looked upon any political movement within the Empire, prohibiting public meetings and allowing no tax-gathering to be undertaken apart from its own agents, it is at first a matter of some surprise that the Jews should have been permitted to maintain their Sabbaths, to exact tribute, and to gather together from all parts of the Roman Empire to keep the feast at Jerusalem, not only with the approval of Rome, but under its protection. These privileges were largely due to the decrees of Julius Cæsar, which, in substance, were as follows.

The first decree was issued in B.C.47 as a recognition of the assistance that Hyrcanus, the High Priest, had rendered during the Alexandrian war.

> "Caius Julius Cæsar, imperator and high priest, and dictator the second time, to the magistrates, senate, and people of Sidon, sendeth greeting. If you be in health, it is well. I also and the army are well. I have sent you a copy of that decree, registered on the tables, which concerns Hyrcanus, the son of Alexander, the high priest and ethnarch of the Jews, that it may be laid up among the public records; and I will that it be openly proposed in a table of brass, both in Greek and in Latin. It is as follows:--
>
> I, Julius Cæsar, imperator the second time, and high priest, have made this decree, with the approbation of the senate: Whereas Hyrcanus, the son of Alexander the Jew, hath demonstrated his fidelity and diligence about our affairs, and this both now and in former times, both in peace and in war, as many of our generals have borne witness, and came to our assistance in the Alexandrian war with fifteen hundred soldiers; and when he was sent up by me to Mithredates, showed himself superior in valour to all the rest of that army: for this reason I will that Hyrcanus, the son of Alexander, and his children be ethnarchs of the Jews, and have the high-priesthood of the Jews for ever, according to the customs of their forefathers, and that he and his son be our confederates; and that beside this, every one of them be reckoned among our particular friends. I also ordain, that he and his children retain whatsoever privileges belong to the office of the high priest, or whatsoever favours have been hitherto granted to them; and if at any time hereafter arise any questions about the Jewish customs, I will that he determine the same; and I think it not proper that they should be obliged to find us winter quarters, or that any money should be required of them" (Josephus Ant. xiv. x. 2).

The next decree ordained:

> "That he, as himself the high priest and ethnarch of the Jews, defend those that are injured."
>
> "This (comments Lewin) was a concession of no little practical consequence. The most beneficial laws would be utterly worthless, if their provisions could be broken with impunity. Now, however, that the relation of patron and clients was established between the High Priest, and the Jews of all countries, if any one suffered wrong the High Priest had authority to make a formal complaint; either to the Proconsul or to the Emperor, and the High Priest's ambassadors were to have a free passage for the purpose."

Another edict permitted the Jews to possess Jerusalem and encompass the city with walls, while yet another exempted them from paying tribute on what "they call the Sabbatical Year because thereon they neither receive the fruits of their trees nor do they sow the land".

Finally, Julius Cæsar wrote:

> "The Jews of Delos, and some other Jews that sojourn there, in the presence of your ambassadors, signified to us, that, by a decree of yours (the inhabitants of Parium, a city > of Mysia), you forbid them to make use of the customs of their forefathers, and their way of sacred worship. Now it does not please me that such decrees should be made against our friends and confederates, whereby they are forbidden to live according to their own customs, or to bring in contributions for common suppers and holy festivals, while they are not forbidden so to do even at Rome itself."

In the earlier part of his book Josephus promises that he will reproduce all the public decrees of the Romans in favour of the Jews. He actually writes out a number of them, which, if cited in these pages, would occupy more than one issue of this magazine, but finding so many more, he apologizes for not transcribing them all. We trust that by the perusal of the few extracts we have given, the reader will have realized something of the value of being acquainted with Roman history as it bears upon the story of the N.T.

We append a list of all references in the N.T. to the Emperors of Rome, and make our quotations from the R.V.

> AUGUSTUS.—"There went out a decree from Cæsar Augustus, that all the world should be enrolled" (Luke ii. 1).
>
> TIBERIUS.—"In the fifteenth year of the reign of Tiberius Cæsar" (Luke iii. 1).
>
> "Is it lawful to give tribute unto Cæsar, or not? . . . . . They say unto Him, Cæsar's. Then saith He unto them, Render therefore unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's" (Matt. xxiii. 17-21; Mark xii. 14-17; Luke xx. 22-25).
>
> "If thou release this man, thou art not Cæsar's friend; every one that maketh himself king speaketh against Cæsar" (John xix. 12).
>
> "Forbidding to give tribute to Cæsar, saying that He Himself is Christ a King" (Luke xxiii. 2).
>
> CLAUDIUS.—"A great famine over all the world, which came to pass in the days of Claudius Cæsar" (Acts xi. 28).
>
> "These all act contrary to the decrees of Cæsar" (Acts xvii. 7).
>
> "Claudius has commanded all Jews to depart from Rome" (Acts xviii. 2).
>
> NERO.—"Nor yet against Cæsar, have I sinned at all . . . . . I am standing before Cæsar's judgment-seat . . . . . I appeal unto Cæsar . . . . . Hast thou appealed unto Cæsar? unto Cæsar shalt thou go" (Acts xxv. 8, 10, 11, 12).
>
> "Fear not Paul; thou must stand before Cæsar" (Acts xxvii. 24).
> "I was constrained to appeal unto Cæsar" (Acts xxviii. 19).

It will be seen from this list that Cæsar's rule, at the time of the birth, ministry and death of Christ, through the history of the Acts and latent in the very title of Paul "the prisoner", is a factor which we cannot ignore without loss.

#2. Augustus, and the Taxing under Cyrenius (Luke ii. 1, 2).
pp. 204 - 207

> "And it came to pass in those days, that there went out a decree from Cæsar Augustus, that all the world should be taxed, and this taxing was first made when Cyrenius was governor of Syria" (Luke ii. 1, 2).

With these words Luke introduces the circumstances of the Saviour's birth.

Cæsar Augustus, whose original name was Gaius Octavius, was the son of a niece of Julius Cæsar, and was adopted by him as his son and heir. We shall have to speak more particularly on the subject of Roman adoption in a future article, and we therefore refrain from giving more detailed comment here. According to custom, Octavius changed his name upon being adopted, and called himself Gaius Julius Cæsar Octavianus. The murder of Julius Cæsar threw the Roman world into a state of chaos, from which the figures of Mark Antony and young Octavian soon emerged as protagonists. At the age of thirty-three Octavian became the master of the world. Julius Cæsar had been assassinated by those who were anxious to safeguard the state as a Republic. Octavian endeavoured to further his predecessor's general aims but without perpetuating his fatal error.

> "The system of the Imperial government, as it was instituted by Augustus, and maintained by those princes who understood their own interest and that of the people, may be defined as an absolute monarchy disguised in the form of a commonwealth. The masters of the Roman world surrounded their throne with darkness, concealed their irresistible strength, and humbly professed themselves the accountable ministers of the senate, whose supreme decrees they dictated and obeyed" (Gibbon).

The Senate conferred upon Octavian the following titles: Augustus, a name that is translated Sebastos in the Greek, and is almost a claim of Divine honours; Pater Patriæ, "Father of his country"; and Princeps, "First citizen". The Senate also invested him with the power of Tribune and Imperium, the latter giving him absolute control over the army.

Augustus reigned from B.C.27 to A.D.14. He established the Pax Romana (the "Roman Peace"), and of him it was said that he "found Rome of brick and left it of marble". The literary and intellectual life of Rome reached its highest point under his rule, and, speaking relatively, it is true to say:

> "His course was wise and beneficent; literature and the arts flourished under his auspices; good laws were enacted; and he was in many respects deserving of the lavish praise heaped upon him by the writers of that time" (Maunder).

Augustus repeated and enforced the edicts of Julius Cæsar in favour of the Jews. The edict of Augustus contains the following statement with reference to Hyrcanus:

> "Whereas the nation of the Jews, and the High Priest Hyrcanus, have proved themselves loyal to the Roman People, not only at the present juncture, but also in the time of my father Cæsar the Emperor, be it enacted by me and my council, with the > sanction of the Roman People, that the Jews do use their own customs according to the law of their fathers, as they used them in the time of Hyrcanus, the High Priest of the Most High God" (Josephus Ant. xvi., v. 2).

It is interesting to observe that the Greek words here are Theou hupsistou, "Most High God", the same words as are used in the Septuagint version of Nebuchadnezzar's ascription in Dan. iv.

The decree set in motion by Augustus, that sent every Jewish family back to the city of their tribe, unwittingly brought about the fulfillment of the prophecy that the Messiah should be born in Bethlehem, for Joseph would most certainly not have allowed his wife to undertake the fatigue of such a journey, when she was within a few weeks of giving birth to a child, unless there had been some such edict that could not be disobeyed.

The statement that this taxing took place when Cyrenius was governor of Syria (Luke ii. 1) has caused a great deal of thought and criticism, and there have been many who have set aside Luke's record as both unhistorical and impossible. Until recently the critics have rejected Luke ii. 1 on four counts:

(1) Augustus did not issue a decree for a census.
(2) Under the Empire there was never any regular system of census.
(3) Where there was a casual census, only the husband's presence was necessary.
(4) And his presence was not required at his original home.

Luke implies by the word "first" that this census was the beginning of a series that followed. Pliny, in his Natural History, vii. 48 (159), tells us that, during the census taken under Claudius in A.D.48, a man living at Bologna entered his age as 150. This excited the curiosity of Claudius, who investigated the records of previous enrolments and corroborated the entry. This proves beyond question that there had been a series of enrolments, and that they were accessible for investigation in A.D.48.

Tacitus also mentions a census in A.D.61 and we know that Vespasian and Titus were Censors in A.D.73-74.

Clement of Alexandria says that Christ was born "in the 28th year, when first they ordered enrolments to be made". Tertullian says that the Saviour was born when a census was being made in Syria by Sentius Saturninus, and Josephus places the governorship of Sentius as 8-6B.C.

Recent discoveries in Egypt have thrown more light upon Luke's statement, and evidence is now available of a census system in operation in Egypt from A.D.90 to A.D.258. In this system we find that every man had to return to his own home or birthplace.

For example, an order issued in A.D.104 reads:

> "That all who for any reason whatever are away from their own homes should return to their homes to enroll themselves."

In A.D.154 we find a text showing the operation of the law:

> "If any person . . . . . is found straying on alien land, he shall be arrested and brought before me as no longer merely suspect but actually a confessed malefactor."

We find the same law in force in Egypt, in Thrace, and in Palestine.

In 1912 Professor Ramsay discovered an inscription at Antioch which reads:

> "To Gaius Caristanius (Son of Gaius, of Sergia tribe) Fronto Caesianus Juletus, Chief of engineers, pontifex priest, prefect of P. Sulpicius, Quirinius, prefect of M. Servillius. To him first of all men at state expense by decree of the decuriones, a statue was erected."

"Quirinius" is the "Cyrenius" of Luke ii. 2 and this inscription shows that he was elected chief magistrate of the colony of Antioch and that he had nominated Caristanius to act as his prefect.

It is beyond our purpose to go into all the proofs that Sir William Ramsay has brought forward to establish the date of Luke ii. 2. It is sufficient to state that the discoveries he has made in Asia Minor "confirm the correctness of all the facts that Luke mentions regarding the census and its manner and its date".

In conclusion we would remind the reader that all arguments found in commentaries written before 1910 were written without the evidence now available and should therefore be read with discernment.

The Epistle to the Romans.

#62. The Goal: Conformity to the Image of His Son. (1) An examination of difficult words (viii. 29, 30).

pp. 32 - 37

We now commence the study of another member of the structure of Rom. viii., namely, verses 29 and 30. This member corresponds to verses 5-15, as follows:--

B | 5-15. Led by Spirit of Christ. SONS now (huios).
B | 29, 30. Conformed to the image of His SON then (huios).

> "For whom He did foreknow, He also did predestinate to be conformed to the image of His Son, that He might be the Firstborn among many brethren. Moreover, whom He did predestinate, them He also called: and whom He called, them He also justified: and whom He justified, them He also glorified" (Rom. viii. 29, 30).

The analysis of the passage is simple, and is as follows:--

A | PREDESTINATION.—Conformity. Steps leading to.
B | PURPOSE.—Christ. Firstborn among many brethren.
A | PREDESTINATION.—Glory. Steps leading to.

But before we can appreciate its magnificence we shall have to arrive, with some certainty, at the meaning of several of the words used.

Foreknowledge.—How are we to understand this word? The word proginosko, to foreknow, occurs five times in the N.T., and the noun, prognosis, twice, making seven references in all. The passages are as follows:--

> "Him, being delivered by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God, ye have taken, and by wicked hands have crucified and slain" (Acts ii. 23).
> "My manner of life from my youth, which was at the first among mine own nation at Jerusalem, know all the Jews; which knew me from the beginning" (Acts xxvi. 4, 5).
> "For whom He did foreknow, He also did predestinate" (Rom. viii. 29).
> "God hath not cast away His people which He foreknew" (Rom. xi. 2).
> "Elect according to the foreknowledge of God the Father" (I Pet. i. 2).
> "Who verily was foreordained before the foundation of the world" (I Pet. i. 20).
> "Ye, therefore, beloved, seeing ye know these things before" (II Pet. iii. 17).

It will be observed that the usage subdivides this list into three groups. (i.) God.—It is used of God in connection with Christ and His sacrifice for sin. (ii.) God.—It is used of God in connection with His people who are called the elect, or the chosen. (iii.) Man.—It is used of man in the sense of knowing beforehand, or of having previous information. The grouping of these occurrences may be made more evident if set out as follows:--

A | Reference to Christ and His sacrifice (Acts ii. 23).
B | Reference to man and his previous knowledge of facts (Acts xxvi. 4, 5).
C | Reference to the elect people of God (Rom. viii. 29; xi. 2; I Pet. i. 2).
A | Reference to Christ and His sacrifice (I Pet. i. 20).
B | Reference to man and his foreknowledge as a result of scriptural testimony (II Pet. iii. 17).

Commentators are divided in their treatment of the meaning of the "foreknowledge" of God. The Calvinist sees in the word a synonym for predestination. Others an indication of love and favour. Apart from theological necessity, the word means to know beforehand, without responsibility as to the event. Dr. Liddon says of the earlier suggestions, "The New Testament use of the word does not sanction this (not even Rom. xi. 2; I Pet. i. 20), or any other meaning than to know beforehand". To us, creatures of time and space, such knowledge borders upon the impossible. Indeed, some, like Jonathan Edwards, have boldly said: "It is impossible for a thing to be certainly known, to any intellect, without evidence", and have come to the conclusion that the foreknowledge of God compels Him, the Most High, to decree, foreordain, and unalterably fix every act and word that He has foreknown. It is extraordinary that any should thus presume to say what is or is not possible to the Lord; nor can such avoid the logical conclusion of their argument, that God must be, if they are right, the author of sin, a conclusion diametrically opposed by the Word of God, and odious to the conscience of His children.

Time is the measure of motion, and in our limited state, the idea of a timeless state expressed by the title I AM, is beyond our comprehension. A very crude illustration, however, may be of service in arriving at some understanding of the matter. Suppose the reader to be standing at a small table upon which there rest books, paper, ink and pens. As he stands, he comprehends the whole table and contents as one; there is neither a first nor a last. The articles could be well be enumerated from the left hand as from the right. Now, further, suppose that an ant has crawled up one of the table legs, and that he visits each article in turn. To the ant there will be definite sequence because the element of time is introduced and, resultingly, there will be a first and a last. So, also, if a spider crawl up the opposite leg, its enumeration would be reversed. So God, as it were, sees all at a glance: He knows the end from the beginning, but the future is hid from our eyes.

We shall be wise, therefore, to leave the word foreknowledge to mean just what it says and no more. The infinite knowledge of God makes it impossible that He shall not know who will preach and who will teach; where they will go, and when they will go; who shall hear, who reject, who accept, and who be left without a word of the gospel. The one great demand upon all who hear the gospel is that they believe the testimony of God concerning His Son. Whoever so believes passes into all the blessings purchased by the blood of Christ. Whoever does not believe makes God a liar (I John v. 10). If there were any idea of preordination in this, refusal to believe would be as much a part of God's predeterminate decree as is election to glory, and it would not be possible to make God a liar by so refusing His testimony. Further, in the passage before us, foreknowledge is differentiated from predestination, for we read: "Whom He did foreknow He also did predestinate." If we alter the word "foreknow" to any word bearing the sense of predetermining or predestining, the sentence ceases to have meaning, as, for example, if we read: "whom He did foreordain He also did predestinate."

We therefore understand the passage before us to declare that God, Who is not under the limitations of time and space as we are, and needs no external evidence in order to attain to His knowledge, knows all things, past, present and future: knows them perfectly and completely, and can, therefore, act with complete certainty where, to us, all would appear in a contingent light.

Predestination.—Those who were foreknown of God were also predestinated to conformity to the image of His Son. Here is another term that demands care in application. What is meant by predestination? It is somewhat unfortunate that the English translation contains the word "destiny", which interjects the conception of fate, although, speaking exactly, the word "destiny" contains no more than the idea of "end" or "destination".

The word predestinate is a translation of the Greek proorizo. The word horos, from which horizo is formed, does not occur in the N.T., but it has the well-established meaning of boundary or limit. This word, in its turn, is from horao, to see, boundaries generally being marked to make them visible and conspicuous. Those whom God foreknew He also marked out beforehand for a glorious end—conformity to the image of His Son.

Three words have now been considered, each commencing with the prefix pro:

(1) Purpose, Prothesis. Something set or placed before the mind, a proposition.
(2) Foreknowledge, Proginosko. To know beforehand, and.
(3) Predestinate, Proorizo. To mark off beforehand.

The whole testimony of the Scriptures is to the effect that God has a purpose before Him, according to which He works and, in accord with that purpose of peopling heaven and earth with the redeemed, He foreknew every one who would respond to the call of grace, and accordingly marked them off beforehand for the various spheres of glory that His purpose demanded.

If we believe that God fixed unchangeably, from all eternity, whosoever should, in time, believe, then however much we may hedge and cover the fact, there is but one logical conclusion, a conclusion that, in days gone by, has driven many to the edge of despair. That conclusion is, that He Who absolutely and unalterably fixed the number of those who should believe, just as surely fixed unalterably the number of those who should not believe, a conclusion so monstrous that it has only to be expressed to be rejected.

> "How then shall they call on Him in Whom they have not believed? And how shall they believe in Him of Whom they have not heard?" (Rom. x. 14).

In the original the word "conformed" in Rom. viii. 29 is summorphos, which is made up of sun, "together with", and morphe, "form". The English word "form" is from the Latin forma, which is but a transposition of the letters of the Greek morpha or morphe. While the word morphe indicates visible shape, its usage, both in its simple form and as a compound, compels us to see in it a resemblance that is much deeper than mere outward conformity. We have, for example in Rom. ii. 20, "a form of knowledge", and in II Tim. iii. 5 "a form of godliness" which was merely external and "formal". In Mark xvi. 12 and Phil. ii. 6, 7, we have the word used in the account of the appearance of the Lord to the disciples on the way to Emmaus, and in the exhortation based on that most wonderful condescension, when He laid aside the "form" of God by taking upon Him the "form" of a servant. In combination with the preposition meta, we have the familiar word metamorphosis, a word used in the study of insect development to indicate the change from pupa to perfect butterfly, a wonderful illustration comparable with the argument based on the sowing of seed used by the apostle in I Cor. xv. Again we find the word in Matt. xvii. 2 and Mark ix. 2, where it is translated "transfigured". In Phil. iii. 21, future resurrection glory is in view, the word "change" being metaschematizo, and the words "fashioned like" being summorphon.

The primary meaning of "form" is uppermost of these references. We note the change from that which is external to that which is within in Gal. iv. 19, when the apostle says: "My little children, of whom I travail in birth again until Christ be formed in you", and again in Rom. xii. 2, where we have the two words suschematizo and metamorphoo translated "conformed" and "transformed" respectively. The difference between the two words may be better appreciated if we remember that morphe deals more with organic form, and schema with external appearance.

> "And be not conformed to this age, but be ye transformed by the renewing of your mind" (Rom. xii. 2).

Here it is most evident that the transformation is internal and not merely outward and visible. Again, in II Cor. iii. 18, the words "changed into the same image" must not be construed to refer only to a future resurrection likeness, but to a present spiritual anticipation. Lastly, the words occurring in Phil. iii. 10: "being made conformable unto His death", refer to present spiritual transfiguration that anticipates "conformity to the body of His glory" in that day (Phil. iii. 21).

With this thought we return to Rom. viii. 29. Conformity to the image of His Son is to be both a present experience and a future hope: the one, associated with the "renewing of our mind", now (Rom. xii. 2), the other associated with the "redemption of our body", then (Rom. viii. 23). In Rom. viii. sonship is, here and now, essentially associated with resurrection, the "spirit" of sonship being expressed in Christlikeness, while literal sonship itself (adoption, viii. 23), will be expressed in complete likeness to the glorified Lord, in body as well as in spirit. God's goal for His children should also be consciously their goal. To be like Christ, the Son, is to satisfy all that Scripture demands in holiness, righteousness, wisdom, and acceptance. All growth in grace and all advance in knowledge must be submitted to this one standard—conformity to the image of His Son. We have borne the image of the earthy: we look forward to bearing the image of the heavenly in resurrection glory (I Cor. xv. 49), the teaching in this pass being associated with the two Adams. While in Rom. viii. 29 the subject of the two Adams is in the foreground (see Rom. v. 12 - viii. 39 as a whole), a closer, family, figure is used of the Lord, namely: "that He might be the firstborn among many brethren." The following passage in Heb. ii. vividly comments on this truth:--

> "It became him, for Whom are all things, and by Whom are all things, in bringing many sons unto glory, to make the Captain of their salvation perfect through sufferings. For both He that sanctifieth, and they who are sanctified are all of one: for which cause He is not ashamed to call them brethren . . . . . Forasmuch then as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, He also Himself likewise took part of the same" (Heb. ii. 10-14).

The reader will remember that the structure of Rom. viii. as a whole (given on page 74 of Volume XXV) throws into prominence the words "Son" and "Sonship". Whether it be deliverance, life, peace, growth or victory, the spirit of sonship must never be forgotten. To attempt entry into the position of Rom. viii. in any other spirit is to court disaster. The Lord foreknew us, and He predestinated us to the glorious goal of conformity to "the image of His Son". May He see of the travail of His soul, and be satisfied now, even as He shall be when we shall stand in all the glory of His resurrection before God our Father!

#63. The Goal: Conformity to the Image of His Son. (2) Four links in the chain of Purpose (viii. 29, 30).

pp. 76 - 79

Having attempted an explanation of the two great words "foreknowledge" and "predestination", and having seen that their goal is "conformity to the image of His Son", we must now move forward to the expansion of this theme which is dealt with in Rom. viii. 30.

> "Moreover, whom He did predestinate, them He also called; and whom He called, them He also justified; and whom He justified, them He also glorified" (Rom. viii. 30).

It will be observed that the calling, the justification, and the glorification of the believer are all spoken of in the Aorist tense, which is usually translated by the past. While due regard must be paid to Greek grammar, we must never forget that behind the Greek of the N.T. is the Hebrew of the O.T., and that through the LXX version the Hebrew has influenced the usage of the Greek in a thousand ways. It may be of service to give a few examples of the way in which the past tense of the verb is used in the Hebrew O.T. to denote the certainty that something will take place in the future:

> "Unto thy seed have I given this land" (Gen. xv. 18).
> "Thou hast become a father of a multitude of nations" (Gen. xvii. 4).

> "Lo, I have sent unto thee, Naaman, my servant, and thou hast recovered him of his leprosy" (II Kings v. 6).

In the last example given the king was mistaken, but his meaning is clear.

The four words used in Rom. viii. 30 may be likened to links in a chain, the first and the last belonging to the remote past and the eternal future, while the second and third, "calling" and "justification", are apparent in time.

PREDESTINATION (Before age times).	CALLING AND JUSTIFICATION (During the age times).	FUTURE GLORY (After age times).

Those whom God predestinated to be conformed to the image of His Son, He predestinated to be glorified; the two expressions represent the same thing seen from two different points of view. It is not given to man to look into the Book of Life to see the names written there, neither is it granted to him to see into the future so as to forecast the names and number of the redeemed. He can, nevertheless, be assured both of the past predestination and of the future glory by reason of the two links that are forged in time—"calling" and "justification". We must, of course, remember that there is a calling that is not co-extensive with election—"Many are called, but few chosen"—but we are not concerned with this here, for the immediate context has already spoken of those who are "the called according to His purpose".

While the call of the believer takes place in time, we must, nevertheless, keep well in mind the words of Rom. iv. 17, that God "quickeneth the dead, and calleth those things which be not as though they were". And again, while our calling is not to be divorced from faith and obedience, we must not forget the words of Rom. ix. 11 concerning the choice of Jacob instead of Esau:

> "For the children being not yet born, neither having done any good or evil, that the purpose of God according to election might stand, not of works, but of Him that calleth."

Another passage that forcibly reminds us of the nature of this calling is found in II Tim. i.:

> "Who hath saved us, and called us with an holy calling, not according to our works, but according to His own purpose and grace, which was given us in Christ Jesus, before age times" (II Tim. i. 9).

In the Epistle to the Romans we find the believers in Rome given the gracious title of "the called of Jesus Christ" (Rom. i. 6).

While the calling, therefore, of the believer has a connection with times past, or rather with a period before time began, there is also an important aspect of it that is associated with present time and with those gracious means that, equally with the decrees of eternity, are ordained by the God Who sees the end from the beginning, and worketh all things after the counsel of His own will. So, in II Thess. ii. we read of being called by the "gospel" (II Thess. ii. 14). And, in I Thess. i. 4-6:

> "Knowing, brethren beloved, your election of God. For our gospel came not unto you in word only, but also in power, and in the Holy Ghost, and in much assurance . . . . . ye became followers . . . . . having received the word in much affliction, with joy of the Holy Ghost" (I Thess. i. 4-6).

To the ordinary Jew or Greek, the preaching of Jesus Christ and Him crucified is a stumbling-block and foolishness, but "unto them which are called, both Jews and Greeks, Christ the power of God, and the wisdom of God" (I Cor. i. 23, 24).

A few verses further on, we find "calling" and "choice" placed together in the same passage: "For ye see your calling . . . . . God hath chosen the foolish" (I Cor. i. 26, 27).

Returning to Rom. viii. we read: "Whom He called, them He also justified" (Rom. viii. 30). It is certain, therefore, that those whom the Lord thus calls will respond, for their justification is also assured.

Justification is "by faith" (Rom. i. 17; iii. 28), and "by grace' (Titus iii. 7). Those justified were before "ungodly" (Rom. v. 6), and had "come short of the glory of God" (Rom. iii. 23, 24).

This gift of righteousness to those who did not previously possess it, is the great underlying plan of the message of Romans, and its exposition has occupied us in some form or other throughout this series. No one can enter into glory who is not righteous. He must either be righteous in himself and by his own works, or failing that, he must have a righteousness provided freely by the grace of God through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus. Predestination to glory does not ignore the sinfulness of man or the holiness of God. It includes all that is necessary to ensure the presentation, as holy and without blemish, of all those who are chosen in Christ, in whatever sphere of glory may be theirs.

The Epistle to the Romans frankly recognizes that "all have sinned and come short of the glory of God", and unless this shortcoming can be righteously cancelled, it is clear that predestination to glory would be as impossible to God as it is impossible for Him to lie. Consequently, the chapter that states emphatically that all have failed to glory, states just as surely that both the sinner and God Himself are justified in the process of salvation. The deliverance of the sinner is "through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus". Christ has been "publicly set forth as a propitiation", so that a righteous ground has been provided, which can never be challenged by angel or man—a righteous ground upon which the love of God can embrace the sinner, the holiness of God meet his sin and the righteousness of God be declared in the very act. In other words, salvation has been so arranged that "He might be just, and the justifier of him which believeth in Jesus" (Rom. iii. 26).

It is a joy, therefore, to note that the next references to the glory of God speak either of Abraham, the believer's pattern of justification by faith (Rom. iv. 20), or of the believer himself: "Therefore being justified by faith . . . . . rejoice in hope of the glory of God" (Rom. v. 1, 2).

The word "predestination" in I Cor. ii. 7 is veiled in the A.V. translation, which renders it "ordained". The passage speaks of predestination in relation to the "glory" of the believer: "Which God ordained before the world unto our glory."

We must bring our study to a close. The apostle has now reached the magnificent conclusion towards which the whole teaching of Rom. v. 12 - viii. 39 has been directed—a triumphant challenge to heaven and earth to lay anything to the charge of God's elect, or to separate the redeemed from the love of God. This must be our next study. May all the wonderful steps leading up to it, that we have already seen, draw forth our praise and thanksgiving as we once again realize the central truth of God's revelation, expressed in those mighty words: "In Christ", "through Christ", and "with Christ". Truly, as the apostle declares in the opening verses of his letter, the gospel of God is concerning "HIS SON" (Rom. i. 1-4).

#64. No condemnation; no separation. More than conquerors, now and ever (viii. 31-39).

pp. 114 - 119

The whole of this glorious chapter of Romans may be likened to a flight of seven steps leading ever upwards, from the doctrinal statement that "there is no condemnation" to the answering challenge "Who is he that condemneth?" It is now a considerable time since we considered the structure of this chapter as a whole, and we will therefore set it out again in this closing article, so that none of our readers may miss the essential relationship between the close of the chapter and its opening.

Romans viii. 1-39.

A | 1-4. No condemnation. God sent His own SON (huios).
B | 5-15. Led by Spirit of God. SONS now (huios).
C | 15-17. Spirit Itself bears witness. SONSHIP (huiothesia).
D | 17-21. Suffering and Glory. Manifestation of SONS (huios).
C | 22-28. Spirit Itself intercedes. SONSHIP (huiothesia).
B | 29, 30. Conformed to the image of His SON then (huios).
A | 31-39. Who condemns? He spared not His own SON (huios).

It will be observed, we trust, with joy, that God's answer throughout the varied experiences of this chapter is to be found in "His Son" and "sonship" in Him.

The opening member (viii. 1-4) deals with the subject of "No condemnation" stated doctrinally, in its Godward aspect. The law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus sets us free from the law of sin and death; and the utter failure of the flesh in respect to obedience and righteousness is met by the gift of God's Son, Who "by a sacrifice for sin, condemned sin in the flesh" (Margin, viii. 3). The closing member likewise deals with the subject of "No condemnation", but approaches it from the experimental standpoint, viewing it not so much from the angle of the law as in relation to suffering and trial. And just as "His Son" proved an all-sufficient answer to the failure of the flesh, so again He provides an all-sufficient answer to the conscious weakness of the flesh. In the opening section we are "free from the law of sin and death"; in the closing section we are "more than conquerors" in the midst of tribulation.

The theme of this last section—Rom. viii. 31-39—is developed by a series of questions and answers, which can be seen best in the form of a structure:

Romans viii. 31-39.

A1 | 31. QUESTION.—What shall we then say to these things?
B1 | 31. ANSWER.—If God be for us, who can be against us?
C1 | 32. Argument: "How?" He spared not His own Son.
A2 | 33. QUESTION.—Who shall lay anything to the charge of God's elect?
B2 | 33. ANSWER.—It is God that justifieth.
A3 | 34. QUESTION.—Who is he that condemneth?
B3 | 34. ANSWER.—It is Christ that died.
C2 | 34. Argument: "Yea, rather." Risen. Right Hand. Intercedes.
A4 | 35. QUESTION.—Who shall separate us from the love of Christ?
B4 | 37. ANSWER.—We are more than conquerors in all these things.
C3 | 35-39. Argument: "I am persuaded."
a | Seven phases of earthly trials.
b | O.T. anticipation.
a | Nine phases of unseen trials.
b | "Any other creature."

Let us rejoice in the triumph of the believer in this passage as he goes from strength to strength. He begins with the great fundamental fact that "God is for us", and asks "Who can be against us?" The question is unanswerable. It goes echoing down the vaults of time to lose itself in infinity, without finding any one able to take up the challenge.

And then—"God has justified us." Here the believer presses forward into the light of holiness. Though a sinner, he can dare all in the consciousness of his acceptance in the Beloved. Who can lay anything to his charge? "We are more than conquerors through Him that loved us." His death, His resurrection, His present place at the right hand of God (the place of the Accuser—see Zech. iii. 1), His intercession, are all "for us". With such a Saviour, what can tribulation, or distress, or persecution, accomplish? They cannot separate us from the love of Christ. In the teeth of all opposition, and in the very midst of the trials themselves, we are more than conquerors.

And what of foes that are unseen and unknown? The Apostle scales the heights and plumbs the depths, not only of present human experience, as in verse 35, but of all possible experience, present and future, visible and invisible, known and unknown, belonging to this creation, or to any other creation, and with magnificent confidence utters the triumphant "I am persuaded" with which the chapter closes.

It must now be our delightful task to descend from this mountain top, in order that we may the more clearly understand the language of the Apostle, and so more truly enter into these riches of grace. Let us first look at the opening challenge:

> "If God be FOR us, who can be AGAINST us?"

The word "for" here is huper, and "against" kata. The two prepositions are used in a similar way in II Cor. xiii 8: "For we can do nothing against the truth, but for the truth."

So also in Luke ix. 50: "He that is not against us is for us."

If anyone should ask "In what way has it been demonstrated that God is for us?" the Apostle refers back, in the words "these things", to the whole chapter, and particularly to verses 29 and 30. In His foreknowledge, He is most certainly "for us". To clinch the matter, however, Paul adds one all-powerful argument:

> "He that spared not His own Son, but delivered Him up for us all, how shall He not with Him also freely give us all things?" (Rom. viii. 32).

The word translated "to spare" (pheidomai) is used in the LXX in connection with Abraham: "Thou hast not withheld thy son, thine only son" (Gen. xxii. 16). The Hebrew word chasak here translated "withhold" is rendered "spare" in eight passages in the A.V. One of these references is solemnly suggestive of what it meant for God not to "spare" His own Son:

> "He made a way to His anger: He spared not their soul from death, but gave their life over to the pestilence" (Psa. lxxviii. 50).

When we remember that these words were spoken of the Egyptians at the time of Exodus, the sufferings of Christ on our behalf stand out in even greater fullness. If Christ was spared nothing, if He bore all our sins, with all their consequences, can there be any argument better able to give the believer assurance before God?

"His own Son."—With these words the initial argument of viii. 1-4 is resumed. In the first section, the utter inability of the flesh is answered completely and for ever by "God sending His own Son in the likeness of sinful flesh", no condemnation to us being the inevitable result. So in the closing section, the fact that "God spared not His own Son", is the Apostle's answer to all doubts, fears and accusations. "With Him", therefore, we may confidently believe that God will freely and graciously (charizomai, cf. charisma, the "free gift" in Rom. v. 16) give us all things.

We have already drawn attention in an earlier article to the difference between "all things" (panta) which the Lord makes to work together for our good, and "the all things" (ta panta) which He freely gives us with the gift of His beloved Son. The Apostle now proceeds to unfold some of "the all things" that are ours, and concentrates upon two chief points:

(1) NO CONDEMNATION—in relation to the possible laying of a charge against us.
(2) NO SEPARATION—in relation to overwhelming trials.

The first problem is solved by a reference to Christ's finished work, and the second by a reference to the everlasting association of the believer with Christ. Let us consider this more in detail.

The Apostle's answer to the question: "Who shall lay anything to the charge of God's elect?" is simple, direct and conclusive: "It is God that justifieth." The word engkaleo, "lay to the charge", occurs seven times in the N.T., six references occurring in the Acts in connection with Paul, and the seventh in the passage under consideration in Romans. The references in the Acts are as follows: xix. 38, 40; xxiii. 28, 29; xxvi. 2, 7. The word has reference to a court of law and is rendered "accuse", "call in question", and "implead".

The Apostle next approaches the subject of the believer's security from another angle: "Who is he that condemns?" (Rom. viii. 34). Again, his answer is complete and conclusive. Our attention is turned from "God that justifies" to the ground of that justification which He Himself has laid. "Christ that died"—it is this that puts away our sins; we are justified by His blood, and reconciled by His death (Rom. v. 9, 10). "Yea, rather", the Apostle continues (or "Still more", an echo of the "Much more" of Rom. v. 9, 15 and 17) "That is risen again, Who is even at the right hand of God, Who also maketh intercession for us." Here it will be observed that the Apostle brings forward the "finished work" of Christ. Not His death only, but also His resurrection; not His resurrection only, but also His ascension to the right hand of God; not His ascension only, but also His present intercession. To understand the importance of this last fact, we must remember the words of Rom. v. 10: "Saved by His life."

And Heb. vii. 25 reads:

> "Wherefore He is able also to save them to the uttermost that come unto God by Him, seeing He ever liveth to make intercession for them."

What "strong consolation" is ministered by these gracious words.

The Apostle now leaves the court of law, having settled once and for all the perfect standing of the believer before the Lord, and turns to the present circumstances of life. With these circumstances in view he asks: "Who shall separate us from the love of Christ?" (Rom. viii. 35). It is evident from Scripture and also from the experience of the Apostles themselves, and the universal experience of all the children of God in all dispensations, that perfect acceptance with God does not bring with it immunity from suffering in this life. Indeed, Rom. v. 1-5 has already assured us that the justified may boast in tribulations because of their perfecting work. In Rom. viii. 35 the Apostle enumerates seven items: "Tribulation, or distress, or persecution, or famine, or nakedness, or peril, or sword." And to enforce his argument, he appeals to the recorded experience of the O.T. saints:

> "As it is written, For Thy sakes we are killed all the day long: we are accounted as sheep for the slaughter" (Psa. xliv. 22).

Could any quotation from the O.T. appear less likely to afford comfort and strength? Yet the Apostle does not hesitate to use it. It is not an act of faith to shut one's eyes to trouble and suffering. The Apostle has written lists of perils and sufferings, but he was never in danger of being separated from the love of Christ. That is the issue, not exemption from trial.

> "Nay, IN ALL THESE THINGS (not exempt from them) we are super-conquerors (hupernikomen) through Him that loved us" (Rom. viii. 37).

In justification of the thought that we are not only "conquerors" but "super-conquerors", the Apostle takes a further step—into the unknown and unseen. He first refers to the two extremes of human consciousness, "death and life", and then turns his attention to the invisible powers of the spirit world, "angels, principalities and powers". He then refers to all time, "present" and "to come", and "height" and "depth"; and in all creation, high or low, visible or invisible, he fails to find anything that can by any possible means separate us from the love of Christ. He now takes one more step and includes "any other creature", any other possible creation; for, however different and unexpected it might be, it would still come from the same Creator, Who has already manifested Himself to be so absolutely on our behalf.

"The love of Christ" of verse 35 is seen to be "the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord". What a "persuasion". What a call to stand fast, to manifest that we belong to such a Saviour, that we are loved by such a God, that we are saved with such a salvation. No condemnation; no separation. Safe here, and safe for ever hereafter.

> "Therefore let no man glory in men. For all things are yours; whether Paul, or Apollos, or Cephas, or the world, or life, or death, or things present, or things to come; all are yours; and ye are Christ's; and Christ is God's" (I Cor. iii. 21-23).

#65. The dispensational Section opens (ix.-xi.).
pp. 154 - 159

With the closing words of Rom. viii. the inner section of this epistle ends. This inner section deals, not with the covenant relationship of Israel with Abraham, but with man in general, whether Jew or Gentile, in relation to Adam. Just as it is necessary to distinguish between the unconditional covenant made with Abraham and the law that was given 430 years afterwards (Gal. iii. 17), so it is important to distinguish between the covenant made with Abraham and the relationship between all men and Adam. When this question has been dealt with and the glorious outcome stated (Rom. viii. 1, 38, 39), the apostle addresses himself to yet another aspect of truth. This aspect, in which the apostle was deeply interested, is concerned with the position of his own countrymen: their attitude to the gospel, their place in the scheme of things, the question of God's elective purposes, and many other related subjects. When facing the problems of Rom. vii. we felt like exclaiming that here surely is the most difficult passage in Romans. But when we come now to consider Rom. ix.-xi., we feel inclined to reverse our judgment.

As we proceed with our examination of these three chapters, we shall discover that the great theme of Romans, with its emphasis on "justification" and "the gospel", is not forgotten, but runs through their teaching just as surely as in Rom. i. - v. 11, and Rom. v. 12 - viii. 39.

There are twelve references to "righteousness" in Rom. ix.-xi., which occur at the end of Rom. ix. and in the first half of Rom. x. The occurrences in Rom. ix. are as follows:

Dikaiosune ("Righteousness") in Romans ix.

GENTILES.

A | 30. Followed not after righteousness.
B | 30. They have attained unto righteousness.
C | 30. Even the righteousness which is of faith.

ISRAEL.

A | 31. Followed after the law of righteousness.
B | 31. They have not attained to the law of righteousness.
C | 32. Sought it (i.e. righteousness) not by faith.

These contrasting passages are followed in Rom. x. by a further contrast, this time between the "righteousness of God" and "their own righteousness", and the "righteousness of the law" and the "righteousness of faith"—and centrally placed, the statement that Christ is the "end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth" (Rom. x. 3, 4, 5, 6, 10).

The "gospel" (euaggelion) is mentioned twice (Rom. x.16; xi. 28), and "preaching" twice (euaggelizo) (Rom. x. 15). "Salvation" (soteria) comes three times (Rom. x. 1, 10; xi. 11) and the verb "to save" (sozo) five times (Rom. ix. 27; x. 9, 13; xi. 14, 26). While the presence of these evangelical terms is sufficient to show that the main theme of the epistle is still in sight, an examination of the passage makes it evident that the point of view has changed. We are now looking at things from the dispensational standpoint. The writer is concerned with the nation itself, and not merely with the individuals in the nation. The effect of the one nation upon the many nations is noted, the salvation of "all Israel" is thankfully recorded, and the reconciling of the world is seen to be contingent upon the casting away of Israel.* (* - This "reconciliation" must be carefully distinguished from the "reconciliation" of Rom. v. 1-11).

This theme, which, as Rom. ix. 1-3 and x. 1 show, was very near to the apostle's heart, has already been touched upon in the opening chapters, but there it is glanced at momentarily to be put aside until in these chapters it can be given the consideration it deserves. We refer to the opening verses of chapter iii. where the apostle realizes that the leveling doctrine of justification by faith appears to do away with the dispensational advantages of the Jew, and may even lead some to think that Israel's unbelief makes the faithfulness of God of none effect. In chapter iii. the apostle is content to express his repudiation of such a charge, basing his argument mainly on the fact that God would cease to be the Judge of the world if His righteousness could possibly be impugned. As soon, however, as he has carried his doctrine to its glorious goal, he returns to this tremendous theme. He now establishes fully the "advantage" and "profit" of being one of the circumcision (Rom. ix. 4-5), and emphasizes the fact that the true Israel of promise were called "in Isaac" and in accord with "the purpose of God according to election" (ix. 6-13). The question of Rom. iii. 5: "Is God unrighteous Who taketh vengeance?" is repeated in Rom. ix. in connection with God's sovereign choice of Israel and rejection of Esau: "Is there unrighteousness with God?" (Rom. ix. 14). The sovereignty of God is further discussed and emphasized by bringing forward two very different examples: the Lord's words to Moses: "I will have mercy on whom I will have mercy", and the raising up of Pharaoh (ix. 14-18). In Rom. ix. 27 a remnant only is "saved", but in Rom. xi. 26 it is "all Israel". The section opens with sorrow (Rom. ix. 1-3) but it closes with song (Rom. xi. 33-36).

Before we can do much more, it will be necessary to obtain a view of the scope of Rom. ix.-xi. as a whole. We have already seen that the section opens with "sorrow" and closes with "song", and that while only a remnant is "saved" at the beginning, it is "all Israel" at the close. These features give us the first great divisions of the section, which we must note. We observe, moreover, that immediately following the list of Israel's advantages (Rom. ix. 4, 5) the apostle breaks into a doxology. In this doxology, where it is a question of the Lord being "over" all, panton is used, but in the concluding doxology of Rom. xi., where it is a question of origin and goal, ta panta is used. In the central section we find the expression "Lord of all". Here the context indicates that a wide range is intended, for "there is no difference", says the apostle, "He is rich unto all that call upon Him" (Rom. x. 12). The "all", clearly, is co-extensive with "those that call". This great section of Romans, therefore, is bounded at either end by the tremendous thought that "God is over all", and at the centre the same note is struck. We will not attempt, at the moment, a full structural analysis of these chapters. Let us be content at the beginning with the barest outline. We can full in the detail as we learn more.

Romans ix.-xi.
A tentative outline.

A | ix. 1-5. Sorrow.
Doxology. "Over all (panton), God blessed unto the ages" (ix. 5).
B | ix. 6-29. The Remnant saved. Mercy on some.
Corrective as to "all Israel" (ix. 6).
C | ix. 30 - xi. 10. The Stumbling stone. | The Lord of all that believe.
Christ the end of the law. | No difference.
B | ix. 11-32. All Israel saved. Mercy on them all.
Corrective as to the Remnant (xi. 1-5).
A | xi. 33-35. Sorrow.
Doxology: "Of Him, through Him, and to Him are all things (ta panta).
To Him be glory unto the ages" (xi. 36).

We must now turn our attention to the opening words of chapter ix.:

> "I say the truth in Christ, I lie not, my conscience also bearing me witness in the Holy Ghost, that I have great heaviness and continual sorrow in my heart. For I could wish that myself were accursed from Christ for my brethren, my kinsmen according to the flesh" (Rom. ix. 1-3).

The apostle realized only too keenly that in fulfilling his mission as an apostle to the Gentiles, he laid himself open to the false charge of indifference to the fate of his own people, Israel. When, therefore, he begins this section dealing with their failure and removal, he feels impelled to use the strongest language to demonstrate his deep concern for his brethren according to the flesh. Hence the oath-like form of his opening words:

> "I say the truth in Christ, I lie not, my conscience also bearing me witness in the Holy Ghost."

The Companion Bible draws attention to the fact that the words "I could wish" in the profound sentence "I could wish myself accursed from Christ" are a translation of the Imperfect, and should therefore read: "I used to wish." The Companion Bible further remarks that the statement is in the form of the figure Anamnesis or "Recollection", the apostle recalling his attitude in the past. This, of course, is very different from the teaching on the surface of the A.V. rendering, namely, that Paul actually wished at the time that he write that he could be accursed from Christ. Further, the apostle had just penned the conviction that nothing in heaven or hell could separate him from the love of God (Rom. viii. 39). It is only fair, however, to the reader to say that a number of great expositors hold that the apostle, in the depth of his feeling, uttered words that would be a true index of his heart, even though his head would have to deny them. This is termed the "potential rendering". The apostle does not say that he "desired" this, but that he "could desire" it if it were permissible, such was his love for his people.

> "The desire rose up in the apostle's heart, and to a certain extent he allowed and sanctioned it. Yet only to a certain extent, for a higher desire struck in and controlled it—the desire to be in perfect accord with God's desire and will. Hence his desire to be anathema for his countrymen never was completed and complete. It hung suspended. It remained imperfect. It was conditional, and the condition that would have brought it to maturity was never forthcoming. Thus the embryo-desire was in reality but a potency, so that the translation I could desire is indicated" (Dr. John Lightfoot on Rom. ix.).

The question is difficult to decide with certainty. According to one interpretation the apostle is manifesting a sympathetic understanding with the attitude of his countrymen by saying in effect, "I know, for I did the same myself". According to the alternative view, he is emulating Moses, who cried:

> "Yet now, if Thou forgive their sin ----- ; and if not, blot me, I pray Thee, out of Thy book which Thou hast written" (Exod. xxxii. 32).

Perhaps it is impossible for us in the present life to arrive at a conclusion. The question does not demand a decision. No point of doctrine or practice is affected by either view, and, therefore, while we still believe the apostle said that he "used to wish" in the past, thereby assuring Israel that there would be no self-righteous condemnation so far as he was concerned, we freely grant the liberty of others to believe that such was the apostle's love for Israel, that, if the sacrifice would have proved effective, he was willing even for that, if only his nation might be saved. In either case, it is clear that any charge against Paul of indifference to the fate of his countrymen now that he is the apostle to the Gentiles is effectively answered.

#66. Israel's Privileges (ix. 4, 5).
pp. 191 - 198

The apostle's sorrow for his kinsmen is expressed, first of all, not in terms of their fall, but in relation to the heights of privilege from which that fall had taken place, and it is the enumeration of Israel's dispensational privileges that for the present must occupy our attention.

> "I have great heaviness and continual sorrow in my heart (for I myself used to wish that I were anathema from Christ) for my brethren, my kinsmen according to the flesh: who are Israelites; to whom pertaineth the adoption, and the glory, and the covenants, and the giving of the law, and the service of God, and the promises; whose are the fathers, and of whom as concerning the flesh Christ came, Who is over all, God blessed unto the age. Amen" (Rom. ix. 2-5).

It will be helpful, before we examine these items in detail, to observe their disposition. By noting the correspondence between them we shall obtain a clearer view of their true meaning than by the individual study of each in turn.

Israel's Dispensational Privileges.
Romans ix. 3-5.

A | According to the flesh. KINSMEN.
B | Who are Israelites.
C | To whom pertaineth the adoption.
D | And the glory.
E | And the covenants.
E | And the giving of the law.
D | And the service.
C | And the promises.
B | Whose are the fathers.
A | According to the flesh. CHRIST.

We note at once that this list of privileges is bounded at each end by the words "According to the flesh". The term "flesh" has a variety of meanings and must always be interpreted in the light of the context. Perhaps it would not be far wrong to say that in this one epistle, we can find almost every variety of its usage. Let us notice a few examples.

(1) The "flesh" considered as equivalent to human nature without any reference necessarily to sin:

> "Which was made of the seed of David according to the flesh" (Rom. i. 3).

(2) The "flesh" considered as the equivalent of the human body in contrast with the heart and "the spirit":

> "Circumcision which is outward in the flesh" (Rom. ii. 28).

(3) The "flesh" considered as the seat of sin, the characteristic of the natural man who is not "spiritual" but "carnal":

> "Ye are not in the flesh, but in the spirit" (Rom. viii. 9).

(4) The "flesh" considered as the medium of human expression, in contrast with the "promise of God" which works in another plane:

> "They which are the children of the flesh, these are not the children of God: but the children of the promise are counted for the seed" (Rom. ix. 8).

It is evident that the apostle, in Rom. ix. 3 and 5, uses the words "according to the flesh" in the first of the four senses enumerated above. The Israelites were his brethren, his kinsmen "according to the flesh". It had been the boast of the apostle that he was a Hebrew of the Hebrews. If the other apostles could say that they were Israelites, so also could he (II Cor. xi. 22). In Rom. xi. 1, even though the apostle is a believer in the Lord Jesus Christ, he sees in his own salvation a pledge that not one Israelite who had been foreknown of God could be cast away: "For I also am an Israelite, of the seed of Abraham, of the stock of Benjamin."

Returning to our passage in Rom. ix., it should be noted that the pronoun in the phrase "Who are Israelites" is of a rather special character:

> "It is a peculiar compound pronoun (hoitines) that has no parallel in English. The force of the apostle's expression might be represented thus: Who belong to the category of Israelites, who, whatever else they may or may not be, are Israelites" (Morison).

At the conclusion of this list of privileges, the apostle places the coming of Christ Himself. One of the chief glories of the people of Israel was that, of all nations on earth, God had chosen this nation to be the one through whom in the fullness of time Christ should be born. And yet—and the tragedy of this struck Paul like a blow—when at last He had indeed come as the prophets had long predicted, born of the line of David, and in the City of David, Israel had not known the day of their visitation.

If the people of Israel were Paul's "kinsmen" according to the flesh, Christ was their glorious "Kinsman-Redeemer".

> "Forasmuch then as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, He also Himself likewise took part of the same; that through death He might destroy . . . and deliver . . ." (Heb. ii. 14, 15).

Intimately connected with this glorious privilege of being so closely associated with the Messiah "according to the flesh", are all the other advantages enumerated in Rom. ix. 3-5. We must now consider these advantages in more detail.

In correspondence with the title "Israelites" we find "the fathers". In this context the word must be limited to the three patriarchs, Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, as in Acts iii.:

> "The God of Abraham, and of Isaac, and of Jacob, the God of our fathers" (13).
> "Ye are the children of the . . . . . covenant which God made with our fathers, saying unto Abraham" (25).

The word is sometimes used in a wider sense, as for example in Acts vii.:

> "Our fathers found no sustenance" (11).
> "He sent out our fathers first" (12).
> "Our fathers had the tabernacle" (44).

In these references, however, the additional word hemon ("our") is used, whereas in Rom. ix. 5 the word is used in the absolute sense, and must therefore be limited.

In the next corresponding pair we have "the adoption" and "the promises". "The adoption" is rightly related to "the promises" and not to "the fathers", for it is closely linked up with the thought of inheritance.

> "And thou shalt say unto Pharaoh, Thus saith the Lord, Israel is My son, even My firstborn" (Exod. iv. 22).

It is unnecessary to labour the point that there were many nations in existence before Israel. There were the Egyptians who oppressed them, and the ancestors of Abraham himself, as well as the seventy nations mentioned by name in Gen. x. Israel was the firstborn by adoption, chosen by God for special favours and privileges "above all nations upon the earth" (Deut. xiv. 2). To such pertain "the promises".

These promises were largely those made by God to Abraham, Isaac and Jacob. Out of the nine occurrences, in addition to Rom. ix. 4, of "promise" and "to promise" in Romans, seven refer to the promises made to Abraham, one to the "fathers", and one to the "gospel" (Rom. i. 2). The reader will discover that there are few references to "promises" in the N.T. that do not refer to Abraham and his seed. In the O.T. the promises include "the land" and "the throne", and Rom. xv. 8 declares that the ministry of the Lord Jesus was at the first "to confirm the promises made unto the fathers". In the Prison Epistles there are no "promises". Instead we have "the promise", entirely unconnected with "the fathers", and going back to a time "before the overthrow of the world".

The next pair of privileges mentioned by the apostle are connected with "the glory" and "the service". In the second of these cases the A.V. translators have felt constrained to add the words "of God"; and, in the first case also, we might well read: "the glory of the Lord." The "glory of the Lord" was spoken of by the Rabbinical writers as "The Shekinah", the word being derived from shaken, "to dwell", and referring to the visible glory of the Lord that dwelt between the Cherubim above the Mercy Seat. While this was the peculiar privilege of Israel—no other nation had the visible presence of the Lord in their midst—they like the rest "came short of the glory of God", and their failure was all the more marked by reason of the greatness of their privileges.

"The service" that corresponds to "the glory" is referred to in Hebrews:

> "Then verily the first covenant had also ordinances of divine service" (Heb. ix. 1).
> "The priests went always into the first tabernacle, accomplishing the service of God" (Heb. ix. 6).

The central pair in the structure consists of "the covenants" and "the giving of the law". That Israel alone, of all the peoples of the earth, received "the law" is so abundantly attested by Scripture that there is no need to give actual quotations. That the "covenants" also, with one exception, are exclusively the prerogative of Israel is not so generally accepted. The exception, of course, is the covenant made with Noah and with all flesh, in the days of the flood, and is God's pledge that never again will He destroy the earth by water. With this exception, all the covenants of Scripture belong to Abraham and his seed. This includes the "new covenant", as a reference to Jer. xxxi. and Heb. viii. will show.

There is only one reference to a covenant in the Epistles of the Mystery, and that is in Eph. ii. 12: "Strangers from the covenants of promise." In the flesh, no Gentile could hope to stand on the same level as Israel. If he became a proselyte, he was admitted into the favoured circle, but never attained equality. In the days to come, when Israel enter into their adoption and promises, when "the glory" and "the service" are indeed theirs, the nations round about them will travel up three times a year to Jerusalem to keep the feasts and obtain knowledge of the Lord, recognizing in this favoured nation "the priests of the Lord" and the "ministers of our God" (Isa. lxi. 6; Zech xiv. 16-21).

Before passing on to consider the latter part of Rom. ix. 5, let us set out the dispensational disabilities of the Gentiles, and compare them with the dispensational advantages of Israel as set above.

Dispensational disabilities of the Gentiles (Eph. ii. 11, 12).

A | Gentiles. IN THE FLESH.
B | Without Christ.
C | Aliens from the commonwealth of Israel.
C | Strangers from the covenants of promise.
B | Having no hope.
A | Godless. IN THE WORLD.

What a desperate condition to be in. In the flesh and in the world, a foe within and a foe without; and then Christless, Godless, and hopeless, having neither citizenship nor covenant. How thankful we should be for the change that grace has made. And how necessary to make it clear that our present calling is entirely separate from Israel's commonwealth and Israel's covenants. Even though our abstaining from certain observances should involve us in misunderstanding, we can surely do no less than remain loyal to the true characteristics of our high calling, leaving the citizenship, the hope and the covenants of Israel in their own sphere. However, we are not primarily concerned at the moment with the doctrine and practice of the Mystery, but rather with the contrast between the Jew and the Gentile "in the flesh", as set out in Rom. ix. and Eph. ii.

There is one further item in Rom. ix. that we have not yet dealt with, that finds its negation in Eph. ii. Of the Gentile we read: "Ye were without Christ." Of Israel it is written: "Of whom as concerning the flesh Christ came, Who is over all, God blessed for ever."

Left undisturbed by the opinions of men, the reader would naturally understand these wonderful words as an ascription of the highest praise to the Lord Jesus Christ. The very statement "as concerning the flesh" seems to demand the sequel "Who is over all, God blessed for ever". There would be no point in the phrase "as concerning the flesh" if the subject of the sentence were merely a man.

We cannot leave the matter here, however, for there are many who would force into this plain ascription of Deity contrary views of their own.

With reference to this passage Wardlaw writes, in his book The Socinian Controversy:

> "This seems abundantly plain, so plain, and so decisive, that if there were not another text in the Bible directly affirming this great truth, I know not how I should satisfy myself in rejecting its explicit testimony. It has accordingly been put upon the rack, to make it speak by dint of torture a different language. It might, perhaps, be enough to say, respecting this passage, that, according to the order of the original words, the received translation is the most direct and natural rendering. This, so far as I know, no one has ventured to deny. All that has been affirmed is that it is capable of bearing a different sense. And this has accordingly been attempted in no fewer than five different ways:

'Of whom, by natural descent, the Christ came. God, Who is over all, be blessed for ever.'

'Whose are the fathers, and of whom the Christ came, Who is above them all (viz., the fathers). God is blessed for ever!"

'Of whom the Christ came, Who is over all things. God be blessed for ever.'

'Of whom the Christ came, Who is as God, over all, blessed for ever.'

'Of whom the Christ came (and) whose, or of whom, is the supreme God, blessed for ever'."

Sadly enough, the R.V. has brought these untenable views to the notice of all its readers. The note in the R.V. reads as follows:

"Some modern interpreters place a full stop after flesh and translate, He Who is God over all be (is) blessed for ever: or He Who is over all is God, blessed for ever. Others punctuate, flesh, who is over all, God be blessed for ever."

No wonder Dean Burgon wrote of this marginal note:

"Now this is a matter—let it be clearly observed—which (as Dr. Hort is aware) belongs to interpretation, and not to textual criticism. What business then has it in these pages at all? Is it then the function of Divines appointed to revise the Authorized Version, to give information to the 90 millions of English-speaking Christians scattered throughout the world as to the unfaithfulness of 'some modern interpreters'? We refer to Manuscripts, Versions, Fathers; and what do we find?

(1) It is demonstrable that the oldest Codices, besides the whole body of the Cursives, know nothing about the method of 'some modern interpreters'.

(2) There is absolutely not a shadow, not a tittle of evidence in any of the ancient Versions, to warrant what they do.

(3) How then about the old Fathers? We find that the expression 'Who is over all (things), God blessed for ever' is expressly acknowledged to refer to our SAVIOUR by the following 60 illustrious names."

The Dean then gives the sixty names, with chapter and verse, which the interested reader can find fully set out in his "Revision Revised" (pp. 212, 213).

Long ago it was noted by Bengel that in all classes of doxology Barak in Hebrew and Eulogetos in Greek precede the name of God. There are thirty places where the LXX, following the Hebrew order, adheres to this rule, and if Paul had intended a separate doxology, he would certainly have followed the same practice.

In the earlier part of this same Epistle to the Romans we find a passage which is in some respects parallel with Rom. ix. 5:

"Who worshipped and served the creature more than the Creator, Who is blessed for ever. Amen" (Rom. i. 25).

It is the consistent testimony of the N.T. that all things were created "by Him and for Him—i.e. Christ" (Col. i. 16), and the ascriptions of praise in Rom. ix. 5, and in Rom. xi. 36 are both offered to the same God. In Rom. ix. 5 He is over "all things" (panton) without reservation, evil as well as good. In Rom. xi. 36 out of Him, and through Him, and unto Him are "the all things" (ta panta), certain specific "all things", which do not include that which is evil. This important distinction we must discuss when we reach Rom. xi. 36 in the course of our exposition.

Our space is already filled, but the theme is so wonderful and so vital that we trust none of our readers will consider the time spent too long. We joyfully acknowledge that which Israel in their blindness failed to see, that the Messiah Who came from themselves, so far as the flesh was concerned, and Who, according to the Spirit, was declared to be the Son of God with power (Rom. i. 3, 4) was at the same time: "Over all, God blessed for ever." To this the apostle adds his solemn "Amen". May all who read and believe echo that "Amen", and rejoice to know that one day Israel shall look on Him Whom they pierced, the One Who, even in the days of Isaiah, was named "The mighty God", and shall at last say of Him:

"Lo, this is our God; we have waited for Him, and He will save us" (Isa. xxv. 9).

#67. The Purpose according to Election (ix. 6-13).
pp. 233 - 239

If the contemplation of the high glory of Israel's privileges has led the apostle for the moment away from himself and the failure of his kinsmen, his next word is an indication that he has returned once more to the theme of Israel's failure in order to meet the objections raised by their defection and fall. The word "but" does not appear in the A.V. of verse 6, but is there in the original. After referring to his intense grief, the apostle is careful to correct any false impression by saying: "But it is not such as that the word of God has failed." Commentators draw attention to this opening phrase as an instance of what is called a "Solecism", because it appears to be a mixture of two different modes of expression neither of which is fully stated. The word comes from soloikos, "to speaks like an inhabitant of Soloi in Cilicia", where Attic Greek had been corrupted by the Greek Colonists.

The word of God would have failed if it had declared that any specific number of Israelites would believe in the Lord Jesus at His first coming. No such statement, however, had been made; rather the reverse, for from prophecy it was quite plain that at the first Israel would reject their Messiah, and be in turn rejected—only a remnant, and that according to the election of grace, preserving the seed and the line unbroken. In order to enforce this fact concerning the remnant according to the election of grace, the apostle commences a somewhat complicated argument, establishing from the history of Israel the principle of God's sovereign choice in connection with the true seed.

First of all he puts forward this thesis:

> "Not all who are out of Israel, are Israel."

The second mention of Israel here does not refer to the man Jacob, but to the nation, the thought being that fleshly descent does not constitute the seed or the election, for both are by promise and by grace.

Abraham had eight sons—Ishmael, by Hagar; Zimran, Jokshan, Medan, Midian, Ishbak and Shuah, by Keturah; and Isaac, by Sarah. Ishmael was "cast out" for he could not be the heir together with Isaac (Gen. xxi. 10). Of the sons of Keturah it is written: "Abraham gave them gifts and sent them away from Isaac his son" (Gen. xxv. 6). But of Isaac we read: "And Abraham gave all that he had unto Isaac" (Gen. xxv. 5). If mere physical descent from Abraham had constituted a claim, then seven other nations descended from these seven other sons might have disputed Israel's rights. The deciding factor was God's sovereign election.

Again, coming closer to the problem, the apostle carries the argument a stage further. The other nations referred to above were descended from different mothers, but the apostle goes on to show that even sons born to Isaac by the same mother do not share equal privileges. Esau was the elder, Jacob was the younger, both children of the same mother, yet Esau was rejected and Jacob chosen:

> "For the children being not yet born, neither having done any good or evil, that the purpose of God according to election might stand, not of works, but of Him that calleth, it was said unto her, The elder shall serve the younger" (Rom. ix. 11, 12).

This is not the only place where a distinction is made between the true seed and the merely natural seed. For example, when the Lord looked upon Nathaniel he said: "Behold, an Israelite indeed" (John i. 47). And again, in John viii., we read:

> "They answered and said unto Him, Abraham is our father. Jesus said unto them, If ye were Abraham's children, ye would do the works of Abraham . . . . . Ye do the deeds of your father . . . . . Ye are of your father the devil" (John viii. 39-44).

In the Epistle to the Romans itself we have already had the distinction between the natural and the spiritual seed brought forward:

> "For he is not a Jew, which is one outwardly; neither is that circumcision which is outward in the flesh. But he is a Jew which is one inwardly: and circumcision is that of the heart, in the spirit, and not in the letter; whose praise is not of men, but of God" (Rom. ii. 28, 29).

These words are immediately followed by the question:

> "What advantage then hath the Jew? Or what profit is there of circumcision?" (Rom. iii. 1).

In Gal. iv. Ishmael is likened to the unbelieving Jews "born after the flesh", while the true believing Jews are likened to Isaac; and his mother, the freewoman, to Jerusalem that is above and free. These constitute the "Israel of God" (Gal. iv. 21-31, vi. 16).

As we study the argument put forward by the apostle in Rom. ix. an important principle emerges that extends beyond the limits of the people of Israel.

> "In Isaac shall thy seed be called" (Rom. ix. 7).
> "The children of the promise are counted for the seed" (Rom. ix. 8).

The following extract from Nedarim f.31.I is suggestive:

> "Is not Ishmael an alien, and yet of the seed of Abraham? It is written, In Isaac shall thy seed be called. But is not Esau an alien, and yet of the seed of Isaac? No. In Isaac, but not all Isaac."

This brief quotation is sufficient to show that the apostle's method of argument was familiar to the Jews and would be easily followed.

When dealing with Rom. iv. we showed that the words "counted for" or "imputed for" indicated that one thing, namely "faith", was reckoned for another, namely "righteousness", and that on account of the finished work of Christ. In that chapter the fact is stressed that Isaac was not begotten merely by the flesh, but that his birth was a foreshadowing of the resurrection of Christ. The fact that Isaac is again brought into prominence in Rom. ix., and that mere physical descent is set aside, only the children of the promise being "counted for the seed", provides conclusive proof that the fluffiest of the purposes of God does not necessitate that every individual Jew and every physical descendant of Abraham must be saved. Known unto God from the beginning are those who constitute the seed of promise.

The fact that the bulk of the nation was in a state of unbelief at the time that Paul wrote, did not in any way throw doubt upon the accuracy of prophecy and the promises. Rather the reverse, for there are a number of references in the O.T. to Israel's apostasy and the preservation of a remnant. Isaiah, in a day of departure, speaks of this remnant in i. 9; x. 21, 22, etc., and is quoted in Rom. ix. 27:

> "Though the number of the children of Israel be as the sand of the sea, a remnant shall be saved."

On the day of Pentecost, Peter omitted the close of Joel ii. 32, because the appeal was to the nation. Subsequent events, however, proved that what Joel had prophesied was fulfilled. The omitted words—"and in the remnant whom the Lord shall call"—were applicable then, and will again be true in the future day of Israel's restoration. When, therefore, we read in Rom. xi. 26: "And so all Israel shall be saved", we must read the words "all Israel" in the light of Rom. ix. 6-9. The "all Israel" that shall be saved is not co-extensive with the total number of Abraham's descendants, but indicates a definite company—"children of promise", a "reckoned seed".

The same principle holds good with respect to "all in Adam" and "all in Christ". These terms do not extend to every individual descendant of Adam, for some, like the Canaanites, ought never to have been born. At the creation of Adam, God had already in view a chosen seed, whose names are written in the Book of Life. Although this purpose has been attacked by Satan, and imperilled in many ways—by Cain and others, by the offspring of the sons of God and the daughters of men at the time of the flood, and by the "tares" of our Lord's own day (John viii. 39-44)—the children of promise are preserved, and will finally reach their true goal.

The history of the birth of Esau and Jacob, and the prophetic utterance that preceded their birth, call for a word of explanation. We can all see that Israel's superior position did not depend upon birth or personal goodness. By blood and birth Esau and Jacob stood on the same level; or indeed, if there was any advantage it was with Esau, the elder. And the question of goodness is also ruled out. Many readers, however, will feel that a problem that needs solution is founding Rom. ix. 3:

> "Jacob have I loved, but Esau have I heard."

The next verse contains our own unspoken thought:

> "What shall we say then? Is there unrighteousness with God?"

How could God be righteous if He hated an unborn infant that, according to His own word, had not done "either any good or evil"? The answer is that upon examination we shall find that no such statement is intended.

If we refer back to the passages from which the apostle quotes, we shall find that under the names Esau and Jacob two nations, and two peoples are in view.

> "Rebekah his wife conceived. And the children struggled together within her; and she said, If it be so, why am I thus? And she went to enquire of the Lord. And the Lord said unto her, Two nations are in thy womb, and two manner of people shall be separated from thy bowels; and the one people shall be stronger than the other people; and the elder shall serve the younger" (Gen. xxv. 21-23).
>
> "I have loved you, saith the Lord. Yet ye say, Wherein hast Thou loved us? Was not Esau Jacob's brother? saith the Lord; yet I loved Jacob, and I hated Esau, and laid his mountains and his heritage waste for dragons in the wilderness. Whereas Edom saith, We are impoverished, but we will return and build the desolate places; thus saith the Lord of Hosts, They shall build, but I will throw down; and they shall call them, The border of wickedness, and, The people against whom the Lord hath indignation for ever" (Mal. i. 2-4).

In connection with these passages it should be borne in mind that, both in the Hebrew of Genesis, and in the Greek of the LXX and Rom. ix., the words "elder" and "younger" are literally "greater" and "lesser". The adjective "greater" is used in Scripture where we should use "elder", as for example in Gen. xxvii. 1 where the literal translation would read: "Esau his great son" (Heb. gadol). This allows the statement of Gen. xxv. 23 to be true of the two children as such (the "elder" and the "younger") and also prophetically true of the two nations descended from them (the "greater" and the "lesser").

It should be noticed that the words "greater" and "lesser" are not used in connection with the two children, but occur in the concluding statement about the two "nations" and "peoples", one of which is "stronger" than the other. The Hebrew word rab, translated "elder" in Gen. xxv. 23, occurs some hundreds of times in the O.T. Scriptures, but is not translated "elder" in any other passage. While we now know that the "greater" coincided with the "elder" of the twins, the prophecy did not make this clear. The whole account of the blessing of Jacob would be difficult to understand if Isaac knew that Esau had been definitely set aside. Which of the two sons was to be the father of the "greater" people was beyond the power of Rebekah and Isaac to discover, and we are only able to know now because prophecy has become history.

It is a matter of history that the Edomites grew rapidly to greatness. While Israel were journeying through the wilderness, a band of pilgrims just liberated from Egypt's bondage, the Edomites were a settled kingdom.

> "And Moses sent messengers from Kadesh unto the king of Edom. Thus saith thy brother Israel, Thou knowest all the travail that hath befallen us . . . . . Let us pass, I pray thee, through thy country" (Num. xx. 14-17).

That Edom was the "greater" people at that time is evident, for we read: "Edom came out against him with much people, and with a strong hand" (Num. xx. 20). Subsequently Edom was conquered, and of David we read: "He put garrisons in Edom; throughout all Edom he put garrisons, and all they of Edom became David's servants' (II Sam. viii. 14). We learn from Josephus that under John Hyrcanus the national independence of Edom was finally destroyed, and they merged into the nation which had at first been "the lesser".

Just as the name Israel stands both for Jacob himself and also for the nation descended from him, so the name Esau is used in the Scriptures both for the twin brother of Jacob, and for his descendants, the Edomites.

Thus we read:

> "I have given Mount Seir unto Esau" (Deut. ii. 5).
> "I have made Esau bare" (Jer. xlix. 10).

Had the apostle, when writing Rom. ix., intended to discuss the doctrines of free-will, and eternal election and reprobation, he would have been obliged to have introduced many different arguments. His purpose in this chapter is much simpler. He is pointing out that the whole history of the people of Israel is the outworking of an elective purpose, and that if this elective purpose is satisfied for the moment by the salvation of a remnant, then there can be no truth in the suggestion that the Word of God has failed. When seen in their true context, the words "hate" and "love" in verse 13 create no insuperable difficulty, but if the apostle's object in Rom. ix. is misunderstood, then we must expect confusion, and the inevitable evils that flow from a false representation of the sovereignty of God. Just as the advocates of eternal punishment can only find a basis for their dreadful creed by ignoring the qualifying statements of Scripture, and applying what is peculiar and limited to what is universal, so in Rom. ix. we can only build up the Calvinistic doctrine of eternal reprobation, with the allied error which regards sin as parts of the Divine decree, if we fail to see that Paul is here dealing with the dispensational question of Israel's rejection and failure.

We conclude by giving the structure of the passage just considered.

The remnant, and the Word of God (Romans ix. 6-13).

A1 | 6-8. The Word of God.
B1 | 6-8. In Isaac, a seed reckoned. |
a | All out of Israel, these are not all Israel.
b | The seed of Abraham, these are not all children.
c | In Isaac the seed shall be called.
a | The children of the flesh, these are not the children of God.
b | The children of promise.
c | Counted for a seed.
A2 | 9. The Word of Promise.
B2 | 9. To Sarah, a child promised. |
a | At this time.
b | Will I return.
c | Sarah shall have a son.
A3 | 10-13. It was said unto her.
B3 | 10-13. To Rebekah, a nation chosen. |
a | Rebekah . . . . . Isaac. Common parentage.
b | Purpose according to election.
c | Greater, lesser; loved, hated.

#1. "Where Christ sitteth" (Col. iii. 1).

pp. 121 - 124

It is not only our duty but also our privilege to obey the exhortation of Col. iii. 1, 2 to set out minds on things above. In the course of our ministry, we often pass this exhortation on to others and have it passed on by others to us. While the Word preached, just as it is written, is full of power, yet there is in it such fullness that always there is room for exposition and application. This enables faith to be exercised with intelligence and the truth of the particular passage to be perceived with a measure of comprehension.

In this series it is therefore our endeavour to direct attention to what the Scriptures mean when they speak of "things above".

> "If ye then be risen with Christ, seek those things which are above, where Christ sitteth on the right hand of God" (Col. iii. 1).

Following the lead of the passage itself, our attention is first drawn to the fact that "things above" are expanded by the apostle himself as "where Christ sitteth on the right hand of God". To obtain some idea of "things above", therefore, we must learn from the Word what are the answers to the questions:

(1) Where is Christ now sitting?
(2) What is implied by the fact that He is seated?
(3) What is involved in this position on the right hand of God?

The Scriptures contain ample evidence that the Lord Jesus Christ is now "far above all heavens" (Eph. iv. 10). The original reads huperano panton ton ouranon, about the translation of which there is no controversy. Huperano occurs only three times in the N.T., as follows: Eph. i. 21; iv. 10; and Heb. ix. 5. Concerning the heavens themselves we can have no opinion that is of weight, but we have no difficulty in understanding the reference to the ark and the cherubims:

> "The ark . . . . . and over it (huperano) the cherubims of glory shadowing the mercy seat" (Heb. ix. 4, 5).

The instruction to Moses were:

> "Thou shalt put the mercyseat above upon the ark" (Exod. xxv. 21).

The cherubims were made "of the matter of the mercyseat" (Exod. xxv. 19 margin), and as the mercyseat is said to be above the ark, so the cherubims are said to be over the mercyseat. We find upon further examination that whereas the church of the One Body is blessed in heavenly places, en tois epouraniois, "in the over heavens", Christ, their exalted Head, is said to have ascended above all heavens, or, as we read in Heb. iv. 14,

He "passed through" the heavens, the translation "passed into" in the A.V. not being sufficiently expressive. Dierchomai is translated "pass through" ten times in the A.V. Six of the occurrences refer to the travels of the apostles, and one refers to the "passing through" the Red Sea of the children of Israel (I Cor. x. 1). Not only do we read that the Lord "passed through" the heavens, and is now "above all heavens", but we read that He has become "higher than the heavens" (Heb. vii. 26). Here the word so translated is hupseloteros, which is the comparative of hupselos, "high".*

This glorious exaltation of the Lord Jesus Christ is associated in Hebrews with His high priesthood, but in Ephesians with His headship. The sphere of blessing that pertains to the Epistle to the Hebrews is the "heavenly calling" of the promise made to Abraham (Heb. iii. 1), and the word here translated "heavenly" is epouranios. This calling finds its goal in the "heavenly" country, and the "heavenly" Jerusalem (Heb. ix. 16; xii. 22). We are told in Heb. ix. that the tabernacle consisted of two parts, the first called the Sanctuary, and, beyond the second veil, that part which was called "The Holiest of all". Into this second part the High Priest went, alone, once every year (Heb. ix. 7), and this finds its antitype in the entry of Christ into heaven itself in the presence of God (Heb. ix. 24).

There is a marked difference between the Hebrew believer's sphere of blessing and that highest place of all which is occupied by their exalted High Priest. They are divided from one another as the Holiest of all was from the Holy Place. The worshippers may draw near with boldness, but sit down there in that Presence, never; the very thought would savour of blasphemy in an Hebrew's ears. But when we come into the dispensation of the mystery, there is no question of boldness of access, as found in Heb. x. 19, for the believer who is a member of His body is definitely declared to be "seated together" in the heavenly places, where Christ sits at the right hand of God, far above all principality and power (Eph. i. 19-22; ii. 6), a statement that is gloriously unique.

Closely associated with the two references to huperano which are found in Ephesians is the word "fullness", pleroma, or "fill", pleroo, words specially characterizing the mystery, and which do not therefore occur in Hebrews.

> "He raised Him from the dead, and set Him at His own right hand in the heavenly places far above all principality . . . . . and gave Him to be Head over all things (huperano) to the church which is His body, the fullness (pleroma) of Him that filleth (pleroo) all in all" (Eph. i. 20-23).
> "He that descended is the same also that ascended up far above (huperano) all heavens that He might fill (pleroo) all things" (Eph. iv. 10).

We learn not only by positive statement, but by comparison. For example: if David had said "Wash me and I shall be white", that would have been a true statement. But how much more forceful are his actual words, "Wash me, and I shall be whiter than snow". Thus, from Ephesians we learn the high calling of the church, but such positive teaching is enhanced by comparing it with that which relates to the heavenly calling of Hebrews. In both epistles Christ is the exalted and seated One. To the Hebrews, as High Priest, He is within heaven's holiest of all, a sphere which is above them. But to the Ephesians, as Head over all things to the church, He is not seated there alone, for the church is seated there, too. The nature of this revelation of love and grace is such that it is no matter for surprise to find it questioned and combated. But, while nothing but revelation could justify such a statement, the poverty of our appreciation of superabounding grace is no warrant for lowering heaven's greatest of all blessings.

When Abraham "looked for a city which hath foundations", or when he and his children "desired a heavenly country" (Heb. xi. 10, 16), they certainly "sought" and "set their mind" on things above and in so doing exemplified the principle of the "seek . . . . . set" exhortation of Col. iii. 1, 2; but neither Abraham nor any of his seed could ever look away, above all heavens, to the seated Christ, and know that where He sat in that supernal glory, there was the sphere of all their blessing and hope. Such a prospect was never put before them. It was hidden with the mystery from the ages and generations that preceded the testimony of the Lord's prisoner. Here then is one great fact that we must keep to the fore when, by faith, we endeavour to follow out the injunction of the apostle to "seek those things that are above". We will remember that it is "where Christ sitteth on the right hand of God".

#2. "Where Christ sitteth" (Col. iii. 1).
pp. 161, 162

Having seen where Christ sits, there follows the next consideration: Why is He seated? The apostle does not say: "seek those things which are above where Christ is", or "where Christ standeth", or "where Christ intercedeth", but "where Christ sitteth".

In the figures of the O.T. a seated posture is associated, among other things, with a king, a judge, and a refiner. While every reference will afford contributory light, the most illuminating passage is found in Zech. vi. 13:

> "He shall sit and rule upon His throne; and He shall be a priest upon His throne."

This speaks of Christ as the "King-Priest", the Priest after the Order of Melchisedec, and points once again to the Epistle to the Hebrews. It was the fact that Christ is seated that appeared to the apostle to be the most important fact in the presentation of the truths brought out in Hebrews, for, the moment he states the glorious fact that the Saviour "purged our sins", he passes straight on to the climax, namely, that "He sat down on the right hand of the Majesty on high" (Heb. i. 3).

Now we know from the testimony of this same apostle that the burial, the resurrection, and the ascension, must all have their place if we are ever to speak of a "finished" work of Christ. Yet such is the special aspect of this epistle, that these facts are overleaped in order that there shall be the closest possible association of thought between the purging of sins and the seating of Him Who thus accomplished our sanctification.

While the actual seating of Christ is not mentioned in Heb. iii. 1 the believer is called upon to consider Him both as "the Apostle"—that is the One sent from God, thus embracing the first advent of the Lord, and as "the High Priest"—that is the One Who returned back to God, His work having been accomplished. The insistence elsewhere in this epistle on the fact that the Priest is seated enables us to realize that it is implied here. The exhortation in Heb. iv. 16 to come boldly to the throne of grace likewise implies a seated Christ. In Heb. v. 6 Christ is first revealed as the High Priest after the Order of Melchisedec and Psalm cx. 4 is quoted. The reader will remember that the Psalm opens with the words:

"The Lord said unto my Lord, Sit Thou on My right hand" (Psa. cx. 1).

The very fact therefore that Christ is a priest after the Order of Melchisedec indicates that He is now seated at the right hand of God.

The whole of Heb. vii. is occupied with the Melchisedec priesthood and its teaching, and this the apostle summarizes as follows:

> "Now of the things which we have spoken, this is the sum: We have such an high priest Who is set on the right hand of the throne of the Majesty in the heavens. A minister of the sanctuary, and of the true tabernacle, which the Lord pitched and not man" (Heb. viii. 1, 2).

Chapter ix. is devoted to the typical teaching of the tabernacle, and explains the meaning of the words, "the true tabernacle", which the apostle associated with the "seated priest". Chapter x. first shows that it is impossible that the blood of bulls and goats could take away sin. It then gathers up all that has been taught in the earlier chapters concerning the glorious fullness of the person of Christ: His unchanging priesthood, His once-offered sacrifice, and His heavenly sanctuary, unpitched by man.

> "And every priest standeth daily ministering and offering oftentimes the same sacrifices, which can never take away sins: But this man, after He had offered one sacrifice for sins for ever, sat down on the right hand of God" (Heb. x. 11, 12).

A	11. The standing priests.	\	Work NEVER done.
B	11. The repeated sacrifices.	/
B	12. The One Sacrifice.	\
A	12. The seated Priest.	/	Work FOR EVER done.

Here then is the answer to our question. We seek those things which are above where Christ sitteth, because there, and there only, can the believer find peace and satisfaction, completeness and acceptance, by reason of a work that is finished: "Seek those things which are above", said the apostle. "Where Christ sitteth" indicates the super-heavens. "Where Christ sitteth" implies that His work is finished.

Our exposition has been meagre; our comprehension of so vast a theme poor; but at least we shall have some understanding when we put into practice the exhortation of the apostle in Col. iii. 1, 2.

#3. "Where Christ sitteth" (Col. iii. 1).
pp. 201 - 203

There is one more statement in this opening passage that demands attention. It is the specific declaration that Christ sitteth at the right hand of God. It will enable us to realize the importance of the fact if we notice the way in which the apostles insist upon stating it. In the passages quote below any explanation or enlargement of the statement that is given by the apostles is printed in italic type.

"For David speaketh concerning Him, I foresaw the Lord always before my face, for He is on my right hand that I should not be moved" (Acts ii. 25).

"This Jesus hath God raised up . . . . . therefore being by the right hand of God exalted" (Acts ii. 33).

"For David is not ascended into the heavens: but he saith himself, The Lord said unto my Lord, Sit Thou on My right hand, until I make Thy foes Thy footstool . . . . . God hath made that same Jesus . . . . . both Lord and Christ" (Acts ii. 34-36).

"Him hath God exalted with His right hand, to be a Prince and a Saviour, for to give repentance to Israel and forgiveness of sins" (Acts v. 31).

"Who is he that condemneth? It is Christ that died, yea rather, that is risen again, Who is even at the right hand of God Who also maketh intercession for us" (Rom. viii. 34).

"The mighty power which He wrought in Christ, when he raised Him from the dead and set Him at His Own right hand in the heavenly places, far above all principality and power, and might, and dominion, and every name that is named, not only in this age, but also in that which is to come, And hath put all things under His feet, and gave Him to be the Head over all things to the Church, which is His body, the fullness of Him that filleth all in all" (Eph. i. 19-23).

"Who being the brightness of His glory, and the express image of His person, and upholding all things by the word of His power, when He had by Himself purged our sins, sat down on the right hand of the Majesty on high, being made so much better than the angels, as He hath by inheritance obtained a more excellent name than they" (Heb. i. 3, 4).

"But to which of the angels said He at any time, Sit on My right hand, until I make Thine enemies Thy footstool" (Heb. i. 13).

"Now of the things which we have spoken this is the sum: we have such an high priest, Who is set on the right hand of the Majesty in the heavens, a minister of the sanctuary and of the true tabernacle which the Lord pitched and not man" (Heb. viii. 1, 2).

"But this man after He had offered One sacrifice for sins for ever, sat down on the right hand of God . . . . . for by one offering He hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified" (Heb. x. 12-14).

"Let us run with patience the race that is set before us, looking unto Jesus, the author and finisher of faith, Who for the joy that was set before Him endured the cross, despising the shame, and is set down at the right hand of the throne of God" (Heb. xii. 1, 2).

Let us look at the seven occurrences quoted from the epistles. The first is from Rom. viii. 34:

The right hand is the place of the accuser.

"Satan standing at his right hand to resist him" (Zech. iii. 1).

"Let Satan stand at his right hand, when he shall be judged, let him be condemned" (Psa. cix. 6, 7).

The focal point of the doctrine of the Epistle to the Romans is chapter viii. 1:

"There is therefore now no condemnation to them which are in Christ Jesus."

To this end the gospel had been preached: to this end love had made a way whereby God might be just as well as the justifier of the believer. It is therefore to the point that the apostle stresses the fact that none can lay anything to the charge of God's elect, for Christ now occupies the accuser's place, and He died for us! He lives for us! He intercedes for us!!! No wonder Rom. viii. concludes in the high strain of victory and glorious persuasion there found.

When therefore we seek those things which are above, they are where Christ sitteth; our perfect pledge of full salvation.

The right hand is the place of Him Who is Head over all.

Had we read on in Rom. viii. we should have come to that pæan of the super-conqueror who sees death and life, angels, principalities and powers, alike, beneath the feet of the risen Christ, shorn of all power to harm or injure His redeemed.

This exalted position being the especial glory of the church of the mystery, we find it categorically stated in our next reference, namely, Eph. i. 19, 23. The position of the Lord at the right hand of the Father of Glory places Him far above principality and power; puts all things under His feet and gives Him to be Head over all things to His church. When therefore members of this church seek those things which are above, they enter a sphere beyond the dreams of man; beyond the highest aspirations of hope; beyond the limits of present human experience. They anticipate the goal of the ages when God shall be all in all, and, by faith, enter into their high destiny "in heavenly places".

The right hand is the place of Him Whom has inherited the excellent name.

As we read the opening of Heb. i. 3 we are amazed at the majesty and glory of Him Who for our sakes stooped to the death of the cross. He Who was the brightness of the glory of God, He Who could uphold all things by the word of His power, must be infinitely "better than angels" and in His Own right has a more excellent name than they. That is most blessedly true. But we must not forget that He Who was in the form of God became man, and took upon Him the form of a slave, and was in due time highly exalted, and will one day, as "Jesus", receive the title "Lord", which nevertheless was His before the earth was made (Heb. i. 10). The Lord when He laid aside His glory did so for our sakes. When He became man, he became "a little lower than the angels" (Heb. ii. 7, 9). By so doing He became one with every son that He will lead to glory (Heb. ii. 10-17), and what He had voluntarily laid aside He received back, in His new capacity, as reward. In this inheritance all His redeemed may share. When therefore the believer seeks those things which are above, where Christ sitteth on the right hand of God, he seeks those glories that once were His alone, but which now, by reason of His condescension unto death, and His triumphant resurrection, may be shared by His people.

We have already considered, in the second paper of this series, the references to Heb. viii. 1, 2 and x. 12-14, when dealing with the testimony of Hebrews to the "seated priest". These, together with the references now considered, provide "strong consolation" to all who draw near to that place where Christ sitteth on the right hand of God.

"What manner of persons ought ye to be."

#22. Symbols of Service. Teachers and Teaching.

pp. 29 - 31

Among the gifts given by the ascended Lord to His church in Eph. iv., we find "pastors and teachers" mentioned (Eph. iv. 11), and the apostle Paul on two occasions couples the office of "teacher" with that of "preacher" and "apostle" (I Tim. ii. 7; II Tim. i. 11). Even in O.T. times the teacher had his place. We are apt to think that the Levitical priesthood was wholly taken up with offerings and ceremonials. These certainly occupied a great amount of time, but the value of these offerings and ceremonials lay in their typical teaching, for the blood of bulls and goats could never in itself take away sin. Consequently we find that the Levite was a teacher as well as a priest or server of the tabernacle.

> "He said unto the Levites that taught all Israel . . . . . Put the holy ark in the house" (II Chron. xxxv. 3).
>
> "And of Levi he said, Let Thy Thummim and Thy Urim be with Thy holy one . . . . . They shall teach Jacob Thy judgments, and Israel Thy law: they shall put incense before Thee, and whole burnt sacrifice upon Thine altar" (Deut. xxxiii. 8-10).

The close association of ceremonial and teaching is evident; the holy ark, the incense, the burnt sacrifice, and teaching are all spoken of in the same context. The words of II Chron. xv. 3 are significant in this connection:

> "Now for a long season Israel hath been without the true God, and without a teaching priest, and without the law."

It is possible to have a life full of ceremonial, offerings, incense, washings and fasts, and yet to be without "the true God". Only as these ceremonials and offerings are explained and their meaning appreciated will God be really known.

Apt to teach.

The passage in Eph. iv. 11 does not indicate that a teacher to-day is endowed with any supernatural gift, such, for instance, as the gift of prophecy or the gift of tongues. Nevertheless the teacher himself was a gift to the church and as such must have possessed some fitness for his work. When the apostle instructs Timothy in the difficult task before him, he writes:

> "The things that thou hast heard of me among many witnesses, the same commit thou to faithful men, who shall be able to teach others also" (II Tim. ii. 2).
>
> "The servant of the Lord must not strive: but be gentle unto all men, apt to teach" (II Tim. ii. 24).
> "A bishop then must be blameless . . . . . apt to teach" (I Tim. iii. 2).

It is only reasonable to believe that anyone sent by the Lord to teach will have an "aptitude" for teaching. If he has to speak, he will be able to speak plainly, and will be able to make himself heard and understood. However good the message may be, it is valueless if it is inaudible or unintelligible.

Moral fitness.

These qualifications, however, are by no means all. There are also moral qualifications that are essential. This we may gather from the passage already quoted from I Tim. iii.

> "A bishop then must be blameless, the husband of one wife, vigilant, sober, of good behaviour, given to hospitality, apt to teach; not given to wine, no striker, not greedy of filthy lucre; but patient, not a brawler, not covetous; one that ruleth well his own house, having his children in subjection with all gravity; (for if a man know not how to rule his own house, how shall he take care of the church of God?) not a novice, lest being lifted up with pride he fall into the condemnation of the devil. Moreover he must have a good report of them which are without, lest he fall into reproach and the snare of the devil" (I Tim. iii. 2-7).

The domestic qualifications mentioned here belong not so much to the teacher as to the bishop, for in these early days the Church was in the house. The rest of the passage, however, may be taken as indicating the qualities that should accompany aptness to teach, if the teacher is to be approved of God.

It should be remembered that the words translated "teacher" (didaskalos) and "teach" (didasko) give us didaskalia, which is translated in most passages by the word "doctrine".

Teaching and Practice.

Throughout the Scriptures we find a salutary insistence upon the necessity for the life to correspond with the teaching given and received. The balance of doctrine and practice is very noticeable in the epistles, and also in the lives of the apostles. Paul himself draws the attention of Timothy to his consistency in this matter, saying:

> "Thou hast fully known my doctrine, manner of life" (II Tim. iii. 10).
> "I have shewed you, and have taught you" (Acts xx. 20).

The relation between "shewing" and "teaching" was a very practical one in the apostle's case, as verses 34 and 35 reveal:

> "Yea, ye yourselves know, that these hands have ministered unto my necessities, and to them that were with me. I have shewed you all things, how that so labouring ye ought to support the weak, and to remember the words of the Lord Jesus, how He said, It is more blessed to give than to receive" (Acts xx. 34, 35).

The subject of the teacher and his teaching is so great that we at first thought of taking some lesser theme, and of reserving the subject of teaching for a more thorough treatment. However, we have presented very briefly one or two aspects of it here, and trust that the service of each of us may be the better for the brief consideration we have given.

#23. Symbols of Service.
Unmoveable.
pp. 73 - 76

At the close of the Sermon on the Mount the Lord likens His hearers to two builders, the one who built his house upon a rock, and the other who built his house upon the sand. The figures vary in different parts of Scripture, but the underlying truth remains that the believer, while in one sense he may be said to grow and run and wrestle, is nevertheless in another sense "unmoved".

> "Cast thy burden upon the Lord, and He shall sustain thee; He shall never suffer the righteous to be moved" (Psa. lv. 22).

There are two reasons for being moved that are brought to our notice here. One is unrighteousness. There is no peace for the wicked. Figures such as the troubled sea that cannot rest are often found in Scripture. Righteousness, on the other hand, is like a rock beneath our feet, after floundering in mire and quicksands. The second reason given for "slipping", as the word "moved" might be translated, is the foolish endeavour to carry our burdens apart from the Lord.

In Psalm xv. we have six positive and six negative qualities, the possessor of which, the Psalmist says, "shall never be moved". The reader who wishes to "search and see" will find the following of service:

Verse 2. Three positive qualities.
Verse 3. Three negative qualities.
Verse 4. Three positive qualities.
Verse 4, 5. Three negative qualities.

Psalm xvi. 8 reads: "I have set the Lord always before me; before He is at my right hand, I shall not be moved." This Psalm speaks of resurrection, and has a bearing upon the passage in I Cor. xv., which we must consider presently.

Again, in Psalm xxi. 7 we read: "The king trusteth in the Lord, and through the mercy of the Most High, he shall not be moved." There is also the magnificent Psalm which opens with the words: "God is our refuge and strength, a very present help in trouble" (Psa. xlvi. 1). The earth is removed, the mountains are carried into the sea, the heathen rage, the kingdoms are moved, the earth melts. Yet, in the midst of such overwhelming confusion, we read: "God is in the midst of her; she shall not be moved" (Psa. xlvi. 5).

It is encouraging to those who are naturally timid to see how to Psalmist's trust and confidence grow by experience:

> "He only is my rock and my salvation; He is my defence: I shall not be greatly moved" (Psa. lxii. 2).
>
> "He only is my rock and my salvation; He is my defence: I shall not be moved" (Psa. lxii. 6).

At the first venture of faith the Psalmist's expression is "I shall not be greatly moved". After having experienced something of the Lord as his rock and defence, the Psalmist omits the qualifying word and says "I shall not be moved".

We must now look at some N.T. illustrations. Let us turn first to Paul's words as his first great ministry drew to a close. Facing the future, with its bonds and afflictions, he says:

> "But none of these things move me, neither count I my life dear unto myself, so that I might finish my course with joy, and the ministry which I have received of the Lord Jesus, to testify the gospel of the grace of God" (Acts xx. 24).

Do we feel as we read these words, that such a condition is beyond us? Let us remember that the unmoved state of the first sentence is largely the result of what is represented by the rest of the verse. Paul was unmoved in the face of bonds and afflictions because He did not count his soul dear to himself. He already knew that all he had and all he was belonged to his Redeemer. He was not his own; he had been bought with a price. A self-centred man is easily moved, but a man who holds self as but a means of serving the Lord will not easily be disturbed at the thought of trials and afflictions. Also the apostle had a goal in front of him. He desired to finish his course, to fulfil his calling; and in its pursuit he endured and overcame odds that to a lesser soul would have been overwhelming.

The words: "But none of these things move me" are a free rendering of the original All' oudenos logon poioumai, which literally means that Paul did not "make account of even one thing". The Vatican Manusrcipt reads: "Of no account make I life precious to myself", which crystallizes the thought already expressed above.

Another suggestive passage is I Thess. iii. 3 where Timothy is sent to the Thessalonians: "That no man should be moved by these afflictions." It is very probable that the preposition en translated in this verse "by" should carry its primitive meaning "in". The verb "move" here means "to fawn upon", "to flatter", "to deceived through flattery"; and the idea seems to be that when one is enduring affliction, one is open to "fawning" and "flattering" suggestions from seeming well-wishers, and that such must be resisted by faith.

We come in conclusion to the great and triumphant exhortation of the apostle in I Cor. xv. 58. With resurrection as a glorious fact, with Christ as the mighty Victor over death and the grave, with a glorious hope before the believer, this chapter ends with the words:

> "Therefore, my beloved brethren, be ye stedfast, unmoveable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, forasmuch as ye know that your labour is not in vain in the Lord" (I Cor. xv. 58).

These three passages from the N.T. should be continually in mind. Nothing helps us in our service so much as the possession of the unselfish spirit manifested by the apostle in Acts xx. The believer who "feels hurt" so often, is thinking too much of self. To realize the Lordship of the Risen Christ is to be free from the intimidation and the flattery of man, and with the Lord at our right hand we too can say: "I shall not be moved."

#24. Symbols of Service. Vessels. pp. 112 - 114

The first title given to the apostle Paul in Scripture provides us with the subject of the present article: "He is a chosen vessel unto Me" (Acts ix. 15).

To any one acquainted with the scriptures and with the worship of the God of Israel, the word "vessel" would be associated with the tabernacle and the temple. The Altar had its specially designed vessels of brass, such as pans to receive ashes, shovels, basins, flesh-hooks and firepans (Exod. xxvii. 13). The Table also had its appropriate vessels, and the Candlestick, or Lampstand (Exod. xxx. 27 and xxxv. 13). When the Lord called Saul of Tarsus to His service, He separated him as a vessel unto Himself. The Lord Jesus Christ fulfils the typical teaching of the Altar, the Table and the Candlestick, and we may regard Paul as a chosen vessel, serving Him in all these offices.

The Apostle was chosen by the Lord as a vessel "to bear His name". In Acts ix. Ananias speaks of Paul as having "authority from the chief priests to bind all that call on Thy name" (Acts ix. 14). And the Apostle himself confesses in Acts xxvi.:

> "I verily thought with myself, that I ought to do many things contrary to the name of Jesus of Nazareth" (Acts xxvi. 9).

How the Apostle bore that Name and suffered for it can be learnt from his epistles. How he must have rejoiced as he wrote to the Ephesians of the ascended Lord, raised far above every name that is named (Eph. i. 21), and to the Philippians, of the coming day when, at the name of Jesus, every knee shall bow (Phil. ii. 10).

When the Apostle comes to speak of himself as a vessel, he does not speak of a vessel of gold or even of brass. So great is the glory of the Name that he has been chosen to bear, that he speaks of himself as an earthen vessel:

> "But we have this treasure in earthen vessels, that the excellency of the power may be of God, and not of us" (II Cor. iv. 7).

It is possible that the Apostle had in mind the story of Gideon with his empty pitchers and lamps within the pitchers, which were broken at the moment of victory (Judges vii. 19, 20). The context of II Cor. iv. 6 refers to the "light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ", and the suggestion of the broken pitcher may be behind the words of verse 9: "Cast down, but not destroyed."

The Apostle was ever conscious of his utter unworthiness when he contemplated his past life and, at the same time, the glory of the message with which he was entrusted:

> "Unto me, who am less than the least of all saints, is this grace given" (Eph. iii. 8).

It should be a matter for thanksgiving that the Apostle can speak in this way. The Scriptures do not present us with impossible saints and inhuman men and women. The chosen vessels of Scripture are in themselves "earthen vessels", but their enabling is all-sufficient grace (II Cor. iii. 5), and that grace is still available for every "earthen vessel" in the service of the Lord.

The last passage to be considered in which the thought of the "vessel" is prominent is found in II Tim. ii. 20, 21:

> "But in a great house there are not only vessels of gold and silver, but also of wood and of earth; and some to honour and some to dishonour. If a man therefore purge himself from these, he shall be a vessel unto honour, sanctified, and meet for the Master's use, and prepared unto every good work."

There must necessarily be different grades of service, and different ways of assessing them. The aspect in view in II Tim. ii. is that of devotion, a devotion that expresses itself in "separation from" and "separation to". There is a purging of the vessel from all contact with evil, whether with evil persons or with evil doctrines, and there is also a singleness of heart in the service of the Lord. The actual service may be performed among and to men, but in spirit it will be offered to the Lord. Its language is that of Phil. ii. 17:

> "Yea, and if I be offered upon the sacrifice and service of your faith, I joy, and rejoice with you all."

Singleness of heart and consecration to the Master's use, and separation from other vessels and other uses, so far from restricting and limiting, are essential elements in all true usefulness.

> "Meet for the Master's use, having been prepared unto every good work."

To be a chosen vessel to bear His Name, to be an earthen vessel to contain His treasure, to be a vessel meet for the Master's use, surely these things touch the very heights of devoted service. No wonder that the Apostle blends such dignity and greatness with so much humility.

#25. Symbols of Service.
Witnesses.
pp. 152 - 154

In the first chapter of the Acts we find the apostles gathered round the risen Lord. They have been told to wait at Jerusalem until they have been endued with power from on high. They have had the unique experience of continual fellowship with Him throughout His earthly ministry. They have enjoyed a unique exposition of the O.T. Scriptures "concerning Himself". And now, they await their commission. Out of all the symbols of service that were at the disposal of the Lord, which will he select? We find that he chooses an important title which we have not yet considered in this series:

> "Ye shall receive power . . . . . ye shall be witnesses unto Me" (Acts i. 8).

"Witnesses unto Me."—In these words the Lord indicates the basic significance of all N.T. ministry. The Greek word for "witness" (martus) is translated three times "martyr" and twice "record". The feminine form marturia is translated "record", "report", "testimony", and "witness", and each of these words is used to translate the verb martureo, "I witness". The fact that the word generally translated "witness" is also translated "martyr" shows the inner meaning of all true witness.

Let us consider now the way in which the ministries of the apostles and others during the Acts were closely linked up with "witnessing".

Immediately after the ascension, the apostles, together with the hundred and twenty, take steps to fill the gap created by the fall of Judas. Matthias, who was numbered with the eleven, possessed the essential qualification for all true witness—the ability to give personal testimony.

> "Beginning from the baptism of John, unto that same day that He was taken up from us, must one be ordained to be a witness with us of His resurrection" (Acts i. 22).

Matthias could say "I know", "I saw", "I heard", "I was there". Piety and eloquence, learning and gift, may all be valuable adjuncts to witness-bearing, but none of them would be of any value apart from personal testimony. The baptism of Pentecost did not give these witnesses experiences to draw upon, but power to testify what they had already seen and heard. Peter's address on the day of Pentecost reaches its climax when he declares the fact of the resurrection of Christ, saying: "This Jesus hath God raised up, whereof we all are witnesses" (Acts ii. 32). And again in connection with the healing of the lame man: "Ye killed the Prince of Life, Whom God hath raised from the dead; whereof we are witnesses" (Acts iii. 15).

When the apostles were liberated from prison they were commanded by the angel:

> "Go, stand and speak in the temple to the people all the words of this life" (Acts v. 20).

And we may be sure that they still spoke as "witnesses of His resurrection".

When brought before the Council, Peter and the others answered and said:

> "The God of our fathers raised up Jesus, Whom ye slew and hanged on a tree. Him hath God exalted with His right hand to be a Prince and a Saviour, for to give repentance to Israel, and forgiveness of sins. And we are His witnesses of these things; and so also is the Holy Ghost Whom God hath given to them that obey Him" (Acts v. 30-32).

When Paul stood before Agrippa, and revealed the important fact that he had received a twofold commission from the Lord, the first part running concurrently with the ministry of the twelve, and the second associated with a ministry from prison, he united them together by one covering title—the title of "witness":

> "I have appeared unto thee for this purpose, to make thee a minister and a witness both of these things which thou hast seen, and of those things in the which I will appear unto thee" (Acts xxvi. 16).

Ministry may vary in its scope, it may emphasize differing aspects of truth and purpose, and differing spheres of blessing; but whether it be Kingdom or Church, Bride or Body, it is unchangeably true that "Ye shall be witnesses unto Me".

The greatest of all witnesses is God himself, and even His witness is "concerning His Son":

> "If we receive the witness of men, the witness of God is greater: for this is the witness of God which He hath witnessed of His Son. He that believeth on the Son of God hath the witness in himself: he that believeth not God hath made Him a liar: because he believeth not the witness that God gave of His Son. And this is the witness, that God hath given to us eternal life, and this life is in His Son" (I John v. 9-12).

Power from on high in order to witness to a risen Christ sums up the essence of true ministry. The reader who cares to go back over this series, taking each symbol in turn, and seeking from the Word its connection with witnessing, will discover that all the various phases of service that have been covered are but various facts of this quintessence of all ministry.

It was the great desire of the apostle that he might "finish his course with joy" and "testify the gospel of the grace of God" (Acts xx. 24). The word "testify" here is diamartureo, "to witness thoroughly". This resolve was not merely the product of highly-wrought feelings, for, in summing up his previous ministry, the apostle was able, by the grace of God, to use this same word (Acts xx. 21). And when last we read of him in the Acts, the same thoroughness is manifest:

"When the commandment came"

(Being a series of articles based upon the testimony of readers as to the particular passage of Scripture that was used to enlighten them as to the unique character of the Dispensation of the Mystery).

#9. "With Abraham" and "With Christ".
pp. 18, 19

The apprehension of the truth that brought light and joy to the reader whose testimony we now give, arose out of a right division of Scripture in connection with the two phrases "With Abraham" and "With Christ". The reader saw that both were indications of dispensational truth, and realized that those blessed with faithful Abraham, sharing with him the Heavenly Jerusalem, and those blessed with Christ, seated together at the right hand of God, must be two different companies. While the doctrinal position of the believer, whether in Galatians, Romans or Ephesians is the same, viz., "in Christ", the dispensational position differs. Those who are found in the churches during the Acts are said to be "blessed with faithful Abraham". On the other hand, the saved belonging to the dispensation of the mystery are blessed "with Christ", and their hope is to be manifested "with Him in glory".

The point that our correspondent stresses in his letter is that we must believe that God uses words "with precision", and without the mixing of metaphors, and that He really means what He says. He comments upon the care we bestow upon the wording of a legal document, which after all belongs only to the realm of time, and contrasts it with the lax way we handle the Word of eternal truth. We are thankful for this emphasis. When once we have rightly divided the Word of truth, we are at last free to believe all that God has said, using every word He has written, and needing no others. It may be that those who do not distinguish these things dispensationally would resent this claim, and tell us that they too believe all that God has said without alteration. While we would give all such credit for sincerity, we would also point out that this is not possible while right division is ignored.

If we "rightly divide the Word of truth" we must believe that "earth" means "earth" in Matt. v. 5, and vi. 10; and that the "heavenly places" of Eph. i. 3 are "far above" the earth. However sincere we may be, if we insist that the Sermon on the Mount is addressed to the same company as the Epistle to the Ephesians, we cannot avoid confusing "earth" with "heaven". And this is but one example. The recognition of dispensational truth goes hand in hand with the acknowledgement that God uses His words with precision—or, as our correspondent writes at the end of his letter:

> "Thy words are pure words > (Words of the earth)
> As silver is tried in a furnace of fire
> Purified seven times."

#10. "In Christ" and "With Christ".
pp. 38, 39

The testimony to be considered in this article cannot, we feel, be adequately presented without quoting from the letter concerned. We do not propose to disclose the identity of any of our correspondents in this series, but in this particular case, as our brother (since deceased) printed and published his testimony to the glorious truths of the Mystery, and was in many ways called upon to pay the price of faithfulness, it may be that the writer will be recognized.

We are glad to be able to record this testimony, which is not only concerned with the dispensation value of the words "With Christ", but also fully rejoices in the grace that resides in the doctrinal phrase "In Christ".

> "As you have opened a column in the B.E. for a series of articles based upon the testimony of readers as to the particular passage of Scripture that was used to enlighten them as to the unique character of the dispensation of the mystery, I want to add mine if it could be of any service.
>
> God has got His own and different ways in leading His elect to the knowledge of the truth. With reference to my personal leading:
>
> I was in Church service for about fourteen years, but was never at rest and satisfied with the doctrine of salvation as interpreted by the Church and preached by myself. While I preached to others, I myself did not enjoy the rest of heart and assurance that salvation ought to bring to the sinner. A dear brother from overseas, Pastor Beaupré, visited the Town where I tried to minister the gospel. Happily I was not too conservative to act as his interpreter at his services, interpreting from English into Dutch.
>
> The gospel of the finished work of Christ as preached by him struck my seeking soul at once, and gave me a fuller understanding of a salvation by grace without the meritorious works of man. The scripture passages then used to put my feet on an eternal rock of truth were the two most precious words in Scripture, so often repeated in Paul's epistles, viz. "IN CHRIST", to which very soon the other preposition was added, viz. "WITH CHRIST". These two scripture words spoke volumes to me, as it involves our glorious position "Complete in Him". Our union with Christ became and will remain the one great subject of meditation. Oh! that wonderful God-created union, with our blessed Lord, exalted far above principality and power. How it lifts our hearts in adoration to the God of love and all grace! How shall we realize to the full that work of grace? The traditional church doctrine of salvation mingled with so much meritorious works was left behind for the doctrine of the grace of God, as taught in His own Word. Tradition (the grave clothes) lost its hold (what grace!) and I was at once on the liberated road from where I could view scriptural truth as it is written. (The suffering involved in that gracious liberation of God I hardly need mention).
>
> The next scripture passage that brought fuller light was Eph. i. 3: 'Blessed be the God and Father . . . . . Who hath blessed us', etc.
>
> The original scripture passage used to lead me to the knowledge of the dispensation of the mystery was the oft-repeated "IN CHRIST"; after that, "WITH CHRIST"; and Eph. i. 3.

Now, as the days go on, I marvel at the sovereignty of God. The sovereign way in which He created the three spheres of blessing, and the sovereign grace that elected the objects for that sphere of blessing out of the fallen race of Adam.

May you be strengthened, dear brother, in your ministry.

Kind regards to members of that wonderful God-created unity."

#11. Ephesians i. 13.
pp. 58, 59

"In Whom ye also trusted, upon hearing the word of truth, the gospel of your salvation; in Whom also upon believing ye were sealed with that holy Spirit of promise" (Eph. i. 13).

The verse quoted above was the passage that brought light and understanding in the knowledge of the dispensation of the mystery to the reader whose testimony we now record. It was not, as in some cases, the application of some rather remote text, but the full blaze of positive truth.

The "sealing" and the "earnest" here are differentiated from the "sealing" and the "earnest" of II Cor. i. 21, 22. The latter, belonging to the dispensation of supernatural gifts, were not complete without the added "confirming" and "anointing", both of which have reference to spiritual gifts (cf. I Cor. i. 6; Heb. ii. 3; and I John ii. 20, 27).

Again, while the phrase "the gospel of your salvation" might be used of any believer under any dispensation, the mind in this case is directed to the particular "word of truth" revealed to the Apostle as the Lord's prisoner, which is particularly the revelation that brings salvation to the believer at the present time. Further, there is no interval between the "hearing", the "believing" and the "sealing". The word "after" in the A.V. here is misleading.

The phrase "the holy Spirit of promise" might be rendered "the holy promissory Spirit", and refers, not to the Pentecostal gift, but to the new nature with its pledge of future glory.

It is impossible to read and be influenced by Eph. i. 13 without a knowledge of the context. Our reader has focused our attention upon the thirteenth verse, because this verse brings the issue to an experimental stage, but he would be the first to acknowledge that this wonderful fruit cannot grow apart from an equally blessed root; and he rejoices in the knowledge of Eph. i. 3-14 as the charter of the church of the mystery. Before the "believing" and the "sealing" and the "promise" could be possible, there had to be the Father's choice "before the overthrow of the world", and the accomplishment of redemption by Christ, through the shedding of His blood. The peculiar sphere of this church, which is “blessed with all spiritual blessings in heavenly places in Christ”, is entered as we “hear” and “believe” the testimony of the Lord’s prisoner.

#12. The value of the dividing line.

> “After it was pointed out to me that Ephesians was written after the Acts closed, then Eph. iii. 1-11 was ample evidence that Paul had a distinct message. Of course there were details to add, such as Eph. i. 3, 17-23, ii. 13-15, Phil. iii., Col. i., with Acts xxviii. 23-28 as a definite dispensational line, but with all that, the conviction was established that the dispensation of the mystery was distinct. The comprehension of the pre-prison epistles upon Acts ground, and the prison epistles after Acts xxviii., did as much for me at the beginning as any verse in particular, for after that I could place the Scripture upon a progressive programme.”

The testimony given above is splendid. It states quite clearly that, as a result of rightly dividing the Word of truth and believing that the setting aside of Israel in Acts xxviii. was a crisis in the outworking of the purpose of the ages, the full acceptance of the apostle’s claim to have received by revelation the mystery of Eph. iii. was both simple and necessary. As this reader says, many other scriptures had to be considered and put into place, but the one great fact of a dividing line at Acts xxviii. solved all problems.

The realization that, however, much affinity there may be between the doctrinal teaching of Romans and that of Ephesians, the two epistles rest upon distinctly different dispensational grounds is most important. There are some who appear to have seen that there was revealed after Acts xxviii. a unique dispensation, and yet to them it is but an evolution of the earlier ministry of the apostle. Such bring over the hope of I Thess. iv. as the hope of the Church of the Mystery, and fail to distinguish between what was permanent and what was transitory in the ministry of Paul during the Acts. The writer whose testimony we are considering raises the question, in a part of his letter which we have not quoted, as to how far elective grace accounts for the differences between believers. This we cannot say. We most surely recognize that “what we are, we are by the grace of God”, but, at the same time, we must be careful to avoid any appearance of minimizing the believer’s responsibility to believe all and only what God has said.

#13. Things that differ.
pp. 198, 199

The writer of the following testimony has been a stalwart supporter of the witness of the Berean Expositor for many years and we are glad to be able to include his contribution. We have kept practically to his own words.

"The first thing that arrested my attention as to the importance of right division was the fact that not all those who are raised at the great white throne judgment will necessarily perish (as many teach), but those whose names are not in the book of life."

"From the realization of the importance of right division I was soon led to see the truth of the mystery. I noticed that in the unity of Eph. iv. there was but one baptism, and realized that it must be spiritual. This indicated a change from kingdom teaching, which has two baptisms, viz., one in water and one in spirit. Following this the connection between the Lord's Supper and the New Covenant exercised my mind. The New Covenant (quoted in Heb. viii. from Jer. xxxi.), connected with the house of Israel and the house of Judah, has not yet been put into effect, and will not be until the church of the mystery has been manifested with Christ in glory."

"Perhaps the passage that helped me most in my studies in a rightly divided Word of truth was that of Acts xxviii. I saw that Acts xxviii. 25-28 was the dispensational boundary, dividing Paul's epistles into two sets of seven, the early set relating to the kingdom, and the later set relating to the mystery. Before this boundary we have numerous references to Jew, Israel, Abraham, tongues, miracles, prophecy, and other gifts. After the boundary these are all conspicuous by their absence, the very isolated references being of a negative character."

"Having thus been set free from the binding and blinding power of traditional teaching, I was able to leave all these things, and to go on to know Christ and the glories of His exalted position as Head over all things to the church which is His body, blessed in the heavenlies; in short, a Saviour and Lord Who has not only died on our behalf and risen because of our justification, but has ascended far above all, and His church potentially seated with Him and waiting the day of His and their manifestation in glory. To Him be praise and glory, Amen."

#14. Galatians iii. 8.

> "And the Scripture, foreseeing that God would justify the heathen through faith, preached before the gospel unto Abraham, saying, In thee shall all nations be blessed" (Gal. iii. 8).

We have only to read this passage in Galatians to be sure that the inclusion of the Gentile in the blessings of the gospel and the promises of Abraham is no "mystery". Quite a number of objections to the truth of the mystery, however, have arisen out of this misconception. We are glad, therefore, to be able to quote from a letter received from a reader the following testimony:

> "I might add my testimony to the many others that the particular Scriptures which more than any others opened my eyes to the Dispensation of the Mystery are: Gen. xii. 1-3, and Eph. iii. 2-7. When the Holy Spirit opened my eyes to the fact that salvation for the Gentiles was included in God's programme as given to Abraham, as such was no new revelation given to Paul, then I saw that Paul's ministry must be something beside that given to Abraham and his seed."
> "If this can be of any help in your articles on 'When the Commandment Came' I should be glad to have you use it."

The same misunderstanding is at the bottom of the criticism which has been made of our attitude to Romans. Because we believe and teach that the dispensation of the Mystery finds no exposition outside Paul's prison epistles, we have been criticized as self-contradictory for turning back to the Epistle to the Romans. We find in Romans the gospel of the grace of God. This gospel, as our brother says, was not a new revelation given to Paul, for its basic teaching of "justification by faith" was to be found in "the law and the prophets" (Gen. xv. 6 and Hab. ii. 4), but it is carried over into the dispensation of the Mystery (Phil. iii. 9). The revelation that is found in Eph. iii. 2-7 speaks of a calling and constitution, and not the initial message of free salvation, that is the great distinguishing feature of the apostle's prison ministry.

In bringing this series of articles of personal testimony to a close, we should like to express the gratitude that many readers have felt and passed on, to all those fellow-members, who out of their varied experiences of the illuminating power of God, have given encouragement to others by allowing us to use their written witness.

We shall be wise if we learn one lesson well—that, just as God has spoken in the past and sundry times and in divers manners, so to-day He is pleased to use a variety of passages of Scripture, some of them to us most unlikely, in carrying conviction to the seeking soul. Let us all be thankful that the commandment "came", whatever may have been its particular form.

Wisdom; Human and Divine.

Being a comparison of the groping after the truth of the ancient philosophers with the truth as it is revealed in Scripture, in order that the believer may the better appreciate the Word of God.

#7. Anaximines: His conception of the "first principle" approaches the Scriptural "Spirit", but fails to reach it.

pp. 8 - 11

As the theory of Thales was rejected by Anaximander, so Anaximander's theory was rejected by Anaximines (born B.C.588). He rejected the water of Thales as being too determinate, and the infinite substance of Anaximander as being too indeterminate, and assumed air to be the arche, or ground of all things. This was rather in the nature of a compromise between the two. He conceived the principle of the universe to be "the unlimited, all-embracing, ever-moving air" from which by rarefaction (fire) and condensation (water, earth, etc.) everything else is formed.

To the student of Chemistry, this attempt of Anaximines will be seen to contain more than a wild guess at the truth. Many of the solids and liquids with which we are familiar contain the gaseous elements Oxygen and Nitrogen, which are the principal constituents of the air we breathe; and both these gases can be liquefied and solidified. The idea that air in rarefaction causes fire contains an element of truth, for we now know that no combustion is possible without oxygen.

If the modern chemist finds some food for thought in Anaximines' choice of air as the primal substance, the student of the Hebrew and Greek Scriptures is equally impressed. We have already turned back to Gen. i. when considering the theory of Thales and the theory of his successor. We do so again for the third time.

Following the description of chaos, we read in Gen. i. 2: "And the Spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters."

The word "Spirit" here is the Hebrew ruach, which occurs in the following passages:--

> "The breath of life" (Gen. vi. 17).
> "God made a wind to pass over the earth" (Gen. viii. 1).
> "The blast of Thy nostrils" (Exod. xv. 8).
> "O remember that my life is wind" (Job vii. 7).
> "By His Spirit He hath garnished the heavens" (Job xxvi. 13).
> "All the while my breath is in me, and the spirit of God is in my nostrils" (Job xxvii. 3).

These examples are representative of the use of ruach throughout the O.T. The N.T. equivalent is pneuma, and its usage is similar.

> "The wind (pneuma) bloweth where it listeth . . . . . so is every one that is born of the Spirit (pneuma)" (John iii. 8).

God is "Spirit", but "Spirit" defies definition. There are no terms in human language, nor ideas that the mind can conceive that do not limit and confine the reality for which the word "Spirit" stands. Throughout the Scriptures God has used the air, the wind, the breath, as symbols setting forth the figure what it is possible for us to know of the Spirit, which in itself lies beyond our ken.

Diogenes of Apollonia added the idea of Intelligence to Anaximines' theory of the Air, and with him this school (known as the "Milesian School") came to an end. If these men did not get very far, they did at least break away from the superstition of their times, and went back as far as their limitations would permit to the witness of creation. Somehow they missed their way: and without wishing to be uncharitable, we cannot help feeling that Rom. i. and I Cor. i. indicate the source of their failure.

> "Because that which may be known of God is manifest in them; for God hath showed it unto them. For the invisible things of Him from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made, even His eternal power and Godhead; so that they are without excuse. Because that, when they knew God, they glorified Him not AS GOD (This marks the wrong turn that all these philosophers took), neither were THANKFUL (We can only be thankful to a Person; "principles" and "infinite substance" leave us unmoved. No one has ever fallen down and worshipped a mathematical principle or the law of gravity). But they became vain in their imaginations, and their foolish heart was darkened. Professing themselves to be WISE (We shall come presently to the Sophists—"The wise"—who were Atheists) they became fools, and changed the glory of the uncorruptible God into an image made like to corruptible MAN" (The Sophists taught that "Man is the measure of the Universe", and so, while scorning the images of wood and stone, created metal images and magnified themselves) (Rom. i. 19-23).

If only they had known! There is ONE MAN Who is the measure of the Universe, but He is the Son of God.

It is a relief to turn from the darkness of philosophy to the light of Scripture:--

> "O Lord our Lord, how excellent is Thy name in all the earth; Who hast set Thy glory above the heavens . . . . . When I consider Thy heavens, the work of Thy fingers, the moon and the stars, which Thou hast ordained, what is man, that Thou art mindful of him? and the Son of man, that Thou visitest him? For Thou hast made him a little lower than the angels" (Psa. viii. 1-5).

If Thales, Anaximander, and their fellows had had this revelation, what a difference it would have made. Yet we can read freely of these things, which even David saw only dimly.

> "We see Jesus, Who was made a little lower than the angels for the suffering of death, crowned with glory and honour: that He by the grace of God should taste death for every man" (Heb. ii. 9).

And we also know, that this same One Who stooped lower than the angels for the suffering of death, is the One Who is praised by the Psalmist as the Creator of all:--

> "Unto the Son He saith . . . . . Thou, Lord, in the beginning hast laid the foundation of the earth; and the heavens are the works of Thine hands" (cf. "The works of Thy fingers" Psa. viii.) (Heb. i. 8-10).

Human wisdom could never penetrate to this depth or scale this height. We bow before the only wise God, and gratefully thank Him for the revelation He has given us of Himself, and His creation, His purposes, and His goal. We glory in the blessed fact that it all pulsates with life and love. There are no cold abstractions. To quote a recent writer:--

> "The Universe is not a spiritual vacuum, a mathematical abstraction; it is OUR FATHER'S HOUSE OF MANY MANSIONS."

Human wisdom is cold and lifeless. Divine wisdom breathes the breath of life and love. Thanks be unto God for His unspeakable gift—a Person, and that Person, His beloved, only begotten Son. He is all the Philosophy that we shall ever need.

#8. The "Formless Being" of Xenophanes and the Scriptural revelation of Him Who was "in the form of God".

pp. 46 - 49

The Milesian school of philosophy was succeeded by the Eleatics, founded by Xenophanes and named after Elea, a town in Italy. The system was developed by Parmenides, and owed its completion to Zeno.

The primitive conceptions of Thales and his correctors seem to have produced a somewhat humbler frame of mind in his successors, for Xenophanes is at pains to tell us that philosophy is but "reasonable opinion", "probability", and not "certain knowledge".

> "There never was a man, nor will be, who has certain knowledge about the gods, and about all the things of which I speak. Even if he should chance to say the complete truth, yet he himself knows not that it is so."

Philosophy, therefore, is a self-confessed failure. Nothing but a Divine revelation can supply us with sufficient knowledge to enable any one of us to say regarding these things: "I know." Let the reader ponder some of the passages of Scripture written, "that ye may know", and let him praise God for the light of His Word.

We must not forget the time at which Xenophanes lived. All around him were men who worshipped gods, whose attributes were those of mortal men, and whose actions were as immoral as those of their worshippers. In his search for "the One", and the dawning consciousness that the one great Cause of all must be infinitely removed from all limitations of time and sense, he not only ridiculed the man-like gods of his day, but threw such doubt upon the external world of sense as practically to annihilate it altogether. Speaking of the gods, he writes:--

> "If oxen and lions could paint, they would make the pictures of their gods in their likeness. Horses would make them like horses, oxen like oxen."

Xenophanes' witness against graven images and idolatry is remarkable, and would have gladdened the heart of Moses, who wrote, by inspiration of God: "Thou shalt not make unto thee any graven image" (Exod. xx. 4). The irony of his remarks about oxen and lions reminds one of the irony of Isa. xliv. 9-20, where the idolater makes his god out of one part of a tree, and with the rest makes a fire to bake his bread. The Saviour Himself testified concerning the Father: "Ye have neither heard His voice at any time, nor seen His shape" (John v. 37).

Xenophanes was unconsciously crying out for the Son of God. Had he known the truth of Phil. ii., that Christ was originally and by right "in the form of God", and that He was the "Image of the invisible God" (Col. i. 15), the empty void in his philosophy would have been filled.

When he spoke of "gods in their likeness", he knew nothing of Gen. i. and its statement concerning the affinity between God and man: "Let us make man in our image, after our likeness" (Gen. i. 26).

Xenophanes' objection to anthropomorphic gods may have been justified in his own day and circumstances, but we hope to show later in this series that Anthropomorphism (This Figure of Speech is discussed in Volume XXIV, pages 145-147 and 208-211), is vital to our understanding of God.

> "There is one God supreme among gods and men, resembling mortals neither in form nor in mind."

He distrusts the evidence of the senses. The external world is but "seeming", and reality belongs only to "the One"—a doctrine very similar to Pantheism.

Xenophanes was very much concerned with Antitheses—"The one and the many", "The permanent and the changing", ascribing reality to the one, and denying it to the other. In this he was not altogether wrong as a reference to II Cor. iv. 18 will show: "The things which are seen are temporal; but the things which are not seen are age-abiding."

Unless it has been forced upon our notice, the idea of distrusting the senses may sound absurd. We well remember a lesson at school that showed how necessary it is to have some standard other than that of our own sense perceptions. Three pails were placed in the class room, and the scholar first plunged each of his hands at the same time into each of the two pails on either side, one containing ice-cold water, and the other hot water.

After a moment or two he lifted his hands and simultaneously plunged them into the central pail, containing ordinary tap water. One hand gave the verdict, "This water is cold"; the other, "This water is hot". Sense perception, therefore, is misleading. The thermometer has to decide.

Xenophanes' "God" was simply "pure Being". Such an abstraction could have no reference to anything finite, and no possible connection with the vicissitudes of existence. Xenophanes had got rid of the "gods" in human form, only to find a cold, shapeless, motionless abstraction, having no resemblance to the "God and Father" Whom we know through Christ.

The Scriptures do not speak of God apart from His relation to man and creation. From Genesis to Revelation, there is no attempt to explain God. He is Spirit, He is invisible, He is immense (immeasureable), He is everywhere always. These things are stated, but not explained, and wherever they are stated, it is only because of some relationship demanded by the context. A few examples will illustrate this.

> "He that cometh to God must believe that He is, and that He is the rewarder of them that diligently seek Him" (Heb. xi. 6).

Philosophy would discuss the "being" of God. Genesis assumes His being, and proceeds to His works and ways.

> "Thus saith the high and lofty One, that inhabiteth eternity" (Isa. lvii. 15).

Here, at first sight, is the beginning of a philosophical disquisition on the "Infinite", but a second glance at the verse shows that it is written to emphasize God's condescension:--

> "I dwell in the high and holy place, with him also that is of a contrite and humble spirit."

Another passage that might be quoted is Psa. cxlvii. 5: "His understanding is infinite." This understanding extends to the number and names of the stars, an understanding that makes the minds reel, but it is introduced into this Psalm much in the same way as the parallel statements in the N.T. concerning the numbering of the hairs of the head, and the sparrow's fall. If the attributes ascribed to God are collected together, it will be found that they do not form a complete whole. They are but the fringe of a mighty subject, and speak of God only as He comes into relation with man. All else is left unexplained.

What Xenophanes did not know was the condescension of this Great and Holy One. He did not realize that He Who created heaven and earth has entered deeply into its progress and its pain—in other words, he had no knowledge as we have of the mystery of godliness: "God manifest in the flesh."

#9. The condescension of the great "I AM" Moses and Parmenides.
pp. 90 - 92

The Eleatic Philosophy which originated with Xenophanes, was systemized by Parmenides, and completed by Zeno. Parmenides was largely concerned with the idea of "being", and opposed this idea to all that is complex and mutable. He maintained that, while the reason led to truth, the senses, which were occupied with impressions received from an ever-changing unreal world, were deceived. His arguments were chiefly directed to proving that reality as a whole cannot change.

> "If we consider everything that is, it is clear that it cannot become more than it is, except by the addition of something else; but if we start with literally everything, there is nothing left that can be added to it . . . . . It follows that the whole cannot change in the parts is, therefore, an illusion" (C. E. M. Joad).

In his endeavour to preserve intact the notion of "pure being", he denied the reality of creation. The subject was too immense for the unaided human mind.

The theme is touched upon in the Scriptures in Exod. iii., but only to be set aside for a lower aspect of truth to be revealed in its place. A momentary revelation of the "being" of God is given to Moses, but this is immediately followed by the name whereby the Most High is revealed in the O.T.

Moses enquires what he shall say to the children of Israel when they ask for the name of the God Who had sent him. And the reply comes:--

> "And God said unto Moses, I AM THAT I AM: and He said, Thus shalt thou say unto the children of Israel, I AM hath sent me unto you" (Exod. iii. 14).

Here we have expressed what Xenophanes and Parmenides sought for, Absolute Unconditioned Being. But what would a nation of slaves, who had spent their days making bricks, know of "Unconditioned Being"? Such knowledge is too wonderful for us all; it is beyond us. We are so constituted that the unconditioned and the non-existent, to us, much the same. That which is not bounded by space, and is not conditioned by time, cannot be realized by the human mind. And so the Lord, in the fullness of time, was born of a virgin, and bore the name Immanuel "God with us". More than once He revealed that He was the "I AM" of Exod. iii., but He usually condescended to the conditions imposed by our human limitations and associated the unconditioned I AM with some other title. To us He is not only the "I AM" but we also read:--

"I am the good shepherd."
"I am the door."
"I am the bread of life."
"I am the way."
"I am the light of the world."

These things Philosophy could never have discovered. As we have said so many times already, God's gracious solution of life's enigma is found in the personal Christ.

Returning to Exod. iii., we find that the Lord modifies His original title:--

> "The Lord God of your father . . . . . hath sent me unto you: this is My Name unto the age, and this is My memorial unto all generations" (Exod. iii. 15).

The timeless "I AM" is replaced by a name that is "unto the age". The Infinite condescends to the limitations of men.

The word "Lord" here is the name "Jehovah", which is made up of parts of the verb "to be". Its composition is unfolded in Rev. i.: "Grace be unto you . . . . . from Him which is, and which was, and which is to come" (Rev. i. 4).

The title "Jehovah" is further explained in Gen. xxi. 33, where the words "The Lord, the everlasting God" are in the Hebrew, Jehovah, El Olam—"Jehovah, God of the age".

It is simple to believe that God is omnipotent, omniscient, omnipresent, and many other high and wonderful things, but it is the glorious peculiarity of the Christian revelation that it turns our worshipping gaze to a lowly cradle, a virgin's Son, a crucified Redeemer. These things are utterly beyond the power of human wisdom to discover.

The philosophy that denied the pulse of life and the joy and sorrow of a teeming creation, carried within itself its own death sentence, and came to an end with the teaching of Zeno. It would serve no useful purpose to occupy space and time in dealing with his empty dialectics. Some readers may know how, in order to disprove the reality of "things seen", he invented the problem of Achilles and the Tortoise, and sought to disprove the reality of motion. Such jugglings as these led at length to skepticism and sophistry, and failed altogether to meet either the cry of the living, or the dreadful need of the dead. Any attempt to discover God apart from Christ is doomed to failure.

To the despised and afflicted captives in Egypt, a revelation was given (Exod. iii. 14, 15) that would have provided a complete answer to the quest of a generation of philosophers. And yet there will probably be some believers, who will consider that the few minutes required to read and weigh over this simple article are almost a waste of time. May we never need to learn the value of the Word of God by being compelled to do without its light and teaching.

#10. A world of change, without Him, Who changes not. The philosophy of Heraclitus.
pp. 132 - 134

Human wisdom, in its brief course from Thales to Zeno, had entered in mist and darkness. God had been shorn of every personal attribute, and the world had been whittled away into illusion. Without being uncharitable, we feel that across the labours of these wise men might be written the words: "The fool hath said in his heart, There is no god." A reaction was inevitable, and found expression in the teaching of Heraclitus (B.C.535-475).

In the philosophy of Heraclitus, we find the pendulum swinging to the other extreme. He denies the permanent and affirms the changeable. The key-word of his philosophy is "becoming"—a word of great importance in the first chapter of John's Gospel, where we read, if we translate literally: "All things through Him became, and without Him not one thing became that did become" (John i. 3). Heraclitus affirmed the fact of the changing world, but only dimly realized Him "through Whom" it became, and "without Whom" it could not exist. In the fragments of his writings we read:--

> "The Logos existeth from all time, yet mankind are unaware of it, both before they hear it, and while they listen to it."

This a remarkable anticipation of John i. 1-5, and enables us to perceived that, while the Jews had the privilege of the Law and the Prophets, the Greeks, in the interval of Israel's rejection, were being used to prepare the way for the wisdom of God in Christ. We hope to give the place of the Logos more definite consideration later.

Centuries before Heraclitus, Solomon, King of Israel, had surveyed the world and observed its incessant change.

> "Into the same river no man can enter twice, ever it disperses and collects itself again" (Heraclitus).
> "All rivers run into the sea, yet the sea is not full; unto the place from whence the rivers come, thither they return again. All things are full of labour: man cannot utter it: the eye is not satisfied with seeing nor the ear with hearing" (Eccles. i. 7, 8).

As part of the revolt against the teaching of the Eleatic school, Heraclitus asserted that we do not become cognizant of "becoming" or "change" by the exercise of reason, but by the evidence of the senses. Dialetic methods—the methods of formal reasoning as opposed to experiment and observation—were therefore inadmissible. Ecclesiastes, however, had tried the empirical method before him, and has left on record the result: "The eye is not satisfied with seeing, nor the ear with hearing." Heraclitus, however, in spite of his insistence upon the senses as opposed to formal reasoning, had to confess that the ears and the eyes were capable of deception, referring probably to the idea that what appears to the senses solid and unchanging is in reality as surely passing as the swiftly flowing river. In this he anticipates modern science with its waves and electrons.

In Ecclesiastes we read:--

> "The thing that hath been, it is that which shall be; and that which is done is that which shall be done; and there is no new thing under the sun" (Eccles. i. 9).

Heraclitus speaks of fire as a principle that underlies all "change" or "becoming"; fire that for ever extinguishes itself and again rekindles, an all-consuming, all-transmuting, all-vivifying element. The two processes of extinction and ignition in this fire-power alternate, according to Heraclitus, in perpetual rotation with each other. "In stated periods the world resolves itself into primal fire, in order to re-create itself out of fire again."

One cannot avoid comparing the teaching of Heraclitus with the testimony of the apostle Peter:--

> "But the heavens and the earth, which are now, by the same word are kept in store, reserved unto fire against the day of judgment and perdition of ungodly men . . . . . The heavens being on fire shall be dissolved, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat. Nevertheless, we, according to His promise, look for new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness" (II Pet. iii. 7-13).

In Heraclitus' teaching, however, there is nothing to be looked for but a "perpetual rotation"; in Peter's teaching, there is a goal and an end in view. Moreover, the whole passage in Peter's epistle is not the development of a philosophical theory, but the fulfillment of a promise, the promise of the personal return of the Lord Jesus Christ. The passage is introduced by the words of the scoffer: "Where is the promise of His coming?" (II Pet. iii. 4).

Rotations of never-ending time in the philosophy of Heraclitus are "days" in the teaching of Peter, "the day of the Lord" and "the day of God", days intimately associated with a Person. The personal note constitutes the essential difference between all philosophy at all times, and the testimony of Scripture. The glory of the Word of God is that the fullness of the Godhead is not an abstraction, but dwells "bodily" in the Lord Jesus Christ. The Word of Life has been "seen" and "handled".

We do indeed, with Heraclitus, see a world of change, but, by the grace of God, we also see "Him Who changes not". Philosophy may turn our attention to change and decay, but God along illuminate the darkness with the light that shines in the face of Jesus Christ.

> "Thou, Lord, in the beginning hast laid the foundation of the earth; and the heavens are the work of Thine hands. They shall perish, but Thou remainest . . . . . Thou art the same . . . . . Jesus Christ, the same yesterday, and to-day, and for ever" (Heb. i. 10-12; xiii. 8).

#11. Empedocles, and the need of a Mediator.
pp. 171 - 173

Before dealing with the next step taken by human wisdom in its attempt to discover the nature of ultimate reality and the origin of force and life, let us turn to the fountain of all truth, and read once again with growing wonder the simple facts that two hundred years of intense thought, from Thales to Heraclitus, had failed to discover:--

> "In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth. And the earth became without form and void: and darkness was upon the face of the deep. And the Spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters. And God said, Let there be light; and there was light" (Gen. i. 1-3).

These are words of revealed truth that scatter the darkness of human philosophy as the rising sun scatters the mists of night.

"In the beginning" (Greek: arche).—Over and over again we come across this word in the writings of the early philosophers. What is the "first principle", the arche? According to Thales it must be water. According to Anaximander it cannot be anything so determinate as water; it must be an unbounded substance like our ether. Then comes Anaximines, who teaches that it cannot be either, but must be something rarer than water, and yet not so indeterminate as "infinity"—it must be air. Pythagoras, rejecting all three theories, discovers that number is the arche, for mathematical relations are found everywhere.

The Scripture make two definite statements concerning "the beginning" (arche) in the New Testament:--

> (1) "In the beginning was the Word . . . . . all things were made by Him" (John i. 1-3).
> (2) "These things saith the Amen, the faithful and true witness, the Beginning of the Creation of God" (Rev. iii. 14).

Philosophy missed its way because it knew nothing of the personal element that is one of the chief glories of the true Revelation of God. The beginning of the creation of God is not merely "time", but Christ Himself. When, therefore, Gen. i. 1 speaks of "the beginning", we must understand not only the beginning of time, but that all creation was created "in Christ". The problems of philosophy with regard to the apparent impossibility of absolute unconditioned Being having any point of contact with the passing and changing creation are fully answered in the Person of Christ, "the Firstborn of all creation". Later we hope to deal with this teaching more fully; at present we are still reviewing the wisdom of man.

The subject that seemed to present itself at the juncture in the history of philosophy which we have now reached was the question of the origin of movement, force, change and growth. How was it possible for the "Being" of the Eleatics to have any contact with the "Becoming" of Heraclitus? Empedocles (B.C.490-430) assumed the existence of four radical elements, fire, air, water and earth, and set beside inert matter a twofold moving force, likened by him to love and hate, or, as we should say to-day, attraction and repulsion. In this Empedocles seems to have had a glimmering of the truth revealed in Gen. i. There, the moving force is said to be "the Spirit of God", and a very definite process of division follows:--

> "God divided the light from the darkness . . . . . Let it divide the waters from the waters . . . . . Let the waters under the heaven be gathered together in one place" (Gen. i. 4-9).

Empedocles also held that the knowing subject, and the known object must be of like nature. This we shall find is a valuable truth, but we will reserve comment upon it until this review is concluded. He was also the first psychologist, and declared God to be "pure spirit without body or members". But he pursued the matter no further. How could he, or any man? He needed Christ the Mediator.

Empedocles seems to have had some idea of the principle of Gen. i. 2, for he taught that at first the four elements existed together, absolutely at one with each other, until gradually "strife" penetrated, breaking up the unity, and so the world of darkness and light, life and death, and the many opposites that belong to everyday experience came into being. The student of Scripture knows that the present world is the battle-ground of the conflict of the ages, that there is a real enemy at work and that not until strife ceases, and righteousness reigns, can true unity or peace be possible. This, however, we rejoice to know, will not be brought about by the working of elementary forces, but by love, the love of the Father, the love of the Son, and the love of the Spirit, involving Sacrifice and longsuffering beyond the understanding of the mortal mind.

There is probably not one reader of these lines whose mentality and intellectual powers surpass, or even reach, the level of these men whose findings we have attempted to analyse—yet the simplest of us all is wiser than the whole world of philosophers, if it can truly be said that "we have the mind of Christ" (I Cor. ii. 16).

#12. Chance or Intelligence? The Final Phase. Democritus and Anaxagoras.

pp. 211, 212

We observed in our last article that Empedocles endeavoured to discover some mediating force that would bring together the "Being" of the Eleatic philosophers with the "Becoming" of Heraclitus. John i. 1-3 supplies this mediating force in the Person of "The Word", Who was "with" God, Who "was" God, and through Whom all "became". This mighty truth, however, was not discoverable by human wisdom, and so we find other attempts to solve the problem.

Democritus (B.C.460) was the exponent of the atomic theory of the universe, a theory that is still held by chemists and physicists to-day. The atoms of Democritus were uncaused and eternal, and by their falling together and impinging upon one another he supposed the present universe to have been formed. No sufficient reason could be given for the marvelous fitness of things, but only "necessity", or "chance", in contrast with a final Cause. The philosophy of Democritus became, therefore, naturalistic and atheistic, and culminated in the Sophists, of whom we hope to speak later. The great failure in all the systems of philosophy that we have reviewed is that no adequate Cause can be discovered for the world as we see it, and no final goal or purpose.

In contrast with Democritus' theory of blind "chance" we have the system of Anaxagoras, who lived at the same time. Anaxagoras makes an attempt to remove the difficulty by introducing the idea of a "designing intelligence". After two hundred years of intense thought philosophy dimly perceived the possibility of that which is expressed very simply in Gen. i. 1.

Anaxagoras writes:--

> "All things were together, infinitely numerous, infinitely little; then came the nous ('mind' or 'intelligence') and set them in order."

There seems to be some vague realization here of the chaos and subsequent order of the six days' creation.

Speaking of Anaxagoras and his teaching, Aristotle says:--

> "When a man said that there was in nature, as in animals, an intelligence, which is the cause of the arrangement and order of the universe, this man alone appeared to have preserved his reason in the midst of the follies of his predecessors."

Anaxagoras, however, fails, for his "nous" is simply a "mover of matter". Socrates complains that in the hope of being brought beyond merely occasional and secondary causes up to final causes, he had applied himself to the study of Anaxagoras, but instead

"With all thy getting, get understanding" (Prov. iv. 7).

#27. Figures of Speech.
Figures involving Change: Simile, Metaphor, Hypocatastasis.
pp. 11 - 15

We pass over a number of lesser figures of speech involving change among separate words (such as Hyperbaton), and change in sentences and phrases (such as Antithesis) and come to the series of figures which affect the application of words. These constitutes a very important section of our subject.

The figures of change that affect the application rather than the position of words, are divided into a number of sub-sections:--

Those that affect the application of words as to
- / SENSE (16).
- / PERSONS (6)
- / SUBJECT (5).
- \ TIME (1).
- \ FEELING (23).
- \ ARGUMENTATION (19).

The figures in brackets at the end of each line denote the number of varieties in each section noted in Dr. Bullinger's Figures of Speech. The three figures of chief importance in this classes are Simile, Metaphor, and Hypocatastasis, and as these three figures are related as "good", "better" and "best" are related, we shall consider them together, even though we shall be obliged to occupy a little more space than usual.

SIMILE is concerned with Resemblance. Its key-words are "like", "as" and "so".
METAPHOR is concerned with Representation. Its key-words is the word "is".
HYPOCATASTASIS is concerned with Implication. There is no special key-word.

Simile differs from Comparison, for Comparison admits of dissimilitudes. It also differs from Metaphor. While Simile says "All flesh is as grass", Metaphor more boldly says "All flesh is grass". Simile also differs from Hypocatastasis, for while the latter implies resemblance, Simile actually states it. Metaphor is the language of feeling. It does not merely say that one thing is like another; it says that one thing is another. When we point to a picture and say, "This is my mother", or when we say, "We are the sheep of His pasture" we are using the figure Metaphor. The reader will realize that to refer to any figure of speech as "metaphorical language" is, therefore, rather misleading.

Hypocatastasis is derived from the Greek word meaning "substitution". The word is a compound of hupo "underneath", kata "down", and stasis "a stationing". Hence a "putting down underneath". The idea is that one of the names is given, but the other is only implied; it is "put down underneath" and left to the imagination.

If Metaphor is more forceful that Simile, Hypocatastasis is more forceful than either. Had Macduff said to Macbeth "Turn, thou man, that art like a hound out of hell", it would have been a strong expression, and yet not true to the language of passion. Had Shakespeare used the figure Metaphor instead, Macduff would have cried "Macbeth, you are a hell-hound". But neither Simile nor Metaphor are sufficient here. True to the feeling and language of a man whose wife and little ones had already suffered at the hands of Macbeth, Macduff throws aside all reserve, and uses the figure of Implication, Hypocatastasis: "Turn, hell-hound, turn."

This is the superlative degree of comparison, implying without stating the comparison.

Let us now consider a few examples of each figure.

Simile.

"He shall be like a tree planted by the rivers of water" (Psa. i. 3).
"The ungodly . . . . . are like the chaff which the wind driveth away" (Psa. i. 4).
"Ye were as sheep going astray" (I Pet. ii. 25).

These are examples of the simplest form of Simile, and require no further explanation. Sometimes, however, the figure is used rather differently, and then demands care.

"And when the people were as murmurers" (Num. xi. 1, Margin).
"Jerusalem is builded together as a city that is compact together" (Psa. cxxii. 3).

In both these cases the actual fact was true. The people were actually murmurers and Jerusalem was actually a compact city.

Sometimes the word "as" is followed by "so". A repeated alternation of this kind is found in Isa. xxiv. 2:--

"As with the people, So with the priest;
As with the servant, So with the master;
As with the maid, So with the mistress;
As with the buyer, So with the seller;
As with the lender, So with the borrower;
As with the taker of usury, So with the giver of usury to him."

Metaphor.

We must now give our attention to the more robust figure of Metaphor. Meta means "beyond" or "over", phero "to carry"; hence the idea of transference.

There is one point that should be carefully noticed here. The whole of the figure lies in the verb; the nouns remain literal and unchanged. For example, "All flesh is grass." Here the words "flesh" and "grass" remain unchanged. Both are literal. The figure resides in the verb "is", and in the statement that one is the other.

Again, there may often be an element of surprise in a Metaphor. Two quite unrelated subjects may be found to agree in some point. For example, both Christ and Satan are likened to a lion.

Let us remind ourselves of some simple Metaphors first before dealing with one or two that are more problematic.

"The Lord is my Shepherd."
"The Lord God is a Sun and Shield."
"I am the door."
"The field is the world."
"The reapers are the angels."

These statements are obvious and require no explanation. No one would be foolish enough to ask whether the Lord was actually a door, or a vine. The expression is obviously figurative. Yet there is one such figure that has caused more misery than almost anything else in the realm of religious controversy. Anyone who has read Foxe's Book of Martyrs cannot fail to have been impressed with the number of saints who were burned at the stake because they believed that the words of Christ, "This is My body" were spoken metaphorically. The Church of Rome maintained that they were to be taken literally, and upon this mistaken interpretation built its blasphemous doctrine of the Mass. As many of the martyrs affirmed, one might just as well believe that "the cup" was the "new testament". The statements, "This is My body" and "This cup is the new testament" must both be translated similarly, and both are metaphors.

We must now turn our attention to the third figure.

Hypocatastasis.

The following are examples. In each case the resemblance is implied; it is not actually stated as in the Simile and the Metaphor.

"Dogs have compassed me about" (Psa. xxii. 16).

The Psalmist does not say that his enemies were like dogs, or that they were dogs; he implies it.

Every plant which My heavenly Father hath not planted shall be rooted up" (Matt. xv. 13).
"Beware of the leaven of the Pharisees and of the Sadducees" (Matt. xvi. 6).

The context reveals that the "leaven" represented the "doctrine" of the Pharisees and Sadducees, but it would have been a cold statement of fact to have said: "The doctrine of the Pharisees is like leaven." The Lord might have said, "The doctrine of the Pharisees is leaven". That would have been stronger, but the implication of the figure Hypocatastasis is stronger still. It forced attention, and we read that the disciples "reasoned among themselves".

Space will not permit us pursue our subject further. We would draw attention in closing to the fact that an Allegory is a continuation of both Metaphor and Hypocatastasis, for in an Allegory the comparison is substituted and implied. A Parable is a continuation of the Simile.

#28. Figures of Speech.
Figures involving Change: "As to Persons."
pp. 49 - 52

We cannot, in this series, deal with all the varied Figures of Change involving sense, of which Simile, Metaphor, and Implication are the most important cases. Other examples, however, that should be included by the interested student are the following:--

PARABOLA (or PARABLE).—Comparison by continued resemblance.
PAROEMIA (or PROVERB).—A wayside saying in common use.
TYPE.—A figure of something future.
SYMBOL.—A material subject substituted for a moral or spiritual truth.
GNOME (or QUOTATION).—A subject of great importance, and partly explored in the series "The Volume of the Book"—See Volumes XXII and XXIII.
EIRONEIA (or IRONY).—An expression that conveys its opposite.
OXYMORON (or WISE-FOLLY).—A wise saying that seems foolish.
IDIOMA.—The peculiar usage of words and phrases. A vast subject, and occupying forty pages in Dr. Bullinger's work.

With this brief notice, we must leave those figures that deal with "sense", and turn to those figures of change that deal with persons. There are five cases:--

(1) PROSOPOPOEIA (or PERSONIFICATION).—Things represented as persons.
(2) ANTIPROSOPOPOEIA (or ANTI-PERSONIFICATION).—Persons represented as inanimate things.
(3) ANTHROPOPATHEIA (or CONDESCENSION).—Ascription of human attributes to God.
(4) ANTIMETATHESIS (or DIALOGUE).—A transference of speakers.
(5) ASSOCIATION (or INCLUSION).—When the writer associates himself with those whom he addresses.

Prosopopoeia is made up of the Greek words prosopon, "face" or "person", and poiein, "to make". This figure may be subdivided into six classes:--

(1) Those that use the members of the human body.
(2) Animals.
(3) Products of the earth.
(4) Inanimate things.
(5) Kingdoms, countries and states.
(6) Human actions, etc.

We will give one or two examples under each of these headings:--

(1) Human.

"When the ear heard me, then it blessed me" (Job xxix. 11).

Here the ear not only exercises its natural function of hearing, but is personified, and "blesses".

"Their tongue walketh through the earth" (Psa. lxxviii. 9).

(2) Animal.

"At the hand of every beast will I require it" (Gen. ix. 5).

If beasts are personified because of responsibility, how much more must man be held accountable.

"Ask now the beasts, and they shall teach thee" (Job xii. 7).

(3) Products of the earth.

"Ye shall count the fruit thereof as uncircumcised" (Lev. xix. 23).
"The land mourneth . . . . . the oil languisheth" (Joel i. 10).

(4) Inanimate things.

"The nakedness of the land" (Gen. xlii. 9, 12).
"I will make mine arrows drunk with blood" (Deut. xxxii. 42).

(5) Kingdoms, etc.

"The whole head is sick, and the whole heart faint" (Isa. i. 5, 6).
"Daughter of Zion . . . . . Daughter of Jerusalem" (Zech. ix. 9).

(6) Human Actions.

"Mercy and truth are met together; righteousness and peace have kissed each other" (Psa. lxxxv. 10).
"When lust hath conceived, it bringeth forth sin" (James i. 15).

Antiprosopopoeia.—Persons who are living are represented by inanimate things.

"Then said Abishai the son of Zeruiah unto the king, Why should this dead dog curse my lord the king? Let me go over, I pray thee, and take off his head" (II Sam. xvi. 9).

The figure here has a vivid intensity, although when looked at in the cold light of reason it may appear absurd to speak of a dead dog cursing at all.

Anthropopatheia is made up of the Greek words anthropos, "man", and pathos, "affection" or "feeling". The Latin name for this figure, Condescensio, is very expressive. It is indeed a condescension for the Most High God, Who is Spirit, to speak in terms of such intimacy that we can in our small measure understand Him, Whose fulness is beyond all mortal apprehension. In one sense it might be said that the Lord Jesus Christ, Who is the Word, and the Image, God manifest in the flesh, is the living example of God's gracious Condescension to poor frail mankind.

Dr. Bullinger sub-divides this figure into nineteen sections. We cannot stay to tabulate these divisions, or to give examples of each, but the passages below are fairly representative of the figure as a whole:--

> "I will guide thee with Mine eye" (Psa. xxxii. 8).
> "Let Thine ears be attentive to the voice of my supplications" (Psa. cxxx. 2).
> "At the blast of the breath of Thy nostrils" (Psa. xviii. 15).
> "Jehovah hath made bare His holy arm" (Isa. lii. 10).
> "Through the bowels of the mercy of our God" (Luke i. 78, Margin).
> "It repented Jehovah that He had made man on the earth" (Gen. vi. 6).
> "They provoked him to jealousy with strange gods" (Deut. xxxii. 16).
> "Where art thou?" "Where is Abel thy brother" (Gen. iii. 9; iv. 9).
> "And God remembered Noah" (Gen. viii. 1).
> "I even I, will utterly forget you" (Jer. xxiii. 39).
> "He that sitteth in the heavens shall laugh" (Psa. ii. 4).

"Years" and "days" are attributed to God (Psa. cii. 24; Dan. vii. 9); and weapons of war, such as bow and arrow, sword, spear, shield and chariot. The Lord is spoken of as a lamb, as a lion, and as a vine. God is spoken of as a light and a fire, as a rock, a hiding place, a "portion" and a shade. In all these and many other ways has the Lord condescended to our low estate.

The two figures that remain need not occupy much space.

Antimetathesis (or Dialogue).—A good illustration is found in Rom. iii. 1-9, where the Jew is represented as asking a series of questions, which are answered by the apostle Paul.

Association (or Inclusion).—This is a figure in which the speaker, after addressing others, turns and includes himself.

> "And you hath He quickened . . . . . among whom also we all had our conversation in times past" (Eph. ii. 1-3).

This concludes our study of the Figures of Change involving persons. We must next consider those figures that deal with subject-matter.

#29. Figures of Speech.
Figures involving Change: "Subject-Matter" and "Time".
pp. 92 - 95

We have already considered the five figures that affect the application of words with regard to persons, and must now turn our attention to the six figures that affect the application of words with regard to subject-matter. They are as follows:--

(1) Apostrophe.—A turning aside to address others.
(2) Parecbasis.—A turning aside from one subject to another.
(3) Metabasis.—A passing from one subject to another.
(4) Epanorthosis.—A recalling of what has been said.
(5) Amphidiorthosis.—A setting right of both hearer and speaker.
(6) Anachoresis.—A return to the original subject.

Those of our readers who possess Dr. Bullinger's Figures of Speech (1898 Edition) should correct a mistake that occurs in the analytical index. On page xli. Apostrophe is included in the list of figures that deal with persons; while in the body of the book it is assigned to its right place, with reference to subject-matter.

Apostrophe.—This word is derived from the Greek apo "away from", and strephein "to turn". The speaker turns away from the real auditory to address an imaginary one. Neh. iv. 4 is an example of the use of the figure in relation to God; and Psalm xxvii. 14, of its use in relation to men. I Kings xiii. 2, and Jer. xxii. 29 are examples of Apostrophe in relation to inanimate things.

Parecbasis or "Digression", is derived from the Greek para "beside", ek "out of", and basis "a stepping". As an example, we may take Gen. xxxviii. On either side of this chapter, we have the story of Joseph, the end of chapter xxxvii. coinciding with the opening of chapter xxxix.

> "And the Midianites sold him into Egypt unto Potiphar, an officer of Pharaoh's, and captain of the guard" (Gen. xxxvii. 36).

Then comes chapter xxxviii., as a digression. And chapter xxxix. opens:--

> "And Joseph was brought down to Egypt; and Potiphar, an officer of Pharaoh, captain of the guard, an Egyptian, bought him of the hands of the Ishmeelites, which had brought him down thither" (Gen. xxxix. 1).

There can be no doubt, however, as to the purpose of this digression. Joseph was submitted to a great temptation and triumphed. Judah, in rather similar circumstances, and with less temptation, failed. Both Joseph and Judah leave behind them articles of apparel or personal possessions that are used as a means of identification. In Joseph's case, his garment is used as a means of convicting him falsely; in Judah's, his pledges are used to convict him justly. Judah represents the people of God; and Joseph the Redeemer—Who, though He did no sin, was sold into bondage, was falsely accused and punished, and finally was the instrument in the hands of God for the restoration of his fallen brethren. Such is the lesson to be learnt from this "Digression".

Metabasis, or "Transition", is derived from the Greek words meta "beyond" and bainein "to step". It indicates a stepping from one thing to another. In I Cor. xii., the apostle is dealing with spiritual gifts, and in verse 31 hints that there is something more excellent. This he elaborates in his magnificent chapter xiii. concerning love.

Epanorthosis, or "Correction", is derived from the Greek epi "upon", ana "up" or "again", and orthoun "to set straight". This correction" may be of three kinds: absolute, partial, or conditional. As an example of absolute Epanorthosis, we may take Rom. xv. 4:--

> "Who art thou that judgest another man's servant? To his own master he standeth or falleth." (And then, remembering the blessed fact that the security of all the redeemed is assured, the apostle adds) "Yea, he shall be holden up: for God is able to make him stand".

As an example of partial or relative Epanorthosis, we may take Gal. ii. 20: "Nevertheless I live: yet not I, but Christ liveth in me." Or again, in Gal. iv. 9: "But now, after that ye have known God: or rather, are known of God."

For an example of the figure of conditional Epanorthosis we may turn to Gal. iii. 4: "Have ye suffered so many things in vain? If it be yet in vain."

An example of the figure Amphidiorthosis, or "Double Correction", is found in I Cor. xi. 22: "What am I to say to you? Commend you herein? No, indeed."

Anachoresis, or "Regression", is derived from the Greek ana "back", and choresis "withdraw". An example of this figure which will be of interest to all believers of the dispensation of the mystery occurs in Eph. iii.:--

> "FOR THIS CAUSE I, Paul, the prisoner of Jesus Christ for you Gentiles—
>
> (This comes a long parenthesis, in which the apostle justifies the claim made in verse 1 by revealing the truth concerning his reception of the mystery and its stewardship. He then returns to his original statement in verse 14).
> FOR THIS CAUSE I bow my knees unto the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ" (Eph. iii. 1-14).

To this list of figures dealing with subject-matter we will add the one figure that deals with "time". This is Prolepsis, or "Anticipation", from pro "before" and lambano " to take". In this figure the future is spoken of as though it were actually present. A familiar example is found in the prophetic Psalms, especially those that commence with the words "The Lord reigneth".

In our next article we hope to conclude this brief survey of the Figures of Speech used in Scripture, but would remind the reader that we shall only have been able to deal with a tithe of the complete subject.

#30. Figures of Speech.
Figures involving Change: "Feeling" and "Argumentation".
pp. 134 - 137

The figures that remain are those dealing with "Feeling" and "Argumentation". Under the heading of "Feeling", twenty-three figures are listed; and under the heading "Argumentation", nineteen. We give a few examples of each kind.

Anamnesis or "Recalling"—from the Greek ana, "again" and mineskein, "to put in mind".—An example occurs in Rom. ix. 3. According to the A.V., Paul expresses a wish in this verse that in viii. 38, 39 he is persuaded could never be fulfilled. We observe, however, that the verb "to wish" is in the imperfect tense and should be translated "I used to wish". All is then clear. The apostle recalls the time when he too acted as his fellow-countrymen were still acting, and so, instead of bitterly accusing them, he looks at them with sympathy and with tears, realizing the grace that alone has made the difference in his own attitude.

It should, perhaps, be mentioned here that many commentators do not adopt the rendering "I used to wish" given above, but adhere to the text of the A.V. For a fuller discussion of this point the reader is referred to the series on The Epistle to the Romans, No.65, which will appear in the August issue.

It would be a good thing if we all practiced the figure of Anamnesis more often. In Eph. ii. 11 we have the apostle's call to "remember"; and many a time it would be salutary for us to remember the pit from which we were taken.

Other Figures of Feeling, which we cannot now consider, deal with Blessing, Prayer, Exhortation, Wishing, Exclamation, Reprimand, Imprecation, and the like.

Erotesis or "Interrogating", from erotan, "to ask".—Dr. Bullinger draws attention to the fact that out of the 1,189 chapters of the Bible, there are only 453 which are without a question, and that there are no less than 3,298 questions. No system of sub-division seems quite adequate or complete. Many attempts have been made, but overlapping or omission seem almost inevitable. Dr. Bullinger suggests a system of 19 classes, e.g.:--

> Positive Affirmation.—"Wilt not Thou deliver my feet from falling?"
> Negative Affirmation.—"Is not the whole land before thee?"
> Affirmative Negation.—"Is anything too hard for the Lord?"

The reader will find it a fruitful exercise to attempt the classification of all the questions that occur in a single book or epistle.

Dialogismos, or "Dialogue".—The name of the figure needs no explanation. As an example, we may take Isa. lxiii. 1-6, where we have an alternation of question and answer.

A | Who is He?
B | I that speak.
A | Wherefore art Thou red?
B | I have trodden the winepress.

Aetiologia, or "Cause shown", from aitia, "a cause", and logos, "a description".—This is a most important element in argumentation, and is often introduced by the words "for" or "therefore". For example, in Rom. i. 16-18:--

"I am ready . . . . . FOR I am not ashamed . . . . .
FOR it is the power of God . . . . .
FOR therein is revealed righteousness . . . . .
FOR the wrath of God is revealed . . . . ."

The apostle Paul is the most argumentative writer in Scripture. Every occurrence of the words "for", "that", "therefore", "wherefore" is a challenge, and should be carefully noted.

Another important Figure of Argumentation is Synchoresis or "Concession", from the Greek sunchoreo, "to come together", or "agree".—The figure is used when a concession of one point is made in order to gain another. A recognition of this figure is necessary for a true understanding of the great parenthesis of Rom. i. 18 - iii. 20. The apostle's supreme object is to convict the Jew of his need of a righteousness without works, and, in order to gain his point he "fetches a wide compass" and begins with the awful sinfulness of the Gentile world (Rom. i. 18-32). Again, in Rom. ii. 17-20 he concedes the claim of the Jew as knowing the law, and being able to lead the blind, but only to give weight to the argument that follows—that the Jew, with his self-confessed advantages, was more desperately in need of righteousness than the Gentile who had no revelation of truth to guide him. The reader should be on the look-out for this figure of Concession, but should be careful not to confuse it with Epitrophe, which is a figure of Admission. When a point is "conceded" we do not "admit" that we are wrong.

The figure Prolepsis or "Anticipation", which we considered at the end of our last article must be considered again here. When it deals with Argumentation, it anticipates the argument that it sees is being formulated. The figure has two forms, "Closed" and "Open". In the Closed Prolepsis, we have the anticipated objection merely stated but not answered. In the Open Prolepsis, the anticipated objection is both stated and answered.

First the Closed form: "I say then, Hath God cast away His people?" (Rom. xi. 1).

Words of Comfort.

#1. Suffering is but for a season (I Pet. i. 6).
pp. 181, 182

While we rejoice in the glorious revelation of God's love that teaches us concerning the fullness of Christ and our acceptance in Him, and while we may be persuaded that neither death nor life shall be able to separate us from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord, there are times when circumstances are such that even words of comfort are not despised, but, rather, eagerly received. In the general body of our witness the reader must expect to find much that will be the strong meat of the Word, but in these smaller articles we seek to pass on those words of comfort that are found scattered throughout the pages of Scripture and which are the preserve of no one particular dispensation.

In his epistles the apostle Peter has much to say of suffering, and while some of his statements have particular reference to "the dispersion scattered abroad", there are also some which constitute mitigation of misery, palliatives in persecution, balm in Gilead, available for every one of the redeemed, whatever may be his hope and calling. The first word of comfort that Peter gives is found in I Pet. i. 6 where he says:

> "Though now for a season, if need be, ye are in heaviness through manifold temptations."

For a season.—What a difference it makes to us in sorrow or distress to be able to look beyond the present darkness, to the future dawn that we know must come. Manifold as temptations may be, they are limited, they are "but for a season". The R.V. translates the passage: "For a little while"; Weymouth gives: "For a short time", and Moffatt: "For the passing moment". Primarily the word means "few" as contrasted with "many". It is used of number, "Few there be that find it" (Matt. vii. 14); of place, "A little farther thence" (Mark i. 19); of time, "It is even a vapour, that appeareth for a little time, and then vanisheth away" (James iv. 14); of quantity, "Use a little wine" (I Tim. v. 23); and of magnitude, "No small stir" (Acts xii. 18).

It is evident that the Spirit of God would minister comfort to all that are in distress for Christ's sake, by drawing their attention to its comparative brevity. We say "comparative brevity" advisedly, for we all know that some hours of our experience have seemed like centuries, and we do well to let this relative element work for good as well as for ill. Look at the two points of view, and their effect upon mind and heart, that dominate the words that follow. One child of God under the pressure of his suffering cries out:

> I see no hope of alleviation, the long lone road stretches out in front of me, on and on to the utmost limit of human endurance. I am doomed to suffer for the remainder of my life.

while the language of another who, despite his suffering, retains a sense of perspective, is:

> I see no hope of alleviation in this life, but although the flesh is weak and the time sometimes seems long, what is the longest human span down here, to the endless ages of glory that await me. Even though weeping endure for the night, and for the whole night, joy cometh in the morning.

The burden of both is that their suffering is for life. But one says: "I must suffer all my life", the other says "Never mind, it is only for a life-time"; the same span of years in each case, but what a different point of view! Which point of view is ours? There is no doubt as to which is the Scriptural one. The apostle Paul, who knew perhaps more of what suffering meant than any follower of Christ since his day, said:

> "For our light affliction, which is but for a moment, worketh for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory" (II Cor. iv. 17).

So, also, Peter. Using the same word as is found in I Pet. i. 6, he says:

> "But the God of all grace, Who hath called us unto His eternal glory by Christ Jesus, after that ye have suffered A WHILE, make you perfect, stablish, strengthen, settle you" (I Pet. v. 10).

Let us, fellow pilgrim appropriate this word of comfort. Manifold temptations are but for "a moment"; suffering is but for "a while". "Joy", however, "cometh in the morning".

#2. Suffering is for a Reason (I Pet. i. 6).
pp. 221, 222

Our first "word of comfort" was the fact expressed by Peter in I Pet. i. 6 and v. 10, that temptation and suffering are but for a season. In the same verse in chapter i. we may discover another source of comfort, for the apostle writes:

> "Though now for a season, IF NEED BE, ye are in heaviness through manifold temptations" (I Pet. i. 6).

Not only are sufferings limited, but they have a "need be". It must surely minister comfort to any in distress to be assured that however strange the affliction may seem, it is for a season, and it is for a reason. The "need be" may have no direct reference to ourselves. It does not follow that every affliction is a chastisement. We are to apt to take the attitude of Job's friends, or that of the disciples when they said: "Master, who did sin, this man or his parents, that he was born blind?" and leave too little margin for the Lord's reply: "Jesus answered, Neither hath this man sinned, nor his parents: but that the works of God should be made manifest in him" (John ix. 2, 3).

Let the afflicted believer take comfort from the reference to the Lord Jesus Himself in Luke xxiv. 46, where the same word is used:

> "Thus it is written, and thus it behoved Christ to suffer" (Luke xxiv. 46).

And in Acts xvii. we read:

> "Christ must needs have suffered" (Acts xvii. 3).

Such a "need be" was true also of the apostle Paul:

> "He is a chosen vessel unto Me, to bear My name before the Gentiles . . . . . I will shew him how great things he must (it behoveth, it is needful) suffer for My name's sake" (Acts ix. 15, 16).

In Acts xiv. 22, the writer, instead of continuing in narrative form and telling us in his own way what Paul said, departs from this form to give a quotation, so important does he consider the message to be:

> "And when they had preached the gospel to that city . . . . . they returned . . . . . confirming the souls of the disciples, and exhorting them to continue in the faith, and that we must through much tribulation enter into the kingdom of God" (Acts xiv. 21, 22).

Take as an example the "need be" realized by the apostle Paul concerning himself. He had some dreadful affliction that he called "a thorn, or stake, in the flesh", "a messenger of Satan sent to buffet me". Three times he besought the Lord that this affliction might leave him, and then he learned the "need be". It was apparently necessary for him to have this continual thorn in the flesh, lest he should be unduly exalted by the fact that so many wonderful revelations had been given to him. Spiritual pride is far worse than any "messenger of Satan" can ever be. It was for Paul's good that the thorn remained. Moreover, it was needful for Paul to have continual and increasing experimental acquaintance with the main theme of his own doctrine, namely, the all-sufficiency of grace and the utter inability of self. It was necessary for him to realize increasingly the fact that while the Lord's strength is exhibited in deliverance, it is perfected in our endurance, and the blessed fact that the words "if need be" and "for Christ's sake" may be synonymous.

> "And He said unto me, My grace is sufficient for thee; for My strength is made perfect in weakness. Most gladly therefore will I rather glory in my infirmities, that the power of Christ may rest upon me: Therefore I take pleasure in infirmities, in reproaches, in necessities, in persecutions, in distresses for Christ's sake; for when I am weak, then am I strong" (II Cor. xii. 9-10).

God does not afflict His children without reason. If we can be assured, as we may, that the unpleasant experiences of this life are necessary, either for our own discipline and correction, as an example to others, or for the working out of the great purpose of God, surely this will illuminate the darkness, and turn our weeping to joy—even as the apostle could turn from beseeching that his troubles might go, to taking pleasure in them, for, he says, “When I am weak, then am I strong”.

“For a season”, and “if need be”—let us “comfort one another with these words”.

Psalm xlix.-- What does it say here is impossible for a man to do for his brother? Who can do this? What is it that God redeems and from what power?

Galatians iii. 1-14 and iv. 1-7.--

(1) Why is redemption necessary for all under law? (See iii. 10 and 13).

(2) Why did the Lord Jesus die upon a “tree” or cross?

Verses to memorize (one each week):

Rom. iii. 24; Eph. i. 7; Exod. vi. 6; Psa. xlix. 6-7; Gal. iii. 13.

Weekly Bible Readings for June, 1937.
Subject: Faith.
p. 120

June 6th. Romans x. Faith cometh by hearing.	Note the questions to verses 14 and 15; "Report" (16) = The thing you hear; "Believe" (in Isa. liii. 1) is "Say Amen to". Faith and the Word (II Tim. iii. 15).
June 13th. Ephesians ii. 1-10. Faith links grace and works.	The word "that" in verse 8 does not refer to "faith", but to the whole scheme of salvation. "Faith" leads to "Works"—Not of works . . . . . His workmanship . . . . . unto good works.
June 20th. Hebrews xi. 1-31. Faith the title deeds.	"Substance." This word has recently been discovered among ancient documents and means "title deeds". Abraham's tent = title deeds; Abraham's city = thing hoped for. Note seven examples in 4-11 and seven examples in 17-31.
June 27th. Habakkuk i. 1-4; ii. 1-4; iii. 17-19. The Just shall live By faith.	Habakkuk's test. "How long shall I cry" (i. 2). Habakkuk's trust. "Though it tarry, wait" (ii. 3). Habakkuk's triumph. "Yet I will rejoice" (iii. 18).

"Search and See" Section.

Romans x.-- (1) How does faith come?
(2) How is confessing the Lord related to believing?
(3) What is the result of faith?

Ephesians ii. 1-10-- (1) Can salvation by grace through faith be earned?
(2) What is it that we cannot do in order to be saved and yet we should do after we are saved?

Hebrews xi. 1-31-- (1) In what way is faith the "substance" of things hoped for?
(2) Can you give another meaning for the words "By faith" which come in connection with the people in this chapter?
(3) What did this faith do for them and what will it do for us?

Habakkuk i., ii., iii.-- (1) Is prayer always answered at once? (i.).
(2) What are we to do in (ii.), and what will help us to do this?
(3) If we have faith in the Lord, what can we do although things go wrong around us? (iii.).

Verses to memorize (one each week):
Rom. x. 17; Eph. ii. 8; Heb. xi. 1; Hab. ii. 3.

Weekly Bible Readings for July, 1937.
Subject: "Children of God."
p. 140

July 4th. John i. 1-18. Children of God.	"Received . . . . . believed" (11, 12). Power = the right or authority. Sons here = children, not full grown sons (I John iii. 1, 3, also children).
July 11th. Romans viii. 1-17. If children then heirs.	Sons instead of slaves (15). No slave was permitted to use the word Abba. Every child of God is an heir (17). Suffering for Christ is rewarded by "joint-heirship".
July 18th. Hebrews ii. 5-18. Children . . . . . He . . . . . the same.	Sons (10), Brethren (11). Children (13, 14). Not angels (5), (7, 9), (16). "All of one" (11, 14).
July 25th. Isaiah xi. A little child shall lead them.	The child should be taught some of the characteristics of the future kingdom on earth though blessed in another sphere.

"Search and See" Section.

John i. 1-18.-- (1) What does the word "sons" mean in verse 12 and the word "power?
(2) How can we become "children of God"?

Romans viii. 1-17-- (1) What do we receive when we are no longer in "bondage"?
(2) What do we become if children of God, and how can we be "joint-heirs" with Christ?

Hebrews ii. 5-18.-- (1) What does Christ call those who are sanctified (verses 11 and 13)?
(2) How did Christ make Himself like "the children", and what did He do for them?

Isaiah xi.-- In what way does this make you think of the Garden of Eden?

Write out from memory John i. 12.

Weekly Bible Readings for August, 1937.
Subject: "Holidays."

August 1st. Mark vi. 1-31. Rest awhile.	Mark's Gospel represents the "Servant" of the Lord. It has no genealogy, but begins and ends with service (Mk. i. 14, xvi. 20). The invitation of verse 31 should be read with that of Matt. xi. 28-30.
August 8th. Nehemiah viii. A Real Holiday.	The occasion of this "holy day" (10) was the finding of the law, and its reading and explanation to the people (8). "Eat the fat, drink the sweet, send portions, make great mirth" (10, 12).
August 15th. John xxi. The Sea Shore.	The disciples and the Lord on the sea shore. His provision (5, 6, 9). Proof of His resurrection (14). What He said to Peter on the sea shore (15).
August 22nd. Matthew vii. The Sand Castle.	After the fun of building a sand castle comes the consciousness that the incoming tide will leave not a trace. The rocks, however, will be there next morning (24-27).
August 29th. John vi. 1-27. A Meal in the Open.	Mark vi. 39 notes the green grass, so giving an idea of the time of year. The disciples "gathered up the fragments", and no Christian will spoil the country with "litter". Daily bread is a symbol of the gift of life (27).

"Search and See" Section.

Mark vi. 1-31.-- (1) What did Christ tell his disciples to do besides go out and work for Him?
(2) Why was it necessary to "rest a while"?
(3) How can we find rest?

Nehemiah viii.-- (1) Why did the people keep this day as a "holy day"?
(2) What was the feeling among them all at this time?

John xxi.-- (1) What happened when Jesus Christ appeared on the sea-shore?
(2) John ii. is the first sign; John xxi. is the last. Show where they are alike.

Matthew vii.-- What is the most important part of the house? What does a wise man do?

John vi. 1-27.-- (1) How much bread did Philip reckon, and how much did Christ use?
(2) What is the difference between the two kinds of meat in verse 27?

Weekly Bible Readings for September, 1937.
Subject: "School."
p. 180

September 5th. Gal. iii. 15-29. THE SCHOOLMASTER.	The thought to follow out is the place of the law. The law cannot alter previous promise (17). The law was "added" (19). The law cannot give life (21). The law acted as a Schoolmaster until Christ came, but ceases after faith is come (24, 25).
September 12th. II Timothy i. THE TEACHER OF THE GENTILES.	Point out that the word "doctrine" (iii. 16, iv. 3) means "teaching". Compare II Tim. i. 11 with I Tim. ii. 7. Teachers were included in special gifts to the Church (Eph. iv.11).
September 19th. Isaiah l. THE LEARNER.	In verse 4 "learned" means a "learner". Note that in order to "speak" one must "hear". Note the four references to the "Lord God". He gives (4), opens (5), helps (7 and 9). Isaiah speaks of Christ. Let us "learn of Him".
September 26th. II Timothy ii. STUDY.	The prime object of study: "approved unto God". The character of the student: an unashamed "workman". The method of this study: "right division" (15).

Verses to memorize (one each week):
Gal. iii. 24, 25; II Tim. i. 13; Isa. l. 4; II Tim. ii. 15.

"Search and See" Section.

Galatians iii. 15-29.-- (1) When did the law cease to be a "schoolmaster"?
(2) What did Christ give which the law could not?
(3) What did the law do (verse 24)?

II Timothy i.-- (1) Who is the teacher in verse 11 and who did he teach?
(2) What is "the form of sound words"? The answer is in verse 13.

Isaiah l.-- (1) What will God do for us if we are willing to learn (verses 4, 5, 7, and 9)?
(2) What can we do when God has given us the "tongue of the learned"?
(3) What (in your own words) does a "word in season to him that is weary" mean?

II Timothy ii.-- (1) What do you say the word "study" means in verse 15?
(2) What are the three things we are told to study especially?

Weekly Bible Readings for October, 1937.
Subject: "I am."
p. 200

October 3rd. John vi. 27-51. I AM the Bread of Life.	"This is the work of God" (29) refers to the miracle of the feeding of the 5000. The request, "What sign showest Thou . . . . . Thee", springs from it. This leads to the type of the Manna, and the fact that God, not Moses, gave it to the fathers.
October 10th. John ix. I AM the Light of the World.	Note "sent" (7). Christ "The Sent One" (see ix. 24, v. 24, xi. 42, xvii. 3, 21, etc.). Note the growth of the blind man's faith: a) "A man called Jesus" (11). b) "He is a prophet" (17). c) "Lord, I believe" (38). Can I say "One thing I know?" (25).
October 17th. John x. 1-18. I AM the Good Shepherd.	Note "Cast out" (ix. 34) same words as "putteth forth" (x. 4). No need to fear man. He "gives", "lays down" His life (x. 11, 15, 17, 18). So preach the cross as to leave room for the words, "No man taketh it from Me" (18). The "other sheep" are around us to day (16). Not of Israel's fold
October 24th. John xi. 1-46. I AM the Resurrection and the Life.	Martha thought not only of the "last day" (24). "Is living and believing" at the second coming?" (26; see I Cor. xv. 51). Note how belief in resurrection power leads to full faith in Christ (xi. 27).
October 31st. John xiv. I AM the Way.	The wording of verse 6 necessitates in English, the following, "I am the true and living Way". "No man . . . . .but by Me" (see also x. 9). "Another" Comforter indicates that Christ also is one. The word "Comforter" is "Advocate" in I John ii. 1.

Verses to memorize (one each week):
John xi. 35; John viii. 12; John x. 11; John xi. 25; John xiv. 6.

"Search and See" Section.

John vi. 27-51.-- (1) What O.T. "type" is referred to here?
(2) What are the difference between the "type" and Christ? (49-51).

John ix.-- (1) What did the man do? (7).
(2) What did he know? (24-25).
(3) What did he believe? (35-38).

John x. 1-18.-- (1) What are the differences between the Good Shepherd and the hireling?
(2) What did the Good Shepherd do for us? (11, 15).
(3) Does the Shepherd drive His sheep?

John xi. 1-46.-- (1) What does it mean by "though he were dead yet shall he live"?
(2) What did Martha say? (27).
(3) What is connected with resurrection? (40).

John xiv.-- (1) What kind of way is Christ?
(2) To Whom does this way lead us?
(3) Why did Christ tell the disciples to rejoice? (28 and 2-3).

Weekly Bible Readings for November, 1937.
Subject: "Peace."
p. 220

November 7th. Rom. v. 1-11. PEACE WITH GOD.	Note, the basis is a fact not a feeling. "Being . . . . . we have" (1). Justified = declared righteous. See "Righteousness and Peace" (Isa. xxxii. 17; Psa. lxxxv. 10). No peace, where no righteousness (Isa. lvii. 21).
November 14th. Philippians iv. PEACE OF GOD.	"Moderation" (5) = "yieldingness"; Not holding on to our "rights." "Careful." "Nothing . . . . . everything" (6). "Shall keep" (7) = keep, as a garrison of soldiers. "The God of peace" (9).
November 21st. John xx. THE BASIS OF PEACE.	"Jesus saith . . . . . He showed . . . . . hands . . . . . side" (19, 20). Thomas had not the peace (25). So again "He said . . . . . hands . . . . . side." Result; "My Lord and my God" (28).
November 28th. Ephesians ii. 11-22. THE BOND OF PEACE.	The middle wall stood in the courts of the temple and divided Jew and Gentile. "The both" are now "one" and this is "the bond of peace" which binds the "unity of the Spirit:" (Eph. iv. 3, 13).

Verses to memorize (one each week):
Rom. v. 1; Phil. iv. 7; John xx. 19; Eph. ii. 14.

"Search and See" Section.

Romans v. 1-11.-- (1) What must there be before we can have peace?
(2) With whom do we have peace and how? (verse 1)

Philippians iv.-- (1) Put in your own words what the "peace of God" is like (verse 7).
(2) How can we have peace? (verses 6, 7).

John xx.-- (1) When Christ said "Peace be unto you", what did He show them and why?
(2) Why did Thomas refuse to believe the disciples?
(3) What title did he give Christ when he did believe?

Ephesians ii. 11-22.-- (1) Before Christ made this peace what was the Gentile called? (12).
(2) In verse 16-18 what two words tell us that we are at peace?

Weekly Bible Readings for December, 1937.
Subject: "Gifts."
p. 240

December 5th. John iii. GOD SO LOVED . . . . . THAT HE GAVE.	"As Moses" (14). The brazen serpent a type. Point out the acrostic in John iii. 16. God so loved the world that He gave His Only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in Him should not Perish, but have Everlasting Life.
December 12th. Galatians ii. THE SON OF GOD LOVED . . . . . GAVE.	Verses 19 and 20 are Paul's personal testimony as to why he had finished with all attempts to save, sanctify or justify himself. (If pressure is brought to bear upon your children to be "christened" etc., etc., use this passage to expose its futility). "Me . . . . . me", "I am . . . . . yet not I" (20).
December 19th. Romans vi. THE GIFT OF GOD.	Confessedly difficult chapter, but you will be surprised how young people understand. Verse 23, Wages earned, see Rom. iv. 4—Death. Gift unearned, see Eph. ii. 8.
December 26th. II Corinthians ix. THE UNSPEAKABLE GIFT.	Note the figure of "sowing" (6). Give with the heart and cheerfully (7). Unlimited sufficiency to draw on (8). All christian giving but a faint reflection of God's unspeakable gift.

Verses to memorize (one each week):
John iii. 16; Gal. ii. 16; Rom. vi. 23; II Cor. ix. 15.

"Search and See" Section.

John iii.--
(1) Why was a brazen serpent lifted up?
(2) Why is Christ compared with this?
(3) What was the reason for God's wonderful gift? (verse 16).

Galatians ii.--
(1) John iii. says 'world': What does Paul say?
(2) John iii. says 'everlasting life': What kind of life did Paul speak of?
(3) John iii. says 'God loved and gave': What does Gal. ii. 20 say?

Romans vi.--
(1) What is the difference between 'wages' and 'gift'?
(2) Can we earn eternal life?
(3) Through whom does God's gift come?

II Corinthians ix.--
(1) What is an 'unspeakable' gift!
(2) How are we to give and why? (verse 7)
(3) Write any verse you know that speaks of God's gift.

U.K.

DEAR FELLOW-MEMBERS,

While the sphere of our blessings is “where Christ sitteth on the right hand of God”, we are reminded continually that we still walk through the wilderness of this world, and it would be natural at this time to emphasize such words as “crisis”, “war”, “depression” and the like. We have, however, the exhortation to “set our minds on things above”, even as believers in another calling were exhorted in similar circumstances to “lift up their heads”.

Without therefore being unmindful of the signs of the times, we still seek to fulfil the ministry that we have received, namely, “to make all men see” (so far as it lies within our power) “What is the dispensation of the mystery”, leaving to others the liberty and responsibility of dealing with matters which, though important, do not come within the scope of this magazine.

We acknowledge gratefully the fellowship of many in making this ministry possible, and look forward to another year of testimony, confident that grace will still prove “all-sufficient”.

Yours “looking for that blessed hope”.

The Use of Ab ("Father") in the O.T.
p. 142

Ab enters into the composition of a number of names in the Hebrew Bible, such as *Ab*ner, *Ab*igail, *Ab*raham, etc. The Syro-Arabian languages demand that such names be translated as Abner, father of light, Abigail, father of joy, etc. It is only because we fail to appreciate the use of the word "father" in the Hebrew, that we find any difficulty in the thought that a woman is called the "father of joy".

It is a common thing among the Syro-Arabic speaking people to use the word "father" in the sense of source or cause, and in a figurative way. For example, Milk is called "the father of white". If we refer to Gen. iv. 20, 21 we find that Jabal, one of the line of Cain, is said to be "the father of such as dwell in tents, and of such as have cattle". No one, however, believes that Abraham was of the line of Cain. Again, Jubal is said to be "the father of all such as handle the harp and organ", yet no one believes that David was of the line of Cain.

A passage that needs care in handling is Isa. ix. 6:

> "Unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given . . . . . His name shall be . . . . . the everlasting Father, the Prince of Peace."

There is no confusion in this passage between the person of the Father and the Son. Rotherham's translation reads "Father of futurity". The word Ad is translated eternity, ever, everlasting, evermore, old, and perpetually. Isa. ix. 6 reveals that time, the ages, all futurity are in the hands of the Lord Jesus Christ, and assures us that inasmuch as the government is upon His shoulder, He will bring the purpose of the ages to a glorious consummation.

The Acts of the Apostles.

#25. The First Missionary Journey (xiii. - xvi. 5). The Light to lighten the Gentiles, and the Opened Door (xiii. - xiv. 28).

pp. 34 - 39

The Book of the Acts is so full of interesting subject-matter that one has continually to recall the prime object of these studies, lest the unfolding purposes of grace which it describes should be obscured by the wealth of archæological and other interests. Much, for example, that could be said about Antioch, Lystra, and the cities of Galatia visited by Paul on this momentous journey must be omitted here and left for the interested reader to discover for himself. One point, however, we will mention in passing. In the previous sentence we have used the term "Galatia", and this may cause some readers to wonder whether a mistake has been made. Up till recently, the Galatia visited by Paul was considered to be the kingdom of that name, shown on maps of Asia Minor, and lying much further North than Antioch. Sir William Ramsay has, however, established from monumental inscriptions and ancient writings that the Roman Province of Galatia extended further South and included the cities of Antioch, Iconium, Lystra and Derbe. We have given the evidence for this in "The Apostle of the Reconciliation". All we can do here is to give two maps: the first from Dr. Kitto's Cyclopædia of 1847, and the second from Ramsay's "Historical Commentary on the Epistle to the Galatians" of recent date. The latter shows the political divisions of Asia Minor in A.D.40-63.

- - - I l l u s t r a t i o n - - -
(BE-XXVIII.35).

Leaving this aspect of our subject, we turn now to the passage itself to seek to understand its message. What distinctive contribution does it make to our understanding of God's purposes? In the preceding article, we found that Acts xiii. 16-41 formed a complete member, so that we are left with the remainder of chapter xiii., and the whole of chapter xiv. to complete the record of the first missionary journey. Before attempting to go into detail, it will be advisable to look at the passage as a whole and to discover its scope by determining its structure. We observe that in Acts xiii. 42-51 we are still at Antioch of Pisidia, while in Acts xiv. 26 we are back again in Antioch of Syria. In the former, we read the prophetic words: "A Light to lighten the Gentiles"; and in the latter, the dispensationally important words: "A door of faith opened unto the Gentiles."

Following out the places visited by the apostles, we obtain the following structure:

Acts xiii. 42 - xiv. 28.

A | xiii. 42-51. ANTIOCH (In Pisidia).—The Light to lighten the Gentiles.
B | xiii. 51 - xiv. 5. ICONIUM.—Jews and Greeks believe. Threat to stone.
C | xiv. 6-20. LYSTRA.—The miracles and the witness against idolatry.
D | xiv. 20-21. DERBE.—Many taught.
C | xiv. 21. LYSTRA.—The return journey.
B | xiv. 21. ICONIUM.—The return journey.
A | xiv. 21-23. ANTIOCH.—Confirming and commending.
A1 | xiv. 24. PISIDIA.—Passed throughout.
B1 | xiv. 24. PAMPHYLIA.—They came to.
C1 | xiv. 25. PERGA.—The word preached.
D1 | xiv. 25-26. ATTALIA.—From thence they sailed.
A | xiv. 26-28. ANTIOCH (In Syria).—The door of faith unto the Gentiles.

In Acts xiii. 42: "When the Jews were gone out" we have an anticipation of Acts xxviii., where "the Jews departed" and the door of faith was closed to Israel, until the fullness of the Gentiles be come in. As Israel's door begins to swing to, the door for the Gentile swings open. Again, in Acts xiii. 43, the "congregation (synagogue) breaks up", while in Acts xiv. 27 we read: "And when they had gathered (sunagagontes) the church together", suggesting that the synagogue of the Jews was about to give place to a "synagogue" of all believers.

We pass by the record of Paul's visit to Iconium without comment, except to mention that he evidently stayed there a considerable time (xiv. 3), and that, while the Roman Colony at Antioch would deal with the administration of city affairs, Iconium, as an Hellenic city, would be much more democratic. Ladies of high rank (xiii. 50) could be used by the Jews in the former, but it was the mob in the latter that brought about the apostles' expulsion.

At Lystra, we must pause for a moment, as the record becomes more detailed, and is of evident importance. For the reader to understand the action of the people in offering sacrifice to Barnabas and Paul, it is necessary to know that the ancients believed that their gods often visited the earth in human form, and more than one such visit is associated with the neighbourhood of Lystra. Dryden's translation of Ovid's Metamorphosis reads:

> "Here Jove and Hermes came, but in disguise of mortal men concealed their deities."

Jove here is Jupiter, and Hermes Mercury, these being the corresponding Greek and Latin names for the same gods. In 1909 Sir William Ramsay unearthed a statue dedicated by the Lycaonians to the two gods, Jupiter and Mercury, showing that these two gods were associated together in the cult of the neighbourhood.

It is not quite correct to speak of the "miracle" at Lystra in the singular, for there were actually two; not only the miracle of the healing of the lame man, but the miracle of the raising of Paul after being stoned and left for dead. The statement of the Acts leaves it undecided as to whether Paul actually died, as some think, or whether he was badly wounded and rendered unconscious, but the fact that he could rise up, go back to the city, and be off on his journey the next day is in any case sufficient to justify the term "miracle".

We give below the expansion of the member C | xiv. 6-20:

A | 6, 7. They preached the gospel.
B | 8-15. The miracle of the lame man. |
C | 8-10. The first Miracle. |
a | Impotent on feet.
b | Never had walked.
c | Heard Paul speak.
c | Faith to be healed.
a | Stand upright on feet.
b | He leaped and walked.
D | 11-15. Sacrifice attempted. |
d | Gods.
e | Jupiter. Mercury.
f | Sacrifice.
e | Barnabas. Paul.
d | Men.
A | 15-17. Paul and Barnabas preach.
B | 18-20. The miracle of Paul's recovery. |
D | 18. Sacrifice restrained. |
g | With these sayings.
h | Scarce restrained.
h | Not done sacrifice.
g | Unto them.
C | 19, 20. The second Miracle. |
i | Jews came thither.
j | Paul stoned.
k | Disciples.
j | Paul arose.
i | Came into the city.

The reader will no doubt remember the dispensational character of Peter's healing of the lame man, as recorded in Acts iii. and iv., and will see that the healing of the lame man by Paul is an intentional parallel. The English reader is handicapped by the fact that the words "save" and "salvation" and the verb "to heal" are sometimes translations of the Greek "sozo". In Acts iv. 9 Peter speaks of the impotent man being made "whole", and in Acts iv. 12 he uses the word "salvation". The word "whole" here is sozo, and "salvation" soteria. So, in Acts xiv. 9, when Paul perceived that the man had faith to be "healed", the word used in sozo, "saved". Isa. vi., quoted in Acts xxviii. 27, ends with the words: "I should heal them", using the ordinary word for "healing". This is followed immediately by the words:

> "Be it known therefore unto you, that the salvation (soterion) of God is sent unto the Gentiles, and that they will hear it" (Acts xxviii. 28).

The lame man of Lystra is said to have "heard" Paul speak, and his faith came by "hearing". In this respect Israel failed, and Rom. x., which gives us the text: "Faith cometh by hearing", is a sad indictment against them.

Paul's two miracles on his first missionary journey are prophetic:

(1) A Jew is blinded, upon which a Gentile (named Paul) is saved. This foreshadows the setting aside of Israel and the salvation of the Gentile as recorded in Acts xxviii.
(2) A lame Gentile is healed, the language of the account being identical with that of Peter's miracle of healing.

With reference to the parallel between Paul's miracle in Acts xiv. and Peter's miracle in Acts iii., we note that both miracles take place in the proximity of a temple, and both are followed by an outbreak of persecution. Peter is put into prison and brought before the High Priest; Paul is stoned and left for dead. Peter, and those with him, after his release, address their prayer to God, saying:

> "Lord, Thou art God, Which hast made heaven, and earth, and the sea, and all that in them is" (Acts iv. 24).

Paul, speaking to the idolatrous people of Lystra, says:

> "We preach unto you that ye shall turn from these vanities unto the living God, which made heaven, and earth, and the sea, and all things that are therein" (Acts xiv. 15).

Moreover his reference to "vanities" finds an echo in Peter's quotation concerning the heathen imagining "vain" things (Acts iv. 25), although the actual words used are not the same.

Enough has been indicated, we trust, to demonstrate the Holy Spirit's intention in this narrative, and to see its place in the outworking of God's purposes of grace. Before concluding, however, we allude to one further point, which is not actually mentioned in Acts xiv., but which, from subsequent Scriptures, is necessarily implied. It was here, in these circumstances, that Paul first became acquainted with the household of Lois, Eunice and Timothy. Paul refers to Timothy in his epistle as his own son in the faith, and in chapter xvi. we find him ready to accompany Paul on his journey. Here, therefore, must be placed the conversion of Timothy.

Writing from his last prison in II Tim. iii., Paul reminds his young successor of these early days:

> "Thou hast fully known my doctrine, manner of life, purpose, faith, longsuffering, charity, patience, persecutions, afflictions, which came unto me at Antioch, at Iconium, at Lystra: what persecutions I endured, but out of them all the Lord delivered me. Yea, and all that will live godly in Christ Jesus shall suffer persecution" (II Tim. iii. 10-12).

What memories these words would produce in the heart of Timothy! And what significance they give to the recorded summary of this early work:

> "Confirming the souls of the disciples, and exhorting them to continue in the faith, and that we must through much tribulation enter into the kingdom of God" (Acts xiv. 22).

And so at length these two men return to Antioch in Syria, whence they had been sent out, having "fulfilled" the work which they had been set apart to do. They rehearse before the Church at Antioch "all that God had done with them, and how He had opened the door of faith unto the Gentiles".

#26. The open door and the many adversaries (xv. 1-35).
pp. 79 - 83

In I Cor. xvi., written rather later than the periods covered by Acts xv., we read:

> "For a great door and effectual is opened unto me, and there are many adversaries" (I Cor. xvi. 9).

There is reason to believe that Paul is referring here to the period covered by Acts xix., and if so, we have only to read Acts xix. 23 - xx. 3 to see that he had opposition in abundance. The figure of the door is repeated in II Cor. ii. 12 and refers to the same period, though not to the same place.

In Col. iv. 3 the Apostle again uses the figure of the door:

> "Withal praying also for us, that God would open unto us a door of utterance" (or, of the word).

We have not to search far here for "the adversaries", for he immediately adds "For which I am also in bonds". It seems that wherever and whenever a door was opened for the exercise of ministry, the Apostle knew well enough that there would be adversaries. Acts xiv. ends with the blessed fact that God had opened the door of faith unto the Gentiles. Acts xv. opens with the attempt of the adversary to counteract this movement of grace, and we find the Apostle plunged into a fight, upon the issue of which, speaking humanly, hung the fate of the glorious gospel that had been entrusted to him for the Gentiles.

At the outset of our study, let us remember, even with shame if need be, that it is almost impossible for any of us, when engaged in strife and conflict, even for the most worthy ends, to be entirely free from bias. This is very evident when one studies the various interpretations of Acts xv. It would be rather a waste of time to go over these differences in detail, but there is one mistaken view to which we must refer, or suffer from a bad conscience by keeping silent. In the scheme of interpretation to which we refer, not only are the attempts to impose circumcision and law-keeping upon the Gentiles rejected as evil, but also the subsequent methods adopted out of respect for the weaker consciences of Jewish believers, which is a totally different thing. The seriousness of this point of view will be evident to any one who ponders the following explanation given on this scheme. With reference to James—who is described as the "fleshly James"—it is stated that "when he makes his decision, saying, 'Wherefore I decide', he does not consult Peter or the rest of the apostles". The reader will probably realize at once the inaccuracy of this view, for in Acts xv. 22 we read: "It pleased the apostles and elders, with the whole church, to send chosen men of their own company." If this interpretation were true what could we make of the express statement: "It seemed good to the Holy Ghost"?

Continuing our quotation, we read:

> "It is to be noted that this epistle claims that this 'burden' was placed upon the nations because 'it seems good to the Holy Spirit and to us'. It would have been more honourable for this flesh-controlled council to assume responsibility upon the Holy Spirit Whom they wholly ignored."

How many other false views of the Acts have been linked up with so-called "apostolic mistakes". Some, with wrong ideas as to the constitution of the Church, teach that the apostles made a mistake in Acts i. 6. Others find apostolic mistakes in other passages. And here, in Acts xv., not only are the apostles and elders found guilty, but Barnabas and Paul, Silas and Judas, men who were "prophets" and had hazarded their lives for the Lord, are all accused of moral cowardice and spiritual dishonesty. If these decrees were "fleshly" and not of God, how is it that we read in Acts xvi. 5: "And so were the churches established in the faith and increased in number daily?"

We have purposely refrained from naming the literature concerned, but those who have any knowledge of it will understand. We cannot help feeling saddened at such reading, but we remember that prayer is what is called for, and not censure.

Let us now come to the positive study of the Word. Before we can hope to understand the details of such a passage we must have a view of the whole, and we therefore give the structure as the next step in our exposition.

A reference to Volume XXVII, page 149 will show that the section before us is Acts xv. 1-35. At verse 36, Paul proposes to re-visit every city where he had preached, and the section relating to his "second missionary journey" begins. We have, therefore, a well-marked boundary at verse 35.

Upon examination we find that the passage falls into three pairs of corresponding sections as follows:

Acts xv. 1-35.

A | 1, 2. Antioch. The Question. Paul. Barnabas. Men of Judæa.
B | 3-5. Phenice, Samaria, Jerusalem. The Pharisees' demand.
C | 6-12. Apostles and Elders. Peter. Why put a yoke?
C | 13-21. Men and Brethren. James. Trouble not the Gentiles.
B | 22-29. Antioch, Syria, Cilicia. No such commandment.
A | 30-35. Antioch. The Answer. Paul. Barnabas. Judas and Silas.

The complete analysis of this passage would occupy considerably more than a full page of this magazine, and we shall therefore only give the above skeleton outline, and then fill in each section as it comes before us. Those who are keen students of the Word will be more than compensated for their pains, if they will take the trouble to reproduce the structure as a whole after the details have been set out.

The first member of the structure, in this epoch-making fight of faith, is comprised in the first two verses:

> "And certain men which came down from Judæa taught the brethren, and said, Except ye be circumcised after the manner of Moses, ye cannot be saved. When therefore Paul and Barnabas had no small dissension and disputation with them, they determined that Paul and Barnabas, and certain other of them, should go up to Jerusalem unto the apostles and elders about this question" (Acts xv. 1, 2).

A | 1, 2. Antioch. The Question. Paul, Barnabas, and the men of Judæa.
a | Certain men come down from Jerusalem.
b | Their teaching.
b | The dissension.
a | Paul and Barnabas go up to Jerusalem.

The glorious doctrine of justification by faith apart from legal works of any kind, had been the central feature of Paul's gospel on this wonderful journey through the cities of Galatia.

> "Be it known unto you therefore, men and brethren, that through this Man is preached unto you the forgiveness of sins: and by Him all that believe are JUSTIFIED from all things, from which ye could not be justified by the law of Moses" (Acts xiii. 38, 39).

After such a gospel had been preached it was obviously nothing less than diametric opposition for anyone to say: "Except ye be circumcised after the manner of Moses, ye cannot be saved." On such an issue compromise was utterly impossible, for essentials were at stake. When it was a matter of conscience with regard to the keeping of certain days, or of eating certain meats, Paul was most willing to meet the troubled believer more than half-way, but to suggest that the glorious doctrine of justification by faith should be dethroned from its place, and replaced by a legal ceremonial, was a call to arms that no follower of the Lord could fail to answer without shame.

"Paul and Barnabas had no small dissension and disputation with them."—Apart from the Acts, stasis, "dissension" occurs only in the Gospels and in the Epistle to the Hebrews. In the Gospels the three references relate to Barnabas, and are translated "insurrection" and "sedition", the word in each case being associated with "murder" (Mark xv. 7; Luke xiii. 19, 25). In Heb. ix. 8, the same word is translated "standing" in the passage: "While as the first tabernacle was yet standing." It is obvious, of course, that this passage has nothing to do with sedition or insurrection, but it is useful in drawing attention to the basic meaning of the word. Stasis is derived from the verb istemi, "to stand". The underlying idea is that of "making a stand", but like most things human, the word deteriorated and came to mean in most cases "uproar" (Acts xix. 40), "dissension" (Acts xxiii. 7, 10), or "sedition" (Acts xxiv. 5). We can verily believe that the Apostle would most gladly have "lived peaceably with all men" (Rom. xii. 18), but the sacred cause of truth outweighed all personal considerations, and the apostle of grace and peace earned for his faithfulness the unenviable titles:

> "A pestilent fellow, and a mover of sedition among all the Jews throughout the world, and a ringleader of the sect of the Nazarenes" (Acts xxiv. 5).

The "dissension" at Antioch was two-fold. On the part of the apostles, it arose out of their stand for the truth of the gospel, while on the part of their opponents, it was due to their subversive views in connection with the law.

The word "disputation"—suzetesis derived from zeteo, to seek—is also of mixed meaning. While every "Berean" must necessarily be a "seeker" after truth, and must certainly "question" any proposition put before him, the tendency of human nature is to abuse this attitude, and the general use of the word is in an evil sense in the Epistles. In I Timothy we read of "interminable genealogies which minister questions" (I Tim. i. 4); and of the ignorant pride that "dotes about questions" (I Tim. vi. 4). In II Timothy we read of "foolish and unlearned questions" that gender strife (II Tim. ii. 23). The Apostle could write out of a full experience when he warned Timothy of the evil tendency of these things.

To return once more to the main narrative of our passage—it soon became evident that if the questions under discussion were ever to be settled, something more authoritative must be introduced. The Apostle Paul needed no rule from Jerusalem for himself, but the Judaisers in the Church rejected his authority, and suggested that the matter should be taken to Jerusalem, thinking probably that the case would go in their favour, especially as James was known to have very strict views with regard to the law.

> "They determined that Paul and Barnabas, and certain other of them, should go up to Jerusalem unto the apostles and elders about this question" (Acts xv. 2).

When we compare the record of Acts xv. with Paul's own testimony in Gal. ii. we get the same facts presented from two different angles. Luke merely says that "certain other of them" accompanied Paul and Barnabas, but Paul tells us specifically that they were accompanied by Titus, an uncircumcised Greek believer. Luke says: "They determined that Paul and Barnabas should go up", while Paul writes: "I went up by revelation." There is, of course, no discrepancy here. A rather similar case occurs in Acts ix. 30 and xxii. 17, 18. In the earlier passage we read:

"Which when the brethren knew (i.e. that the Grecians went about to slay him) they brought him down to Cæsarea, and sent him forth to Tarsus."

If we wonder how it was that such an ardent spirit should so tamely submit, in the face of danger, to being hurried off from the scene of witness, we find a complete answer in the later passage (Acts xxii. 17, 18), together with the setting aside of Paul's objections by the Lord Himself (verses 9-21).

The apostle's going up to Jerusalem was of great importance, for it was there that two great battles were fought and won—first, with the Judaisers, who would nullify the cross of Christ by their insistence upon circumcision and the Law of Moses as essential to salvation; and then with that unbending spirit which confuses essentials and non-essentials. The Apostle who fought to the last against the imposition of the law as a means of salvation, was at the same time most willing that the susceptibilities of a weaker conscience should be respected. In this he probably disappointed the most headstrong among his followers—and, as the extracts quoted earlier in this article show, these two quite different points of view are still apt to be confused to-day.

Our next article takes us to the Council itself. Meanwhile, a reading of Gal. ii. and I Cor. viii. would be an excellent preparation of heart and mind for the next stage of our study in connection with the suggestions put forward by James (Acts xv. 13-21).

#27. The twofold Decision (xv. 3-21).
pp. 117 - 122

We do not propose to deal in this series with the interval between the decision to go up to Jerusalem and the arrival there, except in so far as to supply the details of the structure that lack of space prevented us from giving previously.

B | xv. 3-5. Phenice, Samaria, Jerusalem. The Pharisees' demand.
"It was needful to circumcise them and command them to keep the law."
c | They passed through Phenice and Samaria.
d | Declaring conversion of Gentiles.
e | The brethren.
c | They came to Jerusalem.
d | Declared all God had done.
e | The Pharisees.

Whether the deputation was met by certain of the sect of the Pharisees which believed, who said "It was needful to circumcise them, and to command them to keep the law of Moses", or whether verse 5 means that the apostles repeated the demand that had been made by these men from Judæa, is a little uncertain. The A.V. indicates the uncertainty in the margin, but it is not a matter of any vital importance. The point is that the demand emanated from these men and it was the settlement of this question that was uppermost.

The Structure (see above, page 81) emphasizes two speakers: Peter, who, to the chagrin of the sect of the Pharisees, will have no compromise over the matter of circumcision and law-keeping in relation to salvation; and James, who first whole-heartedly endorses and confirms this attitude, and then introduces the entirely new question conciliating the susceptibilities of the Jewish believer. Two questions, therefore, are before us, and "right division" is as necessary here as in the vaster issues of dispensational truth.

C | xv. 6-12. Apostles and Elders. PETER.
"Why . . . . . put a yoke upon the neck of disciples?"
f | Apostles and Elders consider the matter.
g | Much disputing.
h | Peter rose up.
i | Gentiles by my mouth should hear gospel.
j | Among us.
k | God knoweth.
l | Them and us.
m | PUT NO DIFFERENCE.
f | All multitude kept silence.
g | Give audience.
h | Barnabas and Saul.
i | Gentiles. Miracles wrought.
j | Among them.

There is no suggestion in verse 7 that the assembly at Jerusalem was dominated by either Peter or James, for there is "much disputing" before Peter stands up to speak. It should be noted that when Peter refers to Pentecost he speaks of "us" and "them", the latter referring, not to some hypothetical Gentiles on the day of Pentecost, but to the first Gentiles to be addressed by Peter as recorded in Acts x. It is true that Paul may have preached to Gentiles before Peter went to Cornelius, but even so, this would not invalidate Peter's words, for he says explicitly "God made choice among us".

The incident recorded in Acts x. has already been considered in these pages, and Peter's summary needs no exposition. He stresses the following points:

(1) God knows the heart, the inference being that the Pharisees were more concerned with externals.
(2) God gave the holy spirit to those believing Gentiles, and it is therefore impossible to teach that such cannot be saved except they be circumcised.
(3) God put no difference between us and them. How can we dare to question God?
(4) God purified their hearts by faith. What place in salvation, therefore, can rites and ceremonies have?
(5) These legal obligations had been a yoke too heavy for Israel. Was it wise, then, to put the same yoke upon the Gentiles?
(6) "We believe that through the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ we shall be saved, even as they."

Peter's argument was unanswerable. The law as a means of salvation was obsolete. The Jews themselves, who had the law by nature, were saved by grace, through faith. The emphasis on there being "no difference"—the central feature of the structure—must have rejoiced the heart of the Apostle of the Gentiles (see Rom. iii. 22; x. 12).

This noble testimony to salvation by grace coming from the leading Apostle of the Circumcision, silenced the disputants and prepared an audience for Barnabas and Paul. It should be noticed that the order in naming these apostles changes in the narrative. While they are at Antioch it is "Paul and Barnabas", but when they arrive at Jerusalem, the order is reversed. This reversed order is maintained in the actual letter drafted by the Council, but it should be noted that where Luke is recording the facts himself, he reverts to the old order (Acts xv. 22). It seems clear that Barnabas spoke first.

> "Then all the multitude kept silence, and gave audience to Barnabas and Paul, declaring what miracles and wonders God had wrought among the Gentiles by them" (Acts xv. 12).

The obvious parallel between the miracles and experiences of Peter and of Paul would not fail to make an impression. For example:

PETER.	(1)	The healing of the lame man (Acts iii., iv.).
	(2)	The conflict with the sorcerer, Simon (Acts viii. 9-24).
PAUL.	(1)	The healing of the lame man (Acts xiv.).
	(2)	The conflict with the sorcerer, Bar-Jesus (Acts xiii.).

To the Jew, confirmation by miracle would be a stronger argument than almost anything else, and it would seem, judging from the interval of silence that followed "After they had held their peace" (Acts xv. 13), that the multitude as a whole were convinced.

From Gal. ii. we gather that the Apostle, knowing only too well how easily a multitude can be swayed, and knowing that there were false brethren secretly at work, communicated the gospel which he preached among the Gentiles privately to them that were of reputation. Peter, James and John, therefore, were convinced that Paul's apostleship and gospel were of the Lord, and took their stand for the truth at the public gathering.

We must now pass on to the testimony of James, and before examining his words in detail, we give the structure of the passage.

C | xv. 13-21. Men and Brethren. James. Trouble not the Gentiles.
"My sentence is that we trouble not the Gentiles."
f | James . . . . . me.
g | Gentiles visited.
h1 | The agreement of prophecy.
h1 | The knowledge of the Lord.
f | James . . . . . my.
g | Gentiles turn to God.
h2 | Write that they abstain.
h2 | Moses is preached.

James takes up the claim made by Peter—calling him by his Hebrew name Simon—and, directing his argument to those who revered the Old Testament writings, draws attention to a passage from one of the prophets:

> "As it is written, After this I will return, and will build again the tabernacle of David, which is fallen down; and I will build again the ruins thereof and I will set it up. That the residue of men might seek after the Lord, and all the Gentiles, upon whom My name is called, saith the Lord, Who doeth these things which were known from the age" (Acts xv. 15-18).

It should be noted that James does not say "This fulfils what is written by the prophet"; he simply says "To this agree the words of the prophets". The word translated "agree" is sumphoneo, which gives us the word "symphony", and as a noun is translated "music" in Luke xv. 25.

We could therefore interpret James' meaning as follows:

> "The inclusion of the Gentile upon the same terms as the Jew is in harmony with such a passage as Amos ix. 11, 12 (which in the Septuagint Version reads as above) and it is therefore clear that the spirit in which Peter enjoins us to act now, is that in which the Lord has revealed He will act in the future. He has known these things, which He has commenced to do, since the age, and to object, or to impose restrictions, is but to tempt God as our fathers did in the wilderness, with dreadful consequences, as we all know."

The fact that James could give such hearty support to the position taken by Paul and subsequently by Peter, was a shattering blow to the Judaizing party in the Jerusalem Church. A little man might have been content with this victory and have ignored the susceptibilities of the Jewish believers. Not so, however, the apostle James. He realizes the feelings of shock and abhorrence which would almost inevitably result from the Jewish Christians coming into contact with the revolting customs of the Gentiles, and he therefore gives a double sentence:

(1) With regard to the immediate question, as to whether believing Gentiles must submit to circumcision and the law of Moses, before they can be sure of salvation, my answer is "No". "My sentence is, that we trouble not them, which from among the Gentiles are turned to God."

In the body of the letter sent to the Gentiles it is categorically stated that such teaching was a "subverting of souls" and that no such commandment had been given by the leaders at Jerusalem (Acts xv. 24).

(2) My sentence is not, however, harsh or mechanical. I am by nature and upbringing a Jew, and I know the horror that seizes the mind at the bare possibility of contact with those who have partaken of meat offered to idols, or with those who have not been particular about the question of blood. While we yield no ground with regard to justification by faith, we must not forget that we are called upon to walk in love, to remember the weaker brethren, and to be willing to yield our rights if need be. My sentence, therefore, is that we write to the Gentiles that believe "that they abstain from pollutions of idols, and from fornication, and from things strangled, and from blood" (Acts xv. 20).

Three of these items we can readily understand as being offensive to a Jewish believer, though inoffensive to a Gentile. One, however, is a grossly immoral act and cannot be classed as in the same category. The reason for its inclusion here is not that James meant for a moment to suggest that sexual immorality was a matter of indifference, but rather that, knowing how the Gentile throughout his unregenerate days looked upon this sin as of no consequence, James realized that he was likely, even after conversion, to offend by taking too lenient a view. This is brought out most vividly in I Corinthians, an epistle that deals with the application of the decrees sent from Jerusalem, and which we must examine before this study is complete.

James follows his counsel of abstinence by a reference to Moses:

> "For Moses of old time hath in every city them that preach him, being read in the synagogues every sabbath day" (Acts xv. 21).

His meaning appears to be that there was no need to fear that, by reducing the appeal to only four points, the scruples of the more rigid Jewish believer would be invaded. Moses was preached every Sabbath day in the synagogue, and the synagogue was the nursery of the Church. If we will but put ourselves in the position of the early Church we shall see the wisdom of this decision. The coming into the synagogue of men whose practices filled the body of the people with horror, would be a serious hindrance to the advance of the gospel. It might even mean the destroying, for the sake of "meat", of one for whom Christ died. We shall see presently that Paul's spiritual application of the decrees of Jerusalem went much further than James' four items. He would not eat meat, or drink wine, or do anything that would cause his brother to stumble.

Such, then, was the two-fold decision of the Church at Jerusalem, a decision which, taking the state of affairs at that time into account, must commend itself to all who have any sympathy with the teaching of the apostle Paul. Such a state of affairs was not ideal, and could not last. It was, as the decrees put it, a question of imposing "no greater burden than these necessary things"—much in the same way as the Apostle Paul in I Cor. vii. enjoined abstinence "because of the present distress" (I Cor. vii. 26).

We must leave the consideration of the letter and of Paul's application of its principle for the next article. Meanwhile let us learn from Acts xv. to be as inflexible as a rock where vital truth is at stake, but as yielding as grace will permit, where it is a question of our "rights" and the consciences of others.

#28. The Decrees and Paul's Interpretation of their spirit (xv. 22-35).
pp. 155 - 159

The assembled church, together with the apostles and elders, agree with one accord to the appeals of Peter and James, and their decision is recorded in a letter sent by the hands of Barnabas, Paul, Silas and Judas. This letter is of intense interest, not only on account of its teaching, but also because it is the earliest church letter in existence. Let us take it out of its setting for the moment and look at it as a letter, complete in itself.

> "The apostles, and the elders, and the brethren, to the brethren which are of the Gentiles in Antioch and Syria and Cilicia, Greeting.
>
> Forasmuch as we have heard that certain which went out from us have troubled you with words, subverting your souls, saying, Ye must be circumcised and keep the law: to whom we gave no such commandment:
>
> It seemed good unto us, being assembled with one accord, to send chosen men unto you with our beloved Barnabas and Paul, men that have hazarded their lives for the name of our Lord Jesus Christ. We have sent, therefore, Judas and Silas, who shall tell you the same things by mouth.
>
> For it seemed good to the Holy Spirit, and to us, to lay upon you no greater burden than these necessary things: That ye abstain from meats offered to idols, and from blood, and from things strangled, and from fornication; from which, if ye keep yourselves, ye shall do well. Fare ye well."

Such is the letter itself. Its inter-relation with the context is best seen by expanding the structure of this section as follows:

Acts xv. 22-29.

B | xv. 22-29. Antioch, Syria and Cilicia.
"We gave no such commandment."
n1 | IT SEEMED GOOD.
o1 | To apostles, elders and whole church.
p1 | Send chosen men.
q1 | Chief men among the brethren.
r1 | Greeting. No such commandment.
n2 | IT SEEMED GOOD.
o2 | Assembled with one accord.
p2 | Send chosen men.
q2 | Men who hazarded their lives.
r2 | Tell you the same things.
n3 | IT SEEMED GOOD.
o3 | To the Holy Spirit and to us.
p3 | Lay no other burden.
q3 | That ye abstain.
r3 | Fare ye well.

Three times the words "It seemed good" occur. First, "it seemed good to the apostles and elders, and the whole church". Secondly, "it seemed good unto us, being assembled with one accord". And thirdly, "it seemed good to the Holy Spirit, and to us". To break this threefold cord, the whole church, with the apostles and elders, together with Barnabas and Paul, and Silas and Judas, as well as the Holy Spirit Himself, would have to be regarded as in the wrong. Any system of interpretation necessitating such an assumption is self-condemned.

It is certainly true that Peter acted hypocritically at Antioch, and was publicly rebuked for it by Paul (see Gal. ii.), but we are definitely told in this case that Peter was to be "blamed", and it is in no way to be compared with the solemn agreement manifested in Acts xv.

We now turn to Paul's application of these decrees, as we find it in his first Epistle to the Corinthians. In chapter v.-vii. the Apostle reproves the church with regard to fornication, while in chapters viii. and x. he deals with the question of meats offered to idols. It will obviously be profitable to consider the Apostle's own interpretation of the Jerusalem ordinances as revealed in these chapters.

It appears that the Corinthian conception of morality allowed a man to "have his father's wife", and not only so, but the offence was made a matter of boasting. The Apostle had already written to this church, commanding them not to company with men guilty of such offences, but they had misunderstood him. He takes the opportunity now of correcting the misunderstanding by saying in effect:

> "If I had meant that you were not to company with the fornicators of this world, or with the covetous, or extortioners, or with idolaters: you would need to go out of the world. What I enjoin has reference to a brother who practices any of these things—with such an one no not to eat; but I have no idea of attempting to judge the world or of setting up a code of morals for the ungodly" (I Cor. v. 9-12).

He clinches his exhortation by showing that the sin of immorality is a sin against man's own body, and that that body, if redeemed, should be regarded as a temple of the Holy Ghost (I Cor. vi. 13-20).

In I Cor. vii. the Apostle deals with the question of marriage, and explains that "for the present necessity" it would be as well for all to remain unmarried. But these statements were not to be taken as commandments for all time, nor even for all believers at that time. It was a counsel of abstinence, because the Lord's coming and the dreadful prelude of the Day of the Lord were still before the Church. With the passing of Israel a change came, and the Apostle later encouraged marriage, as we find in his prison epistles. The fact that Eph. v. sets aside I Cor. vii. does not make I Cor. vii. untrue for the time in which was written—any more than the setting aside of the decrees of Acts xv. makes Acts xv. a compromise or a mistake. Each must be judged according to the dispensation that obtained at the time. The dispensation of the Mystery had not yet dawned either in Acts xv. or I Cor. vii.

With regard, to the pollution of meat offered to idols, the Apostle agrees that, strictly speaking, "an idol is nothing in the world" (I Cor. viii. 4)—and therefore one might say, Why should I refuse good food, simply because someone who is ignorant and superstitious thinks that its having been offered to a block of wood or stone has polluted it? This is true, rejoins the Apostle in effect, but "take heed lest by any means this liberty of yours become a stumbling-block to them that are weak". The thing that must be uppermost in the mind, is not the safeguarding of the weaker brother for whom Christ died. To achieve this, the Apostle is willing to go much further than "the four necessary things" of the Jerusalem decrees. In I Cor. vii. 13 he writes:

> "If meat make my brother to offend, I will eat no flesh (even though it satisfy the most scrupulous Jew) while the world standeth, lest I make my brother to offend."

A further interpretation of the spirit of the decrees is found in chapter x.:

> "All things are lawful for me, but all things are not expedient: all things are lawful for me, but all things edify not. Let no man seek his own, but every man another's wealth. Whatsoever is sold in the shambles, that eat, asking no questions for conscience sake . . . . . but if any man say unto you, This is offered in sacrifice to idols, eat not for his sake that shewed it, and for conscience sake . . . . . conscience, I say, not thine own . . . . ." (I Cor. x. 23-29).

If we can but keep in mind those words, "Not thine own", we shall have no difficulty in understanding the principles involved in the decrees of Acts xv.

If man has failed under the law of Sinai, it is not surprising to find that he fails many times under grace. The moderate request that the Gentiles should abstain from the "four necessary things", while the Jewish believers had "Moses preached in the synagogue every Sabbath day" would lead, in time, wherever the flesh became prominent, to a line of demarcation between the churches of Judæa and those of the Gentiles. This gradually grew to become "a middle wall of partition", a division that could not be permitted in the Church of the One Body. The One Body was not, however, in view in Acts xv. Only those things known of the Lord "since the age", only those things that harmonized with the O.T. prophecies were in operation in Acts xv., and nowhere throughout the Acts is there a hint that a Jew ceased from being a Jew when he became a Christian. On the contrary, he became the better Jew, for he was believing the testimony of the law and the prophets. Even justification by faith, as preached by Paul, was to be found in the law and the prophets and was, therefore, not part of a mystery or secret purpose.

We have, therefore, in Acts xv. two vastly different themes. One is eternally true, and independent of dispensational changes. The other is relatively true, but to be set aside when that which is perfect has come. The former is doctrinal truth, the latter the practical manifestation of graciousness and love.

Returning to Acts xv., we come to the conclusion of the matter.

Acts xv. 30-35.

A | xv. 30-35. ANTIOCH. The Answer.
Paul and Barnabas, Judas and Silas.
a | Apoluo. Dismissed.
b | The epistle delivered.
c | Paraklesis. Consolation.
c | Parakaleo. Exhorted.
a | Apoluo. Dismissed.
b | Teaching and preaching.

We learn from these verses that, upon reading the letter from Jerusalem, the Gentiles "rejoiced for the consolation". The word here not only means "consolation" but also "exhortation", as can be seen in the next verse. We read further that Judas and Silas, "being prophets also themselves, exhorted the brethren . . . . . and confirmed them"; and their work now being done, they return to Jerusalem. Verse 34 is an interpolation (see Revised Text), being evidently added by some scribe because of the presence of Silas at Antioch in verse 40.

There now remain two short passages to conclude our study of the large section that we have had before us (Acts xii. 24 - xvi. 5) of which the structure is given in outline in Volume XXVII, page 149. These further passages contain one or two features that are far-reaching, both in their effects, and in the way they manifest the superintending hand of God, Who worketh all things according to the counsel of His own will, and these we must consider in our next article.

#29. Preparation for a wider sphere of ministry (xv. 36 - xvi. 5).
pp. 185 - 188

We come now to Paul's second missionary journey. Although most of the ground that was covered by Barnabas and Paul as recorded in chapters xiii. and xiv. is traversed again here, the two apostles no longer share the joys and sufferings of mutual service for, alas, as they had themselves declared at Lystra, they were men of like passions with ourselves. We are sure that the removal of Barnabas and the substitution of Silas were of God, but it is equally true that the Lord does not need the failure of man to accomplish His purposes.

Paul early exhibited that lovable trait that shines out so brightly in his epistles—an extreme solicitude for the spiritual well-being of his young converts. The untranslated de in verse 36 indicates an element of urgency, and some think that its presence implies that Paul had raised the question of revisiting the churches of Galatia earlier to Barnabas. However this may be, we find that although Barnabas is named first in the separation to the work in Acts xiii., it is Paul and not Barnabas who expresses the desire to revisit the scenes of his sufferings and of the triumphs of the Lord's grace.

In verse 37, we read that Barnabas wished to take with them his nephew "John, the one called Mark". There may have been a variety of motives for this. Barnabas was a near kinsman of John Mark. No doubt he had felt grieved to think that his nephew had turned back at the first, and rejoiced now to know that he had returned and was willing to serve. We cannot say that Barnabas was entirely free from personal motives; his intensions, like those of most of us, were probably mixed. Neither is there any reason to regard Paul's attitude as faultless. We know that Moses spake unadvisedly with his lips, and Asaph rebuked himself saying, "This is my infirmities". David, also, said "in his haste" that all men were liars. Paul himself, when he stood before the High Priest, had to confess that he had spoken words not seemly to be uttered to one in such an office. We do not attempt, therefore, to apportion the blame.

The word used to indicate Paul's decision is axioo—"Paul thought not good" (Acts xv. 38). This is the word that gives us "worthy" in Eph. iv. 1, and suggests a process of weighing, to ascertain the "worth". The word occurs again in Acts xxviii. 22, where it is translated "desire". In this passage the rulers of the Jews say in effect, We know that this sect is everywhere spoken against, but we feel the time has come for some short of investigation to be made, and having weighed the matter over, we should like to know what you think.

Throughout the N.T. record, whether in the Acts or in the epistles, we find that Paul is kind and courteous, although he can be moved to burning point where the truth is at stake. He weighs the matter over here, and decides that the claims of the gospel and the success of these early ventures of faith must not be imperiled by allowing half-hearted service to be condoned, or by allowing the slightest intrusion of favouritism in the choice of witnesses. And so: "Paul did not deem it fitting to take with them one who withdrew from them from Pamphylia, and went not to the work" (Acts xv. 38). So ended the fellowship that saw the planting of the gospel of the grace of God in Cyprus and Galatia. Paul does not re-visit Cyprus, leaving this for Barnabas and his nephew.

We now look beyond the movements of men, and see the hand of the Lord at work. Barnabas was a Levite and would therefore have considerable influence with his own people, but the Lord was about to call Paul and his associates to a wider field. Before this second missionary journey was finished, Europe was to be entered. In such a sphere a Levite would have no special influence, but a Roman citizen would be invaluable (Acts xvi. 37, 38). Possibly Silas had been present at Antioch when Peter and Barnabas had momentarily given way to the Judaisers, and being a Spirit-guided man, and a prophet, he may have foreseen what would happen. Paul would naturally feel the need for loyal companionship, and Silas seemed the heaven-sent man. The names of both Barnabas and Paul appeared in the letter sent from Jerusalem, and the absence of one of the principals might have given a handle to the enemy, but Silas was also named and his evidence would therefore be sufficient justification.

The Church seems to have endorsed Paul's attitude for we read:

"And Paul chose Silas, and departed, being recommended by the brethren unto the grace of God. And he went through Syria and Cilicia confirming the churches" (Acts xv. 40, 41).

These verses are the beginning of another section of the correspondence seen in the structure, and it will be useful to have the whole passage before us, shorn of detail, as we draw to its conclusion.

A | xii. 24. The Word of God grew and multiplied.
B | xii. 25. Barnabas and Saul. John Mark taken.
C | xiii. 1-3. Barnabas and Saul. Separated.
D | xiii. 4 - xiv. 28. The mission in Galatia.
D | xv. 1-35. The conference in Jerusalem.
B | xv. 36-39. Barnabas and Saul. John Mark to Cyprus.
C | xv. 40 - xvi. 4. Saul and Timothy approved.
A | xvi. 5. The churches established and increased.

The choice of Silas and Timothy is seen to be in correspondence with the separation of Barnabas and Saul by the Holy Spirit in Acts xiii. 1-3. The choice of Silas was important, but the choice of the next servant of the Lord was critical. Returning to Derbe and Lystra, the Apostle finds a certain disciple there named Timothy—his father a Greek and his mother a Jewess who believed. From what we can gather from the Scriptures, Timothy was a young man, and of a retiring disposition, one who needed to be reminded in a letter that the Lord had not given a spirit of cowardice, and to be told to be "no longer a water-drinker". This young man had, from his infancy, been taught that Holy Scriptures, and was well reported of by the brethren that were at Lystra and Iconium. It will be remembered that Luke simply tells us that the church at Antioch decided to send Paul and Barnabas up to Jerusalem, and we only learn from Paul himself that he went up by revelation. So here, Timothy's fitness for the work is set forth in everyday language. We learn, first, that he was "a disciple"; secondly, that his mother was a "Jewess who believed, but his father was a Greek"; and thirdly, that he was "well reported of", not only in his own home town of Lystra, but also in the adjacent city of Iconium. He was, therefore, likely material.

Timothy's more particularly spiritual qualifications we learn from Paul himself. In his first letter to Timothy, giving him his "charge", the Apostle writes: "This charge I commit unto thee, son Timothy, according to the prophecies which went before on thee."

We know that Silas was a prophet (Acts xv. 32), and it may be that he was inspired to indicate the Lord's will with regard to Timothy. Something of this sort would have been necessary in view of the defection of John Mark, and Timothy's youthful and timid nature. At some time also—and probably at the time of his call—Timothy received a spiritual gift, for we read:

"Neglect not the gift that is in thee, which was given thee by prophecy, with the laying on of the hands of the presbytery" (I Tim. iv. 14).

"Wherefore I put thee in remembrance that thou stir up the gift of God, which is in thee by the putting on of my hands" (II Tim. i. 6).

Such gifts as these, together with “prophecy” and the “laying on of hands” do not properly belong to the Church of the Mystery. They are referred to in the Apostle’s prison ministry as something carried over from a previous dispensation and belonging to a special order of men who had pioneer work to do. They are not repeated, neither is there any reference to this supernatural enduement found in the epistles of the present calling. Perhaps Luke was constrained to omit the prophecies and the laying on of hands, and to concentrate attention upon discipleship, Bible training, and good report, so that we might remember that the teacher should be “apt to teach” as well as “marked out by prophecy”.

The fact that Timothy was a child of mixed parentage, was another qualification. He could sympathize with the Greek, and he could also understand the Jew. In this connection the large-mindedness of Paul again shines out. A smaller man, having won so signal a triumph regarding circumcision as Paul had done at Jerusalem, would have hesitated before circumcising Timothy. Not so the Apostle; to him circumcision and uncircumcision were nothing, the glory of God was all. If Timothy could better serve the Lord in the synagogue by being circumcised, then let the rite be performed at once. Spiritual gifts, prophecies, laying on of hands and a Jewish rite, all combine to fit this young servant for his high office.

And so these three set out on their journey, “delivering the decrees for to keep”. As a result, we read firstly that the “churches were established in the faith”—for the decrees made the imposition of circumcision upon the Gentile null and void; and secondly, that they “increased in number daily”—for the susceptibilities of the Jewish believers were now recognized and the causes of stumbling removed by the voluntary abstinence on the part of the Gentile believers from those things that caused offence. We are now on the verge of the next great movement in the Acts, and to this we must address ourselves in the next article.

#30. The Second Missionary Journey (xvi. 6 - xix. 20).
pp. 228 - 232

We now approach another section of the Acts, and a wider circle of witness. In the nineteenth chapter we have the separation of the Church from the Synagogue, and in the sixteenth chapter the call of the man of Macedonia. In response to this call the Gospel enters Europe. Such a chapter as this ranks in importance with Acts ii., xiii. and xxviii.

We have given in the Appendix to "The Apostle of the Reconciliation" an adjustment of the Structure of the Acts, so that this vision may at least be noted, but at best the outline suggested was a reconstruction of the work of others and cannot be allowed to take its place in this series. We therefore turn to the pages of the Acts afresh, examining each step as we go. The result of this investigation is that the outline on page 247 of "The Apostle of the Reconciliation" is found to be insufficient. It is true that the geographical terms are there, and in the order shown, but there is little value in a mere list of names—except of course, that they show the footsteps of the apostles and the opening up of the Roman world to the Gospel. Let the reader and the writer share together, as far as possible, the thrill of first discovery and see the light dawn as patience, persistence and prayer overcome obstacles. The obstacles are many and various. Chief among them is the wealth of detail and the amount of material. Look for instance at the places mentioned: Galatia, Phrygia, Asia, Mysia, Bythinia, Troas, Macedonia, Samothracia, Neapolis, Philippi, Thyatira, Amphipolis, Apollonia, Thessalonica, Berea, Athens, Mars' Hill, Corinth, Syria, Cenchrea, Ephesus, Cæsarea, Antioch, Alexandria. To turn these geographical names into centres of real interest would demand a volume. And if we add to these the different peoples that cross and re-cross the path, and the varied experiences of the Apostle, from the prison at Philippi to the Acropolis at Athens, the difficulty grows.

To return to our quest, here then are the chapters awaiting us, and we are convinced that they are stamped with the hallmark of inspiration, that we have found throughout the Scriptures. We begin with the conviction that the vision at Macedonia is a feature of importance, and we therefore make a note of it. We write "Macedonia: Vision". As we do so, there comes to mind another vision, recorded in chapter xviii., and as this is a likely parallel, we make a note of that too. "Corinth: Vision". Philippi, which follows the Macedonian vision, occupies a large space, and we provisionally set aside the rest of chapter xvi. under the heading "Philippi". As we do so, however, we observe that there is recorded here the strange occurrence of the damsel possess with a spirit of divination, and that the spirit, instead of opposing the Apostle, apparently endorses his message, saying: "These men are the servants of the Most High God, which shew unto us the way of salvation." This is evidently an indication that the old enemy is adopting new tactics, and this item is therefore important. So we note, "Spirit of Python: Way of Salvation." As we do so, we recall that there is an incident parallel to this further on in the Acts, and to our delight we find waiting for us the record of the Jewish exorcists, who used the name of "Jesus, Whom Paul preacheth". This is so obviously a corresponding member that we set it down in its place—"Evil Spirit: Jesus, Whom Paul preacheth". We are now well started, and soon the hospitality of Lydia and of Aquila and Priscilla are noted, and at the last minute we find that minute perfectness necessary to confirm the whole scheme—the two references to Phrygia and the region or country of Galatia. We now have the main outline of the new section before us, and soon we have the joy of seeing it grow in beauty before our eyes. And not only so, but we have also exchanged a barren list of geographical terms for the living issues of apostolic witness and conflict.

What has taken a few minutes to recount here represents, of course, in practice as many hours of search and frustration. The pleasure which the reader has shared with us in the recounting cannot, therefore, be anything like as keen as the joy that comes from the initial discovery. Truly the searching of the Scripture brings its own reward, and it is not without reason that the central member stresses the "nobility" of the Bereans, who searched to see whether these things were so. We have deliberately taken up a certain amount of space in introducing this structure, as so many readers ask us "how it is done". There is no royal road to success, and it is most important that there should be no invention. There are usually one or two obvious indications placed by the Lord on the surface, ready to give the lead to any who will follow. The structure of the passage is as follows:

The Second Missionary Journey.
Acts xvi. 6 - xix. 20.

A | xvi. 6-11. |
a | 6. PHRYGIA, a country of GALATIA.
b | 6-11. THE VISION. MACEDONIA.
B | xvi. 12-40. |
c | 12-15. PHILIPPI. Lydia.
Come into my house.
d | 16-18. PHILIPPI. Spirit of Python.
The way of Salvation.
e | 19-40. PHILIPPI. Result: Prison and salvation.
C | xvii. 1-14. THESSALONICA and BEREA. "More noble."
A | xvii. 15 - xviii. 23. |
b | xvii. 15 - xviii. 17. THE VISION. ATHENS and CORINTH.
a | xviii. 18-23. The country of GALATIA and PHRYGIA.
B | xviii. 24 - xix. 20. |
c | xviii. 24-28. EPHESUS. Aquila and Priscilla.
They took him unto them.
d | xix. 1-16. EPHESUS. Evil spirits.
Jesus Whom Paul preacheth.
e | xix. 17-20. EPHESUS. Result: Name of Lord magnified.

We cannot deal with the vision of the man of Macedonia without going on to speak of the witness at Philippi. This, however, demands a complete article, and we will therefore content ourselves here with presenting the structure of this new section, and adding a few words with regard to Phrygia and the country of Galatia (xvi. 6, and xviii. 18-23).

> "Now when they had gone throughout the country which is Phrygian and Galatic" (Acts xvi. 6).

This is Sir William Ramsay's rendering, to which he adds the note "A single district to which both adjectives apply"—"the country which, according to one way of speaking, is Phrygian, but which is also called Galatic." If we turn back to Acts xiv. we find that the Apostles fled from Iconium to Lystra and Derbe, and so apparently crossed a boundary. In Acts xviii. 23 we find the order of the names is reversed, and we now read:

" 'He went over all the country which is Galatic and Phrygia'. The country denoted by the phrase in xvi. 6 is that which was traversed by Paul after leaving Lystra: it is therefore the territory about Iconium and Antioch, and is rightly called Phrygo-Galatic, 'the part of Phrygia that was attached to Galatia'. But the country which is meant in xviii. 23 includes Derbe, Lystra, Iconium, and Antioch, and could not rightly be called 'Phrygo-Galatic'."

A glance at a map showing the political divisions of Asia Minor between the years A.D.40 and 63, explains the ground of Sir William Ramsay's objection quoted above. The Galatian province had taken within its borders a part of Phrygia on the west, and as Derbe, Lystra and Iconium had originally belonged to Lycaonia, which had been absorbed on the east, the exactness of Luke's description "All the country which is Galatic and Phrygian" is striking. No one who was acquainted with the geography of Great Britain would use the term "The London Scottish and Midland Railway", and no one acquainted with the geography of the period covered by the Acts would expect any other description in Acts xviii. 23 than that used by Luke.

The reader may not be keenly interested in the arguments that prove that when Paul speaks of "Galatia" he means the Roman Province of that name, and not the smaller Northern Kingdom. We therefore take it as proven that Anticoh, Lystra, and Derbe are the cities of Galatia wherein the churches of Galatia were formed, and to which the Apostle addressed his epistle. Should any readers wish for the complete array of facts and arguments, we must refer them to the writings of Sir William Ramsay as the matter is technical and would occupy far more space than we can spare.

Our main object in this article has been to introduce the new departure, and to set out the structure. We are now ready for the exposition of these epoch-making journeys—journeys which penetrated into Europe, and so brought the history of our own evangelizing a step nearer.

We append a rough map of this second missionary journey and hope that it will enable the reader to follow more closely the footsteps of these missionaries of grace as they break up new ground for the gospel message.

The Criterion of New Testament Interpretation.
"The Book of the Acts."
pp. 41 - 44

Under the above title, the Bible Testimony, Dixonville, Pa., U.S.A., have issued a most illuminating and convincing circular, and we felt that our readers would so appreciate the evidence assembled therein that we have obtained the gracious permission of the Bible Testimony to re-print it in our pages. Readers will not only value this outline for its own sake, but also as an evidence of the interest in dispensational truth that is growing in the United States of America:

> "The ministry during the period covered by the Book of the Acts is a continuation and confirmation, by the Apostles, 'Of all that Jesus began both to do and teach' (Acts i. 1).
>
> Throughout the Book features that distinguish the 'Acts Administration' from the present 'Body Administration' are very distinct and outstanding.
>
> Points in the Acts, that stand out prominently as being exclusively applicable to the presence of Israel, as a Nation, and the absence of the Church, the Body of Christ, are as follows:--

#7. The Living God.
pp. 22 - 26

Before leaving our study of God as Creator and Moral Governor of the world, we must give some consideration to the question of personality. In a previous article we quoted W. James as saying:

> "In fighting against the God of the Absolutist, I am fighting for the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob."

The God of Metaphysics* may be infinite and absolute, but He is not a person, and cannot be the "Living God" of revelation. An Infinite Being is unlimited, and Absolute Being is unrelated; and anything wholly unlimited and unrelated is, so far, as man is concerned, unknown and unreal. The God of the Scriptures, the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, the "God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ" is a living, loving Person.

God is limited not by limitations imposed upon Him by others, but by His own nature. Holiness, righteousness, love—these are Divine limitations everywhere recognized in the Word. God is "absolute" in the sense that He is self-sufficient, and is not "in need of anything" (Acts xvii. 25), but although He is independent in His fullness of relations with any other, His absoluteness is not such as to exclude His relationship with His creatures, nor does it prevent His self-sufficient fullness from flowing out to them. "In Him we live, and move, and have our being."

It has been objected that to describe God as a Person is to speak of God in terms of man. This, however, is not a valid objection; for this figure of Speech—known as Anthropomorphism—is precisely the language of Scripture. It is true that human persons are finite, but it does not follow that personality need be finite. God must either be personal or impersonal; there is no third possibility. Moreover, the ultimate revelation of God has been made in a Person—whose name is Emmanuel, "God with us". This, however, is a subject that must be given due study in its own time and place. We mention it here so that its light may reflect back to the beginning, and that we may see that the Personality of God is vital to our faith.

[* - The term "Metaphysics" (meta, "after" and physica "physics") owes its origin to a work of Aristotle's that was placed in a collection of his manuscripts after his treatise on Physics. It has now come to mean theoretical philosophy as the ultimate science of being and knowing. Metaphysics deals with the first principles of things, including being, essence, substance, time, space, cause, etc.]

Matthew Arnold conceived of God as an impersonal "power not ourselves that makes for righteousness" but, as Fitchett points out, such a power "would be as incapable of personal relationships as, say, the Gulf Stream or Niagara. The denial of personality to God is fatal to religion. It thrusts God out of the moral realm; it makes personal relationship with Him impossible". "A machine cannot reason, or love, or will. Who can love gravitation, or pray to electricity; or sing hymns, say, to the law of the conservation of energy?"

Philosophy has offered to us, in place of the Living God, Hegel's "idea", the "Blind Will" of Schopenhaur, the "Sublimated Unconscious" of Hartmann, the "Moral Order" of Fichte, and the "Eternal Not Ourselves" of Matthew Arnold. But what is an "idea" but an expression of conscious thinking personality? And what is "will" but another evidence of moral and mental personality? The personal God was really there, but the philosophers were not able to see Him.

When man examines himself, he discovers a personality: a self-conscious being, which thinks, wills, and feels. Is it possible that man is greater than his Maker? Can we believe that God has endowed the creature of His hands with a nobler nature than He Himself possesses? The Psalmist's condemnation of heathen gods would need little revising to fit the Deity of the philosophers:

> "They have mouths, but they speak not: Eyes have they, but they see not: They have ears, but they hear not; Noses have they, but they smell not: They have hands, but they handle not: Feet have they, but they walk not; Neither speak they through their throat" (Psa. cxv. 5-7).

The whole creation testifies to a Personal Creator.

(1) Nature is intelligible, else there could be no Science. This intelligibility implies intelligence.
(2) Nature reveals a purpose. We know, without any book learning, that the direction of any force to an end or goal is the expression of will. Will is inconceivable apart from a person.
(3) Nature is manifestly a coherent unity. Life and activity would cease unless the elements and forces of nature were correlated and held in balance. Intelligence, will and unity all demand that the Cause behind nature's phenomena must be a Person.

Personality is essentially a trinity. We will not discuss at this juncture how far this is related to the doctrine of the Triune God, but it is clear that a person is conscious of three outgoings—he thinks, he wills, and he feels. We will not pursue this question further, at the moment. Possessing all Scripture, and rejoicing in the glorious fact that in the person of Christ God is manifested in the flesh, we defer further study in this connection, until we deal with the coming of Christ. We will not, however, leave this matter without some explicit testimony from the Word itself, and we therefore draw attention to some of the ways in which the Scriptures speak of the "living God".

The first testimony to the fact that God is the "living God" is found in Deut. v. 26:

> "Who is there of all flesh, that hath heard the voice of the living God speaking out of the midst of the fire?"

Looking back over the chapter with this statement before us, we shall realize, as never before perhaps, how definitely the giving of the law testified to the living God. He it was Who made a covenant with Israel (verse 2); Who talked with them face to face in the mount (verse 4); Who led them out of bondage (verses 6-11); Who instituted the Sabbath in connection with His own work of creation; and gave to Israel His holy law (verses 12-21).

The Lord proved Himself to be the "living God" when, under Joshua, He fulfilled His promise concerning the land (Josh. iii. 10). David, also, uses the title when he speaks of the blasphemy of Goliath in defying the armies of "the living God" (I Sam. xvii. 26).

O.T. consciousness of the living God seems to reach its zenith in Psalm lxxxiv.:

> "My soul longeth, yea, even fainteth for the courts of the Lord; my heart and my flesh crieth out for the living God" (Psa. lxxxiv. 2).

Passing over the many passages that use the phrase, "As the Lord liveth", we turn now to the N.T. to see something of the weight of testimony there. As we read chapter after chapter of the Gospel according to Matthew, conviction deepens until, when we reach chapter xvi., we find the echo of our own hearts in the testimony of Peter:

> "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God" (Matt. xvi. 16).

When Paul spoke to the men of Lystra, who were attempting to offer sacrifice to himself and Barnabas, he said:

> "We preach unto you that ye should turn from these vanities unto the living God" (Acts xiv. 15).

This characteristic testimony of the Apostle is found again in I Thessalonians:

> "How ye turned to God from idols to serve the living and true God" (I Thess. i. 9).

In II Corinthians it is the "Spirit of the living God" that writes upon the heart of the believer; and the believer himself constitutes the "temple of the living God" (II Cor. iii. 3; vi. 16). In I Timothy the church is called "the church of the living God" (I Tim. iii. 15), Who is described in the next chapter as the "Saviour of all men, especially of those that believe" (I Tim. iv. 10).

There are further occurrences of the same title in the Epistle to the Hebrews. In Heb. iii. 12 unbelief is described as departure from the living God; and in ix. 14 the service of those whose consciences are purged is "unto the living God". In x. 31, we read that "it is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God"; and in xii. 22 the goal before those who followed in the steps of Abraham and the "great cloud of witnesses" is "the city of the living God".

It is because He is the living God, that we can speak of His attributes without loss. Justice, mercy, love, faithfulness—these attributes indicate a Person; they could not possibly be applied to a Power, or a Principle. In the O.T. the revelation of God as a Person is principally enshrined in the great name "I AM". In the N.T. His Personality is brought nearer in the title "Father", and is given an outline in the life and work of the Son. There can be no clearer testimony to the glorious Personality of the Creator than the final revelation we receive in the Word, the relationship of Father to Son. In these terms language is exhausted.

Let others speak in their darkness of "The Unknowable", "The First Great Cause", "The Power not ourselves that makes for righteousness". For our part, let us glory in the grace that has illuminated our darkness, and revealed the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ.

#8. Jesus Christ is Lord.
pp. 69 - 73

If man be left without a revelation, there is no way in which he can discover the truth about creation and the Creator, except by patiently sifting the evidence of might, wisdom, and benevolence to be found in earth, sea, and sky. This testimony must necessarily be partial, owing to the frailty of human investigation. Wild guesses may be mistaken for truths, and marvelous theories may be built upon sand. For ourselves, however, we possess in the Scriptures the written revelation of God, and, while this revelation does not attempt to answer all the questions that men of science or philosophy may put, it does speak in no uncertain language of creation and the Creator, and we must examine this testimony before we pass on to other related themes.

First of all we observe what the Scriptures say concerning the Creator Himself. God is the Creator of heaven and earth, the sea and "all that in them is". This is the testimony of Scripture from Genesis to Revelation.

> "In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth" (Gen. i. 1).
> "Worship Him that made heaven, and earth, and the sea, and the fountains of waters" (Rev. xiv. 7).

God as Creator is the rightful Object of worship for the creature. When Isaiah rebukes Israel for their idolatry, and seeks to expose its utter folly, he says:

> "Have ye not known? Have ye not heard? Hath it not been told you from the beginning? Have ye not understood from the foundations of the earth?
> It is He that sitteth upon the circle of the earth, and the inhabitants thereof are as grasshoppers; that stretcheth out the heavens as a curtain, and spreadeth them out as a tent to dwell in . . . . . To whom then will ye liken Me, or shall I be equal? saith the Holy One. Lift up your eyes on high, and behold Who hath created these things, that bringeth > out their host by number; He calleth them all by their names by the greatness of His might, for that He is strong in power; not one faileth . . . . . The everlasting God, the Lord, the Creator of the ends of the earth, fainteth not, neither is weary, there is no searching of His understanding" (Isa. xl. 21-28).

It is this God of Creation that stands behind the covenant made with Abraham and with the Messiah.

> "Thus saith God the Lord, He that created the heavens, and stretched them out; He that spread forth earth, and that which cometh out of it, He that giveth breath unto the people upon it, and spirit to them that walk therein. I, the Lord, have called thee . . . . . I am the Lord, that is My Name, and My glory will I not give to another" (Isa. xlii. 5-8).

Further light upon the purpose of creation, and the place of Gen. i. 2 is found in Isa. xlv. 18:

> "For thus saith the Lord that created the heavens; God Himself that formed the earth and made it: He hath established it, He created it not in vain (tohu = 'without form', Gen. i. 2), He formed it to be inhabited: I am the Lord: and there is none else" (Isa. xlv. 18).

We trust that the reader will not fail to appreciate the nature of the testimony given by these inspired declarations. In Isa. xl., quoted above, we have the Divine challenge: "To whom then will ye liken Me, or shall I be equal?" The Hebrew word "to be equal" is shavah, and means "to be, or to be put upon a level or equality, to be made equal by comparison". It is variously translated: for example, "counter-vail" in Esther vii. 4, where the idea of balancing "damage" is uppermost, and "to avail" in Esther v. 13, where the honours heaped upon Haman are counterbalanced by the attitude of Mordecai. It is also translated "profit" in Esther iii. 8, where the idea of "balance" is again implied.

In the second quotation given above from Isaiah, there is another challenging statement: "I am the Lord, that is My name, and My glory will I not give to another." In the third quotation we read the equally emphatic statement: "I am the Lord, and there is none else."

These passages are written in language that admits of no misunderstanding. If we discover in the N.T. that there is One Who claim equality with God, and to Whom the creation of all things in heaven and earth is ascribed, then we are faced with one of three possibilities:

(1) The O.T. is to be believed, but not the N.T.
(2) The N.T. is to be believed, but not the O.T.
(3) Both Testaments are to be received as unequivocally true (even though some statements in each may appear contradictory) because they both refer to the same Person. There is no problem to be solved when once we perceive that the Lord Jesus Christ is "God manifest in the flesh".

There are three passages in the N.T., each of which taken alone would be sufficient to establish this fact, and taken together their evidence is overwhelming.

> "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. The same was in the beginning with God. All things were made by Him; and without Him was not anything made that was made" (John i. 1-3).

With this direct assertion should be read the words of Isa. xlv. 18: "I am the Lord, and there is none else."

> "For by Him were all things created, that are in heaven, and that are in earth, visible and invisible, whether they be thrones, or dominion, or principalities, or powers: all things were created by Him and for Him. And He is before all things, and by Him all things consist" (Col. i. 16, 17).

Here not only the work of creation itself is ascribed to the Lord Jesus Christ, but the "glory" of creation is His too: "All things were created by Him and for Him, and He is before all things." With this passage we may read Isaiah's statement: "My glory will I not give to another."

The third passage is found in the Epistle to the Hebrews:

> "And Thou, Lord, in the beginning hast laid the foundation of the earth; and the heavens are the works of thine hands" (Heb. i. 10).

Here the title given to the Son is "Lord", the N.T. equivalent of the O.T. "Jehovah" (See, for example, Matt. iii. 3).

In connection with Heb. i. let us turn for a moment to Psa. civ.:

> "Bless the Lord, O my soul. O Lord my God, Thou art very great: Thou art clothed with honour and majesty. Who coverest Thyself with light as with a garment; Who stretchest out the heavens like a curtain . . . . . Who maketh His angels spirits, His ministers a flaming fire, Who laid the foundations of the earth, that it should not be removed for ever" (Psa. civ. 1-5).

Heb. i. and ii. were evidently written with this Psalm in mind. The words "honour and majesty" remind one of Heb. ii. 9 and II Pet. i. 17; and the reference to a garment has something in common with the folding up of a vesture, to which the passing away of creation is likened in Heb. i. Moreover, as in Heb. i., we have the angels spoken of as ministering spirits. In verse 5 we read: "Who laid the foundations of the earth" (Psa. civ. 5). If we turn the statement into a question, Heb. i. answers: "He Who in fullness of time was revealed as the Son of God." If we ask, "Who stretched out the heavens like a curtain?" Heb. i. answers: "The heavens are the work of the hands of the Son of God."

Job was confounded at the majesty of the Creator, when the Lord asked:

> "Where wast thou when I laid the foundations of the earth? Declare, if thou hast understanding" (Job xxxviii. 4).

With the added revelation of the N.T., we now know that this Almighty Creator took upon Himself the nature of man and humbled to the death of the Cross. And we also know that the passage which reveals that wondrous condescension assures us that there was no "grasping" on His part to be "equal with God", for it was His by right. What He laid aside for our sakes, however, He will take up again; and every knee shall bow and every tongue shall confess that Jesus Christ is Lord to the glory of God the Father (Phil. ii. 6-11).

We now turn back to Isa. xlv. We have already quoted verse 18, where, in connection with the great work of creation, God declares that "there is none else". We discover further that in the new realm of salvation this is still true.

> "There is no God else beside Me; a just God and a Saviour; there is none beside Me. Look unto Me and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth: for I am God, and there is none else. I have sworn by Myself, the word is gone out of My mouth in righteousness, and shall not return, That unto Me every knee shall bow, every tongue shall swear" (Isa. xlv. 21-23).

The writer of the Fourth Gospel seems to have had no difficulty in writing "The Word was with God, and the Word was God". We must credit him with possessing at least as much alertness as ourselves, and yet he seems to see nothing incongruous in the statement and does not attempt to meet objections. Similarly the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews has no difficulty over the fact that "God" should address the Son as "God" and "Lord". Neither does the Apostle hesitate to quote Isa. xlv. 21-23 with reference to the Lord Jesus Christ, even though this chapter declares: "I am God and there is none else." To those who accept the revelation of Scripture that the Lord Jesus Christ is "God manifest in the flesh" there is no problem—although there is and must be a "great mystery". To those who deny the Deity of Christ, the statements of Isaiah and John, Hebrews and Philippians, can only be a set of contradictions that no argument can reconcile.

We advance no theories concerning the Godhead; we are content to believe what God has revealed. And as we think these things over, we begin to see more clearly that what has been revealed concerning Christ and the creation of man in the image of God, has an intimate and important bearing on His coming in the flesh and His dying for sinful man.

#9. The Unity of the Godhead.
"Elohim . . . . . Let us . . . . . our image" (Gen. i. 26).
pp. 138 - 142

We have so far considered some of the subjects that present themselves to the reader of Gen. i. Our studies may not have been as far-reaching as our desires, or as extensive as the magnitude of the subject would demand, but we trust they have been sufficient to point the way for any reader who should desire to explore the Scriptures further. Let us go over briefly what we have so far seen.

(1) Creation implies a purpose.—This theme is almost inexhaustible. The naturalist as well as the theologian can demonstrate in thousands of ways evident intention and purpose in the works of the Creator's hands.

(2) Creation bears evidence that "God is".—Man need not wait for conversion or spiritual sight to believe that most obvious fact in the universe, namely, that creation demands a Creator. This fact is so evident that even idolaters are held to be without excuse. The earnest student has here an enthralling study. The more he becomes acquainted with the world that surrounds him, and that is within him, the more he will become convinced of the impossibility of Atheism, and the awful gloom of Agnosticism.

(3) God is the Moral Governor.—Not only must a man believe that "God is", but also that He rules in the sphere of moral government. "He is the Rewarder of them that diligently seek Him." Moral government implies law, and law implies reward and punishment. Reward and punishment are only valid where there is moral responsibility. Wherever there is a denial of man's moral responsibility, there also will be found a denial of the sinfulness of sin.

(4) Is might right?—In connection with the moral government of God, it is necessary to be very clear as to the nature of righteousness. Is it arbitrary, and by enactment? Or is it of necessity, arising out of the very nature of God Himself? Our answer to this question will influence the whole of our subsequent interpretation of the Word. We do not believe that Scripture countenances anywhere the idea that mere omnipotence justifies any course of action. Might is not necessarily right. God Himself regulates His omnipotence by His righteousness, and not His righteousness by His omnipotence.

(5) The Self-Limitations of Omnipotence.—This is an aspect of truth that demands care in presenting, but without it there can hardly be room for the self-sacrificing love that is so marked a character of the Almighty. Even creation itself, inasmuch as it has needs and demands constant care and upholding, is an evidence of God's voluntary self-limitation. His tender mercies are over all His works, and if these words have a meaning, they indicate an element of responsibility on the part of the Creator. He rules the world that He made, in righteousness.

(6) The Foreknowledge of God.—God's foreknowledge is differentiated from election and predestination, inasmuch as election is said to be "according" to foreknowledge, and predestination is predicated of those who were already foreknown. Foreknowledge does not mean fatalism, predestinarianism, determinism, or any of the other systems that would make heaven of brass and man morally irresponsible.

(7) The Living God.—God is living, loving Person, not a blind, omnipotent Force, or the Absolute of Metaphysics. No title of God, no name whereby He reveals His nature to us in the Scriptures, sounds such depths of fullness as the last of His titles, "The God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ".

(8) Jesus Christ is Lord.—Reviewing the testimony of the Scripture to the nature of the Creator, we learn that He is without equal. He stands alone, there is none else, and His glory He will not share with another. The Lord Jesus Christ is revealed as the Creator, as God, as the Lord. The moment we see in Him the God-Man all apparent contradictions vanish, and we see the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ.

These related themes must be kept in the background of our thoughts as we proceed with our study.

Let us now come to the creation of man.

> "And God said, Let us make man in our image, after our likeness: and let them have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over the cattle, and over all the earth, and over every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth" (Gen. i. 26).

"Let US . . . . . OUR . . . . . OUR."—It is not extraordinary that Israel should have been called upon to witness, amid pagan idolatry, to the Unity of God, and yet that their very Scriptures should continually use for the great name of their God, a plural word: Elohim? Some impelling reason must account for this strange fact.

Some have suggested that the plural here is simply the Plural of Majesty, much of the same kind as that adopted by earthly monarchs, but this is not supported by the usage of Scripture. In Gen. iii. 22 we read:

> "Behold the man is become AS ONE OF US."

An earthly king might use a similar expression if he desired to include his fellow-monarchs, but Jehovah stands alone—there are no fellow-gods.

The use of the plural in Gen. iii. 22 confirms the R.V. translation of Gen. iii. 5: "Ye shall be as God"—not "as gods", as in the A.V. If the plural ("gods") is the correct rendering of Gen. iii. 5, why not read "gods" in Gen. i. 1, 2, 3, 4 and in all the twenty-seven occurrences of the plural word in Gen. i.?

A fact that cannot be set aside as unimportant is that the plural name of God is generally associated with verbs in the singular. This will be found to be the case about thirty times in Gen. i. On the other hand, it is also true that verbs, adjectives and pronouns are used in the plural in association with Elohim. For instance:

> "Ye cannot serve Jehovah, for He is a holy God" (Josh. xxiv. 19).

Here the word "holy" is qadoshim, plural.

> "Remember now thy Creator in the days of thy youth" (Eccles. xii. 1).

Here the word "Creator" is in the plural. So also are the words "Maker" and "Husband" in Isa. liv. 5.

To the above might be added such expressions as:

> "The Lord God and HIS SPIRIT hath sent ME" (Isa. xlviii. 16).

The words here are uttered by One, Who Himself, in the former part of the verse, uses the language of Jehovah. (For a similar case see Isa. xlv. 19).

Returning to Gen. i. 26, we further observe that, while Elohim is plural, and the pronouns are "us" and "our", the passage does not read: "And they said" but "And He said", with the verb in the singular. We find the same thing in Gen. xi. 7:

> "Jehovah said . . . . . Let US."

Here again the pronoun is plural but the verb singular.

The orthodox Jew at the present time rejects the idea of plurality in the Unity of the Godhead, but this has not always been the case. When Moses Maimonides wrote the thirteen articles of the Jewish faith, he gave an absolute sense to the oneness of the Godhead, which before had been understood as a unity. The modern Jew, in the synagogue service, rises when the "Shema" is reached, and cries: "Shema Yisrael Adonai Elohenu Adonai echad" ("Hear, O Israel, the Lord our God is one"). The word echad here he regards as indicating an absolute, and not a compound unity. This, however, is unscriptural. The word yacheed, which is the true Hebrew word for absolute oneness, occurs some twelve times in Scripture, but is never once used to express the Unity of the Godhead. It is used three times in Gen. xxii. (verses 2, 12 and 16) with reference to Isaac as the "only" son, and also in Judges xi. 34 with reference to Jephthah's daughter. In Psalm lxviii. 6 it is translated "solitary". The word is never used, however, in connection with the Godhead. The word echad, which is in fact used, comes from the root yachad, meaning "to unite", as for example in Psalm cxxxiii., where the Psalmist speaks of brethren dwelling together in unity. The same word (echad) is used in Numb. xiii. 23: "A branch with one cluster of grapes"; and in Judges xx. 1, where all the congregation of Israel assemble "as one man" (See also verses 8 and 11). These are all instances of a compound unity.

So, in Gen. i. 5, "the evening and the morning" are yom echad, "day one". In Gen. ii. 24, the husband is to cleave unto his wife and they shall be basar echad, "one flesh". And, again, in Ezekiel we read of the "two" sticks becoming "one", aitz echad (Ezek. xxxvii. 16-19).

Because certain expressions in the creeds of the Church are almost unintelligible, or because some have attempted to prove the doctrine of the Trinity by triangles or by cloverleaves, this is no reason for denying or questioning the evidence of the Scriptures to the fact that the Unity of the Godhead is a compound unity (echad), and not an absolute unity (yachad). It is not our responsibility to demonstrate or to prove; it is our joy as well as our responsibility simply to believe what God has been pleased to reveal.

We must defer further comment on Gen. i. 26 for another article. This paper has served its purpose if it has established a link between the doctrine set forth in the preceding article—that the Creator is the Lord, Who in fullness of time became man—and this initial act of creating the first man in the image and likeness of his Lord.

#10. Why did God create at all.

pp. 174 - 177

Before developing the underlying idea of this article, it will perhaps be helpful to say something about the necessity for certain laws of thought, and, in particular, about the question of "axioms". Even the revealed truth of the Bible would become a mere sequence of curiously shaped strokes, or varied sounds, apart from grammar, and grammar presupposes intelligence and the laws of thought. Revelation and reason must, therefore, go hand in hand, even though we may have to confess that what passes for human reason may be very far from the truth. A sinless rational being would be obliged to acknowledge the truth of revelation.

At the foundation of all thought are the first principles that we call "axioms". In mathematics, for example, an axiom is a self-evident proposition—such as "A straight line is the shortest distance between two points", or "Things that are equal to the same thing are equal to one another". Even if an angel from heaven should appear and tells us that these things were not so, and that, for instance, a curved line was shorter than a straight one, we should have to deny the very fundamentals of our being to give them up. Just as there are certain self-evident truths in mathematics, so also in other departments of thought, there are axioms that are self-evident and need no proof. We leave this point for the time, but shall return to it later.

The question that we have before us arises out of the opening verse of Scripture:

> "In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth" (Gen. i. 1).

It is at once evident that, if God created heaven and earth in the beginning, He must Himself have been in existence before this creation took place. There must, therefore, have been a time (we can use no other word than "time" here, owing to the limitations of our nature and knowledge), when God was, and nothing else existed. It is therefore evident that God must be self-sufficient. This is confirmed in Acts xvii., where the Apostle is speaking to philosophers, acquainted with the principles of reasoning concerning the nature of the Absolute:

> "God that made the world and all things therein; seeing that He is Lord of heaven and earth, dwelleth not in temples made with hands, neither is worshipped with men's hands, AS THOUGH HE NEEDED ANYTHING, seeing He giveth to all, life, and breath, and all things" (Acts xvii. 24, 25).

The question is bound to arise sooner or later in the mind of the reader of Scripture and the student of the works of the Creator, Why did God create anything? If God be self-sufficient, and needs nothing from outside sources, seeing that He Himself is the Author of all things, why did He create at all? It is not sufficient to say that it was because He was all-powerful and so able to create heaven and earth, for even men are able to do many things which they are perfectly right not to do, even though, should they do them, they would still be perfectly right. The mere possession of power does not answer the question "Why?" We must look deeper, and here we are shut up to the revelation of the Word.

We turn to Rev. iv. and read:

> "Thou art worthy, O Lord, to receive glory and honour and power, for Thou hast created all things, and for Thy pleasure they are and were created" (Rev. iv. 11).

Here, then, is one answer to our question. It is that He created all things "for His pleasure". In another passage we read:

> "Israel shall be saved with an everlasting salvation . . . . . For thus saith the Lord that Created the heavens, God Himself that formed the earth and made it; He hath established it, He created it not in vain, He formed it to be inhabited" (Isa. xlv. 17, 18).

We see here that part of God's purpose is to have an inhabited earth.

In the Book of Proverbs, where "Wisdom" speaks in chapter viii., the passage ends with the words"

> "Rejoicing in the habitable part of His earth; and My delights were with the sons of men" (Prov. viii. 31).

Creation, then, is "for His pleasure"; He formed it for an habitation; He delights in its inhabitants. But again we may ask "Why?"

> "For of Him, and through Him, and to Him are all things" (Rom. xi. 36).

The answer to this question seems to be found in the very being of God Himself. Let us pursue our enquiry with wondering hearts, for we are drawing near the holiest of all.

While some things may be known of God from the works of His hands, such as His eternal or invisible power and Godhead (Rom. i. 20)—so much so that the nations who fell into idolatry were without excuse—there are other things concerning His nature that are outside the sphere of evidence and beyond the range of reason. God is spirit, but that does not necessitate creation. God is light, but it is not self-evident that God, Who is light, should create the universe. But God also is love; and here we pause. Is it not self-evident that for love to abide alone, with none but self to love, with no opportunity to express itself in giving, to say nothing of sacrificing, is in the very nature of things impossible? All Scripture unites to testify that love must give. All Scripture shows that sacrifice is never far removed from love, and we may take without reservation the statement of the Apostle in its widest sense:

> "He that loveth not, knoweth not God, for God is love" (I John iv. 8).

However married human love may now be by the presence of sin, there is nevertheless in human love, the love of husband and wife (Eph. v. 25), the love of parent and child, the love of brethren, something which is the same in kind, though not in purity or degree, as that which dwells in the very heart of God. Human love, even apart from the illuminating and quickening of the Spirit, expresses itself in self-sacrifice:

> "For scarcely for a righteous man will one die; yet peradventure for a good man some would even dare to die. But God commendeth His love toward us, in that while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us" (Rom. v. 7, 8).
> "Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends" (John xv. 13).

If, then, it is self-evident that love must express itself, that it must have an object upon which to bestow its gifts, it is clear that we have an answer to the question as to why God, Who is self-sufficient and perfect in Himself, should have felt it necessary to create heaven and earth, and to take upon Himself not only the initial launching of the universe, but its upholding moment by moment. The answer to the question must be, that He did it because He is love. When He made man in His own likeness, a living soul and a rational moral being, He knew that His creature could not be deprived of freedom of choice without denying his very nature. In His perfect foreknowledge He knew that, when He launched creation, it would one day cause Him "grief", "repentance" and "anger"—and that it would demand at length nothing less than giving up of "His beloved Son". If we still ask, Why, knowing all this, did He create heaven and earth? the answer must still be, Because God is love.

This fact not only lies at the threshold of Scripture; it is found again full-orbed at its consummation. The closing pages of Revelation reveal the goal of the ages, expressed in terms of a Father at home with his family (Rev. xxi. 3). Or, as I Cor. xv. 28 suggests, the difference between the beginning, and the end is that "In the beginning God" (All in Himself); and at the end, "God All in All" (God and His redeemed people).

#11. "After His Kind" or Creation versus Evolution (Gen. i., ii.).

pp. 205 - 210

The nature and purpose of our studies in the Word of God preclude the consideration of many subjects that are both attractive in themselves and in some ways useful. For example, such subjects as Astronomy, Geology and Biology are closely allied to the theme of Gen. i. and ii., but they demand specialized training, and are, after all, outside our own particular sphere. There is one point of view, however, accepted by modern and popular science, that we must consider before leaving these early chapters of Genesis, and that is the current theory of evolution. We speak of evolution as a theory, not slightingly but justly, for the scientist should accept nothing that is not capable of demonstration or proof. The most ardent advocate of evolution would admit that this process has never been either "demonstrated" or "proved". It is unreasonable, therefore, to expect the believer in Christ quietly to remove the very foundation of his faith, simply because a popular theory is for the moment uppermost in the scientific world. How many theories have had their little day and ceased to be, since Moses penned the sublime opening of the Book of Genesis! How many more theories may be propounded before we "know even as we are known" we cannot predict, but of one thing we can be certain—that though heaven and earth will pass away, the Word written in the inspired Scriptures will stand for ever.

Those of us who are not scientists are apt to take the popular cry of the moment as the authentic voice of authority, and it may therefore be of service for us to quote what some of the men who are at the summit of their profession have said on the matter. Dr. Etheridge of the British Museum, "one of the highest authorities in the world", has said:

> "Nine tenths of the talk of the evolutionists is sheer nonsense, not founded upon observation and wholly unsupported by facts. This museum is full of proofs of the utter falsity of their views. In all this great museum, there is not a particle of evidence of the transmutation of species."

Professor Beale, of King's College, London, says:

> "There is no evidence that man has descended from, or is, or was, in any way specially related to any other organism in nature, through evolution or by any other process. In support of all naturalistic conjectures concerning man's origin, there is not, at this time, a shadow of scientific evidence."

Professor Virchow of Berlin writes:

> "The attempt to find the transition from the animal to man has ended in failure. The middle link has not been found and never will be. Evolution is all nonsense. It cannot be proved from science that man descended from the ape or any other animal."

The newspaper reports of the British Association Meeting in 1931 make interesting reading, especially when we remember how strongly some sections of the press have supported evolution in the past. Two extracts are given below.

> "IS EVOLUTION WRONG?
>
> The famous theory of evolution lacks proof. We have been told that evolution has destroyed chapters in the Old Book. That explanation does not now suffice. We are as ignorant as we were seventy years ago.
>
> (The Daily Express)."

The words in italics are the statement of Professor D'Arcy Thompson.

The Daily Telegraph had a leading article entitled "Evolution Overdone", in which the following passage occurred:

> "The immoderate evolutionists . . . . . sometimes made nonsense of the theory they exalted. It has partly been a case of 'Save me from my friends'."

"Nonsense" said Dr. Etheridge! "Nonsense" said Professor Virchow!! "Nonsense" said the Editor of the Daily Telegraph!!! It would have been neither courteous nor wise for a layman in the realm of science to use the word "nonsense" in connection with a theory which is seriously entertained by men of standing, but it is certainly legitimate for men like Dr. Etheridge and Professor Virchow and the Editor of The Daily Telegraph to use this term if it represents their considered opinion—and the reader should remember it when urged to give up the inspiration of the books of Moses. "Not a particle of evidence." "Not a shadow of scientific evidence." "It cannot be proved from science." These are weighty judgments and should make us pause before coming to any hasty conclusions.

Without dealing in any detail with the problems that arise out of this unproved theory, we just mention a few points.

(1) There is an impassable gulf between the living and the non-living, which only the power of the Creator can bridge. Between the rock, and the living lizard that basks in the sunshine upon it, there is a tremendous gulf, which evolution can never span.

(2) Reptiles have cold blood between 40 and 60 degrees. Birds have hot blood, ranging between 100 and 107 degrees. By what known or even imaginary process did the cold-blooded reptile change into the hot-blooded bird, and how did it manage to live throughout the "Laodicean" period of its existence?

(3) Reptiles have a three-chambered heart. Birds have a four-chambered heart. How was the transition accomplished?

(4) Natural selection cannot account for the instincts of the honey bee which has in effect anticipated some of the more profound discoveries of mathematics. The parents of the honey-bee—the queen and the drone—neither gather honey nor build the comb, yet their offspring do this with infallible accuracy. How is this instinct passed on and preserved?

(5) Natural selection could not make use of slight initial changes. For example, what use would the reptile make of the first primitive feathers that it is supposed to have evolved? Would not these have been a hindrance rather than a help, and have led to the early elimination of such abnormalities.

We must now leave this realm of "dogmatic uncertainty", and which is falsely called Science, and turn to the sure Word of the Living God. We cannot attempt an examination of the whole problem of creation, but we do draw attention to the persistent use in Gen. i. and ii. of a phrase which is certainly misleading if evolution be a fact. In the record of creation given in Gen. i. 3 - ii. 3 this phrase—"after his (or their) kind"—occurs ten times. It is used in the following connections:

(1) The fruit tree yielding fruit after his kind, whose seed was in itself "after his kind" (Gen. i. 11, 12).

(2) The herb yielding seed "after his kind" (Gen. i. 12).

(3) Great whales, every living creature that moveth, which the waters brought forth abundantly "after their kind" (Gen. i. 21).

(4) Every winged fowl "after his kind" (Gen. i. 21).

(5) The earth brought forth the living creature "after his kind", cattle and creeping thing, and beast of the earth "after his kind" (Gen. i. 24, 25).

No believer in the Divine inspiration of all Scripture can set aside this tenfold insistence upon the fact that each created thing, whether vegetable or animal, was created "after its kind". If creation had proceeded upon the lines of any process involving the transmutation of species, these words would be misleading and untrue.

The Hebrew word for "kind" is min, and is derived from manah, a verb meaning "to distribute by number, order or the like":

"If a man can number the dust" (Gen. xiii. 16).
"The Lord had prepared a great fish" (Jonah i. 17).
"The Lord God prepared a gourd" (Jonah iv. 6).
"God prepared a worm" (Jonah iv. 7).
"God prepared a vehement east wind" (Jonah iv. 8).

The word manah also gives us temunah, "similitude" (Numb. xii. 8), and maneh, "a particular weight or sum of money" (Ezek. xlv. 12).

The translators of the Septuagint version were aware of the importance of the phrase "after its kind", and knew also that the word min, "kind" was associated with temunah, "similitude". Accordingly we find in the Greek version of Gen. i. 11, 12: "Kata genos kai kath' homoioteta" (according to its kind, and according to its likeness). The word genos here supplies the scientific term "genus", which is defined in the Oxford Dictionary as follows:

> "A classificatory group comphrehending (one or) a number of species, possessing certain common structural characters distinct from those of any other group."

In the N.T. the word genos stands for "offspring", "stock", "kind", "kindred", and "nation".

> "To another (divers) kinds of tongues" (I Cor. xii. 10).
> "Diversities of tongues" (I Cor. xii. 28).
> "Many kinds of voices" (I Cor. xiv. 10).

The word which is added in the LXX version of Gen. i. 11, 12 is homoioteta, "likeness", a word which is certainly rightly used in Gen. i. 16 of the creation of man. Whether or not the translators were justified in inserting the word "likeness" here as an expansion of the idea which they saw was resident in the Hebrew min and the Greek genos, there can be no doubt that to them the use of the phrase "after his kind" indicated a very distinctive element in the record of creation. Each genus was distinct and separate, and we must therefore—with the Hebrew original and Greek translation before us—regard the idea of the evolution of one species from another as being contrary to the express teaching of Holy Writ.

When dealing with the problem of the resurrection body in I Cor. xv., the Apostle turns to the works of God in order to provide an illustration and an argument. We are not concerned, at the moment, with the question of the resurrection, but the passage may help us to understand what Moses meant when he wrote "After his kind".

> "It may chance of wheat, or of some other grain; but God giveth it a body as it hath pleased Him, and to every seed his own body" (I Cor. xv. 37, 38).
> Kai ekasto ton spermaton to idion soma ("and to each of the seeds its own peculiar body.").
> "All flesh is not the same flesh: but there is one kind of flesh of men, another flesh of beast, another of fishes, and another of birds" (I Cor. xv. 39).

There is no word in the original of this verse for "kind", but it contains the untranslated conjunction men . . . . . de which demands recognition, as follows:

> "There is one flesh on the one hand, of men, but on the other hand, there is the flesh of beasts."

The Apostle's argument falls to the ground if evolution be admitted.

Returning to Gen. i. 11, 12, we further note that the fruit tree yielded fruit "after his kind", that its seed was "in itself", and that this seed also was "after its kind". In addition to this very specific statement concerning the creation of separate species of plants, we read in Gen. ii. 5:

> "And every plant of the field BEFORE it was in the earth, and every herb of the field BEFORE it grew" (Gen. ii. 5).

These words make it even more difficult to believe the record of Genesis, and at the same time the theory of evolution, for evolution is a process taking place while plants and animals "grow", whereas these plants, which, according to chapter i., were "after their kind", were according to chapter ii. created thus "before they grew".

We again meet the phrase "after his kind" in the record of the flood in Gen. vi. 20 and vii. 14. The fact that each fowl and beast "after its kind, or genus", was carried through the deluge in order that seed might be preserved alive, is a further indication that one species did not evolve from another, for if that had been the process of creation at the beginning, it could have been repeated after the flood, and the need for carrying into the ark so great a variety of living creatures could have been avoided.

We have already seen that the words "after his kind" are used in the record of the creation, and of the flood, and we find them used once more in the Levitical law concerning clean and unclean animals: "The kite after his kind", "every raven after his kind", etc. This proves that the words had a specific meaning, and were used by Moses to indicate that the whole species was included. There are thirteen occurrences of the phrase "after his kind" in connection with clean and unclean animals, and there is one further reference in Ezek. xlvii. 10. In this last passage, the changed conditions which will obtain at that time will bring a larger variety of fish into the Dead Sea than would have been possible under normal conditions, and the sentence, "Their fish shall be according to their kinds" is expanded into "As the fish of the great sea, exceeding many".

If the animal and vegetable worlds came into being by any process of evolution, the words "after his kind" in the record of Gen. i. and ii. would seem to be redundant and unscientific. We have no alternative, therefore, but to believe that this expression is purposely used in the record of the creation to indicate that the different orders of life, each belonging to its own separate genus, were the result of a specific act of creation. This must not, however, be misconstrued as denying a very wide range of "variety", that could and did develop in response to time and circumstance.

Much of the "science" of to-day will be discarded for the "science" of to-morrow, and one theory will give place to another. Those facts that have been brought to light, founded upon evidence and capable of demonstration, will remain, and not one of them will be found to be out of harmony with the simple teaching of Scripture. The Christian who believes the Scriptures need not be ignorant or prejudiced. He can be as truly "scientific" as the word implies. He will accept without demur every fact that is attested, but he will distinguish carefully between unsubstantiated theories that militate against the Word of Truth, and the evidence of facts that establish the common authorship of the Works and the Word of God.

JUDGES.
#4. The thirteen Rulers of Israel. Abimelech the Antichrist. (viii., ix.).
pp. 7 - 12

There are thirteen rulers mentioned by name in the Book of Judges. This is an ominous number, but is quite in keeping with the general tenor of the book. The last verse of the last chapter is in a sense a summary of the whole book:

> "There was no king in Israel; every man did that which was right in his own eyes."

If we add to this the two occasions when the making of an Ephod played an important part in the downgrade movement of the book, the antichristian character of its prophetic and typical teaching becomes evident.

Twelve of Israel's judges were called of God; the thirteenth was Abimelech, a usurper, and an evident type of the Man of Sin. Moreover, we observe that Abimelech, the usurper, is the sixth name in the record. The number 6 is "the number of man", and is associated with Goliath, Nebuchadnezzar and the Beast of the last days.

Dr. Bullinger went to the trouble of adding up the numerical value of the names of the twelve judges and found that it was a multiple of 8; whereas the title of Abimelech, Ben Jerubbaal, is a multiple of 13.

It is sad to think that Gideon was the father of Abimelech and that Abimelech was the offspring of a concubine:

> "And Gideon had threescore and ten sons of his body begotten: for he had many wives. And his concubine that was in Shechem, she also bare him a son, whose name he called Abimelech" (Judges viii. 30, 31).
>
> "And Abimelech the son of Jerubbaal (i.e. Gideon) went to Shechem" (Judges ix. 1).

It seems that, by this time, Shechem had become a centre of apostacy. And yet it was at Shechem that God had first appeared to Abraham in Canaan (Gen. xii. 6); and at Shechem Jacob had built his altar (Gen. xxxiii. 20). Here also had been pronounced the blessings and cursings from Mount Gerizim and Mount Ebal. And here, after the death of Gideon, is established the worship of Baal-berith (Judges ix. 4).

In the opening verses of Judges ix., Abimelech suggests to the men of Shechem that Gideon's seventy sons are seeking dominion over them. This was a most unreasonable and unlikely suggestion, but it suited Abimelech's plan to give it currency.

> "And Abimelech the son of Jerubbaal went to Shechem unto his mother's brethren, and communed with them, and with all the family of the house of his mother's father, saying, Speak, I pray you, in the ears of all the men of Shechem, Whether is better for you, either that all the sons of Jerubbaal, which are threescore and ten persons, reign over you, or that one reign over you? Remember also that I am your bone and your flesh" (Judges ix. 1, 2).

Abimelech's words had the desired effect, and the men of Shechem made him king. Sixty-nine out of the seventy sons of Gideon were slain at Ophrah "upon one stone". Possibly this refers to the rock that figures so prominently in Judges vi. 21-26. If so, this would indicate another blow at the worship of the true God, and the triumph of Baal. Moreover, the place chosen by the men of Shechem for making Abimelech king was "by the plain of the pillar that was in Shechem". Here Joshua had made a covenant with Israel (Josh. xxiv. 1-26), and had set up a great stone under the oak (see margin of Judges ix. 6), declaring that this stone would be a witness against them if they denied their God. Here, too, the sanctuary of God had stood, as we see from Josh. xxiv. 26. It is evident, therefore, that Abimelech's coronation was a direct attack upon the sovereignty of the Lord. And yet in Abimelech we have Israel's first king, a tragic foreshadowing of the time of the end.

One Son of Gideon escapes death, and his name is Jotham, meaning Jehovah is Perfect. The bearing of this name will be evident when we observe how Jotham uses the very word "perfect" in Judges ix. 16:

> "If ye have done truly and sincerely (perfectly)."

The connection is confirmed when we notice that at this same spot, Joshua had said:

> "Now therefore fear the Lord, and serve Him in sincerity (perfectly)" (Josh. xxiv. 14).

The Lord had said to Abraham, "Walk before Me, and be thou perfect" (Gen. xvii. 1) and had called upon Israel saying: "Thou shalt be perfect with the Lord thy God" (Deut. xviii. 13). An examination of the contexts will leave us in no doubt as to the meaning of the term.

There is one further point which is perhaps more important than everything else. Abimelech had been made king at the very place where the sanctuary had stood. At this place, therefore, the priest would have received answer by Urim and Thummim. Now the word Thummim is the word "Perfection" put into the plural. There is but one King that will successfully rule and reign for God on earth, and He will be a King-Priest "after the order of Melchisedec". There will be but one Kingdom on earth that will received Divine approval, and that will be a "Kingdom of Priests". In this lies the secret of all human failure in this respect. Man desires a King. Even Israel would have taken Christ and made Him King; but External law, however righteous and good, breaks down before the impotence of unregenerate hearts. A Priest as well as a King is needed to put away sin, and to write the laws upon the hearts of a saved people. Gideon apparently had some inkling of this truth:

> "The men of Israel said unto Gideon, Rule thou over us, both thou and thy son, and thy son's son also . . . . . And Gideon said unto them, I will not rule over you, neither shall my son rule over you; the Lord shall rule over you" (Judges viii. 22, 23).

Gideon nobly repudiates Kingship here, but the next verse records what is apparently a strange action. He requests the golden ear-rings that had been taken as a prey, and we read:

> "Gideon made an Ephod thereof, and put it in his city, even in Ophrah. And all Israel went thither a-whoring after it, which thing became a snare unto Gideon, and to his house" (Judges viii. 24-27).

Gideon apparently felt the need of priestly service, but he transgressed the will of the Lord in providing a substitute for the real thing—always a fruitful cause of failure and sin.

The reader may remember that the structure of the book as a whole given in Volume XXVII, page 131, places the Ephod of Gideon and the Ephod of Micah in correspondence.

We must return, however, to Jotham and his parable. The actual word "parable" is not used in Judges ix., but this is evidently what is intended. In Matt. xiii. "the parable of the sower" is not called a parable specifically, but it is a parable nevertheless. Just as the Lord spoke to the people in parables, because He had been rejected by them (see Matt. xi. 20-24; xii. 6, 41, 42 and the articles on the parables in Volume II, III, IV, V and VI), so Jotham uses the same method after Israel's rejection of the Lord as King.

> "Hearken unto me, ye men of Shechem, that God may hearken unto you. The trees went forth on a time to anoint a King over them: and they said unto the OLIVE TREE, Reign thou over us. But the olive tree said unto them, Should I leave my fatness, wherewith by me they honour God and man, and go to be promoted over the trees?
>
> And the trees said to the FIG TREE, Come thou and reign over us. But the fig tree said unto them, Should I forsake my sweetness, and my good fruit, and go to be promoted over the trees?
>
> Then said the trees unto the VINE, Come thou and reign over us. But the vine said unto them, Should I forsake my wine, which cheereth God and man, and go to be promoted over the trees?
> Then said all the trees unto the BRAMBLE, Come thou and reign over us. And the bramble said unto the trees, If in truth ye anoint me King over you, then come and put your trust in my shadow: and if not, let fire come out of the bramble, and devour the cedars of Lebanon" (Judges ix. 7-15).

It may be very true that in Scripture the Fig, the Olive, and the Vine foreshadow and typify three phases of Israel's blessedness. It may be that the Fig represents Israel's national privileges, the Olive their religious privileges, and the Vine their spiritual privileges. All this may be true, but it is not necessarily true in the parable of Jotham. In this parable, the three trees are separate entities, and they each refuse in turn to leave the work to them by God. It is impossible to apply the answers of these three trees to any period of Israel's failure or acceptance. The point of the parable is in the self-assertion of the Bramble. The other trees speak humbly of their "fatness", their "sweetness", their "wine", and of the ministry of honour and cheer that each afforded in fulfilling his appointed service. The Bramble, however, has no such humble conception of his office. He does not speak of oil, or wine, or even of sweetness. He says nothing about honour to God or to man, but vaingloriously usurps the Divine prerogative and says: "Put your trust in MY SHADOW."

In the prophetic utterance of Moses in Deuteronomy we read:

> "He is the Rock, His work is perfect . . . . . Where are their gods, their rock in whom they trusted?" (Deut. xxxii. 4, 37).

And in that beautiful record of faithfulness in a period characterized by utter lack of faith, we read in the Book of Ruth:

> "The Lord God of Israel, under Whose wings thou art come to trust" (Ruth ii. 12).

As the Psalmist writes:

> "Is it better to trust in the Lord than to put confidence in man" (Psa. cxviii. 8).

The opposite course is described in Isa. xxx. in relation to Egypt:

> "Woe to the rebellious children . . . . . that take counsel, but not of Me . . . . . to strengthen themselves in the strength of Pharaoh, and to trust in the shadow of Egypt" (Isa. xxx. 1, 2).

The same words that are rightly used of the Lord, both "trust" and "shadow", are boldly appropriated by Abimelech, the Bramble. It is the spirit of Antichrist manifesting itself in the nation of God's choice, a prophetic foreshadowing of the awful days to come. The Bramble speaks of his shadow, but in fact he had none. He provides neither honour, sweetness, nor cheer, and serves only as fuel for the fire. The word for "bramble" is translated "thorn" in Psalm lviii. 9, where the passage refers to the boiling of a pot over a fire.

In the Gospels we read:

> "Do men gather grapes of thorns, or figs of thistles?" (Matt. vii. 16).

As the Lord spoke these words, the parable of Jotham would come to the minds of many of His hearers. When He spoke, also, of the seed being choked with thorns and so not bringing forth fruit unto perfection (Luke viii. 14), those of his hearers who knew the Hebrew meaning of Jotham, and of his use of the word "perfect", would again think of the degeneracy of the days of the Judges and of the danger of their recurrence. When the apostle used the figure of the land bringing forth thorns and briers and being nigh unto cursing (Heb. vi. 8), his hearers would no doubt go back in mind to this same parable.

We will not pursue the sad story of Abimelech's reign. He died an ignominious death, at the hand of a woman, although he saved his face by calling upon his armour-bearer to thrust him through, so that no man should say "A woman slew him" (Judges ix. 54). He was, moreover, slain by a millstone, another mark of degradation in those days (see Judges xvi. 21); and by the breaking of his skull. If we read the account of the death of Sisera we find a repetition of very similar circumstances. Is it fanciful, therefore, with these things in mind, to see both in Jael and in the Woman that shall bruise the serpent's head? And to see in the tent-peg and in the millstone allusions to the final overthrow of Satanic dominion.

#5. The Six Deliverers of Israel.
Othniel, Ehud and Barak (iii. - v.).
pp. 54 - 58

While there were five complete servitudes of Israel—resulting in 93 years being eliminated from God's reckoning of the national calendar (see the article: "Lo-ammi, or a Prophetic Principle Examined" pages 207-211 of Volume XXVII)—there was also a partial servitude which necessitated the call of Jephthah, and this must not be omitted. The fact that there were six servitudes and six deliverances prepares one for a record of failure, for six is the number of man. We shall expect that each deliverer will possess some good quality that will foreshadow the one true Deliverer of Israel, the Lord Himself, but that each will also show many evidences of human frailty and failure, so turning the heart of the believer away from all types and shadows, to trust freely and only in the great Deliverer Himself.

The Six Deliverers of Israel.

A | OTHNIEL.—The Lion of God (iii. 9).
  B | EHUD.—Union. The Fords. Gilgal. (iii. 15).
    C | BARAK.—Lightning. Deborah a prophetess. Under a palm tree (iv.-v.).
      "I will surely go with thee" (iv. 9).
    C | GIDEON.—The Hewer. A man a prophetess. Under an oak tree (vi.-viii.).
      "Surely I will be with thee" (vi. 16).
  B | JEPHTHAH.—The Opener. The Fords. Mizpah. (xi. - xii. 7).
A | SAMSON.—Like the Sun (xiii.-xvi.).

We do not propose to devote a separate article to each of these six deliverers, but rather to provide sufficient information for the reader to be able to explore their typical histories for himself.

We give below a list in structural form of the enemies of Israel from whom they were delivered by the judges. It will be seen that three of Israel's foes were related to them by blood, Moab and Ammon through Lot, and Midian through Keturah and Abraham (Gen. xix. 37, xxv. 2). The reader will not fail to note the important lesson here.

It will also be noticed that the Amalekites are associated with Midian; and together they represent the flesh, which, in its various manifestations, brings the redeemed of the Lord into bondage.

The King of Mesopotamia, and the Philistines, and the Canaanites were descendants of Ham—a people connected with Babylonian idolatry and high-handed rebellion. Altogether a formidable host.

The Six Foes of Israel.

A | CHUSHAN-RISHATHAIM.—The Cushite of Double Evil.
B | EGLON.—A Bull Calf. A Fat Man.
Moab related through Lot and associated with Amalek.
C | JABIN.—Intelligence. Canaan the Cursed Seed.
C | MIDIAN.—Contention.
Associated with Amalekites, and with Israel through Keturah.
B | AMMON.—Fellow-countryman. Related to Israel through Lot.
A | PHILISTINES.—Related to Cushite (Gen. x. 14). Migrator.

The "double evil" of the first oppression seems to cover the last also, indicating that both the King of Mesopotamia and the Philistines represent the same evil thing, namely the world as opposed to God. Moab and Ammon clearly represent the flesh, for both are associated with Lot and his daughters. Midian also, as well as Israel, could claim descent from Abraham, but they were never "in Isaac" and so were not "counted for the seed". They, too, represent the claim of the flesh intruding into the realm of the spirit. Canaan are particularly the people of the curse, a people not to be evangelized or tolerated, but to be exterminated. They stand for the Devil and all his works. Israel's six foes, therefore, represent most clearly the three elements of the redeemed—the world, the flesh, and the Devil.

The weapons used by the deliverers, although insignificant and weak in themselves, are of importance in their typical teaching.

In the case of Othniel and Jephthah no weapon or instrument is mentioned. All that the Scripture records is:

> "The spirit of the Lord came upon him . . . . . and the Lord delivered Chushan-rishathaim, King of Mesopotamia, into his hand" (Judges iii. 10).
>
> "Then the spirit of the Lord came upon Jephthah . . . . . and the Lord delivered them into his hands" (Judges xi. 29-32).

Apart from the jaw-bone of the ass, Samson accomplished his deliverance of Israel by a power whose source was not evident to the outward eye. With regard to Ehud, we read that his weapon was a dagger with two edges, and that he was a left-handed Benjamite. The name "Benjamin" means "Son of my right hand", yet in spite of this the Hebrew of Judges iii. 15 records that Ehud was "shut of his right hand". Here we have a picture of grace and the power of the Spirit, in contrast to all the boasted powers of the flesh—looking forward, surely, to the "weakness of God" that was stronger than men, manifested at the Cross of Calvary.

Sisera was slain at the hand of the woman by means of a tent-peg. In the case of Gideon, trumpets, pitchers and lamps were all that were used by his depleted army of 300 men to rout the host of the Midianites.

Let us now, as briefly as is consistent with clarity, consider some of the chief points that are recorded in connection with these three Judges.

The record of Othniel's triumph is simple, and is to the Book of Judges what the triumph over Jericho is to the Book of Joshua. It was the ideal victory, though followed alas by faulty behaviour on Israel's part subsequently. Othniel, as the Lion of God, foreshadows the complete emancipation which will be accomplished under the Lord Jesus Christ at His Second Coming, in the capacity of "the Lion of the Tribe of Judah".

Ehud sets out to attack what represents the flesh in type. Eglon, the King of Moab, is described as "a very fat man" (Judges iii. 17). Such fatness is unhealthy; and symbolizes the flesh. The same word is used by Asaph of the ungodly, who prosper in this world, "whose strength is firm (margin fat)" (Psa. lxxiii. 4). It was this fat that sealed Eglon's doom, for we read that "the fat closed upon the blade" (Judges iii. 22) (Compare Psa. xvii. 10: "They are enclosed in their own fat", and Psa. lxxiii. 7: "Their eyes stand out with fatness").

While we naturally expect a king to have some outward signs of his high rank, there seems to be some particular reason for the Spirit to record the fact that the summer parlour where Eglon was slain had been made "for himself alone" (Judges iii. 20). It seems to be an added witness to the selfish and fleshly character of this enemy of Israel.

What moved Ehud were the "graven images at Gilgal" (Judges iii. 19 margin). At Gilgal the "reproach of Egypt" had been rolled away by the rite of circumcision and "the flesh" had been repudiated (Phil. iii. 3, Col. ii. 11 R.V.). Yet at this same spot the "graven images" had been set up. Ehud's action sets forth the mortifying of the members, using the two-edged sword of the Spirit which is the word of God.

Passing on now to Barak, it seems strange at first sight to find, in the record of his call by Deborah, the interpolation of Judges iv. 11:

> "Now Heber the Kenite, which was of the children of Hobab, the father-in-law of Moses, had severed himself from the Kenites and pitched his tent unto the plain of Zaanaim which is by Kedesh."

We learn, however, from verse 17 that there was peace at that time between Jabin and the house of Heber the Kenite, so that when Sisera fled, he turned his steps in the direction of Heber's tent.

Jael's action is praised without reservation by Deborah.

> "Blessed above women shall Jael the wife of Heber the Kenite be. Blessed shall she be above women in the tent. He asked water and she gave him milk; she brought forth butter in a lordly dish. She put her hand to the nail, and her right hand to the workmen's hammer; and with the hammer she smote Sisera, she smote off his head when she had pierced and stricken through his temples. At her feet he bowed, he fell, he lay down; at her feet he bowed, he fell; where he bowed, there he fell down dead" (Judges v. 24-27).

In the previous chapter, before Barak had started his campaign, we have Deborah's prophecy:

> "The Lord shall sell Sisera into the hand of a woman" (Judges iv. 9).

It appears that when Sisera was first received by Jael it was in perfectly good faith, for her husband at that time was at peace with Jabin. After Sisera had entered, however, Jael seems to have been moved by God to destroy this enemy of Israel, and Deborah's words suggest a miraculous power above and beyond the strength of Jael's own arm. Ehud, too, it will be remembered, first gave Eglon a present, and then turned back after he had got as far as Gilgal. The league between Heber and Jabin was a wise move on the part of Israel's foes, but no covenant made by man can thwart the purposes of the Most High. In the very tent of Heber, Sisera dies.

Jabin, meaning "Wisdom", and Hazor, meaning "Power" represent the strength of our spiritual foes, while the "stake" in the hand of Jael stands for the Cross of Christ, in which true wisdom and power were manifested. Jael was but another type illustrating the basic prophecy of Gen. iii. 15.

Deborah's song should be compared with the "Magnificat" of Mary in the Gospel of Luke:

> "Blessed above women shall Jael the wife of Heber the Kenite be" (Judges v. 24).
> "Blessed art thou among women" (Luke i. 28, 42).
> "All generations shall call me blessed" (Luke i. 48).

Is it not also significant, when we think of Jael and Mary, that Heber is not mentioned except as the husband of Jael? The tent is called "The tent of Jael, the wife of Heber the Kenite".

It is not possible, in the space at our disposal, to complete our survey by dealing with the exploits of Gideon, Jephthah and Samson, and we must therefore leave these for another article. Meanwhile let us ponder these lessons that speak so eloquently of our spiritual foes, the world, the flesh and the Devil: and let us glory in the Cross of Christ, having no confidence in the flesh.

#6. The Six Deliverers of Israel (cont.). Gideon, Jephthah and Samson (vi. - xvi.).
pp. 88 - 98

Gideon.

The reader will remember that we were unable to complete our survey of the account of the six deliverers of Israel in the last article (pages 54-58) of this series when we compared them with each other and gave some attention to the more outstanding details that are recorded of the first three. We now proceed to consider the outstanding typical features of the exploits of the remaining three, Gideon, Jephthah and Samson.

The oppression of Israel by the Midianites and the execution of Zeba and Zalmunna by Gideon are referred to by later writers of Israel, as being of prophetic interest.

> "For Thou hast broken the yoke of his burden, and the staff of his shoulder, the rod of his oppressor, as in the days of Midian" (Isa. ix. 4).
>
> "And the Lord of Hosts shall stir up a scourge for him, according to the slaughter of Midian at the rock of Oreb" (Isa.x. 26).
>
> "Do unto them as unto the Midianites; as to Sisera, as to Jabin, at the brook of Kison . . . . . Make their nobles like Oreb, and like Zeeb, yea, all their princes as Zebah, and as Zalmunna" (Psa. lxxxiii. 9, 11).

These references indicate the necessity of a knowledge of the record of Judges if the prophecies given later in the Word are to be appreciated.

The oppression of the Midianites was very great. Israel were driven to dens and caves of the earth, while much that they had sown in the fields was consumed by their enemies. Before Gideon was raised up as a deliverer, a prophet was sent who reviewed the history of Israel's defection and their sad departure from the Lord, in spite of His deliverance of them from the oppression of Egypt. The appearance of the prophet seems to indicate the failure of the priest, and this is borne out by the history of the time. Following the prophet, came the angel of the Lord, and Gideon asked for signs in order that he might be assured that his commission was of the Lord. His first act of deliverance was the breaking down of the altar of Baal which is own father had set up (Judges vi. 25). This earned for Gideon the title Jerubbaal (Judges vii. 1), or "Let Baal plead". The argument of Joash concerning Baal pleading for himself is like that of Elijah at Mount Carmel.

The host of the Midianites and the Amalekites is likened to locusts, or the sand of the sea, for multitude, whereas the total number of Gideon's men is said to be, in the A.V., 32,000. Had an army of even this size vanquished the Midianite host the victory would have been a signal one, but the Lord, Who knew the heart of men, said to Gideon.

> "The people that are with thee are too many for Me to give the Midianites into their hands, lest Israel vaunt themselves against Me, saying, Mine own hand hath saved me" (Judges vii. 2).

Gideon was therefore instructed to issue a proclamation allowing all who were fearful to withdraw, and twenty-two thousand men took advantage of the release and withdrew. But there were still too many, and the remainder were subjected to a test which only 300 of the 10,000 passed.

> "By the three hundred men that lapped will I saved you" (Judges vii. 7).

The principles underlying this selection seem to be that:

(1) In all our dealings with the enemy, only the glory of God, and not the magnifying of self, or faith, or suffering, or anything, apart from the cross of Christ, can be permitted as a goal or accepted as a means.
(2) Only those who "use this world as not using it to the full" (I Cor. vii. 31), can be trusted with victory. To all others victory would be worse than defeat.

In view of Judges vii. is it not folly to boast in numbers?

Before leaving verse 3, we draw attention to a most difficult yet important matter, namely the true principle of Hebrew numerical computation. The A.V. of Judges vii. 3 tells us that the number that returned of Gideon's army was "twenty and two thousand", and it has been assumed that this is just the same as "twenty-two thousand". This however is by no means the case. Indeed it is necessary to undertake a fairly exhaustive analysis of the Hebrew Bible before even competence to express an opinion can be gained. This matter of numbers has often been made the starting point for hostile attack upon the Scripture, whereas the attack should have been directed against the attempt to compute ancient sums upon modern lines.

In English, "twenty and two thousand" does not usually mean "two thousand and twenty", but it is only custom that has so decided, for twenty and two shillings is the same as two and twenty shillings. Not the actual wording in the Hebrew decides the matter but the custom of the times which therefore must be ascertained. Let us turn to another passage which provides a good example of the problem of Hebrew computation. In I Sam. vi. 19 we read that "fifty thousand and three score and ten men" were slain. Do we realize that this figure represents about twice the population of a town like Brentwood in Essex, or about the same as the town of Luton in Bedfordshire? and that this terrible destruction fell upon the men "who looked" into the ark of God? Is it also remembered that the ark stood in "the field" of Joshua the Beth-Shemeshite, and have we attempted to estimate how long it would take for this vast concourse to walk past the ark? In short, what a set of complicated problems have been set by those who have decided to add up Hebrew figures by modern methods!

The actual words and their order in the Hebrew, are "seventy men, fives and thousand men". The word translated "fives", if used in the singular, means simply "five" as in verse 4 of this chapter, but why the plural form should mean that five is multiplied by ten, no living man can now decide: all that can be done is to accept the fact and work accordingly. Dr. Robert Young, whose knowledge of Hebrew and of Oriental languages is such as to command universal respect, renders the passage thus: "He smiteth among the people seventy men—fifty chief men." Twice the word "men" occurs and twice Dr. Young uses it. The word eleph, translated 1000, also means a family, a tribe, and the head of a tribe, examples of which can be found by anyone able to use a Concordance. If therefore 50,070 can be the alternative of 70, of which 50 were chief men, are we not right in saying that the whole subject needs serious investigation?

All we will do at the moment is to suggest that 2,020 and not 22,000 men returned from mount Gilead, and that the number that fell at the fords of Jordan (Judges xii. 6) was 2,040 and not 42,000, a number that exceeds the census of the whole tribe that is recorded in Num. xxvi. 37, even if we take the figure of 32,500 as given in this version.

Emphasis upon the small and the despised is found in the record of the battle itself, first in the dream of barley loaf, and secondly, in the use of pitchers and lamps in place of weapons. The dream is as follows:--

> "Lo, a cake of barley bread tumbled into the host of Midian, and came unto a tent, and smote it that it fell, and overturned it, and the tent lay along" (Judges vii. 13).

The interpretation is:

> "This is nothing else save the sword of Gideon the son of Joash, a man of Israel, for into his hand hath God delivered Midian and all the host" (Judges vii. 14).

Dr. Thomson, in "The Land and the Book" page 447, says:--

> "Nothing is more common for the poor of Canaan at this day to complain that their oppressors have left them nothing but barley bread to eat; and if the Midianites, were accustomed to call Gideon and his band 'eaters of barley bread', as their successors, the haughty Bedouins, often do to ridicule their enemies, the application would be more natural."

Upon hearing the dream Gideon called upon his little band to arise and prepare for victory. He divided them into three companies and provided each man with a trumpet, a pitcher and a torch. The pitcher is a symbol of the human body in its frailty (Eccles. xii. 6). Eastern watchmen often carried a smouldering torch in an earthen vessel so that when a blaze was needed it could be withdrawn and waved in the air. These simple instruments find their parallel in the Apostle's words when he wrote:--

> "For God who commanded the LIGHT to shine out of darkness, hath shined in our hearts, to give the LIGHT of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ. But we have this treasure in EARTHEN VESSELS, that the excellency of the power may be of God, and not of ourselves" (II Cor. iv. 6, 7).

And so in the case of Gideon, the Lord says:

> "Lest Israel vaunt themselves against Me, saying, Mine own hand hath saved me" (Judges vii. 2).

When victory over Midian was complete, the men of Israel said to Gideon: "Rule thou over us", but he refused, saying, "The Lord shall rule over you". He, however, made a request which resulted in the making of an Ephod, which became a snare to Israel. It is evident that the priests of Israel were lax in their high duties, and as Gideon had already been permitted to offer a sacrifice, so he ventured to make an Ephod, probably with the idea that by its means he would, in future, be able to consult the Lord as to His will.

A great temptation in days of failure is to make do with substitutes, but such makeshifts are not according to the will of the Lord. Nothing can take the place of the finished work of Christ, and it is better to walk in a solitary path, without the slightest external evidence of faith or hope, than attempt the smallest substitution, in matters of worship and service, for that which the Lord has commanded. Thus every "denomination" has been formed in the spirit here exhibited by Gideon. Those who instituted them meant well, yet they have but furthered the schism of the church and veiled the supreme glory of the risen Christ.

> "Behold to obey is better than sacrifice, and to hearken than the fat of rams" (I Sam. xv. 22).

Jephthah.

We have already considered the story of Abimelech, and seen how he made capital out of the degraded character of his birth. Jephthah, too, was the son of an harlot, but, instead of being allowed to remain to stir up strife, he was thrust out of home by his father's other sons who said: "Thou shalt not inherit in our father's house; for thou art the son of a strange woman" (Judges xi. 2). He then appears to have become an outlaw, and his followers are described as "vain men". Now the word "vain" means empty, and is employed to describe the "empty pitchers" of Gideon (Judges vii. 16), but where it is used of men it always means vain. Such was the type of men hired by Abimelech (Judges ix. 4), and gathered together by Jeroboam, and they are further described as children of Belial (II Chron. xiii. 7).

Jephthah, by reason of his birth, was classed with the Ammonite and Moabite (Deut. xxiii. 2, 3), so that his employment in Israel's deliverance and his acceptance by the men of Gilead indicate how far the priests and leaders of the people had failed in their office.

The cause of Ammon's antagonism to Israel was ostensibly the question of the land that had been taken by Israel at their entry into Canaan.

> "Jephthah's argument is one that would be advanced now in a Court of Law. If the lands are yours, why have you not claimed possession during the 300 years they have been held by us?" (Companion Bible, Appendix 50/iv.).

We now turn to what has unnecessarily been made one of the most difficult features in the book of Judges, viz., the vow of Jephthah. Various suggestions have been put forward as solutions of the moral difficulties created by the vow. First there is the acceptance, as a fact, of the idea that Jephthah did actually offer up a human sacrifice—his own daughter. We are reminded of the wild state of the times, and of the prevailing ignorance of God's law and character. That Jephthah was an outlaw, and had been leading the life of a Rob Roy or Robin Hood, and that we must, therefore, not expect to find that he possessed too nice a sense of what is righteous or holy in the sight of God. The fact that the spirit of God came upon him for the work of delivering Israel, no more sanctified his every action, or rendered him infallible, than did the coming of the spirit upon Samson mean that all his actions were acceptable unto the Lord.

Against this acceptance of the record as it appears on the surface, is the objection that Jephthah is included in the examples of faith in Heb. xi., a fact indicative of something more personal and sanctified than the equipment of a leader of an expedition.

Even if it be admitted that so rash a vow had been made, there is weighty objection to the idea that God would allow it to be carried out. Indeed Scripture, in such passages as Lev. xviii. 21 or xx. 2-5, forbids such an act.

Some commentators have supposed that the words of Judges xi. 31, "and I will offer it up for a burnt offering", might be rendered, "or I will offer", etc., thereby indicating that the vow was of an alternative character. Either he would dedicate the first person who came out of his home to meet him on his return, or, if he were met by an animal, he would offer it up as a burnt offering. But most Hebrew scholars are against the idea that vav (the word translated "and") can be translated "or" here, though it is sometimes found with the meaning "or" where there is no opposition, as for example.

> "From the sheep or from the goats" (Exod. xii. 5).
> "He that smiteth his father or his mother" (Exod. xxi. 15).

but the usage is not comparable.

Having considered these opinions let us come to the touchstone of Scripture and examine the original Hebrew of Judges xi. 31, "And I will offer it up for a burnt offering". The Hebrew equivalent of "for a burnt offering" is l'olah, l meaning "for" and olah "burnt offering". Any enquirer can see this usage for himself by looking at the original of such a passage as Lev. v. 7, "for a burnt offering". But to our amazement, we discover that in Judges xi. 30, there is no l before olah. "For a burnt offering" therefore is an error of translation. What Scripture says is: "And I will offer it up a burnt offering."

In Gen. xxii. 2 where we read "offer him up for a burnt offering" the Hebrew explicitly reads l'olah. There, the Lord, having accomplished His object of proving Abraham's faith, intervened to prevent the actual slaying of Isaac.

Thus encouraged we look again. The word translated "it" is huah, and while it can stand for the third person in either the masculine, feminine or neuter gender it is usually masculine in significance. The passage can therefore read: "And I will offer Him a burnt offering." We look once more. The A.V. reads: "shall surely be the Lord's", and we find that the name Jehovah is prefixed with lamed (l') and so reads "to the Lord". The meaning is quite clear in a similar passage in I Sam. i. 11 where l'Jehovah is translated "unto the Lord".

Putting together these findings we can now see that Jephthah's vow may be translated as follows:--

> "If Thou shalt without fail deliver the children of Ammon into mine hands, Then it shall be, that whosoever cometh forth out of the doors of my house to meet me, when I shall return in peace from the children of Ammon, shall surely be for the Lord, and I will offer Him a burnt offering" (Judges xi. 30, 31).

It is, we trust, now clear that the problem we have been considering existed only in the translation of the passage and not in the Scripture itself.

Jephthah's distress on seeing his daughter and realizing his rashness is fully explained by the words: "beside her he had neither son nor daughter." Yet in spite of his grief he recognized the sacredness of the vow and said: "I have opened my mouth unto the Lord, and I cannot go back." In this attitude his daughter nobly supported him, saying: "Do to me according to that which hath proceeded out of thy mouth." She then asked as a favour, permission to bewail her virginity for a period of two months, and at the end of the time returned to her father who did according to his vow, that is, he devoted her to the Lord, "and she knew no man" (Judges xi. 39).

Let us note the confirmatory character of this conclusion. What sense would there be in saying of a young maid who was offered up as a burnt sacrifice, "and she knew no man"? If on the other hand the devotion of Jephthah's daughter to the Lord involved the renunciation of all hope of being a mother in Israel, the words are poignant with significance. Moreover, while at this time there may have been laxity in the observance of the law, the book of Ruth proves that there were some who knew it and sought to put it into force. In view of the publicity of Jephthah's vow, even if he had rashly vowed to offer his own daughter as a burnt offering (which we have made plain is not our belief), can we believe that there was no priest or Levite, who, neither for love nor for lucre, would inform Jephthah, that for thirty shekels (Lev. xxvii. 1-4), he could redeem his daughter from the consequences of his impetuosity?

In Judges xi. 39 we read: "And it was a custom in Israel": the margin says "or ordinance". Actually the passage reads, "And it became a statute in Israel". What became a statute? "That the daughters of Israel went yearly to lament the daughter of Jephthah the Gileadite four days in a year." Here the word "lament" perpetuates the original error. In the Hebrew it is tanah, the meaning of which the margin gives as "to talk with" and refers to Judges v. 11, where the future tense is translated "shall they rehearse". These yearly visits seem to have been the only relief allowed to the daughter of Jephthah in her separation unto the Lord, but it is conclusive proof that she lived out her life and had not been sacrificed.

Thus we see that there is no necessity to find extenuating circumstances for the barbarity of literal human sacrifice or strain the meaning of "and" by making it read "or". In dealing with the matter we have but followed the obvious course of passing by demonstrably inaccurate translations and seeing for ourselves just exactly what is stated in the Scriptures. No great learning is called for in doing this: only the ability to recognize the presence or absence of the Hebrew letter lamed; yet how many pages have been written on the subject, based upon inaccurate versions of the passage!

Except for one point, the rest of the story of Jephthah's life must be left to the reader to study. That exception is in connection with Judges xii. 6, "Say now Shibboleth". The inability of the men of Ephraim to pronounce "Sh" in the word "Shibboleth" finds confirmation in the Tel-el-Armarna tablets. The entire district occupied by the men of Ephraim had been Amorite territory (Josh. x. 1-5). The Tel-el-Armarna tablets show that the substitution of "S" for "Sh" was a peculiarity of the Amorites. "Shiloh" for example appears as "Silu". Conder says:--

> "This has always presented the difficulty, that the "S" is not the proper representative of the Hebrew "Sh". Perhaps, as in the other cases, the peasant pronunciation represents the Amorite rather than the Hebrew sound."

The Ephraimites, by continual contact with the Amorites, had fallen into their manner of speech, and these ancient tablets have been preserved to bear their witness to the fact in our day.

Samson.

We now come to the last of the Judges (Samson) whose acts of deliverance are recorded in this book. He foreshadows Christ, in that his birth was foretold by an angel: "Thou shalt conceive and bear a son" (Judges xiii. 3; Isa. vii. 14; Luke i. 31), and that he was a Nazarite, though it is hardly necessary to say that that state was fully exemplified only by Him Who was, "holy, harmless, undefiled, separate from sinners" (Heb. vii. 26).

Samson's exploits are twelve in number, and are the probable origin of the Greek story of the twelve labours of Hercules. These twelve exploits are associated with three women, and fall into three groups of four, as follows:--

Samson's Twelve Exploits in Judges.

A | WIFE, A WOMAN OF TIMNATH.
  a | The lion rent (xiv. 5).
    b | Thirty men slain (xiv. 19).
  a | Jackals and firebrands (xv. 4, 5).
    b | Philistines smitten hip and thigh (xv. 7, 8).
B | HARLOT OF GAZA.
  a | Cords become like burnt flax (xv. 14).
    b | A thousand slain with jaw bone (xv. 15).
    b | He drank of water that came out (xv. 19).
  a | Carried the gates of Gaza to hill top (xvi. 3).
C | DELILAH, PROBABLY A JEWESS (see Josephus).
  a | Seven green withs (xvi. 8).
    b | New ropes (xvi. 11).
  a | Seven locks of hair (xvi. 13).
    b | Over 300 slain at his death (xvi. 27-30).

Samson's first act, the slaying of the lion, the production of sweetness from its carcass, and the evident humility that restrained him from telling his parents, are a clear foreshadowing of the work of Christ. The attitude of the men of Judah who said: "Knowest thou not that the Philistines are rulers over us?" (Judges xv. 10, 11), and their attempt to deliver Samson over to the Philistines is parallel with the attitude of the Jews who said: "We have no King but Cæsar" (John xix. 15), and who delivered the Lord up to their Roman rulers.

Samson however develops vanity and self-praise, and although in his own person he is still used, he becomes less and less a type of the Lord.

Delilah is not spoken of as a Philistine. She betrayed Samson for eleven hundred pieces of silver (Judges xvi. 5), exactly the same sum as was used to make the Ephod, and which finally became a curse to Samson's own tribe (Judges xvii. 2). The name Delilah means effeminate, or enfeebling, qualities which are the opposite of the Nazarite character. Three times over did Delilah tempt Samson, and three times over did he rebut here with lies. What a contrast with Christ, Who met the threefold temptation in the wilderness, with a quotation from the Word of truth! Samson, having so far departed from the spirit of a Nazarite, was deprived of its outward symbol, his long hair, and was taken, blinded, and degraded.

On a set day the Philistines called for Samson to be brought out in order that they might make sport of him (Judges xvi. 25), just as the Lord was blindfolded, mocked and abused before His death.

Whilst Samson's last prayer is for vengeance,

> "Strengthen me, I pray thee, only this once, O God, that I may be at once avenged of the Philistines for my two eyes" (Judges xvi. 28).

that of Christ was for the forgiveness of His murderers:

"Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do"(Luke xxiii. 34).

The analysis of Samson's acts is rendered difficult by the strong intermixture of the flesh with the leading of the Spirit.

Samson "began to deliver" (Judges xiii. 5), but it was left to another, Samuel, more completely to realize the true type of deliverer. He also was dedicated to the Lord before birth, but did not fall from his high calling by giving way to the lusts of the flesh as did Samson. The strongest man, and also the weakest man, of the book of Judges is Samson. What a lesson for ourselves, that we should not trust in ourselves, but in "God that quickeneth the dead!"

No treatment of Samson's life and deeds can be considered complete that does not deal with the meaning and purpose of the Nazarite vow. Insufficiency of space, prevents our giving the subject consideration here, but we refer the interested reader to the article on the subject in the series entitled "Fundamentals of Dispensational Truth" in Volume XXII, page 123.

The Book of RUTH.
#1. The book as a whole; and the loss of the inheritance (i. 1-22).
pp. 127 - 132

The Book of Judges ends on a sad note:

> "In those days there was no king in Israel: every man did that which was right in his own eyes" (Judges xxi. 25).

It would be difficult to exaggerate the deplorable condition of Israel during many of the years covered by the Book of Judges. On the other hand it would be a mistake to paint the whole picture in the same somber colours. In Judges x., for example, we have the names of the two men who judged Israel for a period of 45 years, and there is nothing recorded of that period except the fact that Jair had 30 sons, who rode 30 colts and possessed 30 cities, so that it would appear that during this period things were fairly normal. The Book of Ruth gives us a glimpse of one of these periods "when the judges judged" (Ruth i. 1).

The book of Ruth fulfils several purposes:

(1) It reveals that even during the dark days of the Judges, there were some who lived their simple lives in the fear of the Lord.
(2) The example of utter faithfulness presented by the story of Ruth the Moabitess, stands out in bold relief against the dark background of the times, and gives encouragement to us in our own day of darkness and apostacy.
(3) The book supplies an important link in the genealogy of Christ as the Son of David.
(4) The introduction into that genealogy of a Moabitess illuminates the character of the God of all grace, prefiguring the acceptance of the Gentile, and indicating something of the gracious work of the Saviour.
(5) But perhaps more important than all is the light this book throws upon that most important typical figure, the Kinsman-Redeemer.

If we turn to Eph. i., we find there a twofold presentation of redemption:

(1) REDEMPTION FROM BONDAGE.
"In Whom we have redemption through His blood, the forgiveness of sins, according to the riches of His grace" (Eph. i. 7).

(2) REDEMPTION OF A POSSESSION.
"Which is the earnest of our inheritance, until the redemption of the purchased possession" (Eph. i. 14).

In the first passage the word aphesis ("forgiveness") is used, meaning "setting free from bondage" (See Luke iv. 18). In the second passage, sin and bondage are not in view. The figure is an "earnest" now in view of a "possession" then; and as the possession has been forfeited, redemption is essential. It is this second aspect of redemption that finds so beautiful an illustration in the Book of Ruth, and makes its study so profitable.

The central and longest portions of the book revolve round the figure of Boaz as the Kinsman-Redeemer (Gaal). The word gaal and its derivates, which are variously translated "redeem", "right", "right to redeem", and "kinsman" occur no less than twenty times in these central chapters.

The simplest analysis of the book seems to be as follows. The first chapter simply puts us in possession of the circumstances that involved the forfeiture of the inheritance, while the closing verses of the fourth chapter reveal its redemption.

A | A | i. 1-18. \ Sons dead.
} No more sons possible.
B | i. 19-22. / Inheritance suspended.
B | C | ii. 1-23. Kindness to living and dead. \ Kinsman-
C | iii. 1 - iv. 13. Name of dead not cut off. / Redeemer.
A | B | iv. 14-18. \ Better than seven sons.
} Genealogy to David.
A | iv. 19-22. / Inheritance redeemed.

In this article we propose to clear the way by examining chapter i., so that the central chapters (ii. 1 - iv. 13) may be considered together as a whole next time.

We are not told why Elimelech should have felt constrained to move from Bethlehem owing to famine, for there must have been many families similarly stricken. Perhaps the names of his children indicate that they were very delicate, for Mahlon means "Sickly" and Chilion "Pining". There is more significance, however, in this than the merely physical. In direct contrast with the names meaning "sickly" and "pining" we have Boaz, "Strong", who alone is able to redeem that which by weakness and death the two sons of Elimelech had lost. The reader will realize that in the Apostle's reference to "the weak and beggarly elements", in contrast with Christ the Redeemer, we have a continuance of the same lesson in New Testament terms.

The name Elimelech means "My God is King", a splendid name during the dark days of the Book of Judges, when there was "no king in Israel". It balances the close of the book, where, in the last verse, we read of David, the first king of God's choice. There is also significance in the fact that Bethlehem means "The House of Bread" and Ephratha "Fruitful", though neither of these titles were fulfilled in the case of Naomi, until the advent of the Kinsman-Redeemer. Again, Naomi's name means "Sweetness", and here the book itself assures us that it has a typical meaning. In i. 20 we read that Naomi changed her name to Mara, meaning "bitter". This word is used of Israel in Exod. i. 14, and also of their initial experience as the redeemed of the Lord in Exod. xv. 23, where, at the waters of Marah, sweetness was produced by the application of a tree—an obvious type of redemption.

The Book of Ruth is read by the Jews in their synagogues at Pentecost, the period of harvesting, since much of the book is concerned with reaping and gleaning. Pentecost is the prophetic pledge of the final restoration of Israel, and the two houses, Judah and Israel, are typified by the two loaves baken with leaven (Lev. xxiii. 17). This twofold character of the restoration is set forth in Zech xi. 7 under the symbol of the two staves "Beauty" and "Bands". In case the reader should wonder what this has to do with the Book of Ruth, it must be explained that Naomi, "Pleasant", is the same word as "Beauty", while "Bands", meaning "Pledge", is linked up with the idea of a "Surety", as the parallelism of Prov. xx. 16 shows. All this may not be very obvious to the Gentiles reader, but the Hebrew mind would seize upon these associations and see in the restoration of Naomi at Pentecost by a Kinsman-Redeemer, a prophecy of the future restoration of all Israel.

The structure of the opening verses focuses our attention upon the two sons.

Ruth i. 1-3.
From Bethlehem to Moab.

A | A | i. 1-3. |
a1 | A certain man. Unnamed at first.
b1 | Bethlehem-Judah.
c1 | Sojourn. Moab.
a1 | He and his wife.
d | TWO SONS.
a2 | Names given.
b2 | Bethlehem-Judah.
c2 | Continued. Moab.
a2 | He died.
d | TWO SONS.

After the death of Elimelech, the two sons married two women of Moab, and lived together for ten years. In both cases the marriages were childless, and at the death of the two sons, the three widows were faced with a serious problem. Elimelech's inheritance which passed on to Mahlon and Chilion was temporarily suspended owing to the fact that no child had been born to either of the two sons. This gives point to the otherwise rather strange reference that Naomi makes to the idea of the two widows waiting until she, Naomi, might re-marry and have further sons—a far-fetched argument to our ears, but not so when read in the light of the law of Moses, to which we must make reference later. We do not propose to give here the full outline of this first chapter, but pass on to the fourth member which is as follows:

Ruth i. 8-18.

A | A | i. 8-18. |
d1 | Ye dealt kindly with me.
e1 | "Rest" in house of husband.
e1 | "Tarry" for husband.
d1 | The Lord against me.
f | Orpah. Kissed.
Ruth. Clave.
d2 | She has gone back.
e2 | Her people. Her gods.
d2 | Intreat me not to leave.
e2 | Thy people. Thy God.

In those days the lot of an unmarried woman was such that marriage with almost anyone, however irksome, was preferable. Naomi speaks of Orpah and Ruth "finding rest" (menuchah) in the house of a husband. The same word is repeated in Ruth iii. 1: "Shall I not seek rest for thee?" This figure, too, is prophetic; for in Isaiah we find marriage terms employed to describe the glory of that future day when Israel shall be restored. In Isa. lxii. we read that Israel shall be called Hephzi-bah, "My delight is in her", and the land Beulah, "Married" (Isa. lxii. 4). Again, in Isa. xxxii.:

> "And My people shall dwell in a peaceable habitation, and in sure dwellings, and in quiet resting places (menuchah)" (Isa. xxxii. 18).

The contrast between Orpah and Ruth is most marked. Orpah "kissed" her mother-in-law; but Ruth "clave" to her. Orpah went back to "her people" and to "her gods", but Ruth chooses Naomi's "people" and Naomi's "God".

The beauty of the words of Ruth as recorded in verses 16 and 17 will move the heart so long as the world endures. They are comparable with the lowly act of love which the Saviour said should be remembered wheresoever the gospel was preached (Matt. xxvi. 13).

> "Intreat me not to leave thee, or to return from following after thee: for whither thou goest, I will go, and where thou lodgest, I will lodge: thy people shall be my people, and thy God my God. Where thou diest, will I die, and there will I be buried: the Lord do so to me and more also, if ought but death part thee and me" (Ruth i. 16, 17).

And so these two took the long road back to Bethlehem, and arrived there at the beginning of the barley harvest. There are no accidents in God's providence. His hand guided; His heart planned, and Boaz, all unwittingly, was awaiting his appointed time and work.

We are now ready to take up the great story of the Kinsman-Redeemer as it is unfolded in the central section of this beautiful little book. May the faithfulness of Ruth be an inspiration to each of us in these days when so many seem to do "that which is right in the sight of their own eyes".

For the sake of those readers who appreciate structural outlines in detail, and wish to have them as complete as possible, we give below the structure of verses 19-22.

Ruth i. 19-22.

A | B | i. 19-22. |
g | Came to Bethlehem.
h | Is this Naomi?
i1 | Call me not Naomi.
j1 | Call me Mara.
The Lord hath dealt bitterly with me.
i1 | I went out full.
j1 | Brought back empty.
i2 | Why call me Naomi?
j2 | The Lord testified against me.
The Almighty hath afflicted me.
g | Came to Bethlehem.
h | Beginning of barley harvest.

The Book of RUTH.
#2. The Kinsman-Redeemer (ii. 1 - iv. 22).
pp. 165 - 171

The central sections of the Book of Ruth are mainly concerned with the Kinsman-Redeemer. It is evident, therefore, that before we can rightly appreciate the narrative of Ruth ii.-iv., we must be well acquainted with the teaching of Scripture concerning this important office.

Ruth ii. opens with the statement: "And Naomi had a kinsman of her husband", and this note is repeated with variations throughout the section. In verse 3 we read that Ruth's "hap was to light on a part of the field belonging unto Boaz, who was of the kindred of Elimelech".

In verse 20, when Ruth returns to her mother-in-law with her gleanings, we find that Naomi links up the thought of kindness to the dead, with that of nearness of kin:

> "Blessed be he of the Lord, Who hath not left off His kindness to the living and to the dead. And Naomi said unto her, The man is near of kin unto us, one of our next kinsmen" (Ruth ii. 20).

There are four words used in connection with Boaz and his kinship with Naomi, which may be set out as follows:

(1) He was a "kinsman" of Elimelech (Ruth ii. 1). Here the word translated "kinsman" is moda, derived from yada, "to know". The word implies very intimate knowledge, as the usage of Gen. iv. 1 indicates, and is used in Isa. liii.: "By His knowledge shall My righteous servant justify many" (11). When we realize the relationship between this word and the "Kinsman" and "Kinsman-Redeemer" we begin to see a fuller reason for its use in Isa. liii., and a deeper meaning in many of the N.T. references to "knowledge".

(2) We also read that Boaz was of the "kindred" of Elimelech (Ruth ii. 3). Here the word translated "kindred" is mishpachah, from the root shapach, "to join" or "associate". Mishpachah is translated "after their kinds" (Gen. viii. 19), "after their families" (Gen. x. 5); and is the word "family" in Ruth ii. 1. Ruth uses the word twice in ii. 13 in reference to herself as a "handmaid". Once again profound doctrine is resident in these facts. To be redeemed one must be of the same "family" or "kind" as the redeemer. It was a necessity, therefore, that the Lord from heaven should become man and that the Word should be made flesh.

(3) In Ruth ii. 20 Naomi says of Boaz: "The man is near of kin to us." Here the word translated "near of kin" is qarob. Readers who depend upon Young's Analytical Concordance should note that this reference is omitted both under "Near" and "Near of kin". The verb qarab, "to come near", is used in the same intimate sense as the verb "to know" (see Gen. xx. 4), and once again the instructed reader will appreciate the fuller meaning behind the N.T. references to drawing near, both on the part of the Saviour Himself, and of those whom He has redeemed.

(4) This is perhaps the most important reference and is found in Ruth ii. 20: "The man is near of kin unto us, one of our next kinsmen." Here the margin informs us that the passage may be translated: "One that hath right to redeem." The word here is Goel ( - In the Concordance, Goel is found under Gaal, "to redeem".), or "Kinsman-Redeemer".

The "Kinsman-Redeemer" played an important part in the Hebrew economy and is referred to in Lev. xxv., where we find the first statement of the law concerning the redemption of land. Under the law of Moses it was not possible for a man to sell the land that formed part of his true possession "in perpetuity". In every transaction with regard to the sale of land, it was compulsory to "grant a redemption" (Lev. xxv. 23, 24). If a man had "sold away" any part of his possession, on account of poverty, his "next of kin" had the right to redeem it. A special provision was made for the safeguarding of the inheritance to the rightful family, which is set out at length in Deut. xxv. 5-10:

"If brethren dwell together, and one of them die, and have no child, the wife of the dead shall not marry without unto a stranger: her husband's brother shall take her to him to wife, and perform the duty of an husband's brother unto her. And it shall be, that the firstborn which she beareth shall succeed in the name of his brother which is dead, that his name be not put out of Israel. And if the man like not to take his brother's wife, then let his brother's wife go up to the gate unto the elders, and say, My husband's brother refuseth to raise up unto his brother a name in Israel; he will not perform the duty of my husband's brother. Then the elders of his city shall call him, and speak unto him: and if he stand to it, and say, I like not to take her: then shall his brother's wife come unto him in the presence of the elders, and loose his shoe from off his foot, and spit in his face, and shall answer and say, So shall it be done unto that man that will not build up his brother's house. And his name shall be called in Israel, The house of him that hath his shoe loosed."

This law was certainly in the minds of Naomi, Ruth and Boaz, and its recognition makes the reading of Ruth ii.-iv., vivid and plain. Before turning to Ruth, however, we must mention the other aspect of the Kinsman-Redeemer's work—that of the "avenger of blood". The word Goel is translated "avenger" or "revenger" in 13 passages, and we are told in Numb. xxxv. that cities of refuge were provided so that a man could get a hearing and a trial in the event of having slain another without premeditation. This aspect of the Kinsman's duty does not, however, come into the story of Ruth.

With the information we have gathered, both as to the various words used for kinship and the law concerning the kinsman and his brother's widow, let us return now to Ruth and read the story again in the light of these facts. First of all let us see the structure of the passage.

Ruth iii. 1 - iv. 13.

A | iii. 1-9. | a | c | Shall I not find rest for thee?
d | Is not Boaz of our kindred?
b | e | When Boaz finishes eating and drinking.
f | Mark the place where he shall lie.
g | Uncover his feet.
h | Lay thee down.
i | He will tell thee what to do.
i | All that thou sayest I will do.
e | When Boaz had eaten and drunk.
f | He went to lie down.
g | Uncovered his feet.
h | Laid down.
a | c | Who art thou?
b | j | I am Ruth, thine handmaid.
k | Spread thy skirt over.
j | Thou art a near kinsman.
B | iii. 10-13. Boaz explains about the nearer kinsman. Promises to redeem.
C | iii. 14-18. Ruth assured.
B | iv. 1-6. Boaz advertises the other kinsman. Fulfil his promise to redeem.
A | iv. 7-13. The inheritance secured. Ruth becomes wife to Boaz.

We have not felt justified in setting out the whole of the passage in detail. We have given the sections, and set out the first one as an example, so that the reader should find little difficulty in completing the structure if it be deemed necessary.

Naomi's words in chapter iii. find a parallel in Ruth i. 9:

> "The Lord grant you that ye may find rest, each of you in the house of her husband" (Ruth i. 9).
> "My daughter, shall I not seek rest for thee, that it may be will with thee?" (Ruth iii. 1).

No longer has Naomi to speak of a possible husband and future sons (Ruth i. 12, 13) for now she can say: "Is not Boaz of our kindred?" (Ruth iii. 2).

It was the custom at threshing time for the owner to remain all night on the threshing-floor, until the harvest was safely gathered. Naomi knew this and instructed Ruth how to act. Judged by modern standard of morality Ruth would probably be condemned, but Boaz bears testimony that "all the city of my people dost know that thou art a virtuous woman" (Ruth iii. 11).

When Ruth said: "Spread thy skirt over thine handmaid for thou art a near kinsman" (or, one who has the right to redeem) (Ruth iii. 9). Boaz knew that she was asking him not only to redeem the land that had been lost, but also to marry her and so save the name of the dead husband from being blotted out. Boaz is touched by the fact that Ruth had not followed after young men, but had let her choice fall upon one who was apparently many years her senior.

Boaz was not Ruth's brother-in-law and was, therefore, under no compulsion in the matter, for the law of Deut. xxv. is concerned with the "husband's brother", and the case of "brethren dwelling together" (Deut. xxv. 5, 6). By removing to Moab Elimelech had made impossible the second of these conditions, and Boaz, though of the kindred of Elimelech, was not the deceased husband's brother.

We find this practice of the marrying of the brother's widow in operation before the giving of the law (see Gen. xxxviii. 8), and we have records of its existence in Athens, in Persia, in Tartary and Circassia, and among the Druzes. Niebuhr writes:

> "It does indeed happen among the Mohametans that a man marries his brother's widow, but she has no right to compel him so to do."

We shall discover in the Book of Ruth a blending of the law of Moses and also the more ancient custom referred to above.

Boaz was obliged, in fairness, to defer complying with Ruth's request, for, said he: "It is true that I am thy near kinsman, howbeit there is a kinsman nearer than I" (Ruth iii. 12). However, Boaz probably guessed that the marrying of the Moabitess would be a stumbling-block in the other kinsman's way, and promises to perform the office of the kinsman himself, should the nearer kinsman fail.

It is interesting to note that, while Ruth's virtue could not apparently be called in question, and neither she nor Boaz had any cause for shame, they did not in anyway flaunt their innocence, but sought rather to preserve their good name from the smallest suspicion of evil:

> "Let it not be known that a woman came into the floor" (Ruth iii. 14).

Naomi's immediate question: "Who art thou, my daughter?" (Ruth iii. 16) does not mean that she was unable to distinguish Ruth owing to the early hour of the day, but rather expresses her intense desire to know what had transpired (compare Judges xviii. 8). In Ruth ii. 19 Naomi had enquired where Ruth had gleaned, and when she was shown the ephah of barley she immediately perceived that the Lord's hand was in it. So here, when she sees the six measures of barley, she expresses her confidence that Boaz will not rest until the matter is settled.

In Ruth iii. 15 the A.V. reads: "And she went unto the city." This, however, is incorrect, the true rendering being: "And he went into the city." Boaz meant to lose no time in bringing the matter to a head. Sitting down in the gate where all public transactions were carried out, he hails the other kinsman and, in the presence of the ten men that had been secured to make the transaction legal, he says to him:

> "Naomi, that is come again out of the country of Moab, selleth a parcel of land, which was our brother Elimelech's. And I thought to advertise thee, saying, Buy it before the inhabitants, and before the elders of my people. If thou wilt redeem it, redeem it: but if thou wilt not redeem it, then tell me, that I may know: for there is none to redeem it beside thee: and I am after thee. And he said, I will redeem it. Then said Boaz, What > day thou buyest the field of the hand of Naomi, thou must buy it also of Ruth the Moabitess, the wife of the dead, to raise up the name of the dead upon his inheritance."

While the nearer kinsman was quite willing to redeem the parcel of land, he was not willing to marry the Moabitess and he therefore relinquishes his right. Boaz and the other kinsman then follow a custom that was even then ancient in Israel, whenever redeeming and changing were to be confirmed:

> "A man plucked off his shoe and gave it to his neighbour: and this was a testimony in Israel" (Ruth iv. 7).

To place one's shoe upon anything was a symbol of possession. To take off one's shoe and pass it to another was a symbol of transference. The spreading of the skirt already alluded to was another symbol of transferred authority. Even to this day it is the custom to associate old boots with weddings, and although this is now simply a piece of harmless fun, the custom has its origin in these distant times.

It would seem that the nearer kinsman who failed probably sets forth the failure of man to redeem either himself or his brother, and that the transference to Boaz is an indication that Christ's alone is strong enough to undertake the task.

We next read that Boaz calls upon the elders and the people to witness that he has bought all that was Elimelech's, Chilion's and Mahlon's, of the hand of Naomi, and further, that he has purchased Ruth the Moabitess, the wife of Mahlon, to be his wife, and that he intends to play the kinsman-redeemer's part and to "raise up the name of the dead upon his inheritance, that the name of the dead be not cut off". In reply, the people not only declare themselves witnesses, but also express their pleasure by adding words of blessing. There is pointed meaning in the reference they make to "Pharez whom Tamar bare unto Judah", for in Gen. xxxviii. we have the story of one who, by refusing to do the kinsman's part, not only involved himself in death, but his brother's widow in immorality. Boaz, it is implied, represents the reverse of all this.

We now reach the conclusion of the book:

A | B | iv. 14-17. |
a | The Woman.
b | Blessed be the Lord . . . . . a kinsman to thee.
c | Name famous in Israel.
d | Nourisher.
d | Nurse.
a | The Women.
b | A son born to Naomi.
c | Name Obed (Jesse, David).
A | iv. 18-22. | e | The generations of Pharez.
Pharez begat . . . . . David.

Not only is Ruth, the Moabitess, graciously brought under the wing of the God of Israel, and her temporal needs satisfied by the love and wealth of Boaz the Strong, but a link is also made in the chain that binds Adam to Christ, and Ruth finds an honourable place not only in the line of David, but in the genealogy of David's greater Son (Matt. i. 5).

When we remember that the Scriptural redeemer must be a kinsman and an Israelite, and also that the Redeemer of Israel is set forth as Israel's Lord and God (cf. Isa. xli. 14; xliii. 14; xliv. 6, 24, etc.), we are confronted with a problem which can only be solved in the light of the person of Christ as "God manifest in the flesh".

With this delightful story the O.T. narrative passes on from the days of the Judges to the times of Samuel. We can but be thankful for the presence of this interlude of simple faith and love in the midst of much that is a record of failure and departure. It would almost seem that the God of Israel points to the faith of the Moabitess here in much the same way as, when in the flesh, He drew attention to the faith of the centurion (Matt. viii. 10, 11).

Blessed be God for every one that can say with Job: "I know that my Redeemer liveth."

The Book of SAMUEL.
#1. The Closing Days of the Judges.
(I Samuel i. 1 - viii. 3).
pp. 211 - 215

Rather in the same way as the Book of Ruth establishes a link between the days of the Judges and the days of David, so the opening book of Samuel begins with the days of the Judges and ends with the death of Saul. The books of Samuel, Kings and Chronicles form a complete whole, and were apparently written by the three prophets, Samuel, Gad and Nathan.

> "Now the acts of David the King, first and last, behold, they are written in the book of Samuel the seer, and in the book of Nathan the prophet, and in the book of Gad the seer, with all this reign and his might, and the times that went over him, and over Israel and over all the kingdoms of the countries" (I Chron. xxix. 29, 30).

It is evident that the prophets often wrote the history of their own times, for we read:

> "Then Samuel told the people the manner of the kingdom, and write it in a book, and laid it up before the Lord" (I Sam. x. 25).

The prophet Gad comes into touch with David just after his escape from the cave of Adullam (I Sam. xxii. 5), and is called "David's seer" in I Chron. xxi. 9. Nathan also was closely associated with David, and continued on into the days of Solomon.

> "Now the rest of the acts of Solomon, first and last, are they not written in the books of Nathan the prophet?" (II Chron. ix. 29).

The records contained in the first four books of Kings are, therefore, the work of these three prophets, Samuel, Gad and Nathan.

The reader may, perhaps, be surprised at the phrase we have just used: "The first four books of Kings." The name of the book we are now studying is given in the A.V. as "The First Book of Samuel, otherwise the First Book of Kings". The books that are now called I and II Samuel were always reckoned by the Hebrews as one book, the present sub-division being derived from the Septuagint. That there was no break between the two books is evident from the Sedarim, or cycles for public reading. The twentieth Sedarim begins with I Sam. xxx. 25 and ends with II Sam. ii. 6, without showing the slightest break.

As to the purpose of these records, we are assured that beyond the mere preservation of the historical facts there was a more important purpose served. Speaking of the rejection of Christ and His Second Coming, Peter refers to the testimony of the prophets as follows:

> "Yea, and all the prophets from Samuel, and those that follow after as many as have spoken, have likewise foretold of these days" (Acts iii. 24).

In several ways Samuel stands to David as John the Baptist stands to the Lord. Both were born to mothers who were naturally barren. Samuel was dedicated as a Nazarite all his days, while of John it was said: "He shall neither drink wine nor strong drink." Samuel anointed David as King, while it was the special office of John the Baptist to testify at the baptism of Jordan that the Messiah had come. Samuel was rejected by the people, while John "decreased" until at last he suffered death in prison.

Hannah's song at the birth of Samuel has often been compared with Mary's song in Luke i. 46-55, but few seem to have noticed the close parallel between Hannah's song and that of Zacharias. Of Samuel, also, it is written: "And the child Samuel grew before the Lord" (I Sam. ii. 21), while of John we read: "And the child grew, and waxed strong in spirit" (Luke i. 80). As Samuel was the last of the judges and the first of the prophets, so John was the last of the prophets and the first of the disciples.

The first seven chapters of I Samuel take us back to the days of the judges and show us the sad state of the times, the failure of the priests, and the great need for a wise and firm ruler. With the opening of chapter viii., we find Samuel aged and his sons made judges; but alas, they follow in the footsteps of Eli's sons rather than in those of Samuel their father. The result of this is that Israel demand a king. They were certainly wrong to do so, but it was the misrule of Samuel's sons that was the main cause.

It is evident, as one reads I Sam. viii. 1-3, that there is an intended parallel here with the record of Eli and his sons.

> "And it came to pass, when Samuel was old, that he made his sons judges over Israel. Now the name of his firstborn was Joel; and the name of his second, Abiah: they were judges in Beer-sheba. And his sons walked not in his ways, but turned aside after lucre, and took bribes, and perverted judgment" (I Sam. viii. 1-3).
>
> "Now Eli was very old, and heard all that his sons did unto all Israel . . . . . I hear of your evil dealings by all this people" (I Sam. ii. 22, 23).

The nature of our exposition, the amount of the material before us, and the necessity to make some selection, make it impossible for us to deal with the lovely story of Hannah's faith, and young Samuel's innocence. Neither can we give detailed structures; if we were to do this, it would be fairly safe to say that we should be dealing with these Books of Kings for the remainder of our days. In this series we are simply endeavouring to point out the more important features in the onward movement of the purpose of the ages, and to give enough material to guide the earnest seeker into a fuller understanding of the passages under examination. We cannot, therefore, attempt a detailed analysis. The reader will find much to his hand in the margin of The Companion Bible.

Leaving the structure set out in The Companion Bible, we give instead the following analysis, which, as the reader will see, has the merit of focusing the attention upon the essential features, but, of course, omits much more than it can include.

I Samuel i. 1 - viii. 3.

A | i. 1 - ii. 21. Hannah. Her son.
The song.
Exalt the horn of His anointed.
B | ii. 22-26. Eli. Very old. His sons' evil dealings.
A | ii. 27 - vii. 17. A man of God. Eli's son.
The prophesy. "Faithful Priest."
"Before Mine Anointed."
B | viii. 1-3. Samuel. Old. His sons turned aside.

Hannah's song, in the first section of the structure, demands our attention. While its origin is the birth of Samuel, its burden is prophetic. It speaks of the enemies of the Lord being silenced and, as the song nears its conclusion, its Messianic character becomes more and more apparent.

> "The adversaries of the Lord shall be broken to pieces. Out of heaven shall He thunder upon them; The Lord shall judge the ends of the earth; and He shall give strength unto His King, and exalt the horn of His Anointed" (I Sam. ii. 10).

With this song should be compared Mary's song and the prophecy of Zacharias in Luke i.—particularly the words of verse 69: "And hath raised up an horn of salvation for us in the house of His servant David."

There is no need to enlarge upon the abominable actions of the sons of Eli, but we might notice in passing the way in which the sad story is punctuated, as it were, by the record of Samuel's growth:

> "And the child Samuel grew before the Lord" (I Sam. ii. 21).
> "And the child Samuel grew on, and was in favour both with the Lord, and also with men" (I Sam. ii. 26).
> "And Samuel grew, and the Lord was with him" (I Sam. iii. 19).

It has been objected that Samuel was but a Levite, and not a Priest, and that therefore his offering of the sacrifices was illegal. There are two good answers to this objection:

(1) When the Ark was in its place, and the worship of the Lord centralized, the specific duties of the priests could be enforced; but at this time the Ark was taken by the Philistines and Israel were without it for a period of twenty years (I Sam. vii. 2).
(2) In the days of apostacy the Lord has the right to suspend his laws to replace them by others. This does not, of course, give man the right to change the ordinances of the Lord on his own initiative.

The people had become so degraded that the ceremonial service, that should have enabled them to see the truth of atonement and sanctification, had degenerated into an unclean superstition, and Samuel was raised up, much like the prophets that succeeded him, to tell the people that incense so offered was an abomination.

> "Hath the Lord as great delight in burnt offerings and sacrifices, as in obeying the voice of the Lord? Behold, to obey is better than sacrifices and to hearken than the fat of rams" (I Sam. xv. 22).

Two very suggestive names occur in this section of Samuel, namely Ichabod and Ebenezer. When the punishment fell upon Hophni, Phinehas and Eli, and the Ark of the Lord was taken by the Philistines, the news brought to the wife of Phinehas at a critical time, for "she was with child, and near to be delivered" (I Sam. iv. 19). When she heard what had happened she bowed herself and gave birth to a son.

> "And about the time of her death, the women that stood by her said unto her, Fear not; for thou hast born a son. But she answered not, neither did she regard it. And she named the child Ichabod, saying, The glory is departed from Israel; because the ark of God was taken, and because of her father-in-law and her husband" (I Sam. iv. 20, 21).

The second name, "Ebenezer" means a "Stone of Help". The stone was erected to commemorate deliverance and was so named when the Philistines were obliged to return the Ark whose capture had been associated with the name Ichabod. In these two symbolic words we have a summing-up of the whole of Israel's history. No glory while the Presence of the Lord is removed from them, but when at last that glory returns, as we find in the closing chapters of Ezekiel, the sadness of the cry Ichabod will be turned to rejoicing and the people will say, "Hitherto hath the Lord helped us".

The reader will already be acquainted with the incidents of Samuel's early boyhood, and with the things that happened to the Philistines while they retained the Ark of the Lord, so that he will be able to supplement these notes as the occasion demands. We have but cleared a path through these opening chapters, leading up to the section which deals with the choice of Saul and the history of his reign. This section we must consider in our next study.

Great Plainness of Speech.

#3. The Difference between Doctrinal and Dispensational Truth.
pp. 21, 22

While we have insisted upon the fact that the Mystery is revealed for the first time in the Epistles to the Ephesians and Colossians by Paul when he was the Lord's prisoner, we have also insisted upon the basic character of much that he taught in the Epistle to the Romans. For instance, without the teaching of Rom. v.-viii., the great superstructure of Ephesians would stand upon no solid doctrinal foundation. But there is no contradiction in thus setting Romans aside dispensationally and retaining it doctrinally. It is because we believe that the pre-eminence of the Jew no longer obtains that we set Romans aside so far as its dispensational teaching is concerned. But we re-instate it so far as its great doctrine is concerned, for that doctrine of sin and death is as true for the Mystery as for the New Covenant blessings. We do however insist upon distinguishing between foundation and superstructure; between gospel and mystery; between that which is permanent and that which is passing. Quoting from the introduction to the Booklet entitled Roman Stones for the Ephesian Temple we read:

> "The cause of truth is sometimes damaged by the excessive zeal of its supporters. We believe most surely that the revelation of the Mystery in Eph. iii. and Col. i. marks the introduction of something as absolutely new as a 'new creation'; but the very new creation itself, which is yet to be, will have vital connections with those former things that pertain to the work of redemption, even though other 'former things' are to pass away."

It is for the sake of clearness, that we have used the term "Dispensational Truth", in order to distinguish such truth from "Doctrinal Truth". An example will help. The doctrinal truth of the inspiration of Holy Scripture belongs to all ages, callings and dispensations. We find it asserted by Moses and the Prophets, by the Evangelists, by Peter, and by Paul. But does the acceptance of that common doctrine nullify all the distinctions that are to be found existing between the inspired writings of Moses, Matthew, Peter and Paul? Most certainly not. The great basic doctrine of redemption by blood is found in all parts of Scripture, but the fact that redemption is a fundamental doctrine of the teachings of Paul, Peter and the Book of the Revelation does not in any sense alter the fact that the calling, sphere and destiny of those teachings differ essentially. If possible, still further to make clear these distinctions we seek to state as simply as possible the essential difference between "Doctrine" and Dispensation".

> By "Doctrinal Truth" we mean that fundamental teaching of the Scripture which touches what is common to all men as sinners and to all believers as saints. The doctrines of sin and death, of forgiveness, justification, sanctification and future glory, entered by resurrection, belong exclusively to no one dispensation. The teaching of Scripture concerning the Person and work of the Son of God belongs to no one dispensation, but is as wide as the needs of the sons of Adam.

By "Dispensational Truth" we mean those revealed truths that belong exclusively to some one dispensation. The "promise" of the Land to Israel must be distinguished from the "promise" that was made in Christ before the overthrow of the world. The "hope" of the glory of the New Jerusalem must be distinguished from the "hope" of the glory that shall be enjoyed in heavenly places at the right hand of God. While believers, during the Acts and in the dispensation of the mystery, were and are justified by faith, that common basis must not be used to nullify the totally different structures that God has been pleased to erect upon that common basis. We therefore urge upon all the necessity of distinguishing between the "doctrinal" teaching of Romans, true now as it was when written, and the subsequent revelation of the mystery, true only since Acts xxviii.

#4. Spiritual Gifts.
pp. 68, 69

In tabulating the "things that differ" in the two sets of Paul's epistles, prominence must be given to the subject of spiritual gifts. To say, as some do, that "miracles do not happen to-day" is not quite true. Every Divine interposition, or even answer to prayer, is a miracle. It is, however, true to say that there are no evidential miracles in the dispensation of the Mystery. The presence of evidential miracles is an important characteristic of the dispensation that preceded Acts xxviii., just as their absence characterizes the dispensation which was given to Paul as the Lord's prisoner.

The reader is asked to observe, however, that we do not say that in no circumstances to-day are evidential miracles possible; we are careful to speak only of the dispensation of the Mystery. If the Gospel of the Kingdom is to be preached in all the world for a witness unto all nations, before the end comes, then we must be prepared to find pioneers in heathen lands experiencing some of the evidences of the faith that belongs to the Kingdom. Confining ourselves, however, to the two sets of Paul's epistles, before and after Acts xxviii., we can say quite definitely that evidential miracles are characteristic of the former, while their complete absence is equally characteristic of the latter.

The classical passage in connection with spiritual gifts is, of course, I Cor. xii. It is important here that the thought of the "body" should be considered in relation to the context, namely, as an illustration of the "diversity in unity", which the Apostle sought to teach respecting the many and varied gifts that were given by the self-same Spirit. The "gifts" mentioned in Eph. iv. are not miraculous gifts, but gifts of men specially qualified as apostles, prophets, evangelists, pastors and teachers. A comparison of Eph. iv. 11 with I Cor. xii. 28-30 will show how fundamental in this respect is the difference between the two dispensations.

> Spiritual gifts such as healing the sick, raising the dead, immunity from the fatal results of snake-bite or poison, continue through the story of the Acts right up to the last chapter. They were in operation in the Churches founded by Paul, and were so much in evidence that instructions had to be given as to their regulation in the Church. Further, the possession by the Gentile believers of these spiritual gifts was allowed in order to provoke Israel to emulation, and to warn them of their approaching rejection. While Israel remained a people, and while their repentance was humanly possible, evidential gifts remained, but immediately Israel were set aside at Acts xxviii., and the dispensation of the Mystery was inaugurated, these gifts ceased, and have never been revived in connection with this dispensation. The Apostle, in I Cor. xiii., compares spiritual gifts with childish things, which will be "put away" when that which is perfect is come. Without teaching that Paul had the Mystery in mind when he wrote these words to the Corinthians, we can see now that they point to an obvious truth. Spiritual gifts belong to childhood, while the Church of the One Body has to do with the stature of the fullness of Christ and the perfect man. Accordingly we affirm that spiritual gifts, such as tongues, healings and miracles, have no place in the dispensation of the Mystery.

#5. What is the Hope of our calling?
pp. 122, 123

It is an amazing thing to discover that even when the distinctive nature of the dispensation of the Mystery has been seen, there are some who go back to I Thess. iv. for the revelation of their hope. In the nature of things, the hope of any calling must be in agreement with its peculiarities of sphere and constitution, and it is therefore impossible that the hope of Israel should also be the blessed hope of the Church of the Mystery. It may, of course, be objected that I Thess. iv. does not represent the hope of Israel. This, therefore, we must examine.

The Acts of the Apostles opens with the hope of Israel, both before and after Pentecost (Acts i. 6, iii. 19-36), and closes with the hope of Israel in Acts xxviii. 20. This hope, therefore, is in operation throughout the whole book and period. It is outside the scope of this series to do more than point out simple facts, and we will therefore deal only with the hope of the Church at the time when Paul wrote the Epistle to the Romans. This must, however, be identical with the hope of all other churches that came under the same dispensation.

In Rom. xv. 12, 13 the Apostle writes:

> "Isaiah saith, There shall be a root of Jesse, and He that shall rise to reign over the Gentiles; in Him shall the Gentiles hope. Now the God of the hope fill you with all joy and peace in believing, that ye may abound in the hope, through the power of the Holy Ghost."

The reader has only to turn to Isa. xi., to which this passage refers, to prove beyond the possibility of doubt, that the hope to the Church in Rome at this time was Millennial. The reference to the Archangel in I Thess. iv. makes another link with Israel, as does the connecting passage in II Thess. ii. where the Man of Sin is spoken of. In I Cor. i. 7 the "coming" of the Lord is actually the "revelation" or "apocalypse".

The hope of the Church of the Mystery must be the realization of the calling that places it far above all principalities at the right hand of God, a hope that is far removed from Isa. xi. It is set forth in Col. iii. 4, where it is associated with the manifestation in glory, when Christ Himself shall be made manifest.

> The hope of any company of believers must of necessity be the realization of their calling. It is obvious that the calling of the Church in Ephesians differs materially in sphere, constitution, and destiny from that of the Church at Rome or Thessalonica during the Acts. The hope of these churches must be the fruition of the covenants that were then in force, namely, the covenant with Abraham and the new covenant with Israel and Judah. Members of the Church of the Mystery are taught to set their minds on things above, and that their hope is that when Christ shall be manifested, they will be there with Him, not in the air, or in the New Jerusalem, but "in glory".

The interested reader will find articles dealing with the distinctive hope of the Church of the Mystery as compared with that of the early Church in the following Volumes:

#6. Dispensational Truth.
pp. 159, 160

The word "dispensation" is in continual use in these studies, and it is important that we should not misunderstand its meaning. It has sometimes been confused with the word "age", with the result that some have thought it to be impossible that two or more dispensations could be running together. While, of course, a dispensation must occupy time, and have a beginning and an end, the question of time is not so much in view as the characteristics that mark any special period in the outworking of the purpose of the ages, particularly in so far as this purpose has to do with various spheres and callings. The word comes particularly into prominence in the ministry of the apostle Paul. Until the time came for God to recall to favour the far-off Gentiles, there was no need to lay great stress upon the necessity of right division or of distinguishing dispensations. With the call and commission of the Apostle to the Gentiles, however, came the necessity to distinguish between Kingdom and Church, Jew and Gentile, and Bride and Body.

The word translated "dispensation" means "stewardship" or "house management". When, therefore, Paul claimed that to him had been given the dispensation of the Mystery, he claimed to be the God-given steward and administrator of the Church of the One Body. While Paul fulfilled his appointed commission among the Gentiles, Peter, James and John were equally fulfilling theirs among the circumcision; and for many years the two dispensations, represented by Paul and Peter, ran concurrently.

> A "dispensation" in Scripture indicates that some distinctive phase of the purpose of the ages is in view, and that some group of characteristics mark it off from other phases. Usually some chosen instrument—for instance, Moses or Paul—is identified with the revelation of its terms and the administering of its laws.
>
> "Dispensational truth" indicates a particular revelation of God's will to man during some particular administration. It is not so much concerned with doctrine common to all ages and to all men (e.g., the fact of sin, the inspiration of Scripture, etc.), but with points of difference (e.g., the hope set before any particular company, the sphere in which it will be enjoyed, etc.).

#7. The Ages.
pp. 182, 183

We remarked in No.6 of this series that the word "dispensation" is often confused with the word "age", and it may therefore be helpful if we now consider the meaning of this second word. The meaning and importance of the "ages" in Scriptural teaching has been obscured by the fact that in most places the words olam, aionios, and aion are translated in terms of eternity—"for ever" or "everlasting"—instead of in terms of time. The purpose of the ages in one complete whole but the dispensational sub-divisions in its outworking are many. While the sphere of blessing of the Church of the Mystery differs most essentially from that of earthly Israel, both callings are an essential part of the one purpose of the ages. This is not the place to discuss the varying translations of olam and aion. In this article we are simply stating our conclusions as clearly as possible. The references given to articles in The Berean Expositor will, however, supply the reader with a fairly comprehensive survey of the usage and meaning of the words concerned.

The words OLAM, AION and AIONIOS, usually translated "for ever" and "everlasting" in the A.V., do not refer, either in themselves or in their usage, to eternity, but to time. The one word "age", with its variants, "age-long", "age-abiding", "ages of ages", etc., gives a complete presentation of the truth of Scripture. It is therefore important to discover whether any particular reference in the A.V. is a translation of these words, before any doctrine is deduced involving the idea of eternity as distinct from that of the ages.

For a fuller treatment of this subject and allied themes, the reader is referred to the following pages in The Berean Expositor:

#8. Three "Adoptions" and three Spheres of Blessing.
pp. 221 - 223

Covenants, Dispensations, Ages and Callings, with their associated doctrines, walks and peculiarities, testify to the fact that there are several spheres of blessing, viz., the Earth, the New Jerusalem and the Heavenly Places of Ephesians. These spheres are clearly indicated by name and characteristics in the Scriptures.

The Earth, both during the millennial reign of Christ and afterward, is to be blessed and inhabited by a redeemed people. The O.T. Prophets abound with references to this sphere, while such passages in the N.T. as "Thy Kingdom come, Thy will be done in earth as it is in heaven" confirm the literality of these predictions. Associated with this earthly sphere is a city, Jerusalem, which is to be the centre of rule and light to all the nations of the earth.

One of the finest demonstrations of the fact of these three spheres that Scripture provides, is the use of the word "adoption", which means the "placing as a son", and includes the idea of the making of a will and appointing the heir. It also includes the idea involved in the Scriptural meaning of the Firstborn. It is manifestly impossible for a man to have three first-born sons, unless, like Abraham, he has had three families; and if Scripture reveals three different callings that have the "adoption", it will be a clear proof that there must be at least three different spheres of blessing.

In the earthly sphere, the adoption pertains to Israel.

> "My kinsmen according to the flesh, who are Israelites, to whom pertaineth the adoption" (Rom. ix. 3, 4).

It is impossible to speak of a "spiritual Israel" with this plain passage before us, so we are compelled to interpret literally.

In the second sphere, the adoption pertains to both Jew and Gentile who walk in the steps of the faith of Abraham—the father of all who believe. These are severed from the Jerusalem which is below, and find their calling and sphere of blessing in the Jerusalem that is above.

> "To redeem them that were under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons" (Gal. iv. 5).
>
> "That the blessing of Abraham might come on the Gentiles through Jesus Christ; that we might receive the promise of the Spirit through faith" (Gal. iii. 14).
>
> "If ye be Christ's then are ye Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise" (Gal. iii. 29).
>
> "Jerusalem which is above is free, which is the mother of us all" (Gal. iv. 26).

The epistle to the Hebrews (which some, with good reason, believe was written at the same time as Galatians) speaks of "birthright", "the heavenly Jerusalem", "the Church of the firstborn" (Heb. xii. 16, 22, 23), and makes it clear that to Abraham two sets of promises were made viz., (1) The Land, and (2) The heavenly City. Israel according to the flesh will inherit the first, and believing Jews, and Gentiles called during the Acts period, will inherit the second.

The third sphere is limited to the Dispensation of the Mystery. The adoption of Eph. i. 5 cannot be the same as that of Rom. ix. or Gal. iv., but pertains to the third sphere of blessing which is in "heavenly places", far above all principality and power, where Christ sitteth at the right hand of God.

Israel are called the Firstborn on the earth (Exod. iv. 22). Those who inherit the New Jerusalem are called the Church of the Firstborn whose names are written in heaven, while the Church of the Mystery constitute the body of Him Who is the Firstborn from the dead.

To each sphere of blessing pertains a citizenship. To the earthly sphere, the citizenship of Zion goes with the adoption (Psa. lxxxvii.). To the second sphere pertains the citizenship of the New Jerusalem, and to the third sphere, the citizenship which is in heaven where Christ now sits in the holiest of all (Eph. ii. 19, Phil. iii. 20—"conversation" [politeuma] = "citizenship"). In each sphere, those who have the adoption have pre-eminence. In the earth, Israel will be the head, a Kingdom of Priests, and "The nation and kingdom that will not serve thee (Israel) shall perish" (Isa. lx. 12). In the second sphere, the pre-eminence that belongs to the adoption is not national but spiritual: "The saints shall judge angels" (I Cor. vi. 3), and in the heavenly city, where there is an innumerable company of angels, the saints have the pre-eminence, being the "Church of the firstborn" (Heb. xii. 22, 23). To angels God has not subjected the world to come (Heb. ii. 5). In the third sphere, neither nations nor angels are mentions, but principalities, powers, might, and dominion—the very aristocracy of glory. "In Christ" the Church of the Mystery is far above even such.

> We therefore hold and teach that there are three spheres of blessing, viz., the Earth, the New Jerusalem, and the Heavenly Places, which by way of distinction we call the super-heavens (en tois epouraniois), closely allied with three distinct Callings, the Kingdom, the Bride and the Body. We believe the recognition of three spheres honours the record of Scripture which speaks of three distinct adoptions, reveals three phases of the "second coming" as the hope of each separate company, introduces order where there is confusion, faces the presence of miraculous gifts in the Acts period (and their absence now) with clear sighted understanding, and makes the walk that is worthy of each separate calling clear and definite.

#14. The Rebuilding of Palestine. An approximation to prophecy, though not a fulfillment.

pp. 15 - 19

It is a mistake to look upon the various movements of the nations at the present time as being equivalent to the budding of the fig tree referred to in Matt. xxiv. or Luke xxi. One has only to consider the context of the parable to see that this cannot be true. Matt. xxiv. 33, 34 speaks of "these things", referring to the tribulation and signs in the heavens (Matt. xxiv. 29). The same phrase is used in Luke xxi. 31, where the reference is to the encompassing of Jerusalem with armies, and signs in the heavens. These things have not yet taken place, and therefore much that is being done in Palestine may yet be overthrown and destroyed. Nevertheless, there is an undoubted movement in the "valley of dry bones". There are certainly approximations to prophecy, even if the fulfillment is yet future. No one can consider the rapid developments in the land of Palestine that are at present taking place, without realizing how they confirm the fact that all the prophecies of Israel's restoration shall be literally fulfilled.

Among the many evidences of an awakening of national consciousness is the new Palestine coinage. The name "Palestine" occurs on the coins in three languages, English, Hebrew and Arabic. The most significant feature, however, is not always noticed, even by those who have handled the coins. After the Hebrew word for Palestine come two letters in brackets, Aleph and Yod. These two letters stand for "Eretz Israel", meaning "The Land of Israel". The same abbreviation occurs on the postage stamps and all official documents, and its use is sanctioned by the British Government.

- - - I l l u s t r a t i o n - - -
(BE-XXVIII.16).

Another noticeable change is the revival, after many centuries, of the Hebrew language as a living tongue. Until recently Hebrew was known only to the scholar, the spoken language being Yiddish. A number of years ago a well-known Jewish leader, E. Ben Yehuda, initiated a movement to make Hebrew the language of the people in Palestine, and to-day the ancient language of the O.T. is the national language of the Jew from one end of the land to the other. Books and papers in Hebrew are now issued and circulated in Palestine, just as English books and papers are here.

One of the most remarkable features of the new Palestine is the amount of building that is going on. More than 2,500 years ago, Isaiah gave a graphic picture of what will yet take place in Palestine:

> "And they shall build the old wastes, and they shall raise up the former desolations, and they shall repair the waste cities, the desolations of many generations" (Isa. lxi. 4).

The time for the fulfillment of this prophecy is the "acceptable year of the Lord", when Israel shall be named "The priests of the Lord". This time has not yet come, but the great rebuilding of which Isaiah speaks is being anticipated by the people who are returning to their land now in unbelief. The "old wastes" are indeed being built again.

The prophecy of Ezek. xxxvi. 33-35 is much to the same effect:

> "The wastes shall be builded, and the desolate land shall be tilled, whereas it lay desolate in the sight of all that passed by. And they shall say, This land that was desolate is become like the garden of Eden: and the waste and desolate and ruined cities are become fenced and are inhabited."

This however, will not be fulfilled until the day when "clean water" shall be sprinkled upon them "and they shall be clean". A new heart is also to be given them at this time. We are therefore under no delusion about the building activity that is going on in Palestine by unbelieving Israel at the present time. The very activity, however, indicates that the "dry bones" are moving, even though they may not yet "live" in the sight of the Lord (Ezek. xxxvii.).

In the early days of Jewish colonization, it took about 60 acres of land to support a family. To-day, with irrigation and intensive cultivation, only 5 acres are needed. Jaffa (the "Joppa" of Scripture) is already famous for its oranges, and millions of boxes of this fruit are exported yearly.

A vast amount of building is actually going on in Jerusalem itself. This city has suffered 46 sieges and has been razed to the ground 17 times, yet it still exists and is growing daily. It is tolerably certain that most people, if they were shown a view of modern Jerusalem, would not recognize the city from the photograph.

Jeremiah, in the same chapter that introduces the New Covenant, forecasts the extent of the Jerusalem of the future:

> "Behold, the days come, saith the Lord, that the city shall be built to the Lord from the tower of Hananeel unto the gate of the corner. And the measuring line shall yet go forth over against it upon the hill Gareb, and shall compass about to Goath. And the whole valley of the dead bodies, and of the ashes, and all the fields unto the brook of Kidron, unto the corner of the horse gate toward the east, shall be holy unto the Lord: it shall not be plucked up, nor thrown down any more for ever" (Jer. xxxi. 38-40).

Modern Jerusalem is not yet "holy unto the Lord", but it is intensely interesting to see the predictions of Jeremiah being anticipated before our eyes. The writer to whose book we are indebted for much of this article says:

> "Here is an Israelitish prophet daring to predict with the precision of a surveyor the exact building development of a great city, thousands of years after his words were penned."

The hill Gareb is outside the walls of old Jerusalem, and it was about 50 years ago that building reached this spot. During the past few years the city has extended as far as Goath, a point some distance west of the hill Gareb. The "place of ashes" was reached some 40 years ago, and the line of building is now just touching the "valley of dead bodies". The final measurement given by the prophet, to "all the fields unto the brook of Kidron", is now reached. No limit, however, is imposed upon the development of the city to the south, and it is towards Bethlehem that it is now extending.

The water supply of Jerusalem is mentioned in Scripture, in connection with Hezekiah (II Chron. xxxii. 2-4) and later, Pontius Pilate. To-day, water is being brought from the springs of Ras-el-Ain some 38 miles away. Six pumping stations are used to pump the water along its course, each pump raising the water 600 feet. Tel-Aviv, which is near the springs of Ras-el-Ain, is an entirely modern Jewish city, with more than 120,000 inhabitants. This city is only a few miles from Jaffa.

The Dead Sea, also, is being utilized. Two valuable chemicals are found in abundance in its waters, Potash and Bromine; and a Palestine Company has already put down extensive and up-to-date plant for retrieving this mineral wealth for the benefit of the country. Major Tulloch, in a lecture given recently before the Royal Society of Arts, stated that there is sufficient Potash in the Dead Sea to supply the world's needs for the next 2,000 years. When the day of blessing dawns, the knowledge of the Lord shall cover the earth, as the living waters that will flow down from Jerusalem shall cover the Dead Sea. Meanwhile the present profitable use of this Sea, so long as a synonym for death and dreariness, is suggestive.

So also is the approximation to prophecy of the use of Haifa as the Mediterranean outlet for Mesopotamian oil. In Deuteronomy we read:

> "Let Asher be blessed with children; let him be acceptable to his brethren, and let him dip his foot in oil" (Deut. xxxiii. 24).

Whatever the true fulfillment of this prophecy of Moses may prove to be, it is significant that Asher's territory has been chosen for the delivery of over 2,000,000 tons of Petroleum a year, which is brought for nearly 1,000 miles by "the greatest pipe line ever carried through as a single enterprise".

None of the items enumerated above are fulfillments of O.T. prophecy, but they approximate to them sufficiently to cause the most skeptical to pause, and the believer to rejoice. The "fig tree" is about to bud. Israel are returning. They have yet to look upon "Him Whom they pierced", they have yet to go through their time of trouble, Jerusalem is yet to be invested with armies before the times of restitution shall begin—nevertheless, when we consider present events in Palestine we cannot help realizing that the sands of time are running out.

Most of the material for this article has been supplied by an interesting book by George T. B. Davis entitled: "Rebuilding Palestine According to Prophecy." Providing that the reader substitutes for "according to prophecy" some such phrase as "approximating to" or "anticipating prophecy", the book can be most warmly commended.

Letter from Believing Jew in Palestine.
p. 103

The letter printed below is from a believer in Palestine. He signs himself: "I am yours 'Hid with Christ in God'," and the problems he has to face are very real.

> "Please reply thru the medium of the 'Berean Expositor' to the following:
>
> (1) Does a Jew cease to be a Jew when he believes on the Lord Jesus Christ?
> (2) Is he forbidden to circumcise his males on the eighth day?
> (3) Must he change his day of rest and worship from Saturday to Sunday?
> (4) Is he forbidden to celebrate with the rest of his people the Jewish feasts and fasts?
> (5) Must he estrange himself from his people and their aspirations?
> (6) Does he fall from grace by wishing to express his Jewishness?
> (7) Is it possible for a pure-blooded Britisher to live and feel like a Chinaman or vice versa even as saved people?
> I am asking you all these questions because an article in your paper, entitled 'Israel's Privileges', created in me the confidence to do so. Thanking you in advance, and eagerly awaiting your replies."

We have already replied to these questions as we do not think the reader of the Berean Expositor would wish its pages to be occupied with matter so far removed from the ministry of the mystery. We cannot feel however that such an enquiry can be treated with indifference, for just as a straw shows the direction of a current, so an enquiry of this nature—so reminiscent of the days and problems of the early Acts—is but another sign that the sequel to the Pentecostal dispensation is about to be inaugurated, and that the suspended hope of Israel is about to be reinstated.

Such things should but make us the more concerned that we buy up every opportunity for making known the mystery, realizing that the time for such witness must be short. The prayers of all readers are asked on behalf of the enquirer and for all who find themselves in similar circumstances.

Letter from Believing Jew in Palestine.

> A man's skeleton, estimated to be 12,000 years old, which has been found in Gough's Caves at Cheddar, is regarded as the most important discovery made in this century. It completely destroys the popular conception of the cave man of the palaeolithic age as a simian creature . . . . .
>
> Professor Rix said yesterday that the skeleton proves the slowness of evolution in the last 12,000 years.
>
> If the man were alive to-day, he would not attract attention because he would be completely normal.
>
> Flint tools found in the cave indicate that the man used the place as a workshop (The News Chronicle, 22nd July, 1937).

The statements: "It completely destroys the popular conception of the cave man of the palaeolithic age (earlier part of the prehistoric 'stone age') as a simian (ape-like) and that if he were alive to-day he would be 'completely normal', are important concessions." If science can "completely destroy" one part of its own conclusions, there is hope that it may yet be led to reduce the 12,000 years to the shorter and Biblical period of a little less than 6,000 years. Nothing yet discovered or "proved" justifies the slightest modification of Gen. i. 26, 27.

#15. "Learn a parable of the Fig Tree."
pp. 202, 203

Students of Scripture and particularly students of prophecy, realize the important place that the people of Israel occupy in the purpose of the ages. Since the call of Abraham, with the one exception of the dispensation of the mystery, the people of Israel have always been a factor to be reckoned with.

To those of us who have seen that the Book of Revelation speaks of a future "Day of the Lord" and that a resumption of Kingdom purposes is foretold, any movement among the Jews themselves, or against them by other nations, assumes an importance far greater than the event justifies if considered merely historically. We believe that the seven churches of Asia fall within the prophetic times of the last days, and will be very like the church of the early Acts, and consist mainly of Jewish believers. This being so, we cannot but take notice of a movement among Hebrew Christians, the object of which is to consider the advisability of forming a Hebrew Christian Church.

A Commission was appointed some little time ago to consider:

(1) What is the extent and distribution of Hebrew Christians?
(2) The necessity or otherwise of a Hebrew Christian Church?
(3) If such a Church is needed, what should be its Basis of faith and constitution?

The facts brought to the notice of the Commission led the members to the unanimous conclusion that the formation of a Hebrew Christian Church is imperative. The Commission says:

> "A Hebrew Christian Church has an historic and apostolic precedent, and its present revival would give a status and incentive to Hebrew Christianity, and constitute a valuable living witness to the Church, the Jews and the World in general, in respect to the Faith as revealed in the Old and new Testaments."

In drawing up the Articles of Faith and Constitution, the Commission > "was mainly guided by the principle of keeping close to Synagogual worship, and the polity of the Apostolic Church."

>
> "In its recommended Constitution it kept the polity of the ancient faith and practice of our fathers in view. It worked out a Presbyterian-Episcopal Polity because a majority believe that in these two systems it comes nearest to the Apostolic Church."

We believe our readers will see in this movement a sign of the times, and will watch with interest the progress or otherwise of this effort. It is not for us to praise or to blame, but we are interested spectators of a movement that is vitally associated with all we hold most dear.

Light upon the Purposes of Prayer.

#5. "In nothing anxious . . . . . in everything make request."
pp. 12 - 15

The prayers of Eph. i., iii. and vi. are definite. The prayer of Phil. i. 9-11 is specific and complete, but there are prayers throughout the epistle to the Philippians that may evade our definition and yet are true and real. Among these we would place the opening verses of chapter ii.

> "If there be therefore any consolation in Christ, if any comfort of love, if any fellowship of the Spirit, if any bowels and mercies, fulfil ye my joy, that ye be like-minded, having the same love, being of one accord, of one mind. Let nothing be done through strife or vain glory, but in lowliness of mind let each esteem other better than themselves" (Phil. ii. 1-3).

There is not one of us but could with profit turn every point of these verses into daily prayer.

Again, the words of Phil. iii. 10, "That I may know Him" (of which Eph. i. 15-19 is but an expansion), is the quintessence of prayer. So also, the principle of the beseeching of Euodias and Syntyche to be of the same mind in the Lord (Phil. iv. 2), which is parallel with ii. 1-3, is one which should ever have its place with us.

In Ephesians we observed that one prayer was connected with the apostle's circumstances—"all my affairs, and how I do"—and we saw that the apostle's great concern was not the amelioration of his bondage, but for grace to glorify the Lord therein.

In Phil. i. there is a statement marked by several features illustrative of the purposes of prayer. Let us quote the passage.

> "For I know that this shall turn to my salvation through your prayer, and the supply of the spirit of Jesus Christ, according to my earnest expectation and my hope, that in nothing I shall be ashamed, but that with all boldness, as always, so now also, Christ shall be magnified in my body, whether it be by life, or by death. For to me to live is Christ, and to die is gain" (Phil. i. 19-21).

The prayer of the apostle in Eph. vi. shows how completely he had risen above that which is merely personal, and so the prayer of the saints on his behalf recorded here can be calmly reviewed and gratefully endorsed. For when a man can truthfully say, "For me to live is Christ", the circumstances of that life, whether bond or free, will take but a relative place.

We may here learn an important lesson regarding prayer. There appear to be three links in the chain.

(1) YOUR PRAYER.—This is the first link.
(2) THE SUPPLY OF THE SPIRIT OF JESUS CHRIST.—The central link.
(3) MY EXPECTATION.—This is the third link.

Now it is very possible that a prayer may not be "answered" because of the absence of the third link. Others may be praying for me, the Lord may hear and have all supplies necessary, but unless I, too, share in the intercession in the sense of being really desirous that the Lord's will be done in the matter, it may be best for all concerned if the supplies be withheld until I, too, shall be led to "expect". Or, prayer may have ascended on my behalf, the Lord have heard, and I have an "earnest expectation and hope", yet it may be but to "consume upon my own desires". In the case of the apostle he had that special "salvation" in view that pertains to the prize, but his earnest expectation was, "as always", that Christ should be magnified in his body, whether by life or death, and when a man has reached that stage of spiritual growth there need be no withholding of supply or limiting of prayer.

In Phil. iv. 5-7 we have further light upon the purposes of prayer.

> "Let your moderation be known unto all men. The Lord is at hand, Be careful for nothing, but in everything by prayer and supplication with thanksgiving let your requests be made known unto God. And the peace of God, which passeth understanding, shall keep your hearts and minds through Christ Jesus" (Phil. iv. 5-7).

The word "moderation" is derived from the verb eiko, "to submit", which we find in Gal. ii. 5. There is in the word a combination of the ideas of gentleness, agreeableness, ready yielding of rights, or, as one has put it, "the sweet reasonableness" of Christianity. Many times we may be right, but we may be more right not to insist. To illustrate by an opposite, we all know what we mean by a "stickler" and knowing that, we also know from this passage that such a person is the antipodes of the "moderate" believer.

Anyone who is ever ready to consider others better than themselves will naturally possess this gentle attitude. It is a sensitive quality, however, and develops only in the conscious presence of the Lord. The statement that "the Lord is at hand" does not refer to the second coming but to the presence of the Lord here and now. As in Eph. vi., so in Phil. iv., we have a prayer that comprehends "all my affairs and how I do". This prayer knows no limits, but extends from nothing to everything.

> "In nothing be anxious, but in everything by prayer . . . . . make your requests . . . . ."

The final test of prayer however is in the answers promised. While we allow nothing to worry, and do not limit our prayers to any one aspect of need, the answers indicate to a large extent in what direction our prayers should tend. We may, legitimately, pray for "daily bread", but the answer that is absolutely assured is not "daily bread" but "the peace of God that passeth all understanding". We may pray for deliverance from trouble, but the answer, whether we are delivered or whether we are sustained through the trouble, is "the peace of God". We may pray concerning every single feature of our life, from the lowest physical necessity to the highest spiritual experience, but God has not pledged to answer affirmatively, and in kind. He has however pledged that, whether we are abashed or whether we are exalted, whether we suffer hunger or are full, whether we abound or suffer need, the peace of God shall "garrison our hearts and minds through Christ Jesus" and, like Paul, we shall be able to say:

> "I have learned in whatsoever state I am, to be independent . . . . . I have strength for all things through Christ which empowereth me" (Phil. iv. 11, 13).

So then, moderation and yieldingness do not involve supine dependence: they can go with a downright independence of man's frown or reward.

Somewhat parallel with this prayer, and much in the same spirit, is the language of Matt. vi. 31-34:

> "Do not be anxious, saying, What shall we eat? or What shall we drink? or Wherewithal shall we be clothed? For all these things the nations seek after, for your heavenly Father knoweth that ye are needing all these things. But be seeking first the Kingdom of God and its righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you."

Prayer therefore is the cure of anxiety, but to be effective it must flow from a gentle spirit that has grown up in the conscious presence of the Lord. It goes without saying that anxiety cannot live in His Presence.

The prayers of Philippians are intensely practical: "That ye may be sincere." "That ye be not anxious."

#6. Walk worthy; Stand Perfect. (Col. i. 9, 10 and iv. 12). pp. 61 - 63

Two more prayers complete the number that is found in the prison Epistles. These are written in Col. i. 9, 10 and iv. 12. Let us look at the earlier one and see what light we receive upon the purposes of prayer.

> "For this cause we also, since the day we heard it, do not cease to pray for you, and to desire that ye might be filled with the knowledge of His will in all wisdom and spiritual understanding: that ye might walk worthy of the Lord unto all pleasing, being fruitful in every good work, and increasing in the knowledge of God" (Col. i. 9, 10).

Like the parallel prayer of Eph. i. 15-19, this prayer is the outcome of the Apostle's hearing of their faith and love, and like that prayer it speaks of epignosis, or realization. Like the prayer of Phil. i. it speaks of fruitfulness and, further, expresses a desire which is not found in either Eph. i. or Phil. i.

> "That ye might walk worthy of the Lord unto all pleasing."

Notice for a moment the double reference to knowledge or realization.

> "That you may be filled with the realization of His will . . . . . increasing in the realization of God."

To know or to realize God is a process, and we can only know God as we get to know the way in which He has revealed Himself. Thus if we know His will, we make a beginning; if we know His grace, His love, His wisdom and His faithfulness we are growing up in the realization of God. To fully know God would mean a perfect comprehension of all His attributes and the mysteries of His Being, but, like the love of Christ, this passeth knowledge. The magnitude of the theme however must not deter us; we each have our measure, and more is not expected of us. Let us, however, observe the connecting links that unite the opening knowledge of His will with the closing knowledge of Himself.

His will—wisdom—walk—all pleasing—God.

The walk too is of an extraordinarily high standard. Eph. iv. exhorts us to walk worthy of our calling, and Phil. i. exhorts us to live worthy of the gospel, but Col. i. exhorts us to walk worthy of the Lord. How can this be attained? Only by closely following the course here laid down. It is impossible to think of walking worthy of the Lord while contravening His Will. So far as we are concerned His Will is His Word. His Word being given to us, we need, as Eph. i. 15-19 showed, the transforming power of prayer, so that revelation may be turned into realization, and the "spirit" of that revelation may be given us, or, as Col. i. puts it, "in all wisdom and spiritual understanding".

A walk that is worthy of the Lord will be unto all pleasing. The great desire of the heart will be that He may be well pleased with us. This will have the negative effect of making us independent of the approval of man. Well pleasing is not confined to sound speech; it is inclusive. It is the Lord's good pleasure that the root shall produce fruit, and consequently this Colossians prayer is for an all-round development and growth in grace. To this we must add the prayer of Epaphras in Col. iv. 12.

> "Labouring fervently for you in prayers, that ye may stand perfect and complete in all the will of God."

Here is another gathering up of the prayer themes of Ephesians and Philippians. The prayer that the saints may stand "perfect" takes up the whole epistle to the Philippians, and especially chapter iii., where the Apostle stretches out toward the goal. It includes the prayer of Phil. i., where "discernment" is the mark of the perfect (Heb. v.). It embraces also the prayer of Eph. iii., where the goal is that the believer should be filled unto all the fullness of God, for Epaphras not only prayed that the Colossians should stand perfect, but also complete, a word that answers to the fullness of Eph. iii. Further, it rounds off the prayer of Col. i., for this standing, whether it be perfect, or whether it be complete, is "in all the will of God".

The two prayers of Colossians therefore have for their object the consummation of the will of God by means of spiritual wisdom, worthy walk and fruitful life.

One thing we should observe very closely. True prayer never attempts to question the will of God. In its desires it can only follow along the lines of the will of God, regarding all else as evil and an abuse of a wonderful privilege. We can say therefore that, among other features, the prayers of Colossians exemplify the Lord's own attitude throughout the days of His flesh, when He said: "Thy will be done."

We trust that the survey of the prayers of the Lord's prisoner will have shed some light upon the question: "What are the purposes of prayer?"

None Other Things.

"Saying none other things than those which the prophets and Moses did say should come" (Acts xxvi. 22).

#1. Paul's defence must be understood as literally true.
pp. 65 - 68

When the Apostle declares, in Col. i. 26, that the Mystery which had been hid from ages and from generations, has now been made manifest, his words are a commentary upon the essential nature of a "mystery" or "secret". We shall search in vain the pages of the prison epistles (Ephesians, Philippians, Colossians, II Timothy, Philemon) for any references to the law and the prophets, in so far as the distinctive revelation of the Mystery is concerned. We have already seen, in earlier Volumes of The Berean Expositor, that Paul's apostolic ministry falls into two parts, and Acts xxvi., which supplies us with the sub-title of the present series, provides information on this point. Speaking of his conversion and commission on the road to Damascus, the Apostle tells us that the Lord said to him:

The word "both" here cannot be set aside; it indicates two ministries. We read of "these things" and "those things"; of the "things which thou hast seen", and the "things in the which I will appear unto thee". Here obviously we have two ministries. Further, while the Apostle soon found that his own "people", Israel, were opposed to him, he also found during the early part of his ministry, that the Gentiles, especially the Roman soldiers, were often his protectors. Proceeding from this statement, the Apostle leads on to the verse cited at the head of this article.

We must remember, in reading this passage, that Paul is a bondman, that he has appealed unto Cæsar, and that the only reason for this special hearing before Agrippa, is that Festus, the new Roman Governor, is in a predicament—for, he says: "It seemeth to me unreasonable to send a prisoner, and not withal to signify the crimes laid against him." Paul, therefore, has to offer a defence, and, knowing that the Jewish religion, with its temple worship and sacred books, is a religion sanctioned by Roman authority, his defence is that he has not gone outside the teaching of the law and the prophets, and so has committed no crime against the laws of Rome.

With regard to his ministry which he had fulfilled, the Apostle says:

> "I shewed first unto them of Damascus, and at Jerusalem, and throughout all the coasts of Judæa, and then to the Gentiles, that they should repent, and turn to God, and do works meet for repentance" (Acts xxvi. 20).

This is reminiscent of the Apostle's words to the Thessalonians in I Thess. i. 9, 10:

> "Ye turned to God from idols, to serve the living and true God, and to wait for His Son from heaven."

Returning to Acts xxvi., we read:

> "For these causes the Jews caught me in the temple, and went about to kill me" (Acts xxvi. 21).

The Jews did not accuse Paul of denying the teaching of the law and the prophets. They unjustly charged him with desecrating the Temple by taking a Gentile into it (Acts xxi. 28); but the fact that they found him in the Temple, and that he had gone there to refute the charge made against him that he taught the Jews who were among the Gentiles to forsake Moses (Acts xxi. 21), would be evidence that his teaching was in harmony with the O.T. Scriptures.

> "Having therefore obtained help of God, I continue unto this day, witnessing both to small and great, saying none other things than those which the prophets and Moses did say should come" (Acts xxvi. 22).

It has been suggested that we must not press these words too far, and that all that Paul intended to convey was that he was not an irresponsible iconoclast. When a man of ordinary honesty is making a statement before a judge we expect his statement to be true, and without a double meaning. And if such can be said of the ordinary man, how much more should we expect the apostle of truth to speak with great plainness of speech. If we were to find, in face of this statement, that his early epistles contained teaching that neither the prophets nor Moses had said should come, then it would be difficult to offer any defence. In this series of articles we intend to examine the Apostle's early ministry, as found in the epistles written before Acts xxviii., in order to discover whether or not his statement before Agrippa was literally true.

His own extension of the statement is given in verse 23:

> "That Christ should suffer, and that He should be the first that should rise from the dead, and should shew light unto the people, and to the Gentiles" (Acts xxvi. 23).

This refers particularly to the gospel which Paul had preached. A little earlier we read:

> "And now I stand and am judged for the hope of the promise made of God unto our fathers" (Acts xxvi. 6).

This refers to the character of the hope which was in operation during the Acts period, and which is to be found in the epistles of that time.

While we are dealing with the question of Paul's defence, let us turn back to the preceding chapter and read his statement before Festus:

> "Neither against the law of the Jews, neither against the temple, nor yet against Cæsar, have I offended anything at all" (Acts xxv. 8).

Before Felix, in the previous chapter, the Apostle had said:

> "This I confess unto thee, that after the way which they call heresy, so worship I the God of my fathers, believing all things which are written in the law and the prophets; and have hope toward God, which they themselves also allow, that there shall be a resurrection of the dead, both of the just and the unjust" (Acts xxiv. 14, 15).

On the surface it appears that the Apostle intended to convey quite literally that up to the time of his imprisonment in Cæsarea his ministry had been but the legitimate expansion of Old Testament prophecy, whether with reference to the gospel, the hope, the outpouring of spiritual gifts, or the inclusion of the Gentiles. None of these things has any reference to the Mystery as made known for the first time in the epistles to the Ephesians and Colossians.

If in all Paul's ministry up to the date of Acts xxvi. he had said "none other things than those that the prophets and Moses did say should come", then it is both vain and unbelieving to look for the Mystery in these early epistles. If upon examination it should be found that the early epistles do contain truth which neither the prophets nor Moses did say should come, then there will have to be a drastic readjustment of our teaching. At the moment, however, our position is that the Mystery is not found in these early epistles, and that they belong to a different dispensation. Salvation by the blood of Christ, and justification by faith, are taught in both sets of epistles, but this does not touch the subject of the Mystery. Until a man is saved, no dispensational position is possible for him, either in the earthly kingdom, the heavenly city, or "far above all".

So far as the Acts of the Apostles is concerned, our examination enables us to affirm that there at least the Apostle is found saying "none other things than those which the prophets and Moses did say should come".

#2. The gospel as preached by Paul was in accordance with the testimony of the law and the prophets.

pp. 125 - 127

It would probably not be easy to find complete agreement among our readers as to the chronological order of Paul's epistles. This question does not, however, influence our present investigation, and we will therefore take the canonical order and commence with the Epistle to the Romans though here we may all be in agreement that it was the last epistle written before the change of dispensation. If we can prove that this epistle fulfils the Apostle's claim as cited at the head of this article, the case is practically settled, for if the latest epistle of the series adheres closely to the law and the prophets, the earlier ones must have done so also.

We commence reading this epistle, and in the second verse we are faced with the fact that "the gospel of God", to which the Apostle had been "separated", was "promised afore by His prophets in the holy scriptures" (Rom. i. 2). This gospel was "for the obedience of faith among all nations" (Rom. i. 5), and its power was the provision of righteousness by faith—a provision to be found promised in the prophets:

> "As it is written, The just shall live by faith" (Rom. i. 17: Hab. ii. 4).

After having proved both Jew and Gentile to be under sin, giving in Rom. iii. 13-18 a continuous and composite series of quotations from the Psalms, the Apostle returns to the subject of the provision of righteousness by faith, which constitutes the basis of the gospel:

> "But now the righteousness of God without the law is manifested, being witnessed by the law and the prophets" (Rom. iii. 21).

This righteousness by faith belongs to the believer by imputation, and in Rom. iv. both Abraham and David are quoted:

> "For what saith the Scriptures? Abraham believed God, and it was counted unto him for righteousness" (Rom. iv. 3).
>
> "Even as David also describeth the blessedness of the man unto whom God imputeth righteousness without works, saying, Blessed are they whose iniquities are forgiven, and whose sins covered" (Rom. iv. 6, 7).

Pursuing this theme, we come to Rom. x. There the Apostle speaks of Christ as being the "end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth", and declares that it was "ignorance" on the part of Israel that led them to attempt to produce a righteousness of their own. For even though Moses described the righteousness which is of the law—"That the man that doeth those things shall live by them" in Deut. xxx. 12, 13 he is insistent upon the nature of the gospel message (Rom. x. 6-10), as also are the prophets: "For the Scripture saith, Whosoever believeth on Him shall not be ashamed" (Rom. x. 11).

Moses, the Psalms and Isaiah are quoted in the remainder of Rom. x. in proof of the fact that "faith cometh by hearing", and that the extension of the gospel to the Gentile was intended to provoke Israel to jealousy.

Coming now to I Corinthians, we find the preaching of the cross confirmed by quotations from Isaiah and Jeremiah:

> "That accordingly as it is written, He that glorieth, let him glory in the Lord" (I Cor. i. 31).

In I Cor. v. Christ is spoken of as "our Passover" and in I Cor. xv. as "the Firstfruits". Both of these terms refer back to the law of Moses.

In I Cor. xv. 3, 4 the Apostle affirms:

> "I delivered unto you first of all that which I also received, how that Christ died for our sins, according to the Scriptures; and that He was buried, and that He rose again the third day, according to the Scriptures."

The Epistle to the Galatians insists upon the fact that the gospel is entirely in harmony with the O.T. Scriptures:

> "The Scripture, foreseeing that God would justify the nations through faith, preached before the gospel unto Abraham, saying, In thee shall all nations be blessed" (Gal. iii. 8).
> "The Scripture hath concluded all under sin that the promise by faith of Jesus Christ might be given to them that believe" (Gal. iii. 22).

The Epistle to the Hebrews is in some measure outside the present enquiry. Being written to the Hebrews, we naturally expect an appeal to be made to the Old Covenant Scriptures. Nevertheless, it is significant that, while the Apostle sets aside the Old Covenant with its ceremonies and sacrifices that did not touch the conscience, he quotes the prophets for the bringing in of the New Covenant (Heb. viii.) and cites the fact that the tabernacle which was erected by Moses was an earthly copy of the pattern shown to him in the mount:

> "Who serve unto the example and shadow of heavenly things, as Moses was admonished of God when He was about to make the tabernacle; for, See, saith He, that thou make all things according to the pattern shewed to thee in the mount" (Heb. viii. 5).

We will not, however, pursue this investigation further. So far as our present purpose is concerned there is no controversy with regard to this epistle, which, by its very theme, is an expansion of O.T. type and shadow, and raises no problems in connection with Gentile admission or hope. At the moment we are concerned with how far Paul's words uttered in defence before Agrippa are true and binding with reference to the teaching of his early epistles as the apostle of the Gentiles. This subject we must take up in its different aspects in subsequent studies. Meanwhile we believe that there will be full agreement among us all, that, so far as the basic theme of the gospel was concerned—redemption by blood, and the imputation of righteousness by faith—the Apostle preached "none other things than those which the prophets and Moses did say should come".

#3. The inclusion of the Gentile in Gospel and Promise was never a secret.
pp. 161 - 164

While it may readily be admitted that the basic terms of the gospel are to be found in the Law and the Prophets, it may nevertheless be contended that the extension of the blessings of the gospel to the Gentiles, and their inclusion among Abraham's seed, does, in fact, go beyond what is written in the O.T. Scriptures. It is undoubtedly true that the opening of the door of faith to the Gentiles took the early Church by surprise, and the contention of those of the circumcision at Jerusalem with Peter after they had heard of his visit to Cornelius (Acts xi. 3), and Peter's own attitude (Acts x. 28), most certainly show a deep prejudice against such an inclusion of the Gentile. But prejudice, however, deep, is not the standard of our faith; and our quest must still be: "What saith the Scriptures?"

In Acts xv. we have another exhibition of traditional bias. In verse 14 we read:

> "Simeon hath declared how God at the first did visit the Gentiles, to take out of them a people for His name. And to this agree the words of the prophets: as it is written, After this I will return, and will build again the tabernacle of David, which is fallen down; and I will build again the ruins thereof, and I will set it up: that the residue of men might seek after the Lord, and all the Gentiles, upon whom My name is called, saith the Lord Who doeth all these things. Known unto God are all His works from the beginning of the world" (Acts xv. 14-18).

If we turn to the prophet Amos, and consult the context of the passage cited by James (Amos ix. 11, 12), we shall perceive that James very rightly says: "To this agree (or harmonize) the words of the prophets" (plural—the prophets as a whole), for Amos ix. 11, 12 looks forward to a yet future time for its fulfillment. There was much that took place during the Acts that was of a tentative nature, waiting to see (speaking after the manner of men) whether Israel would repent and the kingdom be set up, or whether they would refuse, and the kingdom purpose fall into abeyance.

In Acts xiii. we find the apostle Paul using the O.T. Scriptures in much the same way. When the Jews manifest their envy at the Gentile acceptance of the gospel, the Apostle says:

> "It was necessary that the word of God should first have been spoken to you: but seeing ye put it from you, and judge yourselves unworthy of everlasting life, lo, we turn to the Gentiles. For so hath the Lord commanded us, saying, I have set thee to be a light of the Gentiles, that thou shouldest be for salvation unto the ends of the earth" (Acts xiii. 46-47).

Commencing once again with the Epistle to the Romans, we observe that the gospel which was "promised afore in the Holy Scriptures", was also for the "obedience of faith unto all nations" (Rom. i. 1-5).

In chapter iii. the Apostle brings forward as an argument, the fact that God is One.

> "Is He the God of the Jews only? Is He not also of the Gentiles? Yes, of the Gentiles also: seeing it is one God, which shall justify the circumcision by faith, and uncircumcision through faith. Do we then make void the law through faith? God forbid: yea, we establish the law" (Rom. iii. 29-31).

This basic fact was evidently in the Apostle's mind when he addressed the men of Athens and commented upon the worship of the "Unknown God".

> "God, That made the world and all things therein, seeing that He is Lord of heaven and earth, dwelleth not in temples made with hands; neither is worshipped with men's hands, as though He needed anything, seeing He giveth to all life, and breath, and all things; and hath made of one blood all nations of men . . . . . that they should seek the Lord . . . . . now commandeth all men everywhere to repent" (Acts xvii. 24-30).

Another argument is brought forward in Rom. iv. 9-10:

> "Cometh this blessedness then upon the circumcision only? . . . . . How was it then reckoned? When he (Abraham) was in circumcision, or in uncircumcision? Not in circumcision, but in uncircumcision."

We can only dimly realize the blow that this question and its answer must have been to Jewish prejudice and exclusiveness. The Jews had boasted with pride that Abraham was their father, but had forgotten that Abraham was not an Israelite, but a Gentile from Ur of the Chaldees. Abraham was already justified by faith and the heir of the promises, before the rite of circumcision was instituted, and before Isaac was born. He was therefore--

> "the father of all then that believe, though they be not circumcised; that righteousness might be imputed unto them also: and the father of circumcision to them who are not of the circumcision only, but who also walk in the steps of that faith of our father Abraham, which he had, being yet uncircumcised . . . . . Abraham, who is the father of us all. As it is written, I have made thee a father of many nations" (Rom. iv. 11-17).

With this passage should be compared the argument of Gal. iii.:

> "The Scripture, foreseeing that God would justify the nations through faith, preached before the gospel unto Abraham, saying, In thee shall all nations be blessed" (Gal. iii. 8).
>
> "Now to Abraham and his seed were the promises made. He saith not, And to seeds, as of many; but as of one, And to thy seed, which is Christ" (Gal. iii. 16).
>
> "For as many of you as have been baptized into Christ have put on Christ. There is neither Jew nor Greek, there is neither bond nor free, there is neither male nor female; for ye are all one in Christ Jesus. And it ye be Christ's, then are ye Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise" (Gal. iii. 27-29).

It is evident from the testimony of James, and of Paul, that the inclusion of the Gentile in the blessings of the gospel and the Abrahamic promise, was no mystery but the consistent witness of Moses and the Prophets.

Both these authorities are quoted in Rom. x. with regard to the inclusion of the Gentile:

> "First Moses saith, I will provoke you to jealousy by them that are no people, and by a foolish nation will I anger you. But Esaias is very bold, and saith, I was found of them that sought Me not; I was made manifest unto them that asked not after Me" (Rom. x. 19, 20).

With reference to the gospel, the Jew and the Gentile stand level. Both are sinners, and "there is no difference", either in the matter of guilt or of salvation (Rom. iii. 22, 23; x. 12). When we come to dispensational privileges, however, we find, during the early ministry of the Apostle, that the Jew is "first". In Rom. xi., after showing that the believing Gentiles, equally with the believing Jews, are Abraham's seed and heirs, the Apostle writes:

> "And if some of the branches be broken off, and thou, being a wild olive, wert grafted in among them, and with them partakest of the root and fatness of the olive tree; boast not against the branches" (Rom. xi. 17, 18).

This dispensational distinction we must keep well in mind, for while it lasted and until the middle-wall was broken down, no church of the One Body with the threefold equality of Eph. iii. 6 was possible.

In Rom. xv., the Apostle speaks of the earthly ministry of the Lord Jesus Christ as being concerned with the "circumcision":

> "Now I say that Jesus Christ was a minister of the circumcision for the truth of God, to confirm the promises made unto the fathers" (Rom. xv. 8).

This testimony is explicit. The "Gospels" are primarily concerned with the "circumcision" and with the confirmation of promises made "unto the fathers". We have already seen, however, that in the great promise made to Abraham the Gentiles were included, with Israel as the channel of blessing. Consequently Rom. xv. 8 is followed by xv. 9-12:

> "And that the Gentiles might glorify God for His mercy: as it is written . . . . . and again He saith . . . . . And again . . . . . And again" (Rom. xv. 9-12).

Apparently no opposition was anticipated to the exclusiveness of Rom. xv. 8, for the Apostle had already alluded to the strength of Jewish prejudice by asking, "Is He the God of the Jews only?" Today, however, the whole aspect of things is reversed. Anyone who dares to believe Rom. xv. 8 and teach that the Gospels are primarily "Jewish" must prepare to meet criticism and opposition, while in most congregations the hope of the Jew is so far forgotten or spiritualized that to-day one would have to ask "Is He the God of the Gentiles only?" The inclusion of the Gentile, even as a wild olive in the olive tree of Israel, presupposes Paul's glorious teaching concerning the reconciliation of the world in its dispensational aspect (Rom. xi. 15), even as the gospel he preached (II Cor. v. 21) necessitated the reconciliation of the world, in its doctrinal aspect (II Cor. v. 19, 20).

For our present purpose Rom. xv. 8-12 provides an abundant confirmation of the fact that the inclusion of the Gentile was no new thing. We do not intend to make these articles at all lengthy. Further evidence can be gathered from the remaining epistles of the period, but enough, we trust, has been brought forward to establish the fact that the inclusion of the Gentile, both in the gospel and in the Abrahamic promise, demands for its confirmation "none other things than those which the Prophets and Moses did say should come".

#4. The Hope of the Church of the Acts still the Hope of Israel.

(Containing a quotation from Dr. Bullinger's last words on the place of I Thess. iv.).

pp. 197 - 202

The conclusions that we have so far reached with regard to the gospel, and the inclusion of the Gentile during the Acts, do not make a very great demand upon the believer whose position is what we may call "orthodox". There are, however, other subjects so close to the heart of the redeemed that anyone suggesting that present traditional views with regard to strong opposition, but also to endure a good deal of misunderstanding and possibly abuse. Among these sensitive themes is that of the Hope of the Church. Many a believer who would be prepared to endorse all that has been put forward in the three opening articles of this series, would nevertheless affirm with conviction that the hope of I Thess. iv. is the hope of the Church of the Mystery.

Now, if Paul taught "none other things than those which the Prophets and Moses did say should come", it follows that the hope set before us in Romans, Corinthians, Galatians and Thessalonians must be the hope of Israel, and further that, if this hope is also the hope of the Church revealed in Paul's Prison Epistles, then the word "mystery" loses its meaning, at least in so far as it can be applied to the hope of the Church. In this article we shall be content to present to the judgment of the reader exactly what is written concerning the hope of the Church during the Acts administration, and we believe that he will find abundant evidence to prove that, as in the case of the gospel and the inclusion of the Gentile, this hope agrees with the testimony of Moses and the Prophets, and cannot therefore be the hope of a company called under terms which were unrevealed until the Apostle became the "prisoner of the Lord".

While I Thess. iv. is the passage to which we naturally turn for a definite statement concerning the hope of the Church of the period, we will follow the rule adopted in the earlier articles and investigate first the Epistle to the Romans. In Rom. xv. the Apostle not only speaks of the inclusion of the Gentile, as we saw in our last article, but also associates the believing Gentile with the hope of Israel.

> "And again, Esaias saith, There shall be a root of Jesse, and He that shall rise to reign over the Gentiles; in Him shall the Gentiles trust. Now the God of hope fill you with all joy and peace in believing, that ye may abound in hope, through the power of the Holy Ghost" (Rom. xv. 12, 13).

There can be no question here as to whether the Gentiles referred to are in the Church, for the presence of such words as, "all joy and peace in believing" and "the power of the Holy Ghost" is conclusive. We are dealing here with the hope of the believer, and therefore with the hope of the Church at that time.

We must first draw the reader's attention to the fact that the word "trust" here is elpizo in the original, and that the word "hope" is elpis. The noun and the verb are from the same root, and both demand the same English word. Also, before the word "hope" in verse 13 we have the definite article, and the two words should therefore be translated "that hope". Putting in these corrections, we have:

> "In Him shall the Gentiles hope. Now the God of that hope fill you with all joy and peace in believing."

This hope of the believing Gentile is found in the prophet Isaiah, and a reference to Isa. xi. will reveal that it is millennial. We might have anticipated this by observing the clause "rise to reign over the Gentiles", a statement consistent with the hope of Israel and the Kingdom, but impossible of application to the Church of the Mystery. The hope here in Romans is, therefore, millennial, and, if Romans was written after I Thess. iv., then it is impossible that the hope of I Thess. iv. should be other than this same hope.

In dealing with I Thess. iv., it is of the utmost importance to remember that there arose a misunderstanding in the Church as to the Apostle's teaching concerning the hope, and that he consequently wrote a second letter with the express purpose of correcting these errors. It is patent, we trust, to all our readers, whatever may be their views concerning the Coming of the Lord, that any interpretation of I Thessalonians that ignores the inspired corrective, II Thessalonians, must necessarily fail.

The Thessalonians had been led astray with regard to the Second Coming of Christ, both by teachers speaking under the influence of an evil spirit, and by a spurious epistle, and had come to believe that the Day of the Lord was at hand (II Thess. ii. 2). Instead of telling these anxious believers that their hope had nothing whatever to do with the Day of the Lord—which would have been the simplest solution, had it been true—the Apostle occupies the bulk of this second epistle with a detailed account of that awful day, and also reminds them, when dealing with the great antichristian blasphemy of Rev. xiii., that he had told them these things when he was with them (II Thess. ii. 5).

In I Thess. iv. he comforts the believer by referring to the descent of the Lord from heaven; and in II Thess. i. 7 he comforts him with the prospect of "rest" at the "revelation of the Lord Jesus". The descent "from heaven" and the revelation "from heaven" are the same in the original, ap ouranon being used in both passages. In I Thess. iv. the descent "from heaven" is associated with the "voice of the Archangel", and, as we shall prove presently, with the Lord's "holy angels" (I Thess. iii. 13). In II Thess. i. this is repeated with added details: "With His mighty angels, in flaming fire taking vengeance."

In Dan. xii. 1 we read that, when Michael the "Archangel" stands up: "There shall be a time of trouble, such as never was since there was a nation even to that same time." There can be only one such time of trouble, and Dan. xii. 1 must therefore synchronize with the even spoken of in Matt. xxiv. 21 and Rev. vii. 14.

If it be objected that this makes the hope before the Church of the Thessalonians identical with the hope of Israel, we would reply that this is not an objection, but actually the truth of the matter. The hope of Israel was the only hope in view in Acts i. 6, and the hope of Israel was still in view in Acts xxviii. 20. We have seen that the church at Rome was taught to abound in this very hope, and we also find that all that is written concerning the hope in I and II Thessalonians links it to this same hope of Israel. Michael, according to Dan. xii., "stands for the people of Israel"; and the coming of the Lord "with all His saints" is a fulfillment of Zech. xiv. 5. The "saints" here are angels, as a comparison of Deut. xxxiii. 2 and Psalm lxviii. 17 will show.

The only other mention of the "Archangel" in the N.T. is in Jude 9, and Jude speaks of the days immediately preceding the dreadful Day of the Lord.

The whole of the prophetic passage in II Thess. ii. is taken up with teaching concerning the Beast and the False Prophet. If the hope of the Thessalonian Church was the blessed hope of the Mystery, why should the Apostle spend so much time describing a period that has nothing to do with this hope?

It may be necessary to say a word here on II Thess. i. 10. The translation "When He shall have come" is to be preferred to the A.V. rendering, but there is no warrant for teaching from this that the hope of the church will have been fulfilled before "He shall have come". The context points the other way, and there is no possibility of this meaning in other passages where the same tense is used.

> "When the Lord of the vineyard shall have come." This leads on to what He will then do (Matt. xxi. 40).
>
> "When ye shall have done all these things"—say, "We are unprofitable servants" (Luke xvii. 10).
>
> "Of him shall the Son of man be ashamed when He shall have come" (Mark viii. 38).
>
> "When He (the Messiah) shall have come (then, and not before), He will tell us all things" (John iv. 25).
>
> "This is My covenant unto them, when I shall have taken away their sins" (Rom. xi. 27).
> "When He shall have delivered up the Kingdom . . . . . when He shall have put down all ruler" (then, and not before), God shall be all in all" (I Cor. xv. 24-28).

So, when He shall have come, in that day, to be glorified in His saints, then, in that same coming, He will take vengeance and punish with aionion destruction those who know not God and obey not His gospel. It is not possible to appeal to this passage as evidence of a hope entertained by these saints before "that day" when He shall have come.

In I Thess. iv. 15-17, the Apostle speaks of the "order" that will govern the resurrection, and it may at first sight be felt that here is a distinct revelation—something more than can be found in Moses and the Prophets. While it is true that the actual words of I Thess. iv. are not found in the Law or the Prophets, they are but a legitimate expansion of what the O.T. revealed, and if this is so, Paul's claim is not invalidated.

Take for example the passage in Dan. xii. that appears to have coloured the language of I Thess. iv. with reference to the Archangel. Daniel speaks of two companies, one living in the time of trouble and delivered out of it, the other sleeping in the dust of the earth and awakened. Daniel knew that he himself would "rest", and would "stand in his lot at the end of the days" (Dan. xii. 13), but he neither affirms nor denies the precedence either of the living or of the dead. Paul, however, does affirm that these two companies go "together", and we understand, therefore, that this is implicit in Daniel, though explicit only in Paul. This does not mean, however, that Paul is saying something more than the Law and the Prophets allowed. It was all within the framework of the O.T. and was by no means a secret "hid" in God.

The Apostle makes very full use of the wilderness wanderings of Israel, and his conclusion at the end of Heb. xi. to the effect that "they without us" should not be perfected, could easily be substantiated from the story of Caleb and Joshua. These two men qualified for entry into Canaan at the time of the spies, but they had to wait the full period of the wilderness wandering, and finally entered the land "together" with the rest of the people.

It is not our custom to quote the writings of others in confirmation of our teaching; we prefer to stand or fall by the Book itself. In this case, however, some readers may be interested to see the last words of Dr. Bullinger on the dispensational place of I and II Thessalonians and their teaching concerning the hope of the Church. Speaking of the fact that in all our versions the Epistles to the Thessalonians come last he says:

> "It must be evident to us all at the outset that, as long as Jehovah's promise to 'send Jesus Christ' was not withdrawn, while it was still open to Israel to see the fulfillment of 'all that the prophets have spoken' on the one condition (of repentance) laid down, while the imminence of the Lord's speedy coming was everywhere the testimony of 'them that heard Him', whether spoken or written, the waiting for God's Son from heaven, and deliverance from the wrath to come would necessarily be the central point of all testimony during the Dispensation of the Acts.
>
> The Pauline Epistles be exempt from this conclusion (our italics). If any one is disposed to hold that the promise made in Acts iii. was withdrawn at any time before Acts xxviii., it is incumbent on them to point out where such an epoch-making event is recorded. But this cannot be done. There is not a tittle of evidence that can be produced. Indeed, the very first epistle written by Paul (I Thess. i. 10) emphasizes this, and the second letter cannot even be understood apart from it."

These words of Dr. Bullinger's were published in 1911-12 in "Things to Come", and in 1913 it will be remembered he fell asleep. Readers who know only the Doctor's "Church Epistles" should note carefully his own correction of his earlier views.

In the same series, after having quoted I Thess. iv. 13-18, Dr. Bullinger writes:

> "Paul was here confirming what the Lord had said in Matt. xxiv. 'This great trumpet' is the 'trump of God' in I Thess. iv. and the gathering is the gathering of 'them that are alive and remain'. This is the work assigned to the angels."

We will not multiply quotations, but must give the following, because of its bearing upon our own position.

> "We can quite understand, and fully sympathize with those who, like ourselves, have spoken or written on I Thess. iv. as being the great charter of our hope of the Lord's coming. But we ought thankfully to relinquish it when we find we have a better hope (our italics), which we can enjoy all the more because we need not reproach ourselves with having robbed Israel of their hope, which is only postponed, and will yet have a wondrous and literal fulfillment for them." (Foundations of Dispensational Truth, Dr. E. W. Bullinger).

We trust that sufficient has been set before the reader to lead to the conviction that the hope before the Church of the Acts was in entire harmony with what "the Prophets and Moses did say should come".

#5. The Gifts of the Spirit, and the Abrahamic Promise. pp. 235 - 238

The present series of studies was suggested by a correspondent who, among other things remarked, "Surely the Charismata cannot come under this heading". This is certainly an important point, and if it can be shown that the endowment with supernatural gifts, which was the peculiar privilege of the early Church, is unrelated to the testimony of Moses and the Prophets, or goes beyond anything they have said, then it will be necessary for us to reconsider our position.

We begin our investigation, where spiritual gifts first make their appearance, viz., in Acts ii. The day of Pentecost having fully come, and the number of the twelve having been completed, a most wonderful thing happened.

> "They were all filled with the holy ghost, and began to speak with other tongues as the Spirit gave them utterance" (Acts ii. 4).

The assembled multitude were "confounded" and "amazed . . . . . saying one to another, What meaneth this?" Others mocked and said, "These men are full of new wine" (Acts ii. 6-13). It is evident from the reaction of the multitude that something extraordinary had happened, but the fact that these Jews, who were "devout men", did not recognize the fulfillment of the O.T. prophecy when they saw it, is no proof that the prophets and Moses did not say that these things should come. The nation rejected their Messiah, in spite of the fulfillment of prophecy and type.

Most of our difficulties in connection with this matter vanish when we consider Peter's inspired answer in verses 14-40, and particularly in verse 16:

> "This is that which was spoken by the prophet Joel" (Acts ii. 16).

If we turn to chapter ii. of this prophecy, we shall find in verses 28-32 the complete testimony to this great event. It is true that the seven wonders in heaven and earth have not yet taken place, but this is explained by Israel's failure to repent. All that we are at the moment attempting, however, is to prove that the "gifts" of the early Church were promised before in the Holy Scriptures.

Peter not only refers to Joel, but later in his explanation to the testimony of David.

> "David . . . . . being a prophet . . . . . seeing this before, spake of the resurrection of Christ . . . . . therefore, being by the right hand of God exalted, and having received of the Father the promise of the Holy Ghost, He hath shed forth this, which ye now see and hear" (Acts ii. 29-33).

It is evident from the above references that Peter would have been surprised to hear any one deny, or even question the fact that the gifts bestowed on the Day of Pentecost were spoken of by the prophets of the O.T. The term "Moses and the prophets" and the term "the law and the prophets" are synonymous, yet we should be unscriptural to draw a hard and fast line, and limit the term "law" to Moses. In John x. 24, quoting Psalm lxxxii. 6, the Lord says: "Is it not written in your law?" And in I Cor. xiv. 21, the prophet Isaiah is quoted as "the law", with reference to the spiritual gifts of the early Church. "Moses and the prophets" in its common usage simply stands for the O.T. Scriptures.

> "In the law it is written, With men of other tongues and other lips will I speak unto this people; and yet, for all that, will they not hear Me, saith the Lord" (I Cor. xiv. 21).

On the Day of Pentecost, the gifts were received by Jews only. It is pure imagination that peoples Jerusalem on that day with both Jews and Gentiles, then and there baptized into one body. One reading of Acts ii., with this tradition of the elders in mind, is enough to dispel such an interpretation for ever. That Peter himself held no such belief is made abundantly clear in Acts x.

> "While Peter yet spake these words, the holy ghost fell on all them which heard the word. And they of the circumcision which believed were astonished, as many as came with Peter, because that on the Gentiles also was poured out the gift of the holy ghost" (Acts x. 44-45).

There were two converging reasons for the abundance of gifts that were poured out upon the early Church. The first of these is given in Gal. iii.:

> "Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us . . . . . that the blessing of Abraham might come on the Gentiles through Jesus Christ, that we might receive the promise of the Spirit through faith" (Gal. iii. 13, 14).

Here it is made clear that the promise to Abraham, which we have already seen includes the gospel as preached in Romans, and was, as Gal. iii. 8 testifies, "foreseen" by the Scriptures, includes also "the Spirit". It may perhaps be objected that this reference to "the Spirit" does not include "spiritual gifts" but just gospel grace. The same chapter in Galatians, however, contains a complete proof that "spiritual gifts" are in view.

> "Received ye the spirit by the works of the law, or by the hearing of faith? . . . . . He therefore that ministereth to you the spirit and worketh miracles among you, doeth he it by the works of the law, or by the hearing of the faith? Even as Abraham believed . . . . ." (Gal. iii. 2-6).

It is clear, therefore, that the spirit given through the faith that is reckoned for righteousness, is also the spirit associated with "working miracles", and that being so, our case is proved.

The outer line of teaching associated with spiritual gifts is that found in I Cor. xiv. 21. Those addressed in I Cor. x.-xi. were by nature "Jews"—for it obviously could not be written of Gentiles that "all our fathers were under the cloud, and all passed through the sea" (I Cor. x. 1). To those who have "ears to hear" this fact and its bearing upon the only reference to the Lord's Supper in Paul's writings (in I Cor. xi.) will speak with no uncertain sound.

In I Cor. xii., however, the Apostle turns from the Jewish section of the Church and addresses the Gentiles:

> "Now concerning spiritual gifts, brethren, I would not have you ignorant. Ye know that ye were Gentiles" (I Cor. xii. 1).

To those who believe that "all Scripture is given by inspiration of God" these things will be the end of all argument.

I Cor. xii.-xiv. deals with these spiritual gifts from various angles. We are not at the moment concerned with the nature of these gifts, their variety, permanence or cessation, but we are concerned with the reason why Isa. xxviii. should have been quoted. This quotation from Isaiah is rather similar to the passage in Deut. xxxii.:

> "I will move them to jealousy with those that are not a people. I will provoke them to anger with a foolish nation" (Deut. xxxii. 21).

This passage is quoted or referred to in Rom. x. 19, xi. 11, and xi. 14. After having stressed the blessing of the Gentile, the Apostle uses the illustration of the olive tree. The Gentile believer is likened to a wild olive grafted in contrary to nature, partaking in both the root and the fatness of the olive tree. The Apostle magnifies his office as the Apostle of the Gentiles "if by any means I may provoke to emulation them which are my flesh, and might save some of them" (Rom. xi. 14).

We learn from these passages that one of the reasons for the abundance of spiritual gifts that characterized the Gentile Churches, was that Israel might, if it were possible, be awakened to see their prerogatives passing to the uncircumcision, and so be provoked to jealousy, and repent and be saved. This, however, was not to be. Israel were not provoked; they passed out into their present blindness, and the gifts ceased.

There can be no doubt after considering the testimony of these Scriptures that the gifts enjoyed by the early Church were well within the sphere of those things "which the Prophets and Moses did say should come".

#14. Seven Qualifications for Service found in Judges vi. 11-27.
p. 98

(1) THERE MUST BE HEART EXERCISE AND CONCERN FOR THE LORD'S WORK AND PEOPLE.
"If the Lord be with us, why then is all this befallen us?" (13).

(2) THERE MUST BE THE ASSURANCE OF THE LORD'S PRESENCE.
"The Lord is with thee, thou mighty man of valour" (12).

(3) THE LORD'S COMMAND AND ENABLING MUST EQUIP.
"Go in this thy might, and thou shalt save Israel . . . . . have not I sent thee?" (14).

(4) THERE MUST BE NO CONFIDENCE IN THE FLESH.
"My family is poor . . . . . I am the least" (15).

(5) ALL SERVICE PRESUPPOSES GRACE.
"If now I have found grace in Thy sight" (17).

(6) SERVICE IS ONLY POSSIBLE BY VIRTUE OF CHRIST.
"Then Gideon built an altar . . . . . and called it Jehovah-Shalom" (19-24).

(7) SERVICE DEMANDS OBEDIENCE AND TESTING.
"Gideon . . . . . did as the Lord had said . . . . . bring out thy son, that he may die" (27-30).

#15. Abraham's Bosom.
p. 143

In Luke xvi. 22 and 23, the Lord speaks of Lazarus being carried by the angels to Abraham's bosom. The Rabbinical teaching speaks of three states after death, for the righteous.

(1) "IN THE GARDEN OF EDEN."

" 'He shall be as a tree planted by the rivers of waters'. This is Abraham, whom God took, and planted in the land of Israel: or whom God took and planted in the garden of Eden."

"When our master Moses departed into the garden of Eden, he said unto Joshua, etc., etc." (Midrash Tillin, and Temurah).

(2) "UNDER THE THRONE OF GLORY."

In chapter x. of Avoth R. Nathan is a long story of how the angel of death failed to take away the soul of Moses, so that > "God taketh hold of him Himself, and treasureth him up under the throne of glory", adding, a little after, that "the souls of other just persons also are reposited under the throne of glory."

(3) "IN ABRAHAM'S BOSOM."

This phrase is met in the writings of the Talmudists. Levi speaks of Rabbi Judah as being "in Abraham's bosom". Josephus in his discourse on Hades writes:

> "There is one descent into this region . . . . . they are conducted down by angels . . . . . guided to the right hand . . . . . wait for that rest and eternal new life in heaven. This place we call The Bosom of Abraham."

In contrast with all this tradition, the Saviour said: "If they hear not Moses and the Prophets, neither will they be persuaded though one rose from the dead" (Luke xvi. 31). Where, in Moses and the Prophets, is there anything approaching the Rabbinical tradition quoted here?

#16. Keep.
p. 143

(1) A SURE TEST — John xiv. 15
"If ye love Me, keep My commandments."

(2) AN ASSURED FAITH — I John ii. 3
"We know . . . . . if we keep."

(3) A SEPARATED WALK — James i. 27
"Keep . . . . . unspotted from the world."

(4) A HOLY CHARGE — John xiv. 23
"He will keep My words."

(5) A FAITHFUL SERVICE — II Tim. iv. 7
"I have kept the faith."

(6) A SAFE ENVIRONMENT — Jude 21
"Keep yourselves in the love of God."

(7) A STIMULATING PROMISE — John xv. 10
"If ye keep . . . . . ye shall abide in My love."

#17. John iii. 16.
p. 223

GOD	Almighty Authority "The gospel of God" (Rom. i. 1).
SO LOVED	Mightiest Motive "Love of Christ constraineth" (II Cor. v. 14).
SON	Greatest Gift "He spared not His own Son" (Rom. viii. 32).
WHOSOEVER	Widest Welcome "Unto all" (Rom. iii. 22).
BELIEVETH	Easiest Escape "And upon all them that believe" (Rom. iii. 22).
NOT PERISH	Divine Deliverance "Delivered from so great a death" (II Cor. i. 10).
LIFE	Priceless Possession "He that hath the Son hath life" (I John v. 12).

#1. The Suretyship of Christ (Gen. xliii. 1-10 and xliv. 18-34).

pp. 180 - 182

The historic incident contained in these verses is full of teaching, both regarding Christ, the Christian, and the final restoration of Israel. The special thought to be impressed, however, is: The Suretyship of Christ.

"I will be surety" (Gen. xliii. 9).—The word surety, in Hebrew, comes from a word which means "to mix", and is once translated "woof", i.e., the threads which run across the "warp" in weaving. Thus the idea of a surety is one who so identifies himself with the one at fault as to be treated in his stead. Substitution is hereby emphasized (See Heb. ii. 14-18, iv. 15, 16; II Cor. v. 21).

"Of my hand shalt thou require him" (Gen. xliii. 9).—Compare Gen. xxxi. 36; II Sam. iv. 11. The word involves payment exacted in full, and vengeance falling if unsettled.

". . . . . let me bear the blame for ever" (Gen. xliii. 9).—The word "blame" is rendered "sin" 165 times in O.T. Hence Judah's words may be rendered "let me bear sin for ever". Herein we see the responsibilities of Suretyship. If our Beloved Lord had failed, He would be still bearing sin, but He was raised from the dead "because of our justification" (Rom. iv. 25); hence every claim is met, all liability discharged, and the penalty endured.

This is still more forcibly brought out in Gen. xliv. 32-34. The erring sinful man Judah understood the solemnity of Suretyship. In verse 33 the precious word "instead" occurs. Christ dying "instead" of "me" means irreversible salvation. Poor Judah contemplated remaining a bondman, but Christ could not be holden by the grave, seeing that He had a personal righteousness which the imputation of sin could not obliterate; consequently He was raised from the dead and became the first-fruits of His people.

"How shall I go up to my father, and the lad be not with me?" (Gen. xliv. 34).—Let us spend a few moments in meditation upon this verse. What unfathomable depths of Divine consolation are here for every redeemed child of God. This is a question which, in essence, our Beloved Lord might also have asked. Praise His name for the words spoken immediately after His resurrection in John xx. 17: "Go to My brethren, and say unto them, I ascend unto My Father, and your Father." Hence all was accomplished; the great atonement was made, and He ascended to present it once and for ever in the Heavenly Holiest of All.

"With me" said Judah: And so also the Saviour, and because He lives, we shall live also. If we died with Him, we shall also live together with Him—and even now we have been raised together with Him, and made to sit together with Him in heavenly places.

May we here apply the truth to those who may be unsaved. The law of God is holy; it demands perfect obedience, failing which, it can pronounce nothing but the penalty. You, like all men, have failed to obey that law, for it extends to the thoughts of the heart—from the cradle to the grave—and needs a perfect man to obey its precepts. Your condition is truly terrible, for you are under the curse! Your only hope is, not that you may evade the claims or penalty of the law, but that the Lord Jesus had said in the presence of His Father: "I will be Surety for him—of My hand shalt thou require him." If you feel your helplessness; if you see yourself as a condemned rebel, yet see that God is righteous Who taketh vengeance—then turn to the Lord Jesus Who came to save His people from their sins. He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life.

#2. Psalm xl.
pp. 227, 228

This Psalm, written by inspiration of God, gives us in the first place, David's own experience as a saved sinner; secondly, the experience of the redeemed in all dispensations; and thirdly and chiefly, the heart utterances of the Lord when here on earth. It may perhaps seem strange at first sight that this Psalm should speak of the perfect, sinless, Holy One of God, but, if we keep in mind the passage considered in the first article of this series in connection with Suretyship, we shall be the better able to enter into its wonderful teaching. By nature man was in the "horrible pit", and to this "pit" the spotless Son of God descended. He humbled Himself even to the death of the cross, wherefore God hath highly exalted Him, and the Gates of Hell (or Hades, the unseen place) could not prevail against Him.

Verses 6, 7 and 8 are quoted in Heb. x. as the Lord's words, when He entered upon His substitutionary work—when He Who was God over all, blessed for ever, became flesh and tabernacled among us. Verse 8 makes it very clear that Christ was perfectly righteous, and we must keep this in mind as we read verse 12—which speaks of "Mine iniquities", and "My heart faileth Me". The sinless One speaks of "Mine iniquities"! Here indeed we see the full extent of substitution. So completely does our Surety enter into our position that, while in His Own nature perfectly sinless and righteous, He graciously bears our sins in His Own Body on the tree, and there receives the stroke and dies as the great Sin-bearer. Hallelujah—What a Saviour!

It should be noted that the passage does not speak of "our iniquities" but "Mine iniquities". The Saviour can have no fellowship with us here, for He and He alone can put away sin. He and His Father alone accomplished the work of Redemption. No man is called upon to help; no one could do anything but mar such a work. Grace is supreme, and the glory is the Lord's.

Let us look back now to verse 5. In this verse blessings are the theme, and they are innumerable. In verse 12 sins are the theme, and they are more in number than the hairs of one's head. In verse 12 Christ stands alone, for when the sword was raised against Jehovah's shepherd "they all forsook Him and fled". But in verse 5 it is "to usward". He was alone in the bearing of sin, but He is in fellowship with His own in receiving the blessing. Dear fellow-believer, every blessing you enjoy now or will enjoy throughout eternity is the result of the vicarious Atoning Work of Christ, and you cannot enter into one of them apart from fellowship with Him. Is your life in harmony with this glorious fact?

#3. Tiberius. Tetrarchs. High Priests (Luke iii. 1, 2).

pp. 4 - 7

> "Now in the fifteenth year of the reign of Tiberius Cæsar, Pontius Pilate governor of Judæa, and Herod being tetrarch of Galilee, and his brother Philip tetrarch of Iturea and of the region of Trachonitis, and Lysanius the tetrarch of Abilene, Annas and Caiaphas being the high priests, the word of God came unto John, son of Zacharias, in the wilderness" (Luke iii. 1, 2).

Luke tells us in the opening of his Gospel, that having had perfect understanding of all things "from above" (anothen), he proposes to write "in order, a declaration of those things most surely believed among us". There is no scarcity of historical data in the verses quoted above. The call of John the Baptist is fixed by the reign of an Emperor, the governorship of Pilate, the tetrarchy of Herod and his brother Philip, and the presence of two High Priests, Annas and Caiaphas, at the same time. What do we know of these historical facts that are important enough to have found a place in Holy Writ? By seeking to elucidate points of this kind we trust that this series of articles will help to make the inspired background of the N.T. clearer and more intelligible.

Augustus who lived to see the death of all his direct descendants with the exception of one weak-minded youth, was forced to adopt Tiberius, the son of Livia, his wife by an earlier marriage. Augustus personally disliked him, but he was unquestionably an able man and reigned for twenty-three years.

> "The picture of that reign irresistibly impressed on our minds by the great Roman historian Tacitus, who was born some twenty years after it ended, is lurid and repulsive; nor can it be doubted that in certain of its aspects the reign was lurid and repulsive in actual fact. Nevertheless it assuredly had another side . . . . . Tiberius was deaf to the beguilements of vested interests, popular agitation, or family influences . . . . . Apart from hard drinking, however, we hear nothing of the emperor's addictions to animal vices till after his retirement to Capreæ in the twelfth year of his reign (A.D.26), when he was nearly seventy" (Hammerton).

During the mild administration of Augustus the people were never forced to any act of worship. Tiberius, however, in the latter part of his reign, visited with severe penalties any act of impiety (asebeia), and the revival of these laws by Nero provided a convenient means of persecuting the Christians. The prominence of the word eusebeia, "godliness", in the pastoral epistles is explained by this historical fact.

Tiberius adopted a different policy from that which his predecessors had followed, in that he seldom changed the governors of the provinces. "Should I send a succession of governors", he said, "my subjects would be pillaged without mercy; but if the same prefect be continued for a number of years, he will plunder eagerly enough at first, but when he has filled his coffers, his rapacity will lose its edge" (Josephus Ant. xviii. vi. 5). Consequently although his reign lasted twenty-three years, Tiberius made only one change in the Procuratorship of Judæa. Valerius Gratus was appointed in A.D.15, and was replaced by Pontius Pilate in A.D.26.

Concerning the death of Christ during the reign of Tiberius, Tacitus writes:

> "The author of that name (christian) or sect was Christ, Who was capitally punished in the reign of Tiberius by Pontius Pilate."
>
> Auctor nominis ejus Christus, qui Tiberio imperitante, per procuratorem Pontium Pilatum, supplicit affectus erat (Ann. lib. xv. c. 44).

There are quite a number of points of importance, with regard to Roman law and its administration, associated with Pilate, but as a consideration of these will occupy all the space we can devote to one article, we propose to reserve what must be said of Pilate for another occasion.

The history of the Herods is a tale of tragedy, blood and intrigue, sufficient to justify Shakespeare's phrase: "It out-Herod's Herod." But this again will require a separate article.

Pursuing our survey of Luke iii. 1, 2, the next point that calls for mention is the title of "tetrarch". By derivation the word signifies the governor of the fourth part of a province, and this was the original meaning. It was subsequently used, however, without too close an adherence to the idea of a fourth part. In the reign of Tiberius, Herod's kingdom was divided into three parts, and his three sons were made "tetrarchs". Archelaus became tetrarch of Judæa, Samaria and Idumæa; Philip tetrarch of Trachonitis and Iturea; and Herod tetrarch of Galilee and Peræa. While originally the tetrarchs wore no diadem, and did not bear the title of king, in course of time the title was allowed.

One further point demands our attention, namely, Luke's reference to "Annas and Caiaphas being the High Priests". In his earlier essays Lightfoot suggests that Annas was the "Nasi", or Head of the Sanhedrin, representing Moses, while Caiaphas represented Aaron. Those who quote Lightfoot should remember, however, that he subsequently wrote:

> "I was once of another mind, I confess; and supposed Annas to be called high priest, because a priest, and head of the Sanhedrin, in which I was too credulous to Baronius, a man far better skilled in Christian antiquity than in Jewish. But now I find that never any such man was head of the Sanhedrin at all; and therefore, I am now swayed to believe, that Annas is called high priest, as indeed having once been so, but now deposed, and now sagan under Caiaphas" (Lightfoot's Works ix. 39).

The editors of the Companion Bible have adopted Lightfoot's earlier view, but have apparently failed to note his own retraction (See marginal notes to Luke iii. 3, John xviii. 13, 24 and Acts iv. 6). The Sagan, to whom Lightfoot refers, was a priest appointed as a reserve in case, by any act of defilement, the High Priest should be unable to perform his duties. Josephus gives one example of this, and other examples are found in the Talmud.

Gratius, the predecessor of Pontius Pilate, deprived Annas of the high-priesthood, and appointed successively Ishmæl, Eleazar and Annas, Simon, and then Caiaphas. It is probable that the Jews resented this and, while being obliged outwardly to accept the nominees of the Roman Governor, they probably retained the title for the man who had succeeded to the office in the orthodox way. As late as Acts iv. 6, we read of "Annas the High Priest, and Caiaphas"—which lends colour to the suggestion of strong Jewish antipathy towards Roman interference.

Within the limits we have allotted for these articles we cannot say very much, but we trust that what is brought forward from time to time will help gradually to build up a mental picture of the people and events that form the background in the great N.T. drama of light and darkness.

#4. Caligula, the Mad, and Claudius, the Wise Fool. (Acts ix. - xi.).

pp. 50 - 54

Before the accession of Caligula, Tiberius had thrown Agrippa into prison on the evidence of his coachman's report of a conversation overheard between Agrippa and Caligula. As soon as he heard of Tiberius' death, Agrippa freed-man came running to tell Agrippa the news, saying in the Hebrews tongue: "The Lion is dead." Upon his accession, Caligula set Agrippa at liberty and placed upon his head a royal diadem. He also made him king over the tetrarchy of Philip and gave him a golden chain of weight equal to that of the chain with which he had been bound in prison.

The name Caligula means "bootling" and had been given by the soldiers to Gaius, the son of Germanicus, as a pet name. As a child he had been the idol of the army, and at his accession to the throne of the Cæsars, all Rome rejoiced. His brothers and his mother were dead, and his sister Agrippina at this time was about to become the mother of the future emperor Nero. The first few months of his reign were full of promise. He liberated prisoners, recalled exiles, and publicly burned incriminating documents. But he soon fell sick with a fever, and arose from his bed a maniac. He became possessed with the idea of his own divinity, and indulged in a lust for blood the record of which is sickening to read. Once, when annoyed by the populace at a public entertainment, he expressed the wish that the Roman people had but one neck so that he might sever it at a single blow. He made his horse, Incitatus, a consul; and his crazy reign ended with his assassination by one of the officers of the Praetorians.

Josephus tells of one incident that occurred during Caligula's reign that is connected with the temple at Jerusalem. The people of Alexandria worked upon the passions of Caligula by telling him that, whereas all other countries in the Empire signalized their loyalty and devotion by erecting altars and temples in the Emperor's honour, the Jews refused to do any such thing. Thereupon Caligula sent Petronius to be President of Syria, with the charge that the Jews should erect a statue to himself in their temple. Petronius, however, was met by tens of thousands of Jews who told him that, while they could not think of meeting the Roman armies in warfare, they were nevertheless willing to die rather than dishonour the Name of God. For a continuous period of forty days the Jews assembled thus, and all agriculture was neglected. So much so that Petronius was obliged to write to the Emperor and tell him that if he persisted in his design, not only would it mean the massacre of tens of thousands of Jews, but also famine and loss of tribute. Agrippa eventually extracted from Caligula the rescinding of the order, and God showed His approval of the Jews' attitude by a remarkable supply of rain when it was least expected. Petronius was ordered to become his own executioner, but news of Caligula's death arrived before this order reached him.

It is true, of course, that none of these details are to be found in the Acts of the Apostles, but it is interesting to remember that the conversion and commission of Paul were events that took place during this appalling reign.

Upon the assassination of Caligula, and while the Senate debated the various claims to the succession, the Guard took the matter into their own hands, dragged Claudius out from behind a curtain, and hurried him off to the camp, where he was hailed as Imperator. Claudius had owed a great deal to the advice and mediation of Agrippa, and in return he restored to Agrippa his grandfather's dominions, and made him king over Judæa and Samaria. This Agrippa is the Herod whose tragic death is recorded in Acts xii., and about whom more must be said in a later article.

Claudius had lived a retired life, and was rather of the student type. Many, however, considered that he was deficient mentally. To this view of his capabilities he probably owed his life, and so found himself at the age of fifty the successor to the Imperial purple that had been worn by his nephew Caligula. Claudius added three new letters to the Roman alphabet—which were afterwards dropped—built the harbour at Ostia, and erected the aqueduct that bears his name. Julius Cæsar had made an attempt at the subjugation of Britain, but it was Claudius who actually added this island to the Roman Empire. Claudius came here in person, and at Brentwood (the district where the present writer is preparing this article) first came into contact with the British forces. The possibility that the name of a British Princess is to be found in one of Paul's epistles and its connection with the campaign of Claudius will be considered when dealing with the Epistles to Timothy.

Among the items of interest that connect Claudius with apostolic history must be mentioned the famine of Acts xi. 28, and the expulsion of the Jews from Rome (Acts xviii. 2).

> "Agabus signified by the Spirit that there should be great dearth throughout all the world: which came to pass in the days of Claudius Cæsar" (Acts xi. 28).

Josephus places the time of the famine as that of Cuspius Fadus and Tiberius Alexander, so that it must have occurred between A.D.44 and A.D.48. Both of these prefects exercised their authority during the reign of Claudius.

As a parallel with the Church's effort to meet the conditions brought about by famine the following extract from Josephus will be of interest. Izates, King of Adiabene, and his mother Helena, the Queen Dowager, had lately become proselytes to the Jewish religion, and Josephus writes as follows concerning the Queen's coming to live at Jerusalem:

> "Now her coming was of infinite service to the people of Jerusalem: for a famine about that time oppressing the city, and many dying of want, Queen Helena sent some of her servants to Alexandria, with money to buy a great quantity of corn, and others of them to Cyprus to bring a cargo of dried figs . . . . . She distributed to those that were distressed" (Josephus Ant. xx. ii. 5).

In the Pembroke collection there is a coin issued in the reign of Claudius bearing a pair of scales, the recognized symbol of famine.

Before dealing with the edict that expelled the Jews from Rome, it will be of interest to record one other incident in the reign of Claudius. The robes of the High Priest had been held in custody by the Romans from A.D.6 up to A.D.37, when they were restored to the Jews. Fadus, however, upon being appointed in A.D.44, received orders from Claudius to withdraw the robes from the custody of the Jews. Agrippa, however, interceded with Claudius, and the Emperor relented. His rescript throws an interesting light upon his character.

> "Claudius Cæsar Germanicus, Tribune of the people for the fifth time, Consul elect the fourth time, Imperator the tenth time, the Father of his country—to the Magistrates of Jerusalem, the Senate, the People, and all the nation of the Jews, greeting.
>
> My Agrippa (whom I have educated, and retain with me as most dutiful) having introduced to me your ambassadors who came to thank me for the care I had taken of your nation, and earnestly, anxiously entreated that the holy vest and the crown might be in your custody, I grant it, as was done by the most noble and excellent Vitellius. And I am of this mind, first from my own sense of religion, and my desire that all men should live according to the customs of their fathers, and next because I know that in so doing, I shall highly gratify King Herod himself, and Aristobolus the younger, with whose loyalty to myself and zeal for your interests I am will acquainted, with whom I have the greatest friendship, as they are most worthy and esteemed of me. I have also written about these matters to Cuspius Fadus, my Procurator.
> The bearers of the letter are Cornelius, son of Keron, Typhon, son of Theudion, Dorotheus, son of Nathaniel, and John, son of John. Dated the 4th before the Kalends of July, in the consulship of Rufus and Pompeius Sylvanus (28th June, A.D.45)."

Another event which occurred during the reign of Claudius was the expulsion of the Jews from Rome. The incidents connected with this expulsion led to the appointment of Felix, and the fellowship of Aquila and Priscilla with Paul. The hostility between the Samaritans and the Jews had led to bloodshed at the time of the Feast of Tabernacles. The news which reached Claudius was probably exaggerated, and he became apprehensive lest the Jews living in Rome might be led on to some act of treason. He therefore issued a decree that all the Jews should be expelled. This is probably the expulsion referred to by Suetonius, Claud. 25:

> "Judaeos impulsore Chresto assidue tumultuantes Roma exhulit."
>
> "The Jews, who were constantly making disturbances, Chrestus being the mover, be banished from Rome."

Chrestianus is found in Tertull. Ahol c 3, and Chrestum in Lactant. Instit. iv. 7, which would suggest that Chrestus here means "Christ". As we have seen, the expulsion was overruled to bring about the association of Paul with Aquila and Priscilla.

Claudius abolished the laws of impiety, and forbade his subjects to offer him sacrifice or any other form of worship. It was during the thirteen years of his reign, that the Christian faith had time to spread.

We have rather exceeded the space we intended for an article of this series, and we will therefore leave the narrative here, trusting that the historical points dealt with will be of service to all students of the New Testament who read these pages.

#5. Nero, the Monster. (II Tim. iv. 17).
pp. 85 - 87

On the death of Messalina, the infamous wife of Claudius, Pallas, one of his freedmen, strenuously advocated the claims of Agrippina. Agrippina was the younger sister of Caligula, the widow of Domitus Ahenobarbus and mother of Nero. She became the wife of her uncle Claudius, and persuaded him to pass over his son Britannicus in favour of her own son Nero. When this was accomplished, she poisoned Claudius and set Nero upon the throne. She was finally murdered by the very son for whom she had committed so much evil. Such was the beginning of Nero's reign; and it was before this monster of cruelty and vanity that Paul had to stand his trial. Nero's parents were conspicuously vile even in their day. His father Ahenobarbus declared that with himself as father and Agrippina as mother "a monster only could be born". And a monster he became.

Four years after his adoption by Claudius, Nero succeeded to the throne.

> "At the commencement of his reign his conduct excited great hopes in the Romans; he appeared just, liberal, affable, polished, complaisant, and king; but this was a mask which hid the most depraved mind that ever disgraced a human being."

Among the tutors of the young Nero was one of high repute, the philosopher Seneca. There are letters extant that purport to have been written by Paul and Seneca to each other. These were known to Jerome, and, although they are spurious, they indicate the place that Seneca occupied in the world of moral philosophy. He utterly failed, however, to curb the immoral tendencies in his pupil—demonstrating once again the utter necessity of the grace of God, and the powerlessness of human wisdom. Seneca was accused by Nero of treason, and died by opening his own veins. Don Cassius ascribes the revolt of the Britons under Boadicea to the distress to which they were driven through the rapacity of Seneca and his agents.

Nero poisoned Britannicus in the year following his own accession to the throne. He was married to Octavia, the daughter of Claudius, a woman of singular virtue, whom he accordingly detested, lived an immoral life with a courtesan named Acte, and in adultery with Poppæa, whose two husbands were still living. He married Poppæa in A.D.62, a year or two before the Apostle's release at the end of Acts xxviii. Strangely enough Josephus tells us that Poppæa was a proselyte to the Jewish faith, and occasionally she protected the Jews and conferred favours upon them. Even Nero himself was conversant with the Jewish religion and was assured by his friends that the fates had destined him to be King of Jerusalem* (Suet. Nero 40).

In A.D.59 Nero added to his series of crimes that of matricide. At the jealous instigation of Poppæa, he was responsible for the murder of his mother Agrippina. After this his nerves became frayed and, not daring to return to Rome, he retired to Naples. The servile Senate, however, urged him to come back to Rome, and now that the restraining power of Agrippina was removed, he gave free indulgence to his every whim. He became charioteer, singer and player upon the guitar. Gallio, who is mentioned in the Acts, had the degrading office of announcing "Nero Claudius is about to sing" (Don Cass. lxi. 20). Tears ran down the cheeks of the honest old soldier Burrhus, as he saw his master thus disgrace the name of Cæsar.

Nero actually encouraged new forms of vice by payment, with appalling results. As Lewin writes:

> "If the passions of men cannot be subdued even by stringent laws, it may well be supposed what license prevailed when the chief magistrate himself offered a premium to depravity."

On the night of July 19th A.D.64, soon after Paul's release at the end of Acts xxviii., a fire broke out in Rome that raged for six days and seven nights. It was commonly reported that Nero himself was the incendiary, and that his object was to obtain a clear space in which to erect a magnificent palace. To provide a scape-goat for the multitude, he started the calumny that the Christians were the culprits, and persecution on a large scale began.

Tacitus, the Roman historian, writes as follows:

[* - For the close parallel between Seneca's writings and the teaching of Scripture, the reader is referred to the series Wisdom, Human and Divine, Volume XXVI, page 104.]

> "To put an end therefore to this report, he laid the guilt, and inflicted the most cruel punishments, upon a set of people who were held in abhorrence for their crimes, and called by the vulgar, Christians. The founder of that name was Christ, Who suffered death in the reign of Tiberius, under his Procurator Pontius Pilate. This pernicious superstition, thus checked for a while, broke out again and spread, not only over Judæa, where the evil originated, but through Rome also, whither everything bad upon the earth finds its way, and is practiced. Some who confessed their sect were first seized, and afterwards, by their information, a vast multitude were apprehended, who were committed, not so much of the crime of burning Rome, as of hatred to mankind. Their sufferings at their execution were aggravated by insult and mockery, for some were disguised in the skin of wild beasts, and worried to death by dogs, some were crucified, and others were wrapped in pitched shirts, and set on fire when the day closed, that they might serve as lights to illuminate the night. Nero lent his own gardens for these exhibitions, and exhibited at the same time a mock circussian entertainment, being a spectator of the whole in the dress of a charioteer, sometimes mingling with the crowd on foot, and sometimes viewing the spectacle from his car. This conduct made the sufferers pitied, and though they were criminals and deserving the severest punishment, yet they were considered as sacrificed, not so much out of regard to the public good, as to gratify the cruelty of one man" (Tac. Ann. xv. 44).

Perhaps the reader will more fully appreciate, after reading this extract, the intensity of meaning in the Apostle's words to Timothy:

> "Wherein I suffer trouble as an evil doer, even unto bonds" (II Tim. ii. 9).

When the Apostle writes in the same epistle: "I was delivered out of the mouth of the lion" (II Tim. iv. 17) he is probably referring to Nero, just as at the death of Tiberius, the information was imparted by the words "The Lion is dead".

When Nero perceived that nothing could save him from the consequences of his shame, he made several attempts at suicide, and eventually died with the words of vanity upon his lips: Qualis artifex peres—"What an artist to perish!"

We shall have more to say concerning Nero when we come to deal with Paul's trial, but for the moment we must conclude. We trust that as the series proceeds, the dark background against which the early ministers of the faith lived and died, may become more real and living.

#6. Gallio, who "cared for none of these things". (Acts xviii. 12-17).

With Roman history after Nero, the student of the New Testament is not, in general, so vitally concerned—although it is true that the Apostle John lived on through the reigns of several more Emperors. For the benefit of those who may appreciate the tabulation of facts, we give below the Emperors, and their dates, together with various supplementary names, and events that took place either in secular history or in the life of the Apostle Paul. With one or two exceptions and modifications, the list is substantially the same as that given in Farrar's Life and Works of Paul, and the chronological tables in Conybeare and Howson and The Companion Bible.

The reader will find an account of the closing years of Paul's ministry in the third article of the series on the Second Epistle to Timothy. A.D.66 appears to be the best authenticated date for Paul's martyrdom, but absolute certainty is impossible. Lewin gives A.D.66; Farrar and Conybeare and Howson, and The Companion Bible give A.D.68. As Nero died in June A.D.68 this must of necessity be the latest possible date. The outbreak of fire in A.D.64 marks the beginning of the persecution responsible for the Apostle's death, which must have occurred, at the latest, within four years from this date.

Some account must now be given of the men with whom Paul came into contact in the Acts.

> "And when Paul was now about to open his mouth, Gallio said unto the Jews, If it were a matter of wrong or of wicked lewdness, O ye Jews, reason would that I should bear with you: but if it be a question of words and names, and of your law, look ye to it; for I will be no judge of such matters . . . . . And Gallio cared for none of these things" (Acts xviii. 14-17).

Through not understanding either the character of the man or meaning of the scriptural comment, Gallio has become a symbol of indifference just as Ananias has become a symbol of falsehood. This, however, is an entire misconception.

Gallio was the deputy or pro-consul of Achaia. It is a testimony to the historical accuracy of Luke that he uses the correct title here, for the government of Achaia had been in a state of constant change. Under Augustus it had been in a state of constant change. Under Augustus it had been pro-consular, then for a time imperial under Tiberius, then again pro-consular under Claudius, free under Nero, and again pro-consular under Vespasian.

Gallio's brother Seneca, wrote of him:

> "No mortal man is so sweet to any single person as he is to all mankind."

And, in another place:

> "Even those who love my brother Gallio to the very utmost of their power yet do not love him enough."
>
> "He was the very flower of pagan courtesy and pagan culture—a Roman with all a Roman's dignity and seriousness, and yet with all the grace and versatility of a polished Greek" (Farrar, ref. to Dion Cass. lx. 35).

The Jewish religion was a religio licita—i.e., licensed by the state—and the charge brought by the Jews against Paul was that he was teaching something contrary to the Law of Moses, and consequently something unlawful in the eyes of Rome. Gallio, however, was not moved by these specious charges. Had the charge been one of civil wrong (adikema), or moral outrage (rhadiourgema), he would have listened to them, but questions about "words", "names", and "your law"—"Look ye to it", says the truly disdainful Roman, and drives them from the judgment-seat.

> "While we regret this unphilosophic disregard, let us at least do justice to Roman impartiality. In Gallio, in Lysias, in Felix, in Festus, in the Centurion Julius, even in Pilate, different as were their degrees of rectitude, we cannot but admire the judicial insight with which they at once saw through the subterranean injustice and virulent animosity of the Jews in bringing false charges against innocent men" (Farrar).

Tacitus informs us that Gallio died in the year A.D.65. From Pliny we learn that, after his consulship, he had a serious illness and went on a sea voyage, and Seneca tells us that he went on this voyage from Achaia. We also know that Seneca was not in favour at Rome until A.D.49 when he returned from his exile in Corsica. These facts taken together place Gallio in Achaia between A.D.52 and 54, which is in harmony with the chronology of the Acts.

We have already seen that Augustus was unconsciously responsible for the birth of Christ taking place at Bethlehem, and that Claudius brought about the friendship of Paul with Aquila and Priscilla. We now see that Gallio, quite unwittingly, was used to fulfil the Lord's promise to Paul:

> "Be not afraid, but speak, and hold not thy peace. For I am with thee, and no man shall set on thee to hurt thee: for I have much people in this city. And he continued there a year and six months, teaching the Word of God amongst them" (Acts xviii. 9-11).

Here for the moment we must stop; we shall hope to deal with the lives of Felix, Festus and others in subsequent articles.

#7. Felix and others who came into touch with Paul. (Acts xxiv. - xxviii.).
pp. 171 - 173

When Paul was apprehended after the uproar at Jerusalem (Acts xxii.). Claudius Lysias, discovering that he was a Roman citizen, sent him with a letter to "Felix the governor".

Felix, together with his brother Pallas, had been imported as slaves, and purchased by Antonia, the mother of Claudius. They were both exceedingly clever, and soon were entrusted with great responsibilities. Pallas ruled the financial affairs of the house of Claudius, while Felix held office in the army. In A.D.52 Felix was appointed Procurator of Judæa, and, as Tacitus writes, "wielded the sceptre of a monarch with the soul of a slave".

> "He was not a Roman by birth, and he had none of the Roman qualities; artful and perfidious, and stirred by revenge, even to the use of the assassin's knife, a votary of pleasure and regardless of the feelings he wounded in the pursuit of it, ostentatious and extravagant, and feeding his wasteful indulgences by peculation and extortion" (Lewin).

Agrippa had known Felix in Rome, and the acquaintance brought Felix into touch with Drusilla, the wife of Azigas, King of Emesa. Ready to hand was an instrument only too willing to assist in any evil work—Simon the Magician. Simon called himself the Almighty, the Christ, and the Paraclete, and took about with him a courtesan Helena, exhibiting her as an emanation of his own godship. He is thought by some, though without definite proof, to have been the Simon of Acts viii. 18, and his name is perpetuated to this day in the hateful word "Simony" which means "traffic in ecclesiastical preferment".

Felix employed this man to seduce the Queen of Emesa from her husband:--

> "Because she was desirous to avoid her sister's Berenice's envy, for she was very ill-treated on account of her beauty. She was prevailed upon to trespass the laws of her forefathers, and to marry Felix."

The Queen, together with the son born of this marriage, perished in the eruption of Vesuvius.

The usual duration of a procuratorship was two or three years, but Felix had already held the office for six years. The apostle Paul was cognizant of this, and the fact gives point to the opening of his defence before Felix:

> "Forasmuch as I know that thou hast been of many years a judge unto this nation, I do the more cheerfully answer for myself" (Acts xxiv. 10).

When Felix came back to Jerusalem we read that "he came with his wife Drusilla, which was a Jewess", and that he "sent for Paul, and heard him concerning the faith in Christ" (Acts xxiv. 24). We do not know what line of testimony the Apostle followed. For the sake of the Jewish Drusilla, he may have expounded the O.T. Scriptures and proved that Jesus was the Christ, as he is seen doing elsewhere in the Acts, but whether this is so or not, we know that he applied the truth to the guilty consciences of the two before whom he stood:

> "And as he reasoned of righteousness, temperance, and judgment to come, Felix trembled" (Acts xxiv. 25).

The more convenient season of which Felix spoke never came, and his sordid love of gain kept Paul a prisoner for two years. Then, wishing to gain all the influence possible in his favour on his return to Rome "Felix, willing to show the Jews a pleasure, left Paul bound" (Acts xxiv. 27).

The Jews, however, were not to be so easily disposed of, and sent a deputation to accuse him to the Emperor:

> "And he had certainly been brought to punishment, unless Nero had yielded to the importunate solicitations of his brother Pallas, who was at that time had in greatest honour by him" (Josephus Ant. xx. viii. 9).

Festus, who succeeded Felix in A.D.60, died the following year, and so provides another definite date in the chronology of the Acts—the other dated event, which has not yet been brought forward in this series, being the death of Herod in A.D.44 (Acts xii.). There is little to be said of Festus that would be of service to the Bible student, and the conduct of Paul's case before him and Agrippa will come before us when we are considering the procedure of the Roman trial.

We pass on, therefore, to the Centurion, Julius, to whose care Paul was consigned in Acts xxvii. 1. Some years ago a full-length effigy of a centurion was unearthed at Colchester, showing the breastplate, girdle and greaves, shoes, and military cloak and sword—equipment which figures in the imagery of Eph. vi.

Prisoners who came to Rome in order to appeal to the Emperor were delivered to the care of the Prefect of the Prætorium. The nature of the prisoner's treatment while in custody depended a good deal on the character of the charges against him. Some of them would be fastened by a chain round the right wrist to the left wrist of a soldier, but would otherwise enjoy a certain measure of liberty, and within prescribed limits would be permitted to hire a room for themselves. Such appears to have been the treatment meted out to Paul.

It was usual for two Prefects to be in charge of the Prætorian guards, but during the year in which Paul arrived at Rome, there was only one, Burrhus. For the first five years of Nero's reign the government was directed by Seneca and Burrhus, the latter bearing the character of a bluff, honest soldier. His treatment of Paul, the prisoner, would have been vastly different from that which Paul had to endure on his second imprisonment at Rome, under the Prefect Tigellinus. Burrhus had been removed by poison, and Tigellinus was the evil genius of Nero, and the instigator of the Christian persecutions.

We must give our attention next to the family of the Herods, and then go on to a consideration of the bearing of Roman law upon the teaching of the New Testament.

#8. The Herods of the New Testament.
pp. 215 - 217

We have so far considered very briefly the story of the Cæsars connected with the Scriptural narrative, and we must now begin the history of another line of kings, subject it is true to the imperial sway, but important actors nevertheless in the drama of the ages.

> "The years of the Son of God on earth were spent under the sway of three Herodian princes. His infancy narrowly escaped the massacre dictated by the ruthless jealousy of the first Idumæan King; the place chosen for the predestined home of His childhood was decided by the dread inspired by the cruel tyranny of the second (Archelaus); the third (Herod Antipas) was the murderer of His kinsman and forerunner, and, after the frustration of attempts to seize His person, took part in His cruel mockery and precipitated His earthly doom. The fourth (Agrippa I) imprisoned and beheaded His chief apostle, and scattered His disciples from Jerusalem to preach the Gospel to all the world. The fifth (Agrippa II) listened to the defence of the greatest early convert to His faith, and jestingly professed to be half ready to assume that designation of its votaries, which in those days had already become the synonym of 'evil-doer'." (Farrar).

To get some idea of the Herods one must go back a little to the Maccabean period in Jewish history. The first Maccabee to assume the title of King was John Hyrcanus. He ruled for twenty-six years in Palestine, and then sent his sons, Aristobolus and Antigonus, to attack Syria. He also subdued the Idumeans and compelled them to adopt Judaism. From these forcibly converted Idumeans sprang Antipater and the family of the Herods. Antipater was an Edomite, a descendant of Esau.

In B.C.64, troubles at Jerusalem, including a siege of the Temple, caused the Roman power to intervene, and Pompey the Great came to Damascus. Jerusalem was stormed and 12,000 Jews massacred. On the Day of Atonement (Tisri 10th or Sept. 22nd, B.C.63) Rome and Judæa first came face to face, and the King, Aristobolus, together with Alexander and Antigonus, were carried away as captives to Rome, to grace Pompey's triumph. Alexander, however, escaped, and in B.C.54 attacked Judæa. He was defeated by Mark Anthony.

The Jews then expressed a wish that their country should become a Pentapolis, that is, governed by five aristocratic sections of the Sanhedrin, at Jerusalem, Jericho, Gadara, Amathus and Sephoris. This state of affairs continued until Julius Cæsar restored Hyrcanus as Ethnarch (see Volume XXVII, page 163).

Antipater, whose history we are tracing, remained a friend of Pompey until B.C.48, when Pompey was defeated by Cæsar (Augustus) at Pharsalia. At this a lesser man might have despaired, but not so Antipater. He immediately transferred his allegiance, and rendered Cæsar such service in an hour of peril that Cæsar became the friend of the Idumeans. Consequently when Antigonus complained to Cæsar that Antipater had robbed him of his kingdom, he was dismissed, and Antipater made a Roman citizen and Procurator of all Judæa (B.C.47). Antipater was now practically King, and made his elder son governor of Jerusalem, while Herod his younger son received the governorship of Galilee. It is at this point that the name of Herod enters the pages of Jewish history.

On March 15th B.C.44 Julius Cæsar was assassinated, and in B.C.43 Antipater, the founder of the house of Herod, died of poison.

> "But he had already gratified the highest hopes of his ambition, and in Herod he left a son who inherited all his energy, his subtleness, his marked daring, his political ability, his magnificence, his personal beauty, and the singular power of fascination by which he won over in succession even the greatest of the Romans to support his cause" (Farrar).

Such is the history, in brief, that leads up to Herod the Great.

It is impossible to condense the story of Herod into closing paragraphs of this article. We must devote at least one complete article to the subject, and will therefore close this outline of Herod's ancestry by indicating the family tree of the Herods as they come into the Scriptural record.

Antipater was poisoned in B.C.43. He had four sons and one daughter. Phasael committed suicide; Joseph was killed in battle; Pheroras died a natural death. His daughter Salome was the mother of Berenice.

Herod the Great is the Herod mentioned in Luke i. and Matt. ii. He married several wives. Mariamne the Asmonæan was the mother of Aristobolus, who married Berenice, and was executed in B.C.6. Of this marriage there were two sons—Herod, King of Chalcis (A.D.48), who married his niece (Acts xxv. 13) and Agrippa I, whose death in A.D.44 is recorded in Acts xii.

Another son of Herod the Great by Mariamne the Boethusian was Herod Philip, who married Herodias (Matt. xiv. 3) and had a daughter Salome II. Malthase, a Samaritan, bore him Antipas and Archelaus. Antipas is the Herod mentioned in Luke iii. 1 and 19; ix. 7; xiii. 31; xxiii. 7; Matt. xiv. 1 and 3; and Mark vi. 14. Archelaus is the king mentioned in Matt. ii. 22.

Agrippa I, whose pedigree we have traced above, was the father of Agrippa II (Acts xxv. 13), and of Berenice (Acts xxv. 13), and of Drusilla, who married Felix (Acts xxiv. 24). The son born of this marriage with Felix bore the name of Agrippa and, together with his mother, perished in A.D.73 in the eruption of Vesuvius. So ended the house of Herod. It came in by bloodshed, it was sustained by murder, and it ended in flame and smoke.

The Epistle to the Romans.

#68. God's Sovereignty Established (ix. 14-29).
pp. 26 - 34

It is of the utmost importance in our study of Rom. ix. that we keep steadily in mind the fact that the objector in this chapter is a Jew and not a Gentile. A Gentile might object to the rejection of Esau, but no Jew would ever suggest that God was unrighteous because he rejected Edom and chose Israel. The pride of the Jew, so manifest in the Scriptures, would make such a suggestion impossible. The question of Rom. ix. 14 concerning the possibility of unrighteousness with God goes deeper; it arises out of the choice of the remnant according to the election of grace, and the corresponding passing by of the bulk of the nation. It is this, and not the "hating" of Esau, that would create a difficulty in the mind of the Jew. So with the question of the "hardening" of Pharaoh's heart. No orthodox Jew would have the slightest scruple or difficulty about this. What would trouble him would be the possibility that any one of the literal seed of Abraham should not find mercy. With ourselves, the point of view is different. We see a difficulty in the rejection of Esau, and in the hardening of Pharaoh's heart, but it is important to realize that, while these problems demand their own solution, they are not strictly relevant to the exposition of Rom. ix.-xi.

Paul had sat at the feet of Gamaliel. He must have known the different words used in the O.T. in connection with the hardening of Pharaoh's heart, and all the arguments that different schools of the Rabbis had put forward; yet he does not enter into the debate at all. It is possible to suggest as a kind of extenuation of the Divine act that Pharaoh is finally to be numbered among the saved, but of this suggestion Paul has nothing to say. It would also be possible to soften the statement by referring to the evident fact that many things are said to be done by the Lord that He really only permits others to do in their self-will and rebellion. Again, the Apostle makes no mention of such a plea. He is here meeting the objection of the Jew, who boasts that, being a son of Abraham, he cannot fail of the kingdom of the Messiah. The Apostle draws attention to the most evident exercise of sovereign choice in the call of Abraham, the selection of Isaac, and the rejection of Esau. The doing of good or evil in no way influenced the choice of Jacob or the rejection of Esau, and, in continuance of his argument, the Apostle gives two further instances from O.T. history, in which the sovereignty of God is exercised in saving mercy, and in punitive hardening.

> "What shall we say then? Is there unrighteousness with God? God forbid. For He saith to Moses, I will have mercy on whom I will have mercy . . . . . Therefore He hath mercy on whom He will have mercy, and whom He will He hardeneth" (Rom. ix. 14-18).

The words of Luther on this section are to the point:

> "The ninth chapter of the Epistle to the Romans is the ninth. Learn first the eight chapters which precede it."

If we have done this, we shall see Rom. ix. in its true light, but if we come to it independently of what has gone before, we shall probably darken its teaching with our own shadows. When we read in Rom. ix. that God "hardeneth" whom He will, we shall remember Rom. i. 24, where we read: "Wherefore God also gave them up." This is no mere arbitrary action, however, for the "giving up" of the nations is only consequent upon the nations giving up God. In Volume XVII, page 132, we set out in parallel columns what God says of the nations in Rom. i., and what He says of Israel in Psalm cvi. There was nothing to choose between them. If God shows mercy to one nation, and withholds it from others, the question of righteousness or unrighteousness is not involved. As Shakespeare wrote:

> "Though justice be thy plea, consider this, That in the course of justice none of us should see salvation."

And again:

> "The quality of mercy is not strained" (Merchant of Venice, iv. 1).

It is contrary to the "quality of mercy" to bring in the question of righteousness at all, seeing that "all" have sinned, both Jew and Gentile, and all alike are amenable to judgment.

The two passages cited by the Apostle in dealing with the objection raised in Rom. ix. 14 are taken from the Book of Exodus.

In Exod. xxxiii. Moses prays: "I beseech Thee, show me Thy glory." The Lord replies:

> "I will make all My goodness pass before thee, and I will proclaim the name of the Lord before thee, and I will be gracious to whom I will be gracious, and I will show mercy on whom I will show mercy" (Exod. xxxiii. 18, 19).

It is important to remember that these words have a context. Anything may be made of them if the context be ignored, but if we go back step by step to that which led to the revelation of Divine sovereignty, all debate concerning the possible "unrighteousness" of God in the bestowing of His grace, or the infliction of His wrath, is for ever stilled. In the opening section of Exod. xxxii. we find that Israel had become idolaters, and were worshiping a golden calf. The Lord calls them a "stiff-necked people" against whom His wrath "waxed hot". So far from the Lord being in any sense obliged by the terms of His covenant to endure and bless this people, He says to Moses:

> "Let Me alone . . . . . that I may consume them: and I will make of thee a great nation" (Exod. xxxii. 10).

Consequently, with this passage in mind, Paul could argue that, had God carried out His threat, He would have been clearly within His rights, even though it meant the blotting out of thousands of Israelites. Indeed, Moses himself called upon the house of Levi to consecrate themselves, and as a result there fell about 3,000 men by the sword (Exod. xxxii. 26-30).

Immediately following this incident there occurs a passage that closely resembles the words of Paul in Rom. ix. 3:

> "Yet now, if Thou wilt forgive their sin ---; and if not, blot me, I pray Thee, out of the book which Thou hast written" (Exod. xxxii. 32).

The Angel of the Lord now goes before the people, and we read in Exod. xxxiii. 3:

> "I will not go up in the midst of thee, for thou art a stiff-necked people: lest I consume thee in the way."

By the time we reach the verses quoted from Exod. xxxiii. in Rom. ix. 15, we know without further debate that mercy extended to such a people must proceed from the sovereign choice of God alone. All reasoning based upon mere physical association with Abraham is inadmissible. God could have raised up a great nation through Moses, and no injustice would have been done. Indeed, as the Baptist declared:

> "Think not to say within yourselves, We have Abraham to our father: for I say unto you, that God is able of these stones to raise up children unto Abraham" (Matt. iii. 9).

It is a great mistake to go to Rom. ix. 15, lift the verse out of its context, and then to use it as a basis upon which to build a doctrinal system. The basis of our faith is found already firmly laid in the first eight chapters of Romans. In ix.-xi. things are viewed from the dispensational standpoint.

If God has the unchallengeable right to "love" whom He will, He also has the sovereign right to "hate" whom He will, "for all have sinned and come short of the glory of God". This is the Apostle's second argument.

> "For the Scripture saith unto Pharaoh, Even for this same purpose have I raised thee up, that I might show My power in thee, and that My name might be declared throughout all the earth. Therefore hath He mercy on whom He will have mercy, and whom He will He hardeneth" (Rom. ix. 17, 18).

The LXX translates this passage: "Thou wert preserved to this day"—instead of: "I have raised thee up." This has led some expositors to believe that there is a direct reference here to the fearful plague that had fallen upon all the Egyptians. There may be some truth in this suggestion, for it appears that all suffered from the plague.

The Apostle, however, passes by the LXX and translates the Hebrew for himself. The word he uses is exegeiro. In the LXX version this same word is used by Hezekiah in Isa. xxxviii. 16, where there is an evident reference to recovery from illness, as also in James v. 15. On the other hand, exegeiro is found in Zech. xi. 16: "I will raise up a shepherd against the land." And in John vii. 52: "Out of Galilee no prophet is raised up." The passage in Romans, therefore, might well mean:

> "For this same purpose I raised thee up, not only in the first instance as king, but even now, from the dire effects of the recent plague, that I might show in thee My power, etc."

Pharaoh apparently was not concerned with either evidence of the sovereign power of God. Indeed, he sets God at nought, saying: "Who is the Lord, that I should obey His voice? . . . . . I know not the Lord" (Exod. v. 2).

It was the Lord's express purpose that Pharaoh should know Him, and that, through him, His name might be declared throughout all the earth. There are no less than sixteen different occasions in the Book of Exodus where it is stated that the Lord's object is to make either Israel or the Egyptians know that He is the Lord. For example:

> "The Egyptians shall know that I am the Lord when I stretch forth Mine hand upon Egypt" (Exod. vii. 5).
>
> "In this shalt thou know that I am the Lord: behold I will smite . . . . . the waters . . . . . and they shall be turned into blood" (Exod. vii. 17).

One cannot help going back in mind to the passage in Exodus already considered, where the Lord "proclaimed the name of the Lord" to Moses. His name is "proclaimed" by the mercy shown to Israel, and by the judgment that fell upon Pharaoh. It is not one God that saves, and another that condemns; the "Man Christ Jesus" Who became the Saviour is also the One to Whom all judgment has been committed. Grace and wrath proceed from the same source, and both are only answerable to the Lord's sovereign and righteous Will.

In his Song after the overthrow of Pharaoh at the Red Sea, Moses remembers this declaration of the name of the Lord:

> "The people shall hear and be afraid . . . . . all the inhabitants of Canaan shall melt away" (Exod. xv. 14, 15).

The news had traveled ahead of advancing Israel, as we know from what was told to the spies by Rahab the harlot (Josh. ii. 9-11).

To return to our passage in Romans, the Apostle now anticipates another objection:

> "Thou wilt say then unto me, Why doth He yet find fault? For who hath resisted His will? (Rom. ix. 19).

The Jew was evidently prone to this type of reasoning. A rather similar passage is found in Rom. iii. 1-8, where we have the objection concerning the advantage of the Jew. The advantage is admitted, summed up in this instance in the entrustment of the oracles of God, and this is immediately followed by the arguments in Rom. iii. 1-8:

> "Shall their unbelief make the faith of God without effect?"
>
> "Is God unrighteous Who taketh vengeance?"
>
> "If the truth of God hath more abounded through my lie unto His glory, why am I judged as a sinner?"

The Apostle's answer to the question of Rom. ix. 19 is a stern reminder that no criminal at the bar, no one who lives only by mercy, no creature in the presence of the Creator can dare to question the righteousness of any of His actions.

It is noteworthy that throughout the argument of Rom. ix. the Apostle meets all cavils and questionings by an appeal to O.T. Scripture. Should the Jew object to this, he would immediately cut the ground from under his own feet. The O.T. was decisive. When dealing with Gentile hearers, the Apostle sometimes "speaks after the manner of men", using familiar illustrations—such as the bondage and freedom of slaves, the games and the prize. But here his appeal is to the O.T., which emphasizes again the strongly Jewish character of chapters ix.-xi.

So, the illustration that follows of the potter and the clay is taken from Isa. xxix. 16 and xlv. 9. Here, once again, let us keep in mind that the Apostle is not advancing doctrine at the moment, but answering the cavils of his opponent. To take the figure of "clay" from this verse, and to argue from it concerning "free-will" is not treating the passage fairly. Man is very different from a piece of clay. He is a responsible being; he can be put under law; he can be rewarded or punished. The Apostle is using the illustration of the clay here to show his opponent how unreasonable are his objections to the sovereignty of God. Moreover, in the words of verse 21, "Of the same lump", he refutes all charges against the righteousness of God, showing that between the saved Israelite and the condemned Egyptian "there is no difference". The figure of "the same lump" is, moreover, taken from an O.T. passage, and is probably used by the Apostle to counteract any tendency to fatalism that might possibly be produced by the preceding argument of the potter and the clay.

If one reads the first four verses of Jer. xviii. and stops there, one might proceed to argue that God assumed responsibility for the failure of Israel, just as the clay was marred in the hands of the potter. But if we lay aside our reasonings (not our reason, which is quite a different thing) and allow the Lord to draw the inference, we shall see that no doctrinal question as to human responsibility is involved, and no idea that God is the Author of Israel's failure. The only point that is picked out and expounded is the Lord's right to treat all nations as He sees fit (Jer. xviii. 6-10). Leaving these figures, the Apostle proceeds to speak in more open terms:

> "What if God, willing to show His wrath, and to make His power known, endured with much longsuffering the vessels of wrath fitted to destruction: and that He might make known the riches of His glory on the vessels of mercy which He had afore prepared unto glory, even us, whom He hath called, not of the Jews only, but also of the Gentiles?" (Rom. ix. 22-24).

The difference between the two "vessels" here is inescapable. The vessels of wrath are endured with much longsuffering, and are "fitted to destruction". How different are the words concerning the vessels of mercy, "which He had afore prepared unto glory". He did not fit the vessels of wrath for perdition by some eternal decree; they fitted themselves. The saved, however, did not by any means fit themselves for glory; the Lord Himself "afore prepared them". In connection with the vessels of wrath the Apostle speaks of God, "willing to show His wrath and make His power known"; but in connection with the vessels of mercy, "that He might make known the riches of His glory". He does not speak of the "riches of His wrath".

It is utterly impossible to teach that God "endured with much longsuffering" vessels that of His own sovereign will He had Himself fitted to destruction.

The passage which the Apostle quotes in support of this argument is taken from Hos. ii., where again Israel are clearly in view. The Apostle knew this, and so did his Jewish opponent. The point that he makes is this. If God can confer the title of "My people" upon those who were "Not My people" when dealing with one nation, namely, the Jews, there can be no objection if, in the sovereignty already established in the preceding verses, He should take as "vessels of mercy" some from among the Gentiles. The Apostle does not follow up this argument as He does in Rom. iv. 9-12, or in Gal. iii. 27-29, for he is not here concerned with the doctrinal aspect of the subject. Moreover, it is entirely foreign to the Apostle's intention to read unto Hos. ii. any reference to the "Church". He is simply using the passage to establish his argument concerning the sovereignty of God.

The Apostle concludes with further quotations from Isaiah concerning the place and purpose of the remnant that should be saved. The rejection of the Jewish people in the Apostle's own time was no more contrary to the promises of God than the rejection of the ten tribes who were carried away into captivity by the Assyrians; for though the number carried away were like the sand in multitude, a remnant returned. Instead of reproaching God with the smallness of the remnant, the Apostle says that we should rather be glad to think that a remnant had been spared at all, for, as Isaiah has already said, the people had become like Sodom and Gomorrah, and the Lord, apart from His sovereign Will, might have left them also to perish.

Before concluding, let us review this intensely difficult passage in broad outline.

Romans ix. 6-29.

First Proposition.

God's promise has not been broken by the failure and rejection of the bulk of Israel (6-13).

(a) The children of ABRAHAM (7-9).
Everything depends upon what we understand by "Israel". We have Abraham's children, Ishmael and Isaac, but in Isaac the seed was called.

(b) The children of ISAAC (10-13).
The purpose of God according to election was signally manifested in the choice of Jacob and the rejection of Esau.

Second Proposition.

God is therefore just when He shows mercy on some, and allows others to go the natural road to perdition. This is later proved by the argument from "the same lump" (14-18).

(a) As to MERCY.—This prerogative is claimed by God Himself in Exod. xxxiii.
(b) As to HARDENING.—This is written large in His dealings with Pharaoh.

Third Proposition.

God, therefore, has always acted in accordance with His sovereignty, and in harmony with O.T. Scripture (19-29).

(a) Man as a creature has no right or power to reply to God.
(b) God has dealt with "vessels of wrath" and "vessels of mercy" according to His sovereign will.

Fourth Proposition.

In the inclusion of Gentiles and the saving of a remnant of Israel, God is acting in harmony with O.T. Scripture.

(a) Quotation from Hosea.—He calls a people "My people", who once were "Not My people".
(b) Quotation from Isaiah.—He saved but a remnant at the captivity of Israel years before.

(A study of Rom. ix. 30 - xi. 10, revealing that Divine sovereignty and human responsibility are but two sides of one truth).

pp. 73 - 78

No part of the Epistle to the Romans can be considered "milk for babes"; most of it is "strong meat" indeed for the most mature. As we realize on the one hand the magnitude of the theme, and on the other the limitations of the writer, the small amount of space at his disposal, and the varied stages of attainment and growth of those who read these articles, there will be no need to stress the difficulties that must attend the exposition of such a passage as Rom. ix.-xi. It will help us, however, as we face the problems before us, to remember that the theme of Romans is righteousness. We meet it in the earlier part of chapter i., where it constitutes the very power of the gospel, and again at the close of the chapter when we read of the failure of the Gentile world. And it is with us in one aspect or another in every succeeding chapter.

For the moment, the failure of Israel, the blindness of so many of the chosen nation, and the inclusion of Gentile believers, have presented such a sheaf of problems, that all other considerations have been set aside, while the great answer, "God is sovereign", has been given. Divine sovereignty, however, in a moral world is but one half of the truth. There is another side of equal importance, namely, human responsibility. This principle, therefore, now emerges, and occupies the central section of Rom. ix.-xi. In this section we have such expressions as "seeking by faith", "not submitting", "confess", "believe", "hearing", "preaching", "stretching forth the hands to a disobedient and gainsaying people".

The two apparently opposite aspects of truth represented by sovereignty and responsibility meet together in Rom. xi. 1, 2, summed up in the word "foreknew". But this we must deal with in its place. Were the Bible nothing but Rom. ix. 14-29, we might all be Calvinists. Were it nothing but Rom. x., we might all be Arminians. As it is, we cannot be either to the exclusion of the other, for each system contains an element of truth in spite of the admixture of error.

Rom. ix. 30 - x. 21 deals with the question of Israel and righteousness, and it has been suggested that the subject is handled in a threefold way: Israel's failure in spite of the prophets (ix. 30-33); Israel's failure in spite of the law (x. 1-11); and Israel's failure in spite of the gospel (x. 14-21). Upon examination, however, it would seem that this subdivision of the subject-matter is not justified. It will be observed that the Apostle uses twice over one particular quotation from the prophet Isaiah: "Whosoever believeth on Him shall not be ashamed" (Rom. ix. 33, x. 11). This fact must certainly be given a place in any structural outline. Further, we notice that the Greek word skandalon, "offence" (Rom. ix. 33) and "stumbling-block" (Rom. xi. 9, 10), is used in two passages with evident and intentional parallelism. This, too, must find a place in the structure, and extends the section beyond the limits of Rom. x. Again, we observe that the subject-matter of Rom. ix. 30-32—the fact that the Gentiles attained what they did not follow after—is echoed in Rom. xi. 6, 7. These items are decisive, and demand recognition. We accordingly give them their place in the structure, which is as follows:

Romans ix. 30 - xi. 10.
"The Election hath obtained it."

A | ix. 30-32. | a | What shall we say then?
b | Gentiles followed not; yet attained.
Israel followed; yet attained not.
c | Faith versus Works.
B | ix. 33. Skandalon. The rock of offence.
C | ix. 33. Kataischuno. Whoso believeth, not ashamed.
D | x. 1-10. | d | Paul's prayer for Israel.
e | Israel ignorant and not submissive.
f | The word of faith which we preach.
C | x. 11. Kataischuno. Whoso believeth, not ashamed.
D | x. 12 - xi. 3. | f | The word of faith that we preach.
d | Elijah intercession against Israel.
e | Israel gainsaying and murderous.
A | xi. 4-7. | a | What saith the oracle of God.
c | Grace versus Works.
b | Israel seek but obtained not.
Election obtain.
B | ix. 9, 10. Skandalon. The stumbling stone.

The word translated "follow after" in Rom. ix. 30 is dioko, "pursue" and indicates that the Apostle is resuming the theme of ix. 16: "Nor of him that runneth". It is clear, however, that Israel were not prevented from attaining unto righteousness by Divine decree. Their failure was due to stumbling at the fact of justification by faith, which, like the cross, was an "offence". They failed to attain unto righteousness "because they sought it not by faith, but as it were by works of law; for they stumbled at that stumbling stone". It was a question of pride and ignorance:

> "For they being ignorant of God's righteousness, and going about to establish their own righteousness, have not submitted themselves unto the righteousness of God. For Christ is the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth" (Rom. x. 3, 4).

They were ignorant of the nature of the righteousness which alone satisfies God, and, like Paul in his unregenerate days, they boasted of "the righteousness of the law". But such is of no avail in the presence of God. Even in the prophets we read: "all our righteousness are as filthy rags" (Isa. lxiv. 6).

Turning again to Rom. x. 4, we read: "Christ is (1) the end of the law, (2) for righteousness, (3) to every one that believeth."

The Lord was "the end" in the sense of a Goal:

> "The law was our schoolmaster to bring us unto Christ, that we might be justified; but after that faith is come, we are no longer under a schoolmaster" (Gal. iii. 24, 25).

He was "the end" in the sense of the Antitype:

> "The law having a shadow of good things to come, and not the very image of the things, can never with those sacrifices which they offered year by year continually, make the comers thereunto perfect" (Heb. x. 1).

He was "the end" in the sense of the Perfecter:

> "The law made nothing perfect" (Heb. vii. 19).

He was "the end" in the sense of Fulfillment:

> "What the law could not do, in that in was weak through the flesh, God sending His own Son in the likeness of sinful flesh, and for sin, condemned sin in the flesh, that the righteous requirement of the law might be fulfilled in us" (Rom. viii. 3, 4).

He was "the end" in the sense that in Him the believer had died to the law:

> "Ye are become dead to the law by the body of Christ" (Rom. vii. 4).

To all this wealth of teaching, and its provision of righteousness by faith, Israel was blind.

Returning to Rom. x. we read:

> "For Moses describeth the righteousness which is of the law, That the man that doeth those things shall live by them" (Rom. x. 5).

But no one ever had fulfilled or ever could fulfil the requirements.

The Apostle does not allow the Jew to shield himself behind the plea that the doctrine of the gospel is difficult to comprehend. In verse 9 we read:

> "That if thou shalt confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus, and shalt believe in thine heart that God hath raised Him from the dead, thou shalt be saved" (Rom. x. 9).

We are all familiar with these words, but we may not be so familiar with the O.T. passage concerned, and the line of argument which the Apostle is pursuing.

Once again we must remind ourselves that the Apostles is speaking to Jews, using a type of reasoning familiar to the followers of Rabbinical methods, but foreign to the logical processes of the Greek. He makes free use here of the passage in Deut. xxx., where Moses tells the people that the commandment of God is "not hidden" or "far off", not "in heaven" or "over the sea", but "very nigh", both in "heart" and "mouth" (Deut. xxx. 11-14). This passage is balanced by Deut. xxix. 29, where the "secret things" and the "revealed things" are spoken of. Dr. Ginsburg draws attention to the fact that the words "Unto Jehovah our God" in this verse are "dotted", and should not appear in the translation. The sense of the passage is as follows:

> "The secret things, and (even) the revealed things belong to us and to our children for ever, if we do all the words of the law."

The balancing of these two passages stresses the fact that obedience renders the commandment plain and understandable. The language used by Moses and by Paul is highly figurative, but would be easily interpreted by the Jew. To the Jew, knowledge that was too wonderful for his grasp was "high; I cannot attain unto it" (Psa. cxxxix. 6; Prov. xxiv. 7). And the impossible would be suggested by such expressions as "ascending up unto heaven" or "making the bed in hell" (Psa. cxxxix. 8). There is no such difficulty, however, in believing the gospel. Confession with the mouth that Jesus is Lord, and belief in the heart that God hath raised Him from the dead, mean salvation.

Returning to the excuses that might be offered by the Jew, the Apostle concedes that it is not possible to call upon the Lord without believing Him, or to believe on Him of Whom they have not heard. But this was no excuse for Israel. They had heard, preachers had been sent to them, but they had turned a deaf ear to the gospel message. As Isaiah had said: "Lord, who hath believed our report?" (Rom. x. 16). This is followed by further quotations bearing upon Israel's responsibility.

> "But I say, Have they not heard? Yes, verily . . . . . But I say, Did not Israel know? First Moses . . . . . But Esaias . . . . . But to Israel He saith, All day long I have stretched forth My hands to a disobedient and gainsaying people" (Rom. x. 18-21).

With the opening of Rom. xi., the Apostle begins to draw his conclusions. Stated briefly, they are as follows:

(1) Gad hath not cast away His people: Proof.—I also am an Israelite, and saved.
(2) God hath not cast away His people whom He foreknew" Proof.—In Israel's darkest days, God had reserved unto Himself a faithful company, unknown even to Elijah himself.
(3) There is now also at the present time "a remnant according to the election of grace".

Those who form this "remnant" have believed in the Lord and are justified. Their standing is in grace, and not in works. Israel as a whole have entered into a period of darkness and blindness, but the salvation of "the election", foreknown by God, is in perfect harmony with God's sovereignty as discussed at length in Rom. ix. No Israelite was coerced into believing; no Israelite was prevented from believing. God's foreknowledge covers the whole problem, without doing violence either to the principles of morality or of Divine sovereignty.

The quotation from Psa. lxix. with which the Apostle concludes his argument is suggestive. The Psalm is Messianic, and contains the verse quoted by Peter concerning Judas: "Let their habitation be desolate." Israel had betrayed the Lord. Their self-righteousness had blinded their eyes, and the great fact that Christ was the end of the law for righteousness to everyone that believeth became a stumbling-block and an offence to them. Only a remnant believed, and that elect company was not exclusively Jewish, but included those who walked in the steps of Abraham's faith. There was no difference between the Jew and the Greek, for "the same Lord over all is rich unto all that call upon Him".

Towards the close of Rom. x. the Apostle quotes the statement of Moses, that the Lord would provoke Israel to jealousy "by them that are no people". This he now unfolds in connection with the great subject of the reconciling of the world, which is dealt with in Rom. xi. 11-36. This, however, we must leave for the moment.

The subject-matter of Rom. ix.-xi., the peculiar style of the Apostle's argument, the many quotations and analogies from O.T. Scriptures, make the study of these chapters hard, and perhaps a weariness to the flesh. The extreme importance, however, of great theme of justification by faith demands that it shall be considered in all its bearings, whether in connection with the Law of Moses, the Call of Abraham, the Headship of Adam, or, as in the passage before us, the Failure of Israel, and the Election of the Gentiles. Principles are brought to the light in these passages that are of vital importance to every believer who desires to understand the ways of God with men.

#70. The Olive Tree and Israel's National Position (xi. 11-32).

pp. 108 - 117

In the earlier verses of Rom. xi. the Apostle has shown that the failure of the bulk of the nation of Israel in no way invalidates God's purpose or His faithfulness. We have seen that the prophets foretold "a remnant according to the election of grace", and we also learn that the defection of Israel had been overruled to bring about the reconciliation of the Gentile world. Looking on to the close of the chapter, we find that "all Israel" shall be saved, because "the gifts and calling of God are without repentance". The words "all Israel", "Jacob", and "Zion", together with the prophecy alluded to, preclude our making any deduction from these verses but one—namely, the national restoration and blessing of Israel according to the terms of the New Covenant. Quite a number of questions suggest themselves as we read this section, but it is evident that the Apostle, when he wrote about the olive tree, had no intention of introducing a theological argument at this point. He had one and only one purpose before him—to seek to show by the figure of the olive tree how the Lord had used Gentile believers in order, if it were possible, to "provoke" the nation of Israel "to emulation". This, and this only, is the reason for introducing the figure, and the recognition of this will save us from almost endless argument as to the ultimate destiny of the branches that remained.

Before attempting any exposition of these verses, it will be wise to see what particular parts of the passage are emphasized by the structure, which we set out as follows:

Romans xi. 11-32.

A | 11-25. ISRAEL'S FALL occasions GENTILE RECONCILIATION.
B | C1 | 11. PROVOKE. "If."
D1 | 12. FULNESS of Israel.
C2 | 13-15. PROVOKE. "If."
D2 | 16. FIRSTFRUIT.
C3 | 17-24. PROVOKE. "If."
D3 | 25. FULNESS of Gentiles.
A | 26-32. MERCY TO GENTILES occasions ISRAEL'S RESTORATION.
B | E | 26. All Israel shall be saved.
F | 26. Deliverer; turn away ungodliness.
G | 27. The covenant.
H | 28. Enemies. Gospel. For your sakes.
H | 29. Beloved. Election. For the fathers' sakes.
G | 29. The gifts and calling.
F | 32. Concluded in unbelief.
E | 32. Mercy upon them all.

It is evident that the Apostle is speaking here of the dispensational aspect of truth, for no Gentile could be justified by being placed in the position forfeited by one of the natural branches of Israel's olive tree. No believer, who is justified by faith, can ever be separated from the love of God, or can ever be condemned (Rom. viii.), so that the threat of excision in Rom. xi. 22 must refer to the dispensational position which then obtained.

In endeavouring to understand the various factors in this presentation of truth, let us first seek an answer to the question: "What does the Olive Tree represent?"

In attempting to answer this question we do not propose to quote the parable of Jotham given in Judges ix. 1-15. Jotham's purpose in the parable is simple and evident, and it would seem to be a distortion of the context to make the Olive, the Fig and the Vine in the parable stand for different aspects of Israel's privileges. The O.T. passages with which we are most concerned are to be found in Jeremiah. In Jer. xi. we read:

> "The Lord thy God called thy name, A green olive tree, fair, and of goodly fruit . . . . . the branches of it are broken" (Jer. xi. 16).

Not only does Paul take the figure of the olive tree, and its broken branches, from Jeremiah, but he also refers to Jer. xxxi. 31. In Rom. xi. 27, where the olive tree is once more complete. There are some who have sought to show that the olive tree of Rom. xi. is to be found in Christendom to-day, but such teaching is contrary to Jer. xi. and xxxi. & Rom. xi. alike.

The Book of Jeremiah consists of fifty-one prophecies, each introduced by some such phrase as "The word of the Lord came". The opening prophecy is indicative of all the rest:

> "See, I have this day set thee over the nations, and over the kingdoms, to root out, and to pull down, and to destroy, and to throw down, to build and to plant" (Jer. i. 10).

The subjects of this prophecy are clearly "nations" and "kingdoms"—not churches, either real or professing. Also the prophecy is two-fold: first, judgment in the form of "rooting out", and then, restoration in the form of "planting".

The second prophecy in Jeremiah occupies only two verses, which we give in full:

> "Moreover the word of the Lord came unto me, saying, Jeremiah, what seest thou? And I said, I see a rod of an almond tree. Then said the Lord unto me, Thou hast well seen: for I will hasten My word to perform it" (Jer. i. 11, 12).

The word for "almond tree" is shaked, and the word for "hasten" is shoked, the almond being called the "watcher" or "early waker". When the time comes for the people of Israel to be restored, the same word is again used:

> "And it shall come to pass, that like as I have watched over them (shoked) to pluck up . . . . . so will I watch over them . . . . . to plant, saith the Lord . . . . . I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel, and with the house of Judah . . . . ." (Jer. xxxi. 28, 31).

Moreover, in verses 36 and 37 Israel are assured that they shall not cease from being a nation, and that they shall not be cast off on account of their misdeeds—a passage which finds an echo in the words of Rom. xi. 29: "For the gifts and calling of God are without repentance."

Returning to the prophecy of Jeremiah, we observe that where the green olive tree with the broken branches is spoken of, the prophet interprets the symbol as referring to Israel:

> "But if they will not obey, I will utterly pluck up and destroy that nation, saith the Lord" (Jer. xii. 17).

If we examine the context of Rom. xi. we shall find that there also Israel is portrayed as an olive tree.

> "To Israel He saith, All day long I have stretched forth My hands unto a disobedient and gainsaying people" (Rom. x. 21).
>
> "Blindness in part is happened unto Israel . . . . . and so all Israel shall be saved" (Rom. xi. 25, 26).
> "As concerning the gospel, they are enemies for your sakes' (Rom. xi. 28).

There can be no misunderstanding of these references which stand on either side of the passage which refers to the olive tree. It is not a church that is in view, but Israel as a nation. The "they" that stumbled are Israel (xi. 11); "my flesh" (xi. 14) refers to Israel; and those who were "cast away" and who are yet to be received are Israel (xi. 15).

We have next to consider the "branches" of the olive tree.

> "There is a remnant according to the election of grace" (xi. 5).
>
> "God hath not cast away His people which He foreknew" (xi. 2).

> "Israel hath not obtained that which he seeketh for; but the election hath obtained it, and the rest were blinded" (xi. 7).

The branches that were broken off were the unbelieving among Israel, the remaining branches constituting a remnant. Into the place from which the unbelieving of Israel had been broken off, the Gentile believer had been grafted, "contrary to nature".

Why does the Apostle use the expression "contrary to nature"? The root and fatness of the olive tree belonged to Israel, and if Israel had repented and had been restored at that time, no Gentile would ever have shared it with them, even temporarily. It was something exceptional that was in view. It is clear that Paul cannot be referring to the great promise of justification by faith for two reasons. In the first place, he warns the believing Gentile that he might be "cut off"—a warning that cannot refer to justification by faith, for Rom. viii. makes separation for ever impossible; and secondly, Abraham himself was an uncircumcised Gentile when he was justified by faith, and so can be the father of all who believe, whether Jews or Gentiles, without any necessity for a grafting in "contrary to nature". So far as justification was concerned, the oneness of all believers, whether Jews or Gentiles, was so close that many have taken the words of Gal. iii. 27-29 as though they were written in Ephesians. "Contrary to nature" cannot, therefore, be used of the great doctrine of Rom. i.-viii.; it can only apply to the dispensational teaching of Rom. ix.-xi. The doctrinal truth remains; the dispensational aspects change, and pass away.

We have now seen enough, we trust, to convince us that "Church" truth is not in view in Rom. xi. Before passing on to the great conclusion, however, we must examine more carefully the Apostle's figure of the olive tree, and to discover why he speaks of the process as engrafting into the true olive tree, branches of the wild olive, contrary to nature.

To provoke unto jealousy.

If the reader will glance at the structure of Rom. xi. 11-32, he will see that the word "provoke" is given three times. Two of these references actually occur (in verses 11 and 14) while in verses 17-24, instead of stating the fact for the third time, we find that the Apostle uses the figure of the olive tree. It is the usual custom in grafting to take a slip of the choice variety, whether it be apple, or pear, or rose, and graft it into the stock of some stronger, though not so choice, a variety. For example, in the case of the standard rose, the tall stem is the briar, and upon this is budded the more fragile flower. Paul appears to reverse all this, and there are many who bluntly say that he did not know anything about the culture of trees, and must not be taken literally. This, however, cannot be. He hangs the whole argument of Rom. xi. upon this figure, and if he is wrong in this, he may be wrong altogether. Paul himself recognizes that the process is "contrary to nature", but those who criticize, and suggest that he is using a far-fetched illustration, are themselves in error. While the engrafting of a wild olive into the true was "contrary to nature", it was by no means contrary to practice. Lucius Junius Moderatus Columella, a Latin writer on Agriculture, Gardening and Trees, deals with the cultivation of the olive tree, and speaks of the very practice under consideration. It was found that when an olive tree began to cease fruit-bearing, the insertion of a wild graft had the same effect upon the tree that Paul hoped the insertion of the Gentile would have had on Israel; it "provoked" the flagging olive tree to "emulation". The practice has been revived in our own day to provoke certain shy-bearing pear trees to fruitfulness. Columella flourished about A.D.40, so that Paul was not speaking "without the book".

The fact that the Gentiles who believed had received "the blessing of Abraham" in the form of the promised "spirit" (Gal. iii. 14), and that they possessed the gifts associated with Pentecost (I Cor. xiv. 21), was intended to provoke Israel to wake up to the fact that their unique position was going. The whole point of the olive tree in Rom. xi. lies in the purpose with which the wild olive was graft in—namely, to provoke Israel to jealousy. Gentile nations are not in view in Rom. xi., for such cannot be addresses as "brethren", neither do they stand "by faith".

If we teach that the "olive tree" position still continues after Acts xxviii., let us see what the Apostle's words imply. Into that same olive tree from which some of the branches had been broken out, God assures us that He will graft them again. We shall see by the references yet to be adduced that when this takes place Israel as a nation will be restored. How is it possible for Israel to be restored as a nation by having any number of branches graft in to any existing Christian community? Will any present-day calling ever eventuate in a restored Israel? There is but one answer. Only while Israel existed as a people, was it possible for believing Gentiles to be graft in among the other believing branches, and so become linked up with the blessing of Abraham, and partake of the root and fatness of the olive tree. We are preserved from any attempt at spiritualizing the expression "All Israel shall be saved", by the fact that the Apostle quotes Isa. lix. 20, where the Deliverer Who comes out of Zion shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob. We have never met anyone who would teach that "Jacob" can mean anything but the literal people of Israel.

Moreover, all this is in fulfillment of the New Covenant:

> "For this is My Covenant with them, when I shall take away their sins" (Rom. xi. 27).

Under the terms of the New Covenant, the forgiveness of sins leads to the restoration of the Nation (Jer. xxxi. 31-37), and in verse 37 we read:

> "If heaven above can be measured, and the foundations of the earth searched out beneath, I will also cast off all the seed of Israel, for all that they have done, saith the Lord" (Jer. xxxi. 37).

With the knowledge of this promise under the New Covenant, the Apostle writes:

> "As concerning the gospel, they are enemies for your sakes, but as touching the election, they are beloved for the fathers' sakes; for the gifts and calling of God are without repentance" (Rom. xi. 28, 29).

By the gracious permission of our brother Mr. S. Van Mierlo, we are able to reproduce in English form the diagram used in his book (in Dutch) dealing with the Dispensation of the Mystery. The diagram demonstrates the whole story of the olive tree, and it will be seen that the first cutting off of "some of the branches" occurred when Israel in the land rejected the Lord.

Before the quotation of Isa. vi. 9 in Matt. xiii. we have a series of events leading up to this critical point:

(1) The failure of Israel to repent, even though the mighty works done in Chorazin and Bethsaida and Capernaum would have brought about the repentance of notorious cities of the Gentiles like Tyre and Sidon (Matt. xi. 20-24).
(2) The threefold rejection of the Lord Jesus in His three offices, as Priest, Prophet and King. "In this place is one greater than the Temple" (Priest). "A greater than Jonah is here" (Prophet). "A greater than Solomon is here" (King) (Matt. xiii. 6, 41, 42).
(3) Consequent upon this rejection and non-repentance come the "mysteries of the kingdom of heaven", and the citation of Isa. vi. 9 (Matt. xiii. 11, 14).

At the close of the Acts we find a repetition of this crisis, but on a larger scale. This time Israel are set aside, but no command is given to make a fresh proclamation, as in Acts i. The quotation of Isa. vi. 9 is followed by the dispensation of the Mystery, in which the olive tree and its branches, as such, have no place.

- - - I l l u s t r a t i o n - - -
(BE-XXVIII.114).

Between Matt. xiii. and Acts xxviii. there were several excisions of the branches because of unbelief, of which two are noted in the diagram—at Antioch and at Corinth. That neither of these was final or intended to set aside the nation, Paul's own action towards Israel makes clear. After Antioch he still preached in the synagogues; and after Corinth, he still gave Israel and Israel's hope first place (Acts xxviii. 17, 20).

It is a difficulty with some students that the Apostle does not actually speak of the cutting down of the olive tree in Rom. xi., but only of "some of the branches" having been broken off. The answer is that the Epistle to the Romans was written before Acts xxviii. and still expressed the hope that, even at the eleventh hour, Israel would be provoked unto emulation and be saved. No indication is given that the "fullness of the Gentiles" would not be attained until nearly two thousand years had elapsed. We have only to turn to Rom. xv. 12, 13 to see that Paul and the Church were still expecting the fulfillment of Isa. xi. as well as Jer. xxxi. The "hope of Israel" was still the one hope before them all. It suffices for the Apostle in Rom. xi. that "some of the branches" had been broken off, and, to provoke the olive tree to emulation, some wild branches had been graft in. What would happen to the olive tree if that effort failed is not revealed in Rom. xi., and in the nature of things could not be. Now that we have the light of all Scripture, we know that Israel were to be "plucked up" and scattered", and to enter into a "Lo-ammi" condition, while a new dispensation was introduced. But though all this is true, it was not revealed in Rom. xi.

When the Apostle in Rom. xi. speaks of the regrafting of the natural branches he is referring to the restoration of Israel as a nation (see Jer. xxxi. 36), and it is not possible that the olive tree should represent any other nation, or any church to-day.

If the olive tree survived the crisis of Acts xxviii., where is it? It cannot be the scattered nation of Israel, for they are manifestly Lo-ammi. It cannot be any of the denominations of Christendom, for if this were true it would follow that the denomination concerned would eventually receive back the broken-off branches of Israel, and resolve itself into the restored nation of Israel—which is manifestly impossible, for the restored nation of Israel will be made up of the very nation that is now scattered. If we will but distinguish between the doctrinal position of Rom. i.-viii., that has no reference to the olive tree, and the dispensational position of Rom. ix.-xi., we shall see that it is quite in harmony with the teaching of Scripture, for justification by faith to be enjoyed, independently of the position of Israel as a nation. The fact that the "believing" branches are called "firstfruits" no more argues for the unbroken perpetuation of the olive tree up to the present time, than the fact that Christ is said to be the "firstfruits of them that slept" proves that, ever since, in unbroken sequence, they that have fallen asleep in Christ have passed straight into glory. The firstfruits were the pledge of a future harvest, and in the type, the harvest naturally followed without a break. In the antitype, however, the harvest is the end of the age, and the interval between the first Pentecost and the present moment is nineteen hundred years.

A very real difficulty that some feel in connection with this passage is the fate of the believing section. If the whole tree is cut down by the roots at the end of the Acts, then believer and unbeliever are treated alike. Yet the believing remnant constitute a firstfruit, and are holy. We must be very certain of all our terms here. If the olive tree represents the nation and its national standing, then whatever the problem may be, it is clear that, as Israel as a nation before God does not exist, the olive tree has been cut down. The believing branches, therefore, must have some other ground of blessing. If we change the figure from the olive tree to that of a divorced wife, as in Jeremiah (Jer. iii. 1 & xi. 16), we may perhaps see more clearly that the believing remnant lost nothing when the national position of Israel was altered at Acts xxviii. Israel as a restored nation is represented as a divorced wife received back by the Lord (Jer. iii. 1), but the believing remnant is spoken of as the "Bride of the Lamb". The "divorced wife" is restored to the land, but the "bride" is associated with the heavenly Jerusalem. There is, therefore, a great difference between the destinies of the believing and the unbelieving branches. In some cases the change was even greater. Paul himself lost his national association with Israel when the nation was set aside, but he entered into a sphere of blessing so great as to enable him to count all things but loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ. Others would find their sphere of blessing set forth in John xiv.-xvii., and learn that though they were no longer branches in the olive tree of Israel, they were branches in Christ as the True Vine, and so had lost nothing. If we recognize the dispensational standing may change to our advantage, as it manifestly did in the case of Timothy, Luke and Paul, our difficulty about the believing branches of the olive tree will be resolved. Doctrinal standing is not in view in Rom. xi. The grafting in of the unbelieving branches into their own olive tree at the end represents the restoration of Israel's national position "in that day". The rest of the natural branches that were left standing in the olive tree manifested the same unbelief that had caused the removal of so many before them—so that at the close of the Acts, we have a believing remnant of Jews and Gentiles, already being prepared for their higher position as the Bride, and also the unbelieving nation which, having resisted all the overtures of grace, is set aside. At the present time the Jew is not first. Neither in Paul's Epistles of the Mystery, nor in John's Gospel for the "world", can the olive tree be discovered. The New Covenant and the hope of Israel are in abeyance, and not until God's good time will they be put into operation. Hosea, speaking of the day of Israel's restoration, uses the same figures as we have been considering—the restoration of the separated wife (Hosea ii., iii.), and the spreading branches of the olive (Hosea xiv.). Any difficulties we may have as to the fate of the believing remnant during the Acts, or of the branches representing believers, are solved if we distinguish between the dispensational terms of Rom. ix.-xi. and the doctrinal terms of Rom. i.-viii.

We have more to consider, but as this article is already longer than usual, we must close, realizing only too well how little we can do in so vast a field.

#71. Fullness, Reconciliation and Doxology (xi. 11-36).
pp. 148 - 155

Most of our time was occupied in the last article in discussing the purpose behind Paul's illustration of the olive tree. We saw that the grafting in of the wild olive was with the intention of provoking the flagging tree to new fruitfulness. The salvation and blessing of the Gentiles during the Acts, before the nation of Israel were saved and ready for their great mission to the families of the earth, were "contrary to nature", and intended to "provoke Israel to jealousy". We must now return to the opening verses of this section to give a little closer attention to the blessings that accrued to the Gentiles as a result of Israel's hope.

The Apostle here uses an argument which may be described as a minori ad majus:

> "If their fall has brought about so much, what must we not expect as a result of their restoration?" (Rom. xi. 12).

The failure of Israel is expressed in the following terms: the "fall" (paraptomai: verse 11); the "diminishing" (hettema: verse 12); the "casting away" (apobole: verse 15); "broken off" (ekklao: verse 17); "spared not" (pheidomai: verse 21); "blindness" (porosis: verse 25); "enemies" (echthros: verse 28); and "concluded in unbelief" (sugkleio: verse 32). In these eight terms, we behold the "severity" of God (verse 22).

The "fall" of Israel is likened to the "offence" of Adam, the word paraptoma being translated "offence" in Rom. v. 15, 16, 18 and 20. The word literally means "to fall aside". Israel follow very much in the steps of Adam. Both fail of their high purpose, and are set aside; and both will realize their destiny only when "in Christ". Just as in Rom. v. 20 the abounding "offence" was overruled by God unto much more abounding grace, so in Rom. xi. 12, 15, we discover something of the same argument—an argument which, approached from the wrong angle, has been resolutely set aside in Rom. iii. 7, for no amount of overruling grace can minimize the positive wickedness of individual sin, however much good may result by the intervention of grace.

In Deut. xxvii., xxviii. Moses gives the people the solemn words that were to be pronounced from Mount Gerizim and Mount Ebal. Among the blessings we find, in verse 13:

> "And the Lord shall make thee the head, and not the tail, and thou shalt be above only, and thou shalt not be beneath" (Deut. xxviii. 13).

This high position Israel forfeited because of unbelief, but a day is coming when the Redeemer shall come to Zion (Isa. lix. 20), and Israel shall be restored, and enter into their high glory:

> "The nation and kingdom that will not serve thee shall perish, yea, those nations shall be utterly wasted" (Isa. lx. 12).
>
> "But ye shall be named the Priests of the Lord, men shall call you the Ministers of our God: ye shall eat the riches of the Gentiles" (Isa. lxi. 6).

With this high destiny in mind, coupled with Israel's terrible fall, the Apostle uses the word "diminish". The primary meaning of hettaomai is to be overcome as in battle or in a law-suit (II Pet. ii. 19, 20), and so to be inferior (II Cor. xii. 13). Israel, by their unbelief and failure to repent, were losing their high prerogatives, set out so fully in Rom. ix. 4, 5. This high position, now in danger of being forfeited, was not, of course, given to them on account of any intrinsic worth in themselves, but rather because of their place in the scheme of blessing. And so, when they fail, the Apostle speaks of them as being "cast away"—as the blind man is said to have cast away his garment that apparently encumbered him, or as the ship that was wrecked was "a loss" (Acts xxvii. 22). Israel had made shipwreck of their calling; they had fallen aside; they were becoming inferior; they were "a loss". And so through all the terms used by the Apostle to explain their condition.

This failure of Israel has been overruled by God to the blessing of the Gentiles, and has resulted in their "reconciliation", and their "riches". These "riches" find an exposition in the Epistle to the Romans itself, as well as in the other epistles of the period:

> "Riches of goodness" which, though despised, would have led to repentance (Rom. ii. 4).
>
> "Riches of His glory", lavished upon those vessels of mercy which the Lord had afore prepared unto glory, not of the Jews only, but also of the Gentiles (Rom. ix. 23).

The "riches of the world" and the "riches of the Gentiles", resulting as we have seen from Israel's failure (Rom. xi. 12).

The "riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God"—calling forth the Apostle's doxology at the close of chapter xi. (Rom. xi. 33).

With these passages we must also read Rom. x. 12:

"For there is no difference between the Jew and the Greek; for the same Lord over all is rich unto all that call upon Him."

When dealing with the structure of Rom. ix.-xi. (page 157, Volume XXVII), we noticed that the whole passage is bounded by the conception that God is "over all":

"Who is God over all, blessed for ever" (Rom. ix. 5).
"The same Lord of all is rich unto all that call upon Him" (Rom. x. 12).
"Of Him, and through Him, and unto Him are all things" (Rom. xi. 36).

This is assurance indeed that the purpose of God shall be achieved, whatever the failure of His instruments, and however dark at times the prospect may appear.

The reconciling of the world, contingent upon the failure of Israel, is a most important part of Paul's ministry. The Apostle was not commissioned on the day of Pentecost. Israel had the opportunity of hearing the Word, with signs following, for a considerable period before the apostle to the Gentiles received his commission. Immediately after Acts ix. and the commission of Paul, comes Acts x. and the indication to Peter that the unique and separate position of the Jew was passing. In Acts xiii.-xiv. the door of faith opens to the Gentiles, and Israel are warned lest that "come upon them, that was spoken by the prophets" (Acts xiii. 40, 41).

The very call of Israel was associated historically with the failure and apostasy of the Gentile world, for Abraham's call in Gen. xii. follows the failure at Babel in Gen. xi. From the call of Abraham up to the time of the Acts of the Apostles, God had concentrated His attention upon that one people:

"You only have I known of all the families of the earth" (Amos iii. 2).

The Apostle speaks of this period of Israel's ascendancy and the corresponding Gentile darkness, when addressing the philosophers on Mars Hill, but he also indicates that a change has come:

"And the times of this ignorance God winked at; but now commandeth all men everywhere to repent" (Acts xvii. 30).

Israel lose their high position of favour, and the far-off Gentiles, through the instrumentality of the Apostle's ministry, are brought back:

"For I speak to you Gentiles, inasmuch as I am the apostle of the Gentiles, I magnify mine office" (Rom. xi. 13).

The "reconciliation of the world" is dispensational. It does not mean that the world was or will be saved, or justified or glorified, but simply that the barrier that kept the nations at a distance and in the darkness has been removed, and "all men everywhere" take the place of "Jews only" (Acts xi. 19). The reconciliation which is individual and doctrinal is found in Rom. v. 1-11.

The Apostle not only draws attention to the riches that have come to the Gentile world through the fall and diminishing of Israel, but goes further, saying: "How much more their fullness?" A reference to the structure of Rom. xi. 11-32, given on page 108, will show that the "fullness of Israel" is balanced by the "fullness of the Gentiles", and we must therefore study them together.

"The fullness of Israel", spoken of in verse 12, is most obviously restated in verse 15 as the "receiving" of them back again into favour, and the ambiguous "How much more?" of verse 12 is expanded as "life from the dead".

The "fullness of Israel" would include their priestly office, the elevation of Jerusalem as the "joy of the whole earth", the blessing of the "land of promise", and the fulfillment of all those wonderful prophecies, that, with restored Israel as a centre, describe the earth as filled with blessings until it appears like another Eden. The "fullness of the Gentiles" is set in another context:

> "For I would not, brethren, that ye should be ignorant of this mystery, lest ye should be wise in your own conceits: that blindness in part has happened to Israel, until the fullness of the Gentiles be come in" (Rom. xi. 25).

If the "fullness of Israel" means their restoration to privilege, glory and blessing, so also does the "fullness of the Gentiles". The failure of the nations took place before a single Israelite existed, and in the Covenant made with Abraham, the blessing of the Gentile is implied:

> "And the Scripture, foreseeing that God would justify the heathen through faith, preached before the gospel unto Abraham, saying, In thee shall all nations be blessed" (Gal. iii. 8).

The salvation and justification of the Gentiles by faith, therefore, instead of causing doubts or murmuring among the Jews, should have caused them to rejoice—and the Apostle himself does rejoice as he beholds the wisdom of God working all things after the counsel of His own will.

In Isa. vi., where the fateful passage that speaks of Israel's blindness is found, we read that "His glory is the fullness of the whole earth" (Isa. vi. 3, margin)—so that the same passage that speaks of the failure of Israel prophetically, implies also the inclusion of the Gentiles.

We must remember also the remarkable words of John the Baptist to those who were relying on the fact that Abraham was their father:

> "I say unto you, that God is able of these stones to raise up children unto Abraham" (Matt. iii. 9).

And the Lord's own words concerning the great faith of the centurion:

> "Many shall come from the east and west, and shall sit down with Abraham, Isaac and Jacob in the Kingdom of Heaven, but the children of the kingdom shall be cast out" (Matt. viii. 11, 12).

The first occurrence of pleroma ("fullness") is found in Matt. ix. 16 where it is translated "to fill up", indicating a patch in a torn garment. This is evidently the Apostle's intention in Rom. xi. 25. The failure and diminishing of Israel had, as it were, caused a "rent" in the purpose of God, and the "fullness"—"that which fills up"—is supplied by the believing Gentiles.

The completion of the period of Israel's blindness synchronizes with the Coming of the Lord, when they shall look upon Him Whom they have pierced and so "all Israel shall be saved". We must remember here that the term "Israel" has already been defined. In Rom. ix. 4 the Israelites were those to whom the covenants and glory pertained, and we must remember that while every Israelite must be a descendant of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, every descendant of these patriarchs is not necessarily an Israelite in the true meaning of the term:

> "For they are not all Israel which are of Israel, neither because they are the seed of Abraham are they all children; but in Isaac shall thy seed be called . . . . . the children of the promise are counted for a seed" (Rom. ix. 6-8).

Every true Israelite is a child of promise, an elect person, and it is not, therefore, true to say that the "all Israel" of Rom. xi. 26 must necessarily include every descendant of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob who has lived in the past, or who shall be living at the time of the end. God alone knows whom He has chosen, and these must be saved. Just as we discovered that the sovereign choice of Jacob had no reference to his having "done good", and the rejection of Esau had no reference to his having "done evil" (Rom. ix. 11), so we find that the purpose of God according to election stands, even though many true Israelites were "enemies" because of the gospel. The election of God stands firm, for "the gifts and calling of God are without repentance".

An attempt has been made by some to teach the doctrine of "Universalism" from Rom. xi. 32. We can hardly believe, however, that anyone who has once perceived the scope of Rom. ix.-xi. will be deceived by such handling of the text.

> "For God hath concluded them all in unbelief, that He might have mercy upon them all" (Rom. ix. 32).

In both instances "all" is tous pantas, "the all"—some particular "all" that is under discussion. The only "all" under discussion here is "all Israel", and Rom. ix. has already warned us against a universal application of the word even so far as Israel is concerned.

With the contemplation of God's great overruling, using the blindness of Israel for Gentile blessing, and Gentile mercy for Israel's ultimate salvation, the Apostle ends his reasoning and breaks into a doxology:

> "O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! How unsearchable are His judgments, and His ways past finding out! For who hath known the mind of the Lord? Or who hath been His counselor? Or who hath first given to Him, and it shall be recompensed unto him again? For of Him, and through Him, and to Him, are all things, to Whom be glory for ever, Amen" (Rom. xi. 33-36).

At the close of the great doctrinal section of Romans, we have the glorious "persuasion" that nothing can separate us from the love of God (Rom. viii. 38, 39). At the close of the dispensational section, we have the doxology quoted above. And at the close of the epistle itself there is a further ascription of praise: "To the only wise God" (Rom. xvi. 25-27).

In Rom. xi. 33-36, the Apostle is thinking particularly of the wisdom, knowledge and judgment of God in the working out of His purposes—wisdom that infallibly uses and overrules all means to one end, knowledge that sees the end from the beginning and can never be taken by surprise, and judgments or decisions that are beyond the understanding of man, being indeed "unsearchable" (anexereunetos). Parallel with this last phrase is the statement that "His ways are past finding out", the word "past finding out" (anexichniastos) being translated "unsearchable" in Eph. iii. 8. The word is a compound from the Greek for "a footstep", and emphasizes the fact that we are completely dependent upon the revealed will of God. Apart from His Word what knowledge should we have? Or how should we set about acquiring it? If the Apostle himself, whose reasonings and explanations given by inspiration of God are so difficult to comprehend, has to cease from argument and exclaim "O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God", how much more we of so much lower calibre. Full as are the words already considered, they are but the steps that lead to the sanctuary itself. There, in a blaze of glory that robs the eye of its natural vision, we perceive something of the glory of Jehovah, the One "Who was, Who is, and Who is to come".

HE WHO WAS.	"Of Him."	Ex - origin.	In the PAST.
HE WHO IS.	"Through Him."	Dia - cause.	In the PRESENT.
HE WHO IS TO COME.	"To Him."	Eis - goal.	In the FUTURE.

"All things" here it ta panta, a form to be distinguished carefully from panta, without the article. The Apostle uses these terms with discrimination. "All things", without reserve, are made to work together for good, but it is "the all things" (not the evil as well as the good) that are freely given us with the gift of Christ (Rom. viii. 28 and 32). In Rom. ix. 5 Christ is set forth as "over all things, God blessed unto the ages". No discrimination is intended here; the evil as well as the good, defective Israel as well as the believing Gentile, Esau as well as Jacob are all included. In Rom. xi., however, it is not all things, evil as well as good, that find their origin, cause and goal in Him, but rather those "all things" that are a matter of promise and election. So in Col. i. 16-20, we have ta panta: "For in Him were created the all things." The Apostle's intention here is not to teach that Christ is the Creator of the Universe—that is a subject treated elsewhere—but rather that "the all things" were created "in Him". These "all things" were created through Him—dia, and unto Him—eis (compare Rom. xi. 36), and "in Him" "the all things" have been "placed together" or "consist".

And so, with every acknowledgment of the immensity of our theme, and of our own incapacity to plumb its depths, we leave this great dispensational section of a mighty epistle, glad at the close to have come to the silencing of all argument, not because of the challenge, "Who art thou, O man, that repliest against God?" but because worship has taken the place of argument, and adoration fills our hearts with song.

We have not given the structure of verses 33-36, believing that it will be obvious to all who will search and see, and feeling that to have introduced it here would have been somewhat of an intrusion.

"To Him be glory unto the ages, Amen."

#72. Romans xii. and xiii.
"Your Reasonable Service" (xii. 1, 2).
pp. 191 - 197

The great dispensational section of this epistle has brought before us the overwhelming depths and heights of divine sovereignty, foreknowledge and predestination; but, far from such high doctrines inducing the irresolution of fatalism, we find that the Apostle opens this practical section by "beseeching", and even speaks of "yielding your bodies" and of "logical service". The Apostle never hesitates to bring to bear the greatest of doctrines upon the lowliest points of practice. He uses, for example, the sublime descent of the Lord from the high pinnacle of equality with God, to the deep abasement of the death of the cross, in order to encourage the believer to seek "that mind which was in Christ Jesus" (Phil. ii. 5-8). So, with Rom. i.-viii. behind him, and the marvelous exhibition in Rom. ix.-xi. of the mercy of God as revealed in His dispensational dealings with Israel and the Gentiles, the Apostle turns to the practical working out of this truth in the various departments of daily life.

He addresses himself to the believer in four capacities:

(1) As AN INDIVIDUAL POSSESSING BODY AND MIND.—He deals with both in their relation to Christian service (Rom. xii. 1, 2) by teaching that is derived from renewal and separation.
(2) As A MEMBER OF A CHURCH ENDOWED WITH SPIRITUAL GIFTS.—He refers all to the measure of faith. (xii. 3-8).
(3) As ONE DWELLING AMONG FELLOW-BELIEVERS AND IDOLATORS.—In this he shows that hatred of evil is not incompatible with rendering to all their dues, or with living peaceably, as far as is possible, with all men. (xii. 9, 18; xiii. 7).

(4) As ONE WHO IS HASTENING THROUGH TIME--WITH ETERNITY EVER DRAWING NEARER.—While presenting the body in service to the Lord, no provision for the lusts of the flesh should be tolerated.

The structure of Rom. xii. and xiii. divides the subject-matter into five sections as follows:

A | xii. 1, 2. Be not conformed to this age. Suschematizo.
B | xii. 3-16. Grace given.
C | xii. 17 - xiii. 7. Vengeance and civil government.
B | xiii. 8-10. Law fulfilled.
A | xiii. 11-14. Put off the works of darkness. Euschemonos.

With these main divisions in mind, the reader will be able to follow quite easily the details of the first section as set out below. As the complete structure is lengthy, we propose to set out in each article only that section which is under consideration at the time, trusting that the reader will, at the end, reassemble the whole so that its balance of parts may be appreciated.

Romans xii. 1, 2.

A | xii. 1, 2. This Age. The Body. The Mind Renewed.
a | c | I beseech that:
d | Mercies of God. Bodies presented.
e | Acceptable.
b | f | Logical service.
g | This age. Not conformed (Suschematizo).
f | Mind renewed.
a | c | You prove what:
d | Will of God.
e | Acceptable.

Let us now gather up some of the teaching that is to be found in this great exhortation.

"I beseech you therefore, brethren, by the mercies of God, that ye present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy acceptable unto God, which is your reasonable service. And be not conformed to this world; but be ye transformed by the renewing of your mind, that ye may prove what is that good, and acceptable, and perfect will of God" (Rom. xii. 1, 2).

The structure throws the word "acceptable" into prominence, and reveals the intimate connection between our acceptableness to God, and our consequent recognition of the acceptableness of His will. We know that the will of God must be "good", we know that it must be "perfect", but is it always "acceptable"? This is an experimental word and only so far as our service is acceptable to the Lord, will His will be acceptable to us. The moment we think, speak or act in a way that is not acceptable to God, His Will for us in that respect will cease to be acceptable to us.

Our practical acceptance with the Lord is the result of yielding our bodies as a living sacrifice. This, adds the Apostle, is not an act of fanaticism, not something done in the white heat of enthusiasm, but something that is calmly and quietly and thoughtfully rendered—it is our "reasonable", or "logical", service. There is one sacrifice, and one only, which has been offered to God that involved death, and that is the sacrifice of Christ Himself. In that we can have no share—as it is written of the High Priest on the Day of Atonement: "There shall be no man in the tabernacle . . . . . until he come out and have made an atonement" (Lev. xvi. 17). What is permitted, however, and what is enjoined, is the yielding of our bodies as a living sacrifice.

What is involved in this "living sacrifice" may be gathered from the way in which this aspect of service is referred to elsewhere.

> "Walk in love, as Christ also hath loved us, and hath given Himself for us an offering and a sacrifice to God for a sweet smelling savour" (Eph. v. 2).

The believer's "walk" here is to partake of this sacrificial character, and just as the Apostle stresses "the body" and "the mind" in Rom. xii., so here, there follows immediately the "but" of verses 3-5 with their reference to the sins of the body and mind, leading up to a further parallel, in verses 8-10, with Rom. xiii. 12-14:

> "For ye were sometimes darkness, but now are ye light in the Lord; walk as children of light . . . . . proving what is acceptable unto the Lord" (Eph. v. 8-10).

Still further parallels are to be found in the exhortation to "awake" in Eph. v. 14, and the same exhortation in Rom. xiii. 11; "the redeeming of the time" in Eph. v. and "The night is far spent" in Rom. xiii.; and "understanding what the will of the Lord is" in Eph. v., and "proving what is that acceptable will of God" in Rom. xii.

The sacrificial nature of service is further seen in Phil. ii. and iv. In the second chapter we have the service of the Apostle, while in the fourth chapter it is the service of the unnamed believers at Philippi.

> "Yea, and if I be offered upon the sacrifice and service of your faith, I joy and rejoice with you all" (Phil. ii. 17).
> "I have all, and abound: I am full, having received of Epaphroditus the things which were sent from you, an odour of a sweet smell, a sacrifice acceptable, well pleasing to God" (Phil. iv. 18).

The "things" described in this last passage could not have been of great size or value, for they had to be carried many miles, and were to help the Apostle in his narrow confinement. Yet, being given in the spirit of Christ, they were "acceptable, well pleasing unto God".

Writing to the Hebrews, in an epistle in which "sacrifice and offering" had been set aside once and for all (Heb. x. 5-10), the Apostle says:

> "By Him, therefore, let us offer the sacrifice of praise to God continually, that is, the fruit of our lips, giving thanks to His name. But to do good and communicate forget not; for with such sacrifices God is well pleased" (Heb. xiii. 15, 16).

In a later section of Romans, the Apostle speaks of the "offering up of the Gentiles" being "acceptable" (Rom. xv. 16).

The word "present" in Rom. xii. 1 should be translated "yield". The word is paristemi, and is used in Rom. vi.:

> "Neither yield ye your members as instruments of unrighteousness unto sin, but yield yourselves unto God as those that are alive from the dead, and your members as instruments of righteousness unto God" (Rom. vi. 13).

Here we have the "presenting of the body", we have the stress upon the "living sacrifice"—"as those that are alive from the dead"—and also another connection that is not so obvious to the English reader. The word "instruments" (opla) occurs once more in this epistle, in Rom. xiii. 12, where it is translated "armour"; and the structure shows that this passage in Rom. xiii. is in correspondence with Rom. xii. 1, 2. The Apostle is thinking of the body as a whole in Rom. xii., and the members separately as "instruments" or "weapons" in Rom. xiii.

This yielding of the body in sacrificial service the Apostle calls "your reasonable service". Paul, the man of faith, was also a man of reason. He saw nothing irrational in faith, nor anything unbelieving in reason. It is true that what often passes for reason is most irrational, but anything that is actually irrational is necessarily untrue, and cannot therefore be acceptable to God. An unbiased mind, unswayed by evil or ignorance, undimmed by darkness or superstition, and free from the dominion of sin, would inevitably arrive at the conclusion reached by the Apostle.

The introduction of the word "reasonable" naturally leads the Apostle to a consideration of the mind. He looks to the renewed mind for this rational power, and points out that we cannot hope for such a mind if we conform to this age. We must be transformed by the renewing of our mind, if we are to prove the acceptableness of the will of God.

The words used for "conform" and "transform" are compounds of schema and morphe. Morphe ("form") is organic, while schema ("fashion") applies more to what is external. The reader should refer to the structure for a moment to note that suschematizo in Rom. xii. 2, is balanced by euschemonos ("well-fashioned"), or as our version puts it, "honestly"—with the marginal alternative "decently". This balance of truth is a necessary corrective. Fanaticism flies in the face of all reason and is apt to think that to be old-fashioned or extreme is a sign of sanctity. Such is by no means the case. In I Cor. xiii. 5 we read that "love doth not behave itself unseemly" (aschemoneo)—or as we might almost render the passage: "Love does not disregard prevailing fashions unnecessarily." It is a matter of complete indifference to the child of God whether he wears a felt hat, a silk hat, a straw hat, or a cloth cap; there is no sanctity in any of them, and there is no sanctity in discarding them. While resolutely refusing to allow this age to fashion our thinking, we shall not willingly offend against the ordinary conventions of propriety under the mistaken conviction that such indicates spirituality.

While we are to offer our bodies as living sacrifices, it is to be "reasonable" service and we are to give none offence, while doing all to the glory of God (I Cor. x. 31, 32).

Metamorphoomai is the word translated "transfigured" in Matt. xvii. 2, and occurs also in II Cor. iii. 18:

> "But we all, with unveiled face, beholding as in a mirror the glory of the Lord are changed into the same image from glory to glory, even as by the spirit of the Lord."

This transfiguration is associated with the "renewing" of the mind. The word is a compound derived from kainos, "new", and takes us back once more to Rom. vi. & vii., where, in the same context as the "yielding" of our members, we read of "newness" of life and "newness" of spirit (Rom. vi. 4, vii. 6).

Following on from II Cor. iii. 18, which we have just quoted above, we read in II Cor. iv. 16 of the "renewing" of the inward man. The presence of the word "image" in II Cor. iii. 18 and the "renewing" of II Cor. iv. 16 find a full explanation in Col. iii. 9, 10:

> "Lie not one to another, seeing ye have put off the old man with his deeds; and have put on the new man, which is renewed in knowledge after the image of Him that created him."

The reader will have observed also the presence of the words "put on" which have already appeared in Rom. xiii. 12 and 14. And so the wonder of the Word grows upon us the more we study it, and the more we search for its treasures.

In this epistle to the Romans, the Apostle has dealt with tremendous issues, involving predestination and foreknowledge, and the arguments of Rom. ix.-xi. Yet, if we imagine that we shall find a treatise on this aspect of the Will of God in Romans, we shall be disappointed. Thelema, "Will" occurs four times in Romans, as follows:

A | i. 10. Making request . . . . . that I may have a prosperous journey, by the Will of God, to come unto you.
B | ii. 18. And knowest His Will and approvest (dokimazo) the things that are more excellent.
B | xii. 2. That you may prove (dokimazo) what is that good and acceptable and perfect Will of God.
A | xv. 32. Pray . . . . . that I may come unto you with joy, by the Will of God.

Here, it will be perceived, the subject is just two-fold. In the opening and closing members, it is simply the recognition of the Will of God that must always temper our requests and plans—a thought so simple that a believing child can understand it. In the central members it is a question of the approval of the Divine Will by man. In the first passage, taught only by law, and unrelieved by mercy, man's approval is superficial—the "form of knowledge and of the truth in the law" (Rom. ii. 20)—while in the second passage we have the far deeper experience of Rom. xii. 2.

Of the fifteen occurrences of thelo, "to will", four only have reference to God: namely, Rom. ix. 15, 18, 18 and 22. While the will of God itself does not change, it assumes different aspects according to our approach to it. It may appear formidable, overwhelming, unfathomable, fixed as "fate". Yet to those whose service is "reasonable", whose bodies are "yielded", whose minds are "renewed", it may appear as the good, and acceptable, and perfect will of One Who, though almighty, is also gracious, and though God, is also Father. It is this aspect, and not the deterministic one, that it is the Apostle's object to present to the believer, not to intimidate him, but to captivate his affections.

The apostle Paul was ever mindful to place practice over against doctrine. He bids the Ephesian saints to walk worthy of their calling. He calls upon the Philippians to live in a manner worthy of the gospel. And now here, he shows the Roman believers what their reasonable service must be. While we realize that in our flesh "dwelleth no good thing", yet the life we now live in the flesh we live by the faith of the Son of God, and instead of "neglecting the body", we rejoice to learn that this same body that was once an instrument of unrighteousness, may now, by virtue of redemption and a renewed mind, be yielded in holy acceptableness to God.

May the beseeching of the Apostle and the contemplation of the mercies of God not be in vain.

#73. Romans xii. and xiii.
Grace Given (xii. 3-16).
pp. 238 - 243

B | xii. 3-16. Grace given.
c | h | 3. Not think highly.
i | 3. Think soberly.
d | j1 | 3. The Measure of Faith.
k1 | 4, 5. Members one of another.
j2 | 6-9. The Analogy of Faith.
k2 | 10. Kind one to another.
j3 | 11-15. The Measure of Service.
k3 | 16. Same mind one to another.
c | h | 16. Mind not high things.
i | 16. Condescend to lowly.

We have already seen in the first two verses of this chapter (Rom. xii. 1, 2) that the yielding of the body to the Lord constitutes our "reasonable service", and that only with the renewed mind can we prove what is that good, and acceptable, and perfect will of God. The next section (Rom. xii. 3-16) is addressed to the Church in the days when supernatural gifts were enjoyed, and it is therefore clear that some parts of its teaching will not apply directly to us in their primary force. There are, however, abiding principles, true for all time, which we may consider with profit.

Although the words of this section are addressed to a Church possessing supernatural gifts, the Apostle carries on the line of thought already begun with reference to the mind, and we find the section bounded by the following:

> "Not to think of himself more highly than he ought to think, but to think soberly" (Rom. xii. 3).
> "Mind not high things, but condescend to men of low estate" (Rom. xii. 16).

One is conscious in reading Paul's epistles that his mind, as taught by grace, had an instinctive horror of foolish adulation. When, because of necessity, he enumerates his sufferings for Christ's sake, he says that he has been acting like a fool in his boasting, and to offset this, he refers to the deep humiliation of having to leave Damascus, not as the proud emissary of the Jewish Sanhedrin, but in a basket let down from the wall. He refers also to the messenger of Satan sent to buffet him, lest he should become vain and boastful on account of the many visions he had received.

> "But now I forbear, lest any man should think of me above that which he seeth me to be or that he heareth of me" (II Cor. xii. 6).

When the Apostle is seeking to impress upon the consciences of the Ephesian saints the unique character of the ministry he exercised as the prisoner of Christ Jesus for the Gentiles, claiming to be the one through whom the dispensation of the Mystery should first be made known, he breaks into the narrative to add:

> "Unto me, less than the least of all saints, is this grace given" (Eph. iii. 8).

Writing to Timothy some thirty years after his conversion, that is to say after thirty years of such devoted service and suffering as has known no equal since, instead of feeling that such a record gave him the right to regard himself as above the saints, the Apostle is found reminding himself and Timothy, that he had been "a blasphemer, a persecutor, and injurious" though acting ignorantly "in unbelief" (I Tim. i. 13).

Those who worked with the Apostle were called upon to share this same humble estimate of their work.

> "Who then is Paul, and who is Apollos, but ministers by whom ye believed, even as the Lord gave to every man?" (I Cor. iii. 5).
>
> "And these things, brethren, I have in a figure transferred to myself, and to Apollos for your sakes; that ye might learn in us not to think of men above that which is written, that no one of you be puffed up for one against another" (I Cor. iv. 6).
>
> "Casting down reasonings (though not service that was 'reasonable'—see Rom. xii. 1, 2) and every high thing that exalteth itself against the knowledge of God, and bringing into captivity every thought to the obedience of Christ" (II Cor. x. 5).

Again, in Eph. iv. 1, 2, at the outset of the practical section of the epistle, we find the Apostle stressing the need for "all lowliness and meekness".

In contrast with "high mindedness", and being "wise in your own conceits" (Rom. xi. 25; xii. 16) the Apostle places "think soberly" and "condescending to men of low estate" (Rom. xii. 3 and 16).

The English word "sober" is derived from sobrius, the opposite of ebrius, "drunk". The first thought that it brings to the mind is associated with temperance, especially in connection with intoxicating drink, while its secondary meaning indicates that a sober person is grave, serious, and solemn. Connected with this second meaning we have the rather colloquial word "sobersides", indicating that a sober-minded person is rather a "wet-blanket" or "kill-joy". With all this the original of the word "sober" has nothing to do. The word in the Greek is derived from *so, meaning "save" (giving us "salvation" and "Saviour") and phronema, "mind". The latter has reference to the "bent" or "inclination", and so, coupled with the word that means salvation, it indicates that quality of mind, bent or inclination that arises out of the condition of being saved. This would of necessity be a bent that would avoid drunkenness, and intemperance of all kinds, but it would also increase, and not decrease, the keenness of one's wits, and the response of the mind to joy, mirth and gladness as well as giving sanity and clearness of judgment.

While all this is true, however, the uppermost thought in the Apostle's mind in writing Rom. xii. 3, is that of humility which necessarily accompanies salvation from sin, or, as the corresponding passage puts it, "condescending to men of low estate". The word translated "condescend" here is remarkable. It is sunapagomai, and means "to be led away with". The word can have an evil meaning, indicating a weak will being led away to evil things by yielding to a stronger, but here it is in contrast with that high-mindedness which is so unchristian. The word suggests the gentleness and simplicity of the little child. We are never called upon in the N.T. to be "childish", but we are enjoined to be "childlike", for such lowliness of mind is in harmony with salvation.

The remote sequence of the injunction to think soberly is found, as we have seen, in the corresponding section; "Condescend to men of low estate" (xii. 16). The immediate sequence is, of course, found in the words of Rom. xii. 3: "Think soberly, according as God hath dealt to every man the measure of faith." What the Apostle means by "the measure of faith" is seen in the argument that follows:

> "For as we have many members in one body, and all members have not the same office: so we, being many, are one body in Christ, and every one members one of another. Having then gifts differing according to the proportion of faith . . . . . ." (Rom. xii. 4-6).

[* - The reader will notice that the prefix so is also found in the English word "sober". This, however, is purely accidental and indicates a negative through the French and Latin.]

"The measure of faith . . . . . the proportion of faith."—The reader will see in Rom. xii. 4, 5 an argument that has already been used by the Apostle in a similar context in I Cor. xii. Spiritual gifts, says the Apostle, vary as much as the differing functions of the human body. The faculty of sight is precious, and one would give much to preserve one's vision. Yet, says the Apostle, if the "whole body were an eye, where were the hearing?" And again, "The eye cannot say to the hand, I have no need of thee" (I Cor. xii. 17, 21). To be proud of the possession of a gift is foolish, for a gift is unmerited. To be boastful of a particular gift because it appears more important than another is also foolish, for several organs of the body whose functions are vital, are hidden and scarcely even mentioned in ordinary conversation. A sober mind would not forget that all the various gifts were held by grace, and differed by grace—"Having then gifts differing according to the grace that is given to us"—and would gratefully acknowledge that good, acceptable and perfect will which has set the various members in the body, or the varying gifts in the Church, not as marks of merit, but in the exercise of free grace. Boasting and despising would be unknown, and edification would result.

The gifts mentioned by the Apostle here are prophecy, ministry, teaching, exhorting, giving, ruling and showing mercy, and these seven gifts are to be used according to the proportion or analogy of faith. Analogy is primarily an arithmetical term, indicating an equality of ratios. The relation that 3 bears to 7, 6 must bear to 14, or 9 to 21. Superficially, he who possesses 6 gifts may appear greater than one who possesses 3, but the proportion settles whether this is really so. If the man possessing 3 gifts produces results corresponding to the number 7, he is exactly the same proportionally as he who has 6 gifts and produces results corresponding to the number 14. That the Lord actually recognizes this principle is evident from the parable of the talents. The man, who, having two talents, produced another two, was proportionately just as successful as the man who, having five talents, had produced another five. For example, if we compare ourselves with such a man as Paul, we must not forget that Paul was a five-talent servant—apostle, prophet, evangelist, pastor and teacher—while we ourselves may have but one gift—that of an evangelist, perhaps, or of a teacher. If we are as faithful in our smaller measure as Paul was in his larger measure, we shall receive the same "Well done". Moreover, a believer who had received the gift of prophecy, would not be held responsible for the exercise of the gift of healing. The minister is to minister, and the teacher to teach, each one thankfully and humbly receiving the gift that God entrusts, and then diligently using it to His glory.

The reader will not, we trust, misunderstand our teaching here. We do not suggest that any believer belonging to the dispensation of the Mystery receives the gift of prophecy or of healing, but the analogy nevertheless holds good. Whatever the Lord may have given us the grace to do for him, we shall find guidance in the principles laid down in Rom. xii.

At verse 9 there is a transition from faith to love, and at verse 12 a further step to hope. "These three" are often found together, and it may be helpful to see the three groups in this section set out as indicated below (i.e. page 243).

The reader should prayerfully and conscientiously ponder these matters. Some of the points mentioned will apply to all, while others will have a more particular application. Beneath the specific acts mentioned there is revealed an underlying principle, and this principle is traced back to one or other of the three graces, Faith, Love and Hope.

FAITH (Rom. xii. 6-8). Seven Gifts. |
- Prophecy.
- Ministry.
- Teaching.
- Exhorting.
- Giving.
- Ruling.
- Showing Mercy.

LOVE (Rom. xii. 9-11). Seven Aspects. |
- / Abhor evil. \
- \ Cleave to good. \
- / Kindly affectioned. \ Serving the Lord.
- \ In honour preferring. /
- / Not slothful in business. /
- \ Fervent in spirit. /

HOPE (Rom. xii. 12-15). Seven Consequences. |
- / Patient in tribulation. \ Yourselves.
- \ Continuing in prayer. /
- / Distributing to necessity. \ Others.
- \ Given to hospitality. /
- / Bless them that persecute you. \ Yourselves.
- \ Curse not.* /
- / Rejoice with them that rejoice. \ Others.
- \ Weep with them that weep. /

[* - "Curse not" is a negative extension of the positive command "Bless", and so must not be counted separately.]

We find the same sort of relationship in I Cor. xii. and xiii. as we have already found in Rom. xii. I Cor. xii., with its figure of the one body and its many members, which is introduced, as in Rom. xii., to illustrate the diversity and yet essential unity of the various gifts, is followed by I Cor. xiii., with its emphasis upon faith, hope and love. And just as I Cor. xiii. declares at the close, that love is greater than all, so after the interval of Rom. xii. 17 - xiii. 7, the Apostle returns to the fullness of love as the all-inclusive grace. This, of course, is as true to-day as when it was written. The changing of the dispensations makes no difference to the pre-eminence of love, except perhaps to make that pre-eminence more intensely true.

Things above.

#4. "Where Christ sitteth" (Col. iii. 1).

pp. 1 - 4

We shall not have completed our examination of the Scriptures that speak of Christ sitting on the right hand of God, until we have considered the definite statement that is included in several of the citations of Psalm cx. 1:

> "The Lord said unto my Lord, Sit Thou at My right hand, until I make Thine enemies Thy footstool."

This we will now do. The verse is quoted seven times in the N.T. The references are: Matt. xxii. 44; Mark xii. 36; Luke xx. 42; Acts ii. 34; I Cor. xv. 25; Heb. i. 13 and x. 13; and it will be observed that the three references in the Gospels and Heb. i. 13 centre round the question of our Lord's Person. "Whose Son is He?" "What think ye of Christ?" "To which of the angels said He at any time . . . . .?" The quotation in Heb. x. 13 has in view the completeness of the Lord's one sacrifice for sin, as I Cor. xv. 25 looks forward to the end of the ages when the last enemy, Death, shall be destroyed.

There are therefore the two remaining declarations of truth to be considered before we complete our survey of these references to the seated Christ at the right hand of God. They are references to His enemies, and His own questions concerning Himself.

The Psalm is a psalm of war and of victory. The conqueror is not only a King, but a King-Priest, for the heart of the Psalm reveals the burden of the epistle to the Hebrews.

> "The Lord hath sworn and will not repent, Thou art a Priest for ever after the Order of Melchisedec" (Psa. cx. 4).

In the wisdom of God, kingship and priesthood were kept distinct in Israel, the dreadful fate of Uzziah revealing the seriousness of any attempt to break down the distinction. Just as Moses broke down when called upon the undertake the leadership of Israel, thus necessitating the passing on of the priesthood to Aaron, so no son of Adam is capable of combining these great offices. This high glory is reserved for the Lord Jesus Christ. Melchisedec set Him forth in type, and Zechariah spoke of Him in prophecy saying: "He shall sit and rule upon His throne: and He shall be a priest upon His throne" (Zech. vi. 13), and when He enters into this double office, at the time of the end, then redeemed Israel shall become a kingdom of priests unto God" (Rev. i. 6).

This King-Priest rules "in the midst of His enemies": He shall "wound the heads over extensive territories" (Psa. cx. 6). These words refer to the Day of the Lord and the judgment on the Beast, the Antichrist and the False Prophet.

Whatever the enemy, whether Devil, Death, or any agency of either, we are assured that the Lord will sit there at the right hand of the Father, until they are made the footstool of His feet.

When therefore we seek those things where Christ sitteth, we are associating ourselves with the mighty Victor over all the power of the enemy, and anticipating by faith the goal of the ages.

From the references to this Psalm in the Gospels, we discover that the Lord used this passage mainly to prove to His hearers, that though, according to the flesh, He was the Son of David, He was, in fact, infinitely more.

In Matt. xxii. where we meet with the quotation for the first time, the Lord had been subjected to a series of questions designed, if possible, to entrap Him into some statement that would imperil His life or shake His hold upon the people.

> "While the Pharisees were gathered together, Jesus asked them, saying, What think ye of Christ? Whose son is He? They say unto Him, The son of David. He saith unto them, How then doth David in spirit call Him Lord, saying, The Lord said unto my Lord, Sit Thou on my right hand, till I make Thine enemies Thy footstool? If David then call Him Lord, how is He his Son? And no man was able to answer Him a word, neither durst any man from that day forth ask Him any questions" (Matt. xxii. 41-46).

The Lord does not give an answer to His question. He leaves it with His hearers; but it is a question that demands an answer, for it touches the vitals of our faith. The Saviour was most certainly David's Son. His genealogy is given in Matt. i. with the express purpose of showing His right to the throne of David. The angel Gabriel announced to Mary concerning her first-born Son, that:

> "He shall be great, and shall be called the Son of the Highest: and the Lord God shall give unto Him the throne of his father David" (Luke i. 32).

Paul, in his epistle to the Romans, says of Him:

> "Which was made of the seed of David, according to the flesh" (Rom. i. 3).

"According to the flesh!" In speaking of every other man, the qualification would amount to absurdity. How else than "according to the flesh" can man be associated with his parents? Such are called "fathers of our flesh" (Heb. xii. 9). But we know that Christ was in communion with God before His birth in Bethlehem, and moreover spoke of the body that had been prepared for Him.

> "Wherefore when He cometh into the world, He saith, Sacrifice and offering Thou wouldest not, but a body hast Thou prepared Me . . . . . Lo, I come" (Heb. x. 5-7).

What son of Adam ever spoke of his own body before his own birth? But this was the utterance of the God-Man, Jesus Christ, Who, though the Son of David according to the flesh, was nevertheless David's Lord. Now there can be no doubt as to who was David's Lord. He who loved the law of God as did the writer of the Psalms, would have most heartily subscribed to the majestic passage in Deut. vi. 4: "Hear, O Israel: The Lord our God is one Lord."

Whether David could have answered our Lord's question in verses 43 and 44 of Matt. xxii. is another matter; possibly he would have confessed: "Great is the mystery of godliness" (I Tim. iii. 16) and have realized that the child born of the virgin was none other than the "Mighty God" (Isa. vii. 14; ix. 6, 7), and bowed in His presence, acknowledging His name as Emmanuel. The fact that Thomas was convinced that the risen Christ had "flesh and bones" (Luke xxiv. 39), and that he was invited to thrust his hand into the Saviour's side, did not prevent him from falling at His feet, saying, "My Lord and my God". Neither did the fact that the Lord was the Son of David according to the flesh (Rom. i. 3) prevent Paul from saying concerning Him in the same epistle:

> "Who are Israelites . . . . . whose are the fathers, and of whom, as concerning the flesh Christ came, Who is over all, God blessed for ever, Amen" (Rom. ix. 4, 5).

We may not be able to satisfy the barren logic of the Unitarian, but when we "seek those things which are above, where Christ sitteth at the right hand of God", we have the twofold satisfaction of knowing that, being Man, He is not untouched with the feeling of our infirmities, and being God manifest in the flesh, all things under His omnipotent and gracious control. What encouragements therefore are held out to us in Scripture to "Seek those things which are above".

#5. "Not on things on the earth" (Col. iii. 1, 2).

pp. 45 - 50

We have now looked at the positive aspect of this wonderful theme. Not only have we learned that "things above" are "where Christ sitteth on the right hand of God", but we have caught a glimpse of what that session at the right hand means.

We now learn, negatively, that "things above" mean "not things on the earth". While these words, as words, are simple and require no explanation, the inspired intention may not be so obvious, partly because of erroneous views that most of us have entertained. A canvass of the opinions of our friends will reveal that in the estimate of the majority "things on the earth" mean such mundane pleasures as theatre-going, smoking, and according to temperament, such arts as music, literature and paintings. One will even rebuke, as being of the earth, the spontaneous joy evoked by the sight of a bluebell wood, a sunset, or a bank of primroses. We cannot discover support for such opinions in the Scriptures, to which we now turn to discover from its teaching what the expression "things on the earth" really means.

Let us first of all see how the earth, and things pertaining to it, are referred to in Colossians itself.

"For by Him were all things created, that are in the heavens, and on the earth (epi tes ges) visible and invisible" (Col. i. 16).

Here we learn that "things on the earth" are as much the creation of the Lord as are the things in the heavens. Moreover, the words "visible and invisible" seem explanatory, thus:

A | Things in the HEAVENS.
B | Things on the EARTH.
B | VISIBLE things.
A | INVISIBLE things.

It is the function of earthly, visible things to set forth the invisible heavenly realities. Let us see this from the Word.

"From the invisible things of Him from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made, even His eternal power and Godhead" (Rom. i. 20).

This however is but the teaching of spiritual infancy: a robust faith "endures as seeing Him Who is invisible", or as II Cor. iv. has it:--

"While we look not at the things which are seen, but at the things which are not seen; for the things which are seen are for a season, but the things which are not seen are age-abiding" (II Cor. iv. 18).

When we turn to the great central section of Colossians, we find a reference to "the world" instead of "the earth". Both terms are, however, used similarly. Let us see this and note how parallel it is.

"Let no man therefore judge you in meat, or in drink, or in respect of an holy day, or of the new moon, or of the Sabbath days: which are a shadow of things to come: but the body is of Christ . . . . . Wherefore if ye died with Christ from the rudiments of the world, why, as though living in the world, are ye subject to ordinances (such as) touch not, taste not, handle not . . . . . If ye then be risen with Christ, seek . . . . . set . . . . . not on things on the earth" (Col. ii. 16, 17, 20, 21; iii. 1, 2).

Here we have the rudiments of the world, constituted of "shadow of things to come", set in correspondence with "things on the earth" which are "visible" and "for a season", not heavenly and age-abiding. In the one case the argument is: "If ye died with Christ", whereas in the other it is: "If ye then be risen with Christ."

The phrase epi tes ges "on (upon, or in,) the earth" occurs too many times for us to give a list of occurrences here, but we note its twofold usage as follows:

USED IN A "GOOD" SENSE.

"Thy Kingdom come, Thy will be done in earth, as it is in heaven" (Matt. vi. 10).

"That in the dispensation of the fullness of times, He might gather together in one all things in Christ, both which are in heaven and which are on earth" (Eph. i. 10).

"Of whom the whole family in heaven and earth is named" (Eph. iii. 15).

"Honour thy father and mother . . . . . that it may be well with thee, and thou mayest live long on the earth" (Eph. vi. 2, 3).

"And hast made us unto our God, kings and priests: and we shall reign on the earth" (Rev. v. 10).

USED IN A "BAD" SENSE.

"Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon earth, where moth and rust doth corrupt, and where thieves break through and steal; . . . . . for where your treasure is there will your heart be also" (Matt. vi. 19).

"For if He were on earth, He should not be a priest" (Heb. viii. 4).

"These all died in faith, not having received the promises, but having seen them afar off, and were persuaded of them, and embraced them, and confessed that they were strangers and pilgrims on the earth . . . . . now they desire a better country, that is, an heavenly" (Heb. xi. 13-16).

When attempting to assess the true value of the term "things on the earth" what we need to remember is that there are two points of view to be kept in mind, and that an undue emphasis upon either must lead to erroneous views.

We remember that the earth, because of man's sin, has come under a curse, but we must remember too, that the earth is the Lord's and the fullness thereof. Though under a curse, the earth is not cursed for its own sake, but for the sin of man, and it is a poor judgment that would conclude that the things of earth must be sinful in themselves when we are definitely told that these things on the day they were created were "good". Man's altered condition has rendered it necessary that many a blessing that once was legitimate must be foregone: that many an innocent pleasure may now take upon itself the character of vice. Things on the earth include both food and raiment. Both are vital necessities, both are the gift of God, and both the subject of legitimate prayer and thanksgiving. If we confine ourselves to such physical things as "bread" and "water" it is evident that "things on the earth" cannot be ignored, but if we confine ourselves to things that are above the physical plane it is not so evident.

Should a believer, out of a false interpretation, refuse to participate in the things on the earth that minister to his physical needs, he would speedily die, and his folly would be evident to all. Man is called upon to love the Lord his God with heart, soul and mind, as well as with strength, yet he may starve his mind by a false repudiation of things on the earth, and utterly fail to render God His due, without that failure being so patent to the observer.

Paul did not hesitate, in the highly spiritual epistle to the Philippians, to draw attention to "whatsoever things are lively, or of good report" and urged upon his hearers the duty of searching for these things, saying, "If there be any virtue" think of these things. The writer of these lines had known for years that the apostle had urged "prayer for all men" (I Tim. ii. 1), but it came to him very forcefully one day that the apostle also said: "giving thanks for all men", and this he had never done. That the apostle is not speaking of thanking God for believers, the context makes obvious, and the "all men" of verse 1 would include many a pagan and philosopher who had no knowledge of Christ. If I ought to thank God for the unrequited labours of Dr. Young in his splendid concordance, should I not also thank God for those who laboured in the English Dictionary, which I also use, even though those who thus laboured may not have been doing the work "as unto the Lord". If I thank God, as I should, for the Christian poetry of Cowper, should I not thank God for the mighty genius of Shakespeare, so evidently given in the most critical period in the history of our tongue?

If I thank God for the beauties of flower, field and forest, should I not thank Him for the genius of Turner, Constable, David Cox and others, who have by their brush drawn our attention to the delightsomeness of our countryside? If I thank God for the composers of our hymn tunes, shall I refuse thanksgiving after hearing Beethoven's mighty Fifth Symphony? Are these the things on the earth that the apostle forfeits? We believe they are not. They each and all may become an evil, even as the necessities of life may be abused, but we would do well to remember the sane principle contained in the words of inspiration, regarding meats in particular, and to realize that in these things our own conscience, or the respect for the tender conscience of another, and not the things themselves, is what most matters.

> "Neither if we eat are we the better: neither, if we eat not are we the worse" (I Cor. viii. 8).

Before leaving this particular aspect of our subject, it may be well to anticipate one or two objections, as the point of view advocated is not what is generally considered "spiritual". We have mentioned, for example, Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, and we readily agree that there is no more spirituality in that magnificent composition than there is in the food that we use for our physical needs, yet for these we unreservedly give thanks, even though the butcher and the baker and all the other folk engaged in their production and distribution were far from God in their thoughts.

Again, we may be reminded that the father of all who handle the harp and the organ was of the line of Cain. The answer is that any argument that proves too much defeats itself. Both the harp and the organ are mentioned with approval in the Scriptures; moreover the line of Cain fathered not only musical instruments, but the keeping of cattle and the work in brass and iron. This would involve Abraham and Israel and Bezaleel and every reader of these lines too.

Regarding Phil. iv. 8, the word translated "think" is the same that is rendered "count" in Phil. iii. 8, or "lay to one's charge" in II Tim. iv. 16, or "impute" in Rom. iv. 22. If we can see any virtue, beauty, loveliness anywhere, we must not hesitate to "reckon" it, even though we clearly distinguish between that which is spiritual and that which is not. Turner, Constable, and David Cox may or may not have been believers; the man who delivers my morning milk or daily bread may or may not be a believer. If I can give thanks for that which is physical food, shall I withhold if from that which is mental food? Both the landscape and the painter of it are involved in the curse and subject to vanity, and there are some who as consistently shut their eyes to the transient beauty of field and hedgerow, as others do to canvas and etching, but whether they are justified is the point in question.

Coming to I Tim. ii. 1, 2, we anticipate a difficulty in connection with the injunction to "give thanks for all men". There is no difficulty in understanding the meaning of the words. "Pray for all men". The word translated "for" is the Greek preposition huper. The primary meaning of huper is "over", but this is modified in usage. We could speak of praying "over" anyone, but it would not be good English. "For", is the natural idiom, and out of some 134 occurrences of huper, the A.V. renders 105 of them by this word.

Now the preposition is a servant (not a master) and it must be flexible. When I pray "for" another I may think mostly of his future deeds—as when one prays for kings and all that are in authority, that we may lead a peaceable life, but when I give thanks "for" another, I mostly think of his past deeds—as when I give thanks for kings and all in authority. We have actual evidence that "thanks" refers to the past, as the usage in the apostle's own case proves.

> "Wherefore I also, after I heard of your faith . . . . . cease not to give thanks for you" (Eph. i. 15, 16).

There are only three occurrences of eucharistia = "thanksgiving" in the pastoral epistles. One refers to "kings and all in authority", the other two refer to meats over which some had scruples (I Tim. iv. 3, 4). Is it possible that some of our readers would have no hesitancy in thanking God for "bacon", who would hesitate (forgive the play on words) to do the same for "Shakespeare". Is food for the body so very much more spiritual than food for the mind?

Now we are aware that this emphasis on the possible legitimacy of some earthly things will be misunderstood by some, and for this we are sorry; this however is no adequate reason for countenancing misinterpretations of the Scriptures, nor for allowing shackles to be imposed where grace has set free, for we have seen minds and spirits cramped and starved, in consequence of mistaking the denial of "natural affection" for "holiness". For most of us however the pressure of circumstances and the demands made by higher things will cause us to forego the transient pleasures that are lawful, whether we will or not, and although this be so, and we find—at the right hand of God where Christ sitteth—more than all the world can give, let us not despise or judge those whose leisure permits the enjoyment of some of these lesser blessings that help to lighten the pilgrim journey.

There are other aspects of this subject that demand attention. These we must leave for another article, praying that what has been seen may be a means of true liberty to those who have been raised with Christ and who seek those things which are above.

#6. "Not on things on the earth" (Col. iii. 1, 2).
pp. 98 - 103

We have seen that things on the earth are, of themselves, neither good nor evil: they become either, to the user, according to his approach to them. For example (borrowing an illustration from the physical world) none can live without water; yet water will drown the person who is submerged in it. We could scarcely live in this climate without artificial fire, yet fire, should it become master instead of servant, is a destroyer. Therefore we reply to the objector to our findings in the previous article: It is not the use of things on the earth but their abuse that calls for the discernment of the believer. This important aspect of the subject is found in the words of Col. iii. 2: "Set your affection (phroneo) on things above, not on things on the earth."

What does the apostle mean by the words "Set your affection"? The word phroneo, translated "affection", occurs elsewhere in the prison epistles, but only in Philippians, where in the space of four chapters it is found eleven times. This fact demands more than passing reference: it demands investigation, for it is evident that Philippians will supply us with the intention of the Apostle in Col. iii. 2. We are the more induced to this belief because we already know that in Phil. iii. 19 there is a parallel with the warning of Col. iii. 2, where the Apostle speaks of those who "mind (the same word as 'affection') earthly things" (ta epigeia being parallel with ta epi tes ges).

At least we must do two things. We must look at the eleven references in Philippians, and we must look at them in the light of the special theme of that epistle. We shall then be better prepared to interpret the Apostle's words in Col. iii. 2.

Phroneo in the Prison Epistles.

A1 | Phil. i. 7. It is meet for me to think (phroneo) this concerning (huper) you.
Phil. ii. 2. Same mind (to auto phroneo).
B1 | Phil. ii. 2. The one thing (to hen) minding (phroneo).
Phil. ii. 5. Let this mind (phroneo) be in you. Christ's DESCENT.
B2 | a | Phil. iii. 15. As many as would be perfect (one thing, to hen verse 13) be thus minded (phroneo).
b | Phil. iii. 15. Otherwise (heteros) minded (phroneo).
a | Phil. iii. 16. Where attained . . . . . walk . . . . . mind (phroneo) the same thing (to auto).
b | Phil. iii. 19. Who mind (phroneo) earthly things (ta epigeia).
A2 | Phil. iv. 2. Same mind (to auto phroneo).
Phil. iv. 10. Your care (phroneo) concerning (huper) me . . . . . ye were also careful (phroneo).
B3 | Col. iii. 2. Set mind (phroneo) on things above. Christ's ASCENT.

Although the word conveys much more than mere mental process, it is evident that the translation "affection" in Col. iii. 2 does not do justice to the word phroneo. Let us make a more detailed examination of this collection of references to the word. We observe that the Apostle used it when he told the Philippians that he was sure that the Lord would be perfect that good thing He had begun in them, and at the close of the epistle he speaks of their kindly thought concerning himself and his needs. The word is used in the following passages with the phrase to auto (the same):--

> "Fulfil ye my joy, that ye be like minded" (Phil. ii. 2).
> "Nevertheless, whereto we have already attained, let us walk by the same rule, let us mind the same thing" (Phil. iii. 16).
> "My longed for, my joy . . . . . be of the same mind in the Lord" (Phil. iv. 2).

These passages bring us nearer to our theme. Apparently there is to be singleness of eye among those who would walk worthy of their high calling. This is definitely expressed in the next reference.

> "Being of one accord, of one mind" (Phil. ii. 2).

This exhortation is practiced by the Apostle himself, for although phroneo is not actually used in Phil. iii. 13, 14, the same spirit is manifest when he said:--

> "Brethren, I count not myself to have apprehended: but this one thing I do, forgetting those things which are behind, and reaching forth unto those things which are before, I press toward the mark" (Phil. iii. 13, 14).

This is to be the "mind" of those who would be perfect (Phil. iii. 15). Here we get further light upon our theme. To set the mind on things above, and not on things on the earth, is to forget the things that are behind and to reach forth for the things associated with the prize of the high calling. The history of Israel illustrates the principle. After their deliverance out of Egypt, instead of forgetting the things which were behind, we read that they said "we remember", and this remembrance of things left behind proved their undoing.

Most of our readers are aware that, in a lower sphere, Philippians finds its most perfect parallel in the epistle to the Hebrews (For demonstrative evidence of this feature the reader is referred to Volume XX, page 231). In Heb. vi. 1 we have the exhortation: "Therefore leaving . . . . . let us go on." To mind things that are on the earth may therefore have regard to the ignoring of dispensational changes, as, for instance, mixing the things of the kingdom with the things pertaining to the church of the mystery, and this is prominent in the exhortation of Col. iii. 1, 2.

We now observe that the N.T. uses two expressions:

> "Things on the earth" (Ta epi tes ges, Col. iii. 2).
> "Earthly things" (Ta epigeia, Phil. iii. 19).

We have already seen that the phrase used in Col. iii. 2 may refer to good things, such as the future kingdom that is to be on the earth, and that the only evil connected with such "things on the earth" arises from an undispensational use of them. There is the same double meaning attached to this expression, Ta epigeia, as to Ta epi tes ges, that is a thing can be good in its right place or it may be positively, and not merely relatively, evil.

As the phrase occurs seven times, we had better record the references. Two references are found outside of Paul's epistles, the one, in John, being an example of dispensational usage, the other, in James, being an example of positive evil.

> "If I have told you earthly things and ye believe not" (John iii. 12).
> "This wisdom descendeth not from above but is earthly sensual, devilish" (James iii. 15).

The remaining occurrences are found in the epistles to the Corinthians and the Philippians.

> "There are also celestial bodies, and bodies terrestrial: but the glory of the celestial is one; and the glory of the terrestrial is another" (I Cor. xv. 40).

Here the subject is the resurrection body and the two spheres in which the raised believer will enjoy his inheritance. There is nothing evil about the terrestrial body, in fact it has its own peculiar glory.

> "For we know that if the earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God, an home not made with hands, eternal in the heavens" (II Cor. v. 1).

Here the contrast is between the earthly, mortal, state and the heavenly and immortal state (see verse 4).

The remaining references in Philippians are:

> "That at the name of Jesus every knee shall bow, of things in heaven and things in earth" (Phil. ii. 10).
> "Whose end is destruction (or waste) . . . . . who mind earthly things" (Phil. iii. 19).

These references to "mind" in Philippians are focused on Phil. ii. 5 which finds its complement in Col. iii. 2.

Let us consider this reference in Phil. ii. 5.

> "Let this mind be in you, which was also in Christ Jesus."

The verses that follow this exhortation contain some of the most sublime statements that are to be found in Scripture. Yet the passage is primarily introduced to provide an example for the believer to follow!

A superficial objection to the use of the passage as illustrative of what is intended in Col. iii. 1, 2 would be, that the example does not fit the exhortation. The Lord left the heavenly glory and came to earth, whereas we are told to leave earthly things and set our mind on things heavenly. It is true, that on the surface, the two passages appear to move in opposite directions. The same class of criticism would find fault with the examples of

Joseph and Moses given in Heb. xi. 22-26, for Joseph not only remained in Egypt, but sat on the throne and received high honour, whereas Moses refused the riches of Egypt and would not stay in the land. Superficially, therefore, the two examples are not comparable, but basically they are one, for in their different lines of action both men of God were actuated "by faith". In Joseph's day, it was a part of the outworking of the divine plan that a protector should be raised up for Israel who would provide for them an asylum while they grew in numbers preparatory to their entry into the land. Moses, however, was born when the close of that preparatory dispensation was imminent. His office was to lead the prepared people out of Egypt into their inheritance. What therefore was good and fitting for one would, owing to dispensational purposes, be evil for the other. Nevertheless, in spite of the fact that Joseph appears to have been whole-heartedly absorbed with the affairs of Egypt, we have it recorded as his great act of faith that > "He made mention of the departing of the children of Israel; and gave commandment concerning his bones" (Heb. xi. 22).

It is manifest therefore that Joseph, though surrounded with the riches of Egypt, had his mind on the things that belonged to God and His people, and though he apparently denied himself nothing, he as surely esteemed the reproach of Christ greater riches than the treasures of Egypt, as did Moses after him.

The giving up by the Lord of the glory that was His, and His condescension to human form and earthly conditions, was the manifestation of that spirit which, in its turn, will renounce many legitimate pleasures and rights of earthly citizenship, and set its mind on things above.

We have accomplished little more than indicate the importance of the occurrences of "mind" in Philippians as a divine comment on Col. iii. 1, 2. But we write for those who will make these things their own and who do not wish to be deprived of opportunity for independent search. Accordingly we leave the matter there, trusting that out of the study of these passages there will come abundant illumination of the exhortation for those desire it is to "set their mind on things above, not on things on the earth".

#7. "Set your mind on things above" (Col. iii. 2).
The intimate association of the exhortation with race and crown.
pp. 135 - 137

Every part of the great work of Christ is an object of faith and a source of inspiration: His cross, His burial, His resurrection, His ascension, and his session and manifestation in glory. And each of these phases has its own associated doctrine and practice. To attempt enumeration of them here were impossible, nor would it be within the scope of this series, for at the moment we are concerned with those aspects of the faith that are associated with "things above where Christ sitteth". One of these aspects of faith is connected with the race and the crown. This we will consider, looking first at those scriptures that link together the look heavenward with the attainment of reward, prize, or crown.

> "For our light affliction, which is but for a moment, worketh for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory, while we look not at the things which are seen" (II Cor. iv. 17, 18).
>
> "If we hope for that we see not, then do we with patience wait for it" (Rom. viii. 25).
> "Esteeming the reproach of Christ greater riches than the treasures in Egypt: for he had respect unto the recompense of the reward" (Heb. xi. 26).

The word translated "to have respect" is apoblepo. In II Cor. iv. 18 the same word is translated "to look", with the preposition apo, "away from", prefixed. Moses looked away from the things that were upon the earth to the things that belonged to "the invisible" (Heb. xi. 27). The whole of creation is summed up as being either "things visible", or "things invisible", or, as explained in the passage, "things on earth" and "things in heaven". Moses therefore looked away from the earthly to the heavenly, from the visible to the invisible. Abraham, who desired a better country, that is an "heavenly", manifested the same spirit, being content to be a pilgrim and a stranger because of that which, except to the eye of faith was invisible (Heb. xi. 13-16). The knowledge which we gain from Scripture that those who thus act "seek" a heavenly country, helps us to understand how we, too, can "seek" those things which are above, for, while the truth of the mystery is not revealed in the O.T., nor is the calling of Hebrews the same as that of the church of the One Body, the parallels in walk and witness are very real and written for our learning.

In the estimate of faith this invisible and heavenly city had "the foundations" and was alone worthy of the hopes and affections of faith.

In Heb. xii., in connection with the race and the prize, the believer's attention is drawn to the importance of seeking those things which are above, where Christ sitteth:

> "Wherefore seeing we also are compassed with so great a cloud of witnesses, let us lay aside every weight, and the sin that doth so easily beset us, and let us run with patience the race that is set before us, looking unto Jesus, the Author and Finisher of > faith, Who for the joy that was set before Him endured the cross, despising the shame, and is set down at the right hand of the throne of God" (Heb. xii. 1, 2).

Here we have the runner, and the motive of the race that is set before him is parallel with "the joy that was set before Him". Christ is here seen as the "Captain" (Author) and "Perfecter" (Finisher) of "faith" (not of our faith). Over against (anti) the joy that was set before Him, was the cross with its shame which He endures. The word for "looking" in the phrase "looking unto Jesus" is the Greek word aphorao, "to look away from", which brings this important verse into line with those already considered.

It is in connection with the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus, that we have the warning not to follow those who "mind earthly things". In the pursuit of this prize the apostle says, "one thing I do", thus emphasizing the fact that it is not possible while "minding things on the earth" to run for the prize. To do so would be to attempt the simultaneous accomplishment of two incompatible acts. The apostle is also said: "forgetting those things which are behind", which is another way of putting the exhortation, "seek . . . . . set", of Col. iii. 1, 2. The opposite is sadly illustrated in Israel's history, for, instead of forgetting the things left behind in Egypt, they said "We remember", with the result that their carcasses fell in the wilderness, and they became examples of those who, minding earthly things, forfeit the prize. Again, the Apostle said: "I press toward the mark." This is impossible unless the runner sets his mind upon the mark. The whole attitude of the triumphant runner of Phil. iii. is summed up in verse 20:

> "For our conversation is in heaven, from whence also we look for the Saviour."

The word "look" in this passage is apekdechomai, "to expect (from some other place) away from (this one)."

In his last epistle the apostle said that "the crown" was for all those that have loved the appearing. This is in immediate contrast with the attitude of Demas who "loved the age that is now".

We find therefore many illustrations of the meaning of the apostle's exhortation in Col. iii. 1, 2. "Things above" are "things not seen"; things that are heavenly and real, not temporal and passing. Pleasures that are for evermore are contrasted with the pleasures of sin which are transient. Moreover we have seen that there can be no possibility of attaining the goal, finishing the course, receiving a crown, attaining to the prize of the high calling, apart from this faith that "endures as seeing Him Who is invisible".

#8. "Saved by His life" (Rom. v. 10). "Saved by hope" (Rom. viii. 24).

pp. 177 - 180

It is but natural that the sinner seeking forgiveness and deliverance from his bondage, should regard with such importance that phase of salvation which is immediate, that the salvation which is continuous, which is associated with hope and the future, fails to be appreciated at its full value. Yet it is important for the believer's true peace, and for his power to overcome and attain "unto perfection", that that salvation which is associated with the sphere "where Christ sitteth at the right hand of God" should be realized as something which is equally the work of grace and the result of the finished work of Christ.

While there may be no need to quote the verses in Romans that speak of that initial salvation, associated with justification by faith, which is the glory of that great epistle, we feel that there may be need to remind the believer of those other aspects of salvation that are also to be found in Romans.

> "We shall be saved from wrath through Him" (Rom. v. 9).
> "We shall be saved by His life" (Rom. v. 10).
> "We are saved by hope" (Rom. viii. 24).
> "Now is our salvation nearer than when we believed" (Rom. xiii. 11).

These references are in themselves sufficient proof that salvation includes much more than the initial deliverance in which we so greatly rejoice. But if we add to them the intimations found in other epistles, the evidence becomes overwhelming, and the demand upon our attention and faith insistent. Let us look at some of these intimations.

> "For I know that this shall turn to my salvation" (Phil. i. 19).
> "To them an evident token of perdition, but to you of salvation, and that of God. For unto you it is graciously given on the behalf of Christ, not only to believe on Him, but also to suffer for His sake" (Phil. i. 28, 29).
> "For an helmet the hope of salvation, for God hath not appointed us to wrath, but to obtain salvation by our Lord Jesus Christ" (I Thess. v. 8, 9).
> "That they may also obtain salvation which is in Christ Jesus with aionion glory" (II Tim. ii. 10).
> "Unto them that look for Him shall He appear the second time without sin unto salvation" (Heb. ix. 28).

These statements fully establish the fact that salvation is a term that applies not only to the past, but also to the present and the future.

Bearing in mind that in this series of articles we are especially concerned with those doctrines which flow from the present position of Christ seated at the right hand of God, let us look now at Heb. vii. 25. Here we have a passage that has something of supreme importance to say to those who, having been saved out of their spiritual Egypt, would also be saved throughout the wilderness journey until they reach the land of promise.

> "Wherefore He is able to save them to the uttermost that come unto God by Him, seeing He ever liveth to make intercession for them" (Heb. vii. 25).

However much we may stress that in the gospel of grace we have an "uttermost" salvation, the fact remains that this passage is not a gospel text for the unsaved, but a message to the believer. The sinner is saved, not because Christ makes intercession for him, but by His death. Moreover this "salvation" in Heb. vii. is not from the uttermost depths of sin but unto the uttermost—eis to panteles. Most of our readers know that the key-word of Hebrews is "perfect", and that the exhortation is that we should "go on unto perfection" (Heb. vi. 1). The word "perfect" is teleios, which is kindred with telos, "the end". The word panteles in Heb. vii. might almost be translated "all perfection".

In order that the full bearing of Heb. vii. 25 and its association with the perseverance of the believer may be appreciated, we give below some of the occurrences of telos in Hebrews and of teleios and its derivatives.

Telos, the end.

> "If we hold fast the confidence and the rejoicing of the hope firm unto the end" (Heb. iii. 6).
>
> "We desire that every one of you do shew the same diligence to the full assurance of hope unto the end" (Heb. vi. 11).

Teleios, and cognates.

> "Strong meat belongeth to them that are of full age" (Heb. v. 14).
>
> "Let us go on unto perfection" (Heb. vi. 1).
>
> "To make the captain of their salvation perfect through sufferings" (Heb. ii. 10).
>
> "God having provided some better thing for us, that they without us should not be made perfect" (Heb. xi. 40).
>
> "Looking unto Jesus, the Captain and Perfecter of faith" (Heb. xii. 2).

The initial salvation of the believer may be likened to the deliverance of Israel from the bondage of Egypt, effected once and for all by the blood of the Passover Lamb, and never to be rescinded. The Red Sea rolled between the redeemed people and Egypt, remembering the onions and garlic, and though they even suggested that they should find a captain to lead them back to their bondage, their return was never permitted. So also in the case of the believer—he can never undo his salvation, he can never become unredeemed. This salvation rests for ever unmoved upon the finished work of Christ.

Returning to our type, we observe that the redeemed people of Israel did not, as an undivided company, journey triumphantly onwards through the wilderness, across the Jordan, and into the Land of Promise. On the contrary, we read that "with many of them God was not well pleased" and the N.T. is emphatic upon the typical importance of this failure:

"I keep under my body . . . . . lest . . . . . I myself should become disapproved (dokimos). Moreover, brethren, I would not that ye should be ignorant, how that

ALL our fathers were under the cloud, and
ALL passed through the sea; and were
ALL baptized unto Moses in the cloud and in the sea: and did
ALL eat the same spiritual meat; and did
ALL drink the same spiritual drink . . . . . but with MANY of them God was not well pleased: for they were overthrown in the wilderness. Now these things were our examples" (I Cor. ix. 27 - x. 6).

This same point is stressed in the opening of the Epistle to the Hebrews:

> "With whom was He grieved forty years? Was it not with them that had sinned, whose carcasses fell in the wilderness? . . . . . Let us therefore fear, lest, a promise being left us of entering into His rest, any of you should seem to come short of it . . . . . For we have not an High Priest which cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities; but was in all points tempted as we are, apart from sin" (Heb. iii. 17; iv. 1, 15).

We must remember that salvation from sin is not here in view, nor are the temptations here the temptations of the unsaved; on the contrary, they are parallel to the trials of the wilderness. Grace, however, is ever available, and is to be found at the throne of grace, where Christ now sitteth at the right hand of God. This brings us once again to Heb. vii. 2. He is able to save His people "unto the uttermost"—that is to say, in the language of the type, He enables the redeemed Israelite, not only to leave Egypt and cross the Red Sea, but He also enables him to pass through the wilderness, and takes him triumphantly into the Land of Promise. The believer is saved "unto the uttermost" by the living, seated, Intercessor at the right hand of God.

#9. That Blessed Hope.
pp. 218 - 221

In this series of studies we have taken the exhortation of the Apostle, "Seek those things which are above, where Christ sitteth", and looked at it from various angles.

We have sought a scriptural answer to the question, "Where" is it that Christ is described as sitting? We have further sought to understand "Why" He is now seated. Moreover there were lessons of deep importance connected with the fact that the Lord is "at the right hand of God". These also we sought to appreciate. We then observed that "things in heaven" could also be understood by considering their opposites, "things on the earth", and found that, in some cases, not anything intrinsically vicious was indicated by "things on the earth", but things undispensational, things right and good in their own sphere. We also found that there were earthly things that were a snare to the believer, and, in connection with the reference in Phil. iii. to those who "mind earthly things", we obtained light on the word "affection" in Col. iii. The fact that it was almost impossible for any doctrine to be found in Phil. iii. that was not connected with the subject of the race and the prize led on to the thought of the seated Christ as the One Who saves to the uttermost those who, being redeemed, are pressing toward the mark.

This brings us back to Col. iii. for the consideration of one more point, namely, the association of this "seeking" and "setting" with the hope that is before us.

> "For ye are dead, and your life is hid with Christ in God. When Christ, Who is our life shall appear, then shall ye also appear with Him in glory" (Col. iii. 3, 4).

We would here draw attention to one interpretation of this passage which places "the appearing with Him in glory" after the millennial reign of Christ. There are many valid and scriptural objections to such an interpretation, the first being the use of the word "life" in the passage. While it is true that the believer's life is "hid with Christ in God", so that it cannot be enjoyed until the day of manifestation, for Christ Himself is here said to be "our life", the interpretation would shut us up to the impossible position that, while saints of other, and lower, callings had been raised and blessed, the Church of the One Body awaited resurrection life and glory throughout the thousand year reign of Christ! To resort, in order to cover this difficulty, to some undefined intermediate state will not do, for "life" would be needed even if glory were future. The refutation of such an interpretation lies in this passage which places the entry into life and glory at one and the same time: "When . . . . . then."

The word "appear" is the word phaneroo and, together with the variants epiphaneia and epiphaino, is specially used in the epistles of the present dispensation to define the hope of the Church at the peculiar phase of the second advent of Christ that will usher in the consummation of the blessed hope of the Church.

Let us see how the word is used in connection with the hope in other epistles of the same dispensation.

> "That thou keep this commandment without spot, unrebukeable, until the appearing (epiphaneia) of our Lord Jesus Christ, which in His times he shall show, Who is . . . . . King of kings and Lord of lords" (I Tim. vi. 14, 15).

That Christ appears as King of kings before the Millennium, is stated in Rev. xvii. and xix., the Millennium not commencing until chapter xx. is reached.

> "We should live . . . . . looking for that blessed hope, and the appearing (epiphaneia) of the glory of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ" (Titus ii. 12, 13).

This is a reasonable exhortation if at the close of the present dispensation or age this hope is to be realized, but how anyone can "live . . . . . looking" for an event which he knows cannot take place for more than 1000 years is not easy to understand, and such an expectancy certainly does not fit the context in Titus ii.

> "I charge thee therefore before God, and the Lord Jesus Christ, Who shall judge the quick and the dead at His appearing and His kingdom; preach the word" (II Tim. iv. 1,2).

It is clear from this passage that there will be a judgment of "quick and dead" before the Millennium, but "the rest of the dead" will not live again until the thousand years are finished, and these stand before the great white throne. Are we to understand that the "blessed hope" before the church will find its glorious consummation at the great white throne? Assuredly not, and no reader of the Berean Expositor will wish space to be occupied in confuting such a notion.

"His appearing" is identical with "His kingdom", and not a thousand years afterwards.

> "I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith: henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, shall give me at that day; and not to me only, but unto all them also that have loved His appearing" (II Tim. iv. 7, 8).

If the believer of the earlier dispensation of the Acts knew that he would appear before the judgment seat of Christ (which, by all the teaching of Scripture, will be set up before, as the great white throne will be set up after, the Millennium), it is inconceivable that the apostle of the highest calling of all shall be made to wait a thousand years longer than they of I Corinthians or Romans, before he shall receive his crown. These passages are all in line with Col. iii. 3, 4, which speaks of the hope of the Church, and "the manifestation with Him in glory" which is the first moment and movement of what, as a whole, we speak of as "the second coming".

There are three great spheres of blessing, each being marked off from the other by the exclusive word "adoption". There is the earthly sphere, where Israel has the adoption (Rom. ix. 1-9). There is the heavenly phase of the Kingdom, where the seed of Abraham is formed of both Jew and Gentile who have their adoption, and where Jerusalem that is above is the city (Gal. iii. 14, iv. 5) and there is the super-heavenly sphere, where the Church of the Mystery is seated in the heavenlies far above all, where Christ sitteth at the right hand of God; these also have their particular calling, consequently the hope of the Church of Ephesians must be realized where that Church is already "by faith", and that is nowhere else and nowhere lower than "in glory".

There will doubtless occur to the reader many other points of contact that could have been taken up in the consideration of "Things Above"; we have indicated but a few that seem of outstanding importance. We trust that with these, as a start, the reader will find incentive to go more fully into a passage that lies so near the heart of all his hopes. "Things Above" associates doctrine, practice, dispensational truth, hope and prize. These at least we have seen, and, if anything of their fullness shall be appreciated as a result of our studies, may He Who is our Life be abundantly glorified now, even before His glory is manifested, as one day it will be, and we with Him.

Wisdom; Human and Divine.

Being a comparison of the groping after the truth of the ancient philosophers with the truth as it is revealed in Scripture, in order that the believer may the better appreciate the Word of God.

#13. The Sophists.
"Every man did that which was right in his own eyes."
pp. 59 - 61

With the advent of the Sophists, a great change becomes apparent in the world of thought, and a new principle appears. According to this new point of view, which may be called the principle of subjectivity, things are as they seem to us, and universal truth does not exist. The Sophists seized upon the idea of the "flux and change" of all things which was taught by Heraclitus, to challenge and question all reality. They taught that the individual himself determined what should or should not be true, just and good, and the times in which they lived echoed their doctrine. Self-seeking and party-strife were the characteristics of public life. The axiom of Protagoras: "Man is the measure of the universe" led to a state of affairs comparable to the close of the Book of Judges.

> "In those days there was no king in Israel; every man did that which was right in his own eyes" (Judges xxi. 25).

When the Sophists spoke of "man" as the "measure", they were referring to the individual man. As each individual knows only his own sensations, what "seems" good to him "is" good—a doctrine upon which Adam and Eve seem to have acted in the garden of Eden, and which will again be apparent at the close of this age, when, as the Apostle write, "man shall be lovers of their own selves . . . . . lovers of pleasures more than lovers of God" (II Tim. iii. 2-4).

The Sophists were skeptics—an attitude partly justified by the widespread corruption among the people which was the natural outcome of the character attributed to their gods and goddesses and traditional heroes. The Greek Sophists were rather like the French illuminati of the eighteenth century, such as Rousseau and Voltaire, whose teaching led to the great Revolution. Like them, too, they were encyclopædic in range, although their special strength lay more in formal quickness and rhetoric, than in positive knowledge. Hippias boasted that he was always able to say something new on any matter under discussion, and others made it a point to hold serious discourse on the most insignificant objects imaginable. In other words, as the Apostle said of their successors, they were characterized by "a show of wisdom", "words to no profit", and "vain janglings".

PROTOGORAS (B.C.490), the first of the Sophists, was an agnostic rather than an atheist. He begins his book with the words:

> "As for the gods, I am unable to know whether they are, or whether they are not: for there is much that prevents us from knowing these things, as well the obscurity of the subject as the shortness of the life of man."

Having resolved all knowledge down to that which we obtain by the senses, and having made man himself the arbiter of good and evil, the practical outcome could be nothing else than the gratification of the senses. This being granted, and coupled with it the fact that perception and sensation are with countless people countlessly diverse, the result was moral chaos. If "A" said a thing was blue, and "B" that it was green, both were true. According to the Sophists nothing is by nature good or bad; only laws makes them so. And we are at liberty to make as many laws as we wish, according to what will be to our advantage.

In contrast with this, let us think for a moment of the statutes and commandments, the laws and precepts given to Israel. No wonder Moses said:

> "What nation is there so great, that hath statutes and judgments so righteous as all this law, which I set before you this day?" (Deut. iv. 8).

No wonder the Psalmist spoke of his love for the law, and how that it was more to him than fine gold. We are apt to think so much about the condemnation of the law, and the glorious liberty of the gospel, that it is difficult for us to put ourselves in the position of those who lived in the lawless atmosphere created by Sophism.

After Protagoras, the next and most celebrated of the Sophists was GORGIAS (B.C.483). His work bore the characteristic title, "Of the Non-existent, or of Nature". He argued that (1) nothing exists, or (2) if something does exist, it cannot be known, or (3) if it can be known, it cannot be communicated. If the reader wonders what sense there can be in the statement that "nothing exists", Gorgias would have explained in terms of origin. Whatever is assumed to exist, he would have said, must either have originated, or not originated. If it originated, this supposes non-existence previously; if it did not originate, it would not exist now. And so, with a grimace, he would have left you on the horns of a dialetic dilemma. The great omission in the scheme was a personal Creator. In the light of this revealed truth, all such speculations become absurd.

The Sophists that succeeded Gorgias became more audacious. Nothing was sacred to them. Laws, observances, customs, all were destroyed. Might was the law of nature, and unrespecting gratification of desire the natural right of the stronger. Restrictive laws were the cunning invention of the weaker.

Some of our readers will recognize the same spirit here as found expression in the teaching of Nietzsche, a German philosopher of the last century. He acclaimed Darwinism and its doctrine of the "survival of the fittest" as the gospel of eternal struggle and triumph of the strong. He attacked pity, humanitarianism and Christianity, and looked forward to the production of "super-men" who would be free from what he called "slave-morality".

All such doctrines are but anticipations of the appalling lawlessness which will characterize the last days. What is solemn issue for the wisdom of this world. Let us not forget that the wisdom of this world, in its ignorance of the hidden wisdom of God, crucified the Lord of glory (I Cor. ii. 7, 8).

Let us hold fast to the truth revealed for all time in the words of Prov. i. 7:

> "The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom."

#14. Socrates, and Moral Philosophy.
A splendid building, but without sufficient foundation.
pp. 105 - 107

We have frequently reiterated in this series the fact that revealed truth differs essentially from every philosophical system, in that it presents all truth concerning both God and man in a Person. Ears have heard, eyes have seen, hands have handled "the Word of Life". In the history of philosophy the "personal" comes into play for the first time in the teaching of Socrates. His system is essentially a biography. In this, so far as method is concerned, Socrates approached more nearly to the Scriptures than any other uninspired thinker. The Scriptures not only teach the doctrine of justification by faith, for example, but exhibit it in the life story of Abraham (Rom. iv.; James ii., etc.). It was not possible, however, for any merely human being to fill out the measure of truth; this was true of One, and One only—the Son of God.

Socrates was born in B.C.469. His manner of giving instruction was easy and conversational, and employed the things of common life as examples and illustrations. In this respect his teaching was a great contrast to the "show of wisdom" and high-flown rhetoric of the Sophists. Socrates invented the name "philosopher", or "lover of wisdom", in opposition to the vaunting claim of the "Sophists" to be "The Wise".

The "Socratic method"—the method of teaching by skilful questioning—is proverbial. Socrates was uninterruptedly employed in trying to find the "what" of everything. Aristotle says that the two things which constitute the foundation of science, namely the method of induction, and logical definition, were both due to Socrates. He took up the teaching of the Sophists that each man is the judge of what is right and wrong, but showed that every thinking being has the consciousness that what he holds to be right and good, is not merely so to him, but that it is also to every rational being. This led to his great enquiry into what constitutes virtue.

"Virtue", said Socrates, "is knowledge, and vice ignorance". The Sophists regarded self-pleasing as an end in life. Socrates taught that rational satisfaction comes only from conduct which accords with the dictates of reason. All men, he argued, seek happiness, and therefore, since virtue is the only true means of happiness, all men would be virtuous, if they only knew what were right. There is a mixture of truth and error in this teaching that is sad. Socrates meant so well, but, alas, he did not allow for the fact that man is fallen, and that reason itself is not necessarily obeyed. However, Socrates was more correct than some have thought when he put together ignorance and vice, and knowledge and virtue. He saw clearly the leaves, the flowers, the fruit that should grow upon the tree, but he failed, as all unaided reason must, to discover the one and only root-hold. Peter, the inspired fisherman, could have taught him that virtue and knowledge and piety are only possible after a mighty change, and the partaking of a new life and power.

> "According as His DIVINE POWER hath given unto us all things that pertain unto life and godliness, through the knowledge of Him that hath called us to glory and virtue" (II Pet. i. 3).

How Socrates would have embraced this revelation no one but the Judge of the secrets of men knows, but on the surface it would seem to provide the "one thing needful".

> "Whereby are given unto us exceeding great and precious promises; that by these ye might be partakers of the DIVINE NATURE, having escaped the corruption that is in the world through lust" (II Pet. i. 4).

Here is a divine power, and a divine nature, both growing out of what the Apostle refers to in the opening verse of the epistle: "Like precious faith with us, through the righteousness of our God and Saviour Jesus Christ" (II Pet. i. 1). This is indeed the root of all virtue. Having this foundation Peter can go forward with confidence, where Socrates had to limp and halt. "And beside this, giving all diligence, add to your faith virtue; and to virtue knowledge" (II Pet. i. 5). Knowledge and virtue are certainly associated here, but they are "added", and this presupposes a foundation already laid, the foundation of "faith". Peter could say: "Add to your faith virtue, and to virtue knowledge." Socrates could only point out that virtue is knowledge, without being able to provide the one or the other.

That vice and ignorance go hand in hand is common knowledge. Speaking of the Gentiles, the Apostle writes:

> "Having the understanding darkened, being alienated from the LIFE OF GOD through the ignorance that is in them" (Eph. iv. 18).

What Socrates did not know was that ignorance not merely beclouds the reason but alienates from the very "life of God". Again and again we come back to the one great difference between Philosophy and Revelation—the emphasis upon a Person. Peter speaks of "the Divine nature"; Paul speaks of "the life of God", and "the truth in Jesus" (Eph. iv. 21).

Socrates held that no one is willingly wicked. The statement is too sweeping, but it contains an element of truth. Men have always attempted to justify their deeds. There are very few who set out to do wrong, knowing it to be wrong. In most cases an attempt is made to colour the action so that it may appear right. As a particular instance, let the reader consider the reasons given by any nation to justify the declaration of war. Is there on record a single public statement which reads: "We know that our action is prompted by avarice, but we are strong enough to win and that is all that matters?" Nothing but true repentance brings a man to say:

> "I will arise and go to my father and will say unto him, Father, I have sinned against heaven and before thee, and am no more worthy to be called thy son."

Volumes have been written about Socrates, the man, his message, and his method. It would, however, be quite outside the scope of these articles to attempt to deal with our subject in detail. The details of his philosophy and all that led up to the bowl of hemlock that terminated his life we must leave for the interested reader to look up for himself.

Socrates laid the foundation of moral philosophy and died at the end for the doctrine he held. But neither his teaching nor his death could bring life. Nothing less than the death of the Founder of our faith could make a philosophy of morals anything more than an excellent system of teaching beyond the possibility of practical attainment. As Peter teaches us, we may "add to our faith virtue", but this is not possible until we are Divinely empowered, and made partakers of the Divine nature. In other words, virtue is knowledge, but only if that knowledge is the knowledge of Christ.

> "Grow in grace, and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ" (II Pet. iii. 18).

#15. The successors of Socrates, and their failure.
pp. 145 - 148

Socrates founded no school, but left behind the memory of a life that had in some measure exemplified his aim and teaching. As was to be expected, therefore, different men interpreted his life and teaching in various ways, according to their own temperaments and predilections. Three different systems have become historical, the school of the Cynics, the Cyrenaic school, and the Megaric school, represented respectively by Antisthenes, Aristippus, and Euclid* (* - not to be confused with the mathematician of the same name). All these schools, however, were too one-sided in their presentation of the original teaching of Socrates.

Antisthenes, and the Cynics.—The name of this school of philosophy has become a normal English word describing any one who is misanthropic and inclined to sneer at the sincerity or goodness of others. Socrates, with a healthy humanity, despised the soft, the luxurious, and the effeminate, but Antisthenes caricatured his master instead of following him, living coarsely, and dressing in rough and ragged clothing. Socrates, however, made it plain that such a manner of living was not a true interpretation of his doctrine for he said on one occasion to Antisthenes: "I see thy vanity, Antisthenes, peering through the holes of thy cloak." This saying seems to approach the truth to be found in the Sermon on the Mount:

> "When ye fast, be not as the hypocrites, of a sad countenance: for they disfigure their faces, that they may appear unto men to fast. Verily, I say unto you, They have their reward" (Matt. vi. 16).

The Apostle, in writing to the Colossians, speaks in a similar way of the ineffectiveness of "neglecting the body" (Col. ii. 23).

It may be asked by some of our readers how it was possible that Cynicism could have been the outcome of the teaching of Socrates. The answer is that Antisthenes, like Socrates, taught that virtue was the only thing worthy of human effort, but he misinterpreted his master by making virtue consists merely in the negation of desire—the avoidance of evil, indifference to marriage, to one's family, to riches, to honour, and to enjoyment. It was against this vain deceitful philosophy that the Apostle warned the Colossian. He says in effect:

> Beware of that specious sanctity, that is the result of mere negations, such as Touch not, Taste not, Handle not.

Cynicism will be one of the characteristics of the close of the age, as well as lawlessness and skepticism as we have already seen:

> "Forbidding to marry, and commanding to abstain from meats, which God hath created to be received with thanksgiving of them which believe and know the truth" (I Tim. iv. 3).

In I Tim. vi. we read:

> "The living God, Who giveth us all things richly to enjoy" (I Tim. vi. 17).

The words "richly to enjoy" would have been like a red rag to a bull in the sight of Antisthenes, but he who "trusts in the living God" has no need to dress in rags to show his crucifixion to the world.

Cynicism as it advanced expressed a greater contempt for propriety and decency. We will not, however, deal with the unmannerly doings and sayings of Diogenes, but turn to the second school, namely, the Cyrenaic.

Socrates had taught that virtue and happiness together constituted the highest human end, but had not based this view upon any actual moral law, other than the teaching that true happiness was to be found only in the path of virtue. Aristippus, the founder of the Cyrenaic school, seized upon this loosely defined happiness, and made it the criterion of what constituted virtue. Pronouncing pleasure as the ultimate good of life, and going probably to an even greater extreme because of the attitude of the Cynics to innocent pleasure, his teaching degenerated into the mere enjoyment of bodily pleasure and sensation. Accordingly all moral limitations were to be disregarded, since they limited pleasure; and nothing was wicked, shameful, or godless, if it procured it. He did advocate justice, since injustice does not pay and so does not lead to happiness; and he did counsel self-control, but, failing to take into account the sinful nature of man, his teaching could lead to nothing better than irresponsible lawlessness.

The third school was founded by Euclid, who taught that in true Being was found the one Good, and that evil was non-existent. None of these men rightly understood the teaching of Socrates; this was reserved for Plato.

The idea of making "pleasure" a criterion of virtue goes back to the time of Adam:

> "And when the woman saw that the tree was good for food, and that it was pleasant to the eye . . . . ." (Gen. iii. 6).

Centuries before the birth of Socrates Ecclesiastes tells us that he had experimented along these same lines:

> "I said in mine heart, Go to now, I will prove thee with mirth, therefore enjoy pleasure: and, behold, this also is vanity" (Eccles. ii. 1).

He tells us that he set out on this quest "till I might see what was that good for the sons of men" (Eccles. ii. 3). Accordingly he pursued pleasure, great works, houses, gardens, possessions, "the peculiar treasure of kings", music and art—"and whatsoever mine eyes desired I kept not from them, I withheld not my heart from any joy" (Eccles. ii. 10). Yet his solemn verdict is that all is vanity. Ecclesiastes saw what none of these philosophers seems to have weighed sufficiently, that "the one event" that happens to all robs all earthly pleasure of any true value.

As we pursue the teaching of the book of Ecclesiastes, our eyes are directed onward and upward. The key to the problem lies "there", not "here" (Eccles. iii. 17; v. 8; vii. 18; xii. 13, 14). The Cynic denied all pleasure. The Cyrenaic endorsed it strongly. Ecclesiastes does neither. He sets aside pleasure in chapter ii., but commends it in viii. 15; iii. 12; v. 18; and ix. 7-10. A patient balancing of his findings will, however, show that there is no contradiction. In most chapters "the one event" is in view, and when that is kept in mind, and the world and its ways seen in their true perspective, the innocent pleasures of life are commended.* (* - The interested reader will find a fuller exposition of these points in the series of articles on Ecclesiastes, published in Volumes X-XIII).

Socrates lived out, in measure, his own doctrine, and died a martyr's death; but he was a sinful man and needed a Saviour. His life and death could be nothing more than an example. They could neither bring deliverance from sin, nor give the blessed assurance of victory over the grave. How far Socrates "felt after" the Lord, we cannot say. Happily all judgment has been committed into the hands of Him who knew what Tyre and Sidon, and Sodom and Gomorrha would have done in more favourable circumstances (Matt. xi. 20-24), and we gladly leave Socrates and all such in His hands. For ourselves, can we ever be too grateful for One Who taught the Truth, Who lived and died for the Truth, and Who by His life and death delivers us from sin, places our feet in the path of virtue, enables us to deny ourselves without cynicism, and to look forward to pleasures at the right hand of God that are for evermore?

#16. Plato, the Idealist.
pp. 189, 190

The zenith of human wisdom is reached in the labours of Plato. Plato's philosophy was founded upon the teaching of Socrates, and his celebrated theory of ideas may be regarded as an attempt to mediate between the two systems of Heraclitus and Parmenides. What was but dimly seen and uncertainly expressed by the master—Socrates, is unfolded and systemized by his disciple. It needed, however, two exponents to give the teaching of Socrates completeness, Plato giving us "idea", and Aristotle "form"—the former being the idealist, and the latter the realist. Plato subjected all previous philosophies to the searching Socratic method of question and answer.

To attempt an outline of Plato's teaching is entirely beyond our ability, time or purpose. In this series of articles we are simply attempting to sketch out as far as possible the history of human wisdom between the close of the O.T. and the birth of Christ, in order to quicken the reader's appreciation of the gift of God, the written and the living Word.

The principle of "right division", which governs all our study of Scripture, is not only a spiritual principle, but obtains also in things which are mental or physical. "Right division" is the rule of all study, all administration, all science; without it we have confusion instead of clarity. Plato speaks of dialectic or logic as the "science of duly conducting discourse, and duly joining or disjoining the genera of things". The word "genus" (plural of genera) indicates a class or kind which includes species having certain attributes in common. Thus the word "dog" represents a genus, whereas "terrier" and "spaniel" stand for particular species—which, while possessing certain characteristic differences, are nevertheless allied, and belong to one class or genus. If we were as wise as Plato, or if we simply heeded the instruction of II Tim. ii. 15, we should keep "Kingdom" and "Church" distinct. We should "rightly divide the Word of Truth", and so not only avoid confusion, but widen and deepen our understanding.

There are many features about "The Good" that it was Plato's life work to discover, that approach to the idea of "God", but his idealism would lead away to "Being" rather than to "the Living God". He did not find the "personal God", for He can only be found "in Christ".

The doctrine of the immortality of the soul which Plato taught, has displaced or modified the teaching of Scripture in the case of many believers, and in most denominations. Plato had no revealed statement concerning the nature of the soul, or the difference between soul and spirit. He knew nothing of resurrection, either as a doctrine, or as a blessed fact of history. He did not know the One Who could say: "I am the Resurrection and the Life." He knew nothing of John iii. 16. Christians, however, have had all these advantages, and are truly culpable if they follow the teaching of Plato, and despise the revelation of God.

Morality, in the teaching of Plato, is generally more a matter of the head than of the heart, but it is not merely abstract, as a study of his "Republic" will show. He would have Reason in supreme control, with the heart fortified by courage, and so enabled to choose aright, to resist evil, and if needs be to endure pain, with temperance regulating the appetite, and the whole bound and related by justice. This is a good ideal, but man by nature is under the dominion of sin, and abstract reason cannot control him, nor can he find strength to resist evil and follow good. While Plato's statements may be faultless, they are fruitless, because they are powerless. Man needs a Redeemer, and he needs newness of life, before he can serve in newness of spirit. The failure of the Jew in a more perfect state than Plato's republic, and under a more perfect law than Plato's ethics, is a warning for all time.

We make no apology for the very sparse account we offer of this great philosopher. The very fullness of his teaching renders any such account as this hopelessly inadequate. If we were to deal with one point only and explain what is meant by the "idea" in the Platonic system, it would mean several books, with explanations of terms at every point. Let it suffice that we have not left his labours unrecorded, and that we have no need to spend years of study before we can arrive at the abstract "Good", which was Plato's Ultimate. Let it suffice that we have found all our "Good", and all our "Goal", as we have found all our wisdom, courage and control, in a living Head, Jesus Christ our Lord.

#17. Aristotle, the Realist.

pp. 233 - 235

If Plato is the idealist in the Socratic school, Aristotle is the realist. While Plato is literary, Aristotle is scientific and his knowledge encyclopædic. It is not easy to subdivide Aristotle's teaching into sections, but roughly we may say that it falls into three groups, represented by logic, physics, and ethics or morals.

In B.C.343 Aristotle was called to Macedonia by Philip to undertake the education of his son, then a boy of fourteen. This son was afterwards to be known as Alexander the Great, and is referred to by Daniel the prophet.

Aristotle's Organon is the basis upon which his fame as the inventor of deductive logic rests, and it was as a rival to this that Bacon wrote his Novum Organon, thus earning the title of the inventor of inductive logic* (* - See "The Syllogism" in the Series: "With all thy getting, get understanding", Volume XXIII, page 129). In ethics, Aristotle opposed the doctrine of the Stoics, arguing that we cannot be indifferent to external goods, or to environment generally. He taught that the true maxim was not negation but subordination.

Aristotle differed from Plato with regard to the immortality of the soul, and approached more closely to the teaching of the Scriptures. Schwegeler's history contains the following summary:

> "The soul is related to the body as form to matter; it is the animating principle. Simply for this reason the soul cannot be thought of without the body: neither can it exist by itself, and with the body it ceases to be."

To appreciate this statement, we must know something of Aristotle's four principles or causes, and the relation of matter to form. Aristotle lays down four principles: the formal, the material, the efficient, and the final. For example, in the case of a house, the building materials are the matter, the idea of the house is the form, the efficient cause is the builder, and the actual house itself the final cause.

Moreover, Aristotle makes a distinction between the "soul" and the "spirit". He speaks of the nous, the "mind", as being essentially different from the "soul", and unrelated to the lower faculties. "It comes, as being no result of lower processes, from elsewhere into the body, and is equally again separable from it." With which we may compare the words of Ecclesiastes:

> "Then shall the dust return to the earth as it was, and the spirit shall return unto God Who gave it" (Eccles. xii. 7).

The summun bonum, or "chief good", according to Aristotle, is happiness, but his happiness is not only a well-being but a well-doing. His definition of happiness is a "perfect activity in a perfect life".

With this we may compare the words of the Apostle in Romans:

> "The earnest expectation of the creature waiteth for the manifestation of the sons of God . . . . . because the creature itself also shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption into the liberty of the glory of the children of God" (Rom. viii. 19-21).

Aristotle felt the burden, and shared the groan of a creation subject to vanity. He realized also that perfect happiness demands perfect liberty, but he did not know the One by Whom this groan shall one day be hushed, and Who even now gives to His believing people the "spirit of adoption" as the glorious pledge of that future "redemption of the body", in which perfect happiness will be realized in a perfect life.

Virtue, according to Aristotle, is the result of frequently repeated moral action; it is a quality won through exercise. We may compare this with the Apostle's words in Heb. v. 14, where he speaks of those who are "of full age, even those who, by reason of use, have their senses exercised to discern both good and evil".

It is of course quite impossible in these pages to give any adequate idea of the breadth and wealth of Aristotle's teaching. And yet, with all his wisdom, and with all that he has contributed to the world of thought and research, he did not reach the position attained by the poor unlettered beggar who had seen the Lord and could say: "One thing I know, that, whereas I was blind, now I see."

There is one thing that is conspicuously absent from the writings of most of these wise men of the earth, and that is the sense of sin. This sense is aroused by the preaching or the reading of the Scriptures, and sends the self-confessed sinner on the quest, not for happiness merely, but for forgiveness and reconciliation, for peace with God and life. Until these things are ours, the matters that occupied the attention of these men of old are but trifles. Important though they may be in themselves, they will take no one beyond the grave, and if there is one lesson we have learnt from Ecclesiastes it is surely that of the paramount importance of the "life to come".

> "Granted that there is a life beyond the grave, then though wickedness may sit in the place of judgment (Eccles. iii. 16), and though many inequalities and perplexing mysteries of providence may still baffle us (Eccles. vii. 15; viii. 14, 17), though the race is not to the swift, nor the battle to the strong, but all have to reckon with time and chance, yet the conclusion of the matter sets all right. It will be our wisdom to fear God and keep His commandments, for a day of judgment is coming, and if a day of judgment, then a day when the crooked shall be made straight, the inequalities made equal, a day of LIFE from the dead, where vanity and vexation of spirit shall never more intrude, for death and Hades shall be destroyed in the second death, and God shall solve all life's mysteries in the LIFE TO COME" (Extract from Volume X, page 168).

Words of Comfort.

#3. "Manifold temptations" and "Manifold grace" (I Pet. i. 6 and iv. 10).

pp. 225, 226

We have already seen in Volume XXVII, that the afflictions of the redeemed are (1) for a season, and (2) for a reason. Reading on now in I Pet. i. 6 we come to the word "manifold".

> "Though now for a season, if need be, ye are in heaviness through manifold temptations" (I Pet. i. 6).

It might be thought that it would be impossible to extract any comfort from the fact that temptations are "manifold"; their very variety would seem to make the attack worse. There are, however, at least two reasons for regarding the word in this light.

The first is the Scriptural statement in James i. 2:

> "My brethren, count it all joy when ye fall into divers temptations."

The second is the fact that suffering associates us with Christ. The word which is translated "to be in heaviness" in I Pet. i. 6, is used by the Apostle in ii. 19, where it is translated "grief":

> "For this is thankworthy, if a man for conscience toward God, endure grief, suffering wrongfully" (I Pet. ii. 19).

The context goes on to show that this constitutes a part of our calling—"For even hereunto were ye called"—and that Christ has left us an example with regard to suffering:

> "Because Christ also suffered for us, leaving us an example, that ye should follow His steps."

We have, therefore, two good reasons for patient endurance:

(1) The fact that Scripture says we are to count it all joy.
(2) The fact that Christ has left us an example of enduring grief patiently.

These of themselves should minister comfort, but the Lord has done more than this. He has condescended to explain as well as to enjoin.

James not only tells us to "count it all joy", but continues:

> "Knowing this, that the trying of your faith worketh patience. But let patience have her perfect work, that ye may be perfect and entire, wanting nothing" (James i. 3).

Instead, therefore, of looking upon trial as so much waste of valuable time, we are taught to realize that it accomplishes an important work and that nothing less than our perfecting.

Before we consider this important fact, let us return to I Pet. i. 6, and its "manifold" temptations. The Greek word translated "manifold" is poikilos, rendered "divers" in James i. 2, already quoted. The word is also found in the LXX version of Gen. xxx. 39, where our version reads "straked", and in xxxvii. 3, where it describes the "coat of many colours" made for Joseph. It is found also in Ezek. xvi. 10 as "broidered work". The meaning of the word poikillo was expanded to include not only the variegated work of "art" (the Poecile was the picture gallery at Athens) but also of "artfulness"; not only a design in the innocent sense, but a "design" in the evil sense. The Lexicon gives: "To variegate, diversify; to change, alter; to paint, embroider; to adorn, arrange; to feign, counterfeit, dissemble, deceived."

Temptation and trial are as variegated as life itself. To one, temptation may come with brute force; to another with cunning craftiness. To one, Satan may come as a "roaring lion"; to another as "an angel of light". How comforting, therefore, for the harassed saint to realize that, however, varied the trial may be, there is varied, manifold grace to meet it:

> "As every man has received the gift, even so minister the same one to another, as good stewards of the manifold grace of God" (I Pet. iv. 10).

No trial or temptation can ever be devised that can possibly outmatch the all-sufficiency of manifold grace. If we need strength, grace can make us strong. If we need wisdom, grace can make us wise. Whether the temptations come from the world or from the flesh, there is manifold grace to enable us to conquer. It is true, of course, that this grace is ours only because of the finished work of Christ. For the moment, however, we are not considering this fundamental aspect, but simply the glorious fact that "manifold temptations" are perfectly matched by "manifold grace".

Weekly Bible Readings for January, 1938.
Subject: The Scriptures.

(The notes are for the guidance of those superintending the Young People's reading).

p. 20

January 2nd. John v. 24-47. "SCRIPTURES TESTIFIES OF CHRIST."	Verse 39 can be read: "Ye search the Scriptures . . . . . ye will not come to Me." The great purpose of the Scriptures is to testify of Christ (verses 46 and 47). Explain evil of Modernism in its relation to Moses.
January 9th. Psalm xii. "THE WORDS OF THE LORD."	Note man's words (2); their end (3). God's words (6); their end (7). "Keep them" may refer to the Word, and not to men. Read verse 6: Words of earth, yes, but purified seven times
January 16th. Romans i. 1-17. "AS IT IS WRITTEN."	"Promised afore" (2); see Rom. iii. 21; iv. 3. One special quotation from Hab. ii. 4 is given in verse 17. Point out Paul's use of this in Gal. iii. 11 and Heb. x. 38).
January 23rd. Matthew ii. "THAT IT MIGHT BE FULFILLED."	Readiness of scribes to quote scripture (5 and 6), but they did not go to see. "Fulfilled" 15, 17, 23. Verse 15 reads literally, "by the Lord, through the prophet."
January 30th. Psalm cxix. 25-32. "I HAVE STUCK UNTO THY TESTIMONIES."	Like the Psalmist make God's Word your choice (30); lay his judgments before you (30), and stick to His testimonies (31). You will not then be put to shame.

Verses to memorize (one each week):
John v. 46; Psa. xii. 6; Rom. i. 16, 17; Matt. ii. 6; Psalm cxix. 30, 31.

Answers will be gladly received from young people of any age. Name, address and age to be written upon each paper, and sent monthly to "Win", "Shalom", Main Road, Hutton, Essex.

John v. 24-47-- (1) What must we do—as well as search the Scriptures—to have eternal life?
(2) Why must the Jews have believed Christ if they really believed Moses?

Psalm xii.-- (1) Say in your own words what God's words are likened to in this Psalm?
(2) How do man's words contrast with God's words?
See "speak" in verses 2 and 3.

Romans i. 1-17-- (1) Give two other verses from the N.T. to show that the gospel is "according to the Scriptures".
(2) Find a verse in Rom. x. that joins "faith" with "hearing" the word of God.

Matthew ii.-- (1) What four things spoken by the prophet are fulfilled in Matt. ii.?
(2) How did the prophets know beforehand?

Psalm cxix. 25-32.-- (1) How many different names for the word of God can you find in these verses?
(2) "Stuck" means "Holdfast". Find a N.T. parallel.

Weekly Bible Readings for February, 1938.
Subject: Salvation.

February 6th. I Timothy i. 1-16. "To save sinners."	God is "Saviour" (1); The law made for "sinners" (9), to condemn them. Christ Jesus came into the world to save "sinners". The word "chief" here means "first". Paul was the first of a new company. See verse 16: "In me as a first one."
February 13th. Psalm xxiv. "The Lord heard and saved."	Verse 4: "Sought, heard, delivered." Verse 5: "Looked, lightened, not ashamed." Verse 6: "Cried, heard, saved." Note references to "deliver" (verses 4, 7, 17, 19) and to "save" (verses 6, 18).
February 20th. Ephesians ii. 1-10. "Saved by grace."	Contrast "time past" of verses 2 and 3 with "Now" of verse 4. The word "that" in verse 8 must not be made to refer to faith, but to the whole plan of salvation. "Not of works" but "unto good works".
February 27th. I Corinthian i. 1-24. "It pleased God . . . . . to save them that believe."	The emphasis is upon the cross. "Was Paul crucified for you? (13). "Preach the gospel . . . . . preaching of the cross . . . . . foolishness of the preaching . . . . . we preach Christ crucified" (17, 18, 21, 22).

Verses to memorize (one each week):
I Tim. i. 15; Psa. xxxiv. 6; Eph. ii. 8; I Cor. i. 23, 24.

"Search and See" Section.

I Tim. i. 1-16-- (1) Why did Christ come into the world?
Could not the law have done this? If not, why?
(2) Can you find any other "Faithful sayings"? If so write one out.

Psalm xxxiv.-- (1) In verses 4, 5, 7 and 22 are other words that mean "saved":
Can you write them down?
(2) What do verses 13 and 14 teach the saved to do?

Eph. ii. 1-10-- (1) In verses 8 and 9 we are saved "by" . . . . . saved "through" . . . . . and saved "not of" . . . . . Fill in the spaces.
(2) In verse 9 we read "Not of works" and in verse 10 we read "Unto good works". Can you explain these expressions?

I Cor. i. 1-24.-- (1) In verses 18, 21 and 23 the preaching of the cross is called "Foolishness". What does verse 25 say?
(2) Can you find a verse in the N.T. that explains why the cross was necessary or what it did, or what it stands for. You may find help under the word "tree".

Weekly Bible Readings for March, 1938.
Subject: Sin.

March 6th. Rom. iii. 9-26. "ALL HAVE SINNED."	Israel had many advantages (1, 2), but so far as sin is concerned they were "no better" than others. "All under sin" (9); "All the world guilty" (19); "None righteous, no not one" (10); "No difference" (22). Illustrate "come short" (23) by Judges xx. 16.
March 13th. I John i. - ii. 2. "IF WE SAY . . . . . NO SIN . . . . . NOT SINNED."	Believers though saved still need cleansing from all sin, and we lie if we say we have no sin or have not sinned. At the same time, this epistle is written "that ye sin not" (ii. 1).
March 20th. Isaiah liii. "ASTRAY . . . . . OWN WAY . . . . . INIQUITY."	Note the words used to describe sin. "Transgressions", "iniquities" (5). "Our own way" is said to be "astray" (6). Note "He"—"our" (5). Griefs and sorrows, oppressed and afflicted, prison and grave. All speak of sin.
March 27th. Luke xv. 11-32. "I HAVE SINNED AGAINST HEAVEN."	Note "wasted", "want", "not worthy". Sin separates from God ("Far country"). Sin makes us unclean ("The swine"). Sin ends in death ("I perish"). Sin is not only against ourselves (17) and against our fellows, but against God (18).

"Search and See" Section.

Rom. iii. 9-26—
(1) "All", "None". How are these words used in Rom. iii. to prove that every one is a sinner?
(2) In verse 22 we have the words "No difference".
Find these two words in Rom. x. and show their connection.

I John i. - ii. 2-- (1) We are redeemed by the blood of Christ.
What does verse 7 say that the blood of Christ does also?
(2) In verses 6 & 8 we read: "If we say." What does God require in verses 7 & 9?
(3) Can you explain how God is "Faithful and Just to forgive us our sins"?

Isaiah liii.-- (1) What is said about "Our" in verses 4 and 5?
(2) In verses 5, 6and 11 we read of "Iniquity". What did the Lord do with our iniquity?
(3) Give one N.T. reference to Isa. liii.

Luke xv. 11-32—
(1) Write the verses which teach that sin separates from God, sin makes unclean, and sin ends in death.
(2) Can you explain how the prodigal not only sinned against his father, but against "heaven"?

Verses to memorize (one each week):
Rom. iii. 19; I John i. 8; Isa. liii. 6; Luke xv. 18.

Weekly Bible Readings for April, 1938.
Subject: "Access."
p. 84

April 3rd. Romans v. 1-11. "ACCESS BY FAITH."	Note the order in verses 1 and 2: "Being . . . . . we have . . . . . we have." Basis of all is justification. Peace and access are two aspects of reconciliation (10) and (11, margin). Access—No shut door now.
April 10th. Hebrews ix. 1-14 "THE WAY . . . . . NOT MANIFEST."	Before Christ came, the tabernacle services only partially foreshadowed the believer's privilege. The High Priest "alone . . . . .once". The way unto the holiest was not made manifest . . . . . typical sacrifices never touched the conscience (8, 9).
April 17th. Hebrews x. 1-24. "BOLDNESS TO ENTER."	Note the change from Heb. ix. Conscience is touched (2, 22); the one true sacrifice has been offered (12). The way is "new and living". It is "through the veil". Access is ours; we may "draw near".
April 24th. Ephesians ii. 11-22. "ACCESS . . . . . UNTO THE FATHER."	In Heb. x. we have removal of the veil. In Eph. ii. we have the breaking down of the middle wall. Describe the approach to the temple, and the distinction made between Jew and Gentile. For particulars see Volume X, pages 13 and 179, and large illustration, Testimony of the Lord's Prisoner, page 69.

"Search and See" Section.

Rom. v. 1-11-- (1) Access follows two things mentioned in verse 1. What are they?
(2) If access means a way into the presence of God, can you find a passage of Scripture that shows that sin banishes from the presence of God?

Heb. ix. 1-14-- (1) The high priest went "alone". Find some verses in the N.T. that tell us that the believer will be "with" Christ in glory.
(2) In verse 9 a word is used to show the failure of the O.T. type. The same word is used in verse 14 to show the reality of the work of Christ. What is the word and what does it mean?

Heb. x. 1-24-- (1) What does this passage say about the "conscience"?
(2) Write out the verses which contain the words "No more".
(3) "Through the veil"—What happened at the death of Christ? See Matt. xxvii. 50, 51.

Eph. ii. 11-22-- (1) What was the middle wall of partition?
(2) To Whom have we access now?
(3) Explain what is meant by the words "but now" in verse 13.

Verses to memorize (one each week):
Rom. v. 1, 2; Heb. ix. 8; Heb. x. 19; Eph. ii. 18.

Weekly Bible Readings for May, 1938.
Subject: "Hope."
p. 104

May 1st. Colossians i. 1-23. "THE HOPE LAID UP IN HEAVEN."	Note association of hope with gospel in verses 5 & 23. Faith looks back to a finished work. Love covers the whole life. Hope looks forward to the coming glory (Col. i. 4, 5).
May 8th. Titus ii. 1-15. "THAT BLESSED HOPE."	Note two "appearings" (11, 13). Glorious appearing is literally "The appearing of the glory". The simple sentence is: "The grace of God that bringeth salvation . . . . . teaches us that . . . . . we should live . . . . . looking."
May 15th. Ephesians i. 15-23. "THE HOPE OF HIS CALLING."	The threefold revelation of Eph. i. 3-14, viz., the Will of the Father, the Work of the Son, the Witness of the Spirit, is followed by a threefold prayer. The first item is "What is the hope of His calling" (see also Eph. iv. 4).
May 22nd. I Peter i. 1-25. "A LIVELY HOPE."	This epistle speaks of the hope of the remnant of Israel, but in essentials is true for all. Hope is "living", therefore those who entertain it are "begotten". Further, all is "by the resurrection of Jesus Christ", for there is no hope apart from resurrection (verses 21-23).
May 29th. Psalm cxix. 49-56. "HOPE AND THE WORD."	Hope must be connected with the expectation that some promise will be fulfilled. Hope cannot stand by itself. Here it rests upon the "Word"

"Search and See" Section.

Col. i. 1-23-- (1) Find two other passages of Scripture where "Faith, hope and love" come together (4, 5).
(2) What is the hope? (23). Where is it laid up? How do we "hear" about it (5, 23).

Titus ii. 1-15-- (1) What is "the blessed hope"? (13).
(2) He will purify (14). What does verse 12 say about the present?
(3) What should be our attitude to this hope? (12, 13).

Eph. v. 15-23-- (1) Find another reference in Eph. iv. to the hope of the calling.
(2) Can you explain why "hope" and "calling" go together?
(3) Can you say why the apostle said "one" hope of your calling? (iv. 4).

I Pet. i. 1-25-- (1) What other words beside "lively" are used in this chapter to teach that this hope is connected with a new life?
(2) Do faith, hope and love come together in this chapter? Write the verses.
(3) The hope is defined in verses 7, 11 and 13: What is it?

Psalm cxix. 49-56-- (1) Explain how "hope" is connected with "the Word".
(2) Read Rom. iv. 17, 18 and say whether Abraham's hope rested upon "the Word".

Verses to memorize (one each week):

Weekly Bible Readings for June, 1938.
Subject: "Jesus."
p. 124

June 5th. Ephesians iv. 17-32. "AS THE TRUTH IS IN JESUS."	The name "Jesus" is rare in Paul's epistles. Special reason for its inclusion should be sought. Here it is the "new man" that is in question. At the end of verse 24 read: "and holiness of the truth"—the subject is "the truth".
June 12th. Philippians ii. 1-24. "THE NAME OF JESUS."	Observe the wonderful descent (6-8) and ascent (9-11) of the Saviour. He Who is "Jesus" has been given "The name", i.e., "Lord". It is our privilege to know Him as Lord now. Teach the young believer to give the Lord His title.
June 19th. I Thessalonians iv. 9-18. "THEM WHICH SLEEP IN JESUS."	The apostle speaks of the believer who has died as "asleep in Jesus". "Bring with Him" means "bring back from the dead".
June 26th. Hebrews ii. 1-18. "WE SEE JESUS."	Angels once ruled, but angels are not to rule in the world to come. Adam was made a little lower than angels, but failed. "We see Jesus", the Second Man and the last Adam, triumphing.

Eph. iv. 17-32-- (1) What is the meaning of the name "Jesus"?
(2) What is said to be "in Jesus"?
(3) How should we act if we also are "in" Him? (22, 24).

Phil. ii. 1-24-- (1) What title will all give to "Jesus" by and by?
(2) Should we call Him "Jesus" when we speak of him now?
(3) What are dome of the titles that we should use?

I Thess. iv. 9-18-- (1) How else are those that "sleep in Jesus" called? (16).
(2) "Jesus" is used twice: another title is used five times in verses 14-17. What is it?

Heb. ii. 1-18-- (1) Look at Psa. viii. 6-8, and Heb. ii. 7, 8. What difference do you find?
(2) Adam was "crowned with glory and honour: (Psa. viii. 5):
In what way was Jesus crowned in this passage? (Heb. ii. 1-18).

Eph. iv. 20, 21; Phil. ii. 10; I Thess. iv. 14; Heb. ii. 9.

Weekly Bible Readings for July, 1938.
Subject: "Believing."
p. 144

July 3rd. John iii. 14-36. "BELIEVETH . . . . . HATH."	Note, in 15, 16, 17, 18 and 36, we have set before us the alternatives: "Believe" and "Believe not"; "Life", "Perish"; "Not Condemned", "Condemned"; "Saved", Wrath".
July 10th. Romans i. 1-17. "POWER . . . BELIEVETH."	Remember that "faith" (5, 8, 12, 17) and "believe" (16) are two words for the same act. "Salvation . . . . . believeth." "Just shall live by faith." "Power" is same word as "Miracle".
July 17th. I Corinthians i. 10-31. "SAVE THEM THAT BELIEVE."	The instrument of salvation (the cross) appears foolish to the wise of the world, and the emphasis upon "believing" is equally so. Believing the gospel admits of our extreme need and failure, and God's full provision.
July 24th. II Timothy i. 1-18. "I KNOW WHOM I HAVE BELIEVED."	Note the three references to being "ashamed" in this chapter (8, 12 and 16). Paul reveals the secret of his strength in verse 12. Believing is not only essential at the first, but throughout our whole life.
July 31st.	As the holidays have commenced, and some of our Young People will be traveling, we give no questions for this date.

(1) Can we really "believe" John iii. 16 if we do not believe the writings of Moses? (see 14 and 15).
(2) What is another way of saying "believe"? (see 32, 33).
(3) What follows believing? (verses 16, 18, etc.).

Romans i. 1-17-- (1) Write out a verse in this passage that speaks of the gospel.
(2) What two things come by believing or faith (see 16, 17). If "power in 16 means "miracle", can any hope to be saved by "turning over a new leaf"?

I Cor. i. 10-31.-- (1) What does this passage say about "foolishness"?
(2) What does it say about "wisdom"?
(3) Is there anything in verse 18 that reminds you of Rom. i. 16?

II Tim. i. 1-18-- (1) We have seen that "believing" has to do with salvation, does this passage show that believing has to do with service and standing for Christ? (see 12).
(2) How many times do we read the words "not ashamed" in this passage? Write out the first one in full.

Weekly Bible Readings for September, 1938.
Subject: The Gospel according to Matthew.
The King and The Kingdom.

p. 184

September 4th. Matthew i. THE BIRTH OF THE KING.	1. What does "the book of the generations" means? 2. Luke iii. 23-28 gives another "birth certificate". Point out any difference that you can see. 3. Explain the meaning of the two names "Jesus" and "Emmanuel". Memorize Matt. i. 21.
September 11th. Matthew ii. PROPHECIES CONCERNING THE KING.	1. There are four fulfillments of the O.T. prophecy in this chapter. Give the number of the verses. 2. Write out the prophecy which speaks of Bethlehem. 3. What title did the wise men use when enquiring about the Lord Jesus? Memorize Matt. ii. 11.
September 18th. Matthew iii. THE FORERUNNER OF THE KING.	1. What did John the Baptist call upon Israel to do? 2. What is the meaning of the word "repent"? 3. What does "fruit meet for repentance" mean? (8). 4. Write out the words which were spoken from heaven, after the Lord had been baptized. Memorize Matt. iii. 3.
September 25th. Matthew iv. THE TEMPTATION OF THE KING.	1. What is another word for "tempt"? 2. How many times did Satan tempt the Lord in this chapter? 3. How did the Lord Jesus meet the temptation? 4. What three words did He use each time he met the temptation? (4, 7, 10). Memorize Matt. iv. 4.

Read each chapter through carefully, not forgetting to ask, in prayer, that God would open the eyes to see and the heart to understand.

October 2nd. Matthew v. 1-20. THE BLESSINS OF THE KING.	1. Explain the meaning of "poor in spirit" and "meek". 2. Write out one verse which commences with the word "Blessed". 3. Explain "Ye are the salt of the earth", and "Ye are the light of the world". Memorize Matt. v. 20.
October 9th. Matthew v. 21-48. THE AUTHORITY OF THE KING.	1. How many times do we read the words: "But I say unto you" in this passage? 2. Read carefully verses 38 and 39, and explain the difference between the law that was given through Moses, and grace that came through Christ. 3. Read verses 43, 44, 45 and explain the words: "That ye may be the children of your Father which is in heaven." Memorize Matt. v. 44.
October 16th. Matthew vi. 1-21. THE REWARD OF THE KING.	1. How many times does the word "reward" occur in Matt. vi.? 2. Verse 15 says: "But if ye forgive not men their trespasses, neither will your Father forgive your trespasses." Is this still true for us, or can you point out what change has been made? You will find help in Eph. iv. 32. 3. What is omitted at the close of the "Lord's Prayer" (Matt. vi. 13). Look at John xvi. 24. Memorize Matt. vi. 19-21.
October 23rd. Matthew vi. 22-34. THE SERVICE OF THE KING.	1. Explain "Ye cannot serve God and Mammon". 2. How many times in these verses do we read "Take no thought" or words similar? Does it mean "carelessness'? If not, explain. 3. What is the meaning of the words "sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof"? Memorize Matt. vi. 28, 29.
October 30th. Matthew vii. 1-29. THE AUTHORITY OF THE KING.	1. Explain, in your way, Matt. vii. 1-5. 2. What word do the initial letters of Ask, Seek and Knock spell? 3. Who is a "wise" builder, and why? (verses 24-27). Memorize Matt. vii. 28, 29.

Read each chapter through carefully, not forgetting to ask, in prayer, that God would open the eyes to see and the heart to understand.

November 6th. Matthew viii. THE BURDEN OF THE KING.	1. Read the account of the Cleansing of the Leper, and of the Healing of the Centurion's Servant. What great difference do you see? 2. Do you think the Leper represented Israel, and the servant the far off Gentiles? Give your reasons. 3. What did the centurion mean in verse 9? Memorize Matt. viii. 16, 17.
November 13th. Matthew ix. THE POWER OF THE KING.	1. How did the Saviour prove that He had power to forgive sins? (1-8). 2. "If I may but touch His garment" (21); Explain this in the light of verses 28, 29. What did the touch represent? 3. Were the men of verses 30, 31 right or wrong when they "spread abroad His fame"? Memorize Matt. ix. 12, 13.
November 20th. Matthew x. THE PREACHING OF THE KING.	1. Write out the names of the twelve apostles. 2. Explain "Go not"; "Go rather" (5, 6). 3. What lesson do you learn from "sparrows" in this chapter? Memorize Matt. x. 42.
November 27th. Matthew xi. THE REJECTION OF THE KING.	1. How did Christ's answer satisfy John the Baptist? 2. Explain verses 16-19 in your own words. 3. "Take My yoke . . . . . I am meek." Can you see the connection between vv. 28-30 and vv. 20-26? Think how Christ acted when the people of the cities rejected Him. Memorize Matt. xi. 28-30.

DEAR FELLOW-MEMBERS,

As we pen these opening words, our minds travel back over the years to 1914, when we wrote the foreword to Volume IV, in the shadow of the Great War. We find no mention there of the fearful conflict then raging, but instead, an expansion of the words:

"Greater light, deeper love, richer liberty, fuller life, in Christ."

Since that year, what experiences have been ours! What failures of the flesh, what triumphs of grace have marked our path! Twenty-five years of unpopular testimony have filled the interval; many precious lessons have been learned; much truth made clear; mysteries resolved; interpretations discovered; and joy in the Lord and His Word deepened—yet when all has been said, we find it impossible—even in the darker days that may await us—to ask for our readers anything better than the prayer of 1914:

"Greater light, deeper love, richer liberty, fuller life, in Christ."

Yours in the truth that makes free,

The Acts of the Apostles.

#31. The Second Missionary Journey (xvi. 6 - xix. 20). The Vision at Troas (xvi. 6 - 11).

pp. 21 - 25

In our last article we left the Apostle, accompanied by Silas and Timothy, delivering to the churches the decrees that had been ordained at Jerusalem. So far this being a retrograde movement, as some have supposed, owing to a confusion between the two separate issues that were before the assembly at Jerusalem (Acts xv.), this was undoubtedly a step towards growth and peace, the inspired comment being:

> "And so (or 'then indeed') were the churches established in this faith, and increased in number daily" (Acts xvi. 5).

Our new section (Acts xvi. 6 - xix. 20), a section fraught with the greatest interest to every believing Gentile (for in this second missionary journey, the gospel was first proclaimed in Europe) opens with a geographical reference that has only been fully understood in recent times. Commenting on the words: "Now when they had gone through Phrygia and the region of Galatia" (Acts xvi. 6), Conybeare and Howson write:

> "We are evidently destitute of materials for laying down the route of St. Paul and his companions. All that relates to Phrygia and Galatia must be left vague and blank, like an unexplored country in a map."

All this has, happily, been altered since the completion of the archaeological labours of Sir William Ramsay. We do not intend going into detail here, but we would recommend Sir William Ramsay's writings on this point to any interested reader. His researches have an important bearing on the dating of the Epistle to the Galatians and other matters in connection with the churches of Galatia, but we must leave these points and pass on to consider the purpose of this journey, as planned by the Apostle and actually led by the Lord. The reader is advised to consult the rough map given in Volume XXVIII, p.232, at each stage in the progress recorded in Acts xvi. 6 - xxviii. 22, as an intelligent grasp of the geography of the route is a considerable asset.

Acts xvi. 6-11.
The Vision of the Man of Macedonia.

A | 6-8. NEGATIVE. "Forbidden." |
a | Asia. Preach (Laleo). \ "They" (Paul, Silas,
b | Bithynia. Assayed to go. / Timothy).
B | 9-10. "Enlightened." |
c | Vision appeared. \
d | Man of Macedonia. \ "He",
d | Come over and help us. / Paul.
c | After he had seen the vision. /
A | 10, 11. POSITIVE. "Called." |
b | Endeavoured to go. \ "We" (Luke
a | Preach (Euaggelizo) unto them. / joins them).

The structure of this section is simple but nevertheless useful. The reader should notice the unobtrusive way in which Luke indicates, by the use of the pronoun "We", his presence at Troas, and then on through the journey up to Acts xvii. 1, where the pronoun is again dropped until xx. 5—from which point it continues to the end of the narrative.

The story of the first preaching of the gospel in Europe falls into three parts. First, we have the closing of doors in Asia Minor, then the opening of the door at Troas, and finally the entry through that newly-opened door into Macedonia. From the contemplation of this record, one great principle emerges, a principle which is true for all time, and for all classes of the Lord's people: namely, that the leading of the Lord is just as real when opportunities for service are closed by Him, as when they are opened. Apart from actually telling the Apostle in plain language that he must cross over to Macedonia, there does not appear to be any other way in which he could have been led, except by the use of compulsion, which is quite foreign to the Lord's method of dealing with his willing servants. There may have been also a need to test this little band, as they start on such a momentous journey. What was the compelling power that had led them thus far? An apparent rebuff would try their temper, would test the genuineness of their obedience, and would indicate whether it was the maturing of their own plans or the ready following of the Lord's leading that was uppermost in their hearts. There can hardly be a greater test for whole-heartedness than to have all one's ardour apparently rejected, to be ready to offer one's self upon the sacrifice and service of the gospel, only to be met with unexplained prohibitions. Yet all along there have been these seasons of trial. Paul himself had withdrawn earlier into Arabia; Moses before him had spent forty years in the desert. Let us remember that a closed door may be the unexpected answer to our prayers. The writer himself can say without exaggeration that some of the things for which he cannot be too thankful have been closed doors, even though they were bitterly disappointing at the time. If rightly accepted, the closed door urges us forward as it did the Apostle and his company. Being forbidden to "speak the Word in Asia", we can well understand that there could be no thought of turning back.

Striking northward until they came "over against" (kata) Mysia, they "assayed" to go into Bithynia. The word "assayed" is, in the original, peirazo, from peiro, "to pierce" or "perforate", and so "to test" or "make trial". In the Acts we find the word translated

"tempt" in v. 9 & xv. 10, and the noun form peirasmos occurs in xx. 19 as "temptation". In Acts ix. 26 we read that the Apostle "assayed" to join himself with the disciples at Jerusalem, the idea being that he naturally felt somewhat different about his reception, but made the attempt. It is right, therefore, for the believer, when faced with an apparently shut door, to try the latch, in case it merely needs a touch to open it, but there must be no forcing of the lock.

Failing to receive permission to enter Bithynia, these three devoted men went on their way once more, arriving in due course at Troas. We must not, of course, allow our imagination to invest these three way-worn travelers with a classical scholar's interest in ancient Troy, but, on the other hand, it seems almost impossible for a man like Paul, brought up in the Cilician University City of Tarsus, famous for its philosophy and learning, not to have had some interest in the scene of Homer's famous poem. And further, Troy was not only famous because of its legendary past, but on several memorable occasions it had been visited by men of world-wide renown. Here Xerxes had passed on his way to the attempted conquest of Greece; here also Alexander the Great, at the tomb of Achilles, had conceived his idea of world conquest. In Suetonius, also, we read:

> "A report was very current, that he (Julius Cæsar) had a design of withdrawing to Alexandria or Ilium (Troy), whither he proposed to transfer the imperial power, to drain Italy by new levies, and to leave the government of the city to be administered by his friends" (Suetonius J. C. lxxix).

Where the conquerors of earthly territory had gathered inspiration or had cast their approving gaze, there the Apostle of the Gentiles, harbouring the vast design of traversing the length of the Roman empire in the cause of Christ, received his call to cross the sea, and plant the standard of the cross on European soil.

We can well believe that, having arrived at the sea coast, the Apostle and his companions would feel that they had reached a crisis. Either they must receive instructions to enter some specific territory, or there would seem nothing left but to return from whence they came. Earnest prayer would ascend to heaven before they retired to rest; and with what relief and thanksgiving they must have listened the next morning to the Apostle's account of his vision. During the night he had seen a vision of a man of Macedonia, and the man had cried, "Come over and help us". Not only would they be grateful for the fact that Asia and Bithynia had been closed to them, seeing that it had led to this fuller venture for the faith, but they would also realize that, had they stayed in either Asia or Bithynia, the Apostle might never have met that "beloved physician", who not only ministered to the Apostle's needs, but wrote the treatise we are at the moment studying.

Paul makes two references to Troas in his epistles:

> "When I came to Troas to preach Christ's gospel, and a door was opened unto me of the Lord" (II Cor. ii. 12).
>
> "The cloke that I left at Troas with Carpus, when thou comest, bring with thee, and the books, but especially the parchments" (II Tim. iv. 13).

There is also a visit to Troas on the return to Jerusalem recorded in Acts xx. 5, 6.

Having heard the account of Paul's vision, we read that they "gathered assuredly" that the Lord had called them to preach the gospel in Macedonia. Sumbibazo, "to gather assuredly", is an interesting word, made up of sum "with", and baino "to go"—the idea being that these men of God "put two and two together", and made the vision "walk with" its interpretation. The word is used of the Apostle himself in Acts ix. 22, where, after his conversion, he was able, with the knowledge he already possessed of O.T. prophecy, to "prove" that the "Jesus" he had formerly persecuted was "the very Christ". He was enabled so to marshal his O.T. prophecies and made them "walk together" with the actual facts of the life of Jesus of Nazareth that many were convinced. There are three occurrences of the word in the epistles (Eph. iv. 16, Col. ii 2 and 19), in which the Apostle uses it with reference to the members of the body being "compacted" or "knit-together", but the same underlying thought of "going together" is evident upon examination. Here, therefore, as earlier, the Apostle and his companions exercised the "sound mind" that had been given them, and we can well imagine the surprise with which they would have listened to the idea sometimes put forward that "faith" and "reason" should be kept apart.

Hesitation and uncertainly now give place to directness and activity. "Immediately we endeavoured to go into Macedonia", says Luke; and this endeavour being successful, they loosed from Troas, and coming by a straight course to Samothracia, arrived on the next day at Neapolis (Acts xvi. 11). The "straight course" here must not be regarded as obvious and inevitable, for we learn from Acts xx. 6 that the return journey from Philippi to Troas occupied five days. The word translated "a straight course" is euthudromeo, which, according to Conybeare and Howson, is a technical expression meaning "to sail before the wind". The passage between Tenedos and Lemnos was not without some risk, owing to the proximity of very dangerous shoals (Purdy's Sailing Dictionary), and the hand of the Lord can be seen in giving a favourable passage.

At Neapolis, the Apostle set foot for the first time on European soil. This town is the modern Kavala, and served as a port for Philippi. As a port it left much to be desired, but as the great Via Egnatia (the military road through Macedonia) began here, it was the invariable landing-place for travelers crossing from the shores of Asia Minor.

The next section of the Acts opens with the words:

> "And from thence to Philippi" (Acts xvi. 12).

We have heard the cry of the man of Macedonia, and we have seen the response to it. Everything is now ready for the first great proclamation of the gospel in Europe. An examination of this epoch-making visit must occupy our attention in the next article.

#32. The Second Missionary Journey (xvi. 6 - xix. 20). Philippi. The First Converts (xvi. 12 - 15).
pp. 61 - 64

Philippi! How poor the reception given by this city to the heralds of salvation, but how rich the response when the love of the truth had been received.

Luke speaks of Philippi in this passage as "the chief city of that part of Macedonia, and a colony" (Acts xvi. 12). The actual capital was Amphipolis, and a writer composing a fictitious narrative would almost certainly have made the Apostle go straight to this city. Amphipolis had, however, fallen into insignificance, and Philippi, owing to its association with the battle between Octavius and Antony on the one side, and Brutus and Cassius on the other, had grown in importance. The victory won by Octavius was celebrated by making Philippi a colony, with the privilege of immunity from taxes. A table known as the "Pentinger Table" represents Philippi as a flourishing city, with houses drawn on the site, while Amphipolis, the capital, is only vaguely chronicled. The rival claims of Amphipolis and Philippi are not in themselves of great importance to us to-day, but they are interesting as demonstrating Luke's veracity as a writer. Every item of proven history that is brought to light intensifies our appreciation of the fact that Luke had "accurately followed from the very first", in order to give us "certainties".

In connection with Acts xvi. 12, Bishop Wordsworth puts forward the suggestion that the word meris, translated "of that part" should be understood as referring to the frontier as meros is translated elsewhere "coast of Tyre and Sidon", and "coast of Cæsarea" (Matt. xv. 21, xvi. 13). According to this view, the verse would read: "Philippi, which is chief of the border cities of Macedonia."

Philippi was also a "colony", and coins have been found bearing the inscription COL., AUG., JUL., PHILIP (i.e. Colonia, Augusta, Julia, Philippensis).

At this point it would perhaps be advisable to get some idea of the constitution of a Roman colony. The Greeks and the Romans looked at the world from two different points of view. The Greeks were philosophers, poets, artists, and their citizenship was intimately associated with their literature; hence for them the world was divided into "Greeks" and "Barbarians". The Romans, however, "thought imperially", each man being either politically a "Roman", or else belonging to a people subjected to Roman rule. The Roman terms were cives and peregrini, "citizens" and "strangers". The fundamental idea of a "colony" was that the city of Rome was, so to speak, transplanted and reproduced in some distant part of the Empire. The colonies were primarily intended as a protection at frontiers; and they also provided a means of settling and rewarding soldiers whose active service was over. The insignia of Rome were displayed in the city, and the Latin language was spoken and used on the coinage. The colonists paid poll-tax as citizens, and also a ground tax, as they were outside Italy. Philippi and Troas, however, had the special privilege of the Jus Italicum, which raised them to the same state of immunity from taxation as belonged to Italy itself (Hoeck's Romische Geschehte). With these things in mind, the reader will realize that the passage in Phil. iii., which speaks of "our citizenship" being "in heaven" (verse 20) would mean much more to those who received the letter than is immediately obvious from the words used.

The fact that Philippi was a military centre would account for the smallness of the Jewish population, and also for the presence of Lydia of Thyatira, "a seller of purple". Thyatira had been famous from early days for the purple dye which was made there, from the shells of a mollusk commonly known as Tyrian Purpura. Homer mentions the purple dye of Lydia in the Iliad:

> "And as by Lydian or by Carian maid
> The purple dye is on the ivory laid" (Iliad iv. 141).

An inscription has also been found in the ruins of Thyatira, bearing the title "The Dyers".

To return to the narrative itself—upon arrival at Philippi, the apostles did not at once begin to preach, for we read that they "abode certain days". Then apparently, when the Sabbath day came, having already discovered that there was no synagogue in the city:

> "We went out of the city by a river side, where prayer was wont to be made; and we sat down, and spake unto the women which resorted thither" (Acts xvi. 13).

True to the dispensational character of the time, the Apostle keeps literally to the principle of "the Jew first" (Rom. i. 16) and waits until the Sabbath day. Finding no synagogue, and knowing the customs of his people, he turns to the river-side and finds there a place where "prayer was wont to be made". The word in the original is proseuche, and we learn from contemporary writers that this was an enclosure of circular shape, open to the sky, and near a river or the sea, because of the ablutions necessary in Jewish worship. Josephus records a number of decrees that were made by different rulers in connection with this custom. The following is one short extract:

> "We have decreed, that as many men and women of the Jews as are willing so to do, may celebrate their Sabbaths, and perform their holy offices, according to the Jewish laws; and make their proseuchae at the seaside, according to the customs of their forefathers; and if any one, whether he be a magistrate or a private person, hindereth them from so doing, he shall be liable to a fine, to be applied to the uses of the city" (Ant. Bk. xiv. 10, 23).

Why only women are said to have resorted to this place of prayer is unexplained, but, whatever the reason, one can well imagine what a rebuff this reception would be to any false pride. However, the Apostle and his companions were led of the Lord, and were apparently willing to walk in His way. One at least of the women who listened would have caused the Apostle and his fellow-workers to exchange understanding glances. They had been forbidden to speak the word in Asia, and had traveled across the sea to preach to the men of Macedonia, and now, to their surprise and joy, their first convert is found to be a woman belonging to the very province from which, as preachers, they had been excluded. The words "which worshipped God", which appear in verse 14, indicate that Lydia was already a proselyte.

Lightfoot draws attention to the place that women occupied in Macedonia as follows:

> "It may, I think, be gathered from St. Luke's narrative, that her social position was higher in this country than in most parts of the civilized world. At Philippi, at Thessalonica, at Berea, the women—in some cases certainly, in all cases probably, ladies of birth and rank—take an active part with the apostle (Acts xvi. 13; xvii. 4, 12). It forms moreover a striking coincidence, and surely an undesigned coincidence, between the history and the epistle, that while in the former the gospel is related to have been first preached to women, and the earlier converts specially mentioned are women, in the latter we find the peace of the Philippian Church endangered by the feuds of two ladies of influence, whose zealous aid in the spread of the gospel the apostle gratefully acknowledges (Phil. iv. 2)."

There are no accidents in Divine Providence. It was peculiarly fitting that this new departure should be associated with a "colony", a miniature Rome, and it is also suggestive, in view of the emancipating and enlightening doctrine, that the first to receive the gospel were women, and not men.

In verse 14 we read that Lydia's heart was "opened", and in the following verse we find her home opened also. The words "She constrained us" suggest that the Apostle did not readily accept her invitation. We know, however, that he fully acknowledged the right of every servant of the Lord to be maintained, at least, by those to whom he ministered; and he also declared that it would have been quite right for him to have been accompanied by a wife, or a sister in the Lord, but these privileges he had foregone lest his sincerity should be called in question.

The only other occurrence of the word translated "constrained" here is Luke xxiv. 29, where the Lord "made as though He would have gone further" (verse 28). Lydia's trade would have demanded a considerable capital, and she may, therefore, have been a woman of means. The apostles would be grateful indeed to the Lord, Who had gone before, preparing a place for them, and raising up helpers who were willing to use their material possessions for the furtherance of the gospel.

pp. 101 - 104

If, speaking humanly, the reception which the Apostle received at Philippi was humbling to the flesh, subsequent events at the same city show how impossible it is to foresee what may be the sequel to a genuine call to preach in any particular place. One might be pardoned for expecting that, with the two closed doors in Asia and Bithynia, and the vision of the man of Macedonia, Philippi would have proved to be a place where great gatherings assembled to hear the Word, and converts were numbered by the hundred. A little experience, however, would modify these expectations, and the presence and persistence of an active enemy would be kept in mind. If Troas proved to be an open door, the Apostle's added words: "And there are many adversaries" most certainly fitted the situation. The first test encountered by the apostles was that of the out-of-the-way meeting place by the river side, and the fact that only some women were present. This was faithfully met, the situation accepted, and the Word preached. One heart was opened, and a household baptized, so that the first encounter was a victory of faith. What will be the next move on the part of the opposition? Instead of creating a disturbance and getting the Apostle expelled from the city, the enemy of truth changes his tactics and attempts to compromise the purity of the gospel. If Balaam cannot curse Israel, he will involve them in evil associations, and we have the testimony of Rev. ii. that this method of attack to which every faithful minister of the truth is peculiarly susceptible. Only those who have walked alone for years, because of the demands of the faith, can have any conception of the strength of the temptation to join up with this or that, so that the stigma of isolation and peculiarity may be removed. To capitulate, however, means a life's work shipwrecked; and we can see this drama enacted for our learning in the remainder of the section dealing with Philippi.

> "And it came to pass, as we went to prayer, that a certain damsel possessed with a spirit of divination met us, which brought her masters much gain by soothsaying: The same followed Paul and us, and cried, saying, These men are the servants of the most high God, which shew unto us the way of salvation. And this she did many days. But Paul, being grieved, turned and said to the spirit, I command thee in the name of Jesus Christ to come out of her. And he came out that same hour" (Acts xvi. 16-18).

The A.V., in the margin, draws attention to the fact that "spirit of divination" may be rendered "spirit of Python". As this encounter with the powers of darkness at Philippi occurs at a most critical period in the history of the preaching of the gospel, we must seek to get as full an understanding as possible of what this expression involves.

Speaking of the agency of evil spirits, the Rev. Walter Scott writes:

> "Of all the devices which he has ever employed for these purposes, one of the most successful has been to invest, as far as he was able, error with the form, and to array it in the beauties of truth; to imitate all the methods which God has adopted to demonstrate the divinity of the true religion; and thus to transform himself into an angel of light. If > God has raised up true, Satan has raised up lying prophets. If God has commissioned his servants to work real miracles, Satan has employed his to exhibit counterfeit ones. If to the Jews were committed the oracles of God, to the heathen were committed the pretended oracles of Delphos and Dodona, and many others. If the intrinsic excellence and the purifying tendency of the doctrines of the gospel, and the beauties of holiness adorning the character of those who have been commissioned to publish them, are amongst the means which God has employed to recommend His truth, the servants of Satan have been transformed as the ministers of righteousness, and have pretended deep concern for the happiness of those to whom they have delivered their message. And it has been thought, and is maintained at the present day by some, that his giving answers by the oracles to which our attention is now to be directed, has been amongst the principal means by which he has carried on his intercourse with our fallen sinful world" (Existence of Evil Spirits).

There is a growing tendency to "explain away" the references to demon possession which we find in the Scriptures. It is suggested that our Lord merely accommodated Himself to the superstitions of the age, and that, if He had lived to-day, He would have called the disease by its true name of "epilepsy". The symptoms recorded in Matt. xvii. 15, Mark ix. 17 and Luke ix. 39 are certainly very like those of epilepsy, but the Lord's words clearly attribute these very symptoms to actual demon possession. The demoniacs of the Gospels do not express themselves as they would if they were insane or hypochondriacal (Matt. viii. 29; Mark i. 24); they answer question put to them in a rational way. They also recognize that they are possessed by demons (Mark v. 9), and the Lord commands these demons not to make Him known as the Messiah (Mark i. 34 margin). We also learn that these demoniacs knew that Jesus was the Son of God (Matt. viii. 29), and the Christ (Luke iv. 41). If he is at all uncertain, the reader should not remain satisfied with the few remarks given above, but should tabulate for himself all that is written in the Gospels in this connection. We believe that the result will be a conviction that actual demon possession is the truth of the matter.

The damsel that followed the Apostle at Philippi was "possessed with a spirit of Python". Python, in Greek mythology, was the name given to the Serpent that was born of the mud left by the flood. The Serpent was killed by the god Apollo, to whom it was supposed that the Serpent's powers of prophecy and oracular utterance were transferred. Apollo's prophecy was at Delphi, where a priestess called Pythia gave cryptic replies to questioners' enquiries.

The following are some of the cases of Satanic opposition encountered at various stages of the apostolic witness:

(1) At the entry of the gospel into Samaria, we find Satanic opposition represented by Simon the Sorcerer. This man "believed", but had very questionable ideas concerning the bestowal of the Holy Spirit (Acts viii. 9-24).

(2) At the entry of the gospel into Galatia, under the separate ministry of Paul and Barnabas, we find again Satanic opposition represented by Elymas the Sorcerer, who was smitten with blindness, "not seeing the sun for a season" (Acts xiii. 6-11).

(3) At the entry of the gospel into Europe, we find Satanic opposition represented by the damsel possessed with the spirit of Python. This spirit was cast out (Acts xvi. 16-18).

(4) When Athens was visited, the city of the world's wisdom, the name of the Lord was confused with those of the demons that played a prominent part in Greek idolatry, for the philosophers said: "He seemeth to be a setter-forth of strange demons" (Acts xvii. 18).

(5) At the separation of the church from the synagogue, we read that "certain vagabond Jews, exorcists, took upon them to call over them which had evil spirits the name of the Lord Jesus". These men were overpowered and wounded (Acts xix. 13-16).

There is no reason to doubt that "Python" was simply another name for "that old Serpent, the Devil", and the Apostle was not going beyond his experience when he spoke the comforting words of Rom. xvi. 20: "The God of peace shall bruise Satan under your feet shortly."

We observe here—for our learning and warning—that this demon-possessed woman spoke words of truth. No fault can be found with her statement: "These men are the servants of the most high God, which show unto us the way of salvation" (Acts xvi. 17).

This was certainly true, and the God Who sent them is given His true place and title. "The Most High God" is a title used elsewhere in the Acts by Stephen (Acts vii. 48). They were also truly described as "servants" on their own confession, for Paul uses the same word (doulos) again and again to define his own position as "a servant of Jesus Christ" (Rom. i. 1). There are but five words used in the original for the phrase: "Which show unto us the way of salvation", and we believe it would be difficult for the wisest Christian to express in five words a truer and fuller synopsis of apostolic witness. The word "show" here is kataggello, used in Acts xiii. 5, 38 & xv. 36 and elsewhere for Paul's "preaching". Also, the use of the word "Way" as a symbol of the gospel is masterly; the same word is used elsewhere in Acts ix. 2; xiii. 10; xviii. 26; xix. 9, 23; xxii. 4 and xxiv. 14. Here, then, we have a perfect presentation of truth. The Apostle and his companions are "servants", the One they serve is "The Most High God", and their great work is "to show unto us the way of salvation". Yet we read that the Apostle was grieved and commanded the spirit, in the name of Jesus Christ, to come out of the women—"And he came out the same hour." Satan has no conscience and no honour. He will persecute, imprison, and kill, or, on the other hand, he will quote Scripture and utter the most irreproachable commendation of the gospel and its messengers, but he has but one end—to deceive, to corrupt, to keep the Son of God, if possible, from His rightful throne.

As servants of the most high God, we must look deeper than the surface before we allow anyone to involve our ministry with theirs. They may give an unimpeachable testimony to the Truth, they may appear to be ministers of righteousness, and yet, all the time, they may be like the false apostles and emissaries of him who, for his own ends, comes as an "angel of light". The Apostles here was evidently sensible of "Satan's devices" and would not allow his ministry to be thus compromised. We are not, of course, endowed with any supernatural gift of infallibility, and there is a possibility that, at times, our concern for the sacred trust committed to us, may have caused us to refuse some proffered fellowship that would have been helpful. If this should have been so, He Who judges the thoughts and intents of the heart will deal with us both righteously and in mercy.

#34. The Second Missionary Journey (xvi. 6 - xix. 20). Paul and Silas, and the Philippian Jailor (xvi. 19 - 40).
pp. 141 - 146

In Acts xvi. 16 we read that the damsel possessed by the spirit of Python "brought her masters much gain by soothsaying". The word ergasia, "gain", occurs four times in the Acts, and in each case we find it to be the motive behind the persecution of the Apostle (Acts xvi. 16, 19; xix. 24, 25). The flame of persecution, which was fanned by the Evil One, was directed to one end—to destroy the testimony of the gospel. The kind of instrument used to this end was immaterial so long as the end itself was achieved, and so we find him using both Jews and Gentiles. At one time was Saul of Tarsus, a Hebrew and a Pharisee, whose moral uprightness was such that he could write of that period of his life: "touching the righteousness of the law, blameless." Saul would have scorned to have followed the rabble, or to have been moved by the desire for gain; nevertheless he persecuted the Church. The Jews, either by their religious leaders, or because of their own fanatical adherence to the tradition of their fathers, persecuted the Church. But we find that the Gentiles also persecuted the Church, moved by the fact that the Christian faith, by supplanting their idolatries, robbed them of their gains, and at length, Rome, the protector of the Apostle during the Acts, became the great persecutor of the Church under the awful rule of Nero and his successors.

During the period covered by the first fifteen chapters of the Acts we read of persecution arising from the following causes:

(1) The leaders of Israel were grieved because the apostles preached, through Jesus, the resurrection of the dead (Acts iv.).
(2) The leaders of Israel were cut to the heart by Stephen's speech. They stoned him, and another persecution was begun (Acts vii., viii. 1).
(3) Saul of Tarsus, being troubled in his conscience (he was kicking against the goad at his conversion, ix. 5) organized a great persecution of the Church (Acts viii., ix.).
(4) The Jews being incensed at Saul's conversion and subsequent witness, took counsel to kill him (Acts ix. 23, 29).
(5) Herod stretched forth his hand to vex certain of the Church. James was killed. Peter was imprisoned. He saw that it pleased the Jews (Acts xii.).
(6) The Jews at Antioch, filled with envy at the evangelizing of the Gentiles, stirred up opposition—and expelled the apostles (Acts xiii.).
(7) The Jews from Antioch and Iconium (apparently from envy and hatred) followed Paul to Lystra and stoned him, leaving him for dead (Acts xiv.).

At Acts xvi. we meet with the first Gentile persecution and another factor enters into the situation: "They saw that the hope of their gain was gone." In a world composed as it is of religious zeal and sordid greed, it is practically impossible to witness for the truth without touching the interests and arousing the antagonism of one or other of these representative opponents. When one reads a funeral eulogy which declares that the man who has died "had not an enemy in the world", one is inclined to think: He did nothing, therefore, in the cause of truth.

Returning to Acts xvi., we find that Paul and Silas are caught and taken before the rulers, the charge against them being:

> "These men, being Jews, do exceedingly trouble our city, and teach customs, which are not lawful for us to received, neither to observe, being Romans" (Acts xvi. 20, 21).

Wordsworth remarks here:

> "Christianity was hated as Judaism, by the heathen, and as worse than heathenism by the Jews. It had to contend against Judaism and Heathenism, and it triumphed over both."

We feel sometimes, in our small degree, that those responsible for The Berean Expositor are in much the same condition. The orthodox are against our teaching because it traverses the "traditions of the elders", and the Modernists are against us because we are out of date and old-fashioned. It is good at such times to think of the apostles and take courage from their experience and example.

The Jews were not liked by the Romans, and a Roman Colony particularly would endeavour to keep them out. About this time the Jews had caused such disturbances at Rome, that Claudius had expelled them by edict (Acts xviii. 2):

> "He banished from Rome all the Jews, who were continually making disturbances at the instigation of one Chrestus" (Suet. Claud. xxv.).

Judaism was a religio licita (a lawful religion) within the Roman Empire, but those in authority were free to punish any unauthorized introduction of any new object of worship.

Luke's historical veracity is again evident here. He says that the Apostle was taken to the "rulers" and brought before the "magistrates". As a colony, Philippi was rather like a miniature Rome, and justice would therefore be administered in it by two officers called duumviri. This title was rendered in Greek strategos, the word translated by the A.V. "magistrate". Inscriptions have been found in Philippi, bearing the names and titles of duumviri, and one of them, whose name was found at Neapolis, was actually duumvir when Paul was taken at Philippi.

The men who laid the charge against the Apostle and his companions were too wise to refer to their private grievances; they were very conscious of the pride that held sway in a Roman Colony, and it was to this pride that they appealed. Had the Apostle or Silas uttered the words, Civis Romanus sum ("I am a Roman"), even the pride of Philippi would have yielded to the pride of Rome, but they evidently refrained and endured the ignominy of being beaten in the market place. On three occasions the Apostle tells us that he was "beaten with rods", and in each case he could have saved himself by announcing his citizenship. Let those who have somewhat hastily condemned the Apostle for his appeal to Cæsar, ponder these facts.

The "rending off" of their clothes shows that brutal violence was indulged in (perirregeumi)—a part of the "shameful" treatment to which the Apostle refers in I Thess. ii. 2. The Roman procedure would be adhered to in a Roman Colony, and the Apostle and his companions would be stripped, either completely or to the waist, and tied to a post erected for that purpose in the market place.

> "It was the first of three such scourgings with the rods of Roman lictors which Paul endured, and it is needless to dwell even for a moment on its dangerous and lacerating anguish . . . . . But such horrors occurred eight times at least in the story of one whose frame was more frail with years of suffering than that of our English missionaries, and in whose life these pangs were but such a drop in the ocean of his endurance, that, of the eight occasions on which he underwent these horrible scourgings, this alone has been deemed worthy of even passing commemoration" (Farrar).

After the scourging, the keeper of the prison was enjoined to keep his prisoners "safe", and this he interpreted by thrusting them into the inner prison, and fastening their feet in the stocks. Here, unattended, with backs lacerated, with feelings outraged, in utter darkness, lay the men who had so willingly responded to the call of the man of Macedonia to "come over and help us". If Paul and Silas had moaned throughout the night, refusing comfort and accusing one another of having made a complete mistake, it would have been but human. We must remember, however, that Paul had received his commission in terms of suffering (Acts ix. 16), while Silas was commended to the churches as one who had "hazarded" his life for the name of the Lord Jesus Christ. And so we read:

> "And at midnight Paul and Silas prayed, and sang praises unto God; and the prisoners heard them" (Acts xvi. 25).

The original here is proseuchomenoi humnoun, "praying, they were singing", and it is possible that the "hymn" may refer to the group of Psalms called the "Hallel" (cf. Matt. xxvi. 30: "And when they had sung a hymn, they went out unto the mount of Olives").

Hobart has given us a volume dealing with Luke as a physician, and draws attention to the many medical terms found in his writings. The word describing how the prisoners "heard" the singing of Paul and Silas through the prison wall, is epakroaomai, a term used in the medical profession at that time for "hearing by placing the ear to the body".

While the Apostle and his companions were singing, and the other prisoners listening, there came the shock of an earthquake. The doors flew open, and everyone's bands were loosed. The first impulse of the jailor was to draw his sword and we read that he "would have killed himself", for under the Roman law the jailor would have had to endure the same punishment as the prisoners who escaped. We find the same anxiety about the escape of prisoners later on in the narrative in Acts xxvii. 42.

The jailor uses the word kurioi, "Sirs", in his appeal to Paul and Silas, and in their reply they point him away to Ton Kurion, "The Lord". Whether the jailor meant by the word "saved" what the Scriptures mean, we cannot tell, but, that after being given the answer: "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved, and thy house", we read that Paul and Silas "spake unto him the word of the Lord, and to all that were in his house". It is well to remember that the "word" here, logos, implies a "logical account", showing that after preaching the way of salvation in the simple terms of verse 31, the preachers followed the declaration with explanation and instruction.

The jailor then washes the wounded backs of the Lord's servants, and in turn he and his house are baptized.

The magistrates were, apparently, rather perturbed about their very un-Roman conduct, and "when it was day" sent the sergeants (or lictors, the bearers of the rod) saying, "Let these men go".

> "But Paul said unto the, They have beaten us openly uncondemned, being Romans, and have cast us into prison, and now do they thrust us out privily? Nay verily; but let them come themselves and fetch us out" (Acts xvi. 37).

"How often", says Cicero, "has this exclamation, I am a Roman citizen, brought aid and safety, even among barbarians in the remotest parts of the earth".

And so we find this terrible beginning of the Apostle's testimony in Europe overruled for the furtherance of the gospel. The publicity that such an unfair condemnation would give, the testimony of the character of the preachers that the trial afforded, the intervention of the earthquake, the salvation of the jailor, the public recognition by the magistrates at the end, would all combine to give the message of the gospel a hearing such as a normal procedure could never have afforded.

It would not be justifiable, in entering upon a new sphere of service, actually to pray for stripes and imprisonment, but one can take courage from these examples and stand firm in spite of the fiercest opposition. It is a strange feeling, that has often been the experience of the writer, to steam into the railway station of some new town, observe its public buildings, its multitude of churches, its teeming numbers, and to contemplate the complete insignificance to most of the people in the town of the coming into its midst of just one mere speaker, armed only with his Bible and a desire to spread the light and liberty of the truth. Nevertheless there are happy occasions of victory to be recorded, in the name of the same Lord, who, in the Acts, gave the vision, permitted the indignities, granted the salvation, and at length established such an assembly as the church of the Philippians.

Satan's twofold attack had failed and the gospel standard was firmly planted in Europe. Paul neither compromised with the Devil (Acts xvi. 17, 18), nor gave place to him (Acts xvi. 25). He was, by grace, proof against both flattery and frown, and came out of the conflict "more than conqueror through Him that loved us". For the sake of the gospel, he could become either a Jew or a Roman, and later on, among the Greek philosophers, we again find how true it was, that he was "made all things to all men", that "by all means he might save some". Two households at least were "saved" before the Apostle departed. Truly these men were the "servants of the Most High God, which show unto us the way of salvation".

#35. The Second Missionary Journey (xvi. 6 - xix. 20). Thessalonica and Berea (xvii. 1 - 14).

pp. 181 - 188

With the preaching of the gospel in Philippi we get the first real conflict between the heralds of the cross and the power of the world, as represented by Rome. With the preaching of the Word in Athens, the conflict is extended and we meet the wisdom of the world, as represented by the city of Athens. In the colony of Philippi it was the Roman magistrates, and the jailor that were prominent, whereas in Athens we have the Stoics and Epicureans. Before his arrival at Athens, however, we have the record of the Apostle's visit to Thessalonica and Berea.

There is much in common between these two visits, and the parallel may be set out as follows:

Thessalonica and Berea (Acts xvii. 1-14).

A | 1. Thessalonica. The synagogue of the Jews.
B | 2, 3. Scripture. Reasoning. Opening. Alleging. Three sabbath days.
C | 4. Some believed.
Devout Greeks. Chief women. Not a few.
D | 5. But the Jews.
E | 5-9. The uproar. The charge.
F | 10. Paul and Silas sent away.

A | 10. Berea. The synagogue of the Jews.
B | 11. Scripture. Received. Readiness. Searched. Daily.
C | 12. Many believed.
Honourable women, Greeks, and of men, not a few.
D | 13. But the Jews.
E | 13. The Stir. The knowledge.
F | 14. Paul sent away. Silas and Timothy remain.

By noting verses 10 and 14 we find that Paul, Silas and Timothy were together at Berea, but that Luke had evidently stayed behind to continue the work at Philippi. Luke was with the Apostle when he was met by the demon-possessed damsel, for he uses the pronoun "we" (Acts xvi. 16), but the third person is employed after this until Luke again joins the Apostle as indicated by the reappearance of the "we" at Acts xxi. 1.

The route taken by the Apostle from Philippi to Thessalonica was the one usually followed. We have a document called the Antonine Itinerary, which gives the length of this journey as one hundred miles; Philippi to Amphipolis 33 miles; from there to Apollonia another 30 miles, and so to Thessalonica 37 miles. We have no record of how long this journey took, and it is idle to speculate.

The next happening of spiritual importance occurs at Thessalonica, and we accordingly find this city now brought into prominence. It was ideally situated as a centre from which might be "sounded out the word of the Lord, not only in Macedonia and in Achaia, but also in every place" (I Thess. i. 8). Its geographical position and political importance made it a natural point of contact with the whole neighbourhood. On modern maps the city is named Salonika.

Nothing is said in Acts xvii. of the physical condition of Paul and Silas, but a passage in I Thess. ii. speaks volumes:

> "For yourselves, brethren, know our entrance in unto you, that it was not in vain: but even after that we had suffered before, and were shamefully entreated as ye know, at Philippi, we were bold in our God to speak unto you the gospel of God with much contention" (I Thess. ii. 1, 2).

The Christian church began in the synagogue and was not separated from it until this second missionary journey was over (Acts xix. 9). So we read in Acts xvii. 2 that, "as his manner was, Paul went in unto them, and three sabbath days reasoned with them out of the Scriptures". The basis of the Apostle's reasoning was, therefore, "the Scriptures", and his method is defined as "opening and alleging", with the object that his hearers might become convinced that the suffering and risen "Jesus" was truly "the Christ". We had one glimpse of the Apostle's method in Acts xiii., and here we have another. We shall profit by giving it our careful consideration.

The word dialegomia, "reasoning", indicates an argument, in which two or more speakers take part, or in which one speaker argues out the pros and cons in the course of his remarks. The passage before us says that Paul "reasoned with them out of the Scriptures", and his method is further illuminated by the two words that follow: "opening and alleging." The word translated "opening" is dianoigo, "to open thoroughly", and is used literally for opening a door, and figuratively for opening the understanding. In Acts xvi. 14 dianoigo is used with reference to the opening of Lydia's heart, and in Luke xxiv. 32 and 45 we have the example of Christ, Who "opened" the Scriptures, and then "opened" their understanding. Paul was closely following His Master's footsteps.

"Alleging" is paratithemi, "to place beside". Its first occurrence in the N.T. is associated with parables, a mode of teaching in which one thing is placed beside another, because of some resemblance, as for example:

> "The field is the world" (Matt. xiii. 38).
> "Another parable put He forth" (Matt. xiii. 24).

We have an early use of the word in Exod. xix. 7 where Moses "laid before" the people the words of God.

The Apostle's "argument", therefore, was two-fold. First he opened up the Scripture and saw to it that the understanding of his audience was also so far opened that they understood the passage cited, and then by bringing passage after passage and placing them over against their actual fulfillment—that had only just become history—he sought to prove that the Messiah of O.T. prophecy was the Christ he preached, and that, in spite of Jewish prejudice, "He must needs have suffered" and that He had risen from the dead. Paul's first object was to convince his hearers that "Jesus was the Christ", and that He had indeed died and risen again—a fact of which he reminds the Thessalonians when writing to them in his first epistle:

> "For if we believe that Jesus died and rose again" (I Thess. iv. 14).

We have only two sources of information regarding the subject-matter of the Apostle's ministry: the record of the Acts where the churches are first founded, and the subsequent epistles where they are given added teaching. We should therefore read I and II Thessalonians while we have this chapter in the Acts before us, so that we may be able to compare the Apostle's line of teaching in the Acts with that in the epistles.

That the Apostle followed much the same method elsewhere is evident from I Cor. xv.:

> "That Christ died for our sins, according to the Scriptures, and that He was buried, and that He rose again the third day, according to the Scriptures" (I Cor. xv. 3, 4).
> "Whether it were I or they, so we preached and so ye believed" (I Cor. xv. 11).

The Thessalonian epistles throw considerable light upon the way in which the Apostle spent his time at Thessalonica. In I Thess. ii. we read:

> "Ye remember, brethren, our labour and travail; for, labouring night and day, because we would not be chargeable unto any of you, we preached unto you the gospel of God" (I Thess. ii. 9).

From the Apostle's remarks in Philippians it would appear that, but for the gracious and repeated contributions made by that assembly, his evangelistic work in Macedonia would have been rendered almost impossible (Phil. i. 5; iv. 15). Judged by modern standards it strikes one as extraordinary, that within the limits of Acts xvi. 40 and xvii. 1-14, there could be formed a company of believers so fully grown in grace as not only to have made their own witness secure, but also to have followed the Apostle with gifts to enable the work in Macedonia to go forward.

To add to the Apostle's burden at Thessalonica, we find at the time of his visit a famine was raging, and Lewin in his Fasti Sacri No. 1735 says that a modus or peck of wheat was sold for six times its usual price.

The result of this devoted ministry at Thessalonica was that "some of them believed, and consorted with Paul and Silas". The word "consorted" is proskleroo, pros meaning "towards", and the remainder of the word, "to take by lot". The "threw in their lot" with the Apostle and his companions, and so formed the nucleus of the church. We are not told their names here, but we learn that there were a multitude of "devout Greeks" (the word "devout" indicating that they were already proselytes) and "not a few of the chief women". The inclusion of the women here and again at Berea (verse 12) is an interesting feature.

The "open door" at Thessalonica was not, however, long free from "adversaries". Beginning at verse 5, we read:

> "The Jews which believed not, moved with envy, took unto them certain lewd fellows of the baser sort, and gathered a company, and set all the city in an uproar, and assaulted the house of Jason, and sought to bring them out to the people. And when they found them not, they drew Jason and certain brethren unto the rulers of the city, crying, These that have turned the world upside down are come hither also; whom Jason hath received; and these all do contrary to the decrees of Cæsar, saying that there is another king, one Jesus. And they troubled the people and the rulers of the city, when they heard these things. And when they had taken security of Jason, and of the other, they let them go" (Acts xvii. 5-9).

Several points of importance must be considered before we leave Thessalonica for Berea. In the first place we note that the charge made against the Apostle was very similar to that which swayed Pilate, and led him to hand the Saviour over to the enemy. To be convicted of having said: "There is another king, one Jesus" would entail very severe punishment. The Apostle had evidently emphasized the kingdom of the Lord at Thessalonica (I Thess. ii. 12; II Thess. i. 5), and had given a prominent place in his ministry to the hope of the Second Coming. This provided a basis for his enemies upon which to found the false charge that he had preached another king in opposition to the rights of Cæsar.

As the Apostle could not be found by the mob, Jason, in whose house he had stayed, was dragged before the "rulers of the city". The word for "rulers" in Acts xvii. 6 and 8 is politarchs, a term not used before this chapter and never used again afterwards. Here, once again, Luke shines out as a truthful historian. Unlike Philippi or Troas, which were "colonies", Thessalonica was a "free city". Such cities were allowed a measure of self-government, and were generally as "Greek" in their atmosphere as a colony was "Roman". The Roman Governor did not interfere with purely local matters, and the local magistrates were even granted the power of life and death.

These magistrates are referred to by Luke as politarchs. In connection with the Apostle's visit to Thessalonica, in some free cities there was a "senate" or "assembly"—an arrangement which was true of Thessalonica (See Acts xvii. 5 where the word demos is used). In connection with the Apostle's visit to Thessalonica, it is interesting to note that the British Museum contains the following inscription on marble slabs that once formed part of a triumphal arch built to commemorate the victory of Augustus over Antony.

The title "Politarch", and the names, Sosipator (1) Secundus (2) and Gaius (3) were inscribed on a triumphal arch in the town of Thessalonica. The original is now in the British Museum.

(BE-XXIX.185).

There are seven names in this inscription, and three of them are the same as those borne by friends of the Apostle from this very district: Sopater of Berea (Acts xx. 4), Gaius the Macedonian (Acts xix. 29), and Secundus of Thessalonica (Acts xx. 4).

The whole atmosphere is changed when we step out of Acts xvi. into Acts xvii. We leave a Roman colony, with its "praetor" (Acts xvi. 20) and "lictors" (Acts xvi. 35), and its appeal to Roman exclusivism (Acts xvi. 21); and we enter a Greek city with its demos (Acts xvii. 5), and its politarchs.

The Jews' attempt to move the city proves abortive, the magistrates finding nothing against Jason, except that he entertained some new religious ideas. Apart from having to give some guarantee that he would not imperil the peace of the city, he is allowed to go free.

As the Apostle had no desire to foment strife, and realized that he would not further the truth by another period of imprisonment, he permitted the brethren to send Silas and himself away by night to Berea. The structure emphasizes the close parallel that is intended with the visit to Thessalonica, but whereas Acts xvii. 2, 3 represents the Apostle as "opening and alleging" from the Scriptures, in the corresponding passage in connection with Berea, this feature is kept in the background, and the attitude of the Bereans brought to the fore:

> "These were more noble than those in Thessalonica, in that they received the word with all readiness of mind and searched the Scriptures daily, to see whether these things were so" (Acts xvii. 11).

This reference has stood on the title page of The Berean Expositor ever since it was published in 1909, and together with II Timothy ii. 15, has been our watchword and inspiration ever since. Berea is now called Verria, and is a city of some 20,000 inhabitants. At the time of the Apostle's visit, there were sufficient Jews among the population to justify a synagogue, and it was of these Jews that the term "more noble" was used.

Light is thrown upon the choice of Berea and the withdrawal by night, by some words of Cicero addressed to a prefect of Macedonia whose maladministration had exasperated the people:

> "Ye came to Thessalonica without the knowledge of any, and by night; and when you could not endure the laments of the mourners and the storm of complaints, you stole away to the secluded town of Berea" (Cic. in Pis. 36).

The word eugenes, "noble" is used in Acts xvii. in a figurative sense, and approximates to the Latin "ingenuus". The word is used in our own language in the form "ingenuous", meaning noble in character, generous, honourable, straightforward. The ingenuous character of the Bereans was manifested in their attitude towards the Apostle's teaching and the Scriptures. Eugenes also occurs in Luke xix. 12, and I Cor. i. 26.

"Readiness of mind" here is prothumia, and occurs also in II Cor. viii. 11, 12, 19; ix. 2, and Rom. i. 15. The "readiness" of the Bereans did not indicate any lack of critical faculty. They received readily, but they also searched daily to see whether the things so readily received "were so". This magazine was entitled The Berean Expositor with this in mind. However strongly convinced the writer of its articles may be as to their truth, it is nevertheless our sincere hope that these articles will be placed side by side with the Scriptures, to see whether what is stated is, in fact, true.

In verse 12 we read that, as a result of the Apostle's ministry, "many of them believed", which is in contrast with the "some" who believed in Thessalonica (Acts xvii. 4, 12).

The Apostle, however, was not long left undisturbed. The Jews at Thessalonica obtained knowledge of his activities at Berea and traveled the 57 miles that intervened. The Apostle reveals in I Thess. ii. 17, 18, that he had hoped to have been absent from Thessalonica for but a "short time", and had indeed attempted to return "once and again", but, as he says, "Satan hindered us". Sad words indeed for Paul to write of the zeal displayed by his kinsmen according to the flesh.

It had become evident by now that Paul was the object of this Jewish rage, and so, leaving some behind to establish the little company in the faith, once more, as a fugitive, the Apostle is "sent away as it were to the sea". There is no need to interpret Hos epi ten thalassan as though it implied that the Apostle merely made a feint of going to the sea, and then turned inland. Winer gives a number of references to the classics to show that Hos epi denotes intention. From some point on the coast a suitable vessel was found, and we read that "they that conducted Paul brought him unto Athens"

Paul's experiences in the Greek city of Thessalonica, and his encouraging interval at Berea, would be helpful preparation for his witness in Athens, the metropolis of the world's wisdom, the city of philosophy, culture, and art, and yet a city of superstition, idolatry, and moral darkness. Paul was ready to preach to the wise or to the unwise, at Athens or at Rome, and we look forward in our next article to considering together the triumph of Christ, as the Wisdom of God, in the city which represented the world's finest philosophy.

#36. The Second Missionary Journey (xvi. 6 - xix. 20). Athens (xvii. 16 - 34).

pp. 221 - 227

Before the Apostle is permitted to speak for the truth in Rome, the metropolis of the world, he comes first into contact with the wisdom of ancient Greece. To the Romans he writes: "Christ is the end of the law for righteousness to everyone that believeth", while to the Corinthians he writes: "Christ is the power of God and the wisdom of God." The Apostle's steps were guided, not only with respect to the salvation of sinners in the various towns he visited, but also in such a way that he himself would learn from each successive stage some fresh aspect of the fullness of Christ.

The record of the Apostle's visit to Athens as given in Acts xvii. 16-34 can be comfortably read in five minutes, but to appreciate, even intellectually, the full meaning of the Apostle's words, makes demands that can only be satisfied by a liberal education. As to the spiritual teaching of the passage, each will receive according to his capacity.

We must endeavour in this short article to acquaint the reader with the city of Athens, as Paul knew it, and to explain his reference to the two classes of philosophers, the Stoics and the Epicureans. We must also say something about Mars' Hill, about the character of the Athenians, their temples, their art, and the idolatry with which the city was full. And then finally, with the atmosphere understood and appreciated, we shall be able to perceive the aptness of the Apostle's speech, and the way in which he became "all things to all men, that by all means he might save some".

Apollonius of Tyana (B.C.4 - A.D.97), a Pythagorean philosopher, traveled over a good deal of the route taken by Paul. He was driven out of Antioch by the insults of the people, and sailed away, as did the Apostle, from Seleucia and Paphos. His entrance into the city of Athens is described as follows:

> "He went post haste up from the ship into the city: but as he went forward, he fell in with quite a number of students of philosophy."

He also comments upon the religious devotion of the Athenians, and upon their altars to unknown gods:

> "Where also altars of unknown gods are erected" (Hou kai agnoston daimonon bornoi hidruntai).

Athens was a “free” city, that is to say, free to live under its ancient constitution and to make new laws, providing of course that the interests of Rome were not touched. From the inscriptions, we gather that in the Apostle’s time the constitution of Athens consisted of three estates, the Areopagus, the Council of Six hundred, and the People, the Areopagus taking precedence. The words “Areopagus” (Acts xvii. 19) and “Mars’ Hill” (Acts xvii. 22) are really the same, one being Greek and the other Latin and English.

Before we go further, we shall be well advised to go back to the record in Acts xvii., and discover its structure, so that we may have the backbone of the argument in our minds, as we consider each of the individual items in turn.

Paul at Athens (Acts xvii. 15 - xviii. 1).

A | xviii. 1. Paul departs from Athens.

Paul’s encounter with the philosophers, and the conversion of at least one of them, Dionysius the Areopagite, is evidently the important feature of the passage. Paul’s preaching of Jesus and the resurrection was the doctrine that struck these philosophers as something “new”, and his double reference to “ignorance” (xvii. 23, 30), coming from one whom they had esteemed a “Babbler”, must have impressed them.

We read that the Apostle’s spirit was “stirred within him” as he saw the city “wholly given up to idolatry”—or, as the margin has it, “full of idols” (Acts xvii. 16). A writer of ancient times, Petronius, said of Athens that “it was easier there to meet a god than a man”, and Paul would have been horrified to see that they had even erected a statue of the High Priest of Israel, Hyrcanus. Statues in every conceivable attitude, size and material met the beholder’s gaze at every turn. There were more statues in Athens, said Pausanias, than in the whole of Greece.

True to one part of his commission the Apostle “disputed in the synagogue with the Jews”, but he also remembered that he was the Apostle to the Gentiles, and so we find him “in the market place daily”, disputing with them that meet him (Acts xvii. 17). Three topographical features of Athens must be understood if we are to follow the Apostle’s steps intelligently: the Agora, the Areopagus, and the Acropolis. The Agora (or market place) lay at the foot of the hill that dominates the city. In the Agora was the Painted Porch, which gave its name to the Stoic school of philosophy which met there. The Areopagus was the rocky elevation a little removed from the Agora, and obtained its name from the legend that Mars was tried there by an assembly of the gods for murder. On the top of this hill was a platform about 60 yards long and 24 yards broad, the platform being approached by a flight of steps. At the top of the steps were two stones, one called the Stone of Impudence, upon which Paul would have taken his stand. A rock-cut bench accommodated the assembled judges. Here, some centuries earlier, Socrates had answered to the charge of corrupting the Athenians with strange gods and new doctrines, and had been condemned to death.

The Acropolis, an isolated rock rising from the centre of the city, is not mentioned by name in the Acts, but it must have been included in the Apostle's sweeping reference to "temples made with hands" and "art and man's device". It was the heart of the city, and was to the Greek what Mount Sion was to the Hebrew. Aristides, the rhetorician, fancifully expresses the attitude of the Athenians to the Acropolis by saying that it was the middle of five concentric circles of a shield, of which the outer four were Athens, Attica, Greece, and the world. At the Acropolis were temples and shrines in one jeweled heap; here also stood the Parthenon, the Temple of the Virgin, regarded as the jewel upon the girdle of the earth, an architectural marvel. The visitor to the British Museum should not fail to examine the collection known as the "Elgin marbles", where portions of this and other temples from the Acropolis may be seen.

In the Agora, the Apostle encountered "certain philosophers of the Epicureans, and of the Stoics". With regard to the Epicureans, Dr Churton observes:

> "They allowed that the world was made, but maintained that it came together by chance, 'a fortuitous concourse of atoms', and that the Deity took no part in its administration."

Cicero reports that Epicurus said "Death is nothing to us, for what is dissolved is insensible", while Tertullian writes: Nihil esse post mortem, Epicuri schola est: "After death is nothing is the teaching of Epicurus."

The Stoics, on the other hand, were pantheists and fatalists. They taught that the Deity pervades the matter of the world, just as honey fills the comb of the hive. They undermined the doctrines of Providence, and personal responsibility, and judgment to come, and also believed that under the One God, Who ruled above, were divine beings, called demons, who acted as mediators. The doctrines of the two schools have been summed up in the words "Pleasure" and "Pride".

It is interesting to note that Seneca, who was a Stoic, speaks as follows:

> "It is usual to teach men how to worship the gods. We should forbid men to light lamps on the Sabbath, because the gods have no need of light, and men take no pleasure in smoke. He that knows God serves and honours him. We should forbid men to bring sheets and bathing-combs to Jove, or to hold a glass before Juno, for God seeks no > ministers. Why not? He ministers to mankind; He is everywhere and ready to assist all."

The Apostle's words in Acts xvii. 24, 25 become even more pointed in the light of this Stoic's remarks.

Some of the philosophers that heard Paul speak said: "What will this babbler say?" The word "babbler" here is spermologos, primarily a small bird like a sparrow, a "seed-picker". It was later applied to beggars who picked up what food they could in the Agora, and then to those who, like parasites, lived by flattery.

Others who heard Paul said:

> "He seemeth to be a setter-forth of strange gods: because he preached unto them Jesus and the resurrection" (xvii. 18).

The word "gods" here is daimonion, and it is practically impossible for Luke to have written this word without thinking of Socrates, who had been charged with kaino daimonia eispheron, "bringing in new demons". As we have noted earlier, to the Athenian a "demon" was not a "devil", but a lesser divinity; and the emphasis which the Apostle placed on "Jesus and the resurrection" made them think that he was introducing another of the many "demons" with which the pagan world abounded. There are some, even, who think that they imagined "Jesus and Anastasis" to be two gods, and it is certainly true that there were altars at Athens to such qualities as Fame and Modesty, Impetuosity and Persuasion.

We next read (verse 19) that "they took him, and brought him unto Areopagus, saying, May we know what this new doctrine, whereof thou speakest, is?" The magnetic word here was the word "new" for Luke adds:

> "All the Athenians and strangers which were there, spent their time in nothing else, but either to tell, or to hear something NEWER (kainoteron)" (Acts xvii. 21).

Demosthenes noted this characteristic of the Athenians, and another writer gave them the nickname kechenaioi, or "gapers". Demades suggested that the crest of Athens ought to have been a great tongue.

And so the Apostle standing in the midst of Mars' Hill, surrounded by men for whom any reference to the O.T. Scriptures would have been useless, seizes upon the presence of an altar to the unknown god, to preach to these philosophers a wonderful gospel appeal—an appeal, however, which cannot be rightly appreciated without some understanding of the Stoic and Epicurean philosophers.

Bishop Wordsworth has given a good summary of the Apostle's address as follows:

> "This speech contains a statement of the Unity of the Godhead (verse 23), against Polytheism; of the Creations of all things by Him, against the Epicurean theory of a fortuitous concourse of atoms; of its Government by Him, against the Stoic doctrine of > Fate, and the Epicurean notion of indifference (verses 23, 24); of the Divine Omnipresence, and of the autarkeia (self-sufficiency) of the One Great First Cause (verse 25) in opposition to the popular theology; of the origin of all nations from one blood, against the Athenian conceit of their own dignity as autochthones (indigenous to the soil, as distinct from a settler); of the spirituality of the Godhead in opposition to idolatry (verse29); of the witness to God's existence, and other attributes, in man's conscience and in human nature, and in the visible world (verse 29). It concludes with a reply to the objection that these are new doctrines (verse 30), and with a statement of the doctrine of human accountability and universal judgment to come by One Whom God has appointed; of which He has given a pledge by His resurrection from the dead."

It is to be regretted that the A.V. makes the Apostle open his address with a reference to Athenian "superstition", for this at once alters the whole tone of his speech. A better rendering would be: "I observe that in every respect ye are very religious." As Farrar remarks, "It is possible to be 'uncompromising' in opinions, without being violent in language or uncharitable in temper."

The Apostle then proceeds:

> "For as I passed by, and beheld the objects of your devotions, I found an altar with this inscription, 'TO THE UNKNOWN GOD'."

Diogenes Laertius tells us that the Athenians, suffering from an epidemic, were commanded by Epimenides to allow sheep to wander at will, and wherever one lay down, to sacrifice it to THE PROPER GOD. We also have the words of Philostratus: "It is wise to speak well of all the gods, and that at Athens, where altars even of unknown gods are erected."

It is absolutely necessary in speaking, that one's hearers, whether Jews or Gentiles, believers or unbelievers, should have some common ground with the Speaker, which he can use as a starting-point. The "common ground" between Paul and the Jew was provided by the O.T. Scriptures and their Messianic testimony, and he accordingly proceeded to prove from the Scriptures "that Jesus was the Christ". No such common ground, however, was possible with the Apostle's audience on Mars' Hill. He therefore seizes upon the confession of ignorance and need that stood out so pathetically on that altar, and with that as a basis, he proceeds to lead his hearers on, until at last, by a series of steps, he reaches his subject of "Jesus and the resurrection".

> "Whom therefore ye ignorantly (or perhaps, 'unconsciously') worship, Him declare I unto you."

The Apostle then proceeds to demonstrate the folly both of idolatry and of both schools of philosophy, by proclaiming the true nature of God, the Creator.

The fact that the Greeks of Athens had gone so far as to erect a statue in honour of Hyrcanus, the High Priest, makes it quite within the realm of possibility that, having adopted practically all the gods of Asia, Europe and Africa (see Jerome on Titus), they might have included also the God of the Jews. They could not, however, have erected a statue for the Jews abominated graven images. Also they could give their altar no name, for the Jews avoided the utterance of the name "Jehovah". Dion Cassius speaks of the God of the Jews as arrheton, "not to be expressed" (xxxvii. 17), and Caligula, speaking to the Jews, refers to their God as "Him that may not be named by you" (Philo).

Standing upon Mars' Hill, the Apostle had before him perhaps the most wonderful assemblage of "temples made with hands" and objects of devotion "engraved by art and man's device", that the world could provide, but he sweeps them all aside, to point his hearers to the true God. Appealing to their own poets and philosophers—Aratus of Cilicia and Cleanthes had said, "We are his offspring"—the Apostle, without endorsing the mythology of these writers, shows how unreasonable it is for the "offspring" of God to think that the Godhead is "like unto gold, or silver, or stone".

To the Jew, the Apostle's witness was that "Jesus" was the "Anointed". To the philosopher, he declares that "that Man", Who had been raised from the dead, was the Lord's "appointed".

> "Because He hath appointed a day, in which He will judge the world in righteousness by that Man Whom He hath ordained, whereof He hath given assurance unto all men, in that He hath raised Him from the dead" (Acts xvii. 31).

The historic fact of the resurrection was open to all men to investigate, and upon this the Apostle based his claim. The times of ignorance had passed, and God now commanded "all men everywhere" to repent.

At the mention once more of the "resurrection of the dead", some "jeered", while others said: "We will hear thee again of this matter." So far as we know from the Scriptures no church was founded at Athens, but at least one trophy of grace was brought from this city of idols and philosophy—Dionysius, the Areopagite. We know nothing of the social standing of the "woman named Damaris", but her inclusion here brings Athens into line with Philippi, Thessalonica and Berea, for women are specially mentioned in each of these cities as being among the first to believe.

And so, with undaunted faith, the Apostle passes from Athens, the city of learning, to Corinth, the city of license.

#12. The Sphere of Man's Dominion.
pp. 15 - 19

It is evident that the present creation, vast as it is, finds its focus in man, in spite of the fact that, compared with that creation, he is infinitesimally small. The Psalmist gives utterance to this truth when he says:

> "When I consider Thy heavens, the work of Thy fingers, the moon and the stars, which Thou has ordained; what is man?" (Psa. viii. 3, 4).

The vastness of creation is placed over against the insignificance of man. The Psalmist continues:

> "Thou madest him a little lower than the angels, and hast crowned him with glory and honour. Thou madest him to have dominion over the works of Thine hands" (Psa. viii. 5, 6).

Here man is viewed as crowned in the midst of created things. We shall have to return later to the consideration of what man's dominion involves, but for the moment let us get some idea of man and his setting, the world of nature. The universe, of which the world of nature is a part, comprises "things invisible" as well as "things visible" (Col. i. 16). For the time being, man is "a little lower than the angels" (Heb. ii. 7 margin), and the invisible spirit world is not his legitimate sphere (Col. ii. 18). He is warned, however, against the false deduction, that what is most evident to his senses must necessarily be the most real, for "the things which are seen are temporal; but the things which are not seen are aionion" (II Cor. iv. 18). He must remember that "existence is essence clothed with form" (Tiberglein), but that form is not essential to the perfection of being. As we read in John v. 37: "Ye have neither heard His voice, nor seen His (the Father's) shape."

There are many passages of Scripture that teach us to view the "fashion of the world" as we would the shifting scenes of a theatre.

> "The fashion of this world passeth away" (I Cor. vii. 31).
> "The world passeth away" (I John ii. 17).

Something of the truth of this was perceived and expressed by our own great poet:

> "The great globe itself,
> Yea, all which it inherit, shall dissolve
> And, like this substantial pageant faded,
> Leave not a rack behind" (Tempest iv. 1).

Those things that are shakeable are destined to be removed; only those things that are unshakeable will abide. These abiding things belong to the Kingdom of God, and to the One Who remains (Heb. xii. 27, 28; xiii. 8), and they are in direct contrast with the present creation:

> "They shall perish . . . . . they shall wax old as doth a garment . . . . . they shall be changed" (Heb. i. 11, 12).

This was the character of the world into which Adam was introduced and over which he was given dominion.

We read that man was "moulded" out of the dust of the earth (Gen. ii. 7), and that upon breathing with his nostrils the breath of life, he became a living soul. While it is true that the word translated "soul" is used of the lower creatures as well as of man (Gen. i. 20, 21, 24), yet in man it is associated with qualities and powers that are not possessed by the lower orders of creation.

The word "soul", when used of man in the Scriptures, is often synonymous with "self". Compare, for instance, an expression used by Job with a parallel one used by Paul:

> "Though I were perfect, yet would I not know my soul (self), I would despise my life" (Job ix. 21).
> "For I know nothing by myself"—or "For, to myself, I am conscious of nothing (evil), yet am I not hereby justified" (I Cor. iv. 4).

Note also the way in which the Apostle, in Rom. vii., speaks of his "flesh", his "body" and his "mind" as Himself":

> "I (ego) am carnal."
> "It is no longer I (ego) that do it, but sin that dwelleth in me."
> "For I know that in me (emoi) (THAT IS, IN MY FLESH*)* dwelleth no good thing."
> "With the MIND I myself (autos ego) serve the law of God, but with the FLESH, the law of sin" (Rom. vii. 14-25).

Man is spoken of as spirit, and soul, and body (I Thess. v. 23), but it is not strictly true to speak of him as tri-partite, for in Mark xii. 30 we have "heart, mind, and strength"—so that we might as reasonably speak of him as sex-partite. Man is a living soul, an individual made up of spirit, and body, and mind.

The body.—In its present constitution the body limits man to the earth, gives him size and shape, and endows him with the property of impenetrability—which may be defined as that property of matter by virtue of which two bodies cannot occupy the same space at the same time. In this respect man differs from "spirits", and his body differs from that "spiritual body" which will be his in resurrection glory (I Cor. xv. 44).

Flesh, and "flesh and blood".—The present body is one of "flesh and blood", and "flesh and blood" cannot inherit the kingdom of God (I Cor. xv. 50). We know, however, that there will be a body, just as real, though not of flesh and blood, that shall inherit that kingdom in the future (I Cor. xv. 44). Flesh and blood are the concomitants of corporeal life, and belong to that condition described in Hebrews as "for a little lower than the angels" (Heb. ii. 7; see also ii. 14 and 17).

This corporeal body of flesh and blood is suggestive of weakness, transitoriness, and dullness with regard to spiritual things:

> "With him is an arm of flesh: but with us is the Lord our God" (II Chron. xxxii. 8).
> "He remembered that they were but flesh; a wind that passeth away and cometh not again" (Psa. lxxviii. 39).
> "Flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee, but My Father which is in heaven" (Matt. xvi. 17).

Soul and Spirit.—The soul stands for organic life. Adam was "natural", i.e. "soul-ical"—a word derived from psuche. We read in Romans that "the Spirit is life" (Rom. viii. 10), and this is true whether in the present sphere or in the glory. There is a spirit of man and of beast (Eccles. iii. 21), and the body without the spirit is dead (James ii. 26).

The outer man is perishing, but the inward man is renewed from day to day. With this inward man the Apostle delighted in the law of God (Rom. vii. 22), and in this inward body is distinct from this inner man, as the Apostle suggests in II Cor. xii.:

> "I knew a man in Christ above fourteen years ago (whether in the body I cannot tell; or whether out of the body, I cannot tell; God knoweth" (II Cor. xii. 2).

The body can be killed by man, but not the soul (Matt. x. 28); there is a definite distinction between the two. The members of the body are spoken of as "instruments" (Rom. vi. 13). They are the means whereby we see, hear, touch, etc., but it must be remembered that it is we ourselves that do the seeing, or hearing or touching, and not these organs.

The body is spoken of as a "sheath" (Dan. vii. 15), as "clothing" (Job x. 11), as a "house" (Job iv. 19), and as a "tent" (II Pet. i. 13).

Such is a brief summary of the teaching of Scripture concerning man and his world. We have purposely avoided lengthy arguments or extended quotations as we are not so much seeking to teach or prove something hitherto unknown, as to bring together that which we have already learned, so that as we proceed we may build securely upon a good foundation. The nature and extent of man's legitimate dominion and the doctrine that arises out of this is our immediate concern, and this article must be looked upon as a preparation for the study of that subject. This we must reserve for our next paper.

#13. Man's Dominion, and the Way of Cain.
pp. 51 - 58

In our last paper we dealt briefly with the nature of man and the world in which he finds himself, and we learnt that man in his present condition is frail, and that his present world is fleeting. There is, of course, a sphere in which man will attain to immortality and in which his world will "remain", but this belongs to the future resurrection glory, the period of the "glorious liberty of the children of God".

We have already found Psalm viii. to be a valuable passage in connection with the nature of man and the world in which he lives, and we must now turn to this Psalm again to learn something of his dominion.

> "Thou madest him to have dominion over the works of Thy hands; thou hast put all things under his feet: all sheep and oxen, yea, and the beasts of the field; the fowl of the air, and the fish of the sea, and whatsoever passeth through the paths of the sea" (Psa. viii. 6-8).

The works of God's hands include "things in heaven" as well as "things in earth", and the Psalmist certainly recognizes this, for we read: "The heavens are the work of Thy hands" (Psa. cii. 25). It is quite evident that man has no dominion over the sun, moon and stars, but apart from this obvious exception, we might be tempted to believe that dominion over every terrestrial work of God's hands is implied in the words of Gen. i. or Psalm viii. Such, however, is not the case.

We have already quoted Psalm viii. Let us now refer to Gen. i.:

> "And God said, Let us make man in our image, after our likeness: and let them have dominion, over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over the cattle, and over all the earth, and over every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth" (Gen. i. 26).

These words describe the counsel of the Lord before the creation of man. After man was created, the dominion is further defined as follows:

> "And God blessed them and God said unto them, Be fruitful and multiply and replenish the earth, and subdue it, and have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over every living thing that moveth upon the earth" (Gen. i. 28).

It is evident, therefore, that the words "over all the earth" in Gen. i. 26 refer simply to all living things on the earth, and not to all its inorganic elements and forces.

One of the earliest recorded acts of man (in Gen. ii.) is that which sets forth his authority over the lower creation:

> "And out of the ground the Lord God formed every beast of the field, and every fowl of the air; and brought them unto Adam to see what he would call them: and whatsoever Adam called every living creature, that was the name thereof" (Gen. ii. 19).

This dominion was seriously modified by the fall. In Gen. iii. and iv. we read:

> "Cursed is the ground for thy sake" (Gen. iii. 17).
> "When thou tillest the ground, it shall not henceforth yield unto thee her strength" (Gen. iv. 12).

After the flood, when Noah seems to be in some respects in the position of a second Adam, the words of Gen. i. 28 are repeated: "Be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth" (Gen. ix. 1). Instead, however, of this being followed by the same words as in Gen. i., we read:

> "And the fear of you and the dread of you shall be upon every beast of the earth, and upon every fowl of the air, upon all that moveth upon the earth, and upon all the fishes of the sea: into your hand are they delivered" (Gen. ix. 2).

A further change is seen in the fact that whereas in the beginning the food of man was:

> "Every herb bearing seed . . . . . and every tree in the which is the fruit of a tree yielding seed" (Gen. i. 29).

immediately after the fall, in Gen. iii., we read:

> "Thou shalt eat the herb of the field; in the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread" (Gen. iii. 18, 19).

When we come to Gen. ix., we find a further change:

> "Every moving thing that liveth shall be meat for you; even as the green herb have I given you all things" (Gen. ix. 3).

It will be observed that in none of these instances does God give to man, either fallen or unfallen, dominion over what we call to-day the "forces of nature". The fullest dominion was necessarily that which was originally given in Gen. i., and the subsequent modifications, so far from extending the sphere, imply serious limitations.

Before passing on to the real purpose of this article, which is to trace man's departure from the divinely appointed bounds of dominion, as in the case of Cain's line, it is perhaps necessary to correct a false view that is often expressed, and is indeed countenanced by the A.V. translation of Gen. v. 3. The usual view is that, whereas Adam was created in the likeness of God (Gen. v. 1), all his posterity have been begotten in "his" (i.e. in Adam's own) likeness and image—it being implied that this is something quite different. However, in Gen. ix., after the flood, we read that God said: "Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed: for in the image of God made He man" (Gen. ix. 6). And centuries after, James wrote:

> "Therewith bless we God, even the Father; and therewith curse we men, which are made after the similitude of God" (James iii. 9).

The true intention of Gen. v. 3 is expressed by translating the original as follows: "And begat a son in this likeness, after this image"—it being understood that the reference is to the opening verse of the chapter. It is true that Adam fell, and that all men are fallen creatures, but it is also true that all men without exception are made after the similitude of God, and in His image (I Cor. xi. 7).

When man sinned and was subjected to vanity, two courses were open to him—either meek acceptance of the new circumstances, with hope in redeeming love as providing the only just and real solution, or a rebellious breaking away from the path indicated by the Lord, and an attempt to palliate the effects of the curse by means that would be but an extension of the temptation, "Ye shall be as God".

The right spirit in this connection is exhibited by Noah's parents. They evidently felt very sorely the effects of the curse, but instead of casting about for some temporary measure to alleviate its immediate consequences, they looked beyond and named their son, Noah, saying:

> "This same shall comfort us concerning our work and toil of our hands, because of the ground which the Lord hath cursed" (Gen. v. 29).

Lamech did not live to see Noah's typical character fulfilled, for he died 595 years after the birth of Noah, at the significant age of 777. He (Lamech) did, however, look forward by faith to the true solution of the misery brought about by sin, for the ark and the salvation that it sets forth is a type of the divine method, not only of alleviating, but of delivering from, the curse and all its accompaniments.

In contrast with this is the action of Cain. Being driven from the presence of the Lord, instead of meekly accepting the judgment pronounced, he begins to introduce what would now be called "civilizing" measures. He builds a city (Gen. iv. 17), and his posterity introduce the harp, the organ, and working in metals (Gen. iv. 21, 22). The practice of having several wives also originated in the time of Cain. While cities, organs and metal working may be innocent innovations in themselves, they are deadly if they are introduced to take the keenness off the edge of God's judgment. From Cain's day onwards to the present time, man has gone on adding layer upon layer of this veneer. Each layer modified and soothed for a time, but the curse upon the earth made itself again and again. The groan of creation will never be hushed, though cities be magnified out of all recognition, and music be "on tap" from morning till night.

It is fairly safe to say that, should the reader maintain the view expressed above in the presence of any half-dozen people, one at least of the company would point with triumphant finger to man's "inventions". These "inventions" are not forgotten in Scripture. The following is the comment of inspired wisdom, as recorded in Eccles. vii.:

> "God hath made man upright, but they have sought out many inventions" (Eccles. vii. 29).

It is impossible to miss the intention of this observation. The seeking out of inventions is placed in direct contrast with being made upright, indicating that the inventions of man are an exhibition of his fall.

The word translated "inventions" here is derived from the Hebrew chashab, "to think, purpose, intend". It is used in a good sense when referring to the "purpose" of the Lord (Jer. l. 45), or the "cunning" craftsmanship of those who worked on the tabernacle, but it usually has an evil meaning, as the following passages indicate:

> "Saul thought to make David fall" (I Sam. xviii. 25).
> "His wicked device which he devised against the Jews" (Esther ix. 25).
> "They imagined a mischievous device" (Psa. xxi. 11).
> "Invent to themselves instruments of music" (Amos vi. 5).
> "He shall forecast his devices" (Dan. xi. 24).

Someone may perhaps object to the inclusion of the passage from Amos in this list, on the ground that most musical instruments have been invented by someone, and that the possession of them can hardly be regarded as evil. There is only one satisfactory way of answering objections of this kind, and that is to let the Book speak for itself.

The following is the context of the passage concerned:

> "Woe to them that are at ease in Zion, and trust in the mountain of Samaria, which are named chief of the nations, to whom the house of Israel came > Pass ye unto Calneh, and see; and from thence go ye to Hamath the great: then go down to Gath of the Philistines; be they better than these kingdoms? or their border greater than your border?
> Ye that put far away the evil day, and cause the seat of violence to come near;
> That lie upon beds of ivory, and stretch themselves upon their couches, and eat the lambs out of the flock, and the calves out of the midst of the stall;
> That chant to the sound of the viol, and invent to themselves instruments of musick, like David;
> That drink wine in bowls, and anoint themselves with the chief ointments; but they are not grieved for the affliction of Joseph" (Amos vi. 1-6).

It will be seen that the evil lay in the "device", not in the mere possession of the instrument. It was one of the many devices introduced to deaden the senses, to help men to "put far away the evil day", and not to "grieve for the affliction of Joseph". It is this feature that stigmatizes so much of so-called "modern progress". It is used as an opiate to deaden the conscience, as a distraction to drown the groan of creation, as a palliative to take off the edge of the curse—in other words, it is the way of Cain.

We find further reference to the evil effect of inventions in II Chron. xxvi.:

> "And he made in Jerusalem engines, invented by cunning men" ("inventions, invented by the inventor", Rotherham) (II Chron. xxvi. 15).

Assuming that Uzziah, as king, had the right to defend his city and country against the enemy, one might perhaps object and ask why it should not be legitimate for him to make use of the inventive genius of his time. Again, let the Book speak for itself:

> "As long as he sought the Lord, God made him to prosper . . . . . he strengthened himself exceedingly . . . . . he was marvellously helped, till he was strong; but when he was strong, his heart was lifted up to destruction" (II Chron. xxvi. 5, 8, 15, 16).

It was not the mere possession of these inventions that mattered, but the evil influence that their possession always produced—the inducing of a self-reliance that was incipiently anti-christian. The next recorded act of Uzziah was the usurpation of the priesthood, an action which was visited by leprosy, and which cut him off for the rest of his days from the house of the Lord.

Two other words are found in the O.T. which are translated "inventions"—one in the Psalms, and one in the Book of Proverbs. The word used in the Psalms has two forms, maalal and alilah, both derived from the same word meaning "work'. Is "work" then to be condemned as evil? Once again we must examine the context.

> "Thou tookest vengeance on their inventions" (Psa. xcix. 8).
> "They provoked Him to anger with their inventions" (Psa. cvi. 29).
> "They went a whoring with their own inventions" (Psa. cvi. 39).

These are the statements. Let us now consider the reason for the Lord's attitude. Hebrew poetry balances thought rather than sound, and so we read in Psalm cvi. 39:

> "Thus were they defiled
> With their own works;
> And went a whoring
> With their own inventions."

It is evident that the word "works" here corresponds with "inventions".

In the same Psalm, the same word comes again in verses 13 and 35:

> "They soon forgat His works."
> "They were mingled among the heathen and learned their works."

The terrible expression "to go a whoring" is used once more in the Psalms, at the close of Asaph's experience in Psalm lxxii. In this passage it is used in direct contrast with that utter trust in the Lord that Asaph had learned in the Sanctuary:

> "Whom have I in heaven but Thee? and there is none upon earth that I desire beside Thee" (verse 25).
> "Thou hast destroyed all them that go a whoring from Thee" (verse 27).

Here again it will be seen that the real evil in these "inventions" lay in the fact that they undermined Israel's trust in the Lord, and substituted something else in its place.

The reference to “inventions” in Prov. viii. 12 does not call for special comment, but the reader should notice the one occurrence of the word in the N.T.—in Rom. i. Of all the terrible lists of sins that are found in the N.T. none, perhaps, is quite so black as that which occurs at the end of Rom. i., and it is in this context that we find the only N.T. reference to “inventions”: “Inventors of evil things” (Rom. i. 30).

Coming back now to our main subject at the beginning of this article, namely, man’s legitimate sphere of dominion in contrast with his attempted dominion over the forces of nature, it is evident that the same principle was at work in the initial temptation of our first parents.

> “Ye shall be as God, knowing good and evil” (Gen. iii. 5).

The Evil One suggested that God was holding back further blessings and powers for selfish ends. It was certainly true that God had given Adam a limited domain, but it was equally untrue to suggest that any good thing had been withheld. The word “good”, like most terms, is relative. What would be “good” for a man might be “evil” for a child; and what would be “good” for an angel might be “evil” for Adam. Had Adam been found faithful in few things, he would have been made ruler over many things. Satan, however, tempted him to seek control over powers that, while man was still immature, would inevitably be evil in their results.

The Bible does not use the language of Science, but it makes many references to the mighty forces of “Nature”. In some passages these forces are said to be under control of a special angel, and it would seem that man himself, though at first “a little lower than the angels”, was destined in God’s good time to be higher than the angels, and to have an extended dominion. This dominion was at first related primarily to the animal world, but it would doubtless have been extended to include the world of Chemistry and Physics, with perfect power and full knowledge—whereas to-day man is becoming more and more conscious that he is dabbling with forces which at any moment may turn back and destroy him. Much that is called “progress” may really be the intrusion, before the time, into things that were intended as man’s domain at a subsequent period.

We have already exceeded our space and must conclude our study for the time being. While we are living in the world, we must of necessity come in contact with its “inventions” on every hand, but, if we realize something of their character, we shall see them in their true light as part of the outworking of the pseudos—“the lie”, the imitation, the spurious—and shall not allow them to come between us and the Lord, Who alone can supply the one and only cure for all life’s ills.

#14. The Constitution of Man, and the Possibility of Revelation.
pp. 87 - 91

In previous studies we have referred to the fact that the creation of man in the divine Image was vitally connected with the making known to him of truths pertaining to the unseen spiritual world. This matter is of such importance, and its bearing upon the value of inspired Scripture so vital to our understanding, that we make no apology for giving it further consideration.

An important point in this connection is well expressed by Bishop Browne as follows:

> "We are to lay it down as a sure and undeniable truth, which holds universally, that we have not the least perception or idea of things immaterial, of purely spiritual beings, or of God in particular, as they are in their own nature."

The reader can easily test the accuracy of this statement for himself. Apart from imagery borrowed from his own experiences, let him endeavour to construct a mental conception of "spirit". Something invisible, inaudible, intangible: something not conditioned by space and time, and uninfluenced by natural forces. Under such conditions, he will find himself completely baffled. Every conception that he forms of pure spirit, will be invested by him with attributes that belong to the world of time, sense and space.

A man born blind can have no true conception of "light". We may tell him that light is derived from the "Sun", but he will have little idea of what the "Sun" is, apart from its name and the fact of its existence. We may tell him that light is coeval with the Sun, that it is distinct from the Sun and yet inseparable from it. We may also tell him that this light diffuses itself over illimitable expanses, and that upon it depends the life of all creatures on the earth. The man born blind will have some idea of what light is, but his conception will not be comparable with what it would have been if his eyes had been opened. So it is with the revelation concerning "God" that is given to us in Scripture. All men by their very nature, are born blind so far as spiritual things are concerned. All that has been said above concerning "light" has also been said concerning "Christ", and theological arguments concerning the Person of Christ must appear as pitiable to the onlooking angels and principalities, as would the arguments that one blind man might put forward to another concerning the nature of light.

It would seem that God has two possible ways of revealing Himself to man:

(1) He must raise man up to a higher level, so that he shall be able to comprehend the true nature of the non-material world, or
(2) He Himself must condescend to man's lowly estate, must come down to the level of his understanding, use terms with which he is acquainted, and ultimately, if the revelation is to be complete, come among men as a Man Himself.

No student of Scripture can have any doubt as to the course actually adopted. In the first place God condescended to use human language and human imagery, and then finally, in the fullness of time, He manifested Himself in Christ, so completely that it could be said: "He that hath seen Me hath seen the Father."

By his very constitution as originally created, man is a creature whose ideas are first of all received through his senses. These sense-impressions are the only raw material for thought to work upon. If we could conceive of a man being created, and deprived at the outset of his five senses, we should have a being who could never think, and could never understand or know anything. When God created man, He made in His own likeness and image, and it is in this likeness that we have the one medium whereby the unseen and invisible may be translated into terms intelligible to man.

The Scriptures abound with metaphors and analogies. The invisible God is spoken of as having eyes, ears, hands, feet, nostrils, and as experiencing such feelings as anger and wrath. The attributes of goodness, righteousness, and power are ascribed to Him, but every word that is used, and every image expressed is essentially human. We must always bear in mind that when we speak, for instance, of God's "goodness", we are using a human term, which employs something which is known to man, and by virtue of its resemblance to the Divine reality, allows us to see the true goodness of God "as in a glass, darkly". Revelation does not come to man with a new set of ideas and express them in an entirely new language. If it did, the revelation would be useless. What Scripture does is to take terms that are known to man, and transfer them by analogy to the corresponding realities of the spiritual world.

The early writers saw this fact clearly. God was called Anonymous ("Without a name") because He is in Himself inexpressible in human language. Justin Martyr says:

> "There is no 'name' for God. Theos, Pater, Kurios, Despotes, are not properly 'names' but appellations only for the Supreme Being, taken from His operations, and the benefits we receive from Him."

For this reason the Lord Jesus Christ is revealed as "The Image of the Invisible God", "The Logos", "The Form of God", "The Express Image (visible character) of His Person" (or Substance, the underlying invisible reality), "God manifest in the flesh". If Adam was ever to understand God, it was essential in the very nature of things that there should be at the outset an element in common, and for this reason man was made "like" God.

In every normal man there is a set of what we may call a priori laws of the mind. If the mind is not utterly mendacious, it affirms, positively and unreservedly, that the two and two are four, and that acceptance of this fact is essential to all intellectual activity. The ideas and beliefs which come to us in this way are the common basis upon which all subsequent reasoning and revelation rest. It would be the annihilation of all reasonable thought to deny such a self-evident axiom as that the shortest distance between two points lying in the same plane is a straight line.

We are so constituted by creation, that it is inconceivable that this should not be true everywhere and at all times. And further, we are also sure that these things are so inherently, and that they have not merely been willed so by almighty power. If seven is multiplied by seven we have forty-nine. Can any one imagine that God, by the mere arbitrary exercise of His will and power, could make this product either more or less? In such simple basic things lies the germ of all righteousness, and their acknowledgment is the test of our conception of righteousness.

Bishop Pearson writes:

> "God cannot be known unto us otherwise than by relation to creatures, as for example, under the aspect of dominion, or of cause, or in some other relation."

Hamilton writes:

> "It is indeed only through an analogy of the human with the Divine nature that we are percipient or recipient of the Divinity."

To quote again from Bishop Browne:

> "Though we know not God in His own nature, yet are we not wholly ignorant of Him, but may attain to imperfect knowledge of Him through the analogy between human things and divine."

So God made man in His likeness, and by reason of the fact that human things resemble, on a lower plane, things that are spiritual and divine, He could speak to man concerning Himself, giving him a sufficient revelation to fulfil all his present needs, and at the same time creating a desire to know more in God's good time. Man was made "for a little lower than the angels", but was destined to be raised above them when God's time came.

The discernment of good and evil belongs to the angels, as is made clear in II Sam. xiv. 17, and in Heb. v. 14 this discernment is said to be characteristic of adulthood. The temptation in Eden was vitally concerned with this question of good and evil:

> "Ye shall be as gods (angels), or as God (Elohim), knowing good and evil" (Gen. iii. 5).
> "Behold the man is become as one of us, to know good and evil" (Gen. iii. 22).

Satan tempted man sinfully to anticipate that which would have been his in God's appointed time; to throw aside the revelation by analogy, and to attempt to know "even as we are known". The attempt proved disastrous, and has left its mark upon man and his world ever since.

The Scripture reveal truth to us "as in a glass, darkly". In resurrection glory, when made higher than the angels, we shall see "face to face". When we possess "spiritual" and "heavenly" bodies in resurrection (I Cor. xv. 40, 44) there will be no need for the analogies that are necessary in our present limited condition. Seeing "through a glass, darkly" will then give place to "knowing as we are known". God's ways and times are governed by infallible wisdom and unerring love. In the fullness of time, Christ, the Great Analogy of God, came into the world, and we are now able to see the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ. Moreover, we must never forget that the gift of human language, and the fact that the revelation of God is couched in this language, obeying the laws of grammar, and adopting the figures and imagery with which the human mind is familiar, that all this part of the divine condescension, just as surely as is the fact of the Word "becoming flesh" and the "form of God" being exchanged for the "form of a servant".

In all this we have been speaking primarily of man as originally created and constituted. We do not forget that redemption and newness of life have, through grace, entered this present sphere, and that the believe, being united with Christ, and having the Holy Spirit of God, already in measure anticipates that new creation, in which the knowledge of the Lord shall cover the earth, "as the waters cover the sea". So we find the Apostle writing in his Epistle to the Corinthians:

> "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love Him, but God hath revealed them unto us by His Spirit: for the Spirit searcheth all things, yea, the deep things of God. For what man knoweth the things of man, save the spirit of man which is in him? Even so the things of God knoweth no man, but the Spirit of God . . . . . we have the mind of Christ" (I Cor. ii. 9-11, 13, 16).

#15. The Problem of Evil, and the Lesson of Gen. i. - iii.
pp. 128 - 134

Is there any one, in possession of his faculties, who has not been exercised, at some time and in some degree, by the "problem of evil"? It has engaged the minds of the greatest philosophers, thinkers and theologians, since the beginning of history. The Book of Job is but an exposition of one of the many aspects of the problem, and what is the Book of Ecclesiastes but a record of the searchings of the mind into the same profound subject? What is the conflict of the ages but the conflict of good and evil? What is the theme of Genesis and Revelation but this same problem? And what is the very gospel of the grace of God but the solution, by Divine love, of the problem of good and evil? It should be noticed, however, that, while men of all times and opinions have had their "problems" concerning the origin, nature and end of evil, there is no such "problem" of good. It is true that the subject of "good", its character, nature and fruit, has been a perennial theme for student, philosopher and preacher alike, but there is no problem about good, as there is about evil. Opinions concerning "evil" range from that which regards God as the Creator of "all things" and the Author of evil—not merely evil as a penalty for sin, but evil in its moral aspects—to the other extreme of the total denial that evil has any existence at all.

Poets of all shades of thought have clothed the mystery of evil with their imagery. The haunting cadences of the Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam, the tragic verses of Browning's "Saul", the light and shade of Tennyson's "In Memoriam", the many lines which the reader may recall from Shakespeare, indicate how deeply this problem enters into the very stuff of life. The reader would probably not wish for pages of quotations on this point, and we will therefore be content with two only before we pass on to the positive teaching of the Scriptures. Here is one of the many aspects of the subject from Shakespeare's pen:

> "For nought so vile that on the earth doth live
> But to the earth some special good doth give,
> Nor aught so good but strain'd from that fair use,
> Revolts from true birth, stumbling on abuse:
> Virtue itself turns vice, being misapplied.
> And vice sometimes by action dignified.
> (Romeo and Juliet ii. 111)."

The underlying thought here is that the "good" or "evil" resides not so much in the thing itself, but in the use or abuse that is made of it—an aspect that we shall understand more clearly when we have considered the teaching of Gen. i.-iii.

Our second quotation is from the writings of Sir Richard Burton, a master of Oriental languages. He gives expression here to something of the Oriental attitude towards good and evil.

> "There is no good, there is no bad, these are the whims of mortal will:
> What works me weal that call I good, what harms and hurts I hold as ill.
> They change with space, they shift with race, and in the veriest span of time,
> Each vice has worn a virtuous crown, all good been banned as sin and crime."

There is indeed a mixture here of good and evil, and it is certainly wrong to affirm that "good" and "evil" are but the "whims of mortal will". The second line of the quotation:

> "What works me weal that call I good, what harms and hurts I hold as ill."

we shall find to be the very essence of the temptation of our first parents, and an indication of the real nature of "evil". This, however, we shall see more clearly when studying the Scriptures concerned.

While Burton may not have meant what we mean by "dispensational truth", his third line does express what we have all seen, namely, that what was "good" for Israel under the law may be "evil" for a believer under grace. These things, if they do nothing else, will, we trust, help us to appreciate the many-sidedness of this great theme, and in view of its complexity and the extreme diversity of teaching and opinion with regard to it, any contribution which we may offer towards the problem of the nature of evil, must be offered with genuine humility, and based upon the facts that cannot be denied.

The first point that we should like to make may be expressed as a simple statement of fact:

(1) "Good"(Heb. Tob) occurs in the record of Creation seven times (Gen. i. 3 - ii. 3).
(2) "Evil" (Heb. Ra) does not occur once in the record of Creation (Gen. i. 3 - ii. 3).
(3) "Evil" is introduced into the narrative of Genesis, where man, a moral agent, is being tested (Gen. ii. 9).

We have stated these facts as baldly as possible. What do they imply? The fact that "good" can be attributed seven times to creation in its varied forms, without the necessity of "evil" as a foil, teaches us that "good" is positive and not dependent upon "evil". Darkness may be the antithesis of light, but light is positive and does not depend upon darkness, for we read that "God is light, and in Him is no darkness at all". "Good", therefore, is not a relative term, but a positive one.

We observe, in the next instance, that "evil" is mentioned for the first time in connection with the trial of a moral agent. While the narrative has to deal with sun, moon and stars, beast, bird and fish, and even the fact of the creation of man, "evil" is unknown. Not until man is called upon to choose does "evil" come into the narrative, and not until desire leads to action does evil itself actually emerge. The tree of Gen. ii. 9 is not called "the tree of good and evil" but "the tree of the knowledge of good and evil". The knowledge or perception did not reside in the tree itself, but was bound up with man's reaction to the prohibition of which the partaking of this tree was the visible emblem. The whole question revolved around the choice of the man, rather than the nature of the tree. It does not matter what the "fruit" may have been, whether the traditional pomegranate or the equally traditional apple; this makes no difference whatever. Had man obeyed the voice of the Lord he would still have known "good and evil", but it would have been an experience that was blessed, and under Divine favour. Man, however, disobeyed, and attained to this knowledge under the Divine displeasure, and it ended in forfeiture, sorrow, shame and death.

There is no such thing as "good" or "evil". "Good" or "evil" as such cannot be created. It would be possible for "good things" or "evil things" to be created, but when we deal with "evil" and its problem, we are not dealing with a substance that exists somewhere in bulk, for evil is the result of thought, desire, choice, will. It is therefore impossible to teach that "God is the Author of evil". For God to be the Author of moral evil, it would necessitate that Adam should be compelled to disobey, which in the very nature of things would be a contradiction. If Adam's "disobedience" really "obeyed" the dictates of his Creator, then sin is no longer sin, for a disobedience which turns out to be obedience is not only nonsense, it borders, by the very nature of its subject, upon blasphemy.

Let us now turn to Gen. iii., a chapter that is rightly considered as the seed plot of Biblical doctrine.

In the account of the temptation of Adam and Eve, we find that something which was hitherto understood to be a prohibited things, is presented in such a light as to be considered “good”. This is the essential nature of evil. Evil is not pursued or practiced for itself alone, however wicked the perpetrator; the evil course is followed, and its consequences accepted, because it has been made to wear a false mask, and appear as “good”. The Tempter recognized this fact and acted accordingly.

> “Yea, hath God said, Ye shall not eat of every tree of the garden?”

Had the Serpent not intended to create in the mind the false idea that the prohibited tree was really “good”, he could have stated the same set of facts and have created an opposite effect by presenting them in some such way as the following:

> How kind of God to surround you with so many evidences of His love and care. Every tree except one is at your disposal, and that one is evidently kept from you by the same love that has so lavishly provided the rest.

To appreciate the significance of the Tempter’s opening attack, emphasis should be placed on the word “every”:

> “Yea, hath God said, ye shall not eat of every tree of the garden?”

Having slipped the mask of “good” over the features of “evil”, the Tempter has only to stand by and skillfully play upon the mind of man to accomplish his ends. The human mind has been so constructed that it will seek that which appears to be “good”. This lies at the root of life itself, and without it the human species would die out.

Having stimulated the interest of the woman, the Tempter now proceeds to justify here disobedience. This prohibited tree, he suggests, will enable you to reach the goal of your very existence: “Ye shall be as God.” From one point of view this aspiration could be regarded as a blasphemous usurpation of the prerogative of Deity, but, from another aspect, to be “like God” is the true goal of every believer and the very object of redeeming grace itself.

Human activity and response now come into play. Satan has touched the inner springs of action, and he can now leave the rest to work itself out.

> “And when the woman saw that the tree was good for food, and that it was pleasant to the eyes, and a tree to be desired to make one wise, she took of the fruit thereof” (Gen. iii. 6).

Once the premises of Satan’s argument are granted, no fault can be found with Eve’s subsequent response. If once “evil” can be made to appear “good”, sin will inevitably follow. Man is assailable through three avenues, and wherever “evil” can be made to appear as “good” for either body, soul or spirit, man will naturally desire it and the consequence will be sin.

(1) HIS BODY . . . . . “Good for food.”
(2) HIS SOUL . . . . . “Pleasant to the eyes.”
(3) HIS MIND . . . . . “To make one wise.”

In Gen. iii. we read that Eve was "beguiled" (Gen. iii. 13); in II Cor. xi. that she was beguiled through the Serpent's "subtlety" (II Cor. xi. 3); and in I Tim. ii. that "the woman being deceived, was in the transgression" (I Tim. ii. 14). At this point we must anticipate a possible objection. The reader may perhaps criticize our argument somewhat as follows:

> The argument as to the essential nature of evil (as something that is falsely presented as 'good') breaks down immediately one turns from the account of the woman's fall to the sin of Adam. In I Tim. ii. 14, which is only partially quoted above, we read:
>
> 'And Adam was not deceived, but the woman, being deceived, was in the transgression.'
>
> Adam, therefore, knew what he was doing, and the argument as to the essential nature of evil breaks down.

To this objection we would reply that we have not yet considered the question with regard to Adam, and this we propose now to do—carrying back with us, from I Tim. ii. 14, the fact that Adam was not deceived. Adam took the fruit of the tree, knowing that Satan had dressed up evil to appear as good.

When the Lord questioned Adam, he gave as the reason why he had transgressed:

> "The woman whom Thou gavest to be with me, she gave me of the tree, and I did eat" (Gen. iii. 12).

The most common interpretation of Adam's answer is to regard him as one who was not above shifting the blame on to the shoulders of the weaker vessel, but such a view, we feel sure, is not the true one. Eve was deceived into believing an "evil" was a "good", and so was Adam. By her act of disobedience, the woman who had been given "to be with him" was already separated from Adam, by sin which would inevitably involve death. By refusing to take the fruit offered by Eve, Adam would have remained sinless. His love for the woman, however, and his sadness at her failure and the prospect of separation, together with his inability to foresee what God could do other than execute the penalty already merited, made the "evil" appear to be a "good". It seemed better to Adam to perish with the woman he loved, rather than to live on in solitude and grief. Adam's action but confirms the fact that "evil" must be considered as a "good" before it can work upon man's desires and influence his choice.

We leave to the reader the illuminating task of discovering N.T. examples of this vital principle. In the threefold temptation of the Lord, for instance, as recorded in Matthew and Luke, this glossing over of "evil" to make it appear a "good" will be discovered to be at the very foundation of Satan's attack on the Lord, as the blessed Second Man, and Last Adam.

#16. The Inadequacy of the Works and Words of God as a Revelation of Himself.
pp. 161 - 165

Before we leave the realm of creation (Gen. i.) and enter the moral sphere (Gen. ii. and iii.), with its problems of free will, the presence of good and evil, and other related themes, let us take a final glance at creation and its revelation in Gen. i., and the limitations in their knowledge of God that finite creatures must expect and accept.

Good and Creation.—Let us consider first the testimony of creation apart from the Biblical record. Quite apart from the written Word, man has the whole circle of nature around him, of which he himself is the crown and climax, and this creation speaks to him of God. The following is the reasoned testimony, overwhelming in its irresistible logic, of one who spent himself in bringing the good news of salvation to men, and who is therefore the less likely to judge the heathen from a purely academic standpoint:

> "For the wrath of God is revealed from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men, who hold the truth in unrighteousness. Because that which may be known of God is manifest in them; for God hath shewed it unto them. For the invisible things of Him from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made, even His eternal power and Godhead; so that they are without excuse" (Rom. i. 18-20).

Aristotle who, so far as we know, had not read any of the Scriptures, confirms the Apostle's testimony, saying: "God Who is invisible to every mortal being, is seen by His works." When the Apostle in Acts xiv. speaks to the heathen, who knew nothing of God from contact with the Jews, he appeals to the evidence of creation:

> "Turn from these vanities unto the living God, which made heaven, and earth, and the sea, and all things that are therein: Who in times past suffered all nations to walk in their own ways: Nevertheless He left not Himself without witness, in that He did good, and gave us rain from heaven, and fruitful seasons, filling our hearts with food and gladness" (Acts xiv. 15-17).

The Apostle follows much the same line when addressing the assembly on Mars Hill.

> "Ye men of Athens, I perceived that in all things ye are too superstitious. For as I passed by, I found an altar with this inscription, TO THE UNKNOWN GOD. Whom, therefore, ye ignorantly worship, Him declare I unto you. God that made the world and all things therein, seeing that He is Lord of heaven and earth, dwelleth not in temples made with hands; Neither is worshipped with men's hands, as though He needed anything, seeing He giveth to all, life, and breath, and all things: And hath made of one blood all nations of men for to dwell on all the face of the earth, and hath determined the times before appointed, and the bounds of their habitation; That they should seek the Lord, if haply they might feel after Him and find Him, though He be not far from every one of us: For in Him we live, and move, and have our being; as certain also of your own poets have said, For we are also His offspring. Forasmuch, then, as we are the offspring of God, we ought not to think that the Godhead is like unto gold, or silver, or > stone, graven by art and man's device. And the times of this ignorance God winked at; but now commandeth all men everywhere to repent" (Acts xvii. 22-30).

In Psalm xxxiii. we read:

> "Lat all the earth fear the Lord: let all the inhabitants of the world stand in awe of Him. For He spake and it was done: He commanded, and it stood fast" (Psa. xxxiii. 8, 9).

In Psalm xix. also we read of creation, particularly in connection with the heavens: "The heavens declare the glory of God; and the firmament showeth His handywork. Day unto day uttereth speech, and night unto night showeth knowledge."

A day is coming when the doctrine of evolution will have reached its ultimate goal, and God will have been driven from His very creation. In that day it will be the "everlasting gospel" that will be preached, a gospel which contains no word concerning redemption, but proclaims the fear of God and His acknowledgment as the Creator" (Rev. xiv. 6, 7).

In all our studies, however, we must keep steadily before the mind the fact that the knowledge of God is relative and conditional. We cannot know God unless He manifests Himself to us, and our knowledge is inevitably limited by the necessity of His being described to us in terms of human thought. Language is symbolic. "Our symbols are windows through which we apprehend a reality which transcends our conceptions. The symbols are true as far as they go" (H. Spencer).

God and Revelation.—We cannot emphasize too strongly or too frequently, that all names and attributes of God that we find in Scripture are analogical and symbolical. God Himself is far greater than all His names and attributes. He, the Infinite One, has condescended to the limitations of human terms, but He Himself is above and beyond the reach of language, logic, or philosophy. We have in the Scriptures a faithful, true, inspired, infallible manifestation of the Invisible and Incomprehensible God.

> "At present we only see the baffling reflections in a mirror, but then it will be face to face. At present I am learning bit by bit, but then I shall understand, as all along I have myself been understood" (I Cor. xiii. 12, Moffatt).
> "For the present we see things as if in a mirror, and are puzzled; but then we shall see them face to face. For the present knowledge I gain is imperfect, but then I shall fully know, even as I am fully known" (I Cor. xiii. 12, Weymouth).

The A.V. here: "Now we see through a glass darkly" is rather misleading as it tends to make the English reader think of transparent glass. The preposition (dia) should be rendered: "by means of"—"Now we see by means of a glass". The only other occurrence of esoptron, "glass" or "mirror", is James i. 23: "Like a man beholding his natural face in a glass."

We must, however, be careful in this passage (I Cor. xiii.) not to think that the Apostle is referring to the imperfect character of the dispensation of the Acts period, as contrasted with the perfect character of the dispensation of the Mystery. No one, surely, would claim that any member of the One Body during the dispensation of the Mystery "knows even as he is known".

It is certainly our joy to testify to the fuller knowledge that is ours now that the Mystery has been made known, but we cannot in this life ever "know as we are known". That the glorious consummation awaits the day of resurrection, when we shall see "face to face". However full our faith, however near we are to the Lord, nothing that we experience now can compare with the joy of that day, when we shall be manifested with Him in glory.

The word translated "darkly" in the A.V. is our English word "enigma". In this life we see by means of the mirror of the Word, reflecting spiritual realities in an enigma. Invisible things are represented by things seen, spiritual things are spoken of as possessing natural qualities, and eternal things are expressed in the terms of time. There are certain things that it is possible for us to know while encompassed with the infirmities and limitations of our human nature, but we must not imagine that these relative truths are absolute, or that types and shadows are realities. We must be careful not to import into the realm of the real, the shadows and images of the relative.

In his book "God and Nature", H. Spencer has said one or two things in connection with our subject that are perhaps worth repeating here:

(1) God is invisible to our physical senses because He is pure Spirit and Infinite (Exod. xxxiii. 20; John i. 18).
(2) God is unimaginable. He cannot be pictured by act or by mind.
(3) Our knowledge of God is indirect. Even Scripture and the manifestation of God in Christ involve translation into human and finite terms.
(4) The relativity that characterizes human knowledge limits our knowledge of God. We can only know what He reveals and the finite capacity or our minds limits His self-manifestation to us.
(5) Divine inscrutability does not mean that God is wholly unknowable, but that we are unable to know Him fully and adequately (Job xi. 7-9; xxxvi. 26; Psa. lxxvii. 19; cxxxix. 6; Prov. xxx. 4; Isa. xlv. 15; lv. 8, 9).

While we are considering this question of the limitations of human knowledge, it may be useful to observe one or two related ideas so that our understanding may be clarified. We speak of the "Infinite" and the "Absolute" in our endeavour to present something of the greatness of the Lord, but we must remember that the word "infinite" means strictly "unlimited", while the word "absolute" means "unrelated". So far as man is concerned, a thing which is wholly umlimited and wholly unrelated, is wholly unknown and wholly unreal. In theology, therefore, the terms "Infinite" and "Absolute" are modified to refer to a Being Who is "Self-limited" and "Self-sufficient". When we use the term "the Infinite", we mean the Being, Whose limitations are wholly within Himself. He is limited by what He is, and not by other and external things. Similarly, when we use the term "absolute" we mean that God is absolute in the sense that He is self-sufficient and independent of all externals. We find, however, that the philosopher speaks of God as being self-sufficient and independent for His fullness upon relations to other realities. This is where Scripture is at variance with Philosophy, for, according to the Scriptures, the fullness of God is seen in Christ and His redeemed people, and is explained, not by the necessities of Metaphysics, but by the presence of Love. The exposition of this aspect of the subject, however, must wait until we come to the creation of man and endeavour to discover the purpose that lay behind it.

The age-long controversy concerning the Unity and Trinity of the Godhead is largely a matter of the conflict between the conception of the Absolute and the conception of the Relative. If God be Infinite and Absolute, He must be unique. God, therefore, is One, and the Trinity is a revelation of this Divine Unity to man. In all these things, to confuse the relative names and attributes whereby God has made Himself visible to us "as in a glass darkly", with the Eternal reality itself, is to add the confusion of misunderstanding to the legitimate enigma which our limited human ability makes inevitable.

Let us thank God that He has stooped so low, and, while we wait with hope for that day of revelation when we shall see "face to face", let us rejoice that in the mirror of the Word we may see now to the full capacity of our present powers of vision.

#17. "Adam", and the "Likeness" of God (Gen. i. 26, 27).
pp. 201 - 205

If we turn to Gen. i. and read the account of the creation we find that the first creative act in connection with this present system is introduced by the majestic words: "Let there be light, and there was light." As we go on with the account, we find that each successive day's work is ushered in by some similar formula: "Let there be a firmament", "Let the earth bring forth", "Let the waters bring forth". The opening of the sixth and last day of the series is no exception to the general rule:

> "And God said, Let the earth bring forth the living creature, after his kind, cattle and creeping thing, and beast of the earth after his kind: and it was so. And God made the beast of the earth after his kind, and cattle after their kind, and everything that creepeth upon the earth after his kind: And God saw that it was good" (Gen. i. 24, 25).

This, however, does not bring the creation to a close. At verse 26, we enter an entirely different atmosphere, and encounter words regarding the Godhead which are utterly different from all that has gone before. We now read that God said, "Let Us make man" and this man is spoken of as made "in the image" and "after the likeness" of God.

The word "create" is used on only three occasions throughout this narrative:

(1) It is used of the creation, in the beginning, of the heaven and the earth. This is followed by a reference to the great deep, which, on the third day, forms the "seas".

(2) These seas being something new, the inhabitants are not said to be "made" or "brought forth", as in other cases, but the word "create" is once more introduced, to describe the way in which God provided this new element with fitting life: "And God created great whales." The word "whale" refers to certain sea monsters which were apparently unknown in the creation that preceded the deluge of Gen. i. 2.

(3) There is no other use of the word "create" until we come to verse 27, where we read: "So God created man." Man, therefore, was a new creature on the earth.

Not only do we find the word "create" used in this connection, but we are also impressed by the solemn pause and apparent deliberation before man is created.

> "And God said, Let Us make man" (Gen. i. 26).

The idea that God consulted with the angels or with some other creatures over the creation of man would not in itself seem probable, and indeed is to be rejected upon the express evidence of Scripture.

> "Who hath measured the waters in the hollow of his hand, and meted out heaven with the span, and comprehended the dust of the earth in a measure, and weighed the mountains in scales, and the hills in a balance? Who hath directed the Spirit of the Lord, or, being His counselor, hath taught Him? With whom took He counsel . . . . .? (Isa. xl. 12-14).

The use of "us" and "our" in Gen. i., coming as it does in the opening chapter of the Book of the Law, a law which emphasized the Unity of the Godhead (Deut. vi. 4), should cause us to pause. We do not propose, in this article, to attempt to deal with the vast subject of the nature of the Godhead. A study in Gen. i. is hardly the place for such an enquiry. It is, however, legitimate to ask why it was that God, Who is self-sufficient, should have created anything at all, and further, why it was that He should have made man in His image and after His likeness. We have already considered, in Volume XXVII, pages 188-191, the question as to whether the very act of creation does not imply a self-limitation of the Almighty, and we believe that we have given a satisfactory answer—namely, that God is not only almighty and self-sufficient, but He is also love, and love dwelling alone, fully absorbed in its own perfection, would cease to be love at all. However, we must not stay to go over this ground again; what awaits us now is the consideration of man, his name and his office.

The name "Adam" occurs for the first time in Gen. i. 26. It is usual for commentators to refer to Gen. ii. 7, and teach that Adam was so called because he was taken out of adamah, or "ground". If Gen. ii. 7 were the first occurrence of the word Adam, there might be some justification for this view, but inasmuch as he was so called in the counsels of God in Gen. i. 26, there does not seem to be any good reason in favour of the suggestion, except the obvious one that adamah, "the ground", and Adam, "the man", are very similar in the Hebrew. If similarity of sound be sufficient justification, we need not leave Gen. i. 26, for in this verse we have awaiting us the word “likeness”, which is derived from damah, “to be like”. Not only does Gen. i. 26 tend to support the idea that “Adam” was so named because he was made in the “likeness” of God, but Gen. v. 1, 2 seems to use the same sort of argument:

> “This is the book of the generations of Adam. In the day that God created man (Adam), in the likeness (demuth) of God made He him. Male and female created He them: and blessed them, and called their name Adam, in the day when they were created” (Gen. v. 1, 2).

This passage certainly looks back to Gen. i. 26-30, and not to Gen. ii. 7, 21-23.

The purpose for which man was created is expressed in the three terms “image”, “likeness”, and “dominion”. The word “image”, tselem, is from the Hebrew root tsel, meaning “shadow”. The first occurrence in the O.T. is in Gen. xix. 8: “The shadow of my roof.” The LXX translates tsel by the Greek skia some 27 times. The latter is found in the N.T. seven times as follows:

> “The shadow of death” (Matt. iv. 16; Luke i. 79).
> “The shadow of it” (a tree) (Mark iv. 32).
> “The shadow of Peter” (Acts v. 15).

The word is also used figuratively of the ceremonial law: “A shadow of things to come, and not the very image” (Heb. x. 1; I Cor. ii. 17); and in Heb. viii. 5: “The example and shadow of heavenly things.”

Adam was not the “very image”, but he in some measure shadowed forth the Lord; and Rom. v. 12-14 indicates that in other ways than those suggested in Gen. i. 26, 27, Adam was a “figure of Him that was to come”.

By creation, man is “the image and glory of God” (I Cor. xi. 7); but this image is, after all, “earthy”.

> “The first man is of the earth, earthy; the second man is the Lord from heaven . . . . . as we have borne the image of the earthy, we shall also bear the image of the heavenly” (I Cor. xv. 47-49).

In his second epistle to the same Church, the Apostle resumes the theme, and we give below the two references to “the image” in this second letter:

> “But we all with open face beholding as in a glass the glory of the Lord, are changed into the same image from glory to glory, even as by the Spirit of the Lord” (II Cor. iii. 18).
> “In whom the god of this world hath blinded the minds of them that believe not, lest the light of the glorious gospel of Christ, Who is the image of God, should shine unto them” (II Cor. iv. 4).

How many know and preach this gospel? How many realize that the announcement that “Christ is the image of God” is the “gospel of the glory of Christ”, and the subject of Satan’s attacks from the beginning? Before the world was, the Lord Jesus Christ had this "glory" (John xvii. 5), and it was the subject of Satanic opposition, as we learn from Ezek. xxviii. It was "shadowed forth" in the creation of man, and attacked by the Serpent in the garden of Eden as explained in II Cor. iii. & iv., and is the goal towards which the purpose of the ages is directed. The central section of Romans (v. 12 - viii. 39) opens with Adam, a failing figure of Him that was to come, and closes with the goal of God's great purpose: "For whom He did foreknow, He also did predestinate to be conformed to the image of His Son" (Rom. viii. 29).

The climax of revelation in connection with "the Image" is found in Colossians:

> "His dear Son . . . . . Who is the Image of the Invisible God" (Col. i. 13-15).
> "When Christ Who is our life shall appear, then shall ye also appear with Him in glory . . . . . and have put on the new man, which is renewed in knowledge after the Image of Him that created him" (Col. iii. 4, 10).

Here, both in Col. i. and iii., the "image" is connected with creation. Moreover, Col. i. 16 makes it clear that the Son was the Creator of Gen. i. 26, and that Adam foreshadowed in some way yet to be considered, "Him that was to come", "the last Adam".

Returning to Gen. i. 26, we must now consider the added clause "after our likeness" (demuth). The LXX Version translates this by kath homoiosin, which we may compare with the Apostle's use of the word when speaking to the Athenians in Acts xvii.:

> "Forasmuch, then, as we are the offspring of God, we ought not to think that the Godhead is like (homoios) unto gold, or silver, or stone, graven by art and man's device" (Acts xvii. 29).

Isaiah also challenges us with the question:

> "To whom then will ye liken (damah, see demuth above) God?" (Isa. xl. 18).

And Ethan says:

> "Who in heaven can be compared unto the Lord? Who among the sons of the mighty can be likened (damah) unto the Lord" (Psa. lxxxix. 6).

Nevertheless it is true that man was made after the likeness of God, and in James iii. we read, concerning the tongue:

> "Therewith bless we God, even the Father; and therewith curse we men, which are made after the similitude (homoioses) of God" (James iii. 9).

The prophet Hosea uses the word damah when speaking of the way in which God had condescended to use figures of speech:

> "I have multiplied visions, and used similitudes by the ministry of the prophets" (Hosea xii. 10).

During His public ministry, the Lord Himself used many similitudes—for example:

> "The kingdom of heaven is like (homoios) unto treasure" (Matt. xiii. 44).
> "Unto what is the kingdom of God like?" (Luke xiii. 18).
> "Whereunto shall I liken this generation?" (Matt. xi. 16).

Man is to God what a figure of speech is to thought, a symbol, an analogy, a type.

When Nebuchadnezzar saw in a dream the successive kingdoms of Gentile rule in the form of an image, neither he nor Daniel ever imagined that such kingdoms were actually like the image itself, but simply that this image and its peculiar construction "shadowed forth" in symbol the moral characteristics of the kingdoms concerned. So, in Gen. i. 26, there is no question of external resemblance. Whether seen in the frail type Adam, or in the glorious person of the Son of God, the "image and likeness" are never to be understood as physical. The Saviour Himself taught that God is spirit, that no man has ever seen His shape. It is true that He declared that "He that hath seen Me hath seen the Father", but no one with any understanding of the Word would think that He intended physical likeness here. The Father was set forth in the life and character of the "Word made flesh", but the Father was not "like" the physical form which the Lord took when He was "found in fashion as a man". So, in connection with Adam, the "image" and "likeness" have reference to what is moral and mental. However, we have already come to the end of our space, and will therefore defer any further remarks upon this important theme until our next article.

Fundamentals of Dispensational Truth. (Second Series).

The Books of SAMUEL.
#2. The King Demanded, Tested and Rejected.
(I Samuel viii. 4 - xv. 35).
pp. 8 - 15

We surveyed in our last article the opening section of the First Book of Samuel, covering the last days of the Judges, and were saddened to observe that even Samuel seems to have failed at the end of his life, in relation to his sons. The parallel between I Sam. viii. 1-3 and I Sam. ii. 22-25 is too plain to be ignored. Yet such is the testimony of Scripture: no man is perfect. We find this fact stressed throughout the Scriptures, from Adam onwards. Noah, for example, a sort of second Adam, the eighth person, is brought through the day of wrath, and re-occupies the earth, but he is found drunk and one of his sons is the father of Canaan, Cush and Nimrod. Abraham is the father of the faithful, the friend of God, the one through whom all families of the earth are to be blessed, yet we know that he wavered, that he was untruthful, and he begat Ishmael. Moses, the great prophet and type of Christ, with whom God spoke face to face as a man speaks to his friend, forfeited entrance into the land because he spoke unadvisedly with his lips. And so the story grows. Neither Joshua, nor David, nor any other prophet, priest or king was perfect. Together with their outstanding typical qualities, there was always evidence of frailty, failure and sin.

We come now to the next section of the book of Samuel, in which we discover another principle that is characteristic of the ways of God. Contrary to all human expectation, God is second, not first. Saul is king before David. Moses is accepted the second time. Joseph is acknowledged the second time. Cain lives and Abel dies. Esau comes before Jacob, Ishmael before Isaac, Antichrist before Christ, the kingdoms of this world before the kingdom of the Lord. The reason is simple. God is dealing with responsible moral creatures, and he teaches them through the exercise of their own choice and the experience of their own efforts. Had Adam never been allowed to exercise his choice, the human race would probably have been convinced that man could stand unassisted against all temptation. Had Israel not failed so signally, man would doubtless have believed that it was within his power to accomplish a righteousness by works. Had government never been entrusted to man, the nations of the earth would never have been convinced that the only true king is the King appointed by heaven.

And so here, in the Book of Samuel, we are to see one more example of the working out of this principle, and we shall, therefore, have to consider Saul, the people's choice, before studying David, the "man after God's own heart".

Let us make one observation at the outset. No one was coerced into demanding Saul. No predestination compelled men, against their better judgment, to this decision. The failure of Samuel's sons, and the natural tendency of man to trust in himself, were sufficient.

Saul's history occupies I Sam. viii. 4 to II Sam. i. 27 and falls into three sections:

(1) I Sam. viii. 4 - xiv. 35. The demand for a king, his testing and rejection.
(2) I Sam. xvi. 1 - xxvi. 25. The anointing of David, and his persecution by Saul.
(3) I Sam. xxvii. 1 - II Sam. i. 27. Saul's sin and death.

We shall find that the consideration of the essential features in the first of these sections will occupy all the space we have available in this article, and once again, as with the first eight chapters, we must refrain from presenting anything like a complete structure.

The following is an analysis of the outstanding points:

I Samuel viii. 4 - xv. 35.
The demand for, and the rejection of, Saul.

A1 | viii. 4-9. | a | A king demanded by the people.
b | The Lord rejected.
c | Reference to history since Egypt.
B1 | viii. 10-22. The manner of the king.
C1 | x. 8. The Test. | Tarry seven days.
I will offer sacrifice.
A2 | x. 18, 19. | c | Reference to history since Egypt.
b | God rejected.
a | A king demanded.
B2 | x. 25. The manner of the kingdom.
C2 | xi. 3-13. The Test. | Give us seven days.
Saul hewed yoke of oxen.
A3 | xi. 15 - xii. 12. | a | Saul made king.
c | Reference to history since Egypt.
b | Lord God rejected.
B3 | xiii. 1. The reign of Saul. One year.
C3 | xiii. 8 - xv. 19. The Test. | He tarried seven days.
Saul's disobedience. The offerings.
Saul's oath. The spoil.
Saul's disobedience. The offerings and the spoil.
A4 | xv. 26. | b | The word of the Lord rejected.
a | Saul rejected from being king.

Taking this outline as our guide, let us consider the teaching corresponding to the letter "A" in the structure. This aspect of the subject occurs four times, and in three of the passages the people are reminded of the attitude of their fathers since the exodus from Egypt. In the personal dealing with Saul himself, however, in chapter xv. this item is not repeated. Saul was there being dealt with because of his own iniquity.

It is evident from the Scriptures, that whoever at any time chooses any king other than the Lord Himself is making a wrong choice. On the other hand, as in case of divorce, some things were permitted because of the hardness of man's heart. The reader may perhaps remind us that there was a definite law made by Moses to regulate the choice of a king and his subsequent conduct. This is perfectly true, but is not the whole truth. The passage referred to is Deut. xvii. 14-20, and the law is prefaced by the words:

> "When thou art come unto the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee, and shalt possess it, and shalt dwell therein, and shalt say, I will set a king over me, like as all the nations that are about me . . . . ."

This passage makes it clear that the desire for a king did not spring from a true conception of their calling, for the reason—"like as all the nations"—was entirely contrary to the revealed will of the Lord. If, however, Israel did desire a king, the Lord would not permit them to transgress all His will. He would not permit a stranger to be king, and by prohibiting polygamy and wealth, and by commanding that the king should write a copy of the law, He would keep the people in check.

The ominous phrase "like all the nations" is found in Israel's demand in I Sam. viii. 5, and constituted the rejection of the Lord:

> "They have not rejected thee, but they have rejected Me, that I should not reign over them" (I Sam. viii. 7).

Then comes the reference to Egypt:

> "According to all the works which they have done since the day that I brought them up out of Egypt, even unto this day" (I Sam. viii. 8).

These three features are repeated in x. 18 and 19, but come in the reverse order from the opening passage (see structure "A2"):

> "Thus saith the Lord, the God of Israel, I brought up Israel out of Egypt, and delivered you out of the hand of the Egyptians, and out of the hand of all kingdoms, and of them that oppressed you, and ye have this day rejected your God, Who Himself saved you out of all your adversities and your tribulations: and ye have said, Nay, but set a king over us" (I Sam. x. 18, 19).

This threefold reference occurs once again in xi. 15 - xii. 12 (see structure "A3"):

> "And there they made Saul king . . . . . Behold I have hearkened unto your voice in all ye said unto me, and have made a king over you."
>
> "Now, therefore, stand still, that I may reason with you before the Lord, of all the righteous acts of the Lord which He did to you and to your fathers. When Jacob was come out of Egypt, and your fathers cried unto the Lord, the Lord sent Moses and Aaron . . . . . and the Lord sent Jerubbaal, and Bedan, and Jephthah, and Samuel" (The Revised Syriac reads "Samson").

Instead of crying to the Lord, when Nahash the king of the Ammonites came against them, Israel turned away from the Lord to a king of their own choice:

> "Ye said unto me, Nay; but a king shall reign over us: when the Lord your God was your king" (I Sam. xii. 7-12).

In these three passages we have the root of Israel's failure.

One can also see in the words of the Lord, His sense of Israel's ingratitude. This thought frequently recurs, and several Psalms (e.g., Psa. cvi. 13) refer to it. Jeremiah, also, refers to the breaking of the covenant by Israel when the Lord led them out of Egypt. The same spirit, alas, persists into the N.T., when we read the awful words: "We have no king but Cæsar" (John xix. 15).

The opening chapter of Isaiah also speaks of Israel's ingratitude, and in Hosea xi. 1-5 we read of Israel's apostacy and the dominion of the king of Assyria.

Ever since they refused their Messiah, the children of Israel have been robbed and persecuted by the kings of the earth, and they will find no rest, until they say: "Blessed is He that cometh in the name of the Lord" (Matt. xxiii. 39).

Returning to our structure on page 10, we have now to consider sections "B1" and "B2"—"The manner of the king" and "The manner of the kingdom". The word "manner" is mishpat. The primary meaning is "judgment, law or right", but it can also mean "usage, manner or custom". So in I Samuel we find the following: "the priest's custom" (I Sam. ii. 13); "perverted judgment" (I Sam. viii. 3); "the manner of the king" (I Sam. viii. 9 and 11); "the manner of the kingdom" (I Sam. x. 25); and "manner" and "ordinance' in xxvii. 11 and xxx. 25.

The manner of the king (I Sam. viii. 10-18).—Samuel told the people plainly what they must expect if a king were placed over them. Their sons would be taken "for his chariots, and his horsemen", and he would commandeer their labour in the field and at the forge. After a long list of other exactions, Samuel warns them:

> "And ye shall cry out in that day, because of your king which ye shall have chosen you, and the Lord will not hear you in that day" (I Sam. viii. 18).

The manner of the kingdom (I Sam. x. 25):

> "Then Samuel told the people the manner of the kingdom, and wrote it in a book, and laid it up before the Lord."

The "manner of the kingdom" expresses what is de jure; the "manner of the king", what is de facto.

Instead of the word "manner" being repeated a third time, we have in its place a reference to the first year of Saul's reign, when all seemed to be going well—until the opening of the second year, when he began to manifest those traits that darkened his whole reign.

One further point is emphasized in the structure, and that is the thrice-repeated test of "seven days".

The first test (I Sam. x. 8):

> "And thou shalt go down before me to Gilgal; and behold, I will come down unto thee, to offer burnt offerings, and to sacrifice sacrifices of peace offerings: seven days shalt thou tarry, till I come to thee, and show thee what thou shalt do."

Saul was warned that he could not start his reign with any hope of success, unless he were wholly devoted to the Lord (the burnt offering) and fully reconciled to Him (the peace offering)—and further, that this devotion and reconciliation were beyond his own power to effect, and that he must humbly wait for the Lord Who, through Samuel, would being it to pass.

The second test (I Sam. xi. 3-13).

The second test of seven days, occurs in chapter xi. The reader may remember that in Judges xi. the people of Gilead were involved in a controversy with the Ammonites, on account of a grievance felt by the Ammonites at the possession by Israel of the land beyond Jordan. When Nahash the Ammonite heard of the possible appointment of a king over Israel, he came and besieged Jabesh Gilead. When the men asked that they might enter into a covenant with him as servants, Nahash consented upon the condition that they should suffer the loss of their right eyes. They then asked for a seven days' respite, and Saul responded to their call for help:

> "And he took a yoke of oxen, and hewed them in pieces, and sent them . . . . . by the hands of messengers, saying, Whosoever cometh not forth after Saul and after Samuel, so shall it be done unto his oxen" (I Sam. xi. 7).

As a result, Nahash was beaten, and the people said,

> "Who is he that said, Shall Saul reign over us? bring the men, that we may put them to death" (I Sam. xi. 12).

The third test (I Sam. xiii. 8 - xv. 19):

> "As for Saul, he was yet in Gilgal, and all the people followed him trembling. And he tarried seven days, according to the set time that Samuel had appointed: but Samuel came not to Gilgal; and the people were scattered from him. And Saul said, Bring hither a burnt offering."

Saul was sorely tried. We dare not condone his sin, but how many of us would not have acted in the same way? The Philistines were gathered together to fight, and the people, seeing they were in a strait, began to hide or fly. Those who followed Saul, did so trembling. He waited with much anxiety until the seventh day, and then broke down. Had he endured to the end the Lord would have established his kingdom (I Sam. xiii. 13), but as it was, he lost the kingdom, and another man, after the Lord's own heart, was sought. It was under this awful shadow that Saul lived until his tragic end, and it was because of this promise concerning another, that he persecuted David.

We find that, while Saul did not render full obedience to the Lord, either in the matter of Gilgal, or in the commission to destroy the Amalekites (I Sam. xv.), he was very determined to keep his own oath, even though it were foolish to do so (I Sam. xiv.). Saul's dreadful end was perceived by Samuel to be incipient in his early disobedience, for he said: "Rebellion is as the sin of witchcraft" (I Sam. xv. 23); and it was for resorting to witchcraft that Saul died (I Chron. x. 13). He Who knows the hearts of all men, saw what was hidden from the human eye. At the beginning Saul was meek, forbearing, generous, just as his antitype, the Antichrist at the time of the end, shall come in peaceably with flatteries. The reader will remember that, at the anointing of David, Samuel was told not to look upon the outward appearance.

However the matter may appear on the surface, and not forgetting the mercy extended by Saul (I Sam. xi. 13), it still remained true, as Samuel said in the succeeding chapter, that by making Saul king, they had rejected the Lord.

> "And when ye saw that Nahash, the king of the children of Ammon came against you, ye said unto me, Nay, but a king shall reign over us: when the Lord your God was your king" (I Sam. xii. 12).

Such is the gist of this first section of the life of Saul. Where Saul failed, the Lord Jesus overcame. Tempted to seek the kingdom and the glory by a short cut He repudiated the offer, and was content, though rejected by the cities that had seen his mighty works, to wait God's time, saying, "Even, so, Father".

We commend the study of this section to the reader, believing that the outline supplied will enable him to consider the intervening detail without losing sight of the main argument. If we have contributed in any way towards making that argument clear, we are indeed thankful. The task before us in these books of the kingdom is formidable, and were it not for the consciousness that we have a work to do, we might well feel the burden to be too great. However, when He commands He also enables, and so we trust that we shall continue, ever being able to say, "Hitherto hath the Lord helped us".

The Books of SAMUEL.
#3. David, Anointed and Persecuted.
(I Samuel xvi. 1 - xxvi. 25).
pp. 44 - 51

We have already seen that Saul's record is divided up into three sections, as follows:

(1) I Sam. viii. 4 - xiv. 35. The demand for a king, his testing and rejection.
(2) I Sam. xvi. 1 - xxvi. 25. The anointing of David, and his persecution by Saul.
(3) I Sam. xxvii. 1 - II Sam. i. 27. Saul's sin and death.

This is not only the actual order of events in Saul's career, but it also foreshadows the great history of Christ and the Antichrist. Christ, as the true Anointed, has already been chosen and is believed in by His people, but He and they are for the time being in such places as the Cave of Adullam, or, as Hebrews puts it, "outside the camp". At the close of this period of persecution, "Antichrist" comes to the fore, but his association with demoniacal powers is now evident and he dies "without hand" (cf. I Chron. x. 13, 14).

In the present article, we must concentrate our attention on the period of David's persecution, and once again we must ask our readers to remember that the amount of material concerned is too great to deal with in detail in an article of this type. All we can do is to point out the main features, leaving the reader to supplement as the Lord gives grace. This method must not, however, be misconstrued as implying either indifference or laziness. The amount of concentration necessary for arriving at an outline of this kind can only be appreciated by those who have attempted its discovery.

The following analysis provides a thread by which the main argument of this very full section may be followed without losing one's way among the many explanatory details.

I Samuel xvi. 1 - xxvi. 25.

A | xvi. 1-23. THE LORD'S ANOINTED.
B | xvii. 1-54. GOLIATH. His sword (51).
C | xvii. 55-58. Whose son is he? The son of JESSE.
D | xviii. 1-4. JONATHAN. "Stripped himself."
E | xviii. 5 - xix. 17. | SAUL seeks DAVID'S life.
TWO ATTACKS. The Javelin (11).
The Philistines (17-27).
TWO CONFESSIONS. The Lord with David (xviii. 12, 28).
D | xix. 18-24. SAUL. "Stripped off his clothes."
C | xx. 1-42. THE SON OF JESSE.
B | xxi. 1-9. GOLIATH. His sword (9).
E | xxi. 10 - xxvi. 25. | DAVID spares SAUL'S life.
TWO OCCASIONS. Skirt (xxiv. 4).
Spear (xxvi. 12).
TWO CONFESSIONS. I know (xxiv. 20)
Prevail (xxvi. 25).
A | xxvi. 23. THE LORD'S ANOINTED.

Let us now become a little more acquainted with the various links in this chain. First and foremost comes the record of David's anointing (xvi. 1-23). There are seven occurrences of the verb "to anoint" in this first book of Samuel, four having reference to Saul (ix. 16; x. 1; xv. 1 & 17), and three to David (xvi. 3, 12, 13). It is noticeable that whereas Saul is said to be anointed captain twice, and king twice, neither of these titles is used of David in connection with this initial anointing. The words are simply:

> "Anoint unto Me" (xvi. 3).
> "Anoint him for this is he" (xvi. 12).
> "Samuel anointed him in the midst of his brethren" (xvi. 13).

While it was the purpose of the Lord that David should be both king (xvi. 1) and captain (xiii. 14), that purpose was not made known at the beginning either to Jesse, or to his sons, or to David himself. David simply knew that, for some reason, Samuel had been sent, and that he had been selected. Not until the death of Saul do we find David actually anointed "King" (II Sam. ii. 4). In the series of articles entitled "Light for the Last Days", Volume XXVII, page 61, we have drawn attention to the principle found in Rev. xi. 15, that the Lord can only reign as King, when the usurping kingdoms are no more. We shall also see, when considering the section relating to Goliath, that David's action portrayed the prophecy which was made later by Daniel as recorded in Dan. ii.

We must leave to the reader the pleasure and profit of a personal study of the narrative of David's first anointing, and pass on to his first great act. Just as the Lord passed from the anointing at Jordan (Matt. iii.) to the conflict in the wilderness (Matt. iv.), so we find David passing from his anointing by Samuel to the conflict with Goliath. In passing, mention is made of the fact that, upon his anointing "the spirit of the Lord came upon David from that day forward", while "the spirit of the Lord departed from Saul, and an evil spirit from the Lord troubled him". There is every likelihood that the incident described in I Sam. xvi. 14-23 did not take place before the events of chapter xvii., but that it is inserted here as a concrete illustration of the change that came over Saul. (See The Companion Bible here and in the margin of xvii. 1).

In xvii. 4 Goliath is called "The champion". The Hebrew here is Ish-habbenayim or "The man between the two". We may compare this with Psalm viii., which concludes with the word "Muth-labben"* (* - In the A.V. this appears in the super-scription of Psalm ix. For further explanation, see The Companion Bible, Appendixes 64 and 65), meaning "The death of the man between". In this psalm, having overcome the enemy, David looks back to the dominion forfeited by Adam and forward to the Lord Himself, of Whom he was so wonderful a type.

In I Sam. xvii., the various pieces of Goliath's armour are enumerated: helmet, coat, greaves, target, spear and shield—six pieces in all. His height is given as six cubits and a span, and his spear-head as weighing 600 shekels of iron. In a later record, where the brother of Goliath of Gath is mentioned, and another giant of the same place, he is said to have had on both hands and feet, six fingers and six toes. The connection between these numbers and the prophetic forecast of Rev. xiii. 18: "Six hundred, threescore and six" seems irresistible.

David's exclamation: "What have I now done?" (I Sam. xvii. 29) will need no explanation to any reader who has been one of a large family, particularly if he has been the youngest of a number of brothers.

There is a further point in connection with Jesse's family that may perhaps present a difficulty. While I Sam. xvii. 12 states that Jesse had "eight sons" and xvi. 10 that "seven of his sons" passed before Samuel before David was called, yet I Chron. ii. 13-15 gives the names of Jesse's sons, ending with "David, the seventh". In I Samuel we have the historical record, whereas in I Chron. ii. we have the genealogy, and for some reason unexplained, one of Jesse's sons could not be reckoned in the genealogy, either because he was the son of a concubine, or because he had died young. It is, however, no accident that David should be both seventh and eighth. We have a corresponding problem in Rev. xvii. 10, 11, where we read that there are "seven kings", and yet there is an "eighth", who is of "the seven". For an explanation of this problem the reader should refer to Volume XIII, page 91.

The fact that Goliath had presented himself for forty days before David took up the challenge, is also suggestive. The number 40 is the symbol of test and probation. It was after the forty days' fast that the Saviour, Who had just been anointed, met the temptation of the Devil (Matt. iv. 2).

Why does the record so particularly explain that the instrument of Goliath's overthrow was one of the five "smooth stones out of the brook"? If we think for a moment of these stones, and of the fact that they were not fashioned by hand, we at once recall the passage in Dan. ii., where the colossus seen by Nebuchadnezzar was destroyed by "a stone cut out without hands" (Dan. ii. 34, 44, 45). David was enacting on the battle-field in Ephas-dammin (which, according to Aaron Pick, means "Nothing but blood") what Christ Himself will accomplish in reality by the blood of His cross.

It is pitiable to see Saul's response to David's simple faith. Saul was concerned with the fact that Goliath had been a man of war from his youth, but David was relying on the fact that the Lord, Who had delivered him from the paw of the lion and of the bear, could and would deliver him out of the hand of the Philistine. In reply to this challenge of faith, Saul says: "Go, and the Lord be with you" (I Sam. xvii. 37), but he immediately spoils it by dressing young David up in the armour of a man who stood head and shoulders above his fellows! How ridiculous any of us look when we stand up in second-hand armour—relying on second-hand faith, or preaching second-hand sermons. We are glad that David had the sense to say: "I cannot go with these; for I have not proved them" (I Sam. xvii. 39).

When the champion of the Philistines was slain, Saul remembered that he had promised to give his daughter to the victor (I Sam. xvii. 25). He therefore enquires of Abner: "Whose son is the youth?" and Abner replies that he cannot tell. Saul then asks David: "Whose son art thou, young man?"—a question which makes us think of the similar question asked concerning Christ in the Gospels. The structure given on page 45 shows that this question is important.

One can never read the account given in the next section of the book without being moved, for it is one of the few instances recorded in Scripture of utter and selfless affection. Jonathan had every reason, speaking after the manner of men, to hate David, for it very soon became apparent that he was destined to occupy the throne. Yet it is written:

> "The soul of Jonathan was knit with the soul of David, and Jonathan loved him as his own soul" (I Sam. xviii. 1).

As a result of this love, Jonathan and David made a covenant (I Sam. xviii. 3)—a covenant which is mentioned on four other occasions in this book, twice by name (xx. 8 and xxiii. 18) and twice by implication (xx. 16 and 42). Saul and Jonathan set forth in type the two classes among Israel, whose true character was manifested by their reaction to Christ. Saul represents the persecuting and unbelieving Jew, who went out in blindness and hardness of heart, and Jonathan the believing remnant who crowned the Saviour in their hearts, during the time of His rejection, in anticipation of the day of His glory. Saul's javelin was directed not only at David, representing Christ, but at Jonathan also, the type of the believer (See the six occurrences: I Sam. xviii. 10, 11; xix. 9, 10, 18; and xx. 33).

We read that Jonathan "delighted much" in David (xix. 2), and that he "spake good" of him (xix. 4). On numerous occasions he interposed on David's behalf, even at the risk of his own life. Almost the last of his recorded acts is found in I Sam. xxiii.:

> "And Jonathan, Saul's son, arose, and went to David into the word, and strengthened his hand in God" (I Sam. xxiii. 16).

And in the next verse we read:

> "Thou shalt be king over Israel, and I shall be next unto thee" (I Sam. xxiii. 17).

a passage which is parallel with the Lord's promise to the faithful in Rev. iii. 21.

It is written in Scripture that "every knew shall bow, and every tongue confess that Jesus Christ is Lord" (Phil. ii.). There are some who find in this passage an argument in favour of the final reconciliation of all, universally. To such we would commend the two sections indicated in the Structure as follows:

D	xviii. 1-4.	JONATHAN. "Stripped himself."
D	xix. 18-24.	SAUL. "Stripped off his clothes."

Jonathan stripped himself of his robe, and "gave it to David, and his garments, even to his sword, and to his bow, and to his girdle" (I Sam. xviii. 4). This, in symbolic language, is what Paul did when he counted all things loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus his Lord (Phil. iii. 8, 9). When the soul is knit to the Lord, when we love Him as our own soul, then that love cannot be satisfied until it yields up its all. We read in the next chapter that Saul also "stripped" himself. He had heard of David's escape from the trap which he had set, and now, when he learned that David was at Naioth in Ramah, he sent messengers to take him. These messengers, however, failed in their errand and joined the ranks of those who were prophesying. This happened three times over, so that eventually Saul himself went to apprehend him. But in verses 23 & 24 we read:

> "The spirit of God was upon him also and he went on, and prophesied until he came to Naioth in Ramah. And he stripped off his clothes also, and prophesied before Samuel in like manner, and lay down naked all that day and all that night" (I Sam. xix. 23, 24).

Jonathan's act was voluntary, Saul's was involuntary. The A.V. reads: "He lay down naked", but the margin tells us that the Hebrew is the word "fell", and refers the reader to the case of Balaam in Numb. xxiv. 4—"Falling into a trance"—where the same word is used. Neither Balaam nor Saul voluntarily obeyed the Lord. All men, whether prompted by love, or driven by power, must one day recognize the Lordship of Christ. All men must be stripped of self-righteousness, but all such stripping will not be voluntary and will not therefore necessarily involve union with the Saviour. All men will at length recognize their sinnership, but although Saul three times uttered the words: "I have sinned" (xv. 24, 30, and xxvi. 21), it was not a confession that accompanied salvation. He did not forsake his sin or truly turn to the Lord.

The reader should examine for himself those sections indicated in the structure by references to "the son of Jesse", "the sword of Goliath", and "the Lord's anointed'. We shall have to pass these passages by without comment, so that space may be found for the sections indicated by the letters E and E. These two sub-divisions occupy a very considerable part of the whole passage, namely, xviii. 5 - xix. 17, and xxi. 10 - xxvi. 25.

In chapter xviii. we find that Saul's jealousy was aroused by the song of the women: "Saul hath slain his thousands: And David his ten thousands" (I Sam. xviii. 7). His first attempt upon David's life was by a clumsy attack with a javelin. When this failed, he planned, on two occasions, to involve David in battle with the Philistines—by making this a condition for the winning of his daughter's hand, although he had actually promised this as a reward for the destruction of Goliath. In this, too, Saul failed.

Not only did Saul make these two attempts upon David's life, but on two occasions it is recorded that he realized that "the Lord was with David":

> "And Saul was afraid of David, because the Lord was with him, and was departed from Saul" (I Sam. xviii. 12).

And again, in verse 28 of the same chapter:

> "And Saul saw and knew that the Lord was with David, and that Michal, Saul's daughter, loved him. And Saul was yet more afraid of David: and Saul became David's enemy continually" (I Sam. xviii. 28, 29).

In the sections E and E in the Structure, the two attacks made upon David by Saul, are balanced by the two occasions on which David spared the life of Saul:

> "Then David arose, and cut off the skirt of Saul's robe privily" (I Sam. xxiv. 4).
> "So David took the spear and the cruse of water from Saul's bolster" (I Sam. xxvi. 12).

It is significant that on both these occasions Saul was asleep. In the second reference, this fact is emphasized by the words: "A deep sleep from the Lord was fallen upon them" (I Sam. xxvi. 12).

On seven different occasions Scripture records the fall of a "deep sleep" (Heb. tardemah). These references, which are given below, seem to indicate that the Lord uses this "deep sleep" when He wishes to deal with man in some great crisis.

A | Gen. ii. 21. ADAM. For blessing.
B | Gen. xv. 12. ABRAHAM. Righteousness by faith.
C | I Sam. xxvi. 12. SAUL. To warn.
B | Job iv. 13. JOB. Is mortal man righteous?
C | Job xxxiii. 15. JOB. To hide pride from man.
A | Prov. xix. 15. SLOTH. \ Judicial blindness
Isa. xxix. 10. JUDGMENT. / (Rom. xi. 8).

In this deep sleep Saul received from God his final warning. He is so far moved as to confess: "I have sinned" (I Sam. xxvi. 21) and to acknowledge that David should "prevail" (I Sam. xxvi. 25), but this does not prevent him from resorting to the Witch of Endor.

Balancing the two confessions of xviii. 5 - xix. 17 in the Structure, we have the two confessions of xxi. 10 - xxvi. 25. One of these we have already quoted above, and the other is found in xxiv. 7-12.

Although much of interest has necessarily been passed by without comment, we trust that the main theme of our passage has been discovered and presented, and we therefore conclude with Saul's confession in chapter xxiv.:

> "And he said to David, Thou art more righteous than I: for thou hast rewarded me good, whereas I have rewarded thee evil. And thou hast showed this day how that thou hast dealt well with me: forasmuch as when the Lord had delivered me into thine hand thou killest me not. For if a man find his enemy, will he let him go well away? Wherefore the Lord reward thee good for that thou hast done unto me this day. And now, behold, I know well that thou shalt surely be king, and that the kingdom of Israel shall be established in thine hand. Swear now, therefore, unto me by the Lord, that thou wilt not cut off my seed after me, and that thou wilt not destroy my name out of my father's house. And David sware unto Saul."

The Books of SAMUEL.
#4. Saul's last act of rebellion and death.
(I Samuel xxvii. 1 - II Samuel i. 27).
pp. 81 - 87

The story of Saul now draws to its terrible end. If the record had been the invention of man, an epic poem with David as the hero and Saul as the villain, many passages would have been either omitted, or completely altered. The Scriptures, however, are a true record, and there is only one man whom they set forth as being perfect, the Man, Christ Jesus. David, was, indeed, a man after God's own heart, but he was by no means perfect. He sinned and fell, more than once, though his repentance was deep and genuine. Neither Aaron (Deut. ix. 16-20), nor Samuel (I Sam. viii. 1-3), nor David (I Sam. xxvii. 1-12), were without fault; the three types of Christ, as Priest, Prophet and King were all found wanting.

David's history in this section is closely associated with Ziklag. According to Dr. Young, Ziklag means "bending". For David it was a place of humiliation and shame, but it was also the place to which there came in the days of his humiliation, those who afterwards were numbered among his mighty men. As always, the type, while teaching certain truths, displays also certain weaknesses, a principle common to all the typical characters of the O.T. from Adam onward. One has only to think of Adam, Noah and Abraham to see examples of this. If Ziklag means "bending", it would seem that the word, in connection with David, has a twofold significance—in the first place, the true "bending", in humiliation and suffering at the hands of Saul; and secondly, the false "bending", when, moved by fear, he compromised with the ungodly.

Originally Ziklag had belonged to Judah (Josh. xv. 31), but it subsequently passed to Simeon (Josh. xix. 1-5), and in the days of Saul it had fallen into the hands of the Philistines. It would therefore seem to suggest the believer's failure to "possess his possessions", and the subsequent need for humbling before victory can be assured.

It will be seen from the structure below that the section before us is primarily a simple alternation of the story of David at Ziklag, and the association of Saul with the witch of Endor and his consequent death.

I Samuel xxvii. 1 - II Samuel i. 27.

A1 | I Sam. xxvii. 1 - xxviii. 2. DAVID AT ZIKLAG. Amalekites destroyed.
B1 | xxviii. 3-25. SAUL AT ENDOR. The Witch.
A2 | xix. 1 - xxx. 31. DAVID AT ZIKLAG. Servant of Amalekite spared.
B2 | xxx. 1-10. SAUL AT GILBOA. Death and dishonour.
C1 | xxxi. 11-13. The kindness of the MEN of JABESH-GILEAD to SAUL.
A3 | II Sam. i. 1-16. DAVID AT ZIKLAG. Amalekites killed.
C2 | i. 17-27. SAUL and JONATHAN lamented by DAVID.

Let us now examine these sub-divisions and seek to learn the lessons that await us. Beginning at the first verse, we read:

> "And David said in his heart, I shall now perish one day by the hand of Saul; there is nothing better for me than that I should speedily escape into the land of the Philistines" (I Sam. xxvii. 1).

It would be difficult for any writer to speak words of censure or condemnation with regard to David's attitude, without at the same time censuring and condemning himself. Only as we treat of these passages with an eye upon our own frailty can we dare to speak of them truthfully. It is in the spirit of Gal. vi. 1 "considering our own selves", that we speak here of David's declension.

In chapter xxiv., we find Saul halting in his persecution, and confessing that he is wrong. David cuts off part of Saul's skirt, and expostulates with him, and Saul seems to repent. Soon, however, he is once more seeking David's life. On one more occasion David spares the king's life, and once again expostulates with him as in chapter xxiv. Again Saul makes a wonderful confession, but David is growing weary, and feeling sick at heart. "And David said in his heart, I shall now perish one day at the hand of Saul." We can surely sympathize with David here, even if Scripture forbids that we should condone. We should probably have given up long since.

David now goes to Achish King of Gath, with his two wives, and asks for and received Ziklag as a residence. It is interesting to notice here that, although we read of David finding grace in the eyes of Achish, there is no mention of the Lord. David and his men now invade the Geshurites, the Gezrites and the Amalekites and destroy their cities. It is true that these cities were originally devoted to destruction (Josh. xiii. 13; xvi. 10; and I Sam. xv.), but David did not answer Achish truthfully when he asked, "Whither have ye made a road to-day?" We read that David "saved neither man nor woman alive", so that no tidings should reach Gath and thus imperil his relationship with Achish. "And Achish believed David." How sad to think that David should be so compromised with evil, and how he must have shrunk inwardly when Achish manifested his trust so far as to make him "keeper of his head for ever" (xxviii. 2).

From David's temporary lapse, we now turn to the fatal step taken by Saul (I Sam. xxviii. 3-25). Samuel was dead, and so could not be consulted, and Saul had put away the wizards and those that had familiar spirits. When he enquired of the Lord, "the Lord answered him not, neither by dreams, nor by Urim, nor by prophets". In his despair he takes the plunge foreseen by Samuel when he warned Saul at the beginning that "rebellion was as the sin of witchcraft" (xv. 23). "Then Saul said unto his servants, Seek me a woman that hath a familiar spirit." Such a woman was found at Endor, and Saul, disguising himself, went by night, and demanded that her familiar spirit should be brought up. There has been considerable debate as to whether Samuel himself actually appeared to Saul, or whether a spirit impersonating him gave the message. It is impossible for anyone to be absolutely certain. All that we can do is to seek to understand what is written according to the analogy of the faith. Scripture teaches that the dead "know not anything", and that there is no knowledge in the grave. At death, the body returns to the dust as it was, and the spirit returns to God Who gave it. There is no consciousness between death and resurrection. If it should be objected that on the Mount of Transfiguration, Moses and Elijah were most certainly present, we would reply that both were special cases. Moses is specially mentioned in Jude as one over whose body Michael and the Devil contended (showing that he was bodily present on the Mount), and in the case of Elijah, we know that he was caught up to heaven by a whirlwind, so that he cannot be compared with the generality of men. Samuel had died and had been buried in Ramah. When Saul said "Bring me up Samuel", we do not know whether he really expected Samuel himself to appear, for he had gone by design to one that had a "familiar spirit", and had previously said, "Divine unto me by the familiar spirit, and bring him up whom I shall name unto thee". The general attitude of the Scriptures towards the diviner is one of unreserved condemnation, together with the assurance that he deals in lies:

> "That frustrateth the tokens of the liars, and maketh diviners mad" (Isa. xliv. 25).
> "Therefore hearken not ye to your prophets, nor to your diviners, nor to your dreamers, nor to your enchanters, nor to your sorcerers . . . . . for they prophesy a lie unto you" (Jer. xxvii. 9, 10).
> "Let not your . . . . . diviners deceive you" (Jer. xxix. 8).
> "Diviners have seen a lie" (Zech. x. 2).

Turning to the N.T., we read, in connection with Saul's great antitype, the Man of Sin:

> "After the working of Satan, with all power and signs and lying wonders, and with all deceivableness of unrighteousness in them that perish . . . . . God shall send them strong delusion that they should believe a lie" (II Thess. ii. 9-11).

Here we find that, while Satan is said to work with lies and deception, God can and does sometimes intervene, and ensure that certain people shall be made to believe a lie. On one occasion we read of a "lying spirit" being sent by the Lord in punishment (I Kings xxii. 21-23; II Chron. xviii. 19-24), and it is obvious that if this could also be done to fulfil the word of the Lord concerning Saul. In the case of Ahab, we are not told that he deliberately set out to consult with one that had a familiar spirit, but in Saul's case we know that he did. In the law of the Lord, which was familiar to Saul, we read:

> "Regard not them that have familiar spirits, neither seek after wizards, to be defiled by them. I am the Lord" (Lev. xix. 31).
> "The soul that turneth after such as have familiar spirits, and after wizards, to go a whoring after them, I will even set My face against that soul, and will cut him off from among his people" (Lev. xx. 6).

We are distinctly told that, when Saul enquired of the Lord, the Lord "answered him not, neither by dreams, nor by Urim, nor by prophets" (I Sam. xxviii. 6). In these circumstances it is difficult to believe that, when Saul turned to the power of darkness, the Lord actually answered him by raising the prophet Samuel from the dead. The fact that the message given to Saul through the witch was true does not in any way prove that Samuel himself was present. The young girl who cried after the apostles in Acts xvi. used words that were quite true, but she was nevertheless under the control of an evil spirit (Acts xvi. 16-18).

If we examine I Sam. xxviii. carefully, we shall find that Saul himself saw nothing. He asked the witch: "What form is he of?" and she replied: "An old man cometh up; and he is covered with a mantle." We then read that "Saul perceived that it was Samuel" (xxviii. 13, 14). This might have been convincing enough to Saul in his overwrought state, but it is hardly logical to conclude that an old man wearing a mantle must necessarily have been Samuel. All that we actually know is that the witch was startled at the apparition, that she perceived that her questioner was Saul, that she described what she saw, and that Saul heard the prophecy. The prophecy was true, and in this we can see the restraining hand of the Lord, but there is no reason to believe that the Lord made any special exception in this case. Those who believe that the soul is immortal, and that the dead are not really dead but alive in another sphere, may find "proofs" for what they believe in this chapter, but we dare not run counter to the whole testimony of Scripture, Spiritism, in all its ways, is from beneath and is abhorrent to the Lord.

We must now return to David and Ziklag (I Sam. xxix. 1 - xxx. 31). David was now in a very serious predicament. The Philistines were gathering for war, and Achish had so trusted David that he believed that he had "made his people Israel utterly to abhor him" (xxvii. 12). Moreover, he had made David "the keeper of his head" (xxviii. 2). Whatever David did now would be an act of treachery. If he betrayed the trust Achish had reposed in him, it would be base indeed. On the other hand, how would it be possible for him to fight with Achish against his own people and future subjects? This is surely a lesson for us all. The man who sets out to please everybody generally succeeds in pleasing no one. We well remember, when we first began our printed testimony, how many wrote to us about the "mistake" of not being sufficiently diplomatic with regard to our attitude to the Lord's Supper. It was suggested that it would limit the sphere of our ministry, and make many turn back—and this was certainly the case. We decided, however, that the only thing was to "burn our boats" so that there should be no compromise. We have certainly "suffered" for our actions in some respects, but we have been spared the dreadful predicament in which David found himself. There are also other elements of truth about which some have compromised to their spiritual undoing. We need not mention them specifically; each one will know his own heart before the Lord.

The Lord in mercy used the natural suspicions of the Philistines themselves to extricate His servant, and he appears to have learned the lesson. Upon returning to Ziklag, however, David found to his horror that the Amalekites had taken their revenge upon him, and had sacked the town carrying away all the women as captives. So bitter was the grief of David's men, that they even spoke of stoning him—"but David encouraged himself in the Lord his God" (xxx. 6).

He now does what he had failed to do in chapter xxvii. He enquires of the Lord through Abiathar the priest, and received the assurance of victory. The six hundred men who formed his band had already marched over rough country for three days, and by the time they reached the brook Besor two hundred were so faint that they could go no further. Much time was saved in the pursuit by the finding of an abandoned Egyptian servant belonging to the Amalekites, and there was a great slaughter—only four hundred young men escaping on camels. David recovered all that had been taken by the Amalekites, the typical teaching probably being that David had at last overcome the flesh, for which Amalek usually stands. David's magnanimity did not meet with the approval of some of his men, who objected to the suggestion that the two hundred who had stayed behind at Besor should share the spoil. David, however, overruled their objection and "made a statute and an ordinance", the terms of which are a comfort to many in the present day:

> "As his part is that goeth down to battle, so shall his part be that tarrieth by the stuff: they shall part alike" (xxx. 24).

Aaron Pick states that Besor means "The bringer of good tidings", and it is certainly true that some have to press on and preach the gospel, while others remain behind and teach, build up or supply the necessary means. All alike, however, shall receive the Lord's approval in that day—whether they be those that sow or those that water or reap.

In verse 26, we read that David "sent of the spoil unto the elders of Judah, even to his friends, saying: Behold a present for you of the spoil of the enemies of the Lord." Thirteen places are mentioned "where David himself and his men were wont to haunt", beginning with Bethel, "The house of God" and ending with Hebron, "Fellowship". These were the places associated with the days of David's rejection, corresponding to the present day when Christ is rejected. To his people, before the day of his coronation comes, he sends indications of his victory, and though the number thirteen suggests that the day of full blessing has by no means arrived, yet Bethel at one end and Hebron at the other indicate a very blessed fellowship, anticipating the greater day when David shall be acclaimed King over all Israel.

The last chapter of I Samuel records Saul's ignominious death, a death at last by his own hand. The Philistines strip him of his armour, cut off his head, and fasten his body to the wall of Beth-shan. The last three verses, which record the considerate action of the men of Jabesh-gilead for the dead Saul, are balanced by the song of the bow, David's lament for Saul and Jonathan (II Sam. i. 17-27).

In II Sam. i. 1-16 another Amalekite is slain, and the section ends with David's lament, a lament in which no word is uttered concerning the cruel persecution he had suffered at the hands of Saul. His tribute to Jonathan is very moving:

> "I am distressed for thee, my brother Jonathan; very pleasant hast thou been unto me; thy love to me was wonderful, passing the love of women" (II Sam. i. 26).

With the fall of Saul, the way is now clear for David to show himself to his people, and our next article will deal with his anointing as king over the house of Judah. So the purpose of the ages unrolls, foreshadowing in the history of David, in faltering type, the glories of his greater Son.

The Books of SAMUEL.
#5. David anointed King over Judah.
Ish-bosheth usurps the kingship over all Israel.
(II Samuel ii. 1-11).

pp. 134 - 139

We have now reached, in a series of articles which has extended over a period of many years, the beginning of the recorded history of the Kings of Israel and Judah. Before we proceed further with our studies, it will be advisable to consider what principle we must adopt in future in view of the almost overwhelming amount of subject-matter to be dealt with and the feebleness of the instrument that must bear the burden. We hasten to explain that we are not thinking of failing health on the part of the writer, who for these many years has been so mercifully sustained, but rather of the magazine itself. What can we hope to do with 20 pages, published monthly, in face of the sheer mass of material that awaits us in these books of the Kingdom? In the Second Book of Samuel, the two Books of Kings, and the two Books of Chronicles, we have more detail to consider, compare and unravel, than our length of days will allow. Moreover, we have other important studies in hand, the present series being only one of many. It is essential, therefore, that we should come to some understanding before we embark upon the history of the Kings of Israel, so that, while acknowledging the inspiration and profitableness of all Scripture, we may also retain our sense of proportion.

With the exception of the opening chapter, the whole of II Samuel is devoted to the life of David. After David we have Solomon; and then a succession of kings, good and bad, who reign over the divided house of Israel and Judah, until the Babylonian captivity under Nebuchadnezzar brings the dispensation of the Kingdom of Israel to an end, and the times of the Gentiles begin.

We propose giving the Second Book of Samuel a fairly careful study so that the salient points of David's career, particularly those which contribute to the understanding of the purpose of the ages, may be seen, and then, using a key which we shall explain in due course, to go through the remaining history of the kings briefly, so that time may be allowed for the testimony of the Prophets and the Psalms to be given a hearing. We are sure that none of our readers will accuse us of negligence or lack of reverence in our attitude to the Word of God—we are but bowing to the necessities of the case, and seeking to use our stewardship to the fullest advantage.

In our last article we left David lamenting the death of Saul and Jonathan (II Sam. i.), and we now take up the theme in the second chapter, where the story of David as King properly begins. In its broadest outline the record of the Kings is as follows:

A | II Sam. ii. 1 - iv. 12. The Kingdom. Divided.
David, King over Judah.
B | II Sam. v. 1 - xxiv. 25. The Kingdom. United.
David, King over all Israel.
B | I Kings i. 1 - xi. 43. The Kingdom. United.
David, Solomon over all Israel.
A | I Kings xii. 1 - II Kings xxv. 30. The Kingdom. Divided.
Rehoboam, Jeroboam and successors over Israel and Judah.

The subject, therefore, falls into four sections, the first being II Sam. ii. 1 - iv. 2—giving the reign of David as King over Judah, up to the time when he ascended the throne of a united people. The most important part of this first section from our present point of view is that which records the anointing of David at Hebron (II Sam. ii. 1-11). We will first look at the structure of this passage and then consider its message.

II Samuel ii. 1-11.
The Two Kings. David and Ish-bosheth.

A | 1-3. DAVID goes to Hebron with his two wives.
B | 4. Men of Judah. David anointed King.
C | 4-10. SAUL though dead, still has influence.
a1 | 4-6. Saul dead and buried.
b1 | 7. David anointed King.
a2 | 8. Saul's captain, Abner.
b2 | 8, 9. Ish-bosheth made King.
a3 | 10. Saul's son Ish-bosheth. 40 years.
b3 | 10. His reign of two years.
B | 10. House of Judah. David followed.
A | 11. DAVID reign in Hebron 7 years and 6 months.

One of the things that strikes the reader as this structure emerges, is the fact that, though Saul is dead and buried (ii. 4, 7), his evil influence is still active; also, that Ish-bosheth, Saul's son, is "made king", but not "anointed".

David is pre-eminently a type of Christ, and his life is recorded, not so much for its own sake as for its remarkable foreshadowing of the future. For instance, we find that, before David was anointed King over all Israel, he was anointed King over his "own", the house of Judah. The instructed reader will not need any proof that in this, David was a type of Christ. The day is yet to dawn when Christ shall be acknowledged King over all, but it is the blessed privilege of His brethren to acknowledge Him as King now.

We must now give our attention to the record of II Sam. ii. 1-11, so that we may learn its typical lesson, and our faith and hope may be strengthened. First of all, let us consider the city selected by God in answer to David's prayer.

"Shall I go up into any of the cities of Judah? . . . . . Unto Hebron" (ii. 1).

Hebron was a city that was closely associated with Abraham, at the time of his separation from Lot.

> "Lift up now thine eyes and look from the place where thou art northward, and southward, and eastward, and westward; for all the land which thou seest, to thee will I give it, and to thy seed for ever . . . . . Then Abraham removed his tent, and came and dwelt in the plain of Mamre, which is Hebron, and built there an altar unto the Lord" (Gen. xiii. 14-18).

Hebron was also sacred to the Israelite, for there Abraham, Isaac and Jacob were buried (Gen. xxiii. 19; xxxv. 27; xlix. 30; l. 13). The burial of the patriarchs here must not be looked upon in any mournful way. They await the promise of God, and, as it were, claim the land by their presence there. Joseph's command "concerning his bones" (Gen. l. 24, 25; Heb. xi. 22) was an act of faith, for he said: "God will surely visit you." In addition to these hallowed and encouraging associations, the meaning of the word itself is suggestive. The word "Hebron" means "a ford", as in Gen. xxxii. 22, and so suggests those that "pass over"—in other words, the redeemed. It was here at Hebron that David was anointed by the men of Judah.

After this anointing there follows the incident of David's magnanimity to the men of Jabesh-Gilead, who had "buried Saul". In his message to them David says: "You master Saul is dead." Instead of this kindness to the inhabitants of Gilead moving them to loyalty towards David as king—for he had added the words: "And also the house of Judah have anointed me king over them"—we have an act of rebellion and attempted usurpation. Saul was dead and buried, but he had a captain Abner, who was Saul's cousin (I Chron. ix. 36), and also a son, a man who is called Ish-bosheth in II Sam. ii. 8, and Esh-baal in I Chron. viii. 33. Ish-bosheth means a "Man of Shame", and Esh-baal a "Man of Baal". Both are significant names for a type of Antichrist.

Ish-bosheth was brought over to Mahanaim, a place associated with Jacob's return to his home and his meeting with Esau (Gen. xxxii. 2). The word means "Two Camps", and the place was so named because of the angels that met the returning patriarch. When Ner took Ish-bosheth to Mahanaim, however, the word took on a new significance. Israel were divided into "two camps", one section following David ("The Beloved"), the Lord's anointed, and the other a man who was "made king", Ish-bosheth ("The Man of Shame"). With the exception of the tribe of Benjamin, to which Ish-bosheth himself belonged, the places and tribes enumerated were all on the West side of Jordan. The reader will remember that the tribes of Reuben, and Gad, and half the tribe of Manasseh, asked for the land of Jazer and Gilead, and so never crossed the Jordan, so far as their inheritance was concerned. These facts surely have a spiritual significance. Believers whose interests are largely "on this side of Jordan" are those who are most likely to come under the dominion of the usurper to-day. So we read that at the place called "Two Camps", Ish-bosheth was made "King over Gilead, and over the Ashurites, and over Jezreel, and over Ephraim, and over Benjamin, and over all Israel" (II Sam. ii. 9). Inasmuch as David was already King of Judah, and the name "Israel" had not at that time come to indicate the ten tribes that separated from Judah after the death of Solomon, we can see that the idea of usurpation was very definite. Satan is the Prince of this world and the God of this age, and his subordinates are called the "rulers of the darkness of this world".

The name Jezreel in II Sam. ii. 9 is associated with Jezebel and her awful end "by the wall of Jezreel" (I Kings xxi. 23). Jezreel was also the name given to the eldest son of Hosea (Hos. i. 4), and became a symbolic name for Israel (Hos. i. 11), prophesying first of all their "scattering" in judgment, and then their final "sowing", when all "men of shame" shall be for ever put down and the true David, "the Beloved", shall reign from sea to sea, and from the river unto the ends of the earth.

David reigned over Judah in Hebron for seven and a half years, and in II Sam. v. 5 we read:

> "In Hebron he reigned over Judah seven years and six months; and in Jerusalem he reigned thirty and three years over all Israel."

According to Hebrew computation this makes 40 years (in I Kings ii. 11 the odd six months are ignored), and as he was 30 when he began to reign (II Sam. v. 4), we have a total of 70 years associated with this great typical king. Ish-bosheth, on the other hand, reigned only two years, and died at the hand of murderers at the age of 42 (6*7):

> "Ish-bosheth, Saul's son, was forty years old when be began to reign over Israel, and reigned two years" (II Sam. ii. 10).

These two years of usurpation should be viewed in the light of Hosea's prophecy:

> "After two days will He revive us, in the third day He will raise us up and we shall live in His sight" (Hos. vi. 2).
>
> "For the children of Israel shall abide many days without a king and without a prince, and without a sacrifice, and without an image, and without an ephod, and without teraphim. Afterward shall the children of Israel return, and seek the Lord their God, and David their King, and shall fear the Lord and His goodness in the latter days" (Hos. iii. 4, 5).

It is evident, we trust, that the seven years of David's reign over Judah, before he was acclaimed King over all Israel, are prophetic of heaven's true King. He also has been anointed and is King among His brethren, but the usurper still seeks to exercise dominion over "all Israel", finding a place for his usurpation in the territory that lies "on this side of Jordan"—the world and its attractive snares. The end, however, is fixed, for "after two years" Israel seek the Lord and David their King, and the Millennial Reign begins.

The Books of SAMUEL.
#6. A Sevenfold Foreshadowing of the Millennial Kingdom. (II Samuel v. - xxiv.).
pp. 165 - 172

We have so far considered the brief but richly prophetic account of David's reign over Judah in Hebron (II Sam. ii. 1-11), and, passing by the details which occupy chapters iii. and iv., we come now to chapter v. where David is anointed King over all Israel.

The story of David's reign occupies the remaining nineteen chapters of the Second Book of Samuel. This record contains some acts that are typical, and others that are shameful. All are necessary to make up a faithful record; and all are necessary if we are to enter into the workings of the of the human heart and have a complete picture of the two natures in the child of God. All these things are not, however, necessary to our understanding of the purpose of the ages, and we must therefore make some selection.

In the centre of the record we find eleven chapters, all overshadowed by David's sin in connection with Uriah and Bathsheba, and at the close of the book we have another confession on David's part. In the first of these sections the child that Bathsheba bears to David is stricken with sickness and dies; and in the second, the land is stricken with pestilence, which destroys seventy thousand men. The consequences of David's sin follow him through many a weary year, as the sins of Amnon, and Sheba, and Absalom show.

The structure of the whole passage is given below, but we shall only deal with those sections in which David is in any measure a type of Christ. His sin with regard to Bathsheba, while bringing to light much truth of both doctrinal and practical importance, will not be included in our survey, except to give it its place in the structure.

II Samuel v. 1 - xxiv. 25.
The Kingdom. United.

A | v. "All the tribes." David anointed.
B | E | vi. The bringing of the Ark to Zion (Psalm xxiv.).
F | vii. The promise. "He will make thee an house."
G | viii. 1-14. David's victories. Spoils dedicated to the Lord.
C | H | viii. 15-18. David's Officers. Joab, Zadok, etc.
I | ix. 1 - x. 5. The house of Saul. "For Jonathan's sake."
J | x. 6 - xi. 1. Wars. "But David tarried."
D | DAVID'S SIN AND ITS CONSEQUENCE (xi. 2 - xx. 22).
K | xii. 10. "The sword shall never depart from thy house."
L | xii. 13. "I have sinned."
M | xiii. 1 - xx. 22. Consequences.
Amnon, Absalom, Sheba.
C | H | xx. 23. David's Officers. Joab. Zadok, etc.
I | xx. 1-14. Saul and his bloody house. "Jonathan."
J | xxi. 15-22. Wars. "David waxed faint."
B | E | xxii. Deliverance from all enemies (Psalm xviii.).
F | xxiii. 1-7. The Prayer. "My house." "All my desire."
G | xxiii. 8-39. David's mighty men.
Water poured out before the Lord.
A | xxiv. 1-9. "All the tribes." Israel numbered.
D | DAVID'S SIN AND ITS CONSEQUENCE (xxiv. 10-25).
L | xxiv. 10. "I have sinned."
K | xxiv. 11-15. Famine, enemies or pestilence.
M | xxiv. 16-25. The offering.
Consequences.

While it will not be possible for us to go through this great section step by step, we very much hope that many of our readers, with this analysis before them, will use it in their own private study, for there are valuable lessons embedded in this record of greatness and frailty, of high intent and tragic fall, that none of us can afford to miss. Meanwhile we must devote ourselves to those parts of the record that foreshadow David's greater Son.

The anointing of David as King over all Israel (II Sam. v. 1-25).—The Israelites were greatly troubled when they heard of the death of Abner (iv. 1), and after the treacherous murder of Ish-bosheth, all the tribes of Israel come to David and anoint him King.

They remind the King and one another of several important facts (II Sam. v. 1, 2):

(1) "Behold, we are thy bone and thy flesh."
(2) "When Saul was King, thou wast he that leddest out and broughtest in Israel."
(3) "The Lord said to thee, Thou shalt feed My people Israel, and thou shalt be captain over Israel."

When Israel shall at length look upon Him Whom they have pierced, will they not also realize that for their sakes He had taken upon Him flesh and blood, that He had led them out and brought them in, and that He was their true Messiah appointed by God?

The capture of the stronghold of Zion.—The first event recorded after the anointing of David over all Israel, is the overthrowing of the Jebusites and the taking of the stronghold of Zion. The Jebusites' taunt in this passage should be understood in the sense that they considered their fortress to be so impregnable that in derision they manned the walls with the blind and the lame—"thinking, David cannot come in hither". There was, however, a secret entrance into the stronghold that somehow had come to the knowledge of Joab. This is called in the A.V. "the gutter"—"a rock-cut passage or shaft, from the upper Gihon (now the Virgin's Fount on the east of Ophel) leading up into the city, and up which the inhabitants drew their water supply" (Companion Bible). This conduit is shown in the Ordnance Survey maps, and The Companion Bible gives in Appendix 68 a cross-section showing the "gutter", from a drawing made by Sir Charles Warren.

We learn from I Chron. xi. 6 that Joab went up this "gutter" first, and so became chief. By this means the stronghold of Zion was taken, and we read in verse 7: "The same is the city of David" (II Sam. v. 7). We can see here an anticipation of the final overthrow of Babylon and Satanic opposition, which the N.T. places just before the revelation of Christ as King of Kings and Lord of Lords.

The bringing up of the Ark to Zion.—The capture of Zion was preliminary to the bringing up of the Ark of God, "Whose name is called by the name of the Lord of Hosts, That dwelleth between the cherubims" (II Sam. vi. 2). David's intention here was right, but owing apparently to ignorance or neglect of the law, Uzzah is smitten, and the Ark left for three months at the house of Obed-edom, the Gittite. From I Chronicles we learn that David must have been exercised over the miscarriage of his plan, and must have sought the Lord and His word about it, for we read:

> "Then David said, None ought to carry the ark of God but the Levites; for them hath the Lord chosen to carry the ark of God, and to minister unto Him for ever" (I Chron. xv. 2).

This time the transfer of the Ark is accomplished with safety, and David, discarding his royal apparel and girt with a linen ephod, dances before the Lord.

> "So David and all the house of Israel brought up the ark of the Lord with shouting, and with the sound of a trumpet" (II Sam. vi. 15).

Upon returning to bless his own household, however, David is met by his wife's sarcastic disapproval:

> "How glorious was the King of Israel to-day, who disrobed himself to-day in the sight of the handmaidens of his servants, as one of the low people might disrobe himself!" (II Sam. vi. 20).

It may be of interest to the reader to know that the LXX here uses apokalupto, where the A.V. reads "uncovered". This word, of course, gives us the word used for the "revelation" of Jesus Christ—which emphasizes a point that has perhaps not been given its due weight, namely, that the "revelation" of Jesus Christ, even though "glorious in our eyes", is nevertheless a condescension on His part. There is a "light" in which He dwells that is unapproachable (I Tim. vi. 16), and the "glory" of His appearing must not hide from us the other equally glorious fact that all His acts on our behalf are condescensions beyond our understanding.

The house of the Lord and the house of David (II Sam. vii. 1-29).—With the coming of the Ark to the city of David, there comes also "rest round about from all his enemies"; and the King, contemplating the disparity between his own house of cedar, and the house of curtains that held the Ark of God, is moved to build a house for the Lord. He reveals later to his son Solomon, however, that the Lord had forbidden his building such a house, because he had "shed blood abundantly". The Temple must be associated with one who was in type the Prince of Peace.

In II Sam. vii., to David's amazement, the Lord makes a promise concerning his house:

> "Also the Lord telleth thee that He will make thee an house" (II Sam. vii. 11).

Further on, in verse 18, we read:

> "Then went King David in, and sat before the Lord and said, Who am I, O Lord God? and what is my house, that Thou hast brought me hitherto? And this was yet a small thing in Thy sight, O Lord God; but Thou hast spoken also of Thy servant's house for a great while to come. And is this the manner of man, O Lord God?" (II Sam. vii. 18, 19).

David was facing grace, and was learning in his measure the same lesson that we may learn to-day as we contemplate the grace of God, namely, that the grace of the "hitherto", is to be eclipsed by the "exceeding riches of grace" which the Lord will reveal in the ages to come (Eph. ii. 7).

This indeed was not "the manner of man". The word "manner" is the Hebrew torah, "law", and "man" here is "Adam". The passage reminds us of Psalm viii., where David asks "What is man?" and then goes on to speak of the Lord's wonderful condescension to a position "lower than the angels", which will ultimately associate the sons of Adam with the Son of God in His dominion over all the works of His hand. David saw by faith something of the glorious truth revealed subsequently in I Cor. xv. 22-28, 45-49; and Heb. ii. 5-10.

With great reluctance we must pass over the intervening chapters that reveal such great depths, after the heights of chapter vii., and come now to the closing chapters xxii.-xxiv. Chapter xxi. significantly ends with the overthrow of several giants, one of them being another Goliath of Gath (II Sam. xxi. 19).

David's psalm of thanksgiving for his deliverance from all his enemies (II Sam. xxii.).—We have here a prophetic foreshadowing of the day when "all enemies" shall be under the feet of Christ, and the glorious goal shall be achieved. The Psalm, which occupies the whole of II Sam. xxii., was afterwards revised and put into the Book of the Psalms as number xviii.

> "In this magnificent hymn the Royal Poet sketches in a few grand outlines the tale of his life—the record of his marvelous deliverances and of the victories which Jehovah had given him—the record, too, of his own heart, the truth of its affection towards God, and the integrity of purpose by which it had ever been influenced. Throughout that singularly chequered life, hunted as he had been by Saul before he came to the throne, and harassed perpetually after he became king by rivals who disputed his authority and endeavoured to steal away the hearts of his people—compelled to fly for his life before his own son, and engaged afterwards in long and fierce wars with foreign nations—one thing had never forsaken him, the love and presence of Jehovah. By His help he had subdued every enemy, and now, in his old age, looking back with devout thankfulness on the past, he sings that great song of praise to the God of his life" (Perowne).

Following this great song of praise are "the last words of David"—which are in structural correspondence with the promise of chapter vii., and refer to David's "house".

David's last words. The Kingdom foreseen (II Sam. xxiii. 1-7).—David's "last words" must be read together with Psalm lxxii., where it is said that the prayers of David, the son of Jesse, are "ended" (Psa. lxxii. 20). Both are prophetic utterances concerning the glorious reign of David's Greater Son. In II Sam. xxiii. we read: "He that ruleth over men must be just" (II Sam. xxiii. 3), while in Psa. lxxii. we read: "He shall judge the people with righteousness" (Psa. lxxii. 2). This righteous rule is followed by newness of life:

> "As the tender grass springing out of the earth, by clear shining after rain" (II Sam. xxiii. 4).
>
> "He shall come down like rain upon the mown grass; as showers that water the earth" (Psa. lxxii. 6).

Verse 5 of II Sam. xxiii. needs some slight revision. Rotherham's Version perhaps expresses David's intention more closely than any other that we have examined, as follows:

> "When not so was my house with God,
> Then a covenant age-abiding He appointed me,
> Ordered in all things and guarded,
> Now that is all my salvation and all my desire
> Will He not make it shoot forth?"

The "last words" of David refer to Christ, and in the words: "Will He not make it shoot forth?" (or grow) we have in verbal form the prophetic title of Christ as "The Branch" (Tsemach).

> "I will raise unto Davie a righteous branch" (Jer. xxiii. 5).

At the close of this prophetic "last word", David looks down the centuries and sees that "the sons of Belial" shall finally be tossed away as thorns, and shall be utterly burned with fire. With this the reader should compare the Parable of the Wheat and the Tares, and all references to the "seed of the wicked one", from Genesis to Revelation.

The "tares" having been destroyed, we should expect the next step to be parallel with the words:

> "Then shall the righteous shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father" (Matt. xiii. 43).

The sons of Belial have dominated the earth long enough, and at their removal, II Sam. xxiii. introduces David's mighty men.

The names of the mighty men whom David had (II Sam. xxiii. 8-39).—These names are linked together in groups.

> THE FIRST THREE.—ADINO, ELEAZAR, and SHAMMAH (II Sam. xxiii. 8-12).
> THE SECOND THREE.—ABISHAI, BENAIAH, and ASAHEL (II Sam. xxiii. 18-23).
> THE THIRTY ONE.—Then follows a list beginning with ELHANAN of Bethlehem and ending with URIAH the Hittite.
> "Thirty seven in all."

Here we have the overcomers, who are honoured when the days of persecution are over—a glorious anticipation of that day when in every sphere of blessing, there will be those who, having "endured", shall receive "the reward" of their inheritance, "the prize" of their calling, "the crown" of life, or righteousness, and share with Christ, not only in His life, but in His glorious reign.

The A.V. and the R.V. in II Sam. xxviii. 8 read, in the margin "Josheb-bassebet the Tachmonite", instead of "the Tachmonite that sat in the seat". His original name meant "A man of shame", but this was altered to Adino, meaning "Ornament". Whether the lesson here is an encouragement for the most worthless of sinners to seek to please the One Who has become Saviour and Lord, or an encouragement to the suffering and persecuted saint, who is for the time being accounted "vile" (cf. Phil. iii. 21 "this body of humiliation"), the end is the same.

One name is notably absent from this list—the name of Joab. The note in The Companion Bible at verse 24 is as follows:

> "24. ASAHEL.—The third of the second three, brother of Joab, but not Joab. His name here but not himself, because when the time of the end comes with its 'last words', loyalty will be the one test. Joab remained true in Absalom's rebellion, but fell away in Adonijah's, Hence in I Cor. 16.22 'love' is the test, in the light of 'Maran-atha', not the 'strifes' of ch.3, or the wrong judgments of chapter 4, or the uncleanness of ch.5, or going to law of ch.6; not the fornication of ch.7, not a wrong conscience of chs.9,10, not ecclesiastical disorders of ch.11, not the misuse of special gifts (chs.12, 13, 14), not orthodoxy (ch.15), but 'love' and loyalty to the Person of Christ, the true David, David's son and David's Lord."

We cannot conclude without referring once again to Uriah the Hittite. Defrauded and basely betrayed by David the man, he is nevertheless honoured and exalted by David as the type of heaven's King.

And so we must conclude this all too meager survey of the reign of David over all Israel. Let us sum up the various points so that their prophetic import may be the better realized.

(1) David is anointed King over all Israel.
(2) The Jebusite is overthrown.
(3) The Ark ascends to its place in the city of David.
(4) God promises David "a house", and David catches a glimpse of "the law of the Man" that is to come.
(5) David at last, with all enemies subdued, sings a Psalm of Praise.
(6) David gives his "last words" regarding the future kingdom.
(7) The mighty men who shared with David in his distress now share with him in his triumph.

May every reader be able to enter into the realization of the prophetic import of these seven items.

The Books of CHRONICLES.
#7. The Divine survey of the history of the kings in relation to the House of God, as indicated by an examination of the Book of Chronicles.
pp. 206 - 212

If our intention were to study the record of each king of Israel and Judah in turn, our next book would be the First Book of Kings, and our theme the closing days of David and the accession of Solomon. This, however, is not our purpose. As we have already explained, what we are attempting to do is to present to the reader a sort of bird's eye view of the whole period covered by the reign of these kings, so that the light that their history throws upon the purpose of the ages may be seen. With such a task before us, we may well ask "Who is sufficient for these things?"

Most readers are probably aware that the ground covered by Samuel and the two books of Kings, is traversed again in the two books of Chronicles. Upon examination, however, we soon perceive that this is no mere repetition. The essential fact about the books of Chronicles is that they view history from the Divine standpoint. To be convinced of this, one must investigate for oneself, but the earnest student will find a good deal of the spade work already done for him by Girdlestone, in his Deuterographs, a book still obtainable at second hand. Appendix 56 of the Companion Bible also supplies the parallel references, without the actual text. As an example, let us take the record of Saul's death as given in I Sam. xxxi., and compare it with I Chron. x. The reader will notice minor differences in the two records, but none of these would seem to justify the time and space of re-writing. At I Chron. x. 13, 14, however, we find a definite addition, the Divine comment upon the factual history recorded in I Sam. xxxi.:

> "So Saul died for his trespass which he committed against the Lord, because of the word of the Lord, which he kept not; and also, for that he asked counsel of one that had a familiar spirit, to enquire thereby, and enquired not of the Lord: therefore He slew him, and turned the Kingdom unto David the son of Jesse" (I Chron. x. 13, 14).

The books of Samuel and I & II Kings view history from the human standpoint, whereas the same events are shown in I & II Chronicles as they appear from the Divine standpoint.

> "In the former books we have three chapters (or 88 verses) given to the secular events of Hezekiah's reign (II Kings xviii., xix., xx.), and only three verses (II Kings xviii. 4-6) given to his great religious reformation. In Chronicles this is exactly reversed. Three chapters (or 84 verse) are devoted to his reformation (II Chron. xxix., xxx., xxxi.), while one chapter (or 32 verses) suffices for the secular events of his reign" (Appendix 56, Companion Bible).

Here, then, is material to our hand. All we need is diligence, patience, the gift of some key-thought, and the record will unfold itself. For this we prayed, and waited, and at length we were led to discover that Israel's history is to be understood dispensationally in the light of their attitude to the house of God. We noted down every king that had anything to do with the Temple, either for good or ill, and to our amazement the notes took shape until we were able to perceive, however dimly, the onward movement of something greater than human action or design. The record is written round the lives of sixteen kings, of which three were Gentiles: Shishak, king of Egypt; Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon; and Cyrus, king of Persia. This leaves the number of Israel's kings as 13, an ominous number associate with rebellion (Gen. xiv. 4), fleshly failure (Gen. xvii. 25), self (I Kings vii. 1), and Satan (Rev. xii. 9). The thirteenth king of Judah was Ahaz, who was, as we shall see, a type of Antichrist.

Before we can go further it will be necessary for us to acquaint ourselves with the way in which Chronicles associates the history of Israel with the house of God. This can be done by each reader for himself by patiently reading through the record and noting each occurrence. The following is the structure obtained.

The Kingdom of Priests.
The history of Israel is the history of the House of God.

A | I Chron. xxviii. DAVID. Command to build (10). Writing (19).
The Lord be with thee (20).
B | II Chron. ii.-xi. SOLOMON. Determines (ii. 1). Begins (iii. 1).
Finishes (v. 1). Dedicates (vi.). Threat (vii. 19-22).
C | II Chron. xii. SHISHAK. Deliverance granted (7). Treasures taken to Egypt (9).
D | xiii. ABIJAH. Keeps to Levitical order (10, 11).
E | xv., xvi. | a | ASA. Brought in dedicated things (good) (xv. 18).
b | ASA. Brought out silver and gold (bad) (xvi. 2).
F | xx. JEHOSHAPHAT. Be not afraid (15).
Battle is not yours (15).
Believe His prophets (20). Dead bodies (24).

* * * Types of Christ and Antichrist. * * *

G | xxii. JOASH. Hidden (12).
H | xxiii. JOASH. King brought (20).
I | xxiv. JOASH. Repaired (4). Levites gathered (5).
J | xxiv. | c | JOASH. Set house in his state (13).
d | JOASH. Vessels to minister (14).
K | xxiv. JOASH. Burnt offerings offered (14).

* * Three out of four types of Antichrist. * *

L | xxv. JOASH. Take vessels (24). Israel's King.
M | xxvi. UZZIAH. Sacrilege (16). 16 years (1). The leper.
M | xxvii. JOTHAM. Entered not (2). 16 years (1).
L | xxviii. AHAZ. Take portion (21). Followed Israel (2).

* * * Types of Christ and Antichrist. * * *

G | xxviii. AHAZ. Shut up (24).
H | xxix. HEZEKIAH. Doors opened (3).
I | xxix. HEZEKIAH. Cleansed (15). Levites gathered (12-15).
J | xxix. | d | HEZEKIAH. Sacrifice (31).
c | HEZEKIAH. Service of house set in order (35).
K | xxx. HEZEKIAH. Passover kept (15).

F | xxxii. HEZEKIAH. Be not afraid (7).
With us . . . . . the Lord . . . . . battles (8).
Rested on words (8). Cut off . . . . . slew (21).
E | xxxiii. | b | MANASSEH. Build altars (bad) (4, 5).
a | MANASSEH. Took away altars (good) (15, 16).
D | xxxiv. JOSIAH (8). Restore to Levitical order (30, 31).
C | xxxvi. NEBUCHADNEZZAR. No remedy (16). Vessels to Babylon (7).
B | xxxvi. NEBUCHADNEZZAR. Burnt (19). Threat fulfilled (21).
A | xxxvi. CYRUS. Charge to build. Writing.
The Lord be with him (22, 23).

In I Chron. xxviii. we find David expressing the desire of his heart to build the house of God, but, bowing to the Divine will, he urges his son Solomon to build it, saying:

"Be strong and do it" (I Chron. xxviii. 1-10). David does not leave the matter there, however. He provides "the pattern", which he says that he had had "by the spirit" and by "writing by His hand upon me" (I Chron. xxviii. 11, 12, 19), and he also supplies abundant material.

> "Now I have prepared with all my might for the house of my God, the gold for the things of gold . . . . . silver . . . . . brass, etc. . . . . in abundance. Moreover, because I have set my affection to the house of my God, I have of mine own proper good, of gold and silver . . . . . given . . . . . Who then is willing to consecrate his service this day unto the Lord?" (I Chron. xxix. 2-5).

With such an example and such an appeal, there was a great response, and we read that "the people rejoiced and offered themselves willingly". David, however, recognizes in prayer that > "All this store that we have prepared to build Thee an house for Thine holy name, cometh of Thine hand, and is all Thine own" (I Chron. xxix. 16).

In verse 22 we read: "And they made Solomon, the son of David, king the second time"—a phrase that reminds us of the coming of Christ "the second time" to put forth His great power and reign.

In II Chron. ii. 1 it is recorded that Solomon determined to build a house for the name of the Lord, chapter iii. tells us when the work began, chapter v. that it was at length finished, and in chapter vi. we have its dedication. In chapter vii. 19-22 we have a warning which includes the prophetic utterance:

> "And this house, which is high, shall be an astonishment to every one that passeth by it, so that he shall say, Why hath the Lord done thus unto this land and unto this house?"

It will be helpful, at this point, to look at the other end of the story. In II Chron. xxxvi. the warning is fulfilled, the house of God is burnt with fire, and the people carried away captive:

> "To fulfil the Word of the Lord by the mouth of Jeremiah until the land enjoyed her sabbaths: for as long as she lay desolate she kept sabbath, to fulfil three score and ten years" (II Chron. xxxvi. 21).

The last item in the structure, and the last word of the Book of Chronicles, is one of restoration.

> "Now in the first year of Cyrus king of Persia, that the word of the Lord spoken by the mouth of Jeremiah might be accomplished, the Lord stirred up the spirit of Cyrus king of Persia, that he made a proclamation throughout all his kingdom, and put it also in writing, saying:
>
> Thus saith Cyrus king of Persia, All the kingdoms of the earth hath the Lord God of heaven given me; and He hath charged me to build Him an house in Jerusalem, which is in Judah, Who is there among you of all His people? The Lord his God be with him, and let him go up" (II Chron. xxxvi. 22, 23).

We observe that we have here the "charge to build", the putting of the proclamation into "writing", and the prayer, "The Lord his God be with him", all of which are reminiscent of the opening section in connection with David. It is good to "see the end from the beginning" and to know by the prophetic word that, after many days of apostacy and rebellion, the time of restitution will surely come.

Returning to the beginning of the record, we come next to the transgression of Rehoboam and the punishment executed upon him by Shishak king of Egypt, who carried away the treasures of the house of the Lord. Rehoboam and his princes humbled themselves, however, and the Lord granted "some deliverance", or "deliverance for a little while". Rehoboam's attitude here is in strong contrast with that described at the end of the book, where we read of the king and his associates that, instead of humbling themselves and repenting—

> "They mocked the messengers of God, and despised His words, and misused His prophets, until the wrath of the Lord arose against His people, TILL THERE WAS NO REMEDY" (II Chron. xxxvi. 16).

The acts of Abijah in chapter xiii., and the acts of Josiah in chapter xxxiv. have this in common, that both kings were zealous in witnessing against idolatry and in restoring the worship of God in accordance with the law. Asa and Manasseh come next in the structure and provide a picture of that mixture of good and bad that is often a link between the true and the false. Jehoshaphat and Hezekiah are the next corresponding members and form an obvious pair. In both cases we have the fear of an enemy, an exhortation not to be afraid, the thought that "the battle is not yours, but God's"; and in both cases we have the destruction of the enemy either by "ambushments", by angelic ministry, or by patricidal murder. All these items are indicated in the structure and should be checked.

We now come to the three central groups in the structure, that provide types of both Christ and Antichrist. Athaliah and the destruction of the seed royal are a type of Satanic opposition to the purposes of God in Christ, while the hiding of the infant king for six years, and his proclamation in the seventh, will need no explanation to those who are acquainted with prophecy. Ahaz stands in line with Athaliah as a type of Antichrist, and the "hiding" of the king's son is echoed by the "shutting up" of the doors of the Lord's house. Hezekiah follows in much the same steps as Joash in the cleansing of the Temple, the gathering of the Levites, and the setting in order of the Lord's house. All these points are noted in the outline already given.

The four kings that come centrally in the structure are important because of the way in which they indicate the various phases of Antichrist's rebellion and opposition. It should be noted that the name of the evil king of Israel here, is the same as that of the good king of Judah. This is a fruitful cause of much evil. Satan's deception is carried out by means of travesty. Let the reader compare, for example, the names of the descendants of Cain given in Gen. iv. 16-24, with those of the descendants of Adam given in Gen. v. To make sure that there is no mistake in connection with Enoch the Scriptures refer to him as the "seventh from Adam" (Jude 14), for there was also a son of Cain who bore the same name.

Uzziah also is a type of Antichrist, for although at first all seemed well, we read later:

> "He was marvelously helped till he was strong. But when he was strong, his heart was lifted up to his destruction; for he transgressed against the Lord his God, and went into the temple of the Lord to burn incense upon the altar of incense' (II Chron. xxvi. 15, 16).

Uzziah was stricken with leprosy and remained a leper to the day of his death, a dreadful picture of the Usurper and his doom.

Of Jotham it is said that he followed his father in so far as he had done right in the sight of the Lord, but he "entered not into the Temple".

The fourth king Ahaz completes the evil triad. We read that he walked in the ways of the kings of Israel and made molten images to Baalim. "Moreover he burnt incense in the valley of the son of Hinnom, and burnt his children in the fire, after the abominations of the heathen". In the same chapter we read that a hundred and twenty thousand men of Judah were slain in one day, "because they had forsaken the Lord God of their fathers" (II Chron. xxviii. 6), while Israel "carried away captive of their brethren two hundred thousand women, sons, and daughters, and took also away much spoil".

> "And in the time of his distress did he trespass yet more against the Lord; THIS IS THAT KING AHAZ" (II Chron. xxviii. 22).

Ahaz seems to be specially marked as a transgressor, as were Cain and Dathan before him. He stands out in strong contrast to Hezekiah, who is singled out for his good deeds (II Chron. xxxii. 12, 30).

It is impossible in these articles to enter into fuller detail, and we can but hope that the reader will accept the suggestion that he should take the key provided and use it in his own personal studies.

We would also remind the reader that the Lord Jesus Himself associated the failure of Israel with the Temple in Matt. xxiii.:

> "O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, thou that killest the prophets and stonest them that are sent unto thee, how often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not! BEHOLD YOUR HOUSE IS LEFT UNTO YOU DESOLATE. For I say unto you, Ye shall not see Me henceforth, till ye shall say, Blessed is He that cometh in the name of the Lord" (Matt. xxiii. 37-39).

The Gospel of JOHN.

#1. An Introduction to the Gospel. A Question of View-Point.

pp. 5 - 8

While it is true that "all spiritual blessings in heavenly places" are "far above all", it is essential that we should remind ourselves continually of the basis upon which all these blessings rest, namely, the finished work of the Son of God, accomplished in the fullness of time upon the earth. The epistles of the N.T. abound in references to this finished work, but it is essential that those inspired records which we call the Gospels, should be read, studied and understood if that work is to become a reality to us.

Three things must be kept in mind when we think of the Gospels and their purpose.

(1) The historic facts which they record are basic. The birth, death, resurrection and ascension of the Lord are fundamental to doctrinal and practical truth.

"If Christ be not risen, then is our preaching vain, and your faith is also vain" (I Cor. xv. 14).

(2) While the Gospels are, in a sense, complete in themselves, the Lord told His disciples that there was still further truth to be revealed to them when the Spirit of Truth had come.

"I have yet many things to say unto you, but ye cannot bear them now" (John xvi. 12).

(3) There is a Divine purpose in the fact that the earthly life or our Lord is recorded from four different aspects. The only One Who could have inspired a single complete account of that life and ministry has not done so, but has been pleased to inspire four different writers to write individual and selective accounts from four different points of view.

MATTHEW.—The point of view of this writer is that of the Kingdom, and his readers are Jews and Jewish believers. He begins with Abraham.

MARK.—This Gospel follows the same line as the Gospel of Matthew, but is shorter and omits some subject-matter that would not appeal to the Gentile proselytes, for whom the account was primarily intended.

LUKE.—Luke writes for the Gentiles evangelized by Paul. He goes back to Adam.

JOHN.—John's point of view is to be discovered. All we will say at the moment is that in John xx. 31 the Apostle has plainly indicated the great object he had in mind in writing his account of the ministry of Christ.

Every teacher, whether inspired or not, if he is to be successful in his work, must establish contact with his hearers, and then proceed from the known and accepted to the unknown. Matthew, for instance, is traversing ground which would be very familiar to his hearers when he traces the genealogy of our Lord back to Abraham. Every name in the first sixteen verses of Matthew would be as well known to many of his hearers as the commonest household words. Abraham was the common ancestor of them all, and Judah the father of the particular tribe most concerned. Having established contact with his hearers, Matthew then proceeds to advance one further step, and to prove that the Son born of Mary was the Heir to the throne of David, and yet a virgin's Son and Emmanuel, "God with us".

John opens his Gospel with the words:

> "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God and the Word was God."

We must suppose that in this case also the writer is standing on common ground with his hearers. Strange as this language may sound in our ears, it can be shown that the necessity for the "Logos" was the burden of both Greek and Alexandrian philosophy at the time of John's writing, and that the city of Ephesus, from which the Gospel emanated, was a place where the philosophies of East and West mingled and where these ideas were at that time "in the air". In a later article we will substantiate these statements as to the important position that the "Logos" held in ancient philosophy, but for the moment we must pass on.

That John wrote for non-Jewish readers is at once evident, for it is obvious that no Jew needed to be told that the "Passover" was a feast of the Jews, or that "Rabboni" meant My Master. We have considered these questions more in detail in Volume XX, where the reader will find the following eightfold proof:

(1) The world is the sphere of John's ministry.
(2) The fact that Jewish customs are explained shows that the non-Jewish reader is in view.
(3) The rejection of the Lord by His own people is at the very forefront of the Gospel.
(4) No mention is made of the Lord's Supper, the New Covenant feast.
(5) The ascension is emphasized.
(6) The "Word" in John i. 1 is parallel with the "Image" in Col. i.
(7) The prayer of John xvii. is, among other things, that "the world" may know.
(8) Miracles are not mentioned as such; they are called "signs".

Those readers who are not familiar with the Scriptural arguments associated with the above summary are earnestly recommended to consider what has been put forward in the Volume referred to. The question of view-point is most important in the study of any part of the Scriptures.

The special "signs" recorded in John's Gospel, which are so intimately associated by the writer with his message (John xx. 31), are eight in number. In Volume XI and XII, these eight "signs" are dealt with in some detail. We will give here the structure only.

The eight signs.

A | ii. 1-11. THE MARRIAGE IN CANA. The third day.
No wine. Glory manifested.
B | iv. 46-50. THE RULER'S SON. After two days. At the point of death.
C | v. 1-47. THE IMPOTENT MAN. Pool Bethesda. 38 years.
Sabbath. Sin.
D | vi. 1-14. THE FEEDING OF THE FIVE THOUSAND.
Many went back (vi. 66).
D | vi. 15-21. THE WALKING ON THE SEA.
Many of the people believed (vii. 31).
C | ix. 1-44. THE MAN BORN BLIND. Pool Siloam. From birth.
Sabbath. Sin.
B | xi. 1.44. THE SISTERS' BROTHER. Two days. Lazarus is dead.
A | xxi. 1-14. THE DRAUGHT OF FISHES. The third time.
No meat. The Lord magnified.

We shall give evidence later on in this series, that John wrote his Gospel at Ephesus, after Paul had finished his course. We do not believe that John teaches the truth of the Mystery, or that he was himself a member of the One Body, but he knew that the revelation had been made through Paul, and records in his Gospel aspects of the Person and work of Christ that the other Gospel writers were not permitted to reveal. In Volume XXVIII, page 126, the reader will find a chart indicating the relation between John's Gospel and the Prison Ministry of Paul. This we commend to any of our readers to whom it is not familiar.

In the articles printed in earlier volumes of The Deity of Christ, John i. 1 has necessarily been considered, and a series entitled "This is the Record", which runs through Volume XXVI, also touches upon important passages in John's Gospel. In the present series, however, we desire to approach the Gospel as a study in itself. In this opening article we have tried to give some idea of what has already been written on the subject, so that all our readers may have the benefit of these introductory attempts, and be prepared to go forward with us in a more systematic study of this wonderful revelation of light and love.

#2. Historical Evidence and the Scope of the Book.
pp. 41 - 43

Readers of The Berean Expositor are not very much concerned with what is called the "Higher Criticism"; for the Scriptures speak too plainly to the quickened understanding to need external proofs. We must not, however, forget that inability to meet criticism, or failure to bring forward evidence, may mean that, at some important moment, our witness may be blunted and some friend or acquaintance left in darkness. We propose, therefore, to devote one or two further articles to introductory matters before dealing more fully with the book itself.

The Gospel of John has been more severely criticized than the other three, and its genuineness has been denied. It is not our intention here to load our pages with ancient names, or with many extracts from antiquity. We give, however, a few pointed references. Clement of Alexandria (A.D.150-215) writes:

> "St. John, the last (of the evangelists), when he saw that the outward bodily facts had been set forth in the (existing) Gospels, impelled by his friends (and) divinely moved by the Spirit, made a spiritual Gospel."

One of the earliest and most important witnesses in this connection is Irenæus (born A.D.98), who knew and had conversed with Polycarp, a disciple of John himself. Irenæus unhesitatingly ascribes the fourth gospel to John, and speaks of this belief as of universal acceptance in his day.

Victorinus of Pettan wrote of John and his Gospel:

> "When Valentus and Cerinthus and Ebion and others of the school of Satan were spread throughout the world, all the bishops of the nieghbouring provinces came together to him to constrain him to commit his own testimony to writing" (Migne Patrol v. 333).

In connection with this quotation it is interesting to note that Cerinthus taught that Christ was a man, and nothing more, and that He was the son of both Joseph and Mary—a doctrine that is most definitely refuted in the opening of John's Gospel. Irenæus also writes of John as being "willing, by the publication of his Gospel, to take away the error which Cerinthus had disseminated amongst men". He tells us, moreover, that John remained at Ephesus up to the time of the Emperor Trajan.

We do not propose to pursue this subject further. Those readers who are concerned with proofs for the canonicity of John's Gospel, and are able to appreciate historical evidence, will already be in possession of sufficient means to prosecute their studies without our help, and those who are not will not benefit by a multiplicity of proofs.

We turn now to the book itself in relation to the other Gospels, and note first those things which are common to John's Gospels and the Synoptics.

(1) The work of the "Forerunner", John the Baptist.
(2) The last supper, but no reference to the institution of a memorial feast.
(3) The anointing at Bethany.
(4) The miracle of feeding the 5000.
(5) The miracle of walking on the sea.
(6) The crucifixion.
(7) The resurrection.

The word "synoptic" has been used in the note above, and it may be that some readers are not quite clear as to its actual meaning. The word means, "to see together", "to have a common point of view"; and it is this common point of view that unites the three Gospels, Matthew, Mark and Luke. John, while recording some of the same incidents in the life and death and ministry of the same Lord, has a point of view entirely his own. This different point of view is manifest in the opening verse: "In the beginning was the Word", and throughout the Gospel. We shall therefore learn more by "trying the things that differ" than by observing the things in common, and we will therefore record a few of these differences as examples.

The Companion Bible draws attention to some 84 words that are employed by John that are not used by the Synoptic writers, and these will be noted as our exposition proceeds. There are also other words, not exclusive to John, but used by him with great frequency than in the other Gospels, and these are grouped together in The Companion Bible in the foreword to John's Gospels. Of this list of 32 words we give the following by way of example.

Word.		John's Gospel.	Synoptic Gospels.
Kosmos . . .	THE WORLD . . .	79 times	15 times.
Ho Pater . . .	THE FATHER . . . (used of GOD)	121	66
Martureo . . .	WITNESS . . .	33	3
Aletheia . . .	TRUTH . . .	25	7
Pempo . . .	SEND . . .	33	15
Teleioo . . .	FINISH . . .	19	Twice

These six words, which are so characteristic of John's message, would, if studied together, throw considerable light upon the special purpose of his Gospel.

The following inter-relation of the four Gospels is common knowledge, but is set out here in order that our testimony may be complete, and that any new reader may have the benefit.

MATTHEW.—Christ is set forth as KING. "Behold thy King" (Zech. ix. 9).
Christ is set forth as David's BRANCH.
"Behold . . . . . I will raise unto David a righteous Branch and a King shall reign and prosper" (Jer. xxxiii. 5, 6; xxxiii. 15).
Christ genealogy is therefore given from Abraham through David (Matt. i. 1-17).
Christ, relatively, presented as in the highest earthly position, a KING.

MARK.—Christ is set forth as SERVANT. "Behold My Servant" (Isa. xlii. 1).
Christ is set forth as the BRANCH.
"Behold I will bring forth My Servant, the Branch" (Zech. iii. 8).
Christ, as a servant, needs no genealogy.
Christ, relatively, presented as in the lowest earthly position, a SERVANT.

LUKE.—Christ is set forth as MAN. "Behold the Man" (Zech. vi. 12).
Christ is set forth as the BRANCH.
"Behold the man whose name is the Branch" (Zech. vi. 12).
Christ's genealogy is traced back to Adam.
Christ, intrinsically, presented as the MAN.

JOHN.—Christ is set forth as GOD. "Behold your God" (Isa. xl. 9).
Christ is set forth as Jehovah's BRANCH.
"In that day shall Jehovah's Branch be beautiful and glorious" (Isa. iv. 2).
Christ, as God, can have no genealogy. He "was" in the beginning.
Christ, intrinsically, presented as "GOD", mediatorially as the "WORD", and savingly as "JESUS THE CHRIST, THE SON OF GOD",
"THE WORD MADE FLESH".

#3. The Logos, in Philosophy and in Revelation.
pp. 92 - 99

When the Apostle was confronted with the Stoic and Epicurean philosophers at Athens, he did not use words of scorn or derision, but rather of sympathy. The Jew in him, as well as the Christian, abominated the sight of idols, and we read that "his spirit was stirred in him, when he saw the city wholly given to idolatry" (Acts xvii. 16). Nevertheless, when he was arraigned before these philosophers, he did not alienate them by ridicule or contempt, but rather used the local conditions as a starting point for his speech:

> "I found an altar with this inscription, TO THE UNKNOWN GOD, Whom, therefore, ye ignorantly worship, him I declare unto you" (Acts xvii. 23).

It is in much the same spirit that John, at Ephesus, surrounded by Greek and Alexandrian philosophy, opens his Gospel with the title Logos. There is no introduction to the title, no leading up to it, but simply a statement with which he expected most of his hearers to be in agreement. After the prologue of i. 1-18, the title Logos is never again used of Christ, the whole object of the Gospel being to prove that the Messiah, the Son of God, fulfils all and more than all that the ancient philosophers, or the writers of the Hebrew Wisdom literature, ever conceived.

We referred above to Paul's attitude at Athens, which is actually recorded, as an illustration of what was probably John's attitude at Ephesus, which is left to be inferred. Let us now acquaint ourselves a little further with the position at Athens. The philosopher Chrysiphus had said that God pervades all nature and that He has many names to match his operations.

> "They all call him Dia, 'through' whom are all things, and they call him Zeus, inasmuch as he is the cause of 'life'." (Diog. Laert vii. 147).

According to Chrysiphus, Zeus is the Logos that regulates (dioikeo) all things, and is the soul of the world.

On another occasion, when Paul stood before a group of Pharisees and Sadducees, we find that he seized the opportunity presented by their mutual antagonism to gain the ear of the Pharisee in the matter of the resurrection. So here, at Athens, before the Stoics and Epicureans, he seizes upon their distinctive tenets and shows how they meet in the person of Christ. Knowing the sayings that were current among them, he refers to the fact that "we are also His offspring", and also that He is not "like unto gold, or silver, or stone, graven by art and man's device". He teaches the Divine transcendence (the Epicurean position); "Neither is worshipped with men's hands, as though He needeth anything", but he also teaches the Divine immanence (the Stoic position) by adding: "If haply they should feel after Him . . . . . For in Him we live, and move, and have our being."

And then, when both parties begin to realize that Paul has taken hold of both their conflicting positions, he brings these opposite views into synthesis by focusing their attention upon the "Man" that has been ordained (Acts xvii. 31).

Paul does not necessarily endorse the somewhat popular etymology of Chrysiphus. Dia and Dion need not necessarily be derived from dia, "through", and there are other possible origins of Zeus besides zoe, "life"; nevertheless the idea was sufficient for the Apostle to use as a starting-point from which to direct the attention of his hearers to the Lord God, the true Source of life, through Whom all else must be derived. And so John, surrounded at Ephesus with a blend of Greek and Philonic philosophy and the Hebrew Apocryphal Wisdom, takes up the central theme of this philosophy, the Logos, and, stripping it of its heathen and Hebrew accretions, and adding to it that which revelation alone could give, leads his hearers to see that the elusive and abstract Logos of human philosophy found its full and perfect significance in the living Person of Jesus Christ, the Son of God.

No explanation of John i. 1 can compare with that written by the same writer in his first epistle:

> "That which was from the beginning, which we have heard, which we have seen with our eyes, which we have looked upon, and our hands have handled, of the Word of life; (for the life was manifested, and we have seen it, and bear witness, and shew unto you that eternal life, which was with the Father, and was manifested unto us); that which we have seen and heard declare we unto you, that ye also may have fellowship with us: and truly our fellowship is with the Father, and with His Son Jesus Christ. And these things write we unto you, that your joy may be full" (I John i. 1-4).

Just as the first eighteen verses of John form a sort of prologue to the Gospel, so the first four verses here form a prologue to the epistle. In both we observe, as Westcott notes, a similar sequence of thought:

> "In each, the main subject is described first (John i. 1-5; I John i. 1).
> Then the historical manifestation of it (John i. 6-13; I John i. 2).
> Then its personal apprehension (John i. 14-18; I John i. 3)."

Each book, however, has its own distinctive point of view. The Gospel is concerned with demonstrating that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, so that, believing this, life may come through His name. The epistle, on the other hand, takes up the practical working out of this truth.

The references to the Logos in John's writings are as follows:

A | John i. 1-5. In the beginning. With God (pros).
B | John i. 14. Made flesh. The Lamb (in context).
A | I John i. 1-4. From the beginning. With the Father (pros).
B | Rev. xix. 13. Coming in flesh (I John iv. 3; II John 7). The Lamb.

Outside the writings of John there is no specific reference to the Logos (unless Heb. iv. 12, 13 be one), but if the word itself is not used by Paul, the doctrine underlying it is most gloriously present in his epistles. He speaks of the "Image of the invisible God" (Col. i. 15; see also II Cor. iv. 4), which to all intents and purposes corresponds to the Logos of John i. 1-5. He speaks also of "the express Image of His Person" (Heb. i. 3), which is even closer to the meaning of the Logos. These passages will come up for more careful examination when the present preparatory studies are over. For the moment, we must continue our quest for the doctrine of the Logos, as underlying John i. 1-5.

First of all, we must refer to the passage in Prov. viii. 22-31, which anticipates the fuller revelation of John i. 1-5:

> "The Lord possessed me in the beginning of His way, before His works of old. I was set up from everlasting, from the beginning, or ever the earth was. When there were no depths, I was brought forth; when there were no fountains abounding with water. Before the mountains were settled, before the hills was I brought forth; while as yet He had not made the earth, nor the fields, nor the highest part of the dust of the world. When He prepared the heavens, I was there; when He set a compass upon the face of the depth; when He established the clouds above; when He strengthened the fountains of the deep; when He gave to the sea His decree, that the waters should not pass His commandment; when He appointed the foundations of the earth: then I was by Him, as one brought up with Him; and I was daily His delight, rejoicing always before Him: rejoicing in the habitable part of His earth; and my delights were with the sons of men" (Prov. viii. 22-31).

The apocryphal writings must also be considered, for, while they are not canonical scriptures and are not looked upon as inspired and authoritative, the thoughts they express and the words they employ hold an important place in the history of doctrine.

In Ecclesiasticus xxiv. Wisdom follows the same line of thought as that given in Prov. viii. Wisdom is represented as seeking rest, and the Creator causes Wisdom's "tabernacle to rest" in Jacob. When one reads in John i. 14 that the Word was made flesh and "tabernacled" among us, one feels that there is at least a passing glance at this ancient book of Wisdom. John, however, shows that the fond hope of Ecclesiasticus that Wisdom should find a home among Israel was not immediately realized, for "He came to His own, but His own received Him not".

The following is a quotation from The Wisdom of Solomon—a passage which it is difficult to read without thinking of John i. and Heb. i.:

> "For she is the breath of the power of God, and a pure effluence from the Almighty . . . . . For she is the brightness of the everlasting light, the unspotted mirror of the power of God, and the image of His goodness" (Wisdom of Solomon vii.).

There is something comparable, also, between The Wisdom of Solomon xviii. 15 and Rev. xix.:

> "Thine Almighty Word leaped down from heaven out of Thy royal throne, as a fierce man of war into the midst of a land of destruction."

While the Targums, or Aramaic paraphrases of the O.T., were not committed to writing until after the Christian era, they embody teaching that was current from a much earlier period, and in these Targums we frequently meet the word Memra, "The Word". For example, in the Targum of Onkelos on Gen. iii. 8, Adam and Eve are said to have heard the voice of the Word of the Lord walking in the garden. And in Deut. v. 5, the Targum reads:

> "I stood between the Word (Memra) of the Lord and you, to announce to you at that time the word (pithgama) of the Lord."

It will be seen that the Targum differentiates here between "the Word" (Memra), and the spoken word. It is "the Word" (the Memra) that creates, preserves and redeems. The Targums, however, fall short of the complete truth, for they never seem to have identified the Memra with the Messiah. It is this identification that is the peculiar office of the Gospel according to John.

Our account of Hebrew thought as to the Logos would be incomplete without a reference to the Apocalyptic Book of Enoch, of which one authority has said: "The influence of Enoch in the New Testament has been greater than that of all the other apocryphal and pseudepigraphal books taken together." This does not mean that John borrowed from the Book of Enoch, but it is obvious that the inspired writers of Scripture must have used words that were intelligible to their hearers, and could not have ignored the doctrines that were believed and taught all around them.

The Book of Enoch is a compilation whose date is regarded by authorities as between 170B.C. and 64B.C. In the section known as the Similitudes we find the following passage, which is in some respects parallel with John's Prologue and his insistence upon the ascension:

> "Wisdom came to make her dwelling among the children of men, and found no dwelling-place; thus Wisdom returned, and took her seat among the angels."

The philosophy of the Greeks, and particularly that of Heraclitus and Plato, must never be forgotten in considering the meaning of the Logos. This does not imply that we should import the speculations of men into the revelation of God, but simply that we should recognize that even inspired truth must use words of common meaning, and that John's immediate readers would be fully cognizant of the philosophic use of this word.

Speaking of Heraclitus, Dr. Drummond writes:

> "He clearly perceived that the universe was one, and that all its multifarious changes were governed by a rational and unalterable law. To this law he gave the very name which we translate 'Word' in the Gospel."

To Heraclitus, however, the Logos was not a person, but much like the scientists "laws of nature".

Plato's views on the Logos are set forth in the Timæus:

> "The world is represented as 'a living and rational organism', the 'only begotten' (monogenes) Son of God, itself a god and the express image (eikon) of the supreme God" (J. S. Johnston).

What Plato ascribed to the creation itself, revelation ascribes to the Person of the Son of God. The groping of unaided reason stumbled upon the terms "logos" and "only begotten" and "image", but could not relate them one to another, or to the truth.

Plato speaks of ideas as "vowels", which, chain-like, pervade all things (Soph. 253)—a suggestion which at once makes us think of Him Who is the Alpha and the Omega, the glorious "chain-like" link in the purpose of the ages.

We must now pass on to Philo, a Jew of Alexandria, who attempted to bridge the gulf between the revelation of God as given in the Hebrew Scriptures and the demands of Philosophy. Two contrary views were held as to the nature of God: one view being that He was transcendent, and the other that He was immanent. The first view removed God so far from creation and human affairs as to reduce Him to an abstraction, while the second identified Him with creation so closely that it became virtually Pantheism. The transcendental God was "unknowable and unthinkable". He had no qualities, and no attributes. His only name was "I am that I am".

With these thoughts in mind, let us turn once more to the Gospel of John. Here, too, we find One Who could say: "Before Abraham was, I AM" (John viii. 58), but we also read that He said, "I am the bread of life", and "I am the light of the world". The transcendent One was also immanent. Greek philosophy felt the need for the mediating Logos, but the Logos was regarded as being neither God nor man. The Christian revelation also stresses the need for the mediating Logos, but reveals the glorious fact that He is both God and Man. In other words, the passage in John i. 14: "The Word became flesh and dwelt among us", together with its complement in John xi. 25: "I am the resurrection, and the life" contain the truth which Plato and Philo sought, but sought in vain. When we consider these earnest seekers after the truth and compare their position with our own, how grateful we should be for the light vouchsafed to us in this day of grace.

John reveals that God is transcendent in His nature (John i. 18), but that in the Logos He is also immanent throughout the extent of His creation. Creation, revelation, incarnation, redemption, ascension are all possible and necessary, if the Logos of John i. be true.

The Rabbinical School at Alexandria, where Philo lived, urged the transcendental aspect of the nature of God to its extreme, setting its face against all forms of anthropomorphism. Philo, for instance, says that, to accept in their literal sense the words: "It repented God that He had made man", is to be guilty of an impiety greater than any that was drowned in the flood. For Philo God was an abstraction, and His nature only capable of being shadowed forth by negatives. We can only know what He is not.

How comforting to turn from such a view for a moment to the reassuring words of John xiv. 9: "He that hath seen Me hath seen the Father", even though, at the same time, we must not forget the utter transcendentalism of such passages as John v. 37: "Ye have neither heard His voice at any time, nor seen His shape" (John v. 37). As we realize the immensity of the gulf that yawned between the far-off Platonist God, and the things of time and sense, we may perhaps better understand why the Lord uses the figure of Jacob's ladder as representing Himself in John i. 51.

Philo uses the following names and titles in his description of the Logos:

The "Son of God"; the "First-born Son" (protogonos, i. 414); the "Image of God" (eikon Theo, i. 6); "God" (i. 655 de Sommus Theos); "Second God" (ho deuteros Theos, Fragments ii. 625); "archetypal man" (ho kat' eikona anthropos, i. 427). When one reads and listens to many Christians to-day as they speak of the Lord Jesus Christ, one wonders whether they have got any further than Philo's "Second God"!

Philo speaks of the "seamless robe", when referring to the indissoluble texture of the universe, and it is surely no accident that this apparently irrelevant detail is incorporated in John xix. 23, for we must constantly bear in mind that the doctrine of the prologue of John i. 1-18 is elaborated and illustrated throughout the record of the Gospel. Philo refers to the Divine Word as flowing like a river, which may be compared with John's reference to the living water. He also speaks of the Logos as the "Heavenly Bread", which is parallel with the Gospel reference to Christ as the Bread that came down from heaven.

In his Confessions (vii. ix.), Augustine has a fine comment on the essential difference between philosophy and revelation, and with this we must bring the present article to a close.

> "Thou procurest for me by means of one puffed up with most unnatural pride, certain books of the Platonists, translated from Greek into Latin. And therein I read, not indeed in the very words, but to the very same purpose, enforced by many and diverse reasons, that, In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God: the same was in the beginning with God: all things were made by Him, and without Him was nothing made: that which was made by Him is life, and the life was the light of men, and the light shineth in darkness, and the darkness comprehended it not . . . . . BUT THAT HE CAME UNTO HIS OWN . . . . . but as many as received Him, to them gave He power to become the sons of God, as many as believed in His name; this I read not. Again, I read there that God the Word was born, not of flesh, nor of blood, nor of the will of man, nor of the will of the flesh, but of God. BUT THAT THE WORD WAS MADE FLESH, and dwelt among us, I read not there."

Augustine puts his finger on the crux of the matter. Human reason could go so far as to see the necessity for the Logos—for all God's ways are wrought with reason—but it could never penetrate the mystery of godliness and discover that "God was manifest in the flesh". The glorious fact that "God was in Christ reconciling the world unto Himself" was the secret of the God of Love, and it was this secret that was John's message, both in Gospel and Epistle.

#4. The Structure of the Gospel as a Whole. The Key of the Eight Signs.

pp. 125 - 128

In our previous studies we have merely cleared the way for the blessed task which now lies before us: an examination of the teaching of this fourth record of the earthly life and ministry of the Son of God. Our first duty is to see the book as a whole, in order to discover its theme and the way in which that theme is elaborated, illustrated and proved.

At the very beginning of this Gospel we are at once struck by its unique point of view. Let us compare the way in which it opens with that of the other Gospels.

MATTHEW . . . This gospel opens with the words: "The book of the generation of Jesus Christ, the Son of David, the Son of Abraham" (Matt. i. 1).

MARK . . . The writer here omits all reference to genealogy, and opens with the words: "The beginning of the gospel of Jesus Christ, the Son of God" (Mark i. 1).

LUKE . . . Luke goes back before the advent of Christ, to the birth of the forerunner, John the Baptist. He begins with an explanatory prologue, to Theophilus, and opens his Gospel with the words: "There was in the days of Herod the King of Judæa, a certain priest named Zacharias, of the course of Abia" (Luke i. 5).

JOHN . . . John gives no genealogy, as Matthew does; he goes back to an earlier beginning than that referred to by Mark; and he speaks of a time and a sphere in which the Lord could have no forerunner. He begins with the words: "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God" (John i. 1).

The first eighteen verses of this Gospel constitute a marvelous and awe-inspiring prologue to the rest of the book. The prologue enunciates the theme, and the rest of the Gospel elaborates it and demonstrates its truth. The central and largest section of the Gospel is a golden chain of eight links, the eight "signs" selected by John about which the whole Gospel narrative is woven. On either side of these eight "signs" we have a reference to specially prepared witnesses. The simplest possible analysis, therefore, of the Gospel according to John is as follows:

A1 | i. 1-18. The PROLOGUE. The theme enunciated.
A2 | i. 19 xxi. 25. The GOSPEL. The theme elaborated.

Taking the second member A2, we can set it out in its simplest form as follows:

B | i. 19-51. WITNESSES.
C | ii. 1 - xxi. 14. SIGNS.
B | xxi. 15-25. WITNESSES.

This simple structure naturally contains a wealth of detail and its gradual unfolding will, we trust, be a joy and rejoicing of heart, as we go forward in this labour of love. Each of the members denominated "Witnesses" may be sub-divided as follows:

B | i. 19-51. WITNESSES.
a | i. 19-34. The witness of John the Baptist.
"This is the record . . . . . I saw and bare record."
b | i. 25-51. Andrew, Simon the son of Jona, Philip, Nathaniel.
"Follow Me."

This section dealing with witness is paralleled at the close in inverse order as follows:

B | xxi. 15-25. WITNESSES.
b | xxi. 15-23. Simon Peter, Son of Jonas, John.
"Follow Me."
a | xxi. 24-25. The witness of John.
"We know his testimony is true."

The bulk of the Gospel lies between these two outposts, and, as we have said above, is interwoven with the eight distinctive "signs". No good purpose will be served by setting out in full detail this great section—the details will unfold themselves before our eyes as our studies proceed—but in order to make this analytical article in its measure complete, we must show how this central section is arranged.

C | ii. 1 - xxi. 14. The eight signs.

C | c1 | ii. 1-12. 1ST SIGN. MARRIAGE AT CANA.
d1 | ii. 13 - iv. 42. "My meat . . . . . to finish His work" (ergon).
"Now we believe" (pisteuo).
c2 | iv. 43-52. 2nd SIGN. NOBLEMAN'S SON.
d2 | iv. 53, 54. "He believed" (pisteuo).
c3 | v. 1-15. 3rd SIGN. IMPOTENT MAN.
d3 | v. 16-47. "My Father worketh . . . . . and I work" (ergon).
"Believeth on Him that sent Me" (pisteuo).
c4 | vi. 1-25. 4th and 5th SIGN. THE 5,000 FED. WALKING ON SEA.
d4 | vi.-viii. "This is the work (ergon) of God that ye believe (pisteuo) . . . . . are the works of your father."
c5 | ix. 1-41. 6th SIGN. MAN BORN BLIND.
d5 | x. 1-42. "The works (ergon) . . . . . in My Father's name bear witness."
"Ye believed not" (pisteuo).
c6 | xi. 1.46. 7th SIGN. SISTERS' BROTHER RAISED.
d6 | xi. 47 - xx. 31. "I have finished the work" (ergon).
"That the world may believe" (pisteuo).
c7 | xxi. 1-14. 8th SIGN. DRAUGHT OF FISHES.

The eight "signs" alternate with six intervening sections, each of which is characterized by a double reference to "works" and "belief", except in the case of the healing of the nobleman's son, where "works" are not mentioned. The eight signs are patently in correspondence, but it will be useful to make sure that all see that the six intervening sections are also carefully arranged and in perfect balance. The importance of this may not at the moment be obvious, but we trust that, by the time we have finished our study, the working out of the revelation given in the prologue will be evident. The following is the structure of the intervening links:

A | ii. 13 - iv. 42. My meat is . . . . . to finish His work.
B | iv. 53, 54. He believed.
C | v. 16-47. My Father worketh . . . . . and I work.
C | vi.-viii. This is the work of God . . . . . the works of your father.
B | x. 1-42. The works . . . . . in My Father's name bear witness.
A | xi. 47 - xx. 31. I have finished the work.

This important inter-relation gives us the Lord's own emphasis, and the more of this we can see, the less we need the help of man. Some may have already observed that the structure given of John's Gospel is entirely different from any hitherto published. It would have been easy to have adopted the structure already set out in The Companion Bible, and hours of labour would have been saved, but this would not have been living up to the title of "The Berean Expositor". We could not ignore John's own significant statement in chapter xx., and a new structure was therefore necessary.

> "And many other signs truly did Jesus in the presence of His disciples, which are not written in this book: but these are written, that ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God; and that believing, ye might have life through His name" (John xx. 30, 31).

Any structure that ignores this testimony must be faulty, and consequently misleading. We were therefore obliged to start afresh, and the result we commend to the discriminating reader.

The majestic prologue of John i. 1-18 now awaits us. Its theme is magnificent beyond our comprehension, and as we draw near, let us remember that we are approaching holy ground. May worship mingle with our studies, and may we too "behold His glory, the glory of the only begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth".

#5. The Prologue in Outline (i. 1-18).
pp. 172 - 175

In reading John's Gospel, most of us find that it is the prologue that contains the more difficult expressions, while in the body of the Gospel itself we feel on more familiar ground. It is probable, however, that those who were primarily in the Apostle's mind when he wrote this record, would find the reverse to be true. As they began to read about the Logos, at the beginning of the Gospel, they would be on familiar ground, but they would feel that they were entering quite new territory as they followed the earthly footsteps of Him Whom was the Logos "made flesh". We have thought so frequently of the Hebrew people as the channel of Divine revelation and as the supreme example of the failure of the creature to attain unto righteousness, that we have tended to forget the Greek nation, as the example of the failure of human reason to attain unto wisdom. We are expressly told that the Jew sought after righteousness but did not attain it, because he sought it by law and not by faith (Rom. ix. 31, 32; x. 3), and in I Corinthians we read:

> "The Jews require a sign, and the Greeks seek after wisdom" (I Cor. i. 22).

Just as "Christ" was the true Righteousness of the Jew, so He was equally the true Wisdom of the Greek.

> "But of Him are ye in Christ Jesus, Who of God is made unto us wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption" (I Cor. i. 30).

In the first three Gospels the Jew is distinctly prominent, and there are abundant references to the Old Covenant Scriptures. The Jew and the Old Covenant Scriptures are conspicuous, too, in the body of the Gospel of John—for it is a faithful record of the Lord's deeds and words in Jerusalem, Judæa and Samaria—but in the prologue the Greek point of view is prominent, and the problem of the Greeks is shown to be solved in the person and work of the Son of God.

It is interesting to notice that John's Gospel is the only one that uses the word Ellen, "Greeks". With the coming of the "Greeks" and their request: "Sir, we would see Jesus" (John xii. 20, 21), the Saviour says for the first time: "The hour is come, that the Son of Man should be glorified" (John xii. 23). To His mother at the marriage feast He had said: "Mine hour is not yet come" (John ii. 4). To the Samaritan woman He says: "The hour cometh" (John iv. 21, 23). In chapter v. He says: "The hour is coming, and now is, when the dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God" (John v. 25). In vii. 30 and viii. 20, we read that "His hour was not yet come". And then in John xii., with the quest of the Greeks, we reach the turning-point of the Gospel: "The hour is come, that the Son of Man should be glorified." It is clear, therefore, that the Greek point of view cannot be ignored without serious loss.

As we are not "Greeks", and have not been brought up in an atmosphere of philosophic discussion, we shall have to pause, at various points, as we go through the prologue, and acquaint ourselves with some of the ideas that John seems to have had vividly in mind as he wrote. We all know something of what is intended by the title "The Word", but how many of us know anything of the history of the quest for the Logos?

Coming now to the structure of these first eighteen verses, it is at once clear that verses 1 and 18 are in correspondence.

a | In the beginning was the WORD.
  b | The Word was WITH God.
    c | The Word was GOD.
    c | GOD only begotten.
  b | In the BOSOM of the Father.
a | He hath DECLARED Him.

Here the "Word" "declares", and the term "with God" finds its echo in "in the bosom of the Father". The reading "God only begotten" echoes the statement that the "Word was God". We defer the proofs for this reading until later.

The structure of the complete section is as follows:

The Prologue (John i. 1-18).

A | 1 | a | THE WORD. In the beginning.
b | WITH. The Word was with God.
c | GOD. The Word was God.
B | 2. The same was in the beginning with God.
C | 3. All things were made by Him (Egeneto dia).
D | 4, 5. In Him light and life (En).
E | 6-8. JOHN. Witness (Marturian).
F | 9. True light cometh into the world (Erchomenon).
G | 10, 11. Received not (Paraelabon).
G | 12, 13. Received (Elabon).
F | 14. The Word made flesh dwelt among us (Eskenosen).
E | 15. JOHN. Witness (Marturi).
D | 16. Out of His fullness (Ek).
C | 17. Grace and truth came by Jesus Christ (Egeneto dia).
B | 18. No man hath seen God at any time.
A | 18 | c | GOD. God only begotten (The Word was God).
b | BOSOM. The bosom of the Father (With God).
a | DECLARED. He hath declared Him (The Word).

The reader is asked to note the correspondences in this outline. We have already drawn attention to the balancing members at the beginning and end. Passing to verse 3, we see that it corresponds with verse 17, the two passages revealing Christ as Creator both in nature and in the realm of grace. The words egeneto dia, "came to be through", are used in each case. In the two members marked "E" we have a double reference to the witness of John the Baptist, while erchomen, "coming", in i. 9, is echoed by eskenosen, "dwell" or "tabernacle", in verse 14. The central passages revolve around the thought of reception.

Having sketched out the conditions under which John wrote his Gospel, and having given in outline the structure of the prologue and of the Gospel as a whole, we are now ready to undertake the joyful task of opening up some of the treasures of wisdom, and grace, and glory, that are to be found in what is perhaps the last book in the Holy Scriptures.

#6. "In the beginning was the Word" (i. 1).
pp. 212 - 219

Within the ambit of human experience, two conditions are inseparable from existence and action—the conditions of time and space. It is true that in a certain sense "thought" is free from the conditions of space, for thought cannot be regarded as occupying so many cubic inches, but, on the other hand, there can be no thought without a thinker, and speaking humanly, the living personality of the thinker must conform to all the conditions of space and time. So that we come back to the fundamental fact, that for all human experience, there must be a place where, and a time when. With John i. 1 before us, we are naturally thinking particularly of the limitations of time, and the reader will remember that the Preacher, who examined all things that are done "under the sun", found that there was a time and a season for every purpose (Eccles. iii.). The synoptic Gospels, and the narrative sections of John's Gospels are no exceptions to this rule. The earthly life of the Son of God was as much conditioned by time and space as that of the sons of men.

> "Now when Jesus was born in Bethlehem of Judæa, in the days of Herod the King" (Matt. ii. 1).

Here we have the two essential conditions: the place, "in Bethlehem", and the time, "in the days of Herod". We also read that Herod enquired "where" Christ should be born, and at "what time" the star appeared. We also discover that, from the beginning of His ministry, the Lord was conscious of a set time in which His work was to be accomplished, and a set hour in which that work should reach its crisis.

We turn now to the opening words of John's Gospel, and are immediately confronted with a state of being that is not conditioned in the same way as our own. We do not read about the beginning of any particular event or action, which could be used as a sort of date line. There is no possibility of printing a date in the margin here, for all is timeless. We are simply told that "in the beginning", however far back that may be, the Word already "was". Nothing is said about activity; it is just sheer existence. The passage is quite different from Gen. i. 1, where we read that "in the beginning God created". Here, in John i., it is just pure unconditioned existence that confronts us, and if we are honest we shall say, concerning this sphere of being, that we can know nothing apart from what we are told. To import into John i. 1 arguments drawn from our own experience would be simply irrelevant. Our difficulty in understanding the statement that the Word was "with God", and also that the Word "was God" is inevitable with our present human limitations. We cannot make the unconditioned being of God conform to the limitations of time and space.

"In the beginning was the Word" (En arche en ho logos).

Every student of the Greek N.T. can call to mind the opening sentences of the Gospel according to John. They represent, so far as mere words are concerned, perhaps the acme of simplicity. But what a difference there can be between "form" (the actual words used) and "content" (the truth that those words are designed to teach), for who among us can ever hope to plumb the depths or scale the heights of such a revelation? Nevertheless, just as one may be impressed with the serene majesty of the Jungfrau, without ever having set foot upon its frozen slopes, so we may contemplate the majesty of John i. 1 without pretending that such infinitude has been comprehended. We can believe what God has told us, even though the subject-matter transcends our experience.

En arche.—First of all, let us note the four occurrences of this phrase in the N.T.:

> "In the beginning was the Word" (John i. 1).
> "The same was in the beginning with God" (John i. 2).
> "And as I began to speak, the Holy Ghost fell on them, as on us at the beginning" (Acts xi. 15).
> "Now ye Philippians know also, that in the beginning of the gospel . . . . . no church communicated with me . . . . . but ye only" (Phil. iv. 15).

It will be seen that in each case something must be understood, if we are to grasp the writer's full meaning. For example, in Acts xi. 15 the reference is to the beginning of the Apostle's ministry, and looks back to Acts ii. 4. In Phil. iv. 15 the Apostle supplies the necessary explanation, which we purposely omitted in the quotation above, for immediately after the words "in the beginning of the gospel", he adds "when I departed from Macedonia". It would appear then, that after each occurrence of the phrase "in the beginning" we must add an explanatory term commencing with the word "when"—and we must now consider the question of what should be added to John i. 1.

Bloomfield says: "At en arche, understand ton panton ('of all things') from the subsequent context at verse 3, pantaegeneto ('all things were made by Him')." However, if we pay regard to Col. i., we shall remember that there, where Christ is described as the Creator of all things visible and invisible, He is said to be "before all things", both as to time and pre-eminence. The Companion Bible supplies the words "of the ages" and refers to Heb. i. 2 and xi. 3, where the ages are said to be prepared by Him.

There is an obvious parallel between Gen. i. 1 and John i. 1, but there is also an important distinction to be observed. In Gen. i. 1 it is an act done, whereas in John i. 1 it is a Being existing. Genesis speaks of the first moment of time, while John goes back to a period before the ages.

In John xvii., we have two references to this period "before the age times".

> "And now, O Father, glorify Thou Me with Thine own self, with the glory which I had with Thee before the world was" (John xvii. 5).

We can therefore read in John i. 1: "In the beginning (before the world was) was the Word."

The second passage in John xvii. reads: "Thou lovest Me before the foundation (overthrow, katabole) of the world" (John xvii. 24). This refers to a period before Gen. i. 2, and so is not parallel with John i. 1.

The relation between John i. 1-3 and Gen. i. 1 seems therefore to be as follows:

(1) Primarily, originally, before the ages, before the world was, was the Word (John i. 1).

(2) In the beginning, God created the heaven and the earth (Gen. i. 1).
Subsequent revelation teaches us that He Who is called Elohim or God in Gen. i. 1, is called Ho Logos, or God, in John i. 1 and all things without exception were made by Him.

It is a mistake to regard "Wisdom" in Prov. viii., and the Logos in John i. 1, as though they were identical. In John i. 1 the Logos is the Creator, whereas in Prov. viii., the Creator is said to have possessed wisdom, "in the beginning of His way". So long as we remember this important difference, Prov. viii. 22-36 will reveal a great deal as to the character of the Creator, the Logos, Who by His wisdom made all things.

When one speaks in one's mother-tongue, there are always present in the back of the mind, certain other meanings besides the one primarily intended. For example, when we use the words "right" and "righteousness", there is at the back of the mind the idea of a "right" line or "plumb" line, something absolute, incapable of deflection. In the same way, when we use the word "wrong", we have a dim consciousness of the idea of "wringing" or twisting" away from the "right". Similarly a Greek, or anyone thoroughly acquainted with the Greek language, could not use the word arche, in the sense of "beginning", without having at the back of his mind the various shades of meaning that elsewhere attach to it. It will therefore be of service to the reader if he becomes acquainted with the various meanings of arche in the N.T.:

(1) A beginning, in order of time, as in John i. 1.

(2) A first or original state. "The angels which kept not their first estate" (Jude 6).

(3) Authority, whether human or angelic.
Human. "Be subject to principalities" (Titus iii. 1).
Angelic. "Far above all principality" (Eph. i. 21).

(4) The "Chief", "Head" or "Beginning", as title of Christ.
"These things saith the Amen, the faithful, and true witness, the Beginning of the creation of God" (Rev. iii. 14).
"Behold I make all things new . . . . . I am Alpha and Omega, the Beginning and the End" (Rev. xxi. 6).

In combination with other words, we find the following:

(5) Archegos. Leader, Captain, Author (Heb. ii. 10; xii. 2).

(6) Archiereus. High Priest (Heb. ii. 17).

(7) Architekton. Architect (I Cor. iii. 10).

Christ's title as "the Beginning of the creation of God" is suggestive of great depths. There is a Rabbinical note to Gen. i. 1 in which the words "In the beginning" (B'reshith) are taken to refer to the Messiah, for rosh means "head" as well as "beginning" (compare the Greek equivalent arche, meaning "chief" as well as "beginning"). The Logos created all things "in the beginning", and He Himself is "the Beginning of the creation of God".

We return now to John i. 1, to notice how this beginning of all things is related to Him Who is the Word:

"In the beginning WAS the Word."

We draw particular attention here to the word "was", which is part of the verb eimi, "to be". In contrast to this we read in verse 3, that "all things were made by Him", the verb being egeneto, "to come into being". We must therefore repudiate the slightest suggestion that John i. 1 tells us that the Word came into being in the beginning. We are simply told that He "was" in the beginning. We have here the basis of the stupendous claim made by the Lord in John viii. 58: "Before Abraham was (genesthai, 'came into being') I AM (Ego eimi)." As "the Word" He is the "I AM", absolute and transcendent. As the Word made flesh, He can say, "I am the Bread of life", "I am the good Shepherd". In all such cases, the absolute "I AM" has become relative and immanent.

If we endeavour to think of God as He is, we are attempting the impossible. "No man hath seen God at any time." Both John and Paul reveal the fact that God in His essence is "invisible"; He is "spirit", and no man has seen His "shape" or heard His "voice". Yet this same God is revealed as essentially "love", and we know that He "created" heaven and earth, and finally man in His Own image. It is clear that He purposed to reveal Himself, and, being love, He must inevitably reveal this love in revealing Himself. He therefore takes the step which involves self-limitation. He, the invisible One, becomes visible; so that Paul can speak of the "Image of the Invisible God". He Whose voice no man has ever heard, becomes audible; and we further read that He Who cannot be approached (I Tim. vi. 16) has been "handled" by men and women like ourselves (I John i. 1, 2).

The name whereby John is inspired to set forth this glorious self-limitation and mediation of the Most High is that of the Logos, or "the Word". In writing to the Philippians Paul uses the word morphe, "form"; to the Colossians, he uses eikon, "image"; to the Hebrews, charakter, "express image"; while in I Tim. iii. 16, at the centre of an epistle which begins and ends with the thought of the invisibility of God (I Tim. i. 17 and vi. 16), he speaks of the Mystery of Godliness: "God was manifest in the flesh." In all these cases, we must be most careful not to use any of these revealed titles out of their context. Each has its own setting, and taken together they provide a wonderfully complete presentation of the truth. The examination of these various passages cannot, however, be undertaken until we have first examined with some care the opening section of John's prologue: John i. 1-5.

We have already given some indication of the growing conception of the Logos in the minds of thinking men from early days. Unaided human reason discovered the need for the Logos, but was entirely unable to supply the need. The Logos was a felt necessity, but beyond the wit or power of man to provide. The words of Prof. Burton on this point are suggestive:

> "St. John was as far as possible from being the first to apply the term Logos to Christ. I suppose him to have found it so universally applied, that he did not attempt to stay the current of popular language, but only kept it to its proper channel, and guarded it from extraneous corruption" (Inquiries p. 220).

Our English translation of Logos as "the Word" has come to us through the Latin. In early times, two words were used by the Latin translators: Sermo and Verbum, but as time went on Sermo was dropped and Verbum universally adopted. Tertullian (A.D.198-210), while giving us both Latin words as a translation of Logos, preferred himself the word Ratio.

> "Logos means the 'word', not, however, in a grammatical sense, for which either rhema, onoma, or epos is used, but always, like vox, of the living spoken word, the word, not in its outward form, but with reference to the thought connected with the form" (Passow).

The Logos of John i. 1 denotes Christ as He Who represents, or in Whom had been hidden from eternity, and especially from the beginning of the world, what God had to say to man (see Cremer). Just as Christ had to say to His disciples, "I have yet many things to say unto you, but ye cannot bear them now" (John xvi. 12), so God has had to speak to man in successive stages. In his original state of innocency, man walked and talked with God (Gen. iii. 8), but subsequent to his expulsion from Eden, he walked and talked with God to a less and less degree. To the nations at large, the only voice that was heard was the voice of creation (Rom. i. 19, 20; Acts xiv. 17; Psa. xix. 1-4). Fallen man, even though specially chosen, as were the people of Israel, could not bear to hear the immediate word of God, and so we read:

> "And they said unto Moses, Speak thou with us, and we will hear; but let not God speak with us, lest we die" (Exod. xx. 19).

And then at length we have the coming of Christ Himself, and we read:

> "God, Who at sundry times and in divers manners spake in time past unto the fathers by the prophets, hath in these last days spoken to us by His Son" (Heb. i. 1, 2).

But even though the time had come for "the Word" to appear among men, and do what neither the Law nor the Prophets could accomplish, even then He could not reveal all, until the time came for the advent of the Spirit of truth—Who, not "speaking from Himself", would "take of the things that are Mine, and show them unto you".

We find in the N.T. a very close parallel between the living Logos, and the written Logos. A lengthy list could be compiled, but the following will be sufficient to illustrate our meaning:

The Living Word.	The Written Word.
THE TRUTH (John xiv. 6).	THE TRUTH (John xvii. 17).
THE LIFE (John xi. 25).	THE LIFE (John vi. 63).
THE JUDGE (John v. 26, 27).	THE JUDGE (John xii. 48).
SANCTIFIER (John xvii. 19).	SANCTIFIER (John xvii. 17).

These few parallels taken from John's Gospel could be supplemented from practically every book in the N.T.

Two meanings that attach to the Greek word Logos which must not be missed, are indicated by the translations "account", and "reason":

> "I desire fruit that may abound to your account" (logos) (Phil. iv. 17).
> "Be ready always to give an answer (apologia) to every man that asketh you a reason (logos) of the hope that is within you, with meekness and fear" (I Pet. iii. 15).

Christ the Logos, speaks to man, that man may know the thoughts of God, Who in His essence is beyond human comprehension. In Christ the Logos, we have God's reason for all that He has planned and made, the logical account of the creation and the purpose of the ages. This we shall see more fully when we come to verse 18, and its echo in Col. ii. 2, 3.

Webster and Wilkinson's Greek Testament note at this point is worth recording:

> "The indecision, instability and presumption of German Rationalists, in their criticism on this term, are, whether intentionally or not, admirably satirized by Goethe, when he makes Faust translate it first 'the Word', then 'the thought', then 'the power', and lastly by the Spirit's help, 'the deed'."

Here for the moment we must stay. We have learned that before all things and before all time, there "was", in timeless existence, the Word, the Reason, the Archetype, the Mediator, the Revealer. The world is the destined sphere, and man the destined recipient of the priceless revelation of God, not only as Almighty and Invisible, but, through the Word become flesh, as the God Who is love, and the God Who is also Father.

> "In the beginning was the Word."
>
> "He hath declared Him."

Great Plainness of Speech.

#9. The Bride and the Body.
pp. 59, 60

Were we all logical and consistent, the recognition of three spheres of blessing would suffice to save us from confusing "The Body" with "The Bride". But there is abundant evidence that none of us is fully reasonable. One effect of the fall is a darkened understanding, and while, by grace, "the renewing of the mind" is going on day by day, we too often "see men as trees walking". In accord with the title and object of these articles, therefore we draw attention to the difference between "The Bride" and "The Body" that must be recognized if we would distinguish between things that differ.

In the book of the Revelation the Bride is identified with the New Jerusalem, and to any who realize the peculiar character of the Mystery, this, of itself, would be enough to show her to be distinct from the Body of Ephesians. The Bride is called the Bride of the Lamb and the Lamb's wife, yet the actual title "The Lamb" is never used in the Prison Epistles, although it is nevertheless most blessedly true that the church of the Mystery is saved by the same sacrifice and precious blood as is the Church of the Acts period.

Just as the "New" heavens and earth are linked with the present heaven and earth, and just as the "New" covenant is connected with the old covenant, so the "new" Jerusalem is nevertheless a new "Jerusalem", and, as such, has no connection with a calling which, at the start, reminds those who are blessed, that they were once aliens from the commonwealth (citizenship) of Israel. Further, each gate of the New Jerusalem is inscribed with the name of Israel, and its foundations contain twelve courses of stones (twelve being the number of the tribes), which bear the names of the twelve apostles of the Lamb. As I Cor. xv. 5-8 makes clear, Paul was not one of the twelve. Writing to the Corinthians, the Apostle said:

> "I have espoused you to one husband, that I may present you a chaste virgin to Christ" (II Cor. xi. 2).

Writing to the Ephesians, the Apostle takes the very word translated "husband" and reveals that as the status and goal of the Church which is The Body of Christ.

> "Unto a perfect man (husband), unto the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ" (Eph. iv. 13).

The idea that we are not to take too much notice of the "mere" letter of the word, and that the apostle could mix his metaphors as he pleased, will not do. A Berean knowledge of the perfection, and therefore accuracy, of the language of inspiration, would prevent the acceptance of such a slip-shod idea as that Paul could, in one Epistle, speak of the Body as the perfect "husband", and, in another, of the same company, as a "chaste virgin" "espoused to one husband". Further, the idea that the Ephesian position is merely the "perfecting" of the Corinthian, as some teach from I Cor. xiii. 9-13, is ruled out, for no "perfecting" could change a Bride into a Bridegroom. The idea is intolerable: a mixture that Scripture repudiates.

> We believe, therefore, that the titles "The Bride" and "The Body" belong to two distinct companies. "The Bride" is made up of faithful Israel, together with those believing Gentiles who, by the promise made to Abraham, and by their similar faith, are associated with that "city which hath foundations". But "The Body" pertains to the dispensation of the grace of God to the Gentiles. It is the subject of a mystery never revealed in O.T. Scripture, and is removed from all connection with Abraham and Israel. The spiritual evolutionist may talk of the development of the Corinthian position in Eph. ii., but the statement is:
>
> > "For to CREATE (not perfect or develop) in himself of the twain one new man" (Eph. ii. 15).
>
> which prevents us from seeing in this anything parallel with the olive tree of Rom. xi., even though it should be taught that Gentiles now, equally with Jews, are reckoned "true olives". It is a "new creation" that we see in Eph. ii., and as such it cannot merge the Bride and the Body together.

Articles dealing with the above subject will be found in earlier Volumes, as under:

The Bride and The Body	Vol. xi. 9.
The Feminine words used of the Church	Vol. xi. 9.

#10. The Body of I Cor. xii. and Spiritual Gifts.
pp. 117, 118

While the "church which is His Body" is the peculiar theme of the dispensation of the mystery, the figurative use of the "body" is found elsewhere, particularly in I Cor. xii. That passage is often confused with the subject of the One Body of Ephesians, and to avoid this, needs to be studied in its context. The subject of I Cor. xii. is defined for us in the opening verse where the Apostle says "Now concerning spiritual gifts brethren". After disposing of false gifts in verses 1-3, the Apostle, in conformity with the opening verse, devotes the whole of the chapter, to spiritual gifts, diverse, yet all from the one source, and uses this complexity, yet unity, of the various members of the human body in illustration of his subjects. We ask, then, with reason, What has this to do with the church of the present dispensation?

Closer examination of I Cor. xii. 4-30 but confirms the oneness of its theme. Let us see this for ourselves, and first, by the structure of the passage.

A | 4-11. GIFTS. DIVERSITY IN UNITY.
a1 | There are diversities of gifts.
b1 | But the same Spirit.
a2 | There are diversities of service.
b2 | But the same Lord.
a3 | There are diversities of inworkings.
b3 | But the same God.
B | 12-27. ILLUSTRATION.
The body, members and head.
Comely and uncomely parts.
A | 28-30. GIFTS. DIVERSITY IN UNITY.
a | God hath set some in the church.
b | First apostles.
Secondarily prophets.
Thirdly teachers.
Then miracles, gifts of healing, helps,
governments, diversities of tongues,

Surely, in view of this analysis, the use of the passage for any other purpose than the exposition of the origin and nature of miraculous gifts would be to "handle the word of God deceitfully".

The figurative use of the eye, ear and nose, as members of the head, is legitimate in the context of I Cor. xii., but out of place in Ephesians, where Christ is Head. Reference is also made in the chapter to members less honourable than others, which, again, is in keeping with its theme but contrary to Eph. iii. 6, where the heart of the mystery is expressed in the idea of a "joint body". There are, too, uncomely parts rightly introduced in I Cor. xii., but who will dare to associate such an idea with the church of the one Body of Ephesians?

> We therefore believe and teach that the status of the church of the Body of Christ is a distinctive feature of the dispensation of the mystery, received by the apostle Paul by revelation, and peculiar to the present time. The subject of I Cor. xii. is not the status of the church, but the problem of spiritual gifts, and the Apostle by an apt use of the figure of the human body illustrates "diversity in unity", which is the answer to the problem raised by the Corinthians in connection with the use, and comparative value, of these miraculous gifts.

Further notes and comments on the subject will be found in the article entitled "The Difference between I Cor. xii. and Eph. iv." (Volume XVIII, page 178), and in the book "The Apostle of the Reconciliation" (pages 154-160).

#11. The Prison Ministry of Paul.
pp. 156, 157

The difference that is observable between the church as constituted during the Acts period, and the church of the dispensation of the mystery, is reflected in the twofold ministry of the apostle Paul, who was the human instrument empowered for the founding of both. From the beginning Paul's authorship differed from that of Peter, for Paul was chosen on the road to Damascus to bear the name of the Lord to the Gentiles, and, writing later in the epistle to the Romans, and during the same period, he magnified his office as the apostle to the Gentiles, while in Gal. ii., he tells how he went up to Jerusalem to lay before the leaders of the circumcision "that gospel which he preached among the Gentiles".

Before the Apostle's liberty was cut short by imprisonment, he wrote six epistles to the churches, namely Galatians, I and II Thessalonians, I and II Corinthians & Romans and, about the time of his detention under Felix, he wrote the epistle to the Hebrews, bringing the number of this group of Epistles up to seven. But after he reached Rome and had spent that memorable day with the leaders of the Jews recorded in Acts xxviii., the Apostle, from his Roman prison, wrote Ephesians, Philippians, Colossians and Philemon. He was then released and wrote in that interval of freedom, I Timothy and Titus. He was then retaken and imprisoned, and, with death in view, wrote his last epistle, II Timothy. Acts xxviii., therefore, divides the written ministry of the Apostle into two groups, each consisting of seven epistles.

In Acts xx. 17-38, we learn that the first ministry of the Apostle was coming to a close, and that a new ministry, closely associated with bonds and afflictions, awaited him. From Acts xxvi. 16-18 we further learn that when the Lord commissioned the Apostle on the road to Damascus, he told him of a future ministry that lay before him, and that at some future date He would appear unto him once more to give him the subject and content of this new, and as it proved, prison, ministry. Thus while the great basis of justification by faith and redemption by the blood of Christ remained unaltered, an entirely new superstructure was erected on it, having many unique features, and entirely distinct from either the Abrahamic covenant or promise, or the new covenant made with the house of Israel and of Judah. Truth is revealed in the prison ministry of Paul that no human heart could have conceived, and no human ear had hitherto heard, and it is to maintain, against all odds and all misrepresentations, that unique ministry that we have laboured with voice and pen these thirty years, the glory of it making any "loss" sustained of no importance whatever.

While we must remember, and use in their proper place, the seven epistles left to us by the apostle of the mystery, the four great prison epistles that contain the complete revelation of our high calling are Ephesians, Philippians, Colossians and II Timothy.

We therefore believe and teach that these prison epistles are the standard given to us, using which we may read and profit by all scripture, without attempting to take to ourselves instruction and promise that belong to others. Again, we see in these prison epistles a complete statement concerning our standing, our state, our calling and our hope. We refuse to import into this unique revelation items of doctrine or practice that will not square with its superlative teaching, and therefore leave ordinances, miraculous gifts, Abrahamic and Davidic promises, the voice of the Archangel, the trump of God, the law of Moses, and the heavenly Jerusalem where we find them, that is on the other side of Acts xxviii., and in Paul's earlier ministry.

Notes and fuller details will be found as follows:

#12. The unique character of the Dispensation of the Mystery. pp. 199, 200

A number of fundamental differences that are observable between the calling of the church during the Acts, and the calling of the church during the dispensation of the mystery, make it utterly impossible that they can be the same company or even that the relation between them could be that of child to adult. However different a full-grown man may be from his infant stage, his origin remains the same, he cannot be said to have had one birth-place when a baby, and another when grown up: that is absurd. In the same way, the choice of the church of the mystery took place in a period denominated "before the foundation (overthrow) of the world" (Eph. i. 4), a period never associated with any other company. The church of the mystery therefore has a calling that forms part of the outworking of the divine plan that antedates all history, and about which very little is revealed in the Scriptures.

Not only is there this unique period of its choice, but there is the equally unique sphere of its blessing, "in heavenly places". Where these heavenly places are, and what are their characteristics, Eph. i. 20-23, ii. 6 and iii. 10 reveal. Again, no company of believers ever entertained the hope of being blessed there or seated there. Such is the second peculiar characteristic, that marks off the church of the mystery from all else.

Again, this church receives a title of such intimacy as to well-nigh overwhelm with the sense of the fullness of its meaning:--

"The church which is His body, THE FULNESS of Him that filleth all in all" (Eph. i. 22, 23).

Where in the whole range of Scripture is there anything to approximate to that title? Then, as already mentioned, this church is said to be "seated together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus" (Eph. ii. 6). The epistle to the Hebrews is the grandest exposition of what the seating of Christ at the right hand of God in heaven itself means, but Hebrews leaves the seated Priest alone in heaven's holiest of all, no revelation having then been made of the church and its high calling.

To the foregoing could be added the additional distinguishing features of the blessed removal of the middle wall, the blotting out of Jew and Gentile in the new man, the status of this company, "the perfect man" (husband) and its hope, "to be manifested with Him in glory" (Col. iii. 1-4).

> We therefore believe and teach that the calling and constitution of the church of the dispensation of the mystery is unique. That no other church or company has a calling or constitution like it, and that it is destructive of all true interpretation or understanding to attempt to bring over, or unite, the church of the Acts with the church of the mystery on the ground that both companies are built upon the rock Christ Jesus and His finished work. It no more proves that they are the same, or similar, than that Westminster Abbey is the same as the Houses of Parliament. The unique blessings of the dispensation of the mystery are our priceless inheritance. Chosen in Him before the foundation of the world, blessed and seated together in heavenly places, destined to be the very fullness of Christ, and the perfect man, let no one attempt to link together what God has manifestly kept asunder.

#6. The heavenly country and calling.
pp. 26 - 28

When the Apostle uttered the words which form the title of this series, it would of course have been possible for an extreme literalist to have attempted to show that, unless the Apostle had confined himself entirely to a literal quotation of the actual words of Moses and the Prophets without adding any words of his own, his statement was not true. We can hardly believe, however, that anyone would, in fact, have adopted such an extreme attitude. If such a view were legitimate, Paul's "one word" of Acts xxviii. 25 would be open to criticism, for the quotation which constitutes this "one word" is made up of 55 "words" in the Greek, and 70 "words" in the English. Many more such examples could be given, but we fear that the average reader would grow impatient, and feel that we were wasting time. We have an object, however, in view, and that is to show that, even though Paul's utterances were not simply quotations, and even though some of his teaching does not appear upon the surface of the O.T. Scriptures, the language of the Prayer Book is applicable here, when it speaks of the doctrine of Holy Scripture "and whatsoever may be proved thereby".

In the N.T. we learn that Abraham not only received the land of Canaan as an inheritance, but that he also looked for a "better country, that is, an heavenly". Although the New Jerusalem is never mentioned in the O.T. Scriptures, it is nevertheless true that this "city which hath foundations" constituted a real and blessed hope in O.T. times. When we read such verses as Heb. xi. 9, 10, 13-16, we may feel at first that here at least the Apostle is saying something more than "the Prophets and Moses did say should come". Let us observe, however, exactly what is written in this chapter (Heb. xi.).

We know, from the record of Genesis, that Abraham "believed" and had "faith". The nature of faith is not enlarged upon by Moses and the Prophets to the extent that it is so treated in the N.T., and the reason is fairly obvious. To teach that Abraham's faith was "the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen" is certainly an expansion of the O.T. account, but it is not an addition. How shall we intelligently interpret the fact that Abraham, Isaac and Jacob were willing to be tent-dwellers in the very land of promise, dying in full faith without possessing more than a burial ground in the land, unless we believe that they knew that the promise upon which they rested demanded the resurrection of the dead for its fulfillment and enjoyment? Paul himself tells us that "they that say such things, declare plainly" (Heb. ix. 14 A.V.), or "make it manifest" (R.V.). While we may have to admit that some of the deductions tabulated in Heb. xi. 9, 10, 13-16, were not so "manifest" to us, our own poorness of insight is surely not the standard whereby we must judge the Apostle. From the recorded attitude of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, it is "manifest" that they sought a country, and it is also clear that if they had had an earthly country in mind, they could have found an opportunity to have returned. As they did not, it is obvious that such pilgrims and strangers, with such promises apparently unfulfilled, yet with such triumphant faith, must have had a heavenly country and a heavenly city in view, for there is no other alternative.

We must now consider some of the statements made by the Apostle with reference to Melchisedec in Heb. vii. We first meet Melchisedec as "Priest of the Most High God" in Gen. xiv. 18. Nothing more is said of him in the O.T. until we reach Psalm cx., where we read:

> "The Lord said unto my Lord, Sit thou at My right hand, until I make thine enemies thy footstool . . . . . Thou art a Priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec" (Psa. cx. 1, 4).

When this Psalm was written, there was in existence the divinely appointed Aaronic priesthood. The greatness of Melchisedec's order of priesthood is proved from several statements made in the Book of Genesis.

(1) The fact that Melchisedec had "no father or mother" (i.e. no "pedigree"), and no specific end to his ministry, is in strong contrast with the law regulating the Aaronic order. In these things Melchisedec foreshadowed the Son of God, "Who abideth a priest continually" (Heb. vii. 3).

(2) Gen. xiv. 20 records the fact that Abraham gave tithes to Melchisedec. In Heb. vii. Paul states that "without contradiction the less is blessed of the better" (Heb. vii. 4-8).

(3) "If I may so say", continues Paul, "Levi, who was in the loins of Abraham, paid tithes to Melchisedec". This shows that the Levitical order was imperfect, and that a change in the priesthood was necessary (Heb. vii. 9-11).

(4) This change necessitated the transfer of the Melchisedec priesthood from earth to heaven:

> "For it is evident that our Lord sprang out of Judah" (Heb. vii. 12-14).
> "For if He were on earth, He should not be a priest" (Heb. viii. 4).

As we have already remarked, these features may not have been obvious to us, but to the Apostle they were "without contradiction". He could, therefore, speak of the heavenly calling and the heavenly priesthood without going beyond that which was revealed in the O.T., even though these things were not expressed in so many words by the O.T. writers. Those who would object to the Apostle's claim must, to be consistent, criticize also the statement of Matt. ii. 17, 18 that the massacre of the innocents "fulfilled" the prophecy of Jer. xxxi. 15, and the further statement of Matt. ii. 23, "He shall be called a Nazarene"—for this actual expression is not to be found in the Law and the Prophets. Who would have dreamed that the language of Deut. xxx. 12, 13 could possibly have referred to the gospel, or to the ascended Christ, and His death and burial? And yet the Apostle makes no apology for using the passage in this way. The same argument applies to the statement that some will be living at the Coming of the Lord and will not "prevent" those that sleep. Such a statement does not go beyond the testimony of Moses and the Prophets.

If Paul had uttered one word that associated any believing Jew or Gentile with the seated Christ at the right hand of God, in the holiest of all, he would most certainly have gone beyond the limits of the inspired testimony of Moses and the Prophets and have revealed truth that was exclusive to the dispensation of the Mystery. It is this that makes the Apostle's claim so important to all who would appreciate the distinctive nature of the Mystery. The heavenly calling, with its city the New Jerusalem, is not related to the Mystery, and rightly falls within the limits set by the Apostle.

The mention of the Mystery may perhaps cause some reader to remember that, long before the prison epistles were written, Paul spoke of several "mysteries". Can these mysteries possibly fall within the limits of "Moses and the Prophets", or will their investigation prove that the Apostle was, after all, wrong in claiming that he had said "none other things than those which the Prophets and Moses did say should come"? To a consideration of this question we hope to devote the closing articles of this series.

#7. The Mysteries.
The mysteries of Israel's blindness (Rom. xi. 25) and the mystery that was silenced (Rom. xvi. 25) considered in the light of our title.
pp. 64 - 69

We have already seen that the gospel, the inclusion of the Gentile, the hope entertained by the early church, and the possession of spiritual gifts, all fall within the testimony of the law and the prophets. There remains, however, one other subject which at first sight may seem to upset all our previous arguments—the subject of the "mysteries" of which Paul was a steward long before the "mystery" of the prison epistles was made manifest.

There are five mysteries specified in the epistles written before Acts xxviii. that must claim our attention:

(1) The MYSTERY of Israel's blindness (Rom. xi. 25).
(2) The MYSTERY that had been kept secret (Rom. xvi. 25).
(3) The MYSTERY of the wisdom of God (I Cor. ii. 7).
(4) The MYSTERY in relation to resurrection (I Cor. xv. 51).
(5) The MYSTERY of iniquity (II Thess. ii. 7).

Let us examine these five mysteries, and see whether we find them in agreement with the O.T. Scriptures, or whether we shall have to admit that they go beyond them.

The mystery of Israel's blindness (Rom. xi. 25).

> "For I would not, brethren, that ye should be ignorant of this mystery lest ye should be wise in your own conceits, that blindness in part is happened to Israel, until the fullness of the Gentiles be come in" (Rom. xi. 25).

In this same chapter we have another reference to the blindness that fell upon Israel, in verses 8-10:

> "According as it is written, God hath given them the spirit of slumber, eyes that they should not see, and ears that they should not hear; unto this day. And David saith . . . . . Let their eyes be darkened that they may not see" (Rom. xi. 8-10).

We have here three quotations taken from Isa. xxix., Deut. xxix., Isa. vi. 9 and Psa. lxix. 22. If we turn, first, to Isa. xxix. 10 we find no hint of the "secret" revealed in Rom. xi., but as we read on to verses 17 and 18 we become aware of the fact that a change is intended. Instead of judgment we have restoration; Lebanon shall be turned into a fruitful field, the deaf shall hear, and "the eyes of the blind shall see". The secret of Rom. xi. is here, for those who are able to discern it.

The passage in Deut. xxix. 4 does not refer primarily to the time of which Paul spoke, but to the condition obtaining when Israel came out of Egypt. The words: "unto this day" as uttered by Moses can have no other interpretation. There is a hint, however, of further and fuller revelation in the last verse of the chapter—a verse that has suffered somewhat at the hands of translators. We transcribe the note given in The Companion Bible:

> "The italics in the A.V. (put in Roman type in the R.V.) show that the Hebrew was not clear to the translators. They make good sense in English, but this is not the sense of the Hebrew text. The words rendered 'unto the Lord our God' have the extraordinary points (App. 31) to show that they form no part of the text, and should come out. The meaning then is:
>
> > The secret things, even the revealed things (belong) to us and to our children for ever, that we may do all the words of this law, i.e., the revealed things, and the secret things which have not been, but will yet be revealed."

Israel had "seen" the miracles which had been wrought in Egypt, but these "revealed" things had left them blind. Their children, however, were to "do all the words of this law", so that the fact that blindness was only for a time was evidently a part of the "secret". Moreover, it is the "nations" that comment upon Israel's excision (Deut. xxix. 24-28), and that are likely to become "wise in their own conceits".

Isa. vi. 9 and 10—the third passage mentioned above—is followed by the prophet's question "Lord, how long?" and the Lord's answer in verse 11. In verse 13, also we have the pledge of the remnant. Even Psalm lxix., which seems to speak of hopeless misery, ends on the same note: "God will save Zion."

We may conclude, therefore, that the secret of Israel's blindness is well within the testimony of Moses and the prophets.

The mystery that had been kept secret (Rom. xvi. 25).

We have now to enquire whether or not this secret is outside the scope of Moses and the prophets.

If we examine the structure of Romans, it becomes clear that the complete epistle demands the inclusion of Rom. xvi. 25-27; otherwise the opening salutation of Rom. i. 1-7 is without its corresponding member. In Rom. i. 1-7 we have the gospel, "which He had promised afore by His prophets in the Holy Scriptures", concerning Christ as the Seed of David and Son of God, "for obedience of faith among all nations". In the corresponding passage at the end of the epistle, Rom. xvi. 25-27, we have, not the "preaching" of the gospel or its "power unto salvation", but a reference to "Him that is of power to stablish you , according to my gospel, and the preaching of Jesus Christ, according to the revelation of the mystery, which was kept secret since the world began, but now is made manifest, and by the scriptures of the prophets, according to the commandment of the everlasting God, made known to all nations for the obedience of faith". In Rom. xvi. we have an advance on Rom. i., but not something entirely different. The secret "now" made manifest (that is, at the time of Paul's writing) is said to have been "silenced" in aionion times. Let us give this statement our careful attention. Where the A.V. reads "kept secret" we have substituted "silenced". What is the justification for this alteration and what does it imply? The Word used in the original is sigao, and occurs nine times in the N.T. One of these occurrences is in Luke ix. where the disciples had heard the voice speaking out of the cloud saying: "This is my beloved Son: hear Him." Immediately after this, we read:

> "And when the voice was past, Jesus was found alone. And they kept it close, and told no man in those days any of those things which they had seen" (Luke ix. 36).

Again, in Luke xx., after the Lord had answered the question put to Him regarding the lawfulness of giving tribute to Caesar, we read:

> "And they could not take hold of His words before the people; and they marveled at His answer, and held their peace" (Luke xx. 26).

The remaining occurrences are Acts xii. 17; xv. 12, 13; Rom. xvi. 25; I Cor. xiv. 28, 30 and 34. There is no suggestion in any of these passages of "keeping a secret", but rather the consistent idea of keeping something quiet.

Returning to Rom. xvi., we observe that this act of "silencing" is said to have taken place "in aionion times", whereas the mystery of Ephesians is related to a period "before the overthrow of the world" (Eph. i. 4), or "before aionion times" (II Tim. i. 9). The mystery of Rom. xvi. cannot, therefore, be the mystery of Eph. iii. or Col. i. Moreover, this mystery, which was silenced in age times, was made manifest by the apostle Paul and "by the scriptures of the prophets". It has been suggested that these "scriptures of the prophets" are not the O.T. prophecies, but the "prophetic writings" of the N.T., either the epistles of Paul himself, or the writings of those who had the gift of prophecy in the early church. So far as Rom. xvi. itself is concerned, there is no positive evidence either way, so that we must turn to other passages for help. In Rom. xvi. we have graphon prophetikon, "writings prophetic", and in II Pet. i. 19 prophetikon logon, "prophetic word". In the latter passage we are not left in doubt as to whether this "prophetic word" was uttered by O.T. or N.T. prophets, for the inspired comment reads:

"For the prophecy came not in old time by the will of man, but holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost" (II Pet. i. 21).

As this is the only other occurrence of prophetikon, we feel bound to accept the view that the word refers definitely to the O.T. writers.

If we examine the Epistle to the Romans carefully, we discover that it contains an inner and an outer section, which may be set out as follows:

Romans i. 1 - v. 11. OUTER PORTION.	Romans v. 12 - viii. INNER PORTION.	Romans ix. - xvi.* OUTER PORTION.

[* - For a fuller treatment of this important theme, the reader is referred to the articles on "The Epistle to the Romans".]

While the outer portion deals with Abraham, the inner is concerned with Adam—and it was this truth relating to Adam which, though incipient in the pages of Genesis, was "silenced" while the truth relating to Abraham occupied the bulk of the O.T.

Of the glorious doctrine of justification, the Apostle wrote:

"But now the righteousness of God without the law hath been manifested, being witnessed by the law and the prophets" (Rom. iii. 21).

Of the equally glorious doctrine of Rom. v. 12 - viii. the Apostle declares that it had been silenced in age-times, but was now made manifest and by prophetic scriptures made known to all nations for the obedience of faith.

Truth has its times and seasons. Man must first realize his own sinnership and personal transgression, before he learns of his association with a ruined race and a federal head. At the time when Romans was written, the moment had come when the full teaching concerning the "one offence" and the "one righteousness" must be brought out of obscurity and made manifest. No uninspired commentator could ever have brought out from Gen. iii. what Paul makes known in Rom. v., but, on the other hand, there is nothing revealed in Rom. v. which cannot be dimly perceived in the ancient record, when once the light of inspiration is turned upon it.

The reconciliation of the Gentile was never a secret. We have already considered the testimony of Moses and the prophets regarding the inclusion of the Gentile, and this inclusion of necessity involved their reconciliation. The reconciliation of one portion of the race (the circumcision) with the other (the uncircumcision) now gives place to the deeper reconciliation of the race as such, for in Rom. v., where the silenced secret has been made manifest and Gen. iii. made to speak, neither Jew nor Gentile is mentioned.

Here we must pause. The remaining "mysteries" must be reserved for another time; for if we attempted to deal with them here, we should either have to give them scant attention or else unduly lengthen the present article. We offer the above comments with full confidence that all who are willing to follow the lead of the inspired scriptures only, will find no difficulty in believing that, so far as these two mysteries in Romans are concerned, they do not go beyond the things "which the prophets and Moses did say should come".

#8. The remaining mysteries of Paul's early ministry, considered in the light of our title.

pp. 105 - 109

We have so far examined the mysteries of Romans and found no reason to call in question the accuracy of Paul's statement before Agrippa, and we must now go on to consider the two mysteries that are specifically mentioned in I Corinthians. We use the word "specifically" because there are also two general references in Chapters iv. & xiii.:

> "Let no man so account of us, as of the ministers of Christ, and stewards of the mysteries of God" (I Cor. iv. 1).
>
> "Though I understand all mysteries and all knowledge . . . . . and have not love, I am nothing" (I Cor. xiii. 2).

These "mysteries", however, are not defined and cannot therefore be called upon as evidence in the case we are examining. The two mysteries in I Cor. ii. and xv., on the other hand, are specific, and must therefore be examined. The first of these passages reads as follows:

> "We speak the wisdom of God in a mystery, even the hidden wisdom which God ordained before the world unto our glory" (I Cor. ii. 7).

Because we have a reference here to a time "before the ages", there has sometimes been a tendency to ignore the context and assume that the passage refers to the mystery of Ephesians and Colossians. If we go back to the previous chapter, we find that the Apostle speaks of the wisdom of God in connection with the cross of Christ (I Cor. i. 24), and also, by contrast, of the wisdom of this world (I Cor. i. 20, 21). In the second chapter, he reminds the Corinthians that when he came to them, he did not pander to human fancies and indulge in "excellency of speech or wisdom", but rather "determined to know nothing among them, save Jesus Christ, and Him crucified". The Apostle was most anxious that the faith of these believers should not stand in the wisdom of men, but, although he so ruthlessly sets aside human wisdom, he assures the Corinthians that he does speak wisdom "among them that are perfect". The identity of these "perfect" ones may be gathered from a comparison of I Cor. iii. and Heb. v. & vi.

I Corinthians iii.	Hebrews v. and vi.
Babes, carnal, fed with milk, not with meat. Building upon the one foundation, that which may be rewarded or may be consumed by fire.	Need of milk, not strong meat. A babe. Full grown (perfect) ones. Those who go on unto perfection. The earth either received blessing or is nigh unto cursing. Whose end is to be burned.

For our present purpose, it is enough to note that the "perfect" one is one who has grown in grace, who has got beyond the "first principles", and who can be taught further and fuller truth. In contrast, therefore, with the basic truth of "Jesus Christ and Him crucified" the Apostle continues: "Howbeit we speak wisdom among them that are perfect" (I Cor. ii. 6). His subject is still "wisdom", though not, as he had already said, "the wisdom of this age, nor of the princes of this age that come to naught". Nothing has so far been said about "the mystery"; the Apostle has confined himself to the one subject of "wisdom", the kind of wisdom of which he spoke, and the kind which he repudiated.

Instead of going to Corinth, and speaking to the unprepared multitude the whole truth of God at once, the Apostle fed them according to their capacity. To babes he gave the "milk" of the Word, to adults the "meat". In Gal. ii. he tells us that, when the great controversy was raging concerning the place of the uncircumcised Gentile in the Church, he "communicated unto them that gospel which I preach among the Gentiles, but privately to them which were of reputation, lest by any means I should run, or had run in vain" (Gal. ii. 2).

So the Apostle here tells the Corinthians that he had spoken the wisdom of God in a mystery. He does not say that he told them "the Mystery", for this would have been altogether foreign to his thought. The presence of the word "hidden", coming so near the word "mystery" has led the superficial reader to a false conclusion. It was not the mystery that was hidden, but the wisdom, and it was this of which Paul spoke to those who were perfect—and so "in a secret". He clinches his argument with a quotation from the Prophets, a proof that "the Mystery" of Ephesians was not in mind:

> "But as it is written, Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love Him. But He hath revealed them unto us by His Spirit: for the Spirit searcheth all things, yea, the deep things of God" (I Cor. ii. 9, 10).

The Apostle's intention here is made very clear by his own expansion of the argument. He proceeds, in verse 12, to place in contrast the "spirit of the world" and the "spirit which is of God"—an evident parallel with the contrasted "wisdom of the world" and "wisdom of God" in the earlier part of the chapter. In verse 12 we read that this "spirit which is of God" is given to us of God, which things we speak" (I Cor. ii. 12, 13). Here we are back again to the subject of verses 6 and 7, which deal with what the Apostle said, and how he said it. In verse 13, he repeats the statement that he did not speak "in the words that man's wisdom teacheth, but which the Holy Ghost teacheth, explaining spiritual things to spiritual persons". Then follows in verses 14 to 16 the contrast between the natural man and the spiritual man, and then in chapter iii. the subject of chapter i. is resumed. A careful examination of the context shows that "wisdom", either human or divine, is the subject, and that being so, there is no necessity to question the Apostle's statement that he did not go beyond that which "the Prophets and Moses did say should come".

We must now pass on to the second "mystery" of Corinthians, which is found in chapter xv., and has to do with resurrection:

> "Now this I say brethren, that flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God, neither doth corruption inherit incorruption. Behold, I show you a mystery. We shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye at the last trump: for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed. For this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality . . . . . then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, Death is swallowed up in victory" (I Cor. xv. 50-54).

We observe first of all that the "mystery" here is associated with the testimony of the prophet Isaiah, whose prophecy relates to Millennial times (Isa. xxv. 6-9). Both in I Thess. iv. and here in I Cor. xv., the Apostle distinguishes between those who shall be "alive and remaining" at the coming of the Lord, and those who have already "fallen asleep". When the change takes place, with regard both to the "living" and the "dead", the prophecy of Isa. xxv. 6-9 will have been fulfilled.

When we examine I Cor. xv. 51 more closely we observe that there is no word in the original that can really be translated "show". The original reads: Musterion humin lego, "a mystery to you I speak". Moreover, it is necessary to consider whether these words would not be more correctly rendered in the form of a question. To make this point clearer, let us turn for a moment to Luke xvi.

It may be that some readers are still perplexed to find our Lord apparently saying, in connection with the parable of the unjust steward: "But I say unto you, Make unto yourselves friends of the mammon of unrighteousness" (Luke xvi. 9).

Most of our readers, however, know that the words Kago humin lego should be translated in the form of a question: "And do I say unto you . . . . .?" the question being followed by the reasons why the Lord's people should not in any sense emulate the spirit of the unjust steward.

Returning to I Cor. xv. and examining the Apostle's words again, we discover that there is no "mystery" here at all. In verses 47-49 he contrasts the first Adam with the Second Adam, and the image of the earthy with the image of the heavenly, and verse 50 opens with the words: Touto de phemi: "But this I say." The Apostle then proceeds to declare that "flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God: neither doth corruption inherit incorruption". Immediately following this, in verse 51, we have: Musterion humin lego: "Do I speak a mystery when I tell you this?"—the implied answer being, of course, "No". To sum up, we may conclude that, when the Apostle taught the glorious doctrine of the resurrection, he did not go beyond the testimony of Moses and the Prophets.

There is now only one other "mystery" to be considered: "The mystery of iniquity" in II Thess. ii. 7. It hardly seems necessary to quote from the Book of Daniel to prove that the rise of the Man of Sin, the Son of perdition, is entirely within the scope of O.T. prophecy. The mystery of godliness, God manifest in the flesh, is enshrined in the O.T. title Emmanuel ("God with us"), and the mystery of iniquity is but the Satanic travesty of the truth. The Man of Son sets himself up "as God" and will one day have his "parousia" (coming) with its preliminary "lying wonders" (II Thess. ii. 9).

There is a possibility that the correct reading of Isa. xi. 4 should be as follows:

> "With righteousness shall He judge the poor and reprove with equity for the meek of the earth: and He shall smite the Oppressor (ariz instead or 'earth", erez) with the rod of His mouth, and with the breath of His lips shall he slay the wicked."

The manifestation and the destruction of this Man of Sin were fully known to the prophets. That which has an end must obviously have had a beginning, and that which finally dares to come out into the light of day may well begin secretly at first. In all this there is nothing that goes beyond the testimony of the Law and the Prophets.

We have now examined the various mysteries that are found in Paul's early ministry, and have discovered nothing in any one of them that goes beyond what "the Prophets and Moses did say should come".

#9. Is the "Church" within the testimony of the Law and the Prophets?

pp. 146 - 149

We have now considered Paul's teaching in connection with the gospel, the inclusion of the Gentile, the hope, the gifts of the Spirit, and the mysteries, and have found in all these instances the words used in his defence before Agrippa to be literally true. There is no need to lengthen this investigation unduly, and we believe that the most exacting of our readers will be satisfied with the list of subjects examined, if we conclude with some consideration of the church and its relation to O.T. prophecy. By the church here we mean, of course, the church of the early Acts and Paul's earlier epistles, and not the church of the One Body as revealed in Ephesians.

It is common knowledge that the word translated "church" is the Greek ekklesia, from ek, "out of", and kaleo, "to call". The term is used mainly in a New Testament setting, but Stephen does not hesitate to speak of the nation of Israel called out from Egypt in the fulfillment of God's purposes as the "church in the wilderness" (Acts vii. 38). Stephen was fully justified in the choice of this word, for both the Septuagint Greek and the O.T. Hebrew contain the Greek and Hebrew equivalents in abundance.

The N.T. writers did not invent the title of the "church" neither did they invest it with entirely new attributes and associations. The meaning of the word will, therefore, be clearer if we examine some of its O.T. occurrences.

The Septuagint Version of the O.T. in Greek contains no less than 70 unquestioned occurrences of ekklesia, and there may be several more. There are also six occurrences of the verb ekklesiazo, "to gather", or "assemble". The first occurrence of ekklesia is in Deut. iv. 10, where the verb ekklesiazo is also found. The word is usually translated in the English version of the LXX either "assembly" or "congregation". In addition to the Book of Deuteronomy, the word is also found in Joshua, Judges, I Samuel, I Kings, I and II Chronicles, Ezra, Nehemiah, Job, Psalms, Proverbs, Lamentations, Ezekiel, Joel and Micah. It will be seen, therefore, that the word was in common use from the days when Israel were assembled before Moses, up to the time of Ezra, Nehemiah, and the prophets.

The word that the Greek translators had before them was the Hebrew kahal, "to call, to gather, to assemble". It is not necessary to enumerate all the many occurrences, but we give a few that are outstanding.

> "The whole assembly of the congregation of Israel shall kill it in the evening" (Ex. xii. 6).

The exclusive nature of an ekklesia is illustrated in Neh. xiii. 1:

> "On that day they read in the book of Moses in the audience of the people; and therein was found written that the Ammonite and the Moabite should not come into the congregation of God for ever."

The Book of Genesis uses the word kahal in the following passage in chapter xxviii.:

> "And God Almighty bless thee, and make thee fruitful, and multiply thee, that thou mayest be a multitude of people" (Gen. xxviii. 3).

The translation of kahal by "multitude" here is unwarranted. The A.V. itself bears this out, for, apart from the parallel passage in Gen. xlviii. 4, the word "multitude" is never again used as a rendering of kahal. The A.V. translators themselves were evidently not quite satisfied, for in the margin they give as an alternative, the word "assembly". The second and third occurrences of kahal in Genesis are in Chapters xxxv. and xlviii.:

> "A nation and a company of nations shall be of thee" (Gen. xxxv. 11).
> "I will make of thee a multitude of people" (Gen. xlviii. 4).

These three passages in Genesis are three prophetic statements in connection with the blessing given to Jacob, who was also named Israel. However strange or improbable it may appear at first sight, these three passages constitute the foundation of every reference to the ekklesia, the "church", in the Old or New Testaments. When, therefore, we read in Matt. xv. 24 that the Lord said: "I am not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel", and in xvi. 18: "Upon this rock I will build My church", we do not feel under any necessity to modify the limitation of chapter xv. or to expand the exclusive company of chapter xvi. The "church" to which the Lord added daily, on and after the day of Pentecost, was an Israelitish assembly, as a reading of Acts ii. will show, and subsequent statements in the Acts will confirm (e.g., x. 28 and xi. 19). The inclusion of the saved Gentiles into the ekklesia was explained by James as being quite consistent with the testimony of the prophets (Acts xv. 14-18).

The LXX translators of Genesis do not use the word ekklesia to translate kahal, the "assembly" or "congregation", but the word synagogue. We must never forget that the "church" began in the synagogue. After he was "separated" by the Holy Ghost at Antioch, we read that the Apostle "preached the word in the synagogue of the Jews" (Acts xiii. 5). Further on in the same chapter we read that "they came to Antioch in Pisidia, and went into the synagogue on the sabbath day, and sat down" (Acts xiii. 14). Upon being invited to speak, the Apostle gave that wonderful address which contains the first positive statement in the N.T. concerning justification by faith (Acts xiii. 39). Moreover, when the Gentiles desired to hear more concerning this truth, it was to the synagogue that they had to go (Acts xiii. 42). Even though the Apostle turned from Israel in Acts xiii. 46, we find him in the very next city preaching in the synagogue (Acts xiv. 1). Not until we reach Acts xix. do we find the believers withdrawn from the synagogue and meeting on neutral ground (Acts xix. 8, 9).

In Paul's own summary of his life in Acts xxii. we read:

> "And I said, Lord, they know that I imprisoned and beat in every synagogue them that believed on Thee" (Acts xxii. 19).

James also, who tells his hearers to call the Elders of the church, speaks of the synagogue as the place of worship (James. Ii. 2; v. 14).

When, therefore, the Apostle confesses in Gal. i. 13 that "beyond measure I persecuted the church of God", we must remember that that church, as the Acts of the Apostles shows, largely was associated with the synagogue, both of the land and of the dispersion. To-day in the light of the Mystery, the word "church" has taken upon it a higher meaning. The church of Ephesians was most certainly not within the range of Moses and the Prophets; but, while Israel as a nation stood before God, there was the kahal, the called-out people, the church of God, and while the hope of Israel remained, as it did until the end of the Acts (Acts xxviii. 20), there could be but one "assembly", or "church", and to this the Gentile believer was added.

We trust that the reader has by now satisfied himself that Paul meant exactly what he said in his defence before Agrippa. Should further and fuller confirmation be sought, let each reader take up the Book and examine its testimony. We do not fear the result. Not only did Paul say that he had not said anything outside the testimony of Moses and the Prophets, but he also said at the close of this first ministry:

> "I have not shunned to declared unto you all the counsel of God" (Acts xx. 27).

This, of course, did not mean that Paul had exhausted the mind of God; but simply that everything that had then been made known he had honestly and unreservedly declared.

In conclusion, may we say that we are grateful to the correspondent who originally challenged us on this question? Truth has nothing to fear from examination: the more it is investigated in the right spirit, the clearer it will become.

Notes and Jottings from an Old Bible.

#17. Affirmation.
p. 19

The form of assent among the Jews was Chen dibroth, which becomes in the Greek Su eipas, "Thou hast said". There are instances in the Talmud of this usage, as for example:

> "A certain man was asked, Is Rabbi dead? He answered, Ye have said it, on which they rent their clothes, taking it for granted from this answer that it was so."

The phrase, "Thou hast said", occurs in Matt. xxvi. 64:

> "The High Priest answered and said unto Him, I adjure thee by the living God, that thou tell us whether thou be the Christ, the Son of God. Jesus saith unto him, Thou hast said" (Su eipas).

This passage is of importance because of its bearing upon Matt. xvi. 18. The A.V. and R.V. render the passage under notice, "Thou art Peter", the text reading Su ei petros, but since the days of Augustine and Jerome opinion has wavered as to whether the Lord did say, "Thou art Peter", or whether He replied as he did in Matt. xxvi., "Thou hast said".

It is a matter too technical for this short note, but after consulting the Retractions of Augustine and seeing the place that chapters xvi. and xxvi. occupy in the structure, the writer has come to the conclusion (the opinion is given for what it is worth) that in both cases the true reading is, "Thou hast said", and that instead of the church being built upon Peter, it is the great confession, that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of the living God, which is the rock foundation of our faith. As in Matt. vii. 21, "sayings"—not persons—are the basis of the building.

#18. The First Word in Leviticus.
p. 180

The first word in Leviticus is in the Hebrew Vayikra: "And he called", and it has one peculiarity that has attracted the attention of reader but has never been fully explained. The last letter of this word is the letter "A", which is the Hebrew letter Aleph, and in all Hebrew MSS this letter is written considerably smaller than the rest. No explanation is given, but the feature is as old as the text itself. Aleph is the equivalent of Alpha in the Greek, and Lightfoot's note is:

> "It seemeth, by such a writing, to hint and intimate, that though this were a glorious oracle, yet was it small in comparison of what was to come, when God would speak to His people by His Own Son, Whom the ark, mercy seat, and oracle, did represent."

#19. Ablutions demanded by the Law.
p. 180

Ceremonial washing, as symbols of purification, are reducible under four heads.

(1) The cleansing necessary to initiate into a high office. The consecration of Aaron and his sons into the priestly office is an example (Lev. viii. 1-6).

(2) The cleansing from contact with common life, in preparation for special ministry. The cleansing imposed upon the priest, on pain of death, before approaching the altar (Exod. xxx. 17-21; Psa. xxvi. 16).

(3) The cleansing from defilement contracted in special circumstances, and so to be restored to normal. There are eleven kinds of uncleanness of this nature recognized by the law (Lev. xii.-xv.).

(4) The cleansing or absolving of oneself publicly; the disavowal of complicity in some particular deed. There is an instance of this type of ablution in Deut. xxi. 1-9): "Our hands have not shed this blood." Pilate's action as recorded in Matt. xxvii. 24 also falls under this heading.

Allegory (Gal. iv. 24).

p. 206

It is sometimes urged by those who oppose the historic accuracy of the O.T. that even Paul admitted that the incident concerning Sarah and Hagar and the birth of Ishmael, was but an allegory. It is well to be accurate when dealing with the Word of God, and to remember that the Apostle did not say that the incidents themselves were "but allegories" but ha tina estin allegoroumena = "which is allegorizing", i.e., referring to his own use of the historic incidents.

Occasional Meditations.

#3. The redemption of Christ. Isaiah liii.

pp. 158, 159

"Then Philip opened his mouth, and began at the same scripture, and preached unto him—Jesus" (Acts viii. 35). May this be the Divine key-note of all our meditations, and particularly so in connection with this chapter of Isaiah. The word "arm" in verse 1 means "that which sows" or "the seed corn"—so that the passage could be translated, if the N.T. did not settle it for us, "the seed corn of the Lord". In John xii. 38 we read: "That the saying of Esaias might be fulfilled . . . . . And to whom hath the arm of the Lord revealed?" The connection between this quotation and John xii. 24 is worthy of notice. The same truth as is expressed in John xii. 24 is found in verse 10 of Isa. liii.: "He shall see His seed."

A literal rendering of verse 5 would read:

> "And He was being wounded because of our transgressions, He was being crushed because of our iniquities, the discipline connected with our peace—upon Him, and in His bruises there is a healing to us."

His perfect sinlessness is declared in verse 9. Yet a righteous God is pleased to bruise Him (verse 10). Why is this? The answer is that His soul was made "an offering for sin". Sin, not being in Him, was laid upon Him (verse 6). In other words, the One "Who knew no sin was made a sin-offering in the place of us, that we might be made the righteousness of God in Him".

Verses 11 and 12 give further light:

> "Out of the travail of His soul He shall see and shall be satisfied. In His knowing (and feeling—the same word as 'acquainted' in verse 3) He shall cause a righteousness, the Righteous One, My Servant, for the many; and their iniquities as a burden He shall bear."

In this verse we have: (1) The Lord as perfectly righteous, (2) His obedience as a Servant, so "making righteousness", (3) "the many"—those for whom that substitutionary suffering was endured, and (4) the "bearing" of their sins.

In verse 12 we read:

> "With a view to that which is fixed, I will evenly divide for Him among the many, and with strong ones He shall evenly divided the spoil; on account of which He poured out to death His soul, and with transgressors He was numbered, and the sin of many He bore as a sin-offering, and for transgressors He made a meeting" (or mercy seat).

In this verse we have set forth the joy of the Lord as well as His suffering (cf. Heb. xii. 1-3), for suffering and glory are always linked together. Because of His great atoning work, the kingdom is His, which is to be evenly divided among the many—in other words, every redeemed one must enter the kingdom by virtue of redemption. The division of the spoil is in the hands of Christ. He divides this among the strong—in other words, the overcomers, the faithful, the obedient. These not only have an entry into the kingdom, but an abundant entry (II Pet. i. 5-13); not only will they live with Christ, but they will also reign with Him in His kingdom.

The next sentences show a threefold aspect of the death of Christ: (1) He "poured out"—willingly; (2) He "was numbered"—representing what man thought, and still thinks, of Him; (3) He "bore"—the substitutionary work. The last words of the chapter: "He made a meeting", should be full of comfort to every saved sinner. By His sacrifice those who were dead in sins are fitted to meet the living God. Unholy rebels are made fit to enter the courts of Heaven. Sinners who were far off have found in Him a meeting place, a "mercy seat", where God still says: "There will I meet with you." Reader—if you are a believer, rejoice, and seek to live as one for whom such wonderful blessings have been prepared. If, on the other hand, you feel, by grace, your need of a Saviour, and of a perfect righteousness—look into this chapter and "behold the Lamb of God".

#9. Herod the Great.

pp. 1 - 5

When Herod received the governorship of Galilee from his father, He exhibited great skill and daring in putting down the brigands that infested the land, and succeeded in capturing and executing their leader Hezekiah, together with most of his followers. Now at this time Herod was a lieutenant to the High Priest, and the Sanhedrin, realizing that, if they let this usurpation by Herod of the Council's right in the matter of capital punishment go unquestioned, all semblance of their authority would vanish, summoned him to appear before them. Acting on the advice of Antipater he appeared, not as a humble suppliant, but surrounded with a life guard, haughty, self-confident, and with a purple robe partly concealing his bright armour. He made no apology, but produced an order from Sextius Cæsar to the Sanhedrin, telling them to acquit him. The Sanhedrin were overawed, and no word of condemnation was uttered, until the Nasi rebuked the assembly, prophesying that Herod in the day of his power would not pardon their action in calling him in question. Herod gathered together an army for his intended vengeance, but was dissuaded from further action by his father and his brother Phasael. Ten years later, however, he massacred the Sanhedrists, sparing only Shammai and Avtalion. Mark Anthony was now a power in the East (B.C.42) and Herod, by bribes, by his own fascinating personality, and by his reminders of his father's services to Cæsar, established himself in Anthony's friendship, throughout the remainder of his (Anthony's) life.

About this time Herod was made Tetrarch by Mark Anthony. During the same period, Antigonus, the younger son of Aristobolus II, was endeavouring to get his father's kingdom back again, and, aided by the Parthians, he entered and occupied Jerusalem. By a base plot, Phasael, Herod's brother, and the High Priest Hyrcanus were decoyed to Galilee, where they were thrown into prison. As the aged High Priest knelt at his feet for mercy, so the story runs, Antigonus himself actually "bit off the old man's ears" (Hautos ta hota labatai tois hodousin, Josephus B. J. i. 13, 9)—in order to incapacitate him for ever from acting as High Priest again. Phasael, realizing that the end had come, dashed his head against the prison wall, and so violent death claimed the next member of the Herod family.

Herod himself escaped from Jerusalem with his mother, his sister Salome, and the Asmonæan Princess Mariamne, his affianced bride. Arriving at Masada, a fortress on the Dead Sea, he at one time determined to follow his brother's example and commit suicide. After many perils, however, he succeeded in reaching Rome, where he was welcomed by both Octavian and Anthony. By what secret intrigues and bribes he succeeded will never be known, but he managed to gain such an ascendancy over the minds of both Octavian and Anthony that they nominated him KING OF THE JEWS (A.D. 37). And all this was accomplished in a single week.

> "Before the seven days were over, unintoxicated by his astounding success, unseduced by the splendours, luxuries and dissipations of Rome, he had rejoined his ships at Brindusium. He had come to Rome a bunted ruined exile; he left it with purple and diadem."*

Upon returning to Palestine, war with Antigonus was renewed, and Herod's brother Joseph was the next to die—this time in battle—his head being sent by Antigonus to Herod. In revenge, Herod defeated Antigonus' general and sent his head to his (Herod's) brother, Pheroras. So passed another of this bloodstained family.

While Jerusalem was besieged, Herod went to Samaria and was married to Mariamne, the descendant of the Asmonæan Princess. By this marriage Herod entertained high hopes of winning the approval of the Jews, but in this he was bitterly disappointed. Antigonus was taken captive at last, and was brought before the Roman general. He was then sent in chains to Anthony, and, upon being assured by Herod that troubles would continue if he were spared, Anthony had him first scourged and then beheaded.

Herod now put into operation his long-delayed vengeance upon the Sanhedrin, and a new period of blood and lust and terror began that it is difficult to parallel even in those terrible times. It was necessary that a High Priest should be appointed, and Herod chose an obscure Jew from Babylon named Hananell—who is sometimes identified with the Annas of the Gospels. Annas' five sons, together with his son-in-law Caiaphas, each became in turn High Priest at Jerusalem. On hearing that certain Rabbis were discussing Deut. xvii. 15, which forbids a stranger being King, Herod had the whole number put to death except Baba ben Buta, whom he spared because he wanted his counsel, but whose eyes he had put out. There is a tradition that Baba counseled Herod to build the Temple in expiation of his crimes.

There are now entered into the life of Herod, a woman whose name is mainly associated with Mark Anthony—Cleopatra, Queen of Egypt. Alexandra, the descendant of the Asmonæan line, and the mother of Herod's wife, Mariamne, regarded her son-in-law Herod as an Idumæan upstart, and began to urge her bosom friend Cleopatra to use her influence to bring about his downfall together with the replacement of Hananell by her own son Aristobolus.

[* - We are in great debt to Farrar's book "The Herods" and all quotations in this series that are not followed by the author's name, are taken from this work.]

At this time Mark Anthony sent for Aristobolus, and Herod, fearing the result of the presence of this handsome youth at court, deposed Hananell and made Aristobolus High Priest. He then became jealous of the popularity of Aristobolus, and had him drowned while entertaining him at his balsam gardens at Jericho. Cleopatra now induced Anthony to summon Herod to appear before him at Laodicea. Herod left instructions that, in the event of his death at the hands of Anthony, Mariamne should not be permitted to survive him. This instruction leaked out, and on his return from Laodicea, Mariamne charged him with it. In a paroxysm of fury Herod ran at her with his sword, ordered his slave to be executed, and Alexandra his mother-in-law to be flung into prison.

Anthony, in his mad infatuation, had given to Cleopatra the revenues of Greece, Cyprus, Phoenicia, Crete, Syria, Iturea and parts of Cilicia. Lysanius, the tetrarch of Abylene, was put to death, and the lease of his territory was given to Cleopatra. But still this "all-rapacious harlot" was unsatisfied. She wanted also the crown of Judæa, and had already secured the balsam gardens close to Herod's capital, Jericho. She now visited Herod in prison, being confident that the glamour and fascination that had captivated Mark Anthony, would prove too strong for Herod. However, he resisted all her blandishments—which only made her the more relentless and furious. Fearing, therefore, that he would lose his Kingdom, he selected the fortress of Masada on the Dead Sea, stored it with provisions, and made it capable of receiving 10,000 men. Very soon, however, Octavian had beaten Mark Anthony, and Herod transferred his friendship to the victorious side. "The ever restless Alexandra, still nursing her plans of ambition and revenge, persuaded the poor, aged, deposed High Priest Hyrcanus to further her efforts". The plot was discovered and Hyrcanus, sole survivor of the Princely Asmonæans, laid his head on the block at the age of eighty.

> "The axe fell on the wrong neck. It would have been better for Herod, it would have saved him an iliad of future woes, if he had ordered the execution of the vile Alexandra instead of that of her blameless father, whom she had inveigled into her plans."

Herod so impressed Octavian with his vigour and magnificent endowments that he bade him resume his crown, and returned to him the balsam gardens that had been given to Cleopatra, as well as many cities, including the fortress known as Strato's Tower, which he turned into the splendid capital city of Cæsarea.

Further machinations by Alexandra led to the execution of her daughter Mariamne, Herod's wife. No sooner, however, was Mariamne dead than remorse and regret preyed upon the king until he fell a victim to the pestilence that was raging at the time. On hearing of a further plot of Alexandra's, however, he seemed to shake off his sickness, and ordered her execution. His day of peace, however, had passed. Another baneful woman was at work to accomplish further misery for Herod the Great.

Salome was already a grandmother, and growing tired of her second husband. She revealed to Herod the fact that Baba had concealed two youths of Maccabæan origin, with the result that further executions followed. "And so, through rivers of blood, Herod waded to his doom."

We have still to deal with further facts of importance in connection with Herod—in relation to the birth of the Saviour, the building of the Temple, and other features—but as we do not wish to encroach on the space reserved for definite exposition, we will reserve these for our next article.

#10. Herod the Great (Concluded).
pp. 73 - 76

The career of Herod the Great presents a strange alternation of splendid qualities, dazzling charm, outrageous sensuality, and appalling blood-lust. In the year B.C.25, a terrible famine swept away thousands of people, and the killing of the flocks left them without the means of making clothing. In these circumstances Herod displayed the most unsparing magnanimity. He sold the silver plate from his own table, he bought immense bales of wool and quantities of bread, and distributed seed-corn to prevent the failure of the subsequent harvest. Yet, at the same time, he loathed the Jews over whom he ruled, and while in some respects acting in a way calculated to win their allegiance, wounded their feelings very acutely by building heathen temples in Cæsarea and becoming a patron of the heathen games.

> "If he had confined such exhibitions of his heathen proclivities to the many pagan or semi-pagan cities of his kingdom, the Jews might have tolerated and partially condoned his conduct. But their horror can better be imagined than described when, in defiance of their most cherished convictions, he built a theatre and an amphitheatre at Jerusalem itself (B.C.25)."

The criticism raised by the Pharisees over this question led to the torture and death of many families. And so the rule of blood continued.

In B.C.27 Herod married again. His new wife was also named Mariamne and was the daughter of a priest, named Simon. To give his new Queen more dignity, Herod deposed the existing High Priest, and replaced him by his father-in-law. However, instead of improving conditions by these actions, he only made them worse, for Simon incurred the hatred of the people by his greed and cruelty.

About this time Herod sent his two sons to Rome, where they were entrusted to the family of Pollio—to whom Virgil addressed the poem in which he anticipated that Pollio's infant son might be the promised Messiah and bring in the golden age. They returned to Jerusalem in B.C.19 aged eighteen and nineteen. On their return, however, they spoke too freely about their mother's execution, and were "imprudent enough to treat Pheroros and Cypros and Salome, the brother, and mother, and sister of Herod, as plebeians almost beneath their disdain". Herod attempted to improve things by arranging for his two sons to marry. But this only made matters worse, for the wife of the elder son treated Salome with contempt, and said that when her husband became king, he would reduce the whole Idumaean family to the obscurity out of which they had emerged by their allegiance with the Asmonaean princes.

Salome now played upon Herod's fears in connection with his past crimes, and poisoned his mind against his sons, whom she represented as being rivals for the throne. In order to remind his two sons that they had an elder brother, Herod took back his divorced wife Doris, and summoned his son, Antipater, back to the court.

> "Antipater soon showed himself to be even worse than Salome—'a mystery of iniquity'—a demon incarnate of villainy and guile. None but an oriental of the worst nature, exacerbated by past wrongs, and with his heart swollen to bursting with venomous hate and inordinate ambition, could possibly have played with such infernal skill the part which Antipater now assumed."

In B.C.13 Antipater was sent to Rome to receive the same advantages as his brothers had enjoyed. "By his letters and subtle insinuations, he brought the weary king to such a state of frenzy as at last induced him to sail to Rome with his two sons, with the intention of procuring their punishment at the hands of Augustus." Nothing but the good sense of Augustus saved them, and disentangled the web of lies that had been woven around them. Back again at Jerusalem, however, the villainy of Antipater soon accomplished their ruin. Slaves were tortured and made to "confess", what was required of them, and as a result the elder son Alexander was thrown into prison. From prison Alexander wrote a letter involving Salome and the whole court.

About this time, in enforcing his demands against the Arabians, Herod overstepped the mark and incurred a reprimand from Augustus. At the same time he again petitioned Augustus for leave to put his two sons to death—a letter that cost Herod a kingdom. The two sons were soon after strangled, in the place where Herod had married their mother. An old soldier named Teron, and three hundred others, were executed for raising a protest. When Augustus heard of it, he said that he would greatly prefer to be Herod's pig (hus) rather than Herod's son (huios). This saying Macrobius associates with the massacre of the infants at Bethlehem.

The wheels that work within wheels now bring together the sect of the Pharisees, the growing expectation of a Messiah even in the heathen world, and the family affairs of Herod. Pheroros, Herod's brother, was a Pharisee, and the Pharisees had wished to make him king. About this time Pheroros fell ill and was visited by Herod. Touched by this visit, he ordered his wife to fling into the fire the poison that Antipater had supplied for Herod's murder. Doris was accused, and the slaves of Pheroros tortured. Pheroros' wife confessed, and flung herself from the roof of the palace. The fall, however, did not prove fatal, and she confessed to Herod about the poison. When it was discovered that Mariamne had been in the plot, she was divorced, her father the High Priest deposed, and Matthias made High Priest in his place. Doris sent a secret letter warning Antipater, but the slaves conveying it were caught.

> "With the shadow of a haunted midnight creeping over his icy heart, he sullenly rode on to Jerusalem. When he arrived he boldly advanced to salute his father, who met him with the stern words:
>
> > 'Even this marks a parricide, to wish to get me into his arms, while under such heinous accusations! God confound thee, vile wretch! Touch me not, till thou hast cleared thyself'."

A forged letter incriminating Salome was found in the possession of Antipater's slaves, and Herod was now haunted by the thought that the letters that had led to the death of his two sons might have been forged also. What a nightmare of blood and intrigue!

Herod now sank into a veritable Gehenna of misery:

> "The distemper seized his whole body, and greatly disordered all its parts with various symptoms" (Josephus).

He was carried back from Jericho to Jerusalem, and there "in his madness, he ordered Salome to summon all the chiefs of the Jews, to have them shut up in the Hippodrome, and then to send his soldiers and massacre them all, that his funeral might be accomplished with the genuine lamentations of the whole people who hated him". His son Antipater, believing that Herod was dead, bribed the jailor, with immense promises, to set him free. On hearing of this, Herod roared with a terrible voice, "Then kill him at once, and bury him ignobly in the Hyrcanium". Five days later Herod himself died. We are glad to record that, on the order of Salome, the Jewish nobles were set free from the Hippodrome.

Such was the state of affairs when there was born at Bethlehem the infant Christ.

> "In the very year stained by the tragic abominations which we have narrated, the angels sang above His cradle their divine song of 'Glory to God in the highest; on earth peace, goodwill toward men'."

#11. The Remaining Members of Herod's House.
pp. 112 - 116

Unless the reader is already acquainted with the history of these times, it will probably come as a surprise to him to discover how much the affairs of the Roman Empire, often linked with some of the greatest names of the period, became interwoven with the fortunes of the Herods and those of the Jewish nation. By ways that were often devious and dark, these men prepared the background upon which the supreme miracle of the ages was to be enacted. While our chief concern will always be this miracle of love, an acquaintance with the historic background cannot but help to enhance its teaching and reveal its character. We have so far devoted two short articles to the tragedy of Herod the Great. We are only too conscious of the scrappy reading that such a compressed account must make, but we must now pass on to some consideration of the successors to that blood-stained throne.

At various times Herod had made and cancelled a number of wills. At one time he had bequeathed his entire kingdom to Philip, the son of Mariamne, daughter of Simon the Priest, but finally he appointed Archelaus to be King of Judaea with Samaria and Iturea, Antipas to be Tetrarch of Galilee and Peraea, and Philip to be Tetrarch of Trachonitus. Of the administration of Archelaus Josephus writes that Judaea was left a prey to ten thousand disorders, and we can well understand the words of Matt. ii. 22:

> "But when he heard that Archelaus did reign in Judaea in the room of his father Herod, he was afraid to go thither."

On account of his cruelty and his marriage with his brother's widow, Archelaus was deposed and banished to Vienne in Gaul. There is a tradition that his journey to Rome to receive the kingdom was the basis of the Lord's parable of the nobleman in Luke xix. If so, it shows how deep an impression the hatred of this man had made upon the minds of the people, for the Jews sent a message after him to Rome saying, in effect, "We will not have this man to reign over us".

With the passing of Archelaus, kingship departed from Judaea, and a Roman Procurator, such as Pilate or Felix, took the place of the King of the Jews. As Archelaus does not appear in the Scriptural record, except in Matt. ii., we must pass on to other characters.

Students of Scripture often confuse Philip I, the son of Herod the Great and the second Mariamne, and Philip the Tetrarch, the son of Cleopatra of Jerusalem (not to be confused with Cleopatra, Queen of Egypt). Philip I lived and died without occupying an official position, and only comes into the pages of Scripture at all on account of the abduction of his ambitious wife Herodias by his half-brother, Herod Antipas (Matt. xiv. 3).

Philip the Tetrarch provides a refreshing contrast to the general character of Herod's family, keeping aloof from the family intrigues, and discharging his duties faithfully. For 37 years he devoted himself to the well-being of his dominion and people, and died without issue in A.D.34 at Bethsaiada Julius—a city which he named after the profligate daughter of Augustus. He also rebuilt Paneas, calling it Cæsarea Philippi.

Herod Antipas, the Tetrarch, occupies a more conspicuous place in the N.T. It was this man to whom the Lord referred as "that fox" in Luke xiii. 32, and whom John the Baptist rebuked. He it was also who granted Salome's request for John's head in a charger, and to whom the Saviour was sent by Pilate at the time of His trial. His great friend was the Emperor Tiberius, in whose honour he built the city called Tiberias, on the shores of the Lake of Galilee. The building of this city brought Herod into conflict with the Jews, for in digging the foundations the workmen came across an old cemetery. The Rabbis therefore pronounced the site unclean, so that no Jew could enter or leave it without seven days purification.

Another fact that should be mentioned in connection with Herod is that he began an adulterous intrigue with Herodias, his brother's wife, promising to divorce his Arabian wife, and marry Herodias. This naturally caused ill-feeling between Herod and the country of his wife's people at Petra.

We shall have to say more about Herod in connection with the Lord's trial, when we come to deal with Roman law, but for the moment, after a few brief notes concerning his end, we must pass on to other members of the same family.

At the death of Tiberius, Caligula, who was a great friend of Herod's half-brother, Agrippa, made him (Agrippa) king. Herodias was fiercely indignant to think that one who had depended upon their charity for his very bread, should have surpassed them in honour and dignity, and she therefore urged her husband to go to Rome and beg for kingship himself. He was followed, however, by a freedman of Agrippa, who charged him with planning rebellion, and made great capital out of the fact that Herod had accumulated enough arms to equip 70,000 men. As a result of these representations Caligula bestowed the wealth and tetrarchy upon Agrippa and banished Herod to Lyons (A.D.39). With all her crime and passion, Herodias demands of us at this point the acknowledgment of one act that was magnanimous. Hearing that Herodias was Agrippa's sister, Caligula restored to her own possessions and exempted her from exile. She replied, however: "It is not just that I, who have been partner in his prosperity, should forsake him in his misfortunes" and so she went into exile with the man whom she had virtually ruined.

The life story of Herod Agrippa is a romantic one, passing rapidly "from squalor to splendour". At one time he is loaded with wealth; at another, his poverty prompts him to suicide. Some idea of the marriage tangle that seems to be characteristic of Herod's family, can be gathered from Farrar's attempt to define his relationships. "Agrippa, son of two first cousins, married another cousin, the daughter of his own aunt, who had married her uncle." During the reign of Tiberius Herod was under suspicion, and was kept in prison for six months. On the death of Tiberius, Caligula released him, and bestowed upon him the tetrarchies belonging to Philip and Lysanius. He was also given the title of King, and a gold chain of weight equal to that of the iron one with which he had been fettered by Tiberius.

Caligula, the maniac (Volume XXVIII, page 50) infuriated the Jews by ordering that his statue should be put in the Holy of Holies at Jerusalem. To his lasting credit, however, Agrippa succeeded, not without some risk, in dissuading the mad Emperor from this act. Later, when Rome was thrown into confusion by the death of Caligula, Agrippa was summoned to the Senate, whose sympathies were in favour of restoring the Republic. "With oriental subtleness he professed to fall in with their plans, but told them that they would require an army . . . . . he advised them to send for Claudius, requesting him to refuse the diadem." Herod, however, privately informed Claudius of the timidity of the Senate, advising him to claim the throne, but to promise a mild and equitable government. To Herod Agrippa, more than to any other man, Claudius owed his succession to the throne of the Caesars. The edicts in favour of the Jews resulting from the friendship between Claudius and Agrippa we have already referred to in Volume XXVIII, pages 50-54.

Agrippa's policy now was to "please the Jews". To this end he acted as a zealous Jew, and was responsible for the execution of the apostle James, and the imprisonment of Peter. Josephus says that he lived at Jerusalem, kept himself entirely pure, and offered every day his appointed sacrifice; while the Mishna records that he paid his first-fruits, like any other Israelite, taking his basket on his shoulder. The way in which Herod died is recorded in Acts xii. His age was 54, and he left three daughters, Mariamne, Bernice and Drusilla, and one son, afterwards Agrippa II.

After Herod's death Claudius was inclined to give the Kingdom of Judæa to Herod's son, Agrippa II, but he was persuaded to defer this, in view of the fact that he was only seventeen years of age. Fadus was actually in charge at the time of the famine mentioned in Acts xi. 28. In A.D.50 Agrippa II was promoted by Claudius to the kingdom and also made Keeper of the Temple. Two years later he was given the title of King (Acts xxvi. 2).

Agrippa was inseparable from his sister Bernice, and there were rumours among the Jews that their attachment was by no means innocent. It was before this king and his sister that Paul made his memorable defence.

About this time Agrippa offended the Jews very much by building a lofty chamber which overlooked the courts of the Temple. In reply to this, the Jews erected a wall between the Palace and the Temple, which not only obstructed Agrippa's view, but interfered with the supervision of the Roman guard. Agrippa and Festus ordered the wall to be demolished, but the Jews appealed to Nero. The High Priest, accompanied by ten deputies, went to Rome, and, by the favour of Poppæa (Volume XXVIII, pages 85-87), they granted their suit, but were detained in Rome as hostages.

Agrippa did his utmost to make the Jews see the folly of opposing the trained armies of Rome, but all in vain. The populace became maddened at the mentioned of the hated Procurator Florius (just as the Jews had become inflamed at the mention of the word "Gentiles" by Paul in Acts xxii. 21, 22), and broke out into curses. From cursing Florius, they passed to cursing Agrippa, throwing stones, and ordering him to leave the city. So began the Jewish war, which was to end with the destruction of the Temple, and the scattering of Israel. Throughout the whole war Agrippa remained with the Romans. In A.D.75 he went to live at Rome, with his sister Bernice, whom Tiberius would have made Empress, if he had not been deterred by the open murmurs of the Romans.

When Josephus published his "Wars of the Jews' he sent a copy to Agrippa, and the King congratulated him on the accuracy of his narrative. The work of Josephus is a mine rich in incidents during these eventful years, and he has proved to be a very faithful historian. Practically all that we have written so far in this series has been derived from Josephus, although we have taken much at second-hand from books by Farrar, S. Buss, Conybeare and Howson, Lewin and others.

With Agrippa II, the man who was "almost persuaded to become a Christian", the Asmonæans and the Herods disappear from the pages of history. The last of the line, Agrippa's nephew, perished as we have already seen in the eruption of Vesuvius.

#12. Herod's Temple.

pp. 153 - 156

We have already spoken of the appalling bloodshed associated with the reign of Herod the Great, and we must now, by contrast, refer briefly to some of his public acts of a more constructive kind.

Herod was so well regarded in Rome, that he was permitted to extend his frontiers "to the widest limits ever dreamed of by Solomon". As King of Judæa, he had an acknowledged precedence over all but the very greatest of the Oriental kings. He protected his subjects from the inroads of Bedouin marauders, and put down with a strong hand the bandits that infested the region of Galilee and Trachonitis. He surrounded the whole of Palestine with castles and fortified towers. He shook "an inexhaustible cornucopia, filled with gifts, over the heathen world, building gymnasia in Tripolis, Damascus, Ptolemais and Nicopolis; theatres in Damascus and Sidon; an aqueduct in Laodicea; baths in Ascalon; temples in Tyre and Rhodes; colonnades in Tyre and Antioch. The towns of Byblos and Berytus owed to him their city walls. Athens, Sparta, Nicopolis, Pergamum, and Cos received ostentatious donations or prizes for their games; and had it not been for his permanent and regal endowment, the ancient and famous Olympic contests would probably have come to an end" (Hausruth). When he came into power, he found the harbour and Stratos Tower silted up; after twelve years of labour, he left a splendid breakwater and harbour. The city was renamed Cæsarea, and was equipped with a most carefully planned sanitation scheme that was centuries ahead of Eastern systems. At Jerusalem, he built a palace, in the prætorium of which the Saviour was questioned by Pontius Pilate, and finally, he also rebuilt the Temple of Jerusalem in a style whose magnificence baffles description.

Herod had a passion for personal glory, and he was mortified to realize that the Jews still hated him as an Edomite usurper. Rabbi Baba, whose life had been spared, but whose eyes had been put out (see pages 1 to 5 of this Volume), is said by the Talmud to have suggested to Herod the rebuilding of the Temple as a means of expiating his many crimes. The Jews raised endless objections, however, to the proposal, "Where was the necessary wealth?" Herod pointed to his apparently inexhaustible treasury. "Would it not be sacrilege to pull down that venerated structure?" Herod point out that it was fast crumbling with decay. "What guarantee was there that he could build another?" Herod pledged himself that nothing should be touched of the ancient Temple, until everything was ready for the erection of the new. "Would it not be sacrilege to let Gentiles enter the Court of the Priests, or to touch the stone and timber of the Holy of Holies?" Herod undertook to train a thousand priests, and ten thousand Jewish artisans. All objections were overborne and the work commenced.

After eight years' work, the old Temple had been taken down, and for another eighteen months, the trained priests worked at the erection of the Holy Place. Herod was most careful to pay regard to the scruples of the Pharisees, and, though the building of the Temple had emptied his treasury, he never once set foot within the forbidden precincts.

In the Royal Portico were four rows of Corinthians columns, 162 in number, 27 feet high, and so thick that it took three men with outstretched arms to encircle them. One of the marble slabs bearing the Greek inscription that prohibited the Gentile from access (the "middle wall of partition" of Eph. ii.) was found in recent years in Jerusalem. The Gate of Nicavor was of Corinthian Brass, and was approached by fifteen semi-circular steps, while in the Great Court was the "Hall of Squares" where the Sanhedrin met. Over another gate was a golden vine, each cluster of grapes being as high as a man. Within hung the veil, which was "rent in twain" at the crucifixion.

The Rabbis speak of the wonders of this building with exaggerated praised:

> "Whoever has not seen the Temple in the perfection of its architecture has never seen a beautiful structure in all the world. With what materials did Herod erect the building? Rava said with alabaster and marble; some say with alabaster, stibium and marble; one row receding, another slightly projecting. Herod thought of covering the whole with gold, but the Rabbis advised him to leave it as it was, as it resembled the waves of the sea" (Succah f. v. i. 2).

No wonder the disciples said, "See what manner of stones and what buildings are here!" (Mark xiii. 1). Its gilded pinnacles and lustrous Pentelic marble made it look like a mountain of snow tinged at the summit with the gold of dawn. It has been described as longer and higher than York Minster, standing on a solid mass of masonry almost equal in height to the tallest of our church spires. We can well understand the astonishment with which the Jews must have heard the Lord's words: "Destroy this temple, and in three days I will raise it up again."

Herod's evil genius, however, led him to mar his gift and rouse against him the bitter resentment of the Jews. In order to attract the notice of the Roman Agrippa (not to be confused with Herod of that name) he placed over the great gate of the Temple a large golden eagle, emblematic of the power of Rome. This action caused the Jews to curse the very name of Herod, and all his munificence was wasted.

The Temple had been in process of building for 46 years when our Saviour opened His ministry, but it was not actually finished until A.D.65, although 18,000 men were constantly employed on the work. What an immense labour, and yet how soon destroyed—for within 6 years of its completion. Titus had left it a desolation.

The reader who realizes the importance of some knowledge of these Roman Emperors and Idumean Kings should not rest satisfied with the meagre notes that we must necessarily be content with in these articles. Josephus should be studied, and the great histories of the past; while a modern contribution in lighter vein is provided by the two historical novels by R. Graves, "I, Claudius" and "Claudius the god". These are very illuminating, and cover a great deal of the ground traversed in this series.

We must now turn our attention to other points of interest that come under the general heading of "The Powers that be".

#13. The Roman Provinces.
pp. 234 - 238

The recognition of Roman authority in the N.T. is clearly seen in several ways. For example, we find references to Roman provinces and colonies, and to the various kinds of rulers—proconsuls, procurators, tetrarchs, etc. We also find the Jews discussing the question of tribute, and there are references to "publicans", or tax-gatherers. Having devoted some space now to the history of the Roman Emperors and the Herods, let us next consider briefly the Roman provinces.

We feel fairly certain that unless the reader has already considered the matter, he will have no idea how many of these Roman provinces are mentioned in the N.T. The etymology of the word "province" is unknown. Some derive it from pro and vincere, "to push forward"; others from proventus, "a country paying tax to a ruling state"; and yet others to providentia, "a country entrusted to the care of someone". The meaning of the term, however, is quite clear, whatever may be its etymology. In Roman history, a province was a dominion, and was administered by a governor sent from Rome. The first province was Sicily, which was ceded to Italy in B.C.240. The land was the property of the Roman people and Senate, and the inhabitants paid tithes of their produce. There was no land-tax in Italy itself, but a tax was payable on any land that remained the property of a provincial.

In B.C.129 Attalus bequeathed his kingdom of Pergamos to Rome, and this became the province of Asia. "The Province" was the name given to Transalpine Gaul, and this is still retained in the name "Provence". In the days of Julius Cæsar there were fourteen provinces, seven in Europe, five in Asia, and two in Africa; and by B.C.27, when Augustus partitioned the empire between himself and the Senate, there were twenty-four. The provinciae Caesarae were controlled by governors representing the Emperor, bearing the title legate or propraetor, while the provinciae Senatoriae were administered by representatives of the Senate, called proconsuls. Augustus himself retained control of frontier provinces, partly because many of them were wealthy. It is interesting to note, in passing, that the only fresh province acquired by Rome during the first century of the Christian era, was the province of Britain.

Josephus uses the title "President" when speaking of the propraetors, while Luke often uses the more general title hegemon—which he applies to the legate Cyrenius, to the procurator Felix, and to the Emperor himself (Luke ii. 2 and iii. 1; Acts xxiii. 33). The procurators, as for instance Pilate and Felix, were appointed by the Emperor over subordinate districts—Judæa, for example, being a dependency of the larger province of Syria. Luke never makes a mistake in his choice of terms. Cyprus, Achaia and Asia, for example, were senatorial provinces, under the jurisdiction of proconsuls. The A.V. translates the word used by Luke "deputy", but the R.V. more correctly renders it in some of its occurrences as "proconsul".

With regard to finance, the revenue from the imperial provinces was called tributum, while that from the senatorial provinces was called stipendium. The Emperor, moreover, received additional revenue by virtue of taxes levied on legacies and inheritances, excise duty on goods for sale, a "bachelor's tax", etc. The regulations introduced by Augustus were most beneficial for the provinces, for before his time, the collector of taxes was little less than a robber.

> "It is attested by Cicero that the arrival of a governor, even in a peaceful province, was little different from the entrance of a victorious army into the country of a vanquished enemy. Even men who were of good repute for their humanity, returned to Rome with almost incredible sums of money after they had been in a province for some years. What the governors left undone was completed by usurers and the farmers of the public revenue" (Schmitz).

The reader will remember that Felix expected to get money from Paul and his friends, and Zacchæus, the tax-gatherer, speaks, after his conversion, of refunding with interest if he had taken more than his due. The words of the Pharisee in the parable: "I am not . . . . . an extortioner . . . . . or even as this publican", and the advice of John the Baptist to the publicans to "exact no more than is appointed you" go to show how prevalent this evil had become.

From time to time exchanges were made with regard to the provinces between the Emperor and the Senate. These exchanges complicate the work of the historian considerably, but they serve to demonstrate Luke's accuracy as a recorder of fact. For example, Cyprus was originally an imperial province, but was later exchanged for Dalmatia, and when Paul visited it, was senatorial, with Sergius Paulus as pro-consul. On this subject we are much indebted to the writings of Septimus Buss, and the following is an abbreviation of his more elaborate list of Roman Provinces with Scripture references.

The student of Scripture who has endeavoured to "place" Galatia and the epistle to the Galatians, will have experienced considerable difficulty in getting anything like harmony.

To-day, however, thanks to the researches of Sir William Ramsay, we are in possession of the facts that reveal the extent of the Galatian Province, and we now know that the churches founded in Acts xiii. and xiv. at Antioch, Iconium, Lystra and Derbe, were the original churches of Galatia. The testimonies of Ptolemy and Tacitus, together with the evidence provided by the monuments, make it quite clear that it is the larger province of Galatia, and not the small and original kingdom of Galatia, that is referred to in the N.T.

The two maps given below show the relative positions of the earlier kingdom and the later province, in relation to the missionary journey of Acts xiii. and xiv.

- - - I l l u s t r a t i o n - - -
(BE-XXIX.237).

We will conclude this account of the Roman Provinces with a note on Egypt, as the "Granary" of Rome. The corn vessels sailed from Alexandria to Puteoli, occupying about 12 days on the voyage. In such a vessel Paul sailed from Melita to Puteoli as recorded in Acts xxviii. 11-13. The governor of Egypt ranked above all other rulers of provinces, being styled Praefectus Augustatis; and it was from Egypt that Herod obtained supplies of corn during the famine that prevailed in Judæa.

We trust that the reader has caught something of the character and atmosphere of this extensive empire, in which the gospel was first proclaimed in the days of Augustus and Tiberius. Anyone who wishes to follow up this study further is recommended to read "The Church in the Roman Empire" by Sir William Ramsay. In this book the author seeks to prove that Paul planned his itinerary along the lines of Roman development, and conceived of the Roman Empire particularly as the first great field for evangelization. Whatever view one may hold as to the corrections of this theory, it is certainly true that the trend of the gospel was Westward rather than to the East, and that Paul planted his footsteps, not in obscure and out-of-the-way places, but in the chief cities and colonies of the Empire.

The Epistle to the Romans.

#74. Romans xii. and xiii.
"Vengeance" and "The Powers That be" (xii. 17 - xiii. 7).
pp. 29 - 34

We now arrive at the central section of Rom. xii. and xiii. with its emphasis upon "vengeance" and "civil rule". For the place this section occupies in the main structure, the reader is referred to Volume XXVIII, page 191.

Romans xii. 17 - xiii. 7.
Vengeance.

C | xii. 17 - xiii. 7. "Coals of fire" or "The sword".
e | l | xii. 17. Recompense no man evil.
m | 17. Provide things honest.
f | n | 18-21. Vengeance. Coals of fire.
o | xiii. 1. Be subject.
n | 2-4. Revenger. The sword.
o | 5. Be subject.
e | m | 6. Pay tribute.
l | 7. Render to all their dues.

The exhortations of the Apostle, from verse 10 onwards, have been mainly concerned with the believer's attitude towards those within the sphere of grace. At verse 17, however, where our new section starts, he turns his attention to the attitude which should be manifested by the Christian towards those that are without. Immediately the outside circle is brought into view a note of evil is struck, and the question of vengeance introduced. The problem of the Christian's right attitude towards his enemies and towards civil government has now to be faced. To appreciate this problem in its true setting involves a very considerable knowledge of Roman history. To attempt the briefest synopsis here, would, however, hold up our studies far too much, and we must therefore refer the interested reader to the series under the general heading: "The Powers That Be." This series forms a kind of supplement to our studies in the Acts and Romans, and deals with "Roman history, and Roman laws and customs, in so far as they throw light upon the N.T. narrative". By arranging the articles in this way, those who are not specially interested will not have the studies in the Acts and Romans impeded, while those who are, will, we trust, find them valuable sidelights on the many passages that refer, either pointedly or remotely, to the historical events taking place at the time of writing.

It had been a most perplexing question among the Jews, as to how far they should recognize the sovereignty of a pagan ruler. The Law of Moses reads:

> "Thou shalt in any wise set him King over thee, whom the Lord thy God shall choose: one from among thy brethren shalt thou set King over thee: thou mayest not set a stranger over thee, which is not thy brother" (Deut. xvii. 15).

One of the twelve apostles is referred to as "Simon the Canaanite" in Matt. x. 4; and "Simon Zelotes" in Acts i. 13. These titles do not imply that Simon was a Canaanite in the sense of belonging to the nations devoted to destruction at the time of Joshua, but rather that he was one whose watchword was "Palestine for Israel, and down with the oppressor". Hence he is also named "The Zealot".

The believing Jew would have many qualms of conscience concerning the right attitude to be adopted toward pagan kings and governors. The converted idolater also was troubled, as a perusal of I Corinthians will show, particularly with regard to possible complicity with the idolatry from which he had been delivered.

In Acts iv., we read that Peter and those with him said to the rulers who threatened them:

> "Whether it be right in the sight of God to hearken unto you more than unto God, judge ye. For we cannot but speak the things which we have seen and heard" (Acts iv. 19, 20).

Paul also gives us a splendid example of uncompromising loyalty to the Lord, and we must therefore give earnest heed to the tempered and gentle spirit that pervades his admonitions on this thorny question. If the passage is read through as a whole, it will be seen that the Apostle does not by any means suggest an abject submission to civil rule whatever its demands. There is to be no prostration of the conscience before any successor to Nebuchadnezzar's image, even though that image be now called "The State" or even "The Church by law established". What the Apostle maintains is that no Christian is justified in opposing government, or in having the remotest connection with sedition or rebellion. He cannot be an agitator, or march under the banner of any company, whatever may be its grievance; neither must he fail to comply with the just demands for tribute, custom, fear or honour, that necessarily accompany organized government. And so we read: "Recompense", "provide", "live peaceably", "be subject", "pay", "render".

"Recompense to no man evil for evil" (Rom. xii. 17).—If we walk according to the flesh, we shall find ourselves acting in a way which is quite contrary to this principle. Under the law, it was possible to exact "an eye for an eye"; but under grace we are called upon to love our enemies—a command more easily written and read than fulfilled, and yet one which lies at the very root of all true Christian living. In the same verse the Apostle continues: "Provide things honest in the sight of all men." The English word "provision" is made up of "pro", before, and vision", to see—and so, to see a need beforehand and make all necessary arrangements to meet it. The Greek word pronoeo is made up in exactly the same way—pro, "before", and noeo, "to perceive". Rendered literally, the passage would read: "Provide beautiful things in the face of all men", referring to the truly beautiful spirit that suffers without threatening or reprisal, confiding its cause, as in the case of the Lord Himself, into the hands of Him Who judgeth righteously.

The next item of exhortation is accompanied by an element of reserve and qualification:

> "If it be possible, as much as lieth in you, live peaceably with all men' (Rom. xii. 18).

It is evident that the Apostle recognizes here that living peaceably with all men, in a world that does not know God, is not always possible. The point is, that, so far as we are concerned, the quarrel or the strife must not originate on our side. We must be willing, for the sake of peace, to yield, where the law entitles us to enforce our rights. On the other hand, where our stewardship is involved, or our loyalty to the Lord, we must, of course, refuse to pay the traitor's price for a so-called peace. We can settle most cases of conscience by remembering that, if it be a matter of our "rights", we can gladly forego them for His sake, but if it be a matter of "His truth", we have no option but to stand fast. That something like this is in the Apostle's mind seems evident from the next statement:

> "Dearly beloved, avenge not yourselves, but rather give place unto wrath: for it is written, Vengeance is Mine: I will repay saith the Lord' (Rom. xii. 19).

It has been suggested that, by the words; "Give place unto wrath", the Apostle implies that we should give it room to spend itself, as a mariner does a storm. In Eph. iv. 27, he warns us against giving place to the Devil by entertaining sinful anger. So here, the Apostle seems to say, Give place to God, Who alone has the prerogative of vengeance. If vengeance is to fall, then it will come from the hand of God, but the believer should labour and pray that his enemy should, on the contrary be saved—so that, instead of recompensing evil with evil, he should seek to overcome evil with good. If his enemy is hungry, instead of letting him starve, he will go out of his way to feed him—for, in so doing, he will "heaps coals of fire on his head".

What are we to understand by this figure? In Psalm. cxl. 9, 10 we read:

> "As for the head of those that compass me about, let the mischief of their own lips cover them. Let burning coals fall upon them: let them be cast into the fire; into deep pits, that they rise not up again."

This is just the opposite of the spirit manifested in Rom. xii., where the Apostle is quoting from Prov. xxv. 21, 22. Dr. Bullinger, in "Figures of Speech", draws attention to the fact that the word "heap" means "to take hold", and that an ellipsis must be supplied as follows:

> "The coals of fire which thine enemy casts at thee, thou shalt take them and put them upon his head: he will thus get what he intended for thee."

The latter part of this comment is modified in The Companion Bible, where we read:

> "If thou doest good to one whose burning words (xvi. 27, xxvi. 23) thou hast received, they will burn him in another sense. Illustration David (I Sam. xxiv. 16-22)."

This is much more in harmony with the teaching of Rom. xii. The unexpected return of good for evil will, it is hoped, in many cases bring about shame and contrition, so that the persecutor may become a believer, and the persecuted one the true victor, overcoming evil with good.

Coming now to Rom. xiii., and its teaching concerning human government, we must remember that Nebuchadnezzar did not attain his authority over the earth, merely as an act of vain-glory, or by force alone. He undoubtedly was a powerful warrior and was not lacking in vanity, but it is also written:

> "And the Lord gave Jehoiakim, King of Judah, into his hand" (Dan. i. 2).
> "Thou, O King, art a King of Kings, for the God of heaven hath given thee a kingdom, power, strength, and glory . . . . . and hath made thee ruler over them all. Thou art this head of gold" (Dan. ii. 37, 38).

When the Apostle wrote the epistle to the Romans, Babylon had been succeeded by Persia, Persia by Greece, and Greece by Rome; nevertheless, Paul and Daniel say much the same thing, for human government was still under God's control. While many of the rulers of the Roman world were unscrupulous, mean, and licentious, this fact did not in any way justify a Christian's resisting the authority that they represented. These rulers were responsible to God for the way in which they used their authority, but it was no business of the Christian to interfere. Even our Lord paid tribute, and spoke of "rendering to Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's".

"We must needs be subject", says the Apostle, "not only for wrath, but also for conscience sake". Many are obedient out of fear, who would rebel if the cause of fear were to be removed. There are many who are respectable citizens, not because of positive and formative volition, but because of the negative and enslaving power of fear. The Christian must always act "for conscience sake", whether he obeys the voice of authority, or decides that it is right to disobey it. Neither fear of consequences, nor hope of reward, must enter into the secret counsels of the heart.

In Jude we read of those who "despise dominion and speak evil of dignities"; and a few verses further on, of other members of the same class, who "have men's persons in admiration because of advantage" (Jude 8, 16).

Such men are wiling either to speak evil of dignities, or to fawn upon them, as it suits their base interests. The Christian, on the other hand, should be able to "talk with crowds" and yet keep his virtue, and "walk with kings" without losing the common touch. We must also remember that, because we own no man as Lord, and all our service is rendered in the name of the Lord Jesus, this does not mean that we may demonstrate our liberty by being discourteous or uncouth. If we are to follow the teaching of Scripture, we must "render to all their dues".

Each generation brings with it its own peculiar problems. These are not solved for us in a ready-made fashion in Rom. xiii. The principles, however, are given, and these must be applied in the light of the truth as the occasion demands. Above all we must keep prominently in mind that spirit of Christian charity which pervades this section like incense, and that spirit of conciliation that is but the reflection to external enemies of the grace that has brought us nigh.

#75. Romans xii. and xiii.
Love, the Fulfilling of the Law (xiii. 8-10).
The Armour of Light (xiii. 11-14).
pp. 69 - 73

In correspondence with the member B | xii. 3-16: "Grace given", we have B | xiii. 8-10: "Law fulfilled."

B | xiii. 8-10. | h | Owe no man anything.
i | Love one another.
j | Love fulfils the law.
h | Thou shalt not commit . . . . .
i | Love thy neighbour as thyself.
j | Love fulfils the law.

Arising out of our obligation to "render to all their dues", comes the precept: "Owe no man anything."

It is sad to see how careless many believers are with regard to the question of debt. While it is true that modern business could hardly be conducted without "credit", the believer, in all his affairs, should be careful to keep a tender conscience in relation to this matter. If, for any reason, a debt has been contracted, everything possible should be done to quickly repay it. It is sad to think that many a Christian would profit by the advice of Polonius:

"Neither a borrower, nor a lender be;
For loan oft loses both itself and friend,
And borrowing dulls the edge of husbandry"
(Hamlet 1. iii.).

Turning again to the structure, we find that the fulfilling of the law by love is given a prominent place—an argument that comes again in Gal. v. 14. As the Apostle draws near to the end of his life, we find him placing more and more emphasis upon "love". Describing the last days in his epistle to Timothy (II Tim. iii. 1-4), he says that "men shall be lovers of their own selves" (philautoi), "covetous" (philarguroi: literally, "lovers of money"), "despisers of those that are good" (aphilagathoi: literally, "not loving the good"), "lovers of pleasure (philedonoi), rather than lovers of God (philotheoi)". In the same epistle, the crown is for all those "who have loved His appearing", while the defection of Demas is attributed to the love of this present evil age (II Tim. iv. 8, 10).

We also remember the pre-eminent place given to love in I Corinthians—above all miracles and martyrdom, above even faith and hope. Love is all-comprehensive, for God Himself is love; and when we know even as we are known, we shall need no other attribute to make God all in all to us. For the time being, the white light of love must be split up to suit our present limitations, but we can see even now that both law and grace, as well as faith and hope, look to love for their realization.

We must pass on to the closing member A | xiii. 11-14.

A | xiii. 11-14. The night. The flesh. The light. Put on.
a | 11. Time. Knowing the season.
b | 11. Action. The hour to awake.
a | 11, 12. Time. | c | Salvation nearer.
d | Night far spent.
c | Day at hand.
b | 12-14. Action.
e | Put off.
f | Put on.
g | Walk "as" (pos.), (Euschemonos).
"Not" (neg.)
f | Put on.
e | Put off.

This is the last section of the Structure, and the teaching of Rom. xii. and xiii. is now complete. No conformity with this age was the key to the first section (Rom. xii. 1, 2); and "walking honestly", as in the day; not as in the night, is the teaching of this and balancing section (Rom. xiii. 11-14). In the first passage suschematizo is used; and in the second euschemonos ("honestly"). In both words the root is schema, "fashion". We are not to be conformed to the fashion of this world which passes away, but to be fashioned in harmony with "the day"—the day of salvation.

There is an emphasis here upon the importance of recognizing "the time". While the people of Israel remained a factor the purpose of the ages, the Second Coming of Christ could be regarded as imminent. Contingent upon Israel's repentance, the return of the Lord was to take place, and the "times of refreshing" would have come (Acts iii. 19-21). In view, therefore, of "the present necessity", the shortness of the time, and the character of the days immediately preceding the Second Coming, the Apostle gave special instructions, as for example in I Cor. vii., with reference to marriage (I Cor. vii. 26, 29). This instruction was considerably modified when the dispensation changed (Eph. v. 22-23, I Tim. iii. 1-5, v. 11-14).

A knowledge of the character of the season leads to action—"It is high time to awake out of sleep". We find a very close parallel to Rom. xiii. 11-14 in I Thess. v. 1-10. In both passages we have darkness and light, sleep and wakefulness, armour and the hope of salvation. Let us see the two passages together.

Romans xiii. 11-14.	I Thessalonians v. 1-10.
"Knowing the season" (kairon). "It is high time to awake out of sleep . . . . . the night is far spent, the day is at hand . . . . . let us walk honestly as in the day: not in rioting and drunkenness . . . . . make not provision for the flesh to fulfil the lusts thereof. Let us put on the armour of light, for now is our salvation nearer than when we believed."	"But the times and seasons (kairon) you know perfectly." "Ye are all the children of light, and the children of the day: we are not of the night, nor of darkness. Therefore let us not sleep as do others, but let us watch and be sober. For they that sleep, sleep in the night, and they that be drunken are drunken in the night. Putting on the breastplate of faith and love; and for an helmet, the hope of salvation . . . . . to obtain salvation by our Lord Jesus Christ."

The two passages follow their own order, but the parallel between them is plain.

While the particular phase of the Lord's Coming may be different in different passages, the practical influence of this "blessed hope" remains the same:

> "Teaching us that, having denied ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously, and godly in this present age, looking for that blessed hope, and the appearing of the glory of our great God and Saviour Jesus Christ" (Titus ii. 12, 13).
>
> "I charge thee, therefore, before God, and the Lord Jesus Christ, Who shall judge the quick and the dead at His appearing and kingdom, preach the word . . . . . love His appearing" (II Tim. iv. 1-8).

In Rom. xiii. 12 we have the exhortation: "Let us put on the armour of light." In verse 14 we read: "Put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ." After the first reference to "putting on", the Apostle mentions certain particular activities of the flesh—rioting, drunkenness, etc. After the second reference, we have the all-inclusive statement: "Make no provision for the flesh, to fulfil the lusts thereof." It is evident that the putting on of "the armour of light" is but a figurative way of describing the full equipment of the believer who stands in all that Christ is made to him. Comparing this passage with Ephesians, we read in Eph. iv. of "having put off . . . . . the old man, and having put on the new man", while in Eph. vi., what is true of every believer in Eph. iv. is put into practical effect when the armour is "put on"—the armour being specified as being either the gifts of grace in Christ, or the Word of God itself. In Eph. vi. the foes in view are "spiritual wickednesses", but in Rom. xiii. the enemy is nearer home. The enemy in Romans is "the flesh"—not the flesh in others, but the flesh in ourselves.

It is important here to keep close to the actual teaching of the passage. There is nothing to justify the idea that the believer cannot fall into sin, or that he will not sometimes be "overtaken in a fault". Even those described in Galatians as "ye which are spiritual" are exhorted to "restore such an one in the spirit of meekness; considering thyself, lest thou also be tempted" (Gal. vi. 1). What we are warned against here is "making provision for the flesh"—a provision which is made by conforming to this age, by forgetting that we are of the day and that it is high time for us to awake out of sleep, and by forgetting the nearness of our hope. Just as we are to "provide things honest in the sight of all men" (Rom. xii. 17), so we must be careful not to provide for the satisfaction of the lusts of the flesh.

The word translated "armour" has already appeared in Romans, but in its previous occurrence it is rendered "instruments":

> "Let not sin therefore reign in your mortal body, that ye should obey it in the lusts thereof. Neither yield ye your members as instruments (Margin 'arms' or 'weapons') of unrighteousness unto sin: but yield yourselves unto God, as those that are alive from the dead, and your members as instruments of righteousness unto God" (Rom. vi. 12, 13).

The "yielding" here in Rom. vi. is the "presenting" of Rom. xii. 1 and 2. The "mortal bodies" in Rom. vi. are those that are yielded as living sacrifices in Rom. xii., for they are yielded "as those that are alive from the dead". The strength for this is in our "reckoning"—according to Rom. vi. 11—or, in our "putting on the Lord Jesus Christ"—according to Rom. xiii. 14.

It is our reasonable service thus to present our bodies; it is a logical outcome of grace not to think highly of ourselves; it is rational to endeavour to serve the Lord in the place and with the gift that He has been pleased to bestow. It is our reasonable service to refrain from avenging ourselves; it is our reasonable service to render to all their dues and to recognize that He Who has so sovereignly given to every believer some gift for His glory, has also, in His wider providential dealings with the world, ordained the powers that be. It is a logical conclusion that love fulfils all law, and that we who are saved by grace and are waiting for glory, should stand complete in all the fullness of the gift of Christ.

"I beseech you", writes the Apostle, at the beginning of this section, "I beseech you, therefore, brethren, by the mercies of God". May this beseeching and our contemplation of these "mercies of God" not be in vain.

#76. Romans xiv. 1 - xv. 7.
"Receive ye one another."
pp. 109 - 112

The section just concluded (Rom. xii. and xiii.) was an exposition of what constituted, and what arose out of, "reasonable service". The section now before us met a very real need in the Church of the Apostle's day, and also indicates what should be our attitude to-day, even though the particular questions under discussion may not be exactly the same as they were while the "middle wall of partition" between Jewish and Gentile believers still remained.

The subject of this section is that of "reception". The Apostle deals with this in two ways: (1) Negatively: "Not to doubtful disputations" (xiv. 1), and (2) Positively: "As Christ received us, to the glory of God" (xv. 7). The "doubtful disputations" were concerned with the eating of "meats" and the observance of "days". The true spiritual attitude in these things is to realize that they make little or no difference to the believer, and that things are in themselves neither clean nor unclean. Days can be neither sacred nor secular in themselves; what matters most is the effect upon the conscience and the motive that is behind the action. It will not be difficult for the reader to see, beyond the concrete examples here introduced, the general principles which must govern the setting of all such grounds of dispute and offence.

The structure of such a section as this is necessarily a long one, and it is not practicable to set it out in full in these pages. We give a condensed outline here, and in the course of exposition each section will be expanded as the occasion demands. It will therefore be a simple matter for the earnest student to reassemble the whole structure should he so desire. Those who do not think it necessary to do this may nevertheless feel assured that the whole structure is before us, even though it cannot be exhibited. The skeleton structure is as follows:

Romans xiv. 1 - xv. 7.

A1 | xiv. 1. Receive the weak.
  B1 | xiv. 1. Diakrisis. Doubtful disputations.
    C1 | xiv. 2-5. Meats, etc., and the estimate of faith.
      D1 | xiv. 6-12. The Lordship of Christ. It is written.
    C2 | xiv. 13-22. Meats, etc., and the estimate of faith.
  B2 | xiv. 23. Diakrino. Doubts and damnation. Not of faith is sin.
      D2 | xv. 1-5. The humility of Christ. It is written.
    C3 | xv. 5. Something better than meats, etc.
  B3 | xv. 6. Homothumadon. One mind and one mouth. Better than diakrisis.
A2 | xv. 7. Receive ye one another, as Christ also received us.

This question of "receiving one another" is one that transcends dispensational boundaries, and is an accompaniment of salvation wherever it is manifested. The ecclesiastical side of the matter is by no means the most important, though this aspect has alas, often been allowed to overshadowed all others.

The word translated "receive" in Rom. xiv. 1 and xv. 7 is the Greek word proslambano, pros being the preposition "toward" or "unto", and lambano meaning "to receive". There is, therefore, a very personal touch about the word. It is not merely "to receive" but "to receive unto oneself". There is something warm and kindly about the word—the very antithesis of anything formal.

Proslambano occurs 14 times in the N.T., the only occurrences in the epistles, apart from those in Romans, being found in Philemon. The two references here indicate very clearly the personal character of the word:

> "Thou therefore receive him, that is, mine own bowels" (Philemon i. 12).
> "If thou count me therefore a partner, receive him as myself" (Philemon i. 17).

We get further light on the meaning of the word from its occurrences in the Acts. In Acts xviii., we read of Aquila and Priscilla "taking" Apollos "unto them" (Acts xviii. 26); in chapter xxvii. the Apostle exhorts the famished sailors to "take" some meat (Acts xxvii. 34); while in chapter xxviii. we read of the kindness of the barbarous inhabitants of Malta, who kindled a fire and "received us every one, because of the present rain and because of the cold" (Acts xxviii. 2). All these passages indicate something of the intimate character of the "reception" enjoined by the Apostle.

If the reader is not acquainted with the usage of the various words translated "to receive", and particularly of lambano and its many combinations, he should examine the Scriptures and discover the important place that this aspect of faith holds.

In John i. 12 the word is lambano: "As many as received Him", while in the previous verse: "His own received Him not", it is paralambano. The latter (paralambano) is used in Col. ii. 6: "As ye have therefore received Christ Jesus the Lord, so walk ye in Him." When we think of all the pretty things that prevent the reception of the believer by other believers, we should be humbled as we remember that the Lord Himself "made Himself of no reputation, and took upon Himself (sumparalambano) the form of a servant (literally 'slave')" (Phil. ii. 7). We are exhorted, in the context of this same passage, that this mind should be in us, "which was also in Christ Jesus".

Each believer has "received" the "reconciliation" (Rom. v. 11), and if each of us is reconciled to God, surely there should be free reception of one another "as Christ also received us". Every believer has received the "spirit of adoption, whereby we cry, Abba, Father" (Rom. viii. 15), and it would surely be strange if those who call upon the same Heavenly Father should be unwilling to receive one another. It is obvious, however, that fellowship with other believers must have some sort of touchstone, and must rest upon something more than a merely personal feeling. The basis of all true reception is that "Christ has received" the other believer to the glory of God, and that this too must regulate our own attitude. At this point, however, a difficulty arises. It is not given to any of us to know the heart of another, for that belongs to the Lord alone. We can, therefore, only act according to evidences; and we must consider what these necessary evidences must be. In the Second Epistle of John we read:

> "Whosoever transgresseth and abideth not in the doctrine of Christ, hath not God. He that abideth in the doctrine of Christ, he hath both the Father and the Son. If there came any unto you, and bring not this doctrine, received him not in your house, neither bid him God-speed" (II John 9, 10).

No amount of "Christian charity" can alter the force of this passage. Christ is the touchstone of all doctrine and practice. We receive as He received. We received those whom He has received, and we cannot receive those who do not receive Him. It is sadly possible to preach "another Jesus", and those who have been taught to honour the Son even as they honour the Father, cannot accept those whose estimate of Christ does not accord Him this equal honour. It must, however, be kept in mind that John deals with the reception of teachers, whereas Paul is dealing with the reception of believers. If we may be allowed a somewhat imaginative use of the terms, the pew is broader than the pulpit.

These few notes will possible be sufficient to open up the new subject that is to occupy us during the study of this section, and we will reserve all further comment until we have examined more closely the "doubtful disputations" which were dividing the early Church.

#77. Romans xiv. 1 - xv. 7.
"Reasonings" and "Reason".
pp. 149 - 153

We have seen that this section of the epistle deals with the question of "reception" and treats it in two ways: first, negatively—how not to receive, and then positively. We must now turn our attention to the negative aspect, which is presented first.

The words: "Not to doubtful disputations" are the translation of me eis diakriseis dialogismon, and before we proceed, it will be necessary to obtain some scriptural light upon their usage and meaning.

To take diakrisis first, this word is used in a good sense in I Cor. xii. and Heb. v.:

> "For to one . . . . . to another discerning of spirits . . . . . all these worketh that one and self-same Spirit" (I Cor. xii. 8-11).
>
> "But strong meat belongeth to them that are of full age, even those who by reason of use have their senses exercised to discern both good and evil" (Heb. v. 14).

It is clear from these passages that in Rom. xiv. 1 the Apostle cannot be condemning the faculty of discrimination in itself, but rather its unkind application in connection with the reception of a weak believer. Just as we are about to learn that the question of meats and herbs in itself is of little consequence, but that it is the part played by the conscience that matters, so we may learn here, that the possession of the gift, or grace, of discernment must be under the tempering power of kindliness and love. Priscilla and Aquila would not have succeeded with Apollos as they did, if they had seized upon his errors at once and made him feel uncomfortable in the presence of the assembled synagogue.

Diakrino is translated in a variety of ways in the A.V., but each translation has at its base the idea of discrimination. For example:

> "Ye can discern the face of the sky" (Matt. xvi. 3).
> "Is it so that there is no wise man among you? no, not one, that shall be able to judge between his brethren?" (I Cor. vi. 5).

Perhaps the passage that is most important in view of the problems discussed in Rom. xiv., is that which records Peter's words after he had received the vision of the great sheet filled with all manner of beasts and creeping things, and had been exhorted to "slay and eat". This vision is recorded in Acts xi., and is the basis of the Apostle's appeal for charity in Acts xv.: "And put no difference between us and them, purifying their hearts by faith" (Acts xv. 9). These words were spoken in Paul's own hearing—for he was himself at the Jerusalem gathering—and he could scarcely have written Rom. xiv. 1 without remembering this critical occasion.

To take now the second word in Rom. xiv. 1, dialogismos, we find that it is usually translated "thoughts" in the A.V., and in nearly all its ten occurrences the word has evil associations. In Luke ix. 47 we read: "And Jesus, perceiving the thought of their heart." While in verse 46 of the same chapter dialogismos is translated "reasoning". We may therefore translate Rom. xiv. 1: "Not for discrimination of reasonings."

The reader should notice here that "reasonings" and "reason" are not the same thing. "Reasonings" arise out of an evil heart (Matt. xv. 18-20), but it would be quite wrong to set aside "reason" because "reasonings" are condemned. If Rom. xiv. 1 sets aside "reasonings", chapter xii. 1 just as clearly upholds "reason", for we read: "I beseech you . . . . . present your bodies . . . . . which is your reasonable service." Peter also exhorts his hearers to be ready to give "a reason" for the hope that is in them" (I Pet. iii. 15).

That the use of "reason" was characteristic of the apostle Paul, the following passages make abundantly clear:

> "And Paul, as his manner was, went in unto them, and three sabbath days reasoned with them out of the Scriptures" (Acts xvii. 2).
> "Therefore disputed he in the synagogue with the Jews" (Acts xvii. 17).
> "And he reasoned in the synagogue every Sabbath, and persuaded the Jews and the Greeks" (Acts xviii. 4).

> "He himself entered into the synagogue, and reasoned with the Jews" (Acts xviii. 19).
>
> "He went into the synagogue and spake boldly for the space of three months, disputings and persuading the things concerning the Kingdom of God" (Acts xix. 8).
>
> "Disputing daily in the school of Tyrannus" (Acts xix. 9).
>
> "Paul preached unto them" (Acts xx. 7).
>
> "Paul was long preaching" (Acts xx. 9).
>
> "And as he reasoned of righteousness, temperance, and judgment to come, Felix trembled" (Acts xxiv. 25).

Not only did the great Apostle continually and consistently "reason", but the Word of God itself is said to do so: "And you have forgotten the exhortation which reasons with you as sons" (Heb. xii. 5).

We must never forget that faith and hope are "reasonable", and in I Pet. iii. 15 we read: "Be ready to give an answer (apologia) to every man that asketh you a reason (logon) of the hope that is in you."

Our Lord's words when He walked with the two disciples to Emmaus also provide further evidence that faith is reasonable, for we read:

> "O fools (anoetos, inconsiderate, thoughtless) and slow of heart to believe . . . . . He expounded (diermenuo, explained or interpreted) in all the Scriptures . . . . . Then opened He their understanding (nous, mind) that they might understand (suniemi) the Scriptures" (Luke xxiv. 25, 27, 45).

We have already referred to Acts xvii. 2 and xviii. 4 in connection with the Apostle's reasoning, and it is good to see that the sequel was that some were "persuaded" (epeithe, i.e. won over to conviction). The Apostle did not hesitate to "speak wisdom" among them that were "perfect" (I Cor. ii. 6), and in Heb. xi. 3 he writes: "By faith we understand" (noeo).

Some of our readers will know that an attempt has been made to belittle the series of articles we have published under the heading "With all thy getting, get understanding". Such an attitude, however, is not in accordance with the Scriptures, for the very title of the series is a text of Scripture, and the getting of understanding obviously implies the exercise of the reasoning faculties. It is impossible for any man to "believe" a statement, whether uttered by God or man, unless he understands its "meaning". He may not be able to appreciate the full significance of the statement, but he must understand the fundamental meaning of the terms used. The Scripture not only speaks of the cross, but of the "word (logos) of the cross"; it not only presents to us the fact of reconciliation, but also preaches the "word of reconciliation". The "cross", presented without explanation, can mean nothing; and immediately we attempt to explain its place in the scheme of salvation we must call upon the whole intelligence to take part. Unbelief may be blind, but faith sees.

By the mere process of "reasoning" human nature cannot attain to the truth, because, first of all, God's truth is beyond the powers of human intelligence to attain, and secondly because sin has robbed man of his birthright. He goes astray from truth like a lost sheep.

He calls light darkness, and darkness light. When, however, man believes the Word of God, the entrance of that Word gives light to the simple. The mind is renewed, and this renewed mind functions as God intended. Faith is discovered to be most reasonable, the purpose of the ages most rational, and the plan of salvation demonstrates that God is not only "righteous" but "right". While, therefore, the Apostle warns the Church at Rome against "doubtful disputations", it is quite untrue to suggest that reason and faith can ever conflict.

As we have mentioned the series entitled, "With all thy getting, get understanding", we would draw the reader's attention to the fact that these articles were not prepared so that the reader should be able to sit in judgment upon the Word of God, but rather that he should be able to judge the writings of men. In any case, we trust that all readers of The Berean Expositor will "search and see" before accepting anything that is written in its pages.

#78. Romans xiv. 1 - xv. 7.
"Meats" and "Days".
The "strong" and the "weak".
pp. 188 - 192

One of the most conclusive evidences that a change of dispensation took place at Acts xxviii., is the complete change in the character of the "cases of conscience" that come up for consideration in the epistles of the Mystery. The problems of Rom. xiv. are pre-eminently Jewish, and are practically unknown in the Church to-day. The eating of meats and the observance of days are regarded as things to be repudiated in Col. ii., but already a new point of view is evident.

There are two words translated "to eat", that occur with great frequency in the N.T.—esthio and phago. While both these words are found many times in the Gospels and the earlier Epistles of Paul, there is not a single occurrence of either of them in the prison epistles. The N.T. occurrences are too many to give in full, as esthio occurs 64 times, and phago 97 times. Phago does not differ from esthio in any essential, and is actually used to form some of its tenses. It is as fanciful to attempt to draw any distinction between them, as it would be to make some essential difference between "go" and "went".

Esthio.

"Why eateth your Master with sinners?" (Matt. ix. 11).
"Another, who is weak, eateth herbs" (Rom. xiv. 2).
"Whatsoever is set before you, eat, asking no question for conscience sake" (I Cor. x. 27).

Phago.

> "To eat with unwashen hands defileth not" (Matt. xv. 20).
> "I have never eaten anything that is common or unclean" (Acts x. 14).
> "One believeth that he may eat all things" (Rom. xiv. 2).

Another word that occurs in Rom. xiv. in this connection is the word "meat". This is the translation of broma, which is not limited to "flesh" but covers the whole range of eatables. The word occurs in Rom. xiv. where the Apostle says: "The kingdom of God is not meat and drink" (Rom. xiv. 17), and again in Col. ii.: "Let no man, therefore, judge you in meat or in drink" (Col. ii. 16).

No one can read the Book of Leviticus or the writings of the Rabbis, without realizing what an important place the question of clean and unclean food occupied in the mind of a zealous Jew. Dr. Lightfoot calls the following the Pharisaical ladder to heaven:

> "Whosoever hath his seat in the land of Israel, and eateth his common food in cleanness, and speaks the holy language, and recites his phylacteries morning and evening—let him be confident that he shall obtain the life of the world to come" (Maimonedes).

The teaching of the law was supplemented by many glosses, and the Rabbis did not scruple to bring in the unseen world to enforce their traditions. Thus we read: "Shibta was one of the demons, who hurt them that wash not their hands before meat" (Babylonian Taanith).

The feelings of the early Church on this question of eating find expression in the reprimand administered to Peter in Acts xi.:

> "Thou wentest in to men uncircumcised, and didst eat with them" (Acts xi. 3).

These two things—circumcision and "meats"—distinguished Israel from the Gentile world, and of these, the more important distinction was the eating of clean meats, for Ishmaelites and other descendants of Abraham who did not discriminate in the matter of meats were nevertheless circumcised.

Let us now turn our attention to the passage that deals with these scruples. The following is the structure of Rom. xiv. 2-5, but the reader should also refer back to page 110 for the structure of the complete passage.

The Estimate of Faith (Rom. xiv. 2-5).

G1 | xiv. 2-5. MEATS, ETC., AND THE ESTIMATE OF FAITH.
a1 | a | One eats all things.
b | Another eats herbs.
a | One must not despise.
b | The other must not judge.
b1 | FOR GOD HATH RECEIVED HIM.
a2 | a | Who art thou that judgest.
b | Another man's servants?
a | To his own Master he stands or falls.
b | He shall be held up.
b2 | FOR GOD IS ABLE TO MAKE HIM STAND.
a3 | a | One man esteemeth.
b | One day above another.
a | Another man esteemeth.
b | Every day alike.
b3 | LET EACH BE FULLY PERSUADED IN HIS OWN MIND.

The parties in view in this conflict are not "the right" and "the wrong", or "the orthodox" and "the heretic"; they are "the strong" and "the weak". A believing Jew, even though justified by faith, found it very difficult to throw off the effects of his upbringing and early prejudices. Hence, if he were obliged to live in a Gentile city, he might find it impossible to feel free from pollution in eating ordinary food, and so would "eat only herbs". Seneca tells us that in his youth he adopted the practice of vegetarianism, but that his father induced him to give it up, lest he should be suspected of foreign superstition (probably Judaism). In the Clementine Homilies the eating of meat is attributed to impure demons and bloodthirsty giants, and Peter is represented as saying that he made use of bread and olives, and sparingly of certain vegetables.

The Apostle's handling of these very real difficulties is referred to by Farrar in the following terms:

> "He treats the difficulty in the same masterly manner—broad yet sympathetic, inflexible in convictions yet considerate towards prejudices—which he had already displayed in dealing with a similar question in his epistle to the Corinthians" (Farrar).

"Inflexible" yet "considerate". What grace is needed for the perfect blend of these two qualities. Without them, the "strong" will become arrogant, and the "weak" self-righteous.

What is said in Rom. xiv. concerning "meats" is also said concerning "days". In this connection, the following paragraph from the writings of Dean Alford is interesting, particularly in view of the fact that, as Dean of Canterbury, he would naturally be obliged to uphold the observance of Sunday as the Lord's Day.

> "One man (the weak) esteems (selects for honour) one day above another day; another (the strong) esteems every day. Let each be fully satisfied in his own mind. It > is an interesting question, what indication is here found of the observance or non-observance of a day of obligation in the apostolic times. The Apostle decides nothing, leaving every man's own mind to guide him in the point. He classes the observance or non-observance of particular days, with eating or abstaining from particular meats. In both cases, he is concerned with things which he evidently treats as of absolute indifference in themselves. Now the question is, supposing the divine obligation of one day in seven to have been recognized by him in any form, could he have thus spoken? The obvious inference from his strain of arguing is, that he knew of no such obligation, but believed all times and days to be, to the Christian strong in faith, ALIKE. I do not see how the passage can be otherwise understood. If any one day in the week were invested with the sacred character of the Sabbath, it would have been wholly impossible for the apostle to commend or uphold the man who judged all days worthy of equal honour—who, as in verse 6, paid no regard to the (any) day. He must have visited him with his strongest disapprobation, as violating a command of God. I therefore infer that sabbatical obligation to keep any day, whether seventh or first, was not recognized in apostolic times."

These words, coming from one who regarded "the Lord's Day as an institution of the Christian Church", and "binding upon us from considerations of humanity and religious expediency", may be of some weight with those who have looked upon the Christian Sunday, the First Day of the Week (or, as it is mistakenly called, the "Lord's Day") as having N.T. sanction.

As a zealot for the traditions of his fathers, Paul would know all about the trivial things that were debated among the Jews with so much zeal—we read, for example, of a discussion as to "whether an egg laid on a festival might or might not be eaten" (Bitsah)—but, being delivered now from these tormenting scruples, and standing in the blessed freedom of grace, he sees in these Levitical and traditional observances, a menace to the gospel and to the believer's standing. He approaches the subject, however, rather differently in Romans from the way in which it is dealt with in Galatians.

In Galatians, the turning back to circumcision and Mosaic observances as being necessary for complete salvation and assurance, the Apostle regards as definitely antagonistic to the cross of Christ. He therefore writes:

> "Howbeit then, when ye knew not God, ye did service unto them which by nature are no gods. But now, after ye have known God, or rather are known of God, how turn ye again to the weak and beggarly elements, whereunto ye desire again to be in bondage? Ye observe days, and months, and times, and years. I am afraid of you, lest I have bestowed upon you labour in vain" (Gal. iv. 8-11).

To the Colossians, who were in danger of being cheated of their reward by teaching that cast doubt upon their completeness in Christ, the Apostle writes:

> "Let no man therefore judge you in meat, or in drink, or in respect of an holyday, or of the new moon, or of the sabbath days: which are a shadow of things to come, but the body is of Christ" (Col. ii. 16, 17).

In I Tim. iv. we find a further reference to "meats", in connection with the departure from the faith that characterizes the "latter times":

> "Forbidding to marry, and commanding to abstain from meats, which God hath created to be received with thanksgiving of them which believe and know the truth" (I Tim. iv. 3).

In Rom. xiv., the Apostle's attitude to these things is less severe than in Galatians, for their observance was not being insisted upon in Romans as vital to salvation, though they were spoiling the free and full reception of fellow-believers.

The Apostle asserts the believer's right to liberty, but at the same time he warns the "strong" against censoriousness, and the "weak" against despising. It is evident that his own sympathies are with the strong, but he makes it clear that "we then that are strong ought to bear the infirmities of the weak, and not to please ourselves" (Rom. xv. 1).

He meets the difficulties of the situation by a threefold argument:

(1) God hath received him.
(2) God is able to make him stand.
(3) Each must be fully persuaded in his own mind.

The Apostle has more to say about this matter, in Rom. xiv. 13-21, but before he discusses such questions as whether a thing is clean or unclean in itself, he turns the reader's attention to a very serious aspect of the question: namely, that in thus judging another, the believer is usurping the prerogative of his Lord. This aspect of the Apostle's teaching we must take up in our next article. Meanwhile, it would be salutary for us all to examine ourselves in the light of this chapter, and see just how far "days" and "meats" enter into our own conception of Christian worship, doctrine and practice.

"The Both"; "The Twain"; "The Joint Body";
Who are they, and what do these words imply?

#1. Introduction.
pp. 193 - 199

The article which we introduce with this brief note, is from the pen of an old friend and fellow-believer, Mr. A. A. J. Woodley. His suggestive exposition of Eph. ii. appears to us to be inevitable, if once we adopt the view which we have advocated in the Berean Expositor, namely, that John's Gospel was not written for the Jew, but was written in the light of the revelation of the mystery, and probably after Paul's course had finished.

Neither Mr. Woodley nor ourselves find "The Mystery" in John's Gospel, but no one can read the Lord's words recorded in John xviii. 21: "That they may be one; as Thou, Father, art in Me, and I in Thee, that they also may be one in us", and not recognize a unity that rises to the heights usually associated with the Epistles to the Ephesians and Colossians. We feel sure that our readers will appreciate Mr. Woodley's pioneer spirit, and we hope to follow this introductory article with a series that will expand and further confirm the note here struck (Editor).

"The assembly, which is His Body" (Eph. i. 22, 23).

"For HE is our PEACE, Who hath made BOTH ONE . . . . ." (Eph. ii. 14).

". . . . . for to make (in order the HE might create) IN HIMSELF of TWAIN, ONE NEW MAN, so making PEACE; and that HE might reconcile BOTH unto GOD in ONE BODY by the cross . . . . ." or as Dr. Rotherham's translation reads: "That THE TWO He might create IN HIMSELF into ONE MAN OF NEW MOULD . . . . ." (Eph. ii. 15, 16).

"For THORUGH HIM we BOTH have access by ONE SPIRIT unto the FATHER" (Eph. ii. 18).

"Ye are . . . . . FELLOW-CITIZENS WITH THE SAINTS, and of the HOUSEHOLD OF GOD" (Eph. ii. 19).

". . . . . if ye have heard of the dispensation of the grace of God which has been given to me you-ward: How that by revelation HE made known to me the mystery . . . . . THAT THE GENTILES SHOULD BE Joint-HEIRS, Joint-BODY, Joint-PARTAKERS of His promise (the promise) IN CHRIST by the gospel" (Eph. iii. 2, 3, 6).

"ONE BODY, and ONE SPIRIT, even as ye were also called in ONE HOPE of your calling, ONE LORD, ONE FAITH, ONE BAPTISM, ONE GOD AND FATHER OF ALL, WHO IS OVER ALL, AND THROUGH ALL, AND IN ALL" (Eph. iv. 4, 5, 6).

"For the perfecting of the SAINTS (see Eph. ii. 19) for the work of the ministry, for the edifying (upbuilding) of the BODY OF CHRIST" (Eph. iv. 12).

"For we are members of HIS BODY . . . . ." (Eph. v. 30, 31, 32; "of His flesh and His bones" not in Texts).

"Giving thanks unto the Father, that hath made you sufficient for your share IN THE INHERITANCE OF THE SAINTS IN THE LIGHT" (Col. i. 12).

"And let the PEACE OF GOD rule in your hearts, to the which ye are also called in ONE BODY; and be ye thankful" (Col. iii. 15).

"For our CITIZENSHIP in the heavens hath its rise" (Phil. iii. 20).

". . . . . each regarding not his own (interest, gifts, advantages, etc.), but each those of others also . . . . ." (Phil. ii. 4).

"And did not HE make ONE? (make of TWAIN ONE FLESH?) Yet had He the residue of the Spirit. And wherefore ONE? That He might seek a godly seed" (Mal. ii. 15).

"THE BOTH"; "THE TWAIN". -- Who are they?

Who are the "Joint-HEIRS", "Joint-BODY", "Joint-PARTAKERS" with US GENTILES?

Who are the "SAINTS" in Eph. ii. 19?

Does Scripture give us the answers to these questions? I believe it does, and what I am writing in these notes sets out what I see, by God's grace, He would have me learn. As, however, fellow-students of God's Word may not have arrived at the same answers in the searching of the Word, I am seeking their help, either in confirmation or rejection of the findings here set forth; in either case, may I humbly ask for all the scriptures on which their findings rest. I think I have set out the bulk of Scripture passages which prove the existence of two bodies or assemblies which are in Him created into One.

I think we can all agree that the above questions are only partially answered by reference to the position of JEW (i.e., ISRAEL) and GENTILE before and since Christ came. After prayerfully and carefully searching the Word of God, one feels that there is no doubt that the clear statement:

"In order that He might create in Himself of TWAIN ONE new man," refers to a future creation, when two bodies or assemblies, one mainly Jewish and the other mainly Gentile, are made ONE in Christ. As Rom. x. and other passages tell us Jew and Gentile are precisely on the same footing, "there is no distinction" as regards salvation (verse 12), therefore the mystery made known by revelation to Paul "That the Gentiles should be joint-heirs, joint-body, joint-partakers of the promise in Christ by the gospel" is something much more, even that which God would make known to His saints or saved ones of this dispensation (Col. i. 26, 27). The great majority of saved ones ever since Paul made known the mystery have followed the example of those to whom he himself declared it, as stated in II Tim. i. 15; iv. 16, 17, preferring to choose for themselves what they think is their calling and hope rather than by "rightly dividing the Word of truth", and by praying to God for His revelation (Eph. i. 17) to perceive by the Holy Spirit's teaching what is His calling and hope for them. Where we make our own choice there can be no full assurance, for it is only as God reveals His choice for us that we can have this. Paul says that he prays that this rejection of him (God's minister or apostle of this dispensation) and of his God-given message or gospel "may not be laid to their charge" (II Tim. iv. 16).

The "joint-body", composed of two heavenly callings, assemblies or bodies, is as regards the Gentile portion still being formed or built-up by the Holy Spirit in this "dispensation of the grace of God" given to Paul usward (Eph. iii. 2).

"The one new man": "The one body" is a new creation in Christ, when God's purposes have been completed concerning the forming of the "joint-body". The "holy temple in the Lord", in which both the heavenly "bodies" have their part, still awaits completion, for we read:

> "IN WHOM ye (Gentiles) also are being built in together for an habitation of God through the SPIRIT" (Eph. ii. 22).

Why should not Eph. iii. 6 and other passages mean exactly what they say? If we believe all as written, then the questions which arise in our minds and to which we must seek the answer of Scripture are:

(1) Who are the "SAINTS" of Eph. ii. 19?
(2) When are "THE BOTH" and "THE TWAIN" made "ONE", and how (i.e., under what human relationship does God illustrate this "CREATION IN CHRIST INTO ONE NEW MAN", so that we may grasp as much as the finite mind can do of spiritual realities).
(3) Can we trace in Scripture the "TWO" BODIES forming the "JOINT-BODY", which IN CHRIST will be made into "ONE" BODY? And if so, does God name them?

(1) We can deal with questions 1 and 3 together. We know that the word "saints" has not the same meaning in all its occurrences in Scripture, but we have to be guided by the context. As regards Eph. ii. 19, Dr. Bullinger in his Lexicon says that the N.T. "saints" refer to "God's heavenly people", and we know that in connection with the Jew or Israel there is a heavenly as well as an earthly calling, even as there is in connection with Gentiles in this dispensation. I Cor. xv. 40 tells us that those who are members of the heavenly callings will have "heavenly bodies", those on the new earth "bodies earthy", and verse 41 points out that there will be differences in position "IN GLORY", even as the passages we are considering point the complete oneness of all in Christ and in God.

In Eph. iv. 13 the goal set before us Gentiles who are members of "His body" is "a perfect or full-grown MAN" in Christ; it is also spoken of as a "new man" in Eph. iv. 24 and Col. iii. 10.

In II Cor. xi. 2 Paul, speaking in his earlier ministry to that other assembly or body, mainly Jewish, formed in Christ, says: "I have espoused (betrothed) you to one husband, that I may present you as a chaste virgin to Christ", and in Revelation we learn of a heavenly people or assembly designated "the bride".

(2) We have therefore two heavenly "bodies" or "assemblies" brought to our notice as a perfect or new man and as a bride, respectively, and in Revelation we read:

> "Blessed are they which are called to the MARRIAGE SUPPER OF THE LAMB" (Rev. xix. 9).

which reveals the fact that in addition to the perfect or new man (bridegroom) and the bride, there are "others" called and blessed with the "both made one", and the "creation in himself of the twain into one man, making peace". As to those others who by God's grace are "called to the marriage supper of the lamb", I would ask all to read the very helpful exposition on "bridal relationships" etc., given by the Editor in Volume XX, pages 139-142, which helps us to see that "the many" who now "look for" the blessings and promises connected with the bride assembly or body, may have their part in one of these "bridal relationships", for no one can find any scriptural authority for declaring that the revelation of God made known to Paul concerning "The dispensation of the Mystery", the calling out of "The assembly which is His Body" to be make known to God's saved ones in this dispensation, offers to all the choice of one of two heavenly callings, bodies or assemblies, for Col. i. 26, 27 very clearly defines and limits the particular heavenly calling which "God would make known to His saved ones" in this dispensation, and if we would see what further provision is made by God's wondrous grace for "us, sinners of the Gentiles", we must turn to the further revelation recorded by God through John, after Paul and his ministry had been rejected, for it is there we learn, as the Editor pointed out, that there are other companies or assemblies of "saved ones" to be associated with the two principal assemblies or bodies to be made "one in Christ".

The oneness in Christ of this joint-body (composed of Gentile and Jewish bodies or assemblies) is confirmed by the Holy Spirit under another figure or symbol, viz.: "A holy temple in the Lord" (Eph. ii. 19-22), for we read:

> "Hence then, ye (Gentiles) are no longer strangers and sojourners, but are FELLOW-CITIZENS OF THE SAINTS, and of THE HOUSEHOLD OF GOD, and are built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, JESUS CHRIST HIMSELF BEING THE CHIEF CORNER STONE, in Whom ALL THE BUILDING FITLY FRAMED TOGETHER, groweth unto a HOLY TEMPLE IN THE LORD, in Whom ye also are builded together for an habitation of God through THE SPIRIT."

In this "one new man" in Christ, we have the perfect (heavenly) man of Ephesians in place of the perfect earthy man (Adam) of Genesis, and the heavenly bride in place of the earthy bride of Genesis, and the Holy Spirit further helps us to see (as far as our finite sight is able) the complete unity and union of "the both" and "the twain", by quoting His own words of Gen. ii. 24. The "old creation" was "one flesh, one breath" (Gen. ii. 24; Eccl. Iii. 19); the new creation in Christ becomes "one body, one spirit" (Eph. iv. 4). Satan brought about the ruin and fall of God's perfect, natural or earthy man, with his "joint-body" or woman, as she is called, created "one flesh", but instead of frustrating the purpose of God, God so works through Christ that in Him "at His appointed time" He creates "one new man", who is not only in the likeness and image of God, but who has been made "partaker of the divine nature", a heavenly or spiritual man instead of an earthy man.

As by God's grace He gives us some glimpses of His manifold (infinitely diversified) wisdom in the unfolding of His purposes of grace, we learn in Eph. iii. 10 that God is also making known "His manifold wisdom" to principalities and powers in heavenly places by the assembly which is His Body, forming part of a "joint-body" (Eph. iii. 6).

The statement of Eph. iii. 6 that "His Body" of Eph. i. 22, 23, composed mainly of Gentiles "should be joint-heirs, joint-body, joint-partakers of the promise of Christ by the gospel" clearly shows that the One Body of Eph. iv. 4 is the fulfillment of Eph. ii. 16, and that the names or titles of assemblies, such as "The assembly which is His Body", cannot mean exactly the same as "One Body" in Eph. iv. 4. The Holy Spirit does not call "His Body" "The assembly which is One Body", and although most of us have used the expression "The One Body", for "His Body" (knowing what we each referred to) yet as we now look carefully at all God says concerning "His Body", a "Joint-Body", and "One Body", we cannot believe the Holy Spirit intends us to use all as meaning "His Body" only, for by so doing we must confuse ourselves. We have the same unity brought before us in the "two folds" of John x. 16, or rather, as the Scripture expresses it:

> "And other sheep I have which are not of this fold: them also I must bring, and they shall hear My voice; and there shall be one flock and one shepherd."

In case any who read these notes should at first sight hastily conclude that by suggesting that Scripture teaches the forming of a "joint-body", to be created in Him into "One Body", or "One New Man", we are detracting from the glorious calling and hope, or position of "The assembly which is His Body", as set forth in Ephesians, we would ask them to first consider whether Adam lost anything of what God had given him, or of his position, by his becoming "one flesh" with Eve, and whether being made one flesh in any way deprived either from fulfilling the purposes for which each was created, or from entering into all that God had provided for them both individually and collectively.

Phil. ii. 4 tells us to "look on the things of others", and in this connection it will do no harm for us to read again our Lord's words in John xvii. concerning those whom we believe are members of that "other" assembly, or our "join-body, joint-heirs, joint-partakers" with us "of the promise in Christ by the gospel":

> "Neither pray I for these alone, but for them also which shall believe on Me through their word, that they all may be ONE, as Thou, FATHER, art in ME, and I in THEE, THAT they also may be one in us, and the glory which Thou gavest ME I have given them, THAT THEY MAY BE ONE, EVEN AS WE ARE ONE: I IN THEM AND THOU IN ME, THAT THEY MAY BE MADE PERFECT IN ONE . . . . . FATHER, I WILL THAT THEY ALSO, WHOM THOU HAST GIVEN ME, BE WITH ME WHERE I AM" (John xvii. 20-24).

Where can we find greater oneness than here expressed. It passes our understanding, yet such are the exceeding riches of His grace in His kindness towards us through Christ Jesus (Eph. ii. 7) that we (Gentiles) "chosen in Him before the overthrow of the world" as members of "His Body" should be formed into a "joint-body" with those for whom He was specially praying in John xvii., to be created with them in Him into "One Body", and be brought with them into this knowledge-surpassing unity and oneness in the trinity (A. A. J. Woodley).

#2. The Mystery, exclusive in its calling, but permitting relationship with members of other callings, such as that of the Bride.

pp. 228 - 230

The reader will remember, we trust, the suggestive article written by our brother, Mr. A. A. J. Woodley, which appeared on page 193. We propose now a series of articles in which the main idea suggested there should be examined, developed and further substantiated. To do this, it will be necessary first for one or two preliminary phases of truth to be reaffirmed.

The Mystery—What it is not.

(1) The "Mystery" is not the inclusion of the Gentile in the scheme of salvation by grace. This needs no extended proof. It is implied in the promise to Abraham referred to in Gal. iii.:

> "The Scripture, foreseeing that God would justify the heathen (Gentile) through faith, preached before the gospel unto Abraham, saying, In thee shall all nations be blessed" (Gal. iii. 8).

(2) The "Mystery" is not the opening up of the heavenly sphere. The heavenly calling (Heb. iii. 1), the heavenly gift (Heb. vi. 4), the heavenly country (Heb. xi. 16), and the heavenly Jerusalem (Heb. xii. 22) form no part of the "Mystery", though it is true that the exclusive sphere to which the blessings of the "Mystery" belong is described as "in heavenly places". Before the Mystery was made known, the Apostle could speak, in his epistle to the Corinthians, of "heavenly" bodies, and the bearing of a "heavenly" image (I Cor. xv. 48, 49).

The "Mystery" is a term which represents a new dispensational dealing with the believer, consequent upon the setting aside of Israel and the temporary suspension of Israel's hope, both earthly and heavenly. This new calling does not arise out of any promise made to Abraham or to the fathers, but goes back "before the overthrow of the world" (Eph. i. 3, 4), and "before age-times" (II Tim. i. 9). It was God's foreknown method of filling the gap occasioned by Israel's foreknown rejection, but, inasmuch as He did not choose to incorporate this gracious plan within the scope of O.T. prophecy and O.T. covenants, the calling and hope of Gentile believers during this present interval in the working out of the purpose of the ages is referred to as the dispensation of the mystery. This calling is described as "The church which is His body" and the sphere of its blessings is said to be "in heavenly places", "far above all principality" a sphere to be entered into and enjoyed when this Church shall be "manifested" with Christ in glory.

But the fact that the Church of the Mystery has its own time period, its own sphere, its own constitution, and its own hope does not isolate it from the rest of the redeemed. It still belongs to that one great association of the saved which constitutes "the whole family" and it is named with the same family name (Eph. iii. 15).

The Bride.—Israel as a nation is spoken of as a divorced wife, who, by God's infinite mercy, shall at length be restored; but the Bride is an elect company, made up partly of Israel and partly of Gentile believers, call through the ages from the time of Abraham (who looked for the "heavenly city") onwards, and including such as the Galatian believers ("Jerusalem above" being their "mother") and the Corinthian saints ("presented as a chaste virgin to Christ"). This calling does not necessitate the presence of Israel as a nation, and many believers to-day apparently find in the Bride and the Heavenly Jerusalem all their hope and desire.

The Gospel according to John.—The Gospel according to John was written after Paul had finished his course, and the dispensation of the Mystery had been made known. We have sought to demonstrate the relationship between Paul's epistles to the Ephesians and Colossians, and John's Gospel in the form of a chart, and the reader who is not familiar with this is advised to consult Volume XXVII, page 126.

John's Gospel is distinguished from the other three by many fundamental differences. For instance, the opening prologue with its revelation concerning Christ as the "Word" is unique. Moreover, while Matthew shows the Lord's ministry as definitely limited to the "lost sheep of the house of Israel" (Matt. x. 6; xv. 24), John links it with the "world". While Matthew records the prohibition: "And into any city of the Samaritans enter ye not" (Matt. x. 5), John records that the Lord "must needs go through Samaria", and devotes considerable space to His conversation with the woman of Samaria and the conversion of the men of that city (John iv.). Moreover, the many explanations that John felt it necessary to give—explaining that the Passover was a feast of the Jews, explaining the existence of a feud between the Jews and the Samaritans, explaining even the meaning of the titles "Messiah" and "Rabboni", all these provide a definite proof that John had the Gentile in mind in writing his Gospel.

Mr. Woodley has drawn the reader's attention to the article in Volume XX, page 140, where the "Bridal relationships" of John's Gospel are dealt with. We will not attempt in this series to give an exposition of the marvelous unity that forms the subject of John xvii. 21-24—this must take its place in the exposition of John's Gospel which is being pursued in another series—but we cannot read the passage without realizing that we are very close here to the zenith of revealed truth. The glory that the Lord refers to here as being given to His believing people is the glory that He had with the Father "before the world was" (John xvii. 5), and we also find that this is the only occasion recorded in any of the Gospels on which the Saviour refers to the love of the Father that was His "before the foundation of the world" (John xvii. 24), a period intimately associated with the Mystery (Eph. i. 3, 4). The believing company of John xvii. were to "behold" the Lord's glory, and to share it, even as the Church of the Mystery looks forward to being "manifested with Him in glory" (Col. iii. 3, 4). While, therefore, the Body and the Bride, ministered to by Paul, the prisoner, and John, the aged apostle, are two distinct companies, there are many indications that lead us to believe that, though "two", they may yet be "one", just as a husband and wife, without losing their own individualities, can be pronounced "no more twain, but one flesh" (Matt. xix. 6: see also Eph. v. 31 and Eph. ii. 18).

In our next article we hope to consider the links which the Apostle has established between the Mystery and the period of Genesis that deals with Adam and creation before the fall.

The Eternal God is thy Refuge.

(Being a series of studies designed to encourage the believer in times of stress).

#1. The particular bearing of the word "eternal".

pp. 238 - 240

At the moment of writing these words, this nation is in a state of war. We recognize, of course, that both "war" and "peace", while the world rejects the Son of God, can be but relative terms. There was much real enmity during the days of so called "peace", and, conversely, there may be enjoyed, in the midst of conditions of war, a peace which the world can neither give nor take away. It has never been our policy to "meddle" with the affairs of nations (Deut. ii. 5), or the consciences of its readers, but rather to pursue a ministry which belongs to a sphere entirely removed from the things of earth, leaving its readers with the Word as the sole arbiter for all their actions. Nevertheless it is obviously true that we may learn from the things around us, and there are still occasions when the rebuke may be merited that the children of this generation are wiser than the children of light. Foreseeing the possibilities of conflict, the Government has, among other things, provided refuges for the protection of the people, and it is this fact that provides the theme of our present meditations. God also has foreseen and provided a refuge, and He Himself is set forth in the Word in this capacity. At other times, we should have felt called upon to spare no pains in acquainting the reader with structural analysis and other exegetical features, but as this series is intended to minister to the "present necessity", we shall in this case approach our subject more directly. The refuge is, so to speak, intended for immediate use, not to be taken to pieces and examined. The character of these short meditations will, therefore, differ somewhat from that of many of our other studies.

"The eternal God is thy refuge" (Deut. xxxiii. 27).

This is the covering title of the series, and takes us to the Fountain-head of all consolation, comfort and protection.

Moses must have had a reason for using the adjective "eternal" here. He could have said, with the Psalmist, "God is our refuge", or "The God of Jacob is our refuge", but he obviously intends to direct our attention, not only to God, but to some element in His character that is of particular relevance in connection with the need for a shelter, and its provision. The word "eternal" represents at least four different ideas in the Scriptures, and we must therefore acquaint ourselves with the facts.

Qedem, "eternal", means "to precede, to go before", and so at times conveys the thought of "anticipating" something before it happens, as may be seen in Jonah iv. 2, which Gesenius translates: "Thus I anticipated (the danger which threatens me) by fleeing to Tarshish."

"Of old" is also a frequent translation, and the words of Hab. i. 12: "Art Thou not from everlasting?" give a similar thought. The reader should not only remember that the "eternal" God is "from of old", for this of itself would not necessarily prove that He would be a refuge, but also that the word carries with it the idea of "being beforehand with anything", "anticipating the demand" and providing for it.

As with the word "eternal", so with the word "refuge", it represents a number of ideas. In Deut. xxxiii. 27, the word is meonah, from a root meaning "to dwell". This refuge is, therefore, a dwelling place. The same word is used for the "dwelling place" of God Himself (Psa. lxxvi. 2), and for the "dens" of wild beasts (Psa. civ. 22). In either case, the meaning is the same. It is a place that provides protection, and where one may feel secure.

The refuge provided for the people of God, is not to be conceived of in terms of concrete or steel, for immediately after the opening statement of Deut. xxxiii. 27 we read:

> "And underneath are the everlasting arms."

In our own language the word "arms" may have two different meanings, but there is no ambiguity in Deut. xxxiii. 27. The "everlasting arms" refer, not to armaments, but to the arms of the Lord, once "stretched out" to accomplish the deliverance of Israel (Deut. iv. 34; v. 15; vii. 19; ix. 29; xi. 2; xxvi. 8), and now stretched out in loving support, so that the weary child of God, forgetting all alarms, thinking not of unkindly steel or rough concrete, sinks into peaceful and secure rest in the arms of the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ.

> "The God Who is beforehand is thy refuge."

Things that be of God.

#1. The glory of God.
p. 39

If the righteousness of God be the irreducible standard according to which all things acceptable must conform, the glory of God is the goal and object towards which creation, old and new, must lead. In creation, "The heavens declare the glory of God", and in the new creation, in all its varied spheres, the glory of God is the ever present goal.

SIN IS THE COMING SHORT OF THE GLORY OF GOD (Rom. iii. 23).

JUSTIFICATION REVIVES THE HOPE OF THE GLORY OF GOD (Rom. v. 2).

The whole life of the believer should be lived in view of the glory of God (I Cor. x. 31), even as, in his original creation, he was made in the image and glory of God (I Cor. xi. 7). In contrast with the face of Moses which shone with a transient glory, the light of the glory of God is seen in the face of Jesus Christ (II Cor. iv. 6). Howsoever many may be the promises of God, in Christ is the Yea and the Amen, to the glory of God (II Cor. i. 20), and when at last every knee shall bow—in heaven and earth and under the earth—and when every tongue shall confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, that too shall be to the glory of God (Phil. ii. 11).

This is one of the things that be of God which must be kept steadily before the mind if doctrine, hope and practice are to be scriptural and well pleasing.

#2. Things that be of men contrasted.
p. 79

When our Saviour rebuked Peter for his attitude towards the great work of the Cross, He said:

> "Get thee behind Me, Satan . . . . . Thou savourest not the things that be of God, but those that be of men" (Matt. xvi. 23).

We may learn some important lessons from this severe rebuke. The "things that be of God" are most evidently opposite to the "things that be of men", and moreover, these "things of men" are but the opposition of Satan expressed through human lips. The words, "Thou savourest", in the original, have nothing to do with incense or offering, but are an example of the idiomatic use of the verb phroneo, "to think". The word phren, from which phroneo is derived, originally meant "the diaphragm, the region of the heart, the seat of the vital and mental powers", so that, although the verb phroneo means "to think, or understand", it is not entirely removed from the movements of affection, or bias, or inclination. There are instances of such a use in the Apocrypha: as, for example, "to take part with" and "to be well affected" (I Mac. x. 20, II Mac. xiv. 26). It should be our earnest prayer that we may ever "incline" and be "well affected" towards the "things that be of God", realizing that such an attitude will often be opposed to the "things that be of men".

Scripture does not veil the fact, that to many there is something very offensive about the doctrine of the cross, and we should realize how diametrically opposed are the "things of God" to the "things of men" in this particular.

The self-same word is used in Matt. xvi. and in Gal. v., to indicate the attitude of God and man to the cross.

> "Thou art an offence unto Me" (Matt. xvi. 23).
> "Then is the offence of the cross ceased" (Gal. v. 11).

In both places the Greek word is skandalon, a word which is translated many times "stumbling-block".

It is painfully evident from Phil. iii. that it was possible for a believer, by his walk, to become an "enemy" of the cross of Christ (Phil. iii. 18), and the message of the cross could be emptied of meaning by resorting to "wisdom of words" (I Cor. i. 17). There are many contrasts instituted by Paul between the things of God and the things of men, as for example the opening words of Gal. i. 1, or his attitude to "man's day" (I Cor. iv. 3), but this we can only suggest to the reader, space not allowing of further comment here.

#3. Grace.
p. 99

"The grace of God" is the characteristic of that gospel for which the apostle Paul was willing to live and to die (Acts xx. 24), and unto that grace of God he had been recommended at the beginning of his public ministry (Acts xv. 40), and which was still his stay when he became the Lord's prisoner (Eph. iii. 7).

The dispensation of the mystery, ministered by Paul as the prisoner of Jesus Christ for us Gentiles, was "the dispensation of the grace of God" (Eph. iii. 2), and this same grace of God which brings salvation, teaches us to "live . . . . . looking for that blessed hope" (Titus ii. 11-13).

Let us not forget that "grace" and "gratitude" are never far apart in the renewed mind.

#4. Righteousness.
p. 139

Whether we contemplate Creation, Law, or Gospel, one thing remains constant: the righteousness of God is maintained throughout all His works and ways. While it is a blessed fact that salvation springs from the love of God, it is so planned that it vindicates His righteousness, and provides also a righteousness for the guilty sinner who believes. In setting forth the Lord Jesus Christ as the propitiation, God was as much concerned that it should "declare His righteousness", as that it should provide a righteousness for the redeemed. The very power of the gospel resides in the fact that "therein the righteousness of God is revealed". To this end Christ died, the just for the unjust: and He Who knew no sin was made sin for us, that we might be made the righteousness of God in Him. The righteousness of God is absolutely essential, whether it be in doctrine, or in practice; it is one of the "things that be of God" without which all must be in vain and end in death.

#5. Power.
pp. 159, 160

The righteousness of God and the power of God are never separate in their motives. Might always subserves Right. When power to do is not under the control of Righteousness, then we have the conditions for the making of a Devil.

In the epistles of Paul, the power of God is associated with the cross (I Cor. i. 18), and with the gospel (Rom. i. 16). Peter assures the believer that this same power "keeps" (I Pet. i. 5), and provides all things that pertain unto life and godliness (II Pet. i. 3).

Resurrection is also intimately associated with the power of God. Christ "liveth by the power of God" (II Cor. xiii. 4), even as He was invested with power at His resurrection (Rom. i. 4). The resurrection of the believer is also assured by this same power (I Cor. vi. 14), as also is the ability to walk in newness of life unto God (II Cor. iv. 7; xii. 9; xiii. 4; Eph. i. 19; Phil. iii. 10).

The reader should note that dunamis, "power", is closely related to the verb dunameo, "to be able", and that in some passages where the word "able" occurs, it is wise to substitute the word "power" in order to do justice to the original.

#6. Peace.
p. 160

In Isaiah we read that "the work of righteousness shall be peace" (Isa. xxxii. 17), and in Romans that "being justified by faith, we have peace with God" (Rom. v. 1). The righteousness of God is vitally associated with peace with God, peace from God, and the peace of God.

The peace of God is very near to the climax of Christian experience, but the Apostle leads to the ultimate goal when he passes from the peace of God (Phil. iv. 7) to the God of peace (Phil. iv. 9). This is but another example of the principle that is at work throughout the purpose of the ages.

The righteousness of God is to lead to the God of Righteousness; the salvation of God is to lead to the God of Salvation; the glory of God is to lead to the God of Glory; and the peace of God is but a step on the way to the goal of all fellowship: "The God of peace shall be with you."

The only references to "the peace of God' in the N.T. are Phil. iv. 7 and Col. iii. 15, both occurrences being in a practical setting. The word "rule" in Col. iii. 15 is brabeuo, "To act as umpire, judge, or president in the Greek games", and is cognate with brabeion, "the prize" (I Cor. ix. 24 and Phil. iii. 14), and katabrabeuo, "to beguile of reward" (Col. ii. 18). No one who "contends for the mastery" can hope to attain to the prize of our high calling who is not continually under the influence of this most important of the "things that be of God".

#7. Help.
p. 220

The apostle Paul, at different times, attributed his continuance and successful ministry, to the grace of God, to the mercy of God, or to the power of God. Once he used a military figure when he said to Agrippa, a military man:

> "Having therefore obtained help of God, I continue unto this day" (Acts xxvi. 22).

The word "help" used here by the Apostle occurs nowhere else in the N.T. It signifies military assistance, and is derived from koros, which means a young person. The element of youth however must not be unduly pressed any more than the word "infant" must be unduly pressed in the military term "infantry". The idea behind the figure used by Paul is, that he was permitted to conduct his campaign with a fair amount of freedom of action, but that he knew that whenever the pressure of the foe demanded it, there was always available that "additional military aid" which in so many human campaigns has turned the tide of battle and ensured victory.

Let us not under-estimate the psychological influence this ever available aid must have upon the servant of the Lord, even when the battle is at its fiercest or victory nowhere in sight.

The truth of God contrasted with the lie and Unfaithfulness.
p. 220

The truth of God is in solemn contrast with "the lie" in Rom. i. 25, and with unfaithfulness in Rom. iii. 7. The former reference deals with the nature of the Godhead; the Creator as contrasted with the creature, the incorruptible God as compared with corruptible man, "the truth" as contrasted with "the lie". In Rom. iii. 1-8 the faithfulness of God to all His Word is in view; the God Who cannot lie, Who changes not, even though His chosen people fail. The Hebrew word for "faith" is the Greek word "Amen".

#8. The life of God.
p. 240

Paul, in his ministry, makes fourteen references to God as “The living God”, also of “The life of Jesus”, and of “Christ Who is our life”, but once only does he speak of “The life of God”, and that in Eph. iv. 18. In fact verse 18 contains the only reference to “life” (zoe) in the epistle. In Scripture, emphasis may be produced by repetition, but sometimes a truth stands out on the page of Scripture by the mere fact of its isolation. Here is such a statement. The Gentiles had become alienated from the life of God by reason of the ignorance that was in them. Here is one of the things of God, without which neither righteousness nor grace, peace nor glory, are of any avail. What this “life of God” involves, and how it is associated with “ignorance” is a theme that demands most sober thought. Praise be to God for “Christ our Life”.

The Volume of the Book.

#31. The Greek Text of the Revised Version. Is it trustworthy?

pp. 121 - 125

In Volumes XXIII and XXIV we endeavoured to draw the reader's attention to several features of importance that justify the use of the R.V. as one of many aids to the understanding of the Word of God. We sought to be as fair as possible in our presentation, but we feel that unless this commendation is associated with a warning, some may be led to a fuller acceptance of the R.V. than we can conscientiously advocate.

The R.V. must be considered from two points of view: (1) The changes that have been made in the English translation. (2) The changes that have been made in the Greek text.

The second consideration is the more serious and far-reaching in its consequences. In direct disobedience to their instructions, the Revisers have forced upon the church a new Greek Text, a text virtually imposed upon them by Drs. Westcott and Hort, a text circulated among them privately and under a vow of secrecy, a text never submitted to the publicity and open examination which such a subject demands. The rule under which the Revisers undertook their task, so far as the Greek text is concerned, reads:

> "To introduce as few alterations as possible into the Text of the Authorized Version, consistently with faithfulness."

The condition enjoined was that, whenever "decidedly preponderating evidence" compelled a change in the text, it should be indicated in the Margin. Dean Burgon asks, with every reason for his astonishment:

> "Will it be believed that this notwithstanding, not one of the many alterations which have been introduced into the original text is so commemorated? On the contrary: singular to relate, the Margin is disfigured throughout with ominous hints that had 'Some ancient authorities', 'Many ancient authorities', 'Many very ancient authorities' been attended to, many more changes might, could, would, or should have been introduced into the Greek Text than have been actually adopted."

Before proceeding, we must put the reader in possession of a few outstanding facts concerning the Greek Text so that he may duly appreciate the gravity of the situation brought about by the Revised Text of the R.V.

If a comparison be made between the A.V. and the R.V. it will be found that there are 36,000 alterations.

Canon Cook, speaking of the Reviser's Text of the first three Gospels, says:

> "It is not too much to say that in nine passages out of ten—nay to go further—in every passage of vital importance as regards the integrity of Holy Scripture, the veracity of the sacred writers, and the records of our Lord's sayings, nearly all ancient versions, and with very few exceptions, all ancient Fathers, support the readings rejected by the Revisers."

Of the 36,000 alterations mentioned above, over 5,000 are definite changes of the Greek Text, and not a revision of the A.V. translation.

> "There is the idea in the minds of some people that scholarship demands the laying aside of the Authorized Version of the Bible and taking up the latest Revised Version. This is an idea, however, without any proper basis. The Revised Version is in large part in line with what is known as Modernism, and is peculiarly acceptable to those who think any change, anywhere or in anything, progress. Those who have investigated the matter, and are in hearty sympathy with what is evangelical, realize that this Revised Version is a part of the movement to 'modernize' Christian thought and faith and do away with the established truth" - (The Herald and Presbyter, July 16, 1924).

The dramatic discovery of the Sinaitic Manuscript (see Volume XXI, pages 169-176) gave it an importance that is not borne out by cool examination, and much the same can be said of the famous Vatican Manuscript. These two, the Sinaitic and the Vatican Manuscripts, practically dominate the R.V.

Dr. B. Warfield writes:

> "I have been surprised, in comparing the R.V. with other versions, to find how many changes, which are important and valuable, have been anticipated by the Rhemish translation which now forms a part of what is known as the Douay Bible . . . . . And yet a careful comparison of these new translations with the Rhemish Testament, shows them, in many instances, to be simply a return to this old version, and leads us to think that possibly there were as finished scholars 300 years ago as now, and nearly as good apparatus for the proper rendering of the original text."

Before we commit ourselves to an unreserved acceptance of the Greek Text of the R.V., we must pause and consider whether after all it may not be but the rising to the surface of some of the errors perpetuated in the Romish Version, to the undermining of truth. The veneration paid to the Vatican Manuscript may perhaps be the veneration, not of truth, but of tradition. Hemphill writes:

> "In fact nine tenths of the countless divisions and textual struggles around that table in the Jerusalem Chamber arose over Hort's determination to base the Greek N.T. on the Vatican Manuscript."

Cardinal Wiseman exulted openly that the A.V. had been thrust aside and the pre-eminence of the Vulgate re-established through the influence of his attacks and those of other textual critics (see Wiseman: Essays Vol. I, page 104).

We must devote a separate article to the question of Westcott and Hort's Greek Text. In the present article we want to survey the subject from a wider angle.

It has been too readily assumed that the scholars of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries were in possession of material for the revision of the Greek text that warrants the setting aside of the Received Text upon which the A.V. is based.

Kenyon, whose connection with the Department of Manuscripts at the British Museum lends weight to his words, writes:

> "A correspondent of Erasmus in 1533 sent that scholar a number of selected readings from Codex B (The Vatican MS) as a proof of its superiority to the received Greek Text."

Erasmus, however, rejected the readings of the Vatican Manuscript because he considered the massive evidence of his day proved the Received Text to be correct.

When Constantine in A.D.312 adopted the Christian faith, as it was then presented, and had to choose between the conflicting editions of the Greek Text that were in use in his day, he had before him three types of manuscript.

(1) The Constantinopolitan. This is the Received Text of the A.V.
(2) The Palestinian or Eusebio-Origen.
(3) The Egyptian of Hesychius.

The defenders of the Constantinopolitan text were the humbler classes. The Eusebio-Origen text was intermingled with philosophy. Constantine adopted this as the official text and asked Eusebius to prepare fifty copies. The Vatican Manuscript belongs to this group; many authorities believe that it is one of the actual copies, and that the Sinaitic is another. (See Swete, Intro. to O.T. in Greek; Dr. I. M. Price, The Ancestry of our English Bible; A. T. Robertson, Intro. To Textual Criticism).

Scrivener in his introduction writes:

> "That the worst corruptions, to which the New Testament has ever been subjected, originated within a hundred years after it was composed; that Irenæus (A.D.150) and the African Fathers, and the whole Western, with a portion of the Syrian Church, used far inferior manuscripts to those employed by Stunica or Erasmus, or Stephens thirteen centuries later, when moulding the Textus Receptus (i.e. The Text of the A.V.)."

In spite, however, of the prestige of Constantine's adopted version it was unable to hold its own, and what is now called the Received Text (the Greek Text of the A.V.) early became the Bible of the Greek Empire, Syria, North Italy, South France and the British Isles.

The Syriac Version (A.D.150) follows the Received Text.

> "The Old Latin Versions were used longest by Western Christendom who would not bow to the authority of Rome."

The two main streams of Greek Manuscripts and their relation to the two versions may be set out as follows:

A. V.	R. V.
The Received Text (Greek).	Sinaiticus and Vaticanus (Greek).
Waldensian Bible (Italic).	Vulgate (Latin). Rome's Bible
Erasmus. Received text restored.	French, Spanish, Italian from the Vulgate.
Luther. Dutch, French, Italian from the R.T.	Rheims. English from the Vulgate Jesuit Bible of A.D.1582.
Tyndale A.D.1535 (English) from the R.T.	Westcott and Hort.
The Authorized Version A.D.1611.	Vaticanus and Sinaiticus, R.V. 1881.

Tyndale translated from the text of Erasmus. Writing of this, Demaus said:

> "He was of course aware of the existence of Wycliff's version; but this as a bald translation from the Vulgate into obsolete English could not be of any assistance to one who was endeavouring 'simply and faithfully' so far as God had given him the gift of knowledge and understanding, to render the N.T. from the original Greek into proper English" - (Demaus, "William Tyndale").

The reader, however much he may have to admit ignorance of the principles of textual criticism, or however firmly he may have been persuaded to accept the Vatican Manuscript as of greater authority than the Received Text, will at least be willing to admit that the matter cannot summarily settled. The question of the value of the R.V. must first of all turn upon the authority of the Revisers' adopted Text. Without pretending to deal with this matter as an expert, or for experts, we feel it incumbent upon us to set before the reader the claims that the Received Text still possesses, and to make clear the methods and the principles that led to the adoption of the Revisers' Greek Text.

May we earnestly ask our readers not to think lightly of this matter? It is our heritage, and the whole fabric of truth that is at stake. When we find Unitarians, Modernists and Romanisers holding the R.V. in preference to the A.V. it should make us pause, lest we be mistaking the chaff for the wheat.

#32. The Greek Text of the Revised Version. What are the Evidences?

pp. 175 - 179

There is no short cut to textual criticism. The need for personal and patient inspection of every original manuscript, painstaking tabulation and comparison, and many years of labour, as well as sound scholarship and critical acumen, makes textual criticism the service only of the few. We must, therefore, be prepared to accept the findings of others. On the other hand, we shall not easily allow any scholar or group of scholars to take from us the Greek New Testament which has been in use through the centuries, and substitute a text of their own, based upon one or two manuscripts of the fourth century, unless there is very strong evidence in favour of the change. The Revisers' Greek Text is largely that of the Vatican Manuscript, and we have a right to know upon what grounds this one manuscript is to be regarded as correct in preference to hundreds of other testimonies. It is not enough to speak of "authorities"; we must see the evidence. In all matters of textual criticism appeal must be made to the consent of antiquity; yet the oldest existing manuscript need not necessarily be the purest.

There are three instruments of textual criticism: (1) Copies, (2) Versions, (3) The Fathers.

(1) Copies.—Since the beginning of Christianity a great number of copies have been made and widely distributed. The very existence of these widely distributed copies is a most effective safeguard against fraud. Where anything like unanimity exists among thousands of such copies, we probably have the original text.

(2) Versions.—Not only were copies made of the original Greek, but the necessities of the case soon produced many versions in various languages. The old Peshito Syrian Version dates from the second century. While these translations do not present the original, they provide a most valuable check upon innovations, and where their evidence concurs the text is beyond dispute.

(3) The Fathers.—From the beginning, the Christian faith was attacked, and these attacks called forth an army of apologists, controversialists and teachers, whose writings cover the whole range of the sacred volume, so providing evidence of the text with which they were familiar.

Most of the copies of the Greek N.T. now in existence date from the 10th to the 14th centuries. They are copies of manuscripts older than themselves, and in the main are faithful presentations of the inspired originals. The testimony of these manuscripts, together with the evidence of the Versions and the witness of the Fathers, have been ruthlessly set aside in the R.V. in favour of one or two manuscripts, of which the chief are the Vaticanus and the Sinaiticus, which are assigned to the fourth century. To these may be added the Alexandrian (A), the rescript Codex designated C, and the Codex Bezæ (D).

> "Singular to relate, the first, second, fourth and fifth of these codices (B, Aleph, C, D), but especially B and Aleph, have within the last twenty years established a tyrannical ascendancy over the imagination of the Critics, which can only be fitly spoken of as a blind superstitution. It matters nothing that all four are discovered on careful scrutiny to differ essentially, not only from ninety-nine out of a hundred of the whole body of extant MSS besides, but even from one another. This last circumstance, obviously fatal to their corporate pretensions, is unaccountably overlooked" (Burgon).

If we take the two most important of these MSS, we find that they differ markedly on ever page. Collating them with the Received Text, in the Gospels alone we find the followings:

> "The Vaticanus is found to omit at least 2877 words; to add 536, to substitute 935; to transpose 2098; to modify 1132 (in all 7578)—the corresponding figures for the Sinaiticus being severally 3455, 839, 1114, 2299, 1265 (in all 8972). And be it remembered that the omissions, additions, substitutions, transpositions and modifications, are by no means the same in both. It is in fact easier to find two consecutive verses in which these two MSS differ the one from the other, than two consecutive verses in which they entirely agree" (Burgon).

Bishop Ellicott, the Chairman of the Revisionists, speaks of these four manuscripts as follows:

> "The simplicity and dignified conciseness of the Vatican Manuscript (B); the great expansiveness of our own Alexandrian (A); the partially mixed characteristics of the Sinaitic (Aleph); the paraphraistic tone of the singular codex Bezæ (D) are now brought home to the student" (Considerations on Revision 1870).

Dean Burgon asks:

> "Could ingenuity have devised severer satire than such a description of four professing transcripts of a book: and that book, the everlasting gospel itself?"

Dean Burgon suggests that the reader should take a copy of the Greek N.T., using Lloyd's edition, and turn to page 189, which contains ten verses of Luke's Gospel (chapter viii. 35-44). Upon collating the five codices, the following result is obtained:

> "A stands alone twice, B 6 times, Aleph 8 times; C 15 times; D 93 times . . . . . AB, stand together by themselves once; Aleph C once; C D once . . . . . Lastly, they are never once found to be in accord in respect to any single various reading. Will any one, after a candid survey of the premises, deem us unreasonable, if we avow that such a specimen of the concordia discors which everywhere prevails between the oldest uncials, but which especially characterizes Aleph, B, D, indisposes us greatly to suffer their unsupported authority to determine for us the text of Scripture?"

Bishop Ellicott's view was that the best way of proceeding with the work of revision was "to make the Textus Receptus the standard, departing from it only when critical or grammatical considerations show that it is clearly necessary".

Lachmann, Tregelles and Tischendorf, however, followed a different line:

> "Lachmann's text seldom rests on more than four Greek codices, very often on three, not infrequently on two, sometimes on only one" (Scrivener).

Tregelles, whose indefatigable industry and conscientious labour surpass all praise, nevertheless adopted Lachmann's leading fallacy and so spoilt his work. He persuaded himself that eighty-nine ninetieths of our extant manuscripts and other authorities could safely be rejected.

> "The case of Dr. Tischendorf (proceeds Bishop Ellicott) is more easily disposed of. Which of this most inconstant critic's texts are we to select? Surely not the last, in which an exaggerated preference for a single manuscript which he has had the good fortune to discover, has betrayed him into an almost child-like infirmity of critical judgment . . . . ."

The last to enter the field of textual criticism were Drs. Westcott and Hort, who confess that they "have deliberately chosen on the whole to rely for documentary evidence on the stores accumulated by their predecessors, and to confine themselves to their proper work of editing the text itself".

These Editors take the Vaticanus as their standard together with its combinations with the other primary Greek manuscripts. But, as Dean Burgon pertinently asks:

> "Did it ever occur to these learned men to enquire how the Septuagint Version of the Old Testament has fared at the hands of Codex B (The Vatican Manuscript)? They are respectfully invited to address themselves to this very damaging enquiry."

The readings of the Sinaiticus and the Vaticanus combined may safely be accepted as genuine, say Westcott and Hort. But what is to be done when these two manuscripts disagree? The answer is, that one takes the Vaticanus and any other primary manuscript that agrees, as giving the true text because "on the closest scrutiny" they generally "have the ring of genuineness", and hardly ever "look suspicious after full consideration".

With reference to the varied readings in Mark ii. 1-12 of the five manuscripts held in such veneration by Westcott and Hort, Dean Burgon asks:

> "What would be thought in a court of law of five witnesses, called up 47 times for examination, who should be observed to bear contradictory testimony every time?"

On the surface, then, it appears that these five oldest manuscripts are not trustworthy witnesses: and on closer investigation their testimony betrays the baseness of their origin. Upon evidence such as this, in spite of the overwhelming unanimity of ancient copies and versions, the R.V. would rob the Lord of His glory and the Church of the truth in such a passage as I Tim. iii. 16.

When we learn that among the Revisionists was G. Vance Smith, a Unitarian Minister, and read the following extracts from the writings of Westcott and Hort concerning such important matters as Darwinism, Mariolatry and Romanism, we cannot help feeling that such leanings must surely have coloured much of their labours on the Greek Text.

"My feeling is strong that the theory (Darwin's) is unanswerable. If so, it opens up a new period" (Dr. Hort, 1860).

"I wish I could see to what forgotten truth Mariolatry bears witness" (Dr. Westcott to Archbishop Benson, 1865).

"You know I am a staunch sacerdotalist" (Hort to Lightfoot).

"The pure Romish view seems to me nearer, and more likely to lead to, the truth than the Evangelical . . . . . we dare not forsake the sacraments or God will forsake us" (Dr. Hort, 1868).

These are the views of the men who have imposed upon us in the R.V. the text of the Vatican Manuscript.

Bishop Wilberforce, the first Chairman of the Revision, wrote: "What can be done in this most miserable business?" He absented himself and did not take part in the proceedings.

Samuel Hemphill gives a vivid account of the dominating character of Westcott and Hort and their ruthless methods.

"A strong and united group of Progressives quickly manifested the determination to impress their principles, their ideals, and it may be added, their personalities fully upon the work. Their motto was 'Thorough', their goal was minute and detached perfection in the textual and grammatical departments; and no consideration for the mind of the outside public, if they ever seriously thought about feeling the throbbings of the public pulse at all, could deflect them by one hair's breadth from the effort to reach that goal. Deaf to the pleadings and remonstrances of the conservatives, who fondly hoped to confine the company to the work of removing 'plain and clear errors' and passionately prophesied that the Revision if overdone would be a public failure, these zealous and 'fearless' men, pressed for an entire reconstruction of the Greek text on modern critical principles . . . . . a new type of text was incidentally and in passing elaborated and what was scarcely less serious, a new standard of 'faithfulness' in translation was set up.

Scrivener was one of the most assiduous of the Revisers, and never failed to state his case fully, but he found himself constantly in a minority, and was in truth very often voted down by sheer force of numbers, when Hort and Westcott opposed him as they generally did.

While he had been taught, by the actual work of collation to use these MSS (the Vatican and the Sinaitic) as only two out of many helps to the reconstruction of the primitive text, Hort and Westcott had persuaded themselves to regard their consentient voice as the one virtual final and infallible authority."

The seriousness of our quest we trust is evident. Which version is more trustworthy? We unhesitatingly say, the Authorized Version. We must reserve the examination of specific instances of the Revisers' handling of the sacred text for another article.

#33. The Greek Text of the Revised Version. The Revisers' Text, and the Voice of Antiquity.

pp. 230 - 233

Before we proceed to a consideration of one or two specimens of the Revisers' Greek Text, it may perhaps be advisable to give some idea of the methods adopted by Drs. Westcott and Hort in establishing their "Revised Greek Text of the New Testament". We should justly expose ourselves to a charge of presumption were we to attempt our own criticism of the theory adopted by these two Revisers, and we shall therefore quote instead from the writings of one whose name stands as high as any man's in the field of textual criticism—Prebendary Scrivener. Dr. Scrivener, who was himself one of the Revision Committee and a continual opponent of Drs. Westcott and Hort, has given an estimate of their theory that should cause all who value the truth, to hesitate very much before accepting the many alterations and omissions presented to us in the R.V. The following are some of his comments with reference to the system used by Drs. Westcott and Hort in constructing their "Revised Greek Text of the New Testament" (1881).

(1) "There is little hope for the stability of their imposing structure, if its foundations have been laid on the sandy ground of conjecture. And since barely the smallest vestige of historical evidence has ever been alleged in support of the views of these accomplished Editors, their teaching must either be received as intuitively true, or dismissed from our consideration as precarious and visionary."

(2) "Dr. Hort's system is entirely destitute of historical foundation."

(3) "We are compelled to repeat as emphatically as ever our strong conviction that the Hypothesis to whose proof he has devoted so many laborious years, is destitute not only of historical foundation, but of all probability."

(4) "We cannot doubt" (says Dr. Hort) "that S. Luke xxiii. 34 comes from an extraneous source". "Nor can we on our part doubt" (rejoins Dr. Scrivener) "that the system which entails such consequences is hopelessly self-condemned."

(Scrivener's "Plain Introduction", etc., Ed. 1883).

Let us weigh these words carefully. "The sandy ground of conjecture." Is this sufficient warrant for the change from the A.V. to the R.V. in I Tim. iii. 16? "Destitute of historical foundation." Is this the ground upon which our knowledge of the Word of God must rest? The Revisers were instructed not to meddle with the Greek Text except where the error was "plain and clear". Inasmuch as Dr. Scrivener was one of the Revisers together with Drs. Westcott and Hort, his sweeping condemnation should make us think carefully before accepting such a text as true. Others also of the Revision Committee have publicly repudiated any complicity in this matter, including Canon Cook, and Archdeacon Wordsworth. Dean Burgon, in the Dedication of his work on the Revisers' Text, writes as follows:

"It is, however, the systematic depravation of the underlying Greek which does so grievously offend me: for this is nothing else but a poisoning of the River of Life at its sacred source."

Later on, in his examination of the theory of Westcott and Hort, he writes:

> "Strange, that you should not perceive that you are the dupes of a fallacy which is even transparent. You talk of 'antiquity'. But you must know very well that you actually mean something different. You fasten upon three, or perhaps four, or two, or perhaps three—or one, or perhaps two—documents of the ivth and vth century. But then confessedly, there are one, two, three, or four specimens only of Antiquity, not 'Antiquity' itself. And what if they should prove to be unfair samples of Antiquity? Thus, you are observed always to quote Cod. B (The Vatican) or at least Aleph (The Sinaiticus). Pray, why may not the truth reside instead with A (The Alexandrian) or C (The Rescript) or R (The Bezae)? You quote the old Latin or the Coptic. Why may not the Peschito or the Sahidic be right rather? You quote either Origen or else Eusebius, but why not Didymus and Athanasius, Epiphanius and Basil, Chrysostom and Theodoret, the Gregories and the Cyrils? . . . . . It will appear therefore that we are every bit as strongly convinced as you can be of the paramount claims of 'Antiquity' but that, eschewing prejudice and partiality, we differ from you only in this, viz. that we absolutely refuse to bow down before the particular specimens of Antiquity which you have arbitrarily selected as the object of your superstition. You are illogical enough to propose to include within your list of 'Ancient Authorities' Cod. 1, 33 and 69—which are severally MSS of the xth, xith and xivth century. And why? Only because the Text of those 3 copies is observed to bear a sinister resemblance to that of Codex B (The Vatican). But then why, in the name of common sense, do you not show corresponding favour to the remaining 997 cursive copies of the N.T.—seeing that these are observed to bear the same general resemblance of Codex A (The Alexandrian)?"

Neither the reader nor the writer can be regarded as "textual critics". No mere intuition can ever constitute a qualification for such an important office. The only basis for true and stable progress towards the attainment of the original Greek text is the exact collation of all existing MSS, Versions, Fathers and Lectionaries. "We may safely keep our 'theories' back till we have collated our MSS, re-edited our Versions, indexed our Fathers. They will be abundantly in time then."

Before concluding this article, which is only intended to show the seriousness of unqualified acceptance of the R.V. Greek Text, we give in our own words Dean Burgon's summary.

Dr. Hort says of the text of Lachmann, made in 1831, that it is "the first founded upon documentary authority". We discover, however, that Lachmann arbitrarily swept aside "Antiquity" and relied on one or two MSS of the ivth and vth centuries. The Received Text (the text of the A.V.) edited by Erasmus (1516) and Stunica (1522), exhibits a traditional text "the general purity of which is demonstrated by all the evidence which 350 years of subsequent research have succeeded in accumulating; and which is confessedly the text of A.D.375".

In the "History of this Edition" of the R.V. Greek Text, there are many and serious occasions where "W" disagrees with "H". As Dean Burgon says:

> "We are reminded of what was wittily said concerning Richard Baxter, viz., that even if no one but himself existed in the church 'Richard' would still be found to disagree with 'Baxter', and we read with uneasiness that 'No individual mind can ever act with perfect > uniformity or free itself completely from its own idiosyncracies; and that the danger of unconscious caprice is inseparable from personal judgment" (page 17).

We do not wonder that the Dean continues:

> "May we be permitted without offence to point out (not for the first time) that 'idiosyncracies' and 'unconscious caprice' and the fancies of the 'individual mind' can be allowed no place whatever in a problem of such gravity and importance as the present."

It would be a weariness to most of our readers to continue with this theme. The theory upon which Drs. Westcott and Hort worked to produce their Greek Text is unsound. It depends upon assumptions and not evidences, and it arbitrarily sets up one or two MSS as standards to the discrediting of widely distributed evidences of even earlier dates. The reader who desires to pursue this subject further should read the Introduction written by Dr. Hort, and then Dean Burgon's searching criticism. We are convinced that by the time he has finished reading these, the additions and subtractions of the R.V. will weigh little with him unless confirmed by other evidences.

This is all we aim at in this series. We are not pretending to teach the principles of textual criticism, but simply to give sufficient evidence for accepting with extreme caution the unsupported readings of the Vatican and Sinaitic MSS which underlie the Text of the present Revised Version.

Wisdom; Human and Divine.

Being a comparison of the groping after the truth of the ancient philosophers with the truth as it is revealed in Scripture, in order that the believer may the better appreciate the Word of God.

#18. The Philosophies of New Testament Times. Stoicism, the Philosophy of Pride. Epicureanism, the Philosophy of Pleasure. Scepticism, the Philosophy of Indifference.

pp. 34 - 39

Our investigations into the history of philosophy bring us at last into actual contact with the philosophers mentioned in Scripture. Aristotle's successors were the Stoics and the Epicureans, and both of these schools are mentioned in Acts xvii.

Stoicism.

To the Stoic, the proper condition of the mind was expressed by the word apathy; to the Epicurean, by self-contentment; and to the Sceptic, by imperturbability or indifference. All three agreed that the only way to happiness was peace of mind, but they each sought it differently—the peace of apathy, the peace of self-contentment, and the peace of indifference. How the heart rejoices as one thinks of that "peace with God" which the justified believer possesses, through our Lord Jesus Christ, and that "peace of God", passing all understanding, that keeps the heart and mind through Christ Jesus. What a tremendous change, from the Stoic's peace of apathy to the believer's peace with God on account of the atoning sacrifice of Christ.

Zeno, the founder of the Stoics, taught that the real business of all philosophy is human conduct, and had little sympathy with the idealism and dialectic of Plato and his school. The keen interest in logic displayed by the Socratic school was not perpetuated by the Stoics. Indeed, one of them likened logic to the eating of lobsters—much trouble for little meat. This attitude was probably intensified by the abuse of logic among those whose paradoxes prove them to be clever but useless members of society.

> "Belonging to an age morally debased and politically oppressed, its founder, Zeno, conceived the idea of liberating himself, and all who were able to follow him, from the degeneracy and slavery of the age, by means of a philosophy which, by purity and strength of moral will, would procure independence from all external things and unruffled inward peace."

The hymn to Jove, written by the Stoic, Cleanthes, and quoted by Paul on Mars' Hill, shows how near at times these men came to the truth.

"Most glorious of the gods, immortal Jove!
Supreme, on earth beneath, in heaven above!
Thou great first cause, whose word is Nature's law,
Before thy throne we mortals bend in awe;
For we thine offspring are. To man is given—
To man alone—to lift a voice to heaven."

To "follow nature" and to "live in agreement with nature" constituted the moral principles of the Stoics, but their attitude must not be confused with that of the Epicureans, who made pleasure their guide and goal. The Stoic interpretation was to "live in agreement with your own rational nature, so far as it is not corrupted and distorted by art, and to exclude every personal end, consequently, the most personal—pleasure". What high ideals—but what poor material on which to work! There is, alas, a "corruption" and "distortion" deeper than that produced by "art", which makes the exhortation to "follow nature" a course that ends only in death. The words of the prophet:

> "We have turned every one to his own way, and the Lord hath laid on Him the iniquity of us all" (Isa. liii. 6).

contain truth concerning the nature of sin and the one and only remedy—a remedy that was unknown to Stoic philosophy.

The Apostle's words in Acts xx. 24: "None of these things move me, neither count I my life dear unto myself", would have gained the approval of the Stoic, but he would not have understood the Apostle's motive, which was "Christ and the gospel". The Stoics held that he only is good who is perfectly good. Their standard, however, was not God's law of righteousness, but "reason and nature". They affirmed that faultless moral action was only possible through the possession of entire virtue, a perfect perception of the good, and perfect power of realization. The apostle Paul could have told them, out of his own experience, how deep a gulf there is between "perfect perception" and "perfect power":

> "That which I do, I allow not; for that I would, what do I not, but what I hate, that do I . . . . . to will is present with me, but to perform that which is good I find not . . . . . O wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" (Rom. vii. 15-24).

F. W. Farrar writes of the Stoics as follows:

> "Aiming at the attainment of a complete supremacy, not only over their passions, but even over their circumstances—professing fictitious indifference to every influence of pain or sorrow,
>
> 'For there was never yet philosopher
> That could endure the toothache patiently' (Shakespeare).
>
> standing proudly alone in their unaided independence and self-asserted strength, the Stoics, with their vaunted apathy, had stretched the power of will until it cracked and shriveled under the unnatural strain; and this gave to their lives a consciousness of insincerity which, in the worst sort of them, degraded their philosophy into a cloak for every form of ambition and iniquity, and which made the nobler souls among them > melancholy with a morbid egotism and an intense despair. In their worst degeneracies Stoicism became the apotheosis of suicide, and Epicureanism the glorification of lust."

Epicureanism.

The watch-word of the Epicureans was pleasure, and morals were all explained in this light. The sailor who risked his life to save a stranger, the martyr who died for his faith, the profligate whose sensuality ruined the lives of others, were all actuated, according to Epicurus, solely by the "pleasure" they received. One can easily see how soon such a philosophy would spread its blight over the community. The Apostle probably had the Epicureans in mind when he spoke of those "whose god is their belly", for Metrodous asserted that everything good has reference to the belly. To demand virtue for its own sake they considered foolishness. According to the Epicurean view, only those who had pleasure as their aim had a real object in life. The Stoics and the Epicureans may be called the exponents of pride and pleasure, and each in their own way were necessarily enemies of the faith.

The Epicureans were materialists. The gods, if they existed, dwelt apart in complete indifference. The universe was but a thing of chance, and as there was no creator, there could be no moral governor, and no day of judgment. The idea of a resurrection was to them ridiculous; and, as the Apostle wrote: ". . . . . if the dead rise not? let us eat and drink; for to-morrow we die"—which was exactly what the Epicurean philosophy led to. To the Stoics also the idea of future reward or punishment was intolerable, so that we can appreciate the way in which the Apostle led up to the day of judgment, and the resurrection of the dead, when he spoke to these philosophers on Mars' Hill.

Paul could not have been ignorant of the fact that Socrates also had been arraigned before the Athenian Council at Areopagus on the charge of introducing strange gods, and had pleaded his own cause, as did the Apostle. The opening words of his defence were as follows:

> "Ye men of Athens (the same words as were used by the apostle Paul), I know not how you yourselves have been affected by my accusers; but I have well-nigh forgotten myself, so persuasively have they spoke. If you hear me defending myself in the same language that I am wont to use in the market place, where and elsewhere most of you have heard me, let me entreat you not to be surprised, or take it in ill part, for thus it is: now for the first time, at the age of more than seventy years, I appear at the bar of the court."

Socrates did not know the Saviour, or the blessed hope of resurrection, but he said to his judges: "I must obey God rather than you", and died for his teaching and his conscience. It certainly seems that the Apostle, who wrote of the Gentiles who have not the law (Rom. ii.), and of the period of Gentile ignorance that God winked at (Acts xvii.), would not have entertained any harsh views concerning the old philosopher who had stood years before in the same place.

Scepticism.

The one other system of philosophy with which we have to deal is Scepticism. The founder of this school was Pyrrho, who was associated with Alexander the Great. The fundamental doctrine of the Sceptics was the same as that of the Stoics and the Epicureans—namely, that "philosophy shall conduct us to happiness". The Sceptics held that what things really are, lies beyond the sphere of our knowledge. For all we know, the opposite of every proposition is still possible. In the circumstances, the true line for the philosopher is a complete suspension of judgment. His attitude was: "It is possible, it may perhaps be so, I know nothing for certain"—to which he was careful to add, "Nor do I even know for certain that I know nothing for certain". In this suspension of judgment, and in this alone, the Sceptic believed that tranquility was to be found.

Paul, as we have seen, bore his testimony before the Stoics and Epicureans. In the case of the Lord Himself, it was before the Sceptic, Pontius Pilate. When Pilate asked "Thos art a King then?" the Lord answered:

> "Thou sayest that I am a king. To this end was I born, and for this cause came I into the world, that I should bear witness unto the truth. Every one that is of the truth heareth My voice" (John xviii. 37).

To which Pilate replies: "What is truth?" Pilate did not ask this question in order to obtain an answer. His words were the words of a Sceptic, and were probably spoken with a sneer, and a contemptuous turn of the heel, without waiting for any answer, and believing that no answer was possible.

> "And when he had said this, he went out again unto the Jews, and saith unto them, I find in Him no fault at all" (John xviii. 38).

Here, before one of the basest products of the philosophy of the ages, stood the living Truth Himself, and yet the Jews combined with the Gentiles to put Him to death, choosing rather Barabbas.

Throughout this series we have but one aim—to do all that we can to impress the reader with the fact that the only true wisdom is the wisdom that comes to us in the living personal Christ. All else is but an unsuccessful groping in the dark. He alone solves the problem of Being and Becoming; of the First Cause and the Last Goal. He Himself is Alpha and Omega, the First and the Last, the Beginning and the End.

Like Asaph, we have vexed our souls in the schools of philosophy, and find no satisfaction or peace until at length we have gone into the sanctuary, and there we have seen the end. In the light of the birth at Bethlehem, the sacrifice of Calvary, and the resurrection from the sealed tomb, we see that which no philosopher could discover, and like Asaph we can say:

> "Whom have I in heaven but Thee? And there is none upon earth that I desire beside Thee" (Psa. lxxiii. 25).

It may be our glad task at a future date to draw the reader's attention to the actual philosophy of the Scripture themselves.

> "The darkness is past, and the true light now shineth" (I John ii. 8).
>
> "We know that the Son of God is come, and hath given us an understanding, that we may know Him that is true, and we are in Him that is true, even in his Son Jesus Christ. This is the true God, and eternal life" (I John v. 20).

(Concluded).

Words of Comfort.

#4. "Nevertheless Afterwards" (Heb. xii. 11).
pp. 77, 78

In the preceding three articles of this series we have seen that suffering and trial are (1) only for a season, (2) always for a reason, and (3) however manifold, are perfectly matched by manifold grace. Another thought which should be of comfort to the tried and tested believer is found in Heb. xii. 11: "Nevertheless afterwards." If we go back through this epistle, we shall find in every section a compensating "afterwards". The first section speaks of Christ being made "a little lower than the angels for the suffering of death", but what a blessed sequel is revealed—He Who was perfected through sufferings, becomes the Captain of Salvation leading many sons to glory (Heb. i., ii.). The next section speaks of Israel's wilderness experiences, and here again, while many failed of the grace of God and fell in the wilderness, there was a blessed "afterwards" for those who, like Caleb and Joshua, "wholly followed the Lord" (Heb. iii., vi.). And so throughout the Epistle.

Of all the examples of a blessed "afterwards" that Scripture provides, the case of Job stands out as one of the most striking. The Divine comment here, given in James v. 10, 11, is worthy of note:

> "Take, my brethren, the prophets, who have spoken in the name of the Lord, for an example of suffering affliction, and of patience. Behold, we count them happy which endure. Ye have heard of the patience of Job, and have seen the end of the Lord; that the Lord is very pitiful and of tender mercy."

If we consider the Apostle's experience as recorded in II Cor. xii., we find that he, too, passed through a bitter trial to realize the blessedness of God's "afterwards". His experiences followed so closely in the footsteps of his Lord, that we can truly speak of them, as we observe his three-fold request for deliverance, as the Apostle's Gethsemane.

> "For this thing I besought the Lord thrice, that it might depart from me. And He said unto me, My grace is sufficient for thee; for My strength is made perfect in weakness."

Then comes the "afterwards":

> "Most gladly, therefore, will I rather glory in my infirmities, that the power of Christ may rest upon me" (II Cor. xii. 8, 9).

It would be a profitable labour for every reader to compile a list of Scriptural examples setting forth in various ways how blessedly true is this principle of "Nevertheless afterwards".

The life of the Lord Jesus Himself provides many illustrations. In Matt. xi. we find Him rebuking Chorazin and Capernaum "wherein His mighty works were done, because they repented not"; and yet, arising out of this terrible rejection, come those blessed words of comfort:

> "Come unto Me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest . . . . . I am meek" (Matt. xi. 20-30).

In Heb. xii. the writer makes it clear that this principle of the "afterwards" applies to the Lord Himself as well as to His children:

> "Looking unto Jesus, the Author and Finisher of faith, Who for the joy that was set before Him, endured the cross, despising the shame, and is set down at the right hand of the throne of God" (Heb. xii. 2).

Following directly from this statement is the passage that contains our text. In verses 5-11 the Apostle's theme is chastisement. He encourages all who may be suffering chastisement, to remember that chastening implies childhood and parentage, and that it is for our profit—"that we might be partakers of His holiness". Moreover, there is comfort in the fact that the Lord Himself admits that no chastening seems at the time to be joyous, but rather grievous. Nevertheless it is not barren suffering. It yields "the peaceable fruit of righteousness"—on one condition: that those who pass through the chastening must be "exercised thereby"; otherwise it is all in vain.

We are safe in saying that no readers of these pages can tread the pathway of truth, surrounded by an evil world and in themselves still mortal and fallible, without continually passing through chastening. May all such be enabled to "glory in tribulation also; knowing that tribulation worketh . . . . ." (Rom. v. 3)—"Nevertheless afterwards."

#5. When Affliction is Good (Psa. cxix. 67, 71).
pp. 118, 119

How many of us have ever said out of a full heart: "It is good for me that I have been afflicted?"

We are so constituted that affliction is a thing to be shunned, and this is natural. We often find "the elements of the world"—too often accepted as axioms not needing proof—turn out to be false if adopted in the spiritual world. Consequently, there may be many occasions when the flesh is smarting, when pride is wounded, when the believer is cast down by a vision of his own heart's baseness, in other words, when it is good to be afflicted. The immediate reason given by the Psalmist is "That I might learn Thy statutes" (Psa. cxix. 71).

Another reason is given in the context: "Before I was afflicted I went astray: but now have I kept Thy word" (Psa. cxix. 67).

It will be as well that we have a correct idea of the meaning of the word affliction, so that the fullest blessing may be received from the Word of truth. Without providing any lengthy proof, we suggest that the word translated "afflict" bears the thought of being "humbled". It is translated "poor" in many passages, notably in the Psalms. The following will suffice our present needs in the matter of proof:

> "Thou shalt remember all the way which the Lord thy God led thee these forty years in the wilderness, to humble thee, and to prove thee, to know what was in thine heart, whether thou wouldest keep His commandment or no" (Deut. viii. 2).

The parallel here with Psa. cxix. 67 and 71 is close, both the passages referring to "keeping" or "leaving" the Word of the Lord.

> "But I am poor and needy; yet the Lord thinketh upon me" (Psa. xl. 17).

Here the word is translated "poor", and is associated with the word "needy". Doubtless we have called to mind the words of the Sermon on the Mount, in which blessedness is said to belong to the "poor in spirit", to them that "mourn", to the "meek" and to the "persecuted" (Matt. v. 3-12). In each case there is an "afterwards" as we saw in our last article.

Before the Psalmist said: "It is good for me that I have been afflicted", he exclaimed, "Thou art good" (verse 68), and further, "and doest good". He had prayed: "Teach me good judgment and knowledge", which is not learned without a measure of experience—often in the school of affliction.

Not only do we find in this stanza references to that which is "good", but also "well" and "better".

> "Thou hast dealt well (Heb. tob) with Thy servant" (verse 65).
> "It is good (Heb. tob) for me that I have been afflicted" (verse 71).
> "The law of Thy mouth is better (Heb. tob) unto me than thousands of gold and silver" (verse 72).

There can be nothing so important to the believer in this present life as his knowledge of, and loyalty to, the Word of God, and as we all have a tendency to "go astray", "affliction" or "humbling" should lead us to a fuller understanding of the Word, and a closer walk with the Lord, enabling us to "learn" God's statutes, and to "keep" God's Word. Grievous as affliction may be, and shrink as we will from anything that "humbles", we trust we shall be enabled to say (with the Psalmist) of Him Who is good, and Who doest good:

"It is good for me that I have been afflicted."

In what way was John the Baptist like Elijah? (10-13). 3. The children of the King are free: Do they therefore please themselves? (24-27). Memorize Matt. xvii. 5.
January 22nd. Matthew xviii. THE PARDON OF THE KING.	1. What kind of person is greatest in the Kingdom of heaven? (1-4) 2. Does this passage teach that little children are so good that they do not need a Saviour? (10, 11). 3. The parable of Matt. xviii. 23-25 illustrates the passage already considered in Matt. vi. 14. From what you know of the gospel which the Apostle Paul preached, say whether you think forgiveness can be lost, as it was in this parable. If not, explain the reason. Memorize Matt. xviii. 10, 11.
January 29th. Matthew xix. THE FUTURE REIGN OF THE KING.	1. During the time when the kingdom was preached, how could eternal life be obtained? (16-19). Is this true for us to-day? 2. What is "The Regeneration" of verse 28? Can twelve thrones and twelve tribes of Israel mean "the Church"? 3. "Suffer little children" (13). Can you find mention in the N.T. of one who "from a child knew the holy Scriptures which were able to make wise unto salvation through faith which is in Christ Jesus"? Memorize Matt. xix. 25, 26.

Read each chapter through carefully, not forgetting to ask, in prayer, that God would open the eyes to see and the heart to understand.

Weekly Bible Readings for February, 1939.
Subject: The Gospel according to Matthew.
The King and The Kingdom.

(The notes are for the guidance of those superintending the Young People's reading).

February 5th. Matthew xx. THE RANSOM OF THE KING.	1. Read the parable of verses 1-14, and then say whether Christian service "earns" anything, or is reward an act of kindness instead? 2. The Saviour said "Whosoever will be great among you, let him be your minister". Show how Christ acted (26-28). 3. What does the word "ransom" mean? Memorize Matt. xx. 28.
February 12th. Matthew xxi. 1-22. THE WELCOME OF THE KING.	1. Verse 5 is a quotation from Zech ix. 9. Can you say what is left out of this passage, and why? 2. Unto which of the four sowings of Matt. xiii. 3-8 would you liken those who cried, Hosannah (xxi. 9)? For they soon cried Crucify Him. 3. "Nothing but leaves only" (19). Can you explain this miracle of the fig-tree? Memorize Matt. xxi. 5.
February 19th. Matthew xxi. 23-46. THE REJECTION OF THE KING.	1. "I go Sir: . . . . . but went not" (30). How does this fit the people of Israel? 2. "This is the heir" (38). Do these words show that the leaders of the people knew that "Jesus" was the Sent One? 3. "The head of the corner" (42). Find (in other parts of the N.T.) two references to Christ as "The Christ Corner Stone". Write them out. Memorize Matt. xxi. 42.
February 26th. Matthew xxii. THE MARRIAGE OF THE KING'S SON.	1. Who were the guests that "would not come" (3). 2. When was the second invitation to the same people given? (4). 3. Was the city destroyed? (7). If so, do you know the date? and by whom? 4. When will this marriage take place? Can you give any further details as to the Bride and her home? Memorize Matt. xxii. 12.

Read each chapter through carefully, not forgetting to ask, in prayer, that God would open the eyes to see and the heart to understand.

Weekly Bible Readings for April, 1939.
Subject: The Gospel according to Matthew.
The King and The Kingdom.

April 2nd. Matthew xxii. 15-46. THE DEITY OF THE KING'S SON.	1. "God is not the God of the dead, but of the living" (xxii. 32). Was the Lord speaking about "dead" people being "alive" in paradise? If not, what was the real subject? (see verses 23, 28, 30, 31). 2. What one word fulfils the whole law? (36-40). 3. "If David then call Him Lord, how is He His Son" (45). Can you answer this question? Memorize Matt. xxii. 31, 32.
April 9th. Matthew xxiii. THE JUDGMENT OF THE KING.	1. How many times does the Lord say "Woe unto you" in this chapter? 2. Write out one verse which shows that these leaders were "hypocrites". 3. Explain "strain at a gnat and swallow a camel" (24). 4. Why does the Lord say "Your house" and not "My house"? (38) Memorize Matt. xxiii. 12.
April 16th. Matthew xxiv. 1-14. THE PROPHECY OF THE KING.	1. Why did the disciples speak about the stones of the temple? Is there anything at the end of chap. xxiii. to make them do so? 2. What three questions did they ask? (3). 3. What do you understand by the expression "The end of the world"? (look at xiii. 39). Memorize Matt. xxiv. 4, 5.
April 23rd. Matthew xxiv. 15-28. THE COMING OF THE KING.	1. Some say that Daniel was not a prophet. What did Christ say? 2. Read Dan. xii. 1-3 and say whether the great tribulation of Matt. xxiv. 21 and of Rev. vii. 14 are the same. Give your reasons. 3. If a man worked a miracle today, would it prove that he came from God? (24) Memorize Matt. xxiv. 24.
April 30th. Matthew xxiv. 29-51. WAITING OF THE KING.	1. We do not know what day or hour the Lord comes (36), but we do know that this coming is immediately "after" something. What is it, and what will appear? 2. In what way will the Coming of Christ be like the days of Noah? (37-39) 3. What does this passage say that believers should do and be? (42-44). Memorize Matt. xxiv. 42.

Read each chapter through carefully, not forgetting to ask, in prayer, that God would open the eyes to see and the heart to understand.

May 7th. Matthew xxv. 1-13. THE KING AS BRIDEGROOM.	1. What is the great lesson that should be learned from the parable of the Wise Virgins? 2. Where else in Matthew do we read of "wise" and "foolish" together? 3. Was it wrong for the wise virgins to go to sleep? Memorize Matt. xxv. 6.
May 14th. Matthew xxv. 14-46. THE SERVANTS OF THE KING.	1. If five talents gained five, and two talents gained two, how many should one talent have gained to have earned the Lord's "Well done"? 2. What is the reward for faithful service? 3. Are they believers who go into everlasting life here? What is the wages of sin as taught by the apostle Paul? Memorize Matt. xxv. 40.
May 2 1st. Matthew xxvi. 1-30. THE MEMORIAL OF THE KING.	1. The disciples called the act of the woman "waste". What did the Lord call it? 2. What O.T. person was sold for twenty pieces of silver? 3. What did the Lord mean when He said: "This is My body"? (26). Memorize Matt. xxvi. 13.
May 28th. Matthew xxvi. 31-75. THE BETRAYAL OF THE KING.	1. "I will not deny thee" (35). Did Peter keep his word? What lessons do we learn? 2. Read verse 53, and say whether the Lord Jesus "gave His life" willingly. 3. "He is guilty of death" (66). Prove from other Scriptures that Christ was innocent, righteous and holy. Memorize Matt. xxvi. 31, 32.

June 4th. Matthew xxvii. 1-35. THE CROSS AND CROWN OF THE KING.	1. Judas said . . . . .? (4). Pilate's wife said . . . . .? (19). Pilate said . . . . .? (24). 2. What was the only crown that Jesus wore? What is the lesson in the fact that "thorns" were used? (see Gen. iii.). 3. What prophecies were fulfilled at the crucifixion of Christ. Memorize Matt. xxvii. 35.
June 11th. Matthew xxvii. 36-66. THE OFFERING OF THE KING.	1. Why was the Saviour forsaken? (46). Where is this written in the O.T.? 2. What was the first thing to happen after Christ died? What does this teach us (see Heb. x. 19-22). 3. What was done to make sure that the body of the Lord could not be removed from the sepulchre? How does this prove the fact of the resurrection? (57-66) Memorize Matt. xxvii. 54.
June 18th. Matthew xxviii. THE TRIUMPH OF THE KING.	1. What proofs are given in this chapter that Jesus Christ had risen from the dead? 2. How were the Jews deceived as to the resurrection of Christ? 3. Does verse 19 say "Preach the gospel"? Has this work been done yet? Are there words in verse 20 that suggests that this "great commission" is yet to be fulfilled? Memorize Matt. xxviii. 5, 6.
June 25th. THE GOSPEL OF THE KINGDOM.	1. Collect references to the title "Son of David" in Matthew. 2. What other title found in Matt. xxii. belongs to Christ as the "Son of David"? Memorize Matt. xxvii. 36, 37.

(As the questions for the next few weeks will be upon the Gospel as a whole, no special chapter has been selected for reading).

JULY 2nd. THE GOSPEL OF THE KINGDOM.	If the following statement is true, prove it by passages from Matthew. A promise was made to David, that there shall be a King greater than himself, who shall rule on the earth. To fulfil this promise the Lord Jesus was born, and will yet come again Memorize Matt. xxvi. 64.
JULY 9th. THE GOSPEL OF THE KINGDOM.	The Gospel according to Matthew is divided into two parts. The division comes in chapter xvi. In iv. 17 and in xvi. 21 is one proof. In iii. 17 and xvii. 5 is another proof. Do you see that this is so? Write a short explanation, making this clear. Memorize Matt. xvi. 21.
JULY 16th. THE GOSPEL OF THE KINGDOM.	Collect references that use the titles "Son of God" and "Son of Man". What two names found in i. 21-25 harmonize with these titles? Memorize Matt. x. 42.
JULY 23rd. THE GOSPEL OF THE KINGDOM.	Collect the miracles mentioned in Matthew. Put them down in order. Can you see that they form different groups? What was the purpose of these miracles? You may find an answer in chapter xi. Memorize Matt. viii. 2, 3.
JULY 30th. THE GOSPEL OF THE KINGDOM.	Collect the parables. Give each a title, as for example "The parable of the Sower". These are parables in chapters other than xiii. Memorize Matt. xiii. 34, 35.

DEAR FELLOW-MEMBERS,

> "Now when Daniel knew . . . . . he kneeled upon his knees three times a day . . . . . AS HE DID AFORETIME" (Dan. vi. 10).

The perilous and momentous days in which we live bring with them a special spiritual peril, the peril of allowing the pressure of earthly conflict to minimize or suppress service or spiritual exercise.

While the believer must never allow it to be said that the unbeliever is more ready or active in his offers of help and sympathy in mundane troubles, the noble spirit manifested by Daniel in the words, "as he did aforetime", should provoke us to emulation. It is in this frame of mind that the foreword of yet another annual Volume is written.

The year's witness has been prepared, printed, published and posted, literally in "the presence of our enemies", and we commend the present Volume and its succeeding numbers to all who appreciate the "Berean" attitude of heart and mind toward the Word of Truth.

Yours in peace that passeth understanding,

The Acts of the Apostles.

#37. The Second Missionary Journey (xvi. 6 - xix. 20). Paul at Corinth. The Second Vision (xviii. 1 - 17).

pp. 31 - 36

We now come to the Apostle's visit to Corinth, which immediately follows his witness at Athens. The two cities were widely different in character and associations. The great concern of the men of Athens was "to speak or to hear some new thing". Corinth, on the other hand, was regarded as the "Vanity Fair" of the Empire, and its reputation for evil was such that its very name became a term to express the foulest immorality. Korinthiazesthai became a synonym for licentiousness, and the meaning of "Corinthian" is still given in the English Dictionary as "a licentious man about town".

The famous temple of Aphrodite Pandemos, that crowned the Acrocorinthus, was served by a thousand heirodouloi, "consecrated slaves", whose lives were devoted to immorality in the name of religion. It was from Corinth that Paul wrote the terrible indictment of Gentile depravity that forms the second half of Rom. i. When a "Corinthian" appeared on the stage at this time, he was usually represented as drunk. Corinth was a seaport and a centre of commerce. It therefore attracted merchants from all quarters, and the mixed character of its population influenced the whole for evil.

Upon arrival at Corinth, Paul finds a certain Jew named Aquila, born in Pontus and lately come from Italy, with his wife Priscilla. This man and his wife had been obliged to depart from Rome because Claudius had commanded that all Jews should leave the city.

Finding that he was of the same craft—the craft of tent-making—the Apostle took up his abode with this worthy couple, to whom the whole company of Gentile believers are particularly indebted (Rom. xvi. 3, 4). Paul had entered Athens "alone", but here in Corinth his loneliness would have been intensified. Who would think twice about this weary Jew? He knew only too well how cruel the money-loving merchants could be, and would not have looked to them for help or sympathy. He therefore turns his footsteps to the Jewish quarter and there by the grace of God he comes upon Aquila.

The decree issued by Cæsar Augustus that all the world should be taxed was instrumental, under God, in bringing about the birth of the Saviour at Bethlehem. The decree of Claudius was equally overruled here to bring about this happy fellowship between Aquila, Priscilla and the Apostle. Suetonius says of Claudius that "he banished from Rome all Jews, who were continually making disturbances at the instigation of one Chrestus".

There is every reason to believe that Paul had been brought up in comfortable, if not in affluent, circumstances. He had been taught a trade, not because his parents had ever intended that he would be obliged to work at it for a living, but because this procedure was in accordance with the teaching of the Rabbis. Rabbi Judah, for instance, writes:

"He that teacheth not his son a trade, doth the same as if he taught him to be a thief." And Gamaliel, at whose feet Paul had sat, said that he that had a trade in his hand was "like a fenced vineyard". "St. Paul, after working miracles, stood in his workshop at Corinth, and stitched hides of leather together with his hands, and the angels regarded him with love, and the devils with fear" (Chrysostom).

The fact that there was a "Chief Ruler" of the synagogue at Corinth indicates its importance and numerical strength. A stone has been discovered in Corinth, dating from between B.C.100 and A.D.200, bearing the inscription (Suna) goge hebr (aion), "Synagogue of the Hebrews", and there is every probability that this stone was actually in position during the Apostle's stay.

Continuing with the narrative in chapter xviii., we read:

> "He reasoned in the synagogue every sabbath, and persuaded the Jews and the Greeks. And when Silas and Timothy were come from Macedonia, Paul was pressed by the word (Texts read logos) and testified to the Jews that Jesus was Christ" (Acts xviii. 4, 5).

Here we have the same enthusiasm, the same methods, the same object. And here, alas, also the same result, the opposition and blasphemy of the Jews. Once more there were branches broken out of the olive tree, and once more the Apostle turns to the Gentiles (Acts xviii. 6).

Before we go further, it may be as well to give the structure of the whole passage, which is as follows:

Paul at Corinth (Acts xviii. 1-17).

A | 1-7. CLAUDIUS. (Roman Emperor). |
a | Jews expelled from Rome.
b | Synagogue. The Word. Jews oppose and blaspheme.
B | 8. CRISPUS. (Chief Ruler of Synagogue). |
Believed. Baptized.
C | 9, 10. VISION. Much people in this city.
A | 11-16. GALLIO. (Roman Deputy). |
b | Hard by synagogue. The Word. Jews made insurrection.
a | Jews driven from judgment-seat.
B | 17. SOSTHENES. (Chief Ruler of Synagogue). |
Beaten (Believed later, I Cor. i. 1).

We find, therefore, that the theme of Acts xviii. 1-17 revolves around five focal points—the action of two Roman rulers, the action of two synagogue rulers, and the vision granted to Paul by the great Ruler over all, the Lord Himself.

On two occasions the Apostle announced in a synagogue that he would turn to the Gentiles, once in Antioch (Acts xiii. 46), and once again in Corinth (Acts xviii. 6). In both cases we read in the immediate context that the Jews not only opposed but "blasphemed". The Apostle himself knew only too well the dreadful hatred from which this blasphemy came, for he confessed before Agrippa that he had himself "compelled believers to blaspheme" (Acts xxvi. 11), while in Rom. ix. 1-3 he writes that his heart was heavy for his kinsmen, for he himself used to wish himself accursed from Christ.

There are some who have attempted to draw the dispensational boundary either at Acts xiii. 46, or at Acts xviii. 6, but just as Paul's turning to the Gentiles in Acts xiii. was followed by a series of synagogue visits from Acts xiv.-xviii., so again, after the utterance given in Acts xviii. 6, we find the Apostle once more in a synagogue in Ephesus in Acts xix. 1. The synagogue witness ends in chapter xix., but Israel as a people are not set aside until after the critical conference at Rome (Acts xxviii.).

With reference to Acts xviii. 6 Alford writes:

> "Not absolutely, but only at Corinth: for we find arguing with the Jews again in the synagogue at Ephesus. I have adopted the punctuation of Lachmann, erasing the colon after ego: 'I shall henceforth with a pure conscience go to the Gentiles'."

When the opposition of the Jews at the synagogue reaches the culminating point of blasphemy, the Apostle withdraws and finds accommodation in the house of one named Justus, "whose house joined hard to the synagogue". There may be more reasons than one for the inclusion of this detail. It may indicate that Paul was still hopeful that many of the Jews he had left would nevertheless come under the sound of the gospel—and in this he was most certainly right, if Crispus and his household were brought in this way—and the position of the house may also have indicated that the complete separation of the church from the hope of Israel was not yet due.

The reader will remember that the vision seen by Paul here in Corinth is in structural correspondence with the vision of the man of Macedonia, seen in Troas. (For the structure of Acts xvi. 6 - xix. 20, which shows this correspondence, see Volume XXVIII, page 230).

> "Then spake the Lord to Paul in a vision, Be not afraid but speak, and hold not thy peace: for I am with thee, and no man shall set on thee to hurt thee: for I have much people in this city" (Acts xviii. 9, 10).

Athens, the city of culture and philosophy, has no such vision, and no such promise, but Corinth, where sin was brazen and depravity enthroned, provides an arena for the triumph of Jesus Christ and Him crucified (I Cor. ii. 2). The Lord tells Paul in the vision that He has "much people in this city". Truly, as the Apostle wrote to the Corinthians:

> "Ye see your calling, brethren, how that not many wise men after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble, are called. But God hath chosen the foolish . . . . . the base . . . . . the despised . . . . . the things that are not, to bring to nought the things that are; that no flesh should glory in His presence" (I Cor. i. 26-29).

The Apostle continues at Corinth for a year and six months, teaching the word of God, and upon the arrival of Timothy, who had been sent back from Athens to Thessalonica, he writes his two epistles to the Thessalonians. With regard to the date of these epistles, Conybeare and Howson give the following notes:

> (1) "It was written not long after the conversion of the Thessalonians (I Thess. i. 8, 9), while the tidings of it were still spreading (apaggelousia, present tense) through Macedonia and Achaia, and whilst St. Paul could still speak of himself as only taken from them for a short season (I Thess. ii. 17).
> (2) St. Paul had been recently at Athens (iii. 1), and had already preached in Achaia (i. 7, 8).
> (3) Timotheus and Silas were just returned (arti, iii. 6) from Macedonia, which happened soon after St. Paul's arrival at Corinth."

These epistles to the Thessalonians were not given to reveal some new or esoteric doctrine, but to help those who had already believed and been taught, and now needed encouragement and correction by the way.

The Jews appear to have waited for some favourable opportunity for venting their anger against the Apostle, and the coming of a new Roman Governor seems to have provided them with the long desired weapon. Gallio was the younger brother of Seneca, and took his name from Junius Gallio the rhetorician, who had adopted him (Dio. Cass. xl. 35). Tacitus informs us that Gallio died in the year 65 (Tac. An. xv. 73), and Pliny tells us that after his consulship he had a serious illness, on which account he took a sea-voyage (Pliny N. H. xxxi. 33). We also learn from his brother Seneca that it was in Achaia that he boarded a ship for the sake of his health (See Ep. 104). Gallio would not have been appointed deputy until his brother Seneca had been restored to favour, which makes the earliest possible date A.D.50, for in A.D.49 Seneca had been recalled from his exile in Corsica and appointed tutor to the young Nero. Prefects were bound by edict to quit Rome about the middle of April. When Cicero traversed the same course, he took about 50 days to get to Cilicia, so that Gallio would have arrived at Corinth at some time during June. We are therefore practically forced to put the date of Gallio's proconsulship at A.D.53, a very striking testimony to Luke's accuracy as a historian. Moreover, under Tiberias, Achaia had been an Imperial Province, while under Claudius it was restored to the Senate and reckoned as an "unarmed province", governed by a proconsul (A.V. "deputy"). In all these changes, never once does Luke falter or make a mistake. Critics who have attempted to discredit his accuracy have been covered with confusion, and some, like Sir William Ramsay, have been converted to a belief in his inspiration.

Seneca spoke of his brother as "the sweet Gallio", and said of him that "no mortal is so sweet to any single person as he is to all mankind". It is in this light that we must understand the comment: "Gallio cared for none of these things." The attempt to scare him by the charge "This fellow persuadeth men to worship God contrary to the law" failed, and before Paul could make his defence, Gallio dismissed the case. Had it been a breach of Roman law, Gallio would have dealt with it as a Roman, but seeing that there had been committed no "wrong or wicked lewdness", and that it was evidently some squabble about Jewish laws and customs, he says to the Jews, "Look ye to it, for I will be no judge of such matters". Thus, through the instrumentality of Gallio, the promise made by the Lord in the vision was fulfilled.

We do not know for certain that Sosthenes succeeded Crispus as the chief ruler of the synagogue, but it seems probable. There is no record in the Acts of his conversion, but the fact that Crispus and Sosthenes are both mentioned in the opening chapter of the epistle to the Corinthians makes it appear likely.

The Apostle now turns his thought toward Jerusalem. He had set foot in Philippi, the chief city of one part of Macedonia, he had witnessed and suffered in Thessalonica, he had spoken both in the Agora and on the Areopagus at Athens, and had seen the triumph of the cross at Corinth. He had encountered a good deal of opposition, but he had also made some friends in the faith: Lydia of Thyatira, Aristarchus and Secundus of Thessalonica, Sopater of Berea, Dionysius and Damaris, Aquila and Priscilla, Crispus and Sosthenes—all trophies of grace and fellow-helpers in the Christian witness.

One other great city is to be visited before this second missionary journey is concluded—the city of Ephesus, whose name is so intimately associated with the great revelation of the Mystery towards which the narrative of the Acts is drawing steadily nearer. It will not be long before we arrive at the prophetic foreshadowing, and then the actual experience once more of prison, an experience from which no earthquake delivers, and which lasts between Cæsarea and Rome for about four years. These themes we must consider in subsequent articles, as together we follow the narrative of those things which the ascended Christ continued to do and to teach through his servants.

#38. The Second Missionary Journey (xvi. 6 - xix. 20). John's Baptism and Special Miracles (xviii. 24 - xix. 20).

pp. 69 - 76

With the conclusion of his ministry at Corinth, Paul now turns his face to Jerusalem. There are two points in connection with this visit to Jerusalem that we must notice particularly, because of the indication they give that the ground is still Jewish:

(1) THE VOW.—"Having shorn his head in Cenchrea; for he had a vow" (Acts xviii. 18).
(2) THE FEAST.—"I must by all means keep this feast that cometh in Jerusalem" (Acts xviii. 21).

It may be as well to settle one point in this connection at once. There are some who suggest that the reversal of the order "Priscilla and Aquila" in verse 18 indicates that it was Aquila, and not Paul, who had the vow. A knowledge of what was incumbent upon a man who made a vow, however, makes it clear that Paul, who was anxious to get to Jerusalem, was the one under the vow, and that Aquila, who stayed behind, could not have been under any such obligation. The Nazarite vow, according to the law (Num. vi. 1-21), necessitated the offering of the hair that had been shaved off, together with a burnt offering, at the Temple. The taking of a vow of this sort was usually a means of acknowledging some great deliverance, from sickness, or accident, or some other calamity. To look back to Acts xviii. and endeavour to find this deliverance at the judgment-seat of Gallio, is to limit our interpretation unduly. The Acts does not record a tithe of the sufferings and the deliverances that Paul experienced. We have only to turn to his epistles, Galatians, Thessalonians and Corinthians, to meet with such a list of afflictions, that it would seem almost impossible for any one man to have endured them all, and to have been brought through alive and able to serve. We may take as an example the list given in II Cor. xi., remembering at the same time that we should have had no knowledge of most of these troubles, had not the Apostle "become a fool" in his boasting.

> "In labours more abundant, in stripes above measure, in prisons more frequent, in death oft. Of the Jews five times received I forty stripes save one. Thrice was I beaten with rods, once I was stoned, thrice I have suffered shipwreck, a night and a day I have been in the deep" (II Cor. xi. 23-25).

Added to this almost unprecedented suffering, is a list of "perils" that beset the Apostle in his ministry, and the passage concludes:

> "Beside those things that are without, that which cometh upon me daily, the care of all the churches" (II Cor. xi. 26-28).

Coming back to Acts xviii., it would appear that the Apostle, who was still an Israelite, still looking for the hope of Israel, and yearning for the salvation of his own kinsmen, could find no means of expressing his thankfulness for so great a deliverance more appropriate than the taking upon him of the Nazarite vow. Paul was not "under the law" so far as salvation was concerned, but at the same time he was not standing in the full light of the Mystery, as made known in his prison epistles. Christianity was still a movement among the Jews. It destroyed no legitimate Jewish aspirations, but rather pointed to the Lord Jesus as the true Messiah and the fulfillment of all their hopes. It is this fact that colours the whole of the Acts up to xxviii. 28, and all the epistles written before that period (namely, Galatians, Thessalonians, Hebrews, Corinthians and Romans).

Lightfoot, referring to Rabbinical teaching, writes as follows:

> "Nazarism was, most ordinarily, for thirty days; though sometimes it was for years, and sometimes for term of life. He whose vow was expired, was to bring three beasts, one for a burnt offering, another for a sin offering, and a third for a peace offering. If he polled his head in the country, as Paul did at Cenchrea, he was to bring his hair, and burn it under the caldron" (Lightfoot, Vol. IX. 307).

Josephus, also, in speaking of Berenice who sacrificed her hair as part of a vow, gives the period as thirty days (B.J. ii. 15.1).

Coming back to the Acts, let us next notice the accuracy of Luke's language. In Acts xviii. 18 the word translated "shorn" is keiramenos, while in xxi. 24 we have the word xuresontai, "shave". Keiro refers to the cutting or cropping of the hair (as, for example, the polling of the head of Absalom) and we find that the Mishna (I. c. vol. ii. page 167) permitted this to be done by a temporary Nazarite in foreign lands.

Acts xxi. 24, however, refers to the actual "shaving" of the head. The Apostle recognizes the distinction between these two words in I Cor. xi. 6: "If it be a shame for a woman to be shorn or shaven." Dion Cassius, also, tells us that when the Prefect of Egypt, for his own ends, sent an unusually large tribute, that had been wring out of the people by extortion, Tiberius rebuked him by saying that he wished his sheep "shorn" (keiresthai) and "shaved" (aposuresthai).

Bearing in mind the Apostle's vow, we can at once understand his desire to get to Jerusalem without delay. At Ephesus he enters the synagogue and reasons with the Jews, but although they "desire him to tarry longer time with them", we read that he "consented not, but bade them farewell saying, I must by all means keep this feast that cometh at Jerusalem".

Luke gives no details of the visit to Jerusalem, or of the keeping of the feast, or the conclusion of the Nazarite vow. All he says is:

> "And when he had landed at Cæsarea, and gone up, and saluted the church, he went down to Antioch" (Acts xviii. 22).

The details were apparently not necessary for Luke's purpose in writing the Acts, and we must abide by the inspired decision. Nothing of moment seems to have taken place, no conference with the leaders at Jerusalem, and no turmoil or riot among the Jews. The Apostle was permitted to fulfil his vow in peace. "He saluted the church", and turned his steps once more to the regions beyond.

Jerusalem was not the spiritual centre of Paul's activity, but rather Antioch; and it is to Antioch, where he first received the definite call to evangelize the Gentiles, that his footsteps now turn. After a little time spent among friends, a short period of refreshment, we once again find the Apostle on the road. The call to service, and the needs of his spiritual family could not be ignored.

> "And after he had spent some time there, he departed, and went over all the country of Galatia and Phrygia in order, strengthening all the disciples" (Acts xviii. 23).

The fact that he visited the churches "in order" enables us to follow the Apostle's footsteps as he visits the church which was founded when he and Barnabas had responded to the call in Acts xiii. Passing through the "upper coasts" (i.e. the highland district of the Western Taurus range), he at length arrives at Ephesus, and so is able to fulfil his promise that, "if God will", he would return to them again (Acts xix. 1 and xviii. 21).

Before we deal with Acts xix., however, and Paul's great work at Ephesus, we have another incident to consider, that took place while Paul was absent from Ephesus.

> "A certain Jew named Apollos, born at Alexandria, an eloquent man, and mighty in the Scriptures, came to Ephesus. This man was instructed in the way of the Lord; and being fervent in the spirit, he spake and taught diligently the things of the Lord, knowing only the baptism of John. And he began to speak boldly in the synagogue, whom when Aquila and Priscilla had heard, they took him unto them, and expounded unto him the way of God more perfectly" (Acts xviii. 24-26).

Apollos had many natural and spiritual advantages. He was born at Alexandria, a seat of learning, and was instrumental in the diffusion of the Greek language and the production of the Greek version of the O.T. known as the Septuagint. According to the A.V. Apollos is described as "an eloquent man". The word is logios, which, according to Philo (Vit. Mos. i. 5) means "learned", and according to Josephus "eloquent" (Ant. xvii. vi. 2). Josephus speaks of Judas and Matthias as "two of the most eloquent men among the Jews, and most celebrated interpreters of the Jewish laws". The word must not, however, be made to include all that is conveyed by the word "eloquent" to-day, or as it would have been understood by the Greek rhetorician. Nevertheless it is clear that Apollos must have had a natural gift that surpassed that possessed by Paul, for the Apostle reminded the Corinthians that, according to their standards, they had said of him: "His bodily presence is weak, and his speech contemptible" (II Cor. x. 10).

Apollos was not merely eloquent; he was also "mighty in the Scriptures", and "instructed in the way of the Lord". On the other hand, we read that he knew "only the baptism of John". There are some who think that Apollos was not a believer in the Lord Jesus, though true so far as he went. The texts, however, read in verse 25: "He taught diligently the things concerning Jesus." The word "diligently" is akribos, "accurately", and is found again in verse 26—"more perfectly". Apollos had the foundation of the faith, but he stopped short at the baptism of John. He could, however, be a very convincing speaker, so far as proving the Messiahship of the Lord Jesus was concerned, for John's baptism was appointed for the very purpose of making the Messiah manifest to Israel (John i. 30-34).

When Priscilla and Aquila heard Apollos speak, they felt as some of our readers have probably often felt when listening to an earnest man, preaching with fervour and grace, but knowing only the truth as far as Acts xxviii. We have personal knowledge of more than one instance, in which readers of The Berean Expositor have emulated the kindly act of Aquila and Priscilla, and have been able to "expound the way of God more perfectly". Apollos evidently profited by their gracious ministry, and, when he wished to pass into Achaia, the brethren commenced him by letter. We read that he "helped them much which had believed", and "mightily convinced the Jews, and that publicly, showing by the Scriptures that Jesus was Christ".

While Apollos is at Corinth, Paul arrives at Ephesus, and he too is met with the same limitations as were found in Apollos. This time, however, instead of one man, it is twelve disciples who "knew only the baptism of John".

The controversy that has arisen over this passage (Acts xix. 1-12), as to whether Paul baptized these believers, or whether verse 5 refers to what took place when men heard and believed John the Baptist's testimony, will perhaps remain a moot point until we know "even as we are known". We give below the structure of the passage as set out in The Companion Bible. According to this structure, the words of verse 5: "When they heard this, they were baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus" refer to what took place when men believed the testimony of John the Baptist, and not to the re-baptism of the twelve disciples by Paul himself.

Acts xix. 1-12. Paul. Ministry at Ephesus.

c | 1. Paul's arrival at Ephesus.
d | 1. Certain men. Their character. Disciples.
e | 2. Spiritual gifts. Their ignorance of them.
f | 3. What they had received. John's baptism.
g | 4, 5. What Paul said. Paul's description of John's action.
g | 6. What Paul did. Luke's description. Paul's action.
f | 6. What they now received. Special gifts.
e | 6. Spiritual gifts. Their use of them.
d | 7. The men. Their number. About twelve.
c | 8-12. Paul's continuance at Ephesus.

The words pneuma hagion ("the Holy Ghost") in verse 2 refer to spiritual gifts, and not to the Holy Spirit Himself. These coming gifts of the Spirit had been spoken of by John, but the men concerned here had not heard of Pentecost. After this interview with the Apostle, we read that "the holy spirit came on them; and they spake with tongues and prophesied".

After this the Apostle spends three months in the synagogue, "disputing and persuading the things concerning the kingdom of God". We read that some of those who heard "were hardened", and once again there is a movement towards the Gentiles:

> "He departed from them, and separated the disciples, disputing daily in the school of one Tyrannus" (Acts xix. 9).

This "school of Tyrannus" was probably what the Jews called Beth Midrash, a kind of private rabbinical seminary, and here the Apostle continues for the space of two years, so that all in Asia "hear the word of the Lord Jesus, both Jews and Greeks".

> "And God wrought special miracles by the hands of Paul" (Acts xix. 11).

Why should God have wrought "special" miracles by the hands of Paul, just at this point? The word translated "special" is not easy to explain, because it changes its meaning and application at different times. The word tugchano means "to hit a mark, as with an arrow" (Homer II. xii. 394), and then, by an easy transition, "to hit upon", "to light upon", with the element of chance attached, as in Acts xvii. 17, "to meet by chance" (paratucho). Ho tuchon means "an every-day man", or, with the negative, "no ordinary man"; and the word is used by Josephus in describing Herod's temple as "no common work".

Coming back now to the record of Acts xix., let us notice the two kinds of miracles that are particularized.

"So that from his body were brought unto the sick, handkerchiefs or aprons, and the diseases departed from them, and the evil spirits went out of them" (Acts xix. 12).

These miracles are said to be "special"—miracles with "no chance work about them", intended to "hit the mark". Paul was in a city full of "magic" (see xix. 19). In his opening ministry at Philippi he had been the subject of Satanic attack through the instrumentality of the damsel possessed by the spirit of Python, and here again in Ephesus we have the same sort of contrast. The complete failure of the Jewish exorcists to cast out the evil spirit by calling over him the name of "Jesus", is exactly parallel with Paul's refusal to allow Satan to bear witness to the fact that he was showing to the people "the way of salvation".

As a result both of the positive witness of the "special" miracles, and of the utter failure of the Jewish exorcists, we read that "fear fell on them all, and the name of the Lord Jesus was magnified". Moreover, there was a public confession and a burning of the books relating to "curious arts" to the value of 50,000 pieces of silver. Many of these magical books and leaves of papyrus—known as Ephesia grammata—have since been discovered.

Immediately after this public exhibition of the triumph of the gospel over the powers of darkness, we read of Paul's desire to go to Rome: "I must see Rome also." He had found the door temporarily shut in Asia (Acts xvi. 6), and had seen the vision at Troas (xvi. 9). At Philippi, a Roman colony, he had witnessed the failure of the Devil's first effort to compromise the new witness, and at Ephesus also, the temple-keeper of Diana, he had seen the triumph of light over darkness. Another round of ministry had been brought to a glorious conclusion. The gospel had been preached, many had believed, and the powers of darkness had been driven out of their strongholds.

We conclude this very inadequate survey with a simplified structure, trusting that it may be of service to any who desire to prosecute their studies further.

Acts xviii. 24 - xix. 20.

A | xviii. 24 - xix. 7. JOHN'S BAPTISM. |
a1 | APOLLOS.—"Knowing only the baptism of John."
Taught "more perfectly".
a2 | DISCIPLES.—"Unto John's baptism."
"Spake with tongues and prophesied."
B | xix. 8-10. The word of the Lord Jesus heard.
A | xix. 11-19. SPECIAL MIRACLES. |
a3 | PAUL AND EVIL SPIRITS.—"Went out of them."
a4 | SONS OF SCHEVA AND EVIL SPIRITS.—"Prevailed against them."
B | xix. 20. So mightily grew the word of God and prevailed.

#39. The Third Missionary Journey (xix. 21 - xxi. 39). Paul at Ephesus (xix. 21 - xx. 4).

pp. 97 - 104

The second missionary journey comes to an end with the words of Acts xix. 20: "So mightily grew the word of God, and prevailed", and we must now begin our study of the Apostle's third journey.

If we refer back to the structure which was given in the first article of the series (Volume XXIV, page 3), we shall find that the next verse (xix. 21) marks the beginning of the final section of the book. As the structure shows, this section corresponds with the close of Peter's ministry:

E | xii. 1-23. JERUSALEM.
Peter's imprisonment.
Close of ministry.
\+ + + + + + +
E | xix. 21 - xxviii. 31. EPHESUS TO ROME.
Paul's imprisonment.
Close of one ministry and commencement of the prison ministry, and the "dispensation of the mystery".

This closing section is divided into two parts, the first part dealing with the time during which Paul was still free (xix. 21 - xxi. 39), and the second with the remainder of his recorded ministry, during which he was a prisoner, in Cæsarea, on board ship, and at Rome (xxi. 40 - xxviii. 31). We will not attempt to set out the structure of these two parts together but rather concentrate upon the first part—the Apostle's third missionary journey which closes the Apostle's activity as a free man during the Acts.

Let us first consider the section in broad outline:

Acts xix. 21 - xxi. 39.
("I must also see Rome": xix. 21).

A | xix. 21 - xx. 4. THE UPROAR (thorubos, xx. 1). Temple at Ephesus.
B | xx. 4-16. TROAS. A work wrought among the Gentiles.
C | xx. 17-38. MILETUS. Bonds. The Holy Ghost.
C | xxi. 1-17. TYRE AND CÆSAREA. Bonds. The Holy Ghost.
B | xxi. 18-26. JERUSALEM. What God had wrought among the Gentiles.
A | xxi. 27-39. THE UPROAR (thorubos, "tumult": xxi. 34). Temple at Jerusalem.

It will be seen that the section begins and ends with an uproar in a temple, in each case instigated by men of Asia, while its central members deal with prophetic warnings concerning the "bonds" that awaited the Apostle. We must now follow his footsteps through each of these six subdivisions, noting particularly the events that led to his apprehension at Jerusalem by the Roman soldiers, which was the first step in the series of incidents that brought him finally to Rome. Across the whole of Acts xix. 21 - xxviii. 31 might be written the Apostle's opening words: "After I have been there, I must see Rome also" (Acts xix. 21), while across the second section could be written the Lord's answering words:

> "Be of good cheer, Paul: for as thou hast testified of Me in Jerusalem, so must thou bear witness also at Rome" (Acts xxiii. 11).

Before we examine this passage more intimately, and before we attempt a description of the great Temple of Diana, let us acquaint ourselves with the disposition of the subject-matter.

Acts xix. 21 - xx. 4.
The Uproar. The Temple at Ephesus.

A | xix. 21-22. | a | After these things were ended.
b | MACEDONIA; pass through.
JERUSALEM; I must go to.
MACEDONIA; sent unto.
c | ASIA; he himself stayed.
B | xix. 23-27. | d1 | No small stir about that way.
e1 | DEMETRIUS. Silver-smiths.
DIANA. Silver shrines.
d1 | No small gain.
e1 | This craft. No gods.
This craft. Great goddess.
C | xix. 28-34. | f | When they heard.
g | They cried: GREAT IS DIANA OF THE EPHESIANS.
h | Confusion.
i | GAIUS AND ARISTARCHUS.
j | PAUL.
h | Confusion.
i | ALEXANDER.
f | When they knew.
g | They cried: GREAT IS DIANA OF THE EPHESIANS.
B | xix. 35-41. | d2 | Appeasement.
e2 | Goddess.
d3 | Be quiet.
e2 | Goddess.
d4 | Lawful.
A | xx. 1-4. | a | After these uproar was ceased.
b | MACEDONIA; for to go.
SYRIA; to sail to.
MACEDONIA; return through.
c | ASIA; his companions.

The reader will observe—and the structure brings this into prominence—that Macedonia is very much in the Apostle's mind at this time.

> "After these things were ended, Paul purposed in the spirit when he had passed through Macedonia and Achaia, to go to Jerusalem, saying, After I have been there, I must also see Rome. So he sent into Macedonia two of them that ministered unto him, Timotheus and Erastus; but he himself stayed in Asia for a season" (Acts xix. 21, 22).
> "And after the uproar was ceased, Paul called unto him the disciples, and embraced them, and departed for to go into Macedonia . . . . . he purposed to return through Macedonia" (Acts xx. 1, 3).

His objective was Jerusalem, and then Rome, but his way was through Macedonia, and he sends on ahead two trusted workers, while he himself stays in Asia. In I Cor. xvi. the Apostle reminds the church of the collection for the saints (I Cor. xvi. 1) which was to be taken by him to Jerusalem (I Cor. xvi. 3), and he tells them that he will come to them when he has passed through Macedonia. This is the journey that is recorded in the chapter of the Acts that we are now considering.

Although he had accomplished so much, by the grace of God, the Apostle still looked eagerly out on to the great Roman world, desiring to preach Christ in the regions beyond. The words "I must see Rome" indicate his desire and willingness, and, in writing to the Romans, he contemplates passing through Rome to Spain (Rom. xv. 22-29).

In order to appreciate what happened to the Apostle, and the incidents recorded in Acts xix. with regard to Ephesus and the Temple of Diana, we must acquaint ourselves with some of the ancient records.

We gather from the first epistle to the Corinthians, that it was written at about the time of the Passover, and that the Apostle intended to remain in Ephesus until Pentecost (I Cor. v. 7; xvi. 8). This would give an approximate date for Acts xix. 23, as the month of May. This particular month was specially dedicated to the goddess of Ephesus. Dr. Chandler found an inscribed marble slab in this district, and the following translation will perhaps help us to understand the presence of the crowds and their enthusiasm for the worship of Diana.

> "Inasmuch as it is notorious that, not only among the Ephesians, but also everywhere among the Greek nations, temples are consecrated to her and sacred portions . . . . . besides this, as the greater token of veneration paid to her, a month is called by her name; by us Artemission . . . . . in which (other cities) general assemblies and Hieromenia are celebrated, but not in the holy city, the nurse of its own, the Ephesian goddess: the people of Ephesus, deeming it proper that the whole month called after her name be sacred and set apart to the goddess, have determined by this decree, that the observation of it by them be altered. Therefore it is enacted that in the whole month Artemission the days be holy, and that nothing be attended on them, but the yearly feastings . . . . , for from this improvement in our worship our city shall receive additional lustre, and be permanent in prosperity for ever."

The reader who is acquainted with the narrative of Acts xix. will see that Demetrius was but expressing the sentiments that were evidently popular. There was obviously a close association in the minds of the people between the "improvement" of the worship of Artemis (or Diana, in our version) and the prosperity of the city.

> "By this craft we have our wealth . . . . . this our craft is in danger . . . . , also that the temple of the great goddess Diana should be despised, and her magnificence destroyed, whom all Asia and the world worshippeth."

So great was the magnificence of this temple that it was included in the seven wonders of the world. The attitude of the Ephesians themselves towards it can be gauged from the fact that an offer by Alexander to dedicate the spoils of a conquest to the building of the temple, on condition that he should be permitted to inscribe his name on the front of the building, was refused (Strabo).

A description of the temple is found in Pliny, who says it was 425 feet in length, 220 feet broad, and supported by a hundred or more columns, each of which had been contributed by a prince, one of them being the famous Croesus.

Among the privileges of the Temple of Ephesus was the right of asylum it gave to all who came within bow-shot. This right attracted to its precincts the scum of the earth, and the nature of the worship of the goddess completed the general atmosphere of corruption.

> "Ionia had been the corruptress of Greece (hence the proverb 'Ionian effeminacy'), Ephesus was the corruptress of Ionia—the favourite scene of her most voluptuous love-tales, the lighted theatre of her ostentatious sins" (Farrar).

Our Lord's saying, "To him that hath shall be given" is most certainly true with regard to the student of Scripture. The more we bring, for example, to the epistle to the Ephesians, the more we take away. When we realize something of the immoral atmosphere in which many of the Ephesian saints had been born and bred, and which perhaps still shadowed the lives of their relatives, we can the better understand Paul's faithful reference to sensual sins in Eph. v. 3-5, and the depths suggested by his reference to the shameful things "which are done of them in secret" (Eph. v. 12).

In Eph. ii. the Apostle stresses the "foundation" of the spiritual temple, and its "chief corner-stone". This, too, would have an appeal to the Ephesians, for they would know that in order to avoid damage by earthquake, the upper foundations of the Temple of Diana had been built at vast cost on artificial foundations of skin and charcoal laid over the marsh.

Again, the Apostle emphasizes the privilege that the Ephesians possessed in Christ, of being "fellow-citizens". The following extract from Josephus will give some idea of the privileges that were granted by the state to the Jews living in Ephesus.

> "I have at my tribunal set these Jews, who are citizens of Rome, and follow the Jewish religious rites, and yet live at Ephesus, free from going into the army on account of the superstition they are under. This was done before the twelfth of the calends of October when Lucius Lentelus and Caius Marcellus were consuls . . . . . and my will is that you take care no one give them any disturbances" (Ant. xiv. x. 13).

In paragraph 17 of the same book we actually meet the word "fellow-citizens".

The temple of Diana was also a treasury, in which a large portion of the wealth of Western Asia was stored up. Guhl, a German writer, says that the Ephesian Temple was, in the ancient world, rather what the Bank of England is to-day. The emphasis on "riches" of grace and glory in the epistle to the Ephesians gathers fuller interest in the light of this fact.

During the month of May a great fair was held, and Ephesus would swarm with people from all parts of Asia.

Pliny, the Roman, writing half a century after the time of Paul's visit to Ephesus, speaks of the utter neglect into which heathen institutions had fallen in the neighbouring province of Bithynia, as a direct consequence of Christian teaching—and this in spite of the fact that the Christians were a persecuted sect.

Paul's teaching concerning the vanity of idolatry was apparently well known, for Demetrius says:

> "Not alone at Ephesus, but almost throughout all Asia, this Paul hath persuaded and turned away much people, saying that they be no gods, which are made with hands" (Acts xix. 26).

When personal interest, superstition, and racial pride combine, little more is required, and the words of Demetrius act like a spark on tow. In verse 29 we read:

> "The whole city was filled with confusion; and having caught Gaius and Aristarchus, men of Macedonia, Paul's companions in travel, they rushed with one accord into the theatre" (Acts xix. 29).

In the narrative here, there are several items of interest that confirm the accuracy of the inspired writer. It is, for instance, assumed that there was a theatre at Ephesus, and that it was large enough to hold a great concourse of people. Moreover, it is further assumed that it was natural for the people to go there, both as a confused multitude, and as a legal assembly. The ruins of the theatre testify to its original grandeur. Fellows estimates its capacity at 30,000, while Wood suggests 25,000. In any case, it was evidently a vast structure. We also read of "certain chief men of Asia" sending to the Apostle "desiring him not to adventure himself into the theatre". The original here is asiarchs, and this word is actually found on inscriptions and coins. Another point that is vouched for by archæology is the reference to the silver shrines of Diana, which are said to have been made by Demetrius (Acts xix. 24). Lewin gives an illustration of an Aedicula, or miniature shrine, of Cybele, and mention is made of similar shrines by many ancient writers.

The "town-clerk", also, is a familiar figure in the annals of the time: The original word is grammateus (Acts xix. 35), which might perhaps better be translated "recorder".

> "He had to do with state-papers; he was keeper of the archives; he read what was of public moment before the senate and assembly; he was present when money was deposited in the Temple; and when letters were sent to the people of Ephesus, they were officially addressed to him" (Conybeare and Howson).

For example, a letter sent from Apollonius to the Ephesians is addressed: Ephesion grammateusi—"To the Ephesian town-clerk".

The town-clerk refers to the city of the Ephesians as a "worshipper" (neocoros) of the goddess Diana. The word used by Luke here is peculiar, and means literally "a temple sweeper". This eventually became a title of high honour, and was boastfully exhibited on the coins of the period.

In verse 38 we read:

> "The law is open, and there are deputies: let them implead one another" (Acts xix. 38).

We learn from Pliny that these large cities were assize towns, and he specifically names in the province of Asia, Sardis, Smyrna and Ephesus. The town-clerk refers to the presence of the pro-consuls (or "deputies") and indicates that the "assizes" were actually on—"The law is open" (Agoraioi agontai).

It has been said that the recorder's speech here might well be regarded as a model for popular harangue. Such excitement, suggests the recorder was undignified, as the grandeur of their worship was unimpeached; it was unjustifiable, as they could prove nothing against the men; it was unnecessary, as other means of redress were open to them; and finally, if neither pride nor justice prevailed, the thought of the Roman power should have restrained them—for, as Hackett has remarked, "There was nothing on which the Roman looked with such jealousy as a tumultuous meeting".

The accuracy of Luke's record and the danger in which the Apostle was placed are illustrated by the account we have of the martyrdom of Polycarp.

> "The proconsul, observing Polycarp filled with confidence and joy, and his countenance brightened with grace, was astonished, and sent the herald to proclaim in the middle of the stadium, 'Polycarp confesses that he is a Christian'. When this was declared by the herald, all the multitude, Gentiles and Jews, dwelling in Smyrna called out 'This is that teacher of Asia, the father of the Christians, the destroyer of our gods; he that teacheth the multitude not to sacrifice, nor to worship'. Saying this, they cried out, and asked Philip the Asiarch to let a lion loose upon Polycarp" (Euseb. H. E. iv. 15).

We must now bring our survey of this incident to a close with two further notes:

(1) The word ekklesia is used in Acts xix. on three occasions, and it is well to bear the implications of this fact in mind when we are speaking of the "Church". The passages are as follows:

> "The assembly was confused" (Acts xix. 32).
> "Determined in a lawful assembly" (Acts xix. 39).
> "He dismissed the assembly" (Acts xix. 41).

(2) The following inscription, which is dated A.D.55, and therefore corresponds closely to the period of Acts xix., shows how accurate Luke has been in his record concerning the town-clerk.

> "Apollonius to his father . . . . . and to his mother . . . . . consecrated the enclosure and this monument . . . . . having filled the offices of clerk at this market, town-clerk, and high priest, and having been in charge of the record office. Erected on the 28th of the month Demarchusius in the year 13. He also served the senate by means of assessors in the time of the proconsul Paulus."

While much has necessarily been left unsaid, we trust that the structure of the passage and the few archæological notes that have been given, will make the story of Acts xix. the clearer, and so intensify the reader's interest in the work of the great apostle to the Gentiles.

#40. The Third Missionary Journey (xix. 21 - xxi. 39). Paul at Troas (xx. 4 - 16).

pp. 125 - 130

Continuing with our study of the Apostle's third great missionary journey, we now leave Ephesus and accompany him on his way towards Jerusalem, and eventually Rome. We have already seen from the structure (Acts xix. 21 - xxi. 39) given on page 98 that the record of this journey from Ephesus to Jerusalem is in six sections, and that the visit to Troas (B | xx. 4-16) is the second of these. We must now fill in the detail of this second section before proceeding further.

Acts xx. 4-16.

D | 4, 5. These going before (Paul and a few others went round by Macedonia—see notes).
E | 5, 6. | k | Tarried at Troas.
l | Sailed away from Philippi.
m | After days of unleavened bread.
F | 7-12. | n | Paul preached on first day of week.
o | Ready to depart on the morrow.
p | A young man, taken up dead.
q | His life is in him. Trouble not.
n | Paul talked a long while, till break of day.
o | So departed.
p | The young man, brought alive.
q | Not a little comforted.
D | 13, 14. Paul, minded to go afoot. Met at Assos.
E | 15, 16. | k | Tarried at Trogyllium.
l | Sailed by Ephesus.
m | The day of Pentecost.

Were it not for the information to be found in the epistles, we should know very little of the eventful period covered by the opening verses of Acts xx.:

> "And after the uproar was ceased, Paul called unto him the disciples, and embraced them, and departed into Macedonia. And when he had gone over those parts, and had given them much exhortation, he came into Greece" (Acts xx. 1, 2).

Before the tumult, Paul had intended to leave Ephesus at Pentecost (I Cor. xvi. 8), and had instructed Titus to meet him at Troas (II Cor. ii. 12). From the writings of Cicero, and the chronology of Wieseler, we learn that a voyage from Ephesus to Athens occupied fourteen days, and to Corinth one day longer. While awaiting with some anxiety the coming of Titus, Paul occupied himself in preaching the gospel (II Cor. ii. 12), but he adds:

> "I had no rest in my spirit, because I found not Titus my brother; and taking my leave of them, I went from thence into Macedonia" (II Cor. ii. 13).

This explanatory comment is followed in the next verse by a note of triumph which might well be written across the first four verses of Acts xx., viz., "Thanks be unto God Which always causeth us to triumph in Christ" (II Cor. ii. 14).

Leaving Troas, the Apostle goes on into Macedonia, of which Philippi was the chief city. Although his heart was warmed by the affection of the Philippians, he writes in II Cor. vii.:

> "When we were come into Macedonia, our flesh had no rest (see 'no rest', II Cor. ii. 13) but we were troubled on every side; without were fightings, within were fears" (II Cor. vii. 5).
